2. Its conception of Eternal Life.—Every reader of John notices the prominence of the words 'life,' or 'eternal life,' or 'spirit'. The phrase 'Kingdom of God' has practically disappeared, and 'life' or 'eternal life' takes its place. The fact is of importance to us in our present study, because it is the index of John's way of conceiving what in the Synoptic mode of speech might be called the present aspect of the Kingdom. Jesus appears as the possessor and even the direct dispenser of the Divine life. It is given to the Son to have life in Himself even as the Father (5:26), and no one can come to Him except it be given him from the Father (6:65). Yet neither the Father nor the Son dispenses life in its fulness till the Son is glorified through death, or returns to the glory which He had from the first with the Father (7:39). But once the life is imparted it is a new birth which carries its own promise. It is, in a proper sense, sufficient for itself. If a man is born of God, the Divine seed remains in him. Its product is righteousness, and its perfect fruition is likeness to the only-begotten Son Himself (3:9-12, 1 Jn 3:2 etc.). It is clear that this mode of view brings the Divine boon nearer to the individual heart, and necessarily alters, at least for the individual, the perspective of the eschatology.

Not simply the great event itself,—the glorious Parousia of the Christ,—but the events of resurrection and judgment that accompany it, are regarded from within rather than from without. Those whose hope is set on Jesus do not lift to the heavens faces sick with deferred hope. They look within and behold Him with the vision of the pure in heart. For them Jesus has come already and keeps coming. The supreme matter is to abide in Him or in His love by keeping His words. Let a man thus live and believe in Him, and he shall never die. Nothing, that is, not even what we call death, will break the continuity of his life (11:26). The water of life that Jesus gives shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life (4:14). The Judgment similarly is, or tends to be, withdrawn from futurity. He who believes does not come to judgment; he has passed already from death to life (5:24, 1 Jn 3:14). On the other hand, he who disbelieves is condemned already. Life has come to him, but he chooses death; light, but he chooses darkness. In turning from the only-begotten Son of God he puts from him his present saved from a Divine wrath already. Until he seeks the Father through Him who is the Way, the wrath of God abideth on him. Every thoughtful reader of Jn. perceives that such are the main ideas both of the Gospel and of the Epistles. He will hardly fail to reflect also that these are, and have remained ever since the time of these writings or earlier, the vital ideas of the Christian Church in its cultivation of individual and social life, both on its practical and its meditative side.—Comparing the Johannine testimony with the utterances in the Synoptic Gospels—few, it may be, but important— which reveal a consciousness in Jesus of a Kingdom of God that is present and not simply future, considering especially the fact that in spite of their testimony to Jesus' sense of the imminence of a Kingdom yet to come, there is not in the Synoptic Gospels the slightest indication that this tremendous prospect at all diminished His appreciation of the worth of those ethical precepts (e.g. those relating to marriage and the parental relation (Mk 10:2-9)) that have to do with the secular order, we shall hesitate before accepting the idea suggested by Joh. Weiss (op. cit.), that the precise meaning of the ethical utterances of Jesus is to be determined by our knowledge (?) of His eschatology, and that Jesus would not have spoken as He does, e.g., in Lk 14:26, had He not believed that within a generation the institutions of marriage and the family would cease, and that those who should survive this end of the world, being 'sons of the resurrection' (Lk 20:36), should be thenceforward as the angels (ib.). In this reference also the Johannine Gospel confirms our sense of an element in the equipment and outlook of Jesus to which justice can hardly be done by those who lay unqualified stress on the distinctively eschatological portions of the Synoptic Gospels.

3. Its attitude to Eschatology proper.—Yet it has to be observed, finally, that while the futuristic element is not prominent in the Johannine Gospel, it is by no means eliminated. It may be felt, indeed, that the terms in which it is expressed involve a departure from (or, at any rate, a transformation of) the objective standpoint of the Syn-optics. The last three words of the phrase, 'the hour cometh and now is' (5<sup>25st</sup>), suggest a state of mind in which the thought of a future radically or incalculably different from that which is already present to the vision of faith, is no longer keenly operative. The same is still more obvious in the Supper discourse (chs. 14-16), in reading which one feels that the line of distinction between the Lord's final coming to receive the disciples to Himself, and His continuous abiding with them or visitation of them through the comforting Spirit, tends to be a vanishing one.

Yet it does not follow that the distinctively eschatological utterances or references contained in the Johannine Gospel (e.g. 5<sup>28f</sup>, 21<sup>27f</sup>) are of the nature of a formally dutiful ἀλλὰ οὐκ ἔστιν ἡμεῖς of an earlier mode of speech and that the NT form of popular Christian expectation corresponding to it. Such a view, at least, is not an exhaustive description of the state of the case. It seems true rather to say that the futuristic outlook, while it lost, even within the time covered by the NT writings, its first aspect of keen expectation, was yet to the last of that period felt to be—what it is still—an indispensable element of Christian faith. That the matter is looked at from within, and attention fastened not on what is to come to us, but rather on what we are to become (1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>), does not alter the fact that the total on which we are looking belongs to the future as well as to the present, and that that future is in the wonder-working power of the Conqueror of death. It is never possible to speak of futurity, and it is sometime to emphasize it.

Such a . . . 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup> . . . Mk 13<sup>21</sup> shows . . . how m . . . Evangelist, in spite of the depth of his insight into the Master's mind (or, shall we say, because of that insight), was to the last influenced by the eschatological utterances of the Synoptic testimony. He recognizes the antichrists of his own day, and is confident that it is the 'last time.' The 21st chapter of the Gospel speaks similarly for the attitude of the Evangelist's circle. The chapter is a . . . and v.<sup>22</sup> show what is probably its . . . The aged Apostle has passed away, and the question is raised, Did not the Master say that this disciple should not see death till He should come in glory? The expectation implied in the question connected itself in all likelihood with the utterance in Mk 9<sup>1</sup> ¶. There was a general impression throughout the Churches of Asia that John was the person mainly intended, and a story was current to the effect that in predicting Peter's mode of death the Master had told that disciple of the survival of John. The author of the appendix claims to be in a position to tell the readers of the Gospel what the Master had really said. It was far from being a definite promise. It was only the hint of a possibility. The apology would hardly have been deemed necessary if the tendency to insist on a literalistic interpretation of the Synoptic testimony, placing the glorious final advent within 'this generation, had not still been prevalent at the close of the 1st cent., i.e. at the time when John died.

Neither the author of the Gospel and the Epistles nor the author of the appendix to the Gospel has anything to object to the probability of an immediate Parousia of Jesus in glory; but the impression which their utterances leave upon our minds, and which from the first they were fitted to convey to the Church, is that the contrast important to the authors is no longer that between present and future, but rather that between God and the world, between the love of the Father and the love of this present evil world. The matter of absorbing interest is not that the Son of God will come again, but that He has come. Life is not movement towards a point on a straight line. It is circumference from a centre, and because the centre is Christ who is at the centre is also implicitly at the goal of the moving circumference.

The Evangelist has expressed this in very characteristic fashion in the closing words of his principal Epistle. 'We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness. And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life' (1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup>).

Those who find their own consciousness expressed in such words, and feel impelled to trace that consciousness to its historical source, will not readily suppose that they have found the source anywhere nearer than the consciousness of Jesus Himself. Who but He could have been the first either to possess eternal life or to know that He possessed it?

LITERATURE.—For the literature on Eschatology in general or on Scriptural Eschatology see the Index under Hastings' DB and in Encyc. Biblica. For the student of the Gospels to understand the genesis and scope of the literature, and for this purpose the Introduction (in the 'Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges') and Scott's Revelation (in the 'Century Bible') will be found sufficient by most English readers. Of German works there may be mentioned, in this connexion, Hilgenfeld, Judische Apokalypstik, 1857 (still a standard work); Gunkel, Schöpfung u. Chao; and the Handbuch der bibl. Eschatologie, 1895, and his Die . . . . . now added Gressmann, Der Ursprung der ur-jud. Eschatologie, 1905. On OT Eschatology see especially A. B. Davidson's The Prophecy of Isaiah (1894), T. In regard to the Eschatology of the Gospels a good list of books will be found in Moffatt's Historical New Testament (T. & T. Clark), p. 639 f., bearing especially on the theory of the 'Little Apocalypse,' which many scholars, e.g., H. C. Levi and Weizsäcker, suppose to be interpolated. M. J. N. Beyond the works of Haupt, Lietzmann, Weiss etc. mentioned in this article, the most comprehensive work, strictly ad rem, is probably Bilde's powerfully illustrated Das Schlussereignis Jesu of which only the first Br. of the 3rd 'vollig ungearbeitete' edition entitled 'Die Messianische Apokalypse Hoffnungen des Judentums' (Strassburg, 1908), has as yet appeared in English. A discussion of the matters specially emphasized by John Weiss under the title of 'The Parousia' appears in a volume of the 'Decennial Publication' of the Chicago Divinity School, entitled The Messianic Hope, ed. by Wm. Barclay Swainson, Shailer Mathews, Chicago, 1905. See also Porters Messias of the Apocalypses, and his art. 'Revelation' in Hastings' DB. ESSENES.—The Essenes were an ascetic community among the Jews, the existence of which can be traced for over two centuries, from about B.C. 150 to the Fall of Jerusalem. For original information regarding them we are dependent on Josephus (BJ II. viii; Ant. XVIII. i 5, XV. x. 4, 5, XIII. v. 9) and Philo (Quod omnis probus liber, chs. 12, 13, ed. Mangey, pp. 457-459). Josephus has also scattered references to individual Essenes, and the elder Pliny (H.N. v. 17) an appreciative notice of them, for which he was probably indebted to Alexander Polyhistor and his work 'On the Jews.' Other ancient authorities are either secondary or untrustworthy.

Josephus introduces the Essenes as one of the three 'sects of the Jews' which were influential amongst the Jews, the Sadducees and the Pharisees; but from the descriptions given of their practices and organization, they seem to have corresponded more closely to a monastic order than to a sect or a religious party. Their name is probably, though not certainly, derived from the Aramaic form of the Hebrew word hāsīdīm ('pious ones'), and this already suggests a close relation, especially in their origin, between the Essenes and the Pharisees. Their numbers are estimated by Jos. (Ant. XVIII. i. 5) and Philo at 4000; and while there is no evidence of their existence as an order outside Palestine, within its area they were widely distributed, being found in a great many of the villages and small towns, as well as in Jerusalem, where there was a 'Gate of the Essenes.' The members of the order lived in community houses and owned property as individuals, but having everything in common. They are extolled for their piety, their industry, which was confined to agricultural pursuits, the simplicity of their food, and their scrupulous cleanliness. Further characteristics of their life were that they had no slaves, used no oil for the purpose of anointing, dressed in white, and rigidly prohibited the use of oaths except on the admission of a new member to the order.

The order was held together by the strictest discipline. Full membership was granted only after a novitiate of two years, and then upon an oath to reveal everything to the members and nothing to the outside world. Offenders against the rules of the order were punished by exclusion; and as they were still held bound by their vows, they were unable to return to ordinary life.

What makes the Essenes 'the great enigma of Hebrew history' (Lightfoot, Col. 2<sup>11</sup>) is that, while they are distinguished by exaggerated adherence to the Jewish Law and by special reverence for Moses as lawgiver, they betray at the same time certain ideas and practices which are foreign to Judaism, and seem incompatible with its spirit. The indications of incipient dualism which may be found in their abstinence from marriage and in other ascetic practices, find a parallel in their doctrine of immortality, wherein they agreed with the Pharisees against the Sadducees as to the immortality of the soul, but differed from the Pharisees in denying the resurrection of the body. And they deviated still further from orthodox Judaism in the practice of making a daily prayer to the sun 'as if entreating him to rise,' and in refraining altogether from animal sacrifice. It followed that they were excluded from the services of the Temple. On the other hand, they were rigid beyond all others in their observance of the Sabbath; and they went beyond the Pharisees in their absolute determinism, affirming 'that fate governs all things, and that nothing befalls men but what is according to its determination' (Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 9).

It is in this apparent eclecticism that the problem of the origin of Essenism consists. While it is impossible to deny the Jewish foundation on which it rests, it is equally impossible to overlook the presence of elements. The source of these has formed the subject of endless discussion, and has been found by various writers in Parsism and Buddhism (Lightfoot), Parsism (Lightfoot), Syro-Persianism (Lipsius), and Pythagoreanism (Zeller, Keim). But all attempts to demonstrate any necessary connexion or indubitable channel between any one of these and Essenism have failed. And it remains either to assume that foreign influences had percolated unobserved, or to suppose that the characteristic phenomena emerged independently in Persia, Greece, and Palestine.

The Essenes are not directly referred to in the NT; but some have without sufficient reason claimed John the Baptist, and even Jesus, as Essenes. It has also been alleged that their influence may be traced within the circle of Christian ideas and practices. The possible relation of Essenism to the heresy controverted by St Paul in his Epistle to the Colossians has been discussed at length by B. Lightfoot in his edition of the Epistle (cf. his Notes, p. 322 ff.), and also by Kloppner, Brief an die Kolosser, pp. 76-95.

ETERNAL FIRE.—An expression twice used by Christ in reference to the future punishment of the wicked. In Mt 18<sup>8</sup> βαλθῆναι εἰς τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον stands in contrast to εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν ζωὴν; and from Mt 25<sup>41</sup> we learn that this eternal fire, into which the wicked are to be cast, was prepared not for them but for the devil and his angels. These are the only passages in which the expression is found in the Gospels. In Mt 18<sup>9</sup> the eternal fire is contrasted with the fire of Gehenna; and in 25<sup>46</sup> we have κόλασις αἰώνιος. In Mt 3<sup>12</sup> and Mk 9<sup>48</sup> it is the unquenchable fire (ἀσβεστον), and in Mk 9<sup>48</sup> Gehenna is the place of punishment where their worm dieth not, καὶ τὸ πῦρ οὐ σβέννυται. The wicked after their separation from the righteous (Mt 13<sup>42, 50</sup>) are to be cast into a furnace (καμίνος) of fire.

A brief account of the origin of this phraseology will throw light on its meaning. The idea of punishment by fire comes from the OT. The destruction by fire of Sodom and Gomorrah supplied the typical example, and it is frequently referred to as such (Dt 29<sup>23</sup>; Is 19 13<sup>19</sup>; Jer 49<sup>18</sup>; Am 4<sup>11</sup>; Wis 10<sup>7</sup>; 3 Mac 2<sup>5</sup>; cf. such well-known NT passages as Jude 7). A similar judgment is spoken against Edom (Is 34<sup>10</sup>), where it is said that the fire is eternal and will not be quenched. In Am 1. 2, Damascus, Gaza, etc., are threatened with the fire penalty. See for other examples of the unquenchable fire, 2 K 22<sup>17</sup>; Is 13<sup>1</sup>; Jer 44 21<sup>12</sup>; Ezk 20<sup>47</sup> 48; Am 5<sup>6</sup>. The 'everlasting burnings' of Is 33<sup>14</sup> refer, like the preceding, to temporal judgments. But there are passages which at least suggest the extension of the idea and its imagery to the future world. According to Dt 32<sup>22</sup> the fire of Jehovah's anger reaches down to Sheol. Chenevix finds in Is 50<sup>11</sup> and 66<sup>24</sup> a reference to the punishment of souls in the underworld, but Salmon and A. B. Davidson see in the latter passage only the description of a present-world penalty, and this seems the more natural interpretation. This passage seems to have suggested the later Jewish belief regarding eternal punishment, for certain expressions in it are used in this sense in the Apocryphal writings (e.g. Jth 16<sup>17</sup>; Sir 7<sup>17</sup>) and by Christ (Mk 9<sup>47</sup>). The scene of this judgment is, in all probability, the Valley of Hinnom, regarded by the Jews as a place accursed on account of its Molech sacrifices, and the fires which were kept burning through which the victims passed, would readily suggest the idea of Gehenna and its eternal fire.*

* Kimchi's statement, that a fire was kept constantly burning in Hinnom to consume the offal and the dead bodies which were thrown into it, comes too late (A.D. 1200) to be accepted without evidence.

In the Apocryphal writings the fire penalty is extended without reserve to the future world, and in a greatly intensified form. Most of the writers have ceased to expect an equitable distribution of rewards and penalties in this life. Their hopes are fixed on the future, and they, therefore, transfer the OT imagery of retribution to the life after death. The Book of Enoch is the great storehouse of teaching on this subject. For the impure angels and the 'fallen angels' rulers an abyss of fire is prepared, in which, at the final judgment, they will be tortured for ever (108 13 181 217 10 546 9024 25). For human offenders, a fiery abyss is opened on the right hand of the Temple (9026 47), this is Gehenna. They descend into 'the flame of the pain of Sheol' (6310), or into the 'burning fire of Sheol' (1037 8). Thus it appears that the NT 'eternal fire' of Gehenna is anticipated in this book. The only difference being that, while in the NT the fire prepared for the devil and his angels is identified with that into which wicked men are cast, in the Book of Enoch they are always distinguished.

Two questions arise: the nature of the eternal fire. Is it . . . And in what sense is it eternal?

(1) In many OT passages, even where it is said that the fire is unquenchable, and will burn for ever, material fire is undoubtedly meant, for fire is one of the physical agents which God commonly employs in His temporal judgments, and its burning for ever must refer to the lasting action which it effects. Sodom, Gomorrah, and Edom are given as examples of places on which the doom of eternal fire fell, and they still bear its proof-marks. But in other passages the literal sense cannot be maintained, as, e.g., where God's anger or jealousy and man's wickedness are said to burn like fire. Nor can it be allowed in passages like Is 66<sup>24</sup> if Cheyne's interpretation is accepted; since undying worms, preying on souls or bodies that are being consumed by unquenchable fire, is an impossible idea. In the NT, as we have seen, Christ drew largely on OT imagery in speaking of the 'last things.' But the whole drift of His interpretation of prophetic language is at variance with the literal sense of the fire penalty. What He gives in His eschatological teaching is not a dogmatic but an imaginative presentation of the truth; and the imagery He employs belongs not to the substance, but to the form of the thing. The prophet like the poet and the artist must present the future in terms and forms borrowed from present experience, and the underlying truth must be spiritually discerned. If, as Christ tells us, the eternal fire was prepared for the devil and his angels, it cannot be material fire; for spirits cannot undergo physical torture.*

Death by fire was the severest penalty under the Jewish law, and as it was inflicted only for the most shameful sins (Lv 20<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>9</sup>, Jos 7<sup>25</sup>), a peculiar infamy was associated with it. Christ, therefore, when He employed this imagery in speaking of the doom of the wicked intended to warn men that God has attached a terrible retribution to sin. At the very least it signifies an ordeal of suffering analogous to that which fire causes in the living masses. To the question, How will the suffering be caused? Scripture gives only the figurative answer, 'as by fire.' Bp. Butler (Anal. pt. ii. ch. v.) thought that it might come in the way of natural consequence, without any direct infliction on the part of God. Sin, which yields pleasure here, becomes misery there without changing its nature, through the natural working of moral law. The agony of remorse, which sometimes overwhelms the sinner in this life, has been regarded as a foretaste of the eternal fire. The pœna damni, or the consciousness of being for ever cut off from the sight of God, the only satisfying good, will be, it has been said, intense suffering as by fire, when the distractions of the world have ceased to dazzle. And these will, doubtless, be elements in the retribution. But if this were all, a possible consequence would be that the penalty would fall most lightly on the most degraded. A soul that can be made miserable through remorse, or the conscious loss of God's presence, has not reached the lowest stage of hardening; while experience tells us that those who have reached this stage are least liable to suffering from such a source. In them remorse can be awakened, not by the pœna damni, but by suffering externally caused. And the language of the NT suggests that in the future world an environment is prepared, with its appropriate agencies and influences, for the punishment of those who are morally and spiritually dead. Such expressions as 'Depart into the eternal fire,' 'shall be cast into the lake of fire,' etc., clearly pre-suppose such an environment, one in which the least worthy shall suffer the most, 'be beaten with many stripes.'

* Yet the contrary has been maintained on high authority. Augustine held that the fire was material, and that spirits may be tortured by it, since it is always the mind and not the body that suffers, even when the pain originates in the body. He also suggests that devils may have bodies made of air, 'like what strikes us when the wind blows, and thus be liable to suffering from fire' (de Civit. xxi. 3, 9, 10). Th. Aquinas held that the fire is material (Summa Theol. pt. iii. supplmt. lxx 3). And in our own day Ed. White inclines to the view that the wicked before extinction will be punished by material fire (Life in Christ, p. 352).

(2) Why is the fire called eternal?—In Mt 25<sup>41-45</sup> the adjective aiōnios is used with reference to 'the fire,' 'punishment,' and 'the life,' and no satisfying reason has been given for saying that, as regards the first two, it means 'time limited,' and, as regards the last, 'time unlimited.' If Christ's purpose had been to call attention to the duration of each, then 'endlessness' is the idea emphasized. But, except where this word or its Hebrew equivalent is applied to objects that, for the nonce, are invested with a quasi-eternity (Lv 3<sup>17</sup>, Gn 17<sup>8</sup> 49<sup>26</sup>), it takes us into a world in which time measurements are inapplicable, in which objects are presented to some eternal aspect of the Divine nature. Thus eternal life does not mean natural life prolonged to infinity; such a life might be lived without any experience of the eternal life, which signifies life in fellowship with, or that partakes in, the eternal life of God. God's relation to believers is such that between them and Him there is a community of life. Eternal fire, on the other hand negatively expresses the truth that, God's nature being what it is, there must be, under any economy over which He pre-sides, a provision for the adequate punishment of sin. The eternal fire is such a provision, and, being eternal, it can be no mere temporary contrivance for tiding over an emergency, but must be the retributive aspect of the Divine holiness. God is, was, and ever shall be a consuming fire in relation to sin unrepented of; this is His unchanging and unchangeable attitude. Some of the OT saints were all their lifetime subject to bondage through fear of death, for to them Sheol (Is 38) was a place where all life in fellowship with God was lost. But suppose that their worst fears had been realized, it would still have been true that they had had a passing experience of the life eternal. And similarly if after ages of suffering, the wicked were to cease to be, it would, none the less, be true of them that they had been cast into the eternal fire. In Sodom, Gomorrah, Edom, etc., we have examples of what is meant by 'suffering the doom of eternal fire'; but this does not mean that ever since the fire destroyed the cities their inhabitants have been enduring its pains. Eternal fire may or may not mean everlasting suffering in it (see artt. ETERNAL PUNISHMENT and RETRIBUTION).

LITERATURE.—Origen de Princip. ii. x. 4-8, c. Cels iv. 13, v. 15; Lactantius, Insl. vi. 21, 26, Augustine, de Civ. bk. xxi., Ench. cxi.-cxv., de Gest. Pelag. 10, 11; T. Burnet, Concerning the State of Departed Souls, 1738; Matt. Horbery, Duration of spoken of in contrast with 'death' and 'perishing.' The believer 'shall not perish, but have eternal life' (3<sup>16</sup>), 'hath passed out of the death into the life' (5<sup>24</sup>), 'shall never see death,' nor 'taste of death' (8<sup>51, 52</sup>), 'shall never perish' (10<sup>28</sup>). He who has not the life is in a condition of spiritual death, and must perish unless he receive the life of God, the eternal kind of life, which has been manifested in Christ. In these and other similar passages life and death are not to be understood as identical in meaning with existence and non-existence. The person who has passed out of death into life had existence before the new life came, and such existence, in estrangement from God and in disobedience of the gospel, may be perpetuated in 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord' (2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>). So the 'death,' which those who 'perish' taste, need not be understood as annihilation, or utter extinction of being. As 'the death' is a condition of moral and spiritual destitution in which one has no fellowship with God, so 'the life' is the blessed experience of fellowship and union with Christ as vital as that of the branch and the vine. And this participation in the very nature of the Eternal God is the essence of the 'life eternal.'

In the writings of St. Paul we also find a mystic element in which we note the concept of eternal life as a present possession. The exhortation to 'lay hold on the life eternal,' and the designation of it as 'the life which is life indeed' (ἡ ζωὴ ἡ ζωὴ, 1 Ti 6<sup>12, 19</sup>), may refer either to the present or the future; but when the Apostle speaks of believers as made alive and risen with Christ, and sitting with Him in the heavenlies (Eph 2<sup>5, 6</sup>), he implies a fruition that was already realized. It involved a positive experience like that in which 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made him free from the law of sin and of death' (Ro 8<sup>2</sup>). He also has a wonderful appreciation of the heavenly illumination which 'shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ' (2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>). This surpassing light is conceived by the Apostle as a product of the Spirit of the Lord, and a reflexion of the glory of Christ as seen in the mirror of His gospel. In that mirror the believer beholds the glory of his Lord reflected, and by the power of the heavenly vision he is 'transformed into the same image' (2 Co 3<sup>17, 18</sup>). The Johannine doctrine of 'passing out of death into life' is conceived by St. Paul as a dying unto sin and being made alive unto God in Christ Jesus. The believer is 'alive from the dead' and 'walks in newness of life' (Ro 6<sup>1-13</sup>). He has been 'crucified with Christ: and it is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me; and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, which is in the Son of God' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). And so in Pauline thought the spiritual life of faith, enjoyed in fellowship with God and Christ, is a 'life hid with Christ in God' (Col 3<sup>3</sup>), and 'the free gift of God' (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>). This conception is in essential harmony with the doctrine of St. John. Eternal life is in its inmost nature the free, pure, permanent spiritual life of Christlikeness. It is a present possession, a glorious reality, a steadfastness of conscious living fellowship with the Eternal Father, and with His Son, Jesus Christ.

But in all the Gospels and in the Epistles we also find eternal life contemplated as a future glorious inheritance of the saints. In St. John's Gospel the 'eternal life' which the believer now 'hath' is destined to attain a glorious consummation in the resurrection 'at the last day' (Jn 6<sup>40</sup>). For Jesus is Himself the resurrection as well as the life, and declares: 'He that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die' (11<sup>25, 26</sup>). Such a life must needs abide in eternal permanence.

Jesus spoke of 'the water of life' which becomes in him who drinks it 'a fountain of water springing up into eternal life' (4<sup>14</sup>). He spoke of food 'which abideth unto life eternal,' and of 'gathering fruit unto life eternal' (4<sup>36, 6-7</sup>). In all the Gospels He is represented as teaching that 'he that loveth [or findeth, so Synopt.] his soul loseth it; and he that hateth [or loseth] his soul in this world shall keep it unto life eternal.' We read in Mk 10<sup>29, 30</sup> 'There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, . . . or lands, for my sake and for the gospel's sake, but he shall receive a hundredfold now in this time, . . . and in the age to come life eternal' (cf. Mt 19<sup>29</sup> and Lk 18<sup>29, 30</sup>). These Gospels also speak of eternal life as an inheritance to be received at a future day (Mt 19<sup>16</sup>, Mk 10<sup>17</sup>, Lk 10<sup>25, 18<sup>18</sup></sup>). Such contrast of 'this time,' 'this world,' 'on the earth' with 'the age to come,' and 'in heaven,' implies possessions in some other age or world beyond the present. In the picture of the Judgment (Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>), the righteous who go 'into eternal life' are said to 'inherit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world,' and to enter into the joy and glory of the King Himself.

This idea of eternal life as a glorious future inheritance finds also frequent expression in the Epistles. Those who 'by patience in well-doing seek for glory and honour and immortality' shall receive eternal life as a reward of the righteous judgment of God (Ro 2<sup>7</sup>). All who are made free from sin and become servants of God 'have their fruit unto sanctification, and the end life eternal' (Ro 5<sup>21, 6-22</sup>). In the Epistle to the Hebrews (1<sup>14, 9<sup>19</sup></sup>) we read of 'them that shall inherit salvation,' and of them that 'receive the promise of the eternal inheritance.' In 1 P 1<sup>4</sup> the writer tells his readers that God has begotten them unto a living hope, 'unto an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved for them in heaven.' . . . all these scriptures, eternal life is . . . Christian believer by the Holy . . . and is to be perpetuated through the ages of ages. It is eternal in quality as being a participation in the Divine nature of the Eternal One, and eternal in duration as continuing for ever and ever. It is a possession of manifold fulness, and is conditioned in a character of godlikeness, which 'has the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come' (1 Ti 4<sup>8</sup>). There can be no living this life apart from God, for it is 'begotten in the soul by a heavenly birth, and must be continually nourished by the Spirit of God. Such vital union with the eternal Spirit brings unspeakable blessedness in this life and in this world; but it is as permanent and abiding as the nature of God, and is therefore appropriately called an incorruptible inheritance. Each individual life, whose fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ' (1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>), is conceived as continuing eternally in that heavenly fellowship. In this age and that which is to come, in this world and in any other, on the earth or in the heavens, the child of God abides in eternal life.

ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.—RV of Mt 25<sup>46</sup> (εἰς κόλασιν αἰώνιον). The AV here and in 26 other passages has 'everlasting.' The adjective αἰώνιος occurs 70 times in the NT (1 Ti 6<sup>19</sup> omitted in RV), and in the RV, with one exception (Philem 15), is uniformly rendered 'eternal.' This is a distinct gain, as it leaves the exact significance to be determined by use. Three passages should be examined: 'Through times eternal' (Ro 16<sup>25</sup>); 'before times eternal' (2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>, Tit 1<sup>2</sup>); in these uses it is clear that 'eternal' and 'everlasting' are not interchangeable. This agrees with the LXX, in which αἰώνιος is used of the rites and ceremonies of Judaism which are done away in Christianity (Ex 12<sup>24</sup> 29<sup>9</sup> 40<sup>15</sup>, Nu 18<sup>19</sup> and others). The suggested use of 'æonian' has failed to find approval notwithstanding its advantages, and 'age-long' is inept.

For NT thought the use of the term in the Fourth Gospel should be studied. Γ. 1<sup>1</sup> has parallel passages, 'eternal life' is found 17 times in the Gospels, and of these 17 are in John. In this Gospel, as also in 1 Jn., the notions of succession and duration are eliminated, and 'eternal' becomes almost synonymous with 'Divine.' 'It is not an endless duration or being in time, but being of which time is not a measure' (Westcott, see Additional note on 1 Jn 5<sup>20</sup>). See ETERNAL LIFE.

In the Synoptic Gospels, to 'enter into life' and to 'enter into the kingdom' are used interchangeably (cf. Mt 19<sup>16, 17</sup> with 23, Mk 9<sup>45</sup> with 47, Mt 25<sup>41</sup> 'inherit the kingdom,' and v. 46 'unto eternal life'). In the Fourth Gospel 'eternal life' is the equivalent of 'the kingdom of heaven' of the Synoptic Gospels (cf. Jn 3<sup>3, 5</sup>, where 'the kingdom of God' occurs, with v. 16). This suggests a very comprehensive and definite idea. 'Eternal life' is the life of the Kingdom of God: forgiveness, righteousness, salvation, blessing, whatever that life is declared to be in the teaching of Jesus. 'Eternal punishment' is the antithesis of 'eternal life,' the penalties upon all unrighteousness inseparably bound up with the Kingdom, and which, in His new teaching of the Kingdom, Jesus plainly sets forth. As a working principle, then, 'eternal' may be accepted as descriptive of things belonging to, essentially bound up with, the Kingdom, and is almost the equivalent of 'Messianic,' in the Christian, as opposed to the merely Jewish significance of the term, that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name' (Jn 20<sup>31</sup>). These deeper meanings of αἰώνιος in the NT should serve to remove the question of the time element in future punishment from the unsatisfactory basis of mere verbal interpretations.

In collating the teaching of the Gospels, full emphasis must be given to the following postulates. 1. The certainty of retribution is inseparably bound up with the revelation of Jesus as to the will and character of God. The Father who 'seeth in secret' and rewards unobtrusive righteousness (Mt 6<sup>18</sup>) will render to the unrighteous the due reward of their deeds (Mt 7<sup>19</sup> 10<sup>26</sup> 12<sup>36</sup> 15<sup>13</sup> 18<sup>6, 35</sup>, Lk 18<sup>7</sup> [parallel passages omitted throughout]). Hence the urgency of the call to repentance (Mt 4<sup>17</sup>), and to the obedience of righteousness as in the Sermon on the Mount, and, at any cost, to 'crucify the flesh' which prompts to sin (Mt 5<sup>28, 30</sup> 18<sup>8, 9</sup>). In this Jesus takes His stand with the prophets of old and with the last of their order, John the Baptist (cf. Lk 3<sup>7-14</sup>). The revelation of the all-perfect Father never weakens, but ever adds new emphasis to the call to a life of righteousness, and to the certainty of penalty for all unrighteousness.

2. The characteristic teaching of Jesus as to the penalties of sin is bound up with His gospel of the Kingdom.—The incomparable worth of the Kingdom, as the richest 'treasure,' and 'pearl of great price' (Mt 13<sup>44, 45</sup>), and the supreme quest of it as the first duty and sovereign wisdom of life (Mt 6<sup>33</sup>), have, as their converse, the 'penalties' which entail the rejection of the gospel. This is the supreme penalty—exclusion from the Kingdom, to be cast into the 'outer darkness' (Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>13</sup> 25<sup>30</sup>), denied by the Lord (Mt 7<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>43</sup> 25<sup>12</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28-27</sup>), shut out from the glad presence of the King (Mt 25<sup>41</sup>). The use of the figures 'weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth' in the sentence of exclusion declares that remorse is one element in future retribution (cf. Lk 16<sup>25</sup> 'Son, remember').

3. The hearing of the gospel adds to human knowledge and increases the severity of the penalty of disobedience.—This is the burden of much of the teaching of Jesus. Light is come into the world, and with the light a more solemn duty (Jn 3<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>41</sup> 15<sup>22, 24</sup> 16<sup>9</sup>, Lk 12<sup>47, 48</sup>). It is the apostate disciple who, as salt which has lost its savour, is cast out (Mt 5<sup>13</sup>). To His disciples Jesus gives the warnings of God's searching judgment (Mt 5<sup>22</sup>). To those who call Him 'Lord, Lord,' and in His name have done 'many mighty works,' He utters the dread 'Depart' (Mt 7<sup>21-23</sup>, cf. Lk 13<sup>28-27</sup>). It is the disobedient hearers of His word who are compared to a foolish builder whose house, built upon sand, is ruined by the storm (Mt 7<sup>26, 27</sup>). Those who deny Him, He also will deny (Mt 10<sup>33</sup>); those who are ashamed of Him, of them will He be ashamed (Mk 8<sup>38</sup>). It is the unfaithful servant (Mt 24<sup>48-51</sup>), the unwatchful (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>), the unprofitable (Mt 25<sup>30</sup>), who are cast out of the Kingdom. It is the unfruitful branch of the vine that is cast forth, withered, gathered, cast into the fire, burned (Jn 15<sup>6</sup>). The final condition of hopeless doom, the state of 'eternal sin,' is the direct result of self-willed, deliberate resistance to the Divine grace (Mk 3<sup>29</sup>; see ETERNAL SIN). And in the larger issue of judgment falls upon cities and nations 'exalted to heaven' in privilege and opportunity but doomed because of neglect (Mt 11-12).

In all this there is no reference to those to whom the gospel has not been made known. (Mt 10<sup>12</sup>) and that of the incidental and indirect to yield any determining principle. Even the great Judgment passage (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>), if indeed it is to be interpreted universally as including all the nations of the earth, may be interpreted also as assuming a corresponding universality of knowledge, the gospel preached throughout the whole world. The judgments Jesus announces are vitally bound up with the message He brings. The problem of those to whom the offers of grace have not been made is not considered, and we are not justified in applying to them the severity of penalty and dread doom which in the teaching of Jesus, fall only upon those who deny Him and reject His gospel.

4. The final triumph of the Kingdom, and consequent final separation of the righteous and the wicked.—This is again and again solemnly asserted and described. In the parables of the Tares (Mt 13<sup>24</sup>) and the Drag-net (Mt 13<sup>47</sup>), the ultimate overthrow, and, as the terms used would seem to imply, the final destruction of evil are decisively declared. From the explanation of the parable it is clear that the wheat and the tares represent persons—'the sons of the kingdom' and 'the sons of the evil one.' This sharp division of men into two classes entirely distinct is to human vision impossible. The facts of life show the presence of 'wheat and tares,' good and evil in every man. The difficulty is unresolved. The end is declared, but not the stages by which it is reached. The Kingdom is to be all righteousness, out of it is to be gathered 'all things that cause stumbling, and them that do iniquity' (Mt 13<sup>41</sup>). Every plant not planted by the Father is to be uprooted (Mt 15<sup>13</sup>), and every tree which beareth not good fruit is to be cut down and destroyed (Mt 7<sup>19</sup>).

So far there can be little hesitation in setting forth the teaching of Jesus. The difficulties arise when we seek to determine exactly the nature and duration of the penalties and of the doom. The difficulty is accentuated by the fact that Jesus uses freely the religious symbolism current at the time. Gehenna, the worm that dies not and the fire that is not quenched, the outer darkness, the weeping and the wailing and the gnashing of teeth, were familiar figures, and are clearly used because familiar (see ETERNAL FIRE). If, then, we ask how far Jesus gave His sanction to the popular notions behind the symbols, we are confronted with the difficulty of determining what those notions were. The use of these figures to describe the place of punishment in the world of spirits is admitted, but it is not so clear which of the three doctrines which have divided Christian thought—endless punishment, annihilation, restoration—was held. Support has been found for each opinion, and from the words of Jesus Himself quite opposite conclusions have been reached. In what has been said above, finality would seem to be taught, but other opinions are held.

(1) The great sayings in which the note of finality is clear are those of grace rings so clear (Jn 3<sup>16, 17</sup>), and the perishing of the lost (Lk 15<sup>4-6</sup>) and the all-embracing work of Jesus are so absolutely declared (Jn 1<sup>29, 12<sup>31, 32</sup></sup>), have been dwelt upon as justifying 'the larger hope.' The exact award of penalty, the few and many stripes according to the measure of disobedience (Lk 12<sup>47, 48</sup>), the completed sentence implied in 'till thou have paid the last farthing' (Mt 5<sup>26</sup>, cf. 18<sup>34, 35</sup>), the startling symbolism of the phrase 'salted with fire' (Mk 9<sup>49</sup>), which is said to teach 'that the destructive element performs a purifying part' (see Internat. Crit. Com. 'Mark' in loco), the use of kólasis, pruning, 'suggestive of corrective rather than of vindictive punishment' (Expos. Gr. Test. on Mt 25<sup>46</sup>), and the use of aiónios as 'age-long,' 'age-long,' have all been singled out as leaving room for the hope of final salvation through the fires of judgment.

The exact balance of the awards 'eternal life' and 'eternal punishment' (Mt 25<sup>46</sup>) has often been insisted upon as teaching finality. As the life is certainly endless, so, it is urged, must the punishment be. But even this is not conclusive. The terms 'life' and 'punishment' point to an essential difference. Life is of God, eternal; Divine punishment is from God, a Divine act. It is well also to bear in mind that 'if good ever should come to an end, that would come to an end which Christ died to bring in, but if evil comes to an end, that comes to an end which He died to destroy' (Clemence, Future Punishment, p. 65).

But more than upon single texts, reliance is placed upon the revealed character and purpose of God in Jesus Christ.

(2) On the other hand, the strong terms, destruction, perdition, unquenchable fire, and the analogies of consumption of tares and chaff and withered branches by fire, are instanced as indicating annihilation. Two sayings of Jesus are indeed terrible in their severity, and ought not to be minimized: 'Be not afraid of them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell' (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>). Whether the reference be to God as the object of fear (so Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. 201, and most commentators) or 'the tempter' and 'the devil whose agent he is' (so Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. in loco), the statement as to the destruction of the soul itself remains. The same thought is suggested by the figure used in the saying, 'He that falleth on this stone shall be broken to pieces; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will scatter him as dust' (Mt 21<sup>44</sup>). Were utter extinction of being to be taught, it could hardly be in plainer terms.

(3) In close association, and lending support to the theory of annihilation, is the doctrine of 'conditional immortality' or 'life in Christ.' According to this theory the object of revelation is 'to change man's nature, not only from sin to holiness, but from mortality to immortality.' Many sayings in the Fourth Gospel are pressed to support this theory, especially those where the gift of life is declared to be only through the Son, and to those only who abide in Him by faith (Jn 3<sup>16, 18, 36-38</sup>).

It is this evident and apparently 'insoluble antinomy' which has led many to conclude 'that we have not the elements of a complete solution, and we ought not to attempt it. What visions beyond there may be, what larger hopes, what ultimate harmonies, if such there are in store, will come in God's good time; it is not ours to anticipate them, or lift the veil where God has left it drawn' (Orr, The Christian View of God and the World, 397). This conclusion, so far at least as the Gospels are concerned, may be accepted. In the teaching of Jesus the emphasis is always upon present opportunity: duty, responsibility. 'One said unto him Lord are they few that be saved? And he said unto them, Strive to enter in by the narrow door' (Lk 13<sup>23</sup>). 'Walk while ye have the light, that darkness overtake you not. While ye have the light, believe on the light, that ye may become sons of light' (Jn 12<sup>35, 36</sup>). God's eternal grace and man's 'boundless power of resistance' stand over against each other. Jesus honours both, but nowhere in His reported sayings does He disclose the final issue.

The teaching of the Epistles does not come within the scope of this article, but this brief reference is necessary. To the present writer, at least, it does appear that St. Paul's faith reaches a final issue. By him an endless dualism is decisively rejected. 'That God may be all in all' (1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>) is the final goal; but what that includes, or how accomplished, is not declared; only of Christ it is said, and we may hold this faith confidently, 'He must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet.'

ETERNAL SIN.—The RV of Mk 3<sup>29</sup> (aiónios ἀμαρτήματος, so NBL; C* vid D read ἀμαρτίας); AV 'eternal damnation' (κρίσις, so AC<sup>2</sup>), 'a strong translation of an incorrect text' (Morison). It is not surprising that the latter explanation of a difficult word (ἀμαρτήμα) should have found its way into the text of some later MSS. As an explanation of the correct text, 'eternal judgment'—or, as the judgment is clearly adverse, 'eternal condemnation'—is not without force. It has the merit of emphasizing the essential matter, which any interpretation, to be adequate, must take into account, that an 'eternal sin' is a sin which 'hath never forgiveness.' But this early gloss is inadequate. There is more than the emphasis of repetition. It is not the penalty of the sin, but its nature, which is declared; not the mere duration of the sin or of the sinning, but the guilt; not eternally sinning, but an eternal sin.

That sin tends to propagate itself is witnessed to by experience, and that continuance in sinning must exclude forgiveness is an essential principle of all moral judgment. Sin and penalty are of necessity coterminous. But unforgiveness because unrepented of is true of all sin, and is no adequate explanation of an 'eternal sin' which carries the judgment 'unforgivable.' The absoluteness of the sentence is already declared in the words 'hath never forgiveness,' it is the ultimate ground of this judgment which is further declared.

'Eternal sin' finds its contrast and opposite in 'eternal life,' which is not simply or characteristically endless life, but essential, perfect life, 'the life which is life indeed' (1 Ti 6<sup>19</sup> RV), the life of the Kingdom of God (cf. Mk 9<sup>43, 45, 47</sup> and Jn 3<sup>15, 16</sup>), the life of God (1 Jn 1<sup>2</sup> RV). So 'eternal sin' is more than 'sin eternally repeating itself,' it is a fixed state of sin, sin which has become character, nature, moral death, which is death indeed. But see art. BLASPHEMY, p. 209<sup>b</sup>. This is the final revolt of man, free will carried to its ultimate in the defiance of God, a final condition, hopeless and beyond recovery, beyond the reach even of Divine illumination and influence. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews certainly contemplates in 6<sup>1-8</sup> the impossibility of such fatal sin; cf. also 1 Jn 5<sup>16</sup> 'sin unto death' (see Westcott, ad loc); but neither of these passages appears to the present writer to afford help here.

Two questions must be distinguished—the actuality and the possibility of this state of moral depravity. That the grace of God should prove unavailing is indeed hard to believe, and by many the thought is rejected utterly. Yet there is much in the teaching of Jesus and in human life to justify the fear that this possibility may become an actual fact. The hardening of the heart which follows all unfaithfulness is the witness in human life to what must inevitably result if unfaithfulness is persisted in a fixed state of spiritual blindness and in-ensibility. There is a law of degeneration in the moral world as in the natural. But it is in the Scripture doctrine of sin that the full ground of this is seen. As Jesus in His teaching of Jesus, the measure of sin is 'the light that is in thee' (Mt 6<sup>18</sup>), and sin is wilful disregard of the light of truth. To be blind is to be without sin; but to those who say 'we see,' and yet walk in darkness, 'sin remaineth' (Jn 9<sup>41</sup>). So every increase of light brings increased responsibility (Jn 3<sup>19, 15<sup>22</sup></sup>); and for self-willed deliberate refusal of the Divine grace—refusal not in ignorance or misunderstanding but with full consciousness and choice of will so that the will itself becomes identified with evil, there can only be judgment, not because the Divine compassions fail, but because the redemption, as the Redeemer, is despised and rejected of men. In the final issue the free will of man is valid even against the beseechings of God (Jn 5<sup>40</sup>, Mt 23<sup>37</sup>).

The doom of the finally impenitent is here negatively told: 'hath never forgiveness'; but that includes the uttermost penalty, exclusion from the Kingdom of the Father, loss of the 'eternal life.' This is sin's last stage and uttermost working; it cuts the soul off from God, its source and life. 'Sin, when it is full grown, bringeth forth death' (Ja 1<sup>15</sup>). See, further, art. SIN.

ETERNITY.—There is no word either in OT Hebrew or in NT Greek corresponding to the abstract idea of eternity.

In Is 57<sup>15</sup> both AV and RV have the phrase 'the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity.' MT has עוֹלָם, lit. 'dwelling for ever'—the thought of the writer being evidently the unchangeableness of God.

words to express perma-

connected with Assy-

'the present' But in OT it is used adverbially to express indefinite duration of time generally in the future. Its use is mainly poetical of God (Is 57<sup>15</sup>), His law (Ps 139<sup>9</sup>), His attributes (111<sup>3, 10</sup>). But it is found also in connexion with things whose existence in Hebrew thought would be limited, e.g. a king's life (Ps 21<sup>6</sup>, Pr 23<sup>14</sup>), the lip of truth (Pr 12<sup>19</sup>).

A word of wider meaning and more general application is

of the fast-days (Is 63<sup>9, 11</sup>, Mic 51<sup>7, 14</sup> etc.), hills (Gn 49<sup>26</sup>, Hab 3<sup>9</sup>). It is also used, like of God or His attributes as existing from the remote past

everlasting to everlasting' (Ps 90<sup>2</sup> 103<sup>17</sup>, Neh 9<sup>5</sup> etc.). But in the case of עוֹלָם also there are many places in OT where its meaning is obviously limited to the affairs and lives of human beings, e.g. of a slave (Dt 15<sup>7</sup>, 1 S 27<sup>12</sup>), of careless dwellers (Ps 73<sup>12</sup>), and in the familiar phrase, 'May the king live for ever'

(1 K 1<sup>31</sup>, Neh 2<sup>9</sup>). Often, however, the word is used to indicate the writer's hope or belief that a certain state of good [e.g. God's covenant (Gn 9<sup>11</sup>), or His promises (Is 40<sup>5</sup>), or His relations to

use of the word עוֹלָם, e.g. in Ec 3<sup>11</sup>, a very difficult passage, RVm gives as an alternative rendering of עוֹלָם

The other Hebrew phrases worthy of note are עוֹלָם 'perpetuity'

in the frequent phrase עוֹלָם 'for ever' (Is 13<sup>20, 25<sup>8</sup></sup>, Am 8<sup>7</sup>, Hab

1<sup>4</sup> etc.), and עוֹלָם 'length of days,' Dt 30<sup>20</sup>, Job 12<sup>12</sup>, Ps 21<sup>4</sup>, and in the well-known passage Ps 23<sup>6</sup> 'I shall dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.' Here the meaning is disputed, but the probability is that the highest anticipation of the Psalmist was to have the joy of spending an indefinite period in the Temple

to future ages (Ex 3<sup>15</sup>, Ps 106<sup>33, 49<sup>11</sup></sup>). It is mainly poetical.

The idea of eternity, like the idea of immortality, is beyond the range of early Jewish thought. It is after the Exile, p. 319, a natural development of the Hebrew

God, and partly through the force of circumstances.

(1) The pious Jew, turning away more and more from the anthropomorphism of cruder religions, strove to differentiate the infinite God from finite man. God is transcendent—above the limitations of earthly existence. Hence He is eternal, from everlasting to everlasting. A thousand years in His sight are but as yesterday. (2) With the Exile came a decay of national ideals, and the Jew began to consider more his own personality and its relation to this eternal God. This thought developed slowly, and was mixed with various elements. The Jew found himself in an evil world.

His own nation was oppressed, almost blotted out.

Good men suffered; wicked men seemed to prosper.

If the eternal, omnipotent God ruled the world, then all this must surely end. The Day of the Lord would come for oppressed Israel, for the oppressors, for the whole world, and (in Apocalyptic literature, Ps-Sol 3<sup>16, 13<sup>9</sup></sup> etc.) for the Jew himself. Then the present evil world (עוֹלָם הַזֶּה) would give place to a new and glorious era (עוֹלָם הַבָּא, see GENETATION).

Whether this new era would be eternal, the Jew did not at first stop to inquire. Sufficient for him that

of Enoch, however, 'Time' is followed by 'Eternity'

in the עוֹלָם הַבָּא. Later Judaism developed the idea, probably borrowed from the Zend religion, of a series of world epochs (cf. the world empires of Daniel's vision), followed by the Messianic age.

In the time of Christ, Jewish thought on the future had developed very much, and had assumed many forms (see ESCHATOLOGY). Jesus must have sifted the various elements. He retained and perhaps developed the view of a new age (עולם החדש) about to dawn on the world (עולם הזה); the present (עולם הזה); Mt 12<sup>32</sup>, cf. 12<sup>35</sup>, 'the kingdom of heaven' (מלכות שמים) would be (עולם הבא). Jesus endeavoured to concentrate the thoughts of His hearers on their personal relation to this kingdom, and the desirability of sharing it (see LIFE, ETERNAL LIFE). Doubtless this kingdom would be for ever and its members live for ever (cf. Dn 12<sup>2</sup> עולם 'eternal life'). The vexed question of the absolute endlessness of this kingdom, with its rewards and punishments, would probably never be raised in the minds of Jesus' hearers. At the same time, there is no evidence in the teaching of Jesus of any limit to the עולם החדש, and while the frequent adjective αἰώνιος, 'eternal,' must be taken in the Gospels as the first place to this coming kingdom, it, as we know, be taken as implying also that quality of absolute permanence with which that kingdom has always been associated in the minds of men.

ETHICS.—A very little reflexion will reveal the unusual difficulties that lurk in a subject like the present—the Ethics of Jesus, or, of the Gospels. Even the uninitiated is aware that we cannot in strictness speak of the 'Ethics' of Jesus at all—in the sense, that is, of a doctrine systematically developed according to principles, and exhaustively applied to the facts of life. For His was no scientific or methodical spirit; His significance lies rather in the realm of personality, in the unique quality of His moral feeling and judgment, in the peculiar way in which men and things moved Him, and in which He reacted upon them. Hence we need not look for either an orderly arrangement of, or even an approximate completeness in, His ethical ideas. From the drama of His life we are unable to compile a system of morals, but we may see how a great Personality creates a moral standard by what He does and suffers, and how He elucidates it in His words.

But are we justified in connecting with Him the term 'ethical' at all? We speak accurately of Ethics or Moral Science only when we regard the conduct of men in their mutual relations as something by itself, abstracted from religious feeling and action, and when ethical ends and maxims are disengaged from religion, in virtue of their inherent worth; and such an independent position of Ethics, whether it appear worth attaining or not, is simply beside the mark in the case of Jesus. His moral and His religious principles are so closely interwoven, His moral feeling, e.g. His love for man, is so inseparable from the religious basis of His belief in the Fatherhood of God, that it would seem to be impossible to delineate His 'Ethics' without at the same time treating of, say, the Kingdom of God, the Divine grace, or the final judgment. And if, nevertheless, we venture upon the task, we must never lose sight of the connecting lines that run between His ethical teaching and His religious principles.

Then there is the question whether our sources are at all sufficient for the full and accurate representation of the moral personality of Jesus. In restricting ourselves to the Synoptic Gospels, we are doing nothing more than recognizing the claims of historical science. But now, to what extent can we regard the three older Gospels as adequate sources for our theme? If we investigate the oldest of all, viz. Mark, we find that it nowhere makes any attempt to portray the Ethics of Jesus as such. In reporting His conflict and controversy with the Judaism of His time, it casts but an indirect light upon this side of His character, and that, moreover, in a series of isolated scenes. Of these the most outstanding are the Rabbinical disputations regarding the Sabbath (23-36), purity (71-23), divorce (16-17), then come the important utterances relating the conversation with the rich young man (10-12) and the 'first commandment' (1238-34). The aspects of His conception of life are vividly illustrated by such utterances as that to the paralytic (25<sup>f</sup>), about the physician and the sick (27), the true kinship (335), children (1018<sup>f</sup>), and tribute-money (1213-17). In the section dominated by the three predictions of His death (8<sup>27</sup>-1045) we have a mass of admonitions to the disciples—concerning readiness to suffer, loyalty, courage, humility, reverence for childhood, etc. We have here something of the nature of a primitive Christian catechism; not instructions (as in the Didache, let us say) for tranquil seasons and everyday life, but rather articles of war for the ecclesia militans of the persecutions, a manuale crucis.*

An entirely different kind of appeal is made by the Sermon on the Mount in Mt 5-7. In its extant form the Sermon is the product of a great programme, in which the Evangelist seeks to give a definitive and approximately complete statement of Jesus' relation to the Law, with a reference, moreover, to the representatives of the anti-legalistic standpoint, who think that He is come 'to destroy the law.' It is the purpose of the writer to convince these that Jesus, being in a general way the Fulfiller of Prophecy, is, as a lawgiver, the fulfiller of the prophecy regarding the second Moses, whom God was to raise up in the last days (Dt 18<sup>15</sup>), and who, so far from abrogating the Law, will rather consummate and even transcend it.† In our present text of the Sermon we cannot afford to ignore the work of the writer; we must draw a distinction between what its words purported to him, and what they meant in the tradition he utilized. Similarly, in reading St. Luke's version of the Sermon on the Mount, we must bear in mind that he has materially abridged his material, not alone by discarding the Jewish and preserving only the typically human elements, but by considerably transforming it under the influence of his pronounced ascetic view.‡ Both Mt. and Lk. thus throw us back upon the source of our Lord's words, in which the primitive Jewish-Christian community had grouped the Logos of Jesus for its own instruction. Hence we are forced to distinguish between the Ethics of the Evangelists and the Ethics of their source. Further, we must make a searching examination of the characteristically Lukan tradition as it appears in the parables of the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Good Samaritan, etc.; § only so shall we be justified in attempting to answer the question, What was the ethical position of Jesus? An extremely complicated critical process must thus be gone through before we use our present authorities as documents for the solution of our problem. But as it is impossible to reproduce here the details of such investigation, only the results can be stated, with references to other works of the present writer.

In an account of the Ethics of Jesus, the reader also looks for a comparison and contrast between Him and His Jewish, perhaps also His Græco-Roman, contemporaries. The fresh and original elements in His moral thought and feeling must be set over against traditional views. The favourite procedure in this connexion, that, namely, of placing His luminous figure on a background as sombre as possible, is one we cannot follow. Above all, the task of describing the ethical conditions of contemporary Judaism would take us beyond our allotted space, and is, moreover, beyond our capacity. Often as it has been tried, in more or less ingenious sketches, to reproduce some cross-section through the moral conditions of later Judaism, it has never been accomplished without subjective caprice and violent exaggeration. Nor is this result to be wondered at. It is quite impossible to describe faithfully, or estimate justly, the characteristic ethical complexion of a period so extensive as the two and a half centuries from B.C. 180 to A.D. 70, of the inner history of which we still know so little, which is represented by a literature so multiform, and of which the dominant currents veered so much—a period, moreover, meagrely equipped with first-rate or distinctly recognizable personalities. True, we can observe the behaviour of the circles from which sprang the Psalms of Solomon, we can lay our hand upon the devout breast of the pseudo-Ezra, we can enter into the spirit of the author of 1 Maccabees or Sirach; but how diverse are even these few casual types, and how impossible is it to make them fit into one harmonious picture! What, again, do we know of the Ethics of the Greek or Sadducean party? What vogue had the Essenes among the people? Are the Pharisees of the Psalms of Solomon identical with those of the time of Jesus? And, above all, what significance for our problem has the Talmud, so often named, so little known? Here, in sober truth, so many unsolved enigmas await the historian, that one cannot but marvel at the assurance of those who, in face of them all, are ready to sketch the Ethics of later Judaism as a foil for the Ethics of Jesus. We for our part renounce any such design. We have not the daring to institute a comparison between the Ethics of Jesus and the complicated historical phenomena of the period, and then, as impartial judges, to proceed to measure out the light and shade. We content ourselves with the question How did Jesus regard and estimate the Judaism of His time? It is beyond doubt that His moral sense was chafed by many things, and in particular by Pharisaism, and that a material part of His teaching was formulated in antagonism to the Rabbis. We too must feel this antagonism, if we are ever to understand Him.

If, again, we are required to answer the question as to wherein consists the new and original element in the Ethics of Jesus, we are brought to a complete standstill. In His conflict with Rabbinism He is in close alliance with the Prophets, and is certainly not outside their influence. But to assume that a great gulf is fixed between the religion of the Prophets and Psalmists and that of later Judaism, is to forget that a goodly part of both the Prophets and the Psalms was a contribution of the post-exilic period, and, above all, to overlook the fact that these writings form the background, or, we might even say, the native soil of Judaism. However profoundly they were misunderstood, still it was not possible to prevent the intermittent welling up, from the soil, of many a copious spring; and many a document of the later period bears clear testimony to their influence. Thus we can do full justice to the moral creed of Jesus only by giving adequate consideration to the circumstance that He lived in intimate sympathy and steadfast accord with the noblest and devoutest thoughts of His people's Bible. Hence, if in view of these facts we inquire concerning the originality of Jesus, the result will be a surprise. For we shall find that of almost all His ethical ideas there are anticipations, precedents, and even parallels in the OT, as also in the Judaism. A mere glance at any of the parallels, such as that of Wetstein, will be sufficient to purge us of the notion that the greatness of Jesus consists in the novelty of His ethical teaching. Theology is still tainted with the propensity, inherited from Rationalism, to see in the production of ideas the all but exclusive factor in the making of history or the progress of man. It often fails to realize how plentiful ideas are in times that are spiritually alive, or how in all ages humanity has been enabled to take a step in advance only by the personality who, with unwonted enthusiasm, absorbed, elaborated, and formed anew from his individual experience the choicest products of his age. So with Jesus; His ideas as such are neither so novel nor so revolutionary as to create a new world; they derive their procreative virtue solely from the fact that He made them His own, lived them, and died for them.

From these preliminaries we turn to the exposition proper, premising that we shall on principle forego any systematic or exhaustive development of the material from a fundamental idea. Our purpose is to survey the figure of Jesus in its specific operation, and what better situation for this can we find than the actual scene of His conflict with His environment? It was the friction with that environment which kindled the fire within Him; it was His unconformity with it that gave Him the conviction of His peculiar heritage. Just as His anger at the profanation of the Temple moved Him to an involuntary display of feeling superior to, and more delicate than, His fellows, so His collision with the leading representatives of Judaism evokes from Him not merely an indignant criticism, but also a manifestation of His own inherent character. In this connexion the great discourse against the Scribes and Pharisees in Mt 23 (cf. Lk 11<sup>39-52</sup>) furnishes invaluable testimony. Even if its artificial form (cf. the seven Woes) be derivative, still the majority of the sayings grouped in it, so expressive of individual feeling, so original in form, unmistakably show the characteristic touch of Jesus. In any case the discourse clearly reveals the distinction He drew between Himself and the Rabbis, and the traits in the latter by which the disciples, filled with His spirit, felt themselves repelled. It is, above all things, the unsuitability of their practice, the contrast between the reality and the appearance, which is so vividly brought out in the metaphor of 'whited sepulchres' (23<sup>27</sup>). The supreme business of the scribes,—to which they devoted themselves with surpassing zeal,—the instruction of the people in the law of God (23<sup>4</sup>), they discharged in such a way as to superinduce the very reverse of what was intended: instead of bringing men into the Kingdom (23<sup>13</sup>) they kept them out by imposing intolerable burdens, in the bearing of which they render not the slightest help. It is, in fact, evident that the work of leading men to God was for them a matter of no consequence whatever. A glaring light is thrown likewise upon the propaganda of the Pharisees (23<sup>15</sup>): under their tutelage a proselyte becomes a child of hell, twice as wicked as themselves (or, as it was probably spoken at first, twice as wicked as he was before). These severe verdicts show at a glance how highly Jesus estimated the sacred and responsible office of the leaders of the . . . they so direly abused. With keen me . . . He passes sentence . . . complacent and . . . ather- . . . who, on the prete . . . zeal, with 'long prayers' devour widows' houses (Mk 12<sup>40</sup>). H . . . the unscrupulousness of their . . . training out gnats and swallow: . . . squeamish and strait-laced in regard to trifles, in the great moral matters lax for themselves and lenient to others: even to the point of . . . which has ever since been the practice . . . clothed with authority (23<sup>24</sup>). In . . . scribes . . . they keep cup and platter clean, but are indifferent to the nature of the contents; non olet, even though it has been accumulated by selfishness and greed, and is gorged with unbridled . . . (23<sup>25</sup>). While with painful precision . . . to the tithing of the meaneast garden produce they neglect the weightiest matters of the . . . mercy, and faithfulness (23<sup>23</sup>). In harmony with Mic 6<sup>8</sup> He enunciates the principle that the primary imperatives of morality surpass all ceremonial prescriptions in importance and urgency—a truth which, though ancient, needs ever to be emphasized anew. There can be no dubiety as to the purport of 'justice' or 'mercy' in this . . . they are meant to cover the great social . . . of the ruling to the . . . perversion of the Law . . . of widows and orphans, the relief of the poor. As to the third injunction, the Evangelists do not seem to have been sure of its meaning; for 'faithfulness' St. Luke (11<sup>42</sup>) substitutes the 'love of God,' probably interpreting piety as 'faith' (as EV). Without doubt, however, Jesus intends this word also to connote a social and moral duty, viz. trustworthiness and candour in human relationships.

Mt. has in this verse inserted a clause (23<sup>23b</sup>) which should almost certainly be deleted from Lk. (11<sup>42</sup>), as a gloss involving a certain modification of the command. The preceding verses might lead us to infer that Jesus did not only set less store by the ceremonial law, but was willing to do away with it altogether. This, however, says St. Matthew, is not His meaning: 'These (moral duties) ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.' The Evangelist is, in fact, keenly solicitous lest Jesus be regarded as hostile to the Mosaic law, as he shows also in 5<sup>17</sup> and the prefatory words 23<sup>21</sup> (neither passage in Lk.), implying that the teaching of the scribes is good, but that their works are evil, since they do not practise what they preach. Taking into consideration the writer's date and point of view, we can quite well understand the words; but we naturally ask whether this conciliatory and conservative attitude towards the ceremonial law truly represents the mind of Jesus?

The words about the cleansing of cups and platters, and about the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin, certainly sound so contemptuous as to compel us to ask whether Jesus set any value whatever upon the ceremonial side of the Law, and, in particular, upon the special casuistical precepts of the scribes. The question may be answered provisionally and generally: Jesus was not a Pharisee, and this means that His attitude towards many of the scribal maxims was a dissentient one; He was not a Judæan, but a son of the Galilæan peasantry, who knew how to evade the authority of Pharisaic doctors and lawyers, and who were, in consequence, liable to the curse merited by those who 'know not the law' (Jn 7<sup>49</sup>); and, accordingly, He regards Himself and His followers likewise as above the Pharisees' rules about purifying. But we also find explicit remonstrances against the 'traditions of the elders' so dear to the scribes (Mk 7<sup>8-13</sup>); He characterizes them . . . as th . . . (EV 'tradition'). . . thus . . . with the commandments of God. In this He evinces His independent attitude, for a genuine Pharisee could live only by the belief that the additions to and amplifications of the Law, even if devised by human teachers, were yet expressive of God's will. But Jesus goes still further, affirming . . . that in their concern for these traditions . . . reject, pervert, and even make void the commandment of God (7<sup>8-13</sup>). He gives as an example the gross case of one who evades the plain human duty . . . is parents by the manoeuvre of . . . Temple the money he might hav . . . : once the fateful word 'Corban' is spoken, then every penny so consecrated belongs to God, and is, as sacred property, interdicted from all secular uses, and so from that of the parents. It is bad enough that a son should so act; but that jurists and theologians should permut him henceforward to turn his back upon father and mother, should declare his pledge to be inviolable, and refuse to 'release' him from it, is neither more nor less than the disannulling of the Fifth Commandment.*

Now the assertion that the great moral demands of God's law are of more importance than any ceremonial . . . is primarily directed only against the . . . and prescriptions of the Rabbis; in . . . is a principle which threatens . . . of the Mosaic system. Already in the OT we see the strained relations between prophetic piety and priestly legality: both again and again at variance. In the personality and preaching of Jesus the prophetic religion reappears with unparalleled force and clearness, and braces itself to the work of . . . Levitical ceremonialism.

In . . . he ritual law as of equal validity belongs to the very nature of the priestly theocracy: the moment the former is placed on a higher level the whole edifice becomes insecure. In this reference St. Mark preserves a short but pregnant saying of Jesus (7<sup>15</sup>), viz. 'There is nothing from without the man that going into him can defile him, but the things which proceed out of the man are those which defile him.' As He is here speaking of clean and unclean meats, He says, 'Nothing going into the man,' but He might equally well say, and certainly means, 'Nothing from without the man coming to him,' i.e. coming into contact with him. But this is the reverse of what stands in the Law. For the whole complex of the Mosaic-Levitical legislation rests upon the postulate that a man is defiled by outer contact and contamination, or by partaking of certain foods, i.e. that he thereby becomes separated from God, is excluded from the sanctuary and segregated from the sacred community. Now the principle enunciated by Jesus cuts the ground from under all the particular commandments of the ceremonial law. It carries indeed, a dissolving and explosive force. But His standpoint differs from mere rationalistic 'illumination' by having a profoundly religious basis. Jesus had so intense a conception of man's relation to God as an ethical one, that He could not tolerate the thought that God would exclude any one from His presence merely because he had touched a corpse or eaten swine's flesh. It is the evil will, the impure heart, the false nature, that separate men from God.

All this, of course, is self-evident to us; but when Jesus uttered it, and acted upon it, He found Himself at cross purposes with the most exemplary personages of His generation, and compelled to resist the drift of an age-long tradition. He raised His voice not only against the scribes, but against the very spirit of the Law they expounded. Moreover, in actual practice, His bearing towards the Law is quite unconstrained. He adds to the exceptions already conceded by the Rabbis (e.g. works of necessity on the Sabbath), and allows both Himself and His disciples a certain freedom, without taking counsel of the specialists. When challenged He appeals to the example of David (Mk 2<sup>23-24</sup>). It is manifestly gratifying to the narrator that Jesus was able to justify His action so adroitly by the methods of Rabbinical exposition. But this is only an ex post facto justification of which the disciples certainly were not privy, as they plucked the corn: they had not had time for deliberation, simply to avail themselves of the freedom which their Lord Jesus had made a matter of course. We learn the true meaning of Jesus from the twofold declaration subjoined by St. Mark (2<sup>27</sup>). Doubtless what the writer means is that the 'Son of man,' i.e. the Messiah, is Lord of the Sabbath, and can absolve His disciples from its observance; but originally the saying must have run thus: 'Man has full power also over the Sabbath,' which, again, is of essentially the same tenor as the other, viz. 'the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath.'* This saying, too, is more than an article in a confession; it is really a declaration of war against Mosaism. Scribe and doctor regard the Law as an end in itself, and obedience to it as the final purpose of human life, even if such obedience involve sacrifice, and indeed the surrender of life itself. But the assertion of Jesus that the Law is given for man's sake, as something designed for his benefit, and the inference that he is free from it whenever its observance conflicts with his welfare, proceed from an entirely different point of view, and have far-reaching implications. The rigid and doctrinaire aspect of the Law is thus cancelled; its behests are viewed as means for the realization of God's purposes of love towards men. All this, however, shows but the birth-struggle of an entirely new religious conception, destined in its further growth to do away altogether with the Law as law. A similar instance is the declaration (Mk 10<sup>11</sup>) that the Mosaic regulation regarding divorce was a concession to the Israelites' hardness of heart, and that it stands in antithesis to the statute originally promulgated in Paradise, which alone is the will of God and the precedent for man. Here the Mosaic ordinance is represented as something adventitious, as merely marking a stage meant to be left behind.

* Cf. J. Weiss, op. cit. i. 1, p. 124

The boldness of Jesus in thus essaying to make a distinction within Scripture itself, and to discriminate between the law of God and human accretions, is of great moment for us. He has recourse to a mode of criticism which might be called subjective, but which really merits the attribute prophetic. This 'Prophet,' filled with Deity, this great religious Personality, ever directly conscious of His nearness to God, does not shrink from giving judgment as to what is the actual purpose of the Most High. Just as He fervidly announces the royal benignity of God towards both the evil and the good, just as He confidently speaks to the contrite of the Divine forgiveness, and without misgiving assures the wretched of the Divine succour, so He also undertakes, in face of the law of Moses, 'that which was spoken to the fathers,' to set forth a new law, in the glad conviction that He is thus expressing the will of God. Hence it is a misapprehension of the tenor and scope of the 'antitheses' in the Sermon on the Mount to imagine that in these Jesus is merely impugning the prevailing exegesis of the Law, or merely endeavouring to bring to light the real design of its promulgation. No; the rhythmical repetition of the phrase, 'But I say unto you,' makes it perfectly clear that Jesus is here reaching beyond Moses. And this corresponds to the historical situation; for instance, the first two enactments, viz. regarding murder and adultery; it is clear that what Jesus means is that God asks more than mere abstention from these crimes: He demands perfect self-control and integrity of heart. The unheeded moments when the animal nature starts up in a fit of anger or of impure desire are grievously sinful in the eyes of God, as well as the actual misdeeds.

The religious-historical situation is as follows. The Jewish people were under a theocracy, and for them the Law of Moses was by no means restricted to moral matters; it was at once a penal code, an order of legal procedure and a manual for the priesthood. Now it is the bane of a theocratic constitution that the Divine law, ingrafted as it is upon common life, tends to lose its majesty and vitality. It has to adapt itself to the varied conditions of existence by means of saving clauses and casuistical methods; and such a régime fosters above all the notion that the will and judgment of God reach no further than the arm of the civil magistrate, and that it is only the completed act, and not the intention, that God brings to judgment. Thus the moral relation of man to God sinks to the level of a legal one. Such a deterioration and externalizing of the religious life must all but inevitably ensue when its regulation and guardianship are committed to priests and jurists. It is the 'Prophet,' however, who now takes up the word. With incisive force He makes it clear that God looks upon the heart, the thought, the secret motions of the soul, and brings these things before His judgment-seat, and that the sin of intention passes with Him for no less than the overt act. To assert such equivalence of thought and deed may seem to us almost to overshoot the mark; for we rightly place a high value upon the self-command which keeps desire from passing into action. But the apparently partial view is to be regarded as the natural reaction of the heart and the soul against the legalistic ossification and formalism of religion.

The verdict of Jesus upon divorce points in the same direction. The argument upon which He bases His prohibition of the separation permitted by Moses merits our attention. The statute laid down in Paradise is to be preferred, as the law of God, not merely in virtue of its great antiquity, but also on intrinsic grounds. When a husband puts away his wife, he places her in a position of moral jeopardy; for, should she associate herself with another man, whether in a second marriage or in a passing act of immorality, he thereby completes the dissolution of the first marriage, which hitherto was legally binding. The noteworthy element in this utterance is not that the ruptured matrimonial union is still binding, but in particular that the man is morally responsible for his wife even after his dismissal of her; he must bear the guilt of her sin. Such is the only judgment possible, if marriage is to be regarded not merely as a legal bond, under the control of the civil magistrate, but as a moral covenant, for whose inviolability men are responsible, not to one another, but to God. See DIVORCE.

The profoundly irreligious subtlety of the lawyers is also exposed in Jesus' prohibition of oaths. First of all He shows that the evasions and periphrases by which those who swear hope to escape the danger of profaning God's holy name, are of no avail; every oath is and remains an adjuration of God.

* See J. Weiss, op. cit. I. 1, p. 87.

But more: to the finer religious feelings, every oath is a gratification and irreverent bringing down of the Most High into the sordid and trivial concerns of the hour—the grossest case being that of the impulsive Oriental who puts his head in pledge, as if he had power over life and death, his complete dependence upon God, and death proceed from Him alone. Thus Jesus supersedes the scrupulous anxiety and the petty evasions of the Rabbis by a much deeper religious motive: the oath, in truth, is but an element in a world under the domination of sin and Satan (Mt 5<sup>37</sup>), and he who feels God's majesty and purity in his inmost soul will have a sacred fear of bringing God upon such a scene, and will honour Him best by the plain and simple word of truth.

Of an entirely different character are the two final antitheses, viz. those relating to non-resistance and love of enemies, as given in Mt 5<sup>38-42</sup>, 43-48. In the foregoing precepts we have simply the utterances of a more earnest moral sensibility; here we have the language of exultant and heroic enthusiasm, not meant to be judged by commonplace standards. In lieu of the typically Jewish principle of retaliation, which was applied both in legal and in personal affairs, viz. 'eye for eye, tooth for tooth,' Jesus demands the entire renunciation of self-defence or self-vindication. Nay more; it is not mere tranquil endurance that He enjoins, but a readiness to present to the assailant the other cheek, to give more than what is asked, to surrender the cloak as well as the coat. These injunctions differ from those of St Paul in Ro 12<sup>19-21</sup> in that they involve no thought of shaming or overcoming the adversary by pliancy and patience. St Paul would seem, in fact, to have interpreted the words of Jesus in the practical didactic sense of certain Stoic admonitions. But the distinctive feature of the passage in the Sermon on the Mount is that the demands are made without any reason being assigned or any subordinate aim proposed, precisely, indeed, as if their authority must have been perfectly self-evident to the disciples. A theological exegesis has barred the way towards a right understanding of them by always starting from the question what these words mean for us, and how we shall obey them. And as a literal obedience to them seems to us impossible, recourse is had to new interpretations and modifications, by which the strength of their tremendous claims is sapped. Instead of putting such questions, we would rather ask how the words are to be understood in their original setting, and how Jesus came to utter them in that form. Now it is evident that their essential feature is a thorough aversion to the principle of retaliation by which the ignobler instincts of the Jewish national spirit were sustained and intensified. This aversion on the part of Jesus is so strong that the most emphatic utterance of the opposite quality is for Him precisely the right thing; a consummate zeal for forbearance and renunciation whets His demands to their sharpest point. But what is the source of this enthusiasm? It is no mere reformer of Jewish morals that speaks here, no legislator for centuries yet unborn, but the herald and apostle of the imminent dissolution of the world and of the Kingdom of God already at the door! Hence a man can prepare himself for that day in no more worthy or more earnest way than by the surrender of all the present life is based upon—earthly repute, business capacity, personal property: all these are but obstacles and fetters. Whoso renounces willingly, whoso suffers gladly—he is truly free, and ready for the great day that is at hand. We can appreciate and vindicate the words only if we interpret them by the mood appropriate to the twelfth hour.

* If so, they take our life,
Goods, honour, children, wife—
Let these things vanish all!

The same enthusiasm pulsates through the words about love to enemies. It is unnecessary to paint the background of Judaism too black, to cavil at the Jewish 'love to one's neighbour' as narrow and partial, or even to lay too great a stress upon the 'hatred of one's enemies,' in order to feel that the demand of Jesus is not only something 'new,' but also a puissant, transcendent, superhuman ideal. He says, indeed, that the man who so acts will be perfect even as God is perfect, a worthy child of the all-loving Father. Now it cannot be sufficiently urged that this obligation to love one's enemies neither issues from nor can be fulfilled amidst the normal emotions of everyday life. If it is to be real to us, i.e. truly realized and not merely assumed, then it demands an enthusiasm which, if not 'contrary to the nature,' is certainly 'beyond the power' of the natural man. None but the possessor of a spirit profoundly religious and animated by the love of God could possibly love his enemies, at all events according to the special sense which Jesus gave to the universal command, viz. 'Love them which hate you, pray for them which despitefully use you.'

Our view of this supreme command of Jesus thus brings us to the twofold law of love (Mk 12<sup>29ff</sup>, Lk 10<sup>25ff</sup>). It is beyond question that neither this conjoining of love to God and love to one's neighbour, nor the focusing of the whole Divine law in that 'summa' is a specifically original thought of Jesus. According to the oldest form of the narrative (Lk 10<sup>25ff</sup>),* He elicits it from a scribe. Possibly enough there were earnest and pious Rabbis who, amid the jungle of thousands upon thousands of precepts, sought for some leading idea, and found in the requirement of love to God and man the nucleus of God's primal revelation: but none of them was ever able to carry such unification and simplification into full effect. Here again it is not the mere thought which matters, nor the fact that Jesus gave it utterance. The great thing is that, over and above, He furnished in His own life such an embodiment of the Law as carries conviction to all. In His personification of the ideal He welded the love of God and the love of man in an indissoluble union, in which they might foster and strengthen each other. He embodied the ideal in a perfect form, and stamped it upon the soul of the race. Since His day it has become obvious that the highest form of religion is that from which there radiates the soothing, genial, meek, and helpful love of mankind; obvious also, that that love of man is the deepest, the truest, the most enduring, the most exacting, which has its roots in the depths of a soul pledged to the Most High, a soul which is permeated by His truth, and has been apprehended by His holy and gracious will.

EUNUCH (εὐνοῦχος; σπένδων occurs sometimes in LXX [see Gn 37<sup>36</sup> and Is 39<sup>7</sup>, with which, however, cf. the corresponding passage 2 K 20<sup>18</sup>]).—From the single reference in the Gospels (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>) to the barbarous Oriental practice of mutilating individuals for certain purposes, we gather that the existence and purpose of eunuchs as a class were not unknown to the Jews of the time of Jesus. The religious disabilities under which men, deformed in this way, laboured, had the effect of making the practice (. . . εὐνοχίσθησαν ὑπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων) abominable to the Jews (Dt 23<sup>1</sup>; cf. Lv 22<sup>24-25</sup>). On the other hand, Josephus informs us that eunuchs were a normal feature of the courts of the Herods; and from him we also learn what share they were at that time supposed to have taken in the family (Ant. xv. vii. 4), and what base purpose . . . subserved (Ant. xvi. viii. 1).

The passage containing the reference to eunuchs is . . . Matthew, and seems to be added to the Markan section, which deals with the question of divorce (Mk 10<sup>2-12</sup> = Mt 19<sup>3-9</sup>), from a source unknown to the author of the latter (see Tischendorf's Synopsis Evangelica<sup>7</sup>, § 113, 'Interrogantibus de . . . respondet'; and Wright's Synopsis of . . . in Greek, 'Anonymous Fragment', p. 267). The remark made by the disciples touching the difficulties arising out of Jesus' interpretation of the law of marriage, shows the widespread influence of the lax teaching on this subject characteristic of the school of Hillel (see art. ADULTERY, p. 30<sup>a</sup>).

It matters not for our purpose whether in the reply of Jesus τὸν λόγον (v. 11) be connected with οὐ συμφέρει γαμήσαι (v. 10), or, which is more intelligible to the present writer in the light of what follows, with the primal law quoted in v. 5 (ἐνεκα τούτου . . . οἱ δύο εἰς σάρκα μίαν). All men are not in a position to accept a hard and fast rule. Men are constituted differently by nature, or adventitious circumstances produce artificial dissimilarities. There is no question as to the law of nature. The married life is the norm of man's condition; and the union effected thereby transcends every other natural bond, even that of filial affection. At the same time, Jesus would have His hearers understand that there are cases, and these numerous enough to be taken seriously into account, where the rule does not hold. It is not granted* to every man to be in a position to fulfil the functions of the married state. Here it is of interest to note that Jesus, in speaking of three classes of 'eunuchs,' was making a distinction well known to those He was addressing. Moreover, the metaphorical use of the word in speaking of the third class finds also its place in the teaching of the Jewish Rabbins (cf. Lightfoot's Horæ Heb. et Palestinæ and Schoegen's Horæ Heb. antiq.).

The well-known case of Origen, who literally crucified himself for the kingdom of heaven's sake,<sup>8</sup> to which he afterwards seems to make pathetic, though incidental, reference in his commentary (in Matt. tom. xv. 1 ff.), was not the only example of a perverted interpretation of these words of Jesus. The Palmyrene tractate Shabbath (152a) contains a reference to a eunuch of this class (cf. Midrash on Ec 10<sup>7</sup>), and the Council of Nicæa (c. 1) felt called on to deal with the danger as did also the Apostolical Canons (c. 21), and the Second Council of Arles (c. 7). The common sense which thus prevailed amongst the guiding spirits of the Church is enhanced when we remember that the disabilities attaching to self-mutilation had no reference to those who were eunuchs from their mother's womb, or who 'were made eunuchs by men' (see for examples of both, Eusebius, HE vii. 32; Socrates, HE vi. 15; Sozomen, HE viii. 24; cf. Bingham's Ant. iv. 9).

It is not without significance that in the conversation of Jesus with His disciples no mention is made of any word of condemnation by Him of the horrible practice of emasculation. The complete lack of the sense of the dignity of human life, so characteristic of the ancient world, and the absence of the feeling of human brotherhood, found expression in no more terrible way than in this consequence of the laws of slavery. Yet Jesus refers directly neither to the institution of slavery nor to this, its result. He prefers the plan of instilling principles which lead by the processes of thought . . . to the . . . that God hath . . . of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth' (Ac 17<sup>26</sup>; cf. Lk 10<sup>29ff</sup> 4<sup>25ff</sup>, Mt 8<sup>11</sup> = Lk 13<sup>29</sup>). It is as if He had an unconquerable belief in the power of the human mind ultimately to accept the truth, and to reject, finally and for ever, what has been false, in its provisional solutions of life's problems.

And as it was with His treatment of this form of cruelty practised by the strong upon the helpless, so it was with the mutilation of the body self-inflicted for so-called religious purposes. To the present writer it seems probable that Jesus made a conscious and deliberate reference to this practice (see Driver's 'Deuteronomy' in Internat. Crit. Com. on Dt 23<sup>1</sup>). Here, too, there is no condemnation expressed of an inadequate and artificial method which was the outcome of a legalistic conception of moral purity. It is rather by His positive teaching on the subject of purity that we are led to understand (ὁ δυνάμενος χαρπὲν χαρπεύει) what are the lines along which we must move in order to reach the goal of perfect self-renunciation. There is another and a more excellent way of obtaining the mastery of the sexual passion than by literally 'cutting off' the offending fleshly member (cf. Mt 5<sup>28f</sup>, where the words βλέπω and ὀφθαλμός point to the radical character of the treatment insisted on by Jesus). The peculiarity about His method of treating this particular question is its loving cautionness. It is not possible for all, but it is possible for some, to obtain as complete an ascendancy over this strong instinct as if they were physically sexless; while, of course, the resultant moral victory is of infinitely more value than the merely negative, unmoral condition . . . self-emasculation. Those who adopt . . . 'make themselves eunuchs' with a definite purpose in view (διὰ τὴν βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν), and the interests which are created by that purpose are so absorbing that neither time nor opportunity is given to the 'fleshly lusts which war against the soul' (1 P 2<sup>11</sup>).

The clear and definite teaching of Jesus on the subject of marriage will help to elucidate the words under review. The Divine idea (ὥστε οὐκέτι εἰσὶν δύο ἀλλὰ μία σὰρξ, Mk 10<sup>8</sup>), on which He laid special stress, involves mutual effort and restraint. It is not possible but that even under the most favourable circumstances duties will arise which will prove irksome, and not less so because they are peculiar to the married state. Indeed, the Hebraistic ἔσονται εἰς (Heb. לִשְׁנֵי) emphasises the truth that perfect union does not follow at once on the consummation of marriage. It is a gradual process, and, because it is so, it involves some amount of mutual self-sacrifice. The cares and responsibilities which follow in the wake of those who are married necessarily mean a . . . for both of time and attention which may . . . the work given to some to do (cf. 1 Co 7<sup>32f</sup>). It is for this reason that these find themselves debarred from ever undertaking the duties attaching to marriage. They voluntarily undertake eunuchism because they are completely immersed in, and engrossed by the work of 'the kingdom of heaven.' There is no need to suppose, as Kern does, that Jesus is here deliberately referring to Himself and to 'His Rabbis.' At the same time, we are able to see . . . the highest expression of that 'blessed eunuchism' (Bengel, Gnomon of the NT, in loc.) which renounced all earthly ties for the sake of the work He was given to do* (cf. Jn 17<sup>4</sup>); and if St. Paul, in view of a stern emergency, felt justified in enjoining upon even the married the necessity of adopting this condition (see 1 Co 7<sup>29</sup>), we know that he was speaking from the plane on which he himself stood (cf. 1 Co 9<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>7</sup>). At the same time, the apparent harshness of his asceticism is softened by his repeated expressions of regard for the gift peculiar to each (ἕκαστος χάρισμα). See, further, art. MARRIAGE.

EVANGELIST.—Although the word 'evangelist' (εὐαγγελιστής) does not occur in the Gospel, it justly finds a place in this work because it is the name commonly given to the authors of the four Gospels. The verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, from which the substantive 'evangelist' is derived, signifies to proclaim good tidings. The corresponding verbs in Hebrew and Aramaic (Dalman, NW B. s.v. 77, Words of Jesus, 103) sometimes bear only the meaning 'announce,' but their prevailing import is to announce good tidings. There is no reason to doubt that the Aramaic word or words used by our Lord in the NT passage to mankind described it as 'the proclamation of good news.' Hence in Christian circles the term acquired the specific sense of 'the gospel.' The word 'evangelist' is not found in classical Greek or in the LXX, nor has it as yet been found in any papyri. So far as our present knowledge goes, it belongs only to the NT and to the Christian era. It is used thrice in the NT, and in none of the instances is its meaning doubtful. It is applied to Philip (Ac 21<sup>8</sup>), either because of the labours described in Ac 8, or because he belonged to a class or order of Christian labourers whose function was to go abroad proclaiming the gospel to those who had not heard it. In the Epistle to the Ephesians, 'evangelists' are mentioned (4<sup>11</sup>) as an order or class, among the Apostles and prophets, and before pastors and teachers. Here, too, the most probable view is that those spoken of were missionary preachers. Again, Timothy is charged by St. Paul (2 Ti 4<sup>5</sup>) to 'do the work of an evangelist.' Whether Timothy is here called an evangelist is open to discussion, but the nature of the work he is bidden to perform is clear: he is to visit new communities in order to preach the gospel to them. The force of the word suggested by its etymology is, therefore, the meaning attaching to it in the three passages of the NT where it is found. This is the view of all modern scholars of any note. Some of the Greek expositors, misled by the usage of their own time, assigned, at least to the passage in Ephesians, the sense which it came to bear subsequent to NT times, that of author or writer of a Gospel; but this interpretation has no supporters to-day.

How did this second sense arise? Can any links of connexion be traced between the earlier and the later signification? Is it possible to ascertain the time at which the later usage began? These questions are best answered by studying the references to the term in the Church History of Eusebius. It is obvious at once that Eusebius had two senses of the word before him; that he knew that its original import was a preacher of the gospel, but that this meaning had been largely displaced by another, that of a writer of a Gospel. Speaking generally, the Church in the age of Eusebius understood by the word 'evangelist' the writer of a Gospel, though scholars like Eusebius himself were aware that in earlier times it had borne another meaning. Accordingly the references of Eusebius to the original force of the term are all associated with the earlier history of the Church. Thus he relates that the Apostle Thomas sent Thaddæus to Edessa as a preacher and evangelist of the Gospel of Christ (HE I xiii. 4). Again he speaks of a man who in the age of Trajan started out on long journeys and performed the office of an evangelist, filled with the desire to preach Christ to those who had not heard the word of faith, and to deliver to them the Divine Gospels (III. xxxvii. 2). Once more, he tells that Pantænus was a herald of the gospel of Christ to the nations of the East, and that he was sent as far as India. For, he adds, there were still many evangelists of the word who sought earnestly to use their inspired zeal, after the example of the Apostles, for the building up of the Divine word (V. x. 2). In all these passages 'evangelist' evidently denotes an itinerant preacher of the gospel. On the other hand, when Eusebius names John the evangelist (III. xxxix. 5), he is speaking of him as the author of the Gospel, and the reference to the voice of the inspired evangelists and Apostles (II. iii. 1) is to be explained in the same sense. How, then, was the transition effected from the one of these significations to the other? How was the title transferred from a preacher to a writer? There are those who think that even from the first the term denoted not so much a travelling preacher in general as a preacher who set himself to relate the life and words of Jesus. Teaching and specific teaching regarding the addresses delivered by Jesus and the miracles He performed was a characteristic of the evangelist from the first, hence there is little difficulty in realizing how the title passed from those who related to those who wrote our Lord's life, the latter meaning being only the natural development of the former. Even a scholar like Meyer (in Ac 21<sup>8</sup>) affirms that the chief duty of the evangelist was to communicate to his hearers historical incidents from the ministry of Jesus, and some later writers of all schools have embraced the same view. It is believed to be corroborated by the language just quoted from Eusebius regarding the distribution of the written Gospels by evangelists. But there is nothing to show that the first evangelists of the Church made special use of the facts of our Lord's life, and that their teaching or preaching differed in this respect from that of the Apostles. The wide acceptance in which the words 'evangel' and 'evangelize' are used in the NT is adverse to this conclusion. The earliest Gospel was not the life of Jesus, but the message of salvation. To preach the gospel was necessarily to preach Jesus, but not to give any sketch of the life of Jesus such as is found in our four Gospels. Nor is the view probable in itself. A modern missionary relates the life of Jesus as he sees it expedient, but he does not make the communication of the details of that life to his hearers one of his chief duties. The same freedom was doubtless exercised in the earliest ages of the Church. One evangelist would tell less and another more of the life of Jesus as he preached. Even the same evangelist would vary the amount of detail he gave regarding the life and words of Jesus according to the varying needs of his hearers. Beyond all doubt most of the addresses delivered by the evangelists were largely occupied by an account of the career of Jesus, and especially of His sayings and His miracles; but this was true of every person who sought to propagate Christianity, and not distinctive of the evangelist as such. Further, it is difficult on this hypothesis to explain the fact that the original signification of 'evangelist' as a preacher was current long after the Gospels had obtained the fullest recognition within the Church. The evangelists carried the Gospels with them if they were fortunate enough to possess copies; they referred to the Gospels as the authorities for the life of Jesus, yet they retained their title. There is no evidence that the later meaning drove out the earlier so long as the Church . . . lists or called them by this name . . . the two meanings flourished side by side!

If this argument is sound, the origin of the later import of the term must be sought in another quarter. That quarter is not remote. The Church possessed from early days four narratives of our Lord's life, and to these first the term 'Gospel' and subsequently its plural 'Gospels' was applied. It was necessary to refer to these writings individually, hence there arose the practice of speaking of the Gospel according to Matthew and the like. Matthew being regarded as the author of the Gospel bearing his name. Very soon it became necessary to find a term to serve as a common designation of the writers of the Gospels. No more suitable word for this purpose could be found than 'evangelist'. It was already in use in the Church; it stood in the closest affinity to the word 'evangel' or 'gospel,' which had acquired by this time its new sense of a written work, and the term once applied proved so useful that it immediately became popular. Just as the term 'gospel,' which denoted a spoken message, an announcement of good news, the Christian good news, was current long before the written books called Gospels existed, and nevertheless gave its name to them, so also was it with the term 'evangelist'. By a similar transition it became the designation of the writers of the Gospels. After the word 'Gospel' was used to denote a written narrative of the life of Jesus, the extension of the meaning of the word 'evangelist' to designate the author of such a work was only a question of time.

Is it possible to ascertain the date at which the term was first used in this specific sense? The evidence at present available shows that it was thus employed by Hippolytus and by Tertullian. The first occurrence of the word is in the de Antichr. of Hippolytus (56), where St. Luke is spoken of as 'the Evangelist.' The generally accepted date of this treatise is about the year 201 (Harnack, Chronol. ii. 214; Bardenhewer, Altkirch. Lit. ii. 521). Tertullian in his adv. Praes., which has been dated to the years 213-218 (Bardenhewer, ii. 304; Hippolytus, ii. 286), speaks of 'the preface of John the Evangelist' (21, cf. 23). This evidence shows that towards the beginning of the 3rd cent. the term was used to denote the authors of the Gospels. The incidental manner in which both writers employ the word suggests that its use was not new. But this inference is precarious, and it is possible that Hippolytus was the first to employ it, and that Tertullian imitated his example and gave it a Latin form. The absence of the word from the opening chapters of the third Book of Irenæus will appear to some to confirm the opinion that the use of the term is later than his time, but the proper conclusion is that a decisive verdict is impossible. All that can be affirmed with confidence is that, as the term 'Gospels' was admittedly used in the plural in the time of Justin Martyr (Ap. i. 66), the employment of the term 'evangelist' to describe the author of a Gospel could have begun in his age, but that the first occurrence of the word is half a century later.

In dealing with the topic 'Evangelist,' it is desirable to add a brief notice of the animal symbols by which the Gospels are designated. This symbolism makes no appeal to us to-day, but it enters so largely into early Christian art and poetry that some acquaintance with it is necessary. The symbolism is founded on the description of the four living creatures in the Apocalypse (4th). The first creature is stated to have been like a lion, the second like a calf, the third had the face of a man, the fourth was like a flying eagle. It occurred to Irenæus to compare, if not identify, these with the four Gospels, and it was therefore necessary for him to ascribe a particular symbol to each of the four. To him John is the lion, Luke the eagle, Matthew the man, and Mark the eagle (Hær. III. xi. 11). The mode of illustration pursued by Irenæus strikes us to-day as forced and profitless, but the example he set was followed by Hippolytus (Hipp. I. ii. 183, Berlin ed., cf. Bardenhewer, Altkirch. Lit. ii. 532). In a Syriac version of the comparison, but advances to its own. Now the lion is Matthew, the man Mark, and the eagle John. The symbolism spread throughout the Church, but there was a difference of opinion as to the connexion between the four living creatures and the separate Evangelists. The authority of Jerome (Preface to Matthew), despite the divergent opinion of Augustine (Cons. Ev. i. 6), was followed in the West, and furnished the basis of the best known, as it is the most represented in Christian art, and as it is the noblest hymn of Adam of St. Victor, 'Psallat chorus corde mundo' (Trench, Sacred Latin Poetry, 67). To this view, St. Matthew is the man, St. Mark the lion, St. Luke the calf, and St. John the eagle.

EVENING (ἡ ὥρα [sc. ὥρα], ἑσπέρα) — The Babylonians divided the day into equal parts by sun-watches. The 'sixty system' of minutes and seconds was in vogue among them. Among Syrian peoples also, it is likely, the same system prevailed. No trace of this is found among the Israelites, however, in the pre-exilic period. Another marked difference between the Babylonians and the Israelites is noteworthy. With the Israelites the day began at sunset, with the Babylonians at sunrise. It is at least certain that the reckoning from eve to eve became the exclusive method in Israel with the triumph of the Law. A kindred system prevailed among Arabs, Athenians, and Gauls (Pliny, N. H. ii. 79). It was customary, too, in ancient Israel to distinguish between the 'first evening' and the 'second evening.' It is not certain just where they drew the line (Edersheim). The phrase 'between the two evenings' (bēn ha'arbayim), Ex 16<sup>12</sup> 29<sup>20</sup>, as a designation of the time of the daily evening offerings, clearly meant some period in the late afternoon. The 'first evening,' it is generally thought, began about 3 p.m. and extended to sunset; the second began at sunset and continued into the night.

In Mt 14<sup>25</sup> 28 we have the word 'evening' used in both senses. 'When it was evening' (v. 18) clearly refers to the first evening (cf. Lk 9<sup>13</sup> and the day began to decline; Bible Union Ver.). For when the disciples suggested that Jesus send the multitude away, that they might go into the villages and buy themselves food, Jesus said they need not depart; and the feeding of the five thousand and the sending away of the multitude followed before 'he went up into the mountain apart to pray.' Then a second evening is spoken of in the words: 'And when the evening was come, he was there alone' (v. 23). In the latter case Jesus, after seeing His disciples off (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>), evidently sought the mountain solitude, as He did on other occasions, to spend much of the night in prayer (v. 25). This second evening, then, was evidently verging on the night.

EVIL. — It is customary to distinguish three kinds of evil: (1) what Leibnitz called meta-physical evil, i.e. the incompleteness and imperfection which belong more or less to all created things; (2) physical evil, i.e. pain, suffering, and death; and (3) moral evil, which is a vicious choice of a . . . able being.

1. . . . EVIL.—The writers of the OT were, for the most part, deeply impressed with the doctrine of God's transcendence; i.e. His unique and unapproachable majesty, power, and holiness. Hence the . . . ness of all earthly and . . . theme with them: 'Bel . . . of heavens cannot contain thee,' etc. (1 K 8<sup>27</sup>); 'What is man that thou art mindful of him?' etc. (Ps 8<sup>4</sup>); 'All flesh is grass,' etc. (Is 40<sup>6</sup>); 'The inhabitants of the earth are as grasshoppers' (v.<sup>22</sup>). Compared with God's ineffable holiness, the holiest of created beings are, as it were, unclean. In heaven the holy angels veil their faces in God's presence (Is 6<sup>3</sup>). The holy sanctuary of Israel required to be purged every year from its pollutions by the blood of sacrifices (Lv 16<sup>16</sup>). All human righteousnesses are as a polluted garment (Is 64<sup>6</sup>).

In the NT there is naturally less stress laid upon the Divine transcendence. The theme of the NT writers is the love of God shown in the Incarnation. The eternal Son of God has taken upon Him human nature, to raise it into fellowship with God, to clothe it with the garment of the Divine righteousness, and to cause it to partake of the Divine immortality. Yet the awful and unapproachable character of God, and the infinite abyss which separates the Creator from the highest creature, are never lost sight of. He alone is the Absolute Good (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>); He alone may lawfully be worshipped (Mk 12<sup>29, 32</sup>, Rev 19<sup>10</sup>).

2. PHYSICAL EVIL.—(1) . . . —Christianity may be classed as a moderate optimism. It is not an exaggerated optimism, like that of Leibnitz, who maintained that this is the best of all possible worlds, or of Malebranche, who . . . as the best conceivable. Christ would certainly not have endorsed the hyperboles of Pope, that all discord is harmony not understood, and all partial evil universal good; yet He must certainly be classed among the most pronounced teachers of optimism. As against all forms of Gnosticism and Dualism, He maintained that the Universe, in all its parts, is the work of a perfectly good Creator, and that, in spite of all . . . to the contrary, it is under the guidance of His fatherly Providence: 'Behold the fowls of the air,' etc. (Mt 6<sup>26</sup>); 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?' etc. (Mt 10<sup>29</sup>); 'He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good,' etc. (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>). The optimism of Jesus is particularly evident in His eschatology. He taught that in the end good will triumph over evil, and evil be absolutely excluded from the Universe: 'In the end of the world the Son of man shall send forth his angels,' etc. (Mt 13<sup>41</sup>, cf. 24<sup>31</sup> 25<sup>30, 41</sup>). He believed that there is a glorious goal to which the whole creation is moving. In one passage He calls it Creation's new birth (παλιγγενεσία, Mt 19<sup>28</sup>); but His usual term for it is the 'Kingdom of God' (or of Heaven): 'Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father' (Mt 13<sup>43</sup>). For the coming of this Kingdom every Christian is directed to pray (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>) and to watch (24<sup>42</sup> 25<sup>13</sup>). That the material Universe will be glorified along with the spiritual is not distinctly stated by Jesus, but is a necessary inference from the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which was undoubtedly held by Him (Mt 5<sup>29</sup> 10<sup>28</sup> etc.), though in a more spiritual form than was generally current (22<sup>30</sup>).

(2) Pain, sorrow, disease, and death.—The Gospels lend no countenance to the view that moral evil is the only genuine evil, and that physical evil is not evil in the strict and proper sense. Pain, sorrow, disease, and death were regarded by Jesus as things which ought not to be, and He spent much of the time of His public ministry in combating them. 'He went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed with the devil, for God was with him' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). He committed the ministry of healing to the Apostles and other believers: 'Preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils; freely ye have received, freely give' (Mt 10<sup>7</sup>). Death was regarded by Jesus as in an especial sense 'the enemy.' Its ravages affected Him with acute distress (ἐνεβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι καὶ ἐτάραξεν ἑαυτὸν . . . ἐδάκρυσεν, Jn 11<sup>33ff</sup>), where consult the commentators) Three of His most striking recorded miracles were victories over death (Mk 5<sup>41</sup>, Lk 7<sup>14</sup>, Jn 11<sup>43</sup>); and His own resurrection, . . . the angelic . . . of the Apostles . . . death, and . . . and incorruption to light' (2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>).

. . . causation of physical evil, there is a great difference of point of view between the OT and the NT. The OT upon the whole (Job 1. 2 is an except . . . sical evil as inflicted directly by God . . . the NT, however, physical evil is . . . of the devil. God tolerates, permits, and overrules, rather than directly inflicts it. Pain and disease and death belong to the devil's kingdom, not to God's; and their universal prevalence is a sign of the usurped authority over the human race of 'the prince of this world.' The preaching of the Kingdom of God and the emancipation of mankind from the devil's thralldom were consequently accompanied by an extensive ministry of healing, and Christ appealed to His miracles as evidence that 'the kingdom of God is come upon you' (Lk 11<sup>20</sup>). The NT does not, however, deny that physical evil is often inflicted by God for disciplinary or retributive purposes. He 12<sup>6</sup> lays especial stress upon the wholesome chastening of affliction which all the sons of God receive. Examples of penal or retributive affliction are Mt 9<sup>2</sup> (palsy), Mt 23<sup>35</sup> (war and massacre), Jn 5<sup>14</sup> (constitutional infirmity), Ac 5<sup>6</sup> (death), Ac 13<sup>11</sup> (blindness). Jesus, however, strongly protested against the idea that every calamity is to be regarded as a punishment for individual sin. This specially Jewish idea, which Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar develop at length in the Book of Job, is definitely condemned (Lk 13<sup>4</sup>, Jn 9<sup>3</sup>).

3. MORAL EVIL.—(1) Its nature and origin.—The only possible way of accounting for moral evil without making God the author of it, is to attribute it to the abuse of free will on the part of created beings, angelic, or human, or both. The doctrine of free will has been severely criticised in all ages by the advocates of philosophical and theological necessity; but it has, notwithstanding, held its ground, and is at the present time the faith of all the most progressive races of mankind. That it was held by Jesus does not admit of reasonable doubt. Thus He habitually spoke of the power which men possess to resist God and to frustrate His benevolent intentions: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, . . . how often would I (ἡθελῆσα) . . . and ye would not' (καὶ οὐκ ἠθελήσατε, Lk 13<sup>34</sup>; cf. Jn 5<sup>40</sup>, Mt 11<sup>20ff</sup>). His general invitations to all men to be saved imply the same doctrine. 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest' (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>); 'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself' (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>).

The reality of Christ's Libertarianism is not disproved by certain passages in the Gospels which seem at first sight to speak the language of Predestination, or even of Determinism

This difficulty, however, on deeper consideration is not incompatible with a wider view of the Evolutionary process. There were several stages in the known pathway of the upward movement from the star mist, in which the process began, to man, in whom terrestrial evolution finds its consummation, when fresh phenomena appeared which cannot be explained in terms of those that preceded; e.g. at the emergence of organic life, of sentience, and of ethical self-consciousness. So far, no rational bridge of theory has been found to span the gap between these diverse facts. It is, therefore, not unthinkable that there was in the Person of our Lord a superhuman element, which in Him mingled with the stream of human life, and started a new and higher line of evolution for the race. The question whether this was so in point of actual fact is thus purely one of evidence, and, if historically substantiated, must be accepted whether we are able ultimately to 'account' it theoretically or not. Our canons of Evolution must make room for all the facts of life and history, or be finally discredited as inadequate and obscurantist.

4. Jesus Christ not explicable on naturalistic grounds—It is certain also that, so far, the innumerable efforts which have been put forth during the past century, from almost every conceivable point of view, to give a naturalistic explanation of the life and Person of Jesus Christ, have not, in whole or in part, disposed of this problem. There is no single theory or combination of theories which meets with general acceptance, even among those who take up a purely critical attitude; and when we confront them with the Christian consciousness which is the historical outcome of faith in the Divine nature and mission and work of Christ, they fail utterly to carry conviction. (This last fact has so far not had its true place in the settlement of the problem). The Personality of Jesus Christ is thus still the unsolved problem of history, and it is more than doubtful if any fresh treatment of the question will succeed in bringing Him within the categories of an Agnostic Evolutionary Philosophy.

5. Cur Deus Homo?—The Theistic Evolutionist has next to face the old question of the purpose and aim of the Incarnation in the cosmic order. 'Cur Deus Homo?' becomes a more burning question than ever in a scheme of Evolution. Two hypotheses present themselves, according as we take an a priori or a posteriori point of view. The first may be called the Evolutionary hypothesis. The first makes the Christ the consummation and crown of the process of cosmic Evolution, and postulates the Incarnation as its necessary climax; the second occupies the old standpoint of Christian theology from the beginning—that, whether the Incarnation lay implicit or not in the process, it was historically conditioned by the fact of the sinful and 'fallen' state of humanity. These two views are not incompatible with each other, and both in combination are quite consistent with the teaching of Scripture. The upward striving of humanity for union with its Creator as personal finds its historical witness in (1) the universal function of worship, prayer, and sacrifice, and (2) the Hebrew prophetic vision of the Ideal Servant of Jehovah, and the Messianic hope; and it suggests, as God is personal, a corresponding act of self-revelation in a historical Person who would unite in himself the human aspiration and the Divine manifestation; while the gradual revelation consummated in the coming of Christ, and recorded in the Old and New Testaments, is in line with all the known laws of God's evolutionary methods. On the other hand, it is unquestionable that the Scripture doctrine of the Incarnation is indissolubly associated with the redemptive purpose of God. This is its historical aim and character: 'He was manifested to take away sin' (1 Jn 3<sup>5</sup>, cf. 1 Co 5<sup>18</sup> 19 etc.). While, therefore, we are justified on a priori grounds in believing that 'the Incarnation was no after-thought' (Dale, Fellowship with Christ, and Other Sermons, pp. 10, 252 f.), but that it would have taken place even if sin had not entered the world, the form which it took was historically conditioned by the actual condition of humanity; i.e. it was teleological in its manifestation.

6. Three pregnant aspects of the historical Incarnation.—Mc Clure points out the significance of the historical Incarnation as a redemptive and perfective process may be described under three pregnant headings. It was (1) the realization of the type of humanity—Christ as the Ideal Man; (2) the achievement of a great restorative or saving work—Christ as the sufficient Saviour; (3) the beginning of a fresh departure in the upward Life of the Race—Christ as the Founder and Head of His Church, and the source of the higher spiritual movements of history. These three aspects of His work are specially related to His human life as our great Exemplar; to His Cross and Passion as our Sacrifice and Reconciler; to His Resurrection and Ascension into the unseen world, and His influence through the Holy Spirit on the individual and wider life of mankind.

(1) As the Ideal Man, Jesus revealed the possibilities and determined the type of perfect manhood for the race. This was done under special conditions, and at a given moment of time and place, race and environment. He was born in Palestine, during the reign of Herod, 'of the seed of David' (Ro 1<sup>3</sup>); i.e. He was a Jew, conforming to the special conditions and demands of His own times, and limited by the intellectual and social horizon of His day. There was much, therefore, in the outward life of Jesus which was temporary and local in its manifestations. Yet beneath all this we see a true revelation of the Perfect Man, universal in its scope yet appealing to each individual man as his exemplar: Ideal in its purity and holiness, yet the living with common life; beyond the reach of idealization yet quickening each of His followers to the realization of his own individual life and personality. Looked at from within, His life is depicted in the NT as one of perfect and joyous obedience to the Father's revealed will (Jn 5<sup>19</sup>), unbroken communion with Him (10<sup>30</sup>), and supreme self-forgetfulness in the service of His brethren (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>). Whatever transcendent elements may have been hidden (and sometimes patent) in the spiritual consciousness of Jesus, He is represented as truly temptable (Mt 4<sup>1</sup> etc.), as depending entirely on Divine help and grace for conquest over temptation (Jn 5<sup>19</sup> etc.), and as having triumphed absolutely over evil, so that He was 'without sin' (He 4<sup>15</sup>). The impression left on those who knew Him best by this life of filial obedience and service was that it was of unique beauty and attractiveness (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>), and yet capable of emulation by all, under their own individual conditions of life and service (1 P 2<sup>21</sup>). And this NT picture of Jesus as the Ideal Man is one that the noblest minds of Christendom throughout the centuries have accepted. There is no historical character that has ever threatened to divide the sovereignty of Jesus in the spiritual homage of men; and such 'detached' thinkers as Goethe and Carlyle, Strauss and Renan, Richter and Lecky have borne unqualified testimony to the solitary and unapproachable grandeur of the moral ideal incarnated in Him.

'In the fulness of the time'.—From the Evolutionary standpoint the question is often asked, whether such an ideal life must not necessarily have appeared as the consummation of the spiritual development of the race,—as the last link in the series. This a priori objection is of course, however, even in the lower ranges of organic life, and as regards men, it is demonstrably lacking. To Scripture, appeared in the 'fulness' of the time, and at that precise moment in the order of history which enabled Him best to fulfil His mission (Gal 4, He 1-4). The best minds of previous ages had been eagerly looking forward to a manifestation of the saving power of God (Mt 13:17, Lk 24:25, Ac 3:18, 1 P 1:10 etc.), and, if the actual historical manifestation of the Messiah for whom they waited was not in accordance with their literal expectations, it was the true fulfilment of the spiritual movement of which their ideals and prophecies were a part. In Evolutionary language, the 'embryonic' Christ of prophecy became in due course the fully manifested life of the Son of God. Or, we may say that the right time for an ideal to be actualized in the life of humanity would be, at that precise moment when the capacity for conceiving and dealing had been sufficiently developed to appreciate it; this, it would be wasted, later, it would have been belated, and Jesus came and embodied the Ideal Life just when humanity was capable of profiting by it, and of being stirred by it into higher aspiration and endeavour.

(2) The Redemptive work of Christ finds its place in an Evolutionary scheme of thought on cognate lines. It presupposes that a lapse, or at least a fatal halt, had occurred in the upward spiritual development of the race, and that all further progress was barred by the poisoning of the wells of progress by sin (see FALL). Before humanity could be released from this disability, which had interfered with the free interflow of the Divine and human fellowship, in the unrestricted action of which alone the spiritual life of man can develop, a process of reconciliation and at-one-ment with the source of the spiritual Life must be initiated. Apart from this, the presentation of an Ideal Life would be a mockery, for its realization would be impossible. Thus, as already stated, the historical Incarnation took a redemptive form, and it was consummated by an act of supreme sacrifice.

The process of 'progress by sacrifice' (see Bruce's Providential Order, ch. xii p. 345 ff.) is deeply embedded in the organic world. The so-called cruel Law of Natural Selection is but another name for a rudimentary fact which finds its finest and most perfect realization in the Cross of Christ. In nature we find three grades or stages of this process. (1) The sacrifice of the weak for the strong, as when those creatures in every made 'subservient to another's good' in the way of food. (2) The sacrifice of the strong for the weak, exemplified in the action of the imperious parental instinct which is manifested by every living species above the very lowest, and which gradually increases in its range and its delicacy till it arrives through the higher mammals at man. Here there is more or less conscious self denial on the part of the vigorous and capable organism on behalf of the feeble and weak. (3) The sacrifice of the good for the bad, as in the case of the necessity of things) only among ethical persons, and exemplified as one of the most potent forces for the life of humanity. These various stages of the sacrificial movement in Nature do not exhaust the meaning of the Redemption wrought through the Cross of Christ, which has a unique character of its own as an 'atonement', but they serve to link it with the world-process and to make it intelligible. (See further on this subject, Evolutionary Ethics, through Ch. vi, in ch. iii, pp. 283-306)

(3) The Risen Life of our Lord initiates the final stage in the spiritual evolution of the race, and completes the range of forces that work for the perfecting of the human soul in its upward march. The Resurrection and the Ascension indicate a fresh epoch in the history of mankind, both in the individual soul and in the progress of the race. A new type of character emerges, and a new community is born; each marking a higher achievement and indicating a further advance in spiritual life. Historical Christianity rests on the faith that Jesus rose again and passed into the unseen world, whence He continues to send forth His personal influence and saving grace by His Spirit among believers, and through them into the world at large. This He does first by quickening individual men in the New Life, enabling them to conquer sin, and to put forth the distinctive Christian virtues; and, secondly, by the perpetual renewal and invigoration of the Christian society or Church, which is composed of those believers who join in brotherly love in the active service of mankind in the name of their spiritual Head. This new force has leavened and in a measure created modern Western civilization, and though it has so far not succeeded in permeating it, it is with the Christian spirit, its finest and most potent elements are those derived from the Christian Ideal and ennobled by the Christian graces. The slowness of the world's spiritual development along Christian lines is undeniable, it is marked by ages of stagnation and by periods of unmistakable reaction; this, however, is entirely consistent with the laws of evolution through all its upward stages, and is inevitable when we remember the potent forces of spiritual degeneracy and inertia which oppose its march. It is clear that there is no rival directive or inspiring ideal among mankind that could take the place of Christ. The future of the world lies with Christ, unless it is to fall back on a lower stage of ethical and spiritual development on its way to utter disintegration and decadence. Since the lines of cosmic development have so far been on the whole in an upward direction, and since there is no indication that the Christian ideal has lost its hold on the best minds of the race, or is less potent than formerly in regenerating individual souls and in inspiring the Church to ever fresh activity and influence, there is reason for confident belief that at last the race as a whole will be raised to the Christian level, and that the future is with Him of whom it is prophesied that He shall reign in undisputed sway over the affections and command the obedience of all mankind (Ph 2:9-11, Rev 11:15 etc.) See, further, art. INCARNATION.

Ascent
of Man.      incarnation      of Man.

EXALTATION.—1. The exaltation that the lowly in heart alone attain, is exceedingly prominent in both the Old and New Testaments. The lowliness of Christ was one of self-humbling, but He knew that it would end in the highest exaltation. In the Song of Mary at the Annunciation this principle of Divine exaltation is stated: 'He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree' (Lk 1:52). In Christ's parable of the Wedding Feast, He insists on this as against the self-seeking and pride of the Pharisees, who love the chief seats in the synagogue, and the foremost places at feasts. It is better to take the lowest room, and wait till the host shall give their proper place to one's virtue and dignity, by saying, 'Friend, come up higher' (Lk 14:10). The behaviour of a Christian among his fellows should have regard to this principle. He is not to be forward to lay claim to that which may even be his right (cf. Mt 23:12 || Lk 14:11-13).

2. One of the clearest words of Jesus in regard to His own exaltation is Jn 12:32. Some Greeks came desiring to see Him. Our Lord came in this desire of theirs something prophetic of the future ingathering of the Gentiles into His kingdom, and He lifted up His heart to His disciples as to the Gentiles, which He hoped to conquer the hearts or men. He made somewhat enigmatic reference to His death. He knew that the hour had almost come for the suffering of the lowly Son of Man. But it is necessary that the seed which is to produce a great harvest must first die. So it is a law of the Kingdom of God that life in this world must be sacrificed, it need be, that life eternal may be gained as a permanent possession. After the Saviour's life of service, the due reward will be honour from God. When the heavenly voice spoke, the Saviour was consoled and uplifted by the thought that He would cast out the prince of this world, and be lifted up (ὑψωθῶ) as a victorious One. It was a prediction of His final triumph over sin and death, and His eternal reign over all men. The outwardly shameful death of the cross would be His true exaltation as the world's Saviour. By the identification of outward events with their inward meaning, He advances men's thoughts to the idea of His exaltation to heaven as the victorious One. This anticipation of Jesus is the for the Church's fully developed Exaltation. 'He rose again from the dead on the third day. He ascended up into heaven, He sitteth on the right hand of God the Father, He shall come to judge the world at the last day.' See artt. ASCENSION, JUDGMENT, SESSION.

After the predictions of His suffering, He always spoke of His future glory. He would rise again from the dead (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>). 'In the regeneration the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory' (19<sup>28</sup>). 'The Son of man shall come in the glory of His Father with his angels; and then shall he render unto every man according to his deeds' (16<sup>27</sup>). In the sayings in the Gospel of John there are many lofty statements as to His heavenly glory (cf. 14<sup>3</sup> 17<sup>24</sup> etc.). DAVID M. W. LAIRD.

EXAMPLE.—

A LINGUISTIC USAGE.—The word 'example' (or 'ensample') occurs 15 times in the AV and 17 times in the RV of the NT. In the two versions it stands 7 times (1 Co 10<sup>6</sup>, Ph 3<sup>17</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>12</sup>, Tit 2<sup>7</sup> RV, 1 P 5<sup>3</sup>) for τύπος, once (1 Ti 1<sup>16</sup> RV) for ὑποτύπωσις, once (1 Co 10<sup>11</sup>) in adverbial phrase for τυπικῶς, 5 times (Jn 13<sup>15</sup>, He 4<sup>13</sup> 8<sup>5</sup>, Ja 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>8</sup> 1<sup>4</sup>) for ὑποτύπωσις, once (Ac 20<sup>33</sup>) as partial rendering of ὑποδείκνυμι, once (1 P 1<sup>19</sup>) as partial rendering of ὑποδείκνυμι, and once (1 P 1<sup>19</sup>) as partial rendering of ὑποδείκνυμι. The present purpose Mt 13<sup>9</sup> falls quite outside the scope of this study. The word is a 'specimen', 'an (illustrative) example'—in this instance set forth as a warning, though of itself this simple form hardly suggests either imitation or shunning, as ὑποδείκνυμι does. The other passages all more or less illustrate the topic in hand. Besides these, there are, of course, many other passages which, though not employing the term 'example', are no less relevant and significant than these.

Thus, whether the 'example' or 'pattern', 'type', has generally an important bearing upon our topic. Primarily, the 'mark', 'impression' of a stroke or blow (Jn 20<sup>23</sup> 'print'), hence 'figure', 'image' (Ac 7<sup>43</sup>), τύπος is generally 'pattern', 'type', 'example'. Sometimes the example is by way of warning, as 1 Co 10<sup>11</sup>. Generally, however, it is an example to be imitated. A corresponding case is to be ascribed to ὑποδείκνυμι (1 Ti 1<sup>16</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>10</sup>). In the latter passage Hofmann's and Cremer's interpretation 'Abbild' seems hardly warranted. Timothy is to hold fast the 'type' of doctrine which he had received from Paul, and thus 'type' is not regarded as Timothy's copy of Paul's, but as something which had now become common to both;—ὑποδείκνυμι is a concrete illustration or exhibition, designed for imitation or for warning—generally the former. In one instance in the NT ὑποδείκνυμι is used for after-representation (Ger. Abbild)—ὑποδείκνυμι is a 'writing-copy' (model), to be imitated by the pupil. Hence an example set before one for close imitation. This is perhaps the most vivid of the NT illustrations of Christ's exemplarship. The term is used in the NT to indicate imitation; though both the context and the general teaching of the NT will save us from the error of conceiving Christ's example as something formal and external.

Among the other terms which give expression to the idea of Christian example, the most prominent are ἡμιμοῦν and ἡμιμιμνήσκω (AV 'follow' and 'follower', RV 'imitate' and 'imitator'). The verb occurs 4 times in the NT (2 Th 3<sup>9</sup>, He 13<sup>7</sup>, 3 Jn 11), in one of these in connection with ἡμιμιμνήσκω. The noun occurs 6 times (1 Co 11<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 18<sup>24</sup>, He 6<sup>12</sup>—at 1 P 3<sup>12</sup> the reading ἡμιμιμνήσκω is to be rejected), in every instance signifying 'imitator' in the ethico-religious sense. In Eph 5<sup>1</sup> we find ἡμιμιμνήσκω used, in He 6<sup>12</sup> it is the exemplary saints who are to be imitated, in 1 Co 4<sup>16</sup> St. Paul exhorts to the imitation of himself, rather than to turn away from him, inasmuch as he was their father in the faith. In 1 Co 11<sup>1</sup> he bids his readers imitate him as he imitates Christ. In 1 Th 1<sup>6</sup> it is 'imitators of us and of the Lord,' while in 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup> it is 'the churches of God in Judaea,' of whom the Thessalonians had become imitators.

Jesus' disciples about Him generally bade men (ἀκούετε οὖτοι), in one instance, Mt 4<sup>19</sup>, ἀκολουθεῖτε μοι. Primarily the expression means no more than 'to accompany' as a disciple, and yet manifestly it became, in our Lord's use of it, one of the most characteristic and intensely significant expressions of the idea of discipleship in all its deepest import. So where Christ bids the rich young ruler sell all that he has and 'come, follow me,' or in the words on 'taking up the cross and following,' and elsewhere (see esp Mt 19<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>38</sup> 16<sup>24</sup>, Jn 12<sup>26</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>). The verb is not found in the Epistles, except at 1 Co 10<sup>4</sup>.

Co 15<sup>49</sup>, 2 But those passages also which represent Christ as the image of God must be taken no less into account, for Christ's claim to an unconditional personal authority is expressly based upon the fact that He is the image—the εἰκών—of the invisible God (Jn 1<sup>3</sup> 1<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>, Col 1<sup>15</sup>). In the last passage the word is ὁμοειδής. In this connection mention must be made also of the expressions 'children of God,' 'of your Father,' 'of the Highest' (Mt 5<sup>9</sup> 45, Lk 6<sup>35</sup> 20<sup>36</sup>). Also in the Epistles the filial relation is made to imply the following of the example of God in Christ (e.g. Eph 5<sup>1</sup> 8, 1 P 1<sup>14</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>21</sup>).

Besides the terms already considered, which give more or less formal expression to the Christian idea of exemplarship, there are many more, which—some of them in the most elementary and untechnical terms—no less definitely express the same thought. The very idea of discipleship in our Lord's teaching involved the idea of the personal exemplarship of the Master (see esp Mt 10<sup>24</sup> 25, Lk 14<sup>28</sup> 27 33, Jn 13<sup>35</sup> 15<sup>8</sup>). The same thought is expressed in the words 'Ye have not so learned Christ.' In He 11<sup>1</sup> the 'Forerunner' is mentioned in the enduring of Christ is the 'life,' and as such is the 'light' of men (Jn 1<sup>9</sup> 9 14 18, cf. 3 Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>35</sup> 36 46, 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>). He is Himself 'the way,' etc. (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). Believers are to 'put on' Christ (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>, Gal 3<sup>27</sup>, Eph 4<sup>24</sup>, Col 3<sup>10</sup>). The Christian's 'walk' is to be according to Christ (see esp Jn 13<sup>35</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> 26, Eph 5<sup>2</sup> 8, Col 2<sup>6</sup>). Finally,—for an exhaustive study of the linguistic usage is not intended,—many of the most characteristic expressions of the thought of exemplarship in Christianity are effected without the use of any peculiar terms. The word 'as,' or something else equally simple and direct, often best serves the purpose (e.g. Mt 5<sup>48</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>15</sup>, Eph 4<sup>32</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>4</sup> 47-51).

B. THE DOCTRINE.—i. THE EXAMPLE OF CHRIST.—1. In the teaching of Jesus no truth is more essential than that God the Father Himself is the original and absolute example for all personal life. The Law is holy, for it is the expression of the will of God. But the letter apart from God's immediate personal will is dead. As Jesus expounds the Law, the disciples learn to look through the particular commandment to the personal will of the living God. It is not enough to keep the commandment in the most scrupulous fashion, as if it were something standing apart and complete in itself (Mt 5<sup>20</sup>). We have to do directly with God Himself. His will and personal nature are our sole and absolute standard (Mt 5<sup>48-49</sup>). In answer to the young ruler who asked what good thing he should do in order to have eternal life, Jesus refuses to be regarded as one who might propose some novel good—some good other than that which is already known from God. Apart from God there is no good (Mt 19<sup>16-17</sup>). To love God is the first commandment; and the coming of His kingdom and the doing of His will should be man's first concern (Mt 22<sup>38</sup> 6<sup>10</sup> 33).

But Jesus does more than point to God as the absolute standard for personal life. He comes to make God known. It is not enough to know that God is the standard, so long as God's nature is unknown. So Jesus was sent as the perfect revelation of the Father (Jn 14<sup>9-10</sup>). Not that God was hitherto unknown: what the Jews worshipped they knew (Jn 4<sup>23</sup>). Jesus came to complete the revelation of God. He gives a perfect interpretation of the mind and will of God, and in His own Person perfectly exemplifies that mind and will. He is conscious of perfect accord with the will of the Father (Mt 12<sup>50</sup> 5<sup>10</sup> 11, Jn 5<sup>19</sup> 43<sup>4</sup> 6<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>29</sup> 14<sup>31</sup>). His words and acts He has learned from the Father, even from the Father's example (Jn 8<sup>38</sup> 5<sup>17-19</sup>). This principle determines His whole treatment of the Mosaic Law. The inevitable limitations of mere statutes He overcomes by an appeal to the Divine example and order (as in the case of the law of the Sabbath and the law of marriage, Jn 5<sup>17</sup>, Mt 19<sup>4-9</sup>, in the latter case appealing also to Scripture as well as to fact). And because He knows God as the Son knows the Father—immediately and perfectly (Jn 7<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>55</sup> 10<sup>15</sup>, Mt 11<sup>27</sup>), and because He perfectly fulfils the will of God, Jesus demands an unconditional following, which shall consist, not in copying the outward form, but in the most inward appropriation of the ruling principle of His life (Mt 7<sup>21-27</sup> 28<sup>30</sup> 10<sup>32-39</sup> 11<sup>28, 29</sup> 20<sup>24-28</sup> 16<sup>24-25</sup> 20<sup>22</sup> 26<sup>39</sup> 31<sup>9-22</sup> 19<sup>21</sup>, Jn 15<sup>8-10</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>35, 36, 44-50</sup> 13<sup>12-17</sup> 15<sup>4-7</sup> 17<sup>21-23</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>). He does not set Himself forth as a substitute for the Father, but as the One who knows God and teaches us to know Him. He is the Light of Life, the Way, the Truth, the Life, the visible manifestation of God (Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 14<sup>6, 9</sup>). Christ's claim to absolute authority (which expressly included the judgment of the world, e.g. Jn 5<sup>22</sup>) is based not upon His prophetic office alone, but upon that unity of word and deed which constituted the perfect revelation of the will of God. Jesus' own Person was not left out of His gospel (cf. Harnack's statement, Wesen des Christentums, p. 91: 'Nicht der Sohn, sondern allein der Vater gehört in das Evangelium wie es Jesus verkündigt hat, hinein'). Not, indeed, as one doctrine among many, nor as an addition to the doctrine of the Father, did Jesus present the truth of Himself. But He claimed to be the unique embodiment and exemplification of the Father's will. Yet He is more than mere example. He does not merely show the way; He is the Way. At the same time He is the Truth and the Life. He gives not only the perfect example but also life-power. In this sense, therefore, Jesus, even according to His own teaching, is more than an element in the gospel: He is the very essence of the gospel.

2. Christ's demand of an unconditional personal following is reproduced in the Apostolic preaching. But after Christ's passion, resurrection, and exaltation, the thought of His example is expanded and heightened. The Christ who is the perfect revelation of God's holy love (e.g. 1 Jn 4<sup>9, 10</sup>), while His exaltation, coupled with the gift of His Spirit, affords assurance that the coveted likeness to Christ and the promised sharing of His glory shall be realized (e.g. Ro 8<sup>2, 29-30</sup>). The thought of Christ as our example is so variously and abundantly applied by the NT writers, that it will suffice here to notice particularly only the more characteristic passages. The concreteness of the revelation in a personal life is most frequently and most strikingly set forth by St. John (Jn 1<sup>4</sup> 14<sup>18</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup> 4<sup>2, 3</sup>). Jesus is the perfect example of the life of faith, even its Author and Perfecter (He 12<sup>2</sup>). He was tempted like as we are (2<sup>9-18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>), and is the perfect pattern of patient endurance of all temptation, even unto death (3<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>37</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>11</sup> 2<sup>21-23</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>; cf. Gethsemane and Calvary in the Gospels). He is our example of mercy and forgiveness (Eph 4<sup>32</sup>, Col 3<sup>13</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>10</sup>); in self-denial and humble service (Ph 2<sup>5-7</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>, Ro 15<sup>2, 3, 7</sup>); in meekness, gentleness and forbearance (2 Co 10<sup>1</sup>, Col 3<sup>13</sup>, Eph 4<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>24</sup>); in the love that sues labours, and dies for others (1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>11, 15</sup>, Eph 5<sup>2, 25</sup>, Gal 6<sup>2</sup>, Ph 2<sup>37</sup>); in holiness and purity (Eph 4<sup>20-22</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>15</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>). And then, more broadly, believers are exhorted to 'put on Christ,' or 'the new man,' renewed after Christ's image (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>, Eph 4<sup>13-15</sup> 24, Col 3<sup>10, 11</sup>, Gal 3<sup>27</sup>), and to 'walk' in, or according to, Christ (Eph 5<sup>8</sup>, Col 2<sup>6</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>6</sup>). The highest destiny of believers is to be made like Christ (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). In this connexion the significance of those passages in which Christ is called the image of God (Col 1<sup>15</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>, cf. Jn 1<sup>14</sup>) should not be overlooked; for God has given us this perfect revelation in a Person just in order that we might find in Him our true example and archetype.

In addition to these and all other specific expressions of the thought of Christ's exampleship, there stands the great fact that the whole picture which the Evangelists drew of Jesus was made under the powerful influence of the twofold conviction that He was the image of the Father, so that by Him we know the 'Christ-like God,' and that He was the Ideal Man—not an ideal creation of human fancy, but the Ideal-Real come from God Himself.

3. It has already been briefly noted that Christ Himself as well as His disciples bore witness that He was to His own much more than mere example. The relation of His followers to Jesus is something more than that of those who are striving to copy a model. Christ is example in a deeper sense. He is not only 'type,' but also 'archetype' (e.g. 1 Co 15<sup>20, 45-49</sup>, Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, He 2<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>17</sup>). An example for personal life must in any case be a type, but a type is better than a mould for the 'own form.' Personality is interested in inward traits and principles, which are to be independently developed in the 'own form' of forms. But Jesus' relation to us is more than this. He is the 'archetype,' the 'original,' of our personal life. Now an original is not passively there to be copied; it sustains some sort of active causal relation to the copy. So Christ is our example in this more vital sense. He is at once example and original (admirably expressed in Ger. Vorbild and Urbild). As our 'original,' Christ not only (as in the case of mere examples in personal life) mysteriously impresses us, but also imparts life and power through His Spirit (Jn 1<sup>16, 17</sup> 5<sup>24-26</sup>, Ro 8<sup>2</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Col 3<sup>2, 4</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>11, 12</sup>, and many more). He who, having fulfilled the Law, is Himself the Law (Ro 10<sup>4</sup>, Gal 3<sup>24</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>21</sup>), has engaged to work likeness unto Himself in all who believe. So we may say with Augustine: 'Gave what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt.' If Christ is to us mere example, without renewing power, we are, after all, 'under law,' and not 'under grace.' 'But the Word became not only flesh, but also spirit' (Kahler, Wissensch. d. chr. Lehre<sup>3</sup>, p. 510. See Jn 20<sup>21-22</sup> 6<sup>63</sup> 7<sup>39</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>17</sup> 18). Yet the inward operation of the Spirit in producing likeness to Christ has constant and express reference to the historic Christ (Jn 16<sup>14</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>2, 3</sup>).

4. The actual validity of the picture of Christ as example implies the genuine humanness of the life and 'personality' and clearness of the picture. The example must be capable of universal application. As to the humanness of the life of Jesus, it is sufficient in this connexion to point out that the Biblical witness is without a trace of questioning as to its reality. Even the highest confessions of Jesus as the Son of God are never at the expense of the patent fact that He is truly man. As to the personality of Christ in the Gospel—while these are not biographies, as that term is commonly understood, they do give a wonderfully luminous and vivid portrait of the personal life of our Lord. Using the historical material for the sake of its content of truth, they show us Jesus the Witness, in word and deed, of the holy love of God, and as the Bearer of love and truth and life to the world. Affirming love to God and man as the supreme law. He Himself fulfilled the law, laying down His life that He might bring the Father and bring salvation to the world. And this life of unimagined self-sacrifice He led to the end, in spite of manifold and tremendous temptations, without once deviating from the path appointed by the Father. And with it all there was no ascetical denial of the values that are temporal; nor did He lose either joy or peace through His sufferings and conflicts. A marvellous openness in word and deed was ever characteristic of Him who came a Light into the world. Besides all this, here is a life that manifestly reached its goal. The course of that life had been one continual renunciation of proffered worldly advantage and success; nevertheless its end was a unique triumph. For the real end was not Calvary, but the exaltation to the right hand of God. However hidden this end may be from the unbelieving world, Christian faith sees in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ the one supreme proof that righteousness cannot fail. This is the 'conviction of righteousness' because Jesus has gone to the Father (Jn 16<sup>10</sup>). Without such a revelation of the appointed end of faith and righteousness the example would be incomplete, and Christian ethics could not maintain its ideal.

This picture of Jesus is capable of universal application. It is true the vocation of Jesus was unique. But the principles which controlled His life—His trust in the Father, and perfect love to God and man—are manifestly applicable under all possible circumstances. Such love as Christ's is the fulfilling of the Law. In one respect only is there a seeming limitation—for it is only in the singularity of Christ's example. He cannot be imitated with inward sin—He can be no model for the transformation of a sinful life. Inasmuch, however, as His life is one of renewal are not our affair—we are joined to our Lord in faith and love. This is no lack. Although 'a Jew of the first century,' Jesus is the Son of Man, in every way essential to personality free from the limitations of His own time and people. He is not less the kinsman of all peoples; He is 'the contemporary of every age.'

5. We have further to consider the practical relation of the disciple to the example of Christ. We are commanded to 'follow,' to 'imitate,' to 'put on Christ,' to 'follow in his steps.' But how are we to conceive the problem of discipleship? For, while the Church has never failed to hear the call of Jesus, 'Follow me!' the conception of discipleship has sometimes been much distorted. In the Middle Ages the dominant thought was asceticism. The ascetic imitation of Christ, of which St. Francis is the most noteworthy example, selects certain traits in His life, and by undue emphasis upon these together with a neglect of others, produces a distorted image. Then there have been enthusiasts who thought to be able to follow Christ in sharing His redemptorial work—exaggerating and perverting such passages as Ph 3<sup>14</sup>, Gal 6<sup>2</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>. Again, rationalism has made of Christ simply a model of virtues to be copied. These three are perhaps the most important types of perversion of the NT idea of Christ's exemplarship; but the three appear in various modifications and combinations. The only safeguard against such errors seems to lie in a consistent emphasis upon the integrity of the Biblical picture of Christ.

Among evangelical theologians the term 'imitation' of Christ is very commonly objected to as implying merely a formal copying of the Lord's example. The word, of course, can be so understood; but so also may the word 'following.' In any event it must be insisted upon that the words 'imitate' and 'imitator' in the NT (RV) have no such unevangelical meaning.

of a few characteristic passages: (a) Answering to the frequent affirmation of the absoluteness of Christ's authority (e.g. Mt 23<sup>8-10</sup>, Eph 1<sup>22</sup>, Ph 2<sup>6-11</sup>), there are many passages which emphasize the obligation of exclusive loyalty to Him (e.g., 2 Co 10<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>3</sup>, Col 3<sup>17</sup>, Eph 4<sup>5</sup>). (b) We are to have the mind of Christ, and to set the mind on the things above, where Christ is (Col 3<sup>17</sup>, Ro 12<sup>2</sup>, Eph 4<sup>23</sup>). (c) We shall be transformed into the image of Christ by beholding Him, though the energy that produces the result comes from 'the Lord the Spirit' (2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>—see also Drummond, The Changed Life). (d) The thought of meditation as a means of transformation, there are various passages which set forth the more strenuous elements in the following of Christ (e.g. Ph 3<sup>10-18</sup>). (e) Several passages bid us 'put on Christ' or the 'new man' (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>, Eph 4<sup>24</sup>, Col 3<sup>10ff.</sup>). This relates to the formation of a Christian character. (f) Jesus left us an example, that we should 'follow in his steps' (1 P 2<sup>21</sup>). Just as 'the mind of Christ' means inward renewal, and 'putting on Christ' means character-building, so 'to walk in his steps' means living as a motto for the exercise of Christ's principles in our social relations. (g) The example of Christ in His personal consummation is the believer's most glorious hope (Ro 8<sup>35</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>2-3</sup>, cf. Eph 3<sup>19</sup>). And the hope set within us is warranted by the earnest of the Spirit. We already have a measure of Christ-likeness—we are now sons of God, and His power is working in us to finish the work begun (Ro 8<sup>33</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>1-2</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>, Eph 3<sup>14-20</sup>, Col 3<sup>10</sup>, Ph 1<sup>9</sup>).

But all these various aspects of our relation to our Example presuppose the vital fellowship of a living faith. No 'imitation' of Christ is accorded to the gospel if it is anything else than an active aspect of the life of faith. With all its rare beauty and power, the Imitation of Christ by Thomas à Kempis (?) is hardly concerned in the plane of the perfect law of liberty. And yet, over against the widespread questioning of the universal applicability of Christ's example, as well as the indefiniteness of a religion of mere feeling, too much stress cannot be laid upon the vocation of the Christian to take up the cross daily and follow the Lord. 'This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments' (1 Jn 5<sup>3</sup>). The full gospel principle of the freedom of the Spirit being presupposed, the question, 'What would Jesus do?' (see Sheldon, In His Steps), is not unwarranted. But to walk in the Spirit implies that we are not seeking merit or virtue for our own satisfaction, but are seeking to glorify God. To do all 'in the name of the Lord Jesus'—no more comprehensive or profound expression of the fundamental law of Christian living could be conceived; and just this, after all, is what is meant by following Christ. Our task is not in the narrower sense to copy Him, but to receive His Spirit, to understand His mind, to let Him be formed within us. So we shall also 'walk' in Him.

ii. THE EXAMPLE OF THE FOLLOWERS OF CHRIST.—'One is your Teacher—one is your Master, even the Christ' (Mt 23<sup>8-10</sup>). 'Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ' (1 Co 3<sup>11</sup>). This relation of our Lord to us is unique and exclusive. He is our life. We have been renewed after His image. But just because this is so—just because He does beget in His followers a likeness to Himself—those who bear His image are fitted to be examples; only, of course, their exemplarship is relative and mediate. He who said concerning Himself, 'I am the light of the world' (Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>6</sup>), said also to His disciples, 'Ye are the salt of the earth, ye are the light of the world' (Mt 5<sup>13-16</sup>). But they are this just because they are His followers, and in virtue of what they have from Him. In various ways our Lord recognizes the value of good example; for instance, where He warns against the bad example of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23<sup>1-9</sup>). He prays for His disciples: 'As thou didst send me into the world, even so sent I them into the world' (Jn 17<sup>18</sup>). They were to be His witnesses; they were to do nothing in their own name. And yet, in order that they might be true witnesses, they must be sanctified in the truth. Their ministry for Christ must be, like Christ's own ministry, an intensely personal one. And when the Lord gives to His disciples that 'example' of humble service in washing their feet (Jn 13<sup>5ff</sup>), and elsewhere (17<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>35</sup>) shows that they shall preach Him through a life of love as well as by word, it cannot be doubted that He places a very high value on the example of His followers.

The NT writers generally, especially St Paul and St Peter, lay great stress on the salutary effect of Christian example (1 P 2<sup>11ff</sup>, 3<sup>1-6</sup>, Ph 2<sup>15</sup>, 1 Th 17<sup>8</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>16</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>1</sup>), with special emphasis in the Church (1 Co 11<sup>1</sup>). On the other hand, the danger of an example not positively evil but only doubtful is clearly set forth (eg 1 Co 8<sup>7ff</sup>, Ro 14<sup>1ff</sup>). St Paul shows the peculiarity of repeated reference to his own example. Repeatedly he presents himself as an authentic report, and in the process of doing so he gives his name, there are not fewer than eight instances (1 Co 4<sup>16</sup> 7<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>, Ph 3<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>). He commends to the Churches his own example, and a ninth (1 Ti 1<sup>16</sup>) in which the element of specific commendation is lacking. This fact is all the more significant, as St Paul is pre eminent in the energy of his human merit. 'Christ is all in all.'

It is St Paul, moreover, who declares: 'We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus as Lord, and ourselves as your servants for Jesus' sake' (2 Co 4<sup>5</sup>). There is, however, no real incongruity here. An example of a man who is a question will show that St Paul is not a man of his own person. 'Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ' (1 Co 11<sup>1</sup>). This is thoroughly characteristic. It is but another way of affirming that his sole purpose is to lead them to purest, simplest devotion to Christ. 'What then is Apollos? and what is Paul? Ministers through whom ye believed, and each as the Lord gave to him' (1 Co 3<sup>5</sup>). St Paul does not refuse to be judged as a minister of Christ and steward of the mysteries of God (1 Co 4<sup>1</sup>). He is but a servant and a witness. And if there is anything exemplary in him it is only the faithfulness and sincerity of his own discipleship and service. 'By the grace of God I am what I am' (1 Co 15<sup>10</sup>). Glorifying is excluded. And neither St Paul nor any other NT writer ever makes the Church is hindered only by the same carnal mind that caused many even in St Paul's day to 'walk according to man' (1 Co 3<sup>9</sup>).

EXCLUSIVENESS.—The term is here employed to denote that Christ's earthly ministry was confined to the people of Israel. The passages bearing on the subject leave no doubt that Christ regarded the Messianic mission entrusted to Him by the Father as limited to the Jewish nation, and in practice He kept within the limits imposed by the Divine decree. Only on one occasion do we find Him crossing the borders of the Holy Land into heathen territory (Mk 7<sup>24</sup>), and on that occasion His object was not to extend the sphere of His work, but to secure an interval of rest and leisure for the private instruction of His disciples. When the Syrophenician woman, on the opportunity presented by His presence in her neighbourhood, appealed to Him to heal her demoniac daughter, He justified Himself at first for refusing by the statement, 'I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 15<sup>24</sup>). At an earlier date, in His instructions to the Twelve in view of their missionary journey, the area of their work was sharply defined in the words, 'Go not into any way of the Gentiles, and enter not into any city of the Samaritans: but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 10<sup>5,6</sup>). It has been alleged that this restriction of His work was occasioned by want of sympathy with those outside the Jewish pale, in which appeal is made to some of His sayings, such as those in which He characterizes Gentiles as 'dogs' (Mt 15<sup>26</sup>), directs His disciples to treat an impenitent offender as 'an heathen man and a publican' (Mt 18<sup>17</sup>), and enjoins them to 'use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do' (Mt 6<sup>7</sup>).

The fact of Christ's attitude of aloofness toward the Gentile world throughout His earthly ministry is quite evident. In explanation of it various considerations have to be taken into account. (1) His vocation as 'a minister of the circumcision' (Ro 15<sup>8</sup>) led Him to avoid as far as possible work among Samaritans and Gentiles. As the Messianic King, who came in fulfilment of OT prophecies, His appeal would naturally be, in the first instance, to 'His own' (Jn 1<sup>11</sup>). (2) The whole history of the Jewish people having been a preparation for the Kingdom of God, He recognized in its members 'the children of the kingdom' (Mt 8<sup>12</sup>). By virtue of possessing the oracles of God, Israel alone was fitted to appreciate the message of the Kingdom, which could not be presented to the world at large without a preparatory training, involving more or less delay. (3) To secure a favourable reception for His message it was necessary to avoid, as far as possible, arousing the prejudice and alienating the sympathy of His Jewish hearers, who would have resented any teaching or practice tending to place Gentile communities on a level of privilege with themselves (Lk 4<sup>25-28</sup>). (4) The shortness of His earthly ministry made it imperative that He should restrict the field to be evangelized and not be diverted from His immediate purpose of establishing the Kingdom among the chosen people by the claims of those outside, however urgent and undeniable. (5) Assuming that the Kingdom was destined ultimately to be the triumph of the Jews, the most successful method of securing its extension to other nations. As a matter of fact, it was Jewish adherents who afterwards became the agents of spreading it among the Gentiles.

Among the reasons why Gentiles were excluded from the scope of Christ's personal ministry, want of sympathy cannot be included. The evidence, instead of proving want of sympathy, is all the other way. He granted the request of the Roman centurion who sought the healing of his servant, eulogizing at the same time his faith as something without a parallel even in Israel (Mt 8<sup>10</sup>). The apparent coldness of His demeanour toward the Syrophenician woman was due to the embarrassing nature of her petition which required Him to violate the principle by which His conduct had been governed hitherto. He was anxious to help, if He could do so without sacrificing the interests of those who had the first claim upon His services. The term 'dogs' has been objected to on the ground that it is insulting. The woman herself did not view it in this light, and her quick wit turned it into an argument in her own favour.

The term (κυρία), moreover, does not denote the ownerless dogs which act as but the household pets which playmates. The scruples which led Christ to withhold for a moment the help sought, were in the end overcome by the woman's faith, which won His cordial approval.

There is no trace of racial or religious bias in Christ's references to the heathen. Any repugnance implied in His language is toward what is evil in their system or in their conduct. It is their method of and which is unworthy. Their lives are such as to make close association with them unadvisable and the impenitent offender on a par with them in this respect. toward publicans, who are bracketed with heathen, was nothing but and if He felt toward heathen in they were objects not of dislike, but of the deepest compassion. See also artt. GENTILES, MISSIONS. W. S. MONTGOMERY.

EXCOMMUNICATION denotes the exclusion, either temporary or permanent, and on moral or religious grounds, of a religious body from the privileges which membership in that body ordinarily carries with it. The word does not occur in EV, but we have in the Gospels several references to the practice as it existed among the Jews in the time of Christ, while certain words of Christ Himself supply the germs of the usage of the Christian Church as it meets us in the Apostolic age and was subsequently developed in the ecclesiastical discipline of later times.

i. JEWISH EXCOMMUNICATION.—Passing over the segregation of lepers, though this implied exclusion from the synagogue (17<sup>13</sup>),* and coming to excommunication of the more specific kind, we find that it is certainly referred to four times in the Gospels, viz. Lk 6<sup>22</sup> ('blessed are ye . . . when they shall separate you from their company'—ἀπορίσσωσιν ὑμᾶς), Jn 9<sup>22</sup> ('for the Jews had agreed already that if any man should confess him to be Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue'—ἀποσυνάγωγος γένηται), Jn 12<sup>42</sup> ('they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue'—ἵνα μὴ ἀποσυνάγωγοι γένωνται), Jn 16<sup>2</sup> ('they shall put you out of the synagogues'—ἀποσυνάγωγους ποιήσουσιν ὑμᾶς). It is not unlikely, however, that a fifth reference should be found in the ἐξέβαλον αὐτὸν ἐξω of Jn 9<sup>34, 35</sup> (so AVm; . . . . .antators). Meyer and Westcott . . . . . object to this that no sitting . . . . . had taken place, and that the persons who cross-questioned the formerly blind man were not competent to pronounce the sentence of excommunication. It is true, no doubt, that excommunication properly denotes a formal sentence passed by the officials of the congregation (Schurer, HJP II. ii. 60),—though in Talmudic times a minor form of excommunication by an individual, and especially by a rabbi, was also recognized (Jewish Encyc. vol. v. p. 286 f.),—but as it was 'the Jews,' i.e. in the language of the Fourth Gospel the Jewish authorities, who expelled the man, it seems quite possible that the examination described in Jn 9 was of a formal nature. This is confirmed by the expressions, 'they bring to the Pharisees him that aforetime was blind' (v<sup>13</sup>), 'they called the parents' (v<sup>15</sup>), 'they called a second time the man that was blind'

(v<sup>24</sup>), which suggests an authoritative summons before an official body. And when we read in v<sup>25</sup> 'Jesus heard that they had cast him out,' this seems to imply that some grave act of formal censure had been passed upon the man.

Of the fact that excommunication was practised in the Jewish synagogue in the time of Christ, these passages leave us in no doubt. But now comes the question whether at that time there were different kinds of excommunication. In the Talmud two degrees are recognized: a minor, niddāi (נידוי), and a major, hērem (חרם); the former being a temporary exclusion from the synagogue together with a restriction upon social intercourse with others, while the latter amounted to a ban of indefinite or permanent duration.* It must be remembered, however, that as an authority upon Jewish usages the Talmud does not carry us back to the earliest Christian age, and that for the practice of Jewish courts in the time of our Lord the NT itself is our only real source of information. And while it has sometimes been fancied that in the Gospel we have an indication of two kinds or degrees of excommunication—the ἀποσυνάγωγος of Jn 9<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>42</sup> 16<sup>2</sup> being distinguished either, as something more severe, from the ἀπορίσσω of Lk 6<sup>22</sup>, or, as something more mild, from the ἐξβάλλειν of Jn 9<sup>34, 35</sup>—the truth is that there are no adequate grounds for such discriminations. It is, of course, quite possible, and even likely, that in the time of Christ there were distinct grades of exclusion from the privileges of the Jewish community, corresponding to the later niddāi and hērem,† but the NT cannot be said to testify to anything more than the fact of excommunication itself.

For the immediate origin of the practice of excommunication as it meets us in the Gospels, we have only to go back to Ezra and the days after the Exile, when the strictest discipline was absolutely essential to the solidarity, needed to the very existence, of the Jewish Church and nation. Ezra insisted that those Jews who had married foreign wives should either put away both their wives and the children born of them, or forfeit their whole substance and be . . . . . of Israel (Ezr 10<sup>3</sup>). . . . . the practice are to be sought in the Pentateuchal legislation with its exclusion of the ceremonially unclean from the camp of the congregation (Lv 13<sup>45, 46</sup>, Nu 5<sup>2, 3</sup>), and its devotion to destruction (Dt 2<sup>34</sup>, whence Dt 2<sup>34</sup> 3<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>2</sup>; cf. Jg 21<sup>11</sup>, where the men of Jabesh-gilead themselves fall under the ban of extermination for not coming up to Mizpeh along with their brethren).

With regard to the grounds on which, in our Lord's time, sentence of excommunication was passed the Talmud speaks of twenty-four offences as being thus punishable: a round number which is not to be taken too literally (Jewish Encyc., art. 'Excommunication')—though later Rabbinical authorities have carried out the list into its particulars. When we read that the rulers decreed that any one

* The attempt has sometimes been made to discover in the language of the Talmud a third and more awful kind of excommunication named shammatta (שמטתא); and in accordance with this it has been supposed that there may be a reference to the three presumed degrees of Jewish excommunication in Lk 6<sup>22</sup>—'they shall separate you from their company' (niddāi), and reproach you (hērem), and cast out your name as evil' (shammatta). But it is now generally acknowledged that the idea of this threefold distinction is due to a mistake, and that, as used in the Talmud, shammatta simply a general designation for both the niddāi and the hērem (see Burdett, Lexicon, s.v. שמטתא; Schürer, HJP II. ii. 60).

* Being forbidden to enter a walled town, they could not worship in the synagogue in such places; but in unwalled towns a corner was frequently reserved for them in the synagogue, on condition that they were the first to enter and the last to depart (see Hastings' DB in 974).

who confessed Jesus to be Christ should be put out of the synagogue (Jn 9<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>42</sup>), this may show that they possessed a large discretionary power of fixing the degrees of ecclesiastical censure. But if the laws of Talmudical writers rest on traditions that go back to the time of Christ, there were certain recognized categories of offence, such as 'dealing with any of the Rabbinic or Mosaic precepts,' under which it would be easy for the Jewish casuists to arraign any one who called Jesus Master or acknowledged Him to be the Messiah.

II. CHRISTIAN EXCOMMUNICATION.—It lies beyond the scope of this Dictionary to deal with excommunication as practised in the Apostolic Church, and as it meets us especially in the Pauline writings. But in the teaching of our Lord Himself we find the principles at least of the rules which St. Paul lays down in 1 Co 5, 2 Co 2<sup>11</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup>, Tit 3<sup>10</sup>.

In Mt 16<sup>19</sup> Jesus promises to St. Peter the keys of the Kingdom of heaven, so that whatsoever he shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever he shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. In Mt 18<sup>17-19</sup> He makes a similar promise to the Church generally, or to the Twelve as representing the ecclesia—not 'quia apostles with ecclesiastical authority, but quia disciples with the ethical power of morally disciplined men' (Bruce, Expositor's Gr. Test., in loc.; cf. further Jn 20<sup>23</sup>). And in the immediately preceding context (vv. 15-17) He gives directions as to the way in which an offending brother is to be dealt with in the Church. The injured person is first to go to him privately and endeavour to show him his fault. If he will not listen, one or two other Christian brethren are to accompany the first as witnesses—not in any legal sense, we must suppose, but because 'consensus in moral judgment carries weight with the conscience' (Bruce, op. cit., in loc.). If he is still obdurate, the Church is now to be appealed to: 'and if he refuse to hear the Church (ἐκκλησία) also, let him be unto thee as the Gentile and the publican.' That ἐκκλησία in this passage means the community of Christian believers, and not, as Hort, for example, thinks (Christian Ecclesia, p. 10), the Jewish local community, seems in every way probable. Jesus had already spoken at Caesarea of the ἐκκλησία that is built on Christian faith and confession (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), and it was altogether natural that on this later occasion He should refer to it again in speaking of the relations between Christian brethren. But it would be a mistake to find in this passage any reference to a formal process of excommunication on the part of the Church. The offender of whom Christ speaks excommunicates himself from the Christian community by refusing to listen to its united voice, and the members of the community have no option but to regard him as an outsider so long as he maintains that attitude. That Jesus meant nothing harsh by the expression 'as the Gentile and the publican' and certainly did not mean a formal exclusion from the Christian society, may be seen from the way in which He treated a Roman centurion and a Syrophenician woman, and from the name given Him by His enemies—'the friend of publicans and sinners.' No doubt in an organized society a solemn and formal act such as St. Paul prescribes in 1 Co 5<sup>4-5</sup> is a natural deduction from the words of Christ in this passage; but it cannot be said that such an act is definitely enjoined by the Lord Himself. It is the attempt to find here the authoritative institution of excommunication as a formal act of ecclesiastical discipline that gives a colour of justification to the contention of some critics (e.g. Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar zum NT, in loc.) that what we have in this passage is not an actual saying of Jesus, but a reflexion of the ecclesiastical practice in the Jewish-Christian circles for which the Gospel of Matthew was written.

From our Lord's teaching in this passage it seems legitimate to infer that, though excommunication may become necessary in the interests of the Church, it should never be resorted to until the offender has been tried, and in particular should be preceded by private dealing in a brotherly and loving spirit. From the two parables of the Tares and the Wheat (Mt 13<sup>24-30</sup>, 36-43) and the Draw-net (Mt 13<sup>47-50</sup>) we may further gather that Christ would have His people to exercise a wise patience and caution in the use even of a necessary instrument. Mt 18<sup>15-17</sup> shows that there are offences which are patent and serious, and are not to be passed over. But from the two parables referred to we learn the impossibility of the Donatist dream of an absolutely pure Church. Not even those who have the enlightenment of the Spirit are infallible judges of character. The absolute discrimination between 'the good' and 'the bad' (Mt 13<sup>48</sup>) must be postponed till 'the end of the age' (v. 49). Only under the personal rule of the Son of Man Himself shall all things that offend (πάντα τὰ σκάνδαλα) be gathered out of His Kingdom (v. 41).

EXCUSE.—'To make excuse' (παραισθεῖσθαι), Lk 14<sup>18</sup>, means to avert displeasure by entreaty, to παραισθεῖσθαι to seek to be freed from an obligation or duty. (Cf. the use of 'excuse' in Dampier, Voyages, ii. 1. 99: 'In the evening he sent me out of the palace, desiring to be excused that he could not entertain me all night'). παραισθεῖσθαι is used by Josephus exactly as here of declining an invitation (Ant. vii. viii. 2). ἔχε με παρητημένον (vv. 18, 19) may be a Latinism for habere me excusatum, but see Meyer and Weiss contra.

These guests had evidently received a previous invitation, as is customary in the East, which they had accepted (vv. 16, 17). Their unanimity, the absence of an adversative ἀλλὰ or δέ, and the order of the words, combine to make παραισθεῖσθαι a surprise when it comes (contrast v. 15). They did not give a direct refusal, they were detained by certain hindrances which were not wrong in themselves, but they all showed the same spirit in rejecting the invitation because they preferred to follow their own inclinations. The first had bought a field, he was elated by his already acquired possessions (Trench, Parables), and alleged a necessity (ἔχω ἀνάγκην); 'saepe concurrent temporis acutior acceptissima et mundana negotia utitur' (Bengel). The second may illustrate the anxiety of getting; he alleges rather his plan and purpose (πορεύομαι). The third was detained by pleasure; his marriage seemed a sufficient reason, and he simply said οὐ δύναμαι. Gerhard sums up the hindrances as 'dignitates, opes, voluptates,' cf. Lk 8<sup>14</sup>. 'His omnibus mereri poterat sanctum illud odium v. 26' (Bengel).

'Excuse' is also used in RV for πρόφασις (Jn 15<sup>22</sup>), so Wyc., Vulg. (excusatio); AV follows Tindale 'cloke.' Cf. Ps 140 (141)<sup>4</sup> τοῦ προφασίζεσθαι προφάσεις ἐν ἀμαρτίαις; Vulg. 'ad excusandas excusationes in peccatis.' The Jews had no longer anything to plead in their own defence, as was possible in times of ignorance.

EXTORTION (ἀπαρτή).—The word is used by Christ in His terrible arraignment of the scribes and Pharisees, on account of the way in which, by their methods of plunder, they openly violated the Scriptures they knew so well (Mt 23<sup>35</sup>, Lk 11<sup>39</sup>). Isaiah (16<sup>4</sup>) had predicted the cessation of the extortioner as one of the signs of the Messianic reign. Ezekiel (22<sup>12</sup>) had inveighed against this sin as one of the transgressions of Israel which called forth the Divine wrath. Yet they, who claimed to keep the Law to the letter, and who professed to be the teachers of the Law, fattened themselves on extortion and filled their cups by it. For the methods of extortion practised by the publicans see art. PUBLICAN.

The almost invariable word used in the Gospels is ὀφθαλμός; in two passages (Mt 20<sup>34</sup>, Mk 8<sup>23</sup>) ὁμαμα is found, but used only in the plural. The difference in meaning between the two would appear to be that ὁμαμα refers to the material organ as distinct from its function, while ὀφθαλμός is not only the vehicle of vision but that which sees.* The most usual verb used in connexion with the eyes is βλέω (e.g. Mt 7<sup>3</sup>, Lk 6<sup>41</sup>), with its compounds διαβλέω (Mk 8<sup>25</sup>) and ἀναβλέτω (Mt 20<sup>34</sup>, Jn 9<sup>12</sup>); more rarely we find ὁράω (Mt 13<sup>17</sup>, Lk 24<sup>16</sup>, Jn 12<sup>40</sup>) and θεωροῦμαι (Jn 4<sup>35</sup> 6<sup>7</sup>). The phrase is that of 'lifting up (ἐνέειπεν) the eyes,' 16<sup>23</sup> 18<sup>13</sup>, Jn 4<sup>35</sup>; in every case in which the eyes of Christ are mentioned this word is used (Lk 6<sup>20</sup>, Jn 6<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>1</sup>).

The word 'eye' is used—1. In the ordinary, literal sense: as illustrating the lex talionis, Mt 7<sup>12</sup>; of the eyes being heavy with sleep, Mk 14<sup>40</sup>; of the eyes being turned to Christ, Lk 4<sup>20</sup>; of the eyes being given sight to the eyes of the blind, e.g. Mt 9<sup>18</sup> 23<sup>34</sup>, Mk 8<sup>23</sup>, Jn 9<sup>6</sup>. 2. In a literal sense, but with a figurative sense implied: e.g. the words of Simeon, 'Mine eyes have seen thy salvation' (Lk 2<sup>30</sup>), where there is primarily the literal looking down upon the babe before him, but also, by implication, the mental vision of God's salvation of which the visible child was the pledge; again, in the words, 'Blessed are your eyes, for they see . . .' (Mt 13<sup>16</sup>, see also Lk 10<sup>23</sup>), where we have both the literal seeing of Christ and the seeing, in the sense of understanding, His teaching; further, a striking instance is contained in Lk 24<sup>48</sup>, where it is said of the two disciples to whom Christ, after His resurrection, became known by the breaking of bread, that 'their eyes were opened, and they knew him.' There appears here (however it may be accounted for) an extraordinarily close connexion or correspondence between weakness in the bodily and the mental vision, for it is certain that their eyes were open, in the ordinary sense, before they Christ. Another example is that in Jn 1<sup>9</sup> 'Lift up your eyes and look on the fields, that they are white already unto harvest.' What the bodily eye saw here was evidently intended by Christ to be a symbol of the great work of evangelism, which He desired the mental vision of His disciples to discern. Under this head would come also Mt 5<sup>29</sup> 'If thy right eye causeth thee to stumble, cut it out and cast it from thee.' From the context the 'eye' is clearly used here in a material sense, while the 'cut it out' is equally clearly used in a figurative sense (cf. Mt 19<sup>12</sup>).

3. In a purely figurative sense it is found in Mt 7<sup>3-6</sup> and Lk 6<sup>41-42</sup> (the mote in the brother's eye); also in Mt 6<sup>22-23</sup>, Lk 11<sup>34</sup> ('The lamp of the body is the eye'), where the eye is spoken of as reflecting the spiritual condition of the heart, though even here it is possible that the thought of the expression of the material eyes may also have been in Christ's mind. Again, in Mt 20<sup>15</sup> 'Is thine eye evil because I am good?' the eye is used figuratively to express an attitude of envy (see below). Lastly, it must obviously have been used in a purely figurative sense in Lk 16<sup>23</sup> 'In Hades he lifted up his eyes . . .'

4. There remains the strange expression 'evil eye' (ὀφθαλμός πονηρός, Mk 7<sup>22</sup>). The meaning of this no doubt corresponds to that of the similar expression in Wisd. 1<sup>10</sup>, and, generally speaking, denotes envy;* but it also implies demoniacal possession [see DEMON, in. (b)],† and the 'evil' referred not only to the possessed himself, but also to the harm which might be done to others who came under the influence of the 'evil eye.'‡

EYE-WITNESSES (αὐτόπται, Lk 1<sup>2</sup>; cf. ἐπόπται in 2 P 1<sup>16</sup>).—We have the assurance of the Third Evangelist that the Gospels are founded not upon second-hand reports, but upon the direct testimony of those who were present. Similarly in Jn 19<sup>35</sup> 21<sup>24</sup> (where the words μαρτυρεῖν and μαρτυρία are used), the record of the Fourth Gospel is certified to be reliable. (See Lightfoot on 'The Internal Evidence for the Genuineness of the Gospel of John,' in the Traveller for Jan.-Mar. 1890, pp. 1, 81, 176; and cf. also GOSPELS, T. GREGORY.

* Cf. the expression עַיִן רָעָה Pr 23<sup>6</sup>; see also Dt 15<sup>9</sup>, 1 S 18<sup>9</sup>.

† Among the Jews there was a special formula for use against the 'evil eye.'

FABLE.—See PARABLE.

FACE.—Of the words tr. 'face,' 'countenance,' the Heb. pānim indicates the front, that which is presented to view, while mar'eh and the NT terms πρόσωπον, ὄψις, and ἐνώπιον correspond to view, visage, that which can be seen.

1. Physical appearance.—Beauty of face is frequently alluded to in the Bible in connexion with both men and women as a distinguishing personal charm, and a powerful influence for good or evil. The underlying thought is that a noble and beautiful face should be the index of a noble and beautiful spirit. There is a resemblance among the children of a king (Jg 8<sup>18</sup>). Along with this recognition there are intimations that the Lord seeth not as man seeth (1 S 16<sup>7</sup>), and that beauty is vain (Pr 31<sup>30</sup>). In the mysterious personality outlined in Is 53 one of the arresting features is the absence of such beauty in a face singularly marred, of the religious life of man. This does away with the absoluteness of Christianity, and is in direct contradiction to the account given by the Scripture writers themselves of the way in which Divine truth came to them. The question, therefore, really resolves itself into that of the trustworthiness of Christ and His Apostles as teachers of doctrine. The evidence for their trustworthiness is just the evidence for Christianity as a supernatural religion which, of course, takes us far beyond the limits of this article (cf. Warfield, art. 'The Real Problem of Inspiration' in Pres. and Ref. Rev. iv. p. 177 f.). But if we accept their authority (as we do, resting it on the above mentioned evidence), then Christianity consists in certain great facts, and in the true meaning of those facts. The meaning of a fact is its meaning for a mind. By their true meaning, therefore, Christ meant their meaning for God. This meaning, therefore, He must have made known to us if we are to have any Christianity.

In the first place, then, to attempt to hold to the great supernatural facts of Christianity and to give up their meaning, is not only impossible, but, were it possible, would result in taking from the facts just that which makes them Christian facts, and which makes them constitutive of the essence of Christianity. There has been an attempt to distinguish between the facts of Christ's life as the permanent Divine element in Christianity and 'theories' as relative, human, and changing. This general tendency to separate between fact and theory in Christianity has assumed two forms: on the one hand, it is said that the Bible contains no explanation of the great facts of Christianity; on the other hand, it is admitted that the Bible does contain an explanation of the facts; but, while a special revelation of supernatural acts of God is recognized, a special word-revelation is denied, and the whole doctrinal content of Christianity as contained in the Bible is reduced practically to human reflexion upon the acts of God.

In the former position, it is said that Christianity consists in facts, not in doctrines. We have in the Bible the fact of Christ, but no theory as to His person. We have the fact of the Atonement, but no theory or doctrine of its meaning.

This position has been held by R. J. Campbell and F. W. Farrar. Farrar, in a volume entitled Thought, 1900. For example, Farrar maintains that any attempt to explain the nature of the Atonement is a 'futile endeavour to be wise above what is written, and to translate the language of emotion into that of rigid scholasticism.' So also R. F. Horton, in his essay on the Atonement in a volume entitled Faith and Criticism, 1898, says that the NT contains no theory of the Atonement. (Horton has given up this position in his essay on the same subject in the same volume with Farrar's essay.) A similar position seems to have been maintained by Asté, who is quoted by H. Bois in De la Connaissance Religieuse, p. 342; cf. Warfield, The Right of Systematic Theology, p. 80.

In regard to this position we should note, first of all, that 'bare facts,' i.e. meaningless facts, are impossible, for every fact has a meaning whether we know it or not. And still further, a 'bare fact' being a meaningless thing, there is no atonement in the 'bare fact' of Christ's death, and no Christianity in the events of His life regarded as 'bare facts.' If we clearly understand that a 'bare fact' is simply an event in the external world apprehended by the senses, or a subjective fact of some self-consciousness, then it may be the statement of a 'bare fact' to say that a man called Jesus was born some 1900 years ago, but we are not to say that He was God's Son made flesh for our salvation; we can say that He died on the cross without going beyond 'bare fact,' or even that He expressed certain feelings, but we cannot say so much as that He died for our sin. It is not necessary to salvation that we should know the full and true meaning of Christ's death; we are not speaking, however, of the conditions of salvation, but of the essence of Christianity. And this lies in the great redemptive facts of the life of Christ, or in the facts because of their meaning. We may conceive some false meaning of these facts, but like all facts they must have some meaning, and their true meaning is their meaning for God. Hence, as was said, if we are to know their true meaning, God must tell it to us. If, therefore, we were simply to hold to the facts of Christ's life considered as 'bare facts,' we should have taken away from them that which makes them Christian facts. In short, this method of Christianity takes from them all that makes them constitutive of the essence of Christianity.*

We should observe, next, that the modes of statement of all those who hold this position suggest the impossibility of holding to 'bare facts.' They speak constantly of the fact of the Atonement. But this is quite ambiguous. If it means that the atonement is real, then it is a true statement, but a statement which involves a theory or interpretation of the fact of Christ's death as atoning for sin. But, taken as they appear to mean it, the statement involves an error. We may speak of the fact of Christ's death, but in this as a 'bare fact' there is no atonement. As soon as we call it an atonement we have interpreted it by a theory. So, when Farrar says it is a 'landmark of the death of Christ,' that it is 'not only the declaration, but the ground of pardon,' he has gone a long way toward understanding its meaning, and, according to his position, has made the mistake of 'translating the language of emotion into the rigidity of syllogisms.' And this same ambiguity often attaches to the language of those who do not hold this position. Thus the late Dr. Dale, in his book on the Atonement, first seeks to establish its fact and secondly its theory. In reality, however, the first part of his book contains more general, and the latter part more specific, statements of the doctrine or theory. Precisely the same ambiguity is seen in the article 'The Fact of the Atonement,' by R. Mackintosh (Expos. Times, May 1903), who speaks of the 'fact of Christ's death' and the 'fact of the Atonement' as equivalent terms, and again of the 'fact that Christ died for our sins,' which statement, of course, contains a doctrine.

But we must observe, finally, that it is not sufficient to show the necessity of an interpretation of the facts of Christianity. The question of an external authority in religious knowledge cannot be evaded by saying that the Bible contains no explanation of these great facts. Whatever may be said as to the authority of Scripture, it is evident that the Bible does contain an interpretation of the great facts of Christ's life. And whatever interpretation be put upon the language of Christ and His Apostles, it is plain that they had definite ideas as to who Christ was, why and how He came into this world, why He died, and what His death means. To take only a few instances, and those only in regard to one fact, viz. Christ's death, it is scarcely a matter for dispute that, when He speaks of giving His life 'a ransom in the place of many' (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>, Mt 20<sup>28</sup>), or of His blood as Covenant-blood 'shed for many unto the remission of sins' (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>), He intended to convey communication of truth to the Scripture writer in a supernatural manner. Of course, it should not be forgotten that inspiration is also necessary in order to render the truth infallible to us a definite view as to the meaning of His death.* The same thing could be shown in regard to all our Lord's statements as to His Person and Work. The whole of the Pauline letters are occupied to a large extent with the interpretation of the facts of our Lord's Incarnation, Death, and Resurrection. It is not possible, then, to assert that the NT contains no interpretation of the facts which lie at the basis of Christianity.

* The necessity for an interpretation of the facts of Christianity has been shown by Denney, Studies in Theol. p. 106, and The Death of Christ, Introd.; cf. also J. Orr, The Christian View of God and the World, p. 25; H. Bois, Le Dogme Grec, pp. 110-117; Warfield, The Right of Syst. Theol. pp. 29-46.

We must therefore face the question of the authority of this interpretation. If we are unwilling to yield to its authority, and still insist upon the distinction between the facts as Divine and the theory as merely human, we shall be in the second position mentioned, that of those who recognize a supernatural revelation in a series of facts, but who reduce the whole doctrinal content of Christianity as contained in the Bible, to human reflexion upon these facts (see Rothe, Zur Dogmatik, pp 54-120; Weiss, Bibl. Theol. des NT, § 1 c, also note 3 on p. 4. For other instances of this see Warfield, art. 'Revelation' in Johnson's Encycl. vol. vii. p. 79). But this position is not a logical one. For it is not the account which the Scripture writers give of their perception of the facts of Christianity. They are not supernaturalism in the communication to them of truth. Hence, if by reason of an anti-supernaturalistic philosophy we reject this claim, and regard their interpretation of the facts as relative and conditioned by the conceptions of the time, we shall also be led logically to reject their statements as to the occurrence of supernatural facts. The consequence of this will be to regard the facts of Christianity, i.e. its whole historical basis, no less than the Scripture doctrine, as the mere 'husk' which contains the 'kernel' either of rational truth or of Christian life; and thus Christianity will have been reduced to a mere religious philosophy or a mystical life. For, we are asked, can a history long past be the object of religious faith any more than a doctrine of a bygone age? Is not the whole of the historical and dogmatic element of the Scripture relative and temporally conditioned? Accordingly the logic of this position of reducing revelation only in fact, is to drive us to Rationalism or Mysticism. This is the result of abandoning the principle of external authority in regard to rational truth and religious sentiment are not Christianity. If we are to have any Christian religion we must have the great supernatural facts of Christianity and an authoritative interpretation of them. Whereas on this view revelation is only a product of the religious life of man.

Accordingly we are brought to a position opposite to that which we have been discussing, i.e. to the position which does not do justice to the facts of Christianity, subordinating them to a purely human theory. This tendency reduces Christianity to a philosophy of religion; the historical element being regarded as the 'husk' which contains the 'kernel' of eternal truths of reason.

This question of the importance of the historical element in Christianity was prominent in the 18th cent. (cf. Lipsius, 'Die Bedeutung des Historischen im Christentum' in his Glauben u. Wissen). The difficulty which was felt with historic facts was not, as more recently, that of attaining historic certitude. The clearest, most undisputed fact, it was held, could not support or be the content of religious belief. The objection was therefore a metaphysical, not a historical one. Hence all positive religions were regarded as but outward expressions of the pure religion of reason. This was the position of the Leibnitz-Wolffian philosophy (cf. Windelband, Gesch. der Phil.

* It is often asserted that the words first quoted show Pauline influence on the Evangelist. But the unwillingness to admit that Jesus uttered them rests on dogmatic grounds. There is no external evidence against them and, as Denney has shown, they are perfectly in keeping with the context. So also Spitta's idea that the words are a later addition to Christ's death, is admitted by him to be quite different from the view of the Evangelist (see Denney, The Death of Christ, pp 38 and 40).

p 30 ff.) Lessing also gave utterance to his famous saying that 'accidental historical truths' can never be the ground of 'eternal rational truth'. The kernel of Christianity is the same way Kant (Die Vernunft) considered the kernel of all religions. History is destroyed, for it is not the product of history, but with much the same result as is concerned, because of their adherence to the distinction between kernel and husk. History is regarded by them not as an 'outer', 'empirical' history, but as the history of God's life in the finite spirit. Thus the history of Christ is the history of an individual, but in the eternal course of the Divine life. Christ's death is simply a symbol of something which must be repeated in every man's inner life, and His bodily life is the finite spirit to the infinite forms, albeit the highest, of bare natural religion, in this case constructed upon a pantheizing basis.

In England, T. H. Green has given a Neo-Hegelian construction of Christianity which subordinates its facts and the Scripture doctrine of the resurrection to its theory. (See Miscell. II, p. 160-161). God is the ideal self of each man. Sin is self-assertion, dying to live, the giving up of the self. This is held to be the revelation of Christianity, but no value is attached to the historic facts. The claim, also, that faith which has a historic element in its content is therefore psychologically a 'historic faith' in the sense of a dead faith, is specious. Faith may have a historical element in its content without being changed as to its psychological content. (For a critique of Green's religious philosophy see The Thinker for 1895; Rainy in Forrest, The Christ of Hist. and of Experience, Lect. 8).

From the standpoint of NT criticism, the art. 'The Resurrection and Ascension' in vol. iv p. 4040f., illustrates the distinction between kernel and husk, and the giving up of the fact of the bodily Resurrection of Christ. Here an anti-supernaturalistic bias governs the whole discussion, though Schmiedel asserts that he does up the authority of the historical element in Christianity.

by W. A. Pickard-Cambridge. The author, the fundamental error in Scripture is the historicity of Jesus Christ with whom is the essence of Christianity. Confronted with a personality of this kind, and so made this mistake. The error is without Christ. The author's error is in the emotion.

To get away with the historical element in Christianity, these thinkers have done away with the historicity of itself. This is only to say that the historicity of Christ's life are a part of the essence of Christianity. The Christian religion is not a product of human ideas, but of a direct revelation of God to men, accompanying God's direct interference in the downward course of the world caused by sin, which is a historic force. Thus, having abandoned all external authority, we lose the fact-basis as well as its Scripture interpretation, and are left with a philosophy of religion. But these so-called eternal truths are either purely human, in which case they cannot be eternally valid truth; or else man's thoughts about God must be held to be God's thoughts about Himself, in which case even natural religion vanishes in Pantheism. This type of religious philosophy may not admit the historicity of the Scripture but it should frankly admit that what it leaves us is not Christianity. It is, however, simply the logical result of the entire abandonment of the principle of external authority in religious knowledge.

When we turn from the philosophers to the 'liberal theology' represented by Biedermann, Lipsius, and Pfleiderer, we find that, notwithstanding the greater emphasis which they lay upon the historic Christ, their difference from the philosophers is not so much as of degree, i.e. of how much of will retain as kernel and how much they will throw away as husk. This is determined largely by their philosophical standpoint. Hence in their case also there is a subjection of Christian fact and doctrine to an unauthoritative theory. That they do not differ so much in principle from the preceding philosophical solvent of Christianity can be seen from the following considerations. Wherever the principle of external authority is given up, we are sure to meet with the same distinction between kernel and husk in reference to Scripture fact and doctrine. And whenever this takes place, the Scripture idea of revelation has been changed, revelation being simply the product of religious thoughts and feelings in the mind of man. This makes it the product of natural development, and subjects it to the laws of psychic life. Accordingly we find that, while these er from the preceding construction in laying greater emphasis upon Christ and in insisting that the essence of Christianity is not in eternal truth so much as in Christ Himself (see esp. Lipsius, op. cit.), they nevertheless regard the Scripture facts as Scripturally interpreted, i.e. both fact and dogma, as but the 'sensuous representation' of rational religious truth.

already cited he that the eternal person of Christ Christianity, he says, consists not in ideas which Christ illustrated, but in Christ Himself. But Lipsius distinguishes between kernel and husk, and between some facts and others. Thus he says that 'faith has to do not with single historical facts as such, but with their religious value,' and that 'there are facts about whose historicity there is little doubt, and which are of no importance for the religious life, and there are others about which there may be much doubt, and yet, as sensuous representations of religious facts, they are of the greatest value.' Obviously, if there is a doubt as to the historicity of facts, it is not one of such importance as 'sensuous representations' of religious truth, the really essential thing is the rational truth which they are supposed to represent. And this is actually the case with Lipsius' treatment of the great Christian facts. Thus the Cross is 'the symbol of the eternal truth that the old man in us must die, in order that man be born of God' (p. 138), though Lipsius does recognize in Christ's death more than a mere symbol (p. 139). At the same time the all important thing is the idea symbolized. So also the Resurrection of Christ need not be true in its literal Scriptural form, but at the same time it symbolizes the truth of the entrance of Christ into the heavenly world. The 'form' in which we conceive it is expressly said to be of no importance. This is sufficient to show the complete subordination of Christian fact to philosophic theory in this movement. But not only are the great facts of Christianity put into the category of 'husk.' The dogmatic interpretation of them in the Scripture is also regarded as the external null or symbol of rational truth. For, as Engström (p. 139), who hold that the Greek influence in the NT writings, the liberal theology carries the process of separating the kernel of truth from its husk, back into the NT. Thus Pfleiderer (Glaubens- u. Sittenlehre, p. 4) says that it is the business of Dogmatics to 'work over critically' the Scripture as well as the Church dogma in order to reach its abiding truth. The Scripture doctrine is said to contain a 'sensuous' element which is not rational and which must be rationalized.

It is evident that the principle of external authority in religious knowledge having been abandoned by this school also, the historic facts of Christianity as well as the Scripture interpretation are given up. Again, facts are subordinated to a human theory, and we have left a religious philosophy.

The subjection of the Scripture facts and doctrines to a subjective norm has taken also a more mystical form. This, indeed, is a natural consequence of the attempt to find a permanent basis for religious knowledge after the principle of external authority has been given up. For this kernel of rational truth seems to differ with each theologian, and does not afford that permanency which should characterize the essence of Christianity. These so-called eternal truths are temporally conditioned just as are the Scripture dogmas. To hold to them, therefore, is a species of dogmatism. Accordingly it is natural that a demand for a truly undogmatic Christianity should arise, seeking to be rid not only of Scripture doctrine, but also of the rational element into which it had been distilled.

This demand was made by Dreyer in his Christentum, the first edition of which Coming from the camp of the liberals, Dreyer directed his polemic against 'liberal' alike. The liberal theology fails to satisfy while orthodox dogma is in are therefore bidden to turn from dogma to the life of faith. Christianity is a life, not a series of facts or doctrines. Dogma is religious experience put into the form of concepts (p. 77). It is therefore put into a form of relative validity, and one that is continually changing. When these concepts are no longer valid, they no longer serve to express religious life, and must be rejected. The facts of Christianity fare no better at Dreyer's hands. He will not allow our idea of by any dogmatic supernaturalism, and demand of an equally dogmatic anti-supernaturalism, he tells us the Gospel record of the external fact may remain, any historic fact, and are told to fall back on Christ's holy character, which is exalted above all the changes of criticism. This arouses life *which is a life, not fact or doctrine.** A been taken in France by A. Sabatier.† life, not doctrine. External authority, or the Church, kills religion. The essential thing in religion is life. But this life must express itself outwardly. Christian doctrines are but symbols higher than those of other religions because the life is higher. The essence of Christianity, therefore, is neither a series of facts nor a sum of dogmas, but a spiritual life.

We have not space to show Dreyer's supposed escape from when he falls back on the inner life of Jesus as the ground of the life which constitutes the essence of Christianity; or to discuss the philosophy which underlies Sabatier's books. We can only stop to indicate briefly that when we have separated Christianity from all external facts and have made its doctrinal content entirely the product of the religious life, we have done away with Christianity, because we have done away with all that distinguishes it from natural religion. Of course it is true that Christ is a life hid with Christ in God. It is also true that Christian doctrine can never produce Christian life. St. Paul has taught us this. Man is dead in sin, and the revelation of Divine truth in the Bible will fail to produce spiritual apprehension or life; for 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit' (1 Co 2:14). These great truths are emphasized in the Reformed Theology. But the type of thought we are discussing means that the essence of Christianity consists in a life which precedes and is independent of facts and doctrines, and that doctrine

* In some respects Dreyer's position resembles that of the Ritschlians. Thus, e.g., Kaftan in his Glaube u. Dogma replied to Dreyer that instead of an undogmatic Christianity we need a 'new dogma' which grows out of Christian faith. Dreyer rejoined, in a later edition of his book, that he admitted a 'science of faith' (Glaubenslehre), and so did not differ from Kaftan. Kaftan again replied saying that Dreyer held that this science of faith contained a symbolic element, and was only of relative validity. This seems to be the most essential point of difference between Dreyer and Kaftan, viz., the latter claims absolute validity for dogmatics as the science of faith, while the former admits a relative element in this 'science of faith' which he refuses to call a dogma. Dreyer's view of the inner life of Christ, as independent of historical criticism, and as the source of Christian life, resembles that of Herrmann in his Verkehr des Christen mit Gott. But Dreyer is a mystic, while Herrmann is not. See also, Dreyer, Zur undogm. Glaubensl. [posthum.], 1901.

† Esquisse d'une Phil. de la Rélig. d'après la Psych. et l'Histoire, 1897 [also Eng. tr. 1897]. This book includes a lecture, 'The Vitality of Christian Dogmas,' published separately [also Eng. tr.], also Les Religions d'Autorité et la Religion de l'Esprit, 1900 [also Eng. tr.].

is the product of life. Thus to eliminate fact and doctrine from Christianity is to leave nothing but bare natural religious sentiment. And it is a mistake to suppose that Christianity is the product of the religious sentiment (see Warfield, The Right of Syst. Theol.). It is no more the product of this than it is of rational reflexion.

Furthermore, there is now left no basis for the affirmation that Christianity is the final religion, and its doctrine absolute truth. For we can never be sure that Christian life may not reach higher levels and embody itself in more elevated doctrinal symbols. Writers of this type might and do reply to this, that, even apart from fact and doctrine, the Christian life is not the bare religious sentiment, but the product of God's Spirit, and that it is therefore the true life, and its doctrinal product final truth. But when they affirm this, they abandon their position. For it cannot be proved that this life is the true life if the norm of truth be drawn from the life itself. We believe that Christian life is the true life because of a fact and a doctrine independent of this life, viz. that it proceeds from the regenerating activity of the Holy Spirit. But in affirming this we have asserted a great fact as well as a doctrine, each independent of, as well as at the basis of, Christian life. In short, if Christianity is separated from the great supernatural facts of Christ's life and from the great supernatural facts of the action of God's Spirit on men's hearts, as well as from its authoritative doctrinal content, then that which differentiates it from mere religious sentiment is gone. What, then, to suppose is the attitude of this type of religious thinking to the question of 'fact and theory' in relation, especially, to Christ? This question may be answered by saying that the facts and doctrines of Christianity have been subordinated to a psychological theory that feeling and sensation precede and condition thought. And as a consequence, we are left with a human Christ whose portrait is the product of the religious sentiment.

At this point we are met with a reaction from the neglect of the historical element in Christianity, and also from the demand for an undogmatic Christianity. This has come from members of the Ritschlian school. Thus, e.g., Harnack (cf. his address, Das Christentum u. die Geschichte, 1896) and Herrmann (besides his Verkehr und Begriff der Offenbarung, see esp. his Warum bedarf unser Glaube geschichtlicher Thatsachen? 1884) have attempted to defend the importance of the historical basis of Christianity against Lessing and Kant; and Kaftan (Glaube u. Dogma<sup>2</sup>, 1889) has written a reply to Dreyer, showing that the dogmatic element is essential to Christianity and that what we need is a 'new dogma'. But this demand must be judged in the light of the motive, principles, and results of this theological movement. The fundamental motive of Ritschlianism is an apologetic one, viz., to find a ground of certitude in Christianity which shall be independent of the results of historical criticism and of metaphysics and so to state the content of the Christian faith that it too shall be independent in both these respects. In order to accomplish this, it is common with theologians of this school to lay stress on the revelation of God in the 'historic Christ,' and to seek to find in Him the ground, as well as an essential element in the content, of the Christian faith. This ground of certitude and this dogmatic content are held to be independent of historical criticism and metaphysics, by means of their sharp distinction between religious and theoretic knowledge, the latter dealing with facts and their explanation, the former with religious values. In regard, then, to the historical element in Christianity or the Christian facts, this school emphasizes its importance as part of the essence of Christianity; but in order to maintain its independence of the results of historical criticism, falls back upon one fact, viz.—the so-called 'historic Christ.' It is not meant that Christianity is independent of the results of historical criticism in such a sense that, if there were no basis for their historic Christ in the Gospels, Christianity could still survive. Their idea is that the 'historic Christ' stands fast after historical criticism has done its work. But since this criticism is largely determined by an anti-supernaturalistic bias, it is evident that the historic Christ of the Ritschlians is not a Christ who is independent of historical criticism, but the Christ which a naturalistic criticism has left us. This shows that independence of the results of criticism is impossible, since Christianity is a historical religion. The supposed independence of its results turns out to be a surrender of all that is difficult to defend against a criticism which is determined by naturalism. As Harnack says (Das Christentum u. die Geschichte), that 'the tradition as to the incidents attending the birth and early life of Jesus Christ has been shattered.' This makes necessary the old rationalistic distinction between 'kernel' and 'husk,' and so in his lectures on the Essence of Christianity we are told that we must distinguish between the Easter message of the empty tomb, which is not essential to Christianity, and the Easter faith that Jesus gained a victory over death and still lives. Of course, if we follow this method, not only will all the external supernatural events of Christ's life have to be surrendered, but also those elements in His inner life which involve the supernatural must go. And so we find Herrmann in the Verkehr falling back upon the inner life of Jesus reduced to a merely ethical content.*

Thus the Ritschlian attempt at independence of historical criticism results really in a surrender to a criticism determined by naturalism. The virgin-birth and the bodily resurrection of Christ are given up, and we have no longer the Christ of the Gospels, but the Christ of a Gospel reconstructed by the critics. It is the subordination of Christian facts to a human theory.

When we turn to the demand for a 'new dogma,' which we saw was emphasized by Kaftan (Glaube u. Dogma), we find the other principle of the school at work, viz.—the separation of theology from metaphysics, and the distinction between religious and theoretic knowledge. The watchword 'theology without metaphysics,' however, does not mean simply theology which shall be free from a speculative reconstruction as in the Hegelian school. It means a theology without any metaphysical elements, i.e. with nothing that transcends experience. Hence we must not only detach from the 'historic Christ' from the Christ of an external tradition; we must also distinguish Him from the Christ of a metaphysical dogma of Greek origin. Accordingly the doctrines of the Trinity and of the two natures in one person in our Lord are to be abandoned as metaphysical. The new dogma expresses itself in religious knowledge without from faith, and not in metaphysical Christ, therefore, is not Divine in a metaphysical sense as in the doctrine of the two natures, but simply in the religious sense that in the man Jesus we have the perfect revelation of God, or else that the term 'Divinity' expresses His value for the believer. This latter is Ritschl's position, and members of the school who have taken a more positive attitude than Ritschl have fallen short of Christ's Divinity in any metaphysical sense (cf. Kaftan, Dogmatik, Lobstein, Lehre v. d. übernat. Geburt Christi, Harnack, op. cit., and H. Schultz, Lehre v. d. Gottheit Christi, occupy much the same position as Ritschl).

*It is true that both Herrmann and Reischle ('Der Streit über d. B. u. d. G.' in Zeitsch. f. d. ev. Theol., 1890, p. 107) when they speak of the 'kernel' as that which is determined becomes in their hands a norm for distinguishing between kernel and husk in its 'content'. According to their idea of the 'content' of faith is one that fits in with their idea of its ground. Kahlel (Der sogenannte historische Jesus u. d. gesch. biblische Christus<sup>2</sup>, 1896) has criticised this distinction between the ground and the content of faith. But it is more important to note that the idea which these writers have of Christ as the ground of faith determines absolutely its content by acting as a principle by which to distinguish the abiding content of faith from its historical form, and thus makes room for endless subjectivity.

We must conclude that in the Ritschlian theology we have again the subordination of the great Christian facts and dogmas to a phenomenological and a historical criticism subject to a human theory. This amounts to their subjection to a human theory. For the fundamental question is—Upon what does this theology rest? Has it a more objective basis than rationalism and mysticism? It seeks to base revelation on Christ. The source of its dogma is not the individual Christian consciousness but the Christian life, or the revelation of God portrayed in the Bible. But its Christ is a human Christ who can give no absolute revelation of God; and the Bible is not regarded as authoritative in any sense as containing a supernatural revelation, but simply as the record of the revelation by the human Christ. The Scripture is subjected to the Christian consciousness to such an extent that the Christian doctrines are not to be taken directly from Scripture as 'external revelations,' but only as 'appropriated' and 'authenticated' by Christian faith (cf. Kaftan, Dogmatik, § on the Scripture, p. 48). Thus the idea of revelation has changed its biblical sense of a supernatural communication of truth, and becomes the product of the religious life of those who stood nearest Christ. But the Christian life does not remove the noetic effects of sin all at once, and consequently this idea of special revelation does not meet the demand which made a special revelation necessary. In short, if we abandon the principle of external authority, we cannot escape the subjection of the facts and doctrines of Christianity to a philosophical theory.

The logical results of the abandonment of an external authority in religious knowledge have been recently exhibited in the new theological school which follows the method of Christianistic Religion. For if Christ is only human, the Christian revelation not supernatural, it will be impossible to maintain the absoluteness of Christianity as the Ritschlians sought to do. It will be impossible to maintain that Christianity consists in Christ and not merely in a principle of which He is the illustration. We thus have the distinction between the 'Christian principle' and the person of Christ. It is the distinction of the old rationalism, only now in quite a different form, since this school insists that principles can never be separated from their historical embodiment. Therefore the distinction between the 'kernel' and the 'husk' must be given up, since the kernel is always inseparable from its historical manifestation. All history is relative, yet not at all unimportant, for we cannot have religious truth except in a historically conditioned form. Thus, while a greater significance attaches to Christ than in the old rationalism, the great facts and the dogmatic content of Christianity have only a relative value, and are frankly given up at the demands of an avowedly naturalistic philosophy. This can be seen in Troeltsch, the dogmatician of the school (cf. his art. 'Geschichte u. Metaphysik' in Zeitschr. f.

Theol. u. Kirche, 1898, pp. 55-67. Cf. also Die Absolutheit des Christentums u. die Religionsgeschichte, 1902) Troeltsch of personality in the religious sphere, and that Christ is the source of our communion with God; but in view of the power of development in Christianity, he holds that it is not possible to limit God's revelation to one person at the beginning of Christian history. Therefore the first form of Christianity, as connected with Jesus, is to be regarded along with later forms simply as illustrations of the Christ. Thus we have again the entire of the facts and doctrines of Christianity to the theory of the naturalistic evolution of religious ideas.

We conclude, then, that Christianity consists in a series of supernatural facts together with their meaning; that their true meaning is their meaning for God, and that therefore He must tell it to us; that the noetic effects of sin make it necessary that this be in a special and supernatural manner. The abandonment of the authority of Scripture for the interpretation of the facts leads logically to the abandonment of the facts themselves, i.e. to their subordination to a theory which distinguishes their accidental Scriptural form from their abiding philosophical content. The Ritschlian endeavour to stem the tide of this logic is unsuccessful, and the newest development in theology has cast aside the Ritschlian claim as to the absoluteness of Christianity and the Divinity of Christ, and has subjected Scripture fact and doctrine to an avowedly naturalistic philosophy. If, therefore, we are not to lose the supernatural facts and their authoritative interpretation, i.e. if we are not to lose Christianity, we must abide by the Scripture as an external authority.

Literature

betoth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betoth thee unto me with faith (בְּאִמּוּנָה) Great is faith before God, for on account of faith it is that the Holy Spirit abides (upon Israel), etc.

In the early Rabbinical literature 'faith' wavers in meaning between 'belief' and 'fidelity (to the Law)'. The former is prominent in the Apocalypse of Baruch (1st cent. A.D.). But the latter is characteristic of the later period, 'faith' and 'works' being co-ordinated or combined.* 'Faith' (אֱמוּנָה) in the sense of fixed dogmatic belief is quite late in Hebrew literature (mediaeval times).

In Rabbinical Hebrew, besides the nouns אֱמוּנָה, אֱמוּנָה, אֱמוּנָה, אֱמוּנָה (אֱמוּנָה) (= Aram. אֱמוּנָה) occurs (v. 8). For the Gospel-expression אֱמוּנָה (אֱמוּנָה) a Heb. parallel occurs in Mekhilla (on Ex 15) אֱמוּנָה 'those lacking faith.' So in the Pal. Targ. (on Nu 11) אֱמוּנָה 'Then rose up those who had lacked faith and gathered the quails, etc.'; and Gen. Rab. § 32, אֱמוּנָה 'men of little faith' (an exact parallel). In the Mishna, Sota ix. 12, the decline of the world is ascribed to the disappearance of 'men of faith' (אֱמוּנָה).

4. 'Faith' in the Gospels. — The terms for 'faith' and 'believe' in contrast with those of the OT are characteristic of the whole NT language, and occur almost entirely with a directly religious connotation. In Philo the religious content of the terms had decidedly been heightened, but suffered from a certain vagueness in the conception of the object of faith, due to his transcendental philosophy. Faith, in Philo's conception, rests rather upon the abstract than upon the personal God of grace, and is rather the fruit and crown of righteousness than its antecedent. In the NT it is all-important to distinguish the different connotations of the terms according as the object is (a) God; (b) the promises of God; (c) Christ; (d) some particular utterance, claim, or promise of God or Christ. The last of these senses is the one most common in the Synoptic Gospels.†

(1) In the Synoptics. — In its active sense of 'faith', πίστις usually means here belief or trust in God or God's power as manifested in Christ (the so-called 'miracle-faith').‡ The response of faith conditions the granting of relief to those in bodily distress (Mk 5<sup>34</sup> || 10<sup>52</sup> ||), the effect being proportionate to the degree of faith exercised (Mt 9<sup>29</sup> 'According to your faith [κατὰ τὴν πίστιν ὑμῶν] be it done unto you'; cf. 15<sup>28</sup>, Lk 7<sup>9</sup> 50; and for degrees of faith see Mt 8<sup>10</sup> || Lk 17<sup>5</sup> etc.). In this connexion Mt 13<sup>38</sup> is instructive. We are told that 'He did not [αὐτὸς] mighty works there [in his own country, Nazareth] because of their unbelief' ('lack of faith', ἀπιστίας); cf. Mk 6<sup>6</sup>. The term 'faith' is also applied to the confidence of the disciple that the power conferred upon him will be effective (in the performance of miraculous works), Mk 11<sup>22-24</sup>, defined by Christ as 'faith in God' (v. 22). Possibly, however, this passage (as has been suggested by Menzies§) is intended simply to bring home to the disciples the power of faith in accomplishing the seemingly impossible. 'Jesus summons those who look to Him to have faith in God when they are in great danger, or when they are seeking with all their heart some boon which outward appearances declare to be all but hopeless'; the special and (apparently insurmountable) difficulty here being the insensibility of the Jewish people as a whole to the message of the gospel

* Cf. Charles' note on Apoc. Bar. iv. 21: 'Faith in the Talmud is in one of its aspects regarded as a work which, as the fulfilment of the Law, produces merit.'

† Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 31 f. The passive sense of πίστις ('faithfulness', 'fidelity') is very rare in the NT. The only instance in the Gospels seems to be Mt 23<sup>23</sup> ('the weightier matters of the Law, judgment and mercy and faithfulness' [καὶ τὴν πίστιν]).

‡ Nowhere in the NT is it used of man's faith in man.

§ The Earliest Gospel, p. 211.

(symbolized by the withered fig-tree) Cf. the words of Christ to Jairus (Mk 5<sup>36</sup> 'Fear not, only believe'), to the father of the epileptic (9<sup>23</sup> 'If it be possible' All things are possible to him that believeth'), to the disciples in the storm (4<sup>40</sup> 'Why are ye fearful? Have ye not faith?')

The words about the power to remove mountains (Mk 11<sup>23</sup> || Mt 21<sup>21</sup>) occur also in a different connexion in Mt 17<sup>20</sup> (and in the rebuke administered to the disciples for their 'lack of faith' in dealing with the epileptic—a case of special difficulty). They have a proverbial ring,* and may have been used by our Lord more than once (cf. Lk 17<sup>6</sup> 'If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye would say to this sycamine tree, Be thou rooted up, etc.').

In one instance 'faith' is used in the Synoptic Gospels in a way that suggests the technical sense so frequent in the Epistles, viz. Lk 18<sup>8</sup> ('When the Son of man comes, shall he find faith on the earth?') Here 'faith' = faith in Himself as Messiah and Redeemer.

In the Acts and Epp πίστις, used absolutely, constantly occurs in a soteriological sense = 'saving faith'. It rapidly became a Christian technical term, and practically stood as a synonym for Christianity, marking out the new religion as essentially characterized by faith or belief in Jesus as Redeemer 'Believers' of Christians; 'to believe' = to become a Christian. In the Synoptics, used with this usage, the term in the Synoptics is, to some extent, undeveloped in meaning. Yet how near the soteriological lies to the 'miracle-faith' (πιστις) in such a case as the lame man at the Gate of Bethesda (Lk 14<sup>1-2</sup>)? The name hath his name made this man strong, whom ye behold and know; yea, the faith that is through him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all', here 'faith in the Name' (of Jesus) is described as 'faith brought into being by Him' (ἐκ τῆς πίστεως αὐτοῦ), and the same conclusion is reached in a comparison of the language of Mt 9<sup>2</sup>, Mk 2<sup>5</sup>, Lk 7<sup>1</sup> ('Thy sins are forgiven thee'), as well as from the language of Lk 7<sup>1</sup>, Mt 9<sup>2</sup>, Mk 2<sup>5</sup>.

(2) In the Fourth Gospel the absence of the substantive (πίστις)—which does not occur at all—is made up for by the frequent use of the verb (πιστεύω).

πιστεύω rarely occurs in the NT in the weakened sense 'to credit', 'give credence to', only once apparently in a non-religious act (Mt 24<sup>23</sup> 28, Mk 13<sup>21</sup>—in the warning about false Christs, 'believe it not'), elsewhere of assent given to some definite act, event, or fact in the religious sphere of believing prayer (Mt 21<sup>22</sup> 'Whoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing ye shall receive'), belief in the fact of the resurrection of Christ (Lk 24<sup>48</sup>), in God's word of promise (Lk 14<sup>29</sup>; cf. Ac 26<sup>27</sup>), in Jesus whether regarding earthly or heavenly things (Lk 22<sup>67</sup>); of faith generally in the word of God (Jn 1<sup>7</sup>) that they may not believe and be saved, cf. Jn 17).

The usual sense of the verb in the Fourth Gospel is a soteriological one. It expresses saving faith directed to the Person of Christ. In some instances, it is true, the immediate object of the faith is the wonder-working power of Jesus (the 'miracle-faith'): Jn 4<sup>48</sup> 'Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will in no wise believe', 11<sup>40</sup>.§ But here also the same remark applies as to the similar cases in the Synoptics—that the 'miracle-faith' is indistinguishable from the other (cf. Jn 4<sup>48</sup> with v. 53 and 9<sup>38</sup>, and 11<sup>40</sup> with v. 15 and 12<sup>39</sup>). In the following instances, however, the direct soteriological significance is clear and unmistakable. 3<sup>15</sup> 18 41 42 73 54 68 69 74 98 102 26 115 123 142 163 193 201. Of these passages the two last are particularly instructive: 'That ye may believe' (19<sup>35</sup>), and 'These are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name' (20<sup>31</sup>). Here faith occupies a fundamental place. Its essential object is defined to be the belief that Jesus is 'the Christ, the Son of God.'

Once again the conclusion is reinforced that the undefined 'to believe' is practically a synonym for 'to be a Christian.' Indeed, it may be inferred from the NT usage generally of πιστεύειν that before the disciples were called 'Christians' (Ac 11<sup>26</sup>), they were designated 'believers' (**οἱ πιστεύοντες* is used as a participle in Mk 9<sup>24</sup>, but as a subst. perhaps in Ac 5<sup>14b</sup>). And believers were the more added to the Lord'). Sometimes οἱ πιστοί is used in an equivalent sense (e.g. Ac 10<sup>45</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>21</sup>, Rev 17<sup>14</sup>, cf. the use of πιστός in Jn 1<sup>7</sup>), and ἀπιστοί occurs in the same sense of 'unbelievers' (e.g. 2 Co 4<sup>6</sup> 14<sup>4</sup>, cf. Jn 20<sup>27</sup>, Mt 13<sup>11</sup>, Lk 9<sup>41</sup>). Cf. the cognate use of ἀπιστία, 'unbelief' (Mk 9<sup>24</sup> 16<sup>14</sup>, Mt 13<sup>18</sup>, Mk 9<sup>6</sup>, also in the Epp.), ἀπιστεῖν, 'disbelieve' (Mk 16<sup>11</sup> 16, Lk 24<sup>11</sup> 41, Ac 28<sup>24</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>7</sup>), and ὀλιγοπιστία, 'of little faith' (Mt 6<sup>30</sup> 8<sup>26</sup> 14<sup>31</sup> 16<sup>8</sup>, Lk 12<sup>28</sup>), ὀλιγοπιστία, 'little faith,' occurs Mt 17<sup>20</sup>.

5. Some characteristics of the Johannine conception of 'faith.'—The fundamental conception of 'faith' in the Fourth Gospel coincides with that of the other NT writers; it consists essentially in trustful self-committal to Christ and His salvation. Only it is concerned less than in the Synoptics with the appropriation of directly revealed facts; it moves rather in the sphere of eternal facts, and directs itself more exclusively to the Person of Christ. Trust in God and in Christ are equated (14<sup>1</sup>); faith characterizes those who recognize His Divine mission (cf. also 16<sup>30</sup>), and they are described as those 'who believe in his name.' The result of faith is an acknowledgment of Christ's unity with the Father (10<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>11</sup>).

Faith (πιστεύειν) and knowledge (γινώσκειν) are closely related ideas in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 6<sup>69</sup>). Whether they express the same truth looked at from different sides. 'To know' (γινώσκειν) in the Johannine language expresses the perception of eternal truth; 'to believe,' a temporal discovery and appropriation. The former is therefore the fruit of the latter (cf. esp. 10<sup>38</sup> 'believe . . . that ye may know'). The intellectual element is thus the product of a moral act, and is conditioned by it. Faith is not the result of logical operations, but is due to the Divine revelation. 'No man can come to me, except the Father who sent me draw him'). Where faith is not attained, this is due to the distraction exercised by lower and earthly ambitions or ideals ('glory one of another,' 5<sup>44</sup>), or the deliberate choice of darkness rather than light (3<sup>19</sup>, cf. v. 21). Trust is also shown to be characteristic of a real faith, which does not need 'signs,' and has risen above the necessities of 'sight' (20<sup>29</sup>). The boon which faith appropriates is eternal life (5<sup>24</sup>).

There is evident in the treatment of faith characteristic of the Fourth Gospel a spirit of protest against the false and exaggerated views of knowledge that were beginning to affect the Church. The subtle and pervasive danger of Gnosticism, with its dangerous glorification of a merely intellectual knowledge, and its contempt for simple faith, had to be met. This was effected in the Fourth Gospel, 'on the one hand by deepening the idea of knowledge to the knowledge of experience' (which is the fruit of simple faith), 'and on the other by insisting upon the immediate entrance of every believer into the possession [of salvation].'† The writer of the Fourth Gospel 'would indeed have believers know what they believe, and who He is in whom they put their trust, and what He has done for them, and is doing, and will do in and through them; but this is not that they may know these things simply as intellectual propositions, but that they may rest on them in faith, and know them in personal experience.'‡ Nothing is more characteristic of the Johannine conception than the insistence on the present experience and participation in eternal life of believers. 'He that believeth hath eternal life' (3<sup>36</sup> 5<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>47</sup> 54; cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 15 5<sup>11-12</sup>). The inheritance of the true Christian was not merely a future boon,—though the future had in store for him a greater glory than that of the present,—but the simple believer, by the mere act of faith, was already placed on a plane of life to which no knowledge could attain.*

It is worth noting in this connexion that ἀλλοθεν (which like πιστός is employed in the LXX to translate אֲמוּנָה) seems to be used in the Fourth Gospel in the sense of 'rectitude,' rather than with the meaning 'obligatory' (e.g. 14<sup>15</sup> καὶ ἀλλοθεν = אֲמוּנָה וְאֵת אֲמוּנָה, and by ἀλλοθεν is to obligatory re . . . the phrase τοῖς τοῖς ἀλλοθεν = 'to do the right,' i.e. to act conscientiously, also 8<sup>42</sup> 40 45 46 17<sup>17</sup> 19, and possibly also in 14<sup>15</sup> 17 15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>14</sup> 18<sup>37</sup>—in all which passages the connotation seems to be a moral one ('faithfulness,' 'rectitude') rather than a purely intellectual one ('truth').

6. The Johannine and Pauline conceptions of 'faith' contrasted.—This is not the place for an extended review of the Pauline view of faith, but one or two salient points of contrast with the Johannine may be briefly indicated. The different method of presentation in each case is explained by the different circumstances under which each was formulated. In the interests of spiritual religion the Apostle of the Gentiles was forced to wage uncompromising war with Jewish legalistic conceptions of religion and prejudices in favour of their own privileged religious position, which (naturally enough) were ingrained in the Jewish consciousness, and threatened to pass over into the Christian Church.† As in the Jewish privilege and advantages, St. Paul maintained the great principle that in the domain of salvation there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile, and that the Jew has no other righteousness than that which comes through faith in Jesus Christ (Gal 3<sup>7</sup>), being in this respect in exactly the same position as the Gentile (cf. Ro 3<sup>30</sup>). From this certain important results follow: (1) That 'no man is justified by the law' (Gal 2<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>11</sup>, Ro 3<sup>20</sup>), and (2) that 'a man is justified by faith alone, apart from works of law.' This thesis was fully developed by St. Paul in his great epistle to the Romans. The absolute sufficiency of this saving faith is above all shown in the contemplation of its object. 'It is because faith lays hold of Jesus Christ, who was delivered up for our trespasses and was raised for our justification (Ro 4<sup>25</sup>), and makes us the possessors of the righteousness of God through Him, that there is no room for any righteousness of our own in the ground of our salvation (Ro 10<sup>3</sup>, Eph 2<sup>9</sup>)' (Warfield). See, further, JUSTIFICATION.

On the other hand, the Johannine presentation is determined by an environment of different circumstances. The false emphasis laid on a merely intellectual knowledge had to be met. Hence the insistence in the Fourth Gospel on the true knowledge of Christian experience which is the fruit of a simple faith. It is regarded as a precious and permanent present possession. Briefly it may be said that 'faith with St. John is rather contemplative and philosophic, where with St. Paul it is active and enthusiastic.'‡

7. The place of 'faith' in the teaching of Jesus.—Christ no less than St. Paul combated the prevailing tendency among the Jews to rest in a * Teaching of Jesus, i p. 239 (Eng. tr.) God's faithfulness to His promises, as shown esp. in blessing His people, is an attribute constantly insisted on in the OT.

† As has already been pointed out above, 'faith' was regarded in Jewish circles as of the highest religious significance and value; only, in the background of the Jewish mind there always lurked the consciousness of privilege and superiority.

position of privilege (cf. Mt 3<sup>9</sup>, Ro 2<sup>17</sup>). But the dominant characteristic of His teaching, both in the Synoptics and in the Fourth Gospel, is the consistent way in which He strives to draw all faith to Himself. Even when His language is general in character (Mk 11<sup>22</sup>, Mt 21<sup>22</sup>, Mk 9<sup>24</sup>, Lk 18<sup>8</sup>), He speaks in a way that necessarily fixes attention upon His own Person as God's unique representative on earth. The significance of the so-called 'already' has been pointed out above. This comes out especially in such a passage as Mt 9<sup>2</sup>, where healing of the body is conjoined with the claim to forgive sins. That Christ is the proper object of this soteriological faith is attested even in the Synoptic account, Mt 18<sup>6</sup> (|| Mk 9<sup>42</sup>), Lk 7<sup>50</sup>; cf. Lk 24<sup>45-46</sup>. It is in the Fourth Gospel, however, in the intimate discourses of Jesus which are there preserved, that the fullest account is given of the teaching of our Lord on this subject. Here, as is natural, faith in its higher aspects is consistently and abundantly set forth, as reflected and mirrored in the recollection of the 'disciple whom Jesus loved.' In the Fourth Gospel we are confronted with the personal testimony of the disciple who was uniquely fitted both by temperament and by character to receive and assimilate the deepest thoughts of his Master.

The testimony of the Fourth Gospel on this subject cannot be more fully summed up than in the words of W. A. Rieu:

'In these discourses, too, Jesus seeks to bind men to Him by faith. The chief object, consequently with the nature of the discourses recorded, much more prevailing stress is laid upon the higher aspects of faith, and we see Jesus striving specially to attract to Himself a faith consciously set upon eternal good. In a number of instances we find ourselves where as in the Synoptics (12<sup>28-29</sup>) where He offers Himself as the object of faith, and in the Fourth Gospel He begins at the level at which He finds His hearers, and in the Fourth Gospel He deals with these higher things. It is so that He deals with Nicodemus (3<sup>12</sup>); and it is so that He deals constantly with the Jews, everywhere requiring faith in Himself for eternal life (5<sup>24-25</sup>, 28, 39, 40, 47, 58, 64, 102, 36, 124, 46), declaring that faith in Him is the certain outcome of faith in their own Scriptures (7<sup>38-39</sup>), and that the witness borne Him by God in His own Son (1<sup>7</sup>, 10, 18, 19, 33, 34, 35, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100) is indeed witnessed by faith in God (1<sup>7</sup>, 38, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100) and is the one thing which God requires of them (6<sup>29</sup>), and the failure of which will bring them eternal ruin (3<sup>18</sup>, 5<sup>38</sup>, 6<sup>64</sup>, 8<sup>24</sup>). When dealing with His followers, His primary care was to build up their faith in Him. Witness especially His solicitude for their faith in the last hours of His intercourse with them. For the faith they had reposed in Him He returns thanks to God (17<sup>7</sup>), but He is still nursing their faith (16<sup>27</sup>) preparing for its increase through the events to come (14<sup>10</sup>) and with almost passionate eagerness claiming it at their hands (14<sup>10</sup>, 11, 12). Even after His death they find Him restoring the faith of the wavering (16<sup>26</sup>), which pronounce a special blessing on those who should hereafter believe on Him (16<sup>27</sup>), evidence—words whose point is not fully caught in the fact that they contain an intimation of the work of the Apostles, as, like His own, bringing men to faith in Him (17<sup>21</sup>).

The fundamental position of faith in the Christian religion, which is so strikingly expressed and implied throughout the whole NT literature, justifies the distinction of the old and new covenants as the ages before and after the 'coming of faith' (Gal 3<sup>23-25</sup>). At the same time the way had been prepared for this historically by the circumstances of the time. The more the fulfilment of Israel's national hopes by special Divine interposition seemed to recede, the more stress was laid upon the necessity of trust and faith in the Divine ordering as a religious duty.

FAITHFULNESS.—The quality of being faithful. 'Fidelity,' in the sense of trustworthiness, is a synonym; so also 'loyalty,' 'constancy.' The thought is not primarily of belief entertained (although that is latent); rather of right conduct which, from right motive, demands and receives approval. Thus George Eliot (Span. Gipsy, v.)—

'The deepest hunger of a faithful heart
Is faithfulness'

The noun does not occur in the Gospels. There is, however, allusion to those in whom the quality (πιστότης) is conspicuous; they are the 'faithful' (πιστοί) of Mt 24<sup>45</sup> 25<sup>21, 23</sup>, Lk 12<sup>42</sup> 16<sup>10-12</sup>—where the word πιστός has the meaning of being trustworthy in the discharge of duty. It is then conduct, not their creed, to which attention is specially directed. At the same time it should be remarked that the πιστότης implied (certainly in Mt 24<sup>45</sup> 25<sup>21, 23</sup>, Lk 12<sup>42</sup>) is closely bound up with an allegiance owned and recognized. It is suggestive of faith which, because genuine, compels to loyal obedience, and cannot but issue in works ('La foi qui n'agit point, est-ce une foi sincère?' Racine). The trusty are the trustful (cf. I Th 5<sup>14</sup>, 155); and it is only those who are able to cling external to themselves who are most serviceable. See FAITH. H. L. JACKSON.

FALL.—The various questions suggested in regard to the relation of the Fall to Jesus Christ may be treated under the following heads:

- i. The Messianic element in the story of the Fall.
- ii. The Fall in its bearing on the work of Christ in (1) the Incarnation, (2) the Cross, (3) the Resurrection.
- iii. The Fall in its bearing on the life of the Christian.
- iv. Our Lord's own teaching on the Fall.

i. THE MESSIANIC ELEMENT IN THE STORY OF THE FALL.—It is not within the scope of this Dictionary to discuss the general character of the OT narrative of the Fall. We may here simply assume as accepted the view that in Gn 3 we have an account, cast in the pictorial form characteristic of the period to which it belongs, of the beginning of human sin, with its attendant evils of suffering and death. Whatever opinion may be held as to the literary materials and composition of the narrative, it commends itself as in all essential features a reliable and authoritative record of great importance for human life and history; and its Divine inspiration is sufficiently attested by the profound truthfulness and significance of its moral and religious teaching.

In the midst of this story of sin and judgment we find the first promise of restoration, and thus the Divine purpose of redemption is brought into association with the very beginnings of human evil. 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel' (Gn 3<sup>15</sup>). That this utterance contains the germ of Messianic prophecy cannot be doubted; but care must be taken to make neither too much nor too little of this element in it, and to interpret the passage in accordance with sound principles of historical exegesis, with due reference to the context, and to the general characteristics of OT prophecy. The embodiment of this Protevangelium in the primitive religious tradition, and in the inspired record of it, is a testimony to the fact that the Divine purpose of redemption is coeval with the existence of human sin. From the time when the consciousness of guilt and corruption first dawned in the human heart, there was also present the hope of restoration, and of man's ultimate triumph over those powers of evil by which he had been temporarily vanquished. This is the germ of which all the redemptive promise and prophecy of the OT are the development. Three progressive ideas may be traced in the teaching—

(1) Under the symbolism of the serpent, which the serpent species is regarded, there is conveyed the truth that there would be continual and deadly conflict between the human race and the powers of evil, each seeking to destroy the other. (2) The hopeful element in the struggle is indicated, and man's final victory suggested, by the specific way in which the conflict is described—'It shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.' (3) There underlies the statement with regard to mankind in general the remoter and deeper significance applicable to the representative Man, in and through whom the warfare was to be brought to a crisis and a victorious issue.

The order of these points may also be taken as indicating the line along which the full meaning of the saying would unfold itself. It is one of those pregnant utterances of revelation whose content is gradually realized and defined by the progress of events. The Messianic ideas contained in it are as yet vague and general, yet real; rudimentary, but fundamental; implicit rather than explicit; yet enough to keep a spark of hope alive, and to inspire faith and effort till clearer light came in the providential unfolding of God's redemptive plan.

ii THE FALL IN RELATION TO THE WORK OF CHRIST.—The fact of man's fallen condition, of which the narrative of Gn 3 is the historical explanation, is the raison d'être of redemption, and thus the Fall is very closely related to the whole work of Christ at every point. But it is with the effects rather than with the manner or history of the Fall that the gospel is supremely concerned, and after the story has once for all been given at the beginning of revelation, it is thereafter but little referred to in Scripture, and is scarcely ever brought into direct relation with redemption, except in two classical passages in the writings of St. Paul, viz. in Ro 5 and 1 Co 15. Our attention will here be confined to those points in which the Fall comes into more direct relation with the work of Christ, or in which the fall of man in Adam and his restoration in Christ serve to illuminate each other.

1. The relation of the Fall to the Incarnation.

—The question here raised is between the two views expressed respectively by the words of Augustine, 'Si Iesus non esset incarnatus, Deus tamen incarnatus esset licet non crucifixus.' The common belief has hitherto been that the whole mission and work of Christ were solely conditioned by the Fall. But the other view with regard to the Incarnation, maintained by the Scotists in the Middle Ages and by other distinguished thinkers, has of late gained fresh currency, especially in connexion with modern evolutionary philosophy. The relation of the Fall to the Incarnation determines the place of the latter in the plan of redemption, and opens up the question whether the Incarnation was subsidiary to the Atonement, or the Atonement a development and modification of the Incarnation.

(i.) The view that an Incarnation was, independently of sin, the consummation of God's purpose in relation to mankind, has been supported by arguments which can here only be briefly mentioned.

(a) The metaphysical argument that a possibility of becoming man must have existed eternally in the being of God, otherwise no Incarnation could have taken place. In other words, there was in God a 'self-disposition' for incarnation, a necessity (ethical, not metaphysical) for God, who is love, to make a perfect self-communication to His moral and spiritual creatures.

(b) The very conception of the Mediator in redemption implies a necessary and eternal relation both to God and to man, which, even apart from sin, would have found its issue in incarnation. The Mediator is necessary for the perfecting of the world no less than for its redemption, and has a cosmical significance wider and deeper than His work as Redeemer.

(c) As Christ is necessary for the world's redemption, Incarnation may be held to be involved in the very nature of the world. This is the counterpart of the preceding arguments, and is as old as Irenæus. It means that man has in his very nature a need and a capacity for Christ, corresponding to love, and thus quite apart from sin, Incarnation is solely on the need of redemption, is to make Christ a means and not an end in Himself, or, in more modern language, to reduce the most glorious manifestation of God for the redemption of humanity to an expedient contingent upon the existence of sin. In Christ alone, as the centre and end, is the highest fulfilment of this plan.

(e) These somewhat speculative lines of reasoning are not without Scripture warrant. In Col 1:15 and Eph 1:10 we have at least a grand Christocentric plan for the universe, antecedent to, and occupying a plane quite above, the contingency of human sin. Christ is here presented in relation to the Universe as 'the firstborn of all creation,' in whom and unto whom all things were created, in whom all things hold together, and who becomes also 'the head of the body, the Church,' and 'the firstborn from the dead.' It was God's eternal purpose 'to sum up all things in Christ,' in whom also we were made a heritage (cf. also Jn 1:3, He 1:2, 1 Co 8:6, Rev 3:14 etc.). Redemption is here presented as the fulfilment of a harmonious plan, the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end of creation, the beginning and the consummation of God's eternal purpose.

(ii.) The commonly received view that the Incarnation is simply a necessary part of the work of redemption, is supported by the prima facie teaching of Scripture. 'The Son of man came to seek and to save' (Lk 19:10); 'God sent forth his Son . . . that he might redeem' (Gal 4:4). These are examples of innumerable passages which represent the mission of Christ in this light. But to this it may be answered that, though actually the Incarnation has taken place, it is in its aspect, and is naturally and properly so presented in the Gospel, another view of it, under different conditions, is not excluded, of which, as we have seen, we are in fact permitted brief glimpses in a wider field of vision.

(iii.) Both the foregoing views may be united and harmonized in what is really the truest and deepest conception, viz. that God's purpose is an eternal and unchangeable unity, and every part of it, as wrought out in history, must be regarded as having its proper place in relation to the whole. It is by a providential absolute being and counsel at all questions as to what might have been done under other conditions. The view of the question before us which is most worthy of a true conception of God, and which at the same time is in accordance with the broad teaching of Scripture is that in the eternal counsels of Him who sees the end from the beginning, Redemption is wrought into the very plan of God's eternal purpose, all parts of which—Creation, Redemption, Incarnation, Atonement, the Final Consummation,—hang together harmoniously as integral and correlated elements in one homogeneous, perfect, and eternal unity. The question as to the relation of the Incarnation thus resolves itself into that of the place of the Fall in God's plan of the world; and we need not hold with hyper-Calvinists that sin was foreordained, in order to believe that the Fall, foreseen and permitted, enters into an intimate and essential relation to the whole of the Divine plan. In this plan Incarnation holds a central place, and its redemptive significance is one aspect of a wider relation to the world, as the means for perfecting as well as for redeeming the human race. This view pre-serves the place of Redemption in the foreground of God's revealed plan, avoids the necessity of conceiving any change in the Divine purpose contingent upon sin, and at the same time gives the Incarnation that cosmical

... worthy of its transcendent character. It is central and supreme, and the whole scheme of Redemption is presented in a true perspective, more in harmony with the requirements of modern thought.

2. The relation of the Fall to the redemptive work of Christ.—In the distinctively soteriological aspects of Christ's work, we are brought at once into close relation to the Fall. We have here to consider (1) the reality and general nature of the Fall, as seen in the light of Redemption; and (2) the main points of detail in which the Fall and the redeeming work of Christ explain and illustrate each other.

(1.) The doctrine of the Fall is vital to the Christian system; the reality and general nature of the by the redemptive work of Christ. This aspect of Christ's work, which occupies in Scripture the foremost place, is everywhere represented as rendered necessary by something grievously abnormal in the condition of the human race. The Scripture doctrine of sin as absolute evil; man's universal sinfulness, and state of spiritual death, which form the very basis of Redemption; the representation of mankind as 'lost,' 'alienated' from God, and yet capable and worthy of being redeemed and restored;—all this, as so abundantly presented and in connexion with the atoning work of Christ, is the strongest confirmation of the doctrine that man has fallen from a higher condition. Whatever may be said as to the Incarnation (see 1, above), it is clear that the great fact of the Atonement, with all the suffering and sacrifice which it involved, can only be accounted for at once by the dignity and the degradation of man,—in other words, by the Fall.

(ii.) This is borne out by the more specific teaching in regard to the Fall in its relation to the work of Christ in Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup> and 1 Co 15<sup>21-22</sup>. The general and clear line of argument in the former passage brings out the following points:

Adam's act of disobedience brought death upon all men in (a) Sin, and (b) Death. By sin is here meant both actual sinfulness ('for that all sinned,' v. 12), and a condition of liability to penalty even apart from personal transgression (v. 13). This latter, however, is not to be held in any sense as personal participation in or responsibility for Adam's offence, though it is the transmitted effect of it (see below). Death here means physical death in the first place (as in v. 12), but most probably includes also spiritual death. On the other hand, though the analogy is not fully expressed, it is clearly implied that in the same way Christ's act of obedience brings (a) Justification and (b) Life; and in view of the emphatic reiteration, in various forms, of the surpassing fullness of Redemption in vv. 15-17, we may include under these terms: negatively, deliverance from guilt, from sin itself, and from death; and positively, the bestowment of judicial and actual righteousness, and of spiritual and eternal life.

Another question raised in this connexion is concerned with the precise moral relationship between Adam and his posterity on the one hand, and between Christ and His people on the other. Adam and Christ ('the second Adam') are represented as standing in an analogous relation to mankind, forming the basis in the one case of universal sin and death, and in the other of restoration for believers. In regard to Adam it has been variously held (1) that the relation between him and his posterity was virtually one of identity; mankind united in him and therefore share his guilt; (2) that the relation is representative or federal, Adam acting on behalf of his descendants; and (3) that the relation is natural, the evil effects of Adam's fall being communicated to the race through the ordinary channels of heredity. The third view preserves any elements of truth in the other two, while it best explains the facts in harmony with true ethical principles. The transmitted effect of Adam's sin consists mainly of the loss of moral balance, an inward corruption of heart and will towards evil, a natural inability, for goodness. Though men are not personally implicated in the guilt of Adam's transgression, their condition involves demerit and necessitates redemption.* Turning to the other side, though we are not warranted in carrying the analogy too far, we find on the other side (1) a relation of identity with the Incarnation; (2) a representative or covenant relation with His people (see 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup> etc.), based on the one side on God's free grace, and on the other on believers' voluntary acceptance of it (Ro 5<sup>17</sup>); and (3) a vital union between Christ and believers by which new life is imparted and the evil effects of the Fall counteracted (Jn 15<sup>1-6</sup> etc.).

Christ is thus a new beginning for the fallen race, a fountain of life and righteousness, as Adam was of death and sin. Adam was a true 'figure of him that was to come,' a type based not on mere analogy, but on deep and real correspondences between his relation as 'psychical' parent to his natural descendants, and Christ's relation to His people as the 'second Adam,' the 'spiritual' originator of a regenerated race†

iii. THE FALL IN RELATION TO THE PERSON OF CHRIST.—The Fall of Adam, as we have seen, introduced into the nature of all descended from him a fatal taint of sin, an insuperable moral disability. The question now before us is, How did Jesus Christ, the new Adam, as a true member of the fallen race, escape this evil influence? That Christ in His nature and Person was absolutely free from sin, is one of the clearest and most generally admitted as well as most vital facts of the gospel. Born into the world in the line of human descent, sharing human nature otherwise in its fullness, how was Jesus alone unaffected by the common heritage of sin?

The full answer to this question lies hidden in the mystery of the Incarnation; but an indication of the line in which the solution lies is given in the great fact of the Virgin Birth of our Lord. The historical reality of this part of the Gospel narrative has been assailed by modern criticism, but the doctrine still retains its place in the best philosophy of the Incarnation, and the truth has been rather confirmed than otherwise by impartial study of the records. As a fact, the birth of Jesus in a supernatural manner commends itself to the mind in keeping with the whole scheme of Redemption. (1) It indicates a new departure, a fresh beginning, the introduction into the human race of a new element, and marks a break in the normal and fatal continuity of spiritual helplessness and decay. (2) It suggests, though it does not fully explain, means by which Christ could become true man and yet be preserved from the hereditary effects of the Fall. The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee: wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God' (Lk 1<sup>35</sup>). Those who deny the Virgin Birth have still to explain the equally miraculous fact of the appearance of this single exception to the universal sinfulness of mankind. The manner of Christ's birth, as recorded in the Gospels of Mt and Lk., is so fully in harmony with His unique personality and character, that, though we cannot fully understand, we may at least be satisfied that all form parts of one Divine plan, and thus the moral miracle and the physical mutually support one another. See art VIRGIN BIRTH.

iv. THE TEACHING OF CHRIST AND OF THE GOSPELS ON THE FALL.—Our Lord makes no reference to the story of the Fall in all His recorded teaching, His only allusion to our first parents at all being the general statement in connexion with marriage (Mt 19<sup>4</sup>, Mk 10<sup>9</sup>). But the doctrine of the Fall underlies the whole teaching of Christ on sin and redemption, and is particularly confirmed and illustrated in the following points:

(1) The universal sinfulness of man. This is taken for granted in all His teaching, e.g., 'being evil, know,' etc. (Mt 7<sup>18</sup>, Lk 11<sup>13</sup>). This truth is involved in the whole character of our Lord's mission and teaching. See also Jn 1<sup>29</sup> 37. (2) The inwardness of sin. 'Out of the heart come forth evil thoughts,' etc. '... These are the things which defile the man' (Mt 15<sup>19, 20</sup> and 11). Cf. also Mt 5<sup>21-23</sup>, Mk 10<sup>5</sup>, Lk 6<sup>45</sup>. (3) The deep radical character of human evil. 'Ye must be born anew' (Jn 3<sup>7</sup> and v. 3). (4) The hereditary disability of human nature. 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh,' etc. (Jn 3<sup>6</sup>; cf. 1<sup>13</sup>). (5) Jesus' teaching indicates clearly His view as to the corruption of man and value of man. 'What shall a man give in exchange if he shall gain the whole world, and forfeit his life?' (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>). Cf. Lk 15<sup>10</sup>, Mt 12<sup>12</sup>, etc.; and the general teaching of Jesus as to the Fatherhood of God. (6) Jesus may be said to be pictured for us more specifically in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>11</sup>) and the corresponding parables of the Lost Sheep and the Lost Piece of Money in the same chapter. (7) Generally the whole mission of Christ to ransom men (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>), to save (Mt 1<sup>21</sup>, Lk 19<sup>10</sup> etc.), and to restore to Divine Sonship (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>), is founded upon the doctrine of the Fall and the state of ruin resulting from it, combined with splendid possibilities of restoration through grace.

FALSE CHRISTS.—The term ψευδοχριστοί or pseudo-Christ occurs only in Mk 13<sup>22</sup> (cf. 13<sup>6</sup>) = Mt 24<sup>24</sup> (cf. 24<sup>5</sup>). Despite its omission in Mk. by D, etc., it probably belongs to the original text of the eschatological discourse. But this discourse forms one of the sections in the Synoptic narrative which are specially permeated by reflexions of the Apostolic Church; and even after a small Jewish or Jewish-Christian apocalypse has been disentangled from the discourse, the remaining logia, of which this forms one, require to be carefully scrutinized. They do not belong to the primitive tradition of Christ's sayings. Over them lie traces of the experiences of the early Christians during the latter half of the seventh decade in Palestine, when the political convulsion of the country was accompanied by religious agitation and moral crises of a strange nature. The 1st cent. of our era was full of unrest for the Jews of Palestine. As the pages of Josephus testify, one rival Messiah followed another, each and all appealing more or less in kindling the passions of the people against the Roman authorities. These popular leaders of revolt worked on the religious feeling of the nation. Messianic fanaticism became uncontrollable, and enthusiasts seduced the ardent by semi-political hopes (cf. Schurer, HJP I. ii § 20, and Volz, Jud. Eschatologie, 209-210).

If the words 'in my name' (Mk 13<sup>6</sup> = Mt 24<sup>5</sup>) mean 'in the name of Jesus,' it is difficult to understand them. For it is hard to think of any Christians claiming to be Jesus. Christian false prophets there might be, and were, but we have no evidence during the 1st cent. of pretenders to the name of Jesus. False Christs in this sense of the term are scarcely credible, though later ages have furnished specimens of the type, as, e.g., among some of the followers of George Fox the Quaker, who was himself accused of claiming to be Christ. Either, then, we must suppose that the phrase 'in my name' has been inserted by the Evangelists in order to stamp as Christian what was originally a Jewish prediction, or the phrase must be taken as equivalent to 'in the name of Messiah,' as is implied in 'I am he.' False Christs would thus be equivalent to false Messiahs (so Mk 13<sup>21</sup>, Mt 24<sup>23</sup>), and the logion would be a warning against the claims and pretensions of the numerous impostors who swarmed in Palestine down to the days of Bar Cochba (131-135 A.D.), their last representative. It is in the light of this retrospect that Justin Martyr (about 155 A.D.) quotes this saying in his Dialogue (82. 308 C) thus: 'Our Lord said many false prophets and false Christs would come in His name and deceive many; which is the case.' The false prophets, of course, are the heralds of the false Messiahs; they guarantee the movement in the name of Jesus by means of miracles. But occasionally a false Messiah may have been, as Theudas was, a false prophet as well. The Didache, curiously enough, omits all mention of false Messiahs, though it notices the danger of false prophets (xvi. 3; cf. however, what is said in xvi. 4 about the appearing of the world-deceiver as Son of God).

The locale of the false Messiahs (Mt 24<sup>26</sup>) is either the wilderness (cf. Ac 21<sup>38</sup>), as in the case of Simon son of Gioras, or the inner chambers, as in the case of John of Giscala (cf. 1 K 20<sup>30</sup>)—alluding, possibly, to the current idea that the Messiah was to remain hidden for some time previous to His appearance in public. But whether the one or the other happened to be chosen, the salient point is that in either case the elect are to be kept right by a wholesome scepticism. 'Christians, at Israel's great crisis, were to be saved by unbelief in pseudo-Messiahs and pseudo-prophets' (Expos. Gr. Test. i. 294). The situation would also manifest the difference between credulity and faith. Desperate situations foster an avid appetite for deliverance, which is too often indifferent to the particular quality of the aid offered. But faith keeps its head. Belief in Christ imparts a sanity of judgment which makes men cool even in emergencies. Finally, there is the thought that miracles of themselves are no guarantee of Divine authority.

The allusion in Jn 5<sup>43</sup> may be, but is not necessarily, to a single anti-Christ or pseudo-Christ, who, however, comes in his own name (cf. Loisy, Le Quatrième Évangile, p. 416). Neither here nor in Rev 13<sup>14</sup> 20<sup>10</sup> have we to do with an epitome or individual incarnation of the deceivers foretold in the Synoptic narrative. The plane of thought is at once later and different.

FALSE PROPHETS.—1. For the understanding of this expression in the NT, we must correctly understand the character of the false prophets of the OT. To earlier writers these men were essentially and consciously false, either prophets of false gods, holders of opinions which did not agree with the revealed character of Jehovah the God of Israel, or men who knowingly spoke falsehoods in the name of Jehovah. Modern biblical science takes a more lenient view. It does not deny the existence of such as either possible or actual (Jer 28, Ezk 13<sup>1-9</sup>), though in the matter of creed many of them were probably 'syncretistic' rather than simply 'anti-Jehovistic' (A. B. Davidson). The majority may be regarded rather as men accustomed to the outward signs of the prophetic office, the hairy mantle (Zec 13<sup>4</sup>, cf. 1 K 19<sup>10</sup>), the methods of prophetic instruction (Jer 28<sup>10</sup>), and the use of the prophetic formula, 'Thus saith Jehovah' (Jer 23<sup>28-31</sup>, Ezk 13<sup>8</sup>), but who had never come under the influence of, or had failed to remain in personal contact with, the revealing Spirit 'who spake by the prophets.' Hence the message they gave was merely one that was agreeable to the common thought of the people, whether it concerned the internal condition and life of the nation or its relation to surrounding States. It was principally in the latter period of Micah, Jeremiah, and Zephaniah that these prophets of smooth things, subject to no true and Divine revelation, came to be regarded as professional tricksters, making a living out of their false predictions (Mic 3<sup>5</sup>, Zec 13<sup>4-5</sup>). But whether from the desire of gain or of public favour, these false prophets expressed the optimistic, what would be regarded as the patriotic, view of the state and future of their country, and have been described as 'nationalistic rather than false.' It is this optimistic, nationalist outlook that is especially expressed in the reference in Lk 6<sup>26</sup>, 'in which they say, "Blessed be they that hate their fathers (speak well) to the false prophets." The false prophets, as declaring the things the nation wished to hear, naturally succeeded in gaining general approval and credence. This is particularly shown in Jer 6<sup>13-15</sup> and Mic 2<sup>11</sup>, and is confirmed by instances, not a few, in which the apparently unpatriotic attitude of the true prophet, compared with that assumed by the false, resulted in disfavour and even in persecution (1 K 22<sup>27</sup>, 2 Ch 16<sup>10</sup>, Jer 20<sup>2</sup>). It was the false prophet, representing the national 'wish that is father to the lie' of whom 'all men spoke well.' Our Lord therefore takes such as types of that ill-deserved general approval which may be won by flattery, by concealment of the truth, by the denying or minimizing of danger and of retribution: methods denied to those who 'are of the truth.' This view of false prophecy as the saying of things men wish to hear 'for the hue of wrongdoing,' is to be discerned in 2 P 2<sup>2f.</sup>, where the false prophet is the analogue of the false teacher, himself guilty of 'lascivious doings' (cf. vv. 18-19 for the character of this teaching).

2. The false prophets in the Christian Church.—In the NT as in the OT, the prophetic ministry must be regarded in its two branches as interpretative of God's mind and as predictive. False prophets of both these classes were to be expected in the Christian community. To grasp the significance of the warnings against these men, the importance of prophecy in NT times must be borne in mind. Prophecy was a more important gift than tongues (1 Co 14), and the prophet is in the list of officers associated with the Apostles, taking, with this one exception, precedence of all other ranks. The prominence of the prophet may be seen in the Didache (ch. 11), and in the part played by him in the Montanist movement. Hence their truth or falseness, their faithful use, or their abuse of the spiritual gift, was an important factor for the infant Church. Hence our Lord warns against them as 'wolves in sheep's clothing' (Mt 7<sup>15</sup>), and St. John at the end of the Apostolic age repeats the warning (1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>). In the former case the reference is apparently to their unethical teaching; in the latter to their denial or misinterpretation of the fact of the Incarnation. Without using the name, our Lord warns also against such men, as falsely predicting or announcing the Parousia (Mt 24<sup>5-7</sup>). In 2 P 2 stress is laid upon false teaching of an antinomian character, the authors of which are called 'false teachers,' but find their analogy in the 'false prophets' of the OT.

FALSE WITNESS.—The prohibition in the Decalogue of bearing false witness was endorsed by Christ (ὁ ψευδομαρτυροῦν, Mt 19<sup>18</sup>). Originally it dealt, not with lying in general, but with lying against one's neighbour, because this is the most heinous form of lying (see Dale, Ten Commandments, p. 218). Was it merely for brevity that the limiting clause was dropped by Christ? or did it not rather imply a broadening and deepening of the commandment? Like other sins, ψευδομαρτυρία come from the heart (Mt 15<sup>18</sup>).

At the trial of Jesus before Caiaphas, the chief priests of the Sanhedrin council sought (ἐζητοῦν) false witness on which such a capital charge might be based as would demand Pilate's attention (Mt 26<sup>59</sup>, Mk 14<sup>55</sup>); ὡς μὲν ἐκείνοις ἐδόκει μαρτυρίαν, ὡς δὲ τῇ ἀληθείᾳ ψευδομαρτυρίαν (Euthym. Zig.); but the latter is seen to mean more than this. 'Hic (ἐζητοῦν) illa falsorum testium exortia copia' (Bengel). While nominally judges, they were really prosecutors as they showed by the rule that witnesses for the defence should first be called (see Westcott on Jn 18<sup>21</sup>). Though many false witnesses came (Mt 26<sup>60</sup>) and bore false witness (Mk 14<sup>66</sup>), yet their witness agreed not together (οὐκ αὖ μαρτυροῦντες ὅτι ἦσαν, ἰδ.), i.e. they were not consistent with each other, since it was necessary that two at least should agree (Dt 17<sup>6</sup>), and witnesses were examined separately, not in the presence of each other (see Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, ii. 560). Some (Erasmus, Grot. etc.) take ὅτι in the sense of 'sufficient for the purpose, equal to the demand for weighty evidence, and justifying condemnation.' The parallel words in Mt 26<sup>60, 66</sup> lend some support ('sought false witness against Jesus that they might put him to death; and they found it not, though many false witnesses came'); but it is a strong objection that οὐδὲ ὅτις ἴση is used of the witness of those who perverted His words concerning the temple (Mk 14<sup>63</sup>), which constituted a very grave charge; cf. Ac 6<sup>13, 14</sup> (cf. Expositor's Greek Testament on Mk 14<sup>66</sup>).

Even the spies who constantly laid wait for Him had caught up nothing to serve their purpose; but at last two false witnesses (Mt 26<sup>60</sup>; τῶν, Mk 14<sup>67</sup>) came, who perverted certain words spoken at the beginning of His ministry (Jn 2<sup>19</sup>); but their testimony also was not ἴση. Taking the meaning as 'did not agree together,' the difference may perhaps be traced in Mt. (δύναμαι καταλύσαι) and Mk. (ἐγὼ καταλύσω); certainly the perversion is evident, since they ascribed to Him that destruction which He ascribed to the Jews. It has been inferred from Mt 27<sup>63</sup> that the rulers knew the true meaning; but perhaps this is better referred to a knowledge of Christ's words in Mk 8<sup>31</sup> etc. This false witness might have sufficed; no other charge could be so effective before the Roman Procurator as that of being a fanatical seducer of the ignorant populace, who might lead them on to wild tumultuous acts; while the claim that He would, or was able to, rebuild the temple within three days might be made to imply Divine or magical pretensions (see Edersheim, op. cit. ii. 559); but it also broke down (οὐδὲ οὐτως ἰσχυρὴ ἡ μαρτυρία αὐτῶν), cf. Ps 27<sup>12</sup> 35<sup>11</sup>.

On the law concerning false witness see Hastings' DB iv. 351<sup>a</sup>; Edersheim, op. cit. ii. 558. Witnesses who contradicted each other were not considered in Rabbinic law as false witnesses in the sense of being punishable. The Sadducees were less severe than the Pharisees in the interpretation of Dt 19<sup>16f</sup>; they held that the punishment should be inflicted only if the falsely accused had been convicted, whereas the Pharisees demanded that a sentence had been pronounced, whether it was executed or not.

LITERATURE.—Besides the works cited above, ref. may be made to Taylor Innes, Trial of Jesus Christ; and Rosadi, Trial of Jesus, ad loc; Schurer, HJP ii. 1. 194, Expositor, i. xii [1889] 276 f. W. H. DUNDAS.

FAME.—This term has had three meanings,—rumour, reputation, and posthumous renown. The last is modern; the Elizabethan usage lies between, or may include, the other two. Bacon, who left a Fragment on the subject, and who loved to quote the mythological idea of Fame as the daughter of the angry Earth and the sister of the warring Giants, understood by the term disturbing Rumour—a thing dangerous to governments. Milton, who in an early poem (Lycidas, 70 ff.) described 'the last infirmity of noble minds,' in a late poem analyzed the temptation to seek fame or glory, and poured scorn on human judgments (Par. Reg. iii. 21–151). In the Gospels the meaning is simpler. The term describes the spreading talk of the admiring multitudes. It is a thing unrestrainable, and in no small degree to the authorities.

We are told that early in the ministry of Jesus a fame of Him went forth from Galilee and the surrounding country, (Mt 4<sup>24</sup>, Lk 4<sup>14</sup>). Special occasions were the restoration of a demoniac (Mk 1<sup>28</sup>, Lk 4<sup>37</sup>) and the cleansing of a leper (Lk 5<sup>15</sup>, cf. Mk 1<sup>45</sup>). The First Gospel uses the term also in connexion with the restoring of Jairus' daughter and the giving of sight to two blind men (Mt 9<sup>35</sup>). And, finally, this Gospel tells us that the fame of Jesus affected Herod (Mt 14<sup>1</sup> RV 'report,' cf. Mk 6<sup>14</sup>, Lk 9<sup>7</sup>).

An examination of the Greek text shows that in no two parallel passages is the same term used. The term of the first two Gospels (except in Mt 9<sup>26</sup>) is ἀκοή (lit. 'hearing'; RV 'report'), used also for 'rumours' in the eschatological discourse (Mt 24<sup>6</sup>, Mk 13<sup>7</sup>). St. Luke, however, eschews this word, and in his three passages uses three others: φῆμη (lit. 'speech'; RV 'fame,' Lk 4<sup>14</sup>, so Mt 9); ἤχος (lit. 'sound'; RV 'report,' Lk 4<sup>37</sup>); and λόγος (lit. 'discourse'; RV 'report,' Lk 5<sup>15</sup>). And elsewhere each Evangelist uses periphrasis. Thus we may conclude that the idea expressed by these terms was of an indefinite character. It included, in varying degrees, such elements as curiosity, attraction, wonder, faith, worship.

These passages, taken along with others that not directly express admiration or astonishment (Mt 7<sup>12</sup> 15<sup>1</sup>), or that relate the concourse and following of multitudes (Mk 3<sup>7-9</sup> 6<sup>14</sup>, so 10<sup>46</sup>), show that during His whole public ministry the acts of Jesus arrested the gaze of men. Not only in Galilee, but in all the provinces of Palestine, and in cities of Syria, men talked and speculated regarding a new Figure that was in their midst. A few who cherished sacred tradition believed that the Messiah had come (Jn 1<sup>41</sup>, 49 7<sup>40</sup>, Mt 16<sup>4</sup> 21<sup>9</sup>). Others less instructed talked wildly as if Elijah had descended, or the Baptist had risen (Mk 6<sup>14</sup>, 15, Mt 16<sup>13</sup> 14), or some prophet of local tradition or expectation had appeared (Jn 7<sup>40</sup>, Mt 21<sup>11</sup>). Doubtless the multitudes that hung around Him were very mixed crowds. Vanity and selfishness mingled with their motives. They loved display. They desired a succession of palpable benefits. Some had political aims or ambitions. The majority failed to see the true renunciation and pure spirituality of His life. And few were able to sustain the devotion of their higher moments. To Jesus it was often a relief to find a place of solitude for meditation and prayer. Yet He acknowledged the true instinct of the untutored worshipper (Mt 21<sup>16</sup>). And it is to the honour of human nature to remember that the common people heard Him gladly (Mk 12<sup>37</sup>), and that not the nation at large, but the constituted authorities and their officialism, a proud and jealous officialism, the true Leader and Lord of men, the Shepherd and Bishop of souls. See, further, artt. AMBITION and GLORY.

R. SCOTT.

FAMILY.—1. Membership.—Jewish family life, while having many points in common with that of the Gentiles, was marked by a higher standard of purity, the avoidance of infanticide, and the condemnation of the selfish cruelty that in human sacrifice gave the fruit of the body for the sin of the soul (Mic 6<sup>7</sup>). The father was the head of the house, exercising restrictive authority over the wife, having complete disposal of the children, and giving his name to the family inheritance. Although living for years in another locality, he was regarded as belonging to the place of his birth (Mt 24<sup>2</sup>).

The wife, as being legally the purchased possession of her husband, was under his law,—the bē'ulah to her ba'al, or rightful possessor. Hence the land of Israel could be called the bē'ulah of Jehovah (Is 62<sup>4</sup>). Betrothal (Mt 1<sup>18</sup>), as a covenant, was equivalent to marriage; it prevented the woman from being married to any other man until she had received a writing of divorce. Among the duties of the wife, apart from the maternal charge of the family, was the daily preparation of the bread (Mt 24<sup>41</sup>), and the drawing of water from the village fountain (Jn 4<sup>7</sup>). The desire for male children was universal (Jn 16<sup>21</sup>), as these preserved the name and upheld the interests and rights of the family, and in due time enlarged its circle by bringing in daughters from other households. The pre-eminence of the father carried with it a corresponding responsibility of watching over the life and honour, the rights and welfare of his family. See artt. DIVORCE, MARRIAGE.

2. References to the family.—It was out of such relationships that Christ drew examples that were familiar to all, when He spoke of fathers who knew how to give good gifts to their children (Lk 11<sup>13</sup>), of sons who obeyed or disobeyed the father's command (Mt 21<sup>28</sup>); and when, beyond the attachments of unselfish devotion fostered by the sacred institutions of the family, He set the higher claim of what was due to Himself from His disciples (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>). The Lord's Prayer was a transfiguration of the family relationships.

3. Religion in the family.—It was especially in the superiority of its religious training that the Jewish home differed from the family life of the Gentiles. See artt. BOYHOOD, CHILDHOOD.

FAMILY.—

1. Jesus as
2. Teaching
  - (a) Marriage
  - (b) Position of women
  - (c) Filial obedience
  - (d) The family and the Kingdom of God

1. Whatever be the force of the phrase 'the brethren of the Lord' (see article s.v.), it is evident that Jesus took His place as a member of a human family in the fullest sense of the word. Such was the impression of His fellow-townsmen who saw Him in His daily life. The reticence of the Gospels about the childhood of Christ is in itself an indication that there was nothing which so differed from the ordinary family life of a Jewish household as to create a special tradition about His early years. It was not till a later age had forgotten the completeness with which the Lord identified Himself with human conditions that there appeared the painful attempts of the Apocryphal Gospels to break the silence of their Canonical prototypes. In the one authentic account of any event in the boyhood of Jesus (Lk 2<sup>41-51</sup>), received perhaps from the Virgin herself (see Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? ch. iv.), He is seen to be as others 'among their kinsfolk and acquaintances'. To the rest we only know that 'the words of the Lord were being translated' (Lk 2<sup>47</sup>), and that His 'obediential virtues which constitute the dignity and the beauty of a human home' (Dale, Laws of Christ's Life, xi.).

When we come to the history of the Ministry, two stages can be discerned in the change which came over the relations between Jesus and His earthly kinsfolk. (1) The calling of the first disciples, narrated in Jn 1, did not lead at once to the withdrawal of the Lord from His family. His mother was present with Him at the marriage at Cana, and after that event He went down with her and His brethren to Capernaum and made a short stay there (Jn 2<sup>12</sup>, cf. Mt 4<sup>13-16</sup>). (2) But when the Apostolic band was complete and the work of training them began in earnest, then He subordinated the claims of His family to the higher claims of His mission, and no longer lived continually in the home of His youth. Immediately after the final choice of the Twelve occurred the incident near Capernaum, when those from His house (οἱ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ) went out to stop Him from preaching, under the impression that He was mad; shortly afterwards His mother and His brethren try to call Him away, supplicantes for a similar reason (Mk 3<sup>21</sup>). From this it may be gathered that they were now living at Capernaum. From Mk 6<sup>3</sup> it has been mistakenly concluded that they were still living at Nazareth, but the verse plainly draws a distinction between them and His sisters (named, acc. to Epiphanius, Her. lxxviii. 9, Salome and Mary), who, either because they were married, or for some other reason, had settled down in their native town. Some have supposed that when the Lord left His family He dwelt in a house of His own in Capernaum. The Gospel of St. Matthew, it is true, speaks in a vague way of 'the house' (9<sup>10, 28</sup> 13<sup>1, 28</sup> 17<sup>1</sup>), but a comparison of, e.g., 9<sup>10</sup> with the corresponding passage in Lk 5<sup>28</sup> shows that it is not a house of Jesus which is meant. After leaving the family home, when He entered into a city, He depended on the hospitality of His friends. It was this literal homelessness which drew from Him the saying recorded in Mt 8<sup>20</sup> || Lk 9<sup>58</sup>; for it is unnecessary to give these words, with Augustine and others, a figurative sense. It is not possible to discover the precise moment at which they were uttered, as the two Evangelists give them in different connexions, but they must belong to the period when the total failure of His kindred to understand His mission had made it impossible for Him to dwell with them any longer. The position given to them by St. Luke is the more probable. According to him, they were pronounced as the Ministry was entering upon its last stage (cf. Lk 9<sup>51</sup>). Now in Jn 7<sup>1-7</sup> the Lord's 'brethren' are found arguing with Him as if He still lived with them. The incident there alluded to took place just before the Feast of Tabernacles in the second year of the Ministry. From this we may accept the conclusion suggested by St. Luke's order, that the Lord's home was closed to Him towards the end of the Ministry, . . . near its beginning . . . the position given to the saying in St. Matthew might imply. Perhaps it is not without significance that in the next chapter of St. Luke is introduced another home, that of Lazarus and his sisters at Bethany, in which the Lord was an honoured guest.

The reconciliation which the Lord's Passion won for all mankind was first reflected among His own kinsmen after the flesh. We cannot suppose that His mother had ever been parted from Him in any absolute sense, and after His resurrection His brethren also cast in their lot with those who believed in Him. According to the tradition which St. Paul received, the Lord Himself appeared to James (1 Co 15<sup>7</sup>). This moment was probably but the last in a series during which the surrender to the claims of Jesus had been steadily replacing previous unbelief. Such at least was the interpretation of later days, when the story was told that beneath the Cross (or even at the Last Supper, acc. to the version of Jerome, de Vir. Illus, quoting the Gospel of the Hebrews) James swore that he would neither eat bread nor drink wine till the Lord rose from the dead. With his conversion came that of the other brethren, and they with the Virgin are found at the opening of the Acts (1<sup>14</sup>) among those who were waiting for the fulfilment of the promise of the Spirit. Thus the earthly family of Christ fittingly finds its place in the foundations of His spiritual family.

2. In the teaching of Christ, although the word 'family' does not occur, yet the institution is everywhere presupposed and its laws emphasized, as it is also connected with the first miracle recorded in the Fourth Gospel. (a) The pivot on which family life turns is marriage, and this subject holds a unique place in the teaching of Christ. On all other social topics He left no particular detailed instructions, but only general rules. On marriage His words are distinct and afford specific guidance about details. He lays it down that monogamy is not the result of any code of law, but a primal fact instituted 'in the beginning' (Mt 19<sup>8</sup>). True marriage rests ultimately upon a spiritual basis, the physical aspect is but an accident. This is implied in the answer to the Sadducees (Mk 12<sup>18-27</sup>). No human law, not even though it have the sanction of the name of Moses, can alter this. The possibility of ground for divorce is confined to the case of one offence (or even abolished altogether, if we regard the exceptive clauses in Mt 19<sup>8</sup> and 5<sup>32</sup> as later glosses on the Lord's words; see Wright, Synopsis of Gospels, on Mk 10<sup>10</sup>, and cf. artt. ADULTERY, DIVORCE, and MARRIAGE).

(b) The attitude of Jesus towards marriage was necessarily reflected in His treatment of women. In spite of all that can be urged to the contrary, it is clear that contemporary Judaism assigned to women a position far inferior to that of men. The tendency was rather to fall away from than to advance upon the standpoint of the OT. There woman is often found in a prominent and honourable place (e.g. Miriam, Nu 12<sup>2</sup>; Deborah, Jg 4<sup>4</sup>; Bathsheba, 1 K 1), but the days were now approaching when it could be said that he who talked with a woman was qualifying for Gehenna (Pirke Aboth,

The winnowing of the mixed mass of grain, chaff, and short straw produced by the threshing, begun by the flail, and the grain is blown into the air with the winnowing-fan. This process separates most of the chaff and straw, which are carried away by the wind (see AGRICULTURE, p. 40), but a good deal still remains mingled with the pile of grain. A second winnowing is therefore needed, and for this the raht is used. See also CHAFF.

FASTING.—In the time of Christ, fasting appears to have been a prominent characteristic of Jewish piety. The fasts were both public and private. Of public fasts only one in the year was ordained by the law of Moses, the Day of Atonement; in Ac 27<sup>9</sup> it is called simply 'the fast' (cf. Jos. Ant. XIV. iv. 3; Philo, Vit. Mos. ii. 4; Schurer, HJP I. i. 322). The four annual fasts, established in memory of national calamities and referred to by Zechariah (8<sup>19</sup>), had fallen into desuetude, and were not revived until after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. The late 'fast of Esther,' on the 13th of Adar (Est 9<sup>31</sup>, cf. 4<sup>3-19</sup>), was not at this time observed. But occasional public fasts were ordered from time to time during seasons of drought and public calamity. They were held on the second and fifth days of the week, — Monday and Thursday, — because Moses was believed to have gone up Mt Sinai on a Thursday and to have returned on a Monday. They always began on the second day, so that a three days' fast would fall on the second, fifth, and second — Monday, Thursday, Monday (see Didache, viii.; Const. Apost. vii. 23; Epiphanius, Hær. xvi. 1). Apart from these public occasions, however, many individuals were in the habit of imposing extra fasts upon themselves (Lk 2<sup>23</sup>, cf. Jt. 8<sup>6</sup>); and some, particularly among the Pharisees, fasted on Mondays and Thursdays all the year round (Lk 18<sup>12</sup>; Lightfoot and Westcott, ad loc.). Religious teachers, moreover, were accustomed to lay down rules about fasting for the guidance of their disciples (Mk 2<sup>18</sup>, Mt 9<sup>14</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33</sup>). The 'frequent fasts' of the Jews are alluded to by Tacitus (Hist. v. 4); and Josephus, speaking of the spread of Jewish customs among the cities, mentions fasting (c. Apion. ii. 40; cf. Tert. ad Nat. i. 13). Among the Romans a mistaken idea seems to have been current that the Jews fasted on the Sabbath (Sueton. Aug. 76).

The manner of fasting differed according to the degree of strictness of the fast. Thus, on less strict fasts, while abstinence from food and drink from sunrise to sunset was enjoined, washing and anointing were still permitted. The strictest fast, however, lasted from one sunset till after the next, when the stars appeared; and during these hours not only food and drink, but washing, anointing, and every kind of agreeable transaction, even salutations were prohibited (Schurer, II. ii. 119; Edersheim, Life and Times, i. p. 663, Temple, pp. 297-300). Fasting was generally practised in an ostentatious manner; on this point the testimony of Mt 6<sup>16</sup> is confirmed by the Mishna.

Passing on to consider the attitude of Jesus towards fasting, we remark that, while on the one hand there is no reason to doubt that He observed the prescribed public fasts, and while He may even have undertaken a voluntary fast of forty days at the commencement of His ministry (Mt 4<sup>2</sup>; but see art. ASCETICISM), yet, on the other hand, it is evident that neither by practice nor by precept did He lay any stress on this form of devotion. His ordinary mode of life was so unascetic as to bring on Him the reproach of being a 'gluttonous man and a wine-bibber' (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup>). In His teaching He directly alluded to fasting only twice. The allusions are as follow:

(a) Mt 6<sup>16-18</sup>. Here Jesus is presupposed as a religious exercise, but the disciples are warned not to make it an occasion for a parade of piety. 'Thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head, and wash thy face; that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret.' Jesus thus sanctions fasting, but only as the genuine expression of a devout and contrite frame of mind. Its whole value depends on the purity and sincerity of the motive with which it is undertaken. As for the pretentious externalism of the Pharisees, that has its own reward.

(b) Mk 2<sup>18-22</sup>, Mt 9<sup>14-17</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33-39</sup>. In reply to the question of the disciples of John and of the Pharisees, Jesus deliberately refuses to enjoin fasting on His followers. Alluding to a Rabbinic ordinance that all mourning be suspended during the marriage-week, He says that fasting, which is a sign of mourning, would be inconsistent with the joy which 'the children of the bride-chamber' experience 'while the bridegroom is with them.' But He adds that the days of bereavement are coming, and then the outward expression of sorrow will be 'enough.' Here, as in the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus certainly sanctions fasting as a form through which emotion spontaneously seeks expression. But to the form itself He attaches no importance. This is brought out clearly by the succeeding parables of the Old Garment and the Old Wineskins. It is futile to graft the new liberty of the gospel on to the body of old observances and practices, and yet more futile to attempt to force the whole new system within the ancient moulds. The new piety must manifest itself in new forms of its own. Nevertheless, while Jesus seems to suggest that the Jewish fasts were not in harmony with the Christia. . . . . . sympathize with the prejudice of . . . . . who still cling tenaciously to the custom of their fathers 'No man also having drunk old wine straightway desireth new: for he saith, The old is good.'

The allusions to fasting in Mk 9<sup>29</sup> and Mt 17<sup>21</sup> are corruptions of the text; for similar combinations of prayer and fasting see To 12<sup>8</sup>, Sir 34<sup>26</sup>, Lk 2<sup>37</sup>. The second Logion of the Oxyrhynchus fragment discovered in 1897 commences with the words, Ἰησοῦς, ἐὰν μὴ νηστεύσητε τὸν κόσμον, οὐ μὴ εὕρητε τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ. Here, however, the fasting spoken of is obviously metaphorical. Another reference to fasting occurs in the fifth of the New Sayings of Jesus, published by Grenfell and Hunt in 1904, but the Logion is 'broken beyond hope of recovery' (op. cit. p. 18 f.).

F. HOMES DUDDEN.

FATHER, FATHERHOOD.—The one subject on which Jesus claimed to have unique and absolute knowledge was the Father (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). Yet, in saying this, He evidently did not mean that He knew all that God knows. He confessed or implied that His knowledge was limited (e.g. Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, Mt 9<sup>21, 22</sup>); and the very fact that He looked up to God as His God is sufficient evidence that, by knowledge of the Father, He did not mean comprehension of the Infinite. The record of His life and teaching makes it plain that His unique knowledge of God was knowledge of the Divine character and purpose. This was the sphere in which He lived and moved and had His conscious being. This was the sphere of His revelation.

In setting forth Jesus' conception of the Fatherhood of God, we shall consider (1) the use of the name 'Father'; (2) the meaning of Fatherhood; (3) the Fatherhood of God in the Fourth Gospel; (4) the place of Fatherhood in the teaching of Jesus; and (5) Jesus' conception of God compared with that of the OT and of His contemporaries.

1. Use of the name 'Father' by Jesus.—The first recorded sentence of Jesus (Lk 2<sup>40</sup>), and that which was probably the last (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>), both contain the name 'Father.' The boy of twelve felt an inward constraint to be engaged in the things of His Father, and twenty years later, expiring on the cross, it was into the hands of His Father that He commended His spirit. Throughout His ministry His use of this name is what we might expect from the scene which St. Luke records from His boyhood. 'The child is father of the man.' Whenever the personal relation between Him and God is involved, Jesus employs no name but 'Father,' if we except a single passage where He quotes from the 22nd Psalm (Mk 15<sup>34</sup>). In each of the five prayers where the words of Jesus are given, He addresses God as 'Father' (Mt 11<sup>25-27</sup> 23<sup>39, 41</sup>, Lk 23<sup>34, 46</sup>); and in the longest of these, which includes only three verses, the name is repeated five times (Mt 11<sup>25-27</sup>). When speaking of God in the third person, Jesus refers to Him once as 'the Great King' (Mt 5<sup>35</sup>), and once as 'Lord of the harvest' (Mt 9<sup>38</sup>); but in almost every case He uses the name 'God' or the name 'Father.' He never employs such circumlocutions as 'the Blessed One' and 'Holy One,' and never uses abstract designations such as 'Place,' all of which were common in the synagogue. It is significant to compare with this usage that of Philo, whose commonest titles of God are abstract (e.g. τὸ ὄν, τὸ εἶναι ὄν, τὸ πρὸς ἀληθινὸν ὄν, ὁ ὢν—Drummond, Philo Judæus, ii. 20). The name by which Jesus Himself addressed God was also the name which He put on the lips of His disciples. It was their privilege to share His communion with God (Mt 6<sup>9</sup> 23<sup>9</sup>).

2. The Meaning of Fatherhood.—What Jesus meant by the term 'Father' is to be learned both from His words and from His life. From His words we infer that He chose this term to describe the character of God. Thus He teaches that, as it is the very nature of a father to give good gifts to his children, so it is the very nature of God to give His good things to those who ask Him (Mt 7<sup>11</sup>, Lk 11<sup>13</sup>). Earthly fathers, though evil, give to their children; much more will God give, who is absolutely and unchangeably good (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>). He is ready to bestow the Kingdom of heaven upon the poor in spirit, and to give the vision of Himself to the pure in heart (Mt 5<sup>3, 8</sup>); that is to say, He gives the best He has to any who will receive it. And even upon those who will not receive the best, He bestows much; for He maketh His sun to rise on the evil, and sendeth rain on the unjust (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>). Jesus exhorts His hearers to have this spirit in order that they may become sons of the heavenly Father and share His perfection (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). Accordingly the term 'Fatherhood' describes what God is in Himself. It does not concern merely or chiefly His relation to men, but it declares His very spirit, that which lies behind all relationships.

The story of the Lost Son perfectly interprets Jesus' conception of Fatherhood (Lk 15<sup>11-32</sup>). The lost son does not stand for a lost Israelite merely, a fallen member of the theocratic people, but represents the sinner, whether Jew or Gentile. For, in the first place, the parable was spoken to justify Jesus' reception of publicans (Lk 15<sup>1-2</sup>), and publicans were rated as no better than Gentiles (Mt 18<sup>17</sup>); and, in the second place, the conclusion of Jesus in the parables of the Lost Sheep and the Lost Coin, which are manifestly parallel to that of the Lost Son, is perfectly general. He there declares that there is joy in heaven over one sinner who repents (Lk 15<sup>7, 10</sup>). Therefore, when Jesus, in the story of the Lost Son, says that the father watched and longed for his son's return, and welcomed him at last with kisses and a joyful feast, He teaches that the Fatherhood of God is essential, and therefore a fact of universal significance. It is in keeping with this when Jesus, addressing the multitudes as well as His disciples, said to all who heard Him, 'Call no man your father on earth for one is your Father, who is in heaven' (Mt 23<sup>9</sup>). If we had more of the addresses of Jesus to the multitudes, we should probably have more instances of this same usage.

Again, the very life of Jesus shows what He meant by the Fatherhood of God, for He surely felt that the spirit of this Fatherhood was manifested through Him. He portrayed His own attitude towards the lost when He drew the picture of the father and his lost son. His brotherhood interpreted the spirit of the Divine Fatherhood. But the brotherhood of Jesus describes what He was. He did not simulate brotherliness. It was by the very necessity of His holy and loving will that He was the friend of sinners. It is impossible, therefore, to suppose that, in His thought, the Fatherhood of God was less than essential, a figure setting forth His gracious relationship to certain favoured people. As His own love flowed out to men, of all merely outward circumstances, and as He believed that He knew the Father and was in harmony with His will, He must have believed that God loves men irrespective of all outward circumstances; in other words, that His Fatherhood is essential, and hence of universal significance.

It is true that Jesus considered Himself sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and that He confined His labours chiefly to them; but it is equally true that this was solely a matter of order. He told the Canaanitish woman that

Jews. Moreover, He granted the woman's request, though He thus spoke; and in no case did He turn a Gentile away empty who came to Him for help. He healed a Samaritan leper (Lk 17<sup>16</sup>), and the servant of a Gentile centurion (Mt 8<sup>13</sup>). There is no indication that they were less dear to Him than were the Jews.

We conclude, therefore, both from the words and the life of Jesus, that He called God our Father, not because God created us,—a view common in Philo,—or because He rules over us, or because of the covenant which He made with Abraham, but simply and only because He loves us. The abstract statement that 'God is love' (1 Jn 4<sup>8</sup>) is a true interpretation of the word 'Father' as used by Jesus.

3. The Fatherhood of God in the Fourth Gospel.—The Fatherhood of God is more conspicuous in John than in the Synoptics, the word 'Father' occurring about 90 times as against 5 in Mark, 17 in Luke and 15 in Matthew. Here also, as in the Synoptics, the word is found only on the lips of Jesus, with the exception of three passages where the author speaks from his own Christian point of view (Jn 1<sup>18</sup> 3<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>8</sup>), and one passage in which he attributes his Christian usage to the Baptist (3<sup>35</sup>).

The new feature of the subject in the Fourth Gospel is the emphasis laid on the universality of Fatherhood. Thus it is the world (κόσμος) which God is represented as loving up to the point of the highest sacrifice (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). It is all men whom Jesus will draw unto Himself (12<sup>32</sup>). In offering life to a Samaritan, Jesus feels that He is accomplishing the Father's will (4<sup>10, 34</sup>), and a visit of certain Greeks brought before His soul the vision of a great harvest for the Kingdom of God (12<sup>20-24</sup>).

Still more noticeable, and more in the earlier usage, is the employment of 'Father' in an absolute sense. The extent of this usage in John is not altogether clear. In the conversation with the Samaritan woman, Fatherhood is plainly universal. 'The hour cometh and now is when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth: for such doth the Father seek to be his worshippers'; 'Believe me, the hour cometh when neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father' (Jn 4<sup>21-23</sup>). Another passage which admits of no doubt is Jn 20<sup>17</sup> 'I am not yet ascended to the Father. But go to my brethren and say to them, I ascend to my Father and your Father, and my God and your God.' It is quite clear that the word 'Father' in the first clause is unlimited; for, in the later clauses, He who is here called 'the Father' is called by Jesus 'my Father and your Father.' Two other cases of what appears to be the same use of the word are Jn 6<sup>37-46</sup>.

In about one quarter of the passages where God is called 'Father,' He is so called in reference to Jesus, and the language is 'my Father' (e.g. Jn 2<sup>16</sup> 5<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>32</sup>). Since, now, there are some passages in which the absolute sense of 'Father' is required, and since in the majority of the other passages, where the expression 'the Father' is used, there is nothing which requires us to adopt a limited idea of Fatherhood, it must be regarded as probable that the author always employed the word in an unlimited sense when he did not associate a personal pronoun with it. Thus the Fourth Gospel would place a very striking emphasis on the thought that the Fatherhood of God is essential and universal. Such emphasis on this point in the teaching of John was, of course, made natural by the missionary activity of the early Church, which had gone forward many years before the Fourth Gospel was composed.

The meaning of Fatherhood in the Fourth Gospel is the same as in the primitive tradition. It describes the character of God, and is expressed in love. It is perhaps probable that the author of the Fourth Gospel occasionally used the term 'Father' in a metaphysical sense (14<sup>18</sup>), but he has put no words on the lips of Jesus which require to be taken metaphysically. He often represents Jesus as saying 'my Father,' but it is unquestionable that Jesus would have every man address God in just this way. He taught His disciples to say 'our Father,' which, of course, implies that each individual may say 'my Father.' When Jesus, to comfort His disciples, is represented as sending them the message, 'I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and my God and your God' (Jn 20<sup>17</sup>), He does not separate Himself from them by claiming a unique relationship to the Father, even God, but rather joins Himself closely with them by the thought that one and the same Father is theirs and His alike, one God the God of both. The Fatherhood of God according to Jesus, even in the Fourth Gospel, is one and ethical, but His appreciation and appropriation of that Fatherhood are unique.

4. The Place of Fatherhood in the teaching of Jesus.—In accordance with the fact that the sole subject on which Jesus claimed to possess unique knowledge was the character of God, or, as we may now say, the Fatherhood of God, we find that this truth is central and determinative in all His teaching. His conception of the Kingdom of heaven was dependent on His conception of the character of God. The Kingdom which He wished to see come on earth was the Kingdom of the Father (Mt 6<sup>3</sup>), a Kingdom in which the will of the Father should be done. Therefore the conception of the Kingdom of heaven is not the fundamental thought of Jesus. Nor was His teaching determined by His sense of the imperfections of the Law. These imperfections He saw clearly, but not because of a critical analysis of the Law such as a philosophical student of history might make. He considered the Law from above, as one who possessed in Himself a higher standard, a more perfect knowledge of the Divine will. His work was, indeed, to fulfil the Law, and to establish the Kingdom of God on earth; but the inspiring and ruling thought in all His work was the truth of God's Fatherhood. What He teaches of man's relation to God is determined by this truth. It is gathered up in the thought of sonship. The lost son is to return to His life is to be one of filial service in the Father's presence. And it is the goodness of the Father that draws him back.

The Fatherhood of God requires that the spirit of the religious life shall be love, out of which will be born perfect trust. It invites and draws man to communion with God, and determines the character of his devotion. What Jesus teaches of man's relation to man is also determined by His consciousness of the character of God. His morality is purely religious. The ethical life of His disciples is to be controlled by the fact of their sonship to God. The standard of that life is the very quality which constitutes the perfection of God (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). It is one and the same quality that makes Him the Father and makes man His son. Thus the entire teaching of Jesus is but the interpretation of the fact of God's Fatherhood. This is the sun in His heaven which lights and warms the broad field of human life.

5. Jesus' conception of God compared with that of the OT, and with views of His contemporaries.—The new revelation which Jesus gave of the character of God was put into a term which had long been applied to Him in Israel. The first of the great prerogatives of the Jewish people which are enumerated by St. Paul is the adoption (Ro 9<sup>4</sup>), that is, the appointment of Israel to be in a peculiar sense God's son. This thought was derived from the OT. God's message to Pharaoh by Moses involved a paternal relation to Israel, for Moses was to say in God's name, 'Israel is my son, my first-born' (Ex 4<sup>22</sup>). Again, Deuteronomy represents Moses as saying to the people, 'A man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee' (Dt 8<sup>5</sup> 32<sup>6</sup>); and the Lord says in Hosea that when Israel was a child He loved him and called His son out of Egypt (Hos 11<sup>1</sup> 1<sup>4</sup>). In these passages, and in a few more, God is thought of as a Father to the people of Israel as a whole; and He is the Father of Israel because He made them a nation and established them by His mighty power (Dt 32<sup>6</sup>). So far His Fatherhood is wholly national. There are, however, other passages in which we have an individualizing of the thought of Fatherhood. Thus the Lord says of the theocratic descendant of David, 'I will be his father, and he shall be my son' (2 S 7<sup>14</sup>); and the Messianic king puts the decree of Jehovah concerning himself in these words, 'Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee' (Ps 27). There is also an individualizing of God's Fatherhood with reference to other persons, for the Psalter calls Him the Father of the fatherless; and His pity for those who fear Him is like the pity of a father for his children (Ps 68<sup>5</sup> 103<sup>13</sup>). Yet in all these passages we see only the relation of God to His chosen people, or to a particular class among them, or to His chosen king. 'Father' is a word of relation, not yet a description of God's very character. It marks an advance upon that conception of Fatherhood which is derived from the fact of creation, but it is still far removed from the view of Jesus. The OT gave to Jesus the name 'Father' for God, but He filled it with a new content.

meaning: (a) In Lk 24<sup>9</sup> the words ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου, although capable of the translation 'about my Father's business' (as in AV), are more properly rendered 'in my Father's house' (RV). By the context See BUSINESS. The house of Jesus has an all-important bearing on the question of the development of His Messianic consciousness. His visit to the Temple, in the dawn of manhood, awakened in Him the sense of a relation to God, whom He recognized henceforth. (b) In Jn 21<sup>6</sup> the words which appear in the Synoptic narrative as a quotation from the OT (It is written, My house shall be called, etc.) are given as a direct saying of Jesus, 'Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise.' The Speaker thus declares by what authority He cleanses the Temple. As Son of God He has the right of ordering His Father's house and casting out the intruders who have dishonoured it.

The 'Father's house' of John 14<sup>2</sup> has been explained (on the analogy of the above passages) as the heavenly Temple, of which the Temple at Jerusalem was the earthly type (cf. Is 6<sup>1</sup>, He 9). Apart, however, from the particular difficulty that a temple could hardly be described as a place of moral, the whole tone of the passage demands a simpler explanation. Jesus thinks of the 'house' as a home, to which He is Himself returning, and in which He will be reunited at last with His disciples. The 'Father's house' has already been used in this larger meaning in Jn 8<sup>35</sup>. The servant abideth not in the house for ever, but the Son abideth for ever.

Theologically the passage Jn 14<sup>2</sup> marks a departure from the prevailing type of Johannine thought. It withdraws into the future that communion with Christ and participation in His eternal life which are elsewhere regarded as present realities. It further identifies the παρουσία with the coming of Christ to the believer in the hour of death (v. 3), not (as in the sequel of the discourse) with His abiding spiritual presence. The divergence, however, does not necessarily involve a contradiction. While maintaining that Life is given in the present, St. John looks to a future in which it will become fully manifest (cf. 5<sup>28-29</sup>, 6<sup>39</sup> etc.). For the believer, as for Christ Himself, death is the transition to a larger 'glory.'

The allusion to the 'Father's house' is obviously figurative, and we cannot even infer from it that St. John conceives of the future world under forms of space. Such a conception seems, indeed, to be debarred by the great declaration (4<sup>24</sup>) of the spiritual nature of God. The essential thought in the saying is simply that the believer will enter after death into that perfect communion with God which is impossible under the conditions of this world. In more than one Synoptic passage this communion is described by Jesus under the image of a feast (Mt 26<sup>29</sup>, 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 11<sup>35</sup>). This image is replaced in the Fourth Gospel by the less vivid but more adequate one of a perpetual sojourn with the Father in His house. But in both cases the house is a vehicle, necessarily imperfect of itself, that the crowning blessedness consists in nearness to God and perfect fellowship with Him.

This main idea is combined, in the Johannine passage, with several others which serve to render it more complete and definite: (1) The communion with God is mediated by Christ, who is Himself the Son, and therefore has the right to bring His chosen friends into His Father's house (cf. 8<sup>35-36</sup>, 17<sup>24</sup>). (2) It will be a lasting communion not fitful and interrupted like that which is granted to us in the present. Those who were formerly servants will 'abide in the house for ever,' like the Son Himself. They will not be strangers, tarrying for an hour, but will have moral appointed to them—fixed places which they can call their own. (3) The emphasis on the many mansions would seem to suggest that the perfect communion with God does not involve a mere absorption in Him. Each life will maintain its own identity and receive its separate fulfilment. Jesus will be the same in the higher world as He was in this, and the disciples likewise will find themselves again, and resume their fellowship with each other and with Him. A certain resemblance can thus be traced between the thought of this passage and that of St. Paul in 2 Co 5<sup>1-4</sup>. The Apostle anticipates for each believer 'a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens,' which will take the place of the 'earthly house of this tabernacle.' The saying in 1 Cor 13<sup>3</sup> declares that there will be room for all these separate mansions within the one 'Father's house.'

FEAR (φόβος, φοβούμαι; in Mt 8<sup>24</sup> and Mk 4<sup>40</sup> 'fearful' = δειλός) —1. In many passages in the Gospels fear is a motive restraining or directing action in the ordinary course of human life. Men fear others, and shape their conduct, at least in part, by their fears: e.g. Mt 2<sup>22</sup> (Joseph is afraid to return to Judæa); 14<sup>5</sup> (Herod would not put John to death because 'he feared the people'); 21<sup>38-46</sup>; Mk 11<sup>32</sup>, Lk 22<sup>2</sup> (where the Pharisees 'fear the multitude'); Mk 9<sup>32</sup>, Lk 9<sup>45</sup> (the disciples are 'afraid to ask' the meaning of a saying); Mk 11<sup>18</sup> (scribes and Pharisees wished to destroy Jesus, 'for they feared him'); Jn 7<sup>13</sup>, 9<sup>22</sup>, 19<sup>38</sup>, 20<sup>19</sup> (men are silent or secret 'for fear of the Jews'). Similar passages are Mt 25<sup>28</sup>, Mk 6<sup>20</sup>, 12<sup>12</sup>, Lk 19<sup>21</sup>, 20<sup>19</sup> etc. This fear sometimes restrains bad men from carrying out their evil purposes; but quite as often turns others aside from the straight path of right.

2. The Gospels also mention frequently the fear which men feel in the presence of what they believe to be supernatural or superhuman. This is often an accompaniment of the miracles of Jesus. It is mentioned of the disciples, at the stilling of the tempest (Mk 4<sup>41</sup>, Lk 8<sup>25</sup>), when Jesus walked on the sea (Mt 14<sup>26</sup>, Mk 6<sup>50</sup>, Jn 6<sup>19</sup>, 20), at the Transfiguration (Mt 17<sup>6-7</sup> and parallels). So the people of Judæa were afraid when they saw the demoniac healed (Mk 5<sup>15</sup>); so 'fear took hold on all' when the widow's son was raised (Lk 7<sup>16</sup>); and in the same way the centurion at the cross (Mt 27<sup>54</sup>) and the witnesses of the Resurrection (Mt 28<sup>4-8</sup>) were afraid; cf. also Lk 12<sup>65</sup>, 29<sup>2</sup>, 5<sup>26</sup> etc.

3. Especially worthy of notice are those passages in which Jesus exhorts His hearers not to fear. He reassures Jairus when word comes that his daughter is dead (Mk 5<sup>36</sup>, Lk 8<sup>50</sup>); and Peter when the miraculous draught of fishes fills him with a sense of sin (Lk 5<sup>10</sup>); He meets the terror of the disciples on the sea with, 'It is I, be not afraid' (Mt 14<sup>27</sup>); and touches them at the Transfiguration, with similar words (Mt 17<sup>7</sup>). When He sends the disciples out to preach, it is with reiterated injunctions against fear. The servants will meet with hostility from the enemies of their Lord; but they must face such opposition without fear, 'for there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed' (Mt 10<sup>24-27</sup>). They are to be fearless preachers of the gospel, because no hostility of men can prevent the triumph of truth. They are not to fear even those who can kill the body, for their power is strictly limited to the body (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>, Lk 12<sup>4</sup>); they are to remember God's thought for the sparrows, and to be assured of the greater value of the servants of His Kingdom, and so to escape from fear (Mt 10<sup>31</sup>). If they are few in number facing a hostile world—a little flock surrounded by wolves —they are to remember the sure purpose of the Father and not to be afraid (Lk 12<sup>4</sup>).

Moral courage is a vital necessity of Christian discipleship. The Master is keenly conscious of moral paralysis which comes from the fear of man. Rev 21<sup>8</sup> reflects His teaching when it groups 'the fearful' with 'the abominable' and 'the abominable' who are cast into the lake of fire which is the second death. And in our Lord's teaching faith is the antidote of fear. A true knowledge of the Father is the unfailing source of moral courage. 'Acquaint thyself with the Father and be delivered from fear' is the burden of His teaching. See COURAGE, COWARDICE.

4. The almost complete absence of direct exhortation to fear God is a very noticeable feature of the New Testament. Fear of God is, indeed, mentioned in the Old Testament (Lk 12<sup>50</sup>), in the parable of the Unjust Judge (Lk 18<sup>4</sup>), and by the penitent thief on the cross (Lk 23<sup>40</sup>); but in a direct injunction of Jesus only—if at all—in Mt 10<sup>28</sup> and the parallel passage Lk 12<sup>5</sup>. Here, as already mentioned, Jesus sends out the disciples with the exhortation not to fear—even those who kill the body. But He adds to the negative a positive injunction, 'Rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell'; or, as Lk. puts it, 'But I will warn you whom ye shall fear: fear him which after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him.' It is most natural to think with the majority of commentators that God is the object of fear in this exhortation; but there are some who urge, on the contrary, that the devil is intended.

A. B. Bruce ('St. Matthew,' in Expositor's Gr Test) says 'Would Christ present God under this aspect in such close connexion with the Father who cares even for the sparrows? What is to be greatly feared is not the final condemnation, but that which leads to it—temptation to forsake the cause of God out of regard to man.' Shortly, the counsel is 'fear not man, but fear God.' Weymouth (The NT in Modern Speech) urges against the reference to God that 'the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.' On the other hand, Pummer (St. Matthew's Gospel) says, 'There is little doubt that this refers to God, and not to the devil. The change of construction points to this. It is no longer φοβηθήτε τὸν θεόν, "fear without trying to shun," which is the usual construction of fearing God. Moreover, we are not in Scripture told to fear Satan, but to resist him courageously.'

It may also be urged that the extreme punishment of the wicked is nowhere described as an Gehenna is 'the eternal fire prepared for the angels' into which in Mt 25<sup>40</sup> those on the left hand are sent by the King. The ultimate 'destruction' of wicked men, whatever that may actually mean, must be conceived as an act of God and as the exercise of His authority; cf. Mt 21<sup>40</sup>, 41 'The Lord of the vineyard . . . will miserably destroy those wicked men.'

5. Looking at the teaching of Jesus as a whole, we notice that, while He constantly urges men to faith rather than to fear, and to a trust in God's fatherly goodness, such as makes filial love the ruling motive of religious life, He does not altogether discard the appeal to fear as a motive for right conduct. There is a severity of God which cannot be ignored. Such parables as the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Unmerciful Servant, the Wheat and the Tares, and others, whatever interpretation we may put upon their details, at least suggest a Divine and holy sternness in regard to which men should keep a wholesome fear. Nor is it only in parables that we find this element of our Lord's teaching. We have in the Sermon on the Mount such passages as Mt 5<sup>21-30</sup> 7<sup>13</sup>, 14 and 21-27; and with these we may compare Mt 11<sup>20-24</sup> 12<sup>28</sup> 16<sup>25</sup>, 26 21<sup>44</sup> 26<sup>24</sup> and many others. The normal relation of the children of God to the Heavenly Father should be one of glad confidence and loving obedience. It should be ever approaching that perfect love which casts out fear; but men who, with great moral issues have no right, the teaching of Jesus, to this happy emancipation. For them fear is wholesome and necessary; for God is the Holy Father, and persistent defiance of His will must be visited with stern and righteous doom.

FEASTS.—The religious Feasts of the Jews in our Lord's time were not so many as the religious Feasts of the Christian Church of to-day as enumerated in the English Book of Common Prayer, but they meant very much more in the way of outward observance. In the first rank—like Christmas, Easter, Ascensiontide, and Whitsuntide—there stood out the three great Feasts of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. Not unlike the Holy Days of the Church's Calendar, commemorating as they do various victories of the past, there were the annual Feasts of Dedication and of Purim, to which must be added the Feast of Trumpets together with its smaller counterpart in the monthly Feast of the New Moon. Corresponding to the Christian Sunday there was the weekly Feast of the Sabbath. Of these, Passover, Tabernacles, and Dedication are all specially mentioned in the Gospels, as well as the Sabbath, to which there are very many references, some merely incidental and some meant to show that it was our Lord's purpose to free the observance of that day from the artificial rules that had grown up about it in tradition. The Feasts are most prominent in the Fourth Gospel, where they are so mentioned as to form a framework into which the events of our Lord's Ministry fall. Three Passovers are there recorded: (1) Jn 2<sup>13</sup>, when our Lord cleansed the Temple almost at the beginning of His Ministry; (2) 6<sup>4</sup>, just after the feeding of the 5000; (3) 13<sup>1</sup> (cf. Mt 26<sup>2</sup>, Mk 14<sup>1</sup>, Lk 22<sup>1</sup>), at the time of the Crucifixion and Resurrection.

It has indeed been contended that the reference to Passover in Jn 6<sup>4</sup> is a mistake, and that really there were only two Passovers in our Lord's Ministry, the one at the beginning and the other at the end; it has also been contended that there may have been other Passovers, which are not mentioned, and that our Lord's Ministry may have included so many as 12 or 13 years, but neither of these conclusions can be made good, and it seems more likely that the record as it stands is both accurate and complete (see Turner in Hastings' DB, art. 'Chronology of NT').

Besides these three Passovers, mention is made of the Feast of Tabernacles in Jn 7<sup>2</sup>, of the Feast of Dedication in Jn 10<sup>22</sup>, and of some Feast not particularized by name in Jn 5<sup>1</sup>. To these St. Luke adds mention of an earlier Passover, when our Lord was 12 years old and was for the first time (?) allowed to accompany Joseph and Mary as they went up to Jerusalem year after year for the Feast (Lk 2<sup>41</sup>).

The Feasts of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles were all of them Pilgrimage Feasts, that is to say, Feasts at which all male Jews above the age of 12 years were required to appear before the Lord in Jerusalem. It is noticed in Lk 2<sup>41</sup> that Joseph and Mary were both in the habit of going up to Jerusalem for the Passover every year. There was no requirement that women should thus attend at the Feasts, but Hillel seems to have encouraged the practice, and it was adopted by other religious women besides Mary (Edersheim, Life and Times, vol. i p. 236). St. Luke in the same passage speaks of our Lord as going up at the age of twelve; that, too, was in excess of what was required by law, but was apparently in accordance with custom (so Edersheim, op. cit. p. 235; but cf. Schürer, HJP II. ii. p. 51, who represents that, strictly speaking, every boy who could walk ought to have attended, and that it was only by custom that boys who lived at a distance were allowed to wait till their twelfth year before going). Attendance at the Feasts was not confined to those who lived within easy reach, but Jews came as well from great distances, although naturally they could not attend so often as three times a year.

Schurer writes (op. cit. p. 290f) 'There was nothing that contributed so much to cement the bond of union between the dispersion and the mother country as the regular pilgrimages which Jews from all quarters of the world were in the habit of making to Jerusalem on festival occasions.' He quotes Philo (de Monarchia, ii. 1) as saying 'Many thousands of people from many thousands of towns made pilgrimages to the Temple at every festival, some by land, some by sea, and coming from the east and the west, from the north and the south,' and refers to Josephus' estimate of the number of Jews in Jerusalem at the time of the Feasts as being so many as 2,700,000 (BJ vi. ix. 8).

In accordance with this it is definitely stated in the Gospels that four times during His Ministry our Lord went up to Jerusalem to keep the Feasts, twice for Passover, once for Tabernacles, and once for an unnamed Feast. Possibly He went up quite regularly three times a year, for the notice that He went up shortly before the second Passover (Jn 6<sup>4</sup>) does not preclude the possibility of His having gone up a little later. At the last Passover mention is made of His disciples being with Him in Jerusalem (Jn 21<sup>22</sup>), evidently having come from Galilee with the same purpose as He went up to keep the Feast. Similarly at Tabernacles it is stated that His brethren went up from Galilee to keep the Feast (Jn 7<sup>10</sup>). In all the Gospel references to Passover and Tabernacles the impression is given of large crowds of Jews in Jerusalem. At the Feast of Dedication also our Lord was in Jerusalem, but that was simply because His work at that time lay close by. He did not go up to Jerusalem on purpose for it, since no pilgrimages were made except at the three great Feasts; but being close at hand He liked to mark the occasion by a visit to the Temple, and there found a considerable number of Jews resident in the neighbourhood who had been attracted thither like Himself. See, further, the sep. artt. on DEDICATION, PASSOVER, etc.

As regards the unnamed Feast of Jn 5<sup>1</sup>, it is impossible to reach any certainty as to what Feast is intended. If the correct reading were  $\eta \epsilon \nu \epsilon \tau \epsilon \rho \alpha$  it would most naturally be the Feast of Tabernacles, which was above all the Feast of the Jews (Cheyne on Is 30<sup>29</sup>); but if the article be omitted, as almost certainly it should be, the expression is quite indefinite, and might refer to either Tabernacles or Passover or Pentecost, or to any of the smaller Feasts.

In attempting to decide between these guidance may first be sought from the general sequence of events, so far as it is indicated in the following notes of time:

- (1) Passover, i.e. March or April, Jn 21<sup>3</sup>.
- (2) A reference to harvest, Jn 4<sup>35</sup>.
- (3) This unnamed Feast, Jn 5<sup>1</sup>.
- (4) A second Passover, Jn 6<sup>4</sup>.

Thus it appears that the unnamed Feast fell between the incident connected with the harvest in Jn 4<sup>35</sup> and Passover. This does not however give very much help because Jn 4<sup>35</sup> may mean either that that was the actual time of harvest or that it was a month or so before harvest, so that it is impossible to tell whether the incident there described happened in the month of April or in May or June. If that happened in midwinter then Dedication (Dec.) and Purim (Feb.) are the only two possible chronological points at which it is equally likely that incident happened at harvest, then the chronology would admit almost any of the Feasts, either Pentecost (May), or Trumpets (Sept.), or Tabernacles (Sept.), or Dedication (Dec.), or Purim (Feb.). Thus the setting of the incident is quite indeterminate. In the description of the incident itself there are two points that need to be noticed. The one is that the chief error words are such as to suggest that the only reason for mentioning the Feast at all is to explain our Lord's presence in Jerusalem. After these things there was a Feast of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem? Since there were only three Feasts at which even the strictest Jews went up to Jerusalem, it appears that this must be one of those three, i.e. must be either Passover, Pentecost, or Tabernacles. At the smaller Feasts many of those Jews who were in or near Jerusalem would naturally congregate in the Temple courts (cf. Jn 10<sup>22</sup>), but none were in the habit of going up on these occasions from other parts of the country. Accordingly, though Purim may seem suitable in other ways, it quite fails to explain the one fundamental fact, our Lord's visit to Jerusalem, and the smaller Feasts. The second of John's use of so vague a word as  $\epsilon \nu \epsilon \tau \epsilon \rho \alpha$  to one of the three great Feasts can mean only that Jesus was himself unable to recall the exact occasion. The events recorded were quite clear in his mind, and he remembered that they had happened on one of the occasions when our Lord went to Jerusalem to keep the Feasts, but at which particular one he could not recall. This being so, it is useless to try now to discover the secret from his writings, but there is no need to feel disappointment at the absence of information on this point, as if some part of the significance of the occasion, for the out of St John's mind, to the understanding of our Lord's words or actions. FEEDING THE MULTITUDES.—The Gospels give us two accounts of multitudes miraculously fed by our Lord. In the first instance (reported in Mt 14<sup>15-21</sup>, Mk 6<sup>35-44</sup>, Lk 9<sup>12-17</sup>, Jn 6<sup>1-13</sup>) the number is given as 5000, exclusive (so Mt) of women and children. In the second instance (reported in Mt 15<sup>32-39</sup>, Mk 8<sup>1-9</sup>) the number is given as 4000, Mt. again adding women and children.

1. It will be better to consider these instances separately and to treat the feeding of the 5000 in the light of the first three Gospels. The Synoptics agree that the place was a desert one on the east side of the Sea of Galilee; and Lk. fixes it at Bethsaida Julias (see CAPERNAUM). Mk. and Lk. connect the withdrawal to this place with the return of the Twelve and their report, Mt. with the execution of John the Baptist. Mk. seems to be correct, since he gives the specific reason that they needed rest, which they could not otherwise secure. All agree that a vast multitude followed them to their place of resort, thus defeating their purpose, and that it was the disciples who called the attention of Jesus to the needs of the people. Jesus then commanded His disciples to provide food for the multitude. One feels that He was preparing their minds for what He was about to do. Their astonishment at His command led them to point out the impossibility, if not absurdity, of the requirement since they had but five loaves and two fishes. Then follows the astounding order to seat the people in groups easy access to the disciples, the blessing of the loaves and fishes, the distribution of the meagre supply, the satisfaction of all, and the gathering up of the Attempts have been made to rob this account of its miraculous character, the favourite method being to assume that the evident determination of Jesus to assuage their hunger induced those in the vast company who had supplies of food, to share, in the spirit of Jesus, with those who had none. The difficulty with this explanation is that the disciples, who had every opportunity of seeing what was done, thought that the multitude was fed with the five loaves and two fishes only. Against this, neither Mk 6<sup>32</sup> nor Jn 6<sup>36</sup> is evidence, as Beyschlag will have it (Leben Jesu, i. 330). The immediate context in both passages shows that both Jesus and the Twelve thought of the transaction as miraculous. Admitting the miracle, some have thought to explain it as a miraculous satisfaction of hunger with a little, rather than as a multiplication of the loaves and fishes. This is contrary to the text in all four of the Gospels, which unite in saying that twelve baskets of fragments were taken up. This would be more than there was at the beginning (see art. BASKET), thus virtually affirming the multiplication. We are shut up, then to the alternative of regarding the account as legendary or else as a miraculous multiplication of their food supply. There are some difficulties in the way of believing it miraculous. (1) The question of Jesus, 'How many loaves have ye?' reminds one of the question of Elsha (2 K 4<sup>2</sup>), 'What hast thou in the house?'

and so suggests an imitation of Elisha's miracle, as in fact the whole process of multiplication suggests the miracle of the meal in the jar and the cruse of oil of 1 K 17<sup>11-16</sup>. (2) The record is a trifle obscure. The whole stress is on the loaves, both in the gathered fragments, especially in Jn., and in the subsequent references of Jesus (see Mk 8<sup>19</sup>), while the fish are ignored. (3) Usually, also, when such a miracle was performed, the observers are said to have been profoundly impressed (see Mk 4<sup>41</sup> 5<sup>42</sup> 7<sup>37</sup>), but here no comment follows. (4) Besides, it seems to be in contradiction of His avowed purpose not to give the Jews what would be to them a 'sign'. As to all but the last of these difficulties, it may be said that they are, in themselves, not serious. The fourth assumes that the miracles of healing would not, but that a miracle such as the feeding would convince the Jews, and so be just the sign the Jews demanded. But, in fact, the sign the Jews required and Jesus refused to grant was some miracle performed to order, and regardless of human need. Such a miracle as the feeding lacked these two characteristics. It was spontaneous, and it met a human want. In favour of the historicity of the miracle is the further fact that it is recorded in all the Gospels. The tradition was not open to question in the mind of any one of the Evangelists.

2. With regard to the second recorded instance, the feeding of the 4000, the case is quite different. It is found in but two of the Gospels. Lk and Jn. evidently thought of but a single feeding. It is easy to see how the second account might have grown out of the first, and the similarities are so great as to suggest that it did have its origin there. The question of Jesus concerning the number of loaves, the remarkable circumstance that a second time the disciples had so little food with them, the seating of the people on the grass, the distribution to the Twelve for the multitude, the eating until they were filled, the gathering of the broken pieces into baskets, are suspiciously like the feeding of the 5000. It is difficult to see how the disciples, with the memory of the feeding of the 5000 fresh in their minds, could have questioned Jesus as to the source of supply for this second company. And here it is that the narrative as given by Jn. sheds light on the question under consideration. Jn. betrays the fact that the same narrative was differently told, since he combines elements of both narratives as related by Mt. and Mark. Mt. places the second feeding on a mountain; Jn. locates the feeding on a mountain. Jn. and Mt. and Mk. (second instance) agree that Jesus proposed the feeding. Mk., according to his usual custom of emphasizing the teaching as primary, and of making the miracles secondary, makes Jesus teach the shepherdless sheep out of sympathy, while Mt. makes this sympathy prompt Him to heal them, and Lk. combines the two; this in the first feeding. In the second (this sympathy was elicited by their hunger. In the second the point of difficulty with the disciples (according to Mt and Mk.), or with Jesus (according to Jn.), was not the expense, as in the first, but that of securing so much food in a desert place. This certainly looks as though Jn. had heard both accounts and deliberately undertook to combine them into one, or else as though the differences in the account of the same story led Mt. and Mk. to believe that there were two feedings. In any case Lk., by implication, and Jn., almost directly, favour the single feeding—that of the 5000. The only serious difficulty in this elimination of the second feeding is the record in Mk 8<sup>19, 20</sup> (cf. Mt 16<sup>9, 10</sup>), according to which Jesus is made to refer to the two feedings as separate events. The denial of the second would make it necessary to affirm that the words of Jesus are incorrectly reported. But here Mt. is evidently dependent upon the collection of narratives by Mk., not Mk. upon the collection of sayings made by Matthew. Mt and Mk. are not two independent witnesses. We may not be able to account satisfactorily for the misunderstanding of Mk. in this case, but his testimony could hardly offset that of Jn., unless we were obliged, which we are not, to suppose that Mk got his information on this point directly from Peter. Even if this were so, we should have to make our choice between Peter and Jn., which, in view of all the facts, would turn out in favour of the latter.

The significance of the feeding of the multitude for the humaneness of Jesus is not less great than that of the healings. The power was His, and He used it for the good of His fellow-men in whatever way was needful for their immediate welfare, and for setting an example of helpfulness in the everyday affairs of His disciples in all the centuries to follow.

FEET.—The word occurs frequently in the Gospels. Figuratively it has a wide range of meaning. It is employed in phrases which express worthlessness ('to be trodden under foot,' Mt 5<sup>13</sup>), supplication ('fell at his feet,' Mk 5<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>25</sup>), great honour or reverence (Lk 7<sup>38-46</sup> the woman who kissed Jesus' feet; Jn 11<sup>2</sup> Mary; Mt 28<sup>9</sup> 'held him by the feet'), ignorant or blasphemous contempt (Mt 7<sup>6</sup> 'trample under foot'), righteous condemnation or rejection (Mt 10<sup>14</sup> 'shake dust off feet'), salvation through sacrifice (Mt 18<sup>8</sup> Mk 9<sup>45</sup> cutting off hand or foot), discipleship (Lk 8<sup>35</sup> cured demoniac sitting at Jesus' feet; 10<sup>39</sup> Mary), helplessness (Mt 22<sup>13</sup> 'bind hand and foot'), complete triumph (Mt 22<sup>44</sup> Mk 12<sup>36</sup> Lk 20<sup>43</sup> enemies of Messianic King put under His feet), absolute safety (Mt 4<sup>9</sup> Lk 4<sup>11</sup> 'lest thou dash thy foot against a stone'), subjection (Mt 5<sup>35</sup> earth the footstool of God's feet). In washing the feet of the disciples Jesus inculcates lessons of humility, mutual service, and the need of daily cleansing from sin (Jn 13<sup>3-14</sup>). See artt. BASON, FOOT.

Of the feet of Jesus Himself mention is made in the NT very rarely. Before His feet suppliants fell down (Mt 23<sup>35</sup> Lk 8<sup>41</sup>), and also a Samaritan who returned to give thanks (Lk 17<sup>16</sup>). At His feet sufferers were laid to be healed (Mt 15<sup>30</sup>). Neglectful of the courtesies of a host, Simon the Pharisee gave Him no water to refresh His feet (Lk 7<sup>44</sup>); but a sinful woman on the same occasion wet His feet with her tears, wiped them with the hair of her head, kissed them, and anointed them with ointment (7<sup>38, 44ff.</sup>); and Mary of Bethany showed her great love and gratitude in a similar fashion, when she lavished the contents of her alabaster cruse of precious spikenard (Jn 11<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>3</sup>; cf. Mt 26<sup>7</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3</sup>) upon the feet which had brought the Lord from beyond Jordan (Jn 10<sup>40</sup> 11<sup>7</sup>) to speak the words of prophecy at her brother's grave (11<sup>42ff.</sup>). At 11<sup>42ff.</sup> restored demoniac sat (Lk 8<sup>35</sup>), like Mary afterwards when she 'heard his word' (10<sup>39</sup>). The two angels who guarded the tomb were seen sitting 'the one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain' (Jn 20<sup>12</sup>). It was His feet that the two Marys clung to when they first met Jesus on the Resurrection morning. [Though love prompted them to lay hold of Him, did reverence forbid them to touch more than His feet?]. When Jesus in the upper room showed His hands and His feet to His disciples (Lk 24<sup>39ff.</sup>), it was doubtless to prove to them that He who now stood before them was the same Jesus who by hands and feet had been nailed to the cross (cf. Jn 20<sup>20, 25-27</sup>). St. Paul says of the ascended Christ that all things are put under His feet (Eph 1<sup>22</sup>), and that beneath His feet death itself shall be destroyed (1 Co 15<sup>55</sup>). And in the Book of Revelation, when the heavenly Jesus appears to the seer of Patmos, the place of His feet has been made glorious (cf. Is 60<sup>13</sup>). Those feet which were dust-stained in the house of Simon the Pharisee, and weary by the well of Sychar (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>), and pierced with nails on the cross of Calvary, are now 'like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace' (Rev 1<sup>15</sup>, cf. 2<sup>18</sup>).

It has been questioned whether the feet of Jesus were nailed to the cross. The doubt is based on the facts that in the Fourth Gospel Jesus mentions only His hands and side (Jn 20<sup>20</sup>), and that sometimes in crucifixion the feet were simply tied to the cross. The nailing of the feet of Jesus would not have been disputed were it not part of an argument to prove that He did not really die on the cross. That the feet were usually nailed (in crucifixion), and that the case of Jesus was no exception to the general rule, may be regarded as beyond doubt' (Meyer on Mt 27<sup>35</sup>). There is a difference of opinion as to whether the feet of Jesus were nailed to the cross separately, with two nails, or the one over the other with the same nail. In early art the feet are more frequently represented as separately nailed, but in later art as nailed together, the one over the other. Tradition favours the opinion that the feet were nailed separately. See art. CRUCIFIXION.

FELLOWSHIP.—

Neither the word 'fellowship' (κοινωνία) nor any equivalent term occurs in the Synoptic Gospels, but the reality in faith, love, and joy is described in the fragrance of the flowers of Galilee through that bright spring of the world-life. As we pass to the Acts and Epistles, we find the Pauline use of the word is found in a variety of meanings. Most frequently it is translated 'fellowship' (Ac 2<sup>42</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Eph 3<sup>1</sup>, 1<sup>3</sup>, 1<sup>10</sup>). It is rendered 'fellowship' (RV) in 1 Cor 10<sup>16</sup> and 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>, and 'fellowship' (RV) in 1 Pet 4<sup>10</sup> and Philem 6, cf. 1 Th 5<sup>14</sup>. It occurs only three times in the Synoptic Gospels. The concept of fellowship in the NT is not exhausted by the various significations of any one word; it becomes plain only as we comprehend the meaning of the life of the Early Church.

i. INHERITED FORECASTS.—Like most of the great religious conceptions of the NT, this idea has its roots deep in the OT. Isaiah proclaims that the religion of Israel can find its truest expression only in a spiritual fellowship of faith, independent of a national framework. In Israel there is an imperishable remnant, a stock from which new life will spring forth after desolation has swept over Jerusalem (Is 8<sup>13-18</sup>, 37<sup>31, 32</sup>). By the time of Jeremiah the disaster of the nation had become so irretrievable that the prophet hardly dares to hope for more than the salvage of individuals from the wreck; but these rescued ones will form the true Israel under a new covenant (Jer 23<sup>8-9</sup>, 31<sup>31, 32</sup>). The Messianic blessedness which those prophets foresaw consisted of an intimate fellowship which, in the coming days, the redeemed company of Israel would enjoy with Jehovah (Is 49<sup>6-13</sup>, Jer 31<sup>31, 32</sup>). It was to be a fellowship of Israelites because it was primarily a fellowship with Israel's God (Is 52<sup>6-12</sup>, 60). This thought of fellowship finds nowhere more vivid expression than in the Psalter. That storehouse of religious devotion is filled with prayer of communion with Jehovah, the supremely moral Person, righteous, faithful, holy, yet full of loving-kindness, who satisfies the needs of man by bringing him into fellowship with Himself (Pss 16, 34, 40, 63). Though many of the psalms seem to be the utterance of individual yearning for God's presence, others express the religious desires of corporate Israel, a fellowship of saints with a common thirst for the springs of its life.

A special term had been coined for Israel in her religious rather than her national function—lāhāl, which was rendered in the LXX by ἐκκλησία ('church'). It signified the religious assembly of God's chosen people; but as this could never be completely realized, even in the great temple gatherings, the conception remained largely ideal. A rich spiritual legacy was transmitted from the OT in the words Israel, ecclesia, Kingdom of God; and though the Jewish heirs were unable to appreciate their inheritance, these two truths of the prophets and psalmists could never have quite perished—that there is an eternal commonwealth of saints, and that this fellowship of Israel is based upon fellowship with Jehovah.

ii. THE SYNOPSIS GOSPELS.—Jesus not only claimed to fulfil prophecy; by His words of grace He did much more than the most spiritually minded Israelite could have hoped. The spirit of the Lord which was upon Him awoke prophetic thoughts that had long lain in the hearts of those who were waiting for the consolation of Israel. He brought spring and quickened the seed sown in the past. He calls men to Himself and forms them into a new society, within which are to be enjoyed the blessings foretold by the prophets. In this company is found religious fellowship, based upon forgiveness of sins and eternal life through the knowledge of God revealed by Jesus as Father, of which the OT saints had but partial enjoyment or glad . . . i. He places Himself at the head of . . . claiming that He alone can impart the knowledge of God which will give rest to the souls of men (Mt 11<sup>27-30</sup>). Thus His followers, constituted into the society of the Messiah, become a Divinely ordered fellowship not dependent on outward organization, but united by a common faith in Jesus as the Revealer of God to them. They are the New Israel, the imperishable ecclesia (Mt 16<sup>16-19</sup>).

This society is no closed circle. Associating Himself more or less intimately with groups of disciples, Jesus sends them forth with the knowledge they have gained concerning Him, to proclaim to the people that the new epoch of Divine rule is about to be inaugurated and that they should prepare for its advent. The condition of membership in this brotherhood is to follow Jesus, even though this may seem to the man of the world to be nothing less than to lose one's life. Fellowship with Jesus costs much. Family ties may be severed, the hatred of the world may be vented upon His disciples, billows of persecution may sweep over them, but in this society is life indeed (Mk 8<sup>34-38</sup>, Lk 14<sup>26-33</sup>). Jesus offers His followers a fellowship in this new brotherhood, which more than compensates for any worldly friendship that they may have to renounce (Mk 10<sup>29-31</sup>). Their true kindred, even like that of Jesus Himself, will be found among those united by spiritual affinities in this new circle. New virtues abound in this brotherhood. Love working in helpful ministries for others is of the essence of fellowship in Messiah's company. Rank is assigned, not as in worldly kingdoms, but by the degree of service rendered by each to all (Mk 10<sup>35-41</sup>).

In time Jesus announces to His followers that His society, as the true Israel, is to take the place of the Jewish nation, which as such is becoming a massa perdita. Out of this perishing world His disciples are saved into the eternal Kingdom, and as heirs of salvation they are in reality, as they were afterwards called, 'the saints of the New Covenant' (Mk 12<sup>1-12</sup>). Before His death the Messiah gave concreteness to this fellowship by a solemn communion with His disciples in the Last Supper, which became the means of making real to them the blessings of the New Covenant. The connexion of the Supper with the Paschal meal, which may here be assumed as having existed, either by anticipation or directly, would suggest to the minds of the participants that in this New Covenant they were entering into fellowship with Jehovah, and that they were also binding themselves together as brothers in a new covenant with God (Mk 14<sup>22-23</sup>). A promise of enlarging fellowship fitly closes the Gospel of Matthew in the words, 'Lo, I am with you to the end of the ages' (28<sup>20</sup>), and gives us a glimpse of the transition from the earthly to the heavenly life of Jesus.

To sum up, the Synoptic Gospels show us the conception of an eternal Divine Commonwealth, made actual by Jesus in a society welded together by fervent loyalty to Himself as the Christ of God, and pervaded by a life of mutual service to the members. He brings His followers into true fellowship with Jehovah by revealing Him and pardoning their sins. They enjoy the life of a brotherhood which is true life.

iii. THE PRIMITIVE JEWISH.

Fellowship is the most real definition of the unity which was a constituent quality of the Early Church. Intercourse, intimate and universal, among brethren, whose life was consecrated to the Divine presence, and thus free from secular, constituted the Church as distinct from the world. This unity was not expressed by any rigid exclusive organization, not even maintained by the leadership of the Apostles. Indeed, the disciples had been warned by their Lord not to allow themselves to be called 'Master' (Mt 23<sup>10</sup>). A company of baptized brethren, they had received the Holy Spirit from their risen Lord, who had welded them into one. His personal gifts were manifest in each brother passionately devoted to his unseen Lord, and so on terms of friendship with all who loved Him.

The Church appears on the stage of the public world as a new sect, holding to the belief that Jesus is Messiah. Outwardly the brethren were probably indistinguishable from good Jews, and such organization as they had would follow the lines of their former life. But it would seem that they did not think of themselves as a new organization. They were slow to cast loose their hawes and swing out into the stream as an independent Church. Led by powerful personalities, Peter, John, and James, who had been either intimate or of close kinship with Jesus, they regarded themselves as the true Israel, and for a while hoped that the nation would repent. Before St. Paul's time, however, there was a change, for we find that the brethren throughout Judaea were organized into distinctive communities, not as 'synagogues,' but as 'churches' (Gal. 1<sup>23</sup>). But in these churches the utmost freedom of the individual, which is essential for true fellowship, prevailed; for the Church grew not by official initiative, but by the prophetic power of the Holy Spirit impelling the brethren to spread far and wide the good news of their gospel.

Little as the primitive Christians differed outwardly from the Jewish world, their inner world was a new creation. It was a brotherhood of Divine origin; for not only were they baptized into the name of Jesus the Lord of life, but they had received the Holy Spirit. How sacred this fellowship was is manifest from the terrible punishment meted out to Ananias and Sapphira for violating the mutual trust that made the brotherhood possible (Ac 5).

There were various manifestations of this fellowship. (a) It was a house-church. Brethren met as sons round the common board in the homes of those who could best provide accommodation, and partook of a daily meal consecrated to the memory of their unseen but present Lord. They held communion with one another because they held communion with the risen Jesus. Common prayers, songs, and thank-givings rose to Jehovah from these family groups (Ac 2<sup>42</sup> 4<sup>13-15</sup>).

(b) This fellowship (κοινωνία) found further expression in a life of mutual service,—the rich for the poor, the strong for the weak. They rejoiced with those who rejoiced; they wept with those who wept. In fact, true κοινωνία could not be better defined than in the words of the Golden Rule—'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them' (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>). No formal ordinance, such as the community of goods, was enjoined on the brethren; their love welled forth in such a pure and powerful stream that it made its own channels. All blessings, earthly and spiritual, were shared with those who were in need.

So we have in the earliest days a true fellowship, a brotherhood united by love to a risen Lord, whom many of them had known on earth, and led without rivalry by favourite disciples of Jesus, enjoying gifts and graces from the ever present Spirit of their Lord. But that brotherhood gathered in the earthly Zion was nationalistic in sentiment. It was provincial in spirit, especially, it would seem, throughout Judaea, where the churches were in villages remote from the world of men.

iv. THE GENTILE CHURCHES OF THE PAULINE WORLD.—With the rise of Antioch a peril threatened the prestige of Jerusalem. Could the fruit of the Spirit thrive equally well in the valleys and on the plains of Syria and Asia as on the isolated plateau of Judaea? If so, it was bound to be very much more abundant. Fortunately, Paul the Apostle to the Gentiles was a man of varied culture. While his world was in cities and he thought imperially, he never treated the Jewish mind lightly, and he knew what that mind was. He understood its worth and its rights. He could discern every wave of feeling, every gust that shivered duskily across it. So St. Paul was himself the greatest power of his day making for the unity of the Church. It was a passion with him to avert a breach which would be fatal; and he was successful, for the other Apostles responded nobly as brethren, and gave him the right hand of fellowship (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>). But the sections thus united had to be cemented; so he devotes much energy to effecting a durable κοινωνία by organizing the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem. In 2 Co 8<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>13</sup> and Ro 15<sup>26</sup> the word κοινωνία is translated (RV) 'contribution'; but 'there is always at the root of κοινωνία, in the NT, the idea of Christian communion in one form or another. Those who bestow make common cause with one another and with the recipients' (Waite). The collection is a religious act, because it is a mark of Christian fellowship. Indeed, the Macedonians regard it as a signal token of Divine favour to be allowed thus to help those from whom they had received the gospel; and the poor Jewish Christians, who had made experience of the liberal Christian kindness of the Gentiles, could hardly refuse to call them brethren (2 Co 8<sup>1-5</sup> 9<sup>11-14</sup>).

The Christian fellowship was world-wide. This brotherhood was one everywhere (1 P 5<sup>9</sup>), and in writing to the Corinthians St. Paul assumes that what he says will be of interest not only to them, but 'to all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours' (1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>). The Church of God which is in Corinth is a visible but partial manifestation of the larger whole. This idea persisted after the Apostolic age; for 'Brotherhood' alternates with Ecclesia in the oldest sets of ecclesiastical canons, while omnis fraternitas and πᾶσα ἡ ἀδελφότης are used to denote the whole of Christendom (Lindsay). This world-wide brotherhood was not held together by any outward organization, though the Apostle Paul does group his churches by provinces. But organization is local: it does not follow the lines of provincial units. Of course, Christian life had to be expressed in outward fellowship wherever it was; so that all the brethren within a community, such as a city, would be grouped together to form the Church of God in that place. And the Spirit of God supplied these local churches with leaders who had the necessary gifts for the conduct of their life. This became the basis of a permanent ministry.

From the world they became outwardly separate, 'saints' chosen out of it and consecrated to God (Ro 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, Gal 1<sup>4</sup>), and so forming one family, 'the household' of faith (Gal 6<sup>10</sup>, Eph 2<sup>19</sup>), throughout the empire of this world. Hence great stress is laid upon the grace of hospitality (He 13<sup>1-2</sup>). In that busy world with its thronged highways, the Christian was always sure of a warm welcome wherever there was a church or a group of brethren (see per contra 3 Jn 8<sup>1</sup>), and the saints were made the occasion of fellowship (He 6<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>23-24</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>). St. Paul experienced many such marked tokens of fellowship, especially at the hands of the Philippians, for whom he cherished the deepest affection. They were unremittingly active in co-operation with him for the spread of the gospel; and whatever his needs, bodily or spiritual, might be, they were ready to do their best by gifts or sympathy to supply the lack. This was true fellowship (Ph 1<sup>5</sup> 2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>14-15</sup>). Philémon also was a true Christian, whose faith in, and love to, the Lord Jesus was manifested in his kindly offices towards all the saints; and the Apostle delicately suggests that he should not stop till his benevolence becomes complete and embraces even the slave Onesimus (Philem 6 10 16).

This religion of brotherhood issues in a new grace, 'love to the brethren' (φιλადελφία), which is to be cherished as an especial sign of Divine life (1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>, Ro 12<sup>10</sup>, He 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>25</sup>). A fine word, ἀπλότης ('singleness'), is used by St. Paul to denote the quality of the man in whom fellowship (κοινωνία) is a ruling motive. He is ἀπλός, 'single-minded', 'liberal'. He does not serve God and Mammon. His eye is single. Looking only at the needs of his brother, he realizes the truth of the Lord's words that it is more blessed to give than to receive (Ac 20<sup>35</sup>). Among the brethren there is no almsgiving. All that is sordid in almsgiving is removed, and generosity becomes a choice token of fellowship (2 Co 8<sup>2</sup> 9<sup>11-13</sup>). 'When men thankfully receive God's gifts, and in imitation of His bounty use them for the good of others, so that the recipients also thank God for the benefaction, it is as far as it goes the re-establishment of the right relation between God and men, and men and men.' The slave is not only made partaker of such bounty, but as he possesses this spirit he pays an ungrudging service to his master (Eph 6<sup>5</sup>).

The fellowship of church with church was further increased by the visits of Apostles and teachers, as well as by the interchange of correspondence. What was of interest to one was of interest to all in so far as it touched their common gospel. While we do not find any uniform creed or liturgy in these Epistles, there was almost certainly a substantially similar form of worship, and in their prayers and hymns the brethren gave utterance to the same faith in Jesus Christ, and in their teaching they adhered to the common truths which the Apostles taught (Ro 6<sup>17</sup>, Gal 1<sup>8</sup>). We cannot fail to be impressed by the combination of a sense of unity with great individual freedom. The Spirit took the life of believer or church, and produced in it some distinctive action, which brought diversity and enrichment without lack of proportion. Mammon, however, as these gifts were, the greatest of all and that which lay at the root of their fellowship was love; for not only was it the best because the commonest, but it tempered and restrained the more individualistic endowments, which might easily destroy the harmony of the Christian company (1 Co 12<sup>31</sup> 13). True fellowship demands variety in unity, individual freedom working at the impulse of a common spirit.

The nobles of Christian fellowship, outside the Church, is contained in the Epistle to the Ephesians. In that prose poem in praise of unity, the Church is described as one body of which each Christian is, or should be, a perfect member. A Divine creation purposed from all eternity by the Father's love, it was made actual in history through Jesus Christ. The Church is one because of the unities on which it is based. Its members are baptised into the name of the one Lord whom they confess. They are inspired by the same Spirit, and there is one God and Father of all, who is above all and through all and in all (Eph 4<sup>4-6</sup>). Historically the Church became one when, in Christ, Jew and Gentile were both reconciled unto God in one body by the cross (2<sup>14-18</sup>); and in the future to come each individual with variety of mission will reach his perfection in this perfect organism, and contribute to the completeness of the whole (4<sup>7-16</sup>). A fellowship so sublime in its ideal must be undisturbed by selfish desires. Only where love, patience, long-suffering and humility reign will there be on earth 'a communion of the saints.' 'In the Apostle's eyes all true life in an Ecclesia is a life of communion of the harmonious and mutually balancing of different elements, so that he is giving instruction on the very essence of membership when in each of the nine Epistles addressed to Ecclesia he makes the peace of God to be the supreme standard for them to aim at, and the perpetual self-surrender of love the comprehensive means of attaining it' (Hort, Christ. Ecclesia, 123).

All the manifestation of fellowship among the brethren, the very brotherhood itself, is possible only because the individual members of the communion of the saints are in personal fellowship with Jesus Christ. He indeed is the fountain and source of communion. All human fellowship is derivative. The word κοινωνία is used by St. Paul only in 1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> to express this personal fellowship with Christ, the thought being that in the Lord's Supper believers are united in close communion, because through the cup and the bread they are enabled to participate in the life of Christ Himself. But the idea is central in St. Paul's religion—'I no longer live, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>); 'For me to live is Christ' (Ph 1<sup>21</sup>). However, this fellowship of the individual is no mere sentiment. Only those who are 'rooted and grounded' are 'able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth and length and depth and height; and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge,' that they may be filled with all the fulness of God (Eph 3<sup>17-19</sup>). Now the Apostle expects that even in his own imperfect churches there should be some real enjoyment of this fellow-contended that there was a specific fever known as 'the great fever,' and that it was this, whatever it may have been, from which the sick woman in Capernaum suffered. This, however, has been questioned, and perhaps it is rather the intensity of the fever than its specific character that is indicated by the word 'great.' Probably both Peter's wife's mother and the nobleman's son suffered from malarial fever. Professor G. A. Smith tells us that the region about Tiberias is a very feverish region, and Dr. Cunningham Geikie says that malarial fever was common at Capernaum. It is very likely that there has always been a good deal of malarial fever about the shores of the Sea of Galilee, and especially about the more northerly portion of these shores. The fever from which the father of Publius suffered (Ac 28<sup>8</sup>) was fever accompanying or accompanied by acute dysentery. See also artt. ### FIELD.—

The three Greek words (ἀγρός, χώρα, χωρίον) rendered 'field' in the Gospels are distinguishable in meaning, and sometimes in use. ἀγρός is used of a field, or open space, as subject to cultivation; e.g. 'sowed good seed' (Mt 13<sup>24</sup>), 'lies of the field,' 'grass of the field' (28<sup>30</sup>), etc. χώρα denotes generally a region, or district of land, as the country of Trachonitis (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>), 'the country of the Galilee' (Lk 17<sup>1</sup>), etc. But, on the other hand, we find ἀγρός used also of the country in distinction from the city (Mt 21<sup>46</sup>), Lk 8<sup>34</sup> 9<sup>12</sup> 23<sup>26</sup>), χωρίον used of fields of tares (Mt 13<sup>25</sup>), and in Jn 4<sup>35</sup> 'Look on the fields, for they are ripe' (i.e. for harvest), 'who have reaped down your fields', and where 'the field of blood' (27<sup>8</sup>), St. Luke uses χωρίον (Ac 14<sup>14</sup>).

A knowledge of certain peculiarities of the fields of Palestine is helpful to the full understanding of several of the parables of our Lord and some other passages in the Gospels. There are now, as there were of old, numerous fields in Palestine where 'the lilies' and many other flowers grow in gorgeous profusion without human care or culture, and where 'the grass of the field,' including fibrous weeds as well as shortlived flowers, when dried by the tropical sun, are still gathered as fuel, and used to heat ovens for baking bread (cf. Mt 6<sup>28, 30</sup>). The argument of the Master, drawn from 'the grass of the field which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven,' still holds good, and still finds abundant illustration. It is true occasionally now, also, that after the owner of the land has 'sowed good seed in his field,' an enemy will in sheer spite creep in secretly and 'sow tares,' the noxious darnel (Lolium temulentum); but see TARES.

In Palestine, as in all unsettled countries, it was common, and in parts of the land it is still common, to resort to the field (the cultivated land or the open country) as a fit place in which to hide treasure (cf. Mt 13<sup>44</sup>). In ancient times the land was peculiarly subject to revolutions, exposed to raids from wandering tribes and, in some districts, liable to plunder from robbers at home. So, in the absence of safety vaults and the like, owners of treasure who feared robbery or thievery (Mt 25<sup>25</sup>), or who were setting off on a journey to a distant country, would bury their money, jewellery, etc., in the field. Then, if the owner were killed in battle, or died in a far country, no one might know where his treasures were hid; and, according to usage, such valuables when found, if no owner appeared to claim them, belonged to the owner of the land—a fact which gives point to the parable of the Hid Treasure (Mt 13<sup>44</sup>, cf. Job 32<sup>1</sup>, Pr 2<sup>4</sup>). Many persons are found digging for hid treasure in Egypt and Palestine to-day, and not a few

In the parable of the Sower (Mt 13<sup>4</sup>, Mk 4<sup>4</sup>, Lk 8<sup>5</sup>), where the AV has 'some (seeds) fell by the wayside,' the picture is really of grains of wheat or barley which fell on the trodden path leading across the field, and so were laid exposed where the birds could see and devour them (cf. Lk 8<sup>5</sup> 'trodden under foot'). It is still common in Palestine to see flocks of birds following the peasant as he sows his seed, eagerly picking up every grain that is not covered by the sower's harrow. And where it is said 'some fell upon stony places' (AV), the real allusion is to the underlying rock of limestone. The traveller finds numberless places where a broad, flat, limestone rock lies just beneath the surface of the field, with only a thin layer of earth upon it (cf. Lk 8<sup>13</sup> 'the rock'). 'Stony ground' (AV, following early English versions) suggests a soil abounding in loose stones, such as is often found there producing good wheat; but the picture is rather of a soil into which the seeds could not sink deep, and, the film of earth being readily heated because of the underlying rock, they would come up sooner than elsewhere, and at first would look uncommonly flourishing; but, not being able to send roots deep into the moist earth (cf. Lk 8<sup>6</sup>), when the hot, dry weather came the stalks would wither, and thus show that the fair promise of 'a harvest' had been deceptive (cf. Ps 129<sup>6</sup> 'grass of the house-tops').

In the fields of Palestine, too, there are still found spots that are rich, but are peculiarly infested with briars and thorn-bushes, where one may see the wheat in scattered and spindling stalks struggling for life (cf. Mt 13<sup>7</sup>). In Mk 2<sup>23</sup> and Lk 6<sup>1</sup> (AV) we have 'corn-fields' where the Gr. word (σπέρμα) is the same as in Mt 12<sup>1</sup>, where it is rendered simply 'corn,'—'through the corn' (after Tindale). It is literally 'through the grain,' i.e. the grain fields as Noyes and Bro. Un. Vers. render it, fields of wheat or barley, not of maize or Indian corn, of course. The picture is of Jesus and His disciples going through the grain, not picking up grain, or by a footpath which is a path to the grain, the grain in either case being within easy reach. It was customary then, as it is now, in Palestine, for the lands of different owners to be separated, not by fences or walls, but usually only by crude individual stones set up at intervals on the surface of the land as landmarks (cf. Dt 19<sup>14</sup>); and the roads, paths, and tracks as a rule, were not distinct from the fields as they are with us, but ran through them, so that the grain grew right up to the edge of the path. We are not meant to think of Jesus and His disciples as going ruthlessly through the fields and trampling down the grain, but as following one of these paths over or between the fields. But neither plucking the ears of wheat to eat, nor even walking across a pathless field, was, according to Jewish ideas (cf. Dt 23<sup>25</sup>), a violation of the rights of property any more than it is to-day among the Arabs. It was not of this, but of Sabbath-breaking, that the Pharisees complained.

FIERCENESS.—The word 'fierce' occurs twice in AV (Mt 8<sup>28</sup> of the two demoniacs [χαλεροί], Lk 23<sup>8</sup> of our Lord's accusers [ἐπιταχυν RV 'urgent']). But the purpose of the present article is to examine in what sense and to what extent this attribute may be attributed to Christ. The popular conception of Him is perhaps too much that of a speaker of smooth things. It is forgotten that He could utter on occasion words of fierce energy. The beauty of the unanswering innocence of the Passion, that type of silent suffering and enduring, has made His outbursts of fierce reproach or condemnation fade from the memory. His 'judge

Of recorded deeds the incident of the driving out of the vendors and money-changers from the temple precincts (Mt 21<sup>12</sup>, Mk 11<sup>15</sup>, Jn 2<sup>15</sup>) is the most notable: but it is in the vigour of His language that the possibilities of fierceness in Him are most revealed. He has small patience with certain failings, such as the lack of an faith, or worldliness, or

There is a denunciatory strain in much resembling the force of the Baptist's 'offspring of vipers' of Lk 3<sup>7</sup>. It is present in the Nazareth sermon in His OT illustrations of prophets not honoured in their own country (Lk 4); in His declaration of war with evil, 'I am come to send fire on the earth' (12<sup>49</sup>), and 'I came not to send peace but a sword' (Mt 10<sup>34</sup>); it even finds expression in the very phrase γεννηματα ἐχιδνῶν used by the Baptist (Mt 12<sup>34</sup>). None of the mildness of diplomacy is in the message to Herod—'Go ye, and tell that fox' (Lk 13<sup>31</sup>). When He encounters men or communities incapable of the heavenly vision, His words are swords. To trouble about them is to 'throw pearls before swine' (Mt 7<sup>6</sup>). They are a 'faithless and perverse generation,' or 'a wicked and adulterous generation' seeking after a visible and tangible sign of spiritual things (16<sup>4</sup>); they shall lose the Kingdom of God (21<sup>43</sup>); the heathen of Nineveh shall show themselves better judges of eternal realities (Lk 11<sup>32</sup>); there is more hope for Tyre and Sidon (10<sup>14</sup>) or for Sodom and Gomorrah than for the spiritually blind (Mt 10<sup>15</sup>); 'Ye are of your father the devil' (Jn 8<sup>44</sup>). The fierceness which marks His rejection of the third temptation (Mt 4<sup>10</sup>) is paralleled in the 'Get thee behind me, Satan' with which Peter's proffered intervention is repelled (Mk 8<sup>33</sup>). The perverter of the simplicity of childhood is told that he had better have been drowned with a millstone about his neck (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>). But the white heat of fierceness in the utterance of Christ comes when He meets with Pharisees, scribes, and teachers of the Law, who are unworthy of their high professions. They are 'false prophets . . . ravening wolves' (Mt 7<sup>15</sup>); 'hypocrites' is hurled at them in every phrase of Mt 23, in the close of Lk 11, and in Mk 7<sup>6</sup>, where Isaiah's bitterest words against lip-service are quoted against them. They are 'whited sepulchres,' 'blind guides,' 'sons of them that slew the prophets,' 'serpents.' They 'say, and do not,' so that 'the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom' before them (Mt 21<sup>31</sup>).

Thus to His Divine tenderness did Jesus add a strange fierceness, as though to teach that in faith's war with darkness lightning has its place. See art. ANGER.

LITERATURE—Seeley, Eccle Homo, ch. xxi.; Butler, Serm. viii, 'Dale Attonement', p. 338 ff. E. DAPLYN.

FIG-TREE (in NT συκή, in OT תְּעֵנָאֵךְ; the Ficus Carica, L.).—1. The fig is the principal shade- and fruit-tree of Palestine growing in all parts, in many places spontaneously. It seldom surpasses 20 ft. [Post, in Hastings' DB, s.v. 'Figs,' says 15 ft.] in height, but has a spread of from 25 to 30 ft. Its welcome shade and refreshing fruit make it the emblem of peace and prosperity (Dt 2<sup>4</sup>, Jp 9<sup>1</sup>, 1 K 4<sup>25</sup>, Mic 4<sup>4</sup>, Zec 3<sup>10</sup>, 1 Mac 14<sup>1</sup>). Besides this general symbolism, two characteristics of the tree, appealing respectively to the eye and to the palate, have led to further comparisons.

(a) The fig-tree is conspicuous in early spring by the expanding of the tips of its twigs into little green knobs called פַּגִּים paggim (Gr δανθοί, Ca 2<sup>13</sup> RV 'green figs') which are the flower-fruit buds, and together with the leaf-bud, which expands shortly after and soon overshadows the pag, or fruit rudiment, serve as the herald of the coming summer (Mt 24<sup>32</sup> and ||). 'T' 'all the trees' (Lk 21<sup>29</sup>) is in the fig-tree because of its early and conspicuous verdure. The ripening of the pag follows the appearance of the flowers on the earth, and accompanies the 'blossoming of the vine' as the feature of the advancing season and the time of mating (Ca 2<sup>13</sup>). In the same connexion may be mentioned the phenomenon of the dropping of great quantities of the immature fruit in consequence of imperfect fertilization, so that the scattered paggim covering the ground under the fig-trees become to the author of Rev 6<sup>13</sup> a symbol of the stars fallen to earth from the firmament, 'as a fig-tree casteth her unripe figs when she is shaken of a great wind.'

(b) The fig-tree has two (not 'one') crops of fruit each year. The first-crop, תְּעֵנָאֵךְ kārāh, Is 28<sup>1</sup>, Jer 24<sup>2</sup>, Hos 9<sup>10</sup>, Mic 7<sup>1</sup>) is produced upon the old wood of the preceding year, the buds which remained undeveloped through the winter swelling into the little green paggim already described, towards the end of the season of spring rains (March–April), and coming to maturity in June. The תְּעֵנָאֵךְ tē'ēnāh, or autumn fig, is the fig of commerce, and is produced on the new wood of the same year. The leaf-bud, which expanded shortly after the pag and soon distanced it in growth, puts out in its turn a flower-fruit bud which matures in August, or later, according to the variety, the fruit hanging on the boughs until winter, when the branches are again left naked, grey, and straggling.

This phenomenon of successive fruitage in the fig-tree is doubtless the source of the description of the fruit-trees of the New Jerusalem (Ezk 47<sup>12</sup>, Rev 22<sup>2</sup> 'the tree of life') as 'bearing fruit every month.' In the Talmud it is a symbol for the acquisition of learning, which, to be permanent, must come by little and little (Hamburger, REJ 3, s.v. 'Feige,' p. 360 with references). Hence the saying, 'Whoso sees a fig-tree in his dreams, his learning shall be safe from forgetfulness' (Berachoth, 57). The capacity of the tree for prolongation of its bearing season leads in fact to certain representations which naturally pass over into exaggerations and are of no important to avoid.

Edersheim (Life and Times, bk. iv. ch. xvi. p. 246) refers to 'a species (the Benoth Shurach) mentioned in Shebb, v. 1, of which the fruit required three years for ripening,' but which may more reasonably be understood as simply a late-bearing variety whose fruit reached maturity only in exceptionally favourable seasons, not oftener than once in three years. So with the rhetorical flourish of Josephus (BJ III. x. 8) celebrating the 'eternal climate of the plain of Gennesaret. His statement that 'it supplies the principal fruits of the country and figs, uninterruptedly during ten months of the year,' cannot possibly be made to prove more than the fact that the fig is a semi-tropical depression, 600 ft. below sea-level, fresh fruit, including figs, could be obtained almost to the end of winter.

To explain the narrative of Mk 11<sup>13</sup> two other facts have been advanced of doubtful value and trust-worthiness. It is asserted that neglected relics of the autumn crop sometimes cling to the branches of the fig-tree throughout the winter; but Post (l.c. p. 6) was unable during a residence of 33 years in Syria to find, or hear of, such. The statement of Edersheim (l.c. v. ii. p. 374) that such left-over fruit about April 1 'would of course be edible becomes admissible only by inserting a 'not' after 'of course.' It is also asserted that the pag, or green fruit, was eaten, even Benzinger (PRE<sup>3</sup> s.v. 'Fruchtbäume,' p. 304) declaring that 'Jesus might expect to find such winter figs (the pagim) on a tree already in leaf at the season of Passover, that is before the time of the ripening of figs.' In the sense that the rudimentary fruit-buds would be discoverable under the leaves, upon examination (unless the tree had become sterile by reversion to the wild type, as sometimes occurs), this statement is true; the present writer has found such dry tasteless 'figs' at 'An Fara near Jerusalem, on March 1, the size of an olive, though the tree was leafless. Boys sometimes nibble these buds, but to speak of the pagim at this season as 'winter figs' is . . . . The evidence for the edible quality of . . . drawn by Edersheim from the Talmud (Bk. v. ii. p. 375, . . . Shebb. iv. 7 and Jerus. Shebb. 35b, las. . . . .) suggests only that at a later season the . . . . was sometimes used as a condiment 'with bread.' This, however, was after the pagim 'began to assume a red colour,' and not when the foliage had only just begun to cover the setting fruit-bud. Apart from the question whether a tree could be . . . . or the absence of a quite exceptional alleged phenomena, whether of . . . . the autumn harvest, or use of the . . . . neither of them any real bearing on the difficulty that Jesus should approach a . . . side fig-tree, with the intention of . . . hunger, when, as so frankly stated in the . . . itself, 'it was not the season of figs.'

2. The Gospel references to the fig-tree include both parables and incidents, and make allusion to phenomena both of its leafage and its fruitage. As questions arise to how great an extent the incidents may not be symbolic, parables becoming concrete in process of repetition, or even pure symbols, it is best to consider first the two instances in which the fig-tree is made the subject of undoubted parable by our Lord.

(b) The parable of the Barren Fig-Tree (Lk 13<sup>6-9</sup>) stands in the same eschatological context as the warning to read the signs of the times (Lk 12<sup>35-13</sup> paralleled by Mk 13<sup>35-36, 12, 13</sup>), and forms its climax. One is tempted to conjecture that the problematic 'parable' referred to in Mk 13<sup>28</sup>, Mt

24<sup>32</sup> (ἀπὸ δὲ τῆς συνῆς μάθετε τὴν παραβολήν, cf. Mk 7<sup>17</sup> as against Lk 21<sup>29</sup> καὶ εἶπεν παραβολήν) was once no other than this. At all events it simply applies, in fuller form, the figure credited in Mt 3<sup>10</sup> = Lk 3<sup>9</sup> to the Baptist.

This is the common prophetic doctrine of the Divine ἀνοχή, the present a time of suspension of the Divine sentence to leave opportunity for repentance.

The . . . . . of interpretation (e.g., the . . . . . years = the three (?) Passovers of Christ's public ministry) is now fortunately discredited. Yet it is incorrect, with Wellhausen (Ev. Lucae, ad loc.) to say that the fig-tree stands for the individual. Not merely is the . . . . . of the punishment of Israel (Jl 17, . . . . . the men . . . . . Siloam, and the Galileans, cut down by the sword of Pilate, are brought forward as 'signs of the times.' The warning, accordingly, is certainly against 'the overthrow of the Jewish people' (T. K. Cheyne, Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Fig-tree,' col. 1521). 'Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish' is not spoken of the fate of individuals, but of the common overt . . . . . may be avoided by individual repentance, . . . . . 13:29-32.

3. The cursing of the fig-tree (Mk 11<sup>12-14, 20-25</sup> = Mt 21<sup>18-22</sup>).—Parabolic symbolism is so slightly concealed under the narrative features of this story that the majority of critics are disposed to regard it as a mere endowment of the Lukan parable of the Barren Fig-tree with concrete form, just as the parable of the Good Samaritan, and others, were long treated as instances of historical fact.

In favour of this explanation are several features of the narrative and its setting.

(a) The . . . . . omitted incorporation of Mk. by Lk. . . . . omission of Mk 11<sup>12-14, 20-25</sup> was deliberate. The most natural explanation of it is that St. Luke regarded the story as a double of his parable, Lk 13<sup>6-9</sup>. Conversely the parable does not appear in Mt. or Mark.

(b) The withering of the tree (Mk 11<sup>20-25</sup>), a sequel of the next day after the cursing (11<sup>12-14</sup>), occupies a different position in Mk 21<sup>18-22</sup>, taking place 'on the spot.' In both Gospels . . . . . sequel proves itself a secondary . . . . . by its material and its language. The contents of Mk 11<sup>20-25</sup> consist in the main of two logia, torn from their proper context (cf. Mt 17<sup>10</sup>, Lk 17<sup>5</sup>, and Mt 6<sup>14, 15</sup>) and characterized by non-Markan expressions (cf. 'your Father in heaven,' Mk 11<sup>25</sup>). Such loose agglomerations of stray logia are frequent in our Second Gospel (Mk 3<sup>22-30, 41, 12, 21, 25, 31, 34-35, 9, 42-50, 10<sup>10-12</sup> etc.). In Mt 21<sup>18-22</sup> the language is alien (παράρημα, 'on the spot,' vv. 18, 20), occurs 17 times in Lk. and Acts, whereas Mt. and Mk. have invariably elsewhere εὐθὺς or εὐθέως, and the logia taken from Mk. produce duplication of Mt 17<sup>20</sup> and almost of 6<sup>14, 15</sup>. By transposing the sequel into immediate juxtaposition with the cursing, and . . . . . Mk 11<sup>20-25</sup>, Mt. avoids one of the two . . . . . of the principal narrative of the . . . . . of the temple and its consequences (Mk 11<sup>15-19, 20-25, 41-42</sup>), and heightens the marvel, but fails to remove the evidence of his own dependence afforded by the duplication of 17<sup>20</sup>, and only brings into stronger relief the supplementary and supererogatory character of the sequel.</sup>

This superfluity of Mk 11<sup>20-25</sup> is most apparent in the light of such attempted explanations as that of B. Weiss, who says: The cursing of the fig-tree was of course meant by Jesus symbolically, to denote the fall of the Jewish nation . . . . . (ad loc.) comments says, early Weiss understood him God misunderstood him.' Nevertheless Weiss is clearly right in maintaining that the purpose of Jesus would be just as completely met if the story stopped with 11<sup>14</sup>.

But even more fatal than the superfluity of the sequel is its perversion of the real symbolism of the incident. Nothing is said of that which analogy (Mt 3<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>16-19</sup>, Lk 13<sup>6-9</sup>) proves to be the real moral lesson; but the appended sayings are adapted to find in it mere evidence of the wonder-working power of belief. The disciples are to learn that the prayer, or even the fiat, of faith—here taken as equivalent to undoubting assurance—can set at defiance the order of nature. This, the writer understands, was the purpose of the cursing. As part of the rebuke of the disciples' half-heartedness (δυσθυμία) in the case of the epileptic boy (Mt 17<sup>18-20</sup>; cf. Lk 17<sup>5-6</sup>, 1 Co 13<sup>2</sup>), the hyperbolic saying on mountain-moving faith is justified. The cursing with Mt 6<sup>14-15</sup> to give the moral of the withering of the fig-tree, both fall to a lower plane, scarcely above that of mere thaumaturgy. The cursing of the fig-tree is lost in the mere wonder of a tree, a needless miracle of display.

(c) Even after the admission of the unhistorical character of the story (Mt 17<sup>20-23</sup>), the incident of the cursing is still encumbered with inherent improbabilities, or which the most formidable is the lack of hunger as the motive of Jesus' approach to the tree. It is not enough to admit that the curse must be explained, if at all, by the discovery, made upon close inspection, that the tree was empty, not only of those supposititious edible products which could not be reasonably expected, but of even the rudiments of a crop in the season, and to suggest that when Jesus arrived 'immediately the tree was full of unsatisfied hunger was lost in the thought of a person which flashed across His mind' (Post, l.c.). Change of motive is inconceivable, because hunger cannot have caused the approach. Relics of the last season's crop, if sought at all, would be sought on a tree whose still leafless branches left them in plain sight, not where they would be concealed by the foliage, if not thrust off by the new growth. So, too, of paggim; but the degree of starvation necessary to suggest appeasing the stomach by paggim at the season in question is improbable.

There remains as a historical basis for the story only the possibility that Jesus' footsteps might be attracted by the suggestion of a possible moral lesson in the precocious leafage of a wayside tree, the discovery that it covered no promise of fruit leading Him thereupon to an utterance in the vein of prophetic symbolism. Gould (Internat. Crit. Com. 'Mark,' 212) finds evidence in Hos 1<sup>3</sup>, Jn 4<sup>6-11</sup>, Mt 13<sup>10-15</sup> that 'such acted parables were not without precedent among the Jews.' More apposite might be the reference of Δδ. xi. 10 to prophets in the early Church who might 'do something as an outward mystery typical of the Church (Eph 5<sup>23</sup>) because in like manner did the prophets of old time'; cf. Ac 21<sup>11</sup>. But the only real parallel in the story of Jesus is the parable (unaccompanied by any narrative of fact) of the Stater in the Fish's Mouth, Mt 17<sup>24-27</sup>. The propensity of the reader, if not of the Evangelist himself, to take this symbolic direction to Peter as implying the real execution of a miracle, shows how easily a symbolic sentence of death, directed against the fig-tree as the representative of unbelief, might be taken to imply its literal withering away.

Due consideration of all these objections leaves the question still open whether the story of Mk 11<sup>12-14</sup> records a specific utterance of this symbolic kind directed against a particular tree, on a particular occasion; or whether tradition and the Evangelist together have not simply localized between Bethphage ('Fig-town') and Jerusalem, on occasion of the supreme visitation of the latter, a visualized version of the parable Lk 13<sup>6-9</sup>.

In favour of the former view may be cited critics no less radical than H. J. Holtzmann (Hakana ad loc.) and J. Weiss (Das Älteste Evangelium, p. 268). Still more pronounced is Schwartz in favour of connecting the fig-tree of Mk 11<sup>12-14</sup>, and even that of Mk 13<sup>28</sup> as well with some sun-bleached skeleton from the orchards of Bethphage, a lone relic of the siege of Titus, pointed to by Jerusalem Christians as the memorial of Jesus' warning and promise, but Schwartz would not admit a basis of fact for this early identification by tradition of 'the' fig-tree but rather such as Cheyne instances in 'the inn' of the Good Samaritan.

The phenomena of the text indicate, however, that the process must at least precede our text of Mark. For our Evangelist the symbolic sense has already disappeared leaving only the work of power. Before this stage of the process could be reached the parable of the Barren Fig-tree must already have been transformed by local tradition into symbolic cursing of some given tree, and the moral lesson have been subsequently eclipsed by the pure miracle.

More than this, while recognizing the secondary character of Mk 11<sup>20-23</sup>, and perhaps the fundamental identity of the symbol with the parable whose lesson is so the same, may still demand more evidence it surrenders the actual fact that our Second Evangelist retains a trustworthy tradition of the actual occasion of the utterance.

4. The fig-tree of Nathanael (Jn 1<sup>48</sup>). Symbolism admittedly enters to so large a degree into the narrative of the Fourth Gospel (cf. e.g. Jn 9<sup>7</sup> 12<sup>33</sup>), that it is not surprising that a more radical school of interpreters, looking upon it as the uniform product of an allegorizing fancy, should find in the unexplained reference of Jn 1<sup>48</sup> the suggestion of an allegorical sense, the fig-tree the symbolic meaning of religious life as applied in the Talmud, or even playing the part of the sacred Bo-tree (Ficus religiosa) in Buddhist legend. The fact that commentators from Schoettgen and Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. ad loc.) downwards have inferred that Nathanael was 'aut orans, aut legens, aut meditans, aut aliquid religiosum praestans' is proof that this mental association is natural; but it cannot be truly said that the Evangelist allegorizes. The words 'when thou wast under the fig-tree' are obscure, not because we fail to apply the key, but because the Evangelist has left something lacking. He utters an utterance with no other clue than the recognition by Nathanael of Jesus' supernatural knowledge. He wishes the reader to guess that Jesus had here proved Himself the καρδιουργός λόγος (cf. Wis 16<sup>3</sup>), as in the case of the Samaritan Woman later (4<sup>17-18</sup>, 29); but he either does not trouble himself, or was unable, to relate the facts.

Cheyne indeed (Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Nathanael') considers the usual explanation 'hardly adequate. If it simply means, "when thou hadst retired under the shade of the fig-tree for meditation or prayer," we ask why the Evangelist did not express the Master's meaning more distinctly (contrast Jn 4<sup>18</sup>). His answer is a conjectural emendation of the Hebrew (?) in a supposititious source of the Gospel, וְאָתָּה כִּתְּבָתָּ 'when thou wast making supplication,' for וְאָתָּה תַּחַת הַתְּאֵנָה 'when thou wast under the fig-tree.' But conjecture of this sort discredits itself. To every reader it is a most remarkable comment of the narrative is so completely and unaccountably misunderstood. If it be granted that the Fourth Gospel is a composite work, it is not unreasonable to suppose its compiler to have left unexplained the fact that Nathanael's source would have explained it. The fact that the Evangelist has left it unexplained for the reader to guess is a distinctive feature of this Gospel.]

If the traditional view be maintained, the Evangelist's reserve will be accounted for as reflecting the enigmatic nature of the actual dialogue, which, so far as by-standers were able to perceive, had no further explanation.

1. The fire are the following.
(a) Those concerned with the domestic use of fire for warming and cooking. In the better houses in Jerusalem, the rooms were warmed by charcoal fires in portable braziers; in poorer houses the wood or other fuel was burned in a hollow in the earthen floor. The fire into which the epileptic boy fell (Mt 17<sup>15</sup>=Mk 9<sup>22</sup>) would be of the latter description. The fire of coals kindled for warmth in the middle of the court of the high priest's house (Mk 14<sup>54</sup>=Lk 22<sup>56</sup>, Jn 18<sup>18</sup>),* and that for cooking on the shore of the Lake of Gennesaret (Jn 6<sup>9</sup>), would be charcoal fires on tripods. (b) Fire from heaven (lightning, or the same kind, natural or miraculous) was a frequent form of Divine judgment in OT. One instance of this (the destruction of Sodom) is recalled in Lk 17<sup>34</sup>, and another (in the life of Elijah) prompted the feeling and suggested the question of James and John in Lk 9<sup>54</sup>.

2. The figurative references to fire are of various kinds. Since wood which was worthless for any other purpose was used as fuel, fire became an emblem of the judgment awaiting spiritual unfruitfulness (Mt 3<sup>10</sup>=Lk 3<sup>9</sup>, Mt 7<sup>19</sup>, Jn 15<sup>6</sup>). A similar idea was suggested by the burning of other worthless things, such as chaff (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>=Lk 3<sup>17</sup>) and tares (Mt 13<sup>30</sup>, 40, 42). The 'furnace of fire,' which is part of the natural imagery of the parable of the Tares, becomes, in the parable of the Fig-tree, a standing expression for the destiny of the unbeliever (Mt 13<sup>50</sup>). Similarly we have 'eternal' (RV) or 'everlasting' (AV) fire (Mt 18<sup>8</sup> 25<sup>41</sup>), 'unquenchable' (RV) fire (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>=Lk 3<sup>17</sup>, Mk 9<sup>43</sup>, 48), and (RV) 'the Gehenna of fire' (RV 'the hell of fire,' AV 'hell fire') in Mt 5<sup>22</sup>, Mt 18<sup>9</sup> (=Mk 9<sup>43</sup>, 45, 47). The last of these expressions is found in the same context as the other two and gives the key to their meaning. From the OT associations of the valley of Hinnom the name Gehenna had in Christ's time been appropriated in Jewish thought for the place of the final punishment of the wicked—a place of burning and corruption, in which body as well as spirit would be tortured. In the passages above mentioned our Lord must be understood to use the popular religious language of His time, though it may have been in a less literal and more parabolic sense than usual. To the group of sayings in Mk 9<sup>43-48</sup> is attached another (Mk 9<sup>49</sup>), in which fire is the emblem of the self-discipline in this world, by which the destruction of Gehenna in the next world is to be avoided. The destructiveness of fire made the phrase 'I will send fire' a common form of prophetic Divine threatening in OT, and this phrase is taken up by Christ (Lk 12<sup>49</sup>) as expressing, in one aspect, the result of His earthly mission. Fire is used by John the Baptist as an emblem of the purity and intensity of the influence accompanying the baptism of the Holy Spirit which he foretold that Christ should bestow (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>=Lk 3<sup>16</sup>).

The eyes of the glorified Christ, as seen in the vision of the Apocalypse, are compared to a flame of fire (Rev 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>18</sup> 19<sup>12</sup>).

Origen (Hom. in Jer. xx. 3) has preserved the following agraphon of Jesus: 'He who is near me is near the fire; he who is far from me is far from the kingdom.'

JAMES PATRICK.

* In Mk 14<sup>54</sup>=Lk 22<sup>56</sup> φῶς is used instead of πῦρ (cf. Lk 22<sup>59</sup>). In classical Gr. a similar use of the word is found in cases where a fire is thought of as the source of light as well as heat (so also 1 Mac 12<sup>29</sup>, cf. v. 28 where πῦρ is employed). Its appropriateness in both the Synoptic passages is due to the fact that it was night, and, in the Lk passage, to the further fact that it was the blaze of the fire which revealed Peter to the maid. In both cases RV brings out the meaning by rendering ἄπὸς τοῦ φῶς 'in the light of the fire.'

FIRKIN (μετρητής, Jn 2<sup>6</sup> only).—An Attic liquid measure, which is generally regarded as the equivalent of the Hebrew bath (cf. LXX 2 Ch 4<sup>5</sup>), and is therefore 'able to contain seventy-two sextaries' (Jos. Ant. VIII. ii. 9), accurately 71.28 pints, or 3.514 gallons (cf. 9 Engl. bushels). 'Firkim' (AV and RV)—the fourth part of a barrel containing from 32 to 36 gallons—as a translation is sufficiently exact for ordinary purposes.

Previously emptied for the ablutions of the guests, the firkin was used to wash the feet afresh. Their character and the reality of the miracle. Very effective is the touch added by the expression ἕως ἄνω, 'up to the brim,' if only in the firkin a sure basis for calculating the quantity of the wedding gift. The lowest estimate of the quantity of wine must be over 12 firkins or 108 gallons; yet, had the vessels been larger they had been filled; had there been more vessels, more wine. To such lavishness there need not be imputed indiscretion. Our Lord did not give simply to meet a pressing need, or even for future use, but rather to exhibit the illimitable power of the Giver. 'It is His miraculous sign . . . it must become the type of the fulness of grace and joy which the only-begotten Son brings to the world' (Godet on Jn 2<sup>6</sup>).

ALEX. A. DUNCAN.

'The First and the Last' is claimed by Jehovah as a description of Himself, with slight variations in the form, in Is 41<sup>4</sup> 44<sup>6</sup> 48<sup>12</sup> (cf. also 43<sup>10</sup>). The Greek form of the title in Rev. is not identical with that given by the LXX in any of these passages, in all of which the LXX has differences representing differences in the Hebrew (41<sup>4</sup> ἐγὼ θεὸς πρῶτος, καὶ εἰς τὰ ἐπερχόμενα ἐγὼ εἰμι; 44<sup>6</sup> ἐγὼ πρῶτος καὶ ἐγὼ μετὰ τὰ ἄλλα; 48<sup>12</sup> ἐγὼ εἰμι πρῶτος, καὶ ἐγὼ εἰμι εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα). It is plain, however, that a supreme description of Jehovah in the OT is applied in Rev. to Christ, and that the title of the transference as regards the First and the Last is unmistakable. Besides this, in 22<sup>13</sup>, where, as has been said, it is natural to regard Christ as the speaker, the title 'the First and the Last' stands between two others, 'the Alpha and the Omega,' 'the Beginning and the End,' the first of which is found also in 1<sup>8</sup> and 21<sup>6</sup>, and the second in 21<sup>6</sup>, in which passages the speaker may be either Christ or, as is maintained by some (Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 263<sup>a</sup>), God the Father, or 'God in the Undivided Unity of His Being.' It may be, therefore, that in Rev. itself we have the same supreme title given to God the Father and to Christ. But whether this be so or not, once it is admitted that 22<sup>13</sup> is spoken by Christ, the accumulation in that verse of descriptions which could only belong to the infinite being of God emphatically marks the belief of the author of Rev. as to the nature of Christ (see Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 691<sup>b</sup>, vol. iv. p. 263<sup>a</sup>).

Of the 'Thirteen Principles of the Faith,' formulated by Moses Maimonides (12th cent. A.D.), the fourth is 'I believe with perfect faith that the Creator of the world is the first and the last' (Authorized Daily Prayer Book of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Empire, p. 89). Schoettgen says that the title was also given by the ancient Jews to the Messiah (Hor. Heb. tom ii lib i 'Nominum Messia, quæ commands the redemption of the firstborn: 'All the firstborn of man among thy sons shalt thou redeem' (Ex 13<sup>13</sup>, cf. 13<sup>15</sup> 34<sup>20</sup>).

From the foregoing one can understand that the term 'first-born,' πρωτότοκος (that which, as the most precious, belonged, in the first instance, to Jehovah), came to be one of particular honour (cf. Ex 42<sup>2</sup>, Jer 31<sup>9</sup>), and it is used as such in reference to Christ (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, Col 1<sup>15</sup> 15).

The only occurrence of the term in the Gospels is in Lk 2<sup>7</sup> καὶ ἔτεκεν τὸν υἱὸν τὸν πρωτότοκον,* and apart from its significance to the Jewish mind as outlined above, its importance lies in its bearing upon the question of the perpetual virginity of the mother of Christ. The term suggests the subsequent birth of in the first place, as a title of honour it would naturally be mentioned in connexion with Christ by the Evangelists, and secondly, 'firstborn' lay in its meaning, which attached to such,† this is as has been said in the previous section; indeed, St. Luke directly implies as much when he quotes, in substance, from Ex 13<sup>12</sup> 'Every male that openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord' (Lk 2<sup>3</sup>).

Redemption of the firstborn.—In the passage Lk 2<sup>22</sup> two distinct ceremonies are referred to: the presentation to the Lord, and the redemption; the former of these implies the actual dedication of the child to God (cf. 1 S 1<sup>28</sup>); from what has been said above, this ceremony must be regarded as the 'it or the primitive act of literally (i.e. giving) the firstborn son to the Deity.

Between the two ceremonies may be illustrated by the practice of modern orthodox Jews. The father of the child first presents his firstborn to the cohen, and makes a declaration ending with the words: 'It is said, Sanctify unto me all the firstborn, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast; it is mine.' This is a definite act of presentation to God, of renunciation on the part of the father,—the child is no longer his. This part of the ceremony corresponds to Lk 2<sup>22</sup>. Then the father places fifteen shillings (five selaim or shekels) before the cohen, who thereupon asks: 'Which wouldst thou rather, give me thy firstborn son, the firstborn of his mother; or redeem him for five selaim, which thou art bound to give according to the Law?' The father replies: 'I desire to redeem my son, and here thou hast the value of his redemption, which I am bound to give according to the Law.'§ This ceremony corresponds to Lk 2<sup>24</sup>.|| This redemption of the firstborn (כִּפְיוֹ) took place thirty days after birth (Lk 2<sup>22</sup>; cf. Lv 12<sup>4</sup>, Nu 18<sup>16</sup>),** and the price of redemption was, according to Nu 3<sup>47</sup> 18<sup>16</sup>, five shekels; in Ex 13<sup>13</sup> the command to redeem the firstborn is given, though the price of redemption is not mentioned, while in Lv 12 there is no mention at all regarding the redemption of the firstborn, reference being made only to an atonement which has to be made for the purification of the mother; it may be owing to Lv 12 that in Lk 2<sup>22</sup> 'their' purification is spoken of, i.e. of the child as well as of the mother; at any rate v. 24 seems to point to an amalgamation of the offerings due from the mother for purification, and on behalf of the child for redemption;* in the modern service of thanksgiving for women after childbirth no provision is made for any offering.

§ The law of the redemption of the firstborn 'applies to the firstborn of the mother and not of the father. Hence the husband of several wives would have to redeem the firstborn of each one of them, while the husband of a woman who had had children by a previous marriage need not redeem her child although it was his firstborn' (Jewish Encyclopedia, v. 396). Moreover, the first male child of a woman need not be redeemed if a female child has been born before him.

FIRST-FRUIT.—On the offering of first-fruits as a Jewish institution see Hastings' DB, vol. ii. p. 10 f.

The word rendered first-fruits (ἀπαρχή) occurs 8 times in the NT, and only in 1 Co 15<sup>20</sup> 23 is it applied directly to our Lord. 'Now hath Christ been raised from the dead, the first-fruits of them that are asleep'; 'Christ the first-fruits; then they that are Christ's.' It is possible, as some have suggested, that there is a reference in v. 20 to the specific offering of the sheaf of the first ripe corn on the second day of the Passover feast (Lv 23<sup>10</sup> 11). The coincidence of our Lord's resurrection on the 16th Nisan—the day on which the sheaf was offered before the Lord—would no doubt suggest the idea of the first-fruits to the Apostle's mind. But, even apart from this specific reference, the figure of the risen Christ as the first-fruits from the dead is perfectly natural. And there is more here than at first supposed. Christ's resurrection of His people's resurrection, just as the first-fruits were the pledge of the harvest to come. Christ is the first to be raised from the dead, and so stands in the front rank alone, as the first-fruits were plucked before the rest of the produce was ripe; but, just as certainly as the harvest in due time followed the first-fruits, so shall those who sleep in Christ be raised up in due time, and stand in the second rank after Him. But, further, it is clearly implied here, and explicitly taught in other passages, that as is Christ the first-fruits, so shall be the rest of the harvest. There is implied here a community of nature and character between Christ, the first-fruits, and His people. It is only the time of their manifestation that is different. The portion gathered as first-fruits is of the same nature as the rest, and the rest is of the same nature and character and standing as the first-fruits. This is indicated specially in v. 21, where it is said that, as death came by man, so it is only by man that the resurrection can come, i.e. resurrection and triumph over death can be man's possession only when given him by one who is man like himself. Man, therefore, must be of the same nature and character and standing as Christ, the first-fruits. What is suggested here is plainly taught elsewhere (Col 3<sup>4</sup>, Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). Christ, according to these passages, is the first-fruits, the firstborn among many brethren, not only as the pledge that, as He rose, so His people shall rise from the dead, but also that as He is, in nature and character, so shall His people be. That is, perhaps, the most glorious promise of the resurrection first-fruits.

In Ro 8<sup>23</sup> the first-fruits of the Spirit received by Christ's people are referred to. That they have received the Spirit in some measure and have been sanctified inwardly, is the pledge that they shall receive it in yet greater abundance, that there shall be a final outpouring of the Spirit by which the body of man shall be redeemed even as the spirit has been sanctified—the psychical body being changed into a spiritual. In Ro 11<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>, Ja 1<sup>18</sup>, Rev 14<sup>4</sup> the reference is to the future of mankind, of which those already are the first-fruits and pledge. Those already redeemed and presented to God as holy are the first-fruits, the pledge of the coming harvest of a holy redeemed humanity.

FISH, FISHER, FISHING.—The present article is not concerned with the fish of the Mediterranean, nor with those which inhabit various watercourses in the Holy Land, nor even with those that belong to the lower course of the Jordan or of its tributaries, or of the other streams that flow into the Dead Sea. The only fish mentioned in the Gospels, the only ones, which come within the scope of this article are those of the Lake of Gennesaret, to which we naturally add those that are found in the upper course of the Jordan or in the springs in the neighbourhood of the Lake.

Fish (OT דג, dag) are designated in the NT only by the general term ἰχθύς, occasionally with its diminutive ἰχθύδι, the employment of the latter term necessarily marking any intended distinction; cf. for an instance in point, Mt 15<sup>34</sup> with v. 36. Nowhere in the whole Bible do we find a special name for a definite species of fish.

Fish formed a large part of the food of the Lake. This may be inferred from the ἰχθυὶ of Jesus (Lk 11<sup>11</sup>, cf. Mt 7<sup>10</sup>), in honest foods are enumerated. bread, fish, eggs. The same conclusion is implied in what is related with reference to the two multiplications of the loaves. On the occasion of the first (Mt 14<sup>13-21</sup>, Mk 6<sup>30-44</sup>, Lk 9<sup>10-17</sup>, Jn 6<sup>1-15</sup>) it is said that there was present a lad with five loaves and two fishes; in the account of the second (Mt 15<sup>32-39</sup>, Mk 8<sup>13-16</sup>) it is mentioned that, in addition to the seven loaves, there were also 'a few small fishes.' We may cite, further, Lk 24<sup>42</sup>.

It is noteworthy to note that for the 'small fishes' of the other Gospel employs the term ἰχθύνες, which Bochart (Hieroz) employed in the same way by the best Greek writers, e.g. Plato, Menander, etc., and that ἰχθυόεσσι is met with as synonymous with 'fish-eaters.'

It is legitimate to suppose that a trade in fish was carried on between the Lake of Tiberias and the rest of the country. The name of the town of Taricheæ (Ταριχεῖαι), situated on the shore of the Lake, implies a business connected with salted provisions (τάριχοι). It may be that this traffic extended as far as Jerusalem; some have supposed that it was in this way that one of Jesus' disciples, the brother of Simon Peter, was known to the high priest (Mt 18<sup>18</sup>); but this is nothing more than an ingenious conjecture.

'Fisher' or 'fisherman' (Heb. דגל) is expressed in the NT by ἀλιεύς or ἀλιεύς; the verb 'to fish' by ἀλιεύειν. Several of the first and principal disciples followed the calling of fishermen. The Synoptics describe the scene when Jesus called them to follow Him (Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup>, Mk 1<sup>16-20</sup>, Lk 5<sup>1-11</sup>). These three narratives contain the promise, 'I will make you fishers of men.' Lk. connects the story with the miraculous draught; cf. in this respect also Jn 21<sup>6-11</sup>. In one of the parables of the Kingdom (Mt 13<sup>47-50</sup>) Jesus compares the latter to a net; and the separation which the fishermen make, in their catch, between what is good and what is bad, is used to symbolize the separation of the righteous from the wicked at the Final Judgment. The separation by which good and bad is not expressly indicated. The point in view might be the difference between clean and unclean foods as defined by the Law (cf. Dt 14<sup>3ff</sup>, Lv 11<sup>3ff</sup>), but there might be other motives, such as those which Loitet indicates in the case of modern fishermen, who reject certain fish on account of their inferior size (Poissons et Reptiles du lac de Tibériade, p. 52), their disagreeable aspect (ib pp. 32, 82), or their unpleasant muddy flavour (ib pp. 35, 58, 64).

The fishermen sometimes carried on their trade in partnership, as is still the case at the present day, when the fishermen of Tiberias form a kind of corporation with fixed rules. The number of fishing vessels on the Lake at the beginning of the Christian era must have been very considerable. Josephus (BJ II. xxi. 8) speaks of 330 (v l. 230); see also Mk 4<sup>38</sup>, Jn 6<sup>23</sup>. Forty years ago Furrer found only 4; at Lortet saw three in 1875 and six in 1886, counted nine in 1886, and the present writer saw the same number in 1894, while in 1899 he noted fourteen; and no doubt the number has increased since then.

The fishermen made use of nets. One of the Greek terms employed (Mt 13<sup>47</sup>) is σαγγήνη, seine, 'drag-net,' a large net which two or more boats arrange in a circle in the lake, in such a way as to enclose a vast space with a kind of vertical wall. It is kept stretched by means of floats. Then the two boats are drawn together, and the whole wall is hauled ashore. The other species of net mentioned in the Gospels (Mt 4<sup>18</sup>) is the casting net (ἀμφίβληστρον), which a single man throws with a skilful turn of the hand, and which is of circular form, like an umbrella. Once cast into the water it is drawn out with a single pull. This is still the method most commonly used in our own time. The other passages where nets are spoken of (Mt 4<sup>20</sup>, Mk 1<sup>18</sup>, Lk 5<sup>2-6</sup>, Jn 21<sup>6-11</sup>) use the general term δικτυον, which might be applied to any kind of net. Some texts speak of washing and of mending nets (Lk 5<sup>8</sup>, Mt 4<sup>21</sup>, Mk 1<sup>19</sup>). See also NETS.

The Gospels only once mention line-fishing, namely in Mt 17<sup>27</sup>, where we read of Peter casting the hook (ἀγκιστρον), which was certainly placed at the end of a cord or line, but we cannot say whether the latter was attached to a rod or long reed or was simply held in the hand. In the NT there is no mention of harpooning fish (contrast Job 41<sup>7</sup> [He 40<sup>31</sup>]). At the present day we still meet with examples of this practice.

The waters of the Lake of Tiberias are exceptionally rich in fish, especially by the shore of el-Battha (to the east of the mouth of the Jordan), and in the bay of et-Tabigha. These were in former times the favourite ground of fishermen, and these spots are still frequented by them in our own day. There, on the shore of el-Battha lay Bethsaida-Julias; and, if there were two Beth-saidas (a much controverted question; see artt. BETHSAIDA and CAPERNAUM), the second was at et-Tabigha or in its vicinity. Now Bethsaida means 'house of fish,' 'fishery.' It was the native town of Peter and Andrew, of James and John,—all four fishermen,—as well as of Philip, whose occupation is unknown to us. According to Jn 21<sup>2</sup> Thomas and Nathanael (of Cana) appear also to have been fishermen, at least occasionally. The dress of the fishermen was more than simple; according to Jn 21<sup>7</sup> Peter was γυμνός, 'naked,' it is not quite easy to see why so many exegetes maintain that this term does not imply complete nudity. It is certainly most natural to suppose that Peter had discarded all his clothes; the fact that he afterwards hastily girds on his ἐπερδύρης, lit. his 'upper garment,' does not necessarily prove that he was wearing another under it.

The fish of the Lake of Tiberias have been minutely studied and described by two experts, Dr. Lortet, dean of the Faculty of Medicine at Lyons, and Dr. Tristram. Out of 39 (Lortet) or 43 (Tristram) species known in Palestine, from 22 to 24 are found in the Lake of Tiberias and its immediate vicinity. They belong to a number of different genera. The genus Chromis has the richest representation of species. Niloticus, Tiberiadus, Andreas, Simonis, Microstomus, Flavus, Isis, Magdalene; belonging to a genus new to him is Hemichromis Sacra. These fish are the most abundant and make the 'best eating'. The genus Barbus is also extremely prolific, three species belonging to it, e.g., Canis, which swarms, but is not so common as Longus is esteemed; and Bedfordianus, etc. In the family of the Cyprinides come Discognathus Lantia; four species of Capeta: Syriaca, Damascina, Socialis, Sauvagei; Leuciscus (or Phoxinellus) Zeregi; Alburnus Sella; Acanthobrama; three species of Nemachilus: Tig, Leontina. In the family of the Blennius: Blennius Varus and Blennius Lupulus. Finally, in the family of the Silurides we have the strange Clarias Macracanthus, already noted by Josephus (BJ III x. 8) under the name κορακίνος, which, in spite of its forbidding aspect, supplies an article of food not to be disdained. This fish has the strange peculiarity that, when it is withdrawn from its natural element, it utters cries like the mewings of a cat, and that it can live for several days out of the water.

A considerable number of the above species belong properly to Palestine, but the fauna of Palestine fish shows, nevertheless, a close connexion with that of Africa and not with that of the Mediterranean basin. The ancients, e.g. Josephus, had already noted this fact, and they raised the question of the possibility of a subterranean connexion between the waters of Egypt and those of Palestine. FLAX.—See SMOKING FLAX.

FLESH (σάρξ).—In every instance where this word is used by the Evangelists we observe that it is confined in its reference to the human race. The same remark, it may be noticed, holds good of the NT writers as a whole (cf., however, 1 Co 15<sup>39</sup>, and the plural σάρκας of Rev 19<sup>18</sup>). The particular conception attaching to it varies in different contexts to a slight extent, though in almost every case a distinction or contrast is either stated or implied which has its roots in OT thought. It is interesting to remark that this is a word employed very rarely by St. Luke in either of his writings; and even when he does use it, we find that, for the most part, he is quoting from the OT (see Lk 3<sup>9</sup> = Is 40<sup>5</sup> [LXX], where in conjunction with πᾶσα it is simply a synonym for all mankind; cf. Mt 24<sup>22</sup>, Mk 13<sup>20</sup>, Jn 17<sup>2</sup>, and Ac 2<sup>17</sup>). The reference, of course, is to the human race in its present condition of weakness and need of help, as contrasted with the power and the active love of God (cf. Dt 5<sup>26</sup>, Ps 56<sup>4</sup> [55<sup>5</sup> LXX]).

In the only other place where the word is found in St. Luke's Gospel (24<sup>39</sup>) we have it used simply to denote the substance flesh considered as a constituent of the human body. The risen Jesus is represented as inviting His disciples to assure themselves by touching Him that He had risen not merely in a spiritual but in a corporeal sense. The antithesis is that of 'spirit' and 'body' (πνεῦμα and σῶμα), the latter consisting of 'flesh' and 'bones' (σάρξ and ὀστέα). See art. BODY.

A still more emphatic expression of the distinction between man and God is found in St. Matthew's Gospel (16<sup>17</sup>), where σάρξ is joined with αἷμα to denote man in his present condition of spiritual limitation and of defective knowledge. A somewhat similar antithesis is indicated by Albert elaborately, pointed out by St. John (1<sup>4</sup>), who, in his reference to the new life communicated through Christ to believers, lays stress on the fact that this higher life is not the result of human birth, whether the latter be considered as the outcome of a long line of descent (ἐξ αἱμάτων), or as springing from natural instinct inherent in the flesh (ἐκ θελήματος σαρκός), or even as the resultant of the will power resident in the entire man (ἐκ θελήματος ἀνδρός). Their infused life has its roots in Him who is the source of all life (ἐκ τοῦ ἐγγενήθησαν), and is conditioned in every instance by their reception of the Word made flesh (οἱ δὲ ἔλαβον αὐτόν, see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.), who notices a very early variant reading which would make 'the Word' the subject of the whole verse).

Another form of this antithetic relationship occurs in the same writing. In His conversation with Nicodemus Jesus draws attention to the limitations which surround the functions of man's nature considered on its sensuous side (ἐκ τῆς σαρκός), and those of the Spirit which finds scope for activity within another sphere of human life (ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος). It is not the antithesis of evil and good that is here referred to. It is simply that within the realm of man's being there are two principles of energy which take their origin from two orders of existence. The law of nature which compels like to produce like holds good in man's complex life, and so 'What is born of the flesh is flesh, and what is born of the Spirit is spirit' (Jn 3<sup>6</sup>). With this we may compare another passage in the same Gospel where this idea is expressed in language more explicit still and as emphatic (Jn 6<sup>63</sup>). The contrast here between spirit, which not only has life in itself but can communicate that life as it wills (τὸ ζωοποιεῖν), and flesh, which 'is of no avail' above its own sphere (ἡ σὰρξ οὐκ ὠφελεῖ οὐδέν), is categorically asserted.

So, too, on another occasion when engaged in controversy with the Pharisees, Jesus contrasts their method of judging with His own patience in that respect, and in so doing implies a further contrast—their imperfect and therefore incorrect judgment (κατὰ τὴν σάρκα) which is based on a superficial knowledge, and His just judgment which comes from His 'knowledge of all the circumstances, and aspects, and issues of life' (ἡ κρίσις ἡ ἐμὴ ἀληθινή ἐστίν, Jn 8<sup>12</sup>; see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.).

Arising out of this conception we have the word employed to mark a psychological distinction between man's flesh and spirit. So real was this distinction to the mind of Jesus that we can almost hear in His words (Mt 26<sup>41</sup> = Mk 14<sup>38</sup>) the echo of personal experience (ἐγὼ γρηγορήσαι μετ' ἐμοῦ . . . τὸ μὲν πνεῦμα πρόθυμον ἦ δὲ σὰρξ ἀσθενής). In this place we may also notice that there was something present in the struggle engaged in by the disciples which was absent in the case of Jesus. They were unsuccessful in their efforts to 'watch,' because not only was their flesh 'weak,' but it had also to contend with an element of discord which further distracted their power for unremitting watchfulness. With Him was also present the flesh of weakness (see 2 Co 13<sup>a</sup> ἐξ ἀσθενείας), but the relationship between His σὰρξ and πνεῦμα was not perverted by the indwelling presence of sin, or by the downward tendency inherited as the result of sin.

On one occasion Jesus quotes with approval the translation of the LXX (Gn 2<sup>24</sup>) where the word σὰρξ occurs meaning the entire man (Mt 19<sup>5f</sup> = Mk 10<sup>8</sup>), and that without any qualifying word. It would be a colourless interpretation of Jesus' words which would limit His teaching on the marriage relationship to a physical oneness following on and produced by the sexual union. The Hebraistic ἔσονται εἰς (Heb. הָיוּ אֶחָד) implies a gradual movement from a physical union to a higher and more complex unity, so that where two separate beings formerly existed there is now but one (ὥστε οὐκέτι εἰσιν δύο, ἀλλὰ σὰρξ μία, which is Jesus' inference from the Heb. הָיוּ אֶחָד; see art. EUNUCH). It is because of the ultimately complete and spiritual character of this union that the sin which dissolves it and the human nature which seeks to render it nugatory are dark proportions (cf. Gould, 'St. Mark' in Internat. Crit. Com. on Mk 10<sup>8f</sup>).

Passing from the Synoptic to the Johannine use of this word, we find it clothing conceptions which are fuller and richer. In the simple but majestic sentence in which he announces the profound mystery of the Incarnation, St. John employs the word 'flesh' to express the totality of human nature, looked at on the side of its manifold limitations, that is to say, as it touches and is connected with the world of matter and of time (ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, Jn 1<sup>14</sup>, with which we may compare the positive references to 'the soul' and 'the spirit' of Jesus in the same writing, e.g. 12<sup>27</sup> ἡ ψυχὴ μου, 13<sup>21</sup> τὸ πνεῦμα, etc.). The phrase 'the Word became flesh' implies the existence of an antithesis which has been reduced in its elements to a final and permanent synthesis. The Johannine conception leaves no room for doubt as to the perfection of the human nature of Jesus, which is universal both as regards time and race.

Keeping in mind this usage, we shall be enabled to apprehend more fully the thought underlying the language of Jesus about Himself, imparting Himself in His perfect flesh (6<sup>51-58</sup>). His 'flesh,' by virtue of its Divine Personality, is 'living' (ὁ ζῶν) food, and therefore possesses the power of communicating its life to all who will eat thereof (ἐάν μὴ φάγητε τὴν σάρκα, κ.τ.λ.). Without this participation and consequent assimilation on the part of His followers, there can be no such thing as 'life' within them, for they deliberately reject what contains for them the germinal principle of that 'life' (οὐκ ἔχετε ζωὴν ἐν αὐτοῖς).

The question may be asked whether it is possible to trace any likeness or fundamental connexion between the Gospel and the Pauline uses of σὰρξ. In St. Paul's writings very marked emphasis is laid upon this word, and for him it clothes a conception rich with ethical significance. The 'flesh' is the present abode of sin, which requires an obedient subject to execute its behests. So closely does he connect the power of sin with the existing weakness of the flesh that he does not hesitate to say from his own experience 'I know that in . . . my flesh dwelleth no good thing.' Ro 7<sup>18</sup>. At the same time, he is careful to point out that this is not the state appointed for man by God. The 'crucifixion' of the flesh is possible for every man who wills to walk not 'according to the flesh' but 'according to the Spirit' (οὐ κατὰ σὰρκα ἐσταύρωσαν, κ.τ.λ., Gal 5<sup>24</sup>, cf. Ro 8<sup>4</sup>), and those who have the indwelling presence of the Spirit are no longer in the flesh (ἐν σαρκί) but in the Spirit (ἐν πνεύματι, Ro 8<sup>9</sup>). With these we may compare such expressions as 'the mind of the flesh' (φρόνημα τῆς σαρκός) and 'the mind of the Spirit' (φρόνημα τοῦ πνεύματος, Ro 8<sup>6</sup>; ὑπὸ τοὺς πόδας τῆς σαρκός, Col 2<sup>18</sup>), from which we can gather how present to St. Paul's mind was the connexion between sin and the flesh, and at the same time how strong within him was the glorious hope that such connexion in the ultimate result was abnormal and destined for destruction. There is no sign in the Pauline terminology that he was influenced in his theological conceptions by the spirit of that Greek dualism which wormed its way into subsequent Christian thought with its evil consequences (see M. A. R. Christian Doct. of Sin, 1. 320 ff.).

The redemption and the quickening of the body ( . . . τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν τοῦ σώματος, Ro 8<sup>23</sup>; . . . ζωοποιήσει τὰ θνητὰ σώματα, Ro 8<sup>11</sup>; cf. 6<sup>12</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>11</sup>) are features essential to the scheme of salvation as outlined and systematized by St. Paul. The condemnation of sin 'in the flesh' by God, who for this purpose sent His Son 'in the likeness of the flesh of sin' (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>), is evidence that there is, for him, no naturally essential connexion between the flesh and evil.

We are not without signs that this is just the point of view from which the question of the flesh is treated in this question (cf. Jn 1<sup>14</sup> 17, Lk 14<sup>17</sup>), that neither they nor the Apostle of the Gentiles were touched by that false belief which identified sin with matter, and, therefore, with 'the body of the flesh' (cf. Col 1<sup>22</sup> 24). The anthropology of the Gospels, as well as the psychological conceptions which emerge but rarely and incidentally from their pages, are essentially Hebrew, and are never stained by the dualism which characterizes the Hellenistic theology.

J. R. WILLIS.

FLIGHT.—The story of the flight of the Holy Family into Egypt is peculiar to the First Gospel (Mt 2<sup>13a</sup>). The omission of it, and also of the manifestation to the Gentiles (Mt 2<sup>1-12</sup>), from the Third Gospel is surprising, since there rather than in Mt. we should have expected to find any story that brought Jesus into contact with the Gentile world. The surprise would deepen into suspicion were it not that the records of the Evangelists are so fragmentary; but that fact instantly relieves the strain.

O. Holtzmann, who cites the well-known omission in Ac 9<sup>19-26</sup> of any reference to St. Paul's journey to Arabia (Gal 1<sup>17</sup>), frankly states that 'the author who left out this journey of Paul to Arabia might well pass over, in his other account, the journey of the Holy Family into Egypt' and that 'if we had in Matthew an account absolutely above criticism it would not be difficult to give over the gap in the narrative of Luke' (Life of Jesus, p 85).

The silence of St. Luke does not, then, discredit the narrative of St. Matthew. But their records might prove to be mutually exclusive, so that acceptance of the one would involve rejection of the other. How stand the facts? According to the Third Gospel, Nazareth was, prior to their marriage, the home both of Joseph and of Mary (Lk 2<sup>4</sup> 1<sup>26</sup>), whereas St. Matthew (2<sup>23</sup>) first associates them with Nazareth after their return from Egypt, and gives no hint of any previous residence there. Further, St. Matthew, having told the story of the Nativity (2<sup>1-12</sup>), goes on to record the visit of the Magi (2<sup>1-12</sup>), the hurried flight from Bethlehem and the sojourn in Egypt (2<sup>13a</sup>), whereas St. Luke records merely the circumcision of the child (2<sup>21</sup>) and His presentation to the Lord (2<sup>22a</sup>), and then adds that 'when they had performed all things . . . to the law of the Lord, they returned . . . to their own city Nazareth' (2<sup>39</sup>). From those words one would naturally infer that the return took place immediately after the events thus recorded, and that no room was left for the episodes of the First Gospel. Is that inference necessary, or even well founded? If the narrative of Acts must be so adjusted as to take in the sojourn of St. Paul in Arabia, he would be a bold critic who would maintain that the terms of the other narrative inevitably exclude the sojourn in Egypt. It is to be noted also that the timetable of the First Gospel is sufficiently elastic to embrace easily the events recorded in the Third. For we find there that, 'according to the time which he had carefully learned of the wise men,' Herod's inhuman edict included all the children in Bethlehem 'from two years old and under' (Mt 2<sup>16</sup>).

The difficulty, therefore, is not one of chronology. Even if it were, such an objection would lose both point and edge in the hands of those who used it, except on the theory that Jesus was, after all, born in Bethlehem. For, even . . . the immediate return to Nazareth . . . inference from St. Luke's account, yet the force of any argument based upon it fails the very moment that Nazareth and not Bethlehem is made the scene of the Nativity. On that showing, St. Luke's story is itself unworthy, and so cannot be used to discredit another story which is inconsistent with it.

The real difficulty is of quite a different sort: it is that we have not in St. Matthew 'an account absolutely above criticism.' It might very pertinently be asked if we have any right to expect such an account. Stories of the childhood of a great man are never written while he is still a child, but only after he has achieved greatness, and even then they are written, not necessarily because of their own intrinsic importance, but because they have caught some of the glory of the afterglow. Now, it was not until Jesus had already won His place in the hearts of men that our Gospels were written. In the circumstances of the case, therefore, these records could not be other than fragmentary, and a fragmentary account can never be 'absolutely above criticism.'

But presumably the special criticism to which these incidents of the Flight are open, is that they are no more . . . than, say, those recorded in the Apocryphal Gospels. The Gospel of the Infancy, . . . weaves around the Flight into Egypt a fantastic garland of miracle and wonder. This wreath of fairy tales is by common consent stripped off and laid aside as unhistorical embellishment. Should not the Flight itself be laid with them as equally unworthy of credence? The question opens up a subject much too large to be discussed here. But one may at least ask if it is not too drastic a measure to destroy the ship because one has had to remove the barnacles, or to remove the peg because a worthless coat has been hung on it. Are these narratives so much of a piece that, if we reject some of them, we must reject all? Surely the fact is not without significance that the Evangelist preserves the story of the Flight, but records none of the marvels that have clustered round it. For if these other stories were extant when he wrote, he must have been cognizant of them, and his rejection of them must have been deliberate. On the other hand, if they were of a later growth, his tradition is thereby marked as older and, to that extent, more trustworthy.

But, says Keim (Life of Jesus ii 91), 'it bears all the marks of a poetic picture.' Is there, then, no poetry in real life? If a story is poetic, is it thereby branded as unhistorical? 'Intertwined with the narrative is a no less than threefold revelation by an angel, almost too much for the thrift of heaven.' The objection would be valid in the case of a story written in modern times by a man of the West, but is shorn of its force when one remembers that this story was written by an Oriental some eighteen centuries ago.

Much more apposite is the contention that 'the enormous toil of such a journey with a little child, was such as only legend, aided or not by miracles, could easily get over.' The toilsomeness of the journey is not denied; no one imagines that it was 'easily got over.' May not our Lord's own words (Mt 24<sup>20</sup>, Mk 13<sup>18</sup>) be an echo of the hardships Joseph and Mary had to endure in bearing Him to a place of refuge? But the cogency of Keim's argument vanishes when we remember that this was a flight for life (see INNOCENTS). In such circumstances, hardships are little accounted. But 'they might have found a nearer refuge among the Arabs of the south or west.' Surely this criticism is singularly inept. A temporary and brief refuge might thus have been found, but no one knew how long it would be ere the wanderers could safely return to their own land. What was needed was an asylum in which they could quietly abide till all danger was past, and where Joseph could find employment which would enable him to provide for his household.

Equally beside the mark is the attempt to explain the story as in some way parallel to the sojourn of Moses in Egypt. The two stories are rich, not in resemblance, but in contrast: they have absolutely nothing in common save the word 'Egypt.' The attempt to derive the one from the other is a triumph of misdirected ingenuity.

Quite as little avails the expedient of deducing the narrative from the prophecy of Hosea (11<sup>1</sup>), as O. Holtzmann would evidently do. 'For the story about the Lord's childhood the Gospel of Matthew seems to have drawn principally upon certain indications in the Old Testament (Life of Jesus, p. 86). One can readily enough understand how a Jewish Christian might see in the . . . of the Flight a richer fulfilment of the prophet's words, but it is almost incredible that the incident should be invented as a commentary on the words, and all the more so when the words in question are not a prophecy, but a historical reference. Still less credible does the suggestion become when we find that we should require to believe not merely that the Flight was invented to explain the prophecy, but further that the Massacre of the Innocents . . . next to be invented to explain the Flight, and the visit of the Magi to explain the Massacre. Acceptance of such a theory involves a much larger draft on one's credulity than does acceptance of the incident itself as historical.'

The question may still arise, What motive led the Evangelist to record this event? Need we seek for any motive? He wanted to tell about Jesus: would it not be enough for him that this was a story of the childhood of the loved Master, and that he believed it to be authentic?

'Egypt has, in all ages, been the natural place of refuge for all who were driven from Palestine by distress, persecution, or discontent' (Farrar, Life of Christ ch. iv.). It need create no surprise, therefore, that it was towards Egypt the fugitives bent their steps. There they would be without Herod's jurisdiction and beyond the reach of his vengeance; the road was a well-known one, and some three days would suffice to bring them to the frontier. Of the incidents of the journey we have no reliable information, nor are we told in what part of Egypt the wanderers at length found rest and refuge. Tradition has assigned this distinction to Matarieh (the ancient Heliopolis), which lies a few miles north-east from Cairo; and there is no good reason why the tradition may not be correct. It is known that in that 'there was a considerable Jewish population. That fact would have undoubted weight with Joseph, as it held out to him the prospect of obtaining suitable employment. The duration of the sojourn in Egypt has been very variously stated, some reckoning it as having extended over one, two, three, or even seven years. But we may take it as certain that it was in reality very brief, seeing the death of Herod occurred very shortly after the period at which the Flight must have taken place. See also art EGYPT.

FLOCK, FOLD.—For a general treatment of these words see SHEEP, SHEPHERD. But it may be noted here that, whereas in Jn 10<sup>1-16</sup> we find in AV 'fold' three times ('he that entereth not by the door into the sheep-fold'; and 'other sheep I have which are not of this fold'; them also I must bring, and . . . there shall be one fold and one shepherd'), there is in the original a marked distinction. Two words, absolutely unconnected with each other, are employed. In v. 1, and in the first clause of v. 16, the Greek word is αὐλή = 'enclosure,' 'court,' 'fold,' in the strict sense. It is the word used of the enclosed court of the high priest's palace (Mt 26<sup>3</sup>, Mk 14<sup>54</sup>, Lk 22<sup>55</sup>, Jn 18<sup>15</sup>), of the strong man's palace (Lk 11<sup>21</sup>), and of the outer court of the Temple (Rev 11<sup>2</sup>). In using this word our Lord seems to refer to those 'walls of partition' (cf. Eph 2<sup>14</sup>) which separated the Jews from the Gentiles and made them a nation by themselves. Within this Jewish fold (αὐλή), our Lord tells us that, at the time when He spoke, He had a number of sheep who were His own; and also that, outside of it, among the Gentiles, dark and miserable as their condition was, He had other sheep, who were His already, and were known to Him, even if they knew it not themselves. These, too, He announces, He must bring, and put them along with His Jewish-born sheep, 'and,' He adds, 'there shall be one flock' (He uses here the other word ποιμνῆ), one shepherd.' He does not say there will be 'one fold' (αὐλή), or, indeed, any fold at all. He has unity in view for His sheep—union; but not such as is to be secured by the erection round His flock of such outwardly-enclosing, or constraining 'walls of partition' or racial—as had hitherto divided nation and Jew from Gentile. The union whereof He speaks is to be the union of a flock, which is kept together on the one hand by its own instinct of affection, or the mutual affection of the members, and on the other hand by its common subjection to its 'one Shepherd,' who loves it, died for it, and whom through all its members it knows. It does not, however, follow that this unity is not a visible unity. The unity of the flock, as it moves along the road under its shepherd's guidance, is just as visible to the beholder as the unity of the fold whose white walls gleam from the hillside. The difference is not in regard to the visibility of the effect, but the nature of the unifying bond. The distinction is brought out in RV.

FLOOD.—The Flood is referred to only in Mt 24<sup>38-39</sup> and its parallel Lk 17<sup>37</sup>. Jesus is speaking of the concealment of the day and hour of the coming of the Son of Man, and He uses the Flood as an illustration which would be well known to His hearers. Men and women were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered the ark; and did not know until the Flood came and took them all away. So it would be at the time of the coming of the Son of Man. Jesus was, at the time of speaking, warning men of His coming, and the warning was intended, doubtless, to be sufficient to turn them, if they would be turned, from their evil. The emphasis in the use of the illustration is upon the indifference and wickedness of the antediluvians, as paralleled by that of men in the future who would not receive and act upon the warnings now given. The Gospel use, then, of the Flood is, like the meaning of the word used (κατακλυσμός), neutral as to the important questions raised by the OT story of the Deluge. See art. 'Flood' in Hastings' DB, vol. ii. O. H. GATES.

FLOWERS.—Palestine has a flora of wonderful wealth and variety. The known species exceed three thousand, and even this large list is probably far from complete. But numbers alone convey no adequate idea of its varied nature. This little land contains within its narrow limits the most remarkable diversities of soil, surface, and climate. As is the land so is its flora, which at the one extreme, amid the heights of Lebanon, is Alpine in its character, and at the other extreme, in the gorge of the Dead Sea, tropical.

In the NT there are very few references to flowers, and these are of the most characteristic (Ja 1<sup>10-11</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>24</sup>). In the NT only mention of them is in the words of our Lord, 'Consider the lilies of the field' (Mt 6<sup>28</sup>, Lk 12<sup>27</sup>). It is noteworthy that it is to the lilies that Christ appeals; elsewhere in the NT they are the emblem of frailty and evanescence. But in spite of the comparative infrequency of Scripture allusions to them or praise of their beauty, the Jews were lovers of flowers. This is attested by the floral ornamentation on the woodwork of the oracle (1 K 6<sup>28</sup>), the pillars of the temple (7-), the vine of the molten sea (7<sup>26</sup>), and the golden candlestick (Ex 25<sup>31-33</sup>). From the Mishna we learn that at the Feast of Harvest (Ex 23<sup>16</sup>) the first crop of fruit offered at the altar was decked with flowers (Bikkurim, i 3).

Among the beautiful flowers of Palestine may be mentioned anemones, crocuses, cyclamens, gladioli, hyacinths, irises, poppies, roses, and tulips. HUGH DUNCAN.

FLUTE-PLAYERS.—Flute-playing is referred to twice in the Gospels: once in the narrative as an expression of sorrow (Mt 9<sup>23</sup> αὐλητὰς, AV 'minstrels,' RV 'flute-players'), and once in the Lord's teaching as an expression of gladness (Mt 11<sup>17</sup> with the parallel αὐλητὰς, RV 'pipers'). The latter use, which is found in several times in the OT and the Apocrypha (1 K 1<sup>40</sup>, Is 5<sup>12-30</sup>, Sir 40<sup>21</sup>, 1 Mac 3<sup>45</sup>), is attested for the later Jews by the mention in the Mishna of 'flutes for a bride' (Baba Mezria vi. 1). The other use, the employment of flutes for mourning, seems to have been widely diffused and of great antiquity, for it is clearly alluded to by Jeremiah (48<sup>36</sup>); and can be traced over a large part of the Gentile world—Phœnicians, Carians, Greeks, Romans, and probably Assyrians. In Greek society (or at least some sections of it) the custom was so general that the flute-player at funerals was described by a special term (τυμβολητής Ælian. Var. Hist. xii. 43). For the Jewish life of the 1st and 2nd cents A.D. there is ample evidence in the Mishna and elsewhere. 'Flutes for a corpse' are mentioned in Baba Mezria vi. 1, and in Kethuboth iv. 4 is the often cited rule that a man who had lost his wife must engage, no matter how poor he might be, not fewer than two flute-players and one wailing woman. A remarkable historical illustration is supplied by Josephus (BJ III. ix. 5). When the news of the capture of Jotapata by the Romans in the summer of 67 A.D. reached Jerusalem, 'most people engaged flute-players to lead their lamentations.' Another illustration comes from Roman history. At the funeral of the Emperor Claudius in 54 A.D. there were flute-players in the procession. These funeral musicians seem to have been generally, if not always, professionals, and to have been held in very low esteem. The class seems to be unknown to modern Syrian society. The wailing woman remains, but the funeral flautist has gone (Bauer, Volksleben im Lande der Bibel, 1903, p. 213).

FOLD.—See FLOCK.

FOLLOWING.—'Follow' represents several Gr. words which it is desirable to distinguish as far as possible.

That great multitudes followed Jesus during His ministry is repeatedly noted; cf. Mt 4<sup>23</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>29</sup> 21<sup>9</sup>, Mk 5<sup>34</sup>, Lk 23<sup>47</sup> (see CROWD, MULTITUDE); publicans and sinners also (ἠκολούθουν, NB, Vulg. Mk 2<sup>15</sup>, cf. Lk 15<sup>1</sup>). 'Follow me' (ἀκολουθεῖ μοι) was His call to discipleship, Mt 9<sup>9</sup> || Lk 9<sup>59</sup>, Jn 1<sup>43</sup>; δεῦρο ἀκολουθεῖ μοι (Lk 18<sup>22</sup> ||) and δεῦτε ὀπίσω μου (Mt 4<sup>19</sup> ||) also occur. The command would be at once understood in this sense, for 'it was not only the practice of the Rabbis, but regarded as one of the most sacred duties for a Master to gather around him a circle of disciples' (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 474). Hence 'following' was a mark of belonging to the band of disciples (Mk 9<sup>38</sup> ||). At ... seem to imply only 'come with me ...' (cf. Jn 1<sup>3</sup> ... they learned that it meant abandonment of previous occupations (Mt 4<sup>30</sup> 9<sup>9</sup>) and duties (Mt 8<sup>22</sup>), ... the dearest ties (Lk 14<sup>26</sup>), as well as a ... in dangers and even death (Mt 10<sup>23</sup> ... Jn 16<sup>7</sup>). Such an intensified meaning of following is seen in the case of Peter (Jn 1<sup>40</sup>), Mt 4<sup>19</sup>, Jn 21<sup>19</sup>). The call of Jesus differed from that of other teachers in that He did not simply invite, but commanded obedience as One who had the right, and as if they literally belonged to Himself; the most peremptory claims to rule over the affections and wills of men are found in Mt. and Lk. rather than in Jn., and can be explained only by His being the supreme Lord of life (Liddon). Further, the disciples followed Him not merely to learn more doctrine, but to be prepared for future work (Mt 4<sup>19</sup>; and of the Apostles Mk 3<sup>14</sup>). Mk 10<sup>32</sup> is especially noteworthy, describing vividly

The literal meaning tends to merge partly or wholly into the metaphorical sense of 'to follow' to the example of Jesus in living, and a ... be, in dying; cf. Mt 10<sup>38</sup> || 16<sup>24</sup>, Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>36</sup> 13<sup>36</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>21</sup> ('follow his steps'), Rev 14<sup>4</sup>. The two meanings seem combined in Jn 21<sup>19, 20</sup>. V. 20 implies that Jesus moved away, inviting Peter to follow along the rough shore perhaps for private conversation, and John though uninvited also followed. But there is probably a reference also to Jn 13<sup>36</sup>; and the action of Peter was symbolical of that obedient following in the rugged path of Christian duty, in the work of the Apostolic ministry (Chrys.), in the ... (Meyer), which would lead to ... Master's glory (see Godet's note). This command differed from the similar command given before the Resurrection, says Westcott, because 'it now required further the perception of His course; the spiritual discernment by which His movements can still be discovered; and yet, further, the readiness to accept ... as the end'.

Lk 9<sup>57</sup> = Mt ... important. All three aspirants for admission into the inner circle seem to have been already disciples, cf. Mt 8<sup>21</sup>, the use of 'Master' and 'Lord,' and the work contemplated (Lk 9<sup>60, 62</sup>). Probably the appointment of the Seventy was in view (Lk 10<sup>1</sup>), or less likely, of the Twelve (so Trench, comparing Mt 10<sup>1</sup>, which, however, does not apply to the choosing, but to the sending out of the Apostles). These were (1) a scribe (ἐὶς γραμματεὺς, Mt.), who came saying, 'Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest.' He meant, perhaps, 'to the end of the journey, wherever it might be, not aware of the continual ... life led by Jesus' (Wendt, Teaching, ... ii. 69); but he was wained of the utter homelessness of the Son of Man, and was shown the necessity of counting the cost (cf. Lk 14<sup>26</sup>). (2) Another was called to follow, and professed readiness to obey but alleged a hindrance, 'Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father.' The words 'go and bury' (ἀπελθόντι θάψαι), and 'leave the dead,' RV (ἀφες τοὺς νεκρούς), naturally imply, and are usually taken to mean, that his father was then lying dead (so early Fathers, Alford, Trench, Godet, Edersheim, etc.). It was a son's most sacred duty to perform the last offices, but this was one of the cases where the Call must take precedence of all else. His going might involve a delay of seven days (the period of pollution, Nu 19<sup>11</sup>), during which good impressions might be dulled; and Jesus would have left the district whither, taking Lk.'s order, He was not to return. This man, too, was being called to active work for God; cf. regulations in Lv 21<sup>1</sup>, Nu 6<sup>7</sup>. But some later commentators, as Theophylact, suppose that the father was still alive though weak and frail, and that the son wished to remain with him until his death. Thus the seeming harshness of Christ's reply would be mitigated; and it is pointed out that as the burial usually took place on the day of death, it was unlikely that the man would leave his home during the interval between these two events. Wendt (op. cit. p. 70) quotes a striking illustration in support. A young Turk was advised by a missionary in Syria to make a tour of Europe, and answered, 'I must first of all bury my father.' The missionary expressed surprise at the news of his death, as he had hitherto been in good health; but the young man explained that he only meant that one must before all things devote himself to the duties owed to relatives. Jesus did not recognize such duties as sufficient to justify delay in preaching the gospel. Clem. Alex. adopted a tradition that this man was Philip (τοῦ Κυρίου λέγοντος τῷ Φίλιππῳ, ἀφες τοὺς νεκροὺς, κ.τ.λ., Ström. iii. 4 50, 51, Migne); if true, it may be taken as an admonition occasioned by some slackness or ἀνπίστου of decadence on the part of the Apostle. A third offered to follow, but wished first to say farewell to his relatives: he showed a divided affection; apparently, therefore, his request involved special danger. A saying of farewell (ἀποτάσσεσθαι) in quite a different sense was necessary (Lk 14<sup>33</sup>). Augustine says of these three: 'oblitus se unus ut eum sequeretur et... ius non audebat et excitatus est, ... et culpatus est' Edersheim sums up the three vital conditions of following as here illustrated (a) absolute self-denial and homelessness in the world; (b) immediate and entire self-surrender to Christ and His work; (c) a heart and affections simple, undivided, and set on Christ and His work, to which there is no other trial of parting like that which would invol Him, no other or higher joy than Him (Life and Times, ii. 134).

The ordinary food in Christ's day consisted chiefly of flesh, cereals, fruits, and herbs. Of flesh, that of sheep, oxen, kids, birds (Mt 12<sup>12</sup> 25<sup>32</sup>, Lk 13<sup>15</sup>, Mt 10<sup>29</sup>), as well as fish (Mt 7<sup>10</sup>, Lk 24<sup>42</sup>, Jn 6<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>13</sup>) was in common use. Of cereals, wheat and barley were favourite food-stuffs (Mt 13<sup>12</sup>, Mk 2<sup>23-25</sup>, Lk 3<sup>17</sup>, Jn 6<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>13</sup>); of herbs there is mention of mint, anise, and cummin (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>, Lk 11<sup>42</sup>); of fruits, we hear of figs (Lk 13<sup>7</sup>, Mt 21<sup>18</sup>, 19) and grapes (Mt 7<sup>16</sup>, Mk 12<sup>3</sup>). The cereals were prepared by grinding in crude mills, and the flour was made into loaves or cakes baked in ovens. Food was seasoned with salt (Mk 9<sup>50</sup>); mustard leaves and cummin were used as condiments. See art. MEALS.

John the Baptist, like some others of his day, lived nearer to nature, as a rebuke of prevalent luxury, and chose the native food of the wilderness, 'locusts and wild-honey' (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>). Jesus came 'eating and drinking' the ordinary food of His time, rebuking the artificial abstemiousness of the Pharisees (Mt 11<sup>18</sup>, Lk 7<sup>33</sup>), as well as the too great anxiety of many as to what they should eat or drink (Mt 6<sup>25</sup>, Lk 12<sup>22-26</sup>).

places, both in AV and RV, it is translated 'foolish.'

These three Greek words, confused more or less by translators, versions,—the Harklean Syriac and others,—are not synonyms. Ἀνόητος means lack of understanding, and so is very fittingly used in Lk 24<sup>25</sup>. Ἀφρων, signifying 'mindless' or 'senseless,' frequently carries with it, in Biblical usage (cf its constant employment in the LXX of Proverbs), an implication of moral defect, impiety, or while in μωρός (cf μωραίνεσθαι, Mt 5<sup>16</sup> 'to become insipid') the predominant meaning is 'dull,' 'witless,' 'stupid.'

The meaning of μωρός in Mt 5<sup>22</sup> has been much discussed. Alford mentions three interpretations (1) that it is to be understood as the ordinary Greek word for 'fool'; (2) that it is a transliteration of the Heb. מָרֵב (mōreh), meaning 'rebel' or 'perverse' (cf. Nu 20<sup>10</sup>), a word which is put in RVm as an alternative to 'fool'; (3) that it bears the sense of ἀθεός (cf. the Heb. usage of נָבָל (nābāl, and כֶּסֶף (kesep). However, there seems to be no real reason for supposing the word to be other than the Greek μωρός used in its ordinary Biblical sense.

Our Lord wished to emphasize the enormity of murder. He said, 'Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not kill, and Whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment. But I say unto you that whosoever is angry [the inward feeling] with his brother, is in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca [a contemptuous utterance arising from the inward anger, and probably no definite word; see RACA], shall be liable to a more solemn judgment; but whosoever shall say, Thou fool [the angry feeling formulated in a definite word of contemptuous depreciation], shall be worthy of a more dreadful doom. This is, in the main, Augustine's explanation (de Serm. Dom. in Mont. i. ix.); and thus our Lord leaves it to be inferred how heinous actual murder is in His eyes.

Every use of the word 'fool' is not, of course, condemned. Our Lord Himself (see above) and St. Paul (Gal 3<sup>1</sup>) employed it in needful rebuke; but that use of it is condemned which springs from angry feelings, and which is one step on the way to violence or even to murder.

FOOLISHNESS.—In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus points out the grave sin of saying to our brother, 'Thou fool' (μωπέ, Mt 5<sup>22</sup>). When He likened His critics to children in the market-place who would play at neither a sad nor a merry game (Mt 11<sup>16-19</sup>), was He not saying in His heart, 'Ye fools'? But anger and contempt are the sources of the former; wonder and pity, mingled with indignation, shape the latter*. He who knew what was in man had occasion to marvel at the foolishness of men. That foolishness is a ruinous self-deception in spiritual things. He points out this folly in these classes:

1. The foolishness of worldly men.—God said to the rich man, 'Thou fool' (ἄφρων, Lk 12<sup>20</sup>). The parable (vv. 16-22) was inspired by a request which showed to Christ a heart so absorbed in thought of material good that it could not listen to His message. That fact gives us the point of view from which to consider the parable. The good of life cannot be in earth's riches which pass from owner to owner, and whose possession is at the mercy of death, which is only an accident to the immortal soul (v.<sup>20</sup>). Covetousness, a man's absorption in heaping up and enjoying things, is folly in so far as it hinders him from . . . he true riches, treasure of the soul . . . l (vv.<sup>15, 21</sup>)

2. The foolishness . . . who shuts his eyes (μαροὶ καὶ τυφλοί) to the spiritual side, the inward consecration which gives meaning and value to conduct or to things (Lk 11, Mt 23<sup>7</sup>).

3. The foolishness of the religious—This thought occurs more frequently. It is a mark of our Lord's teaching that it is concerned rather with the subtler forms of evil which beset the religious class. He assumes that those sins of sense and temper which all the world condemns, need no condemnation from Him. This foolishness consists generally in a lack of seriousness, a lack of whole-heartedness and simplicity in faith and conduct. There are those who hear His words and do them not (Mt 7<sup>26, 27</sup>). These are believers whose whole spirit is a contradiction, children of faith in mind, children of unfaith in conduct. This foolishness of believers is the formative thought of the parables of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>2-9</sup>) and of the Ten Virgins (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>). The meaning of the former parable is said by Jesus to be, that the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. That wisdom consists in greater singleness of vision both as regards ends and means. The steward sees his end clearly: he apportions his means to that end, uses as best he may what resources he has. The inference is left as to the wavering vision, both of end and of means, on the part of the children of light. The same thought is in the subsidiary and incidental lesson as to making friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness. Selfishness, not brotherliness, rules the unjust steward, but he sees clearly those facts of our human life, gratitude and kindness, which make brotherhood possible, and he turns them to his ends. On the other hand, brotherhood is the faith of the children of light, and yet they greatly neglect this rich field. The parable of the Ten Virgins completes this teaching of the foolishness of a half-hearted faith. It hints the irrevocable loss believers bring upon themselves thereby. Life opportunities come unexpectedly—calls to service, possibilities of honour and spiritual enrichment—and the half-hearted miss these. Their heart-culture, their spirits' discipline have been sleeping; and the chances of life pass them by.

The seat of all these follies is the heart (Mk 7<sup>22</sup>). It is not any mere action of the intellect which here comes into condemnation. All these forms of foolishness are a ruining self-deception. The mind is there the servant of the heart whose desires have confused and led it astray.

FOOT.—The references in this connexion arise chiefly from the fact that the foot in relation-ship to the head is the inferior part of the body

1. Humility and defilement.—A still lower level was reached by the shoes or sandals, which were in direct contact with the common earth. John the Baptist indicated his inferiority to Christ by saying that he was unworthy to unfasten His shoelatchet (Mk 17). To walk barefoot was the sign of a captive prisoner (Is 20), and as a voluntary act of self-infliction often forms part of a personal vow. To be trodden under foot was the symbol of utter degradation (Mt 5<sup>13</sup>, Lk 21<sup>24</sup>, He 10<sup>29</sup>). At the entrance to an Oriental house the shoes are removed, not merely for the sake of cleanliness as a preliminary to sitting down with the feet drawn under the dress, but also out of regard to the sanctity of family life, so that no defilement may touch the rugs and mats that have been hallowed by prayer and the Divine presence. He who stood on holy ground had to put off his shoes (Ex 3<sup>5</sup>, Jos 5<sup>15</sup>).

Orientalers are not accustomed to wear stockings with their open shoes, and it was an act not only of ceremonial duty, but of personal comfort, to bathe the feet after a journey over the hot and dusty ground. It was a courtesy due to a guest to see that this ministry was not omitted. Christ drew attention to the fact that in the house of one who prided himself upon his precise fulfilment of the Law this service had been more than rendered to Him by a woman whom the Pharisee despised as a sinner (Lk 7<sup>44-46</sup>). The charge to His disciples to shake the dust from their feet wherever the message of the Kingdom was not received (Mt 10<sup>14</sup>, Mk 6<sup>11</sup>, Lk 9<sup>5</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>), was a demonstration to both parties of the unfitness of . . . membership. When Christ . . . feet, the cleansing meant . . . under which His sacred hands had been placed could never turn aside to paths of evil, but that they could never be set down with harsh and proud authority over the lives and rights of others. His service could never lay upon those disciples any greater humiliation than had been rendered to them. It became a law of the Kingdom to 'wash one another's feet' (Jn 13<sup>5-14</sup>).

2. Authority and submission.—To approach the feet of the great was the conceded right of the weak in seeking the presence and help of the powerful. To kneel down and clasp the feet and even to kiss them is still the Oriental preliminary to an important request. When inferiors salute those of higher rank, the first act of gesture is to lower the hand towards the ground as if to imply that the whole body should be there. Sometimes the word is allowed to do service for the deed, as when the supplicant says, 'Allow me to kiss your feet.' The impression meant to be produced is that the party addressed has the power to do what is asked, and that the only unsettled point is the question of his willingness (Mt 18<sup>29</sup> 20<sup>30</sup>, Mk 1<sup>40</sup> 10<sup>17</sup>).

The foot on the neck as a symbol of conquest seems to have been borrowed from the primitive pastoral life. When an Oriental shepherd wishes to punish a straying and unmanageable sheep, he catches it on its side, and with all his weight presses and rubs the iron-studded sole of his shoe against its neck (1 Co 15<sup>25, 27</sup>). In killing a serpent, the Syrian peasant, even with a stick in his hand, usually, after a blow or two, jumps upon the serpent, and by a quick succession of stamps bruises it to death (Ps 91<sup>13</sup>, Ro 16<sup>30</sup>). To sit at the feet of his teacher was the attitude of the disciple (Mt 10<sup>24</sup>, Lk 10<sup>39</sup>, Ac 22<sup>8</sup>). The Pharisees thus sat in Moses' seat (Mt 23<sup>2</sup>).

FOOTSTOOL (ὑποπόδιον).—With the single exception of Ja 2<sup>3</sup> the word is used figuratively in the NT, to express the idea of 'subjection' or 'complete control.' In this sense it occurs frequently in the Gospels: e.g. Mt 22<sup>44</sup>, Mk 12<sup>36</sup>, Lk 20<sup>41</sup>, where the Synoptists record Christ's quotation from Ps 110—a psalm always regarded by the Jews as distinctly Messianic. In Mt 22<sup>44</sup> RV, on the authority of some of the most ancient MSS and versions, accepts ὑποκάτω instead of ὑποπόδιον, and translates, 'till I put thine enemies under thy feet.' Similarly in Mk 12<sup>36</sup> ὑποκάτω is read by many ancient authorities, and is adopted by WH. Here, however, RV retains ὑποπόδιον (with marg. note); but (as also in Lk 20<sup>43</sup> and Mt 5<sup>35</sup>) translates more correctly 'footstool of thy (or his) feet' instead of AV 'thy (or his) footstool.'

In its application to Christ the word shows Him in His Kingly office triumphing over His enemies, and bringing all men into captivity to His obedience; cf. 1 Co 15<sup>25</sup> 'For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet.'

FORCE.—1. Force, as defined by modern science, is inherent in matter and inseparable from it. It is defined also as the power of doing work. The modes and the effects of its activities are mechanical. It can neither exist nor act, therefore, within the moral sphere of the universe. And from this fact it follows that force and its activities are entirely foreign to the essential facts and truths of Christianity. This truth is clearly seen in the four Gospels, for in their records of Christ's life and mission, the entire import of which was moral, no word is capable of being construed into the force as just explained. The word 'force' occurs only twice in these records (Mt 11<sup>12</sup>, Jn 6<sup>15</sup> EV); and in both cases it is used as the translation of ἀπράξω, which signifies to seize or carry off (an object by force or compulsion). It is the use of force or compulsion that is denoted by St. John's statement that the people wanted to take Jesus by force to make Him a king; and it is probable that our Lord had the employment of force of the same kind in His mind when He said, as St. Matthew reports: 'From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence (βιάζεται—'is carried by force or assault'), and the violent (or assailants) take it by force' (ἀπράξουσιν). The order of ideas here expressed is exactly in terms of the principle of domination by force, which was universal in antiquity; a principle which was entirely antagonistic to His essential ideas as to the moral nature of the kingdom of heaven, and the moral conditions by means of which alone entrance to it could be gained. And as He fully realized that the principle alluded to was hostile to the nature, interests, and laws of the heavenly kingdom, and warned His disciples against it (Mk 10<sup>42-45</sup>), it may be concluded that He did not express Himself in the language of the force which the dominating powers of the ancient world employed, meaning thereby that places in the kingdom of heaven, as He understood and wished His hearers to understand the latter, were in great demand, and that men were eagerly doing their utmost to secure them. His meaning is not quite apparent. He Himself had come to the kingdom of God. He had come to found it. In His life and activities its principles came to perfect realization. To subject men in any way to the abusive treatment of the force of dominating powers or authorities, was to do 'violence' in His Person to the kingdom of heaven; and it was also 'to take' the kingdom, in the sense of making it in His Person an object of violent abuse. When He spoke the words in question His ministry in Galilee was closing in disappointing circumstances. John the Baptist had been already made a victim of violent abuse; and He knew that His 'hour,' a more terrible destiny than John's, would not be long delayed. Might it not be His cross, then, that was in His mind when He spoke the words in question? [For the more usual view that the violence which takes the kingdom by force is the friendly violence of those who seek to enter it, see A. B. Bruce, Expositor's Gr. Test. in loc., Expositor, I v. [1877] p. 197 ff.]

2. 'Force,' however, is a term which is not always used in its strictly scientific sense. In ordinary use it is synonymous with strength or power. 'Power' is a word of frequent occurrence in the Gospels, and in many instances where it is employed it possesses moral significance of very high value. The word 'power' in the EV of the Gospels is represented by two Greek terms in the original, viz. ἐξουσία and δύναμις, the former of which is sometimes translated by the word 'authority.'

'Εξουσία may be taken first. Power in the sense of this word is not always spoken of as Christ's power; but it is as His power that it has its chief interest here. The power (ἐξουσία) that Christ possessed was a power in which might was combined with right; and this is why it is sometimes called authority in the Gospels and sometimes power. He was able to do things because He had the right to do them; and no one had any right to hinder Him or to call Him in question. And the things that He had the right and the power to do were all of a nature purely moral, and things, moreover, which He alone could do, and which were of transcendent importance. What were they? (1) He, as the Son of man, had power on earth to forgive sins (Mt 9<sup>6</sup>, Mk 2<sup>10</sup>). (2) He has power to give eternal life to those whom the Father has given to Him (Jn 17<sup>2</sup>). (3) He has power, or authority, also to execute judgment, because He is the Son of man (Jn 5<sup>27</sup>). (4) He is invested with all power in heaven and in earth (Mt 28<sup>18</sup>). (5) Lastly, He had power to lay down His life on earth, and power to take it again (Jn 10<sup>18</sup>). The explanation of the various forms of power (ἐξουσία) possessed by Christ, and of the grounds on which His claim to the possession of them rests, lies in a domain of essential Christian truth.

It needs to be strong that all the forms of the power in the moral. The power to judge men as moral beings, to give eternal life to men as moral beings, to lay down one's life in perfect self-sacrificing love and service for others' good, to exercise the moral authority of heaven and earth,—to do all these things is to have the right and the power to do them, manifestly means the possession and the exercise of moral power of the highest possible order. Again, it is evident that this power is its nature and in all its forms of power belongs to the supernatural order of things. But in the sphere of things into which the order of ideas considered here introduces one, the supernatural and the natural are one. It is within the sphere of the moral order of things that Christ, in His moral position as Mediator between God and men, exercised, or exercises, the forms of His power alluded to. And within this moral sphere there is no absolute distinction between the natural and the supernatural. Here all that is in harmony with God's will and purpose is in Him, and He is in it. This is the real truth; and whether it be called natural or supernatural is only a difference in name.

Once more, all the forms of power that Christ claimed for Himself were His by delegation from God. But this does not mean that He had the right and the power to exercise them in a merely official capacity without their having any relation to and dependence on what He was as a moral Being. He was invested with them by God, as all but one of the passages referred to above indicate. But one of the passages tells us that He had power on earth to forgive sins as the Son of man; and another, that God had given Him authority to execute judgment because He was the Son of man. He was both the Son of God and the Son of man in all that He was as a moral Being when on the earth, exercising the high moral powers that He claimed to possess. And it is as the same moral Being, now glorified, that He exercises every moral power that He claimed as His own by Divine gift and prerogative. In other words, the power to do all the things that have been specified is His because of what He is as a moral Being. To forgive sins, to judge men, etc., are all acts of moral power which belong to the administration of the moral order of the world as it now is with Christ in it as the one only Mediator between God and men. And the reason why the administration of all things belonging to the moral relations between God and men is in His hands, is—that in His life and death on earth He earned the moral right to occupy this momentous position of mediation and power. For He fills this position and administers its powers as one who has proved Himself all that God can be to men, and all that every man ought to become and be to God. He is thus, because of what He is, the Divinely human and the humanly Divine, true way of forgiveness, of life, and of moral government for men. His Father's own commandment He had the power to lay down His life, in living and in dying to qualify Himself for this destiny of absolute pre-eminence in the moral universe. And as the Father commanded Him, so He did. Therefore His name is now above every name (Ph 2<sup>5-11</sup>, Jn 17<sup>20-26</sup>).

δύναμις is the other word which is translated 'power' in the EV of the Gospels. It is noteworthy that none of the Evangelists includes the word 'energy' (ἐνέργεια) in his terminology; a word which St. Paul employed to denote the power of God's redeeming power as in the raising of Christ from the dead, and in the setting of Him at God's right hand in the heavenly places, i.e. in the moral order of things (Lph 1<sup>19</sup>); (2) the Divine grace that was bestowed on St. Paul himself by the working in him of Divine power (Eph 3<sup>7</sup>); (3) the working of the same Divine power in the creation or evolution of an order of moral unity in the relations of all men to one another in Christ; (4) the working of the same power as in Christ as destined to fashion the resurrection body of believers into the glorious likeness of His own, 'according to the working whereby he is able even to subject all things unto himself' (Ph 3<sup>21</sup>). But the absence from the Gospels of the term 'energy,' which occupies a place of such extensive and high importance in St. Paul's general conception of essential Christianity, does not imply the absence from them of that order of Divine working for which the word stands in the Apostle's writings. The entire body of moral phenomena, reproduced by the Evangelists in their several records, and in which the power of God in Christ was manifested, was a revelation of the Divine energy in St. Paul's sense of the word. But, further, the meaning of the word ἐνέργεια is included in that of the word δύναμις as the latter is used in the Gospels; for in them it signifies, on the one hand, the possession of power capable of action; and, on the other, power manifesting itself in a state of activity, in which case it appears in the form of energy. Power, then, as δύναμις, holds a fundamental place in the Gospels as records of how Christ conceived it and manifested it in His activities.

(1) Christ regarded the power with which He associated Himself and His activities and their effects as moral, and as having its ultimate source in God. He conceived God as a moral Being, and to Him as such He ascribed the power alluded to (Mt 22<sup>29</sup> 26<sup>41</sup>, Mk 9<sup>14</sup>, Lk 22<sup>29</sup>).—(2) But, again, such being Christ's view, He never conceived of Himself as possessing and exercising power independently of God. His feeling of absolute dependence on God for power had a deep and controlling place in His consciousness. It was the feeling He gave unreserved and clear expression to when He said, for instance, 'The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do'; 'I can of mine own self do nothing'; and, again, 'The Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works' (Jn 5<sup>19</sup>, 30 14<sup>10</sup>).—(3) It was, therefore, through His dependence on God that our Lord obtained the power by means of which He was enabled to attain to His perfect moral self-realization, and by means of which He was enabled to finish the work His Father had given Him to do. And the question thus arises as to how He was kept in possession of a continuous supply of power for the great moral task and service of His life. The answer to this question is to be found in the Gospels. The secret of His strength lay in His inner life of perfect, never-broken union and fellowship with His Father in all things. But this life of union and fellowship with His Father needed itself to be continually maintained; and the Gospels also show how this was done by Him. He did it by paying perfect loyalty to His dependence on His Father; by striving in every situation of His life freely and perfectly to identify Himself with His Father's will and purpose for His life and His mission; by means of habits of discipline and prayer (Lk 3<sup>21</sup>, 22 4<sup>1-14</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>28-35</sup> 22<sup>34</sup>, Jn 3<sup>28-29</sup>).

(4) Christ, moreover, believed that His disciples needed the same Divine power that was His strength, in order to be able to fulfil the moral task in life to which He called them; and He believed that this power would be available for them as it had been for Himself during His life on earth. His Spirit in them would be the very power (δύναμις) that had been His own. And in their task of overcoming temptation, of moral self-realization, of achieving good in service for the kingdom of God they would find His Spirit's power all-sufficient for them. But they would need to remember that the servant was not greater than his Lord. They would need to depend on Him as He depended on God. They would need to abide in union and fellowship with Him. They must keep His words as being the Father's words. And they must also follow Him in the path of humility, self-discipline, prayer and self-denial (Mt 10<sup>38</sup> 17<sup>19-21</sup> 26<sup>41</sup>, Lk 11<sup>22</sup> 22<sup>28</sup> 24<sup>49</sup>, Jn 12<sup>24-26</sup> 13<sup>13-17</sup> 14<sup>10-18</sup> 15<sup>4</sup> 17<sup>11-29</sup>, Ac 14<sup>5</sup>).

(5) It was, finally, in the exercise of the Divine power here referred to that our Lord performed those extraordinary works of His to which the name 'miracle' has been given. In some of the Gospels they are called 'mighty works' (e.g. Mt 11<sup>20</sup>, Mk 6<sup>5</sup>, Lk 19<sup>37</sup>). These works of power (δυνάμεις) were only special forms in which was manifested the same power that was revealed in so many other ways in the moral activities of Christ's life. He wrought His miracles by the same power that enabled Him perfectly to overcome all the temptations of His life, and to accomplish all those other things in which He fulfilled His Father's will and purpose.

Again, it never occurred to Him that in the doing of His mighty works He contravened or suspended any of those uniformities of nature to which the term 'law' is applied by modern science; though with many of those uniformities He was quite familiar, and, besides, attached to them great importance. The question raised for science by His mighty works is in reality not a question of natural law; it is a question of natural force or energy. Are the forces inherent and operative in the physical or moral order of the world of such a nature as to render it impossible for the miracles ascribed to Christ's power to have happened? That is the real point at issue as between the testimony of the Gospels and Science. And the man of science who has the most extensive and the deepest knowledge of the energy or forces of the Universe, and who has therefore entered furthest into the presence of the marvels and the mysteries of these forces and their modes of manifestation, would be the last person to answer the question in the affirmative.

Once more, the mighty works ascribed to Christ in the Gospels are not the most wonderful of His achievements. It is often pointed out in defence of these mighty works, and rightly, that they were wrought to serve beneficent ends, that they were manifestations of power and love ministering in various ways to human well-being; and that as so viewed, they were originally and related to all the other beneficent Lord's ministry. It is also argued in favour of the historical truth of the miracles that His perfect personal sinlessness as a moral miracle as great as, if not greater than, any of the mighty works reported by the Gospels as performed by Him. There is just one argument. It was by the power of God immanent and operative in Him, and by His own free co-operation therewith, that He achieved His perfect moral self-realization in which He was morally as perfect as God. That was a miracle indeed; and, to say the least, there is no mightier work on record in the Gospels as wrought by Him in the exercise of the power of which He was a personal organ. See, further, MIRACLE.

But that was only the beginning of the mightiest work of all with which the power of God in Christ is associated, and which is only coming slowly to manifestation in the moral progress of humanity. Christ in the power of His Spirit is in the moral life of mankind. He is morally re-creating the life of the human race. The moral order of the world is being evolved by means of His moral power as the Mediator between God and men. By means of His moral power in man's life and history, He is conducting humanity onwards in the path that will bring it to a perfect moral destiny in the kingdom of God. This is the greatest, mightiest of all His miracles; and whosoever understands the momentousness of the moral task it implies will not stumble at any of the mighty works on record in the Gospels.

FORERUNNER.—See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

FORESIGHT.—The interest of the student of the Gospels, and of the life of Jesus which forms their substance, in the topic of this article, is twofold. Jesus is represented in the Gospels as at once the object and the subject of the most detailed foresight. The work which He came to do was a work ordained in the counsel of eternity, and in all its items prepared for beforehand by the most perfect prevision. In addressing Himself to the accomplishment of this work Jesus proceeded from the beginning in the fullest knowledge of the end, and with the most absolute adjustment of every step to its attainment. It is from this double view-point that each of the Evangelists depicts the course of our Lord's life on earth. They consentiently represent Him as having come to perform a specific task, all the elements of which were not only determined beforehand in the plan of God, but adumbrated, if somewhat sporadically, yet with sufficient fullness for the end in view, in the prophecies of the OT. And they represent Him as coming to perform this task with a clear consciousness of its nature and a competent control of all the means for its discharge, so that His whole life was a conscientious fulfilment of a programme, and moved straight to its mark. The conception

thus dominates the whole Evangelical

It is not necessary to dwell upon the Evangelists' conception of our Lord's life and work as the of a plan Divinely predetermined for Him. It lies on the face of their narratives that the authors of the Gospels had no reservation with respect to the all-embracing predestination of God (cf. Hastings' DB iv. 54-56), and least of all could they exclude from it this life and work which was to them the history which all history turns. To them our Lord is by way of eminence the one who governed by 'the δὲ of the Divine counsel.' Every step of His pathway was a 'necessity' to Him, in the fulfilment of the mission for which He had 'come forth' (Mk 1<sup>38</sup>, cf. Swete), or as St. Luke (4<sup>43</sup>) in quite Johannine wise (5<sup>23 24 30 36 38 62 38 39 40 et passim</sup>) expresses it, 'was sent' (cf. Mt 10<sup>40</sup>, Mk 9<sup>37</sup>, Lk 9<sup>48 10 16</sup>, Mt 15<sup>24 21 27</sup>, Mk 12<sup>6</sup>, Lk 20<sup>13</sup>, cf. Swete on Mk 9<sup>37</sup>). Especially was all that concerned His departure, the accomplishment of which (Lk 9<sup>41</sup>, cf. v. 51) was His particular task, under the government of this 'Divine necessity' (Mt 16<sup>21 26 27</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22 17 25 22 27 24 7</sup>, Jn 3<sup>14 20 9</sup>, cf. Ac 2<sup>23 31 8 4 28</sup>, and Westcott on Jn 20<sup>9</sup>). His final journey to Jerusalem (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>), His rejection by the rulers (Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22 17 25</sup>), His betrayal (Lk 22<sup>47</sup>), arrest (Mt 26<sup>41</sup>), sufferings (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22 17 25</sup>), and death (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22</sup>) by crucifixion (Lk 24<sup>7</sup>, Jn 3<sup>14</sup>), His rising again (Jn 20<sup>9</sup>) on the third day (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22 24 7 41</sup>)—each item alike is declared to have been 'a matter of necessity in pursuance of the Divine purpose' (Meyer, Mt 24<sup>7</sup>), 'a necessary part of the destiny assigned our Lord' (Meyer, Mt 26<sup>65</sup>). 'The death of our Lord' thus appears 'not as the accidental work of hostile caprice, but (cf. Ac 2<sup>23 31 8</sup>) the necessary result of the Divine predestination' (Lk 22<sup>22</sup>), to which Divine δὲ (Lk 21<sup>1</sup>, cf. 11<sup>1</sup>) personal free action of man had to serve as an instrument' (Meyer, Ac 4<sup>28</sup>).

How far the several events which entered into this life had been announced is obviously, in this matter of detail. All of them lay open before the eyes of God; and the only limit to pre-announcement was the extent to which God had chosen to reveal what was to come to pass, through His servants the prophets. In some instances, however, the prophetic announcement is particularly adduced as the ground on which the necessity of occurrence rests. The fulfilment of Scripture thus becomes regulative for the life of Jesus. Whatever stood written of Him in the Law or the Prophets or the Psalms (Lk 24<sup>44</sup>) must needs (δὲ) be accomplished (Mt 26<sup>54</sup>, Lk 22<sup>37 24 26</sup>, Jn 20<sup>9</sup>). Or, in another form of statement, particularly frequent in Mt. (12<sup>21 23 24 8 17 12 17 13 25 21 4 26 36</sup>) and Jn. (12<sup>38 13 18 15 25 17 12 19 24 36</sup>), but found also in the other Evangelists (Mk 14<sup>48</sup>, Lk 4<sup>21</sup>), the several occurrences of His life fell out as they did, 'in order that what was spoken by the Lord' through the prophets or in Scripture, 'might be fulfilled' (cf. Mt 21<sup>7 26 54 27 9</sup>, Lk 24<sup>44</sup>; in Jn 18<sup>9 32</sup>, Lk 24<sup>44</sup> declarations of Jesus are treated precisely similarly). That is to say, 'what was done stood . . . in the connexion of the Divine necessity, as an actual fact, by which prophecy was destined to be fulfilled. The Divine decree expressed in the latter must be accomplished, and to that end this . . . came to pass, and that, according to the whole of its contents' (Meyer Mt 12<sup>21</sup>). The meaning is, not that there lies in the OT Scriptures a complete predictive account of all the details of the life of Jesus, which those skilled in the interpretation of Scripture might read off from its pages at will. This pro-its detailed completeness lies only in its purpose; and in Scripture only so far forth as God has chosen to place it there for the guidance or the assurance of His people. The meaning is rather that all that stands written of Jesus in the OT Scriptures has its certain fulfilment in Him; and that enough stands written of Him there to assure His followers that in the course of His life, and in its, to them, strange and unexpected ending, He was not the prey of chance or the victim of the hatred of men, to the marrying of His work or perhaps even the defeat of His mission, but was following step by step, straight to its goal, the predestined way of His Father, as He in the counsels of the Father, from of old in the Scriptures to enable all who were not 'foolish and slow of heart to believe in all that the prophets have spoken,' to perceive that the Christ must needs have lived just this life and fulfilled just this destiny.

That the whole course of the life of Jesus, and especially its culmination in the death which He died, was foreseen and afore-prepared by God, enters, thus, into the very substance of the Evangelical narrative. It enters equally into its very substance that this life was from the beginning lived out by Jesus. ew of its drift and its issue. | ' e as far from not of His own choosing, to end, as they are from Him as thwarted in His purposes, or His achievement, or determined or modified in His aims or methods, by the conditions which from time to time emerged in His way. The very essence of their representation is that Jesus came into the world with definite mission to execute, of the nature of which He was perfectly aware, and according to which He ordered the whole course of His life as it advanced under His competent control unswervingly to its preconceived mark. In their view His life was lived out, not in ignorance of its issues, or in the form of a series of trials and corrections, least of all in a more or less unavailing effort to wring success out of failure; but in complete knowledge of the counsels of God for Him, in perfect acquiescence in them, and in careful and voluntary fulfilment of them. The 'Divine dei' which governed His life is represented as fully recognized by Himself (Mt 16<sup>1</sup>, Mk 8<sup>3</sup>, Lk 4<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 17<sup>25</sup> 24<sup>7</sup>, Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>34</sup>), and the fulfilment of the intimations of prophecy in His life as recognized by Him as a rule for His voluntary fulfilment (Mt 26<sup>54</sup>, Lk 22<sup>37</sup> 24<sup>46</sup> 44, Jn 20<sup>9</sup>, Mk 14<sup>48</sup>, Lk 4<sup>21</sup>, Jn 13<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>25</sup> 17<sup>12</sup>; cf. Mt 13<sup>14</sup> 15<sup>7</sup> 24<sup>15</sup> 26<sup>56</sup>, Mk 7<sup>9</sup>). Determining all things, determined by none, the life He actually lived, leading up to the death He actually died, is in their view precisely the life which from the beginning He intended to live, ending in precisely the death in which, from the beginning, He intended this life to issue, undeflected by so much as a hair's-breadth from the straight path. He had from the start marked out for Himself in the fullest prevision and provision of all the so-called chances and changes which might befall Him. Not only were there no surprises in life for Jesus (cf. THE MOVEMENT, p. 48), and no compulsions; there were not even 'influences,' as we speak of 'influences' in a merely human career. The mark of this life, as the Evangelists depict it, is its calm and quiet superiority to all circumstances and condition, and to all the varied forces which sway other lives; its prime characteristics are voluntariness and independence. Neither His mother, nor His brethren, nor His disciples, nor the people He came to serve, nor His enemies bent upon His destruction, nor Satan himself with his temptations, could move Him one step from His chosen path. When men seemed to prevail over Him they were but working His will; the great 'No one has taken my life away from me; I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again' (Jn 10<sup>18</sup>), is but the enunciation for the supreme act, of the principle that governs all His movements. His own chosen pathway ever lay fully displayed before His feet; on it His feet fell quietly, but they found the way hard. What He did, He came to do, and to do it He came. He came with a purpose and a mission. So the Evangelists represent Him. (Cf the first half of a striking article on 'Die Selbst- und Eigenheit Jesu,' by Trott, in Luthardt's ZK II 1, 1883, iv. 233-241; in its latter half the art. falls away from its idea, and ends by making Jesus absolutely dependent on Scripture for His knowledge of God and Divine things 'We have no right whatever to maintain that Jesus received revelations from the Father otherwise than through the medium of the sacred Scriptures; that is a part of His complete humanity' (p. 238)).

The significance of this supernatural life which the Evangelists depict Jesus as living, lies thus in the perfection of the foresight by which it was governed. Or the reality of this foresight they leave their readers in no doubt, nor yet of its completeness. They suggest it by the general picture they draw of the self-directed life which Jesus lived in view of His mission. They record repeated instances in which He mentions beforehand events yet to occur, or foreshadows the end from the beginning. They connect these manifestations of foresight with the possession by Him of knowledge in general, in comprehension and penetration alike far beyond what is native to our humanity perhaps be natural to surmise in the first instance that they intend to convey merely the conviction that in Jesus was manifested a product of a unique greatness, in whom, as the fulfilment of prophecy (cf. Ac 3<sup>22, 23</sup>), revealed Himself the gifts proper to prophets. There can be no question that to the writers of the Gospels Jesus was 'the incarnate ideal of the prophet, who, as such, forms a class by Himself, and is more than a prophet'—is what Schwartzkopff thinks Him, Die Propheten des Jesus Christ, p. 7). They record with evident sympathy the impression made by Him at the outset of His ministry, that God had at last in Him visited His people (Mk 6<sup>15</sup>, Lk 7<sup>16</sup>, Jn 4<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>7</sup>); they trace the ripening of this impression into a well-settled belief in His prophetic character (Mt 21<sup>11</sup>, Lk 24<sup>19</sup>, Mt 21<sup>46</sup>, Lk 7<sup>36</sup>, Jn 7<sup>40</sup>); and they remark upon the widespread suspicion which accompanied this belief, that He was something more than a prophet—possibly one of the old prophets returned, certainly a very special prophet charged with a very special mission for the introduction of the Messianic times (Mt 16<sup>14</sup>, Mk 6<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>28</sup>, Lk 9<sup>8, 19</sup>, Jn 6<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>40</sup>). They represent Jesus as not only calling out and accepting this estimate of Him, but frankly assuming a prophet's place and title (Mt 13<sup>57</sup>, Mk 6<sup>15</sup>, Lk 4<sup>24</sup>, Jn 4<sup>44</sup>, Lk 13<sup>33</sup>), exercising a prophet's functions, and delivering prophetic discourses in which He unveils the future (Mt 24<sup>1</sup>, Mk 13<sup>23</sup>, Jn 14<sup>29</sup>; cf. Mt 28<sup>6</sup>, Lk 24<sup>44</sup>, and such passages as Mt 26<sup>32</sup>, 34, Mk 16<sup>7</sup>). Nevertheless it is very clear that in their allusions to the supernatural knowledge of Jesus, the Evangelists suppose themselves to be illustrating something very much greater than merely prophetic inspiration. The specific difference between Jesus and a prophet, in their view, was that while a prophet's human knowledge is increased by many things revealed to him by God (Am 3<sup>7</sup>), Jesus participated in all the fulness of the Divine knowledge (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, Jn 16<sup>15</sup> 18<sup>4</sup> 16<sup>30</sup> 21<sup>17</sup>), so that all that is knowable lay open before Him (Jn 17<sup>10</sup>). The Evangelists, in a word, obviously intend to attribute Divine omniscience to Jesus, and in their adduction of instances of His supernatural knowledge, whether with respect to hidden things or to those yet buried in the future, are manifestly in possession of this Divine omniscience. The Eschatology of Jesus, p. 119, where, in partial correction of the more inadequate statement of p. 48, there is recognized in the Evangelists at least a 'tendency' to attribute to our Lord 'Divine dignity' and 'literal omniscience'.

That this is the case with St. John's Gospel is very commonly recognized (for a plain statement of the evidence see Karl Müller, Gottliches Wissen und göttliche Macht des Johann Christus, 1882, § 4, pp. 29-47: 'Zeugnisse des vierten Evangeliums für Jesu göttliches Wissen'). It is not too much to say, therefore, that one of the chief objects which the author of that Gospel set before himself was to make clear to its readers the superhuman knowledge of Jesus, with especial reference, of course, to His own career. It therefore records direct ascriptions of omniscience to Jesus, and represents His omniscience as received by Him (Jn 16<sup>30</sup> 21<sup>17</sup>; cf. Liddon, Bampton Lectures, ed. 4, 1869, p. 466). It makes it almost the business of its opening chapters to exhibit this omniscience at work in the especially Divine form (Lk 16<sup>15</sup>, Ac 1<sup>24</sup>, He 4<sup>12</sup>, Ps 138 (139)<sup>2</sup>, Jer 17<sup>10</sup> 20<sup>12</sup>; cf. Swete on Mk 2<sup>8</sup>) of immediate, universal, and complete knowledge of the thoughts and intents of the human heart (cf. Westcott on Jn 2<sup>25</sup>), laying down the thesis in 2<sup>24</sup> 25 (cf. 6<sup>64</sup> 70 21<sup>17</sup>), and in detail in the cases of all with whom Jesus came into contact in the opening days of His ministry (cf. Westcott on Jn 1<sup>4</sup>, Peter (1<sup>42</sup>), Philip (1<sup>43</sup>), Nathanael (1<sup>47</sup>), Mary (2<sup>4</sup>), Nicodemus (3<sup>1</sup>), the woman of Samaria (4<sup>1</sup>)). In the especially striking case of the choice of Judas Iscariot as one of the Apostles, it expressly explains that this was due to no ignorance of Judas' character or of his future action (6<sup>64</sup> 70 13<sup>11</sup>), but was done as part of our Lord's voluntary execution of His own well-laid plan. It represents Jesus with great explicitness as possessing His whole work in full knowledge of all that was coming upon Him (Jn 18<sup>4</sup>, cf. Westcott), and with a view to subjecting them all to His governing hand, so that His life from the beginning should run steadily onward on the lines of a pre-arranged plan (Jn 1<sup>47</sup> 2<sup>19</sup> 24 3<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>64</sup> 70 7<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>12</sup> 11<sup>21</sup> 21<sup>28</sup> 14<sup>29</sup> 16<sup>5</sup> 22 18<sup>4</sup> 9).

It is difficult to see, however, why St. John's Gospel should be separated from its companions in this matter (Schenkel says frankly that it is only because there is no such passage in St. John's Gospel as Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, on which see below). Whatever else must be said of W. Wrede's Das Messiasgeheimnis, etc., 1901, it must be admitted that it has broken down this artificial distinction between the Gospel of John and the Synoptics. If they do not, like St. John (16<sup>30</sup> 21<sup>17</sup>), record direct ascriptions of precise omniscience to Jesus by His followers, they do, like St. John, represent Him as Himself claiming to be the depository and distributor of the Father's knowledge (Mt 11<sup>27-30</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22-24</sup>). Nor do they lag behind St. John in attributing to Jesus the Divine prerogative of reading the heart (Mt 9<sup>4</sup>, Meyer, Mk 2<sup>2</sup> 8<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>15</sup> 44, Swete, p. lxxxviii; Lk 5<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>33</sup>) or the manifestation, in other forms, of God-like omniscience (Mt 17<sup>27</sup> 21<sup>2</sup>, Mk 11<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>13</sup>, Lk 5<sup>4</sup> 19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>10</sup>; cf. O. Holtzmann, Was Jesus Ekstatiker? p. 14 and p. 15, note). Least of all do they fall behind St. John in insisting upon the perfection of the foresight of Jesus in all matters connected with His own life and death (Mt 9<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>40</sup> 16<sup>21</sup> 20<sup>18</sup> 22<sup>28</sup> 26<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>34</sup> 50, Mk 2<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>31</sup> 9<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>33</sup> 39. 45 11<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>8</sup> 13 18 30, Lk 8<sup>34</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 44 51 12<sup>50</sup> 13<sup>35</sup> 17<sup>25</sup> 18<sup>31</sup> 19<sup>30</sup> 22<sup>10</sup> 21. 34. 37 24<sup>44</sup>). Nothing could exceed the detailed precision of these announcements,—a characteristic which has been turned, of course, to their discredit as . . . instances of Jesus by writers who find . . . detailed prediction 'The form and contents of these texts,' remarks Wrede (Messiasgeheimnis, etc. p. 88), 'speak a language which cannot be misunderstood. They are nothing but a short summary of the Passion history—"cast, of course, in the future tense." "The Passion-history," he proceeds, quoting Eichhorn, "could certainly not be more exactly related in few words." In very fact, it is perfectly clear—whether they did it by placing upon His lips predictions He never uttered and never could have uttered, is another question—that the Evangelists designed to represent Jesus as endowed with the absolute and unlimited foresight consonant with His Divine nature (see Liddon, Bampton Lectures, ed. 4, p. 464 ft.; and cf. A. J. Mason, The Conditions of our Lord's Life on Earth, pp. 155-194).

The force of this representation cannot be broken, of course, by raising the question afresh whether the supernatural knowledge attributed by the Evangelists to our Lord may not, in many of its items at least, if not in its whole extent, find its analogues, after all, in human powers, or be explained as not different in kind from that of the prophets (cf. e.g. Westcott, 'Additional Note on Jn 2<sup>24</sup>', A. J. Mason, Conditions, etc. pp. 162-163). The question more immediately before us does not concern our own view of the nature and origin of this knowledge, but that of the Evangelists. If we will keep these two questions separate we shall scarcely be able to doubt that the Evangelists mean to present this knowledge as one of the marks of our Lord's Divinity. In interpreting them we are not entitled to parcel out the mass of the illustrations of His supernatural knowledge which they record to differing sources, as may fall in with our own conceptions of the inherent possibilities of each case; finding indications in some instances merely of His fine human instinct, in others of His prophetic inspiration, while reserving others—if such others are left to us in our analysis—as products of His Divine intuition. The Evangelists suggest no such lines of cleavage in the mass; and they must be interpreted from their own standpoint. This finds its centre in their expressed conviction that in Jesus Christ dwelt the fulness of the knowledge of God (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, Jn 8<sup>18</sup> 16<sup>15</sup> 17<sup>10</sup>). To them His knowledge of God and of Divine things, of Himself in His Person and mission, of the course of His life and the events which would befall Him in the prosecution of the work whereunto He had been sent, of the men around Him,—His followers and friends, the people and their rulers,—down to the most hidden depths of their natures and the most intimate processes of their . . . all the things forming the . . . the drama He was enacting was cast, however widely that environment be conceived, or however minutely it be contemplated,—was but the manifestation, in the ever-widening circles of our human modes of conception, of the perfect apprehension and understanding that dwelt changelessly in His Divine intelligence. He who knew God perfectly—it were idle that He should know man and the world perfectly too; all that affected His own work and career, of course, and with it, equally of course, all that lay outside of this (cf. Mason, Conditions, etc. p. 168); in a word, unlimitedly, all things. Even if nothing but the Law of Parsimony stood in the way, it might well be understood that the Evangelists would be deterred from seeking, in the case of such a Being, other sources of information besides His Divine intelligence to account for all His '... d varie' ... At all even ... their ... at all He knew—the scope of which was unbounded and its depth unfathomed, though their record suggests rather than fully illustrates it—found its explanation in the dignity of His person as God manifest in the flesh.

Nor can the effect of their representation of Jesus as the subject of this all-reaching Divine ... be destroyed by the discovery in their ... of another line of representation in which our Lord is set forth as living His life out under the conditions which belong naturally to the humanity He had assumed. These representations are certainly to ... as little as those others in which His ... niscience is suggested. They bring to our observation another side of the complex personality that is depicted, which, if it cannot be said to be as emphatically insisted upon by the Evangelists, is nevertheless, perhaps, equally ... illustrated. This is the true humanity ... Lord, within the scope of which He willed to live out His life upon earth, that He might accomplish the mission for which He had been sent. The suggestion that He might break over the bounds of His mission, in order that He ... from the ruggedness of His chosen path ... exercise whether of His almighty pov. ... (Lk 4<sup>8t</sup>) or of His unerring foresight (Mt 16<sup>22</sup>), He treated first and last as a temptation of the Evil One—for 'how then should the ... be fulfilled that thus it must be' (Mt ...). It is very easy, to be sure, to exaggerate the indications in the Evangelists of the confinement of our Lord's ... within the limits of human powers. It is an exaggeration, for example to speak as if the Evangelists represent Him as frequently surprised by the events which befell Him: they never predicate surprise of Him, and it is only by a very precarious inference from the events recorded that they can ever be supposed even to suggest or allow place for such an emotion in our Lord (cf. art. AMAZEMENT, p. 48). It is an exaggeration again to adduce our Lord's questions as attempts to elicit information for His own guidance: His questions are often plainly dialectical or rhetorical, or, like some of His actions, solely for the benefit of those 'that stood around.' It is once more an exaggeration to adduce the employment in many cases of the term γινώσκω, when the Evangelists speak of our Lord's knowledge as if it were thereby implied that this knowledge was freshly born in His mind—the assumed distinction, but faintly marked in Greek literature, cannot be traced in the usage of the terms γινώσκει and εἰδέναι in their application to our Lord's knowledge, these terms even replace one another in parallel accounts of the same instance: Mt 22<sup>29</sup> Mk 12<sup>32</sup> Mt 9<sup>17</sup> Mk 2<sup>8</sup> Lk 5<sup>22</sup>; cf. Mt 12<sup>17</sup> Lk 11<sup>17</sup> Jn 6<sup>71</sup>; γινώσκει is used of the undoubted Divine knowledge of our Lord (Mt 11<sup>27</sup> Lk 10<sup>22</sup> Jn 10<sup>15</sup> 17<sup>25</sup> Mt 7<sup>23</sup>; cf. Jn 2<sup>24</sup> 2<sup>25</sup> 5<sup>42</sup> 10<sup>14</sup> 27); and indeed of the knowledge of God Himself (Lk 10<sup>22</sup> 16<sup>15</sup> Jn 10<sup>15</sup> [Mt 11<sup>27</sup>]); and, in any event, there is a distinction which in such nice inquiries should not be neglected, between saying that the occurrence of an event, being perceived, was the occasion of an action, and saying that knowledge of the event, perceived as occurring, waited on its occurrence. Gravely vitiated by such exaggerations as most discussions of the subject are, enough remains, however, after all exaggeration ... to assure us, not indeed that our Lord's ... birth was, in the view of the Evangelists, an exclusively human one; or that, apart from the constant exercise of His will to make it such, it was controlled by the limitations of ... but certainly that it was, in their view, ... so far as was consistent with the fulfilment of the mission for which He came—and as an indispensable condition of the fulfilment of that mission—under the limitations belonging to a purely human life. The classical passages in this reference are those striking statements in the second chapter of Luke (2<sup>40</sup> 52) in which is summed up our Lord's growth from infancy to manhood, including, of course, His intellectual development (cf. art. CHILDREN, p. 302), and His own remarkable declaration recorded in Mt 24<sup>36</sup>, Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, in which He affirms His ... and hour of His return to ... by their general dramatization of His life within the range of the purely human, these passages are enough to assure us that in the view of the Evangelists there was in our Lord a purely human soul, which bore its own proper part in His life, and which, as human souls do, grew in knowledge as it grew in wisdom and grace, and remained to the end, as human souls must, ignorant of many things,—nay, which, because human souls are finite, must ever be ... such embraced in the universal vision ... Spirit. We may wonder why the 'day and hour' of His own return should remain among the things of which our Lord's human soul continued ignorant throughout His earthly life. But this is a matter about which surely we need not much concern ourselves. We can never do more than vaguely guess at the law which governs the inclusions and exclusions which characterize the knowledge-contents of any human mind, limited as human minds are not only qualitatively but ...; and least of all could we hope to penetrate the principle of selection in the case of the perfect human intelligence of our Lord; nor have the Evangelists hinted their view of the matter. We must just be content to recognize that we are face to face here with the mystery of the Two Natures, which, although they do not, of course, formally enunciate the doctrine in so many words, the Evangelists yet effectively teach, since by it alone can consistency be induced between the two classes of facts which they present unhesitatingly in their narratives. Only, if we would do justice to their presentation, we must take clear note of two of its characteristics. They do not simply, in separated portions of their narratives, adduce the facts which manifest our Lord's Divine powers and His human characteristics, but interlace them ... in the same sections of the narratives ... they do not ... the Divine that is in Christ to the limitations of the human, but quite decisively present the Divine as dominating all, and as giving play to the human only by a constant, voluntary withholding of its full manifestation in the interests of the task undertaken. Observe the story, for example, in Jn 11, which Dr. Mason (Conditions, etc. p. 143) justly speaks of as 'indeed a marvellous weaving together of that which is natural and that which is above nature.' 'Jesus learns from others that Lazarus is sick, but knows without any further message that Lazarus is dead; He weeps and groans at the sight of the sorrow which surrounds Him, yet calmly gives thanks for the accomplishment of the miracle before it has been accomplished.' This ... of the two elements is typical of the ... narrative. As portrayed in it our Lord's life is distinctly duplex; and can be consistently construed only by the help of the conception of the Two Natures. And just as distinctly is this life portrayed in these narratives as receiving its determination not from the human, but from the Divine side. If what

John undertakes to depict is what was said and done by the incarnated Word, no less what the Synoptics essay is to present the Gospel (as Mark puts it) of Jesus Christ the Son of God. It is distinctly a supernatural life that He is represented by them all as living, and the human aspect of it is treated by each alike as an incident in a more exalted, by which it is permitted, on which it imposes itself. Though passed as far as was befitting within the limits of humanity this life remains at all times the life of God manifest in the flesh, and, as depicted by the Evangelists, never escapes beyond the boundaries set by what was suitable to it as such.

The actual instances of our Lord's foresight which are recorded by the Evangelists are not very numerous outside of those which concern the establishment of the Kingdom of God, with which alone, of course, their motives are particularly engaged. Even the few instances of specific exhibitions of foreknowledge of what we may call trivial events owe their record to some connexion with this great work. Examples are afforded by the foresight that the casting of the nets at the exact time and place by our Lord would secure a draught of fishes (Lk 5<sup>4</sup>, cf. Jn 21<sup>6</sup>); that the first fish that Peter would take when he threw his hook into the sea would be one which had swallowed a stater (Mt 17<sup>27</sup>); that on entering a given village the disciples should find an ass tied, and a colt with it, whose owners would be obedient to our Lord's request (Mt 21<sup>2</sup> ||); and that on entering Jerusalem to make ready for the final passover-feast they should meet a man bearing a pitcher, prepared to serve the Master's needs (Mk 14<sup>29</sup>). In instances like these the interlacing of prevision and provision is very intimate, and doubt arises whether they illustrate most distinctly our Lord's Divine foresight or His control of events. In other instances the element of foresight comes, perhaps, more purely forward: such are possibly the predictions of the offence of the disciples (Mt 26<sup>31</sup> ||), the denial of Peter (26<sup>34</sup> ||), and the treachery of Judas (26<sup>21</sup> ||). There may be added the whole series of utterances in which our Lord shows a comprehensive foresight of the career of those whom He called to His service (Mt 4<sup>19</sup> 10<sup>17</sup> 21<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>9f</sup>, Jn 16<sup>12</sup>); and also that other series in which He exhibits a like full foreknowledge of the entire history of the Kingdom of God in the world (cf. esp. the passages in the Kingdom and such passages as Mt 16<sup>18</sup> 24<sup>25</sup> 21<sup>43</sup> 24<sup>24</sup> 26<sup>13</sup>, Lk 19<sup>11</sup>, Jn 14<sup>18</sup>, 19). It is, however, particularly in reference to His own work in establishing the Kingdom, and in regard to the nature of His work, that the stress is most fully laid upon the completeness of His prevision. His entire career, as we have seen, is represented by all the Evangelists as lying plainly before Him from the beginning with every detail clearly marked and provided for. It is especially, however, with reference to the three great events in which His work in establishing His Kingdom is summed up—His death, His resurrection, His return—that the predictions become numerous, if we may not even say constant. Each of the Evangelists represents Him, for example, as foreseeing His death from the start (Jn 2<sup>19</sup> 3<sup>14</sup>, Mt 12<sup>40</sup> 9<sup>15</sup>, Mk 2<sup>19</sup>, Lk 12<sup>49</sup> 5<sup>34</sup>; cf. Meyer on Mt 9<sup>16</sup>; Weiss on Mk 8<sup>31</sup>; Denney, Death of Christ, p. 18; Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, p. 19, etc.), and as so ordering His life as to march steadfastly forward to it as its chosen climax (cf. e.g. Wrede, p. 84: 'It is accordingly the meaning of Mark that Jesus journeys to Jerusalem because it is His will to die there'). He is represented, therefore as avoiding all that could lead up to it for a time, and then, when He was ready for it, as setting Himself steadfastly to bring it about as He would; as speaking of it only guardedly at first, and afterwards, when the time was ripe for it, as setting about earnestly to prepare His disciples. In respect to His resurrection, He is reported as having it in mind, indeed, from the earliest days of His ministry (Jn 2<sup>19</sup>, Mt 12<sup>40</sup> 16<sup>21</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22</sup>), but adverting to it with pedagogical care, so as to prepare rather than confuse the minds of His disciples. The same in substance may be said with reference to His return (Mt 10<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>27</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup> 27).

A survey in chronological order of the passages in which He is reported as speaking of these three great events of the future, cannot fail to leave a distinct impression on the mind not only of the large space they occupy in the Evangelical narrative, but of the great place they take as foreseen, according to that narrative, in the life and work of our Lord. In the following list the passages in which He adverts to His death stand in the order given them in Robinson's Harmony of the Gospels:

Mt 10<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>27</sup> (Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup> 27), Lk 10<sup>40</sup> 17<sup>22</sup>, Mt 19<sup>28</sup> 23<sup>39</sup> 24<sup>1</sup> (Mk 13<sup>4</sup>, Lk 21<sup>6</sup>), 24<sup>34-37</sup> (Mk 13<sup>30</sup>, Lk 21<sup>32</sup>), Mt 24<sup>44</sup> 25<sup>41</sup> 26<sup>64</sup> (Mk 14<sup>62</sup>, Lk 22<sup>69</sup>).

The most cursory examination of these series of allusions, and especially in their relation to the place element takes in the life of the Lord as depicted in the Gospels. In particular, it will be impossible to escape the conviction that it is distinctly the teaching of the Evangelists that Jesus came into the world specifically to die and ordered His whole life willingly to that end. As Dr. Denney puts it expounding Jn 10<sup>17</sup>, on which see also Westcott's note, 'Christ's death is not an incident of His life, it is the aim of it. The laying down of His life is not an accident in His career, it is His vocation; it is that in which the Divine purpose of His life is revealed.' 'If there was a period in His life during which He had other thought, it is antecedent to that at which we have any knowledge of Him' (Death of Christ, pp. 259 and 18). Nothing could therefore be more at odds with the consentient and constant representations of the Evangelists than to speak of the 'shadow of the cross' as only somewhat late in His history beginning to fall athwart our Lord's pathway; of the idea that His earthly career should close in gloom as 'distinctly emerging in the teaching of Jesus only at a comparatively late period, and as therefore presumably not earlier clear in His mind'; unless indeed it be the accompanying more general judgment that 'there was nothing extraordinary or supernatural in Jesus' foreknowledge of His death,' and that 'His prophecy was but the expression of a mind which knew that it could not cease to be obedient while His enemies would not cease to be hostile' (A. M. Fairbairn, The Expositor, 1897, i.; v. iv. [1896] 283, 285). It is not less unwarranted to speak of Him as bowing to His fate only 'as the will of God, to which He yielded Himself up to the very end only with difficulty, and at last against His will' (Wernle, Synopt. Frag. 200).

Such expressions as these, however, advise us that a very different conception from that presented by the Evangelists has found widespread acceptance among a class of modern scholars, whose efforts have been devoted to giving to our Lord's life on earth a character more normally human than it seems to possess as it lies in the hands of the Evangelists. The negative principle of the new constructions is based on the course and springs of our Lord's career being rejection of the account given by the Evangelists, these scholars are thrown back for guidance very much upon their own subjective estimate of probabilities. The Gospels are, however, the sole sources of information for the events of our Lord's life, and it is impossible to decline them and altogether. Few, accordingly, have been able to discard entirely the general framework of the life of Christ as they present it to those who are inclined to represent Jesus as making no claim even to be the Messiah, see H. Holtzmann, NT Theol. 1. 280, note, Meinhold as there referred to; and Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis, especially 11. Most have derived enough from this to assume that a crisis of some sort occurred at Caesarea Philippi, where the Evangelists represent our Lord as being formally and frankly to prepare His disciples for His death (Mt 16<sup>21</sup> ||).

Great differences arise at once, however, over what this crisis was. Some suppose that it was only at this point in His life that Jesus began to think Himself the Messiah. Strauss suspected Himself to be the Messiah. He suspected that He now first began to proclaim Himself Messiah and Lobstein imagine that on this day He both put the Messianic on His head and faced death looming in His path. Weizsäcker and Keim allow that He thought and proclaimed Himself the Messiah from the beginning and suppose that what is new here is that only now did He come to see with clearness that His ministry would end in His death, and as death for the Messiah means return, they add that He now perceived that He must return. To the scholars who hold the latter view it is impossible that the Founder of a spiritual kingdom should look forward to its consummation in a physical one, and insisting, therefore, that though Jesus may well have predicted the destruction of His enemies, He can scarcely have foretold His own destruction. On the other hand, Strauss and Baur judge that the prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem too must be taken into account. As to the return, coming back on the clouds of heaven. As to His death, Strauss thinks He began to anticipate it only shortly before He left Caesarea to Jerusalem, while Holsten cannot believe that He had not known what was before Him until He actually arrived at Jerusalem, and even then did not acquiesce in it (so Spitta). That He went to Jerusalem for the purpose of dying, neither Weizsäcker, nor Brandt, nor H. Holtzmann, nor Schulzzen will admit, though the two last named allow that He foresaw that the journey would end in His death, or at least that it possibly would, adds Punjer, since the only way of success lay open to Him (cf. H. Holtzmann NT Theol. 1. 285-286, note). As many men, so many opinions. As the positive principle of construction in all these schemes of life for Jesus is desupernaturalization, they differ, so do the negative principles. Each as reported by the Evangelists is in the measure in which they explain it as due more or less entirely to the Evangelists carrying their own ideas, or the ideas of the community in which they lived, back into Jesus' mouth; or allow it more or less fully to Jesus, indeed, but only in a form which can be thought of as not rising above the natural prognostications of a man in His position. A few deny to Jesus the entire series of predictions reported in the Gospels and place them in mass to the thought of the community (cf. Eichhorn, Wrede). A few, on the other hand, explain them all or nearly the whole, series to Jesus, and explain them all naturalistically. Most take an intermediate position, determined by the principle that all which seems to each critic incapable of naturalistic explanation as utterances of Jesus shall be assigned to later origin. Accordingly, the concrete details in the alleged predictions are quite generally denied to Jesus, and represented as easily explicable modifications, in accordance with the actual course of events, of what Jesus really said. The prediction of resurrection on the third day, for example, is held by many (e.g. Schwartzkopff) to be too precise a determination, and is therefore excluded from the prophecy, or explained as only a periphrasis for an indefinite short time, after the analogy of Hos 6<sup>2</sup> (so even B. Weiss). To others a prediction of a resurrection at all seems incredible (Strauss, Schenkel, Weizsäcker, Keim, Brandt), and it is transmuted into, at most, a premonition of future victory. By yet others (as Holsten) even the anticipation of death is doubted, and nothing of forecast is left to Jesus except, possibly, a vague anticipation of difficulty and suffering; while with others even this gives way, and Jesus is represented as passing either the greater part of His life (Tahbain) or the whole of it, in joyful expectation of more or less unbroken success, or at least, however thickly the clouds gathered over His head, in nextinguishable hope in God and His interposition in His behalf (cf. the brief general sketch of opinions in Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, p. 85).

Thus, over-against the 'dogmatic' view of the life of Christ, set forth in the Evangelists, according to which Jesus came into the world to die, and which is dominated, therefore, by foresight, is set, in polar opposition to it, a new view, calling itself 'historical', the principle of which is the denial to Jesus of any foresight whatever beyond the most limited human forecast. No pretence is ordinarily made that this new view is given support by the Evangelical records, it is put forward on a priori or general grounds—as, for example, the only psychologically possible view (e.g. Schwartzkopff, Prophecies of Christ, p. 28; cf. Denney, Death of Christ, p. 11, and especially the just structures of Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, pp. 2, 3). It professes to find it incredible that Jesus entered upon His ministry with any other expectation than success. Contact with men, however, it allows, brought gradually the discovery of the hopelessness of drawing them to His spiritual ideals; the growing enmity of the rulers opened before Him the prospect of disaster; and thus there came to Him the slow recognition, first of the possibility, and then of the certainty, of failure; or, at least, since failure was impossible for the mission He had come to perform, of the necessity of suffering through suffering to the ultimate. The slow adjustment to this new point of view made, that even at the end—as the prayer at Gethsemane shows—there remained a lingering hope that the extremity of death might be avoided. So far as a general sketch can be made of a view of the life of Jesus which is in such great variety of opinion, it is the essential fabric of the new view (cf. the general statements of Kahler, Zur Lehre von der Versöhnung, 159; Denney, Death of Christ, 11; Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, 86). Only such parts of the predictive element of the teaching attributed to Jesus in the Gospels as are thought capable of naturalistic interpretation are incorporated into this new construction. By those who wish to bring in as much as possible, it is said, for example, that our Lord was too firmly persuaded of His Messianic appointment to be deceived, and was too clear that this appointment involved the establishment of the Kingdom to accept death itself as failure. When He perceived death impending, that meant to Him, therefore, return; and return to bring in the Messianic glory meant resurrection. When He thought and spoke of death, therefore, He necessarily thought and spoke also of resurrection and return; the three went inevitably together; and if He anticipated the one, He must have anticipated the other also. Under this general scheme all sorts of opinions are held as to when, how, and under what impulses Jesus formed and taught this eschatological programme. As notable a construction as any holds that He first became certain of His Messiahship in an ecstatic vision which accompanied His baptism; that the Messiah must suffer was already borne in upon His conviction in the course of His temptation; but it was not until the scene at Caesarea Philippi that He attained the happy assurance that the Messianic glory lay behind the dreadful death impending over Him. This great conviction, attained in principle in the ecstasy of that moment, was, nevertheless, gradually assimilated. When Jesus was taken with His disciples, He was labouring also with Himself. In this particular construction (it is O. Holtzmann's) an element of 'ecstasy' is introduced; more commonly the advances Jesus is supposed to make in His anticipations are thought to rest on processes of formal reasoning. In either case, He is pictured as only slowly, under the stress of . . . circumstances, reaching convictions of . . . Him in the future; and thus He is conceived distinctly as the victim rather than as the Lord of His destiny. So far from entering the world to die, and by His death to save the world, and in His own good time and way accomplishing this great mission, He enters life set upon living, and only yields step by step reluctantly to the hard fate which inexorably closes upon Him. That He clings through all to His conviction of His Messiahship, and adjusts His hope of accomplishing His Messianic mission to the . . . pressure of circumstances,—is that . . . trait of human nature? Do not all enthusiasts be like? Is it not precisely the mark of their fanaticism? The plain fact is, if we may express it in the brutal frankness of common speech, in this view of Jesus' career He miscalculated and failed; and then naturally sought (or His followers sought for Him) to save the failure (or the appearance of failure) by inventing a new dénouement for the career He had hoped for in vain, a new dénouement which—has it failed too? Most of our modern theorists are impelled to recognize that it too has failed. When Jesus so painfully adjusted Himself to the hard destiny which more and more obtruded itself upon His recognition, He taught that death was but an incident in His career, and after death would come the victory. Can we believe that He foresaw that thousands of years would intervene between what He represented as but an apparent catastrophe and the glorious reversal to which He directed His own and His followers' eyes? On the contrary, He expected and . . . that He would come back soon—certainly . . . the generation which had witnessed His apparent career had passed away; and that He would then establish that Messianic Kingdom which from the beginning of His ministry He had unvaryingly taught was at hand. He did not do so. Is there any reason to believe that He ever will return? Can the 'foresight' which has repeatedly failed so miserably be trusted still,—for what we choose to separate out from the mass of His expectations as the core of the matter? On . . . shall we adjust the discredited . . . course of events, obviously unforeseen by Him, since His death? Where is the end of these 'adjustments'? Have we not already with 'adjustment' after 'adjustment' transformed beyond recognition the expectations of Jesus, even the latest and fullest to which He attained, and transmuted them into something fundamentally different,—passed, in a word, so far beyond Him, that we retain only an artificial connexion with Him and His real teaching, a connexion mediated by little more than a word?

That in this modern construction we have the precise contradictory of the conception of Jesus and of the course of His life on earth given us by the Evangelists, it needs no argument to establish. In the Gospel presentation foresight is made the principle of our Lord's career. In the modern view He is credited with no foresight whatever. At best, He was possessed by a fixed conviction of His Messianic mission, whether gained in ecstatic vision (as, e.g., O. Holtzmann) or acquired in deep religious experiences (as, e.g., Schwartzkopff), and He felt an assurance, based on this ineradicable conviction, that in His own good time and way God would work that mission out for Him; and in this assurance He went faithfully onward fulfilling His daily task, bungling meanwhile egregiously in His reading of the scroll of destiny which was unrolling for Him. It is an intensely, even an exaggeratedly human Christ which is here offered us: and He stands, therefore, in the strongest contrast with the frankly Divine Christ which the Gospels present to us. On what grounds can we be expected to substitute this for that? Certainly not on grounds of historical record. We have no historical record of the self-consciousness of Jesus except that embodied in the Gospel dramatization of His life and the Gospel report of His teaching; and that record expressly contradicts at every step this modern reconstruction of its contents and development. The very principle of the modern construction is reversal of the Gospel delineation. Its peculiarity is that, though it calls itself the 'historical' view, it has behind it no single scrap of historical testimony; the entirety of historical evidence contradicts it flatly. Are we to accept it, then, on the general grounds of inherent probability and rational construction? It is historically impossible that the great religious movement which we call Christianity could have taken its origin and derived its inspiration—an inspiration far from spent after two thousand years—from such a figure as this Jesus. The plain fact is that in these modern reconstructions we have . . . but a sustained attempt to construct a . . . Jesus: and their chief interest is that they bring before us with unwonted clearness the kind of being the man must have been who at that time and in those circumstances could have come forward making the claims which Jesus made without supernatural nature, endowment, or aid to sustain Him. The value of the speculation is that it makes superabundantly clear that no such being could have occupied the place which the historical Jesus occupied; could have made the impression on His followers which the historical Jesus made; could have become the source of the stream of religious influence which we call Christianity, as the historical Jesus became. The clear formulation of the naturalistic hypothesis, in the construction of a naturalistic Jesus, in other words, throws us violently back upon the Divine Jesus of the Evangelists as the only Jesus that is historically possible. From this point of view, the labours of the scholars who have with infinite pains built up this construction of Jesus' life and development have not been in vain.

What, then, is to be said of the predictions of Jesus, and especially of the three great series of prophecies of His death, resurrection, and . . . with respect to their contents and . . . This is not the place to discuss the eschatology of Jesus. But a few general remarks seem not uncalled for. The topic has received of late much renewed attention with very varied results, the number and variety of constructions proposed having . . . increased above what the inherent . . . amount for, by the freedom with which . . . data have been modified or set aside on so-called critical grounds by the several investigators. Nevertheless, most of the new interpretations also may be classified under the old categories of futuristic, preteristic, and spiritualistic.

The spiritualistic . . . method of dealing with our Lord's prophecies readily falls in with a widespread theory that . . . manner of genuine prophecy . . . (Muirhead Interpretation of the Prophecies of Jesus Christ 2<sup>d</sup> ed. 1891) received a new impulse . . . by Erich Haupt (Eschatologie und Missionen Jesu 1895). Christ's eschatology, says Haupt, is purely symbolic and . . . that He predicts is to be accomplished in a heavenly way which passes our comprehension; there is no soothsaying in His utterances—nowhere any predictions of external occurrences, everywhere only great moral religious laws which must operate everywhere and always, while nothing is said of the form in which they must act' (p. 157). A considerable stir has been created also by the . . . by Weissenbach (Der Wiederkunft Jesu 1895). Die Frage der Wiederkunft Jesu, 1895. . . of the return of Christ with His resurrection, although this view has retained few adherents since its refutation by Schwartzkopff (The Prophecies of Jesus Christ, 1895), whose own view is its exact contradictory, viz that by His resurrection Jesus meant just His return. The

however, that 'for Jesus the hope of resurrection was not a mere hope of return left together, so that "when Jesus spoke of His resurrection He was thinking of His return, and vice versa"' (O. Holtzmann, War Jesus Eskataker? 67, note), is very widely held. The subsidiary hypothesis (first suggested by Colani) of the inclusion in the eschatological discourse attributed by the Evangelists to Jesus of the little Apocalypse of Jewish or Jewish Christian origin, by which Weiffenbach eased his task, has in more or less modified form received the widest acceptance (cf. H. Holtzmann, NT Theol. 1, 327, note), but rests on no solid grounds (cf. Weiss, Bayschlag, Haupt, Clemen). Most adherents of the modern school are clear that Jesus expected and asserted that He would return in Messianic glory for the consummation of the Kingdom, and most of them are equally clear that in this expectation and assertion, Jesus was mistaken (cf. H. Holtzmann, NT Theol. 1, 312 f.) 'In the expectation that the kingdom was soon to come,' says Oscar Holtzmann in a passage typical enough of this whole school of exposition (War Jesus Eskataker? p. 133), 'Jesus erred in a human way', and in such passages as Mk 9<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>30</sup>, Mt 10<sup>23</sup> he considers that the error is obvious. He adds, 'That such an error on the part of issue but a fundamental point of H is self-evident, but this error of Jesus is for His Church a highly instructive and therefore highly valuable warning to distinguish between the temporary and the permanent in the work of Jesus.' Not every one even of this school can go, however, quite this length. Even S. A. Cook, Jesus and His Kingdom, p. 103, thinks that Jesus erred in this matter, 'but he was not to think of the mere definition of times and seasons as belonging to the form rather than to the essence of His teaching (The Prophecies of Jesus Christ, 1895, Eng. tr. 1897, p. 319; Konnt. Jesus irren? 1896, p. 3), and in that Baldensperger is in substantial to have been able to do so, even if they concern nothing but the form; while Weiffenbach (Die Frage, etc. p. 9) thinks we should hesitate to suppose Jesus could have erred in too close a definition of the time of His advent, 'for it is not to be supposed that Jesus, at the time of His death, was ignorant of the time of His return. Probably not by appealing to the fulfilment of the prophecy, but by appealing to the conditionality of all prophecy. And Jesus said and did, predict His return as coincident with the destruction of Jerusalem, and this prophecy is conditioned upon the conduct of the agents involved—between prediction and fulfilment the conduct of man intrudes as a conditioning factor on which the fulfilment depends.' Thus, if prediction has not failed, but its fulfilment has only been postponed—in accordance, it must be confessed, not with the will of God, but with that of man. It is difficult to see how Jesus is thus shielded from the imputation of defective foresight; but at least Barth is able on this view still to look for a return of the Lord.

The difficulty which the passages in our Saviour's teaching under discussion present to the reverent expositor is, of course, not to be denied or minimized. But surely there is no need to be much more hopeless than we are, and we could compel ourselves to the assumption of error 'in One who has never been convicted of error in anything else' (Sanday in Hastings' DB ii. 635—the whole passage should be read). The problem that faces us in this matter, it is apparent, is not a fact, is not one which can find its solution as a corollary to a speculative general view of our Lord's self-consciousness, its contents, and development. It is distinctly a problem of exegesis. We should be very sure that we know fully and precisely all that our Lord has declared about His return—its what and how and when—before we venture to suggest, even to our most intimate thought, that He has committed so gross an error as to its what and how and when as is so often assumed; especially as He has in the most solemn manner declared concerning precisely the words under consideration that heaven and earth shall pass away, but not His words. It would be sad if the passage of time has shown this declaration also to be mistaken. Meanwhile, the perfect foresight of our Lord, asserted and illustrated by all the Evangelists, certainly cannot be set aside by the facile assumption of an error on His part in a matter in which it is so difficult to demonstrate an error, and in which assumptions of all sorts are so little justified. For the detailed discussion of our Lord's eschatology, including the determination of His meaning in these utterances, reference must, however, be made to works treating expressly of this subject.

BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD.

FORGIVENESS.—

Three words are used in the Gospels which are rendered in English by the word 'forgive'—ἀφίημι, to set free, once only, in Lk 6:37; χαρίζομαι, to be gracious, or judge frankly, in Lk 7:42; ἀφαιρέω, to take away, or let off, 3 times in the Synoptic Gospels. The noun ἀφεσις, 'remission' or 'forgiveness', is found 8 times in the Synoptics, the words 'of sins' or 'of trespasses' being either added or closely implied.

In the treatment of the subject in this article three things must be borne in mind. First, that the words employed by Christ and the ideas they represent are not entirely new as they come from His lips. Our Lord presupposes and then puts His own characteristic impress upon a doctrine of forgiveness with which His hearers were for the most part familiar, and which for us is embodied in the OT. Secondly, that no complete study of Christ's teaching concerning forgiveness can be made, unless other words, such as 'save,' 'justify,' and 'cleanse,' are taken into account, and the whole subject of release from the guilt and bondage of sin, as promised by Him, is kept in view. And, thirdly, that to stop short with the recorded words of Christ Himself on the matter is—speakingly—unwise, not to know His whole mind upon it. It was profitable for Him in the course of His earthly ministry to set forth the full significance of His work for men, before it was accomplished. Hence for a complete account of the significance of His death we turn to the teaching of the Apostles, enlightened as they were by the Holy Spirit whom He had promised. In due course were revealed those 'many things' concerning His cross and passion which His disciples could not 'bear' during His lifetime. Down even to the very close of His short ministry on earth the rudimentary spiritual intelligence of the Apostles was unequal to carrying the full burden of the gospel as they afterwards understood it. The way in which that gospel was to be emphatically one of forgiveness, that 'through this man is proclaimed remission of sins, and by him every one that believeth is justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses,' was only made clear afterwards. It being therefore carefully borne in mind that the OT prepared the way for Christ's teaching on forgiveness, and that the Epistles developed and completed it, this article will deal only with that stage in the biblical doctrine of the subject which is represented by Christ and the Gospels. The consideration of it will be divided into four sections: (1) the Divine forgiveness of man, (2) Christ's own power to forgive sins, (3) the duty of men to forgive one another, (4) the extent to which authority to forgive is vested in the Christian community.

1. God the Father as forgiving the sins of men.—

The first reference chronologically to this subject in the Gospels is found in the Benedictus, or Psalm of Zacharias (Lk 17). The prophecy concerning John the Baptist announces that he is to give 'knowledge of salvation unto his people, in the remission of their sins, according to the tender mercy of our God,' etc. The whole tenor of the canticle goes to show that God's ancient promises were about to be fulfilled in the coming of a Saviour through whom the great boon of remission of sins was to be secured in a fuller sense than had hitherto obtained. When the time came, John the Baptist is declared to have preached the baptism of repentance 'unto remission of sins' (Mk 1<sup>6</sup>, Lk 3<sup>3</sup>). In the same connexion may be taken the interpretation of the name Jesus in Mt 1<sup>21</sup> 'he shall save his people from their sins,' and the Saviour, Christ the Lord,' of Lk 24, though the word 'forgiveness' does not occur. It was indeed implicit throughout our Lord's ministry, all His declarations concerning His coming 'not to call the righteous, but sinners' (Mt 9<sup>13</sup>), 'to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19<sup>10</sup>), and His promise of 'rest to the souls' of men (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>), showing that the object of His ministry was to reclaim from sin, by bringing men to that forgiveness and cleansing which God had promised through repentance and faith in Him.

The explicit references to forgiveness of sin are comparatively few, but they are clear and definite in character, and quite sufficient to establish doctrine on the subject. They are: (a) the petition in the Lord's Prayer, 'Forgive us our debts,' Mt 6<sup>12</sup> ('our sins,' Lk 11<sup>3</sup>), combined with Mt 6<sup>14-15</sup>, Mk 11<sup>25</sup>, which assert God's willingness to forgive under certain conditions. With these join Lk 6<sup>37</sup>, a parallel passage with a different turn of expression, 'Release and ye shall be released,' the reference clearly being to sin. (b) The parables of Lk 15, especially that of the Prodigal Son, and of the Pharisee and the Publican in Lk 18<sup>10-14</sup>. (c) Our Saviour's prayer on the cross, 'Father, forgive them,' etc., Lk 23<sup>34</sup>. (d) Statements concerning God's willingness to forgive all sins, including those 'of which the Son of man' but excluding the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost. Mt 12<sup>31</sup>; Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>; add also Mk 4<sup>12</sup>, in which Isaiah's prophecy is represented as being fulfilled, 'lest they should repent and be forgiven (healed).'

Putting these passages together, we are warranted in concluding that Christ taught the readiness of the Father always to hear the prayer of the truly penitent and in His mercy to pardon their sins, the chief questions being, What is the exact nature of forgiveness? Is it free to all mankind, or to those only who are in covenant relation with Him? Is any condition besides that of repentance laid down?

The meaning of the word 'forgiveness,' and the relation between God and man implied in it must be gathered largely from the OT. Doubtless under the old covenant a progressive revelation is to be recognized, an advance in spirituality of teaching being discernible in its later stages. Doubtless also it is necessary to bear in mind the distinction between the ceremonial standpoint of the Law with its elaborate ritual and appointed sacrifices on the one hand, and the more purely spiritual view of the prophet and psalmist on the other. But, broadly speaking, Christ, like the more 'Evangelical' OT prophets, represents forgiveness as a pure act of grace on the part of God, who on the repentance of the sinner receives him graciously and pardons his transgression in the sense of replacing the offender in his former relation of acceptance and favour. Forgiveness is not mere remission of penalty, the forbearing to inflict deserved punishment though such release is for the most part included. Punishment may still be exacted, but it has lost its penal character and becomes Divine chastisement inflicted for the improvement of the offender, or for the sake of others. Neither does forgiveness imply any false or arbitrary dealing with the past, any condoning of sin—which is essentially immoral—or ignoring of the transgression, as if it had not been committed—which would imply a weak and false attempt to secure the impossible. Nor, again, can any kind of remission of sins be predicated of God which implies unrighteousness in any form, the solemn sanctions of the eternal law of righteousness being secured by the conditions upon which forgiveness is granted.

But the essence of forgiveness lies in the establishment, or restoration, of a personal relation between sinful man and a grieved and righteously angry God. Omnipotence itself cannot erase the event from the history of the past, and holiness will not permit any concealment or pretence as to the heinousness of the offence committed. But the sin may be 'covered,' the guilt cancelled, in the sense that on certain conditions it shall be as if it had never been, so far as the relation between God and the sinner is concerned. Hence sin when forgiven is said to be 'cast into the depth of the sea' (Mic 7<sup>19</sup>), 'cast behind thy back' (Is 38<sup>17</sup>), removed 'as far as the east is from the west' (Ps 103<sup>12</sup>), 'remembered no more' (Jer 31<sup>34</sup>) against the sinner.

Ritschl says: 'God, in forgiving or pardoning sins, exercises His will in the direction of not permitting the contradiction—expressed in guilt—in which sinners stand to Him to hinder that fellowship of men with Him which He intends on higher grounds.' It does not, he adds, 'free them altogether from the consciousness of guilt, but from that mistrust which, as an affection of the consciousness of guilt, naturally separates the injured man from his fellow-men.' And again, it is 'a reconciliation of such a nature that the memory, indeed, preserves the pain felt at the sin which has been committed, yet at the same time the place of mistrust towards God is taken by the positive assent of the will to God and His saving purpose.'

Forgiveness can never be adequately understood by means of any figure of speech, commercial or other. It represents a relation of persons, and its essence lies in the restoration of impaired confidence, affection, and favourable regard. It has to do not only with the past, but the present and the future, and it is exercised by God towards men just in proportion as they are capable of receiving it.

Repentance is the one condition clearly laid down and repeatedly insisted on in the Gospels. It is necessary as between man and man, much more between man and God. When John the Baptist comes to prepare the way of the Saviour, nothing can be done without that thoroughgoing repentance which implies reformation so that a man can effect it. Repentance is indeed a necessary ingredient of forgiveness if the two terms are rightly understood. Sorrow for sin and complete renunciation of it are not arbitrary conditions which the Sovereign chooses to exact before bestowing a boon; they belong to the very essence of the personal relation between Father and son which has been impaired or broken by error and disobedience, and which is to be restored in forgiveness. For an impenitent sinner not to be punished is conceivable, but for such a one to be forgiven is a contradiction in terms. The necessity for a forgiving spirit in one who hopes himself to be forgiven is dealt with below.

God is then 'good and ready to forgive' (Ps 86<sup>5</sup>), a God 'keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin' (Ex 34<sup>7</sup>). It would, however, be misleading to generalize and say that this attribute of mercy obviates all necessity for an atonement, or vindication of the law of righteousness, and that throughout the whole history of the world nothing more is needed to obtain Divine forgiveness of sin than confession and repentance on the part of man. The promises of the OT were given to those who stood in a covenant relation with God, in which His righteousness was effectually safeguarded. Christ's ministry was exercised amongst Jews in the first instance, and the presuppositions of OT Scripture must be taken into account.

The same may be said of the two gracious parables of our Lord which chiefly deal with this subject. It is impossible to found accurate doctrine on a parable only, and it is always a mistake to suppose that one parable can cover the whole range of doctrine. The three recorded in Lk 15 were uttered to show the nature of Christ's mission and His desire to seek and save the worst sinners, as well as the willingness of God to receive such, and the joy of heaven and earth when the penitent returns and is pardoned. The moral basis on which this becomes possible in the Divine government is another matter. The cosmic conditions of forgiveness are described in their proper perspective in Scripture. But in the parable of the Prodigal Son the lesson is impressed that the utmost failure in filial duty will be readily forgiven, if the wanderer will but repent and return. In the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican the essential teaching is the same—the danger lest those who comply with rules of ordinary morality should so plume themselves on their obedience as to lose the sense of their own deep need and ill-desert, and the fact that grave offenders against the fundamental laws of righteousness, like the publican and the harlot, may find their way into the kingdom of grace before the self-righteous Pharisee. But it would be utterly misleading, even to the subversion of the very foundations of ethics, if the inference were drawn that it matters nothing how deeply a man sins, provided that when his evil course is over he regrets his errors and asks for pardon, and that there is no reason in the moral government of the Universe why such a man should not be at once forgiven without infractions of the eternal law of righteousness.

This general conclusion is borne out by Christ's strong language in the Gospels, especially that sin which cannot be forgiven—the sin against the Holy Ghost (Mt 12<sup>31</sup>, Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>). In spite of the controversy which has taken place as to the nature of this sin against the Holy Ghost and the misunderstandings concerning it which have caused unspeakable spiritual anguish to thousands, there seems little question that the only sin thus pronounced unpardonable is that of wilful and persistent sinning against light till light itself is turned into darkness,—the perverting of truth at its very source, where the Holy Spirit Himself instructs the conscience, and thus poisoning the wells of the soul. Therefore, not in virtue of an arbitrary fiat of the Almighty, but by the necessity of the case, such sin cannot be forgiven. 'A lamp's death when, replete with oil, it chokes; a stomach's when, replete with food, it starves.' With this explanation the Saviour's prayer in Lk 23<sup>34</sup> 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.' The sin of Christ's murderers, heinous indeed beyond expression, was a sin against the Son of man, and—at least in the case of most of those implicated and so far as the full gravity of the offence was concerned—it was not such a deliberate and complete perversion of conscience as to amount to a sin against the Holy Spirit. The reason why the unforgiving cannot be forgiven is to be similarly understood. Hence the general doctrine is laid down in the Gospels in unmistakable terms, that God the Father is ready to receive and pardon all sinners except those who shut themselves out from its possibility by wilfully cherishing a spirit known to be evil, and deliberately hardening their own hearts against the grace which was ready to receive and renew them. See UNPARDONABLE SIN.

2. It is clear that Christ's teaching concerning forgiveness was not exhausted by the proclamation of the Father's willingness to receive the penitent. He Himself claimed the power to forgive, which was recognized by all to be a Divine prerogative. In Mt 9 Mk 2, and Lk 5 is recorded the narrative of the healing of the paralytic, which had evidently impressed itself strongly upon tradition, since it is given by all three Synoptists at greater length than usual and almost in the same words. It was one of the grounds of offence which ultimately caused the death of Jesus, that, whilst lowly in demeanour, He put forth claims for Himself so lofty that to a reverent Jew He appeared often to blaspheme. Jesus does not deny the fundamental assumption that none can forgive sins but God only. To a true believer in one God this is an axiom; there is but one Governor and there can be but one Fount of pardon. Jesus did not thereupon disclaim the possession of a Divine prerogative. He put His own claims to an easily applied test. Whether is it easier to tell a sufferer that his sins are forgiven, or to heal him of an incurable malady? In other words, any prophet may speak words of comfort or absolution, but one who shows the power of healing in order to establish his claim to pronounce forgiveness is no ordinary messenger, but proves Himself to be the Son of God with power. The whole incident evidently made a deep impression, for we are told that the people wondered, praised God, and acknowledged that unprecedented and superhuman power had been entrusted to a son of man.

The close connexion between the work that Christ did for the bodies of men and the power that He claimed over their souls in the forgiveness of sin, is suggested in other narratives, though somewhat less clearly. The inference has been drawn from Jn 5<sup>14</sup> and the early tradition recorded in 8<sup>11</sup>, that Jesus habitually pronounced remission of sin and gave power to amend the life in future, but the brief records in these cases hardly warrant such a conclusion.

The narrative of the woman who was a sinner, recorded in Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>, is full of instruction on the subject of forgiveness. The mission of Christ to save the outcast and the abandoned is here delicately and beautifully shown. The only doubtful point of interpretation relates to the ground of forgiveness as described in v. 47. Many commentators, including the chief Roman Catholic authorities, make the forgiveness extended to the woman to depend upon the love she showed, and at first reading this might seem warranted by the phrase 'for she loved much.' But on examination this is seen to be impossible. For (1) the whole scope of the parable of the two debtors shows that forgiveness precedes love; (2) the latter part of v. 47 enforces the same lesson; and so (3) does the absolution pronounced in v. 48. The only ambiguity lies in the pregnant use of ἀγαπᾷ in v. 47, and the meaning of the clause may be expressed by the paraphrase, 'This is the reason why I tell you that her many sins are forgiven—for (see) she has shown much love; but he who is forgiven little, loves little.' Her repentance and acceptance had taken place before, her grateful love was manifested in return by the outpouring of the ointment; and in v. 48 Christ authoritatively confirms the assurance of her free and full pardon as One who had an absolute right to do so.

The doctrine of the forgiveness of sins on the basis of atonement through the death of Christ is not, properly speaking, revealed by Christ Himself. The Fourth Gospel contains passages like 1<sup>29</sup> and a reference in 19<sup>36</sup> to the Paschal lamb (?), but neither of these comes from the lips of the Master. The nearest approach to such teaching is found in the institution of the Lord's Supper and the reference to His blood as shed for the remission of sins in Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, also perhaps in the directions given to the Apostles in Lk 24<sup>47</sup>. By the time of St. Paul's earliest Epistles the doctrine of the atoning death of Christ as the ground of the forgiveness of sins was fairly developed, and the question is: How far had progress been made in this direction before the death of Christ took place? The answer appears to be that—as with the doctrines of the Incarnation and a Future Life in the OT—foreshadowings only had been given, hints and indications of a revelation which could not be clearly and definitely made until Christ's work was complete and the full gift of the Spirit bestowed. A reference is found in Mt 20<sup>28</sup> to the giving up of life by the Son of man 'as a ransom for many,' but the Apostles could not in Christ's lifetime understand at all the need for His death and the full meaning of the shedding of His blood upon the cross; and its connexion with the forgiveness of sins dawning upon them only gradually under the illumination of the promised Spirit.

3. One of the most noteworthy features in Christ's ethical teaching was the inculcation of the duty of alms-giving and forgiveness of man by man. The standard thus set up was practically new. In Pagan ethics to revenge an injury and punish an enemy to the utmost was manly, to forgive was mean-spirited. Some affronts might be passed over by the magnanimous man, simply because it was beneath his dignity, or due to his equanimity, to notice them. But the idea of not only abstaining from vengeance but actually rendering to a relation of kindly regard, to the offender of human brotherhood and for the sake of helping an erring one to regain his forfeited position, was quite alien to the spirit of ancient morals.

Christ taught not only the duty of forgiveness on repentance, but that it was to be unlimited both in quality and in quantity. No offence was so serious, no repetition of offences so excessive, that forgiveness might be withheld, provided only that penitence were shown. The former of these points is not enlarged on by Christ, but it is involved in the proverbial completeness of the phrase 'unto seventy times seven' (Mt 18-1). Such forgiveness of injuries was based upon two fundamental principles of Christian ethics: (a) the duty of repressing all personal resentment, closely connected with the virtues of meekness and humility; and (b) that love to all men, including enemies, which—paradoxical as it might appear—Christ enjoined as fundamentally incumbent on all His disciples (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>). The 'love' and forgiveness thus inculcated do not depend upon personal merits, for they are to be exercised even towards the unthankful and the evil. But the one necessary condition—repentance—is insisted on, else the moral character or forgiveness is lost. For, as already explained, forgiveness is a relation between persons, and if it be included as a duty in a moral code, it must imply an ethical relation, such as is altogether lacking if evil is condoned, or its seriousness slighted. Hence the offender must, so far as in him lies, put away the evil thing, if it is to be no longer a barrier between him and one whose course is determined by the law of righteousness. The truly moral nature of Christian forgiveness is brought out in Lk 17<sup>3</sup>, where it is closely joined with the duty of reproofing sin—'If thy brother sin, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him.' With this may be compared Lv 19<sup>17</sup>, where the reproof of an evil-doer is spoken of as a mark of love. Just as in the Law the righteous man is bidden to rebuke his neighbour and not 'bear sin because of him,' so under the gospel he is bidden to forgive the penitent wrong-doer, that he may help him to a better life.

The close connexion between God's forgiveness of man and man's forgiveness of injuries against himself is brought out in Mt 6<sup>12-15</sup>, Lk 11<sup>4</sup>; see also Lk 6<sup>27</sup> and Mk 11<sup>25-26</sup>. In the last passage, as well as in Mt 5<sup>23-24</sup>, the duty of being 'in love and charity with our neighbours,' and 'in perfect charity with all men,' is laid down as a condition of acceptable prayer to God. The reason is akin to that described above. There are some states of mind in which a worshipper is not fit to pray, in which he asks for blessing—that he is not capable of receiving. The principle is not to be understood as a kind of Divine lex talionis, as in the parable of the Unmerciful Debtor (Mt 18<sup>23</sup>)—that a man does not deserve mercy himself, if he will not show it to others, though this is true and appeals to a natural sense of justice. Rather is it to be understood that the unforgiving man shows essential impenitence, or at best an uneducated conscience in respect of his relations with his fellows. A man who cherishes hardness of heart towards those who have injured him so offends against the law of love that he cannot be received by the God of love, and cannot enjoy the restored relationship which he asks for in the Divine forgiveness, the whole significance of which is due to the supremacy of love. Or, as Beyschlag expresses it, 'he who would belong to the kingdom of love as a recipient must belong to it as an agent.' The merciful alone can obtain mercy, or rightly use it when it is granted to them.

4. Similar principles to those which regulate the relation of individuals are to be applied where Christian communities are concerned. The two are closely connected, as is shown by the passage Mt 18<sup>15-18</sup>. Christ deals first with the offending individual: if it can be avoided, recourse must not be had to the authority of the Christian society. It may be that personal remonstrance will suffice to set right the offender, or at least the moral influence of the brotherhood exercised in private by the presence of two or three witnesses. If the whole community is compelled to act, the utmost penalty inflicted is expulsion from the brotherhood, the only rights then of the excommunicated person being those of a fellow-man.

The question of the power of condemnation as exercised by the community arises from the phraseology concerning binding and loosing contained in v. 18, with which should be compared the words addressed to St Peter in Mt 16<sup>18</sup>, and those addressed to a company which seems certainly to have included more than the Apostles, in Jn 20<sup>23</sup>. The power granted to the Christian community in the words, 'Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained,' is not to be confused with Divine forgiveness of sins on the one hand, or with individual forgiveness on the other. Whilst more significant than the latter, it stops far short of the former. Individual Christians are to do their best privately to stop the progress of ill-feeling and enmity, but 'offences' will still arise. A power of checking them is therefore lodged with the community for the maintenance of purity and the avoidance of scandal. This is described as the power of 'binding and loosing.' Acting in the name of Christ, and presumably in the spirit of Christ, His Church will, He says, in a sense exercise His authority, and their action, whether of permission or prohibition, of condemnation or acquittal, will be ratified in heaven. This power, while great and important, is clearly not comparable to the Divine forgiveness of the individual sinner. This involves a full knowledge of circumstances and of the disposition of the inmost heart which no man can possess in relation to his fellow-man. No authority is given by Christ to a community—still less to a 'priest,' of whom it is needless to say that the Gospels know absolutely nothing—to exercise or to pronounce 'forgiveness' in the case of any individual. But just as an offender belonging to a Christian community needs to be rebuked by the Church in order that the Divine condemnation of wrongdoing may be echoed on earth, and earthly penalties may be inflicted which may arrest further evil and so prevent the terrible danger of worse punishment to come; so the penitent needs assurance from an earthly authority to help him in his upward course of reformation, though the real and ultimate transaction of forgiveness must rest between himself and God alone. The high authority thus conferred upon the Christian society and the responsible character attached to its judgments depend entirely upon its possession of that spiritual discernment which the Holy Spirit alone can bestow, and its acting always in the name of Christ and under the direction and control of the Spirit of Christ.

FORSAKING ALL.—

ἀποδοῦναι, Mt 420<sup>22</sup>=Mk 118<sup>20</sup>; Lk 511; Mt 1927<sup>29</sup>=Mk 1028<sup>29</sup>=Lk 1828<sup>29</sup>, ἀποδοῦναι, 'renounce,' Lk 1433. In Lk 961 ἀποδοῦναι τοῖς εἰς τὸν οἶκόν σου may mean either 'bid farewell to those in my house' (cf Mk 646, Ac 1813, 2 Co 213), or 'renounce the things in my house,' renunciare negotiis domesticis (Erasm.)

Jesus had two classes of disciples. First there was the multitude of those who believed on Him; and, while He required that they should give Him the chief place in their affection and shrink from no sacrifice for His sake, He allowed them to remain where He had found them, prosecuting their old avocations, yet rendering no small service to the Kingdom of Heaven by testifying to His grace. . . . what He had done for their souls. Then there were the Twelve, whom He required to be always with Him, following Him wherever He went, sharing His lot, and entering by daily intercourse and discipline into the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven, that they might be fitted for the task of . . . His work when He was gone. Some . . . like the Gerasene demoniac, would fain have attached themselves to Him and joined the fellowship of His comrades; but He refused their offer. He had other work for them to do. 'Away to thine house unto thy people, and proclaim to them what great things the Lord hath done to thee, and how he had pity on thee' (Mk 519=Lk 839).

In every instance He laid it down as the inexorable condition of admission to His inner circle that the man should forsake all—home, kindred, and possessions. 'Come after me,' He said to Simon and Andrew when He called them on the shore of the Lake of Galilee, 'and I will make you fishers of men.' And it is written that 'they immediately left their nets and followed him.' Then He called James and John, and they also 'left their father Zebedee in the boat with the hired men, and went away after him' (Mk 116-20=Mt 418-22). And in His commission to the Twelve, when He sent them forth two by two to preach and heal, He reiterated this condition of Apostleship. He laid His hand on the tenderest of human affections and claimed for Himself a prior devotion: 'He that loveth father or mother above me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter above me is not worthy of me. And one who doth not take his cross, and follow after me, is not worthy of me' (Mt 1039-42).

Of course it was inevitable that those who followed Jesus wherever He went should share His homeless and desolate lot; but He had a special reason for His emphatic insistence on this condition. The men of His generation cherished a secular ideal of the Messiah. They looked for a king of David's lineage who should appear in might and majesty and, driving out the heathen, set up the fallen throne in more than its ancient splendour. Even the Twelve shared this ideal, and they clung to it to the last, attaching themselves to the lowliness of their Master by the theory that it was only a temporary veiling of His glory, and that He would presently fling off His disguise and flash forth in His proper majesty. They had left all that they might follow Him, but they consoled themselves with the anticipation of a rich and overflowing recompense. 'Behold,' said Jesus after the young ruler's refusal to make the sacrifice which Jesus demanded, 'we have left all and followed thee: what then shall we have?' It was towards the close, and the Twelve were beginning to fear that they had been hugging a false hope, and would have no such recompense as they dreamed of. 'Verily I tell you,' answered Jesus, pitying their discomfiture yet resolute to correct their error, 'that ye that have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, shall yourselves also sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And every one who hath left brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or children, or lands, or houses, for my name's sake, shall receive manifold more, and shall inherit eternal life. But,' He added significantly, hinting at a reversal of their expectation, 'many last shall be first, and first last' (Mt 1927-30=Mk 1028-31=Lk 1828-30). They were right in expecting a recompense but their recompense would be other than they conceived.

As time passed and He still trod the path of humiliation, they fretted at His inexplicable procrastination; and, as the darkness deepened, and the toils closed about Him, they reasoned that the inevitable dénouement could be no longer deferred. During His last progress to Jerusalem, with His intimation of the Passion in their ears, they were dreaming their worldly dream. He was going up to the sacred capital, and, they assured themselves, it could be for naught else than the claiming of His crown; and James and John, conspiring with their mother Salome, . . . Him and . . . to extort from Him a . . . they . . . awarded the chief places beside His throne (Mt 2020-28=Mk 1045-48).

Such was the Messianic ideal which dominated the minds of our Lord's contemporaries; and it was fraught with mischief, hindering more than aught else the recognition of His claims. In truth the marvel is not that so few accepted Him, but that with such an expectation any accepted Him. They were looking for a glorious Messiah, a king with a crown on his head and an army at his back; and Jesus presented Himself, the Son of man, meek and lowly, the very antithesis of what, they believed, the Messiah should be. He lost no opportunity of protesting against the unspiritual ideal, and not the least striking of His protests is this condition which He constantly and emphatically placed before those who desired to attach themselves to Him. A scribe once came to Him and said: 'Teacher, I will follow thee wherever thou goest.' What was his notion? He had been convinced of the Messiahship of Jesus, and, sharing the prevailing expectation, thought to reap a rich harvest of honour and emolument in the new era which would presently be inaugurated. Certainly, he argued, when Jesus won His own and rewarded His faithful followers, He would award the foremost place to one so distinguished by rank and learning.* And how did Jesus answer? 'You are expecting,' He said, 'office and honour in an earthly kingdom. Realize the fact. If you follow me wherever I go, you must forsake all and share my lowly and painful lot. The foxes have holes, and the birds of the heaven nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay down his head.'* (Lk 9<sup>7</sup> 28 = Mt 8<sup>19</sup>, 20).

Again, when He was travelling through Galilee on His last journey up to Jerusalem, He was followed by an enthusiastic throng. Knowing whither He was bound, they concluded that He was going to declare Himself king of Israel, and they were for following Him all the way and sharing in His triumph. Suddenly He wheeled round (στροφείς) and addressed them: 'If any man cometh after me, and doth not hate his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, moreover, even his own life, he cannot be my disciple. Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple.' Then He added two parables,—the Unfinished Tower and the Two Kings,—warning against the folly of embarking upon an enterprise which one is incapable of carrying through. 'So, therefore,' He concluded, 'if ye would follow me, understand the condition. Count the cost, and determine whether you are prepared to meet it. Every one of you who doth not renounce all that he hath cannot be my disciple' (Lk 14<sup>25-33</sup>).

FOUR.—See NUMBERS.

FOWL.—The word 'fowl' is now almost restricted to poultry, and especially to that familiar bird in a farmyard, the 'barn-door fowl'; but it is used in the NT in a wider sense. The Gr. word πετεινά (lit. 'flying things') does not indeed signify, as its derivation might imply, all winged creatures. A number of names attached to 'fowls' in Old English (Harvard's DB, art. 'Fowl'). It denotes birds of which there are many species in Palestine, including some which are only birds of passage with us. Quite arbitrarily AV renders πετεινά by 'birds' in Mt 23<sup>32</sup>, Lk 11<sup>32</sup>; and by 'fowls' in Mt 6<sup>13</sup>, Mk 4<sup>32</sup>, Lk 8<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>31</sup>. In every case in which πετεινά occurs in the Gospels RV gives 'birds.'

Borrowing so much as He did from outward nature, our Lord often employed birds to illustrate His teaching. Their nests are contrasted with His own pillowless couch (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>). In the parable of the Sower they devour the seed that falls by the wayside (Mt 13<sup>4</sup>); in that of the Mustard Seed they lodge under the shadow of the huge plant which grew out of such a tiny germ (Mk 4<sup>32</sup>). Their free undistracted lives play an important part in that cumulative argument which Christ builds up in the Sermon on the Mount against the tyranny of care. They neither sow, reap, nor gather into barns, yet the heavenly Father feeds them (Mt 6<sup>26</sup>), i.e. they are inferior to man in two respects. For (1) they cannot anticipate and influence the future as man can by the exercise of his reason or the labour of his hands; (2) God is only their Creator, but He is man's Father, and will not forget His child. Though the 'fowls' cannot foresee, or work, or trust, they have no care. Yet they are fed. How foolish of man, who can do all these things, to fall so far beneath the 'fowls,' and worry over food and drink, when his first duty is to seek the kingdom of God and His righteousness!

FOX (ἄλωπηξ).—Foxes and jackals are referred to indiscriminately in Scripture, although the fox is somewhat smaller in size, and is generally found singly, whereas jackals prowl around villages in small packs. Both animals are of a timid nature, and exhibit similar cunning and stealth in securing their prey, and live in deserted ruins and among the rocks of . . . Christ's allusion to them (Mt . . . ) meaning from the fact that while places of refuge and rest were allotted to such outcast creatures, the Son of Man had not where to lay His head. His reference to Herod as a fox (Lk 13<sup>32</sup>) is not only expressive of contempt, but may allude to the cause of the king's hostility: he was the invader of vineyards who had taken his brother's wife. The verses that follow also indicate that Christ's death must be otherwise brought about. The petty and furtive intentions of Herod must give way to the grander rapacity of Jerusalem as the historical destroyer of the prophets.

FRAGMENTS (κλάσματα, pieces broken for distribution; cf. κλασμάτων ἔργον of LXX Ezk 13<sup>19</sup>).—All the Synoptic Gospels record that, when the miraculous feeding of the multitude ended, the broken pieces remaining over from the meal were gathered up and deposited in twelve baskets (Mt 14<sup>17</sup>, Mk 6<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>17</sup>). St John adds that this was done in obedience to Christ's command, addressed to the disciples, by which the work was performed (Jn 6<sup>12</sup>). The fragments collected far exceeded the amount of the original stock, and bore witness to the abundance of the gift of God. The carefulness shown in the collection of the remnants of food was intended to avoid any appearance of waste, and served to correct any tendency to undervalue what had come to the recipients so cheaply. The miracle was one of the very exceptional cases in which Christ's power was manifested for men's ordinary wants, was a view of the urgent necessity that had arisen (Mt 14<sup>15</sup>), and, while it raised expectations of similar benefits in the future (Jn 6<sup>26</sup>), was not designed to produce this result. The storing of the fragments for future use would tend to indicate that such miracles were not to be everyday occurrences. As in all Christ's miracles, there is strict economy of supernatural resources, which are resorted to only when natural resources fail.

FRANKINCENSE (ἱβαν, λίβανος).—One of the ingredients of incense (ἱερός), Ex 30<sup>34</sup>, and one of the gifts brought by the Magi to the infant Saviour (Mt 2<sup>11</sup>). The name is derived from לבן 'to be white,' akin to which is libān, the name by which frankincense is known in Arabia. It is a fragrant gum or resin, the produce of the tree Boswellia Serrata, of the natural order Amyridaceæ, from which it is obtained by slitting the bark. The tree itself is a native of Central and Southern India, whence the gum, which requires no further preparation than being allowed to harden, is exported to Europe, the yellowish or inferior quality in larger quantities than the white. Some uncertainty has existed as to the source of the supply. It seems clear that no such tree existed in Palestine, but that the frankincense used there was imported through Arabia (cf. Is 60<sup>6</sup>, Jer 6<sup>20</sup>, where 'incense' in AV ought to be 'frankincense,' and is so rendered in RV). The opening up of India by Britain made it plain that the source of the supply, which had previously come through Persia, was to be found there.

The ritual use of frankincense, in the OT as among the heathen, denotes direct adoration. It is burned as an appendage to the minhah (Lv 2<sup>2</sup>). According to old allegorical traditions, the frankincense offered by the Magi signified the Divinity of the Holy Child, the gold representing His royalty, the myrror His healing powers or His prospect of death.

FREEDOM.—See FREE WILL and LIBERTY.

FREE WILL.—It is not easy to give a definition of Free Will that is not indeed, strictly speaking, it cannot be defined. It may, however, be described as the ability to determine within oneself as to one's acts or courses of action. We have not anywhere in the Gospels or, indeed, in the NT mention made in specific terms of Free Will, or any statement made in so many words that either the Divine will or the will of man is free. We have little, in fact, of discussion in Ro 9<sup>18-24</sup>, where the question of human freedom is approached, and even there such discussion is rather deprecated, as verging on impiety, than entered upon. But while the question of the freedom of the will, whether the will of God or the will of man, is not formally dealt with in the NT, it is quite plain that God is regarded as acting freely, and that man is recognized as a free agent.

1. That God is not bound by external to Himself, that He acts the counsel of His will, is rather to be of Scripture teaching than to be of the Divine will, although as (Ro 11<sup>3</sup>), 'Lord who hath known the mind of the Lord' or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him are all things to whom be glory for ever. Amen.' But Scripture simply accepts the freedom of the Divine will rather than formally states it. We cannot, however, think of God as acting other than freely, if we are to accept Him as a living God at all. Did we suppose that there was any necessity outside of Himself constraining Him to act in a certain way, we should be making Him a Deity. We are freely. Yet to say that He acts freely does not mean that He acts in accordance with His own nature. We can conceive that He might have made the material universe other than He has made it, but we cannot conceive Him as acting otherwise than in love and holiness and justice. Still, the necessity by which, in a sense, He may be said to act where His moral government is concerned is simply the necessity of being true to His own nature.

2. That man is a free agent is not stated in so many words in the NT, but is assumed everywhere. Surely when our Lord said (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>) 'Come unto me all ye that labour,' and (Jn 5<sup>40</sup>) 'Ye will not come to me that ye might have life,' He accepted the freedom of man as a reality. No doubt He also said (Jn 6<sup>44</sup>), 'No man can come unto me except the Father which hath sent me draw him.' But in saying so He did not mean that men were mere passive instruments, but simply that all that appealed to the heart in favour of spiritual living was from on high, whence also all spiritual aids came. Those who hold that the will is not free, or, as we should rather put it, that men are not free to will, do not as a rule argue so much from Scripture, although they may do that in part, as from philosophical grounds, and what they regard as liberty. No doubt those who regard liberty as incompatible with predestination may argue that predestination is the plain doctrine of Scripture, but the conclusion that because predestination is the doctrine of Scripture man cannot be free is their own, and is not taught in Scripture. Whether man is free or not is to a large extent a question of merely academic interest, although not wholly so. We all act upon the hypothesis that we are free. Certainly the conclusion that men are not free operates trition for sin and repentance,—hinder feeling that he is guilty before God,—and perhaps it is partly with the desire to get rid of the sense of sin that some men argue against our possession of freedom. But in a general way we proceed on the assumption that men are free agents, hence the doctrine of freedom is mainly one, as we have said, of academic interest. Scripture, as before remarked, accepts man's freedom as a fact, and we all have the consciousness of it. It is argued, however, on various grounds, of freedom which we have is illusive. In his Outline of Christian Theology Dr. W. N. Clarke mentions four grounds on which the doctrine of human freedom is challenged: viz. (a) Fatalism, (b) Predestinarianism, (c) Necessitarianism, (d) Determinism.

(a) There is perhaps no need of seriously discussing Fatalism, which seems to be a mere philosophy of despair. We all at times feel the strange inevitableness of things, but fatalism cannot commend itself to us as a reasoned philosophy.

(b) Predestinarianism in some form or other we can hardly avoid accepting, if we believe in an ordered universe; and to resolve predestination, in so far as rational and moral beings are concerned, into simple foreknowledge, does not materially, or at least very much, help us. Of course it may be argued that the knowledge that a thing is to occur does not imply that the doer of it must do it. But the antecedents of a man we may judge tolerably well what his course of action in given circumstances will be, but our knowledge as to how he is likely to act does not imply that he must do it. It does not compel him to act in the way foreseen. And so, it may be argued, the Divine foreknowledge of an action does not make the action inevitable, does not make it one that must be done. And this is perhaps formally true, but it is only formally so. What God foresees will be done has a material inevitableness about it, and will just as surely be done as if it had been predestinated. And if an action is predestinated, or even Divinely foreseen as being sure to occur, how can it be said that a man does it freely? Freedom seems incompatible with foreordination,—even with Divine foreknowledge. Yet no reasoning, however logical it may appear, can ever make us lose the sense of freedom. We may try to persuade ourselves that we are not free, but the sense of freedom will remain with us notwithstanding, and we shall go on acting as if we were free.

(c) We may say about Necessitarianism, or the doctrine that every volition is caused by its antecedents, that it is in a way true, but that, as urged against the freedom of the will, it neglects consideration of the fact that we ourselves are contributing all along to the antecedents which so far determine every volition.

(d) And with regard to Determinism, or the doctrine that all our actions are determined by motives acting on the will, it may be said that it also is true, but that motives acting on the will are not like forces acting on a body and producing a resultant which may be mathematically calculated. Our motives are our own feelings and desires, however these may be affected by objects without us, and our decisions to act depend upon what we are, though that is not simply what, as we might say, nature has made us, but what to a large extent we have made ourselves. To suppose that we can act without motive of some kind would be to suppose what is contrary to all experience, for we are always more or less conscious of being influenced by motives, but the action of motives is no mere mechanical action. Our freedom, indeed, as Martensen (Christian Ethics, § 31, pp. 109, 110) well points out, is conditioned, not absolute. We are not free save within certain limits, and many things—our native tendency to sin, heredity, environment, above all the force of habit—operate against our acting freely in accordance with our consciousness of what is best. But the sense of freedom which we possess is not illusive. We need, doubtless, the Divine aid in order to true religious living. But we are bound by no iron chain of necessity. We are, save in so far as we may have ourselves enslaved our wills, bound by no outward or inward constraint to will other than the good. And even the enslaved will can be made free by Divine grace.

3. The notion of moral freedom which is presented in the NT differs from all merely philosophical ideas on the subject. Here freedom means the being set free from the bondage of sin, and thus enabled to realize the ideal of human nature as created in the image of God (Ro 6<sup>20ff</sup>). The freedom of the Christian will lies not in the power to do whatsoever we please, but in the power to choose and follow that for which God made us. God Himself is absolutely free, precisely because He is the absolutely perfect moral Being; and Christ's power to make others free springs from His own Divine freedom—that moral oneness with the Father in the strength of which He did always the things that were pleasing to Him (Jn 8<sup>29</sup>). In Christ's gospel a new pattern of freedom is offered to all. The Son can make us free so that we shall be free indeed (Jn 8<sup>36</sup>). This freedom comes from union with Christ, for apart from Him we can do nothing (Jn 15<sup>5</sup>). The doctrine of the indwelling of Christ through the Holy Spirit, and the consequent endowment of His disciples with freedom and power, was taught, according to the Fourth Gospel, by Jesus Himself (see esp. 14-17). It is constantly enforced by St. Paul as the testimony of his own experience. Apart from the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, the will is powerless to realize its own ideals (Ro 7<sup>19ff</sup>, 8<sup>2ff</sup>). But in accepting Christ as our Master, and yielding to His law as supreme, we pass into 'the glorious liberty of the children of God.' See, further, LIBERTY.

FRIENDSHIP.—1. PRE-CHRISTIAN AND CHRISTIAN FRIENDSHIP.—Friendship was esteemed among the pagans and received memorable treatment at the hands of Aristotle (Ethics, Bks. viii. and ix.) and Cicero (de Amicitia). The latter said, 'There is nothing in the world more valuable than friendship.' Jewish literature treated the same subject, as, for example, in Sirach (6<sup>15</sup>), 'There is no greater blessing than friendship.' This appreciation of friendship as one of the chief means of happiness throws light upon the ancient attitude. The mutual kindness of friends, considered necessary to complete the happiness even of the philosopher, but which was confined to those of the same school or character, makes more prominent the absence of benevolence from the ancient system of virtue. Christianity has also a high regard for friendship, has ennobled it, but has at the same time placed limitations upon it.

(1) The enlargement of Christian friendship is twofold. (a) The area within which the grace may be displayed is much extended by the teaching of Christianity upon the dignity of woman, whereby marriage loses any trace of the offence with which even many enlightened Jews regarded it. It comes a lofty friendship by the new ideal of benevolence, which is to penetrate all the relations of life. Humanity has been ennobled by the Incarnation. Christian Ethics is to the virtues of paganism, but the new spirit that turned patriotism into brotherhood, elevated friendship into universal love; philia becomes φιλανθρωπία. The exceptional exhibitions of goodwill and charity displayed by heathen, remarkable because of their contrast with the prevalent selfishness, are taken for granted by the members of the Kingdom of God. Friendship ceases to be a luxury and becomes a duty. Love, the root of all Christian virtues, must pervade all the performances of life.

(2) The limits upon friendship in the Christian doctrine of the Divine life, which causes a complete re-orientation of thought. The pagans found little spiritual rest or inspiration in their religion, and human friendship was neither a reflexion nor a suggestion of a Divine fellowship. With Christ, however, the love for God is paramount, and receives an importance far beyond any other relationship. 'Ye, my friends, shall leave me alone, and yet I am not alone, for the Father is with me' (Jn 16<sup>32</sup>). To furnish this higher friendship is the mission of Christ. He has come that we may have the power to become sons of God (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>). Religion takes precedence over friendship; man may not usurp God's place. The gospel which teaches that man attains his exaltation according as he bows down in humble submission to the will of God, necessarily modifies the view that human companionship is the most valuable thing in the world. The Christian doctrine of God recasts everything in a new mould. Theology reacts upon anthropology. 'God is the beginning and foundation of all true and lasting friendship' (Zwingli).

2. THE TEACHING OF JESUS ON FRIENDSHIP.—This is suggestive and incidental rather than formal and detailed. In parables and conversations Christ indirectly drops sentences which show how general was His observation of all the relations into which people might enter. (1) In the parables of the Lost Sheep and the Lost Piece of Silver, He touches upon the much debated basis of friendship. The joyous discovery of lost possession leads to social communion. 'He (she) calleth together his (her) friends and neighbours, saying, Rejoice with me' (Lk 15<sup>9</sup>). This act is the natural result of the instinct for association. The consciousness of joy breaks through the bounds of individualism and runs over into the sphere of human companionship; for the feeling that life's great emotions are too strong for narrow limits constrains men to seek this expansion among others. The soul delights in self-revelation. 'But no receipt openeth the heart but a true friend. To whom you may impart, Griefes, Joyes, Feares, Hopes, Suspensions, Counsels, and whatsoever lieth upon the Heart' (Bacon). This spontaneous overflow, due to the instinct of association, has been implanted by God; and friendship is thus one of the good gifts of Heaven. Cicero also assigned a similar spontaneous basis to his virtue.

Three types of false friendship are suggested by Jesus. (a) The parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>9</sup>), 'who made friends out of the mammon of unrighteousness' illustrates the commercial type. The material comforts of fellowship are gained by a clever distribution of money favours apart from all sympathy of heart or mind, and though Christ neither commends nor condemns, He indirectly reveals His mind in the remark, 'The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light' (v<sup>8</sup>). But true friendship is disinterested, and seeks the welfare of the friend rather than its own. 'I am not seeking my own advantage, but the advantage of those who love me' (1 Jn 3<sup>17</sup>). (b) The exclusive type of friendship is displayed in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15). The outwardly proper behaviour of the elder brother is marred by the lack of filial love; and his complaint, 'Thou never gavest me a kid that I might make merry with my friends,' shows how blind he was to the lavish affection of a father who bestowed his all upon him, — 'Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine.' The son looked for a friendship apart from the nobler companionship of a loving father. His heart was not really in the home, for his secret longing was for the frivolous joys of the world, the merry-making with friends, which he will have in isolation from the love of home. The unpleasant impression left by the picture of the elder brother is Christ's way of giving His opinion of a friendship which shuts itself up within the circle of favourite comrades, and is careless of the higher claims of love and benevolence. It then becomes a refined selfishness. (c) The selfish type is described in Lk 11<sup>8-9</sup>, where the householder is so comfortably settled in bed that he refuses to rise and give bread to a friend, who is unexpectedly called upon to show a greater service to his friend. 'Friend, lend me three loaves, for a friend of mine in his journey is come to me.' The friend has no responsibilities, and will not deign to get up to the extent of getting out of bed. Are we mistaken in seeing a touch of irony in this portrayal of a bond which lasted only with the enjoyment of benefits, but could not stand the strain of any personal inconvenience? Friendship is mutual assistance. 'A friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity' (Pr 17<sup>17</sup>).

(3) The claim of old friends was recognized by Jesus when He cast out the devils from 'Legion' (Mk 5<sup>19</sup>). The evil spirit, always an isolating influence, had excluded this unhappy man from the comforts of home and companionship. But when he is healed and the craving for intercourse is awakened, Jesus directs it to old channels. 'Jesus saith unto him, Go home to thy friends and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee.' These associates and guardians of his youth had borne with him through the evil days, and Jesus will not be a partner to any indifference to those obligations contracted by former benefits. He knew how keen was the sting of 'friend remembered not'.

(4) Jesus placed restrictions upon friendship at the feast given by the rich Pharisee, and condemned the selfish narrowing of the acts of hospitality. 'When thou makest a dinner or a feast do not call thy friends . . . but call the poor' (Lk 14<sup>12-13</sup>). The force of the verb is not prohibitive, but restrictive: 'Do not habitually call' (μὴ φέρε). Friendship must have open doors, and recognize the larger 'friendship'. Thus Jesus broadened the stream of friendship by bringing neighbours within the same flow of feeling, as is set forth in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>30-35</sup>). 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' Nor did Jesus stop at neighbour. He included enemy also. The Christian must have no foes. 'I say unto you, Love your enemies' (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>). The sentiment of love must pervade every motive, filling the soul with gentle kindness. Cicero had said that 'Sweetness both in language and manner is a very profitable attraction in the formation of friendship'; but what is with him an accident becomes an essential in the Kingdom of Jesus. The distinctive word with Christ is love and not friendship, and, by reason of this, Christianity excels the pagan ideals. The new commandment, 'that ye love one another' (1 Jn 13<sup>34</sup>), decides all matters of conduct. True friends will not sanction any imperfection, or acquiesce in any weak neglect of talents in those whom they love; while at the same time the charity of the gospel will bear all things, will hope all things.

(5) Jesus also taught that the life of love was endless. The old world flourished under dark skies. Fears of an awful end haunted them, and when death came, 'They dreamed there would be spring no more.' But Christ has brought life and immortality to light through His gospel. He has spoken with certainty of the future, and has made the darkness beautiful. The Christian poet can rise out of the calamity of interrupted friendship into the repose of faith and self-control.

'Far off thou art but ever nigh,

In Memoriam, cxxx).

Human affection will pass through the cleansing stream of death, and purified of all selfishness and evil will be made perfect in the presence of God.

3. THE FRIENDSHIP OF JESUS.—Christianity is a life as well as a system of teaching; and as each virtue or quality is best interpreted in the light of the highest example of its kind, so also human friendship becomes refigured by the friendship which Jesus offers to all who will receive Him.

(1) The friendship of Jesus as revealed in the Gospels—These narratives show how approachable Jesus was. His readiness to accept social invitations, to befriend all classes, to reveal His gracious message, testifies to His genius for friendship, and accounts in part for the contemptuous title, 'Friend of publicans and sinners.' He chose twelve 'that they might be with him' (Mk 3<sup>14</sup>), and to these He revealed what was dearest to His heart. On the Mount of Transfiguration He admitted three of them to the vision of His glory (Mt 17<sup>1-13</sup>). In Gethsemane He opened to the same three the door of His grief (26<sup>36-46</sup>). He told His disciples of the stern struggle with temptation in the wilderness of Judæa. The house at Bethany was a second home to Him, and His love for 'our friend Lazarus' was manifested in His visit to the sisters, and in the grief that overwhelmed Him at the grave (Jn 11).

In the second part of the Fourth Gospel the affection of Jesus is seen to lack the slightest 'gram of depreciation,' which Schopenhauer recommends among friends. The constancy of the perfect Friend is the first theme of this intimate writing (Jn 13-17), a constancy unimpaired by sorrow or joy. The foreboding of death ('knowing that he would depart out of this world') threatened to draw away His mind, as also the vision of a transcendent glory ('that he would depart unto the Father') imperilled His attachment; but neither the excess of grief nor the ecstasy of gladness availed to weaken His fidelity to those whom He had chosen; 'having loved his own, he loved them unto the end' (Jn 13<sup>1</sup>). In the following chapters the love of Jesus is unfolded with the eloquence of St. John's Gospel. Christ breathes about the atmosphere of God's glory, lifts up their thoughts to the heavenly home, filling them with the truth of the endless love of God, all of which is summed up in terms of friendship in Jn 15<sup>12-15</sup>. (a) Jesus is a perfect friend because of His personal sacrifice: 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend' (v. 13). Sacrifice is the most convincing evidence in the world, and the surrender of personal advancement for the sake of others is proof of the noble emotion of love. As there is nothing that a man can give in exchange for his life, the death of Jesus for us is the highest evidence of His perfect friendship. Sacrifice is also the food of love, and friendship is growth in self-sacrificing love. Each self-denial is a step toward attachment, and when sacrifice is done its perfect work it forms a deathless union. Jesus experienced every stage of self-denial, suppressing His own desires, until His love, perfected through suffering, received its crown and goal on the Mount of Crucifixion. The sacrifice which was the evidence of His perfect friendship was also the only sustenance by which perfect friendship could be nourished. (b) Christ is an ethical constraint. 'Ye are to do whatsoever I command you' (v. 14). The kindest friend who makes us do our best, and who helps us to do what we thought we could not do. The consciousness of expanding power is purest joy. Christ arouses enthusiasm for the holy life, imparts new resolves to master temptation, and is the most effectual aid in the attainment of the ethical life. His friendship is our better self, our conscience. (c) There is intimate communion in the friendship of Jesus. 'Henceforth I call you not servants, but I have called you friends: for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you' (v. 15). Friendship is fellowship in which undue reserve is cast off. When Christ spoke out on the most sacred matters of religion, and shared with others His knowledge of the Father, He did the friendliest of acts. Christ's love was the most intimate relation into which any man could enter, and His constancy, devotion, communion, and inspiration gave Him the first place among friends.

(2) The friendship of Jesus as revealed in Christian experience.—The limits of human friendship are many, and suggest the blessings which all believers in Christ have enjoyed by their union with the living Saviour. In our human relationships no words are adequate to express the subtler and more refined emotions and convictions of the soul, so that when we strive to reveal our true self we stammer. Besides, we often cannot define these things to ourselves, and we require one who will first tell us our dream and then interpret it. Inhospitability of soul and our native bashfulness impede communion, while the sense of defect or unworthiness restricts our fellowship. Differences of experience tell us that we cannot match each other, and change of occupation place physical barriers, while too often the faults of temper and vexing cares drive apart those who once were knit together in friendship. How precarious is our hold upon a friendship which 'death, a few light words, a piece of stamped paper,' can destroy. But Jesus transcends all these limits of human friendship. His spirit can commune with our spirits apart from language. He knows us altogether, and needs not that any should tell Him. He is master of large experience, having been tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. Physical barriers are all removed, since He will never go away from us or forsake us. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. The universal testimony of the Christian Church is that as we abide in the presence of Jesus by prayer, self-denial, and meditation, we are uplifted in soul, encouraged in our holy endeavours, and made partakers of spiritual joy. The believer finds that Christ is the way to the Father, that Jesus leads us to that communion with God which is the greatest fact of all the world. Religion is friendship between the believer and the living Christ.

FRINGES.—See BORDER

FRUIT.—The consideration of this term as it is used in the Gospels divides itself into three parts: (1) The natural application of the word 'fruit' (καρπός) to the products of the field and the orchard; (2) other references to fruit under their specific names; (3) the spiritual lessons derived from these allusions.

2. Other references to fruits under their specific names, without the use of the word 'fruit': (a) grapes (Mt 7<sup>16</sup>, Lk 6<sup>44</sup>); (b) figs (Mt 7<sup>16</sup>, Mk 11<sup>13</sup>, Lk 6<sup>44</sup>); (c) husks (Lk 15<sup>16</sup>, probably the fruit of the carob or locust-tree); (d) mulberry (Lk 17<sup>8</sup>); (e) olives (Mt 21<sup>1</sup>). Probably the 'thorns' (ἄκανθαι) alluded to in Mt 7<sup>16</sup> are not the so-called 'Apple of Sodom,' but a generic term covering all sorts of prickly plants. The parallel use with 'thistles' (τρίβολοι) suggests that the fruit was inconsiderable.

3. Spiritual lessons.—Christ Himself is intimately associated with (a) the Divine quest of fruit; (b) the Divine creation of fruit; (c) the Divine suffering and sacrifice of fruit-production. The processes of agriculture and horticulture are also, in many ways, utilized as symbols of the Christian's culture of the soul.

(a) Jesus describes Himself (Mt 21, Lk 20) under the figure of the Son whom the Master of the Vineyard sends to ask fruit of the husbandman. Our life is a rich gift to us from God; it is a garden which God has designed with lavish care, endowed with unlimited possibilities, and handed over to our complete control. He has a right to expect that we should use our opportunities well.

(b) Jesus uses the figure of the Vine (Jn 15) and the Branches to express the vital and mysterious connexion that exists between Himself and His disciples, and the necessity for our dependence upon Him and His continuous inspiration, if we are to bring forth fruit. It is our responsibility to 'abide in Him' by keeping His commandments. But it is His obligation to create the fruit. We who cannot so much as make a blade of grass grow without His . . . are not expected to accomplish the . . . and bring forth fruit of ourselves.

(c) Jesus manifestly alludes to His own death and sacrifice (Jn 12-14) under the allegory of the grain of wheat which falls into the ground and dies, and afterwards rises in the new life of the fruit. This figure betokens the utter consecration and determination of the holiness of God to our redemption. We are apt to shudder and tremble before the holiness of God, as a thing of terrible and inaccessible majesty associated with the Great White Throne. That is because we have not taken full views, but have isolated one part from the rest. God is glorious in His holiness (Ps 145); it is such holiness as man praises when he sees it; it is hospitable, friendly, and devoted to our welfare. It is determined even unto death to share its joy and health and purity with us (Jn 12-14 17<sup>19</sup>).

In the Museum of the Vatican there is a little glass relic, taken from the Catacombs, it was made as an ornament to be worn round the neck of a woman, and was found in her grave, it represents Christ bringing again the fruit of the Tree of Life * That relic summarizes the Divine aspects of the question of fruit as it is presented in the Gospels. It is Christ who loves fruit, and who desires to find it in us, and it is He who, in the inspiration and creation of the fruit, virtually gives Himself to us

But, as in agriculture and horticulture the farmer is continually in communion with God in the sowing of the seed, in the growth of the fruit, and in the harvest of the trees, so, in many ways, the Gospels lay upon us the injunctions of our duty.

(1) We are the ground which brings forth fruit, according as we receive the Word (Mt 13<sup>10ff.</sup>, Mk 4<sup>15ff.</sup>, Lk 8<sup>12ff.</sup>). If our hearts be like the wayside, trampled over and hardened by the interests and engagements of the world, or if they be readily affected by the 'fashions' of men, or if they be choked by the ' cares ' of life and the deceitfulness of riches, there can be no fruitfulness. It is our duty to prepare the ground by thought and prayer and a regulated life for the reception of God's truth. The harvest will correspond with the tillage.

(2) We are the branches which bear fruit according as we abide in the Vine (Jn 15). Just as the vine prunes and purges a tree so that it may bear more fruit, so there are afflictions in this life which are only God's way of increasing our fruitfulness. The branches which draw most sustenance from the vine are the most productive, so the soul which keeps most faithfully the Lord's commandments abides the most in His love and is most fruitful.

(3) We are the grain of wheat which comes to fruit, if it dies (Jn 12<sup>24-25</sup>). In the first place, the Master alludes to His own death. But the second reference of the figure is to the essential principle of ethical life—'Die to live.'

To Hegel, the good and rational life is one which is both individual and social, and which expresses the truth about the nature of man and his relation to the world. The true interpretation of the maxim—"Die zu leben ist die Wahrheit"—is that the individual must die to an isolated life, — i.e. a life for and in himself; a life in which the immediate satisfaction of desire as his desire is an end in itself,—in order that he may live the spiritual life, the universal life which really belongs to him as a spiritual or self-conscious being' (Edward Caird, Hegel, p. 213).

(4) We are the husbandmen, who are expected to tend the Vineyard (Lk 20), and to make it fruitful, and to yield up some of the fruit at right-ful times to the Lord of the vineyard. The original application of the parable is, doubtless, to the scribes and the chief priests who rejected Jesus, but it is equally applicable to any who think they can do as they please, and then life and ignore all that is due to the Giver and Lord.

W. are the trees which are known by their fruit (Mt 7<sup>30</sup>). Men do not gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles. A tree which is true to its nature and to its destiny brings forth its appropriate fruit. Man, who is by nature a child of God and by destiny an heir of Heaven, should produce the fruit of the Spirit of God.

FULFILMENT.—The primary meaning of the English word 'fulfil' is simply to fill—by a pleonasm, to fill (until) full. We find this use in literature—

'Is not thy brain's rich hive
Fulfilled with honey?' (Donne)

Sometimes it is imitated even in modern English, though only by a deliberate archaism. For with us 'fulfil' is specialized to mean not literal material filling, but the אֵלֶּה עָשָׂה into act of some word—some promise, e.g. hope, command, etc. When the AV was made, 'fulfil,' according to the great Oxford Dictionary, meant 'fill,' and began to be used by the translators in its remoter sense on the pattern of the Vulgate, which wrote (unclassically) implere and adimplere for Heb. מָלֵא. Thus the transition from one sense to the other, or the metaphor of filling for fulfilling, is Hebrew. But in Greek, too, it is the same metaphor spring up independently of Hebrew influence; cf. classical references (under πληροῦν) in Cremer, also in Luddell and Scott (πληροῦν, II 5). In OT the usage is not very common. Possibly the earliest instance, chronologically, is Jer 44<sup>25</sup>. What the Jews in Egypt have said, they do. Their threat to practise idolatry is not left an empty word; it is filled out, or filled up, in action. At Ps 20<sup>8</sup> we have the word used of answers to prayer: 'Jehovah fulfil all thy petitions'; the empty vessel, as it were, standing to receive the Divine. For 'fulfilling law' or 'fulfilling a promise' there is no proper authority in OT, though EV at times introduces the term (Ps 148<sup>8</sup>; literally, the forces of nature 'do' God's word). In L K 22<sup>85, 24</sup> we have the most important usage of all, the 'fulfilling' of the prophetic word or prediction. The passages referred to are marked by modern scholarship as Deuteronomic. We may therefore conclude that the theological conception of fulfilment is part of the religious language of that great forward movement in OT history, the Deuteronomic reform. Along with these theological applications may mean 'fill' anywhere in the OT. And so in NT (e.g. chiefly in the parable of the Drag-net (Mt 13<sup>47</sup>), the net is 'filled' with all kinds of fish; Mt 23<sup>32</sup>, 'Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers'. More generally, however, the word bears its derivative sense, and has a theological application. Though rare in OT, the usage is quite common in NT, very noticeably, of fulfilled prophecy, in the First Gospel. A beginning of differentiation or specification is made in the NT in this respect, that while πληροῦν may mean 'fill', the simpler but kindred form πικρῶναι [others assume πλήθω as root form] never means 'fulfil'.

A second metaphor underlies קָלָה. This is probably still late '... language. It means especially the fulfilling or prediction. We find it in Ezr 1<sup>1</sup>=2 Ch 36<sup>22</sup>. ... to Bertholet (on Ezr 1.c.; he refers to Dn 12<sup>1</sup> also), 'Fulfilment ranks simply as the end of the prophetic word, which, once spoken, enters among the powers of the real world and gradually works itself out.' This word and metaphor are also common in NT. Sometimes we have τελειν and cognates; though here again there is a tendency (less marked, however, than with πληροῦν in contrast to συμπλάναι) to prefer a more ... or technical term—τελειοῦν, τελειώσις. ... k is begun by the prophetic word, but incomplete till the fact matches the promise.

A third term and metaphor are of some moment in OT, but scarcely enter into NT—εἶρη, βεβαιοῦν. (God's promise may seem to be tottering to its fall, —He will buttress it; support it) See Jer 29<sup>10</sup>, Is 44<sup>26</sup>, Ro 15<sup>8</sup>; but in the Gospels only Mk 16<sup>20</sup> 'confirming ... with signs following.' (How fully this is a synonym for εἶρη we see when we note the usage of εἶρη at 1 K 1<sup>14</sup>). εἶρη, lit. 'return' or 'reward,' occurs by an extension of meaning at Is 44<sup>26</sup>, 28 for 'fulfil'; not imitated in NT. Also, as already implied, EV sometimes introduces 'fulfil' or 'be fulfilled' where the original has merely 'do' or 'be.' And we cannot say that this is '...'. A very important passage is the last (1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup> V 5<sup>18</sup> AV; but RV 'till all things be accomplished' [to mark the contrast with πληρώσαι, v 17. See below—4.—on both verses])

We have then to look chiefly to εἶρη, πληροῦν, while not forgetting other forms. And the question may be raised, whether the NT writers were alive to the implication of steady quantitative growth towards fulfilment? Or had the original suggestions of quantity and of continuousness passed away,—was there assumed a mere correspondence between the word and its fulfilment? (If one pours water into a vessel, it fills by degrees. But if one is fitting together a ball-and-socket joint, the socket is empty at one moment, full at the next. The two correspond, but their correspondence is not reached by gradual growth). We shall have to distinguish in this as in other respects between different senses of πληροῦν (or its ...)

1. ... of time. Here, if anywhere, we may expect to find the ideas of continuity and gradualness. Now 'fulfil' is constantly used in the OT of the elapsing of a given time, alike in Hebrew, Greek, and English; or, in NT, alike in Greek and English. It is used of the period of a woman's gestation (e.g. Gn 25<sup>24</sup>; πληρώω, LXX; Lk 18<sup>26</sup>—συμπλάναι; RV 'fulfilled' in all 3 cases). There is no more striking or more frequently noted parable of

The slow sweet hours that bring us all things good,
The slow sad hours that bring us all things ill, or sometimes, as George Eliot has expressed it in Adam Bede, of 'swift ... shame,' 'the bitterest of life's bitterness.' But the word is also used of other measured times—of periods fixed by OT law (e.g. Lk 22<sup>1</sup>, συμπλάναι, RV 'fulfilled'; cf. Lv 12<sup>4</sup>, εἶρη (Qal); LXX πληρώω). From such usages as these we pass on to times of Divine fulfilment. 'The fulness of the time came' (τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου), Gal 4<sup>4</sup>. And our Lord's own message is summed up in Mk 1<sup>15</sup>: 'The time is fulfilled (πεπληρωται ὁ καιρὸς) and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe in the gospel' (Probably secondary in comparison with Mt 4<sup>17</sup>, 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand'; yet ... of Biblical and primitive Chr ... Lk 4<sup>19</sup>). The idea is, that God has fixed a time, 'His own good time,' as our pious rhymers sing (Is that a misquotation of Is 60<sup>1</sup>? RV 'in its time'; AV [same sense; archaic

... Yet we have ... that ... is not, for the Bible writers, ... predetermined. The eschatological ... 24<sup>22</sup>=Mk 13<sup>20</sup>) tells us that the time of trouble, at the world's end, shall be cut short out of mercy to God's people. [I.k omits, and inserts a reference to 'times of the ...' which must be 'fulfilled,' 21<sup>24</sup>] And it is possible that another popular religious ... 'hastening' of God's kingdom may have been a warrant. It appears at Is 60<sup>1</sup> [quoted above]. But when (as Marti advises) we refer back to Is 5<sup>19</sup>, we find that the word 'hasten' was introduced originally to express the temper of a sneerer—'Let God hurry up, if He is really going to act [and not simply talk].' So that 'hasten,' when used at 60<sup>2</sup>, may have come to mean no more than 'fulfil.' Cf. also Hab 2<sup>1</sup> and 2 P 3<sup>9</sup>. Still, when the fulness of a Divinely appointed time is spoken of, all these ... op out of sight. In some sense a ... Divinely ordained; and efflux of ... day when God acts. Fulfilment of time is not indeed identical with fulfilment of God's promise [or threat]. The first is a condition of the second. In regard to the first, at least, the quantitative sense of 'fulfil' is maintained in clear consciousness. ('My time is not yet fulfilled,' Jn 7<sup>8</sup>= 'mine hour is not yet come,' 2<sup>4</sup>)

2. Fulfilment of joy (πληρώω). Here again there is an ambiguity. When St. Paul says (Ph 2<sup>2</sup>) 'Fulfil ye my joy,' what does he mean? Is it (1) 'Complete my happiness; unless I hear of your being thoroughly at one, I cannot be perfectly happy'? or (2) does he mean, 'I have sacrificed many ordinary sources of happiness, give me this my chosen joy'? Authorities seem to prefer the first; perhaps, 'complete the joy I already have in you.' That is, 'fulfilment' of 'joy' is taken as a quantitative and continuous idea. Elsewhere the phrase is peculiarly Johannine (Jn 3<sup>29</sup> 15<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>24</sup> 17<sup>13</sup>, with 1 Jn 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 Jn 1<sup>5</sup>). The Baptist, e.g. (3<sup>29</sup>), has joy in full. He has all the joy he can expect. Yet there is more than this in the words. He has full joy—'rejoiceth greatly.' In the Johannine passages the two thoughts seem included: the joy (Christ's joy, e.g.) is given; and what is given is a full joy. So prominent is the latter thought—the more quantitative—that one is tempted to regard AV 'full' as a better rendering, in regard to joy, than the more literal 'fulfilled' of RV.

3. Fulfilment of prophecy or of Scripture or of Christ's words (usually πληρώω, Mt 1<sup>22</sup> and very often; Mk 15<sup>28</sup> [doubtful text]; Lk 1<sup>20</sup>, Jn 12<sup>38</sup> and elsewhere. In Christ's words, Mt 26<sup>54</sup>, 56 [a 'doublet'] = Mk 14<sup>49</sup> [Lk 22<sup>53</sup> has not the word]; Lk 4<sup>21</sup> 21<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>44</sup>, cf. 9<sup>31</sup> 'his decease'; 21<sup>24</sup> 'times of the Gentiles'; 22<sup>16</sup> the Passover 'fulfilled in the kingdom of God'; Jn 13<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>25</sup> and elsewhere. But τελειώω, Jn 19<sup>30</sup>. There is perhaps a slight difference in meaning: not the word of Scripture verbal, but the terrible things spoken of in Scripture made actual—when ... 18<sup>21</sup> 22<sup>27</sup>. Purely in the sense of 'fulfilment,' perhaps, at Jn 19<sup>30</sup> 30. συντελέω occurs Mk 13<sup>4</sup>; the noun συντέλεια [τοῦ αἰῶνος 'end of the world,' RVm 'consummation of the age'] in Mt's 11, 24, and also at 13<sup>38</sup>, 40 28<sup>20</sup>. [He 9<sup>26</sup>, συντέλεια τῶν αἰώνων 'end of the ages,' RV; marg. 'consummation']. τελειώω [AV 'finish,' RV 'accomplish'] is used in the Johannine discourses of Christ's work [ἔργον, 4<sup>34</sup> 17<sup>4</sup>] or works [5<sup>36</sup>, cf. again 19<sup>30</sup>]. As far as the words rendered 'fulfil' are concerned, they are used in the same sense throughout, whether the fulfilment is of the past (the OT) in the present (Christ), or of the present (Christ's words) in the (eschatological) future. And

Moreover, for a full index of the Scripture teaching we should need to include passages like Lk 24<sup>25-27</sup>, where no word 'fulfil' occurs. (But we have it in Lk 24<sup>44</sup>). This holds especially of the fulfilment of Christ's own words. It is true, the word as well as the  $\Gamma$  in the Fourth Gospel (18<sup>9, 32</sup>), but in the Synoptics the phrasing is different. The nearest approach is Mk 13<sup>30</sup> ||, 'until all [these] things be accomplished ( $\gammaένηται$ )—a difficult word, discussed below (under 'Fulfilment of  $\Gamma$ '), we must lay down, in general, that the NT thinks of fulfilment as occurring in detailed mechanical correspondence with the letter of prediction. God has said so-and-so, therefore it must happen exactly as was said. In Jn 19<sup>28</sup> it is difficult to take any other view of the  $\Gamma$  in the text—meaning than that Jesus exclaimed 'I thirst,' because the Passion psalms had spoken of the cruel thirst of the Sufferer. We must not, of course, exaggerate the simplicity of the Bible writers. A few verses earlier, where Jn 18<sup>9</sup> interprets Jesus' protection of His disciples, at the moment of His own arrest, as the fulfilment of the word which He spake, 'Of those whom thou lovest I lost not one,' the Evangelist knows that his readers must remember, that the true sense of Christ's words belongs to a different region. In that one instance, at least, he is consciously accommodating, as we might do in the case of Shakespeare. And there is more to be said. The Evangelist discerns in Christ's care for the fulfilment of the supreme spiritual transaction, that Christ saves others, while not saving but fulfilling Himself. Still, in general, the letter of the NT takes the letter of the OT as a magic book, foreshadowing what must happen to Christ. Deeper views are no doubt latent in the NT, but they are nowhere formulated by it. They do not rise to the surface of consciousness in Evangelist or Apostle.

4.  $\Gamma$  in the sense of 'fulfil' [and prophets?]. [Fulfilment of  $\Gamma$  in the sense of 'fulfil' is a difficult interpretation here raises very difficult questions. It is hardly to be settled without some preliminary. First let us take what is simple; to 'fulfil' the Law is to obey it. (Lk 2<sup>27</sup>, Ja 2<sup>8</sup>; or  $\piληρῶν$ , Gal 3<sup>12</sup>, Ro 13<sup>8</sup>—these last, see below).  $\piληρῶν$  too, is 'to fulfil all' (Lk 11<sup>31</sup>,  $\piληρῶσαι$ , Mt 3<sup>15</sup>); and the saying may well be historical, though unsupported in the parallels. It fits the circumstances (see present writer's paper on 'Dawn of Messianic Consciousness' in Expos. Times, 1905, p. 215), if perhaps tinged in expression with the Evangelist's phraseology. But what of Mt 5<sup>17</sup> ('Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets; I came not to destroy but to fulfil')? Much has been written on this. The present writer discussed the passage in Christ and the Jewish Law, 1886. Even more decidedly than then, he must insist that if v. 18—and especially if v. 19—is part of Christ's discourse, we are shut out from standing 'fulfil' in the sense of 'obey' (see Lexicon, launching 5<sup>17</sup> with 3<sup>15</sup>). But (b) the case for omitting v. 18—with its Pharisaic aspect, its at least seemingly exaggerated canonization of the whole letter of the Pentateuch—is being very strongly pressed to-day (e.g. Votaw, art. 'Sermon on the Mount' in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol.). If v. 18 [some would say vv. 18-19] be a gloss [or belong properly to a different context in a somewhat different form], we may render 'not to destroy but to perfect the law,'—raising it to its ideal height of purity, and carrying it to its ideal depth of inwardness. This view probably holds the field at present. It goes well with vv. 21, etc., where our Lord, in a series of brilliant paradoxes, sweeps away the mere letter of the OT [? or the legal glosses added to it by 'scribes and Pharisees' (v. 20)]. But there are difficulties. It is 'hard' to think that our Lord ever exercised the supposed conscious detailed intellectual criticism of the OT as such (so the late A. B. Davidson, in conversation with the present writer's informant). And would He have called His paradoxes a 'perfected' law? They are at least as like a 'destruction' of the régime of law! Moreover, we have the reference to the 'prophets.' (c) When 'fulfil' is in the sense of 'prophecy,' the sense is well known. It becomes the predominant partner in such a juxtaposition as 'to fulfil law and prophets'; and we have to think of the OT's moral teaching as a sort of type, fulfilled, when the OT's prophets is fulfilled, in Christ's person. [Christ and the Jewish Law tried in a particular way to carry through this meaning of 'fulfil']. 'Law and prophets' repeatedly occur in Christ's words, esp. in Mt. (also at 7<sup>12</sup>, 22<sup>40</sup>, Lk 16<sup>16</sup>, cf. Lk 24<sup>44</sup>). We can hardly doubt that our Lord Himself used the expression; and it is probable, too, that He used it as a general designation for the OT. Still, it is conceivable that the Evangelist has brought in the phrase here. A further measure of critical surgery would then dismiss (c), and leave the field so far to (a) and (b). But (d) we might raise a new possibility: either by exegesis, or if necessary by a minor form of critical excision. We might take Mt 5<sup>17b</sup> either as spoken here in pure abstraction—'I am not a destroyer but a fulfiller'—or as originally spoken in the logos worked into this context by the Evangelist.

In view of these rival views, one might turn for help to the Epistles. For, especially on ethical points, the Christ visibly moulds St. Paul's thought. And again. And in this way we might learn how the earliest Church understood its Lord's words. Gal 5<sup>14</sup> and Ro 13<sup>8-10</sup> [see above], while their use of  $\piληρῶν$  suggests Mt 5<sup>17</sup>, refer in substance rather to Mt 22<sup>38-40</sup> [Mark's ||, (12<sup>31</sup>) omits the very element which lives in the Epistles—love to God and man not only the chief duty but the whole of duty. In this case the Epistles decidedly support Mt's tradition. In Luke (10<sup>27</sup>) we have an unwarranted suggestion that the scribes had already woven together Dt 6<sup>5</sup> with Lv 19<sup>18</sup>. Thus Luke's tradition here seems still less exact. On Christ's words, this matter comes up. Montefiore in Expos. Times, Apr. 1905]. (Commentators seem to take Gal 5<sup>14</sup>—'all the law is fulfilled ( $\piληρῶν$ ) in one word, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself'—as parallel not to Ro 13<sup>8</sup> ('all the law is summed up—ἀπακεφαλαιῶσαι—in Thou shalt love thy neighbour' etc.), but rather to v. 14, 'Love thy neighbour as thyself' (the  $\piληρῶν$  of the law.' St. Paul then takes fulfil=obey, as in (a), above. But does St. Paul's language really support (a)? Is there not something more than obeying law in the Pauline thought of 'fulfilment' (Ro 8<sup>4</sup>)? The requirement of the Law is fulfilled in those who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit. The utmost we can say is that  $\piληρῶν$ , in the sense of 'fulfil,' had been given such currency in the Greek version of our Lord's words that St. Paul instinctively weaves it in when he is quoting another passage. Thus, after all, the evidence of the Epistles as to the original meaning of Mt 5<sup>17</sup> is neutral, or at any rate not decisive.

Summary.—In Mt 5<sup>17</sup>, then, Christ claims either (a) to render a perfect obedience to law, or (b) to perfect the moral law-giving of the OT, or (c) to fulfil absolutely the moral of the OT generally, or (d) to be in general a fulfiller rather than a destroyer. (a) is not without evidence in its support (b) is perhaps most generally popular. (c) we are inclined to regard as due to the mistaken intrusion in Mt 5<sup>17</sup> of ['law and prophets,'—words doubtless used by Christ (of the OT as a whole?) in other connexions (d) was on the whole supported in the above discussion—if necessary, at the cost of including v. 17b as by rights an addition. (We have not discussed the possibility that there was no Sermon on the Mount in Christ's ministry at all).

Mt 5<sup>18</sup>. We have quoted with sympathy a suggestion that this verse ought to be struck out of the context of Mt 5. But there is no ground for denying that it represents one of the sayings of Jesus. We have Luke's 11, 16<sup>17</sup>, and, besides that, all three Synoptics have a similar phrase in the eschatological chapter. There the phrase is a word—'This generation shall not pass'—things be accomplished [γίνονται]. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away' (Mt 24<sup>34-35</sup> = Mk 13<sup>30-31</sup> = Lk 21<sup>32-33</sup>). This (as has often been pointed out) must surely be an alternative version of the logion Mt 5<sup>18</sup>. According to Mt 5, Christ spoke of the perpetuity of the Law, according to Mt 24, of the assured truth of His own words. We must note the presence of 3 corresponding clauses in each of the two passages: heaven and earth passing away—all things being fulfilled. Divine word not passing away. In Mt 5<sup>18</sup>, the elements jar against each other. The same sentence contains two limit—two clauses each beginning ὅτι ἀν. In that respect 21<sup>31-33</sup> shows to better advantage, and can advance the stronger claim to rank as the original. On the other hand, the verses in ch 24 are themselves exceedingly difficult. It is no mere blind conservatism which hesitates to believe that our Lord pledged His supernatural knowledge for the conclusion of the world's story within a generation. The words, as we have them, mean that and nothing else; and it is surely incredible that Jesus should have so erred. We do not deny that He may have expected the end shortly; there is at least a strong NT tradition, direct and indirect, that He did. We do say that He could not stake everything, with the very greatest emphasis, upon a date which besides was a mistaken date. B. W. Bacon's solution is attractive—that the original logion referred to the word of God, but not specifically either to the OT law or to the Master's own word of tradition insisted on one or the other.

5. 'Fulfillment' in general.—Some individual passages. (a) Lk 1<sup>1</sup> speaks of the things 'fulfilled' among us (πεπληροποιημένους); perf. particip. from a derivative of πληρόω, or at least of πλήρης). The connexion with v. 4—the certainty of the fulfilment—wherein, etc.—makes AV's rendering 'things most surely believed' (B. 1880) favours the sense 'things most surely believed'. Not, however, in the sense 'things most surely believed'. In these, the most classical verses from St. Luke's pen, we must look rather to classical models; and we should probably take 'fulfilled' as meaning 'fully accomplished.' So Holtzmann; or Adeney—'Luke will record complete transactions, a finished story.' Probably, therefore, there is nothing to be made of this passage. (b) In Lk 23<sup>27</sup> we read (RV), 'This which is written must be fulfilled (τελεσθῆναι) in me, And he was reckoned with transgressors; for that which concerneth me hath fulfilment' (τέλος ἔχει). Here there is room for difference of opinion. Holtzmann is respectful to the tradition of a valuable separate tradition of Luke's,—but doubts whether the individual verse is a genuine saying of the Lord's. And he takes it as an analogia merely (that death, or the end, is hurrying near; on the analogy of Mk 3<sup>26</sup>—Satan if divided against himself hath an end.' On the other hand, Adeney, like the Revisers (apparently), thinks that Divine fulfilment is pointed to here. It is an interesting possibility. We can hardly say more. (c) If the suggestion offered above—(d)—regarding Mt 5<sup>17b</sup> should be adopted—if that were originally a separate saying, at any rate, it was spoken quite early in the central Gospel passage on 'fulfilment' gives us a general point of view, in the Master's own words.

Any of these individual passages, if such an interpretation as we have discussed is warrantable, centres round the idea of the fulfilment of prophecy; though Mt 5<sup>17b</sup> would mean something broader or something profounder than what the letter of the NT generally attains to. It will be interesting if we can regard such broader and profounder teaching as coming directly from our Master.

Different senses of 'fulfilment' reviewed again. These do not to any great extent correspond to different Greek words. To fulfil joy is πληρόω (usually in the NT), complete joy, but (sometimes at least, in the NT), to give joy in its fullness. To fulfil a promise is usually a passive) is also πληρόω, but might be the kindred συμπληρῶναι, which is used even in NT in the less theological applications. The appointed time—whatever authority enacted it—is now full. To fulfil Scripture—or prophets' words, etc.—is indifferently πληρόω (or cognates, possibly once συμπληρῶναι, Lk 21<sup>22</sup> v. l.; and possibly, but not probably, once πληροφωρῶναι, Lk 1<sup>1</sup>; see above, 5), or τελέω (or cognate τελειῶναι; once τέλος ἔχειν); nor should we forget γίνονται in construction. To fulfil law in the Epistles is τελέω or πληρόω. In the Gospels we have πληρόω in kindred applications—once, 'to fulfil' and once, in the great passage, as 'to fulfil.' But to think, in a purely general sense, 'to fulfil.' But see above, 4. Cf. further in Epistles πληροφωρῶναι, 'to fulfil one's ministry,' 2 Ti 4<sup>5</sup>; 'fully to proclaim the' κήρυγμα, 2 Ti 4<sup>7</sup>.

Can we say 'fulfilment' leading senses? Probably not, probably not any two. They are, of course, connected, especially the first three. It is God who gives joy in fullness, God who ordains times, God who keeps His promise. At His own time His keeping fills His people with joy. Nay more; sense is also near of kin. Christ, the fulfiller of all promises, is also, on any view of particular passages, the supreme pattern of obedience, and the author of new obedience in others. But the word 'fulfil' probably does not occur on the same ground in any two of the senses discriminated above. There is, in some cases, an idea of fullness as against half fullness (of time, or of joy; two different fullnesses, therefore). In others (prophecy, or law) there is a mere idea of correspondence—fullness against emptiness, so to speak—the act answering to the word (but answering it in two different ways).

The central subject is imminent of prophecy. (It has also the most passages). Modern study of 'Prophecy and Fulfilment'—title of a book by von Hofmann—brings out a truth which (unless possibly adumbrated in our Lord's words, Mt 5<sup>17b</sup>) is nowhere formulated in Scripture. Fulfilment is not only like what prediction expected, but is also in some ways different, because the prophets' partial wisdom was not adequate to the full splendour of the fulfilment. Christ, in so far as He differs from the Messiah of the OT, is not lesser but greater; He necessarily differs. It is true, some elements of the fulfilment are transferred to Christian eschatology. As yet they are unfinished things. But if the First Advent differed (for the better) from the letter of expectation, we may infer that there are symbolical or metaphorical elements in the prophetic pictures of the Second Advent and eschatology. All this, while not formulated in the NT, is learned by believing study of the phenomena of Scripture, and is our age's proper contribution to the conception of fulfilment. The main lines of expectation fulfilled in Christ are perhaps three: (1) The hope of the Messianic King (Is 9 is the chief text; but not because of its 'fulfilment' in Christ, but because it did not stand very high), but from what we may call its dogmatic sharpness, and its prominence in the NT age. It lent the Christian Church its first creed—viz. that 'Jesus is Christ.' It was fulfilled only through the transference of Christ's royalty from temporal to exalted, or from present to future conditions. (2) There is the hope of God's own coming to His people in person, Is 40<sup>10</sup>—and throughout Is 40-55. This pointed strongly to Christ's Godhead. (3) There is the type or ideal of the Suffering Servant, included in Is 40-55 (also in Ps 22 and others), chiefly at Is 52<sup>12</sup>-53<sup>12</sup>. This teaching furnished Christian theology with its deepest elements. We can also now explain what amount of truth is conveyed by the idea of 'double fulfilments.' When the historical reference of a prophecy is to some lesser or earlier personage than Christ Jesus, yet if that person is important in the history of God's purpose, the same principle may be fulfilled partially in him which is (ultimately) more perfectly fulfilled in Christ. Thus we may have a multiple, a repeated fulfilment of great principles; yet the fulfilment in Christ as the grand or absolute do not affirm a greater. The He meant one event. But his words were capable of meaning many. And in his spiritual messages corresponds to Christ more than to Christ's forerunner. Again, individual or detailed fulfilments have their own subordinate Some indeed may be rather a play of than a serious argument. The OT is full of plays upon words; and the NT citations of 'I called my son out of Egypt,' and of 'He shall be called a Nazarene' (Mt 2<sup>23</sup>), are probably of this sort—things that carried more weight in Judaea long ago than they can possibly carry now. At times the resemblance to the OT is—innocently and unconsciously—filled out. The exact reproduction of Ps 22<sup>8</sup>, which we find at Mt 27<sup>43</sup>, is unknown to the earlier narrative of Mark. Where the matter is of some weight (e.g. probably the birth at Bethlehem), its chief importance is that it emphasizes or advertises the deeper analogies and correspondences in virtue of which Christ fulfils—and, may we say, transcends—the spirit or the religion of the OT; alike in Himself and in His gospel.

FULNESS (πλήρωμα).—The Gr. word is used in its natural, physical sense in Mt 9<sup>16</sup>, Mt 23<sup>17</sup>. It has a definite theological meaning in Jn 1<sup>16</sup> [the only place in the Gospels where it is tr. 'fulness']. In the Epistles it is used: of time, to denote the period that fills up a certain epoch (Eph 1<sup>10</sup>, Gal 4<sup>4</sup>; see FULNESS OF TIME); of persons, the full to make up a definite figure (Ro 11 to measure, to indicate the full capacity, the entire content (1 Co 10<sup>28</sup> 28, Ro 15<sup>28</sup>), also this may be said to be its meaning in Ro 13<sup>10</sup> where love is spoken of as the πλήρωμα νόμου. The word has also a definite theological meaning in Col 1<sup>19</sup> 29, Eph 1<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>. The central conception of the word, wherever used, seems to be completeness the totality of the things spoken of that which binds them into a symmetrical whole. Even when it is the late addition that is indicated as the πλήρωμα, the word refers back to the beginning, and signifies the completeness effected by the addition. Thus in the passages in St Matthew and St Mark which refer to the sewing of the new patch on the old garment, it is not the patch that is the πλήρωμα, it is the completeness that results from the patch; and, as Lightfoot correctly points out, the idea meant to be conveyed is the paradox that it is this very completeness which makes the garment incomplete. A false show of wholeness is worse than an open rent,—an idea entirely in accordance with the method of the teaching of Jesus.

The theological meaning of πλήρωμα in St. John's Gospel must be taken in connexion with its use in St. Paul's Epistles. Granted the authenticity of the Epistles and the Gospel, St. John must have written more than a quarter of a century later, and must have addressed practically the same circle as that which St. Paul had in view in writing to the Colossians and the Ephesians. It is clear that St. Paul is dealing with the word in a technical sense as a word which is familiar to his opponents, but is used by him in a sense different from theirs, and St. John's use of the term is exactly similar. The thought in the Gnostic the first germs referred to in the vigorous polemic of St. Paul. Gnosticism was further developed by Cerinthus, a contemporary of St. John, and reached its culmination in the fully elaborated system of Valentinus. The problem with which these Gnostic heresiarchs were continually wrestling was one that is as old as human thought—how to pass from the infinite to the finite, and reconcile absolute good with the existence of evil. The details of the earlier systems with which the Apostles had to deal are unknown to us, but in the speculations of Valentinus, as preserved in the writings of the especially the we have a system philosophical conceptions are clothed in Oriental imagery, and an attempt is made to give a consistent explanation of the mysteries of Creation, Sin, and Redemption

From the Absolute Being or the Abyssal Depth, there issued twin emanations, having each a relative being in itself, but each pair, as they receded from the primal source of existence, had fainter traces of the pure Divine spirit. These emanations are he Divine attributes, and in their totality Godhead. Opposed to the the realm of matter and n. the realm of reality the realm of archetypal ideas and the objects with a moral significance imparted into it In the the thirty Aëons of the their material counterpart, provided over by the Creator, who has no to the spiritual realm. This world of chaos and ancient night receives from the πλήρωμα a spiritual principle, reducing it to a semblance of order, in the person of Sophia Achaomoth, an emanation from the Sophia of the spiritual realm. The higher Sophia, the latest of the Aëons and the furthest removed from the Absolute, had been the Primal Glory, and to another Aeon in essence but out of her essence to spiritual principle who had in them the Aëons contri- to fit Him for His man Jesus, and through Him effected the redemption of those spiritual beings who were involved in the lower realm of matter, but who had received quickening through the infusion of the spiritual principle into the

What degree of elaboration this fantastic theory had reached in the age of St. Paul, and still later in that of St. John, there is not now material to decide; but there are distinct traces of it in the Epistle to the Colossians in the reference to principalities, dominions, and powers (Col 1<sup>16</sup>); and we know that Cerinthus, a contemporary of St. John, thought out the religious problem on very similar lines, and used the word pleroma in a similar sense. We are to regard the use of the term, then, by the two Apostles as an assertion of the true doctrine of the pleroma as against a false doctrine which had wide currency. In the Logos, who became incarnate in Jesus Christ, the whole pleroma of the Godhead is contained. Jesus was not the last of the Aëons, created as an afterthought. He is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all created beings (Col 1<sup>15</sup>). The long chain of mediators between God and man to the realm of myth, and the one ὁ ἀρχηγός, full of grace and truth (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>), whom alone God effects His purposes in and Redemption, is held up for the adoration of all men. And this fulness of the Divine, which is in Him through the closeness of His contact with God, is imparted to His disciples (Jn 1<sup>16</sup>) and to the Church which is His Body, and is the fulness of Him who filleth.

The Church is here regarded as the complement of Jesus. The Head and the Body make one whole—the pleroma of the Godhead, the full realization of the Divine purpose which centres in the redemption of man. For through this Church, which on earth possesses the potentiality of the pleroma, by means of its varied ministries, the fulness which is in Christ the Head passes to the individual, whose destiny it is to attain to the perfect man, to the possession, in his degree, of the entire pleroma of the Godhead.

It is scarcely sufficiently recognized that the NT doctrine of the Church is a philosophy of the Social Organism which embraces all essential human activities (Eph 4<sup>15-16</sup>). Our difficulty in understanding it lies mainly in this, that the Christian life is the temporal in the light of the eternal, and constantly confusing the boundary between the actual and the ideal, the process from the consummation.

I have seen this in the Glossans; Church also Hastings' D.

FULNESS OF THE TIME (τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου).

—An expression used by St. Paul (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>) to mark the opportuneness of the coming of Christ into the world, and the ripeness of the age for the great religious revolution He was to effect. It emphasizes the unique significance of the period as the culmination of a long course of event, by which the way had been providentially prepared for Christ's appearance, and His bringing into of a purer type of religion. The evidences of such a providential preparation are indeed remarkable. Along different lines of historical development a situation had been created at the very centre of the world's life, that was singularly favourable to the rise and spread of a loftier faith. The result were: (1) the Jewish people had reached; (2) the dissemination of the Greek language, culture, and commercial activity; and (3) the influence of Rome.

1. The peculiar condition of the Jewish mind—Centuries of chequered discipline had formed the Jewish mind the belief in one true and perfectly righteous God, and subsequently to the return from the Exile there had been no relapse into idolatry. Latterly, indeed, through the influence of the scribes and Pharisees, legalism and formality had crept in, and the externalization of religion had been carried far; yet in many classes of society there was a wistful straining after inner purity and a more living fellowship with God; and in spite of the soulless bondage of ceremonial observances, there was an amount of deep and reverent piety that kept the nation's heart sounder than might appear on the surface. At all events, nowhere else in the world did there exist so vivid a conception of the Divine holiness or so high a recognized standard of morality; nowhere else therefore, were there so many devout minds ready to receive a new spiritual revelation, or so well fitted to furnish heralds and apostles for its propagation.

Then there was the revival of the Messianic hope, which, kept alive by the pressure of repeated misfortunes, had, under the Roman domination, attained an intensity. The political situation was galling, and the Jewish people, pining to be free from the foreign yoke, consoled themselves with the thought of a glorious future. It was a time of high-strung unrest and expectancy; yet although the prospect of political emancipation was to a large extent entertained, there were multitudes of earnest souls yearning for a higher form of deliverance, the dawn of a reign of righteousness and peace, in the benefits of which not Israel only, but the whole world, should share.

Outside Palestine, again, the influence of Jewish religious ideas had been widely extended by means of the Dispersion. Conscious of being raised above the manifold forms of heathen superstition around them, the colonies of Jews settled in the trading cities of foreign lands felt themselves impelled to aspire after a certain elevation of life; while the loftier moral teaching they maintained in their synagogues attracted considerable numbers of proselytes from paganism. Thus the conception of the Divine unity and righteousness was being spread over a large section of the heathen world. So far, therefore, both at home and abroad the Jewish people had fulfilled their mission in the moral and religious preparation of the world for the entrance of Christ.

2. The dissemination of the Greek language, culture, and commercial activity.—Ever since the conquests of Alexander the Great, the Greek tongue had attained supremacy among the civilized nations, and had become the current medium for the exchange of thought. Even the OT had to be rendered into Greek, in the translation known as the Septuagint. Moreover, Greek learning, literature, and speculation exercised a pervasive influence far and near. A significant indication of this is to be found in the rise among the Jews of the Dispersion of a school of thinkers who had imbibed the Greek culture, and who, quickened by the intellectual alertness of the Greek mind, were drawn to take part in the literary productivity of the age. The aim of this Greco-Jewish school was to make the purer religious faith and knowledge of Israel accessible to the world. With its chief seat at Alexandria, its leading representatives, such as Aristobulus and Philo, endeavoured to show that the Mosaic law, correctly understood, contained all that the best Greek philosophy had taught. Thus was brought about a mutual action and reaction of Jewish and Greek ideas, and a soil was being made ready for a more elevated spiritual teaching, based on the unity of the Godhead and the eternal obligation of righteousness.

At the same time the commercial enterprise of the Greeks was rapidly overcoming national exclusiveness, and producing a freer intercourse between men of different races. They were the cosmopolitans of the age, open-minded, eager to enter into all vivid interests; and in the East, in Asia Minor and along the coast, they fostered the commerce and helped to secure full scope for all forms of belief.

But while thus stimulating intellectual receptiveness everywhere, the most important contribution of the Greeks in the preparation for Christianity was the universal prevalence they gained for their rich and expressive language, inasmuch as by this they supplied a common vehicle of intercourse, calculated to be of immense advantage in the announcement and promulgation of the Christian Evangel.

3. The unifying influence of Rome.—That the entire known world was then embraced within Rome's imperial sway was a momentous factor in the situation which had been reached. As the barriers of language had been demolished through the influence of the Greeks, so through the influence of the Romans the barriers of nationality had been broken down. The whole world was but one country; and from the Euphrates to the Atlantic there was settled government, order, and the rule of law under one sovereign sceptre. In the lull of national strifes which had thus come—the pax Romana—merchant and traveller moved safely from land to land, and by the splendid system of roads for which the Roman Empire was famed, the lines of communication were opened in all directions. In this way Rome had performed its distinctive part by bringing about a political condition of the world hitherto unexampled in history.

Thus the three great races of antiquity had contributed their share towards the fulfilment of a manifestly providential design, and the period had now arrived when their several lines of historical development converged to a meeting-point, producing a combination of circumstances which rendered issues of vast moment possible. As it has been aptly put, 'the City of God is built at the confluence of three civilizations' (Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, 1. 2).

It is worthy of note also that the little country of Palestine, where the Founder of Christianity was to appear, lay at the very centre of the then known world; and in view of the fact that through the provision of _____ and free means of movement and intercourse the avenues of access were opened to every land, it becomes clear that the most signal facilities were afforded for the dissemination of a faith that was destined to wield a world-wide power.

In addition to this, account has to be taken of the decay of the old pagan religions, and the simultaneous influx of Oriental ideas. There was a strange intermingling of races and also of religious beliefs, with the result that men's minds were unsettled, and a spirit of inquiry was awakened among those who had grown dissatisfied with the popular heathen cults.

Manifestly the age was ripe for a new revelation that would meet the deepest needs of the human soul, and in the situation created by the course of Jewish, Greek, and Roman history, the way for it had at length been prepared. Then Jesus Christ appeared. The 'fulness of the time' had come for the advent of the _____ Saviour with His Gospel of life and _____ to the regeneration of mankind.

GABBATHA (Γαββαθᾶ) occurs only in Jn 19<sup>13</sup>, as the 'Hebrew' or, more correctly, Aramaic equivalent of Ἀββαθρῳος. For the etymology of the word see E. Nestle in Hastings' DB n. 74 f., with the literature there cited. The word is apparently connected with a root גבב, of which the fundamental idea is that of something curved or convex. Hence it cannot be taken as identical in meaning with Ἀββαθρῳος, which implies a level tessellated surface. A surface of that kind on the summit of a hill, or with a rounded porch or an open cupola over it, beneath which might permanently stand, or be placed occasionally, the βῆμα or 'judgment-seat,' would best meet the conditions of _____ Such a spot might well be known amongst one class of the people (the Romans and their associates) as the Pavement, and amongst another as Gabbatha. The latter name has not yet been found elsewhere than in the NT. For the attempts to identify the locality, and for the usages involved in the reference, see PAVEMENT.

R. W. MOSS.

GABRIEL is mentioned in Lk 1 as appearing to Zacharias to announce the future pregnancy of Elisabeth and the birth of John, and to Mary with a similar announcement of the birth of Jesus. To Zacharias he declares that he is wont to stand in the presence of God, and that he is sent by Him on the mission stated. When he is asked for a sign, he is competent to impose the severe sign of dumbness until the fulfilment of the prediction that has been made. The Gospel mention of Gabriel, then, is as a messenger of the signal favour of God, at least in connexion with the Messiah and His forerunner.

He has a somewhat similar function in the only OT passage in which he is mentioned, Dan 8. Daniel was perplexed at the strange vision which he had seen. Pondering over it, he sees one 'standing before him like the appearance of a man,' and a voice is heard bidding Gabriel, for it is he, explain the vision. Daniel falls in a faint as the messenger approaches, and Gabriel lifts him up and explains the mysterious vision. Again he appears to the prophet under a similar guise, and is now called 'the man' (Dan 9. 21, 23). Daniel has a similar experience (10<sup>5a</sup>). The details are identical or in harmony with the account in previous chapters, but the name of the messenger is not given. This is very generally assumed that the prophet had Gabriel in mind. _____ over the interests of _____ over other nations.

Gabriel belongs to the creations of the imagination of the Jews in post-exilic times. When God had to them become universal and correspondingly great and glorious, but without parallel spiritualization of His attributes, He was thought to require agents whom He might send as messengers, 'angels' to transmit His messages. These angels were at first nameless, later they received names. Gabriel was one of the most important of them—one of four, of seven, of seventy, according to different enumerations in Jewish writings. See Jewish Encyc. s.v. O. H. GATES.

GADARA, GADARENES.—In the AV in Mk 5<sup>1</sup> and Lk 8<sup>26</sup> Jesus is said to have come into the 'country of the Gadarenes.' In the RV this is corrected to 'Gerasenes.' On the other hand, the AV in Mt 8<sup>28</sup> has 'country of the Gergesenes,' while the RV has 'Gadarenes.' These are the only passages—all referring to the cure of the demoniac and the destruction of the herd of swine—where Gadara is mentioned in Scripture. How the reading Γαδαρῶν crept in, or, if original, what exactly it meant, we may not be able to explain satisfactorily, but one thing is certain,—the miracle cannot have taken place at the city of Gadara, the modern Umm Keis. For that town stands on a high plateau on the further side of the wide and extremely steep gorge of the Hieromax river, and is about a 3 hours' ride distant from the Lake. As Thomson says (LB ii. p. 354), 'If the miracle was performed at Gadara, then the swine must have run down the mountain for an hour, forded the deep Jarmuk (Hieromax), ascended its northern bank, and raced across the level plain several miles before they could reach the nearest margin of the lake—a feat which no herd of swine would be likely to achieve even though they were "possessed."' In short, no one who has seen the position of Gadara would ever dream of locating the miracle there. See GERASENES.

J. SOUTAR.

GAIN.—The word 'gain' occurs ten times in the AV of the Gospels, and on every occasion in one of the sayings of our Lord. These passages fall into three classes: (1) The parallel records of a saying of our Lord, all the Synoptists (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>, Lk 9<sup>25</sup>, Mk 8<sup>36</sup>); (2) the parables of the Talents and the Pounds (Mt 25<sup>17, 20, 22</sup>, Lk 19<sup>15, 16, 18</sup>); (3) the single record of the saying in Mt 13<sup>15</sup>. It is (with the exception of St. Luke's use of διαπραγματεύομαι, προσεργάζομαι, and ποιέω in the parable of the Pounds) always a translation of κερδαίνω. This verb and its cognate substantive κέρδος are used elsewhere in the NT by St. Paul (1 Co 9<sup>19, 20, 21, 22</sup>, Ph 1<sup>21, 37, 8</sup>, Tit 1<sup>11</sup>), St. Peter (1 P 3<sup>1</sup>), and St. Luke (Ac 27<sup>21</sup>), a peculiar use, but not without classical parallels).

1. Mt 16<sup>26</sup> (||; cf. Ph 3<sup>7</sup> and 1<sup>21</sup>) contrasts gain and loss as they touch the direct personal relation of the soul to God. A man may count the world a thing to be gained, and give his soul as the price of it; or, with the wiser Apostle, may reckon communion with Christ a gain worth the sacrifice of all else; or, rising to the vision of the greater life, may look for the supreme gain, something better even than living here in Christ, to the life beyond the grave. This is the mystic's conception of religion—'I and God are alone in the world.' All gain apart from union with the Divine is really loss; and loss, or what seems loss, incurred in achieving that union is gain. 'Qui invenit Jesum,' says Thomas à Kempis, 'invenit thesaurum bonum; immo bonum, super omne bonum.' The thought finds its simplest and at the same time its fullest expression in the parables of the Hidden Treasure and the Pearl of Great Price, whose finder sells 'with joy' all that he has, to buy what he has discovered.

2. The parables of the Talents and the Pounds express the gain to character which comes of faithful use of powers and abilities. The thought is of the realization of the possibilities that are in man and the fitness of his work. Here the gain lies less on the side of the man than on diligence and faithfulness. This is a common conception of the meaning of the Christian religion. In it life is not a period of aspiration for an unutterable beatitude, but a time of training, in expectation of the gain of the Master's praise and ultimate ability to do more and greater work for Him.

3. Mt 13<sup>15</sup>, with which must be connected 1 Co 9<sup>19</sup>, speaks of the gain of winning other souls for Christ. Here there is the need of sacrifice, the sacrifice of pride, of social and racial prejudice; and there is also the need of faithfulness and diligence. This is the missionary's conception of Christianity. We find it in St. Paul and in all those after him who have felt the necessity laid on them, 'Woe is me if I preach not the gospel.' The joy of this gain is anticipated in Dn 12<sup>1</sup> (cf. Ja 5<sup>18, 20</sup>). Its greatness is most fully known when we realize that we share it with God Himself and His angels (Lk 15<sup>6, 9, 22ff.</sup>).

In all three classes of passages the language is that of the market-place where men get gain by trading or labouring; but it is immensely sublimated and purified of all selfishness and greed.

GALILEEAN (Γαλιλαῖος)—Twice Jesus is mentioned as a Galileean: once by a maid-servant (Mt 26<sup>69</sup>); once when Pilate was anxious to transfer the trial of Jesus from his own to Herod's court (Lk 23<sup>6</sup>). It was during the trial of Jesus also that Peter was named as a Galileean by the bystanders (Mt 26<sup>70</sup>, Lk 22<sup>69</sup>; see GALILEE, § 7). In Jn 4<sup>45</sup> we read that Galileans, who had been at Jerusalem and had seen the works of Jesus there, received Him on that account in their own land. In Lk 13<sup>1</sup> we are told of Pilate's (evidently recent) punishment of some Galileans, whom he had slain even while they were in the temple.

This event cannot be identified with any revolt mentioned in history. Some suppose Barabbas to have been arrested in connexion therewith; some would associate it with the revolt of Judas of Galilee (Jos. BJ II. viii. 1), but this took place, according to Ac 5<sup>37</sup>, more than twenty years before. Probably it refers to some small outbreak, severely punished by Pilate as usual (cf. Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, 37).

For characteristics of Galileans see GALILEE, § 7, 'People'.

G. W. THATCHER.

GALILEE.—1. Name.—The English form of the name 'Galilee' is derived from the Hebrew גליל (Galil), Aram. ܓܠܝܠ (Gālīla or Gālīlā), through Gr. Γαλιλαία and Lat. Galilæa. The Heb. word denotes simply a 'circuit' or 'district', and in Is 9<sup>1</sup> Galilee is called 'Galilee (RVm 'the district') of the nations,' and in 1 Mac 5<sup>15</sup> Γαλιλαία ἀλλοφύλων ('Galilee of the strangers'). In other passages of the OT it is simply called 'the district.'

2. History.—When the Hebrew invasion of Palestine took place, the main part of Galilee was allotted to Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali. According to Jg 1<sup>30-33</sup>, Zebulun was not successful in driving out the inhabitants of their portion, while Asher and Naphtali had to be content to settle as best they could among the inhabitants, 'for they did not drive them out.' These inhabitants seem to have been Amorites and Hivites from the Lebanon. An account of one (or two) of the battles fought in this country is found in Jg 4-5. In the days of the Monarchy, Galilee always suffered in the Syrian wars. It was ravaged by Ben-hadad (1 K 15<sup>20</sup>), probably won back by Ahab, taken again by the Aramæans under Hazael (2 K 12<sup>18, 13</sup>), and recovered by Jeroboam II. It was also on the high-road of the Assyrian invasion, and was won for Assyria by Sargon II. in 734 (2 K 15<sup>29</sup>), many of its inhabitants being carried into captivity. From this time up to the end of the 2nd cent. B.C. the population was heathen, with a small number of Jewish settlers, who attached themselves to Jerusalem after the return from the Exile. About the year 164, Simon the brother of Judas Maccabæus pursued the Syrians to Ptolemais, and on his way back brought the Galileean Jews and their property to Judæa (1 Mac 5<sup>21-23</sup>). Some 60 years later the whole state of affairs in Galilee was changed. According to Strabo, on the authority of Timagenes (Jos. Ant. XIII. xi 3), Aristobulus (B.C. 104-103) conquered much of Galilee, and compelled the inhabitants to be circumcised and live according to Jewish laws. This work had probably been already begun by John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135-105). Herod at his death bequeathed Galilee to Herod Antipas, who succeeded after much opposition in having his legacy confirmed at Rome.

3. Extent—The amount of territory covered by the name 'Galilee' varied in different times. Originally it comprised the hilly and mountainous country to the north of the Plain of Esdraelon or the smaller plain of el-Buttauf. The boundaries were probably not well defined, but on the north it included Kedesh (Jos 20<sup>7</sup> 21<sup>42</sup>). It was later spoken of in two divisions—Upper and Lower Galilee (cf. Jth 1<sup>8</sup>, 1 Mac 12<sup>49</sup>), and in the Mishna is divided into three parts, these corresponding to the natural divisions of plain, hill-country, and mountain.

The boundaries of Galilee at the time of Christ are thus given by Josephus

'Now Phoenice and Syria surround the two Galilees, which are called Galilee. They are bounded on the W. by the Orontes, the territory belonging to Ptolemais, and by Carmel, which mountain of old belonged to the Galileans, but now to the Tyrians, and next it is Gaba (Jebāta), which is called "the city of horsemen," because those horsemen that were dismissed by Herod the king dwelt therein, they are bounded on the S. by Samaria and as far as the streams of the Jordan, on the E. by the district of Hippos, Susiyeh, and Gadara (the district of Gadara, Umm Kaus), and also by Gaulanitis (Jaulān) and the borders of the kingdom of Agrippa, and their N. parts are bounded by Tyre, and the country of the Tyrians. As for what is called Lower Galilee, and Ptolemais, Tiberias to Chabulon (Kābul), the coast, and its breadth is from the village called Alatā (Alatā), which lies in the great plain, to Bersabee, from which beginning the breadth of Upper Galilee is also taken to the Beit, which divides the land of the Tyrians from Galilee. It is also from Meloth (Meuon) to Thella (probably Tell Thala), a village near the Jordan' (BJ III iii. 1).

4.—The southernmost division of Galilee was Esdraelon (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 379). It consists of (1) the triangular plain about 200 feet above sea-level, 29 miles long from the foot of Carmel to Jenin, 15 from Jenin to Tabor, and 15 from Tabor to the foot of Carmel; (2) the valley of Jezreel (Nahr Jalūd), running down for 12 miles from Jezreel to Bethshean, some 400 feet below sea-level. The Plain of Esdraelon is watered by the Kishon flowing to the Mediterranean; but, as the edges are somewhat higher than the centre, it is often marshy. It plays a great part in the history of Palestine (cf. Hist. p. 391 ff.), but has no mention in the story of the Gospels.

On the other hand, the middle division of Galilee, known as Lower Galilee, contains nearly all the important sites of the Gospel record. Nazareth, Cana, Shunem, Nain, Cana, etc., are within its borders. It is bounded on the W. by the Plain of Ptolemais, on the S. by the Plains of Esdraelon and Jezreel, on the E. by the Sea of Galilee (though sometimes a part of the country east of the sea was considered Galilean), and on the N. by a line passing from the N. end of the Sea of Galilee through Ramah to the coast. It consists of four chains of hills running east and west, intercepted by valleys and plains. The hills reach a height of about 1200 feet. The southern chain consists of the Nazareth hills, with Mt. Tabor; the next range contains the Karn Hattin of Crusading fame; the third, the city of Jotapāta; while the fourth consists of the southern slopes of the mountains of Upper Galilee. The central plain of el-Buttauf is about 500 feet above sea-level, while the coast of the Sea of Galilee is nearly 700 feet below sea-level. The whole country is well watered by streams flowing east or west, and was extremely fertile. The grass of the plains was green, and evergreen oaks grew on the hills. The cornfields gave a plentiful harvest, and pomegranates abounded.

Upper Galilee ranged from the N. boundary of Lower Galilee to the Tyrian boundary, which seems to have been at the time of Christ just south of Kedesh, which according to Josephus was a Tyrian fortress on the borders of Galilee (Ant. XIII. v. 6; BJ II xviii 1, IV. ii. 3). It is a land of mountains, where the hills run from 2000 to 4000 feet in height. It too was a fertile land, with thick woods, sycamores, olives, vines, and green pastures by its waters.

5. Roads—'Judæa was on the road to nowhere; Galilee is covered with roads to everywhere' (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 425). Roads in the East even now are often mere tracks, scarcely recognizable by the Western. They are repaired for great occasions, and soon allowed to fall again into their natural condition. Remains of pavements, however, show that at the time of Christ the Roman genius for road-making was at work in the district of Galilee. It was this the case on the great high-road the 'Way of the Sea,' as it was called in the Middle Ages (from an interpretation of Is 9<sup>1</sup>), which crossed the middle of Lower Galilee. The eastern termini of the main roads were the two el-Buttauf crossed the Jordan. These were the el-Buttauf half-way between Merom and the el-Buttauf, now called the 'Bridge of Jacob's Daughters.' To this came the road from Damascus and the intervening country. Westward from the river the road ran by Safed and Ramah to Ptolemais. From this a branch struck off a few miles west of the river, passed by Arbela (Irūd), and rejoined the high-road near Ramah. Another branch went southwards to the west coast of the Sea of Galilee at Kābul, and proceeded to Bethshean, where it joined the road from (2) the bridge a few miles south of the Sea of Galilee, now called the Jisr el-Mugāma. Over this bridge came the traffic from Arabia and Gilead. From it one road passed through Bethshean, the Valley of Jezreel, and the Plain of Esdraelon, to the coast of the Mediterranean, and so on to Egypt; another by Cana and Sepphoris to Ptolemais. The main road from the shore of the Sea of Galilee to the highlands went by the Wady el-Hammām past Arbela, then between Tabor and the Nazareth hills to Esdraelon. Along these and many other roads flowed a ceaseless stream of traffic, and the fulness of their life is reflected in the parables of Christ (cf. Encyc. Bibl. iv. 5191; HGHL p. 430 f.).

6. Government.—Galilee was a part of the Roman Empire; that is, in the days of Christ it was under the emperors Augustus and Tiberius. Roman garrisons were in towns all round the country. Roman influence was felt everywhere. But the mass of the people had little or nothing to do with the Roman Empire directly. The direct government of the land was in the hands of Herod Antipas, to whom, with the title of 'tetrarch,' it was assigned by Augustus after the death of Herod Antipas was 17 years old at his accession to power, and established his capital at Sepphoris. About the year 22, however, he built a new city on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, named it Tiberias in honour of the emperor, and made it his capital. This city was governed after the Greek model by a council of 600, with an Archon and other officers. In these two cities was centred the chief legal administration of affairs in Galilee during the life of Christ. But in Galilee, as elsewhere, the chief details of life were regulated by the Jews' own religious laws rather than by ordinary civil enactments. The chief authority was the Sanhedrin (see SANHEDRIN) at Jerusalem, to which appeals could be made when local doctors differed. The chief local difficulties were usually satisfied by the decisions of local councils (cf. Mt 10<sup>17</sup>), probably associated more or less closely with the local synagogues (see SYNAGOGUE).

7. People.—Galilee was a populous country. 'The cities lie very thick, and the very many villages are everywhere so populous from the richness of the soil, that the very least of them contains more than fifteen thousand inhabitants' (Jos. BJ III. iii. 2). In another place Josephus says there were 240 cities and villages in Galilee (Life, 45), and that many of these had strong walls. From each of these to the others must have been a network of tracks and roads in addition to the main roads (see above), and the land was a scene of constant activity. The life of the hills and the activity of everyday life was a people of energy and vigour. 'The Galilaeans are inured to war from their youth, and have been always very numerous; nor has their country ever been destitute of men of courage' (Jos. BJ III. iii. 2). Regarded with a certain amount of patronizing contempt by the pre-biblical and more strictly theologically-minded Jews of Jerusalem and its vicinity, they still had a strong sense of their own zeal. This zeal was shown in their pilgrimages to Jerusalem, which made a greater impression on their active minds than on those who were more familiar with the life of the Holy City. At any apparent insult to their religion they were ready to break out in revolt. Before, during, and after the life of Jesus, Galilaean leaders arose and flew to arms in the vain attempt to secure religious autonomy. Yet they differed in many respects from their Judaeian brothers. The very technical terms of the market and the details of their religious customs varied from those of the South (cf. Schürer, HJP II. i. 4). Their knowledge of the Aramaic language had been their own (Mt 26<sup>7</sup>), one of these being the guttural sounds. Besides, however, the natural bodily vigour and mental freshness of these highlanders, the most important difference between them and the people of Judaea lay in the different attitude in daily life towards the world of the Roman Empire and Hellenistic culture. Knowledge of, at any rate spoken, Greek was to them a necessity of business, and no attempt could be made, as in Jerusalem, to avoid the study of it (cf. Mt 23<sup>17</sup>). They must have been, like Matthew, in Government employ. All were brought into daily contact with Greek and Roman modes of life and thought. It was to this people of larger experience of life and broader ways of thought that Jesus appealed in the greater part of His teaching, and from it that He chose the men who were first to make His message known to the world. #### GALL (χολή, fel).—

It thus appears that χολή was used of any bitter drug, and there is therefore no discrepancy between Mt 27<sup>34</sup> οἶνον [ὄξος] a copyist's assimilation to Ps 69<sup>21</sup> μετὰ χολῆς μεμιγμένον, and Mk 15<sup>23</sup> ἐσποτισμένον οἶνον. The potion administered to the crucifixion (see CRUCIFIXION) was composed of wine and a variety of drugs—frankincense, laudanum, myrrh, resin, saffron, mastich. Thus 'wine mixed with gall' and 'myrrhed wine' are equivalent phrases, signifying generally medicated wine (cf. Swete, St. Mark, ad loc.). Mt 27<sup>34</sup> and Ac 8<sup>33</sup> are the only places in the NT where χολή occurs.

GAMES.—In the Gospels there are none of the analogies from the Hellenic games which are frequently drawn in the Acts and the Epistles. Thus variety in the range of illustration is traced without difficulty to the different interests of the readers or hearers. The Hebrews, unlike the Greeks and Romans, gave little attention to games. The climate of their land may help to account for this, but the chief reason must be found in their view of life, which made it impossible for them to look upon games with the eye of the Greek. Where the Greek had his Isthmian games, the Hebrew had his Passover, or other solemn festival. The introduction of a gymnasium by Jason (2 Mac 4<sup>7-10</sup>) was accounted an act of disloyalty to the faith of his fathers, and a surrender to Hellenic influences. He was accused of neglecting the altar for the palaestra. Herod is said by Josephus (Ant. xv. viii. 1) to have instituted solemn games in honour of Caesar; but such practices never won the approval of the Rabbis, or of the nation as a whole. Jesus preached to a people who knew little of the games of the Greeks, and who had been taught to hate what they knew. But in Galilee the children played their immemorial games.

'A wedding or a festival,
A mourning or a funeral,

(WORDSWORTH, Ode on Immortality).

From such play Jesus drew a description of the 'musicians' which had listened to John the Baptist and Himself (Mt 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 7<sup>32</sup>). Two groups are playing in the market-place: the musicians are divided from the others. They pipe, but the children will not play; they suggest 'funerals,' but their comrades sulkily refuse to join. The parable is a vivid picture of the fickleness, sulkeness, and self-will of the contemporaries of Jesus. It is not necessary to read into the parable a condemnation of those who should have outgrown childish things but are still playing at life. The 'musicians' have been likened by some to Jesus and John the Baptist by others to the people (see a discussion by Stalker in Expositor, 4th series, vol. vii. p. 29).

The soldiers probably played with dice when they cast lots for the garments of Jesus (Mt 27<sup>35</sup>); and they may have been playing a game when they said to Jesus, 'Prophecy unto us, thou Christ; who is he that struck thee?' (26<sup>68</sup>).

Jesus did not deal with the problems which arise in modern society from the growth of games in the scheme of life. As the Hellenic games, He did not discuss the Rabbinical attitude to the Hellenic games; nor do the Apostolic writers hint of danger to Christian converts from the contests. The ethical questions must be decided by an appeal to the interpretation of life in the Gospels, and especially to the estimate given by Jesus of the true relation between body and spirit. It is clear that to Him the body was not an end in itself (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>), but must become the docile servant of the soul (18<sup>8</sup>), even at the cost of severe discipline. Games will be approved where they give bodily effectiveness, that it may be the 'earthly support' of the endurance of the spirit. They will be condemned if they lead to a neglect of the serious interests of life (6<sup>33</sup>), or of the duty owed to others. The Christian ideal of a life temperate and just does not include a life whose first interest is amusement, or one in which 'distraction' is necessary to prevent ennui (see Dörner, Christian Ethics, Eng. tr. p. 458).

GARDEN (κήπος)—In its most precise application the term refers to a level piece of ground enclosed by a wall or hedge, in which plants, shrubs, and trees are cultivated by irrigation. Its area, ranging from a small plot beside the house to the dimensions of a park, is limited only by the supply of water. While not excluding the idea of garden familiar in the West, its meaning in general is often nearer to that of our nursery-garden and orchard. In the irrigated garden, vines, fig, walnut, pomegranate, lemon, and other trees are grown for the sake of ornament, shade, and fruit. In the Gospels mention is made of mint, anise, and cummin (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>) as the cheap and common garden produce that occupied the laboured scrupulosity of the scribes and Pharisees, to the neglect of more important matters.

The fact of its being artificially and continually watered, distinguishes the garden proper from the ordinary grain field, the vineyard, and the plantation of olive or fig trees. The necessity, however, of having a protecting wall for fruit trees gives also to such an enclosure in a more general sense the name and character of a garden. These may be resorted to and passed through without objection except during summer and autumn, when the fruit is ripening. Such may have been the garden of Gethsemane, to which Christ retired with His disciples (Jn 18<sup>1-2</sup>). In the garden containing the tomb in which Christ's body was laid, Mary's expectation of meeting with the gardener or caretaker (Jn 20<sup>15</sup>) at the time of Easter would rather point to the more careful cultivation of the irrigated garden.

To the Oriental the garden is a place of retirement and rest. Its sound of falling or running water is one of the luxuries of life. Its shade affords escape from the glare of the sun, and its recognized privacy forbids the introduction at the close of the day of disturbing news, exacting claims, or perplexing decisions. The voice of nature seems to say, 'I will give you rest.' It has thus become a symbol of Heaven, and supplies a common term of immortal hope to the three great monotheistic religions, inasmuch as the Christian 'Paradise' is the equivalent of the Jewish Gan Eden, 'Garden of Eden,' and the Moslem al-Gannat, 'the Garden.'

GARNER.—See BARN.

GATE.—The gate of a city, like the entrance to a tent and the door of a house, was a place of special importance, and its original use gave rise to various associated meanings.

1. Military and protective.—As the weakest place in a walled city, it was the chief point of attack and defence. Its strength was the strength of the city (Gn 22<sup>7</sup>, Jg 5<sup>8</sup>, Ps 24<sup>12</sup>, 1 Ch 11<sup>14</sup>). It had a place of outlook over the entrance, from which those approaching could be seen, and intimation given as to their admittance. This was evidently a development of the watch kept at the door of the tabernacle (Jn 10<sup>1-3</sup>). The gates of the city were closed at night, hence in the vision of the city where there is no night they remain unclosed (Rev 21<sup>25</sup>). In the charge to Peter, where the gates of Hades are said to be unable to prevail against the Church of Christ, the original meaning of defensive strength seems to pass into that of aggressive force (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>).

2. Judicial and commercial.—The settlement of matters affecting contested right, transfer of property and internal administration, were attended to at the open space or covered recess behind the gate (Gn 23<sup>10</sup>, Dt 25<sup>7</sup>, Am 5<sup>12</sup>). The litigant was urged to come to terms with the adversary 'in the way' before the gate was reached, for there the judge sat, and behind him were the officer, the prison, and the official exactors (Mt 5<sup>25-26</sup>). In times of industrial peace, the protective challenge became a fiscal inspection, and there the tax-collector sat at the receipt of custom (Mt 9<sup>9</sup>).

3. Figurative and religious.—While the gates or doors of public buildings within the city might be lavishly ornamented (Is 54<sup>12</sup>, Rev 21<sup>21</sup>; Jos BJ v. 3, VI v. 3), the gate of brass was the standard of external protection. The larger and more important the city, the more imposing would be its public gate. The Oriental name for the Ottoman Empire is the High Gate, or Sublime Porte. Christ's allusion to the broad gate that led only to darkness and destruction, and the gate that, though narrow, conducted into a broad place capable of accommodating visitors from all lands (Mt 7<sup>13-14</sup>, Lk 13<sup>24-25</sup>), was in keeping with His other statements as to the startling difference between His Kingdom and the Empire conception of the world.

City gates, as well as those at the entrance to gardens and to the open courts around houses, frequently have a small inserted door from two to three feet square by which an individual may be admitted. It has sometimes been thought that this was referred to when Christ spoke of a camel passing through the eye of a needle (Mt 19<sup>24</sup>), but there is nothing either in the sense of the word or in Eastern custom to support such a CAMEL.

Gates had names, indicating the localities to which they belonged or into which they led (Gn 28<sup>19</sup>, Num. 3, 1<sup>2</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Is 38<sup>10</sup>, Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), or bore some characteristic of the door itself (Ac 3<sup>7</sup>). In the prophetic picture of Zion restored and comforted, the gates were to be called 'Praise,' and those which John saw in the New Jerusalem bore on their fronts the names of the 'twelve tribes of the children of Israel' (Rev 21<sup>12</sup>).

For meanings of the word with the entrance to tents, see G. M. MACKIE.

GEHENNA.—The Heb. name Hinnom is generally used in the OT by the word Gē, 'valley' (Jos 15<sup>7</sup>, Ge-hinnom, or 'Valley of Hinnom,' whence the NT word γέεννα, which is translated in both the AV and RV 'hell' (Mt 5<sup>22</sup>, 29, 30, 10<sup>28</sup>, 13<sup>29</sup>, 23<sup>33</sup>, Mk 9<sup>43</sup>, 45, 47, Lk 12<sup>5</sup>, Ja 3<sup>6</sup>); from which also we obtain the English word Gehenna. Historically, this valley is the traditional site of the worshipped to Molech, first by Ahaz (2 Ch 28<sup>3</sup>), and later by Manasseh (33<sup>6</sup>), who made their children pass through the fire; but which was later defiled by Josiah (2 K 23<sup>10</sup>), and thereafter seems to have been made the receptacle of the city's offal; and in later Jewish thought became a symbol of the supposed place of future punishments (cf. Enoch xxvii 1). The NT use of γέεννα is exclusively in this figurative sense. Milton also employs it thus in his familiar lines:

'The pleasant vale of Hinnom, Thine own Hell' (404).
And black Gehenna called, the place of fire.

Opinions differ as to the identification of the valley; but most authorities, including Robinson, Stanley, Buhl, and many others, as well as modern Arab tradition, identify it with the valley on the W. and S. side of the Holy City, the upper portion of which is called in Arabic Wādī er-Rabābi; the lower, Wādī Gehennam, or 'Valley of Hell.' It is a 'deep and yawning gorge' (Wilson), and 'never contains water' (Socin), its descent from its original source to Bir Eyryub being approximately 670 ft.

At the lower extremity are found numerous rock-tombs, for here seems to have been the potter's field for the burial of pilgrims, which was purchased with the '30 pieces of silver' and known as Akeldama, or field of blood (Mt 27<sup>3-8</sup>, Ac 1<sup>18-19</sup>). On the other hand, the Arab writer Edrisi of the 12th cent. A.D., followed by Sir C. Wairen in an extended and somewhat convincing article on 'Hinnom (Valley of)' in Hastings' DB, identifies it with the Kidron on the E. of Jerusalem, including also its continuation below the junction of the Eastern and Western valleys at Bir Eyyub; the whole of the valley in its descent toward the Dead Sea being known to the Arabs as Wady en-Nâr, 'Valley of Fire.' Still another identification is that advocated by Sayce, R. Smith, Birch, and others, who locate it between the Temple area and the City of David, identifying it with the valley known since Josephus' day as the Tyropeon; but the first identification is, on the whole, the most probable.

GENEALOGIES OF JESUS CHRIST.—1. There is no evidence that any special stress was laid upon the Davidic descent of Jesus, either by Himself or in the preaching of the Apostles. It was assumed that He was 'Son of David,' and the title was given to Him as the Messiah; nor does it appear that His claim was ever seriously contested on the ground that His Davidic descent was doubtful. St. Paul in Ro 1<sup>3</sup> speaks of Christ as 'born of the seed of David according to the flesh,' and in 2 Ti 2<sup>8</sup> he names this descent, along with the Resurrection, as one of the salient points of the gospel he preached: 'Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel.' Similarly in his speech at the Pisidian Antioch, as recorded in Ac 13<sup>23</sup>, he says: 'Of this man's (i.e. David's) seed hath God according to promise brought unto Israel a Saviour, Jesus.' St. Peter in his speech on the Day of Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>34</sup>) points to David, 'that of the seed of David he would set one upon his throne,' and points to its fulfilment in Christ; but in addressing Cornelius (10<sup>38</sup>) he speaks of Christ as 'Jesus of Nazareth'; and this would seem to imply that the birth at Bethlehem, which brought into prominence the claim to Davidic descent, did not form part of his ordinary missionary preaching. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (7<sup>14</sup>) says: 'It is evident that our Lord hath sprung out of Judah.' In the Second Gospel blind Bartimæus (Mk 10<sup>47</sup>, cf. parallels) uses the title 'Son of David,' in addressing Christ, and the crowds at the Triumphant Entry into Jerusalem (11<sup>10</sup>, cf. Mt 21<sup>9</sup> 'Hosanna to the Son of David') speak of the 'kingdom that cometh' as the 'kingdom of our father David'; but in a difficult passage (12<sup>35-37</sup>, cf. parallels) I. . . . difficulties as to the appropi.

application of the title to the Messiah (see Holtzmann, Hdcom 2 ad loc.). In the Apocalypse the Davidic descent is apparently assumed (Rev 22<sup>16</sup>) as well as the birth from the tribe of Judah (5<sup>5</sup>); but the use of the phrase 'the root of David' in both passages shows that the essential and spiritual descent to David was more prominent in the writings than the physical descent from him. The evidence to be derived from the Fourth Gospel is of a doubtful character; in Jn 7<sup>27</sup> we find traces of the phase of Jewish thought according to which the Messiah would appear suddenly and his origin would be secret—the answer of Jesus implies that the people did indeed know His human, but not His spiritual, origin. It is clear from 7<sup>51f.</sup> 52 that He was regarded by both the crowd and the rulers at Jerusalem as being of Galilean, and therefore presumably not Davidic, parentage; it is by no means certain, and to many it may seem in no way probable, that the writer, in the interest of a 'tragic irony' (see Westcott, Speaker's Commentary on 7<sup>42</sup>), refrained from noting the fact of the birth at Bethlehem, and the Davidic lineage of Joseph or Mary. Jesus' words in 7<sup>28f.</sup> show clearly that He did not choose to support His claim by an appeal to fleshly parentage, while the words of Philip (1<sup>45</sup> 'We have found him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph'), and of the crowd at Capernaum (6<sup>42</sup> 'Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?'), left, as they are, without comment by the Evangelist, suggest that he was unacquainted with the story of the birth at Bethlehem, and laid no stress on the Davidic descent.

In all the books thus far mentioned no intimation is given whether the descent of Jesus is traced through Mary or Joseph—this fact must be recognized, however it is explained. In the Catholic Epistles there is no reference, direct or indirect, to the tribe or family of the Lord. The First and Third Gospels, which (at all events in their present form) teach the doctrine of the birth from a virgin, also contain formal pedigrees of Joseph, with the evident intention of proving that Jesus was the heir of David. In this lies the most important problem which the genealogies of Jesus present for solution.

2. The . . . 's in regard to the divergence of the . . . of Joseph are well known. St. Matthew (1<sup>1</sup>) begins with Abraham, and traces the line in fourteen generations to David; then through Solomon in fourteen generations to Jehoniah at the time of the Babylonian captivity to Babylon: then in fourteen (or fifteen, according to our present text) generations to Joseph, and Jesus. Thus he brings the Messiah into relation with all who, whether in a literal or a spiritual sense, could call Abraham their Father.

St. Luke (3<sup>38-39</sup>) makes Joseph the son of Heli, and grandson of Matthat (by some identified without any proof with Matthan of Mt 1<sup>15</sup>), and traces his descent through Zerubbabel and Shealtiel to Nathan the son of David; then (with only slight or textually doubtful divergences from Mt.) back to Abraham, but, not . . . here, he carries the pedigree back to Adam, the Son of God, thus bringing the Son of man into relation with all men whom God has created. A more detailed examination of the main characteristics of the two . . . will show the fundamental differences . . . and treatment that exist between them, and prepare us for extracting whatever may be of value from the attempts that have been made to harmonize them.

3. St. Matt<sup>1</sup> . . . —The heading is translated in . . . of the generation (βίβλος γενέσεως) of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham: in the margin the alternative rendering is given 'the genealogy of Jesus Christ.' If, as seems probable the latter rendering is right, this heading will refer only to the pedigree which follows; the phrase βίβλος γενέσεως is most likely taken from Gn 5<sup>1</sup> (ἀβη ή βίβλος γενέσεως ανθρώπων: cf. 6<sup>9</sup> αὐται δὲ αἱ γενέσεις Νώε, and 10<sup>1</sup>), where it introduces a list of Adam's descendants, and thus practically forms the title of a table. Zahn<sup>17</sup> d. NT<sup>2</sup>, ii pp 270 f. and "cogeny that the phrase could not be applied to a table of ancestors, and takes it as a title of the whole book; he is, however, no doubt right in the view that it refers to the narrative, or of the birth and infancy. Taken as the title of the gospel it indicates clearly the intention of the compiler to show that in Jesus, as the heir of David and of Abraham, were fulfilled the promises made to them: the pedigree itself is intended to illustrate this, rather than to prove it, and it is not easy to avoid the conclusion that it is quite artificial, as is indeed implied by the more or less arbitrary division into 3 sections containing twice seven names apiece.

Confining our attention for the moment to the direct male line, we note that in the first section the names are taken from 1 Ch 2<sup>1-12</sup>, and that if Salmon was the younger contemporary of Joshua (as is implied 1 with Rahab), there are only four over the 300 or 400 years between David's reign. In the second section the names are from 1 Ch 3<sup>1-16</sup>, but Joash, Amaziah, and Azariah are omitted before Jotham, and Jehoiakim before Jechoniah (=Jehoiachin). In the third section only Shealtiel and Zerubbabel are mentioned in the OT [the latter in 1 Ch 3<sup>19</sup> is called son of Pedaiah, the brother of Shealtiel, but in Hag 1<sup>1</sup> and numerous other passages, he is called son of Shealtiel, or Shaltiel, but without any intimation that he was of Davidic descent; it is often assumed that Shealtiel adopted his nephew]. We have no hint as to the source from whence the remaining names were drawn. For about 460 years, from David to the Captivity, we have 14 names, and know there should be 18; for about 590 years, from the Captivity to Christ, we have, against all reasonable probability, only 13 (perhaps originally 14) names.

We now turn to the notes inserted at different points in the pedigree. A very small point may perhaps guide us to a true conclusion in regard to these. Holtzmann (op. cit. on Mt 1<sup>18</sup>) points out that the articles before Δαυὶδ τὸν βασιλέα in v.<sup>6</sup>, and before Ἰωσήφ τὸν ἀνδρα Μάρκας in v.<sup>16</sup>, are incorrect: it seems probable that the compiler of the Gospel had a pedigree before him in which each step was given in the simple form 'Abraham begat Isaac' (Ἀβραὰμ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰσαάκ), and that he added notes to this at certain points; in vv<sup>6</sup> and <sup>16</sup> he did not notice that the use of the article became incorrect when the notes were added. This original document may or may not have ended 'Joseph begat Jesus' (Ἰωσήφ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν): it is perhaps the easiest solution of the difficulties of this verse to suppose that, if it did so end, the compiler omitted the last step, as in conflict with his belief in the Virgin-birth, and added a note to the previous step to explain the relation in which Jesus stood to Joseph. If in Westcott and Hort's edition of the NT the notes be struck out, it will be seen that a perfectly symmetrical pedigree of Joseph is left.

Mr. F. C. Burkitt, in Evangelion da-Mattheos (1904, vol. II, pp. 258-266), argues with great force that the genealogy is an integral part of St. Matthew's Gospel, and that the compiler himself drew it up; but really his arguments apply only to the notes inserted in the genealogy. He discusses fully the reading in v.<sup>16</sup>, and concludes that we cannot look on the reading of the Sinaitic Syriac ('Jacob begat Joseph; Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, begat Jesus, who is called the Christ') as containing traces of an original text. Zahn (op. cit. ii, p. 292 f.) thinks that the Curetonian Syriac ('Jacob begat Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, who bore Jesus Christ') represents the Greek from which the Syriac version was made more closely than does the Sinaitic. If, therefore, the compiler followed a pedigree ready to hand, he did so only as far as the step 'Jacob begat Joseph'; and textual criticism will not help us to reconstruct the presumed original document beyond that point. In the usual text stress is laid on Joseph being the husband of Mary, probably to show that, as he recognized his wife's son as in a legal sense his own, Jesus was legally the heir of David. In the reading that probably underlies the Ferrar group of MSS ('Jacob begat Joseph, to whom being betrothed the Virgin Mary begat Jesus that is called Christ'), and also the Old Latin and Syriac versions, this point is missed, and there is little doubt that the Received Text is right.

Added to vv<sup>6</sup> and <sup>11</sup> are notes which mark important turning-points in the history of the family: with David it attained to royal standing, which it lost under Jechoniah at the Captivity. In v.<sup>2</sup> the addition of 'and his brethren' to the name Judah marks the beginning of the tribe, in that Judah is chosen from among his brethren as founder of the royal tribe. The addition of Zerach to Perez in v.<sup>3</sup> marks the division of the tribe, and it is noticeable to notice that we find an allusion to the house of Perez in Ru 4<sup>12</sup>; perhaps, too, the compiler may have had in mind the strange story of Gn 38<sup>28-30</sup>, around which some Rabbinic lore may have clustered. The addition of 'and his brethren' to the name Jechoniah is more puzzling. Zahn (op. cit. p. 273) thinks it is meant to mark the fact that till then the fortunes of the Davidic house centred in the person of Jechoniah, who was heir of all the promises, but that from that time onward a number of Davidic families existed, any one of which might be destined to receive the inheritance. Thus it would mark the change from the house of David of the second section to a family of the third section. But it is not clear from the OT that Jechoniah (=Jehoiachin) had any brothers, for the text of 1 Ch 3<sup>16</sup> seems suspicious. According to 2 Ch 36<sup>10</sup> his successor Zedekiah was his brother, according to 2 K 24<sup>17</sup> his father's brother. Possibly there has been some confusion with Jehoiakim, who had three brothers (including a Zedekiah) according to 1 Ch 3<sup>18</sup>; more probably the compiler has added the note, for the purpose indicated by Zahn, without regard for strict genealogical data.

The four notes not yet referred to are of special interest, naming four of the ancestresses of Solomon. The selection of these names was evidently made with a purpose, it seems as if the compiler wished to show that in the pedigree of the greatest of Jewish kings could be found instances of the breach of laws usually considered most binding. Tamar became a mother through incestuous intercourse with her father-in-law; Rahab was a harlot; Ruth was a Moabitess, and a Gentile; Deuteronomic law (Dt 23<sup>3</sup>, cf. Neh 10<sup>31</sup>) was ever to enter into the congregation; Bathsheba was an adulteress. Some have thought that these references to acknowledged breaches of morality in the pedigree of David's first great son form some kind of answer to the charges of immorality brought by the Jews against the Virgin: the argument would be that, if they did not reject Solomon in spite of acknowledged moral blots in his ancestry, they ought not to reject Jesus because of unfounded scandal. But this explanation is obviously unsatisfactory; there is no real force in such an argument, even supposing it to be worked out and not merely vaguely indicated; and all must feel that the compiler would have shrunk from drawing a parallel between the Mother of Jesus and notoriously sinful women, also the reference to Ruth remains unexplained, as she was guilty of no immorality. Burkitt (op. cit. vol. ii. p. 260) suggests a different explanation, that these four women are thrust upon our notice 'as if to prepare us for still greater irregularity in the last stage.' But again a comparison between the Virgin-birth and incestuous or adulterous intercourse can hardly have been possible for the compiler.

The simplest explanation is probably the right one: the God about whom Jesus taught had shown Himself ready, in the history of the royal family, to accept strangers and sinners. In the case of Ruth this is fully satisfactory; and the conduct of the other three women is represented in Scripture as justified or pardoned. Judah was obliged to say of Tamar, 'She is more righteous than I' (Gn 38<sup>26</sup>); the remembrance of Rahab's former life was blotted out by her subsequent faith (Ja 2<sup>25</sup>, He 11<sup>31</sup>); there is no intimation in Scripture that Bathsheba was morally responsible for the sin into which she was forced by a powerful king, and certainly the birth of Solomon is not represented as in any way dishonouring to God, but rather the contrary (see 2 S 12, where Nathan named the child 'Jedidiah' ['Beloved of Jah'] for the Lord's sake'; cf. the prophecy of 7<sup>14</sup>). Probably the thought uppermost in the mind of the compiler would be God's acceptance of these women, and not their sin.

In regard to Rahab, there is no evidence for her marriage with Salmon, nor is anything known that would be likely to support the idea: it would seem that the compiler determined to introduce the name, and therefore, without evidence and against all probability, made her the wife of the father of Boaz.

This examination compels us to conclude that the genealogy is essentially and intentionally artificial; the word 'begat' (ἐγέννησεν) is not intended to imply physical birth, but merely descent; the compiler was more interested in the throne-succession than the actual lineage, and used his material to illustrate and enforce his main proposition that Jesus Christ was the son of David and of Abraham, and he joined to the bare pedigree a sort of running commentary of notes.

There is a discrepancy in the Lukan form, but taken from Mt, the names Jechoniah and Eliakim are inserted between Jechoniah and Josiah as if they referred to two different persons, instead of being two names for the same man, and also Amaziah, Joash, and Ahaziah between Uzzah and Joram (see Resch, TU x. 5, pp 182-201, and Grafe in SK, 1898, 1).

4. St. Luke's genealogy — The descent of Joseph is traced through Nathan the son of David. It is possible that the family is referred to in Zec 12<sup>13</sup>, where 'the family of the house of Nathan' is distinguished from 'the family of the house of David,' the latter phrase perhaps meaning the royal line. The rejection of the descent through Jechoniah may have been due to the influence of the prophecy of Jeremiah (22<sup>30</sup>): 'Thus saith the Lord, Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days: for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah: but there is no apparent reason why the line of Nathan should be selected, unless St. Luke had evidence of the fact before him; and, in the case of a writer who so evidently based his work upon the results of careful research, it is only fair, and therefore scientific, to assume that he had such evidence. The agreement with St. Matthew's genealogy in the names Zerubbabel and Shealtiel has not been satisfactorily explained; it is, of course, open to any one to assume, without the possibility of either proof or refutation, that Jechoniah was actually childless, and adopted Shealtiel, a descendant of Nathan; but even so the further descent in the descent from Zerubbabel remains as difficult as ever, for the pedigrees disagree with each other, and with the names given in 1 Ch 3<sup>10ff</sup>. The number of derivatives of the name Nathan, and the repetition of the names Melchi, Joseph, and Jesus in the Lukan pedigree, can be taken equally well to prove the truth of its compiler.

Of interest, there is nothing to notice in the names from David to Adam, except the insertion in v<sup>38</sup> of a second Canan with the LXX of Gn 10<sup>24</sup>.

5. Of the two genealogies. — From what has been said above, it appears that St. Matthew (or the compiler of the First Gospel in its present form) did not aim at historical accuracy; but from what we know of St. Luke's methods it may be assumed that he would not have inserted matter in his Gospel unless he had had satisfactory evidence of its genuineness and historical accuracy, and we have seen that the character of the list of names he gives, from David to Joseph, agrees well with this view. Attempts to harmonize the two genealogies have not been successful, and it is only necessary to indicate the general lines they have followed, and to collect such pieces of evidence as may throw light on the possible transmission of the pedigree.

The question was first discussed by Julius Africanus, who flourished early in the 3rd cent. after Christ, in a letter addressed to an unknown correspondent Aristides, of which a considerable portion has been preserved by Euseb. HE i. 7 (cf. Kouth, Relig. Sacrae, vol. ii. p. 228 ff). In his text of St. Luke the names Matthat and Levi were evidently left out, so that he regarded Melchi as the father of Joseph. He supposed that Matthat was a descendant of Solomon and that he married a woman of the house of Judah, Estha, by whom he had a son Jacob. On Matthan's death, Melchi, a descendant of Nathan, married his widow, who bore him a son Heli. Heli died without children, and Jacob, in accordance with the levirate law, raised up seed to his brother, and begat Joseph. Thus Joseph was physically son of Jacob, legally of Heli. The difficulties of this theory are sufficiently discussed by Dr. B. W. Bacon in Hastings' DB, art. 'Genealogy of Jesus Christ.' The various modifications of this theory that have been proposed (see, e.g., Farrar's St. Luke in the Cambridge Bible for Schools, Excursus II) in no way increase its probability, and practically no evidence can be adduced in support of it. The Lukan does indeed speak of a narrative (ιστορία) which Africanus had received by tradition (HE i. 7; cf. vi 31); Africanus, however, does not assert this in the fragments preserved, and himself admits that the conjecture is unsupported by evidence (ἐι καὶ μὴ ἐμπαρρησιασμένος εἴην, i.e. that it is worthy of acceptance till a better or truer one is proposed).

Africanus does, however, mention the 'Desposyni' on account of their being the Saviour, and applies to them the name 'the before-mentioned,' so that in those parts of the letter that are now lost he may have specified more exactly how far his conjecture rested on evidence traditionally derived from them. After giving a very improbable story about the destruction of the public genealogical records of the Jews by Herod Antipas, he says that many people reconstructed their genealogies from memory or private sources, among whom were the Desposyni of Nazareth and Cochaba, probably, therefore, he derived from them the information that Joseph's grandmother was called Estha. The main interest of this statement is that, in spite of its being somewhat discredited by its context, it suggests a source from which St. Luke might possibly have obtained the pedigree he gives; we may well suppose that he pursue Palestine during St. Paul's Παλαιστίνη (quoted by Euseb. HE iii 19, 20, and 32; see Routh, Reliq. Sacrae, vol. 1 p. 212 ff.) supports the statement of Africanus in reference to the Desposyni, though that term is not found in the fragments of his writings that are preserved. He states that when Domitian gave orders to kill those who were of David's race, certain heretics gave information against two grandsons of Judas the Lord's brother according to the flesh, as being of David's race and akin to Christ; Domitian, on finding out that they were ordinary peasants, and that the kingdom they expected was not of this world, released them, and issued an edict stopping the persecution of the Church; they took leading positions in the Church, and lived till the time of Trajan. He also relates that a similar accusation was brought against Symeon son of Clopas, 'the Lord's uncle,' who, in consequence, suffered martyrdom at the age of one hundred and twenty. It would appear, therefore, that nothing was known of any who claimed kinship with Jesus after the time of Trajan, so that the statement of Africanus probably rests, at the best, on mere tradition, and it is not wise to build much on it. The statement of Africanus about the destruction of genealogical records by Herod is most improbable, and tends to discredit his whole story; Josephus (c. Ap. i. 7 and Vita, 1) speaks of the preservation of the genealogies of priestly families in public records in the Temple, but there is no certain evidence that those of other families were similarly preserved.

The expedient of supposing levirate marriages and adoptions is not only improbable but fails to explain why the descent of Jesus is traced through Joseph. Burkitt is quite justified in saying that the First Gospel was perfectly aware that the word 'begat' (ἐγέννησεν) was not literally true in the pedigree he gives, and that he would have felt no incongruity between the physical reality of the Virgin-birth and the legal descent from David through Joseph. But this reasoning can hardly be applied to the Third Gospel; the Virgin-birth is certainly not insisted on in it in the same way as in the First; the phrase 'thy father and I' in 2<sup>48</sup> (cf. 2<sup>38</sup> 41) seems almost incompatible with the belief, and there is some reason for thinking, on textual grounds, that the original text has in places been altered; the words 'as was supposed' might easily have been inserted in 3<sup>38</sup>, although the variations of reading afford little or no evidence in favour of this supposition; above all, there is no reason to suppose that the writer had, or was likely to have, in mind the legal relation to Jesus in which Joseph, as husband of Mary, might be considered to stand. If, therefore, the suggestion first made by Annianus of Viterbo in the 15th cent., and since adopted by many eminent theologians, that St. Luke gives the genealogy of Mary, could be accepted, it would have important results. It is a matter on which argument is hardly possible, the only point being whether any unprejudiced person could understand the words in 3<sup>38</sup> to mean 'being' (as was supposed, son of Joseph, but really) grandson of Heli—Heli being taken, without a shred of evidence, to have been the father of Mary. A passage has, indeed, been quoted from the Talmud (Jerus. Chag. 77b) to prove that Mary was called 'daughter of Eli'; but this has been shown to be a mistake by G. A. Cooke, Expos., Oct. 1895, pp. 316 ff. In the Prot-evangelium Jacobi her parents are called Joachim and Anna. The early Fathers generally assumed that Mary was of the same family as Joseph, and that her descent was involved in his; see, for instance, Euseb. HE i. 7 ad fin. and Qu. ad Steph. iii. 2 (Migne, iv. col. 881 f.), where reasons are suggested why Mary's genealogy was not given; this view is based on a mistaken interpretation of Nu 36<sup>8</sup>, as if all women were commanded to marry in their own families, whereas the regulation applied only to heiresses. Proof of the Davidic descent of Mary can be obtained from the NT only by assuming the truth of the doctrine of the Virgin-birth; it was no doubt on this ground that Irenaeus (Apol. i. 32<sup>14</sup>) inferred that Mary was of the tribe of Judah (cf. Protev. Jacobi, 10, where she is said to be of the tribe of David) St. Matthew (1<sup>20</sup>) and St. Luke (1<sup>27</sup> 24) assert the Davidic descent of Joseph, but not that of Mary; contrast Lk 1<sup>5</sup>, where Elisabeth is said to be of the daughters of Aaron. St. Paul in Ro 1<sup>3</sup> point out that in Test. we find the theory of a double descent from Levi and from Judah (Sym. 7 and Gad 8), and they remark that this is no doubt an inference from the relationship of Mary to Elisabeth (Lk 1<sup>30</sup>).

We must conclude, therefore, that we have two independent attempts to establish the Davidic descent of Joseph, and that they can be harmonized only by suppositions which are incapable of proof and hardly probable.

LITERATURE.—This is sufficiently indicated in the body of the article. P. M. BARNARD.

GENERATION.—A word of several meanings used to render two different words in OT and NT. All are, however, related in thought, and all have a close connexion with the Gospels and Jewish thought in the time of Christ.

1. In OT 'generation' is used to render (1) the Heb. דור or דר, connected with Assyr. dāra, 'to endure,' means primarily a period of time. This meaning has survived in OT chiefly in poetry, and in the phrases דור דר Ps 45<sup>18</sup> 61<sup>7</sup> לדר Ex 31<sup>5</sup> דר Is 51<sup>9</sup>, Ps 72<sup>5</sup>, and such like, to indicate time stretching away into the past (Is 51<sup>9</sup>), or (more rarely) the future (Ps 33<sup>11</sup> 49<sup>12</sup>). It may refer both to the present (145<sup>13</sup>), and is thus parallel to עולם (see ETERNITY).

Originally דר must have meant the period defined by the life of a man or of a family (Job 42<sup>16</sup>). Hence by a loose usage it comes to mean the people living in that period (Gn 7<sup>1</sup>, Ex 16, Dt 21<sup>4</sup>, Ec 1<sup>4</sup>, Is 53<sup>8</sup> etc. etc.; cf. the modern use of the word 'age'). So also it may be used of a class of people (Ps 104<sup>24</sup> 105<sup>26</sup>), or of a people possessing certain characteristics (Ps 105<sup>26</sup>).

2. Of the four words rendered 'generation' in NT two are unimportant so far as the Gospels are concerned. (1) In 1 P 2<sup>9</sup> 'a chosen generation' γένος ἐκλεκτόν, should be rendered as in RV, 'an elect race.' (2) In Mt 1<sup>1</sup> the rendering should be 'the book of the origin of Jesus Christ,' using the word γένεσις in its widest sense. The meaning in Mt 1<sup>1</sup>, Lk 1<sup>14</sup> is slightly different, and is best expressed by 'birth' (EV). (3) The most important word used in the Gospels is γενεά, meaning 'race,' 'offspring,' 'descent'; (b) the people of any given period; (c) a period loosely defined by the life of a man or of a family; (d) in such phrases as Lk 1<sup>50</sup> it is used to express the future, generally in the future. Cf. the expression in Eph 3<sup>21</sup> eis πάσας τὰς γενεὰς τοῦ αἰῶνος τῶν αἰώνων, which, however, is considered by Dalman (Words of Jesus, p. 165, Eng. tr.) as referring to all the generations of 'the current age' of 'the world period.' But the phrase seems rather to be the strongest possible way of expressing 'for ever.' That γενεά (rendered 'generation') does express 'the current age' of 'the world period' is obvious in the Gospels (Lk 16<sup>8</sup>, Mt 24<sup>34</sup>, and less clearly Mt 23<sup>36</sup>); also the people of that age (Mt 12<sup>35</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>, Mk 8<sup>13</sup>, Lk 11<sup>29</sup>). In the sense of (c) it is found only in Mt 1<sup>17</sup> and apparently never in its original sense (a). (4) This last is expressed by quite a different word, viz. γέννημα. In Mt 3<sup>7</sup> 12<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>33</sup>, Lk 3<sup>7</sup>, AV has the phrase 'generation of vipers.' The Greek is γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν, which RV renders 'offspring of vipers.' The rendering of AV is due to Tindale (see Hastings' DB ii. 142<sup>b</sup>). Elsewhere the word occurs as γέννημα (Mt 26<sup>29</sup>, Lk 22<sup>18</sup>, 2 Co 9<sup>10</sup>), rendered 'fruit.' G. GORDON STOTT.

GENNESARET, LAKE OF.—See SEA OF GALILEE.

GENNESARET, LAND OF.—Thither Jesus and His disciples repaired after the feeding of the 5000 (Mt 14<sup>22</sup>, Mk 6<sup>36</sup>). This miracle probably took place on the N.E. shore of the Sea of Galilee. When evening came, the Synoptists tell us, His disciples entered into a boat, and crossing over the sea, came to the land, unto Gennesaret, ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν ἐκ τῆς Γεννησαρέτ (Mt 14<sup>34</sup>, Mk 6<sup>53</sup>).

1. Name.—The 'Land of Gennesar, or Gennesaret,' is mentioned but twice in the Bible (Mt 14<sup>34</sup>, Mk 6<sup>53</sup>). The name 'Gennesaret,' however, occurs elsewhere: once as the name of the Lake, παρὰ τὴν λίμνην Γεννησαρέτ (Lk 5<sup>1</sup>), once in 1 Mac 11<sup>67</sup> τὸ ὕδωρ τοῦ Γεννησάρ, and is frequently found in Josephus, who uses both λίμνη Γεννησαρίτις (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1) and λίμνη Γεννησάρ (BJ III x. 7); in the Targums, גניסר, גניסר, גניסר, גניסר; and in Pliny's writings, Gennesara (v. 15). The name of the Lake was derived from that of the Plain, and that in turn from the name of a city supposed by the Jews to have been situated on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee; that portion . . . bordering on Mejdel being called . . . . On the derivation of the word Gennesaret, see art. SEA OF GALILEE.

2. Situation.—It is usually identified with the little plain situated on the western coast of the Sea of Galilee, and known to the Arabs as el-Ghazzeir, 'little Ghor or hollow.' This identification is as good as certain. The description of it as given by Josephus can apply to no other. Several years ago an attempt was made by Thrupp and Tregelles (in the Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology, ii. 290-308) to identify it with the plain of el-Bathah, on the N.E. shore of the Lake, but without success (cf. Stanley's 'Note' in refutation, SP 455).

3. Size.—Shut in by the hilly promontory of Khān Minyeh on the N. and the still more prominent hills by Magdala on the S., and extending westward from the Lake only to the base of the rugged . . . of Galilee, its total area is exceedingly . . . . approximate measurements are about 3 miles long from N. to S. by 1½ broad from E. to W. Stanley's measurements are wide of the mark when he says that the plain is 6 or 7 miles long by 5 miles broad (SP 442); and even G. A. Smith exaggerates when he describes it as 'four miles broad' (HGHL 443). Josephus' measurements are more nearly correct, viz. 30 × 20 stadia; though in fact it is a little longer than 30 and not quite so broad as 20. In form it is somewhat crescent-shaped or semi-elliptical. Its surface is comparatively level. Its altitude, like that of the Sea of Galilee, is over 650 feet below the level of the Mediterranean.

4. Josephus' description of the Land of Gennesaret.—

'Its nature is wonderful as well as its beauty: its soil is so fruitful that all sorts of trees can grow upon it, and the inhabitants accordingly plant all sorts of trees there; for the temper of the air is so well mixed that it agrees very well with these several sorts, particularly walnuts, which require the coldest air, flourish there in vast plenty, there are palm trees also, which grow best in hot air, fig trees also and olives grow near them, which yet require an air that is more temperate. One ambition of nature, where it forces those ally enemies to one another to agree together. . . . of the seasons, as if every one of them . . . try, for it not only nourishes different . . . t beyond men's expectation, but preserves . . . men with the principal fruits, . . . during ten months of the year, . . . ecome ripe through the whole year, for besides the good temperature of the air, it is also watered from a . . . The people of the country call it Capha . . . ought it to be a vein of the Nile, because it produces the coracin fish as well as that lake does which is near to Alexandria. The length of this country extends itself along the banks of this lake that bears the same n . . . and is in breadth twenty. And this is . . . . (BJ III. x. 8).

This classical passage from Josephus, though probably coloured to some extent, gives substantially the truth about the Plain as it must have been in the time of Christ, and for this reason it is of the utmost importance. Jewish Rabbins of early times corroborate his description. They describe it as . . . oth 'gardens and paradises', as one o . . . spots of the world; as irrigated and cultivated so that no portion of it was barren; and as being dotted over thickly with towns and villages. Indeed, ruins of villages have been found at three or four different localities in the Plain, viz. at the opening of Wady el-Hamam, at Ain el-Mudawwarah, south of Ain et-Tin, and on the N. side of Wady er-Rubudiyeh.

5. Its condition to-day.—The Arabic account is especially . . . because of the contrast between its . . . ien and now. Then, it was a most charming spot—'th . . . garden of God,' as a certain Rabbi . . . the gem of Palestine,' as Merrill speaks of it (Galilee in the Time of Christ, 33); now, it is, as Thomson says, 'pre-eminently fruitful in thorns,' a veritable thicket of oleanders and nubk trees, of gigantic thistles and brambles. And yet even now one finds proofs of its former luxuriance in the wealth of its wild flowers, the heavy-headed wheat and barley growing here and there, and in the stoutness of the thorns and thistles almost everywhere.

(1) The soil is . . . . h, like that of the Delta in Egypt. . . . of basaltic loam formed by the mingling of decomposed basalt with the alluvium of the lake. All travellers—Seetzen, von Schubert, Ritter, Burckhardt, Robinson, Wilson, and Thomson—praise the fertility of this Plain, and all except Stanley (cf. SP 451) lament its present desolate and uncultivated condition. The latter erroneously describes it as 'cultivated everywhere. Only near Magdala are there signs of marsh.

(2) Fountains and streams supply it with water in copious abundance. Three winter torrents rush down from the hill country lying to the west, and . . . h them abundance of water for the greater . . . the year. (a) One is known as the Wady el-Hamam, or the 'Valley of Pigeons,' a deep gorge bounded by almost perpendicular cliffs over one thousand feet in height, which crosses the Plain from the S.W. This is a tremendous ravine, and from Josephus' day has been known as the ravine of the 'Robber Caves'—the chosen resort of brigands in former days. Thomson describes it in two connexions, as 'a great chasm' and as a 'profound gorge' (Land and the Book, n. 395-397), and as leading up to a fort or castle known as Kalat ibn Ma'an, and still on to the village of Hattin. Down this valley are poured large volumes of water, and down through this same ravine, as through a funnel, rush sudden blasts of wind, which break upon the Lake. The ruins of Irbid, the Arbela of Josephus and 1 Mac 9<sup>2</sup>, are not far to the south. (b) Another torrent, entering the Plain from the W, is that known as Wady er-Rabab. This is the largest, and yields the principal supply of water furnished to the Plain. It is used to irrigate the Plain both N. and S, furnishing nearly three times the volume of water supplied by Ain el-Mudawwarah. (c) A third torrent enters the Plain from the N.W. It is called Wady el-Amud. Like Wady el-Hamam, it is a deep ravine, and scarcely less striking because of its narrowness. Its waters take their rise in the Jarmuk, the highest mountain in Galilee. For the greater part of its course it is called Wady el-Hamam. It is only a winter torrent. According to Thomson, all of these streams which enter the Plain disappear in summer before they reach the Lake.

Besides these waters which drain the region of Galilee immediately west of the Plain of Gennesaret, there are certain fountains in the Plain itself whose waters were used for irrigation : (a) 'Ain el-Mudawwarah, or 'Round Fountain,' situated a little over a mile N.W. of Magdala, is the largest and most important. It is enclosed by a circular wall of hewn stones, 32 yards in diameter, surrounded by thick trees and brushwood, so that access is difficult ; but it yields a copious stream of clear water, which flows across the Plain to the Lake, irrigating right and left. The pool itself contains two to three feet of water and certain fish. Ebrard (SK, 1867, pp. 723-747) identified it with the fountain of Capharnaum mentioned by Josephus, but this has been shown to be highly improbable. Two other fountains assist in watering the southern end of the Plain - 'Ain el-Bawdeh, or 'Cold Spring,' also known as 'Ain el-Fulayeh, or 'Fountain of the Bean'; and 'Ain as-Serar, somewhat further to the S.W. (β) 'Ain el-Tun, or 'Fountain of the Fig Tree,' is another large and important spring. It is situated on the northern edge of the Plain, and bursts forth from under the cliffs of Khān Minyeh. Unfortunately, it is too close to the shore of the Lake to be used extensively for irrigating purposes. The stream which issues from it is choked with a jungle of oleanders and papyrus. Robinson identifies this fountain with the spring of Capharnaum of Josephus. (γ) 'Ain el-Tabgha, or 'Fountain of the Ruined Mill,' formerly 'طَبْخَا', is to be the scene of the miracle of the feeding of the 5000 (Mk 6<sup>30-44</sup>), is another large fountain, according to Tristram, the largest in the Plain, about one-half as large as the 'Ain el-Tun.' It is situated at the village of Philippi. It is not situated in the Plain, but considerably N.E., about half-way between Khān Minyeh and Tell Hum, the two rival sites of Capernaum ; but its waters were formerly conducted by a channel cut in the rock around the promontory on which Khān Minyeh is situated, and made to irrigate the N. end of the Plain of Gennesaret. This aqueduct was discovered first by Sir Chas. Wilson, and since then the fountain has been considered to be the spring of Capharnaum (cf. Thomson, Land and Book, ii 429).

(3) Products.—With all these resources of irrigation, it is not surprising that the Plain of Gennesaret should be described by the Rabbins as the 'Garden of God,' or that its superior and delicious fruits 'were not allowed at the feasts in Jerusalem lest some might attend primarily to enjoy these fruits' (Bab. Pesachim, 8*b*; Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, 45*f.*). But to-day, though its grapes, figs, olives, and walnuts have vanished, there are to be seen wild figs, oleanders, nubk trees, dwarf palms, papyrus plants, tall prickly cactaeas; in summer, magnificent lilac-coloured convulvi hanging in long festoons of blossom from shrubs; wild flowers of countless variety nemeses, rises; rice, wheat, the best and olons and cucumbers in Palestine, sedges and rushes by the Lake; also thorns and thistles, especially in the central portion; in short, a tangle of luxuriant vegetation—a lovely floral carpet in February, a wilderness of thorns in summer. For here, indeed, Nature has lavished her glory in tropical profusion.

(4) Roads.—Two paths cross the Plain from S. to N.—the chief one leading from Magdala to Khān Mīnyeh in a direct course, and skirting the Lake shore within a few hundred feet; the other following the base of the hills along its western side, and stalking over the hills northwards. One of the best views obtainable of the Plain is from the top of the ridge above Magdala.

(5) Inhabitants.—The Plain is without settled inhabitants to-day. The Ghawarneh Arabs, more especially a certain tribe named es-Senekeyeh, roam over it, using it as winter pasture land. Wilson recounts that gipsies from India have been known to sojourn there with their tents and flocks (p. 138). As a rule, solitude reigns near the village of Mgudala and at . . .

(6) Ḥayyā and ḥayyā are still prevalent in this region as in the days of our Lord, when, not far distant, at least, Peter's wife's mother lay sick (Lk 4<sup>38</sup>). Thomson speaks of 'the heat and malarial influences of the Plain'. This probably accounts in part for its present desolation, though under the Turk it has fared but little worse than other portions of the Galilee.

Such is the land on the immediate edge of which lay Capernaum, and over whose 'Eden-like landscape' the feet of our blessed Lord so often trod as He went about preaching from village to village, healing the sick and raising to life the dead. One can almost see Him, in fancy, pushing out in a little the embayed and shell-covered shore, followed to the water's edge by the multitudes who pressed upon Him daily from populous Gennesaret, and hear Him speaking to them, as they sit upon the shore, concerning the gospel of the Kingdom, drawing illustrations from the sower, who, going forth to sow, allows some seeds to fall by the wayside, others on stony places, still others where they are choked by thorns; and then, when He begins weary climbing to the mountains for rest and spiritual refreshment in prayer, only to return again and repeat His message of goodwill and comfort; until, finally, when the great tragedy on Calvary is ended and He is risen from the tomb, He reappears to those same disciples, who meanwhile have returned to their nets. Surely no other spot of like size can possibly be of equal interest, to the Christian who loves to trace the footprints of His Master's earthly career, with what has lately been called 'the most sacred region of the Lake, the gem of Palestine.'

GENTILES.—In AV of the Gospels, 'Gentiles' and 'nations' are the translations of ἔθνη, RV agreeing with the rendering of AV in every place of the word's occurrence. In Mt 6<sup>7</sup> (ἐθνικοί) and 18<sup>17</sup> (ἔθνικός) AV has 'heathen' and 'a heathen man'; RV 'Gentiles' and 'the Gentile.' There AV has τελώναι, 'publicans,' RV with the reading ἔθνικοι has 'Gentiles' (Ἕλληνες, occurring in John only, is rendered 'Greeks' in 12<sup>80</sup> RV and AV; in 7<sup>35</sup> RV has 'Greeks,' AV 'Gentiles,' with, however, 'Greeks' in the margin. Ἕλληνας (Mk 7<sup>26</sup>) is translated 'a Greek' in both versions, but AV has 'Gentile' in the margin. The very wide diffusion of the Greek language after the conquests of Alexander the Great was the reason that in our Lord's day 'Greek' was often used as an equivalent for 'Gentile.' See GREEKS. The word 'Gentiles,' from the Lat. gentilis (adjective of gens, pl. gentes, 'a race,' 'people' or 'nation'), is used in the Vulgate to render the Heb גוי and the Gr. ἔθνη, and has thus passed into English.

For a full history of the term 'Gentiles,' reference must be made to the Bible Dictionaries. It is only necessary here to allude to the origin and use of the expression in the OT. Just as ἔθνος in the Gospels, as a rule (for an exception see Mt 21<sup>44</sup>), means the Jewish nation, and ἔθνη the nations other than Jewish, so in the OT גוי (goy), as a rule (for an exception see Lv 20<sup>38</sup>), stands for the former and the pl גוים (goyim) for the latter; and whilst often used in its purely ethnographical and geographical sense, with the meaning 'foreigner,' it is also constantly employed, especially in the Psalms, as a term of aversion and contempt, as connoting the practice of false religions and of immoral customs. The material and moral evils which the goyim had brought upon Israel in its later history tended to intensify the feelings of hostility with which the Jews looked out upon them from their own religious exclusiveness; and accordingly, in our Lord's day and in the generations following (see Acts and the Epistles passim), they were regarded by the Jews as 'aliens,' whatever the nature of their religion. This must be borne in mind when considering our Lord's teaching on the subject.

A full consideration of the attitude of early Christianity towards the Gentiles requires a study of the Acts and Epistles at least, and is beyond the scope of this article: our Lord's teaching, however, afterwards developed by His followers, is quite plainly indicated in the Gospels, and must form the basis of any adequate discussion of the subject.

The fact that Jesus did not pass His youth in the religiously exclusive atmosphere of Jerusalem, but in the more and more liberal surroundings of semi-Gentile Galilee, fits in with the prophetic word of Simeon at the Presentation, and the declarations of His forerunner: He was to be 'a light to lighten the Gentiles' (Lk 2<sup>32</sup>); and, God was able to raise up to Abraham children (3<sup>8</sup>) who could not boast any natural descent from the patriarch. St. Matthew, although according to the usual account of his standpoint he had no especially Gentile proclivities, records two important prophetic utterances regarding the Gentiles as being illustrated and fulfilled in his Master's work: 'Galilee of the Gentiles; the people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up' (4<sup>15-16</sup>), and, 'In his name shall the Gentiles trust' (12<sup>21</sup>). At the beginning of His ministry, if we accept St. Luke's chronology (see NAAMAN), Jesus defied the Jewish exclusiveness of His hearers in the synagogue at Nazareth by citing cases of Gentiles blessed through the agency of Israel's prophets (Lk 4<sup>25ff.</sup>); and, when driven from His native town, He took up His abode in a city of despised Galilee which belonged to that less Jewish portion of it known as

'Galilee of the Gentiles' (Mt 4<sup>15</sup>). Moreover, it was in the same Gentile-infected Galilee that the most important part of His ministry was carried on, and He even went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon (Mk 7<sup>24</sup>), and also taught and healed those who came to Him from thence, together with those who sought Him from Decapolis (Mt 4<sup>25</sup>), and from Idumæa, and from beyond Jordan (Mk 3<sup>8</sup>); nor did He disdain to remain on one occasion for two days among the Samaritans at their request (Jn 4<sup>40</sup>). In His public teaching He showed no prejudice in favour of the Jews in His assignment of praise and blame: the grateful leper whom He blessed was a Samaritan (Lk 17<sup>16ff.</sup>); it was a good Samaritan who was set forth as an example in one of His most famous parables (Lk 10<sup>30-35</sup>). He commended the faith of the centurion as being greater than any He had found in Israel (Mt 8<sup>10</sup>). On the other hand, the evil generation of whom the Pharisees were representatives, He declared should be condemned in the judgment by Gentiles, the men of Nineveh and the queen of Sheba (12<sup>41f.</sup>); and, setting the seal to the teaching of His forerunner, He asserted in effect that the true children of Abraham were those who did the deeds of Abraham, and were not necessarily those who were naturally descended from him (Jn 8<sup>39ff.</sup>). In the Sermon on the Mount the same broad and world-wide outlook is manifested: there is hardly anything of importance in that great discourse which is local or temporary—it is obviously for all men and for all time. With this, too, coincides the teaching of His many parables about the Kingdom of heaven and that recorded in the Fourth Gospel—in this Gospel all His utterances are in accord with His declaration to the Samaritan woman concerning the true worship which will produce the impression that He was the Saviour of the world (v. 42); for in this Gospel especially His words of warning, of encouragement, and of hope embrace all mankind. 'God so loved the world . . . that whosoever believeth . . . shall have eternal life' (3<sup>16</sup>). And, finally, at the end of His ministry, in the allegory of the sheep and the goats, spoken exclusively with reference to Gentiles, He applies to those on the right hand the word 'righteous,' which in the Jewish language was so often the technical term to designate only the chosen people (Mt 25<sup>37</sup>).

There are two passages in the Gospels which demand a passing notice, as they might seem at first sight to be in opposition to our Lord's usual attitude towards the Gentiles. One is His saying to the Syrophenician woman, 'I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 15<sup>24</sup>); and the other is His injunction to the Twelve, 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (10<sup>5-6</sup>). In the first case there is little doubt that our Lord's words were intended to test or to call forth the woman's faith, and are not to be understood as implying any unwillingness on His part to assist her (see SYROPHENICIAN WOMAN). And in the second case we are to notice that the prohibition was laid upon the Twelve only, and had no application to His own conduct; and, further, that the prohibition was distinctly removed by Him after the Resurrection in the great commission recorded in Mt 28<sup>19</sup> 'Go ye therefore and teach all nations' [in Mk 16<sup>15</sup> 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature'], and in Ac 1<sup>8</sup> 'Ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.' And there are other passages, such as Mt 24<sup>14</sup> 26<sup>13</sup>, from which it is plain that our Lord contemplated the world-wide preaching of the gospel by His followers, the fulfilment, in fact, of the ancient prediction to the father of the faithful: 'In thy seed shall all the nations (goum) of the earth be blessed' (Gn 22<sup>18</sup>). See MISSIONS.

GENTLENESS.—St Paul in 2 Co 10<sup>1</sup> appeals to the meekness and πραυτης και επιεικεια of Christ. These would be readily admitted to be so characteristic of Jesus as to require no specific illustration. Yet such is the objective character of the Gospels, that with the exception of His own claim to be 'meek and lowly in heart' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>) and the Γαλαθα of the prophecy, 'Behold, thy king cometh unto thee, meek' (21<sup>5</sup>), neither quality is directly attributed to Him, nor, with the exception of Mt 5<sup>5</sup>, does either word occur in His recorded teaching.

These characteristics of Jesus are not easily defined in themselves, or distinguished from one another. (See art. 'Gentleness in Hastings' DB, vol II. p. 150). Πραυτης is rather an inward disposition of the mind, the quietness of soul which is the result of faith and self-restraint; επιεικεια is an active grace, exhibited in human relations, 'it expresses the quality of considerateness, of readiness to look humanely and reasonably at the facts of a case'; it denotes in Jesus the tenderness of His dealings with the moral and social outcasts, the burdened and heavy laden, the weak and ignorant; His gracious courtesy, geniality of address, thoughtfulness, and delicacy of touch. It is not the quality of a nature of such softness as to be liable to verge of tears, or of a sentimentalism which has little strength of conscience, and no power of moral indignation and repulsion. The πραυτης of Christ can be appreciated only in relation to certain other elements in His personality: (1) His consciousness of His Divine origin, and His royal vocation as founder of the Kingdom of God (cf. Jn 13<sup>3-5</sup>). (2) His moral consciousness. His is not the gentleness towards the sinful which arises from moral indifference, or the desire of a sin-marred nature to be judged of leniently. He is conscious of sinlessness; He looks upon the great tragedy of human life, but His passion does not make Him harsh in dealing (cf. Mt 5<sup>7</sup>). (3) His consciousness of Divine power. It is the gentleness not of weakness, but of might. The Lamb of God answering Pilate's mildly was conscious that twelve legions of angels stood at His disposal (Mt 26<sup>53</sup>).

The Baptist, himself stern of soul, foresaw the coming of one greater than he, but not more gentle. The axe, fan, and ure of judgment were at His command, and He would wield these instruments of wrath to the destruction of wickedness (Mt 3<sup>10-12</sup>). But, to John's intense disappointment, Jesus found His ideal and method not in these symbols of violence, but in the επιεικεια of the Servant of Jehovah, who did not cry or lift up his voice in the streets, who did not break the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax (Mt 12<sup>19, 20</sup>; cf. Lk 4<sup>18, 19</sup> and Mt 11<sup>4-6</sup>, and see Is 42<sup>1-3</sup>).

The Gospels abound in illustrations of the winsome manner of Jesus. His reception of the little children (Mt 18<sup>19-20</sup>), His thoughtfulness for the multitude lest they should faint by the way (15<sup>32</sup>), the brotherly touch of His hand upon the leper (Mk 1<sup>41</sup>), the delicacy of His approach to the sorrowing (Lk 7<sup>13</sup>, Jn 11<sup>38</sup>), His tender tones to His perplexed disciples—'little children,' 'I will not leave you orphans' (Jn 13<sup>33</sup> 14<sup>18</sup>), and His sense of their frailty in the words, 'Sleep on now and take your rest' (Mt 26<sup>45</sup>), His consideration, even in the agony of death, for His mother (Jn 19<sup>26, 27</sup>),—are but examples of that gracious gentleness which consisted with, and was the expression of, a Divine dignity of love. His attitude to the sinful is distinguished by the same tenderness. His intense love of holiness, quick moral sensitiveness, and stainless purity, made Him uncompromisingly stern in His rebuke of a self-righteousness which had little capacity of repentance; but He combined with that a deep insight into the possibilities of sin-marred natures, and by His disclosure to them of dorn being, and the tenderness of His love, He won them to repentance a (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup> 19<sup>1-10</sup>). And, similarly, His rebukes, touched by His gentleness, become appeals, and are charged with the inspiration of a renewed trust. His 'O ye of little faith' (Mt 8<sup>26</sup>), 'Can ye drink the cup that I drink of?' (Mk 10<sup>38</sup>), 'Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things' (Lk 10<sup>41</sup>), 'Could ye not watch with me one hour?' (Mt 26<sup>40</sup>), 'Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?' (Jn 21<sup>15-17</sup>),—were rebukes whose gentleness could leave no bitterness or despan, but recalled the soul to its loyalty to Him. So, although Jesus never formally held forth επιεικεια as an ideal of Christian life, He left us an example that we should follow His steps (1 P 2<sup>21</sup>).

GERASENES, GERGESENES.—The 'country of the Gerasenes' (Γερασσηνῶν) or 'Gergesenes' (Γεργεσηνῶν) is mentioned in Scripture only in connexion with the healing of the demoniac. The AV reads 'Gergesenes' in Mt 8<sup>28</sup>, and 'Gadarenes' in Mk 5<sup>1</sup> and Lk 8<sup>26</sup>, while the RV reads 'Gadarenes' in Mt and 'Gerasenes' in Mk. and Luke. There is preponderant evidence in favour of the changes (the reading Γερασσηνῶν in 8 in Mt. is undoubtedly for Γαδαρηνῶν). Many natives in the district surrounding the Sea of Galilee pronounce the Arabic ḡ d and ḡ dh like z—thus 'Gadarenes' they would pronounce 'Gazarenes'. The neighbourhood of the town of Gadara must be pronounced absolutely impossible for the miracle (see GADARA). How then account for the reading 'Gadarenes'? Perhaps, as Thomson suggests, the place where the miracle took place, 'over against Galilee,' was included within the district of Gadara. But as this would not be the case, Gadara having been the capital of the district, the south of the town, it might be better to say that popular usage gave to the whole district on the eastern shore of the Lake the name of the principal town. In the same way the reading Γερασσηνῶν might be explained—being derived from the large and important city of the Decapolis, Gerasa—the modern Jerash. (It need not be said that this latter town is out of the question as the scene of the miracle, being some 30 miles from the Lake). The derivation of the reading from the Decapitan city, while not perhaps impossible, is very improbable. A more likely explanation is at hand. According to Origen, the majority of the MSS he had access to had the reading 'Gerasenes'. But this reading he objected to, inasmuch as he knew of only one Gerasa, the town of the Decapolis, which he rightly conceived could not have been the scene of the miracle. He suggested that 'Gergesenes' must be the true reading, as he knew of a town on the eastern shore of the Lake bearing the name Gergesa. Hence, on his autho-riety, the reading 'Gergesenes' may have originated. But how then account for the, presumably, true reading which Origen found in the MSS? There can be here no certainty, but the probability is that Origen was right, and that the true name of the village or town where the miracle occurred, 'over against Galilee,' was Gergesa. It is extremely rare to find a soft changing into a harsh sound, such as Gerasa into Gergesa. But any one who has lived long in Palestine knows how common it is, among the uneducated natives, to find a hard sound like the second g in 'Gergesa' not only changing into a softer sound, but dropping out altogether. The pronunciation of 'Gergesa' among the common people would almost certainly be 'Ger'sa' (Gerasa). Hence from the common speech it would find its way into the text. The modern name of the village which has been identified as the scene of the miracle is Khersa or Chersa, which is nearer to 'Gerasa' than to 'Gergesa.'

The identification of the ruins of Khersa with the Gerasa of the Synoptists is due to Thomson, (LB ii. 355). The identification might have been made much earlier had not men's minds been set on selecting some place near Gadara. Had the eastern shore of the Lake been carefully scrutinized in the light of the three passages, Mt 8<sup>32</sup>, Mk 5<sup>13</sup>, Lk 8<sup>32</sup>, the identification of Khersa with the place described must have taken place. There is one spot only on the eastern shore which answers completely to the description of the Synoptists. On the eastern side 'over against Galilee' Jesus landed from the boat, and '... met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit.' The encounter, then, must have been close to the shore. Were that all we had to guide us, identification of the spot would be impossible, for there are caves, which may have been used as tombs, all along the mountain side. But it would appear from all three Synoptists that the place where the swine were destroyed ran down '... to the water's edge. Now, as we ... only one place on the eastern side where the mountain comes at all near to the beach, and just there the incline is such that one rushing down would be precipitated at once by the impetus into the water. Everywhere else along the coast there is a broad belt—half a mile or more at most parts—between the foot of the hills and the Lake. This spot is at Khersa just below Wady es-Semak. Sailing up the Lake from Wady Fik, which is almost exactly opposite Iberias, the next valley, about a mile north, is Wady es-Semak. Close to the seashore directly below the Wady are the ruins of Khersa, the walls of which can yet be distinctly traced. Directly below Khersa the hills approach close to the Lake, leaving only a narrow pebbly strand, and here the slope of the mountain side is so steep and near to the water that a herd of animals would be likely in a headlong rush to be precipitated into the sea. In the mountain above, where in all probability the swine were feeding, there are numbers of caves and also rock-cut tombs where the demoniacs may have lived. See art. DEMON.

GERIZIM.—In relation to the life and teaching of Jesus, the interest of Mt. Gerizim lies in its being the mountain to which the woman of Samaria referred on the occasion when Jesus uttered His memorable words, 'Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father' (Jn 4<sup>21</sup>).

The establishment of Mt. Gerizim and its temple as the sacred place of the Samaritans in rivalry to Jerusalem, is bound up with the growth of the jealousy and hatred between Jews and Samaritans, which had attained such magnitude ... our Lord ... by Josephus of the ... temple on ... 174 xi viii 2-4) is that Manasseh, brother of Jaddua, high priest at Jerusalem, married the daughter of Sanballat (Neh 4). For this marriage he was threatened with expulsion unless he divorced his wife. He thereupon ... Sanballat, who built for him the temple on ... and made him its first high priest. This story 'seems to be derived from some apocryphal Jewish account of the origin of the Samaritan temple' (Sayce, art 'Sanballat' in Hastings' DB). According to Neh 13<sup>28</sup>, a grandson of Eliashib the high priest was son-in-law to Sanballat, and ... for this 'mixed marriage'. More reliable, if less ... is to be found in 2 K 17<sup>24, 28</sup>, from which we learn that the king of Assyria sent back one of the ... he had carried away from the Northern Kingdom, heathen peoples whom he had settled there 'the manner of the God of the land'. Thus the worship of Jehovah ... in Samaria, and gradually asserted itself over the ... own 'which every nation made. In the days of Ezra, when the temple at Jerusalem was ... Samaritans, who are called 'the adversaries', ... desired to assist in the task, for they sa ... as ye do'. This request was refused (Ezr 4<sup>1, 3</sup>), and thus the founding of a rival shrine became inevitable. See also art SAMARITANS.

The claim of the Samaritans, that Mt. Gerizim was the true centre of the worship of Jehovah, rested upon a statement in their version of the Pentateuch (Dt 27<sup>4</sup> where 'Gerizim' is substituted for 'Ebal' of MT definitely prescribing that an altar should be built there. They also supported the claim of their shrine by traditions in which it was represented as the mountain on which Abraham ... to sacrifice Isaac (cf. G. A. Smith, ... note), the place where Abraham was met by Melchizedek, and also the scene of Jacob's dream.

Apart from such traditions, the position of Mt. Gerizim and its vis-à-vis Mt. Ebal, at the head of the pass leading right through from the river Jordan to the sea, and also at the point where the great north road from Jerusalem to Galilee intersects this pass, has given them a commanding place in the topography of the Holy Land, and has led to their association with important events in the history of Israel. Shechem, which lay between Mt. Ebal and Mt. Gerizim, is associated with the entrance of both Abraham and Jacob into the promised land (Gn 12<sup>5</sup> 33<sup>18</sup>). It was near Shechem that Jacob purchased the parcel of land from the children of Hamor, on which he erected an altar, and sank a well for his family and flocks. It was in this parcel of land that Joseph was buried (Jos 24<sup>32</sup>). Mt. Ebal and Mt. Gerizim, again, were the scenes of the great inaugural service of all Israel on taking possession of the promised land (Dt 11<sup>29</sup> 32 27<sup>11, 12</sup>, Jos 8<sup>33</sup>, 34). And it was at Shechem that Joshua gathered together the people for the renewal of the covenant, 'and took a great stone and set it up there under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord' (Jos 24<sup>1, 26</sup>). It was on Mt. Gerizim that Abimelech, Gideon's son, spoke his parable of the trees (Jg 8<sup>31</sup> 9<sup>1, 7, 20</sup>). It was at Shechem also that all Israel gathered to make Rehoboam king (1 K 12<sup>1</sup>), and this was the original capital of the Northern Kingdom.

In order to understand the significance of the question which the woman put to Jesus at the well (Jn 4<sup>20</sup>), it is necessary to remember that she must have been well instructed in the notable history of Mt. Gerizim, and would accept all the traditions of her people without question. At the same time her own religious faith was probably bankrupt. She had not found God on Mt. Gerizim. There is a vein of scepticism in her words, as of one who, having lost personal faith, points with scorn to the differences of those who worship the same God. Yet even in her scepticism there is a faint hope apparent that this 'prophet' may have a living message for her. On the historical question involved Jesus pronounces quite definitely in v. 22, but not before He has luted the whole subject out of this barren controversy and set it in relation to the fundamental principles of His teaching. There is embedded in the very beginning of the Samaritan worship of Jehovah the idea that Jehovah is the 'God of the land' (2 K 17<sup>27</sup>), and throughout the whole controversy between Jerusalem and Mt. Gerizim there is to be found the assumption that His worship must have a local centre. To this Jesus makes answer, 'God is Spirit.' It follows at once from this fundamental idea of the true nature of God that the essential quality in worship which is acceptable to Him is not the place where it is offered, but the disposition of the worshipper. Wendt points out that our Lord's teaching in this passage as to the true nature of worship is a corollary of His teaching in the Sermon on the Mount, that the heart (the whole inward nature) is the true seat of the righteousness of the people of God. So that for the ethical expansion of Jn 4<sup>23, 24</sup> we naturally turn to Mt 5-7, even as in Jn 4<sup>24</sup> we find the great doctrinal foundation alike of right conduct and right worship.

GESTURES.—Dr. Johnson defines 'gesture' as (1) 'action or posture expressive of sentiment'; (2) 'movement of the body'. Adopting these definitions, we may consider the gestures recorded or implied in the Gospels.

1. Christ heals or blesses with an outward gesture.—In most of these cases the gesture is probably intended to confirm faith; a visible sign accompanies the action. Thus (a) we read of our Lord taking the sick person by the hand, as in the case of Simon's wife's mother (Mk 1<sup>31</sup> and || Mt.), Jairus' daughter (Mk 5<sup>41</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), and the child with the dumb spirit (Mk 9<sup>27</sup>). Similarly St. Peter takes by the hand the man at the gate of the temple and Tabitha (Ac 3<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>41</sup>). Dr Swete (on Mk 9<sup>27</sup>) suggests that this gesture was used when great exhaustion had preceded. (b) Jesus lifted up His hands to bless (Lk 24<sup>30</sup>). (c) Jesus stretched forth His hand to heal, and touched or laid hands on the sick, as in the case of the leper in Mk 1<sup>41</sup> (and || Mt. Lk.). In Ac 4<sup>30</sup> the Apostles speak of God the Father stretching forth His hand to heal. Other instances of Jesus' touching the patients, doubtless, as a rule, to confirm them with faith, are: the blind men in Mt 9<sup>29</sup> 20<sup>34</sup> (the parallels to the latter in Mk.-Lk. mention no touching), the bier on which the widow's son at Naim lay (Lk 7<sup>14</sup>), the woman with the spirit of infirmity (Lk 13<sup>13</sup>), perhaps the dropsical man (Lk 14<sup>4</sup>, see Plummer, in loc.), Malchus (Lk 22<sup>51</sup>, the only account of this healing). Further, St. Luke speaks of a large number of sick folk brought to our Lord at sunset, when He 'laid his hands on every one of them and healed them' (Lk 4<sup>40</sup>, not || Mt. Mk.). The healings by anointing would also involve a touch, as by the Twelve (Mk 6<sup>13</sup>), or in the case of the blind man anointed with clay (Jn 9<sup>6</sup>); cf. Ja 5<sup>14</sup> for the custom in the Apostolic Church. Similarly we read of the sick touching Jesus,—the woman with the issue of blood (Mk 5<sup>27</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), the sick at Gennesaret and the neighbourhood (Mk 6<sup>56</sup> and || Mt.); and St. Luke (6<sup>19</sup>) says that 'all the multitude sought to touch Him, for power came forth from him and healed them all.' This 'touch' of the Lord is recalled by the cures that are recorded to have been worked by handkerchiefs or aprons carried away from the body of St Paul (Ac 19<sup>12</sup>), and by the shadow of St Peter (Ac 5<sup>15</sup>, where it is implied that many tried to touch him). And inasmuch as the Apostles would follow the example of Jesus in lesser and greater things alike (cf. Ac 4<sup>13</sup>), we find that they adopted His gesture, whether for healings or for invocations of the Holy Spirit, or even in speaking. For the touching by laying on of hands, see Ac 6<sup>8</sup> 17<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>19</sup> and 9<sup>12</sup> 28<sup>3</sup>; the last two are cases of healing. (d) Jesus laid on hands to bless, as in the case of the little children (Mk 10<sup>16</sup> and || Mt.). We read twice in Mk of our Lord's taking children in His arms (Mk 9<sup>36</sup> 10<sup>16</sup> ἐναγκαλιζόμενος), a gesture ascribed to Him in Mk. only, though a similar phrase is used of Simeon in Lk 2<sup>28</sup> ἐδέξατο αὐτὸν εἰς τὰς ἀγκύλας. In another way we read of Jesus' gesture of the hand, as at the Last Supper (λαβὼν—ἐὐλογήσας, Mk 14<sup>22</sup>) and at the meal at Emmaus (Lk 24<sup>30, 35</sup>). (e) Jesus breathed on His disciples when 'sending' them after the Resurrection, saying, 'Receive ye the Holy Spirit: whosoever sins ye forgive,' etc. (Jn 20<sup>22</sup>). Here the gesture is of a different nature; our Lord, still using an outward sign, makes breath, which is bestowed—the gift of the ἁγίου, without the article). Breath is the emblem of the Spirit, and by this gesture Jesus shows that the Holy Ghost is the 'Spirit of Christ' as well as of the Father (see Westcott, in loc.).

On the other hand, in some cases Jesus healed with a mere word. One cannot, indeed, always conclude that He did not use any outward gesture, such as touching, merely because an ἐπελάμβανον is silent on the matter (e.g. cf. Mk 10<sup>22</sup> || Mt. Lk.); but in some cases, at least, Jesus healed in absence. The following are examples of cases where apparently no gesture was used: the paralytic (Mk 2<sup>10</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), the man with the withered hand (Mk 3<sup>3</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), the centurion's servant (Lk 7<sup>10</sup>), the ten lepers (Lk 17<sup>14</sup>), the nobleman's son at Capernaum (Jn 4<sup>50</sup>). We find the same difference of gesture also in Acts; thus, in 9<sup>34</sup> 14<sup>10</sup> no gesture seems to have been used.

The use by our Lord of an outward gesture or sign in His ministerial acts was only in accordance with Jewish thought. We may recall Moses stretching forth his hand over the Red Sea (Ex 11<sup>1</sup>, cf. 17<sup>11</sup>), and, by way of contrast, the stretching out of the hand in OT as an act of punishment (Ex 7<sup>2</sup>; see other instances collected by Plummer in his note on Lk 5<sup>13</sup>). It may be thought that this usage of Jesus in His ministry paved the way for His afterwards appointing outward signs in Baptism and the Eucharist, and for the Apostles' employing them for other Christian rites, such as ordination.

2. Christ uses gestures to emphasize His words, or as an expression of emotion.—(a) We read of the stretching forth of the hand toward the disciples when Jesus claimed them as His mother and His brethren (Mt 12<sup>49</sup>); cf. St Paul's gesture when addressing Agrippa (Ac 26<sup>1</sup>). We cannot put under this head the hand outstretched in Mt 14<sup>21</sup> 26<sup>23</sup>, as there it does not express emotion; but we may compare with the above gesture the hands outstretched in prayer (1 K 8<sup>22</sup>, Ps 28<sup>2</sup> 134<sup>2</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>). A 4th cent. writer has interpreted our Lord's 'stretching forth his hands' (cf. St. Peter, Jn 21<sup>18</sup>) of His accepting suffering voluntarily (Testament of our Lord, i. 23). (b) We read of many gestures with the eyes. Jesus looked up to heaven at the miracle of the feeding of the five thousand (Mk 6<sup>41</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), in His last prayer before going to Gethsemane (Jn 17<sup>1</sup>) at the healing of the deaf man with an impediment (Mk 7<sup>34</sup>), and the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11<sup>4</sup>). It is doubtless due to the first two of these passages that we find in many ancient Liturgies, from the Apostolic Constitutions onwards, this gesture ascribed to our Lord when He consecrated the Eucharist—as in the Greek St.

James (in the Syriac St James it is only implied), St Mark both Greek and Coptic, Abyssinian (or Ethiopic), St. Basil, Roman and Ambrosian. The gesture is one of prayer, and implies that prayer accompanied the actions described (see Job 22<sup>28</sup>; cf. the publican, Lk 18<sup>13</sup>). Again, the references to the 'glance' or 'look' of our Lord are very frequent. In Mk 3<sup>5</sup> it conveys His righteous anger (|| Lk does not mention the anger). In Mk 3<sup>34</sup> 10<sup>27</sup> (and || Mt) and Lk 6<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>17</sup>, it apparently emphasizes the truth taught. In Lk 22<sup>11</sup>, brings conviction of sin to St. Peter after his denials. In Mk 10<sup>21</sup> it is a mark of love; here, as so often, St. Mark alone relates the feelings of our Lord's human soul. The glance to emphasize truth must also be understood where we expressly read of Jesus' 'turning' to those whom He is addressing (Mk 8<sup>23</sup>, Lk 7<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>55</sup> etc.). On the other hand, no special must be attached to passages where our Lord's 'look' is mentioned, but where it was merely that He might see, as Mk 5<sup>32</sup> (and || Mt), Lk 19<sup>5</sup> 21<sup>1</sup>. (b) Concerning with this gesture of Jesus is the keen 'gaze' or 'fastening of the eyes' which we read of in the case of the people of Nazareth (Lk 4<sup>20</sup>), the maidservant (Lk 22<sup>56</sup>), St Peter (Ac 3<sup>4</sup>, cf. 3<sup>12</sup>), the Sanhedrin (Ac 6<sup>15</sup>), St Stephen (Ac 7<sup>55</sup>), Cornelius (Ac 10<sup>4</sup>), St. Paul (Ac 13<sup>9</sup> 14<sup>23</sup> 23<sup>1</sup>)—all having ἀρεσκύν, one of St. Luke's favourite words; in the case of St Paul it is difficult to reconcile with the idea that the 'stake in the flesh' was ophthalmia. (c) The gesture of kneeling or prostration is mentioned only once of our Lord, in Gethsemane (Mk 14<sup>35</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), the first two Evangelists speaking of prostration, the third of kneeling. As standing was the usual attitude for prayer* (Mk 11<sup>25</sup>, where see Swete's note, Lk 18<sup>11, 13</sup>), we must interpret this kneeling or prostration as specially signifying deep distress, as when it signified special penitence... of the 20th canon of Nicea on... like Sundays and Eastertide (so Tertullian, de Cor. Mil. 3). And so it was significant of deep distress in the case of St Stephen (Ac 7<sup>60</sup>), and probably of St. Peter when he raised Tabitha (Ac 9<sup>40</sup>); in the case of St. Paul's farewells it would be due to the great... of the occasion (Ac 20<sup>36</sup> 21<sup>5</sup>, cf. also 1 K... 9<sup>5</sup>, Dn 6<sup>10</sup>, Eph 3<sup>14</sup>). Nevertheless, the usual standing to pray would not preclude prostration at intervals to express... as is the case to this day among all Eastern Christians. To... the gesture of kneeling or... practised in the Gospels. We read of... kneeling to Jesus—the leper (Mk 1<sup>40</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), demoniacs (Mk 3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>), Jairus (Mk 5<sup>22</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), the Syrophenician woman (Mk 7<sup>26</sup> and || Mt.), the rich young man (Mk 10<sup>17</sup>), the blind man (Jn 9<sup>38</sup>), Mary of Bethany (Jn 11<sup>32</sup>), the lunatic's father (Mt 17<sup>14</sup>, not || Mk. Lk.), Salome (Mt 20<sup>30</sup>, not || Mk.), the Magi (Mt 2<sup>11</sup>), St. Peter at the miraculous draught of fishes (Lk 5<sup>8</sup>), and so the soldiers in derision (Mk 15<sup>19</sup> and || Mt.). The devil tempts our Lord to kneel to him (Mt 4<sup>9</sup> and || Lk.). The women prostrate themselves at the tomb (Lk 24<sup>5</sup>). Cornelius attempts to do so before St. Peter (Ac 10<sup>25</sup>), St. John before the angel (Rev 19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>9</sup>). (d) A gesture to... speech may probably be understood in Mk 12<sup>1</sup> where it may be that Jesus pointed to the scribe's phylactery, which contained the words, 'Hear, O Israel,' etc. (e) An isolated gesture is the stooping to write on it... in the 'Pericope adulteræ' (Jn 8<sup>6</sup>),... signifying 'intentional inattention.' Westcott (in loc.) remarks that the very strangeness of the action marks the authenticity of the detail. (f) We read of gestures expressing grief.

Jesus sighed at weakness of faith (Mk 7<sup>34</sup> 8<sup>13</sup>), and groaned (or was moved with indignation, ἐνεβριμήσατο), shuddered (ἐτάραξεν εαυτὸν), and wept at Lazarus' grave (Jn 11<sup>35, 38</sup>); He shuddered at the thought of the betrayal (Jn 13<sup>21</sup>), and wept over Jerusalem (Lk 19<sup>41</sup>).

To speak generally, it may be noted that the Fourth Evangelist is more chary of chronicling our Lord's gestures than the Synoptists. He dwells rather on Jesus' words than on the actions with which He accompanied them.

3. Various gestures by others.—To an Oriental people, gesture is almost as natural a method of expressing the meaning as speech. We find in the Gospels frequent references to such a method of communication. This is not only when no other is possible, as when dumb Zacharias makes signs (Lk 1<sup>22</sup>) and the people make signs to him (v<sup>62</sup>—perhaps he was also deaf); just as in Acts, St Peter has to make signs to procure silence in Ac 12<sup>17</sup>, and St Paul in Ac 21<sup>40</sup> and perhaps 13<sup>16</sup>. But we find such expressive gestures as shaking off the dust (Mk 6<sup>11</sup> and || Mt. Lk.; this is our Lord's command to the Twelve), to signify the disavowal of oneself from an offender. So Paul and Barnabas did at Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13<sup>51</sup>), and so Paul 'shook out his raiment' against the unbelieving Jews at Corinth (18<sup>6</sup>). Again, rending the garments was a common Jewish gesture of consternation or grief, often mentioned in OT (e.g. Gn 37<sup>29, 34</sup>, Jl 2<sup>13</sup>), in the Gospels we find it mentioned only of Caiaphas (Mk 14<sup>63</sup> and || Mt.); in Acts (14<sup>14</sup>) only of Paul and Barnabas at Lystra. Smiting the breast as a sign of grief we find in Lk 23<sup>48</sup> (where D adds τὰ μέτωπα), and in Mt 11<sup>17</sup> (ἐκόπασθε) and Lk 18<sup>13</sup>. Wagging the head was the denisive gesture of the passers-by at the Crucifixion (Mk 15<sup>29</sup> and || Mt.; cf. 2 K 19<sup>21</sup>, Job 16<sup>4</sup>, La 2<sup>15</sup>, Sir 12<sup>18</sup> 13<sup>7</sup>). Pilate's gesture of washing his hands (Mt 27<sup>24</sup>) has furnished a proverbial saying, but it was familiar to the Jews (Dt 21<sup>6</sup>). The kindred idea of washing the hands to express innocency (i.e. ridding oneself of evil) is found in Ex 30<sup>18</sup> and Ps 26<sup>6</sup> 73<sup>13</sup>, and is... of the Church Orders and the... Finally we notice the kiss as the... as in the case of the sinful woman (Lk 7<sup>45</sup>), of Judas (Mk 14<sup>45</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), and of the Ephesian elders (Ac 20<sup>37</sup>). It is true that the kiss was the ordinary way of greeting a Rabbi (see Swete on Mk 14<sup>45</sup>), but in all these cases much more than ordinary courtesy is intended by the gesture, and probably καταφιλεῖν in these passages means 'to kiss fervently' (in the case of Judas) ... S 20<sup>41</sup>, 2 S 15<sup>5</sup> 19<sup>30</sup> 20<sup>9</sup>, many of which passages speak of kisses of greeting like that of Judas, to which Joab's is indeed strangely similar.

GETHSEMANE (Γεθσημανή, perhaps for [גֶּתְשֶׁמָנֶה] 'oil press').—Gethsemane is usually described as a 'place' with a garden attached to it; but, so far as the words of Scripture show, it may have been simply a garden. St Matthew (26<sup>36</sup>) and St Mark (14<sup>32</sup>) use the word χωρὶον, St. Luke (22<sup>40</sup>) uses τόπος, and St. John (18<sup>1</sup>), describing it as ὅπου ἦν κήπος, refers to it again (18<sup>2</sup>) as τόπος. It lay east of Jerusalem, across the Kidron (Jn 18<sup>1</sup>), at the foot of or upon the Mount of Olives (Mt 26<sup>30</sup>, Mk 14<sup>36</sup>, Lk 22<sup>39</sup>; cf. Euseb. OS<sup>2</sup> 248. 18, and Jerome, ib. 130. 22). The traditional site is in the Kidron ravine, at a point about equidistant, as the crow flies, from the Golden Gate and St. Stephen's Gate. It is easily reached by the road passing through the latter and crossing the Kidron bridge, just beyond which it lies, a square plot of ground with eight very ancient olive-trees. If the statement of Josephus (BJ vi. i. 1), that Titus cut down all the trees upon that side of the city, be correct, the tradition that those trees are as old as the Christian era, or the tradition as to the site, must be abandoned. Both probably are unfounded, and, according to the general consensus of opinion, this site was fixed upon at the time of the Empress Helena's visit to Jerusalem (A D. 326).

The scene of Christ's agonizing prayers immediately before the betrayal, and of His betrayal and capture (Mt 26<sup>36-57</sup>, Mk 14<sup>32-53</sup>, Lk 22<sup>40-54</sup>, Jn 18<sup>1-14</sup>), it has been a favourite resort with the Master and His disciples (Lk 21<sup>27</sup>, Jn 18<sup>2</sup>). GHOST.—Used in the Bible only in the phrases 'giving up the ghost' (Mt 27<sup>46</sup>, Mk 15<sup>36</sup>, Lk 23<sup>46</sup>, Jn 19<sup>30</sup>), 'ghost' a survival of the meaning commonly associated with it in the times of the translators, when it was used as equivalent to 'spirit' (Germ Geist). The usage of the word 'ghost' as equivalent to 'spirit' has become archaic. The meaning now uniformly given to it makes its continued use in our RV inexpedient. This was recognized by the American Revisers, who substituted 'Holy Spirit' in every instance for 'Holy Ghost.' See, further, art. HOLY SPIRIT, SPIRIT.

GIFT.—Christ continually reminds His disciples that the Father is the source of all gifts. To Him we must trustfully turn. 'Ask, and it shall be given' (Mt 7<sup>7</sup>); 'Everyone that asketh receiveth' (Lk 11<sup>10</sup>), and not only 'daily bread' (Mt 6<sup>11</sup>, Lk 11<sup>3</sup>), but 'whatsoever' is asked (Jn 15<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>23</sup>). He will never refuse the gift of the Holy Spirit to them that ask (Lk 11<sup>13-15</sup>, Mt 7<sup>11</sup>), for it is His 'good pleasure' to give them 'the kingdom' (Lk 12<sup>32</sup>). When Christ has ascended, it is the Father who will send 'another Comforter' (Jn 14<sup>26</sup>); and when trials and persecution shall arise, it is the Father by whom, Christ says, 'it shall be given you in that hour what ye shall say' (Mt 10<sup>19</sup>). We see this confidence inspiring the multitude to glorify God 'which had given such power unto men' in the healing of the palsied man (Mt 9<sup>9</sup>), and making the practical Martha say, 'I know that whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, God will give unto thee' (Jn 11<sup>22</sup>).

It is notable that Christ's only recorded request for a personal favour should have been the occasion of that deep saying concerning the gift of God' (Jn 4<sup>10</sup>). The word used—charis—implies a peculiar freedom in the giving; something of bounty not to be purchased. It is used nowhere else in the Gospels (save in the OT quotation in Jn 15<sup>26</sup>); but in the Acts and Epistles it usually occurs as the distinguishing word for God's highest gifts—as of grace itself (Eph 3<sup>7</sup>), of the heavenly gift (He 6<sup>4</sup>), or the unspeakable gift' (2 Co 9<sup>15</sup>), of the saving power of Christ's life and death (Ro 5<sup>15</sup>), of Christ in us (Eph 4<sup>7</sup>), or of the Holy Spirit (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>45</sup> 11<sup>17</sup>). In Jn 4<sup>10</sup> some hold that our Lord spoke of Himself as 'the gift of God' (cf. Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), others that He meant the unique opportunity the woman now had of gaining religious life by accepting of Him; and the two ideas blend in the thought that the uppermost thought would be the parabolic suggestion of the water for which Jesus had asked, and 'the gift of God' would most naturally be that 'living water' which He Himself could give her, and which would solve her dimly discerned problems of conduct and worship. The Jews had long connected the precious gift of 'living water' with that ever-new and ever-living power of the Spirit which, coming from God, can alone satisfy the soul's thirst for Him (Zec 14<sup>8</sup>, Jer 2<sup>13</sup> 17<sup>13</sup>). So Christ seems to use it here. If the woman but knew 'the gift of God,' that fount of the living Spirit which, springing up within, and independent of Samaritan books of the Law, is the assurance of eternal life (v. 14), and if she could but recognize the supremacy of love and spiritual power in Him who was speaking, then she would not hesitate to ask an infinitely greater gift than He had asked of her. Thus Christ would be the agency; the Eternal Spirit would be 'the gift.'

The greatest of all gifts would be one's life. This Christ gave. All other gifts of His are included in this. They are the fruit of this complete self-surrender, which could yield up all things for love of men. True, He gave, and gives His disciples, the unfathomable gift of a Peace which the world could not give (Jn 14<sup>27</sup>), a Rest for all weary spirits (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>). To His own He is the Living Water (Jn 4<sup>14</sup>), the Bread of Life (6<sup>21</sup>). He gives the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>), the new commandment of Love (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>), and Life Eternal (10<sup>28</sup>). But the highest gift included these and more. It was the gift of His life, 'a ransom for many' (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). This He offered to the Eternal Father, to that Righteousness whose final decision was beyond the Son of man's bestowal: 'To sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give' (Mt 20<sup>23</sup>, Mk 10<sup>40</sup>). For the gift of the Holy Spirit see art. HOLY SPIRIT. See also art. GIVING.

EDGAR DAPLYN.

GIRDLE.—See DRESS, p. 498<sup>b</sup>.

GIVING.—The duty of giving springs naturally out of the gospel fact. Jesus Christ is God's gift (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), and when St. Paul associates the liberality of the Christians of Corinth and this grace of God (2 Co 9<sup>15</sup>), he is true to the mind of Christ. Giving and receiving are correlatives: 'freely ye received, freely give' (Mt 10<sup>8</sup>; the endowment is of Divine power and authority, and the service is to be as wide as human need; cf. Ac 3<sup>9</sup>). Throughout the Gospel narrative the welcome of Christ awakens generous impulses. The new resolve of Zacchæus (Lk 19<sup>8</sup>) is the free expression of his new life. The grace of Christ had come near to him, and he, in that high fellowship, could not but be gracious. So, generally, giving is the necessary expression of Christian faith and love, the spontaneous outcome of Christian life.

Almsgiving is recognized by Jesus as a part of 'righteousness' (Mt 6<sup>12</sup> RV), and the duty of practising it is often enforced (see ALMS). But the care of the poor by no means exhausts the activities of the generous spirit. Treasury gifts for the temple service were recognized by Jesus (Mk 12<sup>41</sup> = Lk 21<sup>1</sup>), and gifts for the upholding of public worship are an essential part of worship.

So, too, Jesus accepted and honoured gifts directly bestowed upon Himself. 'Certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities . . . ministered unto him of their substance' (Lk 8<sup>24</sup>). In the same spirit were Matthew's feast after his call (Lk 5<sup>29</sup>), the anointing by the woman of the city (Lk 7<sup>37</sup>), and the supper at Bethany (Jn 12<sup>2</sup>). These were acts of grateful love, and they were welcomed by Jesus. The incident of the outpouring of the spikenard (Jn 12<sup>3</sup> = Mt 26<sup>6</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3</sup>) is the more significant because of the criticism it provoked, and the reply of Jesus, 'Ye have the poor always with you, and whosoever ye will ye can do them good' (Mk 14<sup>7</sup>). Is there here a hidden rebuke for neglect of opportunities ever present, on the part of those who here professed disapproval of waste? Certainly the reply suggests the thought 'that expenditure in one direction does not diminish for beneficent acts in another. The willing-minded will always have enough for all purposes' (Expositor's Gr. Test., in loco). By accepting and honouring this costly act of thankful love Jesus sanctions the utmost that love prompts. It is in such giving that the joy of sacrifice is known and the secret of Jesus realized—'It is more blessed to give than to receive' (Ac 20<sup>35</sup>).

But all service is included in Christ's law of giving, not alms to the poor alone, but all the manifold expressions of love, the '... springs out of the new family ... hood. How this spirit works ... illustrated in the ministry of Jesus ... again before His gracious acts of healing or of bounty, it is said, 'he was moved with compassion' (Mt 9<sup>36</sup> 15<sup>42</sup>, Mk 6<sup>34</sup>); and His ... id expression in the sending for ... the feeding of the multitude, and in teaching

So is it with His ... All tender ministries are the ... Divine compassion, 'the exceeding grace of God in you' (2 Co 9<sup>14</sup>).

But the law of Christian service goes beyond this. It is founded in justice, the true relations which men hold in Christ. The second commandment of love to our neighbour (Mt 19<sup>19</sup> 22<sup>39</sup>) and the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>30ff</sup>) teach the true inwardness of ...

True ... is that which is due from one man to another because of the ties of humanity. Hence the personal equation in beneficence. All true giving resolves itself into ... the expression of sympathy, reverence, ... the charity ... care and thought (Lk 6<sup>27-35</sup>). It is this ... as man, and because of the ties of a Divine humanity, which is the service of Christ. 'Ye did it unto me' (Mt 25<sup>40</sup>) covers the whole ground.

But while it is ever true that 'money values are not the standard of gifts in the Kingdom of God,' this must not be pressed so as to minimize gifts of money. These must often measure 'the moral value of the giver.' Indeed, this is the lesson of the Treasury (Lk 21<sup>4</sup>), they 'of their superfluity,' she 'of her want.' The frequent reference to money in the Gospels show the importance which Jesus attached to this factor in life. The stewardship of all possessions is taught in the parable of the Rich Fool (Lk 12<sup>16ff</sup>); for 'rich ... cf. 1 Ti 6<sup>17</sup>). Judgment is pronounced upon the selfish use of wealth in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19ff</sup>). Hence the warnings against covetousness (Lk 12<sup>15</sup>). Giving, thus exercised, becomes a 'means of grace,' by which the heart is cleansed (Lk 11<sup>41</sup>); a suggestive rendering of this saying is given in Expositor, II. v. [1883], 318, 'but as to what is within, give alms, and behold all things are clean unto you'.

The test of the young ruler (Lk 18<sup>22</sup>) is not so much 'a counsel of perfection' for all, as the word in season for the individual. The general lesson on wealth and its uses is in the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>14</sup>). Confessedly difficult of interpretation as this parable is in detail, its main lesson can hardly be overlooked—Heaven, which cannot be bought by gold, may yet be prepared for by the best uses of wealth. The giving of money by men who know its value, and whose keenest activities are directed to get it, is a searching test of their self-denial and devotion. True liberality is the Divinely appointed safeguard against covetousness, with this caution, 'to whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required' (Lk 12<sup>48</sup>).

The question of definite 'proportionate giving'

may be briefly dismissed. It has been sought to press the law of a tenth as binding upon all, and the words of Jesus (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>) are quoted in support. But the ground is insufficient. An incidental reference cannot set aside the whole spirit of the Gospel. Any rule imposed from without is alien to the free spirit of love. Rules which the individual may lay down for his own guidance are for the individual conscience to determine, but 'the Christian law is the spirit of Christ, that Enthusiasm of Humanity which He declared to be the source from which all right action flows' (Ecce Homo). 'Charity has no other limit than charity itself' (Godet). Cf. Lk 6<sup>30</sup>.

GLORY.—There are few commoner words in the English Bible than 'glory,' and few more difficult of definition. The word ... on the surface to be used in a strange ... meanings and applications, and with both good and bad connotation. Reputation, praise, honour (true and false), splendour, light, perfection, rewards (temporal and eternal)—all these varying conceptions seem covered by the same word.

Nevertheless the underlying thought is simpler than would appear. In the OT a large number of words are translated in English by 'glory,' but by far the most common is כָּבוֹד, of which the root idea is 'heaviness,' and so in a metaphorical sense, 'weight,' 'worthiness.' The LXX frequently employs δόξα to translate this, as well as a great number of other Hebrew words; and δόξα (with its connected verb δοξάζω) is the usual NT word rendered 'glory.' This word is derived, of course, from the root of δοκέω, 'to think or suppose,' and the primary meaning of δόξα is, no doubt, 'thought or opinion,' especially, favourable human opinion, and thus in a secondary sense 'reputation,' 'honour,' etc.

But an important new shade of meaning comes into the word when it is used in religious language. The δόξα of man, human opinion, etc., is shifting, uncertain, often based on error, and its pursuit for its own sake is unworthy. But there is a δόξα of God which must be absolutely true and ... God's 'opinion' marks the true value ... as they appear to the eternal mind; and God's 'favourable opinion' is true 'glory.' This contrast is well seen in Jn 5<sup>44</sup> 12<sup>43</sup>. Hence 'glory,' whether applied to God Himself or to His works as seen by Him, must imply the absolute truth which underlies all phenomena. This gives us the connecting link between 'the glory that cometh from God' and the 'glory' which man conceives of as belonging to God Himself. The 'glory of God,' therefore, must mean His essential and unchanging Godhead as revealed to man. And the familiar ascription 'Glory to God' would imply not only a right human praise, but the assigning to God of what He truly is, for nothing higher can be given Him. Similarly the true 'glory' of man or nature must be the real condition, that final perfection, which exists as a real fact in the Divine mind. The glory of God is what He is essentially; the glory of created things is what they are meant by God to be, though not yet perfectly attained (He 2<sup>10</sup>, Ro 8<sup>18-21</sup>).

Passing on to that which this article is specially concerned with,—What is meant by the 'glory' and the 'glorifying' of Jesus Christ? It must mean ( $\alpha$ ) the revelation of His essential Deity, that which He is in the mind of the Father, though veiled from man by the limitation of the Incarnation. See Jn 17<sup>5</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>8</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>. ( $\beta$ ) The revelation of the ideal and perfect condition of human nature, as elevated by its union with God in the Incarnation to that which God means it to be by the law of its creation, that which already in the mind of God it essentially is. Then the glory of Christ is the explanation and justification of Gn 1<sup>27</sup> (cf. 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>).

But besides this fundamental conception of 'glory' which springs out of the primary meaning of the Greek word, it is to be noticed that 'glory' in Scripture usually carries with it ideas of 'light,' 'splendour,' and 'beauty.' Thus pre-eminently 'the glory of the Lord' in the OT is the visible shining forth of light, by which the Divine Presence is recognized by man, the קֶדֶשׁ of the later Jews. So the 'glory' appeared to Israel at Sinai (Ex 24<sup>16-17</sup>), at the door of the Tent (Lv 9<sup>23</sup>, Nu 14<sup>10-16</sup>), at the dedication of Solomon's Temple (1 K 8<sup>10-11</sup>), in the visions of Isaiah (6<sup>1-3</sup>) and Ezekiel (1<sup>28</sup> 3<sup>23</sup> 8<sup>4</sup>). Similarly the Messianic hopes of Israel are expressed under the figure of 'glory dwelling in the land' (Ps 85<sup>9</sup>). See att 'Glory' (in OT) and 'Shekinah' in Hastings' DB. Passing to the NT, the same conception of 'glory' is seen in St. Luke's account of the Nativity (2<sup>9</sup>). And thus is brought into direct connexion with the Person of Christ in the narratives of the Transfiguration, in St. Luke's (9<sup>28ff</sup>). There the 'glory' shines forth visibly in the dazzling brightness of His countenance. It encompasses the forms of Moses and Elijah (v 31); it even transfigures material objects like Christ's cloth (v 34). This passage should be compared the visions of Stephen in Ac 7<sup>55</sup>; of Saul of Tarsus (Ac 9<sup>3</sup> 22<sup>9-11</sup> 26<sup>13</sup>), and of St. John in Patmos (Rev 1<sup>12-16</sup>).

A more metaphysical conception of the 'glory' of Christ is seen in St. John's Gospel. The Evangelist may indeed be alluding to the Transfiguration in 1<sup>14</sup>, and to the visible glory in 1<sup>14</sup>, vision in 12<sup>41</sup>. But in 2<sup>11</sup> and 11<sup>30</sup> he is evidently transcending some revelation to the inward eye of what Christ is in some intuition of His Divine power borne in upon the soul or the believer. In Christ's words and works His true nature, as the 'effulgence' of the Father's glory, flashes upon and illuminates not the intellectual faculties merely, but the whole being of man, filling it with the sense of light and beauty and satisfaction.

Thus we seem to arrive at a conception of 'glory' which combines both the ideas of δόξα, as 'splendour' and as the manifestation of eternal truth as it is in the Divine mind.

In this sense Christ looks forward to and prays for the 'glorifying' of Himself by the Father (Jn 13<sup>31-32</sup> 17<sup>1</sup>). This glorifying is in a true sense accomplished in the Passion, as issuing in the Resurrection, whereby the true nature of Christ and His redemptive work were recognized and rejoiced in by the faithful. There is a 'glory' which is yet to come, but the present revelation to the Church of Christ's glory is of the same order as the future one which will complete it (17<sup>24</sup>). The Christian community, already ideally perfected by the separation of Judas (Jn 13<sup>31</sup>), is henceforth to recognize permanently what individual intuition had already perceived and confessed at different points of the ministry. And this 'glorifying' of Christ is to be the 'glorifying' of the Father (Jn 17<sup>1</sup>), for the completion of Christ's work will reveal the Divine mind and purpose to the Church; and it is also the 'glorifying' of the believer and of the Church as a whole (v 22), for the Church will be the permanent witness of God to the world (v 23), and man in union with Christ is on the way to attain the Divine ideal (v 23).

The same profound conceptions of 'glory' appear in the writings of St. Paul and St. Peter. The object of the Christian calling is 'the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ' (2 Th 2<sup>14</sup>). The invisible 'glory' of the Christian Church through its union with Christ by the Spirit is greater than the visible 'glory' of the Old Covenant (2 Co 3<sup>7-11</sup>). The 'glory' of God in Christ by the believer is a new light (4<sup>6</sup>). Present limitations and sufferings will be abundantly compensated in the full future revelation of 'glory' (v 17, cf. Ro 8<sup>18ff</sup>). Indeed, the 'glory' of the believer is already ideally complete; it will be visibly completed in the Resurrection of the body (Ph 3<sup>21</sup>, cf. 1 P 5<sup>4</sup>).

In the Resurrection life, therefore, Christ will be seen and known by all the faculties, the whole being of man redeemed, as sharing fully and in the 'glory' of the Godhead. His glory will be recognized in the 'glory' which was ever in His humanity will be seen by its union with His Divinity, 'taken up into God' (Quicumque vult), and so the perfect expression and vehicle of (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). Hence in the ideal and perfected Church, as described in the Apocalypse, both humanity and its material setting are illuminated with 'the glory of the Lamb,' whose glorified humanity is, as it were, the 'Lamp' (Rev 21<sup>23</sup>) in which shines the 'glory' of the Godhead.

It will be seen that this one word 'glory' is really a summary of the Divine purpose for creation as revealed in Scripture—

'From Eden's loss unto the end of years.'

The 'glory of God' is revealed in the 'glory of Christ,' and both nature and man are in Christ progressing towards 'the liberty of the glory of the children of God' (Ro 8<sup>4</sup>).

GLUTTONOUS.—In Mt 11<sup>19</sup> = Lk 7<sup>34</sup> we are informed that our Lord was reproached as a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber. The Greek is alike in both passages—ἀνθρώπος φάγος καὶ οἰνοπότης. The English versions are probably right in their rendering of φάγος and οἰνοπότης as implying intemperate excess. But this hardly lies in the words themselves. φάγος (Liddell and Scott, s. v.) is found only in these passages and in later ecclesiastical writers. οἰνοπότης does not imply excess (Anacreon, 98; Call. E. 1. 1. 8. 2). In Pr 23<sup>30</sup> it answers to כִּי יִכְרוֹ 'one who is drunken with wine' (cf. Dt 21<sup>20</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>42</sup>, Hos 4<sup>18</sup> for use of the Heb. root); and it is parallel with μέθυσος in 23<sup>31</sup>. In Pr 31<sup>4</sup> (24<sup>72</sup> Swete) the verb οἰνοπορέω occurs in the bad sense. But it is possible that the real force of the insult to our Lord is shown by Dt 21<sup>20</sup>. The rebellious son is to be brought by his parents to the elders, to whom the parents are to say, 'This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice, he is a riotous liver and a drunkard.' He is then to be executed by stoning. It is true that the LXX here συμβολοκοπῶν οἰνοφλυγεί has no resemblance to the phrase in the Gospels, but Pr 23<sup>30</sup> has μηδὲ ἐκρείνον συμβολαῖς as one half of the doublet, 'among gluttonous eaters of flesh' (בֹּלֵלִי בָשָׂר); and in Pr 23<sup>31</sup> Aq., Sym., Theod. agree in using the Deuteronomic word συμβολοκόπος for בֹּלֵל. Delitzsch in his Heb. NT uses the words found in Dt 21<sup>20</sup>.

We need not wonder at the non-agreement with the LXX. For the discourse has several indications that it has been spoken in Aramaic, such as the paronomasia ḥayim 'be found in the cry of the children' (Mt 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>) and 'wept', of Fariar, Life of Christ, 1 92, and the Peshitta), and the variation ḥayim—ḥayim (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>35</sup>) which is best explained by supposing some error in reading an Aramaic document.

GOD—Introduction.—The sphere of the revelation of Jesus was limited to the Fatherhood of God (see FATHER), and all His other references to the Divine Being are more or less incidental. They involve conceptions which He shared with OT prophets, and to some extent also with contemporary Judaism; but the form which some of these conceptions take in His teaching, and the relative emphasis which He laid upon them, are modified by that truth which was central and fundamental in His own experience and thought of God. Jesus, in all His references to God, spoke after the manner of a prophet, and not after the manner of the Rabbis or the Christian theologian. He never sought to prove the existence of God. These were views regarding the nature or the attributes of God. All that He said stood in direct relation to right conduct.

The aim of the present article is to set forth briefly those views of God, expressed or implied in the words of Jesus, which may properly be considered apart from the Divine Fatherhood, and which are, to some extent, characteristic of Jesus.

1. God is one.—To Jesus, as to His people, God was one. He did not believe in a plurality of gods. To the scribe who asked which commandment was greatest Jesus quoted the familiar confession from Deut. (6<sup>4th</sup>) which begins with the words, 'Jehovah our God is one Jehovah' (Mt 22<sup>39</sup>); and the author of the Fourth Gospel represents Jesus as addressing these words of prayer to the Father—'This is life eternal, that they should know thee, the only true God' (τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν, Jn 17<sup>3</sup>).

Jesus spoke of the Holy Spirit; and if there is any place at which He suggests a personal distinction in the Divine Being, it is here. It is necessary, therefore, to consider His words on this subject. His references to the Spirit in the oldest Gospels are extremely rare, and in only one instance do all the Synoptics agree in reporting the use of this term. This is the passage concerning blasphemy against the Spirit (Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, Mt 12<sup>31</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>). There are three other* occasions on which, according to one or two of the Gospels, Jesus spoke of the Spirit. (a) The first occasion was when He spoke words of encouragement to His disciples in anticipation of their future need of support when called before governors and kings. In Matthew (10<sup>40</sup>), He said to them, 'It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you.' In Luke we have two passages referring to the same, or at least very similar occasions; one of these speaks of the Holy Spirit (τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα), while in the other Jesus is represented as saying, 'I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to withstand' (Lk 12<sup>12</sup> 21<sup>15</sup>). Mark has a similar word of Jesus, but puts it on a different occasion. The situation of the disciples is the same, and Jesus says, 'It is not ye that speak, but the Holy Spirit' (Mk 13<sup>31</sup>). The thought which all the accounts have in common is that of Divine assistance. The agent who assists is either the 'Holy Spirit,' the 'Spirit of your Father,' or Jesus Himself.

(b) Another reference by Jesus to the Spirit is found in His reply to those who accused Him of working in league with Beelzebub. Here He said, 'If I by the Spirit of God cast out demons' (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>); or, according to Luke, 'If I by the finger of God cast out demons' (11<sup>20</sup>).

(c) Finally, according to Mark (12<sup>36</sup>), Jesus referred to the 110th Psalm as spoken in the Holy Spirit. Mt. has simply ἐν πνεύματι, and Lk. no reference to the Spirit.

Now the language of these passages does not appear to suggest a different view of the Spirit from that of the old prophets. If Jesus as a rule represented His disciples as saying, 'The Father, and the Father as . . . and then in a single instance, when speaking still of the Divine aid, said, 'the Spirit of your Father' or the 'Π. S. . . not suppose that He made . . . between them. His word is an echo of such a passage as Is 61<sup>1</sup> 'The Spirit of the Lord Jehovah is upon me,' and is in part a fulfilment of the promise in Joel (2<sup>28</sup>) that the Spirit shall be poured out upon all flesh. The statement of Jesus in Mt. 12<sup>28</sup> Psalm, that it was spoken in the Holy Spirit, is parallel to this word . . . It shall be with them . . . with the author of this psalm. The Spirit of their Father will speak in them.

Again, when Jesus said, 'If I by the Spirit of God [or the finger of God] cast out demons,' it is manifest that His thought is that of God's presence and aid. It is like the language of Micah when he said, 'I am full of power by the Spirit of Jehovah' (3<sup>8</sup>). The Fourth Gospel expresses the same thought when it represents Jesus as saying, 'I . . . abiding in me doeth his works' (Jn 14<sup>10</sup>).

Finally, when Jesus warned the scribes and Pharisees . . . irremissible sin of blasphemy against the Spirit, it is obvious that we cannot draw any personal distinction between this Spirit and God. These men had attributed the manifestly good work of Jesus to the prince of bad spirits. Thus they had wilfully called good evil (cf. Is 5<sup>20</sup>). They had violated conscience; they had quenched, at least for the moment, this inner and fundamental voice of God. This manifestation of God within them is called the Spirit of God in accordance with OT usage, which ascribes a spirit to Jehovah, in and through which He

† The notion of some, that the phrase in the Gospels is based upon a conception of Gehenna as a place of extreme cold, and that 'gnashing' = 'chattering of teeth,' is very precarious.

The teaching of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 14-16) regarding the Spirit marks an advance on that of the Synoptics, both in quantity and in character; but this teaching, as it now stands, like the other discourses of John, cannot be attributed directly to Jesus. It appears to represent a stage of thought fully as late as that which we find in Mt 28<sup>19</sup>. We need not, therefore, discuss it in this connexion, where we are concerned with the teaching of Jesus. And we conclude this paragraph with the statement that there is nothing in the narrative of the genuine teaching of Jesus which suggests a modification of the old prophetic conception of a pure monotheism.*

2. God is holy.—The conception which Jesus had of the holiness of God is implied rather than expressed in His teaching; yet though not directly stated, it is fundamental, and marks an advance on the teaching of the OT. How fundamental this conception was in the teaching of Jesus may be illustrated from the Sermon on the Mount. According to this, the standard of the Kingdom of God called for a righteousness that exceeded the righteousness of the Pharisees (Mt 5<sup>20</sup>). The Law declared that a man should not kill, but Jesus taught that anger toward one to the same danger of judgment (v. 21). The Law declared against adultery, but He declared against the lustful desire (v. 27-28). Now this profounder conception of sin, this inner holiness, if the gravest penalties to the secret feelings and to the unclean desire, implies a clearer and more ethical conception of the holiness of God.

Again, Jesus' sense of the holiness of God is reflected when He says that it is the aim of His mission to call sinners (Mt 9<sup>13</sup>, Mk 2<sup>17</sup> [Lk 5<sup>32</sup> adds, 'to repentance']; and II: 17) is still more significantly seen in the inner holiness or the pure in heart (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>). The intensity of His appreciation of God may be measured by the severity of His judgment on impenitent sinners. One of such tenderness of heart as Jesus showed in all His relations to others—a tenderness which He believed was an attribute of God—could not have uttered such words of judgment as Mk 3<sup>29</sup> 12<sup>1</sup> and Mt 25<sup>46</sup>, unless He had had an open vision of the Divine purity.

It is obvious from this brief survey that, to the thought of Jesus, the holiness of God was a fundamental fact, and it is equally plain that His conception of this Divine attribute was profoundly ethical. Its demands could not be satisfied, as the scribes taught, by the performance of any number of statutes. Nothing but a righteous state of the heart could satisfy them. Jesus taught His disciples to ask for the pardon of their sins, not on the ground of any fulfilment of the Law, any good works or any sort, but simply on the ground, as far as the human side of the pardon is concerned, that they have a forgiving God. The ethical character of Jesus' conception of the holiness of God is seen also in His own relation to sinners; for it is clear that His thought of God's relation to sinners was illustrated by His own attitude toward them. Now we are told that He came into personal contact even with the worst of men. He ate with publicans and received harlots, having no fear of defilement from them.* He represented God under the figure of a father embracing a son who had wasted his substance in riotous living (Lk 15).

In the thought of Jesus, therefore, the holiness

* The story of the experience of Jesus at His baptism is probably to be traced back to Himself. This speaks of a descent of the Spirit and a voice from God. It recalls Is 61<sup>1</sup>, and presupposes the same conception of the Spirit of God as with the scribes, that He was far from sinful men, being Himself subject to defilement. His holiness is not ritual, but purely ethical. It is that quality or side of His being which makes it incumbent on all men to 'hallow' His name (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>). It is that which defines His character with reference to sin. It is that attribute of God which renders it impossible to trace the origin of evil up to Him. Jesus everywhere assumes that evil originates either in the freewill of man (Mk 3<sup>28, 29</sup>), or with a power called the 'devil' (Mt 13<sup>39</sup>) or 'Satan' (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>). It cannot come from God, for He is the one absolutely good Being (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>).

The conception of the holiness of God involved in the teaching of Jesus, and perfectly illustrated in His character, is thus seen to have been fundamental in importance and ethical in nature. It has parallels in the OT, as, for example, in Ps 51<sup>6</sup> and Hab 1<sup>13</sup>; but the clearness and intensity with which it is expressed in the Gospels are unique.

3. God is near.—There is a third feature of Jesus' thought of God which, though wholly incidental and subordinate when compared with His revelation of the Divine character, is nevertheless so conspicuous that it helps to mark off the Gospel from the writings of the Old Covenant, and far more noticeably from the views of contemporary Judaism. This is the conception of the nearness or presence of God. To a certain extent Jesus shared the thought of His contemporaries and used the current phraseology of the Jewish habitation. Thus He spoke of heaven as the throne of God, and the earth as His footstool (Mt 5<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>32</sup>). The idea of a Divine revelation clothed itself to His mind in the imagery of an open sky, the descent of the Spirit, and a voice out of heaven (Mk 1<sup>10, 11</sup>). But there is no special emphasis in the teaching of Jesus on the thought that heaven is the dwelling-place of God in a peculiar sense. The emphasis is laid on another point, viz. the practical thought of God's nearness. Though His throne is said to be in heaven, He is no 'absentee' God. On the contrary, He is personally present with men. One may meet Him in the inner chamber (Mt 6<sup>6</sup>). He reveals the mysteries of the Kingdom of heaven unto 'babes' (11<sup>25</sup>). He worked in and through Jesus (12<sup>29</sup>), and Jesus said that God would speak in His disciples (10<sup>40</sup>). This statement may well be taken as the way in which Jesus generally conceived of His presence with men. It is an inner spiritual nearness, a fact of which the soul takes cognizance, and which is manifested to the world only through the life of the man who realizes it.

But God is present not only with those beings who are capable of communion with Him: He is present also in Nature. He arrays the lily in beauty (Mt 6<sup>29</sup>), He cares for the birds (v. 26), notes the fall of a sparrow (10<sup>29</sup>), and is unceasingly active in works of mercy and kindness (Jn 5<sup>17</sup>). How Jesus pictured to His mind this presence of God in the material world we cannot learn from the Gospels. His belief in this particular, as also in regard to God's presence with men, was probably like that of the Psalmists and Prophets (see, e.g., Ps 23<sup>4</sup> 139<sup>7-12</sup>, Is 40<sup>11</sup> 66<sup>18</sup>), though a more constant and marked element of His teaching. It was, doubtless, a consequence of His religious consciousness of God rather than a product of philosophical thought.

GEORGE HOLLEY GILBERT.

GODS.—The single passage in the Gospels where the word theoi occurs (Jn 10<sup>34c</sup>) affords an excellent example both of the style of Jesus' arguments with His Jewish adversaries and of His attitude to the OT. The phrase, 'I said, Ye are gods,' is a literal quotation of Ps 82 (LXX 81)<sup>6</sup>, and is introduced as such by the word invariably employed for that purpose (ἔστιν γεγραμμένον, cf. γέγραπται of Mt 43: 6, 7, 10). It is plain that in quoting these words Jesus is arguing after the manner of the well-known argumentum ad hominem, from His use of the personal pronoun 'your,' as well as from His application of the title 'law' to the Psalms (ἐν τῷ νόμῳ ὑμῶν, cf. τῷ ὑμετέρῳ in 8<sup>17</sup>; and for a similar use of the term 'law,' cf. Jn 12<sup>34</sup> 15<sup>25</sup>). It is an appeal to authority, the validity of which His hearers would be the first to recognize. It was impossible for them to escape a conclusion so immediately the outcome of premisses universally accepted as true. At the same time it is an argument a fortiori. If their beloved Law, to which they were constant<sup>7</sup>, hesitated not to designate as 'gods' . . . judges whose partiality and injustice provoked their . . . by God, and the . . . weak and fatherless; afflicted and destitute' (Ps 82<sup>2</sup>), . . . of blasphemy came badly from those men who recognized in this Law their final court of appeal. His claim to be 'the Son of God,' whom the Father, in a unique sense, both 'sanctified and sent,' could be judged by His works, and it was sufficient to contrast those works which they could daily witness with the works of men whom God designated 'sons of the Most High' (עליון, Ps 82<sup>6</sup>).

Jesus in this place seems . . . this Psalm which is given by the . . . the title 'gods' to the earthly . . . in their capacity as representatives of God. He, moreover, countenances the extension of the term 'Law' to other portions of the OT besides the Pentateuch. This was a common practice in the writings of the Rabbis. Compare also the Talmudic tractate Sanhedrin, fol. 91, 92, for the question of R. Joshua, 'In what manner is the Resurrection of the dead proved from the Law?' with the answer that it is said in Ps 84<sup>4</sup> 'They shall praise thee'; not 'they have praised thee' to the . . . propounded by R. Chana the answer is that . . . proved from Is 52<sup>8</sup> (see Wunsche, Neue Beiträge zur Erläuterung der Evangelien aus Talmud und Midrasch).

There . . . among the Jews which applied . . . to the Israelites who stood before J<sup>h</sup> (cf. Ps 82<sup>6</sup> ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ ἐγένετο, Jn 10<sup>36</sup>). If, said they, their fathers had not sinned in the matter of the golden calf, they would have been as the angels; they would neither have begotten children nor been subject to death. For this reason it was, according to this . . . that the Psalm says, 'they shall die like men' . . . spite of the fact that they were so marvellously . . . tractate Abodah Zarah, fol. 5, 1, . . . Heb. et Talm., vol. iii p. 359).

The evidential value of the whole . . . respect to Jesus' attitude to the . . . will, to some extent at least, be . . . nature of the clause, 'the Scripture* cannot be broken.' If it is parenthetical, we have a direct assertion by Jesus that the OT as containing elements of . . . and, moreover, that its meaning found its final and true explanation in His person and life (cf. Jn 13<sup>18</sup> and Mt 5<sup>18</sup> etc.). On the other hand, it is by no means certain that the clause is of the nature of a parenthesis, and not dependent upon the preceding conditional . . . In this case the sense would be 'if the Scripture cannot be broken,' which would have the effect of presenting the argumentum ad hominem in a still stronger and more merciless form. This is again made more forcible by His use of the emphatic pronoun (ὁμοίως), as if He intended to say, 'How is it possible for you, of all people, in face of the fact that you assert the inviolability of this passage, to find fault with the claims which I have put forward, and to say that I am a blasphemer?' (see Plummer in Cambridge

* It is to be noted here that ἡ γραφή does not mean the OT in general, for which τὸ γράμμα is used, but refers to the particular passage quoted (cf. Jn 20<sup>31</sup> 22<sup>18</sup> etc.).

Greek Test., and Westcott's Gospel of St. John, ad loc.)

It might be possible for an objector to urge that the whole argument was unworthy of the dignity of its allegorist and was too like what His hearers would themselves employ. On the other hand, we know that He did not shrink, at times, from meeting the Jews on the . . . (see art. ACCOMMODATION, p. 19 ff.). . . could seem that He had no option but to do so, if His teaching was ever to penetrate their understandings. Nor did He at any time avoid confounding His adversaries out of their own mouth (cf. Mt 22<sup>35</sup>, Lk 10<sup>36</sup> etc.). At the same time it is evident that there is a profounder significance attaching to the quotation than at first sight appears, and it is in this fact that we have a more certain guide to the estimation in which the OT writings were held by Jesus. Whatever may have been the personal character of those who were designated 'elōhim' in the Psalm, they were men unto whom the word of God had come, and who derived their title to be in a sense Divine from the fact that God delegated to them an authority which was His to give, and that He communicated His will through them to the people over whom they were placed.

The phrase ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ, occurring as it does in this passage, can hardly have been recorded by the author of the Fourth Gospel without a conscious reference to that Personal Word, about whom he speaks in his Prologue. The Logos, pre-existent and active, was the means by which God was effecting the eternal movement of man towards Himself and of Himself towards man. This movement became finally complete in the union of the Incarnation, when God and man met in an everlasting unity (ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). Nor was this . . . 'sprung upon,' so to . . . was being foreshadowed . . . in the OT. The prophetic 'Thus Lord' (cf. e.g. Is 38<sup>1</sup>, Jer 19<sup>1</sup>, Hos 4<sup>1</sup> etc.) was the outcome of a consciousness which felt its power to speak and act as God's . . . representative, and the fitness of this . . . by the oft-repeated assertion, 'The word of the Lord came unto [me]' (cf. Jer 16<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>17</sup>, Is 8<sup>1</sup>, Jl 1<sup>1</sup> etc.; see the emphatic קָרָא in Ezk 1<sup>3</sup>, where the prophet lays stress on the reality of his experience).

The union of God and . . . in the 'Word made flesh' was . . . in the bold words of the Psalmist, 'I said, Ye are 'elōhim,' and it is not difficult to believe that in repeating this expression Jesus had in His mind the realization of this profound idea, and that He desired to disclose it as an accomplished fact to those who had ears to hear and hearts to understand (Mt 13<sup>15</sup>).

J. R. WILLIS.

GOLD.—1. Value.—The Bible references to gold are in terms of use and abuse, in accordance with the great fundamental truth, 'The gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts' (Hag 2<sup>8</sup>). Being the most precious of metals, it represents the possession and influence of wealth. It has a central place in the trilogy of life—length of days, riches, and honour (1 Ch 29<sup>28</sup>). It seems to have a purchasing power over the other two—on the one hand in securing the conditions that tend to prolong life (Ps 17<sup>14</sup> 73<sup>12</sup>), and on the other by influencing opinion in favour of its possessors (Mt 19<sup>25</sup>, Ja 2<sup>2</sup>). As the highest quotation of earthly values, it supplies a standard for estimating what surpasses it (Job 28<sup>17</sup>, Ps 119<sup>72</sup> 127, Pr 3<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>10</sup> 16<sup>16</sup>, 1 P 17<sup>18</sup>). It is only when, as the most beautiful and precious material available it is used to give visible form to the Divine glory that gold becomes a thing of worthlessness (Ps 115<sup>4</sup>, Is 31<sup>7</sup> 46<sup>8</sup>). The blindness that led to such idolatrous perversion among the Gentiles (Ac 17<sup>29</sup>) is also found among the Jews (Mt 23<sup>16</sup> 17).

2 Associated evil—As the emblem of wealth, gold is closely connected with that covetousness in the will and heart of man which is described as the motive and ἡ ἐκείνη ἡ ψυχὴ of all idolaters (Col 3<sup>5</sup>). Job can ἰδοὺ ἐγὼ ὅτι οὐκ ἔχω χρυσόν has not made gold his hope (31<sup>24</sup>). Solomon is commended because he did not make request for riches (1 K 3<sup>11</sup>). The deceitfulness of riches is given as one of the explanations of the unfruitful life (Mt 13<sup>22</sup>). The self-centred ambitions and gratifications of wealth are all against the perception and service of a Kingdom in which even the poor seek the ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ in other lives (Mk 10<sup>24</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>10</sup>). The order given to the disciples forbidding them to take gold or silver with them on their journey of proclamation (Mt 10<sup>9</sup>), was not meant as a commendation of poverty for its own sake. Indeed, it was just because money, clothing, and the wayfarer's staff were the often-proved necessities of ordinary travel, that the omission of them in their case would impart to their message about the Kingdom a meaning of instantaneousness and urgency. The guest-law of the land would provide food and shelter for the passing stranger and where they were asked to prolong their stay, those who were thus interested in their words would attend to their wants.

After playing many parts, such as being a medium of decorative art, a standard of value, and a means of good and evil in society, along with higher uses in the ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ empires and the representation of the ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ, gold renders its last symbolic service in providing a pavement for the feet of the saints (Rev 21<sup>24</sup>).

G. M. MACKIE.

GOLDEN RULE.—This name is given to a saying of Jesus recorded in the Sermon on the Mount. In Mt 7<sup>12</sup> its form is fuller and probably more original than in Lk 6<sup>31</sup>. The omission of the sentence, 'for this is the law and the prophets,' by the Gentile ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ in accord with the purpose of his ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ variations may be due either to changes made in the course of oral transmission, or to divergences in two translations into Greek from the Aramaic. The two versions of the saying are as follows:

Mt 7<sup>12</sup> 'All things therefore whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them: for this is the law and the prophets.'

Lk 6<sup>31</sup> 'And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.'

The saying is rightly called a rule, for it lays down a general principle for moral ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ and furnishes a ready test of the social ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ words and deeds. But it presupposes an ideal of social well-being which determines the end of conduct; its function is to prescribe means for the attainment of that end. To the ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ Christ the coming of the Kingdom of ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ supreme end; for them this saying is, therefore, the golden rule, furnishing a standard of excellence whose practical value consists in its universal applicability. Interpreted in the spirit of Christ, the rule, 'Do as you would be done by,' implies the embodiment in action of the prayer, 'Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth'; they who walk by this rule are doing all that in them lies to bring in the Golden Age. Disparagement of the saying is the result either of failure to fathom the depths of its meaning, or of the rejection of Christ's teaching in regard to the blessedness in which all men's good consists.

The interpretation of the Golden Rule is little, if at all, affected by the connexion of thought. In the two Gospels the context varies. Wendt follows Luke's order, though this necessitates the reference of 'therefore' in Mt 7<sup>12</sup> to Mt 5<sup>42</sup>. The verse ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ in Lk 6<sup>30</sup>. On this supposition the word ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ is to appear superfluous; Zahn rejects it on slight MS authority, because it seems to introduce a summary, which he regards as out of place here (8* L mmm. Syriac om ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ). Yet Bengel's pithy comment, 'Imitate the Divine ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ suggests a natural link with the previous verse ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ gives 'good things' to His children in response to the prayer which expresses desire to receive them, so the motive of His children's actions should be a wish that others may share in the enjoyment of those good things from above. Another interpretation which preserves the unity of the Sermon on the Mount is that our Lord followed His encouragement to prayer by the reminder that if prayer is to be heard there must be a good ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ equally true, however, that the good ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ prayer; the Father hears us when we ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ the most difficult duties of unselfish brotherly love to men become possible to us' (Dykes, Manifesto of the King, p. 572). The two views are complementary and not mutually exclusive. If we are doing unto others as Christ would have us do, He assures us that His Father will hear our prayers, on the other hand, if we will pray, He assures us that His Father will bestow the ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ which will enable us to walk in love. In our ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ discourse there is a similar interdependence of thought. Communion with the Father in Christ's name is a means to an end, even the bearing of much fruit (Jn 15<sup>7</sup>), on the other hand, it is to disciples whose lives are fruitful that the promise of receiving what they ask is given (v 16).

The Golden Rule is not, as some ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ have held, a mere law of nature. ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ the basis of this contention there lies a truth, well expressed by Wesley: 'It commends itself, as soon as heard, to every man's conscience and understanding; inasmuch that no man can knowingly offend against it, without carrying his condemnation in his own breast' (Sermon xxx. § 22). Hobbes declares that moral ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ which he calls 'immutable and eternal ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ,' may all be summarized in the simple formula, 'Do not that to another which thou wouldest not have done to thyself.' 'It is clear,' as Sidgwick points out (Hobbes, p. 167 n.), 'that Hobbes does not distinguish this formula from the well-known "golden rule" of the Gospel,—cf. Leviathan, ch. xv. p. 79, and ch. xvii. p. 85,—whereas the formula above quoted is, of course, the golden rule taken only in its negative application, as prescribing abstinences, not positive services.'

In its negative form the saying is found in both Jewish and pagan sources before the Christian era. Tobias is admonished by his father Tobit to love his brethren, 'and what is displeasing to thyself, that do not unto any other (10<sup>14</sup>). Hillel's concise reply to a Gentile inquirer who asked to be taught the whole Law while standing on one foot, was, 'What is hateful to thee, do not unto thy fellow-man; this is the whole law, the rest is mere commentary' (Bab. Shab. 31a). A saying of Confucius is, 'Do not to others what you would not wish done to yourself' (Legge, Chinese Classics, i. 191 f.). Gibbon (Decline and Fall, li. 11) quotes from a moral treatise of Isocrates, ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐτέρων ὀργίζεσθε, ταῦτα τοῖς ἄλλοις μὴ ποιεῖτε. The ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ in an address (written by Isocrates, ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ writer) of Nicocles, king of Cyprian Salamis (c. 374 B.C.), to his subjects, dealing with their duties as such (Isocrates, Nicocles, 61b).

The unique value of the Golden Rule of Jesus does not depend upon its never having been uttered by any earlier teacher in its positive form, but upon its connexion with His revelation of man's chief good. His perfect example of devotion to that good, and His power to inspire and sustain those who, at His bidding, become followers of that which is good. It remains true, however, that there is little evidence of the existence of any pre-Christian parallel to the positive rule. Diogenes Laertius (v. 21) tells us that Aristotle was asked how we should act towards our friends, and replied 'as we would they should act to us.' The saying is quoted with no context, but a comparison with Nicom. Ethics, ix. 8 fn., is in favour of its genuineness. Prof. Legge, commenting on the assertion that Confucius gave the rule only in a negative form, says: 'but he understood it also in its positive and most comprehensive force, and deplored, on one occasion at least, that he had not himself always attained to taking the initiative in doing to others as he would have them do to him' (Encyc. Brit.<sup>9</sup> vi. 264<sup>b</sup>).

In the Apostolic and post-Apostolic ages the negative form of the rule is more frequent, both in Christian and non-Christian writers. The oldest Christian authority is probably Didache, 1<sup>2</sup>. It is also inserted in the Western text of Ac 15<sup>20, 29</sup>, but the source of the variant is uncertain. Zahn refers the addition to the Didache; but, as Rendel Harris says, 'the negative precept turns up everywhere in the early Church, having been absorbed in the first instance from Jewish ethics.' (Cf. Knowlton's succinct note on Ac 15<sup>20</sup> in Expos. Gr. Test). Other examples are Const. Apost. vii. 1; Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 23, 139; Tertullian, c. Marc. iv. 16. In non-Christian authors the negative form of the rule is found in Philo (Eusebius, Præp. viii. 7. 6). One of the best of the Roman emperors, Alexander Severus, had it inscribed in his palace and on public buildings (Lamprid. c. 51). Westermarck (Origin of Morals, 1. 693) directs to an interesting passage in Epictetus (Fragm. 42): 'the keeping of slaves is condemned in these words, "What you avoid suffering yourself, seek not to impose on others." The rule in its positive form is loosely quoted in Clem. Rom. ad Cor. c. xiii, 'As ye do, so shall it be done unto you . . . as ye are kind, so shall kindness be shown unto you.' Harless (Christian Ethics, p. 110) ascribes to Seneca the maxim, 'altero expecto, alter quod feceris,'—a maxim, rare compared to the Stoic maxim, 'Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris.'

A fair inference from these facts is that the positive form of the Golden Rule has been generally regarded as a distinct advance upon the negative form, its fulfilment of social duty being higher and therefore more difficult to realize. But Professor Hirsch takes the opposite view; in the Jewish Encyclopedia (vi. 225) he says: "'What you would have others do unto you," makes self and possible advantages to self the central motive; "what is hateful to you do not unto another" makes the effect upon others the regulating principle.' But how can self-interest be the motive for doing good to thankful and unthankful alike? The positive precept puts 'doing' first, and bids us take thought in doing good; we are to give what would please us, if we were in the place of those whom we are trying to benefit, though it may be quite certain that we shall receive nothing in return. The command of Christ accords with His teaching that they are 'blessed' who do not invite to their feasts those who will probably return the invitation, but those who cannot make such recompense (Lk 14<sup>12</sup>). It is still more difficult to understand how 'doing nothing' to another ensures that our conduct will be regulated by altruistic principle. To do no harm is consistent with extreme selfishness. 'The negative confines us to the region of justice'; the positive takes us into the region of generosity or grace, and so embraces both law and prophets' (Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. in loc).

A subtle way of obtaining a negative result from the positive precept is mentioned by Schliermacher (Prædigen, iii. 34 ff.). One may say in haughty independence, 'What I wish is that others would let me go my own way; therefore, I let them go theirs.' It is rightly said, in reply, that such pride is incompatible with obedience to the command of Jesus. His words, 'whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you,' are a recognition of the fact of men's mutual dependence. 'We are members one of another, and our chief danger is not that we should neglect our claims on others, but that we should neglect our claims on others,' nevertheless there are occasions when our possibilities of doing good to others will be lessened by unwillingness to be served by others.

A practical difficulty presents itself to the minds of many who desire to walk in accordance with Christ's rule. A king cannot do to his subject what he desires his subject to do to him, nor can a father to his child, nor a master to his servant. But our Lord's command is 'even so do ye unto them.' The narrow interpretation is not only false to the spirit, but also to the letter. The saying of Christ leaves abundant room for good actions which the recipient may be known to be altogether unable to return,—another reason for refusing to see in the positive form of the Golden Rule an appeal to self-interest. The Gr. word used is oîtros, not taûtra; its meaning is rightly given by Alford (Com. in loc), 'After the pattern of ὅσα ἂν . . . Because what might suit us might not suit others. We are to think what we should like done to us, and then apply that rule to our dealings with others.' A narrow interpretation would miss the beauty of the words, when, after enumerating the duties of servants to their masters, he says, 'And, ye masters, do the same things unto them' (Eph 6<sup>9</sup>). The rule for masters and servants alike is 'unto the Lord'; on each side of this and of every human relationship there is opportunity for 'goodwill' and for 'doing the will of God from the heart' (v. 6<sup>1</sup>).

Many modern writers regard the Golden Rule as identical with the ethical maxim of Kant: 'So act as to treat humanity, whether in thine own person or in that of any other, in every case as an end in itself, never as a means only' (cf. Votaw in Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. p. 429, Gore, Sermon on the Mount, 170 f., Loofs, Prædigen, ii. 227). In the language of philosophy, Kant forces the simple words of Jesus, the Golden Rule to exploit men for gain or for pleasure, in a word, to have one ideal for ourselves and another for our neighbours. Loofs shows clearly how the universality of the ethical imperative on which Kant so strongly insists is a distinct note in the command of Jesus. He also makes an instructive application of this principle to a concrete case, and shows how vainly partners in guilt try to shelter themselves behind their own parody of this rule. 'Agreement could ever be any excuse for actions, deceitful evasions, or even immoral pleasures. His reply to those who act on the principle of the German proverb, "The left hand washes the right, and the right hand washes the left," is in substance, "Whatsoever one of you would that another should do to him, let him do the same to that other." The rule is universal. There must be no arbitrary limiting of the extension of the term "men" in the saying, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them." A thief and his accomplice may, for the sake of dividing the spoil, wink at each other's crimes, that is what is called honour among thieves. But neither of them should wish to make the rule of action universal, to be deceived by all men as they have deceived others.'

In the Golden Rule, John Stuart Mill found a fitting expression of the essential principle of his ethical system. 'To do as you would be done by, and to love your neighbour as yourself, constitute the ideal perfection of utilitarian morality' (Utilitarianism, p. 323). But when the crucial question is asked. How is the ideal perfection to be attained? the reply is that utility enjoins, 'as the means of making the nearest approach to this ideal,' that (1) 'laws of social arrangements,' and (2) 'education and opinion' should strive to 'establish in the mind of every individual an indissoluble association between his own happiness and the good of the whole' (op. cit. p. 323). But no external force, such as law or education, can supply either the motive for doing as we would be done by, or the power to fulfil the precept we approve. It is true that on the lips of Christ the Golden Rule has its perfect expression; but its superiority as an ethical maxim rests upon a broader basis. It is more to exemplify a rule than to formulate it; it is still more to furnish the inward inspiration which constrains men to obey it. The disciples of Christ have another Golden Rule for their actions one toward another; it is expressed in His words, 'as I have done to you'; and their all-powerful motive is the assurance that 'ye did it unto me' (Mt 25<sup>40</sup>).

will be their abundant reward, if whatsoever they would have done to Christ Himself, even so they do unto men, serving them lowly and lovingly in His name and for His sake

GOLGOTHA (Γολγοθᾶ, Aram ܡܕܢܚܐ, Heb. ܡܢܚܐ [2 K 9<sup>35</sup>], 'skull')—The name of the place where Jesus was crucified. This name is used by three of the Evangelists (Mt 27<sup>33</sup> 'a place called Golgotha, that is to say, The place of a skull'; Mk 15<sup>22</sup> 'the place called Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull'; Jn 19<sup>17</sup> 'the place called The place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew, Golgotha'). The Greek equivalent (Κρανίον) is used by St. Luke (23<sup>33</sup> 'the place which is called The skull,' RV). Vulg uses here the Latin equivalent Calvaria, whence 'Calvary' in AV.

Three explanations of this name have been suggested: (1) Jerome (Com in Eph 5<sup>44</sup>) mentions a tradition that Adam was buried at Golgotha, and that at the Crucifixion the drops of Christ's blood fell on his skull and restored him to life. The skull often seen in early pictures of the Crucifixion refers to this. (2) It is supposed by some to have been the place of public execution, where bodies were left unburied (Jerome, Com in Mt 27<sup>33</sup>), but (a) it is most unlikely that dead men's bones would have been left lying about so near the city, when, according to the Mosaic law, they made any one unclean who touched them; (b) there was no reason why the place should have been named from the skulls rather than from any other parts of skeletons; (c) the expression is κρανίου τόπος, not κρανίων τόπος, as we should expect it to be if this derivation were correct. (3) The most probable view of the origin of the name is suggested by the form of the expression in St. Luke, 'the place which is called The skull'. It was probably so called because of its skull-like contour. The use of the article by the Evangelists seems to indicate that the place was well known, but they never call it a mountain. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) speaks of it as monticulus Golgotha, and the expression 'Mount Calvary' appears to have come into use after the 5th century.

The site cannot be identified with certainty. All that we know from the Bible is that it was outside the walls of the city (He 13<sup>13</sup>, Mt 27<sup>31-32</sup>, Jn 19<sup>17-18</sup>), that it was high to the city (Jn 19<sup>20</sup>), that it was in a conspicuous position (Mt 15<sup>40</sup>, Lk 23<sup>46</sup>), that it was close to the road leading from the country (Mt 27, Mk 15, Lk 23<sup>26</sup>), and that it was near a garden and a new tomb hewn out of the rock, belonging to Joseph, a rich man of Arimathea (Jn 19<sup>41</sup>, Mt 27<sup>57-60</sup>, Mk 15<sup>43-46</sup>, Lk 23<sup>53</sup>). These particulars are not sufficient to justify a positive decision in favour of any one of the proposed identifications of Golgotha, but they seem to be decisive against the first of the four conjectures mentioned below, to bear against the second heavily, and to be most nearly satisfied by the fourth.

1. The peculiar theory of Fergusson (Essay on the Anc. Topog. of Jerus, and art 'Jerusalem' in Smith's DB), that Golgotha was on Mount Moriah, and that the church of Omar is the church erected by the Holy Sepulchre, was quickly shown to be untenable (e.g. by Bonar, art. 'Jerusalem' in Fairbairn's DB).

2. Barclay (City of the Great King, p. 79) and Porter (Kitto's Cycl. of Bib. Lit art 'Golgotha') maintained that the site of the Crucifixion was east of the city, between the then existing wall and the Kidron Valley. This place could have been quickly and easily reached from the palace of Pilate and the judgment-hall, which probably stood at the N.W. corner of the Haram area. According to this view, the soldiers, instead of taking their prisoner across the city towards the west, or out in the direction of the Roman road, hurried Him through the nearest gate and crucified Him near the road to Bethany. Two objections are urged: (a) that the Gospel narratives imply that the Golgotha was a more frequented road to Bethany, and that the great highways of Jerusalem are all on the north and west of the city; and (b) that there is no skull-shaped site in this region.

3. That Golgotha was where the Church of the Holy Sepulchre now stands, seems to have been almost universally believed from the age of Constantine down to the 18th century. It is now agreed on all hands that the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre occupies the site of the one erected by Constantine in A.D. 335. On what grounds did he select this as the true site of the Crucifixion? Those who still believe it to be the true site generally assume not only that the early Christians at Jerusalem had a knowledge of the places where the Lord was crucified and buried, but that the site was handed down as tradition for three hundred years, before the demolition of Jerusalem by Titus and again by Hadrian, and the altering of the whole aspect of the city by the latter when he rebuilt it as a Roman colony and changed its name to Aelia Capitolina. But Eusebius, in describing the discovery of the site by Constantine, says it had been 'given over to forgetfulness and oblivion,' and that the Emperor, 'moved in spirit by the Saviour Himself,' ordered it to be purified and adorned with splendid buildings.

'Such language, certainly, would hardly be appropriate in speaking of a spot well known and distinctly marked by long tradition. The Emperor, too, in his letter to Macarius, regards the discovery of "the token of the Saviour's most sacred passion, which for so long a time had been hidden under ground," as "a miracle beyond the capacity of man sufficiently to celebrate or even to comprehend." The mere removal of obstructions from a well-known spot could hardly have been described as a miracle so stupendous. Indeed, the whole tenor of the language both of Eusebius and Constantine goes to show that the discovery of the Holy Sepulchre was held to be the result of a miracle, revealed and decreed from heaven, and not the result of human research and revelation' (Rosenberg, BBP, Boston, 1841, n. 75).

The same story is made by the accounts of the writers of the 5th century, who, however, unanimously attribute the discovery not to Constantine, but to his mother Helena. Their story is that, guided by a 'Divine intimation' as to the place, she came to Jerusalem, inquired diligently of the inhabitants, and, after a difficult search, found the sepulchre and beside it three crosses, and also the tablet bearing the name of Pilate. At the suggestion of Bishop Venerius, the cross to which the inscription belonged was ascertained by a miracle of healing. The three crosses were presented in succession to a noble lady of Jerusalem who lay sick of an incurable disease. Two of them produced no effect, but the third worked an immediate and perfect cure. Eusebius, though contemporary with the alleged events, makes no mention of the discovery of the cross nor of the agency of Helena. But whether we accept the account of Eusebius or that of the writers of the 5th century, the traditional site of Calvary rests on a miracle, and, in the case of the latter, on a double miracle.

Those who now favour this site (e.g. Sanday, Sac. Sites of the Gospels, pp. 72-77) labour to show that there was a previous tradition which determined Constantine's selection of the spot, but the only proofs they adduce are: (a) vague allusions to visits made by early pilgrims to the 'Holy Places' of Palestine, an expression which is used of the Holy Land at large, and not of the Holy City only; and (b) the alleged regular succession of bishops from the Apostle James to the time of Hadrian, through whom a knowledge of the place might have been handed down. The alleged succession of bishops is more than doubtful. The only authority on the subject is Eusebius, who lived two centuries afterwards, and he says expressly that he had been able to find no document respecting them, and wrote only from hearsay. Moreover, even if it were possible to prove the existence of an earlier tradition, its value would be open to serious question, as is shown by the falsity of other traditions which did actually exist in the age of Constantine. For instance, Eusebius in A.D. 315 speaks of pilgrims coming from all parts of the world to behold the fulfilment of prophecy and to pay their adorations on the Mount of Olives, where Jesus gave His last charge to His disciples and then ascended into heaven. This is hardly consistent with the explicit statement of St. Luke (24<sup>50-51</sup>) that 'he led them out until they were over against Bethany, and . . . he parted from them and was carried up into heaven.' Other sites shown to pilgrims in that uncritical age were impossible, such as that of Rephidim in Moab. The Bordeaux Pilgrim places the Tomb of David on Olivet, and the combat of David near Jezreel. The fact that no pilgrimages were made to the site of the Holy Sepulchre before the visit of Helena, though they were made in plenty to the summit of Olivet, goes to show that there was no tradition of the Holy Sepulchre.

In the present (18th cent.) of the Holy Sepulchre are shown not only the site of the Sepulchre and the rock of the Crucifixion, with the cleft made by the stone, and the three holes, five feet apart, in which three crosses were inserted, but also a great number of other traditional sites. Almost every incident of the Passion and Resurrection is definitely located. The very spots are pointed out where Christ was bound, where He was crowned, where His friends stood afar off during the Crucifixion, where His garments were parted, where His body was anointed, where He appeared to His mother after the Resurrection, and to Mary Magdalene; the rock tombs also of Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea; the place where Helena's throne stood during the 'Invention of the Cross,'—and many others. The number of these identifications, all under one roof, does not increase our confidence in ecclesiastical tradition.

Not less damaging to the claims of the traditional site is the topographical evidence. Our Lord suffered 'without the gate' (He 13<sup>12</sup>). The Church of the Holy Sepulchre lies far within the walls of the present city, and, as Jerusalem at the time of the Crucifixion was much larger than it is now, the fair presumption is that it included the site of that church rather than excluded it. If we place Golgotha at the traditional site, we make Jerusalem at the time of its greatest prosperity no larger than the poverty-stricken town of the present day, 'containing not far from 200 acres, from which 36 acres must be deducted for the Haram area' (Merrill). This difficulty arising from the present location in the heart of the city seems to have been felt as early as the 8th cent., and also in the 12th and 13th, but the first to meet the question openly was Korte, who visited Jerusalem in 1738, and who held that the traditional site could not have been the site of the ancient city, because of its nearness to the former area of the Jewish temple. The argument against this site has been greatly strengthened by the determination of the rock levels of Jerusalem and the probable course of the 'second wall' of the three mentioned by Josephus. The first wall, that of David and Solomon, encompassed the Upper City (Zion), and its north line ran eastward from the tower of Hippicus to the wall of the temple area. The second wall had its north line from the gate called Gennath, which belonged to the first wall, and, encircling only the northern quarter of the city, it extended as far as the Tower Antonia' (BJ v. iv. 2). This wall, which was probably built by Hezekiah, running in a circle or curve, seems to have had no angles like the first and third, and therefore to have required no extended description. If this curve included the Pool of Hezekiah (which must surely have been within the walls), it would naturally have included also the traditional site of the Sepulchre. If, in spite of the statement of Josephus, the wall be drawn with a re-entering angle so as to exclude the traditional site, there still remain apparently the nature of the ground, the wall must have been built in a deep valley (Tyropæon), and must have been dominated from without by the adjacent knoll on which the Church of the Holy Sepulchre now stands (Acra). But 'fortresses stand on hills, not in deep ravines,' 'the wall must have stood on the high ground' (Conder). Immediately east of the Tower of David (at or near which Hippicus must have stood) a narrow ridge runs north and south, connecting the two hills Zion and Acra and separating the head of the Tyropæon Valley from the valley west of the Jaffa gate. As this is the only place where the wall could have protected the valley on the east and commanded the valley on the west, the natural course for the engineers would have been to build the wall along this ridge. Exactly along this ridge the remains of an ancient wall were found in 1885 by Dr. Merrill. One hundred and twenty feet of it were exposed in a line running north-west and south-east, at a depth of 10 or 12 ft. below the present surface of the ground. At some points but one course of stone remained, at others two, at others three. The stones correspond in size and work to those in the base of the Tower of David, a few yards farther south. This is probably a portion of the second wall. Later, another section, 26 ft. long, of similar work, was found farther north, besides traces at several other points. In explanation of the fact that entire sections are found towards the south and only débris of walls towards the north, Dr. Merrill cites the statement of Josephus that Titus 'threw down the entire wall of the city' but left the southern standing and placed garrisons in its towers. From the statement that Titus made his attack 'against the central tower of the north wall' he argues further, that if the wall ran from near Hippicus to Antonia in such a way as to exclude the traditional site of the Sepulchre, the two parts of the wall after it was broken in the middle should have been designated the 'eastern' and 'western'; but Josephus calls them the 'northern' and 'southern,' a description which is obviously more appropriate to a wall which ran well to the west and north of the traditional site (Presb. and Ref. Rev. iii. p. 646).

Parts of an ancient ditch and remains of walls have been recently discovered east of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and Schick has shown them as remains of the second wall and of the Temple. But, as Benzinger says (Hilprecht's Explorations in Bible Lands in the 19th Cent.), his explanation 'is not convincing in itself, and there stand opposed to it important considerations of a general nature,' such as have been cited above, e.g. the military objection to locating a wall in a valley dominated from without by higher ground, and the fact that, had this been the course of the wall, Jerusalem could not have accommodated its great population at the time of Christ.

The existence of an undoubted Jewish tomb at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the one now called the Tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, has been cited as evidence that the place was outside the old city wall, 'but we know from the Talmud that ancient Jewish tombs were allowed by the Jews to be outside Jerusalem, and any writer will admit that, in the time of Agrippa at least, this particular tomb was within the circuit of the town.' The third wall, which ran far to the north-west and north of the present city wall, was built by Agrippa only ten or eleven years after the Crucifixion, to enclose a large suburb that had gradually extended beyond the second wall. So that, even if it could be shown that the Sepulchre was outside the second wall, it certainly lay far within the line of the third, and in the midst of this new town which at the time of the Crucifixion must have been already growing north of the second wall. The words 'without the gate' and 'nigh to the city' could scarcely mean 'within the suburbs' (Schaff).

The genuineness of the site has been defended by Chateaubriand (Itinéraire), Williams (The Holy City), Krafft (Die Heilige Stadt), Schenck (Reise in den Orient), Terres (Sainte), Sepp (Jerusalem), and others. It has been attacked by Korte (Reise nach dem gelobten Lande), Robinson (BRP), and others. For August and November 1847, Tobler (Die Lande der Bibel), Barclay (The City of Jerusalem), Schaff (Through the Bible Lands), Conder (Tent Work in Palestine), and others.

4. The theory that Golgotha is the knoll above Jeremiah's grotto, outside the north wall, near the Damascus gate, was first suggested by Otto Thenius in 1849. A similar view was put forward independently by Fisher Howe (The True Site of Calvary) in 1871. Since that time the theory has come rapidly into favour, and has been accepted by Gen. C. E. Gordon, Sir J. W. Dawson, Dr. Merrill, Dr. Schaff, Col. Conder, and others. It answers all the requirements of the Gospel narratives, being outside the walls, nigh to the city, in a conspicuous position, near a frequented thoroughfare—the main north road, and near to ancient Jewish rock-hewn tombs, one of which was discovered by Conder about 700 ft. west of the knoll. The so-called 'Gordon's Tomb,' about 230 ft. from the summit of the knoll, is thought by Conder to be a Christian tomb of the Byzantine age; but Schick says it 'was originally a rather small rock-cut Jewish tomb, but became afterwards a Christian tomb.' The great cemetery of Jewish times lay north of the city.

Moreover, Jewish tradition regards this hill as the place of public execution, and the Jews still call it 'the Place of Stoning.' Christian tradition also, as old as the 5th cent., fixes this as the place of the stoning of Stephen. The fact that Christ was put to death by the Roman method of crucifixion and not by the Jewish method of stoning does not break the force of this argument, for there is no reason to suppose that Jerusalem had two places of public execution. No other place would have been so convenient to the Romans for this purpose, starting, as they probably did, from Antonia. The castle seems to have been itself a part of the outer ramparts on the north-east, with the north wall of the temple area stretching from it to the east and the second city wall to the north-west. There must have been some feasible route for the soldiers of the garrison, who were constantly going back and forth between this fortress and Caesarea. There was no such route to the east or south. To go west would have taken them through the heart of the crowded city, with its narrow streets and its perils from the mob. What more natural than that there should have been a road leading from Antonia to the open country? Here, accordingly, only a short distance north of the city, we find the remains of a Roman road.

'If executions were to take place near the city, I think they must have been carried out on the line of such a road, where the soldiers would have free ground to act upon in case of an emergency, without being hampered by crowded streets, and where only one gate would be between them and their stronghold, and that one entirely under their own control' (Merrill).

GOMORRAH (גִּמְזָרָה, Γομόρρα [fem] or Γομόρρα [neut.]).—

The word should be fem. in Greek as in Hebrew, but the final α led to its being treated as neut. plural. In the LXX it is fem. 9 times, neut. 5 times; passages the gender is indeterminate. In the NT it is fem. 2 times and Mt 10<sup>15</sup> [CD], but neut. in Mt [NAB].

The name occurs in the NT in Mt 10<sup>15</sup>, Ro 9<sup>29</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>6</sup>, Jude 7. (In Mk 6<sup>11</sup> it occurs in a sentence wrongly inserted in A and some Lat. MSS, whence it found its way through the TR into the AV.) In every case it is coupled with Sodom, as it is invariably in the OT. It is to be noticed, however, that Sodom is mentioned alone in Mt 11<sup>23</sup>, Lk 17<sup>33</sup>, Rev 11<sup>8</sup>. Not only so, but in Lk 10<sup>12</sup>, the parallel passage to Mt 10<sup>15</sup>, Gomorrah is omitted. It seems probable, therefore, that in St. Matthew the insertion of the name is editorial and not otherwise. Moreover, the text is uncertain; N 10<sup>15</sup> C Γομόρρας, D Γομόρρας; again NC insert γῆ before Γομ., while ABD omits it. Our Lord, then, used 'Sodom' (or 'the land of Sodom') alone; in Ro 9<sup>29</sup> the passage is a direct quotation from Is 1<sup>9</sup>; while the OT expression 'Sodom and Gomorrah' is found only in the two late, and closely connected, writings, Jude and 2 Peter.

For the lessons drawn by our Lord from the wickedness and the destruction of Sodom, see art. SODOM. A. H. M'NEILE.

GOOD (ἀγαθός, καλός).—It is not easy to define Christ's idea of what is good. His expressions vary from a conception of the Good as one with the infinitely and universally Perfect to the most commonplace uses of the word. He speaks of old wine as 'good' (Lk 5<sup>39</sup>), of the world as 'both bad and good' (Mt 22<sup>10</sup>), or salt as 'good' (Mk 9<sup>50</sup> || Lk 14<sup>34</sup>), of certain ground as being 'good' (Mk 4<sup>8</sup> || Lk 8<sup>8</sup>), of God making 'his sun to rise on the evil and on the good' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>), and He says of Judas, 'Good (καλός) were it for that man if he had not been born' (26<sup>24</sup> || Mk 14<sup>21</sup>). Yet when the young ruler comes to Him with the same conventional usage of the word, 'Good Master (διδάσκαλε ἀγαθέ), what good thing shall I do to inherit eternal life?' (Mk 10<sup>17</sup> || Lk 18<sup>18</sup>; cf. Mt 19<sup>16</sup>), and WH's 'Notes on Select Readings' ad loc.), Jesus rejects the title as applied to Himself, and asserts that 'none is good save one, even God.' Whether this be read as 'not denying that He is good, but insisting that none should call Him so who did not believe Him to be God' (Liddon, Bampton Lect. i. 23), or as 'the self-judgment which felt hurt by the epithet good' (Martineau, Seat of Authority, 651), there can be little doubt that Jesus purposely made use of the young man's phrase to point him to the ideal Good. Behind the things to be done, which were in the questioner's mind,—greater than matters of law or ritual, or even charity,—was the necessity that he should recognize the Supreme Good, the Eternal Spirit of all goodness. This did not imply that man should be hopeless of attaining a certain measure of the good, that it was . . . the reach of the race, but that the idea of the good is God, and that to define or limit it is as impossible as to define or limit the Eternal Himself. Only on this occasion does Jesus so suddenly soar beyond the intention of any questioner who approaches Him. Elsewhere He tells a parable, and puts into the mouth of the master of the vineyard (a most human representative of the Heavenly Master) the question, 'Is thine eye evil because I am good?' (Mt 20<sup>15</sup>); and He speaks of 'the good man' who 'out of his good treasure bringeth forth good things' (12<sup>35</sup> || Lk 6<sup>45</sup>). So we may look upon the story of the Rich Young Man as a unique expression of Christ's highest thought of the Good, but not as thereby ruling out all lesser conceptions. A man may begin to do good or to live a good life before he learns that the foundation of all the good he accomplishes or attains to is God Himself; that no ethical aims are good which lack a Divine sanction. It is better for a man when this inward recognition of the Eternal Goodness precedes the active goodness of his life, for then he finds the peculiar secret of St. Paul's dogma (Ro 8<sup>28</sup>), 'All things work together for good to them that love God.' But the doing of good for its own sake may be a man's first step towards the Kingdom of God, and later he will be prepared for any self-denial or self-sacrifice that may bring him nearer the heavenly perfection (Mt 18<sup>8</sup> || Mk 9<sup>43, 45, 47</sup>), when he has learned that it is God's Kingdom he approaches and not the invention of his own sympathetic impulses alone.

In line with this thought of Christ's is the liberty in the modes of doing good which He frequently asserted. With Him the present was . . . fitting opportunity of . . . arises and scries as to whether . . . do good on the Sabbath' (Mt 12<sup>12</sup> || Mk 3<sup>4</sup>, Lk 6<sup>9</sup>).

Some element of altruism enters into all His conceptions of good. The Greek masters (especially Plato and Aristotle) assert the good of a man to lie in his 'well-being' (εὐδαιμονία), a constant rendering of εὐδαιμονία, a concept which depends on certain visible 'goods' that are his own personal possession, and in no way bring him into contact with less fortunate men, such 'good things' as wealth, health, beauty, and intellect. But Christ regards that alone as good which lessens the distance between man and man, and man and God. The good a man should seek is that of each and all men, even 'them that hate you' (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>), for the doing of good to others is the final test of the practical value of religion, and became the distinctive note of the character of Christ in the Apostolic days when He was described as one who 'went about doing good and healing' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). This is indicative of all the visible elements of the good in His teachings. Love, His supreme doctrine, finds its essence in self-surrender. In parables of conduct, such as the Good Samaritan, are insistent upon the actual doing of some good. When Jesus sends the Baptist His own record, the good things that will bear witness to Him, it is a tale of deeds of brotherly kindness, of help for the blind, lame, lepers, deaf, the poor, and even the dead (Mt 11<sup>5</sup>). Zacchæus is assured of his salvation when he has learned to share with his poorer brethren (Lk 19<sup>9</sup>). The fact of giving is accepted by Christ as the evidence of a desire to do good (Mk 14<sup>7</sup>). The good man is not only devout; his personal piety . . . the surest basis for the true spirit of . . . him; but the good must take form in some actual warring with the world's evils, some earnest attempt to remedy the miseries, sufferings, diseases, afflictions, sorrows, or poverty of men. This is the vital test applied in the great parable of the Judgment (Mt 25<sup>31a</sup>). The Son of Man there asks no question as to spiritual . . . intellectual convictions, or ecclesi- . . . The Kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world . . . from the moment of the birth of mankind—is for those who saw and served the King in brethren who were hungry, thirsty, outcasts, naked, sick, or in prison. Christ sanctions the popular judgment of what constitutes a good man,—that effectiveness . . . which moves steadily and lovingly . . . ultimate conquest of the world, that social message of the gospel which is the enthusiasm of true goodness, and is able to 'overcome evil with good' (Ro 12<sup>21</sup>). But all such doing rests on being. It is intimately connected with each man's own spiritual vision and condition, for it is the rudimentary realization of the Kingdom of heaven; it issues from that Kingdom which is 'within' (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>), where 'glory, honour, and peace' are the blessings which come 'to every one that worketh good' (Ro 2<sup>10</sup>)—a Kingdom which a man may never have explored, but which is the ground from which grows all the . . . good he does (Mt 12<sup>35</sup>). If the tree is . . . fruit is good (v. 23), and when the whole . . . man is awake to the inflowing of the Divine Goodness, he becomes the more keenly sensitive to Righteousness—Truth, Love, and the Brotherhood, and finds increasingly St. Peter's utterance at the Transfiguration to be his own: 'Lord, it is good for us to be here' (Mt 17<sup>4</sup> || Mk 9<sup>8</sup> || Lk 9<sup>34</sup>). The Good enters imperceptibly; it is not born of the law, nor of any ethical analysis; and in the unexpectedness of its joy the disciple is conscious of having reached the highest heaven, of having found that delight in whatever is good which helps him to understand the true end of life, 'to glorify God and to enjoy Him for ever.'

GOODNESS.—As . . . of the Buddhist, and valor . . . so the essence of Christianity is goodness. Its Founder was the absolute personification of this characteristic quality. Nothing short of this could have so inspired the Apostles and . . . Veiled within the few . . . Gospels, and perhaps seen . . . meditating mind, is the figure of a perfect goodness once realized upon earth. It is not the novelty of His teaching that has attracted men, nor His deep sympathy with humanity, nor any spiritual utterances to the Father (which are all too rarely recorded). Behind the words and deeds of the . . . stands a shining . . . liv- . . . liness—One of whom . . . speak as being 'without sin.' The Evangelists knew nothing of the dogmatic spirit, and could probably have given no clear definition and explanation of the sinlessness of Christ. To them He was the human expression of the Divine Goodness, and it mattered little whether a man should say that the Goodness was from eternity, so that by its nature sin had never been a moment's possibility, or that at birth Christ had been uniquely endowed with a passion for goodness that turned naturally from everything selfish, injurious to others, or sinful either to God or man; or that at His baptism He had been set aside to that brief ministry (which is nearly all men know of His earthly life), when the voice from heaven was heard saying, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased' (Mt 3<sup>17</sup>). However its genesis might be spoken of, the 'sinlessness' of Christ is the utterance of the measure of His goodness as it affected the disciples.

Throughout the Sermon on the Mount they would hear that note of human tenderness blended with the virtue which constitutes goodness. This alone could be the source of that merciful utterance which is perhaps His only new doctrine—'Love your enemies.'

In His message of the Divine Fatherhood they would behold that goodness sending 'rain upon the just and the unjust' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>), forgiving the penitent as the father forgives the prodigal son (Lk 15<sup>11ff</sup>), and even forgiving those whose repentance is yet to come (23<sup>34</sup>). Such conceptions would be born of the goodness within Himself, that breathed out in the intense sympathy of the story of the woman taken in sin (Jn 7<sup>53-81</sup>), or the defence of Mary Magdalene in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7<sup>36ff</sup>), or in the parable of the Good Samaritan (10<sup>25ff</sup>). The same spirit marks the greater number of the miracles. None could be considered as entirely separated from human interest and influence, and the great majority (thirty-one out of 100 recorded) were wrought openly and for the good of others. The blind, the deaf, the palsied, the lame, the lepers, the lunatic, the hungry crowd, the timid fishermen, the mourners for the dead,—all shared in the effective power of the innate goodness of our Lord. It was as though, in His purity and sinlessness, the very forces of nature became obedient to His transparent will,—the one will that sin has never overcome, the one luminous purity in which sin has found no vitalizing atmosphere. He had been tried at the beginning of His mission, but the temptations of the desert had ended in triumph. The word of His being rose above the low power of a selfish wonder-working, or the temptation of pride, or the vanity of power, or the temptation of 'all the kingdoms of the earth' (Mt 4 || Lk 4, Mk 1<sup>12</sup>). He spoke harshly to the Pharisees for goodness does not always win by the sword against evil. He who knows that the kingdom of God is at hand, and the end of all things is near, will waste no time in diplomatic parley with the powers of darkness. Victory will often be in swift attack. So the goodness of Christ is not lessened by His fierce handling of the money-changers and traders within the Temple (Mt 21 || Jn 2 || Lk 19). He knows that lower ideas of God and goodness will unconsciously prevail if the house of God becomes a place for barter and bargain. It is part of the same zeal that He has about His Father's business' in His boyhood (Lk 2<sup>9</sup>), though it takes the more vigorous form we might expect in manhood. The inward knowledge of the simplicity and holiness of His motives makes fear not only impossible, but non-existent; and this is the spirit that inspires every true missionary. He also, as his Master, would show the winning charm of the visibly good—the goodness embodied in a life rather than in doctrines only—that which in Christ could say to the world, 'I am the bread of life' (Jn 6<sup>35, 48</sup>), 'I am the way, the truth, and the life' (14<sup>6</sup>), and 'I am the light of the world' (8<sup>12, 9</sup>), the witness of which is described by St. Paul, when he says that the fruit of the light is in all goodness and knowledge and truth' (Eph 5<sup>9</sup>).

The goodness of Christ brought a new force into Jewish religion, one that changed the nature of it. Judaism was formal, ceremonial mainly an external worship. Its prophets had striven to kindle it into a moral and spiritual faith. But prophet and priest had stood apart. In Christ the middle wall was broken down, and into the old religion was poured the new spirit. Henceforth religion could not be separate from the moral life. A man could not be unrighteous, an evil-doer, and yet be religious. Goodness became a synonym for true and undefiled religion. For man, having once seen the perfect manhood of the Christ, and felt His power to overcome sin and death, had gained a vision of religion that might perpetuate such a type, and the vision would not lightly fade. Through failures from within and tyrannies from without the Christian would bear witness to his Lord and to his faith, by a life of love, on that of his Master. This was hence he could offer of the Divine Incarnation.

GOODWILL.—See COMPLACENCY, p. 356<sup>b</sup>.

GOSPEL.—'Gospel' is the modern form of the Anglo-Saxon word 'godspell,' corresponding to the Greek word εὐαγγέλιον. Formerly it was thought to be the literal translation, meaning 'good-story.' But now it is generally accepted as meaning 'God-story.' εὐαγγέλιον was originally used for 'the reward of good tidings,' and traces of this usage are found in LXX, 1 Cor 9<sup>40</sup>. But the word came to denote the 'good tidings' themselves; and this is the Christian usage. It may be noted here that Dalman (The Words of Jesus, p. 103) says: 'In the verb κηρύσσειν, which must be assumed to be the original Aramaic expression, the idea of glad tidings is not so inherent as in the Greek εὐαγγελίζεσθαι. Even in the OT (1 S 4<sup>17</sup>) κηρύσσειν is used of mournful tidings. . . . It thus appears that the content of God is the content of a "message" and not without further qualification of "a message of glad tidings." It seems, however, that the choice of εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, as well as the contexts of the word in the Gospels, provide that

1. The Christ is found in Isaiah. In 61 the prophet describes the function of the Servant of Jahweh (or perhaps his own function) in these words: 'The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek. . . . The word is εὐαγγελίσασθαι. The meek are the exiles in Babylon. Good tidings are announced to them. God is coming to save them, and He is near. It is the acceptable year of the Lord, when He shall deliver His people from their enemies and restore them to their native land. A similar reference occurs in 52. A messenger hastens to Jerusalem, as she sits in the dust of her ruins, bringing 'good tidings.' The exiles are to return to her, and she shall be inhabited again by her long-lost children. These instances exhibit clearly the meaning 'good tidings'; and both are claimed in NT to describe the Christian mission. St. Paul quotes Is 52 in Ro 10<sup>15</sup>; and in Is 61 the text for His sermon at Nazareth (Lk 4<sup>18</sup>).

This use of the word by Jesus stamps it at once with its Christian significance. 'He began to say, To-day hath this scripture been fulfilled in your ears.' He claimed to be a preacher of good tidings to the poor. The poor, the captive, the blind, the bruised, are no longer political exiles. They are the bond-servants of sin, those who waited for the consolation of Israel, the poor and outcast to whom Judaism had no message of hope. He is Jahweh's Anointed sent to bring good tidings of great joy to all the people (Lk 2<sup>10</sup>). This description of His mission seems to have endeared itself to the heart of Jesus. He made frequent use of the word, and soon after the rejection in Nazareth He described His Messianic function by it. 'I must preach the good tidings of the kingdom of God to the other cities also; for therefore was I sent' (Lk 4<sup>43</sup>). In particular, Jesus appropriated the name 'gospel' for the contents of His message. This was His description of it from the beginning of His ministry. St. Mark sums up that beginning thus: 'Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe in the gospel' There are many proofs that Jesus used this word 'gospel' to describe His message; cf. Mt 24<sup>14</sup> 26<sup>13</sup>, Mk 1<sup>5</sup> 8<sup>35</sup> 10<sup>29</sup> 13<sup>10</sup>, Lk 7<sup>22</sup> ||. It is not surprising, therefore, that the word came into general Christian use to describe the contents of the preaching of Jesus. All the Scriptures reflect this usage. In Acts and the Epistles it is an established custom. 'The gospel' became the normal Christian title for the message which Jesus came to proclaim, and which He sent forth the Apostles to preach to every creature.

2. But closer examination shows that the term was not used by the Evangelists to describe all that Jesus said; nor was the verb 'preach good tidings' descriptive of all His work. In Mt this sentence occurs twice: 'Jesus went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people' (4<sup>23</sup> 9<sup>35</sup>). It seems to be an accepted formula summarizing the work of Jesus. It contains three main words—'teaching,' 'preaching,' 'healing.' The same distinctions are noticed elsewhere. St. Luke 9<sup>10</sup> 'teaching' and 'preaching' the gospel; and in 9<sup>2</sup> he tells that the twelve were sent forth 'to preach the kingdom and to heal the sick.' St. Mark does not contrast the two words 'teach' and 'preach the gospel' in the same verse; but in 1<sup>4</sup> 21, he ascribes to Jesus 'preaching the gospel' and 'teaching.' In the latter case the effect produced by His 'teaching' is different from that due to His 'preaching.'

It would seem, therefore, that the work of Jesus was threefold: He preached the gospel, He taught, and He healed. If this distinction is valid, the term 'gospel' did not apply to all that Jesus said and did. It was reserved for the 'good tidings' that He preached. In addition to these 'good tidings,' there was 'teaching' that belonged to another category. Listeners would hardly describe such teaching as Mt 5<sup>19-48</sup> by the title 'good tidings,' nor could the word apply naturally to Mt 10<sup>34-38</sup> 12<sup>31-37</sup> 19<sup>9-12</sup> 21<sup>33-44</sup> 23 24 ||. It seems clear that Jesus distinguished the gospel that He preached from the teaching that accompanied it.

3. What, then was implied by the term 'gospel'? It was a revelation of 'news' or 'tidings.' It was the revelation of a fact rather than instruction in the art of living well. It was offered to belief, and its acceptance must be preceded by repentance (Mk 1<sup>15</sup>). It is called 'the gospel of God' (in Mk 1<sup>14</sup> RV); the 'gospel of the kingdom' (in Mt 4<sup>23</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 24<sup>14</sup>). St. Luke uses the compound phrase, 'the gospel of the kingdom of God' (Lk 4<sup>43</sup> 16<sup>16</sup>). These phrases must be studied, and in addition it must be noted that Jesus connected the gospel with His

(a) The 'gospel of God' indicates a message revealed about God that is good news to men. It is certain that Jesus gave the world a new idea of God; and this gospel of Jesus was the revelation of God as 'our Father in heaven.' He did not discover the category of Fatherhood in its relation to God. This had been done under the Old Covenant. But He invested the idea with such radiance as to make it a new revelation. More specifically, He illumined the Fatherhood of God by teaching 'the infinite value of the human soul.' God is not merely the Father of a people. He is the Father of each individual soul (cf. 'thy Father,' Mt 6<sup>9</sup>). His Fatherhood extends to all sorts and conditions of men (Mt 12<sup>50</sup>). In particular, the Father seeks each sinner (Lk 15<sup>1-10</sup>), and welcomes even the prodigal to His home (vv. 11-12). This 'gospel of God' includes, further, the good news to the heavily laden Jew that 'the Father seeketh true worshippers to worship in spirit and in truth' (Jn 4<sup>23</sup>; cf. Mt 11<sup>28</sup>), and that the Father is willing to forgive sins without sacrificial offerings (Mt 9<sup>2</sup> ||). And when the child of God has entered into this blessed relationship with his Father in heaven, that Father may be trusted to provide (Mt 6<sup>25-34</sup>). Prayer must be offered to the Father continually (Lk 18<sup>1</sup>). The Lord's Prayer (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>) 'shows the gospel to be the Fatherhood of God applied to the whole of life; to be an inner union with God's will and God's kingdom, and a joyous certainty of eternal blessings and protection from evil' (Harnack).

The Johannine tradition lays special emphasis upon this Divine Fatherhood in its relation to Jesus; the relation between the Father and His children is referred to in terms of love. Indeed, St. John sums up this aspect of the gospel in the immortal words, 'God is love' (1 Jn 4<sup>8</sup>). Jesus Himself spoke chiefly of love as the duty of man. To love God and to love one's neighbor are the supreme laws for human conduct (Mt 22<sup>37-39</sup> ||). But by His constant speech about the Father, Jesus taught also God's love to men. This relation of love between God and man has been pointed to as the distinguishing feature of the gospel. Thus Réville writes:

'The Christian gospel is essentially characterized by its declaration that the bond between God and man is one of love. God is the Heavenly Father, man is the son of God, God loves man, man ought to love God, the relation between the principle of the universe and the individual is one of love, in which the two terms subsist. God and man—man not losing himself in God, God not remaining aloof from man—meet in a living communion, so that man's dependence on God should no longer be one of compulsion, but of free and joyful self-consecration, and that the sovereignty of God over man should no more appear a tyranny, but a rule which we love and bless. Such is the distinctive mark of the Christianity of Jesus, differentiating it from the other great religions.'*

(b) The phrase 'the gospel of the kingdom' describes the good news brought by Jesus in its relation to that Kingdom of God or of heaven which He proclaimed. It implies that the Kingdom has 'a gospel.' The gospel and the Kingdom are not co-extensive any more than the gospel and God are. But there is good news concerning the Kingdom, and this good news is an essential part of the message of the Kingdom. In brief, this gospel was that the Kingdom of heaven is opened to all believers. The message of Jesus was that the Kingdom was not for select classes or nations, but for all. All Jews were summoned to share it; even the Pharisees and sinners may come (Mt 21<sup>31</sup>, Mk 2<sup>17</sup>). Are Jews alone to walk in its light. All nations must be invited to share the light of the Kingdom (Mt 23<sup>13</sup>, Mk 13<sup>10</sup>). The Kingdom is offered to all. It is offered not to the rich or to the wise, but to all who will become as little children (Mt 11<sup>25</sup> 18<sup>3</sup>, Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). Moreover, this Kingdom, which is offered to all, is a far higher good than men dreamed (cf. Mt 13<sup>44-46</sup>). It is a spiritual blessedness, infinitely transcending the ceremonial righteousness secured by legalism, and the political supremacy envied by the nations. The Kingdom, as Jesus preached it, offered the highest conceivable good to all men. It satisfied the religious instincts of the race; and because these are the deepest and most universal instincts, the message that they can be satisfied is indeed 'good news' (cf. Mt 13<sup>1</sup>). Men had never found true satisfaction in the material forms of a ritualistic religion. These were the husks that contained no nourishment for the soul. Jesus preached 'the gospel of the kingdom' when He offered the highest spiritual good to all penitent and humble souls.

(c) But these two forms of the gospel do not exhaust its fullness. The presence of Jesus in the world was itself a gospel. He connected the good tidings with His own person. As the good news Rhoda brought to the praying Church was that Peter himself was at the door (Ac 12<sup>14</sup>), so the presence of Jesus in the world was 'glad tidings of great joy to all people' (Lk 2<sup>10</sup>). This was due to the an-nun-ti-a attached by Jesus to Himself. He was the Messiah (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>). His use of the title 'Son of man' implies His special significance for the race. In several of His parables He referred to Himself as the Son of God (Lk 20<sup>13</sup>), as the Judge and King of men (Mt 25<sup>31</sup>), as the bridegroom (Mt 9<sup>15</sup> 25<sup>5</sup>); these and other titles indicate the peculiar value of His person. The interest was not metaphysical but religious. His presence in the world manifested the love of God (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). It proved that God had not forgotten men, but had come to their help.

In this connexion the significance of Jesus' offer of pardon must be noted. He raised much opposition to His offer of pardon on earth to forgive sins' (Mk 2<sup>1</sup>). He exercised the power (Lk 7<sup>40</sup>, Jn 5<sup>24</sup>). There is a close connexion between 'good news' and the good news about God and His Kingdom. The barrier between God and the soul is sin. It is sin that hinders enjoyment of the Kingdom. Therefore the best news that men can have is a message of full and free forgiveness for all repentant, trustful souls. And this was the message preached by Jesus. He removed pardon out of the sphere of material sacrifices in the temple, which limited the scope of forgiveness to a few, and He made forgiveness a possible boon for everybody. Thus He opened the way into the Kingdom even to the publicans and sinners.

(d) But the core of this aspect of the gospel is reached only when it is connected definitely with the redeeming work of Jesus. He was conscious of His mission than preaching the gospel. He gave utterance to words that touch the deepest mysteries of redemption. He came to give His life a ransom (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>). He was the Good Shepherd giving His life for the sheep (Jn 10<sup>11</sup>). He foretold His death and resurrection, directly He had brought His disciples to confess His Messiahship (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>). On the betrayal night in the upper room, He gave the cup, saying, 'This is my blood of the covenant which is shed for many' (Mk 14<sup>24</sup>). It was impossible for Jesus to connect the gospel chiefly with His death, before He was crucified. But it seems unquestionable that He referred to His death as achieving a wonderful deliverance for men in respect of sin. The sacrificial element was not introduced into His life for the first time when He offered Himself to die. 'The Son of man came to minister'; and all through His ministry He was giving Himself up for others. Nevertheless, He looked upon His own death as having a peculiar significance, awful for Himself (cf. Mk 14<sup>32-39</sup>), but blessed for men (Jn 14<sup>9</sup>). It is certain that His followers accepted this interpretation of the cross. At once the death of Jesus, followed as it was by His resurrection, was made the main theme of Apostolic preaching (Ac 2<sup>24</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> etc.). So central was this preaching about the death of Christ, that St. Paul identifies 'the gospel' with the message about 'Christ crucified' (1 Co 1<sup>17</sup>).

The meaning of the term 'gospel' as used by Jesus may now be summed up. It seems to describe the message He taught concerning: (a) the fatherly nature of God; (b) the inclusiveness and spirituality of the Kingdom; and (c) God's provision for men's deliverance from sin through His own mediation. This gospel was not only the theme of His preaching, but was exemplified continually in His manner of life. He revealed the Father by

His own attitude to men. He illustrated the spirit of the Kingdom by seeking the lost. He mediated the grace of God by His unsparring self-surrender. In particular, He accepted death upon the cross in obedience to the Father's will, in order that thereby the scattered sons of God might be gathered again to their Father (Jn 11<sup>52</sup>).

4. We must return now to the distinction between 'preaching the gospel' and 'teaching.' Much of the teaching of Jesus could not be directly classed under 'preaching', as sketched above. It was ethical, resting upon the gospel as its foundation. It appealed ultimately to the nature of God for its sanctions. It was connected with the Kingdom, being the legislation that befitted such a Kingdom of grace. Nevertheless it was an ethical code, intended to guide those who have accepted the gospel. The teaching of Jesus was the law-book of the Kingdom. The gospel of Jesus is the manifesto of the Kingdom, explaining its nature and inviting all to become its citizens.

This probably explains the use of the term 'gospel.' Wonderful as the teaching of Jesus was, the gospel seemed still more marvellous. At any rate, that gospel seemed of a nature that it had to be preached before the Kingdom could follow, and whilst points of difference were found between the teaching of Jesus and other ethical systems, there was nothing in the world like the gospel of Jesus. And thus the term 'gospel' was most frequently on the lips of the Apostles; and by a natural process it was extended to cover the entire contents of their report of Jesus, including His teaching. All that the Apostles had to tell about Jesus was called 'the gospel.' This usage is reflected in Mk 1<sup>1</sup>, where the word refers to the whole story of Jesus Christ.

5. Two points need a further reference. The gospel brought by Jesus was not entirely new. It had its roots in the teaching of the prophets and the law (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>). But that earlier teaching was like a faint light of dawn: His words were like the sun of noonday (Jn 8<sup>12</sup>). Hitherto men had only heard rumours of varying trustworthiness; He brought official news that was full and final. Some keen-eyed spirits had caught sight of the Fatherhood of God, as the Alps may be seen from the terrace at Berne on a fine evening. But Jesus led men into the heart of the mountains. The hopes of the nation had hovered for centuries round a kingdom. But only Jesus disclosed the true nature of the shining city of God. Prophets had encouraged lonely exiles with the cry, 'Behold your God cometh!' But it was not until Jesus appeared that one who waited for the consolation of Israel could say, 'Mine eyes have seen thy salvation' (Lk 2<sup>30</sup>). The gospel preached by Jesus gave full substance and final form to the faint and tremulous hopes of centuries. For this reason the gospel must be the unchanging element in the Church's teaching. Being 'news' about God and the Kingdom, it cannot change until they change.

A distinction has been drawn between the gospel which Jesus preached and His ethical teaching. The Church's teaching of the Christian ethos must be a changing message. It is the application of the principles of Christ's teaching to present circumstances. The Christian ethic of the last generation is out of date in presence of to-day's problems. The Church must study the ethical principles enunciated by Jesus, in order to apply them to modern needs. But whilst the Christian ethic develops and is modified by circumstances, the Christian gospel cannot change. It is good news about facts. It must be stated in modern phraseology, that men may hear it in their own tongue and understand it. But it remains an 'Old, old Story' through all time. If this distinction is remembered, it will explain the confusion that is felt in modern times as to the Church's true function. All are agreed that this is to preach the gospel. But very different views are held as to what is included under the term. In particular, there is an increasing demand cannot be made of the gospel. It is not some maintain that the gospel conditions. Probably the term 'gospel' has been used in various senses. As Jesus used it, 'the distinct from the Christian ethic, work' practised by the Lord. But from apostolic days the term 'gospel' has been used to cover the threefold field of the gospel, teaching the ethic, and healing. In its more limited sense, 'gospel' is simply the word used by Jesus. In its historical and broader sense, the whole 'God-story' it includes the entire record of Jesus Christ's life and work. Thus used, the term covers the ethic that Jesus Christ taught, and the social service that He practised. In this sense 'gospel' includes all ethical teaching and social service that are in accordance with the mind of the Master. It is open to question, however, whether the Church has not suffered loss by broadening the reference of this word. Jesus used it to describe the 'good news' He brought to the poor and the meek of the earth, and this 'gospel' must ever be the foundation upon which the Church builds, though the foundation is not to be confused with the fabric erected upon it.

6. A brief space must be given to the consideration of the gospel in the rest of NT in so far as it is connected with Christ. In one sense this would involve an exposition of many chapters of Acts and of all the Epistles, for He is 'the head-stone of the corner,' and the gospel is only 'complete in Him.' But all that can be attempted is an indication of the place occupied by Christ in the gospel as preached by the Apostolic Church.

When we pass from the Gospels to the Acts and the Epistles, we are conscious at once of a change of standpoint. In the Gospels, Christ's disciples are a group of learners. They stand beside their Master at the very centre of truth, and they try to follow His gaze as it sweeps the horizon of the love and the kingdom of God. In the Epistles the relative positions are altered. The disciples have become teachers; but they do not stand by their Master's side at the centre. Christ alone is at the centre; the disciples are on the circumference of the circle and are gazing at Him. Their efforts are directed towards the Lord, whom they would persuade everybody to know (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>2</sup>). The Lamb is in the midst of the throne, and those who have been gathered into the Kingdom of God worship Him (Rev 5<sup>9</sup>). The Apostles are seeking to obey their Lord's command to preach the gospel to every creature (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). But their interpretation of this command was to urge their hearers to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ (Ac 16<sup>31</sup>).

This identification of 'the gospel' with Christ Himself may be accounted for partly by the experience of the Apostles. They went forth as witnesses (Lk 24<sup>48</sup>), not as philosophers. They had to tell what great things God had done for their souls. They could do this only by talking of Jesus. For He had become to them the mediator of God's redeeming love (Mk 8<sup>3</sup>, Jn 1<sup>41</sup>). They could not be witnesses concerning repentance and remission of sins without filling their lips with the one 'name given among men wherein we must be saved' (Ac 4<sup>12</sup>).

But another point must be considered. The Apostles were commanded to 'preach the gospel.' The instruction had a definite meaning because of their Master's use of the words. Jesus Christ preached the gospel of the fatherly love of God, establishing a Kingdom into which all men might be admitted, and He offered Himself as the authoritative proof of that love (cf. Mk 12<sup>34</sup>, Jn 8<sup>42</sup>). The presence in the world of the Son of man, the Messiah of prophecy, demonstrated God's love in providing for men's deepest needs. Now it is evident that the crucifixion of Jesus shook such a gospel to its foundations. If the life of the Messianic Son of man ended with the cross, His speech about God's fatherly love and a heavenly Kingdom seemed worse than idle talk. How could the gospel preached by Jesus survive His death? Only if He Himself survived His death. To rehabilitate

His gospel, His authority must be rehabilitated. This result was secured by the resurrection of Jesus and by His ascension. When they had seen Him 'alive after his passion,' His disciples were prepared to go and 'preach the gospel to every creature' (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>).

But it is evident also that these events themselves had profound importance. They did more than rehabilitate the authority of Jesus; they brought His own significance for the gospel into clear relief. Such unique events set the personality of Jesus in the heart of the gospel, investing Him with peculiar importance (Ac 2<sup>22-36</sup>, 3<sup>13-26</sup>, 5<sup>31</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>1-3</sup>, Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>1</sup>). Although they could not realize at once all that was involved in such events, the Apostles were compelled to take a new attitude to Jesus, and to adopt a fresh theory of His person. He had been their Master; now He becomes 'the Lord.' The primitive Christian community used the term before it was able to construct an adequate Christology. But it called Jesus 'the Lord' because He had sacrificed His life for it, and because its members were convinced that He had been raised from the dead and was then sitting on the right hand of God (Harnack). The significance of Jesus was decided religiously, though not philosophically, at once. From the first, Jesus Christ was the religious value of God. Men were exhorted to believe in Him (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>). The final expression of the Apostolic meditation upon the person of the Lord was given by John (Jn 1<sup>1-18</sup>). But in Apostolic thought the gospel could never be preached apart from Jesus Christ, nor could the significance of Jesus Christ be understood apart from the gospel. In Him God's redemptive purposes and the sinner's acceptance of them may meet. Thus He is the central figure in history (Col 1<sup>15-18</sup>). He is at once the Saviour appointed by the Father (Ac 2<sup>23ff</sup>, Ro 1<sup>3</sup>, Gal 4<sup>4</sup>) and the Head of the redeemed race (1 Co 15<sup>22-45</sup>, Gal 3<sup>26</sup>, Eph 1<sup>22</sup>).

But this conception of the person of Jesus gave a deeper meaning to the great events in His experience which had so affected His disciples. It may be said that the events and the person reacted upon one another. Such events glorified the person; the glorified person brought out the significance of the events. At the first, the significance of Jesus was looked upon as the wicked act of the Jews, which God had frustrated and even turned to His own glory by raising Jesus from the dead (Ac 2<sup>23</sup>, 24<sup>15</sup>, 3<sup>14</sup>, 4<sup>10</sup>, 5<sup>30</sup>). The Resurrection was accepted at once as a proof of Divine Sonship (J.c.). The Ascension not only sealed the person of Jesus Christ's Messianic dignity, but also exalted Him to a place of sovereignty over the world (Ac 2<sup>36</sup>, 21<sup>4</sup>, 3<sup>21</sup>). But further reflection upon these unique events with their religious significance. His Death is the means whereby all men may be forgiven and may be reconciled to God—a sacrifice for the sins of the world (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>20</sup>, 21<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>19</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>, 2<sup>2</sup>). His Resurrection is the earnest of the new life into which all those are introduced who are born anew by faith in Him (Ro 6<sup>4</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). He is the first-fruits of them that sleep: His Resurrection involves the resurrection to eternal life of all in whom He lives (1 Th 4<sup>13-510</sup>, 1 Co 15). His Ascension is the pledge of the glorification of all who are united to Him (Ro 8<sup>29-30</sup>, Ph 3<sup>20-21</sup>).

This aspect of the gospel is reflected in the Apostolic preaching. The Apostles 'preached Christ' (1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>). All the sermons in the early chapters of Acts are full of Christ. The Epistles identify the gospel with Him (Ro 1<sup>16</sup>). In particular, the preaching dwelt upon His Crucifixion, His Resurrection, and His Ascension, though the same 'mind' was discerned in the whole story of the

[illegible]

Nothing, perhaps, more clearly proves the truth or what has been just said as to the importance in the Christian system of the personal history of Je-sus, than the fact that His human origin and His death are treated in the Gospel narrative as having a significance outweighing all else. In the case of all other great men, birth and death, which are universal and inevitable, have for the most part only . . . importance. But in Apostolic reference of Jesus Christ His human ancestry is co-ordinated with His resurrection, e.g. Ro 1<sup>4</sup> 'the gospel of God . . . concerning his Son, who was born of the seed of David . . . who was declared to be the Son of God . . . by the resurrection of the dead'; and 2 Ti 2<sup>8</sup> 'Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel . . . of the Lordship of Jesus, and fact of His resurrection, are declared to have saving efficacy (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>). It is evident, therefore, that a narrative of the main facts in the history of Jesus must have been from the very first the foundation or framework of the preaching of those who propagated His religion. These preachers . . . for the way of salvation, not with a . . . the Saviour's gracious words, but with 'truth embodied in a tale': 'Believe on the Lord Jesus and thou shalt be saved' (Ac 16<sup>31</sup>). A little consideration will make it clear that a proclaiming of the resurrection of One who had been slain entails of necessity an account of who and what manner of man He was, and why He was put to death.

From indications scattered through the Book of the Acts, we gather that an evangelic narrative described Jesus . . . in His lineage, character, and . . . of Messianic prophecy as hitherto accepted; while the fact that He had suffered, and died, and been raised the third day, was shown to reveal the Messianic character of passages of the OT which had not been hitherto clearly understood. The Resurrection, again, was declared to constitute an authentication by God Himself of Jesus that He would come again to . . . and the dead; and salvation from the judgment to come was offered on the conditions of repentance followed by baptism into the name of Jesus. This is the barest outline of the main features in the first Christian . . . accomplishment in Jesus of all . . . in the Christ, His death and resurrection illuminating the dark places of prophecy, and proving the truth of His own claims; judgment; repentance; baptism.

It is scarcely necessary to add that these facts or requirements would be 'commended to every man's conscience' (2 Co 4<sup>3</sup>) by examples of the wisdom, . . . and beauty of the Saviour's moral and . . . teaching. Of this we have an example in St. Paul's speech at Miletus (Ac 20<sup>30</sup>). In this case the audience was composed of Christian elders; and it may be that a true instinct led the early preachers in addressing the unconverted, to dwell on the Word rather than on the Beatitudes. However this may be, the meagre sermon sketches contained in the Book of the Acts do not enable us to make a positive statement as to what the preachers said, beyond what is indicated in the outline given above.

3. We may say, then, that it was the needs of the Christian Church in her natural expansion that first called Gospels into existence. The language of St. Luke (1<sup>1-2</sup>) confirms what we might have gathered from the history of the transition . . . narratives. Those who had been privileged to be 'eye-witnesses and ministers of the word' 'delivered' (παρέδοσαν) to others what they deemed essential in what they had seen and heard in the course of their attendance on their Master, and 'many' of their hearers 'took in hand to draw up narratives' (ἀναρτῆσαι διήγησιν). It may be remarked in passing that St. Paul, who always claimed an authoritative knowledge of the capital events of the Evangelic history, uses the

It is impossible to say how early the necessity for written Gospels arose. The expansion of the Church beyond Judaea began possibly . . . after the Pentecostal outpouring of . . . it certainly was in operation at the martyrdom of Stephen (Ac 11<sup>19</sup>). The number of those who could be reckoned as 'eye-witnesses and ministers of the word' cannot have been very great. Even if we make the large assumption that every one of the 120 persons who were gathered together for the election of Matthias (Ac 1<sup>15</sup>), or of the 500 brethren to whom the Lord appeared (1 Co 15<sup>6</sup>), could be so described, and that they were all subsequently engaged in active . . . work, yet the labour of spreading the . . . even within the limits of Palestine, would have soon outgrown their power to cope with it. As far as the original witnesses were concerned, their memory would enable them to tell all that was necessary of the Saviour's life, even as much as is contained in the longest of our present Gospels. Indeed, there can be no doubt that from constant, perhaps daily, repetition of some portion of the story, the recollection of the whole would soon assume a stereotyped form. But as the number of evangelists who had not 'known Christ after the flesh' multiplied in every direction, it would very soon become impossible for the original witnesses even to instruct all those who were to teach others. To meet this imperative and growing need—the instruction of preachers—was, we may well believe, one of the objects with which the narratives alluded to by St. Luke in his preface were first drawn up. It is natural to suppose that at first such narratives were used to refresh the memory of . . . afterwards, when the first generation . . . had quite passed away, the . . . be openly read as being the . . . of what the original witnesses had seen and heard.

Dr. Salmon is of opinion that even before the Crucifixion some of our Lord's discourses, or portions of them, had been committed to writing. Without going so far as this, it is scarcely open to reasonable doubt that written Gospels of some sort were in circulation well within the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles. In order the better to see this, we shall examine the evidence supplied by the Epistles of St. Paul. His writings, from their extent and the comparative certainty with which they can be dated, afford the most satisfactory grounds on which to base a conclusion.

4. It is obvious that the question when the word εὐαγγέλιον was first used in the sense in which we use it when we speak of the 'Gospel according to St. Matthew,' is quite distinct from the question as to when such written narratives first appeared and received any degree of public . . . T. . . first step towards what may be . . . use of the term εὐαγγέλιον is to be found in passages where the word is used, not of the 'good news' itself, but in the sense of someone's presentation of it.

1 Th 1<sup>5</sup> . . . unto you in word only'

2 Th 2<sup>14</sup> . . . [of salvation] through our gospel.'

Gal 1<sup>11</sup> 'the gospel which was preached by me . . . is not after man'

Gal 2<sup>2</sup> 'I laid before them the gospel which I preach among the Gentiles'

Ro 2<sup>16</sup> 'God shall judge the secrets of men, according to my gospel, by Jesus Christ'

1 Co 15<sup>12</sup> 'I make known unto you . . . the gospel which I preached unto you . . . in what words I preached it'

2 Ti 2<sup>2</sup> 'Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel'

In these instances, certainly in most of them, the word 'gospel' means not so much St. Paul's manner or method of presenting the good news of salvation to his hearers, as the actual substance of what he said. It is true that the substance of what any preacher of the gospel would say would include more than a narrative without comment, such as is one of the Synoptic Gospels, yet St. Paul's gospel evidently did contain some merely historical matter. This point will come up for consideration later. Here it is sufficient to say that the above instances of St. Paul's use of the word 'gospel' as meaning the substance of his evangelic preaching, would naturally suggest the application of the term to a narrative embracing all that it was necessary to know of the life of Jesus Christ as a means of salvation. So much was, no doubt, claimed by their compilers for the short narratives which St. Luke's Gospel was intended to supersede; much more may it be claimed for any one of the four Gospels which have come down to us.

5 An interesting question now arises, What was the content of the Gospel presented by St. Paul to the Churches which he evangelized? and what was its relation to our existing Gospels, or any of them? It would be unnecessary to remark that in an answer to this question the Pauline Epistles for the purpose of this question, any inference drawn from silence is peculiarly precarious. It is as unreasonable to expect to find Gospel material in St. Paul's letters as it would be to find it in the letters of a pastor or bishop of our own day. Paradoxical as it may at first seem, it is probably none the less true that the Churches to which St. Paul wrote had a more intimate and living acquaintance with the facts of the Gospel history than is usual with Christians in our own day. Every member of those Churches had been recently converted from either heathenism or Judaism. Consequently the interest they felt in their new faith was fresh and absorbing; and St. Paul writes as though the main facts of the Gospel history were familiar to his readers. He is able to appeal in the most natural way to their knowledge of the character of Jesus, e.g. Ro 15<sup>3</sup> 'Christ pleased not himself'; 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup> 'Though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor'; and 2 Co 10<sup>1</sup> 'I . . . intreat you by the meekness (διὰ τῆς πραΰτητος) and gentleness of Christ'. It would doubtless be impossible to prove that St. Paul had in mind recorded sentiments of Christ similar to, or identical with, 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister' (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>); 'The Son of Man hath not where to lay his head' (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>58</sup>); 'I am meek (πραῦς) and lowly in heart' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>). But it may be safely affirmed that there was in those to whom St. Paul wrote a knowledge of deeds and words of Christ that made the Gospel appeal intelligible.

What then was the source of St. Paul's knowledge of the Gospel narrative? To many, perhaps most, Christians this question may appear superfluous. In view of the Apostle's own explicit statements: Gal 1<sup>1</sup> 'The gospel which was preached by me . . . came to me through revelation of Jesus Christ,' and 1 Co 11<sup>23</sup> 'I received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you.' Even if we grant, what is likely enough, that the passage from Galatians refers to St. Paul's private doctrines, yet his language to the Corinthians seems to imply that his knowledge of an objective historical circumstance came to him in a miraculous manner. The present writer has no desire to minimize the miraculous element in the NT narrative, or to call in question the reality of St. Paul's visions; but in this case an explanation can be given of the expression 'I received of the Lord' which will both satisfy the requirements of St. Paul's statements, and also take the matter out of the region of the miraculous, and so render the statement historically intelligible and verifiable. The question is, What would one of St. Paul's contemporary fellow-Christians have understood by 'I received of the Lord'? The answer is supplied by parallel phrases in the Book of the Acts, and by what we learn from that book and other sources as to the ministry of prophets in the Apostolic Church. When we read (Ac 13<sup>2</sup>), 'The Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul,' etc., and again, (16<sup>7</sup>) 'The Spirit of Jesus suffered them not,' it is natural to ask, How did the Holy Ghost speak? and how did the Spirit of Jesus control the movements of St. Paul and his company? It was through the utterance of an accredited prophet, or number of prophets in either case. This is placed beyond doubt by an instance given later (21<sup>11</sup>), where a prophet, Agabus, begins his prediction with, 'Thus saith the Holy Ghost' (cf. 20<sup>33</sup> 'The Holy Ghost testifieth unto me in every city'). We see, then, that Ac 13<sup>2</sup> means that the separation of Paul and Barnabas was in consequence of an utterance of the prophets, or one of them, who are mentioned in the previous verse; while in 16<sup>7</sup> it was an utterance of Silas (see 15<sup>32</sup>), if not of Paul himself (see Ac 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>27</sup>), that forbade the missionaries to cross the frontier of Bithynia.

We are now enabled to understand 'I received of the Lord' (1 Co 11<sup>23</sup>) in the same sense as we interpret 'The Spirit of Jesus suffered them not.' St. Paul did not really mean that his knowledge of the Gospel history had been acquired without human intervention, nor can he have intended his readers so to understand him. What he meant to convey was that he was convinced that the evangelist, or the source whence he derived his information, was indeed inspired by the Spirit of Jesus.

The alternative—evangelist, or source—has been purposely suggested, in order to leave it an open question, as, indeed, with our scanty information it must remain, whether St. Paul derived his knowledge of our Lord's life from oral teaching or from a written document. At the time of his conversion there was a Christian community of so . . . and it is probable in the highest . . . had the advantage of hearing . . . those who had companied with . . . On the other hand, St. Paul's own . . . conferred not with flesh and blood . . . Arabia, suggests a retirement for solitary study . . . prayer. There does not seem any extreme . . . supposing that even at that early date there was in circulation a Gospel narrative in Aramaic, or even in Greek. In any case, it is unreasonable to question that Saul the persecutor needed some instruction or study before he could 'proclaim Jesus, that he is the Son of God'.

It cannot be denied, however, that the language of the heavenly vision (Ac 26<sup>14</sup>), 'It is hard for thee to kick against the goad . . . naturally to a long previous struggle between . . . and trained and the strange attractiveness of Jesus of Nazareth, whose glorious deeds and words may have become known to the young Pharisee when he first arrived in Jerusalem from Tarsus. For him the gospel was a thing to which he could not be indifferent. It was either an execrable heresy or the only way of salvation. All that he had learnt from man urged him to 'rub it like a vice of blood, upon the threshold of the mind' (In Memoriam), the preventing grace of God bade him 'embrace it as his natural good'.

All that we can certainly state with regard to the Gospel story known to St. Paul, however he acquired his knowledge, is that his allusions to it, direct and indirect, 'proceed,' to use Paley's phrase (Evidences, i. 7), 'upon the general story which our Scriptures contain'; while it certainly was not identical with any of the four we now possess. This latter point is proved by the enumeration in 1 Co 15 of the appearances of the risen Lord. Of the five appearances there mentioned, two, namely that to James and that to 500 brethren, are not mentioned in the canonical Gospels. It is to be noted, as possibly significant, that the appearance to James was recorded in the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Jerome, de Vir. illustr. c. 2).

6. It would be irrelevant to the purposes of this article to call attention to any correspondences between the Pauline Epistles and our present Gospels other than those that are historical or literary. It would lead us too far afield to discuss St. Paul's Christology, and to inquire how far it was based on extant recorded statements of Jesus about Himself, how far on OT and subsequent Messianic conceptions, and how far on what we may for convenience call the Johannine theology, which, as distinct from its Johannine expression, seems to have existed in the Church from the beginning.

The faithfulness of God to His promise that the Christ should be not only of the seed of Abraham, but also of the line of David, is as markedly emphasized by St. Paul as it is by the Synoptics. Ro 15<sup>8</sup> 'Christ hath been made a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, that he might confirm the promises unto the fathers', Ro 13 'Born of the flesh', 2 Ti 28 'Of the seed of David'.

There is no explicit reference to the Virgin-birth in the Pauline Epistles. The 'born of a woman' (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>) the former probably, the latter of the woman (Gn 3<sup>15</sup>).

St. Paul 'received of the Lord' (1 Co 11<sup>23-25</sup>), alludes to the betrayal of the Lord Jesus, and otherwise approximates most closely to that given by St. Luke. The second edition of his Gospel revised his account with information received from St. Paul. In the previous chapter (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>) and in 14<sup>16</sup> we have allusions to the words of institution which have always been used in the blessing of the bread and wine.

St. Paul's references to the death of Christ are for the most part doctrinal, not historical. He insists on its voluntary character. 'For our sins' (Gal 1<sup>4</sup>, of 2<sup>20</sup>, Eph 5<sup>2-3</sup>, Tit 2<sup>14</sup>). 'The Son of man came to give his life a ransom for many,' seem to underlie these passages, as well as those in which the death of Jesus is spoken of as an atonement or ransom (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>, Ro 3<sup>25</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>6</sup>, Tit 2<sup>14</sup>). Of course the sacrificial aspect of Christ's death is also strongly emphasized in His own words at the Supper.

(Ro 2<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>), and that which states, as matter of common knowledge, that 'the saints shall judge the world' (1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>), can none of them be necessarily referred to the words and parables of Christ in the Gospels, which affirm the same things, inasmuch as these were part of the current Messianic tradition. There are, however, cannot be referred to that source. (1) that the coming of Christ to judge would be heralded by the sound of a trumpet (1 Th 4<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>52</sup>), and (2) that it would be sudden and unlooked for (1 Th 5<sup>2</sup>). The wording of this latter passage is remarkable. 'Yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night.' The trumpet chapter we have had unsuspected attack. There are, in conclusion, a number of passages in which it is references to recorded sayings of Christ (ἀποδοτε) to all their dues, etc. See Mt 22<sup>21</sup>, Render unto Caesar, etc. (ἀποδοτε).

He that is able to receive it, let him receive it.' The caution with which our Lord prefaces this saying, 'All men cannot receive this saying, but they to whom it is given, find also an echo in St. Paul's conclusion: 'Howbeit each man hath his own gift from God,' etc.

The meagreness of historical material contained in these references to Jesus, His acts and sayings, which are to be found in the Epistles of St. Paul, will cease to surprise us when we compare them with the baldness of the Creeds of the Church, even of the Constantinopolitan.

7. The truth is that we have been hitherto misled by the 'Lives of Christ' which have from time to time appeared. The assumption that underlies an attempt to write the Life of any one is that it is possible to give an account not only of his birth and death, but to arrange in some orderly chronological sequence the movements of his life, using the term 'movement' in its most comprehensive signification. This it is well nigh impossible to do in the case of our Lord's earthly ministry. Between the age of twelve years and His death the only events which really mark movements are, His baptism by John the Baptist and the Transfiguration. It is true that the Fourth Gospel notes the Passovers which took place during our Lord's ministry; but it cannot be said that any of the attempts to arrange the circumstances and discourses recorded in the Synoptics so as to fit in with St. John's notes of time have been such as to compel belief. Moreover, although conclusions based on internal evidence must always be more or less precarious, yet there are instances of sayings of Jesus which have an early place in the Synoptic record, but which from their tone it is difficult to assign to an early stage of our Lord's ministry.

A Gospel, in fact, is not a biography. What are of saving efficacy in the events of our Lord's life are His birth, death, and resurrection. The fact that 'He went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>), and that His example and His moral and spiritual discourses threw a new light on the relations of men to God and to one another, this too is of great importance; but there is not any . . . whatever in the order in which this or that miracle was performed, or thus or that discourse spoken. It is not likely that the Apostolic preachers dwelt more on the historical sequence of the works and words of Jesus than do those in modern times; and in consequence, speaking generally, such sequence would be . . . even by original witnesses. The event . . . memorable day might be remembered and repeated exactly in the order in which they had occurred; and thus we have, no doubt, in Mk 1 an account of the incidents that were . . . impressed on Peter's mind in connexion with the day on which he finally left all and followed Jesus.

8. We are now ready to discuss the question, Is there any instance in the NT of the term 'Gospel' applied to a written document? There are perhaps two such cases.

Before citing them, it may be well to premise, (1) that they were written at a time when there must have been written accounts of some sort of our Lord's works and words, and when the term Gospel was . . . narratives of the . . . and also (2) . . . Phil 5) 'the Gospel' is quite . . . story, and, being co-ordinate . . . 'the Prophets,' implies that the story was written.

The passages are: Mk 1<sup>1</sup> 'The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God'; and Rev 14<sup>6</sup> 'I saw another angel flying in mid heaven, having an eternal gospel to proclaim unto them that dwell on the earth.' However visions are to be explained, they are essentially pictures, seen by the eye before they are interpreted by the mind. This picture of the angel 'having an eternal gospel' plausibly suggests a figure with a scroll or roll in his hand.

The opening clause of St. Mark's Gospel has indeed been explained as parallel to Ph 4<sup>15</sup>, where 'the beginning of the gospel' is relative to the person apprehending it' (Grimm-Thayer), as though it . . . of John the Baptist. . . to the present writer . . . more natural to take it as the title of the book, and, as Dr. Salmon thinks, modelled on Hos 1<sup>3</sup> 'Ἀρχὴ λόγου Κυρίου ἐν Ὠσηε. It is not easy to give reasons why a considerable interval should elapse between the application of the term 'Gospel' to an oral narrative, and to the same narrative when committed to writing. It may be fairly asked, How would the writer of the Second Gospel have been likely to describe his work? It is not probable that St. Mark's Gospel, as we have it, was actually the first narrative drawn up. Nor can it be fairly said that the language of St. Luke, in his preface, proves that he was . . . the term 'Gospel' in the sense . . . The use of a Christian technical term would have seemed to St. Luke out of place in a section in which he was carefully using what he deemed his best literary style.

9. What has been said in explanation of St. Paul's statement that his knowledge of Gospel facts had been received from the Lord, i.e. from a man inspired by the Lord, a prophet-evangelist, suggests the answer to the question How did the Church recognize the . . . of the narratives which she finally, and at a very early date, accepted in as authoritative Gospels? It was through the double and almost simultaneous action of the original Evangelist or Evangelists, and the judgment of the Church on the sections of the Gospel-story delivered on successive Lord's Days, both directed and suggested and controlled by the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Jesus.

It is the intention of the writer of the present article to deal with this subject from the standpoint of the Christian Church to a greater degree than is usual now among critical writers. The indignant remonstrance of St. Paul to the individualistic Corinthians has a certain relevance to some modern exponents of early Christian literature. 'What' was it from you that the word of God went forth? or came it unto you alone?' (1 Co 14<sup>36</sup>). One sometimes hears or reads discussions on Christian literature which indicate that for the speaker or writer the Christian Church has no existence. The collection of writings which we call the NT is treated as though it were a fortuitous collection, the selection of which was determined arbitrarily, or at least on principles which have now no claim to respect, as though Christianity were merely a matter of literary or antiquarian interest, so that some new discovery might change our whole conception of Christ's work and words, or alter the value of the Gospels already received. Now the existence of the Christian Church during the first centuries of our era is a fact; a fact the recognition of which has no connexion with any special views we may hold as to what ought to be the constitution or organization of the Church in our own times. It is surely unphilosophical to ignore a fact which . . . one of transcendent importance to the . . . tians. The Gospels, as we have them now, are a product of the Church of Apostolic and sub-Apostolic times. It is, to say the least, conceivable that some principle determined the Church in her final selection of Gospels; and any suggestion as to what that principle was cannot be without interest, even if it fails to compel assent.

It may be proper to remark, by way of caution, that an inquiry into the principle or principles by which the Church was guided in her selection of authoritative Gospels is not . . . by any theory of inspiration. Even . . . that the sacred books only are inspired, and that the Church was not . . . guided by the Holy Spirit in her choice . . . the question must . . . How did the Church recognize the inspiration of the books?

'As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you' (Jn 20<sup>21</sup>). These words of the risen Lord express the idea that the Church is the representative of Christ on earth, and that, as 'in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily' (Col 2<sup>9</sup>), so is the Church His body, a body not only quickened by His life, but indwelt by His mind: 'We have the mind of Christ' (1 Co 2<sup>16</sup>). In the context immediately preceding this quotation, St. Paul claims for those who have this mind the possession of a special critical sense, a faculty of discernment in spiritual matters; and other passages exhibit the practical operation of this critical sense, as it may be . . . 1 Co 14<sup>29</sup> 'Let the prophets speak by two or three, and let the others discern,' and v. 37 'If any man thinketh himself to be a prophet or spiritual, let him take knowledge of the things which I write unto you, that they are the commandments of the Lord.' This special sense was formed by those who had been 'from the beginning eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.' Their reports of what their Master had done and said, the conditions in which He worked, the tone and temper of His utterances, formed a standard by which it was possible to decide the claims to genuineness of stories told about Him. There is . . . nothing new in this; it only supposes the Apostolic Church or at least the leading members of it, to have had the same sort of sense of discernment which is undoubtedly possessed by good critics in other departments of literature. The very best attempts to imitate the style of a great poet or prose writer ring false in the ear of one who knows.

But not only did the Church, thinking through the accredited teachers 'who had the spirit,' or if it be preferred, the sanctified 'common sense of most,' determine which were the Gospels inspired by God; but also then form—at least so far as the Synoptics are concerned—was in all probability determined by the use made of them in the weekly Church assemblies. This use must have obtained from the very earliest times at which meetings were held for distinctively Christian worship. We cannot otherwise account for the familiarity on the part of his readers with the general tenor of the Evangelic story which is assumed by St. Paul in his Epistles.

In Justin Martyr's time (Apol 1: 67) the established custom was that two lessons were read, one from the Prophets, another from the Gospels. We cannot press Justin's language too closely, so as to exclude from public reading the non-Prophetical parts of the OT, or the Apostolic Epistles. We must remember that his intention was to give heathens a general idea as to the nature of the Christian worship; he was not composing rubrical directions for the clergy. It is more likely than not that more use was made of the Scriptures books than of any other portion of the OT and the Epistles is to them that Justin most constantly refers his Gentile readers. That the Apostolic Epistles were also read in the Christian assemblies we know from other sources; but it is not likely that a Lord's Day ever passed without a recitation of some portion of the narratives of the works and words of Jesus.

When we examine the canonical Gospels with this consideration in our mind, we are struck by the fact that it is easy to imagine that the first three were compiled from sections read with a view to practical instruction, and that it is not so easy to think of the Fourth Gospel as having had this origin. The stories and discourses in the Synoptics have the effect of pictures reproduced in the words of the original witness, while the impression was still fresh in his memory, and before he had time to place them in any systematized doctrinal setting. St. John's Gospel, on the other hand, has the air of being an attempt to write a history, a spiritual history if you will, still a history, an orderly statement of words and deeds meditated on in the study, and recorded as they emerged from the writer's inner consciousness after the lapse of many years. To say this is not to undervalue the historical truth, much less the inspiration, of the Fourth Gospel. The difference between it and the Synoptics is similar to that between a diarist and a historian: a diary chronicles facts, a history interprets them.

It is possible that St. John's Gospel was known as a history for private reading only, for some considerable time before it was read in the congregation. This supposition would partly explain why so few of Justin's quotations of Christ's words are taken from it, although we have sufficient proof of its acquaintance with it. Even in our own day it is doubtful whether any public service for Christ's Gospel is giving examples of our Lord's teaching. Moreover, apart from this difference in quality between St. John's Gospel and the Synoptics, the difference in literary style must have, even from the first, delayed its adoption in general public use. Those who think, as they read or listen, soon become aware that its simplicity of vocabulary and its subtlety of thought:

10. A word is necessary as to the relation between the canonical Gospels and the fragments of early Gospel material which have already repaid the patient toil of scholarly excavation in Egypt. In 1892 a fragment of the lost Gospel of Peter, discovered at Akhmîm in 1886-7, was published by U. Bouriant; and in 1897, Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt published a papyrus containing eight Sayings of Jesus in a more or less fragmentary condition; and another fragment of five Sayings has since appeared. We are not at all concerned here with the so-called Gospel of Peter. It is confessedly the production of a sect of Docetæ not earlier than the latter half of the 2nd century. It is undoubted<sup>1</sup> . . . valuable, as illustrating the . . . ; but it has no claim whatever to be an original source of information. It is instructive as a harmonistic narrative based chiefly on the canonical Gospels.

To the student of the Gospels, the recovery of the lost Gospel of Peter, or of a portion of it, has the same kind, but not the same degree, of interest as the recovery of a lost work by Justin Martyr would have. It serves as an illustration of the way in which the canonical Gospels were employed in the 2nd century. But the case is different with the newly discovered Sayings of Jesus. These seem to claim to be Gospel material. The question is, Are they bona fide Gospels, which have been practically rejected by the Church, or are they only pseudo-Gospel material?

We have seen that a complete 'Gospel' must have contained a narrative of those facts of our Lord's life which have a redemptive significance; but besides Gospels, it is very probable, indeed almost certain, that there were current in Apostolic times sayings of our Lord, without any note of the occasion when they were spoken. We have one such saying in Ac 20<sup>35</sup>, and in the extant Gospels there are many passages which it is difficult to believe are not based on collections of Sayings. An almost certain case is Lk 16<sup>14-18</sup>, where we have a group of four Sayings, none of which has any connexion with the others, or with the parable that follows

This example proves that the disconnected nature of the Sayings in the recently discovered papyri affords no presumption against their being genuine Gospel material. Moreover, the record by St. Luke of St. Paul's quotation (Ac 20<sup>35</sup>) of a saying of Jesus which is not found in any canonical Gospel, proves that while St. Luke was no doubt desirous to make his Gospel as full as possible, he was yet aware that there were accessible to him sayings besides those of which he made use. So that we cannot reject the papyri Sayings on the ground that the canonical Gospels must necessarily contain all the sayings of Jesus that were known in Apostolic times.

On the other hand, on the principles we have adopted we must decide that St. Luke, in his selection of sayings and discourses, was guided by the Spirit of Jesus; and it may be regarded as the fact that he did select is a presumptive proof that he wrote at a time sufficiently early for it to be possible for a Christian to consider any authenticated saying of Jesus to be not worth preserving. Contrast the eager anxiety of Papias to gather up every crumb from the recollections of early disciples. At best, the papyri Sayings belong to the same class as the traces in Codex D, that is to say, they are early Gospel material, rejected because the mind of the Church in the 1st cent. thought it to be unsuitable for preservation. The present conclusion to St. Luke's Gospel, on the other hand, and the Pervoepo adulteræ, are instances of floating Gospel material which have been stamped with the approval of the mind of the Church.

It may happen however, that further discoveries and mature consideration will suggest that these papyri Sayings have only a relative value and being fragment- of the very extensive literature of the 2nd century. If more of this literature had survived to our own day, we should be able to view them in a juster proportion. We know that, even in the lifetime of the Apostles, Christianity had developed so rapidly that there was an exuberant growth of 'divers and strange teachings' (He 13<sup>9</sup>). Each of these sects, or schools of thought and speculation, must have had both its authorized expositions and its literary production. We are apt to forget that the business of book production in the first centuries of the Christian era was enormous in volume.

We know from the lists given by Eusebius, and allusions in other authors, that our extant ante-Nicene Fathers represent a very small fraction of the literature of the Church before his time. We may judge from this fact how unlikely it would be that much of the writings of heretics would survive. Such literature did not belong to a body with a continuous organized life, as is the Christian Church, a life continuous in doctrine as well as by personal links. The doctrine of the Christian Church, being a living thing, grows and develops from one age to another, but the new always has to reconcile itself with the old; they are connected. And so even uninspired Christian writings would continue to be preserved and respected long after they had ceased to be generally read. Whereas heresy, as it was called, is essentially transitory; its literature even when not merely the expression of the thoughts of an individual, reflects the conception of only one generation. Those who write it have no reason for retaining interest in it after it has ceased to represent precisely their own. On the whole, it seems to the present writer that these papyri Sayings of Jesus must be regarded as not an expression of the main line of Church thought of any century. They are, of course, profoundly interesting, as casting light on the religious thought of some, we cannot tell how many, in the first century, but they do not exhibit the general mind of the Church.

11. In any discussion as to the language in which the first Gospel narrative was composed, it is impossible to leave out of account the evidence preserved in the fragments of Papias that are cited in Eusebius, HE iii. 39.

It is not intended here to give a résumé of the controversy that has raged over these few lines; but merely to state what seems to the present writer their most probable sense and value. The title of Papias' book was Λογίων Κυριακῶν Ἐξηγήσεις. Besides Eusebius, Irenæus seems to be the only writer of those whose works have come down to us, who exhibits a first-hand acquaintance with the book of Papias. The other writers who allude to him evidently knew no more about him than what they found in Eusebius or Irenæus. The nature of the work may be guessed from what Papias himself states in one of the fragments: 'I shall not hesitate also to put down to you, along with my interpretations, whatsoever things I have at any time learned carefully from the elders.' The book, then, had a twofold character: interpretations, and also oral traditions. It is these latter to which Eusebius refers when he says that the book contained 'certain strange parables and teachings of the Saviour, and some other more mythical things'; and from the fact that Eusebius quotes from Papias two statements concerning the Gospels of Matthew and Mark respectively, it is at least probable that the interpretations dealt with our Gospels. Eusebius does not conceal his contempt for Papias' literary capacity. 'He appears to have been of very limited understanding (ποσὸν ἀσθενὲς τὸν νοῦν), as one can see from his discourses.' This adverse verdict is certainly borne out by the puerile extraneous pre-occupied by Irenæus; and it does not seem reasonable to attribute Eusebius' hostile criticism to his want of sympathy with Papias' millenarian opinions. Eusebius speaks in unqualified praise of Irenæus, who shared those opinions.

We may now discuss the term λόγια κυριακά, as it occurs in the title of Papias' book. The word λόγια may certainly be rendered 'oracular utterances,' as Professor Stanton points out (The Gospels as Historical Documents, p. 53); but λόγια κυριακά is not naturally rendered 'oracular utterances of the Lord,' in the sense uttered by the Lord,—which would be λόγια Κυρίου—but oracular utterances relating to the Lord, just as κυριακὸν δείπνον does not mean the supper eaten by, or given by, the Lord, but the supper ordained as an institution by Him. κυριακός has the same force in the phrase ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα.

As regards λόγια, it would, of course, be absurd to question the possibility that Papias was familiar with the word in the sense 'oracular utterances'; but it is more likely that his use of λόγια was intentionally connected with that found in the NT (Ac 7<sup>38</sup>, Ro 3<sup>2</sup>, 11c 3, 1 P 4<sup>11</sup>), where the term, variously qualified, is used in the Scriptures of the OT. Λόγια κυριακά, then, would mean Holy Scriptures connected with the Lord, i.e. the Gospels. This term harmonizes with what we have otherwise learned as to the nature of the book written by Papias. It dealt primarily with interpretations of the Gospels, and secondarily with oral traditions, of which he was evidently a very uncritical collector.

Papias distinctly tells us, as Eusebius points out, that among his informants were persons old enough to have had personal intercourse with the Apostles. He distinguishes two classes of authorities: (1) Persons who could tell him what Andrew, Peter, etc., said (εἶπεν), and (2) what Aristion and the presbyter John, the disciples of the Lord, say (λέγουσιν). Eusebius, who had read the book, states that the language of Papias implies that he was himself a hearer of Aristion and the presbyter John. We are certainly entitled to infer that they were his elder informants; very much elder, if they really were disciples of the Lord in the strict sense of the phrase. See, further, art. ARISTION.

The order of the list of elders given by Papias is, as Professor Stanton remarks (op. cit. p. 168), 'a somewhat strange one.' He gives the true order: John and Matthew are mentioned last, and the others in the order in which they had embodied their testimony in writing, they were less important than the rest for the particular matter speaking here—the illustration of the verbal matter orally handed down.' It may be added that the omission in this list of Mark and Luke was most probably due to the consideration that these Evangelists could not be supposed to be able, from personal knowledge, to add anything to what they had embodied in their Gospels. One cannot help noting that the other names, Andrew, Peter, Philip, Thomas, James, are those of the Apostles who are introduced in the Gospels as making observations, and that the first three names occur in that order in the first chapter of St. John's Gospel. We do not know which James Papias meant. Moreover, while Eusebius expressly states that Papias mentions Aristion and the presbyter John frequently by name, and gives their traditions in his writings, he does not quote from Papias any tradition whatever concerning the Gospels. We are forced to the conclusion that Papias had none to record, and that the Gospels were by that time the property of those who had been followers of the Apostles, and who had learnt nothing of permanent interest. It is impossible to imagine that if Eusebius had found in the book of Papias any statement whatever as from an Apostle, he would not have preserved it in his History.

Of the two celebrated remarks cited from Papias about the Gospels of Mark and Matthew respectively, the first is given expressly as the statement of the presbyter John, and it is natural to suppose that the second came from the same source. Papias was credulous and unintelligent; but he does not seem to have made any statement on his own authority; so that it would be unreasonable to discount the statements of the presbyter John because of the stupidity of the person who recorded them. On the other hand, it is unreasonable to assume that the nearness of the presbyter John to the times of the Apostles is a guarantee that his assertions as to the composition of the Gospels are altogether to be depended on. We need have no hesitation in rejecting any, or all, of them; if more c . . . oblige us to do so; but the . . . of one statement would not of necessity throw discredit on the others.

Thus, that Mark was 'the interpreter of Peter' is so probable a tradition that it has met with general acceptance; it is, moreover, an assertion as to which it is quite impossible now to produce any rebutting evidence. But the assertion that Mark did not compose his narrative 'in order' is, at the present day, as generally rejected by those who have carefully studied the Synoptic Problem. Dr. Salmon, in particular, has pointed out that if we desire to follow the growth of our Lord's reputation as a teacher and healer, and the corresponding development of hostility against Him, we must consult the Gospel according to St. Mark in preference to the others.

Passing on to the statement of the presbyter John about St. Matthew, and judging it in the light of all the evidence at present available, we seem to find the same mixture in it of truth and error. The testimony of St. Jerome does not leave us room to question that there was an orthodox Hebrew Gospel which, as extant in his time, contained matters not found in any of the four canonical Gospels. This work had such a very limited circulation that it is impossible for us now to affirm with any confidence as to whether its peculiar features were in the original, or were later interpolations; but we have no rebutting evidence that in its original form it was not the work of St. Matthew. On the other hand, nothing is more certain than that the Greek First Gospel, which has always been known in the Church as the Gospel according to St. Matthew, is not in its present form, which there is no reason to think was ever different—a translation from one Hebrew original. How then are we to explain 'Everyone interpreted them,' i.e. Matthew's Hebrew λόγια, 'as he was able'? Dr. Salmon's solution seems to give the most likely explanation of the phrase. John the presbyter meant that the Greek St. Matthew was a translation of the Hebrew St. Matthew, and not by the author himself. The assertion is of the same kind as that about St. Mark, that he did not write 'in order'; and both statements were suggested by an extreme theory of biblical inspiration, a theory which was very generally held until quite recent times—the absolute inerrancy of Holy Scripture in every detail.

One has sometimes heard discrepancies between different historical statements in the OT explained by the assertion that the errors which cause the discrepancies were not in the original as it left the hand of the Divinely inspired writer, but were due to the slips of unimpaired copyists; and thus it is thought possible to reconcile belief in the inerrancy of the Word of God with the actual state of the case. The statements of the presbyter John about the Gospels of Mark and Matthew are best explained by supposing that he held some such theory of inspiration.

'When he finds what seems a disagreement between the Gospels, he is satisfied there can be no real disagreement. Mark's order may be different from Luke's (who declares in his preface that it was his intention to write in order—κατά τάς τάξεις); but, then, that was because it was not Mark's design to recount the facts in their proper order. . . . If in Matthew's Gospel, as he read it, there seemed any inaccuracy this must be imputed to the translators. . . . the Gospel as Matthew himself wrote it was free from fault' (Salmon, Introd. to NT, p. 93).

The conclusion, then, to which we are driven is that if the existence of an original Hebrew Gospel depended on the testimony of the presbyter John, we could not safely make any positive affirmation on the subject. The only other witness to Matthew's Hebrew Gospel who seems to be independent, i.e. Irenaeus, may not really be so. It has been . . . believed that he adds to what Eusebius . . . Papias a note of time, 'while Peter and Paul were preaching and founding the Church at Rome'; but the Rev. J. Chapman has proved (JThSt vi. 563) that this clause is neither derived from Papias nor is it a note of time.

12. However, whether St. Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew or not, there can be no doubt, both from a priori considerations and also from the internal evidence of the extant Greek Gospels, that there was current in the infancy of the Church a Gospel in the Hebrew language as then commonly spoken in Judaea. The last command of our Lord, as recorded by St. Luke (24<sup>47</sup>), that the gospel should be preached, . . . at Jerusalem, is in itself a sufficient . . . one of the first Gospels, in the sense in which we have used that word, must have been in the Aramaic tongue. Even if our Lord sometimes, and in some places, taught in Greek, yet Aramaic was His mother tongue, and that of His Apostles, and of the vast majority of His hearers. In the early Jerusalem Church it is plain that the Hebrews outnumbered the Hellenists (Ac 6<sup>1</sup>). These considerations make it certain that one of the forms which the Evangelic narrative assumed from the very first was in Aramaic. The facts that such a Gospel is not now extant, and that the external evidence for its existence at any time is so scanty, are fully accounted for by the destruction of Jerusalem in the year A.D. 70. That world-shaking event, among its other immediate consequences, was followed by the . . . of the Hebrew-speaking Church of Jerusalem. Then, after not many years, the . . . Christian community in Palestine . . . the main current of Christian thought, and, in . . . sank to the position of an obscure sect with an out-of-date theology.

It has been stated above that the internal evidence of the extant Greek Gospels suggests an Aramaic original. It must be confessed that the presence in a Greek document of Aramaic turns of phrase does not necessarily prove that it is a translation from the Aramaic. Dr. A. R. . . . has given good reasons for his theory that the Aramaisms in the first two chapters of St. Luke's Gospel are due to a deliberate imitation of the LXX of 1 Samuel. But there does not seem any likelihood that the author, or authors, of the common Synoptic narrative were, like St. Luke, conscious literary artists; and even if we cannot follow Weiss in every . . . conclusions, there remains . . . the theory of an original . . . underlying the Synoptics, . . . gree. This supposition is ex . . . case of the portions of St. M . . . which are peculiar to that Evan . . . long ago pointed out, w . . . tions from the OT found in the Synoptic Gospel, that, while the cyclic . . . as he calls them, agree with the LXX . . . are peculiar to St. Matthew seem to be independent translations from the Hebrew.

13. This is not a discussion of the Synoptic Problem; but it may not be out of place to conclude this article with a suggestion as to the relations of the three Synoptic Gospels to each other. It is generally held now that the First and Third Gospels are altogether independent of each other, but that Mt. and Lk. derived the matter which they have in common with Mk. either from St. Mark's Gospel, or from an earlier source from which St. Mark selected the incidents and discourses which he relates. On the hypothesis that Mt. and Lk. copied our St. Mark, we have to assume the existence of another early Gospel, from which they derived the non-Markan matter which they have in common. In this case we conclude that the details peculiar to St Mark were an original feature of that Gospel, and that Mt. and Lk. for various reasons omitted them. On the other hand, if the common Synoptic matter and the matter common to Mt and Lk. be both assigned to one original, it will then be natural to think of St. Mark's peculiar details as additions made by him, probably on the authority of St. Peter.

The problem has been rendered unnecessarily complicated by an assumption that it is impossible that an Evangelist should have omitted anything from his work which he had reason to believe was true. The fallacy of this assumption will be evident, whichever hypothesis we adopt. The simplest method to account for all the facts is to suppose a Greek translation of an Aramaic original as the source of all the common Synoptic matter, and also of the matter common to Mt and Lk. In this document the OT quotations would have been given in a LXX form. At least two other sources must be postulated for the matter found only in Mt and Lk. We have already found reason for the matter peculiar to Mt. was a translation from an Aramaic original.

Whatever solution of the Synoptic problem be ultimately adopted by the consensus of critics, it does not seem that the complicated hypotheses of the German school of a generation ago will again commend themselves to scholars of sober judgment. It is a sound canon of criticism that sources are not to be multiplied beyond the necessity of the case.

GOSPELS (APOCRYPHAL).—i. TITLE.—In the sense in which the term is popularly understood, 'apocryphal' is synonymous with 'spurious' or 'false'; when, however, it is applied as a title to writings of the early Christian centuries, it bears the significance of 'extra-canonical.' By Apocryphal Gospels are, accordingly, meant all writings claiming to be Gospels which are not included in the Canon of the NT, without any implication that their contents are necessarily false or of questionable origin. (See, further, for the meaning of the term, art. 'Apocrypha' in Hastings' DB i. 112 ff.; also Hennecke, NT Apokr. 3* ff., Handb. viii ff.; and Zahn, Gesch. d. NT Kan. i. 127 ff.).

ii. ORIGIN.—For a generation after the death of Jesus, His teaching and the facts about His life were preserved by oral tradition in the circle of believers. With the rise of a second generation, however, the need was felt for reducing the oral reminiscences to written form. The reason for this was twofold. For one thing, the number of those who could give personal testimony of what Jesus did and said was rapidly becoming smaller; and for another, the Christian faith was spreading far from its original home in Palestine. It made it imperative that, if trustworthy accounts of the teaching and life of Jesus were to be preserved for the guidance of the scattered communities of Christians, the tradition should be committed to something more permanent and less liable to disturbing influences than oral reminiscence. The impulse of this necessity gave rise to our written Gospels, and to many other Evangelic records which have survived. Of the many attempts to write the life of Jesus, to which St. Luke in his prologue refers, none (with the exception of Mt. and Mk.) can be said with any certainty to have survived;* although it is probable that the Gospel Fragment of Fayûm is the wreckage of one of them. In any case, some of the earlier non-canonical Gospels, which are extant in more or less fragmentary condition, are probably the products of the general desire, that was everywhere felt, to have a more certain knowledge of Jesus and His life. These were possible from the oral instruction of the evangelists. The Gospel according to the Hebrews, which is but little later than the Synoptics, belongs almost certainly to this class; and the same may be true also of the Gospel according to the Egyptians.

The majority of extra-canonical Gospels are due, however, to other causes. Written at a time when the present Four Gospels were gaining, or had already gained, a place of exceptional authority,† they came into existence in answer to two desires, urgently felt in certain circles of Christians. (1) The first was the desire, popularly entertained, for fuller information about the life of Christ than that given by the canonical Gospels. This was not unnatural, and was directed chiefly to the facts antecedent to Christ's advent, and to those periods of His life which the older Gospels left in shadow. His birth and childhood, and the Resurrection. It is noteworthy that the writers who endeavoured to satisfy this desire for fuller knowledge made no attempt to fill up the silent years between Christ's childhood and His entrance on His public ministry, the reason in part probably being that 'it seemed too daring for them to illumine a darkness, for which there was not the slightest historical suggestion in the New Testament' (Hofmann, *PRE*³ i. 655). With greater probability, however, it may be said that the reason was, not so much any self-restraint through loyalty to the data of history, as the absence of any clear dogmatic motive; and dogmatic motives, as will appear, were almost invariably associated with the desire to satisfy curiosity. It may be safely assumed that, had any doctrinal interest called for the history of the silent years, no scruples about historical truthfulness would have prevented writers from enlivening them with the products of their fancy. In the main it is certain that the details furnished by the apocryphal Gospels regarding matters about which the canonical Gospels are silent have little or no historical basis. They are in reality Christian haggadoth, popular stories similar to those in Jewish literature which were framed for purposes of pious entertainment and instruction. The Gospels of the Infancy and Childhood, for example, are full of legendary matter drawn from various sources, or freely invented by the fancy of the writers. Where the details are not entirely imaginative, they have their origin in the transformation of utterances of Christ into deeds, or in the literal interpretation of OT prophecies and Jewish expectations about the Messiah, or in the ascription to Jesus of miracles similar to those recorded in the OT (Hofmann *PRE*³ i. 655).

* The probability is that most of them disappeared early, being unable to maintain their position alongside of the Gospels which are now in the Canon.

† The authoritative position of the canonical Gospels, which was beginning to be recognized before the middle of the 2nd century, was assured by the end of the century.

As an example of the way in which the Christian haggadist worked, it may suffice to mention his treatment of OT texts. Ps 148<sup>7</sup> reads: "Praise the Lord from the earth, ye dragons"; accordingly, in pseudo-Matthew dragons are represented as coming out of a cave and worshipping the child Jesus. In the picture of Paradise regained in Is 11<sup>6ff</sup> the child Jesus is surrounded by all kinds of wild beasts accompanied by the angels on the way to Egypt (Cowper, Apoc. Gosp. liii).

But although the Apocryphal Gospels abound in legendary accretion, of this kind, the mistake should not be made of assuming that there is no authentic material in the additions to the narratives in the four Gospels. Oral tradition maintained itself for a time after our present Gospels were reduced to writing, and it is not improbable that genuine sayings of Christ and authentic details about His life have been preserved in uncanonical books. On this point see further in § 11.

(2) A much more powerful motive than the desire to satisfy curiosity, leading to the production of Gospel writings, was the dogmatic interest, the desire to find support for beliefs which were held in various sections of the Church. This was especially marked in Gnostic circles, where numerous Evangelic writings (running into thousands, Epiphanius says [Hær. 26]) were produced, the authority of a secret tradition and its doctrines.

Even in the early Gospels, which are of the Synoptic type, it is noticeable that some of the sayings and incidents are to some extent in the canonical Gospels.

which betray Docetic sympathies. The dogmatic motive is prominent as it fills up with fictitious details the empty spaces of the Gospel narrative, and thus have generally been regarded as due to the desire for fuller knowledge. The motive, although it was certainly operative, would have led to the invention of such a mass of fictitious matter, had it not been powerfully stimulated by dogmatic considerations. In the Prot-evangelium of James the legendary history of Mary's antecedents and of the circumstances of Christ's birth was due not merely to any horror vacui, but to the imperative dogmatic necessity, as the writer conceived it, to show that Christ, alike the true Divinity and the true Son of Mary. Similarly, the Childhood Gospel of Thomas contains repulsive stories of the child Christ's miraculous power and knowledge, would never have found acceptance in Christian circles had it not been for the witness which the miracles were supposed to bear to the divinity of Christ's origin.

iii. RELATION TO CANONICAL GOSPELS.—The condition and the uncertain text of the Apocryphal Gospels render a confident judgment as to their relation to the canonical Gospels exceedingly difficult. Where the question of affinity is raised, the problem to be solved is whether the uncanonical Gospels are dependent on the canonical, or draw from a common oral source. The latter possibility is one not to be dismissed without careful consideration; but, on the whole, the evidence points in almost every case to the use of some or all of the four Gospels by the authors of the apocryphal writings. Only in the case of one Gospel, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, is there a strong consensus of opinion in favour of independence (see, however, vii. A. 1). Where there is independence, this is frequently shown by a free manipulation and embellishment of old material, to bring it into line with the writer's peculiar point of view, or to suit it to the character of his surroundings.

While a large degree of dependence on the canonical Gospels must in general be maintained in regard to the Apocryphal Gospels, this must not be pressed so far as to exclude the possibility of their embodying details drawn from reliable oral sources. The fact must steadily be borne in mind that the stream of living oral tradition continued to flow for several generations, though in ever decreasing volume, alongside of the written Gospels; * accordingly, where the uncanonical Gospels deviate from the canonical record, either by slight interpolations into common matter or by additions peculiarly their own, the possibility is always open that in these additions we have early and reliable traditions, either unknown to the four Gospels or passed over by them as unsuitable for their purpose.

Two important considerations must, however, be kept in mind in estimating the trustworthiness of all such additions. In the first place, the authoritative position which the canonical Gospels early reached as authentic sources of the life and teaching of Jesus entitles them to be used as a touchstone of the probable authenticity of the additional matter contained in the Apocryphal Gospels. No saying of Christ or detail about His life has any value if it does not fit into the teaching and personality of Jesus. Secondly, when we keep in view the undoubted fact that fictitious writings were common in which the life of Christ were freely handled in the sects, it is clear that extreme caution must be observed in receiving as authentic any addition to the canonical record. If it would be less than just to say that all the Apocryphal Gospels witnesses, with a against them in respect is nevertheless true that their exclusion from the Canon, as well as the notoriously tainted origin of some of them, render it that their claim to embody a genuine tradition must be carefully sifted, and allowed only after the clearest proof.

iv. VALUE.—The question of greatest moment which arises in estimating the value of the Apocryphal Gospels naturally has reference to their worth as additional sources for the life and teaching of Jesus. From what has been already said about their origin and their relation to the canonical Gospels, their value in this respect will appear. A comparison of the those in the Canon makes the pre-eminence of the latter incontestably clear, and shows that as sources of Christ's life the former, for all practical purposes, may be regarded as of little value. The beauty and versimilitude of the former, and the four Gospels stand out in strong relief when viewed in the light of the artificial and legendary stories which characterize most of the Apocryphal Gospels. The proverbial simplicity of truth receives a striking commentary when (for example) the miracles of the Canonical Gospels are compared with those of the Apocryphal. The former, for the most part, are instinct with ethical purpose and significance, and are felt to be the natural and unforced expression of the sublime personality of Jesus; the latter are largely theatrical exhibitions without ethical content. In them we find no worthy conception of the laws of providential interference; they are wrought to supply personal wants, or to gratify private feelings, and often are positively immoral (Westcott). In a few of the Gospels which show signs of independence, there may be here and there a trace of primitive and trustworthy tradition; but all such details, which have a reasonable claim to be considered authentic, do not sensibly increase the sum of our knowledge about Christ. The conclusion, based on the comparison of the Apocryphal with the Canonical Gospels is amply warranted, that in rejecting the former and choosing the latter as authoritative Scriptures the Church showed a true feeling for what was original and authentic.

Though the Apocryphal Gospels afford us little additional knowledge about Christ, they are invaluable as enabling us to realize more clearly the conditions under which the four Gospels were received in the Church, until they were finally established as authoritative in the Gospel Canon. The existence of so many Gospels shows that for some time after the Gospels appeared, they had no position of influence. The high place which ora 'the living and abiding voice'—still retained in the estimation of the Church (cf Euseb. HE iii. 39-4) militated against the acceptance of any written Gospel as authoritative beyond the communities in which it was current. In the early part of the 2nd cent. we have, accordingly, to think of the four Gospels as merely a local and circumscribed influence in different sections of the Church; the literature of Gnosticism, however, proceeded, as handled more or less freely to suit the dominant conceptions and needs. But by the middle of the century there were indications that the four Gospels, already widely known through the constant intercourse that united Christian communities together, were being elevated above their competitors to a place of exceptional authority. This was due, not to mere good fortune or to any arbitrary dealing on the part of the Church, but to the superior claims of the writings themselves, which were recognized when the necessity arose of counteracting, by trustworthy and authentic records, the rapid growth of a Gnosticism in Gnostic circles. This rise of the Gospels to a commanding and unchallengeable position bears witness not only to their inherent value,—which the Church, with a fine spiritual sensitiveness, recognized,—but to the conviction that, as opposed to the writings which appeared under the names of Apostles, they embodied the testimony of Apostolic writers. By the time of Irenæus (c. 180) the Gospel canon may be regarded as established. The Apocryphal Gospels continued to circulate, but their position of the four Gospels was finally assured.

Perhaps the chief value of the Apocryphal Gospels is to be found in the light which they cast on the conditions of life and thought in early Christian times. They are of service in the difficult work of the complex environment in which Christianity was rearing up.

When, for example, one reads in the Childhood Gospel of Thomas the account of the miracles wrought by the child Christ, and marks the strange, almost fantastic, character of these miracles, and the way in which they are related, and the way in which the Gospel hardly the Gospel of the child Christ's childhood, the Gospel of Thomas is yet a mirror in which we see reflected the curious condition of the society which accepted it. We see here, in a typical instance, how strong were the external influences which played on the development of Christianity in early times. In the process of penetrating the heathen world with the Gospel, the Christian missionaries were in contact with the foreign elements of its environment (Greek mythology and Greek philosophy) and met, and given rise to strange superstitions which exerted a deep influence on the development of the Christian faith and life. Traces of this are clearly discernible in the Apocryphal Gospels, not only in the Gnostic Gospels, but in the Gospel of Thomas. The confusion and vagueness of the Christological views in the different Apocryphal Gospels also bear witness to the great variety of influences which were at work in the early Church, and enable us to realize with what trouble the conception of the Divine manhood of Jesus was eventually established. The indecision and one-sidedness which are revealed in doctrinal matters are also traceable in the interpretation of the ethical content of Christ's teaching and life. Ascetic and Encratite views are found in several Gospels, and no doubt were characteristic of all the Gnostic Gospels. A close sympathy with the true ethical spirit of Christianity is, however, noticeable in the Gospel of the Hebrews, in which stress is laid on acts of mercy and brotherly kindness; and in the 'Traditions of Matthias' mentioned by Clement of Alexandria, and possibly identical with the Gnostic Gospel of Matthias, the doctrine of Christian reformation, in its most stringent form, is put: 'If the neighbour of an elect person sins, the elect has sinned; for if he had lived according to the counsels of the Word, his neighbour would have so esteemed his manner of life that he would have kept free from sin.'

The apologetic interest which is so characteristic of 2nd cent. writers (witness the Apologies of Aristides, Justin, Tertullian, etc.) is reflected in several of the Apocryphal Gospels.

Traces are to be found in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, in which the servant of the high priest is a witness to the Resurrection. A later stage of the apologetic movement may be observed in the Gospel of Peter, where Pilate is practically exonerated from blame for Christ's condemnation, and is made to bear witness to Christ's Divinity. In the Acts of Pilate (Gospel of Nicodemus) the movement has reached its climax in the reverence which the Romans pay to Jesus at His trial, in the miraculous homage of the Roman standards, and in the irrefutable evidence given of Christ's resurrection, to the conviction of His enemies.

A subsidiary element in estimating the value of the Apocryphal Gospels is the interest which they afford in the life of Christ. A passage in the Gospel of Thomas (ch. 18) affords an example of the way in which the scene in the fairy tale, 'Beauty and the Beast,' when by a magic spell the Beast suddenly stands still, and all living beings are immovably rooted where they are. The Childhood Gospel of Thomas, useless as it is as a source of information about Christ's youth, gives a remarkably vivid and convincing picture of Jewish village life. Caution must be observed in tracing the details of Jewish life in the Apocryphal Gospels, many of them are entirely unhistorical.

DOCTRINAL CHARACTERISTICS.—As stated above in § ii., one of the main impulses which led to the production of the Apocryphal Gospels was the desire to express the faith held in certain Christian circles. Gospels of this type, although professedly narratives of our Lord's life and teaching, were in reality doctrinal treatises conceived in the interests of a definite school of thought. Such were the numerous Gospels of which the smallest number remain. But even those Gospels in the production of which there was no deliberate dogmatic purpose, are doctrinally significant. It is true of them, equally with the canonical Gospels, that they were written in the interests of faith, ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν; the writers were not mere chroniclers of past events—giving information about One in whose life and personality they had no vital concern; they were believers, for whom Christ was Lord. The religious value which Jesus had for them, and the manner in which they conceived of His person, were reflected in their narrative of His life. However small the value of the writings may be as authentic sources of information regarding Jesus, they are interesting as showing by a side light what men thought about Him. How far the early Church as a whole was from any clear and uniform conception of Christ, is apparent from the Apocryphal Gospels. In them we have not only the reflection of views representing the main stream of Christian thought, but also the foreshadowings of doctrines which later, in their developed form, were rejected as heretical.

The majority of the Apocryphal Gospels betray a heretical tendency, which varies broadly according as the Divine or the human nature of Christ is denied. On the one hand, there is the Ebionitic conception of Jesus, with its rejection of His heavenly origin; on the other, the Docetic, with its obscuration or denial of His true humanity. These opposing views find their expression in the Gospel of the Twelve and the Gospel of Peter, the latter, somewhat veiled, in the Gospel of the Saviour—the heavenly Christ—freed from the association with the phantasmal earthly Christ, and made the possessor of His full powers through the death and resurrection, declares the true wisdom of God.

The Childhood Gospel is the main current of ecclesiastical doctrine in their view of the person of Christ. The Gospel of Thomas shows that the circles in which it found acceptance held to the doctrine of Christ's human and Divine natures. There are traces that point to a Gnostic origin, and to a conception of Christ in which His true humanity was obscured, but in the later form in which it was current in the Church, the humanity and Divinity of our Lord are alike emphasized. The child Jesus is taking His part in the usual games and sports, and yet the belief in His supernatural powers is by the extraordinary miracles attributed to Him, and by His astonishing confession from His teacher, 'This Son of Man was here before the creation' (ch. 7). The Infancy Gospel of James, too, it is clear, was written in the interests of orthodoxy, which were imperilled, alike by the belief current in Jewish-Christian circles that Joseph was the father of Jesus, and by the Gnostic doctrine that, in being born of Mary, He partook of her human nature, but passed through a pipe (Epiphanius, Hær. 31. 7). It is a double attack on the generally accepted doctrine, the writer of the Protevangelium, while in doubt that Jesus was born as a human child from the breast of His mother, sought to make sure by depicting Mary as holy from her birth, as fed only on angels' food, as conceiving by the word of the Lord, as bringing forth her child in virginity, and as remaining a virgin to the end. It is noteworthy that the Childhood Gospel is the All-Holy mother of God.

vi. INFLUENCE.—Although after the 2nd cent. no Gospels were reckoned as authoritative except those now in the Canon, the Apocryphal Gospels continued to be read for edification both in public and in private. Those which were distinctly heretical gradually disappeared as the power of the Church grew, while those which were of a type similar to the canonical Gospels were unable for any lengthened period to maintain their position alongside their authoritative rivals. Still we find that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was read in some quarters in Jerome's day (end of 4th cent.), and was highly esteemed by that Father himself; while the vitality of the Gospel of Peter is evidenced by the fact that a large portion of it was placed in the grave of a monk in the early Middle Ages (8th–12th cent.). The popularity of the Childhood Gospels was remarkable, especially in the Churches of the East. There the Protevangelium was so popular as a book of devotion that it was used in public worship, and furnished material for the homilies of preachers. Translations of it circulated in Syriac, Coptic, and Arabic, and, along with other childhood legends, its stories, often greatly embellished and exaggerated, found a place in a Gospel of the Infancy and Childhood in Arabic, which had a wide circulation not only in the Churches in the East, but in Mohammedan circles. Passages from the Protevangelium stand in the lectionaries of the orthodox Church, for use at the festivals held in honour of Mary and of her reputed parents, Joachim and Anna.

In the Western Church the Apocryphal Gospels were regarded with more suspicion. Towards the close of the 4th cent. their authority was repudiated in the plainest terms by Jerome and Augustine, the former characterizing certain stories as ex deliramentis apocryphorum petita (Tappeln, Ausser-biblische Nachrichten, 15). On the other hand, their contemporaries, Zeno of Verona, and Prudentius, the greatest poet of early Christian times, drew from the Protevangelium in their works in praise of Mary. The combined influence of Jerome and Augustine, however, determined the ecclesiastical attitude to the Apocryphal Gospels, and the ban of the Church fell upon them under Damasus (382), Innocent I. (405), and Gelasius (496). In the long run this condemnation by ecclesiastical authority proved unavailing to check the popular appetite for the legends; and by various devices the legends which had incurred the censure of the Church, were brought back again into public circulation.

Harnack truly remarks that 'the history of apocryphal literature is a proof that the prohibition of apocryphal writings is perhaps the most strongly represented alongside of the canonical writings, in a form, as one would expect, that is always changing to suit the taste of the age. It was really apocryphal, that is to say, it had what may be termed a subterranean existence, but, suppressed and persecuted though it was, it survived to the surface, and at last the defenceless against it' (Gesch. d. altchr. Litt. I. ix. note 5).

Within a century after the Decretum Gelasii, Gregory of Tours in his book de Gloria Martyrum (i. ch. 4) had no scruples in using the extravagant legends of the 'Transitus Mariæ'; indeed, so little store was apparently set by ecclesiastical condemnation, that about 435, thirty years after the decree of Innocent I., a mosaic of the Annunciation in S. Maria Maggiore in Rome, prepared under the direction of Sixtus III., embodied apocryphal details. Apocryphal writings are used by pseudo-Chrysostom; and in the epic poem of the nun Hroswitha († 968), entitled Historia naturæ laudabilis conversationis intactæ Dei genitricis, the material is in part drawn from the later Gospels of the Childhood. From the 12th cent. onwards, the Apocryphal Gospels afforded an inexhaustible mine for poets and minstrels in Germany, France, and England; and numerous miracle-plays represented incidents drawn from the same source. A powerful impulse was given to the spread of these legends by the Dominican Vincent de Beauvais, who in his work entitled Speculum Majus, published about the middle of the 13th cent., and translated in the following century into many languages, transcribed large portions of the Protevangelium and the Gospel of Nicodemus, etc. The latter half of the 13th cent. also saw the appearance of a collection of legendary Lives of the Saints, the Speculum Sanctorum, better known as the Golden Legend, written by another member of the Dominican order, Jacobus de Voragine, Archbishop of Genoa. This work, in which many of the apocryphal legends find a place, had an immense influence upon the manuscript translations existing in English, German, French, Italian, and Spanish. With the invention of the printing-press this influence was largely extended, the Legenda Aurea and Vincent's Speculum being among the earliest books to be set up in type. From that time onwards the stories of the Apocryphal Gospels have had an influence on popular Christianity in Catholic countries far exceeding that of the Biblical narrative.

Roman Catholic writers have denied their claim to be in any sense a part of the history of the Church, and have regarded them as a dangerous and unauthoritative use; an unfavourable opinion was expressed upon them by the Papal Congregation of the Index in 1584, in connexion with the proposal to celebrate in the following year the nineteenth hundredth anniversary of the birth of Mary, but, all this notwithstanding, the apocryphal stories, likened by Harnack to twining plants which, when cut down spring up again from beneath and choke much that is healthy, have securely rooted themselves in the popular imagination, and have been the fruitful source of many superstitious beliefs. Even Tappeln, a Roman Catholic writer, who, in his scholarly treatise on The Apocryphal Gospels of the Childhood, etc., speaks with deep regret of the tendency to accept these writings as trustworthy historical sources, cannot resist the temptation to retain as much of their contents as has been taken up into ecclesiastical tradition. He accepts, for instance, as reliable the names of Mary's parents, the circumstance relating to her birth, her dedication to the Temple service, the marvellous story of her death, resurrection, and ascension, and declares that use of these apocryphal data may be made with an easy conscience for the purpose of religious edification (op cit 88)

The narratives of the Apocryphal Gospels have had an extraordinary influence on Christian art. Reference has already been made to the attraction which the legends had for poets from the earliest times, and especially since the date of the publication of the Legenda Aurea. (For details of the earlier poetry see von Lehner, Die Marienverehrung, 256 ff.) Sculpture and painting also owed many of their subjects to apocryphal sources, or were influenced in their treatment by apocryphal details. The history of Mary's reputed parents, her service in the Temple, her betrothal to Joseph, the Annunciation, the Birth of Jesus in a cave, the Flight into Egypt, the Assumption of Mary—these and other incidents described in the Apocryphal Gospels were favourite themes of painters and sculptors, especially during the Renaissance.

A marble tablet of the 4th or 5th cent in the crypt of St Maximin in Provence, represents Mary in the attitude of the Stans, with the words ANNA MARIA and ESTER on the left and IN on the right. The Virgin Mary, servant of the temple at Jerusalem (von Lehner, op cit 327). The events in the life of the Virgin, in the 15th c series, were depicted by different painters of the 15th c, one of the best known series being that by Taddeo Gaddi in the Baroncelli Chapel at Florence (Mrs Jameson, Legends of the Madonna, Introd iii). Mary's presentation at the Temple, and her marvellous ascent of the Temple steps (narrated in pseudo-Matthew, ch 4 and the Nativity, ch 6), supply a subject for ny, Venice), while her fine pictures, notably the Pinacoteca, Milan) in Christian art, in accordance with the narrative in the Protevangelium, Mary is represented either at the well with a pitcher of water or spinning wool for the veil of the temple (as in the mosaic, already referred to, in S. Maria Maggiore in Rome). Pictures of the Nativity betray the influence of the apocryphal stories; they show the mother and child and Joseph in a cave, where, according to the Protevangelium, Jesus was born, a dazzling light radiates from the face of the child, an ox and an ass (first mentioned in pseudo-Matthew) bow in adoration before Him—a frequent representation in early reliefs (von Lehner, op. cit. 314ff.)—or in pictures are introduced as mere picturesque details. An example of the Flight to Egypt, the bending down of a palm-tree to yield its fruit to Mary, affords a subject for many beautiful works (e.g. by Pinturicchio, William Blake). The Assumption of Mary was frequently represented in paintings from the 10th cent. onward (e.g. Titian's in the Academy, Venice, Botticelli's in the National Gallery), while the consumption of the Eucharist by the coronation as Queen of Heaven (among others by Raphael, Fra Angelico, and Taddeo Gaddi). The second part of the Evangelium of Nicodemus—The Descent into Hell—gives a subject to Fra Angelico (San Marco, Venice, 15th cent.), Dürer (in his series of woodcuts composing 'The Life of the Virgin')

The narratives in the Koran about Jesus are regarded as a forerunner of Mohammed, are drawn from apocryphal sources, either directly from the so-called Infancy, or indirectly from the popular tales which had an apocryphal origin. An account is given, for instance, of Mary's nativity,—in the Koran her parents are named Imran and Hanna,—of her dedication to the Temple, of the miraculous choice of Joseph to be her protector, etc. Jesus is represented as making of birds out of clay. The Koran represents that Jesus died upon the Cross. In Sura 4:156 the Jews are reported as saying: "We have killed the Messiah, Jesus, the Son of Mary, the Messenger of God", to which God is said to have replied: "Yet they did not kill him, nor did they crucify him; but he appeared to them . . . . In reality, God raised him to Himself, for God is strong and wise. Other legends about Jesus, not mentioned in the Koran, were collected by Moslem commentators, notably by Kessels. See art. CHRIST IN MOHAMMEDAN LITERATURE in Appendix to vol. II.

A. 1. Gospel according to the Hebrews.—The earliest mention of this Gospel occurs in the Προμηναια of Πνεύματι about the year 180 (Euseb. HE iv. 22. 8). The name 'according to the Hebrews' is not original; in the circles in which the Gospel was current, it apparently had no distinctive name, that which it now bears having been given to it by outsiders, to indicate that it was the Gospel in use among Hebrew Christians, the descendants of the original Church in Judæa. There is some probability in the view, which is strongly advocated by Harnack (Chron. i. 637 f.), that the Gospel was in use in the Jewish-Christian community in Alexandria, and that the title was given to it to distinguish it from the Gospel used by the native (Christian) community, the Gospel according to the Egyptians. The language in which the Gospel was written (as we learn from Jerome, contra Pelag. iii. 2) was West Aramaic, the language of Christ and His Apostles,—a circumstance which betrays its influence on the narrative in the fact that the Holy Spirit is represented as female ('My Mother the Holy Spirit,' the Aramaic ruha being feminine). The Gospel was translated into Latin and Greek by Jerome, who had a very high opinion of it, and was inclined to regard it as the original Matthew; but it is more than probable that it had already circulated in a Greek version in different parts of the Church, and found considerable recognition. It was wrongly identified by Jerome with the Ebionite Gospel, the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, also called the Gospel of the Twelve, which was written originally in Greek, and was in use among the Gnostic Ebionites.

As the fragments which have been preserved to us show the Gospel according to the Hebrews was of the Synoptic type. Whether it contained a story of the Nativity is uncertain, but (considering the Jewish-Christian standpoint of the book) it is highly improbable. Included, however, were the Baptism, the Temptation, the Lord's Prayer, the Healing of the man with the withered hand, the pericope adulteræ (or something similar), the injunction to forgive unto seventy times seven, the conversation with the Rich Young Ruler, the entrance into Jerusalem, the parable of the Pounds, the Trial, the denial of Peter, appearances after the Resurrection, and sayings of Jesus not elsewhere recorded. As a rule, the fragments show a somewhat closer resemblance to Mt than to the other Synoptics, but there are also details which have their nearer parallels in Luke.

The divergences from the Synoptics are in several cases remarkable in character, and apart, in the opinion of many scholars, to another, more reliable tradition. In the narrative of the Baptism, Jesus in answer to the proposal of His mother and brethren that they should go and be baptized by John for the remission of sins, says, "In what have I sinned, that I should go and be baptized by him?" Unless perhaps thus which I have said be ignorance,"—an utterance which is generally interpreted as meaning that Jesus, though conscious of no sin, was humble enough not to make the claim of sinlessness. (This passage, regarded by some as primitive and authentic, is better understood as the product of reflexion at a time when Christ's baptism was felt to be a problem requiring solution. In the earliest days the presence of the problem was not felt. The writer of the Gospel, who holds to the messianicity of Jesus, solves the difficulty by pointing to His deep sleep.

After the Baptism, the descent of the Spirit is described with greater fulness. The dove is awaiting, but the voice is in the form of an utterance by the Spirit: 'It came to pass that the Lord was come up out of the water, that the Holy Spirit came down and rested on Him and said unto Him, My Son, in all the prophets I awaited Thy coming, that I might rest on Thee. For Thou art my rest; Thou art my firstborn Son, who reignest for ever.'

A passage, which probably belongs to the narrative of the Temptation, reads: 'The Lord said, Just now My mother, the Holy Spirit, seized Me by one of My hairs and bore Me away to the high mountain ofabor,'—a fantastic description on the model of the Dragon.<sup>36</sup>

In the Lord's Prayer the fourth petition runs: 'Give us to-day our bread for to-morrow.' In the Aramaic mahar ('to-morrow') we may have the word used by Jesus Himself, in which case erioios, translated 'daily' in Mt 6:11, Lk 11:3, would be an adjectival form derived from erioia (the other hand, there are scholars who believe is the case, and that mahar give the meaning of erioios (Meyer in Henn. The former alternative is the more probable).

The narrative of the healing on the Sabbath of the man with a withered hand represents the man as appealing to Jesus on the ground that he was a mason who earned his bread by working with his hands,—a detail which may well be authentic.

In the longest fragment of the Gospel we have a version of Christ's interview with the Rich Young Ruler, which shows notable differences from the Synoptic account. Where the Synoptists speak of the rich man's sorrow because of his inability to accept Christ's terms, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, in vivid and homely terms, presents him as touching Jesus' feet: '(He) began did not please him.' Whereupon Jesus rebuked him for claiming to have fulfilled the law, when he had not: 'How and the law, Thou shalt love thyself, and behold, many of thy brethren, the are covered with filth and are dying with hunger, while thy house is full of many good things, and nothing at all goes out of it to them.' If this account is to be taken as genuine, it is clear that our estimate of the Rich Young Ruler's character, based on the Synoptic tradition, will have to be considerably revised. It is, however, in this passage we have a mistaken view of the Rich Young Ruler with by Luke.

James, to whom he had taken at the Last Supper that he would not eat bread from that hour, when he had drunk the Lord's cup, until He should see Him risen from those that are asleep.' This is an obviously later form of the tradition of Christ's appearing to James, due most likely to the desire of Jewish Christians to exalt their head above the Apostles of Christ. It should be noted that James is here portrayed as one of Christ's followers at Supper,—an unhistorical detail. There between James the Just and James the brother of John, an inference borne out by the reference to drinking the Lord's cup (cf. Mt 20:23).

Into the relation of the Gospel according to the Hebrews to the Synoptics, it is impossible in this article to enter with any fulness. That it is closely allied to them, especially to Mt, is clear from the character of the fragments. Three different solutions of the problem have been suggested, all of them supported by competent authorities. (1) Hebrews is held to be the original Aramaic Matthew (Hilgenfeld) or an elaboration of it (Zahn), and as such, the groundwork of our canonical Matthew. This view is now almost universally rejected. (2) Hebrews is held to be independent of the Synoptics, its affinity being explained by a common oral tradition. This view, which is the one at present most widely held, is strongly supported by Harnack, who goes so far as to express the hope (Chron. i. 645) that, after Zahn's penetrating discussion of the question no one will have the hardihood to repeat the statement that the Gospel according to the Hebrews is based on one or more canonical Gospels. That hope has not been realized. For (3) the view has recently been confidently advocated by Wernle (Synop. Frage, 248 ff.) that Hebrews is dependent on all the Synoptics, making use of Matthew, and in some cases combining the accounts of Matthew and Luke. Meyer (in Henn. 18) supports this view, and strongly emphasizes the secondary character of the Gospel. In this judgment the present writer is disposed to concur. It appears to him that all the facts of the case are satisfactorily explained, if we hold that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was written by one who used canonical Matthew (and Luke), and built up his Gospel on the basis of a separate tradition, under the influence of his own doctrinal.

But even should the view of the dependence be accepted, this does not necessarily imply that in it we are face to face with an earlier, or an equally early, stage of the primitive tradition. The realistic presentation, the fondness for little details, the quaint and, in some respects, undignified language, which are characteristic of the Gospel, may possibly be indications that in some narratives we have the tradition in its original form; on the other hand, these features may with as much probability be due to later manipulation by popular evangelists. Details, such as Christ's words before His baptism, which are by some regarded as primitive on the ground that they are of a character that they could not have been added later, are believed by others (in our opinion more justly), to be products of an age of reflexion. Traces of a later age than that of the Synoptics are found in the Resurrection fragment: there is the unhistorical detail in reference to Christ to James, and the later is shown in securing witness for the resurrection from the enemies of Christ. (After rising from the dead, Jesus handed the linen cloth to the servant of the high priest.) The judgment is warranted that, while the Gospel according to the Hebrews probably retains in some points the freshness of the original tradition, it contains many elements that are secondary, and that, as a whole, it represents not an earlier, but a somewhat later stage of the Gospel tradition than the Synoptics. A date at the end of the 1st cent is probable.

On the view here taken of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the value of its fragments as a source of the life of Jesus is inconsiderable. It cannot justly lay claim to be an authority, as Oscar Holtzmann regards it, on the same level as the Synoptics. Some sayings, however, ascribed to Christ and not elsewhere recorded, have a genuine ring, giving us, if not the ipsissima verba of Jesus, at least true echoes of His voice. Christ is represented as saying to His disciples: 'Never be glad, except when ye look upon your brother in love,'—a beautiful precept (condemning: Schadenfreude) disposition to rejoice in another's misfortune. The Gospel also reported a saying in which it was reckoned among the greatest offences that one should sadden the spirit of one's brother. Another striking saying, quoted from this Gospel by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 9 45) and accepted by many as substantially a genuine utterance of Jesus, runs as follows: 'He that wonders shall reach the kingdom, and having reached the kingdom shall rest.' In another passage (Strom. v. 14. 96) Clement records the saying in a longer form, which agrees almost verbally with one of the Oxyrhynchus sayings: 'He who seeks shall not cease until he finds; and when he finds, he shall be astonished and being astonished he shall reach the kingdom and having reached the kingdom he shall rest.'

The ethical teaching of the Gospel, from all that we can gather, was in sympathy with the mind of Christ, stress being laid on brotherly love and forgiveness. Doctrinally the Gospel occupies the position of the old Jewish Church. It exhibits Jesus as 'the Messiah sent from God, not as the Son of God conceived of the Holy Ghost in a special sense, but as the long expected Messiah of David's race, in whom prophecy finds its fulfilment' (Handmann, TU v. 3, p. 125).

A. 2. Gospel according to the Egyptians.—This Gospel, whose ancient date may be inferred from the fact that, like the Gospel according to the Hebrews, it bears no author's name, was current in native Christian circles in Egypt. Our information regarding it is very slight: it is mentioned by Origen in his discussion of the prologue in Luke's Gospel, and characterized by him, apparently on his own knowledge of it, as a heresy ('Ecclesia quattuor haereses plurima, e quibus quoque secundum Aegyptios'—tr. by Jerome). All that can with certainty be said to remain of the Gospel is a small group of sayings recorded by Clement of Alexandria in the attitude of different Christian communities to marriage. References to the Gospel are also found in Hippolytus (Philos. v. 7), who states that it was used by the sect of the Naassenes to support their peculiar views about the nature of the soul, and in Irenaeus (Her. 62. 2), who mentions its use by the Naassenes.

The fragments which remain are part of a conversation between Jesus and Salome, and are all of the same character, dealing with the transient (if not sinful) nature of the sex relations. They read as follows:

1 'Salome asked, "How long shall death reign?" The Lord answered, "So long as ye women give birth." When Salome had said, "Then should I have done well, if I had not given birth?" the Lord answered, "Eat every plant, but that which is bitter, eat not"' (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii 6 45).

2 'When Salome inquired when those things [the coming of the Kingdom] should be, the Lord said, "When ye trample on the garment of shame, and when the two become one, and the male with the female, neither male nor female"' (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii 13 92).

3 'The Saviour said, "I came to destroy the works of the female"' (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 9 68).

The Encratite tendency, recognized by the majority of scholars, is attested by Zahn, who, however, rejects No. 1 as a later addition to the Gospel according to the Egyptians. If the third saying be genuine, it is certainly ascetic. In the rest of the fragment, however, marriage nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels in heaven. This view finds some support in the fragment of a Gospel attributed to Oxyrhynchus in 1903 (Grenfell and Hunt, Pap. 44). That Cassian, the Gnostic leader of the Naassenes, in whom Clement quoted the sayings, used them in a sense of marriage, is not decisive. Cassian's interpretation, and understood the sayings in a mystical sense. If, however, the Encratite sense of the words be maintained, Harnack is certainly justified by Clement's attitude. 'Encratism cannot have been the aim of the Gospel according to the Egyptians, but that probably only this one passage occurred in it which could be adduced in favour of the extreme ascetic practice' (Chron. i. 166). That the Gospel concerned a sect that was entirely free from suspicion of heresy is probable and this natural inference becomes a certainty if we accept the widely held view that the Gospel according to the Egyptians was written by the so-called 'Gnostic' writer of the so-called 'Gnostic' Gospel, which is closely reminiscent of the Gospel according to the Hebrews. There are several, containing sayings of Jesus, of which some show verbal agreement with the Synoptics, while others, with considerable divergences, are similar in character. On the assumption, which is possible though incapable of proof, that 2nd Clement drew the sayings of Jesus recorded by him from one main source and this was the Gospel according to the Egyptians, Harnack based the conclusion that the Gospel was written in the 2nd century in the Roman Church about 170 or 180. This view is supported, and further, that it was an independent Gospel, not a later addition to Matthew and Luke.

* 'The Lord Himself having been asked by some one, When will the kingdom come? said, When the two shall be one, and the outside as the inside, and the male with the female, neither male nor female' (2 Clem. xii. 2).

and instances sayings in a form even more original (1 619 f). One must confess that so extremely favourable a judgment, reared on a somewhat uncertain basis, does not inspire entire confidence when over against it one places Origen's view of the heretical and its use by the Naassenes and the fact that it may be allowed that there were probably passages in the Gospel which ranked it with the Synoptics, it seems clear that it showed affinities with the speculative Gnostic schools. It contained references to the Gnosticism of the soul which were relied on by the Naassene sect in building up their system of thought, and Epiphanius in refuting the Sabellians, who made use of the Gospel according to the Egyptians, declared that 'there were in it many things such as His declaration to the disciples that the Holy Spirit were one and the same'.

With so little to rest a confident judgment on, it is extremely difficult to characterize it, but it may be near the truth to say that it was a Gospel of the Synoptic type with a slight Gnostic colouring.*

The disposition to refer to this Gospel isolated utterances of Jesus, such as the Oxyrhynchus Sayings, is extremely hazardous. All that can with certainty be said is that some of the recently discovered sayings 'belong to the same sphere of thought' as the Gospel. Further than that it is impossible to go (see Grenfell and Hunt, New Sayings, 27 ff.).

The date of the Gospel is about the middle of the 2nd cent., probably between 130 and 150.

A. 3. Gospel of Peter.—In his enumeration of Petrine writings, Eusebius mentions (HE iii. 3) a Gospel which, along with the Acts, Preaching and Apocalypse of Peter, he declares to be spurious, and not considered authoritative by any ecclesiastical writer. Until fourteen years ago, our knowledge of the contents of the Gospel was of the scantiest description, being based on a slight reference by Origen, on a letter by Serapion, bishop of Antioch (end of 2nd cent.), and on a passage in Theodoret, now generally discredited, which states that the Nazarenes, who honoured Christ as a just man, used the Gospel according to Peter (Her. Fab. ii. 2). Origen's reference (Com. in Matt. bk. x. 17) tells us nothing more than that those who believed the brethren of Jesus to be the sons of Joseph by a former wife relied on the Gospel of Peter and the Book of James; from which we infer that the Gospel contained the narrative of the Virgin-birth. From Serapion's letter (part of it preserved in Euseb. HE vi. 12), which was written to the Church in Rhossus in the diocese of Antioch, we gather the following facts about the Gospel. When on a visit to Rhossus, Serapion had the Gospel brought under his notice, as being the occasion of some disturbance in the Church. Not suspecting any heresy on the part of those who were attached to the Gospel, the bishop, without any careful examination of its contents, sought to establish peace by authorizing it to be read. Having learned afterwards that the Gospel had originated among the Docetae, he procured a copy from some members of that party, and found that, while it contained much true teaching, there were additions of a questionable character, to which he proceeded to call attention. Until recently this was all that was known of the Gospel of Peter; not a single fragment had been handed down; one could only gather that it was a * Von Dobschütz (Die urchr. Gemeinden, 190) finds in the Gospel a trace of the Gnostic idea of the subversion of all ordinary standards of value, from which 'it is only a short step to the perversion of all ethical conceptions'. This view is justly opposed by Zahn (NT Kan. ii. 640).

it to be an extract from a Patristic writing, a free quotation from Mark made by a preacher or by the writer of a book for edification. This would satisfactorily account for the omission of Mk 14<sup>28</sup> (Mt 26<sup>32</sup>). That the fragment probably belonged to a writing of this kind is further borne out by two striking deviations from the Synoptic phraseology. Instead of ἀλέκτωρ (cock) the text has the more classical ἀλεκτρυόν; instead of χρῶνις (colourless φανεῖν (crow) it has the more descriptive word κοκκύζειν. 'The probability is that the canonical expression is the original, which a preacher replaced in the one case by a more elegant word, in the other by one more significant' (Zahn, NT Krit. II. 788). Hennecke (NT Apokr. 9) thinks it possible that the fragment may have been a part of a collection of sayings, but subscribes to Klüger's judgment, that 'the possibility is not excluded that the fragment represents an extract from one of the Gospel harmonies, or even to a Gospel harmony, perhaps even to a homily, and that one is not justified in drawing far-reaching conclusions from it.'

A. 5. Oxyrhynchus Gospel Fragment.—In the year 1903 Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt discovered at Behnesa, the ancient Oxyrhynchus, in Central Egypt, a small portion of a Gospel containing the conclusion of a discourse by Jesus similar to a part of the Sermon on the Mount. This they published, along with a second collection of ‘Sayings,’ in the following year. The papyrus is in a very broken state, only a small part of that which it . . . . . ned being decipherable. From the . . . . . discoverers adjudge the . . . . . tten not later than A.D. . . . . the original composition was much

The translation of the fragment, from that given by Grenfell and Hunt (40), is as follows:

'Take no thou
 until morning,
 'row but spin not Having one garment, what do ye [lack?] Who could add to your stature? He Himself
 ' your garment His Irm, When ' manifest to us, and e Thee? He
 ' ye shall be stripped and not be ashamed . . . He
 ' of knowledge they had they entered not in themselves, and to them that were entering in they opened not; but ye, be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves.'

The sayings here given are, for the most part, parallel to passages found in Matthew and Luke, in a form generally somewhat shorter than the canonical version. Christ's answer to the question of the disciples as to when He should manifest Himself, 'When ye shall be stripped and not be ashamed . . .,' recalls the saying reported in the Gospel according to the Egyptians 'When ye trample upon: <sup>1</sup> <sup>2</sup> <sup>3</sup> <sup>4</sup> <sup>5</sup> <sup>6</sup> <sup>7</sup> <sup>8</sup> <sup>9</sup> <sup>10</sup> <sup>11</sup> <sup>12</sup> B HERETICAL AND GNOSTIC GOSPELS.—Only a few of the more important Gnostic Gospels are referred to in this article. Many are known to us by name merely, or by some indication of the circles in which they were current. Although the Gnostics repudiated the canonical Apostolic writings, they sought in many instances to secure authority for their Gospels by attributing them to Apostles or to others well known in Apostolic times. Besides those mentioned below, there were Gospels of Mattheus, of Bartholomew, of Andrew, of Barnabas; and even the name of Judas Iscariot was associated with the authorship of the Gospel. Gnostic Gospels sometimes bore the name of the founder of the school (Valentinus, Basilides, Cerinthus), but in these cases the writer of the Gospel claimed to have received his information from some Apostle or follower of an Apostle. OT names were also attached to some Gospels; Epiphanius (Hær. 26. 2) refers to a Gospel of Eve. For whatever knowledge we have of these Gospels, readers are referred to Hofmann's article (PRE<sup>3</sup> 1. 661 ff.) or to Tasker's article (l. c. 437 f.).

B. 1. Gospel of Marcion.—Shortly before the middle of the 2nd cent., Marcion, a native of Pontus, settled in Rome, where he devoted himself to the work of purifying the Church from all Jewish influences. The principle of his system was the concept of absolute separation between the God of the OT and the God of the NT. Only in Christ was the true God made known. He, accordingly, rejected the OT, and prepared for the Churches which he founded a canon of NT writings, divided into 'the Gospel' and 'the Apostles.' The original Apostles, he maintained, had misunderstood the teaching of Christ; only Paul had grasped the true significance of the gospel. Into his canon he admitted ten Epistles of Paul, largely expurgated and one Gospel, which he claimed to be the Pauline Gospel (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον μόνον, Ro 2<sup>16</sup>). This Gospel, according to the testimony of early Church writers, was the Gospel of Luke, from which great omissions had been made to free it from all Jewish colouring. All citations from the OT were cut out, and everything else which looked with favour on the Jews. From the quotation given by Tertullian (De praescriptis) and others it is possible to reconstruct Marcion's Gospel. The whole of the Incarnation and the Temptation were omitted, and the three chapters in Luke's Gospel but the chronological notice in 3:1. The history or Jesus commences with 4:1, and from that point to the end of the Gospel larger or smaller portions are excised, amounting in all to over 120 verses. Among the passages excluded are the parables of the Prodigal Son and of the wicked Husbandmen. In all, including the omissions of the first three chapters and part of the fourth, we find that Marcion's Gospel was shorter than Luke's by fully 300 verses.

Against all Patristic testimony some critics (Semler and Eichhorn in the 18th cent., Baur, Ritschl, and Schweigher in the 19th) maintained the priority of Marcion's Gospel to that of Luke. The traditional view was, however, so strongly indicated by Hilgenfeld and Volkmar, that it has been retracted. In our own country, somewhat later, the battle was refought, with the same result. The author of Supernatural Religion revived the theory of Marcion's originality, and called forth a reply by Dr Sanday (Gospels in the Second Century, ch. viii.), in which he conclusively proved, to the satisfaction of his opponent, that Luke's Gospel was from one hand, the same characteristics of style being evident in Marcion's Gospel and in the sections of Luke not found in it.

Where the text of Marcion differs from Luke, there is evidence in some cases to show that the variance is due, not to any arbitrary change made by Marcion in the interest of his peculiar views, but to the copy of the Third Gospel which lay before him. The readings of Marcion thus deserve consideration in the study of Textual Criticism.

B. 2. Gospel of the Twelve Apostles.—Among the heretical attempts to write the history of Jesus, Origen in his Homily on Lk 1st mentions 'the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles' (τὸ ἐπιγραφόμενον τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων). That this Gospel is the same as one which (Hær. 30. 3) describes as 'The Gospel of Matthew' in use among the Gnostic sect, is clear from the fact that in the opening passage quoted by Epiphanius we have the call of the twelve Apostles, of whom Matthew is specially addressed ('and thee, Matthew, I called, while thou wast sitting at the seat of custom'). Epiphanius further states that the Ebionites called their Gospel 'The Gospel according to the Hebrews,' a reference which may rest on a confusion on the part of Epiphanius (as Harnack thinks), but more probably is quite accurate. Nothing seems more likely than that the Gnostic Jewish-Christian sect, acquainted with the tradition that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, should have claimed that their Gospel was the genuine Gospel of Matthew, and, accordingly, the true Hebrew Gospel (Hennecke, NT Apokr. 24). If this be so, we have an explanation of the error into which Jerome fell when he identified the Gospel according to the Hebrews with the Gospel 'according to the Apostles' in use among the Nazarenes (c. Pelag. iii. 2). That these two Gospels were entirely different is apparent from the widely divergent accounts of the Baptism,—the one incident, common to both, described in their extant fragments.

All that remains of the Gospel of the Ebionites is found in Epiphanius (Hær. 30. 13, 14, 16, 22). The Gospel opens with the ministry of the Baptist: 'It came to pass in the days of Herod, the king of Judaea, that John came baptizing in the Jordan, and in the Jordan of repentance in the river Jordan. . . . After the manner of the Fourth Gospel, the story is introduced in the midst of the narrative of the baptism of Jesus: 'There was a certain man named Jesus, and He came and was baptized of John, who chose us.' An account of the calling of the twelve follows, special emphasis being laid on the call of Matthew. Then the broken thread of the narrative is again taken up: 'And John was baptizing, and Pharisees came out to him and were baptized, and all Jerusalem. . . . His food was wild honey, the taste of which was the taste of manna, like a honey-cake in oil.' In the narrative of Christ's baptism which follows, three verses come from the first, 'Thou art My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased,' being repeated for the benefit of the Baptist: 'I have this day begotten Thee'; the second is addressed to Christ, 'I have this day begotten Thee'. Another fragment describes the incident recorded in Mt 12:47-50 in words which vary only very slightly from the canonical version. Characteristic of the teaching of the Gospel are the two remaining fragments: 'I am come', 'I have borne a son, who is kept below until she is able to recover her own children and to educate them for herself'.

The tendency of the Gospel is characteristically Ebionitic. All that is reported of Jesus is in harmony with the views of the Gnostic Ebionites (Elkesaites), who combined the old Jewish-Christian belief in Jesus as a mere man, anointed to be Messiah through the descent of the Spirit at baptism, with the doctrine of a heavenly Christ, 'who wanders over the common earth among men, like a strange guest from heaven, in order that He may lead into His eternal kingdom all that is spiritual and pure in this impure material world' (Hennecke, 25). The matter-of-fact way in which Jesus is introduced in the Gospel ('there was a certain man named Jesus') points to the view that of Himself Jesus was nothing to the members of this sect, but only became significant as the object of faith through the descent of the heavenly Christ. The ascetic (vegetarian) views of the Ebionites and their hatred of sacrifices of blood are manifest in the fragments. In accordance with his vegetarian sympathies, the author removes locusts (ἀκρίδας) from the Baptist's diet, and by way of compensation states that the honey which he ate tasted like honey-cake (ἐγκρίς) in oil. The play on the words ἀκρίς and ἐγκρίς shows that our Greek Gospels, and not a Hebrew original, lay before the writer.

The author in the composition of his work made use of the canonical Gospels in a free and clumsy manner. The narrative of the Baptism, in particular, is extremely awkward and badly told. No scruples deterred the writer from changing the words of Christ to the directly opposite sense by the simple insertion of a negative ('I have in no wise desired to eat this passover-flesh with you'; cf. Lk 22<sup>15</sup>).

The date of the Gospel is late in the 2nd cent.; Zahn puts it at 170; Harnack not earlier than 180, and perhaps as late as the beginning of the 3rd cent.

B. 3. Gospel of Thomas.—A single citation from a Gnostic Gospel of Thomas is found in Hippolytus (Philos. v. 7), who states: 'It is in a writing in use among the Naassenes: "He who seeks me shall find me in children from seven years old; for there concealed in the fourteenth æon I shall be made manifest." Origen (Hom. in Luc. i. 1) speaks of a Gospel of Thomas; and a Gospel bearing that name is mentioned by Eusebius (HE iii. 25. 6) among the 'spurious and noxious Gospels,' and as 'a Gospel according to Thomas written by the Manichæans, and in another passage (Cat. vi. 31) he warns all against reading it, as it is written not by an Apostle, but by "one of the three evil disciples of Manes." The Decretum Gelasii condemns a Gospel of Thomas which was used by the Manichæans. In what relation (if any) the Manichæan Gospel stood to the Gnostic Gospel, referred to by Hippolytus, is indiscoverable, as no other of the former is known. That the Gospel of Thomas bears some relation to the Childhood Gospel of Thomas is practically certain from what we know of the latter, and from the character of the passage cited by Hippolytus. There are indications in the Childhood Gospel which point to a Gnostic origin; and this being the case, if the two Gospels were entirely independent, it would be nothing less than marvellous that, while the one is composed of narratives of Christ's childhood, the only fragment preserved of the other should contain a cryptic utterance of Christ about children (See below, C. (a) 2, where also literature will be found).

B. 4. Gospel of Philip.—A solitary fragment of this Gospel is preserved in Epiphanius (Hær. 26. 13), who states: 'The Gnostics cite a Gospel, forged in the name of Philip the holy Apostle, as saying:

'The Lord revealed to me what the soul must say in ascending to heaven, and how she must answer each of the upper powers. "I have known myself and gathered myself from all quarters, and I have borne no children to the Aichon [the ruler of this world], but I have rooted up his roots and the members of his members, and I know who thou art. For I was one of the seven who are from above." And so she is released. But if one be found who has borne a son, she is kept below until she is able to recover her own children and to educate them for herself.'

The Coptic Gnostic writing, the Pistis Sophia, bears witness to the existence in the 3rd cent. of the Gospel of Philip in Gnostic circles in Egypt. It is there stated: 'And when Jesus had made an end of speaking these words, Philip leaped up and stood, and laid down the book which was in his hand, for he it is who writes all things which Jesus said and did' (Harnack, Gesch. d. altchr. Litt.

i. 14). It is clear from this notice, as well as from the passage quoted by Epiphanius, that the contents of the Gospel of Philip were not of the same character as those of the canonical Gospels, but were of an esoteric nature, revelations of hidden truth purporting to have been communicated by the Risen Lord. The extreme Encratite views of the Gnostic writer are apparent; the assertion of the soul that on earth it has abstained from marriage, is the only way into heaven.

The Gospel of Philip is addressed to the large class of Gnostic writings well described as Gospel-Apocrypha, which owed their origin to the misapprehension which the Gnostics entertained regarding the person of Christ. The true Saviour was not the earthly Jesus, but the heavenly Christ who sojourned in Him, and who was fully liberated for the work of salvation by the Resurrection. Salvation consisted in freeing the souls of men from the dominion of the God of this world, by the communication of the heavenly knowledge (Gnosis); and this knowledge was revealed by Christ as a mystery to His Apostles, partly in parables, and partly hid from the common people. The Gospel of Philip is a tradition given after the Resurrection. For the Gnosis was reserved for the small number of πνευματικοί, whose spirit was derived from the upper world, and who, when purified from their connexion with the earth, returned into the kingdom of light. These views are clearly reflected in the fragment of the Gospel of Philip.

The date of the Gospel is towards the end of the 2nd century.

C. (a) 1. Protevangelium of James.—This writing, dealing with the history of Mary and the birth of Jesus, was first published in the West in a Latin translation by the French humanist Postellus about the middle of the 16th century. Some years later the Greek text was issued by Michael Neander. The title 'Protevangelium' (Earliest Gospel) occurs for the first time, so far as we know, in the edition of Postellus; the writing itself claims to be, not a Gospel, but a history. ('The History of James concerning the birth of the All-Holy Mother of God,' or something similar, is the title in the MSS. See Tischendorf's Evang. Apocr. 1). It is not improbable that the name 'Protevangelium' was given by Postellus himself, who had an extremely high opinion of the book. In earlier times it is never referred to as a Gospel, save in the lists of heretical writings condemned by ecclesiastical authority in the 4th and 5th cents.: 'cetera autem (evangelia), quæ vel sub nomine Matthiæ sive Jacobi minoris . . . non solum repudianda, verum etiam novis esse damanda' (Decree of Innocent I., A.D. 405). The person referred to as the author ('I, James, wrote this history') was in early times generally believed to be the Lord's brother, living in the Church at Jerusalem. The true author is unknown.

The earliest certain reference to the Protevangeli-um occurs in Origen (middle of 3rd cent.), who states that many, on the authority of the 'Book of James' (and the Gospel of Peter), believed the brothers of Jesus to have been the sons of Joseph by a former marriage. Allusions to details mentioned in the Gospel are found (c. 200) in Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii. 16. 93), and (c. 140) in Justin Martyr (Dial. 78; 100, Apol. 33); these, however, do not necessarily point to dependence on the Protevangeli-um, but may have been, and in Justin's case probably were, drawn from floating tradition. Zahn dates the writing in the early decades of the 2nd cent.; but most scholars place it later, in the second half of the century.

In its present form the Proteangelum narrates the childhood of Joachim and Anna, the shame and reproach that fell upon them for that account, and the birth of Mary in answer to their prayer (chs 1-5). When Mary is three years old, she is taken to the temple, where she lives until her fifteenth year, being fed by the hand of an angel (chs 6-8). The priests then consult as to what they should do (chs 9-10). The priests are instructed by an angel, in answer to prayer, to summon the widowers of the people, each with a rod in his hand, that God may give a sign whose wife she should be (ch. 8). Joseph attends in obedience to the summons, and is marked out for the charge of 'the virgin of the Lord' by a dove coming out of his rod and alighting on his head. Joseph would fain refuse, because he has children and is an old man; but, being solemnly charged by the priest, he takes Mary to his house and immediately leaves home on business (ch. 9). Thereafter, the priests, desirous of having a veil made for the temple, summon 'the undefiled virgins of the family of David, and among them Mary, who is chosen by lot to spin the true purple and the scarlet. With these she returns home (ch. 10). While drawing water at the well, she hears a voice pronouncing her blessed. When she is brought to the temple, she is seen by the priests and the people of the Lord (ch. 11). Thirty years after the birth of Mary to Elisabeth, at the close of which it is stated that 'she was sixteen years old when these mysteries happened' (ch. 12). Joseph now returns from his work of building, and, on seeing her state, reproaches her (ch. 13). An angel of the Lord appears to him and informs him of the mystery (ch. 14). Joseph is accused of defiling the virgin of the Lord; and when both he and Mary proclaim their innocence, they are compelled to drink the water of ordeal, and are unhurt (chs 15-16). When the imperial decree of enrolment is issued, Joseph is taken to Bethlehem with Mary. On the way, near to Bethlehem, three days are fulfilled; Joseph leads her into a cave, where he has two sons, the first of whom is named after his father (ch. 17). [At this point the narrative changes suddenly from the third person to the first. 'And I, Joseph, was with her, and was not walking'.] Joseph is then shown a vision of the birds and sheep that were to be sacrificed, a sign that Mary has been put upon the altar (chs 18-19). A word is then spoken, who enters the cave, which is the light of the world, the light gradually decreases, and the infant is seen who takes the breast from the mother. A voice then is heard, and an angel appears, and is incredulous to see the state of the child; she seeks a proof, and her hand burns as with fire, but is restored when she touches the infant (chs. 19-20). [The impersonal narrative is now resumed]. The visit of the Magi is next described in language very similar to that in Matthew (ch. 21). Herod, learning that he has been mocked by the Magi, orders the massacre of children under two years. Mary hides her child in an ox-stall (ch. 22). The rest of the narrative deals with John the Baptist and Zacharias. Zacharias, because he will not reveal where his son is concealed, is murdered in the temple. His body miraculously disappears, but his blood is found turned into stone (chs. 22-24). The narrative ends with a thanksgiving of James for having received the gift and wisdom to write the history (ch. 25).

There is a general agreement that the Protevangelium as a whole is a late work. The group of scholars who regard the Protevangelium as an apocryphal writing, of which it is known to have existed; and it seems highly probable that part of this was awkwardly appended to the original Book of James. This happened, there is ground for believing, in the 5th century. That it did not form a part of the original writing finds some support in the fact that Origen, who refers to the Protevangelium, gives a different account of the death of Zacharias. There is considerable evidence of opinion as to whether the rest of the book is the work of one author. The abrupt introduction of Joseph, speaking in the first person (ch. 18-20) is a convincing evidence that that section is not from the hand of the writer of the rest of the book. Harnack believes that the original Book of James did not contain this narrative by Joseph; but if so, it was a singularly aimless piece of writing, stopping short of the consummation which gives it the only early history of Mary significance, and to which that history manifestly looks, namely, her giving birth to Jesus in virginity. We conclude that the Apocryphum Josephi (as Harnack calls it) was incorporated in his work by the author himself, and that not unskillfully, reference being found in it to details which had been already related. In the section dealing with Mary's connexion with the Temple, there are also signs of different sources. It is noticeable that, when Mary leaves the Temple under the care of Joseph, she is represented as being twelve years old, on the other hand, it is said that at the time of her pregnancy she was sixteen years old, although it is clear, from the main scheme of the narrative, that the conception took place soon after her departure from the Temple, during Joseph's absence from home on business. It is more than probable that we have a combination of two accounts telling of Mary's association with the Temple, one narrating her residence there until she was twelve years of age, the other representing her as being brought, when she was sixteen, to span material for the temple veil, because she was of the family of David. There is no reason, however, for supposing that these different traditions were combined by any one else than the author of the history.

With the exception of the Zacharias group of incidents, the Protevangelium is a well-designed unity, a skilfully constructed romance, in which the author, with the help of material lying ready to his hand, achieved to his own satisfaction on the definite purpose which he had in view. What this purpose was it is not difficult to divine. It was to defend the orthodox conception of Christ's person against a double attack, and to give an answer to those who taunted Christians with the lowly if not shameful birth of Jesus. Accordingly Mary was represented as of royal descent, the daughter of a wealthy man, brought up in the pure atmosphere of the Temple; that was a sufficient answer to every calumny about her character, and to every sneer about her humble rank. Against the Gnostic view that Jesus, in being born of Mary, did not partake of her human nature, it was enough to mention that the infant took the breast from His mother. The whole strength of the author was, however, devoted to safeguarding the Divinity of Jesus against Jewish-Christian misconceptions. That end, he conceived, could be best attained by exalting the person of Mary, by revealing her as one who, from birth to womanhood, had retained an absolute purity and virginity. She was born, in answer to prayer, to parents who had long been childless; she was brought up in the Temple, and fed on heavenly food; in virginity she conceived by the power of the Lord; in virginity she gave birth; in virginity she remained to the end. At every stage her virginity is raised above suspicion; the drinking of the water of the ordeal guarded her virginity in childhood; the witness of Salome established it in infancy; while the statement, given under the authority of James, that the brethren of Jesus were sons of Joseph by a former wife, was sufficient to remove any doubts of her virginity to the last.

The author of the Protevangelium, it is clear, was no Jewish Christian. His ignorance of Jewish usages is notably betrayed in the representation of Mary as a temple-virgin (an unheard of thing among the Jews), and in the water of the ordeal being administered to Joseph (see Nu 5). The Hebraistic colouring is due to the sources which the writer used. In certain of the incidents he is influenced by OT narratives (birth and dedication of Samuel, Aaron's rod, etc.), which he doubtless read in the Greek version. The canonical accounts of the Annunciation and Nativity have been largely drawn upon. Conrady's views, that the Protevangelium was the source of Matthew and Luke (Die Quelle d. kan. Kindheitsgeschichten), and that it was originally written in Hebrew (SK, 1889, p. 728 ff.), have received no support. The former view Hennecke characterizes as 'kritische Geschmacklosigkeit.'

The Protevangelium was condemned by the Western Church in the decrees of Damasus (382), Innocent I. (405), and Gelasius (496). Popular Christianity, however, demanded something in the place of that which had been forbidden, and letters were forged, one to Jerome from the bishops Chromatius of Aquileia and Heliodorus of Altinum, the other the answer of Jerome, from which it appeared that the learned Father had acceded to the bishops' request to translate into Latin the original Hebrew Matthew. This explains the appearance of The Gospel of pseudo-Matthew, which freely worked over the contents of the Protevangelium, gave an account of the Flight to Egypt and the miracles wrought on the way, and added narratives drawn from the Childhood Gospel of Thomas. A detail, which is frequently represented in Christian art,—the ox and the ass at the manger,—appears for the first time in this Gospel. The veneration of Mary, which received an impulse in the Protevangelium, has now grown to greater proportions: she is glorified as 'Queen of the Virgins,' and her holy, nun-like life is dwelt upon at considerable length. The date of ps.-Matt is 6th century.

The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, also connected with Jerome by another forged letter, covers the same ground as the Protevangelium (with the exception of the Zacharias legend). The aim of the book is to exalt Mary as the spotless virgin; after her betrothal to Joseph she does not go home with him, but returns to her parents' house. There she receives the angel's message. The Gospel closes with the bare mention of the birth of Jesus. This new recension of the P. was doubtless due to an orthodox feeling against the somewhat coarse and extravagant nature of pseudo-Matthew. The date is probably late in the 6th century.

C. (a) 2. Childhood Gospel of Thomas.—This Gospel, which deals with the marvellous events of Christ's childhood, was widely read in early times in all branches of the Christian Church. In its present form it does not claim to be a Gospel; it is generally referred to as Παιδικὰ τοῦ Κυρίου—Incidents in the Lord's Childhood. There is everything, however, in favour of the view that the original form of the writing was a Gospel in use in Gnostic circles, referred to by Origen and Hippolytus (see B. 3). Besides the relation between the two writings is supported by a statement in Irenæus (i 20. 1) that the followers of the Gnostic Marcus had in their apocryphal books a story of Jesus as a boy putting His schoolmaster to confusion. This incident is found described twice over in the Childhood Gospel of Thomas. If the Gospel of Thomas, mentioned by Nicephorus in his Stichometry (date uncertain, 6th–8th cent.) as containing 1300 stichoi, had any relation with that known to us, the copy which lay before him was more than twice as long as the longest now extant.

The external evidence, then, converges on the view that our present Gospel was a compilation of stories drawn from a longer Gospel, which originated in Gnostic circles, the parts which were undisguisedly Gnostic in tone being omitted. This conclusion is confirmed by the character of the Gospel itself. A few Gnostic traces still remain, notably in the mysterious symbolism of the letters of the alphabet. The extraordinary miracles attributed to the child Christ, and His astonishing knowledge, were no doubt interpreted by Gnostics in a way to lend support to their own views. For them 'the worth of these miracles lay in the proof, which could be drawn from them, that Christ did not belong to this world, that even as a child He was raised beyond human development and limitation, so that as a child He could teach every human teacher' (Meyer in Henn. 64). The fragment in Hippolytus (quoted in B. 3) may have been a Gnostic utterance of the child Christ.

The figure of Jesus in this Gospel is a melancholy and hateful caricature of the grace, simplicity, and obedience of the Holy Childhood. The miracles which the child Christ is described as working are, for the most part, deeds of magic, or marvels without any ethical meaning. To the latter class belong His making birds of clay and causing them to fly, His carrying water from the well in His cloak after breaking through to the former. His passionate and unflinching courage ran against him, and was rewarded by the cursing of His teacher, who fell down in a swoon. The miracle wrought made by His petulant and vengeful spirit is to be believed by an occasional miracle of healing. His bearing and conduct are those of a spoilt and impudent child, in two instances He takes Joseph to task for venturing to correct Him. A style exact will enable the reader to form some idea of the youthful Gnostic at school. A teacher, Zaccheus by name, approaches Joseph, offering to teach Jesus letters, and how to greet His elders respectfully, and how to love those of His own age—much needed lessons! This is how Jesus profits by His attendance at school. 'He looked upon His teacher Zaccheus, and said to him, Thou, who knowest not the nature of the A, how canst thou teach others the B? Thou hypocrite! first teach the A if thou canst, and then we shall believe thee about the B. Then He began to teach about the first letter, and he was . . . . . Hum. In the hearing of many the child says to Zaccheus, Hear, O teacher, the disposition of the first letter, and observe how it has straight lines and a middle stroke which crosses those which thou seest to belong to one another, (lines) which go together, raise themselves, wind round in a dance, move themselves, and go round again, which are composed of three signs, are of similar nature, or of the same weight, or of the same size. Thou hast the lines of the A.' How vast is the gulf separating this absurd and pretentious display from the simple story of Christ among the doctors in the Temple! Here a forward and unbearably conceited boy, who is ready to teach his elders, there a child with the fresh wonder of life's greatness in his heart, eager to learn, ready to obey.

Many of the stories here narrated of Christ have their origin in folk lore and mythology. Similar stories are told of Krishna and Buddha. But in all countries the popular imagination has borne unconscious witness to man's greatness by the tales of wonder-children. Legends of this nature were handed on by the Gnostics, and used in the interest of their peculiar speculations about Christ. 'The wonder-child becomes a Gnostic, who looks down on the unspiritual world, and, in particular, heartily despises the religion of the Jews' (Meyer in Henn. 65). Apart from the speculations with which they were burdened, these stories took hold of the popular imagination in orthodox circles. The craving for the marvellous proved stronger than the sense of what was fitting in Jesus, and the silence of Christ's childhood, which had been regarded as an evidence of His true humanity, became thronged with silly and repulsive events which were believed to be

In its present form the Childhood Gospel of Thomas cannot be older than the 3rd century. The Gospel exists in several recensions, which vary considerably in length.

C. (α) 3. Arabic Gospel of the Childhood.—This is a late composition, in which are worked up the materials of the earlier Childhood Gospels. The compiler has also added many legends of a wildly fantastic and highly miraculous nature. One or two examples may suffice to show the character of the greater portion of the book. The Magi receive from the Lady Mary, as a souvenir of their visit to Bethlehem, one of the swaddling bands in which the infant Jesus was wrapped. On their return home they show their trophy to the assembled kings and princes. A feast is held, and a fire is lighted, which the company worships. The swaddling band is thrown into the fire, and, when the fire had burned itself out, it is found unharmed. Whereupon the cloth is laid up with great honour in the treasure house. Again, the water in which the infant Jesus is washed has a marvellous virtue, and children whose bodies are white with leprosy are cleansed by bathing in it. A young man who by witchcraft had been changed into a mule, is restored to human form by Mary's placing Jesus on the mule's back.

This Gospel was the main source of the knowledge of Jesus among the Mohammedans. For their edification, Kesseus incorporated its stories, with much embellishment, in his history of patriarchs and prophets.

C. (a) 4. History of Joseph the Carpenter.—In Egypt, where feast-days were multiplied to celebrate events or to commemorate persons held in high esteem by the Church, the History of Joseph was written for the purpose or being read on 20th July, the alleged day of Joseph's death. The narrative is placed in the mouth of Jesus, who discourses to His disciples on the Mount of Olives. After an introductory address, which has passages reminiscent of the Psalm, the Gospels, and St. Paul's Epistles, the life of Joseph is shortly described, in which evident use is made of the P. oterangelium or one of its sources (Apocryphum Josephi). The circumstances attending the death of Joseph are described at great length. We are told of his dread of death; we listen to a bitter lament for his sins (among them his venturing to correct Jesus as a child), and to a prayer to be delivered from the demons of darkness who lie in wait for his soul. When Death approaches with his dread retinue, Jesus drives them back. In answer to His prayer, Michael and Gabriel carry off the spirit of Joseph to 'the . . . place of the pious.' Thereafter Christ . . . mourners, and Himself bewail the death of Joseph. It is plain, from this survey of the contents of the book, that its purpose was less to give the history of Joseph than 'to recommend Christianity as the deliverer in the extremity of death, and to teach the true Christian art of dying' (Meyer in Henn. Handb. 103).

The history, in all probability was written in Coptic Recensions of it in the Bohairic and Sahidic dialects exist, the latter fragmentary (Forbes Robinson, Coptic Apocryphal Gospels, 130 ff.). There is also an Arabic text, first printed in 1722.

Tischendorf puts the date of the history in the 4th century.

LITERATURE.—Tischendorf, Meyer, Forbes Robinson (opp. citt.).

C. (α) 5. The Departure of Mary.—The growing veneration of Mary in the Church led to the invention of incidents in her life parallel to those in the life of Christ. This was the motive that gave rise to the Departure of Mary (Transitus Mariæ), otherwise known as the adormitus (the Falling Asleep), Dormitio, Assumptio. As Christ had risen from the dead and ascended into heaven, so must Mary have risen and ascended. The story runs as follows:

One day, when Mary, according to her custom, had gone to 'the holy tomb of our Lord' to burn incense and pray, the Archangel Gabriel appears in approaching darkness and tells her that, in answer to her request, she shall 'go to a better place to her Son, into the true and everlasting life.' To return home she prays, and all the Apostles—those who are alive, dead and those still alive—are gathered to her bedside at Bethlehem. The Apostles marvel how they were engaged when the Saviour came to them. The heavens are filled with hosts of angels; miracles of healing happen, and the sick crowd to the house. The Jews endeavour to seize Mary; but the Apostles, carrying the couch on which 'the Lady, the mother of God,' lay, are borne on a cloud to Jerusalem. Here Christ appears to her, and in answer to her request declares: 'Rejoice and be glad, for all grace is given to thee by My Father in heaven, and by Me, and by the Holy Ghost; whoever calls on thy name shall not be put to shame, but shall find comfort and support both in this world and in that which is to come, in the presence of My heavenly Father.' Then, while the Apostles sing a hymn, Mary falls asleep. She is laid in a tomb in Gethsemane, for three days an angel-choir is heard glorifying God, and when they are silent all know that 'her spotless and precious body has been transferred to Paradise.'

In this story, which has had a remarkable influence in the Roman Catholic Church, we have the clear signs of an advanced stage of the worship of the Virgin. Prayer to her is here enjoined; and the tendency disclosed, to find parallels between her life and the life of Christ, marks a definite stage of the movement which eventually made her a sharer in the work of redemption. The epithet θεοτόκος (mother of God), which was first applied to Mary by Cyril of Jerusalem (beginning of 4th cent.), and played so large a part in the Nestorian controversy (from A. D. 428), occurs in this writing.

The Transitus was written at the close of the 4th cent. In the Gelasian Decree (496) it was included among those apocryphal writings which are 'non solum repudiata, verum etiam ab omni Romana catholica et apostolica ecclesia eliminata atque cum suis auctoribus auctorumque sequacibus sub anathematis indissolubili vinculo in æternum damnata.' In spite of this the writing maintained its place, and by the 6th cent. it was held in the highest honour. It was in later days ascribed to Melito of Sardis (c. 170), and even to the Apostle John. Versions of it, in longer and shorter forms, are extant in Greek, Latin, Arabic, Coptic, and Syriac.

C. (b) 1. The Gospel of Nicodemus. This Gospel dealing with the Trial, Death, and Resurrection of Jesus, and with His Descent into Hades, is a combination of two parts: (1) Acta Pilati, and (2) Descensus. The older Greek MSS contain only (1) with an independent conclusion, while there are clear signs that the compiler had not thoroughly mastered all his material. The earliest form is found in a Latin version, probably of the 5th or 6th cent.; but it was not until the 13th cent. that the name of Nicodemus was associated with it. The writing claimed to have been written in Hebrew by Nicodemus, and to have been translated into Greek by Ananias or Æneas Protector.

The contents of the Gospel are as follows:

(1) Jesus is accused by the Jews. Pilate orders Jesus to be brought before him. The messenger, by Pilate's instructions, shows Jesus great respect. As Jesus enters the palace, the tops of the Roman standards bow down before him. The charge that Jesus was 'born of formation' is disproved. (1-2) Pilate's wife sends him a message based on John 8:12, and Jesus replies that he is the light of the world. (3-4) Jesus is crucified, and some who had been his enemies are converted and speak on His behalf (chs. 5-8). The Jews choose Barabbas instead of Jesus, and are reproached for their ingratitude by Pilate. Pilate washes his hands, and Jesus is crucified (ch. 9). The body is buried, and burial, based on Lk 23 (chs. 10-11). The body of Jesus is put into prison by the Jews for burying Jesus. Jesus miraculously delivered (ch. 12). The guards at the sepulchre report the resurrection to the Sanhedrin, and are bribed to say that the disciples stole the body (ch. 13). A priest, a scribe, a Levite from Galilee bear witness to Christ's ascension; they are charged to keep silent, and are sent back to Galilee (ch. 14). On the proposal of Nicodemus, search is made for Jesus, but none is found. Jesus is more given of His ascension (chs. 15, 16).

(2) This purports to have been written down by Carinus and Leucius, sons of the aged Simeon, who had been raised from the dead by Jesus (ch. 17). 'A purple royal light' appears in Hades, John the Baptist announces the near approach of Christ to visit those 'sitting in darkness and the shadow of death' (ch. 18). Seth tells of his prayer for oil from the tree of mercy to heal his father and of his father's promise that he should receive it when the Son of God came to earth (ch. 19). A conversation takes place between Satan and Tartarus, who dread Christ's coming (ch. 20). The summons is made (Ps 24) in a voice of thunder to Satan and Tartarus, who are powerless to resist (ch. 21). Satan is delivered into the power of Hades, who reviles him vehemently, and consigns him to everlasting torment (chs. 22-23). All the saints are gathered to Christ, and with them He comes up 'from the powers below' (ch. 24). The archangel Michael leads all the saints to Paradise, where they converse with Enoch and Elias and the penitent thief (chs. 25, 26). Having finished their writing Carinus and Leucius are transfigured and vanish. Joseph and Nicodemus report everything to Pilate, who draws up an account of 'all that had been done and said concerning Jesus by the Jews' and places it in the public records of his praetorium (ch. 27). (In some MSS two other chapters are added, ch. 28 in which a Jewish chronology from Adam to Christ, with Annas and Caiaphas acknowledge, in Pilate's presence, to be a proof that Jesus was the long-promised Saviour, ch. 29 gives a letter from Pilate to Claudius, dealing with the 'cruel condemnation,' crucifixion, and resurrection of Christ).

The first part of the Gospel of Nicodemus—the Acts of Pilate—exists in various recensions, the earliest of which cannot be much older than the beginning of the 5th century. The question, however, is raised by references in Justin and Tertullian, whether these Acts are not based on much older documents. In his first Apology (ch. 35) Justin, after describing the crucifixion of Jesus, declares 'And that these things happened, one may learn from the Acts drawn up under Pontius Pilate'; and again (ch. 48), when speaking of miracles which Jesus wrought, he adds a like testimony. Moreover, Tertullian in two passages (Apol. 5 and 21) speaks of a report sent to Tiberius by Pilate of the account of Christ's life and a report of His death, resurrection, and ascension, he states 'Pilate, who in his heart was already a Christian, reported all these things about Christ to Tiberius, who was emperor at that time.' Many scholars believe that the report referred to by Tertullian is preserved in the Letter of Pilate to Claudius (ch. 29 of the Gospel of Nicodemus). On the other hand, Harnack holds the Letter to be later than Tertullian (Chron. i. 607 ff.). On the ground of Justin's references, Tischendorf (Apoc. lxiv), followed by Hofmann, dates our extant Acts of Pilate in the 2nd century. Lipsius (Die Pilatusakten, 14 ff.), however, Harnack (Chron. i. 610 ff.), and others believe that the Acts of Pilate, and while von Schubert, followed by Stulcken (Henn. Handb. 146 f.), maintains that Justin was acquainted with Acts of Pilate which probably formed the basis of the present Acts. The question is an intricate one, and cannot be fully discussed here. Tischendorf's conclusion may, however, safely be set aside. Harnack bases his judgment mainly on the ground that, if Justin had had any real knowledge of Acts of Pilate dealing with the facts which he narrates, he would have quoted from them, while, as a matter of fact, his quotations are from the Prophets and the Gospels. Nevertheless, this it must, however, be urged that, if Justin had not had some definite knowledge to go upon, he would never have dared in an address to the Emperor to ground his case on documents which presumably were in the public archives. The present writing inclines to the view that Acts of Pilate, at least believed to be genuine, were in existence in the 2nd cent., and that our present Acts were influenced by them. Whether the 2nd cent. Acts were based on any authentic report by Pilate, it is impossible to say.

It is clear that the Acta Pilati in their present form are largely dependent on the canonical Gospels, and that many of the additions are fabrications put forward for apologetic reasons. The aim of the writer is to furnish the truths of Christianity; his purpose than to show Pilate on the side of Christ, and to narrate incidents touching Christ's resurrection which not even His enemies could challenge? Heathen aspersions on the birth of Jesus are also disposed of by evidence given at His trial.

The second part of the Gospel—The Descent into Hades—represents in a developed form the tradition, early and widely accepted, which was based on 1 P 3:19 ('He went and preached unto the spirits in prison'). Earlier traces of the same tradition are found in the Gospel of Peter ('And they heard a voice from heaven, saying, Hast Thou preached to them that sleep? And a response was heard from the Cross, Yea'), and in the Legend of Abgar.

The Gospel of Nicodemus was taken up by Vincent de Beauvais in his Speculum Majus and by Jacobus de Voragine in his Aurea Legenda, and through these works it exerted a far-reaching influence.

C (b) 2. The Legend of Abgar.—In Eusebius (HE i 13 6ff) we find letters to have passed between Abgar V, king of Edessa, and Jesus. Eusebius states that the letters were preserved in the royal archives, and gives a literal translation of them from the Syriac. Abgar, who was suffering from an incurable disease, having heard of Christ's wonderful power of healing, wrote, entreating Christ to come and cure him, and offering Him a residence in Edessa, where He would be safe from the malice of the Jews. Jesus replied that He must accomplish His mission and ascend to Him who had sent Him, but that after His ascension He would send one of His disciples, who would cure the king and bring life to him and all who were with him. Then follows an account, also translated from the Syriac, of the fulfilment of Christ's promise in the sending by the Apostle Thomas of Thaddæus, one of the Seventy, to Edessa.

The legendary character of the correspondence is beyond all doubt, although its authenticity was accepted by Eusebius, and has been decided by several scholars, among them Burton and Phillips in England (see Phillips, Addra the Apostle, ix ff.). It had its origin some time after the introduction of Christianity into Edessa (c. 170), and led to a desire to have an Apostolic letter to the Church. The date of it is probably the second half of the 3rd century.

The correspondence and the narrative of Addai's mission found a place, with many additions, in the Syriac Teaching of Addai, which dates from about 400. The legend had a wide influence, and found credence in all sections of the Church, notwithstanding the doubts expressed regarding it in the Gallican Decree; a Greek recension of it—the Acts of Thaddæus—contains in addition the story of the portrait of Jesus miraculously stamped on a napkin. See also art. ABGAR.

The legendary letter of Christ was in widespread favour as a talisman to guard against dangers of all kinds. For this purpose it was placed at the city gate of Edessa and at the doors of private houses. Up to quite recent times copies of the letter were to be found framed in the houses of the peasantry in England (see Donehue, Apocryphal and Legendary Life of Christ, 223).

D. Gospel of Tatian.—The Gospel of Tatian, better known as the Diatesaron,* was a Harmony of the four Gospels, in all likelihood written originally in Syriac for the use of the Church at Edessa. The author of the Harmony was a disciple of Justin Martyr in Rome; but, being condemned for heretical views, he returned to his native land in the valley of the Euphrates about the year 172. Between that date and the close of the 2nd cent. his 'patchwork Gospel' was written, in which, using the chronological scheme of the Fourth * Diatesaron (δια τερσάρων) is variously interpreted. The expression is generally regarded as signifying a compilation in which only the four Gospels were used; but as the word was in use as a musical terminus technicus to denote a harmony, Tatian might have employed it as a description of his work, no matter how many Gospels he had drawn upon (Hamlyn Hill, Earliest Life, 21, Julicher, Einleitung, 391f.).

Gospel, he wove into a connected narrative the four different accounts of our Lord's life. It is doubtful whether, before the appearance of the Diatesaron, the four Gospels circulated separately in the Syrian Church; but however that may be, it was clearly Tatian's intention to provide a Gospel for public use which should obviate the necessity of having the narrative of Christ's life in different forms. The evidence goes to show that the Diatesaron was in general use in the Syrian Church up to the beginning of the 5th cent. In the Teaching of Addai (c. 400) we read that a large multitude of people assembled day by day and came to the prayer of the service, and to the reading of the Old and New Testament, of the Diatesaron, etc. (Phillips, Addai the Apostle, 34). In the middle of the 4th cent. Ephraem used the Diatesaron as the basis of his famous commentary on the Gospels. But from the 5th cent. onwards Tatian's Gospel was displaced from public worship by the new translation of the separate Gospels made under Rabbula,—the Peshitta, the Syriac Vulgate,—although, largely owing to the commentary of Ephraem, it continued to be read and to exert an influence for many centuries later.

Neither the Diatessaron nor the commentary of Ephraem has been preserved to us in the original Syriac. There are, however, Latin and Arabic versions of the Diatessaron, and two distinct Armenian versions of Ephraem's commentary. For the reconstruction of the text of the Diatessaron, Ephraem's commentary is of the highest value, and the work has been executed by Zahn (Forschungen, i).<sup>1</sup> While the Latin and Arabic versions keep Tatian's arrangement of the narrative, they are of no value for the restoration of the text. The Latin Harmony (Codex Fuldensis), which belongs to about the beginning of the 6th cent., gives throughout the text of the Vulgate, while the Arabic version, which was originally made in the 11th cent., is evidently a translation from a text of the Diatessaron which had been accommodated to the Peshitta. In the 9th cent. an epic poem entitled Héliand was written, based on a translation of the Codex Fuldensis. It became widely known, and to it our Anglo-Saxon forefathers were largely indebted for their knowledge of the life of Christ (Hamlyn Hill, op. cit. 20, 38).

In accordance with Tarian's peculiar views, the Diatessaron reveals a slight Encratic tendency. According to Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 20) it omitted the genealogies of Christ and everything dealing with Christ's birth ('all things that show our Lord to have been born of the seed of David according to the flesh'). The Birth-narratives of Luke and Matthew are, however, found in the Arabic and Latin recensions, as well as in Ephraem's commentary.

GOVERNOR.—The word 'governor' (ἡγεμόν, Lat. praeses, duce) is a comprehensive term, being the only Greek word which includes every class of provincial governor under the Roman empire. The following officials, for instance, are included under this title:—(1) Governors of Senatorial Provinces, namely, pro consulibus who are ex-consuls, and pro consularibus who are ex-prætors. The former class ruled the governmental spheres of duty, Asia and Africa; the latter all other provinces which by 'between Augustus and the Senate' were put under the authority of that body, such as Sicily, Macedonia, Achaia. (2) Governors of Imperial Provinces, namely, legati Augusti pro praetoribus who are ex-consuls; legati Augusti pro praetoribus who are ex-praetors; procuratores; praefecti Aegypti, etc. Examples of Imperial provinces are Syria, the Gauls (except Narbonensis), Judaea, and Egypt. These governors were all accountable to the Emperor, being put in charge of his provinces, but were by no means of equal rank. The legati were always members of the Senate, but the others were of the lower rank of equites. It was to this class that Pilate belonged (Mt 27 28; see under PROCURATOR, PILATE). Every senator, being a member of the same class as the Emperor himself, was a possible rival to him; those of inferior rank were practically in the position of his servants.

Governors of provinces had certain powers of jurisdiction delegated to them, which it is now impossible accurately to define. These were embodied in mandata given to them before setting out. They were also, of course, influenced by the traditions of the province to which they were going. They administered the law with a competence and a justice which have never been surpassed. As the provinces had an appeal from their decisions to the Senate in the case of Senatorial provinces, and to the Emperor in the case of Imperial, it was dangerous for a governor to go against the strongly expressed wish of the subjects of Rome. A procurator, for example, could be cast aside by the Emperor and ruined for life, without the slightest chance of redress.

Governors were commonly changed annually. The emperor Tiberius, however, retained many governors for a number of years in one position, and he also instituted the custom of 'definite salaries to such, thus doing away with the necessity for plunder in order to recoup themselves. The Roman system was sufficiently elastic to permit the appointment of officers for special service and the suspension of the regular order of things. It was an arrangement of this kind that 'Quintus Varus, Governor of Syria' (Lk 23) in A.D. 37 B.C., 'Born at Bethlehem' (ch. xi.), in order to carry on a campaign against the Hasmoneans, and leave the ordinary governor free for civil duties. See art. BIRTH OF CHRIST.

In Mt 10<sup>18</sup>, Mk 13<sup>9</sup>, and Lk 21<sup>12</sup> 'kings' are coupled with 'governors.' The reference here is to 'client-kings' of the Roman empire (such as Herod) as well as the ordinary governors. The territory ruled by such kings was part of the imperium Romanum in the fullest sense of that term. In other words, the Romans had suzerainty over these kingdoms; but they left them under the rule of their kings until they were sufficiently civilized to become ordinary provinces under ordinary governors. Then they were taken over. In Lk 21<sup>12</sup> the 'kings' are mentioned before the 'governors.' If this change is not accidental, it would appear that St. Luke wished βασιλεις to be understood in the sense of 'emperors' a sense quite in accordance with the Greek. The plural need be no difficulty, as it was the common practice for emperors to have their successors invested with the imperial powers, while they themselves were still alive and active.

ALEX. SOUTER.

GRACE (χάρις).—The Gr. χάρις, with which 'grace' in Eng. fully corresponds is one of those words (cf. ἀγαπάω, ἀγάπη, 'love') which have been raised to a higher power and filled with a profounder content by the revelation of Jesus Christ. In accordance with its derivation from χαίρω, it originally signified in classical Gr. something that gives joy or delight, hence charm or winsomeness. From this it came to be used in a subjective sense of a courteous, kindly, or, as we say, a 'gracious' disposition; and so became equivalent to goodwill or favour. From the sense of favour as an attitude of will and feeling, the transition was natural to 'a favour,' a concrete token of kindness and goodwill. Finally, as grace implies not only a giver but a receiver, it was employed to denote the gratitude felt by the latter for the favour bestowed, and the thanks by which the former is expressed (cf. the Eng. phrase 'a neat'). In nearly all these senses the word is found both in the LXX and the NT. But, while the LXX does not carry us beyond the point reached in the classical authors, when we pass to the NT the old meanings of χάρις are wonderfully enlarged, until, as Cremer says (Lex. s.v.), 'it has become quite a different word in NT Greek, so that we may say it depended upon Christianity to realize its full meaning and to elevate it to its rightful sphere.'

1. Grace in the Gospels.—In AV of the Gospels, 'grace' occurs only 4 times, once in Lk. (2<sup>40</sup>) and thrice in Jn. (1<sup>14</sup>, 16<sup>17</sup>). When we turn to the RV, however, and include the marginal readings, we find the word in 4 other places. Thrice it is used as a marginal reading for 'favour' or 'favoured' (Lk 12<sup>30</sup>, 25<sup>22</sup>), while in one important passage (4<sup>22</sup>) 'words of grace' is substituted for 'gracious words.' In every case, both in Lk. and Jn., the corresponding Gr. word is χάρις, with the exception of Lk 12<sup>30</sup> where the derivative vb. χαρίζω is used. Besides these passages in which either in AV or RV it is rendered 'grace,' χάρις occurs 4 times in Lk. (8<sup>32</sup>, 33, 34, 17<sup>9</sup>) in the sense of 'thanks.'

(1) We observe that grace is not a word or idea that is used by the Synoptists. St. Luke being the only one who uses it. It is also worthy of notice that the term is not one which the Evangelist ever attributes to Jesus Himself. It is true that he represents Jesus as using χάρις 4 times, but only in the ordinary colloquial sense of thanks. Thus, although χάρις or 'grace' was to undergo something like a transfiguration through the influence of Christianity, and indeed was to become not only a specifically Christian word, but a word of which we might say that it shines like a jewel on the brow of Christ Himself, whose life and death and teaching gave birth to the ideas which it has come to express, it is not a term which we find in any of our Lord's recorded utterances.

In 4 out of the 5 Lukan passages in which 'grace' occurs, it has the ordinary sense of 'favour.' Twice the Virgin Mary is declared to have been the object of the Divine favour (Lk 12<sup>30</sup>, 30). Of Jesus it is said in one passage that the grace (or favour) of God was upon Him (2<sup>40</sup>), and in another that He advanced in favour (or grace) with both God and men (25<sup>22</sup>). The remaining passage (4<sup>22</sup>) is the only Synoptic one which may possibly carry us on to the peculiar Christian significance of the word. When Jesus preached His first sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth, His fellow-townsmen are said to have wondered ἐν τοῖς λόγοις τῆς χάριτος. AV renders 'at the gracious words'; RV, more literally, 'at the words of grace.' But what does the expression mean? Does it point merely, as has commonly been supposed, to our Lord's winsomeness and charm as a speaker, His grace of manner, His possession of one of the most effective of the gifts of an orator? Or is χάριτος to be taken not as a Hebraistic gen. of quality, but as an objective gen., so that 'words of grace' = 'words about grace'? It is not impossible that by this phrase, which is thus capable of a double interpretation, St. Luke intended to convey a twofold meaning, and to let his readers understand that the words of Christ, as Dr. Bruce puts it, were 'words of grace about grace' (Exp. Gr. Test. in loc.). In any case, however, it seems probable that the objective meaning was the one immediately before the Evangelist's mind. The fact that genitives of quality are frequent in writings influenced by Heb., and that parallels to the use of χάρις to denote the quality of charm in a speaker can be adduced not only from the LXX (Ec 10<sup>12</sup>, Ps 44<sup>3</sup>, Sir 21<sup>16</sup>), but from the classical authors (Hom. Od. viii. 175; Dem. Orat. li. 9), weighs little in comparison with the analogies offered by the usage of St. Luke himself in Acts. It is admitted that λόγος τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ (Ac 14<sup>3</sup> 20<sup>32</sup>) means the message of salvation, and that τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς χάριτος τοῦ θεοῦ (20<sup>24</sup>) means the gospel of the grace of God in the full Pauline and Christian sense of the expression. Moreover, the text from which our Lord preached His Nazareth sermon (Lk 4<sup>18-19</sup>, cf. Is 61<sup>1-2</sup>) lends itself most readily to this larger view of the opening words of 'This day hath this Scripture been fulfilled in your ears' (v<sup>21</sup>). Noteworthy, too, in this connexion is the fact that in quoting 'the words of the Evangelical prophet' the acceptable year of the Lord,' Jesus made the utterance still more gracious by omitting any reference to a coming day of Divine vengeance (cf. v. 19 with Is 61<sup>1</sup>). But, above all, we must bear in mind that whether the Third Gospel was written or not by Luke the 'disciple of St. Paul,' it is matter of common knowledge that strong Pauline influences run through it, and that more than any other it gives prominence to those aspects of our Lord's life and teaching which present His gospel as a message of Divine grace. This is the Gospel of the '18<sup>10a</sup>, 19<sup>2a</sup>), of the 'woman which was a sinner' (7<sup>36a</sup>), of the malefactor forgiven even as he hung upon his cross (23<sup>39a</sup>). Above all, it is the gospel of the great 'Parables of Grace'—the Lost Coin, the Lost Sheep, the Prodigal Son (15). It seems natural, therefore, to conclude that the Evangelist, on whom Christ's grace to the sinful had made so deep an impression, intended in this 'frontispiece' to his story of our Lord's public ministry, when he described the listeners in the synagogue as wondering at 'the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth,' to set Jesus before us not merely as a winning speaker, but as the anointed herald of the grace of God. See also art. GRACIOUSNESS.

(2) When we come to the Fourth Gospel, we find that in the Prologue the word 'grace,' no doubt through the Pauline teaching and its consequences, has blossomed fully into those greater meanings with which the Church had become familiar.* In 1<sup>14</sup> the author describes the Incarnate Logos as 'full of grace and truth' in His revelation of the Father's glory. The phrase recalls the frequent OT combination of 'mercy and truth' (חַסֵּד וְאֵמֶת, LXX ēleos kal alētheia) as a summary description of Jehovah's character (Ex 34<sup>6</sup>, Ps 25<sup>10</sup> 55<sup>10</sup> 59<sup>14</sup> etc.). But the grace of Christ in the NT is more than the mercy of God in the OT. It is remarkable that in the LXX χάρις is not considered a rich enough word to render the Heb. חַסֵּד. There is the Divine kindness or favour (corrected Heb. יֶטֶב, cf. Gn 18<sup>2</sup> and passim), but is not used of those energies which belong properly to the sphere of redemption. For the grace or mercy of God the word ēleos is employed; so that in the LXX ēleos may be said to be a stronger and richer word than χάρις. When we come to the NT, however, the case is reversed. χάρις, as applied to the Christian conception of grace, has become a grander word than ēleos; for while ēleos denotes the Divine compassion in the presence of man's pain and misery, χάρις is used to express God's attitude to man's sin. It is more than a Divine attribute, although it is that. It is the sum of those Divine forces from which our salvation flows.

In v. 16 the Evangelist says that out of Christ's fulness we all received, 'and grace for grace' (χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος). In its general use, as we have seen, χάρις passes from a disposition of goodwill to be applied to the blessings which goodwill bestows. Here the reference is to the blessings of the Christian salvation. Christ's fulness is inexhaustible, and His grace is constantly bestowing itself upon His followers. But 'grace for grace' does not mean merely 'grace upon grace'—one grace added to another. The force of the ἀντὶ is not to be neglected. In the next verse the author is going to contrast the NT system of grace with the legal system of the OT. And here, by a bold use of language, he applies to the economy of grace the very formula of the opposite dispensation, so as the better to bring out its 'complete gratuitousness' (Godet, Com. on Jn. in loc.). Under the Law, with its system of exchanges, a blessing was received as the reward of (ἀντὶ) merit, but under the gospel it is Christ's free grace itself, received and appropriated, which becomes our title to fresh and larger bestowals.

'For the law was given by Moses,' adds the Evangelist; 'grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (v. 17). Here we have the justification of what we said above as to the χάρις καὶ ἀλήθεια of the NT being much more than the ēleos καὶ ἀλήθεια of the OT. The Divine mercy (ēleos) was an essential part of the OT revelation. It was on Sinai itself, and in connexion with the giving of the tables of the Law, that God revealed Himself to Moses as 'a God full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy and truth' (Ex 34<sup>6</sup>). But in comparison with the glory of the Christian revelation, the revelation to Moses was legal and hard. It lacked that element of spontaneous favour towards the sinful, and apart from every thought of merit gained by obedience, which belongs to the very essence of grace as we know it in Jesus Christ.

2. The grace of Christ in the Pauline Epistles.—In discussing the meaning of grace in the Third and Fourth Gospels we have been obliged to anticipate in part what has now to be said about the Pauline teaching. For there can be no doubt that in the minds of both Evangelists that teaching was subsumed. It was the use which St. Paul had made of the word that determined its significance for Christianity ever afterwards.

(1) And first we notice that when the Apostle speaks of grace, he is invariably thinking of Jesus Christ in connexion with it. Most frequently it is the grace of God that he names; for God the Father is always recognized as the primal fountain of all the blessings of the Christian salvation, and no greater misrepresentation can be made of St. Paul's gospel than to describe him as bringing the grace that is in Christ into some kind of opposition to the justice that is in God. Sometimes again ἡ χάρις stands alone; for the Apostle treats it at times not merely as a Divine attribute, but as the operative principle of the whole economy of redemption. But as it is Christ who embodies this great principle in His own person, as it is in Him that the Father's grace is revealed, and by Him that it is mediated to men; as, to use his own words, 'the grace of God was given you in Christ Jesus' (1 Co 1<sup>4</sup>), and 'grace reigns . . . in Christ our Lord' (Ro 5<sup>21</sup>), he does not fail to speak of it again and again, and especially in the benedictions with which he concludes his Epp., as 'the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 16<sup>20</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>23</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>, Gal 6<sup>18</sup> etc.; cf. the opening salutations, Ro 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, Gal 1<sup>3</sup> etc.)

* It is worthy of remark that while in the Prologue χάρις appears as a fundamental note of the revelation of Jesus Christ, the word is not used elsewhere in the work. In the rest of his Gospel, as in his Epistles, the author prefers the idea of love (316 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup> and constantly). Like the Synoptists he never once puts χάρις into the mouth of Jesus, not even in a passage like 719-23 (cf. 510-18), where Jesus is speaking of His relation to the law of Moses. Does this not go to support the essential historicity of Christ's teaching as reported in the Fourth Gospel?

(2) When we ask how St Paul arrived at this distinctive conception of the Christian gospel as an economy of grace, and of Jesus Christ as the dispenser of grace, the answer undoubtedly is that he owed it to that revelation of the Lord Jesus Himself near the gates of Damascus by which his whole life was suddenly transformed. As a Pharisee he had sought to earn salvation by his zeal for the Law. But everything he had done had proved ineffectual. The commandment which was unto life he found to be unto death (Ro 7<sup>10</sup>). Nay, in his endeavours to be exceedingly zealous according to the Law he had been led into the greatest sin of his career—his furious opposition to Jesus Christ, his savage persecution of the saints. Then came the great, astonishing act of spontaneous grace. Christ appeared in person to this bitter enemy, convincing him beyond the possibility of doubt that that Jesus whom he persecuted was no other than the Lord of glory, and at the same time addressing him in those tender and gracious and . . . words of reproach and appeal by which his persecutor was turned into the slave of Christ. From that day Christ was to Paul the Lord of grace no less than the Lord of glory. It was the grace of God in Christ, and that grace alone, which had called him and saved and made him what he was (Gal 1<sup>15</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>10</sup>). And that same grace which had redeemed Paul at the first was with him all along. It guided him in the path of wisdom (1 Co 3<sup>10</sup>). It enabled him to be more abundant in labours than all others (15<sup>10</sup>). It taught him how to behave himself in the world (2 Co 1<sup>12</sup>). And when the messenger of Satan came to buffet him, and he thrice besought the Lord that this thing might depart, it was the Lord Himself who said to His servant, 'My grace is sufficient for thee' (12<sup>9</sup>).

(3) What did St. Paul understand by the grace of Christ, as he used that term in his fully developed teaching? What distinctive contents did he put into this great Christian idea, which he knew in his own experience to be a great Christian fact? (a) We shall perhaps find our best starting-point in . . . which he sets a certain view of that . . . the Corinthians as one with which his teaching had made them familiar. He regards it as an act of astonishing . . . 'For ye know,' he writes, 'the grace . . . Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might become rich' (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>). How much was involved in this self-sacrifice he shows more fully in another Epistle, where he describes it as a self-emptying, on Christ's part, of His Divine form, the assumption of a lowly human nature, and the rendering of a lifelong obedience even unto the death of the cross (Ph 2<sup>5-8</sup>). It is in this quality of self-sacrifice most of all that the grace of Christ in the NT differs from the mercy of God as revealed in the earlier OT revelation. Christ's grace is not merely the compassion which a great and strong and blessed nature feels for one which is sinful and sorrowful and weak. It is the self-remembering love which so yearns to save that it surrenders all the wealth that is its own, and welcomes all the poverty that is another's. It is that love which finds its crowning symbol, as it found its absolute expression, in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. 'I am poor and needy,' said a saint of the OT, 'yet the Lord thinketh upon me' (Ps 40<sup>17</sup>). 'The Son of God,' exclaims St. Paul, 'loved me, and gave him self up for me' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>).

(b) The absolute freeness of Christ's grace was another element in the Apostle's conception. This brings us to his characteristic antithesis between grace and law. We noticed this antithesis already in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel, but it was St. Paul who first formulated it when he wrote, 'Ye are not under law, but under grace' (Ro 6<sup>14</sup>). Formerly the Divine blessings were secured by obedience to the Law. Righteousness was the fruit of works, and rewards were reckoned not as of grace, but as of debt (Ro 4<sup>4</sup>). But now we are 'justified freely (δωρεάν) by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus' (Ro 3<sup>24</sup>). The grace that saves us has nothing to do with works (Ro 11<sup>6</sup>); it is the 'free gift' of God by 'the one man, Jesus Christ' (Ro 5<sup>15</sup>, cf. Eph 2<sup>8</sup>).

(c) Again, Christ's grace, in St. Paul's view of it, was marked by its sin-conquering power. Besides the great antithesis between grace with its free gifts on the one hand, and the Law with its works and debts on the other, we have in the Apostle's teaching a further antithesis between . . . and sin. This antithesis follows of necessity from the former one, for it is the fact of the Law that leads to the imputation of sin (Ro 5<sup>13</sup>), and it is the coming in of the Law that causes trespasses to abound (v. 20). But that same grace of Christ which rises superior to the Law shows its power to master the sin which is the . . . of the Law. 'Where sin abounded' . . . 'abound more exceedingly' (v. 20). And this . . . of grace over sin is manifested in . . . ways:

(a) It removes the guilt of sin and the dread consequences which flow from guiltiness. This it does by not only forgiving the sinner (Eph 1<sup>7</sup>), but justifying him freely (Ro 3<sup>24</sup>), bestowing upon him the gift of righteousness (Gal 2<sup>21</sup>), and giving him the assurance that as sin reigned unto death, even so shall grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life (Ro 5<sup>21</sup>). (b) It breaks the dominion of sin over the sinner's heart. The antinomian indeed may say, 'Let us continue in sin, that grace may abound.' But St. Paul's answer is, 'God forbid!' (Ro 6<sup>2</sup>, cf. v. 1). The free gift bestowed by the grace of the One Man (5<sup>15</sup>) carries within it an 'abundance of grace' (v. 17). And among the things included in this abundance of . . . are a death to sin and a life unto God (v. 1). The fact that we are not under the Law, but under grace, implies that sin's tyranny over us is broken (v. 14), and that we have been set free from it (v. 18) for a life of righteousness and holiness in the service of God (vv. 22).

(d) Finally, we may say that in the Pauline teaching the grace of Christ, the 'riches of his grace' as we have it in Eph. (1<sup>7</sup>), stood for the sum-total of all Christian blessings. There is an abundance and superabundance in grace (Ro 5<sup>17, 20</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>15</sup>), which makes it a stream of endless benefaction flowing from an inexhaustible fountain. Christ's riches are unsearchable (Eph 3<sup>8</sup>), but all that Christ is His grace is for grace is the most essential quality of His being, while He Himself is the very incarnation of everything we mean by grace. We are called by grace (Gal 1<sup>15</sup>), and justified by grace (Ro 3<sup>24</sup>), and sanctified by grace (6<sup>14</sup>). Through grace also we obtain eternal com fort and good hope (2 Th 2<sup>16</sup>), and strength (2 Ti 2<sup>1</sup>), and liberality (2 Co 8<sup>1</sup>), and happy songs (Col 3<sup>16</sup>). And so it was the great Apostle's custom, when he would gather up into a single word all his wishes and hopes and prayers for the Churches, to say, 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all' (2 Th 3<sup>18</sup>, Ro 16<sup>24</sup>; cf. 1 Co 16<sup>23</sup> etc.).*

3. The grace of Christ in the rest of the NT.—The material here is very much scantier than in the Pauline writings, but it is quite sufficient to show how deeply the great Pauline word had lodged itself in the general Christian mind. It is true that we do not find grace defined as to its nature by those antitheses of law and works and sin which give the Pauline conception its peculiar colouring, but the word is still used to express the Divine favour as revealed in Christ, and those saving blessings of which He is the Mediator. The chief relevant passages in Acts have been referred to already in connexion with the usage of the Third Evangelist. In 1 Peter we find the grace of salvation made to depend on the revelation of Jesus Christ, and associated in particular with the Saviour's 'glories' and the glories that followed them (1 Pet 1:11). The author of 2 Peter exhorts his readers to 'persevere in grace and knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ' (3<sup>18</sup>). In Hebrews the fact that Jesus is our great High Priest is urged as the reason why we should draw near with boldness unto the 'throne of grace' (4<sup>14-16</sup>); and the treading under foot of the Son of God is regarded as equivalent to doing despite to 'the Spirit of grace' (10<sup>29</sup>). As in the Fourth Gospel apart from the Prologue, so in the other Johannine writings, love takes the place held by the idea of grace in the Pauline teaching. But the familiarity of the thought of Christ's love shown by its appearance in the forms of 'grace' (2 Jn 3, Rev 14<sup>5</sup>). And what could be more fitting than that the NT as a whole, of which grace is the distinctive watchword, and over every page of which we might inscribe the words 'Grace reigns,' should conclude, in the last sentence of the Apocalypse, with the benediction, 'The grace of the Lord Jesus be with the saints' (Rev 22<sup>21</sup>)?

GRACIOUSNESS.—The word 'graciousness' does not occur in the EV of the Gospels. The adjective 'gracious' occurs only once (Lk 4<sup>22</sup>) in the AV and not at all in the RV. The idea, however, covered by the noun is of very frequent occurrence, and may truly be said to be one of the characteristics of Jesus Himself, and of His coming to proclaim

1. The passage Lk 4<sup>22</sup> is rendered in the AV, 'And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth.' The RV keeps more closely to the form of the Gr. expression, and renders 'wondered at the words of grace.' In so doing it departs from the general practice of the older English versions, which from Tindale onwards adopted the form of the AV. Wyclif and the Rhemish version support the rendering of the RV, following in all probability the example of the Vulg. in verbis gratiae which they rendered literally. The best modern version (Weymouth's) paraphrases and expands the expression thus, 'wondering at the sweet words of kindness which fell from his lips'; while Weizsacker's admirable German version translates simply die lieblichen Worte. The best rendering, where the phrase is thus understood, is probably that of Plummer, 'winning words.' The words of the original, ἐπὶ τοῖς λόγοις τῆς χάριτος, suggest such a rendering, since the original meaning of χάρις, as it is found in Gr. literature, is that of 'comeliness' or 'winsomeness' (see the Lexicons for examples). But the phrase is popular, and attractive as such an expression is, another is probably the correct one. See preceding article.

* Besides the use of the word 'grace' in the Pauline Epp to designate the spontaneous favour of God to sinners as revealed and mediated by Jesus Christ, it is employed in various derivative senses, such as (Ro 5) the state of grace (status gratiae), a particular gift of grace (Eph 1<sup>7</sup>), the special grace required for the Apostolic office (Gal 2<sup>19</sup>, Eph 3<sup>7</sup>). The discussion of these, however, lies somewhat beyond the scope of this Dictionary.

2. The Gr word χάρις occurs on several other occasions in the Gospels, and is variously rendered in the English versions. In order to gain a clearer idea of its meaning, it is necessary to examine these. Of the youthful John we read in Lk 2<sup>40</sup> 'the grace of God was upon him,' and of the child Jesus (2<sup>52</sup>) that He 'advanced in favour (RV 'grace') with God and men.' Weymouth uses 'favour' in both passages. On three occasions, in Lk 6<sup>32-34</sup>, we have the expression, 'What thank have ye?' representing the Gr. ποία ὑμῖν χάρις ἐστίν; and the same sense of the word is found in Lk 17<sup>9</sup>. The only other passage in the Gospels where the word occurs is in the Fourth Gospel, where it is found (Jn 1<sup>14-17</sup>), and is rendered in each case 'grace.' See GRACE.

3. There remains for us to see how the quality of 'graciousness' is manifested in Jesus during His earthly ministry. Many who take the word 'gracious' of Lk 4<sup>22</sup> in the narrower sense noted above, look only for the 'graciousness' of our Lord to be revealed in His manner of dealing with men, in His outward conduct and speech. This view is, of course, true. His readiness to take part in all the festivities and social functions of everyday life marked Him off clearly to His contemporaries from the ascetic attitude of John the Baptist. His playful, gentle winsomeness that won the children to His knee was a scandal to His disciples. His brotherly attitude towards the diseased and stricken, His generous help, His readiness of sympathy to the emboldened leprosy, blind, and dumb, to dare the publicity it shrank from, or the menace and rebuke of the crowd, to cast itself at His feet, and throw itself upon His gracious consideration. This same characteristic is revealed in His intimate association with the household at Bethany, and His special affection for John and Lazarus, as well as in such exquisitely human touches as His longing look of love given to the young questioner (Mk 10<sup>21</sup>).

'Men could approach near to Him, could eat and drink with Him, could listen to His talk, and ask Him questions; they found Him not accessible only, but He did not seem to be vexed by their plans, and He did not attend to them' (ch. 5).

This peculiar graciousness was displayed in such acts as washing the feet of His disciples, and in His patient tolerance of the scepticism of Thomas.

But when we go deeper than form of speech or nature of deed, we find this quality still more clearly manifested. If 'graciousness' is to bear the richer meaning we have seen it may carry, then its significance in the words and works of Jesus is all the greater. His parables (e.g. the Lost Sheep, the Prodigal Son, the Good Samaritan), how full they are of this peculiar quality of the Divine revelation! His conduct to sinful men and women, how sharply did it contrast with the attitude of His contemporaries (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>, Mk 10<sup>13-14</sup>). His prayer for His enemies shows with wonderful tenderness how this spirit did not desert Him at the moment of greatest trial, how inherent it was, therefore, in His very nature (Lk 23<sup>34</sup>). In His thought the gracious method of His treatment of men was to become a general standard of conduct (Jn 13<sup>15</sup>), and would even constitute the basis of final judgment (Mt 25<sup>45</sup>). It should not be overlooked that, while St. Luke is the Evangelist who most fully and clearly reveals this characteristic, he dwells most distinctly upon it, each of the others supplies sufficient evidence to prove that St. Luke's picture is no imaginary one, nor even his emphasis exaggerated. GRASS.—In the OT there are several Heb. words which are translated 'grass,' but they are all very general terms; in the NT the only word so translated is χόρος. Strictly speaking, no plant should be called a grass unless it belongs to the botanical order Gramineae, but this is a comparatively modern distinction. The Biblical writers do not, of course, employ the term with scientific precision. The modern Arab includes, under the common designation hashish (grass), field-flowers such as anemones, poppies, and tulips. If, as is probable, it was in this wider sense that Christ and His contemporaries used the word, it lends new point and charm to His appeal, 'If God so clothe the grass of the field' (Mt 6<sup>30</sup>), and invests with fresh beauty the familiar words, 'All flesh is grass, and all the glory thereof as the flower of grass' (1 P 1<sup>24</sup> RV; cf. Ja 1<sup>10, 11</sup>).

The grasses of Palestine are very numerous; Dr. Post gives the figures for Palestine and Syria as 90 genera and 243 species (Hastings' DB ii. 258). Pasture grasses vary greatly in quality and profusion according to climate, soil, and elevation. Turf is rare. Grass is much used as fuel (Mt 6<sup>30</sup>), especially in districts where wood is scarce (see OVEN).

GRAVE.—See TOMB.

GRAVE-CLOTHES.—The account in the Gospels of the circumstances attending the burial of our Lord illustrates fully the Jewish practice of the time with regard to grave-clothes. The body of Jesus, doubtless after being bathed, after the manner of the Jews as well as of the Greeks (Ac 9<sup>37</sup>, cf. Gospel of Peter, 6), was 'wrapped' (ἐνέλιξεν, Mt 27<sup>59</sup>, Lk 23<sup>53</sup>) or 'swathed' (ἐνέλιψεν, Mk 15<sup>46</sup>) in the shroud of linen cloth (σινδών) which Joseph of Arimathea had procured on his way back to Golgotha, and which is described as 'fresh' or 'unused' (καθαρή, Mt 27<sup>59</sup>), in accordance with the sacred use to which it was put (cf. Mk 11<sup>2</sup>). Spices were next crumbled between the folds of the linen (μετὰ τῶν ἀρωμάτων, Jn 19<sup>40</sup>), and the whole was then bound together with strips of cloth (ὀθονίους, Jn 19<sup>40</sup>; cf. κερίαις, Jn 11<sup>44</sup>). The face was covered with a separate face-cloth or 'napkin' (τὸ σουδάριον, Jn 20<sup>7</sup>).

In later Judaism it was held that the resemblance of the future to the present body was so close that men would rise in the same clothes in which they were buried, on the analogy of the grain of corn which comes up from the earth not naked, but clothed (cf. 1 Co 15<sup>37</sup>). And accordingly the Rabbis were in the habit of giving careful directions as to their grave-clothes (Weber, Jud. Theol. 2 p. 370). This frequently led, however, to such unnecessary expense in the way of luxurious wrappings, that by way of protest Rabbi Gamaliel left directions that he was to be buried in simple while his grandson limited the e-clothes to one dress (see Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life, p. 168 f.). At the present day, among Jews as well as Mohammedans, the corpse is attired in the ordinary holiday attire of life.

GREATNESS.—1. The greatness of Christ.—Greatness is an attribute which more than once in the Scriptures is applied to Jesus Christ. It is used both relatively, in passages which suggest a comparison between His powers and those of such OT heroes as Jacob (Jn 4<sup>12</sup>), Jonah and Solomon (Mt 12<sup>41, 42</sup>), and Abraham or the prophets (Jn 8<sup>53</sup>); and in an absolute sense, with reference to the esteem in which He was to be held in the eyes of Jehovah (Lk 1<sup>32</sup>). In the teaching of Jesus Himself, however, greatness is less a status than a quality. In the few words in which He alludes to His own human greatness, He makes it to consist in capacity for service and for sacrifice (Mk 10<sup>45</sup> ||), and it is significant that in the Epistles also the attribute is ascribed to Him only where the idea of service and sacrifice is prominent in the context (He 4<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>).

In one passage the greatness of the Son is compared with that of the Father (Jn 14<sup>28</sup>). This is admittedly a difficult saying. The important point to be borne in mind is that the statement must not be interpreted apart from the rest of Christ's teaching concerning His relationship to the First Person in the Trinity. A careful study of His whole attitude seems to show that, whether He is here referring to such inferiority as is involved in His sharing the Divine essence by communication, or which belonged to His subordination as being incarnate upon the earth, the words 'are perfectly consistent with the belief in the unity of the Divine nature, and therefore with the belief in the equality of the Godhead of the Son with the Godhead of the Father' (Westcott, ad loc.; cf. Godet, ad loc.).

2. The greatness of Christ's followers.—Christ has less to say about His own greatness than about that of His followers. For there is a greatness that belongs to His Kingdom, and this He covets for each one of them. So exalted is it that it surpasses the highest conception of greatness hitherto received (Mt 11<sup>11</sup>—Lk 7<sup>28</sup>). But this greatness of the Kingdom differs essentially from that in which the world is great. The world has confused greatness with power, and certain caricatures of it known as 'fame' and 'power'. The teaching of Jesus draws clear lines.

(a) Greatness is not fame. Men's fame consists in what others say about them; Christians' greatness consists in what they themselves are. Of the former consideration Christ bids His followers to be exultingly independent (Mt 5<sup>11, 12</sup>, note the strong word ἀγαλλιάσθε). Indeed, to share in their Lord's greatness will involve not praise but persecution (Jn 15<sup>20</sup>). But upon the second consideration, that is to say, upon their character, their claim to greatness wholly depends. And the character demanded includes not the assertive qualities of notoriety, but the milder attributes of child-like humility (Mk 9<sup>34</sup>, Mt 18<sup>14</sup>, Lk 9<sup>48</sup>), and obedience to the Divine law (Mt 5<sup>19</sup>—a passage which has an important bearing on the relationship of the new dispensation to the old).

(b) Greatness is not power. This, it is true, is the current conception of it. In the world's view, to be great is to be able to exact from others as much as is possible of respect and service. The more servants a man has at his disposal, the wider the sphere in which he can command obedience, to be (Mk 10<sup>42</sup> ||). Such was . . . . . eption. Two of them were . . . . . e one on Christ's right hand . . . . . || left in His Kingdom; the others were jealous, because they coveted these seats of . . . . . for themselves (Mk 10<sup>35ff.</sup> = Mt 20<sup>20ff.</sup>). . . . . contrast with this view Jesus places His own pronouncement on greatness. According to His teaching as well as His example (see above), to be great is not to exact, but to give, as much service as possible. A man's greatness is measured less by the service he commands than by the service he renders (Mk 10<sup>43-45</sup> ||). In a glorious paradox the highest in the Kingdom is he who assumes the lowest place (Mt 23<sup>11</sup>, Jn 13<sup>14-15</sup>, and, for the supreme example, Ph 2<sup>11</sup>).

The practical importance of such teaching can scarcely be over-emphasized. Until the time of the Incarnation the position of a servant was the lowest of all; but when the Son of God appeared, He, in St. Paul's words, 'took the form of a servant' (μορφὴν δούλου, Ph 2<sup>7</sup>), and from that day the whole status of honourable service, in whatever capacity, has been consecrated and raised. The position it occupies is no longer menial; it is the most exalted of all. The servant's life, indeed, may be a life of greatness, inasmuch as Christ has placed the very essence of greatness no longer in power to command, but in willingness to minister. The very title which our Lord uses of Himself in appealing to His own example (Mk 10<sup>45</sup> ||), suggests that the nearer a man's life approaches to the ideal of humanity, the more . . . . . will he realize his greatness in the service of . . . . .

The exact significance of the title 'Son of Man' (wh. see) has been much discussed. To the present writer the . . . . . is that which makes it point to Christ as the ideal of . . . . . That is to say, He was not only a man, but . . . . . There was nothing . . . . . nature, nor anything lack- . . . . . we may so express it, the . . . . . It will be seen that, if this view is correct, the application of the title made above is justifiable.

One more saying of Jesus must be included in our study. To His followers, as we have shown, greatness does not mean power in any earthly sense. And yet the very men who refuse to exert such power shall be possessed by a power superior to all earthly might—the power of the Father's protection (Jn 10<sup>29</sup>—according to the probable reading).

GRECIANS, GREEKS.—i. DISTINCTION OF THE WORDS.—1. Greek.—The name Ἕλλην, derived from a small tribe living in Thessaly, was extended to include all of Greek race, whether natives of Greece or of the Greek islands or colonies. This is the use in classical Greek, and it also appears in the NT, e.g. Ac 18<sup>7</sup> (TR), 'All the Greeks took Sosthenes,' etc.; Ro 1<sup>4</sup> (the Greek division of mankind into Greeks and non-Greeks or Barbarians); perhaps also 1 Co 12<sup>22, 28</sup> (Schleierner). This meaning was widened by the Jews to include all non-Jews who lived as the Greeks, using their language and manners. Where Ἕλληνες are opposed to Jews, the primary reference is to a difference of religious worship (Grimm).

So in LXX of Is 9<sup>10</sup> where Ἕλληνες appears for 'Philistines'; cf. also 2 Mac 4<sup>13</sup> and 6<sup>1</sup>. Thus the Jews divided mankind into Jews and Greeks, which corresponds to the division of Jews and Gentiles; cf. Ac 14<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>10</sup>, Ro 1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>9, 10</sup> 3<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>32</sup>, Gal 3<sup>28</sup>, Col 3<sup>11</sup>. In this sense Titus was a Greek (Gal 2<sup>3</sup>), and also the father of Timothy (Ac 16<sup>3</sup>). This use of the word was continued by the Christian Fathers, such as Justin Martyr, Tatian, and Athanasius.

2. Grecian.—Ἑλληνιστής (from Ἕλληνίζω), AV 'Grecian,' one who copies the customs and uses the language of the Greeks, received among the Jews the technical . . . . . a Jew of the Dispersion, born outside . . . . . and living among the Gentiles. These remained faithful to Judaism, but spoke Hellenistic Greek, the vernacular of daily life in the Gentile world. In the NT Ἑλληνιστής is . . . . . Ἰσ, a Palestinian Jew (see Trench, . . . . .; cf. Ac 6<sup>1</sup>. See J. H. Moulton, Gram. of N.T. Greek, ch. i.

ii. GREEK INFLUENCE IN PALESTINE.—1. Historical.—The conquests of Alexander the Great (B.C. 331) opened the East to Greek settlers. Numbers of his veterans settled in Syria, and Greek colonists were welcomed by his successors. Old towns (as Gaza, Askalon, Ashdod, and Samaria) were Hellenized, and new Greek towns . . . . . Pella, and Gerasa) were built. . . . . of Hellenizing his conquests was to a great extent successful, and a large section of the inhabitants of Palestine favoured Greek culture. It appeared likely that Hellenism would slowly conquer Judaism, and that the zealous adherents of the Mosaic law would become a minority in the nation. Had this happened, the blending of Greek culture with Judaism might have taken place on Palestinian soil as it did in Alexandria. Judaism, however, was saved through the . . . . . action of Antiochus Epiphanes, who . . . . . B.C. 175-164. In B.C. 168, Antiochus endeavoured to thoroughly Hellenize Judaea. He forbade the Jewish worship, and ordered sacrifices to be offered to heathen deities in the cities of Judaea. The penalty of disobedience was death (1 Mac 14<sup>45-57</sup>). This led to the rebellion of the Maccabees. During the troubled years which followed, the Jewish national party regained much of their lost ground. Hellenism was discouraged, and even . . . . . Subsequently Jewish patriotism took . . . . . of zealous observance of the Law, and there resulted the strongly marked division between Jew and Greek which we find in the Gospels.

2. Extent of Greek influence in Palestine in the time of Christ.—(1) Greek districts.—The districts of Palestine which in the time of Christ were chiefly Jewish were Judaea, Galilee, and Peræa (Jos. BJ iii. 3; Schürer, HJP ii. 1. 3 ff.). Close to these were districts predominantly Greek. The towns of Philistia had heathen temples. The whole seaboard of the Mediterranean was Greek except Joppa and Jamnia. On the north, heathen territory was reached in Cæsarea Philippi, where there was a celebrated temple to Pan. On the east we find the Greek league of Decapolis (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 593). Even in central Palestine heathen temples existed at Samaria and Scythopolis. In the Greek cities athletic contests took place, and the usual amusements of the theatre and gymnasium were provided. Thus within a few miles of the scenes of the Saviour's ministry there were Gentile cities with temples, society, and culture, fully Greek. But although Jesus went into the country districts of the Gentile portions of Palestine, we have no record of His entering any Greek cities. For instance, we do not know that He ever entered Tiberias, although frequently in that neighbourhood.

(2) Jewish districts.—Even in the Jewish districts of Palestine, Greek influence was distinctly felt. Foreign as the theatre and amphitheatre were to Jewish notions, they were built at Jerusalem by Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xv. viii. 1), and they also existed at Jericho. Greek architecture found its way even into Herod's Temple. Even in the most Jewish localities there must have been a considerable number of Gentiles. Commerce and civilization bear witness to strong Greek influence. The Greek language must have been understood by many, although Aramaic was the usual tongue. This linguistic influence is evident in several ways. (a) the Greek words which are transliterated into Hebrew in the Mishna; (b) the three '... n which the inscription on the cross ...; (c) the Greek names of some of the Apostles, as Philip and Andrew; (d) the NT writers' use of the colloquial Greek as found on papyri; (e) the quotations from the LXX in the NT. Hence Christ lived among a people which, although strongly Jewish, was greatly influenced by Gentile thought and civilization. (See Schurer, HJP II. 1. § 22, Edersheim, Life and Times, 1. 84-92)

III. CHRIST'S CONTACT WITH THE GREEKS.—In two cases only do we find it explicitly stated that Greeks came to the Saviour. These are:

(1) The Syro-Phœnician woman (Mk 7<sup>26</sup>).—The Saviour was either on Gentile ground (note the strongly supported reading διὰ Σιδῶνος, Mk 7<sup>27</sup>) or very near it (so Edersheim). The woman was a native of the country, and is called a Greek, in the sense of not 'Jewish', and she was a heathen. ... life are to be found in ...

(2) The Greeks who asked to see Jesus (Jn 12<sup>20</sup>).—Some have considered that these Greeks were really Grecian Jews (properly Ἑλληνισταί) (so Calvin, Ewald, and others). But there seems no reason for thinking that the word 'Greek' is not used here, as commonly, as equivalent to 'Gentile.' Evidently they were also proselytes (Jn 12<sup>20</sup> 'to worship').

There are other cases in which Christ came in contact with 'Greeks,' but the term being used—(a) The healing of the demoniac (Mt 8<sup>28-34</sup>, Mk 5<sup>1-20</sup>, Lk 8<sup>26-39</sup>). The uncertainty in the name of the demoniac evidently on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, where the inhabitants were mainly Gentile (note Decapolis, Mk 5<sup>20</sup>). The keeping of so large a herd of swine betokens the presence of a Gentile population. (b) The centurion whose servant was healed (Mt 8<sup>5-13</sup>, Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup>). That the centurion was not a Jew appears from Lk 7<sup>5</sup>. (c) The healing of one deaf and dumb (Mk 7<sup>31-37</sup>). This was in the Greek region of Decapolis.

IV. CHRIST AND THE GRECIANS.—The Dispersion of the Jews had compulsory and voluntary causes. Large numbers of Israelites had been carried away captive by the Assyrians and Babylonians; and Pompey had taken many Jewish captives to Rome. But a much larger dispersion was due to voluntary emigration. From the time of Alexander the Great, Jewish colonies were gradually formed in the great commercial centres. Thus large numbers of Jews were to be found in Alexandria, in Antioch, in all the important cities on the Mediterranean, and even in Pontus. These Grecian Jews were representatives of Judaism among the Gentiles, and won large numbers of proselytes from heathenism.

The word 'Grecian' (Ἑλληνιστής) does not occur in the Gospels although, owing to the attendance of non-Palestinian Jews at the feasts and the residence of many in Palestine, our Saviour must often have met with Grecians. One reference only occurs, Jn 7<sup>35</sup>. The Jews wondered whether Christ would go to 'the dispersed among the Gentiles' (ἡ διασπορά τῶν Ἑλλήνων), and, from working among these Hellenistic Jews, proceed to teach even the Greeks (Ἑλλήνες). In this surmise they really anticipated the way in which Christianity found in the Grecian Jews a bridge by which it passed to the conquest of the Gentile world.

GREETINGS.—'To greet' and 'to salute' stand in NT for the same Gr. verb, ἀσπάζεσθαι. AV renders indifferently 'greet' and 'salute,' RV almost uniformly 'salute.' The exceptions are Ac 20<sup>1</sup> AV 'embraced,' RV 'took leave of'; Ac 21<sup>6</sup> AV 'took leave of,' RV 'bade farewell'; He 11<sup>13</sup> AV 'embraced,' RV 'greeted.' χαίρειν is used for 'and in imper in the sense of 'hail' ...; i.e. χαίρειν is the greeting, while ἀσπάζεσθαι is general, circumstances determining in each case what the greeting is. Thus in Mk 15<sup>31</sup> ἤρξαντο ἀσπάζεσθαι αὐτὸν Χαίρειν, 'they began to salute him, Hail.'

The Oriental has always attached great importance to the formal courtesies of life. However easy in demeanour and free in conversation he may be, the laws regulating social customs, sanctioned only by immemorial usage, are punctiliously observed. Any breach of these is regarded as a grave offence. His honour (sharaf), in all matters of ceremony, is very delicate and brittle, but strangely tough in things of greater moment. He will bear lightly an exposure that would cover us with perpetual shame; treat him with less formal respect than he desires, and he will fall into a paroxysm of rage over his 'broken honour.'

Greetings vary with the rank of parties, from the abject prostration of the subject before his sovereign, to the familiar kiss of friendly equals. One of humbler station salutes in silence, showing respect by bending his hand to the ground, then touching his lips and forehead. He will, at times, kiss the hand of his superior, and raise it to his brow. One ... another (Mk 7<sup>25</sup>), or begging a ... will fall down flat; while in token of utter submission one may kiss a benefactor's feet (Lk 7<sup>38, 45</sup>). Slaves or servants kiss the sleeve or skirt of their lord's clothing. To touch (Mt 9<sup>20</sup>) or kiss the hem of the garment indicates great reverence. Dervishes and other 'holy men' are thus saluted. In the Greek Church worshippers often kiss the skirt of the priest's robe. To kiss upon the cheek is a sign of warm affection (Lk 15<sup>20</sup>), of the love and esteem of friends. This stains with a darker infamy the treachery of Judas (Mt 26<sup>48</sup> etc.).

Usually the rider salutes the footman, the traveller those whom he passes on the wayside, the smaller party the larger (one ... for the rest in each case), and the young ... In a crowded street it is, of course, impossible to greet everyone. Only venerable sheikhs, or men distinguished by rank, wealth, or sacred learning, are saluted. The Jews freed the Rabbis from all obligation to salute. To be saluted 'Rabbi' was a coveted honour (Mt 23<sup>7</sup>, Mk 12<sup>38</sup>). They merely acknowledged the salutation and passed on. The Moslem salutes both on entering (Mt 10<sup>12</sup>) and on leaving a house.

To every form of salutation custom prescribes an answer. To use any other regarded as proof of ignorance or vulgarity. The common salutation is salām 'alayk, 'peace be upon you' (Lk 24<sup>36</sup>), to which the answer is, 'And upon you be peace.' It is a Moslem's duty to give this salutation to another; but it may be omitted without sin. When, however, the salutation is given, the Moslem is bound to return it. The Moslems claim this as 'the salutation of Islām, and not for the mouths of the heathen, with whom is no peace nor fellowship, neither in this world nor in the next' (Doughty, Araba Deserta, 1 503). Once Mr. Doughty was gravely imperilled because he 'had greeted with Salvum Aleik, which they [the Arabs] will have to be a salutation of God's people only—the Moslem' (ib ii. 369). If a Moslem by mistake give it to a non-Moslem, it should not be returned. On discovery the former may revoke it, as he does should a Moslem fail to return it, saying, 'Peace be on us and on the righteous worshippers of God' (Lk 10<sup>6</sup>). The insecure line of Hebrew and Arab, ever exposed to alarm of war or robber raid, no doubt responded to the greeting 'Peace'.

Arabic greetings are lengthy and wearisome. One Arab Doughty observes, 'The long nomad greetings . . . are for the most, to say over a dozen times with bashful solemnity the same cheif ent, cheif ent, "How dost thou" and how heartily again?' (ib i. 433). Dr. Mackie gives a good example of the more elaborate trifling of the Syrians (Bible Manners and Customs, p. 150). The phrases are set and conventional, the maximum of words conveying the minimum of meaning.

The Rabbis forbade one mourning for the dead to salute. Interruption of prayer was forbidden, even to salute a king, nay, to uncoil a serpent from the foot. The Rabbis all agreed that, to avoid distraction, no one should be saluted immediately before prayer (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, ii. 137). The nature of indicated above sufficiently explains these restrictions, and also enables us to understand the prohibition of Jesus, 'Salute no man by the way' (Lk 10<sup>4</sup>). The urgency of that mission could brook no such delays.

GROWING.—

Under this term students of the Greek Testament have to do with only one word—and that a verb, αἰσάνω. The consideration of the corresponding substantive does not properly form the subject of inquiry in this Dictionary. Rare in classical literature, αἰσάνω is used only twice in the NT, viz in Eph 4<sup>16</sup> and Col 2<sup>19</sup>. The verb is, however, employed some twelve times within the four Gospels. It is a verb of exceedingly doubtful derivation, but probably is etymologically linked with the German zu.

usage of the verb in the Classics from by some external agency. This significant and intransitive use of the verb is seen, a striking contrast with its use in the NT. Quotations are not needed. The verb is employed by classical writers from Homer downwards to mark efforts to increase the power of the State or of a country, of special honour paid to parents, of the exaggerations of orators, of the waxing of the moon, of the noontide heat of the sun, of the height of the waves of the sea. Enough to say that in classical literature the verb marks an increase or addition to a person or thing brought about by external agency.

The Hebrew language is very rich in terms which signify 'growth'. There are some 16 words, verbs and nouns substantive, which bear this general meaning. It is enough to say here that they are capable of a single classification. One set of expressions corresponds to אֲדָרָא in the sense already indicated, the other, which is preponderant, marks 'growth' of the physical or of seminal growth and is applied with a great wealth of illustration to the life of plants, trees, the brute creation, and of man himself. Every student of the Psalter or of the Prophetic books is aware of the word-pictures here in which the writers take delight, a delight which is spiritual more than intellectual, of the heart rather than the mind. The natural laws of physical development are by these writers boldly made to apply to the spiritual world. Jehovah, supreme in the one sphere, is supreme in the other. Growth is from within, but yet it is 'God'.

When the student turns to the idea of growth which finds expression there, he finds that there is a greater affinity of conception between the inspired writers of both Testaments than there is between the writers of the NT and classical Greek writers. The affinity simply lies in the comwith its spiritual applications, of a germinal and blossoming unto fruition whether in nature or in grace.

1. References in the Gospels—With the above preliminaries, the issue may now be considered in relation to the four Gospels. And first, the less careful student must be warned that the quotation which records the pathetic plea of the disciples to their Lord, 'Increase our faith,'* stands out as an exception. The translation [AV and RV] may serve, but it is doubtful whether 'our' is admissible. Despite the verb, it is questionable whether the disciples then asked for a growth of that spirit of which they were consciously possessed. Were they not rather asking for some gift new and strange to their experience? In any case growth of the physical order is not in place here; for this we must look, as has been shown, almost exclusively to the verb αἰσάνω. This verb is of frequent occurrence in the Gospels, although only once in the Fourth Evangelist,† when the Lord is rendered as expressing the growing authority of the new Teacher, and the increasing number of His adherents. It is interesting to observe that with regard to all other instances of the occurrence of this word, they either apply, as here, to the Lord Himself, or else form a part of His own utterances; nor is the interest of the point largely affected by the admission that our Lord would normally use Aramaic. The Evangelists doubtless discovered in the verb αἰσάνω what they wished to convey about His childhood, and what they understood Him to teach in lessons drawn from the natural world.

In his unique account of our Lord's childhood the Second Gospel records Him (Lk 2<sup>40</sup>) that which he has termed 'the child grew and waxed strong, filled with wisdom' [of the Baptist, 'in spirit']; that is, the development of Christ, both spiritually and physically, was normal and equable in its character. The phraseology of St Luke suggests a contrast with the Apocryphal Gospels, whose account of Christ's infancy makes Him appear a wonder-working prodigy, a phenomenal child, anxious for the display of supernatural powers. St. Luke will have none of this. He is not content with a single protest, for later (2<sup>52</sup>) he solemnly declares that as the child Jesus advanced in years so He developed in wisdom and in favour with God and men. Here, however, the 'growth' is not explicitly stated, the rare verb (προέκοπεν) used marking rather advancement, or progress triumphing over difficulties in the way.

The remaining instances of the verb αἰσάνω appear for the most part in our Lord's discourses. Thus it is seen to be a feature of the seed sown.‡ There is a process of secret assimilation between it and the soil; and growth, not sterility or a barren maturity, is the consequence. In the parable of the tares (Mt 6<sup>28</sup>, cf Lk 12<sup>24</sup>) between the lilies of the field and the garish splendour of Solomon's court dress, it is less upon the beauty of the flowers that Christ lays stress than upon their growth, gradual and all unconscious, spontaneous, effortless. In the parable of the Tares and Wheat this characteristic verb appears in the permission, at once generous and awful, of the master to his servants to let both grow together until the harvest (Mt 13<sup>30</sup>). In the same parabolic discourse it is the growth of the mustard-seed, the development of the surprisingly little, which furnishes an analogue of the spread of the Church universal (Mt 13<sup>31</sup>). Lastly, although we have not here the verb αἰξάνω, we find the mysterious condemnation passed upon the barren fig-tree (Mt 21<sup>19</sup>), a condemnation of that which is purely physical, sterility in fruit, which fruit in the world of men as in the life of plants and trees . . . of all true growth.

2. The . . .—It seems somewhat . . . the O.T. is so full of religious teaching . . . physical growth, that only in the one instance, quoted above, of our Lord's childhood is a spiritual application of the idea directly made in the Gospel narrative. Christ, we may reverently say it, was content to lay the conception which was ever before Him, in garden, harvest field, and orchard, also before His own. If they had eyes to see these things, and ears to hear them,—if they would only 'consider' (Lk 12<sup>24-27</sup>) them,—heart and conscience would do the rest. Then they, as we, would perceive this natural law in the spiritual world—a growing within, secret, beautiful, fertile, in men, and yet not of man, yielding the increase and harvest of the Spirit, His fruit rather than their works.

3. Application of the idea.—But if it is thought even by devout and careful students that such ideas are more . . . gathered from our Lord's actual . . . who treasured His sayings in the Apostolic age did not think so. St. Peter and St. Paul no longer use the idea of growing as a metaphor. . . fact both for the Church and the . . . Thus the Apostle of the Gentiles uses the conception of inward Christian growth (Eph 4<sup>15</sup>), and so as to form a shrine wherein the Divine presence may be manifest (2<sup>21</sup>); his prayer for his Colossian converts is that they may grow in further knowledge of God (Col 1<sup>10</sup>); his promise to them if they 'hold the Head' (2<sup>19</sup>), is that they shall grow with a Divine increase. Twice he assures the Corinthians (1 Co 3<sup>6</sup>) that this growth, although in them, has a Divine origin. St. Peter (1 P 2<sup>2</sup>, cf. [2 P 3<sup>17</sup>]) . . . that . . . have their own function in the . . . It is enough; the conception is carried through from one Testament to the other, and its teaching is consecrated, its consolation is secured in and through Him whom the great Evangelical . . . prefigured as the very symbol . . . There shall come forth a shoot . . . of Jesse, and a branch out of his roots shall bear fruit.' That fruit is still seen in every plant planted by the Divine Husbandman (Mt 15<sup>13</sup>).

GUARD.—1. RV rendering of κουστωδία (Lat. custodia), Mt 27<sup>68, 69</sup> 28<sup>31</sup>, AV 'watch'; obtained by the chief priests and Pharisees from Pilate to guard the sepulchre. The need of Pilate's authorization and the risk of punishment from him (Mt 28<sup>14</sup>) show that this guard must have consisted, not of the Jewish Temple police, but of soldiers from the Roman cohort at Jerusalem; possibly, though not probably, the same as had guarded the cross (ἐξερε, 27<sup>68</sup>, is probably imperative, 'have (take) a guard'). A watch usually consisted of four men (Polyb. vi. 33), each of whom watched in turn, while the others rested beside him so as to be roused by the least alarm; but in this case the guards may have been more numerous.

2. 'A soldier of his [ἑαυτοῦ] guard' (RV tr. of σπεκουλάριον, Lat. speculator, AV 'executioner') beheaded John the Baptist, Mk 6<sup>27</sup>. Speculatores were originally spies or scouts (from specula, 'a look-out'); but we find them chiefly employed (a) as messengers or couriers, carrying official despatches; (b) as military executioners. A certain number were attached to each legion, besides others belonging to the . . . who were closely attached to the Emperor's person and ready for any special service. There are many examples in classical writers (e.g. Seneca, de Ira, i. ii. 4), Acts of Martyrs, and Rabbinic writings, of their employment as executioners; for reff. see Schurer, Wetstein, etc. The Herods had bodyguards (δορυφόροι, σωματοφύλακες, Jos. BJ i xxxiii. 7-9, II. xv 1, etc.), and may have given them the Roman title of speculatores; or the word may here be used generally for an executioner. Herod sent some of his guards (δορυφόροι) to kill his son Antipater (Ant. XVII. vii 1, BJ i xxxiii. 7).

HAROLD SMITH.

GUEST.—Hospitality was, and to a large extent still is, one of the chief virtues of Oriental life. This was due in large measure to the nomadic character of Eastern peoples, among whom there was no provision for the traveller apart from private entertainment. The casual passer-by, the unknown stranger, even the enemy, were welcomed to tent or house, provided with food and lodging, waited on often by the host himself, and dismissed without being expected or even allowed to pay for their entertainment. Even yet, where the influence of travellers and tourists from the West has not corrupted the ancient manners, the offer of payment is regarded as an insult. The practice of ages has invested . . . with a peculiar sacredness: a breach . . . is an almost unheard of disgrace. . . real . . . the East is the idea that every . . . Ullah, 'the guest of God.' The host himself is a sojourner (Heb. gēr, Arab. jar) with God; the stranger is a fellow-guest, and loyalty to God demands that he should be hospitably entertained. Not unlike this, though on a higher plane, is the teaching of Jesus as to God's knowledge of and provision for our needs, which frees the trustful, childlike heart from all undue anxiety (Mt 6<sup>25-34</sup>, Lk 12<sup>22-31</sup>).

In the Gospels, however, it is not the free hospitality of the nomad desert life that meets us, but the more restricted hospitality of the town, of meals and banquets.

The word 'guest' occurs in AV of the Gospels only in Mt 22<sup>10f</sup> (in the parable of the Wedding Feast), where 'guests' = ἀνακείμενοι; and in Lk 14<sup>7</sup>, where 'to be guest' (RV 'to lodge') = καταλίσσιναι. The Gr. καταλίσσιναι . . . the reclining posture then . . . only in reference to meals or . . . 'sit at meat' (e.g. Mt 9<sup>10</sup> 26<sup>7</sup>). In Jn 13<sup>40</sup> ἀνακείμενος is rendered in RV 'at the table' . . . The same word is used in Jn 6<sup>11</sup> in the narrative of . . . of the 5000, though they, of course, had neither couch nor table. In a few passages καταλίσσιναι occurs, with the same reference to reclining at table; e.g. Lk 7<sup>36</sup> (of a meal at which Jesus was present as a guest) 14<sup>8</sup> (in Christ's warning against seeking the chief places); cf. art. GUEST-CHAMBER. The cognate verb ἀνακλίνω is similarly used several times, e.g. Mt 8<sup>11</sup> 14<sup>19</sup> etc.

During His ministry Jesus was frequently invited to be guest in private houses. Thus Matthew (Levi) entertained Him when He had called him from the 'place of toll' (Lk 5<sup>27ff.</sup> ||); Martha 'received him into her house' (Lk 10<sup>38ff.</sup>); Zacchæus 'received him joyfully' (Lk 19<sup>7ff.</sup>). He was one of the guests at the marriage in Cana of Galilee (Jn 2<sup>1ff.</sup>), and after His resurrection He 'sat down to meat' in the house of the two disciples at Emmaus (Lk 24<sup>30</sup>). The Pharisees complained bitterly of His eating with publicans and sinners, yet several of them invited Him to be their guest (Lk 7<sup>36ff.</sup> 11<sup>37ff.</sup> 14<sup>1ff.</sup>), not, as it seems, with the purest motives of hospitality. The words of Jesus to His host on one of these occasions (Lk 7<sup>36ff.</sup>) different words in the (a) ὁδηγέω (from ὁδηγός) in Jn 16<sup>13</sup>. ὁδηγός also in Mt 15<sup>14</sup>, Lk 6<sup>39</sup> (cf. Ac 8<sup>31</sup>, Rev 7<sup>17</sup>), but is there rendered 'lead' in AV, which RV again properly changes to 'guide' (b) κατευθύνω (lit. 'to make straight'), which occurs only once in Gospels (Lk 17<sup>9</sup>; but cf. 1 Th 3<sup>11</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>5</sup>). An ὁδηγός contrast might be drawn between the 'blind leaders of the blind' (Mt 15<sup>14</sup> 23<sup>16</sup>, Lk 6<sup>39</sup>), and the true ὁδηγός (who is also Himself ἡ ὁδός, Jn 14<sup>6</sup>), who came into the world to 'set our feet straight' into the way of peace (Lk 17<sup>9</sup>), who promised before His departure that He would send the Spirit of truth to guide His people into all the truth (Jn 16<sup>13</sup>), and who will Himself hereafter 'guide them to life-giving springs of water' (Rev 7<sup>17</sup>). With Christ as ὁδηγός of His people cf. the ἀρχηγός of Ac 3<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>31</sup>, He 2<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>2</sup>.

2. Christ as our Guide—To communities and to individuals, otherwise walking in darkness, Christ is their Guide, the Shepherd leading His sheep, the Light preceding His people. There can be only one Guide,—a man cannot follow the lode-star and also make for every flickering will-o'-the-wisp that allures and entices him. Christ has deliberately and firmly of mankind. He bade follow, not the Law as such, nor even God as unincarnate, but the Law-in-character and the God-in-man. (Mt 16<sup>24</sup>, Jn 12<sup>26</sup>). His guidance is to be universal in its scope (Jn 14<sup>9</sup>), and will be sufficient in its nature (Jn 21<sup>24</sup>). Without Him the mass of men are as sheep without a shepherd (Mt 9<sup>36</sup>). He alone reveals God to man (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>), and the goal of man's being. He taught, one having unique authority (Mt 7<sup>29</sup>), and rightly draws all men to Himself (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>). He Himself, and no other conceivably or possibly, is the Way as well as the Truth and the Life (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). Hence the warning: 'Take heed that no man lead you astray' (Mk 13<sup>5</sup>). And so, on the other hand, the impossibility of the Christian's seeking any other guidance, expressed in St. Peter's exclamation: 'Lord, to whom shall we go?' (Jn 6<sup>68</sup>). Of this sole claim and the three chosen disciples heard the glory of the Transfiguration. 'This is my beloved Son. hear ye him' (Mk 9). This guidance Christ gives to His follower by His Holy Spirit, guiding into all the truth (Jn 16<sup>13</sup>); and revealing through the Holy Scriptures, which He can make plain (Lk 24<sup>27</sup> 45). Christ Himself ratified the guidance afforded by Scripture at crises of His life, in which example and precept were wedded together in indissoluble union, as in the Temptation, the Cleansing of the Temple, and on the Cross (Lk 4 19 23).

To put it in another way, the Father's will was Christ's will, even to the uttermost: 'Not what I will, but what thou wilt' (Mk 14<sup>36</sup>). So Christ guides us to union with God, our true destiny; through Him we come to the Father (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). Hence His guidance is into peace (Lk 17<sup>9</sup>), as the aged Zacharias felt and declared. It is the steady, unvarying guidance of the heart towards its Divine home, the love of God, as the name Immanuel suggests (Mt 1<sup>23</sup>). It is an absolute guidance, or no guidance (Lk 9<sup>57</sup> 62).

GUILT.—See DECEIT.

GUILT is the state of the sinner before God, whereby, becoming the object of God's wrath, he incurs the debt and punishment of death. So closely are Sin, Guilt, and Death connected, both in the OT and NT, that the terms are almost interchangeable, and can be adequately discussed only in relation to one another (see art. SIN). It will suffice in the present article to show that the removal of guilt was the object of Christ's death, and that the recognition of sin as guilt is in consequence if not the primary feature of the NT concerning sin.

1. The gospel, as first preached by the Baptist (Mt 3<sup>2</sup>) and Jesus Himself (Mk 1<sup>15</sup>, Mt 4<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>7</sup>), was the Kingdom of God. Even the Fourth Evangelist, who usually presents it as Eternal Life, witnesses to this fact (Jn 3<sup>3</sup> 5). The message, therefore, as coupled with the summons to repentance, involves a restoration of personal relations, God reigning in the midst of a reconciled people. Baptism, though the symbolism of cleansing is 'unto remission' (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>, Lk 3<sup>3</sup>) rather than 'washing away of sins', remission being not a vital act by which sinners are made just, but a personal favour (Mt 6<sup>12</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>) by which they are accounted righteous. The risen Lord expressly carries on this view of His atoning work into the proclamation of the completed Christian gospel. Remission of sins was to be preached in His name among all the nations (Lk 24<sup>47</sup>, cf. Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). To this message the primitive preaching shows an exact fidelity (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 5<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>43</sup> 13<sup>38</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>). The expression 'blotted out' in Ac 3<sup>19</sup> emphasizes forgiveness as the cancelling of an account. And the statement of St. Paul in Ac 17<sup>30</sup> (cf. Ro 3<sup>25</sup>), that God had 'overlooked' the times of ignorance, again gives prominence to the personal nature of sin.

It is the guilt rather than the nature of sin which appears in the teaching of Jesus. The analogy between disease and sin, which the miracles of healing suggest, might appear to show the contrary. But it is doubtful whether the transition from the sickness of the body to that of the soul would have occurred itself to the Hebrew in this form, and even through the conception of suffering as the punishment of sin. It is this, for example, that makes the problem of the 'marred visage' of Jehovah's Servant (Is 52<sup>13-15</sup> 53). And the interpretation given by our Lord Himself in the case of the paralytic seems to be decisive. His power to cure the body is the evidence, not of His power to heal the soul, but of His authority (ἐξουσία) to forgive sins (Mk 2<sup>10</sup>). It is the 'debts' which remain as the 'trespasses' for which the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6<sup>12</sup>, Lk 11<sup>4</sup>); and when we crave deliverance, it is not from the sick will, but from the 'Evil One' (Mt 6<sup>13</sup>), the personal enemy of God who has received a guilty allegiance. The importance of sin is further marked by the human forgiveness as the condition of Divine remission (Mt 6<sup>14</sup> 15 18<sup>21-35</sup>). What therefore, is removed is not, in the first instance, the subjective consequences, but an objective result of sin. If it be urged that Christ discharges the latter only in virtue of the fact that He destroys the former, as the words 'it is he that shall save his people from their sins' (Mt 1<sup>21</sup>, but cf. Ro 5<sup>9</sup>), the Saviour is here represented as Saviour in the sense in which Messiah was to save, and that this is determined by the meaning of 'salvation' as developed in the theology of the OT. The root idea of the Messianic salvation is liberation not remedy (Ex 14<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>2</sup>, Is 45<sup>17</sup> 46<sup>13</sup> 52<sup>10</sup>, Lk 1<sup>69</sup> 71 77).

Again, attention must be paid to the promise given to judgment, especially the Day of Judgment, in the Synoptic narrative. Mt 5<sup>25-26</sup> 10<sup>13</sup> 11<sup>20-24</sup> 12<sup>31-32</sup> 16<sup>19</sup> 24<sup>31</sup> 25<sup>31</sup> 26<sup>44</sup>, Lk 12<sup>58</sup> 59). The unquenchable fire is not merely the automatic result of sin bringing forth death, but punishment inflicted by judicial sentence (Mk 9<sup>43</sup> 48, Mt 25<sup>41</sup>). The wicked are workers of iniquit. . . . or idle words and deeds (Mt 12<sup>36</sup>); . . . against the Holy Spirit, however it be interpreted, incurs condemnation as the unpardonable sin (Mk 3<sup>28-29</sup>, Mt 12<sup>31-32</sup>). It is the personal relation, and therefore the guilt of sin, which appears in the parables of the Lost Sheep, etc (Lk 15). The joy of the angels is represented as arising out of the reconciliation between the Father and the penitent (Lk 15<sup>10</sup>). The expiatory character of the Cross is not so fully evident. But Jesus gives His life a ransom (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>); the Agony was a cup given by His Father (Mk 14<sup>36</sup>); the sorrow of death was the forsaking by God (Mk 15<sup>34</sup>); the peace of Calvary the self-committal to the Father (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>).

2. The Gospel of St. John, dwelling, as it does, upon the gift of God as life, truth, and light, might seem on a superficial reading to obscure, if not to ignore, the view of sin as guilt. But even the Prologue couples grace, or God's free favour, with truth as that which came by Jesus Christ, and that in antithesis to the Law given by Moses (Jn 1<sup>17</sup>). The witness of the Baptist is to the Lamb of God (1<sup>29, 36</sup>), a sacrificial term involving expiation (19<sup>36</sup>; cf. Ex 12<sup>46</sup>, Nu 9<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, Jn 6<sup>52</sup> with Westcott's note). To believe on the name of the Son of God is to escape judgment (Jn 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>24</sup>). It is 'accusation to the Father which the Jews have to fear' (5<sup>45</sup>). Through Christ we come to the Father (1<sup>40</sup>). The commission of the risen Christ to His disciples is to forgive and retain sins (20<sup>23</sup>, cf. Mt 16<sup>19</sup> 18<sup>18</sup>). It is the confession and forgiveness of sins which the First Epistle represents as effecting . . . sin and . . . through . . . and heavenly intercession of our Advocate with the Father (1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>). The use of ἀνομία, 'lawlessness,' as a synonym for ἀμαρτία, 'sin,' implies . . . of a broken law (3<sup>4</sup>). The condemnation . . . of the heart reflects the . . . of God (3<sup>7</sup>). In the . . . is set . . . to Him that sitteth . . . (Rev 4<sup>5</sup>). His wrath (6<sup>16</sup>), noted in His books . . . and receiving His plagues (15<sup>1</sup>).

3. It is difficult to set forth St. Paul's view of guilt without entering upon the whole question of his view of sin. But a few considerations will make it clear that he looks at sin, in the first instance, as incurring guilt. It is represented as an act committed against God (Ro 1<sup>18</sup>). All its essential features are recapitulated in each individual sin or transgression. It is only through the Law that it can appear as what it is (3<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>7</sup>). It can only be separated from its actual manifestations by being represented, not as a . . . cause of these, but as itself an act of . . . on the part of Adam (5<sup>19</sup>). Death is not so much its consequence as its punishment or wages (5<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>23</sup>), not following automatically, but inflicted by the sentence of an offended God (1<sup>18</sup>, Eph 5<sup>6</sup>, Col 3<sup>6</sup>). It involves responsibility (Ro 1<sup>20</sup>), desert (1<sup>32</sup>), condemnation (5<sup>16</sup> 18). The work of Christ is primarily an act of . . . (5<sup>18</sup>, 19, Ph 2<sup>8</sup>), undoing the act . . . in which all sin is included; an offering for sin condemning sin in the flesh (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>), and wiping off the score of trespasses (Col 2<sup>14</sup>). Its effect in the broadest view is a reversal of the sentence of condemnation (Ro 8<sup>1</sup>) and reconciliation with God (5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>18-20</sup>). St. Paul's view of the function of law must here be remembered. The analogy of a therapeutic drug, administered in order that the disease may declare itself, is apt to mislead. This is not in the Apostle's thought. For trespasses or transgressions are themselves sin, not merely its symptoms (Eph 2<sup>5</sup>). It is the removal of these, not of a cause distinguishable from them, which is the purpose of the Cross (Ro 4<sup>25</sup>; cf. 5<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>31</sup>). Death, which passed upon all men in consequence of . . . 5<sup>12</sup>), reigned from Adam to Moses (5<sup>1</sup>). . . . is that of a ruler to whose sway all men have as a penalty been judicially consigned, and from whose custody the free favour of God in Christ releases them. 'All have sinned' (5<sup>12</sup>), whether with or without an explicit publication of law. St. Paul would not have allowed that through an involuntary taint of heredity men had at any time suffered without personal guilt. The Gentiles have the Law, being enlightened by conscience (2<sup>14</sup> 15; cf. Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>). Though the Law is not explicitly revealed, they are in effect transgressors. If in Ro 4<sup>15</sup> St. Paul declares that 'the law worketh wrath,' because 'where there is no law, neither is there transgression,' in Gal 3<sup>19</sup> he says rather that the Law was added (προσέτεθη), came in between the promise and its fulfilment, because of transgressions, i.e. to bring home unmistakably to those who were already guilty the conviction of their offences.

S. . . . evidence of the doctrine of . . . pressing the forensic metaphor to a point inconsistent with St. Paul's thought, which would relegate the whole theology of guilt to a region of formal conceptions unchecked by experience, we are bound to remember that the Apostle is concerned with the probation of guilt assumed to exist, which is necessary before the sinner can throw himself upon the offer of free salvation secured to him through the gospel. Justification is not in itself a change of character, a transformation of life, but an alteration of status (Ro 5<sup>1, 2</sup>, Eph 2<sup>13</sup>), a reversal of relations whereby the 'servants of sin' (Ro 6<sup>17</sup>), 'the children of wrath' (Eph 2<sup>3</sup>) become 'children of grace,' 'sons of God' (Gal 3<sup>26</sup>). It is the antithesis of trespasses (Ro 4<sup>25</sup>), no more to be confused with sanctification, which is its fruit (6<sup>22</sup>), than is transgression with uncleanness, which is its issue (12<sup>14</sup>). To be justified from sin is to have . . . (6<sup>12-14</sup>), involving an obedience or yielding of the members. This is entirely in harmony with the conception of sin, from which St. Paul starts, as a voluntary withdrawal of allegiance admitting of no excuse.

We shall be saved from confusion with regard to the Pauline view of guilt, and the necessity of conforming the whole doctrine of sin to this primary idea, by considering what he means by 'adoption' and 'grace.' There is no clear instance in any Epistle of the use of the word χάρις . . .

In some passages, apart from other . . . admits of the . . . (Eph 4<sup>7</sup>). But the root idea is the free favour of God through Christ (Ro 4<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>15</sup>). It is not, therefore, an imparted gift, but . . . gain, the conception of sonship . . . the believer to God, while . . . nature, gives prominence rather to the elective purpose of the Father (Eph 1<sup>5</sup>). It is not reached as a deduction from membership in Christ, as though the highest action of Divine grace were nothing more than the operation of a natural law. Modern theology, with its leading idea of solidarity has tended to obscure the personal action of the Father in . . . St. Paul's thought, on the other hand, is anchored to the elective conception of the . . . rather than primogeniture (Ex 1<sup>12</sup>, Jer 31<sup>1</sup>, Ps 89<sup>27</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup>, cf. Job 19<sup>31</sup>, 1-11). Thus the Christian attains his rank in the family of God by adoption (Gal 4<sup>1</sup>, Eph 1<sup>11</sup>, cf. Gal 3<sup>26</sup>), where sonship is presented as a privilege granted . . . The Spirit which makes him a member of Christ is the Spirit of adoption (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>) . . . God to those whom He takes for His children (Gal 4<sup>6</sup>, Ro 8<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>23</sup>). Membership in Christ is thus rather the result than the cause of the filial relation. The Christian life depends, not upon the eradication of evil, but upon the forgiveness of sins (Eph 1<sup>7</sup>), the clearing of the guilty on the part of a personal God in consequence of the personal satisfaction offered by Christ (Ro 3<sup>21-25</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, cf. Ex 34<sup>7</sup>). This view of sonship, as involving God's elective purpose and man's free response, frequently underlies St. Paul's argument. Isaac is the child of promise (Gal 3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>28</sup> 28, Ro 4<sup>20</sup> 9<sup>8</sup>), Abraham is the faithful (Gal 3<sup>7</sup>, Ro 4<sup>12</sup>). The redemption . . . an 'adoption' (Ro 8<sup>23</sup>).

4. The Epistle to the Hebrews brings out the various elements in the conception of human guilt with conspicuous clearness. We have to do with the living God (He 3<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>31</sup>), who is a . . . fire (12<sup>29</sup>), self-existent and separate from . . . (12<sup>18-21</sup>), the supreme lawgiver and judge (10<sup>30</sup> 12<sup>23</sup>), whom to see, therefore, demands a purifying separation on the part of His suppliant worshipper (9<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>). What men need is boldness to approach His throne (4<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>19</sup>), and so to enter into His rest (4<sup>10</sup>). But there is an obstacle, typified by propitiatory rites and attested by universal experience (9<sup>10-10</sup> 10<sup>31</sup>). The comers thereunto need a τελειωσις (2<sup>10</sup> 11), the accomplishment of a preliminary act of satisfaction (2<sup>17</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>) which shall render them competent. The experience, which justifies the fulfilment of rites felt to be inadequate, is the fear of death (2<sup>15</sup>), the spirit of bondage (ψ), the evil conscience (10<sup>22</sup>). This is not the same thing as ignorance, error, or infirmity (5<sup>2</sup>), all of which are recognized as present in human character and requiring to be dealt with. It is the consciousness that the offerer has a past which repentance cannot separate from him in respect of his relation to the Everliving (10<sup>2</sup> 3 26 27), a record of offences for which none but One who Himself 'ever liveth' can atone by an abiding intercession (7<sup>25</sup>, cf. 10<sup>12</sup>). The conscience must be purged from dead works (9<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>), which are to be distinguished from their present results in character. The 'redemption of transgressions' (9<sup>15</sup>; cf. Ac 17<sup>30</sup>, Ro 3<sup>24</sup>, 25), the removal of a burden (2<sup>15</sup> εὐοχου δουλείας, cf. Ja 2<sup>10</sup>), is the method whereby consecration to God's service and boldness of access are secured. Even sanctification itself in Hebrews (12<sup>14</sup>, cf. 2<sup>9-11</sup> 10<sup>10</sup>, 14 13<sup>12</sup>) is, not indeed the formal consecration of the sinner, but the removal of the 'weight' of guilt (12<sup>1</sup>), of which the fulness of faith (10<sup>22</sup>) is the counterpart in spiritual experience.

5. That guilt is original, . . . kind, and may be predicated of each individual before particular evidence of transgression, is implied in the facts of redemption (see art. SIN), and . . . taught in the NT. In the famous passage, Ro 5:12, nothing is said of a transmitted tendency to sin, though it has been often supposed that this is implied. But St. Paul does say that death 'passed unto all men' through Adam's . . . The context shows that death is . . . inflicted by God. And guilt is . . . a remarkable sentence 'all have sinned,' which interprets the statement that 'through one man sin entered.' How St. Paul reached this apparent paradox seems clear from a consideration of Jewish theology. The OT bears abundant witness to the belief that the sins (plural) of the fathers are 'visited' upon the children (Ex 20<sup>5</sup> 34<sup>7</sup>), while at the same time the teaching of Ezekiel balances it by an emphatic vindication of the separate responsibility of each soul (Ez 18<sup>4-20</sup>). Apart from the narrative of the Fall, which indicates a penalty involving the seed of the woman (Gn 3<sup>15</sup>, 16), this is, perhaps as far as the OT carries us. But the Book of Wisdom (2<sup>24</sup>) represents death as entering the world through the envy of the devil, and Sirach (25<sup>24</sup>) declares that sin originated from a woman, and 'because of her we all die.' The teaching of the Rabbis, however, differentiating the actual transgression of Adam from the potentiality of sin involved in his creation, expressly asserts that death was decreed against the generations of Adam. Elsewhere death is spoken of as incurred by the personal guilt of each individual, and the statement of the Ἀποστολὴ of Baruch (54<sup>15</sup>, 19), that 'each of us is the Lord of his own soul,' looks like an attempt to express a mystery which alone can reconcile these divergent views. According to Weber (J. J. Theol. p. 216), the net result of Talmudic teaching appears to be that 'by the Fall man came under a curse, is guilty of death, and his right relation to God is rendered difficult.' It is probably only in the sense of transmitted taint that Edersheim (Life and Times, etc. i. p. 165 ff.) disallows original sin as part of the doctrine of the older Rabbis; for, in common with other writers, he acknowledges the frequent assertion of inherited guilt. That St. Paul was familiar with this prevalent view hardly admits of doubt, or that he availed himself of it to interpret the relation of Jesus the Messiah to the whole human race, as giving the victory over sin, the wages of which is death (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>), and the power of which is the outraged law (1 Co 15<sup>56</sup>).

GULF (χάσμα, from χαίρω, to yawn, gape, open wide, Lk 16<sup>26</sup> only. Chasma (shortened, chasm) is the exact transliteration of the Greek, but this word, in general use, is later than the AV. Tindale has 'a great space,' and the Geneva VS 'a great gulfe,' with 'swallowing pit' in the margin).—It is interesting to compare with this other representations of the division between the worlds of the unseen. In Plato's vision in the Republic there is an intermediate space where judges are seated, who divide to the right hand or to the left according as men are found just or unjust. Return to the upper world is possible; but when any incurable or unpunished sinners tried to ascend, 'the opening, instead of receiving them, gave forth a sound, and then wild men of fiery aspect, who were standing by and knew what the sound meant, seized and carried them to be cast into hell (Jowett's Plato, iii. 512 f.). Virgil's vision is of 'a cavern, deep and huge, with its vast mouth, craggy, sheltered by its black lake and forest gloom, o'er which no birds might speed along unharmed; such an exhalation, pouring from its black jaws, rose to the vault of heaven; wherefore the Greeks named the spot Avernus.' The 'dreadful pit-on-hill' is guarded by a 'gate of ponderous size with pillars of solid adamant; so that no mortal might, nay, nor the dwellers in the sky, are strong enough to throw it down in war' (Aeneid, vi. 236 f., 553 f.). Coming to Jewish representations, the Book of Enoch speaks of three separations between the spirits of the dead,—'by a chasm, by water, and by light above it' (ch. 22). In Rabbinical . . . cf. Weber, Jud. Theol. 2 341) the . . . Paradise and Ge-hinnom is minimized; it is but 'a wall,' 'a palm-breadth' . . . 'a thread.' With this representation the 'gulfe' of the parable is in striking contrast. It would be obviously wrong to interpret literally, or even to insist upon some spiritual counterpart of the detail of the parable, as it would be wrong to base upon the parable as a whole any doctrine of the future over and above its clear moral lesson and warning. But the solemn words of Jesus as to the possibility and danger of the future of character in evil must not be lightly set aside (see ETERNAL SIN).

HADES.—See DEAD, ESCHATOLOGY, and HELL (DESCENT INTO).

HAIR.—The Jews seem to have shared with other peoples the belief that the hair is really 'a living and important part of the body' (W. R. Smith, ES<sup>2</sup> 324; Frazer, Golden Bough<sup>2</sup>, iii. 390). This lent importance to the oath by the head which was common among them (Mt 5<sup>36</sup>), and it accounts for the reference to the hair in connexion with vows (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>; Jos. BJ II. xv. 1; on hair as offering and in vows see W. R. Smith, l.c. 323 ff; Frazer, l.c. i. 370 ff). In NT times long hair was regarded as a glory of women, but a disgrace to men (1 Co 11<sup>14-15</sup>). Opinion had changed since the days of Absalom.

Among the Arabs the ancient sentiment survives. Many stalwart men, not merely 'immature lads' (RS<sup>2</sup> 326), take pride in their long glossy locks. It is interesting also to note a change from the NT attitude to women's hair. The Jews in Pol. 1 married woman to wear her own hair, it must be shaved before the wedding, and replaced by a high head-dress of wool or silk. It is a terrible rule (Hosmer, 'The Jews,' p. 363, in Story of

It was customary to dress the hair with ointment (Mt 6<sup>17</sup>), and women bestowed much care upon the coiffure (1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>8</sup>). It was a shame for a woman to appear with locks unbound and hair dishevelled.

Lightfoot (Wor. i. 155) notes that in the office of high priests, they asked of her how she came to this hon. . . . The priest unloosed the hair of the suspected woman, about to be tried by the bitter water, for the trial (Sofa, fol. 5. 1).

When Mary (Jn 12<sup>8</sup>) wiped the feet of Jesus with her hair, she thus 'testified that, as no sacrifice was too costly for her purse, so no service was too mean for her person' (Godet, in loc.).

Abundant hair on head and chin has always been regarded by Easterns as lending manhood, and the beard is an object of reverence. 'I smooth my beard,' says 'toward one to admonish him in his wrongful dealing with me, and have put him in mind of his honour. If I touch his beard, I put him in remembrance of our common humanity, and of the witness of God above us. The beard is taken in Arabia for human honour, and to pluck it is the highest indignity. Of an honest man they say, "His is a good beard"; of a vile, covetous heart, "He has no beard"' (Arabia Deserta, i. 268). What indignity then He suffered of whom the prophet wrote, 'I gave . . . my cheeks to them that plucked off the fair' (Is 50<sup>6</sup>).

Single hairs are taken to illustrate the minuteness of God's care (Mt 10<sup>30</sup>, Lk 12<sup>7</sup> 21<sup>18</sup>). White hair are a symbol of reverend and glorious majesty (Rev 1<sup>14</sup>). The long hair, as of women, adds to the grotesque and terrible appearance of the locust monsters (Rev 9<sup>8</sup>).

The Baptist's garment of camel's hair (θριξ καμήλου, Mt 3<sup>4</sup>) is identical with θριξ ζαφίρου or Zec 13<sup>7</sup>, and that of the prototype (2 K 1<sup>8</sup>), where we should read with RVm 'a man with a garment of hair'. The rough outer cloak generally worn is of goats' hair. Wabar al-wibil, the hair, or wool, (θριξ can also mean 'wool,' IL iii 273, Hes. Op 515) of the camel is softer, and of this an inner cloak is often worn, e.g. in winter by the fishermen on the Sea of Galilee.

Goats' hair is not named in NT, but most likely this was the material in which the Apostle Paul wrought at his trade (Ac 18<sup>3</sup>), his native province supplying it in great quantities.

HALL.—'Hall' appears in the AV in a way to cause not a little confusion, as tr. sometimes of αὐλή and sometimes of πραιτώριον. In Mt 27<sup>27</sup> AV has 'the soldiers of the governor took Jesus into the common hall' (a circumlocution for πραιτώριον). In Mk 15<sup>16</sup> AV has 'into the hall called Prætorium,' as tr. of ἔσω τῆς αὐλῆς ὅ ἐστιν πραιτώριον. RV has not entirely relieved this confusion. The English Revisers render πραιτώριον by 'palace,' following Rhem.; while the American Revisers, more literally, give prætorium, the Latin word which was carried over, transliterated, into the Greek, and which denoted originally the prætor's tent or abode, or the general's headquarters. Tindale introduced 'court' for πραιτώριον, and is followed by AV 15<sup>16</sup> etc. The AV renders αὐλή by 'palace' in Mt 26<sup>68</sup>, Mk 14<sup>64</sup>, Lk 11<sup>21</sup>, Jn 18<sup>16</sup>, when the reference is to the place where the governor dispensed justice; by 'fold' in Jn 10<sup>1-16</sup> of the place where the sheep were kept at night; and by 'court' in Rev 11<sup>2</sup>, as designating the court of the temple. RV more consistently renders αὐλή by 'court' instead of 'palace,' everywhere except in Jn 10<sup>1</sup> ἡ αὐλή τῶν προβάτων, where it has 'the fold of the sheep' (cf. AV 'sheepfold'), and in v. 16, where it has simply 'fold.' Cf. Mt 26<sup>68</sup>, where the inner court of the high priest's official residence seems to be meant; in v. 11 'Peter sat without in the palace' (AV); 'without' stands in contrast with the audience-room in which Jesus was appearing before the authorities, i.e. Peter was not in the room of the official residence where the trial was going on, but out in the open court, around which the house was built; and this was 'beneath,' or on a lower level than the audience-room. See also COURT, PRÆTORIUM.

HALLEL ('praise').—A technical Hebrew liturgical term, applied in Rabbinical literature to certain Psalms and psalm-pieces of praise, which characterize as their keynote the expression 'Praise ye Jah'. It is more particularly applied to one group of Psalms (113-118) regarded as a liturgical unit (so always in the Synagogue-liturgy).

Pss 113-118 form 'the Hallel' הַהַלֵּל, as distinguished from the 'Hallel of Egypt' (Pss 113-114) and the 'great Hallel' (הלל הגדול) which is usually understood to mean Ps 136. In T. 1 Midrash, however, the Psalms 113-118 are variously given, viz.: (1) Pss 113-118, and (2) Pss 120-136. The question is discussed in Ps. v. 7. See, further, Joel Muller, note on Ps. v. 7 (p. 253). In one passage of the Mishna (P. 113-118) is designated 'Hallelujah.' For 'half-Hallel' see below.

1. Origin.—In its present form the Psalm-group (113-118) seems clearly to have been compiled for liturgical purposes at a comparatively late date. The most probable view is that the collection was formed in Maccabæan times for recitation on the Feast of Hanukkah (Dedication), on the eight days of which it is still chanted in the synagogue.

Ps 113 (This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it) points to some day of public thanksgiving, vv 424 suggest the Syrian war, and recovery of and entrance into the Temple. At the same time, the collection embodies other elements. Thus Ps 118<sup>29</sup> seems to be an old song of praise for the Feast of Tabernacles. With this agrees the fact that, . . . an old tradition preserved in the Jerusalem Tal. . . iv 5*), the Hallel was recited on 'eighteen days and one night of the year—the eight days of Tabernacles, the eight of Hänukkah, Pentecost (one day), and the first day . . . It is noticeable that Tal. . . st in this list, and it should be remembered that the latter feast seems originally to have . . . a sort of extension or reduplication of the . . . ( . . . 19), Cheyne (OP p. 33, note n) remarks 'that the recitation of the Hallel on these occasions [Dedication and Tabernacles] goes back to Simon can hardly be doubted . . . be seen in the . . . five psalms in the Hallel, Ps 115 not being regarded. The LXX eat the latter psalm as part of Ps 114 of the smaller Midrashim is as follows: . . . -fifths, the Psalter of five-fifths, and the Hallel of five-fifths.'

* הַהַלֵּל הַקָּטָן Ber. 56a. See J. Muller, op. cit. p. 288. In a baraita (Bab. Shabb. 118b) Pss 145-148 are apparently called a 'Hallel.'

2. Jewish liturgical usage.—As already stated, the Hallel, according to tradition, was . . . recited at the Feasts of Tabernacles, . . . Pentecost, and Passover (first day and preceding night).†

On certain other days of the year it became customary to recite the Hallel, viz. on the last 6 days of Passover, and on new moons other than the new moon of Tishri (which introduces the solemn penitential period). But this usage was apparently late and unauthorized. This is shown (a) by the omission on these days of two sections of the complete Hallel, viz. Ps 115<sup>1-11</sup> and 116<sup>1-11</sup>, § and (b) that both Rashi and Maimonides . . . the use of the regular benediction before . . . the ground . . . these days was merely a pious custom.

The recitation of the Hallel is preceded and followed by special blessings.‡ Certain parts are also recited with a responsive refrain:

(a) The first four verses of Ps 118 are said by the Reader, the people responding after each: 'O give thanks unto the Lord; for He is good. For His mercy endureth for ever.' (b) The last nine verses of the same Psalm are also repeated, in part alternately, in part together, by Reader and congregation.

According to the Mishna (Pes. v. 7), which embodies old and (there is every reason to believe) trustworthy traditions as to the Temple-ritual, the complete Hallel was recited by the Levites during the slaughter of the Paschal lambs in the Temple-courts.¶ The use of Hallel in the Paschal meal at home, when the lamb was eaten, must be carefully distinguished from the above. Here the data are somewhat conflicting.

According to the Mishna (Pes. x. 6 and 7), the Hallel was here recited in two parts, and this is still the custom at the Jewish Paschal meal. The first part (Pss 113-114) immediately follows the Haggadah proper (the narrative of redemption) and precedes the drinking of the second cup of wine, . . . closed by a special benediction for . . . second part (Pss 115-118, followed by 119 an . . . Song) follows after the mixing of the fourth cup, when the banquet and grace after meat have been completed. And this arrangement is attested in the Mishna (ib.). The contents of the first part were, however, a subject in dispute between the schools of Shammai and Hillel, the former concluding it at Ps 113, the latter at Ps 114. The wording of the benediction for redemption was also not fully determined (ib.). It looks as though the recitation of the Hallel in the home-service were a reminiscence of the Temple-ritual, the family meal being partaken of between the two parts as a family sacrifice, just as the Paschal lamb was sacrificed in the Temple during the singing of the Hallel. This, indeed, as the Mishna suggests, may quite well have arisen before the destruction of the Temple.

3. Usage in the Gospels.—It is usually assumed that the hymn referred to in Mt 26<sup>30</sup> || Mk 14<sup>26</sup>

* Cf. also Rab. Arathim, 12a.

† Pes. (Festsch.) Bibl. 'Hallel' connects the liturgical recitation of the Hallel with the Paschal meal (he deems that it was sung in the Temple-service), and thinks that it attained its present compass only during the first half of the second century. But this is to ignore the data given above, which connect it primarily with Tabernacles and Hänukkah.

‡ With the doubling of the initial days of Festivals that takes place 'in exile,' the 18 days originally comprised in the above now amount to 21 and 1 night to 2.

§ Hence the designation 'half-Hallel' for this form.

¶ For these cf. Singer's Heb.-Eng. Prayer-Book, pp. 219, 224.

¶ For a graphic description of this see Eidersheim, The Temple, its Ministry and Services, p. 191f.

('when they had sung a hymn' [ὕμνησαντες]) was the second part of the Hallel (Pss 115-118)* sung at the conclusion of the Paschal supper (see above). This is quite possible, in view of the probability that the custom had been established in connexion with the Paschal meal in the time of Christ.

In Delitzsch's Heb. NT the expression is well paraphrased: 'After they had completed the Hallel' (נִכְרַח אֶת-הַהַלֵּל). But . . . that the usage was subject to variation. . . . Thus, . . . authority, . . . the Hallel . . . meal Ps 25 . . . The expression ὕμνησαντες certainly suggests a Paschal meal. It is significant, however, that it is absent from the Lukan account.

HALLOWED.—Used of the name of our Father—first petition in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6<sup>9</sup> || Lk 11<sup>2</sup>), = 'revered' or 'counted holy.' It is, says Godet (Com. in loco), a prayer that 'unworthy . . . of God and of His character may no longer . . . among men. The child of God beseeches Him to manifest with effect His holy character, in the conscience of men, so that all impure idolatry, gross or refined, as well as all formal Pharisaism, may be completely removed, and that every human being may unite with the seraphim in the anthem of adoration, "Holy, Holy, Holy."'

The verb ἀγιασέν is in constant usage in LXX to render the different forms of Heb. שָׁפַח (see Concord s.v.). Isaiah (813 23<sup>23</sup>) and Ezekiel (passim, e.g. 20<sup>41</sup> 36<sup>23</sup>) employ the word (rendered 'sanctify' AV and RV) of the Lord and His name, in exactly the same sense as the Lord's Prayer, of causing to be revered, whether by judgment or by deliverance. . . . to Sabbath, justborn, etc., ought to be computed. Our Lord uses ἀγ. (1) of Himself (Jn 10<sup>36</sup> 17<sup>19</sup>) in the sense of consecration ('sanctify' AV and RV, of Mary) to the office of Messiah by His submitting to death, and (2) of His disciples (Jn 17<sup>17</sup> 19) as consecrated by the truth. The root idea is setting apart for holy purposes, with the consequent development of a holy character. This ethical sense is derived from Lv 11<sup>44</sup> ἀγιασθήσεσθε καὶ ἀγαπᾶτε τὸν θεόν, ὅτι ἅγιός ἐστιν ὁ θεός (see Lightfoot on Ph 1<sup>3</sup>). See, further, artt. CONSECRATE and SANCTIFY.

For usage of the English word see Hastings' DB (s.v.). R. MACPHERSON.

HALTING.—A deficiency in gait, when one is not able to walk without limping. The word refers to the imperfection in the art of walking, rather than to the deficiency, injury, or weakness of the limb or limbs which is the cause. This differentiation is illustrated by a passage from Brand (1789) 'He hath a halt in walking occasioned by a lameness in one of his legs'; also Tennyson (Guinevere): 'If a man were halt or hunch'd'; Bunyan (Pilg. Proq. pt. ii.): 'Mr. Ready to Halt,' cf. Ps 38<sup>17</sup>; Shaks, Timon, Ac. iv. Sc. i.: 'Thou cold sciatica, cripple our senators, that their limbs may halt as lamely as their manners' (an illustration also of the metaphorical use of the word 'halt' similar to that of 'lame'); so Richard III., Ac. I. Sc. i.—

'Sent before my time

Into this braving world scarce halt made up,

And that so limply and unmatchable

That dogs bark at me as I halt by them.'

'Halt' is the tr. of χαλός in Mt 18<sup>8</sup>, Mk 9<sup>45</sup>, Lk 14<sup>21</sup>, Jn 5<sup>8</sup>; but the translators of neither AV nor RV maintain a close distinction between the lame and the halt. The halting is included in the general healings wrought by Jesus among the multitude, and many of them would doubtless be of a character to yield readily to the method of our Lord, acting as He did on the line of existing therapeutic forces, even while going far beyond our present knowledge and experience of these forces.

HAND (יָד, ἡ 'palm or hollow of the hand'; χεῖρ; δεξιὰ 'right-hand', ἀριστερά 'left-hand').—

is not necessary here,* but a brief reference seems appropriate in view of the fact that NT usage is to some extent based, through the LXX, on that of the OT. In its origin the Hebrew word probably meant 'strength' (cf. אִישׁ יָדָאִי 'a man of strength'),† and it is used in this figurative sense in Ps 134 (not in them strength [lit. hands], to thee), Ps 76<sup>5</sup> ('none of the mighty men have found their hands,' i.e. they are powerless). The word is used in a number of other figurative senses, see the Oxford Heb Lexicon under יָד. Instructive is the passage Ex 14<sup>8</sup> 'the children of Israel went out with a high hand' (cf. Ex 15<sup>12</sup>, Nu 11<sup>33</sup> 33<sup>3</sup>), the reference is to the hand of Jehovah ('with a high hand' = with the help of the high hand, a meaning which the preposition יָד frequently has); the 'hand,' strictly speaking, the 'right hand' (יְמִינִי), of God is the planet Venus,† this antique conception is much softened down, though a literal, anthropomorphic sense is still implied in the use of 'hand' in Ps 102<sup>23</sup> 'The heavens are the work of thy hands'.

In reference to man the word is used (just as is the case in the NT) in a variety of senses, according to the phrase in which it is found. 'to put one's life into one's hand' (Jg 13<sup>4</sup>), means to be ready to jeopardize one's life, 'to clasp the hands' is a sign of joy (2 K 11<sup>12</sup>), 'to till the hand' (RV 'consecrate') is to install in office (Jg 17<sup>12</sup>), § 'to lift up the hand' (whether towards heaven or towards the altar is not always certain, see Nowack, Heb Arch. ii. 260) was a symbolic action which accompanied an oath, it implied the calling of the Deity to witness (Dt 32<sup>40</sup>), the same action, with both hands, was the attitude adopted when blessing (Ps 134<sup>2</sup>), 'to open the hand' is to show generosity (Dt 15<sup>11</sup>), 'to place the hands upon the head' was a sign of grief (2 S 13<sup>19</sup>), 'to kiss the hand towards' was a sign of homage (to a heathen deity in Job 31<sup>27</sup>), 'to lay the hand upon the mouth' was done in token of humility (Pr 30<sup>12</sup>, cf. Is 52<sup>15</sup>), 'to strike hands' meant to go surety for someone (Pr 6<sup>1</sup>). All these symbolic actions with the hand were common in the time of Christ, as they are at the present day also in Syria, Arabia, etc.

There is one other use of the word in the OT which demands a passing notice, it is found in Gen 28<sup>12</sup>, 2 S 18<sup>18</sup>, cf. Gn 35<sup>14</sup>, accordi- . . . 1512, 2 S 18<sup>18</sup>, because a hand was depicted upon the monument or pillar, this hand being a token of that wherewith the vow had been made (the uplifted hand), or perhaps wherewith an offering had been brought; in view, however, of what has been said above, it is more likely that this hand was a representation of the hand of the Deity.

Usage in the Gospels.—In a very large number of cases in which 'hand' occurs, it is used in the ordinary literal sense; there is no need to give references for these. Not infrequently there is the expression 'at hand' in the EV where in the original χεῖρ does not occur: e.g. 'the kingdom of heaven is at hand' (ἤγγικεν); such passages do not properly belong to this article, and are not taken into account.

1. All those things which are done by means of the hand, or in which the visible part is done by the hand (such as the working of miracles, or taking hold of a person or thing) are described as being performed διὰ χειρὸς, διὰ τῶν χειρῶν, διὰ χειρῶν—τινος, Mk 6<sup>2</sup> etc.; ἐπὶ χειρῶν, Mt 4<sup>6</sup>, Lk 4<sup>11</sup>; εἰς τὴν χεῖρα, Lk 15<sup>22</sup>. 'Hand' is used figuratively as a synonym for 'power' (Mt 17<sup>22</sup>, Mk 9<sup>1</sup>, Lk 1<sup>7</sup>); in the slightly different sense of 'protecting power' (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>), still in the sense of power but coupled with the idea of 'possession' (Jn 10<sup>28</sup>, 29); as used in Lk 1<sup>66</sup> it contains the idea of God's 'furtherance'; then, again, it is used loosely, ** in the sense of 'finger,' in Lk 15<sup>22</sup> ('put a ring on his hand'); lastly, it is referred to (in a peculiarly Oriental manner) as though it had, metaphorically speaking, sense: 'if thine hand offend thee' (σκανδαλίσθη), and the same idea is conveyed in Mt 6<sup>3</sup> 'let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth.'

2. But the most important use of 'hand' in the Gospels, as in the OT, is seen in idiomatic phrases in which it occurs; these may be briefly enumerated as follows.—'To wash the hands' (ἀπονομπεῖν τὰς χ.) was a symbolic act . . . a repudiation of responsibility on a . . . of innocence (Mt 27<sup>24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>73</sup>); the same phrase, very nearly, νίπτειν τὰς χ., refers to the washing before meals in obedience to tradition* (Mt 15<sup>2</sup>). 'To lay hands on' is used in several senses; ἐπιβάλλειν τὰς χ. ἐπὶ τινα (or simply with the dat.) means to take hold of with violent intent (Mk 14<sup>46</sup>); ἐπιτιθέναι τὰς χ. (or τὴν χ.) ἐπὶ τινα (or with dat.)† is synonymous with healing (Mt 9<sup>18</sup>, Mk 5<sup>23</sup>); τιθέναι τὰς χ. ἐπὶ τινα is used of blessing children (Mk 10<sup>16</sup>); 'to put the hand to the plough' (ἐπιβάλλειν τὴν χ. ἐπ' ἀροτρον) is a metaphoric expression denoting the undertaking of some duty (Lk 9<sup>62</sup>); different meanings attach to the phrase 'to stretch forth the hands': ἐκτείνειν τὰς χ. ἐπὶ τινα is used of taking someone prisoner (Lk 22<sup>53</sup>), or (with the same construction) to indicate a person (Mt 12<sup>49</sup>); ἐκτ. τὴν χ. in Mt 14<sup>31</sup> means to save from harm; the same expression in Jn 21<sup>18</sup> seems to be used in reference to the . . . the hands (in the sense of arms) on the cross. 'To lift up the hands' (ἐπαίρειν τὰς χ.) is the attitude of blessing (Lk 24<sup>50</sup>); 'to take by the hand' (κρατεῖν τῆς χ.) means to take hold of someone with the purpose of helping (Mk 1<sup>31</sup>), 'to deliver up into the hands of' (παράδιδόναι εἰς χ. τινος) is to give into the power of, with evil intent (Mt 17<sup>22</sup>), while δίδοναι τι ἐν τῇ χ. τινος means to commit to the care of (Jn 3<sup>38</sup>); 'to commend [the spirit] into the hands of' (παρatiθέναι τὸ πνεῦμα εἰς χ. τινος) is to place oneself under God's protection (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>).

3. Lastly, there are many words in connexion with which 'hand' is not expressed, but implied; all these convey one or other, or both, of the root conceptions of this word, viz. strength and activity. W. O. E. OESLERLEY.

HANDMAID.—'Handmaid' (Lk 1<sup>38</sup>; 'handmaiden,' v. 48; in the American Standard RV 'handmaid' in both . . . answers to the Gr. δούλη, which means . . . as the RVm shows, 'slave.' In the LXX rendering of Hannah's vow (1 S 1<sup>11</sup>), which is clearly echoed, almost cited, in Lk., δούλη represents the Hebrew 'āmāh, which, with the Aramaic equivalent 'amta and the Bab. amtu, seems to have been a common Semitic designation of a female slave in Canaan and the neighbouring countries. It was sometimes used in courteous . . . (1 K 1<sup>17</sup>, 1 S 25<sup>24</sup>, 28, 31, 41; the . . . Syrian lady in Johns' Babylonian and Assyrian Letters, p. 378), and then was naturally applied to relation to God (the above-mentioned vow, also Ps 86<sup>16</sup> 116<sup>16</sup>). In the Aram. text, which probably underlay the Song of the Virgin, 'handmaiden' would be 'amta with suffix (Pal. Lect. of Gospels, 1899, p. 234). The use of the word in the Gospels illustrates the Oriental habit of describing man as the slave of God, of which there are so many examples in the OT (Ps 19<sup>11</sup>, 13, Neh 16<sup>11</sup> etc.), in the so-called Babylonian Penitential Psalms, in ancient Semitic names—Obadiah found both in the Bible and on an ancient seal, Abdeel (Jer 36<sup>28</sup>), Abdeel (1 Ch 5<sup>18</sup>), Abednego (Dn 1<sup>7</sup>), Abd Naniq (Tell el-Amarna Letters, No. 53, Winckler), Abd Ashtoreth (KAT [Z]W 129); and in names current in the Holy Land at the present time, such as Abdallah. . . . examples from southern and central Palestine. PEFSt, 1904, p. 155, and 1905, p. 48 f.). These illustrations, however, refer mainly if not entirely to men. In connexion with a list of personal names collected from various Moslem villages in the south of Palestine (PEFSt, 1904, p. 155), it is remarked that female names of the type of Abdallah have not been found. Still it must always have been easy for an Oriental woman to call herself 'the hand-maid' of Deity. The transition from the courteous to the religious use would be readily effected.

* It is probable that the origin, of which this custom was a remnant, is to be sought in a ceremonial purifying before partaking of the Eucharist, at which the Deity was conceived of as being present, cf. W. R. Smith, RS<sup>2</sup> p. 229.

† The same phrase with the same construction = 'to ordain' in Ac 6<sup>6</sup> 8<sup>17</sup>.

HAPPINESS.—i. PAGAN AND CHRISTIAN IDEALS COMPARED.—The subject was much discussed among the Greeks under the term 'well-being' (eudaimonia). Aristotle said: 'For on the subject of happiness and what conduces to it, and of its attainment, no oration or discussion is always conversant, and this because we needs do the things which procure it or any of its constituents, and refrain from doing the things which destroy or impede it' (Rhet. i 5). The schools of the philosophers arose from the question wherein it consisted. Was it in knowledge, pleasure, virtue, freedom from pain, wealth, or well-doing? The record of the answers to this forms the history of ancient Ethics. Jesus did not use the word 'happiness' (eudaimonia), or propound any theory of the relation between duty and pleasure; but absence of the word is no proof that the subject was foreign to His mind. It is inconceivable that the 'Son of Man' should neglect in His system so universal an instinct as the desire after happiness; for in the final summation joy must be a part of the perfect state. The comparison between ancient and Christian Ethics must not be made on verbal or literary lines, but the systems must be judged by their actual contribution to well-being or happiness.

(1) The failure of Paganism. The systems of Plato and Aristotle did not afford large satisfaction with them, nor did they afford any permanent refuge for the race. The products of Greek speculation, Stoicism survived longest, and had the largest influence upon the civilization of the world; but while, by its stern grandeur, it shaped a few noble characters which remained as a protest against the lax manners of the Empire, it failed to open up any fountain of joy for man. The Stoic sage was powerless to convert his theories into conduct, as he himself confessed; and the concept of soul which he advocated was a denial of the strong impulses of the human heart. Where reliance upon human reason was undermined, it was met with an impotent religiousness; and where reverence for the natural order was impaired, there was no message of a future life in which compensations would atone for present inequalities. Also the examples of the earlier leaders created a preference for suicide, which was a confession of failure to procure the well-being of life. Paganism withdrew from the struggle to provide happiness. It despaired, and was therefore defeated.

(2) The success of Christianity. The characteristic word of Christianity is Life; for while the moral code and example of Christ are superior to others, it is not on this that His supremacy rests. Christ's Person is the vital force of the new religion. 'As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself' (Jn 5<sup>26</sup>). This same blessing is bestowed upon all who believe in Christ; and so rich is this gift, that each believer becomes a constant source of life (Jn 6<sup>27-73</sup>). Life is imparted to the believer in many ways, but chiefly through Christ's words (6<sup>38-45</sup>). This life is the realization of all human aspiration, enabling the Christian to hold on with courage and hope in the face of temptation and doubts; and the history of our civilization is the evidence that Jesus has succeeded where all others failed. To an age that was exhausted and desponding, that had failed to satisfy the deep desires of human nature, Christ came with convincing and converting power. When He spoke, men believed and lived again. Through Him rose

'One common wave of thought and joy, Lifting mankind again'

Stoicism and Neo-Platonism produced thought of great beauty and purity. 'Yet neither of them could enable artisans and old women to lead a truly philosophic life. Christianity could and did; it realized the ideal of the realization of the ideal of every standing. That was due to the power which issued from Jesus Christ and actually transformed man. The certainty and confidence of faith based on Him, with reliance on God's grace in Jesus Christ, begat in Christians a matchless delight in doing good' (von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, p. 329).

ii THE TEACHING OF JESUS.—The NT verbal equivalent for 'happiness' is 'blessedness' (which see), but it is not conceived in terms of pleasure. It is a religious idea, drawing its worth from the blessing which God imparts. The adjective 'blessed' occurs frequently in Mt 5<sup>3-12</sup>. This representative discourse may be entitled 'Christ's way to happiness.' Here Jesus describes how people become happy, but refrains from all abstract definition. Each of these Beatitudes falls into two parts. In the first half those virtues are mentioned the possession of which constitutes people happy; in the second part the reward or result of each virtue is given. The statements may be made as to the result in this way: (1) The joy begins at the commencement of the journey, and is not reserved for the future. Thus, all who are pure in heart are happy. (2) More than the traveller than upon the outward journey. Happiness rests in dispositions, such as purity, meekness, righteousness, peace, and not in possessions, such as wealth, health, fame. The happy man makes his own scenery. Christian joy, like other Christian graces, is inward; and the OT conception of blessedness, in so far as it consisted in length of days, yields to a more inward joy. All who go Christ's way are like the Happy Warrior,

'With a heart that is not divided,
In the midst of the world's confusion' (Wordsworth).

(3) This happiness is not a passivity, but an active state, with some function of the will. It is not a mere state of emotion, but accompanies an act of service either for God or man. Happiness is associated with piety (Mt 5<sup>3-6</sup>) and probity (vv. 7-12). It follows upon doing the will of God, or upon seeking the well-being of others. Socrates also regarded happiness as eupraxia, well-doing. (4) This way, unlike the world's way, is endless, for the joy that begins on earth is an anticipation of the full joy of heaven (vv. 3<sup>b</sup> 10<sup>b</sup>). It is a duty. All who walk with Christ not only will but ought to rejoice. Happiness is an imperative, 'Rejoice and be exceeding glad' (v. 12). The ethical ideal of Jesus differs from Hedonism, in which morality and happiness are synonymous terms, because with Him blessedness is the associate of virtue. Christ neither confuses nor separates these two. Happiness and virtue are twin stars. The further use of the Beatitude in Christ's teaching continues to emphasize the spiritual ingredients of happiness. In Lk 11<sup>28</sup>, Jn 13<sup>27</sup>, blessedness and obedience are associated; in Mt 16<sup>17</sup> blessedness and knowledge are united; in Jn 20<sup>29</sup> blessedness and faith are joined. In many places blessedness is reserved for the future (Lk 7<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>37-43</sup> 14<sup>15</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel Jesus distinctly offers fulness of joy (Jn 16<sup>24</sup>).

III. HAPPINESS AS REVEALED IN CHRIST'S PERSON.—The birth of Jesus was εὐφροσύνη of joy (Lk 2<sup>10</sup>). Though called the ἄλγος, 'vs,' He was not unhappy. Sorrows never distorted His soul, nor left the faintest shadow of melancholy or accidie. He was 'still cheerful and helpful and firm.' His first miracle contributed to the innocent pleasure of social intercourse (Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup>). The impression left by His address was '... nor was His voice the voice of grief (Lk 19<sup>11</sup>). His gospel was a joyous prize (Mt 13<sup>44</sup> 45). He ... in healing pain (Lk 4<sup>18</sup>). Instead of ... the sadness of households, Jesus removed ... 11<sup>23</sup>, Lk 8<sup>53</sup>). He spoke of a joy that was His own peculiar and characteristic possession (Jn 15<sup>11</sup>), and promised entrance into His own joy as a supreme reward (Mt 25<sup>21</sup>). This joy He offered all who followed Him (Jn 16<sup>24</sup>), and He was anxious to complete the joy of His disciples (Jn 15<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>13</sup>). Christ shunned the moroseness of asceticism (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>), as He turned from the selfish happiness of the epicurean (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>). The joy of Christ arose from several causes—(1) He was free from sin, that root of sorrow and bitterness. 'For by sinning we kept neither piety nor felicity' (Augustine). (2) He had the intense joys of a Saviour (Lk 15<sup>7</sup>). His was the happiness that comes from being the creator of another's good (Lk 19<sup>10</sup>). The keen pleasure of rescue work filled His soul (Lk 15<sup>5</sup> 6<sup>23</sup>). The thought of the countless hosts who would obtain eternal rest through His death was a secret potion to sweeten His bitter cup. For the joy set before Him He endured the cross. (3) The self-sacrifice of Jesus issued out of pure love (Jn 15<sup>13</sup>). He was happy as a lover. (4) He rejoiced in the sense of Divine sonship. This was His earliest thought (Lk 2<sup>49</sup>). To do the will of God was better than food (Jn 4<sup>34</sup>). The knowledge of His Father was life (Jn 17<sup>3</sup>). It was an incomparable ecstasy for Him to dwell upon the love of God (Jn 17). This relieved Him of fear (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>, Mt 6<sup>34</sup>); also it freed Him from the distracting care of false ambition (Jn 13<sup>36</sup>). Being thus free from many of the vexing thoughts and struggles that disturb our peace of mind, He was able to find comfort in Himself and His cause. He was the first citizen in the Kingdom of Heaven, which is righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. Though tempted in all points like as we are, and acquainted with grief, Christ was nevertheless a man of joy.

Christ gives happiness by giving Himself. 'He that hath the Son hath life,' and the causes which led to His peace act in measure in all those who turn to Jesus. The first and last Beatitude of the Gospels is to those who believe in Him (Lk 1<sup>45</sup>, Jn 20<sup>29</sup>). All life culminates in God, and man's summum bonum is God as He is revealed in Christ. Partnership with Him, even when joined with personal suffering and sacrifice, is more valuable than all worldly prosperity (Mt 10<sup>39</sup>). Plato had climbed to a lofty place when he declared that man's happiness was to be found in a supernatural good, in the knowledge of ideas, especially the idea of God. But Christianity rises higher. Jesus leads us up from imitation of God and acquaintance with Divine ideas to the sublime fact that we may know God personally. Not a resemblance, but a partnership; not a certainty that God is good, true, and wise, but a certainty that He loves us, and that we may love Him in return—this is the new faith (Jn 15<sup>9</sup>). Jesus is the Christian's joy. Into our restlessness of soul, due in part to imperfect ideas, Christ comes with a fellowship and an ambition grand enough to supply man with the peace after which he is ever struggling (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>). Through Christ our sins are forgiven, our anxieties removed, our sorrows softened, our hopes revived, while He alone imparts that supreme gift of fellowship with God which is our highest good. Thus purest happiness comes, which some will still prefer to call blessedness, as more appropriate to such intimate and spiritual relationships.

HARDENING OF HEART.—(a) The relation in Scripture between the blood and the life (Lv 17<sup>14</sup>) is such that the heart is naturally 'the typical centre of personal life' (cf. Westcott on He 4<sup>12</sup> and 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> Add. Notes); the seat of understanding (1 K 3<sup>9</sup> 12), affection (Dt 6<sup>5</sup>), will (Jer 5<sup>23</sup>), character (1 K 9<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 11<sup>21</sup>); the fountain at which all issues (Pr 4<sup>23</sup>) may receive a Divine direction. (b) It is described as tender (2 K 22<sup>18</sup>), hard (Ex 8<sup>19</sup>), of flesh or of stone (Ezk 11<sup>19</sup>), not ... sense of merciful or cruel, but ... otherwise) of Divine impressions. ... words employed to express such hardness the two more remarkable (see below) represent the heart as callous (i.e. ossified) or fat. (c) An important distinction is to be made between two expressions.—(i.) 'Hardness of heart.' To a certain extent this is an unavoidable infirmity of man's natural condition. As such, it is the object of Divine condescension, which (as Christ directly asserts) is the explanation of much OT ... (Mt 19<sup>8</sup>). It is referred to in the ... σκληροκαρδία, Mt 19<sup>8</sup> Mk 10<sup>5</sup> [16<sup>4</sup>]; as (2) καρὸς πεπωρωμένον, Mk 6<sup>52</sup> 8<sup>17</sup>. (ii.) 'Hardening of heart.' This is a voluntary process: the object therefore of Divine condemnation (cf. Mt 11<sup>20</sup>, 13<sup>15</sup> 23<sup>37</sup>, Ro 2<sup>5</sup>). Its active nature, as distinguished from passive infirmity, is indicated by ... Mk 3<sup>1</sup> (cf. Ro 11<sup>25</sup>, Eph 4<sup>18</sup>), in contrast to the pf. pt. pass. Mk 6<sup>52</sup> 8<sup>17</sup>. (d) Hardening is re-penented, alternatively with conversion, as a direct consequence of contact with grace and the gospel (Mt 13<sup>15</sup>, Jn 3<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>38</sup>; cf. 2 Co 2<sup>16</sup>). The origin of the process is variously stated, according to the side from which it is viewed. Thus—(1) The heart is hardened, as though by the action of a mechanical law: Mt 13<sup>15</sup> = Is 6<sup>10</sup> LXX (cf. Ac 19<sup>9</sup>, Ro 11<sup>7-25</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>14</sup>). (2) Man hardens his heart. This aspect though necessarily involved in man's responsibility and often stated in the OT (Ex 9<sup>34</sup>, 1 S 6<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 36<sup>13</sup>), is not expressly referred to in the NT, except in He 3<sup>8</sup> = Ps 95<sup>8</sup>. (3) God hardens it: Jn 12<sup>40</sup> ... phrase of 1 S 6<sup>7</sup> see Westcott, ad loc., ... This is often known as 'judicial hardening'; it is 'the inexorable law of moral consequence' (Westcott on He 3<sup>8</sup>). It comes to pass that 'he who will not turn at last cannot. And God, who established that law of man's nature, is said in Scripture to do that which occurs under it or results from it' (Vaughan on Ro 9<sup>18</sup>). (e) In the OT the typical case is that of Pharaoh; in which all three statements are remarkably exemplified (Ex 7<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>15</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>). Babylon's 'Man in the iron cage' is a powerful picture of hardening in its final stage: at the same time, the man who is past repentance is usually past feeling (Eph 4<sup>18</sup>).

HARLOT.—This is the term usually employed in AV as tr. of πόρνη, the only other tr. being 'whore.'

The practice of prostitution dates from the earliest times. While in Egypt, the Israelites must have been familiar with the fact that prostitution prevailed in connexion with Egyptian cults. No sooner were they settled in Canaan than the purity both of their morality and was endangered by the contaminating influence of the harlots, in which the consecrated harlot (kēdēshāh) played no small part. From glimpses of social life afforded us by the can perceive the prevalence of day. One of the and of religious prostitution however, witnesses to the continuance of the common harlot. She haunts the streets (Sir 97), and employs singing as one of her seductive arts (94). In the time of the Maccabees the Gentiles in Palestine 'dallied with harlots,' and had to do 'with women within the circuit of the holy places' (2 Mac 64). Cf. also P 710.

The Gospels supply us with little information as to the extent of prostitution in Palestine during the time of Christ. In Mt 21<sup>32</sup> our Lord refers to harlots as a class. The woman of Lk 7, 'who was a sinner in the city' (v. 37 v. l.), 'longed to the class. In the parable of the Son, the far country in which he devoured his living with harlots (Lk 15<sup>30</sup>) might be supposed to be possibly within Palestine. Again, our Lord's reference to the sin of fornication (Mt 19<sup>9</sup>) suggests the existence of immoral women. The popular idea of Mary Magdalene as a woman of evil life is rejected by many of the best exegetes.

In Christ's day, Palestine was in many ways demoralized by Greek and Roman influences. Wherever the Greeks and Romans went, the εἰσαίμα and the μερetricia abounded. Religious prostitution reappeared in connexion with the Mysteries of Aphrodite, which culminated in vicious orgies, and these rites were not confined to Greece. Pagan gods and goddesses 'had their due secret solemnities whithersoever Greek (and partly Roman) colonists took their Lares and Penates' (B. G. in Chambers' Encyc vii. 369). Nor immorality of women employed in shameless rites be confined to religious ceremonies, any more than is the case to-day amongst similar women attached to Indian temples. In cities upon the coast of Asia Minor immoral cults prevailed in NT times.

To the Christian mind the matter of chief interest is the attitude of Jesus towards this class of sinners, and the significance of His gospel in respect of them. Here we cannot fail to contrast the harsh temper of the Pharisees towards such women with the holy and redemptive sympathy of Jesus. Even the austere John the Baptist had evidently welcomed them as penitents and as candidates for baptism (Mt 21<sup>32</sup>),—a fact of which Jesus reminded His hearers. Our Lord plainly indicated that sins of fleshly frailty are less heinous and less likely to prove fatal than lovelessness, spiritual pride, and hypocrisy; for 'the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you' (Mt 21<sup>31</sup>). His compassionate tenderness in this connexion appears very beautifully in St. Luke's story of the sinful woman, whose newness of heart was intensified by the love and gratitude consequent upon the pity and pardon experienced at the Saviour's hands. It may be added in respect of guilt, that the peace of conscience in the Redeemer's atoning blood is as poignant as the sense of guilt was poignant. Nor should it be forgotten that the general effect of the way in which the Master admitted women to His intimate fellowship is to raise the status of woman in such a manner as to render her degradation through prostitution unthinkable.

HARVEST.—See AGRICULTURE.

HATING, HATRED.—Although the noun does not occur in the Gospels, yet the verb (μισέω) is often found. The passages may be grouped as follows: (1) those which speak of the world's hatred to Christ and His people; (2) those dealing with the Old Law, and Christ's hatred of sin; (3) those which prescribe hate; (4) some remaining passages.

1. The world being opposed, according to St. John's use of the term, to 'all that is of the Father' (1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup>), it was inevitable that the holy and sinless Jesus should arouse its antipathy; and this is specially noted in the Fourth Gospel. The world hated Him because He testified that its deeds were evil (Jn 77). Its instinctive opposition to the light as manifested in Him was immediately aroused (3<sup>20</sup>). Thus He said 'the world hath hated me' (μισήσκειν, 15<sup>18</sup>), the perfect tense expressing 'a persistent abiding feeling, not any isolated manifestation of feeling' (Westcott); and it was 'without a cause' (δωδεκ, 15<sup>25</sup>), cf. Ps 35<sup>19</sup> 69<sup>4</sup>; no reason could be found for such hostility except that He condemned its wickedness. This hatred carried with it hatred of the Father also (Jn 15<sup>23</sup>), in which character He had revealed God to men, cf. 15<sup>24</sup> 'they have both seen and hated both me and my Father'; therefore they had no excuse for their sin, perhaps here the special sin of hatred to Him and His (Alford). Cf. in the parable of the Pounds, 'his citizens hated him' (Lk 19<sup>14</sup>).

Christ's disciples consequently may expect to experience the same hatred as they truly follow their Lord (Jn 15<sup>18</sup>). When they came before the world, it showed at once and decisively its position towards the gospel' (ἐμίσησε, 'hated,' 15<sup>18</sup>). The ultimate cause being that men had no true knowledge of Him who sent Jesus (15<sup>21</sup>). He foretold that they should be 'hated of all men' for His Name's sake (Mt 10<sup>22</sup>), 'of all nations' (24<sup>9</sup>); cf. for its 'hate' 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup> 15, 1 P 2<sup>12</sup>; Tacitus, Ann. xv. 44, 'quos per flagitia invidiosus vulgus Christianos appellabat'; Suetonius, Nero, xvi., 'Christiani, genus hominum novæ et maleficæ.' In so far as they crept in among the disciples, there would be similar exhibitions of hatred among themselves (Mt 24<sup>10</sup>); cf. Gal 5<sup>15</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>15</sup>, the deadly hatred of the Judaizers towards St. Paul, and the name ὁ ἐχθρὸς διθροῦτος apparently given to him in the Pseudo-Clementines. The world's hatred, however, should be a cause of rejoicing (Lk 6<sup>22</sup>), and not of wonder (1 Jn 3<sup>13</sup>, where 'if,' as in Jn 15<sup>18</sup>, implies no doubt of the fact). The disciples might well suspect their loyalty if they escaped the enmity of those who hated their Lord (Jn 77), while their experience of it was a proof that they had been chosen out and united to Him (15<sup>19</sup>, 20), as also a pledge of their future glory (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>12</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>13</sup>); 'Christianos quoque aut summo amore prosequuntur homines aut summo odio. Qui omnibus semper placent, sibi merito suspecti esse debent' (Bengel).

Groups (2) and (3) raise an apparent difficulty: the feeling which is forbidden in the one seems commanded in the other. Westcott has a valuable note on 1 Jn 2<sup>9</sup> which suggests the solution; 'there is a certain ambiguity in the word "hate," for it serves as the opposite both to the love of natural affection (ἀγάπη) and to the love of moral judgment (ἀγαπή). In the former case hatred, which may become a moral duty, involves the subjection of an instinct; in the latter case hatred expresses a general determination of character.' Thus μισέω as opposed to ἀγαπᾶν is condemned (Mt 5<sup>43</sup>, Eph 5<sup>28</sup> 29, 1 Jn 2<sup>9</sup>, 10 3<sup>14</sup> 15 4<sup>20</sup>), while as opposed to φιλῆν it may become a duty (Lk 14<sup>26</sup>, Mt 10<sup>37</sup>, Jn 12<sup>25</sup>).

2. 'Ye have heard that it was said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy: but I say unto you, Love your enemies' (Mt 5<sup>43</sup>); 'do good to them that hate you' (Lk 6<sup>7</sup>, omitted by best authorities in Mt.) The first part of the maxim is found in Lv 19<sup>18</sup>; but in the latter clause Jesus 'is not quoting precisely any OT or extra-Biblical utterance on record (cf. Sir 13<sup>13</sup>)' (Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. p. 30). The question then arises—Is it a fair deduction from, and does it represent the spirit of, the OT, or is it an unwarranted extension and addition of the scribes? In favour of the latter it is urged that this hatred is not conceived of as following in Lv 19<sup>18</sup>, and that passages much nearer the Christian standard are found. The utmost consideration was to be shown even to an enemy's beast (Ex 23<sup>4</sup>); the fact that the owner cherished hate was no reason why help should be refused to him in his trouble (23<sup>5</sup>). Cf. as to rejoicing over an enemy in calamity, Job 31<sup>29</sup>; as to returning evil for evil, Pr 24<sup>29</sup>; and as to the better spirit often shown in OT, Gn 45<sup>14</sup>, 1 S 24<sup>7</sup>, 2 K 6<sup>22</sup>, Ps 7<sup>4</sup> 35<sup>13</sup>. Jewish sages ordained that 'if a man finds both a friend and an enemy in distress, he shall first assist his enemy,' in order to subdue his evil inclination; and held that it is not permitted to 'hate any one except only sinners who, having been . . . admonished, do not repent' (Kahle . . . quoted in Alexander, The Witness of the Psalms to Christ and Christianity, p. 274). Pr 24<sup>17</sup> 25<sup>21</sup>, 22 are sometimes quoted as approaching the Christian spirit, but the reason given in each case . . . is . . . against their force ('lest the LORD see it and it displease him, and he turn away his wrath from him,' and the LORD shall reward thee'). Hence some suppose that 'hate thine enemy' was an illegitimate inference ('pessima glossa,' Bengel) drawn by Rabbis from the precepts laid down concerning the Amalekites and other nations under the curse (Ex 23<sup>34</sup>, Dt 7<sup>1</sup> 23<sup>3</sup> 25<sup>17</sup>); by giving to 'neighbour' the sense of 'friend,' and taking 'enemy' as meaning a 'private enemy,' they were easily turned into a justification of private hatred. On the other hand, it is held by many that this clause was really implied in Lv 19<sup>18</sup> and truly expressed the spirit of OT. The election of Israel, taken with the rules concerning the above nations, would foster an aversion to foreigners which was ever increasing in intensity; cf. Ps 83, Jon 3<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>11</sup>, Est . . . In time the Jews came to have such a profound contempt and disregard for all others as caused them to . . . with being enemies of the human race ('apud ipsos fides obstinata, misericordia in promptu, sed adversus omnes alios hostile odium,' Tac Hist. v. 5. 2; 'non monstrare vias eadem nisi sacra colenti,' Juv. Sat. xiv. 103). Therefore Bp. Gore holds (Sermon on Mount, p. 97) that we must accept Mozley's conclusions, which are as follows.—The whole precept, as it stands, undoubtedly represents, and is a summary of, the sense of the Law; nor is there any occasion to refer 'it hath been said' to the Law in the case of 'Love thy neighbour,' and to the tradition of the scribes in the case of 'Hate thine enemy'—all the other precepts which the Lord takes as instances of an inferior morality are precepts out of the Law, and there is no reason to distinguish this particular one from the rest with respect to its source. In the first place, it applied to 'neighbour' and 'enemy' in a national sense, and tended to strengthen the union of Israelites; it was the imulation of an esprit de corps which was the very bond of, and incentive to, union in the early ages. But it also referred to a private enemy, and was conceived in the general spirit of retaliation (cf. Mt 5<sup>38</sup> and such Psalms as 109).

It is evident from Mt 5<sup>44</sup> that Jesus took 'enemy' as meaning a 'private enemy,' who in the new Kingdom is to be loved, and to whom good is to be done. He used ἀγαπᾶν, not φιλεῖν, on which Tittmann (see Alford) says, 'φιλεῖν, amare, pessimum quemque in honestus non potest; sed poterit eum tamen ἀγαπᾶν, i.e. bene ei cupere et facere quippe homo homini, cui etiam Deus benefaciatur. Amor imperari non potest, sed dilectio.' Cf. Clem. Alex. τὸ ἀγαπᾶν τοὺς ἐχθροὺς οὐκ ἀγαπᾶν τὸ κακὸν λέγει, and Aug. 'sic dilige inimicos ut fratres optes, sic dilige inimicos ut in societatem tuam vocentur, sic enim dilexit ille qui in cruce pendens ait, Pater ignosce illis, quia nesciunt quid faciunt.' According to the teaching of Christ, therefore, the hatred of sin only is . . . which is the necessary corollary of t . . . Love, and is according to His own . . . He 1<sup>9</sup>, Rev 2<sup>6</sup>, where Lyra remarks (see Alford), 'non dixit Nicolaïtas, sed facta: quia persone sunt ex charitate diligendæ, sed eorum vitia odio sunt habenda.'

3. Lk 14<sup>25</sup> 26, Jesus turned and said unto the multitude, 'If any man cometh unto me, and hateth not his own father, and mother, and wife (peculiar to Luke), and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple'; cf. Mt 10<sup>37</sup> 'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me'; and Jn 12<sup>25</sup> 'He that loveth his life loseth it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal.' We may at once dismiss such an interpretation as Renan put forward, viz. that Christ was here 'despising the healthy limits of man's nature,' 'warring against the most legitimate cravings of the heart,' and 'preaching a total rupture with the ties of blood.' The whole tenor of His life and teaching is against such an idea. He forbade hatred even of an enemy (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>); He condemned evasion of the Fifth Commandment (Mk 7<sup>9-12</sup>), and taught the sanctity of the marriage bond (Mk 10<sup>2-8</sup>); He showed tender thought for His mother (Jn 19<sup>26</sup>), and loved children (Mk 10<sup>13</sup>); His new commandment was 'that ye love one another, as I have loved you' (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>). St. John certainly did not understand Lk 14<sup>26</sup> in Renan's sense (1 Jn 2<sup>9</sup> 11 3<sup>15</sup> 17 4<sup>16</sup> 20); nor St. Paul (Eph 5<sup>28</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>8</sup>, Tit 2<sup>4</sup>, Ro 13<sup>9</sup>), who would regard those acting in such a way as ἀπορρογοὶ 'without natural affection,' a vice of the heathen (Ro 13<sup>1</sup>).

Some have given to 'hate' in these passages the meaning of 'love less,' comparing Gn 29<sup>30</sup> 31, Dt 21<sup>15</sup>; but it follows from the above that Jesus cannot have intended to condemn any degree of right affection as if it amounted to loving others more than Him. 'The love which Christ condemneth differs not in degree, but in kind, from rightfulness affection. It is one which takes the place of love to Christ, not which is placed by the side of that of Christ. For, rightly viewed, the two occupy different provinces. Wherever and whenever the two affections come into comparison, they also come into collision' (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 650). There is a foolish affection which would do injury both to the giver and the receiver (cf. Pr 13<sup>24</sup>), and then hate is not only consistent with, but absolutely necessary for, the highest kind of love. It is 'that element in love which makes a wise and Christian friend not for time only, but for eternity.'

The words had special . . . to the time when they were spoken, . . . have sounded strange to the multitude, which, for the most part, was following because of that very love of life which is condemned, desiring to get material benefits (cf. Jn 6<sup>26</sup>). Jesus' enemies were becoming more violent, divisions in families would take place (Mt 10<sup>34-36</sup>; cf. Ex 32<sup>26</sup>, Dt 33<sup>9</sup>), and discipleship would in many cases be impossible without the renunciation of the dearest ties. The mission field affords a parallel nowadays, where the hostility of relatives is often the greatest hindrance to the confession of Christ. The statement is made in the most startling form to arrest attention ; conditions must be supplied as in Mt 5<sup>29</sup>. Even where renunciation is not outwardly necessary, there must be potential alienation and the acknowledgment of Christ's claims as paramount. The key to the true explanation lies in 'yea and his own life also' (cf. Jn 12<sup>25</sup>). Friendship is a source of . . . ; 'Jesus does not indicate a course of action whereby we do evil to others, but such as constitutes a painful sacrifice for ourselves' (Wendt). At bottom our own life only, the last citadel (Job 24), is to be hated, and everything else only in so far as it partakes of this principle of sin and death (Godet) ; 'secundum eam partem, secundum quam se ipsum odisse debet, a Christo aveisam' (Bengel). 'He that so prizes his life that he cannot let it out of his own hand or give it up to good ends, checks its growth, and it withers and dies ; whereas he who treats it as if he hated it, giving it up freely to the needs of others, shall keep it to life eternal' (Dods, Expositor's Greek Test). 'Nec tamen sufficit nostra relinquere, nisi relinquamus et nos' (Gregory, Hom. xxxii.).

Westcott on He 7<sup>3</sup> quotes a striking passage from Philo which throws light on Lk 14<sup>26</sup>. He describes the Levites as being in some sense 'exiles who to do God's pleasure had left parents and children and brethren and all their mortal kindred, and continues—ὁ γὰρ ἀρχιερεὺς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦτον τὸν λόγον εἰσαφέρει τῷ πατρὶ καὶ τῇ μητρὶ, οὐχ ὡς ἀνὰ ὕμνον καὶ . . . ὡς γυνῆα καὶ τοῖς υἱοῖς ἀποσπινόμενος ὅτις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ ἐκείνου ἐστὶν ἀγάπη. For the abstraction of the sinful desire to injure from the word 'hate,' leaving in it nothing but an aversion of a purely moral kind, Wendt compares the use of 'violence' and 'murder' in 11<sup>2</sup>, where 'they are used only so far as they denote energetic seizure and appropriation, but not the unlawfulness of this seizure'.

4. Othe . . . 6<sup>34</sup>=Lk 16<sup>13</sup> 'No man can serve two . . . : either he will hate the one and love (ἀγαπήσει) the other ; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other.' Here also 'hate' must get its full force in order to bring out the opposition and the nature of the man's nature who attempts to serve both God and mammon. The change of words in the second part is remarkable (ἀποστρέφεται for μισήσει, and ἀντιτίθεται for ἀγαπήσει), which does not odnet sed contemnet : sicut solent minas ejus postponere cupiditatibus suis, si de bonitate ejus ad impunitatem sibi blandiuntur' (Aug) ; to which Trench adds—'No man actually . . . comes to hate God and love the devil . . . in the second clause, when the Lord is putting the converse case, He changes both words, which would be no longer the most appropriate, the sinner 'holds to' Satan when he follows his rewards ; he practically 'despises' God when he heeds not His promises and His threatenings ; however little he may acknowledge to himself or to others that he is doing either this or the other.'

Lk 17, 'salvation from our enemies and from the hand of all that hate us,' exhibits a parallelism with no particular distinction between the clauses, cf. Ps 18 : 1-6.

HEAD (κεφαλή).—1. Natural importance.—The relationship of the head to the body is that of master to servant. In this service the body is expected to ignore its own wants, and homelessness is to be without a resting-place for the head (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>). The anointing of the head was an accompaniment of festive happiness (Mt 26<sup>7</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3</sup>, Lk 7<sup>46</sup>), and this mark of joy was to be borrowed by Christian self-denial (Mt 6<sup>17</sup>). A crown of thorns on the head was part of the mock dignity thrust upon Christ as King of the Jews (Jn 19<sup>3</sup>).

The importance thus attached to the head gave a higher significance to the gestures which, among an emotional people, often emphasized or took the place of words. Such movements of the head are practised to-day in Palestine alike by young and old, and are resorted to on occasions similar to those described in the OT and NT. Thus a rapid shaking of the head from side to side, with a similar twirling of the open hand on the wrist, indicates that one is perplexed by some mystery, as when the owner of the garden asked why that useless fig-tree was still there (Lk 13<sup>7</sup>). It also indicates that the hearer has not heard distinctly, or grasped the meaning of what has been said. An abrupt jerk of the head backward does duty, especially when at some distance away, for an emphatic 'No.' The . . . the head downward is the attitude of . . . in the presence of his superior (Is 58<sup>6</sup>, Lk 18<sup>13</sup>). The slow turning of the head once in one direction means that the words just heard or the scene witnessed pass all description. Such a gesture would be common among those who looked upon Christ's miracles of healing power. This motion, repeated several times, along . . . of the hand, means con-wards some action, or the . . . in the case of some party referred to (Jer 18<sup>16</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>15</sup>). The movement of the head up and down is the soliloquy of one speaking to himself and saying, 'It is as I expected ; I knew it must come to this' (La 2<sup>15</sup>, Mt 27<sup>30</sup>). The head laid to one side, with a slight protrusion of the underlip, means, 'Causes must have caused you may do as you please' (Ps 22<sup>7</sup>). . . . seems to fill the gap in the debate over the fig-tree in the garden (Lk 13<sup>9</sup>).

2. Figurative authority.—The connexion thus recognized between head and body was used to express all situations involving a relationship of authority and submission. The patriarchal East, with regard to both secular and sacred matters, . . . importance to the scripture . . . does not understand imperial edicts, and gives its homage to the official who can enforce his decrees. Its conception of life is of graded authority rather than . . . It was not so much in disapproval of a new line of action to the familiar . . . that Christ said that in the coming Kingdom of God the way to honour would have to be . . . abundant and self-humbling service . . . by the head . . . and Jerusalem, are condemned, because, while such a habit of appealing under distress to the name of some one who could and must come to deliver and punish . . . the oppressed under primitive . . . it was here diverted from its original meaning when the appeal was made to that which was not free, but already belonged to another. The practice was at once foolish and idolatrous. The true help is from the Lord which made heaven and earth ; and this help is for those whose speech is 'Yea, yea ; nay, nay' (Mt 5<sup>33-37</sup>).

G. M. MACKIE.

HEADSHIP.—i. IN THE GOSPELS.—1. The word 'head' (κεφαλή), as applied to the relation of Christ to His Church, occurs only three times in the Gospels, and there in the passages in the Synoptics (Mt 21<sup>42</sup> || Mk 12<sup>10</sup> || Lk 20<sup>17</sup>) in which, applying the lesson of the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, Jesus quotes Ps 118<sup>22</sup> in the Septuagint version, 'The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner' (οὗτος ἐγενήθη εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας), where the expression κεφαλὴν γωνίας is an exact equivalent of the Hebrew קַדְמֹנִית. The meaning is clear. The building of which the Psalmist speaks is the theocracy, Israel as the people of God. The corner-stone, a stone fitted into an angle of the building and binding together the walls which meet at that point, and without which the structure must collapse, represents the Messiah, through whom the theocracy finds its realization.

What the Psalmist says about the rejection of the stone on the part of the builders has been explained by some as an allusion to an alleged incident in the building of the Second Temple.

'Some stone, a fragment, we may conjecture, of the Old Temple, rescued from its ruins, had seemed to the architects unfit for the work of binding together the two walls that met at the corner. They would have preferred some other stone, of their own fashioning. But the priests, it may be, with the traditions of the Temple, knew that this was the place for it, and that no other stone would answer half as well. The trial was made, and the issue answered their expectations' (Plumptre, Biblical Studies, quoted by Perowne, Psalms, in loc).

It is more probable, however, that this story was suggested by the Psalmist vice versa. Probably what was in the Psalmist's mind was Is 28<sup>16</sup> 'Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone.' Ps 118<sup>22</sup> was applied by Christ to His relation to the Church as the corner-stone, Jew and Gentile, and to His approach to the temple by Israel. Thus quoted and applied, the words of the Psalm speak of the Messiah as of Him 'upon whom depend the maintenance and development of the theocracy, without whom it would fall to pieces, as the corner-stone is the upholder and stay of the temple' (Meyer). They speak of Christ as representing the principle of unity, that which constitutes the Church a grand whole. If we compare with this application by our Lord of Ps 118<sup>22</sup> the use made of the same figure by St. Peter in the Acts of the Apostles (4<sup>11</sup>) and in his First Epistle (2<sup>4-8</sup>), where he speaks of the Church as a temple built of living stones, and by St. Paul when he describes Jesus Christ Himself as the chief corner-stone of a holy temple (Eph 2<sup>20</sup>), we find the connecting link between the idea of the Headship or Christ as it is expressed in the Gospels and the similar conception of St. Paul in his Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians (compare also 1 Co 11<sup>3</sup>).

St. Peter, while keeping to the figure of the corner-stone, suggested by the passages quoted from the Psalms and Isaiah, and speaking of Christ as 'head stone of the corner' (κεφαλὴ γωνίας), adds the thought of life to that of unity. St. Paul still further working out the same idea, introduces a different figure, that of the head as the seat of life in the body, that which controls and coordinates the action of each individual member (Eph 1<sup>22</sup>, Col 1<sup>18</sup> 2<sup>19</sup>). See § ii.

2. The idea of Headship is suggested in the Gospels in connexion with another figure, in our Lord's similitude of the Vine (Jn 15<sup>1ff.</sup>), in which He illustrates and works out in detail the thought that He is the source of life and fruitfulness for the whole Church and for each individual member of the Church, the vital principle which unites all in one. As the head no less than the heart is the seat of life in the human body, inasmuch as the brain is the centre of the nervous system, and the nerves radiating from the brain and spinal cord are the source of the healthy activity of every part, the beautiful description which St. Paul gives (Col 2<sup>19</sup>)—'the head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God'—corresponds to what Christ says in His parable of the Vine of the source of life and fruitfulness, with the thought of the healthy flow of life-giving sap which His words suggest: 'As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me (χωρὶς ἐμοῦ—maire 'severed from me') ye can do nothing' (Jn 15<sup>5</sup>).

3. Again, the thought of Headship is involved in that view of the Church's relation to Christ which our Lord presents in the blessing pronounced on St. Peter at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16<sup>18</sup> 19), and in a passage from the same Gospel, in many respects similar, in which He repeats His promise of power to bind and to loose (Mt 18<sup>18</sup> 19). These passages are the more worthy of note in this connexion, that they are the only instances in which the Gospels represent Jesus as using the expression 'Church' (ἐκκλησία). According to the first, that which constitutes the being and the strength of the Church is her faith in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God. Jesus speaks of the community which is founded upon faith in the Christ as 'My church' (μου τὴν ἐκκλησίαν), and then promises to invest this Church in the person of her representatives (in this case St. Peter as spokesman of the Twelve) with the power to bind and to loose. The other passage occurs in connexion with our Lord's injunction to make 'the church' the final court of appeal in cases of disputes among brethren. In it Jesus repeats the promise of power to bind and to loose, and states, in more universal terms than He employs in His promise to St. Peter, what constitutes the Church, or what entitles any body of believers to the name of 'Church.' That is the presence of Christ Himself in the midst of them. 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' That which constitutes the Church and invests her with authority and power, that which is the source of her life and energy, is the presence with her of Christ as her living Head, in whose name and guided by whose Spirit she discharges her spiritual functions.

ii. IN THE PAULINE EPISTLES.—The Headship of Christ, suggested in the teaching of our Lord Himself, is expressly taught in the Pauline Epistles, and is applied, moreover, to a much wider sphere than that of Christian discipleship. For while emphasis is especially laid on Christ's Headship over the Church, suggestions are given for a doctrine of His Headship over the human race and even over the whole created universe.

1. Christ's Headship over the Church.—In 1 Co 12<sup>27</sup> (cf. Ro 12<sup>5</sup>) we find St. Paul, in his desire to impress his readers with a sense of their unity and mutual dependence, describing the local church as 'a body of Christ' (σῶμα Χριστοῦ)—conceiving of it i.e. under the figure of a body whose several members (eye, hand, head, feet, v.<sup>21</sup>) are individual Christians. In Eph. and Col. this figure is elaborated at more points than one. In the first place, Christ is no longer thought of as Himself the whole body, of which individuals are the members—the body being a particular member like the rest. The Church is now the body, from which He is distinguished as the Head (Eph 1<sup>22</sup>, 4<sup>15</sup>, 5<sup>22</sup>, Col 1<sup>18</sup> 2<sup>19</sup>). He is the vital centre, the ruling and directing power of the whole organism. Moreover, as the use of the art. before σῶμα (absent in 1 Co 12<sup>27</sup>) now shows, it is the writer's intention that the figure should be applied not to any local church merely, but to the Church universal, and to this Church ideally conceived—the actual Church, no doubt, but regarded sub specie aeternitatis, so that the radiance of the heavenly antitype shines through the earthly form. To this Church, Christ is 'head over all things'; while it is 'his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all' (Eph 1<sup>22,7</sup>). See, further, art. BODY, ii (3).

2. Christ's Headship over the human race.—In 1 Co 11<sup>3</sup> the Apostle writes, 'The head of every man is Christ'. Here we have a doctrine of Headship set out beyond the limits even of the universal Church. The statement, as Hort points out (Chr. Ecclesia, p. 151), is a natural application of St. Paul's view of Christ as the Second Adam (1 Co 15<sup>22,45ff</sup>, cf. Ro 5<sup>12ff</sup>). The Incarnation not only reveals the kinship of the 'man from heaven' with all the sons of men; it sets Him before them as the true spiritual Head of humanity, in whom the race is ideally summed up.

3. Christ's Headship over the universe.—In Eph 1<sup>10</sup> we read that it is God's purpose 'to gather together all things under a head (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι τὰ πάντα) in Christ, the things in the heavens and the things upon the earth'. And in Col 2<sup>10</sup> Christ is expressly called 'the head of all things, in whom all things consist and power'. Words which are explained in 1<sup>15</sup>, where He is declared to be 'the firstborn of all creation,' in whom 'were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers; all things have been created through him and unto him; and he is before all things, and in him all things consist'. In these passages there is affirming a relation of Headship to the universe alike for the past, the present, and the future. In Him all things were created at the first. In Him they even now consist as their vital Head, the underlying principle of their very being. And unto Him from whom they had their origin they shall all finally return, in the day of that great consummation when God shall 'gather together all things under a head in Christ'.

With this Pauline doctrine of the Headship of Christ over (1) the Church, (2) the human race, (3) the universe, it is interesting to compare the teaching of the Fourth Gospel regarding (1) the union of Christ as the living Vine with His people as the branches (Jn 15<sup>1ff</sup>); (2) the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world (1<sup>9</sup>); (3) the creative Logos 'without [whom] was not anything made that hath been made' (1<sup>3</sup>).

HEALING.—See CURES.

HEARING.—1. There are two Gr verbs (ἀκούω, εἰσακούω) used for 'hear' in the Gospels, and they are sometimes rendered in the EV by 'hearken,' 'listen' (RV), 'come to the ears of,' 'to be noised.' Another verb (παρακούω) is used, Mt 18<sup>17</sup>, and translated 'refuse to hear' (RV), and Mk 5<sup>36</sup> where the RV is 'not heeding' (mg. 'overhearing'). The noun (ἀκοή) also occurs, and is rendered 'hearing,' 'fame,' 'report,' 'rumour.'

2. The most obvious meaning of 'hear' is, of course, to be endowed with the faculty of hearing, as opposed to deafness; and in this sense it is used in Mt 11<sup>5</sup> (Lk 7<sup>22</sup>), Mk 7<sup>37</sup>. (See CURES, DEAF AND DUMB).

Next, perhaps, in order of common usage are such meanings of the word as (a) to have immediate perceptual contact with the organ of hearing—the object being either personal as Mt 2<sup>9</sup> 'Having heard the things which ye do hear'; (b) to find out (by hearsay), to have information about, learn (i.e. hear of mediately)—the object again being either personal, as Mk 7<sup>25</sup> 'A woman . . . having heard of him,' or impersonal, as Mk 6<sup>55</sup> 'where they heard he was.' In connexion with (a) and (b) it is interesting to note the passages in which the experience of Jesus is referred to: e.g. (a) Mt 8<sup>10</sup> (Lk 7<sup>9</sup>) 21<sup>16</sup> 27<sup>13</sup>, Mk 5<sup>36</sup>, Lk 8<sup>50</sup> 18<sup>22</sup>; (b) Mt 4<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>12</sup> (Mk 2<sup>17</sup>), Jn 9<sup>35</sup> 11<sup>4,6</sup>.

3. The suggestive uses of the word, however, are those in which more complex experiences than the previous ones are signified by it. (a) The first usage to be named under this head is where the verb 'to hear' is used to mean the receiving of inward communications. For example, Jesus predicts the coming of the hour 'when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God' (Jn 5<sup>25,28</sup>). Again He uses the word to describe His own experience in relation to the revelation of the truth which He received from the Father and made known to men, 'As I hear, I judge' (5<sup>30</sup>); 'The things which I have heard from him (that sent me), these speak I unto the world' (8<sup>26</sup>)—these as well as 8<sup>40</sup> and 15<sup>17</sup> are instances in point. The Evangelist John, speaking of Jesus, says, similarly, 'What he hath seen and heard, of that he beareth witness' (3<sup>22</sup>). In two places Jesus refers to the occurrence of this experience in the case of others. 'Ye have neither heard his voice at any time,' He says to His Jewish audience, 'nor seen his form' (5<sup>37</sup>); 'Every one that hath heard from the Father, and hath learned, cometh unto me' (6<sup>45</sup>). Finally, the inward communication may be far otherwise than Divine in its source. To the Jews, Jesus is reported by the Evangelist John as having said, 'Ye do the things which ye heard from your father' (8<sup>38</sup>), and later on in the same chapter (v. 44) their father is declared by Him to be the devil. It is characteristic that all the above usages are found in the Fourth Gospel. (b) In a few contexts the word 'hear' is used with reference to God's attitude to prayer. For example, we read that at the grave of Lazarus 'Jesus . . . opened his eyes, and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hearest me. And I knew that thou hearest me always' (11<sup>41,42</sup>). In His teaching with regard to prayer Jesus warns His hearers against using vain repetitions, 'as the Gentiles do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking' (Mt 6<sup>7</sup>). To Zacharias the angel Gabriel is reported as having said, 'Fear not, because thy prayer is heard' (Lk 1<sup>13</sup>). [εἰσακούω is the verb used in both the preceding contexts]. The man, blind from his birth, whom Jesus cured on the Sabbath, thus addressed the Jews, 'We know that God heareth not sinners; but if any man be a worshipper of God and do his will, him he heareth' (Jn 9<sup>31</sup>). (c) Another context may be noticed here, viz that one in which Jesus, describing the function of the Spirit, says of Him, 'He shall not speak from himself; but what things soever he shall hear, these shall he speak' (16<sup>13</sup>). (d) In certain passages emphasis is placed on the privilege of 'hearing' or 'becoming acquainted with' the things of God. 'Blessed are your eyes,' said Jesus to Nicodemus, 'for they see; and your ears, for they hear. For verily I say unto you, that many prophets and righteous men desired to see the things which ye see, and saw them not; and to hear the things which ye hear, and heard them not' (Mt 13<sup>16,17</sup>, Lk 10<sup>23</sup>). The duties attached to this privilege may be grouped in the following way—(1) in respect to the exercise as such: 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear' (Mt 11<sup>15</sup> 13<sup>9,43</sup>, cf. Mk 4<sup>23,28</sup> 7<sup>16</sup>, Lk 8<sup>14,25</sup>); (2) in respect to that which the attention is given to: 'Take heed what ye hear' (Mk 4<sup>24</sup>); (3) in respect to the manner of hearing: 'Take heed therefore how ye hear' (Lk 8<sup>18</sup>). (e) In a large number of passages, especially in the parable of the Sower, 'hearing' either implies one or other of certain richer experiences, or it is ex-placitly connected therewith as a prefatory experience. (1) Sometimes the experience implied, or mentioned as that in which 'hearing' fulfils itself (or does not fulfil itself), is understanding or learning. For example, referring to the multitude generally, Jesus said to the disciples, 'Therefore speak I to them in parables: because seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand' (Mt 13<sup>13</sup>, Mk 4<sup>12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>10</sup>). (See art SEEING). 'Hear and understand, Not that which entereth into the mouth defileth the man; but that which proceedeth out of the mouth, this defileth the man' (Mt 15<sup>10</sup>, Mk 7<sup>14</sup>). 'With many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it' (Mk 4<sup>23</sup>), etc. (2) Sometimes the experience is believing. For example, some of the Samaritans are reported as having said to the woman who conversed with Jesus at the well, 'Now we believe, not because of thy speaking: for we have heard for ourselves' (Jn 4<sup>42</sup>). 'Verily, verily, I say unto you,' said Jesus to the Jews, when they were seeking to kill Him, 'He that heareth my word, and believeth him that sent me, hath eternal life' (5<sup>24</sup>). 'This is an hard saying,' said many of the disciples after Jesus had spoken of Himself as the bread which came down from heaven, 'who can hear it?' (6<sup>60</sup>). Cf. also the references in Jn 10 to the shepherds and the voice of the Good Shepherd (3). Sometimes the experience is doing, bearing fruit, or keeping. For example, the verses at the close of the Sermon on the Mount, 'Every one which heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them . . . Every one that heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not' (Mt 7<sup>24, 26</sup>, Lk 6<sup>47, 49</sup>). * 'He that was sown upon the good ground, this is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; who verily beareth fruit and bringeth forth,' etc. (Mt 13<sup>23</sup>, Mk 4<sup>20</sup>, Lk 8<sup>15</sup>). When it was told Jesus that His mother and His brethren stood without desiring to see Him, He said, 'My mother and my brethren are these which hear the word of God and do it' (Lk 8<sup>21</sup>). When a certain woman out of the multitude said to Jesus, 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the breasts which thou didst suck,' He answered, 'Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it' (Lk 11<sup>27</sup>, cf. Jn 12<sup>47</sup>).

The above divisions represent the main usages of the word 'hearing'. It is interesting to notice the contexts in which (i) the interest displayed in anticipation of hearing is described, and these may be collected together without further remark: Mt 12<sup>42</sup> (Lk 11<sup>31</sup>), 13<sup>17</sup> (Lk 10<sup>24</sup>), Mk 3<sup>8</sup> (cf. Mt 4<sup>25</sup>, Mk 3<sup>20</sup> etc.), Lk 5<sup>15</sup>, 6<sup>17</sup>, 15<sup>1</sup>, 19<sup>48</sup>, 21<sup>38</sup>, 23<sup>8</sup>; and (ii) those in which certain emotional results are described as resulting from 'hearing,' e.g. wonder (Mt 13<sup>13</sup>, Mk 4<sup>12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>10</sup>), joy, rejoicing, gladness, etc. (Mt 13<sup>17</sup>, Mk 4<sup>23</sup>, Lk 8<sup>15</sup>), sorrow, fear, trouble, perplexity, offence (cf. art SEEING on these subjects).

In conclusion, it may be pointed out that the antinomy which is found throughout Scripture and is testified to by the human consciousness in connexion with religious experience, viz. between 'man's working out and God's working in,' appears in what is said about 'hearing' in the Gospels. For along with exhortations addressed to men to 'hear' and to fulfil that experience in understanding, believing, and doing, there occurs a saying of Jesus like this, 'Every one that hath heard from the Father and hath learned, cometh unto me' (Jn 6<sup>45</sup>). The 'ability to hear' (Mk 4<sup>23</sup>, Jn 6<sup>50</sup>) implies an inward communication from God and an exercise of man's natural faculties.

* In connexion with this passage it is worth noting that the point of difference between the 'rock' and the 'sand' as foundations lies between 'hearing and doing' and 'hearing and not doing'. The basal element is the same in both cases—'hearing,' but that which gives it the cohesiveness and permanence of 'rock' is 'doing'—habitual obedience.

HEART.—In the NT 'heart' (καρδία) is the word most commonly used to denote the inner nature of man, the secret core of his being, where . . . of his intellectual and moral activity . . . this, its general significance, it is the καρδία of the Hebrew term לב or לֵב in the OT. . . employed to designate the bodily organ which is the centre of the animal life, it came by a natural process of thought to be applied to the invisible centre of the thinking אֵלֶּה . . . In this sense it occurs with . . . in the Gospels; but there, like . . . word in the OT, whilst always referring to man's interior nature, it is used in a variety of . . . according to the particular functions . . . that nature which are meant to be expressed. This is the case also in the other NT writings.

3. As the source of purpose and volition.—The disciples are enjoined to settle in their hearts not to meditate what they shall say (Lk 21<sup>14</sup>); the fell design of Judas was put into his heart by Satan (Jn 13<sup>2</sup>); the adulterous act is virtually done in the intention of the heart (Mt 5<sup>28</sup>).

4. As the organ of moral discernment and religious belief, i.e. of conscience and faith.—Reproofs are given for the hardness of heart which prevents the reception of the truth (Mt 19<sup>8</sup>, Mk 3<sup>5</sup>, 16<sup>14</sup>), and for slowness of heart to believe (Lk 24<sup>25</sup>); there is an exhortation not to doubt in the heart, but believe (Mk 11<sup>23</sup>); and the pure in heart have the promise of Divine illumination (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>).

In OT literature only we find the phrase 'the heart of the . . . (1<sup>1</sup>, 21<sup>34</sup>)

ii. CHRIST'S EMPHASIS ON THE HEART.—The . . . importance which Christ attached to . . . and its right condition was one of the pre-eminent characteristics of His teaching. He possessed an unrivalled insight into the workings of the heart (Jn 2<sup>24, 25</sup>), and could read what was going on there with a penetration and accuracy often startling (Mt 9<sup>4</sup>, 12<sup>25</sup>, 22<sup>18</sup>, Mk 2<sup>8</sup>, Lk 9<sup>47</sup>). But His unique peculiarity was the seriousness and persistency with which He dealt with the heart, and laboured for its purification as the one concern vital to the well-being of men. To the heart He always appealed, and on its deepest instincts He sought to bring His influence to bear; and although in many of His utterances the heart is not expressly named, it is still obvious that He had it directly in view. This was the 'inwardness' which constituted His great secret. The main points on which He insisted were:

1. The heart as the source of all the good or the evil in men's lives.—He dwelt on this with special earnestness—e.g. in His reply to the tradition-bound objectors, 'Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries,' etc., 'the things which defile a man' (Mt 15<sup>19</sup>); and in that suggestive saying, 'A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good, and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil' (Lk 645); and the idea is to be found running through all His teaching.

2. The character and motives of the heart as determining the religious value of actions.—Jesus untiringly taught that the test of a man's worth before God was not the outward propriety of his conduct, but the heart-inclinations and purposes by which he was swayed (Lk 16<sup>15</sup>). Even a correctly decorous Pharisee like Simon did not stand so high in the Divine estimation as the frail woman who had erred sadly, because, while he was proud and self-satisfied in his moral standing, she, amid all her failings, was melted into heartfelt penitence and gratitude (736-39). A man's conduct may be free from all formal commission of impurity, but if he lust after a woman in his heart, the stain of impurity is already incurred (Mt 5<sup>28</sup>). Many things outwardly right and proper were done by the religionists of His day—seasons of prayer duly observed, alms given, etc.—which yet He pronounced to be of little moral value because done from a false motive, the desire for social credit, 'to be seen of men' (6<sup>2-5</sup>). On the other hand, humble and obscure actions, like the widow's offering and the publican's supplication, He declared to be of inestimable worth in the eye of Heaven, by reason of the genuine heart-feeling from which they proceeded (Mt 23<sup>23-24</sup>, Lk 18<sup>13-14</sup>). And in the great '... (Mt 25<sup>31-36</sup>), He made it clear that the unaffected generosity of the heart, finding expression in deeds of simple dutifulness, that rank high in the Father's sight and secures the reward of immortal blessedness. Always and everywhere He pierced below surface and demanded inner rectitude as the true orthodoxy.

3. The renovation of the heart as essential both to a right relation to God and to true happiness.—The repentance Jesus preached meant a change of heart (Mt 4<sup>17</sup> 9<sup>13</sup>, Lk 13<sup>3</sup>); the conversion He urged as a necessity was a turning of the heart to God as the source of life and grace (Mt 13<sup>15</sup>, Mk 4<sup>12</sup>, Jn 12<sup>40</sup>), a restoration of the childlike spirit (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>), a new birth within, apart from which it is impossible to enjoy the blessings of the heavenly Kingdom (Jn 3<sup>3-7</sup>).

iii. EVILS COUNTERACTED BY CHRIST'S TEACHING.—Of these, four at least may be specially noted:

1. A pretentious ecclesiasticism.—Men's minds were drawn away from dependence on the mere institutional aspects of religion and confronted with the absolute necessity of internal righteousness. When orthodox Jews took a stand on their connexion with an ancient religious system, with its high covenantal privileges, and its claim to being children of Abraham, Christ flatly challenged their right to such a title, because of the vile purposes they cherished in their hearts, which proved that they did not possess Abraham's spirit (Jn 8<sup>39</sup>). He avowed that a scorned Galilean, Zacchæus, who was outside the pale of Jewish recognition, was more truly a son of Abraham, in virtue of the higher dispositions which had been stirred in his heart, and which placed him in the line of moral and spiritual descent (Lk 19<sup>9</sup>). Again, in face of the arrogant presumption that restricted Divine blessing and salvation to those within the bounds of Judaism and its religious system, He held up the kind services of a generous heart as sufficient to raise even a Samaritan to a level of equal worth before God (10<sup>30-37</sup>).

2. An external ceremonialism.—Jesus attacked, sometimes with fieri indignation, the superficiality of that righteousness which was based on a punctilious attention to certain prescribed observances,—the tithing of mint and cummin, when justice, mercy, and the faith of the heart were neglected

(Mt 23<sup>23</sup>, Lk 11<sup>42</sup>); the fastings which had no genuine penitence behind them (Mt 6<sup>17, 18</sup>); the careful washing of hands, while the heart was inwardly defiled (15<sup>2-3</sup>). It was His dominant idea that on the disposition of the heart the spiritual value of worship depends (Jn 4<sup>24</sup>), and He had strong warnings to utter against the offerings at the altar when sinister feelings were nursed within (Mt 5<sup>23</sup>), and the ascription of honour to God with the lips while the heart was far from Him (15<sup>8</sup>). With scathing rebukes He exposed the pretensions of those who claimed peculiar sanctity on the ground of their ceremonial scrupulousness, and treated them as whitened sepulchres, outwardly fair, but inwardly full of uncleanness (23<sup>27</sup>). Thus He represented all external acts of righteousness which do not spring out of an upright, pious heart as a mere hypocritical show, and not real righteousness (6<sup>1-6</sup>).

3. A legalistic moralism.—In view of the fact that the great spiritual ideas inculcated by the prophets had been hardened into fixed laws and rules, in formal obedience to which righteousness was made to consist, Christ's endeavour to recall men to the supreme importance of inner motive was calculated to exert a powerful effect. The confidence which many had in their moral respectability was necessarily shaken when they found themselves forced to look within, and judge themselves by a standard higher than a legal standard; as, e.g., in the case of the young man who had great possessions, and whose conduct outwardly was without reproach (Mt 19<sup>16-22</sup>). And there can be little doubt that the uneasiness and irritation created among the professedly religious classes by Christ's teaching was largely due to the consciousness it awakened in them of the insufficiency of the grounds on which their claim to righteousness was based. In the light of the stress He laid on the hidden springs of action in the heart, their moral regularity of life, founded on laws and rules, was bound to be exposed as empty and poor.

4. A false secularism.—Such teaching, setting the renewed dispositions of the heart far above the riches and honours of the world in value, supplied a potent counteractive to the proud security and self-assumption which prosperous worldliness is apt to beget. It forced home the sense of something wanting within, even when the outward fortunes were flourishing. The parable of the Rich Fool is a vivid picture of the real poverty of the man who trusts in his worldly success and is not rich in the things that belong to the inner life (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>); while in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus there is another picture fitted to break down the self-confidence of the prosperous, showing that the day will come when conditions may be reversed, and when heart-qualities alone will determine the status and happiness of men (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>).

iv. THE REVIVIFYING EFFECT ON RELIGION.—By His insistence on the heart as the vital element in religion, Christ transformed the whole character of religion. He made it (1) living,—not mechanical, a matter of prescribed and outwardly imposed form but dynamical, a free, spontaneous spring of high purpose and feeling; not something put on, but a bent and impulse of the spirit within. Thus He gave religion an elasticity and perpetual vitality which prophesy for it permanence and power,—'a well of water springing up unto everlasting life' (Jn 4<sup>14</sup>). He made it (2) effectually operative,—an energizing force, working itself out in practical life, impressing its hallowed ideas and aims on the world of affairs, and proving its reality by the heightened quality of the actions to which it leads. And He made it (3) a gracious influence,—commending itself to the general conscience, winning reverence, inspiring self-devotion, ... from heart to heart fervours of ... the things of God

The only reference in the Gospels to heat for the purpose of warmth is Jn 18<sup>18</sup> 'a fire of coals' (ἀνθρακίδων), i.e. 'of charcoal' RVm, coals having probably till this meaning at the time of the AV. See WIND.

HEATHEN.—The Anglo-Saxon hæthen, 'one who lives on the heaths and in the woods,' as opposed to a town-dweller; cf. 'pagan,' from paganus, 'a countryman or villager.' This word is an indication of the fact that, as a rule, country-dwellers were Christianized later than those living in towns and cities. 'Heathen' occurs in AV of the Gospels in Mt 6<sup>7</sup> 18<sup>17</sup>, and not at all in RV, which gives 'Gentiles' and 'Gentile' respectively in these two places (see GENTILES).

It has been pointed out that paganus also means 'a civilian' in opposition to 'a soldier,' and that thus a pagan would also mean one who was not a soldier of Christ. This secondary meaning of pagan probably came into use through a contemptuous designation by soldiers or non-military persons as 'countrymen.'

HEAVEN (οὐρανός, sing. and plur.; in Mt. plur. chiefly, and always in ὁ πατήρ ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, and ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν).

Three uses of the word may be classified, omitting parallel

(c) As a synonym for 'God.'

The use of 'Heaven' for 'God' is put beyond question by Lk 15<sup>18</sup> 21, where 'sinned against heaven' can only mean 'against God.' There are other uses only less certain—thus 'from heaven or from men' (Mt 21<sup>27</sup>) is clearly 'from God or from men' (cf. Ac 5<sup>38</sup>), so also 'given him from heaven' (Jn 3<sup>27</sup>) must be 'from God.' But the most striking instance of this use of 'Heaven' as a synonym for 'God' is in the phrase 'the Kingdom of God' almost uniformly in Mt for 'the Kingdom of God' of Mk and Lk, and this in exactly parallel passages. It is quite possible to make a distinction between these titles, but it seems best Admitting the use of 'Heaven' for 'God' can be no objection to its use in other instances where a clear meaning follows. Thus, 'bound, loosed in heaven' (Mt 16<sup>19</sup> 18<sup>18</sup>) = or 'God,' 'The keys of the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>) = the authority of God, 'names written in heaven' (Lk 10<sup>20</sup>) = acceptance with God, cf. Ex 32<sup>32</sup>. The demand for 'Heaven' (Lk 11<sup>16</sup>), while it may refer to the throne of God, the wonder out of the sky, has ultimate reference to some direct act of God. Anything 'from heaven' is an act of God, cf. the 'rain and dew' (Mt 23<sup>31</sup>) 'of the Plain' (Lk 17<sup>29</sup>), also the request 'that the Lord will send him' (Lk 11<sup>13</sup>). Even the phrase 'treasure in heaven' has its exact equivalent in 'rich toward God' (Lk 12<sup>21</sup>). Additional instances of the use of 'Heaven' for 'God' are: 'joy in the presence of the angels of God' (Lk 15<sup>10</sup>), 'of God'; confess 'before the angels of God' (Lk 12<sup>8</sup>, cf. Mt 10<sup>42</sup>); power 'from on High' (Lk 24<sup>49</sup>), Dayspring 'from on High' (Lk 1<sup>78</sup>); 'from above' (Jn 19<sup>11</sup>), 'in thy sight' (Mt 11<sup>26</sup>); 'the Most High' (Lk 13<sup>22</sup> 26<sup>35</sup>, cf. Mk 5<sup>7</sup>).

The transition from Heaven as the abode of God to 'Heaven' as a synonym for 'God' is illustrated in the fact that the eyes to Heaven when God is addressed. Temple as the dwelling-place of God led to the habit in prayer of turning the face toward Heaven.

The Temple (see 1 K 8<sup>44</sup> 48, Dn 6<sup>17</sup>) was the dwelling-place of God's presence. The Temple came to the Heavens (Ps 123<sup>1</sup>). The Temple, much as his eyes unto heaven' (Lk 18<sup>13</sup>, cf. Ezr 9<sup>6</sup>). So in prayer, Jesus 'lifted up his eyes' (Jn 11<sup>41</sup>), 'to heaven' (Jn 17<sup>1</sup>), 'looking up to heaven' (Mt 14<sup>19</sup>, Mk 7<sup>34</sup>). There are several passages which present difficulty, but whatever conclusion may be come to as to the objective occurrences in the opening of the heavens (Mt 3<sup>16</sup>), and the voice 'out of the heavens' (Mt 3<sup>17</sup>, Jn 12<sup>28</sup>), or 'out of the cloud' (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>), the subjective experience is the vital matter, the attestation to Jesus of His commission from and fellowship with God.

It is this which is symbolically represented in 'Ye shall see the heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man' (Jn 1<sup>51</sup>). Here, in a figure, the mediocrity of Jesus is declared. His revelation of God to man and intercession for man with God. 'Ye shall see' is a figure. No man hath ascended into heaven but he that descended out of heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven' (Jn 3<sup>13</sup>). has additional difficulty. The words of Mt 3<sup>16</sup> are against the last clause, and the words 'ye shall see' have been added to a clause after the words 'ye shall see'. If, in the RV, we retain them as the words of Jesus, they are taken as qualifying the preceding utterance, which then becomes a declaration of His perfect fellowship with God (cf. Jn 1<sup>17</sup>) rather than as a reference to Heaven as a place. The heavenly things (Jn 3<sup>12</sup>) are without doubt the things of God, the new revelation of His grace in Jesus Christ.

In what has been said above there is little that is distinctively Christian. The threefold use of the word 'Heaven' is common alike to the OT and Jewish thought of the time. But after this preliminary study we ought to be in a better position to consider the characteristic teaching of Jesus and the Christian faith.

1. The Kingdom of God finds its perfect realization in a future state, a world above and beyond earth, the Kingdom in Heaven. This is the reiterated lesson alike of parable and of direct discourse. All the judgment parables, where separation between the righteous and the wicked is declared, clearly teach a future inheritance of bliss or of woe. So the parables of the Tares (Mt 13<sup>30</sup>), and the Virgins (Mt 25<sup>1-14</sup>), the Talents (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>), and the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-11</sup>), where under the figure of 'eternal tents' the future Canaan is 'the past idealized'). In accommodation to Jewish thought and hope, the reward is 'to sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28</sup>), a hope which reaches beyond the life of earth. The final consummation must be where Jesus Himself is, and He, who came from heaven (Jn 3<sup>13</sup> 31 6<sup>33</sup> 38 41<sup>5</sup>), was 'received up into heaven' (Mk 16<sup>19</sup>, Lk 24<sup>51</sup>, Jn 20<sup>17</sup>). The MS uncertainty here in Mk. and Lk. does not affect the . . . which has the testimony of the Apostolic . . . This is the final reward of the faithful, the inheritance of the Kingdom prepared before the foundation of the world (Mt 25<sup>34</sup> 26<sup>29</sup>, Jn 14<sup>14</sup>).

2. The nature of Heaven—As the life of the Kingdom is . . . ethical (Mt 5<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>21</sup>), so is the nature of . . . It is the fulness of the eternal life, which in the Fourth Gospel is the synonym of the Kingdom. Then it is, and there, that 'the righteous shine forth as the sun' (Mt 13<sup>43</sup>), a glory certainly of character whatever else may be implied. There, too, is the perfect vision of God (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>).

It cannot be doubted that Jesus meant to localize the thought of Heaven. The sharp contrast between Heaven and earth (Mt 6<sup>19-21</sup>) can have no . . . His teaching God is no mere . . . lost in negative infinitude. God, as transcendent, immanent, infinite, alone, does not satisfy His revelation of 'the Father in heaven.' That name implies that in some world beyond there is a supreme manifestation of His Presence,—a Father's House, an enduring Holy of Holies. This, for Christian faith, is the Glory of Christ (Jn 17<sup>5</sup>), and to be with Him where He is and to behold His glory is the hope set before us in the gospel (Jn 17<sup>24</sup>).

What the activities of Heaven may be is told only in part. They that are accounted worthy to attain to that world 'are as angels' (Mk 12<sup>25</sup>, Lk 20<sup>36</sup>), and the ministry of angels enters into . . . The faithful are to be 'set over . . . id to 'enter into the joy' of their . . . which, in the light of the gospel, can only mean higher service.

As to when this inheritance is entered upon, very different conclusions are drawn even from the words of Jesus. The question is considered, for the most part, from the standpoint of retribution. So far as the reward is considered, it may be said definitely that the doctrine of an Intermediate State finds no support in Christ's gospel. The 'farewell discourses' of the Fourth Gospel would lose all their force by the introduction of this doctrine. So for Christian faith . . . of Heaven finds its confident . . . words of St. Paul: 'absent from the body . . . at home with the Lord' (2 Co 5<sup>8</sup>).

HEAVENLY THINGS.—See EARTHLY AND HEAVENLY.

HEDGE.—This word belongs to the vocabulary of the parables of Jesus. It occurs in that of the Vineyard (Mt 21<sup>33</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1</sup>), and in that of the Great Supper (Lk 14<sup>23</sup>).

1. Literal application—The hedge is a detail in the outfit of a vineyard, one of many other properties (Mt 21<sup>33</sup> ||) in such a possession. It is a feature in the landscape of Palestine in the other case ('highway and hedge,' Lk 14<sup>23</sup>). There is a connexion between the uses and the associations of the word. The contour of the land is controlled by the tillage of the soil. Vines need hedges. The word (φραγμός) used for a hedge in the Gospels 'denotes a fence of any kind, whether hedge, or wall, or palings' (Hastings, DB n. 340<sup>4</sup>). Another word might rather have called up a stone wall. φραγμός includes all the different kinds of hedges to be found in a country so furrowed with hills and valleys as is Palestine.

2. The parabolaical use of the 'hedge' is rooted in the education of Israel. God made sea and desert a hedge of Palestine. Cf. Ellerton's hymn—
'Praise to our God, whose bounteous hand
Prepared of old
A garden fenced . . .

He hedged the people. He gave them individuals, institutions, the whole national economy, as hedges to protect their life and to restrain it. Enemies raided the land and broke down the . . . P-79, 80) Patriots and prophets saw and . . . gaps, and did their best to repair the . . . institutional hedges. The tragedy of Jesus and the hedges was that He wanted them rooted up, while the chief priests hated the idea of their removal (Mt 21<sup>45</sup>). Through the tragedy . . . anthropic import of the hedge (Lk: . . . we see humanity submerged. 'Them also he would bring' He would make hedge-row people happy. He had seen their misery as He stole to silent midnight prayer, up the hillsides with their mosaic of fields, along whose hedges and through the gaps of which He passed to pray to the Father in secret. It is humanity's ragged regiment whom He would see housed by the compulsion of 'the love' (Lk 14<sup>28</sup>) that will not let them go.'

LITERATURE—Geikie, Life of Christ, i. ch 17; Thomson, Land and Book, ch 14, Philochristus, chs. 1-3 for 'Hedge of the Law.' JOHN R. LEGGE.

HEIR.—The heir (κληρονόμος) is one who enters on a position . . . different from that of servants (Mt . . . h no personal exertion of his own, but as the result of filial relationship. This position is a thoroughly right and legal one, and absolutely valid. The thought of succession to a title upon the death of the present holder is not insisted upon. The son is naturally the heir, and the title is one of present privilege as well as the assurance of fuller possession in the future.

Christ, the Son, is the heir of all things (He 1<sup>2</sup>; cf. our Lord's application of the term to Himself in the parable of the Wicked Husbandman, Mt 21<sup>38</sup>). The complete lordship over Creation was given to Adam (Gn 1<sup>28</sup>, Ps 8<sup>6</sup>). The land of Canaan, again, was promised to Abraham and his seed (Gn 13<sup>14</sup> 15). These assurances given to Adam and to Abraham were absolutely fulfilled in Christ, who, as the firstborn of all creation, Himself both the Agent of the Creator's work and summing up in His own Person all created objects (Col 1<sup>15-17</sup>), enjoys an eternal and incorruptible inheritance. 'The heirship of the Son was realised in the Incarnation, and in its essence is independent of the Fall (Westcott on He 1<sup>2</sup>), though conditioned by it as to its circumstances.' It was the sin of man which caused the suffering and humiliation through which Christ, after the work of redemption was complete, won a name which is above every name (Ph 2<sup>9</sup>). He had inherited in the eternal purpose of God (ἐθγκεν, He 1<sup>2</sup>) a name more excellent than the angels (1<sup>4</sup>).

The title of 'heir,' then, passes on to those who have obtained the blessing of Divine sonship in Baptism or Regeneration, corresponding spiritually to the promise made to Abraham. The Old Covenant (Testament) could not make men perfect, therefore God provided them with more strength, and in place of a worldly inheritance gave them a spiritual and eternal one. This title of heirship may be forfeited, if those who are called to it are not worthy of their inheritance. So Christ speaks in the Apocalypse 'He that overcometh shall inherit these things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son' (Rev 217). We, then, being made children of God through faith in Christ, are heirs according to the promise made to Abraham, who was accepted through faith in God's word against all appearances. No longer servants, but heirs, we are entitled to the Divine privilege of sonship through adoption. We are called to inherit a blessing as all true servants of God through Baptism.

It remains to be seen who are mentioned in the Gospels as heirs to the Kingdom: (1) 'The meek shall inherit the Kingdom' (Mt 5:3); (2) Those who have given up houses, lands, earthly relationships, etc., shall receive an hundred-fold and inherit eternal life, Mt 19:29, Mk 10:17, Lk 18:18; (3) The sheep in the parable of the Sheep and the Goats (Mt 25:32), i.e. those who have shown mercy to the weak and suffering, and whose service has been accepted by Christ as done to Himself, shall inherit the Kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world. But, on the other hand, the Pharisee or unclean person or covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the Kingdom of God and of Christ (Eph 5:5). See also ESCHATOLOGY.

HELL.—See ESCHATOLOGY, GEHENNA, and the following article.

HELL (DESCENT INTO).—During the 16th cent. the Descent of Christ into Hades was made the subject of acrimonious debates. Though commentators still differ, they discuss the subject in a more peaceable spirit, and offer some hope of future agreement on the main question. We must review—(1) the evidence of the NT, (2) early Christian tradition, to explain (3) the insertion of such teaching in Creeds and Articles of Religion. We may then (4) summarize the history of the controversy in modern times.

1. The evidence of the NT.—It is important to distinguish between the bare statement of the Descent as a fact in the history of our Lord as the Son of Man, which is accepted by all who believe that He truly lived, and the theory of His mission in the unseen world, which can claim acceptance only after careful scrutiny of incidental references to it in the NT supported by the independent testimony of the early Christian tradition.

Hades (Αἵδης), corresponding to the Heb. Sheol, which in the AV of the OT is rendered by 'hell,' means both in the LXX and in the NT the abode of departed spirits. This was the general meaning of the word 'hell,' the unseen, hidden place which is the abode of the dead.

In the OT a sense of gloom and unreality was felt about the lot of the spirits of men taken away from the light and activity of earthly life. At first no distinction was supposed to exist in that shadowy realm between good and bad any more than between king and subject. But in NT times such ideas had grown up, and our Lord sanctioned current belief when in the parables of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31) He contrasted the rich in the society of Abraham with misery 'in torments.' This agrees with His promise to the penitent thief (23:43): 'To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.' St. Peter in his first sermon (Ac 2:24-31) quotes Ps 16:10 and explains the words, 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in Hades,' as a prophecy of the Resurrection of Christ, which received no fulfilment in the case of David. He distinctly implies that Christ's soul passed into Hades at His death.

St. Paul (Ro 10<sup>7</sup>), adapting Dt 30<sup>13</sup>, teaches the same truth, 'For it is not necessary to search the scriptures; for Christ is risen from the dead. He regards the Descent as the preparation for the Ascension, Eph 4<sup>9</sup>: 'Now this, He ascended, what is it but that he also descended into the lower parts of the earth?' In the LXX rendering of Ps 62<sup>10</sup> (63<sup>9</sup>), this καταβήκα εἰς ἡλίου, is referred to Hades. It is probable that St. Paul uses it in the same sense. Obedience even unto death secured for the Lord the sovereignty of the underworld; His descent was the pledge of His lordship over it (Ph 2<sup>10</sup>).

The famous passage 1 P 3<sup>18-20</sup> (cf 4<sup>6</sup>) introduces the question of the object of the Descent. 'Because Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the spirit; in which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which aforetime were disobedient, when the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing'; 4<sup>6</sup>: 'For unto this end was the gospel preached even to the dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.'

The earliest Christian tradition, which was probably independent of this passage, certainly supports the interpretation that Christ preached to the spirits of the men and women who were drowned in the Flood. Not until the time of St. Augustine was any other interpretation offered. The Apostle is endeavouring to encourage his readers in Christlike patience under persecution. Christ died, the just for the unjust, but His death in the flesh was followed by His living in the spirit. Therefore we need not fear persecution, which will bring us freedom from sin and increase of spiritual energy. The reference which follows (v. 22) to the Ascension suggests that this preaching took place after Christ's death, and not that Christ in Noah preached to the men of Noah's time.

In view of modern interpretations, however, we must enter further into detail. καταβήκα in the NT generally refers to the descent of the Lord, but it refers also to spirits of the dead, 1 P 3:22, cf. Lk 24:46-48. And 1 P 4:6 proves that the same sense here.

Some critics suppose that the spirits were to the fallen angels mentioned in Job 38:7; according to Baur, after Christ's death; according to others, before the Incarnation. This view is supported by Charles (art. 'Eschatology' in Encyc. Bibl.) as the only possible alternative. But Charles holds that Christ preached a gospel of redemption between His death and His resurrection. Salmond thinks that the key may be found in a non-canonical Jewish book. Others, again, think that Enoch was regarded as an incarnation of the Messiah, and that the passage refers to his preaching. But as Clemen says (Niedergefahren, p. 131), while we hear in the Book of Enoch (12<sup>4</sup>, 13<sup>6</sup>, 14<sup>1</sup>) of a preaching of punishment to fallen angels, we hear nothing of a preaching of salvation to the souls of men.

Perhaps the most extraordinary interpretation of all is that which Clemen quotes from Cramer. An unknown person, in possession of 1 and 2 Pet., is supposed to have been reminded by v. 22 of a former ὑποταγή of angels, and therefore on the basis of 2 P 2<sup>4</sup>, with which he compared Jude 6, 14 and also the Book of Enoch, is supposed to have written ἐν ᾧ καὶ τὸν Ἐνώχ τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν πορεύεσθαι (1 Pet. 3:19), understanding πνεύμασιν of angels and ἐκήρυξεν of a concorda damnatoria. Some one else at a later time, referring the first word to the souls of the departed and the latter to the preaching of salvation reading ΕΝΩΚ for ΕΝΩΧ, and this again for ἐν ᾧ καὶ, took the whole into the text after v 18.

* Some commentators explain the words as contrasting the earth beneath with the heavens above, and refer them to the Incarnation when Christ descended to the earth.

† The tense of ὑποταγή shows that the preaching was regarded as a completed act in the past.

Such speculations are absurd. On the other hand, it is reasonable to explain the ἐκήρυξεν of the one passage by the εὐαγγελίσθη of the other, to maintain that repentance was offered, rejecting the suggestion that Christ preached only to the righteous, or to those who had repented at the moment of death, or to some the gospel and to others damnation.

If it is asked, Why should only the generation of Noah profit by it? we can say that they were typical sinners, cut off in their sins, whose fate was mentioned at that time. Bigg shows that 'it is possible that St. Peter is here expressing in a modified form a belief which was current in the Jewish schools.' Certain passages in the Book of Enoch seem to mean that the antediluvian sinners have a time of repentance allowed them between the first judgment (the Deluge) and the final judgment; e.g. 69-66 'There was great joy among them because the name of the Son of Man was revealed unto them,' Bereshith Rabba: (a) 'But when they that are bound, they that are in Gehinnom, saw the light of the Messiah, they rejoiced to receive Him'; (b) 'This is that which stands written: "We shall rejoice and exult in Thee." When? When the Son of Man came up out of hell, and the Shekinah

We may hope that research will yet further enlighten us on these points. Enough has been said to prove that, in the words of Professor Charles (art. cited):

'These passages in 1 Peter are of extreme value. They attest the achievement of the final stage in the moralization of Shōl. The first step in this moralization was taken early in the 2nd cent. B.C., when it was transferred into a place of moral distinction. It had been originally one of merely social or national character. This moralization, however, was carried out. What they were on entering Shōl continued to be till the final judgment. From the standpoint of

2. Early Christian tradition.—The belief that Christ's descent into Hades changed in some way the condition of the faithful departed meets us in the earliest Christian tradition.

Ignatius (A.D. 115), writing to the Magnesians (c. ix), says: 'Even the prophets, being His disciples, were expecting Him as their teacher through the Spirit. And for this cause He whom they rightly awaited, when He came, raised them from the dead.'

Jerome (c. 380), in his Commentary on Isaiah, says: 'The Lord God remembered His dead people of Israel, who lay in the graves, and descended to preach to them His own salvation.'

Irenaeus quotes this passage both from Isaiah (in iii 23) and from Jeremiah (in iv 56), and (in iv 55) without naming the author. Apocryphal Irenaeus (c. 180) heard it from those who had seen the Apostles and from those who had been their disciples, as saying that 'the Lord descended to the underworld, preaching His advent there also and declaring remission of sins received by those who believe in Him.'

Tertullian (de Anima, c. 35) taught that Christ 'in Hades underwent the law of human death, nor did He ascend to the heights of heaven, until He descended to the lower parts of the earth, that there He might make patriarchs and prophets saints of His life.'

We may even claim the heretic Marcion as a witness to this widespread tradition, though in his view, according to Irenaeus (I. xxvii. 3), it was Cain and the Sodomites and others who were released by the Lord from Hades.

The apocryphal Gospel of Peter, which may be dated possibly from about A.D. 165, contains the following passage: 'They see three men coming forth from the tomb, two of them supporting the other, and a cross following them; and the head of the two reached to heaven; but that of Him who was led by them overpassed the heavens. And they heard a voice from the heavens saying, Hast thou preached to them that sleep? and a response was heard from the cross, Yea.'

The apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, a name given in the 13th cent. to two much older books, the Acts of Pilate and the Descent into Hell, tells the same story of the two brothers with a considerable amount of detail.

Clement of Alexandria (c. 180), a writer who brings Peter into connexion with the tradition that he benefited OT saints. He taught that the heathen, as well as the Jews, shared in the revelation made to the souls in Hades. He quotes Hermas (Sym ix 16), who taught that the Apostles and first teachers of the gospel, when they preached to the heathens as well as Jews, thought of themselves as well as Jews, though himself contemplated such an application of his words. The example quoted by St. Peter appeared to him to be only one example of a far-reaching law (Strom vi 6).

Origen seems to have been the first to suggest that, since the coming of Christ, the souls of the faithful can go at once to Paradise, as an intermediate state between the living and the dead. He quotes Celsus (ii. 43), to the effect, 'You will not surely say that Christ, when He failed to persuade the living, went down to Hades to persuade those who dwell there?' He replies: 'The soul, stripped of the body, did there hold converse with other souls that were in like manner stripped, that He might there convert those who were capable of instruction, or were otherwise in ways known to Him fit for it.'

Athanasius speaks of the wardens at the gates of Hell 'covering in fear at the presence of the Lord,' quoting in this connexion Mt 27:54. He thinks (de Sal. Aduent 9) of 'the soul of Adam as held fast under the sentence of death, and crying to his Lord evermore, and of those who had pleased God, and had been justified by the law of nature, as mourning and crying with him,' till God in His mercy revealed the mystery of redemption. He quotes 1 P 3:19 in connexion with the Descent into Hell, while they regarded Hades as something of a prison, and Jerome (Comm. in Isaias) of thought. This notion of the doctrine of the Limbus Patrum.

the living should enjoy not share in freedom? John the Baptist's question as referring to the Descent. In this opinion he was followed by Rufinus.

Hilary of Poitiers (on P. 1:10) says that the souls of the faithful as knowing, on the witness of the Apostle Peter, that when the Lord went down into Hades, words of comfort were preached even to those who were in prison and were finally unchained in the days of Noah. It is interesting to add that the Venerable Bede quoted the words, without in order to condemn them, on the ground that they taught only the release of the faithful.

It was reserved for the 19th cent. to give a new interpretation to St. Peter's words. The books he accepts the current teaching, but confuses Hades and Gehenna. In de Gen. ad litt. xii 63, he says that there is reason for believing that the soul of Christ descended to the underworld, that He might release the righteous judgment, who be loosed.

In his letter to Eudodius, Bp. of Uzala, on the right interpretation of 1 P 3:19, as Bp. Horsley puts it, 'he perplexes himself with questions? Why, out of all the tens of thousands who had died before the coming of Christ, should He alone be released? He notes that some believed this of Abel, Seth, Noah, and other patriarchs worse off than Abraham? If they were at rest, how could they be benefited by Christ's descent into Hades? What was done for the disobedient? No one would be done for all who died in ignorance before or since. But the idea that a man might believe after death would weaken the appeal of Christian preaching to the "terrors of the Lord." Not able to believe in salvation without Baptism, he cuts the knot of the difficulty by denying that the words of St. Peter had anything to do with the descent of Christ into Hades. Christ preached in spirit in the days of Noah as in Galilee in the days of His flesh. Plumptre truly says "he leaves all the questions which he had started as to the descent itself unanswered." Finally (de Heres 79), he reckoned it a loss to have that Christ cleared Hell of all the souls that were there in torment.

3. Creeds and Articles of Religion.—At the end of the 4th cent., Rufinus, commenting on the clause 'descended into hell' in the Creed of his native city of Aquileia, noted that it was not contained in the Creed of the Church of Rome or in Eastern Creeds. This is true of Baptismal Creeds, but not of others. The words had found a place in three confessions of faith put forward by Arian Synods at Sirmium, Nice, and Constantinople.

Sirmium, A.D. 359.	Nice, A.D. 359.	Constantinople, A.D. 380.
καὶ εἰς τὰ καταχθόνια κατελθόντα, καὶ τὰ ἐκείνους οἰκονομήσαντα ὃν τυλαροὶ ἄβου ἰδόντες ἔβριζαν.	καὶ ταφέντα καὶ εἰς τὰ καταχθόνια κατελθόντα ὃν αὐτὸς ὁ ἄδης ἰτρομασε	καὶ ταφέντα καὶ εἰς τὰ καταχθόνια κατεληλυθότα ὄντινα καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ ἄδης ἔττηξεν

It is interesting to compare also the recently discovered 'Faith of St Jerome,' which contains the words 'descended into hell, trod down the sting of death.' It has been found by Dom G. Moirin, O S B, in some four MSS, and is probably the Confession of Faith which Jerome notes in one of the letters he had drawn up for Cyril of Jerusalem. This 'Faith' contains elements which may have been drawn from his Creed of Pannonia. In like manner it is found that the Sirmium Creed, quoted above, at this point quoted the Baptismal Creed of the district, since Sirmium is in the south-east corner of Pannonia. But it seems that the Creed was drawn up mainly by Mark, Bp of Arethusa in Palestine; and there are traces of the influence of Cyril of Jerusalem elsewhere in this document. The doctrine was one on which he felt strongly; and, therefore, in default of further evidence as to the Pannonian Creed, it is safer to trace to his influence the occurrence of the words in the Creed of Sirmium, on which the Creeds of Nice and Constantinople are dependent.

As regards the interpretation put on the clause in the Creed of Aquileia, Pearson is incorrect when he suggests that Rufinus merely regarded it as equivalent to 'buried,' which was omitted. The Creed certainly contained the word 'buried,' and Rufinus was at pains to show that this word in the Eastern Creeds, as in the Roman, included the idea of a descent into Hades. Swete (p. 61) suggests that Rufinus had lost the clue to the interpretation of the clause, and that the addition was made before his time, possibly to meet the expediency of the latter part of the 2nd century. The difficulty about this suggestion is that the Doctrinal Gospel of Peter, as we have seen, certainly teaches belief in the descent. The present writer would rather regard pseudo-Peter as agreeing to the common belief of the 2nd cent, and explain the addition in the Aquileian Creed as derived from the ordinary catechetical teaching, of which it may have been as 'necessary a dogma' then in Aquileia as in Jerusalem in the 4th century.

In the time of Rufinus it might seem more necessary to insist on such teaching in view of the rise of the heresy of Apollinaris, who denied that the Lord had a human soul. But Rufinus himself gives no hint of this. There is more reason to connect the occurrence of the clause in the so-called Athanasian Creed, now generally accepted as a Gallican writing of the 5th cent, with its connection to Apollinarianism, because the latter had that heresy in view. There is, however, no evidence that the clause had yet passed into any Gallican Creed. By the end of the century we find it in the Creed of Caesarius of Arles, and in the century following in the Creeds of Venantius Fortunatus of Poitiers and of the Spanish Bishop Martin of Bracara. Thus it passed into the Received Text of the Western Creed.

During the Middle Ages the idea of the 'Harrowing of Hell' was made popular by the Gospel of Nicodemus, and as the theme of Mystery Plays, and at a later time by Christian Art. Discussion seldom arose. But the opinion of Abelard that the soul of Christ entered the underworld only virtually and not substantially, was condemned by the Council of Sens (1140) and Pope Innocent II. It found favour with Durandus and Pico della Mirandola, whose names may suffice to show that the debate was not extinct in the 15th century. During the Reformation period, controversy began to wax fierce, and was reflected in some of the more famous Articles of Religion. In the Confession of Faith the bare fact of the Descent is stated, 'The Catechism taught that the Descent meant only the terrible anguish with which the soul of Christ was tried. The Catechism of the Church of the Palatinate explained that Christ descended in order that the Christian in all his mental and spiritual agonies might know that there was One who had borne them and could sympathize with them. These Catechisms reflect the opinion of prominent leaders of thought. Luther, in his Table Talk (ccvi.), spoke of the laying of the devil in chains as the purpose of the Descent. His view fluctuated, but in his Com. on Hos 6th he wrote that Peter clearly teaches that Christ bore some who, in the time of Noah, had sinned, and who waited for the long-suffering of God—that is, who hoped that God would not enter into so strict a judgment with all flesh—to the intent that they might acknowledge that their sins were forgiven through the sacrifice of Christ.

It was Calvin (Institut. ii. 16) who taught the revolting doctrine that the Descent means that in His suffering on earth, in Gethsemane and on the Cross, Christ suffered all the horrors of hell. To which Pearson's words are a sufficient reply: 'There is a worm that never dieth which could not lodge within His breast; that is, a remorse of conscience, seated in the soul, for what that soul hath done; but such a remorse of conscience could not be in Christ.' Zwingli (Trith. chr. exp., art. 'de Christo,' 7) taught that when Christ died the weight of His Redemption penetrated to the Underworld.

The Westminster Standards practically ignore the question of the Descent. The Shorter Catechism is wholly silent, and so is the Shorter Catechism. The only allusion to the subject is in the Larger Catechism, where the answer to Question 50 runs 'Christ's humiliation after His death consisted in His being buried, and continuing in the state of the dead, and under the power of death till the third day; which hath been otherwise expressed in these words, He descended into hell.'

Bishop Alley of Exeter, in a paper drawn up for the Convocation of 1553, wrote: 'There have been in my diocese great invocations between the preachers.' He asked that some certainty might be set concerning this doctrine. Perhaps this explains the form which was given to the third of the Forty-two Articles of 1553.

'As Christ died and was buried for us: so also it is to be believed that He went down into hell. For the body lay in the sepulchre until the resurrection: but His ghost departing from Him was with the ghosts that were in prison or in hell, and did preach to the same, as the place of St. Peter doth testify.'

Bishop Alley's 'hope of certainty' was not fulfilled, and in 1563 the Elizabethan revisers, with rare wisdom, struck out the last clause.

The Roman Catechism* speaks of the release of holy and just men as the purpose of the Descent, of the imparting of the fruit of the Passion, and of the Beatific Vision.

4. Summary of the controversy in modern times.—We may begin this section with the names of Pearson and Hammond, who agreed in teaching that the only meaning of St. Peter's words was that Christ by His Holy Spirit inspired the preaching of Noah.

Hammond (ad loc.) writes: 'The spirits in the prison are those souls of men that lay so sheathed, so useless and unprofitable in their bodies, immersed so deep in calamity as not to perform any service to God, who inspired and placed them there.' He quotes Is 42<sup>d</sup> 49th 61st to prove that elsewhere it is 'a . . . speech to express wicked men.' 'By His . . . is evidently meant that Divine power by which He was raised from the dead after His crucifixion.' We have already noted the objections to this interpretation, and also the fact that Pearson on this point confuses Hades and Gehenna. He writes, indeed, 'less loudly than is his wont,' but in regard of the Descent regarded as a fact his final summary strikes no uncertain note.

'I give a . . . unto this as to a certain truth, that . . . Christ were finished on the Cross, and His . . . from His body, though His body were dead, . . . not, and though it did not, . . . of such as die, and . . . of a sinner, His soul went to the place where the souls of men are kept who die for their sins, and so did wholly undergo the law of death.'

Barrow taught to the same effect (Serm. xxviii) : 'If we do thus interpret our Saviour's descent into hell, for His soul's going into . . . and mansion of souls, we shall so doing be sure not substantially to mistake.' He adds 'I cannot well be at the pain to consider or examine those conceits, which pretend to acquaint us why and to what effect our Saviour descended into hell.' This almost contemptuous refusal to discuss the passages in St Peter is partly explained by the gaps in the line of evidence of early Christian tradition which was known at that time. Coming from a man of Barrow's calibre, it has probably had great weight.

On the other hand, Jeremy Taylor,* while he avoids any explanation of St Peter's reference to the . . . the Patristic view that Christ improved the condition of holy souls.

'And then it was that Christ made their condition better for though still it be a place of relation in order to something beyond it, yet the term and object of their hope is changed: they sat in the regions of darkness, expecting that great promise made to Adam and the patriarchs, the promise of the Messias; but when He that was promised came, He "preached . . . He communicated . . . rets of the kingdom . . . from eternal ages, and taught them to look up to the glories purchased by . . . and made the term of their expectation be His . . . and the objects of their hope the . . . vision. . . But now it was that in the dark mansions there was a scene of the greatest joy and the greatest horror represented, which yet was known since the first falling of the morning stars. Those holy souls, whom the prophet Zechariah calls "prisoners of hope," lying in the lake where there is no water, that is, no constant stream of joy to refresh their present condition (yet supported with . . . isations from God and illumina- . . . they saw their Redeemer come to change their condition, and to improve it into the neighbourhoods of glory and clearer revelations, must needs have the joy of intelligent and beatified understandings, of redeemed captives, of men forgiven after the sentence of death, of men satisfied after a tedious expectation, enjoying and seeing their Lord, whom, for so many ages, they had expected. But the accursed spirits, seeing the darkness of their prison shine with . . . and their retirements of . . . an durt venture thither, or, if he were a God, how he should come to die.'

Bishop Horsley's sermon on 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> at the end of the 18th cent. is the next important contribution to the subject. He regretted the alteration of the Third Article of 1563. He found it difficult to believe that 'of the millions who died in the Flood all died unrepentant.' He taught that Christ 'certainly preached neither repentance nor faith, for the preaching or either comes too late for the departed soul.' He faced the great difficulty why only this one class of penitents should be mentioned, having 'observed in some parts of Scripture an anxiety, if the expression may be allowed, of the sacred writers to convey distinct intimations that the antediluvian race is not uninterested in the redemption and the final retribution.' The following words also deserve quotation, for they go to the root of the matter. 'If the clear assertions of Holy Writ are to be discredited on account of difficulties which may seem to the human mind to arise out of them, little will remain to be believed in revealed or even in what is called natural religion.'

About the same time, Dr. Hey, Norrisian Professor at Cambridge, gave in his lectures a succinct account of the history of the doctrine, and discussed the difficulty of using the metaphor of descent in popular language (3rd ed. p 654).

There is an excellent survey of the literature of the subject down to the middle of the last century in Dean Alford's Greek Testament. Both he and Bishop Wordsworth accepted the Patristic view that Christ preached salvation to the disembodied spirits of those drowned in the Flood if found penitent. Thus light is thrown on 'one of the darkest enigmas of Divine justice.' Bishop Harold Browne expounded the Article to the same effect, and has been followed recently by Bishop Gibson. But not all writers were equally bold. Bishop Harvey Goodwin was content with what was practically Pearson's position. Bishop Westcott (Historic Faith, p. 77) feared to say more on 'a mystery where our thought fails us and . . . is silent.' Surely this is too dogmatic . . . the . . . consensus of opinion which interprets 1 P . . .

There is a full account of modern German literature on this subject in Clemen's Niedergefahren zu den Toten. He interprets 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> as referring to human . . . builds on it an argument in favour of . . . hope, . . . does not commit himself to any theory . . . Restitution. He makes much use of English books, especially Dean Plur . . . in Prison.

This survey of the . . . controversy leads to the conclusion that eventually agreement will be reached as to the exegesis of the passage in 1 Peter. The weighty authority of Professor Charles may be invoked to prove that the interpretation which accepts Christ's mission to the dead fits in with our fuller knowledge of contemporary Jewish literature. It throws light on one of the darkest enigmas of the Divine justice. At the same time full justice will be done to the early Christian tradition that in some way or other Christ benefited the souls of the faithful departed. But it must be admitted that the bare statement of the Apostles' Creed asserts only that Christ's soul passed into the condition which our souls will enter at death, sanctifying every condition of human existence. Harnack writes that 'the clause is too weak to maintain its ground beside the others, as equally independent and authoritative,' but, as Swete (p. 62) says, he fails to point out in what the weakness lies, while 'to us it appears to possess in a . . . strength which comes from . . . a wise reserve.'

. . . theological opinion justifies the teaching of the poet of the Christian Year:*

'Sleep'st Thou indeed? or is Thy spirit fled

Wake Abraham to rejoice,

Or in some dreamer scene Thine eye controls

The thronging band of souls;

That as Thy blood won earth Thine agon

Might set the shadow-world from sin and sorrow free.'

HERB.—In modern botanical science, 'herb' is a well-defined term, and is applied to plants whose stem dies down annually. In the Bible it is used in a popular sense, being employed to translate several Hebrew and Greek words of varying significance. In the NT it is (except in He 6<sup>7</sup>, where the original has βοράνη) the rendering of λάχανα (Mt 13<sup>32</sup>, Mk 4<sup>32</sup>, Ro 14<sup>3</sup>) or λάχανον (Lk 11<sup>42</sup>), which denotes garden-herbs or vegetables. Many of these, such as lettuce, parsley, mint, etc., are in constant use to the present day. Delitzsch (Heb NT) renders this word by grün, which means 'green herbs' (cf. Dt 11<sup>10</sup>, Pr 15<sup>17</sup>). The other term, βοράνη, means 'pasture,' but is evidently used (l.c.) of herbage in general, including cereals. Delitzsch's translation is grün, 'esebh', which has the same signification.

HERMON.—A mountain on the north-eastern border of Palestine, the culminating point of the range of Anti-Lebanon, rising to an elevation of 9200 ft. above the sea. Its dome-like summit, usually covered with snow till late in summer, can be seen from almost every part of Palestine. Jesus in His youth must have often seen it from the hill west of Nazareth, and, during His ministry, from the Sea of Galilee. It is not mentioned by name in the Gospels, but is generally believed to be the 'high mountain' of Mt 17<sup>9</sup>, Mk 9<sup>2</sup>, and the 'mountain' of Lk 9<sup>28</sup> where the Transfiguration took place. This was probably not on the summit, which could be reached only by long and hard climbing, but on one of the elevated platforms on the southern slope. That Hermon, rather than Tabor (on which there was then a fortified city), is the 'high mountain' referred to, seems clear from the fact that the conversation (Mt 16<sup>21-28</sup>) which preceded the Transfiguration by six days was closely connected with Peter's confession; and this occurred at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16<sup>13-16</sup>), which stood just at the base of Hermon by the springs of Jordan. HEROD (Ἡρώδης).—The rise of the Herodian dynasty* to the throne of the Hasmonæan priest-kings, begun by Antipater the Idumæan, and realized by his second son, Herod the Great,† was closely connected with the ascendancy of Roman power in Palestine. Antipas or Antipater, the grandfather of Herod, had indeed been appointed governor of Idumæa by Alexander Jannæus (Ant. XIV. i. 3), but it was not until after the death of Alexandra (B.C. 67) that Antipater, who had succeeded his father Antipas in Idumæa found opportunity to advance his interests in the dissensions between Hyrcanus, the legal but weak heir to the throne in Jerusalem, and the younger but more vigorous Aristobulus. Allying himself with Hyrcanus, Antipater secured the aid of the Arabian king Aretas to establish his candidate in the government. Thereupon appeals were made by Hyrcanus and Aristobulus to the Roman general Scaurus, who had been sent by Pompey to Damascus. The Roman power, thus appealed to, at first favoured Aristobulus, but eventually, after Pompey had taken Jerusalem in B.C. 63, made Hyrcanus high priest (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; BJ I. vii. 6), and committed the administration to Scaurus, who in turn was succeeded by Gabinius. Antipater, however, proved himself useful to the Romans, both in the their military operations against also against the Hasmonæans, Aristobulus and his sons Alexander and Antigonus. He thus acquired considerable political influence (Ant. XIV. vi. 4, viii. 1; BJ I. viii. 7; cf. Schurer, GJV 31 343, n. 14). After the battle of Pharsalus (B.C. 48) and the death of Pompey, Cæsar confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, and made him ethnarch. Upon his accession he conferred Roman citizenship upon him.

procurator of Judæa (Ant. XIV. viii. 3, 5, ἐπιτροπος in the sense of ἐπιμελητής; cf. Wellhausen, IJG 316, n. 2). Soon afterwards he appointed his eldest son Phasael procurator of Galilee, and committed the administration of Galilee to his second son Herod, a young man about twenty-five years of age (Ant. XIV. ix. 2; the transmitted text reads πέντε καὶ δέκα, but is conjecturally emended by Dindorf and Bekker to read πέντε καὶ εἰκοσι; cf. Schurer, i. 348, n. 30; Gratz, Hist. 77, reads 'twenty'). The present article is concerned only with the Herods of the Gospels.

1. Herod the Great.—Among the first acts of Herod's administration of Galilee was the suppression of a band of robbers* that harassed his country and parts of Syria (Ant. XIV. ix. 2; BJ I. x. 5). These he captured, and their captain, a certain Hezekias, he slew, along with many of the robbers, —revealing in the energy with which he suppressed disorders a trait of character that even at this time attracted the attention of the Roman government. Syria, Sextus Cæsar, and that he could make him an acceptable ally of the Romans. This act, however, brought Herod under the suspicion of the leaders at Jerusalem, who persuaded Hyrcanus that Herod should be summoned before the Sanhedrin for trial for violation of the national law in putting Hezekias to death without trial. Herod obeyed the summons, but took care to have a sufficient bodyguard to accompany him. At first the members of the Sanhedrin were overawed by such a show of force. They were recalled to a proper sense of their duty by the courageous words of scornful rebuke spoken by Sameas the Pharisee (Ant. XIV. ix. 4; BJ I. x. 5).† When the Sanhedrin was about to condemn Herod, Hyrcanus, who had received instructions from Sextus Cæsar to have him acquitted, intervened and advised Herod to withdraw from Jerusalem. This he did, returning to Damascus. When he had been appointed governor of Coele-Syria by Sextus Cæsar, he threatened Jerusalem with an army; but, having so far satisfied his anger, he withdrew, on the advice of his father Antipater and his brother Phasael.

the poisoning of Antipater (43), the knowledge, if not the consent of Hyrcanus (Ant. XIV. xi. 3, 6, 319, n. 1, 327, n. 3).—Herod's fortunes reached their lowest ebb. Antony, indeed, while he was in the East, made Herod and Phasaël tetrarchs (Ant. XIV. xiii. 1; BJ I. xi. 5); but not long afterwards, Antigonus, with the help of the Parthians, gained possession of Jerusalem, capturing Phasaël and Hyrcanus. Phasaël killed himself; and Hyrcanus, after his ears had been cut off, was taken by the Parthians to Babylon. Herod, who with his family was in Jerusalem, escaped by night, and, after many difficulties, in the midst of which he was on the point of taking his life, came to the fortress Masada. Here he left his family in charge of his brother Joseph and hastened to Rome. Antigonus, in the meantime, had established himself in Jerusalem, where he reigned for three years (B.C. 40–37) as Matthias, the sons of Antigonus bearing the inscription מתיאס בן אנטיוגוס ANTIGONOU בן מתתיהו (99 ff.).

In Rome, Herod had little difficulty, with the aid of Antony and the concurrence of Octavius, in convincing the Senate that they would be serving their own interests by making him king of Judaea instead of Antigonus, who had been placed on the throne by the Parthians (Ant. XIV. xiv. 4; BJ I. xiv. 4). Appointed king by a decree of the Senate (B.C. 40), Herod now had before him the difficult task of conquering his kingdom. He returned to Palestine, raised an army, subdued Joppa, relieved Masada, and was eager to invest Jerusalem. The assistance of the Roman forces under Ventidius and Silo was far from effective; Galilee had to be conquered; it was not until the spring of 37 B.C. that the siege of Jerusalem could be seriously begun. It was during this siege that Herod put away his wife Doris and her son Alexander, celebrated in Samaria his marriage with Mariamne,* daughter of Alexander (son of Aristobulus) and Alexandra (daughter of Hyrcanus) (Ant. XIV. xv. 14; BJ I. xvii. 8; cf. Ant. XIV. xii. 1; BJ I. xii. 3).

Three months after the siege began, Jerusalem fell (Ant. XIV. xvi. 4; BJ I. xviii. 2; cf. Sieffert, PRE<sup>3</sup> vii. 762, l. 24 ff.). The city was saved from plunder and desecration only by a plentiful use of money on Herod's part. Antigonus surrendered himself to the Romans (Ant. XIV. xvi. 2; BJ I. xviii. 2), and at Herod's urgent request was beheaded in Antioch (Ant. XIV. xvi. 4; BJ I. xviii. 3). Herod also had forty-five members of the Sanhedrin slain, but passed over Pollio and Sameas because during the siege they had advised the city to yield to him (Ant. XV. i. 2).

Established in his kingdom by force of the Roman arms, and occupying the status of a rex socius, Herod fully understood that his continuance in power was dependent on the good-will of Rome and her rulers. Hence, throughout his reign of thirty-four years, he did not fail to cultivate in every possible way friendly relations with his overlords. His government, however, though not without some following among the people, never obtained the cordial support or willing consent of the great majority of its subjects. At the beginning of his reign he treated the Sadducean aristocracy with severity, made the high priesthood subject to his own appointment, and deprived the Sanhedrin of all political influence. The Essenes and many of the Pharisees refused to take the oath of loyalty to him or to the Roman emperor. The incipient Zealots or patriotic nationalists, whether gathered in the robber bands of Galilee or cherishing more quietly the old Hasmonæan ideals, were his natural and determined enemies. Herod, moreover, had no natural claims to his throne. Of Idumæan descent, he was in the eyes of his subjects but half-Jew (Ant. XIV. xv. 2), and had to endure, not only from his enemies but within the circle of his own family, taunts upon his low origin. Careful though he was not to offend the religious prejudices of the people in some respects,—for Herod was wiser and more cautious than Antiochus Epiphanes,—his whole reign breathed the spirit of Hellenism and pagan secularization so offensive to the Jews. Even his self-denying and efficient provision for the country when visited by famine, or his remission in part of a burdensome taxation, or his magnificent restoration of the Temple, called forth only momentary gratitude in the hearts of the people. Successful at Rome, unsuccessful in Jerusalem, Herod greatly increased the material interests of his country, and by the favour of Rome enlarged its borders. But while he rebuilt the Temple and dedicated it with great splendour and large sacrifices—boasting that he had done what the Hasmonæans were not able to do—he placed above the Temple gate a golden eagle in honour of the Romans, built a theatre, amphitheatre, and hippodrome in or near Jerusalem for Greek plays and heathen games, and in other places erected temples for the cult of the emperor Augustus. He built or restored many cities and fortresses throughout his territory, and constructed a city (Sebastus) at Strato's Tower, which he enlarged and called Cæsarea. He colonized restless Trachonitis with Jewish warriors from Babylon, and extended his munificence far beyond the bounds of his own country, to Syria, Asia Minor, Rhodes, Greece, and Macedonia. Agrippa, and Augustus were entertained by him with royal honours, and in his will he made handsome bequests to his friends of the imperial household in Rome.

It is customary to divide the reign of Herod into three periods. The first extends from his accession in B.C. 37 to the death of the sons of Babas in B.C. 25, when the last members of the Hasmonæan family were exterminated by the pathway. This period was characterized by the establishment and extension of Herod's power. The principal forces that he had to combat came from the royal family he had supplanted and to which he was allied by marriage. Alexandra, the mother of Mariamne, knew how to enlist the interest of Cleopatra, and Cleopatra had the ear of Antony. The measures adopted by Herod to meet the situation were not of the gentlest kind. He recalled Hyrcanus from Babylon, and though he treated him with every consideration, Josephus attributes to Herod the motive of wishing to get Hyrcanus in his power.* In view of the fact that Hyrcanus could not be appointed to the high priesthood, and that Aristobulus, the brother of Mariamne, was only about seventeen years of age, Herod made Ananel, a Babylonian Jew of priestly family, high priest. This did not please Alexandra, and she appealed to Cleopatra on behalf of her son. Thereupon Herod deposed Ananel and appointed Aristobulus in his stead. But the popularity of the young Hasmonæan aroused Herod's suspicion, and Aristobulus was drowned soon after the feast of Tabernacles in the year B.C. 35. At the instance of Cleopatra, who learned of the event from Alexandra, Herod was summoned before Antony to give an account of the death of Aristobulus. Before answering the summons, Herod gave instructions to his uncle Joseph, in whose hands he left the kingdom, that Mariamne should be put to death in the event of an unfavourable issue of his mission. Herod regained the favour of Antony, but had eventually to surrender to Cleopatra one of the most fruitful parts of his territory, the famous palm- and olive-land country about Jericho, together with the cities from the river Eleutherus to Egypt, with the exception of Tyre and Sidon. On his return from the conference with Antony at Laodicea (Syrian), Herod learned through his sister Salome, the evil genius of his family troubles, that Joseph had revealed his command to Mariamne. Joseph was put to death, but a fruitful soil for suspicion against Mariamne remained. When Cleopatra, who had accompanied Antony on his expedition to Armenia, returned through Judaea, Herod entertained her; and, through her charms, he won back his territory about Jericho, and to guarantee himself due to her from the king of Arabia.

* The exact date of the event is retained here, although Μαρκ is adopted in the Greek text, both of Naber and of Nestle, and in the text of BJ I. § 241, Μαριαμνη. The Μαρκ is a variant by Niese in Ant. xv. § 27, Μαρκ I. § 131 Μαρκ. In Ant. the MS E spells consistently Μαριαμνη (except in xvii § 335, where Μαρκ occurs) as M does in BJ.

* Matthews (Hist. of NT Times, 118, n. 1) rejects Josephus' account of Herod's motive (cf. also Schurer<sup>3</sup> i. 378, Wellhausen<sup>3</sup>, 321 and Woodhouse, Exeget. Bibl. ii. 2206, n. 4). On the other hand, cf. Sieffert, PRE<sup>3</sup> vii. 762, l. 48 ff., and the indications given above that Hyrcanus was implicated in the death of Antipater.

Herod's contract proved to be a bad one, for the king of Arabia was slow in meeting his financial obligations. Hence, when war broke out between Antony and Octavius, and Herod was desirous of giving aid to Antony, Cleopatra, never doubting that Antony would be victor, thwarted Herod's purpose and sent him instead against the Arabians, in the hope that the two kings would destroy one another. Herod at first defeated the Arabians, but finally suffered a severe reverse, through the treacherous intervention of Cleopatra's general Athenio. About this time an earthquake brought great suffering on the people, and Herod's soldiers were discouraged. The Jewish ambassadors sent to the Arabians had been slain, and Herod's condition seemed desperate. His own courage, however, inspired his troops, and a decisive victory was gained over the enemy.

But Herod had scarcely re-established his power when news of the battle of Actium (2nd Sept. B.C. 31) brought him face to face with the crisis of his reign. Before going to Octavius to learn his fate, Herod had the aged Hyrcanus put to death for plotting with the Arabian governor Malchus to escape from Jerusalem.* Placing the government in charge of his brother Pheroras, and leaving his mother and sister at Masada, but Mariamne and Alexandra at Alexandrinum in care of Sohemus, with instructions that Mariamne and her mother should be killed if disaster overtook him,† Herod went to meet Octavius in Rhodes. He appeared before the emperor in a magnificent chariot, wearing his diadem. His appeal for favour was based on a frank avowal of his dependence on Antony, and of his desire to aid him at Actium. But Antony had refused to take his advice about Cleopatra, and had fallen. He now offered Octavius the same loyalty and support that he had given Antony. Moreover, Herod had already had opportunity of proving his loyalty to his new master by preventing Antony's gladiators from passing through his territory to join Antony in Egypt. At the close of the interview Octavius restored Herod's diadem, and confirmed him in his kingdom. In a short time Octavius even enlarged Herod's kingdom, restoring the territory taken from it by Antony for Cleopatra, and a number of cities, such as Gadara, Hippos, Samaria, Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and Strato's Tower. This was done in recognition of Herod's aid to the imperial army as it passed into Egypt.

When Herod returned from Rhodes, his old suspicions against Mariamne were aroused by discovering that Sohemus had repeated the folly of Joseph. Sohemus was executed, and soon afterwards Mariamne was tried on the charge of attempting to poison Herod, and put to death about the year B.C. 29. But Herod had loved her with a wild passion. After her death his remorse and an uncontrollable yearning for her (which Byron has finely expressed in one of his Hebrew Melodies) quickly brought him to the verge of insanity (cf. also Stephen Phillips, Herod). At length, when he fell sick in Samaria, Alexandra sought to gain possession of the fortresses in Jerusalem. But Herod, rousing himself from his stupor, had her put to death (B.C. 28). Costobar also and the sons of Babas were put to death on the evidence of Salome, who revealed the hiding-place of these men of Hasmonæan descent* and partizanship, and the part played by her husband in the conspiracy (cf. Ant. xv. 25). Herod was now well recovered from his illness, and in favour with Augustus, and triumphant over his enemies.

The second period of Herod's reign, extending from B.C. 25 to B.C. 13, was characterized by extension of his kingdom, and great building operations. In B.C. 25, Herod and Auranitis were given to him by Augustus about B.C. 23 (Ant. xv. x 1; BJ i. xx. 4), and to these the tetrarchy of Zenodorus together with the country of Ulatha and Pnias was added about three years later (Ant. xv. x 3; BJ i. xx. 4; Dio Cass. xiv. 9). During this period many cities were built or beautified by Herod, both in his own territory and in surrounding countries. Fortresses were constructed, and temples in honour of Venus and Mars at Samaria (Sebaste), Pnias (Cæsarea), and Strato's Tower (Cæsarea). But the greatest of Herod's works of construction were the harbour at Strato's Tower and the Temple at Jerusalem. The latter, begun about B.C. 19, was partially completed in a year and a half (the inner temple), and the whole brought to a temporary completion in about eight years, when it was formally dedicated, although work was continued on it until the time of Albinus (procurator A.D. 62-64, cf. Ant. xv. xi. 5, 6, xx. ix. 7; Jn 2<sup>20</sup>). Herod also built himself a magnificent palace in Jerusalem. Theatre, amphitheatre, and hippodrome were the scenes of plays and games not only in Cæsarea and Jericho, but in Jerusalem. Mercenary troops aided by spies and strict police regulations, kept the people in subjection. Outlying districts such as Trachonitis were colonized to suppress disturbances. Herod's power was at its height. In his court were men of Greek learning, such as Nicolaus of Damascus and his brother Ptolemy. As a rex solutus Herod had the right to issue copper coinage. His friendship with Rome was firmly established. He interested himself in the Jews of the Dispersion, and helped to secure them their rights in Asia Minor. He also made generous provision from his private means to alleviate the suffering caused by a famine (B.C. 25), and on two occasions remitted part of the people's taxes, one-third in B.C. 20 and one-fourth in B.C. 14. But the glory of his reign and the material splendour of his works were offensive to the religious consciousness of his subjects, and his sporadic acts of unselfishness failed to arouse any permanently cordial response in the people.

* Josephus (Ant. xv. vi. 1), consistently with his account of Herod's motive in recalling Hyrcanus from Babylon, intimates that Herod sought an occasion of removing Hyrcanus. Schürer (l. 384) questions Josephus' account of the treasonable letter, on the ground that such an action would be unlikely in a man of Hyrcanus' age. He accepts the account of Herod's motive in this instance, however, regarding it as a more probable and a sufficient explanation of Hyrcanus' death (cf. also Mathews, 120, n. 3. On the participation of the Sanhedrin, cf. Ant. xv. xvi. 2, and Wellhausen, 327, n. 1).

* Just what their descent was does not clearly appear from Josephus. They seem to have been related to the Hasmonæans. They were to have been killed when Herod took Jerusalem. But Costobar saved them, and had kept them concealed until Salome, his wife, left him, and made the matter known to Herod.

The last period of Herod's reign, from B.C. 13 to B.C. 4, was one of family intrigue which formed, as Wellhausen aptly puts it, 'a chapter of court history in true Oriental style.' After the death of Mariamne, Herod had married another Mariamne, daughter of a certain Simon, a priest whom Herod had made high priest. He had also other wives, seven in number. His first wife had been recalled to court. His sister Salome and his mother Cypros had already shown some ability in the gentle art of false suggestion. Herod's brother Pheroras, whom he had made tetrarch of Peraea and Idumaea, was at hand with his wife. There were present also the two heirs to the throne, Alexander and Aristobulus, sons of Mariamne I., both proud of their Hasmonæan descent, possibly a little haughty in their manner, certainly a little unwise in their confidential conversations; having a grievance in the unjust death of their mother, but no protection against its misuse by their enemies; holding their mother's opinion of Herod's kindred,—an opinion shared by Glaphyra, wife of Aristobulus and daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and fully reciprocated in kind by Salome and Cypros. If to this we add the villainy of a scoundrel like Euryclus, the presence of Antipater, Herod's eldest son, recalled to court for the purpose of checking presumptuous hopes of succession on the part of Alexander and Aristobulus; and, finally, the suspicious nature of Herod, now made more so by age, and the use of an absolute power over the lives of his subjects to extort evidence by torture,—under such conditions as these, 'where many things were done and more were believed and repeated,' intrigue could hardly fail to ripen into tragedy.

Soon after the return of Alexander and Aristobulus from Rome, where they had been educated, they were suspected of plotting against Herod for their mother's death, and their presumptuous hopes of succession to the throne. Herod himself preferred charges against them before the Emperor at Rome. Alexander succeeded in effecting a flight, but Alexander was arrested, but released under the influence of Archelaus. Gradually, however, the meshes of intrigue closed around the Hasmonæan brothers. Permission was obtained from Augustus to bring them to trial, but the Emperor's suggestions about the constitution of the court were not strictly adhered to. Herod himself appeared as a witness against his sons, and the court condemned them by a majority vote, Saturninus and his sons dissenting. They were strangled at Sebaste (Samaria), and buried at Alexandrinum about the year B.C. 7. Finally, on the death of his brother Pheroras, Herod discovered that Pheroras had gone to Rome bearing a letter from Augustus which named him as successor to the throne, was himself implicated in a patricidal plot. Thereupon Herod wrote to Antipater, urging with great solicitude and paternal affection his speedy return. On arriving in Jerusalem, Antipater was brought to trial before Varus, Nicolaus of Damascus appearing to prosecute the case for Herod. And when Antipater failed to clear himself, he was cast into prison, while Herod awaited permission from Augustus to put him to death.

Herod was now grown old. His physical constitution, naturally powerful and robust, began to give way. The hot baths of Callirhoe gave little or no relief to his disorders. It soon became known that he was suffering from an incurable disease, and the signs of popular rejoicing only embittered the last hours of his despotic reign. The stirring of his anger, as on a former occasion, seemed to rouse his waning energy. When the disciples of two popular teachers of the Law in Jerusalem, Judas and Matthias, cut down the golden eagle from the gate of the Temple, Herod returned, and had forty-two of the including their teachers, burned to sufferings now became more intense. A bath in warm oil ordered by his physicians almost killed him, and in a fit of despair he even attempted to take his own life. Josephus also reports that he gave orders that at the moment of his death all the principal men of the country, whom he had gathered in the hippodrome at Jericho, should be put to death, in order that the people might have cause to sorrow at his departure. But this order was never carried out (cf. Wellhausen<sup>4</sup>, 345, n. 2). The imprisoned Antipater about this time, thinking that his father was dead, sought to escape; but Herod, learning of it, and having just received authority for his execution from Rome, gave the order for his death. On the fifth day after the death of Antipater, Herod died at Jericho, in March or April of the year B.C. 4, being about seventy years of age, and having reigned thirty-seven years since his appointment by the Roman Senate and thirty-four since the fall of Jerusalem. His body was carried to Jerusalem, and interred with military honours.

Herod had received from Augustus at Aquileia the right to dispose of his kingdom as he willed, and at a time contemplated abdication in favour of his sons, but was restrained by the Emperor (Ant. xvi. 4). When he returned to Jerusalem, he made public announcement of his intention that the succession should go to Antipater first, and then to Alexander and Aristobulus. Before his death he made three wills. In the first, made about B.C. 6, Antipater was named to succeed to the throne, or, in case of his death, Herod (Philip) the son of Mariamne the high priest's daughter (Ant. xvii. 2; BJ. i. xxix. 2). In the second, made after the treachery of Antipater had been discovered, Antipas was named as his heir (Ant. xvii. 1; BJ. i. xxxii. 7). In the third, made shortly before his death, Archelaus was appointed to succeed to Judaea and Samaria, with the title of king, Antipas was given Peraea, with the title of tetrarch; and Philip, with a similar title, received Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Batanea (Ant. xvii. viii. 1; BJ. i. xxxii. 7).

Although Josephus gives a very detailed account of Herod's reign depending to a far greater extent on Nicolaus of Damascus than his occasional citations would indicate (cf. Schurer<sup>3</sup>, i. 82 ff.), it is not historically probable that he has recorded every incident found in his sources, much less every incident that occurred during his reign. For, while his representation has in its main features and even in most of its details the appearance of a faithful and trustworthy narrative, it is not unlikely that he has misunderstood or misrepresented some movements, such as the character of the robbers in Galilee; others he has neglected for some reason, such as the Messianic ideas of the time, and their popular influence witnessed by the Psalms of Solomon and the NT (cf. Mt 21st; and Mathews, Hist. 126, The Messianic Hope in the NT, 13 ff.). It is possible also that Josephus misrepresented some details of the history through misunderstanding his sources, such, for example, as the day of the fall of Jerusalem, or, again, assigned wrong motives for actions, and even narrated as fact what did not happen. There are some descriptions of different events which reveal striking similarities, and there are some apparent inconsistencies. The narrative in BJ is closely parallel with that in Ant, but in some instances the one contains what the other omits. If therefore, we may estimate the Josephus as an historian, his silence can be used as an argument against the historicity of an event, otherwise attested, only in case it can be shown that Josephus or his source could not have been in ignorance of the event, and would have had good reason to mention it had it occurred, and no good reason to omit it if known. But even should this be the argument from silence would have only secondary value in confirming a negative judgment, since any judgment in such a case must depend primarily upon the character of the source in which the event is recorded.

Both St Matthew and St. Luke assign the birth of Jesus to a time shortly before the death of Herod (Mt 2<sup>1st</sup>, Lk 1<sup>5-26-56</sup> 2<sup>1st</sup>). This event, although not mentioned by Josephus, could not have taken place later than the spring of B.C. 4. St. Luke, indeed, brings the event more directly into connexion with the death of Herod by mentioning the imperial edict, which caused the journey of Joseph and Mary from Nazareth to Bethlehem. St. Matthew, on the other hand, by narrating the visit of the Wise Men from the East (μάγοι ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν, Mt 2<sup>1</sup>), gives us a glimpse of Jerusalem and Herod wonderfully true to the historical and psychological probabilities that may be inferred from Josephus and other sources. The arrival of the Magi in Jerusalem, the form of their question revealing the fact that they were not Jews, the Messianic significance of their question and its appreciation by the people and by Herod, the consequent effect on the city and on the king, Herod's selection of the scribes where the Christ, i.e. the Messiah, should be born, the answer according well not only with OT prophecy but with the Messianic ideas of the time. Matth. 94, n. 86; Bousset, Religion des Juifs, 214), and, finally, the character of Herod, his dissimulating, treacherous, — the whole narrative vividly reflects the historical conditions of the closing years of Herod's reign. The local colouring betrays no false touch. The ideas and scenes are appropriate to the times, and the character of Herod is quite his own. When St. Matthew tells us that Herod in his anger at being deceived by the Magi slew all the children of two years and under in Bethlehem and its borders, we still recognize perfectly the man whose closing years were filled with passion and bloodshed. Josephus, indeed, does not mention the incident. What he does narrate of Herod, however, bears indirect testimony to a fact so entirely consistent with Herod's character. If the fact therefore be denied, the denial will rest on subjective rather than historical grounds.

Gratz, indeed, remarks (Hist. of the Jews, ii 116): 'A legend of later date tells how Herod was not satisfied with shedding the blood of his own children, but how, in a passion, he ordered all children under two years of age in Bethlehem and the surrounding country to be massacred, because he had heard that the Messiah was to be born there. David had been born in that place.' Similarly I. Broyd (Jewish Encyclopedia vi. 380), who, however, makes appeal to the fact that 'the massacre of the Innocents as related in the NT is now generally admitted by all Christian thinkers to be legendary. For this opinion there is no historical evidence is advanced. The assumed character of St. Matthew's narrative is strengthened by appeal to the fact that the story is only subjective and dogmatic. The attempt is made to ground such a judgment historically by comparing Mt and Lk, and inferring from their differences the untrustworthy character of each. The fundamental objection to the historicity of the Gospel narratives is, however, not so much the differences between them, which simply prove their relative independence, as the fact that they record, and in particular, in this narrative, the star of the Magi. Dr. Zahn suggested an interpretation of this phenomenon as a purely natural occurrence, described, however, not in terms of scientific precision but in popular language, and from the point of view of the Magi. But even should such an explanation be thought exegetically inadequate, the historicity of the narrative could be denied, and the narrative itself justly described as a legend, on principles of interpretation whose validity rests on their dependence on naturalistic premises, logically excluded from the sphere of history all miraculous events, and necessarily explained the narratives of such events as legendary in character and origin.

For an account of Herod's son Archelaus see ARCHELAUS.

2. Antipas.—The second son of Herod and Malthake, the full brother of Archelaus, is called by Josephus Ἀντίπας (Ant. xvii. vii. 1) or Ἡρώδης (xviii. ii. 1). In the NT and on the coins only the name Ἡρώδης appears. Under his father's last will, as ratified by Augustus, Antipas received Peræa and Galilee, with the title τetrάρχης (see TETRARCH). He is commonly designated by this title in the NT, although the popular ὁ βασιλεὺς occurs in Mk 6<sup>14th</sup>, Mt 14<sup>9</sup>.

We know little concerning the events of Antipas' long reign (B.C. 4–A.D. 39). The narrative given by Josephus is very meagre after the death of Herod the Great.* Having little to tell of Archelaus, Josephus introduced very interesting digressions about the Pharisees, Sadducees, Zealots, and Essenes (Ant. xviii. i–vi.; BJ ii. viii. 1–14). But, when he came to tell of Antipas, he filled in with an account of the Parthians and their relations with Rome—with which, indeed, Antipas was incidentally connected (cf. Ant. xviii. ii. 4, iv. 4; Schurer<sup>3</sup>, i. 447). We learn from Josephus, however, that he fortified Sepphoris, the new capital of Galilee and Peræa. He also built and colonized Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee. On one occasion, when in Rome at the house of his brother Herod Philip (Ant. xviii. v. 1; cf. Mk 6<sup>17</sup>), son of Mariamne the high priest's daughter, Antipas secured the consent of Herodias, his mother-in-law, to leave her husband and marry him, on condition that he put away his own wife, the daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabataeans. When Antipas returned, his wife, who had learned of his understanding with Herodias, asked permission to go to Machærus, a fortress near the border of her father's territory. Without suspecting her purpose, Antipas granted her request, but she continued her journey to Arabia, and enlightened her father concerning the dutiful intentions of his son-in-law. Because of this and certain boundary disputes, enmity arose between Aretas and Antipas, which eventually issued in war, and a crushing defeat for Antipas.

It is difficult to determine just how soon after the marriage with Herodias the war between Antipas and Aretas broke out. Vite (op. cit. 100) thinks that it was an old quarrel between Antipas and Aretas, and that the marriage was only a pretext for coming to his assistance, was, nevertheless, under orders from Rome to punish him for his rough treatment of the Jews. The war, however, as far as Jerusalem when news came of it, had been later than the year 7. The same year, remarks (Ant. xviii. v. 2) that the death of Antipas was popularly regarded as a Divine punishment for the murder of John the Baptist. Hence it has been inferred by Keim and others that neither the death of John nor the marriage with Herodias can have preceded this event by many years. Keim connected the year 34 as the date of John's death and assigned the date of Jesus to the year 33 (Jesus of Nazareth, 387 ff.). Sieffert dates the journey of Antipas to Rome when he gained the consent of Herodias to their marriage as the year 31 (PRE<sup>3</sup> vii 709, 149). The concise character of Josephus' narrative, however, as well as the condition of the text in this section of Ant., renders it precarious to infer, from the order of events, close chronological sequence (cf. Schurer<sup>3</sup>, i. 413 ff.; Wellhausen<sup>4</sup>, 354). Equally uncertain is the chronological inference from the popular connexion of Antipas' defeat with the death of John, since such a judgment is too flexible to furnish any very definite chronological datum.

The boyhood of Jesus and most of His public ministry were spent within the territory of Antipas. It was not, however, until the mission of the Twelve that Herod's attention was attracted to Jesus; for, though labouring on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, and from Capernaum as a centre extending His work into the surrounding country, Jesus apparently did not visit Tiberias. Shortly after Jesus learned that Herod had heard of Him, He withdrew from Galilee, and went to the region of Tyre and Sidon (part of the province of Syria). On one occasion Jesus warned His disciples against the leaven of Herod (Mk 8<sup>15</sup>); on another the Pharisees, manifesting an unwonted interest in Jesus' safety, brought Him word that Herod was planning His death (Lk 13<sup>31</sup>). The reply of Jesus on the latter occasion — 'Go tell that fox' — shows that He saw through the cunning design of Herod to be rid of Him. True to His own word, — 'for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem,' — it was not at the hand of Herod that the Saviour of the world suffered, but at the hands of the Roman world-rulers and their procurator,

‡ The reading Mk 6<sup>22</sup> ἀνθ' ὧν in NBDLA, adopted by WH, is probably a corruption for ἀνθ' ὧν (cf. Swete, The Gospels acc. to St. Mk 118; Schürer<sup>3</sup>, i. 441, n. 29).

Pontius Pilate. At the trial of Jesus, Herod's wish to see Him was at length gratified. For Pilate, when he learned that Jesus was of Galilee, and thus subject to Herod's jurisdiction, at once sent him to Herod, who was in Jerusalem at that time. This act of consideration, prompted possibly by the strained relations between the two rulers (Lk 23<sup>12</sup>, cf. 13<sup>1</sup>), proved an effectual peace-offering, and cemented anew the bonds of friendship between them. Herod, however, had no desire to assume responsibility for the death of Jesus. His desire to see Jesus sprang from simple curiosity, stimulated by the hope that He would perform some miracle in his presence. But Jesus was silent before Herod and His accusers. Herod, therefore, when he had mocked Him, sent Him back to Pilate arrayed in fine garments. [The part taken by Herod in the trial of Jesus is the subject of legendary elaboration in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter.]

Starred by envy at the advancement of her brother Agrippa to royal dignity, Herodias persuaded Herod, against his better judgment, to seek from Caligula a similar honour. When he came to Rome, however, Agrippa preferred charges against him, and called attention to the military supplies that had been collected by Herod. Herod was unable to deny the existence of the supplies, and was banished by Caligula to Lyons in Gaul, probably in the summer of A.D. 39 (cf. Schürer<sup>3</sup>, i. 448, n. 46; Madden, however, Coins, 122, gives the year 40). Herodias proudly refused the Emperor's generosity, and accompanied her husband in his banishment (Ant. XVII. vii. 2; BJ II. ix. 6). Herod's tetrarchy was ended.

3. Philip. — Philip was son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra or Jerusalem. When Archelaus went to Rome to secure the ratification of his father's will, he left Philip in Jerusalem in charge of his affairs. Later, when Varus gave the Jews of Jerusalem permission to send an embassy to Rome to oppose Archelaus, Philip went also, at the suggestion of Varus, to profit by whatever course events might take. When Augustus ratified Herod's will, Philip received Batanæa, Trachonitis, Auranitis, Gaulanitis, and the territory of Pamas (Ant. XVII. viii. 1, xi. 4, XVIII. iv. 6; BJ II. vi. 3). In Lk 3<sup>1</sup> the territory of Philip is described by the phrase, 'the region of Iturea and Trachonitis' (τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχυνιτιδος χώρας; cf. Schürer<sup>3</sup>, i. 425, n. 23). The Trachonitis had on two occasions been colonized by Herod the Great — once with three thousand Idumæans, and again with Jewish warriors from Balaion (Ant. XVI. ix. 2, XVII. ii. 1-3). But the population of Philip's territory was chiefly Gentile, his coins, unlike those of his brothers, bearing the image of the Emperor. Philip rebuilt Pamas, and called it Cæsarea in honour of Augustus, and also Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee, calling it Julias in honour of the Emperor's daughter. His reign was a mild one. He lived in his own country and as he travelled from place to place (Ant. XVIII. iv. 6). He married his niece Salome, daughter of Herodias and Herod Philip (Ant. XVIII. v. 4). The Gospels narrate a journey of Jesus into the territory of Philip when He went north from Galilee into the region of Cæsarea Philippi (Mk 8<sup>7</sup>, Mt 16<sup>13</sup>; cf. CÆSAREA PHILIPPI). Philip died in the year 33 or 34, in the twentieth year of Tiberius, having reigned thirty-seven years. His territory was added to the province of Syria, but was given shortly afterwards by Caligula to Agrippa. See also art. HERODIAS.

HERODIANS (Ἡρώδαιες).—Apart from the weakly attested reading in Mk 8<sup>15</sup>, the Herodians are mentioned but three times in the NT and on only two occasions, Mt 22<sup>16</sup> being parallel with Mk 12<sup>13</sup>. The name Ἡρώδαιες does not occur in Josephus. In BJI xvi. 6 the form Ἡρώδαιοι is used of the party of Herod, and in Ant xiv. xv. 10 the phrase οἱ τὰ Ἡρώδου φρονούντες occurs (cf. also Ant xiv vii. 4). (For the formation in -αῖος like Χριστιανός, cf. Blass, Acta Apos. 136, Gram. of NT Greek, § 27, 4; Harnack, Mission u. Ausb. d. Christ. 294 ff., Etym. Magn. s.v. Ἡρώδαιος).

If the party of Herod in Josephus be the same as the Herodians in the NT (cf. O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgesch. 157 f., but, on the other hand, Cheyne, Encyc. Bibl. ii. 2034), then the origin of the party must be sought in the time of Herod the Great. This view of the party will also determine our estimate of its nature. It cannot have been a religious sect or party like the Pharisees or Sadducees, but was most probably a political party composed of the adherents and supporters of the Herodian dynasty. From the combination of the Pharisees with the Herodians (Mk 3<sup>6</sup>), and their common action in Jerusalem (Mt 22<sup>16</sup>, Mk 12<sup>13</sup>), it is not unlikely that the Herodian party was composed principally of Sadducees (cf. Lk 20<sup>19</sup> and Mk 8<sup>15</sup> with Mt 16<sup>12</sup>). After the death of Herod the Great, the deposition of Archelaus, and the establishment of Roman rule in Judea, the aims and purposes of the party would naturally centre in Antipas. The presence of the party in Galilee, indicated in Mk 3<sup>6</sup>, cannot be set aside with the remark of Cheyne: 'This, however, is evidently a mistake. In the country of the tetrarch Antipas there could not be a party called the Herodians' (op. cit. ii. 2043). Members of the party wished to see Antipas sit upon the throne of his father; they may have been in Galilee as well as in Jerusalem; for their ideal was a national one, the restoration of the ideal of the Zealots as royalists. Their union with the strong Pharisaic party, and their attempt to entrap Jesus with the question about tribute to Caesar, find explanation not in any sympathy with the Pharisees or fondness for the traditions which Jesus' activity imperilled, but in their readiness to oppose and suppress any Messianic agitation of the people.

Other views attach some religious significance to the party, connect them with the Pharisees or with the court of Antipas as members of the Herodian family, officers or servants, and attribute to them a friendly or hostile attitude towards the Roman sovereignty (cf. Tert. ad Omn. Haer. i.; Epiph. Haer. xx.; Steph. Thesaur. s.v.; Ewald, HI v. 409 f.; Renan, Vie de Jésus, 226; Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 237 ff., ii. 384; Bleek, Syn. ii. 327; Zahn, Matth. 528, n. 44, 632, n. 45).

HERODIAS (Ἡρώδης).—Herodias was the daughter of Aristobulus (son of Herod the Great and Mariamne the Hasmonean) and Bernice (daughter of Salome, Herod's sister, and Costobar), and thus the full sister of Herod, king of Chalcis, and Agrippa I. (Ant. xviii v. 4). She married first her half-uncle Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, the high priest's daughter. In Mk 6<sup>17</sup> and Mt 14<sup>3</sup> the first husband of Herodias is called Philip, the brother of Herod (Antipas). This Philip, therefore, most probably bore also the name 'Herod' (as did also Archelaus and Antipas), and is to be distinguished from Philip the tetrarch (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>; cf. Ant. xiii. 8<sup>27</sup>), who married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip and Herodias (Ant. xviii v. 4). In Mk 6<sup>17</sup> the reading Φίλιππου is given by Tisch (ed. maj. viii) without citation of a variant. In Mt 14<sup>3</sup> Φίλιππου has the support of NBCL, etc., but is omitted in D a c e ff' g' k vg. In Lk 3<sup>19</sup> Φίλιππου is inserted by ACK, etc., cop syr<sup>tr</sup> arm<sup>add</sup> aeth, but omitted by NBDL, etc. The reading thus appears to be a Mk., probably original in Mt, and in Luke. The statement (Encyc. Bibl. ii. 2032), 'In spite of Mk 6<sup>17</sup> we cannot hold that he ever really bore the name Philip,' as well as the remark of Schurer<sup>3</sup> (i. 435, n. 19), 'Since, according to Josephus, not the tetrarch but the above-named Herod was the first husband of Herodias, the statement of Mark and Matthew is evidently a mistake' (ein entschiedenes Versehen) are too positive. They do not rest on any more substantial evidence than the fact that Josephus calls this son of Herod the Great simply Herod. The argument that two sons of Herod would not have borne the same name Philip is weakened by the fact that even according to Josephus two sons of Herod bore the same name—Herod, son of Mariamne, the high priest's daughter, and Herod, son of Cleopatra (Ant. xvii. i. 3, xviii. v. 4). Herod Philip had been named in the first will of Herod the Great as successor of Antipas in succession to the throne (Ant. xvii. in 2; BJI i. xxix. 2), but was subsequently omitted because of his mother's connexion with the plot of Antipater (Ant. xvii. iv. 2; BJI i. xxx. 7). He continued in private life in Rome, where Antipas, while guest in his brother's house, persuaded Herodias to desert her husband and marry him. This second marriage of Herodias was especially offensive to the high priest's husband, to whom she had borne a child, was still alive (cf. Lv 18<sup>16</sup>, Dt 25<sup>5</sup>; also Ant. xvii. xiii. 1). John the Baptist rebuked Antipas for his action, and paid the penalty with his life for rousing the anger of an ambitious and unscrupulous woman. Her connexion with the downfall of Antipas has been mentioned (cf. art. HEROD under 'Antipas'). In the last recorded incident of her life, when Herodias voluntarily followed Antipas into exile and haughtily refused the Emperor's bounty, she displayed, like her grandmother Mariamne when unjustly sentenced to death, the proud fortitude and fine dignity of the old Hasmonean house now brought so low through its union with the Herods (Ant. xviii. vii. 2; cf. xv. ix. 5).

HEZEKIAH.—One of the kings of Judah, mentioned in Mt's (1st) genealogy of our Lord.

HEZRON.—A Judahite ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1<sup>3</sup>, Lk 3<sup>33</sup>).

HIGH PRIEST.—The terms 'high priest' and 'chief priest' in the NT represent the same original (ἀρχιερεύς), varied in translation to correspond with the uses of the term as explained below. The office of high priest in the Jewish nation can be traced back to the early years of post-exilic times. The priestly writings then adopted as authoritative have their origin to the time of Moses, but the OT writings contain no suggestion of the existence of the office, and cultural conditions before the Exile preclude an early date for its establishment. Immediately after the Return the office was a religious one, the secular power being in the hands of the 'prince'; for, great as was the emphasis in the new community upon law and ceremony, there seems to have been an equal emphasis upon the hoped for restoration of the State to a dignified and independent position. It very soon became evident that this hope was impossible of fulfillment, and the secular functions, so far as they were exercised by the Jews, were merged in the duties of the high priest. At first the position was for life and hereditary. In practice the principle was often violated, the violations being occasioned not so much by deliberate purpose as by the turmoils of Greek and Roman times. Moreover, internal conditions in the Jewish community were of themselves sufficient to have unsettled the principle. At the time of the Hasmonean uprising, the assumption of high priestly functions and title by this family was a necessary consequence of the success of the revolt. Under the Roman supremacy, the fortunes of the political parties in Rome added to the tendencies that made for the disappearance of the last vestige of the high priestly office, and at the time of the fall of the Empire we find it entirely at the will of Rome, both as to appointment and tenure. Under these conditions there had grown up a caste of high priestly families, connected with the secular power, and otherwise connected with the high priestly office. This caste formed a high aristocracy in Judaism, which was possessed of considerable authority, however difficult it may be to define the limits and extent of that influence. Very naturally the selection of the high priest was made from these families. The numerous references in the Gospels are ordinarily to this high priestly class, and when the Greek is so used it is translated 'chief priests' (see art. CHIEF PRIESTS).

As far as concerns the high priest, he occupied the position of chief priest among the Jews, as head of the priestly office. Josephus declares (Ant. xx. 10) that there were 28 high priests from the time of Herod to the destruction of Jerusalem. Of these, the Gospels mention the tenth, Annas, appointed by Quirinius (A.D. 6), and the fourteenth, Joseph, surnamed Caiaphas, who was in office at the time of the crucifixion of Jesus and presided over the Sanhedrin at His trial. Previous to this trial there was a preliminary trial or hearing, whether with or without legal right, before Annas, father-in-law of Caiaphas. The Gospel narrative of these events, so far from being confused or improbable, is confirmed as entirely consistent and probable by the records of Jewish practice of those days. Annas was a man of long continued influence among his people. No fewer than six of the high priests of the Herodian period are known to have been of his family. Other high priests after the end of their term of service are stated to have held high positions at home and abroad, and it is possible that some of the Gospel references to high or chief priests are to this group of ex-high priests together with the officiating priest.

The high priest was also at the head of the sacerdotal system, as the title, of course, implies. But although historically this was his chief claim to authority, his religious influence in the time of Christ was far less than his political power. The religion of the Jew was a matter quite distinct from the rites and ceremonies of the temple, though he might observe these with care. The very success of the high priestly office before, in uniting the two offices of religious and secular ruler, had operated to foster the development of a religion of a different sort. It was now a religion of the scribes.

The high priest conducted the sacrifices only on special occasions. He was required to officiate on the yearly Day of Atonement; and on other festival days, such as New Moons and Sabbaths, he officiated at his pleasure. These distinctively priestly duties do not come into consideration in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The Epistle to the Hebrews, which makes much mention of the office in order by that means to portray more clearly the work of Jesus in behalf of men; but one will be disappointed who goes to this Epistle to discover what were the high priestly duties at the time of Christ, or even the theory of sacrifice and priesthood current in those days. The author does not describe the ceremonial as he and his readers knew it from daily observation or participation. He does not allude to it because it was something vital in the religious experience of the Jew. He describes it as he knew it out of the Jewish Scriptures, and he reflects upon it as dispassionately as a philologist or a theologian. The OT priesthood and sacrifice did not really make atonement for sin; to the author they typified that atonement. In the real atonement Christ had a part similar to that played by the high priest in the sensuous, temporary, typical atonement of the earlier dispensation. He made reconciliation for the sins of the people (2<sup>17</sup>); He was faithful, the recipient of a greater glory than Moses (3<sup>1-6</sup>); sought not the office, but was chosen as was Aaron (5<sup>4</sup>); He was of the order of Melchizedek (5<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>20</sup>); was competent to sympathize with men (2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>). He possessed an unchanging priesthood, sacrificing once for all (7), and the sacrifice was Himself. He has passed through the heavens, through the veil (4<sup>14</sup>), and serves in a perfect tabernacle. As the work wrought by Him for men surpassed that of the high priest, so the terminology of the older dispensation is insufficient, and breaks down under the burden of the description. Jesus is not only the Mediator of the new covenant, the High Priest, but He is also the sacrifice itself. The author will not say that the death on the cross fitted into the OT sacrificial system, any more than he brings Jesus into that system as priest. It was in the new order of things, in the spiritual atonement, which was the real one, with spiritual agencies and results, that His perfect humanity, His perfect obedience and sinlessness found place. The temple is in the heavens where He has gone to consummate the service of which His earthly career was an incident. See, further, art. PRIEST.

HIGHWAY.—In the parable (Mt 22<sup>9</sup>) where the invited guests all made excuse, the king sent his servants out ἐπὶ τὰς διαφόδους τῶν ὁδῶν, 'into the highways' (AV), to gather as many as they could find, and bid them to the feast. The Gr. phrase means literally 'the partings of the highways' (RV), exitus viarum (Vulg.). This is the only occurrence of διαφόδου in the NT, and it is impossible to determine with certainty what is meant by the expression. It may signify either the roads leading out of the town into the country, or the crossings of such, or the streets leading into the open spaces or square in front of the town. The idea is clear—where men both good and bad, Jew and Gentile, are most likely to be found. God's pur-be frustrated; and if the invited guests call, then others who have hitherto been looked down upon will take their place. The invitation is to all and sundry, which leads Whedon to say, 'The good are not too good to need the gospel, nor the bad so bad as to have no hope if they will accept it.' It was the poor, the outcast, the hopeless that were to be found on the highways: blind Bartimæus (Mk 10<sup>46</sup>) shouting, 'Have mercy on me,' and such as the lepers who stood afar off (Lk 17<sup>13</sup>) uttering the same miserable cry. See, further, art. ROADS. R. LEGGAT.

HILL.—In Lk 3<sup>5</sup> 23<sup>30</sup> from βουνός, which in LXX as in the lesser eminence, is properly rendered hill. Language like that of 23<sup>30</sup> is used in hyperbole to-day by Easterns, of preparing a highway for royalty through a country. In two cases (Mt 5<sup>14</sup>, Lk 14<sup>1</sup>), the AV rendering of ὄρος, 'hill.' In Lk 9<sup>37</sup> RV rightly substitutes 'mountain.' Perhaps we should read 'mountain' also in Mt 5<sup>14</sup>. There is nothing to show that any particular city was referred to, but if the words were spoken on any height west of the Lake, Safed, with white walls gleaming in the sun, must have been a striking feature in the landscape. It stands literally 'on a mountain,' to the north, nearly 3500 ft. above the Sea of Galilee. Ancient Nazareth, however, was built on the slope of a hill to which 'mountain' could hardly apply.

Hill country (ἡ ὄρεινή, Lk 13<sup>30</sup> 31<sup>30</sup>). ἡ ὄρεινή is a frequent LXX equivalent of 777. The use of Heb. 777 closely resembles that of Arab. jebel, which denotes a single height, but also a whole range, as Jebel Libnān; or a definite part of a range, as Jebel Nāblus—this indicating that portion of 'the mountain' which is under the government of Nāblus. This expression and Jebel el-Kuds the present writer has often heard on Palestinian lips, without any sense of vagueness or confusion. 777 was 'the mountain'—the central range as distinguished from the plain and the Siyān; on the west, and the 'Arabah on the east. Jebel el-Kuds, 'mountain of Jerusalem,' is perhaps the nearest modern equivalent of ἡ ὄρεινή τῆς Ἰουδαίας, that part of 'the mountain' associated with the tribe of Judah. See, further, art. MOUNTAIN.

HINDRANCE.—The life of communion with God and of obedience to His revealed will is regarded as the normal state and right relation of man made in God's image for His glory. All defect and deflection from this standard are the result of external and internal hindrances. The world is an environment of hindrances and causes of stumbling (Mt 18<sup>7</sup>). Such is the process of opposing influences that the entrance into life has to be by a narrow gate (7<sup>13</sup>). Instances of these outward and inward difficulties are given in the parable of the Sower (13<sup>18-23</sup>), and in that of the Tares their final elimination is predicted (v. 41).

Stumbling-block, stumbling-stone (πρόσκομμα, προσκοπή, also σκάνδαλον, 'trap' or 'snare' [Ro 11<sup>9</sup>], and frequently tr. 'offence,' 'offend' [Mt 16<sup>23</sup> 18<sup>6-9</sup> 26<sup>31</sup>, Lk 17<sup>1</sup>]). The root-idea is that of encountering an obstacle where such ought not to be, as on a public road. In its fig. sense the offence is most grievously where the trust is most implicit and unreserved, as in the confidence of children (Mt 18<sup>8</sup>).

In the East the 'stumbling-block' is seldom repaired. Stones may be cast out upon it in clearing the neighbouring fields. Squared stones for building, collected at the road-side for transport, are often scattered over the path; if a bed of sand suitable for mixing with lime be found near it, the path may be dug into and the cavity left unfilled. No harm can arise from it, men say, except to those for whom it is decreed. The people of the village soon come to know of it, and they are under no obligation to strangers. The better prepared roads have generally been constructed for Government purposes and by forced labour, so that the people of the locality take little civic interest in their condition and preservation. Hence stumbling-blocks are frequently met with, and cause little surprise or comment.

In modern Palestine criminals and men of depraved life are called mal'aththārin, 'those who have been made to stumble'; and the same epithet is applied to such as are in trouble through misfortune.

The Cross that made God the sacrificer and suppliant, and called for faith in a Saviour who could not save Himself, was a stumbling-block or offence to the wisdom of the world, and to all its religious traditions (Ro 9<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>2</sup>).

HIRE.—'Hire' (μισθός) occurs in two passages as the regular payment given for service rendered. In the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt 20<sup>8</sup>) it is spoken of the day's wage, the denarius, owing by agreement to the workers. The proverbial phrase, 'The labourer is worthy of his hire' (Lk 10<sup>7</sup>), is used by Christ in connexion with the mission of the Seventy. In Mt 10<sup>10</sup> τροφή, 'food,' is substituted for μισθός. The latter Greek word occurs again (Jn 4<sup>38</sup>) as the wages of the reaper. It is used in a figurative sense as the reward of devotion and service to God (Mt 6<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>41</sup>, Mk 9<sup>41</sup>, Lk 6<sup>23</sup>), as well as to describe the 'empty popularity' attaching to the religious ostentation of the hypocrites (Mt 6<sup>2-5</sup> 16). It is employed (Rev 22<sup>12</sup>) of Christ's reward to His faithful followers: 'My reward is with me.'

The term 'hired servant' or 'hireling' (μισθωτός) is used in speaking of Zebedee's servants (Mt 13<sup>30</sup>), and of the false shepherd who deserts his flock at the approach of danger (Jn 10<sup>12-13</sup>). A similar derivative (μισθιος) describes the father's servants in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>19</sup>). The verb 'to hire' (μισθω) occurs (Mt 20<sup>1</sup>) of the householder who engaged the labourers for his vineyard. See also next article.

C. H. PRICHARD.

HIRELING.—A hireling is one who works for wages, an employé. Originally -ynonymous with 'hired servant,' it did not necessarily imply venal motive. Ben Sirā was acquainted with devoted hirelings: 'Entreat not evil thy servant that worketh, no . . . hat giveth thee his life' (Sir 7<sup>20</sup>). It denotes a . . . who manifests certain baser qualities . . . nature. Christ's use of the word in Jn 10<sup>12-13</sup> to signify one who, because he cares more for his wages than for his work, proves unfaithful under trial, has determined its evolution into meaning an untrustworthy employé.

Calvin, who defines hirelings as 'those who retain the pure doctrine, and who proclaim the truth, as Paul says, to serve a purpose rather than from pure zeal,' discusses a question wont to be debated in times of persecution, viz.—Has that man to be . . . for any reason shrinks from encounter . . . ; sees with Augustine that parties may . . . the public advantage of the flock be thereby promoted' (Calvin on John, vol. 1. p. 403 f., Edinburgh, 1847).

D. A. MACKINNON.

HISTORICAL.—1. The word 'history' is ambiguous. It may mean (1) the course of events; or (2) any record of the events—a history; or (3) the science, History, which understands the whole. Scientific history is comparatively a young thing; but already educated mankind are tending to refuse the name of 'a history' to anything under the second head which does not try to fulfil the requirements of science. What fails in that may be a chronicle, or may furnish useful materials to the true historian, but is not . . . ry.

2. The aims of the science . . . are twofold. (1) It must get at the facts; and to do that it must secure, as far as possible, first-hand evidence; (2) it must study the facts in their development or causation or connexion upon all sides. (1) In its search for first-hand evidence, the science of history has different kinds of material to work with. (a) The oldest material for history is tradition. All knowledge of past events lived at first in human memory before it assumed any more permanent shape. But tradition, unsupported or unassisted, is a bad witness. And in our own region there is no real historical tradition apart from the Christian records, etc. What is pretended by Catholicism in that sense is a make-believe, to cover over unwarranted innovations. The furthest admission we can make is that scraps of historical recollection, otherwise lost to us, may survive in Church legends, which were reduced pretty early to writing (the Thekla legend?). (b) The best of all witnesses is epigraphy. Biblical learning owes something to this, and may come to owe a good deal more—no one can say. (c) The main source of historical knowledge is literature,—human speech reduced to the ordinary forms of writing. Less durable (as well as less stiff) than inscriptions, books are more numerous—so much more numerous, that they enjoy probably a better chance of survival. In our own field the Bible writings, though not absolutely isolated, stand head and shoulders above all other materials in point of importance. This is true on purely historical principles, theories of inspiration apart. (d) At the risk of making a cross-division, we must mention the importance of foreign testimony. The amount of this is increasing with modern study and research; and the significance generally attached to affinities between primitive Christianity and other civilizations or religions is also on the increase. (2) The most manifest result of study in the field of history is to give a better knowledge of detail. But we must not allow ourselves to suppose that events occur disconnectedly, one by one, and that the mind of the scientific thinker imposes connexions upon them. Science does not create, it elicits the hidden law; and anything that gives us greater knowledge of events increases our knowledge of the relations in which they stand to each other. Facts without theory are 'blind,' if theories without fact are 'empty.' The ideal goal of historical study, . . . of course, to be reached, would be a scientific grasp of every past event in its full . . . completely reproduced in the historian's utterance. For the facts with which history deals are intelligent acts and intelligible processes. True, the unconscious tendency of the times may count for more than the conscious, perhaps selfish, effort of the great man. Or what he does unwillingly, as the executive of Providence and the Zeitgeist, may be the most significant and durable of all his acts. Yet history is man's story; surely, then, man can read it!

3. The Christian study of Bible documents moves for great part of its way, though hardly to the very end [see below], upon historical lines. (1) Its admitted hermeneutical principle, since the days of Ernesti (Institutio Interpretis NT, 1761), is the 'grammatico-historical'—i.e. literal and historical—method. Strictly, each sentence has one meaning, and only one—the . . . its human author designed; the . . . readers would naturally apprehend. This principle had to be laid down in face of the Church's . . . hankering after 'mystical' interpretation. In the Scriptures may be allegorized, theology and faith itself rest upon a . . . (2) Criticism of the text, by all . . . aims at discovering, with as much probability as can be attained, the original form of words used by the writer in each passage. It has nothing to do—unless with supreme caution, as possible evidence to the fact—with the question, which words appear to the student most seemly or most telling. Nay, there is a recognized principle that 'the harder reading is probable'; though we must be able to communicate the sort of 'difficult' reading which suggests a powerful while perhaps erratic mind, from that which rather suggests a blundering copyist. (3) Careful study of the text leads to a further set of inferences, chiefly or entirely drawn from internal evidence, regarding probable date and probable authorship. This is the Higher Criticism—'higher' because dealing with larger questions than those of the text. (4) Even in Biblical Theology we are still occupied with the historian's business. Before all things, we are reproducing past fact. . . . great masses of doctrinal . . . Theologian seeks to put these in shape, as they stand—the affirmations of such and such books, or teachers, or ages. The result aimed at is not Divine truth as such, but various Biblical teachings about the truth; not a normative statement regarding realities which are real, but a historical statement regarding what was held or announced to be spiritual reality; historical, not dogmatic.

4. An attempt was made by a great theological leader, Schleiermacher, to bring even dogmatic theology under the same rubric. It was to be a branch of Historical Theology. Ceasing to be (primarily) a statement of truth, it was to be a statement of what a certain Church in a certain age has come to hold for true. The suggestion was ingenious, and avoided certain difficulties; but it led to other and worse difficulties. If Christian theology, in its central department, cannot pretend to set forth truth, it proclaims itself bankrupt. It is . . . nothing less than the truth regarding . . . His purposes which He has been pleased to make known to us.

5. What shall we say, then, of the remainder of the Biblical territory? We were dealing, until the last paragraph, with stages in a process of historical study. We found that even doctrine was treated in Biblical Theology as a historical study, although on the systematic or dogmatic side it required us to occupy a different point of view from the historian's. But what are we to say regarding the history of Israel? Or—coming closer to our ground—the life as distinct from the teaching? Or, in general, regarding the origins of Christianity? That which was higher than man or than history has appeared once for all upon the plane of human history. The Word became flesh. Unless this be denied, we have come to a point where the contents of our study burst the bonds of ordinary historical investigation. Difficulty arises in two forms. First, there is the minor difficulty connected with miracles. Can history adjust itself to miracles? If so, how? If not, what are we to conclude? But, in the second place, the same question, issuing in substantially the same alternatives, repeats itself as regards the very kernel of the Christian faith. Have we in Christ, and, to a lesser degree, in His antecedents and environment, a unique Divine revelation, a unique Divine redemption? Then how is the historian to deal with Christ?

6. The question is more familiar in its less formidable shape, as regards miracles. (1) It may be held that facts convince us of miracle. History makes its investigation, and bears witness. It cannot demonstrate, but it announces a satisfactory result. This is the attitude generally taken up by British scholars, e.g. in Dr. Sanday's recent Criticism of the Fourth Gospel (though he has the wider as well as the narrower problem before him). (2) Secondly, there is the claim of dogmatic naturalism—'miracles do not happen'; for history, the miracle narrative is an interesting and instructive problem, the miracle itself a hallucination a priori, be the alleged evidence what it may. This mood of mind is sometimes confessed, but much oftener is silently at work behind a disguise. (3) There is an attempt by Harnack to strike out a tertium quid: 'The historian cannot regard a miracle as a sure given historical event; for in doing so he destroys the mode of consideration on which all historical investigation rests.' Belief in miracle is due to the 'unique impression' of Christ's person, though 'there has seldom been a strong religious faith which would not have drawn the conclusion' that Christ wrought miracles (Hist. of Dogma, vol. i. Eng. tr. p. 65, note). This seems to mean that history is prevented from dealing with miracles by limitations of its own, which do not necessarily imply the absence of miracle from the world of real events. (4) Against the point of view which excludes miracles a priori, we might set a point of view which welcomes them a priori as congruous to a Divine revelation and Divine redemption. They are only signs of the Divine content itself; but are they not its signs?

7. On a first inspection, none of the views named is definitely anti-Christian unless the second. Naturalism, which refuses miracle out and out, is plainly pledged in logic to deny revelation. But, as we have said, the importance of the whole matter lies in its further implications. The same difficult decision is called for—now face to face with miracle, but face to face with the Christ. And the logic of the third position—the logic which leads Harnack, while believing in revelation, to ban miracle as a thing the historian must not touch—will inevitably be applied by others to Jesus Himself. They will repeat or extend the claim to be historians, thorough historians, nothing but historians. They will describe the teacher of Nazareth, the martyr of Calvary; but the Christ of God will be a magnitude as inaccessible to them as physical miracle is to Dr. Harnack (cf. art. 'Jesus' in Encyc. Bibl.) And if he is in the right, who can say that they are wrong? Analysis must go on to the end, and that great stumbling-block, the supernatural, be revealed plain in our path. Even if not formally declared an impossibility, supernatural revelation or redemption will be politely waved aside as irrelevant to the historian.

8. There is no question more important at the present moment than this. What is, e.g., a 'historical' view of the NT? Is it a view of the NT in its historical actuality, looked at round and round? Or is it a view hampered by the limitations of one of the special sciences? Ambiguity is always dangerous. People omit the Divine 'Word' under pretext of the second definition—That lies beyond the historian's province! But presently they are found implying the first definition. History tells us everything! There is no Divine 'Word' at all—no supernatural salvation.

9. If history does not give full truth, what does? We shall probably be told, Metaphysics. The only court of appeal from 'scientific fact' is 'metaphysical reality.' Metaphysics is certainly pledged to many-sidedness, to all-sidedness. But the question remains, How far can metaphysics do its task? As interpreters of Christianity are very willing to undertake the Christ idea (e.g. Pfleiderer), is not extended to the Christ fact. At any rate the majority, and those who know their business best, are found reducing Jesus of Nazareth to a symbol, very vaguely connected with any abiding spiritual reality. To a philosopher interpreter it remains 'foolishness' that the Divine Word literally and in deed became flesh. If the professional historian verges upon Ebionism, his philosophical colleague rarely escapes Docetism. Neither of these positions amounts to historical Christianity, which, amid increasing uncertainty in detail, may and ought to have increasing certainty in the fundamental outlines.

10. In the present writer's judgment the attempt to make history a special science, too coy or too scientific to deal with a (possibly real) supernatural, is hopelessly artificial. Scientific history must deal with all the demonstrable, nay, with all the probable, events of the real past. This may interfere with the rounded symmetry of the science; small loss, if it gives us wider and truer knowledge! Further, the writer's own belief is that (not a Christian bias, but) a Christian interpretation is indispensable; or, that experience bears its witness to the fourth position, § 6, as against the first; still, he recognizes that many Christians and many useful theological workers will find themselves able to maintain the first position, and will prefer it. It is perfectly true that faith misleads and over-idealizes (Dr. Moffatt); yet that is a half-truth, or rather it is much less than the half. Better a dazzled faith than 'blind unbelief.' Amid superficial errors, Christian faith grasps the essential truth. Amid superficial accuracies, non-Christian historians (and non-Christians no less) throw away the kernel. The verae veritate—to a Christian—lies neither in metaphysics nor in the abstract findings of historical science, but in the fellowship of Jesus Christ the living Saviour. 'This is the true God and eternal life.'

11. One form of putting this appeal sets the evidence of later Christian history, with its known developments, against the academic modern study of Christian origins. Christ has founded, and must have meant to found, a worshipping Church! The Germans can put this in a phrase—der geschichtliche Christus versus der sogenannte historische Jesus (Kahler). There is a measure of truth in this. Indeed, it is bad history to forget, in studying origins, whereunto the origins grew. On the other hand, the appeal, put forward without qualification, helps the High Churchmen, if not the Ultramontanes. The Church of history is sacerdotal! P... Christians are forced by their... into a fruitful alliance with sober all-round history. Like the Reformers, we must go back to the primary revelation. Christianity, as the world knows it, is not the measure of Christ, nor His worthy interpreter. 'Hear ye Him' ROBERT MACKINTOSH.

HOLINESS.—The word 'holy' is connected with 'whole,' 'hale,' Ger. heilsam, heilig). Modern lexicographers hesitate to speak with certainty... the primitive meaning of the root... group of words is derived. Eng. Dict. is content to equate 'holy' Lat. sanctus, sacer, on the ground that 'we cannot in Old English get behind the Christian sense'. It is probable that the... either from hailo, i.e. inviol... which must be preserved whole; or from hail in the sense of health, well-being.

In all the passages to which reference will be made, the Greek word is ἅγιος or one of its derivatives, with the exception of Ac 27<sup>13</sup>, Lk 17<sup>5</sup>, He 7<sup>26</sup>, where δίκαιος or δοστικός is found. In Acts the words of Ps 16<sup>10</sup> are quoted twice; 'thy Holy One' is a title of the Messiah to whom... belongs the OT designation of... nation,—of δίκαιοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, God's pious ones. 'The δίκαιος, the German fromm, is one who reverences the everlasting sanctities and owns their obligation' (Trench, Synonyms of the NT, § lxxviii.). In Lk 17<sup>5</sup> 'holiness'... re closely associated, as is... in classical and biblical usage. The words are complementary, though the sharp distinction drawn by Plato (Gorgias, 507 B) cannot be maintained: in the NT 'righteousness' cannot be limited to duties toward men, nor can 'holiness' be restricted to duties toward God. Righteousness is the manward, as holiness is the Godward aspect of pious character and conduct. Hence Jesus, our High Priest, is 'holy' (He 7<sup>26</sup>); in His filial reverence and in His devotion to His Father's will there is no flaw; He is, therefore, fitted to appear in the presence of God to do priestly service on our behalf. The LXX usually renders קָדֹשׁ ('godly' or 'beloved') by δίκαιος (Dt 33<sup>8</sup>, 2 S 22<sup>26</sup>, Ps 4<sup>4</sup> etc.), but קָדֹשׁ is generally translated ἅγιος (Ex 19<sup>6</sup>, Nu 6<sup>5</sup>, Ps 15<sup>1</sup>, etc.).

Both ἅγιος and קָדֹשׁ are used when holiness is ascribed to God as well as to persons and things. The question, therefore, arises—What is the primary meaning which underlies and connects these different applications of the word? If the fundamental idea is separation, ti... of thought is from the negative to the... on men and things to God, from the cleansing which is an essential qualification for use in the service of God to purity as the central attribute of God Himself. But if the fundamental idea is essential Divinity, separation becomes a derivative conception, the progress of thought is then from the positive to the negative, from God to external things and persons. Every thing devoted to God must be separated from profane or common uses; and every person devoted to God is not only thus set apart, but is also under moral obligation to fit himself for drawing near to God by separating himself from all that is sinful.

Those who regard separation as the radical meaning of ἅγιος make it almost synonymous with ἀγρός, which signifies pure, and sets forth a negative conception of holiness. Stevens (Hastings' DB

ii. 399) follows Trench, and interprets 1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>—ἐκείνος ἁγρός ἐστίν—of God. But, as Westcott (Com. in loc.) points out, ἐκείνος in this Epistle always refers to Christ; it is in respect of His true humanity that it can be said 'He is pure,' and not only 'He was pure.' In His glorified state 'the result of the perfection of His earthly discipline (He 5<sup>7a</sup>) still abides.' According to St John, a 'hope set on' (RV) Christ is a constant incentive to strive after holiness; and the standard by which the disciple will always measure his attainments is the perfect purity of his Lord. Few will doubt the soundness of the inference which Westcott bases on his exposition of this verse and on his study of the words:

'Both ἁγρός and καθαρός differ from ἅγιος in that they admit fact of... pollution, while ἅγιος is... either in itself or... spoken of as ἅγιος but not as ἁγρός, while Christ can be spoken of as ἁγρός in virtue of His humanity. A man is ἅγιος in virtue of his... tion (He 10<sup>10</sup>) to which he is gradually confor... He 10<sup>14</sup>), he is ἁγρός in virtue of earthly, human discipline.'

This clear and helpful distinction assumes that the primary meaning of ἅγιος must be sought in the revelation of the essential nature of God; the various meanings of ἅγιος may thus be traced in orderly sense-development from its root ὁ ἅγιος, 'religious awe,' 'reverence.' 'Holy is his name' (Lk 1<sup>49</sup>) is the starting-point; things and persons are holy by reason of their being destined for Divine uses; the secondary meaning of separation from defilement arises at a later stage, as clearer perception of the nature of God also reveals the need of preparation for His service by cleansing from all impurity.

This conclusion must be tested by a brief study of the Jewish conception of holiness. The etymology of קָדֹשׁ (LXX generally קָדֹשׁ) can be learnt from the use of cognate peoples. The profound and indeed un... in the religion of revelation can be ascertained only from a careful investigation of the phraseology of the OT writers. An excellent sketch of the probable history of the word, which assumes that its fundamental idea is separation, is given in Sanday-Headlam's Romans (note on 17); but it is acknowledged that 'there is a certain element of conjecture... which is inevitable from the fact that the earlier stages in the history of the word have... though when the Hebrew literature began to... scope for further inquiry.

Kittel... aims that the root-idea of the word is positive. Things are not holy because they are separated from other things, but things because they are holy. Wh... els, animals for sacrifice, etc., either order of thought is suitable. But this is not the case when, e.g., the... called holy; they are holy because... If the primary meaning of holy is that which belongs to God and is devoted to His s... be called holy who stand in a close relation... they are in a special sense His servants. Very instructive is Nu 16<sup>6</sup> 'In the morning the Lord will show who are his, and who is holy.' As applied to persons and to the nation, it has a deeper significance. In the Law of Holiness... command, 'Ye shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy' (Lv 19<sup>2</sup>), is seen to involve both external requirements referring to ritual, and inward requirements referring to moral character.

The holiness of God refers to... primary, His 'essential Divinity'... words with Bengel's saying that God's glory (כְּבוֹד) is His holiness, and His holiness (קָדֹשׁ) is His inner glory. God's holiness is 'that which proves Him to be God, that which is worthy of God.' Cf. 'The Lord God hath sworn by his holiness' (Am 4<sup>2</sup>), with 'The Lord God hath sworn by himself' (Am 6<sup>8</sup>). If it be said that this divine name is vague, the reply is that 'the Divine essence cannot be expressed in a single formula which is suitable for all stages in the development of the OT idea of God.' It is a manifest advantage of this view that the evolution of the idea of holiness finds its explanation in the historical evolution of the idea of God. An early stage is seen in 1 S 6<sup>10</sup> 'Who is able to stand before the Lord, this holy God?' None may approach Him save those who have complied with the prescribed regulation—cf 1 S 21<sup>7</sup>. As the moral nature of God was more clearly... the conception of His holiness was spiritualized, 'I am God, and not man; the Holy One in the midst of thee' the Divine holiness is the ethical motive of the resolve, 'I will not come in wrath (RVm) into the city.' Kittel rightly distinguishes God's glory from His holiness. 'Glory' is a cosmic predicate of God and refers to the outshining of His attributes, which may be metaphysical or moral, but 'holiness' has always a tendency to acquire an ethical significance, and becomes at last solely His moral glory.

The fact that the conception of holiness varies with the conception of God . . . occasional deterioration of the idea. When stress was laid upon the transcendence of God, stress was also laid upon His purity. But, in general, later Jewish teaching has insisted upon moral as well as ceremonial purity as qualifications for the service of the Holy One (see Jewish Encyclopedia vi 441b). Holiness is 'an ideal state of perfection attained only by God' (Jerus. Ber. iv. 13a); but 'man grows in holiness the more he aspires to the Divine will, rising above the sensual' (Tanna, 39a). Dalman says (Words of Jesus, p. 202) that 'the Holiness' (שְׁרָא) became a Divine title (Siphre, Num. 112, ed. Friedm. 33a).

The NT passages which fall within the limits of this article may be classified according as (1) holiness is ascribed to things, places, or persons by (a) the Evangelists. (b) our Lord; (2) holiness is ascribed to Christ (a) in the Acts, (b) in the Epistles.

1. Holiness in the Gospels.—(a) The Evangelists speak of 'the holy city' (Mt 4<sup>5</sup> 27<sup>53</sup>), 'the holy place' (Mt 24<sup>15</sup>), 'his holy covenant' (Lk 1<sup>72</sup>): Jerusalem and the temple are holy, as being the abode of God, the covenant made with Abraham is holy, as being a revelation of the gracious purpose of God in choosing a people to serve Him in holiness (Lk 1<sup>75</sup>; see above on δοῦναι). Persons are described as holy, because they are devoted to God's service. In the Gospels mention is made of 'the holy angels' (Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup>), 'his holy prophets' (Lk 1<sup>70</sup>), and Herod is said to have recognized the holiness of John the Baptist (Mk 6<sup>20</sup>); in such uses of the word there is included an assertion of the moral purity of the person, an essential qualification for the service of God. In Lk 2<sup>33</sup> an allusion (Ex 13<sup>2</sup>) explains that the offering of the parents of Jesus, when they presented their child to the Lord in the temple, was a recognition of the fact that every firstborn son was holy as belonging to God. The ascription of holiness to the Divine Spirit (Mt 1<sup>18</sup> etc.) will be considered in THE HOLY SPIRIT (b), where it may be noted that in the story of the birth of Jesus (Lk 1<sup>35</sup>), Mary is told that the Holy Spirit shall come upon her with the result that her child shall be holy (τὸ γεννωμενον ἁγιον); and that once (4<sup>3</sup>) Jesus is described as 'full of the Holy Spirit.' In Mk 1<sup>24</sup> = Lk 4<sup>34</sup> the man with an unclean spirit calls Christ 'the Holy One of God,' and according to the true text Simon Peter uses the same title (Jn 6<sup>69</sup>). The phrase is a designation of the Messiah, described by John (10<sup>36</sup>) as 'him whom the Father consecrated' (ἁγιάσας. For this and other uses of ἁγιάσας see art. CONSECRATION). Finally, holiness is ascribed to God in the Magnificat, and the whole context ('his mercy,' etc.) shows that 'holy is his name' (Lk 1<sup>49</sup>) is a declaration of the moral glory of God.

(b) Our Lord never speaks of any person, save the Father and the Spirit, as holy; and only once does He describe any thing as holy. His command, 'Give not that which is holy to the dogs' (Mt 7<sup>6</sup>), is a proverbial expression whose origin is probably some Jewish exclamation of horror at the thought of offering to the dogs that which had been offered in sacrifice (Lv 23<sup>29</sup> LXX τὰ ἅγια). A similar saying is quoted from Aristotle: 'Do not fling wisdom into the street' (μὴτε βίβαι σοφίαν εἰς τοὺς τριόδους, ap. Themist. p. 234).

The application of our Lord's words need not be limited to preachers of the gospel, and it is certain that they do not sanction any doctrine of reserve in the statement of truth; their obvious meaning seems to be that holy themes are not to be exposed to the contempt of the profane. John Wyclif's comment (Synon xxx) is both pithy and pertinent: 'Be ware of thinking that any deserve this appellation till there is full and incontrovertible proof.' But 'great and glorious truths' are not to be treated as 'contradictor and blasphemous.' 'Do not quarrel with these upon remission of sins and the gift of the Holy Ghost . . . The most probable way to make Felix tremble is to reason with him of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come.'

In this sense Dalman's words (op. cit.) stood when he says, 'As regards content the word "Holy Spirit" and "Holy Spirit" had become a Divine title, it might readily be supposed that in the term "Holy Spirit," the word קדש became in reality a name for God, so that τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον would represent it more accurately than τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἁγιον. But in that case terms like ἡ ἁγία πνεῦμα (Ps 51<sup>11</sup>), ἡ ἁγία πνεῦμα (Targ. Is 42<sup>1</sup>), would be impossible. And yet it must be maintained that the addition of ἁγιον is expressly meant to specify Divinity as an attribute of the Spirit.' See, further, HOLY SPIRIT.

The last recorded example of our Lord's use of the word 'holy' is in His intercessory prayer. He who never called any human being 'holy' prays that His disciples may attain unto holiness. His prayer is both negative and positive: from the holiness of the world He asks that they may be kept in the name (Jn 17<sup>11</sup> RV) which in its fulness it had been His mission to reveal. But it is not enough for them to be kept from entering the domain of the Evil One (Jn 17<sup>15</sup> ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ, cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup> 'the whole world lieth in the evil one'). If they are to continue Christ's work, they must be partakers of His holiness, for only in complete devotion of all their powers to the service of God can they share their Master's joy. Hence He also asks, as in absolute self-sacrifice He consecrates Himself, that 'they themselves also may be consecrated in truth' (Jn 17<sup>19</sup>). In this expression the love of Christ for His own is clearly expressed, and they are fitly introduced by the unique phrase 'Holy Spirit' (cf. 'Father,' v. 2, and 'righteous Father,' v. 25). In this glorious name of God 'all excellences meet'; purity and tenderness unite, majesty and pity combine. Christ regards this knowledge of God as 'an ideal region' in which His disciples will be safe from harm. As long as they are 'in the name,' it will be impossible for thoughts of God's holiness to suggest anything to approach the Holy Father (cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>, see above). Nor can the revelation in Christ of His 'pitying tenderness Divine' lead to sinful presumption on His grace, and to neglect of moral purity without which none may hold communion with the Holy Father. Therefore, as in the OT the conception of holiness varies with the conception of God, so in the NT the climax of the revelation of the Father in the Son is reached in the harmonizing of the 'many-hued' manifestations (cf. πολυχρόμος, Eph 3<sup>9</sup>) of His glory in the pure, white light of His holy love. The opening petitions of the Lord's Prayer teach that His Kingdom will come and His will be done 'as in heaven, so on earth,' when in His Church on earth as in heaven the name of the Holy Father is hallowed (Mt 6<sup>10</sup> ἁγιασθήτω τὸ ὄνομα σου . . . ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς).

2. The holiness of Christ.—Outside the Gospels holiness is ascribed to Christ in the Acts and the Epistles.—(a) The Acts. St. Peter (2<sup>27</sup>) and St. Paul (13<sup>35</sup>) see in the resurrection of Jesus proof that He is God's 'Holy One,' in whom is fulfilled the Messianic promise that He should not see corruption (Ps 16<sup>10</sup>, RVM renders קדש 'godly or beloved,' see above on δσος). In the prayer of the early Church, Jesus is twice described as Jehovah's 'Holy Servant' (4<sup>27 30</sup>), and it is probable that St. Peter has in mind Is 53 when he speaks of Jesus as 'the Holy and Righteous One' (3<sup>14</sup>, cf. v. 13). In these passages δσος is applied to the ideal Servant, in whose consecration, even unto death, God's moral glory was revealed—(b) The Epistles. Our High Priest, for ever 'separated from sinners,' is 'holy' (He 7<sup>26</sup>). Here δσος is a comprehensive summary of those inward qualities which were manifested by our Lord's dutiful submission to His Father's will: pre-eminently He was 'pure in heart,' fitted to encounter, in the presence of God, His ministry of intercession. In Ro 14 'the spirit of holiness' is not a synonym of Holy Spirit; holiness is ascribed to the spirit of the Incarnate Son. The πνεῦμα of Christ was human, in this respect He was 'made like unto his brethren' (He 2<sup>17</sup>); but His spirit was holy, and in that He was 'without sin' (4<sup>15</sup>), He was unique among men. His 'spirit of holiness' was 'the seat of the Divine nature'; He was filled with the Holy Spirit, and being 'essentially filled with God' was 'full of Divine impollution' (cf. Meyer, Comm. in loc.). St. Paul declares that it was in complete accord (κατά) with the transcendent holiness which was 'in the spirit of Christ' that the resurrection should be visibly manifested in the miracle of His resurrection. In 1 Jn 2<sup>20</sup> 'Ye have an anointing (χρίσμα) from the Holy One,' the reference must be to God the Father; but almost certainly the Holy One is Christ (cf. 3<sup>3</sup> 'He is pure,' and see above). The true reading in v. 27 (ἀντὸς not τὸ ἀντὸς), 'His anointing,' seems to remove all doubt. St. John says that Christians have 'anointed' the Christ; and there can be little doubt that the reference in chrisms is to the Holy Spirit. The faint prelude note, and in 3<sup>24</sup> the mention of the Holy Spirit comes like a burst of the music of the 'Veni Creator,' carrying on the fainter prelude' (Expos. Bible, p. 170).

The chief contributions to the formal exposition of the NT doctrine of holiness lie beyond the limits of this article. It need occasion no surprise that even to His disciples our Lord should not speak directly concerning holiness until in His farewell prayer He asked that the men called to continue His mission might share His consecration. The reason for His reticence is that 'in Him, and for them, holiness imported something—far more and other than it did in the religion of the day. . . . Only as they saw their Lord devote His person in the con-annuating sacrifice would they be prepared to realize what their Christian consecration involved' (Findlay, Expositor, VI [1901] iv. 5). It is also significant that the prayer for His disciples' holiness should immediately follow the discourse in which our Lord expounded in welcome detail what is involved in the promise of the Spirit whose gracious indwelling is the secret of holiness.

The Gospels are, however, the supreme revelation of holiness. The imitation of Christ is the royal road to holiness; His teaching concerning union with Himself and the bestowment of the Holy Spirit reveals the secret of holiness. The writers of the Epistles, under the guidance of the promised Teacher, unfolded the implications of their own experience and the purpose of the Incarnation, the Passion, and the abiding Priesthood of the Son of God.

The stress laid on the positive idea, which is probably the primary conception of holiness, may serve to guard Christians against the error of supposing that holiness may be acquired by withdrawals and abstentions or by compliance with external regulations. Holiness means the attainment of the Divine likeness, and this consists in moral qualities which are all compassed in holy love. The motive to holiness increases in strength as God is more perfectly known. In proportion as the Holy Father is known as He is, will be the gladness of our response to His claims, and the ardour of our desire to be like Him in this world. Into the world Christ sent the men for whose consecration He prayed, and His promise, 'Ye shall know that ye are in me' (Jn 14<sup>20</sup>), conveyed to them His assurance that 'in the world' they should attain to holiness. Life in Christ is . . .

HOLY ONE.—The expression 'the Holy One,' or 'the Holy One of God,' is used several times in the NT to describe our Lord. It is in itself so remarkable, and used in a manner so calculated to arrest attention, that it has been summed that we have here a characteristic of the Messiah (Meyer on Mk 1<sup>24</sup>). While it may be doubted if so positive an assertion can be justified, the expression is sufficiently striking to require a careful examination into its origin and its significance.

A scrutiny of the passages in which the AV has rendered the Greek expression by 'the Holy One,' will show that for the word 'holy' we have two Greek words, δσος and αγος. Now, since the two passages in which δσος occurs are in a quotation from the LXX, and the application of the term is most likely to be derived from a Hebrew original, it will be necessary to ask if these two words are uniformly used to represent corresponding Hebrew ones, or used indiscriminately to fr. different Heb. words in different places.

In the OT there are two distinct words used for 'holy,' קדש, קרוש, and it is to be carefully noted that in the LXX, although δσος tr. קדש about 30 times, and αγος tr. קרוש 100 times, in no single instance is δσος used for קרוש, or αγος for קדש (See Trench, NT Synonymus).

It is reasonable, then, to look for the signification of δσος in קדש, and αγος in קרוש. See art. HOLINESS.

A. Passages in which our Lord is described as 'Holy One,' δσος being used. As a substantive expression it occurs only in Ac 2<sup>27</sup> 13<sup>35</sup>—in both cases a quotation from Ps 16<sup>10</sup>—used first by St. Peter and afterwards by St. Paul,—οὐδὲ δώσεις τὸν δούλον σου ἰδεῖν διαφθοράν. Without a reference to the Hebrew, it might appear that such an expression, taken from the OT and applied by Apostles to Christ, would carry with it peculiar significance; but beyond the fact that the Apostle used the expression, there is nothing in the words themselves to justify any unique position in which our Lord was described as 'holy.'

B. Passages in which our Lord is described as 'Holy One,' αγος being used. If the examination of the foregoing passages prevents us giving to the word δσος any peculiar significance which would make it describe our Lord as a being of peculiar holiness, the case is quite otherwise when we come to the expression ὁ αγος.

1. Use of the title.—We find it first on the lips of the demoniac (Mk 1<sup>24</sup>, Lk 4<sup>34</sup>), who, in declaring his knowledge of Christ, describes Him as 'the Holy One of God' (ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ). The words probably made a deep impression on the disciples. We know how vague and uncertain were their views about their Master, and it would seem as if they seized on the demoniac's confession as a revelation of His claims; for, the next time the title is ascribed to Him, it is by St Peter himself, when striving to find words to answer our Lord's question if they too intended to abandon Him: 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we have believed and know that thou art the Holy One of God' (ὅτι σὺ εἶ ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ [so correct reading], Jn 6<sup>69</sup>).

St Peter, in his speech to the people in Solomon's porch (Ac 3<sup>4</sup>), charges them with denying 'the Holy and Lord' (ὁ ἅγιος καὶ κύριος). St. John (1 Jn 2) addresses his readers that they have 'an anointing from the Holy One' (ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου). In Rev 3<sup>7</sup> our Lord so describes Himself in the address to the Church of Philadelphia: 'These things saith he that is holy' (ὁ ἅγιος λέγει).

2. Derivation of the title.—We have seen that the title of ἅγιος is naturally to be looked for in the OT, which, like קדוש, is freely employed of places, things, and persons. Yet, while קדוש is used of God only in Jer 3<sup>12</sup> (LXX ἐλεῖψαν) and Ps 145<sup>17</sup> (LXX θεός), where it is joined with a reference to His works ('holy in all thy works'), קדוש is used very frequently to describe God Himself. It is so found in the Books of Job, Psalms, Isaiah, Hosea, and Habakkuk, קדוש 'the Holy One,' LXX ὁ ἅγιος. Besides the simple title 'the Holy One,' God is 24 times called by Isaiah 'the Holy One of Israel'; elsewhere only in Ps 71<sup>22</sup> 78<sup>41</sup> 89<sup>18</sup>, Jer 50<sup>20</sup> 51<sup>5</sup> [2 K 19<sup>22</sup>=Is 37<sup>23</sup>] קדוש יקראל.

3. Its significance as applied to our Lord.—To men familiar with the OT expressions 'the Holy One' and 'the Holy One of Israel' as denoting God Himself, it would seem almost impossible that the expression could have been used of Christ without a distinct desire to connect His title with that of Jehovah. Every male firstborn was indeed 'holy to the Lord' (Lk 2<sup>23</sup>). But on the lips of St. Peter and the demoniac it must be felt to have that special and distinct significance such as Jesus Himself implies in Jn 10<sup>36</sup>, when speaking of Himself as one 'whom the Father sanctified (ἁγιάσας) and sent into the world.' Spoken by our Saviour of His Father (Jn 17<sup>11</sup>), it signifies that which He is absolutely; spoken of Christ Himself, it means both this and also His special dedication to the work of man's salvation (e.g. in Ro 12<sup>1</sup> it is used with the force of a sacrificial metaphor, the victim consecrated to God). Christ was indeed the Holy One of God above all others, but that which He was He came in a measure to make His people, so that, in the language of the NT, those who through Him were consecrated and set apart were also οἱ ἅγιοι. See, further, art. HOLINESS.

HOLY SPIRIT.—With the exception of the 2nd and 3rd Epistles of John, every book in the NT mentions the Spirit. On a comprehensive view, indeed, it may be said that to understand what is meant by the Spirit is to understand the two things—the NT and the Christian Church. Not that the two can be precisely co-ordinated; yet in them and in their mutual relations we have the only adequate witness to what the Spirit means for Christians. To the men who wrote the NT and to those for whom they wrote, the Spirit was not a doctrine but an experience; they did not speak of believing in the Holy Spirit, but of receiving the Holy Spirit when they believed (Ac 19<sup>2</sup>). In some sense this covered everything that they included in Christianity. The work of the Christ was summed up in the words: 'He shall baptize with holy spirit' (Mk 1<sup>9</sup>). The acceptance of the gospel is the subject of the question: 'Was it by works of law or by the hearing of faith that you received the Spirit?' (Gal 3<sup>2</sup>). The entire equality of Jews and Gentiles in the Christian community is asserted in the words: 'God who knows the heart bore them witness in that he gave the Holy Spirit to them even as he did to us' (Ac 15<sup>8</sup>). After this, there was no more to be said. Yet the very fact that all who speak to us in the NT are familiar with experiences of the Holy Spirit does not always make it easier for us to understand them. It is clear that very various experiences are described in this way, and sometimes we cannot refrain from asking whether experiences which one writer recounts without any reference to the Spirit would not have been explained as 'pneumatic' by another; or vice versa, whether experiences ascribed to the Spirit by one writer would not in another have found a different interpretation. Further, there is the difficulty raised by the fact that while the experiences thus explained are represented, broadly speaking, as the work of the Risen Saviour, and as dependent somehow on His death and resurrection, the Spirit is also represented as working in His life on earth. Was this the case?

When we read that Jesus was baptised with the Holy Spirit, are we to suppose that He had experiences in consequence which were analogous to those of Christians in this age? The purpose of this article is to set forth facts as they are, and to show the old and new stages in the history the relation between the Spirit and Jesus the Christ.

1. The earliest reference to the Spirit is in the preaching of the Baptist. To the end John was conscious of the impotence and inadequacy of all his efforts: the true Helper of Israel, whatever His name might be, must be 'One mightier than I.' 'I baptize you with water, he shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit' (Mk 1<sup>8</sup>). A Christian Evangelist, like the author of the Gospel, might interpret such words in the light of his own post-Pentecostal experiences; and when we find the later Evangelists (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>16</sup>) add to 'holy spirit' the words 'and fire,' it is nearly certain that they have done so.* But it is not clear that for the Baptist the Holy Spirit of which he spoke was so clearly defined. He had not the Christian experience to put meaning into his words, and he can only have intended something which could be understood through its OT antecedents, or through experiences with which he had been in contact at an earlier period. The earliest form of the Gospel says nothing of such experiences, and when we look backward we cannot but be struck by the almost total disappearance of the Spirit from the OT literature of Judaism. 'First and Second Maccabees and Daniel are each in a different way witnesses for a very profound religious feeling of exactly the sort that in other ages, either earlier or later, would have been ascribed to the Spirit' (Wood, The Spirit of God in Biblical Literature, p. 71; cf. Gunkel, Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, p. 50 f.). Yet the Spirit is not appealed to in explanation. When we come to the Hebrew OT, however, the one idea which is dominant in connexion with the Spirit is the one which is wanted here to explain the prophecy of the Baptist—the idea of power as opposed to impotence. The invocation of Egypt to help Israel is expressed by the words: 'The Egyptians are men and not God, and their horses flesh and not spirit' (31<sup>2</sup>).

* The reference of the 'fire' in this connexion to the fire of Gehenna seems to the present writer (in spite of Mt 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 3<sup>17</sup>) simply incredible. The true key to it is Ac 2<sup>3</sup>, and the many passages in which the same or a similar figure recurs, e.g. 1 Th 5<sup>19</sup>, Ro 12<sup>11</sup>, Ac 18<sup>28</sup>.

Men and flesh are the impotent things, in contrast with the omnipotent, God and spirit. As A. B. Davidson puts it (Theology of the OT, 126), 'the Spirit of God ab intra is God active, showing life and power . . . the Spirit of God ab extra is God in efficient operation, whether in the cosmos or as giving life, reinforcing life, exerting efficiency in any sphere.' John the Baptist was a worker for God, but he never claims for himself either to have the Spirit or to be able to give it; he has the sense, however, that when the Mightier than himself comes, He will . . . in precisely these ways. He will . . . 'holy spirit' in virtue of being full of the Spirit himself.

2. When Jesus comes to be baptized in Jordan, the remarkable phenomenon is that what for others is a baptism with water coincides for Him with a baptism in the Holy Spirit. According to Mk 1<sup>10</sup>, as Jesus ascends from the water, He sees the heavens cleaving and the Spirit as a dove descending upon Him. In the earliest Evangelist thus is the experience of Jesus only: it is He who sees the Spirit descending, He to whom the heavenly voice is addressed. The later Evangelists may have conceived it otherwise, and extended the vision and the hearing of the voice to John the Baptist or even to the bystanders: it is indifferent here. All agree that on this occasion Jesus received the Holy Spirit, and in it the attestation of His Sonship, the call to His unique task, and the endowments needed to discharge it.

Critics have suggested that the curiously indirect way in which the baptism of Jesus and the descent of the Spirit are mentioned in Lk 3<sup>21</sup> is due to the writer's desire to slur over something which is really inconsistent with his account of Jesus' birth, but even if Luke had difficulty in adjusting these two things, as the . . . have had difficulty in adjusting the . . . Logos in Jesus with the descent of the Spirit . . . it is clear that for both the baptism was . . . Gospel testimony that they had no alternative but to set it unambiguously down (cf Jn 1<sup>33-34</sup>).

Have we any means of saying what is meant by such words as the Evangelists employ in this connexion? Can we interpret Jesus' experience by what we read of spiritual gifts or states in the Primitive Church? Is it right to look in His life for such phenomena as we find, e.g., in Acts or in 1 Cor. ascribed to the Spirit? May we look for such sudden accesses of feeling as we connect with scenes like Ac 2<sup>4</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>? Can there be such a thing as the rapture or ecstasy which seems to be meant by being 'in the Spirit' in Rev 1<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 17<sup>3</sup> 21<sup>10</sup>? These are not questions to be answered a priori. There must have been something in the life of Jesus as determined by the great experience of His baptism akin to the experiences which Christians subsequently ascribed to the Spirit, or they would hardly have traced both to the same source; and the more closely we look into the Gospels, the less does the emotionally colourless Saviour of popular art seem to correspond to the historical reality. The experiences of Jesus at the Baptism and the Transfiguration were not those of everyday life; they belong to 'pneumatic' as contrasted with normal conditions. So again it might be said that if the . . . of the temple (Mk 11<sup>15</sup>), the cursing of the fig-tree (11<sup>13</sup>), the excitement (apparently) with which, on the way to Jerusalem, Jesus took the lead of His disciples, to their bewilderment and fear (10<sup>32</sup>), had been told of anybody else, that other would have been described, on each occasion, as 'filled with the Holy Spirit.' However this may be (see J. Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes, p. 54 n.; O. Holtzmann, Was Jesus Ekstatischer?), the Evangelist makes no reference to the Spirit in this connexion. He leaves us to infer from the life which Jesus lived in the Spirit what the Spirit itself was. But it may fairly be said that some of the ideas which Christians . . . connected with their own baptism . . . relation to the baptism of Jesus and to the interpretation which they put upon it. It was the facts of His baptism which led them to believe (a) in a normal coincidence of baptism with the Spirit and water-baptism, instead of in the displacement of the latter by the former; (b) in the Spirit received in baptism as specifically the spirit of sonship; and (c) in that same Spirit as one consecrating them to God and to service in His kingdom.

3. The first light is thrown on the nature of the Spirit as received by Jesus in the narrative of the Temptations. It is the Spirit which sends Him out to the wilderness, there to engage in conflict with the power of evil. The word ἐκβάλλει (Mk 1<sup>13</sup>), though it must not be forced, suggests a Divine impulse which could not be resisted. Jesus was Divinely constrained—for the Spirit is always Divine—to face the ultimate issues of His work from the very beginning, to contemplate all the plausible but morally unsound ways of aiming at ascendancy over men for God, and to turn from them; to face the Prince of this world, and to demonstrate that that Prince had nothing in Him. The most elementary notion of the Spirit may be that of Divine power, but where we see it first at work in Jesus it is Divine power which is at the same time holy; it is at war, in principle, with everything which is unworthy of God; the kingdom which . . . God is to found in the . . . spirit is one which can make no kind . . . with evil. It must be spiritual (in the complete Christian sense) in its nature—not based on bread; spiritual in its methods—not appealing to miracles which only dazzle the senses or confound the mind; and spiritual in its resources—not deriving any of its strength from alliance with Satan, from borrowing the help of the evil which yields such vast power among men, or from recognizing that it has a relative or temporary right to exist. 'The spirit,' as Mk. calls it (1<sup>10-13</sup>), while Mt. has 'God's spirit' (3<sup>16</sup>), and Lk. 'the holy spirit' (3<sup>22</sup>) or 'holy spirit' (4<sup>1</sup>), is the Divine power with which Jesus was endowed at His baptism and which committed Him to an . . . conflict with evil. It is the conscious and victorious antagonist of another spirit, of which all that need be said is that it is not of God.

4. St. Luke tells us that Jesus returned from the Jordan 'in the power of the Spirit' into Galilee (4<sup>14</sup>), and St. Peter in Ac (10<sup>38-40</sup>) tells how God anointed Him (in the T. . . with holy spirit and power'; and it is . . . conditions that the Evangelists conceive His whole ministry to be . . . If they do not mention the Spirit at every step, it is because they think of Him as in full possession of it continually. It probably agrees, e.g., with the Evangelist's own idea, to say that the passage in Mk. which immediately succeeds the Temptations illustrates first by Jesus' power over men (1<sup>10-20</sup>), next by His power or authority in teaching (1<sup>21-24</sup>), and, finally, by His power over demons (1<sup>23-27</sup>), what is involved in His possession of the Spirit. A Divine power accompanied all His words and deeds, and made them effective for God and for His kingdom. The allusion in 1<sup>35</sup> to His rising early and going away to a desert place to pray suggests that, Divine as this power was, it wrought in, and in accordance with the laws of, a human nature which was . . . of spiritual exhaustion, and had to recruit . . . with God. We do not find till we come to 3<sup>21</sup> ('they said, He is beside himself,' ἐξέστη) any further indication of how His work in the Spirit affected Jesus. It is clear from this impatient word, in which the same charge is brought against the Lord as was afterwards brought against Paul (see

2 Co 5<sup>13</sup>, where ἐξέστημεν is opposed to that the tension of His spirit seem abnormal. He was 'rapt' or 'carried away' by His earnestness, and became for the time unconscious of bodily needs or indifferent to them (cf. the fast in the wilderness, and Jn 4<sup>21ff</sup>). Possibly even the charge brought against Him by the scribes, that He cast out demons by Beelzebub, in other words, that He was possessed Himself by a demon,—a charge mentioned in this connexion by Mk,—appealed for support to this tension or rapture. If the character of Jesus' healing had been that of emotionless . . . could not have been even plausible τ . . . ἐχει καὶ παύεται (Jn 8<sup>48</sup> 10<sup>20</sup>: these passages from the Fourth Gospel are guaranteed by their agreement with Mk 3<sup>2ff</sup>). There is no trace in the Gospel of any want of self-control,—no such frenzy as is ascribed to the Spirit in 1 S 19<sup>24</sup>, or in the description of the Spirit in 1 Co 14,—but there is a . . . implied which was felt through . . . word and deed.

5. The main interest of the passage Mk 3<sup>20-35</sup> lies in the word of Jesus Himself about the Holy Spirit. 'Verily I say unto you, All things shall be forgiven to the sons of men, the sins and the blasphemies, all that they have blasphemed but whoso shall have blasphemed the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness; but is guilty of eternal sin: because they said, He hath an unclean spirit' (v. 28<sup>f</sup>). It is hardly doubtful that this is the true form of this much discussed saying of Jesus. The Holy Spirit is not here set in any contrast with Jesus, as though to blaspheme Jesus were a venial fault, but to blaspheme the Spirit an unpardonable one, on the contrary, the Holy Spirit is blasphemed when malignant hearts harden themselves to say of Jesus, 'He has an unclean spirit.' The Divine power which works through Jesus with such intensity healing all who are under the tyranny of the devil is in point of fact God's supreme and final appeal to men. It is such an exercise of power as is possible only for one who has already vanquished Satan, and is engaged in liberating his captives (Mk 3<sup>27</sup>). No person with any sense for God in him can help being attracted by it to begin with. But if the other manifestations of this power should happen to provoke resentment,—if its ethical demands (as in the teaching of Jesus) should threaten seriously the reputation or the self-complacency of the minicore—it is fearfully possible that they may set themselves against it, and so resist the Holy Spirit. Such resistance, once begun, may go to any length even to the length . . . respecting the life of Jesus, and . . . to be from beneath, not from above.

1 sin against the Holy Spirit. In principle, it is the everyday sin of finding bad motives for good actions; carried to its . . . height, it is the sin of confronting . . . holy power which wrought so irresistibly and so intensely in Jesus, and saying anything—the maddest, most wanton, most malignant thing—rather than . . . it for what it is. The people who said, 'He has Beelzebub' (3<sup>22</sup>), 'He has an unclean spirit' (v. 30), were not giving expression to their . . . but to their last thoughts of Christ. This was the depth which malignity in them had reached. The Holy Spirit receives here a certain interpretation from being contrasted with an 'unclean' spirit. 'Unclean' is a religious rather than an ethical word; the unclean spirit is one which has not and cannot have relations with God: it can only be excluded from His presence, as it excludes those who are possessed by it. The Holy Spirit is specifically God's; it brings Him in His power to men, it is the very token and reality of His presence with them. But it is interpreted more precisely—and this is the point of Jesus' . . . as it is brought out in the parallel passage in Mt. and Lk.—by the works which it does. 'If I in the spirit of God am casting out the demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you' (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, cf. Lk 11<sup>20</sup>, where for ἐν πνεύματι θεοῦ we have ἐν δακτύλῳ θεοῦ, the Divine power being the essential idea; cf. Ex 8<sup>19</sup> (12)). When the superhuman power which displays itself with such intensity is manifested in works of this sort, it is clear that it is not merely superhuman, but specifically Divine. To withstand what is so unambiguously the redeeming power of God, and to do so deliberately and malignantly, in the spirit which will kill Jesus rather than acknowledge Him as what He is, is the unpardonable sin.

The form of this saying which appears in Mt 12<sup>31f</sup> and Lk 12<sup>10</sup> has almost certainly been detected in tradition. Mt really has it in two forms, v. 31 by itself corresponding to what we have in Mk, and v. 32 to what we have in Luke. That is, Mt 12<sup>31f</sup> is a doublet, in which the same saying is found, . . . in the Gospel of Mk, and then as it appeared . . . of discourses generally allowed to have been used by Mt and Luke. What is meant in the second form, where a word spoken against the Son of Man is contrasted with blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, is not very clear. Mk, who puts the odious charge, 'He has an unclean spirit,' into connexion with the word of Jesus' friends, 'He is beside himself,' might be regarded as giving a key to the meaning, were it not for the fact that 'the Son of Man' does not occur in his text at all. An impatient, petulant word, like 'He is crazy,' uttered in a moment of anxiety or irritation or misunderstanding, from a man that at bottom loved Him, was no doubt a sin, His friends ought to have been more capable of doing Him justice. But it was not a sin which committed the whole nature blindly and finally against God; it could be repented of, and when it was, then, like other sins, it would be forgiven. This would be the word spoken against the Son of Man. In contrast with such a momentary petulance on the part of His friends stands the . . . of God's present saying 'He has an unclean spirit' . . . Here the nature is finally committed against God, such a word blasphemes His Spirit—that is, the Spirit of God. It is actually here, working in Christ for man's salvation, in which it is sin absolutely, αἰώνιον ἀπάργημα, i.e. sin which has the character of finality, and can never be anything but what it is—sin past which one cannot see so as to infer the possibility of forgiveness either in this world or in the next.

6. The expulsion of evil spirits from the possessed is . . . the Gospel as a chief manifestation of . . . by Jesus of the Holy Spirit. But all His miracles are to be understood in this connexion. Without . . . far as to say that in the Temptation . . . He is represented as tempted to put to selfish uses the power just conferred through the Spirit in baptism for the ends of God's kingdom it is a mark of historicity in the canonical Gospel that until He is baptized with the Spirit, Jesus works no miracle. It is the Spirit in which the power is given for all His mighty works (δυνάμεις). It is not likely, however, that when we read of power as having gone forth from Him (which in Mk 5<sup>20</sup> and Lk 6<sup>19</sup> may be only the Evangelist's reading of the facts, but in Lk 8<sup>46</sup> is distinctly ascribed to Jesus Himself), any reference to the Spirit is intended. The wisdom and the mighty works which astonished the Nazarenes (Mk 6) would no doubt be referred to this source by the Evangelist; and when in 6<sup>7</sup> Jesus sends out the Twelve, giving them authority over the unclean spirits, it can only have been conceived as due to the transference to them of a part in that Divine power which had been so wonderfully operative in Him (cf. Nu 11<sup>17</sup>). The . . . that it was the Risen Saviour by whom . . . was given to the Apostles so dominated the Evangelists, that none of them refers to the Spirit in connexion with this mission of the Twelve during Jesus' lifetime. The Spirit of Jesus in Mk 8<sup>12</sup> is no doubt, as in 2<sup>8</sup>, His human spirit; but if we admit that it is to this that the Spirit of God is most akin, or most immediately attached, it is perhaps not fanciful to suppose that the sigh (ἀναστροφή, cf. in a similar situation 7<sup>34</sup>) represents the grieving of the Spirit of God by the unbelief and hard-heartedness of man (cf Eph 4<sup>30</sup>, Is 63<sup>10</sup>). It is more hazardous to say 'only in 'pneumatic' and abnormal . . . in a psychological state extraordinarily and violently elevated above the level of common experience—did Jesus identify Himself with the Son of Man, who after a tragic career on earth was to rise . . . 'he third day, or to come on the clouds' (Mk 8<sup>31</sup> 9<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>32ff</sup> 14<sup>62</sup>). Abnormal conditions such as are here supposed do not persist in sane minds, and to call Jesus an 'ecstatic' or a 'pneumatic' in this sense is only to avoid calling Him a fanatic by using a natural instead of a moral term to describe Him. Certainly the Gospel suggests in this period of His life accesses of intense emotion (Mk 8<sup>43</sup>) and phenomena both in His aspect (9<sup>15</sup>) and in His conduct (10<sup>32</sup>) which must have struck people as unusual, and due to something overpowering within, which it would have been natural to call the Spirit; but in point of fact there is no reference to the Spirit in this period. Perhaps the nearest approach to it is in Mk 10<sup>38</sup>, where Jesus asks James and John, 'Are ye able to be baptized with the baptism with which I am baptized?' There is no doubt that Jesus speaks throughout this scene with unusual elevation of tone; and the figure of baptism, which He could . . . without recalling . . . at the Jordan and all that His . . . involved, lifts us into the region where the thought of the Spirit is near. Still, it is not expressed. The Triumphant Entry, the Cleansing of the Temple, and the Fig-tree are all acts implying . . . elevation of feeling transcending common human limits: often other persons, visited by such impulses with startling suddenness, are said to be 'filled with holy spirit,' but in Jesus they do not seem to have made the same impression on bystanders. They did not apparently stand in relief in His life as they would have done in the life of others; little in it . . . signed to the Spirit, because the . . . at the . . . impelled and . . . oughtout. It . . . not really cast any light on Jesus' experience of the Spirit, when in Mk 12<sup>36</sup> He quotes Ps 110 by 'David himself said in the Holy Spirit': this merely represents the Jewish belief in the Divine inspiration of Scripture, a belief most distinctly preserved in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where OT prophecies are introduced by 'as saith the Holy Spirit' (Heb 1<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>15</sup>; cf. 2 P 1<sup>21</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, Ac 1<sup>16</sup>). More important is Mk 13<sup>11</sup>, which contains the only promise of the Holy Spirit in the earliest Evangelist. Referring to the persecutions which will come upon the Apostles after His death, Jesus says: 'When they lead you to judgment and deliver you up, be not anxious beforehand what ye shall speak, but whatever is given to you in that hour, that speak; for it is not you that speak, but the Holy Spirit.' The Spirit is here conceived as a Divine reinforcement in the very crisis of need. If fidelity to the gospel brings men to extremity, they will not be left there, but will have experience of superhuman help. It is important to notice that the precise character in which the Spirit which comes to the help of the disciples is here conceived as acting is that of a παράκλητος or advocatus—an idea of which ampler use is made in the Gospel and 1st Epistle of John. The term παράκλητος may be due to the Evangelist, but the conception of the Spirit's function goes back to the Lord. It is not the Holy Spirit which is referred to in Mk 14<sup>48</sup>; and in 16<sup>18-20</sup>, although mention is made, as is natural in a late passage based on other NT writings, of most of what are usually called spiritual gifts, the Spirit itself is not expressly named.

If, then, we try to sum up the oldest Evangelic representation, we can hardly say more than that the Holy Spirit is the Divine power which from His baptism onward wrought in Jesus, making Him mighty in word and deed—a power the character of which is shown by the teaching and by the saving miracles of Jesus—a power to which the sanctity of God attached, so that it is Divine also in the ethical sense, and to blaspheme it is the last degree of sin—a power in which Jesus enabled His disciples to some extent to share, and which He promised would be with them in the emergencies of their mission—a power, however, which (contrary to what we might have anticipated) the Spirit does not bring into prominence at any . . . or intense moments of Jesus' life. It takes nothing less than that life itself, from beginning to end, to show us what the Spirit means. If the last Evangelist tells us that the Spirit interprets Jesus, the inference from the first is that Jesus also interprets the Spirit, and that only through Him can we know what it means.

7. If we turn from Mark to the other Evangelic source common to Mt. and Lk., we find little to add to this. Both our First and our Third Evangelists have everything which Mk has, and their variations (e.g. Mt 3<sup>11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>16</sup> as opp. Mk 1<sup>8</sup>; Mt 12<sup>31f</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup> as opp. Mk 3<sup>28f</sup>; Mt 10<sup>40</sup>, Lk 12<sup>13</sup> 21<sup>15</sup> as opp. Mk 13<sup>11</sup>) have been noticed already, or are of no consequence. But when we look at what is peculiar to Mt. and to Lk. respectively, there is more to say. Omitting for the moment the first two chapters in each, we notice these points:

(a) It is a mark of historicity in Mt. that in recording the Sermon on the Mount he nowhere alludes to the distinction of 'letter' and 'spirit' which occurs so spontaneously to the modern interpreter of the words of Jesus. On the other hand, in 7<sup>22</sup> we have an utterance of Jesus introduced in terms which have . . . influenced by post-Pentecost. . . Spirit. It was only then that men 'prophesied' in the name of Jesus, etc., and till they had done so, such language as this could not have been used. Comparison with Lk 13<sup>26ff</sup> justifies us in saying that we have here the word rather than the words of the Lord. But in any case, the idea that the most amazing gifts of the Spirit are worthless apart from common morality—the idea expanded in 1 Co 13—is here traced back to Jesus Himself. It is difficult to understand a Divine power, the action of which, so to speak, elevates and removes the nature, without raising the character; yet this is undeniably what is contemplated both by Jesus and by St. Paul. . . the underlying truth is that the moral . . . deepest and the hardest to penetrate by the Divine power, and may remain unaffected by it when other elements of our being have been subdued to its service. The unnaturalness of such a result is reflected on by Jesus in Mt 11<sup>21f</sup>, where woes are pronounced on the cities which had seen so many of His mighty works, yet had not repented. It is implied that these mighty works, the works of the Spirit in Him, were of such a character—that is, so holy and gracious—that they ought to have evoked penitence, and brought a new moral life into being. An interesting light is thrown on the Evangelist's own conception of the Spirit in relation to Jesus, by his application to our Lord of the prophecy in Is 42<sup>1-4</sup> 'I will put my spirit upon him, and he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles,' etc (Mt 12<sup>18-21</sup>). Here not only the power of Jesus, which gives Him assurance of final victory (Mt 12<sup>20</sup>), but His method and His temper—His meekness, patience, constancy—are ascribed to the Spirit. The presence and power of God are felt in His superhuman renunciation of the ordinary ways and tempers of men as much as in the superhuman resources which He wielded. It is again a mark of historicity in Mt. that we find no mention of the Spirit where in a writer dominated by the consciousness of a later time we should certainly have expected it—that is, in the passages which speak of what are sometimes called ecclesiastical functions or functions (16<sup>18f.</sup> 18<sup>15-20</sup>). Contrast with these Jn 20<sup>22f.</sup>, Ac 15<sup>28</sup>. The Trinitarian baptismal formula, however it be explained, throws no light on the Spirit as an experience in the life of Jesus (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>).

(b) St. Luke's interest in the Spirit, as the most conspicuous phenomenon in primitive Christianity, is well known, and it is apparent in his Gospel. Thus he describes Jesus, as the result of His baptism, as πλήρης πνεύματος ἁγίου (4<sup>1</sup>), where the adjective seems intended to describe a permanent condition, as opposed to the verb (used of sudden and transient accessions of the Spirit in 14<sup>1-67</sup>). Similarly he says that in the wilderness ἤγειρο ἐν τῷ πνεύματι (4<sup>1</sup>), which seems to signify an intense, rapt, and absorbed state of feeling, in which He was carried up and down the desert. The form of words is used elsewhere to describe either possession by an evil spirit (Mk 1<sup>23</sup> ἄνθρωπος ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ) or ecstasy in the Divine (Rev 1<sup>10</sup> ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι). More instructive is the way in which St. Luke puts the whole ministry of Jesus under the heading of the Spirit. He returns from the Jordan to Galilee ἐν τῇ δυνάμει τοῦ πνεύματος, and it is this power which is the key to all the marvellous life which follows (4<sup>14</sup>, cf. the summary account of Jesus' life by the same writer from the lips of St. Peter in Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). But though power—that is, the presence of God, who can do what men cannot do—is the fundamental note of the Spirit, it is not power undefined. St. Luke has no sooner spoken of Jesus as entering on His work in the power of the Spirit, than he interprets this by the scene at Nazareth where Jesus applies to Himself the prophecy of Is 61<sup>1f.</sup> 'The spirit of the Lord is upon me because he hath anointed me to preach glad tidings to the poor,' etc. (Lk 4<sup>18f.</sup>). 'The words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth' on this occasion (v. 22), and the spiritual healings which He wrought, were as unmistakably tokens of the Spirit as the 'mighty works' which the Nazarenes had heard of as wrought at Capernaum.

If the reading of the TR in 955 (οὐκ οὐδαμῶς οὐ πνεύματος ἵστος) has any authority, it is to the same intent: the spirit in which Jesus came, to seek and save the lost, was the very call down fire from heaven on Him. It is an approach here to the Divine power which works in Jesus makes Him a Saviour, and it is this power which is the key to all the marvellous life which follows. It is the power which is the key to all the marvellous life which follows. It is the power which is the key to all the marvellous life which follows.

One of the most interesting singularities in Lk. is his reference to the Spirit in 10<sup>21</sup>. Mt 11<sup>25</sup> 'In that hour Jesus rejoiced in the Holy Spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father,' etc. Both Evangelists, in giving the one passage in the Synoptic tradition which has the Johannine ring, are conscious of its peculiar elevation of thought and feeling, but only Lk. interprets it in this way. The authority on which he depended must have preserved for him the remembrance of a joyful excitement thrilling Jesus as He spoke. The context, too, favours this. The Seventy return to Jesus (10<sup>17</sup>) exulting that even the demons are subject to them in His name. In a sudden flash Jesus reveals to them what He had seen in their absence, and through their little successes: ἐθεώρουν τὸν Σατανᾶν ὡς δαστυπῆν ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ πεσόντα (v. 18). It is in the consciousness of this final victory, and of His power to make even His feeble followers more than conquerors, that, after warning them not to trust in what they can do for God, but rather in God's faithful love to them, He breaks into what

Lk. evidently meant to say: His rapturous utterance. It is not with Divine exultant gladness, that Jesus accepts the Father's will as revealed in the results of His work. The Spirit is not connected with revelation either here or anywhere else in the life of Jesus, but only with the overpowering, joyful emotion of the hour. And the connexion of the Spirit and of joy is one of the most striking characteristics of the NT all through (see Lk 1<sup>4</sup>, Ro 14<sup>17</sup>, Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, Ac 13<sup>52</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>6</sup>). No authority can be claimed for the v.l. in Lk 11<sup>2</sup>, according to which, instead of 'Thy kingdom come,' or 'Hallowed be thy name,' we should read, 'Thy Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us.' Yet it is in keeping with St. Luke's interest in the Spirit that this reading is found here and not in Mt.'s version of the prayer (see Plummer's St. Luke, p. 295 n.). It is another proof of this interest that in Lk 11<sup>13</sup> πνεῦμα ἁγίου replaces the 'good things' of Mt 7<sup>11</sup>: for St. Luke, all 'good things' which Christians could ask from the Father are summed up in the Spirit. This is a clear case of later experience interpreting the words of Jesus and giving the sense of them in its own terms. Perhaps if another than Jesus had been in question, we might have read that the passionate words of 12<sup>48f.</sup> broke from His lips when He was 'filled with holy spirit'; but to the Evangelist Jesus is always 'full of the Holy Spirit,' and no such points stand in relief in His career. Oddly enough, Lk. omits any mention of the Spirit in connexion with Ps 110 (20<sup>41f.</sup>), though both Mt. and Mk. seem to emphasize it, and in 21<sup>15</sup> he replaces the express promise of the Spirit, which he has already used in 12<sup>12</sup>, by a more general promise of an irresistible power of speech such as he ascribes in Ac 6<sup>10</sup> to a man full of the Holy Spirit. There is no reference to the Holy Spirit in 23<sup>46</sup>. The last light the Evangelist throws on it is in 24<sup>48</sup>, where the Risen Saviour describes it as 'the promise of my Father,' and as 'power from on high.' The last word, therefore, brings us back to the first. The fundamental idea to be associated with the Spirit is that of Divine power: how the Divine power is to be further characterized, what it is ethically, and to what issues or in what temper it works, we can see only in the life of Jesus. He is the key to the interpretation of a term which of itself is indefinite indeed.

8. From the life of Jesus, as covered by the Apostolic testimony (Ac 1<sup>21f.</sup>), we now turn to the chapters of Mt. and Lk. which tell the story of His birth. If Mk. is the earliest form of the Evangelic tradition, it is natural to say (whatever the Evangelist's own Christology may be) that the Divine sonship of Jesus was originally connected with His baptism. It was there He received the Holy Spirit and heard the heavenly voice which said, 'Thou art my Son.' It would be all the more natural for Christians to say this who read in their Gospel of Luke (3<sup>22</sup>), with Codex Bezae, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.' But as soon as reflexion woke, it would be apparent that Jesus could not suddenly, at the age of thirty or thereabouts, begin to be what He had in no sense been, or been destined and prepared for, before. This is the conviction which—not to speak of historical evidence—sustains the stories of the birth of Christ. He must always have been what Christians eventually knew Him in their own experience to be. He must always have been Son of God. If it is the Spirit which makes Him Son, then behind the baptism with the Spirit must lie a birth in which the Spirit is equally important: not only the equipment of this personality, but its origination, must be traced directly to God. And it is the origination of the personality of Jesus with which both Mt. and Lk. are concerned. Neither of them betrays any idea that the Son of God pre-existed, and that they are only narrating the mode in which He came from another order of being into this; and, difficult as it may be to understand how a companion and friend of St. Paul could ignore such an idea, we must abide by the facts as they are before us. No act of man, but only the power of God, lies behind and explains the existence of Jesus Christ in the world. In Mt. the story is told simply and briefly: Mary was found with child ἐκ πνεύματος ἁγίου (1<sup>18, 20</sup>). It is this which makes the Child to be Immanuel, 'God with us.' In Luke, though, is much more elaborate, the place and of the Spirit in the story are the same. The angel of the Annunciation says to Mary (1<sup>35</sup>): πνεῦμα ἅγιον ἐπελεύσεται ἐπὶ σέ, καὶ δύναμις ὑψίστου ἐπισκιάσει σοί. διὰ καὶ τὸ γεννώμενον ἅγιον κληθήσεται, υἱὸς θεοῦ. It is in virtue of this mode of origination that the future child is ἅγιον, Son of God. It is important to notice here the parallelism of πνεῦμα ἅγιον and δύναμις ὑψίστου. The two expressions are equivalent. In the life and work of Jesus, the power can reveal itself ethically (as the Gospel story shows in detail), but in the origination of His personality there is no room for anything to appear but bare power. The action of the Spirit is to be conceived not as sexual but as creative. This marks the truth as well as the purity of the NT. In the OT, where the gender of רוח can be determined, the feminine instances are to the masculine as more than two to one; but in the NT this is irrelevant. πνεῦμα is of τὸ. It will be persuaded by O. Holtzmann (War Jesus Ekstatiker? p. 41) that the Gospel according to the Hebrews, in which Jesus is introduced as speaking of the Holy Spirit as His mother, represents anything more primitive or original than that account. To call the Spirit either 'mother' or 'father' is equally inept and un-Christian: the Spirit is the power of the Highest, to which the presence of the Son of God in the world is due. In other words, the Divine Sonship of Jesus does not date from His baptism, as that of Christians; it is not with Him as with us an affair of re-birth, but of birth simply; it is native and original roots as deep as His being; He is not ἐκ but μονογενής.

9. But it is not only the birth of Jesus which in Lk 1 and 2 is connected with the Spirit: all the events of His life are transacted, so to speak, in an atmosphere created by the Spirit. The representation is certainly partly by OT conceptions of the Spirit, and partly, no doubt, by primitive Christian experiences of it. Thus in 1<sup>15</sup> the angel says of John: πνεύματος ἁγίου πλησθήσεται ἐνὶ ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς αὐτοῦ, words in which we can think only of a Divine energy or intensity of life which was to characterize the child from the first. Possibly the juxtaposition of this with the prohibition of wine and strong drink (cf. Ac 2<sup>13</sup>, Eph 5<sup>18</sup>) suggests the excitement or stimulation of the nature by God as opposed to any natural intoxicant. Yet the work which John is to do in consequence ('many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God,' 1<sup>16</sup>), shows that the Divine power is conceived as working to ethical issues, and therefore as itself ethical. In the OT 'the spirit is never used as a cause except of those things which have to do with the affairs of the people of Israel' (Wood, op. cit. p. 9); and this is the point of view maintained throughout these chapters in Luke. The Spirit is connected with the Messianic age (this is universally the case in the NT), and with the preparations for the coming of the Messiah. In John, who comes 'in the spirit and power of Elijah' (1<sup>17</sup>), it is a prophetic spirit, yet rather in the OT than in the NT sense: indeed, it is the outstanding feature in the consciousness of John that he neither has nor can impart holy spirit. When it is said that Elisabeth 'was filled with holy spirit, and lifted up her voice with a loud cry' (1<sup>42</sup>), we must think of a sudden and overpowering access of feeling referred to God as its source. The same remark applies to Zacharias (1<sup>67</sup>) as he utters the Benedictus: in both cases the emotion is one of joy (see above, § 7). More are the references to the Spirit in connection with Simeon (2<sup>25</sup>). He was a just and devout man, full of the Messianic hope, and it was probably by this character that πνεῦμα ἅγιον ἐπ' αὐτόν. Yet this can hardly mean that he had an abiding possession of the Spirit. No such possession of the Spirit is contemplated anywhere in these chapters, and Simeon is presented to us only in relation to this one scene from the life of Jesus. All through his action here he is divinely illuminated man. This is what is meant by the words quoted. It is 'in the Spirit'—that is, under a Divine impulse—that he comes into the temple; it has been revealed to him 'by the Holy Spirit'—that is, he has had a Divine assurance granted him—that he will see the Christ before he dies. How this impulse or this revelation was imparted to Simeon the Evangelist does not tell, and it is vain to ask. But we need not say that it was not mediated at all, but blankly supernatural. The words in 2<sup>34</sup> could not have been spoken by a young man; here 'old experience doth attain to something of prophetic strain.' Perhaps we may say as much of the ancient prophetess Anna (v. 36<sup>ff</sup>). προφήτης implies the Spirit, yet apart from this one occasion, at the presentation of the Child Jesus in the temple, when she gave thanks to God—no doubt in such an outburst of inspired feeling as is seen in the Nunc dimittis—we have no means of knowing how the Spirit expressed itself through her. For this sudden and eager outburst of thanksgiving (so much is implied in αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ ἐπιστάσα ἀρθωμολογεῖτο τῷ θεῷ) we may perhaps compare St. Luke's account of the first Spirit-given utterances at Pentecost. 'We do hear them speak in our tongues the mighty works of God' (Ac 2<sup>11</sup>).

10. In the Synoptic Gospels, what is said of the Spirit no doubt bears the impress, here and there, of experiences which were familiar to the writers under that name, but these experiences do not come into view. It is otherwise when we turn to the Synoptics. Writers like St. Luke in Acts, and St. Paul in many of his Epistles, deal directly and formally with this subject. In the Gospel of John there is reached even a stage of conscious reflexion upon it which may almost be called a doctrine of the Spirit. And everywhere in the NT there are casual lights thrown upon it in which we can see its place in Christian thought and life. It is not intended here to follow out these in detail, but to indicate in outline the main features of the post-Pentecostal experience and conception of the Spirit, keeping especially in view their relation to Christ and the Gospels.

11. Although there might be reasons for beginning with St. Paul, it is more convenient to follow up Lk.'s Gospel by Acts. The first reference of this book to the Spirit is one of the most singular: Jesus is spoken of as having 'given commandment through the Holy Spirit unto the apostles whom he had chosen' (1<sup>2</sup>). Though Jesus in the Gospel speaks and acts from beginning to end as one anointed with Holy Spirit and power, there is no parallel to this expression. It seems to suggest that with the Resurrection the dispensation of the Holy Spirit began, and that the disciples were conscious, as they listened to the new and final charge of their Lord, that they were in contact, as they had never been before, with the powers of the world to come (He 6<sup>9</sup>), the Divine inspiration of the Messianic age. This power with which the Risen Saviour is invested He bids the disciples themselves expect within a few days (1<sup>5</sup>). It is the promise of the Father. 'Ye shall receive power when the Holy Spirit is come upon you, and ye shall be my witnesses' (1<sup>8</sup>). This promise was made good at Pentecost, when 'all were filled with the Holy Spirit, and began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance' (2<sup>4</sup>). The . . . of the tongues in Ac 2. . . languages has to be controlled by St. . . . description in 1 Co 14. The miracle of Pentecost is not that the disciples spoke in foreign languages, which, in spite of the narrator, is meaningless and incredible, but that they spoke at all, that they spoke with tongues of fire, and that their speech was a testimony to Jesus, delivered with overwhelming Divine power. The whole Pentecostal phenomenon, including the emotional disturbance which suggested drunkenness (2<sup>13</sup>), and expressed itself in joyful if inarticulate . . . (2<sup>11</sup>, cf 1 Co 14<sup>10</sup>), has the character . . . to Jesus. The central thought of the whole is that of 2<sup>33</sup> 'Having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, he hath poured forth this which ye both see and hear.' Pentecost, or the gift and possession of the Spirit, is the proof to the world of the exaltation of Jesus. It is His Divine power which is behind this incalculable elevation and reinforcement of the natural life. This is the NT point of view throughout. There is such a thing as a spirit which is not of God, but the Spirit which Christians have and of which they speak is never anything else than the Spirit of Jesus. It is never an undefined impulse or stimulus—a vague excitement originating anyhow and tending anywhither: it is always referred specifically to Jesus, and it is . . . a token that He is there in power . . . here is an abnormal or pathological side to speaking with tongues need not be questioned; the equilibrium of a weak and sinful nature may easily be disturbed by the sudden irruption into it of such incalculable realities as the resurrection of Jesus, the redeeming love and the coming judgment of God; but any degree of disturbance is better than indifference and insensibility. The . . . question is how the disturbance is to . . . men are to rise out of it into the balance of a renewed nature at a higher level, or to sink out of it into the old torpor again. The disturbance itself is the work of God through His Spirit—the Spirit of the Risen Saviour—whatever the issue be. For other references in Acts to speaking with tongues . . . the most . . . of having the Spirit . . . 10<sup>46</sup> 19<sup>6</sup> . . . what is meant when we read of the . . . (ἐκκλῆσιον) people as in 8<sup>16</sup>.

More important than speaking with tongues, even in Acts, is . . . St. Peter's sermon in Ac 2 is a specimen of Christian prophecy; the Spirit enables him to read the OT (Joel and the Psalms) in a Christian sense, and to find in it Jesus and the Messianic age. It is similarly inspired men—'by the πνεύματος of the Holy Spirit' (9<sup>1</sup>)—under whose ministry the Church is multiplied. Five such men are mentioned by name as working in the Church at Antioch (13<sup>14</sup>). The seven at Jerusalem (6<sup>3</sup>) are chosen as men full of the Spirit and faith. The daughters of Philip, who prophesied, were women who shared in this gift (21<sup>9</sup>). Sometimes the prophecy had the character of prediction: e.g. Agabus (11<sup>2</sup>) signified 'through the Spirit' an impending famine, just as at a later date (21<sup>14</sup>) he foretold what awaited Paul at Jerusalem: 'thus saith the Holy Spirit' It is no doubt the utterances of such 'inspired' men that are in view when St. Paul himself says (20<sup>23</sup>): 'The Holy Spirit testifieth unto me in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me' (cf. 21<sup>4</sup>). It is important to note that St. Paul did not find it necessary to obey when Christian men said to him 'through the Spirit that he should not set foot in Jerusalem'. In some way he could urge the Spirit within him against this spirit without. 'I go bound in the spirit to Jerusalem' (20<sup>22</sup>, cf. 19<sup>21</sup>). He felt a Christian obligation to go at all hazards, and went against all omens. Akin to these warnings is the general guidance of the Church and the Apostles by the Spirit, especially at important crises. For example, in chs 8 and 10, where it is important to represent that the extension of the Church beyond the Jews was Divinely authorized, the whole story is told at the supernatural level, and the Spirit appears at every turn. 'the Spirit said to Philip' (8<sup>29</sup>, cf 8<sup>36</sup>), 'the Spirit of the Lord snatched Philip away' (8<sup>39</sup>); 'while Peter was pondering the vision, the Spirit said, Behold two men seek thee . . . I have sent them' (10<sup>19c</sup>); 'the Spirit bade me go with them, no . . . ' (11<sup>12</sup>). How the Spirit made such . . . we need not inquire but it is important to notice that they are not about indifferent things. There is nothing of the pagan oracle which deals with any question proposed to it. the Spirit gives direction only in the concerns of the Kingdom of the Messiah. For other and striking illustrations connected with this guidance of the Church in the preaching of the gospel see 13<sup>2</sup> (where, no doubt, the Spirit spoke through an inspired man), 13<sup>4</sup> 15<sup>28</sup> 16<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>10</sup>. The last verse probably shows that too hard and fast a line is not to be drawn between the voice of the Spirit and inferences drawn from facts by Christian intelligence.

One point of interest in Acts is the relation of the Spirit to baptism. The gift of the Spirit is itself represented beforehand as a baptism (1<sup>5</sup> 'ye shall be baptized with holy spirit not many days hence'). After Pentecost, instead of displacing and annulling water-baptism, as we might have anticipated, the baptism with the Spirit is regarded as normally coincident with the other. 'Repent and be baptized . . . and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit' (2<sup>38</sup>, cf. 9<sup>17a</sup>). When people believed and were baptized, and the Holy Spirit did not fall on any of them, it was abnormal and disconcerting,—at least on St. Luke's theory (8<sup>14-17</sup>),—and steps were taken to remedy it. It must be remembered that the . . . token of in Acts is that of adult . . . and that for such persons the . . . their faith, in a ritual act, was naturally the occasion of profoundly moving experiences—experiences which, as rising into higher ranges of thought and feeling than usual, were ascribed by the early Church to the Spirit. To find in Ac 8<sup>14-17</sup> or 19<sup>1-7</sup> an analogue of 'confirmation,' a sacrament . . . to baptism, and capable of being conferred only by an Apostle or by a bishop as his successor is an anachronism. The gifts of the Holy Spirit bestowed on these two occasions when Apostles prayed and laid their hands on the baptized, were what may be called spiritual gifts falling within the sphere of the . . . they spoke with tongues and prophesied' (19<sup>6</sup>). In confirmation, this is neither asked nor wanted, but this and nothing else is what is desiderated by St. Luke. The emotional stimulation, which liberates the hidden powers of human nature, is itself the gift of the Holy Spirit in virtue of which people become glossolalists or prophets. But though, for the reason already stated, the gift of the Spirit is the normal accompaniment of baptism, the order of the two things may be reversed. Cornelius and his household are baptized, not in order to receive, but because they have received, the Spirit (10<sup>44-48</sup>). And more important than any single observation is the fact that in Acts, as elsewhere in the NT, the reception of the Spirit is the whole of Christianity. 'They received the Holy Spirit even as we did' (10<sup>47</sup> 11<sup>15</sup> 15<sup>31</sup>). All that makes a man a Christian is in this, and where this is there can be no distinction of Jew or Gentile more. The Church is one in the unity of the Spirit.

12. In St. Paul's Epistles the Holy Spirit is mentioned nearly 120 times, and may be said to have a prominence and importance which it has nowhere else in the NT. It is difficult to discuss it in detail here. On the one hand, we have representations of the Spirit, and of the effects produced by its reception, entirely similar to those in Acts: St. Paul's whole ministry, in word and deed, has been accomplished in the power of the Holy Spirit (Ro 15<sup>13a</sup>); those who receive his gospel receive the Spirit; the chief χαρίσματα, or spiritual gifts, are tongues and prophesying (1 Th 5<sup>19-20</sup>). Though St. Paul was distinguished himself, above everyone at Corinth, by his experiences of the glossolalic ecstasy, and thanked God for it (1 Co 14<sup>18</sup>), and though he discouraged the sober-minded Thessalonians who would have hastily repressed it (this is what is meant by 'Quench not the Spirit' in 1 Th 5<sup>19</sup>), he was not insensible to its dangers. There was something morbid in it; it might be tainted with vanity and selfishness; there was nothing in it to edify the Church. Good Christians might even be conceived as thanking God that they did not speak with tongues. Even the higher gift of prophecy needs criticism and control. The man who comes to the church with a 'teaching' or a 'revelation' may come in the Spirit—he may be an inspired man,—but he is not irresponsible nor is he exempt from the criticism and control of the Church. 'Prophets' spirits are subject to prophets' (1 Co 14<sup>32</sup>): the Divine impulse under which the prophet in each case speaks is not an uncontrollable force which must have its way irrespective of order or decorum. Neither does it guarantee infallibility: the human individuality counts for something in every utterance, and when two or three prophets have spoken the others are to judge (1 Co 14<sup>29</sup>). The Christian common sense of the community, so to speak, is felt to be more inspired than the most ardent utterance of any individual. St. Paul even mentions among χαρίσματα one which he calls διακρίσεις πνευμάτων—the faculty of deciding on each occasion what is the true character of the impulse under which a man speaks, and in particular whether it is of God or not. The conception of a spiritual gift of this kind—an instinctive sense for what is or is not in keeping with the Gospel—is peculiar. It brings us within sight of what is characteristically Pauline in the conception of the Spirit: namely, a possession of the Spirit which is beyond all particular 'gifts' or 'operations' of a spiritual kind, which is, in short, identical with Christian life. To quote from Mr. Wood (op. cit. 263): 'Paul grasped the idea of the unity of the religious life, and spoke of the spirit not merely as God acting in an occasional extraordinary and emotional experience, but as being the Divine source and basis of all the Christian life. For him the Holy Spirit is the cause not only of religious experiences, but of religious experience. The test of the Spirit of God in a man is no longer subjective emotion, but the objective value of his life for the progress of the will of God as working itself out in the Church.' In comparison with the Spirit in this large sense, the particular manifestations or gifts of the Spirit which are discussed at length in Ro 12, 1 Co 12-14, Eph 4, have a subordinate though a vital importance. The main point is that for St. Paul Christian life and life in the Spirit are one thing. All Christian graces are the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5<sup>22</sup>). The Christian God is He who supplies the Spirit (3<sup>2</sup>). To become a Christian is to receive the Spirit (3<sup>2</sup>). To live as a Christian is to walk in or by the Spirit (5<sup>16</sup>). The Spirit and faith are correlative terms, and each of them covers, from a different point of view, all that is meant by Christianity. Regarded from the side of God and His grace and power, Christianity is the gift of God; regarded from the side of man and his response, it is the relation to God, it is the life in God. This is vividly expressed in one of those sentences in which St. Paul concentrates his whole mind on the Spirit: ἡμεῖς γὰρ πνεύματι ἐκ πίστεως ἀπεκδεχόμεθα (5<sup>5</sup>). Here is everything that enters into Christianity and determines it to be what it is. Like the old religion, it has in δικαιοσύνη its hope or goal; but in its attitude to this, nothing is determined by law, in any sense of that word; there are only two conditions. St. Paul is conscious as counting on his soul—the one is Divine (the other is human (faith)); and the one is not to be despised, they cannot be separated. ἐν ἀγιασμῷ πνεύματος καὶ πίστει ἀληθείας, where 'in consecration wrought by God's Spirit, and belief of the truth,' is to be interpreted in the same way.

Without going into details, it is pertinent to point out the connexions between this Pauline conception of the Spirit and what we find in the life of Jesus. (a) To begin with, the Spirit is for St. Paul specifically Christian. It is not the power or the life of God simpliciter, but the power or the life of God as God has been manifested in Christ, and especially in His resurrection and exaltation. He calls it the Spirit of Christ (Ro 8<sup>9</sup>); it is an ἐκτίσις of God that is written on men's hearts by the Spirit of the living God (2 Co 3<sup>3</sup>); he even goes so far as to say, the Lord is the Spirit (3<sup>17</sup>), and he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit (1 Co 6<sup>17</sup>). The presence of the Spirit is, it may be said, the spiritual presence of the Lord; it is not an indefinite power, but God, but the last Adam who has become the Spirit (15<sup>45</sup>). When a criterion of 'spiritual' utterance is found in Jesus (12<sup>32</sup>) to say 'that it is not God's Spirit in which one speaks; but only in the Holy Spirit can one say 'Jesus is Lord.' To confess the exaltation, not of an unknown person, but of Jesus, and to live in the acknowledgment of Jesus at the right hand of the Father, is to be a genuine Christian. Passages like these prove that if there was any danger in the Pauline churches of an ecstatic enthusiasm doing less than justice to the historical character of Christianity, it was a danger to which St. Paul was alive from the first, and which he did his best to obviate. That St. Paul and the members of his churches had such an acquaintance with the historical tradition of Jesus as gave definite meaning to His name, the writer has no doubt. —(b) A further point in St. Paul's conception of the Spirit, which connects it essentially with Jesus, is seen in this: it is a spirit of adoption or sonship, breaking out in the loud and joyful cry, 'Abba, Father.' All who are led by it are sons of God. Because they are sons, God has sent forth the Spirit of His Son into their hearts (Ro 8<sup>14a</sup>, Gal 4<sup>6</sup>). It is not a spirit of δουλεία or δειλία (2 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>), but of trust and joy. (c) Especially as a spirit of sonship is it a spirit of freedom: ὁ δὲ κύριος τὸ πνεῦμα 'ὁ δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα κυρίου, ἐλευθερία' (2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>). 'Ελεύθερος, ἐλευθερία, and ἐλευθεροῦν are great Pauline words in this connexion. What they suggest is the emancipation of the Christian life from everything statutory, whatever its origin. The Christian is not under law, but under grace; no statute contributes in the least degree to make him what he is, or to give him the experiences which he has; it is as he stands in the presence of the crucified and risen Christ, and abandons himself in faith to the Divine love there revealed, that the Divine power descends into his heart which annuls all the statutes and conventions he has ever known, and is its own to him henceforth. It is under the power of this power, and of this power alone, that he now lives and acts; not conformity to any external standard, however high, but moral originality like that of Jesus, because inspired by the consciousness of Jesus and of all he owes to Him, is what is required of him at every step. That such a conception is not without moral perils, and that it is capable of being abused, St. Paul was well aware (Gal 5<sup>18</sup>, Ro 6<sup>14</sup>), but it is in one respect the fundamental truth of his gospel, and he would never compromise upon it. That it has its basis in the person of Jesus—as its supreme illustration in the whole life of Jesus—we may see from the Sermon on the Mount, or from Mt 17<sup>24-27</sup>, Jn 8<sup>31-36</sup>.—(d) Again, the Pauline idea of the earnest of the Spirit (ἀρραβών 2 Co 1<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>, Eph 1<sup>14</sup>), or of the first-fruits of the Spirit (ἀρχή, Ro 8<sup>23</sup>), according to which the Spirit is a guarantee of eternal life, is continuous with the teaching of Jesus. The Spirit is such a guarantee because it is a quickening spirit, 'the Spirit of him that raised Jesus from the dead' (8<sup>11</sup>); it brings to men the life of God, the same life that was manifested in Jesus, and that made it impossible that He should be holden of death (Ac 2<sup>24</sup>). The argument, or rather the assumption of the Apostle, in all this, is the same as that of Jesus in His teaching of the Sadducees. When God has pledged His friendship to men as He did to the patriarchs in ancient days, or as He does to Christians now in making them, through the Spirit, partakers of His own life, He has entered into a relation to them to which death can make no difference. His love overrules. His Spirit inwardly, both mean immortality. They both say of God's flock. 'They shall never perish; none can pluck them out of the Father's hand' (Jn 10<sup>28</sup>). The only difference is that when immortality is deduced from the possession of the Spirit (that is, the life of God), it is referred, so to speak, to a natural or supernatural law, and we see it as part of a constitution of things; whereas when it is deduced from the immanence of God, we see it purely as a gift of His love. Formally, there is one great contrast between the meaning of spirit in St. Paul and the meaning of spirit in Jesus. St. Paul cannot be directly connected with Jesus, the contrast of spirit and flesh. This pervades the Apostle's writings, and is conspicuous in such passages as Ro 8, Gal 5. The flesh represents for him sin in its virulent and constitutional character; the Spirit is the Divine power given to the believer in Jesus, which enables him to do what the Law could not do—to vanquish or put to death the flesh. Yet when St. Paul learned the lesson that only the Spirit could overcome the flesh, he merely learned what Jesus taught the rich ruler—'There is none good but one, that is God' (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>)—with its necessary inference, that for any goodness we can ever attain we must be absolutely dependent on God. St. Paul's gospel means not only that we must be so dependent, but that by God's mercy such dependence is made possible for us: God puts His Holy Spirit in those who believe in Jesus, with their sanctification expressly in view (1 Th 4<sup>7</sup>). There is, of course, a reference here to the OT conception of the Spirit in Ezk 36<sup>27</sup> 37<sup>14</sup>.

The passages in which the Spirit is regarded by St. Paul as a source of knowledge or revelation are among the most difficult in his writings, and have been much discussed. In the Synoptic words of Jesus (Lk 11<sup>17</sup>), where the 'word of wisdom' and the 'word of knowledge' are mediated through the Spirit) and 14<sup>28</sup> (where διδομεν, ἀποκαλύπτει, etc.), there are the longer διδομεν, ἀποκαλύπτει, etc. Co 2 and Eph 1<sup>17</sup>. In both these passages a wisdom is spoken of which is imparted by the Spirit to believers (though σοφία in 1 Co 2<sup>10</sup> may refer only to the Apostles or other inspired teachers). The Spirit can impart this wisdom because it searches all things, even the depths of God. The contents of the wisdom in question are in both cases, apparently, eschatological. It is wisdom which God has foreordained 'for our glory' (not in honour of us, but with us), and we are to share with the Lord of glory. The things which eye has not seen nor ear heard, all that those who love him' (29), or, in the words of hope attached to God's calling, of the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints. Only the man who has the Spirit himself, who has had the eyes of his heart illumined, can receive, teach, or appreciate this wisdom. If we should say that we have a notable specimen of it in 1 Co 15, then its Christian character is thoroughly safeguarded: it speaks not merely of the things that are freely given to us by God (28), but of the things that are freely given to us by God in Christ. It is in Him that all shall be made alive, and put on the body of glory (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>, Ph 3<sup>21</sup>). It is Christ in us who is the hope of the glory contemplated for us in God's wisdom (Col 1<sup>27</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>7</sup>). The power with which He raised Him from the dead, the heavenly places (Eph 1<sup>21</sup>), is the same as 'the power which worketh in us' through the Spirit (3<sup>20</sup>), and it works in us to the same glorious issue. It is perhaps impossible for us to appreciate as revelation all the forms in which St. Paul's thought and imagination clothed themselves as he laid hold of the substance of his Spirit-taught truth of words of life because you are not of my sheep. . . . every one that is of the truth heareth my voice' (Jn 10<sup>27</sup> 26 18<sup>37</sup>). This again unites with Jesus the Pauline conception of the Spirit.

13. The NT books which were written under Pauline influence scarcely call for independent consideration. Hebrews has one reference (2<sup>4</sup>) and perhaps a second (6<sup>4</sup>) to the 'gifts' of the Spirit, the first alluding to them as God's testimony to Christ; elsewhere it refers to the Spirit only as the speaker in the OT (3<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>10</sup>). In 1 P 1<sup>12</sup> the expression ἐν τῷ πνεύματι stands between the 'foreknowledge of God the Father' and 'obedience unto the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ', is, no doubt, to be rendered, as in 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>, 'in a consecration wrought by the Spirit'; it is in this that God's eternal purpose of redemption is realized. Probably in both places (1 P 1<sup>12</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>) there is an allusion to baptism. In 1 Pt 1<sup>11</sup> the idea that the Spirit in the OT (?) prophets was Christ's Spirit must be connected with the belief in the pre-existence of Christ; in 1<sup>12</sup> the Holy Spirit sent from heaven is the power which a true Christian evangelist and makes his words effective. This idea, of course, pervades the NT, and goes back to such words of Jesus as Mk 13<sup>31</sup>, Lk 24<sup>48</sup>. 'The Spirit of the Lord and of God' in 1 P 4<sup>14</sup> recalls St. Paul's conception of the Spirit as the earnest of immortality; it is the spirit of the glory to be revealed because it opens men's eyes to the reality of it (1 Co 2, Eph 1<sup>17</sup>), and ensures their entrance into it (2 Co 5<sup>5</sup>). In 2 Th 1<sup>14</sup> it is the indwelling Holy Spirit which enables one to guard the Christian deposit—a Christian inference from 1 Co 2<sup>12</sup>, Jn 18<sup>37</sup>. In Tit 3<sup>5</sup> the thought of 1 P 1<sup>12</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>, is more articulately expressed: side by side with 'the laver of regeneration' we have 'renewal wrought by the Holy Spirit.' There is nothing more here than a fulfilment of the Baptist's words—'He shall baptize you with holy spirit' (Mk 1<sup>8</sup>).

14. The Johannine books cover all the literary forms known to the NT,—Gospel, Epistle, Apocalypse,—and the Spirit is prominent in all. To understand them it is necessary to remember that all the experience of the Pauline churches lies behind them, and that the circumstances in which they originated have exercised a decided influence on their presentation of the facts and ideas with which they deal.

(a) To begin with the Apocalypse, the writer speaks four times of being, or being carried off, ἐν πνεύματι (1<sup>30</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 17<sup>3</sup> 21<sup>10</sup>), an expression which, whether it is literary artifice or a recollection of remembered experience, suggests the condition of prophetic ecstasy in which he saw his visions. If St. Paul had spoken of the Spirit in that connexion, we should have referred for interpretation to 2 Co 12<sup>12</sup>. The seven spirits before God's throne, whatever their connexion in the history of religion with the seven Amshaspands of Persia, are not numerically seven. In the Apocalypse they are treated as a unity; they are the Spirit of God in the completeness of its powers (1<sup>4</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>6</sup>); and when Christ is spoken of as having the seven spirits of God, the meaning is the same as when we read in the Gospel (3<sup>24</sup>) that God does not give the Spirit by measure to Him. This close connexion of Jesus with the Spirit (He first receives and then bestows it) is strikingly brought out in the Epistles to the Seven Churches. In all of them it is the Risen Christ who speaks; but at the end of each we read 'He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the Churches' (2<sup>7</sup> 11 17 29 36 13 22). In St. Paul's phrase, here too 'the Lord is the Spirit.' It is no other than Christ who speaks through the inspired prophet. And although ἐν πνεύματι probably means 'in an ecstasy,' it must be noted that there is nothing inarticulate or unbalanced about these searching letters. They are terrible in their calmness in their passion. Cf. the utterance of the Spirit in 14<sup>13</sup>. In 11<sup>11</sup> and 13<sup>15</sup> πνεῦμα καὶ ὕδατος OT round, and the Spirit is not πνεῦμα καὶ ὕδατος but, as in OT passim, the principle of life. But the most striking utterance on the Spirit is 19<sup>10</sup> ἡ γὰρ μαρτυρία Ἰησοῦ ἐστὶν τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς προφητείας. This means that the Spirit, which, as we have already seen, is possessed by Jesus and bestowed by Him, has also Him as its object. In all the prophets—in all inspired men—what it does is to bear a testimony to Him. All the prophets, who are prophets simply through having the Spirit, are witnesses to Jesus. This agrees not only with the Gospel (15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>14</sup>), but with such other words of Jesus as Ac 1<sup>8</sup>.

(b) Passing to the Gospel of John, we find, as in the Gospel of Matthew, that the Spirit is first mentioned in the baptism of Jesus. 'I have seen,' says the Baptist, 'the Spirit descending as a dove out of heaven, and it abode upon him. And I did not know him, but he who sent me to baptize in water, the same said unto me, On whomsoever thou seest the Spirit descending and abiding on him, the same is he who baptizeth in holy spirit. And I have seen and borne witness that this is the Son of God' (1<sup>32</sup>). What strikes us here is the assumption that every reader will know what is meant by 'the Spirit' or by 'holy spirit.' The Gospel is meant for Christians to whom the Spirit is an experience, an experience which they owe to Jesus (for it is He who baptizes with holy spirit); an experience, however, which Jesus in His turn had had (He had been baptized with holy spirit).

It is often said that this idea of the descent of the Spirit on Jesus is only a piece of the Christian tradition, too firmly established for the Evangelist to be able to discard it, but really inconsistent with the conception of Christ in the Prologue. The Word incarnate (it is argued) cannot need to be baptized with the Holy Spirit. To say so is to assume that we know what is meant by the 'Word incarnate' without looking at the story of Jesus. The assumption cannot be justified. A great spiritual experience, according to all the Gospels, is connected with the baptism of Jesus; according to all the Gospels, also, it is the experience of receiving the Holy Spirit. If the Evangelist sets this down without embarrassment side by side with his prologue, the Evangelist is that he felt no inconsistency between them, and that he felt no inconsistency between them. His idea may rather be that it is the measureless gift of the Spirit in virtue of which Jesus is the Word incarnate. If He had not had this experience at His baptism, and all that flowed from it, He would not have been (or been recognizable as) the Son of God (Jn 1<sup>34</sup>), as God manifest in the flesh, Immanuel.

Probably part of the Evangelist's interest in the baptism of Jesus lay in it the symbol and the reality signified coincided. Ordinarily, in the baptism of Jesus, water and the Spirit are contrasted. The Spirit accompanies the other. This is the type of the Christian baptism with which the author and his readers are familiar. In it water and the Spirit nominally coincide. This may seem a not very real idea to us; but we have to consider that even within the first century Christianity was assuming some of the features of a sacramental system, that much in the mental sympathies of the early centuries found this congenial, and that it might seem not unreasonable to find at the very beginning of its history its fundamental rite undergone by the Founder; and proved to be not only a form, but a power.

The turning of the water into wine is no doubt a symbol of the whole work of Jesus, of religion to a higher power, of, more than the elevation of water-baptism into the holy spirit. The Spirit, however, is not mentioned in this connexion, and we get into closer quarters with the subject in ch. 3. There the decisive word is v<sup>5</sup> 'Except a man be born ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ πνεύματος, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.' It is not the mind of Jesus with which we are immediately dealing, but the mind of Jesus as interpreted in the mind of the Evangelist and in the circumstances of his time. Granting this, it seems to the present writer quite impossible to question either a reference to Baptism here or one to the Supper in ch. 6. Nor is the meaning of the reference doubtful. As in the baptism of Jesus, so in Christian baptism, water and spirit are not thought of as in contrast, but as in conjunction. No question is raised as to the conditions under which baptism was administered—conditions of faith in Christ on the part of the baptized. These are assumed as familiar to everyone. But under these conditions the new birth is connected with the Spirit and with the rite in the administration of which the Spirit is normally present. One of the great words and ideas of the Gospel is 'life.' Sometimes it is spoken of simply as the gift of God. The Father has given to the Son to have life in Himself, and the Son gives life to whom He will (5<sup>26</sup>). Here, however, the life is conceived on the analogy of natural life, and the entrance into it is by a birth which depends on the act of God through His Spirit. The life with which we are here concerned is nothing less than the eternal life of God Himself (1 Jn 1<sup>2</sup>), and only God can beget it in the soul. To be born of God and born of the Spirit are the same thing (1 Jn 2<sup>29</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>). When Jesus says, 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit' (Jn 3<sup>6</sup>), He means that it is not anything we owe to our fathers and mothers, but only what we owe to God, which quickens the life in us. Put with this, it seems as though the Spirit here had no connexion or no particular connexion, with Christ; it is almost as though we were at the OT stage, at which the Spirit is merely a synonym for God acting. But to say this is to forget the connexion here asserted of the Spirit and the Christian sacrament of baptism. It is through baptism in the name of Jesus that the Spirit is received; and just as the πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν of St. Paul is the Spirit of the Risen Saviour, so here, in the sense of the Evangelist, it is the same Spirit, acting in and through the ordinance of the Risen Saviour, that is the source of all Divine life. As the conversation goes on, too, while the water, as merely symbolical, drops out (it only appears in v.<sup>5</sup>), and the Spirit remains by itself (v.<sup>8</sup>), attention is directed to the Son of Man, lifted up as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, that whosoever believes may in Him have eternal life. Here we have the ideas introduced which define the Spirit—the experiences through which the experience of the Spirit comes to us with life-giving power. The new birth is mysterious, indeed, in all its aspects; it is like the wind which blows where it will. We cannot tell how it originates or in what it will end. But it is not magical, and there is nothing magical in the sacrament. It comes into experience along with other things which form part of the same system of reality with it,—the death of Christ, the resurrection of Christ, and believing in Christ. All this is concentrated and symbolized in baptism; and it is because of this that baptism and being born of the Spirit are represented as coincident. Baptism is a kind of focal point in which all the quickening powers of God in Christ crucified tell upon the soul under the conditions of penitence and faith which make them effective. The life that comes to us in this experience is the life of the Spirit, the Divine life; but quite definitely also it is a life which we owe to the death of Christ. (To apply this conception of baptismal regeneration to the case of infants is to desert the ground of experience, on which the Apostle speaks throughout for what is to us an unconditioned void. In this adventure the NT gives us no assistance whatever).

At the close of ch. 3 we revert, in the words of the Baptist, really in words of the Evangelist, to the idea of the Spirit as bestowed on Jesus by God. He whom God sent speaks the words of God; He does this, and can do it, because God gives not the Spirit by measure to Him (3<sup>34</sup>). Here the idea is like that in 1 Co 2<sup>12</sup>: 'As no man knows the things of a man save the spirit of a man which is in him, even so the things of God no man knows, but the Spirit of God.' It is in virtue of having the Spirit that Jesus is able to do the things of God; in that Jesus is the Word of God; in that Jesus is the Word incarnate. He has received the Spirit in its fullness and is the Word incarnate. To have the Spirit in this sense and measure, to be the Word made flesh, and to have all things put into His hand by the Father (3<sup>34</sup>, 5<sup>20</sup>), are one and the same thing.

The absence of any allusion to the Spirit in ch. 4 (where Jesus offers the 'living water') and in ch. 5 (where we are told that the Son gives life to whom He will: with ζωοποιεῖν, v.<sup>21</sup>, cf. St. Paul's πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, 1 Co 15<sup>45</sup>, and Jn 6<sup>63</sup>) is very remarkable; but it has an exact parallel in the complete absence of the Spirit from Ro 6. When we come to ch. 6 it is different. The reference here to the Supper is as unmistakable as that to Baptism in ch. 3. The discourse starts from the bread of life, but the general idea of feeding on Christ or living on Him by faith, is specified as it proceeds, in agreement with the tradition of the Supper into eating His flesh and drinking His blood. In the most intense and vehement expressions of this kind, indeed, there is never anything more than in v.<sup>47</sup> ('He that believeth hath eternal life') or in v.<sup>57</sup> ('He that eateth me shall live by me'). It is not only conceivable, but highly probable, especially in view of a passage like 1 Co 10, that when this chapter was written materialistic and superstitious ideas about the sacrament of the Supper were already current in the Church, and that the Evangelist has the express design of correcting them. He has no hesitation in the boldest liturgical language he speaks of eating flesh and drinking the blood of the Son of Man, in a tone which seems almost intended to challenge, if not to defy, intelligence; by doing so that only language of which it is like this, to which it is absurd to say that a symbol is only a symbol, is used in worship, yet just as in ch. 3 water is used only once, and the Spirit is used only once, so here any ritual is swept away in the word which gives life... the words that I have spoken to you are spirit and are life' (v.<sup>63</sup>). There is no depreciation of the sacrament here any more than in ch. 3, and no exaltation of the words of Jesus as opposed to it; but there is a protest against the superstitious abuse of it. In the sacrament, on which the life of the Church depends for eternal life. No doubt Christ, the Christ who speaks of His flesh as true food and His blood as true drink (v.<sup>55</sup>), is, in all the truth of His humanity and His Passion, the meat and drink of the soul, and the believer realizes this in the sacrament, but it is not through the material elements that Christ sustains spiritual life; if His words are read in this sense, their character is misconceived; they are taken out of the region of spirit and life to which they belong, and in which alone Christ vivifies men.

One of the most characteristic of the Spirit is 7<sup>37a</sup>. On the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, Jesus stands in the Temple and cries, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.' The words are on a level with those in ch. 4, in which He promises the living water to the woman at the well. But here Jesus goes further. 'He that believeth in me,' He adds, 'as said the Scripture, Out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.' Without discussing the reference to 'Scripture,' what does this mean? The Evangelist himself interprets the words: 'This he said of the Spirit which those who believed on him were to receive, for as yet there was no Spirit (οὐκ ἦν πνεῦμα), for Jesus was not yet glorified.' This is clearly written from the point of view of experience and fulfilment. After Jesus was glorified through death and resurrection, those who believed had experience of His power such as they had never had before. They had owed Him much while they were with Him on earth; He had in a sense satisfied their own spiritual needs (6<sup>68</sup>); He had given them the bread of life to eat and the living water to drink. But now He did more. He came to them in a power which enabled them to be witnesses to Him; others obtained the Spirit through them the living water which He had given them overflowed from them as from an inexhaustible spring. Whether this is what Jesus meant or not, it is true; it answers to the facts of the case as the whole of the NT reveals them. Pentecost was inconceivable to the Jews, except as the sequel to the Passion and the Resurrection of Jesus; the possession of the Spirit which is the characteristic of the new era is determined in point of fact by these antecedents. We have seen the same connexion of ideas already in the chapters on the sacraments: the Passion of Christ is as unmistakably present in 3<sup>15</sup> and 6<sup>52-55</sup> as in 7<sup>39</sup>. It seems very gratuitous, then, to argue with Wendt that the Evangelist has mistaken Jesus, and that our Lord means no more here than in ch. 4.

The Johannine conception of the Spirit comes out most fully in chs. 14-16. The Spirit may be said to be the main subject in the discourses in which Jesus prepares the disciples for His departure. All the difficulties connected with the words of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel have to be allowed for here; to draw the line between what was literally said by Jesus at the moment and what is due to the commentary of experience interpreting His remembered words, might have seemed to the Evangelist himself not only unreal but unspiritual. The following points may be noted.

(1) The first hint of the future suggests the surpassing greatness of the experiences which the Spirit was to bring. 'He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go to the Father. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son' (14<sup>12f</sup>). The Spirit is not yet named, but we can see that it is in the writer's mind. The overwhelming experiences of the Apostolic age, the great movement then inaugurated, the new sense of the power of the name of Jesus, cast light on the significance of their coming in these amazing words. This is a promise of the Spirit, though the name is not mentioned; and indeed nothing short of their fulfilment in the Apostolic age could have enabled the writer to recall such words, or to believe them, or to have any idea of what they might mean.

(2) Immediately after, the language becomes more precise, and the Spirit is expressly mentioned 14<sup>15f</sup>. 'If you love me, you will keep my commandments. And I will ask the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may be with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth; which the world cannot receive, because it does not see or know it (αὐτό). You know it; for it dwells with you, and shall be in you. I will not leave you desolate: I come unto you.' What strikes us first here is the new name given to the Spirit, ἄλλον παράκλητον. It is indeed only the name which is new: in idea it answers closely to the only promise of the Spirit which we find in the Synoptic Gospels. These older writers (apart from Lk 11<sup>13</sup>, which is no real exception) only speak of the Spirit as a future possession of the disciples in Mk 13<sup>11</sup>, Lk 12<sup>12</sup>, Mt 10<sup>19</sup>. The situation contemplated is that in which the disciples are brought before judges and kings to bear testimony to their Master. That is the hour in which they need an advocatus, a counsel, a παράκλητος; and Jesus promises that they will have one in the Spirit. The expression 'another advocate' (ἄλλος) that the disciples have already had (ὁ ἄλλος) one, namely, of Jesus Himself. As long as He was with them their strength was reinforced from Him; and when He goes, then, in response to His intercession, His place is taken by the Spirit. There is another power with them now which does for them what Jesus did before. Yet is it really another? In 1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup> it is Jesus who is the παράκλητος, even after Pentecost; and even here (Jn 14<sup>18</sup>) He says, 'I come unto you.' The presence of the Spirit is Jesus' own presence in spirit; we are reminded again of 2 Co 3<sup>17</sup> and of Mt 28<sup>20</sup>. In the spirit Jesus will be with His own for ever, will dwell by them and be in them. What is meant at this point by calling the Spirit the Spirit of truth (Jn 14<sup>17</sup>) is not quite clear, but some contrast is implied between it and the world (cf. 1 Co 2<sup>13</sup>). The world, as Plato might have said, is the great sophist; it is a realm of deceptions and illusions, by which the mind of the disciple, were he left to himself, might easily be put at fault; but in the Spirit the disciple has a safeguard against its subtleties and sophistications; he is kept in the truth which sanctifies, because he is one with God, truth as truth is in Jesus (17<sup>27</sup>, Eph 4<sup>21</sup>). There is no definition here of the relation of the Spirit to Jesus or to the Father, though it might be said that the Spirit is the alter ego of Jesus. Only, it is the Son who asks the Father and the Father who gives the Spirit; the three are one as they confront the disciples, co-operating for their salvation. In this Gospel, as everywhere in the NT, the Spirit belongs to the same region as the Father and the Son; it is included in what a Christian means when he speaks of 'God.' This is the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity; no man means all that a Christian means by 'God' unless he puts into 'God' all that is meant by the separate terms 'Father,' 'Son,' and 'Spirit.' This is a proposition which is securely based on experience, and which is implied in NT experience from the day of Pentecost onward (see Ac 2<sup>38</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>4-6</sup>, Eph 2<sup>18</sup>, Jn 14<sup>26</sup>). More particularly, too, it may be said that the Spirit in the Fourth Gospel belongs to the Kingdom of God and to the religion of revelation. to the world it is unknown. And within the Messianic realm the full experience of it is ethically conditioned: 'If ye love me, ye will keep my commandments, and I will ask the Father,' etc.

(3) The next reference to the Spirit (14<sup>26</sup>) is still more definite. 'The Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, which the Father shall send in my name, he (ἐκεῖνος) shall teach you all things, and shall bring to your remembrance all things that I said unto you.' Both the masculine pronoun (ἐκεῖνος) and the function ('he shall teach') represent the Spirit as personal, with a definiteness hitherto unnoticed. Not that suggestions of this are wanting elsewhere (cf. esp. 1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>), and, of course, it must be in the last resort meaningless to speak of the spirit of a personal God as itself impersonal; but very often the meaning is covered by the idea of an impulse communicated by God, whereas here the personalizing is much more definite and conscious. The function of teaching or revealing, which, as we have seen above, has but a small space and a mainly eschatological reference in St. Paul, is far more prominent in St. John, and far more definitely connected with the historical Jesus. The Spirit does not teach independently, but brings to remembrance all things that Jesus said to the Twelve. ὑπομνήσει is a word on which it is worth while to dwell. The Evangelist gives us two illustrations of things which the disciples remembered after the Spirit came, and which received a new meaning as they rose in the spiritual light. When He rose from the dead, they remembered the word that He spoke about destroying the temple and rebuilding it in three days; it had slept in their memories, an inert, unrecalled thing, and therefore forgotten thing; now it has a new meaning, and they had a vivid recollection of it (22<sup>22</sup>). Cf. 12<sup>11</sup> of the circumstances of the Triumphal Entry. We cannot think of these two illustrations without asking, What is involved in the spiritually awakened action of memory in such cases? Something is recalled, but it is not only recalled, it is for the first time understood; it is remembered because a key to it has been found; it is not only the dream, so to speak, which is recalled, but the dream and its interpretation together. Where events have deeply interested and impressed men, as the words and works of Jesus did the disciples, and especially where they have initiated great spiritual movements in which their significance has become apparent, memory cannot be insulated so as to perceive them in a purely neutral or 'objective' fashion. They are remembered in the heart as well as in the brain; they are remembered with an ardour which contemplates, explores, makes discoveries, worships; and when they are reproduced in the Spirit, it is not the unintelligent and misleading truth of an amateur photograph with which we are confronted, but something like the work of a great painter, something which is truer in a manner than the most literal recollection would be. It is not open to question that the Fourth Gospel is, in this sense, a 'spiritual' Gospel; it is the decisive proof that the words of Jesus in 14<sup>26</sup> have been fulfilled. On the relation of Father, Son, and Spirit, this passage only confirms what has been said above under (2).

(4) In 15<sup>26</sup> many have sought for more than it contains. Here it is the Son who sends the Spirit from the Father, and the Spirit is described as that which proceeds from the Father. To pretend that we can distinguish between the 'procession' of the Spirit from the Father and the 'generation' of the Son by the Father, is only to make Gibbon sneer about 'the science, or rather the language of metaphysics.' The really important point here is that which has already emerged in Rev 19<sup>10</sup> (see above): ἐκείνος μαρτυρήσει περὶ ἐμοῦ. Christ is the Spirit's subject. The Spirit is the Spirit of truth because it bears witness to Him who can say, 'I am the truth' (14<sup>6</sup>). The truth with which it deals is that which is incarnate in Christ, the very same truth to which the Apostles also are to bear witness, because they have been with Him from the beginning (15<sup>27</sup>).

(5) The climax of our Lord's teaching in this line is reached in 16<sup>7a</sup>. Here Jesus announces the paradoxical truth that it is expedient for the disciples that He should leave them, because the coming of the Paraclete is dependent on His departure. There are natural analogies to this: often there is a truer appreciation, even of a friend who has been intimately known and loved, than before, a more adequate possession in memory than there was in actual intercourse. But more is meant here than that the disciples will get a better view of Jesus from a distance. It is Jesus Himself who is to send them the Paraclete, and He can do it, as He has already said (7<sup>39</sup>), only on the ground of His death and exaltation. When He does do it, they have not lost Him, they really possess Him in the power in which He lives and reigns. The functions of the Spirit are here twofold, according as they have for their object (a) the world (vv. 8-11), (β) the Apostles themselves (vv. 12-15). As for (a), it is the Spirit's function to convict the world, to reach its conscience with demonstration, in regard to certain subjects. This conviction is not wrought in an immediate supernatural way, but through the ministry of the Apostles; it is to them the Spirit comes, and through their preaching the world is convicted. It is convicted of sin, because men do not believe in Christ. This is perhaps the most general statement on sin in Scripture: it consists in refusing to believe in Christ. If men did believe in Him, sin in all its kinds would disappear. Conviction of it cannot be produced by denunciation, or satire, or clever exposures, or by what is mis-called knowledge of human nature; it can be produced only by witnessing to Christ in the power of the Spirit. The Spirit also produces in the world a conviction of conscience with regard to righteousness. This is connected with the exaltation of Christ: 'I go to the Father and ye see me no longer.' When this exaltation is brought home to men's minds with the power of the Spirit (Ac 4<sup>33</sup>), they realize that there is such a thing as righteousness, and that the supreme power in the world is on its side. In a sense it might be said that it was easier to believe in righteousness when men saw it present in the world, incarnate in Jesus Christ the Righteous; but it is a more solemn sense of its reality and supremacy that rises in the heart when, through the power of the Spirit, we realize that that righteous One is seated at the right hand of the Father. The third point in regard to which the Spirit convicts the world is judgment. This may be said to combine the other two. Sin and righteousness are at issue with each other, and the Apostolic ministry, in the power of the Spirit, convinces men that in Christ a final judgment has been pronounced upon the issue. The passage itself in the great cause—Christ and the Prince of this world—have confronted each other decisively, and the Prince of this world has been judged (16<sup>11</sup>, cf. 12<sup>31</sup>). A mind unlightened or unconvinced by the Spirit might easily hold the opposite, and, looking to the life and death of Jesus, infer the impotence of the good, its condemnation, as futile and ineffective, by the nature of things; but even in the Cross of Jesus what the Spirit-taught man sees is the condemnation of evil, the sentence which God has passed and will finally execute on the Prince of this world, the verdict of the supreme tribunal on behalf of the good. Sin, righteousness, and judgment are abstract ideas, and come home to men in their reality only when in the power of the Spirit they are interpreted in their connexion with Christ. In these verses (16<sup>8-11</sup>) the main idea involved in the Spirit is that of power: it is what is required to make the Apostles' message effective (cf. Ac 1<sup>8</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>8</sup>). But when we pass to (β) vv. 12-15, the main idea is that of illumination. The Spirit is conceived as giving the disciples that comprehension of Christ which, according to St. Paul also (see 2 Co 3), is necessary to make a man a fit minister of the new covenant, not of letter but of spirit. Both kinds of sufficiency—that of power and that of illumination—are of God, and specifically of the Spirit. If vv. 8-11 state the dependence of the Evangelist on the Spirit, vv. 12-15 state the dependence of the theologian on the Spirit. The idea underlying the latter passage is that of v. 12: Jesus is greater than His words. When the time comes for Him to leave His disciples, many things remain unuttered. Many things are involved in His presence in the world, and especially in His impending Passion, which He understands, but they do not and cannot: are these things to be lost for ever? Is the significance of Jesus to be so far thrown away? This is not what Jesus contemplates. On the contrary, the Spirit which He promises as the Spirit of truth will have this as His very task, to initiate them into the whole meaning of Jesus. He will lead them, not into all truth, but into all the truth—that is, the truth which is embodied in Him in all its dimensions. The new point which is emphasized here about the Spirit is that He shall not speak of Himself (ἑαυτοῦ, i.e. of His own motion, self-prompted or independently). Many scholars, in reading what is told of spiritual gifts in Acts or the Pauline Epistles, have felt that the early Church ran a real risk. Who could tell whether the Spirit, under the impulse of which men uttered themselves, did not sometimes speak of itself, and say things which may have been in a vague sense πνευματικά, but were not in any true sense Christian? We have seen already how St. Paul met this danger. Partly (as in 1 Th 5<sup>19-22</sup>, 1 Co 14) he provides for the control of 'spiritual' utterances by the gift of discernment or by the common sense of the Christian society. Partly (as in 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>) he lays down a dogmatic criterion of what is genuinely Christian. This latter course is followed also in 1 Jn. (4<sup>2</sup>): the spirit which is really of God is that which confesses Jesus Christ as come in flesh, in contrast with a more 'spiritual' kind of spirit which did not allow the heavenly Christ to ally Himself permanently, and especially by birth and death, to our humanity. But what we have here in the Gospel is really more searching, and goes to the root of the matter. The Spirit, personally as it is here conceived, is not a pure spontaneity; it is always historically prompted and historically controlled. What vindicates any utterance as spiritual is that it is a testimony to the historical Saviour. What the Spirit hears—all that He hears—He shall speak. It is not easy to say how the Spirit is conceived as hearing, but the main point is clear: hearing precedes speaking, and limits and controls it. In particular, it is said of the Spirit, 'He shall announce to you the things that are coming.' Westcott, interpreting τὰ ἐρχόμενα on the analogy of the Messianic ὁ ἐρχόμενος, and thinking of the needs of the Apostles at the stage of transition between the old and the new era, finds the main reference in this to be to the constitution of the Christian Church: the Spirit will enable the Apostles to understand (by anticipating) the new age on which they are about to enter. Godet is inclined to render the words in a more prophetic sense, and regards them as having their fulfilment in the Apocalypse. This is too precise: perhaps if we said 'in' (such as are suggested by 1 Co 2<sup>9f</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>13f</sup>) it would be nearer the mark. It is a special function of the Spirit to animate hope by unveiling the future (H. Holtzmann, Handcom. ad loc.). But whatever the special reference in τὰ ἐρχόμενα may be, the work of the Spirit on this side is summed up in the words ἐκείνος ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀκούει. In every sense of the terms the Spirit's work is to testify to Christ—to what He is, to His words, to what He has done and suffered, to what He is to achieve. In this His function, if not His being, as the Spirit of truth is exhausted. And to say that He uses only what is Christ's is not to narrow the range or the means of His action; for, as the Speaker goes on to say, 'All that the Father hath is mine.' All that belongs to the truth of God's Fatherhood is revealed in the Son, and all that is revealed in the Son is interpreted and vivified by the Spirit. The most striking feature of this passage is, after all, that with which it opens: 'I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now,' with the implicit promise that they should hear the Spirit say them when they were able to bear it. The Apostles' knowledge of the truth, as truth is in Jesus, is not such that it goes beyond the ipsissima verba which Jesus spoke on earth; but the Apostles would have felt it strangely unreal if they had been asked to cut down their testimony to Jesus to what Jesus Himself had expressly put into words. There were many things which circumstances made it impossible for Him to put into words—many things which it was rather for them to say about Him than for Him to say about Himself; but when they said these things, under the guiding and quickening impulse of His Spirit, they had no doubt that they were declaring the truth of Christ. It was a proof of 'Christ speaking in them,' as St. Paul puts it (2 Co 13<sup>3</sup>). Once they had listened to His voice on earth, now they heard Him in their hearts interpret all He had been, and between the voices they made no distinction. A great part of the teaching of the Fourth Gospel is covered if we say that the word of the Risen Saviour, speaking by His Spirit in the heart of the Apostle, is presented as though it had been actually spoken on earth. And, little as this may agree with our ideas of a purely historical narrative, it is a precarious operation to set aside such a testimony, based on Christian experience and contemplated by Christ, as though it could be merely irrelevant to the Christian religion.

(c) The Spirit in the First Epistle of John does not call for separate treatment. One important passage has been already mentioned (4<sup>2</sup>): another (5<sup>6-8</sup>) in which the Spirit and the sacraments are again mentioned in conjunction is to be interpreted on the analogy of ch. 3 and ch. 6 in the Gospel (see the present writer's Death of Christ, p. 277 ff.)

The NT hardly invites to any discussion of the mission of the Spirit. Of course, it is the Spirit of God, and Divine. It is part of the one Divine causality which—as Father, Son, and Spirit—confronts the sinful world, and works in unison for its redemption. It belongs unmistakably to the sphere of the Divine, not of the human. Yet there is something in man which is akin to it, and it is this that God dwells in man, and makes him partaker of the Divine nature. As the Spirit of God, it cannot be truly thought of as impersonal, and yet it is far more frequently spoken of in a way which is satisfied by the conception of a Divine impulse to or stimulation of human thought, feeling, or action, than as a distinct personality. This is so even in writers who, like St. Paul (1 Co 12<sup>11</sup>) and St. John (16<sup>14</sup>), distinctly have the latter mode of representing the Spirit. Certainly the Spirit is not so unmistakably thought of as a person as is the Father or the Son. We never, for example, find the Spirit in the salutations of the Epistles: 'Grace to you and peace from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ' is never supplemented by 'and from the Holy Spirit.' Neither do we ever find the Spirit united with the Father and the Son in prayer, as, e.g., in 1 Th 3<sup>11</sup>. 'Now our God and Father himself and our Lord Jesus Christ direct our way to you.' Even in the Apostolic benediction (2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>) it may fairly be questioned whether the Spirit is conceived as personally as the Lord Jesus Christ and God. As for attempts to place the Spirit within the Trinity the relation of the Spirit to the Father from that of the Son to the Father as 'procession' from 'generation,' the present writer can only repeat that they have no reality which he can apprehend. But the NT and Christian experience are at one in teaching that the Christian conception of God includes all that is meant by Father, Son, and Spirit; and as the omission of what is meant by any of these terms leaves the Christian conception unsatisfied, it may fairly be said that the doctrine of the Trinity is the fundamental doctrine of our faith. The Father, the Son, and the Spirit in their unity constitute the God whom we know as the God of our salvation.

HOLY THING (τὸ ἅγιον).—1. Lk 1<sup>35</sup> AV 'Therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.' RV prefers to render, 'Wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God.' On the expression τὸ γεννώμενον cf. Mt 1<sup>20</sup> τὸ γεννηθὲν, and for the use of ἅγιος applied to our Lord, see artt. HOLY ONE, HOLINESS.

2. Mt 7<sup>6</sup> μὴ δώτε τὸ ἅγιον τοῖς κυσὶ—τὸ ἅγιον is usually taken to refer here to sacrificial meat or the provision of the priests. So Lange, Alford, and most Comm.; but Meyer objects to this as requiring to be more precisely designated, and urges that Christ has in view 'the holy' in general, and that what is meant by this is the holy, because Divine, evangelic truth by which men are converted. The fundamental idea of ἅγιος is consecration—τὸ ἅγιον, that which is consecrated or set apart to the service of God; its general opposite would be βέβηλος, 'profane.' (See Westcott on He 7<sup>26</sup> and literature of HOLY ONE generally.)

In Christian writings we find τὰ ἅγια used for the gifts as offered in the offertory or prothesis, i.e. the act of setting forth the oblation, and also for the consecrated gifts; thus in the Liturgy of the Nestorians we find the direction: 'And when the people have received the holy thing, the priest,' etc. (See Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, pp. 122, 301, 379, 398). J. B. BRISTOW.

HOME.—

1. The expressions bearing the sense of 'home' are (1) oikos (Mt 8<sup>b</sup>, also Jn 14<sup>a</sup>, where we may prefer 'home' to 'house,' the rendering of the EV), (2) oikos (Mk 5<sup>19</sup>, Lk 12<sup>3</sup> 50 961 156; also Jn 7<sup>53</sup> EV, in the section concerning the adulteress), (3) τὸ ἴδιον (Jn 19<sup>27</sup>, cf. also 11<sup>1</sup> and 16<sup>43</sup>). As for (1) and (2), where we have the ordinary term = 'house' employed, it is to be noted that a house naturally becomes a 'home' under the associations of family life and affection, of the corresponding use of בית. (3), as a use of ἴδιος, illustrates a tendency to abbreviation and attenuation of phrasing in such connexions as this ἴδιος, with the force of the possessive pronoun (= ἐαυτοῦ, ἐαυτῶν), appears in ch writers as ἴδιος (cf. τὸ ἴδιον, p. 123 f). Cf., in this particular use, our expression 'at his father's,' and the attenuated Fr phrase chez lui. The Vulg in Jn 19<sup>27</sup> has the strict parallel in sua.

2. The Gospels afford us a few domestic interiors, forming a part of the background of the life of Jesus. We see the common domestic shadows of sickness and death in the home of Simon Peter (Mk 1<sup>30</sup>), of Jairus (Mk 5<sup>22</sup>), of the Roman officer (Mt 8<sup>5,6</sup>), of Lazarus and his sisters (Jn 11), and of others. Homely joys are illustrated in the marriage at Cana (Jn 2), in the sojourn of Jesus as a guest in the home at Bethany (Lk 10<sup>38</sup>, Jn 12<sup>1-2</sup>). Hospitality and entertaining are again exemplified in the case of Levi (Lk 5<sup>27</sup>) and of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7<sup>36</sup>). The ever-fresh interest attendant on the birth of a child as a notable incident in home life finds illustration in the story of the birth of John the Baptist (Lk 1<sup>57,58</sup>). We have sight, too, of the sumptuous domestic establishments of the luxurious rich (Lk 16<sup>19,20</sup>), in contrast with the simple abodes of the mass of the people and the condition of the homeless poor.

No people ever prized the sanctities and blessings of the home more than the Jews. Their wonderful legislation bearing on domestic affairs, the sentiments that find expression in Pss 127, 128, and in the panegyric of the Good Wife (Pr 31<sup>10-31</sup>), the importance attaching to the family as the unit of national life all bear witness to this. The whole system of feasts and fasts, joyous and solemn, including the weekly Sabbath commemorations and seasons, so much colour and interest to life—also strongly tended to deepen the domestic sentiment, the home being to so large an extent the theatre for the prescribed rites and observances.

The general conditions of Jewish home life in our Lord's day offered marked points of contrast with what largely obtains among Western peoples. The greatest simplicity in the matter of meals and clothing, and the fewness of other wants, contributed to an easier condition of life in general. Grinding poverty was by no means common. Every man had a trade, and every father had to teach his son a trade; but a man was not obliged to toil long hours for a bare living. There was considerable leisure, and the Palestinian Jew had much time for conversation like the Arab of today. The man was often abroad in public places, frequenting discussions in the Temple and elsewhere, and mingling with his fellows. He was not charged with certain religious duties and observances from which women were exempt. The place of the woman, on the other hand, was pre-eminently in the home. (Note that one of the things desiderated for women in Tit 2<sup>5</sup> is that they should be οἰκουρῶνται). In this respect the Jews shared the sentiment of other Oriental peoples; but the lot of the Jewish woman was much superior to that of non-Jewish women in the East, and her position in the home was better than that of the Roman nation of that period. A serious menace to the home, however, existed in the conditions obtaining as regards divorce. We know how Jesus dealt with this great abuse of easy divorce (Mk 10<sup>2-12</sup> = Mt 19<sup>3-9</sup>). Some of the Jewish Rabbis also (as Shammai) set themselves against the laxity that had grown up. On the whole, it is probable that general practice was much better than current. A Talmudic saying is significant—'I myself weeps over the man who puts away his wife' (Gittin 10b, Sanhed 22a).

The home as a factor in education was of the greatest importance. In our Lord's time there was probably in addition only a school at the synagogue, taught by the hazzan. A religious atmosphere surrounded the Jewish child from the first, and the mother was the earliest teacher. As soon as the child could speak, his mother taught him a verse of the Torah (on the unity of God; and on the election of Israel). See art. CHILDHOOD.

3. All interest in this subject, so far as the Gospels are concerned, is focussed in the home at Nazareth, where Jesus spent nearly the whole of His life. Actual information as to the life in that home is of the scantiest; but there can be no question that the best traditions of the Jewish home at its best were all exemplified there. There could never have been a better mother-teacher than Mary. The round of religious observances and duties would not fail of scrupulous performance. The conditions of the home itself were no doubt of the simplest and lowliest kind; but an abundance of human affection was an ample compensation. There was nothing to cry 'unfolding.' There is room also for interesting reflection as to the history and experience of the family circle at Nazareth during all the years that Jesus was a member of it. The great crises of all domestic life—births, marriages, deaths—must surely, some or all of them, have marked the history of the home of Jesus during those years. As we think of Joseph, who, as it is commonly agreed, appears to have died at an early period, and of our Lord's 'brothers' and 'sisters' (Mk 3<sup>31,63</sup>) there is every reason to conclude that within the circle of the home Jesus had the experience of human bereavement and sorrow, and also of rejoicing, as His very own.

4. From the day of His leaving Nazareth for the Jordan, Jesus ceased to have any settled home. 'The Son of Man,' He once said, 'hath not where to lay his head' (Mt 8<sup>20</sup> || Lk 9<sup>58</sup>). It is true that this saying is not to be taken too literally (see Bruce, With Open Face, ch. ix.), for Jesus would be welcome in the houses of many friends, as He was notably in the home at Bethany. Still, during His public ministry He surrendered all the quiet joys of the old home life at Nazareth, and often in the course of His constant journeys must have had to endure hardships and privations of a wanderer. With His first disciples to follow Him (Mt 4<sup>18ff</sup> || Mk 1<sup>16ff</sup>, Lk 5<sup>27ff</sup>), He was summoning them to a life of homelessness resembling His own. He made readiness to leave home, with all its possessions and endearments, a test of fitness to be His true disciple (Lk 9<sup>57-62</sup> || Mt 8<sup>19-22</sup>, cf. Mt 19<sup>21</sup> ||). And though He sent one home who wished to follow Him (Mk 5<sup>19</sup> || Lk 8<sup>38</sup>), He taught that in principle at least, His disciples should be willing to forsake not only house and lands, but parents and brethren and sisters, and even wife and children, for the Kingdom of God's sake (Lk 18<sup>28ff</sup> || Mt 19<sup>29</sup>, Mk 10<sup>29ff</sup>). J. S. CLEMENS.

HONESTY (the subst. does not occur in the Gospels; the adj. 'honest' is found in both AV and RV of Lk 8<sup>15</sup> as a rendering of καλός=Lat. honestus, 'noble,' 'excellent.' See Hastings' DB s.vv.).—This virtue does not take the prominent place in the teaching of Jesus Christ that it assumes in most systems of ethics. Our Lord never discusses or enjoins it. The reasons for His seeming neglect of the subject may be (1) that there was no dispute about it in His day, the Sixth commandment being taken for granted as universally binding, (2) that He went beneath the precept to the principles underlying it when (a) He discouraged covetousness (Mk 7<sup>21</sup>, Lk 12<sup>15</sup>), and (b) He bade His disciples do to others as they would that others should do to them (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>=Lk 6<sup>31</sup>), and (3) that He treated considerations of property as of secondary importance. So when a question arose, concerning the dishonesty of the Pharisees, He advised submission (Mt 5<sup>40</sup>); and when the question of the division of an inheritance was submitted to Him, He dismissed it as not within His province, and that with a tone of contempt, as though such a matter had not the importance people usually attached to it (Lk 12<sup>15</sup>). In life we see that dishonesty generally indicates a radical rottenness of character. It cannot be dealt with on prudential lines such as are indicated by the proverb, 'Honesty is the best policy.' By creating the Christian character, Jesus cuts out the roots of dishonesty in deceit, treachery, and greed; and implants those principles of truth and honour of which honesty is one of the natural fruits. The word rendered 'honest' in Lk 8<sup>15</sup> (καλῶς) really means 'fair,' 'sound,' 'excellent.' In the Synoptics, when Jesus speaks of a thief (κλέπτης), it is not to denounce his wickedness, but in one place (Mt 6<sup>19</sup> 20, cf. Lk 12<sup>33</sup>) to warn His disciples against making treasures of earthly things which thieves may steal or moths corrupt; and in another place (Mt 24<sup>43</sup>, cf. Lk 12<sup>38</sup>) to compare the suddenness and unexpectedness of His advent with the way in which a thief breaks into a house at night. In Jn 10<sup>8</sup> the false leaders of the people are compared to 'thieves and robbers' who ravage the flock, in contrast to the Good Shepherd who tends it. In the parable of the Good Samaritan the subject of neighbourly kindness had fallen among robbers (Lk 10<sup>30</sup>), whose excessive cruelty is described; but the point of the parable is not in their conduct, which is referred to only in order to show the depth of the evil which their victim was found. Jesus: '... the robbers, i.e. brigands (λησται), when He denounces the Jews for making God's house 'a den of robbers' (Mk 11<sup>17</sup> RV; cf. Mt 21<sup>12</sup>, Lk 19<sup>46</sup>), quoting Jer 7<sup>11</sup>. Here it is not common dishonesty that rouses our Lord's anger so much as the desecration of the house of God.

When the Jewish authorities came with an armed troop to take Jesus, He expostulated with them, asking if they had come out against a robber (ληστής, Mk 14<sup>48</sup>; cf. Mt 26<sup>55</sup>, Lk 22<sup>52</sup>). In none of these cases does Jesus lay any stress on the question of dishonesty, the occasion not bringing it into discussion. His merciful words to one of the malefactors crucified with Him (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>) cannot be taken as throwing light on His views of dishonesty and its pardonableness, because the man was probably a brigand in-urgent and a follower of Barabbas, not a mere thief. Still it does indicate that gross sins, among which stealing may be included, can be forgiven in those who turn to Christ. The one strong condemnation of theft in the Gospels is St. John's scornful description of Judas as 'a thief'

In the parable of the Unjust Steward it might appear that Jesus was commending an act of dishonesty. This man having and being called to account, foresees some homes to go to for a refuge, he buys the friendship of his master's debtors by reducing the amount of their debts (Lk 16<sup>1-9</sup>). On the surface, at all events, this appears to be a fraudulent action, and yet the steward is commended for it, and held up to the disciples as an example for them to follow. It is to be observed, however, that the commendation comes from the rich man, not from Christ. The master in the parable is the rich man, not the steward. According to this view, ὁ κύριος here means 'the Lord'—i.e. Christ, not 'his Lord,' as in AV and RV. But against that rendering is the fact that the rich man is called the steward's 'lord' in the parable. The natural conclusion is that the steward is the dishonest man, and the rich man is the master. Thus, as Dr. Plummer remarks, 'the steward is the dishonest man, and the rich man is the master.' Even a worthless, dishonest steward is commended by his master, at least for shrewdness, much more, then, should a true servant of Christ act wisely. Of course, it is only not the dishonesty, that is commended. This extreme instance for the rule that in any parable the main lesson is to be sought, and not its details allegorized. It is not to be accepted the suggestion that the estate was harmed to the steward, who rack-rented the tenants and dismissed them, so that his hasty reduction of their debts was only bringing them down to the level of the owner had been receiving, but of no evidence. Mr. Latham put forward the view that the steward had been too scrupulous in studying the interests of his employer, to the neglect of the rights of the tenants, whom he ground down cruelly; and he took the parable as a warning against unwise zeal for God at the cost of unkindness to men, on whom in the name of God too heavy requirements are laid (Pastor Pastorum, pp. 386-398). W. F. ADENEY.

HONEY.—Honey is mentioned very frequently in the OT: twenty times in the proverbial expression 'a land flowing with milk and honey' (Ex 3<sup>8</sup> 17 13<sup>5</sup> 33<sup>3</sup>, Lv 20<sup>24</sup>, Nu 13<sup>27</sup> 14<sup>8</sup> 16<sup>10</sup>, Dt 6<sup>3</sup> 11<sup>9</sup> 26<sup>10</sup> 15 27<sup>3</sup> 31<sup>20</sup>, Jos 5<sup>6</sup>, Jer 11<sup>5</sup> 32<sup>22</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>15</sup>); or in other connexions, either literally, as a product of the soil and as food (Gn 43<sup>11</sup>, Dt 8<sup>8</sup> 32<sup>13</sup>, Jg 14<sup>8</sup> 18, 1 S 14<sup>25</sup> 29, 43, 2 S 17<sup>28</sup>, 1 K 14<sup>4</sup>, 2 K 18<sup>32</sup>, 2 Ch 31<sup>5</sup>, Job 20<sup>17</sup>, Ps 81<sup>16</sup>, Is 7<sup>15</sup> 22, Jer 41<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>13</sup> 19, Sir 11<sup>3</sup> 39<sup>26</sup>); or figuratively, as a term of comparison for sweetness (Ps 19<sup>10</sup> 119<sup>108</sup>, Pr 5<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>24</sup> 24<sup>32</sup> 25<sup>16</sup> 27, Ca 4<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>, Ezk 3<sup>3</sup>, Sir 24<sup>50</sup> 49<sup>1</sup>). On the other hand, it is very rarely named in the NT, and especially in the Gospels. There is no direct evidence that the Jews were acquainted with any other honey than that of wild bees. Yet the fact that in 2 Ch 31<sup>5</sup> honey is included among the products of which the fruits were to be offered, would appear to represent it as an object of culture, and the mention of 'wild honey' as part of the food of John the Baptist (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9</sup> [Syr. Sin., perhaps under the influence of Dt 32<sup>13</sup> and Ps 81<sup>16</sup>, has 'honey of the mountain']) appears to point by way of contrast to the existence of honey derived from domesticated bees. As to artificial honey, made from boiled fruits (dates, raisins, figs), and to which the Arabs give the name of dibs (the phonetic equivalent of Heb. דבש 'honey' [of bees]), it is not probable that it was known to the Israelites and the Jews; but we have no decisive Biblical proof of this (cf. Jos. BJ iv viii. 3; Urquhart, The Lebanon, 1860, i p. 393; Berggren, Guide Français-Arabe, col. 266, Nr. 94 and 95).

The two parallel passages cited above, relating to the food of John the Baptist, are the only ones in the Gospels in which the word μέλι, 'honey,' is found. Wild honey (μέλι ἀγρίου) is named along with locusts as forming the very simple and frugal sustenance of an ascetic, a Nazirite, such as John was.* Further, in another Gospel passage (Lk

* One might be tempted, however, following a hint of Dioscorus Siculus (ix 94), to see in the 'wild honey' the designation of a vegetable and nutritive substance, such as the resin of the tamarisks or some other sweet and savoury exudation

24<sup>42</sup>) there is mention, at least in the TR and AV, of a piece 'of a honeycomb' (ἀπὸ μελισσίου κηπίου) been offered along with 'a piece of' to Jesus after His resurrection. But a number of the most ancient MSS of the NT (SABDLII) do not contain the former phrase, and the disposition of modern commentators, almost without exception, is to consider it as an addition. 'A singular interpolation, evidently from an extraneous source, written or oral,' say Westcott and Hort. The RV omits it. But this method of solving the problem cannot be regarded as satisfactory and final. In fact, if it is very hard to imagine, to use the language of Dean Burgon, 'that such a clause as that established itself universally in the sacred text, if it be spurious,' it is much less difficult to explain 'how such a clause became omitted from any manuscript, if it be genuine.' One can discover no possible motive for the surreptitious introduction of these words into the text. On the other hand, if they are regarded as an integral part of the primitive and authentic text, it is not impossible to see the reason of their suppression in some view to this we must place the narrative of Lk 24<sup>41-43</sup> alongside of Jn 21<sup>9-13</sup>, compare these two descriptions of a meal, and note that in many of the writings of the Fathers, and probably in various attempts to establish 'harmonies of the Four Gospels' (but not in the Diatessaron of Tatian), these two scenes are in fact identified (although they differ in all their essential features). Now, perhaps, we may be able to explain how the mention of the honeycomb came to disappear. The influence of Lv 2<sup>41</sup>, which forbids the use of honey (probably because easily subject to fermentation) in any kind of sacrifice; that of the allegorical interpretation of Ca 5<sup>1</sup> (especially in the LXX version, applied to Christ; an ascetic tendency to reject 'riches' foods; the possible intervention of the Valentinians with their Veritas Evangelium; and, finally, the proneness to polemize against the Gnostics, who made large use of the 'mysteries' (cf. Carl Schmidt, Schriften in Koptischer Sprache, Leipzig 1892, pp. 203, 508), and who may have attacked in support to this text;—such are the motives which either singly or all combined, may have brought about the removal of the disputed words. The present writer is strongly inclined, in common with the three authors cited below in the Literature, to retain them as authentic.

LUCIEN GAUTIER.

HONOUR.—The codes of technical 'honour' are largely opposed to the teaching of Christ (Mt 5, Lk 6<sup>35</sup>). Therefore such conceptions of 'honour' must be regarded as smothering the word (Mk 4<sup>13</sup>); for whatever justification codes of 'honour' may claim (as from Mt 7<sup>12</sup>), they are impatient of the spirit of meekness inculcated by Christ in precept (Mt 5<sup>39</sup>) and in example (Mt 27). So the Sons of Thunder would have vindicated summarily the honour of their Master (Lk 9<sup>54</sup>). More generally, in the quest of honour, it is honour from God and not from men that is to be sought by the Christian—the glory of God rather than of men (Jn 12<sup>43</sup>). Worldly honour may be a source of severest temptation (Lk 4<sup>1</sup>), for the disciple is not greater than his Master whose sinlessness was thus brought from a tree. To collect nourishment of this kind in the thickets along the Jordan would have been an easier task for the Baptist, and would have required less time, than to hunt for the honey of bees (cf. Berggren, op cit col 564).

to view (Mt 10<sup>34</sup>). Honour from God the Christian disciple will have: 'If any man will serve me, him will my Father honour' (Jn 12<sup>26</sup>). And to be invited to the marriage-supper of the King's Son is a greater honour than any this world affords (Mt 22). But this honour and blessing from God contrasts with the dishonour and scorn that the world is ready to shower upon followers of One who was despised and rejected. The wicked husbandmen did not honour the son of the lord of the vineyard (Mk 12<sup>8</sup>); they killed him and put him to shame (Mk 15). The Christian therefore must not be found

'Seeking an honour which they gave not Thee.'

Nay, even the most sacred honour is not the right goal for the follower of Christ, as James and John were taught (Mk 10<sup>37</sup>). Service, not honour, is the true aim for the life of self-sacrifice,—not to be honoured of all, but to be servant of all (Mk 10<sup>44</sup>). Honour is included in the all-things left to follow Christ (Mt 19<sup>27</sup>), and it is worth while to abandon all worldly things in exchange for the true life (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>). Still further, the tradition of men must give place to the commandment of God (Mk 7<sup>8</sup>). Dishonour now will give place to eternal and Divine honour in due season (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>).

HOPE.—In considering the relation of hope to Christ and the Gospel, we are at once met with the fact that in the Gospels the word ἐλπίς does not occur at all, and ἐλπίζω only five times, viz. once in Mt (12<sup>21</sup>), where the LXX quotes the LXX, three times in Lk (6<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>5</sup> 24<sup>4</sup>), and once in Jn (5<sup>45</sup>); and in none of these instances does it refer to the theological virtue.

This absence of the word is the more remarkable, when we remember not only that Judaism, the religion in which our Lord and His disciples were reared, was essentially a religion of hope, but also that the result of the teaching of Jesus was vastly to enlarge and deepen the hope by imparting to it the riches of the Christian era. Great as was the religious hope inspired by the older dispensation, it was small when compared with that 'better hope' (He 7<sup>19</sup>) which rested on the unchangeable kingly Priesthood of Christ.

The disciples doubtless were too fully absorbed in the present to have felt deeply expectations for the future. They were held captive by the greatness of His personality and the depth of His love, and ultimately came to realize that they had in Him the Hope of Israel itself. And if Simeon, having received the Messiah into his arms, felt his greatest hopes realized, then the disciples having found the Christ, must have been so absorbed by Him as to have had little room and little need for longings regarding the future.

But why did Jesus, who taught the necessity of faith (Mk 11<sup>22</sup>, Jn 3<sup>16</sup>) and the present (Mt 22<sup>40</sup>), remain silent as regards hope? It was due to the fact that in training His followers the first necessity was to concentrate their attention on Himself as their present possession. Had He taught them fully of the fruition that awaited them at the end of the age, and had He thus made hope a distinctly prominent portion of His teaching, He would have dispersed their attention and diverted it from that which they most required to learn. St. Paul could teach, 'Christ our hope' (1 Ti 1<sup>1</sup>). Jesus had to lay the foundation by teaching, 'Come unto me' (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>).

But if He did not give direct teaching on the point, He nevertheless laid deeply the basis upon which the Church's doctrine of hope was to be built; for He pointed the disciples, in His promises, to the blessings which they ultimately would enjoy. The promises of His resurrection or His perpetual spiritual presence, and of His final return in glory, were sure foundations upon which the Church could build her doctrine, and on this basis the developed teaching of the Epistles rests. And if the death of Jesus rudely shattered the Messianic hope of the disciples, His resurrection, followed by the illumination of the Holy Spirit, restored it to them in a purified and spiritual form.

As we study in the Epistles the doctrine of hope, which was thus awakened and became an integral part of Christian life, we find it vitally connected by the Church with her faith in Christ risen and glorified. (1) His resurrection is the ground of the Christian's hope: 'we are begotten 'unto a living hope,' and through it their hope in God is established (1 P 1<sup>21</sup>). (2) All Christian hopes are realized in Him. Various objects worthy of hope are mentioned, such as salvation (1 Th 5<sup>8</sup>), eternal life (Tit 1<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>7</sup>), the glory of God (Ro 5<sup>2</sup>, Col 1<sup>27</sup>), the resurrection of the dead (Ac 24<sup>15</sup> 23<sup>3</sup>); but all these different blessings are summed up in Jesus Christ. When they hope for Him, they hope for them all; for in Him all the scattered yearnings of the human heart are united and find their fulfilment. Thus it is that St. Paul calls Him 'our hope' (1 Ti 1<sup>1</sup>). (3) The Church therefore fixes her gaze on the heavens; for her Hope is there. She is ever 'looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ' (Tit 2<sup>13</sup>), for then she shall be like Him, for she shall see Him as He is; 'and every one that hath this hope set on him purifieth himself' (1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). Even inanimate nature groans for its coming redemption at the Parousia, having been subjected to vanity 'in hope' (Ro 8<sup>20</sup>). (4) But while the full realization of Christian hope will not be reached until the return of Christ, yet even now the Church has a foretaste of the bliss that ultimately will be hers. For Christ now dwells in the Church and in the hearts of her members, and thus grants an earnest of final fulfilment. Christ in the Church and in the individual is 'the hope of glory' (Col 1<sup>27</sup>), and therefore to be without Christ is to be without hope (Eph 2<sup>12</sup>).

HOPEFULNESS (CHRIST'S).—Knowing that all our possessions of grace come from Christ, in whom we believe all fulness dwells, and believing that He alone among the sons of men possessed perfect knowledge, we might be led to doubt whether we could justly attribute hope to Him. As regards His perfect knowledge, we must remember that uncertainty is no essential element in hope. Human hope may be proverbially disappointing, but that is due to the uncertainty of temporal things, and not to the nature of hope itself. Indeed, the glory of the Christian hope consists in the moral certainty of its grounds. It is a 'better hope' in part as being 'sure and steadfast' (He 7<sup>19</sup> 6<sup>19</sup>). The fact, then, that our Lord's faith rendered future objects of desire almost a present possession in no way prevented Him from experiencing this grace.* As regards His possessing 'faithfulness' as the God-man, and so being thought incapable of feeling hopefulness, it may be said that we clearly start our thoughts on a wrong line if we commence an investigation of this kind with our own a priori views of what the incarnate Son of God must have felt or not felt. We can in ourselves be no adequate judges of the limitations which Deity might set upon itself when taking our flesh. Our duty is to study the NT, and especially the Gospels, with the view of ascertaining what is there revealed as to the true character and act of Divine condescension. And such a study teaches us that in our Lord's Person we have not only a revelation of the Father, but also a revelation of humanity at its highest. He loved to call Himself 'Son of Man,' because He thereby taught us to see in Him the ideal Man, and therefore we must expect to see in Him every truly human emotion (and hope is one of them) purified and perfected.

No teacher of mankind ever so fully revealed to Himself in His teaching as Jesus did, and yet it is remarkable that He never revealed His own personal emotions. When He disclosed Himself it was as the source of all grace, so that men might be saved and nourished by His life. He was so absolutely selfless that He rarely sought sympathy by speaking of His heart's desires. It is not He but the Evangelists who tell us that He was weary, wept, exulted, marvelled. Thus it happens that He never definitely mentions His own hope. Indeed, strangely enough, the word elpis does not occur in the Gospels (see art. HOPE). But as hope is a necessary element of Christian character, being one of the 'abiding' graces (1 Co 13<sup>13</sup>), Christ, if He be true man, must have experienced it. It is not said that He had faith, but must we not believe that His whole human career was sustained from the first consciousness of childhood to Calvary by faith, perfect in its range and steadfastness? The long night of prayer surely tell us not only of a general consciousness of dependence, but also of a definite trustful belief in His Father, which found its expression in His words: 'What habitual strength of faith is shown in such words as 'Thinkest thou that I cannot beseech my Father, and he shall even now send me more than twelve legions of angels' (Mt 26<sup>53</sup>).

No doubt His faith and hope are so raised above ours by their perfection, that they may no longer seem to be what to us are faith and hope. But He raised all human attributes to their perfection; not the essence of their essential character, but rather the degree as they ought to be in ourselves. And if He felt no hope, never rejoiced in coming good, never was upborne when wearing the cross by anticipation of the crown, but lived His life in the cold calm of duty, then the Stoic is the ideal of our race.

Not a few evidences, more or less indirect, of Christ's hopefulness are found in the Gospels. In one case its object was of a temporal nature, namely, when being 'hungry' He approached the fig tree, 'if haply he might find anything thereon' (Mk 11<sup>12</sup>).

Little reverence would be shown by interpreting this incident as feigned for the purpose of teaching a moral lesson. 'If He only pretended not to know that the tree was barren, we should expect the hunger also to have been pretended' (Mason, Conditions of our Lord's Life, p. 152). Rather have we an example of hope in the mind of Jesus for a desired good, which circumstances disappointed, and which He turned to a moral purpose.

Evidence of His being cheered during His ministry by hope of the results of His spiritual labours may probably be seen in His words to the disciples when the Samaritan woman had left (Jn 4<sup>37-38</sup>). He had gained one soul, and with prophetic vision saw the land filled with ripened souls ready for the spiritual reaper. His followers, too, would receive wages in the joy of souls won, and ultimately they, with the earlier workers of God who had sown the seed, would rejoice together.

* Westcott (Life, vol. i p. 41) writes in his diary 'The fact of our Lord never mentioning His own faith or hope is a proof of His Divinity.' This, however, is a careful statement, but rather noted down early in his life (et. 21).

So full was His soul with joy of hope already realized, and with the prospect of still greater harvesting, that He was raised above the sense of hunger. The whole passage seems full of the deepest emotion of our Lord; and if so, hope was its strongest element. A similar anticipation of coming joy in the salvation of those He came to save may be felt in the words, 'Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost' (Lk 15<sup>6</sup>). Further, may we not see that hope realized was the cause of the strong movement of His soul, when He exulted (ἡγαλλίσσατο, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>) in Satan's fall from heaven? It was a rejoicing of His innermost soul, because already He saw πολλοὶ 'many' accomplished the object of His mission. Similarly must we account for the deep feeling displayed by Him when visited by the Greeks (Jn 12<sup>20-33</sup>). Here again is hope. He sees the uttermost parts of the world πολλοὶ 'many' present in the persons of these Gentiles, and He declares that 'the hour is come that the Son of Man should be glorified' (Jn 12<sup>23</sup>); and yet, foreknowing the terrible ἔκστασις awaited Him before the achievement of His desire, He alternated between the joy of hope and the sorrow of human dread, and prayed to be saved from that hour (v 27).

In His teaching to His disciples there is the oft-repeated lesson of His return to His Father (Jn 7<sup>33</sup> 8<sup>24</sup> 16<sup>28</sup>). Doubtless His chief object was to explain His heavenly origin and to prepare them for His departure, but not a little pathos and increased depth may be recognized in such words if we see in them also a longing hope for the time when the bitter trials of His voluntary humiliation would cease. Thus in His Πατήρ 'Father' now that He has finished His work, He ἀναστρέψει 'will turn' the renewal of the glory which He had with His Father before the world was (17<sup>1-5</sup>). And thinking of the loved ones to whom He ἀφίσταται 'will depart', how bitter a trial, He prays for ἐκστασις 'ecstasy' of the hope that they might ultimately be granted the beatific vision, beholding Him in His glory (v 24); then would He drink with them the fruit of the vine new in His Father's kingdom (Mt 26<sup>29</sup>).

Perhaps the most clearly expressed example of hope on the part of our Lord, an example which ἡγάλλισσατο shows His feeling of the emotion, is ἐκστασις in the words with which He commenced the Paschal meal. 'With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer' (Lk 22<sup>15</sup>). Here we have a distinct statement, that He held ardently an expectation of a future good before its realization.

We further find that His ministry was exercised in a spirit of intense optimism as regards both the community and the individual. This is the more remarkable when we recall that He more than any ἡγάλλισσατο 'rejoiced' in the overthrow of ἡ βασιλεία τῶν Ἰουδαίων 'the kingdom of the Jews'; like Jeremiah of old. But, unlike that prophet, He, notwithstanding His clear view of coming judgment, looked to the future with a splendid hopefulness. His kingdom would yet fill the world (Mt 13); His gospel would be universally preached (Mk 13<sup>30</sup>); and ultimately all men would be drawn unto Him (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>).

The same optimism is to be seen in His dealings with individual sinners. In the most corrupt He saw germs of good; and thus could win sinful women from their ways (Lk 7<sup>36</sup>, Jn 8<sup>11</sup>), and publicans from their grasping worldliness (Mk 2<sup>14</sup>, Lk 19<sup>9</sup>); and He could discover sufficient moral worth in a dying thief and murderer to be able to promise him rest in Paradise (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>). The hopefulness of Christ in His message to mankind is fully embodied in His saying, 'Be of good cheer: I have overcome the world' (Jn 16<sup>33</sup>). Thus we see that our Lord was in hope, as in all else save sin, 'like as we are' (He 4<sup>15</sup>). And if we in our trials are upborne by the hope of future bliss, He also was upborne to endure the cross and despise the shame by 'the joy that was set before him' (12<sup>2</sup>).

1. In the OT the word 'horn' (qeren) is used in poetical and abstract notions of strength (e.g. Ps 132<sup>17</sup>), hence of dignity (112<sup>9</sup>) or pride (75<sup>4a</sup>), also, (b) in a concrete sense, to represent kings and empires (Dn 7<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>30f</sup>, Zec 1<sup>18ff</sup>). The rendering 'a mighty salvation,' Lk 1<sup>69</sup> (Pr Bk), paraphrases the sense but obliterates the associations. Hor Od iii 21. 18 is quoted as an instance of the metaphor in ordinary literature, in which it is rare.

2. Inasmuch as the horn in animals is a weapon of attack rather than of defence, some have regarded it as a symbol of aggressive strength (see Deitzsch, Perowne, etc., on Ps 18<sup>4</sup>)—possibly combative strength, in which both ideas are included, would be a better definition. There are two classes of symbols expressive of such strength: (a) natural weapons (e.g. horn, right hand, arm, etc.), and (b) artificial weapons (arrows, axe, shield, etc.). When any distinction is to be made, the former class tends to represent that strength which is personal, inherent, immediate; the latter, to represent that strength in which second causes, instruments, agents appear (Is 10<sup>5, 15</sup>).

HOSANNA (הוֹשַׁעְנָה, Gr. ὑσαννά).—One of the Hebrew words which (like Amen, Hallelujah, Sabbath, Sabaoth) have passed, transcribed and not translated, from the vocabulary of the Jewish to that of the Christian Church. In the NT it occurs only in three Gospels; in them it is found six times (Mt 21<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>15</sup>, Mk 11<sup>9, 10</sup>, Jn 12<sup>13</sup>), but only in the history of our Lord's triumphant entry to Jerusalem on Palm Sunday, as a vocal cry uttered, either by the multitude who met Him, or by the multitude who hailed Him thereafter in the Temple (Mt 21<sup>15</sup>). Among the Jews, however, the word came to designate not alone the cry, but also the branches of palms, myrtle, or willow which on their joyous feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot) were carried on its seventh day, the people were ἡσαννάζοντες 'singing hosannas'; the Law did not enjoin this ceremony—to call out to the Lord with the priests to the fountain of life—again to the Temple, where these 'hosannas' were piled up and beaten against the altar. It is only with 'Hosanna' as a cry that we are here concerned; but we cannot forget that when, in honour of our Lord, the multitude raised the cry, they 'took branches of palm trees' (Jn 12<sup>13</sup>) as well; and therefore, besides expounding the meaning of the cry, we must consider how a ceremony customary at the feast of Tabernacles came to be adopted, popularly, on an occasion when the worshippers were assembling at Jerusalem to celebrate a feast of a widely different character, that of the Passover.

Philologically, the word Hosanna is explained as a derivation from or contraction of Ps 118<sup>2</sup> (Heb): ānnā Jahweh hōshā'āh-nā ('I beseech thee, O Lord, save now'). This Psalm was sung, and this verse of it used as a refrain by the people, at the feast of Tabernacles; and the refrain was abbreviated, through constant popular repetition, into Hōshā'nā, just as the old Canaanitish cry Hor Dod (= 'Ho Adonis') was turned into a common interjection, Hedad.

The vocal 'Hosanna' was used by the Jews at the feast of Tabernacles when the branches also were employed; and on this account it has been asserted by Mr Lewis N. Deubitz (in the Jewish Encyc vol vi p. 276, s.v. 'Hoshana Rabbah') that 'the Gospels by a mistake place the custom in the season shortly before the Passover, instead of in the feast of Booths.' To this it may be answered, (1) that, according to another writer in the J. E. J. (vol vi p. 272), 'the Rabbi Kaufmann Kohler (vol vi p. 272), the popular cry used in solemn processions wherewith was the feast of Tabernacles, the processions as described in 1 Mac 13:1-12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, Hosanna is rendered in both AV and RV (cf. Ps 118<sup>25</sup>, whence it is taken) 'Save now.' The now is not here an adverb of time, but an interjection of entreaty, as in 'Come now': the word means 'Oh! save' (Jewish Encyc), or 'Save, we beseech Thee.' As given (1) absolutely, as in Mk 11<sup>9</sup> and Jn 12<sup>13</sup>, the natural meaning of this would be an address to Christ, as Messiah, asking Him to bestow the salvation expected of Him; or, as our English hymn expresses it, 'Bring near Thy great salvation.' We can understand how, in this sense, 'Hosanna' should be followed by salutations or acclamations. 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the LORD' (Ps 118<sup>26</sup>, Mt 21<sup>9</sup>, Mk 11<sup>9</sup>), 'Blessed is the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the LORD' (Mk 11<sup>10</sup>), or 'Blessed is the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the LORD' (Jn 12<sup>14</sup>). All the different forms may have been used, for there was a multitude of speakers. The sequence of the thoughts is natural: for if Jesus be once conceived of as able to save (either by His own power or by that of Him that sent Him), the next thing, obviously, for His people to do, after asking Him to exert His power in their behalf, is to rejoice that He has come, and to bless Him for coming.

But only in this absolute construction the word Hosanna is used. St. Matthew, with a dative, 'Hosanna to the Son of David' (Mt 21<sup>9</sup>); and both St. Matthew and St. Mark give us 'Hosanna in the highest.' Both these variations have been censured by Dr. Kaufmann Kohler (Jewish Encyc, l.c. supra) as 'corruptions of the original version': the addition 'in the highest,' he declares to be 'words which no longer give any sense.' But in a connexion which seems to justify St. Matthew, the dative is used alike in the OT (Ps 3<sup>8</sup> 'Salvation belongeth unto the Lord') and in the NT in a passage based upon that Psalm (Rev 7<sup>10</sup> 'Salvation unto our God; and unto the Lamb'); while there is surely nothing 'senseless' in the thought that the salvation which God gives or sends, to men should fill the highest heaven with rejoicings in His praise. We have the idea in the OT (e.g. Ps. 8<sup>1</sup>) and in the NT (Lk 2<sup>14</sup>, Eph 3<sup>10</sup>). To some Christian commentators, however, and those of no mean weight,—e.g. Cornelius à Lapide and Dean Alford,—St. Matthew's use of Hosanna with the dative has seemed to render requisite a different interpretation of the word. Hosanna was, says V. N. 21<sup>18</sup>, 'originally a formula of supplication, but [became] conventionally [one] of praise, so that it is followed by a dative, as in the highest,'—meaning "may it also be ratified in heaven,"—and he cites 1 K 1<sup>3</sup>, where Benaiah answers David, saying, 'Amen: the Lord, the God of my lord the king, say so too.' Cornelius à Lapide takes 'Hosanna to the Son of David' as a prayer for Christ, offered by the people 'asking all prosperous things for Him from God.' Now, this would, in itself, be admissible enough. Of Messiah, even when thought of as Divine and reigning, the Scripture says, 'prayer also shall be made for him continually' (Ps 72<sup>15</sup>). But it seems unnatural to postulate so violent an alteration in the meaning of the word—from 'supplication' to 'gratulation' when, taken in its original meaning, it yields a sufficient sense. 'Save now, for it is to thee, O Son of David, that the power to save us has been given.' It was not unnatural that the people should speak in this sense—as Jews they knew already that 'salvation belongeth unto God' (Ps 3<sup>8</sup>). This view derives considerable confirmation from the parallel passage in the Apocalypse, where the whole scene in ch. 7<sup>14</sup>, and even the very words—'the multitude before the throne and before the Lamb . . . with palms in their hands' (Rev 7<sup>9</sup>, cf. Jn 12<sup>13</sup>), who cry with a loud voice (cf. Lk 19<sup>37</sup>), saying, 'Salvation to our God . . . and to the Lamb'—seems to be based on what happened at Jerusalem on that first Passover, as if the Seer were beholding the scene which that day was asked, and recognized that the hosts of the earthly Jerusalem were the hosts of the redeemed. St. John, it will be remembered, has, in his Gospel (12<sup>18</sup>), the remark, 'These things understood not his disciples at the first, but after he was risen they remembered,' etc. If, as seems clear, the vision is expressed in figures drawn from that event, then the acclaim in heaven must be held to settle the meaning of those Hosannas upon earth: the dative of the Gospel is the dative of a prayer for Jesus, but of an ascription of salvation to Him as its Mediator and Bestower.

It remains only to be added that the Third Evangelist, while recording the same Triumphal Entry, and mentioning the acclamations of the people, omits alike the word Hosanna and the word 'in the highest.' The omission, of both omissions lies in the fact that St. Luke wrote especially for Gentiles: his readers would not have understood the Hosanna, and would have misunderstood the palms. To Greeks the palm-branch would have been, inevitably, the palm of pride and victory: not, as to the Hebrew mind, an emblem of peaceful rest, and freedom, and household joy. 'Hosanna' would have meant nothing at all. Therefore the Evangelist to the Greeks omits the word, and paraphrases with it St. Matthew and St. Mark's addition to it, 'in the highest'; rendering the whole by 'Peace in heaven, and glory in the highest' (Lk 19<sup>38</sup>). And, as St.

Matthew had the dative of ascription, 'Hosanna to the Son of David'—as looking for salvation to Him who had come to Jerusalem in this capacity, so St. Luke, in his paraphrase of the Hosanna, employs what we may call a dative clause: his 'Peace in heaven, and glory in the highest,' are introduced so as to show us these as the result of 'Hosanna' as King in the name of the Lord. It is that He has come; and on this account the people call Him blessed. It was for these ends that He was born: wherefore the angels sang the same strain over Him at His Nativity (Lk 2<sup>13</sup>); it is for these ends now that He paces forward to His cross: and therefore men, though as yet they understand it not (Jn 12<sup>16</sup>), are moved, by a Power they know not, to bear Him record.

HOSPITALITY.—This marked Oriental virtue prevailed in Palestine in Christ's day. Our Lord assumes its exercise, rather than directly enjoins it. His Apostles, later, however, 'hospitality as a reflexion of the Christ' (1 Ti 3<sup>2</sup>, Tit 1<sup>8</sup>, He 13<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>9</sup>), even towards an enemy (Ro 12<sup>20</sup>). Because of the widespread prevalence of hospitality, inns (wh. see) were comparatively few; and even in khamas or places of lodgment for strangers there were unfurnished rooms which were at the disposal of travellers, without cost. The innkeeper or host usually received remuneration for such extra service as the stranger might require, as in a case like that of the wounded man cared for at the Samaritan's expense (Lk 10<sup>35</sup>). Since Jesus Himself 'had not where to lay his head' (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>), He depended much upon the hospitality of the friendly disposed, as of Andrew and Peter at Capernaum (Mt 8<sup>14</sup>), and of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus at Bethany (Jn 11<sup>5-8</sup>); and frequently accepted the hospitality of householders (Mt 26<sup>6</sup>, Lk 5<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>36ff.</sup> 19). On occasions of the great feasts at Jerusalem, guest-chambers were freely put at the disposal of visiting worshippers (Mk 14<sup>14</sup>). When the Master sent out the seventy they were to take no purse but to rely upon the hospitality of the people of the towns into which they might go (Lk 10<sup>4</sup>); a blessing being left with the hospitable, while a woe is pronounced upon the inhospitality (vv. 10-12). Christ said of His messengers that those who received them were in truth receiving Him (Jn 13<sup>20</sup>). So incensed were two of His disciples at being refused entertainment in a Samaritan village, that they would have called down fire from heaven to destroy the town. But this spirit Jesus rebuked (Lk 9<sup>54</sup>). The spirit of hospitality was manifested in the giving of not only lodging and food, but also of the feet (Lk 7<sup>44</sup>, cf. Jn 13<sup>5</sup>); a servant took charge of the sandals (Lk 10<sup>4</sup>); a kiss characterized the hospitable reception (Lk 7<sup>45</sup>).

The emphasis that Jesus laid upon the virtue of hospitality may be discovered in His description of the Last Judgment in which the righteous are commended because 'I was a stranger and ye took me in' (Mt 25<sup>35</sup>). See also art. INN.

HOST.—See (1) ANGELS; (2) HOSPITALITY, INN, INVITATION.

'He was healed in the selfsame hour' (Mt 8<sup>13</sup>, cf. 9<sup>22</sup> 15<sup>28</sup> 17<sup>18</sup>, Jn 4<sup>53</sup>). More 'the word is used as a division of the day' (Lk 22<sup>46</sup>, cf. Mk 15<sup>33</sup> 34, Lk 23<sup>44</sup>, Jn 13<sup>30</sup> 4<sup>6</sup> 52 19<sup>14</sup>). The usual system of reckoning time was from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., and again from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. 'In the 1st cent. of our era the day was divided, in popular language, into twelve equal parts or hours, which varied in length according to the season. . . . The "the first hour," indicated the time . . . shadow on the dial reached the mark which showed that  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the day had elapsed' (Ramsay, Expositor, March 1893, p. 216f). The question has been raised, because of the apparent divergence between Jn 19<sup>14</sup> and Mk 15<sup>25</sup>, whether St. John adopted another method of reckoning in the Fourth Gospel, viz. from midnight to midday, and from midday to midnight. Prof. Ramsay maintains that, though the Roman civil day was reckoned in this way, it was not divided into hours; and that the note of time when the martyrdom of Polycarp took place, ὥρα ὀγδόη, does not prove its use in Asia Minor (l.c.). But the internal evidence of the Fourth Gospel points strongly to this mode of reckoning on the part of St. John. The tenth hour (Jn 13<sup>30</sup>) is more probably 10 a.m. than 4 p.m., if the two disciples lodged with Jesus 'that day.' It harmonizes with the custom of Eastern women of drawing water in the evening, and accounts for the weariness of Jesus, if we take 'the sixth hour' of Jn 4<sup>6</sup> not as noon, but as 6 p.m. And although we cannot look for precision in point of time in Oriental writers, the divergence between the 'the sixth hour' of St. John and the 'the sixth hour' of the crucifixion is too wide to be intelligible on any other basis. But if the 'sixth hour' of Jn 19<sup>14</sup> means 6 a.m., there is no divergence (see Westcott, St. John, p. 282; Smith, The Days of His Flesh, pp. 528-529; and for the view, Dodds, Expos. Gr. Test. i. 698, 855, further, artt. DAY, TIME.

2. But Jesus, living 'in feelings, not in figures on a dial,' and 'counting time by heart-throbs,' gave the word an intense significance. To Him days and hours were moral magnitudes. The appointed span was not small, but spacious ('Are there not twelve hours in the day?' Jn 11<sup>9</sup>), to be employed in strenuous and loving obedience to the Divine will (cf. Jn 9<sup>4</sup>). Until the sunset, He knew He had no reason to fear the hostility of men. Life would be as long as duty, and in the path of God's service there are no tragic foreshortenings (Jn 11<sup>8</sup> 9). But the twelfth hour of the day was that to which He refers as 'Mine hour.' At the 'the sixth hour' in Cana, when appealed to by His suggestion for His help, He replied, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come' (Jn 2<sup>4</sup>). This may simply mean that the time for giving such relief was not opportune, or that the opportunity for miracle-working, or the moment for self-manifestation, had not arrived. But the whole utterance produces the impression that the appeal had aroused strong feelings, and created a critical situation for Him.

'He was standing on the threshold of His ministry, conscious of His miraculous power, and He was questioning whether it were the hour to put it forth. . . . The simplicity of a company of peasants seemed so trivial, so unworthy of the Messiah, so inadequate for the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven' (Smith, The Days of His Flesh p. 75).

But is there not even here a reference to what He calls peculiarly His hour—'the hour when the Son of Man should be glorified' (Jn 12<sup>28</sup>, cf. 17<sup>1</sup>); the hour when He should be betrayed into the hands of sinners (Mt 26<sup>45</sup>); the hour when the Father's will gave Him over to the power of darkness (Lk 22<sup>53</sup>)? If Jesus went down to the Jordan in order to participate in the Baptism of Repentance, conscious that His vocation as Messiah was to be that of the Suffering Servant, and to take upon Himself the sins of His brethren, then the thought of His hour as the hour of His sacrifice could never be absent from His mind. And the simple suggestion of His mother, involving, as it did, for Him the first exercise of a power which came to Him as Messiah, raised suddenly and vividly before Him the issue of suffering, and called forth the intense feeling in the words, 'Mine hour is not yet come.'

A similar tumult of emotion was produced towards the end of His ministry, by the request of the Greeks to see Him (Jn 12<sup>30</sup>). The reply of Jesus, 'The hour is come, that the Son of man should be glorified. . . . Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone,' is relevant to a prospect of possible exemption from the cross which the request raised in Him, rather than to the request itself. Once more an apparently innocent intrusion upon His thoughts had brought before Him the vision of His hour. He saw that the glory would be won at a great cost, and the prospect of it brought distress of soul, and wrung from Him the cry, 'Father, what shall I say? Save me from this hour.' P.

He saw through the pain the holy . . . realizing itself, and recovered His poise of soul and unflinching devotion. 'But for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name.'

It was by this simple word, therefore, that He expressed the conviction that His death was the climax of His life, and that the time of its accomplishment was with God. He would not forestall it by any premature manifestation of Himself to the world (Jn 7<sup>6</sup>); and until His hour came, His enemies were . . . (v. 30 s<sup>20</sup>). But when it came, He was not reluctant to recognize it. Though it was a dark hour, the hour of men with sinister purpose and in league with Satan (Lk 22<sup>53</sup>), He knew it as the hour when He should depart out of this world unto the Father (Jn 13<sup>1</sup>), the hour when God should glorify His Son (17<sup>1</sup>).

With the approach of that hour which marked the climax and close of His earthly ministry, a wider horizon opens. A new day of God dawns, and in it also there is a critical hour—the hour when the Son of Man cometh' (Mt 25<sup>13</sup>). Even to Him the precise point of time was not disclosed (Mt 24<sup>36</sup>). Of one thing He was sure, and gave repeated warning,—it would come upon men with startling suddenness: 'and in an hour when ye think not' (Mt 24<sup>42-44</sup> 25<sup>13</sup>, cf. Lk 12<sup>39-40</sup> 48), and He enforces therewith His command to 'watch,' 'be ready,' so that, 'if he will come, ye may be a glad surprise. JOSEPH MITCHELL

HOUSE (oikla, oikos).—The word 'house' is used in the Gospels, in accordance with ancient Hebrew . . . twofold sense, as referring either to . . . or to the family living in it. Thus we have (1) 'the house of Israel' (Mt 10<sup>6</sup>), 'the house of David' (Lk 1<sup>27</sup>), etc.; (2) 'built his house upon a rock' (Mt 7<sup>24</sup>), 'the house of the ruler' (Mk 5<sup>38</sup>), etc.

The 'house,' as a building, plays no such part in Oriental as in Western life and civilization. Climatic conditions in the East permit people to live much in the open. Accordingly we find artisans and merchants plying their trades in the street, or in open shops looking out on the street. Then the domestic life of the Oriental requires little beyond a sheltered place for sleeping and a quiet place for eating. The ordinary house of the ancient Hebrew, we may be sure, was much like that found in Palestine to-day—it could hardly be cruder, or more primitive. As to Hebrew architecture, of either OT or NT times, the Bible has little to say. Architecture proper can hardly be said to have arisen among the Hebrews before the time of the kings, say, about B.C. 1000. Then, it would seem, it differed little from that of the Phœnicians, Assyrians, and Egyptians. The style of the house would naturally be determined largely by the location, the materials at hand, and the purpose to be served. Palestine, as known to history, has had few . . . and little timber of any kind suited . . . (Solomon had to import materials for palace and temple, 1 K 5<sup>20</sup>). Houses built in the plains were usually constructed of mud, clay, or sun-dried bricks (cf. Job 4<sup>19</sup>). 'Houses of clay,' or those built of sun-dried bricks, could be easily broken into—a fact that gives point to our Lord's allusion in the Sermon on the Mount, when He would dissuade from laying up treasures 'where thieves break . . . and steal' (Mt 6<sup>19</sup>), where it is literally ' . . . (RVm). Great care needed to be tak-foundations. In a limestone country like Palestine, if one dig deep enough, he finds almost anywhere a stratum of solid rock. It is still true that the wise man builds his house upon the rock (Mt 7<sup>24</sup>). It is common there now to dig down to the rock and lay the foundation of even the 'house of clay' upon it. Mt 7<sup>25</sup> 'It was founded,' might well be rendered, 'It was foundationed upon the rock,' if we had such a word in English. St. Luke (6<sup>48</sup>) says, 'dug, and went deep, and laid a foundation upon the rock.'

In the mountainous regions limestone rock was the building material chiefly used, as it was abundant, easily quarried, and readily worked. The house of stone was, probably, modelled after, or . . . om, the cave. The nature of the country . . . to this. First the natural cave would be used, and, as there was demand, artificially enlarged. Then, occasionally, in some inviting place, a cave would be hewn out of the rock, de novo. Finally, a wall would be built in front for protection, or privacy, and so the cave would be converted into a sheltered dwelling. Henceforth it would serve as a model for detached stone houses. As a matter of fact, in the ancient village of Siloam are found all these kinds of houses, and they illustrate this process of development. (See Jewish Encyc. art. 'House'). Bricks were sometimes used even in the mountain regions, though counted inferior to hewn stone (2 S 12<sup>31</sup>). Many stone houses were unpretentious and rude, being built of rough, unhewn stones; but some, then as now, were built of hewn stones, with vaulted stone roofs, e.g. the palaces of the rich, or of the ruling class (cf. 'the house of the ruler,' Mk 5<sup>38</sup>, 'the high priest's house,' Lk 22<sup>54</sup>). Sometimes space for walking was left around the dome, but often all the space between the dome and the battlement (Dt 22<sup>8</sup>) would be filled in, so as to give the much-desired flat roof—the favourite resort of the Oriental in the cool of the evening (2 S 11<sup>2</sup>), and an inviting sleeping-place in summer (1 S 9<sup>26</sup>). Such a house will often have a hut of branches, or of vine-covered trellis-work, on the roof (cf. 2 S 16<sup>22</sup>, Neh 8<sup>16</sup>), and sometimes a more substantial room, where guests of honour are lodged (1 K 17<sup>18</sup>, 2 K 4<sup>10</sup>). For 'summer parlour' cf. Jg 3<sup>20</sup>, RVm has rightly 'upper chamber of cooling' (See Mk 14<sup>13</sup>, and cf. 'upper room' elsewhere). From the roof one could easily see what was going on in the street, or on a neighbouring housetop (cf. 1 S 9<sup>25</sup>); indeed, could even step from roof to roof, and thus walk the whole length of a street, as the present writer once did in Damascus (cf. Mk 13<sup>15</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. 140 [ed. Niese]).

The humbler house of the plain was very simple, having usually only one apartment, which sometimes sheltered both man and beast. The walls were sometimes smeared with clay (Lv 14<sup>41</sup>), sometimes plastered (Ezk 13<sup>10</sup>, Dt 27<sup>4</sup>). The roof was made, no doubt, as that of the common Arab house is made to-day, by laying rough beams about three feet apart, then laying reeds or brush-wood close and thick across, covering it with something like the thickly matted thorn-bush called bellan, and then spreading over the whole, first a coat of thick mortar, and then one of marl or earth, and rolling it. Such roofs would require frequent repairing and rolling to keep out the rain, and, if they would get so soaked with the tropical rain, they would cave in. In this way whole villages have had to be abandoned, and their houses left desolate. It was probably one of the simplest of such roofs that was 'broken up' (Mk 2<sup>4</sup>) when the paralytic was let down from the housetop at Capernaum into the presence of Jesus to be healed. The whole affair would seem to have been the extemporaneous device of plain peasants, accustomed to open their roofs and let down grain, straw, and other articles, as they still do in that country (Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 6 ff.) The furniture of such a house would be very simple,—a few mats, or pallets, spread on the ground floor for sleeping on at night, then rolled up and put aside in the day; latterly a 'divan' set against the wall on one side, a small table, a few rude chairs, a niche in the wall for the primitive little lamp, unless it was of a sort to hang from a rafter, and a few large jugs for grain, water, wine, or oil.

The palace of the rich would differ from such a house, of course, in having more rooms, and richer and more varied furniture. The numerous rooms, often preferably arranged in a suite on the ground floor around one or more open courts, were often built in storeys. Fine woods, olive, cedar, etc., were used for the doors and windows, and the floors were sometimes made of wood, but often of cement or stone, or even of rich mosaics; while the walls in rare instances were inlaid with ivory and beaten gold (cf. Am 5<sup>11</sup>, 1 K 22<sup>39</sup> 6<sup>18, 20</sup>).

The Græco-Roman architecture of the Hellenistic period did not exert any very marked or lasting influence upon the architecture of Palestine, partly because of the Jewish antipathy to the Hellenizing tendency, and partly because it was confined to the larger buildings, such as palaces, baths, theatres, temples, etc. See, further, Hastings' DB, art. HOUSEHOLD.—In Mt 24<sup>45</sup> (oikereia), Lk 12<sup>42</sup> (οικερεία)=servants, i.e. the dependants on an estate to whom the steward was bound in our Lord's parable to serve out rations at intervals of a day, a week, or a month. It was their dependent and helpless condition which was the test of the steward's faithfulness to his trust. The same English word translates οικιακοι in Mt 10<sup>25, 36</sup>, i.e. the inmates of a house, subordinate indeed to the master, but attached to him by ties of relationship or marriage. In v. 25 there is a contrast and comparison between the οικιακοι Christ's disciples and the οικοδεσποτης (the Lord Himself) and Christ warns the Twelve that if He has been called Beelzebub (or Beelzebub) by His enemies (cf. Mt 9<sup>34</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>, Jn 8<sup>48</sup>), those who belong to His household cannot expect to be free from this 'reproach of Christ.' In v. 36 the contrast is between some members of a household and the rest. Here He warns them of the inevitable opposition that will arise when some in a house love Christ supremely, while others are hostile or indifferent to Him. The words of ancient prophecy (Mic 7<sup>6</sup>) then receive a fulfilment. The very closeness of association emphasizes the antagonism, and 'a man's foes shall be they of his own household.' C. H. PRICHARD.

HOUSEHOLDER.—This term as well as 'goodman of the house,' 'master of the house,' are different translations of the same Greek word οικοδεσποτης. It is rendered 'householder' in the parables of the Tares and the Wheat (Mt 13<sup>27</sup>), of the Owner bringing forth his treasures new and old (Mt 13<sup>32</sup>), of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt 20<sup>1</sup>), of the Vineyard let out to husbandmen (21<sup>33</sup>), with special application to Christ as Head of the Church. The phrase 'master of the house' is applied (Mk 14<sup>14</sup>, Lk 10<sup>1</sup>) to the owner of the house in which the Last Supper was to be prepared. The translation 'master of the house' is found in Lk 12<sup>30</sup> RV (AV 'goodman'), Mt 24<sup>4</sup>, of the owner or overseer whose duty it is to protect his property against the thief in the night. It occurs also in the parable of the Great Supper, Lk 14<sup>21</sup> (corresponding to the king of Mt 22<sup>2</sup> 7), also as denoting the head of the house whose persecution involves that of his subordinates, Mt 10<sup>25</sup> (see HOUSEHOLD); and once more in the parable of the Unfaithful Servant, Lk 12<sup>35</sup> (cf. Lk 12<sup>35</sup>, Ten Virgins, Mt 25).

HUMANITY OF CHRIST.—The simplest fact about Jesus Christ, as we see Him pictured in the Gospels, is that He was a man. Whatever there was peculiar about His person, it did not destroy the reality of His humanity or take Him out of the genus 'man.' But this simple fact, seen in all its relations, admits of varied consideration, and indeed demands it.

1. His human body.—Jesus had a body, visible to the eye, giving the natural impression, as other bodies do, of reality. It came into life by the natural channel of birth (Mt 1<sup>25</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>, Lk 2<sup>7</sup>); it grew as others do (Lk 2<sup>40</sup>); was nourished by food as others are (Lk 7<sup>34-36</sup>, cf. 24<sup>41-43</sup>); slept (Lk 8<sup>23</sup>); was restricted by space as ordinary men are, and thus laboriously travelled about (Lk 8<sup>1</sup>, Jn 4<sup>1</sup>); was weary (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>); suffered under the inhumanities attending the Trial and Execution (Jn 19<sup>23-33</sup>), although, in the restraint of the Gospel narrative, no express mention is made of this fact; and truly died (as is made evident by the peculiar character of the phenomenon related in Jn 19<sup>34</sup>, an unconscious testimony, by one not acquainted with the principles of anatomy, as to the reality of His death). See BODY.

With the reality of His body is closely associated the fact of the temptability of Jesus. The Epistle to the Hebrews lays emphasis upon this fact as a part of His qualification for the work of Saviour (2<sup>18</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>). The Gospel history contains a narrative of temptation (Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup>) in which Jesus is assailed by Satan, who is addressed to His physical nature, to His love or display, and to His will. As the reality of the human body is the pre-supposition of the reality of the temptation, so the character of the temptation confirms the proof of that body. Shrinkings from physical pain may have been a part of the agony of the Garden (Lk 22<sup>42, 44</sup>, cf. the interpretation given in He 5<sup>7-9</sup>). Naturally the sacred history, which is engaged with things done rather than with inner processes which are concealed from human observation, and which finds no occasion to trace the course of inner temptations which never result in outward sin, makes no mention of the appeal which alluring objects must have made to the sensibilities of the man Jesus Christ. But the Epistle to the Hebrews ('in all points tempted like as we are,' 4<sup>15</sup>) sustains the inference which must necessarily follow from the possession of a human nature, that there were such appeals to the humanity of Jesus. See TEMPTATION.

2. His human soul.—Had Jesus a true human soul? The answer to such a question is to be obtained only by observing the phenomena of His recorded life, and drawing the necessary inferences from what we see. The statement of fact is, fortunately, very clear and copious. The moment we study the account of His independent life we find the evidences accumulating that in its inward, as well as its outward, processes it is a truly human life. In the temple we find the exercise of a desire—curiosity—and the mental processes both like those of a child and commanding their respect (His 'understanding,' Lk 2<sup>40-47</sup>). In His home in Nazareth He followed a life of obedience (Lk 2<sup>51</sup> 'subject'). As He grew in stature, so He did in 'wisdom' (Lk 2<sup>52</sup> sofia, 'varied knowledge of things human and Divine,' Grimm-Thayer). At His 12th birthday He showed an intellectual knowledge of the Law (Mt 4<sup>4-7-10</sup>). His discourses moved along according to the laws of human address, idea suggesting idea according to the laws of natural association. The lower ranges of reasoning are pursued by Him as by others, and once He even expresses His thought illogically (Jn 8<sup>47</sup>). But the higher ranges of reason, the intuitive knowledge of the meaning of great truths, were His as is seen in the wider interpretation of the OT (Mt 5<sup>17-21-48</sup>), and in the lofty ethical standard which He sets up, itself another instance of the larger interpretation of the OT, forming the still unsurpassed ideal of human conduct, more and more insisted upon in the social struggles for progress in our own time, the binding force and universal validity of the law of love (Mt 22<sup>37-40</sup>). To this standard He held Himself (Jn 10<sup>30-17-21</sup>, Mt 15<sup>32-20-34</sup>). Thus He manifested at every essential point the possession of an intellect characterized by the same faculties and working by the same laws as our own. The same was no less true of the sensibilities, even those which we are inclined to view as trivial, the undue indulgence of which we stigmatize as weakness. Traces may be found of the operation of every one of the distinct emotions. Thus, for example, He had a love for esteem, manifested in His notice of the omission of certain acts of courtesy in Lk 7<sup>44-46</sup>; He displayed the natural affection, such as love of friends (Jn 15<sup>15</sup>), of family (Jn 19<sup>26</sup>), of country (Mt 23<sup>37-39</sup>); He exercised complacent love (Mk 14<sup>38</sup>), moral indignation (Lk 11<sup>46</sup>, Jn 8<sup>44</sup>); His spiritual background was that of joy and peace (Jn 14<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>). The will was moved by appropriate considerations as ours is (Jn 7<sup>10</sup>), and displays the same sort of activities, being sustained by the operation of the same forces as in ordinary men. Thus the struggle in time of temptation is to maintain His spiritual ideals (Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup>, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>), and Jesus concentrates His attention, as men who will be victorious in time of temptation must, upon the proper object of human attention, upon the great purpose for which He has come into the world (Jn 18<sup>37</sup> and 19<sup>11</sup>). The virtues which may be particularly called the virtues of the will are exemplified, such as persistence, shown in His repeated healing upon the Sabbath (Jn 5<sup>16</sup>, Mk 3<sup>2-3</sup>), in His teaching sustained amid the constant evidence that the Jews were inclined decisively to reject Him (cf. the discourses in Jn 5 and foll. chapters). Even the more mysterious operations of the sub-conscious, or better of the supra-conscious, self are to be noted in Him, not merely in the displays of genius which He, as no other man, possessed, but in the manifestations of a power the operations of which first brought it to His empirical consciousness (Mk 5<sup>30</sup> RV). In fact, the better psychologist a man is, the more clearly he can see, in the simple narratives of the Gospels, the operations of every fundamental faculty and law of the human soul.

3. The necessity of Christ's humanity.—To one who sees the humanity of Christ the question of the necessity of His humanity is meaningless—not to say impertinent. Of course He must be human, says such a one, since this is the only path to leadership. God has committed His work for men in the world to men. Apart from those mysterious communications of revelation which selected teachers of men have had, the only possible teacher of men is a man who can approach them with messages which they can understand, in words appropriate to their nature. However true these general principles are, the medium here assumed is not that of the Gospels. To them, Christ 'came' to the earth (see DIVINITY OF CHRIST); and the question arises why this is so, why He took upon Himself humanity and 'became flesh' (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). Did this question arise in the minds of the Apostles? and is there trace of speculation, or of interest as to it, in the Gospels? There are indisputable traces of both in the Gospels, especially in that to the Hebrews. It is represented in this Epistle that the object of Christ's coming in the flesh was particularly to offer His body a sacrifice (10<sup>5-10</sup>, cf. 2<sup>17-18</sup>), but not merely this, for the possession of humanity itself affords Him a spiritual qualification for His priestly work, in that He shares the lot of men, and learns thereby how to sympathize with them in their temptations and their failures (2<sup>17-18</sup> 4<sup>15-16</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>). There is also the suggestion of an idea which is brought out more clearly in the Fourth Gospel,—the same as that suggested above,—that the humanity was the necessary medium of the revelation of God, since it is through Jesus that God 'speaks' (Jn 1<sup>13-14</sup>). This form of presentation covers the point why the humanity was a necessity when once God had determined to enter upon the stage of human history as Redeemer. But St John pushes the matter a little farther back. He begins with the eternal 'Word,' which was in the beginning with God and was God, and sets forth His appearing in the world under the figure of light shining into darkness (1<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>12</sup>), and needed because of the darkness. The ground of the Incarnation is found in this need, in the existence of sin, and the necessity of salvation through faith (3<sup>16</sup>). It is to produce 'children of God' (1<sup>12</sup>) that Christ comes. The coming is the manifestation of the glory of God (1<sup>14</sup>), but that glory is the moral glory of 'grace and truth.' The culmination of the whole work of redemption is, however, the cross (3<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>17-18</sup> 15<sup>13</sup>, cf. He 10<sup>5-10</sup>), and it is the human body and soul of Christ that suffered there (19<sup>28</sup>). This is the central idea of the Fourth Gospel; but other elements are not lacking, as the necessity of the humanity to the work of instruction, which was a main element of Jesus' work (3<sup>11</sup> 19<sup>31-32</sup>), and which culminated in the revelation of the Father, which needed humanity as the medium of communication to human beings (14<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>45</sup> 16<sup>3</sup>). Union with the Father was also essential to Christ's work (14<sup>11</sup> etc.), because this consisted in the manifestation of God's name (17<sup>6</sup>). The necessary spiritual sustenance, finally, was provided by the body and blood of Christ (6<sup>53-58</sup>), through what His humanity alone was capable of doing for man.

4. Unique elements of this humanity.—The humanity of Christ, in order to satisfy the conditions now before us, must be a reality. No 'phantom,' or merely phenomenal body, could perform the offices required in these Scripture passages of the humanity. But other elements also appear which give a new aspect to the human nature. Among these need not be reckoned the origin of the body of Jesus by miraculous conception, as related in the First and Third Gospels; for however the process of development from the first cell might be initiated, the resulting development must be in any case that of a human body. Side by side with evident human limitations, such as ignorance (as of the day and hour of His own return to the earth, Mt 24<sup>36</sup>), there exist phenomena of a like nature altogether transcending humanity, such as the knowledge by which He not only 'knew what was in man' (Jn 2<sup>25</sup>), read th. . . of men often as an open book (Mt 9<sup>4</sup> 12~, Lk 6<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>47</sup>), but, above all, knew perfectly the will of the Father and the mysteries of Divine truth. He walked laboriously from Judæa to Galilee (Jn 4<sup>4</sup>), but He could suddenly appear upon the surface of the sea in the storm, walking upon the water (Mt 14<sup>23</sup> ||). These and other such considerations (see DIVINITY OF CHRIST) raise the question how these things could consist in Him, that is . . . of the nature of the Person of Christ . . . longing . . . and thus lying . . . scope of . . . But—this is the main point—whatever more than humanity there was in Christ, the evidence already cited is decisive as to the reality of His humanity.

5. The unity of Jesus' consciousness.—Christ was, then, a man. Does this word comprehensively express the Gospel teaching as to His person? He had a personality as men are persons. He had a consciousness which expressed itself by the pronoun 'I.' Was this a human consciousness, so that when asked as to Himself Jesus would have replied 'I am a man'? There are two elements in the answer to this question. (a) Jesus' consciousness was a unity. He passes easily from the consideration of earthly to heavenly things, from walking upon the water to sitting quietly in the boat, as if both of these things belonged to Him equally. The impression made upon the unsophisticated reader of the Gospels is that of a single consciousness. In fact, in order to be explicable at all, the Gospels must convey such an impression. But pivotal passages, even those which have seemed to give a basis for the idea that He spoke now 'as God' and now 'as man,' do not justify such an inference when carefully considered. He did not mean in Mt 10<sup>41</sup> 'Thou (Satan) shalt worship the Lord thy God (me),' and not I thee. He meant that the law of worship for any one, and for Him as bound to fulfill all righteousness (Mt 3<sup>15</sup>), was the worship of the Lord only. In Mt 8<sup>23-27</sup> and parallels He was not in one capacity a-leap in the boat and in another watching over the disciples in that storm, but He was totally asleep as He appeared. He did not chide them for lack of faith in such a waking providence of His own, of which they had no knowledge, but for their lack of faith in God (cf. Mk 4<sup>40</sup>), whose messenger Christ was, and who would care for both Him and them. In Mk 5<sup>50</sup> and parallels it is not Jesus in one personality healing the woman and in another inquiring what had happened, that is brought before us; but God the Father made use of Him to answer the petition, unknown to Him but known to God, and He became conscious in this use of Himself that He was so used ('having come to perceive that the power which [often, on other occasion-<sup>1</sup> went forth from him had [on this occasion] gone forth,' cf. RV).

(b) The centre of this personality, the Ego of this undivided consciousness, is God. Whenever He speaks of His coming into the world, it is always God that speaks, not less in Mt 10<sup>45</sup> and

The interest of dogmatics in the Christ lies in the doctrine of a true which is the foundation of the doctrines of Atonement and Redemption. The interest of religion in Christ's interest of believers is in the fact that He is the Son of Man, who need to feel the presence of their Redeemer with themselves. It is not without profound significance that it is said that judgment is committed to the Son of Man (Jn 5<sup>22</sup>). Whatever else of deepest truth there may be in it, there is this, that the sinner needs to feel the identification of his Judge with himself by the fact that He is a common human nature. When the sinner sees in Christ both the persistency and depth of the sin on the one hand, and the weakness and temptations of man on the other, — then only will the sinner be assured that the proffered forgiveness is for him. It is, again, the interest of believers in God, who get higher ideas of God's goodness from the greatness of the condescension involved in His 'becoming flesh.' It is, further, the interest of believers in Jesus, who, when they understand that Jesus is identified with us by the possession of our common humanity, feel a new confidence; are stimulated to more frequent prayer; become conscious that He truly draws near to them; regard their varied lot in life, which He has shared, as sanctified thereby; bear with greater calmness their sorrows, which He also bore; find in Him their pattern of life (see OBEDIENCE, § ii); and thus see in Him not an abstraction, but a real, objective, and personal Redeemer and object of faith, a Christ who is the Head of the Church. See, further, IDENTIFICATION SON OF MAN.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST.—1. Incarnation.—Jesus Christ is a problem. And yet He is not so much a problem as man would be without Him. Indeed He is, in a true sense, the solution of the problem of man. Nevertheless, to the intellect, demanding that everything in the heavens above and on the earth beneath be reduced to 'the measure of man's mind,' He remains a problem. The expressions of His consciousness of pre-existence constitute one of the chief elements of that problem. But, taken in connexion with two facts of His history, even this aspect of His person is not so dense and impenetrable as it is considered by itself. These two facts are (1) the expressions of His self-consciousness, direct and incidental, as to His relation to God on the one hand, and to total humanity on the other; and (2) His effects in the world and on the world. Even the pre-existence of Jesus Christ, when taken in connexion with these two outstanding facts, is, on the whole, a less problem and a smaller difficulty than the world of humanity would be without Him.

Furthermore, it would be more difficult to believe that a being who had the consciousness that Jesus had, who has done for humanity what Jesus has done, and who is to humanity what Jesus is, should have had the absolute beginning of His existence at a late point in time, than to believe that He came out of eternity and is of the eternal order. In other words, assuming and accepting the pre-existence of Jesus Christ, mystery though it be, it is easier to understand His unique earthly history, His character, His consciousness, His revelation, His work, His actual effects on the world and on men, both in the past and at the present, than it would be without that assumption. At all events, He has in several instances expressed the consciousness of having existed in a previous state before His advent into this world (Jn 3<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>52</sup> 8<sup>58</sup> 16<sup>28</sup> 17<sup>5</sup> 24). This pre-existent state was one of intimate association and intercommunion with God and participation in the glory of the Eternal Father. It is also one of the underlying presuppositions in St. Paul's Epistles (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>, Ph 2<sup>5-8</sup>, Col 1<sup>15-17</sup>). It is found also in an original setting in Hebrews (1<sup>2</sup> 3).

Now, whatever may be the meaning of these great mysteries, whatever the pre-incarnate riches and glory of Christ, He voluntarily submitted to the surrender of the resources of a Divine state for the lowliness of a human lot and the extreme of human poverty and to the relinquishment of His equal participation in the Divine glory in exchange for the nethermost depth of human humiliation. Exactly what was involved in His self-humiliation from the Divine to the human is treated specially under the articles on PRE-EXISTENCE, KINGDOM, and INCARNATION. Confining our attention, then, in this article to His earthly history, we find that His whole life, His entire sojourn on earth, was a humiliation. His incarnation was but the first stage in His humiliation, which continued by a deepening descent to the very end of His earthly life. His whole career in this world was a protracted humiliation or succession of humiliations between the humiliation of His incarnation and the humiliation of His crucifixion. It is worthy of note that the words of St. Paul, 'he humbled himself' (in Ph 2<sup>7</sup>), refer to experiences of His earthly life and not to the process of His incarnation.

2. His earthly life to the assumption of the Messianic mission.—The circumstances of His birth were most painful. It occurred, not in the sheltered privacy, and amid the comforts, of home, but while His mother was on a humiliating and painful pilgrimage, and among the feeble beasts, surrounded by the filth of a stable, and possibly under the observation of strange and uncouth men. But the child Jesus was not a year old before He became the object of jealousy and persecution, and had to be taken on a long and painful journey into a foreign land to save His life—a baby fugitive on the face of the earth. Showing at the age of twelve a wisdom which astonished the wisest men of the nation, and which would have secured for Him recognition, position, power, and renown, He yet willingly returned to the obscure and humble home at Nazareth; and there for the space of nearly twenty years He submitted Himself, day after day, to the control of two plain peasant people, and to the occupation and drudgery of common manual labour.

3. Humiliations of the Messianic ministry.—He knew from the beginning what the Messianic mission meant, and how it would end. It was not to Him an honour to be enjoyed; it was a burden to be borne. It cost Him a struggle to submit and adjust Himself to that which He knew was so fraught with difficulty, persecution, humiliation, loneliness, suspense, and suffering, ending with the final agonies and the death of abandonment and shame. This is the reason why He needed—and received—the expression of His Father's approval at the moment of His self-dedication to the work of Messiah (Mk 1<sup>11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>22</sup>). This was the meaning of His temptation in the wilderness. This was why at the sharp turning-point in His ministry, when He looked out on the dark and lonely way of obedience unto death and deliberately chose to walk in it alone, He needed again—and again received—the assurance of His Father's recognition, approval, and sympathy (Mk 9<sup>7</sup>, Lk 9<sup>35</sup>). * It was the burden of the Messianic task that made Him, beyond all men, a man of sorrows. More than once we are told that He wept; but never that He laughed. Almost from the beginning of His ministry He was looked on with jealousy and suspicion by the powerful leaders of the people, from whom He had a right to expect . . . and support. They kept a watch on Him, they found fault with Him, they misconstrued His actions, they perverted His sayings, they dogged His steps, they nagged Him at every turn, they accused Him of being a law-breaker, a blasphemer, an impostor, a lunatic, a demoniac, an emissary of the powers of darkness (Lk 11<sup>15</sup>). They laid plots to catch Him and to kill Him; and they never ceased until they succeeded. Not only so, but little by little He lost His early popularity and was abandoned by the people. He came to those whom He had the right to claim as His own; they refused to receive Him, turned against Him. His personal ministry was . . . a failure, and He . . . outcast. He did not even have a . . . the friends of His youth, the people . . . home at Nazareth. They also turned against Him, rejected His claims, drove Him out of their village, made a desperate attempt to kill Him (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>, Lk 4<sup>28</sup>). The members of His own family failed to understand Him, refused to accept Him, were alienated from Him (Jn 7<sup>3</sup>). Probably they thought Him either a fanatic or a fraud. Probably on account of His strangeness and growing unpopularity they were ashamed of Him. He was subjected to the humiliation and pain of constant misunderstanding and sometimes even criticism on the part of His own disciples. He was rebuked (Mt 16<sup>22</sup>) and denied (26<sup>69-73</sup>) by one of them, sold and delivered into the hands of His enemies and murderers for a few pounds by another (26<sup>14-16</sup>), deserted by all (Mt 26<sup>56</sup>, Mk 14<sup>50</sup>). Added to these things, He suffered the humiliations of a painful poverty. Rejected at home, ejected from home, He had no place of His very own where He could feel that He might retire when weary or lonely or heart-sore, and enjoy rest without the fear of intrusion or molestation. He was dependent on charity, He was supported by charity (Lk 8<sup>3</sup>). He had to borrow a room for His last meal with His disciples (22<sup>11</sup>). He had to borrow an ass to ride into Jerusalem on the day of His triumphal entry (19<sup>33</sup>, 34). Another man's stable was borrowed for Him to be born in (2<sup>7</sup>); another man's grave for Him to be buried in (Mt 27<sup>58</sup>, 60).

4. Trials and crucifixion.—His implacable enemies brought Him at last to bay. Deep in that memorable night when He was in the depths of the impenetrable gloom of Gethsemane, the sacred privacy of His last hours and His last prayer was invaded by a howling mob of underlings, hangers-on and soldiers of the temple guard, guided by one of His own disciples (Mt 26<sup>47</sup>, Lk 22<sup>47</sup>). They took Jesus, and when they had bound * See chapters on the Baptism, the Temptation, and the Transfiguration in the present writer's Son of Man.

Him with ropes (Jn 18<sup>12</sup>), they led Him by the halter, as if He were a desperado, to the house of the high priest. He had a keen sense of this humiliation, and protested against it (Mk 14<sup>48</sup>). Nevertheless, conscious though He was of His innocence of any evil deed or design, of His absolute purity, yea, even of His Divine dignity and mission, He submitted to the humiliation of being put on trial before the corrupt and conscienceless occupant of the high-priestly office and the white-washed hypocrites who, for the most part, constituted the governing body of the nation. After the solemn mockery was enacted and they had condemned Him to death (14<sup>64</sup>), they heaped on Him the most humiliating insults their malicious ingenuity could devise. They spat in His face (ἐνέπτυσαν εἰς τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ, Mt 26<sup>67</sup>), they threw a cloth over Him and then beat Him on the head, mockingly demanding that He should tell them who it was that struck each blow (26<sup>67, 68</sup>). When it was morning, they bound Him again with ropes, and led Him thus to the Prætorium to secure sentence of death from the Roman Procurator (Mk 15<sup>1</sup>, Mt 27<sup>1</sup>). Pilate, though convinced of His innocence, did not care to involve himself in the trouble and annoyance of taking His part, and he was glad to shirk his duty and get rid of the embarrassment by turning Him over to Herod Antipas, who was at that time in Jerusalem (Lk 23<sup>7</sup>). The poor prisoner, whom no one was found to befriend or defend, was dragged through the streets to another tribunal in the hope of finding some one who had the courage as well as the power to rid the earth of Him, and He had to suffer the humiliation of appearing as a culprit before this abandoned wretch. Herod was delighted to come face to face with Jesus, and now at last he was to have the long-looked-for opportunity of having Him show off with a few miracles in his presence. But, though he pled Him with all sorts of requests and importunities, Jesus answered him not a single word. But Herod was not to be balked. He could not induce Jesus to entertain him in one way, he could at least force Him to furnish entertainment for him in another way. And this Herod, this creature of low cunning, this unwashed hog of a sensualist, this seducer of his own brother's wife, this cowardly murderer of the other of the two great prophets of the day, gratified his brutal instincts by joining his soldiers in putting Jesus to scorn. They dressed Him up in a gorgeous and glaring red mantle of mock royalty, and sent Him thus through the streets back to the Prætorium of Pilate (23<sup>7-11</sup>). Pilate, overcome by the persistence of the Jewish leaders and by his own selfish and cowardly fears, decided at last to deliver Jesus up to the tender mercies of the human bloodhounds who could be appeased by nothing but His death. But before doing so, he made his soldiers strip Him and inflict on Him the terrible Roman flagellation (Mk 15<sup>15</sup>, Mt 27<sup>26</sup>), a punishment so severe that the victim often died under it. This bitter torture and bitterer humiliation Jesus endured in submission and silence. While the preparation is being made for the crucifixion, He is left in the hands of the soldiers, the whole cohort is invited in to enjoy the sport, and now for the third time He is made the amusement of a band of ruffians, for it is now their turn to have a little sport with the Nazarene fanatic. They torment Him as a cat teases and tortures a wounded bird before devouring it. They put on Him a scarlet military robe, and having twisted branches of thorn bushes into a sort of crown, they place it on His patient brow, put a mock sceptre in His unresisting hand, and then go down on their knees before Him, shouting, 'Long live the king of the Jews!'

They too indulged in the sport of spitting on Him, and, yielding to the wild beast instinct which their opportunity had aroused in them, they kept spitting over the head (ἐτυπτον εἰς τὴν κεφαλὴν αὐτοῦ, Mt 27<sup>30</sup>; ἐτυπτον αὐτοῦ τὴν κεφαλὴν καλῶς, Mk 15<sup>19</sup>). While He was dressed up as a mock king, His face stained with blood and maled with spittle, Pilate, moved with pity, led Him out to the view of the clamorous mob, hoping that the spectacle of so abject an object might move them to pity (Jn 19<sup>4-5</sup>). But it seemed the more to inflame their rage (v.<sup>6</sup>). His crucifixion was then finally decided on. And now a new humiliation was inflicted on Him. He leaves the Prætorium, and is led or driven along the crowded streets through the avenue of onlookers, bearing on His back the heavy wooden beam that was to be the instrument of His execution (v.<sup>17</sup>). It was the symbol of His degradation and the advertisement of His disgrace.

It may be well for us to stop and try to imagine what was passing in the mind of Jesus while all these horrors were heaped upon Him. We know He was accustomed, in the course of His ministry, to dwell, both in thought and in speech, on the horrors that He knew awaited Him (Mt 16<sup>21</sup> ὅτι δεῖ αὐτὸν πολλὰ παθεῖν). If He so dreaded it from afar, how keen must have been the anguish of passing through it!

But these things were slight in comparison with what yet awaited Him; for the great humiliation was yet to come. He was to be subjected to the accursed and infamous death of crucifixion. When soldiers are to be put to death for desertion or treason, they are shot. The lowest of criminals, those upon whom we wish to heap disgrace in inflicting death, we hang on the gallows. What the gallows is to-day, the cross was in the days of Jesus. It was the method of execution that secured publicity, while it insured the utmost prolongation of the victim's misery. When the procession had reached the place, the cross was laid upon the ground, Jesus was denuded of all His clothing, He was stretched out upon the cross, long iron nails were driven through His hands and feet, the cross bearing His naked body was lifted up and dropped into its socket, and there, looking out on the sea of angry faces and suffering the infamous fate of the most abandoned criminal, hung Jesus, who, though He had the consciousness of having come from God and of being the sinless Son of God, yet willingly endured this humiliation that He might become the Redeemer of men. Wherefore all the ages and the highest of all the races of men have united with God in giving Him the name that is above every name, and with one accord agree in crowning Him Lord of all.

The descending scale of His humiliation, from the estate of conscious equality with God past all grades and levels down to the humiliation of the cross, has been grasped and, with a few master strokes, sketched by St. Paul in the great passage of 1st Cor. 2. The humiliation of the Divine to the level of the human, the humiliation of the human to the level of the servant, to the level of the outcast and condemned criminal, and, lastly, to the degradation of a punishment the most humiliating, the most shameful, the most bitter, the most revolting, the most horrible then or ever known among men.

GROSS ALEXANDER

HUMILITY.—This virtue or grace distinguished the leaders of OT history like Abraham and Moses (Gn 18<sup>7</sup>, Nu 12<sup>9</sup>), and was inculcated by the prophets as a chief duty (Mic 6<sup>8</sup>). It belongs even to the earlier revelation of God's character ('that humbleth himself,' Ps 113<sup>9</sup>), and is the key to man's communion with Him (Is 57<sup>15</sup>). In Judaism and the Rabbinical literature we meet with a variety of examples and maxims enforcing the truth that 'God is the highest type of humility.' These anticipations prepare us for the new and enlarged conception of humility which fills the NT, and was embodied in the teaching, example, and character of Jesus Christ. The moral quality of our Saviour's personality is love (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>), and on this foundation of love is His humility, exemplified in His life, death, and resurrection, and His ethical appeal (Ph 2<sup>5ff</sup>). It may be claimed that the gospel alone has popularized humility, but the temper of Christ's disciples in every age proves that it is an excellence of rare and difficult attainment.

I. USE AND MEANING OF THE WORD—The noun (ταπεινοφροσύνη, Heb. anā, Vulg. humilitas, Germ. Dumut) does not occur till it is employed commonly in the NT (Lightfoot on Ph 2<sup>7</sup>); it is 'a birth of the Gospel' (Trench, Syn. of the NT, § 42). In contrast to the low and servile sense attaching to it in classical writings, humility in the LXX, Apoc., and NT becomes the designation 'of the noblest and most necessary of all virtues' (Cremer's Lex.). It rests on a lowly and unpretending view of one's self, and is opposed to the workings or the ambitious spirit (μεγαλοφροσύνη, ὑψηλοφροσύνη). The term refers mainly to inward character, and sometimes to outward condition. Of humility as the animating principle of Christian character, Jesus Himself was the great example, being 'lowly in heart' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>), not merely in appearance like the professional religious leaders of the time. Pharisaism is the deadly enemy of humility or the religion of lowliness and meekness. The moral temper that inspired Christ's life and service is echoed by St. Paul, when he singles out the motive that prompted his labours ('serving the Lord with all lowliness of mind,' Ac 20<sup>19</sup>). Elsewhere humility is enjoined along with kindred graces, as the means of averting unholiness and of promoting cooperation in the Church and among the members of the Christian society (Mt 18<sup>4</sup> 23<sup>12</sup>, Eph 4<sup>2</sup>, Ph 2<sup>3</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup>). An exceptional use of the term occurs in Col 2<sup>18-23</sup>, where the Apostle guards his readers against the counterfeit of this virtue ('a voluntary humility'). In some instances the humble are viewed in the light of their earthly condition, which God may wonderfully raise and alter (Lk 1<sup>53</sup>), and which, notwithstanding its indignities and trials, should be borne submissively and cheerfully (Ja 1<sup>9</sup>). This class of sufferers corresponds to the afflicted and meek of the OT (Is 42, 43), and would be numerous among the peasantry or fellahin of an oppressed and lawless country (Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, s.v.). The 'poor in spirit' spoken of in the first of the Beatitudes (Mt 5<sup>3</sup>, cf. Lk 6<sup>20</sup>) are probably best understood as placed in such circumstances. In agreement with this, Ritschl (op. cit. infra) defines ταπεινοφροσύνη as 'that temper inclining to the service of God which accepts resignedly an oppressed and wretched condition.' The term, therefore, as one of deep import, is freely coined in the NT.

II. CONTRAST BETWEEN GREEK AND CHRISTIAN ETHICS—The rise of this grace creates an epoch. 'Humility is a vice with heathen moralists, but a virtue with Christian apostles' (Lightfoot on Col 2<sup>18</sup>). In particular, it marks the opposition to the Greek idea of 'high-mindedness' (art. 'Ethics,' by H. Sidgwick in Ency. Brit.), and the advance in ethical sentiment and the standard of judgment due to Christianity. A presentiment of the Christian virtue may be met with in Greek writers (see examples in Neander's Church History, vol. i. p. 26 [Eng. tr.], and in Trench, NT Syn.), but their use of ταπεινός in any noble sense is rare. The Greeks undoubtedly had then distinguishing qualities, but this was not one of them.

Cf. interesting note of conversation in Morley's Life of Gladstone, iii. p. 406. 'Mr G—I admit there is no Greek word of good credit for the virtue of humility. J. M.—ταπεινός? But that has an association of meanness. Mr. G—Yes, a shabby sort of humility. Humility as a sovereign grace is the creation of Christianity.'

Greek Ethics, as expressed and systematized by Aristotle, the ancient master of moral analysis and definition, fostered pride, the genius of later Stoicism, and regarded the humble as contemptible, mean-spirited, and without force or aspiration. Aristotle's picture of the 'great-souled' man and his exaggerated sense of self-importance have a certain air of loftiness which fall below the standard which the Christian is to recognize his duty to others, and to treat with consideration those who are intellectually and socially inferior. The conception of humility, therefore, as it controls the Christian, lies outside the system of Aristotle (see Nic. Eth. bk. iv. ch. 3 [Sir A. Grant, ed. vol. ii. pp. 72-78]). This difference between Greek and Christian ideas of greatness and humility is fundamental, and the change was brought about by Christ's revelation of the character of God. Of Aristotle's great-souled man it is said—'his movements are slow, his voice is deep, and his diction stately' (Grant, vol. ii. p. 77, note). This measured efflorescence of pride reappears in Christ's portraiture of the Pharisee in the temple; but the Publican, the opposite and acceptable type, shows how influential, in Christian experience, is the thought of God, and how closely connected are humility, prayer, and confession of sin. In accordance with Augustine's well-known saying (quoted by Calvin, Institutio, bk. ii. ch. 2), humility comes first, second, third, and always, among the precepts of the Christian religion, and it marks the cleavage between Greek and Christian ideals. The magnificent figure drawn by the Greek philosopher disappears, and instead, Christ presents the image of the little child (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>).

III. OUR LORD'S EXAMPLE AND TEACHING.—1. The great saying which goes to the root of the matter—'I am meek and lowly in heart' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>), has been variously interpreted (see art. by Herrmann, mentioned below), and even called in question as authentic. Martineau asks—'What meek and lowly soul was ever known to set itself forth as such and commend its own humility as the model for others?' and adds, 'did a Saviour bear such testimony of himself, his testimony would not be true' (Seat of Truth, 1844, p. 583). But the mode of speaking Christ adopted and the claim He put forward would not really seem incongruous in a 'Teacher of Israel' (Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. note ad loc.); and, besides, the objection reads a false tone into the original utterance, and ignores the special nature of Christ's consciousness. Our Lord was more than a 'meek and lowly soul,' and had reason for presenting Himself as a model and a winning type to humanity. His humility clothed and concealed His essential dignity, and in speaking as He did He was conscious at the same time of standing in a unique relation to God (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, cf. Jn 13<sup>3</sup>). Indeed, the union on Christ's part of 'unbounded personal pretensions' with an unconscious humility that regarded His importance to the world as 'an objective fact with which his own opinion of himself had nothing to do' (Ecce Homo, ch. 15) is undeniable, and reminds us that majesty and meekness were the two poles of His mysterious yet harmonious character. Christ's humility, however, does not rest on a phrase, but was carried out in the lowly setting of His earthly life. His cradle in the manger at Bethlehem and His subjection in the home at Nazareth, His quiet entrance, at the hands of the Baptist, on public life, His restraint in the use of His supernatural powers, and His dislike of consequent honour and fame, His frequent periods of retirement, His choice of followers and friends, His teaching with little children and humble men (Mt 11<sup>13-16</sup> and 23<sup>10-12</sup>), His appreciation of the smallest offering and the simplest service (Lk 21<sup>1-4</sup>, Mt 19<sup>27</sup>), and, finally, His submission to the experiences concentrated in the week of His Passion and Crucifixion, all attest the consistency of His character as One who was 'meek and lowly in heart,' and who, at every step of His career, plainly and profoundly 'humbled himself' (Ph 2<sup>8</sup>).

(1) Humility in relation to God, or the Law of Grace—We are introduced here to the most powerful among the motives to humility, and to a relation deeper than any that influences us in the society of our fellow-men. In Wendt's language: 'Humility is the conscious lowliness we feel before God in view of His superabundant love and holy majesty, and in contrast to our own unworthiness, guilt, and entire dependence on His grace' (The Teaching of Jesus, vol. 1, p. 341, note [Eng. tr.]). We cannot therefore exaggerate our worth or assert our claims before God: the part we play is that of 'unprofitable servants' who, after all their performances, should be filled neither with the sense of merit nor the spirit of boasting (Lk 17<sup>10</sup>). In the parable, which is a gem of teaching on this point, Jesus enforces on us the duty of humility towards God, the need of genuine self-abasement and confession of sin, as we see and feel our unworthiness in the Divine presence (Lk 18<sup>10-14</sup>). He rebukes the Pharisee as turning away from the simple and comforting words of the Pharisee, but gives the lowly words to the penitent publican who could not look up. For, as a fine Jewish saying puts it, 'While God despises what is broken among the animals, He loves in man a broken heart.' This is a fundamental law of the Kingdom of heaven and the indispensable condition of grace: 'for every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled, but he that humbleth himself shall be exalted' (cf. Pr 3<sup>34</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>6</sup>).

Prof. Dowden, in writing of Milton's view of the intercourse between God and the soul remarks:—'There are two humilities—that which bows and that which soars, the humility of a servant who looks down the humility of a son who gazes up. Milton's humility inaugurates itself in the effort to ascend. He would not prostitute himself in the presence of material symbols, but would enter as a glad child into the courts of heaven' (Puritan and Anglican, p. 167). This is the humility that Christ welcomes, and that makes religion not stiff and heavy with ceremonial, but simple, reverent, glad and pleasing to God. On no other terms is grace given or a lowliness with God possible. 'Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein' (Lk 14<sup>17</sup>).

(2) Humility in relation to men, or the Law of Service.—While it is true that humility 'is not primarily concerned with our relation to other men, but with our relation to God, and springs from an intellectually true view of that relation' (Illingworth, Christian Character, 1905, p. 27), yet its importance in regulating men's ordinary conduct and intercourse did not escape Christ's notice. His striking lessons on this subject were called for at the time, and are far from being exhausted, for it is still true that 'the really humble man is as great in the moral world as he is rare' (Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. on Mt 18<sup>4</sup>).

(a) The child, the unconscious type of humility (Mt 18<sup>1-4</sup>, Mk 9<sup>33-37</sup>).—This was Christ's object—caused frequent heart-aches. 'Who then is greatest?'—from examination of their Master's mind proceeded slowly. As He went on absorbed in the thought of His Father's will, His followers walked behind, each others' worst passions by raising questions of place and precedence. At their next interview the Master of men set a child in the midst of His disciples, and shamed them out of their unworthy temper. This is our Lord's rebuke of pride, rivalry, and ambition in their thousand forms, His reversal of our ordinary and selfish ideas of greatness, and His warning against the world's spirit of exclusiveness, intolerance, and class distinctions. The truly great is he who considers the claims of others and is slow to give offence (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>), and who on all occasions appears simple, teachable, unpretending, indifferent to questions of rank and superiority, and willing to humble himself 'as this little child.' It is only the childlike heart that is capable of true greatness (Mt 11<sup>25</sup>), and of finding the way into the Kingdom of Christendom, and this pattern of greatness is still fresh. Human character is once for all taught to mould itself after this original and lovely type. Christ first saw the hatefulness and unworkableness of a world without a child!

(b) The servant, the practical example of humility (Mt 20<sup>20-28</sup>, 23<sup>1-12</sup>, Mk 10<sup>35-45</sup>, Lk 22<sup>24-27</sup>, Jn 13<sup>1-17</sup>).—This ideal of service was presented on two distinct occasions: the one when the sons of Zebedee came forward with their request for the leading places in the Kingdom; and the other when the same love of dignity, and the jealous exclusion of each other's claims, gave rise to the strife that marred the Last Supper. In rebuking this spirit, Christ had in view not merely the mistaken tendencies of His disciples, who were already fired by the promise of individual 'thrones' (Lk 22<sup>30</sup>) dear to the Israelitish imagination, but also the popular and prevailing spirit of the time. The rulers of the Gentiles, and, in the exercise of a harsh authority, to 'lord it over them'; and the Pharisees, in their fondness for titles of honour, coveted influence and recognition as the 'great ones' of Jewish society. Christ required a new standard and line of conduct from His followers. 'Not so shall it be among you.' Henceforth, greatness lies in conformity to a higher than the heathen or Jewish type: 'but whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister,' etc. The principle of this law is not impersonal, but personal; the seat of authority in the Christian religion and in Christian morals is Christ: 'even as the Son of Man came,' etc. (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>). Finally, in one concrete act, Christ gave an illustration of the great principle He enunciated, when, at the Passover meal, He rose and 'took a towel and girded himself,' and washed the disciples' feet. This astonishing incident left an ineffaceable impression (1 P 5<sup>6</sup>), and warranted the literal saying: 'I am in the midst of you as he that serveth' (Lk 22<sup>27</sup>). Such an ideal and example of service have slowly effected a revolution in the moral sentiment and practice of mankind. We may add, if Christ's setting forth of the child was evidence of His originality as a teacher, the substitution of the servant for the ruler was a no less striking proof of the uniqueness of His insight and methods.

'It is one of the achievements of Jesus that He introduced into the world a new ideal of greatness, such an ideal as men had never dreamed of' (D. Smith, The Days of His Flesh, 1906, p. 442. Cf. Herrmann in art. below: 'Im NT ist ohne Zweifel der Eindruck wiedergegeben dass Jesus in dieser Beziehung seinen Jüngern etwas völlig Neues gegeben hat').

Some ideals are too airy and remote to come into touch with actual experience and practice, but Christ's Law of Service is capable of daily realization, and is within the reach of every one. It is open to all to do some simple deed of kindness, helpfulness, and self-denial, and no action inspired by Christ-like love and humility will pass unnoticed or unrewarded by the gracious Master and great Servant of all (Mt 25<sup>30</sup>).

IV. CHARACTERISTICS AND RELATIONSHIPS.—A few further points of general and practical interest are suggested by this subject, and may be briefly touched on.

1. Humility and character.—In ordinary experience, humility is related to sin and penitence, and marks the feeling of unworthiness in the light of the immutable moral ideal. In presence of the holy revelation of the Son of God, conscience becomes sensitive, and the sense of guilt, as in the case of Peter (Lk 5<sup>8</sup>), weighs men down. 'This, however, is not one of the essential conditions of humility, for we know that humility was also an element in Christ's character' (Ritschl). The greatness of the Baptist was rooted in his humility and utter freedom from jealousy (Jn 3<sup>27 30</sup>), and this grace has been the soil and safety of saints ever since. Keble treated others with a 'humbling humility' (Lock's Life, p. 233. Cf. MacEwen's Life of Cairns, p. 600. 'The first personal impression that he made on all who met him was one of wonder at his humility'). The child, to which Christ pointed, represents humility as part of the essence and permanence of Christian character, and remains an immortal type, preserving the wonder and bloom of the moral world.

2. Humility and kindred virtues.—No Christian grace is isolated or thrives alone. Humility is 'part of a great moral whole. Instead of promoting, it promotes the growth of virtues unlike yet not unfriendly to itself' (Liddon on 'Humility and Action' in University Sermons). Thus it is closely connected with Truth, for humility or confession that does not rest on the recognition of facts is insincere and worthless. It is inspired by Love; ministering love appears always in the guise of humility. W. Channing sees on humility as its foundation. Truth and Patience expresses along with humility the practical virtue of the Christian religion, especially called for and tested in the world (Ritschl).

3. Humility and asceticism.—It has been the tendency of asceticism in theology and piety to make humility the result of self-contemplation, arrived at by the soul's reaction upon itself. This gives rise to artificial and extreme methods of discipline, and misses the healthy objectivity of the life that forgets self in the consideration and service of others (see Herrmann's art. for vigorous criticism of this tendency and ideal of asceticism, derived from Augustine and Bernard. Cf. Harnack's History of Dogma (Eng. tr.), vi. p. 10, note). Humility is 'the eye which sees everything except itself' (quoted in Ritschl). Work and the school of life are the best discipline of humility, as of the other virtues.

'We are to respect our responsibilities,' wrote Mr Gladstone, 'not ourselves. We are to respect the duties of which we are capable, but not our capabilities simply considered. There is to be no complacent self-contemplation, beaming upon itself. When self is viewed, it must always be in the most intimate connexion with its purposes' (Morley's Life, i. 214).

On the other hand, the externalizing of humility and the danger of parading it in rules and economies that lead to self humiliation must equally be avoided. Christ and His Apostles discountenanced all needless self-consciousness and show of virtue (Mt 6<sup>16</sup>, Col 2<sup>3</sup>). Cf. Ritschl: 'Even in ascetic forms of worship there is no particular form of expression necessary to humility'.

4. Humility and individuality.—This virtue is not to be cultivated to the neglect of manliness or at the expense of loyalty to religious and moral principle (Mt 10<sup>32</sup>). Christ honours the spirit of energy and enterprise in us, and blames the hiding of our talents and the misuse of our opportunities through diffidence or cowardice (Mt 25<sup>14ff</sup>). The manly and energetic character of the centurion, as shown in his faith, was doubtless as pleasing to Jesus as the soldier's reverence and humbleness of address (Lk 7<sup>9</sup>). Humility or the fear of God should banish all unworthy fear. Christ's unflinching exposure of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23) calls us to be courageous in adherence to truth and righteousness, and in view of evil and opposition, however powerful. It was a wholesome saying of the Rabbis: 'The disciple of the wise should have sufficient pride to stand in defence of the Law he represents.' Self-assertion has therefore no legitimate sphere, and the 'salt' of individuality in religion and in society should in no wise be lost. There is the danger, however, of exaggerating our own view and importance: 'it always needs much grace to see what other people are, and to keep a sense of moral proportion' (Dodd's Expos. Gr. Test on Ro 12<sup>3</sup>). In the presence of the Christian Church to society, and to reconcile conflicting interests, it requires humility 'to adjust men in due order for the purposes of life' (T. B. Strong's Christian Ethics, Bampton Lect. 1895, p. 127).

5. Humility and science.—Christ's interview with Nicodemus teaches that the assumption of knowledge ('we know,' Jn 3<sup>2</sup>) may cover 'wisdom and confusion. The "wise and" (Mt 11<sup>26</sup>) receive no new light: self-satisfied pride and prejudice are the foes of spiritual enlightenment and intellectual advance. The true student and investigator of nature must still feel, like Newton, that, notwithstanding his discoveries and attainments, the great ocean of truth is undiscovered before him. Docility, not dogmatism, is the mark of the inquirer, and the means of intellectual development. In this important and ever-changing region of science, R. H. Hutton has well observed that humility 'means the docility of learners towards a teacher infinitely above them,' and that it requires wisdom to see the true relations between different kinds of knowledge, and to keep physical knowledge from being turned to a false and dangerous use in the sphere of moral truth. Here also the master of truth and knowledge must take the place of a servant, and illustrate his greatness by his lowliness. Science is humble only when it is in the presence of its ignorance alike to help it to know and to lord it over them' (Essay on 'The Humility of Science' in Religious and Scientific Thought, 1901). So, too, it is the function of this indispensable and crowning grace.

HUMOUR.—Humour in its highest form is the sign of a mind at peace in itself, for which the contrasts and contradictions of life have ceased to jar, though they have not ceased to be; which accepts them as necessary and not without meaning and value, indeed as giving an added charm to life, because it looks at them from a point above them. In other words, humour is the faculty which lets a man see what Plato calls 'the whole tragedy and comedy of life' (Philebus, 50 B)—the one in the other, comedy in tragedy, tragedy in comedy.

The Gospels make it plain that the environment of Jesus was quite a normal one. He had lived among men who worked, played, and talked with men from infancy to manhood, and was familiar with the language of men and with their habits of mind. Hence it may be noticed that in speaking to men He uses the language of reality and experience. His words are stamped as His own by their delicate ease, which implies sensibility to every real aspect of the matter in hand, a sense of mastery and peace. There lay a broad contrast between the common sense His hearers had gathered from experience and the moral ideals which He propounded, and it is quite clear that this contrast did not escape Him, nor can He have failed to see that, judged by the ordinary common sense of men, His words were absurd. With this consciousness of the absurdity and the incongruity of the value of what He said, He bade men which 'turn the one on the other cheek' (Mt 5<sup>39</sup>), go 'two miles' with the man who exacted one (v<sup>41</sup>), yield the cloak to him who took the coat (v<sup>40</sup>),—in fact, His followers were asked to be 'lambs,' missionaries 'among wolves' (Mt 10<sup>16</sup>, Lk 10<sup>3</sup>), and to 'leap for joy' when they were ill treated (Lk 6<sup>23</sup>). In all these sayings there is obvious contradiction between the surface value and the thought beneath.

Again, there is abundant evidence of the use of the grotesque by Jesus—a use natural to homely and friendly talk. Would a father, for example, offer a hungry child a stone instead of bread, a snake instead of a fish, a scorpion instead of an egg (Mt 7<sup>9, 10</sup>, Lk 11<sup>11, 12</sup>)? The Pharisee, He says, is like a man who cleans the outside of his cup and forgets that he drinks from the inside (Mt 23<sup>26</sup>). Do men, He asks, 'gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?' (Mt 7<sup>18</sup>). He urges His hearers not to cast their 'pearls before swine' (Mt 7<sup>6</sup>). The idea of having 'a beam in one's own eye' is grotesque as He meant it to be (Mt 7<sup>3-5</sup>). When He bade His hearers take no care for the morrow, because caring for the morrow was the distinguishing mark of the Gentile as contrasted with the Jew (Mt 6<sup>32</sup>), He spoke with full knowledge of Jewish character, and must have known that His hearers would smile. 'Do not even the publicans so?' (Mt 5<sup>47</sup>), is an instance of reductio ad absurdum. 'Is it lawful on the Sabbath days to do evil or to do good?' (Lk 6<sup>9</sup>), was, His critics on the spot would feel, an absurd question except that it caught them in a dilemma. Similarly, to ask the rich young ruler if he had kept the commandments, 'Thou shalt not kill,' etc., must have struck the onlooker as odd, and Jesus can hardly have failed to feel this (Mk 10<sup>20</sup>). The 'camel that follows, of the camel and the needle's eye, shows recourse to the grotesque again (Mk 10<sup>25</sup>). It should be remembered that Jesus' hearers were not unfamiliar with religious teaching given in ironic form.

There is humour in the appeal to the practice of the Egyptians and Syrians of calling their tyrannic and worthless rulers Euergetes, 'Benefactor' (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>); and in the accompanying suggestion that the real chief among Christ's followers is 'he that doth serve' (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>), there is a conscious reversal of ordinary notions, which would make the hearers smile even while they realized the serious meaning. There is a hint of playfulness in the promise that Peter shall 'catch men' (Lk 5<sup>10</sup>). The question put to the rich fool, 'Then whose shall those things be?' (Lk 12<sup>20</sup>), has a grim touch,—there is a suggestion in it of reckonings grievously wrong; and something of the kind lurks in the tale of the man who built his house on the sand—a tale told, it must be remembered, by one who had been a τεκτων (Mt 7<sup>24</sup>). There are other stories, too, of people of pretension who are ludicrously out in their reckonings: of the king who went to war with a light heart (Lk 14<sup>28</sup>), and the man who could not finish his tower (v<sup>28</sup>). There is surely grim humour also in the words, 'It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem' (Lk 13<sup>34</sup>).

In conclusion, there are in the recorded sayings of Jesus many traces of their origin in conversation. He is a man speaking to men in the language of men, and pathos, contrast, humour, and spontaneity are the natural and pleasant marks of that language. He, like all great teachers, speaks from the abundance of His heart (Mt 12<sup>34</sup>), and a smile is felt in His words, as in the words of all who see contradiction without loss of inner peace. T. R. GLOVER.

HUNGER.—The substantive 'hunger' (EV) is the equivalent of a Greek word (λιμός) which in the NT is used either of the suffering of an individual (Lk 15<sup>17</sup>, cf. 2 Co 11<sup>27</sup>), or, more generally, of the widespread plague of famine (cf. Mk 13<sup>8</sup>, Lk 4<sup>23</sup> etc.; see Blass' Gram. of NT Greek, p. 299, for the combination λοιμοὶ καὶ λιμοὶ [pestilences]). The more frequently occurring verb is an altogether different word (πενεῖν), and it is sometimes found where we might expect λιμός or its cognates (Mt 5<sup>6</sup> and Lk 6<sup>21</sup>). The latter occurs in but 6 places in the Gospels, while the former is found no fewer than 17 times.

There is, perhaps, no feature of Jesus' human experience so vividly instructive as that which is portrayed for us in the simple incidental expression 'He hungered' (Mt 4<sup>2</sup>=Lk 4<sup>2</sup>, Mt 21<sup>18</sup>=Mk 11<sup>1</sup>). This is noted twice by the Synoptists; and though we have no such direct statement by St. John, we are not left by the latter without a reference to this side of 'the humiliation of Christ.' The story of Jesus' conversation with the woman of Samaria conveys the same impression as to the physical limitations to which He was subject with which we are struck in the Synoptic writings. The anxiety of the disciples for the satisfaction of their Master's needs (Jn 4<sup>41</sup> Παῖσι' ὥστε) explains at least one cause of the bodily weakness which compelled Him to rest 'thus by the well.'

It is of the greatest interest to notice that, on the two occasions when it is definitely stated that Jesus suffered the pang of hunger, the writer has pointedly attached to the narrative a lesson of psychological and spiritual value. St. Matthew and St. Luke both inform us not only that on the completion of His forty days' fast 'he hungered'; they also tell us that the Tempter attacked Him on the side of His consequent weakness. 'If thou art the Son of God, command that these stones become bread' (Mt 4<sup>3</sup>, cf. the stronger and more graphic mould in which St. Luke casts the narrative by adopting the singular τῷ λίθῳ τούτῳ for οἱ λίθοι οὗτοι and ἡ ἄρτος for ἄρτοι, Lk 4<sup>3</sup>), expresses the subtle nature of this temptation in a manner which is profoundly in keeping with all human experience (see F. W. Robertson's sermon on 'Elijah, second series').

It is surely more rational to accept the Synoptic statement that this was, in point of fact, the first of the three temptations, for the reason given above, than to adopt the order given in the Gospel according to the Hebrews as O. Holtzmann is inclined to do (cf. his Leben Jesu, Eng. tr. pp. 94 and 140-150). The author of this Gospel places the temptation by hunger after that on the high mountain, which he puts first in the series. Holtzmann, moreover, argues that the first temptation, according to the First and Third Evangelists, occurred last of all. Among other reasons for this inversion he bases his statement on the fact that Jesus met the suggestion to convert the stone into a loaf by a quotation taken from Dt 8<sup>3</sup>, whereas His answers to the other two are quotations from an earlier part of the same book (Dt 6<sup>13</sup> and 6<sup>16</sup>). To the present writer this looks like trifling with the evidence, and seems to expose this author to the charge of adopting any statement as having prima facie claims to being historical provided it be a contradiction of the sacred books. The very simplicity of the narratives as we have them forbids us to assume that the writers manufactured an order by means of 'a gradation as regards localities,' or by presenting a series of grand climacterics—'satisfaction of hunger, miraculous action, and' [For the curious passage in the αὐτὸς ὁ Σωτὴρ ἔστιν ἡμεῖς ἐκείνους καὶ ἡμεῖς ἡμεῖς τοῦ ἀγίου πνεύματος ἐν αὐτῷ τῷ πνεύματι καὶ ἐν τῷ πνεύματι which makes Mt Tabor the scene of t) in Joann tom ii § 6f, given in mentum, p. 77. The same passage is quoted more than once by Jerome, who each time refers it to the Evangelium quod secundum (uxta) Hebraeos (e.g. in Ls 15<sup>11</sup>)]

The other recorded occasion on which Jesus suffered from hunger was at the end of His ministry, and during that week when His last conflict with the religious authorities of His nation culminated in His Passion and Death. The incident affords an example of the way in which the Evangelists, in their choice of literary material, were guided to subordinate the selection of historical facts to the moral and spiritual importance attaching to them. Neither St. Matthew nor St. Mark was deterred by the story of the fruitless fig-tree by the harshness and petulance should moral dignity of their Master. Their portrait of Him was too faithful and too keen to permit any suggestion, to themselves at least, of an unworthy display, in an angry moment, of thaumaturgical energy. See art. FIG-TREE.

The union between Christ and His people, so on by Jesus as indispensable to His great eschatological discourse. The sufferings of redeemed humanity are His sufferings, and the loving service, which clothes the naked and feeds the hungry, is hallowed because it is done, not merely in His cause, but for Himself (Mt 25<sup>36ff</sup>, cf. 10<sup>40ff</sup>). There is something more in these words than an expression of sympathy by a brother who has himself experienced deprivation and suffering (cf. He 4<sup>15</sup>), and who feels for one who is passing through similar stages. We have in them a vivid portraiture of that essential and spiritual oneness upon which the writer of the Fourth Gospel lays such emphasis (cf. Jn 14<sup>20</sup> 17<sup>21, 23, 26</sup> etc.; see also Ac 9<sup>5</sup> Ἐγὼ εἰμι Ἰησοῦς ὃν σὺ δὲ δώκεας).

It is not without significance that not only have we this mystic union adumbrated in the story which is elaborated and, in the Evangelium, by St. John; we have also recorded in the Evangelium of St. John an incident illustrative of that complete companionship in privations as well as in privileges which He demanded as the essence of discipleship from the scribe who would follow Him whithersoever He went (Lk 9<sup>58</sup> = Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, cf. Mt 10<sup>38</sup> 16<sup>24</sup>, Lk 9<sup>23</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34</sup> etc.). The fact that the disciples suffered hunger is specifically mentioned by St. Matthew, though it is only to be inferred from the parallel passages in the other two Synoptists (cf. Mk 2<sup>23ff</sup> = Mt 12<sup>1ff</sup> = Lk 6<sup>1ff</sup>). On this occasion Jesus takes advantage of the opportunity afforded by the carping criticism of the Pharisees to emphasize, by an appeal to the case of the hungry David, His teaching on the Sabbath question. A fine touch is added by each of the Synoptists which beautifully illustrates the spirit of comradeship existing between Jesus and His disciples. The touch is incidental, and therefore the more effective. Each of the writers expressly states that it was the disciples who were plucking the ears of corn and not Jesus, though each commences the narrative by making Jesus the subject of the story (ἐπορεύθη δὲ Ἰησοῦς, καὶ ἄλλοι, Mt 12<sup>1</sup>; ... αὐτὸν διαπορεύεσθαι, Mk 2<sup>23</sup>, Lk 6<sup>1</sup>). It was through the disciples that the Pharisees attacked Him (cf., however, Lk 6<sup>3</sup>); and it was in their defence that Jesus met them with the unanswerable argument taken from their own armoury—the OT.

It will not surprise us to find Jesus the idea of physical hunger to the spirit as this habit of transposition forms His teaching. Just as in man's physical life hunger is a sign of health, and becomes an evil only when its cravings cannot be satisfied, so Jesus counts those blessed whose soul's health is robust enough to cause them to cry out from hunger after righteousness (note the peculiar construction which has the accusative τὴν δικαιοσύνην after πεινῶντες instead of the genitive of classical writers, cf. Od. xx. 137; Xen. Cyr. viii. iii. 39; Plato, Rep. 521 A; see Blass' Grammar of NT Greek, p. 89 f.; and Liddell and Scott's Lexicon). That need, because it is felt, shall be met in the fullest possible way, hence their blessedness (οἱ αὐτοὶ χορτασθήσονται, Mt 5<sup>6</sup>; cf. Lk 6<sup>21</sup>).

On the other hand, they are to be pitied whose spiritual appetite is so deranged that they feel no need at all, because the day shall come when they must feel, and the pangs of hunger shall remain without hope of alleviation (οἱ πεινάσετε, Lk 6<sup>26</sup>). That He possessed the power of permanently satisfying the deepest needs of the human soul, Jesus asserts on more than one occasion (Jn 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). In the assurances we may see the profoundest of the words of the Evangelium: 'The hungry he hath filled with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away' (Lk 1<sup>3</sup>), which are but the echo of the words in which the Psalmist long before had clothed his experience (Ps 107<sup>9</sup>).

J. R. WILLIS

HUSBAND (ἀνὴρ).—Betrothal and marriage were virtually one among the Jews. The betrothal consisted in the simple act, on the part of the bridegroom or his deputy, of giving to the bride or her representative a written engagement, in the presence of two witnesses, or a piece of money, large or small, with the words, 'Be thou consecrated unto me.' Like itself, of which it was the initiatory step, was dissolved only by death or divorce. Under the Mosaic Law, the marriage tie was indissoluble, and divorces seem to have been unknown. During the period of the later prophets the ethical standard was advanced ('God hates putting away,' Mal. 2<sup>16</sup>). Himself utterly set aside the law of Moses, and limited the dissolution of the marriage tie to the one cause of adultery; and in so doing He apparently put the two sexes on the same plane (Mk 10<sup>11</sup>). The mercy of Christ towards sinners against the law of sexual purity as laid down by Himself is, however, illustrated in His treatment of the woman taken in adultery (Jn 4<sup>16-18</sup>), and in that of the woman taken in adultery (8<sup>4-11</sup>).

In Mt 1<sup>16-19</sup> Joseph is called 'the husband' of Mary, indicating, in connexion with v. 23, that true marital relations existed between them. This is in evident conflict with the Apocrypha, which assigns to Joseph the place of a guardian rather than that of a true husband, in order to uphold the perpetual virginity of Mary. HUSBANDMAN (γεωργός).—Jesus knew well the life of the fields. His keen eye for illustrations fell readily on the most fundamental of occupations; one universal since the primeval days when simple patriarchs began to be husbandmen, and princes digged at the up-springing well ('which the nobles of the people delved, with the sceptre and with their staves,' Nu 21<sup>18</sup> RV) Agriculture, in Israel's best days, had been the chief employment, and still from out the scattered villages men were to be seen at work upon the cloiftlike patches. As sure token of happy and successful labours, the plain was verdant with the growing grain, the vines hung graceful from the terraced slope. The human mind never fails to be arrested in religious mood by the mystic forces of nature; and in the case of the Jews there was this added discipline, that Scripture, read steadily in their hearing, teemed with references to the tilling of the soil. Ready to the lips of Jesus, therefore, was an allusive speech which should prove powerful in appeal to educated and uneducated alike. The way into the popular sentiment was clear for Him. People were at least grounded in the elements of literary thought. On the growth of the great Kingdom He profitably under the familiar images of seed-time and harvest, tree or plant culture in their gardens, or the ongoings in their season of the workers in the vineyard on the hill.

What probably commended this line of teaching to Jesus, however, was the fact that husbandry suggests, in singular fashion, the co-ordination of man's activity with God's. Without, on the one hand, what is graciously supplied to us—soil and seed, rain and sunshine—man's labour could be of no avail; yet, on the other hand, without that labour well directed, mankind would perish. The lesson is writ large in cultivated fields that faith and hope, zeal and patience, have a reward assured which comes immediate from the hand of God. Further, this rural imagery of Jesus met the fact that the minds hearing Him were not all equally ready to see the truth in His light. For such persons, pictures from the outer and familiar realm stored up material for self-culture in the future. And nothing better certifies the supreme instinct of the Master than this, that the thousand revelations of the natural science of to-day illustrate only the more those spiritual principles and universal laws of the unseen which He was wont to enforce by reference to phenomena around Him as He spoke.

The slightest glances recorded of Jesus in this realm are fairly numerous. Compare the reference to plants and trees (Mt 7<sup>16-20</sup> 12<sup>33</sup>, Lk 6<sup>43-45</sup>), the putting of the hand to the plough (Lk 9<sup>62</sup>), the sowing of salt to the land (Mt 5<sup>13</sup>, Lk 14<sup>35</sup>), the ox fallen into the pit (Lk 14<sup>35</sup>), the action of the airs of heaven (Lk 12<sup>55</sup>, Jn 3<sup>8</sup>), the glowing or beclouded sky (Mt 16<sup>2-3</sup>, Lk 12<sup>54</sup>), the buyer gone to survey his piece of ground (Lk 14<sup>13</sup>), or busy testing his new teams (v<sup>19</sup>), the deeply-suggestive corn of wheat (Jn 12<sup>24</sup>), the sifting of the same (Lk 22<sup>31</sup>), the tenant counting up his measures (Lk 16<sup>7</sup>), labourers needed for the plentiful harvest (Mt 9<sup>37-38</sup>, Lk 10<sup>2</sup>), the growing whiteness of the crops (Jn 4<sup>38</sup>), the tattered twain of field workers (Mt 24<sup>40</sup>, Lk 17<sup>35</sup>), and the beautiful picture of the fig-tree at the dinner putting forth leaves upon its boughs (Mt 24<sup>32</sup>, Lk 21<sup>29</sup>).

But chiefly in the exquisite parables do we see that power of observation in the material world which makes Jesus so engaging as a child of nature who lived much, and lived free, in the open air of Palestine. As we move with Him by the highways and the hedges, we descry in one field the servant ploughing or feeding cattle (Lk 17<sup>7</sup>), in another the well-remembered spot where gleams of joy lit up the rustic eyes who happened upon hid treasure (Mt 13<sup>44</sup>). Here we have the corn-lands green with the sprouting of the tiny blade (Mk 4<sup>26-29</sup>), tangled betimes with the tares (Mt 13<sup>25</sup>); there the rocky and the thorn-choked patches (Mk 4<sup>3-7</sup>); and over all the hovering birds (v<sup>4</sup>), ready to devour the precious seed. We see the labourers standing in the market-place for hire (Mt 20<sup>1</sup>), the farmer critical about his barns (Lk 12<sup>17</sup>), the shepherd searching the grassy plateau for his sheep (Mt 18<sup>12</sup>). Men are working in the clumps of vines (Mt 21<sup>28</sup>), from which the wine-press peeps (Mk 12<sup>1</sup>), and where the watch-tower stands upon its bolder cogn (v<sup>1</sup>). See the garden where the tall mustard grows (Lk 13<sup>19</sup>), and yonder the forlorn fig-tree (v<sup>6</sup>) threatened with the axe. The whole world of nature, the varied scenes of toil, are laid amply under contribution, made the emblems and the witness of the highest things of the Spirit. (See art. VINE (ALLEGORY OF) for discourse upon the Vine and the Branches, Jn 15<sup>1-8</sup>, where the Father is the Husbandman; cf also art. AGRICULTURE.)

One parable must be specially noted—the story of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mt 21<sup>33-43</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1-9</sup>, Lk 20<sup>9-13</sup>), which is an incisive review of God's relations with His people. Endless pains had been taken (Mk 12<sup>1</sup>) with the vineyard of the Kingdom, yet when, after messenger came seeking fruit in its name, they had been sent empty away, and contumeliously treated—one beaten, another wounded, a third killed (vv<sup>2-5</sup>). Nowhere does Jesus put Himself more clearly in line with the prophets. As the gloomy night fast around His own head, He feels of fate with them. In the passage He carries, indeed, the history of Israel's shameful conduct not only to the days of the Baptist, but even a little beyond the moment of utterance. We have insight into the marvellous composure of the heart of Jesus as He pictures His own case in the person of the one son, well beloved, who was cast out, bruised and bleeding, his body soon to be cold in death upon the highway (v<sup>8</sup>). Thus, in tragic fashion, He broadens the charge against His opponents, with their complacent jealousy (v<sup>7</sup>), by proving their conduct to be of a piece with Israel's cruel treatment of speakers for God in the past. The note of severity and moral indignation is unmistakable, but it is blended with one of wistful sadness. Not that His own approaching death troubles Him; He fears not as He enters into the cloud, and is ready to give His life as covenant blood for the setting up of the Kingdom. But His countrymen's folly, and the terrible crisis at hand for the State, weigh heavy on His spirit. Their doom, He concludes, is written with God's own finger on the wall, for those who had the eyes to see: 'He will come, and destroy the husbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others' (v<sup>9</sup>).

GEORGE MURRAY.

HUSKS—The only mention of husks (κερία, so called from their shape, which resembles 'horns') occurs in Lk 15<sup>16</sup>. Husks were the pods of the carob-tree, which is also known as the locust-tree (Ceratonia siliqua). This tree, which is common in Palestine, belongs to the order Leguminosae and is an evergreen. It attains to a height of about 30 feet, and has a dense foliage. Its leaves are of a dark, glossy green. The pods are from 6 to 10 inches in length and 1 in breadth. They contain a thick, sweet pulp, not unpleasant to the palate, and are used as food for pigs and horses. They are also, because of their cheapness, eaten by the very poor.

Some have identified the pods of the carob with the 'locusts' (ἀκρίδες) which John the Baptist ate (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>). It is true they are sometimes called 'St. John's bread,' this name having been given to them by the monks of Palestine or by 'pious pilgrims' (Thomson, LB p 655), but there can be little doubt that the Baptist's food was not carob-pods, due influence, when ὡσαννά (which in its H. is really a cry addressed to God, 'Save now!') was misunderstood as a shout of homage or greeting—'Hail!' or 'Glory to.' See Dalman, Words of Jesus (Eng. tr.), p. 220 f.

Cheyne's explanation, Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Hosanna,' is hardly convincing. He notes on Mt 21:12 (Hosanna H. ed. v. paraphrases, 'Save us, we beseech Thee, O Thou [who dwellest] in the highest,' taking in τοῖς ὑψίστοις as a substitute for the Divine name. This is barely possible.

The Hosanna-cry (cf. Ps 118<sup>25f</sup>) and the palm branches naturally suggest the Feast of Tabernacles, with the ceremonies of which they were most closely associated (esp. in the 'Hosanna' processions of the Festival).* It seems, however, that such processions might be extemporized for other occasions of a joyous character (cf. 1 Mac 13<sup>3</sup>, 2 Mac 10<sup>7</sup>), and this was the case in the scene described in the Gospels.

Wunsche, indeed (Erläuterungen der Evangelien aus Talmud und Midrash, p. 241), supposes that a confusion has arisen in the Gospel accounts between Tabernacles and Passover, but this is unnecessary. It is noteworthy that there seem to be traces in the Midrash on the Psalms of the Messianic interpretation of Ps. 118<sup>25f</sup>.

HYPOCRISY.—

s), 'hypocrite' (ὑποκριτής), 'act the In the NT the verb appears only in Lk 20-21, ὑποκριτής only in the Synopp, but fifteen times in Mt. alone, ὑποκριτής once in Mt. (23<sup>28</sup>), once in Mk (12<sup>15</sup>), once in Lk (12<sup>1</sup>), and also in Gal 2<sup>13</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>, and 1 P 2<sup>1</sup>. The root meaning of the word is to distinguish between things. From this it easily came to mean to answer, and By what link of association it came to is less easy to determine. In this sense it is used by the Attic writers of orators as of actors. Soon it was restricted to ge, and then, by a process repeated in other languages, was used for acting a part, and so for acting a part for a base end, for giving oneself out to be what one knew one ought to be, but had no intention of becoming.

In the Apoc the word is found in this sense of acting a part, of feigning, and with varying shades of moral obliquity. In 2 Mac 6:21-25, Eleazar is urged to eat his own meat while feigning to eat the swine's flesh. In 12:10-12, though the deception is urged as a necessary evil, it is said that the word already had been used in 12:10-12. In Sir 32:15, as the opposite to fearing God and seeking the law, it is used almost exactly as in the NT. The LXX uses the word in Job 34:30 and 36:13, to translate ḥāṣ. In the first passage, it is an impiety which lays snares, in the second, it is an impiety of the heart which cherishes an inward bitterness against God. Here we have the true ancestry of the NT usage, which always includes the idea of impiety, of shutting out God and resolutely living in the darkness apart from Him. But the NT usage is also influenced by ἁλίσ, though the LXX translates that word by δολεῖν or δολοῦν. From the root idea of smoothness it came to be employed for flattery, and so for all kinds of deception. The kinship of the two words ἁλίσ and ἁλίσ may be seen in Dan 1:2 where those who are basely disloyal to the covenant expose themselves to the danger of being led into a false position towards God by smooth deceptions.

Yet the conception of this vice in the popular mind of His time, to which our Lord appealed, was less determined by any than by the general teaching of the. They have smooth lips, and their profession is far beyond their performance (12<sup>3</sup>). They imagine that wickedness can be shut up in the heart. They are brazen towards God, and deceitful towards men. They cease to hate evil and take to planning it. Above all, they attempt to deceive God (78<sup>36</sup>). Hypocrisy is a thing God cannot tolerate (Job 22:26), and which He is content to punish. Idolatry is a sort of hypocrisy from which the perfect, the whole-hearted, with the classical passage for a hypocrite and knows none of the duties of every prophet has occasion to speak against the evil. All false prophecy was hypocrisy—the saying of the thing that pleased, and not. . . was true. The person most deceived was the (Is 33:14-15, Job 27<sup>8</sup>), but he was also a danger to the society in which he lived (Job 15:34). To all the true prophets he was the supreme the same stress upon hypocrisy, as the opposite. There are . . . appear before God—the scoffer, the hypocrite, . . . slanderer! . . . all vices of falsehood. God hates him who speaks one way with the mouth and another way with the heart. A society which has hypocrites for its members is abominable and falls into exile.

Hypocrisy was plainly no new vice in our Lord's time, but an ancient heritage into which the Pharisees entered. How, then, are we to account for the sudden prominence to which it is raised? No vice is held up to such unenviable notoriety in the Synoptics, no other combated with the same direct denunciation, while in John ὁ ψεύδης is a conception only a little wider than ὑποκριτής, and has the same condemnation. First of all, just because it is a sin of deception, it is . . . exposed, as if our Lord would give a . . . demonstration that there is nothing hidden that shall not be made known. A sin which glories in misleading an opponent by smooth flatteries (Mt 22<sup>6</sup>, which goes about in long robes and seeks to be . . . by public salutations, which takes its honour for granted and cloaks oppressive avarice with long prayers (Mk 12:38-40), which cleanses the outside of the cup and platters while leaving them full of extortion and wickedness, which makes men hidden tombs, fair without and foul within (Lk 11<sup>44</sup>), is met, as no other sin can be, by exposure.

Then the sin which lives by corrupting the conscience has cut itself off from the usual appeal of holiness and love by which our Lord seeks to win men from other sins. It substitutes traditional practice for duties (Mt 15<sup>9</sup>); it uses minutiae of . . . rule as a substitute for . . . and the love of God (Lk 11<sup>42</sup>); it cannot . . . truth, because its eye is on man and not on God (Jn 5<sup>44</sup>); it makes inquiries not in order to believe the truth, but in order to refute it (9<sup>27-28</sup>); and it is chained to its error by a confident assurance that it alone is right (9<sup>41</sup>). The only way of appeal left is direct denunciation.

Further, sin is, in a pre-eminent degree, the foe of all truth. The hypocrite is in a special sense the child of the father of lies (Jn 8<sup>44</sup>). Hypocrisy is not a mere sin of impulse, but is the . . . of everything by which we may lay hold of . . . and be delivered. As surely as faith reaches out towards truth, hypocrisy struggles against it. Not being able to live with truth, it can defend itself only by persecution. 'Ye seek to kill me because my testimony is for the course in you' (8<sup>27</sup>). The same spirit made our fathers kill the prophets as a natural consequence of rejecting their message, and it is only another . . . which makes the descendants repudiate . . . deeds while . . . fathers' spirit. The justification of . . . assault on the Pharisees in Mt 23, is that, sitting in Moses' seat, they show a spirit with which truth cannot dwell. The deep shadow is always in the bright sunlight and the deep corruption is always in the place of opportunity. The Pharisees neither enter the Kingdom nor suffer others to enter. They are religiously zealous, but in a bad cause. They pervert truth, debate it, fight against it. No appeal can touch them, and in the end their house is left to them desolate.

Then the evil of hypocrisy is more than negative. It does not stop with pretending to need signs, while it pays no attention to the evidence it has, and would be convinced by no evidence (Mt 16<sup>3-4</sup>). Hypocrisy is also an active leaven—a dangerous assimilative principle—against the corruption of which no warning can be too ample. It is more than the shadow of truth, the absence of faith. It definitely works to debase the whole man, just as faith works to regenerate him. In addition to refusing to enter in, it takes away the key of knowledge (Lk 11<sup>22</sup>). Against everything connected with the Kingdom of Heaven it is actively hostile.

In the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6<sup>1-18</sup>) it is set over against the Kingdom of Heaven, its opposite and its negation. In the realm of hypocrisy appearances meet every requirement; in the Kingdom of Heaven all is judged by the heart. Christ says, the issues of life are out of the heart alone; hypocrisy says, they are mainly out of ceremonies. Of the whole standard of the Kingdom of Heaven hypocrisy is the daily practical denial—its broad result being the denial of the Kingdom of Heaven. The Scribes and Pharisees, who are set over against it, shall in no wise enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. So alien is the whole unreal pretence of religion, that there is a good secrecy at the other extreme from it. Deliberate care must be taken that one's righteousness be not done in the public eye. Not only is no trumpet to be sounded before us in the street; our praise is not even to find an echo in our own heart. Not only may prayer never be used for show; true prayer is with ourselves and our Father in secret alone. Not only may we not fast with a sad countenance; the head is to be anointed and the face washed as on a day of festival. Hypocrisy is the opposite of that singleness of eye which fills the whole body with light; it turns the light that is in a man to darkness. It attempts to serve two masters while serving none. It sees motes in its brother's eye while ignoring beams in its own. It is in sheep's clothing without, and a menacing wolf within. It is the shadow of the light, the enemy of the truth. It is most of all hostile to the Kingdom of Heaven, just because that is the fullest light and the highest truth. Nor is that all. Hypocrisy, as the opposite and negation of the Kingdom of Heaven, is as ready to corrupt Christianity as it is to corrupt Judaism. Even Christ's name it is capable of turning into a substitute, not a synonym, for the will of the Father.

From all other vices men are delivered by the life of faith. For this reason our Lord never directly assails vice of impulse. The publican and the harlot He treated as the lost sheep He had come to seek. For them He set wide the door of the Kingdom. But the door, He knew, could never be made so narrow that the hypocrites would not at least appear to enter. The new hypocrisy will be to come in Christ's name, saying, 'I am he' (Mk 13<sup>9</sup>). Under that guise it will hide itself so dexterously as almost to deceive the elect; and it will use its opportunity, as hypocrisy has always done, to strangle truth by its subtlety. Just because hypocrisy is thus an enemy in the camp poisoning the wells, our Lord deals with it openly, directly, negatively, by the method of denunciation, as with no other form of evil.

The supreme evil of hypocrisy, as the negation of the life of faith, appears still more clearly in what our Lord says about the eternal sin. In John unbelief is spoken of as the abiding sin. 'For if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins' (8<sup>24</sup>). Yet, from the context, it is apparent that the abiding evil is not the act of unbelief, but the absence of all love of the truth, of which the unbelief is the evidence. Christ came that the thoughts of many hearts should be revealed (Lk 2<sup>35</sup>), and those who had cherished evil were as conspicuously displayed as those who had cherished good. The publican and the harlot who had secretly thirsted after righteousness came to be shown to have faith, though all appearances were against them; the Pharisee who had used his religious position to cover worldly ends was shown to want it, though all appearances were in his favour. While the publican came to the light, the Pharisee hated the truth and sought to repress it, and to do so sought to destroy Him who spoke the truth. Thus he showed himself of his father the devil, who from the beginning was a murderer as well as the father of lies. Here in John then we have juggling with truth, hypocrisies before God and the world and one's own soul, set forth as the cardinal sin which relates us as certainly to the spirit of evil as faith does to the spirit of good, and which works in hate, as surely as goodness works in love, and which leaves men to die in their sins, because it is hostile to all that could lead to life and pardon.

All this is in agreement with what the Scriptures say of the Pharisees. The Holy Spirit says of them in 12<sup>23-27</sup>, 'The Pharisees had reached a turning-point in their opposition. They believed in miracles, they looked for signs. The miracle could no longer be questioned, but they could call it a sign of Beelzebub. Though unable to deny either the power or the beneficence of Christ's work, being resolved not to accept the practical consequences of belief, they clung to darkness and good evil. The actual sin of the Pharisees was the denial of the Holy Ghost, therefore, is possible only when face to face with the highest thing in religion and its clearest evidence, but the danger of coming to that point is present in all hypocrisy. Hypocrisy is ever an overweening pride, denying to other men the right to truth, and to God His power to see; and the eternal sin is only the finished result of what is always present in it. This connexion is most evident in the narrative of Luke, which begins with a warning against the leaven of the Pharisees which is hypocrisy. Nothing, it is said, can be covered, and the hypocrite has power to do only one great evil—to associate others in his spiritual destruction. Faith in the God who cares even for the sparrow, alone preserve from this fatal vice, a faith which is the negation of faith, or at least that faith is the negation of hypocrisy. The natural outcome of faith is confession before men, and the negation of that is Divine protection until the final award. On the other hand, to follow hypocrisy is to go the road that leads to the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost—the state of mind that has so juggled with good and evil that good has no power over it, the sin which no change of dispensation, or perhaps nothing in eternity any more than in time, can modify. This may be most apparent in Luke, but in Mark and Matthew also the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of truth, and the sin which is eternal is not an act of oversight or passion, but an irremediable state which could be reached only by a finished, wilful, and tyrannical hypocrisy. See UNPARDONABLE SIN.

In every form of evil, as Martensen rightly affirms, hypocrisy is present in a partial form. All sin is egoistic, yet every man depends on society—the sinner not least. Under some pretence of goodness alone can the egoist enter society. The seducer must swear false oaths, the deceiver feign friendship, the tyrant profess care for the commonweal. A finished life of wickedness would be one great lie, which would be the only ultimate form of atheism. And just because a God of truth cannot for ever be denied, hypocrisy comes to be more and more a spirit of hatred and opposition to truth. Thus it is, more even than habit, the cumulative element in devotion to evil. It is not only the greatest practical denial of God, it is also the greatest practical alienation from God. To be reconciled to God is primarily to be restored to truth. Wherefore '... may be taken not only as the negation of the teaching of God, but also as the negation of all Christ did to reconcile men to the Father, the negation of His work as a Saviour as well as of His work as a Revealer.

Throughout all the Christian centuries, wherever there has been a lively sense of the reality of Christianity, there has also been a lively sense of this shadow following the sun. The classical example of lying to the Holy Ghost found its occasion in the first flush of the Church's faith and love (Ac 5). The first great division of parties arose through the same vice, and arose almost with the Church. The extreme bitterness of the ... was nourished by that external view of religion which could regard a ceremony as essential, and hatred as if it were godliness. Even Barnabas was almost carried away by their ... (Gal 2<sup>13</sup>), showing how the vice seeks to ... possible, the elect; while their attempts to suppress Paul were limited only by their power and never by their scruples—showing that it is a vice which always persecutes as well as perverts. All the errors which cause men to fall away from the faith are, already in the NT, ascribed to ... of men that speak lies (1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>). ... root of error in moral falsehood, and not in mere intellectual mistake, much might be said, but it must suffice to mention what Augustine says of Manichæism. Long his difficulties seemed to him intellectual perplexity about the origin of evil. When, however, he saw that wickedness was no substance, but a perversity of the will, he discovered the true root of the error.

'They preferred to think Thy substance did suffer ill, than that their own did commit it' (Conf. vii. 4).

That, as our L... ypocrisy has continued to work ... Dispensation as under the Old, may be seen from the state of things in the Eastern Church as pictured by Eustathius, in the Western as drawn by Dante and Chaucer, and in later times as reflected in a literature too abundant and familiar to require to be named.

HYSSOP (חִסְסוֹן, ὕσσωπος) is twice mentioned in the NT (Jn 19<sup>29</sup>, He 9<sup>13</sup>). We know that it was used for ... (Ex 12<sup>22</sup>), and that it grew on walls (1 K ...). Tristram it is identified with the caper-plant (Capparis spinosa); and this view is very generally accepted. It is open, however, to the serious objection that the caper is not well adapted for use as a sprinkler. Many still favour the opinion of Maimonides that it was the sa'tar of the Arabs. This plant, which 'springs out of the walls, those of the garden especially' (Thomson, LB p. 112), is a species of Satureia. In Morocco, the name sa'tar is given to marjoram (Origanum). Carruthers (Bible Educator, iv. 226) suggests that hyssop was a name applied to various plants of the genera Thymus, Origanum, and others nearly allied in form and habit. The balance ... is in favour of this view.

IDEAL.—The word 'ideal' does not occur in EV of the NT, nor is there any term in the Gr text which exactly corresponds to the general notion of the English word.* The subject of the highest good or moral ideal, however, is one that is constantly present in the teaching of Christ, and ... illuminated by His own character ... influence in human history. An ideal may be defined as a mental conception taken as a standard of absolute perfection. The word is used with regard to various kinds of excellence. There are intellectual and æsthetic ideals as well as those which are properly to be described as moral. But it is to the realm of moral worth that the notion of the ideal is ... appropriate, and it is with the moral ... that we are at present concerned.

In the history of Ethics, discussion has always centred in this question of the ideal, the summum bonum, the 'chief end of man.' Aristotle begins his Nicom. Ethics (I. i. 1) by describing the good as that at which all aim, and he goes on to say (I. ii. 2): 'And, like archers, shall we not be more likely to attain what is right if we have a mark (σκοπός)?' This σκοπός, the target or goal of human endeavour, is just the ideal. Aristotle takes the human σκοπός to be happiness, which he defines as 'the active exercise of man's living powers, according to their highest virtue, in a life affording full room for their development' (I. vii. 15). It is a striking coincidence that the only occasion on which the word σκοπός is found in the NT is in the saying of St Paul, 'I press toward the mark (σκοπός) for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus' (Ph 3<sup>14</sup>). The Christian ideal of St Paul was very different from the pagan one of the Stagirite. But ... no less than the philosopher ... of an ideal, and its power over the whole conduct of life.

It would be interesting to discriminate the various ideals or ultimate moral aims which, in the progress of the world's history, have been advocated by the representatives of the leading religious or philosophical systems. These ideals, however, do not directly concern us here. It will be sufficient in the course of the article to refer to them in passing, when they serve, by way of contrast, to bring more clearly into view the distinctive features of the Christian ideal. Applying ourselves to a special consideration of the latter, we shall deal with it (1) as it is set forth in the teaching of Christ, (2) as it is embodied historically in His own person, (3) as it is made real in human experience through His constraining power.

i. THE IDEAL AS SET FORTH IN THE TEACHING OF CHRIST.—One great fault of all non-Christian, or pre-Christian, or imperfectly Christian ideals is their narrowness or one-sidedness: they ignore whole departments of the kingdom of moral worth, and do justice to one part of human nature at the expense of the rest. In contrast with this, the Christian ideal, as we meet it in Christ's teaching, strikes us by its comprehensiveness and perfect

* The translators of the Twentieth Cent. NT render Eph 4<sup>13</sup> 'until we reach the perfection of manhood and that degree of development of which the ideal to be found in the Christ is the standard.' But this is a paraphrase rather than a translation of the original.

1. It is an ideal of blessedness attained through perfection of character.—Pope invokes happiness as 'our being's end and aim . . . for which we bear to live, or dare to die' (Epistle, iv. 1 ff.). And Herbert Spencer, in his Data of Ethics (p. 46), affirms that 'no school can avoid taking for the ultimate moral aim a desirable state of feeling, called by whatever . . . enjoyment, happiness.' Newn. . . . Spencer's statement as a confusion between the form and the substance of the moral intuition (Christian Ethics, p. 86 f.). But if the conception of happiness is enlarged so as to include the appropriate Christian contents, if blessedness (wh. see), in other words, is taken as the NT synonym for the little fault can be found with the poet or the philosopher. The Westminster Divines were very far from being mere Eudæmonists, but in the first question of the Shorter Catechism they define 'man's chief end' as consisting in this—'to glorify God, and to enjoy Him for ever.' If happiness is not the very substance of the Christian ideal, it is none the less, as Dr. Smyth himself says, 'its natural result and its necessary form' (op. cit. p. 119). By beginning His Sermon on the Mount with His great series of Beatitudes (Mt 5<sup>1ff</sup>, cf. Lk 6<sup>20ff</sup>), Jesus places the ideal of blessedness in the forefront of His teaching. So far, therefore, we may say He is on the side of the Eudæmonists as against all who have sought to set up a hard abstract ideal of duty as the moral aim. But note the content of Christ's ideal, and it will be seen at once how far removed it is from ordinary Utilitarianism. The blessedness of which He speaks belongs to a character . . . by meekness, mercy, purity of heart, . . . spiritual qualities (Mt 5<sup>4-12</sup>)—a character which finds its standard not in human perfection . . . but in nothing less than the perfection of the Father Himself (v. 48). In its form of blessedness, happiness is to be desired by Christ's disciples; but only through perfection of character can this happiness come. No man will find delight in that vision of God which Jesus promises (v. 8), no man will 'enjoy God,' unless a resemblance to the perfection of the 'Father which is in heaven' has been growing up within his heart.

2. It is an ideal of natural good.—Even when it is blessedness belongs to the . . . blessedness is sometimes conceived of . . . . Not only is the spiritual . . . above the natural . . . ought to be, but the natural is ignored or despised and then refused its proper rights. This is the inherent fault of all ascetic ideals, whether pagan or Christian. Now Christ certainly exalted the spiritual above the natural. He made blessedness depend, as we have seen, upon inward qualities. Moreover, He taught that His disciples must be ready to make any sacrifice—to cut off hand or foot, to pluck out the right eye for the sake of entering into life (Mt 5<sup>29, 30</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> Mk 9<sup>43ff</sup>), and that a man was nothing profited if he gained the whole world and lost his own soul (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>). But the blessedness He holds before His followers is by no means a purely spiritual thing. The Beatitude of the meek is that they shall inherit the earth (Mt 5<sup>5</sup>). The petition for daily bread is enshrined in the very heart of the Lord's Prayer (6<sup>10, 11</sup>). And when Jesus comes to speak more particularly of food and raiment, the very things which are most fundamental to our natural life in this world, while He forbids anxiety regarding them, the reason given is not that they are unworthy of a Christian's thought and care, but that 'all these things shall be added' unto those who seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness (6<sup>25-34</sup>).

3. It is an ideal of social good attained through individual worth.—The . . . of Jesus was a social one it is impossible to doubt. Deeply as He . . . . His hearers the . . . . value . . . . life or soul (Mt . . . , Lk 15<sup>4ff</sup> etc.). He never said anything to justify a religious individualism which concerns itself only with personal salvation. The very fact that 'the kingdom of God' (wh. see) is the phrase by which He most frequently refers to His moral ideal, shows that it was an ideal of social good. In this He was coming, so far, into touch with the prevalent Jewish conceptions of His time, for it was a social, not an individual good for which Israel looked. But whereas the Jews conceived of this social good on purely national lines, Jesus enlarged the bounds of the blessed society so as to make room in it for men of all nations. 'They shall come,' He said, 'from the east and west, and from the north and south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God' (Lk 13<sup>29</sup>, Mt 8<sup>11</sup>). Yet while His moral ideal takes not only a social form, but one of universal breadth, He always taught that it must be through making its power felt in the individual heart that the Kingdom of God would be realized upon earth. This was where His teaching differed so greatly from the contemporary Jewish expectation, and from the thoughts of many in modern times who have been seized by . . . of Christ's social purposes without . . . individuality and spirituality of His . . . Kingdom of God in popular Jewish hope was an . . . of Israel brought about by deeds like those of Judas Macabæus. The Kingdom of God in the vision of many earnest dreamers and workers of our own days is the result of a social revolution brought about by . . . . According to Christ's teaching, . . . God can come only through the . . . individual hearts. 'The kingdom of God cometh not with observation,' He said, ' . . . for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you' (Lk 17<sup>20-21</sup>). That this, and not the marginal readings 'among you' [AV], 'in the midst of you' [RV], is the proper rendering, seems to be confirmed by the second of the 'New Sayings of Jesus' discovered by Grenfell and Hunt (cf. p. 770<sup>b</sup> below). And He summed up the whole matter when He set a little child in the midst and said, 'Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 18<sup>3</sup> ||; cf. Jn 3<sup>3</sup>).

4. The ideal is at once a reality in the present and a promise for the future.—There are those who look for their summum bonum in the present hour, and whose philosophy of life was long ago summed up in the saying, 'Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die' (1 Co 15<sup>32</sup>, cf. Is 22<sup>13</sup>). There are others again who have, not unjustly, incurred the charge of 'other-worldliness,' because they have despised God's present mercies . . . own urgent duties, while fixing . . . the hope of future blessings and rewards. But in the teaching of Jesus the ideal good is at once realized in the present and consummated in the future. On the one hand, He proclaims that the Kingdom of God is not merely coming, but already come (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, cf. Mk 1<sup>15</sup>); it is set up here and now within the individual heart (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>); its Beatitudes are present realities (Mt 5<sup>3-11</sup>; note not only the recurring 'Blessed are they, ye,' etc., but vv. 3<sup>10</sup> 'thems is [early] the kingdom of heaven'). On the other hand, He constantly taught His disciples to look to the future for the complete and perfect form of the Kingdom and its blessedness. His use of the phrase 'kingdom of heaven' as an alternative expression for 'kingdom of God' (and the evidence of the First Gospel points to the former as being the more habitual term on His part; it refers primarily, no doubt, to the Kingdom as coming from above and having its true home in the supersensible world, is surely not without its future reference. This Kingdom, which is heavenly and must be heavenly also in teaching, and especially everything round the thought of the Parousia, when all that is evil shall be cast out of the Kingdom (Mt 13<sup>41f</sup> 22<sup>13</sup> 25<sup>30</sup>), and the faithful servant shall enter into the joy of his Lord (25<sup>21</sup> 23), points to the same conclusion. And if we are not to reject the evidence of the Fourth Gospel, with respect even to its testimony as to the leading ideas in our Lord's teaching, the fact that in it 'eternal life' takes the central place which in the Synoptics is held by 'the kingdom of God' points once more to a future reference in Christ's ideal. For though futurity and everlastingness are not the fundamental conceptions in the category of eternal life, they are certainly necessary for the completeness of that life which Jesus promised to His disciples as their eternal good.

ii THE IDEAL AS EMBODIED HISTORICALLY IN THE PERSON OF CHRIST.—So far, we have been thinking of the Christian ideal as set forth in our Lord's teaching. But now we must notice the fact that Jesus not only expounded an ideal, but realized it in His own person. It is here that the Christian ideal differs specifically from the loftiest ideals of the philosophers and moralists; it is an ideal which was once made actual in a human life. Jesus not only taught, but was. He brought down the ideal out of the region of dreams, and hopes, and words into the world of positive realities. In His own history He showed how blessedness might be attained through moral perfection; how the life of highest might prove to be the life of widest social benevolence; how it was possible, while enjoying all natural blessings as gifts from the Father's hand, to place obedience to the will above everything else, how the narrow path of present duty might be illuminated by the splendours of the eternal world, while the assurance of something yet more glorious than now appeared might thrill the heart of the faithful wayfarer.

1. Jesus Christ is the Ideal Man.—His character is not merely perfect in some aspects, but perfect in all—so rounded and complete as to become an ideal for the woman as well as for the man, for the Greek as well as for the Jew, for the modern as well as for the ancient world. He is not merely free from flaws, but full of vital and creative forces; His perfection is that not of a marble image, but of a living spirit. This is the verdict of history, the verdict of all who simply read and ponder the records of His life. Even those who do not believe Him to be more than man join without demur in the universal chorus of acclamation. They acknowledge that Jesus stands alone in His moral grandeur as the incarnation of personal human worth, and that the historical Christ is the ideal of humanity.

2. As an Ideal, Christ becomes an Example (wh. see).—For whatever it may be in other spheres in the moral world, at all events, ideals, from the nature of the case, are not merely standards of an abstract perfection, but goals after which we must strive,—targets, to use Aristotle's figure, at which we aim and shoot those arrows of the soul which are the living energies of our moral being. Jesus never set Himself before men's eyes as a beautiful but impossible ideal. He claimed to be an example (Mt 11<sup>29</sup> 20<sup>26-28</sup> | Lk 22<sup>27</sup>, Jn 13<sup>15</sup> 15<sup>12</sup>). As such He was taken by His first disciples (1 P 2<sup>21</sup>). And

St. Paul, who saw the perfect and ideal man in the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ (Eph 4<sup>13</sup>), never doubted that the perfection of manhood which was found in Christ was something to be personally striven after. That was the σαςπός of the long race. On that the Christian must fix his eyes, towards that he must constantly press, if he would attain to the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (Ph 3<sup>13f</sup>). See also PERFECTION (OF JESUS).

iii THE REALIZATION OF THE IDEAL THROUGH THE CONSTRAINING POWER OF CHRIST.—We have seen that Christ in His teaching holds up an ideal, that He embodies this ideal historically in His own person, and sets it before us as an example which we must strive to follow. But to weak and sinful men and women this presentation by word and deed of a perfect moral ideal would be little else than a mockery, if Christ did nothing more than offer us an outward standard after which we were to strive. It is in a far deeper sense than this that He is the Christian ideal. In his famous theory of Ideas, Plato conceived of the Ideal Good as an archetypal essence which becomes an efficient cause, imparting to individuals a share of its own being, as the sun imparts 'vitality, growth, and nutriment' to the creatures on which its rays fall (Rep. vi. 509). And it is in this vital and archetypal manner that Jesus becomes the moral ideal of the human race. He gives what He commands, and so has a right to command what He wills. We have constant illustrations in the Gospels of this constraining power of the Ideal Goodness as it is presented to men and women in the person of Christ. The sinful woman in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>), Zacchæus, the publican of Jericho (19<sup>1-10</sup>), Matthew, the receipt of custom to become an Apostle, may serve as examples. The author of the Fourth Gospel sums up the whole matter for us when he says: 'As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God' (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>). And to St. Paul, who brooded much over this mission of Christ as it had been revealed to him in a profound personal experience, the secret of spiritual life and growth presented itself as an idea of the Christ-nature implanted by the Holy Spirit in the believer's soul. 'Christ in you,' he says, 'the hope of glory' (Col 1<sup>27</sup>), and again, 'I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). And when in another place he describes believers as 'foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>), he suggests a figure which helps us to understand how Christ the ideal is not merely an outward type but an inward principle. The younger brothers of a house are conformed to the likeness of the firstborn not so much by personal imitation as by the operation of secret and vital forces which spring from the very fact of their birth as members of a particular family, and which lie far deeper than the workings of the individual will. And so it is as between Christ and His people. 'For both he that sanctifieth,' says another NT writer, 'and they that are sanctified are all of one—for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren' (He 2<sup>11</sup>).

IDEAS (LEADING).—The leading ideas of our Lord may be divided into two classes, Moral and Religious. This is not an artificial division: it corresponds to two stages in His public teaching, which are very clearly marked in the Gospels. The earlier stage is prevalently ethical, and finds its most characteristic utterance in the Sermon on the Mount. The latter is, in comparison, distinctively religious, and deals with the relation of God to man. Yet we are not to separate the two elements, for they inter-penetrate one another. They are inter-dependent, and form together an organic whole.

i. MORAL IDEAS.—1. The Kingdom.—This idea must be placed first on account of its position in our Lord's teaching. 'Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand,' was the message of the Baptist and the first public utterance of Jesus (Mt 4, Mk 1-2). From the beginning the idea of the Kingdom may be traced throughout the Gospels, and everywhere it will be found to indicate the supreme blessing which comes to man from God. In Mt. it is usually termed the Kingdom of Heaven. Elsewhere the phrase Kingdom of God is uniformly employed.

The idea of a Kingdom of God does not appear first in the NT. In the OT, the sovereignty of God is a fundamental conception. Jehovah is the true King, the people of Israel was a theocracy, kings, prophets, or priests, the human leaders were looked upon as representatives or agents of Jehovah, the true King. The natural tendency was to regard this as the exclusive privilege of the chosen people. Nevertheless, in the OT it is to be found in the vision of a great world-wide Kingdom of God. In the Book of Daniel especially we find how, to the prophetic mind, there was opened the glorious prospect of a universal Divinely-established sovereignty. Dn 2<sup>4</sup> and 7<sup>13</sup> are the clearest. The latter of these passages is especially important, because from it, as we shall see, the title 'Son of Man' by which our Lord designated Himself was derived. It was therefore scarcely possible to believe that, as He proclaimed 'the kingdom,' He had not clearly in mind the words 'His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.'

It is plain that among the Jews in our Lord's time there was a widely spread expectation of some great person who was to be leader of the chosen people, and through whom that people were to be established as a world-power. The Jews of that age were looking for a kingdom. And to them came John the Baptist, and then Jesus of Nazareth, proclaiming the coming of a Kingdom. As our Lord's ministry and teaching developed, He made it quite clear that the Kingdom He proclaimed was very different from the kingdom of popular expectations. Yet the two conceptions cannot be wholly unrelated. Our Lord would not have used the popular language if His meaning had no relation to the ideas of the popular mind.

This consideration is important, because of late years there have been efforts to show that the Kingdom, as conceived by our Lord, had no social content whatever; that, by the Kingdom of God, He meant a spiritual illumination in the heart of the individual (Harnack, What is Christianity? Lect. iii. He holds that our Lord shared the eschatological ideas of the Jews of His time, but that the essence of His teaching is that the Kingdom is the rule of God in the heart of the individual). This view rests mainly on a single text, Lk 17<sup>21</sup> 'The kingdom of God is within you,' and is supported by the consideration that the primary meaning of the word which is translated 'kingdom,' βασιλεία, is 'rule' or 'dominion.'

The sentence (Lk 17-1) 'The kingdom of God is within you' (ἐντός ὑμῶν ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ) being translated, 'The kingdom of God is in the heart of you,' and this rendering suits the context better than any other, for the saying was addressed to the Pharisees. But it must be granted that the 'New Sayings of Jesus,' recently discovered by Grenfell and Hunt, have thrown fresh light on this question. The words occur in the Second Saying, and in a connexion which precludes the translation 'in the midst of you' 'The kingdom of heaven is within you, and whoever shall know himself shall find it.' This is, at least, a very early witness to the sense attached to the words in primitive times.

But we cannot found our interpretation of our Lord's teaching on a single passage, when we are dealing with a leading principle which was always more or less in His mind. Some of the parables which were intended to throw light on the nature of the Kingdom, e.g. the Mustard Seed, the Tares and the Wheat, the Draw-net, seem explicable only on the assumption that the Kingdom was regarded as:

The only way of combining the two elements which seems to be truly satisfactory, is to regard the Kingdom as the rule of God, whether in the individual or in the community. It is then the Summum Bonum, the Absolute Good in which both the individual and the community find their realization. It is thus both a present blessing and an ideal to guide all future development. It is realized here and now whenever man stands in a right relation to God and to his fellows. Its perfect realization belongs to the great future: it is the end to which all creation and all history are tending. The Kingdom of God is thus at once moral, social, and eschatological. All these aspects are distinctly visible in our Lord's teaching, and all are harmonized by the view which has just been adopted. We are now concerned with the moral aspect of this great idea.

The Sermon on the Mount, as we have it in Mt., must be taken as the fullest statement of our Lord's moral teaching. Whether it be accepted as a single discourse, or be regarded as a collection of sayings, the unity which pervades it and its perfect harmony with the rest of our Lord's utterances are manifest. Its place in the gospel of the Kingdom, as proclaimed by our Lord, is clearly defined. The Sermon is a statement of the Law of the Kingdom.

This is evident from Mt 5:17-20, in which a general principle concerning the ethical relation of the gospel to the Law is laid down, and from vv. 21-48, in which several important illustrations of the practical application of this new principle are given. Mt 6:1-33 and 7:1-27 agree with this view of the nature of the Sermon. In the former passage, the whole subject of rewards and motives is dealt with, and the end which is to govern our religious life (vv. 1-18) and our secular life (vv. 19-34) is declared to be, not the pleasure of men (vv. 23-26), but earthly rewards (vv. 19-26), but God's Kingdom and God's righteousness (v. 33). This end includes all necessary goods (v. 33). It therefore lifts the soul above anxiety (v. 34). It is an eternal treasure (v. 20). It must be pursued with whole-hearted devotion (v. 24). In the latter passage (7:1-27) the importance of doing the will of God, as contrasted with mere profession, is insisted on as a condition of entering into the Kingdom.

It is clear that the whole Sermon on the Mount is a statement of the point of view of the Kingdom, and that it contains all the principles which belong to that point of view. It may therefore be fitly described as the Law of the Kingdom.

At the same time, it is necessary to observe that the Sermon on the Mount is not a new Decalogue. Our Lord did not issue commandments like those of the old Law. On the contrary, He laid down principles, and taught His disciples how to apply them.

This is an important distinction. Commandments which classify actions, forbidding some and enjoining others, however necessary they may be for purposes of moral education, have always this defect, that they are sure, sooner or later, to come into conflict, and so give rise to perplexity and to casuistry. Principles, on the other hand, are truly universal, and therefore cannot conflict. There are parts of our Lord's moral teaching which are so general in their scope, e.g. Mt 5:34-39 and 41-42, that it is impossible to see how they can be in conflict with one another. It is seen that these sayings contain not laws but examples, illustrations of the application of a principle (see v 20), which has been already laid down. As examples or illustrations, they must be considered in relation to circumstances, which inevitably limit every particular case.

Among moral principles laid down by our Lord, the Kingdom stands first and supreme. The passage which presents this truth most clearly has been already noticed. It occupies the whole of Mt 6, which fills the central space in the moral teaching of Jesus as we have it in St. Matthew's report of the Sermon. Here we have the motives of conduct dealt with. First, the wrong motives are pointed out: the love of money, which too often destroys the reality of the religious life (vv 2, 5, 16, 18); greed of gain, the laying up of earthly treasures (vv 19-24), which makes the 'single eye' impossible, anxiety for the necessities of life, food and clothing, things that will surely be given us if we live a true life (vv 25-34).

It is characteristic of our Lord that it is in connexion with this last subject that He reveals the true motive. He contemplates the life of the toiling for his daily bread and filled lest that bread should fail. There is an extraordinary tenderness and sympathy in our Lord's language here. The passage is perhaps the most beautiful in all His teaching. And the lesson reaches the heights of spiritual vision. 'Seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things (the necessities of life) shall be added unto you' (v 33).

It is singularly impressive that this teaching should be given in connexion with those common everyday duties at which the vast majority of human beings must spend their lives. To the great mass of the world's toilers our Lord says: 'Be not anxious about your bodily needs. In doing your daily work, seek the Highest, and the necessities of life will not fail. And what is that Highest? It is the Kingdom and righteousness of God. The answer presents both sides of the truth, the external and the internal, the objective aim and the quality of character which corresponds to it.

When we come to consider what is the nature of this highest Kingdom, which is termed the Kingdom, we are met by the difficulty that our Lord no formal definition of it. His manner of speaking to it is rather an indication that He first instance to convince His hearers of its existence, and for the rest to approach it in many different ways, so as to exhibit different aspects of a thing too great for its nature to be made evident by any one statement. But certain characteristics emerge with sufficient clearness. What these characteristics are will be seen as we examine the other leading ideas of our Lord's moral teaching. See also art. KINGDOM OF GOD.

2. The Pure Heart.—'Blessed are the pure in heart,' said the Lord; 'for they shall see God.' The idea expressed in this Beatitude is one of the most fundamental in the interpretation of the Law in terms of the gospel. Our Lord insisted upon the inwardness of all true goodness. An external morality had no value in His eyes. This teaching was not altogether new. Great prophets and psalmists had seen it (Jer 31<sup>33</sup>, Ps 51<sup>10</sup>). Greek philosophers had taught the priority of being to doing. But Jesus gave to the world as a whole what had hitherto been the possession of select souls. By showing the power of this principle to deepen the received code, He was able to alter the popular conception of the moral ideal. He taught that within the Kingdom the only goodness which would be recognized would be goodness of heart. All the examples which He gave to show that the righteousness of the Kingdom must exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, display the operation of this principle. See Mt 5<sup>22, 28, 34-37, 44-48</sup>, Lk 6<sup>45</sup>. Our Lord did not abolish the old Law. He fulfilled it (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>). He penetrated to the inner meaning and deeper truth which underlay it. And what is true of the good is true also of the evil: its nature is spiritual, it proceeds from the heart, and is not concerned with the outward action (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>, Lk 6<sup>45</sup>; see also Mt 12<sup>34, 35</sup>).

There is a tendency to regard this purity of heart as concerned only with the negation of evil. Our Lord's teaching is that the principle is one of universal application, and concerns the very essence of all goodness. Kant stated in the terms of the world, or even out of it, which can be called good without qualification, except a Good Will. It is the doctrine which modern Ethics expresses when it declares that the goodness or badness of conduct depends upon the motive. In the last resort, the 'single eye' and the 'pure heart' are the same. They are the determination to do the good just and for no other reason. The former regards this moral attitude from the point of view of the end which is aimed at, the second contemplates the disposition of the heart, the moral condition of soul, out of which the good inevitably springs.

3. The Infinite Value of the human Soul.—This idea is very frequent in the teaching of our Lord. Explicitly or implicitly, it occurs everywhere. See Mt 6<sup>26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100</sup>, Mk 8<sup>33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100</sup>, Lk 9<sup>25, 48, 10<sup>28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100</sup></sup>, Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, 4<sup>7, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100</sup>. A soul or of the sacrifice by which the salvation of the soul was effected, are witnesses to the same truth. Every person, no matter how poor, wretched, sinful or degraded, is of infinite value when compared with any mere thing. The gospel was preached to the poor. The Christ received the publicans and sinners who came to Him. None were too miserable or too lowly for His compassion. The Great Father in heaven is ever watching over His human children. The very hairs of their heads are all numbered. Better to die a miserable death than be the cause of injury to one of His little ones. God so cares for even the most sinful among His children, that He is compared to the shepherd seeking the lost sheep, to the woman searching for her lost piece of money. There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth. God is like a loving father who rejoices over the returning prodigal. As we have it in St. John, 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son' (3<sup>16</sup>).

Apart from the religious value of these teachings, their ethical importance is incalculable. They conveyed to mankind one of the greatest gifts which even Christianity had to bestow: the belief that each human soul is of absolute value, above all price or estimation. It is the doctrine which philosophical Ethics expresses, when it declares that every person is to be regarded as an end in himself, never as a means only. This is the doctrine which underlies the mission of the Church to go and make disciples of all the nations (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). It is the principle which has overthrown tyrannies, abolished slavery, and justified all our modern enthusiasms for liberty and for the welfare of humanity.

This doctrine, combined with that of the Fatherhood of God, affords the true proof of individual immortality. Our Lord's teaching is quite clear on this subject. There must be a future life for men because God calls Himself their God. 'He is not the God of the dead, but of the living' (Mt 22<sup>32</sup>, Mk 12<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>17</sup>). That is, God cares for men, they are precious in His sight, therefore He cannot permit them to perish. The great Father will never forsake His children.

4. The Law of Love.—Christianity teaches us to think of love as the nature of God and as the law of human life. We owe this noble teaching to our Lord Himself. By precept and example He taught His followers to think of the Almighty as their Father in heaven. While never ignoring the justice, the supremacy of God, He made His hearers realize the supremacy of the Divine Love. Out of this great love, God should flow a human love of the same nature, a beneficent love (Mt 5<sup>44-45</sup>, Lk 6<sup>27-35</sup>), a love which embraces even those who are bitterly hostile. Not only so, but our Lord teaches that the Law of Love is the supreme law of conduct. It includes all the commandments (Mt 22<sup>37-39</sup>, Mk 12<sup>30ff.</sup>). In strict accordance with this teaching is the Law of Service. He is greatest who serves best (Mt 20<sup>25ff.</sup>, Mk 10<sup>43ff.</sup>, Lk 22<sup>24-27</sup>, Jn 13<sup>5-17</sup>). Loving service is the true test of the life (Mt 25<sup>35ff.</sup>).

This teaching that our Lord designed to give to men should be, not merely an illumination for the individual, but a social bond. He set free a principle which would bless all. That principle may be described as the Kingdom of God, then all we 'are brethren' (Mt 23<sup>8</sup>). The kingdom of God is thus the kingdom of Love in which each is blessed in the blessing of all. And this is the true Summum Bonum, the ideal end, which finds its partial realization in every instance of the individual life as well as in the life of the race. Its perfect realization is the social progress of the future, the coming of the Kingdom in glory.

5. The Universality of Love.—The Law of Love in its relation to our duty to one another is expressed by the command, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' But the question arises, What is the scope of this love? Or, as it was put to our Lord Himself, 'Who is my neighbour?' (Lk 10<sup>29</sup>). The answer to this question is contained in the passage already referred to (Mt 5<sup>43-48</sup>). Our love is to be, like God's, a love for all who need it, the evil as well as the good; for just as well as the unjust, our enemies as well as our friends. In the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>30ff.</sup>), the same answer is given in a way which makes its meaning even more distinct. To enforce the lesson, our Lord selected as the hero of His parable a man belonging to a race which was hated and despised by the Jews. There was an exquisite wisdom in this choice. Why not have made a Jew assist a Samaritan, or even a Gentile, in order to illustrate the principle? But our Lord wished to teach by an example, rather to the humanity than to the individual of His hearer. Had the act of mercy been shown by a Jew to a Samaritan it might have seemed condescension, a work of supererogation. Shown by a Samaritan to a Jew, the true character of the goodness it reveals becomes, from the Jewish point of view, far more evident. We are taught that love should be universal in its nature. It should break down the barriers erected by race or privilege, or religion.

It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of this teaching. Ancient civilizations were for the most part founded on slavery or on the subjection of races or classes. Underlying the whole Jewish system was the idea of a privileged people. Our Lord broke through the most inveterate of prejudices, and taught the universal obligation to love and to bless. He laid the foundation of liberty and of philanthropy.

6. The Great Example.—In Mt 6<sup>33</sup>, the ideal is set before us in two ways, as an objective aim and as a type of character: 'Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness.' The righteousness of God is the standard. There is, and must be, a correspondence between the outward and the inward, between the Kingdom of God as a universe of souls bound together by the great love of their Father in Heaven and their love one to another, and the moral condition of each individual soul. When the latter side is considered, we ask, What is its quality? what is its standard? The answer is—the character of God. This is implied in the very name 'Father' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>). The teaching is, 'Be sons of your Father,' be like unto God. Even more explicit is the statement in Mt 5<sup>48</sup>, 'Ye therefore shall be perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect.' This standard may seem too high. It may seem unreal to say to ordinary men and women, 'Be perfect as God.' But all realization of good character in human creatures is, so far as it goes, an imitation of God, a reproduction of the Divine. Goodness is always a following of God, though it be a very long way off. What we have here is the absolute standard, the highest possible ideal of character. Our Lord will set nothing lower before us. But the ideal is brought near to us in a way which is characteristic of Christianity. Jesus Christ Himself is the incarnation of the ideal. See Mt 11<sup>29</sup>, 20<sup>28-29</sup>, Mk 10<sup>42-45</sup>, Lk 6<sup>40</sup>, 22<sup>27</sup>, Jn 13<sup>13</sup>, 34, 35, 15<sup>12</sup>. In this, our Lord holds Himself up as an example; there can be no doubt that the influence of His character has been as potent a moral force as His words. He elevated humanity by being what He was. It is very hard to realize how vast was the change effected by the teaching and example of Christ. The conception of the ideal of character was altered. To see this truth we have but to compare Aristotle's picture of the 'perfect man' with our Lord. Noble and virtuous with the splendid but imperfect nobility and virtue of the great-souled man is proud, and pompous. His very 'greatness,' as conceived by Aristotle, makes him a poor creature when placed beside Jesus of Nazareth. Above all, our Lord's example shows us the principle of love at work in human life.

7. Self-renunciation.—When dealing with the lofty principles of absolute morality, our Lord's teaching is characterized by the most extraordinary sweetness. With joyous confidence His thought lingers on the sunny heights of truth. But when He comes to speak of the struggle through which the soul must pass in its upward progress, His manner changes. There is an awful force in the language and imagery with which He teaches the necessity of self-sacrifice. From this we learn His attitude towards sin. See Mt 5<sup>29-30</sup>, 18<sup>9-10</sup>, Mk 9<sup>42-48</sup>, 10<sup>37-39</sup>. Such passages show that His tenderness towards the repentant sinner involved no condoning of sin. Our Lord received sinners, but He never regarded their sins with complaisance. The following passages are important. Mt 10<sup>37ff.</sup>, 16<sup>24-27</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34ff.</sup>, Lk 9<sup>38ff.</sup>, 14<sup>25-35</sup>, 17<sup>33</sup>, Jn 12<sup>25</sup>, also Mt 7<sup>13-14</sup>, Lk 13<sup>24ff.</sup> In these passages the necessity of self-renunciation is expressed in terms of the most vivid intensity. Yet the denial of self is nowhere represented as an end in itself. It is a means, or rather the inevitable means. It is the way, not the goal. Yet it is a way which cannot be avoided if the goal is to be reached.

Our Lord clearly sets before us the reward of goodness and the punishment which awaits unrepented sin. The subject is a puzzling one, because of the ambiguities of language. But our thoughts will be set free from confusion if we consider our Lord's teaching as it stands, apart from interpretations. It will be found that, in His teaching, is itself the reward. To gain this is to gain all, to lose it is to lose all. Sometimes it is described as 'the joy of thy Lord' (Mt 2<sup>2</sup>), or 'the kingdom' (v. 34), sometimes as 'the life' (v. 35). But all alike are ways of describing that which is the Summum Bonum, the true and final good, that end in which God Himself with all His children shall have one undivided blessedness. To live for this reward is to live for the good itself. The goodness or badness of working for rewards depends altogether on the nature of the rewards which are sought. To work for selfish ends is always wrong, to seek as a reward that great end which is the supreme and universal blessing is always right, it is indeed the essence of all goodness.

ii. RELIGIOUS IDEAS.—We have considered the leading ethical ideas of our Lord's teaching. But, as must now be quite apparent, it is impossible to separate the ethical element from the religious. Though our Lord Himself advanced from a pre-eminently ethical stage of instruction to a stage which was more exclusively religious, yet in His thought the two are united. Indeed, the religious side of the truth is the more fundamental. It deals with the

For example, when speaking of the ordinary work of human life, and giving the great rule, 'Seek first the kingdom of God' He led His hearers on to the thought of the Fatherhood of God as the reason why they should renounce all anxiety and live for the higher ends (Mt 6<sup>33</sup> 30-32).

1. The Fatherhood of God—This idea stands first among those which belong to the distinctively religious of our Lord's teaching. He gave it its position, and conveyed it in every possible way to the minds of His hearers. By word, by manner, by the manifestation of His own spiritual experience, and, above all, by being what He was, and at the same time declaring Himself to be a revelation of the mind and will of God (see Mt 11<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31ff</sup>, Jn 5<sup>19ff</sup> 8<sup>12ff</sup> 10<sup>5ff</sup> 12<sup>44ff</sup> 14-16), our Lord taught men to think of God as 'the Father,' and to attribute to Him all the benignity and bountifulness of the fatherly character. Here it is impossible to separate the teaching from the life of Christ. It is through the Christ Himself that man learns to know God as the Father. Jesus was intensely conscious of God's presence and relation to Himself. He saw into the heart of God with a clearness of vision unparalleled in human experience. He speaks of God out of a perfect knowledge, and whenever a human soul is able truly to hear, belief follows. The revelation of God made by Him carries conviction with it. It is so great a thing that it cannot but be true. When once man has grasped it, no other account of God can be accepted.

In the teaching of our Lord the Fatherhood of God is presented in three ways: (1) Jesus speaks of God as 'My Father.' This name was very dear to Jesus. It sprang from His consciousness of relationship to God. Clearly, it bore a special meaning. He was Son of God in a unique sense. This truth is emphasized by the manner in which the expression 'My Father' is used (Mt 10<sup>32</sup> 33 11<sup>27</sup>, Lk 24<sup>49</sup> 22<sup>29</sup>, Jn 5<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>37</sup> 17 20<sup>17</sup>; see also Mt 7<sup>21</sup> 16<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>10</sup> 19<sup>35</sup> 20<sup>23</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Lk 24<sup>49</sup>, Jn 5<sup>20-45</sup> 6<sup>52ff</sup> 8<sup>39ff</sup> 14-16). These passages fully carry out the idea expressed in the announcements at His baptism and on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mk 1<sup>11</sup> and 9<sup>7</sup>). (2) Our Lord taught His disciples to think of themselves as a family with God, and of them as their Father. They were called into a specially close relationship to God, and became in that special sense His children. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus addresses His disciples, and continually speaks to them of God, calling Him 'your Father' (Mt 5<sup>16</sup> 45 48 61 8 14 15 32 71<sup>1</sup>). 'Fear not,' He says, 'little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom' (Lk 12<sup>32</sup>). In the Lord's Prayer the address 'Our Father' has reference to the disciples as the family of God. Perhaps we dare not limit the 'our,' but the prayer was given to the disciples for their own use, and the word was surely meant to have the effect of uniting them as a family under the headship of their Father in Heaven. (3) Our Lord's teaching regards God as the Father of all men. Mt 6<sup>33</sup>, Lk 6<sup>35</sup> imply this great extension of the Divine Fatherhood. But clearer still are the parables of the Lost Sheep, the Lost Piece of Silver, and the Prodigal Son (Lk 15). The parable of the Good Samaritan extends the sphere of love beyond the bounds of Judaism, and throws light on such passages as Mt 6<sup>35</sup> and Lk 6<sup>35</sup>. Its principle corresponds, in the human sphere, to that expressed by the words, 'God so loved the world' (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>).

Our Lord, then, teaches us to think of God as the Father, and at the same time as Sovereign over the greatest of all attributes of His character—love. His love is so wide that it includes the unthankful and evil, those who have turned their backs on their Father's house and renounced His Kingdom. It is the source from which springs all that is described as Salvation. It is the mission of the Christ (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). It is the truth of the life of Him who came to seek and to save the lost. It is that Divine characteristic from which proceed 'joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth' (Lk 15<sup>7</sup>). And when this love has won the sinner, it introduces him into a circle in which he is brought more immediately under the Divine Fatherhood. He becomes a member of the family, the Kingdom, that great order of things in which men feel and experience the love of the Great Father. Finally, there is that supreme degree of Divine Fatherhood which belongs to the relation between the Father and Him who is in a unique sense the Son. The life and death of Christ reveal the love of God to man because of this relation. God's love appears because He gave His only-begotten Son. See also art FATHER.

2. The Son.—The second stage of our Lord's teaching is concerned mainly with Himself and His work for man. It is one of the great paradoxes of His personality, that while humility was one of His most marked characteristics, He yet preached Himself as none else ever dared to do. Sometimes the humility and the self-assertion occur side by side, expressed in a single utterance. 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls' (Mt 11<sup>28</sup> 29). The invitation and promise here constitute a great claim. Yet He adds, 'I am meek and lowly in heart'; and the story of His life proves the truth of the assertion. Furthermore, these words follow one of the greatest statements ever made of the Son of God's person, and the extent of His love: 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father: and no one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). This passage is but one out of many. Jesus continually asserted His right to the devotion of the hearts of men. No sacrifice is too great to be made in His service. Even the dearest of human relationships must be counted as nothing in comparison with Him. He claims, as His right, the utmost allegiance (Mt 10<sup>37-39</sup> 16<sup>24-26</sup> 19<sup>28</sup> 29 25<sup>31ff</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34-38</sup> 9<sup>37</sup> 41 10<sup>29</sup> 13<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>7-9</sup>, Lk 9<sup>38ff</sup> 48 57<sup>ff</sup> 10<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>5ff</sup> 14<sup>26ff</sup> 18<sup>29</sup>, and throughout St John's Gospel. See, especially, Jn 5<sup>17ff</sup> 8<sup>12ff</sup> 10<sup>30</sup> 14<sup>5ff</sup>).

The only adequate explanation of these facts is that which the NT supplies, and which the Christian Church has always held. Jesus is Divine; He is the Incarnate Word of God (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). No other doctrine can justify the claim which He makes, and explain the life, work, and teaching by which that claim is sustained. Our Lord did not declare Himself Divine, nor did He even make open proclamation of His Messiahship. That was not His method. He avoided anything which would have inflamed the minds of the multitude (Mk 1<sup>37, 38, 43</sup>, Lk 4<sup>41</sup>, Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). Further, He knew that faith springs into being not from names and titles, but from the recognition by the soul of that which is alone worthy to be the object of faith. Therefore He chose to reveal Himself gradually in His daily intercourse with His followers, and so lead them to discover the great truth for themselves (Mt 16<sup>13-20</sup>). That our Lord deliberately followed this method is shown by the terms which He used when referring to Himself. For example, He habitually called Himself the Son of Man. The name presented a problem to all who heard it. It was not a title of honor as to Dn 7<sup>13</sup>, but was not so as to constitute a claim. It evoked the question, 'Who is this Son of Man?' (Jn 12<sup>34</sup>). The name occurs about eighty times in the Gospels, and always as used by our Lord of Himself. It is so characteristic of His own point of view that it is not used by others. It clearly implies His humiliation, yet it is employed by Him pointedly in those passages in which His glory is described. See Mt 13<sup>41</sup> 19<sup>28</sup> 23<sup>31</sup>, Lk 21<sup>36</sup>, Jn 5<sup>27</sup> 6<sup>62</sup> etc.

The title Son of Man expresses the humanity of our Lord. It is His own testimony to His perfect Brotherhood with men. It marks His sympathy with human infirmity, and is used impressively in connexion with His mission of salvation (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Lk 19<sup>10</sup>). It presents Him as the Ideal Man. This has been noted not in accordance with the thought of the OT, but the OT had its ideal figures. Abraham, Moses, David, Elijah came to be regarded as typical representatives of whole peoples or classes. In the latter Isaiah this mode of thought reaches its most perfect development. The ideal Israel is depicted as the 'Servant of Jehovah,' and, as the prophet proceeds, the conception grows, until in Is 53 there rises into view the wonderful form of the Servant who is contrasted with, yet is of, the people of God. There is therefore no anachronism in supposing that when our Lord styled Himself the Son of Man He intended to set Himself forth as the representative of the human race, the Ideal Man. See, further, art. SON OF MAN.

The title Son of God was not often used by Jesus Himself (see Mt 27<sup>43</sup>, Jn 5<sup>25</sup> 9<sup>35</sup>), yet in many ways He implied His right to it. His constant and peculiar use of the expression 'My Father' (see above), and the frequent occurrence of the title 'Son of God,' as attributed to Him by others and not disclaimed by Himself, show what was His position in regard to this question (Mt 4<sup>3</sup> 8<sup>29</sup> 14<sup>33</sup> 27<sup>40, 54</sup>, Mk 3<sup>11</sup>, Lk 4<sup>41</sup> 22<sup>70</sup>, Jn 1<sup>34, 49</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 11<sup>27</sup> etc.). This title was naturally seized upon by His disciples as the simplest way of expressing the mystery of His person. The essence of that mystery, as manifested in every instance in which He disclosed His inner mind, was the close relationship in which He stood to the Father (see Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). And so it was by means of this title that His Divinity was represented to the minds of His first followers. And for the practical purposes of the religious life, as distinguished from the definitions of theology, no mode of expression could have been so useful; the critical faculties were held in suspense while the needs of the soul were satisfied. See also art. SON OF GOD.

The two titles 'Son of God' and 'Son of Man' modify and explain one another. Taken together they constitute our Lord's own most characteristic way of expressing the nature of His person. It was in this way that He chose to teach men His humanity and His Divinity and the miracle of their union. Thus the Incarnation is found to be implied in our Lord's attitude towards His own consciousness of Himself in relation to God and man. For a deeper insight into this profound subject we must turn to those passages in which that consciousness is most fully revealed. Mt 11<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>, Jn 5<sup>17</sup> 8<sup>28-29</sup> 10<sup>30</sup> 17<sup>1-5</sup> etc. With this is connected our Lord's consciousness of Himself as the bond of union among His disciples, uniting them to God and to one another (Jn 14<sup>20</sup> 15<sup>1-11</sup> 17<sup>22, 23</sup>). Also He presents Himself as the means of communication between God and man: Jn 10<sup>7</sup> 14<sup>9</sup>. These truths are aspects of His Incarnation.

Our Lord represented the work of His life as a work of salvation. Lk 19<sup>10</sup>; cf Mt 15<sup>24</sup>, Lk 15<sup>1-10</sup>. This idea, though prominent in His teaching from the first (see Mt 1<sup>21</sup>, Lk 2<sup>11</sup>, Jn 1<sup>2</sup>), is in all our Lord's language about His relation to men, yet remains undeveloped in His teaching until the end of His ministry. As the Gospels proceed, however, and His death approaches, sudden gleams of light are thrown upon the deeper meaning of salvation. In Jn 6<sup>51</sup>, the thought of Christ as the Bread of Life passes into that of the Paschal Lamb by whose death and blood the people of God are delivered. He is the Good Shepherd who lays down His life for the sheep. On the last journey to Jerusalem our Lord's mind was much occupied by the dreadful events which He knew were awaiting Him (Mk 10<sup>33, 34</sup>, also Mt 20<sup>17</sup>, Lk 18<sup>31-34</sup>). Before this He had told His disciples of the facts (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup> 9<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22</sup>), but now He declares something of their meaning and purpose. The occasion of the declaration was the ambitious petition of the sons of Zebedee. In reply to the two brothers, our Lord promises, in veiled language, participation in His sufferings; and to the whole body of the disciples He gives this teaching: 'Who-soever would become great among you shall be your minister; and whosoever would be first among you, shall be servant of all. For the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many.' It is the first clear statement in our Lord's own language of the purpose of His death. With this passage must be connected Jn 12<sup>23-27</sup>, in which, contemplating the terror of His cross, He lays down the law of sacrifice. But clearer still is the declaration which He made at the Last Supper. There are four accounts in the NT (Mt 26<sup>26-28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22-24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>19, 20</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>23-25</sup>). No two of these correspond exactly. But all agree that our Lord connected the rite with the conception of His death as a sacrifice on behalf of men. He gave His body over to death, His blood to be shed 'for many unto the remission of sins.' And, as St. John tells us (chs 14-16), that very night our Lord addressed His disciples at length on His love and His relation to the Father and to them, and said, 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.'

In the teaching of our Lord, then, the atonement is the redemption of men from sin by the giving of His life. It is the remission of sins through His death and the shedding of His blood. It is the work of love. It is the corn of wheat falling into the ground that it may perish and, through perishing, bear much fruit. The impressiveness of this teaching is greatly increased when it is taken in connexion with certain events and fragmentary utterances which give the testimony of our Lord's own inner consciousness to the fact that, in His Passion and Death, He engaged in a great conflict with evil, a work given Him by His Father, a work which He was bound to accomplish. The following passages are the most important: Mt 16<sup>22</sup>, Mt

3. Faith.—But though the fuller explanation of the purpose of our Lord's life and death took place only towards the end, He had from the beginning made a demand which implied all that afterwards became explicit. He insisted on a faith which found its supreme object in Himself. The greatness of His personal claim has been already pointed out (see list of passages given above). We have been able to discern something of the meaning of this claim in relation to the doctrine of our Lord's person. But it is necessary also to observe that there is involved a very clear doctrine of the nature of faith. Jesus taught the supreme necessity of faith in God, the great Father. He also taught the necessity of faith in Himself. By the demands which He made, the promises He gave, the gifts He bestowed, He made it clear that He was a faith which should take the form of an absolute trust directed towards Himself. See Mt 8<sup>23</sup> 9<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 29 15<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>40</sup> 21<sup>23</sup> 40 53<sup>36</sup> 6<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>29</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 17-21 10<sup>52</sup> 14<sup>6-9</sup>, Lk 5<sup>12</sup> 13 20 79. 80 8<sup>25</sup> 48. 50 10<sup>42</sup> 17<sup>19</sup> 18<sup>42</sup> 19<sup>39</sup>. 40 In the Gospel of St John, faith of this kind is presented everywhere as the spiritual condition which enables man to become receptive of the highest blessing. See Jn 1<sup>12</sup> 50 21<sup>15</sup> 23 31<sup>18</sup> 36 41<sup>42</sup> 50 5<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>29</sup> 35. 40 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>35-38</sup> 10<sup>9</sup> 16. 27 11<sup>25</sup> 25 12<sup>46</sup> 48 14<sup>9</sup> 12 etc. In these passages and in others in the Fourth Gospel, Christ Himself is the source of God the Father on the one hand, and to those who believe on the other, sums up all spiritual blessing. He is the source of Eternal Life, the giver of the living water, the Bread of Life, the Light of the World, the Good Shepherd, the Resurrection and the Life, the Way, the Truth, and the Life, etc. All these images imply some attitude or act of reception on the part of those who benefit. Therefore we read of the New Birth, the drinking of the Living Water, the eating of the Bread of Life, the following of the Light, etc. And whatever else may be involved, there is, in all these, the teaching that faith on the part of the believer is the condition to the gifts which are bestowed in Christ. See, further, art FAITH.

Our Lord's first teaching as to the Kingdom was a call to repentance (Mt 4<sup>17</sup>). To this we must now add faith, as the subjective means by which the Kingdom is realized, a faith which, when developed, becomes faith in Jesus Christ.

4. The Coming of the Kingdom.—Our Lord came to found a kingdom, a great spiritual and social order of things based on the principle of love, under the Fatherhood of God, and creating a Brotherhood among men. Its members were to enter into this new life through repentance and faith, and in it to realize a righteousness of heart and life far exceeding the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees. The possibility of such a thing in a world like this would have been incredible, but for the way in which our Lord presented and manifested Himself to men. In Him resided the power which would realize the Kingdom. By His death He overcame the forces which opposed the Kingdom, by His life He established it.

But though the Kingdom was a present fact from the moment that Christ brought human souls into a right relation to God, we are taught by Him to think of the Kingdom as yet to come. In the Lord's Prayer we have the petition, 'Thy kingdom come.' And there are many passages which show that these words refer to a great future realization. Mt 8<sup>11</sup> 13<sup>41</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>25</sup>, Lk 21<sup>31</sup> 22<sup>10</sup> Ac 1<sup>6</sup> 7 etc. But clearest of all are the parables of growth—the Tares, the Mustard Seed, the Leaven, the Draw-net, the Seed Growing in Secret. These parables deal with the development of the Kingdom in history and its relation to the world at large. They connect the conception of the Kingdom in the past fact here and now with its future realization, and distinctly eschatological and regards the Kingdom as a perfected state of things in the future. It is plain that our Lord never lost sight of the great final realization of the Ideal. He constantly looked at the present in the light of the future, and taught His followers to live and work with the great end in view (Lk 12<sup>37ff</sup>).

5. The Paraclete.—In the Fourth Gospel we find recorded a very distinct and detailed promise of a special gift by which the disciples of our Lord were to be fitted to do their Master's work after His departure. It occurs in the solemn address of the Lord to His disciples on the night of the Passion (Jn 14-16). 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter (Paraclete), that he may be with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth' (14<sup>16</sup> 17). Again and again in this great discourse our Lord returns to this promise, and in various aspects of the Spirit's work (15<sup>26</sup>). The presence of the Spirit involves the presence of Christ Himself. The Spirit is to teach the disciples, to guide them into all truth, to bear witness of Christ. He has also a mission to the world (16<sup>8</sup>). It is good for the disciples that our Lord should leave them, because the Spirit's coming is dependent on His going. It is plain that the meaning is that the Spirit is to be given as a source of illumination and spiritual power for the people of Christ during the development of the Kingdom in the world. Thus the Spirit carries on the work of Christ.

In the Synoptic Gospels there is nothing as clear in regard to the Holy Spirit. Yet there are passages which, though much less definite, are in harmony with the teaching in Jn 14-16. The connection of the Spirit's work with the future of the Church is implied in Mt 10<sup>20</sup>, Lk 12<sup>12</sup>. See also Lk 4<sup>18</sup>, Mt 12<sup>31</sup>, Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, Lk 11<sup>13</sup>, Mt 28<sup>19</sup>. See, further, art HOLY SPIRIT and PARACLETE.

In Ac 14 we find an important corroboration by St Luke of the promise recorded by St John: Christ charges His disciples 'not to depart from Jerusalem, but to wait for the promise of the Father, which, said he, ye heard from me' (Lk 24<sup>49</sup>). The promise is mentioned but not given.

The work of the Holy Ghost is therefore connected with the extension and development of the Kingdom. He is the inner regenerating power in the individual and the community. He is the Master of the movements of thought guiding into all truth. The movement of the Kingdom is governed by ruling ideas,—ideas which are the great ends as supremely desirable, and so become, in the true sense, ideals. Chief among all such is the idea of the Kingdom. It is the great ideal which is to be realized in and through the love of the Father, by the submission of the hearts to the Son, and under the superintending influence of the Holy Ghost. Thus the aims of men are to be subordinated to the one supreme end, that at last the Kingdom may come in its fulness.

LITERATURE.—It is not possible to do justice to this subject, as all the literature on the subject is too vast to mention. 'Life of Christ' may be found in the works of Weiss, Life of Christ; Dalman, The Life of Jesus; the Messiah; Dalman, The Life of Jesus. The most important work on the subject is the Life of Christ by Sanday's art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings DB is important. Orr's art. 'Kingdom of God,' should be consulted. The writer's Ruling Ideas of our Lord deals with the subject. Among works of a more general kind may be mentioned Seeley's Ecce Homo, Harnack's What is Christianity? (Das Wesen des Christentums), Liddon's Divinity of our Lord, and Larham's Pastor Pastorum. Archbishop Alexander's Leading Ideas of the Gospels deals with the ideas which guided the minds of the Evangelists. It will, however, be found suggestive on the subject of this article.

IDUMÆA (NT Ἰδουμαία, which is also used in the LXX for the Heb. 'Edom).—This land is mentioned once only in the NT (Mk 3<sup>9</sup>), but is also notable as the native land of Herod and his family. The Edom of the OT lay between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah. In the early part of the Jewish exile many of the Edomites overran the south of Judæa, and when the Nabatæans, at some time during the Persian period, conquered their own land, many more joined the earlier settlers in South Judæa, and that district became known as Idumæa. Thus Idumæa at the time of Christ was '... the Southern Shephelah with the ... A. Smith, HGHL p. 239), i.e. roughly, ... of a line from Beth-sur to Gaza. Judas Maccabæus fought against the Idumæans with much success (1 Mac 5<sup>3</sup>) in 164. Fifty-five years later, John Hyrcanus conquered the country, and compelled the people to be circumcised (Jos. Ant. XIII. ix. 1; BJ i. ii. 6). By the law of Dt 23<sup>7</sup> they thus became full Jews in the third generation, though Herod himself was sometimes reproached as a 'half-Jew' (Jos. Ant. XIV. xv. 2). Although the Idumæans were 'sons of Esau,' their interests from this time were entirely merged with those of the Jews, and their country was reckoned to Judæa, Idumæa being counted one of the eleven toparchies of Judæa in Roman times (Jos. BJ III. iii. 5).

IGNORANCE.—1. Religious ignorance is uniformly regarded in the Bible as a moral and spiritual, and not merely as an intellectual, defect. Religious ... always culpable, because the true li ... every man' (Jn 1<sup>9</sup>). The light of reason and of conscience shines even in the darkness of heathenism, and the heathen are plainly in fault if they 'apprehend' it not (v. 5). To put the matter in another way, the truths of Natural Religion carry their own evidence with them, and those who worship the creature instead of the Creator, or who deny that there is a God, or who think that there is no essential difference between virtue and vice, wilfully blind themselves to the truth (cf Ro 1<sup>19, 20</sup>, Ac 14<sup>17</sup>). Yet the ... of the heathen, great as it is, is less than ... those who have received the light of revelation (Mt 10<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>41</sup>). Our Lord specially blames the Samaritans because, having received the Law, they nevertheless remained in ignorance of its Author (Jn 4<sup>22</sup> RV), and neglected to worship Him in the place which He had chosen. But far more culpable than the half-heathen Samaritans were the Jews, who had behind them a long religious ancestry of patriarchs and prophets (Ro 9<sup>5</sup>), who inherited the promises, and to whom were committed the oracles of God (3<sup>2</sup> 9<sup>4</sup>). The chosen race, wilfully blinding themselves to the true meaning of the Scriptures (Jn 5<sup>45</sup>) and to the signs of the times (Mt 16<sup>7</sup>), especially the testimony of the Baptist (Jn 3<sup>25</sup> 32) and the words and works of Jesus (Mt 11<sup>20</sup>, Jn 10<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>21</sup> 15<sup>24</sup>), were punished by having the truth hidden from them in parables (Mt 13<sup>13</sup>), and by having their spiritual understanding darkened (Mt 13<sup>15</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>14</sup>). Of the Jews the most culpable were the leaders—the Sadducees because they were ignorant of the resurrection and the future life, truths inculcated by Moses himself (Mt 22<sup>29</sup>); and the Pharisees and scribes, those blind leaders of the blind, who led their unwary followers into a pit (15<sup>14</sup>). The case of the Pharisees was particularly hopeless, because, being ignorant they thought themselves wise: 'If ye were blind [and acknowledged it], ye would have no sin; but now ye say, We see: your sin remaineth' (Jn 9<sup>4</sup>).

2. Ignorance of Jesus is treated in the Gospel as ... of God: 'Ye know neither me nor my Father ... ye knew me, ye would know my Father also' (8<sup>19</sup>); 'No man cometh to the Father but by me. If ye had known me, ye would have known my Father also' (14<sup>7</sup>). If men do not come to a ... of Christ in this world, Christ will profess ... ignorant of them in the next, and this will exclude them from the joys of heaven (Mt 25<sup>12</sup> 7<sup>23</sup>). Yet the obligation to know Christ in this world applies only to those to whom the gospel has been actually preached (Mk 16<sup>15, 16</sup>).

The reason why ignorance of Christ is regarded as a sin is that the truth as it is in Jesus is spiritually discerned (1 Co 2<sup>14</sup>). Lovers of truth, whose lives are virtuous and holy, perceive intuitively that the teaching of Jesus comes from God. Every one that doeth ill hateth the light, and cometh not to the light ... But he that doeth the truth cometh to the light,' etc (Jn 3<sup>20</sup>).

Among the 'Seven Words' spoken by Jesus from the Cross there is one which bears upon this sin of ignorance: 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Lk 23<sup>34</sup>). In saying this He renewed that condemnation which He had often passed upon ... ignorance, for He implied that those who ... Him had need of the Father's forgiveness—His own ... the words themselves express. But what the saying immediately proclaims is that the sin of ignorance is not beyond forgiveness, even when it has led to the darkest of crimes, nay, that ignorance itself may be pleaded in extenuation (γάρα) before Him who knoweth all. (On the genuineness of the saying see Meyer, Alford, WH [Appendix]).

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The use of illustrations is a noticeable mark of Jesus' teaching. He spoke in similes and metaphors and parables; general rules He illustrated by examples or stated in concrete instances. His aim may be gathered from observing what uses the method actually served.

Stories and similes, concrete facts and instances, catch the ear of the people. He who would win their attention must trick out his message in pictorial garb; he must weave in his truth with earthly fact and incident on the loom of fancy. Such teaching also remains in the memory. Truth pictured makes vivid appeal to the eye, and what the eye sees the memory retains, store for mind and heart to brood over. Jesus knew what was in man, and, desiring His message to be current coin for all, treasure of life for the simplest, He spoke in pictures and similitudes.

Illustrative examples serve also to make abstract truth more easily understood. A tale may enter in at lowly doors, bearing its load of truth and suggestion, when a truth stated abstractly would remain without. The concreteness of the ... his vision of truth and symbol wedded ... of principle incarnated in fact, is closely akin to the ordinary man's ways of thinking and speaking. It is primary; the abstractness of thought, the language of reflexion and analysis, is secondary. Jesus spoke to the people after their own fashion.

These uses are obvious; but they are only surface explanations; they hardly touch the main purpose. When Jesus said (Mt 7<sup>9-11</sup>), 'What man is there of you, who, if his son ask a loaf, will give him a stone? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?', He was aiming at something more than a clear and striking presentation of His truth. He was speaking from the heart to the heart, appealing to their feeling for what is highest and best, for what is reasonable to faith in goodness. His illustration was an axiom, addressed to the heart. 'In theology, axioms are to be an axiom that 'parables do not act as axioms' (Trenchard, p. 40 n.), but they may in fact. The parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18<sup>21</sup>) was an answer to Peter's question, 'How often shall we forgive?' It gives no direct answer to that question. It is spoken not to the discursive intelligence busy about problems, but to the indignations of the generous. A better nature is enlisted against the man forgiven who was not made thereby tender-hearted and pitiful. When the lawyer put the question, 'But who is my neighbour?' Jesus told the story of the Good Samaritan. That parable also does not answer the question directly. It rather sets before the heart the beauty of kindness, and its power to break down barriers between men which the barriers of race and religion may leave standing. An idea, such as that all men are potentially brothers, is apt to be barren, without conviction, without power of intellectual or spiritual inspiration; a story such as this appeals to the human heart by which we live, that tenderness in us which leaps up in admiration of a good man's deed.

The aim of our Lord's teaching was not enlightenment the bringing of clear ideas to the mind; it was to create faith and sustain it. And the form of His teaching—His parables, similes, metaphors, concrete instances—was a means to serve that end. 'After all,' says Newman (Grammar of Assent, 94), 'man is not a reasoning animal; he is a seeing, feeling, contemplating, acting animal.' It is by the heart that man believes unto salvation. There is the seat of the emotions, the joy we have in things, the intuitions of faith, the admirations which rule conduct and fashion character and shape our beliefs. The heart has its own reasons. Visions of what is noble and fair, spells mighty there. And Jesus' illustrations are mostly pictures which that inward eye, music played that the heart there may hear.

Many of Jesus' parables and pictures are more than mere illustrations; they have in them the imagination's power of interpretation, the revealing vision of the poet. The parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18<sup>9</sup>) is more than an illustrative example, it is as Julicher classes it, 'an example of the spiritual worth of humility before God.' It reveals, as in a transparency, the essential hidden evil of a religious class. Our Lord's controversy with the Pharisees sums itself up in this revealing picture where the inner spirit and tendency of Pharisaism is brought to a luminous point. The parable has the force of a revelation, suddenly illumining a whole spiritual world. The same quality is in the illustrations of hypocrisy in Mt 6. These kindle a light in the spiritual imagination. Jesus takes the cases of almsgiving, prayer, fasting. These are not chosen as representing the three spiritual worlds, or spheres of duty—neighbour, God, self (Gore). That activity of the schematizing intellect is foreign to the whole method of Jesus. These were the fashionable religious virtues of the day, and therefore the chosen theatre of hypocrisy. Self-seeking in religion leaves the humble sequestered virtues alone; and Christ's pictures of ostentatious service there, have that direct illumination of the religious and ethical imagination which sets it free from the bondage of all externalism. Many of the parables have this quality, such as the Seed Growing in Secret, the Good Samaritan, the Unmerciful Servant, the Prodigal Son, the Two Debtors.

In the Synoptic Gospels there is an explanation of Jesus' use of parables which is a startling paradox.

It is that He spake to those without it, and that He did so to hide His meaning (Mt 13; Mk 4<sup>11, 12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>10</sup>). It is easy to show that these words are not universally true, and that the aim of Jesus generally was to make Himself understood. So Julicher (Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Parables') rejects this conception, placed on the lips of Jesus, as quite unhistorical. But we find that in all these Gospels this explanation occurs at one place, namely, between the Sower and the Sower as spoken to those without. The interpretation to the disciples. And there the words have a real significance. The parable did not convey its meaning on the face of it. In the circumstances in which it was spoken, it was largely an utterance of the ironic. Jesus was looking on the multitudes, drawn by curiosity and various motives, caring most of them, for the truths He had to tell them; and He gave utterance to the pathetic thoughts of His spirit. He spoke this parable which tells the disappointment of a prophet and the hope that some will know His voice. It is a simple enough parable; and yet a veil does rest upon it for the careless unspiritual many who are listening, though not any veil of subtle allegory. Jesus is speaking of hopes and fears they comprehend not; and, looking on them it was natural that the words of their kindred pathos and irony, should come to His lips, and He should speak about those who hearing understood not and whose hearts were darkened. That explanation has in it a hint of wider suggestiveness. Clearness and directness of speech are not the only sources of enlightenment. 'Art may tell a truth obliquely, do the thing shall breed the thought.' A truth stated objectively, indirectly, in the form of a story, may not compel the less ones may hear it as thou but it has greater effectiveness with those who receive it. That is exemplified in Jesus' latest parables. These are parables the shadow of the Cross rests on them, by their very form, the meaning is veiled somewhat. The intention and the value of that stand out strongly in this contrast. When Stephen stood before the Sanhedrin, he said: 'Ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye' (Ac 7<sup>51</sup>). There is no mistaking that accusation, or evading it; but there is no persuasion there. No wonder the bold truth-speaker was stoned. Jesus says to His enemies, 'Hear another parable'; and after the parable of the Two Sons, He tells the parable of the Householder and his Vineyard. It is the same charge, but spoken indirectly; the reference is left to their own thoughts. That is a way of persuasion; sympathy and love, which are the sources of persuasiveness, have woven a vesture for the truth that, through the imagination, it may reach the heart. See art. PARABLES.

One great, though indirect, value of Jesus' illustrations must not be missed, ie their witness to the man He was, their revealing of His mind and heart. (1) His figurative method of teaching reveals the fashion of His mind. Farrar speaks of 'that kind metaphorical method of expression which our Blessed Lord adopted.' The thought there is of a stress put upon His mind through a sympathetic accommodation to His simple unlearned hearers, as though He first had a thought, and then searched for some simple familiar picture to express it. But a man's customary method of speech shows his manner of thinking. Our Lord 'reasoned in figures, because He had an eye for nature.' Thought and image were born together in His seeing; His was the poet's mind, with its concreteness and beauty, its outlook of the whole personality, its individual vision of things flushed with emotion; and the pictures He set in the light give joy to the generations as they pass because they first of all gave joy to Himself as they arose in His imagination. (2) The illustrations He uses reveal also the simplicity and fullness of His interest in life. It is amazing how the common life of His day passes in procession through His words! The sower in the fields, the merchant on his travels, the fisherman on the beach looking over his catch, the labourers waiting to be hired in the market-place, the beggar at the rich man's gate and the dogs licking his sores, the clamorous woman with her wrongs at the unjust judge's door, the poor woman turning her house upside down for her lost coin, the play of the little children in the streets; and even the faults and follies of men, the Pharisee with his broad phylacteries and wide fringes praying ostentatiously at the street corners, the craft of the dishonest steward, the son who says 'I go, sir,' and goes not, the anxious host begging for a loaf at midnight, and the friend in bed with his children—all interest with which Jesus looked on life. 'The learned eye is still the loving one.' He was no blinker, as some have said, among ideas, no dreamer; but His heart was amid the plain, ordinary men, and ordinary duties; His thoughts of religion found their sphere there.

(3) Jesus' outlook on Nature was full of joy. That is shown, not so much by the abundance of His reference, as by the light in which He places them, the thoughts they brought to Him. He speaks of the hen gathering her chickens under her wings, symbol of His own protecting love for Jerusalem; the sparrows, objects of God's care; the grass in its beauty and the lilies outvying the splendour of Solomon, symbols of the Creator's joy in the work of His hands, seeing He thus clothes these casual flowers of a day with such loveliness and grace. He touches also the common things of our life with the sudden glory of poetry—the growing of the corn, symbol of the upspringing of life in human souls; the care of parents in the home, symbol of the sleeper's providence of the Heavenly Father over all His children; servants waiting for their lord, symbol of our duty to an unseen Master. When Jesus looked on Nature and the universal order of man's life, something great shone through—a Divine and beautiful mystery. It all spoke of the Father in heaven who made and loves it all; it was all instinct with the presence of God's Spirit. The beauty of religion, its tenderness and grace, is there; and the spiritual glory of life. That is an outlook of the fullest joy.

IMAGINATION.—

Imagination is the faculty by which we are able to reproduce mentally the images or 'copies' of past elements of sense-experience. This may be done in three ways. (1) passively, as when we reproduce our mental pictures in the form or order in which we experienced them as sensations, or (2) actively, as when we combine the images of past sensations into fresh groups for purposes of our own, as in the telling of an imaginary story, or (3) creatively, as when these images are used to symbolize abstract ideas, or to illustrate the teaching of moral and spiritual truth. There are great differences in the endowments of individual men and women in these respects. Many have but a faint power or mentally reproducing past events and objects, and among those in whom the power is well developed, some are able best to reproduce visual images (artists), others auditory impressions (musicians), others the images of movement (those possessing the dramatic gift). The poetic or creative temperament is richly endowed with all these aptitudes, and makes a free use of its resources in the creation of ideal scenes and events as a medium for message.

Students of our Lord's personality will at once realize that He possessed the creative temperament in its noblest development. He was psychically endowed with a rich and varied imagination which was disciplined, like all His human gifts, to the finest pitch of efficiency, and consecrated to the highest uses. His discourses are crowded with bright and vivid pictures, symbolic of the great truths which He had come to reveal. They are expressed in language that is rich, musical, and full of verbal colour and rhythmic phrases. In the narrative portions and the parables there is also a striking dramatic element, which gives them wonderful life and movement.

1. Characteristics of the imagination of Jesus—It is the last feature—the dramatic—which is the most prominent quality in the imagination of our Lord. If the form of His teaching can be relied on as an indication of His mental endowments, it is clear that truth naturally clothed itself for Him in the form of concrete pictures and symbolic events. This is the key to the Temptation scenes so vividly described in Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup>. The temptations of His public life became visualized scenes, and in fighting them thus He rehearsed the long drama of His life, its conflicts, and overcame them beforehand. The same dramatic way of dealing with the critical facts of His life and work may be seen in such incidents as are detailed in Mt 9<sup>30-38</sup> 21<sup>11</sup> 26<sup>30-53</sup>, Lk 10<sup>18</sup>, and many others. This instinctive love of a dramatic situation as the vehicle of imparting spiritual truth, is illustrated also in the frequent use of action-scenes full of incident and movement. Sometimes He made a sudden and skilful use of opportunities offered to Him in the course of social intercourse, as in Mk 5<sup>30</sup> 10<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>41</sup>, Lk 5<sup>24</sup> 7<sup>44</sup> 14<sup>1-6</sup> 17<sup>17</sup> etc. In other cases He deliberately created the situation, and then drew the lesson with which He desired to impress the spectators, as in Mk 9<sup>33-37</sup>, Mt 18<sup>3-5</sup>, Lk 22<sup>17-20</sup>, and Jn 13<sup>1-12</sup>. (The incident or the Blasted Fig-tree, if understood as a simple but vivid action-parable, loses all the ethical difficulties which have hidden its meaning from so many commentators.)

The pictorial side of our Lord's personality is scarcely less obvious than the dramatic. He was temperamentally as well as spiritually in the deepest sympathy with Nature in all her varying moods, her wealth of life, her process of growth; and He was a keen and accurate observer of her ways, showing a vivid interest in the life of plants and animals (Mt 6<sup>28</sup> 7<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>26</sup> 8<sup>20</sup>) and in the common experiences of human life. These impressions were all stored up, as He watched them, in the treasure-house of a faultless memory, to be afterwards used as drapery for the everlasting truths of the Kingdom in a way which makes many of His discourses a perfect arabesque of beautiful imagery. His predominating love, however, was for images drawn from the incidents of human life and experience. He seldom used imagery of a purely natural kind, i.e. drawn from the impersonal action of physical or vital forces: there is nearly always some human agent or sufferer in view whose action or suffering invests the simile with a sympathetic as well as an intellectual aspect. Thus He was fond of drawing His word-pictures from the occupations of such familiar folk as shepherds, husbandmen, fishermen; from social customs in the home,—marriage ceremonies, feasts, salutations, journeyings; and even from bodily life and sensations,—the eye, ear, bones, feet, hunger and thirst, laughing, mourning, sickness, sleep, etc. Our Lord's use of natural imagery may be put into words written elsewhere by the present writer

'Nature is interesting to Him only as the handiwork of God, and the mirror of His perfections or providential care for His creatures, or of Him as the Creator of human joys and sorrows. The cold impersonal attitude of the modern scientist towards the Lover of Souls—Nature with its life as applied to conduct—she is a bundle of analogies in the sense of the poet

"Two worlds are ours, 'tis sin alone
Forbids us to descry
The mystic earth and heaven within Plain as the earth and sky"

In this way our view of Nature is beautifully enriched and impregnated with higher meanings, and her operations resolve themselves into a series of delightful human duty and of Divine love' (The Master and the Disciples, p. 67)

The side of our Lord's mind is seen, finally, in the artistic use of language. Whether He spoke in the dialect of the common people, or (occasionally at least) in that form of Greek which was commonly known in Palestine, in which the Gospels have come down to us, it is unquestionable that even if we have His discourses only in translation, they are full of characteristic vividness, terseness, and colour. His sayings and proverbs in fresh applications (Mt 9:17, 11:15, 12:37, 16:25, Mk 10:23, 27 etc.), His love of paradox (see Mt 5:38-42 for four striking instances of this; also Mk 10:23 and Jn 6:53); the exquisite grace of some of His descriptions of natural processes (Mt 6:28, 7:24ff), and of social functions (Mt 25:1-12), together with the symmetrical build of many of His sentences and discourses (esp. Mt 25:1-12), show a mastery over the resources of language to which only a poet whose natural gift had been carefully disciplined to high uses could attain. The more the form of our Lord's teaching is studied, the more does this verbal skill impress the reader as complete and minute.

2. Practical uses of this imaginative element in our Lord's discourses—The method of Jesus being so easy to see how valuable is that it is so easily, vividly expressed quality them all. In order that this quality be effective under the circumstances of the time, it was essential that it should have the marks of simplicity, concreteness, vividness, and brevity. It must be simple, as it was meant to become current in the minds of scholars, disciplined in the use of long trains of thought, well used to abstract lines of reasoning, and capable of retaining these in their memory for a long time; but amongst the common crowd of listeners who had had only an elementary education, and were incapable of giving a close and sustained attention to any train of thought. It must be concrete, because such people always thought and spoke in such terms as were closely allied to their daily experience. It must be vivid, because otherwise no deep or lasting impression could be made on such occasional and unstudied opportunities as our Lord habitually used to disseminate His teaching. And it must be brief and portable, for it was meant not merely for those who listened to Him at the time, but also for those who should afterwards 'believe in his name' through the 'preaching and teaching' of the eye-witnesses and auditors of His earthly ministry. All these ends were perfectly served by the imaginative method of presenting truth chosen by the Great Teacher, and consistently followed by Him throughout His public life. His wisdom is shown by the event. It was probably many years before any large portion of His discourses and life-story was committed to writing. But there are clear indications that great care was taken to give the general outlines of the teaching accurately and without admixture, and that the utmost reverence was felt for the ipsissima verba of their Lord's utterances by the Apostles and their first pupils. Converts were carefully taught from the earliest times in catechumen classes in the 'doctrine of Christ' (cf. 1 Co 15:11, Col 2:2, Lk 11:3), and they were counselled to be specially careful to retain and transmit the exact form in which the teaching (the 'fair deposit' of truth) had been delivered to them (cf. 2 Ti 1:13, a very clear passage). It was only as these first witnesses were one by one removed by death, or so scattered as to be beyond the reach of appeal, that any need for a written version of the Gospel began to be felt. Then the immediate disciples of the Apostles would endeavour to perpetuate their record of the words and deeds of Christ by committing it to writing. In this way the first two Synoptic Gospels may have taken shape, using the common basis of the oral Gospel as a foundation on which to build. In time various versions would arise, which were collated and welded together into a more accurate whole by scholarly men such as St. Luke (11:3). Finally, as the last survivor of the original group passed away, his followers would have a strong desire to rescue his personal reminiscences from oblivion ere it was too late, and thus the Fourth Gospel arose as a supplement to the others.

If the Gospel and the Epistles are compared as to their form, much light is shed on the wisdom of our Lord in using the imaginative style of speech as a vehicle for His oral teaching. St. Paul's involved literary style, full as it is of technical terms, long sentences, and abstract trains of reasoning, could not possibly have served as the vehicle of a spoken Gospel, though, as a supplementary commentary and exposition of the truths enshrined in that Gospel, it is admirably adapted for the purpose. And the same is true, with a few exceptions, of the NT writers.

3. —The example of the Great Teacher—those whose business it is to carry on the Christian function of preaching. In more illiterate periods, preachers naturally followed this method of putting their discourses into a concrete, illustrative, and vivid style; but as books have spread, and the habit of reading has become general, there has been a growing tendency to throw sermons into a more literary form. While this has been partly inevitable and is so far justifiable, it is certain that the pulpit has lost much of its influence because of this unconscious change of method. All spoken discourse should aim at the qualities of simplicity, concreteness, vividness, and brevity of expression, which are so remarkable a feature in the discourses and parables of Christ. The very plethora of books makes this specially needful in an age when the human mind is overburdened with the rushing details of daily experience, and the evanescent appeal of ephemeral literature. Unique as are many of the qualities that belong to Christ as a preacher, and making due allowance for the contrast between the Oriental environment in which He lived and that of our own day, there is nothing that more needs to be built into our training of young preachers than a close study of the method of the Master with a view to adapt it to our own day and circumstances.

IMITATION.—1. Christian Ethics was roughly constituted in the early centuries by the recognition of two moralities—common morality, requiring a minimum of obedience to law from those living in the world, and first-class morality, the super-legal or supererogatory goodness of those who practised asceticism. Into the service of the latter, with its 'counsels of perfection' (1 Co 7<sup>25</sup> with Mt 19<sup>21</sup>—these texts are very early applied in this fashion), all Christian enthusiasm tended to pour itself. This more exacting life is praised as making men resemble the angels. Christ had described the angels as unwedded (Mt 22<sup>30</sup>); an age, preoccupied with problems of sex, fastened upon this as the leading truth in regard to those exalted beings. But it is in point of fact a mere external—and therefore, of course, it is imitable! The essential thing is, that angels 'fulfil God's word' (Ps 103<sup>20</sup>). To our Lord Himself this was the essential about them: 'Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>). And, when we think of that truth, we see that our proper pattern is not the angels, but the Son. About angels we know little, if anything, that is certain. They are supernatural, almost unnatural beings. The Son came into this world that we might know Him, and has obeyed God's will under our own conditions, in their extremest and most burdensome type.

2. This reinterpretation—imitation of Christ rather than of angels—took place within Catholic ethics, with a gain in the direction of living Christianity. The most conspicuous leader was St. Francis of Assisi (1182-1226) 'that child of nature and child of God', angel and half nightingale' (C. Bigg). Long before his time, the pattern of asceticism had been summed up in three virtues, Poverty, Chastity (i.e. celibacy), and Obedience. There may have been pre-Christian influences at work in so moulding Christian monasticism. But the pattern of Christ could also be seen in these virtues. He had 'become poor' (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>); He had 'made himself a eunuch for the kingdom of heaven's sake' (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>); He had been 'obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross' (Ph 2<sup>8</sup>). Of course, historical knowledge and Christian insight—but the Middle Ages were weak in both—see differences as well as similarities. Above all, Christ, who was persecuted and slain as a revolutionary, can hardly serve in fairness as a pattern of blind obedience to constituted human authorities. But, to St. Francis, the requirements of obedience—a rule for his 'Order,' and unhesitating submission to the Pope—were established conditions, which he never thought of. Much the same may be said in regard to poverty. The really important features of St. Francis' character, and of the movement it gave rise to, were as follows. (1) By the idea of imitating the behaviour of Jesus Christ, St. Francis cut his way direct to the centre of things, unhindered, if unhelpt, by the overgrown and often corrupt Church system of his time, and restored new life to personal religion and personal Christianity. (2) His enthusiasm for poverty was a living contribution to religious progress. Poverty to him was no inherited conventional virtue. He joyed in it. And, in this joy, he penetrated beyond externals, and showed that he had drunk from deep and full fountains. Poverty may be acquired by imitation; joy cannot. If there was something of extravagance in St. Francis' love of poverty, there was also a permanent moral idea—the 'simple life.' We cannot here discuss the claims or conditions or limitations of that virtue; but we greet it with reverence in so great a genius as our Saint. Still further, we must recognize in St. Francis' joy the influences of romance. 'Poverty' was his dear 'bride.' It was not for nothing that he lived in the days of chivalry. We recognize, too, the buoyancy of youth; St. Francis 'entered religion' at 25, and died at 44. These are accessories—innocent and touching accessories—at which Christianity may smile, but certainly will not frown. The centre lies deeper. Who can doubt that Christ's own joy dwelt in St. Francis? (3) He was a servant of his fellow-men. Here in part he inherited from the Church. The first ascetics were hermits, living in solitude; but the social instinct, guided by the sagacity of Church rulers, crept after the solitaires, drew them into union, placed them under rule, and in many cases set them to useful work. The two great orders of friars, Dominicans as well as Franciscans, were preachers. But, besides St. Francis and all his followers who really shared his spirit were helpers of men in their needs and miseries; a very genuine part of the pattern set by Christ. (4) The order of Tertiaries—semi-hermits—was a new life in the world; no gallant attempt to imitate the two moralities, and to make personal Christianity, as St. Francis had discovered it, available for non-ascetics. Here then we see the Christianity of imitation at its very best (but, as we have noted, it is more than imitation). St. Francis' Christianity is an all-round, attractive, strong, serviceable, joyous. Why could he not reform the Church by his indirect influence? Perhaps he was too sweet. Perhaps the lingering taint of the theory of two castes and two moralities frustrated him. Again, external poverty might not be in others what it was in St. Francis, the vehicle of simplicity and spiritual joy. Most obviously, external poverty broke down—even Franciscans evaded the full sacrifice. It is little shame to have failed in a region where no one wholly succeeds. Yet we must note that where St. Francis failed, Luther triumphed.

3. Monasticism has left us a literary monument of a kindred type of Christianity; one of the Church's and one of the world's classics; a Kempis' work known by the [historically doubtful] name, The Imitation of Christ. As long as human sorrow endures, and faith is not dead among men, this book will be treasured and held in reverence. Christ died on the cross; we must accept a crucifixion, a denying, an abnegation of self and self-will. There the message of the book stops. Our fellow-men, even our Christian brethren, are only thought of as hindrances to Divine communion, tempters who threaten to impede our sanctification. A Kempis falls far below St. Francis, who served men for Christ's sake with eager loyalty. The dangerous selfishness of this glorious book is not due to externalizing Christ's example. Externally even the Gospel rebuke it with a loud voice. And the book is not external. It has mystical depth and inwardness. My mind touched with the Christian spirit is its strength. But the defects which mar it lie no less deep.

4. The Reformation abolished the 'higher' morality of asceticism, with its imitation of such outward circumstances in the life of our Lord as His poverty or His celibacy. Ordinary lay Christianity was seen to involve a 'more perfect' obedience than the will-worship of the monk. (Recent study of Luther has called in question his insight on such points; but there can be no doubt that he grasped the principle, however his remarks in detail may show the distorting influence of the mediæval tradition). It is also to be recognized that Protestant Christianity, with its emphasis on the Pauline Gospel of the cross—Christ died for us—had less receptiveness for the thought of Christ's example, in several of its forms. Ritschl and some other modern Protestants even assert that Christ's example amounts to no more than faultless fulfilment of vocation—a vocation very different from ours. This paradox belongs to the art 'Example' rather than to the present article. What we have to insist upon is this—Christ cannot be 'imitated' by imitating Him in externals. But has the N1 erred? He who was greatest humbled Himself; the Master of all served, the one perfectly innocent sufferer in all history forgave ungrudgingly; He laid down His life for us, that we might lay down our lives for others (Ph 2<sup>5-8</sup>, Jn 13<sup>1</sup>, Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>21</sup>, Lk 23<sup>34</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). Can this wonderful many-sided example be 'imitated' for a dry scholastic formula like 'imitation' or 'vocation'? We have to be on our guard lest Protestantism, with its rediscovery of the gospel of God's love, and with its repudiation of false (monastic) conceptions of the higher life, should blur at some points that moral claim which is, in truth, higher than heaven—higher as Christ Himself.

5. Asceticism is an obsolete danger in modern Protestant circles; yet it is possible that the tendency to 'imitation' may take other forms. The socialistic reading of Christ's words—socialism crossed with crazy altruism; anarchistic socialism or socialistic anarchism; extremes meet!—is primarily a wooden way of conceiving Christ's teaching, just as imitation is a wooden way of following Christ's example. If we rise into the region of Christian principle, both dangers vanish. But there is a more subtle connexion between ideas of imitation and a false programme for the Christian life. Many schemes of the Atonement (e.g. the late Dr. Moberly's) tell us in substance that Christ initiated a process—to Dr. Moberly, a penitential process of self-mortification; to others, a process of world-redeeming love—which Christians must prolong. This is substantially imitation over again. We are to be saved by 'being such men as He was, too.' The Pauline and Protestant gospel tells us that Christ offered and finished the great sacrifice. We may well recoil from the old vulgar train of thought described by McLeod Campbell: 'He suffered—I shall not suffer'; but God forbid we should dream that we share, in all respects and for every purpose, the lot of Christ. We fill up our measure of suffering if we are found worthy—but we do not fill out an uncompleted Atonement; that was 'finished,' once and for all, in mysterious anguish in a gloria of which springs our new life. We have not much to learn of the dreary external process of mortification till we confess Christ unambiguously as our life and our only hope. We are to resemble Him, partly as the younger born resemble the elder brother, partly as the saved resemble the Saviour. Consequently, this, we are prepared to learn those who follow Him. He has to teach us about the ways of conformity to His image. Protestantism is to be developed on this basis, but must not be abolished. Christian ethics presuppose the Christian gospel. They can never take its place.

ROBERT MACKINOSH

IMMANENCE (Lat. in, 'in,' and manere, 'to remain') means abiding or dwelling in. In general it denotes the existence and operation of one thing within another. In Philosophy it expresses the identity of the originating and causal principle, involved in the genesis of the universe, with the universe itself in its progressive history. In Theology it denotes the indwelling and operation of God within the entire universe, of which He is the first cause and the abiding ground. It stands in contrast with 'transcendence,' which implies that God is prior to, and not limited by, the universe, which depends upon Him for its origin and continued existence. But immanence and transcendence are not exclusive of each other. A correct theistic philosophy gives a place to each of these principles in its exposition of the relations of God to the universe.

The history of immanence is interesting. It is perhaps in the logos of Anaxagoras, as the principle of the universe. In the idealistic systems to which the ideas that are supposed to be archetypal in God become ectypal in the universe, and constitute its real essence, order, and intelligibility, the immanence of Deity is involved. The same suggestion is also implied in the eternal forms of Aristotle, according to which the frame of the world moulded it into a harmonious whole. The Aristotelian distinction between the immanent acts of the soul in the universe and the acts in making the purposes of the universe in a general way.

In the later logos of the School of Alexandria the principle of the logos, especially in the hands of Philo the Jew, also suggests the idea of immanence. Philo perhaps borrowed the term from the Wisdom literature, where it was used in the sense of σοφία or ratio, and applied to denote what Plato had called ideas. This usage of the term logos is interesting in itself and on account of its bearing upon the usage of the same term in the Fourth Gospel.

In modern philosophy the dictum of Malebranche, that we know things truly only when we see them in relation to God, and the monadology of Leibnitz, according to which a vital principle is supposed to lie at the heart of all things, both involve the idea of immanence. Spinoza's pantheism, as, indeed, all pantheism, so emphasizes immanence that transcendence has no place. The absolute idealism of the Hegelian type of philosophy and the Hindu theosophy both make so much of the immanence of the Deity that His transcendence is quite obscured. In the philosophy of our own time there is a tendency towards a relativism of the immanence of God, and this tendency is affecting theology in a wholesome way. The result is a sound theistic philosophy, as the basis for a more vital theology.

This article has to do mainly with the idea of immanence as it appears in the Gospel narrative, and specially as it is exhibited in the teachings of Jesus Christ. The Synoptics do not give as much prominence to the idea of immanence as does the Fourth Gospel. It might be too much to say that transcendence prevails in the former and immanence in the latter; yet it is true that one of the points of difference between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel is the way in which the relations between God and the universe are construed.

1. In the Synoptics there are hints of the Divine immanence in nature which resemble the OT utterances upon this point, e.g. Mt 5<sup>45</sup> 6<sup>30</sup>, Mk 6<sup>21</sup>, Lk 21<sup>29</sup>. Transcendence is not excluded in these passages. God's immanence in man is also suggested by Mt 6<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>20</sup>, Mk 13<sup>31</sup>, Lk 17<sup>23</sup> 11<sup>17</sup>. The fact of the immanence of God in Christ is alluded to in Mt 3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>18</sup> 27<sup>46</sup>, Mk 11<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>2</sup>, Lk 4<sup>1</sup>. That God is immanent in some sense in the subjects of His Kingdom is implied in Mt 10<sup>40</sup> 13<sup>33</sup> 18<sup>2</sup> 28<sup>20</sup>, Mk 11<sup>12</sup>, Lk 13<sup>21</sup>. It may be added that demoniacal immanence in men is often expressed in the Synoptics, e.g. Mt 8<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>45</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>17</sup>, Lk 8<sup>30</sup>.

We can scarcely conclude from these and similar passages that special stress is laid upon the idea of immanence in the Synoptics. The fact that God is constantly in vital and operative contact with the entire universe of being is very evident; but God's being and activity are not necessarily limited by the universe. He is the First Cause of all things, yet second causes have their place and dependent efficiency in the universe. Hence it is that God's transcendence is clearly recognized.

2. In the Fourth Gospel immanence has a larger place. Some interpreters suppose that St. John borrowed many of his ideas, especially that of the logos, from the Platonic philosophy, as represented by Philo of Alexandria, who combined some OT ideas with the philosophy of Plato. But there are differences between the logos doctrine of St. John and that of Philo which entirely exclude the supposition that St. John was a mere borrower.

sign that before the child knows to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land whose two kings Ahaz abhors will be forsaken. In other words, v. 16 interprets the sign as the desolation of Syria and Ephraim. It is therefore a sign, not of disaster to Judah, but of deliverance. We are accordingly confronted with the problem whether the original text is here preserved. It would suffice to bring v. 16 into harmony with vv. 15-17 if the former were to read simply 'for before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, thy land shall be forsaken'; and several scholars have adopted this expedient. In that case the sign is simply one of disaster for Judah. Nevertheless there are serious difficulties in the way of accepting this solution, and the question is forced upon us whether more radical measures are not necessary. Even with v. 16 it does not connect so well with from that, treating the sign as favourable, expressing the conviction that God was with His people, might, of course, be harmonized with either verse. It gains significance only on account of the distress in which the name was given, the mother's faith is a sign only when experience seems to contradict it. The name might therefore be given in the midst of the trouble caused by the Syrian invasion or in the aftermath of the overthrow of Assyria. But Isaiah was to follow from Syria and Ephraim. Not only so, but a little later, in the public exhibition on a tablet of the word Mahe-shalal-hash-baz, and nearly a year later in the giving of this name to his newborn son, he expressed his faith in the overthrow of the coalition. It is indeed urged that the sign of Immanuel would thus be only a duplication of the sign of Mahe-shalal-hash-baz, but there seems to be no reason why such a duplication should be objectionable. Moreover, there is a significant parallelism between the two which points to such an identification of meaning. The time limit in both cases is very similar. In the one case it is before the child shall know to say 'my father and my mother', in other words, the events described are to happen before the infant who has just been born has learnt to utter the first things that a child says. The other time limit is precisely similar, 'before the child knows to refuse the evil and choose the good'. By this time he has learnt to distinguish between good and harmful food. And the very fact that a year later Isaiah was still concerned mainly with the invasion of the allies and his conviction of their overthrow, such makes it the same question preoccupies his attention here. Nor is there any reason to suppose that the sign of Ahaz would make any difference to the character of the sign. Unless, to the contrary, it is natural to assume, the sign offered, assessed the same significance as the sign offered. The present writer accordingly takes the view that the sign is of a favourable character. This involves, it is true, the elimination of v. 16 (and perhaps of v. 17, though this may belong to another prophecy) to be struck out of the passage. Of course, seem easier to eliminate a few words in v. 16 than to strike out a whole verse. Nevertheless, when we look at v. 16 we see that it is practically a whole verse, and that it is a part of v. 16, whereas the words 'thy land shall be forsaken' make no sense at all. The originality of the sign arises, in what precisely did the sign consist? The stress may lie either on the Immanuel, or the son, or the name given to him, or a combination of these. The traditional interpretation has, of course, thrown the stress on the first of these, for it is the sign lay in the virgin-conception. But when the true sense of Immanuel is understood, it is clear that if she were one of the king's sons, and the possibility of an identification with the Messiah would have to be considered. It would be possible to accept, with McClellan, the identification of Immanuel with Hezekiah, the chronological difficulties not being altogether insuperable. A third possible alternative would be to accept the view taken by several scholars, most recently by Whitehouse in the Century Bible, and identify the Immanuel with the community in Zion. We have no evidence, however, that this term was used at that time for the Jewish community, and the identification with one of the king's wives must also be pronounced improbable, in spite of the fact that the name was more than national, directed against the coalition against Judah as a whole. Nor is there any reason for identifying Immanuel with the Messianic king mentioned in 91<sup>7</sup> and 111<sup>9</sup>. It is true that, according to the present text of 88, the land of Judah is represented as Immanuel's land, but it is probable that the text should be corrected in harmony with 81<sup>9</sup>. * Probably instead of 'thy land, O Immanuel,' we should read 'the land, for God is with us,' thus getting a refrain at the end of v. 8 to match that at the end of v. 10. In that case the figure of the bird with wings spread over the land is a symbol of God's protecting care of Judah, shielding her from the combination of all earthly foes. The extreme abruptness of the transition from threat to promise makes it highly probable that the sign is a fragment not connected with the preceding verses. It must even be granted that Marti may be right in regarding it as a later addition; for although the prophecy may be explained as Isaiah's, on the supposition that he is addressing the forces of Assyria as composed of various nationalities, yet taken by itself the reference to the coalition of the nations against Judah recurs as a standing feature of the later apocalyptic.

Messianic identification. With the correction of 88 no reason remains for the personality of Immanuel is an important element in the sign; it is in harmony with similar cases that it is the name and not the person who bears it that is important. This is true, of course, of the children, and, what is still more to the point, of the children. The problem is not only that both of Mahe-shalal and Mahe-shalal-hash-baz are children themselves, but exclusively in their names. We expect the same to be true in this case. Just as the names of Isaiah's two children express, the one his doctrine of the remnant, the other his certainty that Syria and Ephraim would be overthrown, so the name Immanuel expresses the mother's conviction that God is with His people. The sign is no prodigy in this case. For against the king's unbelief and his obstinate refusal to accept a sign there arises the mother's impressive faith, which confronted danger without dismay, and uttered her conviction of God's presence in the name she gave her son. The sign is equally with that of the son of no importance for the sign, that consists in the mother's faith and the son's name. Accordingly it is better to translate 'a young woman' instead of 'the young woman'. Isaiah, however, does not mean precisely that any young woman, who is shortly about to conceive and give birth to a son, may call his name Immanuel. While he has no definite young woman in his mind, he predicts that some young woman will, in the future, conceive and bear a son, to whom she will give the name Immanuel. His language is not that of hypothesis but of prediction.*

2. The way is now clear to discuss St Matthew's use of the passage. This is not the place to examine the subject either of the Virgin-conception of Christ or of the early Christian interpretation of prophecy. It is quite plain that this interpretation was in general very little controlled by the text of the OT passage quoted. It was a polemical character, since it was necessary, against the cavilling of the Jews, to prove the Messiahship of Jesus from the OT. Accordingly the Hebrew text of the passage was ransacked to find parallels with the Gospel text; and it is not unlikely that, at a quite early period, collections of these passages were drawn up for controversial use. The First Gospel is peculiarly rich in Messianic proof-texts, and it is therefore not surprising that for two facts so important to the author as the Virgin-conception and the Incarnation the writer should allege an OT prophecy. But the fact that he has done so creates a very interesting problem, which, however, will be approached differently by those who accept the text of the OT as a fact and by those who dispute it. In the former, the fact itself is the starting-point, and the author had to find in the OT a text appropriate to it. The only question that would really arise would be as to the part played by the LXX in the text of Is 7<sup>14</sup>. In this passage the LXX renders παρθένος, which suggests virginity much more strongly than the Hebrew word. At the same time, the fact that the LXX so translated shows that the author of the First Gospel may independently have taken the word in the same sense. That he did so is rendered not improbable by the fact that his translation differs in some points from that of the LXX. The text of the First Gospel for the doctrine of the Incarnation of the name Immanuel, which might be translated 'God with us' as well as 'God is with us,' probably first drew his attention to the passage, and then the translation of Immanuel by παρθένος would

* The connexion of v. 16 with v. 14 is as follows. A young woman will bear a son and call his name Immanuel. This will be a sign, for it will express a faith which triumphs over the appearance of imminent disaster. And it is truly God-inspired faith, for it will be splendidly vindicated. The child thus born in days of darkness knows how to distinguish between hurtful and proper food, the hostile power will be crushed, and thus the people will be clearly manifested. The sign is a standing rebuke to the king's scepticism.

† The LXX of Is 7<sup>14</sup> reads in B: διὰ τοῦτο δάσει. Κίριος αὐτῶν ὡς ἐμὴν σημεῖον. Ἰδοὺ ἡ παρθένος ἐν γαστρὶ λήμψεται καὶ τέξεται υἱόν, καὶ καλέσει τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἐμμανουὴλ. For λήμψεται, however, καί read ἐξ, which is the same rendering as that in Matthew. For καλέσει we have in K καλέσει; neither B nor K here coincide with Matthew. The text in Mt 1<sup>23</sup> reads Ἰδοὺ ἡ παρθένος ἐν γαστρὶ ἐξείσται υἱόν, καὶ καλέσει τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἐμμανουὴλ.

readily be suggested by his belief in the Virgin-conception.

Among those, however, who regard the belief in the Virgin-birth as a piece of primitive Christian mythology, there has been a controversy as to what led the author to quote this passage, and the relation between that belief and the passage in Isaiah. Many think that the former was created by the latter,* and probably in the form given to it by the LXX. The Hebrew, it is thought, would not naturally have lent itself to this purpose apart from the definite use of παρθένος in the LXX. Several recent scholars, on the other hand, consider that the use of παρθένος is quite insufficient to account for St. Matthew's quotation. They consider that even before the birth of Jesus there had been formed a doctrine of the Messiah, which included among other things His supernatural birth. This was ultimately derived from the pagan stories of children of the gods, but was not taken over directly from paganism by Jewish Christianity. It had arisen on the soil of Judaism itself, and it is in the Judæo-pagan syncretism, with its doctrine that the Messiah must be born of a virgin, that the origin of the belief is to be sought. What was said of Christ was subsequently transferred to Jesus, when Jesus and the Christ were identified. A quotation from Gunkel will make this position clear. After saying that the mythological representations did not make their first appearance in the later Gentile Christianity, he proceeds: 'But this would have been impossible if Judaism itself had not previously possessed this or similar representations. The birth of Christ from the Virgin through the Divine Spirit had, we may assume, already belonged to the Christological dogma before Jesus, just as His birth in Bethlehem and from David's race, and has been transferred to Jesus only at a later time. What we have to learn then, and what will subsequently be shown again, is that this Judaism which found its way into primitive Christianity must have been strongly inclined to syncretism' (Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Verständnis des NT, p. 69). Similarly Cheyne in his Bible Problems, considers that the historical explanation of the statement of the Virgin-birth is that it arose 'in the story of non-Jewish origin current in Jewish circles and borrowed from them by certain Jewish Christians.' He interprets 'virgin' in a peculiar sense. In its original meaning 'it expresses the fact that the great mythic birth-story was independent of the marriage' (p. 70). For him the passage in Mt. 'is a Jewish-Christian transformation of a primitive story, derived ultimately, in all probability, from Babylonia, and analogous to the Jewish trans-

* Cf. Harnack: 'Even the belief that Jesus was born of a virgin sprang from Is 7:14. . . . The conjecture of Usener, that the idea of the birth from a virgin is a heathen myth which was received by the Christians, contradicts the entire earliest development of Christian tradition which is free from heathen myths so far as these had not already been received by the Jews. . . . The Jewish-Christian transformation of a primitive story, derived ultimately, in all probability, from Babylonia, and analogous to the Jewish transformation of the Babylonian . . . in the opening section of Genesis' (p. 93). On the other hand, a good many scholars take the view that the story was created, not simply out of pagan materials, but on pagan soil and among Gentile Christians. This is the view of Usener, Schmiedel, Soltan, Pfeleiderer, and others (see references below). It does not fall within the scope of this article to discuss this question further, since it is concerned simply with the bearing of the LXX translation of παρθένος on the development of the belief in the Virgin-birth of Christ. To rebut the Christian use of Is 7:14 as a prediction of the supernatural birth of Christ, later Jewish translators substituted ve'enis for παρθένος. See VIRGIN BIRTH.

IMMORTALITY.—In the ordinary acceptance of the term 'immortality' connotes 'endlessness'. It has ceased to express merely or solely a denial of physical death, in its incidence or its consequences, and has been extended to include the possibility or actuality of death, considered as putting an end to conscious existence either now or in the limitless future. Whether these two alternatives really mean the same thing, whether to be capable of dying is always and ultimately to die, and so that only is immortal which by its very nature and constitution is not liable to death, while all else perishes,—as is probably the case,—is a question that hardly comes within the scope of the present article. It will, however, be just, and will conduce to clearness, to separate these two considerations; to seek to determine, in the first instance, the teaching of Christ with regard to existence in the limited sense of a denial of existence at death; and, secondly, to review the much wider and more perplexed question of the permanence of this 'immortal' state. 'Does death end all?', according to the mind and teaching of the Founder of Christianity, is an inquiry that needs to be twice raised,—once as it concerns the terminus of the present life upon earth, and again as it refers or may refer to a future to which human thought can set no limit. It is obvious that the first question is comparatively simple and uninvolved; and that upon its answer in the affirmative depend . . . opening the second, which is . . . and involves the most far-reaching and important problems that can present themselves for human consideration.

By some writers the terms used in the NT, and especially by Christ Himself, with reference to a life after death have been further understood to imply * Cf. also the importance of Is 7:14. He thinks the translation 'virgin' is not correct for the belief in the Virgin-birth that it needs. . . . Is 7:14 the translator must have had . . . that motive must have been not philological, but, if I may say so, ideological'. As for the quotation in Mt 1:22, it is perfectly well accounted for as one of the subsidiary Biblical proofs which were habitually sought for by the evangelists. The real supports of their statements were tradition or one kind or another, but their belief in the written word of prophecy led them to look for a justification of these traditions in the prophetic scriptures, and with this amount of justice, that sometimes the traditions and the prophecies had a common origin'. The same view is taken by the scholars who regard the doctrine as purely pagan in origin. See, e.g., Pfeleiderer, Das Uchristentum, 1, pp 551, 694, where he affirms that Mt's use of Is 7:14 was possible on quite other grounds for ascribing . . .

blessedness. Life immortal would thus be not only life in the ordinary acceptance of conscious existence, but it would be life plus felicity. It is perhaps hardly right or wise to saddle the doctrine with this additional connotation. It will, however, be necessary to examine how far the words of Christ suggest or imply that He regarded happiness as an essential and inseparable part of the life to come, or a future existence of misery more or less prolonged as inconceivable unless it were terminated by restoration to bliss or annihilation of consciousness.

There is, however, a further preliminary consideration which must be taken into account. An examination of the whole of Christ upon so momentous a theme, as is suggested by the Gospel, may be expected to yield results not only positive but negative. Positive, inasmuch as upon a subject that concerns the deepest interests of men no great religious teacher can do other than afford some guidance to those who seek knowledge and truth at his lips; and negative, since the revelation which he may venture or see fit to make of his own thoughts will obviously be determined and limited by the character and capacity of his contemporaries. In a sense neither derogatory nor contemptuous towards his hearers, he will refuse to cast his pearls before swine. Environment naturally and inevitably plays a large part in moulding the form into which doctrine shall be cast, and in assigning the bounds beyond which it shall not pass. The teaching appropriate and welcome to the philosophical circles of Athens will fall on dull and inappreciative ears by the waterside or in the fields of Galilee. And of the confessedly greatest Teacher that the world has ever known this may be expected to be pre-eminently true; He will make His sayings accord both as to form and substance with the receptive ability of those to whom they are delivered. There will be many things within the compass of His own knowledge which they cannot now bear (Jn 16<sup>12</sup>). And though He will at times give utterance to sayings hard to be understood (6<sup>50f. 60</sup>), of a depth and significance beyond their comprehension foreshadowed into the full understanding of which only after-generations will be able to grow, the major part of His instruction will not be concerned with these; else would that instruction be barren and profitless to the hearers, no fruitful seed germinating to new spiritual and intellectual life. Moreover, it is precisely these sayings, dealing with the higher, more abstract and supra-sensible side of things, that would be most likely to be lost upon ordinary disciples, to fail to find a place in their memory, and in their subsequent recollections—whether written or oral, of the Master's teaching. Only by the choicer natures, the more refined and contemplative spirits among His followers, such as we conceive the Apostle John to have been, would this aspect of His discourse and doctrine be caught up and treasured, to be afterwards faithfully delivered as words φωνήματα συνειδητά, although for the moment they may have soared far above the care or comprehension of those who first heard them with their outward ears.

Upon a priori grounds, therefore, bearing in mind the character of the people among whom Christ lived and with whom He had to deal, we should expect to find the speculative and philosophic side of doctrine but slightly represented, while stress is laid more upon ethics and the practical conduct of life. The supernatural will be stated, as it were, in terms of the natural, the heavenly of the earthly, and with a constant recognition of the actual needs and circumstances and possibilities of His hearers. Whether and how far this is so in fact only an examination of the texts can show. Such an examination of the more or less direct references in the Gospels to a future life will be most conveniently conducted under the three divisions suggested, viz—(1) a renewed life after death, (2) the permanence of this life, (3) its comprehensiveness, whether it is to be conceived as embracing the entire race of mankind or limited to a part thereof. It will be necessary to take separately the evidence of the Synoptic Gospels and of St. John.

A. The Synoptists.—(1) With regard to the first point little need be said, for indeed there is nothing in dispute. That the teaching of Christ assumes from first to last a conscious life beyond the grave for Himself and His hearers lies upon the surface of His words and precepts: His entire rule of life. The whole tone of His speech, the implications of His parables, the sanctions with which He surrounds His teaching, and warnings, the comparative καὶ οὐρανὸν teaches men to set upon heavenly and earthly things, the gravity and seriousness of His outlook into the future, all show that here at least to Him and to His hearers there was common ground, that He did not need to begin by proving to them that death was not the end of all, but that the universal postulate of religious thought of His day—the resurrection and renewal of personal and conscious life after death. In this respect He was but adopting, assuming, and making the basis of His exhortation and warning what the majority at least of His contemporaries believed.

The repeated references to the coming of the Kingdom of God or of the heavens (Mt 3<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>7</sup> 12<sup>28</sup>, Mk 1<sup>15</sup>, Lk 9<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>9</sup> al.), into which not everyone who professes loyalty will enter (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>); to the Day of Judgment or 'that day' (Mt 10<sup>15</sup> 11<sup>22</sup> 24, Lk 10<sup>14</sup>, Mt 7<sup>24</sup> al.), to His own Resurrection (Mt 17<sup>9</sup> 28 26<sup>32</sup>, Mk 9<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>, Lk 18<sup>33</sup> al.) and the Coming of the Son of Man (Mt 10<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>27f.</sup>, Mk 13<sup>26</sup> 14<sup>62</sup> al.), when those who have confessed or denied Him upon earth will reap as they have sown, in a public confession or denial of them before His Father and the holy angels (Mt 10<sup>32f.</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup> 12<sup>8f.</sup>),—all presuppose and rest upon the foundation of a belief in another life after this. The disciples are to lay up treasure in heaven (Mt 6<sup>30</sup>, Lk 12<sup>33</sup>), the enjoyment of which is clearly not designed for the present. 'In the resurrection' these disciples shall sit upon thrones in the capacity of judges (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>, Lk 22<sup>30</sup>). Even His enemies, who hound Him to death, shall 'see' the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>, Mk 14<sup>62</sup>, Lk 24<sup>30</sup>, Mk 13<sup>26</sup>, Lk 21<sup>7</sup>). The robber, after death, shall be with Christ in Paradise (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>). More than one parable bears emphatic witness to the same belief, for example that of the King and the Wedding Feast (Mt 22<sup>1ff.</sup>), of the Talents (25<sup>14ff.</sup>), of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19ff.</sup>). These and other expressions which might be cited, figurative as some of them undoubtedly are, sufficiently emphasize the form and content of a teaching which is not limited to the present, but always and consistently presupposes a life of active consciousness beyond the grave.

It is doubtful whether even the reputed scepticism of the Sadducees (Mt 22<sup>23</sup> 24, Mk 12<sup>18</sup> 27, Lk 20<sup>27</sup>) is a valid exception to this. The scope and attitude of their education, their professed remaining without a God, and their rigorous adherence to the law, rendered eg. in the conception of a joint and common resurrection to one time and place at which the relationships of this life would be resumed, a disbelief in any sequel after death to the life lived on earth. The incident gives occasion at least to a most emphatic assertion on the part of Christ of the reality of the life that succeeds the present, and an equally emphatic repudiation of the idea that those who have died have ceased to be—'God is not the God of the dead, but of the living, for all live unto him'.

(2) The question of the duration of this new life, the permanence or impermanence of the state after death, presents greater difficulties. Once again it may be said in anticipation that the probabilities of the case are strongly in favour of the former hypothesis. A teacher of the elevation and spirituality of Christ would hardly be likely to suggest to His hearers as a reward for following Him a prolonged existence indeed, but one which closed in the dark darkness of oblivion; and if He wished to convey the thought that in this respect a sharp distinction prevailed between those who loved and obeyed Him and those who did not,—the former are to be immortal, the latter entirely cease to be,—He would do so very clearly and emphatically, as presenting a further powerful and almost overwhelming incentive to hearken to His words. Moreover, it is to be noted also that the conception of 'endlessness' in the abstract is not one easily formulated, and that a doctrine of this character, to be present in His teaching, may very well prove to have been set forth in the simplest terms, rather by way of suggestion and illustration that would appeal to His hearers, than in the rigorous language of a scheme of metaphysics. The more important terms that bear upon this point are collected and will be conveniently examined together at a later stage. A few expressions only from the Synoptic Gospels call here for notice.

One of the most important passages, rather, perhaps, on the ground of what it implies than of what it states, is the declaration recorded in St. Mark's Gospel (16<sup>18</sup>) of the permanence and inviolability of Christ's Church, founded and built up as it is upon Himself.* The Speaker can hardly be conceived as thinking of a mere temporary duration of that Church, united as it is with Him in the closest of all bonds; the destruction or annihilation of the one would involve a like fate for the other; 'the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it' now or henceforth. And if the Church is to remain, then necessarily its members collectively; for the Church is the members.

It may be said also that the abiding nature of Christ's words (Mt 24<sup>35</sup>, Mk 13<sup>31</sup>, Lk 21<sup>33</sup>), under the circumstances of their utterance, presupposes the continued existence of intelligent receptive hearers and doers. The permanence of His words is contrasted with that which in the universe appears most permanent and unchanged, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away' (Mk 13<sup>31</sup>, cf. Mt 5<sup>18</sup>, Lk 16<sup>17</sup>); in no part or degree shall their accomplishment fail to be achieved. But this complete fulfilment does not imply the cessation of their effect upon and in those for whom they are spoken. Rather is it the beginning of a new life, which is only then perfected.

The literal demands of these passages would be satisfied by what has sometimes been termed 'racial' or 'collective' immortality; in which the race might be supposed to persist, while the individuals, each and all in turn, perished. Such an interpretation could not be ruled out of court on the ground that it is not suggested elsewhere in Christ's teaching. But a conception so remote and unusual would seem to require much more clear and definite exposition, and is hardly consistent with the numerous references to a personal and individual survival.

In a negative sense also phrases like τὸ τέλος

* It is strange that ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ ἐκείνῃ is still sometimes referred to Peter. The Speaker, or the Evangelist who reports Him, is playing upon the name in a characteristically Oriental manner. The similarity of the sound forms to Oriental thought a real bond of connexion between the persons. The whole point of the play is lost, and the expression reduced to meaningless and absurdity if ἡ ἐκείνη and ἐκείνη are identified (cf. 1 Co 10<sup>4</sup>, and in Mt 9<sup>1</sup> Gn 2<sup>2</sup>, Ex 21<sup>6</sup> etc.).

The indications which the Synoptic Gospels afford on the subject of the comparative duration of the existence of the righteous and the wicked after death are almost wholly concerned with the significance of words like αἰώνιος (κόλασις αἰ. Mt 25<sup>46</sup>, πῦρ αἰώνιον 18<sup>8</sup> 25<sup>41</sup>, αἰώνιον ἀμάρτημα Mk 3<sup>28</sup>, εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα ἰδ.). and will be more conveniently examined together (see below). Here it need only be said that parables such as those of the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Wise and Foolish Virgins, or the Wedding Feast, do not in themselves suggest or demand any inequality of treatment as regards the mere duration of the allotted punishment or reward; and that references to the Judgment, the Day of Judgment, or the Last Day are equally neutral, as far as direct statement is concerned. While the burning of the tares in the parable of the Wheat and the Tares (Mt 13<sup>30</sup>), if the detail is to be pressed as anything more than the natural and appropriate setting of the story,—the legitimate and necessary end of weeds,—rather points in the direction of permanence and indestructibility. The end is not annihilation of matter, but a change of form. And this particular feature of the parable might admit of interpretation as involving a renovation through suffering, but is not involved by any theory of absolute cessation or being. Similarly, it might be urged that the πῦρ ἀσβεστον of Mk 9<sup>48</sup> (cf. v. 45) implies the permanence of the fuel on which it feeds. It is clear, however, that no secure or decisive argument can be based on what are obviously allusive and metaphorical expressions.

B. St. John.—Within the Fourth Gospel, where, if anywhere in the record of our Lord's teaching, we might expect to find a reasoned and philosophical doctrine of a future life, that teaching is so entirely, or almost entirely, conveyed in connexion with a special phraseology, the leading terms of which are ζωὴ, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, and εἰς τ. αἰῶνα, that little need be said by way of anticipation of the special investigation of these terms. It is worth noting, however, at once, in view of the interpretation of these expressions which will be urged below, that every reference in St. John to a definite termination or close of a zōē is, as we saw was the case in the Synoptic Gospels, such as to presuppose and assume a continuation beyond. The conception of an absolute end, beyond which there is nothing, is as foreign to the thought of this Gospel as to that of the others. There is a 'last day' (τῇ σελῇ ἡμέρᾳ, 6<sup>39</sup>, 44 54 11<sup>24</sup> 12<sup>34</sup>, a phrase not found in the Synoptists); but it terminates one age only to usher in another more glorious. It is (κρίσις) again in St. John does not await the setting up of a future tribunal; it is immediate conviction, wrought by the presence of the light. And in the one passage where it is definitely relegated to the future (5<sup>29</sup>) the parallelism of the phraseology (ἀνάστασις κήρυξις—ἀνάστασις ζωῆς) shows that whatever threatening of suffering or retribution may lie behind the word, there is no thought of extinction, or of a final end, in the mind of the Speaker,—they that have practised ill (RVm) come to the resurrection equally with those that have done good. He cannot be conceived to mean that they are raised merely that forthwith, or after a longer or shorter period, they may be destroyed.

It is in St John also that the most emphatic assertions are found—apart from the special phraseology to which reference has been made—of the abiding blessedness and freedom from ill of those who believe in Christ. 'He that believeth in me οὐ μὴ ἀποθάνῃ' (11<sup>26</sup>); 'he that drinks of the Christ-given water 'οὐ μὴ διψήσῃ' (4<sup>14</sup>); 'he that cometh unto me οὐ μὴ πεινάσῃ, and he that believeth on me οὐ μὴ διψήσῃ πῶποτε' (6<sup>35</sup>). The 'many mansions' and the prepared place of 14<sup>2</sup> are clearly intended to convey the assurance of more than merely temporary resting-places. Finally, the prayer that all His followers may be one, as He is one with the Father (17<sup>11, 21</sup>), and may be with Him where He is (v. 24), implies for those who are thus united a coequal duration of existence with Himself.

For the believer, therefore, the future, thus conditioned and defined, is a life of blessedness. But there is nothing to suggest, much less to show, that the continuance of the life is dependent upon its felicity; or that these two features are other than independent, no necessary connexion between them which would make an eternal but unblessed life a contradiction in terms.

αἰών, αἰώνιος, eis τὸν αἰῶνα or τοὺς αἰῶνας.—The primary significance of the term αἰών is not seriously in question. 'Age' or 'period' suggests a limited stretch of time marked by a definite close. In this sense the word is found in the Gospels, with reference to the present era under which the speaker is living, either simply or as ethically characterized by sin and corruption. The cares τοῦ αἰῶνος (Mt 13<sup>22</sup> || Mk 4<sup>19</sup>); the sons of this αἰών are wiser than the sons of light (Lk 16<sup>8</sup>); οὗτος ὁ αἰών is contrasted with the αἰών that is to follow it as οὐ μέλλων (Mt 12<sup>32</sup>), or ἐκεῖνος (Lk 20<sup>34</sup>); and the latter appears again as ὁ ἐρχόμενος αἰών in Mk 10<sup>30</sup> || Lk 18<sup>30</sup>, where the present is οὗτος ὁ καιρὸς. It is worthy of notice that in one of the above passages (Lk 20<sup>35</sup>) the future αἰών is something to be gained (τυχεῖν); its nature or characteristic, therefore, was more prominent to the writer's mind than any mere question of duration. In one context, the parable of the Tares in St. Matthew, the end of the present age is indicated (ἡ συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος (Mt 13<sup>43</sup>), and the same phrase is τὸ τέλος αἰῶνος later in the Gospel, once by the same writer (v. 17), reference to the Parousia, which they assume to be the end of the αἰών (24<sup>3</sup>), and Himself, when He asserts His presence with His disciples ἕως τῆς συντέλειας τοῦ αἰῶνος (28<sup>20</sup>).

In the last two passages especially it is clear that in no shape or form is there attached by the Speaker or His hearers to the phrase 'end of the age' the thought of a termination of personality or conscious life. The close of the one epoch marks the opening of another, into which pass without interruption the actors and participants in the present. The promise given to the disciples of personal association with Himself, or rather of His personal association with them—an association which is already subsisting (ἐγὼ μεθ' ὑμῶν εἰμι, Mt 28<sup>20</sup>), could hardly have been couched in more emphatic or significant terms, or in words less suggestive of a possible severance, however clearly they may admit or even require the thought of a change of the conditions under which it is maintained.

αἰών is also twice used in the Gospels with reference to the past, ἀπ' αἰῶνος Lk 1<sup>70</sup>, ἐκ τοῦ αἰῶνος Jn 9<sup>9</sup>. In neither case are the words those of Christ Himself. And all, perhaps, that need be said is that the speakers, Zacharias and the man born blind, employ the phrase to denote in an indefinite kind of way the whole antecedent period of human history— which the conditions of life upon the earth have been such as they now know them to be, or believe them to have been in former times.

Elsewhere in the Gospels, the word under consideration is found only in the phrase eis τὸν αἰῶνα, or eis τοὺς αἰῶνας. The latter occurs in Lk 1<sup>33</sup> and in the inserted doxology of Mt 6<sup>13</sup> (retained in the margin of the Revised Version). It may fairly be regarded as merely a traditional form of the other, immediately before and after, and the yet more emphatic expression eis τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰῶνων employed especially in the Kyrie, and by St Paul in doxology. Eis τὸν αἰῶνα occurs once in St. Matthew and St. Luke (Mt 21<sup>19</sup>, Lk 1<sup>55</sup>), twice in St. Mark (3<sup>28</sup> 11<sup>14</sup>), and twelve times in St. John (4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>51, 58</sup> 8<sup>35</sup> 12<sup>32</sup> 11<sup>26</sup> 12<sup>34</sup> 13<sup>8</sup> 14<sup>16</sup>), constituting indeed this Evangelist's sole use of the word αἰών, with the exception of the phrase above noted (9<sup>9</sup>). Setting aside Mt 21<sup>19</sup> || Mk 11<sup>14</sup>, which condemns the fig-tree to perpetual barrenness, and where μηκέτι eis τὸν αἰῶνα is a strong negation of any possible fruitfulness at any time; and the eis τὸν αἰῶνα of St. Luke, of which the first is Messianic and expressly asserts the endlessness of the Messiah's kingdom, and the second has reference to the Divine attitude or action towards men, which also can hardly be thought of as subject to termination

; the remainder may be classified as negative. In the former, the phrase eis τὸν αἰῶνα qualifies some verb expressive of continuance or life (ζῆν Jn 6<sup>51, 58</sup>, μένειν 8<sup>35</sup> 12<sup>34</sup>, εἶναι 14<sup>16</sup>); in the latter it is joined with a more or less emphatic negative, and denies the possibility of the continuance to which the verb refers (οὐκ Mk 3<sup>28</sup>, Jn 8<sup>58</sup>; οὐ μὴ Jn 4<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>51</sup> 11<sup>26</sup>).

Of all these passages it may be said at once that the Speaker clearly has in mind a state of things of which no reversal is by Him conceived as possible, either now or at any future time. In presence of natural death, the solemn declaration that he who believes οὐ μὴ ἀποθάνῃ eis τὸν αἰῶνα (Jn 11<sup>26</sup>) does not merely defer the date, but repudiates the possibility of anything that deserves to be called death for the believer. The bond-servant, again, whose sojourn in the house of his master comes to an end, is expressly contrasted with the son who μένει eis τὸν αἰῶνα (Jn 8<sup>35</sup>); and the same expression is used of the Christ (12<sup>34</sup>), with the same associated ideas of perpetuity and perpetuity. Peter rejects his Master's service in washing his feet (13<sup>8</sup>)—a rejection which he immediately after gladly retracts—not certainly with the idea that he may accept the offer on some or any future occasion, but sincerely, and as far as his present thought is concerned, finally. And life eis τὸν αἰῶνα (6<sup>51, 58</sup>) is not limited, terminable life, merely lengthened out as compared with the present, but is a life that needs no artificial and bodily sustenance to enable it uninterruptedly to endure. The connotation of the phrase, whether on the lips of Christ Himself or employed by another, evidently implies an outlook into a future to which the thought of the writer or speaker neither assigns nor conceives it possible to assign a limit.

The same considerations will apply to the adjective αἰώνιος, and especially as it is used to qualify ζῶν in a phrase which becomes a distinctive feature of St John's Gospel and First Epistle. For the word itself the somewhat question-begging rendering 'age-long' has been offered. In such a rendering it is evident that all depends on the conception the writers had formed of the 'age,' and the associations it bore to their minds. If they thought of it as definitely terminated or terminable, then αἰώνιος is equivalent to 'temporary.' If they αἰώνιος and wrote of it without any associated αἰώνιος a limit or end, or if the context clearly intimates that no such idea would have been admitted, then so far αἰώνιος is synonymous with 'immortal,' 'everlasting,' or 'eternal.' And it appears undesirable to introduce a new and ambiguous term. Apart, however, from the phrase ζωὴ αἰώνιος, the adjective is of rare occurrence in the Synoptic Gospels, and is not used by St. John. It is found three times in St. Matthew in association with terms expressive of suffering or retribution to be endured in the future (το πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον, 18<sup>23</sup>; ὁδὸς αἰώνιος, 20<sup>30</sup>). St. Luke has a reference (10<sup>19</sup>) to τὰς αἰωνίους σκηνάς, 'the eternal tabernacles,' open to those who have been far-sighted enough to secure to themselves friends while it was in their power, from whom in their own day of need they may claim favours and return in kind. And a significant and unique phrase in Mk 3<sup>29</sup> ὁ δ' ἂν βλασφημήσῃ . . . ἐνοχὸς ἐστὶν αἰωνίου ἁμαρτήματος, suggests far-reaching conclusions, with regard to which all that perhaps need be said in this place is that it stands here as an emphatic addition to an emphatic affirmation that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit hath not forgiveness εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. The context, therefore, precludes the possibility of αἰώνιος in a sense contrary to the αἰώνιος preceding words, as though the writer might be thinking of an act of sin committed once for all, and then with all that it entailed definitely and finally set aside.

The reading ἀμαρτίας is sufficiently decisively attested by the witness of NBLA 28. 33, the Latin and other versions, and is adopted by all editors. It is supported also by the Sinaitic Syriac, mutilated, however, in this verse, if the transcript (1894) may be trusted. The TR ῥήματος is found in NCP and the cursives, with one or two Latin manuscripts, and the Peshitta Syriac. The various reading ἁμαρτίας, C<sup>2</sup>D 13. 69. 346, would seem to be a correction of ἀμαρτίας designed to introduce into the text the meaning of 'sinfulness' as distinguished from 'a sin'. Cf. H. B. Swete, in loc., a not wholly satisfactory note. The true exposition seems to be given by E. P. Gould in his commentary: "An eternal sin may be one subjecting the person in its consequences, that is, to suppose that it describes for the impossibility of the forgiveness by the permanence of the sin attached to endless sin. This is the punishment. Sin reacts on the nature, an act passes into a state, and the state is not a measure of the act, but the result of the sinful state beyond recovery."

With regard to the phrase ζωὴ αἰώνιος, there is a striking difference in its associations in the few passages in which it is found in the Synoptists, and in the more frequent use of St. John; a difference which seems to reflect the varying attitude of the writers towards the teaching of Christ. In the Synoptists the sphere of ζωὴ αἰώνιος is in the future. It is to be inherited (Mt 19<sup>29</sup>), and to be received in the coming αἰών (Mk 10<sup>30</sup>, Lk 18<sup>30</sup>) in recompense for that which the disciples of Christ forego in this; which the ruler (ἄρχων, Lk 18<sup>18</sup> || Mt 19<sup>16</sup>, Mk 10<sup>17</sup>), or lawyer (νομικός, Lk 10<sup>25</sup>) conceives that he may inherit or attain (οὐκ ἔστιν, Mt. l.c.) by virtue of good deeds in the present. In St. John, on the contrary, ζωὴ αἰώνιος is a present possession. The believer has or may have it (Jn 3<sup>36</sup> 5<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>1</sup>, 3<sup>15</sup> 6<sup>40</sup>); and the bestowal of this gift is described as the express aim and purpose of the coming of the Son into the world and of His death, the fruit of the Father's love (3<sup>16</sup>) and will (6<sup>40</sup>), but conferred by the Son Himself (10<sup>28</sup> 17<sup>2</sup>). In one passage also where the same phrase is used, the closeness of the fellowship with Himself implied in the possession of ζωὴ αἰώνιος is mystically described as an eating of His flesh and drinking of His blood, and is associated with the resurrection at the last day (6<sup>54</sup>). This last passage would by itself prove, what the others assume, that ζωὴ αἰώνιος, though present, is not limited by the present. Elsewhere there is an approach to the Synoptic standpoint of a future life over against or following on that now lived, although sight seems never to be entirely lost of the conception of ζωὴ αἰώνιος as subsisting already and now attainable. He that hateth his soul (ψυχὴ) in this world will keep it εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον (12<sup>50</sup>), the meat (βρώσις), the gift of the Son of Man, abideth unto eternal life (6<sup>27</sup>). The same thought recurs in Christ's words to the woman of Samaria; there it is the water, His gift, which becomes a well of water springing up unto eternal life (4<sup>14</sup>). And, finally, in connexion with the same incident, the harvest, the ripeness of which the disciples are bidden to εἰς αἰῶνα laid up unto a future which is under εἰς αἰῶνα and place; the εἰς αἰῶνα together fruit εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, and εἰς αἰῶνα sower in a common joy (4<sup>30</sup>).

Once also Christ appeals to the belief of His hearers in the present εἰς αἰῶνα eternal life; they think that they have it in the OT Scriptures, missing the spirit there, and the εἰς αἰῶνα of these Scriptures to Himself, and εἰς αἰῶνα the letter (5<sup>40</sup>). A somewhat εἰς αἰῶνα underlies the answer of Simon (22<sup>30</sup>) to the question whether he and the Twelve intend to follow the example of others, and be εἰς αἰῶνα by 'hard sayings'; 'Thou hast the words of eternal life' (6<sup>68</sup>),—words, that is to say, which in their spirit and teaching bring ζωὴν αἰώνιον to the hearers. Finally, lest, as it were, any lingering possibility or suggestion should remain of a temporal εἰς αἰῶνα to be understood in the phrase, or of its being confined under a merely temporal category, it is twice expressly defined in terms which are ethical and spiritual, and transcend all limitations of time or change; the Divine ἐντολή, committed by the Father to the Son and by Him transmitted to the world, εἰς αἰῶνα (12<sup>50</sup>); and in similar pregnant words (17<sup>3</sup>) ζωὴ αἰώνιος is the learning to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He has sent.

All the passages in which this phrase is found in the Gospels have now been passed in review. An extension of the examination to the remaining books of the New Testament would not modify the conclusions reached, or throw fresh light upon its meaning. It is used twice by St. Luke in the Acts (13<sup>46</sup>, 48); by St. Paul in the Romans (2<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>22</sup>), Galatians (6<sup>8</sup>), and Pastoral Epistles (1 Ti 1<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>, Tit 1<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>7</sup>); by St. John himself in his First Epistle (1<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>25</sup> 3<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>11</sup>, 13. 20; the adjective not elsewhere), and by St. Jude (v. 21). These conclusions are entirely in harmony with the results obtained from a consideration of the term αἰών, or of the adjective αἰώνιος standing by itself. ζωὴ αἰώνιος is in its significance independent of time-limits, and may be described indifferently as ethical present or future. When, moreover, the occasion offers to indicate its characteristics and meaning by definition, that definition is framed not on the lines of time and space, as here, there, or elsewhere, now or then, but is wholly ethical, supernatural, belonging to the realm of the mind and spirit, and lifting up ζωὴν αἰώνιον beyond the touch of change or end, into the region of the changeless, the immortal.

At the risk, therefore, of repetition, it must again be pointed out that words and phrases which are crucial for any doctrine of immortality as taught by Christ in the Gospels, so far from implying or suggesting an absolute termination whether nearer or more distant, to that future which the speakers or writers have in mind, seem to indicate that no such idea was ever present to them, and in some passages, which are neither isolated nor unimportant, a . . . of the writer's thought in t' . . . context appears to exclude the . . . such limit being found at any definite point or place in the 'age' towards which his gaze is directed

There remains a group of words and phrases to be referred to, which with more or less distinctness characterize the future, or contrast it with the conditions of the present. All of them, when used in their fullest sense, imply non-mortality, but they do not bear directly upon the question of the duration of existence after death, which, as we have seen, has come to be the chief element in the connotation of the term 'immortality'. The chief of these is ζωή with its derivatives, including the phrases of which it forms a part. ζωή in the Gospels is not mere physical life, but is an expression for the higher life, the life which is life indeed, life in its fullest, richest aspects. Such life was in the Word (Jn 1<sup>4</sup>); it is Christ's gift to His disciples (10<sup>28</sup>, cf. 6<sup>33</sup>); nay, He is Himself 'the life' (11<sup>25</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>). It is so good a possession that to 'enter into life' is worth the sacrifice of an eye or a limb (Mt 18<sup>9</sup> || Mk 9<sup>43, 45</sup>). It begins after death (Jn 5<sup>24</sup>)—not in a temporal sense, but when θάνατος as a state ceases to be; and it is a 'resurrection of life' to which the well-doers will come forth from the tomb (v. 29). 'To have life in himself' is an attribute of the Father, and is His gift to the Son (v. 26); and this 'life' or 'eternal life' is repeatedly stated to be the present possession of the believer (Jn 3<sup>15f. 36</sup> 6<sup>47</sup> 54), the gift of Christ which some of them wilfully refuse (5<sup>40</sup>), and which the unbelieving will not see (3<sup>36</sup>), but which is . . . declared to be the final end of His coming . . . world (10<sup>10</sup>, cf. 20<sup>31</sup>). The words which He has spoken are ζωή (6<sup>33</sup>), and His commandment is ζωὴ αἰώνιος (12<sup>50</sup>). None of these passages suggests that the thought of a termination of the 'life' was present to the mind of the Speaker; some are hardly compatible with such a thought, and others absolutely forbid it (e.g. Jn 1<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>26</sup>). This ζωή, therefore, is fittingly represented as αἰώνιος.

A similar absence of limitation will be found to characterize expressions such as σώζεσθαι, σωτηρία, etc., which describe the future from the point of view of deliverance from the present, its calamities and its evils. These terms, however, are not in themselves suggestive of duration, except so far as their results are involved; and, as doctrinal terms, belong in the New Testament rather to the Epistles than to the Gospels. In the eschatological discourses, however, of the Synoptic Gospels, 'salvation' is described as a state to be attained by those who endure εἰς τέλος (Mt 10<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>13</sup> || Mk 13<sup>13</sup>); the saving of the life or soul (ψυχή, cf. Lk 6<sup>9</sup>) is strikingly said to be the result of willingness to lose it for Christ's sake (Mk 8<sup>35</sup> || Lk 9<sup>21</sup>, cf. εὐρήσει αὐτήν, Mt 16<sup>26</sup>); and in St. John the salvation of the κόσμος is the purpose of the Divine mission of the Son (Jn 3<sup>17</sup>), the salvation of His hearers, the end of the words . . . He imparts (5<sup>34</sup>). Hence 'salva . . . as beyond an 'end'; τέλος is rather a crisis than a final close, the entrance into new conditions and a more gracious environment. Both thought and phraseology become meaningless if the subjects of the change are conceived as either annihilated or reduced to unconsciousness.

Agrapha. Of the 'unwritten' Sayings, few have interest or importance for the present subject. The most noteworthy and authentic is that which is embodied in St. Paul's argument of 1 Th 4<sup>13-17</sup>.

Whether all or any of this is intended to be a direct citation of Christ's words must remain uncertain. The teaching of the passage is, however, founded upon a λόγος Κυρίου. And though it has in view only 'the dead in Christ,' and their position of privilege and priority as compared with those alive at the time of the Lord's descent from heaven, it distinctly asserts of these that they will be 'for ever' (πάντοτε) with the Lord. The writer therefore contemplates for them an eternal co-existence with the Lord, and he claims that for this doctrine he has the authority of Christ Himself.

Of the Logia from Oxyrhynchus the mystical Saying, 'Except ye fast to the world, ye shall in no wise find the kingdom of God; and except ye keep the Sabbath, ye shall not see the Father' (Log 2; Grenfell and Hunt, p. 10), may be said to imply that those who do so fast and truly keep the Sabbath will see the Father, and therefore live with Him. Of the later Logia also, which were discovered in 1903 (Oxyrhynchus Papyri, iv. p. 1 ff.), the Introduction, as it is named by the editors, apparently quotes Jn 8<sup>52</sup>—the hearer of these words 'shall not taste of death.' And the first and . . . both make reference to the Kingdom which shall be a place of rest to him who seeks and finds. These indications are all of them slight, and do not add anything to the teaching of the Gospels. But as far as they go they are in harmony with what we have found to be the constant . . . Scripture of the words of Christ.

The most striking and suggestive feature, therefore, of all these references in the Gospels to the future, and of the doctrine which they may be understood to imply, is the absence of any indication of a termination of the new conditions which they introduce. In some instances, indeed, the writer's statement . . . regarded as colourless in this respect, and . . . and context of his words would not . . . contradicted by an assumption that these conditions were themselves temporary, and at some indefinite period superseded by others. Elsewhere the tone and context strongly support, if they do not compel, the view that the state of . . . was contemplated, as far as the forecast or the speaker was concerned, as permanent. In a third and most important series of passages, the same expressions and phrases are directly applied to the Divine Being and to His Kingdom in such a manner as to show that no thought of a cessation or close could by any possibility have entered into the mind of . . . or have been regarded by Him as con-

Moreover, the change of circumstances thus introduced involves no interference with the conscious life, not, at least, to the extent of reducing it to unconsciousness. The subjects of the change are represented as speaking, feeling, and willing, with all their faculties under control and in action. Nor is there any suggestion that this condition is occasional or temporary; it is, on the other hand, tacitly assumed to be usual and a matter of course.

Further, also, most prominent and characteristic examples of this manner of regarding the future were found to be . . . with the terms αἰών and its derivatives. This word, originally apparently denoting a definite age, marked off by beginning and end, had come to be regularly employed to denote an 'age,' the beginning of which was, indeed, sometimes more or less obscurely indicated, but to which the Speaker did not assign a further limit, and, in some instances, would clearly have rejected the idea of a limit as contradictory and impossible. The thought underlying these expressions is not that of a terminable period, but of a limitless progression.

bility of forgiveness. On the central and essential point the three reports are at one.

The significance for the doctrine of immortality of the parable or apocalypse of Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>, with the sentences pronounced on the 'sheep' and 'goats' and the penalties incurred, lies in the application of identical words and phrases to describe the duration of that future into which both pass from the judgment-seat. If the ζωή of the righteous is αἰώνιος, so is the κόλασις of the wicked (v<sup>46</sup>); the fire into which the latter depart is αἰώνιον also (v<sup>41</sup>), although this word is not applied to the Kingdom prepared for the righteous (v<sup>34</sup>). It is surely an abuse of language to maintain that the Speaker designed to convey a different meaning in the two instances. If, as we have seen reason to believe, the term αἰώνιος carried with it the thought of the absence of an assigned or assignable end to that vista of the future contemplated by the Speaker, or, in other words, was practically identical in significance with our 'immortal,' 'eternal,' it cannot justly be shorn of this connotation when it is applied to the 'punishment' which overtakes those on the left hand of the Judge.

αἰώνιος is found in Jn 5<sup>29</sup> which has some subject. Its importance for a doctrine of universal resurrection must not be overestimated; for the statement that 'all who are in the tombs shall come forth' appears to assert the same equality of resurrection as regards the duration of the revived existence. It would not be difficult, indeed, to draw out at length a similar proof for the words ἀναστῆναι and ἀνάστασις to that which has been attempted above for αἰών and αἰώνιος; and to show that these expressions never, on the lips of Christ and in the Gospels, denote a resurrection which is the prelude to a new life leading only to a new death. On the contrary, ἀνάστασις ushers in another period and fresh conditions of existence, of which no termination is contemplated or conceivable. 'All that are in the tombs . . . shall come forth.' And as the 'resurrection of life,' the portion of those who have done good, can hardly be understood to indicate a merely temporary restoration or perpetuation of existence, so no interpretation of the difficult phrase 'resurrection of life' can be satisfactory which does not take into account in this respect between the righteous and those upon whom the judgment falls.

A similar argument might not unfailingly be based upon the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>), or the King and the Wedding Guests (Mt 22<sup>1-14</sup>), viz. that the conditions, the data of the parable, do not in either case suggest, but rather by the very nature of the case, the idea of absolute annihilation. On the one hand, find no place in Abraham's bosom, or, on the other, have failed to fitly provide themselves with raiment meet for the wedding feast. It would, however, be at the best no more than an argumentum e silentio, to which no great value could be attached. The declaration of Christ also to the Sadducees, as reported in St. Luke's Gospel, that 'all live to him' (Lk 20<sup>38</sup>), though from one point of view susceptible of a universalistic interpretation, does seem on any construction to exclude the possibility that there are some who finally cease to live in any real or intelligible sense of the word.

Ἀπολλύναι, ἀποθνήσκειν, etc. It remains to consider briefly the significance and implication of the terms employed in the Gospels to denote 'death,' 'perishing,' or 'destruction.' The principal of these are the verbs ἀπολλύναι and ἀποθνήσκειν, with the cognate nouns ἀπώλεια and θάνατος.

employed of mere physical death, the termination of the activities, good or evil. There is no thought of a future, either affirmed or denied, in the minds of the speakers, and in none of the passages is the word on the lips of Christ or reported as used by one of His disciples. Neither is the simple verb ἀλλύναι found in NT Greek. And the adjective θνήσκος is used only by St. Paul (twice as an epithet of σωμα, Ro 6<sup>12</sup> 8<sup>11</sup>, once of σαρκός, 2 Co 4<sup>11</sup>, and in antithesis to ἀθανασία, 1 Co 15<sup>38</sup>, or to ζωή, 2 Co 5<sup>4</sup>).

Ἀπώλεια is found only four times in the Gospels. In Mt 26<sup>28</sup> || Mk 14<sup>24</sup> it is the 'waste' of the ointment. For its real purpose, as conceived by the Speaker, the ointment is 'wasted'; but it is clearly not annihilated, for it is 'from its proper use.' In Mt 7<sup>13</sup> the way that leads εἰς τὴν ἀπώλειαν, 'to destruction,' is described as broad; no indication, however, is given as to the fate of those who traverse this way when they reach ἀπώλεια, and it is fair, therefore, to interpret the phrase in the light of the other passages where the word occurs (in the parallel passage Lk 13<sup>24</sup> no mention is made of the broad way). Jn 17<sup>12</sup> 'not one of them is lost but the son of perdition,' employs a Hebraistic mode of expression. ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας is one who shares the qualities, is like in character to ἀπώλεια, cf. υἱὸν γέννησις, Mt 23<sup>15</sup>; but though he ἀπώλετο is directly stated as to his present future destiny, the son of perdition is certainly not conceived as either unconscious or extinct, nor is there any suggestion that this is to be his ultimate fate.

In the Synoptic Gospels ἀποθνήσκειν, like θνήσκειν, uniformly expresses merely physical death as the cessation of physical activities. Two passages in St. Luke, however, call for special notice. In the parable referred to above, both Lazarus and the rich man 'die' (ἀποθανεῖν, 16<sup>22</sup>); but their conscious activity does not terminate, it is merely transferred to other spheres. And of the sons of God, the sons of the resurrection, it is emphatically said (20<sup>36</sup>) that recurrence of death is for them impossible. Death, therefore, passes upon them once, but leaves them ἰσάγγελοι, 'equal to angels,' in an exalted and privileged state, no more subject to its power. The word is more common in St. John (28 times), and in accordance with the more contemplative and spiritual character of his Gospel is employed also in the Synoptic Gospels. Though its predominant use is of physical death, thus the grain of wheat falls into the ground and dies (ἀποθνήσκει, 12<sup>24</sup>), but by its death it bears much fruit. And for the believer death is but the beginning of life (11<sup>25</sup>), a life that is permanent and exposed to no return of death (πᾶς ὁ ζῶν οὐ μὴ ἀποθάνῃ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, v. 26).

Of the word θάνατος, 'death,' a similar account must be given. It is used of physical death, with no reference to or thought of a future life beyond. By the Synoptists it is employed more or less metaphorically in Mt 4<sup>16</sup>, Lk 17<sup>9</sup> (quotations from Isaiah), Mt 28<sup>38</sup> || Mk 14<sup>34</sup>. In Mt 20<sup>18</sup> || Mk 10<sup>38</sup> θάνατος is for Christ Himself the prelude to life. So in Jn 5<sup>24</sup> he that believeth . . . 'hath passed out of death into life'; and later in the same Gospel Christ declares that he who keeps His word shall not see (8<sup>51</sup>), or taste of (v. 52) death εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (cf. 11<sup>26</sup>).

Finally, there is the term ἀπολλύναι, perhaps the most significant of all the expressions that describe dissolution and the cessation of a worldly estate. It is apparently employed by the Sacred Writers with a weaker as well as a stronger association. The former meaning, to 'lose,' to 'find to be missing,' is illustrated by Mt 15<sup>24</sup>, Lk 15<sup>4</sup>, Jn 6<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>9</sup> and other passages. The predominant sense of the word, however, is that of 'ruin,' the precise nature or degree of which will be indicated by the context; but which consists essentially in the loss or withdrawal of capacity for the due discharge of function or duty. Thus the wine-skins 'perish' in St. Matthew (9<sup>17</sup>), both the wine and the skins in St. Mark (22<sup>3</sup>); but the substance of both survives, though they have become wasted and useless. So also in Jn 6<sup>27</sup>, where the βρωσις that 'perishes' loses its nutritive power, and ceases to be able to perform the part of food. Applied to persons the word is equivalent to 'ruined,' 'undone,' succumbing to present or prospective (πῶς ἢ πότε) or pressure, e.g. Mt 8<sup>23</sup> || Mk 4<sup>28</sup>, Lk 8<sup>24</sup>; Lk 15<sup>17</sup>, Jn 11<sup>50</sup>. In the passages most pertinent to the present inquiry a definitely spiritual 'ruin' is (οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν) the object of which is usually the ψυχή, Mt 11<sup>13</sup> 16<sup>25</sup> || Mk 8<sup>35</sup>, Lk 9<sup>34</sup> 17<sup>33</sup>; Lk 6<sup>9</sup>, Jn 12<sup>25</sup>; but the loss or ruin of the soul here is distinctly said to be preliminary to finding, saving, or (Lk 17<sup>33</sup>) οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν (σω- γονεῖν). The idea conveyed is ἀπώλεια, not annihilation or destruction of being, but change of state. Here, also, the highest form of teaching is found in St. John. Every believer in Christ, or the sheep who hear His voice, are expressly declared to be (οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν) exempt from ruin (3<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>28</sup>); and (οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν) who 'loveth his life' (ὁ φιλοῦν τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ) is the active cause of its ruin (ἀπολλυεῖ αὐτήν), he who hates it in this world will keep it 'unto life eternal' (12<sup>25</sup>). Passages in which the word is used of mere physical destruction, in which usually no thought of the future is involved, must be interpreted in accordance with this general conception (Mt 2<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>14</sup> 26<sup>31</sup>, Mk 9<sup>22</sup>, Lk 17<sup>29</sup> et.).

In the passages referred to above, Mt 10<sup>39</sup> and parallels, the antithesis ὃς ἀπολλεῖ ἑαυτόν ἢ ὁ ἀπολλύσας τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ is hardly to be weakened or explained away as mere willingness to lose. There is an ἀπώλεια of the self, which consists in the soul transformed, is 'saved' by the process, and enters upon a new life. Thus the phrase is practically equivalent to St John's 'loving' and 'hating' (Jn 12<sup>25</sup>).

To estimate the value of these references to the future life of the wicked, few and slight as they seem to be compared with the fulness and frequency of the references to the blessed lot of the righteous, two preliminary conditions which are essential to their right interpretation need to be borne in mind. In the first place, it was clearly far from the intention of the Teacher to lay down or elaborate any metaphysical doctrine of a future existence, such as we might reasonably expect from formal systems of philosophy. Written across His words and actions is their immediate and practical aim; and to have mystified His plain and unlettered hearers with definitions and metaphysics would have been to repel them, and defeat His own purpose. That task He must leave to successors, who in other times, and with other surroundings, will enter into His labours. To expect to find, for example, in the Gospels a well-ordered and articulated defence of natural immortality, so called, is unreasonable. Any such expectation is by the conditions of the case doomed to disappointment. Hints, pre-intimations, there will naturally be, the elucidation and development of which will be the care of after ages; but completeness, finality, from a logical or philosophic point of view, will not be found; nor a series of statements which, however fitted they might be to meet the requirements of some one or other of the later centuries, were out of touch with the thought of His own day and generation.

Again, the reticence observed as to the fate of the wicked, and the comparative infrequency of mention thereof, are entirely in harmony with what is found to be the case in the early literatures of the other great religions of the world. To expatiate on a destiny of woe and pain, or upon the duration of the sufferings of the lost, is, judging from all analogy, evidence not of an early but of a late position in the history of religious thought, and were thus a marked feature of the Gospels, it would justly have laid them open to the suspicion of having at least undergone modification in the interests of later and more developed forms of belief. The hymns of the Rig-Veda, for example, dwell much upon the blessed estate of the good who do that which is acceptable to the gods, and accordingly go hereafter to dwell with them; but they contain only slight and passing references to the lot of the evil-doers, who are hurled by Indra into darkness. The Egyptian Book of the Dead relates the varying trials and fortunes of the deceased in the nether world, which he passes successfully by the aid of formulae and the favour of the gods; but complete silence is observed with regard to the man who at the bar of Osiris fails to pass the prescribed tests. And it is characteristic also not of primitive but of mature, if not decadent, Buddhism to set forth in vivid description and with luxuriant art the series of hells in which carefully graduated torments on an ascending scale of horror are apportioned with precision to the heinousness of the sinner's crimes. It was not otherwise in early Christianity. There, too, it was left to later ages to elaborate descriptions and to revel in details of a future life, the real circumstances of which neither human language is capable of defining nor human thought, tied down as it is to categories belonging essentially to present conditions, able to conceive. The comparative silence of the earliest authoritative documents, and of the earliest teaching so far as it has come down to us, is more eloquent and convincing than the most exhaustive and graphic statement of doctrine could ever have been.

Mohammedanism, it may be said, is an exception to this rule, and from the very beginning lavishes its descriptive powers on the torments that await the unbeliever. Islām, however, sprang adult and full-armed from the mind of its founder, and was stereotyped in the Korān. Its doctrines have already a long history of development behind them, and, if we could trace them back to the starting-point, would probably be found in all instances to conform to the prevailing type of historic growth.

The results to which we have been led may be briefly summarized as follows:—

(1) The reality of a conscious life beyond the grave is uniformly assumed and taught by Christ Himself and by the writers of the Gospels.

(2) To this future life there is assigned no terminus or end. Rather do the phrases used suggest that the thought of a final end never presented itself to Speaker or writer as either actual or possible. And where words like τέλος, ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, etc., are employed, the 'end' or 'last day' is obviously and patently not absolute, but marks and introduces a new beginning. No theory of immortality formulated; is not to be conceived and was, indeed, under the circumstances hardly possible. The doctrine of the Gospels, however, of a renewed life after death to which no limit is set, and for which by virtue of the very terms employed no limit appears to be conceivable, is in the last analysis all that we mean, or can mean, by 'eternity,' 'immortality.'

(3) The writers give no countenance whatever to any theory which in respect of its duration separates the lot of the righteous from that of the wicked. Slight and indefinite, overlaid with metaphor and parable, as are the indications of the conditions under which the future life of the latter will be lived, the guarded statements made and the hints allowed to fall consistently imply that in this respect equality of treatment is meted out to all. If the ζωή of the one is αἰώνιος, and he is not to die eis τὸν αἰῶνα, the kόλασις of the other is αἰώνιος likewise, and he is or may be guilty of a ἁμάρτημα, the fruits of which are αἰώνιος not less a period of time than is αἰώνιος by the same phrase. Theories of universal restoration, of final extinction, or of any modification or combination of these find no support in the words of Christ or of His disciples as recorded in the Gospels.

The present writer shares the convictions which have been very widely felt and expressed, that the final demonstration of immortality, if and when it is given, will have to be based on broader than any merely literal or narrowly expository grounds. Christ spoke to His own age; and necessarily spoke such truths and in such a form as that age could receive and assimilate. That He exhausted the whole range of truth in His statement, or formulated both in shape and substance all doctrine that the mind of man could ever appreciate, is as impossible to believe as it is contrary to His own express words (Jn 16<sup>12</sup>). Nor can we doubt that if He had lived in our day, He would have delivered truths expanded and recast to meet the needs and tendencies and capacities with which He found Himself brought into touch.

That the Christian Church has been on the whole on right lines, and has been justified generally in her interpretation of the teaching of her Founder and His immediate disciples with respect to this particular doctrine, the foregoing exposition has attempted to show. The end, however, is not yet. And the ferment of thought, not less, perhaps more, characteristic of our age than of any that have preceded it, is not destined to be stilled into unconcern, or to have its efforts paralyzed, by any creed or pronouncement of whatever authority. It claims the right to work out its own doctrinal freedom not only in the light of the Sacred Records, but under the influence of that reason which it holds no less sacredly than revelation to be an element and gift of the Divine.

LITERATURE—The treatises on NT Theology, or Theology in general, and relevant S doctrine contain little that is relevant S (theology), by D F S and in Hastings' and the literature thereof, Add W. Christian Theology, Edinburgh, 1898, p. 904.

IMPEDIMENT.—See DISEASE.

IMPORTUNITY.—The only passage in the EV where this word is found is Lk 11<sup>18</sup> 'Because of his importunity he will arise and give him as many as he needeth'. This rendering dates from Tindale (1526). Wyclif (1380) has 'his contynuel axynge'. Good modern translations are 'per-sistency' (Weymouth), 'persistence' (Twentieth Century NT). Murray's New English Dict. gives the definition 'troublesome pertinacity in solicitation'; as early as 1460 the word has this meaning, 'Through y<sup>e</sup> importunite off their sayttes'. In the companion parallel Coverdale (1535) uses the cognate adjective, Lk 18<sup>5</sup> 'yet synge this weddowe is so importune vpon me. I wil deluyne her.' The original meaning of 'importune' was 'inopportune', 'untimely'; in Sir 32<sup>4</sup> 'display not thy wisdom out of season', Coverdale has 'at an importunyte'. Intermediate stages in the growth of the later signification of the word from this root idea are marked by the now obsolete meanings 'troublesome' and 'urgent'.

'Impudentia.' T. k 11<sup>g</sup> is the translation of the Gr. αἰδώς, which signifies 'the absence of αἰδώς,' 'shamelessness.' In Biblical Greek it occurs only in Sir 25<sup>22</sup>, and is rendered 'impudence.' The Lat. importunitas, 'unfitness,' is found with the stronger meaning 'insolence' (Cic. de Sen. iii. 7).

and is therefore a more accurate translation of avaiðeia than its English equivalent. But persistent asking soon becomes insolent asking. The word contains, as Tiapp says, 'a metaphor from beggars, that will not be said Nay, but are impudently יִרְיָה, 'עוֹלָם' (Com. in loc) Cowper uses the word (Task, iv 414) in an instructive context:

To bring out the striking contrast which our Lord's parable suggests, it is necessary to show that persistence in asking becomes those who know that prayer is never troublesome to God, and never out of season. He who 'will not be said Nay,' and he alone, has learnt the secret of prevailing prayer. Wright notes (Synopsis of the Gospels, 2d Greek, p 243) that St. Luke 'three times uses bad men to represent God, or to be examples to us: (1) here, (2) the unjust steward, (3) the unjust judge.'

IMPOSSIBILITY.—The modern mind flatters itself upon its frank recognition of impossibility in the world of nature. There is also an acceptance of faith which is content to allow impossibility in the sphere of grace. Both these tendencies to a lazy acceptance of impossibility in a fancied inevitable are out of tune with the gospel of Christ. There is, of course, such a thing as impossibility as that of a good tree bearing evil fruit (Mt 7<sup>17</sup>). And there is the possibility of the falling of a house divided against itself and being run (Mk 3<sup>25</sup>). But the range of possibility in the world of nature and in the sphere of grace is narrowed to evanescence by the new Christian disciple. A mustard-seed of faith will remove a mountain (Mt 17<sup>20</sup>). God is able to save to the uttermost (Lk 18<sup>27</sup>), though it seems like the passage of a camel through a needle's eye for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 19<sup>24</sup>, Mk 10<sup>25</sup>). It is through Christ, the Son of God become the Son of Man, that all is possible and nothing impossible (Jn 15<sup>1</sup>, Mk 9<sup>23</sup>). He Himself showed it in the supreme triumph of the Resurrection, when the tomb had been sealed so that escape might be impossible (Mt 27<sup>66</sup>). The command over nature is shown in the stilling of the storm (Mk 4<sup>39</sup>) and in the healing of the woman with the issue of blood (Mt 9<sup>21</sup>, Mk 5<sup>28</sup>) is at the service of faith and prayer. The poor leper lost his despair in faith, and was rewarded (Lk 5<sup>13</sup>). The blind received sight, because through their faith human limitations were swallowed up by Divine omnipotence (Mk 10<sup>51</sup>). Infinite resources, and therefore no bounds of impossibility, are revealed in the earnest childlike faith the Lord approves (Mk 11<sup>23</sup>, Lk 17<sup>6</sup>). Such bright and uplifting lessons are remote from the gloomy and depressing problem of evil. There is, indeed, an undecurrent of impossibility in the stream of this world's development. 'It is impossible but that occasions of stumbling should come' (Lk 17<sup>1</sup>). But this species of impossibility we are not to dwell upon too long. 'The redemption draws nigh' (Lk 21<sup>28</sup>).

IMPOTENCE.—The single instance of our Lord's miracles specifically classified under this head is recorded in Jn 5<sup>2-9</sup>, where the sufferer is described as ὁ ἀσθενὺν (AV 'the impotent man,' RV 'the sick man'). The features of the case are its long continuance (for thirty-eight years); and the association of the man with the multitude of infirm and diseased people gathered round the Pool of Bethesda (wh. see). Of the nature of the ailment we have no evidence. It has been thought to be palsy, but Bennett (Diseases of the Bible) considers this unlikely. The long duration of the disease is against its being identified with locomotor ataxia. It may have been some chronic disease of the nervous system.

The chief feature of the healing is the fact that Jesus begins the process of restoration by dealing with the bodily condition induced and established by thirty-eight years of suffering, and by the repeated dashing to the ground of slowly-rising hopes. 'Wouldest thou be made whole?' our Lord asked, appealing to the last flicker of expectation evinced by his remaining still at the healing pool, and calling it out into new vigour and consciousness.

Another significant feature is the apparent association in the mind of Jesus of this infirmity with sin, either the sin of the sufferer or the sinfulness of the race (Jn 5<sup>14</sup>). A similar association is found in the case recorded in Mt 9<sup>1-8</sup>, Mk 2<sup>1-12</sup>, Lk 5<sup>17-26</sup> (see art. PARALYSIS). It cannot be definitely asserted that Jesus marked personal sin as the root-cause of disease in this case, but the inference is not altogether unwarranted from the narratives. But it is at least evident that our Lord did habitually recognize the close connexion between personal and racial sinfulness and all manner of disease and sickness. While carefully guarding Himself from attributing all sickness and weakness to sin (Jn 9<sup>1-9</sup>), He yet declared the essential alliance of sin with all kinds of bodily disorder. 'Sins of the flesh,' as commonly understood, are notoriously responsible for many of mankind's worst diseases and disorders, and the Apostolic catalogue of these sins includes not only adultery, uncleanness, murder, drunkenness, and revellings, but also hatred, variance, wrath, strife, envyings, and covetousness (Gal 5<sup>19-21</sup>, Col 3<sup>5</sup>, Eph 5<sup>3</sup>). Our Lord's list of sins that defile and destroy the body begins with 'evil thoughts' and ends with moral stupidity or foolishness (Mk 7<sup>22</sup>, ἀφροσύνη).

Another case which must probably be included here is that of the woman with a spirit of infirmity (Lk 13<sup>11-17</sup>). The features here are the Evangelist's description of the ailment as πνεῦμα ἔχουσα ἀσθενείας, the lengthened prevalence of the trouble (for eighteen years), and the completeness of the inability to raise herself. The description is evidently from a competent hand. The woman was bowed and crouched together (ἡ σιγῆ τρυπῶσα) and was in no wise able to lift herself up. The inability was εἰς τὸ παντελές (cf. He 7<sup>25</sup>, where the ability of the ever-living Christ to save mankind is also εἰς τὸ παντελές). The infirmity, however, did not debar the sufferer from attending the synagogue. The ailment may have been congenital—a gradual distortion and permanent contraction increased by old age, of the spinal column, such as in many cases is due to continual bending in field labour or in the bearing of heavy burdens. Bennett suggests the gradual wasting and relaxation of muscles and ligaments of the back by which the trunk is held erect, so that the body falls forward without any disease of brain or cord or mental impairment. But it may not improperly be rather classified as due at least in part to some morbid mental condition such as hysteria. This seems to be indicated not obscurely by the description given, as a spirit of infirmity.

The reference of our Lord to Satan as binding the woman is not to be understood as pointing to possession, although it may have been a reflexion of the current idea that all bodily deformity was due to demonic agency—in which case the description is due to the Evangelist rather than to Jesus. But most probably it indicates our Lord's view of the infirmity as being part of that widespread calamity and curse that lies upon the whole race, of which complex coil Satan is the summary and representative.

The features of the healing are: (1) The Divine compassion expressed in our Lord's laying His hand upon the woman as He spoke the word of hope and deliverance; (2) His profound sense that this suffering and weakness, this bodily infirmity, were completely foreign to the woman's spirit, and (3) His steadfast refusal to allow any pedantic Sabbath rules to stand in the way of His relief of suffering humanity. The last fact is dominant in the whole narrative, and consequently the other features and the healing are only casually reported.

IN (ἐν, eis, κατά, ἐπὶ, πρὸς, διά, ἔσω) —The word is preponderantly used in its primary meaning of position in place but it frequently follows the Greek ἐν in its more or less figurative ramifications of meaning. It is also employed more or less accurately to translate various other prepositions which convey a slightly different nuance of significance. In the present article we shall follow the rendering of the RV, where the use of the prepositions is more consistent and precise, as well as more conformed to the modern usage, than in the AV. (For illustration of the wider use of 'in' common in the Elizabethan period, cf. Hastings' DB, art. 'In').

I. As translation of ἐν, the word indicates:

1. Local relations: (a) 'in,' 'at,' or 'on,' of simple locality (Mt 2<sup>1</sup> 'in Bethlehem,' 24<sup>40</sup> 'in the field,' Jn 4<sup>20</sup> 'in this mountain'); (b) that with which one is covered or clothed (Mk 12<sup>38</sup> 'walk in long robes,' Mt 7<sup>15</sup> 'in sheep's clothing,' 11<sup>21</sup> 're-pented in sackcloth and ashes,' Jn 20<sup>12</sup> 'two angels in white'); (c) direct cohesion (15<sup>4</sup> 'except it abide in the vine'); (d) position in a book (Mt 21<sup>42</sup> 'in the scriptures,' Mk 1<sup>2</sup> 'in the book of Psalms').

2. Temporal relations—the point or space of time when, or within which anything occurs (Mt 22<sup>28</sup> 'in the resurrection,' 10<sup>40</sup> etc. 'in the day of judgment,' Lk 9<sup>36</sup> 'in those days,' Jn 2<sup>19</sup> 'in three days I will raise it up').

3. Figurative and personal relations

(a) Indicating a person: (a) conceived as the sphere where a certain quality or state of mind is found (Mt 6<sup>23</sup> 'the light that is in thee,' Mk 9<sup>50</sup> 'have salt in yourselves,' and similarly Mt 21<sup>42</sup> 'marvellous in our eyes,' 5<sup>28</sup> 'committed adultery in his heart,' Mk 11<sup>23</sup> 'doubt in his heart'); or (β) in reference to whom another stands in a certain attitude (Mt 3<sup>17</sup> 'in whom I am well pleased,' 11<sup>6</sup> 'whosoever shall not be offended in me').

(b) Of the state or condition, manner or circumstance, range or sphere in which a person is or acts: (a) state or condition (Mt 4<sup>16</sup> 'the people which sat in darkness,' Lk 17<sup>35</sup> 'serve him in holiness and righteousness,' Jn 4<sup>24</sup> 'in spirit and truth,' Mt 21<sup>22</sup> 'ask in this manner' (13<sup>3</sup> 'in parables'); (γ) occasion (Lk 22<sup>27</sup> 'ensnare him in talk,' Lk 23<sup>31</sup> 'if they do this in the green tree,' 24<sup>35</sup> 'in the breaking of bread'); (δ) surrounding accompaniment (Mt 6<sup>29</sup> 'Solomon in all his glory,' 16<sup>28</sup> 'coming in his kingdom,' 16<sup>27</sup> 'in the glory of his Father'); (ε) range or sphere (Jn 8<sup>21</sup> 'die in your sins,' Mk 1<sup>15</sup> 'believe in the gospel').

This is an exceptional use of πιστεύω with ἐν. The LXX almost invariably construes the verb with the dative, the NT writers with eis or ἐπὶ. Probably therefore the verb is used here absolutely, and ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ marks the sphere within which faith is to be exercised. The only other instance of πιστεῖν followed by ἐν in the NT is Jn 3<sup>15</sup>, which the RV translates 'that whosoever believeth may in him have eternal life'. For ἐν with ὄνομα see below.

(c) Of the means or instrument, or personal agency employed, where a simple dative might have been used instead of ἐν (Mt 3<sup>11</sup> 'I baptize you with [RVm 'in'] water'; cf. Lk 3<sup>16</sup>, where the simple dative is used; Mk 9<sup>34</sup> 'By [RVm 'in'] the prince of the devils casteth he out devils'; in other cases 'with' is used as translation, as Lk 22<sup>49</sup> 'shall we smite with (ἐν) the sword?').

(d) Of persons inherently joined and connected, where the completest intimacy conceivable is expressed—employed with noticeable frequency in the writings of St Paul and the Fourth Gospel, to mark the close fellowship between the Christian and Christ (ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, ἐν Κυρίῳ, ἐν Χριστῷ, Ro 8<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>5</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>; μένειν ἐν ἐμοί, Jn 6<sup>56</sup> 15<sup>4-5</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>5</sup>, 6<sup>24</sup> 27<sup>28</sup> ἐν αὐτῷ εἶναι, ἐν τῷ νύμφῃ, ἐν αὐτῷ μένειν), between the Christian or Christ and God (ἐν θεῷ, ἐν τῷ πατρὶ, 1 Th 1<sup>1</sup>, Col 3<sup>3</sup>, Jn 3<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>20</sup>), or between the Christian and the Spirit (ἐν πνεύματι εἶναι, Ro 8<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>; cf. Mt 22<sup>34</sup>, Lk 2<sup>27</sup>). The very repetition of such unusual expressions indicates that the thought was a favourite one in Pauline and Johannine theology. For the determination of the meaning, special weight should be attached to the fact that complementary expressions are used ἐν τινι, πνεῦμα ἐν τινι, πατήρ ἐν τῷ υἱῷ, υἱὸς ἐν τῷ πατρὶ, 13<sup>5</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Jn 10<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>20</sup> 15<sup>4-5</sup> 17<sup>21-23</sup>). The employment of these parallel expressions points to a relation of the most intimate communion; and the only question is how this spiritual communion is to be conceived. Deissmann, who has carefully sifted the material relating to the phrase ἐν Χριστῷ, insists that the translation 'in fellowship with Christ' does not quite convey the concrete thought of St. Paul. He favours the view that the ἐν here retains its literal and local significance; the Christian lives in the element Christ, somewhat in the same way as animals live in the air, or fishes in the water, or the roots of plants in the earth. He notices the parallel use of ἐν Χριστῷ and Χριστὸς ἐν τινι with ἐν πνεύματι and πνεῦμα ἐν τινι, and argues that as the last phrase would be naturally understood in the most literal local sense, of one within whom the invisible powers of the Spirit resided, so in the phrases relative to Christ, the Christ of faith, the same local

Or, again, the phrase ἐν θεῷ (1 Th 1<sup>1</sup>, Col 3<sup>3</sup>, Ac 17<sup>28</sup> 'In him we live and move and have our being') expresses the thought that God is the element in which we live, implying the local conception of a Divine περιχώρησις. From such analogies Deissmann is inclined to the most literal and local interpretation of ἐν Χριστῷ, a favourite phrase; and he believes that if we keep in mind the equation Χριστὸς=πνεῦμα, Christ the everliving Divine Spirit, the conception of real locality will not appear improbable. This interpretation certainly presses the literal meaning of ἐν too far; it tends to dissolve St Paul's mystic idea of union into a semi-physical relation, and so to destroy the moral and spiritual basis of faith. The spiritual presence of Christ is indeed pictured as a local nearness of relation; yet St Paul elsewhere clearly distinguishes between the spiritual nearness of present fellowship with Christ and the future local fellowship with (σύν or πρὸς) Christ in the life to come (1 Th 4<sup>17</sup>, Ph 1<sup>23</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>5</sup>). Even while 'absent from the Lord,' St Paul is ἐν Χριστῷ, i.e. in spiritual but not local union. The implied ἐν θεῷ in Ac 17<sup>28</sup> 'In him we live and move and have our being,' is scarcely adducible as an analogy, since it refers rather to the natural basis of existence than to the spiritual ground. The Johannine phrases already cited (μένειν ἐν ἐμοί; ἐγὼ ἐν τῷ πατρὶ μου, καὶ ὑμεῖς ἐν ἐμοί, κἀγὼ ἐν ὑμῖν) contain substantially the same thought as the Pauline ἐν Χριστῷ, and in these, in spite of the local figure employed, the idea is not that of local inherence, but of spiritual inherence or communion. The mystic realism of the Pauline and Johannine phrases is rather to be found in the fact that they approach the thought of a real identification of the Logos or the pneumatic Christ. The life Divine incorporates itself in the Christian; the Spirit of Christ or of God takes the place of the human spirit, and is individualized in the life of believers. This idea of essential spiritual (mystica, hypostatica) union alone does justice to those passages where the union of believers with Christ, and even with one another, finds sublimest expression (Jn 17<sup>21-23</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>13</sup>). But while this thought of vital union is the central and original conception of the phrase used by St Paul, the context often indicates some variety in the shades of meaning. Thus Ro 14<sup>14</sup> 'I am persuaded in the Lord Jesus,' i.e. in virtue of that fellowship; Ph 2<sup>29</sup> 'Receive him in the Lord,' i.e. in the spirit of such fellowship; it is often used as a favourite expression for 'Christian'—Ro 16<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>; while in other cases the relationship referred to is that between Christ and the Father; 1 Th 5<sup>18</sup> 'this is the will of God in Christ Jesus'; 2 Co 5<sup>18</sup> 'God was in Christ reconciling the world'.

II. The word is also used to translate other prepositions in the following senses:

διὰ, 'within' a space of time (Mt 26<sup>61</sup> 'build it in three days').

κατά, 'throughout,' 'according to' (Lk 15<sup>14</sup> 'a famine in that land,' Mt 1<sup>30</sup> 'in a dream').

πρὸς, 'towards,' direction (Lk 12<sup>8</sup> 'spoken in the ear').

εἰσα, adverb, within (Mt 26<sup>68</sup> 'entered in').

ἐπὶ, 'on,' 'upon,' 'over.' The RV has followed the more restricted use of 'in' in many cases, and substituted 'on,' 'upon,' 'at,' 'over,' 'by,' 'unto,' 'to' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup> 'thy will be done in earth' [RV 'on earth'], 18<sup>16</sup> 'in [RV 'at'] the mouth of two or three witnesses,' 22<sup>22</sup> 'reigning in [RV 'over'] Judaea,' 21<sup>19</sup> 'in [RV 'by'] the way,' 13<sup>14</sup> 'in [RV 'unto'] them is fulfilled the prophecy' Mk 5<sup>38</sup> 'knowing what was done in [RV 'to'] her'); but in some cases 'in' is retained, where English idiom requires it, and where the sense is not liable to be mistaken (with the genitive, Mk 8<sup>4</sup> 'in the wilderness' [RV 'in a desert place'], 11<sup>4</sup> 'in a place where two ways met' [RV 'in the open street'], and, with the dative, Mt 14<sup>8</sup> 'in a changer,' Mk 10<sup>24</sup> 'trust in riches,' Lk 18<sup>9</sup> 'trusted in themselves that they were righteous,' i.e. rested their confidence of being righteous upon themselves).
