KEY TO REFERENCES

For greater clarity and convenience, the footnotes and cross references are printed at the bottom of each page and cross-indexed in the text itself. An asterisk (*) in the text indicates that there is a footnote to the text in question. Each footnote is in turn clearly marked with the number of the chapter and the verse to which it pertains. Similarly a superior letter (<sup>a</sup>) in the text indicates that there is a cross-reference to a particular verse. The reference itself is also clearly marked with the same letter. Hence, the reader is always aware of a footnote or a cross-reference simply by reading the text.

GENERAL AND INTRODUCTORY ARTICLES

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

The book you hold in your hand contains one of humanity's greatest treasures. No one can deny that the Bible has had a profound impact on world civilization. Its epic stories, its powerful language and images have left their imprint on human history, especially in cultures touched by Judaism and Christianity.

For the Christian, the Bible has an importance far more profound than its impact on culture. The Christian believes that through the turbulent and wonderful chapters of biblical history, God speaks to us. Although expressed in genuinely human terms and through very human authors, the Bible is, at the same time, the Word of God for us. Therefore, as Christians we reverence and love the Scriptures, and seek to understand them as much as we can.

The purpose of this newly revised and updated Catholic Study Bible is to enable the reader to read the Scriptures with new understanding and depth. The primary audience of this Study Bible is Roman Catholic. Some of the comments in the notes to the text, the Reference Articles, and the Reading Guides deliberately reflect Catholic experience and Catholic interests. However, the editors do not wish to exclude other Christian readers from the focus of this book. In most instances, the materials included here will be useful for all Christians who want to enter deeply into the mysteries and marvels of the Bible.

In this general introduction and the two following articles, we hope to: (1) Provide a general introduction to the Bible as a whole: the nature and diversity of its contents, and how it came to be; (2) introduce the reader to the special resources for understanding the Bible provided in this new edition of the Catholic Study Bible and to suggest more profitable ways of using them.

INTRODUCING THE BIBLE

Although it is bound under one cover and bears a single title, the Bible is not a single, unified book. It is, in fact, a collection of some seventy-three different works by different authors, using very different styles and perspectives, composed over a span of several centuries, and in three different languages (Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek). Most of the Old Testament (forty-six books) was written in Hebrew, but parts of the books of Daniel (2:4–7:28), Ezra (4:6–6:18; 7:12–26), and one verse from Jeremiah (10:11) were originally composed in Aramaic, a Middle Eastern language related to but different from Hebrew. The book of Wisdom is written in Greek but some scholars believe it was originally composed in Hebrew. All twenty-seven of the New Testament books were composed in Greek.

The rich diversity of the Bible is one of its glories because it allows the story of God's people to be told from various perspectives. It also presents a challenge to the reader who should be aware of the different cultural, historical, and literary contexts of each biblical book. But there is a deeper unity to the Bible that binds together these individual pieces of literature. Through the many biblical books flows the continuing saga of God's love for Israel and for the church. Each of the biblical authors, no matter how much separated in time, culture, and literary style, shares a conviction that God's presence is felt in human history and that God invites the human family to respond with faith and integrity.

The Writing of the Bible

As its diverse makeup implies, the Bible was not written at a single point in history. The events covered in the Old Testament span nearly two thousand years of history, from the time of Abraham and the patriarchs (around 1800 BC) to the period of the Maccabean wars (140 BC). If one includes the epic accounts of the creation and prepatriarchal stories such as Noah and the flood, then the reach of the biblical saga goes back to the beginning of time. But the actual formulation of the biblical accounts, although making use of earlier stories and traditions, is confined to a narrower period of time, probably beginning with the monarchy (around 1000 BC) and concluding in the century before the birth of Christ.

The New Testament books were all written during the latter half of the first century AD, although some recent scholars assert that the Gospel of John and the Acts of the Apostles may have been composed in the early part of the second century. The letters of Paul were probably the earliest

New Testament works to be put in writing, dating mainly from the decade of the fifties of the first century. The sayings of Jesus and the many stories about his ministry circulated in the Christian community all during these early decades of the church but were probably not put in writing until shortly after AD 70, with Mark the first Gospel to be written. Matthew, Luke (and his second volume, the Acts of the Apostles), and John follow, with the compositions of their Gospels taking place sometime during the last quarter of the first century. The other non-Pauline letters and writings, including the book of Revelation or the Apocalypse, also date from this period.

Forming a “Bible” from Diverse Books: The Story of the Canon

The gathering of these diverse writings into a single collection or “book” (the literal meaning of the word Bible) was itself a long-term and laborious process. The technical term for designating which books belong to the Bible is canon (from the Greek term for “rule” or “measuring stick”). Both Judaism and Christianity had to make choices about which books to include and which books to exclude from their respective Bibles. Judaism would not make any official decision about which books belonged to its Bible until the end of the first century AD, but that does not mean it was without a Bible for so much of its history. There was little or no dispute about the major books of the Old Testament, those that were constantly used in Jewish liturgy and teaching, but there was debate about the inclusion of later and less central works such as Tobit or the Wisdom of Solomon.

The Jewish or Hebrew canon ultimately recognizes thirty-nine books, divided into three major categories:

1. The Law (sometimes referred to as the Pentateuch, or first five books of the Bible): Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy.
2. The Prophets: Subdivided into the “Former Prophets”: Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings; and the “Latter Prophets”: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the “Twelve”: Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi.
3. The Writings: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles.

As we shall explain below, not included in the official Jewish or Hebrew canon are seven other books that Roman Catholics (and Orthodox Christians) consider part of their Scriptures. Judaism reverences these books and considers them sacred, but they are not part of their canon or official list. These books are: Tobit, Judith, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Wisdom, Sirach/Ecclesiasticus, and Baruch. There are also some additional passages in the books of Daniel and Esther.

The formation of the Christian canon also took place over a considerable period of time. In fact, the official Roman Catholic decision about the canon did not come until the Council of Trent (1545–63), but by that time the choice of which writings were to be included in the Bible was well established. There were many sacred writings in the early decades of the church, which presumably could have been included in the Bible. We cannot always tell what criteria or decision-making processes were used to establish the canon. Some “gospels” evidently portrayed Jesus in a way unacceptable to the vast majority of Christians and so were not included. Other early writings, however, such as the Didache (Greek for “teaching”)—a short handbook of moral behavior and church practice—seem perfectly acceptable in content and tone but were still not included. Probably the early church considered a work’s content, its authorship, and the frequency of its usage in the liturgy and teaching of the churches as important criteria for judging if a sacred writing was inspired by God and worthy of inclusion in its official canon or Scriptures. Some recent scholars have asserted that the present New Testament canon was formulated by Orthodox church leaders in collaboration with Roman imperial authorities in order to maintain ecclesiastical control and to suppress more charismatic elements in emerging Christianity, but far more important and decisive was the reception and use of these canonical books by the faith communities of the early Church.

All Christians agree on the twenty-seven books in the New Testament, but there is a dispute about some of the books in the Old Testament. As noted earlier, Roman Catholics and Orthodox Christians agree on the forty-six books that make up the Old Testament (the Orthodox include additional books in their canon: 1 and 2 Esdras; the Prayer of Manasseh; Psalm 151; 3 Maccabees). Judaism and Protestant Christians hold for the shorter list of thirty-nine books listed above; the remaining seven are designated as the “apocryphal” books.

The reason for this divergence is that earliest Christianity used an ancient Greek translation of the Old Testament (called the Septuagint and prepared by Jewish sages) as its Bible. This Greek version of the Bible included forty-six books. Since most of the early Christians were Greek-speaking, this is the Bible they preferred. But when Judaism officially set out to determine its canon at the end of the first century, it drew up a shorter list of thirty-nine books: those written in Hebrew. In the Reformation period, Protestants went back to this shorter, Hebrew canon, considering it more authentic.

Today, many of the doctrinal tensions that separated Catholics and Protestants have eased. Some Protestant editions of the Bible include the seven apocryphal (what Roman Catholics call deuterocanonical) books in an appendix of their Bibles or in a special section between the Old and New Testaments. Following usual Catholic practice, the New American Bible integrates the deuterocanonical books into the order of the Old Testament canon.

THE DIVERSE LITERARY FORMS AND HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE BIBLE

The broad span of biblical history and the fact that the Bible is a collection of various books signal its rich diversity. The reader of the Bible needs to be attentive not only to the historical context of a particular passage but to the varieties of literary forms and the specific style and intent of each biblical author. The prophetic oracles of Isaiah or Jeremiah are very different in literary style from the legal codes of Leviticus or the narratives of Exodus. The long lists of wise sayings in Proverbs are dramatically different in tone, style, and theology from the sweeping liturgical poetry of the Psalms. So, too, do the parables of the Gospels differ greatly from the letters of Paul or the dramatic apocalyptic scenes in the book of Revelation. The notes and Reading Guides found in this Study Bible help the reader understand more about these various literary forms and their implications for interpreting the meaning of a particular biblical passage.

The presence of various literary forms or means of expression in the Bible also complicates the issue of the historical value of the Bible. Some Christians, particularly fundamentalist Christians, fear that admitting the Bible contains poetry, stories, and other literary forms is somehow an attack on the veracity of the Bible and dilutes its witness to history. They prefer to regard the story of creation in Genesis, or the episode of Jonah's sojourn in the belly of a great fish, as literally true.

Roman Catholic teaching—and that of many other Christian denominations—sees no incompatibility between recognizing the truth of the biblical witness and the fact that it is expressed in many forms of literary expression characteristic of human communication. Credible witness to the truth of history is not confined to an “objective” reporting of the facts in the manner of a police report or a mere “factual” description of what happened. All reporting of history involves a degree of interpretation, and such means as poetry, hymns, stories, myths, and other literary forms can also communicate historical truth about past events and the perspectives of our ancestors.

Undoubtedly, both the Old and New Testaments contain many accurate historical facts and descriptions reflecting the times and events of biblical history. But the biblical writers also wanted to interpret the meaning of that history and present it unabashedly from their perspectives. Previous traditions are given new interpretations and adapted to the circumstances of a different generation. In most instances their intent was not to provide a historical archive for subsequent generations but to see in the events of this history the presence of God’s grace, and to communicate that conviction to their readers. The Bible is a witness to the vitality of the people who lived its events and pondered their meaning in a spirit of faith. Each biblical passage, therefore, must be evaluated on its own terms in attempting to distinguish between factual historical data and the theological and historical interpretation provided by the biblical writer.

THE TRANSMISSION OF THE BIBLICAL TEXT AND ITS MODERN TRANSLATIONS

Each modern reader of the Bible is in debt to countless numbers of people—Jewish and Christian—who lovingly handed on to the next generations the treasures of the Bible. For much of biblical history, such transmission of the biblical tradition was done orally, not in written form. Stories, sayings of great teachers and leaders, hymns, and poetry were lovingly memorized and handed down from parents to children, teacher to disciple, from leader of prayer to congregation, and, thereby, formed the growing body of the biblical heritage.

In ancient (and some modern) cultures, oral transmission of important literature was not a casual, haphazard affair. For our modern culture, so dependent on written and electronic means of communicating information, it is hard to realize that in oral cultures subtle and often unspoken rules govern how information is shaped, retained, and transmitted from one person and one generation to another. But as styles of writing and writing materials became more sophisticated in Israel, and when it had the social organization under the monarchy to have archives and develop an educated class of scribes, then undoubtedly some parts of the Bible were preserved in written form as well.

In the New Testament, many of the Gospel materials were first preserved in oral form. Sayings of Jesus, his parables, the stories about his healings, his conflicts with opponents, and the narrative of his Passion would have been preserved and transmitted in a variety of settings such as the liturgy, instruction within the home or small Christian communities, or, perhaps even more formally, in some early centers of Christian learning. But eventually these oral materials were gathered and put in written form by the evangelists. It is likely that the oral transmission of the biblical materials, both Old and New Testaments, continued to exist and be employed even after the biblical text had been put into writing. Paul's letters and other New Testament texts such as the Catholic Epistles and the book of Revelation were composed or dictated into written form immediately.

No original manuscript of any biblical book exists. Copyists from one generation to the next transcribed the biblical materials and enabled them to be available for subsequent generations. The earliest written manuscripts we have of some Old Testament biblical materials date from the first century BC. These were part of the wealth of written materials discovered in 1948 on the northwest shore of the Dead Sea and thereafter called the "Dead Sea Scrolls." Most of the other early written materials for both the Old and the New Testaments would be papyrus fragments of biblical passages dating from the early second century AD and more complete manuscripts of the Bible on parchment from the third and fourth centuries AD.

The biblical texts of the ancient church did not have the neat format of our modern Bible. Division into the present system of chapters and verses was introduced only in the Middle Ages. Prior to that, demarcations between individual sentences and sections of a particular biblical book were much more casual and fluid. The hands of many copyists, with different personal interests and levels of skill, inevitably introduced some variations and errors into the numerous editions of the biblical text. Ancient translations or versions of manuscripts into other languages, such as Latin or Syriac or Coptic, could also introduce errors or varying interpretations not found in the original biblical language.

The science of textual criticism attempts to trace the relationships of ancient manuscripts to each other and to reestablish the most reliable form of the biblical text. The discovery of biblical texts among the Dead Sea Scrolls rolled back our acquaintance with extant biblical manuscripts several centuries. Surprisingly, although some variants exist, there is still remarkable correspondence between the state of the biblical text in the first century BC and the third or fourth century AD—testimony to the accuracy and care with which ancient peoples handed on the biblical tradition.

The New American Bible Translation

Most modern translations, including that found in the revised edition of the New American Bible (NAB) used in this Catholic Study Bible, are based on the most reliable texts of the Bible we have and are translated from the original biblical languages rather than using any intervening translations. Many previous Catholic translations had been based on the Vulgate, or Latin version of the Bible, first prepared by Jerome in the fifth century.

As the preface to the NAB states (see pp. 3–6 of the Old Testament section), its translation was a collaborative achievement of some fifty Catholic biblical scholars, determined to use the best of modern scholarship to bring a fresh and accurate translation of the Bible to the American Catholic community.

The first full edition of the Old and New Testaments appeared in 1970. A revision of the New Testament appeared in 1986, and the NAB Revised Edition in 2011. It is this fully revised edition that is used in this latest version of the Catholic Study Bible.

Every translation, no matter how accurate and faithful, falls short in attempting to communicate the subtlety and meaning of another language. All translators have to make decisions about the purpose and audience of their translation, and the consequent principles they will use in translating the Bible from its original languages to a modern language such as American English. And, to some degree, every translation is a subtle “interpretation” of the biblical text.

The translators of the NAB wanted as much as possible to accurately reflect the nuance and form of biblical Hebrew and Greek, while recasting the language to make it compatible with the rules and style of modern English and in harmony with traditional Catholic interpretations of Scripture. The translators, however, wanted to avoid making the NAB a “paraphrase” or quasi-interpretation of the biblical text. Some modern translations attempt this. While such paraphrases perhaps make the biblical texts more palatable to a modern audience, they also risk a high degree of subjectivity in recasting the contents of the Bible. The NAB translation is faithful to the biblical text and takes its place alongside rigorously literal translations such as the Revised Standard Version. This makes it particularly suitable for deeper study of the biblical message, as well as its use in prayer and liturgy.

Accuracy of translation from one language to another also involves issues that are more than linguistic, such as cultural and social expectations. For instance, the editors of the revised New Testament translation had to struggle with the question of inclusive language. This is a sensitive issue in modern American culture and in the Catholic Church in particular. The translators adopted a compromise stance here. Where the original biblical language clearly intended a generic reference to human beings, the translation is careful to use inclusive language. Where the original text uses a gender specific reference, however, such as many references to God through male pronouns, the translation does not attempt to use inclusive language.

Modern political issues can also cause difficulties for the translator. Such geographical terms as Israel or Palestine have highly charged meanings in the political arena of today’s Middle East. But their appearance in the biblical translation of the NAB implies no endorsement of any modern political stance on these difficult issues. So, too, can modern religious sensitivities come into play. Judaism in all its modern forms, out of reverence, avoids the use of the name Yahweh for God. Readers in the synagogue, for example, will substitute Adonai (“my Lord”) wherever the divine name appears in the biblical text. The modern translator and commentator have to make a decision on whether to try to respect this understandable religious sensitivity.

It should be noted that the Reading Guides and major Reference Articles included in the Catholic Study Bible attempt throughout to use inclusive language, and, wherever possible, to avoid offense to modern religious, cultural, or political sensitivities. The editors believed that such a spirit is in accord with both the biblical witness and sound Catholic tradition. Some use of the geographical terms Israel and Palestine was unavoidable in some of the Reading Guides, but no reference to modern geopolitical realities is intended.

READING, STUDYING, AND PRAYING THE SCRIPTURES

From the beginning of its existence, the Bible has been the object of intense study, prayerful reading, and even heated debate. The Bible is not meant to be a coffee-table book.

One could say that the Bible was formed in a context of prayer and reflection. The various biblical authors reflected on significant events in the life of Israel, of Jesus, and of the early church. Their discovery of God's presence working within history gives the Bible its force. For all Christians the Bible has unique authority as writings inspired by God's Spirit working within the communities of Israel and the Church, and impelling the biblical writers to give expression in human words to their faith perspective. (For a Catholic view of biblical inspiration, see "The Bible in Catholic Life," RG 19–32 and "Biblical Translation and Pastoral Interpretation," RG 88–99.)

Judaism has always maintained a rich tradition of reflection on its Scriptures. The rabbis lovingly studied every detail of the biblical text and saw an infinite possibility of applications to everyday life. The Scriptures were revered as God's Word and took a central place within the prayer life of the synagogue. Christian tradition has had the same character. Until the Late Middle Ages (ca. 1300–1500), almost all of the Church's theology and teaching was little more than an elaboration of the biblical text.

Some of this biblical focus was lost in the Catholic Church when philosophical analysis—always important—became overdominant and theological reflection could often be far distant in focus and spirit from our biblical foundations: While biblical symbols remained dominant in Catholic liturgical life and architecture, however in popular preaching and much popular piety the Bible was often a more distant echo. In the past fifty years, that trend has been radically reversed. The Second Vatican Council gave a strong impetus to a biblical renewal in every dimension of Catholicism as has subsequent papal documents such as Pope Benedict XVI's exhortation, Verbum Domini (The Word of the Lord) and that of Pope Francis, Evangelii Gaudium (“The Joy of the Gospel”); see further: “The Bible in Catholic Life,” RG 19–32, and “Biblical Translation and Pastoral Interpretation,” RG 88–99.

One can approach reading and study of the Bible from several vantage points.

The Historical Approach. One purpose in reading the Bible can be to comb through the biblical books, seeking leads to the historical context of a given period or culture. While this is a legitimate historical enterprise, it does not correspond to the fundamentally religious character of the Bible. The Bible does have strong historical value, but its purpose is not simply to inform the reader about history but to probe the meaning of past history for the life of faith.

The Theological Approach. Another way of entering the biblical world is to seek what the Bible, or a particular biblical book, has to say on a specific doctrinal or moral issue. What, for example, does the Bible say about violence? Or what is the biblical perspective on justice? Because the Bible is such a rich and diverse body of literature, we soon discover that the Bible will yield many perspectives on such important issues. There is seldom a single or uniform biblical viewpoint on any specific theological or moral issue. Only by first understanding the context of each biblical period and biblical book, and then interrelating the Bible’s varied approaches to profound questions of faith, can one weave together a coherent biblical theology.

The Inspirational Approach. For most Christians, reading the Bible has a more modest, yet still important goal. They turn to the Scriptures for inspiration in living out their life of faith. Such inspiration can be gained in many different ways.

For some, the Scriptures are an important stimulant for prayer. The words of the Psalms, the challenge of the prophets, the compassionate mission of Jesus, the soaring words of Paul—all of these give form and expression to the longings of our own hearts as we seek the face of God. Very often the biblical words are able to express the feelings and fears and hopes we could not put into words ourselves. And in reaching out to the Bible we unite ourselves with the faith of countless generations of Christians who found the same solace and strength in the Scriptures.

For others, probing the Scriptures either in private or with a group of fellow Christians helps guide and illumine their daily life. Study of the biblical text and discussion of its meaning with other thoughtful Christians can help us understand our own experience of faith and expand our perspective on what it means to be a believer in the modern world. This approach works best when the participant is not afraid to reflect on his or her own experience, and can then relate that reflection to the ideas and images of the Bible. Very often the Bible opens its treasures when we bring to it questions and hopes that spring from our everyday experience and our life of faith. Then, in turn, the biblical message can give new insight and nourishment to our faith experience.

A profound sense of grief or loss, for example, might lead a Christian to read with new understanding the lament psalms of the Old Testament (RG 279–80) or the Passion of Jesus. And these biblical passages, in turn, can bring new strength to the one who suffers.

Whatever approach one takes to reading and praying the Bible, it is important from a Catholic perspective that it not be done in isolation. The Bible is the Church's book, not a private library. Only in the context of the Church's faith and tradition as a whole can the full meaning of the Bible be discovered. Some Christians who isolate themselves from common sense and from the sound wisdom of the Church community can interpret the Scriptures in a bizarre and even destructive manner. That is why the effort to understand the biblical text in its context and to take into account the entirety of the Scriptures, to sound out its possible meaning with other thoughtful Christians, and to be open to the guidance of the Church and its teaching forms the best context for full integration of the Bible into our lives (on this see the 1993 statement of the Pontifical Biblical Commission, The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church. This statement, as well as the reflections of Pope Benedict XVI in Verbum Domini, fully endorses the historical critical method and stresses the importance of biblical interpretation for a community of faith.).

This newly revised and updated Catholic Study Bible is designed to open the beauty and power of the Bible to the reader. The editors and the Oxford University Press hope that the guides, reference articles, and other resources provided in this unique volume will serve you well as you step into the marvelous world of the Bible.

THE BIBLICAL TEXTS AND THEIR BACKGROUND

DONALD SENIOR

The biblical writings were created over a wide expanse of time. That broad historical and cultural canvas is one important cause for the Bible's rich diversity. In this Study Bible, the Reading Guides provided for each biblical book, and the introductions provided in the notes to the biblical text itself, offer specific information about the historical background of the individual books of the Bible. A clear and succinct historical summary is provided in the reference articles "Biblical History and Archaeology" (RG 33–71). The following paragraphs sketch the relationship of the biblical books to that evolving history.

The accounts of creation and the stories about the first ancestors of the human family, such as the tragic rivalry between Cain and Abel, and the story of Noah and the flood, obviously do not have the same historical grounding that later traditions could. These stories answer the question about the origin of humanity and its plight in history. Firm historical traditions begin only with the forging of Israel into an identifiable people, an event that did not begin until probably around 1250 BC. Traditions about the earlier patriarchal period starting around 1850 BC are much less certain historically, and even events from the time of Israel's sojourn in Egypt and during the period of the Exodus and early settlement in the land are sketchy; at that point in Israel's history there were few means for the biblical peoples to preserve historical archives.

THE MAJOR PERIODS OF BIBLICAL HISTORY

The Time of the Patriarchs (1850–1250 BC)

The period from Abraham to Joseph is recounted in Genesis 12–50. Historically, this was a period of vast migrations in the Middle East, with clans of herders moving freely from Mesopotamia down through the Fertile Crescent into present-day Israel. Egypt had been a dominant power in the Middle East for more than two thousand years prior to that time. Egypt's might was counterbalanced by a succession of powerful dynasties at the eastern end of the Fertile Crescent, including the Persians, Assyrians, and Babylonians. Israel, located geographically between those two areas, would often be the battleground for those opposing forces. (See map #6.)

Few firm historical traditions exist from this period, but the general picture provided in the biblical traditions about the patriarchs does reflect something of the nomadic lifestyle and familial religion typical of the period.

The Exodus, Wilderness Wandering, and Settlement in the Land (1250–1130 BC)

This period is covered in Exodus, Deuteronomy, Numbers, and Joshua. The story of Israel as a unified people begins in Egypt with the stories about Moses and the miraculous exodus from Egypt. During a period of wandering in the desert, the covenant was formed with Yahweh, the Lord, the God of Israel. Under the leadership of Joshua, Israel finally breaks through into the Promised Land, driving the native Canaanites before them.

There is considerable debate about the historical background to this period. Some scholars, particularly conservative ones, are willing to accept the biblical portrayal at face value: namely that there was a mass migration of Hebrews from Egypt and that they invaded the regions of Israel with military force and thereby gained possession of the land.

The lack of clear archaeological evidence supporting such a vast military conquest, and some ambiguity in the biblical traditions themselves, have led other historians to surmise that both the migration from Egypt and the possession of the land took place over a longer period of time. Some Hebrew tribes may have already settled in Israel prior to the Exodus and joined with the incoming tribes at a later period. While some Canaanite cities may have been taken by force, some of the land was probably settled in a peaceful and more evolutionary fashion.

In any event, the Bible sees this process as a dramatic act of deliverance by God and as the historic beginning of the story of Israel.

The Period of the Judges (1130–1020 BC)

This early period of Israelite history is narrated in the book of Judges. It is clear that the Israelites at first resisted the idea of a strong central government. They preferred a loosely organized federation of clans or tribes ruled by charismatic leaders called judges. Only the LORD could claim the right to be called king. This independent spirit and aversion to the monarchy goes deep into the consciousness of Israel.

The Monarchy (1020–587 BC)

This long, but in fact highly diverse, period of Israel's history is taken up in the books of 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, and a parallel account in 1 and 2 Chronicles.

The transition from the more informal and charismatic leadership under the judges to the more institutional form of the monarchy begins with Saul (about 1020–1000 BC) but reaches its zenith with David (1000–960 BC) and Solomon (960–930 BC). Threats from surrounding peoples and the need for more complex social organization gradually led Israel to adopt a monarchical form of government. David eventually unified diverse groups of people under a single government system and ruled from his new centrally located capital of Jerusalem. Under David and his son Solomon, Israel's territories greatly expanded.

The united kingdom forged by David did not last very long. Solomon strained it by increasing taxation and by lack of sensitivity to the old tribal loyalties. When Solomon's son Rehoboam ascended to the throne, the seams between north and south split, and the separate kingdoms of Judah in the south and Israel in the north began. This divided monarchy would last until 724 BC, when the Assyrian empire would crush the Northern Kingdom. Judah would survive until the Babylonian invasion of 587 BC.

The biblical account has little respect for the northern rulers and takes a critical view of most of the kings of Judah as well, considering them unfaithful to the covenant. During this period the great prophetic movement would ignite in Israel. Elijah, Elisha, Amos, and Hosea were prophets in the northern kingdom. Isaiah served as court prophet to the kings of Judah.

Exile and Return (587–332 BC)

This crucial period of Israelite history is narrated in 2 Kings 24–25 and in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The Babylonian captivity would last almost fifty years. Systematic deportation as a way of subduing conquered peoples had been used first by Assyrians and then by the Babylonians. Only a small remnant of Israelites was left behind under the firm control of Babylonian officials. When the exiled Jews eventually returned to Judah, they considered the people who had stayed behind as somehow corrupt and would not allow them to take part in the reconstruction of their nation, a source of bitterness that would lead to the sharp divisions between Jews and Samaritans so obvious in the New Testament period.

Under the leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah, Jerusalem and its Temple were rebuilt. But Israel was now only a small and fragile nation, clustered around Jerusalem and very concerned with preserving its identity.

The Greek Conquest and the Rise of the Hasmoneans (332–39 BC)

This is a turbulent part of Israelite history, reflected in 1 and 2 Maccabees and Daniel.

Alexander conquered Palestine in 332 BC, beginning a period in which Greek culture would have a strong impact on the life of Israel. After his death, the Middle Eastern portion of Alexander's empire was divided between the Seleucid dynasty, which ruled from Syria, and the Ptolemies who ruled from Egypt. The Ptolemaic dynasty controlled Israel from approximately 332 to 199 BC. Their generally benign rule gave way to the Seleucids, who attempted to impose Greek culture and taxation in a more rigorous fashion, driven in part by needing to respond to the increasing encroachment of the Roman Empire in the eastern part of the Mediterranean. Seleucid ruthlessness eventually triggered the Maccabean revolt, which by 160 BC had thrown off the yoke of the Seleucids against incredible odds.

The Jewish dynasty of the Hasmonean family now began a hundred-year reign. The Hasmonean kings proved to be as corrupt and ruthless as the foreigners who had preceded them. Reactions by pious Jews to the compromises of the Hasmoneans and their Jerusalem aristocracy would give rise to protest groups such as the Essenes and Pharisees. By 60 BC, Roman influence was becoming more dominant in the Middle East and brought pressure on Israel itself. The Hasmonean period came to an end with the outbreak of civil war among various factions and the eventual successful emergence of Herod the Great, a vassal of the Romans, who would unify the country and hold it in his grip.

The Roman Period (39 BC–AD 100)

The New Testament writings emerge during this period of biblical history. With the death of Herod in 4 BC, the Romans divided Israel among Herod's three sons. Eventually the Romans removed the cruel and incompetent Archelaus, taking over direct rule of Judah and Samaria. Herod Philip and Herod Antipas would continue to govern in the regions of Upper Galilee, Lower Galilee, and the Transjordan (see map #12)

Roman rule and its heavy taxation eventually proved intolerable to the Jewish people. Tensions mounted all during the first half of the first century, exploding into revolution in AD 66. That revolt would be violently suppressed by the Romans, climaxing with the destruction of Jerusalem and its great Temple in AD 70. That event would change the complexion of Judaism forever. Another short-lived revolt would break out in AD 132. The Romans would continue to occupy Palestine until the time of the Byzantine empire. All of these events left a profound impression on the writings of the New Testament.

USING THE CATHOLIC STUDY BIBLE

DONALD SENIOR

HOW TO USE THIS STUDY BIBLE

This one-volume Catholic Study Bible offers a full range of aids to help the reader discover the meaning of the Bible. The following description of its contents, and suggestions for using the book, might help you take full advantage of its unique resources.

The Resources of the Study Bible

There are seven major sections in this volume:

The Revised Edition of the *New American Bible

Beginning on page 7 of the Old Testament section, you will find the full text and notes of the revised edition of the NAB. Each major section of the Bible and each biblical book has a brief introduction. Extensive notes explaining words or individual verses are found at the bottom of the page. Asterisks (*) or other sigla alongside a particular word or verse signal to you that an explanatory footnote is provided for that biblical text. These footnotes are the official notes that were prepared by the editors of the NAB, and they provide a wealth of specific information for the studious reader.

The NAB also provides cross-references to other related biblical passages. These cross-references are indicated by a small italic letter printed within specific verses. The cross-reference is found at the bottom of the page.

Finally, along the side margins there is another set of cross-references, directing you to the Reading Guides and Reference Articles found in other sections of the Catholic Study Bible. These cross-references are indicated by page numbers enclosed within a shaded box. Page numbers referring to the Reading Guides and Reference Articles are preceded by the letters RG.

The Reading Guides

One of the most important special features of this Study Bible is the Reading Guides found in the front section beginning on page RG 109. There are Guides for each book of the Bible, and their purpose is precisely to lead the reader through the structure and basic message of each biblical book.

The notes found at the bottom of the page with the NAB translation provide information on specific details of a given verse. The Reading Guides, on the other hand, add a new perspective by taking a broader look at each biblical book, tracing its major sections and themes, and making suggestions about its meaning for today. Each of them also provides references to other books and articles for readers who want to continue their study of specific issues.

Reference Articles

Another helpful feature of the the Catholic Study Bible is that it provides extensive and detailed reference articles on key issues for understanding and using the Bible. These articles will prove especially valuable for those who want to probe deeper into a particular question. In addition to this introduction, the reader will find the following Reference Articles:

- “The Bible in Catholic Life” explains the Roman Catholic view of Scripture and the meaning of biblical inspiration.
- There are two articles on history and archaeology—“Biblical History and Archaeology: Old Testament” and “Biblical History and Archaeology: New Testament.” These offer a succinct overview of the major periods of biblical history along with a helpful explanation of the methods and major discoveries of biblical archaeology.
- “Catholic Interpretation of the Bible” traces the history of the Church’s approach to the meaning of Scripture.
- “Biblical Translation and Pastoral Interpretation” considers how translating a sacred text from one language to another is both an art and a science, and also explores from a Catholic perspective how the Scriptures are to be interpreted within a community of faith.

- “The Bible in the Lectionary” explains the role of the Bible in liturgy and, in particular, shows the rationale for the selection of biblical passages in the Lectionary. This will be useful for preachers or those who prepare liturgies.

A number of other helpful resources can be found at the back of the volume:

Glossary. The glossary provides clear explanations of less familiar or more technical terms used in the Bible or in the Reading Guides and Resource Articles.

Concordance. This word index provides key citations for important biblical names and terms.

Measures and Weights. This provides modern equivalents for measures and weights mentioned in the Bible.

Lectionary. This provides the complete listing of the biblical texts assigned for the Sunday and Daily Readings in the three-year Catholic Lectionary.

Index to the Reading Guides. This is a useful index to names and topics covered in the Reading Guides.

Biblical Maps and Index. This includes an extensive set of Oxford biblical maps, which provide the reader with the entire geographical canvas on which the biblical drama is portrayed, along with an index to help locate names of places found in the maps.

Suggestions for Use

The resources of the Catholic Study Bible enable the reader to use it in a variety of ways and settings.

For Individual Reading or Study

If your goal is to read and reflect on a single biblical book or major passage of the Bible, the two key sections of the Study Bible to use are the biblical text itself and the Reading Guides. Both should be used in tandem.

You may wish to read through the introductions to the biblical book first, both the one found in the Reading Guide and in the NAB text. In turning to the Gospel of Luke, for example, one would read the introduction in the Reading Guide on RG 442–57 and then turn to the Bible section on pp. 1433–85. After that the reader can pick his or her way through the Gospel, noting the major characteristics of the biblical passage and its major motifs by attentive reading of the biblical text and its accompanying notes, and by referring to the information provided in the Reading Guide.

For the more ambitious reader, the “Suggested Readings” at the end of the Reading Guides and in the Reference Articles offer leads to further study.

For Group Study

The Catholic Study Bible lends itself well to group use. If each member of the group has a copy, then the leader could suggest the reading of a specific biblical text and the accompanying section from the Reading Guide as a good means of preparing for the group session. Preparation always enhances group Bible study. Often the Reading Guide will provide some points of reflection that a group might find helpful as a starting point for discussion about the meaning of a passage.

Some of the articles, such as the ones on “The Bible in Catholic Life” and “The Bible in the Lectionary,” could also be fruitful sources for group study and discussion. Where the group itself does not have access to individual copies, the Catholic Study Bible can serve as a resource for the leader or can be on hand for reference when the group discussion generates a question that needs further information. The availability of the Glossary for checking the meaning of technical terms or unfamiliar biblical concepts, along with the Concordance for looking up biblical texts relating to a specific topic or theme is also valuable. Likewise, the Index to the Reading Guides can lead the reader to further information.

Teaching Resource

The Catholic Study Bible is particularly useful for the college or religious education classroom. It provides teacher and student with virtually a one-volume textbook and reference library on the Bible. Experienced and imaginative teachers will find their own ways to best utilize a book like this. A few suggestions might help.

The Study Bible can certainly serve as a textbook for a course on the Bible as a whole or for introductions to the Old or New Testaments. Here again interplay between pertinent sections of the Reading Guides, the biblical text and notes, and the Reference Articles and other resource materials is very important.

Teachers in a Catholic setting may want to give special attention to the article on “The Bible in Catholic Life” and the article on “Biblical Translation and Pastoral Interpretation,” as both are important summaries of Catholic teaching on the role of the Bible in the Church’s life and thought. “The Bible in the Lectionary” will help Catholics (and Christians from other mainline denominations) understand how the liturgy is a major source of biblical inspiration for Roman Catholic tradition; the complete list of biblical readings assigned in the Lectionary will also illustrate this point.

The volume will also support a course on the history and geography of the Bible. The articles on the history and archaeology of the Bible provide clear and useful information. The accompanying maps and index enable the teacher to discuss the geography of the Bible in detail. The maps can especially be a useful illustration when studying such narratives as Exodus, the historical books, the Gospels, Acts, and Paul’s letters.

Sermon and Liturgy Preparation

The thematic approach of the Reading Guides and the attempt they make to relate the biblical message to spirituality and Church teaching should prove useful for sermon and liturgy preparation.

The reference article on “The Bible in the Lectionary” provides important and often neglected information on the rationale for the selection and arrangement of biblical passages in the Lectionary, and offers good suggestions about relating the Bible to the liturgical year. The list of biblical readings found in the Catholic Lectionary alerts the preacher to upcoming selections in the Sunday and Weekday liturgies throughout the year. Here, too, the Concordance and Index to the Reading Guides can provide leads to the interpretation of specific passage.

Conclusion

Few one-volume study bibles contain the wide variety of practical resources and leads for study and pastoral use of the Bible as found in this revised and updated edition of the Catholic Study Bible. We hope it provides our readers great help in the work of bringing the Word of God to our Christian communities and to our world.

THE BIBLE IN CATHOLIC LIFE

DANIEL J. HARRINGTON

CHURCH LIFE TODAY

One of the great achievements of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) has been the renewal of interest in the Bible among Catholics. How dramatic this renewal has been can be grasped by comparing Catholic practice around 1950 and the situation in the early years of the twenty-first century.

At mid-twentieth century the Scriptures were read at Mass in Latin. There were few selections from the Old Testament, and a rather small number of New Testament passages dominated the one-year cycle. In response to the mandate of the Second Vatican Council we now have a three-year cycle of Sunday readings and a two-year weekday cycle. (See “The Bible in the Lectionary,” RG 100–108.) The Old Testament is very prominent, and almost the entire New Testament (Gospels and Epistles) is represented. The passages, of course, are read in the vernacular (English, Spanish, or whatever is the dominant local language).

In the 1950s study of Bible texts was not an integral part of the primary- or secondary-school curriculum in Catholic schools. At best, Bible content was conveyed through summaries of the texts. Catholic college students might work through parts of the Bible with the aid of cautious and approved textbooks as guides. But now the texts of the Bible form a primary resource for Catholic religious education at all levels. And Bible courses and Bible study groups have become especially popular forums for adult education.

At this same time, Catholic seminarians took most of their Scripture courses toward the end of their theology programs. In comparison with dogma and moral theology, Scripture study was considered a minor course. Now biblical studies are a major component of the seminary curriculum at all stages. And such courses are very popular. Students in Catholic seminaries assume that much of their preaching and teaching in the future will be devoted to the Bible, and so they study it with eagerness. There is also a lively dialogue and interdisciplinary cooperation between professors of Scripture and their theological colleagues.

Since Vatican II the Bible has become prominent not only in Catholic liturgy and education but also in popular piety. The revised prayers for the sacraments and other liturgical actions use biblical language almost entirely. Charismatic groups and base communities have found biblical reflection and prayer to be the source of great spiritual energy. Even traditional Catholic observances like the Rosary are (and always have been) thoroughly biblical. The language of Catholic prayer in almost every instance derives from the Bible.

The Scriptures have also been a major element in the ecumenical movement since the Vatican II. The serious historical and theological differences between the Christian churches remain, but the most progress has been made where the different church groups have focused on the Bible as their common heritage and have reexamined their differences in light of the Bible's language and thought patterns. When this has occurred, the usual result has been the recognition that what unites the Christian churches is more important and fundamental than what divides them. In the new and more positive relationship that has emerged between Christians and Jews in recent years, Bible study has been a vital force toward greater mutual understanding and respect.

Catholic theology since the council gives far more attention to biblical sources and is likely to express itself more in biblical than in philosophical language. Official church documents on theological matters or current problems almost always begin from Scripture and try to ground their arguments in biblical texts. The Catholic Church today is far more biblical than it was in the mid-1950s.

BIBLE STUDY IN HISTORY

In order to understand the Bible's place in Catholic thinking today, it can be helpful to see how Christians in other times and places thought about and interpreted the Bible. The Bible has not always been studied according to the principles of modern historical criticism. Nor should scientific study of the Bible be understood as superseding, and thus making obsolete, all earlier approaches. A brief history of biblical interpretation will reveal important insights that remain valid today.

The Old Testament constituted the Bible for Jesus and the early Christians. According to the Gospels, Jesus sometimes quoted or alluded to Old Testament texts in order to establish a theological point or to suggest a way of acting. He clearly accorded these texts a certain degree of authority. Nevertheless, Jesus emerges from the New Testament as displaying flexibility toward the Old Testament and even asserting his authority over it. He distinguishes what comes from God and what comes from Moses (see Mk 10:1–12), goes beyond certain scriptural teachings (Mt 5:21–48), and rates love of God and neighbor (Mk 12:28–31) over strict observance of the Sabbath.

New Testament writers such as Paul and Matthew looked upon the Old Testament Scriptures as “fulfilled” in Jesus Christ. Basing themselves on what apparently was a widespread early Christian understanding, they interpreted the Old Testament Scriptures in the light of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. Like other Jews of the time, they understood the Old Testament to be a “mystery”—that is, something that could not be understood without guidance or explanation. Whereas the Qumran community (the Jewish group that gave us the Dead Sea Scrolls) found the key to the Scriptures in their own sect’s history and life, the early Christians discovered Jesus to be the key that opened up the mystery of the Hebrew Bible.

By the time of the Fathers of the Church (the patristic period), the Christian Bible contained two Testaments—Old and New. These early theologians generally adopted one or the other of two basic approaches to the reading and interpretation of Scripture: the allegorical and the literal methods.

The allegorical method, favored particularly by those theologians who lived in Alexandria in Egypt, emphasized uncovering the spiritual truths beneath the surface of the biblical stories. This method had been developed by Greek thinkers who interpreted the stories in Homer’s Iliad and Odyssey as symbolizing emotional or spiritual struggles within the individual. It had also been adopted by Jewish interpreters, like Philo of Alexandria, who used the method on the Hebrew Bible in order to appeal to non-Jews and especially to Jews who had come under the influence of Greek philosophy and culture. Christian theologians who used this method included Origen and Clement of Alexandria.

In contrast to this method was the more literal reading of the Bible, favored by those Christian thinkers who lived in Antioch, the capital of Syria in Roman times. The literal method focused more on the historical realities described in Scripture, and insisted that any higher or deeper sense should be based firmly on the literal sense of the text. John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia were among those who favored this approach.

It is important to recognize that these different emphases were not completely opposed to each other. Thus the allegorical method did not deny the historical truth of events in Scripture, nor did the literal method deny the spiritual meaning of those events. Later theologians tended to blend the two approaches, though favoring one tendency or the other. Augustine, for instance, tended toward the allegorical and Jerome toward the literal.

Medieval interpreters, building on both these approaches, distinguished four senses in a scriptural text: literal (what took place), allegorical (the hidden theological meaning), anagogical (the heavenly sense), and moral or tropological (the significance for the individual's behavior). The classic example was the word Jerusalem (see Gal 4:22–31), which can refer to a city in Palestine (literal), the church (allegorical), the heavenly home of us all (anagogical), and the human soul (moral). Since this wide-ranging approach to Scripture could easily degenerate into subjectivity, careful interpreters like Thomas Aquinas insisted that “nothing necessary to faith is contained under the spiritual sense that is not elsewhere put forward by Scripture in its literal sense.” Thomas Aquinas also used human reason as a tool in explaining the Scriptures and tried to bring together philosophical truth (especially as proposed by Aristotle) and biblical truth.

With the Renaissance and the rise of Humanism came a new interest in studying the Scriptures in their original languages and their historical settings. Erasmus produced a new edition of the Greek New Testament to go along with his revision of the Latin Vulgate translation. He also used the Greek and Roman classics of paganism along with the writings of the Church Fathers to interpret the biblical texts. Catholic enthusiasm for the study of the Scriptures cooled, however, in response to the claims for the Bible (sola scriptura or Scripture alone) made by Martin Luther and other Protestant Reformers, especially their statements about the clarity of Scripture (so that there is no need for the church as the final interpreter) and its sufficiency (so that there is no need for church tradition).

The rationalist claims of the European Enlightenment made matters even more complicated for Catholic interpreters of the Bible. For example, the philosopher Baruch Spinoza maintained that when Scripture and philosophy come into conflict (as in the case of miracles), then Scripture is to be rejected in favor of “reason.” Thus the Catholic Church was backed into being the defender of biblical “truth,” sometimes with unfortunate consequences.

This survey reveals some abiding principles of Catholic biblical interpretation: the central significance of Christ; the struggle to be faithful to the literal meaning while searching for spiritual meaning; the conviction that faith and reason are not opposed; the insistence that the Bible should be interpreted in the Church; and the emphasis on biblical truth against the attacks of rationalism.

MODERN DEVELOPMENTS

The gradual Catholic acceptance of scientific biblical criticism (or the historical-critical method) while remaining true to the Church’s heritage can be traced with reference to a series of official Roman documents issued during the late nineteenth and the twentieth centuries. For a full collection of official Roman Catholic documents pertaining to the study of the Bible, see The Scripture Documents: An Anthology of Official Catholic Teachings (ed. Dean R. Bechard, Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2002).

A cautious beginning was made with the papal encyclical Providentissimus Deus by Pope Leo XIII in 1893, only to be blunted by fears of Modernism under Pius X and by Benedict XV’s encyclical Spiritus Paraclitus issued in 1920. A new age dawned with the encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu promulgated by Pius XII in 1943, in which the historical study of the Bible was given official approbation. The approach outlined by Pius XII was put into practice by the Pontifical Biblical Commission in its 1964 Instruction Concerning the Historical Truth of the Gospels.

The culmination of official Catholic pronouncements on biblical studies was the Second Vatican Council’s Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation. The nature of these documents is cumulative; that is, the latest document generally restates the teachings contained in previous documents and clarifies matters not discussed earlier in detail. However, the document of an ecumenical council has far more official weight than a papal encyclical or an instruction from the Pontifical Biblical Commission.

Moreover, the Council's document on Scripture was a "dogmatic constitution," the most authoritative kind issued by Vatican II. Thus Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation can be taken as the authoritative climax of a long series of developments in the Church's attitude toward the Bible.

Vatican II was a pastoral council. It sought to address the needs of the Church and the world in the twentieth century and beyond. Its constitution on divine revelation (also known by its Latin title, Dei Verbum) was addressed not so much to scholars or theologians as to the Church at large. In effect, the bishops were saying, "This is what the Catholic Church thinks and believes about the Bible and related matters." The document had a rocky history from its first draft in 1962 to its final form in 1965. Pope John XXIII's rejection of the initial draft, which favored a propositional understanding of revelation (revelation consists of statements of abstract truths) and a theory of two sources of revelation (Scripture and tradition), set the Second Vatican Council on its path of aggiornamento (Italian for "bringing up to date"). (All quotations are from the translation by Liam Walsh and Wilfrid Harrington in Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Post-Conciliar Documents, ed. Austin Flannery [Northport, NY: Costello, 1975] 750–65.)

The six chapters in Dei Verbum treat divine revelation itself, the transmission of divine revelation, sacred Scripture—its divine inspiration and its interpretation—the Old Testament, the New Testament, and sacred Scripture in the life of the Church. What the constitution teaches on these topics will be taken up in the remaining parts of this essay. Here, only what it teaches about scientific biblical criticism will concern us.

The conciliar statement about biblical criticism appears in paragraph 12, which is part of the chapter on the inspiration and interpretation of Scripture. It is prefaced by an acknowledgment that since God speaks in Scripture through human beings, and so in human fashion, interpreters should give careful attention to the ways in which the sacred writers thought and expressed themselves:

In determining the intention of the sacred writers, attention must be paid, inter alia, to literary forms for the fact is that truth is differently presented and expressed in the various types of historical writing, in prophetic and poetical texts, and in other forms of literary expression. Hence the exegete must look for that meaning which the sacred writer, in a determined situation and given the circumstances of his time and culture, intended to express and did in fact express, through the medium of a contemporary literary form. Rightly to understand what the sacred author wanted to affirm in his work, due attention must be paid both to the customary and characteristic patterns of perception, speech and narrative which prevailed at the age of the sacred writer, and to the conventions which the people of his time followed in their dealings with one another.

The statement, which is really a condensation of Pius XII's 1943 encyclical Divine Afflante Spiritu, makes three points. First, it insists that we take into account the various literary forms in which the Bible is written, and it warns us against confusing historical, prophetic, and poetic texts. Next, it urges us to pay attention to the historical setting in which the sacred author wrote, suggesting that such historical awareness is necessary for grasping what the author intended. Finally, it recommends that we learn about the literary conventions and cultural assumptions that people accepted at the time when the biblical books were composed. Thus the conciliar document encourages the literary, historical, and sociological study of biblical texts.

The acceptance of biblical criticism, of course, does not reduce the sacred Scriptures to the status of other, strictly human books. In fact, the very next sentence in the document affirms the divine authorship of the biblical texts and urges biblical interpreters to take that into consideration:

But since sacred Scripture must be read and interpreted with its divine authorship in mind, no less attention must be devoted to the content and unity of the whole of Scripture, taking into account the Tradition of the entire Church and the analogy of faith, if we are to derive their true meaning from the sacred texts.

In this way the conciliar document achieves a balance between the human and the divine contributions to Scripture. Interpreters are thereby encouraged to apply all the tools of biblical criticism, while bearing in mind the Church's long-standing conviction that the Bible contains "the Word of God in the words of men."

In 1993, to mark the one hundredth anniversary of Providentissimus Deus and the fiftieth anniversary of Divino Afflante Spiritu, the Pontifical Biblical Commission, with the full approval of Pope John Paul II, issued a document titled "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church." Prepared by an international team of distinguished Catholic biblical scholars, this document describes various methods of and approaches to biblical interpretation, examines certain questions of a hermeneutical nature, reflects on the characteristic features of a Catholic interpretation of the Bible, and considers the place that biblical interpretation has in the life of the church. This document spells out in some detail many of the directions recommended in the papal encyclicals and in Vatican II's Dei Verbum.

The Pontifical Biblical Commission's document describes the historical-critical method as "the indispensable method for the scientific study of the meaning of ancient texts." While giving attention to the many possible contributions from certain "new" literary and social-scientific approaches, it criticizes fundamentalism as "dangerous" and even as inviting people to "a kind of intellectual suicide." And it insists on the pastoral significance of the whole exegetical enterprise when it states: "Exegesis produces its best results when it is carried out in the context of the living faith of the Christian community, which is directed toward the salvation of the entire world."

Methods of Biblical Interpretation

The term biblical criticism refers to various methods of scientific biblical study that have as their goal establishing the text, understanding the content and the literary style of biblical books, and determining their origin and authenticity. This undertaking is sometimes called the "historical-critical method"—"historical" because it focuses on the original historical settings of the biblical texts and the historical processes that gave rise to them, and "critical" because it applies reason to the texts and makes judgments about them in the effort to be as objective as possible. Biblical criticism aims to understand what a text was saying to its original audience and to make clear its significance then (and now).

Textual criticism (sometimes called "lower criticism") seeks to establish the wording of the biblical text as the biblical authors wrote it. Since we no longer have direct access to the manuscripts written by the biblical authors (autographs), textual critics try to come as close as possible to the original form of the texts by gathering all the pertinent manuscript evidence (Hebrew and Aramaic for the Old Testament, Greek for the New Testament, ancient translations for both Testaments). When the evidence has been assembled, textual critics determine where the ancient manuscripts differ and proceed to decide which reading is original and to explain how the other readings arose. The rejected readings may have been unconscious mistakes (for example, confusing similar letters of the alphabet, omitting words or phrases, inserting marginal comments into the main text) or deliberate modifications (e.g., harmonizing with parallel texts, correcting grammar or style, removing “offensive” material). The accepted readings should be consistent with the content and style of the document and follow the rules of grammar and good sense.

Literary criticism attends to the words and images, the characters and their relationships, the structure and progress of thought, the literary form, and the meaning. These processes are used today in studying all kinds of literature; they are by no means confined to biblical study. Bible concordances, dictionaries, and encyclopedias make it possible to trace the development of a word (for example, faith) or a theme (for example, covenant) and to locate a particular occurrence within such a framework. Careful inspection of a text enables one to chart out the interactions among the characters or to outline the progress of the argument. The biblical writers used many different literary forms. The Old Testament consists of law codes, narratives, psalms, prophecies, proverbs, visions, and even love poetry. The New Testament contains stories of Jesus’s words and deeds (Gospels), the actions of some apostles (Acts), letters (Epistles), and visions (Revelation). Rather than stating theological truths in the form of theses or propositions, the biblical authors conveyed their message in artistic and memorable ways. Literary criticism helps us to read the biblical books on their own terms and thus to appreciate their artistry and their truth.

Historical criticism concerns the world behind the biblical texts; that is, the origin and growth of the biblical documents. Scholars assume that sometimes a complicated process of composition lies behind a finished book of the Bible. Smaller literary units—for example, a saying from Jesus, or a hymn—were told and retold, or used orally in worship. Later, perhaps, a collection of sayings or hymns was generated. Still later, a writer created a longer narrative into which various sayings were fitted, or which quoted a hymn in order to make a point. At each stage, the original small unit was being used in a slightly different context, and it may have been changed in small ways in order to fit its new use better.

Scholars have various names for this sort of investigation of a biblical text, depending on what level they are examining. Source criticism attempts to establish where previously existing material (for example, a hymn, a saying, or a vision account) has been used by a later author in a longer work, either by accepting what is stated in the work itself or by noticing differences in content, vocabulary, and literary style. Form criticism seeks to classify literary genres or forms, and to isolate the historical settings in which the forms developed and functioned before they became part of the main text. A sermon, for instance, will have characteristics that are different from those of a letter or a story. Redaction criticism deals with the ways in which a biblical author or editor (redactor means editor) used sources, and sometimes changed them, to address problems and concerns facing his readers. So biblical criticism takes account of historical settings at three levels: the sources, the small units, and the finished document.

Archaeological excavations and textual discoveries, such as the Ugaritic texts and the Dead Sea Scrolls, can shed light on the material world and culture in which the biblical books were written. For example, ancient epics outside the Bible have helped us to appreciate the creation stories in the book of Genesis. And the Dead Sea Scrolls, besides providing the earliest extant manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible, have illumined the thought and organization of the early church.

The interpretive process can also be enriched by the application of concepts and methods used in the social sciences such as sociology, cultural anthropology, and psychology. These approaches help in exposing the cultural assumptions about the human condition and the world that people in biblical times took for granted, and in explaining the development of ancient Israel into a nation and the early Christian communities into what we call the church.

Historical criticism is sometimes defined narrowly to refer to the reality of the event behind the text, to determining what actually occurred at (for example) the first Passover or the first Easter. What really happened in detail is sometimes hard to discern, since the biblical authors were often more interested in the meaning of the events than in their precise details. Some historical critics (in the narrow sense) rule out the miraculous and divine intervention on philosophical grounds and make negative judgments about the communities that handed on the biblical texts. But this is not true of all historical critics, nor is it at all consistent with the Catholic approach to Scripture, which assumes that the biblical texts tell the “honest truth” about the events described in the texts.

While the classic historical-critical method is oriented mainly to illumining the history of the text and the world behind the text, certain new methods of literary analysis focus more on the text as it now stands (the world of the text) and on its effects on the reader today (the world before or in front of the text). Rhetorical analysis explores the capacity of a biblical text to persuade and convince the reader, while narrative analysis investigates how a text works in the sense of its success in telling a story involving plot, characters, and point of view. Structuralist analysis and semiotic analysis are modern linguistic methods that examine the various temporal and spatial relationships in a text, with an eye toward revealing the deeper patterns of meaning underlying the text.

Another set of approaches to biblical interpretation privileges the interpreter and the social location of the interpreter. Liberation theology takes as its starting point the lived experience of poor people today and enters into conversation with biblical texts (e.g., Israel's exodus from Egypt, or Mary's Magnificat in Lk 1:46–55) as a way of illumining both the biblical text and the present situation of the poor. Feminist interpretation calls attention to the prominence of certain women in the Bible, exposes the patriarchal or male-centered assumptions of the cultures in which the Bible was originally produced, and challenges interpreters to recognize the liberating contributions of women to the biblical story of salvation.

Other reader-oriented resources in biblical interpretation include the history of interpretation (how a text has been understood by Jewish and Christian readers throughout the centuries) and the history of effects (the impact or influence that a text has exercised in the course of history). Canonical criticism focuses on the final canonical form of a biblical text, explores its place within the biblical canon as a whole, and considers its significance for the church's faith and way of life. Hermeneutics is concerned with discerning the present significance of a biblical text. While this is what preachers have always done, the hermeneutical phase of the interpretive task is open to and incumbent upon all Bible readers. It involves the fusion of horizons between the ancient text and the reader in the present, and envisions a process by which the reader is changed intellectually and spiritually by encounter with the biblical text.

Two terms that have recently become prominent with regard to Catholic biblical interpretation and its practical impact in church life are actualization and inculturation. The Christian Scriptures are ancient texts, and so they need to be presented in ways in which they can speak to peoples of different times (actualization) and places or cultures (inculturation). The Scriptures are made "actual" whenever their spiritual insights are presented in such a way that they can address the problems and possibilities of the present day. Likewise, the Scriptures are "inculturated" whenever they are translated, interpreted, and applied in terms that peoples from outside the ancient Mediterranean world can understand and so live out their challenges and opportunities.

One traditional way of bringing together all these different methods in a simple and coherent framework is through the traditional Catholic approach developed in monastic circles and known as lectio divina (divine or spiritual reading). There are four steps. The first step is lectio (reading); that is, a careful reading of the text from various critical perspectives (literary, historical, and theological) and the assimilation or appropriation of the text on both intellectual and emotional levels. The second step is meditatio, which explores what this text may be saying to me (or us) now. One can open up the text by focusing on a theme or a few phrases, by applying the senses (sight, hearing, smell, taste, touch) to the biblical scene, and by trying to make connections between the text and one's present situation. The third step is oratio (prayer) in which on the basis of reading and meditating one may speak words of praise, petition, adoration, and/or thanksgiving to God. The fourth step may take the form of contemplatio (relishing the religious experience generated by the encounter with the text and resting in the mystery of God) and/or actio (coming to a decision about one's life, or finding new ways to express what one has learned—through dance, drama, artwork, group sharing, homily, etc.).

Catholic Biblical Research

Catholic institutions and scholars make important contributions to scientific biblical research. The Vatican Museum and other such institutions conserve and make available important manuscript evidence. The publishing programs of the Pontifical Biblical Institute (Rome), the Catholic Biblical Association (Washington), and the Studium Biblicum Franciscanum (Jerusalem) are among the most ambitious and respected. The research of Catholic scholars appears in prestigious journals published under Catholic auspices: Biblica, Biblische Zeitschrift, Catholic Biblical Quarterly, Estudios Biblicos, Revue Biblique, and Rivista Biblica Italiana. Of course, non-Catholic scholars are welcome to publish in these Catholic scientific journals. Catholic scholars routinely write for periodicals not under Church auspices: Journal of Biblical Literature, New Testament Studies, Novum Testamentum, Vetus Testamentum, Zeitschrift für Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft, and so forth. The major bibliographical services—Old Testament Abstracts, New Testament Abstracts, the Elenchus of Biblica, and the International Review of Biblical Studies—emanate from Catholic institutions. Articles on biblical topics frequently appear in Catholic theological journals; popular periodicals (The Bible Today) and books make available to a general audience the results of scientific biblical research.

Many Catholic biblical scholars have received their professional training at the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome, the Ecole Biblique in Jerusalem, the Studium Biblicum Franciscanum in Jerusalem, as well as at European Catholic universities such as Louvain, the Catholic theological faculties at German universities, and the departments of theology at Catholic universities in the United States (Boston College, Catholic University in Washington, Notre Dame, Loyola of Chicago, etc.). Others have gotten philological and archaeological training at Harvard, Yale, Johns Hopkins, University of Chicago, Emory, and many other institutions. A major professional organization for biblical scholars in the United States is the Catholic Biblical Association. Catholic scholars are also heavily involved in the nondenominational Society of Biblical Literature, the American Schools of Oriental Research, and the Society of New Testament Studies.

Modern biblical scholarship is an international and interconfessional enterprise. The Catholic Church contributes to this dialogue by providing well-trained scholars and channels for publishing research. Some good examples of Catholic biblical scholarship in the United States are the New American Bible, the New Jerome Biblical Commentary, and the Sacra Pagina series of New Testament commentaries published by Liturgical Press.

Scripture as Tradition

The official Catholic emphasis on attention to the literary forms, historical settings, and cultural assumptions of the biblical writings flows from the nature of the books themselves. Far from being individual creations generated in solitude, the biblical books include many ideas, traditions, and even small pieces that already existed before being integrated into the texts in which they now stand. Biblical literature is thoroughly and deliberately traditional.

The traditional character of the Old Testament has long been acknowledged. The first five books, which are customarily called the Pentateuch or Torah, are generally recognized to incorporate material from at least four different sources (Yahwist, Elohist, Deuteronomist, Priestly; see “Introduction to the Pentateuch”). The historical books (Jos–2 Kgs, Chr, Ezr, and Neh) include earlier accounts, memoirs, genealogies, and the like. The prophetic books are anthologies of short pieces of poetry and prose, and the wisdom books contain ideas and sayings that circulated in the ancient Near East for centuries. The Psalms are a collection of varied kinds of songs used mainly in the Jerusalem Temple; in the Psalms there may even be remnants of non-Jewish hymns (see Ps 29). So complicated and so rich is the process of transmission that it is difficult in most cases to speak of the author of a biblical book as one may speak of an author today. The situation is further complicated by the fact that in biblical times personal creativity and originality were not important values. One displayed real creativity by using traditional ideas and expressions in new settings and in new combinations.

Given the nature of the Old Testament and the ancient concept of creativity, one would expect the New Testament to be thoroughly traditional also—and it is. The earliest complete documents in the New Testament are Paul’s letters. Even these highly original and occasional pieces rely at key points on preexisting material (e.g., Rom 1:3–4; 1 Cor 13:1–13; 15:3–5; Phil 2:6–11). Those epistles whose direct Pauline composition is doubtful (e.g., the Pastorals, Eph, Col, 2 Thes) are best understood as later attempts to bring the figure and teaching of Paul to bear on situations facing the churches in the late first century. We often regard Paul as a creative genius. However, not only did he use some traditional material, but also almost all his undisputed letters contain some indication of joint authorship (see 1 Thes 1:1; 1 Cor 1:1; Rom 16:22; etc.). Moreover, throughout his letters Paul gives credit to his co-workers and encourages the collection for the Jerusalem community as a sign of solidarity with the mother church there.

The complicated process of tradition and composition also applies to the Gospels. Most scholars today place the final composition of the four canonical Gospels in the late first century: Mark around AD 70, Matthew and Luke around AD 80–90, and John around AD 90–100. Yet all scholars acknowledge that the evangelists used already existing material in their Gospels. For example, Matthew and Luke each seem to have read both Mark’s Gospel and a collection of Jesus’s sayings that modern scholars call Q (from the German word Quelle, meaning “source”). John utilized a collection of miracle stories (signs) and perhaps also some revelation discourses. The Markan and Johannine Passion narratives surely contain much traditional information, accounts that had been passed from one person to another.

The Gospels and the traditions incorporated in them tell the story of Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified around AD 30. Like other Jewish teachers of his time, Jesus taught by word (parables, proverbs, debates, other sayings) and deed (example, healings, symbolic gestures). His disciples remembered and retold his words and deeds, thus providing the basic materials for what became the Gospel tradition. Jesus did not write books. What we know of Jesus comes to us through the process of tradition from Jesus to the early church and finally to the evangelists.

The nature of the Gospels demands that interpreters attend to three stages in their development. The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum 19) captures that development in this marvelously concise statement:

The sacred authors, in writing the four Gospels, selected certain of the many elements which had been handed on, either orally or already in written form, others they synthesized or explained with an eye to the situation of the churches, the while sustaining the form of preaching, but always in such a fashion that they have told us the honest truth about Jesus.

The council's document affirms that the Gospels tell us the "honest truth" about Jesus. It recognizes that there was an intermediary stage in which traditions about Jesus circulated in oral and written forms as "preaching" about the significance of Jesus. It acknowledges that the evangelists give us only a selection (see Lk 1:1–4; Jn 20:30–31; 21:25) of the traditions about Jesus. It also recognizes that the evangelists used the traditions about Jesus to address the situations of their own day. Therefore Catholics must read the Gospels as traditional documents (because they are such) and attend to three stages in their development: Jesus, the early church, and the evangelists.

Although in the past there has been some Catholic resistance to accepting the traditional character of the biblical books, this emphasis is perfectly compatible with the principles of Catholicism. There is no obligation for Catholics to be conservative historians of early Christianity (nor is there any obligation for them to be reckless or indifferent). As long as Catholic scholars make clear the link from Jesus through the early church to the evangelists, they remain faithful to their theological heritage.

In fact, an emphasis on the traditional nature of the biblical writings is fully consistent with certain distinctively Catholic principles. The Catholic stress on the communal character of our way to God and God's way to us sensitizes Catholics to the complexity of early Christian tradition, and to the role of the Church in shaping it and being formed by it. The Catholic emphasis that encounter with God is rooted in history and is a mediated experience helps us to see the continuity between Jesus and the early reflections on him, as well as the significance and correctness of those reflections. The Catholic sacramental approach, which sees God in and through all things, leads us to view the very human process of tradition as a vehicle for expressing, safeguarding, and adapting divine revelation.

Scripture and Tradition

The Catholic Church does not restrict divine revelation to the biblical text. Against the Protestant Reformation's slogan of "Scripture alone," Catholic theologians insisted on "Scripture and tradition." The term tradition recognizes the fact that the living reality of the Church has the task of preserving the Gospel as well as interpreting and applying it in new situations. Catholic Christianity is not simply a "religion of the Book."

While acknowledging the twofold reality of Scripture and tradition, Catholic theologians have long debated the precise relation between the two. One way of approaching the problem was to assume that Scripture and tradition constitute two separate sources of divine revelation. The Second Vatican Council rejected this view in the second chapter of its Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum 10): "Sacred Tradition and sacred Scripture make up a single sacred deposit of the Word of God, which is entrusted to the Church." In other words, the Word of God (or divine revelation) is the source of both tradition and Scripture.

How exactly Scripture and tradition are related remains a problem. The conciliar document uses the analogy of a wellspring or fountain to insist on their unity while preserving their diversity in Dei Verbum 9:

Sacred Tradition and sacred Scripture then, are bound closely together, and communicate one with the other. For both of them, flowing out from the same divine wellspring, come together in some fashion to form one thing, and move towards the same goal. Sacred Scripture is the speech of God as it is put down in writing under the breath of the Holy Spirit. And Tradition transmits in its entirety the Word of God which has been entrusted to the apostles by Christ the Lord and the Holy Spirit.

The same paragraph rejects the “Scripture alone” principle of the Reformation and preserves the Catholic approach of “Scripture and tradition” by insisting that the Church does not draw certainty about all revealed truths from the holy Scriptures alone. Hence, both Scripture and tradition must be accepted and honored with equal feelings of devotion and reverence. Thus the Second Vatican Council insisted that Scripture and tradition flow from the same divine wellspring and that both must be accepted and honored. Without endorsing any one theological approach to their relation, the council rejected the opinion of those who wished to keep the two separate.

The same tension appears when the Dogmatic Constitution addresses the issue of authoritative interpretation of the Scriptures in Dei Verbum 10:

. . . the task of giving an authentic interpretation of the Word of God, whether in its written form or in the form of Tradition, has been entrusted to the living teaching office of the Church alone. Its authority in this matter is exercised in the name of Jesus Christ. Yet this Magisterium is not superior to the Word of God, but is its servant. It teaches only what has been handed on to it. At the divine command and with the help of the Holy Spirit, it listens to this devotedly, guards it with dedication and expounds it faithfully. All that it proposes for belief as being divinely revealed is drawn from this single deposit of faith.

On the one hand, this statement entrusts authentic interpretation to the magisterium (the bishops with the pope). On the other hand, it insists that the magisterium is the servant of divine revelation and can teach only what is drawn from the single deposit of faith constituted by divine revelation.

The precise relation between Scripture and tradition also remains a problem. As a pastoral council, Vatican II avoided becoming an arbiter of theological disputes. Its insistence on the oneness of Scripture and tradition, however, did have a pastoral dimension. While not conceding to the “Scripture alone” position, it insisted that the Bible take again its rightful place in the center of Catholic life and that appeals to tradition be judged according to their consistency with Scripture.

The Nature of the Bible

What is this book that it should be studied so intensely and guarded so carefully? The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation made its own a theological formula that had become prominent before Vatican II: “the words of God, expressed in the words of men” (Dei Verbum 13). That formula derives from the classical theological definitions of the divine and human natures in the person of Jesus Christ. In speaking about the Bible in this way, the Second Vatican Council sought to hold together the transcendent nature of Scripture and its human form. Although the Bible may look like other books and may be studied profitably as other books are studied (that is, with the techniques of biblical criticism), the Bible is different with regard to its origin and its nature. The different character of the Bible is expressed by means of some rather complicated terms: revelation, inspiration, inerrancy, and canon. As with “Scripture and tradition,” the Second Vatican Council used these terms without adjudicating the theological disputes surrounding them. As a pastoral council it sought to express the significance of the words for the way in which the Bible is read within the Church.

Revelation is fundamentally God’s self-revelation; it is the communication of the mystery of God to the world: “It pleased God, in his goodness and wisdom, to reveal himself and to make known the mystery of his will” (Dei Verbum 2). The Christian theological tradition affirms that God’s self-revelation comes to us through creation, history, persons, society, and reason. It is also customary to refer to the Bible as a privileged revealer of God—that is, a place where the divine revelation is particularly clear. This tradition appears prominently in Dei Verbum 6:

By divine Revelation God wished to manifest and communicate both himself and the eternal decrees of his will concerning the salvation of mankind.

The order adopted in this statement (“both himself and the eternal decrees”) is significant, for it gives pride of place to the personal character of divine revelation without denying the content and the consequences. Although this point may seem obvious today, the council’s emphasis on the personal dimension of revelation was correctly taken as a major step in clarifying Catholic attitudes toward Scripture. Through the Bible we encounter the mystery of God, not simply lists of commandments or interesting stories. The personal God makes those commandments and stories meaningful.

Two other theological terms for talking about the difference of the Bible from other books are inspiration and inerrancy. Again the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation asserts the basic point expressed by these terms without arbitrating the very complicated theological debates surrounding them. On inspiration Dei Verbum 11 states:

The divinely revealed realities which are contained and presented in the text of sacred Scripture have been written down under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. For Holy Mother Church relying on the faith of the apostolic age, accepts as sacred and canonical the books of the Old and the New Testaments, whole and entire, with all their parts, on the grounds that, written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (cf. Jn 20:31; 2 Tm 3:16; 2 Pt 1:19–21; 3:15–16), they have God as their author, and have been handed on as such to the Church herself. To compose the sacred books, God chose certain men who, all the while he employed them in this task, made full use of their powers and faculties so that, though he acted in them and by them, it was as true authors that they consigned to writing whatever he wanted written, and no more.

The same paragraph treats inerrancy:

Since, therefore, all that the inspired authors, or sacred writers, affirm should be regarded as affirmed by the Holy Spirit, we must acknowledge that the books of Scripture firmly, faithfully and without error teach that truth which God, for the sake of our salvation, wished to see confided to the sacred Scriptures. Thus “all Scripture is inspired by God, and profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction and for training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be complete, equipped for every good work.” (2 Tm 3:16–17, Greek text)

The key expression in this statement is “that truth which God, for the sake of our salvation, wished to see confided to the sacred Scriptures.” Without explicitly embracing the theory of only limited inerrancy, that statement suggests that the Bible’s inerrancy consists primarily in its being a trustworthy guide on the road to salvation. Thus it expresses “inerrancy” in a positive way and avoids conceiving it as a defensive program of protecting the Bible against accusations of scientific or historical error.

The council’s statement on inspiration refers to the books of the Bible as “sacred and canonical.” The word canon (reed or measuring stick) originally meant the rule or characteristics that decided whether a particular book was judged to be part of sacred Scripture. It now usually refers to the collection of books that are acknowledged to be authoritative in the Church and by which the Church’s faith can be measured. The canon of Old Testament books traditional in Catholicism contains all the books of the Hebrew Bible (which is the same as the Protestant Old Testament canon) together with seven others that were part of the Greek and Latin Bible tradition (Jdt, Tb, Bar, 1 and 2 Mc, Sir/Ecclesiasticus, Wis). All Christians today share the same canon of twenty-seven New Testament books. The history of the canon’s development is quite complex. The final definitive list of biblical books (including the seven additional Old Testament books) for the Catholic Church was drawn up only at the Council of Trent in 1546, though there was little disagreement about the substance of the canon from the early centuries of the Christian era.

The Bible is different. How it is different has been expressed with the help of some traditional words: revelation, inspiration, inerrancy, and canon. The Second Vatican Council in its authoritative declaration on Scripture (Dei Verbum) took over those hallowed terms. In interpreting the council's use of these words we must take account of the pastoral orientation of the council as a whole. Rather than working out theological subtleties or choosing among theological schools, the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation used those words to convey basic attitudes about how the Bible differs from other books. It affirmed that God's self-revelation comes to us through the Bible, that in some mysterious way God entered into the composition of these writings and inspired them, that the biblical books provide reliable guidance (inerrancy) for those who walk the way toward salvation with God, and that these books constitute the norm or rule (canon) by which the life of the Church is to be guided and measured in all ages. These are the basic pastoral meanings of revelation, inspiration, inerrancy, and canon.

The Authority of the Bible

The terms by which Christians express the difference of the Bible indicate that it possesses great authority for them. The Bible is the "words of God, expressed in the words of men." It is revealed, inspired, inerrant, and canonical. The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation goes beyond the general assertions conveyed by the traditional theological vocabulary and speaks about the authority of various parts of the Bible.

The Old Testament (see Dei Verbum 15) prepares for and declares in prophecy the coming of Christ. It conveys our basic understanding of God and the human situation: "how a just and merciful God deals with mankind." It provides "sound wisdom" and "a wonderful treasury of prayers." The document also mentions "matters imperfect and provisional" in the Old Testament, without specifying precisely what these are (presumably legislation about sacrifices and ritual purity, "vengeful" psalms, and other such material). The unity of the two testaments is traced back to God who "in his wisdom has so brought it about that the New should be hidden in the Old and that the Old should be made manifest in the New" (Dei Verbum 16).

The council accorded the Gospels a special place within the Bible “because they are our principal source for the life and teaching of the Incarnate Word, our Saviour” (Dei Verbum 18). It insisted on the historicity and apostolicity of the Gospels, while recognizing the complex process of their composition from Jesus through the early church to the Gospel texts. Catholics find a basic continuity between Jesus and the Gospel tradition under the guidance of the Spirit working in the church. Their tendency is to insist that the tradition is basically historical. They assume that the modifications and reinterpretations made necessary by changing circumstances do not do violence to the original teaching or event. The “apostolic” character of the Gospels refers not so much to their direct composition by apostles as it does to the faithful transmission of the material in them by those who had experienced the risen Lord and bore witness to his resurrection. The term apostolic describes the generation between Jesus’s death (about AD 30) and the composition of the New Testament books. The claim implied by the term is that those witnesses have told us the “honest truth” about Jesus.

The New Testament also contains Paul’s letters and other writings (Heb, the Catholic Epistles, Rv). After affirming their composition under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, Dei Verbum 20 describes the contributions that these writings make in the following way:

In accordance with the wise design of God these writings firmly establish those matters which concern Christ the Lord, formulate more and more precisely his authentic teaching, preach the saving power of Christ’s divine work and foretell its glorious consummation.

It would be a mistake, however, to conclude from this description that the Epistles have a secondary status as supplements to the Gospels. In fact, Paul’s authentic letters (1 Thes, Gal, 1 and 2 Cor, Phil, Phlm, Rom) are the earliest complete documents in the New Testament from the standpoint of their dates of composition. Thus they give us precious information about how Paul and other early Christians in the fifties of the first century AD (some twenty-five years after the death of Jesus) understood the significance of Jesus’s life, death, and resurrection. They show us how early Christians struggled to articulate their new faith in an environment that was often hostile and foreign to them. They reveal the kinds of problems that early Christians faced within their own communities (see especially 1 Cor) and so warn us against too easily viewing the apostolic period as a trouble-free and conflictless “golden age.”

Enough has been said about the Bible in general (revelation, inspiration, inerrancy, and canon) and about its major parts (Old Testament, Gospels, Epistles) to indicate that it possesses great authority. But what kind of authority does the Bible have? It is surely not the coercive authority of a parent or the state or the police, which have the power to enforce a law or decision and to punish the uncooperative. It is not even the persuasive authority of the lawyer or the mathematician who convinces another by logic, arguments, proofs, and so forth. At some points in his epistles (e.g., in 1 Cor 15) Paul does labor to make a convincing case on the basis of logic. But that is not his usual mode of presentation, nor is it the customary idiom of other biblical writers.

The authority that the Bible possesses can perhaps be best described as compelling. Compelling authority is the authority of the witness, the expert, the participant. Much of the Bible concerns what God’s people say about God’s action on their behalf. Without narrowing the testimony of the Bible to the concept of an eyewitness, it is possible to describe the Scriptures as a collection of testimonies to God. The biblical descriptions of creation, exodus, monarchy, exile, and return from exile all stress God’s relatedness to Israel and Israel’s responses of praise, confession, thanksgiving, and so forth. The New Testament writers portray Jesus as the revelation of God’s power (and weakness). The proper response is faith, hope, and love. Thus the biblical documents contain the proclamation and articulation of people’s faith about God and God’s ways with creation.

God is the real basis of the Bible’s authority. Insofar as the biblical books bear witness to God and thus enable us to understand better who God is and how God acts, and to grow in love for and trust in the God of the Scriptures, the Bible can be aptly called the “word of God.” And so Vatican II’s Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, which so emphasizes God’s self-communication, is appropriately titled from its initial two words Dei Verbum (“word of God”).

Scripture in Church Life

This essay began with a comparison regarding the Bible’s place in church life of the 1950s and today. A look at Catholic liturgy, education, piety, and theology led to the conclusion that the Catholic Church today is far more biblical than it was in the 1950s. This development mirrors some powerful statements made in the final chapter of Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation.

The centrality of Scripture in Catholic liturgy involves both preaching and sacramental practice. Dei Verbum 21 insists that “all the preaching of the Church, as indeed the entire Christian religion, should be nourished and ruled by sacred Scripture.” The same paragraph directly confronts and dissolves the opposition between word and sacrament that had been prominent since the Protestant Reformation. It does so with reference to the celebration of the Eucharist:

The Church has always venerated the divine Scriptures as she venerated the Body of the Lord, in so far as she never ceases, particularly in the sacred liturgy, to partake of the bread of life and to offer it to the faithful from the one table of the Word of God and the Body of Christ.

The council document insists that word and sacrament belong together in the Eucharist, to the point of asserting that they form “one table.”

The popularity of Scripture in Catholic education and piety responds to a very strong statement in Dei Verbum 22: “Access to sacred Scripture ought to be wide open to the Christian faithful.” The document goes on to urge the production of modern-language translations made from the ancient biblical texts. It also encourages biblical exegetes to examine and explain the sacred texts so that preachers, teachers, and catechists “may be able to distribute fruitfully the nourishment of the Scriptures to the People of God” (Dei Verbum 23).

The importance of Scripture for Catholic theology is stated in no uncertain terms: “The ‘study of the sacred page’ should be the very soul of sacred theology” (Dei Verbum 24). The document mandates that all those officially engaged in the ministry of the word should “immerse themselves in the Scriptures by constant sacred reading and diligent study” (Dei Verbum 25). The same paragraph recommends the preparation of volumes such as the present one with “translations of the sacred texts which are equipped with necessary and really adequate explanations.” There is overwhelming evidence that in response to the Second Vatican Council the Catholic Church has become much more biblical. Again, one of its most important documents was the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, which has served as our principal guide in this article. At nearly every point the post-Vatican II Church has fulfilled the mandates of that council document and thus become more biblical.

The challenge facing the Catholic Church today is to look upon Dei Verbum not only as the end of a long development (which it was) but also as the beginning of a process that has taken us into the twenty-first century and beyond. A still more biblical church will paradoxically be better able to adjust to the rapid changes that the new millennium is already bringing upon us. A still more biblical church will be better prepared to make common cause with other Christians, with Jews and Muslims, and with all truly religious people. A still more biblical church will preserve its spiritual heritage and open its riches to others. An obvious step in the process toward a more biblical church is an increase in knowledge and love of the Scriptures.

BIBLICAL HISTORY AND ARCHAEOLOGY: OLD TESTAMENT

RONALD A. SIMKINS

THE BIBLE AS A HISTORICAL SOURCE

The Bible contains much history: it is the product of history but not a book of history. The Bible is composed of many different formal types of literature (genres), and although many of the genres present a past, no literature in the Old Testament claims or presents itself to be a work of history. History, as first practiced by the classical historians Hecataeus, Herodotus, and Thucydides, entails not only the collecting of tales and traditions about the past but also the inquiry (which is what historia means) into the reliability of the traditions and plausibility of the tales. Although ancient historians used different standards to judge their source materials from those modern historians would use, the important point is that they did make critical judgments about their sources. In the New Testament, only the writer of Luke-Acts claims to present a work of history (Lk 1:1–4). Whereas the writer of Luke-Acts claims to have investigated his sources in order to present a reliable account to Theophilus, the Old Testament writers made no such critical judgments. They were not historians in either the modern or classical sense.

Although the Bible is not itself a work of history, the Old Testament authors did write about Israel's past. The narrative genres present the story of the people of Israel from the creation of the world through the days of Ezra and Nehemiah. The biblical writers drew upon tales and traditions of Israel's past in order to communicate an idea to their contemporaries. They were not concerned about whether the tales and traditions were reliable or plausible. Even when some attempt was made to communicate factual information, such as in the books of Kings, the writing of history was secondary to other purposes of the biblical writers. The nonnarrative genres of the Bible—laws, songs, prophetic oracles, proverbs, and wisdom literature—attest to the story of Israel only indirectly. These texts too are ideological, though they also served ritual, educational, moral, and other functions in ancient Israelite society. (The various genres of biblical literature are discussed in the relevant sections of the Reading Guide.)

The extent of history embedded in the biblical texts is also questioned because of the chronological gap between the biblical writers and the events that they purport to narrate. In most cases, the biblical writers did not witness the events they describe. They often lived centuries later and were dependent upon oral traditions and perhaps some written sources (the Bible refers to a number of written sources, discussed later) for the composition of their narratives of the past. The reliability of these sources and their use by the biblical writers is unknown. When no source material was available—for private events, for example—the biblical writers would simply fill in the historical void in their presentation of the past one way or another, ultimately by pure invention.

Many of the biblical stories are shaped according to traditional literary or mythic patterns that make their reliability suspect. For example, the common Near Eastern myth popularly known as the conflict myth, one that describes a young warrior-god's rise to kingship by defeating an old god or force who poses a threat to the order and stability of the world, is transformed by the biblical writers into a literary pattern that shapes the stories of the Exodus, Joshua's conquest of Canaan, and Saul's election as king. Many other stories utilize such literary patterns. The traditional motif of the barren mother of an important person, for example, is used in the stories of Sarai and Isaac, Rachel and Joseph, and Hannah and Samuel.

The biblical writers' use of traditional literary and mythic patterns to tell their stories of Israel calls into question not only the narrative of the events but also the historical value of many details of the stories. This particular style of the biblical writers does not necessarily mean that no actual events lie beneath the narrative, but at the very least it indicates that the presentation of such events has been shaped to conform to a traditional interpretive framework. In other words, the meaning of such events as indicated by their presentation in the stories of Israel is more significant to the biblical writers than the historical reality of the events.

The Contribution of Archaeology

Archaeology is the scientific study of the material remains of past human life and activities. The material remains are discovered through excavations and surveys, and include both unwritten and written discoveries. Among the unwritten discoveries are architectural features such as temples, palaces, fortifications, public buildings, and houses; industrial features such as oil presses, wine presses, silos, ovens, and pottery kilns; and artifacts such as pottery, tools, jewelry, weapons, and statues and figurines. The written material, usually discovered during the process of excavation, is ordinarily studied by epigraphists and paleographers and includes literary documents (such as the Dead Sea Scrolls), inscriptions on stone or clay tablets, seals (bullae), and ostraca (broken pieces of pottery with inscribed words).

The beginnings of the scientific study of biblical archaeology can be dated to 1890, when W. M. Flinders Petrie conducted the first systematic excavation in Palestine at Tell el-Hesi in the northern Negev. The Arabic word tell (tel, in Hebrew) is used to designate the artificial mounds in the shape of truncated cones that dominate the landscape of Palestine. They are sites of ancient settlements, built up by successive levels of human occupation and destruction over the centuries. The oldest occupancy, of course, is at the bottom of the mound, and the most recent at the top. At Tell el-Hesi, Petrie laid the foundations of stratigraphy and ceramic typology, which are the basic interpretative principles of archaeological field method. Stratigraphy is the technique of excavating a mound (tell) layer by layer and, at the same time, isolating the contents of each occupational layer (stratum). Typology is the study and classification of groups of objects (artifacts) on the basis of shared characteristics (shape, material, decoration). By correlating stratigraphy and typology, archaeologists can construct a relative chronology. Using distinctive types of pottery as his dating tool, Petrie constructed a chronological framework for Palestine.

Except for a few excavations, like George Reisner's at Samaria (Sebaste) in 1909–10, archaeological excavations in Palestine before World War I resembled treasure hunts. Between the two world wars there was a significant advance in field techniques, due in large measure to William F. Albright, a distinguished American archaeologist and biblical scholar. He refined pottery chronology through excavation and survey; he identified several mounds as biblical sites; he related many of the biblical episodes to archaeological contexts. Archaeological field methods advanced rapidly after World War II. Three archaeologists contributed meaningfully to this development: the Briton Kathleen Kenyon, the Israeli Yigael Yadin, and the American G. Ernest Wright. Kenyon used precise stratigraphic method to clarify the chronology of the fortification walls at Jericho that had been dated incorrectly to the Late Bronze Age (1550–1200 BC). Yadin directed the first large-scale dig in modern Israel at Hazor in Upper Galilee, the largest biblical city in Israel. In keeping with the Israeli method, Yadin concentrated on broad exposure of the monumental architecture of the site. G. Ernest Wright excavated Shechem in the central hill country, the first capital of the kingdom of Israel. Wright gave special attention to the pottery of the site as one of the most accurate indicators of ancient chronology; he also trained a new generation of archaeologists at Shechem.

Since 1970 there has been a striking change in field method as archaeologists borrow from both the natural and the social sciences. In the first place, almost all excavation staffs are interdisciplinary: such specialists as paleobotanists, zooarchaeologists, geologists, ecologists, and, especially, physical and cultural anthropologists collaborate with archaeologists in the field. Also, the technologies of modern science, such as carbon-14 (for dating organic substances), thermoluminescence (for dating pottery), magnetometry (for detecting the presence of metal objects), potassium argon (for dating geological samples), and neutron activation analysis (for tracing the origin of clay), are being used to analyze the data with greater precision. The purpose of this comprehensive approach, at least in theory, is to reconstruct the daily life of the people whose remains are being excavated, including their social structure and economic development, as well as their religious practices. Archaeologists' earlier interest in digging isolated tells is now also combined with regional surveys as a way of studying a tell's relationship with the surroundings. Regional study is indispensable in determining town planning, settlement patterns, and population expansion, to mention only some of the concerns of modern archaeologists.

Because archaeology provides a different kind of evidence than that from the Bible, archaeology cannot be expected to make definitive contributions to several basic problems in the history of Israel. For example, archaeology cannot contribute to the problems of chronology beyond the broad limits determined by ceramic or radiocarbon dating. Archaeology addresses chronology through typologies of material remains that lack the precision of the chronological framework established by texts. The basis of typology is that human culture changes gradually and within limits. When a broad range of features and artifacts from stratified archaeological contexts are compared, a typological sequence can be established into which new features and artifacts can be placed. This typological sequence then becomes a means for dating the material uncovered in a new excavation. The major artifact used in typological dating is pottery. Pottery shards are virtually indestructible and are found at every site in Israel and Jordan for every period since the Neolithic period. Moreover, whole pottery vessels were easily broken, leading to the production of more pottery and to rapid changes in the pottery repertoire. As a result, a large database of pottery has enabled archaeologists to establish a typological sequence by which they are able to date layers of human occupation in an excavation. Although this pottery typology is tied to an absolute chronology by dated inscriptions occasionally found in sealed archaeological contexts, the changes within the pottery sequence provide a chronological precision of no greater than a few decades.

Other historical issues to which archaeology cannot make a definitive contribution include the problem of ethnicity. Archaeology can provide much of the material content of ethnicity, but it cannot finally define the ethnic groups because such a definition also involves shared cultural values and self-perceptions. Ethnicity involves both material and ideological components. The identification of the early Israelites in the archaeological record has been a continual problem in this regard, for the early Israelites appear to share the same material culture as the Canaanites. Some interpreters attempt to get around this problem by identifying the inhabitants of the new settlements in the central hill country at the beginning of the Iron I period as early Israelites and those inhabitants who continue to occupy the Late Bronze cities and towns as Canaanites. However, such an interpretation cannot be supported by the archaeological evidence, and in any case is possible only because of the implications of the biblical text (e.g., see Jos 17:14–18).

The interrelation of particular human events in a political history is also beyond the scope to which archaeology can contribute. Archaeology can demonstrate that the city of Hazor in northern Israel was destroyed near the end of the Late Bronze Age, and that the city of Lachish in Judah was destroyed approximately a century later. It cannot answer the questions: Who destroyed the cities? Was the same agent responsible for the destruction of each city? Why were the cities destroyed? What were the causes of the cities' destruction? What happened to the inhabitants of the cities after they were destroyed? Archaeology does not deal with the kind of evidence necessary to answer these questions. For many of the problems of political history, archaeology can only remain silent.

Finally, archaeology cannot demonstrate the truth or confirm the meaning of the biblical texts. The meaning of the biblical texts is not found in the degree to which the texts correspond to what really happened in the past. Rather, the meaning of the texts is found in the message that the biblical writers were communicating to their ancient readers, and this message is beyond the scope of archaeological research.

The focus of archaeology is on the material world, and in this regard archaeology can contribute to the historical study of ancient Israel. Archaeology provides the material context for understanding this history by presenting the material remains of a broad spectrum of Middle Eastern peoples and places. This material provides the general setting for the history of Israel and, through cross-cultural comparison, is able to shed light on the Israelite material culture. For example, archaeology can provide information about the distinctive cultures of those peoples who lived near and interacted with the Israelites, such as the Philistines, Edomites, Phoenicians, Arameans, and Assyrians. Regional surveys allow us to reconstruct settlement patterns and the demographics of particular regions. The faunal and floral remains gathered from excavations enable us to reconstruct Israel's environmental setting, its economy, and changes over time.

Archaeology also provides the specific material context for many of the events narrated in the Bible, much of which the biblical narratives themselves do not address. The biblical description of King Hezekiah's rebellion against the Assyrian empire focuses primarily on the diplomatic maneuvers of the Rabshakeh of Assyria to coerce Hezekiah into submission (2 Kgs 18–19). The archaeological evidence, however, presents a picture of Hezekiah's preparations for revolt and its tragic consequences.

Ultimately, archaeological remains illuminate the daily life of the ancient Israelites and supplement the biblical narratives. Only from archaeology can we learn about the planning and defenses of the Israelite and Judean towns and cities; the architecture of palaces, houses, temples, and public buildings; figurines, altars, and other cult objects; tombs and the Israelites' treatment of their dead; luxury items such as jewelry, carved ivories, metal and stone vessels, and imported items; and common tools and weapons. Archaeology enables us to reconstruct aspects of the society, economy, and religion of the ancient Israelites that are neglected by the biblical tradition. Furthermore, because archaeological evidence is random—its preservation is by chance, unaffected by human selection—it provides an alternative perspective from which to view the biblical narratives. This is especially true regarding aspects of the Israelites' religious practices and beliefs. The widespread abundance of terra-cotta female figures, for example, attests to a dominant concern for female fertility that is given little attention in the biblical texts. Similarly, the graffiti found at Kuntillet 'Ajrud refers to "the LORD (YHWH) and his asherah." The meaning of this phrase is debated, referring to a consort or a symbol of the LORD. In either case, the phrase attests to a view of the LORD that has been excluded from the Bible.

The Bronze Age

Chronology

Archaeologists divide the Bronze Age into three major periods, tied to the chronology of Egypt, based on changes in material culture. The Early Bronze Age (3300–2000 BC) is the first period of urbanization in Palestine. This period corresponds to the Early Dynastic period and the Old Kingdom in Egypt. The Early Bronze Age is further divided into four subperiods. Only the beginnings of urbanization are evident in Early Bronze I (3300–3000 BC). By Early Bronze II and III (3000–2200 BC), Palestine is characterized by numerous large fortified cities. Notable excavated sites include Megiddo and Beth Yerah (Khirbet Kerak) in the north, Tell el-Far'ah (perhaps biblical Tirzah) and Ai in the central hill country, and Tel Yarmuth and Arad in the south. With the weakening of the Old Kingdom at the end of the Sixth Dynasty, Egypt entered the First Intermediate Period. Similarly, most of the urban centers in Palestine were abandoned or destroyed, with much of the population subsisting on pastoralism. This final rural period is known alternatively as Early Bronze IV, Middle Bronze I, or Intermediate Bronze (2200–2000 BC).

The Middle Bronze Age (2000–1550 BC) marks the height of prosperity and power in Palestine with a resurgence of urbanization. The numerous large fortified cities during this period are characterized by massive fortifications consisting of ramparts, mudbrick walls, and large fortress-style gates. The large temples and palaces constructed inside the city walls attest to the prosperity of the period, and many luxury items of foreign origin give evidence of a vibrant international trade. Excavated sites of note for this period include, from north to south, Dan, Hazor, Megiddo, Aphek, Shechem, Jericho, Gezer, Ashkelon, and Tell el-'Ajjul. The Middle Bronze Age corresponds to the Middle Kingdom and Second Intermediate Period in Egypt. In contrast to the end of the Early Bronze Age, however, the cities of Palestine continued to flourish with the collapse of the Middle Kingdom and during the rule of the foreign Hyksos kings of the Second Intermediate Period. Only when the native Egyptian kings of the Seventeenth Dynasty succeeded in driving out the Hyksos did the Middle Bronze Age come to an end, with numerous cities in Palestine being destroyed.

The Late Bronze Age (1550–1200/1150 BC) corresponds to the New Kingdom in Egypt. This largely urban period lacks the prosperity of the Middle Kingdom as the cities of Palestine became subject to the Egyptian empire. Nevertheless, the period is also characterized by internationalism, with material culture from Egypt, Greece, Cyprus, Turkey, Lebanon, and Syria found at several of the sites in Palestine. Important excavated sites for this period include, from north to south, Hazor, Megiddo, Beth Shan, Aphek, Shechem, Gezer, Lachish, Tell el-Far'ah (south), and Timna. The Late Bronze Age comes to an end with the weakening of Egypt in the Twentieth Dynasty and the withdrawal of Egypt from Palestine.

In the chronology supplied by the Bible, the Israelites' ancestors—the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—are placed in the period from the end of the Early Bronze Age through the beginning of the Middle Bronze Age. The exodus from Egypt is placed at the beginning of the Late Bronze Age. The book of 1 Kgs 6:1 claims that the construction of Solomon's temple began 480 years after the Israelites came out of Egypt in the Exodus. A conservative date for the beginning of Solomon's reign would be around 960 BC, placing the exodus event around 1440 BC. In Exodus 12:40, the text claims that the Israelites lived in Egypt for 430 years. Thus, Joseph would have brought his father, his brothers, and their families into Egypt around 1870 BC. Further references establish a chronology for the ancestors: Abraham was one hundred years old when Isaac was born (Gn 21:5); Isaac was sixty years old when Jacob was born (Gn 25:26); and Jacob lived 130 years before Joseph brought him to Egypt (Gn 47:28). According to this chronology, Abraham would have been born around 2160 BC.

Although the biblical chronology is indicated fairly precisely, critical examination indicates a number of problems. First, setting aside historical problems that will be discussed later, the figure of 480 years for the period between the Exodus and the construction of the Temple is a suspiciously round number. It translates into twelve times forty, the latter being the traditional biblical length for a generation. In other words, the biblical writer is stating that the temple was constructed twelve generations after the Exodus. The number twelve, is itself suspicious, especially in the context of the temple—the single most significant building in Israel—because the number often represents “all Israel.” Solomon is also the twelfth generation from Judah according to some genealogies (e.g., 2 Chr 2:1–17; 3:1–9), and this might have served as the basis for the 480 years. The figure of 430 years for the duration of the Israelites’ stay in Egypt is also problematic but for a different reason. In Genesis 15:13–16 the figure of 400 years is used for the same period, and this is equated with three generations. Indeed, Moses and Aaron belong to the third generation after Levi. Finally, the extremely long lives attributed to the ancestors—Abraham lived to be 175 years old, Isaac surpassed his father with 180 years, and Jacob died at the age of 147—cannot be accepted. The great ages of the ancestors reflect their proximity to the antediluvian period. Those who lived before the flood had life spans of 900 years or more, but after the flood the life spans of the people gradually diminished (Joseph lived to be only 110 years old). In the end, the biblical chronology cannot be accepted as historical; it is rather symbolic and schematic.

The Patriarchs in History

The story of the Israelites’ ancestors in Genesis is composed of numerous, originally independent folk tales. It is usually assumed that these tales had an oral prehistory, but the written form of these tales are dated from 900 BC to 400 BC, depending on how the composition of Genesis is understood (wide disagreements exist on this issue). Unfortunately, little conclusive evidence exists to determine the date and nature of the book’s composition. Nevertheless, many anachronisms in the story indicate that it was written many centuries after the time it purports to describe. Also, as is typical of folk tales, many parts of the story were written, and perhaps originally told, according to fixed patterns of storytelling in the ancient world. For example, all three of the major women in the story—Sarah, Rebekah, and Rachel—are initially barren. This is a common motif, perhaps reflecting the social and physical reality of young girls who are married soon after their first menstruation, but are unable to conceive for a few years, and are used in the story of the ancestors to demonstrate the providence of God. Other fixed patterns of storytelling include the rivalry between a barren, favored wife and a fertile co-wife or concubine (Sarah and Hagar, Rachel and Leah); the encounter of the future betrothed at a well (Rebekah, Rachel); a journey in the desert and the discovery of a well (Ishmael); revelations of a deity in a dream (Jacob); and the testament of a dying ancestor (Jacob). One fixed pattern that is found repeated in the story of the ancestors but not elsewhere is the motif of an ancestor telling a king that his wife is his sister. Abraham does this twice and Isaac once, and in each case the common motif is told in a slightly different way to fit a different context regarding whether the wife is barren, promised a child, or already has children.

Does the story of Israel's ancestors preserve any recoverable traces of actual events that took place in the Bronze Age? Some scholars have thought so. W. F. Albright placed Abraham's migration from Haran to Canaan within the context of the Amorite migrations attested to in texts from Mesopotamia. The Amorites, known as "Amurru" in the Mesopotamian texts, were interpreted as a distinct, seminomadic people who migrated into southern Mesopotamia from eastern Syria and Turkey, and contributed to the collapse of the Akkad Dynasty and the rise of the First Dynasty of Babylon (whose most important king was Hammurapi). The Amorites were also given credit for the collapse of the Early Bronze city-states in Palestine. Albright further argued that documentary evidence from texts discovered at Mari and Nuzi indicates the historicity of the patriarchal figures. Dating to the Middle Bronze Age, the Mari texts attest to some of the personal and place names mentioned in the ancestor stories; the later Nuzi texts corroborate some of the social and legal practices in the Genesis narratives. Finally, the picture in Genesis of the ancestors living a seminomadic life in the midst of fortified urban centers fits the general situation of the Middle Bronze Age.

Kathleen Kenyon, who excavated at Jericho, thought she could identify the Amorites in the archaeological record. During the Intermediate Bronze Age, Jericho was characterized by a period of occupation (perhaps in tents) prior to the construction of any permanent structures. The buildings that were built on the tell during this period were characterized by thin, rather flimsy walls. Nevertheless, the inhabitants carved hundreds of large shaft tombs out of the bedrock, in which one individual was buried in each tomb with a bronze dagger or with a few small pots. Because she also identified many foreign elements in the material culture, Kenyon argued that the evidence from Jericho attests to the arrival of nomadic invaders, whom she associated with the Amorites.

Although widely influential, Albright's interpretation is no longer credible. First, it is worth noting that the biblical stories do not identify the ancestors as Amorites. Abraham begins his journey not from Haran but from Ur of the Chaldeans in southern Mesopotamia; his journey goes "upstream" against the flow of Amorites into Mesopotamia. Outside Genesis, Abraham is called an Aramean (Dt 26:5). The Amorites in the biblical tradition are presented as the native inhabitants of the land of Canaan ("Amorite" is often used synonymously with "Canaanite"), whose land would be given to Abraham's descendants. In Mesopotamian texts, the term "Amurru" simply denoted the west Semitic population of the Bronze Age. Although some groups of Amurru were nomadic, others were urbanized, occupying a wide range of socioeconomic roles in the society. Second, the correspondences between the names and social and legal customs of the ancestors, and those presented in the Mari and Nuzi texts, are not unique to the second millennium. Many of these names and customs can be identified in first-millennium texts during the period in which the ancestor stories themselves were written. Finally, the social situation of the ancestors as seminomads living in the midst of urban centers is also not unique to the Middle Bronze Age. In fact, this social situation is typical of virtually every period in the history of Palestine, from the Early Bronze Age through the Ottoman period. In the end, the ancestor narratives reflect the period of the Iron Age in which they were written, and provide no evidence that they preserve historical traces of past events.

The Exodus in History

The historical value of the Exodus narrative is much more difficult to assess than the story of the patriarchs. On the one hand, the Exodus narrative presents a spectacular story in which the God of Israel fights and defeats Pharaoh and his army in order to rescue his people from bondage, and humiliate the Egyptians who dared to challenge the honor and kingship of God. The story is told in accordance with the widely recognized mythic pattern of the conflict myth, and many aspects of the story have a supernatural rather than a historical character. Indeed, some aspects of the story cannot be historical. The sheer magnitude of the event—that the firstborn male of every Egyptian household died (Ex 12:29); that the entire Egyptian army pursued the Israelites to the sea and were subsequently drowned (Ex 14:9, 28); that the number of Israelites who escaped from Egypt were 603,550 men of fighting age, not counting Levites, old men, women, and children (Nm 1:44–47)—renders it historically impossible. Other aspects of the story call its historicity into question. For example, the story does not record the name of the Egyptian king, the primary adversary of God and the Israelites. This is extremely odd since elsewhere the biblical writers mention the names of most other foreign kings—the two notable exceptions being the Egyptian king who married Sarai in Genesis 12 and the Egyptian king in the Joseph story, both of whom are known simply as “Pharaoh.” The depiction of the plagues is also not historically plausible. Although many of the individual plagues are natural events that can occur in Egypt, the combination of all the plagues, the scope and severity of the plagues, and the references to the plagues not affecting the Israelites or their animals challenge a historical reading of the story.

The Exodus story, on the other hand, gives evidence of the writer’s familiarity with Egypt. The story is set in the context of the family of Jacob migrating into Egypt during a famine in Canaan and after Joseph had risen to the rank of vizier. Ample evidence indicates that Asiatics migrated to and lived in Egypt during all periods and especially during the Second Intermediate Period. In fact, during this period a group of Asiatics living in the eastern Delta region, known as the Hyksos, succeeded in establishing their rule over all of Lower Egypt and parts of Upper Egypt. Many scholars have noted that Joseph’s ascendancy in the court of Pharaoh fits in the Hyksos period, but Asiatics also rose to prominence in later periods as well. Moreover, some parts of the Joseph story have parallels in Egyptian literature, such as the “Tale of Two Brothers.” Many of the names in the Exodus narrative are Egyptian. Moses is the Egyptian word for birth, and occurs with theophoric elements in the names of Thutmose and Ramesses.

The names of Hophni, Phinehas, Shiphrah, and Puah are also Egyptian. The narrative claims that the Israelites were forced to build the store-cities Pithom and Ramesses. Ramesses can be identified with Pi-Ramesses, the capital city of Ramesses II in the eastern Delta at Tell el-Dab'a. Pithom is Hebrew for Egyptian Per-Atum (House of Atum) and can be identified with either Tell el-Retabeh or nearby Tell el-Maskhuta in the eastern Delta. Evidence also indicates that foreigners living in Egypt were conscripted into the corvée-labor groups used to work on the state building projects during the New Kingdom.

How do we reconcile these two opposing views of the historicity of the Exodus story? Two characteristics of biblical storytelling are important in this regard. First, the biblical writers responsible for this narrative are not attempting to write a history of the event, in either the modern or the classical Greek sense of history. The biblical writers did not investigate or critically examine their sources, nor did they necessarily invent the story. They simply took the traditions about the past that were present in their day (probably in oral form) and constructed from them a dramatic and persuasive written narrative. The traditions might have been generated in response to actual events of the past, but, as is often the case with oral tradition, the actual events no longer resembled the traditions and cannot be reconstructed from them. Second, the biblical writers describe the significance of the event for Israel. The biblical writers present the Exodus as one of the most significant events in the history of Israel, yet no reference to the Israelites or the Exodus can be found in any of the Egyptian records. We would not necessarily expect the Egyptians to record what would have been a disaster for their king and army at the sea—rarely do royal scribes record the failures of their king—but we would expect to find some record of the Israelites' presence in the Delta (the "land of Goshen") or their role in state building projects. The absence of any reference to the Israelites suggests that whatever actual events might lie behind the narrative, they were insignificant from the perspective of the Egyptians. Therefore, although we might acknowledge that the Exodus narrative does preserve some traces of past events, the present form of the narrative does not provide us with any evidence from which to reconstruct those events.

Whatever events might underlie the Exodus narrative must be set in the context of what we do know about Egypt and Palestine in the Late Bronze Age. Palestine in the Late Bronze Age had a material culture that was continuous with the Middle Bronze Age, but the society itself was much poorer and less organized. This is attested in the settlement pattern. Most of the large fortified Middle Bronze cities in Palestine were destroyed at the end of the period. Many of the sites were not immediately reinhabited. Gradually, the old sites were reinhabited and new sites were settled, but the total settled area remained stable due to the abandonment of several large sites. The central hill country, which had been widely settled in the Middle Bronze Age, was now largely devoid of settlement. Most of the sites in the Late Bronze Age were small (less than twelve acres) and unfortified. The massive Middle Bronze ramparts continued to exist, but often no city wall was built on top of the ramparts. Instead, buildings were placed along the edge of the tell in a continuous line so that the outer wall of the structures offered modest protection. Few public buildings have been uncovered. The large fortress-style temples of the Middle Bronze Age (at Shechem and Megiddo) continued to be used, but on a diminished scale. The large city of Hazor alone continued to flourish during the Late Bronze Age, perhaps due to its orientation toward the large cities in Syria rather than toward Egypt.

The Egyptian kings of Thebes, who had been ruled by the Asiatic Hyksos during the latter part of the Middle Bronze Age, now sought to extend their rule into Palestine. When Ahmose (1550–1525 BC) drove the Hyksos out of Egypt, he campaigned into Palestine to provide a buffer against further Asiatic incursions into Egypt. By the reign of Thutmose III (1492–1425 BC), all of Palestine was incorporated into the Egyptian empire. He set up an administrative system over Palestine that would endure through the remainder of the Late Bronze Age. (It is worth noting that the biblical chronology places the Exodus during the reign of Thutmose III—an impossible scenario.) Although Egypt faced opposition from the kingdoms of Mitanni (Hurrians) and Hatti (Hittites), Egypt maintained control over Palestine through the reign of Ramesses III (1184–1153 BC). Then a series of weak kings and political turmoil across the Mediterranean forced Egypt to withdraw from Palestine after approximately 350 years of control.

Evidence of the Egyptian presence and control of Palestine is found in numerous Egyptian artifacts (scarabs, jewelry, statues, stelae, anthropoid coffins) and buildings (temples and residencies), especially from the end of the Late Bronze Age. Egyptian-style temples—found at Beth Shan, Lachish, and Timna—differ in distinct ways from the Syrian-style temples in Palestine that continued the Middle Bronze tradition. A number of new buildings constructed at the end of the Late Bronze Age appear to attest to the strategic concerns of the Egyptians. The buildings are similar to private dwellings in Egypt, and thus are called “Egyptian residences.” Most of these residences were built at existing sites—Beth Shan, Tell el-Far’ah (south), Megiddo, Tel Sera’, Aphek, Jaffa, Tell es-Sa’idiyeh—but a few were built at uninhabited sites such as Tel Mor (near Ashdod) and Deir el-Balah (west of Gaza) and thus served as fortified outposts. The buildings are laid out according to an Egyptian floor plan and are constructed using Egyptian techniques.

Two episodes during the Late Bronze Age are often connected to the Bible. During the reigns of Amenhotep III (1390–1352 BC) and Akhenaten (1352–1336 BC) numerous letters sent from the local rulers of the Canaanite cities to the Egyptian court (known as the Amarna letters) refer to groups of people known as ‘Apiru (or Habiru), who seem to be responsible for some of the regional turmoil. The letters imply that the ‘Apiru were mercenaries or bandits, and were employed by some local rulers to promote their self-interests against other rulers. Because the term ‘Apiru is etymologically similar to that for Hebrew, some scholars have suggested the Amarna letters give evidence of Hebrews—that is, the early Israelites—in the land of Canaan. It is possible that ‘Apiru is related to Hebrew, but at most ‘Apiru probably designates a similar social category rather than an ethnic group. In any case, if the Amarna letters refer to groups of people that can be identified as Hebrews or early Israelites, the information about them does not correspond to the biblical tradition and thus little is known about them.

The second episode occurred during the reign of Merneptah (1213–1203 BC), the son of Ramesses II. In the fifth year of his reign, he defended Egypt against a Libyan assault, and commemorated his victory on a stela where he also refers to his campaign into Palestine against Ashkelon, Gezer, Yanoam, and Israel. Whereas Ashkelon, Gezer, and Yanoam are designated in the Egyptian inscription as cities, Israel is designated as a people or tribe. This is the first reference to Israel in any Middle Eastern text, and the only reference to Israel in an Egyptian text. Unfortunately, we learn nothing about Israel, its geographic location, or its relationship to the Canaanite cities from this text. We can be certain, however, that by the reign of Merneptah a group of people known as Israel is living in the land of Canaan.

The Iron I Age

The Israelites in the Biblical Tradition

The end of the Late Bronze Age and beginning of the Iron I Age (1200/1150–1000 BC) was characterized by political turmoil. Across the Mediterranean prominent civilizations—the Mycenaeans, Minoans, Hittites—were brought to ruin, many of the Syrian and Canaanite cities were destroyed, and Egypt was forced to retreat to the Nile Valley. The causes of the turmoil are many and not fully understood. One group that emerged from the turmoil was the Philistines. Originating in the Mycenaean world, they settled along the southern coast of Palestine, from Tell Qasile on the Yarkon River to Gaza, after losing a series of land and sea battles against Ramesses III in the eighth year of his reign (as recorded on the walls of his mortuary temple at Medinet Habu and in the Harris Papyrus I). They brought with them a distinct Mycenaean-style pottery that allows archaeologists to identify their settlements. The Israelites are another group that emerge during this period, but their identification in the archaeological record is not as clear as that of the Philistines.

The biblical presentation of the Israelites' conquest of Canaan and the period of the Israelite judges should presumably be set in the Iron I Age. The political vacuum that resulted from Egypt's withdrawal from Canaan would have enabled the settlement of the Israelite tribes in Canaan and the formation of new political structures, culminating in the Israelite state. The Bible's presentation of this period, however, is riddled with literary problems and presents numerous insurmountable historical and archaeological problems.

The bulk of the stories of Israel's settlement of the land of Canaan comes from Joshua 1–12. They describe the military invasion of the land by a unified people under the leadership of Joshua. The conquest was largely successful. All the Canaanite cities were destroyed except for Gibeon, whose inhabitants deceived the Israelites into making peace with them. In its present form, the book of Joshua is part of what has come to be known as the Deuteronomistic History (along with the books of Judges, Samuel, and Kings). In the story of the conquest given in Joshua and Judges, the Deuteronomistic Historian presents an ideological tale that focuses on the Israelites' faithfulness to God as demonstrated by their fidelity to the laws of God, especially the laws of Deuteronomy. According to this ideology, the Israelites would succeed in their conquest and possession of the land of Canaan as long as they were faithful to God's covenant (Jos 1:3–8). If they were unfaithful to the covenant—if they turned their back on the LORD and served other gods—they would fail in taking and keeping the land. Instead, God would leave the Canaanites in the land to oppress the Israelites, and thus to be a test of their covenant fidelity. Thus, in the story of Joshua the Israelites are faithful to the covenant and succeed in conquering the land. However, upon the death of Joshua, the people turned away from the LORD and worshipped the Baals, and as a result God gave the Israelites over to their enemies and they were unable to stand against them (Jgs 2:11–15). The book of Judges then describes how the people of Israel struggled in the midst of the Canaanites. The book presents the rule of each judge according to the following cycles of events: the people would suffer under the oppression of their more powerful Canaanite neighbors because they had worshipped other gods; the people would eventually turn to the LORD and plead for help; God would then raise up a judge who would deliver them by defeating their enemies in battle; peace would endure throughout the life of the judge, when the people would once again reject the LORD and the whole cycle would repeat.

From a literary perspective, a number of problems result from the Deuteronomistic Historian's presentation of the Israelite settlement. One problem arises due to a glaring inconsistency regarding the fate of King Jabin of Hazor. In Joshua 11, the Israelites fight and defeat Jabin, put to the sword all the inhabitants of Hazor, and then burn the city. In Judges 4, however, King Jabin of Canaan who reigns in Hazor is oppressing the Israelites until they, under the leadership of Deborah and Barak, defeat his army and eventually destroy him. Although it is possible that multiple kings, especially within a dynasty, would bear the same name, it is unlikely that the king and entire population of Hazor could be killed and the city destroyed, yet emerge as a powerful force in a following generation. A more likely scenario is that two distinct and independent traditions of King Jabin and Hazor's fall have been preserved and attributed to two different periods.

More substantial literary problems exist with the presentation of the conquest in Joshua 1–12, for the Bible preserves alternative accounts of this story. A brief tale in Joshua 17:14–18 presents a picture in which the Israelites were militarily incapable of driving out the Canaanites. The tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh must resort to clearing the forests in the inhospitable hill country in order to find enough land to subsist on because the Canaanites in the valleys have iron chariots. Exodus 23:23–33 presents a situation in which the Israelites are too few in number to conquer the land of Canaan. The land can only be conquered little by little until the Israelites have sufficient population to occupy it, presumably after several generations. In Judges 1 the Israelites do not conquer the land as a unified people, but each tribe acts independently. Although the tribe of Judah has a measure of success, all of the tribes fail to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants of the land. The accounts of the allotment of the land also challenge the literary presentation of the conquest in Joshua 1–12. In Joshua 18:2–5 Joshua divides the land among seven tribes that had failed to take possession of their land (the hill country was already occupied by the tribes of Judah and Joseph). In this account, the tribe of Benjamin had failed to take possession of its land, but the stories in Joshua 1–12 emphasize clearly that the land of Benjamin is conquered. Finally, the general picture of Israel during the lifetime of Joshua is at odds with the picture of Israel during the period of the judges. In the stories of Joshua, the Israelites are a unified people made up of twelve clearly defined tribes under the leadership of a single individual. In the stories of Judges, the Israelites are not unified; intertribal conflict is presented on more than one occasion. The judges rule over individual tribes, and the number and composition of the tribes is fluid.

Do the books of Joshua and Judges preserve traces of events of the past? For the stories of the conquest in Joshua 1–12, the answer is probably no, as we will explain in the following sections. The tribal allotments and boundary lists in Joshua 13–21 probably do preserve historical records of tribal boundaries, but the period to which they attest is uncertain. We should note that none of the boundary lists are given in their entirety, and the descriptions of the allotment of the land are inconsistent. The historical value of the book of Judges is a little more complicated. The overall form of the individual stories has been shaped to correspond to the ideology of the Deuteronomistic Historian and is thus clearly secondary. Nevertheless, many biblical scholars suggest that the content of the stories preserves at least some social history and perhaps also some political history. The stories do seem to attest to early Israelite customs and social configurations, but many of these customs and social configurations may have endured well into the period of the Israelite and Judean states. Reference to conflicts with other peoples might reflect long-standing antagonism (such as with the Philistines), though some might be anachronistic for the Iron I period (such as with Moab). It is possible that the text preserves the names of early tribal leaders, especially in the lists of so-called minor judges (Jgs 3:31; 10:1–5; 12:7–15). The references to these judges are short, simply naming the judge, the location from where he judged, how long he judged, and often referring to his sons and where he is buried. Perhaps these lists formed part of the writer's source material. The names of the so-called major judges—Ehud, Deborah, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson—probably also would have been included in this source material, but their stories were filled out from other, presumably oral, traditions.

Models of the Israelite Settlement

Over the last century, biblical scholars formulated three competing historical models in order to explain the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan during the Iron I Age. The Nomadic Infiltration model was first developed by Albrecht Alt and his student Martin Noth in the first half of the twentieth century. This model posits that the early Israelites were nomads or seminomads in a process of gradual sedentarization in the sparsely inhabited central hill country. The settlement was a two-stage process: the early Israelites first entered the land of Canaan in the process of changing pastures; slowly they began to settle permanently in the sparsely populated parts of the country and extended their territory as occasion offered. The whole process began by peaceful means without the use of military force. As the settlers increased in numbers, they gradually moved into the lowlands where they came into conflict with the Canaanite urban centers. This model views Joshua 1–12 as etiologically generated traditions with little historical value. Some cities such as Hazor and Bethel were destroyed by the Israelites as they moved into the lowlands, but the bulk of Joshua 1–12 is fictional. This model emphasizes the uncoordinated movements of Israelites into Canaan from different directions and at different times. If there ever was an exodus event, only a fraction of later Israel was involved.

This model is flawed in several respects. First, the model is unable to demonstrate that the Israelites originated from outside Palestine. As indicated above, all material evidence indicates that the early Israelites resembled their Canaanite neighbors. This would not be the case if the Israelites, like the Philistines, had entered Palestine from elsewhere. Second, the model presents an inadequate understanding of nomadism. Pastoral nomadism cannot be viewed as an evolutionary interval between hunting and gathering, and agricultural societies. It is rather a marginal specialization of animal husbandry. The relationship between agriculturalists and pastoralists was symbiotic. Moreover, early Israelites appear to have practiced both pastoralism and agriculture.

The Military Invasion model was created in response to the Nomadic Infiltration model. The main proponents of this model—W. F. Albright, G. Ernest Wright, and John Bright—argued that archaeology has vindicated the essential historicity of the narratives in Joshua 1–12 by demonstrating that the numerous cities stated in the text to have been destroyed do in fact provide evidence of massive destruction. They acknowledge that the ancient sites of Jericho, Ai, Gibeon, and Arad pose problems to this model because they provide no evidence of occupation at the end of the Late Bronze Age. Nevertheless, they also note that the overwhelming evidence of destruction of other sites is decisive. Moreover, the destruction levels of most of these sites are followed by poor unfortified occupations. There is also a large number of sites with new occupation or occupation that followed centuries of abandonment. This model thus suggests, building on the integration of the biblical and archaeological records, that a large group of people rapidly moved into Canaan from outside the land, and their conflict with the native Canaanite inhabitants was primarily political.

The Military Invasion model has been challenged in many respects. First, the application of archaeology to Joshua 1–12 is selective. The evidence is absent for much of the text, and it is embarrassing with regard to Jericho, Ai, Gibeon, and Arad. The sites of Kadesh-Barnea, Hormah, Heshbon, Dibon, and Hebron could also be added to the list of sites in which the archaeological record does not support the biblical tradition. Second, this model has been challenged on its very assumption that archaeology could be used to verify the biblical texts in this regard, for archaeological data are inherently ambiguous. A destroyed city does not indicate the agents of destruction. Although the early Israelites could have been responsible for a site's destruction, more likely scenarios would point to the Egyptians or the Philistines (or other so-called sea peoples) as the agents of the destructions. Archaeology also raises a chronological problem for the model because not all the Late Bronze cities that give evidence of destruction were destroyed during the same time period. The destructions of Hazor and Lachish, for example, were separated by more than a century. Many of the large sites that give evidence of massive destruction were in areas in which the native Canaanite inhabitants remained dominant. In other words, the material culture after the destruction was similar in kind to the material culture before the destruction of the site, such as Beth Shan. Finally, the Military Invasion model also implies that the material culture of early Israel would be intrusive into the native Canaanite culture, but this is not the case.

The Peasant Revolt model was first put forward by George Mendenhall and subsequently modified by Norman Gottwald. According to this model, the Amarna letters—which refer to the internal struggles in Palestine caused by the ‘Apiru—and the biblical events (especially as presented in Judges) represent the same political process: namely, the withdrawal of large population groups from an obligation to existing political regimes and, therefore, the renunciation of any protection from these sources. There was no statistically important invasion of Canaan, no displacement of population, no genocide, no large-scale driving out of the population, only that of royal administrators. Instead, there was a peasant’s revolt against the network of interlocking Canaanite city-states. The catalyst for this movement might have been the Exodus group, that is, a group of corvée-labor captives who escaped from Egypt and made a covenant with God at Sinai. This Exodus group espoused an ideology attractive to those who were oppressed in Canaan and who immediately joined them. Many of the biblical texts suggest that the people of Israel were not able to conquer the cities of the plains until David’s time. Therefore, the early Israelites had geographically removed themselves from the Canaanite cities by retreating into the wooded hill country. The early Israelite settlements were in fact opening this previously uninhabited frontier; such frontiers often attract the socially disenfranchised. Credit should be given to several technological improvements—iron tools, rock terraces, lined cisterns—which made this achievement possible.

Although this model takes into account the similarities between Israelite and Canaanite material culture, it has been criticized for failing to demonstrate the existence of a true peasant’s revolt in ancient Palestine and for imposing modern, especially Marxist, ideologies on the early Israelites. The Peasant Revolt model overemphasizes the uniqueness of the Israelite settlement. The early highland villages of Israel are identical to other highland villages outside of Palestine; the Israelite settlement does not appear to depend on a unique religious experience or a political ideology.

The Archaeology of the Settlement

A number of new models explaining the Israelite settlement have emerged in recent years, but none has risen to the paradigmatic status of the earlier models. Rooted heavily in the new evidence gleaned from excavations and surveys, especially in the central hill country and the northern Negev, these models share numerous similarities: the Israelites emerged largely from the indigenous population of Canaan, the settlement was primarily peaceful, and the population was engaged in agricultural and pastoral activities. The models differ in their explanation of the causes of the settlement. Some models emphasize the disruption of international trade or the collapse of the Late Bronze cities; others emphasize environmental factors or long-term social processes. Undoubtedly, multiple causes are responsible for the emergence of the Israelites. The new models simply provide interpretive frameworks for the growing body of archaeological evidence of the Israelite settlement.

An explosion of new settlements in the central hill country characterizes the archaeology of the Iron I period. During the Late Bronze Age the hill country held only twenty-nine settlements (down from 220 during the preceding Middle Bronze Age). During the Iron I period, the settlements in the hill country increased to 254. The size of the settlements was quite small, averaging 4.25 acres, but most were less than 2.5 acres in size (the Late Bronze settlements on average were twice as large). The majority of the settlements were founded on previously unoccupied sites, although many were founded on abandoned sites that had been occupied during the Early or Middle Bronze Ages. Except for a few major sites that show continuous settlement from the Late Bronze Age, such as Shechem and Jerusalem, most of the settlements were poor hamlets with no fortifications or public buildings.

The central hill country has gone through periods of settlement and abandonment from the Early Bronze Age through the Iron Age, and during each period the settlement pattern is fairly similar. The northern hill country (Shechem and north) is more conducive to settlement with its large valleys, moderate topography, and fertile eastern slope. The southern Judean hill country is less hospitable. As a result, more settlements are found in the north. During periods of settlement decline such as the Late Bronze Age, the percentage of settlements shifts to the north. However, during the waves of settlement such as the Iron I period, the percentage of settlements increases in the southern hill country. Similarly, an east-to-west settlement shift can be detected. Because the eastern side of the hill country is closer to the desert fringe, it is the location of the early wave of settlement. During settlement declines, only the eastern flank is settled. The western side of the hill country is ideal for horticulture, but it is also more mountainous and demands more permanent commitment for settlement. Thus this side is not occupied until later during the waves of settlement.

This settlement pattern might be interpreted in terms of the shift from pastoral to sedentary life. The eastern and southern regions are where pastoralism is primarily practiced, and where the people would be able to make the transition from pastoral to a primarily agricultural life. The economy of these small settlements appears to be dependent primarily upon agriculture and supplemented with pastoralism. The building of many terraces throughout the hill country attests to the agricultural economy of the region. Also, pits for holding grain and cisterns for holding water are characteristic features of the Iron I sites. The domestic structures, however, attest to the importance of pastoralism, for they were adapted to also serve as shelter for the flocks. The mixed economy of farming and herding served to minimize the risks inherent in the establishment of new settlements.

Although most of the settlements simply consist of a group of houses, some of the settlements attest to planning. The common plan was the arrangement of the houses along the perimeter so that the external walls of the houses formed a defensive wall, or the ring of houses could also have created a pen for gathering the inhabitants' flocks of sheep and goats. At 'Izbet Sartah (perhaps biblical Ebenezer), for example, twenty-two broad-room houses formed an oval enclosure, a half-acre in area, surrounding a central open area. At Beersheba the first built-up settlement (Stratum VII, dating to the end of the Iron I period) consisted of a ring of houses built around the perimeter of the mound, with their external walls forming a defensive barrier.

The material culture of these sites is simple and plain, and is characterized by the pillared house and the collared-rim storage jar. The pillared house is the most common architectural feature of the Iron I Age. The pillars consisted of large stone monoliths, unworked stone drums, or wooden posts placed on stone socles. Rows of pillars served to divide courtyards into roofed and unroofed areas, as well as define multiple rooms within buildings. The pillared houses followed a variety of plans, but the most common and enduring plan was the four-room house.

The basic plan of the four-room house consisted of three long rooms backed by a broad room. Pillars were usually used to separate the three long rooms; solid walls are also employed to separate the long rooms. In modified plans, the long rooms themselves (or the broad room in back) could be further subdivided. The center long room typically served as a courtyard, along with ovens and food processing equipment. There is debate over whether it was roofed. The side rooms separated by pillars were used to house animals, with troughs placed between the pillars. The back broad room served as the main living room. Based on the amount of charred debris in the buildings, many of these houses supported a second story. The bedrooms would have been located in the upper story over the side and back rooms. In some villages, the pillared houses appear in clusters or compounds in which several houses shared walls and a common courtyard. These compounds probably reflect the kinship structures of the settlers (such as the extended family). They also might attest to the economic and labor needs that the settlers faced. The shared walls of the compounds would have minimized the labor and resource needs of the settlement.

The pottery repertoire of the hill country settlements is characterized by large storage jars (pithoi), including the collared-rim storage jar. Other utilitarian vessels are also found in lesser quantities. Painted decoration is rare, although applied or impressed decoration can be found. All of the pottery has antecedents in the pottery of the Late Bronze Age. Only a few cultic items have been found—a bronze bull at an open-air site near Mount Gilboa, a bronze figurine of a seated deity in a cult room at Hazor, pottery incense stands and small, stone, four-horned altars at Megiddo and Lachish—and in every case they stand firmly within the Canaanite tradition.

Who were these settlers in the central hill country? The biblical tradition, of course, would identify many of these settlers as Israelite, and indeed they became part of the states of Israel and Judah. Many of the settlers, however, might not have identified themselves as Israelites, at least not initially. In any case, the archaeological and historical evidence suggests that the settlers were a mixture of several population groups. One group undoubtedly consisted of those who left the Late Bronze urban centers in the lowlands. The settlers' knowledge of dry farming and other technological skills such as terracing, digging of cisterns, and house construction argues in favor of their origin in the Late Bronze cities. The continuities of the material culture that the settlers share with the earlier Canaanites further support this interpretation. Another group consisted of pastoralists living on the desert fringe. This group lived in a symbiotic relationship with the urban centers throughout the history of Palestine. During periods of settlement decline, the pastoral population increased and their mode of subsistence became more diverse. During periods of increased settlement as in the Iron I period, many in this group chose a predominantly agricultural lifestyle while others would revert to a strictly pastoral lifestyle. Finally, the settlers could have consisted of groups that are mentioned in historical texts such as the 'Apiru and the Shasu (the latter is a nomadic group mentioned in the Egyptian texts), and perhaps, also a group of refugees who had escaped the corvée in Egypt.

Iron II Age

Historical Sources

For the Iron II Age (1000–539 BC) the historian of ancient Israel finally has at hand numerous literary and documentary sources in addition to the biblical literature. The primary and most important sources are the annals of the Assyrian kings. Beginning with Shalmaneser III (858–824 BC), the Assyrian kings began to encounter the kings of Israel in their campaigns toward the Mediterranean, and hence began to include reference to Israel in their annals and inscriptions. The annals of Shalmaneser, for example, record his battles with an Aramean coalition in which the Israelite kingdom participated. Ahab is presented as one of the stronger members, supplying the coalition with 2,000 chariots and 10,000 foot soldiers. In a later inscription on the Black Obelisk, Shalmaneser records the tribute of Jehu, the son of Omri [sic], and includes a relief representation of the king kneeling in submission to him. With the reign of Tiglath-pileser III (744–727 BC) the Assyrian kings also had encounters with the kings of Judah, who are now mentioned in the Assyrian annals and inscriptions. The Assyrian records are important sources for understanding Israel's relations with Damascus and other Aramean states, the events that culminated in the destruction of Samaria and the end of the Israelite kingdom, and the political events surrounding the reigns of Ahaz and Hezekiah.

The Babylonians also kept annals that shed light on the political events in the Middle East at the end of Assyrian domination. Few texts refer to Judah directly, but one chronicle does record Nebuchadnezzar's battles in Palestine, including his destruction of Jerusalem.

The Egyptian records during this period shed little light on the events involving the Israelites, for they are largely preoccupied with internal matters. During the Late Period, Egypt under the Twenty-Fifth and the Twenty-Sixth Dynasties is once again involved in the political affairs of Palestine, but records that attest to this involvement are few. The most notable record of Egypt's interaction with Israel and Judah during the Iron II period is the list of conquered cities in Israel and Judah by Sheshonq I (945–924 BC; identified as the biblical Shishak), which is carved on the walls of the Karnak temple. Unfortunately, Sheshonq did not include a narrative description of his campaign, and thus his inscription offers limited historical insight.

Numerous Hebrew and Aramaic inscriptions that provide important firsthand information on the events of this period have been uncovered in Palestine. The most famous of these inscriptions is the Moabite Stela, erected by King Mesha of Moab in dedication of a temple. The inscription describes how Mesha freed his land from Israelite vassalage during the reign of Omri's "son" (usually interpreted to mean Omri's grandson, Joram). The Tel Dan inscription celebrates an unnamed king's defeat of the kings of Israel and the "house of David." The inscription was presumably erected by Hazael, king of Damascus, but the fragmentary and incomplete condition of the inscription make such an interpretation tentative. The Siloam Tunnel Inscription describes the construction of the tunnel that brought water from the Gihon spring into a pool inside the walls of Jerusalem. The inscription describes the events from the perspective of the workers, but the tunnel probably was dug at the command of Hezekiah in preparation for his rebellion against Assyria. The Lachish Letters describe diplomatic and military maneuvers during the final days of the kingdom of Judah as it was being assaulted by the Babylonians. From the same period, the Arad Letters record the provisioning of the Judean fort at Arad but also record conflict with the Edomites who live south of Judah. Finally, many seals and bullae attest to the names of officials and the Jerusalem hierarchy, prior to the city's destruction by the Babylonians.

Other inscriptions attest to economic, social, and religious conditions of the Iron II period. The Gezer Calendar describes the agricultural cycle of the year. Because of the content, some scholars have interpreted this inscription to be a practice text, attesting to early scribal activity (as do the 'Izbet Sartah and Khirbet Qaiyafa ostraca and the Tell Zayit abecedary). The Samaria Ostraca are a series of tax receipts for agricultural goods delivered to the capital and which attest to economic and kinship structures in Israel. The Yavneh-yam Letter records the complaint of a farm worker to the commander of a fort who has deprived him of his cloak. The Kuntillet 'Ajrud and the Khirbet el-Qom inscriptions attest to a form of Yahwism that has not been preserved in the Bible.

The primary sources in the Bible for the Iron II Age are the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles (some of the prophetic books, especially Isaiah and Jeremiah, also provide historical information for this period). The stories of Samuel and Saul in 1 Samuel 1–15 are similar in kind to the stories in the book of Judges. They probably record real historical figures, and perhaps also early conflicts between the Israelites in the central hill country and the Philistines on the coastal plain. No earlier source material other than oral traditions can be recognized behind the narrative. The story of Saul and David's conflict in 1 Samuel 16–2 Samuel 1 has been shaped by an apologist on behalf of the Davidic Dynasty. Saul is presented as one driven mad by an evil spirit, whereas David is a loyal servant who refuses to raise his hand against Saul. Some of this material probably preserves traces of real historical events, such as Saul's death in battle against the Philistines, but whatever historical sources might have lain beneath the narrative are now difficult to ascertain.

The stories of 2 Samuel 2–1 Kings 11 address the period of the "United Monarchy," the reigns of David and Solomon. The historical value of these stories is currently the subject of intense debate by biblical scholars and archaeologists. This debate is compounded by the fact that this period (often labeled Iron IIA, or in some circles Iron IC) is not addressed in any nonbiblical sources, and the material remains of this period give at best an ambiguous picture. At issue is the nature and scope of the "kingdom" of David and Solomon: Was there a “United Monarchy”? Did David and Solomon rule over a territorial state? What was the relationship of this “kingdom” to the other “kingdoms”—Ammon, Aram, Edom, Philistia, Phoenicia—in the region? Many of the stories of David and Solomon are either legendary tales or creations of the biblical writer, perhaps based on brief historical records. Whereas the death notice of Solomon (1 Kgs 11:41–43) refers to the “Book of the Acts of Solomon,” no such source is listed in the stories of David. Texts that appear to be based on earlier sources might include the lists of David’s administrators (2 Sm 8:16–18; 20:23–26) and his warriors (2 Sm 23:8–39). The references to David’s battles (2 Sm 8:1–15) might also be based on an earlier source. A longer list of historical sources might be extracted from the story of Solomon: list of Solomon’s officials (1 Kgs 4:1–6); list of officials responsible for supplying food for the court (1 Kgs 4:7–19); Solomon’s use of forced labor (1 Kgs 5:13–18); cities that Solomon built and fortified with forced labor (1 Kgs 9:15–19); dealings with King Hiram of Tyre (1 Kgs 9:26–28; 10:11–12, 22); Solomon’s trade in horses and chariots (1 Kgs 10:28–29); and conflicts with Hadad of Edom, Rezon of Damascus, and Jeroboam of Ephraim (1 Kgs 11:14–40). Many other aspects of the stories, such as David’s conquering of Jerusalem, Solomon’s wisdom and wealth, and his building of the Temple, are legendary and might have been based on widely known oral traditions.

The stories of the separate kingdoms of Israel and Judah are found in 1 Kings 12–25. These stories are based on two groups of sources. The first source has been called the “Tales of the Prophets.” This source consists of stories of prophets, especially their dealings with kings, and their prophecies. The source includes, for example, the story of Ahijah’s prophecy that Jeroboam will become the king of the northern ten tribes of Israel (1 Kgs 11:26–40) and his subsequent prophecy that the house of Jeroboam will be destroyed (1 Kgs 14:1–18). Other stories are about Shemaiah (1 Kgs 12:1–24), Jehu (1 Kgs 16:1–4, 7), Micaiah (1 Kgs 22:1–38), Jonah (2 Kgs 14:25–27), Isaiah (2 Kgs 18:13–20:19), and a number of unnamed prophets (1 Kgs 12:25–13:32; 1 Kgs 20; 2 Kgs 21:10–15). The best known and largest group of stories focus on Elijah and Elisha and their interaction with the house of Ahab (1 Kgs 17–19:21; 2 Kgs 1–10, 13). Although many of these stories are largely legendary and often reflect a later situation, they appear to have preserved some reliable historical information, particularly regarding the political and economic situation of the period. However, it should be noted that the focus of the stories is primarily religious; the political and social context of the stories is often the backdrop for a religious message regarding the king's (and the people's) faithfulness to the LORD.

The second major source for the book of Kings is the Israelite and Judean chronicles, which provides the framework for the story of each king. The reign of each king is introduced with a reference to his father, the age at which he began to reign and the length of his reign, and his mother's name. The reigns of the kings of Judah are synchronized with the reigns of the kings of Israel. The story of the king's reign ends with a reference to his death and the place of his burial. Mixed in with this framework are references to deeds accomplished by the king and a statement that other deeds are recorded in either the "Books of the Annals of the Kings of Israel" or the "Books of the Annals of the Kings of Judah." Although the Deuteronomistic Historian adds his own evaluation of each king's reign, the Historian does not appear to have edited or omitted information from the chronicles of the Judean kings. Less information is preserved about the Israelite kings—the king's father and mother are not listed—but this might reflect the nature of the Israelite chronicle rather than the Deuteronomistic Historian's bias. The chronicles preserve fairly reliable historical information. This information, however, is not without its problems. The chronology and synchronization of the Israelite and Judean kings, for example, does not fit within the absolute dates that can be fixed from Assyrian, Babylonian, and Egyptian records. Part of the problem might be that we are not certain how regnal years were counted in each case or whether a king's reign included a co-regency with his father. In other cases, the numbers supplied by the chronicles are incorrect. It seems impossible that Pekah could have reigned for twenty years or that Uzziah (Azariah) reigned for fifty-two years (though the latter's reign could be accounted for with a co-regency).

Other sources that could have been used by the writer of the book of Kings might be dedicatory building inscriptions (similar to the Moabite Stone) or inscriptions associated with votive dedications or biographic stelae that would have been set up in the Temple, the king's palace, or a prominent public location in Jerusalem. The existence of such inscriptions is likely and many texts in the books of Kings could be based on such inscriptions, but in the end their existence must remain speculative.

The book of Chronicles is also a source for the Iron II Age. For the stories of David and Solomon, the book of Chronicles is largely dependent upon the books of Samuel and Kings and offers little independent material. For the stories of the later kings, however, Chronicles offers some material that is not found in Kings. For example, the book of Chronicles records how the Assyrians took Manasseh as a captive to Babylon, where he repented to God who restored him to Jerusalem (2 Chr 33:10–13). This episode is absent from the book of Kings, probably because it does not fit the ideology of the Deuteronomistic Historian, who blames the sins of Manasseh for the eventual destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. In such cases, the book of Chronicles gives us insight into sources that were not accessible to or rejected by the Deuteronomistic Historian. Moreover, this particular example should caution against placing too much confidence in the sources used by the Chronicler or other biblical writers. It is unlikely that Manasseh was ever taken to Babylon, which was a center of repeated revolt against the Assyrian empire. It is possible, however, that Manasseh was taken to Nineveh—an inscription of Esarhaddon records that Manasseh and twenty-one other kings were forced to bring building materials to Nineveh. A number of sources are named in Chronicles—acts of the Prophet Nathan, the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, the visions of the seer Iddo (2 Chr 9:29), Records of the Prophet Shemaiah and Seer Iddo (2 Chr 12:15), midrash of the book of the kings (2 Chr 24:27), acts of Uzziah by Isaiah (2 Chr 26:22), and acts of Hezekiah by Isaiah (2 Chr 32:32)—but the nature of these sources or whether they are included in the book of Kings is unknown.

The Tenth Century

The beginning of the Iron II Age is imperceptible in the archaeological record. The similarities of the tenth century with the material culture of the Iron I period have led some scholars to label the tenth century as Iron IC. The tenth century is associated with the Iron II Age primarily because the Bible claims that it is the period of statehood—the formation of the “United Monarchy.” Unfortunately, the United Monarchy is not clearly evident in the archaeological record. Until recently, no archaeological remains could be associated with David’s kingdom. There is archaeological evidence attributed to the reign of Solomon, but the significance of this evidence for understanding the history of Israel is debated.

In recent excavations in Jerusalem and at a small hilltop site overlooking the Elah Valley (Khirbet Qeiyafa), the excavators argue that they have uncovered material remains of the kingdom of David. In Jerusalem, Eilat Mazar reexcavated an area west and above the so-called stepped-stone structure, an area that had previously been excavated by Macalister in the 1920s and Kenyon in the 1960s. Mazar exposed small and broken sections of large, monumental walls, connected some of the walls to the stepped-stone structure, and announced that she had uncovered the palace of David, for which the stepped-stone structure served as a foundation and retaining wall overlooking the city's eastern slope. While the monumental size of the walls that Mazar uncovered is undeniable, the dates of the walls and their connection to a building plan are debatable. The prior excavations and the damage caused by later Hellenistic and Roman cisterns and baths in the area have left only fragmentary remains of uncertain date.

The hilltop fortified town at Khirbet Qeiyafa holds more promise of attesting to the kingdom of David. Excavated by Yosef Garfinkel and Saar Ganor, the town is fortified with two four chamber gates (hence, the excavators identify the site with biblical Sha'aryim, which means "two gates") and surrounded by a casemate wall. Unexpectedly, the houses, which utilize the casemates for their back rooms, are not constructed according to the plan of the four-room pillared house (or its variants) characteristic of houses in Israelite settlements. Nevertheless, because the excavators found neither Philistine pottery nor pig bones, they argue that the inhabitants were Israelites. In the center of the site stands a large rectangular public building, which the excavators suggest may be a palace. Two model shrines, one stone and one terra-cotta, were found in association with cultic rooms in houses near the southern gate. The shrines are aniconic but decorated with architectural features the excavators claim are illustrative of Solomon's Temple. An ostrakon inscribed in the so-called proto-Canaanite script may be the earliest Hebrew inscription yet discovered, though its language and interpretation are not certain. Based on radiometric dating of burned olive pits and the excavated pottery, the site flourished at the beginning of the tenth century BC, precisely the time when David would have been consolidating his kingdom.

The archaeological foundation for the United Monarchy generally has been the large, fortress-style, six-chamber city gates, and massive casemate walls at Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer (1 Kgs 9:15 claims that Solomon built up the walls of these cities). The gates and walls at Hazor and Gezer do appear to date to the tenth century, but the gate of Megiddo should now be dated to the ninth century (the first phase of Stratum IVA), and there is no evidence of a casemate wall surrounding the city. Instead, tenth-century Megiddo (Stratum VA-IVB) consists of two large monumental palaces—palace 6000 in the north and palace 1723 in the south. No wall surrounds Megiddo at this period, though the exterior walls of the houses and two palaces built along the edge of the mound provide some protection. The palaces have foundations made of ashlar (cut stones), as does the gate of Gezer. The gate and walls of Hazor are constructed of fieldstones. The Gezer gate is also associated with guard quarters (palace 10,000) and perhaps an outer gate and solid wall. Inside the gates of Hazor and Gezer only a few buildings can be dated to the tenth century, and none is monumental or impressive. Moreover, both Hazor and Gezer are small settlements, covering only part of the tell. Elsewhere, the gradual process of urbanization is detectable in the material culture, although no monumental architecture has been found.

The significance of these archaeological remains for understanding the political structures of the tenth century is fiercely debated. For those who follow the biblical tradition and argue for a large United Monarchy, these remains provide significant, yet limited, evidence of the veracity of the tradition. For others, the material culture of the tenth century attests to some centralized building activity, but not a state, let alone a “United Monarchy.” A key site in this debate would presumably be Jerusalem, where the Bible claims Solomon built a Temple, a palace, and many other administrative public buildings. Unfortunately, virtually nothing from the tenth century has been uncovered in the numerous excavations of the city. Two reasons are generally given to account for this lack of evidence. First, Jerusalem was continuously occupied until Nebuchadnezzar II destroyed it in 586 BC. Evidence of tenth-century Jerusalem was destroyed by later rebuilding and occupation of the city. Second, the remains of many of the Solomonic buildings would be beneath the present Temple Mount (Haram esh-Sharif), which is impossible to excavate due to the religious and political situation in the city.

The Kingdom of Israel

The short-lived kingdom of Israel (931–722/1 BC) is well attested in the archaeological record. Its capital Samaria was founded in the ninth century on top of several olive-oil installations. An independently fortified royal acropolis, consisting of a large platform supported by massive retaining walls, was built on the rounded summit of a hill. The platform contained a couple of palaces and a number of administrative buildings. Most of the construction utilized finely cut ashlar. In one of the palaces a large cache of carved ivories, many imported from Phoenicia, attests to the wealth of the kingdom—the cache is usually attributed to the reign of Ahab (873–852 BC), who the Bible claims built a house of ivory (1 Kgs 22:39). The Samaria Ostraca were found in one of the administrative buildings, and were inscribed during the reign of Jeroboam II (784–744 BC). The city was destroyed in a conflagration by Sargon II (721–705 BC), though the Assyrian assault might have begun during the reign of Shalmaneser V (726–722 BC).

Megiddo was one of the major administrative cities of the Kingdom of Israel. The Israelite city (limited to Stratum IVA) was surrounded by a large wall and entered through a six-chamber gate (later rebuilt as a four-chamber gate) on its north side. A palace (Building 380) was located on the eastern side of the city, but most of the city was dedicated to two large complexes of tripartite-pillared buildings. The southern complex consisted of five connected tripartite-pillared buildings fronted by a large walled yard. The northern complex consisted of three groups of five, two, and five connected buildings surrounding a walled yard. The interpretation of these buildings has been debated. Most commonly they are interpreted as stables for the royal chariot force. Other interpretations argue that the buildings were used for storerooms in a state-run redistribution center, or functioned as markets and fair grounds. The large water tunnel on the western side of the city, which leads to the spring outside the city wall, was constructed during this period. Tiglath-pileser III destroyed Megiddo in 732 BC and rebuilt the city (Stratum III) as an Assyrian provincial capital. The city was filled with residential buildings in an orthogonal pattern, with several Assyrian-style palaces built near the gate.

Unlike Megiddo, Hazor and Dan in the northern Jordan Valley give evidence of several strata of occupation during this period, attesting to Israel's conflicts with Damascus and Assyria. Israelite Hazor covers the entire acropolis (the lower city was not inhabited after the Late Bronze Age). The tenth-century casemate wall is filled in to form a solid fortification wall, and another solid wall is constructed to surround the new eastern half of the city. Inside the six-chamber gate, now in the middle of the city, a single tripartite-pillared building was uncovered. Two large halls attached to the building could have functioned as a granary or storerooms to support the function of the pillared building (as a stable or market). A large citadel was built on the western end of the acropolis. Administrative buildings resembling those of Samaria were found immediately to the north and south of the citadel. The massive walls of the citadel (more than six feet thick) initially served as the western fortification of the city, but at the height of the Assyrian threat at the end of the Israelite period, a new wall was added to the north, west, and south of the citadel, covering over the administrative buildings. New administrative buildings were constructed on the east side of the citadel. On the southern side of the city an enormous shaft and tunnel were dug into the aquifer beneath the city in order to supply the populace with water during a siege.

Dan was Israel's northernmost city, and thus often at the center of conflict with Israel's northern neighbors. The complex set of gates with multiple building phases on the southern side of the city attests to this conflict. On the north side of the tell, the excavator uncovered a large series of structures that he identified with the high place initially built by Jeroboam I (931–911 BC; see 1 Kgs 12:26–31). In the earliest stratum, the structure consisted of a large podium constructed of ashlar. Avraham Biran, the excavator, assumed that the podium served as an open-air high place, but traces of foundations on the podium have led others to suggest that it supported a large superstructure, probably a temple. In front of the podium on the south is a large altar platform built of ashlar, with storage rooms on the west and an oil press farther south. A second phase of the temple is not well preserved. The third phase of the temple complex, dating to the eighth century, is the most developed. The podium now supported a temple. A monumental staircase made of ashlar was added to the south side of the podium. A large four-horned altar that was approached by steps and surrounded by an enclosure was constructed in front of the podium. A row of rooms on the west side of the temple and altar functioned in support of the temple cult. Tiglath-pileser III, presumably, destroyed the temple at the end of the eighth century with the rest of the city.

The Kingdom of Judah

Judah was Israel's poorer and weaker sibling, and the material culture of Judah generally reflects this distinction. Although there were periods of friendly relations between the two kingdoms—with Judah often submitting to a more powerful Israel such as during the Omride Dynasty, and perhaps also during parts of the Jehu Dynasty—the Bible also attests to strained relations and military conflicts. The material evidence of these relations can be seen in the early fortification of some of the towns of Judah. One such site was Tell en-Nasbeh, which has been identified with biblical Mizpah and is situated at the border between Israel and Judah. At this site a massive solid inset-offset wall was built outside an earlier (tenth century) casemate wall. The wall was roughly nineteen hundred feet in length, stood forty feet above bedrock, and had an average thickness of more than twelve feet. Eleven towers fortified the wall. The wall was made from uncut fieldstones, but ashlar were used in corners and on the faces of the towers. A stone glacis further protected several towers and long sections of the wall. The city was entered through a two-chamber outer gate and a four-chamber inner gate. It appears that the inner gate was the original gate, but in the ninth century the fortifications were strengthened with the construction of a new outer gate fortified by a massive tower. The heavy fortifications at this site attest to political tensions and perhaps military conflict between Israel and Judah.

Although the kingdom of Judah developed under relatively peaceful conditions—despite the construction of some new fortifications as few destruction levels are attested—the Assyrian threat in the eighth century led to the fortification of Judah. Unlike Israel, which had several large urban centers, however, the kingdom of Judah developed primarily around Jerusalem. By the end of the eighth century, Jerusalem had swelled to a large fortified city of 150 acres, larger than any city in Israel. Lachish, the second largest city in Judah, covered an area of only twenty acres. The other Judean towns averaged only five to eight acres in size. The generally peaceful conditions of Judah also enabled it to rapidly increase in population. In addition to natural population growth, the population of Judah increased due to the migration of refugees from the north, especially during the second half of the eighth century, which culminated in Israel's destruction by the Assyrians. The population increase was felt prominently in Jerusalem but also across the Judean hill country. Numerous small settlements were established during this period, many of which were unfortified and roughly two miles apart.

At the end of the eighth century, archaeology is able to provide a material context for one of the more crucial events recorded in the biblical texts: the archaeological evidence provides a picture of Hezekiah's revolt against Assyria (1 Kgs 18–19). Hezekiah fortified an enlarged Jerusalem with a massive, seven-meter thick city wall (the so-called broad wall uncovered in the Jewish Quarter). Recent excavations in the Kidron Valley have uncovered a second, outer wall around the eastern side of the city. This wall might also have been constructed by Hezekiah. In order to secure drinking water for the inhabitants of the city in case of siege, he diverted the water from the Gihon spring to a pool inside the city wall through the excavation of the Siloam tunnel. Further evidence of Hezekiah's preparation against an Assyrian assault is attested in the distribution of royal storage jars that are impressed with the inscription lamelech ("belonging to the king"). The impressions are applied to the loop handles of large ovoid jars that are sixty centimeters high, have four handles, a narrow mouth, and a short upright neck. The jars were apparently used to store liquids rather than dry goods. The seal impressions have either a winged solar disk or a four-winged scarab. The word lamelech is inscribed above the design. Below the design one of four towns is named: Hebron, Socoh, Ziph, and mmsht (the last name is unknown). These jars and seals have been securely dated to the end of the eighth century. They have been found throughout Judah, but mostly at Jerusalem and Lachish. Some scholars have argued that the jars were used to gather taxes in the form of agricultural produce such as wine and oil. Others argue that the jars represent four centers of royal wine production. Another interpretation is that the four cities inscribed on the seals represent four military divisions and that the jars conveyed provisions to military units posted by Hezekiah throughout his kingdom. In any case, the jars attest to the king's provisioning of his cities in preparation for his revolt.

Although Jerusalem was never sacked, Hezekiah's rebellion was a complete failure. Most of the cities of Judah were destroyed (Sennacherib claims to have conquered forty-six cities), and part of Judah was placed under the domain of the Philistine king of Ekron. Hezekiah himself was forced to pay a large tribute to Sennacherib. The consequences of Hezekiah's revolt are illustrated in the Lachish reliefs found in Sennacherib's palace at Nineveh and in the excavations at Lachish. The Lachish reliefs depict in graphic detail the Assyrian assault, defeat, and plunder of Lachish. The excavations of Lachish revealed the violent destruction of Stratum III. At the southern corner of the city, the Assyrians built a massive siege ramp. Inside the city wall, the inhabitants of the city built a counterramp over their own houses in order to hold the Assyrians back. The hundreds of arrowheads and spherical slingstones attest to the intensity of the battle. The discovery of a mass grave with more than fifteen hundred bodies is grim evidence of the slaughter of the people of Lachish.

The southern border of Judah was along the Beersheba Valley and was fortified by Arad on the east and Beersheba on the west. Beersheba was a small, fortified town from the tenth century through the eighth century (Strata V-II). It provides the best example of a complete and regular city plan from the Iron II period. Although the city occupied an area of only three acres, it probably served as the major administrative center in the south. The city was fortified by a casemate wall, and entered through a four-chamber gate. Surrounding the city a stone glacis was constructed against the rampart supporting the wall. Inside the city gate was a large open square that probably served a variety of public functions. The street plan of the city was composed of concentric ovals connected by radial lanes, with the entire system converging on the plaza inside the gate. A water system was uncovered in the northeastern corner of the city. The city contained approximately seventy-five houses, most of which were designed according to a special four-room type. The back rooms of those houses that abutted the city wall along the peripheral road were incorporated into the casemates of the wall. Some of the houses have stairs preserved indicating that they had a second story. Three tripartite-pillared buildings were built east of the city gate and open onto the plaza. Together they cover an area of six hundred square meters. A large building located near the city plaza at the juncture of the outer road and a radial road has been called the "governor's house." It contained three large reception halls whose entrances were built of ashlar. Beersheba was destroyed at the end of the eighth century, presumably by the Assyrians in response to Hezekiah's revolt.

The fortress of Arad was built on top of a small settlement in the ninth century (though the excavator initially dated the first fortress to the tenth century). The fortress was destroyed and rebuilt five times before finally being destroyed early in the sixth century with the destruction of the Kingdom of Judah by the Babylonians. A number of letters inscribed on pottery sherds found in the fort suggest that the fort functioned primarily as a Judean bastion against the encroachment of the Edomites. The pressure of the Edomites on Judah's southern border is attested at numerous other sites in this region. At 'Ein Hatzeva in the Arabah (southeast of Arad), the large eighth-century Judean fortress is replaced by a smaller Edomite fortress in the seventh century. At Horvat Qitmit in the Arad Valley (southwest of Arad), a small Edomite shrine-complex was built late in the seventh century. The fortress of Horvat 'Uza on the eastern end of the Arad Valley (southeast of Arad) was destroyed by the Edomites (as suggested by an Edomite letter found in a gate chamber) at the beginning of the sixth century. Both Aroer and Tel Malhata in the Negev (between Arad and Beersheba) present evidence of Edomite occupation by the beginning of the sixth century.

Jerusalem was destroyed in 586 BC by the Babylonian army in order to crush the rebellion by Zedekiah, Judah's last king. The archaeological remains of the City of David primarily attest to this period. Heavy ash layers in several buildings give evidence of the destruction, and numerous Babylonian iron arrowheads hint at the presumable human slaughter. One of the buildings on the eastern slope of the City of David that was destroyed in the conflagration appears to have been an archive. Dubbed the "House of the Bullae," this building contained fifty-one clay bullae that had sealed papyrus or parchment scrolls. Many of the names inscribed on the bullae are mentioned in the Bible, especially in the book of Jeremiah. The most notable bulla, found elsewhere in the city, records the name of "Baruch, son of Neriah, the scribe"—the companion of Jeremiah.

The Persian Period

It is ironic that although most of the biblical books were written or compiled during the Persian period, few books actually attest to the period. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah provide the main narrative source for this period. The numerous prophetic books that attest to this period include Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, and Isaiah 56–66, but unfortunately, these books attest to little more than the social and religious situation of the period. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah are particularly valuable for understanding this period because they seem to preserve primary sources. Each book preserves a firsthand report that has been labeled a memoir. The Nehemiah memoir is found in Nehemiah 1:1–7:72; 12:31–43; 13:4–31; the Ezra memoir is found in Ezra 7:27–9:15. The book of Ezra also contains several letters from correspondence with the Persian administration. These letters also might be based on primary texts. Because many scholars have argued that Ezra is a fiction, an ideal lawgiver, his memoirs are not usually given the same status as the Nehemiah memoirs. Although Ezra has been idealized in later tradition, the presentation of him in the book of Ezra has a realistic basis and probable historical source. In any case, in their present context the memoirs and letters have been shaped by the ideological concerns of the biblical writer.

Other sources for the Persian period include the Jewish Antiquities of Josephus (first-century Jewish historian). Although Josephus largely follows the biblical text, he adds information concerning the relationship between the Judeans and the Samaritans. Many Greek sources contribute to writing the history of Persia, most notably, the History of Herodotus and the works of Diodorus Siculus, but these texts give little attention to the events of Judah. The archaeological evidence for this period has not been investigated well. In terms of material culture, the spread of Phoenician and Greek influence along the coastal plain can be detected. The hill country demonstrates cultural continuities with the Iron Age. Destruction layers at numerous cities attest to military conflicts, but the dating of these destruction layers to specific events is problematic. Inscriptions on coins and papyri, such as the Elephantine Papyri, provide evidence of the administration of the province of Judea, but they attest to little more than names of governors and high priests.

The biblical evidence refers to only two periods during the long Persian rule of Judah, and in both cases its presentation of the events is less than clear. The first period focuses on the rebuilding of the Temple by the exiles who returned to Judah from Babylon. Once Cyrus defeated Babylon (539 BC), he sought to consolidate the empire under his rule by restoring the gods and the peoples that the Babylonians had exiled. Thus Cyrus issued an edict for the Judeans to return to their homeland and rebuild the Temple of the LORD (Ezr 6:3–5; compare this text to an edict that has survived in the so-called Cyrus Cylinder). The book of Ezra gives a conflated presentation of who initially returned to Babylon. Sheshbazzar, who is called a prince over Judah, is credited with leading the initial return, bringing the Temple vessels from Babylon (Ezr 1:8–11), and laying the Temple foundation (Ezr

5:16). Yet Zerubbabel is also listed as the leader of the people, under whose direction the foundation of the Temple was laid in the second year of the return (537 BC; Ezr 3:8–13). After a delay of several years, the rebuilding of the Temple resumed under Zerubbabel in the second year of Darius (520 BC). The Temple was completed in Darius's sixth year (515 BC).

Little is known about Sheshbazzar; no genealogy is given about him. He is often identified with Shenazzar, a son of Jehoiachin (1 Chr 3:18), but this identification has little support. As a "prince" over Judah he could have been a member of the royal family, as Zerubbabel probably was, but he could simply be a leader of the people. He is called a "governor" just as Zerubbabel is later called. What happened to Sheshbazzar is also unknown. He probably did begin to rebuild the Temple, laying only the foundation. His leadership might have come to an end with his failure to rebuild the Temple, or in the wake of the turmoil associated with Darius's usurpation of the Persian throne. Zerubbabel is the grandson of Jehoiachin, Judah's last king, though some scholars suggest that this is a fiction of the biblical writer. Like Sheshbazzar, he was appointed governor of Judah. When he was appointed governor is never stated in the text, although Haggai first mentions him in reference to Darius's second year (520 BC). Although he was the civil administrator of Judah, only his work in rebuilding the Temple is recorded. Once the Temple is rebuilt, no more is heard about him.

The second period that the biblical evidence addresses is the period of Ezra and Nehemiah. The relationship of these two reformers poses a significant historical problem. The stories of Ezra and Nehemiah have been artificially joined. Part of the story of Ezra has been inserted into the middle of Nehemiah's story (Neh 8–9). The biblical text places Ezra first, followed by Nehemiah, but this relationship could be artificial. The text claims that Ezra's mission began in the seventh year of Artaxerxes, whereas Nehemiah's mission began in Artaxerxes's twentieth year, but several kings by this name ruled Persia. The date of Nehemiah's mission is fairly certain. He became governor over Judah in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I (465–424 BC), thus in 445 BC. This date is independently confirmed by a letter from the Judean community in Elephantine, Egypt, dated November 25, 407 BC, at which time a certain Bagoas was governor over Judah, referring to Delaiah and Shelemiah, the sons of Sanballat, a contemporary of Nehemiah. Nehemiah's term of office lasted until 433 BC, at which time he was recalled to the Persian court. He was appointed for a second term some time before 424 BC, the end of Artaxerxes's reign, and served as governor until some time before 411 BC, at which time Bagoas is governor.

If Ezra's mission is to be dated to the seventh year of Artaxerxes I, then his mission began in 458 BC. This relationship, however, poses several problems. The high priest Jehohanan, the grandson of Eliashib who was a contemporary of Nehemiah, is mentioned in relation to Ezra, but the Elephantine texts place him in Judah around 407 BC. The names of the high priests in the preserved lists have been corrupted because of repetition (several men named Jehohanan son of Eliashib served as high priest), thus this evidence is not conclusive. If Ezra preceded Nehemiah, then his reform does not appear to have been successful, for when Nehemiah comes on to the scene the problems addressed by Ezra continue to exist. Moreover, Nehemiah never mentions Ezra and blames his predecessors for the corrupt situation in Judah (in Neh 8:9 the two are mentioned together, but this is clearly the result of editorial activity). Scholars have also noted that during Ezra's time Jerusalem is occupied and surrounded by a wall (Ezr 9:9), but in Nehemiah's time Jerusalem is unoccupied and its wall has been torn down. From Nehemiah's perspective, Jerusalem could have recently been destroyed during the revolt of Megabyzus, the satrap of Abar-nahara (of which Judah was a part) in 449/8 BC, but no evidence clearly attests to this. As a result of these problems, many scholars prefer to date Ezra to the reign of Artaxerxes II (404–358 BC). Ezra's mission would then have begun in 398/7 BC, after Nehemiah. However, the biblical order of placing Ezra's mission during the reign of Artaxerxes I cannot be ruled out.

BIBLICAL HISTORY AND ARCHAEOLOGY: NEW TESTAMENT

LAURIE BRINK, O.P.

THE BIBLE AS A HISTORICAL SOURCE

The intertestamental period (the time between the writing of the Hebrew Scriptures and the New Testament) saw significant political and social change in the Mediterranean world, which would have long-lasting effects on emerging Christianity. This article surveys the spread of Hellenism in the third century BC, the rise of Roman domination, and the impact of foreign rule on the lands and peoples of the New Testament world. While historical evidence is drawn chiefly from written sources, this article will emphasize the contributions of archaeology to our understanding of the milieu from which the New Testament texts emerged.

Engaging archaeology in the study of early Christianity is no easy task, due to the paucity of explicitly identifiable Christian remains in the first two hundred years of the common era, and the nature of the hermeneutical (interpretive) process of archaeology itself. Though the “Good News” of Paul and the apostolic teams took root in a very concrete world, only a few explicitly “Christian” artifacts predate the fourth century. In his book, The Rise of Christianity, sociologist Rodney Stark proposes that Christians numbered only 7,500 at the close of the first century. These earliest followers anticipated Jesus’s imminent return: “For you . . . know that the day of the Lord will come like a thief at night” (1 Thes 5:2). With a high level of eschatological anticipation, these believers were not inclined to build edifices. In fact, there was no need, for as Paul writes, “you are the temple of God, and . . . the Spirit of God dwells in you.” (1 Cor 3:16–17). The earliest Christians chose to “enshrine” their religion not in temples but in texts. This was “the self-conscious hermeneutical program of the earliest Christians, who did not, remarkably, root their religious lives in a tomb cult or fixed shrine to dedicated objects, but instead in telling and retelling a spoken message Paul called to euangelion, ‘the good news’ ” (Margaret M. Mitchell, “Does the ‘James Ossuary’ bring us closer to Jesus?” (<http://divinity.uchicago.edu/sightings/does-james-ossuary-bring-us-closer-jesus-margaret-m-mitchell>)).

If one is to retrieve the earliest stratum of emergent Christianity, one must begin with our New Testament texts. However, if one hopes to glimpse the context out of which those texts were written, the findings of archaeology provide a multidimensional, albeit “mute,” access to the ancient world. This brief recounting of the significant political and social history, drawn from written sources and illustrated by archaeology, form the backdrop of the Jesus movement and the creation of early Christian texts, some of which would later comprise the canon of the New Testament. The story begins with the ambition of Alexander, traces the rise of Roman hegemony and its influence on Palestinian politics, and concludes with the societal impact of the Roman Empire on the economy, and civic and domestic affairs.

The Legacy of Alexander the Great

Alexander the Great’s ambitious campaign against the Persians extended his empire from Greece in the west to the Indus River in the east. After his defeat of the Persian king Darius II (331 BC), Alexander laid claim to the title of “Great King,” having successfully taken Phoenicia, Palestine, Egypt, and the region of Mesopotamia. His untimely death in Babylon put an end to his reign but not the ideals by which he had conquered and controlled the captured lands. He allowed local government to continue and encouraged native worship, while promoting Greek culture. As his army marched eastward, Alexander set up “Greek” cities from which Hellenism—the proliferation of the Greek culture, language, politics, philosophy, religion, and art—would spread. He encouraged his men to take local wives and had Greek temples built for local worshipping of Greek and local gods. Over time, the indigenous deities took on the dress and manner of Greek gods and goddesses. So Isis of Egypt, once depicted in a long Egyptian dress and crowned with the hieroglyph that symbolized the throne, came to resemble Demeter, the Greek goddess of the harvest, but now dressed in proper Hellenistic attire. The more formal Attic Greek mixed with the local tongue to create koine, or common Greek, the language that would become that of the New Testament texts. A common language across such a vast area encouraged trade, which was supported by the use of a single monetary unit, the silver drachma. The conquest of Alexander furthered the establishment of urban centers and Greek colonies. The polis or city became the basis for society, with its concomitant educational (gymnasium) and political (bouleuterion) structures. Greek literacy, philosophy, and ideas traveled freely throughout Alexander's vast empire, but not all aspects of Hellenism were met with equal enthusiasm by local populations.

After Alexander's death in 323 BC, the empire was divided among his top generals. Of particular importance is Ptolemy I Soter, who held Egypt (323–283 BC), and Seleucus I Nicator, who ruled the entire eastern part of Alexander's empire (301–281 BC). The Ptolemies (each successful Egyptian king took the name of the founder) focused their energies on promoting the political, economic, and cultural development of their cities; chief among them being Alexandria. The library and museum at Alexandria served as a repository of the world's knowledge until it was burned during the siege of Julius Caesar in 48 BC. According to the pseudepigraphic Letter of Aristeas (the word "pseudepigrapha" means literally "false attribution" and refers to texts "falsely" attributed to an author, normally a noted figure from the past; pseudepigrapha also refers to a collection of Jewish and Jewish-Christian works written between 200 BC and AD 200), the chief librarian, Demetrios of Phaleron, engaged seventy (or seventy-two) Hebrew scribes to translate the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, so that the volume could be added to the library's holdings. This Greek translation became known as the Septuagint (or LXX, which means "seventy"). Although there were other Greek translations in circulation, the Septuagint became the translation of the Old Testament used by the earliest Christians, and the great majority of its canon (organization and number of books) is used by Catholics today. It includes the books that originally had been written in Hebrew, and the newer ones (e.g., Wisdom of Solomon, Tobit, Judith) composed in Greek. Thus, when the Apostle Paul cites an Old Testament passage, he is likely referencing the Greek translation, not the original Hebrew.

At various times the Ptolemies held Palestine, Cyprus, and some parts of Asia Minor, but it was the Seleucid kingdom that actively sought to extend its land and holdings, establishing new cities and rebuilding old ones. Its chief city became Antioch on the Orontes River, in present-day southeast Turkey. Unlike Alexandria, which served as a great center of Hellenistic culture and learning, Antioch became a prosperous center of trade. According to the author of Luke-Acts, Antioch is where the followers of Jesus were first called, “Christians” (Acts 11:26). Many of the cities of the Decapolis (in Greek, “ten cities”; Pliny the Elder lists the cities of the Decapolis as Gerasa, Scythopolis, Hippos, Gadara, Pella, Philadelphia, Capitolias, Canatha, Raphana, and Damascus (N.H. 5.16.74), but the cities varied over time) were founded under Seleucid rule and served as oases of Gentile rule and Greek culture in the area in and surrounding Palestine. According to the Gospels, Jesus traveled in the area of the Decapolis (Mk 5:20; 7:21), and people from that area joined the great crowds following him (Mt 4:25).

The books of 1 and 2 Maccabees recount the resistance by religious Jews to Seleucid rule and its legislation of hellenization in the second century BC. The chief antagonist was Antiochus IV Epiphanes (215 BC–164 BC) whom 1 Maccabees identifies as the “sinful offshoot” (1 Mc 1:10), who looted the Temple in Jerusalem (1 Mc 1:20–24), and forbade Jewish worship, circumcision, and kosher practices (1 Mc 1:41–50; 2 Mc 6:1–11). The abhorrent policies of the Seleucids spurred Judas Maccabeus to seek an alliance with Rome (1 Mc 8), an invitation and relationship that would eventually lead to Judea’s subjection under Rome.

The forced hellenization policy of Antiochus IV is also the historical backdrop of the book of Daniel, even though ancient Babylon is depicted in that narrative. Using apocalyptic imagery, Daniel’s visions in chapters 7–12 anticipate the raising of the dead to judgment, the triumph of the Kingdom of God, and the coming of the “one like a son of man” (Dn 7:13). The technical name for this kind of literature is apocalyptic eschatology, from two Greek words, apokalypsis, meaning “revelation” or “removing the veil,” and eschata, meaning “the last (or final) things.” It thus depicts the writer’s “unveiling” of the reality behind historical events leading up to the end of an era. This kind of writing emerged out of the suffering of the religious Jews under the Seleucid kings. Eschatology holds that God in some future time will intervene to judge the world and thus set in motion a new reality. Apocalypticism is a form of eschatology that sees a catastrophic end to history in a cosmic battle between good and evil. In apocalyptic eschatological understanding, the son of man would usher in the cosmic beginning of the reign of God, but would then depart. After a period of time, the Messiah would then come, and the New Age would be complete. In the new age, suffering would be no more and the faithfully deceased would experience a bodily resurrection (2 Mc 7:14). Some of these concepts are developed further in the New Testament texts (see Mk 13; Mt 25:31–46; Jn 5:28–29).

During the years from 167 to 163 BC, religious Jews in Judea repeatedly attempted to end or at least minimize the influence of Greek culture and religion, and succeeded in stemming the tide of Hellenism under the leadership of the Hasmonean family. Judas Maccabeus waged a successful guerrilla campaign, securing religious freedom for the Jews in 162 BC. Three years after Antiochus IV had profaned the Temple, a new altar was built, and the Temple rededicated. In commemoration of the event, the Feast of Lights (Jn 10:22) or Hanukkah (which means “Dedication”) was initiated into the Jewish calendar (1 Mc 4:59). Judas’s brothers, Jonathan (160–143 BC) and Simon (143–135 BC) established the Hasmonean dynasty by variously cooperating with and repulsing the Syrian Seleucids. Members of the Hasmonean family subsequently ruled as commander, ethnarch (ruler of the people), and high priest until 63 BC. The expansionist policies of Simon’s son, John Hyrcanus (134–104 BC), led to an increase in territory and the forced conversion of Judea’s neighbors—the Idumeans (Edomites) in the south. He destroyed the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim (128 BC) and took the city of Samaria (109 BC). Aristobulus I (104–103 BC) continued his father’s, John Hyrcanus, policies and established Jewish colonies in Galilee, a region known for its Gentile population. Alexander Janneus (103–76 BC), Aristobulus’s successor and brother, extended the kingdom’s boundaries to the greatest extent since Solomon’s reign. He annexed Iturea in the north, Gadara to the east, and Gaza to the southwest. The religious zeal of his forefathers is little evident in Alexander Janneus. A brief rebellion by the people was unsuccessful, and Alexander had eight hundred of his opponents crucified while, at their feet, their wives and children were slaughtered. At the close of the Hasmonean dynasty, Hyrcanus II served as high priest and ethnarch, but the power behind the throne was his advisor, the Idumean governor Antipater, whose son would later rule as Herod the Great.

Ironically, the dynasty that began as a guerrilla campaign to preserve religious Judaism against hellenizing forces became the target of later religious reformers. The first-century Jewish historian Josephus described a group of “Essenes” as a religious community of ascetics who shunned wealth, were pious in their devotion to religious observances, and many of whom lived celibately (Josephus, J.W. 8.2–6). The Essenes may have been the authors of a series of scrolls first discovered in 1947 in caves near the ruins of Qumran on the Dead Sea. In addition to the earliest manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible, the cache of scrolls included apocryphal and pseudepigraphical works, and sectarian documents. These sectarian materials portray a group of religious zealots who saw themselves as “the Sons of Light” preparing for a holy war against “the Sons of Darkness.” Likely originating from the Hasidim, traditionalist Jews who supported the original Maccabean uprising (1 Mc 2:42–43), the Dead Sea scroll community saw the “Teacher of Righteousness” as its spiritual founder. The community opposed the Hasmonean high priests, believing that only the sons of Zadok were the rightful high priests. The Dead Sea scrolls provide invaluable insight into the practices of Judaism in Palestine between the second century BC and AD 68 (when the Roman army destroyed Qumran). The messianism and eschatology found in the documents contribute to the study of these themes in the New Testament.

A “Friendly Alliance” with Rome

Judas Maccabeus, in his attempt to rid Judea of Seleucid rule, sought an alliance with the new rising power in the Mediterranean world. Republican Rome had the reputation of aiding its allies (1 Mc 8:12–13) and crushing its enemies (1 Mc 8:2–11). In 63 BC, that alliance took a decidedly different turn. After having subdued the last of the Seleucid rulers and claiming Syria as a Roman province, Pompey (106–48 BC) marched on Jerusalem. Pompey sided with Hyrcanus II in his civil war against his brother Aristobulus II, restored the high priesthood to Hyrcanus, and subjected Judea to the oversight of the governor of Syria. The Hasmonean political leadership was effectively ended, and Roman rule had begun. Many of the Jews whom Pompey had enslaved and taken to Rome would later be emancipated, adding to the Jewish community there.

Herodian Dynasty

Thanks to the shrewd diplomacy of the Idumean Antipater, the Jews enjoyed special Roman privileges. Antipater aided Caesar when he attempted to enter the port of Alexandria after Pompey’s assassination in 48

BC. In gratitude, Caesar provided a series of significant favors to the Jews, including a reduction in tribute and exemption from military service. He made Antipater chief administrator over Judea with the right to collect taxes. Antipater subsequently named his sons Phasael and Herod as governors over Jerusalem and Galilee, respectively. After Antipater's death by poisoning in 43 BC, Mark Antony appointed Antipater's sons as joint tetrarchs, a term denoting a ruler of part of a province. When Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus II, gained power in Judea and Phasael was killed, Herod fled to Rome, where the senate declared him "King of the Jews." The skillful politics of Antipater had paved the way for his son Herod's attainment of the throne, ushering in the last dynasty to rule Judea.

After three years of fighting and with the aid of Roman legions, Herod wrested control of Judea from Antigonus and the last of the Hasmonean supporters. He ruled as a client king of Rome from 37 BC until his death in 4 BC. From the Roman perspective, Herod was an able ruler and administrator. He had originally supported Mark Antony in his battle against Octavius, but when the former lost at Actium in 31 BC, Herod submitted himself to Octavius who later became Caesar Augustus. To cement the alliance, Augustus gave Herod additional territory including Gadara, Hippos, Samaria, Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and Straton's Tower (Josephus, J.W. 15.217). In response to Augustus's generosity and clemency, Herod built on the ruins of Straton's Tower a "modern" Roman city in honor of his patron. Begun in 21 BC and dedicated in 9 BC, Caesarea Maritima (Caesarea by the Sea) and its harbor, Sebastos (Greek for Augustus), were engineering marvels. With the use of Roman pozzolona, a type of cement that hardened underwater, Herod's builders constructed an artificial harbor on the coast of Israel. Lined with warehouses along its wharfs, the harbor provided revenue for Herod's extensive building there and elsewhere in his kingdom. Underwater archaeological work corroborates Josephus's account of the massive triple harbor (Josephus, J. W. 1.411–13).

With temples, baths, a theater, an amphitheater for gladiatorial games, and a hippodrome, Caesarea was a suitable Roman city on the eastern end of the empire. While the Temple to Roma (the city of Rome personified as a goddess) and Augustus evidenced Caesarea's strong pagan history, it nonetheless became a significant site for early Christianity. Peter baptized the Roman centurion Cornelius in Caesarea (Acts 10). Philip the evangelist had a home in Caesarea where he lived with his four daughters who were “gifted with prophecy” (Acts 21:8–9). Paul landed in Caesarea on his way to Jerusalem (Acts 21:8), and was imprisoned there for two years before he was sent to Rome (Acts 23:12–26:32).

Between 23 or 20 BC and 15 BC, Herod the Great initiated a massive campaign to rebuild and expand the Temple (the central religious and national monument of the Jews) and its precincts in Jerusalem. Josephus reported that the construction was carried out by priests and took ten years. This may refer only to the area of the sanctuary, since the Gospel of John records that the process took forty-six years (Jn 2:20). Herod’s engineers extended the Temple platform to twice its original size and surrounded it with a temenos wall (the Greek word, temenos, refers to a sacred precinct). Although only parts of the temenos wall remain, the dressed masonry (embossed stone and pilasters) and massive stones (one of these stone blocks is more than forty feet long and weighs four hundred tons) hint at the workmanship and scale of the project. Today, the western section of the retaining wall remains a place of prayer for Jewish men and women. Known as the Western Wall (or Kotel ha-Ma’aravi in Hebrew), this area is the closest spot to the Temple sanctuary outside the Temple Mount.

Encompassing an area of 450,000 square feet, the Temple area in Jerusalem became one of the largest sacred precincts in the ancient world. Within the temenos, the most grandiose area, the Court of the Gentiles, was open to all. Lining this court were various colonnades and porticos, one of which was called Solomon’s Portico (Jn 10:23). The double colonnades along the sides of the Temple platform provided shelter for the pilgrims, particularly during festivals. The colonnade on the southern side was called the Royal Stoa, a vast basilica-like area where rabbis taught and merchants sold the necessary animals for sacrifice. Money changers also likely gathered in this area.

On the southern end of the Temple temenos, pilgrims entered through the double gates known as the Hulda Gates and walked up two large stairways, emerging inside the Royal Stoa. Excavations uncovered the doorpost and lintel of part of the Hulda Gates (the rest is obscured by a Crusader tower). Prior to entering the Temple precincts, pilgrims purified themselves in the Jewish ritual baths (in Hebrew, mikva’ot) located in bathhouses east of the stairs leading to the gates. The pools of Siloam may have served a similar purpose (Jn 9:6–11). In 2004, Israeli archaeologists uncovered a section of the lower pool of Siloam fed by the Gihon Spring.

The sacred center of the Temple was reserved for the Israelites alone. It consisted of a series of courts, each with increasing restrictions. The Court of the Women was followed by the Court of the Israel (men only), and finally, the Court of Priests where stood the sanctuary. The altar for burnt offerings and the slaughtering place were located there. The sacred precincts were encircled by a stone lattice or balustrade (soreg) with signs that warned Gentiles not to enter. In 1871 and 1935, two such Greek inscriptions were discovered, both of which read: “No Gentiles should go beyond this sign under penalty of death.” Today, one inscription is on display in the Istanbul Archaeological Museum; the other is in the Israel Museum in Jerusalem. In the Acts of the Apostles, Paul is accused of bringing a Gentile into the Temple, a charge that he refutes (Acts 21:28ff).

In addition to the Temple’s reconstruction, Herod’s massive building campaign included the desert fortresses of Masada on the Dead Sea, Herodion near Bethlehem, and Machaerus across the Jordan River. Fearing a revolt of his subjects or the machinations of Cleopatra, who desired Judea for herself, Herod had the flat-topped mountain of Masada outfitted with substantial resources to withstand a lengthy siege. With less than 100 millimeters (four inches) of rainfall a year and no nearby spring, engineers built into the mountain a series of cisterns, capable of holding ten million gallons of water. Extensive warehouses held food, while a bath complex and luxurious palaces assured the king would remain comfortable during the assault. Masada later became the location of the last stand of the Jewish zealots against the Romans in AD 74. Excavating the less extravagant fortress of the Herodion in 2007, Ehud Netzer uncovered a massive circular structure (tholos) and sarcophagus fragments, confirming that the Herodion had been Herod’s final resting place. According to Josephus, John the Baptist was beheaded by Herod the Great’s son, Antipas, at Machaerus (Josephus, Ant. 18.52.; also see Mk 6:17–29).

The Gospel of Matthew reports that Herod ordered the deaths of all male children under the age of two in Bethlehem and its environs in response to the visit of the Magi (Mt 2:16–18). Though this story is not attested in other sources, its heinous nature is consistent with other reported actions of Herod, who killed two of his own sons (by his wife Mariamne). Augustus is reported to have said, “I would rather be Herod’s pig (hus in Greek), than his son (huios)” (Macrobius, Saturnalia 2.4.11).

After Herod’s death in 4 BC, his kingdom was divided among three of his sons: Archelaus, Philip, and Herod Antipas. The oldest, Archelaus, became ethnarch of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea, but he proved to be an inept and despised leader. The Romans removed him less than a decade later, annexing the lands into the Syrian province and appointing a governor (originally “prefect” and later “procurator”). Caesarea Maritima became the headquarters of the governor who had auxiliary troops at his ready (Acts 10:1; 27:1). During pilgrim festivals in Jerusalem, the large crowds and the potential for violence required a greater imperial presence, so the governor relocated to the praetorium in Jerusalem during such periods.

Herod’s son Philip became tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis, northeast of the Sea of Galilee. The town of Bethsaida (meaning “house of fishing”), located near the Jordan River on the northern coast of the Sea of Galilee, marked the southern boundary of his area. Village life there centered on the fishing industry; a discovery of lead weights for nets, basalt line sinkers, stone anchors, and a fisher’s seal confirm the town’s name. Archaeologists discovered an ancient harbor at the base of the hill on which the village had been built. Over the centuries, alluvial deposits and tectonic shifts altered the course of the Jordan and the seacoast, and the site is now 1.25 miles from the lake. The apostles Peter, Andrew, and Philip are said to have originally lived in Bethsaida (Jn 1:44; 12:21) before relocating to Capernaum (Mk 1:29). In AD 30, Philip elevated the village to a polis and renamed it “Julias,” in honor of Augustus’s wife.

Philip also rebuilt Panias (a cult center for the worship of the Greek god Pan), and renamed it Caesarea Philippi (Caesarea of Philip) to distinguish it from Caesarea Maritima, the city that his father, Herod the Great, had built. Twenty-five miles north of the Sea of Galilee, Caesarea Philippi became the capital of his territory. Archaeological remains and coinage reveal a thoroughly Gentile city. Josephus reports that Philip ruled moderately (Josephus, Ant. 18.106). Jesus traveled to this area (Mk 6:45) after John the Baptist’s death at the hands of Philip’s less amicable brother, Herod Antipas (Mk 6:17–29). The area of Caesarea Philippi was the setting for a significant moment in the life of Jesus. The Gospel of Mark records that while traveling to the villages of Caesarea Philippi, Jesus asked his disciples “Who do people say that I am?” to which Peter answers “You are the Messiah” (Mk 8:27–29).

Herod the Great’s youngest son, Herod Antipas, ruled Galilee and Perea (on the eastern side of the Jordan River) for forty years. It was he who imprisoned and eventually beheaded John the Baptist for criticizing Antipas’s marriage to his niece, who was his half-brother’s wife (Mk 6:17–28). According to Josephus, John’s death resulted from Herod’s fear that John’s preaching might be perceived as seditious (A.J. 18.116–117). Herod Antipas is portrayed as a “fox” in the Gospel of Luke (13:32). Antipas desired to see Jesus perform miracles (Lk 23:8), but the Pharisees also reported that he wanted to kill Jesus (Lk 13:31). According to the Passion narrative in Luke, the Roman governor Pilate sent Jesus to Herod Antipas since Jesus was from his jurisdiction (Lk 23:6), and, like Pilate, Herod had found him not guilty of the charges (Lk 23:15). Despite the declaration of innocence, the Gospels report that Jesus was crucified and that Pilate and Herod were complicit in his death (Lk 23:11–12, 14–15). A passage from Josephus supports much of the Gospel portrait of Jesus’s death:

About this time there lived Jesus, a wise man, if indeed one ought to call him a man. For he was one who wrought surprising feats and was a teacher of such people as accept the truth gladly. He won over many Jews and many of the Greeks. He was the Messiah. When Pilate, upon hearing him accused by men of the highest standing amongst us, had condemned him to be crucified, those who had in the first place come to love him did not give up their affection for him. On the third day he appeared to them restored to life, for the prophets of God had prophesied these and countless other marvelous things about him. And the tribe of the Christians, so called after him, has still to this day not disappeared (Josephus, Ant. 18.63–64, LCL).

The authenticity of the so-called Testimonium Flavianum is questioned by some scholars, who see the visible hand of later Christian apologists in Josephus’s account. Filtering out spurious Christian interpolations, the Testimonium Flavianum demonstrates at the least that Josephus knew of Jesus as a wise man, crucified under Pontius Pilate, and that his followers were known as “the tribe of Christians.”

Herod Antipas enjoyed favor under Tiberius, but Roman politics were fickle. Likely due to the machinations of his nephew, Herod Agrippa I, Antipas was accused of conspiracy by the next emperor, Caligula, and exiled in AD 39 (Josephus, Ant. 18.240–252). Agrippa I was then given Herod’s title, lands, and fortune. During his reign (AD 41–44), Agrippa had James, the brother of John, killed, and Peter arrested (Acts 12:2–3).

According to Acts, Agrippa was struck down by an angel of the Lord and eaten by worms (Acts 12:23). Josephus describes the death in slightly different but no less dramatic fashion (Josephus, Ant. 19:345–350).

The last Herodian ruler was Agrippa II who, along with his sister Bernice, heard Paul's defense in Caesarea, according to the author of Acts (25:13–26:32). Having been raised in Rome, Agrippa's loyalties were clearly Roman. At the outbreak of the first Jewish Revolt (AD 66–73), Agrippa II sent archers and cavalry in support of the Roman general Vespasian. Agrippa was wounded at the battle of Gamla in the Golan Heights where he fought against the Jewish rebels with Vespasian's son Titus. The Herodian chapter of Judea's history closes with the annihilation of Jerusalem and the total destruction of its Temple in AD 70, confirming that the power behind the client kingdom had always been Rome.

Roman Emperors and the *Pax Romana

The events in the life of Jesus and the Apostles, and the subsequent emergence of Christianity, are set against the backdrop of Roman imperialism. The annexing of territory and the creation of new provinces began under the Roman Republic in the third century BC. Roman senators served as provincial governors and were given an imperium (right to command) for a period of one year. The term "empire" has its roots in the word, imperium, which later came to refer to the power held by the chief Roman leader, the "emperor." The Roman Republic effectively ended in 44 BC with Julius Caesar's appointment as perpetual dictator. Despite the hopes and efforts of pro-Republican forces, which conspired in the death of Julius Caesar later that same year, the Republic was not restored after Caesar's assassination. Rather, a second Triumvirate (leadership by three men) of Mark Antony, Octavius, and Lepidus seized power. Ten years later, after the defeat of Mark Antony, Octavius became the sole leader of Rome. In 27 BC, the Roman senate conferred upon him the title "augustus" and "princeps" (the first of the senate). The adopted son of Julius Caesar became Caesar Augustus. Even though the expansion of Roman power and influence across the Mediterranean was well underway prior to Augustus, his ascension marks a new moment in Roman history.

At its zenith, the Roman Empire encompassed the entire Mediterranean world, extending as far west as the isle of Britain, north to Germania, east to Arabia, and south to North Africa. After the Roman civil wars, Augustus established a period of peace, which became known as the Pax Romana, secured by his military forces. The network of imperial roads designed, surveyed, and built by the soldiers became the arteries of communication and trade for several centuries after their completion. The Pax Romana provided the fertile field in which the work of laborers like Paul and Peter could, for the most part, go unhindered.

Significant for the study of early Christianity is an inscription found in Priene, today's southwest Turkey. Dated to 9 BC, the Greek inscription describes Augustus as "savior," "god," and his birth as "the beginning of the good news (euaggelia)."

Scholars propose that the Christian appropriation of the term "gospel" (euaggelion) is meant to counter the imperial use. The Gospel of Mark 1:1 states that it is Jesus Christ, not Caesar, who is the Son of God, and who heralds the beginning of the "Good News."

The capabilities of Augustus's successors varied greatly. Tiberius (AD 14–37) reigned when Jesus began his public ministry (Lk 3:1), and it would be Tiberius's appointee, Pontius Pilate, who condemned Jesus to death by crucifixion (Mk 15:15). Pontius Pilate held rank of equestrian (lower than a senator) and served as prefect of Judea from AD 26 to AD 36. Ancient writers record that Pilate deliberately provoked the Jews (Philo, Embassy to Gaius 299–305; Josephus, J.W. 2.169–174; Lk 13:1) and crucified Jesus as an insurrectionist (Tacitus, Ann. 15.44) in AD 30. An inscription found in secondary use (as a step in the theater) in Caesarea Maritima shows that Pilate had a small imperial temple built to honor Tiberius. The reconstructed inscription reads "Pontius Pilate the prefect of Judea has dedicated to the people of Caesarea a temple in honor of Tiberius." This is the only epigraphical evidence of Pilate to have been discovered so far.

In an effort to gain favor with Tiberius, Herod Antipas constructed a new city in AD 20, named in Tiberius's honor. Built on the western coast of the Sea of Galilee, near a series of hot springs, Tiberias became the capital of Herod's tetrarchy. Since the presence of a cemetery made the area ritually unclean, many religious Jews refused to move there, forcing Herod to settle his capital with Gentiles from the area. The Gospel of John is the only canonical Gospel to refer to the Sea of Galilee as the Sea of Tiberias (Jn 6:1; 21:1).

Tiberius's successor, Gaius (AD 37–41), also known as Caligula, aggressively provoked the Jews by commanding that a statue of himself be placed in the Temple, and demanding to be addressed as a god (Josephus, Ant. 18.262–309). Gaius was assassinated by his bodyguards, and his uncle, Claudius (AD 41–54), became emperor. Suetonius reports that Claudius banished all the Jews from Rome because of intercommunity disturbances “at the instigation of one Chrestus” (Suetonius, Claudius 25.4). Suetonius confused the Greek “Christos” with the Latin “Chrestus,” a common slave name. The disturbances may have resulted from clashes between Jews and Jewish Christians. Paul’s Corinthian co-workers Aquila and Priscilla (Prisca in 1 Cor 16:19) had relocated from Rome because of Claudius’s edict (Acts 18:2). At Claudius’s death, the Jews who had left were able to return to Rome.

Although Augustus set in motion the Pax Romana, which unintentionally facilitated the spread of the Gospel, it was Nero (AD 54–68) who, as emperor, had a direct impact on early Christianity. His appointees, Antonius Felix (AD 52–58) and Porcius Festus (AD 59–62), served as procurators of Judea. Paul was held in captivity for two years in Caesarea, first under the jurisdiction of Felix (Acts 23:33–24:26), and then Festus, who eventually sent Paul’s case to Rome (Acts 24:27–26:32). The fourth-century Christian historian, Eusebius, reported that under his rule Peter and Paul were martyred (Hist. eccl. 2.25). The apostles were not the only victims of Nero’s reign. Not only is he believed to have had his stepbrother, the son of Claudius, poisoned, and his ex-wife murdered, Nero also accused various family members and officials of conspiracy. His licentiousness was widely known but little talked about until after his death (Tacitus, Ann. 15.37). After a conflagration destroyed much of Rome in AD 64, Nero commandeered prime property and began to build his domus aurea (golden palace). To quell rumors that the fire had been started at the behest of the emperor, Nero blamed the Christians and had them tortured and killed (Tacitus, Ann. 15.44). His suicide in AD 68 ended his reign of terror in Rome but left the leadership of the empire up for grabs.

In AD 69, a brief civil war led to three claimants (Galba, Otho, and Vitellius) who ruled in rapid succession until Titus Flavius Vespasianus (AD 69–79) secured the throne. Vespasian commanded the Roman forces during the First Jewish Revolt in Palestine (AD 66–73). Vespasian’s son, Titus, who was to rule after him (AD 79–81), oversaw the burning of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple in AD 70. The Arch of Titus in the Roman Forum depicts the Temple’s treasures, including the giant menorah that Titus’s soldiers carted off as the spoils of war. Josephus reported that the golden vessels and menorah were placed in Vespasian's Temple of Peace after the triumph that commemorated the subjection of Judea (Josephus, J.W. 7.150).

At the war's end, the Jews were forbidden to rebuild their Temple and were exiled from Jerusalem. The Babylonian Talmud reports that the Sanhedrin, the Jewish council responsible for overseeing aspects of religious law, relocated to Yavneh, south of present-day Jaffa on the coastal plain of Israel (Gittin 56a–b). According to Eusebius, the Jewish Christians fled to Pella, a city in the Decapolis (Hist. eccl. 3.5). After the First Jewish War and the destruction of Jerusalem, Jews throughout the empire were subjected to a special tax (fiscus Judaicus), the proceeds of which went to the support the temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus in Rome (Josephus, J.W. 7. 218; Dio Cassius 66.7.2). Unlike the Temple tax that was required of Jewish men, the fiscus Judaicus was levied also against women, children, and Jewish slaves. Under Domitian the tax was extended to those who observed Jewish customs, likely referring to Christians (Suetonius, Domitian 12). Nerva relaxed some of Domitian's draconian practices and limited the tax to Jews who openly practiced their faith.

After Titus's sudden and surprising death, his younger brother, Domitian (AD 81–96) came to power. Domitian promoted the Imperial Cult, which worshipped the emperor as a god, and he preferred to be addressed as dominus et deus (Lord and God). After his death, the Roman historians Suetonius and Tacitus recounted that Domitian was a paranoid tyrant who mercilessly oversaw a reign of terror against the senate and any who opposed him. During his fifteen-year reign, however, Domitian improved the Roman economy, initiated massive building campaigns, and extended the empire's borders. Seeing himself as the “new Augustus,” Domitian promoted Roman virtues and piety, upholding ancient customs and Roman religion. Murdered in his bedroom (AD 96) by his attendant, the plot was likely planned by the supporters of Nerva (AD 96–98), who was swiftly proclaimed emperor by the senate.

Nerva's adopted son, Trajan (AD 98–117), ushered in a new era in Roman politics. Vespasian upset the old Roman aristocracy because he hadn't descended from an ancient senatorial family, but at least he hailed from Italy. Trajan's home was Italica, a Roman colony in Spain. Thus Trajan became the first non-Italian emperor to rule Rome. Roman writers commended his leadership, and applauded his respect of the senate. During his reign, the empire reached its zenith. He subdued the Dacians (from a region in the Carpathian Mountains west of the Black Sea) and incorporated the Nabataean kingdom (located between the Sinai Peninsula and the Arabian peninsula) into the new province of Arabia in AD 106. His campaign against the Parthians ended with the conquest of Mesopotamia in AD 115.

Trajan's successor, Hadrian, traveled extensively in the East, and much of the Roman remains of archaeological sites in southwest Turkey date to his reign. Under Vespasian, Caesarea became a Roman colony, and Judea was made into a separate province. Hadrian established Caesarea as the capital of the province, which he renamed Syria Palestina (for the Philistines). In AD 130 he visited the ruins of Jerusalem and initiated substantial rebuilding projects, including the construction of a temple to the chief Roman god, Jupiter, built upon the remnants of the Jewish Temple. He renamed the city "Aelia Capitolina." His anti-Jewish policies ignited another Jewish insurgency, led by Bar Kokhba (AD 132–35). After the loss of many Roman and Jewish lives, the Second Jewish Revolt ended in AD 135, and Jews were forbidden from entering Aelia Capitolina. Thus the period in which the New Testament texts are set ends much as it began, with a strong autocrat commanding a vast empire at the expense of religious freedom.

Christian Persecutions in the First Century

The Pax Romana may have promoted trade and commerce, and provided relative stability throughout the Mediterranean, but it was not experienced equally or consistently across the empire. As long as the early Christian movement remained a sect of Judaism it enjoyed the privilege of being a licit religion under Roman law. Once the Christian community separated from Judaism, though, it was no longer exempt and became the target of sporadic attacks. The apocalyptic orientation of Jesus and the early disciples had prepared believers to expect suffering and persecution as a sign of the coming of the "Son of Man" (Mk 13:26). Jesus had warned that his disciples would be beaten in synagogues, arraigned before civil officials (Mk 13:9), and persecuted (Mt 5:10–12; Jn 15:20). Paul comforted the Thessalonian believers who suffered at the hands of their own neighbors because of their new faith (1 Thes 2:14), much as he himself had suffered (2 Cor 11:23–27).

Persecutions of Christians in the first two centuries resulted from sectarian disagreements or limited government intervention. Written toward the end of the first century, the Acts of the Apostles records the martyrdom of Stephen at the hands of the Jewish authorities (Acts 7:57–60) and the death of James at the behest of Agrippa I, the client king of Judea (Acts 12:2). Paul acknowledged he actively persecuted Jewish Christians (Gal 2:13), and, according to Acts, Paul himself later became the victim of such attacks (Acts 17:5; 18:12; 21:27). James, the brother of Jesus, was executed by the high priest Ananus (Josephus, Ant. 20.200–201). As noted previously, Jews and Jewish Christians were banned from Rome by the Edict of Claudius due to intersectarian disputes.

Nero was the first Roman Emperor to actively persecute the Christians. During his reign both Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom. Nero instituted several regulations that included the punishment of Christians, whom Suetonius describes as “a sort of people who held a new and impious superstition” (Nero 16). The Roman historian Tacitus presumed the persecution of Christians was associated with the great fire in Rome (Ann. 15.44). In AD 95, Domitian banished many Christians, including Flavia Domitilla, the niece of the prominent Roman official Flavius Clemens, for their “testimony for Christ” (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.18.4). The Christian catacombs of Domitilla outside Rome were built on property once owned (and likely donated) by Flavia Domitilla. During Domitian’s reign, a regional persecution arose in Asia Minor. Tertullian (ca. 160–225) likened Domitian’s cruelty to that of Nero’s, but added that Domitian’s humanity led him to end the abuses and restore those whom he had banished (Apol. 5). In the province of Syria, Ignatius, the bishop of Antioch, was arrested in ca. 108 and condemned to death at the Colosseum in Rome. There he was thrown to the wild beasts (Ign., Rom 5.2) and killed (ca. 110). During his long journey to Rome under military guard, Ignatius wrote six letters to the various churches in the region and one to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, who himself would be martyred. Four years later, Pliny the Younger, the governor of Bithynia and Pontus (in northern Turkey), wrote to Trajan, requesting clarification about the extent of punishment and appropriate procedures against those accused of being a Christian:

I have never been present at an examination of Christians. Consequently, I do not know the nature or the extent of the punishments usually meted out to them, nor the grounds for starting an investigation and how far it should be pressed. Nor am I at all sure whether any distinction should be made between them on the grounds of age, or if young people and adults should be treated alike; whether a pardon ought to be granted to anyone retracting his beliefs, or if he has once professed Christianity, he shall gain nothing by renouncing it; and whether it is the mere name of Christian which is punishable, even if innocent of crime, or rather the crimes associated with the name. (Pliny, Ep. 10.96; LCL)

In his response, Trajan commanded that Christians were neither to be “hunted out” nor should anonymous accusations be given credence (Pliny, Ep. 10.97). Under Trajan’s successor, Hadrian (117–138), Christianity remained a punishable offense, but the emperor instituted new legal procedures to protect the defendant from unfounded accusations.

“All Roads Lead to Rome”

Near the Temple of Saturn in the Roman Forum, the Miliarium Aureum (golden milestone) marked the beginning of all roads and the point from which all distances in the Empire were reckoned. More than 250,000 miles of roadway crisscrossed the Roman Empire, built primarily to serve the needs of the imperial administration, most notably the movement of its armies. But while the military provided the engineers and occasionally the labor, the province supplemented the construction with additional workers and materials and, when completed, became responsible for the maintenance of the viae publicae. Three imperial roadways played key roles in the New Testament: the Via Maris in Palestine, the Via Egnatia in Greece, and the Via Sebaste in south central Asia Minor.

The Via Maris, or Way of the Sea, was an ancient trade route that began in Egypt, and then followed the northern coast of Sinai through the Philistine coastal cities of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Joppa, and Dor. One branch continued north along the Mediterranean coast to Tyre and Sidon. A second turned northeast. Taking advantage of the natural pass in the Carmel Mountains, the Via Maris entered into the Jezreel Valley at Megiddo and continued on to Tiberias. At the Sea of Galilee, the roadway traveled north through Magdala, Capernaum, and Hazor to its end at Damascus. A milestone, found near Magdala (Migdal), commemorated Hadrian’s travels to the East before which extensive repairs and preparations were made. Peter’s coastal journeys from Lydda to Joppa and Caesarea (Acts 9:32–10:2) follow the Via Maris. When Paul was transferred from Jerusalem to Caesarea, he and his guards joined the Via Maris at Antipatris (Acts 23:31–33).

The Via Egnatia was a major Roman road that connected the Adriatic in the west with the Aegean on the east. Built in 130 BC, this nearly seven-hundred-mile paved road linked what would become Byzantium (later known as Constantinople, today Istanbul) in the east with Dyracchium on the northwestern coast of Greece. From Dyracchium, one could take a ship to the coast of Italy, travel up the Via Appia and enter Rome. Epigraphic evidence indicates that during the reigns of Trajan and Hadrian in the second century, the Via Egnatia received extensive repairs. Luke places Paul's travels along the Via Egnatia (Philippi, Acts 16:12; and Thessalonica, Acts 17:1).

In 6 BC, Augustus had the Via Sebaste built in order to link his new veteran colonies (Comama, Cremna, Parlais, Antioch, Iconium, Lystra) in the region of Pisidia and provide quick transport of armed personnel for a planned assault on the unpacified tribes. A milestone records that the legate Cornutus Aquila oversaw the road's construction. The road began on the coast of Pamphylia, probably at Perge, and climbed into the Pisidian highlands through Comama until it reached Antioch of Pisidia. The Via Sebaste branched out from Antioch of Pisidia and ran east to Iconium. Paul and Barnabas traveled extensively along the Via Sebaste (Antioch of Pisidia, Acts 13:14; Iconium, Acts 13:51; and back again, Acts 14:21).

Taxes, Tolls, and Tribute: Paying for the *Pax Romana

Under a stable and strong central government, the economy of the Roman Empire flourished. Roman fleets patrolled the Mediterranean, guarding against piracy; on the frontiers, legions stood as the front line against barbarian invaders. Roman military and civil engineers engaged in large public works that insured Rome's security interests while aiding the local economy. To pay for this peace and security, Rome heavily taxed its provinces. A system of "tax farmers" developed wherein an individual would contract with imperial officials to collect the taxes at the local level. Since tax farming was itself a business, the tax collector was free to levy stiffer fees than required in order to make a profit. Luke describes Zacchaeus as a tax collector who promised to repay anyone whom he may have extorted (Lk 19:8). Tax collectors were ineligible to serve as judges or jurors since they were often thought to cheat for personal benefit (Sanhedrin 25b). In the New Testament, the Greek word, telōnēs, which is translated as

“tax collector,” generally referred to the collector of minor taxes such as fees on sales and transport items. These required more frequent collection than the annually assessed imperial taxes. Tolls were levied on merchandise and slaves at borders, harbors, and important cities such as Capernaum, which lay at the border between the tetrarchy of Herod Antipas and that of his brother Philip. (The disciple Matthew [or Levi] was a tax collector stationed at his post in Capernaum when he encountered Jesus [Mt 9:9; Mk 2:14; Lk 5:27].)

The two most important annual imperial taxes were the tributum capitis, a head tax, and the tributum soli, a property tax. During the reign of Augustus, a census was held across the empire to assess the number of individuals aged twelve or fourteen to sixty-five, who were required to pay the tributum capitis. Luke explains that Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem as a result of the census of Augustus (Lk 2:1–5). Jesus is asked by the Pharisees if it was lawful to pay the census tax (kēnsos) to Caesar (Mt 22:17 / Mk 12:14). Luke presumes it is a tribute tax on property (phoros 20:22). Paul recommends paying the tribute taxes (phoros), since they originate from legitimate authority (Rom 13:6–7).

In addition to the taxes owed to Rome or Herod, adult male Jews paid an annual tax of one-half shekel (2 drachmae/2 denarii) to the Temple in Jerusalem (Mt 17:24–27). More fees and tithes were required to support the Jewish priestly and Levitical offices, and to purchase animals for sacrifice (Lk 2:24; Jn 2:14).

Papyri from Egypt show that the taxes assessed on peasants and tenant farmers often outweighed their actual profit, causing many to be several years in arrears. In Israel, combined Jewish and Roman taxes on first-century farmers was approximately 35 percent of their produce/income. The Gospels present various accounts of indebtedness, including the possibility of prison (Mt 5:25–26; Lk 12:57–59; Mt 18:23–34; Lk 7:41–42; 16:1–9). Jesus prays that debts might be forgiven (Mt 6:16). Shortly before the First Jewish Revolt, the economic and political crises led to violence. Rebels set the archives in Jerusalem ablaze in AD 66 in order to destroy loan contracts in order to prevent the collection of debts (Josephus, J.W. 2.427). Four years later, people set fire to the tax archives in Antioch, Syria, to destroy its financial records (Josephus, J.W. 7.60–61).

The economy of first-century Galilee presented in the Gospels is punctuated by overwhelming debt and overburdening taxes. The letters of Paul and other texts in the New Testament address an urban audience and reflect a different aspect of the economy, one based on patronage.

Patrons and Clients

The economic instability and social structure in many parts of the empire encouraged a widespread system of reciprocity known as patronage. The personal relationship between social superiors and their inferiors benefitted both the patron and the clients. The patron provided financial support in the way of loans or employment, and expected his clients to enhance his political aspirations. A patron's status was often demonstrated by the number of clients he had surrounding him at public functions. Clients, in turn, could be patrons to those of lower status. Scholars propose this same patron/client system is at work among the early Christians. In the New Testament, Paul reminds Philemon that he owes a debt to Paul (Phlm 8, 19), which Paul expects to be repaid through the services of Philemon's slave, Onesimus (Phlm 13). Phoebe, a "minister of the church at Cenchreae" (Rom 16:1) is called a patron (prostatis) of many and specifically of Paul (Rom 16:2). Jason acts as a patron to Paul and Silas, offering them hospitality, and standing before Roman officials in their stead (Acts 17:5–9).

Civic benefaction was the public expression of patronage. In order to move through the political circuit of promotions (Cursus Honorum) in Rome or advance in provincial leadership, a patron needed to engage in public acts of benefaction. For example, euergetism (derived from the Greek, euergeteō, "to do good works") refers to the system wherein public works and programs were initiated and funded by private individuals of wealth and high status. Much of the architectural and inscriptional remains found at Roman-period archaeological sites resulted from the generosity of donors, who chose to record their benefaction on stone and marble. Like most Greco-Roman city streets in the first few centuries, Kuretes Street in Ephesus is lined with pedestals on which once stood statues of patrons, their podiums engraved with their contributions to the city. The excavations at Corinth revealed a paved area between the north market and theater, which contained an inscription that read: "Erastus in return for his aedileship [responsibility for public works, etc.] laid [the pavement] at his own expense." Archaeologists date the pavement to the middle-first century. Since Romans 16:23 mentions an Erastus who was the city treasurer, some scholars suggest that the stone is evidence of an early Pauline Christian in Corinth.

Clients were also expected to acknowledge their debt to their patron, which meant public displays of gratitude. Throughout the Roman world, temples to the imperial cult were erected by local aristocracy to assure their good relations with the emperor. As mentioned earlier, the Pontius Pilate stone is actually the dedicatory inscription to a temple that Pilate funded in honor of his patron, Tiberius. In grand style, Herod the Great built an entire city, Caesarea Maritima, to honor his patron, Augustus. His sons followed suit: Herod Antipas dedicated his city on the Sea of Galilee to Tiberius, while Philip rebuilt Pnias as Caesarea Philippi.

Domestic Life

The Gospels reflect the evangelists' understanding of first-century Galilean Jewish family life: parents attend to the religious responsibilities (Lk 2:22–24); family honor is guarded and shame avoided (Mk 3:21; Jn 2:1–5); one works in the family business (Mk 1:16–20); children are to care for their parents (Mk 7:11); and the death of a child is, of course, devastating (Mk 5:35–42; Lk 7:12–15; Jn 4:46–53). This idyllic image is broadened in the Acts of the Apostles and epistles, reflecting the larger Greco-Roman context in which the texts are set.

The chief organizing unit in antiquity was the house, or oikos—from which we get the term “economics” (oiko-nomikos means the rules, or laws, that govern the household affairs, including financial matters). The Roman family included: the father (pater), mother (mater), children, other relatives, the slaves of the household, freedmen, and freedwomen. The paterfamilias (head of the family) held patria potestas, the right of life or death over his children. He could have his children killed, sold into slavery, and forced into marriages, though this rarely happened. An adult son was not financially emancipated until his father's death, when he would assume the role as head of the family. A daughter was always under her father's guardianship until her marriage, when her husband would become her guardian. If she had no husband, another male relative would serve as her legal representative. Underage children were often under the guidance of a tutor or pedagogue. Paul invokes the image of a pedagogue to explain how the law functioned prior to Christ (Gal 3:24–25).

Issues of inheritance were of grave importance in order to secure the memory of the deceased and uphold the honor of the family. In Roman society, both male and female family members could inherit. If a man had no biological child, adoption was a legitimate means of securing an heir in the Roman legal system. The adopted one would share in all legal rights just as if he or she had been born to the parents. For example, Julius Caesar adopted Octavius who became Augustus; Nerva adopted Trajan, and so forth. Paul confirms that through adoption Christians are children of God and joint heirs with Christ (Rom 8:14–17).

In Roman society, and in much of the first-century Mediterranean world, the father was the public face of the family. He attended to all activities outside the house, including business, legal, and political dealings, while his wife supervised the household. It would be anachronistic to think of the matrona as a “housewife” in our modern sense. In essence, the household represented the entire functioning of the family life—a minipolis as it were. The matrona supervised the household slaves, oversaw the stewards responsible for outlying estates, saw to the education of her daughters, and attended to the preparation of food and clothing. Roman matrons had more rights and freedom than did their Greek sisters. Augustan legislation released women from the need of a male guardian if free women had borne three children or if freedwomen had four children. Roman women could inherit, run businesses, and hold limited political power. Archaeological remains in Pompeii reveal that Eumachia donated a building to the fullers (launderers). In that same city, Julia Felix ran a large entertainment complex complete with multiple tricliniums (dining rooms) for rent. Lydia hosts Paul and Silas in her Philippian home (Acts 16:15). An inscription at Misenum attests that Cassia, the wife of Lucio Lecanio Primitivo, was inducted into the Augustales—ordinarily a male-only priesthood of the imperial cult.

The immediate family included the father and mother and children, but the slaves of the household were also part of the familia. They worshipped the household gods; they could earn money and buy their freedom; they could engage in civil unions (legal marriage was only available to nonslaves), but the children of these unions were the property of the master. In the master’s will, his favored slaves were often manumitted or set free upon his death. These freedmen and freedwomen became clients of the patron—their former owner. When these slaves and freed members of the family died, they were interred in the family tombs, though with much less ornate markers.

The New Testament texts presume the ubiquitous nature of slavery. Paul encouraged slaves to gain their freedom if they could do so, but if not they should remain as they are (1 Cor 7:20–22). In baptism, the distinctions of slave and free, male and female were no longer valid (Gal 3:28). Nonetheless, Paul does not advocate freeing slaves and, in fact, sends the runaway slave Onesimus back to his master (Phlm 12).

Despite the public activities of some elite Roman women, generally public affairs were the purview of men—women engaged in the private activities of household management. These clear role distinctions were rooted in an ancient understanding of economics, which developed particular codes of behavior. These codes adhered to the strict patriarchal standards of Greco-Roman society, which limited the public leadership and behavior of women, children, and slaves. The New Testament contains examples of Christian codes of behavior modeled on these patriarchal expectations (Col 3:18–4:1; Eph 5:21–6:9; 1 Tm 2:8–15; Ti 2:1–10; and 1 Pt 2:18–3:12). Since Paul and the earliest Christians anticipated an immediate parousia (Jesus’s return) and, therefore, did not address social issues (see 1 Cor 7:29–31), the presence of household codes within later New Testament literature suggests a more developed church emerging at the end of the first century.

Death and Burial

The death and burial of Jesus of Nazareth, so foundational to the Christian narrative, is a typical example of first-century Jewish burial customs. The Synoptic Gospels state that Jesus’s body was wrapped in a linen cloth burial shroud (Mk 15:46; Mt 27:59; Lk 23:53). The Gospel of John reports that the body was bound “with burial cloths along with the spices, according to the Jewish burial custom” (Jn 19:39–40). All four Gospel accounts mention a tomb and a stone covering the entrance. According to the Gospel of John, near the site of crucifixion was a garden and within that garden was a new tomb (Jn 19:41). Excavations under the floor of the Holy Sepulchre (the Jerusalem church built over the place of crucifixion and burial) in the area of the tomb have yielded evidence of arable soil, suggesting the possibility of a garden.

The Jewish burial process required that the body first be placed in a tomb (inhumation) and later the deceased's bones be collected for a "second burial." Excavations of first-century Jewish burials sites in Palestine reveal similar features. Ordinarily, an external entry way led into a central chamber, off of which shafts or loculi niches were dug. Also known as kokhim tombs, these shafts were found extensively from the first century BC on. A stone was used to seal the entrance (Mk 15:46; Mt 27:60; Lk 24:2; Jn 11:38; 20:1).

A year later, after the body had decomposed, the bones were "gathered to the fathers"—collected and placed with other members of the family. The remains of the deceased became part of the ancestral collective in this "second burial." Jesus's tomb is described as a new burial site into which no one had yet been placed (Jn 19:41). In other words, there had been no bodies placed here to decompose before they were "gathered to their fathers." The bones collected were placed in an ossuary or bone box. For those with wealth and status, decorative images along with the deceased's name adorned the outside of the stone container. Other ossuaries lack any ornamentation. Such a burial allowed the soul of the dead to have an existence in the underworld of Sheol, and, by a later tradition, for the bones to be available for resurrection after the Messiah has restored the Israelites to their proper land. Several of these first-century bone boxes have been discovered near Jerusalem. Most notable is an ossuary bearing the name of Joseph Son of Caiaphas, believed to be the same Caiaphas who was high priest during Jesus's arrest (Mt 26:3, 57). Discovered in 1990 in a cave in Abu Tor just south of the city of Jerusalem, the ossuary contains the remains of six people.

Traditionally the Romans preferred cremation, though by the end of the second century inhumation was becoming more popular. Gentile Christians seemed to have preferred inhumation, in anticipation of a bodily resurrection at the end time (1 Thes 4:16–17; 2 Cor 4:14; Eph 2:6; Rv 11:9–12). Dated to the third century, funerary inscriptions and catacomb frescos are among the earliest identifiable Christian artifacts.

Conclusion

The New Testament texts reflect the political, social, and religious milieu of the first-century Greco-Roman world. The hellenization policy initiated by Alexander and continued by his successors led to the creation of a common language, koine, which became the language of the New Testament texts. The persecution of religious Jews under the forced hellenization policy of the Seleucids gave rise to political action under the Maccabees and fostered messianic expectations. Concepts like “the kingdom of God” and “son of Man” that developed during this period were foundational for later Christian theology. Under Roman hegemony, Judea lost political power, becoming a client kingdom and then a Roman province. But the Pax Romana, initiated and maintained by a strong central government, created an environment in which the early Christians could move freely across the Mediterranean world. As Tacitus unfavorably reported, after Jesus’s death: “the pernicious superstition was checked for a moment, only to break out once more, not merely in Judea, the home of the disease, but in the capital itself, where all things horrible or shameful in the world collect and find a vogue” (Tacitus, Ann. 15.44, LCL).

The Apostle Paul had encouraged the Roman Christians to respect authority and obey the laws (Rom 13); Roman Christians knew the time was near, “it is the hour . . . to awake from sleep. For our salvation is nearer now than when we first believed” (Rom 13:11). The virtuous societal expectations were upheld, patriarchal structures unchallenged, and gender roles accepted. But as the New Testament texts attest, Christians were to be in the world but not of it. They were to live as “aliens and sojourners” on their way to the reign of God (1 Pt 2:11).

This brief overview of selected political and social history provides a background to the Jesus movement and the spread of early Christianity. As the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum) acknowledges, the inspired writers of the biblical texts were human authors writing with full instrumentality out of their historical and cultural contexts (3.11–12). Familiarization with that ancient context can help shorten the historical distance between the inspired authors of the New Testament and today’s readers.

CATHOLIC INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE

KEVIN MADIGAN

The Early Church (ca. 100–500)

The early Catholic interpretation of the Bible, like Christianity itself, did not emerge or develop in a religious, cultural, or intellectual void. Instead, it was formed and influenced by two antecedent interpretive traditions, one Greco-Roman, the other Jewish.

The Greco-Roman tradition traces its origins back at least to the sixth century BC. This tradition originated with the followers of the brilliant Pythagoras of Samos. The Pythagoreans focused their interpretive attention upon the epic poetry of Homer, and their Platonic and Stoic successors on other classics of the Greco-Roman tradition. Confident that the poets had written under inspiration as theologians, so to speak, these interpreters concluded that great poetry was about deep cosmological and ethical realities. Accordingly, they developed a philosophy or method of interpretation called allegoria (allegory). Using this technique, Greek and Roman interpreters of classical literature claimed to find the deep meaning intended by the author. This meaning was usually hidden by the surface language of the poet, which could be crudely literal, enigmatic, superficially trivial, or otherwise intellectually or morally offensive. All assumed, in fact, that the literal meaning was an impediment to the “real,” deep, and true (or truer) meaning of the text.

Similar assumptions and methods passed over into Diaspora Judaism no later than the turn of the first century BC and were used in the interpretation of the Septuagint, notably with the ascetic sect Therapeutae (“worshippers”). Without doubt, the preeminent practitioner of the allegorical method in Hellenistic Judaism was Philo of Alexandria (20 BC–AD 50). With non-Jewish Hellenistic interpreters, he shared several crucial assumptions: that the text (the Septuagint) was divinely inspired and thus permanently normative; that it contained deeper truths than those expressed superficially and contained a spiritual sense above or beyond the literal-historical; that the deeper truths were present especially where the text was, or seemed, irrational, ambiguous, absurd, sacrilegious, or otherwise difficult; and that such truths could be understood by the interpreter skilled in allegory. In addition, it was Philo's conviction that such truths were consistent with the highest insights of Stoic and Platonic thought, so that the allegorist in some sense "rewrote" the sacred text so as to harmonize it with these insights. Yet Philo insisted on literal adherence to Torah. He also observed that some texts (e.g., Nm 23:19: "God is not a human being . . . ") were literally clear and therefore required no allegorical gloss. On several very important Christian exegetes also from Alexandria, especially Clement and Origen (who was very conscious of and explicit about his debt to Philo), Philonic hermeneutics would exercise a profound influence, which would then be felt for more than a millennium in both Eastern and Western Christianity.

With Philo and, indeed, with all contemporary Jews, the earliest Christian community agreed that "the Scriptures" referred to a collection of authoritative Jewish writings, namely that collection of writings Christians today refer to as the Old Testament. With Hellenistic Jews, early Christians also shared the methodological conviction that the Scriptures could be (and sometimes should be) permitted to say things other than that which the words seemed to suggest or require.

In the application of this principle, of course, early Christians parted company with contemporary Jews. This is because the earliest Christians rapidly took those authoritative Jewish writings to attest typologically to the eschatological events that had occurred in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. That is, early Christians interpreted the events of Israelite history as types—intentional figural prophecies expressed in the spiritual sense of the text and recognized as prophetic only in the light of later events—of the decisive redemptive actions taken by God in the life of Jesus. Thus, typology (a form of allegory) grew up with Christianity as a hermeneutical method. (Such a hermeneutic is in evidence no later than the letters of Paul, e.g., in 1 Cor 10:6 and Rom 5:4.) It enabled Christians to understand the events of Christ, especially the problem of a crucified Messiah, in terms prefigured in the Hebrew Scriptures. Accordingly, it was crucial to the project of emerging Christian and ecclesiastical self-definition. Thus, it goes without saying that Christian typology required a thoroughgoing reinterpretation of the Scriptures the community shared with contemporary Jewish exegetes and practitioners.

This is not to say that all early Christians, or all who so identified themselves, were comfortable with the typological method and the practical exegetical results its application effected. Some were not. Few were more uncomfortable than Marcion of Pontus, a layman of formidable wealth and missionary zeal. After having worked among the Roman Christians (ca. 144), Marcion founded a church based, exegetically, on the rejection of the typological method and of the Hebrew Scriptures, and of the God revealed therein. He composed a canon, perhaps the first composed by any Christian, consisting solely of an expurgated version of the Gospel of Luke and a collection of ten Pauline letters. Had Marcion's position carried the day, the Old Testament would have ceased to be an arsenal of proof text to be used—in conjunction with the words of the evangelists and Paul—to establish the messiahship of Jesus. However quaint and occasionally even disrespectful typological exegesis sounds to a postcritical and ecumenical age, it did preserve the Hebrew Scriptures for the use of the church.

Eventually, Marcion's views (as well as those of Gnostic Christians who also rejected the Hebrew Scriptures) were condemned by the mainstream or emerging "Catholic" church. But Marcion's views gave considerable impetus to the formation within this Catholic Church of an authoritative list of scriptural writings. Within decades of Marcion's death—certainly no later than AD 180—the Catholic Church had composed a list, a canon, of authoritative Scriptures that resembled very closely the contents of this Study Bible. It included an "Old Testament," understood now as a collection of writings pointing typologically beyond itself to Christ, and a "New Testament." The former was the Greek Septuagint, which included the Apocrypha, books not allowed by the rabbis into the Jewish canon in the first two centuries after Jesus's birth. The contents of the latter were very much like those of our Greek New Testament, though writings later listed in the canon (e.g., James, Hebrews) were not then included.

For the remainder of the second century, the Bible was exploited above all in polemical writing against Jewish and heretical interlocutors (sometimes imaginatively configured). While these Catholic polemicists hardly ignored the New Testament, the Hebrew Bible was the turf on which such battles were fought. Typology was the most frequently wielded arrow in the Catholic exegete's quiver. In his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew (ca. 160), for example, Justin Martyr attempted to demonstrate that Christ's life and especially his crucifixion had been copiously, almost ubiquitously, foreshadowed in the Hebrew Scriptures. So intent was Justin on proving that the cross had been prefigured there that he found types of it in virtually any reference or allusion to wood, beginning with the Tree of Life in Genesis.

Aside from being an accomplished practitioner of the typological method, Bishop Irenaeus of Lyons (fl. AD 170–180) established a crucially influential principle of correct interpretation of the Bible. Dubbed by R. M. Grant “the father of authoritative exegesis in the church” and often recognized to be a father of early Catholicism, Irenaeus argued (particularly against heretics) that only bishops in an unbroken line of succession from the apostles were to be counted as trusted interpreters. From this principle, it followed that authoritative interpretation was to be found solely within the walls of the churches and, more precisely, in those churches that could trace their origins to the apostles and whose episcopal successors had, in addition, produced short creeds to summarize the main events of salvation history contained in the Scriptures. These creeds (or rules of faith) could then be used (circularly, it might be observed) to test the orthodoxy of any scriptural interpretation.

In the Catholic interpretation of Scripture and above all in hermeneutical theory, Origen of Alexandria (ca. 185–253) towers over the third century. The fourth book of his masterwork, On First Principles, is dedicated solely to a theory of biblical interpretation; it is a deeply influential manifesto of Christian allegoresis. Origen's basic presumption, like that of his fellow Alexandrians, not least of all Philo, is that the Scriptures are intended to reveal not simply the historical events of salvation history but deep spiritual, theological, and cosmological truths. Such truths are revealed above all where the literal sense says things unworthy of the Deity (God planting a garden, for example), or impossible (three “days” of creation without any natural body of light), or inconsistent. (Origen was deeply impressed with the inconsistency of, among other things, the Passion and resurrection accounts, from which he concluded they must each intend a deeper spiritual meaning.) In some cases, a biblical passage will have no literal sense. But all passages have a deeper spiritual sense, to which the interpreter is clued by the “stumbling blocks” of an illogical or absurd “letter.” Such texts invite the skilled exegete to unearth the spiritual treasure buried below, and Origen gives quite specific rules about how to uncover this camouflaged meaning. He encourages the exegete to “search the scriptures” (Jn 5:39) and establish the meaning of difficult passages by clear ones (a method that presupposed the unity of the biblical witness), and by paying attention to context and to etymology. Echoing Irenaeus, Origen also adds (perhaps less enthusiastically than the bishop of Lyon) that the meaning of Scripture can be established by use of the Church’s Rule of Faith. These reflections made Origen by far the most sophisticated theoretician of interpretation in ancient Christianity. He was, in addition, an enormously prolific exegete. Not to be overlooked is his Hexapla (sixfold), an edition of the Hebrew Scriptures that contained, in six parallel columns, one version of the Old Testament in Hebrew, one of the transliterated Hebrew, and four, including the Septuagint, in Greek. This might be called the first attempt in ecclesiastical history at textual criticism of the Hebrew Scriptures. His influence on late-antique and medieval exegetes, especially those sympathetic to allegorical interpretation (like the fourth-century Cappadocian fathers Gregory of Nyssa and Basil of Caesarea), would be, if indirect, immense.

Not all were sympathetic (we remember here Marcion). If Alexandria nourished its scholars on allegoresis, the biblical exegetes in the important city of Antioch tended to stress the fundamental importance of the literal and historical sense of the text. According to Eusebius, the Antiochene exegetes—represented typically by John Chrysostom (407)—interpreted the text “with moderation,” that is, unallegorically. This is not to say Antiochene exegetes denied that the sacred text had a higher meaning. It is to say, though, that they were nervous about allegory. In their view, allegory simply made the text a springboard for unrestrained flights of speculation that left the natural, obvious, or contextual meaning of the text far from view. For the deeper meaning of the text, they preferred the term theoria. Their leader, Diodore of Tarsus (d. 390), actually composed a text titled On the Difference between Theoria and Allegoria. Two others, Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, and Diodore’s pupil Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428), wrote tracts on the same topic with the same unambiguous title—Against Origen.

As it turns out, the difference is largely one of emphasis, with the Antiochene school typically stressing the need to ground the higher meaning of the text in its foundational historical meaning, or at least not be opposed to it. Both men were concerned that allegoresis actually robbed the text of the meaning it purported to uncover by plunging and thus dissolving it into the murky, seemingly undisciplined universe of discourse of “spiritual understanding.” (The Antiochenes would have vibrated sympathetically to Adolf von Harnack’s complaint about Origen’s “biblical alchemy” in his History of Dogma, vol. 2 [1908] and 3 [1897].) Neither Antiochene was as apprehensive about, in his understandable preoccupation with the historicity of the text, what was for Origen and his Alexandrian peers the sometimes disturbingly anthropomorphic, mythical fabric of the biblical narrative. Looking ahead, one could say, somewhat simply, that in the early Latin West, the Alexandrian tradition would certainly carry the day, while in the High Middle Ages (ca. 1300–1500), with the reintroduction of Aristotle, the Antiochene tradition asserted its supremacy.

Even as no scholar of the fourth century did as much to explicate and make available the Bible to contemporaries, no figure exemplified ambivalence to the allegorical approach more than the great Jerome (ca. 340–420). His early commentarial efforts are highly allegorical. Later, he came under the influence of the Antiochene school through Apollinaris of Laodicea (d. ca. 390), who was later condemned for Christological heresy at the second ecumenical council of Constantinople (381). At that point, Jerome stated his desire to avoid excessive allegoresis, going so far as to claim he allegorized only when he could not determine the literal sense of a passage. However, this claim was purely theoretical, as his voluminous commentaries are replete with allegorical interpretation, about much of which, at the end of his life, he finally expressed regret.

It is difficult to imagine that such a man as Jerome could look back on his career at all ruefully. He was without doubt the greatest scholar of the fourth century. His knowledge of the history, geography, and philology of Palestine was simply unrivaled. He wrote capaciously on the Bible; indeed, he was the most prolific commentator of his day. In 382 Pope Damasus commissioned him to translate the Bible into Latin. The result was the Vulgate (editio vulgata), a Latin Bible translated from the original languages. To this day it remains the edition of the Bible that has perhaps been most widely read in the West, where it had tremendous influence on language, liturgy, art, architecture, literature, politics, and theology.

We can hardly mention the Latin West without speaking of the importance of the North African tradition. It was there, probably by the end of the second century, that the first translation of the Bible into Latin was made, and we know there were several such translations. Tertullian quotes from these old Latin versions as, in the mid-third century, does Bishop Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258) and as Augustine would as well. A contemporary of Jerome, Tyconius (d. ca. 400) authored the first tract on the theory of interpretation in the West worthy of comparison to Origen's. This Liber Regularum (Book of Rules) set out, as its title suggests, a set of principles (seven in all) for interpreting Scripture. One of the most important is that when Scripture speaks of the head of the church, it refers also to its body. In this way, statements made about Christ could be understood to refer to the church in the present age as well. Tyconius also authored a very influential commentary on the Apocalypse, which shifted the exegetical tradition away from the historic millenarian reading of the book.

Tyconius's influence was nowhere more deeply felt than in the writings of his fellow North African, Augustine of Hippo (354–430). Indeed, the influence of Tyconius on the greatest of Latin doctors has not always been recognized or conceded, because Hippo was a member of the schismatic Donatist church, which Augustine spent much of his life quite fiercely denouncing. But upon inspection of Augustine's own hermeneutical theory as it is expressed in his classic On Christian Doctrine, it is obvious that Tyconius's influence was profound. And that influence was felt in the wide circulation in the Middle Ages not only of Augustine's book on Christian teaching but of his own Book of Rules, both of which were recommended by no less a figure than Cassiodorus (d. 580).

When speaking of Augustine, it is impossible not to mention the decisive influence in his life as well as work of the allegorical method. It might easily be said that but for that method Augustine might never have been baptized. It was only in the wake of hearing the Old Testament interpreted allegorically by Bishop Ambrose of Milan (ca. 339–97) that Augustine felt ready to convert. Until then, Augustine, nurtured on the classics of Roman literature, had regarded the Old Testament with a feeling bordering on contempt. Allegory enabled him to understand the Hebrew Scriptures in a new way and to harmonize them, as had Ambrose, with the Neoplatonic philosophy on which he had also been nourished. Like Origen, he offered abundant guidance on how to treat difficult passages (and his advice is remarkably like Origen's). Augustine insists, as had Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Origen, on the utility of the Church's Rule of Faith. But he also adds that all Scripture is to be interpreted in light of the Law of Love, so that any interpretation that contributed to the Reign of Charity should command assent. Augustine is also capable of sounding uncannily modern, as when, in his Harmony of the Gospels, he is prepared to concede that the narratives in the Gospels reflect recorded community memory rather than accurate chronological narrative history. Augustine also acknowledged that Jesus's words were not always recorded verbatim; it was their sense that was communicated accurately to posterity.

The question of how many senses of Scripture there were, and what each meant, achieved authoritative definition at the end of the ancient period in Christianity in the writings of the monk John Cassian (360–435). Most ancient commentators worked with the practical distinction between literal and spiritual senses. Origen had theoretically designated three senses: literal, moral, and spiritual (On First Principles 4.2.4), although scrutiny of his surviving commentaries indicates he did not follow this principle slavishly. In his Conferences, Cassian became the first to argue that, theoretically, Scripture contained or expressed four senses: literal, allegorical, moral or tropological, and anagogical or eschatological. Eventually, this understanding was versified as follows:

*Littera gesta docet, quid credas allegoria,
Moralia quid agas, quo tendas anagogia.*

This little couplet basically meant that the literal sense has to do with the history of God's redemptive activity, the allegorical level with articles of belief, the moral with ethical behavior, and the anagogical with one's eternal destiny. Thus, for example, when Jerusalem is mentioned in the Bible, it would refer literally to the earthly city, allegorically to the church, morally to the soul, and anagogically to the heavenly city. Cassian's Conferences was one of the few texts recommended in the Rule of Benedict. As a consequence, his theory was absorbed in Benedictine cloisters in the Early Middle Ages (ca. 475–1000) and passed on to interpreters for a millennium. Again, few interpreters applied this principle mechanically; many were content to distinguish in their commentaries between two or sometimes three senses.

When we survey the history of the Catholic use of Scripture in early Christianity, two important truths emerge. First, theology and scriptural interpretation were virtually one and the same activity. At the least, theology invariably began as exegesis. Second, the allegorical method, which the church itself did not invent, had been appropriated and baptized by it. All Christian interpreters recognized that allegory (or, with the Antiochenes, theoria) gave the church access to a meaning that was not frozen in time or fixed. With the allegorical method, the church had inherited and had brilliantly exploited a way of making the Scriptures inexhaustible. To it the ancients had bequeathed a means by which, until the modern era, it could make the Scriptures perennially relevant, above all, perhaps, in preaching.

The Medieval Era (ca. 500–1500)

We can hardly mention Benedict and early medieval monasticism without at least noting how central the role of the Bible was in monastic life. Monastic prayer began with the lectio divina (divine reading) of Scripture and continued with meditation upon it. Monks were utterly immersed in the language, imagery, and thought-world of the Scriptures. So often and so carefully did they read and so assiduously ruminate upon certain parts of Scripture (the Psalter, for example) that such texts became a fundamental mark of their spiritual and mental experience. As Jean Leclercq, OSB (1911–93) has shown, monastic culture was a profoundly scriptural one. Monastic education was oriented almost exclusively to the ability to read and understand Scripture. In addition, early medieval scholarship on Scripture was produced almost exclusively in monastic scriptoria and by monks. One thinks of the Venerable Bede (ca. 673–735) in Northumbria, Pope Gregory the Great (590–604) in Rome, and a whole succession of eighth- and ninth-century Frankish monks, including Rabanus Maurus, Walafrid Strabo, Alcuin, Haimo, Remigius of Auxerre, and Paschasius Radbertus, to mention only a few of the most accomplished. In short, Catholic scholarship on the Bible took place almost always in the restricted setting of the monastic cloister.

It would be difficult to exaggerate the awe with which such monks beheld the patristic tradition of exegesis. Few would have dared to think of a scriptural book other than in sensu patrum—“in the sense of the Fathers.” So understood, scholarship was prized not for novelty but for fidelity to the received tradition. Early medieval biblical scholarship was therefore traditionalist and conservative in nature. The early medieval period was, in terms of biblical scholarship, an age of compilation, not innovation. In the eighth and ninth centuries, Frankish biblical scholars produced commentaries that were, by and large, syntheses of venerable authorities. Very few dared personal commentary on the received wisdom of the church fathers. The main objective, particularly in the Carolingian era, was the transmission of patristic extracts (technically known as florilegia) that were authentic and otherwise reliable. Such collections are dominated by the Latin fathers, especially by Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine, and Gregory the Great. Such exposure to the Greek fathers (especially Origen) as was communicated to Western readers was achieved, largely, by presentation of the Latin fathers (like Hilary of Poitiers, Ambrose, Jerome, and Gregory) by whom they were influenced.

Most ages in church history can be identified by their interest in some discrete collection of scriptural writings, usually reflecting the theological and ecclesiological interests of the time. In the Early Middle Ages, the Scriptures most used and commented were those holding a central role in monastic liturgy and thought and, to a lesser extent, doctrinal theology: the Psalter, the Song of Songs, Genesis, Paul, and Matthew (the one Gospel, curiously, that received widespread commentarial attention in the Early Middle Ages). Leclercq rightly emphasized that for the entirety of the Early Middle Ages, there is a strong and consistent link between the Bible and prayer (private and public) and that such a link is also the common characteristic of the use of the Bible in this period.

One of the great achievements in biblical scholarship in the Early Middle Ages was the production of a standard or Ordinary Gloss (Glossa Ordinaria) of patristic commentary on the entire Bible. Nonetheless, its origins, authorship, and history of the Gloss have long remained obscure. Thanks to the researches of Beryl Smalley and others, we are now better informed about such questions. First of all, none of the Gloss was produced in a Carolingian monastic setting—the so-called marginal gloss had long been attributed to the monk Walafrid of Strabo (d. ca. 850)—as had long been presupposed. Instead, it was begun in the cathedral school of Laon in the early twelfth century, at which time it, and the theological scene in Europe, was dominated by the brothers Anselm (d. 1117) and Ralph (d. ca. 1135), though the very earliest glosses on the Bible appeared in the late eighth century in England and Ireland. Anselm probably glossed the Psalter, Paul, and the Gospel of John; Ralph the Gospel of Matthew. Others, including the mid-twelfth-century Gilbert the Universal, glossed much of the Hebrew Scriptures, including the Pentateuch. The entire collaborative project was completed no later than the first quarter of the thirteenth century. That commentary usually appeared with the biblical text as a “glossed Bible,” with short interlinear comments and longer marginal comments, usually of patristic origin, a form similar to contemporary Jewish commentary on the Talmud. Distributed in large numbers from a center in Paris, it was probably the most widely read and influential commentary on the Bible from the time of its widespread circulation ca. 1220 until the seventeenth century.

Over the course of the century that produced these two textbooks, running commentaries on the Bible came more and more to be disrupted by the introduction of theological issues or questions (quaestiones). Eventually, these questions were grouped together and finally broke off from their original commentarial context altogether to form textbooks of doctrinal theology. The classic in this genre is, without doubt, Peter Lombard’s Book of Sentences. Late in the twelfth century, scholastic masters began lecturing on the Lombard independently of the sacred page (sacra pagina)—the Vulgate page that had been established as a set text in the schools. This is a development of some moment. Aside from signaling the growing hegemony of the schools and the eclipse of monastic biblical scholarship and emerging universities in theological discourse, it indicates the beginning of the separation of biblical and theological studies, heretofore conceived as a single discipline.

It was, however, in the famous house of canons of St. Victor in Paris that hermeneutical and exegetical developments of great importance occurred in the twelfth century. In Hugh (d. 1141) and Andrew of St. Victor (d. 1175), the High Middle Ages are sometimes said to have received, respectively, their own Augustine (the former for his Didascalicon, often called a reworking of Augustine’s De Doctrina Christiana) and Jerome (the latter for his immense erudition, knowledge of Hebrew, and concentration on the literal-historical sense). From these men came important new reflections on the primacy and content of the primary or literal sense of Scripture, reflections that would gesture toward the ways in which biblical scholarship would change in the schools and universities, and in a time during which Aristotle was being reabsorbed in Western Europe.

Like some of the Antiochenes, Hugh wrote a tract (in his case an imaginative debate) on the relationship of the literal and allegorical sense. There he described the operation of the allegorical sense with considerable precision. It was not, he argued, the language or words of Scripture that expressed the allegorical meaning but, instead, those things to which the words pointed; the figurative meaning of the text, if such it has, belongs to the literal sense. (This was to be an issue taken up and resolved definitively for Catholic exegesis for centuries by St. Thomas Aquinas.) It was, Hugh argued, on this spiritual plane or level of exegesis that the unity of Scripture was contained. It could not be on the level of the literal sense, for it was all too plain that the literal sense contradicted itself in scores of places in the Scriptures.

Hugh was nonetheless adamant that the literal sense was of foundational importance for the allegorical sense, and he rebuked unrestrained allegorists with some sarcasm. In his book De Scripturis, he observed:

I wonder how people have the face to boast themselves teachers of allegory, when they do not know the primary meaning of the letter . . . How do you read Scripture then, if you don't read the letter? Subtract the letter and what is left?

Hugh even dared to deny Christological interpretations of texts that had long received such interpretations. Given his preoccupation with the importance of the literal sense, it is interesting to observe that Hugh was among those exegetes in twelfth-century Europe that first forged ties with the Jewish exegetical community. Hugh was convinced that Jewish exegesis of the Hebrew Scriptures furnished the most literal sense of the text, and for that reason he often quoted the great Jewish exegete Rabbi Solomon bar Isaac (Shlomo Yitzchakhi) of Troyes (known by the acronym "Rashi," 1040–1105) as an authoritative guide to the literal sense.

If Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173) undertook to refute some of Hugh's ideas, Hugh's promise was fulfilled in Andrew, also of St. Victor (d. 1175), whose obscurity Beryl Smalley did much to overcome and on whose significance she wrote a long chapter in her groundbreaking (if not uncontroversial) book, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (finished in 1940), which, as it were, invented the field of the study of medieval exegesis.

Andrew is without question the hero of Smalley's book, and it is because he concentrates on the historical and literal sense to the explicit exclusion of the doctrinal and moral. In this, he was quite aware that he was embarking on something new in the Middle Ages. Or, to put it another way, he saw himself continuing the work of St. Jerome. Of Andrew, Smalley observes, "No western commentator before him had set out to give a purely literal interpretation of the Old Testament." For his access to the literal truth of the Hebrew Scriptures (Andrew commented on the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, many of the Prophets, and some of the wisdom literature), he, like Hugh, relied on the school of Rashi. And, again like Hugh, he simply felt that the "Jewish explanation" of the text was the literal sense of the text. To the extent that he was preoccupied with establishing the literal sense of Scripture, he made extraordinary and unprecedented use of Jewish exegesis by making contact with the communities most influenced by Rashi.

One of the several other twelfth-century exegetes worthy of mention alongside Hugh of St. Victor, by whom he was influenced, is Peter Comestor or Manducator (d. ca. 1179), dean of the cathedral of Troyes and chancellor of the University of Paris. The name means "Peter the Eater," which he earned for having absorbed all of the Scriptures. His most enduring contribution to the understanding of the Scriptures was a work titled Historia scholastica. This was an epitome (depending on some non-Christian authors, like Josephus) of biblical history from creation to the events narrated in the Acts of the Apostles. As such, it fulfilled the requirements of Hugh of St. Victor's Didascalicon, which called for a foundational knowledge of biblical history. It also relied heavily (though anonymously) on the commentaries of Andrew and so was in a double sense a child of the great abbey of St. Victor. Like the Gloss, Historia scholastica became a standard textbook. Judging from the number of manuscripts and early printed editions made of it, it remained very popular through the fifteenth century.

Another disciple of Andrew, perhaps the finest biblical scholar of the twelfth century, was Stephen Langton (d. 1228). Perhaps his most important contribution to biblical scholarship was the production of a new edition of the Bible. This edition was important because it divided the entire Bible into chapters (ca. 1200); Thomas Gallus (d. 1246) would later divide it into verses. This was the edition that was to become standard at Paris and, as such, became the one used in the new university setting of the thirteenth century. The early thirteenth century was, among other things, an age in which several aids to biblical study were produced. Once Langton's Bible had been produced, with its chapter references, it was possible to produce a concordance, and indeed a concordance to the Latin of the Vulgate was produced (ca. 1235) in the new Dominican priory of St. Jacques in Paris.

It was in the very different monastic setting of southern Italy that the highly innovative exegesis of Joachim of Fiore set exegesis on a radically different path—deplored once by Smalley, an enthusiast for Andrew and literal exegesis, as an attack of “senile dementia” in the spiritual sense, a prime example of the “spiritual sense in decline”—than that recommended by the great Victorines and early friars of Paris. Born in 1135 in Celico, Joachim entered the Benedictine abbey at Corazzo in 1171, of which he became prior, then abbot (ca. 1176–77). Multiple visions at the Cistercian Abbey of Casamari in 1183–84 revealed to him the fullness and harmony (concordia) of the Scriptures and the mystery of the Trinity. Convinced that the inner mystery of God's existence as a Trinity of Persons was linked with the structure of history, Joachim, pondering the Scriptures, saw salvation history unfolding in terms of three successive, overlapping ages (status), each primarily under the aegis of one of the persons of the Trinity. Thus Joachim postulated a status of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, the last about to dawn.

This intricate theology of history is based on an equally complex hermeneutical theory. For Joachim, one of the major objectives of scriptural exegesis was to demonstrate the numerous literal parallels or concordances (concordiae) between Old Testament history and New. These concordiae not only shed light on the past but were also capable of revealing the future. The gifted exegete could see in both Testaments (above all in the book of Revelation) sets of concordances, which enabled him not merely to understand the first two status more fully but also to predict the structure and meaning of the dawning third status of history. Joachim's exegesis was to have profound influence not just on the Franciscans of the thirteenth century, who saw in Francis a herald in the new age of history just then dawning, but also on many exegetes and secular thinkers down to the twentieth and twenty-first centuries.

If Bonaventure and other Franciscan exegetes such as Peter Olivi (d. 1298) enthusiastically capitalized on Joachite hermeneutics in their own exegetical works, their Dominican confreres emphatically did not. Probably the greatest early Dominican exegete was the prolific Hugh of St. Cher (d. 1263). Intended to supplement the Glossa Ordinaria, his massive Postillae in Totam Bibliam—which relied heavily on Stephen Langton and his moralizing exegesis—was almost certainly compiled as the work of a Dominican “team” of exegetes at St. Jacques. Nonetheless, the postilla (or commentary, from the words post illa [verba?] “after those [scriptural] words”), which was a continuous gloss on every book of the Bible, bore his signature. This postilla would exercise enormous influence on contemporary exegetes (such as Bonaventure and his fellow Dominicans Albert the Great and St. Thomas Aquinas). Hugh and his collaborators also produced a Correctorium Bibliae in which alternative readings of the Vulgate were provided in an attempt to establish an authoritative text.

Hugh’s fellow Dominican Thomas Aquinas is renowned as the author of the Summa Theologiae and as the scholastic theologian whose work was declared normative by Pope Leo XIII in 1879. Less well known is that, as part of his duties, first at Cologne, then later at Paris, he was required to lecture on the Bible. The result was a series of commentaries on Job, the Psalter, the Song of Songs, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Matthew, John, and the Pauline letters. Some of these exist as versions edited by Thomas, others in student lecture-notes (reportationes), while others still (like the commentary on the Canticum) have been lost. Thomas also produced, at the behest of Pope Urban IV, a continuous gloss on all four Gospels. This Catena Aurea (Golden Chain) of mostly patristic excerpts, including an extraordinary number of Greek ones, had influence on commentaries on the Gospels down to the nineteenth century, when it was edited by Cardinal Newman (1801–90), though it had its greatest impact in the Middle Ages. One of its warmest admirers would be Erasmus.

Although he commented extensively on the Bible, it was probably in the area of theory or hermeneutics that Thomas exercised the more profound influence. Thomas heightened the emphasis, begun among the twelfth-century Victorines, on the primacy of the literal sense. He argued that upon its authority alone could a necessary theological argument be constructed (Summa Theologiae 1.1.10 ad 1um). The literal or first sense is the one intended by the author; like Augustine, Thomas agreed that this literal sense could have more than one meaning. Thomas is also clear that the literal sense could include figurative and poetic language. The spiritual sense is threefold—Thomas accepted the traditional medieval division of allegorical, moral, and anagogical spiritual senses. This threefold spiritual sense is based on the literal and presupposes it. It has to do with those spiritual realities signified by things expressed in the literal sense. Only revelation has this property, since the author of holy Scripture is God, who intends this threefold spiritual sense to be expressed by the literal sense and apprehended by the reader. In short, the literal sense for Thomas is the meaning communicated by the words; the spiritual sense is the meaning conveyed by the things (res) to which the literal words refer (see Quodlibetales 7.16.4).

In a real sense, Thomas's insistence on the primacy of the literal sense and his clear definition of it were applied to the entire Bible by a late-medieval exegete whom many have compared, for the breadth of his work, with Jerome. Whatever the merit of that analogy, the Franciscan Nicholas of Lyra (d. 1349) is without question the dominant biblical exegete of the Late Middle Ages (1300–1500); his Literal Postill on the Whole Bible is one of the most impressive works of biblical scholarship in ecclesiastical history.

After taking the Franciscan habit in 1300 and studying theology in Paris, Nicholas (Lyra) became Regent Master in Theology there in 1309. In 1322, after having been elected, three years earlier as minister of the Province of Paris, he began his Literal Postill, which he finished in about a decade. From 1333 to 1339, he wrote his Moral Commentary on the Whole Bible, a shorter commentary that emphasized the moral and mystical meanings of the text. This was intended as a practical handbook for preachers and teachers. Unlike the postills written under the name of Hugh of St. Cher, these were all composed by Nicholas himself. The Postilla was the first biblical commentary to be printed (Rome, 1471–72).

Unlike most contemporary Christian exegetes, Lyra was able to read at least some Hebrew, and he knew the Talmud, the Midrash, and the works of Rashi, who influenced him deeply. Lyra's great hermeneutical innovation was his teaching on the "double literal sense" (duplex sensus literalis), which held that citations from the Hebrew Scriptures found in the New Testament had two literal meanings. The first and more perfect meaning referred to Christ, the second and less perfect to pre-Christian history.

Lyra's influence was enormous. More than 200 manuscripts of his Postilla Literalis exist. Since the late fifteenth century, it has been printed 176 times. It ranks, along with the Glossa Ordinaria, the Sentences of Peter Lombard, and Thomas's Summa, as one of the most influential theological works of the Middle Ages. Moreover, some of his commentaries are known to have influenced Luther, at least indirectly, an influence immortalized, with pardonable exaggeration, in a famous early modern couplet: Si Lyra non lyrasset / Lutherus non saltasset (“Had Lyra not lyred, Luther would not have danced”). Whatever the degree of his influence on Luther, Lyra did share with the reformer a revulsion for what he took to be the over-allegorization of the Bible and an emphasis on the plain, clear sense of the biblical text, an exegetical emphasis which has caused him to be known as “the clear and plain doctor.”

Looking back over a millennium of the use of the Bible in medieval Catholic history, any historian is hindered by the length of the era and the complex use of the Bible from easily summarizing the main developments of the period. Nonetheless, there are certain elements of the use of the Bible, and certain trends in how and in what contexts it was interpreted, that deserve to be underscored. First of all, from the Early to the High Middle Ages, biblical scholarship became more professionalized. Fewer and fewer Benedictine monks ranked among great biblical scholars (with the exception of the great Rupert of Deutz, almost none in the twelfth century and following). Biblical scholarship moved from cloister to the schools and universities and their classrooms. It thus becomes less exclusively oriented to prayer and spiritual experience. Dominance of the field passed from the Benedictines to the new school and secular university masters, first at Laon and Paris, and then to Dominicans and Franciscan friars at the University of Paris. With this development, emphasis is placed on glossing the entire Bible, often carried out in “teams.” (In the Late Middle Ages, we witness the reemergence of the virtuoso solo performer—Nicholas of Lyra being the primary example—who himself comments upon the entire Bible.) At the same time, a whole host of aids to Bible study were produced. These included histories of the biblical world and its geography, verbal concordances, and editions of the Bible with chapters.

In terms of hermeneutics, there was an increasing emphasis, beginning in the twelfth century, on the literal and historical sense of Scripture, an emphasis reflected in many commentaries in the High and Late Middle Ages. With the absorption of Aristotle in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the nature of each sense, and specifically how the literal is distinguished from the spiritual, received more precise definition. This hermeneutical project also boosted the ascendancy of the literal sense.

Although Henri de Lubac is surely correct to insist that medieval authors never relinquished the allegorical sense to the extent argued by Smalley—in that it enjoyed something of a renaissance in the Late Middle Ages—it was perhaps in the High- and Late-medieval emphasis on the primacy of the literal sense of Scripture that in principle had the most profound effect on the sixteenth-century reformers, even if, in the application of that principle, they came to radically different exegetical conclusions than their Catholic forerunners. Their efforts to translate the Bible into the vernacular made reflection on the literal sense not just desirable but imperative.

The Early Modern Period (ca. 1500–1650)

Dominating the early medieval period and contemporaneous with the reformer Martin Luther is the outstanding biblical humanist Erasmus (d. 1536). In Erasmus, we see the union of superior classical learning, the desire to reform the Church by learning, and excellent biblical scholarship. His greatest contribution to the use of the Bible was his publication of the first Greek critical edition in 1516. This was a two-columned work, which contained not only the Greek New Testament but Erasmus's own Latin translation of the Greek (which corrected many perceived errors of Jerome), as well as extensive annotations at the back of the edition. For the Greek edition, Erasmus used five manuscripts he had discovered in Basel, relying especially on two of them. In later editions, his Latin translation became more and more different from Jerome's. Some of his changes, which he thought reflected the sense of the Greek more precisely, were to undermine key Catholic dogma, especially sacramental claims. For example, where Jerome translated Matthew 4:17 "poenitentiam agite" (do penance), Erasmus translated it simply as "repent." This seemed to subvert the biblical foundation for the sacrament of penance. Other translations would seem to undermine other key elements of Catholic doctrine, including aspects of Mariology. Luther would make use of the 1519 edition of Erasmus's edition of the New Testament for his German translation (1522), as Tyndale would for his English version (1525). It would also serve, indirectly, as the basis for the King James version (1611) and the Textus Receptus (1633). Hundreds of commentators, well into the seventeenth century, would use his edition as well.

Erasmus also wrote a Paraphrase on Romans, published at virtually the same time (1517) Luther arrived at his own revolutionary understanding of that book. For the next seven years, Erasmus wrote paraphrases of every other book of the New Testament, save the Apocalypse. These would have special influence on the Swiss reformers. In 1547 they were placed in every parish in England and in the library of every aspiring divine. Together with the enormous influence of his edition, they easily made Erasmus the most influential Catholic biblical scholar of the early sixteenth century.

One of Luther's great theological opponents, Thomas de Vio, Cardinal Cajetan (1469–1534), certainly agreed with the Reformer and with Erasmus that reliable exegesis depended on the availability of good Hebrew and Greek texts. Although Cajetan is probably best known for his anti-Lutheran polemics and as a great admirer of Thomas Aquinas (his is the commentary on the Angelic Doctor that appears in the authoritative Leonine edition of Thomas's works), he was also an accomplished exegete. Indeed, shortly after engaging in examinations of Luther's writings, he began dedicating himself to biblical translation and interpretation, producing, finally, commentaries on the Pentateuch, the historical books of the Hebrew Bible, Job, Sirach/Ecclesiasticus, the Gospels, and the Epistles. Similarly, Jacopo Sadoletto, while known primarily as an opponent of Calvin, was an accomplished humanist and one who also dedicated much of his life to biblical interpretation. He produced commentaries on Paul, the Gospels, and Acts. In the middle of the sixteenth century Isidorus Clarius (d. 1555) produced a revision of the Vulgate New Testament on the basis of his translation from the Greek.

The status and the authority of the Vulgate was one of the issues taken up at the Council of Trent (1545–63). At the council, it was decreed that the Vulgate was authoritative for dogma. The reason for making it so was explicitly not its proximity to the original sense of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures but, rather, that it had been normatively so used for a millennium. Against the notion that any individual could interpret the Scripture, Trent explicitly declared:

No one, relying on his own skill, shall, in matters of faith and of morals pertaining to the edification of the structure of Christian doctrine, wresting the sacred Scripture to his own senses, presume to interpret the said sacred Scripture contrary to that sense which holy mother church, whose it is to judge the true sense and interpretation of the holy Scriptures, has held and does hold.

This is in effect a reassertion of the ancient authoritative principle found in the writings of Irenaeus. Reacting against the reformed emphasis on “scripture alone” (sola scriptura), Trent defined both Scripture and tradition as sources of revelation to be received pari affectu—that is, with the same reverence. This phrasing leaves it ambiguous whether the Scriptures, presumed of course to have a divine author, were a higher and more authoritative form of revelation than the writings included under the rubric “tradition.”

Trent is thus largely conservative and backward-looking in its main dogmatic decrees on Scripture and interpretation. But not all Catholics in the sixteenth century were looking backward. The Catholic exegete in the sixteenth century who most anticipated modern interpretive concerns was undoubtedly Sixtus of Siena (Senensis) (d. 1569). A convert from Judaism, Sixtus brilliantly postulated, in a guide to the Bible titled Bibliotheca Sancta, that the Psalter had multiple authors and in other ways foreshadowed the insights of modern biblical criticism.

Still, it must be conceded that Sixtus was something of an exception. While much Catholic exegesis was absorbed in polemic with Reformed exegetes, it still shared premodern assumptions with them. Both Protestant and Catholic exegetes, however radically they differed in their dogmatic interpretation of Scriptures, shared certain crucial assumptions. Both agreed that the Scriptures were inerrant; that they were inspired; that they were heaven-sent; that revelation did not change or develop and, above all, that the Scriptures were not influenced by the cultural or historical matrices in which they were produced. At the end of the period, however, Catholic exegesis began to point to developments that would revolutionize our understanding of the original meaning of the Scriptures.

The Emergence and Development of Modern Catholic Biblical Criticism (1650–1943)

Probably no Catholic exegete so anticipated the discoveries of modern Catholic biblical criticism more than Richard Simon (1638–1712). Originally a member of the French Congregation of the Oratory, Simon—like many Europeans writing under the influence of rationalistic or empirical movements and scientific discoveries, which would revolutionize Western thought in the Enlightenment—published a pathbreaking three-volume book, Historical Criticism of the Old Testament (1678). Simon was an immensely learned man; he knew rabbinic as well as patristic literature, and he was an accomplished patrologist. Among other things, he denied that the Pentateuch had been authored only by Moses; in fact, he maintained that Moses kept some sort of notes or annals, which were later worked up by another author. Simon also argued that oral traditions usually precede their codification in written form—a crucial insight all but ignored then. Eleven years later, he followed up this daring study with a similarly bold examination of the New Testament. For these studies he paid a dear price as he felt he had to leave the Congregation on the publication of his first book. In addition, his books were condemned by the Parliament of Paris; others of his writings were later attacked by no less a figure than Louis XIV, and Jacques-Benigne Bossuet (1627–1704) was among his fiercest critics. In 1682, Simon's study of the Old Testament was placed on the Index of Prohibited Books, owing to the influence of Bossuet and his former Congregation. In spite of all this negativity, the book was translated into English that same year and later into German. A copy of it was eventually discovered in the library of Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834), who has often been referred to as the father of modern Protestant theology.

Simon's work was perfectly illustrative of the ways in which historical criticism would threaten cherished, historically dogmatic assumptions, and its condemnation an augury of how the new criticism would be received in ecclesiastical circles. For nearly two centuries after the death of Simon, Catholic biblical scholarship felt content to ignore Simon's insights. These were centuries of desiccation and dreariness practically unprecedented in Catholic biblical scholarship. Even when Julius Wellhausen (1844–1916) masterfully set out his documentary theory, many Catholic exegetes remained in a state of siege, rejecting the theory because of the rationalistic and empirical assumptions that underlay it.

In this gloomy context, the Dominican M.-J. Lagrange (1855–1938) stands out as a shining example of exegetical vigor and enlightenment. In 1890 Lagrange established the École Biblique in Jerusalem in order to encourage analysis of the Word of God with the assistance of the historical-critical method. Two years later, he founded the first important journal in Catholic biblical studies, Revue biblique. At a Catholic conference in Fribourg in 1897, he urged his fellow Catholic biblical scholars to take the Pentateuchal criticism more seriously than they had heretofore. On this question, he felt, the historical evidence had to trump the literary tradition. In 1902 he started an important series of biblical commentaries titled Études bibliques. His Historical Criticism and the Old Testament (1905) championed the use of the historical method. In all of these endeavors, Lagrange strove to demonstrate that the historical-critical method was not necessarily destructive of immutable truth of the Catholic faith. In addition, he did pioneering work on the study of biblical genres and forms.

Not surprisingly, Lagrange failed to convince everyone that the historical-critical enterprise was compatible with the maintenance of historic dogma, and he did not emerge unscathed. After a warning from the Sacred Congregation, he turned his attention to the New Testament. Meanwhile, Pius X established the Pontifical Biblical Institute as a rival to the École, and he removed Lagrange from his position there. Nonetheless, Lagrange's legacy certainly lives on, not least of all in the continuing vitality of Catholic biblical study at the École Biblique.

Shortly after Lagrange founded the École Biblique, Pope Leo XIII, who had seemed once to express the opinion that the higher criticism and Catholic dogma were compatible, issued (in 1893) the encyclical Providentissimus Deus ("The God of all Providence," usually referred to as "On the Study of Holy Scripture," from its subtitle), which left a very different impression. In that encyclical, Leo demanded that the Vulgate version be used, although he allowed that other versions ought not to be neglected. He also argued that a biblical text could not contradict the sense given it by the magisterium or by the unanimous consent of the fathers, and no exegete was allowed to interpret the text so as to contradict Church dogma.

No Catholic interpreter of Scripture in the twentieth century ran so directly against the grain of this idea than the French biblical critic and "Modernist" Alfred Loisy (1857–1940). Loisy was a talented philologist and interpreter who taught Scripture at the Institut Catholique in Paris from 1884 to 1893. He fully accepted the methods, insights, and implications of the historical-critical method. In 1902 he wrote his classic book, The Gospel and the Church. In it, he concluded that many New Testament texts were ahistorical and were, in fact, produced by the early church. He dismissed the typological method and denied that the church developed in a way that Jesus could have foreseen. In later works, he sharply distinguished between the Jesus recoverable by historical method and the Christ known by faith, and argued that Jesus was unconscious of his divinity.

By the time Loisy had published these works, he had been dismissed from the Catholic Institute. More severe retribution was to follow. In 1907 his “errors” were condemned by the Holy Office in its encyclical Lamentabili. In the following year, Pius X issued the decree Pascendi dominici gregis, which condemned sixty-five “Modernist” propositions. Many of these were from Loisy’s work on the New Testament (or were epitomes, more or less tendentious, of his positions). Pascendi denied that the authority of the Church was incompetent to judge the meaning of Scripture; that the exegete could or should ignore the supernatural origin of the Bible; and that the Scriptures contained error. Classically, it denied the proposition that:

No chapter of scripture from the beginning of Genesis to the end of Revelation contains a teaching absolutely identical with that which the Church sets forth on the same subject; and consequently no chapter of scripture has the same meaning for the critic as for the theologian. (Proposition 61)

Not surprisingly, Loisy was excommunicated.

The Coming of Age of Catholic Biblical Scholarship (1943–2000)

Catholic biblical scholarship, which in some sense had been plunged into a dark age with these papal pronouncements, was reliberated in 1943 to do its work by another papal encyclical, Pope Pius XII’s Divino Afflante Spiritu (“Inspired by the Holy Spirit”). Issued on the fiftieth anniversary of Providentissimus Deus, it announced its intentions to “ratify” what had been “wisely laid down” by Leo XIII. In fact, it reverses or radically recasts much of what he had to say. Where, for example, Leo had designated the Vulgate the authoritative text, Pius commanded scholars to translate and explain the original Hebrew and Greek texts. Much emphasis was laid upon determining the literary form the human author employed. Pius also encouraged scholars, as Leo emphatically did not, to examine the original intention and circumstances of the authors of Scripture and thus to understand the context in which they wrote. Remarkably, Pius also encouraged scholars to harmonize their conclusions with those of the profane sciences.

Even at the time, Catholic scholars recognized that Divino Afflante Spiritu had opened up a new epoch in the Catholic interpretation of the Bible, and its publication was hailed by the editors of Revue biblique. For that reason, Pius XII has been lionized by scholars as a grand patron of Catholic biblical studies. It was his pontificate that marked an about-face in Catholic attitudes toward the Bible in the twentieth century. Indeed, so sensible an authority as Raymond Brown once observed that Divino Afflante represented the Catholic Magna Carta for progress in biblical study.

Nonetheless, a renewed atmosphere of chill prevailed in Rome in the wake of Pius's death in 1958, as several professors were removed from their teaching office at the Pontifical Biblical Institute due to displeasure with their historical conclusions. They were restored to their positions, however, under John XXIII and Paul VI, as the warming winds of aggiornamento (modernization) swept through Rome during the Second Vatican Council. The council's dogmatic constitution on revelation (Dei Verbum, November 18, 1965) takes a largely positive, if cautious, attitude (reflective of the fact that it went through multiple revisions and had to reflect diplomatic compromise) toward the program laid out by Pius XII.

The efflorescence of Catholic biblical scholarship in the fifty years since the council is so great as to defeat any attempt to summarize it easily. Still, a number of crucial developments may be noted. First of all, since the council, Protestant and Catholic interpretations of the Scriptures have been methodologically indistinguishable. Roman Catholic scholarship has accepted modern biblical criticism. Having accepted modern approaches, Roman Catholics have now produced some of the most accomplished biblical scholars in the world. As the center of gravity in biblical scholarship has shifted from the European Continent to North America, and as an increasing number of women have entered the academy since the council, the number of outstanding Catholic women biblical scholars who have trained or who teach in the United States has soared. Adela Yarbro Collins, Margaret Mitchell, Carolyn Osiek, Pheme Perkins, and Elizabeth Schüssler-Fiorenza, to mention only a few, all have made signal contributions to the field and are recognized worldwide. Their male counterparts—among others, R. E. Brown, J. Collins, J. Donahue, J. Fitzmeyer, D. Harrington, J. Meier, D. Senior—rank at the top of their respective fields internationally and belong to, and in many cases have led, the most important international societies of biblical studies (e.g., Society of Biblical Literature and Society for New Testament Studies [SNTS]). In addition, copious new approaches—literary-critical, liberation, feminist, structural, rhetorical, social-scientific—have given us novel insight into the original meaning of the Scriptures and the communities to which they were addressed. Furthermore, as Ronald Witherup has pointed out, partly as a result of the application of these new approaches, translators have become more sensitive to the issues of human dignity and the language of the Bible (see “Biblical Translation and Pastoral Interpretation,” RG 88). As a consequence, great strides have been made in utilizing “inclusive language” toward communities, like women and the handicapped for example, who may once have felt excluded by patriarchal or otherwise insensitive locutions. Finally, as Daniel Harrington has noted in “The Bible in Catholic Life” (RG 19), there have been myriad changes in the use of the Bible in the Catholic Church and in educational institutions, including seminaries, since the 1950s. Where scripture studies were once seen as subordinate to dogmatics, they are now viewed as critical to the training of those who will preach and teach from them; courses in Old and New Testament are now often among the most popular in Catholic seminaries and other institutions of higher learning. Since the Second Vatican Council, prayers revised for liturgy have been saturated with biblical language and imagery. Catholic dialogue with Jewish communities and ecumenical discussions with non-Catholic Christians have often centered on the study of the Bible. Magisterial pronouncements likewise are deeply grounded in biblical reflection.

As Father Harrington has observed in his article, that scholars of Scripture and of theology have been, in recent decades, ever more deeply involved in conversation, with intriguing results, on the issue of how to bring the truth claims of their disciplines into relationship with one another. It is certainly nowhere assumed in Catholic studies that historical study and faith based on revelation are perforce opposed or irreconcilable. Pope Benedict XVI’s Verbum Dei (2010), insisted (as Ronald Witherup points out) that the tradition of prayerful and spiritual meditation upon the Scriptures has always attempted to balance historical insight with the theological, spiritual, and ethical nourishment it supplies. The Church has always read the Bible first of all for the pastoral and religious benefit it gives its readers. For Benedict as for most readers in the Catholic tradition, historical data have been harnessed for the growth in faith and hope in God. No historical discovery is likely to alter the relative emphasis of reason and faith, history and revelation in the Catholic interpretation of the Bible.

Taking the long view of two thousand years of Catholic interpretation of the Scriptures, one is awed by the immense diversity in interpretive approaches, impressive array of exegetical results, volume of commentary, and continuing vitality of scriptural interpretation and use. If recent history is any guide, this interpretive verve and exuberance—in secondary and higher education, in base communities and groups focused on biblical prayer, in theological and magisterial teaching—is likely to abide and flourish in the ever-more-rich social, historical, and cultural contexts in which the Bible is read, prayed with, and profited from in the worldwide Church.

BIBLICAL TRANSLATION AND PASTORAL INTERPRETATION

RONALD D. WITHERUP, S.S.

In 2012, the fiftieth anniversary of Vatican Council II (1962–65) has given Catholics a chance to review where we have come from and where need to go with regard to the use of the Bible in Catholic life. In particular, the golden anniversary of the seminal conciliar text Dei Verbum, the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (November 18, 1965) fostered deep reflection on the ongoing need for biblical translations and the impact they can have on the pastoral life of the Church.

For the average person in the pew, the need for new biblical translations can be bewildering. “Why do we need new translations?” or “What translation is the best one?” are common questions. The fact is that the task of biblical translation is quite complicated. There is no one biblical translation, which is the best and serves all purposes equally. The translation used in this study Bible is the New American Bible (NABRE), and special attention will be given to it. But first, one should have a general overview of the challenges posed by translating the Bible into modern English.

Presuppositions

The need for biblical translation should be self-evident. The Bible has come down to us in ancient Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek, languages that few but scholars can use today. The Bible itself witnesses to the necessity of translation. After the Babylonian exile (sixth century BC), when the Jews dispersed throughout the ancient world and began to lose command of their native Hebrew tongue, the need arose to produce a translation of their Hebrew Bible into the vernacular of the empire, which at the time was Greek. Thus was produced in the second century BC one of the great translations of all time, the Septuagint (LXX), which had a major influence on the writers of the New Testament. Without translation, many of the traditions of Israel may have been lost over time, as the Jewish people struggled to retain their identity in the midst of the multiple influences of the Greco-Roman world.

No translation is perfect, however. Scholars frequently quote the adage that every translation is an interpretation. There is no such thing as a purely objective translation, yet there are some guiding presuppositions that modern translators acknowledge. The following list is foundational:

1. Language is a living reality. By nature it changes with usage and experience. No translation stands forever. The following quotation from Ronald Knox, one of the great translators of the Bible into English, affirms that

Words are living things, full of shades of meaning, full of associations; and, what is more, they are apt to change their significance from one generation to the next. The translator who understands his job feels, constantly, like Alice in Wonderland trying to play croquet with flamingoes for mallets and hedgehogs for balls; words are for ever eluding his grasp. (The Trials of a Translator [New York: Sheed and Ward, 1949], 13)

Because living languages change, translations—even of ancient texts—must take this growth into account.

2. The task of translating from one language to another involves primarily two interrelated values: (a) preserving faithfully the meaning of the original text, and (b) enunciating the original text in clearly understood terms of the receptor language. Generally, the one cannot take absolute precedence over the other because this can lead to distorted translation. A literal translation could, for instance, lead to a total misreading of the original text because the words were translated but not the meaning. Fidelity to the original might well require a less literal translation in the receptor language. One must also consider the range of meaning of words in both the original and receptor languages.

A related value in the task of translation is the need to preserve in the receptor language as much as possible the form and structure of the original. Poetic and narrative forms are quite different, for example, and require separate attention. Literary form and genre is as important for translation as the actual words. Some might approach this task more loosely than others, since every language employs unique formal conventions that may or may not appear in other languages. Hebrew, for instance, has certain tendencies for repetition and simple, staccato expressions, which when translated literally into English can seem stilted. The careful translator attempts to bridge this gap in a way that respects the linguistic uniqueness of both languages.

3. In the recent past there has been a tendency to bifurcate the task of translation into two categories: (a) formal equivalence (word-for-word), and (b) dynamic equivalence (thought-for-thought). The first is the more literal style of translation in which each word is produced as nearly as possible to preserve the sense and the form of the original. The second approach translates more fluidly, not by replicating words and form but by conveying the meaning of the original in the proper form of the receptor language (i.e., thought-for-thought rather than word-for-word). A third category not included in this twofold division is commonly called a “paraphrase.” This is not a translation as such but a total rephrasing of the text. It is strongly interpretive.

Recent translation theory has recognized that this duality can be misleading. Instead, translation is better viewed as a continuum ranging from a formal, one-to-one literal translation on one end to a totally free form translation or paraphrase on the other, with a range of options in between. This continuum allows for more diverse approaches to biblical translation, which are in fact seen in the wide variety of English translations currently available. It also recognizes that the complexity of biblical translation requires more than a choice between two mutually exclusive opposites.

4. Every translation involves some interpretative moves, even if the goal is to capture as accurately as possible the original intention of the author of the text. If this principle is acknowledged, then it must be seen that not even a literal word-for-word translation constitutes the same reality as the source text. Eugene A. Nida, a notable Bible translator, indicates that translation always involves three realities: (a) loss of information, (b) addition of information, and (c) alteration of information (“Principles of Translation as Exemplified by Bible Translating,” in On Translation [Reuben A. Brower, ed.; NY: Oxford University, 1966], 13). Words in any given language have a multiplicity of meanings and shades of nuance that do not permit one-to-one correspondence into other languages. Thus, fidelity to a biblical text does not necessarily involve an overly literal approach. This is particularly true of idioms. By their very nature idioms cannot generally be translated in literal fashion but must be compared to an appropriate, corresponding idiom in the receptor language.

The Pontifical Biblical Commission, an international body of professional consultants who provide expert advice to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in Rome, reinforces this point:

The literal sense is not to be confused with the “literalist” sense to which fundamentalists are attached. It is not sufficient to translate a text word for word in order to obtain its literal sense. One must understand the text according to the literary conventions of the time. When a text is metaphorical, its literal sense is not that which flows immediately from a word to word translation (e.g., “Let your loins be girt”: Lk 12:35), but that which corresponds to the metaphorical use of these terms (“Be ready for action”). (The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church [Boston: St. Paul Books & Media, 1993], 82)

5. Translation must also take into account the influence of culture. This is a controversial point. Some believe that only a literal, word-for-word translation is authentic to the original text. This position, however, denies that the value of all translation is to communicate faithfully the sense of the text in other cultures and contexts. If fidelity to the original text is always viewed as the ultimate value, serious mistranslation can occur. One need only ask the experience of expert Bible translators who have undertaken the task of translating biblical texts for very foreign cultures (African, Asian, indigenous peoples, etc.) to know how serious this challenge is. For example, one cannot utilize properly the biblical image of sheep and goats and shepherds in a culture that has experience only of cattle, as in the case of some African tribes. The culture(s) represented in the biblical text are not the only ones that must be respected if the Word of God is to be communicated in modern contexts.

Again, the Pontifical Biblical Commission emphasized this point:

A translation, of course, is always more than a simple transcription of the original text. The passage from one language to another necessarily involves a change of cultural context: concepts are not identical and symbols have a different meaning, for they come up against other traditions of thought and other ways of life. (The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church, 122)

Similarly, Pope John Paul II, in an Italian address to the United Bible Societies (November 26, 2001), spoke of a threefold requirement for translators:

A good translation is based on the three pillars that must contemporaneously support the entire work. First, there must be a deep knowledge of the language and the cultural world at the point of origin. Next, there must be a good familiarity with the language and cultural context at the point where the work will arrive. Lastly, to crown the work with success, there must be an adequate mastery of the contents and meaning of what one is translating.

Taking into account these five presuppositions helps to see the complexity of the translation process. It also implies that the act of translation is as much an art as it is a science. Balancing the different factors and remaining true to both the original and receptor languages and cultures is an enormous challenge.

Multiple Translations

The availability of so many modern English translations can be confusing to people. There are dozens of English translations of the Bible. How does one choose? There are, in fact, different goals for different translations. Some are intentionally directed to a specific denominational audience, be it Catholic, mainstream Protestant, evangelical, Orthodox, or fundamentalist. Some are intended for private study, others for public reading or worship services. Many modern English translations are available in Catholic editions; they purposefully include the Old Testament apocrypha, which are often excluded from Protestant editions of the Bible.

Translation	Date	Brief Description	Sample Text: Ps 86:14
New American Bible (NABRE)	2011	The basic American Catholic translation intended for study, prayer, and use in liturgy, thoroughly revised between 2001 and 2010; uses modern American English with an attempt to balance literal and thought-for-thought translation suitable for oral proclamation as well as private reading	O God, the arrogant have risen against me; a ruthless band has sought my life; to you they pay no heed.
New Revised Standard Version (NRSV)	1989	Based upon the classic Revised Standard Version (RSV), which remains a good literal translation, but with sensitivity to inclusive language; uses modern idiomatic English intended for a broad appeal	O God, the insolent rise up against me; a band of ruffians seeks my life, and they do not set you before them.
New International Version (NIV)	2011	An updated revision of the 1984 New International Version intended for broad ecumenical appeal; attempts a balance between literal and thought-for-thought translation, and aims to be “gender-accurate”	Arrogant foes are attacking me, O God; ruthless people are trying to kill me—they have no regard for you.

Now we will take a closer look at some differences of approach among these translations.

Mark 2:1 narrates Jesus's return to his home town. The NAB translates: "When Jesus returned to Capernaum after some days, it became known that he was at home." The highlighted phrase literally reads "in (the) house" (e.g., NJB), but most translations use the expression "at home" (RSV, NRSV, NIV). The 1996 NLT provides a much freer translation: "Several days later Jesus returned to Capernaum, and the news of his arrival spread quickly through the town."

The Greek text of Mark 2:19 uses an expression that is an obvious Hebraism, namely, "sons of the wedding hall." Virtually all translations recognize that this is an idiom that cannot be accurately translated in literal fashion. There is a divergence in the terms that are used, however. Some use "wedding guests" (RSV, NRSV, NABRE, RSV, NLT, NET) while others use "the bridegroom's attendants" (e.g., NJB).

More serious issues arise when the text is somewhat ambiguous. Hebrews 12:2 provides an example. Many translations follow the RSV: "looking to Jesus the pioneer and perfecter of our faith . . .," assuming that the text refers to the faith of believers (e.g., NRSV, NJB, NET). However, the context indicates that Jesus's faith is most likely the object of attention in the text; the modifier "our" is not found in the Greek text. Thus the NAB translation preserves the ambiguity of the text: "keeping our eyes fixed on Jesus, the leader and perfecter of faith." It is left to the reader to decide whether our faith or Jesus's faith is intended. The 1996 NLT again takes greater liberties in its rendering of the passage: "We do this by keeping our eyes on Jesus, on whom our faith depends from start to finish." Such a translation is probably overly interpretive and exceeds the import of the text considerably.

At times a more literal translation whose meaning is obscure is best left literally, even when it is universally recognized as a saying whose meaning is not intended to be taken literally. An example is found in Romans: "if your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he is thirsty, give him something to drink; for by so doing you will heap burning coals upon his head" (Rom 12:20 NABRE; cf. RSV, NRSV, NJB, NET). The saying is a proverb from the Old Testament (Prv 25:21–22), the exact meaning of which has been debated through history. The text is not likely meant to be taken literally to pour live coals on someone's head. Rather, it appears to be an expression of bringing shame or humiliation to one's enemy by paradoxically providing a kindness.

This is the way the 1996 NLT takes the passage, which it loosely renders: "Instead, do what the Scriptures say: 'If your enemies are hungry, feed them.

If they are thirsty, give them something to drink, and they will be ashamed of what they have done to you.” While this highly interpretive translation may communicate the meaning of the text, this is not self-evident from the passage. Since Patristic times, various interpretations of the passage have been proposed from which one can choose an acceptable option. Thus, the majority of translations retain the reference to burning coals. Footnotes, commentaries, or study Bibles can then offer a variety of interpretations that lie beyond the scope of the translation itself.

Language and Gender

In the late twentieth century, modern English translations had to confront a special translating challenge that became a politically charged issue, namely, the question of “inclusive” or “gender-neutral” language.

Inclusive language means language that includes rather than excludes. Some prefer the term “gender-neutral.” It is usually identified with feminist concerns that traditional English translations of the Bible exhibit a vocabulary that is too patriarchally oriented and excludes the viewpoint of women. Thus, some speak of “gender-inclusive language,” but the concept of inclusive language, as we will see, actually is not restricted to feminist or gender concerns. Yet we must acknowledge that the Bible grew out of a patriarchal culture, one in which men were dominant and women generally secondary. Thus it is not surprising to find a dominant male perspective expressed in biblical texts.

Inclusive language is divided into two categories, “horizontal inclusive language” (i.e., concerned with human beings) or “vertical inclusive language” (i.e., language about God). Bible translators have had to deal with this question directly. The NAB, for instance, has taken the stance that moderate attention to horizontal inclusive language is appropriate for a contemporary English translation. Thus, where possible, the translators avoid using the words “man” or “mankind” where the text is meant to embrace all human beings, because these terms have become increasingly more restrictive in modern English than in previous eras. Also, the literal term “sons of Israel” (an idiomatic Hebrew expression) is translated as “Israelites,” since that is what the term means in most contexts. When the Pauline letters address the audience as “brothers” (Greek adelphoi), the NRSV utilizes the translation “brothers and sisters” (e.g., Rom 1:13; 7:1; 1 Cor 1:10; etc.) because the word clearly applies to the entire community

Paul is addressing. The NABRE recognizes the principle (see footnote for Rom 1:13) but has chosen to stick with the literal translation “brothers” in deference to convention. When the NABRE translation was adapted for use in Roman Catholic lectionary, however, the more inclusive “brothers and sisters” was employed where appropriate.

While the expression “inclusive language” is most frequently tied to feminist sensitivities, it has also been applied to other categories. Some translators, for instance, object to traditional expressions like “the lame” or “the blind” because they overly emphasize the handicap of an individual or class of people rather than their human dignity. They propose alternative translations like “the one who is lame” or “the one whose sight is impaired.” A similar concern has arisen regarding the biblical contrasts between light and darkness (Mt 10:27), day and night (Jn 11:9–10; 1 Thes 5:5), or white and black (Ps 51:9 “whiter than snow”), because such contrasts allegedly denigrate people of color. An even more aggressive position is taken regarding a biblical title like “the Son of Man,” which has Christological significance (e.g., Mk 10:45; Jn 8:28). They translate the phrase “child of the human one,” an odd and clumsy translation that ignores the Christological implications of the title. (See New Testament and Psalms: An Inclusive Language Version [New York: Oxford University Press, 1989].) Most translators view such attempts as excesses that are overly intrusive in the translation process. These are examples of the imbalance of allowing modern cultural concerns to dictate absolutely how to communicate ancient texts. Such instances do not respect the integrity of the biblical text.

The principle of inclusivity has also been applied to biblical language about God (i.e., vertical inclusive language). Some object to the overabundance of masculine terminology for God in the Bible, although it is an understandable outgrowth of a patriarchal culture. They attempt to counteract this by avoiding the masculine pronouns “he” or “him” or by repeating the word “God” frequently or designing other circumlocutions for the Deity. Theologically, since God is a spirit and is neither male nor female, biblical language about God, in fact, has its limitations. As the Catechism of the Catholic Church points out:

We must therefore continually purify our language of everything in it that is limited, image-bound or imperfect, if we are not to confuse our image of God—“the inexpressible, the incomprehensible, the invisible, the ungraspable”—with our human representations. Our human words always fall short of the mystery of God. (#42)

To refer to God as “he” or to call God a rock or a fortress (2 Sm 22:2; Ps 18:3), a shepherd (Pss 23:1; 80:1), and so forth, is to use metaphorical and analogous language to describe how God acts toward people or how we experience God. These are not literal descriptions of God’s identity. There are also feminine images for God in the Bible that should be remembered, and these can provide some counterbalance to the predominance of masculine images (e.g., the image of God as a woman in labor [Is 46:3–4] or as a tender mother [Is 49:15; 66:13]).

Another aspect of inclusive language is the limitation of English when utilizing singular forms of pronouns. Unlike some languages (e.g., French or Spanish), English has a limited form of third-person pronouns. For example, in French the same expression “sa croix” (or Spanish “su cruz”) can mean his or her cross, depending upon who is envisioned as the antecedent. But English requires the use of both modifying pronouns if one wants to apply the expression to men and women alike.

Let’s take a biblical example. Jesus’s saying about the necessity of taking up one’s cross (Mt 10:38) obviously applies to all Jesus’s disciples, male and female. The NABRE translates: “whoever does not take up his cross and follow after me is not worthy of me.” The NRSV tries to make the saying more inclusive by deleting the modifying pronoun: “whoever does not take up the cross and follow me is not worthy of me.” This solution, however, has the unfortunate side effect of making it seem that each disciple is to take up Jesus’s cross rather than his or her own cross. The NLT avoids the problem by transposing the saying into second person: “If you refuse to take up your cross and follow me, you are not worthy of being mine.”

Another example is the translation of Jesus’s famous saying in Matthew 6:24, which also applies to all followers of Jesus: “No one can serve two masters. He will either hate one and love the other, or be devoted to one and despise the other. You cannot serve God and mammon.” The NRSV attempts to solve the more restrictive phrasing by inserting an implied word that is not literally present in the biblical text: “No one can serve two masters; for a slave will either hate the one and love the other, or be devoted to the one and despise the other. You cannot serve God and wealth.” Note in this latter example the difference between the NABRE’s retention of the original word “mammon”—an Aramaic or Hebrew word for “money” or “goods”—and the NRSV’s “wealth,” which presumably is intended to be better understood by a broad audience (cf. “money,” NJB, NIV).

In short, English poses a peculiar problem for inclusivity that can be vexing for translators who wish both to preserve the meaning of the original text and to remain sensitive to modern concerns. While this is not the only contemporary issue of affecting biblical translation theory, it remains one of the more controversial.

Translation and Interpretation

We have read that all translations are essentially an interpretation. Regardless of how objective translators attempt to be, biases exist that can enter into the process. This accounts for the oft-quoted Italian saying attributed to Dante, “Traduttore traditore” (“A translator is a traitor”). Inevitably, in the history of Bible translation there have been many instances of external issues that creep into the translation process.

One example is the tendency at times for translations to make up for perceived or real mistakes in the biblical text. Matthew 1:17 provides an example. The RSV text translates in a fairly literal fashion (see also NABRE, NRSV, NET):

So all the generations from Abraham to David were fourteen generations, and from David to the deportation to Babylon fourteen generations, and from the deportation to Babylon to the Christ fourteen generations.

While the text is clear, anyone with a knowledge of the history of Israel recognizes that Matthew’s genealogy has telescoped that history into an artificial construct and has left out of the list numerous kings and generations. This is for theological reasons. The genealogy is likely based upon a symbolic number (fourteen) that alludes to King David and reinforces Jesus’s background as the Davidic Messiah. The 1996 NLT, noting this deficiency, consequently translates the passage more loosely to rectify the apparent mistake, in a way that glosses over Matthew’s theological intention:

All those listed above include fourteen generations from Abraham to King David, and fourteen from David’s time to the Babylonian exile, and fourteen from the Babylonian exile to the Messiah.

Critical questions arise also when passages of profound Christological significance are considered. A passage in the letter to the Hebrews provides an example, especially because it quotes an Old Testament psalm that it then applies to Jesus Christ. The NABRE sticks with a fairly literal translation of Hebrews 2:6, quoting Psalm 8:5:

Instead, someone has testified somewhere: “What is man that you are mindful of him, or the son of man that you care for him?”

In the context of Hebrews, the text’s use of “the son of man” is meant to evoke the mysterious Christological title that the New Testament associates with Jesus (e.g., Mt 8:20; 9:6, etc.). At issue is not what the original meaning of Psalm 8 was, but what use is made of it by the author of the letter to the Hebrews. The more literal translation preserves the Christological connection. The NRSV translation (also NJB), in an effort to make the passage more inclusive, obscures the meaning of the text and glosses over its Christological significance by use of plural expressions and by substituting “mortals” for “son of man”:

But someone has testified somewhere, “What are human beings that you are mindful of them, or mortals, that you care for them?”

In instances such as this, good translation requires careful attention to the context as well as the words.

Characteristics of the New American Bible Translation

The NABRE, with its completely revised Old Testament, was most recently republished in 2011. Since this translation is the basis for this study Bible, these are some of its characteristics:

1. The NABRE falls in the middle of the continuum mentioned earlier yet leaning toward a more formal translation. It seeks to offer an exact rendering of the biblical text in good, modern American English that is not overly literal. For instance, no attempt is made to duplicate fully the Hebraisms of the Old Testament, although the parallelism of many poetic passages is retained.

2. The NABRE takes into account recent extensive finds in ancient manuscripts, such as the Dead Sea Scrolls, and more current decisions about the various families of manuscripts in existence. Textual critics are always attempting to ascertain the most authentic reading of ancient manuscripts based upon the latest scholarship. This is one reason why new translations are needed on a periodic basis as our knowledge of ancient texts grows.

3. The Old Testament of the NABRE leaves the verse order of the Masoretic text (the authoritative received text of the Hebrew Bible) intact instead of attempting a reorganization based upon scholarly theories of a more original word order.

4. A common flaw in translations can be the unevenness of translating the same word in the original text with a different English word. Unless the meaning is clearly otherwise, the NABRE tries to translate the original terms with the same English equivalent consistently throughout its translation.

5. The NABRE utilizes modest horizontal inclusive language wherever possible and where it would not distort the text. As much as possible, where the text necessarily requires an inclusive reading, such is rendered in the English translation. An exception is in passages where Christological meanings take precedence (e.g., Pss 1:1; 2:7; 8:5; Heb 1:5). The translation does not employ vertical inclusive language.

6. The NABRE takes into account modern American English in its rendering of the biblical text. There is an avoidance of terms that might confuse or offend modern readers, such as “holocaust” (meaning a sacrifice consumed by fire, but which can be confused with the Nazi atrocity of attempting to exterminate the Jews during World War II, “the Holocaust”) and “cereal offerings” (which can be confused with breakfast food rather than “grain” offerings).

7. The exegetical notes, which are essential for clarification and interpretation, have been thoroughly revised in the NABRE Old Testament to bring them more in line with the approach taken in the earlier NABRE New Testament translation.

8. For Catholics, it should be noted that the NABRE is published with full ecclesiastical approval and has followed the required principles for Bible translation that are standard in the Roman Catholic Church. It is thus a reliable and faithful translation useful for both spiritual and scholarly purposes.

Pastoral Interpretation of the Bible

What is the value of a good Bible translation? Since the sacred Scriptures are obviously ancient books, whose meaning is not always clear, the question of why good biblical translations are necessary is a pertinent one. People read the Bible for many different reasons, which is why different types of translation are essential. The Bible can be read for history or for its multiple types of literature. It can be explored for academic study or as a prayer book. For all people of faith the Bible is a source of spiritual enrichment, a divinely inspired set of writings that can provide guidance for daily life.

Saint Paul has a comment in his letter to the Romans, just after citing a passage from the Old Testament, which expresses the pastoral dimension of biblical interpretation well: “For whatever was written previously was written for our instruction, that by endurance and by the encouragement of the scriptures we might have hope” (Rom 15:4). This is not merely a pious sentiment. Paul quotes the Old Testament more than a hundred times, and his letters contain many more biblical allusions. If he sometimes interprets the ancient passages out of context or with a loose application of them to his own day, nevertheless his purpose is clear. The Scriptures are God’s Word: it is not a dead word or an ancient artifact. For believers of all eras, the Bible as the Word of God is a tangible, living Word whose wisdom and power can nourish us today as it did in ancient times. In the passage just cited, Paul speaks of three different aspects of this reality. The Word of God is given for “our instruction.” It provides “encouragement.” It gives us “hope.” In other words, the biblical message was for him, for his audience, and ultimately for us. This is primarily why people of faith always seek new and better ways to understand the Bible. Its meaning is not restricted to one era. The Word speaks to us today, and we seek to understand it on its own terms.

Catholics are fortunate to have a long and venerable tradition about interpreting the Bible and using it pastorally (see “The Bible in Catholic Life,” RG 19, and “Catholic Interpretation of the Bible,” RG 73). Indeed, the Catholic Church is the only Christian denomination to have an official body of teachings, stretching back centuries, which address multiple aspects of translating and interpreting the Bible, such as its inspiration and basic truth, its diverse genres, and the multiple methods of biblical interpretation. We cannot explore this long tradition in its entirety here, but two recent teachings give some crucial guidance.

Dei Verbum (1965)

This is first mentioned at the beginning of this article, the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum). Because it is a dogmatic constitution from an ecumenical council, it holds the highest authority in the Church’s teaching on revelation and Scripture. If we cannot do justice here to the in-depth teaching of this document, we can nonetheless identify five key areas where it has made an impact on a Catholic understanding of the Bible.

- The first concerns its emphasis on the personal nature of revelation. Revelation is a mystery whereby the God of heaven and earth reaches out to communicate personally with human beings. God's Word is foremost experienced in a person, the Word-made-flesh, Jesus Christ, who is both the "mediator" and the fullness of this divine revelation. He is also experienced in the written Word, the Bible. This personalistic emphasis is in marked contrast to earlier emphases in Catholic teaching on the doctrinal or propositional aspects of revelation.

- A second major emphasis is found in its Incarnational perspective. Dei Verbum notes that just as Jesus Christ is both God and human, and the one cannot supplant the other, so the Word of God—the sacred Scriptures—is both divine and human. God is the true "author" of the Bible, but the human writers, who used the language and genres of their time, are also true authors. This mystery is ensured by the Holy Spirit, who works in these human authors so that the essential message of salvation God desires is communicated in ways that people can understand. This understanding, on a pastoral level, is why fundamentalism is unacceptable as a Catholic approach to the Bible. It collapses the human into the divine and ignores the historical and scientific limitations that are sometimes evident in Scripture.

- A third important teaching concerns its affirmation that Scripture and tradition together constitute one source of divine revelation. If this is one of the most critical teachings of the constitution, it is also one of the most difficult to comprehend. The essential is to recognize that, for Catholics, Scripture alone is not sufficient. Tradition, seen in its broadest sense of the Church's long reflection on, liturgical celebration of, and teaching about the Word throughout history, all guided by the Holy Spirit, ensures the truth of the message of the sacred Scriptures. Official Church teaching—the magisterium—is also a faithful guarantor of this truth. Not every Catholic teaching, then, has to be found explicitly in the Bible. Our understanding of revelation deepens over time and reaches new levels of sophistication.

- A fourth teaching touches the delicate question of history in the Bible. Some people are unnerved by the thought that the Bible could contain historical errors, thinking naively that this would then call into question the Bible's status as an inspired book. Dei Verbum addresses this question in two ways. One is an explicit statement:

Since, therefore, all that the inspired authors, or sacred writers, affirm should be regarded as affirmed by the Holy Spirit, we must acknowledge that the books of scripture, firmly, faithfully and without error, teach that truth which God, for the sake of our salvation, wished to see confided to the sacred scriptures. (11)

The highlighted phrase “for the sake of our salvation” is the key. The Scriptures teach “faithfully and without error” what is necessary for our salvation, that is, moral and doctrinal teaching, not historical or scientific. It is also important to note that by using the expression “without error” the council fathers explicitly avoided the term “inerrancy,” which is associated with a fundamentalist perspective incompatible with Catholic teaching.

- A second way in which the constitution nuances its approach to historical questions in the Bible is by its incorporation of a 1964 teaching from the Pontifical Biblical Commission, On the Historical Truth of the Gospels (Sancta Mater Ecclesia). It teaches that there are at least three levels of tradition in the Gospels: (1) the historical Jesus, (2) the apostolic preaching, and (3) the evangelists who authored the four Gospels (Dei Verbum, 19). These three levels in no way mitigate the historical truth of the Gospels, which the constitution affirms several times in the same paragraph. Rather, this three-tiered tradition simply acknowledges the complex process of writing, collecting, editing, and synthesizing the Gospels in the time of the evangelists. Accretions and changes in the Jesus traditions inevitably crept into the Gospels, but they remain in essence faithful narratives about the words and deeds of Jesus of Nazareth. This nuanced teaching was later inserted into the Catechism of the Catholic Church (#126).

- Finally, the fifth major teaching in Dei Verbum calls the Bible a resource for all Christians, not just Catholics. Its ecumenical vision is evident. This was in fact one of the explicit goals of Vatican Council II. The constitution calls for ecumenical translations of the Bible wherever possible, and it also invites all the faithful to use the Bible regularly since it is a faithful resource for teaching, moral instruction, prayer, meditation, and liturgy (see 2 Tm 3:16–17). It calls for the widest possible dissemination of the Word of God among the faithful, something that began to happen almost immediately after the council ended, when Catholic Bible study programs and conferences sprang up.

By any measure, Dei Verbum was a remarkable document whose teaching orients a Catholic approach to the Bible even today. But it was not the final word on the matter, as Catholic teaching continues to evolve, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. After the council, numerous instructions from the Pontifical Biblical Commission continued to appear to flesh out one or another aspect of biblical interpretation. These include instructions on Christology (1984), methods in biblical interpretation (1993), the Jews and their sacred Scriptures (2001), and the Bible and morality (2008), and The Inspiration and Truth of the Scriptures (2014). Regarding the latter text, Pope Benedict XVI had asked the Pontifical Biblical Commission to study this question in more depth in response to the 2008 General Synod on the Scriptures in the Life and Mission of the Church. Once completed, this text will show that Catholic sensitivity to the Word of God has only grown in its appreciation of the power and value of the Word in its many contexts, especially since Vatican II.

Verbum Domini (2010)

In addition to the aforementioned instructions, a second essential document is noteworthy. It quotes from Dei Verbum extensively but is itself a product of a synod of bishops rather than an ecumenical council. Verbum Domini (The Word of the Lord) is an apostolic exhortation proclaimed by Pope Benedict XVI in 2010. It grew out of the fifty-five propositions that the bishops of the Synod on the Word of God (2008) had sent the pope for his consideration. A much longer document than Dei Verbum (Verbum Domini has 124 numbered paragraphs vs. 26 in Dei Verbum), it is nonetheless not difficult to read and is rather poetic. Although it has different emphases from Dei Verbum, it builds upon the dogmatic constitutions primary insights. Five stand out.

- First, like Dei Verbum, it emphasizes Scripture as a divine communication. The Scriptures, written in human language but containing a divine message, are a means of personal communication. God reaches out to humanity through this sacred Word. God's desire is to invite humanity into relationship, and the Word, which is first and foremost a person—the Word-made-flesh, Jesus Christ—touches our hearts as well as our minds.

- A second emphasis is the necessity both to study and pray the sacred Scriptures. Verbum Domini explicitly seeks to balance historical-critical studies with those oriented more toward the spiritual and theological message of Scripture. Catholics do not read the Bible only for its historical or literary value but also for the spiritual nourishment it offers. Yet we cannot ignore the historical, scientific, and literary questions that arise from biblical interpretation. Even the early church fathers, whose exegesis is praised by this document, studied the scriptures in depth in order to arrive at their spiritual insights.

- A third teaching concerns the renewal of lectio divina. Verbum Domini emphasizes the value of this ancient practice of prayerful meditation upon the Scriptures (86–87). No one method of lectio is adopted, but the important point is to read the Scriptures and reflect on them in a prayerful manner. This practice is useful to laity and preachers alike in order to understand better the Word of God.

- A fourth point from Verbum Domini is its pastoral tone, so evident also in Dei Verbum. The pope calls on Catholics to have a Bible in their home and to read it (85). He also notes the value of the Bible in all sorts of pastoral activities and contexts (72–85), even though a certain priority is given to the context of liturgy and the sacraments (52–55). It also calls for more practical dialogue between theologians, biblical scholars, and pastors so that the Bible can be implemented concretely in pastoral life (45). All this points to a pastoral understanding of the role of the Word of God that has rich implications for all engaged in pastoral ministry and for the lay faithful in general.

- Finally, Verbum Domini takes a refreshing stance toward open-ended questions about the Bible, about inspiration, about the complex interrelationship between Scripture and tradition, and the like. The document calls for further study of technical questions not yet fully explored, but also invites consideration of a “Directory for Homiletics” to help equip preachers better to proclaim God’s Word (60), and for pastoral centers to promote good formation in biblical studies for catechists, exegetes, and pastoral ministers (75).

These two recent Church documents, then, show the dynamism of a Catholic approach to the Bible, which is eminently pastoral. One might ask, is there a pastoral “payoff” for the average Catholic?

These modern developments should not overshadow the fact that the Catholic Church has always used the sacred Scriptures pastorally from the earliest days, as the earlier quotation from Romans 15:4 indicates. The Bible as the inspired Word of God has always brought insight, spiritual nourishment, and hope to people in need in every generation. If interpretations of a given passage can change, or can be applied in different ways over time, this simply reinforces the living nature of the Word of God.

It is forever able to create anew and to be applied and adapted to new situations unforeseen in bygone eras. That is why we still read, study, and pray the Scriptures today. It is also why preachers of the Word—bishops, priests, and deacons—and those who teach it in catechism classes and the like, also have an obligation to plumb its depths. The United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, for example, has urged priests and deacons to turn to the Scriptures as the source and inspiration of preaching. (See “Preaching the Mystery of Faith: The Sunday Homily” USCCB, [www.USCCB.org: Washington, DC, 2013], and in his pastoral exhortation “The Joy of the Gospel,” Pope Francis devotes considerable attention to the Scriptures and preaching; see sections 68–88.) To open our ears, minds, and hearts to the Word of God is to open ourselves to God’s mysterious outreach to humanity.

An image from the Old Testament comes to mind in this regard. In the book of Isaiah we find one of the few biblical passages that literally describes the power of the Word of God. The prophet, whom we call Deutero-Isaiah, dates from the time of the Exile and proclaims God’s Word thus:

Just as from the heavens the rain and snow come down and do not return there till they have watered the earth, making it fertile and fruitful, giving seed to the one who sows and bread to the one who eats, so shall my word be that goes forth from my mouth; it shall not return to me empty, but shall do what pleases me, achieving the end for which I sent it. (Is 55:10–11)

God speaks through this prophet of the efficacy of the divine Word. It will accomplish all that is intended. It will replenish the earth, bringing forth new life. These words, which must have seemed unbelievable to those who first heard them, brought hope and promise of restoration to the exiles. Like a desert receiving the waters from winter and spring melting, so does the Word of God bring life again, and again, and again.

This is why we read Scripture today. This is why we take the time and energy to read, pray, and study the sacred writ. People of faith have always believed in the efficacy of God’s Word, even if sometimes it does not come true in exactly the way we intend. This is the pastoral value of the Word. This is also why the most essential task is not simply to read about the Word, but to read it directly—a goal of this study Bible.

The Future of Biblical Translation and Interpretation

In conclusion, both the pastoral and professional demands of the Church today require a foundation in excellent biblical studies. There will always be a need for new translations to assist with this goal. Every translation has strengths and weaknesses, and likewise every interpretation. Inasmuch as translation and interpretation are both a science and an art, there will always be room for improvements. The fund of knowledge about the Bible and its world, about the ancient languages and cultures out of which it emerged, grows daily. In order for the Word of God to seep into the very lifeblood of modern English-speaking peoples, new English translations will have to take into account not only the results of scientific investigations but also the changes that continue to occur at a rapid rate within the English language. This reality ensures that Bible translation and interpretation will remain an exciting field for succeeding generations who will continue to seek ways to communicate the Word of God effectively in their time and place.

THE BIBLE IN THE LECTIONARY

EILEEN SCHULLER

One of the enduring results of the Second Vatican Council has been a renewed emphasis on the place of the Bible within Catholic life and greater attention to its use in worship, study, and devotion. As a Church and as individuals we are discovering anew the truth of St. Jerome's insight that "ignorance of the Scriptures is ignorance of Christ." Most Catholics now own a Bible; there are Bible study groups in many parishes; children are introduced to biblical stories and actual biblical texts from the first stages of their religious education; many new hymns and much contemporary folk music are biblically based; Services of the Word (which often include a solemn enthronement of the Bible) and parish celebrations of the Liturgy of the Hours are slowly finding a place in Catholic piety.

Still, for most Catholics, their main exposure to the Bible comes at those times when the Church gathers for liturgy, to offer together praise and worship to God through Jesus. Each time the Mass is celebrated there are two or three readings from the Bible, always one from the Gospel and others from the book of Acts, the Epistles, or the Old Testament. Whenever the sacraments are celebrated (even when baptisms, marriages, the sacrament of the sick and the sacrament of penance are celebrated apart from the Mass), readings from the Word of God are an integral part of the ritual. The first reading from Scripture is regularly followed by a psalm so that we might give our response in the words of Scripture. The Gospel Acclamation and the Entrance and Communion antiphons are usually taken directly from Scripture; other prayers and texts of the Mass reflect or are based on scriptural sources (for instance, the Glory to God in the Highest, the Lamb of God, the Lord's Prayer).

It is instructive to reflect on why the Christian tradition is so insistent that we read the Word of God whenever we gather to pray as Church. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (hereafter CSL), one of the foundational documents of the Second Vatican Council, puts it this way: “Christ is present in his Word since it is he himself who speaks when the holy Scriptures are read in the church” (CSL, 7). The Eucharistic Instruction of 1967 elaborates at greater length “the principal modes by which the Lord is present to his Church in liturgical celebrations. First of all, Christ is present in the assembly of the faithful gathered in his name; he is also present in his word for it is he who is speaking as the sacred Scriptures are read in the Church; in the eucharistic sacrifice, he is present both in the person of the minister . . . and above all under the eucharistic elements” (CSL, 9).

Roman Catholicism has traditionally placed primary emphasis (at times, almost the sole emphasis) on the eucharistic presence of Christ under the appearances of bread and wine. More recent theological reflection has emphasized that Christ is present from the moment when the people gather together in the Christian Assembly, and that he is present especially during the proclamation of the Word of God, both in the reading of Scripture and in its unfolding in the homily. The Eucharistic Instruction brings this all together with the beautiful imagery of food: “The Church is nourished by the bread of life, which she finds at the table both of the Word of God and the Body of Christ” (10).

The Revision of the Lectionary

Very early on in the Second Vatican Council, the bishops of the Church, recognizing that “Sacred Scripture is of paramount importance in the celebration of the liturgy” (CSL, 24), called for certain reforms and changes so that this truth might become a living and pastoral reality in the Church. They said there should be “more reading from holy Scripture” and it should be “more varied and suitable” (CSL, 35); or, to put it in more poetic fashion, “the treasures of the Bible are to be opened up more lavishly, so that richer fare may be provided for the faithful at the table of God’s Word” (CSL, 51). Thus, one of the first major reforms following on the Council was a revision of the Lectionary, that is, the biblical readings that are set down for each Sunday and weekday of the year, and also for use in the celebration of the sacraments, on Feast Days, at funerals, and for Votive Masses and Masses for Special Occasions.

The reforms envisaged by the Council meant not only that the readings would be in English, but that new and previously unheard sections of the Bible would need to be introduced both on Sundays and at weekday Masses. In the centuries since the Council of Trent, the Roman Missal of Pius V (1570) had prescribed a set series of Gospel passages on a yearly basis, and a second reading usually from the Epistles; very few passages from the Old Testament were ever heard at Sunday Mass.

To fulfill the Council's mandate, a committee was established by Rome in 1964; liturgical, scriptural, and pastoral experts, along with bishops around the world, were consulted. The work was completed in 1969 with the publication of the Lectionary for Mass, and introduced in all churches throughout the world on the First Sunday of Advent, 1971. In January 1981 a second edition of the Lectionary was published with a few minor additions and changes, plus an expanded and very helpful introduction, which explains more fully the goals and purpose of the Lectionary.

The revision of the Lectionary has been one of the most extensive and significant reforms of the Council. Unfortunately, it has not always been given the attention it deserves, nor are some of its fundamental principles always well understood, either by the clergy who preach on these readings or by the laity who hear them. Our appreciation of the Scriptures in the liturgy can be greatly enriched by a more careful examination of the Lectionary.

Why a Lectionary at All?

Before we look at more specific questions about how the Lectionary is put together and exactly which passages are chosen, it is helpful to step back and ask the more fundamental questions: "Why a lectionary at all? What do we gain by using a lectionary?"

The decision to use a lectionary means that the readings for a given Sunday or weekday are predetermined; they are a given and are therefore the starting point for the planning of the liturgy as a whole and the homily. On certain other occasions (for instance, celebrations of marriages, funerals) there are more options given for Scripture readings, and a choice is to be made of what is most appropriate to the pastoral needs of a given congregation. When a special group gathers for a one-time occasion (a Retreat Day, a meeting), it is recognized that the given readings for the day may not be appropriate, and provision is made for using readings "that are more suited to the particular celebration, provided that they are chosen from the texts of an approved lectionary" (Masses with Special Groups, 6e). Interestingly, the greatest flexibility is allowed in choosing readings for Masses with children, although a reading from the Gospels is always to be included (Directory for Masses with Children, 43).

The norm in the Roman Catholic tradition is that the Scripture readings are set; they are not the choice of the priest or anyone else in the congregation. Certainly a case can be made (and has been made in the Reform and Free Church traditions) for the freedom and spontaneity to choose readings suitable to a specific community and occasion. But the Catholic tradition has opted for a structured and planned system of readings that “provides the faithful with a knowledge of the whole of God’s Word, in a pattern suited to the purpose” (CSL, Introduction to the Lectionary, 60; hereafter Introduction).

The imposition of a lectionary seeks to lessen the temptation (although it can never remove it entirely!) to pick and choose, to listen only to those parts of the Bible that we find readily helpful and to omit those that we find difficult to understand or accept—but which may be the ones we most need to hear. For instance, if I am readily inclined to look upon God as one who is loving, merciful, kind, and forgiving, the Lectionary will certainly provide my favorite passages, but it will also force me to read those difficult passages (from both the Old and the New Testament) that speak of the wrath of God, judgment, and punishment. Or again, if I am a person with a strong social-justice orientation, firmly convinced that “actions on behalf of justice . . . are a constitutive dimension of the preaching of the gospel-message” (1971 Synod of Bishops), the Lectionary will show many of the key biblical texts both from the prophets and the Gospels; but it will also include passages that speak of the personal dimension of union with God, of a world that is passing away, even passages in praise of the monarchy and the established realm. The gift and challenge of the Lectionary is that it places before each of us passages that we might otherwise not choose to read; unrelentingly it nudges us to open ourselves to the totality of God’s Word.

Foundational Principles of the Lectionary

On a first examination of the Lectionary, it is easy to get bogged down in a mass of details about different cycles and lists of what is read when, so that the whole thing can seem somewhat intimidating. Rather than trying to determine why certain texts are read on a certain day, it is more important to get an overall sense of the arrangement and rationale of the whole. The general principles and foundational decisions that have determined the basic shape and ordering of the Roman Lectionary will then be clear.

The Paschal Mystery

The focal point of the whole Lectionary is Jesus Christ, especially “the paschal mystery of his blessed passion, resurrection from the dead and glorious ascension” (CSL, 5). Throughout the cycle of the Church’s Year, the Lectionary sets before us the totality of this central mystery of the Christian life, a mystery that was not only accomplished in Jesus but a mystery in which we now share through Baptism and faith.

Thus, primacy is given to readings from the Gospels, which speak most directly of the person of Jesus. Furthermore, we read these texts not as individuals but as a people gathered for praise and thanksgiving. “Within the Christian assembly the proclamation of the word inevitably has a Christian aura . . . the God whom we worship in our liturgy is not, first of all, the God of the Book (which is why we freely interpret the Book by arranging it in a lectionary). Our God is the God of the Gathering” (R. Keifer, To Hear and To Proclaim, 115). At Mass, every passage of Scripture, whether from the Old or New Testament, is set in relationship to the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus as made present to us in the Eucharist.

The Church Year

Not everything in the Lectionary is of equal importance. The Lectionary is divided into six parts: the major section (and the one that will be the main focus of our attention) is the Temporal Cycle, that is, the readings for Sundays and weekdays throughout the Church Year; the rest of the Lectionary contains the readings for special occasions (Proper of the Saints, Commons, Ritual Masses [for examples, readings for sacraments, funerals], Masses for Various Occasions, and Votive Masses).

Within the Temporal Cycle, not all days of the year are of equal importance. Sundays have special importance, since they are the weekly celebration of the Lord’s Resurrection and the occasion for the gathering of the whole community; thus, “the more important biblical passages” (Introduction, 65) are assigned to Sundays and the Solemnities of the Lord.

The Sunday cycle is set up independent from the weekday cycle, which, in a sense, complements it.

The Church Year as a whole has its own rhythm. “The solemnity of Easter has the same kind of preeminence [in the year] . . . that Sunday has in the week” (Norms for the Liturgical Year, 18); there are six Sundays in Easter season, followed by Pentecost and Trinity Sundays. Then, next to Easter, the Church “holds most sacred the memorial of Christ’s birth and early manifestation” (Norms, 32). There are two Sundays after Christmas, followed by Epiphany and the Sunday after that. These two major feasts, each with their preparatory period (Lent, with six Sundays, before Easter; and Advent, with four Sundays, before Christmas) are the primary seasons of the Church Year; the other thirty-four Sundays, which celebrate “the mystery of Christ in all its aspects” (Norms, 43), form what is called simply Ordinary Time. (The Lectionary provides for more than fifty-two Sundays to allow for variations in the length of time after Easter, since Easter can fall anywhere from March 22 to April 25.)

Lectio Semicontinua and Lectio Electa

There are many different ways in which we could go about reading the Bible in a systematic fashion. We could start with the story of Creation and work through the events of the Old Testament chronologically, then move on to the New Testament and conclude with the book of Revelation; this would be a kind of salvation-history approach. Another option would be to organize the Scripture readings around certain great themes (grace, salvation, forgiveness, creation) or moral principles; the traditional name for this approach is lectio electa, “readings chosen” to suit a predetermined theme. Or, we could adopt lectio continua, a “continuous reading” of the Bible from beginning to end. This is the system of the Jewish synagogue in which the Torah, the first five books of the Bible, are read continuously through a year; on the same day that the last chapter of Deuteronomy is finished the first chapter of Genesis is begun, so that the reading of Torah is unceasing.

The Roman Lectionary has opted for a combination of lectio electa (particularly in the major seasons of the Church Year) and lectio continua (particularly during Ordinary Time and in the weekday cycle); in fact, it is really more correct to talk of lectio semicontinua since no biblical book is read through in its entirety.

Although a “harmony” (to use the term from the Introduction, 66) exists between the different readings during Advent, Lent, and Easter, for most Masses there is no one theme in the three (Sunday) or two (weekday) readings. Thus, attempts (whether by a homilist or by musicians) to discover or impose a theme for every Mass can result in a misleading or artificial approach to the Scriptures.

Readings of Suitable Length; Omission of Difficult Sections

In the early church the custom was to read “the memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets as long as there is time” (Justin Martyr, Apol. 67). That, however, is not the norm today; within the Mass, particularly when there are three readings, none can be too long. Narrative texts (Gospel stories, parables) are often longer (ten to fifteen verses) so that they can be complete and because they more easily hold people’s attention. Other texts, particularly Sunday readings from the Epistles, are shorter (between four and eight verses) “because of the profundity of their teaching” (Introduction, 75). Occasionally an option is given for reading either a long or a short version of a text (for example, the story of Jesus and the Samaritan woman on the Third Sunday of Lent, A).

The Roman Lectionary also recognizes that not every passage in the Bible is either suitable or helpful for public reading in the liturgy. Decisions were made to omit entirely certain passages with “complex literary, critical, or exegetical problems” (Introduction, 76) that would make them difficult for most people to understand. Similarly, following the long-established practice in Roman lectionaries, at times selected verses within a reading are omitted because the passage would otherwise be too long or because a verse is “unsuitable pastorally or . . . involves truly difficult problems” (Introduction, 77).

Basic Arrangement of the Sunday Lectionary

After examining the possibility of spreading the readings over as little as two years or as many as four, the planners of the Sunday Lectionary decided on a three-year cycle. That is, there are different readings for each Sunday in Years A, B, and C (as they are commonly designated) and then the cycle begins over again. (Years where the sum of all the digits are divisible by three, for instance 1989, 1992, are always Year C. The year begins on the First Sunday of Advent.)

For each Sunday there are three readings: one from the Old Testament (with a few exceptions, as we will note in the Sundays after Easter), one from the Epistles or the book of Revelation, and one from the Gospels. Although provision is made for an individual Conference of Bishops to allow only two readings “for pastoral reasons” (Introduction, 79), three is clearly the norm.

Since there is considerable divergence in the shape of the Lectionary during the major seasons of Advent–Christmas and Lent–Easter as compared with the Sundays of Ordinary Time, it is easier and less confusing to look at each separately, beginning with Ordinary Time.

The Gospels in Ordinary Time

One of the three Synoptic Gospels forms the central focus of each of the thirty-three (occasionally thirty-four) Sundays of each year of Ordinary Time. Year A is always the Gospel of Matthew; Year B, the Gospel of Mark; and Year C, the Gospel of Luke. The Gospel of John is not neglected, even though it does not form the core of a specific year. In accord with an ancient practice of the Church in both the West and the East, John has been read during the Lent and Easter seasons “because it has been traditionally considered the ‘spiritual’ Gospel that presents the mystery of Christ in the greatest depths” (Introduction, 7); in addition, because of the shortness of the Gospel of Mark, chapter 6 of John (the Bread of Life discourse) is taken up on five Sundays during Year B.

This particular arrangement of the Lectionary allows us to hear each of the Gospels in its own right; over the course of a year we come to know the distinctive picture of Jesus presented by Matthew or Mark or Luke.

The Epistles in Ordinary Time

Over the Sundays of Ordinary Time, passages are selected from the Epistles for the second reading, according to the following outline:

Year A

1 Corinthians 1–4 (Sundays 2–8)

Romans (Sundays 9–24)
Philippians (Sundays 25–28)
1 Thessalonians (Sundays 29–33)

Year B

1 Corinthians 6–11 (Sundays 2–6)
2 Corinthians (Sundays 7–14)
Ephesians (Sundays 15–21)
James (Sundays 22–26)
Hebrews 2–10 (Sundays 27–33)

Year C

1 Corinthians 12–15 (Sundays 2–8)
Galatians (Sundays 9–14)
Colossians (Sundays 15–18)
Hebrews 11–12 (Sundays 19–22)
Philemon (Sunday 23)
1 Timothy (Sundays 24–26)
2 Timothy (Sundays 27–30)
2 Thessalonians (Sundays 31–33)

Though individual passages are quite short and there is no attempt to read the Epistles in their entirety, over the three years the Lectionary gives a rich and varied exposure to the main themes and emphases of this part of Scripture. As already noted, in the Sundays in Ordinary Time there is no direct correlation between the Gospel reading and the Epistle reading; although at times they may touch on similar aspects of the Christian mystery, they have not been picked to provide a common theme.

The Old Testament Reading in Ordinary Time

In contrast to the selection of the Epistle, the first reading from the Old Testament has been carefully chosen to correlate with the Gospel text of the day. Although the intent is to highlight the unity between the Old and New Testaments, in fact there is considerable variety in how this “harmony” (Introduction, 67) is achieved. Sometimes it is a common theme that binds the two readings together; at other times the Old Testament will foreshadow or suggest something that is more fully developed in the Gospel (for example, on Sunday 16, Year C, the story of Martha and Mary giving hospitality to Jesus is paired with the story from Genesis of Abraham receiving his three guests). Often, if the Gospel quotes a verse from the Old Testament or refers to a specific incident, this passage will be the first reading (for example, on the Third Sunday, Year A, Matthew quotes Is 8:23–9:1, and that Isaianic text serves as the first reading). At times, the single lines given before the readings in the Lectionary are most helpful (though they are not meant to be read publicly) to indicate the point of correspondence that led to the choice of a particular reading.

While the desirability of a weekly Old Testament reading is undisputed, it is probably fair to say that the selection of Old Testament passages has been the single most controversial aspect of the Lectionary. The decision to link the first reading so closely with the Gospel imposes certain limitations. Many of the most important Old Testament passages simply do not readily lend themselves to correlation with a particular Gospel passage and so are never heard in the Sunday assembly; often, such a brief or peripheral section of a major Old Testament story is read that it is difficult to get a sense of the whole picture. Furthermore, relatively little ever appears from the corpus of Wisdom literature (only three selections from Proverbs and two, both truncated, from the book of Job). The passages selected from the prophets are those that are readily seen to be fulfilled in Jesus, or which at least have Christological implications, but other aspects of the prophetic message are given less prominence (for example, the relatively few “social justice” passages read over the three years).

The Lent–Easter Season

As noted earlier, the seasons of Lent–Easter and Advent–Christmas form independent units; both cycles (the Advent even more so than the Lent) are carefully crafted so that through the Scripture readings we may be more closely initiated into the Church’s understanding of these great feasts.

Easter, especially the Easter Triduum (Holy Thursday, Good Friday, and Easter Vigil on Saturday), is “the culmination of the entire liturgical year” (Norms, 18); Lent serves as a time of preparation, especially as a period of “closer attention to the Word of God” (CSL, 109). During Lent, “those passages from the Gospels that were read to catechumens in the early centuries to prepare them for Baptism are proclaimed to all the faithful because during Lent the whole Church, along with those about to be baptized, recalls the mystery of initiation into Christ.” Though it is not possible to examine closely all the readings for the Lent–Easter season, a few examples will illustrate the care and theological insight that finds expression in the arrangement of the Lectionary for this season.

The baptismal thrust is seen most clearly in Year A on the final three Sundays of Lent, where the great themes of water, light, and life are proclaimed through the reading from John’s Gospel of the Samaritan woman at the well (Third Sunday), the curing of the man born blind (Fourth), and the raising of Lazarus from the dead (Fifth). So pivotal are these particular texts to the process of Christian initiation that they can be used in any of the three years, especially when there are candidates preparing for Baptism.

The readings for the first two Sundays of Lent are always the account of the Temptation and the Transfiguration respectively, read according to the Gospel being followed in a given year. In Year B, the Gospels for the rest of Lent focus on the Crucifixion and Resurrection; in Year C, on the process of conversion.

At first glance, the choice of Old Testament readings for the Sundays of Lent might look entirely diverse and random; certainly they are not specifically linked to the Gospel. Rather, each year, they are meant to lead us through the Old Testament, presenting “the main elements of salvation history from its beginning until the promise of the New Covenant” (Introduction, 97):

Year A

First Sunday: Creation and fall

Second Sunday: The call of Abraham

Third Sunday: Water from the rock in the desert

Fourth Sunday: The anointing of David as king

Fifth Sunday: Promise of the restoration

Year B

First Sunday: Flood and covenant

Second Sunday: Abraham’s sacrifice of his son

Third Sunday: The Ten Commandments

Fourth Sunday: Exile and destruction of the Temple

Fifth Sunday: Promise of the new covenant

Year C

First Sunday: Retelling the deliverance from Egypt

Second Sunday: The covenant with Abraham

Third Sunday: The call of Moses

Fourth Sunday: The Passover celebrated in the Promised Land

Fifth Sunday: Promise of a new exodus

The Epistle readings during Lent highlight themes such as faith, repentance, and baptismal motifs, and often are related to the first reading (e.g., on the First Sunday of Lent, A, the passage from Romans about Christ as the Second Adam corresponds to the reading about the sin of Adam in Gn 2).

The reading of the Gospel of John continues on most of the Sundays after Easter in all three years with texts about the Good Shepherd (Fourth Sunday) and from John's presentation of the Farewell Discourse and Prayer of Jesus (the Fifth to Seventh Sundays). This is the only time when there are no Old Testament readings; in keeping with a very ancient tradition, the Church turns to the Acts of the Apostles in all three years so that we ponder the work of the Spirit in the early Church. For the second reading, semicontinuous selections are taken from 1 Peter in Year A, 1 John in Year B (both rich in baptismal allusions), and from the book of Revelation (with its emphasis on heavenly worship) in Year C.

Advent–Christmas Season

The Lectionary for Advent is very carefully planned, with a definite movement as we progress toward the celebration of Christmas. The First Sunday emphasizes the Second Coming of Christ, picking up on a theme already sounded in the final Sunday of the Church Year (the feast of Christ the King). On the Second and Third Sundays, the Gospel is always about John the Baptist, so that the focus of attention moves more to the historical coming of a Messiah. On the Fourth Sunday, we turn to the first chapters of Matthew and Luke for events immediately prior to the birth of Jesus (the Annunciation to Mary and Joseph, and the Visitation).

In keeping with a long tradition in the Church, the book of Isaiah with its messianic prophecies has a special place in both the Advent and Christmas readings. The Epistle readings are more general, offering exhortations and reflections; often, as the Advent focus moves to the birth of Jesus in time, the second reading serves to remind us of the Coming, which still awaits us in the future.

Throughout the Christmas season, the Lectionary preserves many of the readings that have been traditional in the Roman Church. On the Octave of Christmas, the Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God (New Year's Day), the first reading is the priestly blessing from Numbers 6, and the other two speak more specifically of Mary.

The Lectionary for Weekdays

The readings for weekdays throughout the year form a separate cycle, independent of the Sunday cycle. Even with only two readings, obviously more of the Bible can be covered on weekdays, although still only portions of many of the longer Old Testament books are included. The seasons of Advent–Christmas and Lent–Easter follow an annual cycle, that is, the readings are repeated every year; in Ordinary Time, the same Gospel passages are read every year, while the first reading follows a two-year cycle (designated as Year I and Year II).

The following will give a brief outline of the weekday cycle:

Advent–Christmas Season

During the first nine days of Advent, the Lectionary follows a very ancient custom of the Church and reads (in sequence) selected passages from the prophet Isaiah; on these days, contrary to usual practice, the Gospel is chosen to relate to this first reading. After the Thursday of the second week of Advent, the Gospel consistently speaks of John the Baptist, while the first reading is still from Isaiah or chosen to relate to the Gospel. From December 17 to 24, passages are selected from the first chapters of Matthew and Luke of events leading up to the birth of Christ; the first reading presents some of the major Old Testament messianic prophecies.

From December 27 on throughout the Epiphany season, there is a virtually continuous reading of 1 John. The Gospels relate various manifestations of Jesus; the whole of the first chapter of John's Gospel is read between December 31 and January 5.

Lent–Easter Season

Throughout Lent, the Gospel and Old Testament are rather closely related to each other and present to us different aspects of the major Lenten themes of Baptism and penance. In accord with an ancient custom in the Church, the Gospel of John is read from the fourth week on; in Holy Week the focus is more specifically on Christ's Passion.

During the Easter season, on weekdays as on Sundays, the Lectionary maintains the ancient custom of reading semicontinuously from the Acts of the Apostles. During the Octave of Easter, the Gospel selections recount the different occasions on which Christ appeared; over the next weeks there is semicontinuous reading of the teaching and prayer of Jesus at the Last Supper from John 13 through John 17.

Ordinary Time

Over the course of the year, the Gospels are read on a semicontinuous basis: Mark 1–12 in weeks 1–9, Matthew 5–25 in weeks 10–21, and Luke 4–21 in weeks 22–34. The Church Year ends with those passages from Luke that talk specifically of the Second Coming.

The first reading is completely independent from the Gospel and provides the opportunity to read selections from the majority of the Old Testament books and Epistles. Longer books are sometimes divided (e.g., Gn 1–11 is read in weeks 5–6 of Year I, Gn 12–50 in weeks 12–14). At the very end of the Church Year, we read from Daniel in Year I and the book of Revelation in Year II with their eschatological themes.

The Responsorial Psalm

The Lectionary also introduces us to the psalms in the Bible; in fact, more than eighty psalms (or verses thereof) are used in the Sunday Lectionary and some 130 of the 150 psalms appear somewhere in the complete Lectionary. The psalm comes between the first and second reading, and is considered as “an integral part of the Liturgy of the Word” (General Instruction of the Roman Missal, 61).

The psalms are poetry, the majority of them certainly originally composed to be sung with musical accompaniment. The introduction to the Lectionary strongly encourages singing the psalm at Mass, preferably by a soloist (cantor) with the congregation joining in with a refrain; if the psalm is spoken, it is “to be recited in a manner conducive to meditation on the Word” (Introduction, 22).

Although the psalm always serves in some way as a response to the Word of God, there is considerable diversity in terms of its precise relationship to other readings. If the first reading or the Epistle or even the Gospel quotes a particular psalm verse, that psalm is usually taken up as an echo or anticipated response (e.g., the use of Psalm 91:11 on the First Sunday of Lent, C, when a verse from this psalm, “For he commands his angels with regard to you,” is quoted during the temptation story in the Gospel). Often a psalm simply picks up and carries on the mood of the first reading, whether lamentation, thanksgiving, or praise. Some psalms have a long tradition of usage on particular feasts (Psalm 47:6, “God has gone up with a shout” for the Ascension; Psalm 72:10–11, “the kings of Arabia and Seba offer gifts. May all kings bow before him, all nations serve him” for Epiphany). According to Lucien Deiss (a member of the committee involved in the choice of psalms when the Lectionary was compiled), some psalms that would not otherwise be used were introduced primarily so that the Christian community could become more familiar with the entire Psalter (Deiss, Spirit and Song of the New Liturgy, 110–11).

Ecumenical Import of the Lectionary

One of the unexpected and unforeseen results of the revision of the Roman Lectionary has been its adoption (with some modifications) by many Protestant churches, including Anglican/Episcopal, Methodist, Presbyterian, Lutheran, and United Church of Canada, United Church of Christ, and many others. James White, a Methodist minister, in a much-quoted statement observed that the Lectionary has become “Catholicism’s greatest gift to Protestant preaching, just as Protestant biblical scholarship has given so much impetus to Catholic preaching” (Christian Worship in Transition, 139).

Many of the Protestant churches came together under the auspices of the Consultation on Common Texts and developed the Common Lectionary in 1983 for use on Sundays and a few special days of the Christian year. This was further revised and then published as the Revised Common Lectionary in 1994. The Revised Common Lectionary basically follows the Roman Lectionary, with some significant changes in the choice of Old Testament passages to provide more semicontinuous readings from the historical and wisdom sections of the Old Testament, and to give alternatives for readings from the Deuterocanonical books.

Although Catholics and Protestants do not share exactly the same Lectionary, tremendous progress has been made toward common reading of Scripture. The ecumenical import, even on a practical level, is significant; in many places ministers of different churches now gather together to reflect and prepare their Sunday sermons. And, although we are still not at the point of being able to be united at the table of the Lord's banquet, we can be united and nourished at the common table of his Word.

Using the Lectionary for Prayer and Study

Many people, both clergy and lay, today use the Lectionary as a basic resource for daily prayer, whether or not they are able to celebrate liturgy with the Christian community every day. Consistent use of the Lectionary over a period of years will necessarily expose us to a broad expanse of Scripture and protect us against the subjective reading of the Bible spoken about earlier. The Lectionary puts us in touch with the Church's understanding of the mysteries of our faith as presented through the Church year, helping us to recover dimensions which may have been lost in popular piety (for example, the baptismal dimension of the season of Lent as opposed to a solely ascetic focus).

Many religious educators are discovering the Lectionary as a valuable resource in catechetics; reflection on the readings as appropriate to various age groups provides a common focus when the whole community gathers in prayer. Parish study groups or Bible studies often take the Gospel of a given year as their text for study. More and more the Lectionary is being used as the core of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) program to introduce the new catechumens to the life of faith and community.

Though the Lectionary contains the Word of God, the particular selection of material is a human endeavor and thus only more or less perfect. It is recognized that some choices of specific readings could have been more auspicious, and certainly revisions will probably be made in time.

In particular, two areas are surfacing that seem to call for further discussion and reflection. As we ponder the role of women today in church and society, we bring certain questions to the Lectionary; we need to ask why certain texts have been omitted (for example, the story of courageous midwives who defy Pharaoh and ensure the survival of the Hebrew people in Egypt) and whether it is either necessary or helpful pastorally to include other texts that are open to being interpreted in a way derogatory to women (e.g., Eph 5:20). The second concern is in the area of our relationship to the Jewish people; as we become more aware of “the continuity of our faith with that of the earlier covenant” (Vatican Guidelines, 1974), we are more sensitive to the fact that the Lectionary must “promote among the Catholic people a genuine appreciation of the special place of the Jewish people as first chosen in the history of salvation, and in no way slight the honor and dignity that is theirs” (American Bishops’ Statement on Catholic-Jewish Relations, 1975).

The revision of the Lectionary stands as one of the most tangible and permanent implementations of the vision and challenge of the Second Vatican Council. In the Lectionary, “the treasures of the Bible are . . . opened up more lavishly so that a richer share in God’s Word may be provided for the faithful” (CSL, 51). The Lectionary has the potential to shape the life of the Christian community, not only as the Word of God is proclaimed in the celebration of the liturgy but also as it is broken open for us in the homily, in catechetics, and in private and group study and prayer, which is rooted in Scripture. As the Lectionary is used over the cycle of years and even generations, “there is reason to hope for a new awakening of the spiritual life deriving from an increased dedication to God’s word which ‘stands forever’ (Is 40:8)” (Dei Verbum, 26).

READING GUIDE

THE PENTATEUCH

CHRISTOPHER FRECHETTE

Jewish and Christian canons of Scripture agree that the books of Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy appear first in the canon and constitute a unit. Christians refer to this unit as the Pentateuch, a word derived from a Greek term meaning “five books/scrolls.” Jewish tradition refers to it as both the “Five Books of Moses” and the Hebrew term “Torah,” which can be translated “law” or “instruction.” When the term refers to these five books, however, the most common translation is “the law.” But these books contain much more than collections of laws. The laws are embedded within extensive narratives that account for the origins of the people Israel, and the entire Pentateuch was intended for instruction in a broad sense: to shape the way in which readers understand their origins and identity as the people of YHWH, the God of Israel. As such, these books remain fundamentally important for Christians, who claim this same God as their own.

In order to orient the reader to studying the books of the Pentateuch, this article first addresses issues of method, the kinds of questions to bring to the text in light of biblical scholarship. It then sketches the overall structure, content, and function of the Pentateuch. Next, it explains some key terms and concepts important for understanding the Pentateuch. Finally, it concludes with a list of books and articles for further reading.

KINDS OF QUESTIONS TO BRING TO THE TEXT

We may look at the Bible from either a diachronic or a synchronic perspective. Both terms are derived from Greek: diachronic signifies “through time,” and synchronic signifies “at the same time.” A synchronic perspective focuses on the final form of the text as preserved and keeps in view the way in which the details of the text function together. It is concerned with the dynamics of the text itself, considered at various levels, including: a unit within a book, an entire book, a set of books in the canon, or the entire canon. A diachronic perspective investigates how the biblical text achieved its present state through time. It may seek evidence to assign an approximate date and location to a given text, and may envision how the text would have functioned in that context. It may look for evidence within the text indicating multiple sources, or a process by which the text was edited. A diachronic perspective keeps in view the reality that the Bible resulted from and addressed human activity within a culture and time different from our own.

Both synchronic and diachronic perspectives are important, and they complement each other. The diachronic perspective attends to how the biblical texts have both emerged from and affected the changing realities of the faith community through time. The synchronic perspective keeps in view the dynamics of the text's final, canonical form.

Diachronic Considerations: Investigating the Origins of the Pentateuch

For many Jews and Christians through the centuries, the unity of the Pentateuch has had a simple explanation: Moses wrote it. The obvious question concerning how he could have known about things that he could not have witnessed was often explained in supernatural terms. For instance, the book of Jubilees, a Jewish composition dated to the second century BC, explains how an angel dictated to him an adapted version of the accounts of events narrated in Genesis, all of which predated his birth. In recent centuries, scholars drawing upon evidence from the biblical text, comparative linguistics, extrabiblical texts, and archaeology have identified considerable evidence for a much more complex picture of how the Pentateuch came into being.

Both the Enlightenment, with its values of rationality and intellectual freedom, and the Protestant Reformation, with its interest in studying the original texts of the Old Testament in Hebrew and other ancient languages, profoundly influenced biblical scholarship. Scholars sought more and more to apply critical reason and philology to biblical studies. Christian scholars, both Protestant and Catholic, sought to integrate such critical reading with religious interpretation addressed to the believing community. Two influential methods in biblical study, source criticism and form criticism, which emerged in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, respectively, have undergone considerable revision and remain valuable for biblical study. (For a lucid, accessible discussion of the development of biblical scholarship in the modern era, see Jean Louis Ska, Introduction.)

Sources: Identifying Traditional Materials

During the eighteenth century, scholars began to notice patterns in the Pentateuch, such as the different ways of referring to God, that suggested more than one author or source. For instance, in Exodus 6:3 God states: “As God the Almighty I appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but by my name, LORD [Hebrew: YHWH], I did not make myself known to them.” (The New American Bible Revised Edition uses “the LORD” for this Hebrew word; see RG 119.) However, in Genesis, all three patriarchs as well as other characters refer to God by the name YHWH (e.g., Gn 12:8; 25:21; 27:20). In order to grapple with such difficulties, scholars began to form hypotheses to explain such patterns as representing the source materials from which the Pentateuch was compiled. Some theories highlighted the fragmentary character of the source material, arguing that the Pentateuch was composed from multiple sources, each comprised of either relatively short narrative units or incomplete texts. Others proposed that a single original version of the Pentateuch had been variously supplemented. The hypothesis that gained consensus imagined that the Pentateuch was formed by compiling several independent and fully developed documents.

Building on a century of prior scholarship, Julius Wellhausen in the late nineteenth century synthesized this documentary hypothesis. He held that early oral traditions had been collected and expanded in four separate, coherent “documents,” each at a different period in Israel’s history, and each reflecting different perspectives and terminology. These four documents served as sources for the compilation of the Pentateuch during the Persian period. Wellhausen’s theory was largely accepted, even as it continued to be refined, until the late twentieth century. In recent decades, however, this theory has come under increasing attack. While there is some consensus that the Pentateuch reached its final form in the Persian period, and that its compilers employed traditional material, scholars continue to debate the character of that traditional material. More recently still, a number of scholars have mounted a vigorous defense of the documentary (or “neodocumentary”) hypothesis. At present, the composition of the Pentateuch is a topic of lively debate.

It is useful to offer a brief summary of the evidence cited for the distinctiveness of each of the supposed documentary sources. Two of the sources are designated by the way the source refers to God in Hebrew, YHWH (pronounced Yahweh, the proper name of the God of Israel, often rendered as “the LORD” in translations) and ’elohim (the general word for God).

The Yahwist (J): This theory cites tendencies to refer to God by using the divine name YHWH, and to employ frank and earthy language about God’s interactions with humans, especially those whom God chooses. The abbreviation J reflects the German spelling of the divine name as Jahweh. This source was long believed to be written in Judah during the tenth–ninth centuries BC for the purpose of demonstrating that the promises to Abraham were fulfilled in the monarchy founded by David. It is becoming increasingly problematic, however, to hold that a separate J source existed at such an early date, and many scholars conclude that no coherent J source existed at all.

The Elohist (E): The theory cites tendencies to refer to God by using the Hebrew ’elohim and to depict God as communicating by more remote means, such as dreams and messengers. Emphasis on Jacob and northern locations such as Bethel and Shechem suggested that this source was written in the Northern Kingdom during the early ninth–eighth centuries BC. After the Northern Kingdom fell in 722 BC, refugees who fled to Judah brought with them the E account, which was combined with J into a single account at some point around 700 BC. Proponents of this hypothesis acknowledge that all of the E material in the Pentateuch together does not constitute a full account, and so conclude that the original E source must have been truncated when it was combined with the J source. However, as with the J source, some dispute that a separate E source or combined J/E source ever existed.

The Deuteronomist (D): This source takes its name from Deuteronomy, although some scholars see evidence of its theology in other parts of the Pentateuch. Among its distinctive elements is the requirement that all sacrificial worship of the LORD be centralized in one place, implying Jerusalem without naming it. The book repeatedly emphasizes that if the people fail to be faithful to the covenant, they will bring dire consequences upon themselves; although it is not named, the book makes clear that such consequences will include the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem in the sixth century BC. These and other perspectives from Deuteronomy also occur in the so-called Deuteronomistic History (Jos, Jgs, 1–2 Sm, and 1–2 Kgs). Some scholars have argued that Deuteronomy was originally written as an introduction to these books and was only later transferred to conclude Genesis through Numbers. Others have pointed out that the story of the Pentateuch was not complete until the people had taken possession of the land, and so they contend that the original unit included six books (the Hexateuch), counting Joshua among them.

The Priestly Source (P) Supplemented by the Holiness School (H): The Priestly source received its name because of its extensive legislation concerning priestly matters, sacrificial worship, festival calendars, and the portable Tabernacle, which prefigured the Jerusalem Temple. It is also characterized by traditions expressing order. For instance, the Sabbath organizes ongoing time; lists of generations (toledoth) organize time between the creation of the world and the Exodus; itinerary formulae organize the Israelites' journey from Egypt to Canaan. However, to speak of a single Priestly source is disputable in two respects. On the one hand, many scholars contend that all the Priestly material together does not comprise a complete narrative. Rather, it employs a significant amount of unique material in editing together other traditional material. On the other hand, there are two distinct layers in the unique Priestly material: the earlier Priestly material assembled during and shortly after the Exile; and a revision, with new material, made later during the Persian period, evidenced most clearly in the Holiness Code (Lv 17–26), but not limited to these chapters.

It seems more helpful then, to speak not of a Priestly source but of a Priestly strand of tradition, which was eventually edited and supplemented by the Holiness school. Perhaps the clearest difference in perspective between these two layers of tradition pertains to how each understands holiness. For the older Priestly tradition, holiness is a communicable effect of the LORD's presence concentrated in the Tabernacle and the priesthood. However, the Holiness school expanded its concept of holiness from the sphere of sanctuary and sacrifice to ordinary life; not just the priests but the entire of people of Israel are to be holy by the way they live. The great commandment, "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lv 19:18), expresses this view of holiness. The Deuteronomistic and Priestly/Holiness schools were likely responsible for shaping much traditional source material into the final form of the Pentateuch in the wake of the Babylonian Exile. The theme of covenant offers one window into their distinctive perspectives.

While many Jewish and Catholic scholars have participated since the mid-twentieth century in the ongoing discussion of the sources of the Pentateuch, the early formulation of the documentary hypothesis had an anti-Jewish and anti-Catholic tone. Wellhausen's understanding of Israelite religion reflects two notions strongly influenced by Romanticism and notions of history prominent in nineteenth-century German intellectual circles: (1) that the origins of a culture are most valuable for illuminating its essence; and (2) that cultures develop in a trajectory of phases moving from creativity to decline. Wellhausen interpreted Israelite history in three phases, through which Israel's ritual system developed in ways increasingly repressive and divorced from the rhythms of nature. Phase 1 was the period of monarchy for which the J and E sources reflect Israel's golden era, characterized by spontaneous religious expression and rituals that reflected the rhythms of nature. In phase 2, the centralization of the cult carried out by Deuteronomic reform and the fixing of a liturgical calendar obscured the connection between ritual and the natural rhythm of the seasons. In phase 3, Judaism from the Persian period on was judged negatively as a religion in decline. Wellhausen associated it with the rigid legalism attributed in the gospels to the Pharisees. He saw in Judaism's emphasis on ritual an indication of collective guilt over the sin for which people believed that God had punished them through the traumatic events of the Babylonian Exile.

Because ritual life is so central in modern Judaism and Catholicism, this perspective on ritual in effect supported a negative view of both religions. In the twentieth century, anthropologists studying empirical evidence from a variety of cultures began to demonstrate the constructive function of ritual in human experience, and their resulting theories about ritual have influenced biblical studies as well. Wellhausen's portrayal of the trajectory of Israelite religion as a sequence of stages culminating in decline has been abandoned.

Genres: Investigating Conventional Functions of Texts

At the end of the nineteenth century a new method shifted attention away from the stages of Israelite history on a grand scale. This method, introduced by Herman Gunkel, focused on specific units of text, thus attempting to grasp the conventional ways in which they had been used. Known as form criticism, this method seeks to identify a text's genre. Gunkel explained that term as the relationship among a conventional literary structure or form, the mood or atmosphere manifested in it, and the social situation in which the form was believed to function originally. While many aspects of this method have been revised since Gunkel, it remains valuable in drawing attention to literary conventions and the functions that such conventions serve within their own social contexts.

One difficulty in applying this method to ancient literature is the relative lack of empirical evidence for establishing what was conventional in a given literary structure or social situation. Immensely helpful for establishing an empirical basis for judging the literary conventions and social contexts of biblical texts has been, since the early nineteenth century, the discovery and translation of vast amounts of ancient Near Eastern literature. Scholarly discussion of the Pentateuch as Israel's story of origins has benefitted greatly from the recognition of the way in which such stories functioned in the ancient Near East.

Gunkel's understanding of genre has been corrected in some respects by subsequent scholarship. He imagined that originally brief oral genres had become obscured as they were transformed into lengthy written documents, which he found less aesthetically valuable. As Gunkel acknowledged, to investigate the structure, mood, and social function of a kind of text is more an art than a science. While form criticism may seek to explain native (emic) classifications of texts, it has more often constructed (etic) classifications based on the investigator's observations. Such judgments risk reflecting one's own assumptions rather than those of the ancient culture being studied. In practice, form criticism may be considered a valuable heuristic tool applicable to textual units of various sizes, from a single phrase to an entire book or set of books. It urges the reader to consider the biblical text in light of the cultural conventions of the contexts in which the text originated and has been read. Two qualifications must be borne in mind. On the one hand, the parameters of what constitutes a literary form may allow for a fair amount of fluidity. It is best to avoid being either rigid or meticulous in defining literary form, and to remain open to clarification and correction about function based on new information. On the other hand, the different dimensions of the structure and function of given text may support more than one assessment of its genre.

One of the most pervasive literary forms in the Pentateuch is etiology. An etiology is a story that narrates the origins of something. The Pentateuch contains etiologies for a variety of things, including particular rituals, customs, and the names of places, persons, or ethnic or national identities. Such stories vary in length, and many interpret the meaning or value of what they explain. When explaining a name, an etiology often provides an etymology, although these are often folk etymologies that play on the name rather than providing a scientific explanation. For instance, in the etiology for the name Israel (yisra'el), the explanation “for you have contended with divine and human beings and have prevailed” (Gn 32:29) offers a folk etymology that plays on the first two letters of the verb “to contend” (srh) and the occurrence of the word for God ('el) in the name. Whether or not an etiology can be proven historically or linguistically accurate, its details can reveal clues about its intended purpose. For instance, the etiology explaining the origins of the eponymous ancestors of the Ammonites and Moabites depicts them both as the offspring of incest, suggesting that the story was intended to ridicule those nations (Gn 19:30–38).

SOCIAL SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES

Sociology, anthropology, and psychology each provide theories for understanding human experience—and methods for investigating it—all of which are useful for cross-cultural study. Scholars employ such theories and methods both in constructing the historical realities of ancient Israel and in assessing the ways in which biblical texts would have functioned in those realities. Some scholars, such as Norman Gottwald and Rainer Albertz, have interpreted the Pentateuch primarily through sociological approaches in order to argue for particular social and political constructions of Israel's origins. While lack of empirical evidence will likely prevent universal consensus concerning many aspects of Israelite history, the social sciences nevertheless have become important for interpreting the biblical text in relationship to Israelite history. For example, sociological observations about the symbiotic relationship between agriculturalists and pastoral nomads have undercut the theory that prior to settling in Canaan, the Israelites would have existed as a pastoral nomads socially isolated from agriculturalists. Mary Douglas and others have employed anthropological theory in developing perspectives on the symbolic functioning of the ways in which ancient Israel's ritual system, especially as portrayed in the Priestly writings, established boundaries relating to ritual purity and holiness. The social sciences also provide tools for assessing how biblical texts functioned in antiquity. For instance, regarding biblical literature produced during and after the Babylonian Exile, including the Pentateuch, recent scholarship has applied both social and psychological theory to investigate the function of this literature in helping the Jewish community to survive the collective trauma posed by those situations.

Synchronic Considerations: Studying the Pentateuch in its Final Form

For Jewish and Christian communities, the final form of the Pentateuch remains a primary source for liturgy, theological reflection, and personal prayer. As important as insights about the conventions reflected in the Pentateuch and the processes by which it came into existence may be, these play a supporting role in the careful study of the final text as it has been preserved within the canon of Scripture. Especially since 1970, several methods emphasizing a synchronic approach to the text have gained prominence.

Canonical Approaches

A canonical approach to interpreting the Pentateuch emphasizes the theological importance of the entire canon of Scripture, which for Christians includes the New Testament. This approach also highlights the role of the community's sense of faith in appropriating the texts. The two major early proponents of this approach have sharply different perspectives. Brevard Childs has a more purely synchronic interest, focusing on the final form accepted by the community as authoritative. James Sanders, by contrast, also includes a diachronic dimension, attending to the processes by which older traditions are employed in successive contexts en route to constituting the text's final form. For instance, for the Jews in Diaspora during the Persian period and later, Sanders notes the significance of the fact that the final form of the Torah ends with the Israelites outside the land.

Literary Approaches

Important literary approaches include narrative and rhetorical analysis, each offering frameworks for attending to the details of a given text in illuminating ways. Narratology attends to how a text tells a story in a way that engages the reader in its “narrative world.” For a given text, this approach explores elements of time, plot, narrator, reader, point of view, and characterization. Attention to plot and characterization in the Joseph story, for instance, allows one to see how the story cultivates tension through a series of inversions by which Joseph’s treatment of his brothers in Egypt echoes their prior treatment of him. Rhetoric involves discourse aimed at persuasion. While classic theories of rhetoric, such as that of Aristotle, tend to catalog formalized types of discourse and features of oratory, more recent rhetorical approaches seek to address what makes a particular use of language effective for communicating within concrete situations. Thus, it blends careful (synchronic) consideration of the text with specific features of the situation it addressed in antiquity (diachronic). So, for example, rhetorical analysis may shed light on how the final edition of the Pentateuch addressed the struggles prompted by the Babylonian Exile and postexilic situations in Judea and in the Diaspora.

CONTEXTUAL BIBLICAL CRITICISM

At each stage of the history of the biblical text, the notion of context is fundamental to understanding the function of the text. However, what has become known as contextual biblical criticism refers to those approaches that prioritize contemporary contexts in which the Bible is read. These approaches attend to the ways in which such reading is oriented to the actual experiences and needs of people.

Liberationist and feminist approaches pioneered this sort of criticism, both foregrounding relationships of domination and subordination, that is, uneven relationships of power. Liberationist criticism calls attention to economic systems and class divisions. In the context of the Pentateuch, it highlights God’s intervention on behalf of the Israelite slaves to free them from the oppression under the Egyptians. From this theme, it seeks both to critique contemporary economic and class structures, and to inspire hope in people who face domination under such structures. In a similar way, feminist criticism seeks to engage in critique of social and economic structures that reflect gender bias and thus cultivate hope among people oppressed by those structures. In the biblical text, it draws attention not only to the way in which patriarchal culture is reflected in the subordination of women but also to the way in which texts champion the roles of women. In Exodus 2, for example, it is the midwives who subvert Pharaoh's orders to kill the Hebrew infant boys. Feminist criticism has given rise to a broader form of criticism that calls into question dominant paradigms of constructing meaning, especially as these pertain to sexual orientation and gender identification.

Both liberationist and feminist criticism have influenced the rise of other forms of contextual criticism in recent decades. Postcolonial criticism foregrounds the realm of geopolitical realities and the uneven relationships of power at work between the center of empire and the colonized periphery. An array of forms of criticism reflect the experience of particular populations: African, African American, Asian, Asian American, and Latino/a. In each case the text is viewed explicitly from the perspective of one group of people, rather than from a supposedly objective standpoint. Practitioners of these methods typically deny that a purely objective interpretation is possible.

Israel's Story of Origins

Having reviewed methods for studying the Pentateuch, we now turn to an overview of its overall structure, content, and function. The Pentateuch narrates the origins of the people of Israel and relates those origins to the origins of the universe. In its overall structure and content, the Pentateuch is both similar to and distinct from Egyptian and Mesopotamian stories that explain cultural origins. Those stories envision cultural origins as occurring in the primeval era of the creation of the world. While the Pentateuch adapts traditions of the creation of the world from its neighbors, it narrates a separation of many generations between the era of the creation of the world and God's creation of the people of Israel after freeing them from slavery in Egypt. The Pentateuch, however, remains an unfinished story, in that it concludes before the people receive their land and can worship in the sanctuary of the LORD there.

The Pentateuchal Narratives as History

What constitutes a historical text can be understood in different ways for different purposes. While the texts of the Pentateuch relate the origins of the people of Israel, they do not demonstrate a concern with factual reliability and plausibility in the way that modern historians do. An alternative understanding of history draws attention to that with which these texts are concerned. According to the twentieth-century Dutch historian Johan Huizinga, “History is the intellectual form in which a civilization renders an account to itself of its past.” To say here that an account occurs in “intellectual form” means that its descriptions and analysis make sense within the culture for which they are written; it does not imply that they would meet modern standards of facticity or objectivity.

This definition of history is useful for studying the Pentateuch because it invites us to consider the purposes for which the ancient Israelites and Judeans were interested in recounting their past. They, like people from their neighboring cultures, placed great value on representing their past in order to understand the present and to anticipate the future. Many aspects of the Pentateuch suggest that its final editors were engaging crucial struggles that the Judean community experienced in the wake of the Babylonian Exile and under the Persian empire. Additionally, portions of traditional material seem to have addressed concerns from earlier periods.

The Pentateuch’s Liturgical Function

The Pentateuch is not only an account of the past; it is also a sacred, foundational text. The Bible contains only a few instructions or descriptions regarding how it was read. The following verses conclude the section of Deuteronomy that has been regarded as the “essence” of the Torah:

Take to heart these words which I command you today. Keep repeating them to your children. Recite them when you are at home and when you are away, when you lie down and when you get up. (Dt 6:6–7)

“These words” may refer to the entire book of Deuteronomy. Beyond this instruction, multiple indicators throughout the Bible, reviewed earlier, convey the foundational, sacred, and authoritative status of the Pentateuch. One may imagine a variety of communal and domestic settings in which its texts were read or recited from memory. The sacred and authoritative character of the texts, combined with the belief that the act of listening to them was carried out in response to God’s instruction, would have supported for those texts a liturgical function: to draw people into an encounter with God through words and actions that stand outside ordinary space and time.

Genesis: The Prequel

The narratives of the Exodus through Deuteronomy expand upon core traditions portraying Israel as coming into existence when the LORD freed them from slavery in Egypt. Those core traditions, combined with archaeological evidence and additional textual evidence, place Israel's origins in the late thirteenth century BC. (See RG 33–55 and RG 179–185.) This combined evidence calls into question the historicity of the biblical narrative describing massive numbers of Israelites leaving Egypt, journeying through the wilderness, and conquering Canaanite cities. It is more likely that Israel's earliest traditions of their origins stem from the experience of a relatively small number of people who declared that their God had freed them and brought them to Canaan. If subsequent generations seeking to account for Israel's origins had been content simply to expand on those events, there likely would be no book of Genesis.

Supplementing the expansive narratives relating how Israel emerged as a people out of Egypt, Genesis provides a prequel. It was necessary to reconcile Israel's relatively recent origins with the assumption, prevalent in the ancient world, that the order of things including elements of culture, was established during the primeval era when the cosmos was created. Genesis provides a narrative that blends and adapts various traditions in order to link the LORD's creation of the cosmos in the primeval era with the LORD's creation of Israel out of slaves oppressed by the Egyptian empire.

The story of God's creation of the universe in Genesis 1:1–2:3 anticipates the creation of Israel in several ways. Of these, perhaps the most pronounced is that by resting on the seventh day God observes the Sabbath, a central institution of Israel's communal life explained in the laws given through Moses. Accounts of the creation of the nations, the violence of humanity, the flood, and the tower of Babel (Gn 2:4–11:9) establish a pattern that provides a rationale for God's choice of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. God's first attempt at creating humanity does not work well: the earliest humans display remarkable capacity for violence and malice; after the flood, people prove incapable of recognizing their proper role in relationship to God. Thus, in both cases, God employs the strategy of selecting one man and his descendants in the hope that from them the rest of humanity might find the blessing that God intends for them.

In various ways, the stories of the Patriarchs anticipate the later narratives of the Pentateuch as well as the historical experience of Israel.

Abraham enters the land initially from Mesopotamia and then from Egypt after having to flee there because of famine. His movement to and from Egypt anticipates both the descent of Jacob and his sons to Egypt, again because of famine, and the Israelites' exodus from Egypt, journey to Canaan, and eventual possession of the land. Abram's initial journey to Canaan from Ur anticipates the experience of those who returned to Judea from Babylon after the Exile, an experience fresh in the collective memory of the Judeans for whom the Pentateuch was written. Jacob goes into exile in Mesopotamia and reenters the land with fear for his life.

The stories and genealogies concerning Jacob, whose name is changed to Israel in the course of the narrative, account for the ancestor whose identity the entire people of Israel carries. In the stories of Jacob's sons, those same chapters account for the named ancestors of each of the tribes of Israel. These chapters locate Jacob/Israel and his sons initially in the promised land and then explain how they ended up in Egypt, thus setting the stage for the Exodus. A brief sketch of a plausible reconstruction of the actual history of the tribes of Israel is helpful for putting in perspective the relationship between that history and the function of these narratives.

Scholars propose different theories to explain the growth of the Israelite population during the late second millennium and its relationship to the non-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan. It is generally agreed that most of the population of early Israel was indigenous to Canaan. An exodus group or groups may have entered Canaan and attracted the affiliation of local tribes, although (as reflected in differences among biblical lists of Israelite tribes) just which tribes were included changed over time. What distinguished the Israelite tribes from others was the spiritual and political bond among them that was characterized by belonging to the LORD and being obligated to help fellow Israelite tribes, especially in times of military necessity. Several aspects of such a bond could explain its appeal to local Canaanite tribes: the compelling character of the stories of victories of the LORD against Egypt and in Canaan; the association of the LORD with the critique of oppressive use of power; the lack of any centralized authority such as a king; and the political, military, and socioeconomic benefits of mutual support.

One cannot rule out the possibility that certain patriarchal traditions may have originated prior to the Exodus. The stories about Jacob and his sons place the origins of the Israelite tribes in a single family who lived long before the Exodus. In actuality, though, those tribes most probably affiliated with one another in a gradual, fluid process during the centuries after 1200 BC. In view of this, modern readers may be inclined to dismiss the biblical claim that these tribes were related by blood as simply false. In the Israelite context, though, terms of kinship were not restricted to people actually related by blood or marriage; they were employed to describe a whole range of social relationships characterized by mutual obligation and commitment. For Judeans of the Persian period, the narratives of Jacob/Israel and his sons provided a story of origins upon which to base the obligation of mutual commitment among all the people of the LORD that could counter past memories and present experiences and of enmity among them.

Exodus–Deuteronomy

These books consist of expansive narratives describing the LORD's rescue of Israel from slavery in Egypt, entering into a covenant with them at Sinai, and bringing them through the wilderness to Canaan. These narratives model several essential dynamics of Israelite religion for helping people to navigate their relationship to God amid the struggle and suffering of life. Overall, when the people cry out from their suffering, the LORD is responsive to them and proves worthy of trust. Yet, the people often struggle to trust God in the midst of difficulty, and they protest against God. Regarding protest, the narrative draws the hearer into a paradox by affirming the validity of such protest, while simultaneously inviting reconsideration of the perspectives upon which it is based in order to cultivate trust. Prior to arrival at Sinai, God accommodates the people's protests by feeding them. During the journey from Sinai to Canaan, however, further protest is considered unacceptable in light of how God has freed them from slavery and cared for them along the journey. The people recognize and celebrate God's saving activity, especially at the Red Sea. In these ways, the narratives reflect the complex interplay of lament, praise, protest, and trust that combine to foster the community's trust in God.

It is in the context of these stories, which portray the growth of the Israelites' trusting relationship with the LORD, that the collections of laws governing them are embedded. The law collections originated in different periods, reflecting different social sensibilities and theological perspectives. The legal material includes three major collections that originated independently during different periods. From oldest to youngest these are: the Covenant Code (Ex 21–23), the Deuteronomic Code (Dt 12–26), and the Holiness Code (Lv 17–26). In addition, there are versions of the Decalogue in Exodus 20:8–11 and Deuteronomy 5:6–18. Exodus also includes the “Ritual Decalogue” (Ex 34:10–28). Deuteronomy recounts the great command to love God, followed by exhortations against idolatry in Canaan (Dt 6–11). There are also collections of laws pertaining to the Tabernacle, the making of offerings, and the observance of festivals in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers. In terms of the dynamics of lament, praise, protest, and trust, the ritual laws include many that concern sacrifices and festivals, the purpose of which is to seek reconciliation with God after sin and to celebrate God’s ongoing saving activity and presence with Israel and in the world.

The fact that the legal material stems from different original collections explains the reason that there are laws treating the same issue in different ways. These include:

- the Sabbath command (Ex 20:8–12; Dt 5:12–15);

- laws concerning slaves (Ex 21:2–11; Dt 15:12–18; Lv 25:39–55);

- laws concerning loans (Ex 22:24; Dt 23:20–21; Lv 25:35–36).

The modern reader might wonder why multiple laws treating the same issue were retained. Why not simply discard the older versions? The explanation has to do with the fact that the cultures of the ancient Near East were essentially conservative in that they placed great value on what was considered ancient, and so tended to preserve ancient laws and traditions. To bring what was old in line with contemporary social realities, they also updated them. In this respect, the Deuteronomic Code presents itself as a revision of the Covenant Code, and the Holiness Code expands upon this prior revision.

The books of Leviticus and Deuteronomy have distinct theological and even political emphases. Deuteronomy downplays the role of the king in the life and identity of the community. Moses was held up as the model for prophets, and their role was to assist the people in living in relationship with God according to the law of Moses. In Leviticus, priestly activity pertained largely to sacrifices and the Temple, for which the Tabernacle was a paradigm. The Holiness school extended the concept of holiness from sacrifices and Temple to the role of all the people. They were to be holy in the way that they attended to their ordinary behaviors in daily life while not neglecting the observance of Sabbath, festivals, the making of offerings to God, and guidelines regarding purity and food.

Key Concepts

Many elements of the Pentateuch, including some that may seem strange or disturbing to modern readers, become more comprehensible in light of the cultural assumptions behind those texts.

Blessing

In the Bible, blessing is not limited to something that God does to humans. Humans bless God as well as other humans. The Hebrew verb for “to bless” (brk), and its cognates in other Semitic languages, can also mean “to greet,” and the notion of recognition of relationship underlies the logic of the concept. The act of blessing implies the affirmation, anticipation, or hope that the person (human or divine) whom one “blesses” is or will be in a favorable relationship with the one doing the blessing. When the notion of blessing is invoked, the relationship—typically either God–human or parent–child—is asymmetrical. In whichever direction the blessing is enacted, it expresses fundamentally the recognition that the relationship is reciprocal and favorable, even as it is asymmetrical. When humans bless God, they commit to enacting their part as the subordinate in the relationship and that is to serve God loyally. When God blesses humans, or fathers bless their children, the concept of blessing often includes a promise or bestowal of the life, provision, and protection that ultimately originate from God. Within the worldview of these cultures, however, such material goods are understood to result from the favorable relationship that people enjoy with God. As seen in the stories of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the father’s blessing of his children may involve a recognition of their status in relationship to each other; it also presumes a transfer to the offspring of the father’s favorable relationship with God. Such transfer follows the understanding of personal identity, presumed in the Bible, that offspring actually represent a continuity of the identity of their parents.

Covenant

In the ancient Near East, a covenant was an agreement establishing a favorable relationship between parties, sworn with the gods as witnesses and defining certain benefits and obligations of the relationship, with the expectation that the gods would enforce the agreement. Describing the relationship between God and humans in terms of covenant underlines the personal character of that relationship. While modern Western culture draws a sharp distinction between what is bureaucratic and what is personal, in the ancient Near East even political and business negotiations were understood in personal, familial terms. The Pentateuch tells of God establishing three covenants: one with all humanity through Noah; one with Abraham, anticipating the future Israel; and one with Moses and the Israelite people (the Mosaic covenant). When the Pentateuch was compiled after the Exile, the stories of these three covenants together helped the people remain in relationship with God.

The Mosaic covenant refers broadly to the agreements enacted between the Israelites and God through the leadership of Moses. The terms of this covenant are woven into the lengthy narrative from the appearance of the LORD at Sinai (called Horeb in Deuteronomy) to the laws given by Moses in Moab. In many places, this covenant emphasizes conditionality: God will remain committed to providing for the people, if they remain faithful in serving God. This emphasis provided an explanation for why God allowed the traumatic destruction of Jerusalem and the Babylonian Exile: these events resulted from the people's injustice and faithlessness. This conditionality is emphasized by the Deuteronomist.

The covenants with Noah and Abraham, preserved by the Priestly school, are both described as "everlasting" and emphasize unconditionality. God promises to Noah to provide for humanity and never again to destroy all creatures by means of a flood. The sign of this covenant is the rainbow. God promises that Abraham will be the father of a multitude of nations, that they will have the land of Canaan, and that God will be their God. The sign of this covenant is male circumcision. Even though there are requirements of the people in each case, the idea that God might no longer be bound by the covenant is not mentioned. The Priestly school thus supports hope in the face of the trauma of the Exile by emphasizing the validity of the older unconditional covenants with Noah (Gn 9) and Abraham (Gn 17).

Monotheism and Terms for God

Although both Judaism and Christianity are monotheistic religions, ways of understanding the God of Israel developed over time. For a more complete discussion of this complicated development, see several books by Mark S. Smith noted in the Further Reading section. The cultures of the ancient Near East may be considered polytheistic in that they understood the divine world as a social world populated by different divine persons, all of whom interacted with each other and with humans. In the early stages of their history, the Israelites shared such a belief. The Bible is distinctive, though, in insisting that Israel should not worship any other deity except the one who brought them out of slavery, whose name is YHWH. It is apparent from the biblical text that the Israelites often did worship other deities, but the laws of the Pentateuch and, later, the Prophets are consistent in forbidding such worship. While other particular nations or cities each might have its ruling deity, thus far there is no evidence of similar prohibition against the worship of other deities. Still, the attributes of the LORD are not completely distinct. It is clear that as the Israelites emerged in Canaan, they drew upon traditions about the most important Canaanite gods, El and Baal, in order to represent the LORD. During and after the Exile, however, there is a shift toward a strong affirmation of the incomparability of the LORD, who reigned supreme over the entire universe. This shift may be considered monotheistic in that it effectively placed the LORD in a unique category, above whatever other divine beings people might have believed to exist. Belief in subordinate supernatural beings is developed extensively in Jewish literature from the Persian period and later.

There are several Hebrew terms for referring to God. These include various descriptive titles, such as “Almighty,” which are explained in the notes to the biblical text. The most common terms are translated in the NABRE either as “God” or “LORD.” The term ’el and a few related terms can signify a general term for a “god,” or they can refer to Israel’s God. In extrabiblical texts, ’el can refer to the chief deity of the Canaanite pantheon. Related to ’el, the term ’elohim is a plural form, but it comes to be treated as a singular in referring to Israel’s God.

The name of Israel’s God is represented in the biblical text by four consonants: YHWH. While it is difficult to know for certain, the best guess at an original pronunciation of the name is “Yahweh.” In postexilic times, however, a tradition emerged of not pronouncing the name out of reverence but substituting the word ’adonai (“lord,” “sir”) when reading the biblical text. NABRE and other modern translations render the divine name as “LORD” out of respect for the ancient tradition. When vowels were added to the biblical text, the vowels for ’adonai were placed under the name.

Centuries ago, some scholars mistakenly read the vowels as belonging to the name and concluded it should be pronounced “Jehovah.”

GENESIS

[see pages 9–81 of the Old Testament]

Before proceeding, it is recommended that readers turn to the “The Pentateuch,” RG 109, for a discussion of fundamental issues not repeated here.

OVERALL STRUCTURE OF THE BOOK

Genesis may be divided into two major sections. It begins with the origins of the world and the nations in 1:1–11:26; 11:27–50:26 relates stories of Israel’s ancestors in four successive generations: Abraham and Sarah; Isaac and Rebekah; Jacob/Israel and his wives Leah and Rachel; and the sons of Jacob/Israel, who bear the names of the tribes of Israel. Since the culture in which ancient Israel emerged was patriarchal, the line of ancestry in Genesis follows the male ancestors, and many of the stories focus on them. While these stories are commonly referred to as “the patriarchal narratives,” it is important to recognize the significant roles that women play in them.

Genealogies

Readers of Genesis may find its genealogies among its least interesting passages, yet these sections are important both for the structure of the book and for explaining ancient Israel’s origins in relationship to those of the peoples around them.

In Genesis, a Hebrew formula (toledoth [X]) literally meaning “what was engendered by [X]” functions—in all but one case—to introduce the descendants of the person named. The NABRE most often translates this phrase “the descendants of X,” but it may also be translated “the generations of X.” The formula occurs in eleven (counting Gn 36:9, which duplicates Gn 36:1) places in Genesis and helps to structure the book. The first occurrence (Gn 2:4a) refers to what was engendered by the heavens and earth, and likely served as an editorial link between the two creation stories. The remaining occurrences designate the following characters: Adam, Noah, Noah’s sons (Shem, Ham, and Japheth), Shem (ancestor of Abraham), Terah (father of Abraham), Ishmael, Isaac, Esau, and Jacob. In the cases of Adam, Noah, Terah, Isaac, and Jacob, the formula begins a substantial narrative. By contrast, for Ishmael and Esau, neither of whom were chosen by God in the story, the names listed are not followed by a narrative. The genealogy of another non-elect brother, Cain, is not introduced by this formula.

Genealogies have vertical and horizontal dimensions. The vertical dimension, by describing a particular line of ancestry, provides a basis for claims to status or power. The genealogies in Genesis establish a claim to ancestry that links Israel not only to the patriarchs and the promises made to them by God but also to Adam and Eve. The horizontal dimension, describing multiple descendants in a given generation, serves to explain relationships of kinship among groups, sometimes also describing characteristics of a given kinship group. The genealogies of the sons of Noah situate Israel (a descendant of Shem) in relationship to the peoples who populated all areas of the known world and giving special attention to their destiny to dominate the Canaanites. The genealogy of Jacob, who is renamed Israel, in connection with the blessing that he bestows on each of his sons (Gn 49), provides a rationale both for unity among the tribes of Israel and for the dominance of Judah and Joseph over the other tribes.

Genesis 1:1–2:3 The Creation of the World Anticipates Israel's Creation

Preamble to the Pentateuch

Many of the stories and laws of the Pentateuch address the challenge of relating to others and to God, given the violence, struggle, and suffering involved in the human condition. Located here as a preamble, this passage places all of that in context. It portrays the goodness and harmony of God's design for the world, the tenderness of God's provision for humanity and all life, and the majestic and awe-inspiring sovereignty that God has over the world. It also affirms humanity's capacity, in God's image, to share in God's creative work. Ultimately, human dignity comes directly from God.

Although biblical tradition clearly understands that Israel's creation as a people occurred not during the primeval period but within ordinary history, the Priestly writers used poetic means to root multiple aspects of Israelite culture in the creation of the world. Careful attention to the poetic artistry of this first unit within Genesis reveals thematic links to the entire Pentateuch according to the theological perspective of the Priestly writers. Elements establishing such links include: the activities of separating and organizing that characterize God's creative work; God's instructions to the humans; and the ways in which Israel's understanding of sacred space and time is woven into the very fabric of the cosmos.

This passage tells of how God creates the universe by separating and organizing, both of which are fundamental Priestly concepts for establishing Israelite identity and behavior. God separates light from darkness, the waters above the heavens from those below it, land from water, and night from day. This view of the cosmos was shared by other ancient Near Eastern and Mediterranean peoples and is similar to the description of creation given in the Babylonian Enuma Elish. God creates and organizes, placing the sun and moon in the heavens, the fish in the sea, the birds in the air, the animals and humans on the earth. In biblical Israel, as in many cultures, the idea of being sacred or holy entailed being separated out from the ordinary. The Pentateuch describes how God creates Israel as a people by separating them out from the rest of the nations for a special relationship with God and giving them their own unique system of instructions for living by which they are to distinguish themselves from other nations. The Priestly perspective emphasizes that by living according to that system Israel participates with God in the ongoing project of creation. The separating and organizing that characterize God's creation of the universe and of Israel also characterize the Priestly instructions throughout the Pentateuch regarding ritual matters and (with the Holiness Code) all aspects of life. Many of the Priestly laws—such as those concerning food, sacrifices, sex, and death—involve activities of separating and organizing. Thus, by emphasizing such activities the Priestly writers have linked the ritual and social instructions in the Pentateuch to God's creative activity. Despite the attempts of fundamentalists to read Genesis 1 as factual, and despite misguided attempts to find an allusion to evolution in the extension of creation over seven days, Genesis 1 is not a scientific account in the modern sense.

God's instructions to humanity are linked to the Pentateuch in several ways. On the one hand, the fulfillment of God's command that humanity be fruitful is demonstrated in the genealogies of Genesis and in many narratives describing procreation throughout the Pentateuch. On the other hand, this command anticipates further specification for Israel in commands concerning sexual behavior (e.g., Lv 18). God's command to subdue the earth likely reflects the ancient notion that each nation was to take the land given to it by God. Using the same verb (kbs), this command anticipates how Israel will take possession of the land of Canaan, which will be subdued before them (Nm 32:22, 29; Jos 18:1). Finally, at this stage humans are vegetarians, for God has not yet given them meat or fish to eat. The instruction about food here anticipates further instruction to Noah that allows for the eating of meat but not blood, and ultimately the detailed food laws (Lv 11) and the rationale given (in Lv 17) for not eating blood.

In Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, the Priestly writers devote detailed attention to the calendar of festivals and the Sabbath. The present passage anticipates all three of these without naming any of them. It notes that the lights of the sky mark seasons, days, and years, and so it reflects the ancient practice, not unique to Israel, of using celestial observation to organize time. This anticipates the Priestly concern with the calendar of festivals. The Sabbath is emphasized in several ways, even though humans are not yet commanded to observe it. God not only rests from the work of creation on the seventh day, in the culminating act in the passage God blesses and consecrates that day. The Priestly writer's version of the Sabbath command (Ex 20:8–11) includes a rationale linking the command to God's rest on the seventh day of creation. Although other ancient Near Eastern cultures, including that of the Babylonians, celebrated creation as part of New Year's festivals, there is no festival called New Year's in the Pentateuch. Associating creation with the Sabbath rather than the New Year may well reflect the desire to assert Israelite identity during the Exile in Babylon, where impressive New Year's festivals celebrated the Babylonian god Marduk.

Humankind is the crowning creation in the preamble, and the details of the account are striking. The significance of saying that humanity is created in the image of God becomes clearer when seen in the light of Mesopotamian royal ideology. A standard title of the king in many Babylonian and Assyrian royal inscriptions calls him "the image of [name of a deity]." Claiming to be in the divine image set the king apart from everyone else for a special relationship with the deity. The Priestly writer thus portrays all humanity as having dignity given by God and as capable of intimate relationship with God. In light of this affirmation, to specify humanity as male and female affirms that both sexes enjoy such dignity. On the other hand, for the Priestly writers, since God does not have a consort or sex, to be differentiated by sex is a way in which humans are not like God. The account assumes that heterosexual marriage is normal, but the account is schematic, and does not comment on homosexual relations. We will find a fuller discussion of various sexual activities in Leviticus.

Genesis 2:4–11:26 Origins of the Nations

Gn 2:4a: While scholars have debated whether this phrase belongs with what precedes or what follows, this first of the eleven genealogical formulas in Genesis is likely an editorial insertion intended to introduce what follows while also linking it to the story of the seven days of creation.

Genesis 2:4b–6:4

The First Humans and the Spread of Civilization and Violence

After the idyllic preamble, Genesis turns to an account of creation and the earliest generations of humans that addresses fundamental questions about the human condition and about God's intentions for humanity. The narrative treats disobedience, rivalry, murder, vengefulness, and ultimately the rampant wickedness that prompts God to destroy humanity except for Noah's family, and to begin again. These stories occur during the period "before the flood," a period portrayed here, as in other ancient Near Eastern sources, as primeval and qualitatively different from recognizable human history.

Genesis 2:4b–3:24

This section addresses several aspects of the human condition as well as the fundamental relationship of obedience to God. How is it that people were created? The environment needed them: no plants or herbs of the field had sprouted because there was no one to till them. Why are humans of two sexes? The undifferentiated human needed to relate to a suitable human counterpart. Why must humans die? On a poetic level, it is only natural: the human, in Hebrew ha 'adam, was taken from the dust of the ground, in Hebrew ha 'adamah. It is fitting that humans return to the ground. Still, the reality of death is softened in that the woman is named "Eve," a name similar to the Hebrew term for life. This is an apt name, given women's capacity to bear children, and in the biblical view of identity, allowing the identity of parents to continue beyond their own deaths. In terms of plot, God warns that eating of the tree will bring death. Since the couple was not created immortal—if they were, it would not make sense for God to be worried that they might become immortal (3:22), the death against which they were warned was likely understood to be immediate. In this case, that the couple did not die immediately but was exiled from the garden and charged with difficult labor can be understood as an expression of leniency.

Beyond its biological meaning, death in the biblical world also serves as a metaphor for alienation and isolation, and in this story it is the metaphor of death as alienation from God upon which Christian theology has focused. Christian teaching since the Church Fathers has followed the lead of Paul, who offered the first known interpretation that Adam and Eve's disobedience caused humanity to be in a fundamental state of alienation from God, termed both “death” (1 Cor 15:20–23) and “sin” (Rom 5:12), a state that came to be called “original sin.” For early Christians, beginning with Paul, who argued that the saving work of Christ pertained to Gentiles as well as Jews, the alienation resulting from Adam and Eve’s disobedience represented the fundamental condition, common to all humanity, from which Christ offers salvation. The Hebrew story, however, does not suggest that a state of sin or alienation is transmitted. The story is rather paradigmatic of the phenomenon of temptation. Equally, the snake here is not Satan or the devil, although it came to be interpreted in this way in the first century AD (e.g., in Rev 12).

While creation of humans from the earth has parallels in other ancient Near Eastern creation stories, the humans here are not created in order to relieve the gods of their backbreaking labor. A tone of exploitation in the divine motivation for creating humans occurs in the Babylonian creation stories. In one such story, Enuma Elish, also called The (Babylonian) Epic of Creation (Dalley, Myths from Mesopotamia, 228–77; Context of Scripture [CoS] 1:391–402), humans are created to labor so that the gods might have leisure. Another story, Atrahasis, specifies that humans are to relieve a class of gods call Igigi from their forced labor digging out canals and rivers (Dalley, Myths, 1–38). A tone of exploitation is absent the present story. The LORD creates the humans and places them in his own royal garden to tend it. The image is one of dignified, not exploitative, labor.

One of the most controversial verses in the story is the word of God to Eve, that “your urge shall be for your husband, and he shall rule over you” (3:16). Coupled with the story that Eve was taken from Adam’s rib this verse has often been taken to authorize the subordination of women. The first epistle to Timothy in the New Testament even claims, that it was not Adam who was led astray, but Eve, although in Genesis they are equally responsible. The verse is not prescriptive, however, but rather a statement of the way things were in the world as the author knew it. Similarly, men are supposed to eat their bread with the sweat of their brow and snakes are supposed to crawl on their bellies and eat dirt.

An aspect of the dignity with which the LORD treats Adam and Eve is the LORD’s apparent desire that they be free to make their own decisions. They are not predetermined. The LORD is not depicted here as all-knowing or all-controlling, but as a God who lets human beings decide what they want to be.

Genesis 4:1–25

From the story of Adam and Eve's disobedience and expulsion from Eden, the narrative turns to contemplate two fundamental roots of violence, rivalry over the success of one's kin and the spiraling hatred that can arise when one feels violated.

While the story tells how God looks favorably on Abel's offering but not on that of Cain, God's preference here remains a mystery. The story offers no explanation for it. The story follows Cain's response, his anger over his brother's success. By warning Cain that "sin lies in wait at the door" (4:7), God characterizes Cain's inclination to violence as something separate from himself; in other words, he has the freedom not to act on it. This is a penetrating insight into the human heart, for in moments of passionate anger or envy, people can feel as if they have no alternative but to act on their violent inclinations. After Cain kills Abel, God shows compassion on Cain. Given the cultural expectation that murderers should be put to death, it is surprising that God does not kill Cain outright and explicitly forbids that anyone should do so. Cain's murderous act, however, does have a serious consequence: his separation from his family.

The genealogy here accounts for the origins of various aspects of culture, as do some accounts of the Mesopotamian pre-flood sages. It also follows the theme of violence begun with Cain. Among Cain's offspring is Lamech, who boasts of his capacity for violent retaliation. For Lamech, the root of violence is not envy but injury, and his angry response is not commensurate with his injury. He kills in retaliation for a wound or a bruise. He epitomizes the way in which passionate anger over injury can spiral in horrific ways. It is over against such spiraling of violence that the law of talion, popularly known as "eye for eye" (Ex 21:23–25), is best understood. That law sets a boundary against such spiraling violence. Jesus's teaching that one should forgive "not seven times but seventy-seven times" (Mt 18:22) alludes to this saying of Lamech.

Since Cain has been exiled, and his offspring has proven more violent than he, God provides Adam and Eve with another son, Seth.

Genesis 5:1–6:4

The second of the Priestly introductory formulas introduces this genealogy. While it includes many of the same names as that of Cain's genealogy, the point is that of Adam and Eve's children, Seth rather than Cain is the ancestor of Noah and eventually of Israel. Both the extraordinarily long life-spans in the genealogy and the story of the liaisons between divine beings and humans reflect a view of the time before the flood as one when the boundaries between humans and the gods were not yet clearly established.

Genesis 6:5–9:17

The Flood

In contrast to the goodness that God saw in creation in Genesis 1, here God sees such human wickedness that it causes God to be grieved and to regret having created humanity. The violation of the boundary between divine and human seems implicated in the spread of wickedness. God's response is to wipe out humanity with a flood. The present account combines a Priestly version with other materials attributed to the J source. In 7:11, the Priestly writer explains the flood in terms of a reversal of the process of creation described in Genesis 1. There, God separated the waters by creating a dome to hold back the waters above the sky and separated the land from the waters below. Here, God allows the waters to burst through the open windows in the dome, and the waters from under the earth to gush forth so that the earth disappears. See Figure 1, RG 122.

The story bears strong resemblance to a flood tradition preserved in stories from Mesopotamia. One version is well preserved in the second part of a lengthy narrative, Atrahasis, the first part of which describes the creation of humans from the earth to relieve the gods of their difficult labor. In the second part, the rationale for the gods' sending the flood is that the rapidly expanding human population is making so much noise that the gods cannot sleep. The gods resolve to wipe them out with a series of plagues, the third of which is a universal flood. Ea (the god of magic and wisdom) tips off his favorite human, Atrahasis, who builds a boat and rides out the flood. In the absence of human servants, however, the gods come to regret their decision. When Atrahasis is found, the gods are relieved and create anew, but this time with inbuilt population control devices, e.g., infancy diseases, and an order of celibate women. In contrast to Atrahasis, in Genesis what prompts God to enact the flood is human wickedness rather than an inability to sleep because of human noise. Moreover, rather than a self-serving motive like that of the gods in Atrahasis, the turning point in Genesis is God's concern for humanity: God "remembers" Noah (8:1). This is the first of several instances in the Pentateuch in which God "remembers" and then rescues, culminating in God's remembering of the covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, leading to the rescue of the Israelites from slavery in Egypt (Ex 2:24–25).

After the flood, Noah's family represents humanity's new beginning. God addresses Noah in words partially quoting God's instructions to the first humans (Gn 1:28). Making a covenant with Noah, preserving his family, and promising never to destroy the earth by flood, dramatize God's desire and capacity to preserve a favorable relationship with humanity, even in the wake of violence and destruction. Alongside God's promise, however, comes legislation concerning murder and the symbolically related prohibition against eating meat with blood in it. It is as if each time people consume meat, not consuming its blood serves as a reminder of the sacredness of life. This is the origin of the Jewish practice of salting meat in order to absorb the blood before cooking. The explanation in Lv 17 supplements this theology.

Genesis 9:18–19

These verses serve as a transition from the story of the flood, resuming the story of Noah's sons, already named in 5:32.

Genesis 9:20–11:26

This section serves as a transition from the flood story to prepare for the story of Abraham by the particular ways in which narratives and genealogies are presented.

The conclusion of the flood constitutes a turning point, with events being referred to twice as occurring "after the flood" (10:1; 11:10). The narrative explains that Shem, the ancestor of Abraham, is blessed by Noah, in contrast to the curse that falls on Ham, the father of Canaan. This anticipates the conflict between the Israelites and the Canaanites in the book of Numbers and the subsequent biblical narrative. The genealogies of Noah's three sons explain the origins of all the peoples of the known world, providing context for the emergence of Abraham. It would be normal for the genealogy of the eldest, Shem, to appear first. In order to highlight anticipation of Abraham, however, Shem's genealogy is given last (10:21–31) and repeated in a variation (11:10–26) that concludes with Terah, the father of Abraham. In the Genesis narrative, as in Mesopotamian traditions, life spans “after the flood” are shorter than “before the flood” but will remain abnormally long and only gradually become more realistic.

Between the two genealogies of Shem, a brief story is set in Babel, Hebrew for Babylon. The people's desire to build a tall tower suggests the ziggurats for which Babylon was famous. The story fits the genre of an etiology, an explanation of origins, in two ways. It explains that there are different languages as a result of the divine will to keep humans in check. In the story of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, people speak in different languages but are still able to understand one another (Acts 2:4–6), suggesting an allusion to the story of Babel intended to portray a unified purpose among the people that is of God. The story also explains the origins of the name of Babylon by means of a folk etymology associating Babel with the Hebrew balal “to confuse.” The story mocks the Babylonian empire by combining this etymology with the punishment of the people's collective hubris and refusal of obedient relationship with God.

At the same time, the story both anticipates and provides a foil for Abraham in two ways. In the story, all humanity decides to stay in one place in order to avoid being scattered throughout the world. This attitude runs contrary to the divine command to fill the earth (Gn 1:28; 9:1). By contrast, Abraham obeys God's command to go to an unnamed land from Ur in Southern Mesopotamia. While the people of Babel seek to make a name for themselves by building a tower, God promises to make Abraham's name great.

Genesis 11:27–50:26

Origins of Israel's Ancestors

A repeated pattern in these stories establishes the special relationship that the Israelites have with the LORD, emphasizing its distinctiveness by comparison to Israel's neighboring nations. In each of the first three generations, God chooses Israel's ancestor rather than someone else. For each of the three patriarchs, a counterpart is not chosen, each of whom is associated with a people who play an important role in Israel's subsequent story. Abraham has a nephew, Lot, who fathers both the Ammonites and the Moabites. Jacob has a brother, Esau, who fathers the Edomites. The Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites were nations residing East of the Jordan and were often in conflict with Israelites throughout their history. Isaac has a half-brother Ishmael, son of the Egyptian Hagar. From the name Ishmael comes the term Ishmaelite, which refers broadly to bedouin or desert Arabs. A group of Ishmaelites bring Joseph to Egypt after he is sold to them by his brothers.

The LORD's covenant includes three promises to Abraham: to make of him a great nation, to bless him, and to give him the land of Canaan. While Ishmael and Esau also receive promises of blessing, the threefold promise is repeated only to Isaac and to Jacob. The emphasis on corporate identity in ancient Israelite culture puts in perspective that Abraham's descendants through Isaac and Jacob share his identity, which includes sharing in the benefits of the covenant that God has made with him. Although the text emphasizes the unconditional aspect of the covenant by calling it "everlasting" and not mentioning the possibility that God might revoke it, God nevertheless requires obedient trust and, as a sign of the covenant, the enactment of male infant circumcision. Abraham's heroic trust and obedience become a model and inspiration for all Israel, and the Joseph narrative makes poignantly clear that obedience to God also includes caring for one another. Repeatedly, and in each generation, the narrative demonstrates that the cultivation of trust in God involves becoming more and more willing to let go of one's own expectations.

Abraham

God's first word to Abram is "Go." God's promises of land, blessing, and progeny presume that Abraham will trust God and go as directed. God's initial encounter with Abraham and the cycle of stories that reaches a climax on Mount Moriah in Genesis 22 make clear that fundamentally what God is offering Abraham is a covenant relationship. Abraham and the Israelites who inherit it are promised the benefits of becoming an extraordinarily large nation on their own land. However, these stories anticipate that time and again God will invite unconditional trust and obedience, and that those benefits often may not materialize in the manner desired. Here, as in other Semitic cultures of the ancient Near East, divine blessing entails that God regards Abraham favorably and desires a reciprocal relationship with him in which both parties recognize the asymmetry and commit to fulfilling their different responsibilities faithfully. God, who is infinitely more powerful than Abraham, initiates the relationship and sets its terms, promising to provide for Abraham's flourishing, and expecting his unswerving loyalty. In the context of the Pentateuch, and indeed the entire Bible, such trust in God is foundational. While these narratives demonstrate God's solicitude for Abraham and his heir Israel, it is beginning in Exodus that the relationship is described explicitly as familial: Israel is God's son (Ex 4:22–23). Moses's speeches in Deuteronomy expand on God's parental commitment to love Israel.

Genesis 11:27–17:27

These chapters begin with God's initial promise, and they contain two separate accounts of God formally establishing a covenant with Abraham. Multiple elements woven into these stories not only raise doubts about the purity and depth of Abraham's trust, they also portray the kinds of problems that arise in a covenant relationship. In Genesis 17, God changes the names of Abram and Sarai to Abraham and Sarah, in order to dramatize the change in their destiny.

Immediately after describing the arrival of Abram, Sarai, and Lot in Canaan, the narrative explains that a famine causes Abram and Sarai to take refuge in Egypt. This journey anticipates the migration of Jacob/Israel's entire clan to Egypt (Gn 46) setting the stage for Exodus, and it also mirrors the experience of future generations of Israel who found themselves living outside the land. Out of fear for his life, Abram presents Sarai to Pharaoh as his sister. Use of the same tactic with the king of Gerar (Gn 20) suggests that this was a stock motif. Scholars have wrestled with the morality of Abraham's behavior. While the king in both stories reacts angrily, in neither case does harm come to the couple. On the contrary, they receive great wealth as a result. Survival is a higher priority than a strict moral code. Abraham's trickery here anticipates the kind of behavior we will find in the Jacob stories.

Genesis 13–14 present Abram as a model of trust and as a leader. By contrasting Abram with his nephew Lot, Genesis 13 highlights Abram's trust in God's providence. Lot asks for the fertile lands that he sees, but the narrator reveals that in time those lands will be rendered a waste. They include Sodom and Gomorrah, which were associated with the arid plains in the southern region of the Dead Sea. In Genesis 14 Abram demonstrates both family loyalty and leadership by pursuing and defeating the four kings who had captured his nephew Lot. Upon Abram's return, Melchizedek, the priest-king of Salem, blesses Abram. Salem is identified with Jerusalem, and the passage anticipates its importance in later history.

Genesis 15 begins with an exchange that depicts Abram both questioning God and trusting God's promise. God begins by assuring Abram that he will have a great reward. Abram replies that he still has no offspring to be his heir. In language that parallels the beginning of the Decalogue (Ex 20:2), God explains that he brought Abram out of Ur to Canaan in order to give him that land as a possession. Abram asks how he can be sure this will happen. Between two parts of a covenant ceremony, God explains that Abram's descendants will be oppressed in Egypt for centuries, but that they will return.

In Genesis 16, as roughly ten years have passed since their arrival in Canaan, and they still have no offspring, Abram takes Sarai's advice to have a child by her maidservant, an accepted practice in the ancient Near East. A heated rivalry between the two women ensues after the birth of Ishmael and becomes the basis for an ironic twist. The maidservant Hagar is Egyptian, and after she escapes the oppression of her mistress Sarai, a divine being meets her in the wilderness and orders her to return to her oppressive situation. This sequence alludes to and inverts how God frees the Israelites from oppression in Egypt and meets them in the wilderness to bring them to their land. This irony emphasizes the specialness of God's relationship with Israel, but it also raises difficult questions. Hagar is oppressed because of nationality, class, and gender; how does one interpret the fact that her oppression is sanctioned by God? The story can serve to raise consciousness among those who see the good things in their lives as given by God, while failing to recognize ways in which they benefit from the oppression of others, whether because of class, race, or gender.

In the Priestly account of the covenant with Abraham (Gn 17), God affirms the promises of progeny and land, and initiates the custom of circumcision as a sign of the covenant. God renames the couple Abraham and Sarah, and the language of blessing is applied to Sarah rather than Abraham. God declares that she will have a son, but Abraham laughs in disbelief and protests that Ishmael is sufficient. God reaffirms the declaration, and says that Abraham shall name the boy Isaac. As often occurs in Genesis, the story serves as an etiology for the name, which means “he laughs.”

Genesis 18:1–19:38

These two chapters form a unit that portrays the life and joy of God’s covenant relationship with Abraham through sharp and highly structured narrative contrasts. In Genesis 18, Sarah and Abraham demonstrate abundant hospitality, when in midday they receive three “men,” who speak as God. They ask for Sarah and announce that she will have a son within a year’s time. Overhearing the announcement, this time it is Sarah who laughs with disbelief. That Sarah is childless for so long before having a son places her story among a number of special birth stories involving formerly barren women, including Rebekah and Rachel. In Genesis 19, the two angels arrive in the evening to investigate the outcry of oppression that has gone out against Sodom and Gomorrah. Lot invites the two angels to his home. The outcry proves justified when the entire population threatens to violate not only the visitors but also Lot. Since the place is to be destroyed, the angels tell Lot to leave with his family so that they can avoid destruction. This message of impending destruction contrasts with the announcement of Sarah’s pregnancy, and while she was confused for joy, Lot’s family is confused with terror. Lot will have children, but it will be by his daughters, who make him drunk in order to have relations with him. For future generations of Israelites, such contrasts offer a vivid portrayal of Israel’s covenant relationship with God as the path to life and joy. For those facing choices about whether or not to remain in that collective relationship, it presents Lot as the alternative: making his way alone and confused in a violent world.

The lengthy dialogue (Gn 18:22–33) between God and Abraham concerning the outcry against Sodom and Gomorrah demonstrates several things: Abraham’s desire to know whether God acts justly; the extent of God’s care for the innocent; the value that God places on educating Abraham in matters of justice; and the fact that neither God nor Abraham seeks to treat unjustly populations who do not share in the covenant. While some readers interpret the account of the men of Sodom as a condemnation of homosexuality, per se, three factors undercut such an interpretation. The sexual activity threatened by the men in the passage is violent rape. In the ancient patriarchal context, for a man to penetrate another man sexually could be understood as feminizing and so implicitly humiliating the man. The notion of sexual orientation as an enduring psychological reality was not understood.

Genesis 20:1–25:18

The account of Abraham and Sarah with Abimelech parallels that of their encounter with Pharaoh (Gn 12), however this story delves more deeply into moral and psychological complexity. Here, Abraham defends his actions, claiming that there is no fear of God there. However, the king's actions prove him wrong. Thus, Abraham again demonstrates weakness, but God nevertheless upholds him, designating him a prophet from whom Abimelech is to seek intercession. This favorable portrayal of a Canaanite is one of several that balance unfavorable portrayals of them in biblical traditions.

After Isaac is born, the story returns to Hagar and Ishmael, evoking great pathos for the two, as Abraham only with difficulty obeys God's instruction that he accede to Sarah's demands and drive them away. In terms of the larger plot, however, this action sets the scene for the test of Abraham in Genesis 22 by making clear that Ishmael will not be an heir to the covenant, even though God will make of him a great nation. Thus, when God asks Abraham to offer Isaac as a sacrifice, there is no fallback for an heir.

That story, known as "the binding ('aqedah) of Isaac," is perhaps one of the most moving and masterfully told stories in the Bible. Yet, readers may find it disturbing that God asks Abraham to sacrifice Isaac, and that Abraham is willing to comply. Interpretations that the angel's interruption of the sacrifice is meant as a general refutation of the practice of child sacrifice strain against the evidence. The magnitude of the sacrifice from Abraham's point of view should be underlined. Abraham is demonstrating a willingness to relinquish any assurance that his identity will survive or that God's promises to him will be fulfilled.

In the context of Israel's repeated collective traumas, including devastation and exile at the hands of the Assyrians and the Babylonians, and life under successive empires, this story would have supported hope that even from the brink of extinction God can preserve a future. New Testament writings reflect this story in various ways. For instance, in John 3:16 the Father's love for the world, expressed in giving his beloved Son, alludes to Abraham's love for God expressed in his willingness to offer his beloved son. In the Common Era, neither Jewish, Christian, nor Islamic tradition has used this story to justify harming children. All have seen it as a paradigm of trusting obedience to God.

The detailed narrative in Genesis 23, concerned with the purchase of land as a burial plot for Sarah, serves symbolically to establish the legality of Israel's claim to Canaan.

Abraham is determined that his heir shall not marry a Canaanite woman and so sends his servant to Haran in search of a suitable wife for Isaac. That neither Isaac nor Jacob intermarry with Canaanite women aligns with the consistent self-perception of Israel reflected in the Bible, that they entered the promised land as outsiders. Deuteronomy includes the imperative that Israel refrain from intermarrying with Canaanites even after settling there (Dt 7:1–4). The prohibition in these texts against marrying outside of Israel corresponds also with a major concern of the Persian period (e.g., Neh 10:31; 13:25).

Genesis 25 tells of Abraham's wife Keturah and his descendants by her. It also describes his clear designation of Isaac as his heir, while he makes gifts to his children by his concubines. After Abraham dies, both Isaac and Ishmael bury him. The section concludes with a list of Ishmael's descendants.

Genesis 25:19–26:35

Isaac

The list of Isaac's descendants introduces his narrative, which is brief by comparison to the cycles of stories pertaining to Abraham and Jacob. Multiple aspects of Isaac's narrative mirror that of Abraham.

Isaac's first act is to plead with God on behalf of Rebekah, who, like Sarah, is barren, that she might conceive. God responds by giving her twins, and the rivalry between Jacob and Esau begins already in the womb. God tells Rebekah that the children represent two nations, and that the younger shall take the elder's status as firstborn, which is not simply a matter of birth order; it must be confirmed by the father's blessing. Thus, the narrative affirms that both Esau's sale of his birthright to Jacob and Jacob's deception of Isaac in Genesis 27 to obtain his father's blessing fits within God's design.

As with Abraham, a famine forces Isaac to another location. As did his father, Isaac ends up in the court of king Abimelech of Gerar. At this point, God repeats to Isaac the threefold promise given to Abraham: blessing, progeny, and the land. Isaac also repeats Abraham's tactic to preserve his life by presenting his wife as his sister. Here, however, a comic twist occurs: before Rebekah is taken from Isaac, the king sees the couple romantically involved and confronts Isaac. God affirms to Isaac the promise of blessing and progeny. Isaac, like Abraham, makes a covenant with Abimelech. As God's first word to Abraham is to go to an unnamed place, his last word to Isaac is to go wherever God directs him. But this directive comes with the encouragement to not fear, for God will be with him.

Jacob/Israel

The stories about the eponymous ancestor of Israel portray him as a complex character, with a mixture of traits that would have made him attractive and inspiring to generations of Israelites. As the younger of twin boys and as a subordinate in the household of his father-in-law, Jacob represents a feisty underdog who proves himself astute, pragmatic, and resourceful. At the same time, the story makes clear that his success and the survival of his family result not only from his efforts but also from God's faithfulness at work in mysterious and unanticipated ways. From the point when Jacob returns to Canaan and his name is changed to Israel, he becomes less and less in control of events, facing fearsome and painful realities that require his trust in God. The accounts of his twelve sons, the eponymous ancestors of the tribes of Israel, not only explain how the family ended up in Egypt, they also provide a narrative rationale for the dominant status of Judah and Ephraim among the tribes.

Genesis 27–33

The prior narrative noted that Isaac preferred Esau, and Rebekah, Jacob. It also established that Jacob would supplant his twin brother. Genesis 27:1– 45 portrays the human actions leading to Jacob's becoming heir to the covenant. Having already exchanged a bowl of stew in return for Esau's claim on firstborn status, Jacob follows Rebekah's advice in deceiving Isaac into blessing him rather than Esau. Once enacted, such a formal blessing was understood to be unalterable. The attitude of the narrative toward Jacob's deception of Isaac is paradoxical: on the one hand, it is within God's plan that Jacob should be the heir to the covenant; on the other hand, Jacob will eventually humble himself before Esau, seeking reconciliation (33:1–17).

The details of the story reveal the pain and hostility that result as parents and sons are forced to relinquish their own desires. Isaac and Esau face the fact that Esau will not inherit the covenant. Esau is the eponymous ancestor of the Edomites. The sympathy shown for Esau here and the attention given to his genealogy (Gn 36) reflect a time when Israelites and Edomites enjoyed a fraternal relationship (cf. Dt 23:8). Rebekah has helped secure the blessing for her favorite, but she and Jacob will never see each other again. He is forced to flee for his life because of Esau's murderous threats against him. The story serves as a point of identification for hearers who face the pain of disrupted relationships and plans, even as it invites trust in the activity of God.

The following story (Gn 28:1–9) reflects source material that offers an alternative account of Jacob's reception of Isaac's blessing and departure for Haran. Here, Isaac knowingly blesses Jacob, and it is the search for a wife rather than the need to flee Esau that prompts Jacob's journey. However, the two accounts are linked by the inclusion in 27:46 of Rebekah's complaint to Isaac about the idea that Jacob might not marry within the clan.

In the ancient Near East, dreams were considered an ordinary means of divine communication. En route to Haran Jacob has a dream of angels ascending and descending a "stairway" (sometimes translated "ladder") that reaches to the heavens. God extends to Jacob the promises of land and progeny made to Abraham and Isaac, additionally promising to accompany and protect Jacob and bring him back to Canaan. Jacob vows to accept the LORD as his God on the condition that God protects and provides for him. This vow makes explicit the reciprocal character of covenant relationships in the ancient Near East.

Alluding to Genesis 11:1–10 (the Tower of Babel) as a foil in several respects, the story serves as an etiology for the important Israelite shrine at Bethel. The people of Babel attempt—to no avail—to build a tower with its head in the heavens, but God reveals to Jacob a stairway that leads to heaven. While the people are scattered from Babel, God is sending Jacob forth but will bring him back. In the Akkadian language, Babel means “gate of god,” but Jacob calls this place “house of God” (Bethel) and “gateway to heaven.”

Once in Haran, Jacob demonstrates both loyal service to Laban, and resourcefulness in looking out for his own interests. Of Laban’s daughters, Jacob prefers Rachel, and Laban agrees to give her to him in marriage. Laban’s deception of Jacob by substituting Leah for Rachel echoes Jacob’s deception of Isaac. Still, Jacob consents to Laban’s terms, serving him for an additional seven years. When Laban attempts to swindle Jacob out of livestock (30:25–43), Jacob protects his holdings by his own ingenuity supported by the implied blessing of God, ensuring that he will have the resources to return to Canaan.

Identifying the tribes of Israel with Jacob’s sons offers a basis for the bond of kinship among the tribes of Israel. Of the twelve sons, all are born in Haran except Benjamin, who is born in Canaan. The narrative describes the birth of each, including a brief etiology of each one’s name, and so lays the foundation for a major concern of the remainder of Genesis: to justify the dominant status of Judah and Ephraim among the tribes of Israel. Of Leah’s sons, Judah is the fourth in birth order. Subsequent narratives disqualify the first three: Reuben, Simeon, and Levi. Joseph is Rachel’s firstborn, and Ephraim is the younger of his two sons. Genesis 48 provides further explanation concerning Ephraim’s status.

Jacob’s return from Haran echoes Abraham’s initial arrival in the land, and it foreshadows the eventual arrival of the Israelites in the land from Egypt. However, as Jacob approaches, he is afraid because he must now face the brother whom he had deceived, and Esau is accompanied by a small army. A trickster who is out of tricks, Jacob asks God for help. Although Jacob refers to himself as “unworthy,” this does not express lack of dignity but a sense of being overwhelmed by God’s generous favor. Finally, Jacob sends a gift to Esau hoping to appease him. In an enigmatic scene at night by a river, whose name “Jabbok” plays on Jacob’s name, he wrestles with a mysterious “man” of supernatural origin. Jacob is wounded but prevails, and his name is changed to Israel. Esau embraces Jacob in reconciliation, and the story links the encounter between the brothers with the wrestling match. Jacob exclaims, “I have seen God face to face, and yet my life has been spared” (32:30); and to Esau he declares, “To see your face is for me like seeing the face of God—and you have received me so kindly” (33:10). Jacob sees in Esau’s graciousness the active hand of God. Although the two are reconciled, Jacob maintains separation to ensure the distinctive identity of his family.

Genesis 34–36

With these chapters, the focus shifts from Jacob and Esau to their succeeding generations. Aside from the lengthy genealogy of Esau/Edom (Gn 36), the narrative relates the actions of Jacob’s adult sons. Within Jacob’s family, rifts emerge involving rivalry, obstinacy, and deception. In addition to the question of whether the family will survive with its distinctive identity, the accounts of the sons address their relative status.

The story of the rape of Dinah (Jacob’s daughter), by Shechem, son of Hamor, a Canaanite (Hivite) leader, provides rhetorical support for the prohibition against intermarriage with Canaanites by placing the idea of it in an offensive context. There is ancient legal support for Hamor’s proposal that his son marry Dinah after the rape. However, the violent act enrages her brothers, and the story reveals Jacob’s inability to control their behavior. Simeon and Levi deceive Hamor with a promise of intermarriage on the condition that all the local males are circumcised, and they accept. While they are incapacitated, Jacob’s sons kill them. Jacob reprimands them because their actions will cause the Canaanites to perceive them negatively, making their life more difficult. Having instigated a situation that brought on themselves the reprimand of their father, Simeon and Levi have lessened their status among the brothers. In actual Israelite history, Simeon was absorbed by Judah, and Levi, dedicated to sanctuary service, had no territory.

Jacob’s return to Bethel and his instruction that his household discard their foreign gods corresponds with his vow (Gn 28) to serve God. This story includes an account of the changing of his name, likely from the Priestly writers. The remainder of the chapter establishes that Jacob’s family is complete, and with the death of Isaac, the focus shifts squarely to the future. The youngest of Jacob's sons, Benjamin, is born to Rachel as she dies. Isaac dies and is buried by Esau and Jacob.

Genesis 37–41

Unlike the brief, self-contained stories concerning Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the Joseph story constitutes a lengthy, well-crafted, and subtle whole. God is clearly active, as the narrator notes in many places. The characters, however, must interpret events in order to recognize God's hand at work, for, aside from God's speech assuring Jacob upon his departure for Egypt (Gn 46:2–4), they do not receive direct communication from God, as in the prior material.

The account of Joseph's sale into slavery by his brothers (Gn 37) sets the stage for the remainder of the book. The family loyalty demonstrated by the brothers' indignation over the violation of Dinah dissipates under the weight of their envy over Jacob's preference for Joseph. For his part, the immature Joseph does not grasp how his brothers would be incited by his favored status, his giving bad reports to their father about them, and his describing of dreams that suggest his superiority. The full significance of his dreams will not become clear until Joseph and his brothers have gained wisdom from their struggles.

The larger narrative question of which of Leah's eldest sons will achieve dominant status comes into focus in the actions of the two remaining candidates, Reuben and Judah. Intending to restore him to Jacob later, Reuben suggests throwing Joseph into a pit, and the brothers do so. However, the brothers then accept Judah's proposal to sell Joseph. That they dine together in the midst of their plotting expresses a depth of disregard for their kinship obligation to Joseph. The next time they dine in Joseph's presence, it will be to seek his help to save their lives. Reuben (apparently absent from dinner) returns to the pit into which Joseph had been thrown to find it empty and cries with grief in surprise. Between Reuben and Judah, it is the former who has clearly acted in compassion for Joseph, but his plan has failed. While it is plausible that Judah's plan to sell Joseph had a compassionate motivation (suspecting Joseph would die otherwise) it is not made explicit.

When the brothers show Joseph's tunic dipped in a kid's blood to Jacob in support of their fabricated account that his beloved son was killed, it recalls Jacob's deception of Isaac over his favorite, Esau. The pathos of the scene describing Jacob's grief is profound.

The story of Joseph is interrupted by an account in which Judah disgraces himself. Judah is embarrassed when he is caught in his failure to fulfill a customary responsibility, by refusing to give his youngest son in marriage to his widowed daughter-in-law Tamar. Having disguised herself as a harlot and attracted Judah to have intercourse with her, Tamar becomes pregnant. When he accuses her of harlotry, she produced evidence that he is the father. He admits his guilt and drops the charge against her. Tamar delivers twins in a story that echoes the birth of Jacob and Esau. Once again the younger is favored; Perez becomes the ancestor of David. The genealogy of Jesus in Matthew names Tamar and her twin sons (Mt 1:3). In a separate prior account (Gn 35:22), Reuben is also disgraced by sleeping with Jacob's concubine, an act that constitutes rebellion against his father (cf. 2 Sm 16:20–22), and Jacob is greatly offended. Judah is credited with acknowledging his error, but the text is silent about Reuben's response.

As a servant in the house of Potiphar, Joseph demonstrates that he has attained a level of maturity. Potiphar, one of Pharaoh's officials, recognizes that the LORD is with Joseph and favors Joseph. This recognition and favor portray Egypt not as a place of oppression, as in the Exodus traditions, but as a hospitable environment for Israelites. The LORD's covenant blessing and the protection promised to Jacob has extended to Joseph, and because of him Potiphar's household flourishes. Joseph is "well-built and handsome" (39:6), which was understood as a sign of divine favor. But when his appearance attracts the attention of his master's wife, his character is tested by her adulterous proposition. He refuses, citing the loyalty he owes his master. Yet, because of the wife's false accusations against him, Joseph is thrown in jail. Remarkable similarities between the account of Joseph in Potiphar's house and an episode concerning a young man and his brother's wife from the Egyptian tale known as "The Two Brothers" (CoS 1:85–89) or "Anubis and Bata" (Matthews and Benjamin, Old Testament Parallels, 65–69) suggest that the biblical account has adapted the Egyptian tale.

The chief jailer's favorable treatment of Joseph, the success of all Joseph does, and his demonstration of increasing maturity all manifest that the LORD's presence is with him. These factors combined suggest that the dual agency of divine favor and of Joseph's effort cannot be neatly separated in terms of which caused what effect. Texts affirming such a blend of divine and human agency occur widely in both Old and New Testaments. When asked to interpret the dreams of Pharaoh's cupbearer and baker, Joseph credits God for the ability to interpret them. When his interpretations are proven accurate, Joseph asks the cupbearer to remember him to Pharaoh. That the cupbearer forgets about Joseph for two years underscores the necessity that Joseph be patient in trusting God. It is the necessity of interpreting Pharaoh's dreams, which are crucial to the survival of Israel, that causes the cupbearer to remember Joseph to Pharaoh. Upon hearing Joseph's interpretations, Pharaoh recognizes that Joseph is endowed with the spirit of God and places him in charge of his household to prepare for the great famine portended by his dreams.

Despite Joseph's personal success in Pharaoh's service, within the larger story the situation verges on catastrophic, for the beloved son of Jacob seems at risk to abandon his family identity by becoming an Egyptian. He receives an Egyptian name, Zaphenath-paneah. Conflicting with the explicit commands of Abraham and Isaac that their sons marry within their own people, Joseph takes an Egyptian wife, Asenath, by whom he has two sons: first Manasseh, and then Ephraim.

Genesis 42–50

The great famine will occasion not only reconciliation between Joseph and his brothers but also reunification of Joseph with Jacob and the entire family in Egypt. The poignancy and power of the Joseph story derive, in part, from the rich and realistic portrayal of the characters' experience, sometimes describing their emotions, at other times leaving the hearer to imagine them. These chapters follow Joseph through an incremental process of interaction with his brothers, which reflects the gravity of such a betrayal. The reader cannot assume from the start that reconciliation will occur. Besides fulfilling the dreams that Joseph described to his father and brothers in Genesis 37, the accounts of Joseph's interactions with them in Egypt are replete with elements of irony and poetic justice. Careful reading reveals multiple inversions of his brothers' prior treatment of him. To name a few of them:

1. They hid from him their plot against him./ He reveals to them his plans for them, but he hides his identity and speaks through an interpreter;

moreover, they do not know that he understands when they speak in their language.

2. They sold him into servitude, and he ended up in prison. / They offer to be his servants, and he puts them all in prison at first and then keeps Simeon in prison until they return.

3. They sold him, the older of Rachel's sons, and he ended up in Egypt. / He demands that they send Benjamin, the younger of Rachel's sons, to Egypt.

4. They lied to Jacob about Joseph's fate. / They think they are telling him the truth in saying that Joseph "is no more," but they are wrong.

5. Joseph approached them unsuspecting, and then they dined while Joseph sat in a pit vulnerable to their power. / They approach Joseph's house suspecting mistreatment, but he dines with them and allays their suspicions, while his plan concerning Benjamin remains hidden from them.

A basic notion of reciprocity and fairness, of punishment that fits the crime, is apparent. But allowing Joseph to pay his brothers back for their mistreatment of him is not the story's central concern. The narrative makes this explicit twice, reflecting the degree to which reconciliation after such betrayal runs contrary to expectation. In 45:3–8, when Joseph initially reveals himself to his brothers, they are distressed and dumbfounded, likely fearing for their lives. He calms them and offers an interpretation of the story: although they sold him, it was God who sent him to Egypt to ensure survival of the family. Then in 50:15–21, after Jacob's death the brothers still fear that Joseph may not have let go of his anger; they anticipate that he may have been waiting for Jacob to die before unleashing that anger upon them in order to avoid upsetting their father. They plead with Joseph, saying their father wanted Joseph to forgive them. Assuring them that he will provide for them and their children, Joseph explains: "Even though you meant harm to me, God meant it for good, to achieve this present end, the survival of many people" (50:20).

In the interactions leading up to reconciliation, Joseph demonstrates both restraint and wisdom in directing his anger toward his brothers. After their initial visit, Joseph sends the brothers home with plenty of grain, but likely expecting their return because the famine will last seven years, and their brother Simeon remains in Egypt. When their grain runs out, the contest of the larger narrative between Reuben and Judah resumes. Reuben's offer of the lives of his two sons does not compel Jacob to allow Benjamin to return to Egypt with them. Judah succeeds in persuading Jacob by offering to take responsibility if anything happens to Benjamin and by pointing out that there is no other option. Upon their return to Egypt, Joseph feasts with his brothers and then sends them home with plenty of grain, but he secretly plants a silver cup in Benjamin's sack. Planting the cup was meant to give Joseph justification for detaining only Benjamin, while sending the others home to Jacob with the grain; Joseph assumed that they would abandon Benjamin, the only other son of Jacob's favored wife, as they had abandoned Joseph before. Planting the cup is a deception intended to prove Joseph's suspicions right while also giving his brothers an opportunity to prove them wrong. To Joseph's amazement, they refuse to leave Benjamin behind. When Joseph rejects their offer to remain and be his slaves, Judah explains how the loss of Benjamin would affect Jacob and volunteers to take Benjamin's place. This act of compassion prompts Joseph to let go of his suspicion and his anger, and in so doing to recognize God's hand at work.

When Jacob and the entire family arrive in Egypt, they are situated generously by Pharaoh in Goshen. In another inversion of events that reflects a sobering portrayal of centralized power, Joseph, who had arrived in Egypt as a slave, rescues the people from starvation by his administrative skill but then enslaves them for Pharaoh (Gn 47:13–26). Before Jacob dies, he adopts Joseph's two sons as his own and blesses Joseph while placing his hands on them, but he inverts their status, granting superior status to Ephraim (Gn 48). Among the tribes of Israel, Ephraim and Manasseh are considered "half-tribes." In contrast to Isaac's blessing of his sons, Genesis 49 portrays brothers who have become reconciled and a vigorous father. The poetry in the blessings is archaic, and the content does not reflect the story but applies to the tribes associated with each of the brothers. Concerning the question of which of Leah's first four sons will be accorded firstborn status, the content of the poetry reflects the narrative. Based on both the length and content of the passages, it is clear that Judah and Joseph are accorded firstborn status, as is reflected in Israelite history. In Israelite history, the Southern Kingdom is known as Judah, and the Northern Kingdom can be referred to as Ephraim or Joseph, as well as Israel.

EXODUS

[see pages 81–133 of the Old Testament]

THE STRUCTURE OF THE BOOK

The book of Exodus may be divided according to plot and geographic location into three main sections:

1. Exodus 1:1–12:36. In Egypt: Pharaoh oppresses the Israelites in Egypt, and the LORD sets in motion a plan to deliver them, demonstrating superiority to Pharaoh.
2. Exodus 12:37–19:2. The journey from Egypt to Sinai: the LORD defeats Pharaoh's army, and the people journey toward Sinai.
3. Exodus 19:3–40:38. At Sinai: the Israelites enter into a covenant with the LORD.

Plot Summary and Analysis

The narrative that extends from Exodus through Deuteronomy addresses two basic questions: What characterizes the LORD, the God of Israel? What does being the people of the LORD entail? The following summarizes the plot of Exodus in terms of these questions.

The story sets up a contest between Pharaoh and the LORD to prove which is the superior “god.” The LORD wins the contest. Pharaoh seeks to prevent the Israelites from leaving Egypt (1:10) as they will need to do in order to take their land, and he attempts to kill all their male infants (1:16). In these actions he threatens the promises of land and progeny that God made to Israel's ancestors. Pharaoh's planned infanticide is thwarted by the midwives (1:19–21), and Pharaoh's oppressive treatment of the Israelite laborers demonstrates that he is inferior to the LORD. The LORD hears the Israelites' cries of suffering (2:23–25) and reveals to Moses plans to rescue them from that oppressive slavery in order to bring them to their own land (3:7–9). Through Moses and Aaron, the LORD demands that Pharaoh release the Israelites, but Pharaoh refuses, and the account of the ten plagues dramatizes the ensuing contest of power. With the final plague, the LORD takes Pharaoh's firstborn. This signals victory, since it represents in that culture the ultimate homage one can give a deity. When Pharaoh pursues the Israelites as they leave Egypt, the LORD confirms superiority by defeating Pharaoh and his army at the Red Sea.

Having initially appeared to Moses in the desert region of Sinai (also called Horeb) to commission Moses to lead the Israelites out of Egypt, the LORD designates the same place as the one to which Moses is to bring them to worship the LORD. This location, far away from civilization and the state religion of Egypt, conveys the LORD's mysterious origins and radically free character. The LORD does not serve the interests of any state or empire but stands in radical critique of their use of power, a critique that resonates with liberationist approaches to theology. The LORD leads Moses and the people to Sinai, showing them favor by providing for them along the way, even though they complain and threaten to rebel. At Sinai, the Israelites agree to be the LORD's people, and the terms of the covenant spell out in specific ways what that will entail: proper worship and service to their God is a central aspect of being the LORD's people. However, their service is not demeaning, for they share a collective identity as God's own child (4:22–23) and as God's special possession for whom God cares (19:5). They are to worship no other deity, and God provides a full range of instructions, including those for constructing the Tabernacle as a dwelling for God's glory among them and the place for making offerings to God (25–31, 35–40). In the midst of these instructions, however, they violate this prohibition (32). After Moses intercedes for them, God forgives them (33–34). The book concludes with the construction of the Tabernacle, and the entrance of the glory of God into it (40).

The Exodus Motif throughout the Bible

The books of Exodus through Deuteronomy represent an expansive account of the Israelites' exodus from Egypt, journey to Canaan, and entrance into a covenant with the LORD. The core of Israel's story of origins involves recalling how their God, the LORD, rescued them from slavery in Egypt, entered into a covenant with them, and brought them through the wilderness into Canaan. These books in their final form represent a compilation of narrative traditions and legal material, often with a view to addressing events that were much more recent for the people doing the compiling. The foundational exodus traditions appear in a variety of other biblical texts, as well, especially in the Psalms (e.g., Pss 77:12–21; 80:9–12; 83:10–13) and prophetic books (e.g., Am 3:1–2), many of which recall them as a way of admonishing the present audience to greater faithfulness.

Additionally, other biblical texts employ the exodus as a motif to interpret present and future events. In doing so, they convey a conviction that what God is doing in those events constitutes something as fundamentally significant as the very beginning of Israel's existence. All three major prophets speak of God's saving action in bringing Israel out of the Babylonian Exile in terms of a new exodus. Jeremiah speaks of a new covenant (Jer 31–34); Ezekiel speaks of a new testing in the wilderness (Ez 20:34–35); Isaiah 40–55 speaks of the people's return from Babylon to Jerusalem through the wilderness in parallel with the LORD's bringing the Israelites through the Red Sea (Is 40:3–5; 43:16–21).

Owing to the difficulties that Judaism experienced in surviving as a people under the successive empires of Persia, Greece, and Rome, many Jews during these periods regarded the Exile as not yet concluded. This view was widespread in Palestine when the earliest Christians, many of them Jews, were writing the texts of the New Testament. They employed the Exodus as a paradigm for explaining who Jesus was and what his death and resurrection had accomplished. Details such as Jesus's forty days in the desert (Mt 4:2; Mk 1:13; Lk 4:2) and the idea of a new covenant (Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25; Heb 9:15; 12:24) reflect this paradigm. Luke explicitly refers to Jesus's saving work as an "exodus" (Lk 9:30–31).

SECTION BY SECTION

Exodus 1:1–12:36: In Egypt

Exodus 1–2

The book begins with the Israelites residing in the region of Goshen in Egypt, when an unnamed Pharaoh takes four steps to oppress them. He subjects them to forced labor, then slavery, and he instructs first midwives, and finally his entire population, to kill the male Hebrew infants. The Israelites are referred to as Hebrews in the Bible as a way of distinguishing them from other ethnic groups. Archaeological remains of the cities of Pithom and Rameses have been dated to the thirteenth century BC, which is consistent with the possibility that the Exodus traditions reflect events occurring at about that time.

These initial chapters not only set up the contest between Pharaoh and the LORD to demonstrate which is the superior “god,” they also foreshadow the LORD’s victory by conveying in several ways that Pharaoh’s efforts at oppression fail. Harsh slavery does not prevent the Israelite population from growing. Then, the midwives subvert Pharaoh’s instructions, because they “fear God,” an explanation that expresses their commitment to observe the divinely established moral order. Their refusal signals that they do not recognize Pharaoh as divine. Moses’s mother places her baby in the Nile, but she ensures that he will float by placing him in a specially prepared basket, and the maidservant of Pharaoh’s daughter rescues the boy. Pharaoh’s daughter accepts him into Pharaoh’s household and unwittingly arranges for Moses’s mother to nurse him. That women play the key roles in subverting Pharaoh’s plan and preserving life affirms their value within the biblical story and implies that God was acting through them. At the same time, within the context of ancient patriarchal culture, it would have been considered particularly humiliating to Pharaoh that his efforts were defeated by women.

The story of Moses’s rescue has parallels in birth legends of heroes from Egypt (the god Horus) and Mesopotamia (Sargon of Akkad; see Context of Scripture, 1.133), but within the Pentateuch it alludes to the story of Noah: “ark” and “basket” both translate the same Hebrew term (tebah), and in both cases the hope of the future rests on the survival the vessel’s human contents.

Moses's efforts to defend his people and adjudicate their disputes (2:11–14) foreshadow future events, but to be their leader will require an explicit divine mission.

Exodus 2 concludes by noting that although Pharaoh dies, the oppression continues; the Israelites voice their suffering by crying out, and their cries reach the God who does not die, and who remembers his covenant relationship with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The Israelites' cries and God's response to save them from oppression constitute a central dynamic in the plot of Exodus and within Israelite religion. The Exodus tradition provides a basis for the belief that God attends to the cry of those who suffer, a belief reflected in the thanksgiving offerings of the sacrificial system as well as in psalms of petition and thanksgiving. Thanksgiving is understood as a public celebration of God's saving response to cries of suffering and petitions for help.

Exodus 3:1–6:13

Moses's encounter with the LORD at the "mountain of God" affirms the radically mysterious nature of God. The encounter occurs far away from civilization and the state religion of Egypt, in a place that resists identification: different traditions even give it different names (Horeb and Sinai). It portrays two paradoxical aspects of who God is: God is perceptible in some ways but not fully; God is attractive but also arouses fear. Seeing an "angel" who speaks from a bush that burns but is not consumed, Moses is attracted, but when he discovers that God is speaking, he turns away, afraid to look.

The story reveals God's identity in the form of an enigmatic name and an identification with the God of the Patriarchs. The statement in Exodus 6:3, "As God the Almighty I appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but by my name, LORD [Hebrew: YHWH], I did not make myself known to them," most likely reflects the Priestly writers. It does not acknowledge that multiple texts in Genesis portray the patriarchs and other characters as referring to God by the name YHWH (e.g., Gn 12:8; 25:21; 27:20); such texts would have originated from a different source, identified as the Yahwist (J) in the documentary hypothesis. One explanation of YHWH is that it originally served as the verb in the title, "God who causes the heavenly hosts to be" ('el yhwh tseba'oth). The heavenly hosts referred to the stars visible in the night sky that were thought to represent supernatural armies. Understood in this way, the title would have asserted the superiority of the God of Israel to other heavenly beings. The Greek translation of the Bible rendered God's enigmatic utterance to Moses as "I am the one who is," and this provided the basis for identifying the God of Israel with the concept of Being in Greek philosophy, which was important for later Christian theology.

God's revelation to Moses here is inherently linked to the task at hand: the LORD commissions Moses to bring the Israelites out of Egypt. The interchange between God and Moses has parallels in several biblical stories of prophets, for example, the call of Jeremiah (Jer 1:4–10): God initiates the communication and commissions the prophet; the prophet objects; God reassures the prophet and gives a sign. The dialogue between Moses and the LORD foreshadows the way in which the contest narrative will demonstrate the LORD's superiority over Pharaoh. Only when Pharaoh is forced, will he allow the Israelites to go (3:19–20). Moses and Aaron will serve as leaders of the Israelites and as the LORD's messengers to Pharaoh, and the LORD will assist them, allowing them to perform wondrous signs. They will ask Pharaoh to let the Israelites go, but the LORD will strengthen Pharaoh's resolve so that he does not release the Israelites. Of the coming plagues, the LORD alludes to the first (the river becoming blood) and the last (the death of the firstborn) and offers a rationale for the escalation: Israel is the LORD's firstborn son, and because Pharaoh refuses to let Israel go, the LORD will kill Pharaoh's firstborn son (3:9; 4:22–23).

Upon first hearing of the LORD's plan and seeing wondrous signs, the people believe Moses and Aaron (4:31). However, after the disastrous first audience of Moses and Aaron with Pharaoh, leading the Israelites proves difficult. In that audience, Pharaoh refuses to let the Israelites go on the basis that he does not know the LORD. Through the narrative of the plagues, Pharaoh will not only learn who the LORD is, he will submit to the LORD as God. After the audience, however, he angrily withholds straw for the Israelites' brick making. In their increased suffering, the people reject the leadership of Moses (5:20–21; 6:9). Moses protests against God, first accusing God of treating the people badly (5:22–23), then explaining that if the people will not listen to him, surely Pharaoh will not (6:12). God responds to Moses's protests with encouragement and insistence (6:1–2, 13).

Exodus 6:14–12:36

Prior to the contest narrative, a genealogy locates Moses and Aaron within the tribe of Levi (6:14–27), and a restatement of the commission of Moses and Aaron combines with a summary statement of how the LORD will bring the Israelites out of Egypt (6:28–7:7). The story of the plagues (7:8–11:10; 12:29–36) takes the form of a contest between competing gods. The LORD confronts Pharaoh’s oppression of the Israelites not merely in order to free them from slavery, but to demonstrate to Pharaoh and to the world that the LORD, not Pharaoh, is God. This purpose provides the rationale for the idea that the LORD could strengthen Pharaoh’s resolve (“harden his heart”) to refuse to let the Israelites go. That the LORD could do this draws on the ancient understanding that supernatural forces could affect human decision making. Some scholars argue that the story presents Pharaoh as a mere puppet of the LORD, seeing in the LORD’s control of Pharaoh’s repeated refusals to let the Israelites go the removal of all agency from Pharaoh. The details of the narrative suggest, however, a more nuanced view of Pharaoh’s agency.

The list of plagues associated with the Exodus is not uniform among biblical accounts (see, e.g., Pss 78:44–51; 105:28–37). Recounting ten plagues in Exodus has narrative purpose. It provides symmetry: in connection with the first five, Pharaoh is either obstinate or hardens his own heart; with the sixth to the tenth plagues, the LORD hardens Pharaoh’s heart. Having said he does not know who the LORD is (5:2), Pharaoh refuses to recognize the LORD as God even after the initial signs and the first plague. After the second and fourth plagues, he recognizes the LORD as God by asking Moses to pray for him. Still, Pharaoh remains obstinate even after the fifth plague, which he knows spared the Israelites’ livestock. It is only after this point that the story of the plagues describes the LORD hardening Pharaoh’s heart. The seventh plague, a number that recalls the LORD’s creation of the world, includes a speech by the LORD both justifying his punishment of the Egyptians and explaining that the afflictions to come will demonstrate the LORD’s power and Pharaoh’s foolishness for resisting it (9:13–17). A similar speech looks back on the seventh plague (10:1–2). After the seventh and eight plagues, Pharaoh’s servants urge him to let the people go, and Pharaoh admits that he has sinned against the LORD and again asks Moses to pray for him. With the ninth plague, Pharaoh makes a vain threat on Moses’s life; for the tenth plague, the LORD says he will take the firstborn of Pharaoh and the entire land, but spare those of the Israelites (11:1–10). When this occurs, Pharaoh sends the Israelites away (12:29–36).

After the announcement of the final plague, the LORD instructs Moses concerning celebration of the feasts of Passover and Unleavened Bread (12:1–20). This and subsequent sections (12:21–27, 43–49; 13:3–10), in which the LORD gives further instructions and Moses instructs the people to enact the rites, constitute an etiology for these feasts. They are to be enacted in remembrance of the LORD’s sparing the Israelites’ lives from death and bringing them out of Egypt, but the details given reflect the way in which the feasts were actually celebrated in Israel. In a similar way, the Synoptic Gospel accounts of the Last Supper, which was celebrated during Passover, reflect the words used by early Christians when celebrating the Lord’s Supper (Eucharist) to remember the death and resurrection of Jesus. Early Christians recalled that Jesus was killed during Passover, and understanding his passion, death, and resurrection as a new exodus, they came to portray him as a new and definitive paschal lamb.

The feasts of Passover and Unleavened Bread were mostly likely of Canaanite origin, both celebrated in the early spring. They were likely adopted and eventually combined by the Israelites to commemorate their founding event, also associated with early spring. Originally observed by shepherds, the Passover sacrifice would have entailed offering firstborn lambs; the blood rite may have originally been intended to ward off demons believed to endanger the flock in transition from winter to summer pasture. The seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread would originally have related to a spring grain harvest. Elsewhere in the Pentateuch, festival calendars in Leviticus (23:5–6) and in Numbers (28:16–17) treat the two as separate feasts; the Ritual Decalogue names only Passover (Ex 34:25); the calendar in the Covenant Code (Ex 23:14–17) lists only Unleavened Bread, but the one in Deuteronomy (Dt 16:1–8, 16) considers both a single feast, called Unleavened Bread, which includes a Passover sacrifice. The account of the Israelites observing the first anniversary of their escape from Egypt includes Passover, but the seven-day feast of Unleavened Bread is not mentioned (Nm 9:1–14).

Exodus 12:37–19:2: Journey from Egypt to Sinai

The Priestly writers employed an itinerary formula in order to organize the narrative from Egypt to Sinai, and from Sinai to Canaan. The formula is: “[they] set out from A . . . went to/camped in B.” Despite some variance in translations, the Hebrew verb ns’ “to set out” is the same in all the formulas.

The six occurrences of the formula in the narrative from Egypt to Sinai make Sinai the seventh location, a number that recalls God's creation in seven days and the importance of the Sabbath (Ex 12:37; 13:20; 15:22; 16:1; 17:1; 19:2). In the narrative of the journey from Sinai to Canaan in Numbers, starting with Sinai, Canaan is the seventh location (Nm 10:12; 20:1; 20:22; 21:4, 10; 21:11; 22:1). Although the summary itinerary in Numbers 33:1–49 uses the same formula, it gives a different version of the itinerary. There, Sinai is the twelfth location in the journey from Egypt to Sinai, a number that corresponds to the traditional number of the tribes of Israel. The journey from Sinai to Canaan is subdivided into two phases, the first to Mount Hor, on which Aaron dies. This segment involves twenty-two locations, corresponding to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. The journey from Mount Hor to the Jordan River involves ten locations, perhaps alluding to the Decalogue. The ancient audience would have perceived the allusions conveyed by the different versions of the itinerary and not been bothered by their lack of agreement. For the Priestly writers, the structure created by this formula provided a means of expressing that this journey was not an aimless wandering in the wilderness; it was guided by God.

Exodus 13:1–2, 11–16

The LORD declares to Moses that all firstborn among the Israelites and their livestock belong to the LORD, meaning that the LORD has a claim on their lives. Humans, however, shall not be sacrificed. That they are redeemed means that some substitute is to be given in their place. Although the means of redemption is not stated here, Numbers 18:16 specifies a donation of five shekels. In this way, all the firstborn of the Israelites and their livestock become an occasion to remember how the LORD killed the Egyptian firstborn in order to bring the Israelites out of Egypt.

Exodus 13:17–15:21

Pursuit by Pharaoh and his army arouses panic and ambivalence in the people. While they cry out to the LORD for help, they also protest against Moses, accusing him of bringing them to the desert to die, and wishing to return to serving the Egyptians. Moses attempts to encourage the people, and the narrative makes clear that the LORD is in control. The LORD plans to lure Pharaoh after the people and goes with them in the form of cloud and fire.

The LORD continues to strengthen Pharaoh's resolve so that Pharaoh will pursue the people, continuing the theme of the contest narrative, in order to demonstrate that the LORD, not Pharaoh, is God. Reflecting different sources, Exodus 14 and 15 combine three different descriptions of what occurred when the LORD defeated Pharaoh's army. The most developed account (Ex 14:19–23, 26–31), from the Priestly writers, portrays the waters standing like walls to the people's right and left. This image conveys the idea that through this act God created Israel, for it alludes to God's acts of dividing waters from waters in creating the universe (Gn 1:6–7). A separate explanation, inserted at Exodus 14:24–25, portrays the LORD throwing the Egyptian army into a panic and clogging their wheels so that they turn back. The Song of Moses (15:1–18), likely an elaboration of the Song of Miriam (15:21), portrays the LORD blowing with his nostrils so that the sea is churned up. As a result, Pharaoh's chariots and army are thrown into the sea and sink like stone.

The Song of Moses poetically adapts a loose literary pattern, well attested in ancient Near Eastern sources, involving a conflict between divine actors, which has consequences among humans. Known as the "combat myth" or "conflict myth" genre, it occurs in narratives from Mesopotamia (Enuma Elish [Dalley, Myths, 228–77] and Anzu [Dalley, Myth, 203–27]) and ancient Canaan (the Baal Cycle [COS, 1:86]), and it is alluded to or implied in numerous short biblical texts, especially Psalms. The pattern begins when the assembly of the gods is confronted by news of a malicious deity who threatens the cosmic order. The magnitude of the threat is conveyed by panic among the gods, who then attempt to locate a deity willing to combat the malicious god in hopes of restoring order. A warrior god is found, who then engages and defeats the threat. In response, the gods declare him their ruler, build a temple for him, and joyfully celebrate his victory with feasting.

In this plot, the high point is not the victory but the celebration of it in connection with the building of a temple. It is the joyful celebration that releases the tension raised by the threat of chaos, and it is the temple that provides the symbolic link between the celebration of the gods in the narrative and the celebration of the people reciting the story. Concluding the plot with the building of a temple and feasting helped to relate the narrative to the ritual activity of the people who recited it, for whom the earthly temple was a crucial symbol of their devotion to the deity. Many songs celebrating God in the Bible, especially among the Psalms, reflect the combat myth genre in that they either state or imply that God has defeated a fearsome threat to order and so has been proven worthy of loyal service and worship. God is declared to reign, and the Jerusalem Temple is called to mind.

The Song of Moses employs multiple elements of the combat myth genre as it recounts the origins of Israel in a nutshell. The song celebrates three traditional affirmations concerning Israel's origins: the LORD freed the Israelites from slavery by defeating Pharaoh, brought the Israelites into their land, and built a sanctuary on his holy mountain there. Elements of the combat myth include: the fearsome threat posed by Pharaoh, the LORD's defeat of Pharaoh and his army, declaration of the LORD's superiority among the gods and by other nations, establishment of the LORD's sanctuary, and joyful celebration of the LORD. The song creatively bends the conventional genre, adapting it to this traditional understanding. In contrast to Mesopotamian creation stories, the events do not take place in the world of the gods at the time when the universe was created. Nevertheless, use of the conventional genre would have invited hearers to imagine the conflict as a battle between two gods, playing upon the fact that Egyptians regarded the Pharaoh as divine. For its intended audience, though, the portrayal of the LORD's dramatic defeat of Pharaoh would have underscored Pharaoh's humanity. Dramatizing Pharaoh's defeat also undermines claims of the Egyptian empire (and, by analogy, subsequent empires) to enjoy divine authority and assistance in their exercise of oppression.

The Exodus narrative surrounding the song places it in the mouths of the Israelites, when they celebrate immediately after the LORD has defeated the Egyptian army at the Red Sea. However, the song is actually an independent unit, whose content does not fully match that context. It celebrates not only the LORD's defeat of Pharaoh and his army, but also events that have not yet occurred in the Exodus narrative: the LORD brought the Israelites into Canaan to the amazement of the surrounding peoples and established a sanctuary for himself there. As with the conventional combat myth pattern, the song highlights the building of a sanctuary in celebrating the victorious deity, reflecting the idea that Israel's creation would not be complete until the people resided in their land and could worship in the LORD's sanctuary there. In this way, the song draws the audience's attention outside the narrative of Exodus 15. It highlights the fact that neither what has just occurred, nor the journey through the wilderness that will conclude at the end of Deuteronomy, is adequate to account for the creation of Israel.

Many aspects of the Israelites' journey through the wilderness to Canaan anticipate the building of the LORD's mountain sanctuary: the LORD appears to Moses on the mountain in the Sinai; Moses constructs the Tabernacle, and the LORD's glorious presence enters to dwell in it; and the LORD specifies all manner of ritual activity pertaining to the priesthood and the sanctuary. Still, all this only anticipates what the song celebrates. At the same time, the song links that anticipation to the LORD's astonishing victory over Pharaoh in order to foster hope in what the LORD has yet to accomplish. In the context of the Pentateuch, which concludes before the people enter their land, this song draws attention to both the unfinished and ongoing character of the LORD's act of creating Israel. In this respect, for the faithful of any era who reflect on their own situations in light of this song, the Pentateuch affirms hope in God's capacity to subdue forces of oppression and suffering, and it does so in a way that recognizes the imperfections and challenges of life.

Exodus 15:22–17:15

As they journey from the Red Sea toward Sinai, the people's mood of celebration over the LORD's victory shifts to a basic concern for their hunger and thirst, and the LORD meets their needs. Having demonstrated the LORD's superiority to Pharaoh in power, the narrative now demonstrates that the LORD provides for the Israelites. When they complain because they are thirsty, the LORD enables Moses to purify bitter water (15:22–25). When they experience hunger, they protest against Moses, wishing to have died in Egypt where they had food (16:1–3). The LORD responds by beginning a supply of manna and quail that will continue throughout their forty-year sojourn, and doing so in a way that teaches them to observe the Sabbath (16:4–36). Suffering from thirst again, they angrily accuse Moses of bringing them into the wilderness to die, and they question whether the LORD is with them (17:1–7).

In this last incident, the narrative says that the people "tested" the LORD. Such testing is considered problematic not because the people complain when they are hungry or thirsty, but because they question whether the LORD is with them. In this regard, however, the dynamics of Israelite religion are paradoxical. In Deuteronomy and the Psalms, the story of Meribah and Massah (Ex 17:1–7) is employed as a negative example intended to admonish the people to trust God in the present (Dt 6:16; 9:22; 33:8; Ps 95:8–9). At the same time, other psalms and other biblical poetry actually provide language for questioning and protesting against God. Taken together, these multiple voices allow for protest against God, while continually and strenuously inviting trust in God.

The notion of testing is also applied to the LORD. Now that the LORD has rescued the people from oppressive slavery, the idea of whether they will follow the LORD's instructions emerges with the theme of the LORD's testing them to find out (Ex 15:25–26; 16:4). To portray the LORD as testing people through certain experiences of difficulty could help people to consider those situations as opportunities to persevere in trusting God, anticipating an eventual end to the difficulty. As with the metaphor of God as judge, the metaphor of God testing people does not imply malevolence.

Exodus 19:3–40:38: At Sinai

Having arrived at the mountain of God, the Israelites remain there for one year. The remainder of Exodus, all of Leviticus, and Numbers 1:1–10:10 take place there. The foundational event at Sinai is the Israelites' agreement to follow the terms of the covenant as given to them by the LORD. These terms include particular instructions governing various aspects of life. Prominent among the instructions are those establishing the ritual system, and in Exodus these pertain mainly to the Tabernacle, a prototype of the Jerusalem Temple. In the narrative, although only the Decalogue and the Covenant Code are given by God before the Israelites formally agree to the covenant, the laws in the remainder of the Pentateuch were also understood to be included.

Exodus 19:3–25

Biblical traditions describe God's presence and action in a variety of ways that capture both how humans can perceive and interact with God, and how they cannot. For instance, in his initial encounter with God, Moses hears God's voice and talks to God, but he is afraid to look at God (Ex 3:2–6). Combining descriptions in this way preserves the paradoxical affirmation that God is both immanent and transcendent; people can encounter God, but they ought not presume to control or manipulate God. This narrative describing the LORD's appearance, or theophany, at the mountain serves to preserve this tension by means of the interactions between the LORD and Moses, and the dramatic terms restricting the people's access. The passage combines non-Priestly source materials and is difficult to follow, but on a poetic level even this difficulty conveys the limits of the human capacity to comprehend God.

Exodus 20–24

Presentation of the particular terms of the covenant is modeled on a type of ancient Near Eastern treaties, called “vassal treaties,” enacted between a more powerful (suzerain) and a less powerful (vassal) king. Many such treaties are preserved from Hittite kings, who ruled ca. 1650–1200 BC in Anatolia (modern Turkey), and from the Neo-Assyrians, especially from the seventh century BC. (For examples of Hittite treaties, see COS, 2.17–18; ANET, 531–32. For Neo-Assyrian examples, see COS 2.127–129; ANET, 532–41.) In both cases, the suzerain sets the terms of the treaties, and the treaties include the names of both kings, the stipulations to be observed by the vassal, the divine witnesses to the treaty, and curses that will take effect if the vassal fails to keep the treaty. The Hittite treaties also include: a historical prologue describing the relationship between the two kings with emphasis on what the suzerain has done for the vassal; provision for the deposit of the treaty in a sacred place; and a statement of the blessings that the vassal will enjoy if he abides by the treaty. The Decalogue begins with the naming of the parties and a historical prologue, and then it lists stipulations. Additional stipulations continue throughout the legal collections of the Pentateuch. Of the other elements, blessings and curses are emphasized in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 27–28, and mention of witnesses, in the covenant renewal ceremony described in Joshua 24.

The Pentateuch adapts the conventional treaty form in a way that dignifies the Israelites by placing them collectively on the level of a king. Moreover, making the covenant directly with the people echoes the tradition that Israel does not need a human king, for the LORD is their king. The Decalogue (20:1–17; adapted in Dt 5:6–21) begins by naming the two parties and recounting what the LORD has done for Israel. Recounting the LORD’s saving action recalls the explanation in Exodus 19:4–5 of the foundational blessing that is contingent upon the covenant: the LORD’s commitment to a special, favorable relationship with Israel. As vassal-treaties typically prohibit the vassal from serving any other king, so the LORD prohibits Israel from serving any god other than the LORD, adding a specific prohibition against making graven images to be worshiped. In itself, this command does not presume that no other gods besides the LORD exist. No parallels for either of these two prohibitions have yet emerged from any other ancient Near Eastern culture. Presenting Sabbath observance as a way of celebrating that the LORD created the entire world supports the LORD's claim on Israel's undivided loyalty.

Biblical Law and the Death Penalty

The similarities and differences between the laws presented in the Pentateuch and other ancient Near Eastern legal collections, for example, the Laws of Hammurabi, are instructive. In both cases, ultimately divine authority is understood to legitimate the laws. However, while in other ancient Near Eastern cultures it is typically kings, under divine authority, who formulate laws, Israel's laws are spoken directly by the LORD, implicitly affirming that the LORD is Israel's king.

While concern for the less powerful in society is common in ancient Near Eastern law, only in Israel do these laws include the protection of foreigners. This concern reflects Israel's own origins as having been foreigners in Egypt and having come into Canaan as foreigners. For instance:

You shall not oppress or afflict a resident alien, for you were once aliens residing in the land of Egypt (Ex 22:20). You shall not wrong any widow or orphan (Ex 22:21). If ever you wrong them and they cry out to me, I will surely listen to their cry (Ex 22:22). My wrath will flare up, and I will kill you with the sword; then your own wives will be widows, and your children orphans (Ex 22:23). See also, Lv 19:33–34; Dt 10:18–19; 24:17–22)

Another notable difference pertains to the death penalty. In the Laws of Hammurabi, offenses against someone's property may incur the death penalty, but in the case of a married woman found lying with another man, the penalty is left up to the husband. In biblical law, offenses against property do not incur the death penalty, but a range of offenses do. Biblical law distinguishes between death that God enacts as a penalty, and death that humans enact. In addition to the laws protecting the vulnerable for which God will punish the offenders directly, a divine penalty is also implied in many instructions regarding priestly activity and transporting the Tabernacle (Ex 28:31–35, 42–43; 30:20–21; Lv 8:35; 10:6–7; 16:2, 12–13; Nm 4:15).

The laws for which humans impose the death penalty fall roughly into three categories:

Offenses in relationship to God, including:

blasphemy (Lv 24:16–17)

violation of Sabbath (Ex 31:14; 35:2–3)

illicit prophetic activity (Dt 18:20)

idolatry or illicit religious activity (Ex 22:17; Dt 13:1–5, 10–11; 17:2–5)

offenses against priestly authority (Dt 17:12–13)

Offenses against the person of another, including:

kidnapping (Ex 21:16; Dt 24:7)

murder (Ex 21:12; Dt 19:11–13; Nm 35:16–21, 30–31)

Offenses involving sexuality and the family:

illicit sexual activity (Ex 22:18–19; Dt 22:22–27; Lv 20:10–16) offenses against parents (Ex 21:15, 17; Lv 20:9; Dt 21:18–21)

The extent to which the death penalty was actually enacted in Israel is difficult to ascertain. Aside from that, the laws applying it to an offense would have communicated the supreme value of what the law protects. As discussed here, these laws emphasize the value of relationship with the LORD and respect for the sacred, the persons of resident aliens and fellow Israelites—especially the less powerful, and matters of sexuality and respect for parents.

The first and oldest collection of laws in the Pentateuch is the “Covenant Code” (Ex 20:22–23:33), a name derived from the reference to the “book of the covenant” in the ceremony that immediately follows it (Ex 24:7). (For comparison to other ancient Near Eastern legal material, see Matthews and Benjamin, 101–30.) It includes casuistic laws, which focus on particular types of situations (“if X, then Y”), and apodictic laws, which are more categorical (you shall/not . . . ). Most of the religious laws are apodictic, while the social laws are mostly casuistic. The entire collection is framed by groups of religious laws (20:22–26; 23:20–33). The realms of sacred and secular sometimes overlap. For instance, in cases where no witnesses are available to resolve a conflict, the parties are to approach the local sanctuary to take an oath before God (22:7–9). The laws presume an agrarian society and include a number of practices that would not be acceptable in the modern world, for example, the practice of slavery.

After the Decalogue and the Covenant Code, the covenant at Sinai is concluded with two ceremonies, the first at the base of the mountain and the second upon it. The apostasy with the golden calf partially mimics the combined ceremony (Ex 32:6). In the first ceremony, sacrifices are offered, and Moses puts blood on an altar, representing the LORD. Then, in the presence of the altar and twelve stones, which represent the people, he reads from the book of the covenant. After the people affirm that they will do all that the LORD has said, Moses sprinkles blood on them (or perhaps symbolically on them via the twelve stones). With the words, “this is the blood of the covenant which the LORD has made with you,” Moses solemnly declares the covenant to be in force (24:8). The narratives of the Lord’s supper in the Synoptic Gospels allude to this passage. Mark recounts Jesus saying, “this is my blood of the covenant, which will be shed for many” (Mk 14:24; cf. Mt 26:28; Lk 22:20). Reflecting an understanding that blood contains the life-force of animals (Lv 17:11), biblical texts describe the symbolic use of blood in a variety of ritual contexts.

The second account describes Moses, Aaron, Aaron’s sons, and the seventy elders seeing God, but it preserves God’s transcendence by avoiding any description of what God looked like. To say that God “did not lay a hand on them” is an idiomatic way of saying that God did not harm them. The focus of the scene is the meal that they share in God’s presence. A meal is well-attested as a way of establishing and reaffirming a covenant (cf. Gn 26:28–30).

Moses is then invited to receive stone tablets upon which the LORD has written the commandments (Ex 31:18 and 32:16 specify two tablets). The image of stone conveys permanence. Stone was used in the ancient Near East for permanent inscriptions, including treaties and other types of legal agreements, which were often deposited in sanctuaries.

Exodus 25–31

The narrative turns toward establishing a dwelling for God in the midst of the people. As noted above regarding the Song of Moses, the Pentateuch ends before the people enter Canaan and build a sanctuary there. In Exodus 25 through 28 and 30 the LORD instructs the people to build a portable sanctuary, the Tabernacle, and to make the many items pertaining to it. These instructions are fulfilled in Exodus 35–40. In Exodus 29 and 31, the LORD gives instructions for the consecration of priests and the selection of artisans, respectively. The book ends with the entrance of the glory of the LORD into the Tabernacle.

The Priestly writers responsible for these chapters were concerned with showing that the LORD’s Temple in Jerusalem had its original mandate at Mount Sinai. The portable Tabernacle is described in terms of what a nomadic people might use. It can readily be assembled, disassembled, and transported. The Tabernacle and its furnishings clearly serve as a prototype for the Jerusalem Temple, for which many of the vessels and objects described would have been appropriate. Throughout the ancient Near East, temples were understood by analogy to royal palaces. While deities could be identified with phenomena in the heavens or the underworld, their temples were considered their earthly residences, where humans could both express loyalty and care for them and seek their help. Temples were considered sacred geographic locations that united heaven and earth, enabling communication with the divine in a special way. In many cases, the earthly temple was understood to mirror the deity's celestial or underworld temple. This notion is reflected, for instance, in the description of the LORD seated in his heavenly temple in Isaiah 6.

The terms Tabernacle, tent of meeting, and sanctuary in the Pentateuch refer primarily to the sacred covered tent. By association, they can also refer to the entire courtyard surrounding it. (See diagram, Structure of the Tabernacle, on Exodus page 116.) The space in the tent and the surrounding courtyard was understood in graduated levels of holiness. Inside the tent, a veil separated the inner sanctuary from the rest of the tent's interior. The "inner sanctuary," also called the "holy of holies," contained the ark of the covenant and was considered most sacred, accessible only to the high priest on the Day of Atonement. The rest of the interior, called the "holy place," was considered next in holiness. It was accessible only to priests and contained an incense altar, a table, and a lamp stand. Finally, the courtyard surrounding the Tabernacle, containing the altar of sacrifice and a laver, was accessible to all Israel. Since the entire Tabernacle area was holy, anyone entering it, whether priests or other Israelites, was required to be in a state of ritual purity (on the concepts of purity and holiness, see Leviticus, RG 147–156).

The materials used in constructing the tent, its furnishings, and the priestly garments reflect gradations of holiness, with more precious materials reflecting greater degrees of holiness. For instance, all the furnishings inside the tent, itself, are either made of gold or overlaid in gold. Standing in the courtyard in front of the tent, the altar of sacrifice and the laver are made of bronze. Gold thread was woven into the garments of the high priest, and his garments were adorned with precious gems.

The use of finely crafted precious metals and gems, common in ancient Near Eastern temples, divine images, and ritual furnishings, was understood to arouse an almost overwhelming affective response in worshipers. Mesopotamian sources describe such objects as evoking in people a combination of awe and admiration. Ancient texts represent this response as positive or negative depending on one's relationship to the divine: for those seeking a favorable relationship, it would be positive, eliciting praise and trust; for those opposed to the deity, it would cause panic. It was understood that such objects, and even entire temples, were endowed with the capacity to act as agents capable of evoking the same type of response as would the deity. This view is reflected in the Priestly writers' understanding that the glory of the LORD resides in the sanctuary. Despite the Israelite prohibition against making images to be worshiped, the Jerusalem Temple, and its prototype the Tabernacle, would have been imagined as offering worshipers a visual experience of the LORD.

The Ark of the Covenant

What appears as the ark of the covenant in the NABRE translation, actually represents two different Hebrew expressions, one reflecting the Priestly perspective, and the other, that of the Deuteronomist. Each was imagined as a portable wooden box in which the two stone tablets inscribed with the Decalogue were contained.

The Priestly view, which appears in Exodus, speaks of an ark of the “testimony” (‘edut), and regards it as a ritual throne to be housed in the sanctuary. This wooden box was covered in gold and adorned with two golden cherubim (plural of cherub). Within the aniconic tradition, the throne itself would have suggested an image of a king, even though one was not visible. Hardly the round-faced infant of Western art, a cherub was imagined as a mixed creature, symbolizing the supernatural, and it could be fierce. Psalm 18:1–19 portrays the LORD as a storm god flying to the rescue in a cherubim chariot, and breathing fire in angry concern over the distress of his beloved. Resembling sphinxes, cherubim were winged creatures with two or four legs, and their faces could be those of a human, a lion, an ox or cow, or an eagle. The correspondence between this range of possibilities and the classic iconographic representations of the four Evangelists is probably not coincidental (in Matthew, a human; in Mark, a lion; in Luke, an ox; in John, an eagle). Figures of cherubim have been found in the decorative programs of thrones in ancient Phoenicia (ANEP, no. 458) and of cultic artifacts from ancient Israel (e.g., the Ta’anach cult stand). For the Deuteronomist, the ark of the “covenant” (berit) was much simpler: a plain wooden container with no cherubim (Dt 10:1–5). In the Deuteronomistic History, the ark served as an emblem carried into battle that signified the LORD’s presence as a warrior (e.g., Jos 6).

Exodus 32–34

After the people have agreed to worship no god other than the LORD, and in the midst of extensive instructions for proper worship, we encounter a story of the people’s illicit worship. Angry over the people’s betrayal, the LORD threatens to destroy them all, but Moses intercedes on their behalf, and the LORD forgives them and renews the covenant with them. The section concludes with a collection of laws, the “Ritual Decalogue,” exclusively concerned with worship.

The initial section of this complex story of illicit worship (32:1–24), likely represents two or three distinct stages of tradition, each with a different purpose, which may be reconstructed as follows.

Two pieces of evidence suggest a possible initial stage in which there was no sin, but simply a narrative establishing worship of the LORD. Exodus 32:5 refers to the celebration as legitimate, a “feast of the LORD.” In ancient Near Eastern iconography, the use of quadrupeds as pedestals for divine images was common. A calf could have performed the same legitimate function as the cherubim: supporting an invisible LORD. An initial stage representing legitimate worship would have entailed 32:2–6, except for the people’s exclamation that two calves brought them out of Egypt. That this exclamation was a later insertion is indicated by the fact that it does not agree with the description of Aaron fashioning a single calf. Thus, in this initial stage, Aaron requests the people’s gold, makes a single calf, and declares a feast to the LORD.

In the next stage, the story would have been adapted in the Southern Kingdom after the fall of the Northern Kingdom (722 BC). The purpose of this adaptation would have been to give an ancient foundation to the view that the Northern Kingdom was perennially guilty of idolatry, a view reiterated throughout the Deuteronomistic History. That history portrays Jeroboam I as setting up the worship of two golden calves, one to be worshiped at each of the Northern cities of Dan and Bethel (1 Kgs 12:26–30). That story includes the people’s exclamation verbatim as it occurs in Exodus 32:4, “These are your gods, Israel, who brought you up from the land of Egypt.” This exclamation links the two stories. The Exodus story otherwise speaks only of a single calf, suggesting that either the entire exclamation or the plural form has been inserted. If Jeroboam I did install calves in Dan and Bethel, they would likely have been understood as pedestals for the LORD. But without reference to such legitimate use, the Southern writers would have included the calves in both Exodus 32 and 1 Kings 12 as a means of portraying the Northern Kingdom negatively.

The third stage, the work of the Priestly writers, would have added the explanation in 32:21–24, in order to soften Aaron’s guilt. Since Aaron was the first high priest, the Priestly writers would have found it unsavory to have him engage in such a serious sin. In these verses, Aaron does not ask for gold or make the calf. Rather, he acts under pressure from the people, and the calf simply “comes out” of the fire. Nevertheless, in keeping with ancient practice, the prior tradition of Aaron’s responsibility, however disturbing, was also preserved.

The people’s idolatry spurs a dramatic exploration of what such a fundamental breach of covenant by the people means for their relationship with the LORD. The LORD threatens to consume them (32:10), and Moses presides over a punishing massacre (32:26–29). Yet Moses, the archetypal prophet, engages in intimate dialogue with the LORD and obtains forgiveness and a renewed commitment to the covenant (32:11–14; 32:31–34:11). Throughout their history, the Israelites experienced multiple catastrophic events that were interpreted as punishment by the LORD on account of their idolatry and injustice. This story is linked to the idolatry of the Northern Kingdom, and this idolatry was cited to explain their destruction by the Assyrians in the late eighth century BC. This explanation provided a way to draw lessons from those traumatic events and to preserve belief in the LORD as not weak or capricious, but as acting with justice. In this way, the violence and threats of violence in this story mirror the reality of violence experienced by Israel.

The story also provides a paradigm for the role of prophets in Israel as one of mediating the concerns of the people to the LORD, and representing the LORD to the people. The story dramatizes the importance of both parties remaining in relationship, even after catastrophic sin and suffering. Moses stands in the tension between the LORD’s attributes of justice and mercy. When the LORD appears to Moses in a cloud to renew the covenant, he speaks of mercy and justice in a way that closely parallels the opening lines of the Decalogue, providing a bookend that contains the covenant, its breach, and its renewal.

This comparison shows that the emphasis on either mercy or justice is tailored to the situation of the Israelites. When the Israelites enthusiastically accept the covenant, the declaration begins with an emphasis on the LORD’s jealousy and warns of punishment. When the people have brazenly broken the covenant, the declaration begins with an emphasis on the LORD’s mercy, forbearance, and undying love. In both cases, however, the duration of love dwarfs that of punishment. The statement emphasizing the LORD’s mercy (34:6) is included or adapted in multiple Old Testament passages (Pss 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Neh 9:17; Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2; Na 1:3).

The Ritual Decalogue (34:11–28) gives instructions concerning Israelite ritual practices and the avoidance of making covenants with Canaanites or taking part in their ritual practices. On the one hand, the notion of an absolute separation from Canaanite culture does not square with the facts of how Israelite religious practices and symbols actually developed; many of these, from depictions of God to ways of offering sacrifices, stem from Canaanite culture. On the other hand, as an instruction read in various periods of Israelite history, this text would have supported efforts to preserve a distinctive identity.

Exodus 35–40

This section largely constitutes the enactment of the instructions already given for the construction of the tabernacle, its furnishings, and the priestly garments. In Exodus 35–39, skilled craftsmen make the component parts of the tabernacle and the garments. In 40:1–15, the LORD instructs Moses to assemble the components of the tabernacle and to consecrate the priests. On the first day of the first month of the second year, almost a year after having departed Egypt, Moses assembles the tabernacle (40:16–33a). The priests will not be consecrated until Leviticus 8–9. The account of the construction closes with a phrase that echoes Genesis 2:2, “Thus Moses finished all the work” (Ex 40:33b). Finally, the glory of the LORD descends in a cloud and fills the tabernacle. The remaining legislation at Sinai is presented as spoken by the LORD from inside the tabernacle.

C.F.

Beginning of the Decalogue Ex 20:5b–6	Conclusion of the Golden Calf Story Ex 34:6–7
For I, the LORD, your God, am a jealous God, inflicting punishment for their ancestors' wickedness on the children of those who hate me, down to the third and fourth generation; but showing love down to the thousandth generation of those who love me and keep my commandments.	The LORD, the LORD, a God gracious and merciful, slow to anger and abounding in love and fidelity, continuing his love for a thousand generations, and forgiving wickedness, rebellion, and sin; yet not declaring the guilty guiltless, but bringing punishment for their parents' wickedness on children and children's children to the third and fourth generation!

THE STRUCTURE OF THE BOOK

An outline of the book of Leviticus:

1–7 General rules for the five major types of sacrifice

8–10 Narrative

8:1–9:21 Consecration of the priests and dedication of the Tabernacle

9:22–24 Blessing of the people and appearance of the LORD

10 Ritual errors by Aaron's sons

11–16 Rules for permitted and prohibited foods, disposing of impurity

17–26 Holiness Code

17 Rationale for not eating blood, and rules for disposing of it

18–20 The holiness of the Israelite people

21–22 The holiness of priests and sacrificial animals

23 Calendar of holy times

24:1–9 Continuous light and bread in the sanctuary

24:10–23 Narrative: the holiness of God's name

25 Limitations on the purchase of land and slaves

26 Exhortation: reward, punishment, and renewed covenant

27 Votive offerings and dedications

Leviticus contains mostly laws, statements, and commandments, which the LORD speaks to Moses from inside the Tabernacle. The laws for the making of the major types of offerings precede the initial enactment of sacrifices in the Tabernacle, which are offered in connection with the ordination of the priests. After the final sacrifice is placed on the altar, and Aaron and Moses have blessed the people, the LORD appears to the people while sending fire to consume the sacrifice. For the Priestly writers, this moment initiates the ritual system and so concludes creation. At the same moment, the LORD also sends fire to consume two of Aaron's sons for having violated the ritual protocol commanded by the LORD. Moreover, Aaron's two remaining sons also violate protocol but receive Moses's angry rebuke only as a consequence. These priestly errors dramatize the necessity that priests exercise their service carefully. The errors also highlight the need for the Day of Atonement rituals for cleansing the Tabernacle of the pollution that accrues to it as a result of violations of the sacred as well as violations of ritual purity. The following chapters discuss issues of ritual purity in detail, and Leviticus 16 describes the ritual sequence for the Day of Atonement.

The remainder of the book, the Holiness Code, begins with a unique explanation for abstaining from blood when eating any sort of meat. Then, a set of three chapters addresses how all Israelites are to be holy. Of these three chapters, the center one (Lv 19) may be considered the Decalogue of the Holiness Code. It includes the golden rule to love one's neighbor as oneself. The focus shifts in the following two chapters to regulations concerning priests and sacrifices. A chapter on the annual cycle of sacred festivals is followed by regulations for two institutions that are continuous: the light and bread maintained in the sanctuary. After a brief narrative dramatizing the importance of revering the divine name, two chapters emphasize the LORD as the proprietor of both the land and the people. Rules for sabbatical and jubilee years state that the sale of land or Israelites is temporary. The exhortation (Lv 26) emphasizes that the benefits of the land are a consequence of faithfulness to the covenant with the LORD. The final chapter treats issues arising when money or property is vowed or dedicated to the LORD.

Sacrifice in the Old Testament

In the Old Testament, the term "sacrifice" covers a wide range of particular activities for which the function of each may be understood on multiple levels. Broadly speaking, sacrifice can refer to animal sacrifices and other offerings for God, such as grain. Among sacrifices, some are offered entirely to God, while others are shared also by the priests and the people. Insights from social sciences are helpful for grasping aspects of the social and religious functions of sacrificial activity, and comparative evidence from the ancient Near East sheds light on various specifics in the biblical text.

Sacrifices could be misunderstood as providing people a sense of security allowing them to break the covenant by engaging in injustice and idolatry without fear of consequences. Many prophets confronted the people for assuming that their sacrifices could function in this way. For instance: “What do I care for the multitude of your sacrifices? says the LORD. I have had enough of whole-burnt rams and fat of fatlings; In the blood of calves, lambs, and goats I find no pleasure” (Is 1:11). Such statements were not intended to advocate for an end to the sacrificial system in a literal way, for that would have been incomprehensible in the ancient Near East. Rather, they are aimed rhetorically at those who engage in sacrifice while disregarding the demands of the Mosaic covenant for justice and faithfulness.

Fundamental for grasping many biblical texts about sacrifice, including both Priestly and non-Priestly texts, is that in many cases a sacrifice was understood as a gift, like one that a subject would present to a king. A formal situation in which a subordinate enters the presence of a deity, a king, or other powerful person is called an audience. In the ancient Mediterranean world, interactions in an audience were facilitated by the observance of certain conventions. After being presented before the human or divine superior by an intermediary, the subordinate was expected to offer one or more gifts in conjunction with words of greeting and conventional greeting gestures, for example, raising a hand, bowing, or prostrating. The idea that worship at the Temple was like entering an audience with God is apparent in many biblical prayers. For instance, Psalm 96:8b–10 speaks of worshipping the LORD in the Temple in this way:

Bring gifts and enter his courts (8b);

bow down to the LORD, splendid in holiness (9).

Tremble before him, all the earth;

declare among the nations: the LORD is king (10).

In the context of an audience, the subordinate’s gift constitutes a token of respect, loyalty, and dependence befitting the asymmetry of the relationship. Like the conventional gestures offered, it conveys not only recognition of one’s subordinate status in relationship with the powerful person or deity being approached but also commitment to behave accordingly. A common purpose for an audience was to allow the subordinate to make a request. The convention, however, does not portray the gift as a quid pro quo mechanism by which something of equal value is offered in exchange for what is asked, but precisely the opposite: because it is of far lesser value than what is requested, it symbolizes dependence upon the favor of the superior. This same rationale illuminates the biblical notion of sacrifices as gifts for God: they constitute tokens of respect, loyalty, and dependence, whose value is far outweighed by the life and help that are given by God, and that are both celebrated and anticipated by those who offer sacrificial gifts.

The Priestly writings concerning sacrifice reflect a complex system that developed over time, often employing terms in a more technical fashion than is found in the other sources of the Pentateuch and in other biblical texts. For instance, the Hebrew term minha can mean either “gift” or specifically “grain offering.” In the Priestly writings, the term always refers to a grain offering, clearly differentiated from other kinds of offerings that were also understood as gifts. Complex sacrificial systems were common among ancient Near Eastern cultures, and many similarities in activity and terminology exist among them. Still, even where terms and activities have parallels in other cultures, the distinctiveness of a given sacrifice for each culture lay in the particular way in which that culture situated it, both with respect to an overall sacrificial system and with respect to its meaning within a larger system of belief. The Priestly system of sacrifice is intimately related to beliefs about what constitutes deliberate or unintentional offenses, ritual purity or impurity, and common or holy spaces, times, and persons. (See “Holiness, Purity, Offenses, and Consequences: Priestly Concepts,” below.)

Instructions for sacrifice in the Priestly writings can be divided into two types. Some texts provide general rules explaining in an abstract way the mechanics of the five basic types of sacrifice. These rules are given in Leviticus 1–7 and its doublets (e.g., Nm 15:22–31; 5:5–8):

- burnt offering (Lv 1:1–17; 6:1–6)

- grain offering (Lv 2:1–16; 6:7–16)

- communion sacrifice (Lv 3:1–17; 7:11–36)

- purification offering (Lv 4:1–5:13; 6:17–23)

- reparation offering (Lv 5:14–26; 7:1–10)

In addition to animal and grain sacrifices, a libation may be included in a ritual sequence. Apparently because the procedure involved in a libation was relatively simple, there is no text specifying how it was done. In contrast to the Mesopotamians, who typically used beer in ritual libations, Priestly texts specify wine. This preference reflects both the availability of wine in Israel and the way it was understood symbolically as embodying life force, being called the “blood of grapes” (cf. Dt 32:14).

All other rules pertaining to sacrifice in the Pentateuch explain particular ritual sequences, each one as enacted for a given circumstance and including one or more of the basic types of sacrifice. The instructions for the Passover sacrifice (Ex 12:1–13; Dt 16:2, 7) and the ordination offering (Lv 8:22–31) are similar to the communion sacrifice, although it is not named. Ritual sequences involving sacrifice may be divided into three types:

- foundational sequences: ordination of priests and Levites (Lv 8; Nm 8), dedication of the tabernacle (Lv 9; Nm 7)

- sequences pertaining to the whole community: festivals and the daily burnt offering (Lv 16; 23; Nm 28–29)

- sequences pertaining to individuals: childbirth (Lv 12), scaly infection (Lv 13–14), vows of the Nazir (Nm 6), impurity from bodily discharge (Lv 15:13–15), and so forth.

Many texts in the New Testament interpret the death and resurrection of Jesus in terms of sacrifice. For instance, the Letter to the Hebrews makes extensive use of this metaphor, speaking of Jesus as not only the sacrifice but also as the high priest who offered the sacrifice (cf. Heb 4:14–16; 10:1–14). Revelation speaks of Jesus as a sacrificial lamb once slaughtered who now occupies a throne in heaven with God (Rev 5).

Holiness, Purity, Offenses, and Consequences: Priestly Concepts

The Bible does not preserve a single theological system but multiple traditions in dialogue. The Priestly writings of the Pentateuch reflect a system of beliefs and practices that developed over time, remaining largely coherent. Central to the system of the Priestly writers is the perception that the order established by God requires the observance of rules for all aspects of human behavior, including those that reflect the Priestly understanding of holiness, ritual purity, and moral impurity. In the Priestly view, this order operates in some respects with a reliability that we might compare to the laws of physics, and with predictable consequences for certain actions, including both inadvertent and intentional offenses against the established rules.

“Holiness” is not simply a synonym for “piety” or “virtue.” Holiness refers to a communicable effect of God’s presence that sets something apart, making it no longer common or ordinary. God designates certain persons, places, and times as holy. Holiness is especially concentrated in the sanctuary and the priesthood. The Priestly system of ritual focuses on holiness as something transmitted to persons and objects with which it comes into contact. In a later development, the Holiness school expands the notion of holiness to include the effects of ethical and ritual behavior, and in this respect admonishes all Israel to be holy and so to be set apart from the other nations.

To be “unclean” refers to ritual impurity, which is not the same as moral impurity and has nothing to do with either sin or physical hygiene. Systems for distinguishing what is taboo (impure) from what is acceptable (pure) occur across cultures, and they function, in part, to provide a particular group with a means of establishing its identity over against surrounding groups. Being unclean is a temporary state imagined as being covered with an invisible miasma that is contagious. It is contracted by contact with sexual fluids and certain manifestations of death, as well as certain foods deemed unclean. When persons become unclean, some impurity also pollutes the sanctuary. Before coming into contact with persons, places, or things that are holy, especially the sanctuary, unclean persons must wait a designated period of time (from less than a day to longer than week) and observe proper bathing rituals. Purification offerings function as cleansing agents to remove the effects of the person’s impurity from the sanctuary. A proposed rationale behind the purity regulations is that various forms of contact with death or with sexual fluids were considered to make one temporarily incompatible with holy people, places, and things. In the Priestly view, God is eternal and so undying, and God does not engage in sex because God has no consort. Being in a state affected by death or sex required following prescribed regulations to return to a state compatible with encountering what is holy.

Moral impurity results from committing particularly deplorable acts, including idolatry, murder, and violations of certain sexual regulations. These acts defile the one who commits them but do not render that person ritually impure, and the defilement itself is not contagious. The acts also defile the sanctuary in the form of an invisible miasma that accrues to it. The defilement can be removed from the person by atonement or by punishment. In the Priestly view, by the early sixth century, BC the collective moral impurity of Israel had so polluted the Temple that the LORD departed from it, leaving it vulnerable to destruction by the Babylonians.

The Priestly system imagines that many offenses against the law occur inadvertently, but that these violations, nevertheless, pollute the sanctuary. The purification offering gains forgiveness for the offender and cleanses the sanctuary of this pollution. The idea that one could violate the divine order inadvertently is common also in Mesopotamian culture.

Certain offenses against the sanctuary are described as bringing immediate death. For instance, God consumes Aaron's sons Nadab and Abihu with fire when they offer improper fire during the first offerings made in the Tabernacle (Lv 10:1–2). An elaborate system is given for transporting the sacred objects of the Tabernacle so that those carrying them do not have to touch them, for if they touch them, they will die (Nm 4:15). These descriptions convey the intense power that the Priestly writers attributed to the sanctuary, a power akin to that of high-voltage electricity. Both have great capacity for good but can be fatal if not respected. In the wake of the catastrophes of the fall of the Northern Kingdom and the destruction of Jerusalem, it would have been easy to see those losses as evidence of the LORD's weakness. In such contexts, portraying the LORD's power manifested so dramatically would have served to inspire confidence in the LORD and in the Priestly ritual system.

For some offenses against the sacred and for defiant behavior, the stated penalty is that the offender "shall be cut off from the people" (e.g., Lv 7:20; Nm 15:30–31). While scholars have debated what that idiom might signify, it seems most likely to express a penalty enacted directly by God that effectively ensured that the person's line of descendants would cease. The gravity of this penalty in ancient Israel becomes apparent in light of the way identity was understood. More concretely and to a greater extent than is the case in the modern West, children were understood to share the identity of parents, extending the identity of their parents into the future. One rhetorical effect of stating this penalty would have been to associate proper handling of the sacred with what is necessary for the continuation of life itself.

SECTION BY SECTION

Leviticus 1–7

The book of Exodus concludes with the glory of the LORD descending in the form of a cloud and entering the Tabernacle, which Moses has just assembled. Leviticus begins with the LORD calling to Moses from inside the Tabernacle and providing instructions for the mechanics involved in the five basic types of sacrifice to be offered. In the Priestly system, these constitute a set of building blocks used in constructing specific ritual sequences.

Leviticus 1:1–17; 6:1–6

In a burnt offering, the entire animal is burned. Hebrew has a word for “to burn” (srp), and the Priestly writers use this term to describe burning what remains (hide, dung, etc.) of an animal after it is sacrificed. The idiom for burning a sacrifice on the altar is to “turn it into smoke” (qtr), conveying the image of the offering going up to God as a pleasant-smelling gift. Compared to the other types of sacrifice, the burnt offering counted as the best gift for God, since it was far more valuable than grain and was given completely to God, none of it shared by the priests or people. The daily morning and evening offerings for God included a burnt offering, a grain offering, and a libation offering (Ex 39:28–42). Also attested among Israel’s neighbors, burnt offerings were perhaps thought to attract the deity’s attention. When an individual presented an animal for sacrifice, the laying of the person’s hand on it perhaps signified transfer of ownership of the animal to the deity (Lv 1:4). The reference to the burnt offering as “making atonement” (1:4) may reflect an early stage in the Priestly sacrificial system, for otherwise in the Priestly writings it is only the purification and reparation offerings that deal with the effects of offenses.

Leviticus 2:1–16; 6:7–16

A grain offering might be cooked or not. Once offered to God, only a small portion is then burned on the altar; the remainder is eaten by the priests. Grain offerings are included in the daily offerings, but they might also substitute for other offerings in cases where people cannot afford an animal, even a dove. Such substitution of grain in cases of poverty is also reflected in Mesopotamian ritual practice.

Leviticus 3:1–17; 7:11–36

In a communion sacrifice, also translated “sacrifice of well-being,” only a small portion is burned on the altar; the majority is eaten by the priests and the people who are making the offering. In the Priestly view, the shared meal constitutes a sacrifice in that the entire animal is first given to God. The portions shared by the priests and people are considered given back to them by God, as in the case of a king who invites his subjects to dine at the royal table. Thus, while the burnt offering was food for God, the communion sacrifice was food for the people. Moreover, in the Priestly view, no livestock could be eaten unless the animal was part of a communion sacrifice (Lv 17:3–7). The sacrifices described for Passover and for the ordination of priests are very similar to a communion sacrifice, but they are considered more holy and have additional elements. Since the communion sacrifice is shared as a meal, and since the occasions for which it is employed are joyful ones, an apt analogy for it is a communal barbecue. Three types of communion sacrifice are named. It may be offered in thanksgiving or as a voluntary offering for any number of situations. As a votive sacrifice, it would fulfill a vow made when a person lamented and petitioned God for help.

Leviticus 4:1–5:13; 6:17–23

A purification offering was a mechanism for cleansing the sanctuary of the pollution that had accumulated there as a result of the people’s contact with ritual impurity as well as from various types of offenses against the divine order. Blood was considered a sort of detergent effective for this purpose. In a purification offering the procedure that most concretely expresses cleansing is the placement of some of the sacrificial blood on the various furnishings of the sanctuary. The greater the status of the offender, the more central to the sanctuary are the furnishings to be treated with the blood. When Revelation 7:14 speaks of people being washed in the blood of the Lamb (referring to Christ), it alludes to this cleansing property of blood.

Leviticus 5:14–26; 7:1–10

The reparation offering was imagined in terms of a monetary metaphor. It served as a compensation or payment of damages in restitution. While it could be enacted in cases of actual fraud, it was most often enacted for unknowing infractions of things pertaining to the sacred.

Leviticus 8–10

The book shifts from instructions to narrative. It describes how Moses complies with the LORD's prior instructions for a ritual sequence in which Aaron and his sons are ordained as priests, the Tabernacle is dedicated, and the initial sacrifices are offered there (Ex 29). The scene reaches a climax when the priests bless the people and the LORD appears to them. In the midst of this joyous scene Aaron's sons are consumed by fire from the LORD's presence because they offered unauthorized fire.

Leviticus 8

The ordination ritual fits the three stages of a "rite of passage" as articulated by the anthropologist Arnold van Gennep: there is a symbolic separation from the people, a time of liminality (the transitional phase of the ritual), and finally an incorporation of the priests into their new identity within the people. The entire people is assembled to observe and participate, and from among the people Aaron and his sons are separated by being washed and receiving four ritual actions.

1. They are clothed in distinctive garments, described in detail in Exodus 28.
2. Blood of the ordination ram is placed on each priest's right ear, right thumb, and right big toe.
3. They receive in their hands portions of the ordination ram and other offerings that would become their customary allotment.
4. They are sprinkled with oil and some of the blood from the altar.

After the initial rite concludes with the priests eating their portion of the ordination sacrifice, the priests must remain for a period of seven days at the entrance of the tent of meeting. This period of waiting constitutes a liminal stage, for they cannot yet function in their new role. Upon the completion of this period, they prepare sacrifices for the first time, demonstrating their incorporation into the community in their new identity.

Leviticus 9–10

The following narrative of the eighth day is complex and paradoxical. This is the climactic moment in the Priestly narrative: the priests offer sacrifice for the first time, Aaron and Moses bless the people, and the LORD appears to the entire people, consuming with fire the people's communion sacrifice. Yet, Aaron's sons do something at that instant that has not been commanded, and they too are consumed by fire that comes from the LORD's presence. Thus, the priestly activity of the eighth day represents both resounding success and catastrophic failure. As the priests have begun to exercise their roles, they do so well enough that the desired effect occurs: the LORD appears to the people and consumes their offering. However, the priests make errors: not only do Nadab and Abihu offer improper fire but Aaron's other sons, Eleazar and Ithamar, fail to consume their portions of the purification sacrifice that had been prepared (Lv 9:15). As a result, Moses rebukes them in anger. In this way, the story illustrates the Priestly understanding of the LORD's justice and mercy. Within the Priestly view, violations have consequences as real, and some are as deadly, as would exposure to high voltage. The deaths of Nadab and Abihu illustrate violations of the sacred that are lethal. But for lesser violations, the LORD has provided the elaborate ritual system, with its purification and reparation offerings, ways of making restitution and of wiping away the polluting effects of the violations.

The account in Leviticus 9–10 also says something about the overall Priestly ritual system. Like the account of the theophany at Sinai (Ex 19), which is not from the Priestly writers, the present account highlights the tension between the immanence and the transcendence of God. It emphasizes in highly dramatic fashion that even with all the carefully detailed rules that pertain to the sanctuary, one ought never presume to have confined or domesticated the LORD.

Leviticus 11–16

These chapters address issues of clean and unclean foods, as well as other sources of ritual impurity and how to dispose of it.

Leviticus 11

By distinguishing creatures that are clean, and so permissible as food, from those that are unclean, and so prohibited, the Priestly writers offered a means of symbolically affirming and ritualizing Israel's special relationship with God. Five different classes of living creatures are named: large land animals (11:2–8); water creatures (11:9–12); birds (11:13–19); flying insects (11:20–23); and land creatures that swarm on the ground (11:41–42). With the exception of the land creatures that swarm on the ground, none of which may be eaten, characteristics for each class are given by which to judge the clean from the unclean. These characteristics imply what is “normal” for each class, and on this basis only the normal creatures are considered clean. For instance, a “normal” sea creature would have fins and scales; those that do not have both are considered unclean. For ancient Israel, making such distinctions provided a way of affirming boundaries in a way that was understood to reflect the order established by God when creating the world. Just as God created the world by acts of dividing waters from waters, and light from darkness, so Israel would constantly distinguish between clean from unclean creatures. Additional rationales have been proposed to explain the distinction between certain clean and unclean creatures, but none has proven adequate to explain all the distinctions. For instance, among land animals the only ones which may be eaten are the livestock that may also be sacrificed.

To touch unclean large land animals or their carcasses communicates impurity, and so they are to be avoided. The concluding exhortation to be holy by observing these purity laws echoes the perspective of the Holiness school (11:44–45).

Leviticus 12; 15

Leviticus 12 explains the manner of disposing of the ritual impurity that results from childbirth, and chapter 15 discusses impurity from bodily discharges. As noted earlier, in the Priestly system there is nothing dirty or sinful about sex or childbirth. (On what constitutes ritual impurity, see “Holiness, Purity, Offenses, and Consequences: Priestly Concepts,” RG 149.)

Leviticus 13–14

The treatment of “scaly infection” deals not only with human skin but also with discolorations on walls or fabric that likely resulted from mold. The Hebrew term tsara’at, translated “scaly infection” in the NABRE, is sometimes translated “leprosy,” but the condition called Hansen’s disease is not what the term describes. The Greek term lepra is used to translate the name of this skin disease, and the same term occurs in the Gospels, where it is translated “leprosy.” The common denominator that explains why the various types of scaly infection produced impurity has to do with the perception that they signified a draining away of life. The discolorations of human skin described were understood to lead to death if they did not go away. An expanding discoloration in walls or fabric, such could be caused by mold, was then perceived by analogy to progressive skin discoloration. Although some biblical texts associate such scaly infection with divine punishment, in the present text no offense is implied. The role of priests was that of diagnosticians: they were to judge whether or not the condition was present. This explains why, in the gospels, when Jesus cures lepers, he instructs them to show themselves to the priests to establish that they are cured (e.g., Lk 17:12–14).

Leviticus 16

In the Priestly system of ritual, the sequence for the Day of Atonement provides annually for purging the sanctuary of the invisible miasma of pollution that has accrued to it as a result of Israel’s offenses, and for disposing of that pollution. The necessity of this sequence stems from a twofold rationale. Even though sacrifices of purification and reparation are enacted throughout the year, as needed, in order to counter the polluting effects of offenses, some slippage is assumed. Beyond that, the polluting effects of intentional or defiant sins, which affect the most holy interior of the sanctuary, are not addressed by those sacrifices. “Atonement,” from the Hebrew term kpr, refers to the purgation of the sanctuary, and in light of the interpretation of blood (Lv 17:11), it also refers to release from a debt owed to God. Additionally, this ritual sequence allows the entire people to express penitence through fasting and cessation of work, and so to experience a renewed equilibrium in relationship with the LORD. The phrase “humble yourselves” (16:29, 31; see note to 16:29) involves primarily fasting.

In the ancient Near East, rituals for addressing the perceived effects of offenses against the divinely established order are well attested. In terms of social function, such rituals addressed people's anxiety about the potentially disastrous effects of their offenses, while also reinforcing their confidence in the ritual system and their resolve to refrain from such offenses. These rituals, like that of the Day of Atonement, typically symbolize the elimination of the effects of offenses in more than one way. A number of Mesopotamian rituals include prayers appealing to personified deities to calm their anger over the person's offenses, while also including ritual actions that symbolize the release of the effects of their offenses. For instance, in a Babylonian New Year's ritual called "House of Sprinkling Water," the king not only recites multiple prayers to an array of deities seeking reconciliation, he also engages in several symbolic actions: he releases two birds named "bitter thing" that symbolize his hope that the gods will release him from the bitterness of their anger; a boat is placed in a small canal and sent away, understood to carry away all evil from the king; the king sits in a ritual prison overnight to demonstrate his penitence; finally, the king is sprinkled with water to signify his purification.

Three clues suggest that before becoming an annual festival, the Day of Atonement ritual was celebrated as needed when a communal crisis emerged that was interpreted as divine punishment. There is evidence for crisis rituals from neighboring cultures that involve similar procedures as the present ritual. The directive that Aaron may not enter the inner sanctuary at any time (16:2) can be explained as establishing a shift in protocol, delegitimizing the prior crisis-oriented practice. The only mention of the annual celebration occurs at the conclusion of the chapter (16:29–34), and this section could easily have been appended to the older rite.

The ritual consists of two sequences: one sequence involved sacrifices and blood rites; the other involved sending a live goat into the wilderness. First, a burnt offering and two purification offerings, one for the high priest and one for the people are offered. A goat is selected for the people's purification sacrifice. The blood of the purification offerings is applied to the inner sanctuary and antechamber of the tent of meeting, as well as to the altar of sacrifice, in order to cleanse them.

After the sacrifices and blood rites are concluded, Aaron places his hands on a goat selected "for Azazel" (see note to 17:7). This act transfers to the goat the pollution caused by the people's sins. Aaron then has someone bring it into the wilderness. “Azazel” may refer to a demon, although its meaning is disputed. The wilderness can symbolize what is chaotic and dangerous; a place that does not embody the order of creation. As such, it is a fitting place to receive the pollution of the people’s sins, which represent their lapse away from the divine order.

If the two sequences originated separately, their symbolism might have been harmonized by imagining that the pollution removed by the blood rites was then transferred by Aaron to the live goat.

Leviticus 17–27

There is strong evidence that the Priestly material was revised and expanded by writers who extended the notion of holiness beyond something present in the sanctuary and priesthood. They understood holiness to include the idea that by proper ethical and ritual behavior the people were to be holy, set apart from the other nations. While the work of the Holiness school is apparent in other Priestly writings, the greatest concentration of texts that reflect this perspective are in Leviticus 17 through 26, known as the Holiness Code. Overall, the Holiness Code can be seen as a response to the prophetic critique of the sacrificial and ritual system central to the Priestly writings. Many of the prophetic writings in the Old Testament confront the people for using sacrifice or the idea of God’s presence in the Temple to take God’s protection for granted, while committing injustice and idolatry. The Holiness Code retains the importance of sacrifice while making explicit the demands of moral behavior in social and domestic matters.

Leviticus 17

Within a highly structured presentation of rules for disposing of the blood when handling livestock and wild game, this chapter offers a rationale for abstaining from the blood of any meat, a rationale not found anywhere else in the Pentateuch. After an introduction (17:1–2), there are five sections (17:3–7; 8–9; 10–12; 13–14; 15–16), of which the central one offers this unique rationale. God instructed Noah that people could eat meat but should not eat it with the blood in it (Gn 9:4). Here, a symbolic rationale is given. Since the life (nepes) of a creature resides in the blood, God has given Israel the blood to place on the altar as a means of paying a fundamental debt of life to God that they otherwise could not pay. This rationale makes observance of the blood prohibition a way of assimilating and honoring the idea that the sacrificial system itself is a gift from God for dealing with all manner of guilt that might arise. Even as it allows for the killing of certain animals, this chapter highlights the sacredness of all living creatures. It does this by emphasizing the sacredness of all blood, and also by legislating that the slaughter of all livestock to be eaten must be brought to the sanctuary as a communion sacrifice. Deuteronomy, by contrast, allows for the slaughter of livestock away from the sanctuary (Dt 12:15, 20–27).

Leviticus 18–20

The laws in these three chapters are addressed to all the Israelites. The similarity of content here creates a bookend around the central chapter (Lv 19), which may be considered the “Decalogue” of the Holiness Code and which begins with the central concern of the Holiness school: “The LORD said to Moses: Speak to the whole Israelite community and tell them: Be holy, for I, the LORD your God, am holy” (Lv 19:1–2).

The content of Leviticus 19 integrates rules about ritual practices with rules about social interactions within the community, including resident foreigners. Much of the Decalogue (Ex 20:1–17) is restated, but some underlying concerns are expanded. The Decalogue promotes social harmony by prohibiting blatant violations of murder, adultery, theft, bearing false witness, and coveting the spouse or possessions of one’s neighbor. Leviticus 19 mentions several of these and includes many additional prohibitions aimed at establishing harmony in the community. Exploitation, insults, slander, hatred, revenge, and indifference to the plight of others are all prohibited (19:13–18a). At the end of this sequence, the “golden rule” is given: “You shall love your neighbor as yourself ” (Lv 19:18b). Moreover, generosity to the poor is encouraged in the instruction to leave some of the harvest in the fields for the poor to glean (19:9–10). The commands concerning the Sabbath and reverence for the divine name and sanctuary are mentioned but not elaborated. However, the statement in 19:5–8 about not keeping meat from the meal of the communion sacrifice for longer than two days is detailed and can be seen as a prohibition against hoarding. When the meat was eaten communally, the temptation would have been to take more than one’s share and save it. The cultic practices of the other nations are also to be avoided, for example, wearing magical charms, practicing soothsaying, and consulting ghosts. Leviticus 19 begins with the command to revere mother and father and is the conceptual link to the focus of chapters 18 and 20 on domestic relations. The penalty for cursing father or mother is given (Lv 20:9), and like the other penalties there, it is death.

Leviticus 18 and 20 contain prohibitions and penalties regarding sexual behavior and infant sacrifice to the god Molech. By observing these prohibitions, Israel will be holy because these things are commanded by the LORD and because they will distinguish themselves from the practices attributed to the other nations. The extreme penalties for offenses against these prohibitions reflect the great value that the Priestly writers placed on the power and significance of sexuality in human relations and on the miracle of procreation.

Interpreting this legislation for the purpose of addressing contemporary issues in sexuality does well to consider a range of factors. Three are worth naming here. The laws reflect a patriarchal culture and are addressed to men. In that context, for a man to penetrate another man sexually could be understood as feminizing and so implicitly humiliating the man. The notion of sexual orientation as an enduring psychological reality was not understood.

Leviticus 21–22

Although the Holiness school broadens the concept of holiness to encompass the entire people, it maintains that the priests have a greater degree of holiness than other Israelites. These two chapters are structured into five speeches from the LORD to Moses, and they give regulations concerning the qualifications and conduct of the priests, and the qualities of sacrifices.

Even though they are holy, priests will encounter a certain amount of unavoidable ritual impurity. To the degree possible, they must avoid anything that would make them impure. As a result, priests are prohibited from coming in contact with a corpse. While most priests may do so in the case of an immediate family member, the high priest may not come in contact with any corpse. For a number of regulations dealing with sexuality, restrictions and penalties are greater in the case of priests because of their holiness. For instance, no Israelite daughter should become a harlot, but if a priest's daughter does so, she is to be burned. Extensive restrictions on the woman that a priest may marry are intended to ensure that he is the only man who will have had sexual relations with her.

The animals being sacrificed as well as the priests offering them were required to be free of specified “blemishes,” that is, permanent disabilities or bodily formations considered abnormal. Such blemishes were considered to lessen the value of the animals. In humans, such blemishes were understood to manifest a lack of divine favor.

Leviticus 23–24

The first of these two chapters (Lv 23) concern holy times. The second (Lv 24) regulates two institutions within the sanctuary that are continuous, and it offers a narrative about respect for the divine name.

Among the Priestly writings, Leviticus 23 is one of two elaborate calendars detailing the annual cycle of festivals, the other one being Numbers 28 and 29. The present calendar is structured as five speeches from the LORD to Moses. It includes expansions of a Priestly calendar by the Holiness school that incorporate activities of the people, such as the bringing of first fruits from the harvest (Lv 23:10–11). All the festivals are considered holy days belonging to the LORD, separate from ordinary time. In many cases, as on the Sabbath, no work is to be done.

From the annual festival cycle, Leviticus 24 turns to two institutions that represent a continuous display of worship in the antechamber of the sanctuary. Both the sanctuary light and the showbread are to be maintained by the priests. The seven-branched lamp (Ex 25:31–40) is a stylized bush or tree. The instructions of Leviticus 24:1–4 closely parallel those in Exodus 27:20–21.

The narrative of Leviticus 24:10–16 dramatizes the gravity of profaning the divine name, something highly sacred yet continually vulnerable to violation by anyone. The laws (Lv 24:17–22) are not directly related to the narrative; they make the point that foreigners residing in Israel are obligated to observe the same proportionality in dealing with injuries as are Israelites.

Leviticus 25–27

Leviticus 25 and 26 focus on the idea that both the land and the Israelite people belong to the LORD; the people receive the produce of the land as a result of their covenant relationship with the LORD. Leviticus 27 treats aspects of the material offerings that the people make to God.

The idea that the land should be left fallow in the seventh year is found not only in Leviticus 25:2–7 but also in Exodus 23:11 and Deuteronomy 15:1–6. However, the rationale assigned to the practice is different in each case. In Exodus, the rationale is to let the poor eat from the fallow land. The discussion in Deuteronomy connects the law to a set of social concerns. Leviticus points to the Sabbath: the land will rest. Although it is uncertain whether the Jubilee year regulation was ever put into practice (25:8–22), it provides that persons and land that had been sold should be freed. Leviticus 23:23–55 provides for a more ordinary means of allowing for the restoration of property and personal freedom. Overall, these laws express the ideas that Israelites should not be enslaved and that the land does not belong to people but is entrusted to families by the LORD. A family's land should be allowed to return to them in cases where they have been forced to sell it.

As the legal collections given at Sinai draw to a close, chapter 26 expresses both the unconditional faithfulness of the LORD to the covenant and the requirement that Israel remain faithful to its terms. In Leviticus 26:1–13, the LORD describes the benefits that he will provide Israel in the land. The next section (14–39) becomes dramatic in a way that it portrays the LORD in an explosive battle of wills with an obstinate Israel: the more they are hostile to the LORD, the more he will increase their suffering. Still, the LORD will remember his covenant and will remain with them. The images in this chapter are horrific. The metaphor of punishment leading to submission can easily be misappropriated to justify deplorable behavior. Nonetheless, it is important to recognize that these images reflect the dreadful reality of catastrophic events in Israel's history. Contemporary trauma studies illuminate how such texts enabled people in these circumstances to survive.

Leviticus 27 considers issues that may arise when people have vowed that they will offer something to God or have already dedicated something to God.

THE STRUCTURE OF THE BOOK

An outline of the book of Numbers:

- 1:1–10:10 Organization in preparation for the journey
  - 1:1–4:49 Organization of the people
  - 5:1–10:10 Legal material, celebration of Passover
- 10:11–22:1 Journey to the Plains of Moab
  - 10:11–36 Departure
  - 11:1–14:45 Lack of trust in the LORD prevents entrance into the promised land
  - 15:1–41 Ritual laws: sacrifice, defiance, garments
  - 16:1–18:32 Rebellion followed by reaffirmation of leaders
  - 19:1–22 Ritual laws: purification after contamination by a corpse
  - 20:1–22:1 Transition to the new generation
- 22:2–36:13 At the Plains of Moab
  - 22:2–24:25 The story of Balaam: the LORD's inexorable power
  - 25:1–18 A story against idolatry and intermarriage
  - 26:1–65 Census of the new generation
  - 27:1–11; 36:1–12 Inheritance laws
  - 27:12–23 Joshua as Moses's successor
  - 28:1–30:1 Ritual laws: sacrifices offered daily and during festivals
  - 30:2–17 Laws and vows
  - 31:1–54 War against the Midianites
  - 32:1–35:34 Issues regarding settlement in the land, recalling the journey
  - 36:13 Summary statement

The book of Numbers tells the story of the Israelites' journey from Sinai to the border of Canaan. Into the narrative recounting the journey, it weaves a number of legends as well as additional legal material. In both content and structure, the story conveys tension between order and disorder.

In the story, the first chapters describe the organization of the entire people by tribes, with instructions to proceed toward Canaan in a manner that resembles both an army on the march and an elaborate liturgical procession. It is liturgical in that it is organized around the portable tabernacle and led by the LORD's presence. It is military in that it advances toward battle with those who would prevent the people from taking the land given to them by the LORD. However, this image of precise organization in sync with the divine command stands in tension with the episodes along the way that dramatize the people's rebellion and lack of trust.

As with Exodus, the book may be divided structurally into three major sections according to geography: the organization preparing for the journey, the journey itself, and events that occur after arrival at the Plains of Moab. As with the prior narrative of the journey from Egypt to Sinai, the narrative from Sinai to Canaan is structured by six itinerary formulas linking seven locations. Moreover, scenes involving the people's protest because of hunger and thirst during the journey from Egypt to Sinai have parallels in the journey from Sinai to Canaan. As they proceed from Sinai toward Canaan, however, the people's protest and lack of trust is judged more negatively because they have committed themselves to a covenant relationship with the LORD, which was not the case during the journey to Sinai. In this way, the narrative dramatizes that radical trust in the LORD is the foundation presumed by the requirements of being God's holy people. As the narrative transitions to the new generation, the Israelites demonstrate greater obedience and enjoy increased success.

At the Plains of Moab, a census attests to the passing of the old generation, and Moses designates Joshua as his successor and recaps the journey from Egypt. The narrative anticipates success in Canaan by demonstrating through the prophet Balaam the LORD's inexorable power, and through victory over the Midianites the capacity of the Israelites under the LORD to defeat their enemies. Instructions cover a range of issues, including sacrifice, vows, and the apportionment of the land.

SECTION BY SECTION

Numbers 1:1–10:10 Organization in Preparation for the Journey

Numbers 1:1–4:49

Having marked the conclusion of the main lawgiving at Sinai (Lv 26:46; 27:34), the narrative of the Pentateuch turns in Numbers to the LORD's instructions to Moses for the organization of the people as they prepare to journey from Sinai to Canaan. This turning point marks the first anniversary of the people's exodus from Egypt. The LORD instructs Moses concerning not only how to take a census of the people but also how to organize the tribes each time they set up camp and each time they set out on the journey. The Levites are separated from the rest of the tribes.

The initial census includes all the tribes except the Levites (1:2–47). The separate narrative describing the census of the Levites includes for each branch of the tribe (Gershon, Kohath, and Merari) specifications of the responsibilities that pertain to the tabernacle (3:14–39; 4:1–49). The rationale for the Levites' distinctive treatment is inserted into this census narrative: they belong to the LORD in a special way because the LORD has designated them as a substitute for the firstborn of the Israelites, who belong to the LORD (Nm 3:11–13; cf. Ex 13:2; 22:28). This explanation, in turn, provides a point of reference for the insertion of laws pertaining to the redemption of the firstborn (3:40–51).

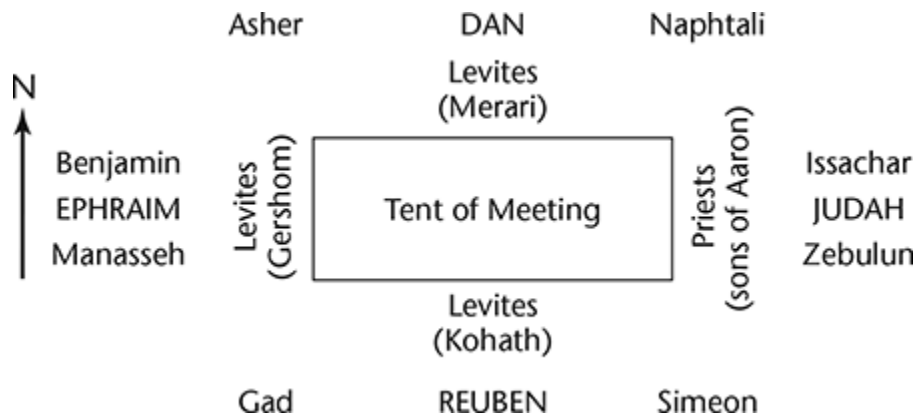

The Levites are responsible for transporting the portable tabernacle and its furnishings and for assisting the priests (3:5–10). Whenever the people set up camp, the Levites set up the tabernacle and then camp directly around it. Each of the remaining twelve tribes is designated to set up his camp, such that three tribes camp on each of the four sides of the tabernacle (see Figure 2). The same sequence is followed each time when setting out on the journey, with the Levites and priests in the center of the four groups.

1. Judah, Issachar, Zebulun (East)
2. Reuben, Simeon, Gad (South)
3. Levites
4. Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin (West)
5. Dan, Asher, Naphtali (North)

Naming the East first in sequence reflects a Near Eastern custom that considers the rising sun a fundamental point of reference. The overall picture is one of ritualized symmetry, conveying in spatial terms that the people move toward the Promised Land in a manifestation of the graduated levels of holiness that characterizes Israel, as understood by the Priestly writers.

Numbers 5:1–31

Having presented an idealized schema for the way in which Israel is to journey through the wilderness, the narrative shifts to legislation for dealing with three potential sources of disorder in the camp, each pertaining to a separate sphere: ritual, social, and domestic.

Priests and Levites

The historical reality of the relationship between priests and Levites, from the origins of Israel and Judah until the destruction of the Second Temple in AD 70, is extremely difficult to reconstruct. The main sources of information are the Priestly and Deuteronomic writings, but these, like the later source material (e.g., Ezra–Nehemiah), were completed after the Exile and largely reflect the writers' theological agendas. Although Moses and Aaron are from the tribe of Levi, the Priestly system described in Leviticus and Numbers distinguishes the sons of Aaron from all other Levites. Only Aaron's descendants are called priests, and only they are designated to make offerings in the sanctuary; the Levites assist the priests. Moreover, both Levites and priests serve exclusively at the central sanctuary. This system agrees both with the Priestly theology that the central sanctuary is the earthly residence of the LORD, and with the Deuteronomic theology that all sacrificial worship of the LORD should be centralized at the Jerusalem Temple. In tension with both of these theological agendas, the Deuteronomic writings preserve preexilic traditions, including poetry that portrays the Levites as making offerings (Dt 33:8–11) and stories of local shrines in which kin and Levites were ordained to serve as priests (Jgs 17–18). The antiquity of such traditions is suggested by the fact that the Deuteronomic editors felt compelled to retain them, even while presenting them with the negative judgment that they occurred at a time when "everyone did what was right in their own eyes" (Jgs 17:6). (For further reading, see Kugler, "Priests and Levites.")

Those who are unclean (ritually impure) are to remain outside the camp (5:1–4). There is nothing either sinful or unhygienic about being ritually unclean; in most cases, it constitutes a temporary, unavoidable state. (On ritual impurity, see RG 149.) Legislation that those who are unclean should remain outside the camp points to the holiness of the camp and to the concern that their ritual impurity could infect others or defile the sanctuary.

The remedy is given for any offense in the broad category of wrongs committed against fellow Israelites; it involves confession, restitution, and sacrifice (5:5–10). Since such offenses have the potential for divisiveness and even violence in the community, the remedy involves admission of the wrong done and restitution. Since the offense is presumed to have violated the covenant stipulations given by the LORD, the remedy also involves making an atonement offering.

When a husband suspects his wife of committing adultery but has no proof, a ritual is to be enacted to settle the matter (5:11–31). That the issue of a husband’s suspicion of his wife’s infidelity is inserted alongside broad laws concerning any ritual impurity, and any offense against a fellow Israelite indicates the fundamental potential for disruption in family life that such suspicions were understood to have. That the law concerns only cases of a husband’s suspicion about his wife, and not those of a wife about her husband, reflects the patriarchal culture that produced the law.

The ritual procedure described is akin to an ordeal, a physical test, the outcome of which demonstrates a person’s guilt or innocence. More specifically, the present ritual is a type of “drinking trial,” in which the person is made to drink something that if the person is guilty is believed to effect a punishment by divine agency. In the present case, if the woman is guilty, drinking the mixture was believed to affect her sexual organs. From a psychological perspective, the mere prospect of being forced to submit to such a ritual may have prompted a woman guilty of adultery to admit her guilt rather than drink the mixture. Elsewhere in the Old Testament, many allusions to a drinking trial involve a cup of wine (e.g., Ps 75:9; Is 51:17; Jer 25:15). In the New Testament, Saint Paul alludes to the concept of a drinking trial in discussing the Eucharist: “For anyone who eats and drinks without discerning the body, eats and drinks judgment on himself” (1 Cor 11:29).

Numbers 6:1–21

The legislation shifts from a focus on sources of disorder to a concern for those persons who might vow to enter into a state of increased holiness for a period of time. The term “nazirite” is derived from the Hebrew verb nzr “to separate,” which is a central aspect of holiness in Israelite religion. As Israel is separated from the other nations to be holy, so individuals may choose to distinguish themselves from the Israelite community by taking on certain distinctive behaviors. These include total abstinence from alcohol and from cutting one’s hair. In addition, the avoidance of contact with the dead corresponds with the Priestly notion that death imparts impurity and should not be exposed to what is holy, if this can be avoided. That Samson was a nazirite explains his long hair (Jgs 13:1–7). Although the story of Samson suggests that being a nazirite could be a permanent state, the present legislation deals with cases in which a person makes a vow to become a nazirite for a period of time. From ancient Near Eastern inscriptions as well as biblical texts, it is apparent that vows were a conventional way of presenting petitions to the deity during times of distress. Such vows entailed a promise to offer a gift to the deity as a token of gratitude for the deity's favorable response to the petition. Perhaps the most common such gift would be a communion sacrifice of thanksgiving to be shared as a meal by the deity and the people. It is not clear under what conditions one might vow to become a nazirite.

Numbers 6:22–8:26

This set of texts parallels the narrative of Leviticus 8–10, which tells of the dedication of the tabernacle, the consecration of the priests, and the first blessing of the people by Aaron and Moses. Numbers 7 lists the offerings contributed by the various tribes on the day that the tabernacle was dedicated (cf. Lv 8–9). In its literary form, it resembles the ancient records preserved from Near Eastern temples that account for the specific offerings made. Most of Numbers 8 constitutes a purification ritual for the Levites that parallels the consecration of the priests in Leviticus 8.

In Leviticus 9:22–24, the pair of first blessings of the Israelite people by the newly ordained Aaron (with Moses joining in the second blessing) occur just before the LORD appears to the people and sends fire to consume the initial communion sacrifice of the people. That narrative does not indicate that any words were spoken. Numbers 6:22–27 provides words for such blessings. The concept of “bless” fundamentally entails a recognition of status in a favorable relationship, and the words of Aaron's blessing convey such recognition using a bodily metaphor for God. The “face” of God “shining” upon the people does not imply that there were figural depictions of the LORD. Rather, the metaphor of a shining face expresses both the LORD's superior status and favorable disposition toward Israel. The concrete expressions of blessing—protecting (“keeping”), showing graciousness, and granting peace—flow from the LORD's commitment to covenant relationship with Israel. What is not stated, but implied, here is that the people also must bless the LORD by recognizing and committing to their status as the LORD's own people.

Although no reciprocal response of the people is described in Numbers, such response is indicated in the Leviticus narrative, in which the people engage in prostration, a gesture that recognizes the superior status of the one into whose presence one has arrived. Psalm 134 portrays a reciprocal exchange of blessing enacted ritually between people and God, in which the priests serve as mediators. The instruction in Numbers 6:21–27 highlights the intermediary role of the priests; the LORD begins by instructing Moses to tell Aaron “You shall bless the Israelites,” and the instruction concludes “So shall they invoke my name upon the Israelites, and I will bless them.” In other words, the ritual action of priestly blessing is to be understood as manifesting the divine action.

Numbers 9:1–10:10

The Israelites' time at Sinai concludes with the observance of the Passover (9:1–23). However, unlike the situation of the original Passover, the people have now received the rules concerning ritual impurity. Thus, the instructions here include the designation of an alternate time to celebrate the Passover sacrifice intended for those who are prevented from observing the festival at its appointed time because they are in a state of ritual impurity.

The final preparation for the journey involves making two silver trumpets for sounding specific signals to the people and to the LORD. The trumpets symbolize at once the military and liturgical character of the people's migratory campaign to Canaan: they alert the people to gather or to set out on the journey, and they also alert the LORD when divine help is needed in facing enemies. Many biblical texts attest to the use of trumpets in ritual activities. That they are to be used by the priests to signal each time that the camp is to set out conveys the liturgical aspect of the journey.

Numbers 10:11–22:1 Journey to the Plains of Moab

In organizing the narrative from Sinai to the Plains of Moab on the eastern edge of the promised land, the Priestly writers mark the itinerary with the same formula employed in the narrative from Egypt to Sinai: “[they] set out from A . . . went to/camped in B” (Nm 10:12; 20:1; 20:22; 21:4, 10; 21:11; 22:1). Beginning with Sinai, the formula is used six times, making the Plains of Moab the seventh location. The summary itinerary in Numbers 33:1–49 uses the same formula, but it offers a different version of the itinerary.

Numbers 10:11–36

This initial breaking of camp and setting out on the journey demonstrates Israel's capacity to follow the LORD's precise instructions, and so to proceed safely despite the dangers that the Priestly writers attribute to coming in contact with the disassembled tabernacle and its furnishings. The LORD's presence is continually manifest in the cloud, and Moses routinely calls upon the LORD to invoke protection against enemies (10:34–36).

Moses's father-in-law, called Hobab here (called Jethro or Reuel in Exodus), is a Midianite, and the positive portrayal of Midianites in this regard contrasts with the negative portrayal of them in Numbers 25 and 31, where they are associated with the Moabites. The present brief account may indicate a shift in tone toward the negative, in that Hobab suggests that Moses remain with him rather than journey toward Canaan (10:29–32). Although such an invitation is a standard expression of hospitality, in the present context it constitutes an invitation to disobey the divine plan.

Numbers 11:1–14:45

The people's complaining on the way toward Canaan parallels that of their journey from Egypt to Sinai, during which their complaints were answered by divine provision with water, quail, and manna. (In the journey from Sinai toward Canaan, the order in which these three are provided is partially reversed; with manna and quail in the present section, and water in Numbers 20.) In addition to treating the people's demands on the LORD, the present section also addresses the people's inability to act upon the LORD's demands that they accept the leaders that the LORD has chosen for them and that they trust the LORD to bring them into the land. In the narrative of the journey from Sinai toward Canaan, the people's complaints thus become pointedly symptomatic of the larger problem: their lack of trust. The narrative dramatizes the level of trust demanded by the people's having entered into a covenant relationship with the LORD at Sinai. It also expands the presentation of Moses in the role of a mediator, portraying him as engaging with the LORD more passionately than during the journey toward Sinai. It is helpful to see such exchanges between Moses and the LORD over against widely held assumptions in the biblical world that suffering resulted from divine anger over offenses against the divine. Portraying Moses, the archetypal prophet, engaging the LORD in this way would have offered Israelite hearers a way to imagine in their own time that the LORD's anger would not last forever, and that their own prophets could be effective in restoring a favorable relationship with the LORD.

The Israelites are disgusted with the manna provided by God and focus their longing on fond memories of Egypt (11:4–6). The larger narrative context, however, suggests the selectivity of their memory about Egypt and their willingness to abandon the goal of entering the promised land, a goal that they accepted when they agreed to the covenant with the LORD. Moses's appeal to the LORD shifts quickly from direct complaint to over the people's suffering under divine punishment, "Why do you treat your servant so badly?" (11:11a), to a play upon the LORD's parental responsibility for them: "Why are you so displeased with me that you burden me with all this people? (11:11b) Was it I who conceived all this people? or was it I who gave them birth, that you tell me to carry them at my breast, like a nurse carrying an infant, to the land you have promised under oath to their fathers? (11:12) . . . I cannot carry all this people by myself, for they are too heavy for me" (11:14). In Deuteronomy 1:31, Moses recounts that the LORD carried the people through the wilderness as one carries one's child. In the present narrative, the LORD responds to Moses's complaint by appointing seventy elders to assist him. But in responding to the people's desire for meat, the LORD first gives them quails but then strikes them with a plague. The lack of the people's repentance and of any mention of healing or alleviation of the plague fits the larger narrative context: the generation that left Egypt demonstrates rebelliousness and so will not be allowed to enter the promised land, while the new generation represents hope for a more faithful relationship to the LORD. By contrast to the present account, the story of the bronze serpent (Nm 21:4–9) occurs after Aaron's death and so represents a transition to the new generation. In that story, the people repent of their rebellion, and many are healed of their illness.

Miriam and Aaron demonstrate rebellion by calling into question the uniqueness of the status of their brother, Moses, as leader, while the text affirms the uniquely close relationship between Moses and the LORD. As a result, Miriam is stricken with a scaly infection in her skin, a condition apparently understood as a leaking away of life and so was considered to cause ritual uncleanness (Lv 13). Interestingly, Aaron is not so afflicted. The reason for this may be that the Priestly writers could not imagine the first high priest being allowed by the LORD to be so contaminated with ritual impurity. It is Aaron who acknowledges their sinfulness, and Miriam is apparently restored.

The story of the failed attempt to enter the land in Numbers 13–14 portrays the people as both lacking in trust of and rebellious toward the LORD. The issue of lack of trust arises first, in that fear of the inhabitants causes some of those who scouted out the land to falsify their report: while they initially say it is a good land, they then say that the land consumes its inhabitants. In the context of the larger narrative, in which the LORD has defeated Pharaoh's army, it is trust in the LORD's power that is required. The people cry out in fear, suspecting the LORD of intending to kill them, and proposing to choose a new leader and return to Egypt (14:1–4). Their fear leads to rebellion, and they are ready to abandon the covenant. The details of the situation are reported differently here than in its retelling in Deuteronomy 1:26–36. Here, it is Joshua and Caleb who seek to motivate the people to go and fight, claiming that the LORD is presently with them (Nm 14:7–9). Moses remains in the role of passionate intermediary with the LORD, playing here on the LORD's desire to maintain his reputation among the Egyptians (cf. Ex 32:12), and even quoting the LORD's self-description as slow to anger, kind, and forgiving (Ex 34:6–7). The LORD responds by pardoning the people but then declaring that the generation who left Egypt will not enter the land. After the LORD explicitly instructs the people not to enter the land at that time, the people ignore the instruction and fail in their attempt to enter it (14:39–45).

Numbers 15:1–41

This set of ritual laws begins with instructions for the inclusion of grain, bread, wine, and oil with animal sacrifices. The major types of sacrifice addressed include burnt offerings (burned entirely for God); communion sacrifices (most of which was eaten by the people, with only a token portion burned to God); and purification sacrifices (of which the priests eats a portion).

Returning to the theme of rebellion, one law invokes the death penalty on those who act in defiance of the LORD in any way (15:30–31), and a brief narrative reports the execution of someone who violated the Sabbath (cf. Ex 31:14; 35:2–3). (See discussion of laws invoking the death penalty, RG 142.)

Numbers 16:1–18:32

This section begins with a narrative of rebellion against Moses and Aaron by a Levite (Korah) and two Reubenites (Dathan and Abiram), together with an assembly of two hundred and fifty leaders; the rebellion ends in their deaths by divine intervention (16:1–17:5). Seeing this, the entire congregation rebels against Moses and Aaron, and the LORD sends a plague; however, Moses and Aaron intercede, and the plague is stopped (17:6–15).

The present narrative seems to blend separate traditions. Korah's claim that the entire community is holy (16:3) reflects a challenge to privileges accorded to the Aaronide priests because of their status of greater holiness. Such privileges include the ability to offer sacrifices and to have access to the most sacred parts of the sanctuary. This challenge may reflect disputes between Levites and Aaronides during Israelite history. Moses's speech to Korah asserts the validity of the distinction between Levites and priests (16:8–11). The question, "Why then should you set yourselves over the LORD's assembly?" (16:3b) implies that Moses and Aaron lack legitimacy or divine authority in their exercise of leadership, and that they have taken on leadership for self-serving motives.

The subsequent narrative affirms in several ways the divine authority of both Moses's prophetic leadership and Aaron's priesthood. The destruction of the initial offenders, and the subsequent plague upon the entire congregation reflect the view, common in the ancient Near East, that disasters such as earthquakes and plagues resulted from divine anger. In the narrative, the destruction of the offenders dramatizes the LORD's rebuttal of their claim that Moses and Aaron lack divine authority. Additionally, in portraying Moses and Aaron as interceding for the victims of the plague, the narrative confirms their lack of self-interest; if they had been concerned only to accrue power, they would not have interceded on behalf of those who had opposed them. From among the staffs of the twelve tribes, that of the Levi, inscribed with Aaron's name, sprouts miraculously, affirming in a way that symbolizes life the divinely authorized special status of both the Levites and the Aaronides (17:16–26). In the collection of regulations for both the priests and Levites (Lv 18), the divine authorization of Aaron is expressed in that the LORD addresses Aaron directly, rather than through Moses. Such direct communication occurs only here and in Leviticus 10:8.

Numbers 19:1–22

The belief that a person contracts ritual impurity from contact with a dead body underlies rules for eating meat of an animal that is found dead (Lv 17:15–16), and rules prohibiting priests and nazirites, because of their holy status, from contact with human corpses (Lv 21:1–4, 11–12; Nm 6:6). Recognizing that the ordinary Israelite will inevitably contact human corpses, the present text describes the ritual means of purification from the resulting impurity. The placement of these instructions here in the narrative may be linked to the death of the generation of Israelites who left Egypt, looking back at the many deaths that have just occurred and anticipating the deaths of Miriam and Aaron in the next chapter.

The severity of corpse contamination is reflected in the both length of time required for purification and in the elaborate character of the ritual. Lesser impurities subside within a day, but corpse contamination requires seven days. Rather than sprinkling the affected person with simple water, the water used here is made to resemble blood, which was considered a more powerful ritual detergent. For this purpose, a red heifer (young cow) is burned (not sacrificed to God) and its ashes are mixed with the water used for sprinkling.

Numbers 20:1–22:1

This section signals a transition in the narrative from the generation that left Egypt, to the generation born during the journey. Both Miriam and Aaron die and are buried, and Moses transfers Aaron's priestly garments to his son Eleazar (Nm 20:1, 22–29). Prior to Aaron's death, the people complain because they have no water, but rather than seeking help from the LORD through Moses, they rebel against Moses and Aaron, and the place is called Meribah (20:2–13). This story echoes Exodus 17:1–7, and in both cases after Moses strikes a rock, water flows from it. The Priestly writers employ the present story as a rationale for the LORD's refusal to allow Moses and Aaron to enter the promised land. Although the LORD instructs Moses to strike the rock (Ex 17:5), here the instruction is to command the rock (Nm 20:8). Moses's failure to follow the LORD's instruction is construed as a lack of confidence on the part of both Aaron and Moses.

Before Aaron's death, the Israelites fail to gain access through Edom and must go around it (20:18–21). After Aaron's death, the Israelites have success in battle against the king of Arad (21:1–3). There, the people enact their vow to carry out the practice known as the ban (herem), and the story serves as an etiology for the name of the place, Hormah. The ban is attested in numerous biblical texts as well as in an ancient inscription from the ninth century BC attributed to the Moabite king Mesha (COS, 2.23). Just what the ban entailed varies, as does the rationale for carrying it out, and no specifics are given in the present case. In the divinely sanctioned battles against Jericho, Ai, and other cities narrated in Joshua 6–8; 10–11, accounts that may be foreshadowed here, the ban involves devoting to God entire enemy populations by killing them. In cases of attack against non-Israelite towns, two rationales for enacting the ban have been suggested. Rather than stylizing the enemy as subhuman, which is often the case in war, the ban preserves their human identity, depicting them as a most valuable of sacrifice to be given to the deity. Moreover, assuming that the ban should be carried out would have functioned as an incentive against going to war, since it precluded the people's benefitting from taking an enemy people as slaves. (For further reading, see Niditch, War in the Hebrew Bible.) Nonetheless, the ban must be recognized as a brutal custom that is incompatible not only with modern values but with central values of the biblical tradition.

Immediately following their success at Hormah, the people again rebel against God and Moses, but this is the last episode in which they complain about the journey. After the LORD sends poisonous snakes among the people, they admit their offense against the LORD. Moses again intercedes, and the LORD gives instructions for their healing. The people's willingness to recognize their offense as the cause of their situation is symbolized in a ritual that involves looking at the source of their illness in order to gain healing. A bronze serpent was among the furnishings of the Jerusalem Temple prior to the reforms of Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18:4), and the Gospel of John alludes to this passage in explaining the saving capacity of Jesus's death (Jn 3:14–15).

As the people move forward in their journey, the relationship between the people and the LORD is portrayed in more harmonious terms. The LORD sustains the people with water, and they respond in jubilant song (20:16–18). Although they go around Moab (20:10–13), when Sihon, king of the Amorites, refuses to let them pass through his land and pursues them in war, they defeat him (20:21–25). According to the promise of the LORD, they also defeat the army of King Og of Bashan (20:33–35). The victories against Sihon and Og are celebrated in Psalms 135:10–12 and 136:17–20. Encouraged by a string of military successes against Arad, Sihon, and Og, the people arrive at the plains of Moab, on the edge of the promised land.

Numbers 22:2–24:25

With the people's arrival in the area of Moab, the narrative turns to a serious potential threat. In fear of the Israelites, the Moabite king Balak conspires with the Midianites to render the Israelites vulnerable by hiring the itinerant prophet Balaam to curse them.

Apparently Balaam was legendary for the effectiveness of his blessings and curses, and an ancient inscription preserves traditions naming this legendary prophet. Written in Aramaic, this inscription was found in the area around ancient Moab (Deir Alla in modern Jordan) and is dated to the eighth century BC (COS, 2.27). In both the inscription and the present story Balaam refers to the deities that he serves by the title “the Almighty” (Heb. Shaddai; Nm 24:4, 16), a title employed for the Israelite God in the Priestly texts of the Pentateuch.

As renowned as Balaam may have been, his ability to bless or curse, as understood in the ancient context, would have depended on either explicit or implicit cooperation of the deities believed to have power over the object of blessing or curse. Balaam's subordination to the divine is evidenced both in the inscription and in the present narrative. In the inscription, Balaam asks the gods to reverse their decision to send a drought. The present narrative makes clear that Balaam obeys the God of Israel, and in this way it employs the legendary prophet to affirm the absolute power of the LORD over the destiny of the Israelites.

This point is made dramatically in several ways. The LORD communicates directly with Balaam, and Balaam demonstrates unconditional obedience to the LORD. Balaam not only calls the LORD his God, he also refers to the divine with the titles Almighty and Most High, both of which became applied to the God of Israel in biblical traditions. Three times Balak requests that Balaam curse the Israelites, increasing his offer of payment with each successive request. To Balak's great frustration, Balaam refuses twice from a distance and then, in Balak's presence, three times blesses Israel with oracles from the LORD. As Balaam travels on his donkey to meet Balak, the angel of the LORD appears to the donkey, but until the LORD opens Balaam's eyes, he, Balaam, cannot see the angel. This conveys the point that the prophet's abilities derive completely from the LORD. In a fourth oracle, Balaam speaks of a distant future in which Israel shall defeat Moab and Edom.

Numbers 25:1–18

Returning the focus to the Israelites, the narrative takes up the Pentateuch's concern with a great internal threat: the Israelites will fail to preserve their identity over other nations. Encamped at the edge of the promised land, the people of Israel succumb to this threat, simultaneously violating prohibitions against intermarriage and against the worship of deities other than the LORD. In its current form the chapter coheres, but it seems to represent a Priestly expansion of Numbers 25:1–4. The apostasy evokes the LORD's wrath, apparently in the form of a plague, which is not averted when Moses fails to enact the LORD's command to execute all the leaders. When a certain Israelite consorts openly with a Midianite woman near the tent of meeting, the scene suggests cultic prostitution (25:6). Phinehas, grandson of Aaron, executes the couple, and the plague stops (25:7–9). Like the story of the golden calf, the present story employs violent images of divine anger against Israel in order to convey the gravity of apostasy, while at the same time demonstrating that the people as a collective survived. The graphic images of destruction followed by survival would have resonated with audiences who had survived actual catastrophic destructions, such as the Babylonian exile, which were understood as divine punishment. The action of Phinehas is hailed as an example of zeal, which represents one pole of the religious sensibility of ancient Israel. (The label "zealot" is famously applied to the revolutionaries against Rome in the first century AD.) This use of violence to enforce religious ideology is criticized by the prophets and in the teaching of Jesus.

Numbers 26:1–65

By this point, the narrative asserts that—with the exception of Moses, Caleb, and Joshua—the entire generation of Israelites who left Egypt has died, survived by their children who will enter the land. The census provides a methodical way of establishing this fact. Anticipating the allotment of the land in the book of Joshua, the focus of the census is on clans rather than individuals.

Numbers 27:1–11; 36:1–12

These two sections constitute the first and the last of several sections in the concluding chapters of Numbers that deal with specific issues pertaining to the allotment and the inheritance of land. In Numbers 27:1–11, the issue concerns keeping ancestral land within the clan. If a man has no sons, his daughter may inherit the land; if he has no daughter, either, his brothers may inherit it, and so forth. Numbers 36:1–12 raises the issue of how to keep land in the family if a daughter who inherits it chooses to marry. The conclusion is that a daughter who inherits land must marry within her own tribe, so that the land stays within the tribe.

Numbers 27:12–23

In this section, the LORD instructs Moses concerning the process for passing the leadership of the people to Joshua, and Moses complies. But here Joshua is not considered on a par with Moses. For instance, while Moses communicates directly with the LORD, Joshua must rely on consulting the LORD via the priests who will use the Urim, most likely a device for obtaining yes-or-no answers to questions posed. The role delineated for Joshua here is primarily that of a military leader, who leads the people to and from battle.

Numbers 28:1–30:1

These ritual laws concerning sacrifices are organized by time. They include those offerings to be made daily, on the Sabbath, at the new moon, and throughout the annual cycle of festivals. This list differs from the parallel calendar in Leviticus 23 in that the one in Numbers focuses on the sacrifices made by the priests, while Leviticus 23 also includes the activities of the people, such as bringing the first fruits of their harvest, leaving some of the harvest for the poor to glean, and fasting on the Day of Atonement. These differences suggest that the present calendar represents the earlier Priestly writings, while the one in Leviticus 23 has been adapted by the Holiness school.

Despite the NABRE translation's heading "On New Year's Day" (Nm 29) and that a New Year's Day exists now in Jewish practice, the designation "New Year's Day" does not exist in the Pentateuch. Considered in light of the Babylonian Exile, during which the Judeans would have witnessed the Babylonian celebration of the creation of the world in connection with the New Year, this omission may reflect a desire to affirm the Sabbath as the festival for celebrating creation. (See discussion of Genesis 1 in RG 121.)

Numbers 30:2–17

These laws govern the validity and annulment of vows, distinguishing between men and women, and presuming a culture in which a woman was dependent upon a man, either her father or her husband. In this context, the general principle is that a vow spoken by a man must be honored, but a vow spoken by a woman is valid only if the man upon whom she is dependent knows of her vow and does not contest it.

Numbers 31:1–54

Turning from legal considerations, the narrative presents an idealized account of the new generation's victory over the Midianites in the Transjordan. Unlike the failed attempt to enter the land despite the LORD's instruction to the contrary (Nm 14:39–45), the new generation obeys the LORD's commands and is successful. However, Moses's angry response to their having taken the women and children as booty suggests that they should have enacted the ban, destroying the entire enemy population. That Moses allows them to keep the girls and the women who have not had sexual intercourse suggests that issues of purity were involved in the ideology of the ban.

Numbers 32:1–35:34

This section addresses issues that anticipate settlement in the land, and it looks back over the entire journey from Egypt.

Numbers 32:1–42 serves as an etiology for how the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh came to dwell in the Transjordan region of Gilead. Members of the tribe of Manasseh capture a portion of Gilead from the Amorites. The Reubenites and Gadites request to settle in Gilead, pointing out that it had been vacated after the victories over Sihon and Og, but Moses emphasizes that these tribes must nevertheless support the other tribes in battle as they take possession of the land west of the Jordan. As is apparent from the ancient poetry of the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5), the commitment to come to the aid of fellow tribes in time of battle was of utmost importance in early Israel.

Before continuing with issues pertaining to the taking of the land, the narrative reports Moses's summary of the people's itinerary since leaving Egypt (33:1–49). In contrast to the itinerary marked by the Priestly formulas throughout the narrative, this summary makes Sinai the twelfth location in the journey from Egypt to Sinai, corresponding to the number of the tribes of Israel. The journey from Sinai to Canaan is divided into two phases, the first to Mount Hor, on which Aaron dies. This segment involves twenty-two locations, corresponding to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. The journey from Mount Hor to the Jordan river involves ten locations, perhaps alluding to the Decalogue.

The LORD's instructions for taking and apportioning the land demonstrate concern that the Israelites not adopt Canaanite religious practices and that the land be apportioned in an organized manner. The Israelites must dispossess the Canaanites of the land and destroy their ritual objects and installations, and the amount of land given to each tribe is to be proportional to the size of tribe (33:50–56). After delineating the boundaries of the land, the LORD instructs that Joshua and Eleazar, son of Aaron, as well as a leader from each tribe will apportion the land (34:1–29).

Although the Levites are not allotted a portion of the land (as are the other tribes), provision is made that they should have forty-eight cities, along with land for pasture. The cities include six that are set aside as cities of asylum for protecting those guilty of manslaughter from being killed in retaliation. In connection with this provision, specific rules are given for distinguishing murder from manslaughter.

Numbers 36:13

This statement refers to what the LORD has communicated through Moses since the people arrived at the Plains of Moab. What follows in Deuteronomy are “the words that Moses spoke to all Israel beyond the Jordan in the wilderness . . . ” (Dt 1).

THE STRUCTURE OF THE BOOK

An outline of the book of Deuteronomy:

1:1–5 Introduction to the book

Moses's first address:

1:6–3:23 Review of the journey from Horeb (Sinai) to the Plains of Moab

4:1–40 Exhortation to observe the covenant

4:41–43 Instruction regarding cities of asylum in the Transjordan

4:44–49 Introduction to the legal material

Moses's second address: core exhortation and commandment:

5:1–32 Recollection of the covenant at Horeb (Sinai) and restatement of the Decalogue

6:1–11:32 Exhortation to observe the demands of the covenant

12:1–26:19 The Deuteronomic Code

27:1–26 Instructions for a ritual renewing the covenant upon crossing the Jordan

28:1–69 Additional blessings and curses contingent upon faithfulness to the covenant

Moses's third address, reviewing the past and anticipating the future

29:1–30:20 Prose speech

31:1–28 Transition anticipating Moses's death, including the LORD's "song"

32:1–43 Poetic speech: Moses's "song"

Moses's fourth address:

33:1–29 Blessing of Moses on the tribes of Israel

32:44–50; 34:1–12 Concluding narrative: the death of Moses

In its structure and content, Deuteronomy is perhaps the most cohesive book of the Pentateuch. It constitutes a comprehensive reinterpretation of Israel's religious, political, and social traditions in order to face the religious and political crises of its own time. It legitimates this updating by placing this reinterpretation in mouth of Israel's founding figure, Moses.

With the exception of brief introductory sections and its final chapter, Deuteronomy takes the form of a lengthy farewell speech given by Moses to the people just before he dies and they enter the promised land. In biblical and other ancient Near Eastern literature, the genre of a farewell speech, given shortly before dying, by a leader to his disciples or by a father to his children, seeks to impart the elder's wisdom and may do so with filial affection. Placing instructions in such a context enhances their authority and their ability to engage the hearers. Among such speeches in the Bible are those given by Samuel (1 Sm 12), by the speaker in Proverbs 1–9, and by Jesus (Jn 13–17). Moses's speech here is often passionate in its exhortation, warning, and encouragement. Although Deuteronomy presents a considerable amount of legal material, it is anything but a sterile listing of regulations. At the same time, it includes many of the elements of a vassal treaty discussed in connection with Exodus 20–24: identification of the great king, recounting the history of what the great king has done for the vassal; stipulating what the vassal must do; and curses and blessings for those who break or keep the treaty. Aside from a few insertions attributed to the Priestly writers (e.g., Dt 32:48–52; 34:1a, 7–9), the book reflects a unified theological outlook and is attributed to the Deuteronomic school. Many scholars explain the present form of the book in at least two broad historical developments.

An early stage resulted in the book's core: the Deuteronomic Code of laws in chapters 12–26 surrounded by the exhortation in chapters 6–11 and 28; and the revised Decalogue in chapter 5. This core likely includes traditions that originated in the Northern Kingdom during the eighth century BC. After the Northern Kingdom fell to the Assyrians in 722 BC, these traditions would have been brought to Judah and developed there during the seventh century. Among the evidence for a Northern origin of these traditions are parallels to the book of Hosea, an eighth-century prophet from the North. Such parallels include its emphasis on the love of the LORD, covenant responsibility, and the need for religious reform (cf. Hos 8:1, 4; 11:4). Although separate from the legal material, the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33) seems also to reflect traditions from the Northern Kingdom. This poetic text, which treats each of the tribes (except Simeon), gives four times as many lines to the Northern tribes of Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) than to the Southern tribe of Judah.

The emphasis on cultic and political reform in the legal material may have been well received in Judah during the reign of Hezekiah (end of the eighth century), but during that of Manasseh (early to mid-seventh century) it would have more likely constituted a resistance movement. Manasseh served the Assyrians as a vassal, and the Deuteronomistic History is highly critical of him (2 Kgs 21:9–16; 23:12, 26). The rhetoric of Deuteronomy, especially that of the curses in chapter 28, seems to have been influenced by the language of the vassal treaties of the Assyrian king Esarhaddon (680–669 BC; see ANET, 534–41). It is nearly certain that Manasseh would have taken such an oath. After the assassination of Manasseh's son Amon, Josiah became king. According to 2 Kings 22–23, he instituted a reform, based on a book that was found in the Temple. The legal core of Deuteronomy likely represents the Book of the Law “discovered” in the Jerusalem Temple during the reign of Josiah (2 Kgs 22:8). Scholars debate whether any clear layers of editing can be discerned in Deuteronomy 6 through 26 and 28, but there is agreement that Deuteronomy 27 was likely an independent covenant liturgy. Pointing to a shift from exhortation to regulation, some consider that chapters 12 through 26 constituted a distinct earlier work, which was updated with introductory and concluding speeches. In any case, the book's core reflects the program of religious reform that Josiah enacted in the late seventh century.

During the events of the Babylonian Exile and the early postexilic period, Deuteronomy 1 through 4 and 29 through 34 were added to the book's core. Aside from chapter 33, which likely dates from the early monarchic period, these expansions include theological responses to the collapse of the Davidic monarchy and included the destruction of Jerusalem and the deportation of thousands of Judeans to Babylon. Thus, these speeches are placed in the mouth of Moses as a solemn warning that a massive destruction of Jerusalem could occur if the Israelites fail to remain faithful to the Mosaic covenant. In actuality, the speeches were written after the fact.

These additions also introduce the following four parallel statements, which serve as a device for structuring the entire book as a unity:

1:1 “These are the words that Moses spoke to all Israel beyond the Jordan in the wilderness.” This statement begins the brief section that introduced the entire book.

4:44 “This is the law which Moses set before the Israelites.” This statement introduces the book’s core, which itself is subdivided by three similar phrases. “These are the decrees” (4:45) introduces the revised Decalogue; “This then is the commandment, the statutes and the ordinances” (6:1) introduces Moses’s exhortatory speech; and “These are the statutes and ordinances” (12:1) introduces the Deuteronomic Code.

28:69 “These are the words of the covenant which the LORD commanded Moses to make with the Israelites . . . in addition to the covenant he made with them at Horeb.” This statement concludes the Deuteronomic Code.

33:1 “This is the blessing with which Moses, the man of God, blessed the Israelites before he died.” This statement introduces the final speech of Moses, which emphasizes in poetic form the LORD’s favorable regard for all Israel.

Major Themes and Rhetorical Strategies

Deuteronomy presents revisions of much prior legal material, such as the Decalogue, the Covenant Code, and certain ritual regulations, as well as material not appearing elsewhere in the Pentateuch, such as regulations for the office of the king. Placing all these laws in the mouth of Moses just prior to his death, the book incorporates heightened strategies for persuading, warning, motivating, and encouraging the hearers to accept them. Rather than simply listing regulations, the books cites certain laws and historical acts of the LORD on behalf of the people in order to urge its hearers to adopt basic moral principles and faithful attitudes. It appeals fundamentally to the heart. One of the book’s key strategies is to convey the impression that Moses is addressing the present audience in a personal manner. Even in presenting case law, rather than using third-person language as in other ancient Near Eastern law collections, Deuteronomy repeatedly uses second-person language, which has the effect of personalizing the law.

Shared Identity with the Israelites of the Exodus

The book repeatedly employs second-person “you,” in addressing its hearers. Such direct discourse helped the audience of the completed book, who lived in the wake of the communal traumas of the Babylonian exile, to identify themselves with their ancestors preparing to enter the land. Despite the catastrophic suffering fresh in the communal memory of the postexilic audience, the book draws its hearers into an identification with the people whom God chose to be his special possession, to share with him a covenant relationship. In the book, Moses insists that it is the hearers themselves whom the LORD freed from slavery in Egypt, even though they were not actually present in Egypt. For example: “It was because the LORD loved you and because of his fidelity to the oath he had sworn to your ancestors, that the LORD brought you out with a strong hand and redeemed you from the house of slavery, from the hand of Pharaoh, king of Egypt” (7:8). Even as it depicts Moses drawing his audience on the Plains of Moab into an identification with their ancestors who escaped Egypt, the book’s repeated use of second-person address and its emphasis on “today” help to draw its hearers into an identification with those same ancestors and with Moses’s audience.

Points of Reform

It is clear that Deuteronomy originated as a document of religious and political reform. The book emphasizes the importance of worshiping only the LORD and avoiding any act that might lead to the worship of other gods. Offerings for the LORD were not to be brought to local hilltop sanctuaries but only to the centralized sanctuary. This sanctuary is referred to consistently as “the place the LORD will choose as the dwelling place of his name” (16:2). Jerusalem is implied but not named. Such centralization would have encouraged national unity and served to safeguard Israel from adopting the practices of other nations. Moreover, various practices associated with non-Israelite religion are prohibited, including the use of sacred poles or asherahs (16:21–22); child sacrifice, witchcraft, divination, and necromancy (18:9–14).

Apparently in response to abuses of power by kings as well as prophets, the book places limits on the king’s authority, subordinating him to God’s written law (17:14–20), and also providing for the scrutiny of prophetic activities (18:15–22). Connected to the abuse of power is Deuteronomy’s promotion of treating others, Israelites as well as resident foreigners, in a fair and humane way. Thus, the system of justice must operate effectively (17:2–13; 19:1–13, 15–21).

At the heart of its reforming tone is the book's repeated imperative that its hearers make a decision as to whether they will accept the claim that covenant relationship with the LORD places on them. These imperatives emphasize "today" as the moment for making this decision.

Subverting Loyalty to the Empire

An element of reform that is not named explicitly in the book, but which can be recognized in it, is its rejection of the policy of serving the Assyrian king as his vassal. Such service entailed political loyalty and the regular payment of tribute, terms that were written in vassal treaties. For the Deuteronomic school, as it developed in the eighth and seventh centuries, to serve the Assyrian king meant also to serve his gods and so was tantamount to idolatry. Israel could serve only one king, the LORD. Kings in both Northern (Israel) and Southern (Judah) Kingdoms paid tribute to Assyrian kings intermittently from the ninth to the seventh centuries BC. During Manasseh's forty-year reign, he remained a loyal vassal of the Assyrian empire, which was at the height of its power. In several places in Deuteronomy, the parallels between its language and that of the Assyrian treaties is so pronounced as to indicate direct influence and a strategy of subversion. The Deuteronomic writers, undoubtedly familiar with the language of the Assyrian treaties, employed language from them and used it to assert the imperative of serving the LORD rather than the Assyrian king. After the collapse of the Assyrian empire in 612 BC, an important aspect of Deuteronomy's legacy to Judeans living under the empire is the book's insistence that Israel's identity, dignity, and life derive from the LORD rather than any human sovereignty.

Suffering as Punishment

Moses portrays the first generation of Israelites who departed Egypt as a rebellious generation. The LORD was justified in being angry with them and punishing them dramatically as a result. Yet the LORD did not completely destroy them as a people, but instead offered their children prosperity in the land.

Depicting the first generation in this way offered the survivors of the Babylonian Exile and subsequent generations living under successive empires a way of interpreting their own situations. To interpret suffering as divine punishment was common in the ancient Near East, and contemporary trauma studies affirm that as an immediate response to overwhelming, life-threatening experiences (such self-blame) functions as a survival strategy. Moreover, contemporary social theory points out that a common strategy for groups interpreting collective trauma is to assign blame for causing the trauma to those who violated certain moral principles; those same principles become markers of identity for the group that emerges from the collective trauma. This strategy is apparent in Deuteronomy: the values being espoused are those that the prior generations violated, so bringing upon the whole community the disaster of the Exile. These insights into psycho-social strategies for surviving trauma suggest a limited constructive function for interpreting past suffering as divine punishment in Deuteronomy. (See Frechette, under FURTHER READING.)

Love as Motivation in Covenant Relationship

Deuteronomy stresses the importance of love as motivation for both the LORD and the people. Mitigating the metaphor of suffering as punishment is the metaphor of the LORD as loving parent: the affirmation of the LORD's love for, and passionate desire to be in a favorable relationship with, Israel. "Love" and "hate" are key concepts in Deuteronomy, but in this context these terms express not simply emotion but commitment to covenant relationship or lack of such commitment, respectively. (See Lapsley and Moran, under FURTHER READING.) Love motivated the LORD to choose Israel and create Israel as a people in the past, and love motivates the LORD to seek to renew a relationship with Israel in the wake of the Exile. Moses exhorts the people to love the LORD above all else. The particular ways in which the LORD provides for and protects Israel, and in which Israel obeys the LORD's commands, are all presented in Deuteronomy as expressions of love. Recurrent in the book is the motivation that if the people obey the LORD's commandment, they will have life and prosper in the land that the LORD is giving them (e.g., 5:32–33; 16:20; 23:21). In the context of the book, this motivation is best seen within the overarching motivation of love upon which the covenant relationship is based.

Punishment and Love in Tension

Metaphors of punishment and love are combined in the portrayal of the LORD as a father who disciplines his children but also cares for them (8:3–5). Modern readers might construe such a portrayal of the LORD as analogous to an abusive parent, who at one moment expresses care and at another acts abusively. On the one hand, this analogy misses the complexity with which the metaphor of suffering as punishment functioned in the biblical context. This metaphor was embedded in the larger culture, and it served to help people remain in relationship with God while surviving actual violence that was, in fact, enacted not by God but by people. On the other hand, this metaphor can indeed be harmful if applied in present situations, and such application warrants the greatest scrutiny in order to prevent harm. (See Frechette, under FURTHER READING.)

Types of Rhetorical Argumentation

Among the rhetorical strategies of argument employed, two are prominent. In some cases, Moses recalls the acts of the LORD in history in order to draw out their meaning for the present:

For love of your ancestors he chose their descendants after them and by his presence and great power led you out of Egypt. (4:37)

This is why you must now acknowledge, and fix in your heart, that the LORD is God in the heavens above and on earth below, and that there is no other. And you must keep his statutes and commandments which I command you today. (4:39–40a)

In other cases, the wrong conclusion is raised only in order to be refuted. For instance:

Otherwise, you might say in your heart, “It is my own power and the strength of my own hand that has got me this wealth.” Remember then the LORD, your God, for he is the one who gives you the power to get wealth, by fulfilling, as he has now done, the covenant he swore to your ancestors. (8:17–18)

Sometimes, the two strategies are combined:

If you say to yourselves, “These nations are more numerous than we. How can we dispossess them?” do not be afraid of them. Rather, remember clearly what the LORD, your God, did to Pharaoh and to all Egypt. (7:17–18)

SECTION BY SECTION

1:1–4:43 Introduction and Moses’s First Address

Deuteronomy 1:1–5

Beginning with the first of four statements by which the entire book is structured (1:1), this introductory section locates Moses’s speech geographically and temporally. However, the list of place names given resembles an itinerary more than an indication of a particular location. The time is near the end of the fortieth year of the Israelites sojourn in the wilderness. Unlike the preceding narrative of the Pentateuch in which the LORD speaks to Moses, it is almost exclusively Moses who speaks in Deuteronomy. Nevertheless, the introduction insists that what he says accords with what the LORD commanded.

Deuteronomy 1:6–3:23

Moses’s speech begins with this review of the journey of the Israelites from Horeb. Deuteronomy refers to the mountain where the LORD made a covenant with Israel as “Horeb” rather than “Sinai.” In this it follows the precedent of the E (Elohistic) source in the Pentateuch, according to the documentary hypothesis.

When Moses recalls the moment in the journey at which he was given leaders to assist him, he portrays it in terms of a request he made to the people, and to which they agreed (1:9–18). In the parallel account in Numbers, however, Moses brings his complaint to the LORD, who establishes the leaders (Nm 11:10–17). Moreover, Moses’s review of the journey makes no mention of the way in which the people questioned Moses’s leadership (Nm 16:1–35). A rhetorical effect of such reworking of the situation in the present account is to demonstrate unity between Moses and the people, with whom the book invites the audience to identify. Moses’s retelling of the Israelites’ failed first attempt to enter the land differs from the account in Numbers in ways that serve the purposes of Deuteronomy (Dt 1:19–46; Nm 13–14). In Numbers, it is Joshua and Caleb who, after seeing the goodness of the land firsthand, urge the people to not be afraid to enter it (Nm 14:6–9). In Moses’s recollection, it was he who urged them to do so, and as throughout Deuteronomy, his argument was based on the LORD's past actions on the people's behalf: the LORD fought to free them from Egypt and has carried them through the wilderness to the present, as tenderly as one carries a child. In Numbers, Moses intercedes passionately with the LORD on behalf of the people (Nm 14:13–19), but no mention of that intercession is made in Deuteronomy. Here, Moses recalls only how the people initially repented but once again disobeyed by seeking to enter the land against the LORD's will and so brought punishment on themselves. This account echoes Deuteronomy's emphasis on the consequences of disobedience. Finally, in Numbers the LORD prohibited Moses's entry into the land because he did not obey the LORD's instruction to command the rock rather than strike it (Nm 20:6–12). By contrast, Moses makes the point in his retelling that it was because of the people's disobedience that the LORD did not allow him to enter the land, providing an image of Moses as the model prophet, who suffers because of the people, and with them.

As Moses recounts Israel's movement through the territories of Edom, Moab, and Ammon, he affirms that the people were not to attempt to take land from these nations because the LORD had allotted to each of these nations its land, just as the LORD has allotted the Israelites their land (2:1–23). But the LORD instructed Moses to take possession of the Transjordan regions of kings Sihon and Og, who are called Amorites (2:24–3:11). The defeat of these kings and the apportioning of their land to Reuben, Gad, and a portion of the tribe of Manasseh anticipate success in the conquest of Canaan.

Deuteronomy 4:1–40

Having reviewed the journey, Moses offers an exhortation on the law as a source of life and wisdom given by the LORD so that the people may prosper in the land that the LORD is giving them. The law is also a source of prestige, for even the Egyptians will admire how wise the Israelites are because of it (4:6–8). Moses recalls the people's acceptance of the law at Horeb and then focuses on its prohibition of the worship of any gods other than the LORD. It is violation of this prohibition that Moses "predicts" will lead to the exile of the Israelites. Here Deuteronomy interprets the Babylonian Exile as the result of idolatry, while suggesting that the same moment can become one of renewed relationship with the LORD. On the basis of the LORD's past actions on behalf of Israel, Deuteronomy 4:32–40 argues in elevated rhetoric for the LORD's utterly unique divinity. The hearer is invited to conclude that worship of any other deity would make no sense.

Deuteronomy 4:41–43

This brief narrative explains that Moses designed three towns in the Transjordan as cities of asylum.

4:44–28:69 Introduction and Moses's Second Address

Deuteronomy 4:44–49

This brief narrative begins with the second of four statements by which the entire book is structured (4:44). It is followed by the first of three similar statements that divide the core legal material (4:45), here introducing the restatement of the Decalogue.

Deuteronomy 5:1–32

As in Exodus (20:1–17), in Deuteronomy the Decalogue is presented as a separate collection of laws. Not included in the Deuteronomic Code (12–26), it has been inserted here and edited, in part, as a way of linking the authority of the lawgiving at Horeb to the rest of the laws in Deuteronomy. The explanation given is that the LORD appeared to the people at Horeb and spoke directly to them to give them the Decalogue. They were amazed that they could meet God face-to-face and not die, but they became afraid to remain in God's presence and so asked Moses to report back to them the rest of what God would say (5:22–27). Additionally, the LORD affirmed that the people should disperse and leave Moses alone to receive the rest of the commandments. The entire section begins and ends with an emphatic exhortation that the people internalize and act upon what they hear.

Most of the account of the Decalogue here is essentially the same as that in Exodus 20:2–17. The most substantive difference between the two concerns the Sabbath. In contrast to Exodus, which makes the Sabbath a memorial of God's resting after creating the world, here the command to rest on the Sabbath is extended to slaves, animals, and resident foreigners as a way to memorialize that the Israelites were once slaves in Egypt and the LORD freed them.

Deuteronomy 6:1–11:32

Moses exhorts the people to appropriate the complex of religious and political laws that will be detailed in Deuteronomy 12 through 16. The laws are presented as a unified whole, as conveyed by the phrase, “this is the commandment”; it is comprised of “the statutes and the ordinances” that make up the Deuteronomic Code (6:1). In 6:2, “you, that is you, your child, and your grandchild” explicitly identifies the hearers of the book with Moses’s generation. To “fear” God in this context refers to a reverential posture that finds expression both in proper worship and in moral behavior that is in sync with the divine will.

Deuteronomy 6:4–9 presents an idealized image of the reception of the Torah in an all-encompassing process that continuously expands from individuals to their children, displayed on their bodies and in their dwellings. Moses portrays obedience to the LORD’s commandment as an act of hearing Moses’s words and loving the LORD. The Hebrew term for “hear” (shema) may also be translated “obey”; the sort of hearing envisioned is both attentive and ready to internalize what is heard. The notion of love in this context is not sentimental but rather expresses total commitment imbued with filial affection. It captures the personal and relational emphasis of Deuteronomy. This total love engages “heart,” the place of thought and intention; “soul/being,” the place of desire and emotion; and “strength,” one’s capacity for action. Of itself, the statement “The LORD is our God, the LORD alone!” (6:4) allows for other translations, including “the LORD our God, the LORD (is) one.” While the statement might be understood to express that the LORD is unitary in nature or unparalleled among other deities, the concern of this verse becomes clear when taken together with the following one. Because of the LORD’s utter uniqueness, Israel is to give total commitment exclusively to the LORD, Israel’s only God. Jesus considers this text the greatest of all the commandments (Mt 22:37–38; Mk 12:29–30; Lk 10:27).

The exhortation proceeds through a sequence of topics linked to remembering the LORD’s action of bringing Israel from Egypt into the land:

- warning against committing idolatry in the promised land (6:10–19); proper instruction of children (6:20–25);
- prohibition against intermarrying with Canaanites and instruction to destroy their ritual objects (7:1–11);
- promise of the LORD’s continued commitment to covenant relationship resulting in life and prosperity for the people (7:12–15);
- instruction to enact the ban, which entails destroying the inhabitants of the land but not taking any of their goods, and trusting that the LORD is fighting for them (7:16–26; see discussion of the ban, RG 164);
- encouragement to obey the commandments based on recollection of the LORD’s provision during the journey from Egypt, and the LORD’s testing the people to see if they intended to keep the covenant (8:1–6);
- warning against forgetting that it is the LORD who provides prosperity of the land (8:7–20);
- admonition to recognize that the LORD has given them the land not because they earned it but because of the LORD’s promises to their ancestors (9:1–6);
- reminder of Moses effective intercession for the people during their multiple rebellions since the covenant at Horeb, including the golden calf incident and the subsequent covenant renewal (9:7–10:11);
- conclusion that the LORD’s requirement of wholehearted commitment and obedience is not only justified by the LORD’s past actions; in the present it is the path of life and strength for Israel in the land (10:12–11:17).

This lengthy exhortation concludes by first reiterating the initial exhortation in Deuteronomy 6:6–10 and by emphasizing the conditional-nature of the promise of prosperity in the land (11:18–25). It then draws the audience into a climactic confrontation with a moment of decision: to be faithful to the covenant and obey the law is to choose life; to turn away from the covenant is to choose death (11:26–32). This confrontation anticipates the blessings and curses that conclude the book’s core legal section (27:14–28:68).

Deuteronomy 12:1–26:19

These chapters constitute the Deuteronomic Code. The first section includes instructions regarding proper and improper worship (12:1–31). The section begins and ends with instructions to destroy the ritual objects of the Canaanites, and with warnings against inquiring into their practices of worship. As in the Priestly material, these instructions indicate that all sacrifices are to be brought to the centralized sanctuary, and they refer to two of the main types of animal sacrifices also found in the Priestly material (burnt offerings and communion sacrifices; see RG 163). Prior to the fall of the Northern Kingdom, there were likely multiple shrines for offering sacrifices in both the Israel and the Southern Kingdom. After the fall of Israel, Hezekiah's reforms in Judah required the centralization of sacrifice in Jerusalem, a policy which would have both produced revenue and supported political and religious centralization of authority. Hezekiah's reform does not seem to have had long-term effect, and so Josiah reinstituted the policy of centralization. In Deuteronomic theology, such centralization expresses in spatial terms the ability of all Israel to appear together in worship before the LORD, supporting one another in avoiding apostasy. In contrast to the Priestly instructions, many of which are intended for the priests and Levites, the Deuteronomic material is addressed to all the people. Like Leviticus 17, the present regulations prohibit consuming the blood of the meat. Although that chapter states that the slaughter of all livestock must be treated as a sacrifice, Deuteronomy allows for eating the meat of livestock without offering any of it to God at the sanctuary. For people residing far from Jerusalem, it could have been tempting to go to a local shrine rather than make the journey to Jerusalem any time they wished to eat meat. Perhaps it was to avoid such temptation that Deuteronomy allows people to eat meat whenever they want without having to sacrifice any of it to God.

The focus of legislation turns to particular situations in which people may be tempted to idolatry (13:1–19). Whether it is a prophet, a dreamer, or a member of one's own kin, anyone who invites the worship of other gods is to be killed. (On the death penalty in the Pentateuch, see RG, p. 142.) These potential sources of temptation to apostasy are the same as the potential instigators to treason discussed in the Vassal Treaties of Esarhaddon; and these and other similarities between the present chapter and that document suggest deliberate adaptation. If, for example, the inhabitants of a whole town have been led astray to worship other gods, the town must be completely destroyed. This is the only case in which the ban is to be enacted on an Israelite town. (On the ban, see Niditch, War in the Hebrew Bible.)

As in the Holiness Code (Lv 16–26), Israel is a holy people (14:2) both by virtue of being designated such by the LORD and by observing distinctive practices as instructed by the LORD. Many regulations are intended to maintain boundaries around Israel’s distinctive identity as a people. Such a concern is expressed in regulations prohibiting the mourning rites of other peoples and affirming a distinctive diet (14:1–21). There are restrictions on membership in the assembly (23:2–9), and both men and women are prohibited from being a temple “prostitute,” qadesh/qedeshah, although precisely what is meant by this Hebrew term is unclear (23:18–19).

The laws concerning tithing, remission of debts, and release of slaves are addressed to free Israelites who owned land (14:22–15:23). These laws express a clear humanitarian concern for the economically disadvantaged (i.e., the widow, the orphan, and the foreigner). Israelites ought to offer tithes to God and to treat others generously because everything that they have in the land is a gift from the LORD. A portion of the harvest and the firstlings of the flock should be given back to the LORD, but the tithes given to the LORD may be consumed by not only the Levites but also by the poor. The instruction for the periodic release of slaves expresses the idea that in Israel, who are a people freed from slavery in Egypt, those who have had to sell themselves into slavery should not remain slaves forever. Among related laws are those requiring that refuge be given to slaves who have fled their masters; that interest not be demanded on loans; that people fulfill vows promised to the LORD; and that people not abuse the generosity of others by taking more grapes than they can eat when passing through a neighbor’s vineyard (23:16–17, 20–26). Protections for the poor include limits on what can be taken as a pledge for loans, and the requirement of paying a just wage in a timely manner (24:6, 10–15). The practice of leaving a portion of the harvest to be gleaned by the poor (24:19–22) is based on Israel’s experience in Egypt and has parallels in Exodus 23:10–11 and Leviticus 19:9–10; 23:22.

Like the laws regarding sacrifices (Dt 12:1–14), the annual ritual calendar (16:1–17) is addressed to all the people, not just to the priests. Unlike the Priestly calendar in Numbers 28 through 29, it does not address sacrifices carried out during Sabbath, new moon, Day of Atonement, and the fall new year. Instead, it concerns only the three annual pilgrimage feasts to the centralized sanctuary, with the Passover sacrifice and Unleavened Bread comprising a single feast. The command to “rejoice”

(16:11, 14) signifies celebratory feasting, and the law specifies that the poor are to be included.

Deuteronomy 16:18–18:22 offers an idealized vision of Israelite society in which power is distributed among judges, priests, kings, and prophets. Judges—and Levites in cases of bloodshed—decide cases, but there shall be no distortion of justice or taking of bribes. That kings are permissible but not necessary is echoed in 1 Samuel 8 and supports the primacy of the LORD as Israel's king. The earthly king must not amass excessive wealth, and like other Israelites he must read and obey the Torah, and listen to the LORD's prophets. Justice is to be accorded to foreigners as well as Israelites (24:17–18). Limits are placed on corporal punishment (25:1–3).

Rules for the establishment of cities of asylum, for distinguishing between cases of homicide from those of murder, and for guarding against false accusation appear in Deuteronomy 19. These laws reflect the deeply ingrained cultural assumption that the kin of someone who has been killed have an obligation to kill the one responsible. At the same time, the laws go to great lengths to prevent the killing of the innocent and of those who have inadvertently killed a person. In cases where a human corpse is found but no witnesses to the death have come forward, Deuteronomy 21:1–9 provides a ritual for the people of the nearest town to declare that they neither were responsible for the death nor witnessed it, so to clear themselves of suspicion.

Deuteronomy 20:1–20 presents an idealized vision in which warfare is conducted only at the direction of and with the help of the LORD. It encourages citizen soldiers not to fear a superior army, while also stipulating several humanitarian exemptions of individuals from the obligation to go to war (see also Dt 24:5). Limits are placed on the enactment of the ban (total destruction of a town) as well as on the destruction of fruit trees. Legislation (Dt 23:10–15) treats the encampment of the army as a sacred space to be kept free of both ritual and physical impurity.

The first of several sections regulating marriage provides a transition from war legislation. It introduces procedures that allow an Israelite to marry a woman from an enemy town, allowing her to grieve for the loss of her family and symbolically to enact a new beginning (21:10–14). In such cases, the husband is prohibited from subsequently enslaving her or selling her. All the marriage laws reflect a patriarchal society, yet they establish certain boundaries intended to protect women. The laws pertain to both a husband's ability to divorce his wife (22:13–21; 24:1–4), and a man's obligation to marry and never divorce an unmarried woman whom he has raped (22:28–29). In cases of a married or betrothed woman having intercourse with another man, the man is presumed guilty; the woman is presumed to be guilty unless she cries out for help. If the act occurs away outside the town, where no one would hear her cry, the woman is presumed innocent (22:22–27).

The law requiring an Israelite to assist a neighbor's lost animal (Dt 22:1–4) adapts Exodus 23:4–5 so that the "enemy" there becomes a "neighbor," literally a "brother," in Deuteronomy. While Exodus presumes a local community in which the owner would likely be known to the one who finds the animal, Deuteronomy presumes either population movement or social breakdown. Nevertheless Deuteronomy affirms a bond of kinship with all Israelites, even those one does not know. Jesus's parable of the Good Samaritan in response to the question "Who is my neighbor?" may be seen as an expansion of the spirit of this law (Lk 10:29–37).

The legal material concludes with instructions for a ritual offering of the firstfruits of harvest and a tithe in gratitude to the LORD (26:1–15). Here, the offering of firstfruits becomes an opportunity to ritually affirm communal identity with Israel's ancestors, who were oppressed as foreigners in Egypt but whom the LORD brought to their own land. The offerings are to be made at the centralized sanctuary, and, as with tithes (Dt 14:28–29), the firstfruits and tithes are to be shared by the poor. Having concluded the laws, themselves, Moses exhorts the people that since they have accepted the laws as part of the covenant with the LORD, they are to observe them "today" (26:16–19).

Deuteronomy 27:1–26

An insertion into the surrounding speech, Deuteronomy 27 echoes the covenant making ceremony at Sinai (Ex 24:1–10). The present account includes elements from the first part of that ceremony: altar, stones, sacrifices, and a written form of the words of the covenant. The shared meal (Ex 24:10) is echoed in the communion sacrifice (Dt 27:7), both of which were understood as meals shared with God. After the Israelites cross the Jordan, the ceremony is enacted by Joshua (Jos 8:30–35). The "amen" that concludes each of the twelve curses turns it into an oath or self-curse. The necessity of such an oath is highlighted by the fact that most of the infractions listed might be difficult for witnesses to detect.

Deuteronomy 28:1–69

This extensive list of blessings and curses is presented as the consequences of keeping the covenant with the LORD, or of not doing so. There is remarkable similarity between many of the curses listed here and those of the vassal treaties of Esarhaddon, the Assyrian king. Deuteronomy 28:20–44 has strong parallels in sections 39–42, 56, and 63–64 of those treaties (cf. ANET, 538–39). Given these parallels, the present chapter can be seen as a theological adaptation of the language of those treaties for the purpose of subverting allegiance to Assyria. (See RG 174.) In the treaties, the language of the curses expressed the supreme power of the Assyrian king and his gods to control the vassal. The Deuteronomist uses the Assyrian's language of power but does so in a way that attributes to the LORD the power claimed by the Assyrian king. In contrast to the Assyrian king, who only lists curses as a consequence of disloyalty, the LORD also promises blessings for loyalty. The curses that describe exile and return to slavery provide a lens through which postexilic hearers could interpret past communal disasters of destruction and exile (28:63–68).

29:1–34:12 Closing Addresses

This section was likely added to the book in the wake of the Babylonian Exile. It contains Moses's concluding exhortation, in prose and poetic sections. It also includes a final speech from the LORD to Moses, and Moses's final instructions for the transition that his death represents.

Deuteronomy 29:1–30:20

This speech seeks to draw the hearers into an existential choice to obey the covenant as a means of having life. Moses explicitly identifies the generation of the book's hearers with those present with Moses on the Plains of Moab (29:13–14). For an audience aware of the devastation of Jerusalem in 587 BC and subsequent Babylonian Exile, the speech provides an explanation of past communal devastation (29:15–28), while encouraging hope for a renewed relationship with the LORD (30:1–14). As elsewhere in the book, the LORD's saving action in the Exodus, the people's success against Kings Sihon and Og in the Transjordan, as well as the promise of blessing in the land, are foundational motivations for committing themselves to the LORD in the present.

Deuteronomy 31:1–29

Turning from direct speech to narrative, this chapter reports Moses's final actions before his death. Moses arranges for the transition of authority to Joshua and for the preservation and periodic reading of the written law. The LORD speaks twice to Moses (31:14–15, 16–22). After instructing Moses concerning the commissioning of Joshua and regarding Moses's death, the LORD predicts the people's future apostasy and addresses a question that the audience of the sixth century would have raised: "Is it not because our God is not in our midst that these evils have befallen us?" (31:17). This second of the LORD's speeches is called a "song" three times, and it insists that the people brought evil on themselves by abandoning the covenant. The tone of judgment in the LORD's "song" is echoed in the first half of Moses's "song" (32:1–43).

Deuteronomy 32:1–43

Moses's concluding exhortation of the people is called a "song," and it corresponds to the LORD's "song" (Dt 31:16–21). Its date of composition is much disputed, for while it employs archaic language consistent with an earlier time, it addresses the sixth-century context of the Exile. Moses's song responds to the people's question about their suffering, as quoted by the LORD (Dt 31:17). With allusions to the devastation that Israel experienced in the Exile, the poem attempts to explain the past disaster while encouraging committed trust in the LORD as the only God, who remains committed to a renewed relationship with Israel.

The first part, 32:1–27, proceeds like prophetic speech that takes the form of a lawsuit; it presents evidence of the LORD's faithfulness in contrast to the faithlessness of the people to the LORD. Assuming the conventional ancient Near Eastern rationale that suffering may result from divine punishment, the song implies that the people have brought their suffering upon themselves. As often occurs in prophetic speech, the voice of the prophet shifts to that of the LORD (Dt 32:20).

In Deuteronomy 32:28, the LORD turns from accusing Israel to accusing the nations who devastated them. The remainder of the song employs dramatic and violent imagery to express the LORD's advocacy for the Israelites, and the LORD's anger on their behalf because of the suffering that they have endured. As in Isaiah 10:5–19 and Jeremiah 50–51, the same nation that has been considered an instrument of the LORD's punishment is itself condemned for arrogantly failing to recognize the supremacy of the LORD.

Thus, there are two interpretations of Israel's suffering: it is divine punishment, but the nations' arrogance in inflicting that suffering leads to their condemnation. For a community traumatized by disaster, the first interpretation provides a sense of order, by which some sense can be made of the events, and in which past violations can serve as examples of behaviors to be avoided in the future. The second interpretation expresses in dramatic terms the Israelites' value and dignity in the LORD's eyes, for the LORD will fight on their behalf. (Concerning the function of such texts in addressing the effects of trauma, see Frechette, Old Testament.)

Deuteronomy 33:1–29

This blessing of the tribes of Israel just prior to Moses's death echoes the blessing given by Jacob (Gn 49). These final words of Moses in the Pentateuch shift from Deuteronomy's consistent emphasis on the conditionality of divine favor, to a strong affirmation of God's abiding love, provision, and protection for Israel. Like Genesis 49, the present set of blessings likely represents a compilation of separate tribal sayings. While the high status accorded to Judah in Genesis 49 reflects a Southern/Judahite perspective, the present blessings reflect a Northern/Israelite perspective, in which Judah is downplayed and Simeon is not mentioned. In contrast to Genesis 49, Levi's priestly responsibility receives considerable attention here. Introductory (33:1–5) and concluding (33:26–29) sections frame the particular blessings for the tribes (33:6–25) and place them in the context of the comprehensive blessing intended for the entire people. The introductory section summarizes the core tradition of how the LORD brought Israel into existence as a people. "A king" (33:5) most likely refers to the LORD rather than to the Davidic monarch. The concluding section affirms the capacity of the LORD to protect and provide for Israel. That Moses's final speech emphasizes the unity of the tribes and God's ongoing care for them would have encouraged trust and unity among the people amid their struggles.

Deuteronomy 32:44–50; 34:1–12

These brief narrative sections describe Moses's departing words of exhortation and his death. An insertion by the Priestly writers reiterates their explanation for the LORD's refusal to allow Moses and Aaron to enter the land (32:48–52).

The Pentateuch concludes by affirming the utter uniqueness of Moses among all the prophets of Israel (34:10–12).

BEFORE BEGINNING . . .

The book of Joshua is both the conclusion of one story and the beginning of another. It ends the story of Moses and the liberation of the Hebrew slaves from Egypt and their guidance into the land of Canaan. It begins the story of Israel in its land. That story continues in the books of Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings. The rabbis called these books the “Former Prophets” since they believed they were composed by the prophets Samuel and Jeremiah. They are also known as the “Deuteronomistic History of Israel” because the religious views of the book of Deuteronomy shaped the telling of the story. They are, however, not histories in the modern sense. These books turn the memories of Israel’s past into a sermon that provided readers with some hope for a future following the fall of Jerusalem, the destruction of the Temple, and the forced migration of many of Judah’s people in the sixth century BC. Deuteronomy emphasized the critical importance of serving the LORD alone by shaping one’s conduct according to the norms of traditional Israelite morality as found in the Torah given by God to Moses. The Former Prophets illustrate the consequences of both obedience and disobedience. This message of these books implies that there can be a future for Israel since God has set before it the choice of life and death (Dt 30:15). All Israel had to do was choose life.

The story of Israel in its land begins well enough as the book of Joshua tells of a quick conquest of almost all of Canaan by the Israelite militia under the leadership of Joshua. By the time the book of Joshua was composed in the sixth century BC, the settlement of the Israelite tribes in Canaan was a distant and hazy memory. Archaeology has shown that the book of Joshua simplified what was a very complex process. Some of the violent confrontations described in Joshua (e.g., those at Jericho and Ai) were not part of this process since these sites were unoccupied at the time the Israelite tribes settled in the central highlands of Canaan. The book is not a historical account of the Israelite settlement but a homiletic exhortation calling for obedience to the Deuteronomic Torah: when Israel is obedient it enjoys God's blessings. Israel acquired its land not because of Joshua's leadership and the Israelite militia's accomplishments but because "Israel served the LORD during the entire lifetime of Joshua" (Jos 24:31a). But as the story of Israel in its land continues readers learn of the consequences of Israel's failure to serve the LORD faithfully.

A problem that contemporary readers have with the book of Joshua is its martial tone. It presents God as ordering Joshua to lead the Israelite militia against the indigenous population of Canaan (8:1–2). These people are defeated and exterminated (6:17; 8:24; 10:32–35). God not only orders this but joins in the fighting on Israel's side (10:14). It is true that the Israelite tribes gained the territory that would be the setting for their subsequent history, in part through violence. The Israelite tribes emerged during a turbulent period of Canaan's history. Egyptian hegemony in the region ended, and the Canaanite city-states were in a state of collapse. There was a vacuum of political power and control as various groups attempted to take advantage of this. Complicating the picture was a long period of inadequate rainfall in the region, which led to serious food shortages with people fighting over Canaan's limited resources. The Israelite tribes first settled in Canaan's central highlands, hoping to exploit its agricultural potential. They found themselves in conflict with other groups of people (3:10) trying to survive in difficult times.

The description of this conflict in the book of Joshua was shaped not by memory as much as it was by Deuteronomic ideology. Deuteronomy's law regarding the waging of war, which required the extermination of the Canaanite populace (Dt 20:16–17), is an ideological statement rather than a practical guide to Israel's conduct. The book of Judges makes it clear that no such extermination took place. The overheated rhetoric of Deuteronomy 20 reflects the centuries of conflict between the Israelite kingdoms and the other nations of the eastern Mediterranean region, and ancient Israel's determination to maintain its presence in the region.

Reading through the Book of Joshua

The Land-Taking (Jos 1:1–12:24)

The book of Joshua's first chapter makes clear connections with Deuteronomy. Its story begins "After the death of Moses . . ." (1:1a; Dt 34:5). The words of God to Joshua (vv. 1b–9) rehearse Moses's commissioning of Joshua in Dt 31:14, 23; 34:9. The dimensions of the land in v. 4 are the same as those given in Dt 11:24b. The reference to "the book of the law" in v. 8 certainly refers to Deuteronomy. In vv. 12–14, Joshua reminds the tribes whose territory lay east of the Jordan that Moses ordered them to assist the tribes west of the Jordan (Dt 3:18–20). The Deuteronomic texture of this first chapter provides a framework for understanding the stories that will follow. As the stories unfold, it becomes clear that Israel receives the land as a gift from God given to those who obey the Torah under the guidance of Joshua. No military preparations are mentioned and none are necessary as long as Israel observes the Torah.

Although the book of Joshua is often thought of as a chronicle of a massive invasion of Canaan by a united Israelite army under the leadership of Joshua, only one quarter of the book actually deals with the battles for the Promised Land. The book asserts that "Joshua took the whole land" (11:23). But the account of the battles fought by the Israelite tribes focuses almost entirely on the central region of Canaan (6:1–10:27). Battles in the south (10:28–43) and the north (11:1–14) are treated in summary fashion. The two places that receive the most attention are Jericho (6:1–27) and Ai (7:2–8:29). The story of the taking of Jericho begins with the sending out of two unnamed Israelite spies to the city (2:1–24). The story of its fall in chapter 6 suggests that the sending of spies was unnecessary. The focus of the story is theological, centering on the affirmation of faith in the God of Israel by Rahab, a non-Israelite. She and the spies discuss nothing of a military nature; instead, Rahab acknowledges the power of Israel's God. This story adds a universalist coloring to a book that is decidedly Israel-centered. The Gospel of Matthew names Rahab as one of Jesus's ancestors (Mt 1:5), and Hebrews presents her as a model of faith (Heb 11:31). Some interpreters, however, regard Rahab as an ambiguous figure since she betrays her own people to aid the Israelite spies.

Following the favorable report by the spies, Joshua leads the Israelite tribes across the River Jordan (3:1–5:1). Normally the Jordan is easily fordable so 3:15 notes that the crossing took place when the river was high. This detail is important since the crossing is compared to the miracle at the Red Sea (4:23). Liturgical rather than martial features shape the story of the crossing that begins and ends at Israelite shrines: Shittim and Gilgal. Priests carrying the ark of the covenant precede the people across the river (3:6). The people are to be ritually clean (3:5), and the event is memorialized by setting up stones, an action similar to that of Moses at Sinai (4:1–10; Ex 24:4). The Jordan here is more than a physical boundary; it marks the transition of the Israelite tribes from desert wanderers to a people with a land of their own. The miraculous crossing demoralizes the kings of Canaan and robs them of their will to resist (5:1).

The final preparations for the land-taking have no military dimension to them at all (5:2–12). The first is the circumcision of the males born on the journey in the wilderness (5:2–9). While this will render the newly circumcised temporarily unable to fight, it does make them fit to celebrate the Passover (5:10). Both these observances became important makers of Jewish identity during and after the exile. Certainly the book of Joshua intends to promote these practices. The land-taking here is not a matter of military action but of hunger: eating the land's agricultural produce (5:11–12). Finally, Joshua meets "the commander of God's army" (5:13–15). This enigmatic figure is likely the leader of God's heavenly army. He makes no further appearances in Joshua. The encounter underscores the priority of God's activity in the land-taking.

Archaeology has shown that Jericho had been abandoned for some time before the emergence of the Israelite tribes, probably because its water source had become severely polluted, making its waters no longer potable. In the thirteenth century BC, Jericho was a small unwallled village and remained so until the Persian Period (sixth century BC). Ai was a town that flourished in the Early Bronze Age (2500 BC). It too had been abandoned for centuries before the Israelite tribes made their appearance. But apparently, the people of Israel celebrated the gift of the land that they received from God at shrines near Jericho. The story of Jericho's fall reads more like an account of a liturgical ceremony than that of a military adventure.

The book tells the tale of Jericho and Ai as object lessons for its readers. Neither Joshua's military leadership nor the military prowess of the Israelite army was responsible for the fall of Jericho: it was taken because Israel followed God's directions. The city's walls collapsed after an elaborate procession with the ark that took place over seven days. Thus, the city did not fall because of any military operation. The Israelite tribes were not to enjoy the fruits of Jericho's fall since no booty was to be taken nor was there to be any Israelite settlement there. While Israel had no difficulty taking Jericho, Ai was another story (7:1–8:30). Because Joshua's spies misjudged the enemy's strength, Israel attacked Ai without sufficient force and suffered a grave defeat. The book accounts for this stunning setback by describing how Achan kept some of the booty from Jericho for himself contrary to God's commands (6:17–21). After Joshua prayed and Achan was punished, God provided Joshua with tactical instructions for the defeat of Ai's army.

To keep the significance of the Torah before the reader, the book tells of a detour to the north that Joshua took in order to build an altar on Mount Ebal, which flanks the valley in which Shechem is located (8:30–35). On the stones used to make the altar, Joshua wrote the Torah. He then read the Torah—complete with the blessings and curses contained in it—to the people, reminding them that they will shape their future by the choices they make.

When the book returns to the story of the battle for Canaan, Joshua and his army are at Gilgal. Their victories led kings of the city-states in Canaan to form an alliance to stop the Israelite advance. The people of Gibeon tried a different approach. They sought an alliance with the Israelites by claiming to be, like the Israelites, newly arrived in Canaan (9:1–27). When the Israelites discovered that they were tricked by the Gibeonites, they required the Gibeonites to accept a low social status in the Israelite community as laborers in the Temple.

Like Jericho and Ai, Gibeon was not inhabited at the time of the Israelite settlement in Canaan. This story is not based on any memory of an event in Israel's past; it is another homily on obedience. Like Rahab, the Gibeonites seem to know their Bible and are familiar with the Exodus tradition and the laws of Deuteronomy regarding relations with nearby and distant towns (Dt 20). But the story also serves as a warning to consult with the LORD in difficult circumstances, which the Israelites did not do in this situation—much to their regret (Jos 9:14). Without consulting God, Israel found itself regretting its actions. There will be several occasions in the monarchic period when Israel and Judah got into great difficulties because of the treaties it made with other nations, for example, Ahaz's alliance with Assyria (2 Kgs 16:7–9).

One reason for Israel's regret in this case was that it had to face a coalition of Gibeon's neighbors to the south who were not happy because of its alliance with Israel. Of course, Israel was victorious, not because of its military prowess but because God enlisted the sun and moon to seal Israel's victory (10:1–15). In the ancient Near East, the sun and the moon were gods in their own right, but here they are simply weapons in the LORD's arsenal. Verse 13 notes that the couplet celebrating this miracle came from a now lost text: the book of Jashar (see also 2 Sm 1:18). Ancient Israel produced more literature than the Bible preserves though occasionally the Bible will cite these texts. The book of Jashar is one example. To judge by the two texts from this book cited in the Old Testament, the book of Jashar contains poems on martial themes.

Following Joshua's defeat and execution of the kings allied against him, he continued the move to take control of the southern portion of Canaan. The book gives a significant amount of attention to Joshua's southern campaign because of the region's association with the Davidic dynasty, which the Deuteronomistic History prefers to dynasties that ruled the Kingdom of Israel. The story of Joshua's victory over a coalition led by Jabin of Hazor (11:1–15) is meant to account for the taking of the entire northern third of Canaan: the Jezreel Valley and the Galilee. Once the author tells of the capture of Hazor, the story of the land-taking ends. The second section of Joshua ends with summary statements (11:15–23), the most important of which is that Joshua carried out the orders that God gave to Moses (11:20). The story of the battle for the Promised Land, then, is a story of the success that obedience brings.

The gift of the land is a motif that is woven throughout the Old Testament, but the references to how that land was acquired by Israel are not very specific. For example, though the story of Jericho's miraculous fall is an important part of Joshua, it is not mentioned elsewhere in the Old Testament. What precisely were the experiences that generated the first stories about Israel's acquisition of its land are unknown. But before they came to have their present form, they were shaped and reshaped by almost six hundred years of life in that land. Ancient Israel's storytellers witnessed the rise and fall of the two Israelite national states. These experiences certainly left their mark on the story of Joshua and the emergence of the Israelite tribes in Canaan.

The story of the land-taking, likely a product of the Deuteronomistic Historian, effectively turned the past into a sermon by characterizing the Israelite settlement in Canaan as a great military conquest similar to those that the Israelite kingdoms experienced at the hands of the Assyrians and Babylonians. The purpose of the story was to stimulate the faith and hope of the people of Judah in exile. They learned that there could be a future for Judah if they, like Joshua's generation, were obedient to the Torah. The homiletical character of this story is problematic for reconstructing the early history of Israel. But what the book does affirm unequivocally is that Israel came to possess the land because of God's power, and Israel was able to receive that land as God's gift because of its obedience. These affirmations, however, were meant to give Judah a vision of the future rather than information about the past. To those who wonder if God were capable of restoring Judah, the book of Joshua answers with a resounding yes.

A restored Judah, however, must eliminate all non-Israelite features from its way of life with the type of intensity that is reflected in the stories of the Israelite army's utter destruction of all that was Canaanite in the time of Joshua. The story of Israel's acquisition of its land underscored the need to eliminate all that may in any way compromise Israel's loyalty to its God. The people of Judah will be able to re-acquire that land if it is equally committed to the program of reform set out in the book of Deuteronomy by loving God alone and completely (Dt 6:4–5).

The Distribution of the Land (Jos 13:1–22:34)

After listing the territories brought under Israelite control by the Israelite militia under the leadership of Joshua (13:1–7), the book of Joshua has an extensive section dealing with the distribution of the land among the Israelite tribes (13:8–19:51). Working through this section is difficult for modern readers since it is full of geographical detail meaningless to many readers. While the precise borders of the various tribal allotments may have been very important to the people of ancient Israel, their significance today is exclusively historical. Still, there are some details in this part of the story that the contemporary readers should attend to.

It is important to remember that ancient Israel's economy was based on agriculture. Ownership of land was crucial to survival in such an economy. Possession of a plot of land enabled the Israelite to produce enough food for his family and livestock with a surplus to be used for replanting and for sacrificial offerings. Without land, a person had no access to the means of production and so was dependent for survival on the charity of his fellow Israelites. This is the background of the story of Naboth and Ahab told in 1 Kings 21. Of course, there were some people who supported themselves as merchants and artisans, but they too ultimately depended on Israel's peasant farmers for their prosperity.

The account of the land distribution among the tribes begins with a reminder of the areas of Canaan that the Israelites did not control (13:1–6). This was a necessary corrective to the exaggerations in the previous section of the book that claimed that Joshua and the Israelites subdued the “entire land” (9:24; 11:23). Then follows a review of the territories previously allotted by Moses to those Israelites who were going to live east of the Jordan River (13:7–33). Israel's control over this region was neither firm nor constant, but its inclusion among the tribal allotments expresses Israel's claim on that territory even though the Israelite kingdoms were not always able to support that claim. When Ezekiel described his vision of an Israel restored after the exile, he did not mention any of the tribes living east of the Jordan (Ez 48:1–29).

When the account of the distribution of the land west of the Jordan begins in Joshua 14, both the priest Eleazar, Aaron's son, and Joshua preside over the distribution (v. 1; see Nm 34:17). The preceding sections of the book did not emphasize the role of the priest except for the liturgical actions (e.g., 3:6; 6:1–9). The priority given to Eleazar here may reflect the more significant role that the priests played in the leadership of the community after the state collapsed and the dynasty ended, as is evident from Haggai, Zechariah, and Ezra. Eleazar's presence may also be a consequence of having the land distributed by lot (14:2). Though Deuteronomy explicitly forbids attempts to determine the divine will through the techniques of divination (Dt 18:9–12), the casting of lots seems to have been widely practiced and accepted as legitimate. To show that the distribution of the land was done according to God's will, this was accomplished by the use of lots in a procedure presided over by a priest. The New Testament gives evidence of the continuing popularity and acceptance of using lots to determine the divine will (Acts 1:26).

The report of the land's distribution among the Israelites pays most attention to the region in the very center of what became the territory of the two Israelite kingdoms (14:6–17:17). This is the territory that would be given to Judah, Ephraim, and Manasseh. While the territory of Benjamin (18:11–20) also merits special regard since it was coveted by both Israelite kingdoms, the allotments of the other tribes get comparatively meager attention: Judah is considered first. Its territory comprised most of what would be the kingdom of Judah. Since the Old Testament reflects a southern perspective, the priority given to Judah is understandable. The territory of Ephraim and Manasseh became the heartland of the kingdom of Israel and could not be ignored. The account of the allotment of Dan is unusual (19:40–48). It notes that the territory given to Dan was located along the coastal plain, and this will be the setting of the story of Samson, a Danite hero (Jgs 13–16). But the entry goes on to note that Dan was unable to take control of that territory from the indigenous population, so the tribe relocated to the far north. The story of this relocation is told in Judges 17 and 18. The story of the land's distribution concludes in 19:49–51 with the note that Joshua received the town in Ephraim that he requested for himself.

Two of ancient Israel's social institutions are the subject of chapters 20 and 21. The first are the cities of refuge (20:1–9). There were six of these cities—three on each side of the Jordan. According to Numbers 35:9–34, it was Moses who announced God's plan to have such cities where a person who accidentally caused another's death could be safe from the victim's relatives, who might seek vengeance. Moses had already named the three cities east of the Jordan, and now Joshua designated three more west of the Jordan. The books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles never mention this institution since they were not needed following the centralization of authority by the monarchy. The book of Judges mentions two examples of private vengeance: 8:13–21 and 20:1–11. It is clear from these examples that the biblical tradition does not approve of such acts. A second set of forty-eight towns is set aside for the Levites (21:1–42). The tribe of Levi received no territory of its own because the men of that tribe served as priests, who were to teach the Torah to Israel and offer sacrifice to the Lord (see Dt 33:8–11). To fulfill these functions they needed to be available to the people so the cities where the Levites have residential and grazing rights are scattered throughout the country.

The Israelites whose territory was east of the Jordan River assisted the tribes west of the Jordan in the acquisition of their land. Since this was completed successfully, Joshua allowed the eastern tribes to return to their homes (22:1–8). This is a prelude to a conflict between the Israelites east of the river and those on the west (22:9–34). The tribes from the east side of the river built an altar near the Jordan, which offended the Israelites from the west. War was averted because Phinehas, Eleazar’s son, succeeded in negotiating peace between the two groups. The precise nature of the offense is not obvious, but it may reflect the Deuteronomic belief that there was to be only one place where sacrifices were to be offered. Apparently, the book of Joshua assumed that this place was Shiloh (22:9–12). When the easterners explained that they did not intend to offer sacrifices on the altar they built (22:26), this resolved the problem. The tribes from the west of the Jordan were satisfied that those from the east side meant no offense and were not repudiating the LORD. Joshua had no role in this story. It was a priest who brought about a happy ending to what could have been a great disaster. Again, this presages the leadership role that priests assumed in Israel’s life following the end of the monarchy.

An Era Ends (Jos 23:1–24:33)

The final words of an important person such as Joshua were highly significant. The storyteller creates a speech for his hero that could have come right out of the book of Deuteronomy. Israel’s continued presence in the land depends on its adherence to “all that is written in the book of the law of Moses” (23:6). Joshua reminded Israel to love God (23:11), the Torah’s greatest command. But then Joshua issues a warning that any failure on Israel’s part to remain completely and exclusively loyal to God will have the gravest of consequences (23:15–16). Even though the land is a gift from God to Israel, the gift can be revoked “If you transgress the covenant of the LORD” (23:16). Of course, this is a theological conclusion that came from Israel’s experience. By the time the book of Joshua took the form that it now has, Israel did “perish from the good land” that it had received from God (23:16). Israel’s faith in God’s fidelity, however, led to the hope that a new dedication to the Torah and a renewed commitment to the covenant will bring a reversal of the misfortune that Israel brought upon itself. The book then describes an elaborate ceremony in which Israel of Joshua's day renews its commitment to God and the Torah (24:1–28). Clearly this final chapter is a model for Israel of the sixth century BC, which has experienced the full consequences of its infidelity. But a renewal is possible if the people and their leaders remember how God has been faithful to fulfill the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Like their ancestors in the days of Joshua, Israel must again commit itself to serve and obey God alone.

The burial notices with which the book ends (24:29–30, 32–33) are significant because of the prominence given to the priest Eleazar. This is very likely another indication of the leadership role assumed by priests after the fall of the Israelite monarchy. Verse 31 is the verdict on the era of Joshua: it was an era marked by obedience and loyalty. That is the reason Israel came to possess the land, for obedience brings God's blessing.

The Continuing Significance of the Book of Joshua

Most Christians who read the book of Joshua today have a difficult time with the image of God that the book appears to have. It is a God who orders an invasion of Canaan and the annihilation of the armies sent to oppose the Israelites and even of the civilian population of towns under attack by Israel. The conflicts depicted in the book of Joshua have been described as examples of “holy war,” but this expression never appears in Joshua or anywhere else in the Bible. Still, it is true that ancient Israel did acquire control over Canaan, in some measure, by violent means. But it is difficult to be more specific than this when trying to reconstruct the process of Israel’s emergence in Canaan. It is clear, however, that the image of a large Israelite armed force organized under Joshua’s leadership invading Canaan from the east and quickly gaining control over the whole land has its roots in the religious imagination of ancient Israel rather than in the experience of the Israelite tribes.

Archaeology has shown that there were serious and widespread conflicts in Canaan of the thirteenth century BC. But the conflicts were probably not initiated by an invading military force. They began as the centralized political and military authority over the region exercised by Egypt began to deteriorate in the fourteenth century. Canaanite city-states began fighting one another for dominance in the region. Some of the peasant-farmers of Canaan, who bore the burden of these conflicts, withdrew their allegiance from these city-states and began to develop an alternate polity. In the central highlands, groups united by kinship and the worship of the LORD emerged as a significant force. It is possible that a group of people who worshipped the LORD and who had escaped from slavery in Egypt energized the people of the central highlands to resist their oppressors by telling stories of a miraculous escape made possible by their God. In any case, the people of Israel rejected the hegemony of the city-states and ruled themselves according to traditional norms of behavior as interpreted by their elders. Over time the power of the city-states waned; the Israelite tribes were able to strengthen their hold on the central highlands and enjoy a measure of peace and prosperity with the LORD rather than with a human being as their sovereign. Instead of paying taxes to a human overlord, they offered tithes of their agricultural produce to the LORD at the shrines where they thanked God for the gift of the land. The Israelites believed that it was the God of their ancestors who made it possible for them to take control over their lives and destinies. This reconstruction of the emergence of the Israelite tribes in Canaan is based on the results of archaeological excavations whose results have been interpreted, integrating what is known from the Bible and other ancient Near Eastern texts, and using models derived from anthropology and sociology.

But this is not the story related in the book of Joshua. That book and its story were not written to describe the process by which the Israelite tribes came to dominate parts of Canaan. The book sought to encourage the exiles of Judah and Jerusalem to believe in the power of their ancestral deity to lead them from exile in Babylon back to the land promised to Abraham's descendants. The fall of Jerusalem, the destruction of its Temple, the scattering of the priesthood, and the end of the dynasty and national state led the people of Judah to wonder about the power and the willingness of their God to save. The book of Lamentations gives voice to the questions that the exile raised in the hearts of believers. It begs God to remember what has happened to Israel and to start acting like the LORD (Lam 5:1–19), but Lamentations ends with what is best translated as a plaintive question: “Why have you utterly forgotten us . . . you have indeed rejected us and utterly turned your wrath against us” (Lam 5:20–22). The book of Joshua, then, is best understood as a response to questions such as this one—not to questions about how ancient Israel acquired its land.

The great irony of the book of Joshua was that its stories about the Israelite army conquering great cities and annihilating their populace were written at a time when ancient Israel was at its lowest ebb—politically and militarily. The two Israelite national states no longer existed. Their territory was absorbed into the Babylonian provincial system. The leading citizens of Judah were taken to Babylon to prevent their fomenting of any resistance to the new order in the region. Those Judahites who remained in the land were subsistence farmers who were not in a position to challenge Babylonian rule. Certainly the stories about the mighty Israelite army winning victory after victory under Joshua was a parody of the military and political impotence of Judah in the sixth century BC.

Unfortunately, the stories of the book of Joshua have served to provide support for the wars of conquest waged by Christians over the centuries. The Crusades, the wars against the Native Americans, the Boer conquest of South Africa are just three examples of the lethal mixture of war and religion. The book of Joshua was written not to inculcate a martial spirit in its readers but rather a spirit of obedience and commitment to the Torah. The book assumes that the exile of Israel from the land that God gave it was not due to any military misadventures. Israel's lost its land because of its failure to keep the Torah that God revealed to Moses. The only hope for restoration was for Judah to join their ancestors in recommitting themselves to their God: "Far be it from us to forsake the LORD to serve other gods. For it was the LORD, our God, who brought us and our ancestors up out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery. He performed those great signs before our very eyes and protected us along our entire journey and among all the peoples through whom we passed. At our approach the LORD drove out all the peoples, including the Amorites who dwelt in the land. Therefore we also will serve the LORD, for he is our God" (Jos 24:16–18). The significance that the book of Joshua has for contemporary readers is its emphasis on absolute loyalty and commitment to God.

JUDGES

[see pages 296–326 of the Old Testament]

BEFORE BEGINNING . . .

The book of Judges is the second book in the collection the early rabbis called the “Former Prophets” and modern interpreters the “Deuteronomistic History of Israel.” The author of the Deuteronomistic History created the period of the judges by organizing a collection of hero stories into a chronological framework. These were stories about several local Israelite leaders whose military achievements served to maintain Israelite presence in Canaan in the face of serious threats to their existence from various rivals for control of the region before the rise of the Israelite monarchy, which was a little known period of Israelite history. The name of the book comes from the title given to its protagonists in 2:16. The “judges” did not preside over courts of law but were charismatic leaders of the individual tribes or groups of several tribes. No judge was ever able to unite all the tribes to face those peoples who vied with Israel for control of Canaan’s limited resources. The judges had to deal with two problems: the failure of Israel to serve the LORD alone and the competition for control of the land from other peoples. The book presents these two problems as interrelated. When Israel failed to maintain its commitment to serve the LORD exclusively, then God allowed Israel’s neighbors to make its life very difficult (2:11–14).

There was always competition for control over the land of Canaan. In the course of that competition, individuals emerged who proved very capable of managing that competition to the benefit of the Israelite tribes. Stories about these individuals and their feats circulated among the Israelite tribes and eventually found their way into the collection we know as the book of Judges. This collection, however, served a purpose beyond simply preserving the memory of ancient heroes. Its purpose was to illustrate the consequences of Israel’s failure to live in faithful obedience to the LORD. It deals with a practical and theological problem: the absence of the kind of leadership provided by Joshua and the elders who outlived him (2:7). How should Israel be governed? Who will insure that Israel will live according to the Torah in the land it had received from the LORD?

The book of Judges has three parts. The first (1:1–3:6) provides readers with a framework for understanding the significance of the stories about these ancient heroes. The second part (3:7–16:31) rehearses the exploits of the judges. The book concludes with a few supplementary stories (17–18) that show how the Israelite tribes were on a path of self-destruction, along with stories concerning an intertribal war directed against the tribe of Benjamin (19–21). Originally the stories about the individual judges served to excite a certain measure of pride in the achievements of the tribes in maintaining control over the land of Canaan. But once these stories were put into their present context in the book of Judges, the effect was to show that there was something terribly wrong about the way the Israelite tribes were living their lives in the land that God had given them. Readers are led to conclude that matters cannot go on like this—something must be done because the life of the Israelite tribes is degenerating into anarchy.

READING THROUGH THE BOOK OF JUDGES

Understanding the Period of the Judges (Jgs 1:1–3:6)

The book of Judges begins by raising the question of leadership: “Who shall be first among us to attack the Canaanites and to do battle with them?” (1:1). The initial answer is Judah, the tribe to which the rulers of the Davidic dynasty belonged. This tribe enjoys prominence throughout the Deuteronomistic History because of its association with the Davidic dynasty. After some initial success at securing Israelite presence in Canaan, the tribes’ progress bogged down and the first chapter concludes with a list of areas over which the Israelites were not able to assert their control (1:27–35). The picture here is just the opposite of that given in the book of Joshua according to which Joshua “took the whole land, just as the LORD had said to Moses. Joshua gave it to Israel as their heritage, apportioning it among the tribes” (Jos 11:23). The process by which the Israelites achieved control over Canaan was long and complex. Once the Egyptians no longer dominated the region, the stability they provided was gone. The indigenous population of Canaan has to face raiders from the fringes of the settled areas, refugees from economically and politically volatile regions, people looking for adequate supplies of grain and oil, and invaders looking for new settlement possibilities—all of whom converged on the area between the Mediterranean Sea on the west and the desert on the east, the mountains of Lebanon on the north and the Sinai peninsula on the south. Eventually the national states of Edom, Moab and Ammon arose east of the Jordan River. The Israelite kingdoms were established west of the Jordan. But the book of Judges is set in the time between the emergence of the Israelite tribes in the central highlands of Canaan and the establishment of the Israelite monarchic system. The polity before the rise of the monarchy was decentralized and supported by a religious ideology that held that Israel’s king was not a human being but the LORD. Until the rise of their national states, the Israelites had to make do with local and temporary leadership. While there were some benefits to a decentralized polity, the principal drawback was its inability to respond adequately to threats from the outside.

The second chapter describes the price Israel had to pay for its preferred pattern of leadership: the Israelite tribes found themselves in danger of being overcome by the other groups competing for the limited territory of Canaan. Judges offers a theological explanation for this potential disaster: the failure of the Israelites to keep their covenant with the LORD. Israel will have to deal with other contenders for the land by themselves because God's help will not be forthcoming. The contrast between the period of Joshua and that of the Judges could not be more striking. Under Joshua's leadership, "Israel served the LORD" (Jos 24:31) and had experienced victory after victory and came to possess "all the land." Without the type of leadership Joshua provided, the Israelite tribes were on the verge of annihilation because of their failure to obey the LORD. The Israelite response was lamentation at a place named Bochim ("weepers") (Jgs 2:5).

The next section (2:6–3:6) elaborates on the religious interpretation of the problems the Israelite tribes had in maintaining a foothold in the land promised to their ancestors. The reason for Israel's difficulties is simple enough: "the Israelites did what was evil in the sight of the LORD by serving the Baals" (2:11). The threat to Israel's continued presence in Canaan was a direct by-product of the Israelite worship of Baal, which presented a most serious threat to the exclusive service that Israel owed to its God. Baal is the title ("Lord" or "Master") by which Hadad, the Canaanite god of the storm and fertility, was known.

One of the principal sources of anxiety in the Bronze and Iron Ages in Canaan and Israel was having enough food to eat. The problem was not the soil—it was fertile enough. The problem was water. The region was not blessed with a river system as were Egypt and Mesopotamia, whose river systems made large-scale irrigation possible. In Israel, however, whatever moisture there was to water the land had to come as rain. The Israelites, following the lead of the Canaanites, relieved their anxiety about having enough rain to make the land provide enough food by worshipping Baal and his consort Astarte (or Asherah) (2:13) because rain and fertility were their specialties. Israel's ancestral deity, by way of contrast, came from southern, arid regions (see Hb 3:3). It is likely that most Israelites did not consider the worship they offered to Baal and Astarte as incompatible with loyalty to the LORD, but certainly the author of Judges did. It took centuries for the people of Israel to be convinced of how critically important it was for them to serve the LORD alone. The book of Judges was an important contribution to this process.

The pattern for the way the stories of the judges will be told is set in 2:11–23. The book introduces the narrative of each of the judges with the formula found first in 2:11: “Israelites did what was evil in the sight of the LORD.” The consequence of this infidelity was domination over the Israelite tribes by their rivals for hegemony in Canaan. But the period of the judges was marked not only by divine judgment but by divine mercy. The LORD always heard the sounds of Israel’s pleading and responded by raising up a leader who rescued Israel from the oppression they were experiencing. Unfortunately, at the death of the judge who rescued them, the Israelites returned to their evil ways. God determined, then, that Israel will have to continue facing the threat of extinction as long as it continued to serve the Baals (2:16–23). The introduction to the book ends with 3:1–6, which explains that Israel’s competitors will remain in the land to test the loyalty of future generations. But one consequence of this intermingling will be that some Israelites will marry Canaanite spouses. Often that will mean that the Israelite partners in such unions will abandon their ancestral religion.

Two final observations need to be made about the introduction. In the stories that follow, the threat and resistance are usually local. But the Deuteronomistic History transforms the stories of local heroes into stories that have a significance for all Israel. Second, as readers work their way through the stories of the judges, the question arises about how long God will continue to abide Israel’s infidelity: Is there some limit to God’s forbearance?

The Stories of the Judges (Jgs 3:7–16:31)

Othniel (Jgs 3:7–11)

The book of Judges begins with a divine oracle which names the tribe of Judah, David’s tribe, as the leader of the Israelites in the attempt to take control over Canaan (1:1–2) and the first of the judges is from Judah: Othniel. He already made an appearance in the book as the conqueror of Debir, a city in the southern hill country of Judah (1:11–13). Here Othniel’s story is told with a minimum of detail and without a story of deliverance. The basic pattern found here will be repeated throughout this section of Judges. The Israelites served Baal and Asherah instead of the LORD. God allowed an enemy to oppress them—in this case for eight years. They cried out for deliverance and God sent a judge to rescue them. God endowed the judge with “the spirit of the LORD,” which empowered him to accomplish extraordinary deeds. Israel then served the LORD for the lifetime of the judge—in this case forty years.

The NAB accepts the reading of the Hebrew Bible for the name of Cushan's base: Aram-naharaim, a city on the Euphrates River in northern Syria. This reading cannot be correct since the judges all deal with threats from within Canaan. One suggestion is that the text should read Armon-harim ("fortress in the hills").

Ehud (Jgs 3:12–30)

Ehud came from Benjamin whose territory is immediately north of Judah. The first detail given about Ehud was that he was left-handed. While the people of the ancient world considered left-handedness abnormal, it was a distinct advantage in hand-to-hand combat. Though the name Benjamin means "the son of my right hand," the tradition behind the book associates this tribe with a high incidence of left-handedness. Judges 20:16 asserts that Benjamin could boast of seven hundred highly skilled left-handers.

Israel's sin was responsible for the oppression, which took the form of raids by Eglon, the king of Moab, which was located in the central part of the Transjordan directly across the river from Benjaminite territory. While engaged in these raids, Eglon made "the City of Palms" (probably Jericho) his headquarters. These raids continued over an eighteen-year period. Ehud, who was supposed to bring Benjamin's tribute to Eglon instead assassinated him. After making his escape, Ehud was able to convince men from the tribe of Ephraim to join him in expelling the Moabites from Israelite territory. So total was Ehud's victory that Israel had peace for eighty years.

The story of Ehud's assassination of Eglon ridicules the Moabites for their carelessness, naivete, and stupidity. Of course, the story must have been highly entertaining as it was retold countless times. Certainly one can picture the Israelite audience having a good laugh at the expense of the Moabites. The book takes this entertaining story about a Benjaminite hero and makes it part of a comprehensive theological presentation about the importance of serving the LORD alone.

Shamgar (Jgs 3:31)

There is some doubt whether Shamgar ought to be understood as a judge like the others in the book. His name is not Semitic and the text does not claim that God raised him up in response to Israel's cries. The Song of Deborah (Jgs 5) notes that the caravan trade was interrupted "in the days of Shamgar" (v. 6). Perhaps he was responsible for this disruption. In any case, he did single-handedly defeat an entire Philistine force. While his service on Israel's behalf may have been indirect, he did make life easier for some Israelites by defeating the Philistines. The book mentions him after Ehud—someone else who "single-handedly" delivered Israel.

Deborah and Barak (Jgs 4:1–5:31)

With the story of Deborah and Barak, the scene shifts northward—to the vitally important Jezreel Valley. The valley, which extended southeast from the Plain of Acco on the Mediterranean coast to the Jordan Valley, separated Galilee from the central highlands. Unless the Israelites were able to control this valley, communication between the tribes in the Galilee and those in the highlands to the south would remain difficult. Also significant was the agricultural and trade potential of the Jezreel Valley. Israel had to take this important piece of real estate, which the Canaanites with their chariots kept under a tight rein. The story and poem about Deborah and Barak testify to the significance that the Jezreel had. It is the celebration of a great and unexpected victory: that of an army of peasants over professional soldiers with the best of equipment.

The book of Judges presents Deborah as the hero of the conflict with Sisera's army. Barak made his contributions with great reluctance. The story labels Deborah as a prophetess and a judge (4:4) without further explanation. Because the judges and prophets were charismatic leaders, these roles were open to women. A male-dominated social system could not obstruct the "spirit of the LORD" (Jgs 3:10), and clearly people understood this. Deborah shamed Barak into raising a force from Naphtali and Zebulun to oppose Sisera and his chariots (4:4–10). Naphtali and Zebulun were Galilean tribes, and their territory was located just to the north of the Jezreel Valley. As the reader expects, God gave victory to the Israelites. Sisera escaped the rout and hoped to find protection among the Kenites, who were friendly with Jabin (4:17), but Jgs 1:16 and Ex 2:16–22 connected the Kenites to Israel through Moses. Jael, a Kenite woman, killed Sisera (4:21). This fulfilled, in an unforeseen way, Deborah's prophecy, which was intended to goad Barak into action (4:9).

The book of Judges preserves what many consider to be one of the oldest texts found in the Bible: the song of Deborah (Jgs 5). This hymn celebrates the victory of Israel over Sisera's army. Here readers find out how the victory was achieved. A sudden rain causing a flash flood in the valley rendered the chariot force immobile and eliminated Sisera's advantage. Also, the poem asserts that the Israelite force included not only Zebulun and Naphtali but also Ephraim, Benjamin, Issachar, and Machir, which may be that portion of Manasseh living west of the Jordan. Other tribes are criticized for not responding to the threat posed by Sisera: Asher, Dan, Reuben, and Gilead, which may be that portion of Manasseh living east of the Jordan. The poem does not mention Judah, Gad, or Levi.

The poem contrasts two mothers: Deborah, mother of Israel (5:7), and Sisera's unnamed mother (5:28). Deborah was responsible for a great victory, while Sisera's mother came to realize that Sisera's failure to return promptly from the battle means that she will never see her son again.

Gideon (Jgs 6:1–8:35)

No character receives more attention from the book of Judges than Gideon. His story begins with Israel being harassed by the Midianites, who enjoyed a great advantage over Israel. The Midianites were mounted on camels when they came on the raids into Israelite territory at harvest time. These mounted attacks made the Midianite raiders unstoppable. They simply confiscated the harvest that the Israelites worked to produce, making life impossible for the Israelite peasants (6:1–6). An unnamed prophet announces the religious cause of the Midianite oppression (6:7–10). To the angel sent to recruit Gideon to deliver Israel the reluctant judge pointed out his lack of suitability—a motif also found in the call of Moses (Ex 3:10), Isaiah (Is 6:5), and Jeremiah (Jer 1:6).

There is a great anomaly in Gideon's story: he is frequently called Jerubbaal, a name that seemingly honored Baal, the LORD's rival for Israel's loyalty. The meaning of that name ("Let Baal take action") helps explain the anomaly. Gideon's dismantling of an altar for sacrifices to Baal aroused the anger of the local populace, and they were ready to kill Gideon for his sacrilege. Gideon's father suggests that they should leave the matter up to Baal; "Let Baal take action against him, since he dismantled his altar" (6:25–32).

The rest of Gideon's story describes his efforts to deal with the Midianites and others that were threatening the Israelite tribes in the central highlands. He rallied to his side not only members of his own tribe (Manasseh) but the militia of three others (Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali). But Gideon refused to proceed without receiving another sign that his mission was from God (6:36–40). Next came a test of Gideon's militia administered by God, who had Gideon dismiss those who lapped up drinking water and thus reduced their vigilance. Gideon received additional orders from God, requiring him to keep only three hundred fighters to insure that the militia could not ascribe the coming victory to their military skills but to God (7:1–8). The three hundred vanquished the Midianites by a surprise nighttime attack without doing any actual fighting—again underscoring the divine origin of Israel's victory. The Ephraimite militia joined in the pursuit of the Midianites. They captured and executed two Midianite kings, Oreb and Zeeb. The story concludes with Gideon pursuing the fleeing Midianites into the Transjordan where he took two more Midianite kings, Zebah and Zalmunna. Gideon also engaged in an act of private vengeance against the town of Peniel that had refused to help his men during their campaign (8:13–17). The story of Gideon's victories underscores a motif that weaves its way throughout the stories of the judges: victory is due to God's benevolence and is not a human achievement.

Gideon's story then takes a new twist as the Israelites ask Gideon to rule as king and establish a dynasty to provide ongoing protection from groups like the Midianites. Gideon refused, citing the Israelite notion that the LORD is king of Israel. Gideon then uses part of the valuables confiscated from the Midianites to construct an ephod, a priestly vestment probably used for divination. The book does not consider this a positive development but notes that, nonetheless, Israel enjoyed peace for forty years (8:22–28).

Gideon's story ends with a transition to what follows by introducing his many wives who bore him seventy children. The one child mentioned by name is Abimelech, who will be the principal character in the next story. After Gideon died, the people of Israel reverted to the worship of Baal and forgot both the LORD and Gideon's achievements (8:29–35). The story of Gideon and that of his son Abimelech introduces the idea of monarchy into the story of Israel in its land. It is clear that the author of the Deuteronomistic History does not consider this to be positive development.

Abimelech (Jgs 9:1–36)

Coming at approximately in the middle of the book of Judges, the story of Abimelech is something of an oddity because Abimelech is not a judge. He did not free Israel from any oppression. Abimelech convinced the people of Shechem to accept him as the sole ruler of their city and its environs, replacing the more defused pattern of leadership exercised by Jerubbaal's seventy sons. To solidify his one-man rule Abimelech murdered all brothers except Jotham, who survived, cursed his brother, and then fled the Shechem area—never to be heard from again.

The book places on Jotham's lips a bitter diatribe against his brother (9:7–15). Jotham addresses Shechem's leadership, telling them a fable about trees who were looking for a king but were able to persuade only a worthless thorn bush to accept the position. Is this fable a criticism of the monarchy as an institution or merely a criticism of Abimelech? The book can barely hide its animosity toward Abimelech. It is important to remember that the book of Judges—in the form in which it now exists—was the product of someone who witnessed the fall of the Davidic dynasty and the end of the Judahite national state. Certainly the failure of the monarchy to prevent the disaster that came upon Jerusalem had to weigh heavily on the writer's mind. The role of the monarchy in Israelite life, then, was not simply a theoretical question. It is important to note that the setting of this story is Shechem where earlier Israel had reaffirmed its covenant with the LORD (Jos 24). In Abimelech, Shechem accepts a human being as its lord, and this is a decision that sets a bad precedent.

Abimelech's rule in Shechem was a disaster for him and for the city. Although Abimelech claimed to be a Shechemite "flesh and bone" (9:2), a revolt was fomented by Gaal, who implied that Abimelech was only a half-Shechemite. The trouble started by Gaal was serious enough that Abimelech had to be ferocious in his response (9:42–49). Abimelech died as he was putting down the revolt; the book implies that his ignominious death was a fitting conclusion to a bad episode (9:56). In 2 Samuel, Joab and David will recall the story of Abimelech's death as they scheme to have Uriah die during the siege of Rabbath-Ammon as part of the cover-up of David's adultery with Bathsheba (11:18–24). By making this connection, the Deuteronomistic author implies what he thinks of David's scheme. After Abimelech's death, the Israelite militia, which Abimelech also led, dispersed (Jgs 9:55).

Tola and Jair (Jgs 10:1–5)

There were several judges about whom the book provides almost no information, but they are mentioned to leave the reader with the impression that judges were part of the experience of people in every region of Israel. Tola judged in Ephraim, the western portion of the central highlands, and Jair in Gilead, the northern part of the Transjordan controlled by Israel. References to their service provide the outer frame for the much more developed story of Jephthah.

Jephthah (Jgs 10:6–11,40)

Because Jephthah, as the son of a prostitute, had an even lower social standing than Gideon or Deborah, he too appeared at first to be an unlikely candidate for the leadership of the Israelite militia. He did, however, possess one advantage. As the leader of a group of raiders, he had military experience, and he was just the kind of man that the elders of Gilead were looking for when the Ammonites were trying to push their border northward into Gilead's territory. Gilead was an Israelite territory east of the Jordan; Ammon was a kingdom to the south of Gilead.

There are several unique features to Jephthah's story. First, before resorting to armed conflict, Jephthah tried to negotiate a settlement with the Ammonites (11:12–28). When the negotiations failed to convince the Ammonites to stop their incursions, "the spirit of the LORD came upon Jephthah," empowering him for the extraordinary efforts necessary to neutralize the Ammonites (11:29–32). But then there is a second unusual detail in the story. Jephthah makes a hastily and carelessly worded vow before the battle (11:30–31). The reader wonders if this indicates that the judge was less than confident in the outcome of the approaching battle. When Jephthah handily defeated the Ammonites, it was time to act on the vow he made. The NABRE translation of 11:31 states that Jephthah vowed "the first thing to come out of the doors of my house." Perhaps the reader is to imagine that a domesticated animal ("thing") kept near Jephthah's home was the intended object of the vow. But, in fact, it was his daughter, his only child, who "came forth" (11:34). Jephthah thought that he was trapped by the imprecise wording of his vow and so he believed that he had to sacrifice the daughter who ran out to meet him on his return from the battle with the Ammonites (11:34–35). The religious and cultural significance of the practice of lamenting for Jephthah's daughter (11:37–40) is not clear.

The third unique episode in Jephthah's star-crossed career is a brief war between the Israelites from Gilead and those from Ephraim (12:1–6). The latter were jealous of Jephthah's victories and were angry that they were not invited to join his expedition against the Ammonites. The conflict between Ephraim and Gilead may reflect an attempt by the former to dominate the latter. Jephthah tried negotiations a second time and failed again. In the ensuing conflict, the Ephraimites suffered severe casualties. Those who tried to escape were caught because they did not pronounce the “sh” sound in the Hebrew word “shibboleth” (“current”) because of their Ephraimite dialect.

Though Jephthah did neutralize the Ammonite threat and judged Israel for six years, the impression left by the book is that Jephthah's career was marked by failure and tragedy. He was not able to successfully negotiate with either the Ammonites or the Ephraimites. He lost his daughter because of a carelessly worded vow, and his victories ignited an intertribal war. The picture of Israel during the time of the judges is getting darker.

Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (Jgs 12:8–15)

The second part of the frame surrounding the story of Jephthah is a brief notice about three more judges, each of whom judged Israel in the region west of the Jordan River. Since Elon and Abdon were from the north, it is likely that Ibzan was too. The village of Bethlehem that was Ibzan's home was located in Zebulun (Jos 19:15)—not in Judah. There are no deliverance stories connected with any of the three.

Samson (Jgs 13:1–16:31)

Although Judges 15:20 states that Samson was a judge in Israel for twenty years, his career was different from that of the judges whose stories the book has told so far. Samson never led the Israelite tribal militia. His was more of a solo act. The setting of Samson's story is the long conflict between the Israelites and the Philistines for control of Canaan. When the Egyptians and Hittites exhausted themselves vying for control of the trade routes that ran through Canaan, this left a vacuum of power waiting to be filled. The first to try to take advantage of Egypt's weakness were the Philistines. Who these people were and where they came from are not clear. Perhaps they were Mycenaeans who crossed the Mediterranean from Greece following the collapse of their empire in the thirteenth century BC. Mycenaeans served as mercenaries in the Egyptian army and knew the strengths and weaknesses of Egyptian defenses, but their invasion of Egypt still failed. The would-be conquerors of Egypt retreated to the southern part of Canaan's coastal plain, which in Hebrew was known as peleshet (e.g., Ex 15:14; Ps 60:8). The Bible calls these people pelishtim ("Philistines"), that is, the people who live in the peleshet. The Philistines organized themselves politically into a confederation of five city-states: Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath. As the Philistines expanded to the north, they threatened the tribe of Dan, which was located on in the central part of the coastal plain. Samson was a Danite.

Another unique feature of Samson's story is the narrative about the events surrounding his conception and birth that took place after Israel suffered forty years of Philistine oppression (13:2–25). Samson's mother is told that the son she will conceive is to be a Nazirite. The word "Nazirite" comes from a Hebrew root that means "to separate, consecrate, abstain." Numbers 6 describes the lifestyle of the Nazirites. First, they were not to drink fermented beverages, wine, or vinegar. They were not even to drink grape juice or eat grapes or raisins. This prohibition probably was meant to insure that Nazirites would not lose the spirit of the LORD because of intoxication or it could have been a protest against a settled lifestyle and the complications that this lifestyle brought to the Israelites, meaning the temptation to serve the Baals. (Viticulture symbolized the abandonment of a nomadic lifestyle and accommodation to a settled one.) Second, Nazirites were not to cut their hair. This prohibition likely reflects a belief that a person's hair was especially significant as a place where spirits dwelt. Finally, Nazirites were not to touch any corpse because they were to remain ritually pure, and contact with a corpse rendered a person impure. A person took the vows of a Nazirite for a set time, or a person could be a permanent Nazirite.

Samson's conflicts with the Philistines appear to be private in nature. The first comes as a result of a lost wager that Samson made with the Philistines during the celebration of his marriage to a Philistine woman (14:1–20). The second is a reaction to his wife being given to another man (15:1–7). The third involves an attempt by some Judahites to turn Samson over to the Philistines (15:8–20). The story affirms three separate times that the spirit of the LORD came upon Samson. Each time the spirit gave Samson strength in situations when his life was in danger. Still, as a judge, Samson was a failure. He made poor use of the power that the spirit of the LORD conferred upon him, using that power instead to settle personal accounts. The tribe of Dan was not better off for Samson's adventures. Under unrelenting pressure from the Philistines, the tribe had to migrate to the north of Canaan in order to find a place to live in peace.

As the previous section ended with the stories of Samson's private vendettas easing the pressure that the Philistines were bringing to bear on Israel, so this final section begins with Samson's descent into self-destruction. What is even worse is that Samson nearly took Israel with him. In Judges 16:1–3, Samson's visit to a prostitute nearly cost him his life. Apparently, he learned nothing from that brush with death, and his affair with Delilah did lead to his death. Delilah was from the Sorek Valley, which is located about thirteen miles west of Jerusalem. The land there was much more agriculturally valuable than the land the Israelite tribes had in the central highlands. Its one disadvantage was that it abutted Philistine territory so there was a constant threat of harassment hanging over the Israelite farmers in the Sorek because the Philistines too had moved into that valley. The book of Judges suggests that the Philistines soon dominated the region. And although Delilah is never called a Philistine, the implication is there. The cutting of a Nazirite's hair was a public statement that he was released from his vows (see Acts 18:18). In Samson's case, it meant that he was no longer equipped to defend Israel from the Philistine threat. But his hair grew back and Samson had one more opportunity to avenge himself, though doing so cost Samson his life (Jgs 16:23–30). Samson's flaws proved fatal. His death presaged that of the Israelite kingdoms whose story is introduced by that of the judges.

Israel's Self-Destruction (Jgs 17:1–21:25)

As readers make their way through the stories of the judges, a question arises: How long will God allow this pattern of apostasy and repentance to repeat itself? Will Israel ever learn to serve the LORD alone? The book of Judges answers those questions by concluding with a series of stories that show Israel clearly on the path of self-destruction. What God would not allow the Moabites, the Midianites, the Ammonites, or the Philistines to do, Israel seems bent on doing to itself. The final chapter makes it appear that the Israelites become addicted to chaos—chaos that threatens their continued existence as a people.

Micah and His Shrine (Jgs 17:1–18:31)

The scene shifts from the fate of Samson to that of Israel as a whole. The story about Micah is a symptom of the disease that afflicts Israel: the failure to serve the LORD alone. Micah built himself a shrine and, with his mother's help, he outfitted it with images and an ephod. Micah had one of his sons serve as the priest of the shrine until a Levite happened to come by. But Micah replaced him with a Levite as soon as the opportunity to do so presented itself. Levites were seen as authentic representatives of the Yahwistic tradition (Ex 32:25–29; Dt 33:8–11). Indeed, Micah believed that as a result of his installing a Levite as a priest of his domestic shrine, he will enjoy blessings from the LORD (Jgs 17:13). The only comment that the author of Judges makes on what he considers to be a warped notion of Israelite religious traditions is found in Judges 17:6: “In those days there was no king in Israel; everyone did what was right in their own eyes.” Without some central authority, religious anarchy reigned in Israel.

Judges 18 describes the migration of the tribe of Dan from the central part of the coastal plain to the far north of Galilee. The story begins by repeating the refrain “In those days there was no king in Israel” (Jgs 18:1). The story continues to describe the religious anarchy among the tribes. The Danites steal the liturgical appurtenances from Micah's shrine and abduct his priest. After they take the city of Laish, they install the Levite and the shrine in their new home, which they rename Dan. Finally, the identity of the Levite is revealed. His name is Jonathan, and he is a grandson of Moses. The book of Judges regards this shrine as illegitimate because the “house of God” was located at Shiloh (Jgs 18:31). That Moses's grandson was associated with such an illegitimate shrine so scandalized later scribes that they introduced another letter into the name of Moses in 18:30, changing it to Manasseh, which was also the name of the most notorious apostate of all Judah's kings (see 2 Kgs 21).

The Outrage at Gibeah and Its Aftermath (Jgs 19:1–21:25)

The story of the corrupting of a young Levite from Bethlehem (7:9) is followed by the story of a well-established Levite from Ephraim (19:1). This story too begins with the refrain: “In those days there was no king in Israel” (v. 1)—a warning that what follows is another example of the religious anarchy that plagued Israel at the end of the period of the judges. On his way home from reclaiming his secondary wife (concubine), who had returned to her father in a fit of anger, the Levite and his concubine spend the night in Gibeah, a town in the territory of Benjamin. In what has been aptly characterized as a “text of terror,” the Levite’s wife is gang-raped and murdered (vv. 22–30). Evidently, the hospitality and protection due a stranger in Benjamin did not extend to a secondary wife that may accompany him. Despite his own implication in facilitating this crime, the Levite summons the Israelite militia for vengeance. The tribal militia is not engaged in a defensive war against oppression but now fights in civil war. After two terrible losses, the Israelite militia finally defeats the Benjaminites, leaving only six hundred surviving males (20:47).

When the tribal militia reassembled at Bethel, the people realize what they have done. When they seek an oracle from God to determine why one tribe has been virtually wiped out, none is forthcoming. The answer should be obvious. The Israelites try to undo what they have just done, and their solution involves them in another civil war against the people of Jabesh-gilead (21:8–12). They did not join in the muster against Benjamin and were likely candidates to supply wives for the six hundred remaining Benjaminites. When the war did not provide enough women, the supposedly wise elders suggested that the Benjaminites kidnap as many as they needed from Shiloh (21:21). With that, the militia disbands.

The author of Judges has painted a very bleak picture of the Israelite tribes. He leaves his readers with the by-now-familiar comment on the religious and civil anarchy that gripped the life of Israel in its land: “In those days there was no king in Israel; everyone did what was right in their own sight” (Jgs 21:25). What follows in the books of Samuel and Kings is the story of Israel’s experience with its kings, who proved just as incapable of forestalling disaster for the people of Israel as did the judges.

While the book of Joshua is a highly stylized portrait of Israelite beginnings, the book of Judges reflects the disordered state of life in Canaan at the end of the Late Bronze Age in Canaan. It was a very unsettled time in the region, and certainly the book of Judges gives some idea of the chaos that affected the Israelite tribes who were trying to gain a foothold in the region. This is not to suggest that the book of Judges is a historical account of events as they happened. Judges is also a highly idealized account of the early years of Israel's existence in Canaan. What these stories of the judges show is that loyalty and commitment to the LORD are what stand between Israel's well-being and its destruction.

Continuing Significance of the Book of Judges

If the modern religious reader of Judges is repulsed by its narratives, the ancient author has been successful. The picture of Israel—especially at the end of the book—is far from attractive or edifying. But it does show what happens to a nation when it ignores traditional ethical and moral values. Disaster inevitably follows. If the people of Judah would restore their community's life in the land promised to their ancestors, they need to remember the centrality of the covenant that God made with those ancestors. The stipulations of that covenant require fidelity, commitment, and absolute loyalty to the LORD. The book of Judges is an object lesson about what happens to a people when they ignore the LORD in their national life. The pattern of recurring apostasy has to be replaced by a consistent loyalty. But how does a nation evaluate its level of commitment to the moral values to which it is an heir? This will be the subject of much of the story of Israel's kings that begin in the books of Samuel and continue in the books of Kings.

Another significant motif is the need to balance charismatic leadership as exemplified by the judges with official leadership exemplified by the monarchy. If charismatic leadership is unchecked, the result is chaos and anarchy. If official leadership becomes too dominant, there is stagnation. Charismatic and official patterns of leadership ought to be symbiotic—existing side by side for the good of the Church.

RUTH

see pages [326–331 of the Old Testament]

BEFORE BEGINNING . . .

The book of Ruth contains a rare and delightful story that continues to captivate its audience no matter how often it is read. It is a story of love and commitment set in challenging circumstances. Few can forget the loyalty of Ruth, the bitterness of Naomi, the forthright Boaz. The story has been of special interest to Christians since Matthew lists Ruth among the ancestors of Jesus (Mt 1:5).

Ruth as Story

The book of Ruth is a short story, similar to the Joseph story in Genesis 37–50. It is an artistically told tale with a simple plot. While the story of Joseph is set with the court of Pharaoh and deals with important personages and events, Ruth's characters are ordinary people; its events, mundane. Its closeness to life enables us to identify with its characters, to sympathize with their situation, and to rejoice when their problems are solved. The plot of the book is controlled by the problems that Ruth and Naomi have as they adjust to their new status as widows. These problems are resolved through the interaction of the book's main characters: Ruth, Naomi, and Boaz, relieving the tension created by the uncertain future that the two women faced. The principal characters are exemplary persons whose goodness is rewarded in the end, reinforcing the belief that human events are in some sense under the control of a power that insures that good triumphs. As story, its purpose is to entertain and delight, and this it does, but at the same time it also instructs. Though God never directly speaks or acts in the story, nevertheless it is clear that the story has something to teach us of the way that God is present in life.

An important element in the story is Ruth's Moabite ancestry. The Bible contains frequent denunciations of the Moabites (Is 15–16; Jer 9:5–6; 48:1–47; Am 2:1–3; Zep 2:8–11). This is especially significant since the book presents her as the great-grandmother of David. Even though Deuteronomy 22:4 forbids a Moabite from becoming part of the Israelite community, Ruth not only does so but is a forebear of the great King David. Perhaps the author of the book made a connection between David and the Moabites because the story of David's rise to kingship has him place his parents in the safekeeping of the king of Moab while David is trying to elude capture by Saul (1 Sm 22:3).

Dating the Book of Ruth

It is difficult to date the book of Ruth with any certainty; it has been argued that it is postexilic in origin, but more and more frequently arguments for a preexilic date are being advanced. Those who postulate a postexilic date see the book of Ruth as a polemical work challenging the policies of Ezra. In his reform of the postexilic community, Ezra implemented a policy forbidding intermarriage with foreign women. The book of Ruth questions such a policy by showing that Ruth, although a foreign woman, is pious and faithful. Moreover, the kinship between Ruth and David indicates that David, the greatest of Israel's kings, was himself of mixed blood. Such a challenge to Ezra's policies would emerge close to the time of Ezra's activity (ca. 450 BC). The evidence for a preexilic date comes from an analysis of style and theology. There is nothing in the style of the book that would convince one to assume a late date. Its theology is similar to that of the Joseph story (Gn 37–50) and the court history of David (2 Sm 9–20; 1 Kgs 1–2), both thought to be preexilic in origin. We cannot resolve here the complex issues surrounding the date of the book of Ruth, but the diversity of opinion cautions us against easy answers. Recent linguistic analysis of the Hebrew of Ruth suggests that a date in the early postexilic period is likely (late sixth century BC).

Ruth's Place in the Canon

While there is universal agreement about Ruth's canonical status, there is some disagreement about the book's place within the canon. In Christian Bibles, including the New American Bible, the book of Ruth occupies a place after Judges and before 1 Samuel, following the order of books in the Septuagint, which was the version of the Old Testament read in the early Church. No doubt the Septuagint placed Ruth after Judges because the story is set "in the time of the judges" (Ru 1:1). It is important to note that despite its placement, the book of Ruth is not a part of the Deuteronomistic History—the story of Israel from conquest to exile found in the books of Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings. It does not reflect the thought or style of the Deuteronomistic History; nor does it have Deuteronomistic theological overtones (see section on Deuteronomistic History, RG 179–228). In the Hebrew Bible or its translation as used in the synagogue, the book of Ruth is placed in the third division of the Jewish canon: the Writings, a collection of miscellaneous works. Jewish liturgical practice includes Ruth among the five Megilloth, the scrolls that are read on major Jewish festivals. The book of Ruth is read on the Feast of Shavu'ot (Weeks), which Christians know as Pentecost.

Theology in the Book of Ruth

There are several levels of meaning in the book of Ruth. The book explains how even the enemies of Israel could become part of the people of Israel. Deuteronomy 23:4–6 asserts that no Moabite can become part of the community of those who worship Yahweh—even to the “tenth generation.” According to the Bible, the Moabites and Israelites were related through Abraham. Lot, Abraham’s nephew, was the ancestor of the Moabites (Gn 19:37). But the Bible also describes the interaction between these two peoples as generally hostile (Nm 21–24; Jgs 3:12–30; 11:26; 1 Sm 14:47; 2 Sm 8:2; 2 Kgs 3). Solomon’s fall from God’s favor is blamed in part on the Moabite women who were in his harem. Solomon even built a shrine to the Moabite god Chemosh for them (1 Kgs 11:7, 33). Moab was a frequent object of prophetic criticism. The book of Ruth, then, stands in dramatic contrast to the hostility toward Moabites evident in the biblical tradition.

The story of Boaz’s response to the difficulties of Ruth and Naomi also illustrates how people of means should act toward those who have little economic resources to sustain their lives. The poor had the right to follow reapers who harvested the ripe grain from the fields. In fact, Deuteronomy counsels a type of studied incompetence in the harvesting process so that the “resident alien, the orphan, and the widow” could find some sustenance from what remained after the harvest was complete (Dt 24:19–22). Boaz makes certain that Ruth’s efforts in his fields will be successful. In fact, he allows her to join the professional harvesters. She need not wait until they are finished. He even instructs the harvesters to let some grain fall to the earth so Ruth can gather it easily (Ru 2:15–16). Boaz does all this to ensure the well-being of a Moabite. The clear conclusion to be drawn is that Israelite farmers are to be at least this generous toward their brothers and sisters in need.

Then, in an age when the Torah was on the way to becoming the central religious symbol of early Judaism, the book of Ruth presents three characters—Ruth, Boaz, and Naomi—whose actions go beyond what is required of them. Ruth makes a commitment to her mother-in-law, Naomi, which ignores the claims of religious traditions and national origins. Naomi shows her loving concern for Ruth by devising a scheme to induce Boaz to marry Ruth although that scheme could have backfired on her. Boaz ignores his self-interest to marry Ruth and redeem the property of Naomi’s husband. The story shows how people who think of others' needs before their own find their truest happiness. God approves the conduct of these people by giving a son to Ruth and Boaz—a son who removes the emptiness and uncertainty that faced the widow Naomi. The author of Ruth is certainly saying to the book's readers: "Go you and do likewise."

Finally, the early rabbis saw this story as a paradigm of conversion to Judaism. Because Naomi told Ruth to return to her family and homeland three times (1:8, 11–12, 15), the rabbis suggested that any potential converts to Judaism should be turned away three times as well. If would-be converts are determined to become Jews despite these rejections, they can be accepted. This process was necessary not only to determine the sincerity of any convert but also to impress upon the convert that fidelity to Judaism is not easy.

How to Proceed . . .

The book is short and it can be read easily in one sitting. Because a story conveys its meaning in terms of what is said of its actors and their actions, it is important to pay close attention to the characterization of Ruth, Naomi, and Boaz, and what they do. Pay particular attention to the subtle presence of God in the story. Notice, too, recurring motifs and patterns that will function as clues to meaning.

The Book of Ruth in Outline

The story is worked out in scenes set between an introduction, which presents the problem, and an epilogue, which follows the resolution of the problem.

1:1–5 Prologue: A Family Dies

1:6–22 Naomi and Ruth in Bethlehem: Emptiness and Uncertainty

2:1–23 Naomi, Ruth and Boaz (I): A Meeting with Possibilities

3:1–18 Naomi, Ruth and Boaz (II): A Husband for Ruth

4:1–12 The Climax: Boaz Acts

4:13–17 A Son for Naomi

4:18–22 Epilogue: A Family's Genealogy

Reading through the Book of Ruth

The Prologue: A Family Dies (Ru 1:1–5)

A family from Bethlehem that had been driven by hunger to Moab is now left without any hope of progeny since the men of the family have recently died. This is a principal problem of the story: Naomi is left without husband or sons (1:5). The author makes a special note of identifying the family's origin in Bethlehem of Judah (1:1), noting more specifically that they were "Ephrathites from Bethlehem of Judah" (1:2). This detail, emphasized as it was, certainly led those who first read the story of Ruth to think of the most famous of all Ephrathites: David, the son of Jesse (see 1 Sm 17:12). Thus, the opening verses of the story hint at its eventual resolution.

The Geographical and Cultural Setting

The events recounted in these opening verses reflect conditions typical of life in Canaan. Because the region did not have a river system that made large-scale irrigation possible, agriculture was completely dependent on rain. When the rainfall was inadequate, famine was the inevitable result. One way to cope was to move to areas unaffected by the famine—usually this meant Egypt (see Gn 12:10; 26:1). Moab was an unusual choice. It was located east of the Dead Sea and like the lands to the west it too was entirely dependent on rain for agricultural productivity. Presumably a drought that affected Bethlehem would have affected Moab as well. Also unusual is that no negative comments are made regarding the marriage of Naomi's sons to Moabite women. But these details also serve to prepare the reader for an even greater anomaly coming at the end of the story.

Childless widows were particularly vulnerable in the social and economic system of the societies of the ancient Near East. A husband and sons provided a woman with security. Naomi found herself without such protection in a foreign land. She bitterly lamented her fate (Ru 1:13), but in an unusual move one of her daughters-in-law chose to ignore her own welfare and care for Naomi. Instead of attaching herself to a man to provide for her welfare, Ruth attaches herself to Naomi who can offer her nothing.

The Motif of Emptiness

Naomi's "emptiness" is the principal problem of the story. With great artistry the author of Ruth weaves into the story a motif of emptiness that sets the action of the story in motion and will be reversed by the end of the story. The emptiness of the land (famine) causes Naomi's family to leave the land. The emptiness of the land gives way to the emptiness of Naomi as she loses her husband and her sons. Naomi dismisses her daughters-in-law because her "emptiness" cannot be cured. She is too old to give birth again. Naomi's emptiness is accentuated when she contrasts her previous abundance with her present destitution (1:21). The story ends with Naomi no longer empty. She takes Ruth's child to her breast and cares for him. The women of the neighbor congratulate her: "A son has been born to Naomi" (Ru 4:17).

Naomi and Ruth in Bethlehem: Emptiness and Uncertainty (Ru 1:6–22)

The length of this scene indicates its importance for the author of Ruth. Naomi decides to return home because the famine is over in the land of Israel. Also motivating her decision must be the realization that she will have a better chance of survival among her own people than as an Israelite widow living among Moabites. Naomi's words to her daughters-in-law accentuate the tragedy of her situation. She is too old to marry and can no longer bear children. She can hope for nothing. Her daughters-in-law share Naomi's desperate situation, but she advises them to return to their people. Among their own people they may be able to find husbands and thus secure their future. With Naomi there can be no future. Ruth's loyalty is shown in her refusal to abandon her mother-in-law in spite of the hopelessness of Naomi's future; she will stay with Naomi despite the prospect of poverty.

The Character of Ruth

By drawing out the hopelessness of Naomi's situation coupled with Ruth's refusal to leave her mother-in-law, the author highlights Ruth's character: she is faithful. While there is nothing wrong with Orpah's returning home, Ruth's virtue is shown in sharp relief by the contrasting actions of these two women: Ruth is willing to share the plight of Naomi. Ruth's character is spotlighted even more in its biblical context. She is not called by God. She receives no promises. No reward awaits her. She acts solely for the good of Naomi. Her loyalty will draw the attention of Boaz, which eventually will lead to the resolution of the problem facing Ruth and Naomi, and thus all in the story depends on this young widow.

God's Presence in the Story

It is important to note that in the story of Ruth, most often God is referred to in the blessings and oaths spoken by the main characters. Naomi blesses her two daughters-in-law (1:8f); Boaz blesses Ruth for her loyalty to Naomi (2:12) and her good character (3:10); Naomi blesses Boaz for his kindness to Ruth (2:20); the blessing of fertility is bestowed upon Ruth by the citizens at the city gate (3:10). All of these blessings are issued in God's name, but it is through the actions of the main characters that the blessings are fulfilled. God stands behind all as cause (4:14), but God's activity is mediated by those who live faithful lives.

Other references to God in the story imply that God is the cause of all that happens. God is the one who has ended the famine in the land of Israel and filled it with food (1:6). God is blamed for Naomi's destitution (1:20f); God is also responsible for Naomi's abundance at the end of the story (4:14), by enabling Ruth to conceive and bear a child (4:13). The hand of God is to be found in all that happens in the lives of Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz. But there are no miracles, no theophanies, no signs and wonders to illuminate Ruth's way. It is through the ordinary lives of ordinary people, who demonstrate extraordinary care for each other, that the divine is manifest.

Ruth, Boaz, and Naomi (I): A Meeting with Possibilities (Ru 2:1–23)

Ruth takes the initiative in this scene, requesting permission from her mother-in-law to glean in the fields. Picking the few stalks of grain left by the harvesters was one way that people without land were able to feed themselves. Both Leviticus and Deuteronomy require that harvesters not be so thorough as to leave nothing for the poor (Lv 19:9f; 23:22; Dt 24:9). Ruth, seemingly by chance, enters the fields of Boaz, a prominent relative of Naomi. Boaz has heard of Ruth's kindness to her mother-in-law, and sees to it that she is protected and allowed to gather a considerable amount of barley.

The Character of Boaz

The story depicts Boaz as generous and noble. He insists that Ruth glean only in his fields, he extends his protection to her, he provides her with food and water, and he sees to it that she will prosper in her gleaning. The motive for his behavior toward Ruth is her kindness and loyalty to Naomi. We see in his gracious response to Ruth's faithfulness that Boaz is a person of integrity and honor.

Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz (II): A Husband for Ruth (Ru 3:1–18)

Naomi does not want Ruth to remain a widow, so she decides to take advantage of the positive encounter between Ruth and Boaz. She suggests a plan to Ruth that could lead to marriage with Boaz. Although the writer uses euphemisms that reflect his culture's reticence about private matters, the sexual overtones of Ruth's actions are clear. Her encounter with Boaz on the threshing floor could have turned out differently, but Boaz's integrity and generosity led in the direction Naomi hoped: Ruth will have a husband.

The Climax: Boaz Acts (Ru 4:1–12)

The storyteller introduces a new wrinkle into his tale to complicate matters just before the denouement. For the first time in the story, Elimelech's land becomes an issue. Probably the story's first readers would have wondered when the storyteller was going to get around to dealing with this most important matter. Boaz assembles ten of the town's elders to witness how the matter of the land was going to be settled among Elimelech's relatives. The presence of the elders insured that the details of settlement became "public record." An unnamed relative who had a prior claim on the land was willing to buy it back, thus making sure that Elimelech's land would stay "in the family." Of course, doing so will have benefitted that man economically. But then Boaz adds that with the land came Ruth, Mahlon's widow. The land in question would pass to any child born of Ruth and the relative in question. It is at this point that he demurs and cedes his rights to Boaz. The storyteller implies that the unnamed relative was concerned solely about his interests unlike Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz who, throughout the story, are concerned less about themselves and more about the welfare of others. With the tension brought on by this last complication, the storyteller can proceed to the "happy ending," which has Ruth acquire a husband, Boaz acquire both a wife and Elimelech's land, and Naomi acquire a son who will fill her emptiness.

Levirate Marriage and Land Redemption

Some interpreters suggest that the marriage of Boaz and Ruth represents a variation of the levirate marriage. A levirate marriage was the marriage of a woman with the brother of her deceased husband (levir is the Latin word for "brother-in-law"). Such a union was mandated if the marriage was childless (Dt 25:5–10). The practice developed to insure that the line of the deceased man would continue, in spite of the fact that he died before his wife bore him a child. Though Boaz claims Ruth as wife to raise up a family for her late husband, he is not her brother-in-law and thus the law of levirate marriage did not apply. The storyteller presents Boaz as going beyond his obligations in order to help two widows in need.

Land redemption was a strategy that developed to insure that circumstances that forced a man to sell his land would not lead his family into a permanent state of poverty. According to Leviticus 25:23–38, it was the responsibility of a relative to buy the land before it was sold outside the family or to buy it back if it had already been sold. The land remained the property of the relative who bought it back until the year of jubilee when its ownership reverted to the descendants of the man who was forced to sell it.

A Son for Naomi (Ru 4:13–17)

Ruth's marriage to Boaz is blessed with a child. Naomi's loss is replaced by Ruth's gain; the tragedy of death, with which the story opened, is balanced by the joy of new life. Notice that the women of the village congratulate Naomi as if she were the mother: "A son has been born to Naomi" (Ru 4:17). The storyteller thus solves the problem of Naomi's emptiness.

The Epilogue: A Family's Genealogy (Ru 4:18–22)

The story's epilogue takes the reader back to the prologue, which identified Naomi's family as "Ephrathites from Bethlehem" (Ru 1:2) and thus informing the reader of the wider significance of this charming story of one family's problems. The most famous Ephrathite from Bethlehem was David, who, it turns out, was a descendant of Boaz and Ruth. Usually a genealogy serves to legitimate the status of the last person named. Here David, the last person named, serves to show the significance of what happened to three people from the village of Bethlehem for all Israel.

Continuing Significance of the Story of Ruth

While Early Judaism came to regard careful observance of the Torah as the key to its future, the book of Ruth shows three people whose relationships with each other are based not on obligations but on love and concern for another in need. Such relationships have significance far beyond the lives of the three people involved directly. Jesus develops these insights in his Sermon on the Mount in which he calls his followers to go beyond the commandments—as irreplaceable as they are. The charming story of Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz shows that an ethical system fulfills its purpose if those who accept it learn to go beyond its requirements. Again, the Torah asserts that no Moabite is to be admitted into the Israelite community (Dt 23:4). But the book of Ruth presents a Moabite woman whose actions on behalf of her Israelite mother-in-law proceeded from love that ignored religious and ethnic boundaries, which serve to keep people from responding to each other in love. The book of Ruth, then, presents this young Moabite woman to its readers and suggests that they follow her example. The ending of the book wishes readers to recognize that when people give of themselves for the sake of others, they find their truest happiness. This paradox lies at the heart of the book of Ruth and makes it the charming and admirable story that it is.

1 AND 2 SAMUEL

see pages [332–399 of the Old Testament]

BEFORE BEGINNING . . .

The books that we call 1 and 2 Samuel were originally one book. The division into two was the work of those responsible for the Septuagint, the third-century BC Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible. Perhaps the translators thought it was necessary to make two shorter books out of one long one. The division was introduced into the Hebrew Bible in the sixteenth century AD and has become standard ever since. Ending 1 Samuel with the death of Saul seems to make sense until the reader realizes that this division breaks up the story of David's rise to the throne. The story of the succession to David, which begins in 2 Samuel 9 is interrupted by extraneous material in 2 Samuel 21–24 and is not completed until 1 Kings 1–2.

The books of Samuel are so named because the early rabbis believed the prophet wrote 1 Samuel 1–25. They held that the rest of 1 Samuel and the whole of 2 Samuel were the work of the prophets Nathan and Gad on the basis of 1 Chronicles 29:29. Modern scholarship ascribes the books of Samuel in their present form to the anonymous author of the Deuteronomistic History of Israel, which begins with the book of Joshua and continues through 2 Kings. This author brought together several works such as the Saul Cycle (1 Sm 8–15), the story of David's Rise (1 Sm 16–31), the Ark Narrative (1 Sm 4:2–7:1) and the Succession Narrative (2 Sm 9–20; 1 Kgs 1–2) to tell the story of the rise of the monarchy in ancient Israel. Some modern historians suggest that it is not possible to use the books of Samuel to reconstruct the early history of the Israelite monarchy since the archaeological record does not support the image of David's kingdom as presented in 2 Samuel. The purpose of the Deuteronomistic History was homiletical, not historiographic. The Deuteronomists sought to give the people of Judah hope for the future rather than information about the past.

The stories in the books of Samuel revolve around three characters: Samuel (1 Sm 1–25), Saul (1 Sm 9–2 Sm 2), and David (1 Sm 10–2 Sm 24). The stories of these three figures overlap and are supplemented with stories about the ark, Jerusalem, and other members of the royal family. Through most of 1 Samuel, the story moves toward the eventual accession of David to the throne of Israel. In 2 Samuel, the story describes the clear move toward religious and political centralization in Jerusalem. The books also reveal the political and religious opposition to the attempt to center all power in the Davidic dynasty and in Jerusalem. Of course, the move to establish a dynasty and concentrate all political power in the royal house had serious political and economic repercussions, and these too unfold in the book. The story of Israel as it establishes a monarchy is a fascinating tale of a social, political, and economic innovation that could advance only by overcoming the religious restraints that flowed from the belief that the only king of Israel was the LORD. Finally, though the stories seem to focus on three great figures in Samuel, Saul, and David, there is an impressive list of characters—David’s wives and children, his generals, priests and prophets, Saul’s son Jonathan, and Jonathan’s crippled son Meribbaal—all of whom have critical roles in the origin of the Israelite monarchy as it unfolds. Also, the “little people” such as Hannah (1 Sm 1), the “man of God” who announced the fall of the house of Eli (1 Sm 2:27–36), the woman of Tekoa (2 Sm 14), and Shimei (2 Sm 16) affect the lives of the great personages of the books of Samuel in most critical ways. But it is important to remember that for the author of the Deuteronomistic History, the most important character in the story of Israel in its land is the LORD, Israel’s patron deity, even though God’s action is sometimes subtle and unnoticed. For example, in the story of the succession to David (2 Sm 9–20 and 1 Kgs 1–2), God is mentioned explicitly only three times.

READING THROUGH THE BOOKS OF SAMUEL

Samuel (1 Sm 1:1–8:22)

Samuel’s Birth (1 Sm 1:1–2:10)

In one sense, the books of Samuel try to answer the question: “Who is a legitimate leader in Israel?” At first, Samuel provides leadership for the tribes in an unparalleled way. He is a priest, prophet, and judge, and uniquely able to inform Israel of the LORD's will. He represents the view that God communicates to Israel through charismatic individuals such as prophets. The story of Samuel's conception and birth (1:1–28) marks him as one whom God has chosen. The book follows a familiar pattern to indicate Samuel's significance: he is born to a woman who had been thought of as infertile. The same motif was used to indicate the special role of Isaac (Gn 17:15–22), Jacob (Gn 25:19–28), Joseph (Gn 30:22–24), and Samson (Jgs 13:2–7). Like Samson, Samuel, it appears, was destined from birth to be a nazirite (1 Sm 1:11). The story of Hannah (1 Sm 1:1–2:11) is one of those brief episodes in which a supporting character plays a crucial role in the narrative. Samuel was born because God rewarded Hannah's persistence in praying for a child. Out of gratitude, Hannah gives her son over to the exclusive service of God. To conclude Hannah's story, the author of 1 Samuel inserted a poem whose theme is the reversal of fortunes brought about by the LORD in the lives of the faithful (2:1–10). The poem's theme reflects Hannah's experience.

Samuel and the Sons of Eli (1 Sm 2:11–36)

The story of Samuel's career is introduced by contrasting him with the sons of Eli, the priest of Shiloh. That Samuel, rather than Eli's sons, succeeded the old priest required some explanation since the priesthood in Israel came to be a hereditary occupation. The answer is simple enough: Eli's sons were corrupt and abused their office to enrich themselves. The author of 1 Samuel skillfully weaves the indictment of Eli's sons (2:12–17, 22–25) with the reports about Samuel's growth to adulthood (2:1, 18–21, 26). The indictment of Eli's sons, given by the unnamed "man of God," prepares the reader for fall of the house of Eli. The oracle begins with a series of questions (2:27–29) that provide the basis for the judgment that is to follow. The man of God, then, announces God's judgment (2:30–34). The oracle concludes with the promise that God will raise a new priestly house, and Eli's descendants will be reduced to poverty (2:35–36). The fulfillment of this prophecy comes in two phases. The immediate fulfillment comes in 1 Samuel 4:11 with the death of Eli's sons, and its final fulfillment is noted by 1 Kings 2:26–27 when Solomon exiles Abiathar and deprives him of the priesthood. The fulfillment of prophecy is another important motif in the Deuteronomistic History.

The announcement of judgment against the house of Eli sets a pattern for understanding the story of Israel as a whole. The rehearsal of God's goodness toward Israel is followed by a listing of infidelities. The judgment makes clear the terrible consequences of infidelity—consequences that cannot be avoided. But judgment is not God's final word to Israel. Just as God raised up a new priestly dynasty to replace Eli's discredited family, so there is hope for Israel as a whole. The book offers a reason to expect God to restore Israel to the land that it lost because of its infidelity.

Samuel and Eli (1 Sm 3:1–4:1)

Samuel is no longer a child. It is time for him to begin his ministry on Israel's behalf. The book, however, first offers a final contrast between Samuel and the house of Eli in order to show that God sanctioned the role Samuel will play in the narratives to follow. Samuel's career began with an initial experience of the Word of God while Samuel was in Shiloh at the shrine where the ark was kept. The book notes that such experiences were rare at the time. Though Samuel appeared unsure of himself, he did show himself to be receptive as he referred to himself God's "servant" and asserted his willingness to obey. The message that Samuel receives is one that rehearses the condemnation of Eli's priestly dynasty in harsh and uncompromising terms. Eli accepted the verdict on his house, realizing that a new era in Israel's life was beginning. God's chosen means of communicating with Israel will be through a prophet—the prophet Samuel. The book concludes the story of Samuel's call by noting that all Israel recognized Samuel's role in communicating God's word. It also affirms that God continued to speak to Samuel at Shiloh and that every word that Samuel announced came true.

In the chapters that follow, the focus will be on the fate of the ark. Samuel will not appear in the story again until chapter 7. This is probably to dissociate him entirely from the reverses Israel will experience, especially the loss of the ark to the Philistines.

The Story of the Ark (1 Sm 4:2–7:1)

The ark was a unique element of ancient Israelite religious tradition. It served to represent the presence of God in a religion that did not allow an image of its deity to serve that purpose. But the Deuteronomic tradition understands the immediate function of the ark differently. It is simply a box that contained the two tablets of the Ten Commandments (Dt 10:3) or the LORD's throne (1 Sm 4:4). In this section of 1 Samuel, however, the ark is a type of battle palladium that accompanied the army of Israel in war—somewhat akin to a modern flag. The first part of the ark's story describes its capture and return. The story will be taken up again when David brings the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sm 6).

The Philistines, who became the principal threat to Israel's existence, were intent on enlarging their holdings in Canaan. They controlled the area along the southern coast and were determined to expand their territory to the north and east. This move brought them into direct contact with Israel. The Philistine encampment was located at Aphek in an area of Canaan that they controlled. The presence of the Philistine army close to Israelite territory signaled the determination of the Philistines to move against Israel. After an initial defeat, the elders of Israel wondered about the cause and, thinking the ark could make a difference, they bring it to the battlefield from its shrine at Shiloh. The presence of the ark, however, did not prevent a second loss and worse: the Philistines captured the ark.

It is important to be aware that the numerical losses of the Israelites were not as staggering as the English text implies. In the first battle, Israel lost “four thousand men” and in the second, thirty thousand. The Hebrew word that is translated as “thousand” also represents a military unit that was relatively small, probably between five and twenty men. The book asserts that in the first battle, the Israelites lost the equivalent of four such units. In the second, they lost the equivalent of thirty such units. But, as the text makes clear, this loss was devastating nonetheless.

It is also important to note that the text does not blame the defeat of Israel on the sons of Eli, who accompanied the ark from Shiloh. The story of the ark contains no negative comments about Hophni, Phinehas, or their father, Eli, who died upon hearing the news of the disaster at Ebenezer. The first part of the ark's story ends with the naming of Phinehas's newborn child to memorialize the loss of the ark (4:19–22).

Both the Israelites and the Philistines expected Israel to be victorious at the battle of Ebenezer (4:4–9), but Israel suffered two crushing defeats plus the loss of the ark. To insure that readers would not draw the wrong theological conclusion from Israel's defeat, the book describes two great victories of the LORD over Dagon, the Philistine god. These two victories were mirror images of Israel's defeats, that is, Dagon's second loss was more severe than the first. Dagon was a Mesopotamian deity imported into Canaan and honored as Baal's father. Dagon's attributes are unknown, but he is likely a fertility god since the Semitic root from which his name derives means "grain." This text asserts that there was a temple of Dagon at Ashdod, but excavations have not located one although 1 Maccabees 10:83–84 provides evidence that Dagon was worshipped there into the second century BC. The LORD's victory over Dagon spread panic through the Philistine cities (1 Sm 4:3, 6, 11). No Philistine city wanted the ark because of all the devastation that it caused, and so the decision was made to return the ark to Israel.

The victory of the LORD is made all the more indisputable by the method the Philistines choose to return the ark. First, they return the ark with gifts. The golden tumors and mice (1 Sm 6:4) were given as offerings to fend off additional plagues. But to be certain about the true origin of their troubles, the Philistines set up a test. Getting milk (milch) cows to overcome their maternal instincts, their lack of experience with pulling a cart, and having them arrive at a precise place would certainly indicate divine power. Of course, Israel's God passed the test and the ark arrived back at Beth-shemesh, a town on the border of Philistine and Israelite territory. There was a sizable crowd to greet the ark on its return because the people were in the fields harvesting the wheat crop. A large stone in the field served as a substitute altar on which the cows were sacrificed though normally the only male of the species were to be sacrificed (Lv 1:3; 22:19). The Philistine lords witnessed all this. The victory of Israel's God was complete.

The people of Beth-shemesh, however, did not want to keep the ark in their village, perhaps to avoid provoking the Philistines whose territory was close by. The village of Kiriath-jearim, which was a few miles farther east, accepted the ark and designated a certain Eleazar to care for it. The ark remained in that village until David brought it to Jerusalem (2 Sm 6).

Samuel and the Israelite Monarchy (7:2–8:22)

Samuel reenters the story as an adult who will have a special role in the establishment of the Israelite monarchy. While the book's attitude toward the monarchy is a bit ambiguous, it is clear from the story of Samuel's victory over the Philistines (7:2–17) that, from a military point of view, the monarchy was unnecessary. If Israel would be absolutely loyal to the LORD, no enemy could do it much harm. The story begins with Israel's return to the exclusive service of the LORD after twenty years of Philistine domination, despite the ark's presence in Israel. The book makes it clear that the presence of the ark offered no guarantee that Israel would live undisturbed in its land—only exclusive service to the LORD will bring Israel peace.

Samuel assembled the Israelite militia at Mizpah in response to the people's desire to return to the LORD. The Philistine response to this provocation was an utter failure, and Israel's victory removed the stigma of the two defeats at this very battlefield (1 Sm 4:2–11) so Samuel renamed the place Ebenezer, that is, “the stone of (God's) help.” Israel remained free of Philistine domination under Samuel's leadership, making it appear unnecessary for Israel to choose a king as it would at Mizpah (1 Sm 10:17), the scene of the great victory inspired by Samuel. The book, then, emphasizes that it was Israel's repentance—not the presence of the ark nor the leadership of a king—that secured Israel's future. Of course, when the books of Samuel were written, Israel no longer had the ark nor a king. Its only course was to return to its ancestral deity.

The move toward the establishment of a monarchy accelerated because of the corruption of Samuel's sons (8:1–9). The people's request, however, angered Samuel who claimed that a king would not be an instrument of justice but of oppression (8:10–18). The people adamantly insisted on having a king “like all the nations” to fight their wars, so God told Samuel to honor their request. But for Samuel, the request for a king was an insult to the LORD. After all, God had always defended a loyal Israel. Why would Israel want a king? Samuel warned the Israelites that their rejection of God would lead to God's refusal to answer them in time of need (8:18). They will have to depend on their king. This story, of course, reflects Israel's experience of the monarchy. It proved ineffective in preventing the disasters that eventually befell the two Israelite kingdoms. First Samuel implies that this outcome was, in some sense, determined by the people's sinful request for a king.

Saul (1 Sm 9:1–15:35)

Samuel and Saul Meet (1 Sm 9:1–10:16)

The story of Samuel's initial encounter with Saul, whom he eventually anointed king, knows nothing of the people's sinful request for a king. On the contrary, it presents Saul's rise to kingship in a very positive light. Saul is a handsome man from a wealthy family, a seemingly good choice for a king. The book preserves this fascinating tale of a man who went looking for donkeys but found a kingdom. This charming story maintains that Saul was chosen by God to be king and could have remained in God's good graces. But as Saul's story continues, the reader learns that the young man endowed with so many gifts and blessed by the spirit of the LORD squandered everything. The story of Saul is a story of Israel in microcosm. Like Saul, Israel was blessed with many gifts, but in the end it too squandered them all and found itself in exile. But will Israel's end be different from that of Saul?

The futile search for his family's donkeys led Saul to seek out a "man of God," who turned out to be Samuel. The revelation that Samuel received about a "man of Benjamin" whom he would meet indicates that Saul was God's choice to be king, though Saul himself was surprised by Samuel's message (9:14–21). Another indication of the divine choice of Saul was the fulfillment of the signs that Samuel gave to Saul to confirm his new status. This third sign is the most significant because it promised that "the spirit of the LORD" was going to come on Saul. This gift, of course, will enable him to do extraordinary deeds in saving Israel from its enemies (10:1, 6). Upon returning home with his family's donkeys, Saul said nothing about his peculiar encounter with Samuel. This detail is necessary to make a smooth connection with the following story that describes Saul's public acclamation as king.

A positive attitude toward Saul as king continues in the story of his public acclamation (10:17–27). Still, there are features in the story that still reflect the book's overall discomfort with the monarchy as an institution. First, Samuel assembled the people at Mizpah—the very place where he had shown that a king was unnecessary since God will always protect a repentant and loyal people (10:17; see 1 Sm 7:2–12). Second, Samuel, speaking in the name of God, asserted that the request for a king was another of Israel's actions rejecting their God, who had proved in the Exodus and in other situations to be a savior beyond compare (10:18–19). Still, by using lots to select the king, Samuel demonstrates the choice of Saul was God's since God controlled how the lot fell. The people, impressed by Saul's bearing, acclaim him as their king. Samuel then committed the laws governing the new institution to writing and dismissed the people. There were a few people whom the text characterizes as "worthless" (10:27), who did not support the choice of Saul. To do so, however, involved questioning the choice that God had made.

The story of Saul's public acclamation is another instance of the book's ambiguity about the establishment of the monarchy in Israel. While the story presents Saul as God's choice to be king, it also presents Israel's choice to have a king as sinful. This ambivalence is not only a theological issue; it is also a literary technique that builds up suspense in the story. Can this paradox be resolved? Can the monarchy be something that contributes positively to maintaining Israel's relationship with God? Or is it only a matter of time before the monarchy's doom becomes apparent? How can Israel reject God as its savior and still expect to survive?

The "worthless people" who did not support Saul are the only connection between the story of Saul's choice by lots (10:17–27) and the story that follows (11:1–15). The story of Saul's victory over the Ammonites is the high point of the Saul cycle. Here his kingship differs little from the pattern of leadership represented by the judges. He rallies all Israel to follow him in lifting the oppression brought to bear on Jabesh-gilead, a town east of the Jordan that was threatened by Ammonites, who were expanding their holdings to the north. The victory of the Israelite militia led by Saul was total. Saul proved to be magnanimous in victory as he spared the lives of the "worthless people" who opposed his accession (11:14). Saul was then proclaimed king at the old tribal shrine at Gilgal. Saul shows what the kings of Israel should have been, the saviors of the oppressed. Unfortunately, Saul and most of his successors proved to be more obsessed with their power than with the good of the people.

The book's final reflections on the rise of the Israelite monarchy appear in 1 Samuel 12. In chapter 7 the book already showed that Israel could have gotten along very well with the LORD as its only king. Still, God acceded to the people's wishes so living under a king should have been compatible with Israel's commitment to its God. Indeed, the book did treat Saul favorably in 1 Samuel 9:1–11:15. That God chose Saul to be king of Israel was underscored in several ways: through the anointing, the empowerment by the spirit of the LORD, the lot oracle, the prophetic designation, the popular acclamation, the victory over the Ammonites—even by Saul's pardoning of those who opposed his accession. Samuel's presence lent credibility to the establishment of the Israelite monarchy. At the same time, the book showed less than complete support for kingship by noting that Samuel was able to keep the Philistines in check for twenty years, implying that no king was need to defend Israel. It also had Samuel point out the negative social and economic impact the monarchic system will have on Israel. Finally, Samuel twice characterized the request for a king as apostasy. But despite all this, God commanded Samuel to give in to Israel's request.

The book goes over this ground one more time in 1 Samuel 12. Samuel's address to Israel begins with a legal argument designed to show that both God and Samuel were blameless in the process that led up to Saul becoming king. Israel's future under its kings depends on its commitment to observe the LORD's commands (12:14). When it rains during the dry season, the people see in this unusual occurrence additional proof that God and Samuel bear no responsibility for what will happen to Israel under its kings. The people also admit that their request for a king was sinful. But God has chosen not to abandon Israel. Samuel will be with the people to pray for them and to teach them. The implication is that as long as the people obey the prophets sent to them, God will bless them. The quality of Israel's life under its kings depends on Israel's obedience. Those who first read 1 Samuel knew that Israel and its kings failed, so the judgment that came upon the people was the fulfillment of the words spoken to Israel by Samuel as it began its life under a king.

Saul Defeats the Philistines (1 Sm 13:1–14:52)

Saul's reign began well enough, at least from a military point of view. Saul maintained a small army while allowing the bulk of the Israelite militia to return to their homes. After a Philistine outpost was attacked by either Saul (13:4) or his son Jonathan (13:3), both sides prepare for war. 1 Samuel 14:1–21 describes the Israelite success in that war. That success came despite the Philistines' numerical (13:5) and technological superiority (13:19–22). The reason for the latter was the ability of the Philistines to forge iron. The Israelites had to make due with the less effective bronze for their tools and weapons. The average Israelite farmer could not pay the price that the Philistine charged for iron agricultural implements—much less for iron weapons. Of the Israelite forces only Saul and Jonathan had an iron sword and spear. The book, of course, implies that given the advantages that the Philistines enjoyed, only a miracle could have enabled Israel was able to defeat them.

In the midst of the story about Saul's successful war against the Philistines, the book relates an ominous incident that took place at the tribal sanctuary at Gilgal (13:7b–15). Because Samuel was late in arriving at Gilgal, Saul offered a sacrifice there as a prelude to the attack on the Philistines. Samuel regarded this as an offense that led God to reject Saul in favor of “a man after his own heart” (13:14), whom the reader knows to be David. The book does not specify the precise nature of Saul's offense, but Samuel regarded it as some sort of an unlawful usurpation on Saul's part. It was so serious that it ended all prospects of a Saulide dynasty.

The Philistines decided to fight the battle at Michmash, a town just nine miles northeast of Jerusalem and just over a mile east of Geba, Saul's village. Michmash was located in a canyon that was impassable on the east, so it was a good place for the Philistines to mass their troops in anticipation of an Israelite attack. That attack was led by Jonathan (14:1–14), who did not inform Saul of his plans. When Saul heard the sound of battle, his reaction was strangely indecisive. First, he sought an oracle to determine if the Israelite army should attack, but then he stopped the process before it was completed and attacked. When the Philistines began their retreat, Saul let piety overcome his military sense. He ordered his men to fast until the victory over the Philistines was consolidated. The hungry troops not only disobeyed but ate meat that had not been properly drained of its blood (see Dt 12:23). Jonathan too ate, but he ate some honey without knowing that his father pronounced a curse on anyone who ate before the victory was complete.

When Saul heard about his soldiers' disregard of his orders, he had a ritual performed to deflect the curse on those who had eaten the meat. Then Saul sought another oracle to determine if he should continue pursuing the Philistines. When no answer was forthcoming, Saul concluded that someone had sinned, and he was determined to execute that person even if it were his son. To determine the guilty party Saul uses the lot oracle (the urim and thummim; see Dt 33:8). Though Jonathan's guilt is discovered, the army prevented Saul from taking Jonathan's life. Saul did not continue his pursuit of retreating Philistines. The book then appends a short notice (14:47–52) that summarizes Saul’s many battles to make it clear that God was faithful to the promise made to Samuel as reported in 1 Samuel 9:16.

Saul and the Amalekites (1 Sm 15:1–34)

This story contains 1 Samuel’s final word on Saul’s kingship. It simply comments that God “regretted” having made Saul king (vv. 10–35). This verdict on Saul comes after another act that Samuel regards as disobedient. Saul and his army were to take no booty from the Amalekites, whom the tradition remembered as violently opposing the entrance of the Israelite tribes into Canaan (Ex 17:8–13; Dt 25:17–18). When confronted by his disobedience, Saul did confess and ask for pardon, but it was too late. The prophet and the king never saw each other again alive. Samuel mourned for Saul because God was determined to give the kingdom to another. The story of Saul describes the power of human choice. Though God selected Saul to be king, Saul was able to annul that choice by his failures. Again, this is precisely what Israel did by its disobedience.

David (1 Sm 16:1–2 Sm 24:25)

Saul and David Meet (1 Sm 16:1–23)

The book does not hesitate to enumerate the schemes that David contrived to become king: his political moves, his marriages, and his career as a guerrilla and as a Philistine mercenary. None of this is particularly flattering to David. Despite this, the book affirms that David was God’s chosen. Samuel would have anointed another of Jesse’s sons, but David was God’s sovereign choice, and the anointing served to commit God to David. This commitment was confirmed by the spirit of the LORD that seized David. But Saul, deserted by the spirit of the LORD, is a broken man, afflicted by melancholy. What the reader recognizes as a supreme irony is that the old king had to look for relief from his rival for the throne. Saul’s servants brought David to the court to deal with their master’s moods, but the reader recognizes that their description of David makes him overqualified to be only a musician.

David and Goliath (1 Sm 17:1–18:5)

The story of David and Goliath stands as a paradigm of what a person of faith can accomplish. Clearly the book wants the Jewish exiles to identify with the young David, whose words and deeds testify that it was God who brought down the Philistine giant. The story also underscores David's credentials for leadership, which even Saul recognized since he appointed David to a permanent military command, not realizing that he was paving the way for his successor. Jonathan's gift of his own clothes and weapons to David makes it appear that Saul's son is divesting himself of the right of succession in favor of his new friend, the son of Jesse. The book's rush of enthusiasm in narrating this great story led to an obvious anachronism. According to v. 35, David brought Goliath's head to Jerusalem, but that city was still in Canaanite hands and remained so until David captured it and made it his capital (see 2 Sm 5:6–10).

One feature of the story is not so flattering to David. Before he volunteers to face Goliath, David asks about the reward for the person who kills the Philistine champion (1 Sm 17:26). The text implies that David was already calculating actions that would enhance his prestige. Also, 2 Samuel 21 reflects another and probably earlier tradition about the killing of Goliath, crediting that deed to an otherwise unknown Bethlehemite named Elhanan.

Saul's Jealousy (1 Sm 18:6–30)

Saul had good reason to be jealous of David. Not only did the people love him but so did Jonathan and Michal, Saul's children. But no matter how Saul tried to eliminate his rival, David's popularity continued to grow. Saul tried to kill David twice (v. 11), but eventually Saul realized that David's success was divinely ordered (vv. 14–15). Saul suggested that David marry his eldest daughter. David was thrilled at the prospect of marrying into Saul's family, but Saul married her off to someone else. Recognizing David's eagerness, Saul offered David another daughter if he was willing to pay a bride-price that exposed him to great danger. But David accomplished the task and outperformed any of Saul's staff. When Saul saw how the people held David in high regard, Saul's reaction was fear and hatred.

David the Fugitive (1 Sm 19:1–28:2)

Saul became so obsessed with David's success that David had to flee Saul's court and take up the life of a fugitive in order to avoid being killed. Coming to David's aid is an unlikely group of supporters that range from Saul's own children to the Philistines. In telling the story of David's life on the run, the book sees God's hand protecting David from Saul and leading the young shepherd boy inexorably to the throne of Israel.

David's successes and popular acclaim triggered Saul's first attempts on David's life, but these were unsuccessful (1 Sm 19:1–24). First, Jonathan talked Saul out of killing David (vv. 1–7). After another one of David's military victories over the Philistines, Saul could not control his hatred and made another attempt on David's life, but the latter's dexterity saved him (vv. 8–10). Michal, Saul's daughter and David's wife, prevented a third attempt from being successful (vv. 11–17). Finally, David fled to Samuel. Saul found him, but a prophetic ecstasy, which once confirmed Saul's kingship (1 Sm 10:5–12), now made possible David's escape (vv. 18–24). The reader is meant to recognize the hand of God in David's escapes.

Though Jonathan was loyal to his father, he nonetheless considered Saul's moves against David as unjust (1 Sm 20:1–21:1). The story of Jonathan is a story marked by conflicting emotions as Jonathan has to stand up to Saul in order to protect David. Saul's anger led him to hurl a demeaning insult to Jonathan and his mother (v. 30). The book portrays David as not involved in all this by having different characters affirm his innocence three times (vv. 1, 8–9, and 32). The irony surrounding David's rise to kingship continues as he depends on Jonathan, the presumptive heir to Saul's throne, to insure his safety. But by saving David, Jonathan is in effect denying himself the throne and his father a dynasty. Although the book does not say so explicitly, the reader knows that God is guiding the events that will eventually bring David to the throne.

Jonathan, Samuel, and Michal were not the only members of Saul's entourage to help David escape from Saul. While Jonathan and Michal consciously decided to help David, Ahimelech, a priest from a sanctuary near Saul's town, was duped by David into providing him with food and a weapon (1 Sm 21:2–10). Unfortunately for Ahimelech, Doeg, an Edomite in Saul's service, witnessed the exchange between David and Ahimelech, but the consequences of that will be clear only in 1 Samuel 22:6–23. But the book is intent on describing an ever-widening circle of those who came to David's assistance.

In his desperation David sought refuge in Gath, a Philistine city that was home to Goliath. But David was unable to remain incognito. He feigned lunacy, and the Philistine king fell for David's act (1 Sm 21:11–16). David will eventually join the Philistine army (1 Sm 27), but the book implies that David's actions were not treasonous but were motivated by his need to escape Saul's murderous intentions.

To survive on the run David sought safety in numbers. His family joined him as he assembled a force of four hundred men. Evidently, even the king of Moab was among David's supporters since the king agreed to protect members of David's family. Other help came from the prophet Gad, who advised David to seek a haven in the territory of Judah. Saul, on the other hand, massacred a group of priests that had supported his rival. Saul was now almost completely isolated. His son, daughter, the priests of Nob, and even his fellow Benjaminites were giving passive and often active support to David. In addition to all these people, Saul's atrocity at Nob drove Abiathar, the sole surviving priest, into David's camp (1 Sm 22:1–23).

First Samuel 23 describes two of David's narrow escapes from Saul. The first of these follows David's defeat of the Philistines who were raiding the Judahite town of Keilah. When Saul heard that David came to the town's defense, he saw that this afforded him the opportunity to finally capture his rival. In reversal of the usual pattern, Saul found people who were willing to betray David. But David, though divination, learned of Saul's intention and escaped. David was then betrayed by the Ziphites, who also belonged to the tribe of Judah, but before Saul could act on the intelligence they provided, he had to deal with a new Philistine threat. Sandwiched between these two stories of treachery by David's fellow Judahites is another account of a Benjaminite—indeed Saul's own son and heir—declaring support for David. Jonathan had more to lose than anyone as a result of David's rise to power, but he acted in accordance with what the book presents as the will of God (1 Sm 23:14).

In chapter 24 the tables turn and David has an opportunity to kill Saul, his antagonist, but he refuses to raise his hand against the old king. This story of David's refusal to kill Saul when he had the opportunity is a fine piece of political propaganda. The story puts David in an extremely good light and serves to legitimate his eventual ascent to Israel's throne. Indeed, even Saul now recognizes that David should be king (v. 20). The story also serves to put a positive spin on actions that David will take to neutralize any claims to the throne that Saul's descendants might make. The implication here is clear: David was entirely blameless in the matter of the succession.

Between two accounts that make David appear reluctant to take the throne forcibly, there is one that shows him to be taking steps that make him Saul's successor nonetheless. One of these steps involves marrying a woman from an influential Judahite family (1 Sm 25:1–42). But before the story of David and Abigail begins, the book notes the passing of Samuel, who has had no significant role in the narratives for a while. Before the book can have Saul conjure up the spirit of Samuel (1 Sm 28), it is necessary that Samuel die.

One of the anomalies of the story of David's rise is the treachery of people from David's own tribe. Nabal is another Judahite who was simply not impressed with David and refused to help him. Abigail, Nabal's wife, persuaded David not to take any reprisals on her husband. When Nabal died, David immediately proposed marriage to Abigail. It will not be the first time that David will marry a woman from an influential family, who had been married to another. David clearly saw such marriages as helping to solve the problems he had been having with certain elements from Judah. The marriage to Abigail gave David new status in Judah.

For a second time, it was possible for David to kill Saul, and again he refused to do so (1 Sm 26:1–25). In fact, David upbraided Abner, Saul's military commander, for the lax security that gave David the opportunity to assassinate Saul. Even though Saul was grateful to David, there was no reconciliation between them, and this was the last time the two would meet. Saul's final words to David are a blessing and a prediction of David's ultimate success (vv. 17–25).

Saul's pursuit of David was relentless despite what appeared to be reconciliation between the two in chapters 24 and 26. Ironically, the only place David was safe from Saul was with Israel's implacable enemies, the Philistines (1 Sm 27:1–28:2). David lied his way into the trust of Achish, who once thought him mad. David claimed to have been raiding Judahite settlements while all the time raiding those of other peoples. David was put in a very awkward position when Achish announced that a raid on Israel was in the offing. He had to assure Achish of his loyalty.

Saul's Tragic Death (1 Sm 28:3–2 Sm 1:27)

Saul went out to meet the Philistines one last time. The place of this final confrontation was a town or near Mount Gilboa, which overlooks the Jezreel Valley. The king was terrified at the prospect of having to face the Philistines again. He consulted the LORD but received no answer. He thought to consult Samuel, who had died earlier. To do so he had to engage a specialist in conjuring the spirit of the deceased—something forbidden to Israel (see Dt 18:11). The prophet's spirit did not give the king good news: the Israelite army would be defeated. Saul's fate is sealed.

David was saved from having to fight against Saul and the Israelites because the Philistines did not trust him. Achish allowed David to engage in raiding the Amalekites, another of Israel's traditional enemies (1 Sm 29:1–30:31). The story of David's conduct during these raids stands in contrast to Saul's impotence before the Philistines. David showed himself to be courageous in battle; he was fair and even generous with his soldiers; he defended the Israelites who fell victim to Amalekite power; and above all, he was victorious. David's victories over the Amalekites coupled with Saul's impending loss to the Philistines implied that God was behind David's rise to power.

The book relates the end of Saul with dignity and sympathy (1 Sm 31:1–13). Saul died doing his duty as king. Although he knew that defeat was inevitable, Saul fought bravely and died by his own hand to insure that the Philistines would be deprived of making sport of him. They did, however, hang his corpse and that of Jonathan from the walls of Beth-shan, a city near Mount Gilboa. This afforded the people of Jabesh-gilead an opportunity to repay the favor that Saul did for them in better times. They took the two bodies off the city wall, transported them to Jabesh where they were buried. Then the people began a period of mourning for their one-time benefactor.

Transitions of power in the ancient Near East were rarely smooth. Palace revolts and assassinations occurred with some frequency. The book wishes to end any rumors about David's role in Saul's death, so it portrays David at deeply affected by the deaths of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sm 1:1–27). The Amalekite confessed to Saul's murder, but the reader knows that the Amalekite is lying—perhaps to ingratiate himself with David. Still, David acted on the only information he had and ordered the confessed regicide to be executed. While David came into possession of the royal insignia (v. 10), he did so without any foul play on his part. The poem lamenting the tragic deaths of Saul and Jonathan that the book places on David's lips, came from a now-lost collection called the "Book of Jashar" [the Just] (see also Jos 10:13). It shows that in some quarters, the memory of Saul and Jonathan was cherished. The book has David recite these poignantly beautiful lines to demonstrate David's innocence in Saul's death.

David Becomes King (2 Sm 2:1–5:25)

Saul's end was sad and tragic, but the reader has a sense of relief that David has survived both Saul and the Philistines. He is now in a position to claim the kingship for which he was anointed by Samuel. But it will still be several years before David's position over all Israel will become secure. While David had no trouble being recognized as king in Judah (2 Sm 2:4), his position with regard to the other tribes was a different matter. Though Abner, Saul's general, placed Ishbaal, Saul's surviving son, on the throne, Ishbaal proved incompetent. This paved the way for David's rule over all the tribes. David consolidated his rule by taking Jerusalem and making it his political capital as well as Israel's religious center.

Although the book implies that a united Israel under one king was the ideal, it is clear from the story of the war between Israel and Judah in 2 Samuel 2:12–3:1 and subsequent stories that there were strong political differences and intense rivalry between Judah and the other tribes. Even a common language, religion, and culture could not overcome these differences. For most of their history, Israel and Judah were political opponents, each establishing its own national state. The story of this rivalry is told from a Judahite perspective. The story of the civil war between the supporters of Ishbaal and David is a necessary prelude to the actions that Solomon will take in assuring his succession to David (see 1 Kgs 2:23–33).

The list of David's children (2 Sm 3:2–5) inserted in the account of David's struggle over the succession to Saul is important because it introduces characters who will have significant roles in the story of Solomon's succession to David. Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah each had a better claim on the succession than Solomon. But each in turn will be eliminated, paving the way for Solomon.

The book describes, in some detail, the political maneuvers that were necessary to secure the kingship for David (2 Sm 3:6–4:12). A rival king and his military supporters have to be eliminated, so both Abner and Ishbaal are killed. The story absolves David from any complicity in these acts, but now the waters are becoming murkier. David is no longer the simple shepherd boy who saved Israel with his slingshot. The book makes it obvious that with the monarchy come the intrigues, the double-dealing, the murders that seem to be an inevitable consequence of the quest for royal power. While the story of David's rise to kingship may not be an antimonarchic tract, the book lays bare more of the consequences of Israel's decision to have a human lord in place of its Divine Lord.

Once Ishbaal is assassinated, the elders of Israel bow to the inevitable and accept David as king. The newly acclaimed king then moves to eliminate the one tract of land that still separates Judah from the Israelite tribes in the north. David captures Jerusalem and makes it his capital. The book pauses in its story to assert that all this happened because God was with David (5:1–12), but then the book returns to the actions that David took to solidify his hold on the throne. One of these actions was to marry women from Jerusalem and have children with them, a move to gain support from its citizens (5:13–16).

Another practical step in David's solidifying his rule over Israel is his ending the Philistine domination of Canaan (2 Sm 5:17–25). David freed Israel from the Philistine threat while Saul failed to do so (see 1 Sm 9:16; 2 Sm 3:18). Of course, the victory over the Philistines really belonged to God who gave David the victory (2 Sm 5:19, 24)—another hint that David was God's choice to be king. The book suggests that David's victory was so overwhelming ("The LORD has broken through my enemies . . . as water breaks through a dam") that the battlefield was named Baal-perazim (see note to 5:20; see also Is 28:21).

The Ark in Jerusalem (2 Sm 6:1–23)

Another step in marking the legitimacy of David's accession to kingship was the transfer of the ark to Jerusalem. Michal's negative reaction to David's dancing before the ark suggests the displacement of Saul's family by that of David. The housing of the ark in David's city underscores the centralizing tendencies of the monarchy, which accrues all political, military, and religious authority to itself. This attempt to make human authority absolute will ultimately lead to the undoing of the monarchy and the national state.

Temple and Dynasty (2 Sm 7:1–29)

In the ancient Near East, the building of a temple for a nation's patron deity was a royal prerogative. Still another way that David sought to legitimate his accession to Israel's throne was to build a temple for Israel's God. The book shapes its account to make two important points. First, a temple was not an absolute necessity in ancient Israel's religion (2 Sm 7:5–7). Second, God was going to establish a "house" for David that would endure forever (2 Sm 7:16). While the Temple will be built and the David's dynasty will rule for four hundred years, both come to inglorious ends in the sixth century. Eventually the Temple was rebuilt but under the patronage of the Persians; David's house was never to rise again. Still, there were some who believed that Israel's future was, in some way, tied to the destiny of the Davidic dynasty. The prayer of David (2 Sm 7:18–29) reflects their views.

This text provided support for the hope of some Jews who came to expect that the restoration of the Davidic dynasty would be among God's final acts on Israel's behalf. This hope has come to be known as messianism. The term is derived from the Hebrew word mashiach ("anointed one"), a title of the kings of Judah. The New Testament exploits this expectation as it presents Jesus as the one who will inherit the throne of "David his father" (Lk 1:32). The most frequently used title for Jesus in the New Testament is christos, which is the Greek translation of the Hebrew mashiach. This reflects the Christian belief that Jesus is the fulfillment of Jewish messianic expectations.

David's Kingdom and Its Administration (2 Sm 8:1–18)

Second Samuel asserts that David did not limit his rule to the territories given to the Israelite tribes. David mounted expeditions to extend the borders of his kingdom. Not content with limiting his role to protecting the people of Israel from external threats, David engaged in the type of expansionist militarism to which Israel and Judah would eventually fall victim. But because David was God's chosen, he was victorious (2 Sm 8:14b). David needed people to assist him in the administration of his kingdom; the list in 2 Samuel 8:15–18 names those who assisted David in the military and religious spheres. Though David's sons acted as priests (2 Sm 8:18b), eventually Levites were recognized as the sole legitimate priests; when the Chronicler gives his list of David's administrators, he calls David's sons his "chief assistants" rather than "priests" (see 1 Chr 18:17).

David's Family and the Succession (2 Sm 9:1–20:26)

The rise of David to kingship appeared to be unstoppable, and 2 Samuel makes it clear that holding on to the throne and selecting a successor were entirely different matters. Scattered throughout the story of David's rise were assurances that all happened because of God's actions. In the story of the succession to David, God is mentioned infrequently. The book shows what kind of an institution the monarchy really was, making it clear why, in the end, the monarchy failed Israel.

The story of the succession begins with David inquiring if anyone from Saul's family were still alive. While David feigned concern to fulfill his commitment to Jonathan, he effectively placed a claimant to the throne and his family under house arrest (2 Sm 9:1–13). David thus blunted any opposition that may have sought to use the disabled Meribbaal to rally against him. The story of the war with the Ammonites and Arameans provides the framework for another of David's attempts to secure his throne more firmly. His strategy was to marry a woman who belonged to an influential family. This is at least the third such marriage for David (see 1 Sm 18:20–27; 1 Sm 25). The story seemingly makes it appear as if David's encounter with Bathsheba was fortuitous, but the attentive reader recognizes a pattern in David's marriages. David married women who could help him gain and hold onto power: Bathsheba's grandfather Ahithophel was one of David's key advisors (2 Sm 16:23), and her father, Eliam, was an important military commander (2 Sm 23:34). The book implies that David knew exactly who Bathsheba was. He did not hesitate to use his royal power to have Bathsheba's husband eliminated so that he could marry her (2 Sm 11:2–27).

The book then transforms a tale of adultery and murder into a homily on repentance (2 Sm 12:1–15). The prophet Nathan appeared before the king without being summoned to announce God's verdict on David's actions. The confrontation led to David's repentance so that the sentence of death was not imposed on him. The book wants to lead its readers to conclude that if they too listen to the prophets, their lives will be spared as well. David here becomes a model of repentance. Still, the power of evil that David unleashed by his sins led to the death of Bathsheba's newborn (12:16–23). In time, Bathsheba bore David a son, who succeeded his father as king. Bathsheba named her son Solomon, but the prophet Nathan named him Jedidiah (2 Sm 12:24–25). The reason for Nathan's action is unclear since parents were responsible for naming the child. Jedidiah means "beloved of the LORD" and may signal God's choice of Solomon as David's successor. With the story of David and Bathsheba concluded for the present, the book notes that the war against Ammon was successful (2 Sm 12:26–31).

David's adultery with Bathsheba and his murder of Uriah meant that David and his family would have the specter of sexual excess and murder hanging over their lives for a long time to come. The first to fall victim were David's eldest son, Amnon, and Tamar, his half-sister. Amnon's attraction to his sister led him to rape her (2 Sm 13:1–21). While appalled at his son's crime, David did not punish Amnon. The disconsolate Tamar moved in with Absalom, her full-brother. Nothing more is heard of her. Absalom, however, brooded over his sister's fate for two years. When the opportunity presented itself, Absalom had Amnon murdered. Absalom then found sanctuary in Geshur, which was located in the southern part of the area now known as the Golan Heights. His maternal grandfather was king there (2 Sm 13:23–37; see 2 Sm 3:3).

Eventually Joab, David's nephew and general, was able to effect a reconciliation between David and Absalom, enabling Absalom to return from exile (2 Sm 14:1–33). Absalom was impatient with the pace of his rehabilitation, and it is clear that no genuine reconciliation between father and son took place. Absalom was still harboring grudges. This led the son to take advantage of those who expressed dissatisfaction with David's rule (2 Sm 15:1–6). Absalom's intrigues led to a full-blown revolution, which nearly succeeded (2 Sm 15:7–12). David had to flee for his life, but he had the presence of mind to instruct his priests to remain in Jerusalem to bring him news of how the rebellion was progressing and to have his friend Hushai infiltrate Absalom's retinue. Another supporter was Ziba, one of Meribbaal's servants, who provided David with supplies and informed him that his master had designs on the throne (2 Sm 16:1–4). During this retreat from Jerusalem, David met Shimei, who regarded David as a usurper. Shimei assured David that the rebellion was just what David deserved (2 Sm 16:5–14).

Upon entering Jerusalem, Absalom, dramatized his break with his father in a most decisive way. He had sexual intercourse with David's concubines in full view of the people, fulfilling the curse on David pronounced by Nathan in God's name (2 Sm 12:11–12). Ahithophel, one of David's counselors who went over to Absalom, advised quick action against the retreating David. Hushai, David's spy in Absalom's retinue, bought David time by suggesting that Absalom assemble a large force from all the tribes to deal with David. Absalom took Hushai's advice. Here again is an instance where the book calls the reader's attention to the divine hand ordering events. It asserts that God prevented Absalom from taking Ahithophel's advice (2 Sm 17:14b). David used the time bought by Hushai to prepare a successful counterattack. Absalom fled but was caught by David's troops and killed by his cousin Joab, who countermanded David's express orders that Absalom be spared. David's obvious grief over Absalom disconcerted his soldiers who risked their lives in putting down Absalom's rebellion. David regained his composure and met with his army (2 Sm 16:20–19:9).

The book does not have David's difficulties end with the collapse of Absalom's rebellion. David had to encourage members of Judah, his own tribe, to welcome him back as king. He had to deal with Shimei, who cursed him, and Meribbaal, who sought to take advantage of the rebellion. He spared both. David wanted to reward Barzillai's kindness, but the latter demurred. As a result of having to face an uprising led by his own son, David realized that despite all his machinations, he actually owed this throne to the people (2 Sm 19:23b).

Tensions among the tribes continued, presaging a split that will occur following the death of Solomon (1 Kgs 12). A more immediate consequence of this tension is a second revolt against David. Amasa, who had been a leader of the revolt that Absalom fomented, was rehabilitated by David, who charged him with putting down a second revolt led by Sheba of Benjamin, Saul's tribe. When Amasa dawdled, Joab quickly moved in, killing Amasa and leading David's forces against Sheba, who took refuge in Abel Beth-maacah, a city in the north. The revolution ended when a woman of Abel Beth-maacah persuaded the people of the town to hand over the revolutionary (2 Sm 19:41–20:22).

A list of David's principal officials concludes the story of David's problems in maintaining his position as king. There were two military officials: Joab who commanded the Israelite army, and Benaiah who led the mercenary forces. There were two civil magistrates, Shawsha and Jehoshaphat, and two priests, Zadok and Abiathar. Adoram oversaw the prisoners of war who had to do forced labor. The duties of Ira as David's priest are unknown (2 Sm 20:23–26).

Miscellaneous Material (2 Sm 21:1–24:25)

The story of David's reign is interrupted by six appendices arranged in a chiasm:

A. A famine (21:1–14)

B. Military Exploits (21:15–22)

C. A hymn of victory by David (22:1–51)

C'. David's final hymn (23:1–7)

B'. Military Exploits (23:8–39)

A'. A plague (24:1–25)

The lack of a river system to provide for irrigation made the land of Israel particularly vulnerable to famine when rainfall was not sufficient. The book describes one such famine, which was ascribed to the failure by members of Saul's family to honor the covenant between Israel and Gibeon (see Jos 9). David allowed the Gibeonites to take their revenge on Saul's family (2 Sm 21:1–11). The famine ended when David provided an honorable burial for Saul and Jonathan (2 Sm 21:12–14).

The second component of the supplementary material is difficult to square with 1 Samuel 17, which describes the young David's defeat of Goliath: 2 Samuel 21:15–19 asserts that Goliath was killed by one of David's soldiers—a certain Elhanan—while one of David's brothers is credited with killing another formidable Philistine warrior (2 Sm 21:20–22). Following the account of Israel's victories over the Philistines, the book inserts a hymn of victory that David composed. It is virtually identical to Psalm 18:21–25, which asserts that it was David's obedience that led to his victories—a perspective that resonates with the views of 2 Samuel.

The poetic “last words of David” (2 Sm 23:1–7) are really a theological commentary on David and his dynasty, which emphasize the importance of justice and devotion to God (v. 3). These will lead to God's blessings on the dynasty. Those who ignore the demands of justice are doomed (vv. 6–7).

David's rule as king did not depend on his virtue alone but on the support of many people. Some of these are mentioned by name in 2 Samuel 23:8–39. Ironically, the last person on the list is Uriah. His loyalty was not reciprocated by David—something that the reader knows without being told.

The last episode in 2 Samuel describes another natural disaster: a plague (2 Sm 24). David is blamed for bringing it about by taking a census of the people. The census provided the data necessary for taxation and conscription of the population. David showed that he was not content to simply protect the people from their enemies; he wanted to reduce them all to the status of the king's servants. The plague destroyed the value of the data. David relented and God delivered the country from the plague.

The books of Samuel describe the transition in leadership from that of the judges to Samuel, from Samuel to Saul, and from Saul to David. The question that arises for the reader is who will succeed David as king. One son was a rapist and was murdered to avenge his crime. Another was guilty of fratricide and attempted patricide, and died in the course of a revolution against his father. The prospects for the house of David look bleak. The opening chapter of Kings will describe the solution to the problem of succession.

Continuing Significance of the Books of Samuel

As we read the books of Samuel and its tales of jealousy, rape, murder, and revolution, we can almost hear the author of the books of Samuel saying: "If you want a monarchy, this is what you get." The contemporary reader needs to recognize the folly of making absolute any human institution. The story of David's family shows what can happen when we are unable to keep in check the tendency to make absolute a political institution. The ability of any society to criticize its social structure, its economic policies, and its political system is necessary to keep that society from consuming itself. Second Samuel describes how Judah's royal family began to consume itself. Though monarchies are, for the most part, relics of another age, nations still succumb to the temptation of making their political, social, and economic institutions into absolutes. The story of Israel in its land shows what happens when a nation and its leader ignore the fundamental moral values.

1 AND 2 KINGS

BEFORE BEGINNING . . .

First and Second Kings continue the story of Israel in its land. They are the final two components of the Deuteronomistic History of Israel, which turns that story into a sermon that takes its theological principles from the book of Deuteronomy. First Kings takes up where 2 Samuel 20 ended, describing how the problem of the succession to David was resolved. The book then goes on to tell the story of Solomon's reign and the two Israelite kingdoms that arose following Solomon's death. The division between 1 and 2 Kings is artificial since it is made in the middle of telling the story of King Ahaziah of Israel. Second Kings ends rather abruptly after telling of the parole of King Jehoiachin of Judah from prison in Babylon. The book allows readers to draw their own conclusions regarding the significance of this event. There is, then, no "happy ending" to the story of Israel in its land. What began with so much promise ends with great tragedy.

Certainly, the Deuteronomistic author used a variety of sources—from royal archives to prophetic legends—in composing the story of the two Israelite kingdoms and their tragic end. But in the form in which we read the book of Kings, it is probably the work of a single individual, writing during or shortly after the exile when the shape of Judah's future was unclear. The institutions that gave meaning to the people's national and religious life were dead. The Israelite national states no longer existed. Their territory was simply incorporated into the conquering Mesopotamian empires. The likelihood of a restoration of the Kingdom of Judah and the Davidic dynasty seemed remote. The Temple of Jerusalem was in ruins and its priesthood scattered. Imbued with the religious perspectives of the book of Deuteronomy, Kings clearly states that the downfall of Israel and Judah was a consequence of the people's disobedience, but it implies that Judah may still have a future if its people learn obedience.

The books of Kings are anything but objective. First, they reflect a clear bias in favor of Judah and so they write off the Northern Kingdom as a complete loss. Not a single monarch from the Northern Kingdom receives a positive evaluation. Second, the books of Kings do praise a few kings of Judah, but most are condemned. In the author's eyes, most kings promoted or at least allowed worship that did not reflect the uniqueness of Israel's God and the absolute loyalty that Israel owed to its divine patron. Third, the author is absolutely convinced of the centrality of the Torah in Israel's life with God. Every other religious institution is secondary to it. To make its theological points, the book uses speeches, prayers, and sometimes editorial comments. Attention to these forms will help the reader become acquainted with the spin the book puts on the events it narrates.

Finally, the books of Kings are part of a larger work that begins with Joshua and is sometimes called the "Deuteronomistic History." It is important to remember that while the adjective "Deuteronomistic" is appropriate, the term "historian" is not. The book is an exponent of Deuteronomy's theology, but the author is not a historian—at least not in the modern sense. The author is more of a preacher or moralist as he turns Israel's past into a sermon. The author of Kings directs those who want "historical" information to sources like the chronicles of Solomon (1 Kgs 11:41), the chronicles of the kings of Judah (1 Kgs 14:29 and fourteen more mentions), and the chronicles of the kings of Israel (1 Kgs 14:19 and sixteen more mentions)—sources that are, unfortunately, lost. Also, the relative chronologies of the kings of Judah and Israel do not mesh, and contemporary historians have not been able to reconcile these differences. The book passes over kings of great historical import with a few lines while it devotes chapters to kings that the book considers models of religious commitment. With some care one can use the books of Kings to help reconstruct the history of the Israelite kingdoms, but these books were not written for that purpose. It is important to relate the contents of the books of Kings to other ancient Near Eastern written sources and to the results of archaeological excavations. But none of this diminishes the book's theological achievements. This massive work enabled the exiles to make sense of events that challenged their most deeply held religious beliefs. The book's passion to keep Judah's faith in its ancestral deity alive, despite terrible odds, offers a model to all those who hand on the faith today: reading the books of Kings can be as important today as it was millennia ago.

Solomon's Accession (1 Kgs 1:1–2:46)

When David was a very old man, unable even to keep himself warm, the question of succession became acute. There were two competing candidates: Adonijah and Solomon. Neither was designated by a divine word given through a prophet as were Saul and David. The throne would go to the better practitioner of power politics. Adonijah was born in Hebron and was favored by David's oldest supporters: Joab and Abiathar. Solomon was born in Jerusalem and was favored by his mother, Bathsheba, and those who supported David after he established himself in that city.

Adonijah and Solomon took different approaches toward the succession. Adonijah acted in his own person, claiming the throne for himself. Solomon was content to let his supporters manipulate his father into designating him as the successor to the throne. The book describes two simultaneous ceremonies each of which was to inaugurate David's successor. The ceremonies took place near Jerusalem at two sites in shouting distance of each other. Adonijah chose En-rogel, a spring located at the juncture of the Hinnom and Kidron Valleys just south of Jerusalem; Solomon had his ceremony at the Gihon Spring, Jerusalem's main water source, at the base of the eastern slope of David's city. Solomon was able to bring more people to his ceremony; he was, after all, the candidate of the Jerusalem party. When Adonijah and his supporters heard the crowd acclaim Solomon as their king, they lost heart and fled. Adonijah submitted to Solomon's authority and begged for his life, which Solomon chose to spare.

With the succession settled, the book of 1 Kings had David make his exit. Of course, a person as important as David must have some significant last words to say. The book provides David with a schizophrenic-like testament (1 Kgs 2:1–9). The first to speak is the "pious David" who charges his successor to be obedient to the written authoritative Torah, that is, the book of Deuteronomy. It will be through his obedience that Solomon will secure the throne for himself and his successors (vv. 2–4). Then it is the turn of the "practical David." He knew from experience that gaining the throne and keeping the throne are two different things. David names those who have shown themselves a threat to the dynasty and was certain that Solomon would know what needed to be done (vv. 5–9) to neutralize those threats.

The reader does not have to wait long to learn how Solomon dealt with potential troublemakers (1 Kgs 2:12–46). First, he had Adonijah killed. The imprudent Adonijah gave Solomon a pretext when he asked to marry Abishag, one of David's secondary wives. Solomon chose to interpret Adonijah's foolish request as treason. The new king then dealt with Adonijah's principal supporters. He had Joab killed and sent Abiathar to internal exile. For good measure, Solomon had Shimei, David's tormentor, executed as well (see 2 Sm 16:6–14; 19:16–24). The book allows its readers to draw their own conclusions regarding the path Solomon took to the throne. Notably absent from these first two chapters is any statement or even a hint that God had any role in Solomon's succession.

It is important to note the role that Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, played in his rise to the throne. After he became king, she enjoyed access to him and was seated near his throne at official functions (1 Kgs 2:19–20). The books of Kings name the mothers of seventeen other kings. This has led to the conclusion that the “queen mother” had an official position and exercised political and religious power. Unfortunately, the books of Kings do not provide the type of information that would permit firm conclusions to be drawn. That the Deuteronomists made it a point to mention the mother of eighteen kings by name, however, makes it obvious that the “queen mother” enjoyed a specific rank and exercised some power—especially over domestic matters.

Solomon's Reign (1 Kgs 3:1–11:43)

The account of Solomon's reign begins with an introductory statement that encapsulates the book's ambivalence toward David's son (1 Kgs 3:1–3). On the one hand, the reader is told that Solomon “loved the LORD” (v. 3), fulfilling the great commandment of Deuteronomy (see Dt 6:5). But, on the other hand, he married a foreign princess and worshiped on the “high places.” The Deuteronomic tradition takes a dim view of both patterns of behavior (see Dt 7:1–4; 1 Kgs 3:2–3, and twenty-eight more mentions). Like Israel's life in the land, Solomon's reign will begin well enough, but it will soon founder because of an unwillingness to be faithful to the most basic of the Torah's commands: absolute fidelity to Israel's God.

The book finally gets around to providing divine legitimation for Solomon's accession (1 Kgs 3:4–15). It does so by having God approve of Solomon's status as king through an appearance in a dream, which the Bible considers as one way that God communicates with human beings. The story reflects an ancient Near Eastern practice of seeking an oracle by sleeping in a sanctuary after offering the prescribed sacrifices. Any dream experienced during this sleep was considered a revelation from the god honored at the sanctuary. The dream concerned Solomon's request for God's help in ruling Israel wisely. The request was granted. The book follows up the account of the dream with a tale illustrating Solomon's wisdom (1 Kgs 3:16–28). Solomon was able to settle a dispute between two women over an infant, which each claimed as her own, because he knew that the true mother would sacrifice anything to insure the welfare of her child.

The book pauses in its narrative about Solomon's reign to include information about Solomon's administration, wealth, and wisdom (1 Kgs 4:1–5:14). By way of contrast, 1 Samuel mentions almost nothing about Saul's administration. Second Samuel named nine administrators during David's reign (see 8:16–18; 20:23–26). It is clear from the list of Solomon's administrators (4:1–19) that the centralization of all authority in the monarchy became a priority under Solomon. He developed an efficient apparatus to do what Samuel warned them that their king would do: tax them (see 1 Sm 8:10–18). The book also makes a point of noting that Solomon set up his sons-in-law over two of the districts (4:11, 15) and that Judah, Solomon's tribe, was not included among the taxation districts. The people asked Samuel for a king to rule over them "like all the nations." The book implies that the taxation, nepotism, and cronyism assure them that they have such a king. Deuteronomy requires that the king study the Torah so that he "does not exalt himself over his kindred or turn aside from this commandment" (Dt 17:20). The list of the king's daily provisions (1 Kgs 5:1–5) certainly sounded more than extravagant to Judah's subsistence farmers. The divide between the royal establishment and the general population was becoming more pronounced. Still, 1 Kings 4:20 and 5:5 describe Solomon's reign as a time of peace and prosperity.

It is likely that this description of an elaborate administrative structure that handled the affairs of a kingdom that extended "from the River [Euphrates] to the land of the Philistines, down to the border of Egypt" (5:1) is largely an ideological construct. The archaeological record does not support the Deuteronomist's assertion that Solomon ruled a kingdom of such an extent. Solomon's kingdom was likely a much more modest affair.

Just as Moses came to be associated with Torah and David with the psalms, Solomon was remembered as a sage (see Prv 1:1; Sir 47:12). To conclude its initial portrait of Solomon, the book asserts that Solomon's wisdom was unsurpassed. His wisdom attracted admirers from all over the world (5:9–14). The reader is left to conclude that Solomon's court is far different from that of Saul—and even David.

Next the book describes a project with which Solomon's name is always associated: the building of the Temple (1 Kgs 5:15–32). While the account implies that the project was ordained by God, temple-building was a royal prerogative in the ancient Near East. By initiating the project of erecting a temple to Israel's patron deity in Jerusalem, his capital, Solomon was asserting, in most dramatic form, that he had a legitimate claim to the throne. The book has Solomon explain that David did not build a temple because he was almost continuously at war (1 Kgs 5:17). Solomon also used good Deuteronomic language as he said that he was going to build a temple "for the name of God" (v. 19). The Deuteronomic tradition usually avoided describing the Temple as God's dwelling place, preferring to speak of the Temple as the place for God's name (see Dt 12:5, 11). To be consistent with its portrait of Solomon as an Israelite king with an international reputation, the book has the king using his contacts to assemble the best material and artisans from surrounding countries for his project while ordinary Israelites contributed their labor to the project.

The book goes into some detail in describing the building of the Temple. It gives the date for both the beginning and the completion of the project (2 Kgs 6:1, 37) and describes the dimensions of the building and its tripartite structure. The Temple was to have a porch, a nave, and a "holy of holies." The latter was a windowless room that was to contain the ark of the covenant, the symbol of the divine presence. In the holy of holies, there were to be two cherubim (1 Kgs 6:23–28). A cherub was a mythical creature that had the face of a human being, the forequarters of a lion, the hindquarters of an ox, and the wings of an eagle. Their purpose was to protect holy places. The ark of the covenant was to be set between the two cherubim.

The book clearly wants readers to think of the Temple as a most impressive building. Solomon spared no expense in its construction and ornamentation. He overlaid the entire structure with gold (1 Kgs 6:22). At the same time, however, the book offers an explanation for the eventual destruction of this singular structure. It presents God as warning Solomon that God will never forsake Israel, the dynasty, or the Temple if he keeps the commandments (1 Kgs 6:12). Kings will describe how Solomon and most of Israel's kings failed, leaving God to abandon the Temple that Solomon built.

The book inserts a short description of five other structures that it credits to Solomon's building activity (1 Kgs 7:1–12), implying that as much as the Temple was designed to show that the LORD was a great God; the other buildings Solomon had built were designed to show that Solomon was a great king. These five structures were the "House of the Forest of Lebanon," which was larger than the Temple, the "Porch of Columns," the "Porch of the Throne" ("Porch of Judgment"), and palaces for himself and for the pharaoh's daughter. Completing these projects took almost double the time it took to build the Temple (1 Kgs 6:38; 7:1). The text provides little information about the structures themselves, and archaeological excavation has not uncovered any of these buildings.

After mentioning Solomon's other projects, the book returns to the Temple and describes some of its furnishings (1 Kgs 7:13–51). The artisan responsible for crafting these furnishings was named Hiram from Tyre. The Chronicler remembers him as Hiram (2 Chr 4:11) and Hiram-abi (2 Chr 2:12; 4:16). Of particular interest are the two bronze pillars (1 Kgs 7:15–22). Their appearance and function are difficult to reconstruct given the information in the text. They were probably symbolic because they did not support any part of the structure and because they were given names: Jachin and Boaz (v. 21) even though the text provides no hint as to their significance. The bronze sea (vv. 23–26), the wheeled stands (vv. 27–37), and the basins (vv. 38–39) testify to the need for large volumes of water that had to be kept in the Temple area to cleanse it from the contamination caused by the blood of the sacrifices offered there.

With the Temple and its furnishings completed, all is ready for the building's dedication. The book provides a narrative framework (1 Kgs 8:1–9; 62–66) for a lengthy prayer that Solomon offered at the dedication. The framework describes the transfer of the ark to the newly built Temple and the sacrifices offered there for the first time. The prayer, however, seems to prepare the reader for a world without a temple. The words of the prayer are, at times, in conflict with each other. Verses 10–13 speak about God's presence in the Temple while v. 27 asserts that God cannot be contained in the building that Solomon had just built. The prayer also appears to transform the Temple from a place of sacrificial offerings (vv. 5 and 66) into a place of prayer where Israelite and non-Israelite alike can ask for forgiveness (vv. 42–43). Indeed, one does not even need to be present in the Temple to be heard by God. All that is necessary is that one pray in the direction of Jerusalem and its Temple (vv. 38, 48; see Dn 6:11). The author of Kings composed this prayer to help his readers cope with the loss of the Temple.

The book uses another speech to reiterate its explanation for the disastrous end of the Davidic dynasty and the destruction of the Temple (1 Kgs 9:1–9). After all, the prayer of Solomon had just praised God for fulfilling the promise to David (1 Kgs 8:14–29) and celebrated the dedication of the Temple. God appeared to Solomon and warned him that the future of the dynasty and the Temple depended on the fidelity of Israel's kings to the commandments and on Israel's exclusive loyalty to its ancestral deity. The conclusion is obvious: the destruction of the Temple and the end of the dynasty did not occur because of any lack of fidelity on God's part. The people of Israel and their kings bear full responsibility for the fall of the two Israelite states and the exile of their people. Of course, the book wants its readers to recognize that the converse is true as well: obedience will bring God's blessing to the people and their land.

The book brings its treatment of the Temple to a close by mentioning some of economic and personnel issues (1 Kgs 9:10–25). The assistance that Hiram, the king of Tyre, gave to Solomon in completing his building projects came at a price. Solomon ceded twenty cities along the Galilean border with Tyre to Hiram. Also, the labor for the projects was supplied not by Israelites but by prisoners of war. The issue of forced labor proved to be one that undermined the relations between the king and people. Even though 1 Kings 5:27 suggests that Solomon got skilled workers for the Temple project from Israel, 1 Kings 9:20 asserts that the laborers came from non-Israelite prisoners of war. The Millo mentioned in 1 Kings 9:24 was probably a structure that supported the terrace work that allowed building on the steep grades of the Ophel hill on which monarchic period Jerusalem was built.

Next, the book describes the splendor of Solomon's reign by focusing on his wealth, wisdom, and military might (1 Kgs 9:26–10:29). Eleven times the text mentions the gold that the king amassed. It also notes that the queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem because of Solomon's renown as a sage. Sheba was located at the southwestern corner of the Arabian peninsula and was likely one of Judah's trading partners. Goods passed between these two countries through the Red Sea port at Elath (Eilat) and Ezion-geber, which was likely a nearby island in the Gulf of Eilat (Aqaba). The location of Ophir is not known, but the context suggests that it was in Arabia.

From the book's perspective, the luster of all Solomon's achievements was tarnished by his failure to support the worship of the LORD alone. The reason offered for Solomon's infidelity was his marriage to non-Israelite women. The book is trying, of course, to promote marriage within the Judahite community as one way to maintain Judahite identity. To show the seriousness of Solomon's failure, the text has God speak to Solomon for a third and final time, announcing the end of the Davidic-Solomonic kingdom and the rise of another Israelite national state, which will occur after Solomon's death (1 Kgs 11:1–13).

Kings concludes its story of Solomon's reign by mentioning three of Solomon's rivals (1 Kgs 11:14–40). The first is Hadad, king of Edom. Judah and Edom were perennial rivals for control of the southern part of the region. The second was Rezon who was king of Damascus, the capital of Aram. Israel and Aram struggled for many years for hegemony in the northern part of the region. The most serious threat, however, was an internal one. Jeroboam, one of Solomon's administrators, supported by Egypt and, with prophetic designation, threatened the rule of the Davidic dynasty. Although the rebellion was not successful at first, the book explains the origins of the two Israelite national states, Israel and Judah, as a consequence of Jeroboam's attempt to replace Solomon, who simply failed to observe the commandments and to worship the LORD alone. It is important to note that the book asserts that despite Jeroboam, the Davidic dynasty continued in existence not only for the sake of David but also for the sake of Jerusalem. That city was destined to take on paramount importance for Judaism. The Temple, however, is not mentioned specifically. Also significant is the role played by the prophet Ahijah (vv. 29–39), who like Samuel, pronounced words of judgment on the king. The book again was suggesting that Israel listen to the prophets sent to it.

Like the reigns of his predecessors Saul and David, Solomon's began with great promise but ended with an unfavorable picture of the king thus presaging the story of the people of Israel in their land. The book notes that Solomon was buried in the City of David after a reign of forty years and was succeeded by his son Rehoboam.

The Two Kingdoms (1 Kgs 12:1–2 Kgs 17:41)

The two Israelite national states probably arose in Canaan sometime in the ninth century BC. Historians still have not arrived at a consensus as to the developments that led to their establishment. The book, however, describes the origins of the two Israelite states as the result of divine judgment on Solomon's rule, communicated by the prophet Ahijah. What Ahijah foretold was fulfilled almost immediately after Solomon's death and the accession of his son Rehoboam. But as it did with the origins of the monarchy, the book describes the origins of the two Israelite national states in economic as well as religious terms (1 Kgs 12:1–25). Rehoboam refused to lighten the economic burdens that Solomon imposed on his subjects, and before Rehoboam was able to consolidate his hold on his father's realm, there was a revolution, which led to the establishment of the Kingdom of Israel separate from the Kingdom of Judah. When Rehoboam attempted to use military force against the rebellion, he was dissuaded by a word from the LORD given through the "man of God," Shemaiah (vv. 22–24).

While Kings implies that the Israelites had legitimate grievances, it does not approve of religious practices of the Kingdom of Israel. First Kings criticizes them as obscuring the unity of Israel's ancestral deity, as violating the prohibition of images, and as ignoring the place that God chose. The book presents Jeroboam's fear that the Jerusalem Temple will be a magnet drawing the people to Jerusalem and to the Davidic dynasty. To counter this, he built cultic centers at Dan at the extreme north of his kingdom and at Bethel in the extreme south (1 Kgs 12:26–33). The book makes its attitude toward these cultic centers absolutely clear when it depicts an unnamed "man of God" from Judah condemning the shrine at Bethel (1 Kgs 13:1–10). As the story of the Northern Kingdom unfolds, every king of Israel will be condemned for maintaining these shrines and continuing "the sin of Jeroboam."

This man of God left Bethel because God had told him to eat or drink nothing there but to return to Judah. On his way home, he met an unnamed prophet who convinced him to return to Bethel and enjoy his hospitality. Because he disobeyed God's instructions, the man of God from Judah died a violent death. But the prophet from Bethel lied to the man of God in convincing him to accept hospitality (1 Kgs 13:11–32). Here the book exposes a practical problem connected with prophecy: How does one know whether a prophet is actually speaking in the name of God? The book wants its readers to recognize that the written authoritative Torah (Deuteronomy) is the authentic, reliable, and unambiguous statement of God's will for Israel.

Kings concludes its treatment of Jeroboam by revisiting the theme of succession (1 Kgs 14:1–20). Abijah, Jeroboam's heir, fell ill and Jeroboam had his wife visit the prophet Ahijah in order to elicit a favorable oracle on behalf of the child. The prophet, however, predicted not only that the child was to die but also that Jeroboam's dynasty would end violently. Ahijah's speech is an intense and sometimes vulgar invective. While the prophet was not specific about Jeroboam's failures, he was quite specific about the king's future and that of the nation. He even blamed the exile on Jeroboam (v. 16).

The book intertwines narratives about the kings of the two Israelite nation-states until it tells of the fall of the Northern Kingdom to the Assyrians in 2 Kings 17. The two Israelite kingdoms were rivals at first. Disputes over the border that they shared were almost continuous. The book notes that Israel and Judah fought each other during the reigns of Jeroboam and Rehoboam (1 Kgs 14:30). Rehoboam also had to deal with a raid by Pharaoh Shishak, who had given asylum to Jeroboam during the reign of Solomon (1 Kgs 11:40). While the Egyptians were not in a position to reestablish the hegemony over the region, they raided 154 towns in the two kingdoms. Jerusalem was spared only because Rehoboam paid a large indemnity to Shishak (1 Kgs 14:26). All this happened to the Kingdom of Judah because Rehoboam's reign was a time of apostasy (1 Kgs 14:21–24).

The border wars between the two Israelite kingdoms continued during the reign of Abijah in Judah (1 Kgs 15:6–7). The book provides no other information about Abijah's short reign except to note that he was nothing like David, whom the book begins to idealize, although it mentions David's lapse "in the case of Uriah" (1 Kgs 15:5; see 2 Sm 11). The book devotes more attention to Asa, Abijah's son. He is one of the few kings of Judah whom the book commends because of his actions to rid Judah of non-Yahwistic worship. Asa also induced the Arameans to invade the Northern Kingdom. With the army of Israel occupied with the Arameans, Asa had a free hand to extend the border to Mizpah, a town about five miles north of Jerusalem. The border remained there until the fall of the Northern Kingdom in 721 BC.

The book next turns its attention to the Northern Kingdom for almost the rest of 1 Kings (15:25–22:40). After Jeroboam's twenty-two-year reign, the political situation in the north became unstable. Nadab, Jeroboam's son and successor, was assassinated in the course of a war with the Philistines. The coup was led by Baasha, who purged Jeroboam's entire family in order to secure his own accession to the throne. The book sees this as a fulfillment of Ahijah's prophecy (1 Kgs 14:10) and a consequence of Nadab's infidelity. Baasha proved to be no improvement over Nadab though he did manage to hold the throne for twenty-four years (15:33–16:7). Kings notes that a prophet named Jehu announced the end of Baasha's dynasty (16:1–5, 7) just as Ahijah announced the end of Jeroboam's dynasty. Jehu's words were fulfilled as Baasha's son and successor Elah was assassinated during a military coup after just two years on the throne. Zimri, the leader of the coup, purged all the descendants of Baasha to solidify his claim to the throne (16:8–14). Omri, another Israelite general, decided to lead a coup of his own. His success led Zimri to take his life after a reign of just seven days. The book suggests Zimri's fate was the consequence of his religious infidelity. After a short civil war (1 Kgs 16:21–22), Omri became king of Israel.

Although 1 Kings generally ignores Omri (1 Kgs 17:23–28), he was arguably the most able ruler of the Northern Kingdom. His reign reversed Israel's fortunes. He ended the Aramean threat. He revived Israel's commercial fortunes by aligning himself with Phoenicia, sealing the alliance with the marriage of his son Ahab with Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Sidon. Omri ended the fifty years of fruitless conflict with Judah. He subjugated Moab, and this brought the King's Highway, a major commercial highway east of the Jordan, under his control. The dynasty he established lasted four generations, providing a measure of stability to Israel. All this brought a new era of peace and prosperity to the Northern Kingdom. While Kings ignores these achievements because they do not correspond with its theological purpose, it does note that Omri established his capital at Samaria where Omri was buried (1 Kgs 16:24, 28).

Ahab succeeded his father, Omri. From a military, economic, and political perspective, Ahab's reign was remarkably successful. His only defeat was the loss of Moab toward the end of his twenty-two-year reign. Excavations at several cities in the north show that Ahab's reign was one of economic growth and military strength. His greatest military achievement took place at the battle of Qarqar, which the book ignores. Ahab led a coalition of small states that successfully engaged the Assyrians and prevented them from taking control of the region. Ahab led the largest force in the coalition. The book chooses to focus on Ahab's serious internal problems by introducing several stories about the prophets Elijah and Elisha. Both prophets were highly critical of the religious and social policies of Ahab and his successors.

Kings implies that Ahab's problems were caused by his Phoenician wife Jezebel, who promoted the worship of Baal. The prophet Elijah forcefully opposed her. The conflict between Elijah and Ahab over Jezebel's activity dominates the portrait of Ahab in the Bible and makes it appear as if he were a weak and ineffective ruler when the opposite was true. The worship of Baal was attractive because Baal was thought to provide the rain that made Israel's survival on its land possible. To show that Baal was unable to provide rain, Elijah announced a drought (1 Kgs 17:1). The LORD's power to provide is obvious when a dry river bed yielded water for the prophet, and ravens brought him food. When the stream dried up again, the prophet went to beg in a Sidonian town. A poor widow from that town who took pity on the prophet never ran out of food despite the famine induced by the drought (1 Kgs 17:2–16). An even more remarkable demonstration of God's power occurred when the prophet brought the widow's deceased son back to life (1 Kgs 17:17–24).

Elijah finally met Ahab, who blamed the prophet for the drought. But the reader knows that the fault lies with Ahab. While the confrontation with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel is another indication of the power of Israel's God (1 Kgs 18:20–40), it is the prophet's prayer for rain that brought relief to the suffering people (1 Kgs 18:41–46). The rain that comes on the land does not end the tension in the story because Jezebel was determined to avenge Elijah's victory at Mount Carmel. The prophet fled to the south, stopping at Beersheba, a town on the northern fringe of the Negev. After a brief pause, Elijah continued his journey until he reached Horeb, which is the name the Deuteronomic tradition knows as Mount Sinai. At the place where the Israelites experienced God's presence in a most dramatic way (Dt 4:9–14), the prophet experienced only God's absence until he realized God was present in a "light silent sound" (1 Kgs 19:12). God then commissions the prophet to take specific steps to deal with the apostasy fomented by Israel's royal family. One of these steps is the anointing of a prophet to succeed him. Elijah found Elisha, whom the LORD had designated, and called him to his prophetic ministry (1 Kgs 19:13–21).

The book sets aside its narrative about Elijah and Elisha and interjects a story about an unnamed prophet who confronts Ahab during a war between Aram and Israel (1 Kgs 20:1–43). Aram, which was in southern Syria with its capital Damascus, was probably the most powerful kingdom in the region between the eleventh and eighth centuries BC. However, historians have had problems with the stories of a war between Aram and Israel during Ahab's reign. Both Ahab and Omri were powerful kings and were not dominated by the Arameans as suggested in this story (1 Kgs 20:1–9, 34). The details of the story reflect the relations between Aram and Israel that were characteristic of the reigns of Jehoahaz and Jehoash fifty years later when Israel was much weaker politically and militarily. Though the book may have provided this story with an incorrect setting, its theological point is clear enough as it tells a tale similar to that of Saul and the Amalekite war in 1 Samuel 15. Both Saul and Ahab fail to heed the instructions given by a prophet and stand under divine judgment. The lesson is obvious: Israel must listen to the prophets sent to it if it is to have any future.

The book returns to the conflict between king and prophet as it tells the tale of Naboth's vineyard (1 Kgs 21:1–29). Again, it is Jezebel, Ahab's non-Israelite wife, who is responsible for the trouble. Ahab recognized that Naboth was within his rights in refusing to sell the king his vineyard. Jezebel, however, co-opted the elders of Naboth's city into convicting him of trumped-up charges of blasphemy and treason. Naboth is executed and his property forfeited to the crown so Jezebel was able to present her husband with Naboth's vineyard. Elijah then condemned this blatant injustice in God's name. Surprisingly, Ahab repented upon hearing the prophet's words of judgment and so God spared his life. Again, the book's message is obvious: if Israel listens to the prophets God sends to it, Israel's life will be spared as well.

But just as the book finished commending the prophetic word to Israel, it shows that discerning that word is not a simple matter. To do so the book describes preparations for a second war between Israel and Aram during the waning years of Ahab's reign (1 Kgs 22:1–28). This time Ahab sought help from Jehoshaphat, the king of Judah. Relations between the two Israelite states had steadily improved since the time of Ahab's father, Omri. Indeed, Ahab offered his daughter in marriage to Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son (2 Kgs 8:18). The king of Judah, however, suggested seeking a word from God before embarking on any campaign against the powerful Arameans. Ahab assembled four hundred prophets to impress Jehoshaphat. After the four hundred encourage an attack, Jehoshaphat—apparently reluctant to fight the Arameans—asked if there were any more prophets who may be consulted. Ahab summoned Micaiah ben Imlah who predicted an Aramean victory. Micaiah asserted that God put a “lying spirit” in the four hundred prophets to insure that Ahab would be defeated. How then could prophecy be a reliable guide if God can inspire prophets to lie? The book assumes that the one reliable and unimpeachable guide to Israel's life is the written, authoritative Torah, the book of Deuteronomy. The attitude of Kings toward Ahab is evident from the description of what happened when Ahab's chariot was cleansed of the fallen king's blood (1 Kgs 22:38).

The book returns briefly to the Judahite monarchy and gives a qualified commendation to Jehoshaphat, who followed the good example of his father, Asa. The book also notes that Jehoshaphat was “at peace” with Israel though it also claims that the king led Judah bravely in some wars but gives no details (1 Kgs 15:45–46).

The story of Ahaziah of Israel straddles 1 and 2 Kings. Since he reigned for a little more than one year, the book gives just a brief and disapproving summary of his rule, emphasizing his promotion of Baal worship (1 Kgs 22:52–54). The first chapter of 2 Kings offers an illustration of Ahaziah's apostasy (2 Kgs 1:2–6). The king sought an oracle from the Baal worshiped at Ekron. When Elijah intercepted the king's messengers and proclaimed an oracle from the God of Israel, Ahaziah sought to arrest him. But the conflict between king and prophet was no real match (2 Kgs 1:7–16). The book is building up its case showing the failure of the monarchy. It wants to show that the political disasters that befell both Israelite kingdoms were a direct result of the apostasy of their kings (see Dt 4:25–28).

The book presents the prophets as the foils of Israel's apostate kings; after describing the failures of Ahab and his son Ahaziah, it turns attention back to Elijah and Elisha and describes the transition from the prophetic ministry of the former to that of the latter (2 Kgs 2:1–18). The narrative is purposely reminiscent of the traditions regarding the transition in the leadership of the Israelite community from Moses to Joshua. The book sees the succession of Elisha to the prophetic ministry as a genuine act of God.

Perhaps a story with the spectacular details that this one has served to show that Elisha was a true witness to the God of Israel as was Elijah in contrast to the prophets that supported the house of Ahab (see 2 Kgs 3:13). Fifty “guild prophets” witness the passing of the prophetic mantle to Elisha (2 Kgs 2:15). Except for 1 Kings 20:35, these prophets are always mentioned in connection with Elisha and may have been his supporters against the king and his prophets. The book concludes its introduction to the cycle of stories about Elisha by telling two tales which serve to encourage Israel to obey the prophets sent to it (2 Kgs 2:19–25).

The book shifts its attention to Ahab’s sons and successors again. After the short reign of the childless Ahaziah, his brother Jehoram became king of Israel (2 Kgs 3:1–3). While Kings asserts that Moab’s revolt took place during Jehoram’s reign, it more likely took place during Ahab’s final years. Jehoram was simply unsuccessful in returning Moab to Israelite control. Moab was a kingdom located east of the Dead Sea and west of the Arabian desert. It had been a vassal to Israel since the time of Omri. The Mesha stele, a monument celebrating Moab’s victory over Israel, gives an account of this revolt from the Moabite perspective. Though both the biblical and Moabite accounts agree that Mesha, the king of Moab, was successful in regaining his country’s independence, the book provides little historical information but a clear theological interpretation. It insists that apostasy always brings defeat. The extent of the territory under Israelite control was a tangible indication of God’s blessings according to the book, and the success of Mesha’s revolt and the consequent loss of Moab show that Israel was on a downward spiral because of the nation’s infidelity (2 Kgs 3:4–27).

The book again shifts the focus of its story away from kings and international political conflicts to ordinary folk in need—people whose names are never given (2 Kgs 4:1–44). Elisha, whom this chapter refers to as a “man of God,” responds to those needs with compassion. While the effect on the reader is to wonder at the miracle-working power of Elisha, the stories do not even hint that the man of God worked these miracles to establish his reputation. The book implies that Elisha did what the kings were supposed to do, respond to the needs of the lowly and poor. In fact, the reason ordinary people were in need was the economic and political policies of the monarchy. God redresses this injustice through Elisha. The prophetic task is not simply to speak words of judgment on injustice but to undo the effects of the greed that creates poverty.

With the story of Naaman, Elisha moves back into the arena of international politics (2 Kgs 5:1–19). This is the second time the book has told a tale of someone searching for healing in a foreign country. In 2 Kings 1, it was King Ahaziah of Israel looking for healing in Ekron from Baal-zebub. In 2 Kings 5, it is Naaman from Aram who looks for healing in Israel. Whereas the healings in 2 Kings 4 took place because of Elisha's compassion for those in need, here there is an overt apologetic purpose: Naaman is to learn that there was a prophet in Israel who can heal in the name of Israel's God. The Aramean general learned this lesson. There is also a homiletic character to the story as Naaman is a model for Israel. Although reluctant at first, the Aramean general obeyed the prophet and was healed. Israel surely should obey the prophets sent to it.

Two more stories with a clear homiletic thrust follow (2 Kgs 5:20–6:7). Both concern the prophet's followers. In the first, Gehazi sought to reap a monetary profit from his association with Elisha and is duly punished for his avarice. In the second, Elisha's supporters find themselves in an embarrassing situation, which the prophet resolves. The book warns against venality. Though the story of Naaman presupposes that there was peace between Aram and Israel, the book asserts that the situation changed as it describes two incidents between Israel and its neighbor to the north. The first shows that of itself Aram posed no danger to Israel (2 Kgs 6:8–23). The prophet made the Arameans look foolish as he led them into Samaria. Fortunately for them, the prophet told the king to spare the lives of his prisoners.

The circumstances change abruptly in the story of Ben-hadad's siege of Samaria (2 Kgs 6:24–33). Besieging a city sought to force its surrender by cutting off the supply of food. Ben-hadad's siege of the Israelite capital was working as is evident from the horrific details that the book gives (vv. 28–29). The apostasy of Omri and his successors is having its full effect as Aram jeopardized Israel's very existence. The king, of course, did not recognize his own responsibility for Samaria's troubles; he blamed Elisha whom the book describes as cowering behind a closed door in fear of the king's anger. The Aramean threat was a harbinger of things to come. For the book, Aram is an instrument of divine judgment on Israel's apostasy—apostasy that continued without abatement. But Israel's time had not yet come, so 2 Kings 7:1–20 tells of the lifting of the Aramean siege of Samaria. The book makes it clear that the lifting of the siege and the relief of Samaria were not the work of Israel's military. God's power lifted the siege, and four lepers (by sheer happenstance) open the way to the city's relief from the famine. The book shows readers that Israel's God shapes human events through the prophetic word. Just as easily as God made Aram a threat to Israel, God removed that threat. This is another hint to the book's first readers that God can end their exile.

The epilogue to the story of Elisha and the woman of Shunem (2 Kgs 8:1–6; see 2 Kgs 4:8–37) is unusual on two counts. First, the prophet does not directly solve her problem. In fact, she is suffering economic privation precisely because she followed the prophet's instructions to relocate from Israel. Upon returning, she found her property had been confiscated. Still, just the power of the prophet's fame was enough to solve her problem. Second, it was the king who restored the woman's property. For once, an Israelite king did act for the benefit of those in need. The book illustrates the power of God to extricate people from difficult situations. That power is such that it can lead people to act contrary to their normal patterns to bring about the fulfillment of the divine will. In a sense, the woman of Shunem is Israel in microcosm. She experienced exile, loss, and eventually restoration. What happened to her, the book implies, can happen to Israel as well. It too can experience restoration after exile.

The book introduces a new character into its story of the Northern Kingdom and its kings: Hazael who was to become king of Aram and a very serious problem for both Israel and Judah (2 Kgs 8:7–15). Hazael was an emissary sent to seek a positive oracle for Ben-hadad, the king of Aram, who was dying. In the course of giving this oracle, the prophet became aware of the great problems Hazael would cause the Israelite kingdoms. Hazael appears to be surprised by the prophet's words. Hazael's succession was indeed irregular: he did not belong to the royal family but usurped the throne of Aram following Ben-hadad's death.

For the first time in 2 Kings, the book turns its attention to Judah as it offers judgment on the reign of Joram (Jehoram) (2 Kgs 8:16–25). The relations between Judah and Israel were peaceful, sealed by the marriage of Jehoram to Athaliah, a daughter of Ahab. Certainly in any alliance between the two kingdoms, Judah was the junior partner. The book notes that Jehoram replicated the behavior of the kings of Israel. This brought serious consequences for Judah. As Israel lost control over Moab (2 Kgs 3) so Judah's domination of Edom came to an end. The power of the Israelite kingdoms was steadily diminishing. For the book this was an obvious sign of God's displeasure with Israel, Judah, and their kings. Jehoram of Judah died after only eight years as king, leaving his twenty-one-year-old son Ahaziah to ascend David's throne. Ahaziah was a brother-in-law to Jehoram of Israel. The two kings decided to strike the Arameans under Hazael because of the threat that the Arameans posed. But Jehoram was severely wounded in battle and went to Jezreel to recover. Ahaziah went there to visit him (2 Kgs 8:25–29). In providing these details, the book is setting the scene for the violent end that will come to the dynasty established by Omri.

To illustrate the disintegration of the Kingdom of Israel, the book describes a revolution that brought an end to the House of Omri (2 Kgs 9:1–10:22)—a revolution so bloody that it was still remembered with horror a century later (see Hos 1:4–5). According to Kings, Jehu's revolution was set in motion by the apostasy and injustice practiced by Israel's kings and the terrible end of these kings reflects the prophetic judgment on their actions (1 Kgs 14:11; 16:4; 21:19–24). The book then presents Jehu's revolution not in political but theological terms; it begins with the prophet Elisha's naming of Jehu, an officer in Jehoram's army, as the one to replace the king. After Jehu assassinated Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah, he turned to Jezebel, who taunted him as no better than Zimri, the assassin who was king of Israel for only seven days (see 1 Kgs 16:15–19). Jezebel shared the fate of her son Jehoram at Jehu's hand (2 Kgs 9:1–27).

Because Jehu was a usurper, he had to eliminate claimants to the throne with better credentials. His revolutionary goals were to take Jehoram's place on the throne and end the foreign religious practices in the Kingdom of Israel. To secure his throne, Jehu purged the entire royal family (10:1–11, 15–17), and to eliminate foreign influence he killed the prophets of Baal and destroyed their temple (10:18–28). Because he also killed Ahaziah of Judah, Jehu also had to deal with a force from the Southern Kingdom seeking to avenge Ahaziah. But the book does not tell the story of Jehu's action to give an accurate picture of the progress of his revolution. The book wishes to describe the religious significance of that revolution. From this perspective, for all his brutal thoroughness, Jehu was a failure. He did not follow the LORD when he was king but followed the pattern of apostasy as set by Jeroboam. Because of this sin, Jehu did not stop Israel's slide to oblivion. Like his predecessors, Jehu witnessed Israel's power diminishing.

More territory was lost—probably to Aram. Israel’s doom was just a matter of time (2 Kgs 10:29–36).

Then the book shows that the baleful influence of the house of Ahab was not limited to the Northern Kingdom. The queen mother in Judah was Athaliah, Ahab’s daughter. She was given in marriage to Jehoram, the crown prince of Judah, ending the tensions between the two Israelite kingdoms. When Athaliah’s son, Ahaziah, was assassinated in the course of Jehu’s revolt, she decided to seize absolute power in Jerusalem. Because like Jehu, she was a usurper, she had to eliminate all potential rivals for power so she had all the males from the Davidic dynasty killed (2 Kgs 1:1). Ahaziah’s son Joash was saved by his aunt Jehosheba and escaped the massacre orchestrated by his grandmother Athaliah. During her seventh year on the throne, Athaliah was assassinated in the course of a revolution led by Jehoiada, a priest. The temple of Baal that Athaliah built in Jerusalem was torn down, and the unprecedented rule of a woman (and a non-Davidide) over Judah ended. Joash was enthroned in place of his assassinated grandmother. The book notes that endorsement for Joash came from the people in rural areas. Jerusalem’s population had evidently been co-opted by Athaliah and made no effort to support the new king (2 Kgs 11:20).

Since Joash was placed on the throne by a priest, it is not surprising that he concerns himself with restoration of the Temple of Jerusalem, which probably suffered from neglect during Athaliah’s reign. Still, it is important to note that the “royal scribe” oversaw the financing of the project (2 Kgs 12:11). This is the first attempt putting more control of the Temple and its affairs in the hand of the king. Hezekiah and Josiah will continue the policy. Though Joash developed an efficient way to finance the maintenance of the Temple, his efforts were wasted since he had to pay a heavy indemnity to Hazael, who threatened Jerusalem. Nothing else is told of this king’s forty-year reign except that he was assassinated by his own courtiers. With three successive rulers assassinated, the stability of the Judahite state was seriously undermined. The book implies that the future of the Judahite state was in question.

The downward spiral of the Kingdom of Israel continued during the seventeen-year reign of Jehoahaz (2 Kgs 13:1–9). Almost constant warfare between Israel and Aram led to the severe depletion of Israel’s army (v. 7). Total disaster was averted by an unidentified “savior” (v. 5). It is likely that this savior came in the form of the Assyrian army that invaded Aram at the end of the ninth century, easing the pressure on Israel. With this account of Israel's deteriorating military power, the book begins its description of the fall of the house of Jehu. The end of Jehu's dynasty is inevitable because of the continuing apostasy of Israel's kings (v. 2).

Israel enjoyed a temporary respite from the military reverses it experienced at the hand of the Arameans during the reign of Joash (Jehoash) (2 Kgs 13:10–35). Before Elisha died, he predicted a revival of Israel's military fortunes. The short note about the revival of a corpse that touched the bones of the dead prophet (v. 21) illustrates how the prophetic word can bring life to the sick body of Israel because God's saving will did not wish to bring the full force of judgment upon God's people. Tangible proofs of that were the victories of Jehoash and his recovery of Israelite territory lost to Aram.

The book's attention refocuses on Judah, which fared poorly during the reign of Amaziah (2 Kgs 14:1–22). The king did merit qualified praise for his loyalty to God, but worship at the high places, which the book regarded as improper, continued during his rule. While the king was good, he was not good enough to insure Judah's success in the political and military sphere, which the book uses as a benchmark indicating the nation's standing before God. Amaziah was successful in bringing Edom back under Judahite domination, but when he turned his attention to the north, he was unsuccessful. He was defeated by Israel and made a prison of war. He witnessed the army of the Israelite forces partially destroy Jerusalem's walls and the sack the Temple. His folly in starting a war with the more powerful Northern Kingdom led finally to Amaziah's assassination. The Southern Kingdom's disintegration continued.

The book dismisses the forty-year reign of Jeroboam II in a few verses, but it cannot ignore it completely (2 Kgs 14:23–29). Jeroboam has notable success in expanding the boundaries of the Kingdom of Israel, which the book usually considers a sign of God's blessing. Here it asserts that Jeroboam's success was the fulfillment of a prophetic word given by Jonah. Although there is a book ascribed to Jonah in the collection of the prophets, the oracle given to Jeroboam is not preserved in that book or anywhere in the Bible. Kings goes on to explain the anomalous success of Jeroboam by claiming that it was the result of God's compassion on Israel (vv. 26–27). Jeroboam's reign is often described as a time of peace and prosperity, but that not all people benefitted is clear from the books of Amos and Hosea. The ministries of these prophets took place during Jeroboam's reign. The expansion of Israel's territory had to come by way of war, the personal and financial costs of which had to be borne by those who could little afford to do so. His building projects put a strain on the country's resources, which eventually led to the severe economic problems that Israel faced following Jeroboam's death. The chasm between rich and poor grew during Jeroboam's time.

Like Jeroboam II, Azariah of Judah enjoyed a very long reign; it was, however, marred by a skin disease that rendered him unable to perform rituals reserved only to the king (2 Kgs 15:1–7). His son Jotham assumed many of Azariah's duties. Although the book praises Azariah, this praise is tempered by the comment that he did nothing about the high places that the book considered illegitimate. Under Azariah, the Kingdom of Judah enjoyed a resurgence, which the book chooses to ignore since it does not reflect its notion of the direction Judah is heading.

Following the long reign of Jeroboam II, the Northern Kingdom began a rush to its total collapse. The text gives little more than the basic outline of a nation devolving into political chaos in the final years of its existence. Zechariah, Jeroboam's son and successor, is barely able to hold the throne for six months before he is assassinated (2 Kgs 15:8–12). Shallum, Zechariah's assassin, managed to rule for only one month before his assassination by Menahem, whose ruthlessness kept him on the throne for ten years (2 Kgs 15:13–16). During Menahem's reign, Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria, which the text calls Pul (2 Kgs 15:9), began Assyria's expansion at Israel's expense (2 Kgs 15:17–22). Pekahiah, Menahem's son, ruled for only two years before his assassination by Pekah (2 Kgs 15:23–26). It was during Pekah's reign that the Assyrians began dismantling the Northern Kingdom. He, too, was assassinated after a twenty-year reign by Hoshea who was destined to be the last in the line that began with Jeroboam I. The book provides few details about the reigns of these five kings because it is more interested in the fate of Israel as a nation whose doom it describes. The five kings each receive the usual condemnation that is given to all the kings of the north, and their individual fates presage the disaster that Northern Kingdom will experience.

The book has to break off its account of Israel's final years to tell the story of the last conflict between Israel and Judah. Pekah formed a coalition with Aram, Israel's chief rival in the Levant, to deal with a common threat, Assyria, whose expansionism and militarism imperiled them both. Pekah tried to enlist Judah in the coalition but Jotham resisted while Kings insists that it was God who led Aram and Israel against Judah. Before the issue was decided, Jotham died (2 Kgs 15:32–38). Jotham's son Ahaz is left to deal with the crisis.

The book has no regard for Ahaz, condemning him without reservation (2 Kgs 16:1–20). Ahaz's desperation in the face of the invasion by the combined forces of Aram and Israel is evident from his resorting to child sacrifice as a way to gain divine favor. Ahaz's situation was grievous because he had to face hostilities on two fronts since the Edomites were moving in the south (v. 6), and Aram and Israel were coming from the north. This military pressure led Ahaz to align himself with Tiglath-pileser to whom he paid a large indemnity. The Assyrian king quickly put an end to the coalition seeking to depose Ahaz. Kings then describes in great detail changes that Ahaz made to the Temple and its altar, which was Aramean in design. These are regarded as acts of apostasy (vv. 10–20).

With the account of Ahaz's reign completed, the book returns to Israel, which was on the brink of total collapse. After narrating the events that led to end of Israel's political existence (2 Kgs 17:1–6), the book launches into a long editorial comment to explain the fall of the Northern Kingdom as a consequence of its failure to shape its national life on the basis of the Torah (2 Kgs 17:7–23). The Assyrians annexed the territory of the former Northern Kingdom into their provincial system. To pacify the region they led the prominent citizens of Israel into exile and brought in people from other regions of their empire to settle in what had been the Kingdom of Israel. The author of Kings maintains that the Samaritans of his day were the descendants of these foreign settlers and describes their patterns of worship as a hybrid of Yahwism and the worship of foreign deities (2 Kgs 17:24–41).

The Final Years of the Kingdom of Judah (2 Kgs 18:1–25:30)

After describing the fall of the Kingdom of Israel, 2 Kings chronicles the last years of the Kingdom of Judah. The book begins with the story of Hezekiah, a king that it greatly admired because of his obedience to the Torah and his destruction of the high places. Hezekiah was able to augment Judah's territories at the expense of the Philistines. In contrast to Israel in its final years, Judah and its king appeared to be prospering (2 Kgs 18:1–12). However, the Assyrians ended Hezekiah's peace by invading Judah and besieging Jerusalem. Although Hezekiah offered an indemnity to Sennacherib, the Assyrian king, the siege continued. Sennacherib demanded the surrender of Jerusalem, claiming that Judah's own patron deity had ordered him to conquer the country (2 Kgs 18:1–37, esp. v. 25).

In his despair, Hezekiah turned to the prophet Isaiah, who assured Hezekiah that Sennacherib would lift the siege and return to his country (v. 7). For reasons that are not clear to historians, the Assyrian army retreated. A year later Sennacherib was assassinated—just as the prophet suggested (2 Kgs 19:1–37). Of course, Kings sees the lifting of the siege as an act of God. The final episode in Hezekiah's story puts the king's reputation under a cloud. Though God healed him and promised him a longer reign, Hezekiah wanted proof that the promises made to him by Isaiah would be fulfilled. The arrival of an ambassador from Babylon gave Isaiah the opportunity to announce Judah's approaching defeat and exile. Instead of this announcement moving Hezekiah to repentance, the king expresses relief that the disaster will come after he is gone. It is as if Hezekiah learned nothing from the near disaster brought about by the Assyrians (2 Kgs 20:1–21).

Hezekiah was succeeded by his son Manasseh. From Deuteronomist's point of view, Judah never fell so low as it did during the fifty-five-year reign of this king (2 Kgs 21). The book accuses Manasseh of apostasy, idolatry, and murder, and explicitly identifies him as the Judahite Ahab, leading the Southern Kingdom to disaster as Ahab had in the Northern Kingdom. Unnamed prophets pronounced divine judgment on Manasseh's actions. There is no doubt that Manasseh kept his throne by demonstrating his loyalty to the Assyrians, in part by introducing Assyrian religious rituals to the Jerusalem Temple. He also had to be ruthless in preventing a nationalistic spirit to express itself in open revolt against the Assyrians. The book offers no reason for Manasseh's great apostasy, letting the king's actions speak for themselves. The consequences of his actions could not be set aside with an appeal to God's promises to the patriarchs or to David. Judah's fall is only a matter of time (2 Kgs 21:1–18). Second Chronicles tells of Manasseh's conversion (33:11–13).

Manasseh was succeeded by his son Amon, who continued his father's policy of submission to Assyria. This led to his assassination by his own courtiers. Evidently the assassination of yet another king provoked the ordinary folk, who supported the Davidic dynasty. They likely believed that another round of assassinations would be the end of Judah, so they killed the conspirators and installed Amon's young son, Josiah, as king (2 Kgs 21:19–26). It was during Josiah's reign that Judah made one last attempt at reform; it proved to be too late to avert divine judgment.

Josiah's reign was just a short pause as Judah moved to the inevitable (2 Kgs 22:1–23:30). Second Kings describes Josiah as a monarch who “did what was right in the LORD's sight” (2 Kgs 22:2). A critical event in Josiah's reign was the discovery of a book in the course of renovations that were being made on the Temple. Kings wishes its readers to assume that the “book of the law” was what we know as the book of Deuteronomy. Josiah responded to hearing the words of the book with a gesture of repentance. He had the book authenticated by a prophet. Even though Jeremiah was active at this time, the prophet consulted was an otherwise unknown woman named Huldah. She authenticated the book but announced that the curses on the unfaithful found in the book will fall on Judah and Jerusalem but not in Josiah's time.

Fortunately for Josiah, he came into power about the time Assyria's control over the eastern Mediterranean region was waning; he moved quickly to reclaim Judah's sovereignty in matters of religion and politics. The book concentrates on Josiah's actions in the sphere of religious practice. The king took action against all types of religious activity that was non-Yahwistic and promoted such traditional practices as the Passover. His move into the north was likely prompted by a determination to take advantage of Assyria's weakness to extend the territory under his control. Josiah's attempts to reassert and expand Judahite sovereignty ended when he died during an ill-advised attempt to involve himself in international politics. He endeavored to stop the Egyptian army as it was advancing into Mesopotamia and was killed in battle. Josiah's “reform” died with him because Judah once again came under foreign domination. The Egyptians asserted their control over Judah by deposing Josiah's son and successor Jehoahaz, exiling him to Egypt. They placed another of Josiah's son, Eliakim, on the throne, changing his name to Jehoiakim (2 Kgs 23:31–35). Judah had to pay an indemnity to the Egyptians. This, of course, burdened Judah's economy, which had already been made fragile by the cost of Josiah's military adventures.

With no other choice, Jehoiakim remained a loyal Egyptian vassal until Nabuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptians in two decisive battles, ending Egyptian domination of the region. Judah then was forced to submit to Babylon. When Babylon's fortunes plunged temporarily, Jehoiakim came under Egyptian control again. But Babylon's fortunes soon revived, and Judah was forced to submit to Nabuchadnezzar a second time after a siege of Jerusalem, during which Jehoiakim died. Of course, the book sees all this political and military activity as an act of divine judgment on Judah (2 Kgs 23:36–24:7).

Jehoiachin succeeded his father just as the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem was about to end with the city's surrender and the sacking of the Temple. While Judah was able to maintain the appearance of sovereignty, it was more firmly under Babylon's control than ever. Jehoiachin was deposed and exiled along with many of Judah's leading citizens. The Babylonians placed Mattaniah, another of Josiah's brothers on the throne, and changed his name to Zedekiah. The book lets the events speak for themselves as Judah's final collapse appears to be imminent. Zedekiah was to be the last king of the Davidic line. He managed to keep his throne for eleven years. No longer able to resist calls to rebel against Babylonian domination, Zedekiah withheld tribute from Nabuchadnezzar, sealing the fate of the dynasty and the kingdom. The Babylonians responded to his rebellion by taking Jerusalem a second time, killing Zedekiah's sons, blinding the king, and leading him into exile. Zedekiah was never heard from again (2 Kgs 24:18–25:7).

Jerusalem also paid for Zedekiah's folly in revolting against Nabuchadnezzar. The city was put to the torch, and its Temple was left in ruins. Many of Jerusalem's leading citizens were executed, and the rest were deported to Babylon. Nabuchadnezzar completely reorganized the government of Judah. He appointed Gedaliah, who did not belong to the royal family, to administer what would become a new province of the Babylonian empire. He also moved Judah's administrative center from Jerusalem to Mizpah. Assassins led by a survivor of Judah's royal family killed Gedaliah along with his Judahite and Babylonian retainers. This led many Judahites, including Jeremiah, to seek refuge in Egypt, and those that remained were subject to a third deportation (see Jer 52:30; 2 Kgs 25:8–26). And so ends the story of Israel in its land.

As an epilogue, Kings mentions the parole of Jehoiachin from prison in Babylon (2 Kgs 25:27–30). Unfortunately, the book does not reflect on the significance of the exiled king's new status for Judah's future. At the most critical moment in his story, the author of Kings is inexplicably reticent, leaving the reader to wonder what will become of Judah and Jerusalem. Is the divine judgment brought on by Judah's failure to be loyal to the LORD and shape its life according to Torah final? Perhaps Jehoiachin's parole is a harbinger of Judah's rehabilitation. Unfortunately, the book does not give an explicit answer to these questions. The books of Kings end on a most ambiguous note, requiring readers to make sense out of a tragic tale.

Continuing Significance of the Books of Kings

Like the other books that make up the Deuteronomistic History of Israel, the books of Kings put in sharp focus the consequences of failing to remain absolutely committed to the LORD and to the pattern of life given to Israel in the book of Deuteronomy. What the books illustrate is a continuing pattern of failure to live responsibly. Although Kings focuses almost exclusively on the actions of the ruling class, it certainly intended its message for a wider audience. These books remind believers today that they bear a responsibility to act on the Word. Election offers no guarantees; rather, it calls believers to greater commitment. The books of Joshua to 2 Kings tell a sad and tragic story. What began with so much hope ends in disaster. It is not a pleasant story—especially in 2 Kings when it becomes clear that the two Israelite kingdoms are headed toward self-destruction. But the reader today knows that Jerusalem's fall, the end of the national state, and the collapse of all Judahite religious and political institutions were not the end of the story. God's mercy triumphed over God's justice, and a renewed Judah emerged from the exile. The story of Israel in its land makes it absolutely clear that God's moral demands must be taken seriously. Failing to do so brings disaster. But despite this, believers recognize that God is still love.

THE CHRONICLER'S HISTORY

RICHARD J. BAUTCH

1 CHRONICLES

THE CHRONICLER'S WORK

Written in the fourth century BC, 1 and 2 Chronicles originated as a unified work by a writer whom we today call the Chronicler. The division into two books occurred when the texts of the Hebrew Bible were translated, in the second or third century, into Greek for Jews living in the Diaspora. The Chronicler's work, moreover, is related to the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. Although the four books did not have common authorship, as was once thought, they are naturally grouped together. Read sequentially, the narrative of these four books begins with Adam and concludes in the fifth century in postexilic Judah.

Although Chronicles begins with Adam, it revisits none of the familiar stories found in Genesis. The first nine chapters of 1 Chronicles employ narrative material selectively. These initial chapters contain genealogical lists that the author, the Chronicler, created by using sources available to him. Within the listings of generations, the text intersperses accounts of how the tribes of Israel co-existed with one another and dealt with issues that arose among them (see the border dispute in 1 Chr 8:6). In all likelihood, the genealogical chapters touch on social and religious issues during the Second Temple period when the Chronicler was writing. After the genealogies, the narrative proper of 1 Chronicles begins with Saul's death and burial (10:1–14); the Chronicler indicates that a distinctly new chapter in Israel's story begins with the events of Saul's death and the subsequent rise of David to the throne in Jerusalem. The reign of David plays a prominent part in Chronicles.

About half of the material in Chronicles comes from the books of 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings. Like Samuel and Kings, the books of Chronicles describe and explain the rise and fall of the Israelite kingdoms, Judah (the Southern Kingdom) and Israel (the Northern Kingdom). For the Chronicler, the story of the past points as well to the future. Israel's religious institutions must have continuity with the past in order to flourish in the future. Foremost among these institutions are the Temple and the community itself. Israel must worship God in the Temple of Jerusalem according to the pattern set by David at God's direction, and the unity of Israel that distinguished it in the past must continue into the future. Both points reveal the Chronicler's unique perspective on salvation history from his vantage in the fourth century BC. On the one hand, the writer links renewal to the legitimate worship of the LORD in the Temple of Jerusalem under the direction of its priests and Levites. On the other hand, the Chronicler never refers to the Israelites' time outside the land of Israel. The narrative makes no mention of serving as slaves in Egypt and minimizes the impact of the split into two kingdoms, Judah and Israel. The split is minimized in order to advance the notion of a people unified over a long period of time in the land their God has provided for them. The people, in this view, signify all Israel (1 Chr 11:1; 13:6; 2 Chr 1:2; 6:3; 10:16; 18:16; 29:24), with the connotation of a unified or greater Israel.

Position in the Canon

The ancient Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, the Septuagint, titles the books of Chronicles Paraleipomena ("things that were not included"). Those responsible for the Septuagint may have considered Chronicles a kind of supplement to the books of Samuel and Kings, perhaps in the manner of Jewish midrash, a genre that involves the expansive rewriting of a prior text (Chronicles refers to "midrash" in 2 Chr 13:22, 24:27, and provides examples of it in 1 Chr 5:1–2, 27:23–24). If Chronicles were considered a supplement to or midrash on Samuel and Kings, it would explain why the Septuagint places Chronicles immediately following the books of Kings. Jerome also followed this order in the Vulgate (his Latin translation of the Bible). English Bibles used by both Protestant and Catholic Christians also follow this order, although the Jewish tradition takes a different approach.

The books of Chronicles are the last books in the Jewish Bible, which was arranged by the rabbis in antiquity. The rabbis began the biblical collection with the Torah or Pentateuch, which was followed by the prophetic books, since the prophets were understood to be the expositors of the Torah. (In the Hebrew Bible, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings are regarded as among the prophetic books.) The rabbinic Bible has a third division, called the Writings, which is a diverse collection of books that belong to neither the Torah nor the Prophets: 1 and 2 Chronicles are the last books of this collection. Specifically, the Hebrew Bible ends with the decree of the liberator Cyrus (2 Chr 36:23) that calls for the people of Judah to return to Jerusalem and rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem. Since the time of the Chronicler, religious Jews scattered throughout the world have found that the last words of their Bible were a call to return to Jerusalem.

Reading the Book

A broad overview of 1 Chronicles gives attention to three topics. The book begins with a genealogical introduction to Israel and its people; the first nine chapters (1:1–9:34) contain lists of generations that are integral to the Chronicler's work as a whole because they reveal the importance of kinship at this time. Also central to the Chronicler's purpose is the story of David, as narrated in the remainder of the book (9:35–29:30). David is cast as an authority figure who is foundational to the narrative of all Israel. After establishing David's Judahite lineage in the genealogies and relating the king's rise to power, the Chronicler idealizes David, and transforms him into the architect and sponsor of Jerusalem's Temple.

The Genealogical Lists (1 Chr 1:1–9:44)

The genealogies of Chronicles are more than an ancestral record from Adam (1:1) to the returnees from the Babylonian Exile (9:2–34). These lists had contemporary significance as well as religious functions. The author takes some of his genealogies from sources such as Genesis, which traces the descent from Adam to Abraham and his sons (1:1–27; see Gn 5; 10; 11). From there, the Chronicler's focus is on the twelve sons of Judah with source material drawn from Genesis 46 and Numbers 26. In these sections on the twelve sons or tribes, the Chronicler's unique perspective on history is also brought to bear. The clearest example is the remarkable fact that he supplies the genealogies of the northern tribes in chapters 1–9 as an indication that the Chronicler still considers them a part of Israel, despite their apostate behavior. The Chronicler includes a summary list of the sons of Israel in 2:1–2 to clarify that all Israel included the northern tribes, even the far northern tribes of Asher, Dan, Zebulun, and Naphtali.

Israel's preeminent tribe is Judah, a kinship unit in the South, and is synonymous with King David, its most celebrated member. There is a genealogy of Judah down to David and his relatives (2:3–17) along with lateral branches of the descendants of Judah (2:18–55; 4:1–23). The genealogy of David in 1 Chr 2:10–15 emphasizes his Judahite lineage by connecting him with Judah the patriarch through Ram and Salmah. David is king par excellence because of the influence of Judah, which is measured in different and sometimes surprising ways. The genealogy of Judah has been built in part through intermarriage with five different groups that appear to be non-Israelites or distant relations of the Israelites, from the Canaanites (1 Chr 2:3) to the Moabites (1 Chr 4:21–22). Moreover, the genealogies of Judah incorporate a number of individuals and clans who appear in other biblical sources as non-Israelites or only loosely related to the Israelites: the Calebites (2:46–47), Jerahmeelites (2:25), and Quenizites (4:13–14). In short, David's extended family, that of Judah, has been magnified through intermarriage, and by extension his reign has benefitted too. The book of Ruth similarly links David to the union of Ruth, a Moabite, and Boaz, an Ephrathite from Bethlehem. As a later member of the Ephrathites, David is a descendant of Ruth and Boaz (Ru 4:18–22), whose intermarriage thus bore a larger significance for all Israel. And like the book of Ruth, 1 Chronicles draws attention to David's lineage and incorporates intermarriage into the story of his descent from great figures such as Judah.

The genealogies of the other tribes follow (4:23–8:40). These lists are not as extensive as the one for Judah except for the genealogy of the tribe of Levi (5:27–6:38). The priestly tribe of Levi and the cult in which they ministered were of special interest to the Chronicler. These ministers are distributed throughout the twelve tribes to indicate how important they are to Israel's identity and well-being. The genealogies of Levi's descendants are followed by the record of their settlements in 6:39–66. Again, all twelve tribes were originally named in the list of Levitical cities to show the unity of all Israel under David. In general, these materials underscore the importance of the priests and Levites in their capacity as leaders of Israel's cult. To conclude the genealogical section of 1 Chronicles, generational lists of Saul's descendants (8:33–40; 9:35–44) frame a register of those who returned from the Babylonian Exile (9:1–34).

The impression left from reading these genealogies is that Israel embraces all twelve tribes and takes an inclusive stance toward outsiders and those loosely related to Israel. The sense of all Israel, or greater Israel, finds its focus with the reign of King David, and the Chronicler's unique appreciation for David and his achievements becomes even clearer in the next section of the book.

The History of David's Reign (1 Chr 10:1–29:30)

This section begins with a report on Saul's death and burial (10:1–12), along with a short editorial comment on the dangers that Saul's reign posed for Israel because Saul was not faithful to God. For the Chronicler, Saul is little more than a foil for David, whose portrait the Chronicler painted with the strokes of piety and fidelity. In turn, source material from the books of Samuel that was not consistent with this idealized view of David was omitted: David's conflicts with Saul, his service with the Philistines, David's career-advancing marriages, and the political maneuvers that led to his taking the throne as king of Israel. The Chronicler is not necessarily denying these events happened, but he wishes to emphasize other, more edifying dimensions of David's character.

The Chronicler's editorial decisions regarding David, in some instances, allow him to unify major themes and express his vision of Israel in its fullness. For example, 2 Samuel 2:4 states that "men of Judah" anointed David as the king of their tribe following Saul's death. David ruled over Judah for seven years before the elders of Israel chose him as king over the rest of the tribes (2 Sm 5:1–5). The Chronicler, in contrast, states that the LORD ceded the kingdom to David son of Jesse (1 Chr 10:14) and adds that "all Israel gathered together to David at Hebron" (11:1). In Chronicles, David becomes king over all Israel at once, with emphasis on God's role in this event. Integrating the themes of an ever unified, greater Israel and the exceptional kingship of David, the Chronicler makes clear to the LORD's people what is of primary importance. To drive the point home, 1 Chronicles 11:4 reports that "David and all Israel" marched to Jerusalem to take control of the city, whereas the source text (2 Sm 5:6) speaks of "the king and his men." Thus, uniquely in Chronicles is Jerusalem conquered by a united Israel. The establishment of Jerusalem in this manner adds luster to its primacy and suggests links between David's kingship, the unity of Israel, the significance of Jerusalem, and of the temple to be built there. In fact, from this point forward, the narrative of 1 Chronicles is focused on plans for the temple, which David (1 Chr 17–29) initiates and prepares for in anticipation of his son Solomon (2 Chr 3–4) carrying out the construction.

The Chronicler depicts David and Solomon in such a way as to underscore their respective roles in the establishment of the Temple and its liturgy. To verify worthiness in inaugurating worship, the Chronicler idealizes David in the ways already noted and elevates the king's son by eliminating the stories from 1 Kings that highlight Solomon's religious and moral failure. After such cleansing, both figures give voice to one of the Chronicler's primary concerns, worship. The God who is present in Israel's experience evokes a response in worship from the people whose destiny this God guides. The Chronicler tries to show that Israel's future is dependent upon its fidelity to the proper forms of worship that God has revealed through David. There is a reciprocal relationship between God and Israel. God blesses Israel, and Israel worships God. For the Chronicler, the Temple and its liturgy were symbols of God's continuing presence among the people of Israel. As long as the priests offer the correct sacrifices at the appropriate times in the presence of a grateful people, the LORD will dwell in Israel's midst, in the Temple of Jerusalem. For the Chronicler, the history of Israel was not a series of unrelated action by kings and prophets. Israel's nucleus was the worship led by the priests who were appointed by David. The Chronicler recognized that there were times when the people's sin led to serious failures to offer proper worship, with disastrous consequences. The heinous idolatry inspired by King Manasseh of Judah led to the exile in Babylon (2 Chr 33:11). In time, however, Manasseh repented, restored right worship of the LORD, and offered his own sacrifices in the Temple in Jerusalem (2 Chr 33:16; in the Chronicler's source text, 2 Kgs 21:1–18, Manasseh never repents). Like King Manasseh, Israel was always able to recover from its misdeeds, resume proper liturgical services, and thus be certain of God's abiding presence. The fall of Jerusalem and the exile to Babylon formed an unfortunate interruption in an otherwise unbroken history of Israel as a community that offered legitimate worship to its ancestral deity. The only way to avoid a similar disaster in the future was to worship God in Jerusalem's Temple according to the rituals that go back to those developed by David.

The Importance of the Temple

Proper worship of the LORD requires a temple, and Chronicles—like the books of Kings—recognizes the legitimacy of only one such place, the Temple at Jerusalem. Valid worship could be conducted at this site alone because David and Solomon built this Temple under divine guidance, according to plans given by the LORD (1 Chr 28:19). When the Chronicler was writing his history, the worshippers of Israel's ancestral deity were not unanimous in recognizing Jerusalem's Temple as the only legitimate place of worship. There was a temple dedicated to the LORD in Samaria, within the historical boundaries of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, and at Elephantine, a Jewish military colony located on an island near the modern city of Aswan in Egypt. How did the Chronicler view the Jews at Elephantine or the northerners of his day? While scholars discuss this question, there is textual evidence (2 Chr 13:5–22) to suggest that the Chronicler attempted to reach out to those who had rejected the Jerusalemite tradition so that they might reattach themselves to the Jerusalem Temple. While some individuals and groups within the Jerusalem community sought separation from the people who also held fast to many of the principles of Yahwism but worshipped elsewhere (Neh 13:1–9), the Chronicler did not. The Chronicler sought to bring especially the northerners back into the nucleus of worship and faith, the Temple of Jerusalem. The words of the Chronicler are more conciliatory in tone and constitute an invitation to those otherwise excluded. The Chronicler's overture in no way compromised the core values of the Temple tradition, and the northerners were expected to adopt these values without reservation. Thus, reconciliation was an important dimension of the sense of all Israel or greater Israel that the Chronicler envisioned.

The Temple Personnel

Chapters 23 through 27 appear to be secondary to the Chronicler's story about David and Solomon, but they are central to the Chronicler's concern to describe in detail the proper worship of God. Chapter 23 deals with the Levitical class; chapter 24 with priestly classes; chapter 25 with Levitical singers; chapter 26 with the gatekeepers of the Temple; and chapter 27 with army commanders, tribal leaders, and royal advisers. The passages that deal with the priests and Levites are important for the Chronicler's general purpose. Not only is the proper place for worshipping God crucial but so is having the proper personnel to officiate at the rites (see also 2 Chr 13:9–11). The Chronicler provides quite a lot of detail about the people whom God chose to officiate at liturgy in Jerusalem. According to source texts, any male Israelite could offer sacrificial worship. Gradually, however, members of the tribe of Levi became the preferred ministers of the ritual. Chronicles reflects a further development. Some members of the tribe of Levi were priests, who offered sacrifices; the rest were temple singers and assistants to the priests.

The Priests

The Chronicler recognized the priests as the chief religious officials. Among the duties of the priests, there was the responsibility to blow the trumpets (1 Chr 16:6), to minister to the inner sanctuary (2 Chr 5:14), to offer sacrifice on the altar (2 Chr 29:21), and to burn incense (2 Chr 26:18). Although the books of Samuel and Kings recognized that others besides the tribe of Levi could serve as priests, the Chronicler makes no exception other than David himself. For example, the source text relates that David's sons were priests (2 Sm 8:18), but in a parallel passage (1 Chr 18:17), the Chronicler calls them "chief assistants to the king." The Chronicler does depict David as exercising priestly prerogatives: he wore priestly vestments (1 Chr 15:27), he blessed the people (16:2), and he offered sacrifices (16:2). David, however, was the only exception.

The Levites

The Chronicler asserts that the Levites did more than a few menial chores connected with the liturgy of the Temple. They carried the ark (1 Chr 15:15); they were singers (15:16–22) and gatekeepers (15:23). The Levites fulfilled all their responsibilities under the direction of the priests (1 Chr 23:27–32). The Levites were a type of "subordinate clergy." They had additional roles that were not directly related to worship. The Levites were judges (2 Chr 19:8, 11), prophets (2 Chr 20:14), and fund raisers (2 Chr 24:5; 34:9).

Temple Servants

The Chronicler also describes a third group of religious personnel: the temple servants (1 Chr 9:2; see also Ezra 2:70; 7:7; Neh 11:3). The Chronicler mentions them only a few times in his history. They were a still lesser class of liturgical functionaries, and their task was to help the Levites.

Roman Catholic Priesthood

The sacrament of Orders in the Roman Catholic Church is largely a part of our heritage from ancient Israel. The rituals of ordination recognize this heritage. The division of orders in the Roman Catholic Church into the episcopacy, presbyterate, and diaconate mirrors to some extent the Chronicler's division of temple personnel into priests, Levites, and temple servants. Of course the status, role, and interrelationships of the orders in the Church are different from those of the Old Testament's cultic personnel, yet the concern in the Church for a hierarchy among the people directly concerned with worship is similar to that of the Chronicler.

There is not a single instance in the New Testament of anyone called a "priest" presiding at Christian worship. It is the Chronicler (and even more the Priestly strand of the Pentateuch, especially Leviticus and Numbers) who portrays worship led by "official" ministers. For the Chronicler, the priests and Levites were those through whom God's abiding presence among the people was evident. The rituals that they conducted were a source of blessing for the people and an act of devotion to their God. The Chronicler's God was not a hidden God. The people experienced God in worship more than anywhere else.

2 CHRONICLES

[see pages 508–547 of the Old Testament]

Solomon

The second book of Chronicles continues the story of Israel with the accession of Solomon to the throne of David. The Chronicler continues to work with his sources, 1 and 2 Kings, in a manner that reveals the later writer's emphases, priorities, and values. The story of Solomon (2 Chr 1–9) deals exclusively with the building of the Temple as envisioned by David. The Chronicler does not repeat the negative aspects of Solomon's story that 1 Kings recounts (see RG for 1 Chronicles). For example, the Chronicler omits the details about how Solomon secured his throne through the execution of potential opponents, including his half brother Adonijah (1 Kgs 2). Also unmentioned is Solomon's marriage to the daughter of Pharaoh (1 Kgs 3:1) and other non-Israelite women (1 Kgs 11:1–13). In his description of the wealth and glory of the Temple, the Chronicler goes beyond the words of the books of Kings in providing more details (compare 2 Chr 3–4 with 1 Kgs 6–8). In the former, after Solomon's prayer of dedication, fire falls from heaven and consumes the sacrifice; God's glory fills the temple (2 Chr 7:1). Here the Chronicler models the story of the Temple's dedication on that of the tabernacle in the wilderness (Ex 40:34). Throughout the description of Solomon's achievement in building and dedicating the Temple, the Chronicler reminds readers of David's preparations (2:6, 13, 16; 3:1; 5:1; 6:3–11). In the eyes of the Chronicler, the Temple was the combined enterprise of David and Solomon, who each made his own contribution to the completion of this work.

The Kingdom of Judah and Greater Israel

The remaining chapters of the book (10 through 36) rehearse, from the perspective of the Chronicler, the story of Judah up until the Babylonian Exile; 2 Chronicles passes over much detail in 1 and 2 Kings because of its focus on the liturgy of the Temple. On the other hand, the Chronicler mentions various building activities and military as well as administrative matters that his source text does not mention. Most of these reports occur in passages about kings that the Chronicler evaluates positively because they promoted what the Chronicler regarded as the proper worship of God, or they worked to bring about unity between the preeminent Southern Kingdom of Judah and the rebels of the Northern Kingdom, Israel.

The narrative continues with Rehoboam, who was Solomon's son and successor. Rehoboam builds fortifications (11:5–12) and as a result has a promising start to his career. His failure to remain faithful to the law of God, however, leads to the partial conquest of his realm by the Pharaoh Shishak (12:1–5). While the source text of 1 Kings cites idol worship in Judah as the apparent cause of Shishak's success, the Chronicler pinpoints the blame on Rehoboam as one who abandoned God's law.

The Chronicler is more favorable to Abijah, Rehoboam's successor. Again there is a contrast with 1 Kings, which calls the king Abijam (1 Kgs 15:1–8), and in other ways, as well, the Chronicler details his portrait of this king distinctively. At the outset of a war that Abijah wages against the Northern Kingdom, Abijah addresses a long, theological speech to his opponents. To begin he states that the legitimate cult of Judah guarantees him victory over them because they, the Northern Kingdom, have forsaken the true worship of the LORD (2 Chr 13:4–10). As the speech continues, Abijah voices the Chronicler's principal concerns: the division of the kingdom did not remove the North from greater Israel or create a final separation between it and Judah. The people in the North are still the people of God as well as kin of Judah (2 Chr 13:12). Even though the North has forsaken the LORD, they can repent and return, just as the people of Judah stray from God but then repent at different points in their own history. Divine mercy is the ultimate word for the Chronicler.

Both Asa and Jehoshaphat, Judah's next two kings, receive a positive evaluation from the Chronicler, who recounts their building, military, and cultic projects (14:5–15:15; 17:6–9; 19:4–20:30). Second Chronicles, then, depicts the first four kings that ruled Judah following the breakup of the Davidic-Solomonic kingdom as conscientious and loyal to the LORD. Following the lead of 2 Kings, the Chronicler rates positively several other kings from the Davidic dynasty: Uzziah (2 Chr 26:4; see 2 Kgs 15:3, which calls him Azariah); Jotham (2 Chr 27:2; see 2 Kgs 15:34); Hezekiah (2 Chr 29:2; see 2 Kgs 18:3); and Josiah (2 Chr 34:2; see 2 Kgs 22:2).

Chapters 29 through 31 describe a thoroughgoing reform of Judah's liturgy under Hezekiah. This reform included a confession of past neglect of proper worship (2 Chr 29:5–11), the cleansing of the Temple (29:16), and the celebration of the Passover. Hezekiah invited the northerners who survived the Assyrian conquest to join the people of Judah in the renewal of the covenant (30:1–9). Such an invitation to covenant renewal is significant as it supports one of the Chronicler's main themes, that of "all Israel." The Northern Kingdom had engaged in apostate behavior when it established its own altars outside of Jerusalem; thus, in 30:1, Hezekiah reaches out to "all Israel and Judah," and he writes letters to two of the northern tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh, inviting them to come to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover "to the LORD, the God of Israel." The Passover feast is the occasion to acclaim the unity of Israel "from Beer-sheeba to Dan" (30:5), a geographical expression of greater Israel found elsewhere in the Bible (Jgs 20:1; 1 Sm 3:20; 2 Sm 3:10; 17:11). For the Chronicler, the kingdoms split after Solomon's reign but remained one people destined to join together again in Jerusalem to worship their God.

In his account of Judah's kings, the Chronicler continues the pattern of departing from the source text when it serves his purposes. The account of Hezekiah's reign is expanded, as 2 Kings 18–20 says little about this king's reform. Instead, 2 Kings downplays Hezekiah's achievements because it wishes to portray King Josiah as a second David who restored the covenant (2 Kgs 22–23). Another striking contrast to 2 Kings is the Chronicler's portrait of Manasseh, who is discussed above as the Chronicler's exemplar of repentance (see RG for 1 Chronicles). In 2 Kings, Manasseh appears as the most evil of all Judah's kings. His sins were responsible for the fall of the Southern Kingdom (2 Kgs 21:1–18). The Chronicler rehabilitates Manasseh by describing his conversion, which leads to a reform of Judah's worship (2 Chr 33:11–17). It is likely that the Chronicler wanted his readers to identify with Manasseh by confessing their sins and renewing their commitment to the proper worship of Israel's God. The Chronicler's portrait of Manasseh is consistent with the apocryphal work known as the Prayer of Manasseh, a second-century BC text and a classic of penitential devotion. (Although Jerome included a translation of this work in the Vulgate, the Council of Trent decided not to include the Prayer of Manasseh in the canon of the Old Testament.) The Chronicler's version of Josiah's reform, although less celebratory than the version in 2 Kings, distinguishes several stages within this king's reign. This probably reflects historical events more accurately than the account in 2 Kings 22–23, which telescopes all the activities of the reform into a single year.

The Chronicler evaluates the last three kings of Judah (Jehoiachin, Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah) negatively (2 Chr 36:5–14). After an editorial comment explaining the cause of the exile (36:15–21), the book ends with the decree of Cyrus that calls for the restoration of Jerusalem and the rebuilding of its Temple (36:22–23).

The Purpose of the Chronicler

Why did the Chronicler retell the story of Israel's monarchy from a Judean perspective? After all, 2 Samuel through 2 Kings already communicated that story. Indeed, the Chronicler derived much of his story from these books. The purpose of this new version of the story of David and his dynasty was to guide the Jerusalem community as it was reestablishing itself in the centuries following the exile. In the eyes of the Chronicler, the lasting contribution from the monarchic period of Israel's history was the Temple, its rituals, and its priesthood. Once the people rebuilt the Temple and restored the proper form of its liturgy, the essential elements of Jewish life were in place. According to the Chronicler, David and Solomon together established a divinely ordained liturgy in Jerusalem. The people in the postexilic period, led primarily by priestly figures, resumed the service of God according to the pattern set by David. In the Chronicler's view, the restoration of the national state and the Davidic dynasty were not of importance. All the really important tasks of the postexilic community were fulfilled when the people supported the rebuilding of the Temple and resumed authentic worship there. A fully functioning Jerusalem Temple, in turn, was the magnet to attract Israelites in the North to Judea so that they might form a unity with worshippers in Jerusalem and together form all Israel.

The Theology of the Chronicler

The Chronicler's account of the ancient Israelite monarchy differs markedly from that found in the books of 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings. While sources document the failures of the Davidic dynasty, the Chronicler presents David and his line in the best possible light. The Chronicler wants to assure his readers that Judah's future depends upon the resumption of Temple service as established by David and the newfound unity of all Israel that the Temple and its liturgies can foster in a unique way.

There may have been political considerations at work in the Chronicler's telling of the story of Judah's monarchy as well. Recall that the books of Chronicles are dated to the fourth century BC. At this time, relations between the people of Judah and the people of the former Northern Kingdom were complex and not without tension. On the one hand, the two peoples had certain things in common. First, the Pentateuchal texts circulating in Samaria, the North's ancient capital, were virtually identical to those in Judea, and apparently some northern traditions were accommodated in the scriptures of Jerusalem (Dt 27:12 refers to Mount Gerizim in the North). Moreover, the North continued the tradition of worshipping the LORD just like the Judeans in Jerusalem. There is evidence of important, positive interactions between Samaritans and Judeans at this time. On the other hand, the Samaritans' practice of worshipping the LORD on Mount Gerizim in the North (as opposed to Jerusalem) was so serious that the Chronicler and others like him viewed this as apostate behavior. He believed that the future of Judah depended on its absolute commitment to the authentic worship of the LORD in the Jerusalem Temple, which the North rejected down to the Chronicler's own day.

From a contemporary perspective, the Samaritans were one example of the rich diversity in early Judaism. Their religious traditions developed independently of the leadership of the community that arose around the priests of Jerusalem. Other examples of the variety of religious perspectives in early Judaism include the Hasidim, the Essenes, and the Pharisees. The Chronicler's attitude toward those outside his community who worshipped the LORD in places other than Jerusalem is instructive. While the Chronicler challenged in an uncompromising way the Northerners' notion that they too were authentic worshippers of the LORD, he sought to build bridges with this community for the sake of religious unity, which was one of his ideals. The Chronicler did not necessarily seek to eliminate diversity among those who considered themselves worshippers of the LORD; rather he grasped a fundamental unity among these groups and articulated it plainly in texts such as 2 Chronicles 30, where King Hezekiah writes to the people of Manasseh and Ephraim in the North to invite them to the house of the LORD in Jerusalem so that there they might all keep the Passover feast. Saint Augustine, in his letter 211 (ca. 424 AD), writes: “Cum dilectione hominum et odio vitiorum,” which is commonly translated as “With love for humankind and hatred of sins.” The phrase is sometimes rendered “love the sinner but hate the sin,” and it describes the Chronicler’s view of other worshippers, especially those in the North. Although he condemns their separation from the worship at the Jerusalem Temple, in love he anticipates their reunion with the Jerusalem community, which has followed the LORD in every way.

Relationships among Christian Churches

Until the Second Vatican Council, the attitude of Catholics toward other Christians was at times one of intolerance. The council challenged this attitude and sought to promote the restoration of unity among all Christians. The Council’s Decree on Ecumenism (3) speaks of that unity, or communion, in clear terms:

[Those] who believe in Christ and have been truly baptized are in communion with the Catholic Church even though this communion is imperfect. The differences that exist in varying degrees between them and the Catholic Church—whether in doctrine and sometimes in discipline, or concerning the structure of the Church—do indeed create many obstacles, sometimes serious ones, to full ecclesiastical communion. The ecumenical movement is striving to overcome these obstacles. But even in spite of them it remains true that all who have been justified by faith in Baptism are members of Christ’s body, and have a right to be called Christian, and so are correctly accepted as brothers [and sisters] by the children of the Catholic Church.

Catholics’ acceptance of other baptized Christians as brothers and sisters in Christ finds a biblical precedent in the Chronicler’s attitude toward those who worshipped the LORD in Samaria and other parts of the former Northern Kingdom. The Chronicler envisioned communion between the northerners and his own community based at the Jerusalem Temple, despite differences between the two groups.

THE BOOKS OF EZRA AND NEHEMIAH

The books of Ezra and Nehemiah are products of the Persian period and tell a remarkable story. In the Babylonian Exile (587–539 BC), lost were all the important legacies of ancient Israel: the Temple, the monarchy, and the city of Jerusalem itself. Undoubtedly some Judeans wondered whether their covenant with God had been broken, perhaps permanently. After roughly fifty years, however, waves of returnees from exile along with Judeans who had remained in the land began to create a new future by rebuilding the city of Jerusalem along with its Temple. Indeed virtually all the legacies of ancient Israel—the Jerusalem Temple, the monarchy, the covenant, and the law—were reconsidered and recast to form the foundation of Judean life after the exile. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah document this restoration, and describe it as a dynamic and creative process of renewal. Both books narrate episodes where community is formed through grace and faith. Challenges are met by trusting in God and following the law of God.

The books of Ezra and Nehemiah recount, on occasion, controversial practices on the part of the postexilic community, such as forcible divorce for those members who did not marry a fellow Judean (Ezr 9–10). While some in the community may have supported this type of initiative unequivocally, it in fact raises questions about the best means of preserving group identity and remaining faithful to that identity. The issue is whether to be assimilationist or anti-assimilationist, and in the latter case there arises the question of acceptable means to the end: forced divorce and the dissolution of whole families? In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, other such conflicting issues included relation to the outside world, proselytism, and the community's stance toward the empire and its politics. For readers today, Ezra and Nehemiah are valuable for the case studies they provide on these formative issues.

For Christian readers, the books of Ezra and Nehemiah are a critical part of the background of the New Testament. To understand in-depth facets of Jesus's ministry such as the radical forgiveness of sins, one must consider contemporary Jewish beliefs and practices, and then trace them back to the two centuries of Persian Rule. Luke 15:7 celebrates one sinner's repentance over the good deeds of the many, and links repentance to the heavenly world to come. This point of view, also present among the rabbis of the first and second centuries, has roots in postexilic Judaism, where repentance flourished and the confession of sin became a hallmark of piety (Ezr 9:6–15; Neh 1:5–11; 9:6–37). In renewing the legacies of ancient Israel, Jewish writers at the time of Ezra and Nehemiah engaged these themes, developed them considerably, and established trajectories for them; as a result of their efforts, the template for much of Second Temple Judaism emerged and is reflected in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Textual Considerations

Originally the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were a single work. The book of Nehemiah does not have a title in the Hebrew Bible; there is simply a superscription (Neh 1:1) that reads “The book of Nehemiah.” In most editions of the Septuagint (the second-century BC Greek version of the Hebrew Bible), the two books form a unit. Their division into two separate texts dates at least to the time of Origen and is to be found after that in Jerome's Vulgate (the translation of the Hebrew Bible into Latin). On the basis of Jerome's work, Ezra and Nehemiah became separate books in our English Bible. Much later in the sixteenth century AD, the composite book became two in Hebrew Bibles as well.

While scholars identify several different sources underlying the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, the books form a coherent unit. The whole period of the restoration as covered by the books of Ezra and Nehemiah is one great era of return and rebuilding framed by two celebrations of the Feast of Booths. (Booths is the fall harvest festival, also known as Tabernacles or Succoth, its Hebrew name.) The first celebration takes place after the return (Ezr 3:4) and the second after the rebuilding is complete (Neh 8:13–18). Both celebrations are said to be in accord with festal guidelines written in the Torah (Ezr 3:4; Neh 8:14, 18).

Historical Developments

The books of Ezra and Nehemiah present the restoration of Judah following the Babylonian Exile in two phases. The first is the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem, a work completed in 515 BC. Without introducing the figure of Ezra, Ezra 1–6 recounts the rebuilding and related events in the sixth century BC. The second phase is the reordering of Jewish life, for which Ezra and Nehemiah had some responsibility. The reordering was a process that began in the sixth century and continued into the fourth century, roughly the time when the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were put into their final form.

Locating Ezra and Nehemiah in History

Ezra 7:7 states that Ezra's ministry began in the seventh year of Artaxerxes's reign, while Nehemiah 2:1 reports that Nehemiah's projects began "in the twentieth year of King Artaxerxes." There were, however, three Persian monarchs who had this name and who might conceivably be the Artaxerxes mentioned in these texts. The biblical text appears to assume that Ezra's ministry preceded that of Nehemiah. The chronological priority is due less to historical memory than to the Bible's view that Ezra was the preeminent restorer of Jewish life after the exile. It is arguable, however, that Nehemiah's ministry preceded that of Ezra. Ezra's work appears to presuppose that the reconstruction and repopulation of Jerusalem had taken place, but it was Nehemiah who is credited with restoring the city. Then, too, the high priest during Nehemiah's time was Eliashib (Neh 3:1, 20; 13:4) while the high priest during Ezra's time was the son of Eliashib, Johanan (Ezr 10:6). The order and names of the postexilic high priests are problematic, however, due to gaps in the available records. Nehemiah worked during the reign of Artaxerxes I and arrived in Jerusalem in 445 BC. Depending on whether he preceded or followed Nehemiah, Ezra is dated either to 458 BC, in the reign of Artaxerxes I, or to 398 BC, in the reign of Artaxerxes II.

The chronology of the Judean restoration given in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah is ambiguous and not easily reconstructed. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah are more interested in presenting the religious dimension of the activities of the two men whose names they bear.

The Persian Empire

The book of Ezra begins with the Persian King Cyrus ordering all Judeans exiled in Babylon to return to Jerusalem and build a temple for the LORD, the God of heaven (Ezr 1:2–4). Subsequently, the Persian king Artaxerxes authorizes Ezra to teach the “law of the LORD,” its statutes and ordinances, in Israel (Ezr 7:6, 10). These reported events have led scholars over the years to romanticize somewhat the relationship between the Persian Empire and postexilic Jerusalem, as if King Cyrus and his descendants were benevolent patrons with a special concern about life in Judea. In fact, Persia dealt with Judea as pragmatically as it did with most of the other parts of its empire. Conquered populations were pressed into service in a number of ways. Militarily, provinces like Judea, situated between the empire’s center and its farthest perimeter, could provide the Persians a buffer zone in the case of revolt in the hinterland. Since the beginning of both Nehemiah’s and Ezra’s missions coincided with Egyptian revolts against Persian hegemony, it was important for the Persians to have a submissive and supportive Judah as they moved against the rebellious Egyptians. Fiscally, conquered peoples were made to pay tribute in the form of material goods, precious metals, and sometimes human labor. Resources were extracted from a province such as Judea via the Temple, which served as a clearinghouse for these goods on their way to the Persian capital. This system of tribute helps explain the Persian interest in restoring the Temple and gives more perspective on the mechanisms of Persian imperial control.

Nonetheless, the books of Ezra and Nehemiah at times portray Persia positively, for the following reason: In order to accentuate the distinction between Judea and its proximate enemies, the so-called peoples of the land and the Samaritans to the north, the writers of Ezra and Nehemiah depict Judea as a valued representative of Persia and its interests. Judea’s rapport with Persia and its approbation by the Persian king placed it in a superior position to that of its neighbors and rivals. In the book of Ezra, this contrast is depicted through a series of letters said to have passed between the Persian court and the leaders in Jerusalem and the surrounding areas (Ezr 4–6). In the book of Nehemiah, the figure of Nehemiah himself clashes with those who control the lands to the north and to the east of Jerusalem and Judea. In these disputes, Nehemiah’s authority as governor is an extension of the Persian polity. In both books, when postexilic Judeans enjoy the favor of Persia, it is typically at their enemies’ expense. The authors understand imperial favor as part of God’s providential plan for the Judeans returned from exile.

READING THE BOOK OF EZRA

The book of Ezra falls into two parts, each covering a period of postexilic history. Chapters 1 through 6 treat the return from exile and the rebuilding of the Temple. Chapters 7 through 10 describe the mission of Ezra to reconstitute Judah as a community living in accord with the Torah. There are continuities and discontinuities between the book of Ezra and the books of Chronicles, which precede Ezra directly in the Christian Bible. On the one hand, the final verse of Chronicles, 2 Chr 36:23, is repeated at the very beginning of Ezra (Ezr 1:1–4) when Cyrus, king of Persia, declares that every exile from Judah should return to Jerusalem to rebuild its Temple. The repetition of Cyrus's decree forms a bridge between the two books. Moreover, the rebuilding of the Temple in Ezra 1–6 shares with the Chronicler theological language and a Temple-centered vision of Jerusalem. Like the Chronicler, the writer of Ezra 1–6 foregrounds the Temple, credits King David with its design (Ezr 3:10), highlights the role of the Levites in the temple (Ezr 3:10, 12), and describes Temple worship as the offering of sacrifice as well as songs of praise and thanksgiving (Ezr 3:11). On the other hand, in Ezra 7–10 the Jerusalem community assumes a posture of exclusivism toward outsiders, whereas the Chronicler sought connections between Judah and its separated brethren in the North, the Samaritans. The program of forced divorce enacted in Ezra 10 curtailed contact between Judeans and other people, and as such would be out of place in the world of the Chronicler. In light of this and other differences, scholars in general no longer think that the same person wrote Chronicles and the book of Ezra (as well as Nehemiah), a view that had been prevalent for decades. Close reading of the texts shows, rather, that there are continuities and discontinuities between these two biblical books.

The Return of the Exiles (Ezr 1:1–6:22)

Chapters 1 through 3 are focused on the return from exile. After the proclamation of Cyrus noted earlier, the following verses describe the return itself (1:5–11). Chapter 2 gives a list of the returnees, some 42,700 in all. At the top of the list is Zerubbabel, a member of the Davidic family, and Jeshua, a member of a prominent priestly family. In chapter 3, these two figures play important roles in the revival of worship in Jerusalem. Sacrifices begin on a provisional altar (3:1–3). The people observe the Feast of Booths (3:4) and they initiate the regular sacrifices (3:5). Most important of all, they prepare for the rebuilding of the Temple (3:6–13).

There were problems with the rebuilding that the author describes in 4:1–6:13. Opposition to the project came from “the enemies of Judah and Benjamin” (4:1) and “the people of the land” (4:4). According to the biblical writer, both groups tried to convince the Persians that the rebuilding of Jerusalem was an act of political disloyalty. Ezra 4:7–23 dramatizes the opposition to rebuilding the walls of the city by quoting a letter written in Aramaic to the Persian king Artaxerxes. Although the question of the letter’s authenticity cannot be settled definitively, there are hints that it was not written by the putative authors Rehum and Shimshi, officials in the territory of Israel north of Judea (e.g., their account of their own history does not correspond to Ezr 4:10). Later, two other northern officials appeal to the Persian king Darius to stop the Judeans from rebuilding their Temple (5:7–17), but the king sides with the Judeans. Remarkably, King Darius’s edict describes in detail the sacrifices the Judeans were to offer in the completed Temple (6:9–10), another indication that the Aramaic letters cited in these chapters are not authentic. These chapters are valuable less as history and more for the picture they paint of the people of Judah successfully completing their project with the full support of the Persian imperial authorities (6:14, 22). The narrative accentuates God’s providence and the people’s example of living by grace in the face of challenge.

Ezra’s Mission (Ezr 7:1–10:44)

The Return from Exile

The account of Ezra’s activity begins with chapter 7 and concludes with chapter 10, although Nehemiah 8 also mentions Ezra and fits well with these events. Ezra 7–8 provide an account of Ezra’s journey from Babylon to Jerusalem. The genealogy in 7:1–5 states that Ezra was the son of Seraiah, the last high priest killed by the Babylonians in 587. Since Ezra is working more than a century later, this information is not historical but rather serves to magnify Ezra’s priestly lineage. Later in the genealogy Ezra is identified as a Zadokite priest. The Zadokite priests were associated with the Jerusalem Temple in preexilic times (Zadok was the priest who served David and Solomon [2 Sm 8:12]). In the postexilic period, the Zadokites were one of several priestly groups that enjoyed influence in Judah. Other groups included the eponymous Aaronides and the Levites, as well as the Korahites who may also be responsible for adding superscriptions to certain psalms (Ps 42:1; 44:1). Ezra's genealogy concludes by tracing his descent back all the way to Aaron; the associations with both Zadok and Aaron further portray Ezra as priest par excellence.

A scribe as well, Ezra is presented as an expert in the Torah (7:6), which was being developed by the Judeans who were in Babylon. With further development, the Torah would become the first five books of the Bible, also known as the Pentateuch. The relationship between the figure of Ezra and the formation of the Pentateuch is more complicated than it was once thought to be. Alongside a linear model in which Ezra appeared shortly after the completion of the Pentateuch and served as its first spokesperson, a more dynamic model has emerged. In this model, the account of Ezra's mission (Ezr 7–10 and Neh 8) roughly coincides with the formation of many Pentateuchal writings. The Ezra narrative thus offers a window on the development of Torah, or the Pentateuch in the making, and conversely the first five books of the Bible can illumine passages in the book of Ezra dealing with community norms and practices as well as other aspects of the law.

Another Aramaic document (the credentials that Artaxerxes gave to Ezra) takes up 7:12–26. This imperial commission includes information about contributions to the Temple in Jerusalem (vv. 13–25) and the order to reestablish Judahite society based on the law of God (vv. 13–15, 25). It was Persian policy to restore and support the worship of national deities throughout the empire (temples facilitated the extraction of tribute from all parts of the empire). By their acceptance or rejection of laws in the developing Torah, the Judeans defined themselves as belonging to or rejecting membership in the community as Ezra and his followers defined it. In these matters the figure of Ezra had considerable authority; Ezra 7:25–26 reports that the king granted Ezra power to establish a judicial structure for the governance of the Jewish community according to the law.

The account of Ezra's journey to Jerusalem begins with a list of those returning with him (8:1–14), some 5,000 people in all. These returnees are grouped as families with the heads indicated by name followed by the number of additional kin. In an aside (8:15–20), Ezra persuades a group of Levites who were not initially among the returnees to make the trek to Jerusalem with him. The return itself is described in terms that evoke the twelve tribes of preexilic Israel: there are twelve leading priests (8:24), they offer twelve bulls (8: 35) and ninety-six rams (8:35). Upon Ezra's arrival in Jerusalem, there is a three-day rest (8:32) reminiscent of Joshua's break after crossing the Jordan (Jos 3:1). Such echoes of the past are consistent with overarching exodus-occupation themes worked into the Ezra narrative as a whole. Chapter 8's final two verses shift to the third person and lead into the episode of Ezra's reading the Torah of Moses in public. Ezra's reading is described in Neh 7:72 [73] and following, but in the order of events that episode fits very well here in the book of Ezra.

The Issue of Mixed Marriages

The remaining two chapters deal with Jews who have married outside their community (9:1). Ezra finds their behavior unacceptable and recites a long penitential prayer on their behalf (9:6–15). The prayer is a prime example of increased penitential piety in postexilic Judaism, as discussed earlier. The people decide upon forced divorce as a corrective (10:1–4), even though there is no clear warrant in the laws for divorce in this type of situation. The author of Ezra relies on the fact that in Ezra 9:1, four of the groups with whom Israelites may not marry (see Dt 7:1–3) are elsewhere listed with two foreign nations barred from entering the assembly of Israel (Dt 23:3–6). Thus, the later sanction, exclusion, is applied to the earlier offense, intermarrying with people of the land. In the narrative, Ezra specifies exclusion as divorce and initiates divorce proceedings through the high priest, Johanan (10:5–6). After a public assembly takes place, a special commission begins work to impose divorce and thus dissolve families (10:7–17). It produces a list of those who married outside the community (10:18–44), but there is no indication the policy was enacted. In fact, the final verse of this narrative (10:44) does not make sense in Hebrew (“and there were from them wives and they took sons”). The NABRE translators based their rendering of this text on the Septuagint, the ancient Greek version of the Old Testament and reads “All these had taken foreign wives; but they sent them away, both the women and their children.”

In denouncing mixed marriages, Ezra speaks of a “holy seed” (9:2). Ezra accuses the group with which he himself associated, the returnees from Babylon, of desecrating themselves by mixing with “the peoples of the land.” The referent is rhetorical as there follows a list of foreign nations (Ezr 9:1) that is archaic and stereotyped. Who were the “peoples of the land”? The Judean population of the fourth century BC comprised for the most part Ezra’s returnees and other groups that worshipped the LORD; the returnees lived in tension alongside other Judeans who had not been exiled and with whom the returnees had a historical connection. This plurality is comparable to the Israelite tribes centuries before the establishment of the Israelite national state (thirteenth to eleventh centuries BC). There was little unity or even cooperation among the tribes, and the same can be said of the Judeans as a whole after the exile. Ezra attempted to provide stability and continuity, first to his own community of returnees and in turn to all who lived in Judea as well.

The expression “holy seed” in Ezra 9:2 suggests a link to the priestly lineage with which Ezra is associated. The Priestly writers of the Pentateuch understood holiness as a theological category, and their book of Leviticus employs the term more than twenty times. There are important verses where Leviticus, like Ezra, calls the people as a collective holy (Lv 11:44–45) in order to exhort them to purity. In the Torah, the concept of God’s holy people is prevalent among but not limited to the Priestly writers of Leviticus; Exodus 19:6 and Deuteronomy 7:6; 14:2, 21 develop this idea, as does Ezra 9:2. A scribe skilled in the law, Ezra locates the concept of “holy seed” in the legal sphere by defining the separation process (forced divorce) as one consistent with the law (Ezr 10:3, actually Ezra’s associate Shecaniah states this). The community responsible for these chapters of Ezra had a deep and abiding sense of Torah as a guide to life, and their most important decisions were seen as fulfilling the instructions of Torah.

The Legacy of Ezra

Contemporary Catholics should receive the legacy of Ezra with prudence. The figure of Ezra views God’s people as holy and set apart for service. He views Torah as encompassing an eternal order given by God to Israel alone. Holiness and Torah were Ezra’s keys to a stable and secure community. This achievement, however, had consequences. Mixed marriages were banned, not without precedent (Ex 34:6; Dt 7:3; 23:5–7), but in a departure from other, more open biblical traditions (Gn 41; Nm 12:1; Ru 1). In the Ezra account, the Jewish community was no longer open to outsiders. To define the people of God in this way compromised Israel’s role as a source of blessing for the nations (Gn 12:2), and as God's servant bringing the Torah and its peace to the nations (Is 49:1–7). Early Christianity had to deal with Ezra's legacy after its highly successful mission to the Gentiles (Acts 10:1–15:35), and in time the early Church abandoned the exclusionary views on membership in the people of God.

THE BOOKS OF EZRA AND NEHEMIAH

As noted in the RG for Ezra, Ezra and Nehemiah are components of what was originally a single work. The book of Nehemiah deals with the political and administrative side of the restoration, while the book of Ezra focuses on the establishment of Torah as the guide by which the returned community lived. Besides these varied concerns, there is one striking difference between the two books based on literary form. According to Nehemiah 1:1, the book is an account for which Nehemiah himself is responsible. A significant portion of the book is written in the first person (1:1–7:5; 12:31–13:31). These sections are called “Memoirs of Nehemiah.”

It is important to see the work of both Nehemiah and Ezra against the challenging conditions in postexilic Judah that the prophets Malachi and Haggai depict (see Malachi 1–2; Haggai 1). Root causes of the impoverishment included the Persian extraction of material resources and partisan wrangling among the various groups of Judeans, including the returnees banded around Nehemiah and Ezra. Although they were allied with the Persians and with their own interest groups, both Ezra and Nehemiah express concern for the common good and seek to provide all Judeans with concrete communal structures that would benefit them.

READING THE BOOK OF NEHEMIAH

The book describes the work of Nehemiah (1:1–7:72) and the place of Torah in the restored community of Jerusalem (8:1–13:31).

The Rebuilding of Jerusalem (1:1–6:19)

Because of the dire reports that came to the Persian imperial court from Jerusalem, the emperor Artaxerxes agreed to send Nehemiah, his cupbearer, to rebuild the city (1:1–2:8). The book reports that there was opposition from both within and without the Judean community to this project. Although Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, was Nehemiah's principal antagonist, opposition came from governors of other neighboring provinces as well (4:1). They mocked Nehemiah's plans (2:19; 3:33–37) and even proposed military action against Jerusalem (4:1–6). When their criticism and plots failed to deter Nehemiah, they began plotting against his life (6:1–14). There were also some elements within Judean society that associated themselves with these plots against Nehemiah (6:17–19). This internal opposition came from the upper classes who had a stake in maintaining the status quo. Their unjust behavior led to disturbances that hindered the task of rebuilding the city (5:1–5). Rebuilding the city's walls was not enough to insure the stability of the community. Nehemiah ordered the Judeans to stop their economic abuse of the poor (5:6–13). Specifically, Judeans were engaging in usury and then selling the people who could not pay into debt slavery, a social injustice that so offended Nehemiah he made the priests swear to stop doing it (Neh 5:12). Despite waves of opposition, Nehemiah is said to have completed the project of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem in just fifty-two days (6:1, 15).

Jerusalem had been the capital of Judah, the Southern Kingdom. It was the location of the temple dedicated to the patron deity of that state. But the Babylonians leveled the city and its temple in 587 BC (2 Kgs 25:10). Although the temple was rebuilt, the second temple was far less ornate than the one built by Solomon, and it disappointed the people (Ezr 3:12; Hg 2:3). Because Jerusalem was no longer the capital of a Judahite national state, any sense of sovereignty was lost. Still, Jerusalem was the leading city of the Persian subprovince of Yehud. It was the center for preserving the particular worship of the Jewish community, and Persian imperial policy supported the preservation of this worship. Moreover, Nehemiah's project enjoyed the direct authorization of the Persian emperor and made a decisive contribution to the restoration of Judea after the return from exile. The refortified city with walls credited to Nehemiah served as a stronghold while Nehemiah's work for social justice improved the community's moral character.

The Population of Jerusalem (7:1–72)

Chapter 7 provides a transition from the description of Nehemiah's successful rebuilding project to the public reading of the Torah. Following the comment about the meager population of Jerusalem (7:4), there is a repetition of the list of those who returned from Babylon (7:6–72). This list duplicates the one found in Ezra 2:1–67.

The Public Reading of Torah (8:1–10:40)

At this point the Nehemiah memoirs break off. Chapters 8 through 10 describe a series of public rituals, some of which involve Ezra or Nehemiah. These events bring closure both to the rebuilding of the city and the reestablishment of its religious life. The community of Jerusalem hears the words of Torah (Neh 8:1–12), although the contents of this “book” are not disclosed and there is no indication of what Ezra read to the people. The response of the people, who are guided by the leaders, is one of joyous celebration, and they are told to extend the celebration to those who have nothing by sharing with them a portion of food (Neh 8:10). Nehemiah's interest in social justice (Neh 5:6–13) is visible again here at the reading of Torah. After a day had passed, Ezra and the elders instruct the people to celebrate the Feast of Booths (also known as Tabernacles or Succoth) according to the prescriptions of the Torah (8:13–18). The feast continues for seven days, with a solemn assembly on the eighth and final day. The fact that the people required this festal instruction suggests that the Torah was indeed still a work in progress. Two weeks later the community begins a fast (9:1–3), followed by a great confession of sin in 9:6–37 (in the Septuagint, the confession of sin is attributed to Ezra). The prayer recounts Israelite history with emphasis on God's gracious acts (9:6–32) as well as the people's misdeeds and transgressions of the Torah (9:34). Chapter 10 contains a pledge made in writing by those listed in vv. 1b–29 to observe the Torah of Moses. Among the specific points made in the pledge is the prohibition of marriage with the peoples of the land (10:31, see the RG for Ezra [Ezra 9:3]), and observance of the Sabbath (10:32). Those who made the pledge also promise to provide firewood for the altar (10:35), first fruits for sacrifice (10:36), and tithes for the support of the Levites (10:38–40). The emphasis of Nehemiah 10 clearly reflects legal traditions in the Torah, often with particular interpretations of a given law that tend to be more rigorous than its other formulations. For example, bringing wood to facilitate temple sacrifice is not explicitly mentioned in the Pentateuchal laws; rather, Leviticus 6:5–6, 12–13 imply this requirement by stating the altar fire is to burn continually. Nehemiah 10:35, however, reflects newfound regulations and legislation around the matter.

Torah as an authoritative guide for the life of the Jewish community is an important theme in both Ezra and Nehemiah. In Nehemiah 8, Ezra reads the law. In Nehemiah 9, the people of Jerusalem confess their failure to observe the law. In Nehemiah 10, the people agree to live according to its precepts. The Torah seems to have been unknown in Jerusalem when Ezra came precisely because the Torah was a work in progress and not yet the Pentateuch as we know it; it nonetheless provided clear legal and religious guidance to the Jews of Ezra's and Nehemiah's day. Moreover, both the figures of Ezra and Nehemiah are associated with a foreign empire, and although the exile had ended at an earlier point in history, the two books that bear their names contain an exilic perspective on Torah. In this view, the people of Israel have become a religious minority, and they maintain their identity now only by adhering to a distinct code of conduct. The writers of Ezra and Nehemiah imply that without a scrupulous observance of Torah, Judaism is in danger of being lost in a process of assimilation. Torah even becomes a wedge to keep the Jewish community separate from other ethnic and religious groups, as in the mixed-marriage episodes in Ezra 9–10 and Nehemiah 13. Intermarriage, however, is not the final word on the Torah, and the limited view of Torah sometimes expressed in Ezra and Nehemiah should not be taken as definitive. Torah, in fact, has many meanings and reflects different values. It includes the notions of instruction, custom, and worldview. Through the centuries Torah has been an expression of God's election and salvation of Israel. It is also the way to respond to God's graciousness. Torah is a way of life and contains universal values that Christians could learn from Judaism, ancient and modern.

The Resettlement of Jerusalem (11:1–13:31)

Nehemiah 11 begins with a lottery used to resettle Jerusalem, which is portrayed as a city in ruins and decay (11:1–3). Apparently people were loath to live in Jerusalem, and the lottery served to ensure a critical mass of population. There follow lists of the inhabitants of Jerusalem (11:3–24), and of the rural areas of Judea (11:20–30), and of the Benjaminites (11:31–36). The first list highlights elite families (“the heads of the province,” 11:3) and indicates a shockingly low number of Jerusalemites, just somewhat more than 3,000. This number pales in comparison with the 42,700 returnees listed in Ezra 2 and again in Nehemiah 7. Historians note that the actual population of Jerusalem at this time may have been as small as 1,500 people, but little else is known about the city during this period. The second list, before focusing on the rural areas, describes the temple servants and the Levites living in certain quarters of Jerusalem, with special attention to the former’s schedule of the daily duties in the house of God. Temple servants who sang in the service were appointed by royal decree. As the list resumes, most of the settlements lie south of the city in the traditional land of the tribe of Judah. The writer of Nehemiah refers to this area as “from Beer-Sheba to Ge-hinnom” (11:30). The third and final list accounts for the Benjaminites directly north of the city of Jerusalem in locales such as Bethel; at this time Benjamin was understood to extend as far north as Hazor and as far west as Lod (11:33–35).

Nehemiah 12 begins with lists of priests and Levites (12:1–26). The list begins with the priestly heads who served at the time of Zerubbabel and Joshua at the beginning of the return from exile in the sixth century (12:1–7). After a short enumeration of the Levites at that time (12:8–9), there is a list of high priests beginning with Jeshua and ending with Jaddua (12:10–11); in all likelihood some names have dropped out of this list because it does not match the historical record that other ancient sources supply. Concluding the chapter is a list of priests and Levites from the generation after the return under Jeshua and Zerubbabel (12:12–26). Joshua’s son Joiakim oversaw these men and their work. The second list repeats virtually all of the names of the first list from the first generation, but there are orthographic differences due to scribal error. The list ends with a statement that conflates the time of Joiakim in the late sixth century with that of Nehemiah the governor and Ezra the priest-scribe (12:26). This assertion is from the hand of an editor attempting to relate genealogical lists and other source material to the figures of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The description of the dedication of the walls (12:27–43) resumes the first-person narration of the “Memoirs of Nehemiah,” with Nehemiah orchestrating a liturgical service that involves priests, Levites, Levitical singers, and the administrators of Judea. The singers are accompanied by musicians playing cymbals, harps, and lyres in joyful hymns of thanksgiving (12:27). The priests and Levites purify the wall as well as the gates and the people in attendance (12:30). The heads of the community form two choirs that stand atop the newly constructed walls in a symbolic gesture of the protection they themselves will provide to the city, just as the walls do. The choirs’ members are listed by name, and their songs of rejoicing at the dedication of Jerusalem’s walls can be heard far beyond the city. Prominent in their song is the Hebrew word todah (Neh 12:27, 31, 38, 40) that denotes praise and thanksgiving while carrying liturgical connotations as well.

The book ends with descriptions of three key reform measures begun by Nehemiah in his second tenure as governor (he returned to the Persian king but obtained a royal authorization to come to Jerusalem a second time). These initiatives, listed in 12:44–13:31, include: restoring the Levites’ portion of the tithe (13:10–14), maintaining strict observance of the Sabbath (13:15–22), and correcting, with both verbal and physical attacks, those who married foreign women (13:23–29). These practices were introduced in Nehemiah 10, where the people pledged themselves to right conduct on all three counts. The Levitical tithe is mentioned in 12:44–47, and the subsequent passage (13:1–3) cites a ban on intermarriage between Judeans and Ammonites or Moabites.

The three reforms are embedded in a charged plot. While Nehemiah was away from Jerusalem, his rival Tobiah has secured a chamber in the Temple through an alliance with the high priest Eliashib. In the process, Tobiah displaced stores of grain, wine, and oil that were to be tithed to the Levites. Nehemiah ejects Tobiah and his personal effects from the temple (13:8) and has the room in question purified and sanctified before restoring it to the Levites. The story of Nehemiah vanquishing Tobiah forms a final segue to the first of the three reforms in chapter 13, the restoration of the Levites’ portion of the tithes (13:10–14). After each of the three reforms, Nehemiah prays to God asking that his good deeds be remembered and not forgotten, to his favor and to his credit (13:14, 22, 31). This verbal triptych of prayer stands as the signature to the book of Nehemiah.

TOBIT

[see pages 578–595 of the Old Testament]

The book of Tobit is a story of faithfulness, hardships, and God's enigmatic ways. This so-called religious novella holds up models of piety while addressing the suffering that even the righteous undergo. While the theology of Tobit employs multiple themes found elsewhere in the Hebrew scriptures, the book also reflects a worldview in which otherworldly beings—angels, as intermediaries of the Divine, and demons—interact in decisive ways with humans. As the book is set during a time of exile, the theme of loss and restoration of the people of God fits well as a backdrop for the struggles and eventual prosperity of two intersecting families.

OVERVIEW

Tobit, after whom the book is named, is a pious Israelite of the tribe of Naphtali (1:1–2). Although he is an orphan, Tobit is raised and educated in God's ways by his grandmother, Deborah (1:8). Tobit models appropriate worship by making pilgrimages to Jerusalem (1:6–7), though he is, in fact, from the Northern Kingdom (Israel), which had split from Judah (1:4–5). He also gives to orphans, widows, and proselytes (1:8; cf. Dt 26:12) and marries a woman from among his people (1:9). When Tobit (along with countrymen) is exiled to Assyria (1:3, 10), he continues to adhere to traditional religious practices. He does not eat the food of Gentiles (1:11; cf. Ex 34:15; Lv 11:1–47; 17:14–15; Dt 14:3–21), gives alms (1:16), tends to the hungry and naked (1:17), and buries the dead (1:17–18), including those executed; the latter act brings him into conflict with the king Sennacherib (1:19). His generosity extends also to hospitality, as Tobit seeks to invite poor Israelites to celebrate Pentecost (the feast of Weeks) with him and his family (2:1–2). Despite the good deeds, Tobit experiences challenges (becoming a wanted man for burying the dead [1:19–20], having property confiscated, and becoming blind [2:9–10]) that leave him disheartened, unable to support his family, and ready for death. After praying for death (3:2–6), Tobit sends his son Tobiah (Tobias, in the Greek) to Media to acquire talents of silver he deposited there (4:20; cf. 1:14). Meanwhile, in Media, Sarah, daughter of Raguel—kin to Tobit, the reader later learns (cf. 6:12)—is plagued by a demon (Asmodeus) who has slain each of her seven husbands on their wedding night. Although Asmodeus causes the deaths of the men, a servant in the household blames Sarah (3:8–9). Without a solution to these troubles, Sarah too prays for death (3:10–15).

At this point, God dispatches the angel Raphael, whose interventions finally resolve the trials of Tobit and Sarah. Raphael appears as a guide named Azariah (“God helps”) who leads Tobiah to Media to obtain Tobit’s money (5:1–5). Along the way, Azariah/Raphael (which means “God heals”) teaches Tobiah about the medicinal properties of a fish, which had attacked Tobiah (6:2–5, 7–9). The angel also suggests to Tobiah that he should marry Sarah, a woman destined for him (6:10–18), and Tobiah is agreeable since she is a kinswoman. Though Sarah’s parents are worried for the welfare of Tobiah (7:10–11), the instructions of Raphael to burn the liver and heart of the fish help Tobiah vanquish the demon (8:2–3). Tobiah and Sarah pray, consummate the marriage, and finally participate in wedding festivities with Raguel and his wife Edna; then they return to Tobit and his wife, Anna (8:4–11:1). Once the couple arrives, Tobiah follows the instructions of Raphael and heals his father’s blindness by smearing fish’s gall on his eyes (11:1–14). After wedding festivities with the family of Tobiah, the father and son seek to repay Azariah the guide. At this juncture, Raphael reveals his true identity as an angel (12:11–22). This revelation is followed by Tobit’s hymn of praise, which takes up the themes of exile, life in the Diaspora, and the restoration of Jerusalem, conveyed in idyllic terms (13:1–18). Thereafter, Tobit delivers a farewell discourse (or deathbed speech) to his son and grandsons, alluding to the exile of Judah and reiterating the importance of serving God faithfully (14:3–11). The narrator reports finally that Tobiah lives a long and prosperous life, providing proper burials for his parents, taking care of in-laws in Media, and witnessing the destruction of Nineveh (14:12–14). In sum, the book of Tobit provides satisfying resolutions for two struggling families, and readers are reminded that recompense—whether for an individual or the corporate people of God—occurs in God’s own time.

THEOLOGICAL HORIZONS

The book of Tobit is theologically rich with allusions to numerous traditions of the Hebrew scriptures/Old Testament. The book of Tobit emphasizes values and traditions celebrated in the Pentateuch. The protagonist is educated in (and the book recalls) the ways of Torah (1:8; also associated with instructions from the book of Moses in 6:13; 7:11–13) and remembers God through annual pilgrimages (1:6–7) in accordance with the teachings of the Pentateuch (Ex 23:14–17; Dt 12:1–14). He extols Jerusalem as the proper place for worship (1:4, 6) to which those later exiled will be returned (13:5; Dt 30:3). Tobit tithes (1:6–8; cf. Nm 18:20–32; Dt 14:22–29; 26:12), celebrates holy days like Pentecost (the feast of Weeks; 2:1; Lv 23:15–21; Dt 16:9–12), and attends to the proper burial of the dead (1:17–18; 2:7). The families of Tobit and Raguel also adhere to endogamy, or marrying someone from the same group (1:9; 4:12–13; 6:16; cf. Gn 24:7, 37–38; 29:19; Ex 34:16; Lv 20:22–26; Dt 7:3–4). Tobit also models love of God and neighbor through his generosity (1:16–17; cf. 4:7–11, 16; 12:8–9; 14:9), and he, as well as Sarah and Tobiah, deliver notable prayers in the short story (3:2–6, 11–15; cf. also 13:1–18). The happy ending of the book suggests that hope in God and trust in God's plan is warranted, not unlike the short story of Ruth. Parallels or shared motifs with the Exodus narrative, Deuteronomy, prophetic literature, Psalms and with wisdom literature like Proverbs have been suggested.

Still, the book of Tobit reminds readers of the challenges that confront even the most devout of persons. The work is at pains to communicate the goodness of the protagonists, who suffer nonetheless. In this respect the book concerns theodicy, or the question of whether God is just. Why would God allow the righteous to suffer? Although the traditional formulation of Deuteronomistic theology and some streams of traditional wisdom literature (e.g., Proverbs) suggest a sort of causal relationship between deeds and outcomes in this life (i.e., appropriate behavior leads to the good life), the book of Tobit adds suspense and, like the book of Job, perhaps a challenge to or nuancing of that proposition. If one accepts the conventional theory of retribution theology, it is not clear why Tobit suffers initially, given his good deeds. Unlike the psalmist, who cries from despair to be rescued lest he descend to Sheol, the harassed and disabled Tobit longs, like the weary Elijah, for death. As exemplary as Tobit and Sarah are, the two also represent the plight of humankind in their struggles with opposition, illness, or death of loved ones. Times of trial prompt existential questions of God's purpose and presence in the lives of humankind. Unlike the unknowable mysteries given to Job to contemplate in the face of unjust suffering (Jb 38–41) or the motif of retribution occurring in an afterlife (Dn 12), the travails in Tobit are worked out in this life via extraordinary events. These are shepherded along by a heavenly being (a scenario not unlike the story of Susanna where God’s agent, the precocious boy-hero Daniel, intervenes on behalf of the righteous protagonist). Unlike Jonah, where Nineveh repents and forestalls judgment, the book of Tobit includes notice of the city’s destruction witnessed by Tobiah; in the book of Tobit, the destruction emphasizes God’s decisive judgment in human affairs.

While human protagonists and antagonists are pivotal in plot resolutions in Susanna, Ruth, Judith, and Esther, Tobit calls attention to otherworldly beings as mediators and active agents in human affairs. Angels, or messengers of God, are to be found throughout the Hebrew scriptures, where they defend Divine prerogatives, accompany God in times of judgment, and, importantly, are intermediaries delivering messages. In the postexilic period, though, descriptions and roles of otherworldly beings become more elaborate and are given more attention in literature. Heavenly beings are given special designations and names; in Tobit, Raphael is one of seven angels who is permitted into God’s presence (12:15), and similarly in the book of Daniel, Michael is identified as a protector or patron angel of the people of God (Dn 12:1). The angels in Tobit and Daniel are especially comprehensible when viewed along with the rich portraits of angels found in other early Jewish texts. This literature, which includes texts omitted from the Bible such as 1 Enoch (also called the Ethiopic Book of Enoch), takes up how angels worship God in the heavenly sphere, protect and watch over humans, maintain the cosmos, and punish wrongdoers. Moreover, the literature describes otherworldly beings that have rebelled against God and challenge or fight against benevolent angels. Rebellious or fallen angels are also thought to antagonize humans and often associated with demons (cf. 1 Enoch 15:8–9, 11–12; 19:1, and Jubilees 10:1–5, writings considered among the pseudepigrapha). Tobit’s view of angels and demons is at home in apocalyptic and early Christian literature as well. These later writings feature angels who petition God on behalf of humankind (Mt 18:10), demons that cause human suffering (e.g., Mk 1:32–34; 5:2–10), and warring angels (Rev 12:7–9).

In addition to attention on otherworldly beings, the book of Tobit is optimistic in its view of creation (the book includes a portrait of canine companionship), community, family and marriage, citing Genesis 2, even while it acknowledges that malevolent beings like Asmodeus can interject disorder. The medicinal properties available from creation itself (here the gall, heart, and liver of a fish) that assist Sarah and then Tobit recall folk remedies; the heart and liver are used to drive the demon away. The gall of the fish is used as an ointment on Tobit's eyes, curing his blindness.

GENRE, COMMON MOTIFS, AND THE INTEGRITY OF THE BOOK

Literarily, the book of Tobit is characterized as a novella (prose fiction) or didactic short story. The work is associated also with the romance genre (an extended narrative that relays, from the vantage point of the protagonist, adventures or experiences). Various literary forms are also employed in this novella or romance. These include prayers (3:2–6, 11–15; 8:5–8, 15–17; 11:14–15), testaments (farewell discourses or, here, wisdom speeches (4:3–21; 12:6–10; 14:3–11), and a hymn (13:1–17). The angel's command to Tobit and Tobiah to record all that happened to them (12:20) also makes it possible to read the book as a memoir.

The book contains a shift from first-person narration (1:1–3:6) to a third-person narrator (3:7–14:15), a feature also found in Ezra-Nehemiah and the Genesis Apocryphon (written in Aramaic and found also among the Dead Sea Scrolls). Contemporary readers are struck also by the irony of Tobit: for example, when the title character declares that it should be as if God's angel would accompany and safeguard Tobiah on the journey (5:17), readers already know that the guide Azariah is, in fact, the angel Raphael. Key words include light and darkness, thus calling attention to Tobit's blindness, a cipher perhaps for his own spiritual growth; in the course of the book, Tobit and the readers learn that Providence does not work in a mechanistic manner (4:19; 13:2). Others find comic elements in the work (including Raguel's covert grave digging [8:8–11]) as might also be included in a Hellenistic novella.

The book of Tobit refers to the prophets and prophetic literature (Am 8:10 [cf. Tb 2:6] and Nahum [cf. Tb 14:4]), and evokes a number of biblical scenes. These include the betrothal of the patriarchs (like Isaac and Jacob), which involve messengers and/or the search for proper brides. The story of Joseph and the concern for an absent, beloved son, and court tales where Israelites or Jews serve foreign kings are also invoked. At the same time Tobit draws upon a range of traditions from the Near East. For example, while the biblical Ahiqar is a nephew of Tobit, who intercedes for him after he falls out of favor with Shalmaneser, extrabiblical traditions know him as a renowned sage of the Assyrian court. Not unlike Tobit, Ahiqar faced undeserved suffering, and his story came to circulate with collections of proverbs. The Jewish community of fifth-century Elephantine knew the traditions of Ahiqar, as did the author of the book of Tobit. At the same time, Tobit includes folklore motifs like the “grateful dead” (where the deceased assist persons who provided them proper burial [Tb 1:17; 2:3–7]) and the “dangerous bride”; the motivic lore, which circulated in Europe but has been traced eastward toward Caucasia and Armenia, is adapted to fit the religious nature of the book of Tobit. The demon’s name “Asmodeus” (3:8), perhaps deriving from Aesma Daeva (the Persian demon of wrath), and the appearance of an accompanying dog (6:2; 11:4), thought to have a special bond with humans in Zoroastrian tradition, also link the book with Persia.

Discontinuities and varied styles are often signs of editing (redaction), and can be clues that more than one author contributed to a composition. Since the book of Tobit works well as a short story with an edifying conclusion, it is possible that the book was composed by a single author. The sapiential (or wisdom-oriented) instructions of chapter 4 and the narrative frame (chapters 1; 13–14) that highlights Jerusalem strike some as conspicuous and different thematically from the travails of Tobit. Others have detected several distinctive layers to the book. If the book of Tobit results from the contributions of several authors, the strata are not striking enough, however, to lead to a consensus view on the matter.

The objective of the book of Tobit is not ultimately to provide a history lesson but to address themes of piety along with God’s justness and hand in guiding human affairs. The book is set in the Neo-Assyrian empire of the eighth–seventh centuries BC and makes reference to historical figures like Shalmaneser V, but there are many reasons for regarding the work as historical fiction. Confused geographical references and inaccurate sequences of named kings argue against the historicity of the account. The author may have purposefully sought an exilic setting (with geography understood as symbolic) in order to invoke a context of oppression and dislocation; an audience challenged by life under foreign dominion or by harsh circumstances would be invited to identify with (or situate themselves within) the story and its lessons.

The novella was more likely written sometime during the third or second century BC. The references to the “law of Moses” (1:8; 7:13) and “book of Moses” (6:13; 7:11–12) become common after the fourth century (cf. 2 Chr 23:18; 25:4; 30:16). The late second century is seen as a terminus ad quem because the book of Tobit does not allude to the tumultuous events under Antiochus IV (175–164 BC) and the Maccabean rebellion. The provenance of the work is more difficult to determine. The most commonly cited locations are Palestine, the eastern diaspora, Egypt, or other places in the western Levant like Damascus and Antioch.

Although not in the Hebrew Bible, which became authoritative for the Jewish community, Tobit was included among the Historical Writings in the Septuagint in Greek. From the Greek text, scholars had been aware of different textual versions or editions of Tobit—shorter and longer texts—which circulated in antiquity. The shorter text is represented in the Alexandrinus and Vaticanus codices (G<sup>1</sup>) and the longer in Sinaiticus (G<sup>2</sup>). The shorter is presumed now to be a condensed or abridged version of the long text. Another Greek recension is available in minuscules (G<sup>3</sup>). Semiticisms in Sinaiticus (G<sup>2</sup>) suggested that the Greek was translated from a Hebrew or Aramaic text of Tobit; when both Aramaic and Hebrew versions of Tobit, long lost, were recovered among the Dead Sea Scrolls, the conjecture that the book was written originally in a Semitic language prior to the Common Era (AD) was confirmed. Additionally two Latin editions are extant. An Old Latin translation, comprised of numerous Latin translations of Tobit prior to Jerome, resembles the longer Greek text (G<sup>2</sup>). There is also Jerome’s Vulgate translation, considered periphrastic; in addition to relying apparently on a Latin text, Jerome also reported having access to an Aramaic copy of Tobit for the Vulgate translation. Translations of Tobit exist in other classical languages (including Syriac, Coptic, Ethiopic, and Armenian) as well. The numerous manuscripts and editions of Tobit available suggest that there is not one extant text upon which one can depend if trying to reconstruct the original book. The fragmentary Aramaic and Hebrew manuscripts differ with one another. The manuscripts in Semitic languages tend to agree with the longer Greek text (G<sup>2</sup>), though on occasion G<sup>1</sup> (representing the shorter text) and G<sup>3</sup> agree with one another, the Semitic text types, and the Old Latin. While text-critical work may not be able to champion one extant manuscript as a base text, the various versions of Tobit can each yield valuable information about the respective translator or community that preserved the text.

OVERVIEW

The book of Judith takes up a theme familiar to readers of Scripture—who is truly sovereign and in control: a human ruler or God?—and presents it in a new guise. The book tells of the conflict between the followers of Nebuchadnezzar and of God, and how a pious Israelite is instrumental in demonstrating the importance of faith, as well as the inscrutability and superiority of Israel's God. The protagonist Judith is a widow who prevents the town of Bethulia from falling to the forces of the general Holofernes; moreover, her initiative and slaying of Holofernes ultimately prevents his forces from capturing Jerusalem and destroying the Temple.

The book of Judith emphasizes the majesty of God, whose ways may elude and confound the imperiled; readers are urged, though, not to test God in those times but rather to approach God with reverence and trust in the divine prerogative. Like other stories in the Hebrew scriptures, the book celebrates how God works in surprising ways to preserve God's people. Even while the book appears unusual due to its heroine's deception and violence, Judith alludes to numerous tropes and themes from the Hebrew scriptures. The ironic and entertaining narrative recalls earlier moments of despair in Israelite history as a way to bolster later audiences. It is especially likely that the book served initially as a theological resource for second- or first-century BC Jewish readers, facing Seleucid dominance or vigorous international challenges during the Hasmonean commonwealth.

Summary of the Story

The book of Judith is often presented as consisting of two parts: chapters 1–7 and chapters 8–16. While the heroine Judith is absent from chapters 1–7, these chapters should not be viewed as superfluous to the book. The first half of the book helps readers understand the grave plight of the people of Israel. Much like the first chapters of the book of Exodus, which explain how dire the situation of the enslaved Hebrews had become under the Pharaoh, Judith 1–7 recounts the menace facing the people of Judea and Samaria. The second half of the book provides a response to the challenges faced by the people of God. By means of an unanticipated and unconventional agent, God delivers God's people.

The story is set during the time of Nebuchadnezzar, presented in the book as king of the Assyrians (Jdt 1:1, 7, 11; 2:1, 4; 4:1). Nebuchadnezzar is enraged that peoples of the West would not form alliances with him against Arphaxad and he seeks revenge (Jdt 1:12; 2:1–4). He appoints Holofernes to lead both infantry and cavalry through the lands that did not ally with him and have the peoples there surrender and await punishment (2:5–13). The countries that resist Holofernes are decimated, frightening others who live in the region to acquiesce (2:23–28). The nations that do submit, though, conscript the men (3:6) and destroy sanctuaries or sacred spaces (3:8). The news leads the people of Israel to fear for the Temple, which had been rebuilt following the Exile (4:2–3). Since Bethulia occupies a strategic place near mountain passes that allow access to Jerusalem, the town's people are charged by the high priest Joakim to help ward off armies passing through (4:6–8). As Holofernes learns about Israel's defensive preparations, he asks for information about the people and their leader (Jdt 5:1–4). Achior, leader of the Ammonites, then summarizes for Holofernes much of Israelite history and gives voice to a Deuteronomistic refrain: as long as the Israelites do not sin, they prosper. If they disobey God, they are assailable (5:17–21). Holofernes is outraged by Achior's bold claims and has him delivered to Bethulia. Rather than take the mountain passes, Holofernes is urged to control the water supply for Bethulia, leading to a siege (7:1–18). Although the people of the town cry out to God, they grow weary and faint from lack of water. In their distress, they criticize the rulers of the city for not making peace with the Assyrians (7:19–29). Uzziah, one of the town's leaders, proposes a five-day window for God to act. If God doesn't help within that period, Uzziah is ready to submit (7:29–32).

The second half of the book brings resolution to the dire situation. Readers are introduced to Judith, the wealthy widow of a fellow Simeonite from Bethulia (8:1–3). Judith, a God-fearing woman, is an extraordinarily pious widow; she remains in sackcloth in a tent atop her house, fasting with the exception of sabbaths and feast days (8:4, 6, 8). Judith follows this austere path, even though her beauty and exceptional means would have permitted a very different lifestyle (8:7). When learning of the despair and grumbling of the people of Bethulia and of Uzziah's plan, Judith calls together the elders of the city and takes them to task. From Judith's vantage, the people have put the LORD to the test and, by giving him an ultimatum, have imagined themselves in the place of God (8:11–16). Judith announces, however, that she has other plans for saving Bethulia (8:28–36).

Judith and her maid go to the Assyrian outpost, where she requests to have an audience with Holofernes. He is taken with the beauty of Judith and reassures her of her safety (10:20–11:4). Judith informs the general that the people of Bethulia intend to sin and therefore, will bring upon themselves God's wrath (11:5–14). She asks to be allowed to go out to the ravine each night to pray so that God might reveal to her when the Israelites have sinned and will be vulnerable to the armies of Nebuchadnezzar (11:16–19). For three nights, Judith is allowed to exit the camp and go to the ravine where she prays. On the fourth night, Holofernes arranges for a banquet with Judith at which he plans to seduce her; Judith accepts the invitation and sits with him as he drinks to excess (12:10–20). When Holofernes passes out from the wine, she decapitates him with his own sword and, taking his head, she and her maid depart from the camp under the ruse of going to pray (13:4–10). Judith and her maid return to the Bethulia and she reveals to the people of the city that God has shattered their enemy by means of her hand. When the latter's headless corpse is discovered, the commanders become troubled, the troops fall into disarray, and are overwhelmed by Israelite soldiers (14:11–15:3). Judith is then blessed by the high priest, the elders of Israel, and the women of Israel, who perform a dance in her honor. The book concludes with the people's three-month celebration and worship before the Temple in Jerusalem (16:18–20), and Judith returns to pious widowhood and long life (16:21–25).

Theological Horizons

The theology of the book of Judith suggests a rich engagement with tropes and themes from Israelite tradition likely known to the work's initial audience. The book is oriented around the premise that God alone is sovereign with no human rival, whether Pharaoh (Ex 1:10–11), kings of neighboring lands (Is 13–23), or Nebuchadnezzar (Jdt 3:8). God's omnipotence as creator is highlighted, as is God's omniscience (Jdt 9:5–6, 12, 14; 16:13–14). Not unlike the book of Job, only God comprehends the universe and the divine design that informs it (Jdt 8:14; 9:5–6). Such knowledge is to call people to fidelity and unfailing trust (Jdt 8:17). Unlike those who have thought themselves equal to God or have attempted to usurp the Divine prerogative, the people of God are to humble themselves before God (4:9–13) and to behave scrupulously (Jdt 6:19; 8:12, 15–20). In manifold ways, Judith also surveys Israel’s history (Jdt 5:6–19; 8:26–27; 9:2–4). The book highlights the patriarchs (5:7–10; 8:26–27; 9:2–4), the Exodus (5:10–14), the period of the judges and monarchy (5:15–17), the destruction of the “temple of their God” (5:18) and return from “the Diaspora” (5:19). The temple (4:2, 12), sacrificial system (4:3; 16:18) and temple authorities (high priests and priests; 4:8, 14–15) are presumed by the narrator. Judith’s behavior and that of the people suggest that observing God’s instruction or Torah is expected (8:4–8, 18–20, 27).

Comparable to views articulated in Deuteronomistic theology (e.g., Dt 11:22–24; Jos 23:5–16), the land of Israel is depicted in Judith as a gift dependent upon the behavior of the people of Israel (Jdt 8:18–19; 9:12–13). Noteworthy is that the book has an expansive view of Israel, which consists of the people in Judea, Samaritan territory (Jdt 4:4), and converts (Jdt 14:10). Essential to this idyllic Israel is the well-functioning Temple in Jerusalem—and in the narrative it is the Second Temple (4:3)—that must be defended (8:21, 24). This sacred space is not the inviolate sanctuary of Zion in Psalm 48; the people know its vulnerability (Jdt 4:1–2; 9:8).

The story recalls also the various trials of Israel; God’s people are often vulnerable and must rely upon God’s intervention on their behalf (Jdt 9:11; 16:11). In various contexts and times, God’s people are imperiled by a hostile power and seemingly without the means to save themselves. In these hopeless situations God intervenes (e.g., Ex 1–15), because God is a God of the humble, ally of the insignificant, champion of the weak (Jdt 9:11). The people are not to put trust in an earthly monarch, alliances, or worldly conventions in order to save themselves; instead, the people must act accordingly and trust in God (Is 7; Jdt 8:17). How should God’s people conduct themselves? People should observe the law, be scrupulous in piety (Jdt 11:12–13), and still anticipate challenges or tests (Jb 1–2; Jdt 8:25–27). In assisting the vulnerable, the Bible often presents the deity engaging unlikely protagonists who carry out God’s plan. Judith is an instance of exactly the sort of unanticipated person—Moses (Ex 4:13), Rahab (Jos 2:1–21), Jael (Jgs 4:17–5:27) also come to mind—who is used by God to affect great change in this story.

Inasmuch as the book concludes with violence, it is helpful to recall that it is not unusual in the Hebrew scriptures to have God's will manifested amid warfare and strife. Charismatic military leaders, like Deborah (Jgs 4–5), other judges of yore, and successful monarchs like David (1 Sm 18–2 Sm 8) serve as the instruments by which God defeats enemies. Judith, following the ancient Greek version, the Septuagint, of Exodus 15:3, twice proclaims that God crushes war (Jdt 9:7; 16:2), and the book challenges the military force paraded by Nebuchadnezzar, an antagonist who could stand in for an overconfident military leader of any era (Jdt 9:7–11) or a person or people secure in their own might and power. By the end of the book of Judith, the defenseless prevail and Nebuchadnezzar dies by his own sword (Jdt 13:6–8; cf. 1 Sm 17:51). Judith, on the other hand, models a form of asceticism (8:4–8; 16:19–24), an approach to life that becomes more visible in the late Second Temple period and anticipates early Christian views of chastity.

Genre, Common Motifs, and the Integrity of the Book

In terms of genre considerations, the book of Judith has been characterized as a Jewish Hellenistic novel, as a short story with a religious dimension, or as fictional drama. Like the Hellenistic novel, Judith juxtaposes eroticism and chastity. The work also makes generous use of humor and irony. These moments occur especially in the interactions between Judith and the Assyrians—for example, Judith tells Holofernes that God has sent her to him to accomplish astonishing things, and he is flattered (Jdt 11:16)—with the result that the foes come across as sinful. Comparable scenes and parallels have been noted in the writing of Herodotus, and some Greek and Hellenistic historians tend to present Nebuchadnezzar as king of the Assyrians. Further, selections from Eupolemus (a second-century Jewish historian), preserved by Eusebius, offer a view of geography compatible with that found in Judith. These sorts of literary resemblances and equivalents often signal the use of sources or of influential contemporaneous works. More decisive to the book of Judith are, however, motifs and narratives well-known from the Hebrew scriptures. In addition to evoking much of the scope of the Hebrew Bible and the theological emphases found therein, Judith has innumerable allusions to particular accounts or persons from the Hebrew Bible. Some are explicit. For example, in her prayer (Jdt 9) Judith recounts the story of Dinah and her defilement by Shechem (Gn 34), a counterpart to the potential violation of Judith's community by outsiders (Jdt 9:2–4). The juxtaposition also hints that just as the violation of Dinah called for a strong response, one that required both deception and violence, now God's people and the sanctuary need protection (Jdt 9:7–14). Among the many allusions, one might note that God's victory "by the hand of a female" over an earthly tyrant (Jdt 16:5) echoes the very language used of other biblical heroes; God uses the hand of Moses (an unassuming leader; Ex 4:10; 6:30; Lv 8:36; 26:46; Nm 27:23) and the hand of David (introduced as a boy with a slingshot; 1 Sm 17:40, 46) in defeating seemingly invincible foes. The grumbling of the thirsty people during the siege of Bethulia (7:23–27) recalls the grumbling of the Israelites during their time wandering in the desert (Ex 15:23–24; 17:1–4; cf. Ex 16:2–3). Achior, the insightful foreigner who seems to speak with a prophetic tongue, is like Balaam (Nm 22–24). The general scenario is also evocative of the military leaders of the time of the Judges and the motif of a monarch who is perceived as a god is much like the numerous kings of the Near East that attempt to put themselves in the position of God (2 Kgs 18:19–25; Is 10:12–15; 14:12–20).

While the book of Judith may have been informed by preceding historiography, reminiscences of an earlier invasion of the region, and biblical traditions, the received book manifests literary integrity and a clear structure. The two halves, Judith 1–7 and Judith 8–16, are symmetrical (with paired contrasts and parallels), present clear chiasmic structures (inverted parallelism), and work together in the narrating the story. Because chapter 16 consists of Judith's Hymn of Deliverance, some have wondered whether it is original to the work. The final chapter of Judith reaffirms, however, the integrity of the book. Judith 16 provides a fitting summary of the narrative in poetic form and mirrors the hymns that follow narratives (e.g., the "Song of the Sea" [Ex 15:1–21] and Deborah's Canticle [Jgs 5]).

Surprising Aspects of Judith

Readers might be surprised by the protagonist Judith (a strong woman) who rescues her people. The character can challenge readers' expectations on different fronts. Could a reclusive widow (a member of a vulnerable social group) save her people, when the male authorities in Bethulia and Jerusalem appear to be failing at that very task? Furthermore, the way Judith saves her people (deceiving and then beheading a general) is striking.

Is Judith, who dupes and then slays Holofernes, truly a heroine? What are readers to make of her duplicity? Nonetheless, the character of Judith stands in a long line of resilient women in the Hebrew scriptures who effect significant change. Israelite women, from Deborah (Jgs 4–5) and Huldah (2 Kgs 22:14–20) to Esther, play key roles in preserving their people. While contemporary readers might wonder about the morality of Judith (her deception ends with the death of the Holofernes), it is useful to remember that many cultural contexts expect underdogs or the weaker party in social scenarios to use their wits to help them survive. Such instances are observed with Abram in presenting Sarai as his sister (Gn 12) or with the midwives who lie to Pharaoh as to why the Israelite baby boys survive when they were commanded to kill them (Ex 1:15–22). This sort of story whereby the weaker party survives by means of cunning is typically used to explain Jacob’s deception of Isaac (Gn 27:1–35), the “secret message” of Ehud that ends in the death of Eglon (Jgs 3:15–23), or Jael’s “hospitality” to Sisera (Jgs 4:17–21). The latter case is especially pertinent to the story of Judith. Jael invites Sisera, the commander of King Jabin to take shelter in her tent when he is at war with the Israelites, only to strike him dead with a tent peg when he lets down his guard (Jgs 4:21). An ancient audience might well have understood Jael as using strengths available to her, while also preventing further loss of life at the hands of Sisera; as the mother of Sisera is imagined to say: had Sisera been successful in routing the Israelites, he would have raped women (Jgs 5:30; cf. Jdt 4:12) in addition to killing the men of the community. While contemporary morality is challenged by these instances of deceit, an ancient reader may have viewed the story through a very different lens.

Readers today should also consider what Judith represents in the book. While the name “Judith,” which means “Jewess” (or “Jewish woman”), might point toward a paradigmatic character to which each Israelite or Judean should aspire, the character also personifies the totality of the people of God or the nation, as an equivalent to Daughter Zion. In times when the people were taken to task, the prophets described them as a wayward daughter (Jer 2–3) or as an unfaithful spouse (Hos 1–2). In Christian tradition, the people of God (i.e., the Church) is presented as an adorned bride (Rev 21:2; cf. Rev 19:7–8). What does it mean, then, for the people to be depicted as a pious widow? One possible reading of the book could be that the figure of Judith articulates a confidence in the goodness of the people of God (Jdt 8:18–20), but also an emphasis on their vulnerability in different historical periods. Such was the case when the book was likely written in the second century BC. This particular century often saw Judea attempting to defend itself against hostile, invasive foreign powers (see, e.g., Dn 7–12); even with some autonomy under the Hasmoneans, the fledgling state of Judea was regularly engaged in international wrangling and subjected to shifting political alliances, scenarios familiar from earlier periods of the people’s history (1 Mc 3–16). This context should certainly be kept in mind as one attempts to make sense of the morality of the book of Judith. At the least, readers are encouraged to consider that the book comes from a cultural context completely different from their own and that the Israelites are in a defensive position, are clearly outnumbered, and without the same military resources as their foes (2:14–27).

Textual Witnesses and Historical Context of the Book

The book of Judith is authoritative for Roman Catholics and Orthodox Christians; like certain other writings preserved in Greek and found in the Septuagint, Judith is not in the Hebrew Bible. For this reason, the book was excluded later from the Protestant Old Testament, but along with other writings from the Septuagint it is included in the Protestant Apocrypha. The most ancient version of the book available to us is in Greek and of these, Septuagint manuscripts Vaticanus and Alexandrinus are thought to contain the best Greek text of Judith.

The Greek version of Judith is thought to be the basis for translations into other classical languages such as Syriac and Coptic. Jerome noted, however, his use of a Semitic (Aramaic) form of Judith, combined with older Latin texts, when translating the book for the Vulgate. Though not extant, a Hebrew Vorlage (prior version) was assumed to stand behind the Greek version of Judith; a Hebrew original was thought to best explain certain awkward words or phrases in the Greek version of Judith, and some expressions of the Greek also showed up as literal renderings of Hebrew idioms. More recently scholars have suggested that Judith could easily reflect a Hebraized Greek, a style of Greek meant to imitate the conventions of a Semitic language. It is even possible that the book of Judith not only draws upon Septuagintal texts when referencing the Hebrew scriptures but also simulates the style of Greek. Medieval manuscripts of Judith that exist in Hebrew are thought by some scholars to be translations made from the Vulgate. Still, given the differences among the early extant Greek texts (and corresponding Old Latin), the Vulgate's Latin (perhaps based, in part, on an Aramaic translation) potentially reflected also in medieval Hebrew manuscripts, and Judith midrashim in medieval works, it is entirely possible that pluriform Judith traditions circulated in antiquity.

The setting of the book of Judith and the characters presented in the work are confused and chronologically incomprehensible. Judith's story is set during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Assyria who rules in Nineveh; an audience at all familiar with the Hebrew scriptures or Israelite history knows that Nebuchadnezzar was the king of the Babylonians (reviled for destroying Solomon's temple and exiling the people of Judah)—not the Assyrians, an earlier superpower of the Near East. In addition, the city of Nineveh was destroyed before Nebuchadnezzar became king. These and other anachronisms hint at how readers (ancient and contemporary) should approach Judith in terms of genre expectations. The implausible setting of Judith could serve as an intentional literary device to signal to readers that the basis of this story is "timeless"—an "old story" that is relevant to many contexts. Put another way, the temporal and geographical span where centuries of Jewish history are telescoped by the book into a singular conflict could have a very purposeful function. In this way, the account narrates a truly transcendent story: the recurring story of God's defeat of the humans who fashion themselves to be the deity's equal (Jdt 6:3). At the same time, though, the anachronisms signal that the historical context in which the book was composed is not communicated through the setting of the story but rather requires some excavating.

Features of the book's writing find distinctive parallels from the Persian and Greek periods. For example, in the fourth century, Artaxerxes III Ochus launched an attack on the West, and had a general named Holofernes accompanied by Bagoas (cf. Jdt 12:11). Allusions to the wearing of garlands (Jdt 3:7; 15:13) or the practice of reclining at meals (Jdt 12:15) are also suggestive of Greek customs, all of which could well have circulated in the Near East by the late fourth century BC. While there could be earlier forms of a story about an invasion from the East which circulated at that time, there is much to suggest that the book of Judith in its received form derives from the late second century or from the first quarter of the first century BC. Judith is frequently compared with Judas Maccabee (d. 161 BC), who, according to 1 and 2 Maccabees, plays a leading role in liberating Judea from Seleucid (“Syrian”; in Judith “Assyrian”) aggression; with feminine and masculine forms of the same name, both Judith and Judas rescue the people of God from foreign foes. Also, a number of details in the book of Judith recall the time of the Maccabees and Hasmonean dynasty. The fate of Nicanor (cf. 1 Mc 7:47; 2 Mc 15:30–35) is much like the decapitation of Holofernes and public presentation of the head (Jdt 14:11); the deaths of these commanders are said to have the same result: they are meant to strike fear in Israel’s enemy (1 Mc 7:44–46; Judith). The depiction of Israel consisting of Judea and Samaria and accepting of converts recalls perfectly the period of John Hyrcanus, a Hasmonean king and descendant of Simon Maccabee (135–104 BC); Hyrcanus annexed Samaria and forcibly converted Idumeans. Moreover, the remark in Judith 4:3 that the temple vessels, the altar, and the temple itself had only recently been purified from profanation (a claim missing from the Vulgate’s version) could be read as another possible connection to the time of the Maccabees. For some, the reference in Judith to the sanctuary’s “recent” desecration and purification allude to the profanation of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mc 3:51; 2 Mc 6:2–5) and its subsequent cleansing associated especially with Judas Maccabee. In later Jewish tradition, the figure of Judith was often associated with the celebration of Hanukkah. For this reason, many scholars today are wont to locate the book of Judith around the 100 BC; some even speculate that perhaps the book was written during the time when another strong widow led Israel: the Hasmonean queen Shalemzion (Salome Alexandra; 76–67 BC), widow of Alexander Janneus.

ESTHER

OVERVIEW

The central concern of this Diaspora novella is the survival of a Jewish minority in the midst of an increasingly hostile world. The book of Esther recounts a threat to the community's survival, as well as the removal of that threat through the involvement of Mordecai, a Jewish courtier in the service of the Persian emperor and his ward Esther. Like Judith, the central character in this book is a beautiful Jewish woman whose beauty, courage, and wit save her people from certain destruction. The stories of both Esther and Mordecai recall the court tales of Joseph (in Genesis) and Daniel: these figures live as religious minorities outside of Palestine where they face challenges but also acquire privileged roles within courts. The book of Esther (not unlike the book of Ruth) accords God a subtler role. God does not intervene directly to resolve problems, though the book of Esther, especially the Greek version, makes clear that God does act in order to preserve God's people.

Textual Versions and Reception

Two principal versions of the book of Esther are extant: a Hebrew version and a Greek version. The Hebrew version as preserved in the Masoretic tradition came to be included in the Hebrew Bible. Rabbis (by late antiquity) came to recognize Esther's canonicity after a long debate precipitated by the fact that the Hebrew text of Esther mentions neither God nor any religious institutions and practices except fasting. The other version of Esther, available in Greek and with additional passages, was preserved ultimately by Christians. There are, in fact, two Greek versions of Esther. One is utilized in the Septuagint and is also known as the Old Greek version; the other is referred to as the Alpha text. There continues to be some speculation about the origins of the additional selections in the Greek text that are lacking in the Hebrew Esther. At least some selections of the Greek additions are thought to be translations from a Hebrew original, but these source texts would have differed in some respects from the version of Esther in the Hebrew Bible today.

The Greek text is distinctive vis-à-vis the Hebrew version in the following manner. Greek Esther has about 107 verses more than the Hebrew version. The additional selections introduce religious elements (e.g., the prayers of Mordecai and Esther in C:1–30; concern for dietary and marriage laws; reference to the Temple). In contrast, the Hebrew version lacks reference to God except for the possible allusion in 4:14 (see note to 4:14) and is not overtly religious. It is a tale about how a community under siege uses its wits to outsmart its enemies and survives. The Greek version of Esther also introduces “documents” (B:1–7; E:1–24) into the narrative, which lend an air of authority and authenticity to the book. The additions make the book read as if it were a historical work. Such documents also serve to encourage the celebration of the Feast of Purim (F:10) with which the story of Esther was associated. Scholars have noted that in some respects Esther functions especially as the heroine in the Hebrew text, while in the Greek version Mordecai and God take center stage in the protection of the people.

Readers of the NABRE might find the order and numbering of chapters and verses a perplexing aspect of the shape of this book. There are six chapters that have alphabetic identification (A–F) scattered in the midst of ten chapters that have the more familiar numerical identification (see also the outline in the introduction to the book of Esther). This form is a result of the way the book of Esther has been received. Jerome did not believe that the additional verses of the Greek Esther were inspired, so when he produced his Latin translation, he took the additional verses in the Greek Esther out of their proper context and put them in an appendix to the book. When chapter and verse numbers were given to biblical texts during the Middle Ages, these additions received their numbers according to the position they had in Jerome’s Vulgate rather than according to their proper position in the Greek version of the book. The canonical status of the additional selections of Greek Esther was not settled for Catholics until the Council of Trent (1545–63) decided in their favor. (The Protestant churches do not accept the additional passages in Greek Esther as canonical.) The arrangement of the text of Esther in the NABRE reflects the attempts to follow the order of the Greek version of Esther while preserving the traditional numbering of chapters and verses following Jerome’s arrangement. This seems to be the best solution possible in the circumstances. It allows the reader to find the additions in their proper contexts, and it preserves the numeration of chapters and verses that is universally followed.

The Story

At first the story sounds like a typical tale of palace intrigue. Two royal officials, Mordecai the Jew and Haman the Agagite, are presented as rivals in the court of the Persian emperor. In chapter 3 the story takes an ominous turn. Haman plots to destroy Mordecai as well as the entire Jewish community of the Persian empire. Additions A and F (Mordecai's dream and its interpretation) with their imagery of the two dragons and the phenomena in heaven and earth (A:4–10) transport the conflict to a cosmic level. Addition F makes it clear that it was God who saved Israel (F:5–9). When Esther joins Mordecai in a plan to frustrate Haman's murderous plots, the tension is resolved. What was to be a pogrom, an officially organized massacre, against the Jews becomes a celebration of the Jews because Haman and his conspiracy fail.

The Personalities in the Story

Haman and Mordecai

The story refers to Haman as an Agagite (3:1), that is, a descendant of Agag, who was the king of the Amalekites whom earlier traditions remembered as the most dangerous of ancient Israel's opponents (Ex 17:14; Dt 25:17–19). Mordecai's genealogy (1:1) makes him a descendant of Kish, the father of Saul (see 1 Sm 9:1). At the conclusion of his conflict with Agag, Saul wanted to spare the life of this enemy of Israel and is criticized for it (1 Sm 15:8f). Mordecai makes no such mistake regarding Haman (Est 7:9f).

Vashti and Esther

The story of Esther begins with the deposition of Vashti, the queen of Persia. Vashti lost her position as queen because she refused to obey the command of her husband, Ahasuerus, the king of Persia. At his own banquet, the king became drunk and ordered his wife to "display her beauty” before his male courtiers (1:11). Because she declined to submit to this indignity, the king’s officials advised the king to remove her as queen. They feared that their wives might imitate her example and refuse to be submissive and obedient (1:16–18). The king then issued “an irrevocable royal decree” deposing Vashti and insisting that “all wives will honor their husbands” (1:19–22). Esther, an orphaned Jewish girl who was the ward and cousin of Mordecai, won the beauty contest that determined Vashti’s replacement (2:1–10). The name “Esther” was a Mesopotamian name; her Hebrew name was Hadassah (see note to 2:7). Vashti is considered a heroine, according to a feminist reading of the text; she refuses to become an “object” and insists on her dignity as a person, even though her stance means that she loses her position as queen. Esther appears in the Hebrew version as obedient to the king (and Mordecai). Later, Esther does challenge the authority of the king, though, approaching him when she has not been summoned—the mirror image of Vashti’s act. Moreover, Esther reverses the situation of Vashti in that she succeeds in summoning the king to the banquet she hosts. Esther (in her situation), in fact, is said to epitomize the plight of diaspora communities. She must carefully negotiate a potentially perilous environment by working within the structure.

The Historical Character of the Book

The historicity of the book has been called into question for the following reason; details in Esther cannot be reconciled with what is known of Persian history during the reign of Xerxes (here called Ahasuerus) in the fifth century. Because the author of Esther shows a familiarity with the royal court and administrative system of Persia, some scholars have favored a date toward the end of the Persian period for the bulk of the text. The genre of the work also reminds readers as to how they should approach Esther: the book is a novella that addresses the theme of the persecuted righteous and their deliverance.

The Book of Esther and the Feast of Purim

The book of Esther also offers an etiology for the festival of Purim. According to F:10, the feast of Purim is to be celebrated on the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar (February/March), commemorating their deliverance (cf. also 9:26–32). The name of the feast (Purim) means “lots” and is a reference to 3:7 and 9:24, 26. The Bible mentions this feast nowhere else except in a possible allusion in 2 Mc 15:36 that mentions “Mordecai’s Day.”

The Theological Horizons of the Book

Like the Joseph story (Gn 37–50) and the Succession Narrative (1 Sm 9–20; 1 Kgs 1–2), God remains in the background in the book of Esther. The Hebrew version of the Esther story never mentions God except for what may be an oblique reference in 4:14 (see note to 4:14). The rise of Esther to the position of queen of Persia allowed her to defend the Jews, in a manner similar to that of Joseph. The latter, who rises to the position as second only to the pharaoh in Egypt (Gn 41:37–43), is placed where he could later save his family (Gn 50:20f). Similarly the succession of Solomon to David’s throne was according to the divine will (2 Sm 12:24f), but it occurred without direct divine intervention. Solomon ascended the throne of David following the successful machinations of Nathan, his mother, Bathsheba, and courtiers who supported his accession (1 Kgs 1).

The story of Esther describes intrigue and plots by the antagonists and countermoves by the protagonists. The absence of any explicit references to God in the Hebrew version of the story may have been a deliberate attempt to emphasize the importance of the Jews being able to defend themselves when faced with hostility. The additional texts in the Greek emphasize religious dimensions of the story:

Additions A and F. The story of Mordecai’s dream and its interpretation make it clear that God controls the final destiny of Israel. Esther is the deliverer whom God chose in answer to the prayers of the Jews.

Addition B. The decree of the Persian monarch against the Jews shows how some Gentiles regarded specifically Jewish observances as evidence of their disloyalty to the king (esp. 4–7).

Addition C. This addition contains the prayers of Mordecai and Esther. The text makes it clear that the deliverance of the Jews is in response to those prayers. C:26–29 answers any objections that readers might raise about the propriety of Esther’s marriage to a non-Jew. The reference in C:20 to the Temple is an anomaly, given the setting of the story in the Diaspora.

Addition D. Verses 2 and 8 assert that the king’s change of opinion regarding the Jews resulted from God’s response to the prayer of Esther.

Addition E. God condemns the enemy of Israel (vv. 2–6). The king finds the Jews innocent of all the accusations that Haman brought against them (vv. 15–16). The king acclaims the God of the Jews as ruler over all (v. 21).

A Christian Reading of the Book and Tales from the Diaspora and Today's Migrants

The message of the book of Esther has an important and positive role in the Christian canon. It offers an opportunity to check the tendency to spiritualize the people of ancient Israel and their contemporary descendants. The biblical text helps Christians to build on statements in the Second Vatican Council's Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra Aetate), article 4, which pertains to Jewish communities past and present and interreligious dialogue.

Stories about life in the Diaspora (Est; Tb; Dn 1–6) suggest that fidelity to Jewish religious traditions is not easy for Jews living outside Palestine. The special circumstances that come from living outside the Promised Land and apart from the community of faith contribute to a special feeling of vulnerability for a minority community. For such a community there could be numerous potential threats. With the greater mobility that is characteristic of our age, there are more and more people who can identify with the Jewish characters in these tales from the Diaspora. Immigrants of other periods might relate to diaspora tales like Esther. Immigrants may sometimes feel that they must choose between economic and political security and their own cultural and religious identities. Aware of those needs, Pope Paul VI issued his Instruction on the Pastoral Care of People Who Migrate (1969). Responding to the pope's initiative, the bishops of the United States issued The Church and the Immigrant (1976) and established the Bishops' Committee on Migration to respond to the needs of immigrants to this country. One of the main duties of this committee is to help today's immigrants adjust to their new life in a new and sometimes threatening cultural milieu. Specifically, the committee concerns itself with immigration laws, the problems of undocumented immigrants, economic and social discrimination experienced by people on the move, and pastoral initiatives to help people who feel the dislocation that comes with being an immigrant. One of the achievements of this committee was the preparation of "Together, a New People," a pastoral statement on migrants and refugees published by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in 1986.

1 MACCABEES

[see pages 628–664 of the Old Testament]

OVERVIEW

First Maccabees describes a critical moment in Jewish history. This book, like 2 Maccabees, concerns the trials faced by God’s people in the second century BC, challenges precipitated (according to these works) by Seleucid oppression and apostasy. Set against this backdrop, the two books—whose customary designations associate them with the Maccabee family—take up the weighty topics of assimilation, abolition of traditions, annihilation of a community, and resistance to internal and external threats. Both 1 and 2 Maccabees lead readers toward a new chapter in the history of Israel when, following a long period of foreign occupation, the Jews of Palestine wrest control of the land from external forces. Despite their comparable titles and treatment of second-century crises, 1 and 2 Maccabees are not sequential accounts in the same manner as 1 and 2 Samuel, nor are they from the same hand.

First Maccabees is especially concerned with chronicling the family that shepherds Israel through a time of subjugation and provides the foundation for the Second Commonwealth (or Second Temple). The family comes to be associated with the nickname Maccabeus (apparently “hammer-like”), which was given to the son Judas; the dynasty that emerged from it would be known as the Hasmoneans. To demonstrate continuity with Israel’s past, the book associates the challenges of the Second Temple period as well as significant leaders with biblical exemplars; just as previous hardships were successfully navigated and overcome by strong leaders, so too a family emerges in the time of the persecutions of Antiochus IV to lead God’s people. This family, with priestly ties as well as military and political acumen, and those who work with them make consistent gains toward an independent Jewish state. While the book of 1 Maccabees may inspire with its account of resistance to domination and liberation from external powers, contemporary readers are also aware how the book might be perceived as promoting violence in the name of religion. Further, when placed in the context of the second and first centuries BC, the book can be read as legitimating the religious and political leadership of a particular dynasty.

Background for the Account

Significant change in the Mediterranean and Near East occurred with rise of Alexander the Great and his successors. Alexander, an accomplished military leader from Macedonia, gained vast territory through conquests and the defeat of the Persian Empire in the latter half of the fourth century (cf. 1 Mc 1:1–4). An untimely death (ca. 323) left Alexander without a clear heir; his officers (referred to as the Diadochoi) and their families then seized control of Alexander's empire and divided it among themselves. Thereafter, successors in Egypt (the Ptolemies) and Mesopotamia (the Seleucids) would contend for regional preeminence over the course of two centuries. In the quest to control the Levant, the hostilities and military confrontations of the Ptolemies and Seleucids regularly had an impact on the land of Judea.

Regional strife and warring hegemonies were not, however, the only legacies of Alexander. With the military campaigns and conquests, Alexander and his troops brought Greek culture, mores, and language. The introduction and assumption of a Greek culture, heavily infused with other Near Eastern traditions with which it came into contact during this time, is referred to as hellenization, and Jewish communities in Palestine and the Diaspora would receive this cultural force variously. While some Jews engaged Greek culture and practices (to differing degrees), others deemed assimilation to the way of the nations (cf. 1 Mc 1:11) to be problematic as it could diminish traditional Torah practices (see, e.g., 2 Mc 4:10–17). In addition to the rivalry of the Ptolemies and Seleucids for regional dominance and the challenges to cultural and religious identities, the second century also witnessed divisive internal politics in Judea. First Maccabees alludes to some of the schisms that emerge in divergent responses to the Seleucid presence and persecution (e.g., 2:16; 2:31–38; 2:42–44). Yet 2 Maccabees (esp. chaps. 3 and 4) provides insight into the competition of several prominent—in many cases priestly—families of Second Temple Judea that exacerbate domestic discord and Seleucid involvement. Significant in this regard was the position of high priest, conferring at this time stature and authority, which different individuals sought to obtain; while 1 Maccabees alludes minimally to the wrangling for the office, 2

Maccabees and certain writings from the Dead Sea Scrolls make clear the jockeying for and contention around the high priesthood. First Maccabees, just as other sources, offers a distinctive depiction of the challenges noted and of this volatile period.

SUMMARY OF THE BOOK

First Maccabees begins its account of crisis in Judea and Jewish resistance against second-century foes at the time of Alexander the Great (d. 323) in the fourth century. Then, eclipsing a hundred years, 1 Maccabees advances from this illustrious conqueror and his successors (Diadochoi) to the book's primary antagonist: Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mc 1:10; 175–164 BC). The narrative portrays Alexander and the successors of his empire in negative terms so that the condensation of history has the effect of linking “arrogant” Alexander (1:3) and the next generation of leaders who spread evil on earth (1:9) to the “sinful offshoot,” Antiochus IV (1:10; cf. Is 11:1). Simultaneously the narrative obscures a century (305–198 BC) of ostensibly benign relations of Judea with the Ptolemies of Egypt. In fact, additional sources like 2 Maccabees and Josephus are necessary to clarify the various actors involved and their motivations.

After introducing Antiochus Epiphanes, the narrator turns to apostates in Judea, individuals who broke traditional law (Torah), sought alliances with Gentiles, and embraced Gentile institutions such as the gymnasium (1:11–15). Perhaps most disturbing for the narrator is the shift in allegiance as the apostates choose relationship with Gentiles over their covenant with God (as is suggested by the desire to cover over the mark of circumcision; 1:15). These apostates, like Antiochus IV and his allies, are seen as threatening Jewish tradition. Antiochus IV reemerges in the narrative, plundering the Temple in Jerusalem after an invasion of Egypt (1:16–24); the act leaves “Israel,” her virgins, young men, brides, and bridegrooms to mourn the desecration of the sanctuary (1:25–28). Two years later, a Mysian commander (Apollonius, as suggested by 2 Mc 5:24) gains the trust of the people but then pillages Jerusalem; the establishment of a citadel (or Akra) not far from the Temple in which collaborators dwelt is especially distressing (1:29–35). Though the looting of the Temple and fortified installation in the heart of Jerusalem are lamented (1:36–40), the prohibition of Judaism with persecution of those engaging in traditional practices (ca. 167 BC) is the most intrusive and far-reaching of Antiochus IV's acts (1:41– 61). The suppression of Jewish tradition, construction of “pagan” altars and temples, and desecration of the Temple elicit different responses among those who identify themselves with Israel. Some followed the practices advocated by the king (1:43, 52), while some went into hiding (1:53). Others refusing the decrees of the king and persisting in Jewish traditions—like the mothers who had their sons circumcised—were put to death (1:50; 1:60–63). The suppression of Judaism and imposition of a cult on the part of Antiochus IV are thought to be unusual in this context; a possible explanation for such anomalous actions could be the Seleucid monarch’s desire to quell potential rebellion among agitated subjects.

After setting the stage, the narrative concentrates on three generations of a family and how this particular family thwarts wide-ranging threats posed by Antiochus IV and Seleucid allies to the Jews of Palestine. The family’s story begins with Mattathias (d. ca. 166), a priest of the lineage of Joarib. Mattathias refuses to participate in the sacrifices mandated by Antiochus IV and kills an apostate and a representative of the king (2:6–25). With his five sons (John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan [2:1–5]), Mattathias rallies others committed to the “law” and “covenant” to follow him (2:27–28). Thus begins the rebellion as Mattathias, joined by like-minded countrymen and pious warriors called Hasideans, form an army, fight back and pursue apostates (2:39–47). Upon the patriarch’s death, son Judas, known also as Maccabeus, is tasked with leading the army and waging war against the nations (2:66). From here the narrative follows the leadership of Judas (3:1–9:22), Jonathan (9:23–12:53) and then Simon (13:1–15:41). Each of these brothers enjoys moments of victory during their period of command, and in fact the Maccabee family is portrayed as essential to and divinely appointed for the defense of Israel (1 Mc 5:61–62). Still none of the brothers is granted an easy path in shepherding the fledgling state as the successes are followed by low points and defeat. Even after initial successes and the death of Antiochus IV, the narrative reports unremitting political and military challenges to the brothers and the challenges of statehood that involve forging alliances and succession in leadership.

First Maccabees presents Judas as a military leader who prevails in battle with Divine assistance though his armies are regularly outnumbered. The piety of Judas and “against-all-odds” wins are meant to remind readers of David. Judas succeeds in numerous campaigns, defeating forces led by Apollonius (3:10–12), Seron (3:16–24), Gorgias (4:1–25), Lysias (4:26–35), and Nicanor (7:26–48). In addition to a prominent role in the rededication of the Temple (4:36–57; 164 BC), the basis for the festival of Hanukkah, later campaigns take Judas outside of Judea to Gilead (5:17, 20, 24–44) and neighboring lands, like Idumea (5:3–5), Edom (5:65), and Azotus (5:66–68). During Judas’s leadership, the archantagonist Antiochus IV dies (6:1–16) and a treaty with Rome is established (8:17–31). The gains of Judas are diminished, though, by a siege of Jerusalem (6:48–54) and by the appointment of a high priest Alcimus (portrayed in 1 Mc as spurred by apostates [1 Mc 7:5] and as duplicitous [1 Mc 7:12–18]). Judas eventually is killed in an intense battle (d. 160 BC), defeated by Bacchides (9:7–18). His brothers are left to recalibrate, as some of their supporters desert and as Bacchides hunts down supporters of the Maccabees (9:23–27).

Appointed by friends of Judas, Jonathan (160–143 BC) assumes leadership that advances the status of the Maccabees and of Judea. Jonathan leads campaigns that result in the defeat of Bacchides (9:23–33, 43–73) and strengthens diplomatic relations with Rome and Sparta (12:1–23). Seleucid rivals, Demetrius and Alexander Balas, both court alliance with Judea (10:1–47), resulting in gains for Jonathan and his allies. Jonathan is appointed high priest (10:21; 152 BC) and later acquires status and trophies from other Seleucids—Demetrius II and Antiochus VI—as well as favorable terms for his land (11:28–37; 57–59). Despite being sought after by Seleucid claimants and even after honoring alliances with these, Jonathan and his forces are regularly betrayed by Seleucid partners (e.g., 11:44–53). Shifting allegiances and perfidious ambitions are presented in the narrative, however, as commonplace in international relations (11:1–3, 8–13). This very sort of treachery by Trypho (who sought to rule Asia and was fearful of Jonathan) leads to the latter’s capture and death (12:39–13:24).

The final brother to lead Judea is Simon, whose significance is foreshadowed in Mattathias’s proclamation that he would be wise counselor and a father to the others (2:65). Simon’s accomplishments (142–134 BC) are striking. Simon appears an effective military leader, shoring up fortifications, taking Gazara (13:43–48), and gaining Joppa as a port (14:5). Under Simon, the people are said to be liberated from the yoke of the Gentiles (13:41; cf. 14:36). Just as Judas is associated with the purification of the temple, Simon is credited with retaking the citadel (Akra; 142 BC), which had served as a garrison in Jerusalem for foreign authorities and apostates (13:49–52). Further, he strengthens the profile of Judea through diplomatic means as well as through building projects. The tomb complex in Modein (13:25–30), which Simon commissions for deceased family members, is an impressive structure; the tombs with militaristic flourishes visible from the sea would advertise the might of Judea. Like his brother Jonathan, Simon handily uses the competition between Trypho and Demetrius to acquire both support and tax exemptions for the people (13:36–40). First Maccabees suggest that Simon is granted far-reaching power by popular acclaim: the people of Judea see themselves to be indebted to him. For this reason, Simon is accorded not only the role of high priest but also governor and ethnarch of Judea (13:41). In assuming religious, military, and political leadership, Simon anticipates the Hasmonean dynastic rulers that follow. Like his brothers, though, Simon is not exempt from betrayal or hardship. He is later ambushed at a banquet and murdered along with two of his sons by his son-in-law, Ptolemy (16:11–17).

One of Simon's sons, John Hyrcanus (134–104 BC), survives, and 1 Maccabees concludes by letting readers know that they can learn more of Hyrcanus, his deeds, and accomplishments in the chronicle of his high priesthood (16:23–24). In this manner, the narrative suggests Hyrcanus's reign as an end-point. In sum, 1 Maccabees gives the ascension and transformation of the Maccabee family: from renegades in the Seleucid Empire to Chief Friends, King's Friends (e.g., 10:65; 11:57), from a priestly family of Modein to leaders of an emerging commonwealth, whose reputations are known to the ends of the earth (14:10).

Theological Horizons

The Maccabee family is propelled to action, according to the narrative, in defense of Torah (1:11, 34, 49; 2:27, 50, 64, 67–68). Their theological orientation revolves around worship of the God of Israel to the exclusion of other deities (1:47, 54–55), the sanctity of the Jerusalem temple and its sacrificial system (2:7–13; 3:49), the covenant God established with their ancestors (1:15, 63; 2:20, 50), the value of religious texts associated with Torah (1:56–57; 3:48), traditional practices such as circumcision (1:15, 48, 61; 2:46), kosher diet (1:63), prayer (e.g., 3:44), and fasting (3:47). The family is also presented as rather pragmatic vis-à-vis certain of the traditions which might put the people at a disadvantage during a time of war. When Seleucid forces attack on the sabbath, the Maccabees and followers fight back (2:41), unlike some compatriots who choose martyrdom (2:36–38). The dynasty also justifies its procurement of the high priesthood by invoking the figure of Phinehas (2:24–26, 54; cf. Num 25:6–15): the zeal of Phinehas qualifies his descendants to serve as priests and this same zeal is shared by Mattathias and his sons in their defense of monotheism and Judea. While Providence determines the course of human affairs, 1 Maccabees expects that one must do all one can without the expectation that victory is foreordained (such is the stance of Judas, who ultimately dies in battle; cf. 1 Mc 9:10). Unlike 2 Maccabees and Daniel, 1 Maccabees does not address reward or retribution in an afterlife, nor does it mention any sort of heavenly agent assisting God’s people.

First Maccabees draws heavily on biblical events as prototypes and exemplars in portraying this critical period in early Jewish history. Connections with the Hebrew scriptures are made via citations (7:17; 9:21), allusions (9:73) and anachronisms (e.g., the use of “Canaan”; 9:37) which as literary conventions link Israel’s past with the events of the second century. Recitations of Israelite history (for example, 2:51–60; 4:9, 30) also suggest parallels among pivotal figures and the Maccabees. Mattathias’s slaying of the apostates recalls the zeal of Phinehas (2:25–26), for example. As a warrior since his youth, waging war against the nations (2:66), Judas recalls David; the peace brought about by Judas also suggests that he is like the judges of ancient Israel (7:50; Jgs 3:11, 30). Simon’s rule also is equated with idyllic scenes presented in the Hebrew scriptures (14:8 || Lv 26:3–4; Zec 8:12; 14:9 || Zec 8:4–5; 14:11 || Lv 26:6; 14:12 || Mi 4:4; Zec 3:10). The correspondences aid, of course, the Maccabee family in demonstrating credentials for leadership.

Liberation from foreign oppression and religious persecution during the second century harkens back to earlier moments in Israel’s story. First Maccabees builds on traditions in which God’s people are threatened and decisive action required, whether the enslavement of the Hebrew people or fight for survival during the time of the Judges and early monarchy. The zeal of Mattathias and sons can be viewed as an impassioned defense of one’s religion (several sons die as “freedom fighters,” taking up arms against oppression and religious persecution). The same zeal can seem a dangerous attribute. Contemporary readers know well the hazards of religious intolerance and violence undertaken in the name of religion. It is not the case that bloodshed is prompted only by persecution; any person or group claiming to act as the arbiter of God can advocate violence even against those with whom there are disagreements. In 1 Maccabees, apostates—those who approach Judaism and assimilation differently—are the targets of Maccabean violence as well; the first act of Mattathias is to kill a fellow Jew who was to participate in the sacrifices mandated by Antiochus (2:23–24). The family also leads attacks on Jews they view as lawless (2:44; 3:5, 6, 8) or as collaborators (6:21–26) and forcibly circumcise boys in Israel (2:46). Further, some of the violence in 1 Maccabees appears indefensible according to the Church's Just War tradition. The slaying of all males and the plunder and leveling of Ephron when inhabitants do not allow Judas and those with him to pass through the city (5:45–51; cf also 5:28, 35), and the revenge act directed toward members of a wedding party (9:37–42) seem to be the unnecessary taking of life in these narrative contexts. The stance of the Maccabees does recall the tradition of herem in the Hebrew scriptures (when whole cities were put to the ban; e.g., Jos 6:20–21) and the prohibition of polytheism, punishable by death (Ex 22:19; Dt 13:7–18). Still while the Maccabees are intentionally portrayed as championing and continuing the traditions of the forefathers, the narrative of 1 Maccabees also reveals that the family regards challenges to their leadership as threatening (5:55–57, 62) and other contemporaneous writings make clear that not all the Jews of Palestine adopted Maccabean approaches to Seleucid persecution (7:12–14) or agreed with Maccabean leadership (see Josephus, J.A. 13.228–98; Peshar Habbakuk; Peshar Nahum).

Structure, Genre, and Sources

The book's structure has been analyzed in different ways. One reading argues that the work can be divided into four sections: the introduction (1 Mc 1–2), the deeds of Judas (3:1–9:22), deeds of Jonathan (9:23–12:53) and deeds of Simon (1 Mc 13–16). Others have noted that the structure of 1 Maccabees emphasizes the cleansing of the Temple (1:1–6:17) and the taking of the citadel (Akra; 6:18–14:15). By this evaluation, Jerusalem and the sanctuary (and the association of both with the Hasmoneans as communicated via the priesthood of Simon and descendants [14:16–16:24]) are of central importance to the book.

In terms of genre, the style and vocabulary of 1 Maccabees recall biblical historiography, and in this manner the author assumes the guise of a court historian. Certain selections that stress that the family has a divine mandate to lead (5:62) intimate an apologetic aim for the Maccabees/Hasmonean dynasty. At the same time, the historiography is interspersed with additional forms. Poetic passages detected by word order and poetic parallelism include laments (e.g., 1:25–28; 1:36–40) and poems of praise (e.g., 14:4–15). First Maccabees features also prayers (4:30–33), a testament (2:49–70), and official documents (e.g. 11:30–37; 15:16–21). Scholars suggest that the author could have drawn upon various sources available from Hasmonean archives—14:49 knows of documents deposited in the treasury—or from a Seleucid history.

Textual Witnesses, Historical Context, and Integrity of the Book

First Maccabees is available in Greek. The style of the Greek and the idioms suggest that the work was originally written in Hebrew. The Hebrew version no longer exists, though. Origen (third century) cites in transliterated Greek the work by its Semitic title, Sarbethsabanaiel, but the exact meaning of the title is debated. Some suggest that the author of 1 Maccabees could have composed the work in a Semiticizing Greek. The Greek of 1 Maccabees resembles that of the Septuagint, especially the translations of the historical books in the Greek Bible, and it is from the Greek of 1 Maccabees that translations were made. A Greek text revised by Lucian of Antioch in the fourth century is the source for some of the Latin and Syriac versions. Three manuscripts in particular, Vaticanus, Sinaiticus, and Alexandrinus, provide witnesses to the early Greek text not modified by Lucian. In addition to the Vulgate, there are also manuscripts that follow the Old Latin tradition, which is especially important for the reconstruction of early Greek witnesses to 1 Maccabees. Ultimately 1 Maccabees, like other deuterocanonical books, was not included in the Hebrew Bible, although both this work and 2 Maccabees provide rich accounts of the origin of the Jewish festival Hanukkah. Protestants include 1 (and 2) Maccabees in the Apocrypha.

First Maccabees is thought to have been written toward the end of the second century AD. It was likely composed either toward the end of the reign of John Hyrcanus (104 BC) or during the rule of Alexander Jannaeus (103–76 BC). While a number of scholars assume 1 Maccabees to be the work of a single author, aspects of the book lead some to propose that 1 Maccabees was composed in two stages. For example, Simon's eulogy (which ends at 14:15) could have provided a natural (and original) conclusion to the book. Those suggesting an addition to the work point out that such a theory would help account for differing attitudes toward Gentiles in the book. A first edition (consisting of 1:1–14:15 and composed around 130 BC) is especially hostile to Gentiles (2:66, 68; 3:52; 13:6) and reflects the tensions of the initial uprising. An amendment (14:16–16:24) was written during a time of Hasmonean expansion, however, and for this reason is less ardent in anti-Gentile rhetoric. In terms of situating 1 Maccabees, scholars also note that because the work makes the case for the high priesthood of Simon and his descendants (like John Hyrcanus; cf. 1 Mc 14:41; 16:24), it could have been written around 100 BC; this period accords with challenges to the high priesthood of both Hyrcanus and Alexander Jannaeus (according to Josephus, J.A. 13.288–98; 13.372–74) when special justification for the family's attaining this role would be sought. In any event, the arrival of Pompey in Judea in 63 BC provides an end-point for the work as one would not expect thereafter to find the positive assessment of Rome that one sees in 1 Maccabees.

2 MACCABEES

OVERVIEW

Prefaced by two letters to Diaspora communities, 2 Maccabees is an account of the attack on the Jerusalem Temple in the second century BC and its defense. Nefarious agents, aligned with the Seleucid Empire, attempt to secure the high priesthood and arrogate the Temple's wealth to themselves. Time and again divine intervention frustrates these adversaries of God and God's people. Judas Maccabeus emerges as a valiant defender of the Temple, although his family (so conspicuous in 1 Maccabees and anticipating the later Hasmonean dynasty) is lacking in this book. Rather, the Temple, all that it connotes, the city of Jerusalem (3:1; 15:37), and the Jewish people are the focal point of the work. As the Temple, the Jewish religious institution par excellence, proves inviolable, the reader of 2 Maccabees contemplates the enduring value and virtue of Jewish life comprising the Temple and myriad other institutions (e.g., the liturgical calendar and festal days).

The ancient Jewish author of 2 Maccabees produced an abridged version of an earlier account by Jason of Cyrene, which is no longer extant and otherwise unknown. When the anonymous author states in his prologue that Jason's five scrolls will be concisely rendered as one composition (2:23, 32), the Greek verb in question has given rise to the moniker "epitomator" (or "abbreviator") as a way of referring to this author. The author is interested in the period of Jewish history in Palestine from the time of the high priest Onias III (ca. 180 BC) to the victory of Judas Maccabee over the Seleucids in 161 BC, the time span covered by 2 Maccabees.

Background for the Account

Second Maccabees reflects a critical time in early Judaism that involved both internal and external trials. Sources from this period report from disparate views that the second century BC was a contentious time for Jews in Palestine. Priestly and prominent families vied with one another for power and often appealed to foreign powers for the right to assume the office of the high priesthood. Such disputes around the high priesthood preface the account of (and contribute to) the threats to the Temple in 2 Maccabees (3:4–6; 4:7–34). Jews in Palestine also approached assimilation to Hellenism (Greek culture infused with indigenous practices of the Near East) in different ways (4:12–20). Exacerbating this mix were Seleucid leaders whose contact with Judea, the Temple, and Jewish tradition often ignited controversy and hostilities. Like the book of Daniel, 1 and 2 Maccabees recount periods of Seleucid oppression that culminate in rebellion against Antiochus IV (167 BC); the revolt transformed the dynamic between the Jews in Palestine and representatives of the Seleucid kingdom, ending a period of religious repression. The final form of 2 Maccabees including the two prefixed letters would have been completed postrebellion, during a time when the Maccabee family has established dynastic leadership in Judea and claimed the high priesthood. Still this account of the rebellion does not hint at the dynasty and ends before (and does not allude to) the Maccabean high priesthood.

Second Maccabees leads its readers to follow ancestral customs and Torah; ironically, even though the book decries the hellenizing impulses (4:9–22), the work also embraces Hellenistic institutions, employs Greek tropes (for instance, figures of speech, rhetorical devices), and reflects Hellenistic historiography. For example, the Jewish community in Jerusalem is presented as a polis (a Greek city) with its citizens (4:5, 50; 5:6, 8) who follow lawful institutions (4:11); following the customs of ancestors and the laws of God, the Jewish community is civilized (6:1) in contrast to the barbarians who oppress them (e.g., 2:21; 5:22; 10:4). Similarly, the book is indebted to types of Hellenistic historiography.

Structure, Genre, and Sources

Excepting the letters and preface, the work is often understood as featuring a two-part or three-part structure. One might read chapters 3 through 15 of 2 Maccabees as consisting of two halves; in the first half (3:1–7:42) the conflict is defined. In the second half, 8:1–15:37, the conflict is resolved. Another manner of reading the book involves a tripartite structure, whereby three threats to the Temple are addressed and resolved (chap. 3; 4:1–10:8; 10:9–15:36).

The book of 2 Maccabees, the reader is told, is an abbreviation of a five-volume history by Jason of Cyrene. The epitome is an example of Hellenistic prose, and its genre represents a form of historiography. This sort of Hellenistic historiography is often referred to as “pathetic” in light of the work’s rhetorical aims to help its audience empathize with (or to relate to the pathos of) the characters. At the same time, the rhetoric is meant to move the community, in the case of 2 Maccabees, to maintain traditional praxis while adopting new celebrations. In terms of its recounting of the past, one might cautiously say that the work’s historicity is expressed in small details. For example, in 2 Maccabees 4 a delegation travels to Tyre with an offering, and the amount of money specified—300 silver drachmas—reflects second-century practice. If the episode were invented, the Jewish author might well have exaggerated the amount to make the homage to an idol all the more objectionable.

Composed within a half century of the events it reports (the Hasmonean revolt), 2 Maccabees was written on the basis of sources. The author used sources extensively, beginning with the chronicle of events written by Jason (2:23). The extent of the epitomater’s redaction of Jason’s work is hard to determine. With regard to distinctive forms, the author employs legends, or popular stories, typically with a fantastic character. At the climax of the Heliodorus episode, for example, this agent of the Seleucid king is overwhelmed by a dreadful rider who is a manifestation of God’s power (3:25). The rider is joined by two youths remarkable in appearance (3:26), and they flog Heliodorus into submission. The author also incorporates prayers in the composition, placing them in the mouths of pious Jews facing persecution. While fitting speeches placed in characters’ mouths are typical in ancient historiography, the supplication of Nehemiah (1:24–29), paradigmatic for 2 Maccabees’ prayers of petition, shares thematic elements found at the beginning and at the close of the prayer (in Neh 9:6–37). If the latter text was not a source for 2 Maccabees, it likely influenced its composition.

Textual Witnesses, Historical Context, and Integrity of the Book

Second Maccabees was composed in Greek, from which translations, such as that of the Old Latin, were made. While the book is included in the Septuagint, it is not in the Hebrew Bible; Protestants place 2 Maccabees, along with other deuterocanonical texts, in a section known as the Apocrypha. Detail about the epitomator as historical author is scant, although there is much one can infer from the text. On the one hand, 2 Maccabees encourages its Jewish audience to maintain ancestral traditions and, on the other hand, suggests that coexistence with Gentile communities and imperial power is viable. Indeed, a hallmark of the author is that he is not simplistic in treating the relationship between Jews and Greeks. This profile of the author must be taken into consideration when attempting to situate the author of 2 Maccabees. Open discussion about the provenance of 2 Maccabees continues among scholars. Jerusalem's prominence in the narrative and 2 Maccabees' preoccupation with the Temple make Palestine a logical choice, and this opinion is increasingly prevalent among commentators. Such a position is strengthened by the opening letters, which communicate that they were written by "the Jews in Jerusalem and in the land of Judea" (2 Mc 1:1).

This theory of provenance has not, however, displaced the long-standing view that 2 Maccabees was composed in the Diaspora, namely Egypt. A migration setting is plausible in that 2 Maccabees explores the interactions of Jews with non-Jewish culture in a way that would be instructive to readers in a diasporic setting. Moreover, the letters that begin the work are both addressed to the Jewish community in Egypt, and their inclusion in this literary work would serve to reinforce that community's ties with the religious center of Judaism, in Jerusalem. From such a vantage, the focus of 2 Maccabees is not so much Jerusalem as it is the idealized Jewish community living in the world with a heritage centered on the Temple. With this in mind, a diaspora setting such as Alexandria is also plausible.

The book is conventionally dated to the last quarter of the second century BC based on 2 Maccabees 1:10a, which associates the first letter in chapter 1 with the year 188 of the Seleucid era, or 125/124 BC. Some commentators focus, however, on 169 of the Seleucid era, a date attested elsewhere in the letter (1:7), to place the composition earlier in the second century (142/143 BC).

The two letters appended to the epitome are also relevant to the question of the book's integrity, and there is scholarly debate around the authenticity of these.

Summary of the Book

2 Maccabees 1–2: Prologue to the Historical Narrative

The book of 2 Maccabees begins with two letters and a preface. Each of the letters starts with a salutation from the Jews in Jerusalem to the Jews in Egypt. The first letter proceeds to evoke themes such as covenant, the patriarchs, prayer, the law, and the commandments. The point of the first letter is to encourage the celebration of Hanukkah as a commemoration of the Temple's purification and rededication after the victory over Jason, a high priest who did evil in the land (1:7–8). With the victory, fresh sacrifices and offerings were made to God, and the Temple began to function anew; in light of that, Hanukkah is to be celebrated annually in the Jewish month of Kislev (1:9). The second letter specifies its recipient as Aristobulus, counselor to King Ptolemy, and it too exhorts the Jews in Egypt to commemorate the rededication of the Temple in Kislev, on the twenty-fifth day of the month (1:18). The second letter also relates striking stories of the death of Antiochus IV (1:13–16), the preservation of the sacred fire used in the Temple and its recovery by Nehemiah (1:19–36) and of Jeremiah hiding the sacred vessels of the first Temple (2:4–8). The fire is worthy of celebration, the letter's recipient is told, because for centuries it has been preserved and passed down from Moses to Solomon to Jeremiah to the postexilic figure of Nehemiah. The writer locates the holy flame along a trajectory of salvation history in order to align a relatively new celebration of the temple, Hanukkah, with Israel's finest leaders who also share a connection to the tabernacle or Temple. The second letter thus indicates that God's grace is continually made available (for example, in the postexilic context), especially for the rescue of the Jewish community in Jerusalem who face peril; the grace extends also to the purification of God's place, which is the occasion for the new feast Hanukkah (2:16).

It is potentially confusing that neither letter refers to the feast of Hanukkah as it is known today, and they both conflate the new feast of Temple rededication with the feast of Booths (Sukkot [in Hebrew] or Tabernacles; 1:9, 2:18). These references suggest an early understanding of Hanukkah as linked to the festival of Booths/Tabernacles, even though the latter takes place in the Hebrew month of Tishri, which is two months earlier than Kislev. The link may have been that both Hanukkah and Booths extend over eight days. It is also possible that the author hopes to persuade its audience, the Jewish community in Egypt, to observe Hanukkah, which is not mandated in the Torah.

The short preface to the narrative (2:19–32) indicates its subject matter: the heroes who fought bravely for Judaism (particularly for its laws) and put to flight the invaders of the land. The author states that his work will outline in summary the longer account of Jason of Cyrene; he aims to be brief, to forgo a detailed treatment of Jason's text, and to edify readers (2:25). Nonetheless, he assures his readers, the task of abbreviating Jason's work is laborious and causes the writer of 2 Maccabees to sweat and lose sleep (2:26).

2 Maccabees 3:1–4:6: A Threat to the Temple

The narrative of 2 Maccabees begins with the Jerusalem Temple flourishing under the direction of Onias (Onias III, ca. 175), its high priest. Thanks to Onias, even foreign kings honor the Temple and send gifts there while the city of Jerusalem lives in perfect peace as its laws are strictly observed (3:1). This idyllic picture of the Jerusalem Temple changes, however, when exaggerated reports of the Temple's wealth reach the Seleucid king, Seleucus IV Philopater, who reigned from 187 BC to 175 BC. In response Seleucus charges one of his emissaries, Heliodorus, with confiscating the Temple's treasury. Upon his arrival in Jerusalem, Heliodorus prepares to enter the Temple while the Jerusalemites respond to this incursion with prayer. Priests pray that God might protect the funds in the Temple treasury (3:15), and crowds of people make public supplications (3:18) along the same lines. Among those offering prayers in the streets are women girded with sackcloth and maidens out of public view (but positioned at the gates, walls and windows) on the periphery of public space. The maidens make supplication by waving their arms to the heavens. The prayers collectively are efficacious, the text implies, because the divine presence halts Heliodorus. Specifically, God sends a heavenly horseman and two youthful figures into the Temple to overwhelm Heliodorus and render him senseless (3:22–30). In a similar fashion, heavenly agents appear later in the narrative to defeat Timothy (10:29–31) and Nicanor (15:22–30), both enemies of God's people. For each of the instances, emissaries are sent from heaven to wield justice on earth. Furthermore, the three accounts fashion the emissaries of God as warriors, endowed with supernatural powers that accentuate their nobility and valor. The account of three heavenly figures stopping the Seleucid Heliodorus from plundering the temple treasury is theologically noteworthy because it integrates two of the major themes in 2

Maccabees: the prayer of Jews in distress, and the manifestation of God's saving power in response to the people's prayer. This portion of the narrative concludes with Heliodorus converting to Judaism and witnessing to the God he had seen with his own eyes (3:36).

2 Maccabees 4:7–6:17: A New Crisis Emerges

With the death of King Seleucus, Antiochus IV Epiphanes takes the throne, and a new series of threats follow. The first threat arises when Onias's brother Jason obtains the high priesthood for a price and attempts to change Jewish life in Jerusalem by introducing Hellenistic customs. Specifically, Jason opens a gymnasium and a youth club (or ephebion [4:9]) and enrolls Judeans as citizens of "Antioch at Jerusalem." It is unclear whether this was simply Jerusalem under a new name or a distinct politeuma, a political entity distinct from Jerusalem but associated with it. Second Maccabees describes how Jews involved in activities at the gymnasium come to neglect traditions and laws, including priests who disdain the service of the altar at the Temple in order to attend sports activities. Moreover, Jason sent envoys to Tyre to the quadrennial games, with an offering of 300 silver drachmas for Hercules. (Hercules was associated with Melqart the god of Tyre.) The envoys, however, requested that the money be used for ships rather than for sacrifice, which they deemed inappropriate.

After three years Jason sent a man named Menelaus to take the tribute to the king, but Menelaus had himself appointed high priest by offering to increase the tribute. Jason had to withdraw from Jerusalem. Some time later, then, Antiochus invaded Egypt but was forced to withdraw by a Roman legate. A rumor spread that he had been killed. Jason tried to seize the opportunity to regain the high priesthood. Fighting broke out in Jerusalem between his followers and those of Menelaus. When the king heard of this, he took it that Jerusalem was in revolt and sent in the troops, who proceeded to sack the city and pillage the Temple. At this time, we are told, Judas Maccabee and some followers fled to the hills (5:27).

Not long after this, the king sent an Athenian to instate a new law for Jerusalem. The Temple would now be dedicated to Zeus Olympius, and the Samaritan temple at Mount Garizim to Zeus, the friend of strangers. The Temple was given over to pagan sacrifice. Judeans were no longer allowed to keep the sabbath or the festivals and were forced to observe the king's birthday and the festival of Dionysus.

The author of 2 Maccabees explains this persecution theologically as chastisement designed to correct the people (6:12). God, it is said, shows kindness to the sinners by calling them to account and punishing them sooner rather than later, when the full measure of their transgressions would require a greater punishment. The full passage (6:12–17) articulates some of the key theological principles found in the book of Deuteronomy: there are sure consequences when people transgress God's law. God punishes, but God also relents and never abandons the people. In this vein, the author of 2 Maccabees underscores the divine attribute of mercy (6:16).

2 Maccabees 6:18–10:9: Response to the Crisis

Several acts of martyrdom provide a response to the crisis. The martyrs include Eleazar, an elderly scribe, and a mother accompanied by her seven sons who die in succession (7:41). In each case the Jewish hero or heroine refuses to eat the meat of sacrifice prescribed by the king, Antiochus. The stories of Eleazar and the mother with seven sons provide gruesome details of torture and long speeches placed in the mouths of the martyrs. Eleazar proclaims publicly that his death gives an example to the Jewish youth of how to die selflessly for the sake of the law (6:28). The sons make public speeches with theological resonance; the second son tells Antiochus that the king deprives him of his life only so that the “King of the universe,” that is God, might raise the son to everlasting life (7:9). At this time, the idea of resurrection was not accepted by all Jews, and 2 Maccabees provides support for a belief that would become normative in Christianity.

Immediately after the mother's death, the narrative switches to the revolt led by Judas Maccabee. While organizing his military forces, Judas prays that God protect the Temple and manifest divine power on behalf of the people. The prayer is efficacious as God's wrath changes to mercy (8:5). Judas scores military victories over Timothy and Bacchides (8:30), and over Nicanor, who was sent with a force of 20,000 armed men to destroy the Jews of Jerusalem. Nicanor's defeat is treated with irony as the author of 2 Maccabees remarks that Nicanor destroyed his own army (8:35), and in defeat Nicanor is said to testify that the Jews are invulnerable in battle because they follow the laws given to them by their God (8:36). Similar sentiments are expressed by Antiochus after God strikes him down with an unseen blow (9:5) and visits excruciating pain upon the king. Antiochus has a change of heart and pledges to support Jerusalem and the Temple (9:14–16); he then embraces Judaism shortly before his death.

2 Maccabees 10:10–15:39: The Final Crisis and Its Resolution

Antiochus is succeeded by his son, Antiochus Eupator, who unleashes a final assault upon Jerusalem and the Jewish community there, led by Lysias (10:11) and Timothy (10:24). Again Judas Maccabeus and his forces defend Jerusalem, and the surrender of Lysias (12:1) sets the stage for a series of final confrontations between Judas's soldiers and those of Nicanor. As Nicanor seizes the advantage by attacking on the sabbath, when Jewish soldiers are by law to rest (15:1), he boastfully compares himself to the ruler in heaven who instituted the laws of sabbath. Before the battle, Judas rallies his troops and exhorts them with a tale of the prophet Jeremiah visiting Judas in a dream to deliver a golden sword. The battle ensues, and Judas's forces slay Nicanor and some 35,000 of his soldiers (15:27). Nicanor is dismembered so that his head can be put on public display. God is praised for manifesting the divine power and keeping the Temple secure and undefiled (15:34).

Theological Horizons

This book celebrates the Jerusalem Temple, the city of Jerusalem, and religious institutions such as festivals (15:17, 34). In highlighting the Temple, 2 Maccabees emphasizes the figures of Moses (for his association with the Tabernacle), Jeremiah (credited with preservation of the first Temple's implements), and Nehemiah (who retrieves the sacred fire for the second Temple). The accounts of Jeremiah in 2 Maccabees 2:1–7 and 15:14–16 hint at the diverse traditions around this prophet that come to proliferate in early Judaism. Even while the Temple is celebrated, the office of the high priesthood in 2 Maccabees is far from idealized; Jason, Menelaus, and Alcimus are portrayed in unflattering terms. The reader of 2 Maccabees finds only a positive appraisal of Onias III who is killed (4:34; cf. also 15:12).

Second Maccabees reminds readers that only the God of Israel is Pantocrator (“ruler of all”; 1:25), a theme underscored through various references to divine manifestations. First, the narrative revolves around the heavenly manifestations of God that embolden the heroes of 2 Maccabees to fight bravely, retake the land of Israel, assume possession of the Temple, and reestablish their laws (2:21). The manifestation of God becomes a motif synonymous with the defense of the Temple (3:24, 30) and the defeat of the Seleucid emperor Antiochus IV (9:8). The moniker of Antiochus “Epiphanes” (an expression associated with the manifestation of a god) is portrayed as a usurping of God’s own theological identity. After the fall of Antiochus, other foes such as Timothy are overwhelmed with fear and terror by the manifestation of God (12:22).

Yet the particular manifestations of God in 2 Maccabees happen by means of proxies, heavenly messengers. In contrast to 1 Maccabees, this book boasts a rich angelology. Human-like figures appear as if from heaven to dispatch those who would threaten the community and the Temple. In 2 Maccabees 3, God sends a heavenly horseman and two youthful figures to overwhelm the miscreant Heliodorus (3:22–30). In a similar fashion, heavenly agents appear later in the narrative to defeat Timothy (10:29–31) and Nicanor (15:22–30), both enemies of God’s people. But the narrative makes clear, in the case of the Jewish soldiers who have amulets (12:40), that worship of any other deity or semidivine figure like Hercules is forbidden.

The God of 2 Maccabees is not simply manifested (even if by miraculous events and otherworldly intermediaries) but is in relationship with the faithful. Evidence of the rapport is the close correlation between manifestations of the Deity and prior prayers of petition. Indeed, God seemingly responds in the narrative to the prayers of the high priest Onias, Jeremiah, and Judas (3:20, 22, 32; 8:2–7; 10:25–26; 12:42; 15:12, 14, 22, 24). Reminiscent of Deuteronomistic theology, the wicked (especially the chief antagonists) in 2 Maccabees can be punished in this life (e.g., 1:17; 5:7; 7:18; 9:28; 13:7–8); Deuteronomy 32 is also invoked by one of the seven sons as he is tortured (2 Mc 7:6). That particular chapter in Deuteronomy anticipates that the Israelites’ neglect and unfaithfulness would lead to abandonment of the Divine. But later, Deuteronomy 32:36–38 explains that God’s compassion on or pity for his people, when they are finally without strength, will cause him to respond in justice (7:37–38). Second Maccabees also expects further resolution in the afterlife, for both restoration and punishment (e.g., 7: 9, 11, 14, 19, 32–38).

2 Maccabees has influenced Christian theology in a number of ways. Suffering, for example, is accorded theological significance. The accounts of the martyrdom of Eleazer, the mother with seven sons, and Razis (14:37–46) clarify that these individuals suffer as a form of chastisement in this life (leading to divine mercy; 6:12–17).

Further, the suffering of the innocent in 2 Maccabees points theologically to Divine recompense and justice, in association with the resurrection of the dead (7:9, 11, 14, 23; 14:46). The latter notion is also indicated when Judas Maccabeus prays and makes sacrifices for his soldiers killed in battle (12:42–46). The fallen soldiers had sinned by secretly wearing an amulet, or ancient scapular, honoring the god of Jamnia, Hercules. That Judas believes they will rise from death speaks to resurrection, and to the Roman Catholic beliefs in purgatory and the power of prayers for the deceased. Roman Catholics similarly read the vision of Jeremiah that Judas reports in 15:12–16 with a theological eye. Because the prophet is praying for the Jews and Jerusalem, Catholics understand this account as an early witness for the belief in efficacious intercession by the saints on behalf of the faithful. Finally, the mother's public words prior to martyrdom anticipate the theological view that God formed creation not out of existing things but only through God's omnipotent will and creative word (7:22–23, 28). The idea of creation ex nihilo informs 2 Maccabees as it would subsequent Christian writings (Heb 11:3).

THE WISDOM BOOKS
DIANNE BERGANT

INTRODUCTION

The sacred tradition of ancient Israel has come down to us principally in narrative form. Even the prophetic books, which contain poetic oracles, frequently place those oracles in a narrative context. This has led some to refer to the overall biblical narrative as “salvation history.” As with all history, the events recounted in these books are specific to one particular people, and the lessons learned do not always apply to all.

In addition to this narrative collection, some books treat aspects of life that have universal appeal, aspects such as: the meaning of life; success in living; and the mystery of suffering. These books have come to be known as the “wisdom tradition.” Their teaching focuses on human values, human pursuits, and human fulfillment. This tradition maintains that people encountered God, not merely through some supernatural means such as dreams or divine communication but through the ordinary experiences of life. Rather than trace the unfolding of “salvation history,” these books provide a kind of guide for successful living. In them, every aspect of life takes on new importance. Since every person in every culture must struggle with the fundamental questions of life, there is a universal character in this tradition. This might explain why, even today, people of other religious cultures can often more readily identify with the teaching of the wisdom tradition than with the uniquely Israelite or Christian theology found in other sections of the Bible.

While the biblical narratives depict God involved in the events of ancient Israel’s history, the wisdom tradition focuses on human life in general. This openness to universal human experience required that God be understood in new and broader ways. Accordingly, the Israelites came to believe that their God was not simply their personal savior, but was the great Creator-God, the one responsible for the world and everything and everyone in it. Other insights emerged. Observing the regularity in creation, they concluded that there was some kind of order inherent in nature itself. Thus, they developed an early form of “creation theology.” Concerned with living successful lives, they believed that, if they could discern how the order in nature operated and would then harmonize their lives with it, they would flourish and live at peace. The ability to perceive this natural order and to live in accord with it was considered true wisdom.

The primary interest of this wisdom tradition is instruction in the proper ways of living. The writers of the books included in this collection made use of several teaching techniques, such as storytelling, exhortation, warning, and questioning. In addition to the standard proverb, they used riddles, parables, and metaphors to instruct, advise, and persuade. There were usually very definite lessons that they wanted to teach, and so we should not be surprised when we discover what appears to be “the moral of the story.”

The sages were humanists. They were concerned with the study of human beings and were attentive to human welfare, values, and dignity. They taught that whatever benefited humankind was a good to be pursued and whatever was harmful should be avoided and condemned. Training of any kind, whether within the family, the court, or in preparation for a profession, sought to impart the skills needed to succeed in that respective occupation. The criterion for judging the value of any venture was the degree of success or happiness that it brought. The sages regarded well-being and happiness as evidence that life was conducted in accord with the order of creation. They did not advocate the pursuit of happiness for its own sake, but as a by-product of the right kind of living. Success and happiness were also considered concrete evidence of the wisdom of the person who succeeded. The judgment of right or wrong and the laws that supported this judgment grew out of just such a critical reflection of the experience of life.

The sages did not insist on a rigid standard that would fit every circumstance. Each case was seen as unique. The truly wise person was the one who had a store of wisdom gained from experience and who knew which manner of behaving was appropriate to each situation. There is a great deal of pragmatism in this way of viewing life. If an approach did not accomplish the desired goal, it was discarded for one that would. This is not a case of the end justifying the means. Rather, the Israelites had a sense that goodness was a force that determined life. They seem to have been convinced that goodness became evident in whatever built up, sustained or enriched life. From this point of view, the consequences of an action or the qualities of the end were seen as evidence of the goodness of the means. On occasion, the wisdom tradition itself acknowledges the limitations of this point of view. Job and Ecclesiastes are examples of this. Nonetheless, this theory of retribution (the good shall be rewarded; the evil shall be punished) undergirds most of the wisdom literature.

Although this tradition focuses on what benefits human advancement, it originated from within an androcentric (male-centered) society. In such a society, the man is the norm against which all standards, desires, and accomplishments are judged. While women are certainly valued, their value lies in ensuring the future of the group (procreation) and in instilling its values (education), not in determining those values. Because of this androcentric perspective, much of the teaching in this tradition is male-biased. In fact, some of the teaching of Ecclesiasticus (Sirach) has earned that author the disreputable designation of misogynist (hater of women).

Israel's wisdom tradition did not develop in a vacuum. It was part of a much broader movement within the ancient Near Eastern world. Reference to the sages of these foreign nations can be found throughout the biblical text itself, usually within passages that depict an Israelite exceeding a non-Israelite in wisdom. For example, it was Joseph who succeeded in interpreting Pharaoh's dream when the magicians and sages of Egypt failed (see Gn 41); and Job had a reputation of wisdom, which surpassed that of all the sages of the East (Jb 1:3). There is remarkable similarity between the biblical wisdom material and some Egyptian, Mesopotamian, and Canaanite texts. The traditions share a similar worldview; they contain common subject matter and literary forms. Critical examination shows that the non-Israelite texts are significantly older than comparable biblical material. This suggests that Israel borrowed from its neighbors, and adapted and reinterpreted material when necessary. While there are Egyptian and Mesopotamian works that are similar to both Job and Ecclesiastes, this borrowing is most evident in the book of Proverbs.

Despite these similarities, Israel's wisdom tradition is clearly in accord with its Yahwistic faith. It may not focus on specifics of religion, but it is highly ethical, fundamentally monotheistic, and, at times, equates wisdom with fidelity to the law of Israel.

ABOUT THE BOOK

Certain features of the book of Job have evoked as many interpretations as there are interpreters. Since the way we explain these aspects may influence our understanding of the message of the book, it might be helpful to consider some of them before proceeding. There is no agreement about the book's date, its place of origin, or the source of some of its sections. There is not even total agreement as to its principal theme. In fact, the richness of the book and its universal appeal prevent us from easily categorizing it. Evidence from the book itself is often given in support of a preexilic dating (seventh century BC). Job's complaints are reminiscent of the lamentations of Jeremiah, and some consider the book of Job an outcry against the impending destruction of Jerusalem and deportation into exile. However, similarities with the theology and style of Deutero-Isaiah (the portion of Isaiah beginning with chapter 40) seem to outweigh this data, tipping the scale in favor of a postexilic dating (sixth–fifth century BC). The book certainly appeared prior to the third century BC when "Satan" appears as a proper name of the "evil one" (1 Chr 21:1) instead of as the designation of a role (an adversary, as in a court of justice) as it is found in Job.

Job's struggle with suffering is a universal and perennial problem, and there is much in the book that has international flavor and appeal. Older ancient Near Eastern accounts of innocent sufferers may have influenced the author of Job. Several characteristics of the book (e.g., the names and places of origin of the three visitors) suggest foreign influence and even borrowing. Still, whatever in the book that may have originated elsewhere has been used here with Israelite theology in mind.

Like most pieces of ancient literature, Job is a composite rather than the work of a single author. It appears to be a prose folktale (1:1–2:13; 42:7–17) within which extensive poetic speeches (3:1–42:6) have been inserted. In the book's present form, the two parts of the folktale serve as prologue and epilogue to the speeches. Even within these speeches, we can detect units believed to have originated from someone other than the principal author (e.g., the Wisdom Poem [chapter 28], the Elihu Speeches [chapters 32–37], the second Speech of the LORD [chapter 40]). Regardless of when or from whom these different sections originated, they all belong to the final form, and it is this final form that has been handed down to us as sacred Scripture.

The universal appeal of the book stems from the nature of the questions posed by the tormented Job. Who has not struggled with the dilemma of incomprehensible suffering? Who has not cried out to God: “Why?” The principal theme of the book has been variously identified as human integrity, innocent suffering, disinterested piety, human limitations and the incomprehensibility of God, and/or ultimate trust. Actually, these interpretations are not mutually exclusive; they are interrelated. They each express a different nuance of the all-encompassing mystery of the manner in which God is present in the world, and they suggest how we might respond to that presence.

The Literary Style

Most people know the story of the innocent man who was mysteriously stricken yet who remained steadfast in his loyalty, only to be rewarded in the end. This simple understanding does not accurately represent the story; it is merely the plot of the folktale that frames the dialogues. The principal part of the book is the poetic dialogues. The prologue and epilogue set the stage and bring to conclusion the real drama. The more we understand how the form of the book works, the more we will discover the message within it.

The dialogues consist of speeches in Hebrew poetic form. Each time Job cries out against his sorry state, either Eliphaz, Bildad, or Zophar offers him counsel or attempts to convince him of his error. The orderly manner in which this exchange takes place constitutes the cycles of speeches. The third set of speeches is somewhat fragmented. Bildad’s remarks are abbreviated, Zophar’s are missing all together, and Job’s replies are inordinately long, often containing material that seems to contradict his basic point of view. Some scholars believe that these discrepancies resulted from the dislocation of material that really belongs to either Bildad or Zophar, and these scholars reconstruct the speeches accordingly. This explains why the verses are sometimes out of numerical order in some translations.

The speeches of Elihu do not fit into any of the three cycles. While there are some differences between the Elihu section and what precedes it, the theological point of view expressed by this character neither fundamentally departs from nor significantly adds to that of the first three counselors. This fact has led some commentators to conclude that either these speeches are a later literary and theological addition of the original author or they are the work of another writer. Nonetheless, this section is now part of the book and cannot be discounted.

The literary form and the content of the LORD's speeches are reminiscent of an ancient Near Eastern pattern known as onomasticon (a Greek word meaning "naming"). This was a constructed listing of names of things that have similar characteristics, for example, cosmological, meteorological, or other natural phenomena. These listings were probably pre-scientific attempts at classifying natural phenomena. They demonstrate the universal human search for understanding the world about us. In the book of Job we find a creative use of this form. The author casts God in the role of wisdom teacher who poses challenging questions that test Job's comprehension of the wonders of the universe, a teaching technique typical of the wisdom tradition. The content and the form of these questions are similar to the onomastica.

The use of nature as a means of instruction is also characteristic of the wisdom tradition. While this occurs throughout the entire book, nowhere else does it have the effect that it does in these speeches. Because God does not directly address Job's demands, some commentators have concluded that God ignores Job's concerns. In saying this, they have not adequately considered the way the author makes use of this literary form.

The poetry found within the book is unlike most classical or contemporary poetry. There is virtually no rhyme, and the rhythm follows tonal patterns that are usually lost when the original Hebrew is translated. One characteristic that is identifiable even in translation is the correspondence of thought in successive half lines. This feature is known as parallelism. The thought in the first line can be repeated: "Does God pervert judgment, and does the Almighty pervert justice?" (Jb 8:3), or contrasted (there are no clear examples of this in Job): "Hatred stirs up disputes, but love covers all offenses" (Prv 10:12), or advanced: "Pity me, pity me, you my friends, for the hand of God has struck me!” (Jb 19:21). Parallelism is used effectively in Job as an aid in furthering the arguments of the various speakers.

There are two other literary forms that should be mentioned: the lawsuit and the lament. Elements of these forms are found throughout the speeches of Job. Again and again he demands that God meet him in court where his (Job’s) case will be tried, and he will be found innocent (e.g., 23:2–4). Even more frequently, Job cries out to God in complaint. He laments the day of his birth (3:1–10), and life itself (10:1–7), and he pleads for help (13:20–28). In all of these ways, the literary style of the author contributes to the development of the book’s message.

The Drama

Each section of the book has its own dynamic and carries the story forward to its conclusion. The prose prologue plays a very important role in the unfolding of the theological message of the book. It is there that Job’s innocence is established beyond any doubt, and it is there that we see who is responsible for Job’s misfortune. It is God who permits this righteous man to suffer in order to test the quality of his integrity. Job never knows this, nor do his visitors. Only the reader witnesses what takes place in the court of heaven. This is important to remember for an understanding of the theological debate that follows.

The arguments in the poetic speeches are repetitious and appear to be quite monotonous, but this is an essential part of the author’s treatment of the problem. By adding layer upon layer of the same accusation and rebuttal, the author brings us into the very midst of the impasse. It does not take long for us to recognize the pointlessness of the debate. Job makes his claims, and his counselors make theirs. Neither side is convinced by the other. Only some manifestation from God can resolve the impasse.

Job demands a hearing and, finally, God does confront him but in a manner surpassing Job’s imagining. God breaks the cosmic silence and thunders through the heavens. Job makes his appeal to the justice of God. God answers Job from the midst of creative wisdom and power. Even though his questions are not answered, the opposing tensions with which Job struggles are clearly reconciled in the end. But why?—and how?

The epilogue and its last verses of prose complete the reworked folktale. Job is vindicated and, as was the custom in this ancient society when someone had been unjustly dispossessed, he is compensated for his losses by double payment. But Job's question: "Why?" is never answered. As the book ends, all he knows is that the innocent can indeed be afflicted for no apparent reason and with no guarantee that the reason will ever be disclosed.

The Message

While the book of Job is a poetic narrative, it also contains theological teaching consisting of several intricately interwoven themes. The way we understand the arguments in the book will influence the way we perceive this theology. The themes are treated here not in order of importance but as they appear in the book.

Reward and Punishment

The theory of retribution undergirds most of the wisdom literature. It is, after all, the basis of any notion of justice: goodness should be rewarded and evil punished. This theory probably originated from the experience of life itself, for actions often do generate their own consequences. When it appears that this will not happen in the natural course of events, someone often steps in to see that justice is done. We not only expect this to happen; we need it to happen in order to live with a certain degree of security.

This theory clearly plays an important role in the book of Job. Although Job endures insufferable loss and physical distress, his real agony lies in the incomprehensibility of his situation. He has been a righteous man—and righteous people should not be so afflicted. Job's claim of righteousness is not empty. The author has taken great pains in the prologue to show us that Job is indeed a man of unsurpassed integrity. Then why should he have to bear the burden that, according to this theory, is the consequence of wickedness? Has God forgotten Job's faithfulness? Or, even worse, is God indifferent toward it? These are the kinds of questions at the heart of Job's dilemma.

It is clear that those who visit Job consider the theory of retribution a valid way of interpreting life. Job is suffering; therefore, he must be guilty of wrongdoing. Since his suffering is so comprehensive and so intense, his sin must be serious. Job's visitors use every argument they can devise to convince him of his error and to persuade him to repent. They draw their conclusions about the morality of his behavior from the nature of his present situation. They do not question Job's suffering, and so they assume that he is guilty.

Job himself adheres to the same theory, but he makes his claims from a different perspective. He knows that he has done nothing to deserve such misfortune. Still, a strict understanding of retribution offers no other explanation for his troubles and, therefore, Job blames God. Being a man of faith, he believes that God is the architect of the order in the universe. God is the one who made things to work as they do. Ultimately, God is the one who decides who will be rewarded and who will be punished. God usually accomplishes this through the laws set at creation. When they seem to fail, God can and, as the traditions of Israel claim, does intervene to enforce justice. Job argues that God has failed to do this in his case.

Since the bulk of the speeches deals with arguments in defense of or in opposition to Job's righteousness, one would think that when the LORD speaks, the matter will be clarified and we will know who is correct. When God finally does thunder from the whirlwind, the question of justice is never addressed. Instead, the issue is the creative wisdom and power of God. Still, this is not an avoidance of the question. In this book God is cast in the role of wisdom teacher, and such a teacher asks rhetorical questions and refers to the natural world in order to make a point about the human condition. By means of such questioning, God leads Job to see that as there is much in nature that Job cannot understand, so there is much in human experience that also is beyond him. Indirectly, God reveals the inadequacy of the theory of retribution. God shows Job that happiness and success are not always demonstrable rewards for righteous living nor are grief and failure necessarily punishment for unfaithfulness. In other words, suffering is not a sure sign of alienation from God.

Theodicy

Once we are convinced that certain suffering is undeserved, we are faced with a very troubling question: "Why does God seem to allow injustice?" Theodicy (from the Greek for "justifying God") is the name given to our attempt to explain the problem of evil, while at the same time maintaining the belief that God is a moral creator who is in control and who loves those who suffer. If Job did not believe that God is moral, the question of evil would have taken a totally different turn. If God is not just, then Job's suffering might be equally difficult for him to bear but it would not be the puzzle that it is. He would know that he could not depend upon God for justice. It is clear that such a view was foreign to Israel's faith, for Job's counselors never question God's integrity, and Job does so only reluctantly.

According to another view, God could be moral but not able to control evil completely. This is the theory advanced by several post-Holocaust thinkers who cannot explain why God allowed so many millions of innocent people to be exterminated during the Second World War. Although a number of recent thinkers have held this view, that view itself is not found in the Bible. Israel believed that its God was the undisputed almighty creator (see Is 45:7; Am 3:6). None of the characters in the book of Job doubts God's control. In fact, if Job could believe that God was not somehow responsible, his torment might even be lessened.

Finally, perhaps God is both moral and omnipotent but unconcerned about simple people. Surely the almighty God has more important things to do than to worry about the fortunes or misfortunes of one man. The traditions of Israel contradict this notion as well. From the earliest stories of the ancestors (Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Rachel and Leah) we see God portrayed as attentive to the most personal needs of the individual. This is the memory of God that Job recalls as he laments his present predicament (Jb 29:1–6). How could a gracious God, who cared for him in earlier years, turn against him now?

Theodicy is not an issue for the visitors, since Job's misery is not a puzzle to them. Job himself is intent on defending his own integrity rather than God's, and so theodicy is not a concern of his either. However, it is of major importance to the author of the book, who depicts God as all-powerful and provident and a God of unchallenged goodness. At the end of the book, the question of suffering may be left unanswered, but the integrity of God is no longer questioned.

Disinterested Piety

The drama of the book stems from the satan's challenge found in 1:9: "Is it for nothing that Job is God-fearing?" He insinuates that Job is righteous because of the rewards that he now enjoys and will continue to enjoy as long as he remains faithful. It is easy for Job to be loyal to God when things are going right and he is happy with life. Take away his prosperity and the good things of life, and he will not only give up his way of integrity but will actually curse God. The reader should note that God takes the dare. Twice Job is assaulted. His initial response to the tragedy that has fallen upon him proves that the satan's accusation was groundless. Job neither curses God nor veers from his attachment to God. Despite his complete reversal of fortune, Job's confidence has not been shaken, and he actually praises God (see 1:21 and 2:10).

It is clear that Job is not God-fearing simply for the sake of blessing. His afflictions do not diminish his devotion. Even in adversity he believes that all things are in God's hands, and God will render whatever God deems fit. Still, it is probable that Job did expect to be blessed for being faithful. The admonitions of his visitors as well as his own later assertions mark an expectation common to all of them (see 4:7; 8:20; 11:15; 13:16). All seem to believe that goodness will not go unrewarded nor will wickedness fail to be punished—a conviction that is fundamental to the notion of justice. The question still remains: Was Job faithful for the sake of reward or was his piety really disinterested? The content of Job's laments and pleading show that he does not look for recompense; he wants vindication. He is not concerned about possessions; he insists that his integrity be acknowledged. When he finally understands the lesson that God set out to teach him, he is silent and seems content with his new insights. It is apparent that the depth of Job's piety is based on his relationship with God, not on some promise of reward.

The ancient Israelites did not have a clear idea of reward or punishment in an afterlife, as Christian theology teaches. If justice was not meted out in this life, they had no hope at all for retribution. This makes Job's disinterested piety even more admirable. Job is not willing to accept unquestioningly what he considers a grave injustice. He rejects the instruction and counsel of those considered teachers of the religious tradition. Job is not blindly docile in his suffering. Nor is he afraid to complain to God in his frustration. He does not really argue with God because he is suffering, but because he sees a conflict between his unwarranted suffering and his faith in the justice of God. The Job who accuses God is no less pious than when he earlier acknowledged, "The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away" (1:21). We are reminded of the great Teresa of Avila, who in frustration also complained to God: “No wonder you have so few friends.”

Suffering

Although the customary way of understanding suffering was as punishment for sin, the book of Job does provide other explanations for it. The prologue itself tells us that God allowed Job’s misfortunes to befall him so that Job’s integrity might be tested (1:11; 2:5). Suffering is also sometimes seen as a source of moral discipline. Finally, Elihu claims that pain and sickness sometimes act as warnings against sin and as a defense against pride and complacency (33:15–24). A similar incident in the cycle of stories about Abraham comes to mind. There “God put Abraham to the test” (Gn 22:1) and told him to sacrifice his son Isaac. There is a significant difference here, however. In the end, Abraham was told that he had been tested (Gn 22:16), while Job never knows about God’s dealing with the satan. Job himself never regards his misfortune as a test.

Other interpretations of suffering include: vicariously enduring the punishment of others (the Suffering Servant: Is 52:13–53:12); undergoing purification (Ps 66:10); a necessary way of accomplishing the will of God (Joseph in Egypt: Gn 50:20). Only the first two explanations are found in the book of Job.

The ancient Near East offered another explanation referred to as the “curse of the evil deed.” It claimed that those who engage in evil infect themselves in the process. This notion is behind the saying: “Whoever digs a pit falls into it” (Prv 26:27). Just as the Israelites had a sense that goodness was a force that determined life, so they believed that evil carried its own consequences. It must be noted that this view differs from that of retribution since it does not believe that God intervenes to punish. In fact, it tends to exclude divine activity. This may explain why, in Israel, it seldom appeared by itself. It is always tempered by belief in God’s ultimate control of good and evil.

The biblical writers appear to be more interested in the reason and purpose of suffering than in its origin. They addressed the fact of suffering and tried to give meaning to it. They offered provisional explanations intended to strengthen people in their struggle. These explanations were not meant to be conclusive answers, because circumstances change and might cease to be appropriate. This is precisely the case in Job. The instruction and advice offered by his visitors may very well have been fitting in other circumstances, but in Job's situation they are empty of meaning. No one seems able to offer him an adequate explanation for his suffering. This inability adequately to explain suffering may be why this book has always enjoyed a place of prominence in the literature of the world and in the hearts of countless people. No one is protected from undeserved personal misfortunes such as the sudden and tragic death of loved ones, human exploitation or betrayal, the unexpected collapse of a business or career, or from disasters such as flooding or fire or other ravages of nature. The horrors of war, of ethnic, racial, sexual, or other social discrimination or brutality, victimize untold children, women, and men and defy all standards of justice. Over the centuries this pitiable man has stood as proof that suffering is not a sure sign of infidelity. He continues to be a source of consolation for many today who suffer through no fault of their own.

Experience and Tradition

A fundamental principle that underlies wisdom thinking and which plays an important role in the book of Job is the relationship between experience and tradition in the formation of new theological understanding. A dynamic relationship exists between the religious tradition as it has been handed down to us and the needs of contemporary society. Each influences and refashions the other. Neither Job nor the men who came to advise him took note of this dynamic. In the final summary of his cause, Job insisted that he always complied with the prescriptions of the law (see chapter 31). In fact, he went far beyond the demands of the law. It was precisely because of his faithfulness that he expected a life of peace and prosperity. His situation suggested, however, that something was seriously wrong with the order of things. He was not willing to question his own integrity, and he was not ready to challenge the tradition. That is why he found fault with God. The others also evaluated Job's life according to the tradition. Adhering to the conventional way of interpreting suffering, they insisted that his present state of misery was the direct consequence of some sin. They argued that God was justified in afflicting Job and the tradition was adequate in explaining the situation. They discounted the authenticity of Job's experience of faithfulness.

After speaking to Job from the whirlwind, God turned to Eliphaz and stated: “You have not spoken rightly concerning me, as has my servant Job” (42:7). Where were these men wrong and Job right? What had they said that was not part of the traditional teaching? The only issue over which there was serious disagreement was that of Job’s innocence: Job insisted that God afflicted him without cause. Upholding an inflexible interpretation of the tradition, the visitors maintained that God would never act in such a manner. The reader knows that the visitors were wrong.

Job’s experience of innocent suffering called for a new and more critical look at the tradition. It is strange that neither Job nor his counselors challenged this unbending interpretation of theology, because it is precisely the ability to be faithful yet flexible in new situations that constitutes wisdom. Perhaps the author of the book wanted to demonstrate what can happen when theology is rigidly applied.

Creation Theology

Perhaps the most neglected characteristic of this multifaceted biblical book is the revelatory significance of nature that is drawn there. Job stands in awe of the vistas of creation that unfold before him by means of God’s interrogation. Nonetheless, the questions posed by God are much more than a test of Job’s knowledge of the universe. God does not provide direct answers to Job’s demanding questions. Instead, like a good teacher, God poses questions that force Job to look beyond his own questioning. The marvel of this questioning technique is seen in its ability to bring Job to real wisdom despite, or perhaps because of, the indirectness of the approach. God asks questions about cosmic nature, and Job gains insight into human nature. Cosmology reveals the place of anthropology.

As important a role as nature plays in this remarkable biblical book, it is not the principal marvel showcased here. Rather, it is the awesome God who is manifested through the natural world. In other words, the artistry of God can be seen in the splendor of the universe; God’s unsurpassed wisdom is evident in the world’s delicate balance; God’s incomparable imagination is expressed in nature’s vast diversity; God’s providence is displayed in earth’s inherent fruitfulness. The natural world was not only born of the creativity of God, it also bears the features of this creativity. Every property of creation mirrors something of the Creator. It is not enough to say that creation is the means through which God is revealed. In a very real sense, the means is itself the revelation: creation itself is a revelation of God. Job states this clearly in his final response. There he testifies to having seen something of God, not merely the splendor of creation: “By hearsay I had heard of you, but now my eye has seen you” (42:5).

The wonders of creation that were paraded before Job were not unknown to him before this extraordinary revelation by God. They constituted the everyday world that he knew but which he did not fully understand. It was the ordinary world within which he lived but which he seems to have taken for granted. This breathtaking, even mystical, experience of creation has catapulted him out of the narrow confines of anthropocentrism, concerned exclusively with his own valid yet self-centered matters, into the vast expanses of splendor and mystery of the universe. It has brought him to realize that human history unfolds within the broader context of the natural world, and not vice versa. Job comes to see that the natural world does not merely serve the ends of human history. His encounter with the ineffable Creator-God has led him to this new insight. It is an insight that transforms him from a self-pitying victim of circumstances to a human being who has endured the struggles of human finitude and has emerged chastened, yet nonetheless a mystic.

The God of Mystery

The book of Job portrays God in various ways. In his complaints, Job characterizes God as powerful and oppressive when near, and unconcerned when at a distance. Job’s companions describe God as a prosecuting judge. However, the image unveiled in the speeches of the LORD is quite different. God is indeed seen as powerful, but it is a wondrous, awe-inspiring power (see 40:3–5). It is also true that God is transcendent, but this does not prevent God from being solicitous for even the mountain goat about to kid (see 39:1). Finally, God does not assume the role of divine judge, summoning Job before the divine tribunal, there to find him guilty and to sentence him. Instead, Job is questioned by the divine teacher and led to new horizons of understanding. What he understands is that he has been treading on mystery “things too wonderful for me” (42:3). In the book of Job, God is the provident but nonetheless mysterious God of creation.

The Dramatic Effect of the Story

The best way to read the book of Job is as a drama from beginning to end. Only in that way can one feel the frustration of the counselors mount and the desperation of Job deepen. The final effect of reading the book in this way includes an admission that much of life is incomprehensible. Whether we have identified with Job or with one of the others, we come to the speeches of the LORD and we realize that no one can answer the questions put to Job. Everyone—Job, Eliphaz, Bildad, Zophar, Elihu, the reader—once confronted with incomprehensibility in human life, stands silent before this transcendent yet always engaged God.

PSALMS

[see pages 727–834 of the Old Testament]

ABOUT THE BOOK

The book of Psalms, also known as the Psalter, is really a collection of books each of which ends with a short doxology or hymn of praise. This is clear to anyone who looks closely at the arrangement of the psalms. The editors of the New American Bible Revised Edition have indicated this order by adding subdivisions within the text itself. “The First Book—Psalms 1–41” ends with a doxology in 41:14; “The Second Book—Psalms 42–72” ends with a doxology in 72:18–19; “The Third Book—Psalms 73–89” ends with 89:53; “The Fourth Book—Psalms 90–106” ends with 106:48; “The Fifth Book—Psalms 107–150” ends with an entire psalm of praise as Psalm 150.

Evidence within the book of Psalms itself indicates that the present anthology was composed of even earlier collections. Several psalms, found principally in the first section are attributed to David. This may account for the popular but probably not historically accurate tradition that David himself wrote most of the psalms. Several psalms in the second and third sections are ascribed to Korah and Asaph, the two great guilds of Temple singers performing during the period of the Second Temple (see 1 Chr 6:33ff; 25:1–2). These groupings may have been the original collections around which other psalms clustered. Finally, the fifth section is made up of a number of Songs of Ascent and psalms of praise known as Hallel or the Hallelujah collection.

These collections have another distinguishing characteristic: variations in the preferred name for God, YHWH (translated LORD) is generally used in the first, the fourth, and the fifth collections. This has led some to refer to them as the “Yahwist Psalter.” The name Elohim (translated God) is preferred in the second and third sections, and thus they are sometimes called the “Elohist Psalter.” Most scholars believe that Elohim is a substitution made by a postexilic editor who wished to show reverence for the divine name (YHWH) by avoiding its use. These various collections overlap and so it is difficult to identify precisely the original groupings. It is enough to know that the final compilers had an array of psalms from which to choose. The presence of psalmody in places other than the Psalter (e.g., the Song of Moses in Ex 15 and the Song of Deborah in Jgs 5) indicates that there were many more psalms current than have been preserved here.

Types of Psalms

Commentators classify the psalms in slightly different ways. There is, however, widespread agreement that the major headings are three: hymn, lament, and thanksgiving. In addition to these major groups, there are royal psalms, wisdom poems, and some psalms that might fit into more than one category. Since psalms are the prayerful responses to life experiences, a study of their form as well as their content will throw light on the life situation of the community from which they sprang.

Laments

The type of psalm that occurs most frequently in the Psalter is the lament. Nearly a third of all the psalms belong to this category. Depending on the speaker, they are further classified as community laments or laments of the individual. The structure of the lament is not exactly the same in every case. Not all laments appear to be complete, and even when the most common elements are present, they do not seem to have any fixed order. Still, laments are usually comprised of: an invocation similar to the hymnic introduction; the actual lamentation that describes the suffering endured by the one(s) praying; a plea for deliverance from this misfortune; some kind of praise of God, often an expression of confidence that God will come to the rescue of the community or the individual; a vow to perform an act of worship in gratitude for God's intervention. Some laments also include an acknowledgment of guilt or an assertion of innocence. Finally, there is frequently a curse hurled against the one(s) believed to be responsible for the intolerable situation that precipitates the lament.

It is quite clear that the community laments (Pss 12, 14, 44, 53, 58, 60, 74, 79, 80, 83, 85, 89, 90, 94, 106, 123, 126, 137) were somehow associated with the official cultic worship of Israel. Most probably they were used when the people gathered to fast and pray on special occasions arising from national humiliation or distress. The enemies referred to are usually national rivals who, by being opponents of Israel, were viewed as opposed to the LORD. These psalms often contain a recital of the former marvelous deeds that God accomplished in the history of the nation. This was to remind God of past favors and thus encourage God to grant new ones, as well as to remind the people of God's earlier blessings in order to instill confidence in their hearts.

The laments of the individual (Pss 3–7, 13, 17, 22, 25–28, 31, 35, 36, 38–40, 42/43 [considered a single psalm, as explained in the footnote to Ps 42], 51, 52, 54–57, 59, 61, 63, 64, 69–71, 77, 86, 88, 102, 109, 120, 130, 140–143) were most likely prayerful responses to personal misfortunes such as illness or persecution. Commentators believe that they were an integral part of personal liturgical devotion. Frequently, people who were suffering went to the Temple, or to another shrine, in order to make a formal request to God for deliverance. Laments, with their declaration of trust in God, were simultaneously prayers to God and testimonies of hope for the benefit of the community gathered around the one suffering.

Hymns

The hymn is a song of praise of God. While many hymns appear to be the prayers of individuals, most of them seem to have been composed for use in the liturgies of Israel's major festivals. The reason for praising God, as expressed in the psalm itself, enables us to further classify certain hymns as psalms of the kingship of the LORD or as songs of Zion.

Hymns (Pss 8, 19, 29, 33, 100, 103–104, 111, 113, 114, 117, 135, 136, 145–150) usually open with a call to praise, which suggests that this type of psalm originated within a community setting and a liturgical leader is calling the others to prayer. This introductory exhortation is followed by an account of the wondrous acts of God, deeds that cause one to stand in awe. Depending upon the psalm, God is praised for the glories of creation (e.g., Ps 8) or for the marvelous feats performed specifically for the people of Israel (among others, Ps 114). Having proclaimed God's glorious deeds, the psalm ends with a repetition of the initial call to praise, some expression of exaltation of God, and a plea for God's blessing. Not all of these elements are present in every psalm.

Hymns of the LORD's kingship (Pss 47, 93, 96–99) are a distinct group among the psalms. They address the LORD, the universal king, and they have many images and motifs in common. Some scholars claim that these psalms were composed for an annual celebration: the feast of the Enthronement of the LORD. They therefore refer to this group as “enthronement psalms” and place them in a category of their own. However, no account of such a festival can be found in the Bible itself. For that reason, and also because this group of psalms fits the general hymnic pattern perfectly, they are here included in this category.

The songs of Zion (Pss 46, 48, 76, 84, 87, 122) extol Zion as God’s holy mountain and Jerusalem as the city God chose to inhabit. There is a variation in the structure of these psalms. Both the introductory and concluding call to praise, which are typical of hymns, are missing. Still, the body of the psalm celebrates the mighty God of Israel, who held back every kind of primeval attack on the city and who now dwells on its sacred mountain. As with the psalms in praise of the LORD’s kingship, we are not certain about the cultic setting at which the songs of Zion were sung. We may be heirs to Israel’s songs but we do not know more than a few general facts about its cultic calendar and we cannot reconstruct its system of worship.

Confidence and Thanksgiving

It is rather difficult to classify these psalms. Expressions of confidence and gratitude are often found within laments. This has led many interpreters to list these psalms with either community or individual laments. There are some psalms, however, that might be considered explicit psalms of confidence, both communal (Pss 115, 125, 129) and individual (Pss 11, 16, 23, 62, 91, 121, 131). Psalms of thanksgiving, again both communal (Pss 65–68, 75, 107, 118, 124) and individual (Pss 9/10, 30, 32, 34, 41, 92, 116, 138), also comprise a distinct category. It is the subject matter rather than the form that characterizes this type of psalm. Thanksgiving psalms are similar to hymns for they extol the marvelous works of God. What distinguishes the two is the sentiment that each elicits. Hymns call forth praise; thanksgiving psalms are expressions of gratitude. Like the laments, psalms of thanksgiving were probably part of the communal and personal liturgical life of the people and were used in cult and devotion when thanksgiving was in order (perhaps at a harvest festival, or after a threat by an enemy had been successfully resisted).

Royal Psalms

There are several psalms that pertain specifically and exclusively to the king. Some scholars believe that they point to a prominent royal role in the cult. Others contend that the king did not have to be a cultic leader to enjoy a significant place in the ritual. His political and religious importance were enough to assure him of a cultic function. We must remember that this is a nation that perceived its king as the representative of the whole people before God and as God's special envoy for the people. This shared perception entitled the king to the prominence he enjoyed.

Various occasions in the life of the king constitute the setting of these psalms. There are coronation hymns (Pss 2, 72, 101, 110), an anniversary hymn (Ps 132), a royal wedding song (Ps 45), petitions in behalf of the warrior-king (Pss 20, 144), and prayers of thanksgiving for his successes (Pss 18, 21). These royal psalms are often referred to as "messianic psalms." "Messiah" means "anointed one," and the king is called "messiah" or "anointed one" in Psalm 2. To read them as messianic psalms implies that they refer to an ideal king who is to come in the future. These psalms take on a new meaning in the Christian tradition when they are applied to Jesus, the king par excellence and the one anointed by God.

Wisdom Poems

These poems (Pss 1, 37, 49, 73, 112, 119, 127, 128) are clearly different from those psalms which probably originated in and were used during liturgical celebrations. They differ in both content and style. The wisdom tradition in general is concerned with the problem of evil, the suffering of the righteous, and the justice of God. These same themes, along with language and imagery characteristic of that tradition, are found in the wisdom psalms. Finally, the manner of address here is intended to instruct rather than to evoke a response. The wisdom psalms call people to listen and learn, not to pray.

Although these psalms do not follow a uniform style, they do have some distinctive literary characteristics. The sages of ancient Israel made use of several techniques that were judged helpful for learning. Some of these techniques appear in the wisdom psalms. A popular technique was the acrostic arrangement, a poetic form in which the alphabet determines the initial letter of the first word of each successive line. Several wisdom poems follow this arrangement (e.g., Pss 37, 112 along with 111, and 119). Because they conform to this pattern, some commentators include as wisdom poems some psalms listed under other categories (Hymn: Ps 145; Lament: Ps 25; Thanksgivings: Pss 9/10, 34).

It may be difficult to understand how and why this type of psalm originated and was included in the various collections. What may be even more puzzling is the fact that the Psalter begins with a wisdom poem (Ps 1). Most likely a postexilic compiler placed this psalm first at a time when there was neither Temple nor Temple worship, and those responsible for the religious life of the community wanted to keep the psalms alive in Israelite devotion. At this particularly critical time the psalms might be seen as a treasury for much needed instruction as well as for prayer. The organization into five “books” might well have been patterned at this time after the Torah or five books of Moses, wherein the major teachings of the faith were found.

Various Psalms

There are other psalms that obviously were used during a pilgrimage to or procession around Jerusalem and the Temple. The Songs of Ascent, one of the early collections mentioned earlier, preserves the memory of such psalms. In addition to this group, there are other psalms that were sung during processions (Pss 15, 24, 95). A few psalms appear to have been composed after the style of prophetic speech (Pss 50, 81, 82). Since people frequently came to the Temple or to a shrine in search of some word from the LORD, it is understandable that traces of this form would remain in some psalms. Finally, a small number of psalms seem to defy classification. They are either historical recitals of the feats of the LORD (Pss 78, 105), composites of other psalm forms (Pss 108, 133, 139), or general liturgical songs (Ps 134).

The Piety of the Psalmist

The psalms generally speak to God rather than about God. Although most of the important historical events of the nation as well as the universal needs of women and men are described or addressed somewhere in these prayers, the psalms are just that—prayers to God. The various forms of psalms (hymn, lament, thanksgiving, etc.) express different sentiments of devotion.

Grief, Fear, Repentance, and Confidence

We all have a certain sense about how life is supposed to unfold. We learn this as we are fashioned in and by the various social groups to which we belong. While societies may differ over values and lifestyles, all agree that basic to our nature as human beings is the desire to be happy. Social groups to which we belong train us in the acceptable ways of achieving and maintaining the happiness we seek. When we have not attained what we believe is our right, or when having once attained it, we lose it, we often cry out in protest. We tend to balk at the unfairness of adversity regardless of whether we are in any way responsible for it. We expect that life will be good to us. This natural human instinct, coupled with the conviction of God's special love and care, led Israel to expect security in a hostile world, success in its undertakings, and a life of serenity and prosperity for the nation as a whole and for each individual within that nation. Such a state of affairs is what the Bible refers to as shalom or peace. Psalms of lament grew out of the absence of just such peace.

The references in communal laments apply to some national disaster that has already taken place. Depending upon the dating of the particular psalm, this calamity could have been the fall of the Northern Kingdom of Israel (about 722 BC), the Babylonian Exile (about 586 BC), or the Maccabean conflict (about 167 BC). Allusions to the vulnerability of the nation would fit any one of these three emergencies. Any description of the destruction of the Temple, however, must be dated after the time of the Exile and before the rebuilding of the Temple (515 BC).

That the psalmist cries out to God demonstrates Israel's belief that God has both the power and the will to intervene and deliver the nation from its present distress. Several psalms themselves indicate that this belief is based on former saving events in the history of the people (e.g., Pss 44:2–4; 74:2; 83:10). Israel believed that God's might was in no way exhausted in earlier feats. On the contrary, Israel held that the all-powerful God was always ready to defend the nation whenever it was threatened with extinction. Even as the people cried out in complaint, they proclaimed God's all-encompassing power and declared their trust in God's continued concern for them, a concern based on divine covenantal promises. An expression of confidence, then, is an important characteristic of the lament.

As there were times when Israel felt that it was the innocent victim of the aggression of another nation, there were also instances when it admitted that the straits in which it found itself were directly related to its own sinfulness. Suffering at the hand of another was seen as punishment from God for violation of the covenant. In some of the laments, Israel admits its guilt, pleads for forgiveness and for an end to its suffering, and promises to amend its ways. One of the communal laments recounts the nation's history as if it were no more than a series of offenses against a loving God (Ps 106). Others plead that God might forgive the people for their sins and restore them to divine favor (Pss 80:5–8; 90:7–17). In these psalms, suffering is understood as recompense from a God who is just but also forgiving.

Many of the sentiments found in the communal laments are present in individual complaints as well. The authors of these prayers claim that they are physically or spiritually afflicted or that they are being wrongfully oppressed by others. In their distress they turn to God for release. They do not doubt God's ultimate control over the workings of nature or the social order. Nonetheless, they might, on occasion, question why God allowed them to be besieged in the first place. Their confidence in God rests on both the recollections of past blessing and reliance on God's own faithfulness to covenant promises.

Praise

Praise is that sentiment that wells up within believers when they are overwhelmed by the wonders around them or by the provident concern afforded them by the events of life and by life itself. It is not so much something that they are taught as it is something that they experience. Praise of some sort is natural to human beings. Who has not been swept away by the extravagance of a sunset, by the delicacy of spring's reawakening, by the refreshment of a gentle summer breeze, by the magnitude of the ocean's horizon or the night sky's depth? Who has not stood in awe before the splendor of creation and been drawn out of themselves? Attentive to the religious tendencies within themselves, believers will be moved to praise. We discover the same sentiment in the hymns. The psalmist does not seem able to find words adequate to describe the grandeur of creation (Pss 8, 29, 104, 148), and so all of the forces of nature are called upon to join the psalmist in glorifying God. Underlying such sentiments of praise is the belief that God is the creator of all things and that all that God has created is beautiful, deserving of our respect and a reminder of the majestic creator.

Other hymns applaud God for the marvelous feats performed on behalf of the Israelites (Pss 105, 114, 135). Again and again the miraculous power of God intervened for them thus saving them from certain extinction. Since the initial and preeminent experience of deliverance was liberation from the oppression of Egypt, the Exodus became for them the symbol of all liberation. In these psalms, God is perceived as tireless savior, and the psalmist's praise is an acknowledgement of the nation's total dependence on God for its continued survival.

These hymns presume that nature is benign and that God is committed to the well-being of the people. Such a view of life does not usually emerge spontaneously. It either arises from an experience of life that is basically untroubled or from a religious belief that God does indeed want what is best for us and, thus, we should be fulfilled in life. The biblical hymns are not the flights of fancy of people who have been protected from the hard realities of life or from the indifference of nature. They are songs of praise of people who, despite misfortune, persist in their reliance on an all-powerful yet attentive God.

The LORD is further acclaimed as the sole and eternal sovereign over all nations. The God of Israel earned this title as champion in the primordial struggle with chaos (Pss 96:4–5; 98:1), undermining the influence of the other gods and ascending the heavenly throne to reign with universal and undisputed authority. The concept of God as victor in the cosmic conflict embraces the notion of creator, for creation frequently was understood as the establishment of order out of chaos (see the creation narrative in Gn 1). Unlike the hymns discussed above, the psalms that laud the LORD's rule acknowledge the threatening powers present in the universe. Chaos was conquered by the LORD, but not totally destroyed. Admission of this in no way detracts from belief in the universal reign of God proclaimed in the psalms. Instead, it was a way that Israel dealt with the fact that creation is not always friendly, and life does not always appear to be favoring us. Despite this, Israel believed that the LORD is truly in charge, involved in creation while ruling from the divine throne in the heavens, controlling all of the forces of the universe and, therefore, deserving of our undivided allegiance.

The songs of Zion contain some of the same imagery as do the psalms that honor the Lord-King. Ancient Canaanite mythology, from which much of the Israelite imagery originated, recounts the cosmic battle described earlier. After the forces of evil have been quelled, a palace is built for the victor on the summit of the highest mountain. From this vantage point the conquering hero holds sway over the entire universe. Israel revered Zion as this sacred mountain and revered the Temple as the palace of the victorious Creator-God. A significant shift in understanding can be detected in these psalms. Zion and the Jerusalem Temple move the drama from the cosmic scene of primordial creation to the political and cultural world of Israel. The reality of God's divine creative power is now associated with one nation and, because of the close connection between Zion and David, specifically with the monarchy. The songs of Zion depict God as unabashedly committed to the welfare of Israel over all other nations. The Creator-God who is praised in these psalms is not distant from this people but lives in their very midst, allowing them to approach the divine presence that is somehow mysteriously dwelling in the Temple. (There was an attempt to balance this apparent exclusivity by inviting all other nations to worship the LORD on Zion [see Is 2:2–3; Mi 4:1–2].) Thus God is perceived as near and accessible, and Zion and the Temple command veneration.

The hymns provide us with several perceptions of God: the creator of the universe, historical liberator, and cosmic champion. At times these perceptions overlap, producing a collage of images intended to call forth praise. The psalmist extols God for the wonders of creation, for continued deliverance from destruction, for God's victory over the forces of evil, and for the fact of God's presence in the midst of the people. These are some of the sentiments voiced in the biblical hymns.

Gratitude

Prayers of thanksgiving are similar to those of confidence in that the latter expect blessing and the former thank God for it. At times this gratitude flows from favors already received. At other times it anticipates the blessing that the psalmist is confident will come. The structure and content of the thanksgiving psalm resemble those of the hymn. There can be no thanksgiving until God has first been praised for the goodness that God has accomplished.

National Loyalty

The royal psalms emanated from national pride and spirit. Allegiance to the king was regarded as loyalty to the nation. Since the king was perceived as God's special envoy for the people and the representative of the whole people before God, loyalty to the king and to the nation was considered an act of devotion to God. These psalms originated out of various royal settings, and they express sentiments appropriate to the respective occasion (e.g., coronations, weddings, danger to the king during warfare, etc.). Despite their diversity, the sentiments of all of these songs flow from what today would be considered a type of patriotism.

An Understanding Heart

The wisdom poems generally do not address God. They are usually directed toward the community. The piety of the psalmist is not explicit here as it is in the many of the other psalms. Still, it can be discerned by looking carefully at the way the poet treats the themes that appear to be prominent. The problem of evil, the suffering of the righteous, and the justice of God are principal concerns of the wisdom tradition and are all facets of the same issue—the right order of the universe. It is clear that the wisdom psalmist presumes that there is an order to the world, and that there is a way in which we can live in this ordered world so as to be secure and prosperous. It is also evident that the psalmist sees God as the source and guarantor of this order.

On the other hand, evil that clearly is not punishment can challenge the sovereignty or justice of God. When this evil raises its head, God is expected to step in, subdue it, and restore the world to its former and appropriate state. When this does not happen, the power of God or the uprightness of God may be questioned. Either God cannot repress the evil or is unwilling to do so. While Job and Ecclesiastes live with the unanswered question of innocent suffering, and Job even demands that God take responsibility for it, the wisdom psalms do not challenge the prevailing situation. They seem to presume that the suffering of the righteous is for some legitimate purpose, which God will reveal at the appropriate time and then correct.

The themes, language, and imagery of the wisdom poems depict God as creator of all. In this they resemble the hymns and psalms of thanksgiving. In their insistence on justice, they are like the laments. These similarities explain why commentators classify the wisdom poems in different ways. These psalms may not be explicit expressions of Israelite piety, but they do reveal a trait characteristic of religious sentiment, that is, an understanding heart (see 1 Kgs 3, 9, 12).

Enthusiasm, Humility, and Faithfulness

The processional psalms are charged with excitement and anticipation. They invite the observant Israelite to participate with heart and soul in various liturgical celebrations. The major festivals of ancient Israel (Passover and Unleavened Bread, Pentecost or the Feast of Weeks, Sukkoth or the Feast of Tabernacles) were all commemorated with pilgrimages to Jerusalem. Psalms were sung as the people approached the city. There were shouts of profound joy as well as humble acknowledgements of the need for pure hearts when approaching the holy city and the Temple of the LORD.

Prophetic psalms were also linked closely to the Temple. They embrace sentiments of humility and religious devotion, and they summon the people to be faithful to their covenant commitment.

The wide range of religious sentiment found in the Psalter reveals the extent of Israel's piety. Every human emotion is tapped because Israel believes that God is involved in every aspect of life. It is no wonder that the psalms have touched the lives of women and men throughout the ages and that they continue to inspire the human spirit even to our own day.

The Theology in the Psalms

The expressions of piety found within the book of Psalms give us insight into the theology of ancient Israel. Although much of this theology has already been noted, it will be helpful to look at it in a more systematic fashion.

The God of Israel

The portrait of God that is sketched in the psalms draws together all of the divine faces found in the rest of the Israelite tradition. This God is the creator of the universe (Ps 8:4) and the source of all life (Ps 36:10), enthroned in heaven (Ps 47:6) yet dwelling in Jerusalem (Ps 76:3). Initially, the LORD may have been perceived as Israel's exclusive liberator (Ps 66:6), but the universal scope of God's power and protection came into view as the nation moved closer and closer to a monotheistic faith. Although uniquely committed to Israel by means of the Mosaic covenant (Ps 114:2), and to the monarchy through the royal covenant with David (Ps 132), God is envisioned as concerned about the well-being of all people (Ps 117).

This majestic God inspires both fear (Ps 89:8) and confidence (Ps 23), is both demanding (Ps 75:8) and forgiving (Ps 85:3). Above all else, the God of Israel is "merciful and gracious . . . slow to anger, and abounding in mercy" (Ps 103:8; see Ps 86:5). The key characterization of the LORD is covenant partner. Everything that is important to Israel flows from this perception of God.

The Image of God

The human person is held in high regard in the psalms. (It must be noted that the psalms come from a society where the male person was the norm for what is human. The language and imagery that issued from this fact have caused great distress to some feminists. Without perpetuating this male-preferred situation and by making appropriate substitutions while reading or meditating, we can still value the psalms for their religious insight and sentiment.) Humankind is given responsibility as caretaker for the other living creatures of the earth (Ps 8, see Gn 1). Again and again the psalmist marvels at this singular work of divine artistry. Why should God be personally committed to such insignificant beings as humans (Pss 8:5; 144:3–4)? As extraordinary as they are, humans live a fleeting life (Ps 39:5–6) and then perish like the flowers of the field (Ps 103:15–16). Realization of the impermanence of life becomes even starker when we recall that the psalmist did not have any clear notion of life after death. Human dignity was related to life in this world.

There is no doubt in the mind of the psalmist that human beings are thoroughly understood by and totally dependent on God (Ps 139). God provides for their basic physical needs (Ps 65:10–14) and protects them from harm (Ps 121). In a special way, God is the guardian of the poor and afflicted (Ps 40:18), the defenseless widows and orphans (Ps 68:6), and the anawim or lowly (Ps 147:6). The psalmist goes to great lengths to show that what appears to be the insignificance of the human creature is, in fact, the occasion for the solicitude and tender care of God.

Natural Creation

The psalms reveal a special regard for natural creation as the handiwork of God (Ps 104). This may well originate from a polytheistic belief that the mysterious powers in nature are really manifestations of various deities. As Israel's understanding of God developed, expanded, and incorporated within itself reverence for these extraordinary manifestations, they came to be seen as the handiwork of the one LORD. God is praised for the glories of the natural world (Ps 104), particularly the marvelous human being (Pss 8; 139). Creation itself sings praise to God. God is revealed in the thunderstorm (Ps 29) and in the design of the natural world (Ps 65:7). This world is seen as having value in itself, not merely as a storehouse of treasures meant for the exploitation and consumption of human beings. Nor is creation seen as a rival for the homage of the people, as was the case when elements of nature itself were worshipped. Instead, the natural world is considered a partner in the praise of God (Ps 148).

The Future

Ancient Israel was interested in both the future of the nation and the fate of the individual. The positive view that it takes on this issue, which is called eschatology, stems from its faith in the goodness of God toward all of creation. Despite the struggles that the nation faced in its attempts to survive and to flourish in a contentious world, Israel believed that the final victory would be the LORD's and that it (Israel) would prosper from God's triumph. Individuals also looked to God to remedy the injustice of a burdensome life. They clung to the conviction that God would eventually right all wrongs and they would then enjoy the happiness that was their due.

The psalms that praise the rule of the LORD and describe God's defeat of the forces of evil, also promise the restoration of the nation (Ps 14:7). They state that when this happens, the gods of the other nations will be recognized as the empty idols they are (Ps 96:5), and all the peoples will join in praising the LORD (vv. 7–10). According to some of the royal psalms, this decisive turning point in history will be brought about through the agency of a messiah (Ps 2:7–9).

Great attention is paid to the fate of the individual. Although earlier theology taught that reward and punishment would be meted out within the community or down through the generations (see Ex 20:5), the postexilic prophets insisted that retribution would correspond to the individual's own deeds (see Ez 18). In the face of this new understanding, the prosperity of the wicked challenged the theory of retribution. In response, the psalmist claimed that such prosperity would not last and so the upright should not envy sinners (Ps 37:2). Still, the apparently peaceful death of those who were wicked and prosperous, and the unmerited suffering or adversity of the righteous remained an unresolved problem.

The psalms say very little about life beyond the grave but they frequently mention the shadowy existence known as Sheol (Ps 49:15). This was not a place of retribution; there was neither reward nor punishment here. It was merely a place of darkness and dust. It was probably nothing more than the grave, the abode of the dead. Still, it suggests that while Israel did not have a clear idea of life after death, it entertained the possibility that the dead did not cease to exist somewhere in some form.

The Psalms and the New Testament

We may not always appreciate the specific theological importance of the psalms, because today we tend to distinguish between explicit theological statements on the one hand and prayer on the other. In many ways, this is a false distinction. Statements of faith may well be the reflection on or development of theological thought, but prayer is theology as it is experienced. It is quite clear that the early Christians seldom made such distinctions. For them, the psalms were not only vehicles of prayer, but they also contained important statements of faith, statements that found their fulfillment in the person and mission of Jesus (see Lk 24:44).

The New Testament both alludes to and specifically cites various psalms. Five of them seem to be referred to more than the rest. These are the messianic psalms 2 and 110; the individual laments 22 and 69; and the communal psalm of thanksgiving 118. The first two are cited in discussions of Jesus's messianic preeminence (see Acts 13:33; Heb 1:5). Motifs from the two laments are used in descriptions of his Passion and death. Psalm 118 speaks of the rejected stone that becomes the cornerstone (v 22; see Mt 21:42) and the blessedness of the one who comes in the name of the LORD (v. 26, see Mk 11:9), themes that the New Testament writer sees fulfilled in Jesus. Thus the early Christian theologians developed the theology of the psalms in ways that would enhance their understanding of Jesus the Christ.

The Psalms Today

Most people are acquainted with the psalms because they are incorporated into the regular prayer life of the church. Others may be more familiar with some of them through their own personal use in private devotion. Everyone interested in the psalms will also want to know more about how they function as means of prayer. While the psalms are certainly religious literature they are at the same time means to spiritual transformation.

Poetic Imagery

The psalms are poetry. There are, in fact, some of the most beautiful poetry that the human spirit has created. The imagery is vivid, the verbs are energetic, and the sentiments expressed are shared by many. We need not be familiar with the historical situations from which the psalms sprang in order to appreciate their enduring worth. Like all classic literature, they express fundamental human values that speak to every culture and every age. By merely reading the psalms thoughtfully and respecting their integrity, we can be touched by their lyrical artistry and drawn into the dynamic world that they envision.

This reflective, even contemplative, reading can plunge us into the religious dispositions of the psalmist, for the words and the images that grew out of these dispositions can readily serve as vehicles carrying us back into them. We may not come to the psalms with hearts filled with praise or thanksgiving or grief, but the world mirrored there—a world that is real though perhaps not identical with the contemporary world—often resonates deep within us. It is as if we know that world, or at least sense that we should know it, and recognizing it we cry out in praise or thanksgiving or grief. In this way, the poetic imagery can be the starting point of our meditation on the psalms.

Genuine Prayer

For Jews and Christians, these psalms are much more than profoundly moving poetry. They are the voice of their respective religious faiths. First heard centuries ago in a land far removed from ours, they have been on the lips of believers in every historical period since that time. Psalms do not merely express devotion; they in fact profoundly shape our religious consciousness. They have served as a prism that spreads out the many facets of our relationship with God. Gilead, Manasseh, and Ephraim (see Ps 60:9) may be unfamiliar names to many, but they were beneficiaries of God's promise of protection of which we are heirs, and so we identify with them. We "join in procession with leafy branches up to the horns of the altar" (Ps 118:27) convinced that our prayers too will be answered.

Liturgy is not merely a celebration of some past event. It is an enactment in which and through which promises and claims that were made in the past become present realities. The Exodus was certainly a concrete historical event. However, whenever Israel reenacted this event (see Jos 24), the reality of the Exodus became present with all of its power and possibility. The participants of the liturgical celebration became participants of the original escape. "When the Egyptians maltreated and oppressed us, imposing harsh servitude upon us, we cried to the LORD, the God of our ancestors, and the LORD heard our cry and saw our affliction, our toil and our oppression. Then the LORD brought us out of Egypt." (Dt 26:6–8a). The psalms have a role to play in this creative reenactment. Not only do they address God in sentiments appropriate to what has been described, they fashion a world wherein we interact with God by means of these very sentiments. When we really enter the world sketched in the laments, we are plunged into fear and distress, and we cry out to the Lord. Now this is our world; these are our sentiments; this is our prayer.

When we pray the psalms in this way, we are not simply using their religious imagery to express our own personal devotion. Nor are we merely calling to memory events of the past in order to be inspired by the saving acts of God in that history. We are entering into and carrying forward our creative, dynamic religious heritage. In this way, the heritage becomes the inspiration of our personal devotion and our devotion is shaped by this biblical heritage.

The World beyond the Psalms

The psalms not only invite us into the world created by their imagery and sentiments, they also prompt us to move beyond this world, back into our own world and circumstances, there to engage in the transformation we ourselves have already undergone. The implications of this transformation of our world and the forms it may take will vary according to the sentiments found within the psalm. (Once again it will be helpful to return to the classification of psalms outlined under the heading Types of Psalms.)

Laments

The laments, the largest category of psalms found in the Bible, continue to cause considerable difficulty for many contemporary believers. Some people think that prayer should be primarily praise, petition, or thanksgiving. The fact that many of the sections of the laments, which contain accusations against God of the cursing of antagonists, have been deleted from liturgical texts seems to support this misconception. We have become so accustomed to seeing ourselves as “Alleluia People” that we relegate any mention of suffering and pain to the prayers of petition. This is unfortunate because it prevents us from dealing honestly and straightforwardly in worship with the grief and frustration we experience in the face of national crisis or personal misfortune. It is natural to complain, even to complain to God.

Laments do not originate in the hearts of nonbelievers. They spring from the conviction that God is committed to our well-being and is willing and able to provide for us in our distress. Remembrance of past protection is at the heart of this conviction, which itself actually engenders both the protest and the confidence. If the compassionate God of the past has turned away from us, surely the compassionate God of the past will once again deliver us. The laments are not only protests of our grief or fear or anger but are also testimonies of our trust in God’s faithfulness to covenant promises.

There is another way to enter the world of the laments. It is through solidarity with those who suffer and are oppressed. While laments may not come easily to the lips of the comfortable, they are integral to the prayer of those who are in distress. As we share their suffering, their prayer becomes our own; as we enter into the sentiments of the laments, we begin to understand and identify with their suffering. Laments can strengthen us in our commitment to justice and peace.

Finally, laments are often admissions of guilt, pleas for forgiveness, and promises of amendment. When we pray the laments in this spirit, we confess that God is a just yet forgiving judge and we pledge ourselves to lives of faithfulness to our own covenant responsibilities.

Hymns

As we praise God for the splendor of creation and acknowledge that the universe belongs to this divine architect and not to us, we should also be moved to profound respect for the world of which we are a part. We may have certain responsibility for the animals with whom we share the earth, but we exercise this responsibility in God's place. The hymns of praise can instill in us the dispositions necessary to become responsible stewards of the treasures of creation.

The hymns extolling the LORD for having delivered Israel from the threats of extinction depict God as an ever-present savior. This nation was rescued from oppressive policies that threatened its well-being and prevented its self-determination. In praising God as a faithful liberator, Israel also acknowledged God's enduring commitment to justice. God's people—and that includes all people—must be free to follow the inspiration of God as they receive it. As we pray these hymns, we too should find ourselves committed to justice toward and respect for the autonomy of all nations.

The LORD is also acclaimed as champion in the cosmic struggle with the threatening forces of chaos. Acknowledging that these forces were never completely destroyed, these psalms claim that the LORD is nonetheless in charge and, thus, deserving of our undivided devotion. If we praise the LORD in this fashion, we can hardly allow anything—wealth, power, national loyalty—to rival the allegiance we have pledged to God.

The final division of hymns consists of the songs of Zion. These psalms honor Zion as the mountain on which the LORD dwells, from which the LORD reigns, and to which all the nations are invited. We have seen that here the drama has moved from the cosmic plane to the world of history. The LORD is not in some distant remote place, inaccessible to the people. On the contrary, God is in the midst of the people, approachable, even inviting. We may have no allegiance to Zion, but with these psalms we are really acknowledging God's commitment to our well-being and God's faithful presence in our midst. A word of caution is in order here lest we fall into the trap of national chauvinism. Zion has significance because the LORD chose it, not the reverse. Whenever the nation confused being elect with being elite, it faced prophetic condemnation (see the prophet's reprimand of Jerusalem and the Temple in Jer 7 and 26). We are not above this same temptation. The songs honoring Zion must be understood for what they are: hymns in praise of God, not simply songs of national pride.

Thanksgiving

It is very difficult to be sincerely grateful when we think we deserve the good fortune that is ours. Psalms of thanksgiving help us to remember that whatever we enjoy has come to us from the hand of a gracious God. When these psalms are associated with laments they serve as expressions of gratitude for deliverance. This suggests that Israel recognized that its own security and prosperity were blessings from God. Psalms of thanksgiving will only be genuine prayer when they spring from the conviction that our blessings also are gratuitous gifts from God. We cannot claim them by right, and so we would do well to be as generous with them toward others as God has been with them toward us.

Other Psalms

As with the songs of Zion, we must be on guard against national chauvinism when praying the royal psalms. Israel may have believed that loyalty to the king and to the nation was an act of devotion to God, but the king was accountable to the same covenantal responsibilities as were the rest of the people, and the law of the nation was an early attempt to guarantee protection and prosperity to each member of the community. (Since this was a patriarchal society, full membership was restricted to adult men.) Rather than exempting Israel from covenantal obligations, the royal psalms proclaim that the blessings of fidelity will come through the agency of the king. These psalms provide us with language and imagery to celebrate the benefits we receive from God as citizens of our own country.

One of the characteristics of the wisdom poetry is its lavish use of nature imagery. The balance and regularity of the natural world are held up as examples after which society and human relationships should be patterned. This may help us understand why several “New Age” or “Creation-Centered Spirituality” movements turn to the wisdom tradition of the Bible for their inspiration. We can all benefit from the insights of these groups, for this dimension of our tradition has for too long been overlooked and reclaiming it can only enrich us. Still, we cannot allow reflection on the harmony in nature to hinder us from addressing the more challenging issues of the wisdom psalms. These poems challenge us with their interest in the problem of evil, the suffering of the righteous, and the justice of God. As these hymns become our own, their interests will become our commitments.

The excitement and enthusiasm that permeate the processional psalms reveal a nation that takes its liturgical celebrations seriously. There is unfeigned joy at the thought of approaching the throne of God, but there is also the humble recognition that only the pure of heart will be granted access. In a society such as ours, which is so focused on human progress and human accomplishment together with technological advances and secularization, many people have lost an appreciation of the transcendent. Processional psalms remind us that, while God is indeed in our midst and accessible to us, God is still God, holy and transcendent

It should be clear from this consideration of the psalms that their real importance lies not primarily in their literary meaning but in their religious nature. As believers, we cannot be disinterested in our study of the primary prayers of our tradition, for we come to the psalms not only with open minds but also with open hearts.

ABOUT THE BOOK

Proverbs is probably the biblical book that best characterizes the wisdom tradition. It appears to be the “guide for successful living” referred to in the introduction. Its primary purpose is to teach wisdom. It makes its appeal to various groups of people in different walks of life. It exhorts children (not necessarily only young children) to heed the teaching of their parents (1:8), and it directs citizens to act with respect toward the king (16:10–15). It warns young men of the dangers of undisciplined living (5:1–14; 23:29–35), and it offers a portrait of the model wife for women to emulate (31:10–31). Since the male is the norm in androcentric societies such as was ancient Israel, instruction is directed only to the men. Women are expected to learn the household customs according to which they are to live in the household itself, rather than from any formal training.

The book of Proverbs is composed of nine discernible collections of didactic teaching. These are quite distinct sections. Several of them are identified within the biblical text itself. Others can be distinguished by their particular literary form.

The first two sections consist of a general introduction to the entire book (1:1–7) and a collection of instructions (“Instructions of Parents and of Woman Wisdom,” 1:8–9:18). It is in these two sections that we find the student addressed again and again as “my son” and exhorted to listen to the teaching that is advanced. Fifteen of the twenty-three instances of this address appear in the first seven chapters of the book. The form clearly marks these sections as instruction. The third section (10:1–22:16) is explicitly identified as “First Solomonic Collection of Sayings” (10:1). Each verse in this section is a saying in its own right. Its meaning does not depend on what precedes it nor on what follows it. Some scholars classify this as sentence literature. A second characteristic of this section is the antithetical nature of each proverb. (This poetic feature will be discussed later.) These characteristics clearly delineate the section as a distinctive collection.

It is possible that the fourth section of the book (22:17–24:22), “Sayings of the Wise” (22:17), is patterned after a collection of an Egyptian scribe Amenemope (see footnote to 22:17–24:22). If this is the case, it is probably the most obvious example in the wisdom tradition of Israel’s literary borrowing (see introduction). The fifth section (24:23–34), a group of sentences designated “Further Sayings of the Wise” is quite short. It is followed by section six, a much longer collection of sentence literature titled “Second Solomonic Collection, Collected under King Hezekiah” (25:1–29:27). This collection is linked with the sages of the court of Hezekiah, the Judean king who ruled around the turn of the seventh century BC. It appears that he inaugurated a period of religious reform and literary activity. The mention of his name in a collection of proverbs may be evidence of this movement.

The seventh section, “The Sayings of Agur and Others,” is quite short (30:1–6). These verses are followed by a collection of proverbs distinguished by their literary form (30:7–33). These numerical proverbs, so named because of their use of numbers ( $x$ ,  $x+1$ ), have much in common with the riddle. The latter is a form mentioned in one of the introductory verses (1:6) and in other places of the Bible (see the riddle of Samson, Jgs 14:12, and the test of the queen of Sheba, 1 Kgs 10:1), but found nowhere in the book of Proverbs itself. The eighth section is also short: “Sayings of King Lemuel” (31:1–9), followed by the ninth and final section, “Poem on the Woman of Worth (31:10–31).

The first verse of the book states that Solomon is the author of the proverbs. There was a tradition that this king was not only versed in human wisdom (1 Kgs 3:16–28) but had encyclopedic knowledge as well (1 Kgs 4:29–34). Ancient people believed that wisdom belonged by right to a god, and since the king was the human representative of the god, it was the special possession of the king. Since Solomon ruled during a time of splendor and enlightenment, he became known in popular devotion as the wise man par excellence. His reputation gave credibility to wisdom writing, and as more wisdom writing was attributed to him, his reputation grew. Ascribing Solomonic authorship to Proverbs gives the book the status of official teaching and credits the king with comprehensive wisdom. There is a possibility, though, that the real royal authority behind the Proverbs is Hezekiah. Collections of proverbs could well have been compiled during the time of his religious reform, and he could have ascribed them to Solomon. We do not have enough information to reconstruct accurately this historical period. However, the book of Proverbs itself attests to both Hezekiah's influence (25) and to Solomon's reputation (1:1; 10:1; 25:1).

The Proverb

There is no English word that adequately translates the Hebrew mashal ("proverb"). It embraces a broad category of literary forms: oracle (Nm 23:7); discourse (Jb 29:1); parable (Ps 78:2); taunt song (Is 14:4). In each case a lesson is to be learned and for this reason the mashal might best be understood as "an example from life" intended to instruct. (Although some scholars understand mashal in the limited sense of a specific form, it will be used here as a general category unless otherwise indicated.) This is the word that identifies two major collections as "The Proverbs of Solomon" (10:1; 25:1) from which the book itself receives its name. The root meaning of mashal is "likeness" or "comparison" as in "Like mother like daughter," or in the contrast "Better safe than sorry." As a comparison, it usually consists of two parts in some kind of poetic construction. The sentence (10:2f), the purest form of the proverb, is distinct from the instruction (22:17ff), which is a much longer unit, sometimes almost a short essay. However, sentence and instruction alike are expressed in poetic form, the two parts being either compared or contrasted in parallel balance of "thought rhyme." This parallelism is an easily recognizable feature of Hebrew poetry.

There are three major types of parallelism. The simplest type is called synonymous parallelism. In it the second half of the line repeats the thought of the first with a slight variation:

On the way of wisdom I direct you,
I lead you on straight paths. (4:11)

Antithetic parallelism contrasts ideas. These contrasts are not precise opposites and ultimately they communicate the same idea:

The memory of the just serves as blessing, but the name of the wicked will rot. (10:7)

The third type of parallelism is called synthetic. The second part of this saying neither repeats nor contrasts the initial idea. It advances it and moves it toward a new thought:

Gray hair is a crown of glory;
it is gained by a life that is just. (16:31)

It is clear that synonymous parallelism does not demand exact equivalence, antithetic parallelism does not require precise contrast, and synthetic parallelism extends the scope of the proverb. Because of this, the second part of each of these poetic lines can be drawn from a wide variety of possibilities. The result is a collection of sayings, which are remarkable for their accuracy of insight and fluidity of expression. It is precisely this openness to interpretation and application that distinguishes a proverb—in the strictest sense—from a simple simile or metaphor, whose interpretation is indicated and whose use is thereby limited.

It is important to appreciate the prominence of poetry in the Bible. Israel did not casually choose to express itself in poetic form. Its very perception of reality was poetic. The modern world of science and technology does not always grasp, much less appreciate, the aesthetic perspective of the ancient world. We insist on the language of the exact sciences because we tend to perceive reality scientifically. Ancient Israel did not. Its encounter with reality was aesthetic and, therefore, it expressed itself in artistic thought patterns and literary forms. This does not minimize the validity of its perception and the truthfulness of its expression, or ours for that matter. They are two very different ways of looking at reality and talking about it.

The proverb itself serves two important functions: it depicts a situation from the past and, from this depiction, it suggests a way of acting in the future. Understanding how this literary form works should help us to grasp the dynamics of the wisdom tradition. Wisdom is not a collection of quaint catchy phrases, which in some simplistic fashion suggest that life will unfold according to a plan if we just follow the directions. Proverbs are artistically honed images of specific facets of life, and from these we can learn something about our own living. They direct our attention to the commonplace and there, usually by some type of comparison or contrast, provide us with an opportunity to gain insight into the complexities of life. Different proverbs do this in different ways. The wise person is the one who understands life from more than one proverbial point of view and can discern the appropriate way of responding to it.

Our comprehension of proverbs depends upon our ability to recognize what very different things might have in common:

The way of an eagle in the sky,
the way of a serpent upon a rock,
The way of a ship on the high seas, and the way of a man with a woman. (30:19)

What these four “ways” have in common is the fact that none of them possess a distinctly defined route. This kind of analogy operates according to the same principles as do the riddles that people might use to challenge each other’s wit.

Proverbs do not command; they persuade. They do not dictate what must be done; they describe how things work. Their purpose is not to indoctrinate but to educate. They are not precepts that call for obedience; they are adages that invite prudent response. The book of Proverbs clearly insists on the importance of living an ethical life. However, the ethics it promotes issue from reflection on life rather than from conformity to law.

The Teacher and the Student

Scholars hold various opinions regarding the identity of the wisdom teachers and the settings within which they taught. Some believe that there was a professional class of teachers attached to the court and appointed to train young men in the arts of diplomacy. They claim that much of the wisdom that we find in Proverbs is specialized knowledge imparted in well-defined schools. Others maintain that the elders of the family were the recognized teachers of wisdom who handed down the tradition to the next generation. These believe that wisdom was part of the common cultural heritage of the people and all male members of the society were fashioned in its teaching.

All scholars agree that the primary education of ancient Israelite youth took place in the home and was the responsibility of the father and, as Proverbs 1:8 tells us, the mother as well. (Some commentators do not believe that women played a role in the education of sons. They contend that the inclusion of “mother” is merely for the sake of poetic parallelism [see description of parallelism earlier]. And while that may be the case in this instance, such a poetic construction probably would not have been envisioned without some grounding in experience.) The pertinent information and operating principles of hereditary occupations were also handed down within the confines of the family, perhaps an extended family. Such hereditary professions included the monarchy, the priesthood, and the scribal class. Education in these professions might well have been an extension of family training.

The biblical texts show that Israelite kings modeled their courts after the pattern of other ancient Near Eastern nations. They appointed men to advise them, to administer royal policies, and to keep official records. It is obvious that these men had to be trained. But we should not automatically conclude that such centers were the exclusive or even principal settings for the teaching of wisdom. Some insist that since the relationship between teacher and student was analogous to that between father and son (in patriarchal societies women seldom benefit from the educational system), the address “My son” should not be viewed exclusively as familial. While this is true, the inclusion of “your mother’s teaching” (1:8) argues for a family setting.

If wisdom is basically the way a culture addresses the fundamental questions of life, then all members of the society are trained in it and all possess this wisdom in varying degrees and live it out in their lives in diverse ways. The “way of wisdom” may have been either very general and indistinguishable, or specialized and distinctive. Intelligence is an innate quality, but wisdom is acquired by learning from others and from life experience. Such wisdom is neither static nor the exclusive domain of an official class. It grew up within the people and it was their public property.

The Way of Wisdom

Wisdom came to be understood in several ways. Consequently, “the way of wisdom” (a phrase that scholars use), refers to a manner of operation, which is proper, whether in human society, in the world of nature, or on the cosmic plane. The first of these is the kind of wisdom that has been described thus far. Often called practical or folk wisdom, it is primarily concerned with the consequences of social interaction. Since peace and harmony can exist only where some kind of social order is maintained, whatever guaranteed such order was pursued, whatever threatened it was avoided. This, in fact, is the dimension of wisdom thinking that gave rise to the theory of retribution—the wise will enjoy peace and security; the fool will suffer the consequences of foolishness:

The justice of the upright saves them, but the faithless are caught in their own intrigue. (11:6)

Proverbs declare that there are only two ways open to women and men: the way of the wise (those who learn from experience) or the way of the foolish (those who do not). Since successful living demands an ongoing search for meaning, one can never settle for the solutions of the past. New situations constantly present themselves; new choices must be made. The ever-developing tradition of wisdom provides various examples of behavior that resulted in success as well as behavior that ended in disaster. The wise, enriched by this store of practical knowledge, will take to heart these lessons. They are the ones who have developed a certain facility in drawing from the accumulated wisdom of the past and, in an imaginative way, successfully bring it to bear in new situations. Thus do they follow “the way of wisdom.”

A second kind of wisdom deals with our need to survive and prosper in the natural world. Reflective observation of nature and the movements within it led people to recognize a certain amount of regularity in its operations and similarity in its various manifestations. This regularity was charted, the similarities noted, and a kind of nature wisdom developed that was a precursor of the physical sciences. People learned how to live in harmony with nature and, through comparison and contrast, they drew lessons from nature for their daily lives:

Like snow in summer, like rain in harvest, honor for a fool is out of place. (26:1)

This too was “the way of wisdom.”

Some have questioned the religious value of folk wisdom, because there is no mention of God. The proverbs appear to be anthropocentric (human-centered) rather than theocentric (God-centered). We must be careful not to compare an ancient Near Eastern humanistic point of view with a kind of modern humanism that is faithless. Biblical Israel was not a secular society: it never questioned the divine power working to hold the world in proper balance. It might not understand God’s actions, but it did not doubt God’s power. The wisdom tradition was built on the conviction that God expected people to use their human abilities to the fullest. Whether there is explicit mention of God or not, Israelite wisdom was religious teaching, and the ethical orientation of the proverbs should be seen as evidence of their religious character.

Finally, the ancient Near Eastern world believed that there was a kind of wisdom that was beyond their grasp and their comprehension. Their belief rested on the conviction that there was a cosmic order within which they lived, an order that was reliable though mysterious, an order that revealed the wisdom of the Creator-God. They maintained that this cosmic order not only predated the natural world, but was actually somehow responsible for its existence. The primordial wisdom associated with this cosmic order fashioned the world and keeps it functioning properly. Of all the kinds of wisdom only this dimension of wisdom contains the secrets of the universe and the complete answers to all questions. The sages knew that this was the only wisdom that would satisfy the human search for meaning. Since it was clearly beyond human reach, This wisdom was considered a cosmic reality and described as such:

From of old I was formed, at the first, before the earth. (8:23)

Creation itself is “the way of wisdom” on this cosmic plane.

Israel believed that God was creator of all things, and thus it spoke of a theological dimension to each of these three manifestations of wisdom. Although theological expression is more explicit in later writings, it was never absent from Israel’s worldview. The optimistic view of life that permeates the book of Proverbs flows from the conviction that there is an order to the universe and, with God’s help, we can discover it, live in harmony with it, and thus enjoy peace and prosperity. This, above all, is “the way of wisdom.”

The Teachings of the Wise

Before we look at some of the specifics of the wisdom teaching, it is important for us to remember a few fundamentals of the movement. Here, emphasis is on the human person in general rather than on the nation as a collective group. The scope here is universal, not exclusively Israelite. The counsel offered addresses issues from everyday life rather than from cultic experience. This teaching is concerned with pragmatic ends, not transcendent values. If we expect this teaching to address questions not found within its range, not only will we find it wanting but we might even fail to appreciate the riches that are to be found there.

Fear of the LORD

“The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom.” Several variations of this familiar saying appear in the book of Proverbs (1:7; 9:10; 15:33). This notion of fear is based on the recognition of the holiness of God. There may very well be an element of terror in those who behold the awesomeness of God and realize their own deficiency, but this is not the primary meaning that the expression “fear of the LORD” is intended to convey. This fear is better characterized as awe and reverence than as terror and dread. Awe, not dread, is awakened when one realizes the transcendence of a God who is protective, not threatening.

Israel did not view this reverential fear as merely an attitude of mind. It was the foundation of its moral conduct. It included respect, loyalty, obedience, and covenant love. Owing to the special character of God, “fear of the LORD” (the Hebrew word that we translate as LORD is Yahweh, the name of Israel’s God) becomes a uniquely Israelite expression. Eventually, this phrase became the summation of Israelite religion and piety. In Proverbs “fear of the LORD,” which is a reverential disposition toward God, is linked with wisdom, which is practical knowledge that comes from reflection on experience. These are two quite distinct ideas that, when brought together, significantly reinterpret the meaning of wisdom. This can be seen by comparing:

The beginning of wisdom is: get wisdom; (4:7)

with:

The beginning of wisdom is fear of the LORD (9:10).

In the first proverb, ordinary life is the source of wisdom. In the second, wisdom flows from religious faith. This change in perspective may be the result of sages trying to bridge the gap between the wisdom teaching that they held in common with other Near Eastern nations and that which was distinctively Israelite.

“Fear of the LORD” might be understood in another way. The Israelites believed that behind the breathtaking order of the universe was an all-wise and all-powerful God. They believed that the more they knew about their world, the more they would discover about God. The reverse was also held. Knowledge about God was the beginning of true knowledge about the world. The more one was committed to God, the more one was in harmony with the orders placed in the world by this same God. Thus, the proper religious attitude toward the LORD was the source of wisdom.

Training in Virtue

As stated earlier, the emphasis in the wisdom tradition is on the individual person rather than on the nation. This should not be understood as a kind of privatized individualism as we know today. It was precisely as a member of the covenant community that an Israelite searched for meaning in the events of life. The social ramifications of one’s personal life were seldom far from the minds of the people. (It is merely for the sake of this investigation that we separate personal virtues from social virtues. The former should characterize one’s behavior in every kind of situation. The latter suggest specific social settings that are implied in the proverbs themselves.)

The connection between wisdom and personal virtue is clear and frequently stated. The way of wisdom is the way of virtue. It is also the only way to happiness (see Prv 10–13). Many proverbs praise self-control, especially restraint in speech (21:23). When one does speak, it should be with words that are pleasing (16:24) not foolish (14:23). One should be disciplined in other areas of life as well. For instance, the student is counseled: “With all vigilance guard your heart” (4:23). Honesty (13:5), diligence (6:6–11), docility (13:10), and humility (22:4) are but a few of the virtues that are recommended to the young. If they live their lives according to this counsel, they are promised a good reputation (22:1) and long life (10:27). Once again we see that they are advised not to be overconfident of their own ability, but to put their trust in the LORD (3:5).

There are numerous warnings against the seduction of adulterous women. In a strict patriarchal society, the virtue of men would be of primary concern; women were treated as property and confined in restrictive seclusion in order to guarantee their fidelity and thus assure the legitimacy of the male's offspring. Only women of questionable virtue moved freely in such societies, and these are precisely the women about whom the young men are cautioned (see 2:16–19; 6:20–35).

A significant amount of instruction is unmistakably social in its focus. It is bent on developing relationships necessary for societal tranquility. The proverbs themselves provide us with hints about the social settings within which they might have been effective. It is obvious that the family played a prominent role as the initial setting for education. Several proverbs admonish young people to heed the teaching of their parents (1:8; 6:20). The sages realized that the family was the foundation of society and social virtues were cultivated there. They understood that the lessons of respect and obedience learned within the family would go a long way in other less personal social situations. A fair amount of counsel about training and chastisement can also be found (22:6, 13; 1:24; 19:18.) This advice might be directed either to training within the family or to occupational education (see The Teacher and the Student).

The distinct influence of Yahwism may not be easily detected in some proverbial instructions, but the covenant's call to justice is obvious. It manifests itself in concern for the relationship between the rich and the poor. Despite the fact that riches were viewed as fitting reward for righteous living, the inherent dangers of possessing wealth were still acknowledged (28:3, 8; 11:28; 21:13). The poor were to be respected for they too came from the hand of God (14:31; 22:2) and were sometimes more virtuous than the rich (28:6).

Advice is given to both the ruled and the ruler. Subjects are told to esteem the king because he exercises considerable power over them (16:14f). Kings, on the other hand, are bound to be fair and upright (16:10–12). In other nations of the ancient world, the king had the last word, and that word could not be questioned. This was not so in Israel. The king may have been revered as the legitimate representative of God, but he too was a member of the covenant community and obliged to obey the Mosaic law.

Moral teaching such as this presupposes an almost mechanical view of retribution. The universal order upon which the world depends is neat and reliable. The rewards and punishments that are the consequences of particular styles of living seem almost to issue from impersonal laws inherent in the actions themselves, or they are the direct intervention of a God who is executing justice. We may think that the book of Proverbs tends to oversimplify the complexities of human life. It does not question the status quo. One will have to look elsewhere for a critique of social structures or of the prevailing philosophy of life. The applicability of the theory of retribution is not challenged here as it is in Job and in Ecclesiastes.

The Figure of Wisdom

An interesting feature of this book is the figure of Wisdom personified. In the very first chapter (1:20–33), Wisdom is depicted as a woman who goes through the city looking for disciples. Many of the traits that characterize her are found throughout the book in proverbs that describe either the wise teacher or the wisdom teaching itself. This woman is frequently contrasted with a second woman, Folly (9:13), who attempts to seduce the simple into her ways. These characterizations are probably nothing more than imaginative literary ways of distinguishing between the way of wisdom and the way of folly. Israel did not have to borrow them from its neighbors.

It is not unusual to find personification in Hebrew poetry. The prophets used it:

Break out together in song, O ruins of Jerusalem! (Is 52:9)

as did the psalmists:

Let the rivers clap their hands,
the mountains shout with them for joy (Ps 98:8).

What is unusual is that wisdom is characterized as a woman. Some believe that this is a remnant of ancient Near Eastern (even Israelite) worship of a goddess of wisdom. Others see it as merely a development from the feminine form hokmah, wisdom. The suggestion that this personified Wisdom represents the feminine side of the masculine LORD (YHWH) is a contemporary hypothesis. It would probably not be compatible with the ancient believers' concept of divinity. The most widely accepted explanation for this can be found in the nature of the society itself. Wisdom was regarded as the most desirable possession. In this patriarchal male-preferred society, it is understandable that it was personified as a woman.

The same is true for folly. Women are no more inherently seductive than are men. However, they are a better representation of what men find enticing.

This might explain certain features of the figure of the woman in the market place (8:1–21), but the real mystery lies in the identity of the figure that was present at creation (8:22–31). Over the centuries this figure has been interpreted in various ways.

The Bible quite explicitly states again and again that God alone is the creator. However, Wisdom claims to have had some part in creation (8:30). This claim must be reconciled with the traditional faith. One way to do this has been to understand the figure of Wisdom as the personification of a divine attribute. According to this view, the personification is merely a stylistic feature of the author. Such an imaginative technique is not foreign to the Bible. The kindness, truth, and justice of God have also been personified (see Ps 85:10–14).

As helpful as this explanation might be, it does not take into account the fact that wisdom is identified as an entity separate from the creator (8:22). This characterization is more than personification. It is closer to hypostatization (taking what is normally a personal trait and transforming it into a person with its own existence). It is apparent that once Wisdom is created, she has a life of her own. It is also clear that she is a creature with cosmic dimensions. She existed before the rest of creation, and she appears to be active beyond the confines of space and time. According to some commentators, this suggests a mythological origin. Such an interpretation would not be against biblical religion for there are several other sections of the Bible that contain mythological elements (e.g., the garden with the talking serpent [Gn 2–3]; the sea dragon [Is 27:1]).

A third interpretation of this mysterious figure is gaining more prominence today. It claims that Wisdom was originally a goddess. Some claim that she was a Canaanite deity, others say that she was early Israelite. Scholars have long believed that Israel moved from believing in many gods (polytheism), to believing that other nations may have their gods but Israel worships only one (monolatry), to believing that there is only one God (monotheism). It is possible that the ancestors of Israel believed in a goddess of wisdom from whom this figure originated.

Whatever the origin of this enigmatic figure, she is no longer perceived as a goddess. She probably represents that inaccessible dimension of wisdom that we all desire but which resides with God alone, the kind of wisdom that is within creation but beyond us. This is the wisdom that explains the universe but which we cannot attain. This mysterious figure, whatever her origin, reminds us that the fullness of wisdom cannot be gained through human experience. It belongs to God.

The Role of Wisdom Today

There are several reasons why Proverbs may not be popular reading. It seems to describe a world that does not exist, a world where life has a proper order and events follow a cause and effect sequence. We know to the contrary that life is very unpredictable. We may be able to discern some of the order in nature, but the events of life itself cannot be charted or foreseen. Consequently, Proverbs appears to be very naive and somewhat static.

Furthermore, the world of Proverbs seems to be the world of the comfortable, not the world of those who struggle. Even directions about justice are given from the point of view of those who are in charge. The advice given does not question the way things are. Since people supported by the status quo seldom challenge it, Proverbs might well be perceived as a guide to “Win Friends, Influence People, and Get Ahead in the World.” Advocates of justice and peace usually turn to the prophets for inspiration, not to the proverbs.

Such an evaluation of the wisdom tradition misses a few very important points. First, proverbs do not claim to describe everything, but they do depict a bit of the world. Each proverb reflects a snippet of life. Together they offer a collage, not a blueprint. Secondly, the process that produces proverbs may be more significant than the content of the proverbs themselves. It teaches us the importance of serious reflection on experience and the need to adjust our behavior as circumstances change. The wise person is the one who can adequately assess the demands of a situation and who is experienced and flexible enough to behave in a way that is appropriate to that particular situation. If we read proverbs as directions that we must follow rather than as examples from which we can learn, we will misunderstand the force of their teaching. The way of wisdom is neither naive nor static.

Although people do not turn to the proverbs for prophetic inspiration, the wisdom method of reflection on life experience found there has gained prominence in recent years. Frequently experience is the starting point from which contemporary theologians develop their insights. This approach has also spread from the base communities of Latin America to the Bible discussion groups around the world. People are beginning again to realize that they encountered God through human experience, not despite it.

The charge that Proverbs is a book of upper-class ethics is debatable. It is true that several proverbs seem suited to the court or to some other diplomatic setting. However, most of them could easily have been used in the normal training of youth. They do presume an underlying order that is stable and reliable, but that is common in most initial training programs. Proverbs is the kind of teaching that socializes members into the group. It does not question the credibility of the group and so it lacks a prophetic edge. What Proverbs does offer is an appreciation of life and an encouragement to live it to the fullest.

ECCLESIASTES

see pages [879–890 of the Old Testament]

Ecclesiastes does not enjoy the renown that belongs to other writings from the wisdom tradition, specifically Job or Psalms. Nonetheless, even people who are unfamiliar with the book often use expressions that arise from its provocative view of life. Sayings such as “You can’t take it with you!” or “There’s nothing new under the sun!” show that the thinking of Ecclesiastes is not foreign to our own contemporary worldview.

ABOUT THE BOOK

Ecclesiastes manifests some of the literary characteristics of a Royal Testament, a common type of literature in the ancient Near East intended for the instruction of the king’s successor. It was written in the first person and claimed to be advice gleaned from the experience of life. Although the book itself begins with a kind of third-person descriptive prologue (1:1–11) and ends with an epilogue also in the third person (12:9–14), everything else suggests but one speaker and, despite some conflicting statements, one point of view. The book contains several unresolved literary questions that have to do with authorship, dating, place of origin, and the composition and structure of the book itself.

The very first verse of the book describes rather than identifies the speaker as “David’s son, Qoheleth, king of Jerusalem.” (see footnote to Prv 10:1–22:16). There is no biblical mention of a Davidic son by this name, and so there must be some other connotation intended. The exact meaning of Qoheleth is debated. It probably comes from the Hebrew word qahal, meaning assembly. The form of the word Qoheleth suggests that it is not a name. It is a participle that designates someone who presides over the meeting, perhaps for the purpose of teaching. The Greek word used to translate qahal is ekklesia, a citizens’ assembly in Greece. The one who presides over this particular assembly is called Ecclesiastes or Preacher.

The man is further designated as the son of David, king of Israel. The reference is obviously to Solomon, the one revered in popular devotion as the wise king par excellence. The author is claiming that Solomon is the speaker, and therefore his teaching has the authority of Solomon's wisdom. Although this claim of royal authority appears only in the first two chapters, it sets the tone for the rest of the instruction. From the outset it has authority, even though it may prove to be unorthodox.

The language of the book resembles the kind of Hebrew that appeared during a very late biblical period and was used almost exclusively for literary purposes. The inclusion of several Aramaic words has led scholars to date the book around the third century BC. The place of origin is more difficult to determine. Some say Phoenicia, others suggest Egypt. The international character of the wisdom tradition adds to the complexity of precise identification (see introduction).

There are also different opinions regarding the structure of the book. Some believe that it is simply a collection of wisdom pieces, without any organization. Others divide the book into two major parts: Qoheleth's observations of life, and the conclusions that he draws (the New American Bible Revised Edition belongs to this latter group). Since there is only one speaker, a structure based on alternate speeches is ruled out.

Besides instruction, the author makes use of several teaching techniques. These include: proverbial quotations, contrasting proverbs, and rhetorical questions. Several of these forms are mentioned in the prologue to Proverbs, "proverb and byword, the words of the wise and their riddles" (Prv 1:6). All of this fosters the characterization of Qoheleth as a respected teacher of wisdom.

Ecclesiastes is one of the five books that make up the Megilloth, or "Scrolls." This refers to a special collection in the Hebrew Bible, which also includes Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, and Esther. These books were read during various liturgical festivals and were gathered together for the sake of convenience. Ecclesiastes was read during the harvest celebration of Sukkoth, also known as Tabernacles or Booths. This major pilgrim feast was so called because the harvesters lived in booths as they gathered in their crops. It is not clear how this practice began or why Ecclesiastes was chosen. Perhaps the somber tone of the book, the seasoned reflections of an aging sage, fit the maturity of harvest and the dreariness of autumn. Although reading the book was not always a consistent synagogue practice, Ecclesiastes continues to be considered part of the Megilloth.

The book clearly begins with the distinctive “Vanity of vanities, says Qoheleth, vanity of vanities! All things are vanity!” (1:2) and ends on the same tone “Vanity of vanities, says Qoheleth, all things are vanity!” (12:8). What some consider a kind of prologue (1:1–11) might well come from the original author. The epilogue (12:9–14) is different: at least one, possibly two people besides the main author have added something. Verses 9–11 praise Qoheleth as a wise teacher and compiler of wisdom sayings. Whoever added these verses plainly agreed with Qoheleth’s conclusions despite their critical and sometimes unconventional viewpoint. The tone changes, though, with verse 12, which begins with the same Hebrew word as does verse 9. Some hold that this is textual evidence of a second epilogue. This is the only place where a student is identified in the manner found frequently in Proverbs. The student is warned against too much speculation and is advised to trust in the retributive justice of God, a theme that Qoheleth consistently challenged.

It would appear from all this, that the author created a literary character, Qoheleth, and ascribed Solomonic authority to him in order to give his own instruction credibility. A later editor further authenticated this teaching by explicitly assuring the reader of Qoheleth’s wisdom. However, with two short verses a second editor tried to temper some of Qoheleth’s statements.

There are two possible explanations for this inconsistent ending: (1) The book was already well enough accepted so that it could not be dismissed by its critics. Still, someone was in a position to append a caution to what might be considered questionable teaching. (2) If there was only one editor who agreed with Qoheleth’s teaching, that person realized that without some kind of tempering it would not be preserved. The last verses restate the traditional view of retribution and seem to return the entire teaching to the circle of orthodoxy.

A Critical Point of View

A wide range of scholarly opinion regarding the meaning of the book exists. Qoheleth has been described as a skeptic, a cynic or, more positively, a pragmatist. His view of life has been called everything from pessimistic and fatalistic to realistic. Some judge his religious outlook hedonistic or pleasure-seeking, while others think it is faithful to Israelite values. It is clear that he is disillusioned with certain facets of his society, yet he lacks the enthusiasm of a reformer and the vision of a mystic. This has led some critics to label him a frustrated man who is resigned to the injustice and meaninglessness of life and who is intent on making the most of any fleeting pleasures, in the spirit of Epicureanism. It is difficult to make a distinction between a challenge to the way life is understood and dissatisfaction with life itself. Perhaps in the actual living of life, it is impossible to separate the two. A careful reading of Qoheleth, however, will show that he does not really despair of life but of unrealistic expectations regarding it. Qoheleth's real struggle is with the meaning of life, especially from the perspective of the theory of retribution (see introduction).

A Chase after the Wind

Qoheleth sets out to discover everything within human experience (1:13). Since he is a king, he has both the wealth and the leisure to embark on this quest. As possessor of extraordinary wisdom (1:16), he of all people is equipped to experience life to the full. He has acquired wisdom, but what he sought was always beyond his grasp, "a chase after wind" (1:17). It is clear that in his search for wisdom, he was looking for something else besides. Qoheleth next turned to the pursuit of self-gratification and in many different ways he was successful, but still he was not satisfied (2:1–11). It seems that he accomplished everything to which he had set his mind in his search to answer the fundamental question: "What profit man from all the labor which he toils at under the sun?" (1:3). However, he consistently arrived at the same conclusion. There is no lasting gain, no tangible dividend, "There is no profit under the sun" (2:11).

The theory of retribution claims that there is a direct relationship between the uprightness of one's behavior and the good fortune that one enjoys. According to this theory, Qoheleth's wisdom and wealth would be perceived as concrete proof of his goodness and a guarantee of future prosperity. But Qoheleth does not really enjoy his good fortune and so he questions its value. Since death comes to all, he wonders: "why should I be wise? Where is the profit?" (2:15) It is not life as such, nor the search for fulfillment in life, that frustrates him. What he loathes (2:17) is the profitlessness of human striving. It is not fulfilling. Since Qoheleth did attain the wisdom and wealth and pleasure that he sought, his frustration must stem from his failure to attain something in addition to these goals. Qoheleth is asking more of life than merely success and prosperity.

He is also troubled about the inevitability of death and the sense of futility it often imparts. Regardless of how one lives, death is the ultimate fate of all. Any advantage that one might have because of righteousness, wisdom, or wealth is only temporary and, therefore, questionable. In fact, the fool who disregards societal rules may actually have an edge over the one who conforms to them at the cost of enjoyment. Death and the total relinquishment that it demands force Qoheleth to question the value of any human accomplishment and to wonder if perhaps life itself is “a chase after wind.”

Nothing Is New under the Sun

We have already seen how the wisdom teachers appealed to the obvious order within the natural world as they urged people to live in compliance with acceptable social custom (see Proverbs: The Way of Wisdom). The author of Job used the same technique with a slightly different twist. There we see that Job was overwhelmed by the wonders of nature and led to acknowledge the incomprehensible dimension of life (see Job: Reward and Punishment). The author of Ecclesiastes also directs our attention to the regularity in nature (1:2–11), but does so in order to highlight its monotony. The earth does not change, it seems constant. The sun rises and sets and rises again and sets again in the same mode day after day. Although the wind appears at times to be irregular, it follows certain paths that, upon observation, can be predicted. Even the sea, though constantly fed, is never full. The regularity detected in nature appears to be devoid of any progress. There is indeed nothing new under the sun.

What advantage does the earth have in being constant? What does the sun accomplish by rising and setting if it must repeat the cycle again and again with no variation and no advance? What profit comes from the wind's endless movement if it never arrives at any destination? To what avail do the streams nourish an insatiable sea? This sage urges us to learn yet another lesson from nature. Human striving for gain is nothing but wearisome labor that must be repeated and repeated with no promise of conclusion and no assurance of gratification. Human life is basically the same regardless of the society or the generation into which one is born. Life itself follows the same cycles and experiences are quite similar. Momentous events do occur, but they seldom interfere with the fundamental rhythms of existence. Nature repeats itself and so does human history. Nothing seems to have lasting significance.

In what may be the most familiar section of the entire book (3:1–9), Qoheleth declares that each event of human life has its own appointed time. Here each event is linked in poetic construction with its opposite. There are two ways of understanding this pattern. First, juxtaposing opposites is a poetic way of expressing totality. It creates an inclusion that encompasses both poles and everything in between. Examples of this include: “knowledge of good and evil” (see Gn 2:9, 17) meaning comprehensive knowledge; “bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh” (see Gn 2:23) referring to the entire body. The contemporary phrase “flesh and blood” has the same meaning.

The second way of understanding this poetic form is as an expression of relativity. There is an inevitability to human events that is nonetheless relative. The circumstances of life determine what is fitting and what is not. What is appropriate at one time or in one situation can be out of place when the circumstances change. This may be the author’s way of insisting that there are no absolutes, that is, everything is always relative to all else. There is a time to die as well as a time to be born. Neither seems to have an advantage over the other. Still, we do not know the rules that govern these appointed times, and so we are helpless to control them and we may feel that we are at their mercy.

The task of living is not easy. Qoheleth explains why in 3:11. This verse may be the most difficult one of the book because of the questions surrounding the translation and interpretation of the Hebrew word olam. Although some versions translate this word as “world,” or “future,” or even “ignorance,” the New American Bible Revised Edition renders it as “the timeless.” God has put olam in the human heart and we want to know, to understand, even to control everything in the world. It seems that while the human beings are finite, their desires transcend the limits of time. Qoheleth has described the world as fixed and closed. There is, nonetheless, an urgency within the human heart that seeks to burst the confines of restrictive determinism in order to delight in the wonders of freedom and mystery. We are reminded of St. Augustine’s famous saying: “You have made us for yourself, O Lord, and our hearts are restless until they rest in you.”

All Is Vanity!

“All is vanity” is the expression that has come to characterize the entire book. The Hebrew word hebel, which is here translated as “vanity,” can also be rendered as “vapor” or “thin air.” It means pointlessness or futility and refers to something that may be real but that has little or no lasting substance. We have seen that Qoheleth has accomplished everything he set out to do. He has acquired wisdom and wealth; he has enjoyed pleasure and prosperity; he has achieved all of his goals. And yet, he declares that “All is vanity!” All of the energy he put into his projects was pointless; all of his toil was futile. One might expect him to advise against ever trying to be happy, but he does not. Quite the contrary! We will see that he urges people to enjoy what they have. Then what about life does he regard as vanity?

Qoheleth observed in the lives of others what Job experienced in his own. That is, the righteous do not always enjoy the good things of life, nor are the wicked always deprived of them (4:1; 8:10–11). Life itself has shown these two men the inadequacy of the theory of retribution. It may be helpful in explaining some things and in encouraging a certain kind of behavior, but it falls short in many areas. While Qoheleth shares this insight with Job, his dissatisfaction in the face of his own prosperity and success has led him a step further in challenging the theory. It is not only that a righteous person sometimes does not prosper; it is also that, even when one does realize some desired goal, there is no guarantee of fulfillment. To suppose that the attainment of goals, even noble goals, can fulfill human longings is, according to Qoheleth, vanity!

The Wisdom of the Sage

The wisdom of Qoheleth consists not only in a critical examination of everything that is supposed to bring happiness but also in positive advice. Although he finds fault with some aspects of human striving, he encourages something that is often overlooked in times of feverish activity. It is something that is always within reach and may well be the key to true fulfillment and contentment. He exhorts his hearers to relish the simple pleasures that are at hand (2:24; 3:13, 22; 5:19; 8:15; 9:9). These pleasures can be experienced in the very act of living: in eating, in drinking, in the work itself rather than in the wealth that one may hope to produce by it. This pleasure, like everything else in life, has come from the hand of God and should be enjoyed.

One cannot calculate this enjoyment or manipulate it as might be possible in a purely business transaction. Life is not a business transaction and to expect a strict quid pro quo (this for that) return, as in a rigid interpretation of retribution, will only end in disappointment. Qoheleth believes the enjoyment should be sought in the doing rather than in the outcome. To wait in anticipation of something more than the natural satisfaction that accompanies human activity is foolish, because the future is uncertain.

Qoheleth does not spurn the search for wisdom or the normal human striving for success and prosperity. He objects to making human accomplishment the primary or exclusive goal in life. He calls upon all to find pleasure in what they are doing and, if they are fortunate enough to become successful in the process, to see this as a gift from God as well.

A Challenge for Today

Ecclesiastes is not an account of Qoheleth's journey in faith. It is more like jottings for a report on his experiments in living. He did not share Job's struggle with theodicy (a defense of God against the accusation of injustice). Rather, Qoheleth addressed human misconceptions, not the incomprehensible and easily misunderstood divine activity. He seems to have gone right to the core of things. He scrutinized some of the primary undertakings and fundamental goals of people.

Qoheleth would probably be unrelenting in his criticism of many of the attitudes found within our contemporary society. He knew that prosperity is often fleeting and cannot ensure happiness even when it is at one's disposal. The complexity of modern society and the instability of the world's economy make it more difficult to amass wealth today than may have been the case in the past. For this reason, the strain and conflict that often accompany the struggle for "upward mobility" have been heightened. This is true for nations as well as for individuals. Much of the injustice in present society stems from greed and an avaricious devouring of the wealth of the world. People believe that having more will make them happy.

Qoheleth never disparaged ingenuity or hard work. Rather, he criticized those who judged the worth of human endeavor by the amount of output rather than the quality of input. There is a very thin line between directing all of one's energies toward accomplishing a noble goal and sacrificing everything for the sake of success. Qoheleth wholeheartedly endorsed the former while he condemned the latter. He would most likely criticize any attitude or system that placed more value on the product than on the person producing it. Today's business practices, whether local, national, or international, would come under his scrutiny in this regard.

The struggle for upward mobility is not the only dimension of contemporary society that Qoheleth would most likely challenge. Many people spend a lifetime climbing the ladder of prominence and power. Others will do almost anything to gain acceptability in prestigious social, professional, or political circles. And who does not aspire to a reputation for wisdom or exceptional intelligence? Qoheleth would challenge us to put all ambition in the right perspective.

This sage teacher was not blind to the many disappointments and tragedies of life, but neither was he an advocate of social change. He cautions against wishing for what cannot be, and he urges his hearers to make the most of what they have. This may not be an encouraging message for those who are deprived of the necessities of life, but most likely it was not intended for them. He is not contesting the justice of the social order. He is, instead, questioning the value of the motivation behind striving for success.

Finally, Qoheleth is convinced that the future is not totally under our control. It cannot be manipulated by human decision nor determined by human behavior. A strict interpretation of retribution frequently includes the notion that God is bound to respond to our actions with appropriate reward or punishment, whichever the case may be. This normally unconscious attitude surfaces when we are faced with unexplained reverses of fortune. We wonder what we have done to bring adversity upon ourselves or we accuse God of behaving unfairly toward us. Qoheleth would remind us that God is not bound by our interpretive theories. We can accurately predict neither success nor failure.

Qoheleth would insist that the primary goal of life is living. All work, all progress have one principal purpose and that is the enhancement and promotion of life. Every other end is at best secondary or otherwise "a chase after wind.” This is a profoundly religious teaching, for Qoheleth believes that it was the creator who placed the desire for happiness within each human heart, made living an exciting adventure, and willed that every person be given the chance to find pleasure in life. He would strongly object to any materialistic point of view that might minimize or deny this basic conviction. Qoheleth was a champion of the greatest of God’s gifts—life itself.

THE SONG OF SONGS

see pages [890–898 of the Old Testament]

No book of the Old Testament is more difficult to interpret than The Song of Songs. It is clearly a collection of love poems full of sensuous imagery. It promotes no apparent theological or moral values and never even mentions God. It is no wonder that its acceptance into the canon of inspired writings was seriously questioned. The very character of the book has led to many quite distinct interpretations.

ABOUT THE BOOK

Scholars vary in their explanation of the book, but they agree that it did not originate as a single composition. They concur that it is a collection of poems of various length, but they propose different ways of gathering these poems into sections. Some have suggested a pattern of longing, union, and separation that is repeated through the eight short chapters. Others maintain that while the lyrics do express such sentiments, the poems themselves lack any definite pattern. The book has no clearly defined structure, but that it is marked by frequent repetitions (for example, 2:7; 3:5; 8:4). Since there is no narrative plot and the speakers are neither identified nor introduced, one can only speculate about the compiler's original intention.

This relatively short book has an unusually large number of uncommon words. Its 117 verses contain forty-nine words that appear nowhere else in the Old Testament. This adds to the difficulty of comprehension, for we are prevented from comparing the meaning of the word in one context with its meaning in another. This obscure vocabulary also opens the poem to a multiplicity of interpretations, thus making it somewhat cryptic but also allowing for a rich diversity of meanings.

Like Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, the Song is associated with Solomon. This ascription to the famous king is found only in the editorial introduction (1:1) and is preceded by a preposition that can be translated in various ways: “by” Solomon; “to” Solomon; “for” Solomon; “of” Solomon; “concerning” Solomon. The attribution need not imply authorship. Still, ascribing the book to Solomon probably gave it credibility, linked it with the other wisdom traditions, and contributed to one of its best known allegorical interpretations. The book does include other references to Solomon (3:7, 9, 11; 8:11f), and this has convinced some interpreters of the Solomonic identity of the amorous shepherd. But in none of these passages does Solomon speak, and the references could actually be merely figurative allusions to fabulous wealth.

The geographic references within the Song are quite wide-reaching. Northern locations are mentioned (2:1; 3:9; 4:8; 6:4; 7:5–6) as are places in Transjordan (4:1) and Judah (1:14; 3:5). This variety may reflect the early northern Israelite source of some of the original poems and a later southern, perhaps Jerusalem, setting for the final edition. The appearance of the Persian word for orchard or park (4:13) suggests a postexilic date (after 539 BC).

The Song of Songs is also found in the Megilloth scroll. It is read on the last day of the celebration of Passover. Perhaps the announcement of the end of winter (2:11) made the poem suitable for use during a spring festival. Reference to the horses and chariots of Pharaoh (1:9) is a clear allusion to the Exodus, the event commemorated at Passover.

Voices in the Song

Letters (M, W, D) in the left-hand margins of the New American Bible Revised Edition identify the speaker of the verses. These letters are not found in the original Hebrew text and are actually an interpretation. The references to the “Daughters of Jerusalem” (see 1:5; 2:7; 3:5; 5:8, 16) do not present any problem, but the meaning of “bride” (see 4:8–12; 5:1) is not clear. The Hebrew text clearly refers to the young woman in this way, but the word itself designates a woman who is betrothed but not yet married to a man. While the text does allude to the sexual union of the lovers, it never describes a marriage and so the male partner is not necessarily a “groom.” (The reference in 3:11 is to the splendor of Solomon, not to the marriage of the lovers in the Song.) Furthermore, there seem to be two distinct portraits of this elusive lover. One of them is a royal figure from Jerusalem (see 1:12–17; 3:6–11) and the other is a rustic youth from the north (see 1:7–8; 2:8–17). Nowhere in the book do we find an explicit combination of the two.

Who are these mysterious lovers? The way one understands the meaning and function of the book will influence the way one identifies the characters within it. If these are ancient wedding songs, then, of course, the lovers are a bride and a groom. If this is love poetry of the type we know existed in ancient Egypt, then “bride” can be understood in the figurative sense of a lover, and her partner is the man with whom she is intimately involved. He is called “lover” (see 1:13; 2:16; 5:8; etc.), not husband. It is only as the result of some interpretive approach that one might identify the young man as Solomon and thus understand the Song as a poem composed on the occasion of one of his marriages to some foreign princess.

Form and Meaning

For more than two thousand years, the Song of Songs has been not only a fascination but also something of a riddle. Its very uniqueness has made it a challenge to understand. There are basically four ways of interpreting it: allegorical, cultic, dramatic, and literal. Each of these interpretive approaches reveals different facets of the literary quality of the book and opens up possibilities for our religious enrichment. All of them have gained acceptance within Roman Catholic tradition. The book itself contains characteristics of each of these methods, thus lending itself to any one of the approaches. It is interesting to note that while the first and preferred method of interpretation of most of the Bible has been the literal approach, the opposite has been true with this book. It seems that much of the sexual imagery has been so explicit or suggestive as to offend the sensitivities of many of the faithful. Therefore, commentators have presumed that the poems were not intended to be understood literally and must have some concealed religious meaning.

When we talk about interpretation, it is important to distinguish between what the book meant in the past and what it means for the present. Those interpreters who employ a strict historical-critical approach insist that the original sense must be the focus of our explanation. For them, discovering the earliest form and meaning of the book is crucial. They believe that it is this original meaning that continues to be revelatory for us today. Other commentators believe that the book can be interpreted in various ways. These latter interpreters do not categorize methods as “right” or “wrong” but as “helpful” or “not helpful.” They would be more open than the former group to various interpretations of the Song of Songs.

Allegorical Interpretation

An allegory is an analogy or comparison of two areas of human experience, usually a more concrete or everyday area and a more abstract one, further removed from ordinary experience. Our understanding of the more abstract area is helped by the analogy with our everyday experience. For example, Justice in our courts is often personified as a beautiful woman wearing a blindfold and holding balancing scales. The woman's beauty symbolizes the attractions of Justice: we are drawn to beauty so we should be drawn to Justice. Her blindfold symbolizes the impartiality of Justice: no matter how important or unimportant the person who appears before her, she is only concerned with the merits of the case each presents. The balancing scales symbolize the objective nature of Justice: decisions are made according to public standards, and anyone can observe how they are made. Thus by using concrete images the allegorical figure helps us understand our ideals of Justice.

An allegorical method of interpretation presumes that the real significance of the material under consideration is more than just its factual or historical content. The surface meaning is a figure of speech that signifies some deeper spiritual truth. This interpretive approach was quite prevalent in ancient Jewish circles (Philo, 20 BC–AD 54) as well as among early Christian writers (Origen, 185–254). Jewish commentators who allegorize the Song interpret it as symbolizing God's dealings with Israel. They claim that the book narrates this relationship, tracing it from the time of the Exodus to the coming of the messiah. They believe that it extols the steadfast love that God bestowed on Israel and describes the fickleness that characterized Israel's attitude toward its divine lover.

As the Christians began to read the Hebrew traditions in light of their faith in Christ, this allegorical method produced new meanings. One of their interpretations identified the lovers as Christ and the Church. Another read it as a description of the mystical union of God and the individual soul. Some of the most profound theology in the Christian mystical tradition is grounded in this kind of allegorical interpretation of the Song. The works of St. Bernard of Clairvaux and St. John of the Cross are the chief examples of this kind of writing.

The bride has even been explained as the Virgin Mary. Although this interpretation is not easily accommodated to the poems, it has become quite prominent within Roman Catholic tradition. One reason for this is the belief that Mary is the exemplar of the individual soul in union with God. A second and probably stronger reason for the acceptance of this representation is the fact that sections from the Song are read during the liturgy on several Marian feasts. Thus by association this particular allegorical interpretation has come into popular devotion.

Cultic Interpretation

A second way of understanding the Song of Songs assumes that it was originally a liturgical reenactment of a drama that takes place in nature each spring. This drama is reflected in a well-known fertility myth of the ancient Near Eastern world. The great god (the Canaanite Baal or the Babylonian Tammuz) dies after the harvest and is mourned by the fertility goddess (Anath or Ishtar respectively). She frantically searches for him during the barrenness of winter. Her efforts are successful, and they are finally united. Nature is revived with the coming of spring, and the cycle of life continues. The fact that this book was read during the spring festival of Passover seems to support the theory that Israel was indeed influenced by the agricultural celebrations of the time.

There is ample evidence in the Bible of Israel's appropriation and subsequent reinterpretation of Canaanite cultic practices. Passover itself is probably a combination of two festivals: an early nomadic celebration intended to ensure the fertility of the flock, and an agricultural one, the Feast of Unleavened Bread, intended to ensure the growth of the crop. The nomadic festival took on historical meaning as it was used to commemorate God's deliverance of the people from Egyptian bondage, and it was associated with the Feast of Unleavened Bread after the people had settled in Canaan and had moved from a nomadic to an agricultural form of life. These two very different festivals merged into one celebration and elements of both became details of the standard story of the first Passover celebration (see Ex 12).

The Song itself includes several features that are characteristic of fertility liturgies. Women always play a prominent role in these cultic reenactments. There is frequently a chorus of women and the chief character is a goddess who is separated from her lover. The speakers are seldom named, and their speeches are more monologues than dialogues.

The goddess is sometimes a bride, sometimes a sister, sometimes a mother; the beloved is depicted as a king but more frequently as a shepherd. It is quite possible that while this ritual drama was never incorporated into the official liturgy of Israel, it enjoyed widespread acceptance in the isolated rural communities (see Ez 8:14). Those who endorse this theory of interpretation contend that the book was included in the canon precisely because of this popular use. Commentators who reject the theory do so because there is no explicit evidence that Israel included the rite of the dying/rising god in its own ritual. They do not deny the possibility of popular acceptance, but they insist that any association with fertility religion would work against the book's inclusion in the canon. They regard the cultic interpretation as merely a sophisticated form of the allegorical approach.

Dramatic Interpretation

The third approach has a long history in the church's tradition. As early as the second century of the Christian era, Origen claimed that the Song was a wedding poem written in dramatic form by Solomon himself. Some interpreters today divide the book into a drama of five movements (e.g., the anticipation and tryst [1:1–2:17]; the separation [3:1–11]; reunion [4:1–5:1]; a second separation [5:2–6:3]; final union [6:4–8:14]). Such a division attempts to show how the Song includes the dramatic elements of conflict and resolution. The fact that there are only speeches and no narrative sections lends support to this theory of interpretation. It is the commentators who assign the speeches to the characters, as is done in the left-hand margins of the New American Bible Revised Edition, and who identify the various scenes by means of subtitles within the text.

The two major characters of the drama are, of course, the royal shepherd and the Shulammite maiden. A two-character interpretation has serious deficiencies, however. There is no dramatic development, and the book lacks ethical purpose. A three-character approach developed to address these weaknesses. It distinguishes two male individuals, the king and the shepherd. The former tries to win the love of the beautiful maiden, but she remains faithful to her shepherd lover. The difference between these two interpretations is obvious. In the first one, the royal shepherd is noble and worthy of the faithful love of the Shulammite. This royal personage might well represent Solomon. In the second interpretation, the king is a villain who tries to seduce the maiden with the promise of luxury and comfort. One wonders how such a disapproving portrait of Solomon could survive as part of the wisdom tradition, a tradition ascribed to the wisdom of the very king who is maligned by this depiction. The weaknesses of this approach are obvious. Since the biblical text does not supply speech designations, the decisions about their identification are influenced by the biases of the interpreter. Stage directions are also imposed from without rather than discovered within the poems themselves. Finally, there is neither story line nor character development, both essential traits of good drama.

Literal Interpretation

It may be that the original meaning of the Song is found in its literal interpretation. Most likely, the Song of Songs is simply a collection of love poems that neither symbolized divine love nor developed from fertility rites. It teaches no lesson; it tells no story. It simply celebrates the passion of human love. Some believe that the poems are secular. Others doubt that purely secular love songs would ever be admitted to the canon. These latter commentators believe that the poems are examples of Judean wedding songs. They also discover in them traces of a poetic form called the wasf, an Arabic word meaning description. These are poems that use images from nature to describe parts of the female or male body. This literary form might explain some of the imagery found in the Song (see 4:1–5; 7:2–6).

If this is really the meaning of the Song of Songs, a fundamental question surfaces: Why was the book considered inspired and thus included in the Bible? One can only offer a hypothetical answer. Israel may have followed the same wedding customs as did its Syrian neighbor, celebrating the event for seven days. During the festivities the bride was characterized as “maiden” and the groom as “king.” On the eve of the wedding itself the girl would dance for her lover and recite wasfs for his enjoyment. The representation of the man as “king” and the extravagance of the celebration could blend quite easily with the tradition about Solomon’s erotic adventures (see 1 Kgs 11:1). Some believe that one of the poems was actually composed on the occasion of one of his marriages (3:6–11). Thus what was initially a collection of wedding songs was now regarded as a description of the king’s sexual adventures and was joined with two other writings that claim divine inspiration and Solomonic authorship (Proverbs and Ecclesiastes). Each of the three books explicitly attributed to Solomon addresses some of the central issues of life, issues that are basic to the wisdom thinking of the ancient Near East, Israel included. Proverbs provides directions on how to achieve peace and prosperity. Qoheleth addresses the search for meaning in life. The Song of Songs celebrates a fundamental human emotion—erotic love. None of these books fits into the category of “salvation history,” but each one is an example of the “way of wisdom.”

Once writings were associated with Solomon and the wisdom attributed to him, it was not long before they possessed their own authoritative significance. This seems to have been enough to ensure inclusion in the canon. The three books may be quite distinct from each other, but they have come to represent different moments in the life of the same man. The Song of Songs reveals a young passionate unguarded Solomon; Proverbs shows a moderate but optimistic man who has learned from his experience of life; the musings of Qoheleth come from someone who comes to the end of life challenging the enduring value of human accomplishment. The quality of these anthropological, but nonetheless theological, concerns is evidence of their religious value. Solomonic ascription provided them with canonical status.

Wisdom Teaching

Each of these interpretive approaches leads us to the central question: What is the book’s theological value? Since it belongs to the wisdom tradition, we might also ask: What does it teach us? We have considered four different methods of interpretation, and we should not be surprised if we discover four quite distinct answers to these questions.

The allegorical approach provides us with a figurative way of understanding the nature of our relationship with God. It portrays the relationship as dynamic, energizing, mutually loving, and intensely intimate. This depiction of God runs counter to the images of an impassive creator or an avenging judge, characterizations that may be the prominent images of God held by many people. We may be familiar with the notion of God as a loving parent or of Jesus as a faithful friend, but the Song of Songs offers us a portrait of a passionate lover, one who desires union with us. Some might find this notion scandalous, but God’s concern for human beings is found in the prophetic tradition as well: “I have loved you with an everlasting love” (Jer 31:3; trans. author).

At the heart of the ancient Near Eastern agricultural dying/rising ritual is the conviction that death does not have the final victory. The love of the grieving goddess is strong enough to bring her lover back to her and to revitalize the lifeless earth. To the proverb: “For Love is strong as Death” (8:6), one might add a revision of the popular adage: “In Spring a young woman’s fancy turns to thoughts of love.”

The dramatic interpretation renders an example of faithful love. Whether one favors the two or the three character account, the fidelity of the bride is held up for all to admire and imitate. She is unrelenting in her search and steadfast in her commitment. This image of a faithful woman conforms to the one found in other places of the wisdom tradition (see Prv 31:10–31).

The literal understanding of the Song skirts all symbolic interpretation and makes no apology for its erotic imagery. It affirms that sexuality is one of the gifts that God gave for our enjoyment (see Prv 5:15–21; Eccl 9:9). However, the sexual pleasure is not sought promiscuously. It is pursued only within the context of faithful and exclusive commitment.

Finally, the portrait of the maiden is exceptional for literature from a patriarchal male-centered society. This is not the image of a sexually naive and passive woman, dependent upon a man for protection and sustenance. Quite the contrary, it is a woman who takes the initiative in this romantic pursuit. She utters almost twice as much of the erotic poetry as does the man. Her language is explicit, and she shatters any stereotypes that suggest that women may be romantic but not sexually inclined. The Song is devoid of male dominance and female subordination. The maiden is an independent person. She has her own vineyard (1:6) and is encouraged to pasture her flocks (1:8), occupations normally assigned to men. This wisdom book teaches that human passion is both noble and ennobling. Furthermore, its attraction and vitality are natural to both women and men.

THE HELLENIZATION OF THE WORLD

The last half of the fourth century BC saw rapid and sweeping changes in the ancient world. The conquests of Alexander the Great had brought the entire Eastern world under the influence of Greek culture. This served to unify an otherwise diverse and disorganized world. It also threatened the integrity of other cultures and religious perspectives. With Alexander's death in 323 BC, the empire was divided among his followers, and three independent and mutually hostile kingdoms were formed. Two of these kingdoms played significant roles in the affairs of the Jewish nation. Alexander's general Ptolemy gained control of Egypt and established himself in Alexandria; his general Seleucus triumphed over Babylon and made Antioch his center. In its own way, each kingdom contributed to the shaping of biblical tradition.

The hellenization that was forced upon the Jewish community by the Seleucid ruler Antiochus Epiphanes IV was the background for the Jewish war of independence known as the Maccabean revolt (167–142 BC). This struggle is narrated in 1 and 2 Maccabees (see Maccabees RG, pp. 259–270) and is the real context for the story found in the book of Daniel. The military and religious victory the Jewish people gained at this time is celebrated each year at the feast of Hanukkah.

The influence of the Ptolemies is more relevant to an understanding of the wisdom literature. It occurred earlier than that of the Seleucids and appears to have been quite well received. A large colony of Jews lived in Alexandria and accommodated itself to Greek language and culture. This was the group that translated its religious traditions from Hebrew into Greek, thus producing the basis of what has come to be known as the Septuagint (Latin for seventy, frequently designated LXX). A tradition grew up claiming that seventy scribes, working independent of each other, labored over the translation for seventy days in seventy different locations and produced identical versions. This was seen as evidence of the inspired nature of the translation. Most likely, the task took decades, but this fact did not detract from the reverence accorded the Septuagint over the years.

The Alexandrian or Greek version of the Scriptures was probably the one in popular use during the first century of the Christian era. During this same period the Jewish community adopted the older Palestinian or Hebrew version as its official text. The Christian practice of adding its own writings to the Alexandrian collection may have contributed to this decision.

Christians continued to revere the Alexandrian version. In fact, by comparing the Old Testament citations used by New Testament writers, scholars conclude that a good number, if not most of them, come from the Alexandrian rather than from the earlier Palestinian version. At the time of the Reformation, the official version of the Old Testament became a point of disagreement among Christian denominations. Protestant churches retained the shorter Hebrew canon and thus preserve the more ancient Jewish version of the Sacred Scriptures. The Roman church accepted the wider Greek canon and thereby preserves an authentic early church tradition. Those books not found within the Hebrew canon have been understood as inspirational but not canonical by many Protestants. This explains why some Bibles include such books as Wisdom and Sirach, while others do not.

ABOUT THE BOOK

Over the centuries this book has been called “The Book of Wisdom” (from the Latin translations), “The Wisdom of Solomon” (from the Septuagint), or variations of either title. Although the author does not explicitly identify himself as Solomon, speaking in the first person he described himself as such (7:5; 8:21; 9:7–8; see 1 Kgs 3:5–15). This might be due to the author’s presumption that the somewhat unconventional character of the book’s ideas might require Solomonic authority to be accepted as orthodox teaching. (For an explanation of Solomonic authorship see Proverbs <sup>RG</sup>, Ecclesiastes <sup>RG</sup>, Song <sup>RG</sup>.)

The book itself suggests an origin from within the Jewish community of Alexandria. It is clear that the author was steeped in the history of the Exodus (11:2–16; 12:23–27; 16:2–19, 22), was acquainted with the religious practices of Egypt (15:14–16:1), and was well versed in Hellenistic philosophy and science (6:22–11:1). The author reinterpreted his own religious heritage and critiqued the traditions, practices, and insights of the Egyptian and Hellenistic cultures. He did this in an attempt to support those Jews who were questioning the relevance of their ancient faith in the face of the radical cultural changes they were undergoing.

Most scholars date this book somewhere during the first century BC. At this period of history, the primary threat did not arise from the Hellenizing Greeks but from the Hellenized Jews themselves. The oppression from outside the community that had led to the Maccabean revolt had given way to a subtle undermining of traditional teaching and values. Even the religious leaders were not immune to this kind of worldliness. The author appears to have been concerned that the pious not be led astray, that those enthralled by Greek culture be convinced of the excellence of their own religious heritage, and that those already carried away by the currents of change be rescued.

Literary features of the book confirm that it originated in Greek. The form of the language is natural and free flowing, not awkward as might be the case if this were a translation from Hebrew. The extensive scientific vocabulary reveals an author who possessed an exceptional comprehension of Hellenistic learning. References to earlier religious tradition correspond to the style of the Alexandrian rather than to that of the Palestinian version. The thought is similar to what is found in Jewish-Alexandrian works of this period. The author frequently employed a form of expression that resembles the diatribe, a method of argument, developed by the Cynic and Stoic philosophers of Greece, which creates imaginary opponents who raise questions that the philosopher refutes.

Despite these Greek characteristics, this is basically a Jewish work. It is not difficult to detect the influence of Hebrew parallelism in the poetry. (For an explanation of parallelism see Job RG.) The description of God's care during the Exodus is a kind of homiletic midrash (a method of interpretation that the Jewish community devised in order to apply the Bible to new situations). Thus a law was restated (halakah) or a narrative retold (haggadah) in such a way as to give direction to a new generation. The Greeks, on the contrary, and specifically Philo, developed allegory as a principal method of interpreting traditions. It is significant that the author of Wisdom employed midrash rather than allegory. This characteristic further substantiates the Jewish, rather than Greek, origin of this book.

The structure of Wisdom is a matter of dispute. There are not the obvious divisions as can be found in some books of the wisdom tradition.

The editors of the New American Bible Revised Edition have adopted a fairly general thematic division: (1) The Reward of Justice; (2) Praise of Wisdom by Solomon; (3) Special Providence of God during the Exodus.

Wisdom Teaching

The unifying theme of this biblical book is “the praise of wisdom.” Each of the three major sections addresses this theme from its own distinctive point of view. A cursory examination of each section will highlight significant theological elements found there.

The Reward of Justice (1:1–6:21)

The first section is often called “The Book of Eschatology.” (Traditionally, eschatology refers to the last or final things: the end of the age; death, judgment, reward, and punishment.) In it we find the destinies of the righteous and of the wicked described in vivid contrast. The former, regardless of their obvious suffering, “are in the hand of God” (3:1), while the latter “shall receive a punishment to match their thoughts” (3:10). This entire section serves as a summons to fidelity to the religious traditions of Israel, a fidelity that will guarantee the rewards of wisdom.

At first glance this teaching might seem to be merely a restatement of the doctrine of retribution. A closer look will show that it is instead a radical departure from the traditional understanding. The author not only challenged some traditional views but also introduced several radically new ideas. First, he insisted that childlessness, a condition that by itself brought reproach in ancient society (see Gn 16:4; 1 Sm 1:7) is not a mark of divine displeasure (3:13–14; 4:1). Regardless of the importance of offspring for the survival of the race, moral, not physical, fruitfulness is emphasized.

The author further denied that suffering itself presupposes sin. In fact, an untimely death may be a righteous person’s rescue from the wickedness of life (4:14). We are reminded of the adage: The good die young. This author agreed with both Job and Qoheleth that virtue is not always rewarded in this life, nor is evil punished. He went on to suggest, however, that whoever thinks that the death of the righteous is affliction or destruction is foolish (3:2). It is, rather, a trial that they must endure in order to be with God (3:5–6).

It is in this book that the reader of the Old Testament is first introduced to the Greek concept psyche (soul, 1:11; 3:1). Although in some passages the word is used with the same meaning as the Hebrew nephesh (being or life, 12:6; 14:5; 16:9), in other places it clearly marks adoption of the body-soul dualism that was part of the Greek understanding of human nature. Some Greek thinkers held that human nature was a combination of an impermanent, material body and an eternal, spiritual soul. This combination was dissolved at death. A caution is in order here. We must be careful not to take accommodation to Greek thought farther than the author did. Nowhere does this book speak of the soul as immortal in itself.

A second and related idea is that of life after death. This notion is quite different from the earlier perceptions of Sheol, the abode of the dead (see Psalms RG). There is just enough ambiguity in the use of the words “immortality” (3:4; 4:1; 8:13, 17; 15:3) and “incorruptibility” (2:23; 6:18–19) to prevent us from making too many definite statements about the author’s view. One thing does seem clear, though. Immortality is not an inherent quality of human nature; it is the fruit of union with wisdom (8:13, 17; 15:3). Although 2:23 claims that God made humans to be incorruptible (imperishable), 6:18 suggests that incorruptibility is contingent upon fidelity to wisdom.

We are not sure whether the author was speaking here merely of physical death, or of physical death followed by spiritual death, or of spiritual death alone. The thought does seem to pass over physical death, and attention is directed toward spiritual death. Saint Paul will have to face this same question when dealing with the unexpected deaths of Christians (1 Thes 4:13–18). Unlike the author of Wisdom, his answer is quite specific.

Finally, the author brought the two earlier creation narratives together and reinterpreted them. The statement about being made in God’s image (2:23), an allusion to Genesis 1:16, 28, is followed by the claim that the devil’s envy brought death into the world (2:24), a reinterpretation of Genesis 3. (A few commentators believe that the latter reference is to the envy of Cain, which resulted in the death of Abel [Gn 4:1–8]. However, another writer of this time stated that Satan led Eve astray [1 Enoch 69:6]. This latter citation supports the interpretation offered here.) The author of Wisdom was the first biblical writer to identify the serpent of the Genesis account with the devil.

Praise of Wisdom by Solomon (6:22–11:1)

The second major section of the book is an address acclaiming the glories of wisdom. It is from this section that the book receives its name, and it is here that we find a representation of personified Wisdom (see Proverbs RG). This characterization of Wisdom is quite different from that found in the earlier tradition. The author may have realized the unconventional nature of his depiction and felt that claiming Solomonic authority would be necessary in order to gain acceptance for this reinterpretation. At any rate, this section begins with an account of his humble origin, his own prayer for wisdom, and God's bestowal of this immeasurable gift in answer to his pleading (7:1–7; also see 9:1–18). This is unquestionably an allusion to the prayer of Solomon (1 Kgs 3:5–15), and it characterizes the author as the wise king.

The actual description of Wisdom is composed of elements from Israelite tradition (7:22a; see Prv 8:30), from the cult of the Egyptian deity Isis (goddess of wisdom and patron of culture whose praises were extolled in the form of listings similar to that found in 7:22–8:1), and from Hellenistic philosophy and science (see footnote to 8:7 for mention of the cardinal virtues found in Plato). This section may well be the heart of the author's argument in favor of the superiority of the religion of Israel. The author confers characteristics of Isis on the figure of Wisdom already found in the Israelite tradition, and draws upon Hellenistic religious and scientific concepts to praise her as he argues that real wisdom is a gift from God bestowed on the faithful.

Earlier traditions spoke of “a spirit of wisdom” (Is 11:2), but here Wisdom itself is called a spirit (1:6; 7:22). The author has brought two quite distinct and dissimilar concepts together by merging the notion of intelligence, the basic meaning of wisdom, with that of energy or power, the central idea in spirit. Having done this, he could then speak of the wisdom-spirit as “a breath of the might of God” (7:25). It is in this book that Wisdom is referred to as “the spirit of the LORD” (1:7). (The theology in this verse functions significantly in the liturgy of Pentecost.) Although spirit played a major role in Stoic philosophy, it was clearly a prominent theme in Jewish tradition as well. In his description of the nature and dignity of Wisdom (7:22–24), the author may well have employed the attributes of the world spirit, a concept found in Stoic philosophy. However, when he recounted the early history of Israel he equated Wisdom with the spirit of the LORD. He did this by ascribing to Wisdom what earlier Israelite writers attributed to the spirit of the LORD: the creative power in the world (7:22a; see Jdt 16:14); the source of Joseph's honor in Egypt (10:13; see Gn 41:38); the inspiration that prepared Moses for the Exodus and led the people through the wilderness (10:16–17; see Is 63:11, 14).

A significant amount of discussion regarding the influence of this figure of Wisdom on New Testament writings has appeared. Some scholars believe that the influence is direct. Others hold that the obvious similarities suggest that there was a general treasury of thought, imagery, and language that served as a common source. Whichever the case may be, the figure of personified Wisdom was reinterpreted by early Christian theologians as they struggled to understand Jesus the Christ. Paul explicitly referred to Christ as the wisdom of God (1 Cor 1:24, 30). However, the most obvious example of this reinterpretation is found in the Gospel According to John. There we find Jesus described in ways that Wisdom had been depicted earlier: as being with God in the beginning before the world existed (Jn 1:1; 17:5; see Wis 2:22); as sent from heaven to accomplish the will of God (Jn 6:38; see Wis 9:10). Current scholarship is only beginning to pursue the implications of this imagery for Christology.

This section ends with a summary of the way that Wisdom guided the ancestors of Israel, brought them out of Egypt, and, through the agency of Moses (see Hos 12:14), enabled them to prosper (10:1–11:1). It is clear that this Wisdom, once thought to be the possession of the king, was now considered the constant companion of true Israelites, those faithful ones of the past as well as the committed Jews of the present.

Special Providence of God during the Exodus (11:2–19:22)

At this point there is an observable shift in focus. The poem in praise of Wisdom gives way to a midrash that extols the ancestral God of Israel. This version of the experience of the Exodus and the time in the wilderness illustrates two points: (1) the sufferings that befell the Egyptians were the direct results of their sinfulness (11:16); and (2) the very elements that afflicted the Egyptians benefitted the Israelites (11:5). This rereading of the past is done through a creative selection of biblical data as well as the addition of material not found elsewhere. The author did not set out to recount historical facts or to repeat traditional testimonies. He seemed intent on addressing the challenge raised by Hellenism. His goal was to remind Alexandrian Jews that once before they had suffered at the hands of the Egyptians and, in the face of impossible odds, had been rescued. This midrash provides “historical” basis for continued trust in the God of Israel.

There are two digressions within this third division of the book. Both of them are found in the second example of God’s providence. The first is a testimony to God’s mercy (11:17–12:22). Although it breaks the midrashic line of thought, it may have been prompted by the mention of punishment in the preceding line (11:16). The second digression is a condemnation of idolatry (13:1–15:17). It follows the claim that the Egyptians “saw and recognized the true God whom formally they had refused to know” (12:27), but they continued in their idolatry. It should be noted that the language used in the condemnation of nature worship (13:1–9) may be the best example of the author’s broad grasp of scientific knowledge.

Theology in a New Context

The author of Wisdom did not set out in search of new theological insights. Since he was committed to prove the enduring value of the religion of Israel, he explained traditions and themes that were familiar to the Jews of his day. What made his contribution unique was the method he employed as he went about his task: by incorporating elements of other cultures into this theological thinking.

Throughout its history, Israel had been forced by circumstances to deal with the religious and cultural traditions of other societies. The Bible itself shows that these encounters were sometimes peaceful and beneficial, and at other times violent and destructive. Whatever the situation may have been, elements from these cultures found their way into the traditions of Israel. But it was the religion of Israel that had reinterpreted features of the other cultures and then assimilated these new ideas into its own perspective. Israel seldom had taken seriously the religious worldview of the other culture. This changed with the hellenization of the world. It was precisely the attraction of Greek civilization that threatened Jewish faith. The community wrestled with an agonizing dilemma: Could one accept the prevailing culture and remain faithful to the traditions of the ancestors? The author of Wisdom undertook the task of answering this question in the affirmative. In doing this, he did not try to reconcile Judaism with Hellenism. Instead, he used the ideas, the language, and the literary style of Greek culture to demonstrate the excellence of the Jewish faith.

In taking Greek culture seriously, this theologian did what theologians after him would have to do whenever cultural lines were crossed. The challenge of interpretation facing him was not so different from the one facing us, that is, to render a religious heritage that originated in one cultural context into another. His purpose was apologetic, a defense of the ancestral faith. Ours is usually evangelical, the proclamation of the Word of God. We have much to learn from both the message of this wisdom teacher and from his method of theological reinterpretation.

SIRACH (ECCLESIASTICUS)

[see pages 924–986 of the Old Testament]

ABOUT THE BOOK

Over the years the book of Sirach has been known by different names: “The Wisdom of Jesus Ben Sira” (of which Sirach is the Greek form); “The Book of Sirach” (a shortened title); “Ecclesiasticus” (from the Latin for book of the church, a designation that probably stems from its frequent use as a catechetical aid in the early centuries of the Western Church).

Sirach is the only biblical book that identifies its author (50:27), refers to its translator (a grandson of Ben Sira), and dates its translation (“the thirty-eighth year of the reign of King Euergetes,” sometime after 132 BC, [information found in the foreword]). Although the prophetic books claim to originate from the prophets and do locate their ministry during the reign of specific kings (e.g., Hos 1:1; Is 1:1; Jer 1:2–3; etc.), the references there are to prophetic activity and not to the books that bear the names of the prophets. Here we have a clear reference to literary activity.

The foreword also provides us with some interesting information about the composition of the biblical canon (the official list of inspired books). Three times the grandson of Ben Sira speaks of “the law, the prophets and the later authors” (or “the rest of the books”). This reference tells us that by the second century BC, the Jewish community already had what has come to be known as a tripartite (three-part) collection. Scholars believe that the first two parts (the Law and the Prophets) most likely included the books as we have them today. The third part (the Writings) was probably quite fluid until well into the Christian era.

Like the book of Wisdom, Sirach belongs to the collection called deuterocanonical by Roman Catholics or apocryphal by Protestants (see Wisdom RG). The foreword, which is considered historical introduction and not inspired instruction, recounts the translator’s arrival in Egypt where he discovered that the Jews’ “valuable teaching” had been rendered from Hebrew into Greek, the language of the day (see Wisdom RG). This inspired him to undertake the translation of his own grandfather’s teachings. The Hebrew version from which he worked seems to have dropped out of sight until copies of it were found in 1896.

It is not clear why the Jews did not accept Sirach as canonical (see Wisdom RG). Some commentators offer a twofold reason: (1) Ben Sira was interested in the Temple and the cult (concerns of a first-century AD group called Sadducees); (2) he did not seem to believe in the resurrection of the body (a position held by a rival first-century religious group called the Pharisees). Therefore, the Pharisaic rabbis who decided on the canon rejected Sirach. Whatever the case may be, its absence from the Jewish list explains its exclusion from the Protestant canon.

The manner in which the high priest Simon is described (50:1–21) leads one to conclude that he had only recently died. This would locate the writing of the original Hebrew version of Sirach sometime during the first quarter of the second century (200–175 BC). The description of Simon's priestly performance suggests that the author was quite familiar with the Jerusalem ritual; perhaps he was even a resident of the city. Many commentators believe that Jerusalem was in fact the place of composition.

The book appears to be a collection of proverbs organized in such a way as to resemble short essays. While there is no explicit arrangement in the book itself, one can divide the material both thematically and according to literary form. Chapters 1 through 44 principally deal with moral instruction, a characteristic that Sirach has in common with the rest of the wisdom literature. Still, this first section can be subdivided into two parts, each of which is introduced by a poem praising wisdom (see 1:1–29 and 24:1–31). The entire first section ends with a poem extolling God's activity in nature (42:15–43:35). The poems acclaiming time-honored heroes of Israel (44:1–49:16) and the high priest Simon (50:1–24) are followed by a kind of epilogue, which contains a denunciation of some of the traditional enemies of Israel and a subscription identifying the author (50:25–29). The book closes with two appendices: a psalm of thanksgiving for deliverance from danger (51:1–12); and a personal testimony in the form of an acrostic poem (51:13–30; see Psalms RG).

The Reason for Writing

The hellenization of the Near East had already taken hold among the educated upper classes by the time Ben Sira put his teachings into writing (see Wisdom RG). Many Jews must have wondered whether or not their ancient traditions could match the comprehension and depth of Greek thought. Being a well-traveled man (34:11), Ben Sira would have witnessed the decline in fervor that overtook his co-religionists, and being an observant Jew he would have been greatly troubled by this. It seems clear that his object in writing was to show the Jews of his day that real wisdom was to be found in the traditions of Israel and not in the godless philosophy of the day. He intended his work to be a comprehensive authoritative reference wherein could be found guidance and instruction for every circumstance of life.

Ben Sira exhorted his readers to study the ancient traditions in order to find there the kind of direction needed to cope with their new and challenging situation (2:10). He warned against trying to live according to the standards of both Judaism and Hellenism (2:12), and he condemned those who chose the latter over the former (2:13–14). Using a traditional wisdom figure of speech (“those who fear the LORD”), he identified the wise as those who were faithful to the religion of Israel (2:15–17). While the content of most of his wisdom teaching is quite conventional, the way Ben Sira blended it with Israel’s history and its legal and cultic traditions is distinctive. Earlier wisdom writing showed little interest in specifically Israelite matters. Ben Sira claimed that true wisdom resides in Israel (24:1–21), and later he used history to support this claim (44:1–49:16). He identified Wisdom with the Law of Moses (24:22), and in that way he accorded the latter a place of honor above the traditions of other cultures. But unlike other wisdom teachers, he demonstrated a profound concern for the cult and the role of the priesthood (46:6–26; 47:12–13; 50:1–21). All of this was, no doubt, Ben Sira’s way of arguing in favor of fidelity to Judaism.

If we are correct in determining the date of the translation, then it is probable that the final form of this book appeared after the Maccabean revolt but before the writing of the Wisdom of Solomon. Such historical reconstruction will help us to see how Israel’s response to Hellenism varied with time. Ben Sira did not accommodate to the process of Hellenization to the extent that the author of Wisdom did. If “traditionalist” means maintaining unchanged the answers of the past because they alone are adequate to meet the problems of the present, then Ben Sira can be called traditionalist in his response to Hellenism.

Wisdom Teaching

In many ways, the teaching of Ben Sira resembles that of the book of Proverbs. Its primary focus is moral guidance. The book lends itself to being an instructional manual containing maxims, many of which are grouped according to topic. The result is a series of short essays addressing topics such as duties toward God, toward one's parents, and toward rulers. There are instructions on how to train children, how to choose friends, and how to guard one's speech. There are warnings against excess, sloth and foolishness. Whatever one needs to succeed in life—while at the same time remaining faithful to the traditions of the elders—is addressed in the instructional section of this book.

Sirach is also like Proverbs in its celebration of the glories of personified Wisdom (1 and 24). However, it is distinctive in the way it takes this characterization a step farther than did the earlier work. Here we see Wisdom searching for a place to dwell and finally pitching her tent in Jerusalem. Traces of this poetic characterization can be found in the prologue to the Gospel of John where the Word, present with God from the beginning and involved in the creation of all things, “made his dwelling among us” (Jn 1:14).

Ben Sira's poems describing the role of divine wisdom in creation (16:22–17:18; 39:12–35; 42:15–43:35) are really commentaries on the opening chapters of Genesis. The somewhat technical way he developed his thought shows us the extent to which Ben Sira was influenced by the scientific knowledge of his day.

This book contains some of the harshest statements about women found in the Bible. Proverbs may have warned the naive youth to beware of wily and seductive women, but this author seems to speak disparagingly against women in general. Ben Sira is the one who blames woman for sin and death (25:23). It is further apparent that he expected wives to be subservient to their husbands, for he seems to advocate punishment even including divorce if they refuse to obey (25:24–25). Perhaps the worst example of this misogyny is found in the description of the unwed daughter (42:9–14). The author clearly considers her a liability, and his concern is exclusively with the reputation of the father.

The author holds a thoroughly traditional view of retribution (4:11–19; 7:1–3; 16:1–21; 21:1–10). The possibility of rewards or punishments after death does not seem to have been considered by this wisdom teacher (14:15–19). He counsels mourning at the death of another, but he admonishes his reader to moderation even in the acceptable expression of grief. The reason why the display should be temperate is that the dead are dead and nothing can be changed by uncontrolled sorrow (38:16–23).

While this view of life and death may have been in agreement with earlier notions of retribution, it was clearly not universally held in Israel at this time. Hope of reward after death for fidelity during persecution is found in other writings of this period (e.g., Dn 12:1–3; 2 Mc 7:9, 23, 29). Although Ben Sira probably lived before the Maccabean revolt (events surrounding this period are recorded in the other books mentioned earlier), his grandson/translator certainly lived after the rebellion and he upheld his ancestor's traditional view.

Ben Sira's adherence to the traditional notion of retribution and its consequent rejection of any notion of life after death, coupled with his support of the priesthood and interest in the cult, has prompted many interpreters to regard him as a Proto-Sadducee. Although such a group probably did not yet exist until after the Maccabean revolt, many of the theological views found in this book were eventually adopted by the Sadducees, an aristocratic priestly party.

The Influence of Sirach

Since the New Testament writers seem to have preferred the Alexandrian version (see Wisdom RG), it is not surprising that the influence of Sirach can be detected in some of their writings. The Letter of James is a clear example of this. Both books address questions of pride (Sir 10:7; Jas 4:6) and humility (Sir 3:18; Jas 1:9), of rich and poor (Sir 10:19–24; Jas 2:1–6), and of true wisdom (Sir 19:17–21; Jas 3:13–17), to name but a few instances. There are also obvious parallels between directives found in Sirach and those found in the Gospels. This includes teaching on magnanimity (Sir 29:12; Mt 6:19) and forgiveness (Sir 28:2; Mk 11:25) and against placing false hope in possessions (Sir 11:18–19; Lk 12:16–21).

While the canonical status of Sirach was and remains a question for debate, from the time of its appearance it has exerted significant influence on both the Jewish and the Christian communities. Over the years it has served as a kind of handbook of practical ethics, and its teachings can be found in the liturgical texts of both religious groups. The discovery at Qumran of a scroll of Sirach is evidence that the book was venerated as Scripture by the Essenes, a Jewish sectarian group whose community was located at that place along the Dead Sea. It also appears in copies of liturgical scrolls that were read in synagogues around the tenth century AD. Finally, the book is also quoted as Scripture at least once in the Talmud. The early church theologians Cyprian (third century AD) and Jerome (fourth century AD) attest to Christian use of the book. Clement of Alexandria (second century AD) quotes it so often that his citations have come to be considered an authoritative version of the text. This controversial book continues to exercise its influence even today. Passages from Sirach are used as lectionary readings. For many, perhaps most Catholics, the liturgical celebration is their primary exposure to the Bible. Within this context, the teachings of Ben Sira continue to exhort hearers to fidelity to the tradition and upright moral living.

It is interesting to note that in response to the Vatican document Decree on the Training of Priests (no. 16), moral theologians are reexamining the moral instructions found in Scripture. They do not turn there in search of ageless answers to contemporary questions but in an attempt to discover how moral decisions were made in the past. Biblical specialists provide them with insights into the manner in which writers, especially the teachers of wisdom, brought the time-honored religious tradition to bear on new situations. The book of Sirach, with its essay-like instruction, remains a source of information in this area. It opens a window into a community struggling with its identity as it finds itself at the crossroads of traditional religion and contemporary culture. Sirach and Wisdom provide us with two ways of responding to this challenge. While we may not be able to follow their specific advice, we can learn from their example how to reinterpret the tradition creatively yet remain loyal to its revelatory message.

THE MAJOR PROPHETS, LAMENTATIONS, AND BARUCH

KATHERINE M. HAYES

The prophetic books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel are traditionally named the three “major prophets.” They are longer than the twelve “minor prophets,” which together could be written out on one scroll. Associated with the book of Jeremiah are the short books of Lamentations and Baruch. Lamentations is a series of five laments over the razing of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. The deuterocanonical book of Baruch, set in the exilic community in Babylon, is ascribed to Jeremiah’s companion and scribe, Baruch.

The three major prophets lead off the grouping of the prophets in both Christian and Jewish canons. This primary position has a long tradition, as can be seen in the book of Sirach, dated to approximately 180 BC. Sirach’s ode to the ancestors of Israel includes praise of the written prophets, beginning with Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, and then mentioning the “twelve prophets” (Sir 48:20–49:10).

Isaiah (66 chapters), Jeremiah (52 chapters), and Ezekiel (48 chapters) create a panoramic view of God’s interactions with the people of Israel and Judah over time. Both the scope and the complexity of these books can be related to a common reality: the destruction of Jerusalem and its Temple in 587 and the dissolution of Judah as an independent kingdom ruled by a Davidic king. The book of Jeremiah is set in Judah in the period immediately preceding the final seizure of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. The first chapter of Ezekiel places the prophet in the region of Babylon, among the initial group of Judahites in exile. Although the first part of the book of Isaiah is framed in relation to the Assyrian threat to Judah during the eighth century, the historical setting shifts in Isaiah 40 to the era of Babylonian Exile in the sixth century.

The exile in Babylon, though limited to about fifty years (587–539), was a near-death experience for the people of Judah. The feelings of loss and distance from God after Jerusalem's fall are expressed lyrically in the book of Lamentations and among the communal laments of the psalms (Pss 74, 79, 89, 137). The exile had many ramifications and raised many questions about the future for those who survived and for subsequent generations. The varieties of prophetic speech and narrative included in the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel address this crucial turning point from different angles. In these books distinct perspectives are presented side by side or nested within overarching literary structures. The resulting complex texture is appropriate to the difficult human and divine realities reflected in the prophetic word. The multiform articulations of these books do not resolve all questions, but they do provoke readers and listeners to contemplate the meaning of the catastrophic events they address in order to illuminate the present and future.

The full spectrum of prophetic rhetoric in these books includes announcements of impending judgment and woe, laments, diatribes and dialogues, narratives of prophetic visions and symbolic acts, allegories, wisdom-like instructions, hymn-like poems, promises of deliverance and restoration, and narrative accounts of historical events and prophetic activity. All are intended to move readers to remember and engage with the past so as to live in the present with greater awareness of God's purposes and ways.

Common to Isaiah and Jeremiah is biographical, third-person narrative about the prophet's activity in particular historical circumstances (Is 7–8; 36–39; Jer 26–45; 51:59–64). Much of the book of Ezekiel consists of first-person reports of prophetic visions, often linked to specific times and places that give it an autobiographical feel. All three major prophetic books connect the words they convey with a human figure, an individual chosen by God to remind the wider community of the divine presence in human life and history, and to guide them in the light of that presence.

The existence of third-person narratives about the prophet within the books of Isaiah and Jeremiah bespeaks a distinction between the prophetic figure and the prophetic book. Not all the prophetic material in the major prophetic books can be definitively traced to a single prophetic voice. This is clear in the book of Isaiah, which evokes historical settings that span at least two centuries (from eighth-century Judah to sixth-century Babylon to sixth- or fifth-century Jerusalem). Those responsible for compiling these books and their earliest audiences did not find the development of new prophetic traditions and contexts in relation to the same prophetic figure problematic. Rather, prophetic inspiration in one historical setting was seen as having long-term, multiple implications in later generations.

The ongoing validity of the prophetic witness is conveyed by expanding on the words of earlier prophecy. Differences in genre, style, tone, and perspective within Isaiah and Jeremiah, especially, suggest the inclusion of voices from different times and contexts. The historical narratives of Isaiah 36–39 and Jeremiah 52, for example, closely parallel passages in 2 Kings 18–20 and 2 Kings 24–25, respectively. The basic elements of the book of Ezekiel cohere more closely, and interpolations and additions are not as obvious. Nonetheless, the expansion of prophetic speeches with additional material can be seen as a widely accepted practice in the prophetic corpus.

References in the major prophets to the writing down of the prophetic word (Is 8:16; 29:11–12; Jer 30:2; 36:1–7; Ez 43:10–11) suggest one means by which prophetic oracles delivered in an oral context developed into the compositions we have now. In writing down prophetic speeches in certain sequences and in reformulating them for new audiences, new voices added to the tradition and contributed to the growth of the prophetic books over time.

In the form in which the books have come down to us, diverse forms of speech and narrative have been placed under the rubric of prophetic vision. The opening verse of the book of Isaiah declares it to be “the vision which Isaiah, son of Amoz, saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem.” The book of Ezekiel begins with the first of the prophet’s many visionary experiences, as the heavens open and he sees “divine visions” (1:1). In the first chapter of the book of Jeremiah, the prophet sees images of an almond tree and a boiling kettle that portend the exercise of divine justice on Judah (Jer 1:11–16; cf. 24:1–10). Such experiences imply extraordinary perception in the mode of divine revelation. The language and tenor of vision at the beginning of the three major prophetic books places them within a framework of aural and visual revelation of divine movements that cannot simply be attributed to human foresight or experience.

Prophetic vision implies a farther horizon than ordinary human sight alone can register, and the concept of revelatory vision can be applied to the scope of the prophetic message in the major prophets. In all three prophetic books, the terrible woes that befall the misguided and unseeing people of Judah are presented as preliminary to the initiation of a new community founded in a deep connection with God and blessed with peace and abundance. The inevitable rejection of the prophetic word in the short term leads in time to a community shaped by the divine word (Is 29:22–24; 30:20–21; 33:19; 43:21; 54:13–14; 60:19–22; Jer 31:33–34; Ez 36:26–27). Such visions of the future do not necessarily accord directly with human experience in the moment, but they are integral to the prophetic affirmation of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel.

At the same time, the three major prophetic books unambiguously announce the enactment of divine judgment. They do not shrink from placing a spotlight on the human catastrophe and suffering resulting from the decisions of Judah's leaders and people, who have ignored the parameters of God's justice in favor of their own calculations. A litany of social abuses tied to the denial, marginalization, and replacement of God runs through the oracles of judgment in these books. The images of divine wrath and fury and the strong statements of divine resolve to put an end to violence and greed among the people by destroying city and nation are intended to shock. Such statements should neither be glossed over nor read simply at face value but warrant careful study in their contexts. Yet they convey the divine determination to save those who suffer through social injustice and indifference while refusing to surrender the community as a whole to unchecked dehumanization. These three major prophetic books are insistent on both divine justice and divine mercy and forgiveness. They connect justice with hope, making a case that without justice, there is no hope for the just—or ultimately for anyone else.

ISAIAH

see pages [988–1071 of the Old Testament]

The book of Isaiah is a collection of prophetic writings spanning several centuries. These writings have been joined together under the name of Isaiah, the son of Amoz, who saw “a vision concerning Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, kings of Judah” (Is 1:1). Ahaz and Hezekiah, who ruled in Jerusalem at the end of the eighth century, play an important role in Isaiah 1–39, the first part of the book. To each king Isaiah brings a divine word of assurance in the face of desperate situations caused by the pressure of the expanding Assyrian empire on the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The devastation brought on Judah by the Assyrians is presented as a failure to trust in God’s wisdom and instruction. Yet Hezekiah’s trust in God’s word led to the deliverance of Jerusalem from annihilation.

In the book of Isaiah as a whole, the harm done to Judah by the Assyrians in the eighth century is presented as a prelude to the destruction of Jerusalem and the deportation of its inhabitants by the Babylonians in the sixth century. Isaiah’s words of assurance to Kings Ahaz and Hezekiah prefigure the divine word of deliverance for those exiled in Babylon almost two centuries later. Isaiah 40–55, the second part of the book, speaks explicitly of the return from exile in Babylon. Isaiah 56–66, the third section, draws out the long-term, eschatological implications of this pattern of divine judgment and deliverance in the context of the rebuilding of Jerusalem from the late sixth to the mid-fifth centuries BC. The book of Isaiah as a whole was put together after that time.

The name “Isaiah” means “salvation of the LORD,” and the book of Isaiah traces the playing out of God’s salvific purpose for Jerusalem, God’s “holy mountain,” and for its people. The vision of Isaiah, son of Amoz, in the first part of the book is extended in the second and third parts of the book to turning points experienced by successive generations of the people of Judah.

The three major parts of Isaiah are traditionally known as “First Isaiah,” “Second Isaiah,” and “Third Isaiah.” Each of these parts displays distinct settings and internal structures but also similarities of phrasing, motif, and theme that join them to the other two parts. Awareness of these resemblances has led many scholars to avoid the numerical titles as if implying separate prophetic traditions. Such scholars emphasize the unity of the book and speak of the Isaiah tradition as a whole. In our discussion, the titles First, Second, and Third Isaiah will be used at times for ease of reference.

Across its three major parts, the book of Isaiah shows many signs of careful structuring and interconnection. One might compare the book as a whole to a varied forest habitat of intertwined ecosystems that sustain an overall dynamic balance. Thus it is helpful to mark out some broad contours before delving into discrete sections of the book.

Unifying Features in Isaiah

The interweaving of the Isaianic collection can be seen in the often noted parallels between the beginning and conclusion of the book (Is 1:1–2:4 and Is 65–66, respectively). In both, God protests that the people of Israel have rebelled against the one who has cared for them (1:2–3; 65:2; 66:24). Isaiah 1:6 exhorts the people to cease doing evil and to learn to do good; Isaiah 65:12 and 66:4 condemn those who have done evil and have not chosen what is pleasing to God. The vision of a new Jerusalem in 1:26–27 is echoed in 65:18–19, and the motif of the holy mountain of God as a gathering point for all nations and peoples in Isaiah 2:1–4 is paralleled in 66:18–20.

In terms of the major themes of judgment and salvation, Isaiah 1–39, framed within the expectation of woe and judgment, includes numerous prophetic oracles of future hope and healing. Isaiah 40–55, although heralding the LORD’s imminent deliverance of the exiled people of Judah, acknowledges resistance and rejection to this good news. And Isaiah 56–66 speaks simultaneously of vindication and salvation for the just and humble, and condemnation and judgment for the perverse and self-driven. The interplay of judgment and salvation takes different forms in the book but weaves through the whole.

Recurrent Themes and Motifs

Specific motifs and themes recur throughout the book of Isaiah that contribute to its overall presentation of God, of the people, of the prophet, and hence to its distinctive theology.

God as Divine King

Toward the beginning of the book of Isaiah, God appears in vision as a king seated on a high throne above the temple (Is 6:1). This initial vision is reflected at the end of First Isaiah: “The LORD is exalted, enthroned on high; he fills Zion with right and justice” (Is 33:5). The promise of peace in Jerusalem is attributed to God’s kingship in 33:22: “For the LORD is our judge, the LORD is our lawgiver, the LORD is our king; he it is who will save us” (cf. Is 24:23). Second Isaiah announces the LORD’s reappearance in Jerusalem after the exile with royal images: “Here comes with power the Lord God, who rules by his strong arm” (Is 40:10), and the essential “good news” of salvation is: “Your God is King!” (Is 52:7). In the last chapter of Isaiah, God declares the cosmic nature of divine kingship: “The heavens are my throne, the earth, my footstool” (66:1). As king, God’s purposes are beneficent, insuring justice, protecting the people from harm, and providing for their needs.

Yet Isaiah makes clear that the LORD’s kingship is distinct from human kingship. God is not only given the traditional title “LORD of hosts,” that is, commander of heavenly and earthly armies. God is the “Holy One of Israel” (Is 1:4 and twenty times more throughout the book). The word “holy” in Hebrew means to be set apart from all human imperfection and limitation. In Isaiah’s initial vision of God enthroned, the seraphim, a heavenly assembly of divine beings, call out “Holy, holy, holy” (Is 6:3).

God as Exalted

As the Holy One, God is portrayed as exalted, high, or lofty: that is, transcendent and above human powers. The divine presence reduces human aspirations to size and “rises to overawe the earth” (Is 2:19, 21; cf. 33:10). When that happens, “the LORD alone will be exalted” (Is 2:11, 17). The LORD’s house, or sanctuary, is on a high mountain, raised above the hills (Is 2:2; 27:13; 56:7; 66:20). The divine name itself is exalted (Is 12:4).

Toward the beginning of Isaiah 40–55 God claims to be “the one who is enthroned above the vault of the earth, its inhabitants like grasshoppers” (Is 40:22). The end of Second Isaiah echoes this comparison: “As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, my thoughts higher than your thoughts” (Is 55:9). In Isaiah 56–66, the LORD declares exaltation in heaven as well as presence on earth : “Thus says the high and lofty One, the One who dwells forever, whose name is holy: I dwell in a high and lofty place, but also with the contrite and lowly of spirit” (Is 57:15).

God’s Justice

Central to the role of a governing king, justice and judgment are essential elements of God’s exalted rule: “The LORD rises to accuse, stands to try his people / The Lord enters into judgment with the people’s elders and princes” (Is 3:13–14). Indeed it is in the decisive carrying out of justice that the LORD is exalted: “The LORD of hosts shall be exalted by judgment, by justice the Holy God shown holy” (Is 5:16; cf. 33:5). In Isaiah 28:17 the LORD declares, “I will make judgment a measuring line, and justice a level,” indicating the realignment of what has become skewed (cf. Is 1:18). At the same time, divine justice is connected with compassion and mercy for the afflicted: “Truly the LORD is waiting to be gracious to you, truly, he shall rise to show you mercy / For the LORD is a God of justice: happy are all who wait for him” (Is 30:18).

Overtone of mercy and vindication are dominant in references to divine justice in Isaiah 40–55, where words related to “justice” are frequently paired with words related to “salvation” (Is 45:8, 21; 46:13; 51:5–8). Thus the LORD claims to have stirred up a king to defeat Babylon “for justice” so as “to rebuild my city and let my exiles go free” (Is 45:13; cf. 41:2). The exiles are promised safety through justice: “In justice shall you be established, far from oppression, you shall not fear, from destruction, it cannot come near” (Is 54:14).

The dual tones of justice as judgment and as deliverance are clear in Isaiah 56–66. Justice is absent in the community: “Judgment is turned away, and justice stands far off / For truth stumbles in the public square, and uprightness cannot enter” (Is 59:14). Yet divine justice will set things right: the LORD’s own arm “brought about the victory [or salvation], and his justice sustained him / He put on justice as his breastplate, victory [or salvation] as a helmet on his head” (Is 59:16–17). This decisive judgment will be experienced as payment for the crimes of the perverse and treacherous but instead as redemption for “those in Jacob who turn from transgression” (Is 59:20). These dual tones are sounded again as God states, concerning those rescued: “I, the LORD, love justice, I hate robbery and wrongdoing / I will faithfully give them their recompense, an everlasting covenant I will make with them” (Is 61:8).

The Plan of God

Associated with God’s just rule is the divine counsel or plan—in broader terms, divine wisdom. The noun “counsel” and the verb “to counsel,” frequent in the biblical wisdom books, occur thirty-five times in Isaiah, often with the more specific meaning of “plan.” God rules according to a long-term plan or strategy with an outcome referred to as the “work” or “deed” of the LORD. Isaiah 5 portrays the leaders and people Judah as imperceptive and foolish because they dismiss the divine plan and work, saying “Let him make haste, let him speed his work, that we may see it / On with the plan of the Holy One of Israel! let it come to pass that we may know it!” (Is 5:19). Isaiah 14 points to the ultimate breakdown of Assyrian power as the implementation of a divine plan: “This is the plan proposed for the whole earth, and this the hand outstretched over all the nations / The LORD of hosts has planned; who can thwart him? / His hand is stretched out; who can turn it back?” (Is 14:26–27; cf. 25:1).

References to the active plan of the LORD continue into Isaiah 40–55, where God claims concerning the return of the exiles to Jerusalem: “I confirm the words of my servant, carry out the plan my messengers announce / I say to Jerusalem, Be inhabited! To the cities of Judah, Be rebuilt! I will raise up their ruins” (Is 44:26). God’s capacity to carry out a plan over long ages and to know how it will turn out is what defines divine rule: “I am God, there is no other; I am God, there is none like me / At the beginning I declare the outcome; from of old, things not yet done / I say that my plan shall stand, I accomplish my every desire” (Is 46:9–10). The recurrent motif of God’s plan and work in different contexts in Isaiah suggests that what unfolds within the book is to be understood under the aegis of divine knowledge and purpose.

God as Light

The exaltation of God as high and exalted evokes a vantage point that allows for comprehensive vision and discernment. This may explain why, in part, imagery of light is frequently associated with God in the book of Isaiah. Light is linked to the LORD's beneficent and pervasive vision in Isaiah 18:4: "I will be quiet, looking on from where I dwell / Like the shimmering heat in sunshine." At the beginning of the book the exhortation "House of Jacob, come, let us walk in the light of the LORD," associates light with the teaching and judgment of God, which lead to peace among nations (Is 2:1–5). Light is also connected with God's mercy and healing: "The light of the moon will be like the light of the sun, and the light of the sun will be seven times greater, like the light of seven days / On the day the LORD binds up the wounds of his people and heals the bruises made by his blows" (Is 30:26). In Isaiah 40–55, divine judgment is compared to a "light to the peoples" (51:4), and the LORD's servant is sent as a "light to the nations" (42:6; 49:6). Images of light cluster at the center of Isaiah 56–66, as in Isaiah 60:1: "Arise! Shine, for your light has come, the glory of the LORD has dawned upon you" (cf. Is 60:3, 19–20; 62:1). In this dawning Jerusalem itself will become radiant: "Nations shall walk by your light" (Is 60:3; cf. 58:8).

God's People as Blind

In contrast to these images of divine light are recurrent images of a people blind or obscured in vision and perception. The judgment oracles of Isaiah 5 condemn those whose perception is twisted, who cannot "see" the work of God, "who call evil good, and good evil, who change darkness to light, and light into darkness" (Is 5:19–20). Isaiah is commissioned as a prophet to speak words to those who cannot understand them and thus to "Make the heart of this people sluggish, dull their ears and close their eyes / Lest they see with their eyes" (Is 6:9–10; cf. 29:10). In Isaiah 40–55, God recognizes the exiles' blindness but promises to lead them: "I will lead the blind on a way they do not know; by paths they do not know I will guide them / I will turn darkness into light before them, and make crooked ways straight" (Is 42:16; cf. 42:18–20). In Isaiah 56–66, a dark shadow is cast over communal life: "Like those who are blind we grope along the wall / like people without eyes we feel our way" (Is 59:10).

Jerusalem, City of God

The major thematic pattern of Jerusalem's corruption, destruction, and restoration is widely considered to be the most significant unifying element in the book of Isaiah. God's heavenly reign is intimately bound up with Jerusalem. Isaiah presents the city as the site of God's holy mountain (Zion), which is envisioned at the beginning of the book as the seat of the LORD's instruction or teaching (torah) for the people of Israel and for all peoples: "For from Zion shall go forth instruction, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem" (Is 2:3). Jerusalem experiences both destruction and deliverance at the hand of God, but the first chapter of Isaiah sees destruction as part of the divine strategy to restore the city to justice: "Zion shall be redeemed by justice / and her repentant ones by righteousness" (Is 1:27). It is to Zion that a healed and redeemed people will in time return as pilgrims along a "holy way" (Is 35:6–8; cf. 27:13).

Isaiah 40–55 brings a full message of comfort to Jerusalem (Is 40:1–2; 51:3; 52:9) and a commission to the city to herald the good news to the rest of Judah (Is 40:9). It is the divine plan to rebuild the city and temple (Is 44:26–28) God's commitment to this plan is evident in Isaiah 56–66: "For Zion's sake I will not keep silent, for Jerusalem's sake I will not keep still, until her vindication shines forth like the dawn, and her salvation like a burning torch" (Is 62:1). The motif of nations streaming to Jerusalem with riches to "bring beauty to my sanctuary, and glory to the place where I stand" (Is 60:13) illustrates this aim. The book draws to a close with nations gathered at the LORD's holy mountain bringing with them, as an offering, the dispersed of Israel (Is 66:18–20; cf. 49:22–23). The pilgrimage of peoples to Jerusalem thus both opens and closes the book of Isaiah.

The Prophet as God's Servant

In the narrative of Isaiah's call as a prophet in Isaiah 6, he volunteers to serve as God's messenger (Is 6:8). He proves his persistence as a prophet in the face of King Ahaz's refusal of his message (Is 7). In his interaction with King Hezekiah he guides the king to trust in God's power to save. In the second half of Isaiah 40–55, the servant of the LORD takes the form of a prophetic messenger (Is 49:2–3), who is scorned and abused (Is 50:6; 53:3), yet who perseveres (Is 50:5–7; 53:7–9). A prophetic figure reemerges in Isaiah 56–66 as one anointed by the spirit of the LORD to bring good news and comfort to those who are afflicted and disheartened (61:1–3).

These motifs are repeated, for the most part, through all three major sections of the book of Isaiah. Although the book cannot be read as a single strand of prophetic witness, recurrent threads of phrasing and content create the impression of multiple stages and cycles within an overall divine plan. It now remains to explore how these threads are woven into different articulations within the major sections and subsections of the book.

PART I: ISAIAH 1–39 (FIRST ISAIAH)

The first major part of the book of Isaiah is itself a tapestry-like interweaving of different strands or modes of prophetic speech. Setting the pattern of the whole is the motif of God's wisdom, instruction or teaching (torah), plan, and work. First Isaiah's harsh accusations of the perversion of Judah's communal life are rooted in the refusal of both leaders and people to listen to divine instruction: "They have rejected the instruction (torah) of the LORD of hosts, and scorned the word of the Holy One of Israel" (Is 5:24; cf. 1:10; 30:9). They have persisted in pursuing their own plans: "Ah! Rebellious children, oracle of the LORD / Who carry out a plan that is not mine" (Is 30:1). Their wisdom is fundamentally distorted because of its limitations. They are "wise in their own eyes, prudent in their own view" (Is 5:21). This self-defined wisdom adds up to a foolishness something like the stupor and blurry vision of a drunkard: "Stupefy yourselves and stay stupid, blind yourselves and stay blind / You who are drunk, but not from wine, who stagger, but not from strong drink!" (Is 29:9).

The manifestations of this foolish wisdom are devious schemes, arrogant language, and callous and abusive acts: "For the fool speaks folly, his heart plans evil / Godless actions, perverse speech against the LORD / Letting the hungry go empty and the thirsty without drink / The deceits of the deceiver are evil, he plans devious schemes / To ruin the poor with lies, and the needy when they plead their case" (Is 32:6–7; cf. 1:16–17; 3:14–15; 5:7, 8–9, 23; 29:20–21). Foolishness is also evident in those who seek security and protection against enemies like Assyria in alliances with Egypt, rather than looking to the transcendent wisdom of the "Holy One of Israel" (31:1–3; cf. 30:1–2).

Such announcements of judgment intertwine in Isaiah 1–39 with glimpses of a future community of profound peace and serenity, guided by the spirit and teaching of God: "Those who err in spirit shall acquire understanding, those who find fault shall receive instruction" (Is 29:24; cf. Is 1:26–27; 2:1–4; 30:20–21; 32:15–18; 33:19–20). In this community, God will rule as divine king (Is 33:5–6, 17, 22; cf. 24:23). The oracles of Isaiah 9 and 11 also raise the hope of a future Davidic king endowed with divine wisdom, strength, and justice (Is 9:1–6; 11:1–9). He will "judge the poor with justice, and decide fairly for the land's afflicted / He shall strike the ruthless with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips he shall slay the wicked” (Is 11:4). Under his reign God’s wisdom will prevail: “They shall not harm or destroy on all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the LORD, as water covers the sea” (Is 11:9). The portrait of King Hezekiah in Isaiah 36–39 provides the model of a king who, in listening to God’s guiding word through Isaiah, is able to save Jerusalem and its people from annihilation.

The oracles of healing and of a transformed community introduce a future dimension into Isaiah 1–39, beyond the time of judgment it announces. The oracles of woe themselves often portray judgment in broad terms, evoking future as well as present catastrophe (Is 39:5–7), and, in Isaiah 24–27, global eschatological judgment. Both Jewish and Christian interpretive traditions have seen in First Isaiah’s oracles of salvation depictions of the kingdom of God in an eschatological age (Is 11:6–9; 65:17–25; cf. Rev 21:1–6). Christians have long adopted them as foretelling the advent of Christ (Is 29:18–19; 35:5–6; cf. Lk 7:21–22; Mt 3:16; Mk 1:10; Jn 1:32).

Historical Setting

The book of Isaiah as a whole integrates the poetic speeches of the eighth-century prophet Isaiah with prophetic oracles stemming from the exilic and postexilic periods. Signs of the process of integration can be seen in Isaiah 1–39, which incorporates implicit references to the later Babylonian conquest, the future restoration of Jerusalem, and even to world judgment and transformation. First Isaiah as a whole, however, is set within the time of the two Judahite kings Ahaz and Hezekiah, whose reigns are evaluated in 2 Kings 16 and 2 Kings 18–20.

During this time the Assyrian empire was expanding from its base in the city of Nineveh (in modern-day Iraq), causing disruption and instability to many smaller, weaker nations. In 738 BC the Northern Kingdom of Israel became a tribute-paying subject state of Assyria, with subsequent ramifications for Judah. In 735 BC the king of Israel and the king of neighboring Aram (Syria) allied to free themselves from Assyrian domination. They sought military help from Judah to bolster their effort. These two kings invaded Judah in an attempt to depose the Davidic king, Ahaz, and replace him with a ruler amenable to their plans. According to 2 Kings, Ahaz responded by allying himself with the Assyrian emperor, swearing exclusive loyalty: “I am your servant and your son” (2 Kings 16:7).

Ahaz’s son Hezekiah was not as convinced as his father was of the benefits of being a tribute state of Assyria. When he became king in 716 BC he allied Judah with other rebellious subject states in the region, all of whom were counting on military assistance from the second great superpower of the day, Egypt. The Assyrians had already obliterated the Northern Kingdom of Israel in 722 BC for withholding tribute. They now turned their attention to subduing the new cluster of break-away kingdoms. Assyrian troops poured into Judah, burning cities, plundering valuables, carting off inhabitants to slavery and exile, and, in 701 BC, surrounding the city of Jerusalem and demanding surrender. According to 2 Kings 19, Hezekiah’s response was to enter the Temple, send for Isaiah to appeal to the LORD for the city, and utter fervent prayers himself. As a result, the Assyrians withdrew and Jerusalem was saved.

The portraits of these two kings in 2 Kings 16; 18–20 form a contrasting pair: one seeking the security offered by a more powerful human monarch, the other refusing to yield up Jerusalem and trusting in the protection of the one who alone is “God over all the kingdoms of the earth” (2 Kgs 19:15). This contrast is important in considering the internal structure of Isaiah 1–39.

Literary Structure

Isaiah 1–39 is both an intricately structured composition and a loosely joined collection of prophetic speech and narrative. The juxtaposition and bracketing of different genres of prophetic speech and narrative invite the reader to meditate on their multiple interconnections. The following major sections are distinguished:

Isaiah 1–12: Oracles of Judgment and Salvation; Isaiah’s mission to King Ahaz

Isaiah 13–27: Oracles against the Nations and World Judgment

Isaiah 28–35: Oracles of Judgment and Salvation

Isaiah 36–39: Isaiah’s mission to King Hezekiah

The two biographical narratives about Isaiah’s mission to kings Ahaz and Hezekiah, one toward the beginning section of Isaiah 1–39, the other at its end, orient the prophetic oracles of First Isaiah toward the opposition between human calculations and trust in a divine plan. They also provide a literary context for the prophecies of an ideal Davidic king that are found only in Isaiah 1–39. The well-known hymn to the prince of peace and the prophecy of the peaceable kingdom in Isaiah 9:1–6 and 11:1–9 are echoed in the references to a just king in Isaiah 32:1 and a king of great splendor in Isaiah 33:17. The king is given titles that indicate his possession of wisdom and strength to a god-like degree (Is 9:3), and he is endowed with the spirit of the LORD (Is 11:2). His just and peaceful reign reflects that of the divine king (Is 33:22).

In the narrative logic of the book of Isaiah as a whole, these oracles are appropriately placed within the framework of the kingship in Judah. In Isaiah 40–66, images of God as warrior and king prevail, but there is no role for a human king in these chapters. Yet like the royal psalms that were given prominent positions in the psalter long after the end of the David kingship in Judah (e.g., Pss 2, 45, 72, 89), these passages are bound up with Isaiah’s vision of God’s reign on earth. The image of the peaceable kingdom associated with the Davidic king in Isaiah 11:1–9, for example, is associated in Isaiah 65:25 with the new heavens and earth God is about to create.

Isaiah 1–12

This opening section of the book of Isaiah can be viewed as a microcosm of the longer arc from judgment to salvation displayed in the book as a whole. Isaiah 1–12 presents the basic message of the prophet to the people of Judah: trust in the reality of God’s wisdom and plan, which leads, if by long and difficult roads, to peace and well being.

Isaiah 1

The first chapter sets out a basic pattern with which to view Isaiah as a whole. Following the first verse, or superscription, the voice of the LORD raises a fundamental grievance against the people of Judah. The appeal to the heavens and earth as witnesses to the divine word underscores the cosmic gravity of the accusation, yet the language is familial: “Sons I have raised and reared, but they have rebelled against me” (Is 1:2). The LORD’s own offspring, bound by the closest of bonds and a shared life, have not understood the parental care of their God—not even to the extent that a domestic animal knows by whom it is fed. The language evokes pathos and at the same time points to the heart of the matter: misperception and miscomprehension by those who have known divine nurture. That failure has led to a parting of ways, since these “corrupt children” have abandoned and rejected the Holy One (Is 1:4).

Lack of understanding approaches the absurd in the metaphor of a wounded and sick people persisting in self-destructive behavior (Is 1:5–7). The image of “daughter Zion” left standing alone, like a besieged city in a landscape of burning ruins (Is 1:8) makes concrete the result of this behavior, calling to mind both the Assyrian siege of Jerusalem and the later Babylonian siege.

Accusation shifts to exhortation of the people and their leaders (Is 1:10–20). They are to listen to the instruction or teaching (torah) of their God. Rather than increasing the number of their ritual sacrifices, they are to do the more essential work of ceasing from wrongdoing, learning what is good, and setting their sights on justice. The concrete and active character of justice is conveyed here by examples: compensating the wronged, hearing and responding to the orphan’s plight, defending widows (those without a protector) from abuse. If the choice to do these things is made, the disjuncture between God and people can be set right, sins washed clean, and well-being assured (Is 1:16–20).

The prophetic word strongly recommends this direct route to realignment with God, with the warning that to refuse it is to invite annihilation (Is 1:18–20). Yet annihilation is shown in the last verses of Isaiah 1 to be an alternate, more painful route toward the restoration of Zion as a faithful city (Is 1:21–28).

The prophetic voice compares Jerusalem, once a faithful and just city, to a prostitute, giving itself over to murderers and ruthless leaders. In this the city has become like silver adulterated with baser metals, or alloy (Is 1:21–23). Following the logic of the metaphor, God resolves to subject the whole mix to extreme heat, burning off what is corrupt in a furnace (Is 1:25; cf. Is 48:10). By divine choice, God will restore Jerusalem to its original justice and faithfulness (Is 1:26). The process of refinement entails a distinction between the “repentant” (those who turn to God), who will be redeemed as Zion, and “rebels and sinners” (those who abandon the LORD), who will be crushed and finished off (Is 1:27–28). The distinction between those who turn away from God and those who turn toward God is developed at greater length in Isaiah 56–66 (cf. Is 59:20; 65:8–15).

The outline of an alternative route to Jerusalem's renewal serves as a map for the three stages of communal experience reflected in the book of Isaiah. Life-altering disaster, foreshadowed in the Assyrian invasion of Judah and fully realized in the Babylonian conquest, will overtake a Jerusalem that has broken with God and abandoned justice. On the other side of massive suffering and loss, the true value of Jerusalem as a "city of justice, faithful city" can be reclaimed. Jerusalem can only be fully redeemed, however, in those who enact just behavior and only when those who continue to break away from God lose their hold on Zion (Is 1:27–28). In this respect God's direct appeals for the people's turn toward justice—retain their force along with the experience of defeat that represents the breakdown of old practices and attitudes.

Isaiah 2:1–4

Because Isaiah 1 maps out the long road to salvation traced in the rest of the book, scholars have regarded it an introduction to the book as a whole. The opening verse of Isaiah 2 offers a separate heading or superscription for Isaiah 1–39: "This is what Isaiah, son of Amoz, saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem." Yet this second heading is followed by a vision of the pilgrimage of nations and peoples to Jerusalem (Is 2:1–4), a recurrent motif in Isaiah 56–66. This motif stands at the end of the last chapter of the book (Is 66:18–21), and it stands here, at the head of Isaiah 1–39, as a signal of the telos of the book as a whole.

The purpose of the nations' pilgrimage to "the mountain of the LORD's house" and "the house of the God of Jacob" in Isaiah 2:1–4 is to receive instruction from the LORD so as to learn to "walk in his paths" (Is 2:3). The instruction or teaching (torah) of the LORD is a key term in Isaiah 1–39, in which a major focus is the judgment coming to a Jerusalem uninterested in divine instruction.

Isaiah 5–6

The situation in Judah is set out in Isaiah 5, beginning with a poem traditionally named "the song of the vineyard" (Is 5:1–7). Using the teaching mode of allegory, the prophetic singer sketches a scenario, introduces the voice of a “friend,” and then asks his audience to evaluate what they have heard (cf. Nathan’s parable in 2 Sm 12:1–12). The simple dramatic lines of the tale make the clear point that a carefully cultivated vineyard that produces rotten grapes needs to be abandoned. The final verse of the song explicitly connects the vineyard with the people of Judah: they have replaced judgment with bloodshed, and justice with the outcry of the wounded.

The six announcements of judgment that follow this allegory spell out various forms of injustice in Judah. These oracles are marked by the opening expression “Ah!” or “Woe!” and represent a type of prophetic speech known as “woe oracles” (Is 5:8–25). This series of oracles begins by targeting powerful landowners who seize the land of others, and continues by condemning the self-indulgent who are blind to the activity or “work” of God around them (Is 5:8–17). In Isaiah 5:18–19 the accusations cut deeper. Woe is nearing for those who are harnessed to guilt and sin, who do not simply ignore but taunt the work and plan (counsel) of the Holy One of Israel. Just as doomed are those who cannot discern the most basic distinctions, but who call evil, good, change darkness to light and bitter to sweet, and are wise from their own perspective (Is 5:20–21). In a few words Isaiah creates a portrait of solipsistic ignorance that shuts out the wisdom not simply of others but of the Holy One of Israel who is exalted above all human powers (Is 2:6–22). Again, a failure of perception and knowledge is at the heart of the people’s enthrallment to wrongdoing. The final announcement of judgment states: “they have rejected the instruction (torah) of the LORD of hosts, and scorned the word of the Holy One of Israel” (Is 5:24).

The six woe oracles of Isaiah 5:8–25 form part of a larger structure that brackets the account of the commissioning of Isaiah as a prophet, his mission to King Ahaz and its failure, and the divine promise of a just king to come (Is 9). In Isaiah 10:1–4 a seventh woe oracle, indicting those who pervert justice and prey on the helpless, is uttered with a closing verse that echoes 5:25: “For all this, his wrath is not turned back, his hand is still outstretched.”

The question of why Isaiah’s call as a prophet in Isaiah 6 does not occur earlier in the book is often raised. In its current placement Isaiah’s vision of God is given a context in the warnings of woe that surround it, heightening the impact of his commission to bring the divine word to a resistant people.

Isaiah speaks in the first person of his encounter with God in the temple, relating its details with personal and dramatic force. He sees, as if in a vision, God sitting on a high throne above the temple, surrounded by heavenly attendants (the seraphim). The exalted position of God reflects the biblical tradition of God's heavenly throne and dwelling place on Mount Zion as directly connected with the temple, the earthly dwelling place of God (Ps 84; 1 Kgs 8:12–13, 27). All of Isaiah's senses are engaged as he not only sees the divine throne but hears the seraphim cry out "Holy, holy, holy," senses the frame of the temple shake, and smells smoke rising. All these phenomena signal the earthly reality of the divine presence, which has perceptible force (cf. Ex 19:16–20; Pss 18:7–16; 29:3–9). In this holy presence, Isaiah recognizes his own limits: he is a "man of unclean lips, living among a people of unclean lips," inherently flawed in relation to the transcendent divine king and thus doomed (Is 6:5; cf. Lk 5:1–11).

The prophet's cry of inadequacy is given meaning by the preceding woe oracles of Isaiah 5, which depict a people who scorn the reality of the LORD's work and plan with their lips. Isaiah is transformed when one of the seraphim touches his mouth with a burning coal, presumably from the incense altar that stands in front of the inner room of the temple (holy of holies) where the glory, or presence, of the LORD rests above the ark (Ex 25:21–22). He then joins the assembly of heavenly attendants, volunteering as one of them to bring God's word to the people from whom he has now been set apart.

The apparent impossibility of this task is brought out in his commission, one of the passages most frequently cited from Isaiah in the New Testament (Mt 13:14–15; Mk 4:12; Jn 12:40; Acts 28:26–27). God's directive to Isaiah in 6:9–10 indicates that from the start the prophet's words will fall on deaf ears, failing to open the eyes and alter the hearts (discernment or will) of the people. Isaiah will instead only intensify their resistance to divine communication. If they could see, hear, and discern outside of their own ingrained habits and points of view, they could choose a direct route to healing by turning to the LORD. But the perception of this people is distorted and self-enclosed, and they will find the word Isaiah brings them from the heavenly realm incomprehensible (cf. Is 28:11–12; 29:11–12).

Isaiah's question, "How long, O Lord?" (Is 6:11) points to the longer route to human transformation. The LORD's responses, "Until the cities are desolate, without inhabitants" and "Until the LORD sends the people far away” (Is 6:11–12), evoke both the Assyrian devastation of Judah and the later, definitive Babylonian devastation. They portend the kind of searing, divinely initiated change that Isaiah himself has undergone (and that is suggested by the metaphor of the refining of silver in Is 1:25). Here the prophet becomes a model for the people, first in having been touched directly by the presence of God and set apart from his former state of life, and then in his trust in the long timeline of his mission.

Isaiah 7–9

The futility of the prophetic mission in the short term is illustrated in the third-person narrative of Isaiah’s meeting with King Ahaz in Isaiah 7. Against the fear aroused by the invasion of Judah by the kings of Aram (Syria) and the Northern Kingdom of Israel, the divine word commands: “do not fear” (Is 7:4). From the divine perspective the current crisis will not last but resolve itself completely within the lifetimes of the two invading kings (sixty-five years). At that time, Ephraim, the Northern Kingdom, will no longer exist (Is 7:9). That Ahaz cannot comprehend or accept this divine timeline as a plan of action is apparent in his immediate rejection of Isaiah’s offer of a sign from the LORD. A sign offers a means of visualizing the divine promise, but to ask for one, Ahaz protests, would be to test or tempt the LORD. His refusal implies either that divine help is unnecessary or that Isaiah’s prophetic message is bogus.

The sign of Emmanuel is well known to Christians through its citation in the Gospel of Matthew, where it shows the birth of Jesus to be the fulfillment of a long-term divine plan of salvation (Mt 1:21–23). In the context of Isaiah 7:14–16, the sign is not simply about the birth of the child and its name “Emmanuel” (“God is with us”) but about the child’s age, as a measure of time. By the time the child has reached the age of discernment, “the land of those two kings whom you dread shall be deserted” (Is 7:16). In other words, Ahaz can look for relief from the crisis presently seizing Judah within an even shorter timeline. The birth of Emmanuel is a sign of deliverance from enemy kings in the short term, a foretaste of divine deliverance from future threats, and, in the Christian tradition, a prefiguration of the deliverance from sin and death represented in the birth of Christ.

The sign of the birth of a child in 7:14 is often associated with the hymn-like prophecy of the advent of a Davidic king in 9:1–6: “For a child is born to us, a son is given to us” (Is 9:5). The titles given this king—wonder-counselor, god-hero, father-forever, prince of peace—portray a human ruler who shares in the wisdom, steadfastness, and peace-making capacity of the God whose zeal will bring about his ascent to the throne. His kingdom will be founded in justice and lasting peace. The images of this hymn convey, as the Emmanuel sign does, the sense of changes ultimately beyond human control that must be simply awaited: dawn, harvest, victory in battle, and birth (Is 9:1–5; cf. Mt 4:14–16).

The question of whether the child of the Emmanuel sign has a specific identity within the frame of the book of Isaiah itself has been much discussed over the centuries. Taking into account the royal hymn in Isaiah 9 and the narrative of Isaiah’s mission to King Hezekiah in Isaiah 36–39, many have taken both the sign and the hymn as referring to Hezekiah, the son who succeeds his royal father, Ahaz. As king, Hezekiah turns to God and to God’s prophet for counsel, remains steadfast during a severe threat to Jerusalem, and becomes an instrument of peace and safety for his people. His reign demonstrates the meaning of the sign: “God is with us” (cf. 2 Kgs 18:7). Yet the language of Isaiah 7:14–16 and 9:1–6, like prophetic language generally, is implicit rather than explicit, inviting adaptations and interpretations that go beyond the immediate setting of the book.

Isaiah 10–12

The prophecy of a “shoot” of Davidic lineage from the house of Jesse (David’s father) in Isaiah 11:1–9 forms a parallel with the messianic hymn of 9:1–6. This foretelling of a divinely endowed leader follows a series of judgments against Assyria for its assumptions of omnipotence (Is 10:5–11). The new Davidic leader is depicted in a very different light. He is imbued with the spirit of God and hence with divine wisdom, which includes counsel, strength, knowledge, and the fear of (reverence for) the LORD, with which all wisdom begins (Prv 1:7). The result will be not simply a just and peaceful kingdom but a new creation, in which even natural predators no longer inflict harm, and the earth is filled with the knowledge of God (Is 11:6–9; cf. 2:4; Gn 1:29–30). Although Isaiah 9:1–6 uses the royal language of “prince,” “throne,” and “kingdom,” the nature of Davidic leadership in 11:1–9 is less defined. It is more akin to depictions of spirit-endowed leadership that show a prophetic dimension in later sections of Isaiah (Is 42:1; 61:1).

The promise of a Davidic leader with transformative power in 11:1–9 is followed by an oracle of a future time (“on that day”) when this leader, “the root of Jesse,” will serve as a signal for peoples and nations to seek him out in Jerusalem (Is 11:10). This prospect adapts, with a royal twist, the pilgrimage motif introduced in Isaiah 2:1–4, at the beginning of First Isaiah. In an additional oracle, God speaks of signaling the return of all the people of Israel and Judah scattered through many nations by the Assyrians (Is 11:11–12; cf. Is 27:12–13; 43:5–6; 49:12, 22–23; 66:16–18). They will return along a highway, as they once returned from the land of Egypt (Is 11:16; cf. Is 35:8; 49:11; 45:16–19; 62:10).

The first section of Isaiah 1–39 ends in Isaiah 12, another hymn-like thanksgiving, which begins by acknowledging God’s salvation three times (Is 12:2–3). The closing verse assures Zion, in an echo of the Emmanuel sign, that “great in your midst is the Holy One of Israel!” (Is 12:6).

Isaiah 13–27

Isaiah 13–23

A series of oracles of judgment aimed largely against foreign nations known to Israel and Judah is a standard feature of the major prophetic books (cf. Jer 46–51 and Ez 25–32) and notable as well in Amos 1–2. Such oracles play multiple roles and are developed differently in different prophetic contexts. Across the board they demonstrate the LORD’s sovereignty over all peoples as well as the solidity of divine rule, as opposed to the rise and fall of earthly kingdoms. Isaiah’s oracle against Assyria articulates this divine sovereignty in terms of the LORD’s plan: “This is the plan proposed for the whole earth, and this the hand outstretched over all the nations / The LORD of hosts has planned; who can thwart him?” (Is 14:26–27).

The accusations against foreign nations in these oracles are often phrased in terms that echo prophetic indictments of Israel and Judah for their misplaced pride in human actions, strength, and wisdom (Is 19:11–15). Isaiah’s oracles against the nations, like those in Amos 1–2, also incorporate oracles of judgment against Israel (Is 17:4–14) and Judah (Is 22). Beyond strict judgment there is drama and pathos in these poems of human catastrophe, eliciting sympathy for the victims of human overconfidence. The oracle against Moab, for example, appeals to Judah and the Davidic throne for compassion on the scattered Moabites (Is 16:1–5).

Some passages attached to the oracles in Isaiah 13–23 imply that an aim of the upset of a foreign nation is to restore the people of Israel to their land (Is 14:1–2). Others reflect the motif of the worship of the LORD by foreign peoples, echoing again the vision in 2:1–4 (Is 17:7–8; cf. 18:7; 19:18–25).

Isaiah's oracles begin with a vision of the destruction of Babylon (Is 13:1–22) and a taunt directed at its king (Is 14:3–21). Babylon is a major target of divine judgment, as a third oracle of Babylon's fall is given in Isaiah 21 (Is 21:1–10; cf. Jer 50–51). The eventual downfall of Babylon receives eschatological weight in the first oracle: the stars and constellations will emit no light, the sun and moon will go dark (Is 13:10). The short oracle of restoration for the house of Israel that follows indicates the profound significance of the defeat of Babylon as the beginning of a new age (Is 14:1–2). The highlighting of Babylon in First Isaiah's collection of oracles points to the future heralded in Second Isaiah, and in fact the anti-Babylonian oracles were probably composed in the Babylonian, rather than the Assyrian, era.

This focus on Babylon's fall is balanced by the central oracles against Egypt and Ethiopia in Isaiah 18–19, which contrast the prowess and wisdom of Egypt as a world power with what God has planned for them (Is 19:1–2, 11–13). Since the people of Judah looked to Egypt to undermine both Assyrian and Babylonian domination, these oracles challenge the wisdom of Judah as well. The oracles against Egypt are supported in Isaiah 20 by the short narrative of Isaiah's symbolic act of walking naked through the streets of Jerusalem to symbolize that Egyptians and Ethiopians would be led away as captives by the Assyrians.

Isaiah 24–27

The oracles against particular nations in Isaiah 13–23 culminate in Isaiah 24–27 in a view of universal judgment that will bring all the “children of Israel” home to “worship the LORD on the holy mountain, in Jerusalem” (Is 27:12–13; cf. 11:11–16). In this section the naming of nations to be judged (including Judah) gives way to broad designations like “the city of chaos,” “the fortified city,” “the castle of the insolent,” “the high-walled fortress,” “the lofty city” as well as to mythic language: “Leviathan, the fleeing serpent,” “Leviathan the coiled serpent,” “the dragon in the sea” (Is 27:1). All these epithets suggest archetypal human phenomena, encountered in every nation and people.

The coming judgment is similarly drawn in global and cosmic terms. Terror will overwhelm the “inhabitant of the earth” (Is 24:17) as the earth itself breaks apart and God reckons with both the host of the heavens, or heavenly armies, and the “kings of the earth” (Is 24:21). The final outcome will be universal recognition of the majesty of the God of Israel, who will “reign on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem” (Is 24:23). As the site of God’s reign, Jerusalem will be a “strong city” and “righteous nation” (Is 26:1–2) in contrast to the “lofty city” that God brings down to the ground (Is 26:5). Now the divine exhortation is to sing of a “pleasant vineyard,” tended and protected by God (Is 27:2–5; cf. Is 5:1–7) and cleared of the stones of idolatrous altars (Is 27:9).

The prospect of the return of the scattered people of Israel and Judah to worship God on “the holy mountain” (Is 27:12–13) is similarly given universal overtones as part of God’s “wonderful plans of old” (Is 25:1). The divine act of turning the “fortified city” into ruins so as to protect the poor and weak will bring strong and powerful nations to honor and fear God (Is 25:2–3). Thereafter God will lavishly nourish all peoples, destroying the universal pall of sorrow and death, and wiping away tears “from all faces” (Is 25:6–8). That God will do these things “on this mountain” (Is 25:6, 7), however, indicates the continued centrality of Jerusalem as the site of God’s rule (cf. Is 24:23).

The imagery of cosmic transformation in Isaiah 24–27 lies behind its traditional title, the “Isaiah Apocalypse,” even though these chapters do not place the heavenly realms and heavenly agents in the foreground, as does, for example, Daniel 7–12. Isaiah 24–27 probably dates from the Persian period, later than other parts of the book of Isaiah, but centuries before the book of Daniel.

The oracles of judgment and salvation in Isaiah 24–27 draw on cosmic language and eschatological imagery to convey the import of the LORD’s plan for Jerusalem as the center of a new world. Within this frame of reference, verses that speak of the destruction of death and the rising of the dead (Is 25:7–9; 26:19) point to the possibility of new life and hope under the LORD's just reign: "You have increased the nation, LORD, you have increased the nation" (Is 26:15; cf. Is 25:9). Many psalms speak figuratively, in a similar way, of the LORD bringing the life of the psalmist through or up from a place of death: the valley of the shadow of death in Psalm 23:4 and the underworld (Sheol) in Psalms 30:4; 116:8–9. In Isaiah 25 the deliverance of God's people from shame and the threat of extinction signals hope to all peoples: "On this mountain he will destroy the veil that veils all peoples / The web that is woven over all nations / He will destroy death forever" (Is 25:7). At the same time, Isaiah's affirmations of God's power over death here can be viewed as part of a longer tradition of revelation and belief.

Isaiah 28–35

Isaiah 28–33

In these chapters the prophetic lens refocuses on Judah, with a preliminary look at the sorry model of Ephraim (the Northern Kingdom) in Isaiah 28:1–4. Six extensive woe oracles, five of them ending with expressions of promise for the future, loosely structure this unit. The sixth woe in 33:1–13 is directed at an unnamed "destroyer" and "betrayers." This language echoes that of the oracle against Babylon in 21:2, but identification is left open, as in Isaiah 24–27. The reference to dread targeting those who are sinners and impious in Zion in 33:14 creates a sense of discriminating ethical judgment that is reminiscent of Isaiah 56–66, the last section of the book (cf. Is 31:2; 59:1–2; 65:8–26; cf. 1:27–28). The six woes form a parallel to the six woe oracles against Judah in Isaiah 5:8–25 but incorporate visions of a new, divinely initiated reality.

The motifs of divine wisdom and human foolishness and blindness recur in Isaiah 28–33. The leaders of Judah, like those of Ephraim, are compared to drunkards with blurred vision and confused judgment who make a "covenant with death," ensuring their own destruction (Is 28:7–8, 15; cf. 5:11–12, 22). The people, too, seek deceptive visions rather the truth from their prophets and want to hear nothing of "the Holy One of Israel" (Is 30:10–11). With their leaders, for example, they are eager to seek protection from Egypt and its armies, to embark, in God's words, on a "plan that is not mine" (Is 30:1). They refuse "to listen to the instruction (torah) of the LORD” (Is 30:9) and seem to forget that the “Holy One of Israel” is also “wise and will bring disaster” and that “the Egyptians are human beings, not God, their horses flesh, not spirit” (Is 31:1–3). The setting of these last two oracles is open, as Egyptian help was sought by Judah during both the Assyrian and Babylonian invasions. The language further conveys a broad outlook: “He will rise up against the house of the wicked and against those who help evildoers” (Is 31:2).

The LORD’s wisdom and plan is evident in the parable of the farmer in Isaiah 28:23–29. Taught by God, the farmer knows how to produce a harvest through plowing and sowing as well as through threshing and crushing to remove the grain from its husk. The life-giving, life-changing capacity of divine wisdom is conveyed in the salvation oracle of 29:17–24: “On that day the deaf shall hear the words of a scroll / And out of gloom and darkness, the eyes of the blind shall see” (Is 29:18). Thus “those who err in spirit shall acquire understanding, those who find fault shall receive instruction” (Is 29:24).

What stands out in these chapters is the language of wonder and surprise in God’s activity: “For the LORD shall rise up as on Mount Perazim, bestir himself as in the Valley of Gibeon / To carry out his work—strange his work! to perform his deed—alien his deed!” (Is 28:21). As in demonstrations of divine power in the battles against the Philistines at Gibeon (2 Sm 5:19–20, 25), so, God declares, “I will again deal with this people in surprising and wondrous fashion: / The wisdom of the wise shall perish, the prudence of the prudent shall vanish” (Is 29:14).

The surprise factor in divine activity accords with the image of God as raised above human creatures (Is 28:21; 33:5, 10). From on high the spirit will pour down, effecting what is beyond human reach: turning the wilderness into a garden land of abiding justice, a “peaceful country” where those who have undergone devastation may dwell “in secure dwellings and quiet resting places” (Is 32:15–18). The last in the sequence of six woe oracles is followed by sublime images of the serenity of Zion under the just kingship of God: “Indeed the LORD in majesty will be there for us, a place of rivers and wide streams” (Is 33:21–22).

Isaiah 34–35

A final pair of oracles concludes the main block of prophetic speech in Isaiah 1–39 and at the same time points ahead to Isaiah 40–55, forming the beginning of a long dovetail with the second and third parts of the book of Isaiah. These chapters were probably composed in the Babylonian period. Isaiah 34 is a judgment oracle against the nation of Edom, and Isaiah 35 speaks of the return of the “ransomed of the LORD” to Zion along a highway or holy way in the wilderness (Is 35:8–10; 11:16). Both oracles evoke the time of exile and the return of the exiles to Jerusalem reflected in Isaiah 40–55. Edom is singled out for judgment in Isaiah 63:1–6 and elsewhere in the prophetic corpus (Ob; Ez 35; cf. Am 9:12) as well as in Lamentations (Lam 4:21–22) and the Psalms (Pss 60:11; 108:11; 137:7). Edom’s prominence as an object of judgment reflects the appropriation of land in southern Judah by Edomites at the time of the Babylonian conquest and their continued possession of this land after the return of the exiles. In Isaiah 34 the LORD’s action against Edom is posed as “a day of vengeance, a year of requital for the cause of Zion” (Is 34:8).

In direct contrast to the stark scenario of Edom’s cultivated land reverting to a wilderness rife with wild animals and demons (Is 34:13–15) stands the image of the blooming desert through which the LORD’s people will walk in Isaiah 35. Here the language directly echoes Isaiah 40–55, for example in the motifs of the highway in the wilderness (cf. Is 35:8 and 40:3) and the return of God to save (cf. Is 35:4 and 40:10–11). Isaiah 35 also follows the lines of the transformation of God’s people promised in 29:18–19: the blind will see, the deaf hear, the lame leap, and the mute sing, returning to Zion with undisturbed joy and gladness (Is 35:5–6, 10). Such portrayals of fruitfulness and healing in prophetic speech frequently signal the revival of divine favor and a new age of well being after the enactment of judgment.

In keeping with these associations, the portrayal of judgment against Edom in Isaiah 34 carries eschatological overtones. It begins with the LORD’s anger against all the foreign nations and a grim view of mass extinction (Is 34:1–3). This entails the rolling up of the heavens like a scroll and the withering of “all their host,” presumably in preparation for new heavens (Is 34:4). Then God will descend upon Edom to bring upon it the kind of total chaos and confusion that defines the pre-creation state of the cosmos (Is 34:10–11; cf. Gn 1:2). This landscape of desolation and waste, uninhabitable by humans, precedes the flowering of the wilderness in Isaiah 35, the sign of a new creative force.

The language of Isaiah 34 resembles that used in Isaiah 63:1–6, where the LORD executes justice in Edom prior to raising the expectation of a new heavens and new earth (Is 65:17–25). In both passages Edom stands as a symbol of harm inflicted on Zion from close quarters and the divine reordering that leads to a new creation, with Zion, the holy mountain of God, at its center (Is 35:10; 65:25).

Isaiah 36–39

These last chapters round out Isaiah 1–39 by grounding its prophetic oracles in the narrative account of a Davidic king, Hezekiah, who works both with God and prophet to save Jerusalem from harm. Clear parallels are drawn between the portraits of Hezekiah here and of Ahaz in Isaiah 7. Isaiah meets Ahaz at the “conduit of the upper pool” outside the city (Is 7:3), which is where the Assyrian general meets the envoys of King Hezekiah (Is 36:2). Divine signs conveying hope are offered to both kings. Although Ahaz refuses his (Is 7:14–16), Hezekiah asks for one (Is 38:21).

Despite these parallels, Isaiah 36–37 is distinctive as an extended block of third-person narrative that largely matches the account of Hezekiah in 2 Kings 18–20. It is generally assumed that the compilers of Isaiah 1–39 took over and modified the narrative in 2 Kings to heighten the heroic stance of Hezekiah. Left out in Isaiah, for example, is any parallel to 2 Kings 18:14–16, which reports negotiations between Hezekiah and the Assyrian king. The story of Hezekiah’s illness in Isaiah 38 is expanded to include the king’s prayer of thanksgiving to the LORD for his recovery (Is 38:9–20; cf. 2 Kgs 20:1–11).

Notable in both Isaiah 36 and 2 Kings 18 is the opening stand-off between King Sennacherib’s general and the envoys of King Hezekiah, which conveys the strong pull of imperial ideology on smaller nations. Inscriptions on Assyrian monuments reveal similar expressions of self-aggrandizement by Assyrian kings, such as “the strong one among the great gods,” “king of the universe,” “wonderful shepherd.” The barrage of taunts fired off by Sennacherib’s general against Judah and its understanding of God serve to amplify the courage of Hezekiah. In his prayer he addresses God as the reigning king: “LORD of hosts, God of Israel, enthroned on the cherubim / You alone are God over all the kingdoms of the earth / It is you who made the heavens and the earth” (37:16). In fact, Judah was brought to its knees by Sennacherib, an event that seems to be recognized in Isaiah 1 (Is 1:7–9). The account in Isaiah 36–37, however, disregards the destruction, to focus only on the miraculous deliverance of Jerusalem.

Isaiah 39, the last segment of the Hezekiah narrative, shows the king in a somewhat different light, entertaining ambassadors from the king of Babylon. He is at pains to impress them with the riches of his kingdom, but Isaiah warns him that the status he now enjoys is temporary. After his lifetime the royal treasures will be plundered by Babylon, and his royal descendants made to serve its king. This short scene provides a direct bridge to the exilic prophecies of Isaiah 40–55, which presume that the prophet’s warning has come to pass.

The final cautionary note in Isaiah 39 does not undermine the witness of Isaiah 1–39 as a whole to the salvific power of God reaching outwards from Judah and Jerusalem through the just reign of a Davidic king. Rather, the account in Isaiah 38 of Hezekiah’s illness, his prayer to God, Isaiah’s prophetic assurance, and the final healing and thanksgiving of the king can be read as a sign of the forward thrust of this first major part of the book of Isaiah. In the words of Hezekiah’s prayer of thanksgiving: “The LORD is there to save us, we shall play our music / In the house of the LORD, all the days of our life” (Is 38:20).

PART II: ISAIAH 40–55 (SECOND ISAIAH)

The prophetic speeches collected in this second major part of Isaiah pick up the theme of salvation following upon judgment displayed in Isaiah 1–39. Rather than looking ahead to judgment, however, Isaiah 40–55 looks ahead to an imminent release from a punitive term of exile in Babylon. The first two parts of the book of Isaiah also differ in their perspective on the reception of the prophetic word. In First Isaiah the prophet is briefed that his words will be incomprehensible to a people whose eyes, ears, and hearts are closed. Isaiah’s warnings of catastrophe nonetheless materialized in the Assyrian invasion of Judah and the later destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. The exilic audience presumed in Isaiah 40–55, or at least some of them, are in a position to see reality from, literally, a new place. The confident yet intimate tone of Isaiah 40–55 suggests the possibility of engagement with the divine word. These chapters are filled with direct addresses to the exiles, rhetorical questions, diatribe, and encouragement.

The prophetic voice of Second Isaiah aims to persuade the exiles that the justice of God works in two ways: to call an end to what is wrong, and to realign what has become skewed. The exiles are the remnant of Israel, whom God now calls out of servitude in Babylon to serve the divine presence by making it known to all (Is 40:3–5; 43:10–12). Second Isaiah appeals to this community to be God’s servants. Israel is to serve as a “light for the nations,” opening the eyes of the blind and releasing those imprisoned in darkness (Is 42:6–7). God’s people are still blind and deaf servants of limited perception (Is 42:18–20; 43:8; 50:11), but there is hope that they may listen and be led out of captivity to witness to God’s saving power (Is 43:10–11). Second Isaiah ends by anticipating the fruition of God’s promises: “So shall my word be that goes forth from my mouth; / It shall not return to me empty, but shall do what pleases me, achieving the end for which I sent it” (Is 55:11).

Historical Setting

The prophetic speeches of Isaiah 40–55 are set late in the period of the Babylonian Exile, and were presumably written at that time. The prophetic voice heralds an end to Babylon’s supremacy (Is 43:14; 47:1; 48:14) and urges the Judahite exiles, “Go forth from Babylon, flee from Chaldea!” (Is 48:20). Cyrus, the ruler of Persia, a kingdom east of Babylon, is named as God's "anointed," or royal agent (Is 45:1). Cyrus conquered the kingdom of the Medes to the north of Persia in 550. He continued to expand his dominion westward, subjecting territories once dominated by the Babylonians to his rule and, in 339, capturing the city of Babylon. Once firmly in power, Cyrus issued a widely distributed decree permitting exiled peoples living in the region of Babylon to return to their native lands to rebuild their sacred cities and shrines. He is referred to in Second Isaiah as a "champion of justice" and the LORD's "attendant" (Is 41:2), the LORD's "shepherd," who carries out the divine will to rebuild the Jerusalem temple (Is 44:28).

It should be understood that the Judahites and other exiled groups were most likely settled in Babylon on vacated land, which they worked as tenant farmers. In the letter of Jeremiah to the first group of exiles, he sends them divine instructions to build houses, plant gardens, marry, and even pray for the welfare of the city on which they were now dependent (Jer 29:4–7). Second Isaiah's call to the exiles almost a generation later to leave their lives in Babylon and return to a city and land in ruins may have seemed less than appealing. The lyric praise and bold claims about what God can do in the speeches of Isaiah 40–55 are directed toward illuminating this leap in the dark. The question posed in Is 50:10 hits the mark: "Who among you fears the LORD, heeds his servant's voice? / Whoever walk in darkness, without any light, / Yet trust in the name of the LORD, and rely upon their God!"

Literary Structure

Isaiah 40–55 can be divided into two major sections:

Isaiah 40–48: The Good News of the Return to Zion and the Call to Servanthood

Isaiah 49–55: The Response of the Community and the Prophetic Servant

Four prophetic poems, forming a sequence known as the "servant songs," are interspersed among these chapters, one in the first half and three in the second half (Is 42:1–9; 49:1–7; 50:4–11; and 52:13–53:12). These poems have been considered a separate prophetic collection, later integrated with the larger body of prophetic speeches. Each song is distinct, although the term "servant" and the motif of a divinely assigned mission links all four.

The emphasis in Isaiah 40–48 on the exiled remnant of Israel as the LORD’s servant suggests a communal interpretation of the servant in 42:1–9. The three servant songs in Isaiah 49–55 employ language evoking an individual prophetic figure. This is especially noticeable in the last song, in which the main speaker is a member of a community who has witnessed the servant’s life and death.

Isaiah 40:1–11

Isaiah 40:1–11 serves as a prologue to Isaiah 40–55. It strikes a chord of assurance and deliverance but with multiple tones that are developed in the chapters that follow. The divine command in Isaiah 40:1 is, literally, “Comfort, give comfort to my people, says your God.” Jerusalem’s term of distress is at an end and its guilt made good, for it has paid the required restitution for its failures and wrongdoing. In biblical law “double” represents the traditional repayment for damages inflicted (Ex 22:6–8), and it communicates here the evenhanded justice of God.

The command to comfort is, in Hebrew, a plural command addressed to a group, as is the following mandate to prepare the way of the LORD in the wilderness. The recipients of this divine command would seem most naturally to be “my people,” the exilic community, who are called to take on their own prophetic mission of bringing hope for Jerusalem. They are to prepare a pilgrim’s road, or highway for God in their own journey home to Zion (Is 11:16; 35:8). Jerusalem, in turn will serve as a herald to the “cities of Judah” (Is 40:9), announcing the reappearance of God as king in the land: ruling in power, distributing benefits, and, like a shepherd, feeding, protecting, and leading (Is 40:10–11).

The return of the LORD to Zion has universal ramifications. As in classic scenes of theophany, the earth will shake and give way, and “all flesh” (humankind) will see together the “glory,” or presence, of the LORD (Is 40:4–5). “All flesh is grass,” but the word of God stands above and apart from the rise and fall of human fortunes (Is 40:6–8) and can be proclaimed with surety. God’s promises of renewal and deliverance for Jerusalem hold true even in the face of the city’s destruction.

The elements of belief in a new stage in the life of Israel are presented in the first half of the book. The prophetic speaker begins by mounting a series of claims about God that lead up to the key divine announcement: the redemption of the Israelites out of servitude (Is 40:2) into servanthood (Is 41:8). The rhetorical questions and other forms of direct address to the implied audience that punctuate these speeches create the persona of a prophetic orator, straining to open the eyes of the exiles to new perspectives on God's kingship.

The first prophetic claim is that God's wisdom and power are unequalled because God alone is creator of heavens and earth. Who else could hold and measure in a hand the skies, earth, and mountains (Is 40:12)? In forming the world, "who has directed the spirit of the LORD, or instructed him as his counselor? / Whom did he consult to gain knowledge? Who taught him the path of judgment, or showed him the way of understanding?" (Is 40:13–14). It is absurd even to imagine the nations, or any collective human endeavor, matching God's cosmic design: "Before him all the nations are as nought" (Is 40:17). It is equally absurd to compare God to idols, which are crafted by human beings (Is 40:17–18).

The presentation of God as creator and sole deity, reducing other gods to lifeless statues, is pronounced in Isaiah 40–55 and can be summed up in the claim, "I, the LORD, am the first, and at the last I am he" (Is 41:4; 44:6; 48:12–13; cf. 42:5, 8; 43:10–11; 45:5–6, 22). In the Babylonian setting of Second Isaiah, the repeated statements of God's sole command over creation can be heard as a comment on the Babylonian pantheon, especially its creator deity Marduk, the patron god of the city of Babylon.

Connected with the claim of God's acuity and skill in creation is the assertion of the divine power over human empires: they, too, are shaped by God's creative work. The God who stretches out the heavens also "plants" the rulers of the earth, then "breathes" on them when their time is finished, so that they wither and are carried away by the wind (Is 40:22–24; cf. 40:7). Second Isaiah's climactic claim about God is that the defeat of Babylon by Cyrus is a manifestation of God's creative activity in history: "Who has stirred up from the East the champion of justice, and summoned him to be his attendant? / To him he delivers nations and subdues kings" (Is 41:2). This rhetorical question is directed to all the nations, as far as the coastlands (Is 41:1). All peoples and nations must see the hand of God in the unexpected rise to power of this young king from an outlying region.

On the basis of these premises, God calls out the exilic remnant of Israel: “But you, Israel, my servant, Jacob whom I have chosen, offspring of Abraham my friend” (Is 41:8). The primary role of Israel as servant is to witness to the reality of the LORD’s word and work: “You are my witnesses—oracle of the LORD—my servant whom I have chosen / To know and believe in me and understand that I am he / Before me no god was formed, and after me there shall be none / I, I am the LORD; there is no savior but me” (Is 43:10–11). The exiles will witness to God’s saving power by believing that what they are seeing in the victories of Cyrus is God’s creative work and, on the strength of that belief, returning to Jerusalem. As they once walked through the sea on dry land in the exodus from Egypt, they will now journey through a dry desert watered by rivers (Is 43:19–20).

To build credence in God’s summons to the exiles, the language of a divine plan associated with the LORD’s work heard in Isaiah 1–39 reappears in Isaiah 40–55. Concerning the rise of Cyrus, God assures: “At the beginning I declare the outcome; from of old, things not yet done, / I say that my plan shall stand, I accomplish my every desire. I summon from the east a bird of prey, from a distant land, one to carry out my plan” (Is 46:10–11). The divine plan is to rebuild Jerusalem for the purpose of showing God’s salvation and glory within it (Is 44:26; 46:11–13).

God’s purposes thus extend through the people of Israel to the wider world. God speaks of Jacob/Israel as “The people whom I formed for myself, that they might recount my praise” (Is 43:21). In the proclamation of Isaiah 40–55, the fading of Babylon’s strength opens a window for praise of God to reach the ends of the earth and transform it. Thus the mission of the servant people in the first servant song is to be “a light for the nations” (42:6). This mission is fulfilled in the LORD’s oath: “To me every knee shall bend; by me every tongue shall swear / Saying, ‘Only in the LORD are just deeds and power’ ” (Is 45:23–24).

Isaiah 49–55

The tone of the second half of Isaiah 40–55 is both more sober and more intimate than that of the first half, as God appeals to “my people” to respond to the promise of a new life. The last three of the four servant songs link this section together. All of them evoke an individual figure whom the LORD has in some way formed to bring Israel, identified with the exilic community, back to God (Is 49:5). The second and third songs are spoken in the first person as if by the prophet; in the fourth song the speaker is a member of the community who observes the servant.

The second servant song (Is 49:1–7) opens Isaiah 49–55, beginning with images of a prophetic call from birth and the sharpening of the prophet’s mouth (Is 49:2). The song suggests a link between this prophetic figure and Israel as servant: “He said to me, You are my servant, in you, Israel, I show my glory” (Is 49:3). Yet the prophet’s first task is to “raise up the tribes of Jacob, and restore the survivors of Israel” (Is 49:6). He is to play an active role in forming the exilic community into the servant God now summons (Is 41:8–9).

That this prophet and his community are not always in unison is made clear in the third servant song (Is 50:4–11). The prophetic speaker refers to his “well-trained tongue” and his reception of the LORD’s word day after day, but also the resistance he endures. Yet he persists: “My face I did not hide from insults and spitting” (Is 50:6). He retains his trust in the God who is his help (Is 50:7–9; cf. Is 8:16–17). This song and the last reflect the struggle entailed in bringing God’s plan for the salvation of first Israel, and then the nations, to fulfillment.

The Suffering Servant

The fourth and last servant song draws a full picture of the suffering servant and is the origin of this epithet. This song is distinct from the others in that the main speaker is an onlooker, a member of the exilic community who knows the servant and who uses the first-person plural (“we,” “our,” “us”) to speak for the community. The song begins and ends with God’s exaltation of “my servant” (Is 52:13; 53:12), but the speaker of the bulk of the song narrates a change in his own perspective. The servant’s ordinary appearance and burden of suffering led others to dismiss and avoid him (Is 53:2–3). Now, however, the speaker understands that the servant bore pain that the community at large would not: “it was our pain that he bore” (Is 53:4). In the exilic setting of Isaiah 40–55, this pain would seem to include the hardship of exile itself.

In the course of observing the servant’s silent surrender to harsh treatment and death, the speaker has come to view him differently. The servant has done no wrong himself but has accepted the consequences of the failings of his people: “he was pierced for our sins, crushed for our iniquity” (Is 53:5). The speaker recognizes that the community has fundamentally failed: “We had all gone astray like sheep, all following our own way” (Is 53:6). The underlying metaphor suggests that the community has become divided and scattered. The servant’s assent to suffering, which has fallen on all, repairs the community’s brokenness and heals their relationship with God: “He bore the punishment that makes us whole, by his wounds we were healed” (Is 53:5).

The comparison of the servant’s life to a “reparation offering” (Is 53:10) introduces another metaphor. This type of sacrifice was offered to God by individuals to atone for offenses, along with the paying of restitution for harm done (Lv 5:14–15). The servant has given over his life to accepting without complaint what God has “laid upon him,” which is, the speaker now realizes, “the guilt of us all” (Is 53:6).

In giving over his life in this way, the servant carries out the will of the LORD (Is 53:10), and his painful life and death will have significant consequences. He will generate “offspring,” those who follow in his footsteps and keep alive his memory (Is 53:10). Oriented as he is to divine justice, he will make “the many” just (Is 53:11). He will inspire amazement not only in those who have known him but among the nations, leaving even kings speechless (Is 52:14–15).

The Christological resonance of this song is so strong that for many Christians it overwhelms questions about the identity of the suffering servant within the book of Isaiah (cf. Mk 10:45). Is this servant the resolute prophetic speaker of Isaiah 50:4–11 or the prophetic voice of Isaiah 40–55 as a whole? Does he represent an idealized form of the Judean community? Did he experience not only scorn from the exilic community but also torture and death at the hands of the Babylonians, who saw him as subversive (cf. Jer 29:21–22)? Such questions are left open in the song, which is intent on creating the model of a servant of God whose life and death transform the lives of those who know or know of him. His example brings others to recognize their failings and sets them right (makes them just). He thus generates offspring, or new generations of servants. Such a group of “servants” is mentioned at the end of the next chapter: “This is the lot of the servants of the LORD, their vindication from me—oracle of the LORD” (Is 54:17).

In Acts 8:32–35 the model of the suffering servant takes on flesh when, in answering the question of the Ethiopian eunuch about Isaiah 53:2–8, the apostle Philip tells him about the life and death of Jesus. This last servant song is cited or alluded to in all four gospels and at least twelve times throughout the New Testament.

Isaiah 54–55

These chapters conclude Isaiah 40–55 with assurances of God’s tender care (Is 54:1–17) and exhortations to the community to seek what the LORD offers (Is 55:1–9). God’s promises are the lot, or inheritance, of “the servants of the LORD” (Is 54:17), who can look forward to becoming a community taught by the LORD, at peace, grounded in and protected by justice (Is 54:13–14). To inherit these promises, however, some action is required. The community must seek and call upon God, which means that the wicked must give up their ways of acting and thinking and look to divine mercy and forgiveness (Is 55:1–3, 6–7).

Isaiah 40–55 ends by echoing the opening affirmation of the durability of the divine word (Is 40:6–8) with an affirmation of its life-giving capacity. God’s word, like rain, is ultimately fruitful in bringing about what the LORD sends it to do (Is 55:10–11). The transformation of nature in the last two verses of Isaiah 55 is a sign of this generative force.

PART III: ISAIAH 56–66 (THIRD ISAIAH)

Isaiah 56–66 reveals the culmination of the LORD's salvific work in Zion: a just community which lives in the light and glory of God and makes Jerusalem a beacon for the world (Is 60:19–22). This work is unfinished, but its completion in the creation of a new heavens and new earth is forecast (Is 65:17–25). The focus on the responsiveness of the community seen in Isaiah 48–55 continues in Isaiah 56–66, but in the context of daily life and practice rather than of a journey to Zion. On the immediate horizon is the rebuilding of ruined cities, including Jerusalem with its walls, and the Temple (Is 58:12; 60:10, 13; 61:4–5). That this is the final stage in a plan long announced is conveyed by the many allusions in these chapters to passages in earlier sections of Isaiah.

The central chapters of Isaiah 56–66 are replete with images of light (Is 60–62). On either side of this core are darker views of the community in its present state (Is 56–59 and 63–65). The wicked still flourish and have created a grim society lacking any measure of justice, loyalty, or honesty, where salvation “is far from us” (Is 59:11). That is why God unilaterally resolves to implement justice in Zion, in the mode of a warrior taking the world by storm (Is 59:16–20). Divine judgment will be experienced as redemption and deliverance by those who have turned away from perverse ways, but as wrath and hostility by those who have set themselves against God (Is 59:18, 20; cf. 1:27–28).

Isaiah 56–66, then, raises a vision of divine intervention in the future that will make everything right: in other words, an eschatological vision. Exhortations in these chapters to abandon wrongdoing and emulate the lowly and contrite of spirit who “tremble” at God's word (Is 57:15; 66:2) are linked to warnings of ultimate judgment. In the present age, the community is divided between forsakers of the LORD and servants of the LORD (Is 65:12–15). Only the servants will rejoice in the new heavens and earth the LORD is creating.

As in Isaiah 40–55, the mission of witness to the divine word of comfort is invested in both the community (Is 59:21), and in an individual, unnamed, prophetic voice (Is 61:1–3). At the end of the book, however, it is God, the eschatological redeemer and parent for whom the faithful long (Is 63:7–64:11), who announces the creation of a new heavens and new earth (Is 65:17; 66:22). The gathering of nations and tongues in Jerusalem to see God's glory and the worship of God by "all flesh" will be the signs of God's reign (Is 66:18–23).

Historical Setting

The prophecies of Isaiah 56–66 are generally situated in Judah after the end of the Babylonian Exile and under Persian rule, and were presumably written at that time. Different passages, however, seem to reflect different periods within this era, from before the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Is 61:4; 64:10) to a time after the completion of the new Temple and the offering of sacrifices and prayer there (Is 56:7; 66:6). A span from the late sixth to the mid-fifth centuries is proposed as a wide time frame for these prophetic writings, which may represent a collection of different voices.

There are correspondences between the situations evoked in Isaiah 56–66 and those described in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, which chronicle the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the later return of the two leaders to Judah in 458 and 445, respectively. Parallels can also be found in the prophetic books of Haggai and Zechariah, which are set in the early reign of the Persian king Darius (522–486) and which encourage the people of Judah to restore the temple in Jerusalem.

These biblical books suggest that the period of restoration in Judah was a time of uncertainty and division within the community. Harvests were meager and taxes paid to the Persian king heavy (Hg 1:5–11; Neh 5:1–4; 9:36–37). Not only was Judah subject to Persian rule, but foreign peoples from adjacent regions had moved in, sometimes marrying into the Israelite community, and bringing with them their own religious and cultural practices. Rifts developed between the more prosperous and the subservient poor (Neh 5; cf. Is 58) and between those who kept up essential religious practices, such as observation of the Sabbath, and those who did not (Neh 13:10–22; Is 57:5–13). In Isaiah 56–66, such divisions weaken the focus of the community on the divine commission to build a new Jerusalem and grow into a holy people (Is 62:12; cf. 60:21).

Literary Structure

Isaiah 56–66 divides into three major sections:

Isaiah 56–59: Exhortations and Oracles of Judgment

Isaiah 60–62: Zion as the City of God

Isaiah 63–66: God as Eschatological Savior

An internal link or dovetail with Isaiah 40–55 has been noted in the repetition of the statement “There is no peace for the wicked, says the LORD” at the end of both Isaiah 48 and 57. This phrase brackets the second half of Isaiah 40–55 (Isaiah 49–55), with its focus on the challenges of transforming the exilic community into God’s servant, with the first two chapters of Isaiah 56–66, in which the reassembled community in Judah is shown to be in need of essential change. The appeal to the wicked to forsake their ways in 55:7 forms a direct bridge from Second to Third Isaiah, since Isaiah 56 begins with an exhortation to do what is just and right and to refrain from wickedness.

Isaiah 56:1–8

The opening verses of Isaiah 56 serve as a prologue, sounding the note of salvation dominant in Isaiah 40–55 but with a distinctive tone: the practice of what is right and just prepares for the LORD’s salvation and justice (Is 56:1). Deliverance is given an ethical cast and entails not simply belief and trust but a reflection of salvation’s inherent relation to justice. Just behavior includes the rubric of avoiding what is evil and harmful and, positively, observing the Sabbath.

That these directives sum up what is essential to salvation is made clear in the rest of the prologue, which builds on the universal mission of Israel revealed in Isaiah 40–55. Foreigners who “join themselves to the LORD” (cf. Ezr 6:21), keep the Sabbath, and embrace the whole covenant with God will be welcome on the LORD’s holy mountain (Is 56:4–7). God’s aim is that “my house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples.” Isaiah 56–66 thus begins with its own vision of Zion as the summit of salvation for all who show themselves worthy to gather there (cf. Is 33:15–16; Pss 15 and 24).

Isaiah 56:9–59:21

The rest of Isaiah 56 gives a dim view of the sentinels, or leaders, of Israel: blind, deluded, and self indulgent. The accusations echo those raised against Judah and its leaders in Isaiah 1–39 (Is 6:9–10; 28:7–15; 29:9–12) and within the exilic community in Isaiah 40–55 (Is 50:11; 53:6). Isaiah 57 presents contrasting sketches of two groups: the just (Is 57:1–2) and the “rebellious children, deceitful offspring” who give themselves over to foreign cults, even to the point of sacrificing their children (Is 57:3–8). Their idols will prove useless to save in a crisis, whereas those who take refuge in the LORD will inherit the land and possess the LORD’s holy mountain (Is 57:13).

The prophetic speaker maps out the road to this inheritance in the language of Is 40:3, but with an emphasis on the people’s, rather than God’s, movement: “Build up, build up, prepare the way, remove every obstacle for my people’s way” (Is 57:14). The extent of God’s solicitude for the people’s progress along this road is revealed in what follows. God is the “high and lofty One” who dwells in a “high and holy place” yet also with the contrite, or crushed, and lowly of spirit (cf. Pss 34:19; 51:19). God revives the spirit of the lowly, knowing that “without me their spirit fails” (Is 57:15–16).

God knows the ways of the people. Even after they experience harsh consequences they continue to turn away from God, “following the way of their own heart” (Is 57:17; cf. 53:6). Despite this discouraging pattern, God declares: “I will heal them. I will lead them and restore full comfort to them, and to those who mourn for them, creating words of comfort” (Is 57:17–18). Some, however, are not receptive to the LORD’s peace: the wicked, continuously self-driven, who cannot be still (Is 57:24).

Supplementing this scenario of divine healing are the directives in Isaiah 58. Here the community is warned to stop being driven by their own pursuits, or interests (Is 58:3, 13). They are to refrain from overworking their laborers, from fighting and quarreling with each other, and from doing business on the Sabbath. On the positive side, they are to share substantively with those in need, seeing them as their own flesh, or kin. This kind of interrelated respect for God and neighbor will bring its own light and healing (Is 58:8, 10).

In these chapters, central to Third Isaiah, the prophetic voice exults in the light dawning on Zion. This light is not connected with a Davidic king, as in Isaiah 9, but with the LORD’s glory (Is 60:1–2, 19–20). The strength of that light shining over Zion will draw all nations and their kings to take their bearings from it (Is 60:3). At the heart of these chapters is the promise of transformation for the people of Zion. Violence, plunder and ruin will be unheard of among them. They, too, will walk by and in the light of the LORD. All will be just, manifesting, unlike the useless vineyard in Is 5:1–7, that they have been planted by the LORD and are the “work of my hands” (Is 60:21).

Playing a role in this transformation is the spirit-anointed messenger who speaks in Isaiah 61. The LORD has sent him to bring good news to the afflicted and despairing and to comfort all who mourn by announcing a new time of favor from the LORD (Is 61:1–2; cf. 40:9; 52:7). He will strengthen the faint spirit of the community, enabling them to grow into the LORD’s planting, that is, “oaks of justice” (Is 61:3; cf. Is 40:29). They can then take on the task of rebuilding what previous generations made desolate, and in this role will be named “priests” or “ministers” of the LORD, set apart for direct service to God (Is 61:4, 6).

The parallel with Exodus 19:6, in which God summons the Israelites as a “kingdom of priests, a holy nation” before making a covenant with them rooted in a just and merciful community suggests a similar pattern here. God declares: “I, the LORD, love justice, I hate robbery and wrongdoing / I will faithfully give them their recompense, an everlasting covenant I will make with them” (Is 61:8–9). Divine justice manifests itself in the deliverance of the Israelites from exile, but justice within the community is implicit in the covenant between this people and the God who loves justice. The prophet’s response gives full expression to the interrelationship of salvation and justice: “I will rejoice heartily in the LORD, my being exalts in my God / For he has clothed me with garments of salvation, and wrapped me in a robe of justice” (Is 61:10; cf. 45:8).

The Gospel of Luke refers to Isaiah 61:1–2 to elucidate the mission of Jesus. In Luke 4:16–21 Jesus reads these verses aloud in the synagogue at Nazareth and then claims: “Today this scripture passage is fulfilled in your hearing.” He identifies with the one anointed by the spirit to bring good news of God’s justice and deliverance to the helpless and faint, but in a new era and a new way.

Isaiah 63–66

The last chapters of Isaiah 56–66 describe the birth pangs of the new Zion. The LORD reappears as a divine warrior en route from Edom (Is 63:1–6), ready to save. In the communal lament (Is 63:7–64:11) the people voice their longing for the LORD’s presence as they recall God’s care and guidance in the Exodus and appeal to God as “our father” (Is 63:16; 64:7). They even blame God for allowing them to wander and hardening their hearts, conveying that God alone can straighten them out: “Oh, that you would rend the heavens and come down, with the mountains quaking before you” (Is 63:19).

In Isaiah 65–66, all is finally in God’s hands. The divine response to the people’s lament is a declaration of eschatological judgment (Is 65:8–16). The image of trampling out the vintage expresses the nature of this judgment, which is not simply punitive, but “for the sake of my servants” (Is 65:8). The LORD’s servants are defined in contrast to forsakers of the LORD, those who “forget my holy mountain” and turn to dubious sources of influence over the future: “Destiny” and “Fortune” (Is 65:11). It is the servants who will possess the land and enjoy peace (Is 65:9; cf. Is 54:17; 57:13). The plural form “servants” recalls the servant of the last servant song, whose suffering justifies the many and produces offspring (Is 53:10–11; cf. 54:17). Following the pattern of God’s exaltation of the suffering servant, the servants, too, will be exalted as the forsakers are subdued. The antiphonal sequence in 63:13–15 reflects comprehensive eschatological reversal (cf. 1 Sm 2:4–10; Lk 1:46–55).

Decisive judgment that differentiates between two groups within the Israelite community, one deserving praise and the other blame, represents a final turn in the arc of salvation sketched out in Isaiah 1. Isaiah 56–66 assures the new community in Judah that a split in the human response to God will persist until the divine hand shapes a new heavens and a new earth for the sake of God’s servants (Is 65:17–25). The full range of issues that divide the community is not clear, but seems to include different attitudes to the rebuilt Temple (Is 66:1).

Absent from the new creation is a spectrum of human miseries, including sickness, premature death, the loss of land and houses, work that comes to nothing, and “sudden destruction” (Is 65:19–23). The removal of these human ills is followed by the restoration of intimate connection with God (Is 65:24). The full picture of lasting human peace is captured in the image of a pristine creative order untroubled by violence or bloodshed: wolf and lamb living side by side, the lion eating grass just as the ox does (Is 65:25; cf. Gn 1:29–30). The location of this pervasive well being “on all my holy mountain” indicates that Jerusalem remains the focal point of the new age. These images of a new order recall those associated with the rule of the Davidic king in Isaiah 11:6–9. They do not reintroduce messianic hope, but they keep alive the hope of a divinely ordered human domain.

The opening verses of Isaiah 66, the last chapter of Isaiah, suggest that human expectations of the LORD’s ways cannot encompass the divine reality: “Thus says the LORD: The heavens are my throne, the earth, my footstool / What house can you build for me? Where is the place of my rest? / My hand made all these things when all of them came to be—oracle of the LORD” (Is 66:1–2; cf. 2 Sm 7:1–7; 1 Kgs 8:27). The one God approves of, wherever found, is “the afflicted one, crushed in spirit, who trembles at my word” (Is 66:2). The word “tremble” conveys not simply terror here but a penetrating consciousness of the life-and-death significance of the divine word, which reveals what is beyond human understanding.

It is to make this word real that the book ends with references to seeing. The servants will see the revelation of God’s hand, or power, and rejoice: “You will see and your heart shall exult, and your bodies flourish like the grass” (Is 66:14). All nations “shall come and see my glory” (Is 66:18). In contrast is the gruesome sight of the corpses of those who have rebelled against the LORD’s work (Is 66:24). This sight witnesses, in its own way, to “all flesh” (Is 66:23). The corpses are dead—there is no mention of resurrection in Isaiah 66. The imagery of everlasting fire and undying worms in this last verse of the book enhances the contrast between those who revere God and participate in the life of the new heavens and new earth, and those who have rebelled against God and do not.

JEREMIAH

see pages [1071–1142 of the Old Testament]

The book of Jeremiah confronts head-on the Babylonian assault on Jerusalem. The final reduction of the city to rubble and the deportation and flight of its inhabitants are presented in Jeremiah as a tragic reversal brought about by the divine hand on a people once beloved of their God. The leveling of Jerusalem to the ground is inevitable because of the people's persistent failings yet not predestined from the beginning. It calls for mourning and remembrance and implies that if memory is preserved and kept alive, these terrible events can serve as a basis for rethinking the relationship between God and people in terms of a "new covenant" (Jer 31:31–34).

The superscription of Jeremiah (Jer 1:1) sets the prophetic word in the time of the last kings of Judah, leading up to the eleventh year of King Zedekiah, the date of Jerusalem's fall (587 BC). The final chapter of the book describes in graphic detail this catastrophe: the breaking down of the outer walls, the burning of the city, and the dismantling of the Temple. Much of what lies between the first and last chapters of Jeremiah draws out the full weight of these events and the questions they raise about divine presence and the inevitability of human tragedy. Such questions yield no simple answers, and in addressing them the book of Jeremiah introduces new forms of prophetic speech.

The prophetic oracles of judgment in the first half of the book (Jer 1–25) are often extended first-person reflections in which God reproduces the words of the people and their leaders and responds to them, as in a diatribe. The actual voices of the people or the personified city of Jerusalem are sometimes heard, and both people and prophet lament in direct dialogue with God. These different voices bring out a range of perspectives on Judah's failure and loss, reveal more fully its ramifications, and display the complexity of the divine–human relationship. In the second part of the book (Jer 26–52), a series of narratives about Jeremiah and his prophetic mission lend concreteness to the oracles and laments of the first part.

The two major parts of the book are linked in part by a narrator who introduces divine speeches and instructions as well as narrative accounts of the prophet with phrases like “The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD.” This unnamed narrator is the dominant voice throughout, although Jeremiah sometimes provides his own introduction with the phrase: “The word of the Lord came to me.” Such phrases form a continuous bridge, joining all parts of the book under the rubric of the divine word to Judah through Jeremiah.

That said, there is a tremendous variety of material within the book: poetic and prose oracles of judgment; poetic and prose oracles of salvation; instructions to Jeremiah to perform symbolic acts to accompany the divine word; divine, communal, and prophetic laments; psalm-like prayers and meditations; narrative accounts of Jeremiah’s public prophetic activity in the last days of Jerusalem and the aftermath of its fall; oracles against foreign nations; the final account of the sacking of the city. These forms of expression alternate in the body of the book, often without transitions or indicators of who is speaking. The frequent reference to “the word of the LORD,” however, serves as a connecting thread, drawing together the diverse sections of the book into a multivocal witness to the reality of God’s oversight even in times of unfathomable upheaval.

The figure of Jeremiah is another continuous thread. The superscription of the book begins with the phrase “The words of Jeremiah” and opens with a first-person account of the prophet’s call. Jeremiah 51, the last chapter of the body of the book concludes with “Thus far the words of Jeremiah.” Divine oracles, as noted above, repeatedly begin with a reference to the word of the Lord coming to Jeremiah. Personal appeals of Jeremiah to God, descriptions of symbolic acts he is instructed to perform, and biographical narratives about Jeremiah create a three-dimensional sense of the prophet as a living respondent to the divine word he receives. In his ordeals Jeremiah reveals that the task of following the divine word can be overwhelming, leading him into long stretches of darkness and doubt. At the same time he is buoyed by God’s promises, and he experiences deliverance from danger, keeping alive in his person the hope held out in the book’s oracles of restoration.

The book of Jeremiah in a full sense is a book about Jeremiah: the words he receives from God, his response to them, and the situations into which they lead him.

Historical Setting

The superscription of the book places Jeremiah's reception of the divine word in the time between the thirteenth year of the reign of King Josiah (627) and the eleventh year of King Zedekiah (587). Jeremiah's prophetic mission is thereby given a forty-year time span, parallel to the mission of Moses, the prototype of all prophets in the book of Deuteronomy (Dt 18:15; 34:10–12). Josiah was a king known for instigating a major reform of worship in Judah on the basis of the book of the law of the covenant found in the temple (2 Kgs 22–23). Hence the implied parallels between Jeremiah and Moses, who mediated the covenant with God at Mount Sinai, are particularly rich. The biblical accounts of the wilderness wanderings show Moses bringing the word of God to the Israelites for forty years after the making of the covenant, with mixed results. The book of Jeremiah displays a similar forty-year pattern of prophecy and rejection of the divine word following the efforts of King Josiah to promote and implement the book of the covenant.

Most of the date markers in the body of the book, however, refer to the reigns of kings Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, under whose reigns Judah suffered two major invasions by the Babylonians. The first invasion, in 597, resulted in the plundering of the temple and a major deportation to Babylon of many of the leaders of Jerusalem, including the reigning king Jehoiakin, who briefly succeeded his father Jehoiakim. The second invasion ended in 587 with the destruction of Jerusalem, including the Temple, and more deportations, including King Zedekiah. The names Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, then, represent the last days of Judah as an independent nation. Whereas Moses guides the Israelites out of slavery in Egypt, Jeremiah guides the people of Judah into captivity in a foreign land. As Moses prepares the people in the wilderness for entry into the land, Jeremiah prepares the exiles for reentry in the distant future.

Exact chronology is not a concern of the book of Jeremiah, as oracles dated to the time of Jehoiakim alternate with oracles from the time of Zedekiah. Many of the oracles in the second part of the book are placed in the reign of Zedekiah, for example, leading directly to the final devastation of 587, yet Jeremiah 26, 35, 36, and 45 go back to the time of Jehoiakim.

The time references in the book, explicit and implicit, display a span from the last years of the kingdom of Judah to a period after the exile. Jeremiah 40–44 concerns Judah after the fall of Jerusalem (cf. 2 Kgs 25:22–

26) and relates the migration of a group of survivors, including Jeremiah, to Egypt. Jeremiah 30–33 speaks of the return of Israelite exiles to the land after a period of seventy years (Jer 29:10). And Jeremiah 50–51 foretells the dramatic collapse of Babylon's power.

Jeremiah 36 refers to the days of Josiah as the time when God first spoke to Jeremiah (Jer 36:2). In addition to the superscription of the book (Jer 1:1) there are two other references to the divine word coming to Jeremiah from the days of Josiah (Jer 3:6; 25:3). On the basis of these references some scholars have assumed that an initial scroll of Jeremiah's prophecies included oracles received by him beginning in the thirteenth year of King Josiah (Jer 1:1; 25:3). The oracles of Jeremiah 2–3, in particular, which are linked neither to a particular king nor to depictions of imminent invasion and national collapse, are sometimes assigned to this time. Other scholars weigh more heavily the symbolic character of a forty-year prophetic mission paralleling the mission of Moses and the rejection of the divine word in the wilderness. Choosing a more figurative reading, such scholars have interpreted the thirteenth year of Josiah as the year of Jeremiah's birth. According to Jeremiah's call narrative, he was formed as a prophet before his birth (Jer 1:4–5). The largely undated oracles of Jeremiah 1–20, presented as personal communications of God to the prophet, lend the impression of a long relationship between God and prophet preceding the subsequent narratives of Jeremiah's public proclamations, which begin at the end of Jeremiah 19 and take place for the most part in the time of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, the last kings of Judah.

Literary Structure

Tracing a structure in the variety of prophetic material in the book of Jeremiah is challenging. It is noteworthy that in the early Greek translation of the Old Testament (the Septuagint, or LXX), the order of Jeremiah is different than it is in the existing Hebrew text. The section of oracles against the foreign nations, which comes at the end of Jeremiah in the Hebrew text (Jer 46–51), is placed in the middle of the book in the Septuagint (Jer 26–32). The order of oracles within this section differs in the Septuagint as well. The overall structure of Jeremiah is loose enough to allow for such variations in sequence.

Most scholars, however, mark a division after Jeremiah 25 and regard the book as two facing panels. Jeremiah 1–25 consists largely of prophetic oracles, with minimal narrative about Jeremiah's public activity (Jer 19:14–20:6). Narratives about Jeremiah's public witness in the last days of Judah cluster in Jeremiah 26–52, although these chapters also incorporate many prophetic oracles (e.g., the oracles against the nations in 46–51). On the whole, however, the first part of the book conveys the words Jeremiah received from the LORD, and the second part, how Jeremiah carried that word into the public square in a time of crisis in Judah.

Others see a thematic shift in the book from judgment to restoration. At the center of the second part of the book is a series of oracles of healing and restoration for Judah and Israel, which God commands Jeremiah to write on a scroll (Jer 30:2). These chapters (Jer 30–31) are known as the “Book of Consolation,” and they point to a time beyond the doom looming over Jerusalem. The oracles they contain do not shift the movement of the book away from catastrophe. The second part of the book continues to portray the pattern of rejection of the divine word and dire consequences evident in the first part, and the book concludes with a narrative of the destruction of Jerusalem as a case in point (Jer 52). Yet Jeremiah's letter of encouragement to the exilic community in Babylon in Jeremiah 29, the oracles of return and transformation in 30–33, and the lengthy oracles foretelling Babylon's demise in 50–51 all bespeak God's intentions for the long-term vitality of the scattered people of Israel.

Jeremiah 24 and 25 serve as hinges connecting the two parts of the book. In Jeremiah 24 the prophet receives a vision of two baskets of figs. The good figs represent the exilic community formed in 597, whom God will favor and bring home. The bad figs are those who still remain in Judah or have fled it for refuge in Egypt. This vision foreshadows the oracles concerning the exiles and their return in Jeremiah 29–33, 51–52, as well as reinforcing previous judgment oracles against Judah.

Jeremiah 25 summarizes the people's long-term refusal to listen to the divine word as spoken by the prophet, and underscores that Judah's eclipse is inevitable (Jer 25:1–11). At the same time this chapter mentions seventy years of subjection to Babylon (a biblical lifetime in Ps 90:10), after which Babylon will suffer the same fate as Judah (Jer 25:12–14). Jeremiah 25 ends with an extended oracle of divine disfavor, “the cup of the wine of wrath,” that Jeremiah is to bring to all nations as the Lord “enters into judgment against all flesh” and gives the wicked over to “the sword” (Jer 25:15, 31). This language of global judgment conveys the Lord's dominion over all nations and forms a parallel with the longer oracles against the nations in Jeremiah 46–51.

In sum, a broadly delineated two-part structure is apparent in the book of Jeremiah, with smaller sections in each that show signs of interconnection. Recurrent phrases and images weave the diverse parts of the book together as well. Considering Jeremiah's themes and variations, changing rhythms and tempos, and major and minor keys, the best way to read the book may be to approach it as a musical work. It can be roughly broken down as follows:

Part I: Jeremiah 1–25

Jeremiah 1–20 Oracles and Laments against Judah and Jerusalem

Jeremiah 21–25 Oracles against the Leaders and People of Judah

Part II: Jeremiah 26–52

Jeremiah 26–29 Narratives of Jeremiah's Prophetic Witness

Jeremiah 30–33 Oracles of Restoration for the Exiles

Jeremiah 34–45 Narratives of Jeremiah's Prophetic Witness

Jeremiah 46–51 Oracles against the Foreign Nations

Jeremiah 52 Narrative of the Fall of Jerusalem

Judgment, Repentance, and the Reach of Jeremiah

The book of Jeremiah keeps a steady focus on divine reckoning with a people who have distanced themselves from God (Jer 2:5–6), live in fundamental ignorance of God's ways and justice (Jer 5:1, 4–5; 8:6–7), and do each other harm (Jer 5:26–28; cf. 2:34; 6:13–14; 7:6–10; 8:10–12; 9:1–8). God's judgment is recurrently expressed in Jeremiah with the vocabulary of anger and wrath, which includes the nuance of heat, burning, and boiling over (see, e.g., Jer 4:4; 6:11; 7:20; 10:10). Although this language is dangerous as a theological dictum, it does forcefully communicate a sense of divine justice as having an irrefutable, almost physical, force: "Their houses are as full of treachery as a bird-cage is full of birds; / Therefore they grow powerful and rich, fat and sleek. / They pass over wicked deeds; justice they do not defend / By advancing the claim of the orphan, or judging the cause of the poor / Shall I not punish these things?—oracle of the LORD / on a nation such as this shall I not take vengeance?" (Jer 5:27–29; cf. Jer 9:6–8). Divine indignation and determination to redress wrong infuses the prophet as well: “The wrath of the LORD brims up within me / I am weary of holding it in” (Jer 6:11).

The book of Jeremiah sounds in places as if God’s anger rules out divine mercy and reconciliation: “I will smash them against each other, parents and children together—oracle of the Lord—showing no compassion, I will neither spare nor pity, but I will destroy them” (Jer 13:14; cf. Jer 16:5, 13). The divine declaration, “I will pour out on them their own wickedness” in Jeremiah 14 (Jer 14:16; cf. Jer 2:19; 6:19) echoes traditional parameters of just deserts and act leading to consequence (cf. Prv 10:9; 11:19; 12:21). Directly following this divine statement of poetic justice, however, is an expression of divine sympathy for those facing the consequences of their wickedness: “Let my eyes stream with tears, night and day without rest / Over the great destruction which overwhelms the virgin daughter of my people / over her incurable wound” (Jer 14:17).

Throughout the first half of Jeremiah, God expresses distress and empathy for a people set on a path whose end they do not foresee: “Something shocking and horrible has happened in the land / The prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests teach on their own authority / Yet my people like it this way; what will you do when the end comes?” (Jer 5:30–31). God grieves and calls for mourning over this end (Jer 8:18–23; 9:1–5, 9–10; 16–21; 14:17–18). The language of lament can be heard in questions like “Why do they provoke me with their idols, with their foreign nonentities?” (Jer 8:19; cf. 8:4–5, 22; 9:6–8).

At the same time, God is “weary of relenting” (Jer 15:6), of holding back anger from those who do not see the harm they do: “They have treated lightly the injury to the daughter of my people: / ‘Peace, peace!’ they say, though there is no peace. / They have acted shamefully; they have done abominable things, yet they are not at all ashamed, they do not know how to blush” (Jer 8:11–12; 6:14–15). Their sin has become a way of seeing and discerning, “engraved with a diamond point upon the tablets of their hearts” (Jer 17:1; cf. Hos 5: 4). The second part of Jeremiah provides numerous illustrations of how Judah’s leaders continue to brush off the divine word Jeremiah brings to them, even after its warnings have proved true.

There are, however, passages toward the beginning of the book in which divine disfavor seems to be overcome by mercy: “For I am merciful, oracle of the LORD, I will not keep my anger forever” (Jer 3:12). An appeal to the “rebellious children” to “return” is issued four times in Jeremiah 3–4 (Jer

3:12–13, 14, 22. 4:1; cf. 7:4–7), and God’s deep-seated desire for that return is expressed in personal terms: “I thought: How I would like to make you my children! / So I gave you a pleasant land, the most beautiful heritage among the nations! / You would call me, ‘My Father,’ I thought, and you would never turn away from me” (Jer 3:19).

Such a return, however, would entail deep-seated consciousness and remembrance of God on the part of the people: “Be circumcised for the LORD, remove the foreskins of your hearts, people of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem; / Or else my anger will break out like fire, and burn so that no one can quench it, because of your evil deeds” (Jer 4:4). The connection between God and people must be inherent, or the justice that is inherent to God will express itself independently as anger at the wrong human beings do to one another.

What follows this divine appeal for circumcision of heart at the beginning of Jeremiah 4 is a series of heightened scenes of disaster that God is bringing upon a people who “are wise at evil” but “do not know how to do good” (Jer 4:22). The juxtaposition of calls to return (Jer 3:1–4:4) with vivid images of invasion and siege (Jer 4:5–31) reflects the recognition that Judah and Jerusalem are at present incapable of a full return, as the rest of the book reiterates and illustrates. Repentance (turning back to God) is a possibility, but not now. The expressions of contrition that appear in the first part of Jeremiah are incorporated within divine speeches and stand as a model for what the people should express, but cannot, at least with any depth of understanding (Jer 3:22–25; 14:7–9, 20–22; 16:19). The few calls to repent in these chapters are directed primarily to later generations, appealing to them to turn fully to God. The promise of a new, postjudgment covenant, in which God forgives past sins and puts knowledge of God into the hearts of all (Jer 31:31–34), does not preclude, in Jeremiah, the people’s active return to God (cf. Jer 29:12–14).

To foster this kind of turning is the stated purpose of the scroll of divine words that God commands Jeremiah to write on a scroll in Jeremiah 36: “Perhaps, if the house of Jacob hears all the evil I have in mind to do with them, so that all of them turn from their evil way, then I can forgive their wickedness and their sin” (Jer 36:3; cf. 36:7). Frequent references in Jeremiah to the writing of words on a scroll (Jer 25:13; 29:1; 30:2; 36:2; 45:1; 51:60; cf. Jer 32:10–15) also suggests an audience beyond the immediate time and place of the figure of Jeremiah himself.

The book of Jeremiah is addressed to the audiences after the impasse in the relationship between God and people it describes has played out. The psalm-like passages incorporated in the book add to the drama of the immediate crisis in Judah a universal perspective on the human state: “LORD, my strength, my fortress, my refuge in the day of distress! / To you all nations will come from the ends of the earth, and say / ‘Our ancestors inherited mere frauds, empty, worthless!’ / Can human beings make for themselves gods? But these are not gods at all!” (Jer 16:19–20; cf. Jer 10:23–25; 17:5–11).

Part I: Jeremiah 1–25

Jeremiah 1

The book of Jeremiah begins with an account of the divine call and commission of the prophet. It is in the form of a dialogue between God and Jeremiah, with each voice speaking in the first person. As elsewhere in Jeremiah, questions surface and perspectives are brought to light in a dramatic and personal way.

The initial word of God to Jeremiah reveals that he was formed by the divine hand before his birth, dedicated or set apart (literally, made holy), as a prophet to the nations (1:4–5). Jeremiah's call as a prophet thus shapes his life from its beginning and entails a global mission (cf. Is 49:1, 6). It suggests broad parallels with Moses, who was singled out for survival from birth and who brought the Egyptians, a foreign nation, to know that the LORD is God (Ex 7:5; 14:4, 18, 25). Jeremiah's hesitation and God's response to it, including the promise "I am with you to deliver you," echo the narrative of Moses's call in Exodus 3–4 (Jer 1:6–7; cf. Ex 3:12; 4:10–12). A connection between the two traditional turning points of the exodus from Egypt and the exile in Babylon, including the role of prophetic intermediaries in them, is conveyed here.

Jeremiah's commission is dual: with the words God places in his mouth he is both "to uproot and tear down, to destroy and to demolish" and "to build and to plant" (Jer 1:10). The negative aspect of the prophetic mission is given double play here, suggesting the dominant tone of the prophetic oracles and narratives that follow. Yet destructive activity is the first part of a sequence that includes constructive activity, implying a larger process in which replanting follows preparing the field (cf. Is 28:23–29). The language of this commission recurs throughout the book of Jeremiah, appearing three times in the first part (Jer 1:10; 18:7–9; 24:6) and three times in the second (Jer 31:28; 42:10; 45:4). It serves as a summary of the overall outlook of the book: ruin and desolation in the present but the possibility of a new start in the more distant future.

The primary focus of the book on demolition is borne out in the two visions in Jer 1:11–14. The almond tree and the boiling kettle point to the invasion of the land. In this threatening situation God prepares Jeremiah to speak as he is directed, in contrast to the cities of Judah who have forsaken God (Jer 1:15–17). Jeremiah will become a strong “fortified city” himself, protected by God against the assaults of Judah’s leaders, who will fight against him. They will not overcome him, however, God declares, because: “I am with you to deliver you” (Jer 1:18–19; cf. 1:8). The repetition of this promise here does more than underscore Jeremiah’s own survival: it is a divine declaration of the durability of the prophetic mission to tear down and to build up.

Jeremiah 2–6

This initial sequence of oracles, mostly poetic in form, serves as an introduction to the book as a whole by spelling out God’s determination to raze Judah and Jerusalem. The first two verses of Jeremiah 2 provide a rubric for the oracles that follow by presenting them as a divine word received by Jeremiah (“The word of the LORD came to me”) and directed toward Jerusalem (“Go, cry out this message for Jerusalem to hear!”).

The message begins with a lengthy reflection that articulates the essence of what has gone wrong between God and the people of Israel (Jer 2:2–37). God speaks in the first person, questioning “the house of Jacob” and the “house of Israel” and occasionally citing their words, creating the impression of an interior dialogue into which readers and listeners enter. God recalls how at the beginning of a long relationship Israel showed love for God, walking with the divine presence through the wilderness. The people themselves, like Jeremiah at his birth, were dedicated or “set apart.” Like the “first fruits” of the harvest, they belonged to God as a sign of larger abundance (Jer 2:2–3).

Against this background, God’s first question carries a note of intimacy: “What fault did your ancestors find in me, that they withdrew from me?” (Jer 2:5). The essential fault of the people flows from this question: “Two evils my people have done: they have forsaken me, the source of living waters / They have dug themselves cisterns, broken cisterns that cannot hold water” (Jer 2:13; cf. 17:13). They have “moved on” and “forgotten” their God (Jer 2:31–32), taking up other concerns: the worship of idols and other gods (2:8, 23–28) as well as political alliances with Egypt and Assyria (2:18, 36–37). Their wickedness manifests itself as the stain of “the life-blood of the innocent” (Jer 2:34). The capstone of God’s accusation is that in spite of these bloodstains, the people of Judah and Jerusalem assure themselves: “I am innocent; at least, his anger is turned away from me.” It is this attitude that provokes God to fire back: “Listen! I will judge you on that word of yours, ‘I have not sinned’ ” (Jer 2:35; cf. 3:1–5; 8:6).

The possibility of change is raised in Jeremiah 2:2 through 4:2 by God’s remembrance of a time when the relationship between God and Israel was unbroken (Jer 2:2–3; 3:4, 19) and in periodic divine calls to “return” (Jer 3:12–14, 22; 4:1–2). In God’s view, however, indications are to the contrary: the people and their leaders have failed over centuries to acknowledge their intimate connection with God or to acknowledge their failings wholeheartedly in the words God would hope to hear (Jer 3:4–5, 22–25).

What is needed in Judah and Jerusalem is a circumcision of heart, or interior remembrance of their relationship with God (Gn 17:9–11). Without that the people will continue to do wrong and God’s anger will “break out like fire, and burn so that no one can quench it, because of your evil deeds” (Jer 4:3–4). That this latter scenario is already underway is indicated by the depictions of imminent disaster “from the north” that follow in the rest of Jeremiah 4. North is the direction from which any number of invading armies would enter Judah, and the enemy is characterized simply as a “destroyer of nations” (Jer 4:7). The expected catastrophe is sketched with broad strokes, making it relevant for generations far beyond the Babylonian era. The scenes of invasion are nonetheless vivid, heightened by God’s call to lament, “So put on sackcloth, mourn, and wail” and the voice of the people crying out in fear, “Woe to us! we are ruined”(Jer 4:8, 13).

The people’s voice also expresses confusion “ ‘Ah! Lord God,’ they will say, ‘You really did deceive us / When you said: You shall have peace, while the sword was at our very throats’ ” (Jer 4:10; cf. Jer 6:14; 8:11). God’s voice clarifies what is happening: “Your conduct, your deeds, have done this to you; how bitter is this evil of yours, how it reaches to your very heart!” (Jer 4:18; cf. 2:19). The desperate cries of Jerusalem, personified as a woman, bear out God’s observation: “My body! my body! how I writhe! The walls of my heart! / My heart beats wildly, I cannot be still; / For I myself have heard the blast of the horn, the battle cry” (Jer 4:19; cf. 4:31).

These charged exchanges between God and people yield to a solo voice, which offers a somber vision of the final outcome for Judah: the land as a lifeless wasteland (Jer 4:23–28). The images and language are evocative of an undoing of creation: the prophetic voice sees no light, the ridges of the earth are shaking and crumbling, human life is absent, there is not even a bird of the air to be seen (cf. Gn 1). A fundamental reversal has come upon Judah as a result of God's "blazing anger," which is not uncontrolled but stems from a deliberate purpose: "I have spoken, I will not change my mind / I have decided, I will not turn back" (Jer 4:28). The summoning of heavens and earth to mourn reiterates the call for the people to mourn (Jer 4:8), but also marks the cosmic gravity of this loss.

Jeremiah 7

The oracles of Jeremiah 5–6, almost entirely poetic, build on the reasons for disaster given in chapters 2 through 4. Jeremiah 7 introduces a new form of divine speech: the extended prose oracle, or sermon, which sets forth in straightforward language Judah's failings and their consequences (cf. Jer 11:1–17). Prose speeches appear with regularity through Jeremiah 7–20 in the form of divine words and instructions. Scholars have noted similarities of language and perspective between these prose speeches and the exhortations and warnings of the book of Deuteronomy. The setting out of a clear cut choice between following the divine word and ignoring it, the language of God's burning anger, and the metaphor of the circumcision of the heart (Jer 9:24–25; cf. Dt 10:16; 30:6), for example, form noticeable parallels between the prose oracles of Jeremiah and Deuteronomy, although they are apparent in the poetic oracles of Jeremiah as well.

Jeremiah 7 is a prime example of a prose oracle or sermon. It offers another slant on Judah's failure: a disproportionate focus on worship in the Temple rather than God's ethical mandates. The people regard the Temple as a guarantee of divine protection for Jerusalem, but they commit and ignore social injustices that are highly offensive to God (exploitation of the poor and helpless, shedding of innocent blood, stealing, murder, adultery, perjury) and offer sacrifice to other gods (Jer 7:3–10). The divine speech critiques the people's way of thinking as deceptive: "You put your trust in deceptive words to your own loss!" (Jer 7:8). By indulging in abusive acts with impunity the people have made the Temple "a den of thieves" (Jer 7:11), which is no protection at all.

Jeremiah 7 reflects a wider prophetic tradition that makes listening to God's voice the essence of a strong relationship between God and people, taking precedence over the performance of ritual sacrifices (Hos 6:6; Am 5:21–24; Is 1:11–17). It goes quite far, however, in claiming that God did not command sacrifices or offerings in the wilderness but simply wanted the people to follow the divine voice (Jer 7:22–23; cf. Am 5:25). The divine word makes clear, however, that from the time the Israelites left Egypt to the present, they have not listened to God’s words through the prophets, and Jeremiah is warned that they will not listen to him either. A long history of following their own ways has brought them to the point where “faithfulness has disappeared; the word itself is banished from their speech,” or has become foreign to them (Jer 7:28). The signs of this absence are extreme: the people of Judah have desecrated the Temple with idolatrous objects and have built altars for child sacrifice in the valley of Ben-hinnom, near Jerusalem (Jer 7:31).

Thus it is high time for Judah to confront what it has become and is doing: “Be assured! Days are coming—oracle of the LORD” (Jer 7:32). In the vein of poetic justice typical of prophetic speech, the valley where children are being sacrificed will become known as the “Valley of Slaughter” because of those slain there in the invasions and siege to come. It is time for gaiety and gladness in Judah and Jerusalem to give way to a death-like silence, “for the land will be turned to rubble” (Jer 7:34).

Jeremiah 7 solidly sets out the pattern of consistent disregard of God’s word leading to disaster. Like other prose oracles in Jeremiah, this one shows that pattern to be logical, just, and of long maturation.

Jeremiah 8–10

The inevitability of just deserts is only part of God’s justice in Jeremiah. The lament oracles that follow in Jeremiah 8–9 (Jer 8:18–23; 9:1–5; 9:9–10; cf. Jer 9:16–21) display the role of grief over the necessity of judgment. Although there is ongoing discussion about whether it is God or the separate voice of the prophet expressing sorrow in these laments, they appear in the context of divine oracles (Jer 8:1–17; 9:6–8, 12–25), and two are marked with the phrase “oracle of the LORD” (Jer 9:2, 5). The recurrent phrases “the daughter of my people” and “my people,” further, seem most appropriately spoken by God (cf. Jer 12:7–13; Hos 11:8–9; cf. Lk 19:41–44).

These lament oracles evoke pathos: an ignorant people is headed for irrevocable anguish. They also draw out the complexity of the balance between mercy and justice in the divine nature. The perspectives of God and people are brought together in dramatic dialogue (Jer 8:18–23). God begins by expressing distress (“My joy is gone, grief is upon me, my heart is sick”) and then calls attention to the baffled cries of the people who expect divine protection: “Is the LORD no longer in Zion? Is her King no longer in her midst?” The divine response carries a note of regret: “Why do they provoke me with their idols, with their foreign nonentities?” (Jer 8:18–19). God’s final question strikes deeper, at the ultimate source of sorrow: “Why does new flesh not grow over the wound of the daughter of my people?” (Jer 8:22; cf. Is 1:5–6). Why is healing and a return to well being not possible for this people? Since it is not (at this point), God grieves over their suffering, as if with human tears: “Oh, that my head were a spring of water, my eyes a fountain of tears / That I might weep day and night, over the slain from the daughter of my people!” (Jer 8:23).

God’s mourning as well as the divine call for mourning in Judah (Jer 9:16–21) mark the pathos of an unpreventable catastrophe and the loss of what once held promise and possibility. The divine laments reach out for a hearing beyond the time of the people who do not understand why God does not keep them from harm and who cannot heal themselves. They are intended to move later generations both to grieve over the fallen and to heighten awareness of their own vulnerability and need to grow in knowledge of God (in Aristotle’s famous definition of tragedy, to arouse pity and fear).

Jeremiah 11–20

The Confessions of Jeremiah. These chapters add another perspective on divine judgment by means of another lamenting voice: that of the prophet. In a series known as the “confessions” of Jeremiah, the prophetic voice separates itself from the divine voice and appeals to God. Scholars have identified in Jeremiah 11–20 seven individual laments addressed to God that reflect the basic elements of the individual laments of the psalms: a cry for help, a description of distress, and an affirmation of either God’s response or of trust in a response (Jer 11:18–23; 12:1–6; 15:10–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–13; and 20:14–18).

In Jeremiah's laments the divine response can be more bracing than assuring, and expressions of trust are sometimes lacking. Jeremiah's confessions present a dialogue between God and prophet that brings out further dimensions of divine justice and the challenges it poses. The voicing of Jeremiah's struggles as a messenger of judgment bears out his initial briefing to expect conflict and adds theological depth to the narratives of his ordeals in the second part of the book.

In his first confession (Jer 11:18–23), Jeremiah speaks of plots to silence his prophetic witness and appeals to God as the “just judge” who will defend him. In 12:1–6, he challenges God's justice: “Why does the way of the wicked prosper? Why do all the treacherous live in contentment?” (Jer 12:1). What Jeremiah asks is that God expedite justice and cut off the wicked: “Pick them out like sheep for the butcher, set them apart for the day of slaughter” (Jer 12:3). As Isaiah laments “How long?” (Is 6:11), so, too, Jeremiah: “How long must the land mourn?” (Jer 12:4). The mourning the prophet refers to is not over the coming judgment but over its delay, that is, over the unrestrained flourishing of the wicked and godless.

The divine response to Jeremiah's plea in this lament (Jer 12:5–6) suggests that the prophet must shore up his patience and endurance, as life on the ground will get worse before it gets better. In light of God's laments over the effects of impending judgment, particularly the divine lament that directly follows in 12:7–13, this response implies that divine justice is not facile or swift.

The implications of God's response can be seen in Jeremiah's next confession (Jer 15:10–21), in which the prophet again asks God to bring punishment on those who are persecuting him: “Because you are slow to anger, do not banish me” (Jer 15:15). The confession begins with the lament, “Woe to me, my mother, that you gave me birth, a man of strife and contentment for the whole land” (Jer 15:10). Jeremiah here gives vent to the burden of receiving God's words. On the one hand, those words are his joy because he “bears the name of God,” as if adopted and raised by God (Jer 15:16; cf. Ps 119:103). Yet the weight of God's hand or power has removed him from those who take joy in life and has filled him with “rage,” or indignation (Jer 15:17). This painful state is chronic, and now Jeremiah echoes God's own query: “Why is my pain continuous, my wound incurable, refusing to be healed?” (Jer 15:17–18; cf. 8:22). Like the people, he accuses God of being deceptive (Jer 15:17–18; cf. 4:10).

God's response is to point out to Jeremiah a route to healing: Jeremiah should return to God rather than petition God. He must "utter what is precious and not what is worthless" so that he can again become God's "mouth." Only then will his isolation and pain break for the better: "Then they will be the ones who turn to you, not you who turn to them" (Jer 15:19). At the same time, God reiterates his initial promise to strengthen Jeremiah: "I will make you toward this people a fortified wall of bronze" (Jer 15:20; cf. 1:18). Divine presence and help is assured but depends on the prophet's resolve.

In Jeremiah's last two confessions (Jer 20:7–13; 14–18) his trust in God's promises falters. In the first of these two confessions Jeremiah accuses God of assaulting him: "You seduced me, LORD, and I let myself be seduced; you were too strong for me, and you prevailed" (Jer 20:7). This outbreak follows a narrative account of Jeremiah's public witness in which he is sent to preach to the crowds in the Temple and is then beaten, shackled, and shamed publicly by one of the Temple priests (Jer 19:14–20:6). Such events give concrete meaning to his complaint "The word of the LORD has brought me reproach and derision all day long" (Jer 20:8).

Jeremiah's dilemma is that despite his discomfort, he cannot hold back God's word. In the imagery of his call narrative, the divine word can be seen as part of his formation in the womb: it is "imprisoned in my bones" (Jer 20:9; cf. 6:11). Yet he declares his trust in the LORD "who is with me like a mighty champion" (Jer 20:11). God indeed "tests" or tries the just, seeing into the mind and heart (Jer 20:12; cf. Jer 12:3), but Jeremiah entrusts to God his hope that he will be rescued from those who menace him.

In Jeremiah's last confession, trust has vanished. Jeremiah 20:14–18 begins and ends on a note of despair, with the prophet cursing the day of his birth. Since in Jeremiah's call narrative God claims to have set him apart in the womb, cursing the day of his birth comes close to cursing his prophetic call. It also reflects a rejection of all human hope and possibility: "Cursed be the one who brought the news to my father, 'A child, a son has been born you!' " (Jer 20:15; cf. Jb 3:1). The confession ends with the typical lament question, "Why?" expressing a disorienting lack of connection with God. For what purpose was Jeremiah born, "to see sorrow and pain, to end my days in shame?" (Jer 20:18). This final prophetic lament suggests that the conjunction of human hostility with irrepressible prophetic witness can overwhelm even the one guided and strengthened by God and try the mind and heart to their limits (cf. Ps 88).

Although this confession voices despair it is, in the lament tradition of the psalms, a despair raised to God, in implicit trust that it is heard (cf. Ps 22). In this respect Jeremiah is presented as a model for those the book addresses, past and present, who are urged to persevere in spite of the hardships and doubts involved in doing so. The Gospel of Matthew proposes Jeremiah as a forerunner of Christ (Mt 16:14), and certainly an echo of Jeremiah's "Why" here can be heard in Christ's "Why" of abandonment on the cross (Mk 15:34).

The Symbolic Acts of Jeremiah.

Notable in Jeremiah 11–20, and in the vein of the prose oracles, are instructions to Jeremiah to perform prophetic symbolic acts that convey the message of the divine word. These, too, are introduced with formulas like "The LORD said to me" or "This word came to me from the LORD," or "This word came to Jeremiah from the LORD."

These narrative instructions include the burying of Jeremiah's loincloth and retrieval of it when wholly disintegrated (Jer 13:1–11); the mandate to Jeremiah to remain celibate as a sign of imminent mourning over the dead in Judah (Jer 16:1–13); Jeremiah's observation of a potter at work, forming and reforming clay (Jer 18:1–12); and Jeremiah's smashing of a clay jar at the Valley of Ben-hinnom outside Jerusalem, where the people of Judah were sacrificing children (Jer 19:1–15). These descriptions of prophetic acts put into visual and dramatic form the intent of the divine word, in the way an allegory or parable might do. At the same time they build the impression of a full-bodied prophetic witness that involves actions as well as words, foreshadowing the narratives about Jeremiah in the second half of the book.

Jeremiah 21–23

These oracles, a mixture of prose and poetry, are addressed to the kings and prophets of Judah, and many of them are linked explicitly to the time of the last kings of Judah: Zedekiah and Jehoiakim, along with his son Jehoiakin or "Coniah" (Jer 22:24). They introduce a framework for Jeremiah's prophetic activity in the last days of Jerusalem, a framework that continues through the second part of the book. The oracles are not arranged in chronological order, but begin with a judgment on King Zedekiah, the last king.

These oracles frequently refer to the king as belonging to the “house of David” or sitting on “the throne of David.” As heir to the legacy of David, the king’s role is to “each morning dispense justice, rescue the oppressed from the hand of the oppressor” (Jer 21:12; cf. 22:2–3). To King Jehoiakim, Jeremiah holds up the model of King Josiah, who acted “justly and righteously” and “dispensed justice to the weak and poor,” asking “Is this not to know me?—oracle of the LORD” (Jer 22:15–16). Jehoiakim’s acts show that he clearly does not know God: “Your eyes and heart are set on nothing but your own gain / On shedding innocent blood and practicing oppression and extortion” (Jer 22:17).

The oracle in 23:1–8 offers hope of an alternative to these negligent shepherds (kings) who are ultimately responsible for having scattered their sheep (subjects) into exile (Jer 23:2). In days to come God will raise up a “righteous branch,” or descendant of David. This future king will reign wisely, that is, do what is just and right, ensuring the safety of Judah/Israel (cf. Jer 3:15). Thus he will merit the name “The LORD our justice” (Jer 23:6), whereas Zedekiah, whose name means “The LORD is my justice,” clearly does not.

Joined to the oracles against royal leaders is a sequence of condemnations of deceptive prophets. They promote the aims of wrongdoers: “But among Jerusalem’s prophets I saw something more shocking: / Adultery, walking in deception, strengthening the power of the wicked, so that no one turns from evil” (Jer 23:14). They are deceptive in that they proclaim to speak and act in the name of the LORD without having received the divine word: “I did not send these prophets, yet they ran; / I did not speak to them, yet they prophesied” (Jer 23:21). They prophesy according to their own inspiration or dreams but have never “stood in the council of the LORD, to see him and hear his word” (Jer 23:18, 22; cf. 23:25–32). These oracles prepare for the stand-off between Jeremiah and the prophet Hananiah in Jeremiah 28.

The last two chapters of the first part of Jeremiah look beyond the time of flawed kings and leaders in Judah to a postexilic future, but without diminishing the reality of judgment. The vision of two baskets of figs in Jeremiah 24 looks to the formation of a new community among those taken into exile. God will protect the exiles in Babylon and bring them back to the land as signs of building up and planting after the uprooting of the old order (Jer 24:6; cf. 1:10). They will receive a new heart (discernment or will) that makes it possible for them “to know me, that I am the LORD” and to return to their God (Jer 24:7). This vision answers the need for a circumcision of heart for the people of Judah (Jer 4:4) and anticipates the announcement of a new covenant, in which God will write divine law or teaching on the hearts of a reassembled people (Jer 31:31–34).

Jeremiah 25 summarizes the divine word to Jeremiah up to this point, claiming that Judah and Jerusalem’s fall is inevitable, yet limiting the time of subjection to Babylon to seventy years (Jer 25:11–12). The announcement of a global reckoning in what follows enhances the view of God as cosmic overseer of a just order, who sets limits and preserves them (Jer 25:15–38; cf. Jer 5:22). It reveals the divine intent to disarm all nations who do harm, beginning with Judah (Jer 25:18): “For the LORD has an indictment against the nations, he enters into judgment against all flesh / The wicked shall be given to the sword—oracle of the LORD” (Jer 25:31). The LORD “roars” not just from Zion (Am 1:2) but from “on high, from his holy dwelling,” and “the uproar spreads to the end of the earth” (Jer 25:30), as if simultaneously, on one day of reckoning. This last chapter of the first part of the book foreshadows the oracles against the nations in Jeremiah 46–51. It also lends to Jeremiah’s initial call to be a “prophet to the nations,” a context of worldwide eschatological judgment (cf. Jer 1:5).

Part II: Jeremiah 26–52

Jeremiah 26–29

The second part of Jeremiah begins in Jeremiah 26 with an abbreviated version of the Temple sermon of Jeremiah 7, followed by a longer narrative about its delivery in the Temple court. It is set in the days of King Jehoiakim, that is, before the first Babylonian invasion and plundering of the Temple. Jeremiah warns the priests, prophets, and worshippers gathered in the Temple about the possibility of its destruction unless they reform their customary ways of life by “walking according to the law” and listening to the words of God’s prophets (Jer 26:4–6). Jeremiah’s audience reacts by seizing him and demanding, “You must die!” (Jer 26:7). Not all present agree, however, and the narrative develops into a trial of Jeremiah and a debate over how a prophet’s words should be regarded. Jeremiah states that the warning he has delivered comes from the LORD (Jer 26:12–15). The royal officials (“princes of Judah”) and the crowd speak up against the religious leaders (“priests and the prophets”) by advocating for Jeremiah out of respect for the prophetic word. A group of prominent landowners (“elders of the land”) recall the prophet Micah’s words of warning against Jerusalem a century earlier and the deferential response of King Hezekiah (Jer 26:16–19).

Despite these expressions of support for Jeremiah, the chapter concludes with the account of the fate of the prophet Uriah, who prophesied against Judah and Jerusalem and was sought out and killed by order of King Jehoiakim (Jer 26:20–24). His example signals further dangers for Jeremiah.

In Jeremiah 27–28 the divine word comes to Jeremiah early in the reign of King Zedekiah, that is, shortly after the first Babylonian invasion. At this point the grounds for divine judgment have shifted. Those remaining in Jerusalem face a critical choice between accepting subjection to Babylon so as to survive as a city and refusing to serve the king of Babylon, which will lead to “sword, famine, and pestilence,” all elements of ancient sieges (Jer 27:13).

Jeremiah 27 is introduced by the usual formula “This word came to Jeremiah from the LORD,” but it continues as a first-person narrative of a symbolic act Jeremiah is instructed to perform. He is to make a yoke for his neck and shoulders, like those worn by work animals, and to send versions of this yoke to all the kings of surrounding nations. A new dimension of divine rule over the nations (Jer 25:15–38) is revealed here, connected with God’s role as creator. Since the divine hand has created the earth and everything on it, God can hand over any land to any ruler (cf. Is 40:12–24). Judah and its neighboring kingdoms have been given over by God to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. God intends all these kingdoms to “serve” Nebuchadnezzar and his successors “until the time comes for him and his land” (Jer 27:7).

The word “serve” is provocative. In Exodus, God is the one whom the Israelites are freed from slavery in Egypt to “serve” (Ex 4:23), and in Isaiah 40–55 the exilic “house of Israel” is referred to repeatedly as “my servant,” who will witness to the sovereignty of God by leaving Babylon. Here Judah is instructed by God to serve the king of Babylon, based on the premise that God is not just the commander but the allocator of earthly power. Human kingdoms are not permanent, but God grants dominion to them for a time, according to divine discretion. Taking God’s word on this is vital to survival in a world of massive empires: “The people that bends the neck to the king of Babylon to serve him, I will leave in peace on its own land—oracle of the LORD—to cultivate it and dwell on it” (Jer 27:11).

There is a practical aspect to this divine decree. King Jehoiakim’s rebellion against the Babylonian yoke brought Nebuchadnezzar’s armies to Jerusalem in 597 to plunder the Temple and city and deport its leaders. A sizable group of exiles—and the Temple treasures—remained in Babylon, as a reminder of that debacle. Yet the continued existence of these exiled leaders kept hopes of their return alive. The last half of Jeremiah 27 concerns prophets who fuel false expectations of easy restoration, prophets whom God did not send and who prophesy falsely in the divine name (Jer 27:12–22).

The issue of false prophecy is given dramatic form in the confrontation between Jeremiah and the prophet Hananiah in Jeremiah 28. In the account of this standoff readers are invited to hear and weigh the message of Hananiah, who also claims to speak for the LORD. He begins with the classic prophetic formula, “Thus says the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel,” but his message is contrary to Jeremiah’s. He insists that God has “broken the yoke of the king of Babylon” and that all the sacred vessels plundered from the temple by the Babylonians will be restored in two years (Jer 28:2–3). Jeremiah's response recalls earlier critiques of those who assure the people of Judah of peace rather than awakening them to the seriousness of their situation (Jer 5:12; 6:14; 8:11; 23:17). It is concrete signs of the realization of the prophetic word, Jeremiah asserts, not simply attractive hopes, that mark that word as divine (cf. Jer 23:25–32; cf. Dt 18:21–22). Jeremiah stands within the legacy of prophets like Micah (Jer 26:18) but also Hosea, Amos, and First Isaiah, who “prophesied war, disaster, and pestilence against many lands and mighty kingdoms” (Jer 28:8).

In a letter to the exiles in Jeremiah 29, the prophet draws out the implications of submission to the Babylonian yoke for the exiles. They are to accept their new situation by building houses, planting gardens, and raising families in Babylon. They are even to contribute to and pray for the peace and well-being of Babylon, for they are dependent upon its protection and largesse (Jer 29:4–7).

After seventy years (a lifetime), however, God's long-term plans for the exiles will bring them back to Jerusalem to give them a future of hope rooted in a fully responsive relationship: “When you call me, and come and pray to me, I will listen to you. When you look for me, you will find me. Yes, when you seek me with all your heart, I will let you find me—oracle of the LORD—and I will change your lot” (Jer 29:12–14; cf. Dt 30:1–3). This divine promise begins with the reaching out of the people toward God. In this way it varies from the similar oracle in Jeremiah 24, in which God promises to give the people a heart to “know me” after which they will “return to me with their whole heart” (Jer 24:7). Jeremiah's letter to the exiles implies that the experience of separation from the land will itself lead the exiles to call upon, pray to, and look for God.

Jeremiah 30–31

These chapters are traditionally known as the “Book of Consolation,” due to their encouraging content and to the divine command to Jeremiah to “Write down on a scroll all the words I have spoken to you,” which seems to refer to the oracles that follow (Jer 30:2). These oracles expand on previous indications of future restoration, especially in Jeremiah 24–25, 29.

Their placement in the middle of narratives about the negative reception of Jeremiah's prophetic words by Judah's leaders is significant. The realization of a new people and a new order is still a long way off and must wait the playing out of the siege of Jerusalem and its chaotic aftermath (Jer 37–44; 52). Yet glimpses of future healing are revealed in the midst of a dark time and recorded to allow future generations to find encouragement in daunting circumstances.

The first oracle begins with an address both “to Israel and to Judah” (Jer 30:4). The names Israel, Jacob, and Ephraim, all frequently applied to the people of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, appear in the oracles that follow (Jer 30:10–31:22). Several places, and another figure particular to the Northern Kingdom, are also named: Samaria, Ramah, Mount Ephraim, Rachel. In their present context these oracles of return and healing, which include some references to present distress and divine wrath, are heard in relation to the collapse of Judah and the return of the Babylonian exiles. Judah is what remains of Israel after the fall of the Northern Kingdom (Jer 6:9), and the exiles in Babylon are the remnant of the remnant, referred to in Isaiah 40–55 as “Jacob” and “Israel” and in Ezekiel as the “house of Israel.”

More than in Isaiah, however, these northern names convey here a wide net that will bring home the tribes of the Northern Kingdom scattered over a century earlier. This wider prospect adds resonance to statements of reunion between God and people: “At that time—oracle of the LORD—I will be the God of all the families of Israel, and they shall be my people” (Jer 31:1; cf. 30:18–22; 31:2–6). The repeated descriptions of rejoicing in these two chapters are enhanced with amazement at the rejoining of a people long separated (Jer 31:7–8, 10–14).

Mourning plays a role in this return. The people will return weeping, that is, without forgetting the calamities of the past (Jer 31:9). Tears over the lost are still shed: “In Ramah is heard the sound of sobbing, bitter weeping! Rachel mourns for her children, she refuses to be consoled for her children—they are no more!” Yet the LORD compares these tears to “labor,” for which the people will be compensated in their return (Jer 31:15–16). Further, Ephraim's “rocking in grief” moves God to declare him “my favored son, the child in whom I delight” (Jer 31:18–20).

Oracles of mourning turning to joy lead up to a reiteration of the divine promise to follow uprooting and tearing down with building and planting, but in the context of a fundamental change in the human-divine dynamic (Jer 31:27–30). The recurring cycle of wrongdoing and its consequences in generation after generation will be broken: “All shall die because of their own iniquity” (Jer 31:30; cf. Dt 24:16). In proverbial language, “the teeth of anyone who eats unripe grapes shall be set on edge” (Jer 31:30; cf. Ez 18:1–9). The divine promise here does not eliminate the possibility of wrongdoing but undermines its inevitability.

The New Covenant.

The announcement of a new covenant between God and a reunited people (Jer 31:31–34) expands and formalizes earlier references to a change of heart among the exiles (Jer 24:7; 29:13) with the language of covenant. The new covenant marks a decisive turning point in the life of the people with their God, since it will be significantly different from the covenant made with the ancestors of Israel when God led them out of Egypt (Ex 19:5; 24:7–8). That covenant was breakable, as the Israelites demonstrated when they asked for an image of God in direct violation of the first commandment (Ex 32:1–19). Only with a further revelation of God to Moses was this broken covenant reinscribed (Ex 34:1–11).

In the new covenant God will write the divine law or teaching (torah) upon the hearts of the people, so that the union of God and people will be internal (Jer 31:33–34; cf. Jer 32:38–40). Where once the sin of Judah was engraved on their hearts (Jer 17:1), knowledge of God will be written, inserted into their capacity for discernment and will. The divine teaching of the law is not replaced in this new covenant, but implanted. This striking image, and the assertion that no one will need to teach another to know the LORD, represent signs of divine forgiveness of the people’s former state of sin: “For I will forgive their wrongdoing and no longer remember their sin” (Jer 31:34; cf. Is 33:24; 44:22).

The succinct yet graphic language of this passage adds to the previous promise of God’s giving the people a heart in Jeremiah 24 (Jer 24:7). At the same time the new covenant is to be balanced with the oracle that precedes it, in which the possibility of choosing to do wrong and suffering the consequences is left open (Jer 31:30).

This passage lies at the heart of Christian proclamation, in which Jesus embodies the new covenant in his life, death, and resurrection, and invites all human beings into it, particularly in sacramental communion (Heb 8:7–9:28; 1 Cor 11:23–26; 2 Cor 3:2–6; Lk 22:20; cf. Mk 14:24; Mt 26:28).

Jeremiah 32–33

These two chapters are often included with Jeremiah 30–31 in the “Book of Consolation.” They draw out the salvation oracles of return and renewal with a literal example of planting in Judah (Jer 32) and a sequence of oracles on the restoration of Jerusalem and the Davidic kingship (Jer 33). The divine promises communicated in both chapters are connected with the change of heart God will bring about in the people (Jer 32:36–41) and the divine healing and forgiveness of their offenses (Jer 33:6–8).

In Jeremiah 32 God’s instruction to Jeremiah during the final siege of Jerusalem to buy a field from his cousin—and to have the deed of purchase written, witnessed, and sealed—is a sign of divine commitment to the promise that “they shall again purchase houses and fields and vineyards in this land” (Jer 32:15). That Jeremiah hands the deeds of purchase to Baruch to store in a jar “so that they can last a long time” (Jer 32:14) indicates a significant wait before this act will have any meaning and evokes the future generations for whom the narrative is intended.

The oracles of restoration in Jeremiah 33 bring together the rebuilding of Jerusalem with the raising up of a “just shoot” from the house of David, who “will do what is just and right in the land” (Jer 33:15; cf. 23:5). The advent of this king will bring both Judah and Jerusalem to safety, but it is the city here, as opposed to the king, who will be named “The LORD our justice” (Jer 33:16; cf. 23:6). Under the leadership of a just king the entire community will be identified with divine justice. The continuity of worthy Davidic royal leadership is joined to the continuity of the priestly line of Levites (Jer 33:17–18). Thus the fundamental mediating structures of the relationship between the people and their God will be reestablished.

Jeremiah 34–35

These two chapters resume the biographical narratives about Jeremiah that begin in Jeremiah 26, thereby embedding the oracles of salvation in Jeremiah 30–33 within an account of the last days of Judah. Jeremiah 34 begins with an oracle of judgment against King Zedekiah, delivered by Jeremiah to the king during the final siege of Jerusalem and its neighboring cities (Jer 34:1–7). The following oracle (Jer 34:8–22) accuses Zedekiah and all Judah of breaking a covenant they had made with each other to free all Israelite slaves, in keeping with the mandate of the divine covenant that sets a six-year limit on debt slavery (Jer 34:14; cf. Ex 21:1–2; Dt 15:12–15).

The portrait of a very different community, the Rechabites, is offered in the oracles of Jeremiah 35, set in the earlier time of King Jehoiakim. The Rechabites are described as an ascetic, nomadic or semi-nomadic group living without property of their own (including slaves). The key distinction between them and the people of Judah, however, is that the Rechabites have consistently followed the practices of their founder. Their example sharpens God’s castigation of Judah and Jerusalem for deviance from their tradition (Jer 35:12–17).

Jeremiah 36

This chapter marks a significant incident in the mission of Jeremiah: the burning of a scroll of his words, dictated by divine command to Baruch, son of Neriah. The scene of a royal official reading the scroll to the king and, at his royal command, cutting off sections and dropping them one by one into the fire, is chilling. That this act is dated to the fourth year of Jehoiakim’s reign, identified in Jeremiah 25:1 as the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, is significant. Not simply the date but the act itself marks the beginning of the end for Judah. This incident introduces the further attempts to silence Jeremiah in the time of King Zedekiah narrated in Jeremiah 37–38.

Jeremiah 37–45

Jeremiah 37–44 is a sequence of narratives about Jeremiah’s prophetic activity during the final siege of Jerusalem (Jer 37–38), the fall of the city (Jer 39), its immediate aftermath (Jer 40–41), and the flight of remaining leaders to Egypt, taking Jeremiah with them (Jer 42–44). Jeremiah 45 relates the delivery of a divine message by Jeremiah to Baruch. As a collection of narratives, these chapters are sometimes referred to as the “book of Baruch,” since they largely consist of third-person accounts about Jeremiah and, in the context of the book, are presumably written by Baruch.

In these chapters Jeremiah is shown continually bringing the divine word to the people and leaders of Judah as new situations unfold. In Jeremiah 37 the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem has been interrupted by the advance of the Egyptian army, and God directs Jeremiah to warn King Zedekiah against relying on Egypt to keep the Babylonians (Chaldeans) away. In Jeremiah 38 the siege has resumed and the divine word calls on the people to surrender to the Chaldeans so as to preserve their lives. In Jeremiah 42 the city has fallen, the Babylonian-appointed governor Gedaliah has been assassinated, and God instructs the people to remain in the land rather than to desert it for Egypt in fear of Babylonian reprisals. When Jeremiah is taken against his will to Egypt by deserters, he continues to warn the refugee community there that they are defying the divine command.

This word presents difficult choices to the people of Judah, testing their capacity to trust in it. For the most part they fail to do so, but Jeremiah 37–45 lifts up as models a few individuals who illustrate the possibility of choosing what is difficult. When royal officials have Jeremiah thrown into an empty cistern to die of thirst and starvation, Ebed-melech, a court official and foreigner (Ethiopian) pleads for the prophet to King Zedekiah and receives permission to pull him out (Jer 38:7–13).

Baruch is shown to be a disciple in the image of Jeremiah. The divine word Jeremiah brings him reveals that Baruch, too, laments in grief and pain (Jer 45:2). God answers him by referring to the divine intent to tear up and uproot, thus preparing him with the same forewarning of difficult times ahead that Jeremiah received (Jer 45:4–5; cf. Jer 12:5; 15:19–21).

King Zedekiah is portrayed in these chapters as hesitant. He solicits divine help and guidance through Jeremiah but frankly admits his fears of following it (Jer 37:17–21; 38:14–24). He is afraid both of his court officials, who advocate resistance to Babylon (Jer 38:5, 24) and afraid of his subjects who have already surrendered to the Babylonians (Jer 38:19). This portrait of King Zedekiah illustrates the outcome of hesitation and fear: in the capture of Jerusalem he is seized and blinded by the Babylonians, although they spare his life (Jer 39:1–7).

Through all these narratives Jeremiah remains the indomitable figure who faces squarely the ever-shifting human realities around him and persists in bringing the divine word to bear on them. Set against his example the resistance to the word by Judah's leaders and people appears increasingly absurd. Those who have survived the capture of Jerusalem solicit guidance from God about what they should do, but when Jeremiah supplies it they claim he is lying to them (Jer 42:1–3; 43:1–3). Having fled to Egypt in defiance of the divine warning to stay in Judah, they continue to brush off Jeremiah’s words: “Regarding the word you have spoken to us in the name of the LORD, we are not listening to you” (Jer 44:16).

Jeremiah 46–51

This section of oracles against the nations is placed in the Hebrew text of Jeremiah at the end of the second part of the book of Jeremiah, forming a parallel with the oracles of divine judgment against all nations in Jeremiah 25, at the end of the first part. The section opens with a series of oracles against Egypt, the major power to which the royal leaders of Judah looked for relief from Babylonian domination. A pair of oracles against Babylon, which takes up over half the section, concludes the collection.

These last two oracles make clear that Babylon’s eventual defeat will mean the return of Israelites and Judahites together, “weeping as they come, to seek the LORD their God” and to join with the LORD “in an everlasting covenant, never to be forgotten” (Jer 50:4–5; cf. Jer 50:20). Thus the promises of Jeremiah 30–31 are linked to the divine word spoken against Babylon, and Babylon’s fall is revealed as a part of a “strategy” or “plan” of God (Jer 50:45; 51:12, 29). The power of God over earthly kingdoms, proclaimed in Jeremiah 27, is heightened here by the portrayal of Babylon as “destroyer of the entire earth” (Jer 51:25). Babylon in its turn, like Judah, will be invaded by a “people from the north” (Jer 50:41), including the “kings of the Medes” (Jer 51:11), a title that after 550 would fit Cyrus, the Persian king, who conquered Babylon in 539.

Another aspect of divine power is conveyed in Jeremiah’s oracles against foreign nations by periodic references to God’s ultimate intent to restore (or to preserve a remnant of) the nation whose destruction is foretold (Jer 46:25–26; 48:47; 49:6, 11, 39). These brief asides reflect the pattern of restoration after judgment in Israel/Judah and show that the intent to rebuild and replant is part of the divine plan.

Jeremiah 52

The oracles against the nations conclude with a notation: “Thus far the words of Jeremiah” (Jer 51:64). The last chapter of the book consists of a third-person account of the destruction of Jerusalem that closely resembles the ending of 2 Kings (2 Kgs 24:18–25:30). Even though Jeremiah 39 narrates the destruction of Jerusalem, a second narrative account that focuses on the horrifying spectacle of the dismemberment of the Temple and includes an enumeration of three groups of exiles deported from Judah to Babylon forms the final scene. This spectacle is what the words and symbolic acts of Jeremiah have aimed to draw attention to throughout the book. The leveling of Judah and Jerusalem must be acknowledged, remembered, and mourned if a lasting return to the LORD is ever to become real. The final verses of Jeremiah recount the release of King Jehoiakin from prison in Babylon to a place within the foreign court (2 Kgs 25:27–30). They echo the similar release of Jeremiah from prison (Jer 37:21) and suggest a motif of the extension of life in a tenuous situation (cf. Jer 29:4–8; 32:13–15; 37:7–13).

This is not a powerful indicator of hope for the exiles, or for later generations caught in dangerous circumstances, but it fits the context. The old Judah must be uprooted and remain desolate for a significant period, but if what is left of it stays alive, even as a captive community, hope has grounds to work. The book of Jeremiah as a whole, however, indicates that hope will endure only as long as the past remains alive in memory.

LAMENTATIONS

see pages [1142–1151 of the Old Testament]

The book of Lamentations is a collection of five poetic laments that give voice to the helplessness and grief of Jerusalem and its people after the siege and destruction of the city. In distinct ways these laments implore God for attention to the massive suffering they vividly evoke. The Babylonian conquest of Jerusalem in 587 is implicit in these poems, although Babylon is never named (Lam 1:4–6, 10; 2:6–7, 9; 4:11–12; 5:15–18).

As many of the communal laments in the psalms do, Lamentations expresses the reaching out of a people toward God in circumstances of near extinction and apparent divine abandonment (cf. Pss 44; 74; 79, 80; 89:39–53; 137). The poems appeal to God to “see,” “pay attention to,” and “remember” the pain of Jerusalem. This pain is the result of divine punishment brought on by the city’s guilt (Lam 1:5, 8, 18; 2:14; 3:34–42; 4:1–14; 5:7, 16), yet nonetheless horrific and tragic. The second lament reports the question posed by outside observers of the ruin of Jerusalem: “Is this the city they used to call perfect in beauty and joy of all the earth?” (Lam 2:15; cf. Ps 48:3).

The fourth lament ends with a view of the completion of Zion’s punishment (Lam 4:22), and the next to last verse of the book introduces a new petition: “Bring us back to you, LORD, that we may return: renew our days as of old” (5:21). This appeal reflects consciousness of the need for full reconciliation with God and for divine action to make it possible (cf. Is 63:15–19; 64:4; Jer 24:7; 31:31–34; 32:39–40). Yet no sign or assurance of relief from the present reality of death, subjection, and loss is offered, and the book ends with a reminder that the community still suffers the rejection and anger of God (Lam 5:22). The gravity and finality of Jerusalem’s dismemberment remains held in mind and, according to Lamentations 3, this is of value: it is good to wait for deliverance and bear the yoke of the present “in silence” (Lam 3:26–28).

Lamentations brings different speaking voices into play. These include, in addition to the poetic narrator, the personified city (Lam 1:9, 11–16, 18– 22; 2:20–22), the city’s children (Lam 2:12), outside observers (Lam 2:15), Jerusalem’s enemies (Lam 2:16), an unnamed individual sufferer (Lam 3), the nation’s and the city’s inhabitants (Lam 4:15), and the community as a body (Lam 4:17–20; Lam 5). The use of different speaking voices brings the full catastrophe of Jerusalem’s fall to life for readers and listeners. The lively interaction between these voices suggests an attempt to engage future generations and to move them to grieve over, remember, and learn from a disaster that might willingly be forgotten.

Relation to Jeremiah

Parallels in settings, such as the fall of Jerusalem; the use of phrases like “daughter Zion,” “daughter Jerusalem,” and “daughter of my people”; and the language of weeping and lament have long suggested links between the books of Jeremiah and Lamentations (cf., e.g., Jer 8:18–9:21 and Lam 2:18; 3:48–49). Both Jeremiah 1–20 and Lamentations employ different speaking voices. The individual voice that laments the pain and rejection entailed in trusting in God evokes Jeremiah’s prophetic laments (cf. Lam 3:28 and Jer 15:17). The poems note the connection between the people’s guilt or sin and their misfortune that the book of Jeremiah repeatedly heralds.

Some manuscripts and editions of ancient translations of Lamentations add the phrase “of Jeremiah” to the book’s title “Lamentations.” The Septuagint (LXX), further, inserts a heading: “And it came to pass that Jeremiah sat weeping and composed this lament over Jerusalem and said . . .” Lamentations, along with Baruch, is placed directly after Jeremiah in the LXX and the Vulgate, and it has remained in that position in the Christian canon. The earliest complete Hebrew Bible, however, does not join Lamentations to Jeremiah or group it with the prophetic books but places it among the “Writings,” the last section of the Jewish canon.

The five poems of Lamentations make no reference to Jeremiah or to a prophetic context, except to note the absence of “any vision from the LORD” among the prophets (Lam 2:9) and to rue the false prophets who have contributed to Jerusalem’s downfall (Lam 2:14; 4:13). The poetic narrators of the five laments never claim to relay a divine word, nor do they explicitly warn or prepare the people for an impending act or appearance of God. Rather, Lamentations describes the impact of an act of God that has been already been carried out in the ravaging of Jerusalem. The words of the individual sufferer in Lamentations 3 show more verbal parallels with Job and with psalms of individual lament than with Jeremiah or other prophetic figures.

Overall the five poems express the elemental need of the people for the God who has turned against them. They reach out in desperation and supplication, asking God to take notice of the city and its people again (Lam 1:11, 20–21; 2:20; 5:1, 20). They are prayers lifted up at a time when there is nothing left to pray for except divine attention.

The points of correspondence between the books of Lamentations and Jeremiah do create a wider context for understanding the witness of each to the dissolution of God's city and people. Modern scholars, however, do not link the two books by common authorship. Like the communal and individual lament psalms, the poems of Lamentations offer no specific markers of authorship or date of composition, and they may well represent a collection of laments by different authors. They may also have developed over time through use in liturgical settings, such as the postexilic ritual of fasting and mourning on the fifth month noted in the book of Zechariah (Zec 7:1–3).

Lamentations clearly postdates the Babylonian conquest of Jerusalem in 587, as it marks and reflects on this life-changing moment in the history of the people of Israel. As such it has long formed a part of both Jewish and Christian liturgical prayer. In Jewish tradition, Lamentations is read in the liturgy of the ninth of Ab (the fifth month in the Jewish calendar), which commemorates the destruction of both the First and Second Temples. In Christian tradition, Lamentations was incorporated into liturgical services known as tenebrae ("darkness") on Holy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday.

Form and Structure

The five poems of Lamentations share basic elements with the communal laments of the psalms. These include questions and pointed statements directed at God (Pss 44:23; 60:3–5, 12; 79:5; 89:47, 50), especially the question "Why?" (Pss 44:24–25; 74:1, 11; 79:10; 80:13). Descriptions of communal distress and appeals to God to look, hear, and respond to the helpless state of the nation or city (cf. Pss 44:27; 60:6–7; 74:18–23; 79:9–13; 80:2–4, 15–20; 83:2; 89:48, 51) are also integral to both these psalms and Lamentations. Scholars, further, point to an ancient Mesopotamian poetic genre known as the city lament as an indirect influence on Lamentations. Existing examples of this genre mourn the desertion of a city by its protective deity and the subsequent demolishment of the city by enemies.

The focus of Lamentations on grieving both the death of the city (and Temple) and the death filling the city with the bodies of young and old, princes and priests, women and children often takes on the tenor of a lament over the dead (cf. 2 Sm 1:19–27; Jer 7:29; 9:16–20; Am 5:1–3; 8:10). Many, though not all, of the poetic lines in Lamentations 1–4 are shaped in a pattern or rhythm associated with biblical laments over the dead: the qinah (lament) meter, in which the second half of the line is shorter than the first (cf. Jer 9:18–20; Am 5:1–3). In the book of Lamentations as a whole, the last two poems are shorter than the first three, which suggests to some a large-scale reflection of the long/short pattern in the poetic line.

A formal poetic device, the alphabetic acrostic, shapes the five poems of Lamentations in varying degrees. In Lamentations 1 and 2, the first word of each three-line stanza begins with a successive letter of the alphabet. Lamentations 4 shows this same form, but with two-line stanzas. In Lamentations 3, the acrostic is denser, with each of the lines of the three-line stanza beginning with the same letter. Lamentations 5 is not an acrostic in the strict sense but has twenty-two lines, reflecting the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet (cf. Pss 33, 38, 103).

The acrostic pattern in Lamentations creates a sense of symmetry in the collection as a whole. This formal structure, further, evokes solemnity and a design that overlays the expressions of grief and horror in the poem. The special density of the acrostic in Lamentations 3, the central poem, draws attention to its reflective wisdom and assertion of trust in God’s mercy despite the experience of divine anger.

The word “How” also plays a part in unifying the five poems into a formal whole. This exclamation marks the drastic change in Jerusalem’s state in Lam 1:1, 2:1, and 4:1 and conveys astonishment: “How solitary sits the city, once filled with people” (Lam 1:1; cf. 2 Sm 2:19; Jer 2:21; 9:18; 48:17).

Lamentations 1

The first poem begins by contrasting the desolation of the present with the teeming city of the past (Lam 1:1). The poetic narrator immediately personifies Jerusalem as a woman: a widow, forlorn and without protection;

a laboring slave, who was once a princess; and a mother who has lost her children (Lam 1:1, 5). The personification extends even to the roads leading to Zion and the gates of the city, which, along with designated human lamenters, mourn and are desolate (Lam 1:4). The impression of bleak isolation without comfort is explicit (Lam 1:2): “She has no one to comfort her.” This motif is repeated throughout the poem, underscoring both the need for comfort and the impossibility of finding it in a loss that is total and final: “Zion stretches out her hands, with no one to comfort her” (Lam 1:17; cf. 1:9, 16, 21).

The personification of Jerusalem as “daughter Zion” (Lam 1:6) comes to life when the voice of the city breaks into the poetic narrative, speaking in the first person of her plight and calling upon the God who has brought it on her (Lam 1:9, 11–16, 18–22). Both the voice of Zion herself and the poetic narrator see God’s hand in the city’s agony: “Is there any pain like my pain, which has been ruthlessly inflicted upon me / With which the LORD has tormented me on the day of his blazing wrath?” (Lam 1:12). At the same time, the poem offers reasons for God’s anger or indignation: “the LORD has afflicted her for her many rebellions” (Lam 1:5); “Jerusalem has sinned grievously, therefore she has become a mockery” (Lam 1:8); “Her uncleanness is on her skirt” (Lam 1:9; cf. 1:17); and “The LORD is in the right: I had defied his command” (Lam 1:18; cf. 1:14). This last declaration takes on the aspect of a warning or teaching, as it is followed by an appeal to others to attend: “Listen all you peoples, and see my pain: My young women and young men have gone into captivity” (Lam 1:18).

In the absence of comforters and comfort, Zion turns to God with the appeal first to “see” and “pay attention” (Lam 1:11–12, 20). As in the lament psalms, both individual and communal, Zion is surrounded or overcome by enemies (Lam 1:5, 7, 10, 17). The poem ends with Zion’s petition that God requite these aggressors for their role in her pain: “Let all their evil come before you and deal with them / As you have so ruthlessly dealt with me for all my rebellions” (Lam 1:22; cf. Ps 137:7–9).

Lamentations 2

In this poem the main speaker is the poetic narrator, who witnesses God’s dismemberment of Jerusalem and its Temple as the footprint of the divine presence on earth: “How the Lord in his wrath has abhorred daughter Zion / Casting down from heaven to earth the glory of Israel / Not remembering his footstool on the day of his wrath!” (Lam 2:1). The narrator evokes Jerusalem as a living organism, or kingdom, intoning the loss of its princes (Lam 2:2, 9), its sanctuary (Lam 2:4, 6–7), its walls and gates (Lam 2:8–9), and its human inhabitants—old, young, and infants (Lam 2:10–12). The range of God’s fierce action is broad as well as deep in its extremity: children die of hunger or are even eaten by their mothers (Lam 2:12, 20; cf. Lam 4:10; Jer 19:9; Dt 28:53). Again, no comfort is possible, “for your breach [breaking] is vast as the sea; who could heal you?” (Lam 2:13; cf. Jer 30:12–13). Even Jerusalem’s prophets are at a loss and “do not obtain any vision from the LORD” (Lam 2:9; cf. Am 8:11–12). All that Jerusalem was is broken and either dead or dying.

The narrator links this death to Jerusalem’s failure to recognize and remedy her guilt: “Your prophets provided you visions of whitewashed illusion; / They did not lay bare your guilt, in order to restore your fortunes” (Lam 2:14; cf. Ps 74:9). At the same time the declaration that God “has fulfilled the threat decreed from days of old” suggests a history of prophetic warning that has been ignored (Lam 2:17).

In the present moment the speaker summons Zion to supplicate God for deliverance from extinction: “Lift up your hands to him for the lives of your children / Who collapse from hunger at the corner of every street” (Lam 2:19). As if in response, the voice of Zion breaks in to entreat God to take notice of the suffering caused by the divine hand: “Look, O LORD, and pay attention” (Lam 2:20). The poem ends as it began with a stark statement of the unimagined force and reach of divine anger, here in the voice of personified Zion: “On the day of the LORD’s wrath, none survived or escaped / Those I have borne and nurtured, my enemy has utterly destroyed” (Lam 2:22; cf. Ps 44:23).

Lamentations 3

This poem stands out from the others in that it is voiced by an individual speaking in the first person of personal affliction: “I am one who has known affliction under the rod of God’s anger / One whom he has driven and forced to walk in darkness, not in light; / Against me alone he turns his hand—again and again all day long” (Lam 3:1–3). At the same time, this individual expresses grief and torment “by the sight of all the daughters of my city” (Lam 3:51; cf. 3:48–50) and speaks for the community to God: “You wrapped yourself in wrath and pursued us, killing without pity” (Lam

3:43). The individual voice of this poem allows readers and listeners to connect the personal experience of pain and isolation, so frequently expressed in the psalms of individual lament, with the massive scale of suffering unleashed by Jerusalem's fall. It brings the expressions of trust in God's saving presence that are a consistent element of these psalms to bear on the speaker's assertions of God's mercy and the need to wait upon God's deliverance in silence (Lam 3:22–39).

In this context of classic lament, the speaker's reflections on the nature of divine mercy and its relation to the divine rejection of injustice (Lam 3:34–36) carry the sense of wisdom shared by one who has personally experienced affliction and sought illumination (cf. Ps 25; Ps 73). The speaker's appeal to (or with) the community, "Let us search and examine our ways, and return to the LORD" takes on the resonance of wise counsel (Lam 3:40). The poem ends, as does Lamentations 1, with a petition for divine requital on those who seek to harm the speaker and, by extension, on the enemies of the people as a whole (Lam 3:59–66).

Lamentations 4

Again, beginning with the exclamation "How," this poem resumes the depiction of Jerusalem's devastation: "How the gold has lost its luster, the noble metal changed / Jewels lie scattered at the corner of every street" (Lam 4:1). This visual metaphor is translated in human terms to "Zion's precious children, worth their weight in gold" in the next verse (Lam 4:2). The poetic narrator speaks of Jerusalem and its people in the third person but shifts to first-person speech in places, creating a sense of personal identification and eyewitness that effectively engages the reader or listener. Thus the narrator speaks of "The punishment of the daughter of my people" (Lam 4:6) and dramatically reconstructs the city's helplessness: "Even now our eyes are worn out, searching in vain for help" (Lam 4:17; cf. 4:18–20). The poem ends with a direct address to personified Zion that conveys a word of assurance: "Your punishment is completed, daughter Zion, the LORD will not prolong your exile / The LORD will punish your iniquity, daughter Edom, will lay bare your sins" (Lam 4:22; cf. Is 40:2). This confident sighting of both an end to Zion's punishment and the requital of Israel's archetypal enemy Edom recalls again the vows of trust in divine deliverance in the individual psalms of lament.

Lamentations 5

This last poem, voiced as a communal lament in the first-person plural, is not structured as tightly as the others. It lacks the acrostic form, although its twenty-two verses match the number of letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Nor do its verses reflect the long/short pattern of the qinah meter. It is framed by two petitions, opening with the simple appeal “Remember, LORD, what has happened to us, pay attention, and see our disgrace” (Lam 5:1) and drawing to a close with a more profound appeal: “Bring us back to you, LORD, that we may return: renew our days as of old” (Lam 5:21).

In between these verses is the portrayal of communal distress as subjection and slavery to foreigners: “We pay money to drink our own water, our own wood comes at a price. / With a yoke on our necks, we are driven; we are worn out, but allowed no rest” (Lam 5:4–5; cf. Is 62:8). Slavery affects all elements of the community in different ways: women are raped, princes hanged, elders shown no respect, young men put to hard labor (Lam 5:11–13). The quintessential sorrow is that Mount Zion, the site of the Temple, lies desolate, a vacant area given over to wild animals (Lam 5:18). Again the speaker traces this loss to the sins of the community (Lam 5:16; cf. Lam 5:7; Ps 79:8). The picture of Jerusalem’s misery in this concluding poem is framed less in terms of the siege and destruction of the city than in terms of their aftermath. It evokes the situation of later generations living under foreign rule.

The lament ends on a mixed note. The affirmation that, despite the desolation of the Temple, God remains “enthroned forever” is followed by the “Why” question of divine absence: “Why have you utterly forgotten us, forsaken us for so long?” (Lam 5:19–20). The last two verses of the lament (Lam 5:21–22) juxtapose the need for restoration of the relationship with God and the present state of divine rejection. The petition to “Bring us back to you, LORD, that we may return: renew our days as of old” expresses a new awareness of both God’s power to do so and the necessity of this divine act for Jerusalem’s renewal (Lam 5:21; cf. Jer 31:18; 31:31–34; 32:39–40). Yet the last word of Lamentations 5 (and of the book) underscores the lack of any sign of God’s movement in this direction: “For now you have indeed rejected us and utterly turned your wrath against us” (Lam 5:22; cf. Pss 44:24; 60:12; 74:9; 79:5; 89:39, 47). This verse could also be translated with a darker shade of doubt, “Unless you have rejected us . . . ”

In either case the last verse of Lamentations 5 bears out the need to grasp the wisdom of the individual sufferer in Lamentations 3: “The LORD is good to those who trust in him, to the one that seeks him / It is good to hope in silence for the LORD’s deliverance / It is good for a person, when young, to bear the yoke / To sit alone and in silence, when its weight lies heavy / To put one’s mouth in the dust—there may yet be hope” (Lam 3:25–29). Under the crushing weight of Jerusalem’s fall, this expression of hope is both tentative and extraordinary.

BARUCH

see pages [1151–1160 of the Old Testament]

The book of Baruch is one of the deuterocanonical books in the Roman Catholic and Orthodox canons. In this book Baruch, the scribe and disciple of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer 36:32; Jer 45), is presented as the author of a scroll written while he was living among the exiles in Babylon (Bar 1–5). The last chapter of the book is presented as a copy of a letter Jeremiah sent from Jerusalem to the exiles in Babylon (Bar 6). The book as a whole addresses the situation of the people of Israel after the conquest of Jerusalem, both those remaining in Judah and those scattered abroad.

The book was preserved in the Septuagint (LXX) in Greek, but no ancient manuscripts or fragments in Hebrew have been found. Most scholars agree, however, that a good part of the book (Bar 1:1–3:8; Bar 6), and possibly the whole work, were originally written in Hebrew. The LXX presents Baruch 6 as a separate work, “The Letter of Jeremiah,” but the Latin Vulgate incorporates the letter into the book of Baruch.

According to the book’s narrative introduction, Baruch writes the scroll in Babylon and sends it to Jerusalem, accompanied by funds for the restoration of sacrificial worship on the Temple altar and by the silver vessels carried off from the Temple by the Babylonians in their final assault on Jerusalem. The scroll is prefaced with a request for prayers for those living in Babylon.

The scroll is to be read in the “house of the LORD” (Temple) on an unnamed feast day and on other “days of assembly” in the Temple. It provides the script for a long penitential prayer, or lament, that appeals to the mercy of God for full deliverance from the reduced circumstances and scattered state of the people of Israel (Bar 1:15–3:8). This prayer is followed by a poem praising the divine wisdom revealed in the law, which offers Israel a means to enduring peace (Bar 3:9–4:4) and a poetic exhortation to the Israelites to appeal to God in hope of the full manifestation of Jerusalem’s glory, which is the glory of God (Bar 4:5–5:9). The introductory verses of the book (Bar 1:1–14) imply that everything that follows is intended to be read on an ongoing basis in the temple, with a view to cultivating recognition of the harm done by past wrongdoing along with a new reverence for God (Bar 3:7–8); adherence to the revealed law (Bar 4:1–4); and patient waiting in hope of God’s merciful deliverance (Bar 4:25–29).

The letter of Jeremiah in Baruch 6 serves as a coda, directing those living in foreign lands (and, if the letter is read within the framework of Bar 1–5, the inhabitants of Jerusalem as well), to shed any awe of idols, who are not gods, and revere the real God who can save from death and deliver the weak from the strong, restore sight to the blind, and pity the widow (Bar 6:35–37).

As a whole, Baruch addresses a community that is still scattered after the Babylonian exile but that looks to Jerusalem and the temple as its vital center. The book directs a people who are subjected to foreign rule and influence both at home and abroad to appeal to God’s mercy, hold on to the divine gift of the revealed law, and trust in God’s salvific promise of a reunited people that will represent forever “the peace of justice, the glory of God’s worship” (Bar 5:4).

Historical Setting

The chronology on view in Baruch is blurred. Baruch writes his scroll in “the fifth year” and on the “seventh day of the month,” a date linked to the time of the capture and burning of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (Bar 1:1–2). The “fifth year” presumably represents the fifth year after the fall of the city and the destruction of the Temple. Yet the scroll is sent with instructions to the people of Jerusalem to read it in “the house of the LORD,” as if the Temple had already been rebuilt (Bar 1:14). According to the book of Ezra, this rebuilding was not accomplished until after the Persian conquest of Babylon and the first stages of return of the exiles to Judah (Ezr 6:13–18). The sending of funds to support sacrificial rituals in the Temple, or at least on the altar of the temple (Ezr 3:1–5), is also connected with the return of significant numbers of exiles to Jerusalem under Persian rule (Ezr 1:1–4; 7:12–24; 8:1–30).

The reference to the changed state of the Temple “to what it is today” in Bar 2:26 is vague, and for the most part, the body of the book speaks in general terms of exile among many nations (Bar 2:4; 4:6) and cities (Bar 4:32), and of “enemies” in the plural (Bar 4:25). References in the exhortation to the manifestation of God's glory in Jerusalem (Bar 5:1–9) are reminiscent of the prophetic oracles of Third Isaiah (Is 56–66) to a community struggling to rebuild Judah and Jerusalem (Bar 5:1–9; cf. Is 60–62; 66:18–20). The letter of Jeremiah in Baruch 6 expands the duration of exile from seventy years (Jer 25:11–12; Jer 29:10) to seven generations, or 280 years (Bar 6:2).

The narrative focus of the book on Jerusalem (Bar 1:15; 4:5–5:9) suggests a time of composition well after the first stages of return from exile in the sixth to fifth centuries BC. In Baruch, distinctions between the exiles and those living in Judah have disappeared, and the relationship between Jerusalem and the scattered people of Israel is like that of a mother to her children (Bar 4:10–12, in contrast to Jer 24).

The book of Baruch addresses the reality of an extended, exile-like situation in which Judah is subject to foreign rule and many of its people are living in foreign lands “from east to west” (Bar 4:37; 5:5). Parallels in Baruch with later biblical books suggest a time of composition in the postexilic period. The poem praising divine Wisdom in Bar 3:9–4:4 has close parallels with the similar poem in Job 28 and also with the second-century poem identifying wisdom with the revealed law in Sirach 24. The penitential prayer in Baruch 1:15–3:8 resembles that in Daniel 9, although both may reflect a traditional postexilic prayer (such as those found in Ezr 9:6–15; Neh 1:5–11; 9:5–37; and Dan 3:24–45). There is a range of proposed dates for the final compilation of the book from the fourth century BC to the second century AD. Many scholars, however, date the book in its final compilation to the Greek or Hellenistic period in Judah, that is, in the third to second centuries BC.

Relation to Jeremiah

The introduction to Baruch connects the book with Jeremiah through the figure of Baruch, the son of Neriah, and Jeremiah's scribe (Jer 36:4; 45:1), but it gives Baruch a longer pedigree (Bar 1:1). The letter of Jeremiah in Baruch 6 recalls the prophet's letter to the Babylonian exiles in Jeremiah 29. There are, however, clear discrepancies between the two books. As the book of Baruch opens, Baruch is living with the exilic community in Babylon after the fall of Jerusalem. Yet Jeremiah 43 recounts that both Baruch and Jeremiah were taken to Egypt by a group of fugitives from Judah after the Babylonian occupation of the land (Jer 43:1–7). As noted, the letter of Jeremiah in Baruch 6 refers to seven generations of exile, whereas the letter in Jeremiah 29 sets the time of exile at seventy years.

At the same time, the communal lament of Bar 1:15–3:8 echoes the language and perspective of Jeremiah's prose oracles, including the promise of a change of heart in Jer 31:31–34. The exhortation in Bar 4:4–5:9 is reminiscent of the promises of return and consolation in Jeremiah 30–31. Baruch 6 builds on the denunciations of idolatrous worship in Jeremiah 10:1–16 (cf. Jer 1–3). The distinct sections of the book of Baruch have been integrated as a continuation of the prophetic tradition of Jeremiah through his scribe Baruch. Church tradition continued to see this connection: citations from Baruch in the church fathers are attributed to Jeremiah.

The book of Baruch is part of a group of works written subsequent to the time of the prophet Jeremiah, but related to him through the figure of Baruch. These works include 2 Baruch, 3 Baruch, and 4 Baruch, also known as the Paraleipomena of Jeremiah ("What Is Left Out of Jeremiah"). These three books were composed after the destruction of the Second Temple by the Romans in 70 AD. They represent expansions of the tradition of Jeremiah to reflect on new situations and turning points in the life of the people of Israel that call to mind earlier experiences. The book of Baruch extends, as it were, the last chapter of Jeremiah into the long period of exile that follows the destruction of Jerusalem but does not fully end with the return of some of the exiles to Judah.

Form and Structure

Baruch appears in many ways to be a composite work that may well have been composed by different authors at different times. The narrative introduction, the opening penitential prayer, and the letter of Jeremiah are written in prose; the ode to Wisdom and the exhortation are poetry. The phrasing of the prayer closely resembles that of the prose oracles of Jeremiah, whereas such parallels are less concentrated in the rest of Baruch, even in the letter of Jeremiah in Baruch 6. The penitential prayer (Bar 2:6) uses the title "LORD," the Wisdom poem (Bar 3:9–4:4) uses "God" and the feminine pronouns for Wisdom, and the exhortation (Bar 4:5–5:9) speaks repeatedly of the "Eternal One." Baruch 6 is, of course, attributed to Jeremiah, and its separation from Baruch 1–5 in the LXX may suggest it is an independent composition. Finally, although there is general agreement that the introduction and opening prayer as well as the letter of Jeremiah were composed in Hebrew, there is ongoing debate over whether the Wisdom poem and exhortation were first composed in Greek.

As a whole, though, Baruch 1–6 shows a common focus on exile, broadly defined. Threads of common language connect its various parts. There is a narrative flow to the book, which guides a people broken apart by catastrophe to confess their role in the situation they lament, to revere and grow in the wisdom of God revealed in the law, to hope for the glorious restoration of Jerusalem, and to steer clear of the deceptive allure of idols.

Baruch can be broken down into the following sections:

Bar 1:1–14 Narrative Introduction

Bar 1:15–3:8 Penitential Prayer for God’s Mercy

Bar 3:9–4:4 Poem in Praise of Divine Wisdom

Bar 4:5–5:9 Exhortation to Hope in the Eternal God

Bar 6 Warning against Idols

Baruch 1:1–3:8

The narrative frame of the book of Baruch is established in Baruch 1:1–14. Baruch writes a scroll in Babylon on the fifth anniversary of the burning of Jerusalem, reads it aloud to the exiles, and sends it to Jerusalem. It is to be proclaimed in the Temple on special days of communal worship, and prayers for the safety and fortitude of those living in exile are to be offered.

The scroll itself is reproduced beginning in Baruch 1:15 with a long communal prayer in the form of a lament. The prayer opens with a confession of sin: “To the Lord our God belongs justice; to us, the people of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem, to be shamefaced, as on this day” (Bar 1:15; cf. Dn 9:7). This confession of Israel’s long history of failure to listen to and follow the voice of God reiterates prophetic accusations in the book of Jeremiah. They are now to be recited by the community Jeremiah could not save from disaster. This community is to acknowledge that “each of us has followed the inclinations of our wicked hearts, served other gods, and done evil in the sight of the LORD, our God” (Bar 1:22; cf. Is 53:6; 58:3, 13). The relation between the community’s distance from God, and the long-term harm that still clings to the community like a curse and shapes their situation, is part of the recitation (Bar 1:20; cf. Dn 9:11–14; Dt 28:15).

The petition for God’s mercy that follows the confession appeals to the LORD to protect the community in the precarious situation of exile: “We are left few in number among the nations where you have scattered us. Hear, LORD, our prayer of supplication, and deliver us for your own sake: grant us favor in the sight of those who brought us into exile” (Bar 2:13–14). By stages, the prayer moves toward calling on God’s promise to change hearts. First, however, it acknowledges the community’s new potential not only to grieve over sin and its consequences but to praise God: “The person who is deeply grieved, who walks bowed and feeble, with failing eyes and famished soul, will declare your glory and justice, LORD!” (Bar 2:18; cf. Ps 51:17–19). The experience of grief in exile has turned their hearts away from their own “inclinations” toward recognizing God’s just presence (Ps 119:71–72).

After a second confession of sin and acknowledgement of the connection of Israel’s diminishment with the “wickedness of the house which bears your name,” or the Temple (Bar 2:26; cf. Jer 7:1–15), the prayer alludes to the divine promise given through Moses that the Israelites would experience a “change of heart”(discernment and will), “in the land of their exile” (Bar 2:30; cf. Dt 30:1–2; Jer 24:7; 32:39). This will enable them to “turn back from their stiff-necked stubbornness, and from their evil deeds, because they shall remember the ways of their ancestors who sinned against the LORD” (Bar 2:32–33; cf. Ez 36:31).

The confessions of Israel’s pattern of sin and its sad outcome suggest that the process of internal transformation has begun. Yet the instructions for continued recitation of the prayer imply that this change of heart is not complete. When it is, God will not only bring the community back to the land: significantly, “they shall rule it” (Bar 2:34). Then the promise of an eternal (that is, unbreakable) covenant between God and Israel will be realized, and the people will remain in the land forever (Bar 2:35; cf. Jer 32:40; Ez 37:26).

The prayer ends on a positive note but spells out a process that is still underway. God has put the fear of God—reverence for God’s presence and power in the world—into the heart of the people “that we may call upon your name” (Bar 3:7; cf. Jer 32:39). In time the community will praise God in their exile because they will remove from their hearts the wickedness, or injustice, of their ancestors (Bar 3:7; cf. Ps 34:12–15; Prv 3:7), whose wrongful acts still “cling” to them (Bar 3:4; cf. 1:20). This sequence indicates that ongoing prayer, effort, and internal growth on the community’s part will be needed. The prayer ends by reminding God of the need for divine attention as well: “See, today we are in exile, where you have scattered us, an object of reproach and cursing and punishment for all the wicked deeds of our ancestors, who withdrew from the LORD, our God” (Bar 3:8).

Baruch 3:9–4:4

The poem about divine Wisdom that follows the community’s lament is intended to offer a way forward. In teaching mode, the poem begins with a question: “How is it, Israel, that you are in the land of your foes, grown old in a foreign land?” (Bar 3:10). The answer is to the point: “You have forsaken the fountain of wisdom / Had you walked in the way of God, you would have dwelt in enduring peace” (Bar 3:12–13). With prudence (thoughtfulness), strength, and understanding—all attributes of wisdom—come life, joy, and peace, but one must learn where to look for this kind of wisdom (Bar 3:14; cf. 1:12). Wisdom is not open to direct human access: “Who has found the place of wisdom? Who has entered into her treasuries?” (Bar 3:15; cf. Job 28:12–13). Only God, whose dominion in creation is “vast and endless, high and immeasurable” and “who established the earth for all time” knows wisdom (Bar 3:25, 32; cf. Prv 3:19–20; 8:22–23; Is 40:12–26; Job 38:1–42:6; Sir 24:3).

Baruch’s ode to Wisdom is thus a poem in praise of the eternal and omniscient God: “Such is our God; no other is to be compared to him” (Bar 3:36; cf. Is 40:18, 25). Baruch here equates wisdom with divine Wisdom, appearing on earth, “at home with mortals,” and disclosed to Israel as “the book of the precepts of God, the law that endures forever” (Bar 3:37–4:1; cf. Sir 24:23). The significance of the law here recalls Jeremiah’s declaration of the new covenant, in which the divine law or teaching is written on the hearts of the people. With their hearts shaped by the directives of the law, the people will not only know God but will become God’s people, with all memory of their former sins removed (cf. Jer 31:31–34; 33:8). Baruch, however, underscores the necessary human response to divine Wisdom in the law: “Turn, O Jacob, and receive her: walk by her light toward splendor” (Bar 4:2; cf. Is 2:5). Israel must actively hold on to the hope of splendor by living out the law in the face of foreign alternatives: “Do not give your glory to another, your privileges to an alien nation / Blessed are we, O Israel; for what pleases God is known to us!” (Bar 4:4).

A major part of this stunning praise of divine Wisdom is read each year in the liturgy of the Easter Vigil (Bar 3:9–15; 3:32–4:4).

Baruch 4:5–5:9

The third major part of Baruch builds on the appeal to God's mercy in the opening prayer as well as on the assurance of life, peace, and joy through adherence to God's law. It issues a strong exhortation to "Take courage, my people!" (Bar 4:5, 21, 27, 30), offering wise counsel colored by prophetic language. The exhortation subtly but repeatedly makes the point that no matter how long the duration of exile, dispersion, and captivity, God is the "eternal God" (Bar 4:8), the "Eternal One" (Bar 4:10, 14, 20, 22, 24, 35; 5:2), the "Holy One" (Bar 4:22, 37; 5:5), and the "eternal Savior" (Bar 4:22). As such, God can bring Jerusalem and her captive people "eternal joy" (Bar 4:29; cf. 4:23).

The personified voice of Jerusalem in Bar 4:9–29 lends persuasive intimacy to this promise. A grieving mother, Jerusalem has witnessed the "captivity that the Eternal One has brought upon my sons and daughters" (Bar 4:10) because they "turned from the law of God, and did not acknowledge his statutes; In the ways of God's commandments they did now walk, nor did they tread the disciplined paths of of his justice" (Bar 4:12–13). Yet Jerusalem herself is helpless to save them: "What can I do to help you? / The one who has brought this evil upon you must himself deliver you from your enemies' hands" (Bar 4:17–18).

Jerusalem's children thus must "take courage" and "call upon God" for the mercy that will come swiftly from their "eternal Savior" once they ask (Bar 4:21–22). The confidence of Jerusalem in God's mercy here matches the appeal to the mercy of God who is "enthroned forever" in the book's opening prayer (Bar 3:3). From an eternal perspective, God's salvation is coming soon (Bar 4:24). Jerusalem thus encourages her children to "bear patiently the wrath that has come upon you from God" (Bar 4:25). At the same time they must intensify their efforts to draw nearer to the divine presence: "As your hearts have been disposed to stray from God, so turn now ten times the more to seek him" (Bar 4:28; cf. Lam 3:26–30).

In the last section of the exhortation the voice of Baruch urges Jerusalem herself to "take courage" (Bar 2:30). The Eternal One will reverse the fortunes of those cities who enslaved her children and gather in the scattered (Bar 4:31–37). Jerusalem should put mourning aside (Bar 5:1) and “rise up” in anticipation of the return of her children (Bar 5:5), led by God “with the peace and justice that are his” (Bar 5:9). The language and imagery of return in Bar 5:1–9 echoes not only the promises of imminent return in Second Isaiah (cf. Is 40:3–4; 48:20) but also the vision of eschatological redemption for Jerusalem and its people as a sign of God’s glory and justice in Third Isaiah (cf. Is 60:4–9, 19–22; 61:3, 10–11; 62:1–3; 66:18–20). It is for this universal and permanent ingathering of the dispersed to a Jerusalem clothed in God’s glory that the people of Israel must wait.

Baruch 6

The letter of Jeremiah to the exiles in Babylon echoes the letter of Baruch from Babylon to Jerusalem. It underscores the separation of the Israelite community and the changed realities of its life both in Judah and in the Diaspora. The introduction of the book might imply that the letter of Jeremiah to the exiles was to be bundled with Baruch’s scroll and sent to Jerusalem to be read to the community there. In any case, its inclusion in the book of Baruch creates the impression of a wider audience than the exiles for whom it was first intended.

Unlike the letter in Jeremiah 29, the letter in Baruch 6 issues a single instruction: a warning against being in thrall to idols and foreign gods. It has been noted that the description of idols in Baruch 6 is nonspecific and does not evoke particular Babylonian rituals. This warning against idols could easily be applied to the Israelites’ ongoing position of subjection to foreign rule and coexistence with foreign cultures.

Baruch 6 draws out the exposé of the foolishness of idols and insistence on the superiority of Israel’s God in Jeremiah 10 (Jer 10:1–16; cf. Is 40:18–20; 44:9–20; 46:1–7; Pss 115:4–8; 135:15–18). Throughout a series of ten demystifying arguments, the refrain is: “Know therefore, they are not gods, do not fear them,” or a close variant (Bar 6:14; cf. 6:22, 28, 39, 44, 49, 51, 56, 64, 68). Despite their lavish gilding and their exaltation by devotees, these gods are useless: less than human, made and manipulated by humans who are blatantly corrupt and irreverent (Bar 6:9–10, 27–32; cf. 6:45–51).

The idols resemble kings and rulers in form (Bar 6:11–14) but execute no justice or deliverance: “They neither save anyone from death, nor deliver the weak from the strong, nor do they restore sight to the blind, or rescue anyone in distress. They widow they do not pity, the orphan they do not help” (Bar 6:35–37; cf. Bar 6:52–53, 63). In light of Israel’s diminished state and domination by foreign powers, this is the crux of Baruch’s argument. The letter exhorts exiles of all kinds to dismiss such false gods: “When you see the crowd before them and behind worshiping them, say in your hearts, ‘You, LORD, are the one to be worshiped’ ” (Bar 6:5). This instruction protects all exposed to the illusionary majesty of foreign deities. It is accompanied by assurance of another form of divine protection: “For my angel is with you, and he will keep watch on you” (Bar 6:6).

EZEKIEL

see pages [1161–1220 of the Old Testament]

The book of Ezekiel is built around three visions of the glory of God: on a river bank in Babylon; in Jerusalem, exiting the defiled Temple; and back in the land of Judah, entering a reconfigured and holy Temple. Ezekiel is introduced as a priest, deported with many of leaders of Judah after the first Babylonian invasion of the city in 597 BC. The divine visions he receives inform his prophetic mission as he shares, or is directed to share, them with the exiles (Ez 11:24–25; 40:4; 43:10–11). They impart an unforgettable visual dimension to the prophetic word.

In Ezekiel's first vision God addresses him as "son of man," designating him as human in relation to the divine presence (Ez 2:1). At the same time, Ezekiel perceives God as if in the likeness and appearance of a human being (though enthroned above the sky and surrounded by fiery brilliance). In his visionary experiences, Ezekiel serves as a human connection with a transcendent God who, despite the utter degeneracy of Jerusalem, chooses to appear to a "son of man" and through him to speak to those in exile from the city.

Like Jeremiah, Ezekiel receives a divine word of judgment on Jerusalem, but from the spatial distance of exile and the visionary distance of a future beyond exile. Whereas the book of Jeremiah dwells largely on the present reality of loss and dislocation, the thrust of the book of Ezekiel is forward, toward God's re-creation of the exiles into a new house of Israel. Ezekiel does not suggest that return to the land is imminent, as does Isaiah 40–55 (Second Isaiah). Rather, the exiles are to ponder the visions of new life Ezekiel brings them so as to feel shame and regret for the sins that led to their banishment and in preparation for a new order of holiness in sanctuary, city, and land (Ez 43:10–12).

The Temple was never rebuilt according to the dimensions specified in Ezekiel 40–48, nor were the old tribal territories of the land reapportioned, nor was Jerusalem renamed "The LORD is there" (Ez 48:35). Yet Ezekiel's vision of an ideal Jerusalem and Judah, with the divine presence at its center and inhabited by a community with a new heart and spirit, remains as a paradigm of hope.

Historical Setting

The book of Ezekiel is unusual among the prophets in the number of precise dates (fourteen in all) it assigns to its visions and oracles. These begin with the date given for Ezekiel's first vision, the fifth year of King Jehoiakin's exile (593), and end with the date given for his final vision, the twenty-fifth year of our exile, or fourteen years after Jerusalem was captured (573). These dates set the book in a time beginning shortly after the first Babylonian invasion and deportations in 597 and extending twenty years into the period of exile in Babylon, which came to an end in 539. Like Jeremiah, Ezekiel receives the word of God during the time of King Zedekiah's reign in Judah, when Jeremiah himself writes to the exiles in Babylon (Jeremiah 29). Ezekiel, however, is commissioned as a prophet while living among the exiles and directed to speak to them as his own people, "the house of Israel" (Ez 3:1, 11). His last vision is dated well before the victories of the Persian king Cyrus began to loose Babylon's hold on world power (ca. 550), heralding the end of the exile. Thus the setting of Ezekiel's visions and words precedes that of the speeches of Isaiah 40–55 (Second Isaiah).

The recurrent depiction of the "elders" of Judah or Israel sitting before Ezekiel as if consulting God through him suggests a leadership group within the exilic community oriented towards the divine word through priestly and prophetic instruction (Ez 8:1; 14:1; 20:1). A wider, less receptive and less serious audience among the exiles is portrayed in references to those who talk with each other about Ezekiel and flock in a crowd to listen to him (Ez 12:21–23; 21:5; 33:30–33). False prophets of peace, as in Jeremiah, continue to pose a problem in the exilic community (Ezekiel 13).

The careful chronology of the book and the narrative logic of Ezekiel's visions suggest a fairly stable frame of reference and composition in the period of exile, although some degree of reworking and expansion as the text was proclaimed and handed on in the postexilic era is presumed. The vision of the redesigned Temple and land in Ezekiel 40–48 is unique in relation to the rest of the book, but it is well integrated into its overall structure.

Literary Structure

The book of Ezekiel, like the books of Isaiah and Jeremiah, incorporates a range of prophetic expression, including accounts of visions; oracles of judgment against Jerusalem and the people and leaders of Judah; instructions to Ezekiel to perform symbolic acts; oracles against foreign nations; oracles of new life for exilic community; instructions for the exiles; allegories and parables; and laws governing the ritual and moral lives of a renewed community. This diverse material is integrated within a sequential structure marked by the dates that appear throughout the book. Ezekiel follows a chronological progression from roughly seven years before news of the fall of Jerusalem reaches the exiles to roughly the midpoint of exile.

Interpreters generally make a basic division between Ezekiel 1–24, in which declarations of judgment against Jerusalem and Judah prevail, and Ezekiel 33–48, in which oracles and visions of a renewed community follow the announcement of Jerusalem's capture (Ez 33:21). Ezekiel 25–32, a collection of oracles against foreign nations, lies between these two major divisions and widens the picture of judgment and of God's rule over all human contenders.

It should be noted, however, that there are oracles of the possibility of future deliverance and change for the exiles among those foretelling unmitigated judgment on Jerusalem in Ezekiel 1–24 (Ez 3:17–21; 11:14–24; 18:1–32; 20:40–44). At the same time, warnings of judgment and accountability for the exiles and for the nations appear among the visions and oracles of divine reconciliation in Ezekiel 33–48 (Ez 34:17–22; 35:38–39). In this sense the three parts of Ezekiel are interwoven.

The three extended visions of the glory of God contribute to the book's narrative coherence: an initial theophany in Babylon (Ez 1–3); the vision of the glory of God departing from the defiled temple prior to the burning of Jerusalem (Ez 8–11); and the climactic vision of the return of the divine presence to the new temple (Ez 40–48).

The book as whole can be divided into the following parts:

Part I: Ezekiel 1–24 Visions and Oracles of Judgment against Jerusalem

Part II: Ezekiel 25–32 Oracles against Foreign Nations

Part III: Ezekiel 33–48 Visions and Oracles of Transformation and Renewal

Special Elements in Ezekiel

A Priestly Perspective

Ezekiel is identified as “the priest Ezekiel, the son of Buzi” in the opening verses of the book (Ez 1:3). Jeremiah is said to be the son of the priest Hilkiah (Jer 1:1), but the naming of Ezekiel himself as a priest implies designation for active service in the Temple. Although in exile he could not offer sacrifice (sacrifice was not allowed outside the Temple), he could take up the priestly tasks of marking for the community the distinction between the sacred and profane, clean and unclean, and teaching them the laws governing communal life revealed through Moses (Lv 10:10–11; Ez 22:26; 44:23–24). These priestly responsibilities blend with Ezekiel’s call to tell the exiles of the divine visions and words he receives, and thus a priestly perspective shapes the book as a whole. The “thirtieth year” (Ez 1:1) in which Ezekiel experiences his first vision may refer to the age at which priestly service in the sanctuary begins, according to Numbers 4:3, 23, 35 (cf. 1 Chr 23:3–4).

The priest’s role is to maintain the purity of the community in keeping with God’s presence in its midst and especially to protect the holiness of the sanctuary as the locus of that presence. The images and visions of the book of Ezekiel reflect the mandates for holiness articulated in the book of Leviticus as well as the rituals prescribed for the periodic removal of the effects of sin on the sanctuary and community.

Ezekiel repeatedly highlights the importance of preserving the holiness of God’s name, that is, of how God is known. The holiness of the divine name is manifest through the people whom God intends to make holy (Ez 20:12). Over a long history with the people of Israel, extending back even to their enslavement in Egypt, the people have repeatedly been distracted by idols and have made up their own rules, failing to keep the Sabbath holy and to follow all God’s life-giving laws (Ez 20:1–31).

It is God’s aim, in Ezekiel, to restore the holiness of the divine name by ensuring the holiness of the exilic community: “You shall never again desecrate my holy name with your offerings and your idols! For on my holy mountain, on the highest mountain in Israel—oracle of the Lord God—there the whole house of Israel shall worship me; there in the land I will accept them all, there I will claim your tributes, the best of your offerings, from all your holy things. As a sweet-smelling oblation I will accept you, when I bring you from among the nations and gather you out of the lands over which you were scattered; and through you I will manifest my holiness in the sight of the nations” (Ez 20:39–41; cf. Ez 36:23; 39:27; Ex 19:6). The descriptions of the visionary Temple at the end of the book underscore the holiness of every aspect of the new design as a meeting ground between God and people, guarding the people from ever defiling God’s holy name again (Ez 43:7).

Ezekiel portrays Jerusalem’s destruction and Judah’s desolation as a removal of the defiling effects of serious wrongdoing on a grand scale: “the land will be emptied of what fills it—the lawlessness of all its inhabitants” (Ez 12:19). The word “abomination,” used to refer to intolerable ritual and moral offenses in Leviticus and Deuteronomy, occurs more than forty times in Ezekiel’s oracles of judgment. Such offenses have utterly defiled Jerusalem, and its people must be scattered to remove their uncleanness (Ez 22:1–5, 15). In two different symbolic depictions, Ezekiel 9–10 and 24 portray the burning of Jerusalem as a sacrificial ritual of purification.

The exiles are directed not to mourn over the city’s fall, just as Ezekiel is commanded to act as a sign for them by refraining from mourning over the death of his wife (Ez 24:15–24). The leveling of Jerusalem is the prelude to a new order and new life. With the news of the capture of Jerusalem in Ezekiel 33, the prophetic word turns toward oracles of divine cleansing and renewal for the exilic community. The priestly narrative of the flood in Genesis 6–9 shows a similar movement from a creation corrupted with lawlessness and violence to a new creative order (cf. Ez 7:23; 9:9).

Human Responsibility

The divine instructions given to Ezekiel entail an appeal to the exiles to choose to do what is good and to shun evil ways. In Ezekiel 3 (repeated in Ez 33), the prophet is commissioned by God as a sentinel, or watchman, to warn both the wicked and the just to turn away from doing wrong. In Ezekiel 18 the divine word distinguishes, similarly, between the just, who do what is right (banishing idols, harming no one, and following God’s laws), and the unjust, who commit abominations (indulging in idolatrous rituals, in violence, and in abusing the weak). Contrasting fates await the just and the violent: life for the one, death for the other. These instructions not only insist on a measure of human responsibility but entail differentiation between members of the community.

The notion of individual choice and consequence for members of the covenant community is inherent in the biblical law codes and in the earliest wisdom traditions in Proverbs, which appeal to each person to do what is wise and right in the long run. The language of individual choice and accountability in certain passages of Ezekiel reflects the priestly role of instruction in the divinely revealed laws and in the distinction between lawful and unlawful, sacred and profane. Psalms 15 and 24, which concern requirements for admission to the Temple, make such distinctions in relation to both moral and ritual practices. Ezekiel 22 cites a range of norms that have been violated by the Israelites (Ez 22:1–12) and Ezekiel 44–46 imparts the laws that will govern the community formed around the new Temple.

Respect for the parameters of divine law is incumbent on every member of the community, but that is to say it is incumbent on the community as a whole. The people of Judah have put themselves at risk of extinction by bringing themselves to the point of utter corruption. The actions of their leaders and members have made Jerusalem into a “city of bloodshed” (Ez 22:2). The appeal to individuals within the community in Ezekiel 18 to live justly, honoring the sacred tradition of the laws, must be heard in relation to Ezekiel’s audience in this chapter: the “house of Israel” (Ez 18:25, 29, 30, 31). Throughout the book, Ezekiel addresses the community as a whole, foretelling the devastation of “all flesh” in the land of Israel due to communal defilement of the land (Ez 21:8–10; cf. Ez 22:18–22) as well as God’s gathering of the exiles to purify and revive them as a unified body (Ez 36–37). Ezekiel’s consistent focus is on the divine act of re-creating the exiles as a people: “You will be my people, and I will be your God” (Ez 36:25–28; 37:12–14, 26–28).

It is within the frame created by this focus that Ezekiel summons the exiles to take responsibility for their actions. The divine act of purification and transformation of the people through a new heart and spirit will enable the community to do what is just and to feel shame for their failures (Ez 36:27–32). The divine spirit will bring to life and knowledge of God a community that regards itself as dead bones cut off from God (Ez 37:11–14). These divine acts are essential to the future of Israel, as is the vision of a new God-centered city and land in Ezekiel 40–48.

Human responsibility in Ezekiel is related to the divine grace that makes it possible. Ezekiel's prophetic commission as a sentinel who cries out warnings implies that human response plays a vital role in the reconstituted community of exiles. Yet without the divine spirit alive in their very being, this community would remain inert and lifeless.

The Spirit of God

The figure of Ezekiel is a priest and also a visionary. Like the prophets Elijah and Jeremiah, he feels the hand, or power, of the LORD upon him (1 Kgs 18:46; Jer 15:17), and he is lifted up and transported by the spirit (Ez 2:2; 3:12, 14; 11:1, 5, 24. 37:1; 40:1; 43:5). The spirit of God is a major motif throughout the book of Ezekiel beginning with Ezekiel's first vision, in which the spirit moves the cherubim and wheels that drive God's heavenly throne (Ez 1:12). The divine intent in Ezekiel is to infuse the exilic community with a new spirit so that they can follow God's ways (Ez 11:19–20; 36:26–28; 39:29). The Hebrew word for spirit (ruah) also means “wind” or “breath,” and in Ezekiel 37 God directs Ezekiel to call forth “the breath” from the four winds to breathe life into dead bones that symbolize the scattered house of Israel (Ez 37:14). In Ezekiel the spirit of God is the force through which God exercises rule over heaven and earth, and brings about communion between the divine and the human house of Israel (Ez 39:29).

The Power of Divine Holiness

The phrase “they (or you) shall know that I am the LORD” is a constant refrain in the book of Ezekiel, occurring more than fifty times. The recurrent use of this phrase in Ezekiel is reminiscent of its role in Exodus 1–16, where it conveys the undeniable power of God over the imperial might of Pharaoh. In Ezekiel both the destruction of Jerusalem (Ez 6:10, 14; 7:4, 27; 22:16, 22; 23:49; 33:29) and the gathering and renewal of the exiles (Ez 20:44; 34:30; 36:38; 37:14) manifest this power to Israelites. In the restoration of Israel, the nations, too, will come to know God: “Then the surrounding nations that remain shall know that I, the LORD, have rebuilt what was destroyed and replanted what was desolate” (Ez 36:36).

The power of God to transform is frequently expressed in Ezekiel in terms of divine holiness, or transcendence: “When I bring them back from the nations and gather them from the lands of their enemies, I will show my holiness through them in the sight of many nations. Thus they shall know that I, the LORD am their God” (Ez 39:27–28; cf. Ez 20:41–44). In particular, it is the divine act of making holy what has become defiled that will bring the nations to recognize God’s hand: “Then the nations shall know that I, the LORD, make Israel holy, by putting my sanctuary among them forever.” (Ez 37:28). The commanding power of God is given eschatological dimensions in the divine battle against the ultimate, mythic enemy Gog: “And so I will show my greatness and holiness and make myself known in the sight of many nations. Then they shall know that I am the LORD” (Ez 38:23; cf. 39:7).

Visionary, Allegorical, and Mythic Language

As a sign of the holiness of God, which transcends human limits, the visionary language of Ezekiel often verges on the fantastic, defying full human comprehension. It is difficult, for example, to translate Ezekiel’s initial vision of the intricate movements of the throne of God or his last vision of the Temple complex into realistic images. The vision of the valley of dry bones, in which the bones join together and spring to life, has no direct human parallel, although it has been taken as an image of resurrection in Jewish and Christian traditions.

Characteristic of the book of Ezekiel generally are extended metaphors or parables and allegories that create a mythic landscape for divine action: the allegory of the vine (Ez 15), the foundling daughter (Ez 16), the eagle and the cedar tree (Ez 17), the lioness and her cubs (Ez 19), the sister prostitutes (Ez 23), the sacrificial pot (Ez 24), the great ship (Ez 27), and the dragon of the Nile (Ez 29). The oracle against the prince of Tyre in Ezekiel 28 speaks of the prince dwelling in “Eden, the garden of God” and on “the holy mountain of God” before he was banished and driven out by the “cherub” (Ez 28:13–14).

This recurrence of parable and mythic language suggests that for Ezekiel, divine activity is often best expressed by analogy or in mythic scenarios that evoke the divine realm. The book indicates that Ezekiel’s mode of speech does not penetrate the understanding of all who listen to him. Some consider him as simply a storyteller or “spinner of parables” (Ez 21:5) or as a “singer of love songs, with a pleasant voice and a clever touch” (Ez 33:32). They will come to know that he speaks as a prophet only when the judgment he warns of comes (Ez 33:33).

Part I: Ezekiel 1–24

Ezekiel 1–3

The account of Ezekiel's call and commission as a prophet is narrated in the voice of the prophet himself (save for the aside in Ez 1:2–3). It begins with an unprecedented vision of the glory of God. This vision is notable for its suddenness and location in Babylon. It is legendary for its forcefulness and strange details, which are difficult to describe and integrate. The narrative is dense with analogical language: words meaning “like” or “looked like,” “seem,” and “appearance” recur throughout.

What Ezekiel sees first is a massive cloud, an apt image of what is perceptible yet veiled, and a locus of God's glory, or presence, in the book of Exodus (Ex 16:10; 24:16–17). The cloud is part of a storm wind that flashes with fire, a classic image of theophany, or the appearance of God in full power (Ex 19:16–17).

Ezekiel can see up to a point into the gleaming center of the cloud. There he discerns figures “in the likeness of four living creatures” that look like nothing seen on earth. They are human in form, or likeness, but each has four faces and also wings and hooves. They move in all four directions without turning, guided by “the spirit”; have an appearance overall like “burning coals of fire”; and are interconnected by something like torches, or burning points of light (Ez 1:13–14).

These four-faced, winged creatures reflect in multidimensional and dynamic form the gold cherubim placed in the sanctuary on either side of the ark (Ex 25:17–22; 1 Kgs 8:7). Such protective guardian figures were often set on either side of the thrones of kings, or at the entrance to the throne room of a palace, in ancient Near Eastern cultures. In Ezekiel's vision they have sprung to life, and he sees the beings themselves, as Isaiah sees the seraphim surrounding the divine throne in Isaiah 6.

Ezekiel's initial view into the cloud expands as he sees the mechanism of an elaborate, wheeled vehicle. The wheels, which are attached to the cherubim, move in coordination with the spirit, upwards as well as in four directions. As Ezekiel's gaze moves above the heads of the cherubim, beyond what looks like the shining surface of the sky, the full vision unfolds. He sees sitting on a sapphire-like throne a figure that looks like a human being but is surrounded with brilliant light and the appearance of fire. “Such,” Ezekiel sums up, “was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD” (Ez 1:28). The doubling up of “appearance” and “likeness” conveys Ezekiel’s imperfect perception of the divine presence.

What Ezekiel does see is telling, though. The glory of God is perceived as resembling a human king seated on a heavenly throne. This throne is mobile and moves in at least five directions. Apparently it can also move so as to be in more than one place at a time. According to the chronology given at the beginning of the narrative, Ezekiel receives this vision in the fifth year of the first deportations to Babylon (Ez 1:2). At this time the Temple in Jerusalem, though plundered by the Babylonians, was still standing, with the glory of God present over the ark and cherubim figures guarding it (1 Kgs 8:6). Yet God is fully and magnificently present to the exiles in Babylon, defying human parameters of space and time.

The book of Ezekiel begins with this experience of the glory of God, which he sees as dynamic and potent, despite the plundering of the Temple. Ezekiel registers the overwhelming force of this experience by falling on his face (cf. Is 6:1–5). He is raised by the sound of a divine voice that activates the spirit to enter into him and bring him to his feet (Ez 2:1–2), reflecting the movement of the cherubim by the spirit. Ezekiel is distinguished from these heavenly beings, however, by being addressed by God as “son of man,” or “human being.” This title designates Ezekiel as an intermediary between God, who looks something like a human being, and the Israelites to whom he will be sent. They are a human community whose children “are bold of face and stubborn of heart” (Ez 2:3–4). Ezekiel will speak to them as one of them but, at the same time, as one moved by the spirit and communicating words and visions he has received from God.

Ezekiel’s commission as a prophet begins with a visionary hand holding out a scroll, covered with writing, that God commands him to eat. Unlike the rebellious Israelites, Ezekiel is to absorb and accept the words God gives him. Even though the words speak of “lamentation, wailing, and woe,” they taste “sweet as honey” in his mouth, indicating his close link with God (Ez 2:9; 3:3; cf. Jer 15:16). Ezekiel is then sent to the exiles: “Now go to the exiles, to your own people, and speak to them” (Ez 3:11). The community exiled in Babylon is to be regarded as the “house of Israel,” despite the fact that there are still Israelites living in Judah and Jerusalem, and even though the exiles are stubborn and “a rebellious house” (3:7–9).

Ezekiel is lifted up by the spirit and carried to the exilic settlement at Tel-abib, a name which means “mound of spring grain” (Ez 3:15).

After seven days, perhaps corresponding to the seven-day initiation ritual for priests (Ex 29:35–37; Lv 8:33–35), God further defines Ezekiel’s role as prophet. He is to be a “sentinel,” or watchman, for the exiles, warning them of danger based on the word he receives from God (Ez 3:17). Both the wicked and the just are to be warned: the wicked that they “shall surely die” for their sin if they do not change their ways, and the just, similarly, if they do not persist in right and good ways (Ez 3:18–21). This final briefing by God sums up the divine word to the exilic community going forward. Heeding Ezekiel’s warnings will not save Jerusalem or its inhabitants from destruction, but it will mean continued life for the exiles. And by intrepidly speaking God’s warnings, Ezekiel will ensure life for himself, as well.

In the final segment of Ezekiel’s inaugural vision, the “hand” or power of God falls on him and he again sees the divine glory, falls on his face, is raised up by the spirit, and is given a last command. Paradoxically, he is to remain mute and shut within his house, unable to rebuke or guide the exiles. He will only be able to speak to them when God opens his mouth (3:22–27). As is made clear in Ezekiel 24 and 33, this will happen only when Jerusalem is finally stormed and captured by the Babylonians (Ez 24:25–27; 33:21–22). The divine commissioning of Ezekiel as a sentinel is repeated at the beginning of Ezekiel 33, just before the city falls and the hand of the LORD opens his mouth to speak (Ez 33:1–9).

The frame of reference for Ezekiel’s role as sentinel for the exiles, then, is the period after the fall of Jerusalem. The prophetic warnings in Ezekiel 4–24 are preliminary to the full mission of Ezekiel to this community when it is finally cut off from its past by the burning of Jerusalem.

Ezekiel 8–11

The extravagant symbolic acts Ezekiel is commanded to perform in Ezekiel 4–5 and the harsh oracles of judgment that follow in Ezekiel 6–7 prepare for the reception of Ezekiel’s second vision of the glory of God in Ezekiel 8–11. Once again Ezekiel feels the hand of God and sees before him a human-like figure, similar to the one sitting on a heavenly throne in his first vision, fiery and with the brilliance of polished bronze (Ez 8:2). This man stretches out “the form of a hand” and seizes Ezekiel’s hair (Ez 8:3). The anthropomorphic imagery effectively illustrates the intimate connection between God and prophet, although marking visible distinctions.

The spirit lifts Ezekiel into the air and transports him “in divine vision” to Jerusalem and the inner gate of the temple. There he sees the glory of God as it appeared in Babylon. The Temple gate is marred by a “statue of jealousy,” presumably the sculpture of unnamed deity. Ezekiel’s divine guide points to it as a foretaste of the “great abominations” the house of Israel in Jerusalem are practicing in the Temple, which are so great that “I must depart from my sanctuary” (Ez 8:6; cf. 5:11).

Inside the sacred precinct multiple polytheistic rituals are in full swing, and there is no indication that any of the regular sacrificial rituals that sanctify the temple as the dwelling place of God are taking place. Rather, the elders, or leaders, of Jerusalem are engaged in burning incense to gods represented by images of animals. Their reason for doing this, rather than appealing to God, Ezekiel’s guide explains, is that they are convinced that, “The LORD cannot see us; the LORD has forsaken the land” (Ez 8:12; cf. Jer 12:4; Is 40:27). This utterance suggests a counsel of despair following the first Babylonian invasion and plunder of the Temple. The elders have given up on God and resorted to other means of survival because they believe God has given up on them. In the inner courtyard women are participating in the rites of the vegetation god Tammuz, and men are turning their backs to the Temple and bowing down, eastward, to the rising sun.

The remaining inhabitants of Jerusalem, then, have so filled the house of God with foreign rituals and idolatrous images that the divine presence is about to leave it. In other ancient cultures, when a city is abandoned by its protective deity, it is vulnerable to invading armies and the famine and disease caused by siege and warfare. In the book of Ezekiel, the destruction of Jerusalem by conquerors is envisioned as a ritual carried out by angelic agents following God’s command. The burning of the city is necessary not only because God’s sanctuary is given over to invocations of foreign gods but because the land as a whole is “filled with bloodshed, the city with lawlessness,” or violence (Ez 9:9; cf. 7:23; Gn 6:11–13). The guilt, or wickedness, of those in the land is “too great to measure”: mayhem rules, and there is nothing left to salvage (cf. Ez 22:18–19).

The possibility that there are some left in Jerusalem who “groan and lament” over the abominations that have become common practice is raised when the divine voice directs the angelic scribe to search for them. He is to mark their foreheads with an X so that they may be spared. Whether any are so marked is noticeably unreported (cf. Ez 22:30). The hypothetical instance of righteous individuals in a thoroughly corrupt community is raised in Ezekiel 14, in the examples of Noah, Daniel, and Job, all legendary figures of virtue (Ez 14:12–20). Even such righteous men, however, would save only themselves, not the land as a whole (as the Genesis account of Noah bears out). The focus of Ezekiel’s vision is on the inevitable devastation of Jerusalem as it stands, though some may escape death through captivity (Ez 6:8–10; 12:7–11, 16).

The linen garment of the angelic scribe is reminiscent of the linen tunic worn by priests (Ex 28:39), and his task of marking those to be spared evokes the priestly role of distinguishing between clean and unclean, lawful and unlawful (Lv 10:10–11). The slaughter that God commands in Ezekiel 9 is thus given ritual associations, as is the burning of Jerusalem in Ezekiel 10. The divine voice commands the man in linen to take burning coals from the wheels of the cherubim holding the divine throne and to scatter them over the city (Ez 10:2, 6–7).

In the last scene of this vision, the glory of God, which has already moved away from the ark to the threshold of the Temple (Ez 9:3; 10:4), ascends to the heavenly throne supported by the living cherubim, pauses at the eastern gate of the Temple (Ez 10:19), and moves on to rest on a mountain east of the city (Ez 11:23). It is thus headed in the direction of Babylon, where it will continue to be, in some measure, a “sanctuary” for the exiles there (Ez 11:16). Babylon is, in any case, where Ezekiel is taken back by the spirit to tell the exiles all he has been shown (Ez 11:25).

At the end of this extended vision, Ezekiel receives an oracle that clarifies the hope God invests in the exilic community (Ez 11:14–21). The current inhabitants of Jerusalem assure themselves that they are protected by the walls of the city and that they have a right to possess the land (Ez 11:3, 15). God intends, however, to make a new people out of the exiles, replacing their stony hearts and giving them new hearts and a new spirit (Ez 11:19–20). They will stand apart from those remaining in Jerusalem, who have given themselves over to “atrocities and abominations” (Ez 11:21). This first declaration of a profound change of heart and spirit amongst the exiles points forward to lengthier oracles of restoration and transformation placed in the book after the announcement of Jerusalem's capture in Ezekiel 33 (cf. Ez 36:27).

Ezekiel 18

As Ezekiel 11 looks ahead to oracles of restoration delivered to the exiles after the fall of Jerusalem, Ezekiel 18 offers a preview of the kind of prophetic warning and instruction he is instructed to give them at that time (Ez 33:10–20). In this chapter the oracles respond to a lament summarized in the widely circulating “sour grapes” proverb: the present generation suffers the effects of what the previous generation has done (Ez 18:1–2; cf. Jer 31:29). It can be assumed that the immediate audience of these oracles is, again, the community in exile, who place the blame for their burden of loss on their forbearers. The divine concern in this oracle is to move the exiles to take responsibility for their own lives with God by following God's ways.

The proverb suggests a set sequence of intergenerational sin and its consequences (cf. Ex 20:5). God insists, however, on the precedence of divine judgment (cf. Ex 33:19), declaring that “all life is mine” and that “only the one who sins shall die” (Ez 18:4; cf. Jer 31: 30; Dt 24:16). Although these words make a distinction between those who choose to do right and those who do not, the oracle appeals to the whole “house of Israel” to act reverently and justly so to ensure their continued collective life (Ez 18:30–32). This is what God desires: the exiles are assured that God takes no pleasure in the death of the wicked but rejoices in those who turn from serious offenses and live (Ez 18:23, 32). The message is consistent with Ezekiel's commission as a sentinel to the house of Israel to protect them from relapsing into behavior that will bring them into mortal harm, and in fact the prophet's recommissioning and message are joined together in Ezekiel 33 (Ez 33:1–20).

At the end of Ezekiel 18 God calls directly upon the house of Israel to “cast away from you all the crimes you have committed, and make for yourselves a new heart and a new spirit” (Ez 18:31). This command reflects a different dimension of conversion from that displayed in the divine promise of a new heart and spirit in Ezekiel 11 (Ez 11:19–20; cf. 36:26–29). It affirms the role of human response in a transformation made possible by divine fiat (cf. Jer 4:4; 29:12–14). The twice repeated lists of ethical and ritual norms that constitute justice in Ezekiel 18 (Ez 18:5–13, 15–17) evoke the priestly role of teaching the community the distinction between just and unjust, clean and unclean in relation to divine laws.

Ezekiel 24

The first major part of the book of Ezekiel ends in Ezekiel 24 with an allegory and a symbolic act that highlight Jerusalem's destruction as prelude to a new dynamic between God and the house of Israel. The allegory of the pot refers back to the confident statement of the leaders of Jerusalem in Ezekiel's second vision, that they are safe from harm: "The city is the pot, and we are the meat" (Ez 11:3). The allegory in Ezekiel 24 turns this expectation around, drawing on images of the communion sacrifice, in which the meat of sacrificial animals was boiled and then shared by priest and worshippers (cf. 1 Sm 2:12–17). The burning of Jerusalem is represented as a sacrifice, but an impure one, due to the blood that has been shed in the "city full of blood" (Ez 24:9). Thus not only will those who live within the city perish, the city (pot) itself must be burned to the ground in order to cleanse the encrusted impurity of blood that has been carelessly poured out in its midst (Ez 24:7, 11–13).

A symbolic act follows, in which Ezekiel is told that his wife, "the delight of his eyes," will suddenly die, but that he is not to publicly lament over her or cease normal activities despite his internal grief (Ez 24:15–17; cf. Ez 21:11–12). In his restraint he will serve as a sign that the exiles are not to enter into a state of mourning over God's desecration of the Temple, "the pride of your strength, the delight of your eyes, the concern of your soul" (Ez 24:21; cf. 2 Sm 12:16–23). On the day a fugitive from Jerusalem brings news to Ezekiel that the Temple is gone, a new stage in communication between God and people will begin. God will open Ezekiel's mouth to speak to the exiles about their future. In what he says and does he will serve as a sign to them of the divine presence and "they shall know that I am the LORD" (Ez 24:27)

Part II: Ezekiel 25–32

The second part of Ezekiel comprises oracles against foreign nations, the bulk of which consists of lengthy oracles against the city of Tyre (Ez 26–28) and Egypt (Ez 29–32). Featuring these two kingdoms as objects of judgment reflects their role in opposing Babylonian dominion, a futile opposition mirrored by the leaders of Judah. Both Tyre and Egypt will, like Jerusalem, fall to Babylon.

These oracles place divine activity in Judah within a wider arena. Their mythic language and fantastic allegories suggest the cosmic power of God manifest in the collapse of major world powers. Thus the nations, too, will “know that I am the LORD” (Ez 26:6; 28:24; 29:9, 16; 30:19, 25–26; 32:15; cf. 38:23). Two references to future restoration of the house of Israel point forward to the final part of the book (Ez 28:25–26; 29:21).

Part III: Ezekiel 33–48

Ezekiel 33–37

The last part of the book of Ezekiel begins with a review of Ezekiel's initial commission as a sentinel for his people (Ez 33:1–9; cf. 3:17–21) and a reminder of the divine program for the exiles to do what is good (Ez 33:10–20; cf. 18:1–32). This is the point at which, in the narrative of the book, Ezekiel's prophetic mission goes fully into gear. A messenger brings him news of Jerusalem's fall, and his mouth is opened (Ez 33:21–22). The following oracles speak of the transformation of the exiles into God's people, first claimed as a "holy nation" and "kingdom of priests" in the covenant sealed in the wilderness (Ex 19:6).

These oracles begin in Ezekiel 34 with allegorical language that announces a restructuring of leadership over the house of Israel. Israel's shepherds, or human kings, have fed on their flock rather than feeding them, and have let the sheep fall prey to predators, or enemy invaders. God now declares divine kingship over Israel: "I myself will pasture my sheep; I myself will give them rest—oracle of the Lord God (Ez 34:15; cf. 20:33). Protecting the sheep entails assuming the royal role of judge: "I will save my flock so they can no longer be plundered; I will judge between one sheep and another"(Ez 34:22).

God will also rely on a Davidic shepherd to provide for the people, but his title will be "prince" rather than king (Ez 34:23–24). With this arrangement in place, God will make a "covenant of peace" with the people, who will then know concretely not only that their God is the LORD but that they are "my people, the house of Israel" (Ez 34:25–31).

Ezekiel 36 opens with God's proclamation to the mountains of Israel. These mountains have not only been plundered and taken over by other nations (especially Edom, cf. Ez 35) but were the site of the sacrificial offering of children by the Israelites. Despite this horrific history, God declares: "I will turn my face toward you; you will be plowed and planted" (Ez 36:9). People will again settle and multiply there. God will restore the land of Israel, both mountains and valleys, but with a firm rule: "Never again shall you rob your nation of its children—oracle of the Lord God" (Ez 36:15).

The process by which a people who have poured out the blood of children on their land and defiled it with idols (Ez 36:18) will be transformed into God's people is traced, step by step, in the rest of Ezekiel 36. That this transformation is the result of a divinely initiated act is clear from the start. Scattered among the nations, the Israelites have desecrated God's holy name by raising doubts about the protective power of God over them (Ez 36:20–21). For the sake of that name (the way God is known), God will demonstrate divine holiness, or transcendence by working a change in this devastated people. The nations will recognize God's sovereignty when, God tells the exiles, "through you I show my holiness before their very eyes" (Ez 36:23).

The first step in the manifestation of God's holiness is to remove the exiles from foreign territory and bring them back to their own ground. As in a purifying ritual, God will sprinkle clean water on them to remove their impurities (cf. Lv 17:15–16; Ps 51:4, 9; Jer 33:8). Cleansing with water is only the prelude to a more fundamental change, however. A new heart of flesh, to replace their old heart of stone, will enable them to respond to and follow their God (cf. Jer 24:7; 29:39; 31:33). The spirit will guide them in the laws or ways of God and, finally, re-create them as God's people. As in Jeremiah's oracle of the new covenant, separating them from all their past offenses is an essential element of transformation: "I will deliver you from all your impurities" (Ez 36:25–29; cf. Ez 37:23; Jer 31:34; 33:8). A sign of this people's new way of perceiving and responding will be that they remember with shame and loathing their wrongful acts, sins, and abominations (Ez 36:31–32; cf. Ez 6:8–10; 20:43; Is 6:5).

Gaining a new perspective on their past is the endpoint of the exiles' interior transformation. It suggests the capacity to distinguish between what is good and what is harmful, and to shrink from the latter. This will enable them to respond to priestly and prophetic instruction and warning. The instinct for discrimination, however, cannot simply be assumed in the human heart and spirit. Ezekiel insists that the exiles do not merit divine intervention on their own account (Ez 36:22; 32; cf. Is 43:25; 48:11) and that they will not cease to remember this. When they are released from their old patterns of thinking and acting they will continue to feel "ashamed and humbled" because of their former ways (Ez 36:31–32; cf. Is 57:15; 66:2; Ps 51:19).

The aim of the restoration of the house of Israel is that the nations will know “that I the LORD have rebuilt what was destroyed and replanted what was desolate” (Ez 36:36). The people themselves, as God multiplies them on the land, will become like “sheep for sacrifice, like the sheep of Jerusalem on its feast days,” a suitable offering to the God whom they recognize as the LORD (Ez 36:38; cf. 20:41).

The theme of transformation is developed allegorically in the two oracles of Ezekiel 37. In the first oracle (Ez 37:1–14) Ezekiel prophesies to the “breath” or “spirit” (the Hebrew word ruah), to enter into the dry bones he sees strewn in every direction over the broad valley where the spirit leads him. These bones represent an exilic community that has lost hope and is “cut off” from God (cf. Ps 88:6). The spirit lifts the bones up, as it has often lifted Ezekiel, and joins them together, as he has seen it coordinate the cherubim. It brings them to life as a “vast army,” or crowd (Ez 37:10–11). This re-creation is compared to resurrection from the grave, effected by the breath or spirit God summons through Ezekiel. If the exiles can see, as Ezekiel sees, their restoration in this light, they will recognize the LORD’s hand in it: “you shall know that I am the LORD” (Ez 37:13–14).

The symbolic joining of two sticks representing Israel and Judah in the second oracle (Ez 37:15–27) points to a different aspect of the restoration of Israel. God will repair what has been sadly broken since the days of Solomon: “They shall never again be two nations, never again be divided into two kingdoms” (Ez 37:22). As in Ezekiel 34, a Davidic heir will rule over God’s people in the role of a king, but as “their prince forever,” in service to the divine king. It is the placement of God’s sanctuary or dwelling place among the house of Israel, however, that is key to their transformation: “Then the nations shall know that I, the LORD, make Israel holy, by putting my sanctuary among them forever” (Ez 37:28).

Ezekiel 40–48

These chapters relate Ezekiel’s third and longest vision of the glory of God. The ends by imprinting on readers the design of a great temple dominating a rebuilt city, at the center of a newly mapped and populated land. The word “holy” occurs more than twice as often in these final chapters as earlier in the book. The entire land is made and kept holy as God comes to rest in its midst forever (Ez 43:7; cf. Rev 21:3). This scenario is a fitting climax to the divine activity of purging the uncleanness of the land and creating a community guided by the divine spirit.

The first verse of Ezekiel 40 dates the vision to the “twenty-fifth year of our exile” (Ez 40:1). Counting from 597, the year of the first deportations, yields a chronological date of 573. The “twenty-fifth” year may, further, evoke a point halfway to the fiftieth year designated in Leviticus for the release of slaves and forgiveness of debts (Lv 25:8–12). In any case, at the time of this vision the restoration of Israel is not imminent. The vision imparts an ideal whose details form a metaphorical blueprint for the future.

In keeping with Ezekiel’s previous visionary experiences, he feels the hand of the LORD and is carried over a long distance, this time to a high mountain in the land of Israel. As in the first vision, what he sees is not entirely clear: “In front of me, there was something like a city built on it” (Ez 40:2). Again he encounters a man whose bronze-like appearance is a sign of the divine presence (Ez 8:2) and who addresses Ezekiel as “son of man,” or “human.” This divine guide walks him through the visionary temple, carefully measuring its dimensions and calling him to pay close attention so that he can relate what he sees to the exiles (Ez 40:4). The dimensions of the sanctuary and its sacred surroundings are larger than those given in the description of Solomon’s Temple in 1 Kings 6–7 and the architecture more complex, which is why Ezekiel compares it to a city. In a sense it is a sacred city, a hub of activity revolving around the heavenly king who dwells in the throne room of the inner sanctum (Ez 43:7).

Just as Ezekiel’s first vision of the glory of God enthroned above the wheeled cherubim cannot be fully scanned, so it is difficult to put all the details of this vision into a comprehensible whole. The dimension of height, for example, is often omitted, making it difficult to visualize how the gates and stairways stand in relation to the Temple building. No details about the furnishing of the Temple are given, save for the reference to “something that looked like a wooden altar” (the incense altar) in front of the inner room (Ez 41:21–22; cf. 1 Kgs 6:20). The overall impression is of empty space waiting to be filled.

What the particulars do convey is that the temple complex has wide gates to provide access to the sacred domain, outer and inner courtyards that define an increasing measure of holiness in proximity to the sanctuary itself and that control access to it, buildings and rooms for a range of sacrificial activities and priestly ministers, an interior space waiting to be filled with the glory of God, and an inner sanctum (the holy of holies).

Into this sacred domain Ezekiel sees the glory of the LORD enter through the eastern gate, from the direction of Babylon, and fill the Temple (Ez 43:5; cf. Ex 40:34–35). The divine voice speaks, as a king might do, of mounting the throne and declaring stability in his kingdom: “Son of man, do you see the place for my throne, and the place for the soles for my feet? Here I will dwell among the Israelites forever” (Ez 43:7). God’s sanctuary, however, is to be well separated from the palaces of Israel’s kings, who “defiled my holy name by the abominations they committed” (Ez 43:8). It is a divine and not a human seat of rule.

The voice directs Ezekiel to describe the visionary Temple to the exiles in all its details, so that they may be ashamed on account of their former sins (Ez 43:10; cf. 36:31). If they can look back with shame on what they have done, further meditation on the plan and measurements of the Temple will enable them to order their lives according to its “laws and statutes” (Ez 43:11). These laws are summed up in one: “This is the law for the temple: the entire area on top of the mountain all around will be a most holy place” (Ez 43:12). Contemplation of the vision of the Temple, designed in every aspect by God as a most holy place, is a means by which the house of Israel can learn to experience and practice holiness and thus to manifest God’s holiness (Ez 20:40–41; 36:23; 37:28).

The laws and practices of worship in the new Temple are given in Ezekiel 45–46, making the envisioned sacred domain fully operational. In Ezekiel 47 the divine guide shows the prophet the impact of this sacred powerhouse on the entire land, symbolized in the stream that flows out from underneath the Temple toward the desert areas to the southeast. As the stream passes beyond the outer gate of the Temple, it grows deeper and broader, becoming a river teeming with fish and every kind of living creature. Its banks are lined with trees of many kinds that bear fruit continually. The fruits of these trees nourish, their leaves bring healing, and the river even transforms the toxically salty waters of the Dead Sea, making them fresh and supportive of life (Ez 47:8–9, 12; cf. Rev 22:1–2). This imagery of new life stemming from a new creative order in the land is reminiscent of the creation account in Genesis 1 (cf. Gn 1:12, 20).

The mapping out of a new order extends to the final segment of Ezekiel’s vision in which the boundaries of the land are redrawn and the land itself reapportioned equally among the twelve tribes. An additional portion is now to be “set apart for the LORD” (Ez 48:9), a “sacred tract” that cuts across the width of the land, with the temple at its center. Within this sacred portion the space allotted for the temple, priests, and Levites far overshadows the “profane land” given to the city (Ez 48:15). The prince’s lands occupy the margins of the tract (Ez 48:21).

Ezekiel 48 ends with the design of the new city. The naming of its gates, three on each of its four sides, recalls the positioning of the twelve tribes around the moveable tent sanctuary in the wilderness (Ez 48:30–34; Nm 2:1–31; cf. Rev 21:12–13). The new name of the city, “The LORD is there” (Ez 48:35), similarly recalls the abiding presence of God among the people of Israel promised in Exodus (Ex 3:12; 40:34–38), but now at rest: “Here I will dwell among the Israelites forever” (Ez 43:7).

DANIEL AND THE MINOR PROPHETS

JOHN J. COLLINS

DANIEL

see pages [1220–1245 of the Old Testament]

The book of Daniel falls into three sections. The first (chapters 1–6) consists of stories in which Daniel and his three companions are the heroes. The second (7–12) is made up of revelations told by Daniel in the first person. The third (13–14) contains short stories that are not found in the Hebrew/Aramaic text of Daniel but only in the Greek and Latin versions. Jews and Protestant Christians do not accept these stories as canonical, but Protestants include them in the Apocrypha, a collection of ancient Jewish writings, which they consider edifying even if not inspired. The different kinds of material in the three divisions of Daniel reflect the gradual growth of the book. The stories in chapters 1 through 6 are the oldest part and may originally have been independent stories. We know that the revelations were composed during the persecution of the Jews by Antiochus IV Epiphanes of Syria in 168–164 BC. The “Additions” were added some time later, probably before the beginning of the Christian era.

The Tales

The stories in the first six chapters are similar in kind to historical novels—they mention historical names and places but are, nevertheless, fictional. At several points they contradict what we know from other sources about the history of the times. For instance, Belshazzar is presented as a king of Babylon and son of Nebuchadnezzar. Ancient Babylonian inscriptions show that he was son of Nabonidus (a slightly later king), and that he served as deputy ruler in Babylon but was never king. Darius the Mede is not attested independently of the book of Daniel, but Darius was the name of an early Persian king.

In each of these cases the book of Daniel has a smattering of history, but it is not ultimately concerned with historical accuracy. The stories are means of conveying a religious message, like the parables of Jesus, and so the occasional historical characters and places are not the main point. Daniel, like Noah and Job (with whom he is mentioned in Ez 14:14), may never have existed, but the religious value of the stories is none the less for that.

The stories paint a picture of the life of Jewish exiles in Babylon. It is an ideal rather than a realistic picture, but it expresses hopes and defines acceptable behavior. There is a certain analogy between the situation of the Jews in a pagan world and the modern situation of Christians in a secular world, which makes the message of the tales still relevant today. This message has two facets: it affirms the possibility of life in a Gentile environment, and insists on the importance of fidelity to the essentials of the Jewish tradition.

Affirmation of the Gentile Environment

Daniel and his companions are taken into the service of the Babylonian king and are trained in “the language and literature of the Chaldeans.” They express no reservations about this training. Indeed they outshine the Babylonians at their own skills (1:20). The point of chapter 2 is that Daniel can interpret the king’s dream when the Babylonian wise men fail, because of the assistance of his God. His superior ability to interpret mysteries is again in evidence in chapters 4 and 5.

King Nebuchadnezzar’s dream in chapter 2 provides an interesting case study in Daniel’s attitude to Gentile kingship. The dream concerns the famous statue of four metals symbolizing four kingdoms, which will all be destroyed by a stone and which symbolizes the kingdom of God. This dream foretells that ultimately all Gentile kingdoms will be destroyed. There is no urgency about this prophecy, however. God has allotted a lengthy period of time for Gentile rule, and during that period Jews can find fulfillment in the service of a pagan king. The spirit of the passage is similar to that of Jeremiah 27:6–8, which affirms that all nations must serve Babylon until its time too shall come.

Chapters 4 and 5 present two case studies of pagan rule in action. In chapter 4, Nebuchadnezzar becomes proud because of his great kingdom. For this he is punished by being reduced to the condition of a beast. After a time his reason is restored, and he gives praise to God. He is then restored to his kingdom. In chapter 5, Belshazzar behaves arrogantly at a feast and profanes the sacred vessels of the Jews. Mysterious writing appears on the wall, which only Daniel can read. It pronounces judgment on the king.

Because Belshazzar did not learn from the experience of Nebuchadnezzar, he is weighed in the balance and found wanting, and his kingdom is given to the Medes and the Persians. In short, Gentile kings must be subject to God in the fundamental sense that they must temper their arrogance and behave with restraint. If they do this, Daniel has no objection to their rule, and indeed he shows sympathetic concern for Nebuchadnezzar. Only when the kings exceed their limits do they incur the judgment of God.

The Importance of Fidelity

Despite their success at the pagan court, Daniel and his companions remain faithful to their Jewish religion. In chapter 1, they refuse to eat the king's food because it is not kosher. (See the laws concerning clean and unclean food in chapter 11 of the book of Leviticus.) In chapter 3 the three youths refuse to worship the king's statue at the risk of death, and in chapter 6 Daniel likewise refuses to depart from his custom of daily prayer even at the cost of being thrown into the lions' den. In each case the Jews ultimately win the respect of their rulers and emerge more successful than before. The stories of the fiery furnace and the lions' den, like all miracle stories, are meant to arouse a sense of wonder. They are not realistic stories. The long history of Christian martyrdoms and of the persecution of Jews (down to the lethal furnaces of Auschwitz) shows that God does not usually intervene to rescue the innocent. Christian tradition appropriately understood the stories of the furnace and lions' den as representing resurrection from the dead. The essential point in Daniel's stories, however, is that God has the power to save, or to do whatever is for the best. Daniel and his companions have trust in God, and this liberates them to do whatever they ought to do regardless of the immediate consequences. The attitude of the tales is well expressed in the words of the three youths (3:17f): "If our God, whom we serve, can save us from the white-hot furnace and from your hands, O king, may he save us! But even if he will not, you should know, O king, that we will not serve your god or worship the golden statue which you set up." Their fidelity is not conditional. It is a matter of integrity, and this integrity is the key to their success.

The tales in Daniel 1 through 6 have a very optimistic view of the Gentile world. The Jews have enemies at the royal court, largely for reasons of envy, but the kings are well disposed, and repeatedly praise and acknowledge the God of Daniel. In chapter 6, King Darius is dismayed when he is tricked into throwing Daniel to the lions. He is delighted when Daniel survives and readily confesses “the living God, enduring forever” (6:27). The stories stop short of having the king convert to Judaism. In a sense it is even more gratifying to have a pagan king acknowledge the power of the God of the Jews. These tales express confidence that the truth of Jewish religion is powerful enough to impress any person of goodwill. Judaism has nothing to fear from the Gentile or secular world.

Daniel 1 through 6 conveys a sense that God is in control and that all will work out for the best. The kingdom of God can be exercised through the rule of pagan kings. True religion does not require any particular political system. This optimistic view of the world arose from the experience of Jews in foreign lands in much of the ancient world. It is similar to the liberal theology that has flourished in modern times wherever Christians or Jews have lived under tolerant political regimes. It is an attractive view of the world, which emphasizes the good in human nature, and is a viable theology in normal times. Unfortunately, times are not always normal, and there are occasions when we have to give more recognition to the forces of evil in the world. One such occasion in antiquity was the persecution of the Jews in the Maccabean period (see “Biblical History and Archaeology,” RG 58–59), and it was in this situation that the apocalyptic visions of Daniel (7–12) were written.

The Revelations

The Apocalyptic Genre

Daniel’s visions belong to the genre of apocalyptic literature, which takes its name from the book of Revelation in the New Testament. “Apocalypse” (apokalypsis) is simply the Greek word for revelation, but the word has come to be associated with a particular kind of revelation, with certain recurring characteristics.

One trademark of the Jewish apocalypses (though not of the book of Revelation) is pseudonymity—that is, the real authors (whose names are not known) wrote under the names of famous people who had lived long before. Enoch, the most popular visionary, was supposed to have lived before Noah and the flood. (Enoch appears in Gn 5:18–24.) Surprisingly, the people of the second century BC do not appear to have been skeptical about his authorship. Rather, his great antiquity added to the prestige of his writings.

Another trademark of an apocalypse is the presence of a mediating angel. An angel explains the visions to Daniel. In other apocalypses, which are not included in the canon, a visionary such as Enoch is taken on a tour of the heavens, accompanied by an angel as tour guide. The presence of the angel emphasizes the supernatural character of the experience and adds to the sense of mystery. (The interpreting angel first appears in biblical literature in the book of Zechariah.)

Apocalypses also have a typical subject matter. This deals on the one hand with the heavenly world of the angels, and on the other with predictions of the future, especially of a final judgment. This kind of writing was developed in Judaism from the third century BC on and was very popular in early Christianity. The most important Jewish apocalypses are 1 Enoch, 2 Enoch, 2 Esdras, 2 Baruch, 3 Baruch.

No genre of biblical literature is more difficult for the modern reader than the apocalypses. This literature is exceptional even within the Bible. In the modern world liberal Christians tend to avoid it, while fundamentalists too easily adapt it to their own ends. Several factors contribute to the difficulty.

The Heavy Use of Symbolism

Apocalypses do not speak directly but veil their meaning in symbolic language, which is closely related to the language of dreams. All scholars agree that King Antiochus Epiphanes is a major figure in Daniel 7–12 (see note on 7:7–8). Yet the king is never mentioned by name. Instead we read of a beast with ten horns, which sprouts an eleventh, and we can infer from other historical information that the eleventh is Antiochus. The text gives us a clue. It tells us that the four beasts, of which the horned beast is the last, are four kingdoms, but it never identifies them explicitly. The lack of specificity is typical of oracles in the ancient world. It adds a sense of mystery, and strengthens the impression that the prophecy is of supernatural origin. It also has an effect on the long-term interpretation of the apocalypse. Two hundred years after Daniel was written, people could interpret the fourth kingdom as Rome, and the eleventh horn as a Roman emperor. Down through the centuries the beast could be interpreted as the villain of the day. This kind of reinterpretation is helpful if it is done with proper understanding. The apocalyptic vision describes types of characters who reappear in history. Antiochus Epiphanes was not the only tyrant worthy of being described as a beast. One of the uses of an apocalyptic vision is that it gives us language to describe new situations: the scene of beasts rising from the sea could be applied appropriately to the outbreak of World War II. It is important to realize, however, that Daniel was not predicting this war. He was speaking of a persecution in the second century BC, and his vision can be applied to other situations only by analogy. Fundamentalists often read Daniel or the New Testament Apocalypse as if they were written to predict our modern situation. In fact, they were written for their own time and place, but they can help us understand our modern situation because they describe patterns that recur throughout history.

Angels and Demons

Some modern Christians find the prominence of angels and demons in apocalyptic literature to be a problem. For Daniel, the battles between Jews and Greeks are only a reflection of a battle in heaven. Moreover, it is not God who fights for the Jews but the archangel Michael, who is mentioned here by name for the first time. Most people in the ancient world believed that the heavens were peopled with supernatural beings. Usually these were called “gods,” but Jewish and Christian tradition makes a sharp distinction between the supreme deity and the lesser heavenly beings, called angels. The modern secular world, with its scientific approach to the heavens, has little room for such beings. An apocalypse, however, is not a scientific treatise but a work of imagination. To say that there is a battle in heaven between the patron angels of Greece and Judah is to say that earthly war is not entirely subject to human control. Angels provide a vivid way of dramatizing providence or divine control. To understand an apocalypse, we should not ask, “Do these angels exist?” but “What do they stand for?” and especially, “If we imagine a world with angels, what effect does this have on the way we view human life?”

Pseudonymity

We have noted above that all Jewish apocalypses are pseudonymous. This device added to the authority of a book. In an apocalypse it had another advantage: it enabled Daniel to “predict” four hundred years of history, which were already past when the book was written. Since the prediction was demonstrably accurate over these four hundred years, people were more likely to believe the real prediction of what was still to come. From a modern viewpoint this practice seems deceptive and therefore unethical. We consider pseudonymous writing a forgery. The practice was widely accepted, however, in the Greek and Roman world as well as in Judaism. While the common people presumably believed that the revelations were genuinely old, the real authors must have been known to an inner circle. It is difficult for us to reconstruct the mind-set of people who wrote pseudonymous books, but it is certain that they did not regard their work as deceptive. It is possible that the authors put themselves in the place of Enoch and Daniel, and imagined that they were actually describing the visions of these ancient worthies. In any case, the enduring value of the apocalypses does not lie in the accuracy of their predictions but in the kind of conduct they inspired and supported. In the case of Daniel, the question is not whether Daniel really predicted all these things in advance, but whether his stance in the face of religious persecution is a good one.

Determinism

Apocalyptic literature typically assumes that history has a fixed duration and can be divided into a set number of periods (e.g., four kingdoms or seventy weeks of years). The course of events can be predicted centuries in advance. Consequently, history appears to be predetermined. It is important to realize that this does not mean that human decisions are predetermined. On the contrary, the book of Daniel is basically a call for decision in a time of crisis. The course of history is set, and the fate of the righteous and the wicked is predetermined. The fate of any individuals, however, remains to be decided and will be determined by the kinds of decisions they make.

Predictions of the End

Perhaps the aspect of apocalyptic literature that most offends modern sensibilities is the attempt to predict exactly the time of the end. (In Daniel, the end in question is the end of the persecution. In later apocalypticism it is often the end of the world.) Down through the centuries, apocalyptic groups have often set a date for the end of the world, only to see it come and go. Naturally, such predictions have been discredited by their frequent failure. The book of Daniel actually gives three very precise dates for the end of the persecution. In 8:14, an angel says that the Temple will be desolate for 2,300 evenings and mornings, or 1,150 days. At the end of chapter 12, however, we are given two different figures: 1,290 days and 1,335 days.

Presumably the number was increased when the end was delayed. We can understand the function of these numbers in the time of persecution: it was easier to keep going if one believed that relief would come on a specific day. Remarkably enough, though, the failure of these exact predictions did not discredit the book of Daniel. Later interpreters assumed that the figures must have some symbolic meaning and were not to be taken literally. In fact, the attempt to predict the end is only a very minor element in apocalyptic literature, and its importance should not be blown out of proportion. It served a limited purpose in its historical setting, but it must be admitted that such attempts were ultimately counterproductive. This is not an aspect of apocalyptic literature that anyone should try to imitate in a modern setting.

Information or Exhortation?

The problems of interpreting apocalyptic literature in the modern world can be summarized by asking whether we should read these books for information or for exhortation. It is a fact that any apocalypse combines the two aspects. It tries to teach us a view of the world, and if we accept that view we will be disposed to act in a certain way. The problem is that the apocalyptic view of the world is no longer acceptable. Much of the “information” provided by an apocalypse is now incredible if taken literally. It still has value, however, if we regard it as symbolism and focus on the attitudes and actions it was designed to support. Such an ethical focus is fundamentally important for understanding the book of Daniel and its relevance to modern times.

A Symbolic Vision

Chapter 7 is one of the most famous and influential of all apocalyptic visions. In part it resembles Nebuchadnezzar’s dream in chapter 2: it describes four human kingdoms, which will be followed by a kingdom set up by God. The imagery, however, is very different. Instead of four metals, Daniel 7 describes four beasts that rise out of the sea. In biblical poetry the sea is often a symbol of chaos, of all that is opposed to God, and it is sometimes said to be inhabited by monsters (for instance, Is 27:1: God “will slay the dragon in the sea”; compare Is 51:9f). When chapter 7 in Daniel represents the pagan kingdoms as beasts from the sea, then the point is that they are rebellious and opposed to God. This represents a view of the pagan kingdoms, which is much more negative than anything in Daniel 1–6.

After the vision of the four beasts, Daniel sees a judgment scene in which an “Ancient of Days” sits on a throne, surrounded by thousands of angels, and the fourth beast is condemned to the fire (7:9). Then “one like a son of man” appears on the clouds of heaven (7:13). Christian tradition, beginning with the Gospels, identified this figure as Jesus Christ, but the passage could not have been understood in that way by Jews in the second century BC. Jewish tradition identified the “son of man” as the messiah. Modern scholarship is divided between two interpretations: some see the figure as a collective symbol for Israel, others as the archangel Michael. It is quite clear that he represents the triumph of the Jewish people over their persecutors. The issue in dispute is how that triumph was understood. The view that the son-of-man figure is Michael relies on the analogy with Daniel 10–12, where Michael represents Israel in a heavenly battle with the angelic prince of Greece. The triumph of the Jews, then, is imagined in the apocalypse as a victory by their heavenly patron. The son of man is always understood as a heavenly individual in other Jewish apocalypses (1 Enoch, 2 Esdras).

Daniel 7 was written during the persecution of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes of Syria, which is described in 1 and 2 Maccabees. The experience of persecution colored the author’s perception of all Gentile kingdoms. The message of the vision is that pagan rulers are evil and in rebellion against God, but that they will be defeated by the power of God. The symbolism of the vision, however, with its beasts and fire and figure riding on the clouds, expresses this idea with exceptional power and vividness. Consequently, the imagery has been used over and over again in new situations. It provides language that can express the evil, which erupts from time to time in human affairs (think of the Holocaust as a modern example) and which can also express a hope that does not depend on human power. The message of the vision is one of hope. Although the forces against us may be demonic, the power of God and the angels will ultimately prevail. The imagery of this vision is used repeatedly in the Gospels and most elaborately in the book of Revelation.

Daniel 8 is a symbolic vision very similar to chapter 7. Even some of its imagery (the little horn) is taken from the earlier chapter. In this case the central episode of the imagery concerns the revolt of the little horn against the host of heaven. There is a reminiscence here of the morning star, son of the dawn in Isaiah 14, which rises above the stars of God but is then cast down to the depths. Antiochus Epiphanes is identified as an example of the general pattern represented by the Isaianic passage. Again, the prophecy is one of hope since the pattern guaranteed the fall of the rebel.

A Prophecy Reinterpreted

A different kind of revelation is found in chapter 9. In this case, a biblical prophecy provides the point of departure. Jeremiah had prophesied that the land would be subject to Babylon for seventy years. According to 2 Chronicles 36:20f, this prophecy was fulfilled by the restoration under Cyrus of Persia (although only fifty years had elapsed). Zechariah 1:12 related it to the rebuilding of the Temple (about sixty-six years after its destruction). The author of Daniel evidently did not think that the restoration of the Persian period satisfied the prophecy. Rather than discard the prophecy as a failure, however, he reinterpreted it. Seventy years really means seventy weeks of years, or 490 years. The way of interpreting Scripture here is basically the same as the way of interpreting dreams and visions in the previous chapters. (It is also typical of the Pesharim, or biblical commentaries, found among the Dead Sea Scrolls.) The numbers in Jeremiah's prophecy are taken as symbolic. The implications of this procedure are far-reaching. When the visionary says that only three and a half years are left before the end, we cannot be sure that this will not turn out to mean three and a half weeks of years. In short, the impression of precise prediction, which we get from the use of numbers, is misleading. What Daniel ultimately affirms is not the particular timetable but the reliability of the promises of God, however mysterious their timing may be.

Chapter 9 also includes a remarkable prayer on the lips of Daniel. The prayer is of a type common in the postexilic period. (See, e.g., Neh 9.) Its theology is typical of the tradition influenced by the book of Deuteronomy. Israel is punished for its own sin and can only appeal for the mercy of God. This theology is rather different from the usual theology of Daniel. The primary cause of Israel's suffering in apocalyptic theology lies in the wickedness of the nations that rebel against God, and indeed in the predetermined plan of history. In response to the prayer, Daniel receives a revelation, but there is no question of forgiveness, or of shortening the time of trial because of repentance. From the viewpoint of the book of Daniel, it is appropriate to express repentance, as Daniel does, but we should not expect our prayers to alter the course of events.

Another Dimension of History

Daniel's apocalyptic view of history is most fully laid out in chapters 10 through 12, which make up one long vision. There, an angel explains to Daniel that there is an ongoing battle in heaven between the archangels Michael and Gabriel on the one hand and the angelic "princes" of Persia and Greece on the other (10:13, 20f). This battle is reflected on earth in the wars of the Hellenistic age, which are described at length in chapter 11, and especially in the career of Antiochus Epiphanes who takes up approximately half the chapter (11:21–45). At the end Michael will arise in victory (12:1), and the resurrection will follow.

This long passage makes several claims about history, which would not be apparent to the typical observer:

First, what is involved is not just warfare between human kingdoms, but a battle between angelic powers, and the outcome of this cannot be decided by human power.

Second, the course of history is fixed in advance. The battles of the Hellenistic age can be revealed to Daniel in the Babylonian Exile. In fact, the passage was written during the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes. It gives an accurate account of history down to that time (11:39). Such "prophecy after the fact" implies that the course of history is predetermined, and it inspires confidence in the actual prediction with which the passage concludes (in this case, the imminent death of the king, 11:40–45, and the resurrection, 12:1–3).

Third, history culminates with the resurrection of the dead. Daniel is the only book in the Hebrew Bible that clearly affirms the resurrection of individuals. Earlier prophecy sometimes uses the language of resurrection for the restoration of the Jewish nation, as in Isaiah 26:19 and Ezekiel 37. The book of Wisdom, which was composed in Greek about the time of Christ, also has a clear doctrine of immortality. The idea of resurrection had probably been introduced into Judaism before the time of the Maccabees. The noncanonical 1 Enoch, chapter 22, which describes the abodes of the dead as they wait for resurrection, is probably older than Daniel. There is no doubt, however, that the experience of martyrdom in the time of persecution made the Jews more receptive to belief in resurrection than they had been before. The importance of resurrection in that setting can be seen from the story of the seven brothers in 2 Maccabees 7.

Belief in resurrection made an enormous difference to Judaism, and was essential to the origin of Christianity. Traditional Jewish religion had taught that the reward for a just life was to see one's children's children, to the fourth generation, and the welfare of the nation as a whole. In the time of the Maccabees, however, pious Jews were put to death precisely for obeying the Law and so were cut off from the traditional reward for a just life. Belief in life beyond the grave, in the company of the angels, provided an entirely new perspective. Martyrdom was no longer an absurdity but the means to a greater end. So Daniel announced that the wise would take their stand in the time of persecution, even though some of them would fall (11:33–35). These “wise” do not, apparently, join the Maccabees to fight for national independence. Rather, they put their trust in Michael and the heavenly world and choose the way of passive resistance. The stand of these wise teachers exemplifies the ethical stance of the book of Daniel, which is the most enduring message of the book.

There is clear continuity between the apocalyptic message of Daniel 10–12 and the older stories of the fiery furnace and the lions' den. On the one hand there is the belief that God rules all kingdoms and has the power to save. On the other is the conviction that one must act with integrity even at the cost of life itself. The belief in resurrection makes this conviction easier to maintain.

The apocalyptic visions offer a much less optimistic view of the Gentile world than the tales of chapters 1 through 6. This again is not a view for all seasons but for situations of crisis, which we should hope are exceptional. Pagan powers are not always “beasts from the sea,” although they may be so on occasion. The ethical stance advocated by the “wise” in Daniel 11, that of passive resistance, is not necessarily normative for all situations either. The militant revolution of the Maccabees is also canonized in the Old Testament. The book of Daniel exemplifies one possible way in which a faithful Jew or Christian may respond to a situation of oppression and persecution. Whether it is the right way can only be decided in light of the specific circumstances of each situation, but it always demands serious consideration.

The Additions

Daniel 13 and 14 are rightly labeled as an Appendix in the New American Bible, as they are independent stories in which Daniel happens to play a part. Susanna is placed before Daniel 1 in one Greek translation (that attributed to Theodotion), since Daniel appears there as a young boy, but there is no doubt that the story was originally independent.

Susanna

In the story of Susanna, Daniel appears as the wise judge. This role is suggested by his name (Dan comes from the Hebrew verb, to judge) but not by anything in Daniel 1–12. His judgment recalls that of Solomon in 1 Kings 3. The story as a whole may be described as a parable, insofar as it is a short story that reverses our expectations in some important respect. (Compare Nathan’s parable in 2 Sm 11 and several of Jesus’s parables.) Normally elders who have been appointed judges are the righteous ones, and the word of a young woman would carry little weight against theirs. Yet it is characteristic of biblical narrative that the underdog prevails or is justified. (A comparable story involving a woman, Tamar, can be found in Gn 38.) The story of Susanna loses some of its dramatic effect by telling us at the outset that the judges are wicked. Nonetheless, the story provides a nice illustration of the unreliability of conventional expectations.

In one respect, at least, the story of Susanna has the same viewpoint as the rest of the book of Daniel. In v. 23, when Susanna is trapped, she declares: “Yet it is better for me not to do it and to fall into your power than to sin before the Lord” (Dn 13:23). This is the same lesson that we learned from the three young men, from Daniel in the lions’ den, and again from the martyrs of the Maccabean period. The story is closer to Daniel 1–6 than to 10–12, since it envisages salvation in this life, and, appropriately, the execution of Susanna’s accusers.

Bel and the Dragon

Daniel 14 contains two stories that make fun of pagan idolatry. These stories are caricatures. They should not be taken as accurate descriptions of Babylonian religion, any more than anti-Catholic caricatures should be taken as fair representations of the Catholic veneration of images of saints.

The Babylonians in the stories are excessively stupid, and their devices are too easily exposed. The story of the dragon shares with Daniel 6 the motif of the lions’ den but does not necessarily depend on the earlier chapter. All we can say is that Daniel was associated with the lions’ den in oral tradition, and that both these stories made use of the motif. Bel and the Dragon is more fantastic than Daniel 6: he remains in the den for six days and the prophet Habakkuk is transported from Judea by an angel to feed him. These fantastic elements give the tale a lighthearted quality, but the background here is more tense than in Daniel 1–6. Daniel confronts the Babylonian religion in a way that he never does in the earlier chapters. The Babylonians threaten him because of his religious zeal, not because of professional envy as in chapter 6.

There is a sense here that Judaism and paganism are fundamentally incompatible. The king is still benevolent, but the Babylonians suspect that he has become a Jew. There is, of course, ample precedent for demanding a clear-cut choice between the LORD and other deities (compare Elijah in 1 Kgs 18). Daniel 1–6 also presupposed such a choice but did not present it as starkly as chapter 14. There are times when confrontation can be avoided and fruitful interaction is possible. Bel and the Dragon, on the other hand, does not allow for any ecumenical relations with pagan religion. Presumably this attitude reflects the situation in which the story was written. Here again we see that the biblical stories are not timeless in character but are shaped by historical circumstances. Their modern relevance, likewise, depends on the circumstances in which we read them.

THE TWELVE MINOR PROPHETS

The Book of the Twelve is a collection of prophetic oracles that were composed over a period of about 300 years. The number twelve is probably chosen because of the twelve tribes of Israel. At least in some cases the books are artificial—for example, it is quite clear that Zechariah 9–14 do not come from the same prophet as Zechariah 1–8. While we will review the books in their canonical order, it may be helpful at the outset to group them according to their origin.

1. Three prophets, Amos, Hosea, and Micah, were active in the eighth century BC, and were contemporary with the earlier part of Isaiah's career. Hosea was a northern prophet and Micah a southern, while Amos was a native of the Southern Kingdom who prophesied in the north. (On the two kingdoms, see the historical sketch, RG 50–53.)

2. Another cluster of three prophets can be dated in the Babylonian period, toward the end of the seventh century BC. Zephaniah is dated to the time of King Josiah (640–609 BC), Nahum proclaimed the fall of Nineveh in 612 BC, and Habakkuk prophesied when the Babylonians were already advancing westward (605–597 BC).

3. Two prophets, Haggai and Zechariah are known to have been active in the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple in 520–518 BC. Again, only chapters 1 through 8 of the book of Zechariah, at most, can be attributed to this prophet.

4. The remaining four books, Joel, Jonah, Obadiah, and Malachi, and the latter part of Zechariah, come from the postexilic period, but their dates cannot be determined precisely. Malachi may be roughly contemporary with Ezra in the fifth century BC. The book of Jonah and the second part of Zechariah could be as early as the fifth century or as late as the Hellenistic period (after 330 BC).

Most of these books are made up of short poetic oracles. (The book of Jonah, which is a short story, is an exception.) The nature of prophecy is that it addresses specific situations, and so it is important to know something of the time and place of the different prophets, when this is possible. At the same time, these oracles were preserved because they had enduring relevance and could be applied to new situations by analogy. All of this material was handed down orally for some time before it was put in written form. Consequently, there is often reason to doubt whether a particular prophecy was actually uttered by the prophet to whom it is ascribed. So, for example, Micah 4:1–3 contains a passage that is also found in Isaiah 2:1–4. We cannot now be sure which, if either, of these prophets originally spoke these lines. Moreover, these books were edited in the postexilic period, and the editors also added some passages. While it is always helpful to know the situation in which an oracle was originally given, it is not possible to be sure of the original setting of each passage.

As we might expect, there is considerable diversity in this collection, but there are also some dominant themes:

1. Most of these prophets focus their attention on the sins of their own people. There are exceptions. The oracles of Obadiah and Nahum consist entirely of condemnations of foreign nations. Haggai and Zechariah, in the period immediately after the Babylonian Exile, are exceptionally supportive of their leaders and institutions. Nonetheless, most of these prophets were characterized by their critical spirit.

2. The sins they denounced were both social and cultic. The social agenda of prophecy was set by the great eighth-century BC prophets, especially Amos and Micah, but concern for the weak and unprotected persists throughout the corpus, down to the oracles of Malachi. Hosea engages in extensive polemic against the worship of gods other than the LORD, and this concern reappears from time to time in the other prophets. The prophets were even more concerned, however, with abuses in the worship of the Lord, even when there were no pagan elements involved. Amos and Micah denounced the cult of their day because it made the people complacent and distracted them from the injustice of their society. At the end of the collection, we still find Malachi criticizing the priests for failing to live up to the ideals of their office. People who performed the prescribed rituals were not necessarily pleasing to God for that reason. The prophetic critiques do not mean that ritual is not important. On the contrary, it is precisely because it is vitally important to the religious life of a community that they devote so much attention to it.

3. It is common in biblical theology to say that God acts in history. The prophets say more than this: they teach that whatever actually happens is the work of God. So they understood the great calamities, which befell the Northern Kingdom of Israel in 721 BC and the Southern Kingdom of Judah in 587/6 BC, as acts of divine judgment. Indeed these catastrophes added to the authority of the prophets, since they were seen as the fulfillment of their oracles. The constant reference to historical events ensures an element of realism in the preaching of the prophets. They are not only concerned with moral ideals, but also with what works in practice.

4. The theme of judgment undergoes some development in the later prophets. This can be seen by following the motif of the Day of the LORD. This motif first appears in Amos. In the context it seems clear that the Israelites expected the Day of the LORD to vindicate them against their immediate enemies. For Amos, however, the Day of the LORD would be the occasion of judgment on Israel. In the postexilic period, Joel anticipates a day of judgment for all nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat. In Zechariah 14 it is the day when all the nations assemble for battle against Jerusalem, to be defeated by the Lord. The Book of the Twelve ends with a forward look to “the day of the LORD..., the great and terrible day.” Increasingly, it is a day of definitive universal judgment.

5. The theme of the salvation of Israel is also more prominent in the postexilic period. Already in the eighth century BC, Hosea looked beyond the impending destruction by the Assyrians and spoke of a new beginning like the Exodus of old. After the exile it made little sense to speak of further destruction of Israel. Very often the prophets imagine a situation that is different from the present. When Jerusalem was in ruins, or restored in only modest circumstances, they revived the dream of Zion, the holy mountain, and divine abode (so Joel, Zephaniah, and a postexilic passage in Micah 4). Similarly, the hope for a restored Davidic monarchy is at home in the period after the exile (Mi 5; Zec 9). The phrase “on that day” frequently introduces prophecies of the great transformation that is to come (for example, Zec 14:6, 8, 13, 20). It is likely that at least some of these oracles were inserted by those who put this collection together, gathering and arranging the scattered materials. These editors wanted to insure that the recollection of the past did not outweigh the hope for the future. The tendency of the editors to put the words of judgment in perspective is most strikingly evident at the end of the book of Amos. After the prophet’s threat that God would wipe Israel off the face of the earth, the editor adds, “but I will not destroy the house of Jacob completely” (9:8) and goes on to prophesy the restoration of the Davidic dynasty.

Taken as a whole, the Book of the Twelve is both a reflection on the past and a lesson for the future. The order of the oracles is not easily apparent, and this makes reading through the collection difficult. They are certainly not arranged in chronological order, and even the thematic order is only occasional. We can, however, find a pattern, in which sin is followed by judgment and judgment by salvation. Not all the individual prophets saw this full pattern. Some, like Amos, simply announced the imminent judgment. Others, like Haggai and Zechariah, focused on the moment of restoration. The editors of the prophetic books were heavily influenced by the theology of Deuteronomy. According to that theology, sin does not go unpunished, but God is ultimately merciful and wants only the repentance and restoration of Israel. The collected prophets, then, can be read as a call for repentance, to be sustained until the final Day of the LORD. The first book in the collection, Hosea, ends with the invitation, “Return, Israel, to the LORD, your God” (Hos 14:2). The final book, Malachi, ends with a reminder to keep the law of Moses, and a promise that Elijah will come to reconcile parents and children. In this way, the lesson of the prophets is tied in nicely with that of the Pentateuch.

HOSEA

see pages [1245–1259 of the Old Testament]

Hosea is not the first of the prophets chronologically, but he provides a good introduction to the prophetic corpus, as he is unrivaled for the beauty of his poetry and the emotional power of his oracles. He lived at a time of great crisis for the Northern Kingdom of Israel. He began his career in the middle of the eighth century (about 750 BC). Little more than a decade later Israel came under threat from the mighty Assyrian empire, which was expanding westward. The king of Israel became a vassal, or subject, of Assyria in 732 BC, the kingdom was brought to an end, and its capital Samaria destroyed, in 722 BC. In the period between the death of King Jeroboam II (who is mentioned in Hos 1:1) in 746 BC and the first submission of Israel in 732 BC, no fewer than five kings sat on the throne (and a sixth succeeded in 732 BC). It was, then, a period of great instability. While we cannot specify the occasions of Hosea's individual prophecies, it is important to be aware of this general background.

As noted in the New American Bible, the first three chapters stand apart from the rest of the book because of the theme of the prophet's marriage. It is difficult to discern any pattern in chapters 4 through 14. Most of the oracles proclaim the destruction of Israel, but the book ends with an invitation to repentance (14:2–9). There is also an important prophecy of restoration at 11:8–11.

The Metaphor of Marriage

The attractiveness of Hosea's prophecy springs from his use of metaphor and symbol, especially imagery drawn from human relationships. His most fundamental metaphor is that of marriage. The book opens with one of the most bizarre commands in all the Bible, "Go, get for yourself a woman of prostitution . . ." It may be that the woman, Gomer, was not a harlot when she married, and that the command anticipates her later behavior. There is an alternative view, however, held by many scholars, which sees the choice of a harlot wife as a deliberate symbolic act on the part of the prophet

(compare the bizarre symbolic acts in Is 20 and Ez 4). Some scholars think that Gomer was not only a prostitute but a cult prostitute, devoted to the worship of the pagan god Baal. By marrying such a person, Hosea would have attracted considerable attention, and dramatized his message that “the land prostitutes itself” (1:2). In any case, the prophet uses the experience of infidelity in marriage, all too familiar to his audience, to convey an understanding of Israel’s behavior toward the LORD, the God of Israel. The metaphor was appropriate for several reasons:

1. It is a fundamental presupposition of Hosea that Israel is bound to God by the covenant given to Moses. A covenant is a contractual arrangement, like a marriage. The relationship can be expressed in the declarations “You are my people” and “My God” (2:25) on the analogy of the standard marriage formula “she is my wife, he is my husband.”

2. One of the major problems addressed by Hosea was idolatry, specifically the cult of the Canaanite god Baal. The word baal was used in Hebrew as the common word for husband. Moreover, Baal was attractive to the people because he was a fertility god who was supposed to guarantee the productivity of land, animals, and people. Some scholars have supposed that the worship of Baal involved sexual acts with sacred prostitutes. This is now viewed as unlikely, but the imagery of prostitution and fornication is often used to symbolize idolatry. Hosea was contrasting the covenant with the LORD, understood as a marriage, with the cult of Baal, understood as prostitution. The prophet’s wife exemplified the behavior of Israel, by straying from the marital relationship.

3. Hosea’s whole understanding of God is based on the assumption that God is like the best in human nature, only more so. Since marriage is the culmination of love between man and woman, it is appropriate that it should also provide the analogy for understanding the love between the LORD and Israel.

The fact that the prophet uses the most intimate aspect of his own life to convey his message is indicative of his total involvement in his prophecy. The involvement extends to his children, who are given such symbolic names as “Not-Pitied” (Lo-ruhamah, 1:6) and “Not-My-People” (Lo-ammi, 1:8). There is no concern for private, personal life. The prophet and his family are at the disposal of God for the welfare of the people.

The LORD and Baal

In the great poem in chapter 2, Hosea argues that the people are mistaken when they credit Baal with providing the grain, the wine, and the oil. It is the LORD who really controls fertility. What is involved here is not simply a matter of knowing the most appropriate name for the God of nature. To acknowledge the LORD as lord is to accept the Sinai covenant, with its code of ethics for society. Israel's infidelity in worshipping Baal is the symptom of a pervasive disease. Hosea's grievance against the people is summed up in 4:1–3:

There is no fidelity, no loyalty,
no knowledge of God in the land.
Swearing, lying, murder,
stealing and adultery break out;
bloodshed follows bloodshed.
Therefore the land dries up....

The list of offenses closely follows the Ten Commandments, but the point is not just that specific laws are broken. It is a question of fundamental attitude. Infidelity manifests itself in sexual behavior, in idolatry, in the repeated assassination of rulers, in wavering political alliances. This lack of constancy certainly had an effect on the political fortunes of the nation. Hosea believed that it also had an effect on the land itself. He may have been right insofar as the rulers neglected the proper care of the land because of intrigue and opportunism.

Land and Desert

In the poem in Hosea 2, the prophet plays on the rich associations of the promised land. The foundation of Israel's identity was the story of the Exodus. The escape from Egypt had been followed by forty years of wandering in the wilderness. After that experience, Israel had indeed looked like "a land flowing with milk and honey." Now the prophet threatened to take all that away: "I will make her like the wilderness, make her like an arid land." To appreciate the full force of this threat we must remember that for ancient Israel the gift of the land was the primary expression of salvation. There was no belief among Israelites of that time in a blessed hereafter. To reduce the land to a wilderness would be, in effect, to undo the Exodus. In fact, the devastation of the Assyrian invasion might well be said to do that, some years after Hosea spoke.

The wilderness, however, was not only a place of death. It was also a place of hope. Israel wandered in the wilderness in “the days of her youth.” Hosea changes his metaphor in 2:16 and plays on the positive connotations of the wilderness, as a place where a man might take a young woman in privacy, away from the town, to court her. What he is suggesting is that the destruction at the hands of Assyria is not the end. It is rather a transitional stage, necessary to clear away the cult of Baal and the other abuses in Israel. When Israel has been stripped down, so to speak, by the Assyrians, a new beginning will be possible, in effect a new Exodus.

The motif of a new Exodus, introduced here for the first time, would later be important for Second Isaiah (Is 40–55) after the Babylonian Exile. It would be taken up again by the people who wrote the Dead Sea Scrolls, shortly before the time of Christ, and it is implied in the career of John the Baptist (Mk 1:2f).

Criticism of the Cult

The cult of Baal was attractive in part because it was a matter of ritual rather than of ethical conduct. The Israelites were also willing to perform rituals for the LORD. Hosea complains at the facile way in which they professed repentance, only to have the sentiment vanish as soon as they left the Temple (6:1–4). In the course of this passage the Israelites say: “He will revive us after two days; on the third day he will raise us up.” This reference to raising up on the third day has often been related to the resurrection of Christ. In its context, however, it simply expresses the hope that God would restore the fortunes of the people after a short time.

Hosea goes on to enunciate one of the classic formulations of biblical religion in 6:6: “It is loyalty that I desire, not sacrifice, and knowledge of God rather than burnt offerings.” Sacrifice was not bad in itself, but it was only as good as the attitude it represented. Without the love that expressed itself in ethical conduct, sacrifice was meaningless, no matter what it cost. The inadequacy of sacrifice without the practice of justice is one of the major themes that runs through the prophetic corpus.

The Importance of Metaphors

The power of Hosea’s prophecy comes in large part from his stock of striking metaphors. Israel is compared to a “unturned cake” (7:8), a “wild ass” (8:9), or a “luxuriant vine” (10:1). These metaphors have an emotional effect because of the associations they carry with them, and this enhances their power of communication. Nowhere is this more evident than in chapter 11, which begins “When Israel was a child I loved him.” The reference is to the Exodus, but the effect is very different from the rather violent accounts in the Pentateuch. By comparing Israel to a child, Hosea paints a vivid picture of God as the loving parent, teaching the infant to walk and lifting it up. By implication, Israel should have the same kind of elemental bond with the LORD that a toddler has with its parents.

Development of this metaphor leads Hosea to one of the most remarkable passages in the Old Testament. The thought of destroying his or her own child is repugnant to any normal parent. The LORD, too, asks, “How could I give you up, Ephraim?” (11:8). Following the thrust of the metaphor the answer is inevitable: “I will not give vent to my blazing anger, I will not destroy Ephraim again.” The rationale may surprise us, however—“for I am God and not a man.” Human parents are fallible and may be overcome by anger; God is not subject to weakness. The difference between God and humanity is that we fall short of what we know to be best, while God has no such limitation.

Hosea, like all the great prophets, was a realist. He recognized that Israel would be destroyed, and whatever actually happened was the work of God (a point which will be made again by Amos). The same God whose heart is stirred to pity in chapter 11 declares that “Compassion is hidden from my eyes” in 13:14. There is an apparent contradiction here. The mood of the prophet might naturally swing with changing circumstances, but if the LORD is “God and not man,” we expect consistency. Hosea was not a systematic theologian, however, and all his insights do not fit neatly together. He was a shrewd enough observer to realize what would befall Samaria at the hands of the Assyrians—little ones dashed to pieces, expectant mothers ripped open (14:1). Yet he affirmed that God still loved Israel like a child, or, in the imagery of chapter 2, that after God had divorced Israel he would start over again with a new courtship. In this his faith is like that of a modern Jew who still believes in the love of God after the Holocaust. The conviction that God is love, despite all the evidence for random brutality and hatred in the world, is also an integral part of Christian faith.

One of Hosea’s harshest words of judgment is given an ironic twist in the New Testament. In 13:14 the LORD asks, through the prophet, “Where are your plagues, O death! where is your sting, Sheol!” The point of the passage is that God is about to use the sting of death against Israel. In 1 Corinthians 15:54f, Saint Paul quotes this passage. In this case, however, the question is a mocking one—the sting of death has been broken by the resurrection of Christ. While Paul changes the meaning of the passage he quotes, the new meaning is not altogether alien to Hosea, since he too looked beyond the death of the nation Israel and hoped for its “resurrection.”

The Relevance of Hosea

Hosea’s message of divine love and the need for fidelity has lost none of its relevance in the modern world. The most important lesson to be learned from Hosea, however, may well be a matter of theological method. The way to the knowledge of God is through the observation of human experience. We know that it is better to pity than to destroy because of our experience in raising children. We know that infidelity is destructive because of the experience of our relationships, or because we have seen it in the relationships of others. Our knowledge of God is inferred from those basic human values which we know intuitively. Essentially the same theological method can be found in the parables of Jesus (for example, the prodigal son and the good Samaritan), which are based to a great degree on the observation of human relationships.

JOEL

see pages [1259–1265 of the Old Testament]

In sharp contrast to Hosea, the book of Joel makes no reference to known historical events, which would enable us to establish when it was written. It is safe to say, however, that it is one of the later prophetic books, and the date 400 BC (OT, p. 1259) is a reasonable guess. Two considerations favor a relatively late date. First, according to 4:6 some people of Judah were sold as slaves to the Greeks. This reference suggests a date after the Babylonian Exile, when Judah was weak and contacts between the Greeks and the Near East were increasing. Second, the imagery of the Day of the LORD and the judgment of the nations has a strongly apocalyptic character. Such imagery is characteristic of the postexilic period.

The reference to Jews sold into slavery is indicative of the circumstances in which the book was written. It was a time of deprivation and exploitation. The first two chapters refer to a plague of locusts that had ravaged the harvests of Judah, thereby aggravating the problems of the poor. These circumstances are significant for understanding why the prophet predicts cosmic upheaval and radical change.

The book is characterized by movement from specific concern with the plague of locusts to a more general prophecy of universal judgment. Joel 1:1–2:17 combines description of the plague with exhortations and prayers for deliverance. Chapter 2, verses 18 to 27 give a reply and reassurance from God. All of this may reflect an actual Temple liturgy for relief from the disaster. Chapter 3 is concerned with a future time, when God will intervene to pour out the spirit and save a remnant of the people. Chapter 4 proclaims the final judgment of the nations and salvation of God's elect.

The Day of the LORD

The theme of the Day of the LORD runs through the book as a unifying thread. The earliest mention of the Day of the LORD is in Amos 5:18. It is apparent from that passage that this was originally a festive day to which people looked forward in joyful anticipation. Amos, however, declared that it would be a day of darkness and not light. By the time the book of Joel was written, any great disaster could be dubbed a “Day of the LORD.” In Joel 1–2 the reference is quite specifically to a plague of locusts, which transforms the land from being like “the garden of Eden” to a “desolate wilderness” (2:3). Joel speaks of the locusts as an invading army, with the LORD at their head (2:11)—whatever actually happens is the work of God. The people respond to the emergency in ways typical of the ancient world, by bringing offerings and libations. It is characteristic of the Hebrew prophets, however, that a crisis such as this is made into an occasion for reform and repentance. The exhortation in 2:13 is a classic expression of the prophetic view of proper ritual: “Rend your hearts, not your garments.”

In the modern world we do not often regard natural disasters such as locusts or tornadoes as visitations from God, nor do we rely on empty rituals for relief. It would indeed be unfortunate if recourse to ritual kept people from taking whatever practical measures were possible to resolve their problems. The situation in Joel, however, was beyond human control, at least in that time and place. The ritual, then, was all that people could do. It was their way of expressing their desperate concern and their hope that God would give them relief. In urging them to use the crisis as an occasion for reform, the prophet is bringing some good out of a bad situation. He is also recognizing that all of life has religious significance. The prophetic idea of salvation is primarily concerned with the welfare of the people on earth. Anything that threatens that welfare is worthy of the prophet’s attention, even if it is not the result of human activity in any evident sense.

The plague of locusts was undoubtedly traumatic for those who experienced it, but it was not an event of great historical moment. We do not even know when it took place. In the context of the book of Joel it takes on a broader significance. It is a prefiguration of a greater Day of the LORD, when God will come to judge the nations. The destruction of the land by the locusts is a small-scale rehearsal for the final judgment. In chapter 3, then, the Day of the LORD takes on a different meaning from what it had in the first two chapters. It now refers to the Day of Judgment. The description in 3:1–5 has become a classic passage because it is quoted in Acts 2:17–21. The imagery suggests the end of the world—the sun will be turned to darkness and the moon to blood. Such imagery is increasingly common in prophecy of the postexilic period (cf. Is 13:9–11; 34:1–4).

Despite the vividness of the imagery, Joel does not envisage the end of the world, in the sense familiar from the book of Revelation. The language here is metaphorical. The darkening of sun and moon is a way of expressing that there will be a time of great tumult and confusion. The world order as we know it will be turned upside down and, most importantly, the foreign nations who have oppressed the Jews will be overthrown. The magnitude of this upheaval is expressed through the imagery of the physical universe. This kind of imagery is very common in the apocalyptic literature from the second century BC on (see the RG to Daniel). The later apocalyptic writers, however, took the imagery more literally and came to believe in an actual end of the world. This is not yet the case in Daniel, but it is commonplace by New Testament times. In 2 Esdras 7:30 (a Jewish writing from the end of the first century AD), the earth is turned back to primeval silence for seven days before the resurrection so that the new creation is clearly separated from the old. Joel, in contrast, has no resurrection and looks for a transformation of this world rather than a new creation.

A Vision of Plenty

There are two aspects of Joel's hope for the transformation of the earth. First is the universal human hope for freedom from hunger. This is a natural reaction to the locust plague. In a time of scarcity Joel comforts his people with the promise that they will eat and be filled (2:26) and even rhapsodizes that "the mountains will drip new wine, and the hills will flow with milk" (4:18). This kind of prediction is very common in the Prophets (see, e.g., Is 11). It evidently involves a strong element of wish fulfillment. More than two thousand years later, the world is still a long way from being rid of hunger. The optimistic prophecy has two functions. It gives hope to the poor, not certainty indeed but a hope that is within the bounds of possibility, and it reminds us all of a goal toward which we should work. The role of the prophecy is to sustain energy and morale in depressing times. In itself, the prophecy did not feed the hungry, but then humanity does not live by bread alone, and the prophet supplied strength in other ways.

Vengeance on the Nations

The second aspect of the Day of the LORD is one that Christians sometimes find distasteful, although Christians have certainly indulged it in the course of history. This is the desire for vengeance. It is not enough that Judah flow with wine and milk, the hated neighbor Edom must be a desolate wilderness, Egypt a desert waste (4:19). If the Philistines have sold Jews as slaves, their own children must be sold in turn (4:4–8). Where other prophets called on people to beat their swords into plowshares (Is 2:4; Mi 4:3), Joel reverses the call and looks forward to a showdown in the valley of Jehoshaphat. Vengeance is not one of the nobler human emotions, but it is certainly understandable and sometimes irresistible. Distaste for vengeance should not distract us from the more fundamental problems that give rise to it. The prophets' call for vengeance is usually a call for justice. In the case of Joel it is a protest of the powerless who had seen their children sold into slavery. Slavery was a far more fundamental sin against humanity than vengeance, real or imagined.

In the modern world, the vengefulness of the prophet often finds its counterpart in the feelings of Third World countries toward the more developed West. Vengeance is all the more distasteful when it is directed against ourselves, for reasons we seldom understand. Since the Hebrew prophets are part of our own tradition, they may help us reach some understanding of the mentality of those who see themselves as oppressed and want to see the tables turned on their more powerful neighbors. This is not to approve of vengefulness, but to affirm that we can learn something even from a somewhat distasteful text.

AMOS

see pages [1265–1276 of the Old Testament]

Amos is the earliest of the prophets who have books in their names. In fact, his oracles were transmitted orally and were only collected in book form much later. The opening verse mentions the kings Uzziah of Judah and Jeroboam II of Israel, who are the earliest kings mentioned in Hosea 1:1. The later kings listed in connection with Hosea are not mentioned in Amos. The historical background of the two prophets is very much the same. The dominant factor is the threat of destruction by Assyria. Nonetheless, the problems on which the two prophets focus are quite different. Hosea paid great attention to idolatry and cultic behavior, which symbolized the deeper problems of the society. Amos also comments on the cult but scarcely hints that idolatry is a problem. Instead, he speaks directly to the issue of social justice, with a vigor unparalleled anywhere in the Bible.

The Career of Amos

We know very little about the career of Amos. He came from the village of Tekoa in the Southern Kingdom of Judah, but he delivered his oracles in the Northern Kingdom, especially around the temple of Bethel, just north of the border. He did not, in any case, attach great importance to political boundaries. It is a theme of his prophecy that all peoples are equal in the sight of God.

Only one episode from his career is recounted in the book. In 7:10–17 we hear of an encounter between Amos and the priest of Bethel. The priest was worried because Amos was prophesying against the king in the Temple precincts. The priest could not afford to offend the king, and so he told Amos to go back to Judah. Amos's reply has given rise to much debate. Literally the Hebrew says "No prophet I, nor the son of a prophet." The NAB opts for one possible interpretation of this utterance: "I am not a prophet" (until the LORD called me). An alternative view is that he rejected the very name "prophet." In either case, the point at issue is that Amos is not a member of a guild of professional prophets, such as we see in action in 1 Kings 22, the story of Micaiah, son of Imlah. He was an independent agent. He was a shepherd and a dresser of sycamores (the fruit, resembling a fig, had to be tended in order to prevent insects from destroying it), and so had his own means. He did not depend on king or priest for support and was not beholden to them, and thus did not require their permission to prophesy. This independence left him free to speak the truth as he saw it, without political constraint.

The style of Amos is blunt, even offensive. He calls the women of Samaria “cows of Bashan” (4:1) and tells the priest Amaziah that his wife will be a harlot in the city (7:17). This is not the way to make friends and influence people, and it is not a style recommended by professors of homiletics. Amos makes no attempt to win the sympathy of his audience, as Nathan did with David (2 Sm 12) or as Jesus does in the parables. He is a prophet in the mold of Elijah, whose denunciations come close to cursing. This crude style of preaching must be seen in its social context. Nathan was a trusted adviser to David and could expect to have an effect on him. Amos, like Elijah, was an outsider. He did not have the ear of the king and saw no likelihood that the upper classes would change their ways. Consequently, he does not appeal for repentance. He simply proclaims the doom that is coming. He testifies to the conditions of his time and puts them on record, but he does not suggest that the catastrophe could be avoided.

The oracles of Amos are grouped in distinct blocks. The first two chapters contain a series of oracles against various nations, culminating in a denunciation of Israel. Amos 3:1–5:9 contains three long oracles (or strings of short utterances), which are introduced as “words.” These are followed in 5:7–6:14 by three “woes” against Israel and Judah. (The verses in 5:7–9 are out of order and must be rearranged. See OT, p. 1271.) Chapters 7:1 through 9:8b contain a series of visions of destruction. Chapter 9:8c–15 is an epilogue, probably added by a later editor.

The Oracles against the Nations

The book begins with oracles of judgment against Israel’s immediate neighbors, in the area now occupied by Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, and part of the occupied territory of Palestine. The oracle against Judah may have been added by the editor of the book to bring it up to date, after Israel had been destroyed. It was not unusual in the ancient world for a prophet from one country to denounce or curse other nations: see Numbers 22–24, where Balaam is called to curse Israel. What is unusual here is that Amos doesn't stop after he has denounced the other nations but goes on to pronounce a similar judgment on Israel. His listeners would surely have expected to hear that Israel would be glorified when Edom was humiliated (as we saw in Joel 4). Amos, however, insists that Israel is no different from other nations in the eyes of God. Any nation that sins deserves punishment. The sins of the other nations are not all offenses against Israel. Moab is condemned for burning to ashes the bones of the king of Edom (2:1), which is an outrage against humanity as such, or against natural law. The sins of Israel, too, are sins against humanity: they sell the just man for silver and the poor man for a pair of sandals (2:6).

The oracle against Israel in Amos 2:6–16 can be read as a “covenant lawsuit,” that is, a speech in which the prophet indicts Israel for failing to keep the Sinai covenant. The covenant had three essential elements: (1) the recollection of salvation history, culminating in the Exodus; (2) the commandments, and (3) blessings for keeping the commandments and curses for breaking them. The history as well as the curses and blessings both provided motivation to keep the commandments. The typical argument of a “covenant lawsuit” is that (1) God earned the loyalty of Israel by bringing it out of Egypt, but (2) Israel proved disloyal by breaking the commandments. In Amos 2, the sins of Israel are listed first (vv. 6–8). Then the prophet recalls the Exodus and the obligation it entailed. He concludes with a threat, which is in effect a curse (2:14–16): “Flight shall elude the swift” and further disastrous outcomes. Many scholars think, however, that the recollection of the Exodus here was added by an editor who wanted to put the prophetic preaching in the context of the theology of Deuteronomy (which is also exemplified in the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings). Amos himself had a wider frame of reference. The practices he condemns are, to be sure, forbidden by the law of Moses, but that is not the point in Amos. People of any nation should recognize that it is criminal to sell a just man for silver. So it makes no difference to Amos whether or not a particular nation knows the law of Moses. The basic requirements of justice should be obvious to all. In short, Amos appeals to natural law, as it was understood in the ancient Near East. The law of Moses coincided with that law to a great extent, but the essentials of ethical behavior should be known even to pagans. In the New Testament, Saint Paul makes the same point in Romans 1, where he says that pagan idolaters have no excuse, “for what can be known about God is evident to them.”

Amos and the Covenant

The equivalence of Israel and other nations in the sight of God is a theme that runs through the book of Amos. It raises a question as to whether the prophet regarded Israel as a chosen nation in any sense. He was certainly familiar with the story of the Exodus and the recitation of salvation history. For Amos, however, the Exodus guarantees Israel no privilege, but only adds to its responsibility. Two other passages in the book address this question very directly.

1. In 3:2 we read “You alone I have known, among all the families of the earth.” We expect this statement to be followed by a reassurance, such as “therefore I will protect you like the apple of my eye” or the like. Instead we read “Therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities.” Here, as in the oracles against the nations, Amos deliberately shocks his audience by telling them what they neither expect nor want to hear. (Jesus uses a similar technique in the parable of the good Samaritan.) In a sense he is only spelling out the implications of the covenant, which always carried the threat of the curses for breaking the laws as well as the promise of the blessings for obedience. This is not how most people in Israel understood the covenant, though. They thought, naturally enough, that the Exodus guaranteed them divine protection, that they were already “saved.” According to Amos, the only way Israel differs from the other nations is that it should know better and therefore is all the more blameworthy for its crimes.

2. Amos puts the Exodus in perspective even more bluntly in 9:7: “Are you not like the Ethiopians to me? . . . Did I not bring the Israelites from the land of Egypt as I brought the Philistines from Caphtor and the Arameans from Kir?” Israel is special in the eyes of God . . . but so is every other people. The Philistines and Syrians had their salvation history too. None of this means that the Exodus was not important. It was absolutely fundamental to the identity of Israel. It did not, however, mean that Israel would be favored in any way, except that it should know more clearly than others what was demanded of it.

Amos’s sustained denial that Israel was any different from other peoples has its best parallel in the Wisdom literature (especially Proverbs), which ignores the special revelation to Israel and focuses on the universal moral law. Amos seems to have been an educated man. He displays an impressive knowledge of international affairs, and he was certainly no ignorant peasant. We do not know how he acquired his learning. He was probably well versed in traditional wisdom, whether he was formally educated in a school setting or not.

The Words and Woes

The three “words” of Amos are really a string of shorter oracles, mainly concerned with the sins of the Israelites. In 3:3–8, however, he lays out some of his theological presuppositions. He assumes that there is an order in nature and things do not happen by chance (“Does a lion roar . . . when it has no prey?”). This order is the work of God. Amos is a radical monotheist, not only in the sense that he ignores other gods but that he regards everything that happens as the work of the LORD. Religious people always credit God with the good things that happen. Amos goes further: “Does disaster befall a city unless the LORD has caused it?” God is responsible for the bad as well as the good. (Remember the Israelite religion at this time had no devil on whom evil could be blamed.) The acts of God in history, then, are not confined to special events like the Exodus, but embrace everything that actually happens. This conviction lays the foundation for a thoroughgoing realism in his view of international politics. If Assyria is more powerful than Israel, this is not by chance but is the will of God. Jeremiah took a similar view of the power of Babylon when it destroyed Jerusalem.

Amos directs many of his oracles against the cult at Bethel. When people go to make offerings to atone for sin at Bethel, Amos says that they “come to Bethel and sin” (4:4). There is a pun in the Hebrew because of the similarity of the terms for “sin-offering” and “sin,” and Amos uses the word play to equate the two. His sharpest critique of the cult, however, is delivered in the famous “Woe” against those who yearn for the Day of the LORD (5:18–25). The Day of the LORD was a major festival day, most probably the feast of Tabernacles or Sukkoth, a harvest festival in the fall. It was an occasion for celebrating the victory of the God of Israel and the defeat of his enemies. Amos, characteristically, tells the people that it will be the opposite of what they expect. The real Day of the LORD, when God appears before the people, will be a day of judgment. Amos was the first prophet to speak of the Day of the LORD as a day of judgment on Israel, and thereby he introduced one of the major themes of the prophetic literature.

Amos goes on to issue a broadside against all the festivals of Israel. He implies that Israel survived for the forty years in the desert without offering sacrifices (5:25). His point is not that all ritual is necessarily bad, but that it is not of the essence of religion. For Amos, the essence of religion is social justice. If ritual furthers justice, well and good, but too often it does not. In the prophet's view, the Israelite cult only made the upper classes complacent. They identified themselves as "Israel" and felt that they were God's chosen people. Their cultic celebrations reminded them of the Exodus and the great things God had done for them, and reassured them that God would deliver them from danger again. They need not, then, be too concerned about the plight of the poor. When the festival was over, they could go back to cheating in the marketplace (8:5). Amos insisted that all this was self-delusion. God would not overlook the injustice of the society because of the sound of the harps, and the Assyrians would rudely shatter the naive belief that God would protect Israel no matter what.

The final "Woe" in chapter 6 paints a vivid picture of "those who are complacent in Zion, secure on the mount of Samaria," the upper classes of both kingdoms of Israel. These were the people who sold the poor into slavery while they lived in luxury themselves. Amos announces with evident anticipation that these would be the first to go into exile. This was not mere wish fulfillment on the prophet's part. He knew the practice of the Assyrians, which was to take the upper classes into exile so that there would be no one left to lead a revolt. In his view, it was a fate that they richly deserved.

The Visions

Chapters 7 through 9 are primarily visions of the destruction of Israel. At first the prophet is moved by the enormity of the destruction and intercedes with God on behalf of Israel. After the vision of the locusts and of the fire, God relents, but the time for forgiveness runs out. The message is summed up in the vision of a basket of ripe fruit. The Hebrew here involves another pun. The word for "late summer" or "end of summer" is similar to the word for "end." Thus the statement in 8:2, "the end has come," is a play on words. This was the first time the idea of an "end" was proclaimed in ancient Israel. The end in question was the end of Israel as an independent nation. Later biblical writers would extend the idea and envisage an end of history or of the world. (The technical theological term “eschatology,” which refers to the doctrine of the last things, is derived from the Greek word for “end.”) Amos, however, was not speaking of the end of the world. The end of Israel in the eighth century BC, which he predicted, was final, in the sense that the political entity that had existed for two hundred years was wiped off the map and never restored. The influence of Amos on later tradition was undoubtedly increased by the fact that his prophecy was so completely fulfilled.

The Israel whose end Amos announced was primarily the Israel of the upper classes, who held political power. They were the ones who identified themselves as Israel in the cult and in international political relations. The peasants would undoubtedly suffer during the Assyrian invasion, but ultimately it may not have made much difference whether one paid taxes to a foreign power or to predatory Israelite landlords. From the viewpoint of the peasants, and of Amos, the survival of Israel as a nation was not of great importance. What mattered was not political identity but the living conditions of the poor within the society.

The Epilogue

Much of the force of Amos's prophecy derived from its finality. When he said that God would destroy the kingdom of Israel off the face of the earth (9:8), that was his last word. A later editor felt that this stark conclusion did not do justice to history. Israel in the broader sense of the people of the LORD, north and south, was not terminated. The message of the prophetic corpus as a whole is ultimately not one of destruction but of hope. What the epilogue does, then, is put the prophecy of Amos in a broader perspective. Death and destruction have their time and place, but there remains the hope for an ideal future, as we have seen in the prophecy of Joel. This ultimate optimism is an essential ingredient of biblical faith.

Three points in the epilogue deserve special attention:

1. Amos 9:9f suggests that God's judgment on Israel will be selective, so that only the sinners will die. Obviously the Assyrians were not so selective, nor were the Babylonians after them. The preexilic prophets spoke of the fate of the whole nation, not of individuals, and this was realistic if divine judgment was executed through warfare. In the postexilic period, however, there is increasing sensitivity to individual responsibility. (See the great reflection on this subject in Ezekiel 18.) In the apocalyptic literature (e.g., Daniel) the problem is resolved by the belief that just and wicked receive their appropriate retribution after death.

2. The hope for the future is focused on "the fallen hut of David" (9:11). This oracle probably comes from the period after the exile when there was no longer a Davidic king on the throne in Jerusalem. The hope expressed here is messianic but should not be confused with the later Christian understanding of the Messiah. The hope here is that the native Jewish kingship will be restored.

3. Finally, the ideal state of the end-time is decidedly earthly in character. The hope is for peace and prosperity, with an abundance of wine and fruit. One of the major points that the Hebrew Bible can contribute to Christian spirituality is a healthy appreciation of the good things of this world.

The Relevance of Amos

No prophet is more easily related to the modern world than Amos, for the social inequities that he denounced in eighth-century BC Israel are still very much with us. The American bishops adopt a much milder tone than Amos in their pastoral letter on the economy, but their concerns are very much in line with his. The bishops insist that “government has a moral function: protecting human rights and securing justice for all members of the commonwealth” (Economic Justice for All, p. 35), and that “the fulfillment of the basic needs of the poor is of the highest priority” (p. 27). In the ancient world it was the role of the prophet to be the conscience of the nation and speak up for the powerless. In the modern world, that role falls to religious leaders, who are not themselves involved in the business of government and so can view it with some perspective.

The first lesson to be learned from Amos is that social justice is the business of religion. The test of piety is what happens in the marketplace rather than what happens in the church or temple.

A second lesson is less obvious at first, but bears some thought. Amos was convinced that there is an intrinsic connection between the justice of a society and its long-term prosperity. This conviction arose from his radical monotheism. The God who gives prosperity is also the God of justice. In the modern world we are hesitant to see such an immediate connection between morality and success. Nonetheless it is probably true that the greed of the Israelite upper classes contributed to their own downfall. On the one hand their aspiration to power and independence brought them into conflict with Assyria. On the other hand the exploitation of the poor, and the individualism of the rich, weakened the society internally. The Assyrians might have rolled over Israel whether it was a just society or not, but the blow might not have been so severe if its leaders had been less concerned with political power and more concerned with equality and justice.

OBADIAH

see pages [1276–1278 of the Old Testament]

With only twenty-one verses, the book of Obadiah is the shortest of the prophetic books. It consists of a series of short oracles against Edom (vv. 1–14), then an oracle against all the nations (15f), followed by a prediction of the restoration of Judah. Edom was a small state to the south of Judah (it was later called Idumaea). The Edomites incurred the lasting hatred of the Jews in the sixth century BC by exploiting the weaknesses of Judah and pillaging its territory after the Babylonian invasion. Relations remained very bitter when the Jews returned from the exile and restored the city of Jerusalem. The prophecy of Obadiah belongs to this general period (sixth or early fifth century BC) but contains no indication of its specific date. The hatred between Judah and Edom was intense and lasting. Long after Edom had ceased to be a threat to the Jews, the name Edom was used in rabbinic literature as a code name for Rome, the hated enemy of the day.

Oracles against Edom

Oracles of vengeance against Edom were common in the postexilic period. Compare the related utterances in Jeremiah 49:7–22. For the modern reader, these oracles pose the usual problem of how to deal with vengeance. In fairness, it should be noted that the logic of Obadiah is quite similar to that of Amos. There is a natural moral law that applies to the actions of all peoples. That law forbids violence against one's neighbors and then gloating over their distress. One who violates that law, however, loses its protection. The underlying principle is succinctly stated in v. 15: "As you have done, so will it be done to you." The natural law requires that the punishment fit the crime. Obadiah indicts Edom for behavior similar to that for which Amos indicted Israel. While it may seem more noble to direct criticism against one's own people, the moral principle is the same. Edom deserved the prophetic denunciation.

Judgment upon the Nations

In broadening his attack to all the foreign nations, Obadiah uses the now familiar motif of the Day of the LORD (see the RG to Amos). Here the judgment is directed only against the foreign nations. Israel did not need a word of judgment at this time. The Day of the LORD here is simply the day of judgment. It implies a decisive change in the course of events but nothing like the end of history or of the world. The judgment will be governed by the law of retribution: as you have done to others, so shall it be done to you. Obadiah applies this principle to whole nations rather than to individuals.

The Restoration of Judah

The idea that a remnant will be saved on Mount Zion was developed especially by Isaiah. In the present context one is struck by the modesty of the hope. The kingship of God does not imply that Judah will rule all the nations, only its immediate neighbors who have most recently afflicted it. While a note of vengeance is present it should not be exaggerated. The oracle is really a testimony to the indomitable hope of a people who had been reduced to poverty and insignificance, and were at the mercy of their neighbors. Belief in the kingship of God on Mount Zion was a deep-rooted part of the Jerusalem cult under the monarchy (see, e.g., Pss 93; 97–99). In the aftermath of the exile it became a source of hope for deliverance.

JONAH

see pages [1278–1281 of the Old Testament]

The book of Jonah is unique among the Prophets for two reasons. First, it is not a collection of oracles but a narrative, and second, Jonah is in many ways an antiprophet, whose behavior is approximately the opposite of what we expect from a prophet. The story may be termed a fable, because of the role of the fish (compare the role of animals in Aesop's fables). It can also be considered as a parable, in the sense that it is a short story that goes against our expectations, like many of the parables of Jesus. The story is set in the Assyrian period (like the prophecies of Hosea and Amos), but there is general agreement that it comes from a much later time. While we cannot pinpoint the time of composition, it was certainly sometime in the postexilic period. The actual setting, then, was close to the time of Joel and Obadiah, but Jonah has a very different perspective on the problems of the period.

The division of the book is adequately represented by the chapters. The long psalm in chapter 2 stands out from its context. It may have been added by a later editor who was more interested in the miracle of Jonah's survival than was the original author.

Three considerations are especially important for appreciating the book of Jonah:

1. The story is quite deliberately humorous.
2. Its primary subject matter is the proper attitude to foreign nations, not Jonah's miraculous escape from drowning.
3. The story gives a mildly critical perspective on the religious zeal that is a trademark of prophecy.

The Humor of the Story

The humorous quality should be apparent from the opening verses. Where else do we ever hear of a prophet who so flagrantly disobeys a divine command? The idea that one could get away from the LORD by sailing to a remote place is not only naive but deliberately ridiculous. The pagan sailors exhibit more “fear of the LORD” than does Jonah. When he finally goes to Nineveh, the Assyrians respond with a fervor unparalleled in Israel. Even the animals join in the repentance. The author of this passage is not concerned with historical plausibility—everyone knew that Assyria had never turned from its “evil way.” The fantastic repentance of the Assyrians simply adds to the enjoyment of the tale.

The centerpiece of the humor of the story is even more fantastic than the repentance of the Assyrians. A great fish arrives just in time to catch Jonah when he is thrown overboard and vomits him up on the shore. Nothing could be more remote from the spirit of this story than to believe that this actually happened. The episode of Jonah and the fish has rich theological implications, especially for Christians, but there is no theological virtue in mistaking a fantastic joke for literal fact.

The humor of the story has an ironic quality. It refuses to give the prophet the dignity associated with the office, or to take his convictions seriously. It invites us to reconsider our stereotypes of both pagans and prophets. Unlike the oracles of Amos, it assumes the goodwill of its readers and tries to lead them to new insight.

The Attitude to Foreign Nations

The primary subject matter of the book is indicated at the outset when the prophet is sent to preach to the Assyrians rather than to his own people. The wickedness of Assyria is not in doubt; it is the premise of the story. Jonah, naturally enough, wants to see justice done and is upset at God’s excessive mercy. The incredible repentance of the Assyrians forces the issue: does Assyria, the most destructive tyrant of its day, deserve divine forgiveness? It is as if the Nazi leaders made a show of repentance after World War II and were pardoned. Jonah is not exceptionally narrow-minded here. His demand for justice is just as reasonable as that at the Nuremberg trials. It is not accepted, however. God speaks here as creator, to whom the Assyrians are as important as the Israelites (or, in modern terms, Nazis are as important as Jews or Christians). The concluding verse of the book recognizes that “the Assyrian in the street” is no more guilty of the crimes of his nation than are the cattle, but guilt or innocence is not the point. The book of Jonah sees God in the same terms as the much later book of Wisdom 11:24: “For you love all things that are and loathe nothing that you have made; for you would not fashion what you hate.” The magnanimity of this sentiment is astonishing, especially when we consider the situation of the Jews in the postexilic period, when they had every reason to resent foreign powers. We may compare this story to Jesus’s parable of the good Samaritan. The parable presupposes that most Jews would have regarded “good Samaritan” as a contradiction in terms. The penitent Assyrian is at least as great a contradiction, and as hard to accept. Admittedly, when the book of Jonah was written the Assyrian invasion was already ancient history, and it did not arouse emotions to the same degree as the Holocaust in our time. Nevertheless, it is not that Jonah was exceptionally narrow-minded here but rather that God is exceptionally tolerant.

The Perspective on Prophetic Zeal

Jonah reacts to God’s mercy by sulking and praying for death (4:8). He is not the first prophet to do so. The great Elijah also sat under a tree and asked God to take his life (1 Kgs 19:4f). Elijah, more than any prophet, was known for his zeal in destroying sinners (witness his treatment of the prophets of Baal in 1 Kgs 18:40). Jonah is a prophet in the same mold. In this case, however, the zeal of the prophet does not meet with approval. The book of Jonah sees the limitations of prophetic zeal. God’s rebuke is mild. Jonah is well-intentioned and is acting in accordance with a long tradition. Conformity with tradition is not enough, however. Hosea had marked a breakthrough in the Israelite tradition by the recognition that it is more fitting for God to have mercy than to punish. The book of Jonah extends that insight to the treatment of foreign nations. Even the prophet must learn that reconciliation holds a higher value than strict retribution. Not all the prophetic books reflect this insight, but it is certainly the view affirmed for Christianity in the Gospels.

The Sign of Jonah

The episode in the belly of the fish is a minor humorous motif in the original story, but it acquires greater significance in later tradition. In Matthew 12:39f, Jonah’s stay in the belly of the fish is taken to prefigure Jesus’s time in the tomb, and Jonah is often used as a symbol of resurrection in early Christian art. The symbolic significance of this episode appears already in the psalm in chapter 2. There the belly of the fish is equated with the netherworld, and Jonah's rescue is equivalent to resurrection from the dead. In the context of the Old Testament, the resurrection is metaphorical and means simply that the psalmist is delivered from desperate circumstances. It is a confession of the power of God to give life and take it away. We should note that what Jonah regrets about the netherworld is that he is separated from the presence of God. What he asks is not just continued survival but restoration to that presence. Fullness of life, for most Old Testament writers, is not life without end but the experience of God's grace, which is so satisfying that it is better to have "one day in your courts than a thousand elsewhere" (Ps 84:11).

The Relevance of Jonah

Jonah's message of tolerance and forgiveness is as urgent in the modern world as it was in the fifth century BC. These are hard words and should not be sentimentalized. The message demands not only tolerance and understanding for those who are different from us but forgiveness for those who have truly behaved wickedly, if they are willing to accept it. It is not yet a demand for unconditional forgiveness, since it has the precondition of repentance, but it is not an easy demand for all that.

The sign of Jonah caught the imagination of later generations as a sign of hope. That hope nicely undergirds the message of tolerance and forgiveness, since the wicked deeds of the oppressor are not as final as they seem. Those who hope for deliverance from the belly of death can afford to forgive the injustices of life. Belief in resurrection is often associated with the hope that the wicked will be damned. The book of Jonah, read in the light of the New Testament and Christian tradition, suggests that resurrection can also give a larger perspective on life, which has room for tolerance and forgiveness.

MICAH

see pages [1281–1289 of the Old Testament]

Micah was a prophet of the eighth century BC, contemporary with Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah. As a prophet of the Southern Kingdom of Judah, he most closely resembles Isaiah. The book that bears his name does not all come from his hand. There is general agreement that his words are preserved in chapters 1 through 3, probably also in chapter 6, and in parts of chapter 7. Chapters 4 and 5, however, were probably added after the Babylonian Exile. The original words of Micah, like those of Amos, are largely preoccupied with issues of social justice and the coming Assyrian invasion.

The Impending Judgment

The first oracle begins with a classic description of a theophany, or apparition of God. Traditionally such a theophany was associated with divine deliverance, as in Deuteronomy 33 and Judges 5 (compare also the theophany on Sinai). Micah's theophany, however, is like Amos's Day of the LORD. God is not coming to save but to judge. The immediate presence of God is destructive for a sinful people. In eighth-century BC Israel, the presence of God was not experienced as fire and earthquake but as the invasion of the Assyrian army. The destruction would fall most heavily on Samaria and Jerusalem, the major cities, homes of the royal houses and ruling classes.

The reasons for the coming destruction are spelled out most clearly in chapter 2. The problem is that the rich devise ways to force the smaller landowners into debt and then seize their property. Isaiah 5:8 complains about the same problem ("Ah! Those who join house to house, who connect field with field, until no space remains, and you alone dwell in the midst of the land!"). From the prophet's viewpoint, it was only fitting that this land would be seized again by the Assyrians, so that the greed of the big landowners would be in vain.

Micah also discusses another fact of life in ancient Israel, which was only hinted at by Amos but was later a major theme in the prophecy of Jeremiah. The professional prophets were leading the people astray (3:5). This is why Amos made his protest “I am not a prophet” (7:14). The phenomenon is natural enough. Prophets found that people liked to be reassured and told that all was well, and they tailored their message to their market. They were concerned with their own well-being more than that of the nation. A classic illustration of the professional prophets in action can be found in 1 Kings 22. In contrast, Micah saw the task of the true prophet as “to declare to Jacob his crimes and to Israel his sins” (3:8). Compare the assertion of Jeremiah that “In the past, the prophets who came before you and me prophesied war, disaster, and pestilence” (Jer 28:8). Such a prophet would never be popular, but at least there could be no doubt about his sincerity.

The true prophet here, as so often in the history of Israel, finds himself in opposition to the religious leaders, the priests, and the official prophets (3:11). On the surface of things, the priests appear to have great faith: no evil can come upon Israel because the LORD is in its midst. Such faith is no virtue for Micah. Rather virtue lies in the practice of justice and in facing reality honestly. He regarded the Temple on Mount Zion, often the focal point of Jewish religion in antiquity, as a negative force. According to the psalmist, Mount Zion was “the holy dwelling of the Most High. God is in its midst; it shall not be shaken” (Ps 46:6). If kings came to attack it, they would be seized with terror and put to flight (Ps 48:5f). Micah realized that the Assyrians would not panic at the sight of Jerusalem. The belief that Zion could not be destroyed was a source of complacency and illusion. So Micah uttered his radical prophecy that Zion would be plowed like a field. This prophecy is quoted in Jeremiah 26:18 as a precedent for the equally radical prophecy of Jeremiah. It was not fulfilled in Micah’s time, but it was not forgotten either, and it was justified in time. Faith cannot be based on any religious institution, no matter how sacred. No temple is permanent, and no one is guaranteed the unconditional protection of God.

The Indictment of Israel

Chapter 6 presents an example of the “covenant lawsuit,” which we have discussed earlier in connection with Amos. According to the logic of the Sinai covenant, Israel was bound to keep the commandments because God had brought it out of the land of Egypt. If the people kept the commandments they would be blessed, if not they would be cursed. In Micah 6:1–5 God indicts Israel by recalling that the divine part of the obligation had been satisfied in the Exodus. It is not necessary to spell out how Israel has failed to keep its part, or what the consequences will be.

Micah does not suggest that the Israelites were indifferent to religion. On the contrary, they were willing to perform any ritual that might further their interests, even human sacrifice (6:7). According to 2 Kings 21:6, a king of Judah, Manasseh, immolated his son by fire in the seventh century BC. The prophet cuts through the pretenses of such superstition with a succinct formulation of the essence of religion: “to do justice and to love goodness, and to walk humbly with your God” (6:8). No special beliefs or cultic observances are required. There was general agreement on what it meant to do right. The anguished quest for the right sacrifice, then, is shown to be mere hypocrisy. The business of religion is quite straightforward. It only requires the will to do what we know we ought. It is significant that the American bishops used Micah 6:8 as a summary of the heritage of the biblical prophets in setting the tone for the entire letter Economic Justice for All (n. 4). We might compare this passage with the judgment scene in Matthew 25:31–46. There the Son of Man does not ask about beliefs or ritual practices, but whether one fed the hungry and clothed the naked.

The Faith of the Prophet

The prophets only rarely provide glimpses of their personal faith, such as we find in the “confessions” of Jeremiah. One such glimpse is provided in Micah 7:7–10. Micah appears as a lonely figure, as we might expect in view of his relationship to the other prophets. His attempt to reach his public appears to have failed, but he is sustained by the conviction that God will vindicate him. In all of this he resembles Jeremiah, whose trials are described at greater length. The experience of prophets such as these contributed to the ideal of the Suffering Servant (Is 53), which has played such an important part in Christian theology.

The Prophecies of Restoration

The oracles inserted in Micah 4–5 in the postexilic period include two that are especially memorable. The prophecy of the restoration of the house of the LORD in Micah 4:1–3 is also found in Isaiah 2:2–4. The author of this oracle is unknown. The idea that all nations would find a spiritual center in Jerusalem may be quite old, but it flourished especially in the postexilic period when Jews who lived in other lands went to Jerusalem on pilgrimage. The prophecy is artfully placed here (4:3), immediately after the prediction that Zion would become a plowed field (3:12). The editors of the prophetic books typically placed an oracle of hope after one of judgment. In Micah's day the influence of the Temple was such that he needed to remind people that it would not last forever. By the time the book was edited the need for judgment had passed, and it was appropriate to remember the potential of the Temple for good.

Micah 5:1–4 speaks of a ruler who will come from Bethlehem. This prophecy has been treasured by Christians for obvious reasons. In the Jewish context, the significance of Bethlehem lies in the fact that it was the birthplace of David. The prophecy, then, is that the Davidic line will be restored. In mentioning Bethlehem rather than Jerusalem, however, the prophet is making a further point. He is recalling the humble origins of the monarchy, when it was associated with a village rather than with a city, and was not yet tainted with the corruption of Solomon's empire. The hope for restoration of the native kingship, which would bring peace to the land, is similar to what is described in more rhapsodic language in Isaiah 11.

NAHUM

see pages [1289–1293 of the Old Testament]

The oracles of Nahum are concerned with a single event, the fall of Nineveh in 612 BC. The euphoria of the prophet is understandable. Never again would Judah be invaded by Assyria. Some centuries later the author of Jonah might pity Nineveh, but that was more than could be expected at the time of its downfall. It is characteristic of biblical prophecy that the fall of one Gentile nation at the hands of another is assumed to be the work of the LORD.

A Jealous God

The opening verse of Nahum's prophecy is somewhat shocking to modern ears: "A jealous and avenging God is the LORD." Such a characterization of God was not new. One of the oldest descriptions of the biblical God is found in Exodus 15:3: "The LORD is a warrior" and on Sinai the LORD declares that he is a jealous God (Ex 20:5). This aspect of the divinity was never thought to be incompatible with mercy and love. It is simply the expression of justice: "the LORD will not leave the guilty unpunished." The wrath of God is only the manifestation of the moral order in the universe. Events like the fall of Nineveh were precious, because they showed that justice eventually prevailed. Nahum also says that the LORD is slow to anger (1:3) and emphasizes his goodness to the righteous (1:7). The immediate demonstration of that goodness was that God gave the smaller peoples of the Near East the satisfaction of seeing the fall of Assyria.

A Shortsighted Prophecy

The most striking thing about Nahum's prophecy, however, is how shortsighted it was. While Judah was freed from one oppressor it would soon be subjected to another, no less destructive. A mere fifteen years after Nahum proclaimed security, Jerusalem would again be under siege.

The lesson to be learned from Nahum is a two-edged one. The fall of Assyria is a reminder that all tyrants fall sooner or later and therefore is a cause of hope. The hope is tempered by the realization that the fall of a particular tyrant is not the end of all tyranny. History is full of surprises, not all of them pleasant. Nahum's exultation over the fall of Nineveh is echoed in the New Testament in John of Patmos's anticipation of the fall of Rome (Rev 17–18). John uses the image of the harlot, which is found in Nahum 3:4. Rome, too, fell eventually, but other tyrants took its place. Yet there is consolation in the knowledge that no power lasts forever.

HABAKKUK

see pages [1293–1297 of the Old Testament]

The prophecy of Habakkuk is considerably more reflective than that of Nahum. He prophesied a few years later, when the Babylonian threat had become obvious. Habakkuk, however, not only reacts to the immediate danger but ponders the underlying problem. Why do the wicked circumvent the just? Why do the wicked devour those more righteous than themselves? Granted that the blame falls on humanity, why does God allow such a situation to prevail? The question, in short, is one of theodicy, or the justice of God and is more typical of wisdom literature than of prophecy. The classic treatment is found in the book of Job. The question of theodicy arises later in the apocalyptic literature especially in the great apocalypse of 2 Esdras, which is printed with the Apocrypha in Protestant editions of the Bible. (The book of 2 Esdras, which is not part of the Catholic canon, has been included since the Council of Trent in 1546 in an appendix to the Latin Vulgate.)

Habakkuk was concerned first of all with the injustice within Jewish society. It is illuminating to compare the statements beginning with “Ah!” (2:6–20) with Jeremiah’s critique of King Jehoiakim (609–598 BC), which accuses the king of oppression and exploitation, especially in building a cedar palace by forced labor (Jer 22:13–19). Jehoiakim might well be accused of storing up what is not his (Hb 2:6) and of setting his nest on high (2:9), and even the violence done to Lebanon (2:17) may refer to his use of cedar. The critique, however, is couched in general terms and can apply to any wealthy and arrogant man.

Habakkuk’s answer to the question of theodicy anticipates the kind of response that the apocalyptic writers would later offer. He does not provide an explanation but a promise that the situation will be rectified in time. At first the solution seems worse than the problem: God will raise up the Babylonians (1:6–11). Isaiah (chapter 10) had spoken of Assyria as the rod of the LORD’s anger. Babylon apparently fills this role in Habakkuk, by bringing about the downfall of King Jehoiakim. In Isaiah the rod itself would eventually be broken. The eventual destruction of Babylon is implied in Habakkuk too. The prophet cannot have been unaware that Babylon was a prime example of the wicked who devours one more just than himself and whose throat was insatiable as death (2:5). Because of the similarity between the behavior of Babylon and that of the wicked in Judah, it is sometimes unclear to which Habakkuk is referring. The lesson, however, is clear. Even though justice is not apparent in the world, one should trust in the LORD and be patient.

Righteousness and Faith

The most famous utterance of Habakkuk is undoubtedly 2:4, “the just one who is righteous because of faith shall live,” which acquired pivotal importance in the theology of Paul (Rom 1:17; Gal 3:11). In its original context, “faith” does not have the pregnant sense that it has in Paul. It is simply the trust in God that enables one to wait for the future, closer perhaps to hope than to faith in the traditional Christian sense. The contrast here is between the rash man (the fool, in the terminology of Proverbs) and the one who is able to take a longer view. The person who judges only in light of the immediate present sees no justice in the world and may be tempted to conclude that there is no divine control. The righteous, or wise, person, in contrast, trusts that justice will prevail and is content to wait for it.

The faith of Habakkuk finds its most poetic expression in chapter 3. The description of the theophany, which has God come in triumph as a warrior, stands in a long tradition of such hymns (compare Dt 33; Jgs 5; Mi 1). The early hymns of this kind referred to God’s past activity on behalf of Israel. Habakkuk expects such a manifestation in the future. It will be directed against “the people who attack us” (3:16), presumably the Babylonians, although Jewish oppressors may also be included. What the prophet envisages is a decisive intervention of God to wipe out all wickedness and oppression. In this he is close to the kind of future hope that we find later in the apocalyptic literature, except that he does not envisage any judgment of the dead. It is not surprising then that Habakkuk was popular in apocalyptic circles. The Dead Sea Scrolls include a commentary (called a peshet) on Habakkuk, which interpreted the prophecy with reference to the history of the Qumran sect (taking the Chaldeans as the Romans). The notion that “the vision still has its time” (Hb 2:3) is echoed in Daniel 8:17, in a context where people were again asking “how long, O LORD?”

The faith of Habakkuk is a faith against appearances: “Though the fig tree does not blossom, and no fruit appears on the vine. . . . Yet I will rejoice in the LORD” (3:17f). It is based on the conviction that God is just, and so justice must ultimately prevail. The only question is “how long?” It is a question that has been repeated in every generation and has yet to receive a final answer. In the meantime, those who share the faith of Habakkuk find strength to go on. The value of such faith does not depend on the fulfillment of its expectations but on its power to transform the lives of the faithful.

ZEPHANIAH

see pages [1297–1301 of the Old Testament]

Zephaniah prophesied a little earlier than Nahum and Habakkuk in the reign of Josiah, the king who instituted the Deuteronomic reform (2 Kgs 22–23). One of his themes concerns idolatry (1:4–6). He may have been active before the reform, but Josiah was not very successful in his attempt to stamp out foreign cults in any case. Indeed, the prophet inveighs against the king's sons for adopting foreign customs (1:8). Zephaniah was contemporary with the early career of Jeremiah. The surviving oracles are almost entirely taken up with the proclamation of the Day of the LORD.

A Day of Judgment for Judah

The first oracle on the Day of the LORD is directed against Judah. The main offenses, which he denounces, are idolatry and lack of faith in the LORD (1:12). In the context of Josiah's time, rejection of the LORD was rejection of the Deuteronomic law. The emphasis of Zephaniah is not on the sins of Judah but on the destructiveness of the Day of the LORD. It is portrayed in cosmic terms: God will make an end of all who live on earth. The day of judgment is seen as the vindication of the majesty of God against the unworthiness of the people. Compare the destructive effect of the holiness of God in Isaiah 6.

A Day of Judgment on the Nations

The wrath of the LORD is not only directed against Judah. Chapter 2 catalogues the surrounding peoples, most of whom have been guilty of offending Judah in some way. The list extends to Assyria, the most arrogant of all. The boast of Nineveh ("I and there is no one else" [2:15]) is the same as that of Babylon in Isaiah 47:10. The most fundamental human sin is self-divinization. This was already the temptation of Adam and Eve, and it is a charge often made by the prophets (see, e.g., Is 14 and Dn 4). Zephaniah's prophecies of the Day of the LORD dramatize the gulf between God and humanity and are basically a put-down of all human pride.

Reproach and Promise for Jerusalem

The final chapter does not use the catchword “Day of the LORD” but deals with related themes. The phrase “on that day” (3:11) refers to the Day of the LORD and is often used to introduce additions to the prophetic books in the postexilic period.

In the opening oracle of the chapter (3:1–8), Jerusalem is denounced as the tyrannical city that accepts no correction. The reference may be to the failure of the Deuteronomic reform or simply to the rejection of the prophet himself. The concluding oracle, however (3:11–20), prophesies restoration for Jerusalem, when God “will leave as a remnant in your midst a people humble and lowly.” The motif of the remnant is familiar from the preaching of Isaiah, a century before Zephaniah, and there is no doubt that Isaiah had considerable influence on the later prophet. It is possible, then, that Zephaniah uttered this oracle, but it is more likely that here we have another example of an optimistic oracle added on to the end of a prophetic book by an editor.

While the concluding oracle may not have come from Zephaniah, it has its own validity. The judgments of the Assyrian and Babylonian eras were not God’s last word to Israel. Even after the destructive Day of the LORD, hope was still possible.

HAGGAI

see pages [1301–1304 of the Old Testament]

The activity of Haggai can be dated quite precisely to the year 520 BC, almost two decades after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian Exile. During that time various problems had beset the returned exiles, and they had not succeeded in rebuilding the Temple. We know from Ezra 5:1f that it was at the urging of Haggai and Zechariah that the task was finally brought to completion. The book of Haggai preserves both the words Haggai used to exhort the Jews to finish the building and his attempt to cope with their disappointment after it was finished.

The Exhortation to Rebuild

The first chapter of Haggai paints a vivid picture of the impoverished state of the Jewish community after the return. The difficulty of their situation was compounded by drought and crop failure. Haggai offered a daring interpretation of this situation: their difficulties were due to the fact that they had not rebuilt the Temple but had concentrated instead on rebuilding their own houses. We find here a classical case study in religious priorities. Socially minded critics tend to see Haggai as merely superstitious. The people needed the shelter of their own houses. God did not need a temple. This criticism is congenial to modern thought, but we also find it in antiquity. The anonymous prophet in Isaiah 66:1 asks: “The heavens are my throne, the earth, my footstool. What house can you build for me?” That passage very probably comes from Haggai’s time and suggests that there were other prophets who opposed the rebuilding. Yet there was social wisdom in Haggai’s position. The morale of the community was at a low ebb. One way of raising that morale was to engage in a community project, which would encourage people to think of the good of the community as a whole rather than dwell on their own misfortune. This is not to suggest that Haggai thought consciously in such sociological terms but, in fact, by urging the people to think of God rather than of themselves he was directing their attention to the greater good of the community. A comparable situation occurred in the United States in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The immigrant communities from Europe were made up of poor working-class people. Nonetheless they took pride in erecting great churches and schools in cities like New York and Boston. These edifices were put up at no small sacrifice, and their value to the communities was enormous. While success was difficult for individuals, it was possible for communities that banded together. The buildings were simultaneously an offering to their God and an expression of their own self-worth.

The Reaction to the Finished Temple

We are told in the book of Ezra that when the foundation of the new Temple was laid, the old men who remembered Solomon's Temple cried out in sorrow, and their laments could not be distinguished from the shouts of joy. This was because the new Temple was puny in comparison with the old (Ezr 3:12f). Haggai 2:3 records this reaction. Besides, the completion of the Temple did not bring about the dramatic reversal of fortunes that Haggai had predicted. Haggai's reaction to this situation is typical of prophets through the ages whose predictions have not come to pass. First, he tells the people to wait "a little while." The prediction is not wrong, only the time is delayed. Second, he diagnoses a reason for the delay. The people are not observing purity laws and their offerings are unclean. He ends by reaffirming that God will shake the heavens and the earth when conditions are right.

It must be admitted that this reaction shows some embarrassment on the part of the prophet, which can only have increased with the passage of time when his predictions remained unfulfilled. The case of Haggai points out the Achilles heel of predictive prophecy. The hopes raised by the prophet were good for the morale of the community, but only for a time. When they were not fulfilled, they led to disillusionment. The same problem would beset the apocalyptic and messianic expectations of later generations, and eventually tend to discredit them.

The Lesson of Haggai

There are, then, two lessons to be learned from Haggai. One is that hope should not be focused on specific predictions. The faith of Habakkuk was secure because it was a faith in ultimate justice and did not depend on specific events coming to pass within a short space of time. Haggai's more specific prediction gives rise to problems. The other is that he has a positive lesson to offer on the value of religious symbols and ritual as a means of bringing the community together. It was largely through his efforts that the Temple was rebuilt. While the Temple may not have satisfied immediate expectations, its contribution to Jewish life over the next five hundred years was enormous, and would far outweigh the initial disappointment which many felt when it was completed.

ZECHARIAH

see pages [1304–1317 of the Old Testament]

The book of Zechariah contains the work of more than one prophet. It takes its name from the contemporary of Haggai who was also instrumental in the completion of the Temple. “Deutero-Zechariah” (Zec 9–14) comes from a much later time. Some scholars even distinguish a “Trito-Zechariah” in chapters 12 through 14.

The Original Zechariah

The original oracles of Zechariah are characterized by a series of visions that are explained to the prophet by an angel. The interpreting angel appears here for the first time in biblical literature. It becomes a standard feature of apocalyptic literature, beginning with Daniel 7–12. These symbolic visions disclose the prophet’s view of what is really going on in the postexilic period by revealing a dimension of these events, which is hidden from the ordinary observer. So the first vision shows four (presumably angelic) horsemen whom the LORD had sent to patrol the earth. The implication is that God is indeed in control, although the divine activity may not be obvious. The visions in chapter 2 show four heavenly blacksmiths coming to beat down the horns of the nations and an angelic “man” making preparations for the restoration of Jerusalem. In all of these visions the hidden, heavenly activity is reassuring and a source of confidence for the fledgling Jewish community.

High Priest and King

Down to the time of the Babylonian Exile, the prophets had been sharply critical of the monarchy and usually also of the priesthood. When Zechariah prophesied, the monarchy was no more, but Zerubbabel, a descendant of the Davidic line, held the position of governor under the rule of the Persians. In the absence of a king, the high priest enjoyed new power and authority. Both Zerubbabel and the high priest of the day, Joshua, had their critics. Zechariah, in sharp contrast to earlier prophets, came to the defense of the community's leaders. The vision in chapter 3 is a remarkable defense of Joshua. In the vision, Joshua stands before the angel of the LORD and is accused by Satan. This is one of the earliest appearances of Satan in the Old Testament. (He also appears in Jb 1–2 and 1 Chr 21:1.) He has not yet taken on the character of the Devil of later mythology. Rather he is an angel in the service of God, whose mission is to detect and prosecute wrongdoers in the manner of a federal attorney. The fact that Satan is said to bring accusations against Joshua is the prophet's way of dramatizing the opposition to the high priest in the Jewish community. Satan symbolizes Joshua's critics. He receives a stinging rebuke from the angel of the LORD. The point is not that Joshua is faultless, but that criticism is not appropriate when the community is struggling. Joshua is "a brand plucked from the fire" (Zec 3:2)—that is, most of the leadership and institutions of Judaism had been destroyed, and what was left should be supported not criticized. So Joshua's faults are cast aside like dirty clothes, and he is affirmed in the sight of the LORD. Zechariah does not give Joshua a blank check. He is charged to walk in the ways of the LORD (3:7). Nonetheless, the contrast with earlier prophetic attitudes to the priesthood is striking. In earlier times, religious institutions were often problematic insofar as they bred complacency in the people, and so a prophet like Amos spoke as if the sacrificial cult could be abolished. After the experience of the exile, however, Zechariah recognized the importance of institutions. While they are not an end in themselves, no society can live without them.

The prophet is equally positive about Zerubbabel, who is extolled for laying the foundation of the Temple. The two leaders are pictured as olive trees in chapter 4, because both priest and king were anointed with oil—hence the title "messiah" or "anointed one." The people of the Dead Sea Scrolls followed the lead of Zechariah and expected two messiahs, a priestly messiah of Aaron and a royal messiah of Israel. In chapter 6, the prophet is told to make a crown and to put it on the head of the high priest Joshua. Most scholars have recognized that the text has been altered here. (See the note on p. 1309, OT.) Originally, it would have provided crowns for both Joshua and Zerubbabel. The coronation of a Davidic prince would have been a highly dangerous undertaking, because the Persian overlords would surely have taken it as a gesture of rebellion. We do not know whether Zechariah ever carried it out. At some point the text was changed to eliminate the crown for Zerubbabel and thus avoid the suggestion of rebellion.

The understanding of the monarchy became increasingly idealized in the period after the exile, when the shortcomings of the actual kings were forgotten. The future king would be the messiah, the anointed one who would make Jerusalem again a holy city (8:3). Zerubbabel could hardly have lived up to those expectations if he had been crowned, but his career, and that of Zechariah, helped keep alive the dream of independence for Judah.

The Appreciation of Ritual

Just as Zechariah shows a renewed appreciation for the institutions of priesthood and monarchy, he also has a more positive view of ritual than some earlier prophets. In 5:5–11 he sees wickedness in the form of a woman, who is put in a basket and carried off to Babylon. The vision suggests that wickedness can be gotten rid of by a symbolic physical action. This idea is very similar to the scapegoat ritual in Leviticus 16 and shows that the prophet appreciated the power of ritual. While wickedness cannot be put in a container and disposed of, the ritual action expresses the human desire—and strengthens the resolve—to rid the society of evil. It has its effect on the emotions and motivations of the people who perform it.

Zechariah also appreciated the limits of ritual. In chapter 7 he is asked about the proper number of fast days. He answers that motivation is more important than keeping the exact number. What is most important is to “Judge with true justice, and show kindness and compassion toward each other” (7:9). Here Zechariah echoes the sentiment of Hosea 6:6: “it is loyalty that I desire, not sacrifice.” After the experience of the exile and the destruction of the Temple, Zechariah knew that sacrifice was important too, but his priorities are still the same as those of Hosea.

Zechariah 9–11

Two passages in chapters 9 through 11 merit special attention: the messianic oracle in chapter 9, and the allegory of the shepherds in chapter 11.

The Messianic Oracle

The messianic oracle in 9:9f is famous because of its association with Palm Sunday in Matthew 21:5 and John 12:15. The ass was not as humble an animal in the ancient world as in modern times and was the vehicle of nobility in Genesis and Judges, but in the postexilic context it was a throwback to an earlier, simpler time. The hope is for a ruler who will restore Solomon's empire ("from the River to the ends of the earth") but will avoid the arrogance of the monarchy (symbolized by horses and chariots) and will be closer in style to the Judges.

As in Micah 4 and Isaiah 2, the messianic age will be a time of universal disarmament. One could scarcely describe Zechariah 9 as pacifistic, however. The logic of the passage is that the LORD will fight for Judah so that "they will drink and become heated as with wine" (9:15). The mentality of this passage is close to what we find later in the apocalyptic books. In Daniel, it is Michael the archangel who fights the battles of Israel. The human role is to maintain purity and be obedient to the law. For Deutero-Zechariah, the LORD assumes the role of warrior directly, in accordance with much of Israelite tradition (e.g., Ex 15:3). The Jewish people will not need the warrior's bow because God will kill their enemies for them.

This oracle could have been written at almost any time in the postexilic period when the monarchy was no more, and the Jewish people, in any case, were not equipped with horses and chariots. If the reference to Yavan (Greece) in v. 13 is original, the setting may be about the time of Alexander's conquests. The modest messiah, riding on an ass, provides an attractive contrast to the mighty Macedonian conqueror.

The Allegory of the Shepherds

The allegory of sheep and shepherds is very widespread in the ancient Near East, with the shepherds representing kings and rulers. The allegory of Zechariah 11 must be understood against the background of two passages in Ezekiel. Ezekiel 34 has an extended prophecy against the shepherds of Israel who exploited their flock. The movement of the prophecy, however, is from judgment to salvation, as the LORD takes over the job of shepherd. In Ezekiel 37:15–22, the prophet takes two sticks, representing Israel and Judah, and joins them together, signifying that they would henceforth be one nation under David their king. In Zechariah 11 we also find exploitative shepherds (compare Zec 10:2f), but there is no movement to salvation. The flock is designated for slaughter from the outset. The prophet is assigned to shepherd it for a while, but even he gives up on it and in the end they are given over to a foolish shepherd who takes no care of them. The wage of the prophet is the price of a slave, which is the value that the sheep merchants (foreign powers) attach to the God of Israel. It is also the wage of Judas in Matthew 26:15. The two staves of Zechariah 11 symbolize two covenants, one with the nations, and the other between Judah and Israel. Both are broken in the course of the prophecy. In all, then, Deutero-Zechariah reverses Ezekiel's predictions of salvation.

There is no agreement among scholars as to just when this prophecy was written or what context it addressed. All we can say is that it is an expression of extreme dissatisfaction and disillusionment from the postexilic period. The author of this passage is far from the trust in the institutional leaders that characterized the original Zechariah in chapters 1 through 8. There is no confidence here either in the Jewish leaders or in their foreign masters. All the prophet can do is protest, in the traditional language of prophecy: "Ah! my worthless shepherd . . ." (11:17). Like every great prophet from the time of Elijah, the anonymous speaker of these lines uses the power of the word to proclaim judgment and even to curse. Even if there is little hope of changing the situation, it is the duty of the prophet to testify and to ensure that people see reality for what it is.

Zechariah 12–14

The last three chapters of Zechariah are even more confusing than the previous three. There is persistent criticism of the rulers. Chapter 13 includes a "song of the sword" (cf. Ez 21) against the "shepherd" and predicts that only one-third of the people will be spared. More surprising than this is the prediction of the end of prophecy (13:1–6).

The Decline of Prophecy

Prophecy had been discredited for various reasons. One was the failure of predictions, especially the prophecies of glorious restoration after the exile. Another was the conflict between prophets themselves and the willingness of some to mislead the people for their personal gain. This had been a problem already in the time of Micaiah, son of Imlah (1 Kgs 22) and was severe in the time of Jeremiah. It was only natural then that prophets would come to be viewed with suspicion. In Zechariah 13:3 even a prophet's parents assume that an oracle spoken in the name of the LORD is a lie.

After Haggai and Zechariah, prophets seem to have lost status. We do not even know the real names of the prophets whom we call Third Isaiah, Deutero-Zechariah, and Malachi. The visionaries of the Maccabean period attributed their visions to ancient heroes such as Daniel and Enoch. Undoubtedly there were prophets in Judaism in the Hellenistic period (John the Baptist is a late example), but they did not command the same respect as those of the Assyrian and Babylonian eras.

The Final Battle

The motif that runs through these chapters is that of a final battle in Jerusalem. The traditional motif was that in the last days all the nations would assemble to fight against Mount Zion (e.g., Ps 2; Ez 38–39). This motif is elaborated here in chapters 12 and 14. Chapter 12 suggests that there has been some tension between Judah and Jerusalem. Judah must be saved first so that Jerusalem will not gloat over it. Rivalry between city and countryside is natural enough and does not help us identify the situation in which the oracle was composed. In Zechariah 12 the emphasis falls on reconciliation. Jerusalem and the Davidic house will be compassionate and will “look on him whom they have thrust through” (12:10). This enigmatic allusion has given rise to endless speculation. Some scholars have thought that the reference was to King Josiah, who was killed at Megiddo in 609 BC, but this oracle is certainly from a much later time. Others have thought the figure is deliberately mysterious like the Suffering Servant in Isaiah. John 19:37 saw the fulfillment of this prophecy in the piercing of the side of Christ on the cross. We cannot now be sure whether the passage referred to a specific individual in its Jewish context. What is clear is that the prophet looked for a time when the leaders in Jerusalem would show compassion for the people they had oppressed and be reconciled with them.

The final oracle, in chapter 14, also envisages reconciliation between Judah and the nations, so that even the Egyptians will celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles. There is a threat of coercion, which betrays the prophet's awareness that such a conversion of the Gentiles was implausible. Nonetheless, the future hope of Zechariah 14 is remarkable for its broad-minded universalism, insofar as it wants to include the Egyptians in the worship of the true God.

MALACHI

see pages [1317–1322 of the Old Testament]

The three chapters that make up the last book of the prophetic corpus are, like Deutero-Zechariah, anonymous—we do not know who wrote them. Malachi is not a proper name but means “my messenger.” The word is taken from 3:1 (“Now I am sending my messenger”) to designate the one through whom this word of the LORD was given. The book is made up of six oracles: 1:2–5; 1:6–2:9; 2:10–16; 2:17–3:5; 3:6–12; and 3:13–21. There are two short appendixes in 3:22–24.

The first oracle, 1:2–5, is a standard polemical oracle against Edom, Judah’s neighbor and bitter enemy in the postexilic period. This oracle is rather atypical of Malachi, however, as the others are all critical of Judah itself. He is especially critical of the priesthood and of breaches of faith by the people.

The Priesthood (1:6–2:9)

Malachi stands in a long line of prophets, beginning with Amos, who were critical of the priesthood. In this case, the charge is that the priests have been offering cheap sacrifices, disposing of sick and lame animals instead of offering the best ones. The logic of Malachi’s argument deserves notice. No one would offer a sick animal to the governor, yet the priests make such offerings to God. An offering has symbolic significance and reflects the attitude of the one who brings it. Malachi is not opposed to the priesthood as such. Far from it. He speaks of a covenant with Levi (2:4), which is never mentioned in the Pentateuch or historical books. (Levi is, however, set apart for a special role in Dt 10:8f and 33:9f.) He has the greatest respect for the ideal of the priesthood. Because so much is expected of the priests they are all the more guilty.

The most striking statement in this passage, however, is the declaration that “from the rising of the sun to its setting, my name is great among the nations” (1:11). The Gentile nations certainly did not worship the LORD explicitly, so it is not certain what the prophet had in mind. One theory holds that the reference is to the Jewish Diaspora, the scattering of Jewish exiles among the nations, but Jews were not supposed to offer sacrifices outside of Jerusalem, although they sometimes did. Two considerations may throw light on this problem. First, the Persian kings were generous in providing funds for the support of the Jewish Temple, and Malachi may have recognized this support as an offering to the LORD. Second, in the official correspondence in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, the LORD is called the God of heaven (e.g., Ezr 6:10). The high god of the Persians, and other sovereign deities could also be acknowledged as “the God of heaven,” and so the Gentiles could be understood to worship the same God as the Jews. This view of pagan religion would be decidedly broad-minded and liberal.

Breaches of Faith

The most controversial passage in the book of Malachi is found in the third oracle, 2:10–16. The prophet begins with the rhetorical question: “Have we not all one father?” He goes on to denounce two breaches of faith. First, Judah has committed idolatry: he “has married a daughter of a foreign god” (2:11). The second problem is the divorce of “the wife of your youth,” (2:14).

It is reasonable to assume that the background of this oracle is related to the situation described in Ezra 9, where the leaders of the people inform Ezra that “neither the Israelite laymen nor the priests nor the Levites have kept themselves separate from the peoples of the lands . . . for they have taken some of their daughters as wives. . . .” The usual explanation of the passage in Malachi is that Jewish men were divorcing the Jewish wives of their youth and marrying Gentile women, possibly for social reasons. Inevitably, they then became implicated in the cult of pagan deities. On this interpretation, the question, “have we not all one father?” is addressed only to Jews and is not as universalistic as it initially seems.

This interpretation is certainly possible. There is no doubt that Malachi disapproved of mixed marriages. There is no other evidence, however, that Jews in the postexilic period divorced their Jewish wives. In fact, the only instance of divorce for which we have evidence is found in Ezra 10, where the Jewish men who had taken foreign wives send them away at Ezra’s command. Malachi’s categorical statement, “for I hate divorce, says the LORD" (2:16), is hard to reconcile with Ezra's policy. It is possible, then, that Malachi is quite universalistic, despite his disapproval of mixed marriages. Once a marriage had been entered into, it was sacred. The Jewish men should have taken care that their offspring were "godly" (2:15) rather than try to undo the marriage. Conversion of the spouses, rather than divorce, was the solution. On this interpretation, the "one father" is the creator of all, Jews and Gentiles. Ethnic distinctions do not matter if one is willing to recognize the one God. The "daughter of a foreign god" only becomes so by her choice of which God to worship. If this interpretation is correct, Malachi exhibits some of the spirit of Saint Paul in his openness to the Gentiles. He would have been in direct conflict with Ezra, had they been contemporaries. We know that there was some diversity of opinion in Judaism at this period. Ezekiel 44:7 insisted that no "foreigners, uncircumcised in heart and flesh" be admitted to the Temple. In contrast, an oracle preserved in Isaiah 56 shows a very open attitude to "the foreigners who join themselves to the LORD," and assures them of a place on the holy mountain. Malachi may be seen as part of this "liberal" tradition, which welcomed foreigners if they were willing to convert to Judaism.

The Day of the LORD

The final chapter of the book is dominated by the expectation that God will come in judgment. The image of the refiner's fire is embedded in our memory by Handel's Messiah. The idea of a day of destructive judgment is, of course, an adaptation of the traditional Day of the LORD. The most distinctive aspect of Malachi's use of the theme is the motif of the messenger who prepares the way. In the final appendix, this messenger is identified as Elijah the prophet. Since Elijah had not died but was taken up alive to heaven (2 Kgs 2:11), there was speculation that he would return to complete his earthly course. In the New Testament, John the Baptist is cast in this role (Mt 11:14; 17:12f). Elijah's task is to warn the people and give them a last chance at repentance. It is likely that the prophet we call Malachi saw himself as performing this task.

The final oracle of Malachi is also the conclusion of the prophetic corpus. The editors of the prophetic books specifically wanted the collection to reinforce the laws of the Pentateuch: "Remember the law of Moses. . . ." (3:22). They also underlined the theme of the coming judgment, which runs throughout the collection. The purpose of the collected prophetic books is not only to remind us of the past but especially to motivate us in the present by making us look to the future.

THE GOSPELS AND ACTS

DONALD SENIOR, SUSAN A. CALEF, PHEME
PERKINS AND JUSTIN TAYLOR

The New Testament contains not one but four gospels. These four accounts of the life, ministry, and death and resurrection of Jesus provided to the church are a privileged source for our Christian faith. The collective portrayals of Jesus and his mission found in the four gospels are the source of our unity as a community of faith, but in their differences the gospels are also a support for the rich diversity of theology and practice that has always characterized Christianity.

THE SIMILARITIES AND DIFFERENCES AMONG THE GOSPELS

Because of their striking similarities, the three Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke have traditionally been called synoptic, from the Greek meaning to “view together.” The observer of these three Gospels would, in fact, notice many parallels among these narratives about Jesus if they were laid side by side. At the same time, the general structure and style of the Synoptic Gospels are distinctively different from John’s Gospel. For example, in each of the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus begins his public ministry of teaching and healing in Galilee, travels with his disciples on a single purposeful journey to Jerusalem, and there experiences final rejection, death and, ultimately, resurrection. Jesus’s sayings in these Gospels are generally either succinct and pointed or in the story form of the parable; his actions are characterized by marvelous healings and exorcisms, and a major theme of his preaching is the advent of the “Rule of God.” In John, on the other hand, Jesus moves back and forth between Galilee and Judea, and his teaching is often expressed in long, meditative discourses. There are no parables in John, no exorcisms, and fewer healing stories; the Rule of God motif plays a very minor role.

But it would be a mistake to consider Matthew, Mark, and Luke as carbon copies of each other. As the Reading Guides and the New American Bible Revised Edition introductions make clear, modern biblical scholarship has emphasized the unique style and theological perspective of each of the Gospels. While obviously related to each other in form and content, the three Synoptic Gospels develop their own distinct views of Jesus and his mission. Mark, for instance, begins his story of Jesus with his baptism at the Jordan, whereas Matthew, by means of the infancy narrative at the beginning of the Gospel, traces Jesus's origin back into the history of Israel. Luke, too, begins with an infancy narrative but gives much more positive emphasis to Jerusalem than either Mark or Matthew. In Luke's Gospel, the young Jesus goes to Jerusalem to listen to the teachers in the Temple courtyard, and the disciples of Jesus will later gather to pray in the Jerusalem Temple after his resurrection. Luke also adds a second volume to his Gospel: the Acts of the Apostles picks up the story of Jesus and his apostles where the Gospel left off, and shows its continuing force as the community of the Risen Christ moves out into the world (see Introduction to the Acts of the Apostles). Similarly, the three Synoptics all begin Jesus's public ministry in a different way: in Mark's account Jesus casts out a demon from a man in the synagogue of Capernaum to the amazement of the synagogue congregation (Mk 1:21–28). The inaugural scene of Jesus's mission in Matthew, by contrast, begins with a majestic scene of Jesus's healing the crowds that stream to him and then ascending a mountain to begin the first discourse of the Gospel, the Sermon on the Mount (see Mt 4:23–5:1). In Luke, Jesus's first public action is in his hometown synagogue of Nazareth, where Jesus reads a stirring passage from chapter 61 of the prophet Isaiah, which becomes the keynote of his ministry (see Lk 4:16–30). John, always distinct, begins Jesus's public ministry with the story of the wedding feast of Cana where Jesus changes the water into wine, the first of his "signs" that reveal his messianic identity and his power as the incarnate Word made flesh (Jn 2:1–12).

These examples illustrate that while the Synoptic Gospels share much in common and follow the general sequence of events laid down by Mark's Gospel, each of them also portrays the mission of Jesus in a distinct, if ultimately complementary, manner, thereby providing the church with a rich variety of perspectives on Jesus and his message. John's unique sequence, with Jesus moving back and forth from Galilee to Jerusalem at least three times, along with the other distinctive features of the Fourth Gospel, adds to this rich diversity.

The “Synoptic Problem”

Both the similarities and the distinctive differences among the Synoptic Gospels have led to ongoing debate about their interrelationship, or the “synoptic problem” as it is called. The canonical order of the Gospels—Matthew, Mark, Luke—influenced scholars in the early church, such as Augustine, to assume that Matthew was the first Gospel written, with Mark and Luke dependent on it. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, however, this general consensus was challenged. Analyses of the style and content of Mark led scholars to conclude that Mark was the first Gospel written, with Matthew and Luke directly dependent on Mark. The presence of other material in Matthew and Luke that was not found in Mark, such as the sayings of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount, led to the hypothesis of an additional source for Matthew and Luke. This hypothetical source of material—which scholars call “Q” (from the German word Quelle or “source”)—was probably a collection of sayings and parables of Jesus that circulated in the earliest Christian community. Independently of each other, if this hypothesis is correct, Matthew and Luke blended this source with their new renditions of Mark and perhaps with some other materials or traditions specific to their own communities. Both Matthew and Luke have accounts that are unique to them: for instance, Matthew has the visit of “magi from the east” (2:1–12) and the judgment of the nations (25:31–46); Luke has the parable of the good Samaritan (10:29–37) and the parable of the lost son (15:11–32).

This hypothesis about the interrelationship of the Synoptic Gospels is called the “two-source hypothesis” because it postulates two literary sources for the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, namely the Gospel of Mark and Q. It presumes that Mark was the first Gospel to be written and that Mark, in fact, set the basic format for the story of Jesus, a format that both Matthew and Luke used as the starting point for their own narratives. This relationship would account for the similarities among the Gospels. Each Gospel writer's particular interpretation of Mark, the use of other sources, and the unique pastoral and theological perspectives of the writers and their local churches would lead to the distinctiveness of each of the Synoptics.

Most New Testament scholars today, including Roman Catholics, accept the two-source hypothesis as the most plausible explanation of the interrelationship among the Synoptics. But even though a majority of scholars accept it, it is still a theory, and therefore vigorous debate continues about other solutions to the synoptic problem. There are those who are convinced that Matthew or even Luke should be considered the first Gospel to be written, or others who are not persuaded that there was any literary contact among the Synoptic Gospels, but rather that each developed independently from a common gospel tradition. Scholars stress the fact that the gospels were transmitted orally as well as in written form. In the first-century world, oral communication was considered as reliable as written formats since most people were not literate and depended on oral communication. In fact the oral transmission of the gospel materials—in liturgy, in settings of instruction, and so forth—most likely continued even after the gospels were being circulated among the Christian communities in written form. This transmission process might also explain some of the similarities and differences among the Synoptic Gospels.

The issue of the relationship of John's Gospel to the Synoptics is even more problematic. Until the midpoint of the twentieth century, most modern biblical scholars assumed that John knew of the Synoptic Gospels, and that his own Gospel was a distinctive variation on the synoptic tradition. But more recently, a significant number of scholars speculate that John may represent an independent stream of tradition that had little, if any, contact with the Synoptic Gospels or, more likely, had some common earlier starting point or contact with the oral gospel tradition that ultimately would diverge into the synoptic versions and into the distinctive format of John's Gospel. Some passages and sequence of passages in John are similar to those in the Synoptics (compare, for example, the sequence of the accounts of the multiplication of the loaves and the walking on the water in Jn 6:1–21 and the same sequence in Mk 6:34–52). John and the Synoptic Gospels are also fairly closely aligned in their Passion narratives, beginning with the arrest of Jesus.

The Gospels and Their Portrayal of Jesus

Whatever may be the ultimate solution to the synoptic problem, it is clear that the Gospels have made an essential contribution to our understanding of Jesus and his ministry. The strongly transcendent Jesus of John's Gospel, with its emphasis on the preexistent Word and the incarnation of that Word in human flesh, has had a profound influence on Catholic Christology. But in the twenty-first century, Catholic theology has turned with renewed energy to the portrayals of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels. The overarching symbol of the Rule of God proclaimed by Jesus in the Synoptics has provided an important framework for understanding the social and liberating implications of Jesus's message. Modern Christology's deep interest in the humanity of Jesus also turns to the portrayals found in Mark, Matthew, and Luke. The trauma of the Holocaust and the Christian-Jewish dialogue have led to a new appreciation of the Jewishness of Jesus, and here, too, the Synoptics' portrayal of Jesus and his milieu has provided an important backdrop. Interest in the literary quality of the Gospels has also focused attention on the Synoptic Gospels with their rich variety of sayings, parables, healing stories, conflicts, and other types of literary forms.

In short, the Synoptic Gospels, along with the uniqueness of John's Gospel, are a major and essential source for a genuine understanding of Jesus and his message. That richness is described in detail in the Reading Guides that follow.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

The Acts of the Apostles has a unique place among the New Testament writings. Most scholars believe that the Acts was written by "Luke," the same evangelist who composed the Gospel. At the beginning of the Acts, the narrator picks up from the preface that began the Gospel (see Lk 1:1–4 and Acts 1:1–2), addressing Theophilus, who may have served as the actual or ideal reader of the text or possibly the author's patron who supported Luke in his writing of this text. In any case, the sense of the two prefaces is that the evangelist wants to give Theophilus (and the other readers of this text) a sense of the God-directed sequence of events that led from the origin of Jesus in the history of Israel through the mission of Jesus himself and then, through the power of the Spirit sent by the Risen Christ, on to the unfolding history of the early community as it spread from its origin in Jerusalem to the ends of the earth (see Lk 24:47 and Acts 1:8). This sweeping expanse of the early Christian mission underwrites the entire structure of the Acts, culminating with Paul under house arrest in Rome, the capital of the empire, but still preaching the Gospel “with complete assurance and without hindrance” (Acts 28:31).

As noted in the Reading Guide for Acts, the sources and the historical reliability of Luke’s work are much debated. Traditionally, most scholars note that the author of Acts drew on a number of historical sources, possibly including his own firsthand experience with the apostle Paul during some of his missionary travels. But in the manner of ancient historical writing, he did not hesitate to imprint on the narrative his own theological interpretation of the events and their sequence. This is especially evident in the various speeches that occur in Acts and which reflect the consistent theological viewpoint of the author.

Some recent scholars, however, have sharply questioned the historical value of Acts, dating the work to the beginning of the second century, questioning whether the author is the same as that of Luke’s Gospel, and surmising that the author of Acts drew most of his material from his reading of the Pauline letters and his own imagination. A more balanced viewpoint acknowledges that the evangelist certainly intended to proclaim his distinct theological message in narrating the Acts of the Apostles, but also concludes that Luke drew on various historical sources in composing his account.

The content of Acts is shaped not only by its expansive geographical schema described earlier but also through the great characters that dominate the narrative, particularly Peter and Paul. Peter is a dominant figure in the opening chapters of the narrative that focuses on the life of the Jerusalem Christian community and its explosive expansion in numbers and territory. Later, the missionary travels of Paul, which take the Gospel through Asia Minor and into Macedonia and eventually to Rome, dominate the narrative and bring it to its conclusion.

In analyzing the content of Acts, some have concluded that one of Luke’s major purposes was an attempt to demonstrate to the Roman world that the Christian movement was not seditious or revolutionary. The leaders of early church, such as Peter and Paul, are portrayed as dealing respectfully with the Roman officials they encounter and, when there was conflict, the apostles themselves prove innocent having been unjustly accused by others. While this perspective has some validity, other scholars have contended that on a much deeper level, the Acts of the Apostles confronts some of the defining values of the Roman Empire and portrays a community of love and justice, which runs directly counter to the oppressive dimensions of Roman imperial rule.

The Acts of the Apostles has a noteworthy position in the canon of the New Testament, standing between the four Gospels and the body of the Pauline letters and other New Testament writings. In a true sense, Acts serves as a bridge or transition point within the canon. The writings and teachings of the great characters of Acts are found in the remainder of the canon following the Acts, such as the letters of Paul as well as those of Peter and James. More than any other New Testament text, Acts gives us insight into the dynamic missionary spirit of the apostolic church and illustrates how the message of Jesus was translated into the vibrant community life of the church's first generation.

BEFORE BEGINNING . . .

As pointed out in the introduction (pp. 1332–36), Matthew’s Gospel has long held a special place in the life and teaching of the church. The special character of this Gospel alerts us to some things to keep in mind as we set out to study it more closely.

A Story

Like each of the Gospels, Matthew’s work is a story or a narrative. It begins with the roots of Jesus’s family tree, describes the circumstances of his birth, and then turns to the events of his ministry, culminating in his death, resurrection, and final appearances to his disciples.

Even though Matthew’s way of telling a story is influenced by his time and culture, his narrative has many of the same characteristics as storytelling today. There is an unfolding plot that carries the story from the beginning of Jesus’s life, with its mixture of success and opposition, through to the death and triumph of its conclusion. There are characters (Jesus, the disciples, the opponents, etc.): some of them are quite developed (e.g., Jesus and Peter); some seem one dimensional (e.g., the Pharisee opponents); others have only minor roles (the mother of James and John). All of these elements play a part as one reads or studies the Gospel of Matthew.

In describing Matthew’s Gospel as a story we are not implying that it has no historical basis. There is no doubt that Matthew uses materials rooted in history (most of which he draws from the Gospel of Mark, one of his principal sources). But the evangelist, or Gospel writer, casts these traditions about Jesus into the form of a running story. A story or narrative helps draw the reader into the dynamism and feeling of the events being recounted. This feature of the Gospel can engage us when we come to study or read it in more depth.

A Fund of Teaching

While Matthew's Gospel remains a dynamic story, it is also enriched—more than any of the other Gospels—with the sayings of Jesus. This feature has led commentators over the centuries to consider Matthew a kind of “catechism” or teacher's manual. In addition to the basic story of Jesus's life and ministry, he also has a fund of the important sayings of Jesus (many of which he shares in common with the Gospel of Luke). The evangelist organized many of these sayings into discourses or speeches of Jesus (see introduction pp. 1333–35). These are not transcripts of actual talks given by Jesus because there is little logical progression found in the discourses as a whole. Rather, the evangelist clustered the sayings of Jesus around basic motifs. Explanations of many of the sayings are found in the notes to the biblical text; later in the study guide we will discuss some of the major themes of the discourses. These discourses bring the reader of Matthew's Gospel into vital contact with the power of Jesus's teaching.

The Jewish Heritage of Jesus and the Early Church

While all of the New Testament writings illustrate the essential dependence of Jesus and the early church on Judaism, none does it more forcefully than Matthew's Gospel. In fact, one of the primary purposes of this Gospel may have been the attempt to link the story of Jesus with the history of Israel. Any reader of Matthew who wants to go deeply into this Gospel must be alert to its Jewish background.

This feature of Matthew springs to our attention from the opening lines of the Gospel, which begin with a genealogy or family tree, tying Jesus into the history of Israel. The frequent use of Old Testament quotations, the concern with the Jewish law and customs of purity and prayer, the sharp critique of the Jewish leaders for their rejection of Jesus, and for their failure to lead a life of holiness—all of these show that Matthew was absorbed with Jesus's Jewish heritage.

But it is also apparent that Matthew is concerned with how this Jewish Jesus is Messiah for the whole world. As we will indicate, the universal mission of the church is also a prime motif of this Gospel. In fact, Matthew seems to be telling the story of Jesus so that it can help both the Jewish Christians and the Gentile converts of his community. After reading the Gospel they would be able to understand that Jesus fulfills the hopes and dreams God planted in the people of Israel, and now extends the offer of God's salvation to all the world.

Strange as it may seem, Matthew's Jewish roots may also explain another difficult feature of his Gospel: his strong critique of the Jewish leaders. The Jesus of Matthew's Gospel blisters his opponents for their hypocrisy and lack of faith. They are held up to the reader of the Gospel as negative examples of what an authentic disciple should avoid becoming. The sharp edge to Matthew's critique may stem from the tragic division and hostility that grew between Judaism and Jewish Christianity in the early decades of the church. For Matthew, the fact that most of Israel did not accept Jesus or the Gospel—while many Gentiles did accept it—was a baffling and unexpected turn in salvation history, and his telling of the story of Jesus reflects this. Matthew's Gospel seems to hold the religious leaders of the Jewish people as the ones most responsible. Unfortunately, Matthew's characterization of them also provided an opportunity for later anti-Semitism to develop (itself a violation of the Gospel's teaching).

How to Proceed

Since Matthew's Gospel is a narrative, it would be best to begin at the beginning. Although one could approach the Gospel thematically, that is, taking a certain topic (for instance, discipleship) and tracking passages throughout the Gospel that relate to this theme or motif, the best method might be to let the story line of the Gospel be your guide. Begin where Matthew begins (1:1) and let overarching ideas or themes emerge as the story of Jesus unfolds. This will be the method of the study guide: for each major section of the Gospel, we will discuss some key themes. You will find more detailed commentary on each section in the ample notes that accompany the Gospel text itself.

Working through Matthew's Gospel

The outline or major segments of Matthew's Gospel can be determined only by paying attention to the contours of his story. In harmony with the discussion found in the introduction (see NT, pp. 1332–36), we propose the following division:

- The Origin of Jesus (1:1–2:23). Here Matthew presents the events surrounding Jesus's birth and infancy.

- Preparation for the Ministry of Jesus (3:1–4:11). The test in the desert and the ministry of John the Baptist help prepare for the formal beginning of Jesus’s mission.

- The Galilean Ministry of Jesus (4:12–16:12). This major section spans the ministry of Jesus from his entrance into Galilee until his announcement of the Passion and his intent to go to Jerusalem. It can be subdivided into other important segments:

1. The Sermon on the Mount (4:17–7:29)
2. Jesus the Healer (8:1–9:35)
3. The Mission Discourse (9:36–11:1)
4. Mounting Hostility to Jesus (11:2–12:50)
5. The Parable Discourse (13:1–53)

6. The Kingdom and the Disciples (13:54–16:12). This section includes the ongoing activity of Jesus and reactions to it, but with special emphasis on Jesus’s relationship with Peter and the rest of the disciples.

- The Way to Jerusalem (16:13–20:34). Jesus’s fateful journey to Jerusalem with his disciples dominates this section. Three times during this journey Jesus predicts his Passion and resurrection (16:21; 17:22f; 20:17–19) and instructs his disciples on the cost of following him. There is also the important discourse on community life (18:1–35).

- Final Teaching in Jerusalem (21:1–25:46). This section of the Gospel takes place in Jerusalem. It concentrates on Jesus’s final exchanges with his opponents (esp. 21:12–22:46), his condemnation of the scribes and Pharisees (23:1–39), and the long discourse on the final age and judgment (24:1–25:46).

- Death and Resurrection (26:1–28:20). The concluding segment of the narrative contains the Passion narrative and the account of Jesus’s burial (26:1–27:66), the events surrounding the discovery of the empty tomb (28:1–15), and Jesus’s final appearance to the eleven disciples on a Galilean mountaintop (28:16–20).

Reading through Matthew’s Gospel

This section traces major themes and characteristics in each segment of Matthew’s Gospel. It supplements the introduction and notes that accompany the Gospel text itself.

The Origin of Jesus (Mt 1:1–2:23)

The first two chapters of Matthew's Gospel are like a prologue to a great drama, sounding major themes that will be played out in the rest of the story. In this way the evangelist or Gospel writer alerts the reader to the particular tones he will give his portrayal of Jesus.

A Messiah Rooted in the Hopes of Israel

The Jewish heritage of Jesus is stressed in the very first lines of this Gospel. He is the “son of David, the son of Abraham” (1:1) and his messianic lineage is traced through Jewish history from Abraham to Joseph, the husband of Mary (1:2–18). Explicit quotations from the Old Testament (e.g., 1:23; 2:6; 2:15; 2:18; 2:23) are augmented by numerous allusions to Old Testament figures and events, for instance: the hostility of Herod recalls the rage of Pharaoh against the Israelites; the reference to a star recalls the prophecy of Balaam about a future deliverer for Israel in Nm 24:17; Joseph, who is guided to protect the holy family through dreams and goes into Egypt, is reminiscent of another Joseph who was also a dreamer and one who rescued Israel in Egypt during a time of famine and distress (Gn 37–50). In all these ways Matthew proclaims something that echoes throughout the Gospel: Jesus is the promised Messiah, the one through whom God's longed-for salvation would be achieved. Thus continuity with the Old Testament is stressed (compare Mt 5:17).

A Messiah Close to His People

The experiences of Jesus and his family evoke another theme important to this Gospel, namely Jesus's identification with the “least.” The Matthean Christmas story has a sober mood to it. Right from the beginning, Jesus and his family are threatened with death by a tyrant. Innocent people are killed because they are identified with Jesus. The holy family is forced into exile (just as Israel had been in its tortured history). Even when they return from Egypt (a new exodus?) they are unable to go home to Bethlehem but must become displaced persons, living in Nazareth (2:22f).

This identification with the great events of Israel's struggle to be free may help explain one of the names given Jesus in Matthew's story. He is to be called Emmanuel, that is, “God is with us” (1:23). As subsequent events of the Gospel will show, the Matthean Jesus has extraordinary compassion for the suffering (see, e.g., the healings in chapters 8 and 9), explicitly identifies himself with the “least” (see Mt 25:31–46; 10:42), and promises to remain with his church as it continues its mission in the world (28:20; 18:20).

Jesus as Messiah of Israel and Savior of the World

While Matthew stresses the Jewish roots of Jesus and his messianic mission, he also signals the ultimate worldwide scope of that mission. As Herod and the leaders of Jerusalem plot to destroy Jesus, the magi, Gentile wise men, come seeking to pay homage to him (2:1–12). Even in the family tree of Jesus, Matthew may be hinting at the wider horizons of Jesus’s mission. While most of the genealogy traces the male line of Jesus’s ancestry, there are several women mentioned—Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Bathsheba—all of whom were foreigners whose entry into Jewish history was under unusual, sometimes even scandalous, circumstances. Even Mary, the mother of Jesus, seems to be put in this category since her association with the royal Davidic line is not by natural means but only through the initiative of the Spirit—something that causes consternation to Joseph (1:18–19).

Thus from the beginning outsiders had been part of Jesus’s history. This is a major theme of Matthew’s Gospel. He will emphasize the rejection Jesus experiences from the Jewish leaders and at the same time provide scattered examples of Gentiles groping toward faith (e.g., the centurion in 8:5–13; the Gadarene demoniacs in 8:28–34; the Canaanite woman in 15:21–28). Matthew carefully notes that Jesus’s historical ministry focused on Israel (10:5; 15:24) but with the new age of resurrection, that mission of salvation would now extend to all nations (28:19).

The infancy narrative also hints at the kind of salvation Jesus will bring. Of all the Gospels, Matthew alone stresses the significance of the name Jesus. The angel gives the divine instruction that the child is to be named Jesus “because he will save his people from their sins” (see the explanatory note at 1:21). Jesus is depicted as savior throughout the Gospel as he delivers people from their burdens of sickness, oppression, and sin. This is a Jesus who thirsts for justice or righteousness (3:15) and blesses those who, like the prophets before them, suffer in the pursuit of justice (5:10). Jesus exercises divine power in forgiving sins (see 9:1–8) and urges his disciples to reflect this same sense of reconciliation in dealing with each other (see esp. 5:43–48; 18:21–35).

The overall mood of Matthew's Christmas story is quite different from that of Luke's. There are no triumphant angels, no picturesque gathering of shepherds, little focus on a tender vision of mother and child. Instead there are ominous plots against the child, outbreaks of violence, displacement, and exile. But throughout there is also the promise of God's abiding presence, bringing salvation in spite of sin and rejection. Perhaps we can think of Matthew's infancy Gospel as an "adult" Christmas story, one that has a special truth for those experiencing violence and persecution today, many of whom are forced to leave their homes as refugees and immigrants, just as Mary, Joseph, and Jesus were compelled to do. It tells a story that begins in the strength and beauty of a particular history and culture but will ultimately reach across boundaries to touch all peoples. In any case, these two chapters prepare us for the story that will follow, a story that will trace Jesus's mission of salvation through bitter rejection to ultimate triumph.

Preparation for the Ministry of Jesus (3:1–4:16)

This transition section brings the reader from the infancy narrative into the beginning of Jesus's ministry in Galilee. It opens with the preaching of John in the desert and closes with the first footsteps of Jesus into Galilee, the northern region of Israel where he proclaims the advent of the Kingdom.

Two characteristic Matthean themes dominate this segment of Matthew's narrative.

The Dawn of a New Age

Throughout his Gospel, Matthew is conscious that the coming of Jesus was the decisive turning point in the history of salvation. In Jesus, God was offering the world salvation; the final age longed for by Israel was now beginning. This conviction is expressed through the figure of John the Baptist, whose appearance is reminiscent of Elijah, the great prophet expected to return at the end of the world (see note to 3:4) and whose message heralds the imminent approach of God's Kingdom (3:2). That message will be driven home by Jesus himself. He, too, preaches the nearness of the Kingdom (4:17). Whereas John is clearly a prophet preparing the way, Jesus is the one who brings the Kingdom to reality. Jesus is clearly superior to John: the Spirit of God descends on Jesus (3:16) and a “voice came from the heavens” (a Jewish way of speaking obliquely about God) declares that Jesus “is my beloved Son” (3:17). Jesus’s entry into the region of Galilee and the start of his mission there will be light and hope to people who languish in darkness and the fear of death (see 4:13–16). Even at this early stage of his Gospel, the evangelist hints at the universal scope of Jesus’s message (see note to 4:12–17).

Repentance and Good Deeds

Both John and Jesus call people to repentance. The reality of God’s kingdom and the consciousness of living in a new and decisive age of salvation should move Israel to change its way of thinking and its way of acting. Throughout his Gospel, Matthew will insist that the touchstone of authentic repentance is good deeds. So here John the Baptist challenges the Jewish leaders: “Produce good fruit as evidence of your repentance” (3:8). It is not sufficient for them to claim to be children of Abraham (3:9); status within God’s reign is not dependent on blood lines or rank but on one’s response to God’s love embodied in Jesus.

The testing of Jesus in the desert also illustrates this point (see notes to 4:1–11). As was the case in the infancy narrative, Jesus recapitulates the experience of Israel. In their wandering through the desert, Israel and its leaders had often failed God’s covenant, but Jesus, faithful Jew and faithful Son of God, will not fail, despite the efforts of Satan to draw him away from his messianic mission. The Jesus of Matthew’s Gospel shows a fierce and loving loyalty to God. As he tells John, he must “fulfill all righteousness” (3:15). Jesus is not content merely to preach fidelity to God; he demonstrates it here in the mysterious realm of the desert test and in his commitment to his mission even to the point of death on the cross.

The Galilean Ministry of Jesus (4:17–16:12)

A major section of the Gospel begins with Jesus’s entry into Galilee and the inauguration of his ministry of teaching and healing. We will consider the material in six segments, following the flow of Matthew’s narrative.

The Sermon on the Mount (4:17–7:29)

The Sermon on the Mount, the first of Jesus's five great discourses in this Gospel, is perhaps the best-known passage of Matthew's Gospel.

The Sermon itself spans chapters 5 through 7, but preparation for this great discourse begins in chapter 4. After sounding the theme of the Kingdom of God (4:17), Jesus calls his first disciples to follow him and to share in his mission (4:18–22). Jesus is committed to teaching, proclaiming the Kingdom of God, and healing (4:23). That liberating mission draws a response from every point of the compass as throngs of broken and needy people surge toward Jesus and his message of God's mercy (4:24f). Jesus's teaching, Matthew implies, is not mere abstract truth. Jesus's words and his healing touch have the power to transform lives.

The Sermon on the Mount does not have a neat progressive structure; rather, sayings of Jesus are clustered around basic motifs. We will note some of them here:

A New Teaching for a New Age. Matthew's conviction that Jesus is the Messiah, and therefore the authoritative teacher of God's will, runs throughout the Sermon. With Jesus the final age of salvation dawns and, with it, new insight into God's will. Matthew's Jesus sees that will of God as being in continuity with the revelation that came through the Law of Moses in the Old Testament, but now bringing that law to its fullest and most compelling expression. In the opening verses of the Sermon Jesus states: "Do not think that I have come to abolish the law or the prophets. I have come not to abolish but to fulfill" (5:17; see the comments in the notes to this text).

The conviction that the end of the world will be a triumph of God's grace—a conviction based on belief in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus—runs throughout the Sermon and gives it special force. The false values assumed by the world are crumbling. This is the message of the beatitudes (5:3–12): those who are "poor in spirit" or who "hunger and thirst for righteousness" or are "peacemakers" are blessed because God will vindicate their hopes. Similarly, because it is a new age with new possibilities, the old wisdom is no longer adequate. A series of six antitheses or contrast statements mark off the difference between former interpretation of the Jewish law and Jesus's own radical teaching (see 5:21–48).

The Supreme Law of Love Expressed in Committed Action. Matthew's emphasis on good deeds, cited earlier (see comments on Preparation for the Ministry of Jesus [3:1–4:17]) is clearly in evidence here. The words of Jesus at the conclusion of the Sermon are unequivocal: "Not everyone who says to me, 'Lord, Lord,' will enter the kingdom of heaven, but only the one who does the will of my Father in heaven" (7:21). But the Sermon demonstrates that Matthew's Jesus is not simply talking about frenetic action. The heart and soul of Jesus's teaching is the command to love. That comes to its fullest expression in the last of the contrast statements where Jesus tells his disciples they are to love even the enemy (5:44) because God's own love is lavish and indiscriminate, bathing both just and unjust in its light and refreshment (5:45). Matthew is consistent on this point throughout the Gospel (see 7:12; 22:34–40). Asking his disciples to strive for love of enemies—the most challenging demand that can be made on the human heart—expresses the ultimate spirit of all of Jesus's teaching on human relationships. For this reason, the disciple is to strive for complete honesty (5:33–37), avoid retaliation for injury (5:38–39), and is not to violate another through lust or manipulation (5:27–30).

Jesus's teaching roots all of this in God's relationship to us. The teaching on love of enemy and nonretaliation is, therefore, not a peripheral part of the Gospel nor is it an abstract ideal. This fundamental teaching of Jesus remains a challenge for Christians who wrestle with what this Gospel teaching demands of us who live in a violent world where the use of force is commonplace.

Revelation of a Close and Compassionate God. Jesus's teaching in this part of the Gospel also gives a profound insight into the Gospel's image of God. God's boundary-breaking love is not based on merit but reaches out even to the unjust and the "enemy" (5:45–48). God cares for us more than for birds of the air or the wild flowers, whose freedom and beauty are signs of God's provident love (6:25–32). Therefore, the disciple is to have complete trust in God and to pray with confidence and without pretense (7:7–11). Jesus's model prayer (6:9–15) catches up much of the spirit of the entire Sermon. There is a wonderful simplicity and honesty about the instructions on piety in the Sermon (6:1–18); God's relationship to us is direct and close. There is no place for posturing before such a loving God.

The Authority of the Sermon. How to live with the Sermon on the Mount has been a constant point of discussion in the church. Are these demanding words to be taken as impossible ideals, meant only for a perfect world or for perfect people? Or do they make sense only in the setting of Jesus's own times, when people thought the end of the world was near and so might be capable of responding heroically in such an emergency situation?

None of these solutions is adequate. The instructions of Jesus are not a system of clear-cut laws spelling out exactly how we are to act in every circumstance, nor are they abstract or impossible ideals. These teachings give us practical guidance as we seek to live a life faithful to the Gospel. They illustrate the core spirit of Jesus's teaching, a spirit we must embody in our own circumstances. The possibility of living in accord with the teaching of Jesus is based on God's grace; the Sermon illustrates the difference grace can make in a person's life and relationships. Within the array of moral choices that confront us, the examples Jesus gives in the Sermon, such as the call for integrity in our relationships, for nonretaliation, and for a commitment to reconciliation, help direct us in the right way.

Jesus the Healer (8:1–9:34)

Introduction. This is a powerful section of the Gospel in which Matthew displays another dimension of Jesus: he teaches, he also heals. As the notes to the text state (see comments under 8:1), Matthew draws most of these stories from his source, Mark's Gospel, but the evangelist significantly reedits this material. He abbreviates many of Mark's stories, omitting some of the colorful details in order to concentrate on Jesus's essential actions and accompanying words. Matthew also clusters the nine major stories of these chapters into three segments (a tenth miracle is reported but barely narrated in 9:32; it serves to contrast the reactions of the Pharisees with that of the crowds): 8:1–17; 8:18–9:17; 9:18–34.

Each of these clusters of stories seems to have a dominant motif. In 8:1–17 the emphasis falls on Jesus's power to heal. The second section, 8:18–9:17, concentrates on the demands of discipleship. And the final section, 9:18–34, illustrates the essential role of faith in the healing narratives. These motifs are by no means exclusive, however; the richness of the healing stories allows the Gospel to proclaim many levels of meaning at the same time. We will examine more closely each of these dominant themes.

Christology. By narrowing the spotlight on Jesus in the first three stories, Matthew emphasizes the divine power that works through the Messiah. Jesus cleanses the leper, heals the servant of a Gentile soldier, and dispels the fever of Simon's mother-in-law. Except in the case of the centurion, there is little attention to the plight or disposition of the sick person in these stories. The concluding verse of the section (8:17) makes Matthew's intended point; by his healing touch Jesus fulfills the prophetic promise of Isaiah 53:4: "Yet it was our pain that he bore, our sufferings that he endured."

By their very nature the healing stories serve Matthew's purpose. All of us experience sickness or disability at one time or another in our life. We all experience our limitations and realize too well that death looms before us. Jesus is moved with compassion (9:3, 36) and does not hesitate to stand in solidarity with those whose condition makes them "outsiders" (see his association with the leper, the Gentile, the tax collectors). Jesus's compassionate response to human suffering and his strong commitment to healing are also intended as a model for the mission of his disciples.

The Conditions of Discipleship. In the second set of stories Matthew illustrates some of the demands of discipleship. Only those fully committed to proclaiming the Kingdom of God and following Jesus are able to go with him across the sea (see 8:18–23). But even for those who remain, following Jesus can mean the threatening experience of the storm at sea (8:24–27) and strange encounters with the power of evil (8:28–34). The true disciple is one who learns that mercy and compassion drive Jesus, a lesson the Pharisees (whom Matthew consistently portrays in negative tones) seem unable to grasp (9:9–13).

Faith. The healing stories often serve to illustrate the meaning of faith. Faith is, first of all, trust in Jesus's power to heal and transform us. That faith is evident in the leper who approaches Jesus (even though the law forbade him to do so), in the centurion who pleads on behalf of his servant (see 8:10), in the friends who bring the paralytic to Jesus (9:2), in the woman with the hemorrhage who touches the tassel of his cloak (9:22), and in the two blind men who trust that Jesus can do what no one else can (9:28f).

Note, too, the faith illustrated in these stories often takes a very active form. The leper boldly comes up to Jesus; the woman dares to touch him; the Gentile swallows his pride and pleads with a Jewish healer; the friends of the paralytic gain him access to Jesus. The sick and disabled can teach us this lesson: trusting in God does not mean mere passivity, waiting for a bolt from heaven. Transformation comes when we exercise our trust in God, and courageously commit our own resources to seeking a new life.

The Mission Discourse (9:35–11:1)

Now that Matthew has completed his portrait of Jesus as teacher and healer, he moves to a new segment of the Gospel. Using his own mission as a model, Jesus gathers his twelve apostles and commissions them to proclaim the Kingdom of God, and to heal. The motivation for their mission is the same that animated Jesus's own energetic healing in the previous two chapters: the crowds are "troubled and abandoned, like sheep without a shepherd" (see Mt 9:36–38).

This forms the second of the five great discourses of Matthew's Gospel. The evangelist draws some of the material in this discourse from chapter 13 of Mark's Gospel (see especially the material in Mt 10:16–23); the rest comes from Q, the sayings source he holds in common with Luke (see introduction), or from Matthew's own sources.

Note that the discourse can be read from two different perspectives: (1) as part of the unfolding story of Jesus's ministry and his relationship with his disciples; (2) and as an instruction for the post-Easter church. In the former time frame, Jesus tells his apostles to restrict their mission to Israel, the chosen people of God (10:5f); but in the new age, when the gospel must be proclaimed to all the world (see 28:16–20), Jesus's words apply to the universal mission of the church.

Typical Matthean themes run through the discourse. The Twelve (including Matthew the tax collector, 10:3) share in Jesus's own mission of proclaiming the Kingdom and healing those in need (10:7f). Note that the apostles are not yet commissioned to "teach"—that comes only after the resurrection (see 28:20) when they have a deeper grasp of Jesus's mission. Any disciple who follows Jesus can expect to meet indifference, hostility, or rejection (see, e.g., 10:16–25, 34–39). The discourse is not naive but clearly warns the apostles about the cost of proclaiming the gospel in an authentic way.

But there is also strong affirmation of the power of the gospel and of the sense of confidence that should go with those on mission. They are not to be afraid of those who threaten their lives (10:26–28) or flinch before the divisions that may come. The loving God who has an eye for the sparrows and counts the hairs on our heads will not abandon those who follow the way of Jesus. Christians who live in circumstances of persecution and violence understand well these words of Jesus. Those who live in more comfortable circumstances need to ask themselves if the gospel values they reverence are not sometimes co-opted by the seductions of the dominant-culture.

Matthew's concern with the mission of the church will reemerge in the final scene of the Gospel when the mission of Jesus, confined to Israel during his lifetime, bursts out into the world through the mission of the church (28:16–20).

Mounting Hostility to Jesus and His Mission (11:2–12:50)

In the mission discourse Jesus warned his disciples to expect opposition when they preached the gospel. Now Jesus himself becomes embroiled in conflict because of his mission. For the next two chapters Matthew traces the opposition that swirls around John the Baptist and Jesus.

The motif of conflict is apparent from the first words of chapter 11—John the Baptist is in prison and soon to die. He sends his disciples to Jesus with the key question: “Are you the one who is to come, or should we look for another?” (11:3). That question leads to a summary of Jesus's great deeds, and to Jesus's reflection on John's ministry and his own (11:4–15).

The opposition to Jesus is crystallized in “this generation” (11:16), which understood neither the ascetical John nor the gentle and compassionate Jesus (11:18f). “Wisdom,” that is, God's message to Israel embodied in Jesus himself, will be proven present in the liberating works that Jesus performs in his ministry, including his outreach to sinners and those on the margin and his sharing bread with them (11:19).

Matthew weaves together in this section profound insight into the bond between Jesus and his Father (11:25–27)—one of the most beautiful passages of the Gospel—with tumultuous scenes of conflict, as the enemies of Jesus fail to perceive that he is the Messiah and attack him for healing on the Sabbath (see the series of stories in chapter 12). Judgment, another typical Matthean motif emerges from all this. The Jewish towns that refuse to transform their lives in the light of the gospel bear the responsibility for their failure. Matthew's emphasis on judgment goes hand in hand with his emphasis on the necessity of good deeds. Living out the gospel should not be confused with mere noble aspirations and religious rhetoric. A tree is known by the fruit it produces (12:33).

The section closes with this insistence: the true family of Jesus are not those who merely claim kinship with him but those who do the will of God (12:50).

The Parable Discourse (13:1–50)

Parables are the trademarks of Jesus's teaching style. As the notes to the text explain (see 13:11), these pointed stories both reveal and veil the mystery of the Kingdom. Unless the listeners are willing to probe beneath the surface of the parables, the true meaning of Jesus's words will escape them (13:14f).

Typical themes of Matthew's Gospel emerge again in this discourse. The certain triumph of the Kingdom, which was a strong theme of the Sermon on the Mount, dominates the parable of the sower (13:1–9) as well as the parables of the mustard seed (13:31f) and the yeast (13:33f). Discipleship motifs stand out in the parables of the treasure and the pearl (13:44–46): true followers of Jesus are to put aside everything and be fully committed to the compelling beauty of God's reign.

Many of the parables in Matthew's Gospel have obvious moral messages (see also the stories in chapters 24 and 25). The parable of the weeds sown among wheat (13:24–30; explanation, 13:36–43) makes the point that the church, like the world itself, is a mix of good and evil. The disciples should not be discouraged by this but be confident that God's grace will triumph at the end of time, and evil will be punished. The theme of judgment present in the previous section of the Gospel reemerges here.

The conclusion of the parable discourse seems almost to be a signature of the Gospel writer (13:52). The scribe who is instructed (literally: "discipled") in the kingdom of heaven is like the householder who can bring from the storehouse "both the new and the old." Preserving the best of the past and yet making it come alive for a new generation seems to be one of the main purposes of Matthew's Gospel (see introduction, p. 1336).

Matthew was convinced that Jesus did not destroy the beautiful traditions of Judaism but gave them new meaning. Bridging past and present in an open and respectful manner is one of the greatest challenges of religious leadership in any age.

The Kingdom and the Disciples (13:51–16:12)

It is difficult to characterize this long section of Matthew's story under any single heading. Jesus's ministry of teaching and healing continues but now begins to burst beyond the confines of Galilee into Gentile territory. Clashes with his opponents, mainly the Pharisees, also continue to erupt. But the haunting story of Jesus's walking on the water and Peter's awkward attempts to trust his master (14:22–33) may give us a clue to the special character of this section. With new intensity Jesus begins to instruct his disciples on the mystery of the Kingdom, and they begin to realize the awesome identity of the Messiah. Several motifs run through these chapters:

The Inclusive Mission of Jesus. Following the lead of Mark's Gospel, Matthew begins to trace the boundary-breaking nature of Jesus's ministry (see Reading Guide to Mark's Gospel, RG 428–442). After another conflict with the Pharisees (15:1–20), Jesus ventures near the Gentile region of Tyre and Sidon and there encounters a "Canaanite" woman (15:21–28). This is one of the most intriguing stories in the Gospel. At first Jesus resists the woman's entreaties on behalf of her daughter. The Matthean Jesus remains committed only to the people of Israel (see 10:5f). But the woman's insistence, an expression of her active faith, breaks down Jesus's resistance and seems to open the horizons of his own vision. Matthew uses this story to instruct his own church: they, too, may have had too narrow a concept of their mission, thinking that only Jews could become Christians. But the needs and genuine faith of the Gentiles showed the early church that God intended to extend the boundaries of the Kingdom to include all people.

The two stories of the miraculous feedings (14:13–21; 15:32–39) give a similar impression of expansiveness. Jesus will not let the vast crowds go hungry and uses the occasion to instruct his disciples. Another epic scene takes place on the mountaintop, a favorite place of revelation in Matthew's Gospel (15:29–31). Similar to the vista at the beginning of the Sermon on the Mount (see 4:23–25), vast crowds of the sick and disabled surge toward Jesus, and he cures them. Once again the disciples can observe the boundless compassion that drives Jesus.

Opposition and Rejection. Despite the mercy of Jesus, his opponents continue to resist and misunderstand his message. The parable discourse had warned that some would prefer not to “see” and not to “hear” what Jesus preached. That prediction comes true in Nazareth (13:54–58) where Jesus’s own people rebuff him and take offense at his “wisdom and mighty deeds.” The story of Herod and the death of John the Baptist (14:1–12) are early warning signs about Jesus’s own fate. His enemies were so immersed in their opposition that they would carry it to the point of trying to destroy Jesus.

In the conflict about the tradition of washing hands before eating (15:1–20), the Gospel offers one explanation of the intransigence of Jesus’s opponents. They have allowed their own traditions to “nullify the word of God” (15:6). In other words, they had lost a sense of priority, placing good but not essential values ahead of those that were most fundamental. Matthew continues to stress that Jesus was not opposed or indifferent to the Law, but he wanted to inject new life into its observance by insisting that the love command was the basis of all fidelity (see discussion at 5:17).

The Disciples. The story of Peter walking on the water contains material unique to Matthew’s Gospel and illustrates both the importance of Petrine traditions in this Gospel and the evangelist’s view of discipleship. Peter begins to sink in the waves because he “doubted” or “hesitated” and because he has “little faith” (14:31). The latter phrase is particularly characteristic of Matthew’s Gospel (see p. 1334). Matthew’s portrayal is sympathetic and realistic: the disciples believe but their faith is weak. Deeper trust in Jesus is needed.

At the same time, the disciples are quite different from the opponents of Jesus. While the opponents reject Jesus and align him with Satan (12:24), the disciples acclaim Jesus as “the Son of God” (14:33). The enemies of Jesus cannot understand his teaching, but the disciples, albeit hesitantly, do “understand” (16:12; see also 13:16, 51).

The Way to Jerusalem (16:13–20:34)

A dramatic shift in the setting of the Gospel story is about to take place. Jesus goes with his disciples to the northernmost reaches of Israel, Caesarea

Philippi (16:13). There he will ask the fundamental question of the Gospel: “Who do you say that I am?” (16:15). Jesus’s question and Peter’s response represent a turning point in the narrative. “From that time” (16:21) Jesus will begin to speak openly about his approaching death, and the action of the Gospel will point toward Jerusalem and the events of the Passion and resurrection.

The announcement of Jesus’s journey to Jerusalem (16:21) thus introduces the motif of a “journey,” a theme already present in Mark’s Gospel (see comments on Mk 8–10) and one greatly expanded in the Gospel of Luke (see comments on journey narrative in Luke RG 451). The threefold prediction of the Passion (in Matthew, see 16:21; 17:22f; 20:17–19) punctuates the journey and keeps the reader’s attention directed to Jerusalem and Jesus’s death and resurrection. That great climax to the Gospel, already alluded to as early as the infancy gospel (see comments in RG 416), dominates the entire narrative and gives urgency to Jesus’s teaching. The transfiguration reflects this: immediately after Jesus predicts his death for the first time, the light of resurrection glory seems to emanate from his person in a mountaintop scene reminiscent of the revelation given to Moses on Sinai (see the notes to Mt 17:1).

During the journey narrative, the spotlight seems to fall with new intensity on Jesus’s relationship with his disciples. Although some conflicts with the Pharisees take place (see, e.g., the dispute about divorce, 19:1–12), most of Jesus’s words are directed to his disciples, revealing to them what it means to follow a Crucified Messiah. Special Petrine traditions are present in this section, too, including Peter’s confession at Caesarea Philippi and Jesus’s blessing upon him, his mediating role in paying the Temple tax on behalf of Jesus and Peter himself (17:24–27), and his lead question about forgiveness in the discourse on community life (18:21).

The Ministry of Leadership

Matthew gives special attention to Peter in his Gospel (see comments on 14:22–33).

Although the disciples had already confessed Jesus as “the Son of God” (14:33), Peter himself has an opportunity to confess his own belief that Jesus is “the Messiah, the Son of the living God” (16:16). Thus the focus in the Caesarea Philippi scene is not on the disciples in general but on Peter and his faith in Jesus. Peter's firm belief in Jesus is rewarded by a special blessing. He receives a new name, "Peter" or "rock" (see comments in notes to 16:18, p. 1366) because he will be the foundation upon which Jesus's church will be built. Peter is given the "keys of the kingdom of heaven" and empowered to "bind" and "loose." Both of these images, as the notes to the text indicate, refer to the responsibilities of leadership entrusted to Peter. He becomes, in effect, the prime minister of the community.

Matthew will balance out this focus on Peter by also asserting the authority of the community in chapter 18, but at this point in the Gospel he is showing the important role entrusted to the leader of the community. Undoubtedly this reflects a ministry of leadership already present in Matthew's church. The Gospel uses Peter as a model for leadership. Historically, Peter had been an important leader in the church. In Acts we are told that he helped mediate between the Jewish Christian church of Jerusalem and the emerging Gentile churches (see Acts 10–15). Paul, too, acknowledges the importance of "Cephas" (see, e.g., Gal 1:18; 2:11–14). And the Letters of Peter, even if not written directly by the Apostle, testify to the importance of his memory in the early church (see RGS to 1 and 2 Peter).

While it would be going too far to impose on this Gospel scene the full-blown institution of the papal office, Roman Catholic tradition can legitimately see in the figure of Peter the founding model for the later emergence of this office in the church. Peter is blessed because of his strong faith in Jesus and because he served a key role in maintaining the unity of the church. Equally important to remember, however, is that the gospel refuses to idealize Peter or to place him above the demands of the gospel. The same Peter that Jesus blesses lavishly here is also called "Satan" and "obstacle" (16:23), will underestimate the need for reconciliation (18:21), and will deny his discipleship in the face of the Passion (26:69–75). Leaders within the community must remain disciples (see 23:10).

Life in the Community

The fourth discourse of Matthew's Gospel, the discourse on community, occurs in this section (18:1–35). The notes supply detailed commentary on this powerful example of Jesus's teaching. Matthew gathers here two parables of Jesus (the lost sheep, and the unforgiving servant) and several sayings, and he molds them into a discourse.

Two key sayings divide the chapter and strike its major themes. At the end of the first major section, Jesus tells the disciples: “In just the same way, it is not the will of your heavenly Father that one of these little ones be lost” (18:14). The call to urgently seek out and care for the “little ones,” that is, the weak or alienated members of the community, dominates the first half of the discourse. The members of the community are not to seek their own aggrandizement (18:1–5) and are never to “scandalize” or despise those on the margins of the church (18:6–10). Matthew’s version of the lost sheep parable drives that lesson home: the leaders of the community are to seek out the stray, not to condemn them.

The second half of the discourse concludes with another key saying: “So will my heavenly Father do to you, unless each of you forgives his brother [or sister] from the heart” (18:35). The need for reconciliation dominates the latter half of the discourse. Disputes are to be settled in a fair and practical manner (18:15–17), and even if strong discipline must be taken toward a recalcitrant member, he or she is to be treated “like a Gentile or a tax collector”—a poignant note where Jesus seeks out just such people (see, e.g., 18:17; 9:9–13). Those who have experienced limitless forgiveness from God should not put limits on reconciliation within the community. That is the radical message of Jesus’s reply to Peter, and the concluding parable of the story. Its message is similar in content to Jesus’s teaching on love of enemies in the Sermon on the Mount (see 5:43–48). We are to strive to love even the enemy because God’s own love is lavish and indiscriminate.

This entire chapter offers a remarkable model for the church. There is little concern here for structures and budgets (important as they are for us and may have been for Matthew’s community, too); emphasis falls rather on the care we need to have for each other if we are to be followers of Jesus.

Final Teaching in Jerusalem (21:1–25:46)

The Gospel drama now enters Jerusalem, the capital city, where Jesus will experience death and resurrection. The great temple of Herod dominated this city in the time of Jesus, and its shadow falls across the scenes Matthew narrates in these chapters.

Jesus the Messiah enters his city in triumph, but he is seated on a donkey's colt, which Matthew interprets as a sign of Jesus's humility (see comment on 21:4–5). As a fearless prophet, Jesus cleanses the house of God, another sign of his God-given mission to call Israel to repentance. The next day Jesus returns to the Temple compound and begins to teach the crowds (21:13). There follows a number of key texts that reveal the heart of Jesus's message. But the Jewish authorities (the Pharisees now joined by the “chief priests and elders of the people,” all members of the Sanhedrin, an informal ruling body whose base would, in fact, have been Jerusalem) remain hostile to Jesus and his message. This section of the Gospel is filled with sharp clashes between Jesus and his opponents.

Two important clusters of sayings and parables are found here. In the first, 23:1–39, Jesus excoriates the scribes and the Pharisees, portraying them in purely negative tones for their hypocrisy and lack of fidelity. As we will discuss in the next section, this is Matthew's most intense assault on the Jewish leaders. The second collection of sayings and parables forms the fifth and final discourse of the Gospel, the so-called eschatological discourse or discourse on the end of the world (see the note to 24:1). While gazing at the stunning Temple from the Mount of Olives, Jesus reflects on the fate of the Temple and the end of human history. This leads to a series of parables, some of them unique to Matthew, urging the disciples to remain faithful and to exemplify that fidelity through good deeds (see 24:36–25:46).

The Authority of Jesus

Matthew portrays Jesus in strong, authoritative tones in this section. The Messiah enters the royal city in triumph with the acclamations of the crowds filling the air (21:1–11). The “Lord of the sabbath” (12:8) asserts his authority over the Temple by driving out the merchants and money changers, reclaiming God's house (21:12–17). He meets head-on the challenges of each of the major religious authorities of Israel: the scribes, the Pharisees, the chief priests, the elders of the people, the Sadducees. Even though Jesus will soon be a prisoner, Matthew wants to leave no doubt in the mind of the reader: Jesus is the Messiah, the true Teacher of Israel.

The foundation of that authority is Jesus's identity as God's Son. The parable of the tenants reaffirms that (21:33–46); Jesus describes himself in this allegory (see note in text, p. 1379) as the son of the vineyard owner, the "heir," whose maltreatment will bring judgment on the tenants. He is more than David's Son—even David the King had to call the future Messiah "Lord" (22:41–46).

Matthew also presents Jesus dealing with questions of the law in characteristic fashion. The law is not rejected out of hand but reinterpreted. The dispute about the greatest commandment of the law (22:34–40) is most revealing: "The whole law and the prophets" depend on the love command. The core of Jesus's teaching and the basis for all interpretation of tradition are the values of love and compassion (see 5:43–48, and comments on chapter 18).

Jesus and His Opponents

In chapter 23 Matthew presents Jesus as launching into a fierce assault on the hypocrisy and infidelity of the scribes and Pharisees. As the notes observe (see comments on 23:1–39), they become, in effect, negative examples—the reverse side of the portrayal of the faithful disciple found in the Sermon on the Mount. Reading this discourse tells us what values Matthew's Jesus holds most dear: practicing what one preaches (23:3), being compassionate rather than laying heavy burdens on others (23:4), not using religion as a means of self-aggrandizement (23:5f), having a proper sense of values and therefore understanding that mercy and justice are always the highest priority in interpreting the law (23:23–28). Jesus urges his disciples to be leaders who have a sense of solidarity with the community rather than viewing others as inferior and subordinate (23:8–12).

This strong indictment of the failings of the leaders is not intended solely to pummel the opponents of Jesus. Rather it is meant as a sober instruction for the Christian readers of the Gospel. Nevertheless, the negative stereotyping of the Jewish leaders, especially when it is read apart from its historical context in the Gospel, can have destructive effects. We who live in the horrible shadow of the Holocaust must be responsible readers of this Gospel and, while taking to heart the important lessons of this discourse, must not allow its negative image of the Jewish leaders to influence our attitude to Jews today. Every modern pope and the teaching of the Second Vatican Council has attacked anti-Semitism and reminded Catholics of their spiritual and historical roots in the living faith of Judaism (see particularly, the 2002 statement of the Pontifical Biblical Commission, The Jewish People and Their Sacred Scriptures in the Christian Bible).

Judgment

The parables that make up the eschatological discourse have a familiar Matthean ring to them (see 24:36–25:46). Once again the evangelist dwells on the importance of doing good deeds as the authenticating expression of one's discipleship. The "faithful and prudent servant" is the one who is found taking care of the household and distributing food to those in need (24:45f); the wise virgins have their lamps filled with oil and are ready to respond at the proper moment (25:1–13); the servant who employs his or her talents is the one blessed on the master's return from a long journey (25:14–30); those who will be invited to inherit the Kingdom are those who carried out the love command—feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, visiting the prisoner, and welcoming the stranger (25:31–46).

The climactic parable of the sheep and the goats illustrates how far Matthew is prepared to press his insistence on good deeds. The "sheep" had not even recognized the Risen Lord present in the needy but yet they acted out of compassion. They are blessed by the Son of Man in his glory because they have proven to be faithful servants. More than once in his Gospel Matthew has stated that doing the good deeds of compassion and justice weigh far more than knowing the right words and wearing the right vestments (see a similar message in the parable of the two sons, 21:28–32). There is little tolerance for religious hypocrisy in this Gospel. Some interpreters believe that in the original context of Matthew's Gospel this parable was directed to the Gentiles, indicating they would be judged on how they responded to the early Christian missionaries who are called "the little ones" in the mission discourse (10:42). In any case, love, compassion, and care for the vulnerable remain key criteria for judging the authenticity of the Christian life.

The Death and Resurrection of God's Son (26:1–28:20)

The Passion (26:1–27:66)

The Passion story moves quickly from Jesus's prediction of the plot against him (26:1–5), through the last supper with his disciples (26:20–30), his anguished prayer and arrest in Gethsemane (26:36–56), the interrogation and trial before the Sanhedrin or Jewish Council (26:57–75), the Roman trial before Pilate (27:1–31), and the final scene of crucifixion, mockery, and death (27:32–56). The burial in Joseph of Arimathea's tomb and the Pharisees' demand that Pilate post a guard (27:57–66) prepare the reader for the explosive events of the resurrection.

The peculiar emphases Matthew gives the Passion story can be summarized under three major themes:

The Majesty of Jesus. Even in the Passion story, Jesus remains the majestic Messiah of Israel. This is already true in Mark's account, but it is given particular emphasis by Matthew. Jesus is imbued with prophetic knowledge of the events about to take place: he predicts the plot of the leaders (26:1f), is fully aware of his impending death (26:12, 18), knows the identity of his betrayer (26:25), and the certainty of Peter's denials (26:34). His captors cannot seize him until Jesus confronts Judas with his treachery (26:50). And when the high priest commands with an oath that Jesus reveal his identity, Jesus predicts with calm majesty his eventual triumph as the Son of Man who will be exalted at the right hand of God (26:64). Death cannot destroy or defeat God's Son—that is the heart of Matthew's message in the Passion story. The parade of mockers who file past the cross jeer Jesus and ridicule his claim to be God's Son (27:39–44). But as death comes, Jesus is acclaimed as the true Son of God, and nature itself erupts in testimony to Jesus's victory (see comments on 27:51–54).

The Dawn of the New Age. The death of Jesus is the center point of sacred history in Matthew's perspective. As discussed earlier (see comments in RG 422), Matthew, along with all of the New Testament, considered Jesus as the advent of the final and decisive age of salvation promised by God to Israel. The death of Jesus was the climactic act of his entire mission: here all of his love and commitment were compressed into one intense act of fidelity to the will of his Father. Thus the death of Jesus becomes in a special way the turning point between the old and the new age. With the death (and resurrection) of Jesus the final age of human history had begun and, therefore, humanity must respond to God's grace in a new way.

Several features of Matthew's Passion story proclaim this theology of history. At the moment of death (27:51–57) signs of the new age break out: nature convulses, the tombs are split open, and the dead are liberated—just as the dream of the prophet Ezekiel had envisioned, with the dead bones of Israel's hopes taking flesh and escaping the tomb (see Ez 37:1–14; see also Dn 12:2). The age of death is over; the age of resurrection begins.

The attention Matthew gives to the response of the leaders and people of Israel to Jesus is another part of his theology of history (see, e.g., 27:24f). Paradoxically, because the leaders of Israel reject Jesus, the way will now be open for the gospel to be proclaimed to the Gentiles. This does not mean that Matthew despairs of having the Jews accept the message of Jesus (he seems to offer hope of this in 23:39), but he does believe that the mission to the Gentiles now begins in this new and final age of salvation. One of the catalysts for that mission was the fact that the mission to Israel had seemed to fail but this was not the ultimate reason for turning to the Gentiles; from the beginning Matthew portrays the outreach to the nations as the plan of God for the salvation of all people. Paul, too, has a similar theology in Romans 9–11, where he reminds his readers that in the mystery of God's providence, the failure of Israel becomes a moment of grace for the Gentiles. For Paul, Israel remains special because God is faithful and will never forget the promises made to the chosen people. This biblical teaching is reaffirmed in the theology of the Second Vatican Council where in the document on relationships with non-Christian religions (Nostra Aetate) the Council explicitly refers to Romans 9–11 to state that the Jewish people have a special and enduring place in the history of salvation. Pope John Paul II, in his historic visit to the synagogue of Rome, affirmed that Catholicism has a relationship with Judaism “which we do not have with any other religion.” For these reasons the Pontifical Biblical Commission declared that “an attitude of respect, esteem and love for the Jewish people is the only truly Christian attitude in a situation which is mysteriously part of the beneficent and positive plan of God” (The Jewish People and Their Sacred Scriptures in the Christian Bible, par. 87).

Examples and Counterexamples. The Passion story also serves Matthew's teaching about discipleship. In the crucible of suffering and death, one's true character is revealed. The Passion is filled with examples, both positive and negative, of how people respond to the gospel in crisis. The leaders remain implacably hostile to Jesus and demand his death. Peter and the rest of the disciples prove their "little faith," with Peter denying he knows Jesus and the others fleeing in panic. Judas betrays his master and gives in to despair rather than seeking repentance (27:3f).

There are also bright moments: the woman of Bethany who performs a last kindness for Jesus, anointing him for burial despite the protests of the disciples (26:6–13); Pilate's wife who pleads on behalf of "that righteous man" (27:19); the centurion and his companions who acclaim the crucified Jesus as the "Son of God" (27:54); the women who stand by Jesus at the cross and see to his burial (27:56); Joseph of Arimathea, the rich disciple who risks his reputation by burying a publicly executed man in his own new tomb (27:57–61). And, of course, Jesus himself is the prime exemplar of fidelity—seeking God's will despite the threat of death, refusing violence at the moment of his arrest, and trusting in God even as his life's breath is taken from him.

There is no doubt that Matthew intended the readers of the Passion to place themselves in the story and to ask the troubled question posed by the disciples: "Surely it is not I, Lord?" (26:22).

The Resurrection (28:1–20)

The Gospel concludes with the events surrounding the empty tomb and Jesus's appearances to his disciples. None of the Gospels attempts to narrate the resurrection itself, but Matthew comes closest to that in mentioning an "earthquake" and an "angel of the Lord" who comes from heaven to roll back the stone from the tomb (28:2). Marvelous events such as these and the opening of the tombs at the moment of Jesus's death (see 27:51–53) continue to signal the final and glorious age when God's presence would be felt in a vivid way.

Mark's original ending does not include the report of any appearances of the Risen Christ; the discovery of the empty tomb, and the words of the heavenly messenger about Jesus's triumph over death are enough to proclaim the message (see Mk 16:1–8). But in Matthew's Gospel, Jesus appears first to the women as they leave the empty tomb (28:9f), and then to the eleven disciples (here Matthew does not forget Judas's tragic fate) in Galilee (28:16–20). Matthew’s denunciation of the Jewish leaders continues right to the end of the Gospel: when the chief priests and elders learn from the soldiers about the astounding events at the tomb, instead of believing in Christ’s triumph, they concoct a false story about the disciples stealing the body of Jesus (28:11–15).

The final scene of the Gospel (28:16–20) is on a mountaintop, the favored site of special revelation throughout the Gospel (see, e.g., the temptation, the Sermon on the Mount, the transfiguration, the healing of the crowds, 15:29–31). The Risen Christ comes in triumph, as he had predicted during his Passion, and commissions his disciples to go to “all nations,” making disciples, baptizing them into the community, and teaching them to observe all that Jesus had commanded.

Major themes of the Gospel are compressed into this scene: Matthew’s concern with the universal mission of the church; his emphasis on Jesus as teacher; his realistic portrayal of the disciples (who even now hesitate [doubt] as they encounter the Risen Christ, see 28:17); his interest in the church. This scene has inspired countless Christian missionaries throughout the centuries to leave their homeland to bring the gospel to others. Above all, the Gospel’s majestic portrayal of Jesus as the church’s firm foundation and abiding hope is reaffirmed. No matter how turbulent will be the church’s future, the Risen Jesus will not abandon it. Matthew concludes his Gospel with the final promise of one who was named Emmanuel, “God is with us” (see 1:23): “I am with you always, until the end of the age” (28:20).

BEFORE BEGINNING . . .

Scholars generally regard each of the canonical Gospels as addressed to a specific community whose temporal and geographic location and circumstances influenced the particular Gospel's emphases, hence, its intended meanings. Unfortunately, there is little certainty regarding the authorship and provenance of the Gospel of Mark. The titles that associate each Gospel with a particular name were added sometime in the second century. Moreover, the author of Mark neither identifies himself in his text nor provides explicit information about his location. Some contemporary scholars continue to argue for the veracity of the early tradition that identifies the author as a Mark associated with Peter and Rome. Others, however, have cast doubt on the accuracy of that tradition. This guide assumes anonymous authorship, but follows the convention of using the traditional name Mark. The location of composition also remains uncertain. Each of the locations for which scholars argue, Rome, Galilee, or Syria, has a degree of plausibility, but none has gained consensus.

There is broad agreement, however, regarding the approximate date and historical circumstances in which the Gospel was composed. Most scholars have concluded that the farewell speech known as “the little apocalypse” (Mk 13) reflects some knowledge or even experience of the first Jewish war with Rome (66–74 AD). A somewhat more precise date is suggested by apparent references to the imminent or recent destruction of the Temple and the appearance of the “desolating abomination” (Mk 13:14). Thus, the Gospel was probably written shortly before or after 70 AD, a time of turmoil in the Empire in the wake of Nero's persecution of Christians in Rome and the violence of the Roman-Judean war.

Scholarship treats 13:9, 11–13 as the clearest evidence for the historical circumstances in which the Gospel was composed. There Jesus foresees persecution by both the Roman authorities and the synagogue, as well as division, even betrayal, within families over allegiance to Jesus and the reign of God. Such circumstances are also glimpsed in the parables of Mark 4, particularly the parable of the sower, where the seed stands both for the word (proclamation of the reign of God) and for persons who have received the word, some of whom (i.e., the seed sown on rocky ground) are tempted to fall away “when tribulation or persecution comes because of the word” (4:17).

It appears, then, that the Gospel addresses a community suffering, or fearful of suffering, persecution along with its attendant trials and tribulations. These included struggles within the community over the betrayal and apostasy that often result from persecution as well as the need for forgiveness and reconciliation in the aftermath of such conduct. This situation would account for some of the notable emphases of the Markan narrative. For example, the Passion and death of Jesus are especially prominent in Mark, with the cross looming large in the Passion narrative, casting its long shadow over all that precedes. The pivotal central section of the Gospel is dominated by three portents of Jesus’s suffering, death, and resurrection (8:31–33; 9:30–31; 10:32–34), each followed by prophecies of the persecution of his disciples (8:34–38; 9:42–48; 10:17–31, 38–39). And finally, at the Gospel’s dramatic climax, the disciples embody these realities, as Judas betrays Jesus, Peter denies him, and all abandon him at the arrest. These features of Mark’s Gospel seem designed to address a community struggling with the costliness of allegiance to Jesus and his “gospel of God” (1:14).

In the midst of the violent turmoil of the period, faith in Jesus and his proclamation of God’s reign would be sorely tried. It is not difficult to imagine that the fate that Jesus suffered at the hands of the powers-that-be—death on a Roman cross—would raise grave concerns, and that members of the Markan community now fear suffering. If Jesus, God’s messiah and son, inaugurated the reign of God, then why the fierce opposition that now threatens them? How long must they endure the threat?

Characteristics of Mark’s Gospel

A Narrative

To address these urgent concerns, the evangelist composes for his community, not a collection of sayings, such as the Gospel of Thomas, but a narrative. He tells them a story, or more accurately, he retells a story with which they were familiar in some form, although not in the particular form in which Mark shapes it. As the first to compose a textual narrative, Mark selected and arranged traditions about Jesus into a sustained plot, doing so in a way that would serve his purpose in writing for his audience.

The final product bears resemblance to various ancient genres (e.g., ancient biography or bios, that is, the account of a life of a great personage; the Greek tragedy; the novel), but is an exact match to none of them. Like an ancient drama, Mark begins and ends with a well-defined prologue (1:1–13) and epilogue (16:1–8), and the narrative’s dramatic quality is undeniable. The educated reader in the first century might well have seen the Gospel of Mark as a biography of sorts. But with its frequent and rapid change of scenes and its simple but vivid language, the Gospel more closely resembles biblical narrative. Mark’s story, after all, features the God of Israel, prophets like Isaiah, Elijah, and John the Baptist, and references to the ancestral figures of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and David. Indeed, the frequent use of Old Testament quotations and allusions suggests a conscious effort to set the story of Jesus in connection to the story of God’s relationship with ancient Israel as told in the Scriptures. The opening verses of the Gospel make that intention abundantly clear: Mark writes a narrative of eschatological or end-time events as prophesied by Isaiah.

A Narrative Theology

Given the similarity to biblical narrative, it is unsurprising that Mark’s Gospel is pervaded by theological claims. It is, implicitly, a “narrative theology,” that is, an understanding of God expressed in a narrative rather than through a set of abstract systematic propositions. That the narrative is deeply Christocentric has long been recognized and for good reason: the opening verse (1:1) establishes Jesus as the protagonist of the story, who commands center stage throughout the drama. Moreover, midway through the narrative Jesus himself explicitly raises the question that is central to Mark’s narrative theology, “Who do you say I am?” (8:29). This matter of Jesus’s identity threads through the length of the narrative (1:1, 24, 34; 3:21–22; 4:41; 6:3, 14–16; 8:11, 27–29; 14:61–62; 15:39). Because who Jesus is has implications for what it takes to follow him, the narrative also features numerous teachings about discipleship.

Mark's Gospel, however, is not simply a story about Jesus's identity; more fundamentally, it is a story about what God wills to do in and through Jesus. The framing of the narrative by the words and actions of God makes this clear: at the opening, God speaks through the words of Isaiah, then tears open the heavens to invest his Son with the Spirit; and at the Gospel's climax, God tears the Temple curtain, then raises Jesus from death. Thus, Jesus plays the lead in the Markan drama but acts in response to one who is hidden offstage, or more accurately, one directing from behind the curtain (of the heavens, of the Temple), whose will scripts the action that unfolds before the eyes of the audience.

Three essential components of Mark's theocentric script are introduced early in the narrative: the way of the Lord (1:14–15), the reign of God (1:14–15), and mystery (4:11). The narrative theology built on those components may be summarized as follows:

The human condition is plagued by captivity and oppression at the hands of the various “powers-that-be” who currently reign in the world, in reference to the strong man Satan who has been in charge of the house, 3:26–27; demons who afflict people, 1:21–28, 34, 39; 5:1–20; 7:24–30; 9:14–29; Gentile leaders who rule by domination, 10:42; religious leaders who, as tenants of God's vineyard, have lost sight of their accountability to God, the vineyard owner, 12:1–9. In response to this condition, the Lord God (the True King of Israel and Vineyard Owner), in fulfillment of the ancient promise voiced by Isaiah (1:2–3; Is 40:3), wills to liberate in a new end-time exodus (1:2–3). To that end, God authorizes and empowers Jesus as Messiah and Son who, in the power of the Spirit (1:9–11), walks “the way of the Lord” from wilderness (1:3–13) to Jerusalem (11:1) to inaugurate the reign of God (1:14–15). That transformative reign comes by way of a divinely orchestrated sequence of eschatological or definitive events that “must” (Greek, dei) happen: Elijah first must come (9:11); the Son of Man must suffer, die, and rise (8:31); then there must be wars and rumors of wars (13:7); and prior to the consummation of the reign, the gospel must be preached to all nations (13:10). Thus, for Mark, salvation brings liberation from bondage to the temporal and spiritual powers (“ransom for many,” 10:45) and for the life-giving reign of God (1:14–15), based on a new covenant sealed in blood (14:24), with a people who will participate in a new “house of prayer for all peoples” (11:17).

How to Proceed

The evangelist's decision to produce a narrative bears implications for proper interpretation. Narratives have a "logic," that is, a way in which the various episodes and sections fit together to form a coherent plot, and a "rhetoric," that is, they seek to persuade the audience of something. Thus, it is by studying the Gospel as a whole that readers are able to grasp the meaning of the individual parts that together communicate Mark's "good news." Before embarking on a study of Mark, then, it is best to read it from beginning to end in a single sitting, or even to read it aloud, which is how the original audience would have experienced it. This also allows one to experience the dramatic power of the Gospel. With its terse style, its rapid and frequent change of scene, and its dramatic tensions, Mark's narrative draws the audience into the story, preparing them to carry the story forward (see the shorter ending, 16:20, following the longer ending, [Mk 16:9–20]).

Working through Mark's Gospel

It is helpful to have an orientation to the overall structure and main segments of the story before undertaking a close reading. The most obvious feature that structures Mark's Gospel is geographic: Jesus moves from the Judean wilderness to Galilee, then on to Jerusalem for the climactic events of his story. The geographic movement from preparatory events in the wilderness to climax in Jerusalem corresponds to the Deutero-Isaian vision of the "way of the Lord," which Mark cites at the beginning of his drama (1:2–3). The outline here thus foregrounds the "way of the Lord," which may be considered programmatic for Mark's story. This guide reads the Gospel as a three-act drama with a prologue and epilogue.

Prologue: Beginning of the Good News . . . (1:1–13)

Preparing the Way of the Lord in the Wilderness

These verses provide a précis of the divinely scripted drama that will unfold: Jesus, God's Messiah (1:1) and Son (1:1, 11), will walk "the way of the Lord" in fulfillment of the Deutero-Isaian prophecy of a new exodus in the final days.

Act 1: The Way of the Lord in Galilee and Environs (1:14–8:21)

The Reign of God Draws Near: Proclamation, Reception, and Resistance

The first half of Mark's Gospel covers most of Jesus's public ministry, beginning in the Jewish region of Galilee, and then extending into Gentile territory. It consists largely of mighty deeds and controversy stories, interspersed with occasional call and commissioning narratives. Initial successes in Jesus's ministry lead to determined opposition by religious leaders and incomprehension by others, including Jesus's kin and disciples. His powerful words and deeds increasingly raise questions about his identity: "Who then is this whom even wind and sea obey? (4:41).

Act 2: The Way of the Lord to Jerusalem (8:22–10:52)

The Mystery of the Reign: Identity, Destiny, and Discipleship

Jesus makes his way from Caesarea Philippi in the north, southward to Jerusalem, his geographic destination and existential destiny. The focus shifts from mighty deeds that free people from illness, possession, and hunger to private instruction of the disciples regarding Jesus's destiny. The section features three Passion-resurrection prophecies that share the same basic structure: the prediction of the fate of the Son of Man (8:31; 9:31–32; 10:32–34); disciples do not understand (8:32–33; 9:33–34; 10:35–40); Jesus clarifies the implications of his identity and destiny for discipleship (8:34–9:1; 9:35–50; 10:41–45). The material is framed by two encounters with blind men, both of whom invite comparison to the incomprehension of the disciples that Mark highlights in this section.

Act 3: The Way of the Lord in Jerusalem (11:1–15:47)

Baptism into the Mystery

After a triumphal entrance into Jerusalem and a series of controversies with Jewish leaders, Jesus prepares the community for the Passion that they will experience after his death, and then proceeds to the events of his own suffering and death. The content divides into three sections: Jesus's relationship to the Temple (11:1–12:44); the eschatological discourse that envisions for disciples the way forward (13:1–37); and the Passion narrative, where Jesus “drinks the cup” and is plunged (i.e., baptized) into the mysterious destiny of which he spoke on the way (Mark 14–15).

Epilogue: The Good News Continues . . . (16:1–8)

The Way of the Lord Returns to Galilee

The drama ends with discovery of the empty tomb and the heavenly messenger’s announcement of God’s triumph over death and thus Jesus’s vindication. Additional endings are appended to Mark’s Gospel, but these are later additions by someone other than the evangelist (see notes). In this guide, we assume that 16:1–8 was the original ending of Mark’s narrative.

Reading through Mark’s Gospel

The goal of this section is to highlight narrative developments that advance the plot toward its dramatic climax and to trace major themes in Mark’s narrative theology.

Prologue: Beginning of the Good News (1:1–13)

Preparing the Way of the Lord in the Wilderness (1:1)

The Markan drama opens with a proclamation (1:1), a citation of the prophet Isaiah (1:2–3), then three brief episodes in rapid succession, each featuring a reference to the Spirit and a wilderness setting. These episodes portray the events that were expected to happen at the end-time as now assumed to be underway: fulfillment of Scripture, appearance of Elijah, opening of the heavens and return of the Spirit, the time of testing, and coming of the messiah.

The first verse is less a title than an opening proclamation of the “good news” (euangelion) that prompts the reader to see the story in a particular light. In the Roman world and the Septuagint, euangelion and related verb forms often refer to good news associated with kings and bear the nuance of victory. Mark’s use of euangelion, in combination with two titles used for Israel’s kings (Christ and Son of God), suggest that Jesus is God’s royal messiah or messianic king, with hint of some kind of triumph about which the audience can rejoice. That Mark designates the story “the beginning” of the good news suggests that the story is still unfolding, that is, in the time of the intended audience.

The Way of the Lord (1:2–3)

The scriptural citation that stands at the head of the prologue serves to interpret the events to follow as divinely initiated and as the fulfillment of the Deutero-Isaian vision of “the way of the Lord” (Is 40:3): that is, God’s deliverance of his people from bondage and the triumphant march from the wilderness to Jerusalem to restore his reign (Is 40:9–11; 52:7). In the Bible, “way” (Heb, derek; Greek, hodos) refers literally to a physical path to follow, including the way or path opened by God in the Exodus (ex-hodos; literally, way out); it is also used figuratively for a course of conduct. Both meanings are relevant for Mark’s story: “the way of the Lord” that Jesus, God’s Messiah (12:35–37), will walk involves a geographic path from wilderness to Jerusalem. Moreover, it will proceed first by way of Jesus’s incomparable exercise of power in service of the needs of others, then by way of the suffering, dying, and rising of the Son of Man.

The Coming of Elijah (1:4–8)

In accord with the Isaian prophecy, the action of the story begins in the wilderness, with the forerunner, John, preceding Jesus onto the Markan stage (1:4–8), costumed as the Elijah who would return for the end-time events (see Mal 4:5–6). The appearance of Elijah is, in Mark, one of the four divinely ordained “musts” of God’s saving plan (9:11–13; see also 8:31; 13:7, 10). John is not the primary agent of God’s salvation, and so he prophesies the coming of a stronger one (1:7) who will baptize not with water but with the holy Spirit. That the Spirit affords superior strength is confirmed by later episodes in which the same Greek word for strong (ischyros) occurs: Jesus is stronger than the strong man Satan and his demons (3:22; 5:4).

Baptismal Events (1:9–11)

The coming one who will baptize with the Spirit must first receive that Spirit; the water baptism by John that follows is not the focus of the scene. It is, rather, the vision that Jesus experiences, which consists of three elements. The three occurrences here anticipate those that will occur at the climax of Mark's account: here Jesus receives the Spirit; on the cross he breathes out his spirit; here the heavens are torn open; after his death the curtain of the Temple is torn; here the voice of God declares Jesus to be his son; after Jesus's death the centurion declares Jesus to be son of God. Jesus's baptism in the wilderness thus anticipates the "baptism" (on Golgotha) to which Jesus refers later in the narrative (10:38).

Like the appearance of Elijah, the tearing of the heavens marks the beginning of the end-time (Is 63:19); while descent of the Spirit into Jesus signals invasion of divine power into the earthly realm. Then, from high above the earthly stage the heavenly voice, in words reflective of Psalm 2:7 and Isaiah 42:1–2 provides a kind of divine imprimatur of the opening proclamation: Jesus is God's messiah-King and Son but with intimation that the Son's experience will be that of the Suffering Servant who carries out God's will in the midst of adversity and ridicule. In Mark, the baptismal episode is, in effect, Jesus's anointing as royal messiah and son, and also by virtue of the Spirit his authorization and empowerment as God's agent. From this point forward, Jesus acts with unprecedented authority, for he acts with the Spirit-power of God.

Testing by the Adversary (1:12–13)

The final episode of the prologue previews the conflicts with the "powers-that-be" that will occur throughout Mark's account. The Spirit that entered Jesus at baptism drives him deeper into the wilderness for an encounter with Satan (satana, meaning adversary). The wilderness setting and reference to forty evoke memory of Israel's forty-year wandering after the Exodus, an experience that tried and tested the people's faith in their God. In contrast to the memory of his Israelite ancestors, this almost serene tableau of Jesus exposed to danger (beasts) and Satan evokes Psalm 91:9–14, which promises that the one who trusts in God will receive angelic protection from beasts and other harmful things. Some commentators have suggested that Jesus's encounter with the beasts evokes the ultimate reconciliation of nature to occur at the end-time (see, e.g., Is 11:6–9).

The testing episode sets the mission of God's Christ and Son in the context of a cosmic conflict between two unseen parties, God and Satan. In this, Mark's Gospel reflects a mode of apocalyptic thought that is accentuated in times of war and persecution, such as the Markan community experienced. This cosmic apocalyptic eschatology assumes that the earth is in the grip of cosmic forces of evil, which human beings are helpless to overcome of their own power. Their only hope is a climactic intervention by God to defeat the oppressive powers and transform the human condition for the better. For Mark, the coming reign of God, and Jesus's many exorcisms (1:21–28, 32–34; 5:1–20; 9:14–29) are the climactic intervention for which they have hoped.

The Way of the Lord in Galilee and Environs (1:14–8:21)

In act 1, Jesus makes his way from wilderness to Galilee, where he proclaims the reign of God in powerful word and deed and calls for repentance and faith in “the gospel of God.” The incomparable authority and power that he received at his baptism and exercises along “the way” elicits mixed responses, both attraction and resistance, and raises questions regarding his identity, a theme that spans the length of the Gospel. Although the disciples are privileged recipients of “the mystery of the kingdom [reign] of God” (4:11), they are increasingly unable to grasp the implications of that mystery for mission and discipleship. The content can be divided into four sections, each developing Markan themes.

The Gospel of God: The Reign at Hand (1:14–15)

Jesus's arrival in Galilee is preceded by an ominous notice of John's “handing over,” which foreshadows later references to the handing over of Jesus (3:19; 9:31; 10:33; 14:10–11, 18, 21, 41, 42, 44) and of his disciples (13:9). That Mark introduces Jesus's inaugural proclamation as “the gospel of God” confirms the theocentric foundation of Mark's Christology: “the gospel of Jesus Christ” (1:1) that Mark's narrative proclaims is simultaneously “the gospel of God” (1:14).

Jesus's first words in the narrative provide a summary of his mission, which consists of two elements: proclamation of the reign of God, and a call to repent and believe. The phrase “the time of fulfillment” uses a Greek word (kairos rather than chronos) connoting decisive or opportune time as well as crisis (1:15; 13:35), thereby signaling the urgent need for decision. That decision concerns the in-breaking reign of God. Although the NABRE translates the Greek basileia as kingdom, “reign” is often preferable.

Kingdom is static and evokes a place or realm, but in Mark the basileia of God is above all the activity of reigning within the earthly realm; hence, the use of both kingdom and reign in this Guide. Although the phrase “the kingdom of God” is infrequent in the Old Testament, the image of God as the true king of Israel, whose rule brings justice and peace, is common. The perfect tense Greek verb for “drawing near” combines present and future, indicating that God’s reign begins now in Jesus’s ministry but will be established in fullness only in the future, with the return of the Son of Man (8:38; 9:2; 13:24–27; 14:62).

Given the twofold meaning of “the way,” the call to repent evokes the image of a physical turning toward and falling in behind Jesus on “the way” as well as a change of thinking in accord with Jesus’s course of conduct as he proceeds to Jerusalem. A later episode clarifies the change of thinking that Jesus models in Mark: to think as God does rather than simply as humans do (8:30). In the Bible, faith or belief is not so much intellectual conviction but trust and confidence, and so, too, personal allegiance. Hence, “believe in the gospel” is a call to place one’s trust and confidence in the good news of the triumphant coming of God’s reign.

Impact and Reception of the Reign (1:16–3:35)

A series of episodes confirm the transformative power of God’s reign and report the mixed response to it among the people. The first response is by four men whom Jesus calls to follow him (1:16–20). The wording of the call (more literally, “Here! Behind me!”) has the feel of a command or order, the efficacy of which is indicated by the response: all four instantly leave everything to follow Jesus. The episode thus highlights his commanding presence. It also introduces the Markan understanding of discipleship: to walk together behind Jesus on the “way of the Lord,” sharing in his work of “fishing” for people in preparation for the final day of judgment (see Jer 16:16; Hb 1:14–15). The same Greek phrase “behind me” will occur in Jesus’s stern rebuke when later Peter is literally and figuratively out of line (8:33) in his response to Jesus’s instruction regarding his destiny.

The first day of ministry that follows (1:21–34) manifests the efficacy of God’s reign as it brings relief from various forms of human suffering: a man in the synagogue is freed from an unclean spirit, a woman healed of fever, and many others are cured of their afflictions. Two occurrences of the word “authority” (Greek, exousia; 1:22, 27) in the first mighty deed highlight the incomparable authority of Jesus that is derived from the Spirit vested in him at the baptism. That the first mighty deed is an exorcism (1:21–28) reflects the Markan understanding of Jesus’s mission as a cosmic struggle between God and Satan. It also reflects a worldview with which modern audiences often cannot identify: that physical and psychic ailments are caused by evil spirits. In the absence of alternative explanations, ancient peoples construed the evils in life as caused by personal spirit-beings. This does not mitigate the message conveyed by exorcism episodes: that God’s will to reign requires liberation from all forms of evil, including the systemic forms that are beyond the control of individuals (e.g., economic oppression, systemic injustice, racism, sexism).

The “honeymoon” of the mission ends quickly, as the plot soon thickens with conflict. In a series of controversies, religious leaders question his authority and the lawfulness of his actions, then determine to destroy him (2:1–3:6). Although his powerful deeds draw suplicants and large crowds to him, no human character rightly perceives who Jesus is. Unclean spirits recognize that he is “Son of God” (1:23–24; 3:11; 5:6–8), but religious leaders accuse him of blasphemy (2:7), Sabbath violation (2:24), and working in league with the prince of demons (3:22), while his kin think he is “out of his mind” (3:21). The pattern of incomprehension that includes his family results in a redefinition of kinship that embraces his disciples: “Here are my mother and my brothers . . . whoever does the will of God is my brother and sister and mother” (3:35).

Parables, Mystery, and the Problem of Perception (4:1–34)

The fast-paced action of the first three chapters is followed by the first major block of teaching material, the parable discourse. It features three seed parables, the last two of which explicitly refer to the reign of God, thereby forging a link with the three preceding chapters. This material serves to explain the mixed responses to Jesus’s proclamation that emerged in the preceding text and to assure the audience that despite the apparent lack of progress, God’s reign will eventually triumph in an abundant harvest (4:20). The frequent verbs of perception and the repeated admonition to see and to hear (4:9, 23, 24) suggest that it is not easy for those who encounter Jesus to grasp what they see.

The explanation for such incomprehension is given in 4:11–12, where Jesus first affirms that there is a “mystery” to the reign of God that is disclosed only to some (4:11). That is, some are given an insight into the hidden purposes of God that distinguishes them from others. The tense of the verb for “granted” suggests something given previously, which would seem to be in the telling of the parable of the sower. But mystery can be given and not yet comprehended, even by insiders, as is the case with the disciples, who do not understand the parable and request clarification (4:10, 13). The strong sense of difference between insiders and outsiders here likely reflects the heightened awareness of the boundaries of identity that persecution brought for Mark’s community.

Jesus’s further observation—“But to those outside everything comes in parables, so that ‘they may look and see but not perceive, . . . in order that they may not be converted and be forgiven’ ” (4:11b–12; cf. Is 6:9–10)—implies God’s deliberate intention that some people misunderstand and fail to repent. In view of later traditions about free will and predestination, modern readers are often troubled by this thought. Mark, however, is drawing upon Isaiah 6:9–10, which offers an earlier biblical solution to the perennial problem of human resistance to the divine will, namely, that even such resistance falls within the purposes of God. Therefore, the community can have hope of God’s triumph.

Expanding Scope of the Reign (4:35–8:21)

In this section, the mighty deeds that bring wholeness and relief from suffering continue to predominate. The geographic scope of Jesus’s mission now expands as he moves beyond the boundaries of Galilee into Gentile territories (the Decapolis, 5:1–20; 7:31; the region of Tyre and Sidon, 7:24–30). The material is loosely organized into two missionary journeys (4:35–6:44; 6:45–8:26), each commencing with a sea crossing “to the other side” that proves distressing to the disciples (4:35–41; 6:45–52). The mission focus is also evident in the block of material that includes the commissioning of the Twelve (6:6b–13, 30), which frames the flashback to the death of John the Baptist (6:14–29). The latter episode is a sobering reminder of the costs of discipleship in a world resistant to God’s reign.

This section also features a series of recurring events: two sea crossings, three bread episodes, and three difficult conversations in the boat. Examination of each reveals important Markan themes.

Sea Crossings: Outreach to the Other

In this section the Sea of Galilee, whose eastern shore bordered on Gentile territories, functions as a symbolic boundary between Jew and Gentile, “self” and “other.” Twice Jesus initiates crossings by boat “to the other side” where he heals the Gerasene demoniac (5:1–20), the deaf-mute from the Decapolis (7:31–37). In a later foray into the region of Tyre and Sidon on the Mediterranean coast, Jesus will heal Syro-Phoenician woman’s daughter (7:24–30). Thus, although Jesus’s mission begins with Israel, its outreach is universal, bringing the blessings of God’s reign to Jew and Gentile alike.

Mark recognizes, however, that crossing cultural and religious boundaries in outreach to others is difficult for humans, as the two sea crossings hint. In both, conditions that rock the boat make the journey difficult, provoking fear in the disciples and need for Jesus’s reassuring presence. With Jesus’s response to the disciples in the first crossing—“Do you not yet have faith?” (4:40)—Mark introduces a lesson that will recur throughout the narrative: that boundary-crossing and effective ministry (e.g., healing, 6:5–6) require faith, that is, trust and confidence in God’s power at work through Jesus. In stark contrast to the fearful disciples, other characters model such faith: the hemorrhaging woman (5:34), the Syro-Phoenician woman (7:28–29), and Bartimaeus (10:46–52). That Jesus is, for Mark, the true exemplar of faith will become dramatically clear in the Passion narrative, where he faces, with trust and confidence, the most fearsome of boundaries, between life and death.

Bread Episodes: One Loaf for the Many

The nature of Jesus’s mission and that of his disciples is clarified further in three bread episodes: two feedings of hungry crowds, then a conversation over a single loaf. The two nearly identical feedings appear redundant unless one attends to the differences in detail and location. With its wilderness setting, reference to “sheep without a shepherd,” peculiar seating arrangement (rows of hundreds and fifties), and the number twelve, the first bread episode (6:34–44) represents a feeding of Jews, reminiscent of God feeding the Israelites after the first Exodus (Ex 16). The second feeding story lacks the Jewish details and reports not twelve baskets of leftovers but seven, the number for completeness or wholeness, and so, universality. This feeding of Gentiles on the eastern side of the sea anticipates the Lord’s end-time feast “for all peoples” (Is 25:6). Jesus’s actions with the bread in both feedings (taking, blessing, giving thanks, breaking, giving) foreshadow the Last Supper (14:22–23), inviting reflection on the mission implications of eucharistic practice in the Christian community.

The two bread episodes, however, are not simply feedings, as attention to the dynamics between Jesus and the disciples indicates. They are also discipleship lessons in which Mark depicts human ways of thinking that must change in accord with Jesus’s “way.” The disciples think it not their responsibility to feed the crowds and are shocked by Jesus’s suggestion “Give them some food yourselves” (6:37), even pleading the personal cost of doing so (two hundred days’ wages, 6:37). By the second episode, their thinking has not changed (8:4). Thus, in both scenes Jesus not only feeds; he teaches the disciples that they are to feed God’s hungry people, both Jews and Gentiles, and how to do it.

Shortly after the second feeding lesson, Jesus and the disciples once again deal with bread, this time a single loaf (8:14–21). When the disciples think the one loaf insufficient, Jesus reminds them of their hands-on feedings, in which insufficiency became overabundance for multitudes on both sides of the sea. Mark’s bread episodes afford valuable lessons about mission for disciples of every era: the mission is universal in outreach, unitive in purpose (one loaf for the many), and requires new ways of thinking in order to feed all of God’s people. The human tendency to limit outreach based on a perception of “otherness” or insufficiency can and must be overcome by faith.

Boat Journeys: Fear, Faith, and Perception

This section also includes three boat scenes that highlight the disciples’ lack of faith and their incomprehension of the “mystery” unfolding before them. In the first (4:35–41), they are utterly bewildered when Jesus calms the storm, asking, “Who then is this whom even wind and sea obey?” (4:41). Later, when they mistake Jesus walking on water for a ghost, the narrator explains, “they had not understood the incident of the loaves . . . their hearts were hardened” (6:52). That the disciples remain blind to the meaning of the feedings is confirmed in the third boat scene, with which act 1 comes to its tension-filled close. Realizing that the disciples think the one loaf insufficient, Jesus responds with a string of pointed questions that expose their lack of perception and memory. “Do you have eyes and not see, ears and not hear? And do you not remember?” (8:18). Apparently the disciples, like outsiders, do not perceive or understand what they see. Their struggle deepens in act 2, where Jesus will reveal to them still more of “the mystery” of God’s reign. The section ends with Jesus’s last words in the boat, “Do you still not understand?” (8:21) hanging in the air for the audience to ponder.

The Way of the Lord to Jerusalem (8:22–10:52)

The Mystery of the Reign of God: Identity and Destiny

The central section of Mark’s narrative is pivotal, not only geographically with its turn toward Jerusalem but also theologically and existentially, as Mark clarifies his Christology and its implications for Christian life. The mighty deeds of God’s mysterious in-breaking reign that dominated act 1 become secondary to Jesus’s instruction of the disciples. Here at the midpoint of the drama, Jesus three times provides a fuller revelation of “the mystery of the reign of God”—that God’s Messiah must suffer, die, and rise as Son of Man—and teaches about the real-life implications of that mystery for the discipleship community. The inability of the disciples to comprehend the deepening revelation becomes painfully obvious. Other events, such as the Transfiguration, an exorcism, and assorted teachings on sin, marriage, divorce, and the dangers of wealth, are interspersed throughout as interludes within this framework.

Identity and Destiny

The key to Mark’s Christology may be found in the sequence of four episodes with which this section opens: first, the healing of a blind man (8:22–26); then Peter’s identification of Jesus as the Christ (8:27–30); next, the first of three Passion-resurrection prophecies (8:31); and finally, the dramatic confrontation between Jesus and Peter (8:32–33). Within this narrative progression, the first two episodes are both about healings of blindness: the physical blindness of the man, then the spiritual blindness of those who encounter Jesus. In the first, the man's stubborn blindness requires a two-stage healing, by which Jesus brings him first to partial sight (8:24), then full vision (8:25). In the second, Jesus's identity questions, "Who do people/you say I am?" are simultaneously vision questions, "how do they/you see me?" While others wrongly identify Jesus as John the Baptist, Elijah, or a prophet (8:28), Peter, speaking for the disciples, recognizes him as the Messiah (christos, 8:29; see 1:1). The disciples apparently have gained some sight since their blind bewilderment in the preceding boat scenes. In Mark, however, there is something more to the mystery of Jesus's messianic identity that the disciples must grasp; hence, Jesus's peculiar injunction to silence about what they now "see" (8:30).

That Peter's sight is only partial is confirmed by the next two episodes. There Jesus reveals for the first time the fuller "mystery of the reign of God," that the Son of Man must suffer, die, and after three days rise (8:31). This first of his three prophecies of his destiny uses the Greek verb dei ("must" or "it is necessary"), indicating the will of God. Significantly, each of the three prophecies includes reference to the rising (8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34). With this formulation, Mark affirms, not that God willed Jesus to suffer and die but, rather, that God willed him to suffer, die, and rise. Mark's cross-focused Gospel thus provides no basis for the glorification or valorization of suffering for its own sake, including that of Jesus on the cross.

Peter's response to Jesus's fuller revelation of "the mystery" is a vehement rebuke (8:32) that elicits from Jesus a stinging counterrebuke, "Get behind me, Satan" (8:33). The harshness of Jesus's response suggests the high stakes that are here put at risk. By taking Jesus aside and contesting the destiny of which he speaks, Peter has stepped out of his discipleship position (1:17), and so, is ordered back "behind" Jesus. More importantly, his response threatens to lead Jesus astray from "the way" that God wills for him; hence, the startling address as "Satan," God's adversary, and then the climactic explanation, "You are thinking not as God does, but as human beings do" (8:33; cf. Is 55:8–9). For Mark, this is what distinguishes Jesus from his disciples as they walk "the way." Jesus "thinks the things of God," entrusting himself to God's mysterious ways and purposes. Peter and the disciples think only as humans do, in this case, in terms of popular conceptions of the messiah as a glorious and powerful figure. In view of such messianic expectations, the disciples are unprepared to grasp the mystery of a reign that “must,” by the inscrutable will of God, be established by way of the suffering, dying, and rising of God’s christos. For Mark’s very human disciples, God’s thoughts on this are unthinkable.

After rebuking Peter, Jesus does what he will do after each of the three Passion-resurrection prophecies: he teaches about discipleship, declaring, “Whoever wishes to come after me must deny himself, take up his cross, and follow me” (8:34). The original meaning of this instruction is not an encouragement to accept and embrace any and all suffering in human life as willed by God. Rather, it presumes the imperial context in which proclamation of the reign of God risked persecution by the privileged and powerful. Thus, it pertains to the suffering that disciples could incur due to their allegiance to the reign of God and its transformative vision of well-being for all. In Mark, it is less a call to discipleship than a frank and sobering forewarning for would-be disciples regarding the costs of following Jesus “on the way.”

Discipleship Lessons for “the Way”

The pattern of revelation, incomprehension, and instruction continues, as twice more Jesus speaks of the destiny that awaits him in Jerusalem, and twice the disciples fail to comprehend. After the second prophecy (9:31), Jesus discovers the disciples discussing “who was the greatest” among them (9:33–34). He responds to their status concerns with a call to service from below, “If anyone wishes to be first, he shall be the last of all and the servant of all” (9:35), then identifies himself with the least in society, a child (9:37). Similarly, when for the third time Jesus describes in graphic detail the fate that awaits him (10:33–34), James and John, with the coming “glory” of the messiah’s reign on their minds, request seats of honor and privilege on each side of Jesus, sparking resentment among the other ten, who apparently want the same (10:41). As the journey continues, the disciples increasingly behave in ways that elicit Jesus’s corrective instruction: they resent the work of another exorcist “because he does not follow us” (9:38), rebuke those who bring children to him (10:13), and fail to drive out a demon due to lack of faith and prayer (9:23, 28–29). In their self-aggrandizing ways and preoccupation with power, privilege, and glory, the disciples “think as humans do.” But Jesus remains the faithful teacher, instructing and modeling for them what it means to “think as God does,” that is, in terms of faith, inclusivity, compassionate action on behalf of the sick, the marginal, and the least.

The crux of “the way” that Jesus models for disciples is given in the last and climactic lesson that their jockeying for special seats elicits from Jesus. First, he poses to James and John sobering questions about their readiness to “be baptized” and to “drink the cup” with him (10:38), in other words, to be “plunged” (the literal meaning of baptizo) into the depths of his mysterious destiny. Then he challenges their divisive desire for personal prestige and privilege with an alternative vision of leadership for disciples. “Among you” those who wish to be “first” and “great” (10:43–44) will pursue a different way: not self-serving domination, but other-centered service. The Christological basis for what Jesus asks of his disciples is given in the final verse, which encapsulates the core teachings of act 2: “the Son of Man did not come to be served but to serve and to give his life as a ransom for many” (10:45). To this point, Jesus’s ministry has embodied other-centered service. In the Passion narrative, that service will take an additional form: giving his life in order to free people (that is, “ransom” them) from the powers of fear, sin, and death.

Act 2 ends, as it began, with a healing of blindness (10:46–52) that invites comparison to the immediately preceding episode (10:35–45). In both, Jesus asks the same question, “What do you want me to do for you?” (10:36, 51). The disciples request seats of honor for themselves (10:37). Bartimaeus, in sharp contrast, makes the simple request, “Master, I want to see” (10:51). The two healings that frame act 2 are, then, discipleship lessons. The first presents the disciples’ reality: recognizing that Jesus is God’s christos, they have partial sight (8:22–26). The second represents the ideal to which the disciples ought to aspire: receiving the sight by which they, like Bartimaeus, might follow Jesus “on the way” into Jerusalem.

The Way of the Lord in Jerusalem (11:1–15:47)

In this section, Mark presents the final acts of Jesus’s transformative ministry on behalf of God’s reign. That transformation now occurs by way of a series of climactic endings. In chapters 11 through 13, Jesus ends the Temple cult (11:11–25) and the authority of its leadership (11:27–12:44), then foretells the end of the Temple itself (13:2) and of the world as it has been (13:24–37). In the Passion narrative (14–15), Jesus’s powerful opponents end his life, bringing to a halt his ministry on behalf of God’s reign. But as the preceding revelation of God’s will and purposes have indicated (and the Epilogue will confirm), such endings are the necessary prelude to a new beginning (16:7). The material divides into three major sections, each further developing Markan themes and moving the plot to its dramatic climax and denouement.

Jesus and the Temple (11:1–12:44)

With Jesus’s triumphal arrival in Jerusalem (11:1–11), conflict with the religious establishment quickly resumes. The cursing of the fig tree (11:12–14, 20–21) that frames the cleansing of the Temple (11:15–19) signals that the Temple cult is no longer valid. In its place Mark foresees a new Temple that will be truly “a house of prayer for all peoples” (11:17) and a new worshipping community that emphasizes faith, prayer, and forgiveness (11:20–25). Jesus’s stinging critique of the religious leaders in his parable of the vineyard (12:1–12) provokes a series of debates in which Jesus “bests” Jewish leaders in the very seat of their authority. After reducing them to silence, Jesus asserts his own authority to teach, clarifying for the scribes, first, the greatest commandment (12:28–34), then the relationship between the Messiah and the Son of David (12:35–37). The section ends with another sharp contrast: Jesus denounces the scribes who love the trappings of religion and “devour the houses of widows” (12:38–40), then praises a poor widow who surpasses the rich in giving her all (12:41–44).

Given the painful legacy of anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism among Christians, Mark’s unflattering picture of the Jewish leaders and Temple ought not be taken as an accurate representation of Jews and Judaism at the time of Jesus. The characters in Mark with whom Christians identify—Jesus, the disciples, Bartimaeus, and other suppliants who seek Jesus’s care—are, after all, Jews themselves. Moreover, individual Jewish leaders such as Jairus (5:22), the “good scribe” with whom Jesus engages in his final debate (12:28–34), and Joseph of Arimathea, a member of the Sanhedrin, are presented in a positive light in Mark. Recent studies of Second Temple Judaism and the historical circumstances in which each Gospel was written afford insights that can be a helpful corrective to prejudicial readings of Gospels. In the case of Mark, the disasters with which both Jews and Christians had to cope in the midst of the Roman brutal suppression of the Jewish revolt and the recent or approaching destruction of the Temple that was part of that war likely contribute to Mark's negative portrayal of the Temple and its leadership.

Farewell Discourse: The Way Forward (13:1–37)

As Jesus departs the Temple, he predicts its destruction (13:1–2), then withdraws to the Mount of Olives for a speech in which he envisions for his disciples “the way forward.” The structure of the speech corresponds roughly to the two questions that his prediction raises for them: when and what will be the signs of these final events (13:4)? In response, Jesus imparts to his disciples revelations about the ultimate destiny of the world. The primary focus of the speech, however, is not to disclose esoteric information, but rather to address the pastoral needs of the community as it moves out into history beyond the resurrection of Jesus.

To do so, Mark draws upon apocalyptic literature to assure his struggling community that the alarming events around them are under God's control and that the faithful will soon be vindicated. Thus, Jesus first clarifies the signs of the end (13:3–8), then prepares them for the “Passion” they will share with John and Jesus: betrayed, arrested, handed over, beaten, “hated by all because of my name” (13:9–13). Those who live in the time between Jesus's departure and “the end” are here instructed on the stance to take as “the way forward” unfolds: watch (13:23, 33, 35, 37), pray (13:18), and above all, carry on the mission—“the gospel must first be preached to all the nations” (13:10)—all the while confident that “the one who perseveres will be saved” (13:13).

For disciples of every era, Jesus's speech expresses a sobering realism about history. History will continue to be marked by chaos, tragedy, and destruction, but the disciples were to also maintain a vibrant hope for ultimate transformation. The basis for the hope, Mark would have his audience know, is a profound faith that the final redemption of the world can and will occur, the kind of faith that Jesus himself models and that his own transformative ministry can inspire. After the tribulation, Jesus assures the disciples, the elect “will see the Son of Man coming in the clouds with great power and glory” to gather the elect from all directions (13:26–27). As the episodes to follow will clarify, paradoxically, the one who will “come in power and glory” at the climactic transformation is “the crucified” (16:7).

The Passion Narrative (14:1–15:47)

The length of this narrative confirms its centrality to the story Mark tells. Here at its climax the fuller “mystery” that Jesus revealed to the disciples in word on the way to Jerusalem is revealed now in deed, as Jesus “drinks the cup” and is plunged (baptized) into the depths of that mystery. This section is comprised of eight episodes that move the story with a rapid inevitability to Calvary: the anointing (14:1–9), the Last Supper (14:10–31), Jesus’s prayer in Gethsemane (14:32–42), the arrest (14:43–52), the hearing before the Sanhedrin (14:53–72), the Roman trial (15:1–20), the crucifixion (15:21–41), and the burial (15:42–47). It divides into two sections, the first featuring Jesus with his disciples and the Jewish leaders (14:1–72); the second focusing on Jesus’s execution by the Romans (15:1–47). It is in Jesus’s interactions first with his disciples, then with the “powers that be” (Jewish and Roman) that Mark’s narrative theology comes to its fullest expression. Two major themes bear close attention here:

The Crisis of Discipleship: Willing Spirit, Weak Flesh

An important feature of Mark’s Gospel is its portrayal of the humanity of both Jesus and the disciples. That humanity has been evident in the preceding narrative, with the disciples exhibiting recognizable human foibles, and Jesus experiencing human emotions, including anger (1:41; 11:15–18), compassion (6:34; 8:2), frustration and disappointment (8:17–21). As the Passion draws near, the humanity of both Jesus and the disciples is highlighted with particular poignancy, but with a crucial distinction. Jesus, in all his humanity, remains faithful to “thinking the things of God,” and so, makes his way to Calvary. The disciples stumble in fear at the prospect of the cross, and so, fall away.

It is in Gethsemane that the “ways” of Jesus and the disciples begin to diverge. Although Jesus had prophesied his destiny during their journey, the arrival of “the hour” brings a crisis for all, including Jesus (14:32–42). His final instruction for the disciples clarifies the nature of that crisis: “Watch and pray that you may not undergo the test. The spirit is willing but the flesh is weak” (14:38). That is, “the spirit is willing” to do what God wills, but human flesh, in its vulnerability to pain and death, is tempted to flee in fear from adversity, which for Jesus would mean abandoning the “way of the Lord.” Jesus deals with his crisis through prayer, which begins with an expression of faith, “all things are possible to you,” then a stunningly forthright request: that the Father remove the cup (14:36). In the midst of his deep distress Jesus manages to add, “but not what I will but what you will.” The prayerful struggle continues, as Jesus apparently voices his petition twice more (14:39, 41). By the end of the scene, braced by the power of prayer, Jesus resolves to go forth to “drink the cup” (14:41–42). For Mark’s troubled community, Jesus is the model of the faith that prays with honesty and openness in times of trouble and so remains steadfast in “thinking as God does.”

In sharp contrast, the disciples sleep, unable to watch and pray with Jesus (14:37, 40–41); and so, their resolve to remain with him soon falters. Once Jesus’s “hour” comes, they embody Jesus’s last words to them. They are “willing in spirit”: declaring their willingness to drink the cup and die with Jesus. But their “flesh is weak”: they sleep instead of pray, then flee at his arrest to save themselves (14:50). The weakness of the disciples’ “flesh” is epitomized by Peter, whose well-intentioned attempt to follow Jesus after the arrest fails miserably. Here Mark frames Jesus’s trial before the Sanhedrin (14:55–65) with Peter’s interrogation in the courtyard (14:53–54, 66–72), juxtaposing them for purposes of comparison. In answer to the high priest’s question, Jesus, for the first time in Mark, publicly confesses that he is “the Messiah, son of the Blessed One” (14:64), a confession for which he will be executed. In stark contrast, Peter three times denies his identity as a follower in order to preserve his own life. In light of Jesus’s earlier admonition, that disciples must be prepared to take up their cross and follow him (8:34–35), Peter’s failure is a grave departure from “the way of the Lord” and of discipleship. Once Peter and the others flee at the arrest (14:50–52), Jesus takes up the cross and makes his way to Golgotha alone.

Baptism into the Mystery

The events of the Passion story present Mark’s fullest answer to the question of Jesus’s identity. In the Jewish hearing, Jesus courageously declares that he is not only the Messiah and Son of God; he is also the Son of Man, seated at the right hand of God, to whom all authority will be given (14:62). But God's royal Messiah, as the three Passion-resurrection predictions revealed, "must" first be plunged into the "mystery of the reign of God," by way of suffering, dying, and rising. And so, Jesus makes his way to Golgotha and the cross.

Significantly, in Mark's telling, neither the self-awareness that Jesus declared to the high priest (14:62) nor the steadfast resolve mustered in Gethsemane (14:41–42) lessened Jesus's anguish on the cross. Rather, once again the evangelist highlights Jesus's very human struggle, as he dies alone, with no one but executioners and enemies present, taunting this ridiculously powerless "king" (15:29–32). Thinking as humans do, they cannot see God's Messiah-King in this crucified man, whose death serves as "ransom" from the powers of sin, fear, and death (10:45) and seals a covenant in blood (14:24). In his anguish and distress, Jesus does what the suffering righteous of his people had done for generations: he cries out to God in lamentation, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (15:34; Ps 22:2). Having come to the cross believing his destiny to be the will of God (8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34; 14:36), Jesus suffers the stunning absence of Abba, his loving father. The last words of God's royal Son are a cry, from the solitary depths of mystery, for that divine presence upon which the meaning of this terrible event depends.

Although the heavenly voice that had spoken at baptism and Transfiguration remains silent, immediately upon Jesus's death, two events signal divine action and the beginning of a new era. Mark's story opened with God tearing the heavens (1:10) for the Spirit to descend, then declaring Jesus to be "my beloved Son" (1:11). Here at the climax (15:33), God tears the Temple curtain and the centurion, a Gentile, recognizes that the man crucified before his eyes is the "Son of God" (15:39). The Passion narrative closes with the burial of Jesus (15:42–47) with the question raised by the dying Jesus yet to be answered: did the Father abandon his Son (15:34)?

Epilogue: The Good News Continues . . . (16:1–8)

The Way of the Lord Returns to Galilee

The denouement of Mark's narrative occurs at the empty tomb, where women encounter a heavenly messenger who announces that Jesus has been raised (16:6). The three-fold prophecy of Jesus's destiny—suffering, dying, and rising—is thus fulfilled. Significantly, the formulation of the announcement designates Jesus as “the crucified,” confirming the centrality of the cross to Jesus’s identity, and Mark’s use of the theological passive signals the action of God. He has raised, and so, vindicated Jesus as Son of Man. Based on this episode, the “good news” (euangelion) that Mark proclaims is multifaceted.

The Triumph of God and Vindication of Jesus

The fundamental message of the passage is that death has been overpowered by God and by his crucified Messiah. The reign of God has not been brought to a halt by the execution of his Messiah-King, for God has raised him up. Moreover, Jesus’s obedience and faith in God’s mysterious way of establishing his reign—by a servant-king who suffers, dies, and rises—has been vindicated. God is the truly trustworthy power whose reign brings wholeness of life for and through his Son.

Reconciliation and Healing for Disciples

The women are told to “go and tell his disciples and Peter, ‘He is going before you to Galilee; there you will see him, as he told you’ ” (16:7). The messenger’s command corresponds to Jesus’s promise to the disciples at the Last Supper, “After I have been raised up, I shall go before you to Galilee” (14:28). Although the disciples had abandoned Jesus in his Passion, the Risen Christ has not abandoned them. Even Peter, who denied knowing Jesus in order to save his skin, has a place in the company of the disciples as they return to Galilee, where, they are promised, they “will see him.” The reference to sight recalls the disciples’ blindness to Jesus’s identity, of which they were only partially healed “on the way.” Apparently, Jesus’s suffering, dying, and rising is the second-stage healing by which Jesus brings his disciples from partial sight to full vision.

The Mission Resumes Anew

The Risen Christ is returning to Galilee, the place where Jesus had carried out his universal mission, and the disciples are to meet him there. Mark does not specify what that meeting entails. The preceding narrative, however, suggests that the mission will resume. In following the Crucified-

One-Now-Raised back to Galilee, disciples will do what “must” be done in the time that stretches from resurrection to the coming of the reign in fullness. “The gospel must first be preached to all nations” (13:10); and human suffering in its myriad forms must be relieved—by healing, forgiving, teaching, confronting evil, feeding the hungry. Along “the way” disciples must be prepared to “take up the cross,” following Jesus’s example in proclaiming the “good news of God,” whatever the cost, and trusting in God’s power and life-giving will.

Mark’s Gospel ends abruptly: “Then they went out from the tomb, seized with trembling and bewilderment. They said nothing to anyone, for they were afraid” (16:8). Some interpreters understand the women’s behavior as a final instance of discipleship failure: paralyzed by fear, the women did not deliver the message given to them. Mark’s use of words for fear and bewilderment elsewhere in the Gospel, for example the calming of the storm (4:35–41) and his emphasis on “mystery” suggest otherwise. In Mark’s narrative, the rising is the third component of the deeper mystery of the reign of God that Jesus had revealed in word “on the way” to Jerusalem and then in deed in the Passion. The finding of the tomb and the message delivered by the heavenly messenger are, for the women, an epiphany. Their response, then, represents numinous awe in the presence of the mystery of divine power.

Mark 1:1 designates the narrative “the beginning of the gospel . . .” thereby suggesting that the story still unfolds. The abrupt ending at 16:8 opens the narrative space for the presence and participation of the intended audience to whom the “mystery of the reign of God” has been revealed and who now must carry on the mission—proclaim the good news to all nations—until the end.

LUKE

see pages [1433–1485 of the New Testament]

BEFORE BEGINNING . . .

Luke tells us that he is dependent upon others who had put the testimony of witnesses to Jesus's ministry in narrative form (1:2). We possess one of those sources in Mark's Gospel. A close reading of the Gospel suggests two others: a collection of Jesus's sayings, which was also used by Matthew, called Q; and a source for the additional material found only in this Gospel such as the Infancy narrative and beloved parables like the good Samaritan and the prodigal son, which scholars designate L (see NABRE, introduction, p. 1434). Luke may have preserved the order of sayings in his version of Q more accurately than Matthew, who employs Jesus's sayings to create longer discourses. Distinguishing his work from predecessors, who were themselves dependent on what eyewitnesses had handed down, situates Luke as a second- or third-generation Christian presenting the founding story of the movement for an audience without access to any of the original participants. An ability to write in different styles—including that of the Septuagint (LXX), the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, which was the Bible for most of the early Christian communities—and to use conventions of Hellenistic literature, such as the opening dedication to a prominent patron, suggests a well-educated author, probably from a prosperous urban family. Unlike the other Gospel writers, Luke's account did not end with the Gospel. He wrote a second volume, Acts, which showed that God's salvation, begun in Jesus, moved beyond Jerusalem where the Gospel begins and ends into the whole world.

Luke's Gospel provides an account of Jesus's life and teaching for that universal mission. Some people imagine that Christianity and its Gospels belong to Western European culture. They wonder whether Christians can evangelize other cultures without destroying them. They should remember that the story of Jesus is rooted in a Semitic culture. Luke and other early Christians were already engaged in intercultural dialogue when they retold the story of Jesus for the Greek-speaking, non-Jewish converts who inhabited cities in the eastern part of the Roman empire. Their example shows that the Gospel message is not limited to any one culture. The story of Jesus belongs to all peoples (Acts 2:8–11).

An Assured Teaching

Luke sets Christianity within the larger world of the Roman empire by referring to Roman emperors and events. For example, he links the birth of Jesus to Caesar Augustus (2:1). These correlations do not mean Luke intended to write what we consider a history of Jesus and the earliest disciples. Most of the references are not accurate, even by ancient standards. Luke calls his work a diegesis, meaning a “narrative account,” not a history. He claims that it is thorough, accurate, and orderly. He has traced the events that have occurred among “us” (that is, the Christian community) from the beginning (1:1–4). The purpose of his writing is to provide asphaleia, “assurance” for the instruction that Christians give. In other words, Luke’s book will show that what the church preaches is rooted in the ministry of Jesus and the witness of the first apostles.

Luke finds patterns for his story in the story of Israel. This literary device is especially evident in the infancy narratives, which show God’s promises of salvation being fulfilled in Jesus. When Luke claims that his narrative is “orderly,” he refers to the literary order, which sets out the periods of salvation. Luke also provides assurance for the Christian preaching by showing that the Spirit of God has guided the whole process from the earliest days of Israel through the ministry of Jesus. In the second volume, Acts, he shows the same Spirit at work in the developments in the early community. Civic authorities were suspicious of new religious movements. Luke-Acts addresses those fears by highlighting the high moral standards and social value of Christianity.

An Ordered Narrative

Luke says that he has reworked his material to provide a more accurate and orderly account. We have seen that accuracy and order do not mean independent historical inquiry but are a means of showing that God’s plan of salvation is being fulfilled in the Christian movement. Luke has made deletions, additions, and changes in the order of material taken from Mark. Even the beginning Gospel reader can spot three major additions. Mark begins abruptly with the appearance of John the Baptist. Luke (as does Matthew) begins with an account of Jesus's birth (1:5–2:40). He adds a tale about the child Jesus (2:41–52). Then, between the baptism and temptation stories, Luke reintroduces Jesus by giving his genealogy (3:23–38). A long section in which Jesus is journeying toward Jerusalem with the disciples (9:51–19:27) contains much of the teaching of Jesus. It includes parables from Q and from Luke's special tradition retold in a way that serves as instruction for the church by adding context or other sayings of Jesus to focus attention on the lessons to be learned. By contrast, Mark's Gospel has only a short section of instruction to the disciples on the trip to Jerusalem.

Finally, several differences between Luke and Mark in the Passion and the resurrection accounts are easy to spot. Mark ends with the women running from the empty tomb. Luke 24, on the other hand, has accounts of appearances by the Risen Lord as well as instructions to the disciples. Luke's Passion narrative differs from Mark (and Matthew) as well. Jesus is never formally tried by the Jewish court. An episode in which Pilate sends Jesus to be investigated by Herod Antipas (23:6–12) is peculiar from a legal perspective. Throughout the proceedings Pilate repeatedly declares that Jesus is innocent of the charges against him (23:4, 14f, 22). The dying Jesus prays for forgiveness for his enemies (23:34) and enacts the message of the Gospel by promising salvation to a repentant criminal who dies with him (23:39–43).

Each of these sections contributes to showing that God's plan of salvation is being carried out. The infancy narratives recapitulate the hopes of the faithful people of Israel. As Jesus begins the journey to Jerusalem, he knows that he is to be taken up from there in death (9:51). This journey is a time to prepare the disciples both for the events in Jerusalem and for their future role as witnesses to Jesus's teaching. In the narrative of Jesus's death and resurrection, Luke emphasizes the fact that it "was necessary"—that is, part of God's plan already set out in the Prophets—for the Messiah to suffer and die in Jerusalem (see 22:22; 24:26f). The episode with the repentant criminal shows that the death of Jesus extends salvation and forgiveness to others.

The Tragedy of Israel

Luke's strong narrative sense of a divine plan moving toward its fulfillment often dominates Luke-Acts. However, accomplishing divine purpose does not mean that all the events through which God's plan is achieved are to be considered good or necessary. Luke's way of telling the story has another component—the tragedy of Israel. The infancy stories awaken the joyful expectation that Israel's messianic king has arrived to bring salvation. Through him, God's peace and blessings will come to both Jews and Gentiles (2:29–32). Yet, as the story unfolds, this promise will not be fulfilled completely.

Persistent rejection, first of Jesus and then of the disciples' mission, leaves Israel excluded. Luke points out the tragedy of this situation in a series of prophetic laments that Jesus utters over Jerusalem and her inhabitants. The first is a Q tradition (13:34f; Mt 23:37–39), which Luke has attached to an episode from his own special material (13:31–33). The episode contained a warning that Herod Antipas was seeking Jesus's life. Jesus connects the divine necessity that he die in Jerusalem (13:33) with a lament for the city. The second, from Luke's special tradition, occurs as Jesus is looking out over the city where he is to die (19:41–44). Jesus weeps at the thought of the peace that will elude the city and the terrible devastations of war that she is to suffer. The final lament, also from Luke's special material, occurs as Jesus is on the way to his death. He addresses the women of Jerusalem who are lamenting his fate, warning that they will soon have cause to weep for themselves (23:27–31).

The church teaches Catholics that even though the ancestors of today's Jews did not accept Jesus as Messiah, Christians are never justified in hostility to the Jewish people. Christians share a common heritage with the Jewish people, which is rooted in the Hebrew Scriptures. Luke's narrative insists that there would be no Christianity without the faithful and just persons of Israel who did rejoice at Jesus's coming. Jesus's own family are humble pious ones who trust in God for salvation. In Luke's Passion, Jesus does not condemn those Jewish leaders responsible for his death but asks God's forgiveness. Luke also presents a Jesus who weeps as he foresees the terrible fate of Jerusalem. The prosperous and beautiful city of his day will be reduced to the rubble of war. She will not enjoy the peace that God so longs to give the people.

READING THROUGH LUKE

Before you sit down to study Luke, read through the whole Gospel. Many of the stories will be familiar to you, since Luke contains some of the best-loved stories in the New Testament. You will notice that Luke is a gifted storyteller. Even in retelling the parables, Luke uses short episodes and switches from the third-person report into dialogue between the characters. Young children often enjoy the stories in Luke more than those in the other Gospels. As you are reading, you might note passages that particularly appeal to you. Do you find any common themes in those stories? Here are some of the themes that you will find running through the Gospel.

Salvation Is a Joyous Surprise

Luke has many images of celebration and rejoicing. From the beginning of the story to its last verse, people are praising and thanking God for the salvation that they experience in Jesus. Salvation is a “surprise” or gift because those who receive it could only hope that it would come someday. Mary’s Magnificat (1:46–55) sets the tone. God has intervened to rescue the humble, poor, oppressed, and lowly people of the land. Jesus begins his ministry (4:18) by quoting a promise from Isaiah: a threefold release from poverty, from sickness, and from sin. Luke drives home this point about salvation by showing that Jesus has the power to forgive sins and to heal people (see 5:17–26). Even the rich tax collector Zacchaeus hears the message, demonstrates his repentance by making restitution to those he had cheated, and expresses his joy by throwing a banquet (19:1–10).

God’s mercy is the source of this salvation. Christians are to show mercy in the same way that God is merciful (6:36). When Jesus gives examples of what God’s mercy and forgiveness are like, he uses very active images. God is not waiting for people to come crawling back, begging forgiveness. God is out looking for people to help like the shepherd does for the lost sheep, the woman for her lost coin, or the wayward son’s father, who, when the errant son returns, goes running out of the house and immediately orders a large celebration (see 15:3–32). The elder brother in the story of the prodigal son shows us the other side of the coin. Jesus recognizes that some people find it difficult to accept this open-handed offer of forgiveness to sinners, when they themselves have struggled all their lives to do everything that they are required to do and have never even had a banquet to celebrate.

Salvation Includes Everyone

In Acts, Luke will show the disciples taking the gospel from Jerusalem to Rome. The Gospel demonstrates the universality of God’s love and salvation in a different way. It stresses the fact that Jesus reached out to all sorts of people in his own culture, even to those who seemed to have no chance at salvation. Zacchaeus, the tax collector, was a sinner who had defrauded people to enrich himself (19:1–10). The Samaritans, traditional enemies of the Jews, turn out to be examples of how to live out the command to love one's neighbor. The mercy shown by the parable of the good Samaritan (10:37) is so well known that we can speak of anyone who shows mercy or unmerited assistance to another as a "Samaritan." Less well known is the Samaritan leper (17:12–19) who is the only one of the group healed by Jesus to return and give him thanks. Women—often excluded from literary education or public and cultural leadership, unless they belonged to the wealthy elite—are constantly included in Jesus's ministry. A sinful woman provides a better demonstration of love and hospitality than the Pharisee. Her sins are forgiven (7:36–50). Mary is permitted to sit and listen to Jesus as a disciple. She does not have to busy herself with the traditional woman's business of serving the male guests that has her sister so distracted (10:38–42).

Today, many women experience the tension between Martha and Mary in their own lives. On the one hand, they are anxious to participate in opportunities for education, careers, and involvement with the community outside the home. On the other hand, they are still responsible for most of the work and caregiving that goes on within the home. When Jesus defended Mary's place as listening to his teaching, he was not condemning Martha's devotion to serving her guests or the traditional tasks of women in the home. Jesus was really issuing an invitation to her to join her sister. Martha was so busy that she was missing the one necessary thing, to hear Jesus's message about the Kingdom (10:41f). As our lives continue to fill up with activities at home, work, and in the community, we need to ask whether we are squandering the time we need for the one necessary thing, hearing the word of the Lord.

Special Concern for Those in Need

Salvation has very concrete aspects in Luke. Those who are poor, helpless, in prison, or sick are promised release. Jesus and the apostles relieve suffering by healing the sick. Acts contains stories in which God intervenes to free the apostles from prison. Miraculous events are not required to assist the sick or the poor. The story of the good Samaritan (10:25–37) shows how salvation can come about through concrete actions. The Samaritan uses his own resources to make sure that the man beaten up by robbers is restored to health, even though Samaritans often considered Jews as enemies. The parable of the great feast, in which the host replaces with the poor the friends who refused to come, and the sayings about aiding those who cannot repay (14:12–24) are other examples of how salvation can come to those in need.

Luke often returns to the theme of rich and poor. The rich often fail to receive salvation because they are trapped by their own desires for money or pleasure (see 12:13–21; 16:19–30). Even good people like the rich official (18:18–24) are so locked in by possessions that they cannot achieve the eternal life they desire. Not all rich people are excluded from the Kingdom. The Samaritan, Zacchaeus, and anyone else who is willing to share his or her wealth generously with those who are in need can become a disciple of Jesus. Acts returns to this theme in its picture of the earliest believers in Jerusalem sharing possessions and providing for the poor. Luke also retains the sayings of Jesus that call upon followers to renounce material goods in order to become disciples (6:35; 9:3; 10:4; 12:33; 14:33; 16:13). By doing so, Jesus, and later the apostles, demonstrate that they are completely dedicated to God. But Luke knows that such discipleship is possible only if the basic needs of the group are met through the generosity of others. He reports that a group of women followers provided the necessary support (8:1–3). In Acts, he reports that Paul achieved the same end by laboring at his trade (Acts 20:33–35).

Mary Is the First Disciple

Catholic Christians have always paid special honor to Mary, the mother of Jesus. Since much of the elaborate Marian piety of the church did not develop until medieval times, people sometimes feel that Mary has been left out as Catholics have turned to the Bible for spiritual renewal. Luke's Gospel provides the basis for devotion to Mary. Her assent to God's work of salvation initiates the whole story. Her Magnificat is a strong affirmation of God's faithfulness and mercy. Sometimes people think that we honor Mary simply because she experienced a miracle in Jesus's birth. That is not Luke's picture. For Luke she is both the epitome of the faithful people of Israel who wait confidently for God's salvation, and the beginning of the new life of those who will be disciples of Jesus. Jesus defines her role in 8:21. She is one who hears and does the word of God. He repeats this affirmation in 11:27–28. The crowd praises Jesus’s biological mother. Jesus corrects them by insisting that hearing and keeping the word of God constitutes the true source of blessing.

The infancy narrative demonstrates that Mary has this quality of true discipleship. She has accepted God’s will in the Annunciation scene. Later she keeps in her heart words spoken to her about Jesus, as well as the extraordinary events that she witnesses (2:19, 51). Simeon includes her in his oracle about the impact of Jesus’s ministry in Israel (2:34f). She too will be caught in the divisions to come. But Mary remains among the faithful disciples of Jesus. She was present among those disciples gathered in Jerusalem after the resurrection (Acts 1:14).

An Outline of Luke

Luke’s Gospel falls into a pattern that moves from the infancy narrative, in which we are among the righteous of Israel in Jerusalem, through the ministry in Galilee, back to the Jerusalem Temple, and finally to Jesus’s death and resurrection. The Gospel concludes with the disciples in Jerusalem awaiting the coming of the Spirit. Acts will take the Gospel from Jerusalem out into the world. Jerusalem forms a symbolic center to the entire Gospel story, as much of the narrative takes place either in or on the way to the holy city. The major divisions in the story are clearly marked transitions in the plot:

Prologue (1:1–4)

Infancy Narrative (1:5–2:52)

Preparation for the Public Ministry (3:1–4:13)

The Ministry in Galilee (4:14–9:50)

The Journey to Jerusalem (9:51–19:27)

Teaching Ministry in Jerusalem (19:28–21:38)

The Passion Narrative (22:1–23:56)

The Resurrection Narrative (24:1–53)

Now it is time to read through Luke in detail to see how Luke develops the picture of Jesus, salvation, and Christian discipleship. We will also be interested in how Luke presents the teaching of Jesus for Christians in his time. Discipleship requires doing the word as well as hearing it.

Prologue (1:1–4)

Luke opens with a prologue to show that this work belongs alongside other Hellenistic literature. The prologue consists of a single complex Greek sentence that ends with the word asphaleia, “assurance.” Luke intends the orderly account of the events that constitute the Christian story to demonstrate the integrity of the Christian message that the church in his day proclaims. (A close parallel for this use of kathexes, “orderly,” appears in Acts 11:4. Peter is going to narrate the events that led him to baptize the Gentile Cornelius and his household and to share table fellowship with them. This account will persuade the leaders of the church in Jerusalem that God was operating behind those events.)

The Infancy Narrative (1:5–2:52)

Structure of the Lucan Infancy Narrative

This section presents an elaborate parallelism between Jesus and John the Baptist. In each case, Jesus is greater than the Baptist, who is only the forerunner of the Messiah. The most detailed parallels occur between the two angelic birth announcements (John, 1:5–25; Jesus, 1:26–38): (a) neither parent is expecting a child; (b) an angel appears, the parent is troubled and told not to fear; (c) the child is announced, his name given, and a statement is made about his future greatness; (d) the parent raises a question about how this can happen; (e) the angel gives an assertion that it will happen, and a sign; (f) Zechariah is forced to be silent; Mary’s spontaneous answer affirms God’s will. The birth announcements are followed by an episode that brings the two mothers together and confirms the angel’s statement to Mary, the Visitation (1:39–56). In this episode the Baptist testifies to the presence of Jesus as savior by moving in the womb.

The next cycle recounts the births (John, 1:57f; Jesus, 2:1–20) and circumcision/naming of the two children (John, 1:57–80; Jesus, 2:21–40). Each birth section includes an affirmation of the joy attending the birth. Each naming section concludes with an affirmation that the child grew. This cycle is followed by an episode that prefigures Jesus’s last days, the Finding in the Temple (2:41–52). Jesus will return to the Temple to teach before his death (see the outline of the Gospel). God is responsible for the origins of both children. For the Baptist, God has overcome the barrenness of his parents, just as other barren women in the Hebrew Bible, like Sarah and Hannah, had been given children. For Jesus, God has done something even greater by bringing the child into existence in the womb of his virgin mother.

Songs of Salvation: The Canticles

The infancy narratives contain canticles, which have become a treasured part of Christian worship: Mary's Magnificat (1:46–55); Zechariah's Benedictus (1:68–79); the canticle of the angels (2:13f); Simeon's Nunc Dimittis (2:29–32). Luke may have derived the phrasing of the Magnificat, Benedictus, and Nunc Dimittis from a Jewish Christian source. They employ a mosaic of expressions found in the Hebrew scriptures and other Jewish psalms and hymns. Mary's Magnificat is an individual song of praise, which is modeled on the Song of Hannah (1 Sm 2:1–10). After celebrating God's greatness toward the lowly handmaid, the second strophe (vv. 51–53), in a series of strong, active verbs, recalls God's past deeds of salvation. The final verses (54f) relate the career of Jesus to the covenant God had made with Abraham. This hymn probably originated among Jewish Christians who identified themselves as the "poor ones," the anawim, of Israel. The term referred to those who were unfortunate, lowly, sick, downtrodden. The rich and powerful, who feel no need of God, are opposed to the anawim (see Ps 149:4; Is 49:13; 66:2). The poor ones are the righteous remnant in Israel who acknowledge that only God provides salvation.

The Benedictus begins as a song of thanksgiving (vv. 71–75) recalling the dynastic oracle concerning the house of David (see 2 Sm 7:12f). It affirms that Jesus will fulfill this messianic role. The poetry then employs the form of an oracle concerning the destiny of the newborn child (vv. 76–79). The Baptist will prepare God's people for the coming Messiah. We are reminded that God comes to save the people out of merciful compassion. Luke will make the theme of mercy a central motif in the ministry of Jesus.

The Nunc Dimittis draws upon two passages of Isaiah (Is 40:5; 49:6). Simeon has seen the salvation promised by the prophet. The image of an aged patriarch blessed with a glimpse of God's promise is taken from the Hebrew Bible (see Joseph, Gn 46:30; Moses, Dt 32:49–50; 34:1–5; Anna and Tobit, Tb 11:9, 14). Verses 31–32 introduce another important theme in Luke: God’s salvation is given for all peoples. Endowed with the prophetic spirit, the aged Simeon not only recognizes the dawning of salvation, he also warns that Jesus’s coming will bring about divisions. God’s plan includes the rejection of the Messiah by his own people (see 4:29; 13:33–35; 19:44, 47–48; 20:14, 17).

Virgin Birth and Christology in the Infancy Narrative

The canticles celebrate Jesus’s coming as the fulfillment of all God’s promises to the faithful people of Israel. The Benedictus pointed to Jesus as the anticipated Messiah of the Davidic house. The most striking Christological statements in the infancy narrative occur in the angelic birth announcement (1:28–37). The announcement proceeds in two stages. Verses 32–33 parallel 2 Samuel 7:9, 13, 14, 16. Jesus will inherit the Davidic throne and rule over Jacob’s house forever as “son” of God. The second stage in the announcement moves beyond these messianic promises to the special sense in which Jesus is the Son of God: Jesus is begotten through God’s intervention. This two-step process appears in older Christological affirmations like Romans 1:3–4. There, Jesus is “Son of David” during his earthly life and is designated “Son of God” through the power of the Holy Spirit when he is exalted to God’s right hand at the Resurrection. The announcement to Mary speaks of God’s Spirit overshadowing her and bringing into being a child who is Son of God from the time he is conceived. For Luke, Jesus is fully human but is never just another ordinary human being.

Mary’s virginity sharpens the Christological focus: the child to be born is God’s Son. The step-parallelism between the Baptist and Jesus provides additional evidence that Luke considers the birth of Jesus to be an even greater example of divine power than that of the Baptist. Mary is not like the barren woman, someone whose womb could unexpectedly open and produce a child. As a virgin, there is no human way for her to have a child without God’s unique presence in that process. Ancient Greek biology taught that the spirit in a father’s sperm gave shape to the material in a mother’s womb. The more active the spirit, the more closely a child resembled its father. Thus Mary’s virginity indicates a relationship between Jesus and God unlike that of any other human being. The honor that Mary enjoys is not due to the fact of her virginity but to her willingness to accept a role in God's plan for the salvation of humanity.

A second angelic announcement to the shepherds accompanies the story of Jesus's birth (2:1–20). Luke introduces this section with a reference to Caesar Augustus and the expansion of Roman rule indicated by a census in Judea. Historically, there was no global census under Quirinius. When the Romans took over administration of Judea in AD 6, they took a census of that province. Residents of Galilee, which was still ruled by one of Herod's sons, would not have been obligated to return to an ancestral village in Judea. Matthean tradition claims that Jesus was born toward the end of the rule of Herod, the Great, who died in 4 BC. Though Luke lacks precise historical information in this scene, its Roman associations permit a symbolic contrast between the Roman empire and God's reign. Augustus claimed that his rule had brought peace to the world. On coins the doors to the temple of war, were pictured as closed. Luke uses the angelic announcement (2:10–14) to show that the true source of peace lies elsewhere: in the Savior, Messiah, the Lord who has been born in the Davidic town, Bethlehem.

Preparation for the Public Ministry (3:1–4:13)

Many of the themes in the ministry of Jesus have been anticipated in the infancy narratives. We have seen that Jesus fulfills God's promises of salvation, and we have heard some of the major Christological titles: Son of David, Messiah, Savior, Lord, and Son of God. The Spirit, which overshadowed Mary at his conception, will remain with Jesus throughout his ministry. Mary's Magnificat introduced the images for salvation as "reversal," a lifting up of the poor ones, those who have no one but God to turn to in their need. We have seen the importance of thanksgiving, rejoicing, and prayer as well as the posture of the faithful disciple who hears the word of God. But we have also heard the warning that all of Israel will not rush to greet its Messiah with the same joy found in these stories. Before Luke begins to recount the public ministry, he introduces three additional blocks of material: (a) the Baptist's mission in preparing the way for Jesus and Jesus's baptism; (b) a genealogy, and (c) the temptation of Jesus.

The Baptist's Ministry (3:1–22)

Luke has gathered traditions about John the Baptist from different sources. John is fulfilling the mission of serving as forerunner for God's Messiah. This fiery preacher of repentance also anticipates Jesus in the content of his message: (a) repentance and forgiveness, two of the effects of salvation in Luke, and (b) the requirements for dealing with material possessions: share with those who have nothing, avoid greed and injury to others, act fairly. The ethical section of John's preaching (vv. 10–14) illustrates the "good fruit," which must come from repentance (v. 9). When we bear in mind the whole sweep of salvation history in Luke, the warning that God can raise up children of Abraham from the stones takes on a more ominous note. As the episode concludes, the Baptist responds to speculation about his own status by distinguishing himself clearly from the Messiah who is about to arrive with the Spirit and fire. John belongs to the age of prophetic figures. Jesus will inaugurate the messianic age. Before introducing Jesus Luke completes the story of the Baptist by reporting that John was imprisoned by Herod Antipas. This order makes the account of Jesus's baptism, which follows a bit awkward (vv. 21f). For Luke, the baptism of Jesus should not suggest that Jesus was dependent upon the Baptist. Rather, the story permits a divine affirmation that Jesus is the son of God and provides the occasion for the Spirit to descend on Jesus and inaugurate his ministry.

Genealogy of Jesus (3:23–38)

This unusual genealogy corrects a possible misapprehension about Jesus. People may think he is the son of Joseph. The Christian community knows better. It traces Jesus's ancestry back to the first "son of God," Adam, and thus links Jesus to the entire human race, not just to the house of David.

Temptation of Jesus (4:1–13)

Jesus Goes to the Desert Led by the Spirit. The temptations Satan poses are challenges to Jesus's identity as "Son of God," which has been the central title in Luke's narrative to this point. Temptation, in this sense, is not an impulse toward some sinful act. Rather, as in the testing of Abraham by the demand that he sacrifice Isaac (Gn 22), temptation creates a crisis that will demonstrate whether the individual's faith in God can be destroyed. Jesus refuses to use his status as Son for personal gain. Though Satan is silenced, the story ends on an ominous note; Jesus's ministry will undermine demonic power (10:18; 13:16) but Satan may yet return. In Luke 22:31–32 Jesus speaks of confronting Satan’s power on behalf of his disciples; though they will be seriously tested by the events of the Passion, Jesus has prayed that their faith will not fail. When Satan leaves him, Jesus has demonstrated that he is the obedient Son of God who will carry out God’s plan of salvation—whatever the cost.

The Ministry in Galilee (4:14–9:50)

The introduction to this section (4:14–15) highlights the power of the Spirit active in the ministry of Jesus (1:35; 3:22; 4:1, 14, 18).

In Nazareth and Capernaum (4:16–44)

Luke’s sources had Jesus’s ministry begin in Capernaum (see Mk 1:21–35). Luke has reordered events (v. 23 refers to the Capernaum tradition) opening with a sermon in Nazareth that depicts Jesus as the one who fulfills what the Hebrew prophets foretold (vv. 17–21). Throughout Luke-Acts, similar programmatic announcements occur in synagogues and at the Temple. Jesus inaugurates the joyous freedom of the Year of Jubilee (combining Is 61:1–11 and Is 58:6). Luke’s genealogy has prepared readers for the skeptics in the audience who think that Jesus cannot possibly be the messiah, because of his lowly family origins as Joseph’s son (3:23; 4:22). Once again, Luke previews the story to come. Jesus points to Hebrew prophets Elijah and Elisha, who healed persons who were not Israelites. His words provoke a deadly hostility in the hearers (vv. 25–30).

The rest of the chapter consists of healing stories that illustrate the liberation Jesus has just announced. The demons acknowledge that Jesus is “from God.” However, the popular acclaim, which results from the miracles, makes it so difficult for Jesus even to move about that he leaves for synagogues in Judea (vv. 42–44).

Jesus Gathers Disciples (5:1–39)

Jesus’s activities in Nazareth and Capernaum occur before he has any disciples. This arrangement provides those who are called with a reason for following Jesus, his reputation as healer and teacher. Simon Peter’s call is linked with the tale of a miraculous catch of fish. Peter’s acknowledgment that he is a “sinner” would remind some ancient readers of stories like those in Homer. Mortals cannot see the gods, but certain events make their presence evident. So Peter, viewing the catch, announces that he is unworthy to be in the presence of the divine (v. 8). Peter's reaction to the catch is also similar to the "fear" exhibited at the appearance of the angels in the birth announcement stories. Like the angel, Jesus first tells Peter not to be afraid. Then he states what Peter's future destiny is to be: "from now on you will be catching men" (v. 10). Christian readers know of Peter's later role as a missionary apostle in Acts. Peter and the sons of Zebedee, James and John, respond as exemplary disciples. They leave everything to follow Jesus.

Jesus establishes his authority through healings, first of a leper (vv. 12–16), then of a paralyzed man (vv. 17–26). When Luke found the account of the healing of the paralyzed man in Mark, the healing had already been cast as a controversy over Jesus's authority to forgive sins (see Mk 2:1–12). Readers know that Jesus can heal anyone he wishes. In this episode, the miracle becomes both an occasion to free the man from sin through forgiveness and a demonstration of the authority by which Jesus can assert that God has forgiven the man's sins. Its introduction (v. 17) recalls the boy Jesus in the Temple (2:46–47): there are Pharisees and scribes gathered from the villages of Galilee and Judea as well as Jerusalem. The crowd goes home praising God, but the Pharisees and scribes have become suspicious of Jesus. His words of forgiveness appear to be a blasphemous attempt by a human being to seize a power that belongs to God (v. 21). Readers know that Jesus is not just any human being but the obedient Son of God. He would never seize any power that rightly belongs to God (see 4:5–8).

When Jesus calls his next disciple, the toll collector Levi, he incurs further complaints from Pharisees and scribes. They ask Jesus's disciples why he eats with persons considered sinners. Jesus cites a proverb in defense of his actions and then insists that the goal of his mission is to call sinners. He is not calling the righteous back to God.

Jesus is accused of not instructing his disciples in piety as any Torah teacher should do. The disciples of both the Baptist and the Pharisees fast. Jesus's disciples do not. Jesus's defense consists of a parable followed by a string of proverbs (5:33–39). The parable employs a human analogy: it is impossible to fast at a wedding. The abundance of a wedding feast was a common metaphor for the time of salvation. When Jesus is no longer present, Christians will fast (v. 35). The proverbs demonstrate the absurdity of trying to mix the old ways of life with the new time of salvation. Persons accustomed to the old may find it difficult to accept the new (v. 39).

Jesus next defends his disciples against charges of breaking the Sabbath (6:1–5), first by appeal to Scripture (1 Sm 21:1–6), then by insistence upon his authority as Son of Man (compare 5:24), and finally on humanitarian grounds: it is always right to preserve rather than destroy life (vv. 6–11). The section concludes with selecting the Twelve from a larger group of followers as the ones who will serve as witnesses to what Jesus has done and said.

Sermon on the Plain (6:17–49)

Jesus's sermon to a crowd from beyond Galilee's borders sounds familiar notes of reversal from the Magnificat as well as from the opening words in Nazareth (4:18). The Kingdom is good news for the poor and oppressed, and divine judgment against the wealthy and prosperous. As the stories of Christian missionaries in Acts will demonstrate, believers must expect rejection and persecution for preaching about Jesus (see Acts 7:52). Juxtaposing the command to love enemies with sayings on persecution highlights the concrete context in which that love is to be practiced (vv. 27–30). The love command covers all forms of mercy since it emulates the mercy of God. Examples point to general ethical precepts: give to one who asks; lend to those who cannot repay; treat others as you would be treated. Judgment sayings strengthen this ethical teaching. We are judged by the judgments we make about others (vv. 37–42).

Jesus Is the Promised Savior (7:1–9:18)

Jesus's ministry in Galilee continues with a series of traditional miracle stories that testify to Jesus's identity: (a) cure of the centurion's slave indicates that there is greater faith among the Gentiles than in Israel (7:9); (b) the widow's son evokes the allusions to Elijah and Elisha in the opening sermon (4:25f); awestruck, the people acknowledge that a great prophet has arisen (7:16). Further miracles demonstrate the truth of Jesus's reply to the Baptist's disciples, that he is indeed the one to come (vv. 18–23). Luke edits his sources to distinguish between those who received John's baptism and also receive Jesus, praising God, and those who reject the plan of God—the lawyers and Pharisees (vv. 28–30). The call of Levi (5:27–32) illustrated the conversion of tax collectors. This contrast anticipates the sharp contrast between the Pharisee Simon, who failed to show Jesus the hospitality due an honored guest, and the sinful woman, who anoints Jesus and whose sins are forgiven (7:36–50). The parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector makes a similar point (18:9–14).

Examples of women who followed Jesus (8:1–3) and Jesus’s mother as model disciple, one who hears and keeps the word of God (8:19–21), frame the instruction about discipleship provided by the parable of the sower (8:4–15), the lamp proverb (8:16–17), and a general warning to be careful how one hears the word (v. 18). An interpretation of the sower parable indicates the threats to discipleship: (a) some will not believe the initial preaching; (b) some will be turned from discipleship by temptation, cares, riches, and pleasure; and (c) still others will lack the patient endurance necessary to bring forth the harvest.

Another series of miracles emphasizes Jesus’s power to save. The disciples are rescued from the storm (8:22–25); the Gerasene from the multitude of demons that made it impossible for any human bonds to restrain him (vv. 26–37). The concluding instructions are pointed toward Christians as well: go and declare what God has done for you (vv. 38f). The healing of Jairus’s daughter and the woman with the hemorrhage focus on the faith of those healed (vv. 40–56). Jesus expands his mission of preaching and healing by sending out the Twelve (9:1–6). A brief notice about Herod’s perplexity raises expectations about Jesus’s true identity. If he is not the Baptist returned, then he must be like one of the great prophets of old such as Elijah (9:7–9). This section concludes with the feeding of the five thousand (9:13–17). As Luke shapes the story, this miracle represents food for the hungry (6:21) as well as a response to Satan’s challenge to turn stones into bread (4:3–4). Jesus does live by the word of God alone.

The Messiah Who Must Suffer (9:18–50)

None of the external opinions about Jesus’s identity capture the truth that Jesus is the Messiah who must suffer. Luke extends this insight to the followers of Jesus by insisting that the disciple must be ready to take up the cross “daily” (9:23). Not only does God affirm Jesus’s sonship at the Transfiguration (as in Mark 9:7), but Moses and Elijah also converse with Jesus about his coming departure from the world at Jerusalem (9:30f). Luke has omitted Markan material critical of the disciples from the Passion prediction (Mk 8:33), the Transfiguration (Mk 9:6), and the healing of an epileptic boy (Mk 9:28–29). In doing so, Luke brings the dramatic theophany of the Transfiguration into closer proximity with the predictions of the Passion. God prevents the disciples from understanding what Jesus has said to them. Their arguments over greatness and their jealousy of an outsider who uses Jesus's name (9:46–50) show that his disciples are not yet ready to follow Jesus in suffering.

The Journey to Jerusalem (9:51–19:27)

The journey to Jerusalem is a time of preparation for the disciples. Teachings of Jesus, especially extended narrative parables, dominate this section of the Gospel. Miracles underline Jesus's conflict with the Pharisees over the merciful application of the Law (13:10–17; 14:1–6); they point to the virtues of faith and gratitude (shown by a Samaritan, 17:11–19), and they anticipate Jesus's triumphal entry into Jerusalem (18:35–43). We will pick out some of the key themes in this section.

Criticism of the Pharisee Opponents of Jesus

The shape of this criticism was anticipated by the story of the sinful woman in the house of a Pharisee (7:36–50). Luke sharpens the charges against Jesus's opponents but also generalizes them to apply to Christians: (a) it is hypocritical to use the Law to condemn in one case what one's actions in another approve; applications of purity regulations demonstrate this principle (11:37–44); (b) lack of love of God leads to self-aggrandizement and even hostility to those sent by God (11:45–52). The Pharisees are pictured as driven by love of money, desire for honor among others, and self-justification based on their application of the Law. The first two characteristics (16:14–15) reappear in Acts as typical of pagan magicians and false prophets (see Acts 8:9–25).

Luke uses the Pharisees as characters to warn Christians about dangers that they face. Christians should not presume that such failings only happen to persons who reject Jesus's teaching. Legalistic condemnation of one group for actions that one's own community tolerates in another context, such as racism or other forms of discrimination, cannot be acceptable any more than disciples of Jesus can spend their lives pursuing money, social status, or other forms of power over others.

Warnings about Judgment

Luke does not anticipate the return of Jesus as judge in the immediate future. Consequently, warnings to be watchful apply to both Jesus's opponents and Luke's Christian readers. Jesus utters prophetic woes against unrepentant cities (10:13–15). Demands for a sign only prove that there was more wisdom among Gentiles in the past than among God's people in the present (11:29–32). Hypocrisy can never be hidden from God's judgment (12:1–3). The stories of faithful and unfaithful servants warn against presuming that the delay in God's day of judgment means that all restraints are removed (12:35–48). Although they can read the signs of the weather, Jesus's contemporaries are unable to see what is before them in Jesus (12:54–56). People must not fall into the false confidence when they hear about the tragedies that happen to others. The fact they have been spared such disasters does not mean that those who suffered them are worse sinners (13:1–5). The parable of the barren fig tree provides an alternate reading of the situation. It could be that those spared are like the tree being given its one last chance (13:6–9). The narrow door and shut door warn that Jesus's audience could be excluded and replaced with foreigners in the Kingdom (13:22–30). Framing the parable of the servants entrusted with the master's wealth with the parable of the ruler who had gone into a distant country emphasizes the problem of discipleship in a time of delay (19:11–27). Delay need not mean absence of God's Kingdom. Luke preserves sayings that point out the presence of the Kingdom as well as its sudden arrival (17:20–37). Luke expands the traditional saying about the coming of the Son of Man in judgment with another affirmation that the Son of Man must first suffer and be rejected by his own generation (17:25).

Discipleship: Renunciation, Devotion, and Suffering

The journey opens with warnings that would-be disciples must be completely devoted to the Kingdom (9:57–62). Such disciples renounce normal human ties to family. They are the ones sent to heal and to preach the approach of the Kingdom (10:9). Their words are equivalent to the words of Jesus (10:16). Luke 10:17–20 acknowledges the dangers that the disciples face. However, Satan's fall from heaven indicates that the mission is weakening evil's power over humanity. Stories of the apostles in Acts will illustrate the certainty of divine protection. Sayings encouraging disciples not to be anxious express confidence in the generosity of others (12:22–24). Luke's addition to the traditional saying—sell possessions, give alms, and so provide yourself with heavenly treasure (v. 22)—points to one way in which the material needs were met.

The church's economic teaching reminds Catholics that they have a moral obligation to promote a society that meets the needs of its weakest members. The good news for the poor depends upon consistent efforts by all Christians to help the disadvantaged. Social programs should not make such people feel despised or rejected. Jesus and the early church welcomed such people into the community in addition to providing food and clothing for them.

The Martha and Mary story (10:38–42) illustrates a familiar tension in the life of discipleship between the concerns associated with serving others and the need to abandon ordinary routines, even the obligations of hospitality, for the one thing necessary to salvation—hearing and keeping the word of Jesus (also see 11:27–28).

Disciples must also expect division. Jesus's ministry brings division even within families (12:49–53; see also 2:34f). Jesus challenges disciples to recognize the full cost of being a disciple: both suffering and patient endurance to follow Jesus to the end are required (14:25–33). The slave can never tell the master, "I quit" (17:7–10).

Discipleship and Material Possessions

Riches can be a major hurdle to becoming or remaining a follower of Jesus (8:14; 18:18–25). Disciples have left everything to follow Jesus (18:26–30). Lucan parables demonstrate the folly of being possessed by wealth: the rich farmer dies before he can build larger barns (12:13–21), and the rich man who cannot see the poor Lazarus at his door is so blind to his sinfulness that he tries to bargain with Abraham even from hell (16:19–31). In addition to renouncing everything, there is another way in which Christians can use material possessions: sharing them with the unfortunate as the Good Samaritan does (10:30–36). Instead of feasting with friends, one can provide food for the poor, lame, homeless persons who have no resources

(14:12–24). Luke interprets the parable of the dishonest steward as a warning to Christians that they cannot mix service to God with the pursuit of wealth (16:1–13). The final episode in the travel narrative, the parable of the ten gold coins (19:11–27), draws on a common experience in a world without instant communications, uncertainty about the fate or return of those on a journey. Luke recognizes that Jesus may not return in judgment for a long time. Disciples must remain faithful stewards of what God has given them.

Prayer in the Life of Disciples

The infancy narrative highlighted prayer as central to the exemplary piety of those waiting for the Messiah. Jesus frequently turns to prayer (3:21; 6:12; 9:18, 28; 11:2; 22:32, 41; 23:46), and he instructs the disciples about prayer when they ask to be taught as the Baptist had taught his disciples (11:1; see also 5:33). Luke combines the Lord's Prayer (11:2–4) with that of the persistent friend (vv. 5–8) and instruction on the efficacy of prayer (vv. 9–13). The issue of efficacy returns in the parable of the importunate widow (18:1–6). If an unjust judge with no moral conscience can be badgered into hearing the widow, how much the more quickly will God respond to the pleas of the suffering lowly ones? After all, God is not withdrawn, waiting for humans to come begging, but is actively seeking those who are lost (see chap.15).

Jesus's Teaching Ministry in Jerusalem (19:28–21:38)

Jesus's arrival in Jerusalem brings the narrative back to its beginning.

The Messiah Comes to City and Temple (19:28–48)

The Messiah who could have brought peace to Jerusalem will not be able to do so (19:41–44). Luke has revised the story of Jesus's entry (Mk 11:1–10) so that the crowd consists of followers testifying to the works Jesus has done in Galilee (v. 37). Jesus proceeds directly to the Temple so that the story reflects the Greek version of Malachi 3:1, "the lord whom you seek will come suddenly to his temple." But Jesus has not come to set up the kingdom of David (19:11; Acts 1:4). The conclusion of the acclamation resembles the angelic announcement that peace is coming to God's faithful (2:14). Here, the city is the object of a prophetic lament—peace comes in the heavens, not on earth (v. 38). Allusion to Hebrews 2:11, the stones crying out from the walls against a nation that plunders the people (19:39f), heightens the narrative sense of a city facing its divine destiny. Jesus purges the Temple so that it can be a place of prayer as well as the location for Jesus's teaching in Jerusalem (19:45–48).

Jesus Teaches Daily in the Temple (20:1–21:4)

A set of pronouncement stories from Mark's Gospel (Mk 11:27–12:44) provides the content of Jesus's teaching now that he has returned to "his Father's house" (2:49).

The Authority For Jesus's Actions.

Jesus poses a counterquestion suggesting that those who reject him do not believe the Baptist either. Compare Jesus's answer (20:8) with his response to the Council when they demand to know whether Jesus is Messiah (22:67). If Jesus speaks they do not believe; if Jesus asks a question they do not answer.

Wicked Tenants. Christians have traditionally read this parable as an allegory for the replacement of Israel as God's covenant people. Today we recognize that neither Jesus nor Luke think that a faithful God would abandon the Jewish people. Jesus directs this tale at his opponents. Luke has expanded the narrative with increasing violence against the servants and the owner's soliloquy about the actions of the opponents. The additional image of persons crushed by the rejected stone (compare 2:34), intensifies the judgmental overtones of the episode.

Tribute Due God and Caesar. Luke spells out the hostility implied in the tribute question in verse 20. Jesus's opponents are seeking evidence for charges of stirring up political rebellion to bring against Jesus at trial (see 23:2–5). Spies pose their malicious question under the guise of pious flattery. Jesus, they say, teaches the truth with a godlike impartiality toward persons. Again, Jesus responds with a counterquestion. He forces the opponents to acknowledge that they are carrying coins with Caesar's image, inscribed with Caesar's name. Jesus's reply condemns their failure to pay God the honor due God. Readers know that Jesus's disciples have left coins and human positions of honor behind. They recognize that only God claims our loyalty. Thus, this passage does not teach the doctrine of separate powers of church and state that tradition later attached to it.

Resurrection of the Dead. The final challenge receives a double answer. The absurd case based on a hypothetical reading of levirate marriage (that is, that a man must marry his dead brother's wife if she had not yet borne children [see Dt 25:5; Gn 38:8]) may have originated in debates between Sadducees and Pharisees over resurrection. Jesus's first answer affirms that the "children of God" (note the contrast with the woman who dies childless) are resurrected to an angelic existence. His second answer (20:37f) points to the revelation of God to Moses. If God is God of the patriarchs, they must be living.

Jesus Challenges the Opposition. Having silenced those who came to question him, Jesus poses challenges of his own. The question about how David's Son can be greater than his ancestor draws upon Psalm 110:1, a text frequently used in early Christianity to speak of Jesus's exaltation at the right hand of God. The warning about the scribes (20:45–47) invokes the gospel's contrast between the wealthy and the oppressed poor. Jesus advocates for the poor. Finally, his comment on the widow's offering (21:1–4) repeats the contrast between a poor person and the wealthy. The radical gift of the widow condemns the abundance that stands behind the gifts of the rich. Jesus is not approving the poverty in which the widow lives, but he is asserting that her acts demonstrate a piety greater than that of the rich.

Fate of the Temple and the Coming End-Time (21:5–38)

Jesus's Jerusalem teaching ends with Luke's version of the apocalyptic sayings in Mark 13. The evangelist has recast that material by separating the destruction of the Temple (21:5–7) from events which signal the end-time so that readers will not conclude that destruction of the holy city was a sign that the end-time had arrived.

Even traditional signs of the end, false messiahs and rebellions, do not point to the second coming (vv. 8–11). They belong to a time of persecution. God protects believers who face hostility or even death from Jews, Gentiles, or family (21:12–19). The Roman destruction of Jerusalem was not a prelude to the end-time but the beginning of a new stage in salvation history. Jerusalem will remain under foreign rule until the age of the Gentiles reaches its conclusion (21:20–24). Then the Son of Man will return in glory (21:25–28). The Christian who lives between Jesus’s ascent to heaven and the Second Coming can remain confident that Jesus’s words will never pass away (21:29–33). Disciples should remain watchful and pray for strength to endure and appear before the Son of Man (21:24–36).

The Passion Narrative (22:1–23:56a)

The Passion narrative is not a court record of what happened but a narrative shaped by the conviction that Jesus is the suffering Messiah, the obedient Son who has been raised by God. Apologetic motifs dominate Luke’s Passion story. Political charges (23:2, 5, 18f) are false and recognized as such by Pilate, who declares Jesus innocent three times (23:4, 14f, 22). Pilate yields to pressure from Jewish leaders, to whom he hands over Jesus for crucifixion (23:23–26).

Conspiracy to Kill Jesus (22:1–6)

Luke blames only certain Jewish leaders for the plot to have Jesus executed (22:1–2). Acts 1:16–20 reports a legend that divine retribution took the life of Jesus’s betrayer, Judas.

The Last Supper (22:7–38)

Throughout the narrative Jesus is aware of the suffering he is about to undergo. His final Passover meal provides a symbolic interpretation of the cups of wine and the bread. As the Jews had been told to remember the Exodus during Passover, Jesus tells his disciples to remember his death as the new focal point of salvation history, since his death inaugurates a new covenant.
