εἰς, 'into,' 'with reference to,' 'with a view to': (a)='into,' locally or figuratively, often after verbs of rest, where previous motion and direction are implied (Mt 23<sup>3</sup> 'came and dwelt in a city,' Jn 9<sup>7</sup> 'go wash in the pool,' Mt 10<sup>27</sup> 'what ye hear in the ear,' 13<sup>38</sup> 'hid in three measures of meal,' Mk 1<sup>9</sup> 'baptized in the Jordan,' 5<sup>34</sup> 'go in peace,' Jn 1<sup>18</sup> 'which is in the bosom of the Father'—εἰς τὸν κόλπον—i.e. placed in the Father's bosom and there abiding, cf. 1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup> 'with respect to,' 'with a view to' [Lk 22<sup>19</sup> 'in remembrance of me,' 16<sup>8</sup> 'wiser in their generation' [RV 'for their generation']]). After πιστεῖν 'believe,' εἰς is largely used (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>, Jn 1<sup>12</sup> 2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> etc.)='in' or 'on' in AV, in RV invariably 'on'; it implies the direction in which the believing soul turns the fellowship into which it enters. Specially noteworthy is the use of εἰς, ἐπὶ, and ἐν with ὄνομα. While the Synoptists commonly employ ἐπὶ or εἰς or the simple dative, and rarely use ἐν except in the phrase, 'Blessed is contribution to illustrate and confirm the conclusion that the deepest passion of the human heart has ever been union with God

(2) The idea of union with God is, further, the presupposition and the ruling category of philosophic thought. To think at all, implies that there is present to the mind the ideal of a unity in and to which the manifold details of the universe exist. Philosophy is simply the verification and application of this ideal. Philosophy, accordingly, however great its quarrel may be with any existing religion, is itself fundamentally religious. It seeks to accomplish, in thought and for thinkers, the harmonizing of all reality in and with God.

This is the effort of early Greek thought, though as yet the distinction of spiritual and material had scarcely emerged. From Plato onwards, with his assertion that the world of Being, the world of Ideas, with his counter-assertion that all is flux, the Greek mind, gathered together synthesis is handed on to thinkers of the Middle Ages. The Middle Ages, in turn, imperially, seek to exhibit the ultimate unity of the universe as 'the Good,' or 'Thought of Thought.' From them, again, it has descended, in ever deepening complexity, to the days when the absolute idealism of Hegel is met by the demand to do justice to the reality and independence of the Self. And in the nineteenth century, the union with God is the need and aspiration of the Self. The deepest fact regarding human personality is that it is imperfect even in the broadest-minded, largest-hearted specimens of our race, and that consequently, in spite of its intense consciousness of itself, the human self is ill at ease till it enters into the life of the universal Self, and becomes its organ and its reproduction. This fact forces its way to intense conviction and impassioned utterance in every human family which has reached a certain stage of spiritual culture. In India the date may be picturesquely fixed in Buddha's 'great renunciation.' For the Western world the hour had come in the 1st. cent. of our era. Two systems, the one born on Greek soil, the other on Jewish, occupied the minds of educated men, and supplied them with the instruments of thought.

(2) One was Stoicism. The systems of Plato and Aristotle had been pierced by dualism, which these masters had sought in vain to overcome. Their supreme merit is, that they did not dispute the intensity of the opposition between the rational and the irrational, between form and matter. In Stoicism, however, is growing weary of the effort to heal this dualism, and is hoping to make things easy for itself by seizing one of the extremes, and making that supreme. The Universe is the ultimate principle. Differences, the obstinate facts of a world which contains so much that is evil and irrational, are not so much resolved or harmonized with the supreme good, as resolutely denied or ignored. Stoicism begins at the furthest extreme from the universal, in an intense individualism. It ducts the individual to turn away from a political sphere which has no longer a true, satisfying life to offer him, and to turn inward on himself. It promises, however, that there in the individuality there is a rational and moral element as the Master of Balliol has pointed out (Philosophy, Lect. xvi), Stoicism passed by one step from individualism to pantheism. It is a process which holds on to the conception of one all-embracing principle, but it also transcends the ever victorious good. High above the world, with its evil and its irrationality, is the realm of truth and goodness. To it the good belong. The message of Stoicism accordingly is, 'Live in accordance with this Reason, or Logos, which is immanent in the universe and germinally present in every man.' Such a faith as this was bound to be both in lives made sublime by achievements. The benefits conferred by Stoicism on civilization are patent and unpishable. At the same time, simply because it was no more than faith in an idea, it was bound to fail. Its most strenuous exponents toiled at what they knew was a hopeless task, and though they carried their burden nobly, their hearts were weighed with the sorrow of their failure. Belief in a purpose which links all the discords of the world into one plan, conquers all things evil, and makes them subservient to good, requires some surer basis than the meditations of a philosopher, however true or noble these may be. The failure of Stoicism is obvious now; but in the Hellenic world, in the early years of the Roman Empire it permeated educated society like an atmosphere, and supplied the young men with a point of view whence they might look out on the unwholly desolated and despairing to determine is to limit God is thus the indeterminable To Him no pred . . . I . . . alism is thus wider and deeper than . . . It is a dualism not be between God conceived as pure thought and the world condemned as material, but between the transcendent God who is too high to be expressed in the loftiest category of thought and the realm of the finite as such. His problem, accordingly, is to find a medium of transition from this remote transcendent God to the time and space world. This bridge, if we may so describe it, Philo built of elements borrowed both from Judaism and from Greek philosophy. In Jewish theology, as the ethical qualities of God are subordinated to the supposed majesty of His transcendence, Divine acts are attributed to personified metaphysical properties. In particular, there is a tendency to ascribe to God and to ascribe to it almost as much as to creation and of judgment.

 At the same time, the prevalent idea of Greek philosophy, found in Stoicism the conception of the Logos or immanent reason of the universe. From this twofold attitude of mind, Jewish and Greek, Philo reached a new synthesis, a principle which is Divine and yet human, which serves as mediator between the transcendent God and the material world. To this principle he gave the name Logos, which thus gathered to itself the import of the double lineage of thought from which it is descended, and thus to Jew and Greek alike came laden with not entirely dissimilar associations.
 This famous designation stands as the symbol of the highest effort the mind of man has ever made to reach a synthesis of the seemingly discordant elements of the universe, and to discover a medium whereby the spirit of man can ascend into union with the distant incomprehensible Deity. The situation in the 1st cent is not adequately described by saying that a great many individuals were adherents of the Stoic philosophy, or of the Alexandrian theology, rather must we imagine an intellectual atmosphere full of the ideas of both, which find a shorthand expression in the term Logos. The phrase is continually on the lips of men. It tells at once of what they sought and of what they thought they had found. Any new message coming to such a world must reckon with this phrase and all it stood for. That the Logos doctrine, failed to regenerate either the individual or society, is the obvious fact. The reason of its failure is that the reconciliation which it offers is in idea merely not an historic fact; in thought, and not in life. The opposition between God and the world is so stated as to make the request of it not merely difficult, but impossible.

able. On the other is the universe of matter, in which man is immersed, finding in his body and its relations with the material world his sepulchre and his shame. How shall these two ever meet? The Logos bridge, which God throws across the gulf cannot reach to the lower side. The Logos is too ethereal, too Divine, to take to itself any particle of the material world, or to redeem any life which is bound up with matter. Man, for his part, cannot reach, stretch or leap as he will, even the extremity of that gleaming bridge. Matter will not be so easily got rid of. In the sublime ecstasy, which was man's last effort to reach the borders of the spiritual world, the flesh found itself still the victor. God and man belong to two disparate universes. They cannot be at one.

(3) In order to complete even so imperfect a sketch of the spiritual situation in the Hellenic-Roman world at the advent of Christianity, it is necessary to note the fresh and more hopeful point of view presented by the religion of Israel. (a) Its presupposition is not the contrast, but the affinity of God and man. On the one hand, God is like man. Anthropomorphism is not false, for human nature is the reflex of the Divine, and the attributes of man do thereof but not falsely, represent the . . . . . On the other hand, man is like God, capable of communion with Him, as one person is with another, finding in that fellowship his true life. The Greek dualism of God and the universe of form and matter, is unknown to the OT. Whatever mediation is wanted is found in man himself, who is creation's crown, to whom nature is bound by community of substance, in whose destiny, for weal or woe, nature is profoundly implicated. (b) Its analysis is wholly different from, and far deeper than, the Greek. It lays bare, not distance between God and man, as between two disparate natures, but a breach, as between two persons who ought to have been at one, but are now through the action of the dependent personality woefully opposed. The gulf to be bridged therefore, is not that between form and matter, but between will and will. To overcome this, no one of the Divine attributes, but God Himself alone, will suffice. (c) The goal of the religion of Israel, accordingly, is the indwelling of God in man. The coming of Jehovah in His fulness is the end to which the prophets of Israel look. When He comes, Israel will be restored, and the universe, sharing the blessing, will itself be renovated. They conceived this coming of the Lord without perspective, and in the forms belonging to the world of their own day. In this way alone could the hope of the coming of the Lord have sustained and comforted their own spirits; only in such forms could they have proclaimed it to others who, like themselves, waited for the consolation of Israel. The spiritual history of the devout in Israel, accordingly, is one of continual disillusionment. Form after form broke like mist; and still the perfect form in which the presence of Jehovah would be fully realized did not come. It is little wonder, therefore, that the hope of Israel did not retain its purity and spirituality, save in the hearts of an inner circle of whom the theologians and politicians of the time took no account,—the poor in spirit, the mourners, the meek, the pure in heart. Comparison between the two lines of development, that of Greek philosophy and that of the religion of Israel, shows that the idea of both was union with God, and that the unifying of all the elements of the life of man and of nature. On neither line had the goal been reached. In the one there was at best an occasional and intermittent experience of ecstasy. In the other there was, in the deepest natures, a hoping against hope, that God would yet visit His people.

Into such a world, Jewish and Hellenic, Christianity entered, with the declaration that what men had been seeking had come to pass, that union with God was no longer a mere dream or a wistful hope, but an accomplished fact. God, so the announcement runs, has united Himself with one Man, so that all men may, in this Man, who is both Christ and Logos, become one with God. The reconciliation of God and man is effected not merely in idea, but in a historic Person. He is both God and man, through Him men have access to God, in Him man and the universe are gathered into unity, and are perfected in their being. He is, with respect to the Divine purpose, at once ἀρχή and τέλος, the active cause of its fulfilment, and the goal of its accomplishment. It is plain that the heart of this announcement is the Person of Christ. Do the facts regarding Him warrant the transcendent claim made on His behalf? Is this man Divine as well as human? Does He indeed meet the demand for union with God? These questions must not be approached with any dogmatic pre-suppositions. The answer to them must be sought in the portraiture of the historic Christ, and in the impression which His personality made on those who came under its influence.

A. THE CHARACTER OF CHRIST.—It is remarkable that all study of Christ necessarily begins with His character. It is not so with other great men, even the founders of religions. What primarily drew adherents to them was not the goodness of their characters, but some gift or power which they possessed. Believers in the greatness of these heroes have been able to retain their faith, even while admitting the moral defects of those to whom they prostrated both intellect and will. It is not so with Jesus Christ. He rules the minds of men by the impression of His personality, and in this impression His character forms an integral part. Prove Him guilty of sin, and at once the spell is broken. He has achieved nothing, if He can be classed among other frail, failing, sinful mortals. All Christology, therefore, must begin with a character study of Jesus. An attempt at such a study has been made in the article CHARACTER OF CHRIST, the details of which need not be repeated here. We may, however, restate the results of that article—the results, as we believe, to which the study of His character must necessarily lead. Conceiving Him as He is presented to us in the concrete features of His character stand out supreme and unmistakable.

1. The first is positive, His perfect goodness. This quality is to be sought, and is found, in all the relations in which Jesus stood to His fellow-men and to God. (1) Between Him and God the relations were such as never existed in the case of any other man. They include (a) perfect knowledge, (b) perfect love. Jesus knew God directly and fully, with the complete intimacy of a Son, nay, of one who, in comparison with all other men, is the Son (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). He beheld Divine realities with immediate vision, and reported what He had seen and heard (Jn 1<sup>18</sup> 6<sup>46</sup> 8<sup>48</sup> 15<sup>15</sup>). We see in Jesus one whose vision of God was absolutely undimmed, whose intercourse with God was unhindered by any incapacity on His part to receive, or to respond to, the communications of God to Him. Jesus, moreover, loved God with the strength of a nature which had never been injured by any breach with God. In His love for God there is no trace of the compunctions, the heart-breaking memories, which make the love of the redeemed a thing compounded of tears and pain, as well as of adoration and gladness. It shows itself in serene and unbroken trust, which continually depends on the Father's gifts (Jn 5<sup>20, 30</sup> 7<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>10, 24</sup>), and in perfect and unhesitating obedience, which owned no other will than the Father's (Lk 2<sup>49</sup>, Jn 4<sup>34</sup> 6<sup>38</sup>). Thus loving God, He was aware that God loved Him, and did continually pour upon Him the fulness of a Divine love which found no limitations in the spiritual receptivity of its object. The Divine love, which returns from every other object restrained by incapacity or wounded by misunderstanding, is concentrated upon Christ, abides and has free course in Him, and returns to its source in God. He is ever rejoicing with eternal joy. His perfect mutual indwelling and perfect mutual joy of fellowship are unveiled to us in the concrete life of Jesus and God, to which the mere concepts cannot admit us.

(2) Between Jesus and His fellow-men the relations are no less perfect. It is true, He could not realize in His own case all possible circumstances in which a man might be placed. But He could, and did, hold such an attitude to men as would enable Him to enter with perfect sympathy and understanding into any situation into which a man might conduct a man. In a word, He loved men. It is abundantly evident that He knew them, both in the broad qualities of humanity and in the individual features of the lives which came before Him. The amazing fact, accordingly, is, that, in spite of such knowledge, He loved men, believed in their high destiny, yearned to save them, and was ready to give the supreme proof of His love by dying for them.

We conclude, then, that Jesus was good, not merely as being one of a class of men upon whom we may pass this verdict without setting them thereby apart from their fellows, but as standing alone in the completeness of His ethical achievement. His character bears the mark of attainment and finality. All other goodness is to be estimated by the measure in which it approximates to His. This is not matter of dogma but of observation. It is a clear inference from the moral history of the race subsequent to His appearing. It is a fact that He is the ethical head of humanity. To say this, however, is to define Him as more than man. However we may construe His person, it will be impossible to confine ourselves to a merely humanitarian interpretation of it. 'He who alone stands in this universal relation to humanity cannot be merely a member of it' (Forrest, Christ of History, etc. p. 66)

2. The second is negative, His absolute sinlessness. The evidence of the portrait constrains us to conclude, not merely that Jesus was a very good man, in whom there was 'the minimum of sinfulness' and 'the maximum of holiness,' but that in Him was no sin. The testimony of His contemporaries might not suffice to establish this result, though it is, indeed, most impressive to note how those who knew Him intimately bear unanimous and most solemn testimony to His sinlessness, and ascribe to Him an office which could be held only by an absolutely holy person (1 P 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>, Ac 3<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>62</sup> 22<sup>14</sup>). The weight of proof lies in His own consciousness. It is beyond question that in that consciousness there was no sense of personal unworthiness, of shortcomings or failures, even the slightest. He who taught others to pray for 'thy will be done' never besought it of the Divine Father; He who proclaimed the necessity of 'repentance' for all men, and Himself never passed through such phase of experience; He who in tenderest sympathy drew close to the sinner's side, and yet always manifested a singular aloofness of spirit, and never included Himself among the objects of the Divine compassion; He who made it His vocation to die for the remission of sins, must have been, in actual fact, sinless—either that, or He must have been sunk in a moral darkness more profound than sin ordinarily produces, even in the worst of men. The sinlessness of Jesus is a fact whose possibility ought not to be roughly even unwillingness to admit which follow from it. If Jesus is sinless, He stands alone in the moral history of the race. He cannot be classed along with other men, however good and great. They are all men, but He is the Ideal. His uniqueness, moreover, cannot be interpreted as that of a lusus naturæ, or a special product of creative power. The difference between Jesus and other good men is this, that while He has produced a conviction of sin immeasurably more profound than they have evoked among their admirers, He has also awakened a confidence and a peace which they have never wrought in their closest imitators. Unnumbered multitudes of human souls have come under regenerative and sanctifying influences, which, without doubt, have emanated from His person, and which have wrought in them a character which is the reflex of His. There is only one place in which a reverent and open-minded study of the character of Christ can set Him, and that is beside God, as essentially Divine. He is certainly human. The closer we draw to Him, the more clearly do we discern His humanity. There is nothing, sin or sorrow, pain and conflict, discipline and growth,—nothing that divides us from Him. He is the Ideal to whom all men are drawn. In His universality all the endless variety of human experiences is comprehended; so that He is kinsman of every family on earth, contemporary of every generation, neighbour and friend of every soul that breathes and suffers. Yet this very humanity is the unveiling of Divinity. If, because of His humanity, we have been inclined to draw Him into our ranks, we soon find that He will not be thus classified. He is man, yet more than man—the Holy One of God. He was born a Jew, but His birth was not the inevitable product of Jewish racial conditions; it was the entrance into humanity of one whose home and native air were elsewhere. They were within the circle of Divinity. See, further, art. SIN, § 7.

A study of the character of Christ does not provide us with a ready-made dogma of the constitution of His person. Two things, however, it does effect: (a) it sets the person of Christ in the centre of Christianity as its main declaration and its most cogent proof; (b) it makes a merely humanitarian construction of His personality for ever impossible. We are constrained to conceive of the sinless Christ, not as the bloom and efflorescence of humanity, but rather as One who has entered into humanity on an errand of profound significance for the moral history of the race. We are, therefore, once more to the portrait in the Gospels, to see if the consciousness of Jesus reveals any traces of a uniqueness of personal constitution corresponding to the uniqueness of His character. If such there be, they will both sustain the impression of His sinlessness, and derive from it their true interpretation. His functions and gifts would mean nothing if they were ranked apart from ethical perfection.

B. THE SELF-WITNESS OF JESUS.—It is noteworthy that Jesus does not discuss the constitution of His Person, and gives none of the definitions with which theology has been rife. This is an indication of the truthfulness of the narrative, and shows that it has been to a wonderful degree untouched by the doctrinal development which we know had preceded its earliest written form. It suggests, moreover, that the very highest construction that can be put on the words of Christ is no more than the truth. If, in truth, Jesus be the highest that is said of Him, this is the method which He would adopt in the transcendent aspect of His being. He would make no categorical statements, but would leave it to be decided by the total impression of His personality.

i. HIS CLAIMS.—As soon as we return to the portrait, we are impressed by the extraordinary claims which Jesus makes on His own behalf. He is perfect in humility; and yet, combined with the utmost gentleness, the most winning loveliness, there is an assertion of His own supreme importance, which is at once profound and sublime. These claims are sometimes stated explicitly; more frequently they are implied in what He says and does. In any case, they are inseparable from what He believes Himself to be. They enter into the very texture of the narrative. They are wrought of the very fibre of the personality of Him who makes them. Whatever quality of being is required to make them valid, we must impute to Him who deliberately advances them. Without presuming to make a complete enumeration, we note the following:—the offices and functions which Jesus avowedly claims to hold and fulfil.

1. Teacher.—In Jesus' discharge of this office, certain features at once attract attention.—(1) The solitariness of the office. There were in Jesus' day many teachers of religion, and the title of Rabbi, commonly given to them, He accepted (Mk 14<sup>14</sup>, Jn 13<sup>14</sup>). These others, however, were prepared to be followed by successors who might wear their title and inherit their honours. But Jesus claimed to be a teacher in a sense in which He could not be followed by any of His disciples, however learned and pious (Mt 23<sup>8</sup>). He did not aim at raising up men who should succeed Him in this office. His office of teacher is His alone. No doubt there came to be in the Church certain men upon whom the Spirit of God conferred a special gift of knowledge, who were accordingly recognized as 'teachers' (1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>). But teachers after the pattern of Christ were not to be instituted, and were not needed in the new Society (1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>27</sup>). This solitariness of His office is a remarkable fact. He was, then, the bearer of a message which could not be pronounced by other lips than His, which originated in the depths of His consciousness, and owed all its significance and value to the personality of Him who declared it.

(2) The note of authority.—This could not be missed, and, in one who had not received the special training of a school Rabbi, it was profoundly impressive. When the people heard His first sermon in Capernaum, 'they were astonished at his teaching: for he taught them as having authority, and not as the scribes' (Mk 1<sup>2</sup>). The source of this authority lies in the quality of His mind, which directly sees things Divine. His teaching is not the issue of a dialectic process; it is of the nature of a report, and implies that the Teacher lives in a habitual intercourse with God, such as no other man ever enjoyed (Jn 3<sup>1</sup>). His authority, therefore, is His own absolutely. He quotes no other Rabbi, leans on no human opinion, however sound and wise. More amazing still, He does not use the formula which marks the supernatural authority of a prophet, 'Thus saith the Lord.' For this He substitutes the simpler, more astounding phrase, 'I say unto you.' 'He speaks at all times with the same absolute conviction and consciousness of His Divine right. There is majesty in His least utterance, and it is nowhere more easily recognized than in the unvarnished record of the Gospel, according to St. Mark' (Svete, Studies in the Teaching of our Lord, p. 64). Many men have been intoxicated by their own conceit; but the swelling vanity of their tone has easily been detected. When Jesus employs the note of authority, He is simply being true to His own inner consciousness, which, to its inmost core, is clear, genuine, and reliable.

(3) The originality of the teaching.—It would be a mistake to attribute to Jesus the independence of a mind which excluded all possible sources of information or instruction, and operated only in a medium of its own imaginations or conceptions. Relations may be traced between the teaching of Jesus and ideas which found lodgment in other minds than His; yet His originality is not thereby infringed. Thus, for instance, His teaching was couched in the terminology and in the forms of thought common to the religious teaching of His day. A parallel might easily be drawn to illustrate this (cf. Shailer Mathews, The Messianic Hope in the NT, p. 71 ff.). This, however, in no way lowers the value of the teaching of Jesus. Ideas are not necessarily valueless because found in Rabbinical theology. By taking them up into His larger and loftier thought, Jesus has placed upon them the stamp of His authority. The central idea of the teaching, moreover, is not borrowed from contemporary thought. The spirit of the Kingdom of God is Jesus' special contribution to the religious life of His day. This conception is all His own, and is the organizing power of all His teaching. Attempts to set aside certain parts of His teaching as derived from external sources, and as being, therefore, of no permanent value, wreck themselves upon the fact that He was certainly no eclectic, and that His teaching has none of the features of a patchwork. His originality consists in the synthetic, transforming power of His mind. Again, His teaching is not independent of, rather is it rooted in the OT. He Himself repudiated the idea that He was breaking with the religion of Israel. He does claim, however, to 'fulfil' the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>).

Law and Prophets, which are thus conjoined in Jesus' speech (Mt 21<sup>13</sup> 22<sup>35-40</sup>), are equivalent to the OT taken as a whole, and viewed, in its ethical and spiritual significance, as the utterance of the Divine mind regarding the relations of God and man. This, therefore, is the inspired record of God's revelation, Jesus claims to fulfil, to preserve and perfect to retain and develop. We are not to water down the implicit claim. Who can undertake to give the true inwardness of the Divine thought and carry to completion the eternal purpose? In such a task prophets God speaks 'by divers portions.' When He speaks clearly and fully, His spokesman can be none other than His Son (He 1<sup>1</sup>).

Once more, the teaching of Jesus appears most strikingly in the fact that He traces all His teaching to His Father (Jn 7<sup>16</sup>). The very refusal of the claim to be independent of God is itself a claim of the most stupendous kind. He whose words and deeds are entirely the speaking and acting of God in Him, between whom and God there is complete intimacy and uninterrupted reciprocity of thought and purpose, stands apart from all human teachers, even the most brilliant and the most original. His teaching is not His own. It is the message of Another, even of Him who sent Him to carry it to the human race.

(4) The future of the teaching.—Teachers die; then great thoughts perish not. Socrates passed from the market-place; but Plato and Aristotle, those real Sociatics, took up the threads of thought, and wove them into systems which have dominated the intellectual world ever since. It is noticeable, however, that this has not been the history of the ideas of Jesus. He uttered them, and then passed from the scene of His labours. But no disciple took them and expanded them into a system. No philosophical or theological system to-day can claim to be His. He himself predicted a much more remarkable future for His teaching. It could have a successor, indeed, but not one who would have his vigour, or St. John with his speculative gift. The successor of Jesus in the teaching office is none other than the Spirit of God (Jn 16<sup>13-15</sup>). He will take the thoughts of Jesus and unfold their meaning, and apply their vitalizing power to the needs of all successive generations of men. In the face of all uncertainties are resolved in the eternal day. It is certain that He will 'speak by the well' and talked with a woman, who preached in synagogues, and taught in the Temple had this consciousness of Himself as continuing a teaching which was destined to continue, through the power of the Spirit of God, unfailing, imperishable, and indefeasible. In respect of this also, Jesus stands apart from and superior to all other teachers of men.

2. Legislator.—Jesus is more than a teacher, whether of the type of a Jewish Rabbi or of that of a Greek philosopher. The disciple band is more than a group of docile souls, who may be expected to assimilate the ideas of their Master. The Jewish Schools fails to give us Jesus' point of view. He has before Him the Kingdom of God, which has existed throughout the past ages of Israel's history, and is now about to pass into a new stage of realization. He speaks, accordingly not so much in the character of a communicator of new ideas, as in that of a legislator laying down principles upon which the community of God shall be built or rebuilt, delivering laws which shall guide it in its future history. The tone of Jesus is not that of a prophet who stands within the Kingdom, a member of it like those whom he addresses, speaks out of the circumstances of his age, and addresses to his fellow-citizens words of warning, of counsel, of rebuke, and of hope. Jesus stands consciously on a far higher platform, and does not class Himself with those whom He addresses, as though He and they bore the same relation to the Law. They are not His fellow-citizens. They are His subjects, citizens of the community of which He is head and lawgiver. The laws of the Kingdom He promulgates by His own personal authority. Six times in the Sermon on the Mount He sets aside 'that which was spoken to them of old time,' and substitutes a rule of His own. In doing so, however, He is no mere revolutionary. He is taking the inner spiritual principle of the old Law, and liberating it from the restrictions which had protected it in the time of man's sin. After the same manner He interprets the Sabbath law (Mk 2<sup>27-28</sup>). In dealing with per-versions of the Law He is still more peremptory and drastic; e.g. as to fasting (2<sup>18a</sup>) and ceremonial purification (7<sup>5a</sup>). The consciousness of One who thus legislates for the Kingdom is not that of a prophet, not even of the greatest of the prophets, who was God's instrument in the first founding of the community, and received the law at His hands. It is rather that of One in whom God comes to His people, who is the Divinely appointed King in Israel, whose relation to God is closer than any mere man's can be, who speaks, therefore, with the very authority of God Himself.

3. Messiah.—The sense in which Jesus claimed the title of Messiah is not to be gathered from any views of the Messiah entertained by His contemporaries. The clue is to be sought in Jesus' attitude towards the OT. (a) He regards the OT as a unity. Critical questions are not before His mind, and upon them He pronounces no judgment. 'David,' 'Moses,' 'Isaiah' are simply terms of reference. What He does lay hold of is the unity of the revelation. One mind is revealed. One self-consistent purpose moves amid these varied scenes and ages. (b) He conceives the Divine purpose in the OT to be redemptive. The heart of the OT is union with God, the formation of a spiritual fellowship in which God is fully known and men enter upon the position and privilege of sons. In this connexion He preaches the Kingdom not merely as at hand (Mk 1<sup>15</sup>), but as present in commanding power (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>). Thus He appropriates to Himself as descriptive of His own work the picture language of Is 61<sup>1-4</sup>. So also in the most solemn hour of His life, when He was on the verge of laying it down, He claimed redemptive efficacy for His death in accordance with the oracle of the new covenant (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, Jn 1<sup>31</sup>). This was central in the consciousness of Jesus. An eschatology, no doubt, He had; but it was subordinate to the spiritual conception of redemption, and represented in terms of current thought the consummation of redemption in the world to come. Messiahship accordingly, meant for Jesus the vocation in which the redemptive purpose of God, which had been growing to completion through the history of Israel, would be fulfilled. We can understand, therefore, how unwilling He would be to receive such a title, and how glad He would be to accept it when it was applied to Him, not because of His supposed fulfilment of popular requirements, but in spite of His obvious non-fulfilment of these demands; and how careful He would be to train those who clung to Him as Messiah in the apprehension of His own transformed idea of it.

The passages which may be adduced as proof of the Messianic consciousness of Jesus all exhibit His own interpretation of the title. It is the calling of the agent of a Divine purpose.

(1) The Baptism.—(For discussion of Baptism and Temptation, see art. CHARACTER OF CHRIST, p. 285 f.) This is evidently much more than installation into a public office. It was the solemn acceptance of the vocation of Messiah interpreted with reference to the taking away of sin. For such an office, a personal rank superior to that of all other men, and a personal endowment of the Spirit in a measure which no other man could receive were essential.—(2) The sermon at Nazareth. Here the Messianic era is described in terms of intense spirituality; and the Speaker claims to be the Messiah in a sense which identifies Him with the Servant of the Lord (Lk 4<sup>16-30</sup>).—

VOL. I.—51

(3) The reply to John the Baptist. To the question 'Art thou he that cometh?' He makes a reply which is at once an affirmation and a negation. He is the Messiah, not after a plying external or catastrophic instrumentality, but of a far higher order, employing means which reach to the depth of man's sin (Mt 11<sup>2-6</sup>, cf. Is 35<sup>5</sup>).—(4) The estimate of John the Baptist. In Mt 11<sup>10</sup> John is the messenger of Mal 3<sup>1</sup> who prepares the way for Jehovah, or for the Angel of the Covenant, who is identified with Jehovah. In Mk 9<sup>12-13</sup> John is Elijah, the precursor of the Messiah; while in 12<sup>3</sup> he is identified with the 'voice' of Is 40<sup>3-5</sup>. The implied claim on the part of Jesus, which the Evangelist repeats, is to a personal dignity not less than that of One whose coming is, at the same time, the coming of Jehovah to His people.—(5) The threefold call of Jesus. The call mentioned in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 1<sup>35-41</sup>) is necessary to render intelligible that which is mentioned first by Jesus (Mt 1<sup>16-20</sup>, Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>10-11</sup>). The third call to Apostleship (Mk 3<sup>13-14</sup>) is the culmination of the series. Messiahship and Apostleship thus receive progressive interpretation. The Kingdom, the King, and high rank even like that of prince in a tribe of Israel, are all to be interpreted in a manner that confounds and contradicts popular theory.—(6) The answer to Peter. Into one moment of intense emotional strain and profound spiritual instruction are compressed (a) joyous recognition of faith's insight and grasp (Mt 16<sup>17</sup>); (b) solemn illumination of the truth which faith had thus, with little intelligent apprehension, made its own (Mk 8<sup>37-41</sup>). The Messiah has an aim which is reached through His resurrection. He who is competent to carry out such a scheme does not stand in the same rank of being with other men. Jesus' doctrine of His person is never dogmatically announced. It is none the less, rather all the more, impressively taught, because He allows it to grow upon the minds of believers as an irresistible inference.—(7) It is significant that Jesus' claims to Messiahship become more explicit toward the close of His career. No doubt the explanation is that misapprehension was scarcely now possible. If He is a King, it is through humiliation He reaches His end (Mk 11<sup>1-11</sup>, 15<sup>1-19</sup>, 13<sup>5-6</sup>, 14<sup>61-62</sup>, 15<sup>2</sup>).

4. Saviour.—(1) Jesus' view of sin, in respect of its guilt, and power, and pollution, was the very gravest. Yet He did not hesitate to announce Himself as able to save men from an evil for which the OT provided no institute of deliverance. He forgave sin (Mt 9<sup>9</sup>). He restored the outcast (Lk 7<sup>48-50</sup>, 19<sup>10</sup>). He died to make good His claims as Redeemer (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>). This negative form of salvation, however, is not that upon which alone, or even usually, He dwells. He dwells rather on the positive aspect of salvation, and claims to be able to bestow upon men the highest blessing of which the OT revelation can conceive, viz. life. Not merely does He promise it in the future, but He bestows it in the present. He possesses life (Jn 5<sup>26</sup>). He bestows life (6<sup>37</sup>). His words convey life (6<sup>68</sup>). Those who believe in Him are made of life to others (7<sup>38</sup>). Life consists fundamentally in knowledge of God, and of Himself as the Christ (17<sup>3</sup>). If we admit that the Fourth Gospel has reproduced the teaching of Jesus with substantial accuracy it is impossible not to recognize the superhuman nature of Jesus' self-consciousness. The Jews might well strive with one another (6<sup>52</sup>) as to what His words meant. They certainly conveyed a claim which no mere man could offer in his own behalf.

(2) There is only one possible response on the part of men to the Divine saving act, viz. faith, as personal trust. There can be no doubt that Jesus did require faith in Himself, and, in so doing, consciously stood toward men in a place that can be filled by God only. It is true that the words 'believe in me' occur but rarely in the Synoptics (Mk 9<sup>42</sup>, Mt 18<sup>6</sup>). But if they have not the phrase, they have the fact. In Bey-chlags well-known words, 'the conduct of those who sought His help, to whom He says so often "thy faith hath saved thee," is, at bottom, a faith in Christ.' So also, confessing Him (Mt 10<sup>32</sup>), praying in His name (18<sup>20</sup>), coming to Him and learning of Him (11<sup>28-30</sup>), are, in essence, religious acts. What is implicit in the Synoptics becomes explicit in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 11<sup>25</sup> 12<sup>46</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>9</sup>), in which cases the use of ei implies trustful giving up of self to the personal object of faith). Surely there is only one justification for the man who speaks in such phrases and adopts such an attitude toward His fellows, viz that, human though He be, He consciously occupies a relation to God radically distinct from that which can be held by any mere man. Jesus accepted a worship that can be rendered to God only. Yet He never by a breath suggested that He was a rival to Jehovah in the faith and love of men. Whom, then, did He conceive Himself to be? Whom must they, who thus worship Him, believe Him to be, if they are to be free from the error of man-worship?

5. Lord.—He who is Saviour has the right of sovereignty. Such sovereignty Jesus claims, uses and exercises increasingly. (1) He commands men to follow Him, and thus institutes discipleship (e.g. Mt 4<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>9</sup> 19<sup>21</sup>). (2) He enjoins on His representatives a similar usage (10<sup>12-15</sup>). (3) He demands entire surrender, placing Himself first in the regard of the human heart (e.g. Mt 10<sup>37-38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>59-62</sup>). (4) He decides infallibly on the spiritual cases set before Him, and deals with them in a manner which would be an invasion of elemental human rights, if it were not warranted by a unique function, which, in turn, is rooted in a unique position. (5) He appoints the whole future of His disciples, both here and hereafter (Mt 10<sup>6-29</sup>, Jn 14<sup>2</sup> 4). In all this there is implied a sovereignty over man which cannot be wielded by one who is no more than man.

6. Worker of Miracles.—If we take the standpoint of monism, that there is only one substance, and only one set of laws appropriate to it, or that of dualism or parallelism that spiritual and material facts belong to two distinct and incommensurable orders of being, we shall find it impossible to believe in miracle; and we shall condemn, as mistaken, Jesus' evident belief that He was able to seal His redemptive activities by works of superhuman power in the realm of physical nature. If, however, we hold the theistic position, which Jesus Himself held, that between God and the universe there is neither pantheistic identification nor dualistic separation, but that God maintains constant contact with the world which He has made, and directs the activities of which He is the source, towards ends in harmony with His own nature, then we shall find it possible to believe in those interventions of spiritual power in the domain of physical nature, which we call miracle. The only question we shall ask—apart from that of evidence—is that of need. In a perfect universe there might be no need for miracle. In the universe as we know it there is abundant need. Redemption is needed at once ethical and cosmical. The Kingdom of God is miraculous in its very nature. Miracles, therefore naturally will attend its advent into the realm of time and space. They are altogether congruous with the mission of Jesus. They are 'signs of the Kingdom, the characteristic works of Him in whom the Kingdom comes. Such, in any case, was the conviction of Jesus. Before the forces of nature, and of the obscure spirit-world that borders on the physical, in presence of disease and death, He did not own Himself conquered. He bore Himself as Master, as One to whom God's universe lay open, so that its powers were at His disposal for the furtherance of the cause committed to Him. This commanding authority of His was an element in that impression of supernatural greatness which He made on those who came under His influence (Mk 1<sup>27</sup>, Lk 5<sup>9</sup>).

7. Creator of the New Israel.—The word ἐκκλησία is but once heard on the lips of Jesus in its special significance; but the occasion is one of solemn import (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>). Peter has made his inspired confession, and Jesus makes reply, 'Thou art Petros, and on this Petra I will build my Ecclesia; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it.' Those who heard could not fail to connect this with Israel, as though Jesus had said, 'on this Rock will I build my Israel' (Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, p. 11). This claim has reference to the past. That community, which originated at the first Passover, which endured through the vicissitudes of Israel's history, which cannot be identified with the nation which has rejected Christ, is now rebuilt, or built, by Jesus in His capacity as Messiah. It has reference to the future. To the Ecclesia, or community of believers in Jesus, He gives the seals of the Supper and Baptism, to it He gives the commission to carry on His work; in it He promises to dwell by His Spirit. Regarding it He predicts that it will prove invincible in face of the powers of Hades. He, Jesus of Nazareth, undertakes to erect on the bed-rock of that group of loyal disciples a new Israel, a spiritual dominion which shall not pass away while time endures. It is vain to characterize a consciousness such as this as merely human. Jesus, in His own belief, stands above the human as Revealer and Representative of the Father, God, superior to the lapse of time.

8. Judge.—Our view of eschatology will depend on our conception of history. If we believe in the fulfilment of a Divine purpose we shall anticipate a climax, in which the whole movement will be complete. In that case we shall not be able to set aside 'Messianism' as irrelevant to the essence of religion. Our Lord certainly regarded redemption as a process to be continued through a lapse of time whose culmination would form the completion of the world's history; and, at the highest point of that culmination, He placed Himself. Amid the many difficulties, textual and other, which surround the eschatology of Jesus, it seems clear that He keeps close to the OT representations, without committing Himself to the details elaborated in later literature. In one all-important point, however, He modifies the OT representation; where the OT placed Jehovah, Jesus places Himself as Judge (Mt 7<sup>21-23</sup> 13<sup>30</sup>, 41 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>11</sup> 12, 31ff., Lk 13<sup>25-27</sup>).

In the Fourth Gospel there is another judgment, one which belongs to the present time, and is carried out through the presence or the word of Christ (Jn 3<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>47</sup> 48). This, however, is not inconsistent with a final judgment, but is rather its precursor; while the final judgment itself is not absent from the representations of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 12<sup>48</sup> 5<sup>27</sup> 28, cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>).

Here, then, is the climax of our Lord's self-assertion. There is manifest in this claim a consciousness which we should pronounce insane were it not that of the humblest and sanest man the world ever saw. Nothing can warrant such a claim, nothing justify such a consciousness, save the hypothesis that Jesus had a higher being than appertains to men, and that, as arising from this constitution of His person, He had universal functions which none other than Himself could exercise.

ii. HIS SELF-DESIGNATIONS.—The claims of Jesus, accordingly, direct us to conclude that He believed Himself to be human indeed, yet at the same time One who was related to God, in the ground and origin of His being, as no other man could be. From this consciousness the functions He claimed relative to humanity must have been derived. It must have been on the ground of what He was, and knew Himself to be, in the inherent quality of His being, that He set Himself forth as called and enabled to do certain acts in and for mankind.

It was impossible for men to listen to His claims without inquiring as to His person. Nay, He Himself stimulated the inquiry, and displayed, if one may so say, an anxiety to know what men were thinking of Him. What help, if any, does He give us in seeking for an answer? It is certain that He will not give us definitions after the style of the creeds, or analytic descriptions in the manner of a modern handbook of psychology. The most, and the best, He can do for us, is to grant such unveilings of what was and must remain His secret, as shall enable us, under the requisite spiritual conditions, to know Him and to trust Him. Christ is not a proposition to be proved, or an object to be dissected. He is a Person to be known. By what names, then, does He will to be known?

Hisself, two are of supreme importance. The discussions regarding their meaning form a kind of register of the history of modern Christology. If the Person of Christ be the centre of the Church's faith, and the apprehension of it be the note of the Church's growth, these discussions cannot be expected to reach scientific finality. The titles stand for all that Christ means in the experience of His disciples, and their wealth of meaning is, therefore, too rich for our exegetical skill to tabulate.

1. The Son of Man.—Three questions are pertinent to our present purpose

(1) Whence—It would not have been necessary to title might have been at once accepted. Himself—were it not that a phrase, suggestive of it, occurs both in the later apocalyptic literature and in the OT, in unmistakably Messianic connotations. It is inconceivable that Jesus should have adopted this title, and not have meant it to designate Himself, as the personal realization of what was prophesied in the indefinite phrase of Dn 7<sup>13</sup>. We are therefore led to the title 'Son of Man' stood on Jesus' lips as equivalent to the title 'Messiah,' which He would not use unless and until His use of it could not be misapprehended.

The title, moreover, is not arbitrary. It suggests the type of Messiah which Jesus intended to fulfil, and the kind of actions through which He intended to fulfil His Messianic vocation. The passage in Daniel, taken as a whole, turns on the contrast between two kinds of sovereignty—that which is won by brute force, and that which belongs to a being not brutal but human. But this is precisely Jesus' conception of His Messiahship, viz a sovereignty to be won through service. There is another passage which ought not to be forgotten when we ask for the sources of Jesus' idea of the Son of Man, viz. Is 53. It may be too much to say that Jesus intended 'Son of Man' to be the title of the Lord, though His use of the phrase 'Son of Man' with the contents of that other I meant by 'Son of Man' to identify 'Messiah' who, in the prophetic vision, passed through suffering and death.

(2) How and for what use it?—Let the relative passages be placed before us, as is done in Driver's great art. 'Son of Man' in Matthew's DB, and at once a twofold use reveals itself. One class of passages, those in which Jesus speaks of Himself as the Son of Man, those in which He speaks of others as the Son of Man. It is a redemptive work, it is performed in the lowliest service and profound suffering, its motive is deep, true sympathy with men in their needy condition. The other class contains references to the sovereignty which is now hidden by the lowliness, though in no sense inconsistent with it (Mk 10<sup>42</sup>), which, when the ends of humiliation are achieved, will be demonstrated in the face of the universe. Together these passages set forth a Messiah whose work is the redemption of men through a life of service and suffering, and a death which has in it the quality of an atonement, a Messiah whose faithfulness to His vocation will be crowned with royal honours.

(3) What does He reveal as to His own Person in it?—The interpretation of the title as 'representative' or 'ideal' man is surely too modern to be an accurate reflexion of Jesus' own mode of thinking. We shall not be in error, however, if we read in the title Jesus' identification of Himself with men, His profound insight into their condition and His acceptance of it as His own, His taking upon Himself the griefs from which they suffer, and His achieving, in the depths of His suffering, their deliverance. The title, accordingly, sums up the relations in which Jesus stands to men. He touches human nature at every point. It is true He is sinless; but this fact, so far from hindering His perfect sympathy with men, is its necessary pre-condition. Just because He is sinless, His identification with men can be complete, and He can be to men what no other can be. He can do for men what not one of themselves can do. The fulness of His humanity distinguishes Him from all individual members of the race. He is not 'a man'; He is 'the Son of Man,' the kinsman of every man, the Head and King of redeemed and reconstituted humanity.

Here is a gracious fact, verifiable in the experience of every man who will yield his heart to this Saviour and Lord. This very fact, however, opens depths of mystery within itself. Who is He who is perfect man? What is the basis of this human sonship? It cannot be a Personality, limited as ours is, needing, as ours does, some bond beyond itself to connect it with God. He who can stand in this unique relation to men must stand also in a unique relation to God. See also art SON OF GOD.

2. The Son of God.—This title, as Jesus used it or accepted it, is plainly derived from the OT, where it is applied to the theocratic people (Ex 4<sup>22</sup>, Hos 11<sup>1</sup>), to the theocratic King (2 S 7<sup>14</sup>, Ps 89<sup>26</sup> 27), and to the Messiah (Ps 27). The OT usage evidently is not barely official, but shows a growth in its connotation and in definiteness of its application. It would be too much to suppose that any OT prophet clearly discerned the Divinity of the Messiah; but at least the prophetic vision catches sight of One who should stand in a spiritual relation to God closer than that which can possibly be occupied by any member of the theocracy. The title, accordingly, as it applies to the Messiah, does not express barely His office, but rather some quality of His person which is superhuman and is the source of reverent awe in the minds of those who contemplate the thought of Him. There is a quality in it which excludes either a dogmatic conception of His Divinity, or a merely humanitarian view of His person. When it occurs in the NT, we cannot get rid of it by pointing out that it simply means 'the Messiah.' No doubt it means the Messiah, but it connotes that in the man who claims to be the Messiah which lifts Him above the level of mankind.

(1) We cannot draw any definite inference from the use of it by demons, or by Satan in the Temptation narrative. Probably, however, as the idea of the 'subliminal' sphere which engirdles our conscious life makes its way into psychology, men will be more likely to give weight to narratives which imply that between such unhappy beings and Jesus there existed mutual knowledge and that He exerted a direct and certain influence upon them. It is certainly a fact that He possessed a power which He possessed.

(2) Neither can we base a case on the expression used by the high priest (Mt 26<sup>63</sup>), for the charge or claim to be 'the Christ' did not carry with it the verdict of criminal punishment. The addition 'Son of God' or 'Son of the Blessed' looks like a climax. In St Luke's narrative (22<sup>67</sup>) the question, 'If thou art the Christ' (v. 67), is separated from the second, 'Art thou then the Son of God?' (v. 70), by Jesus' claim to Divine honours (v. 69). The impression made by the scene is that our Lord's judges understood Him to be claiming superhuman dignity. This claim they regarded as blasphemous, and it formed ipso facto the warrant of the death sentence.

(3) Peter's ascription in Mt 16<sup>16</sup> has some doubt thrown on it by the absence of the clause 'the Son of the living God' from the parallel passages in Mark and Luke. Yet an argument based on omissions is precarious. St. Matthew had access to special sources. His version has the ring of genuineness, and it is to be noted that the benediction upon Peter is not found in Mark and Luke, where the ascription of Sonship is also wanting. If, then, we may accept the genuineness of the saying, we cannot, indeed, attribute to Peter a doctrine of his which he could reach only through experience of the Sonship; but, certainly, we note that he is far in advance of the momentary impression of Mt 14:18. He cannot mean less than that He to whom he speaks is the Son of Jehovah, having an intimacy with Him possessed by no other man, revealing Him as no other can, not even the greatest of the prophets. Peter knows nothing of dogma, but he has flung the plummet of his faith. He is being. In that moment of being, when he was, has been made to him which will carry him far in after days, of which the opening verses in Hebrews and the prologue to the Fourth Gospel will be no more than the adequate expression.

(4) When we turn to our Lord's own testimony as to His Sonship toward God, we are at once lifted high above the merely official aspect of the designation. In the Synoptic Gospels He never uses the title 'Son of God'; but His filial relation toward God is not for a moment in question. A son's devotion to his father, a son's utter trust in his father, a son's joyful intercourse with his father—all these, raised to an immeasurable degree, are the characteristics of Jesus' bearing toward God. If the phrase had never occurred in the OT, or fallen from any human lips regarding Him, none the less would any sympathetic view of the Figure portrayed have yielded the inference: Here is a man who in very deed is Son of God, in a sense to which no other man ever attained or could attain. The unique Sonship which Jesus knew Himself to possess gains express utterance in three great sayings (Mk 13:32 14:36 [cf. Lk 23:46] and Mt 11:27). The first of these sets the rank of the Son in a more conspicuous light, because Jesus is disclaiming a knowledge which, on the supposition that He was God's Son, it might have been expected that He would possess. The second unveils the mystery of the Passion, the profound acceptance of the Father's purpose in the midst of a suffering which the Father Himself appoints. The third, with its strongly Johannine phrasing, brings Jesus and the Father together in unique mutual knowledge. The latter Christology is expressed in these words; and, in the consciousness which they express, the invitation which follows, addressed to all the weary and heavy laden, promising them rest, can alone find its warrant. In the Fourth Gospel Jesus is represented as using the exact phrase, 'Son of God' (Jn 5:25 9:35 10:36 11:4). In one of these passages, however, there is uncertainty as to the correct reading, and in the others the possibility that the author may have imported into the narrative phraseology of later date, may be admitted. But the correlative terms 'the Father' and 'the Son' abound; and no reader of the Fourth Gospel, whatever his critical views or theological prejudices may be, doubts that the deep consciousness of Jesus, revealed in such utterances (e.g. 5:18 10:30 38 14:11 17:21), is that of a Sonship toward God which belongs to Himself alone of all the human race. Few, also, will be found to deny that the representations of the Fourth Gospel are not in excess of the portraiture of the Synoptic Gospels.

(5) The Divine attestation—At the Baptism and the Transfiguration God solemnly attested the Divine Sonship of Jesus in words which reproduce the language of the OT (Ps 27, Is 42). It is needless to discuss the 'objective' aspect of the communication. In any case, the attestation was made direct to the consciousness of Jesus. The language is that of Messianic prophecy; but as it fell on Jesus' inward ear, it was not a mere certification of His Messiahship, but rather a gracious assurance of that which interpreted for Him Messiahship, and made its achievement possible, viz. a relation toward God which lay deep in His being, and was the primary element in His self-knowledge.

How, then, are we to conceive the Sonship of Jesus toward God? Let us avoid modern abstractions, which were certainly not present to the mind of our Lord, or to any of those who came under His influence and have recorded their convictions. In particular, let us not be coerced by the supposed contrast between 'ethical' and 'metaphysical' and by the alternative, which some have forced upon us, of regarding the Divine Sonship of Jesus as being ethical merely, or of imputing to Him a metaphysical Sonship, which is an importation from the modern world. Ethical the Sonship of Jesus undoubtedly was. It manifested itself in knowledge of God and love to God, together with trust and obedience and other lovely qualities and experiences. The Sonship to which believers in Him are introduced is of this type, and is marked by the same characteristics. He Himself claims them as His brethren (Mk 3:35). But does this mean that He and they are of one class? Does His Sonship differ from theirs merely in degree? Is He unique only in the measure in which He realized the privileges of a filial standing, which, however, belongs to men simply as men? Is this the utmost impression that the whole portrait makes upon us? It certainly was not all that His Jewish auditors inferred from His self-witness. They declared that He was making Himself equal to God, and they would have killed Him for His blasphemy (Jn 5:18 8:59 10:31-33). Were they mistaken? He does not say so. His retort (10:34ff.) is no earnest disclaimer; rather is it a reassertion of His essential unity with God. Surely this is the impression we gain from the record, that along with His intense nearness to men, there is a note of aloofness from them as of a Being of another order. Surely there are qualities in His Sonship that are incommunicable to men, aspects of it which can never be found in theirs. Could any of them ever say, 'I and the Father are one?' Could it be said of any one of them, that 'to see him was to see the Father'? It is noteworthy, and ought to be final on this subject, that Jesus never classes Himself among His disciples as if He and they were alike children of the Heavenly Father. He distinguishes Himself as the Son from all other sons of God (cf. Mt 6:32 10:20 with 18:35 20:20). They become sons, He is the Son. The correlation between 'the Father' and 'the Son' is absolute, and excludes any other son of God from that unique and perfect fellowship. When we weigh these things, the distinction between ethical and metaphysical becomes meaningless. The Sonship of Jesus has an ethical uniqueness which carries with it essential relations to God. His self-witness carries us to equality of being with God. As 'Son of Man' means humanity in the broadest, truest sense, so 'Son of God' means Divinity in the deepest signification of the term, which will require for its statement and defence the utmost range of reverent thought, while yet it cannot be comprehended or set forth in any formula.

This is the self-witness of Jesus. He is a Divine Being. His life in time under the conditions of humanity is not His whole life. He has come from a sphere wherein He dwelt with God, a conscious Person in equality with God. He entered into this world to execute a purpose which involved His complete oneness with humanity and a sympathetic appropriation of a complete human experience; He had before Him, throughout His experience as a man, His return to the abode which He had left, His regaining the glory which, for purposes of infinite love, He had laid aside. He knew 'that he came forth from God, and goeth unto God' (Jn 13). These were facts which, in the nature of the case, could not be proved by any external evidence. Sympathetic hearts and open minds would be prepared for them. Narrow-minded, unspiritual, and prejudiced persons would reject them. The truth is: His Personality stands or falls by His own life. 'Even if I bear witness of myself, my witness is true; for I know whence I came, and whither I go.' Or, if another witness is wanted, there is Another who witnesses along with Him, even the Father in whom He abides (Jn 8:12-19). Of a mode of being which He had with God antecedent to His earthly life He could not speak freely. Necessarily, He could not but observe the utmost reticence regarding it. Nevertheless, His recollection of it was continually with Him, and "in great moments, for example in His crises, or in communion with His Father (Jn 6:62 8:58 17:24).

It will be said that this highest reach of the self-witness of Jesus opens out into sheer mystery; and attempts are continually made to bring to light the view of Jesus regarding the terms of the view of making the record more intelligible, and making Jesus Himself more accessible to our imaginations. Such attempts wreck themselves on the high oval-slopingness of criticism and criticism itself of exaggeration. Moreover, they defeat their own ends. In Jesus, no more than man, the Gospel narrative is forever unattainable, and Jesus Himself remains behind in the past, at best a pathetic memory, at worst a mere enigma. The fact which makes Jesus as 'the only-begotten Son,' or 'God only-begotten' (Jn 1:18), is a just deduction from the narrative of His life and from His own self-witness. It supplies, moreover, the explanation which is wanted for the whole representation as it is given not merely in the Fourth Gospel, but in the Synoptic Gospels as well. The humanity of Jesus, the universal unversality, could belong only to One as well as Son of Man. The Messianic redemptive work of Jesus, in its efficacy, as sealing the new covenant, could be undertaken and discharged only by One who was, and knew Himself to be, the Son of God.

C. THE WITNESS OF THE APOSTLES.—The disciples of Jesus, even when He was with them as their Master and Teacher, were not a mere school. They were a community, enjoying the unexampled privilege of fellowship with the most wonderful Personality which ever impinged itself on human souls. For a brief space, which must have seemed an eternity of pain, they thought He had left them. Then He astounded, rebuked, and blessed them by His risen presence. Thus the disciples were reconstituted as a community, the secret of whose unity and vitality was fellowship with the unseen yet living Lord. This is their experience: Christ is risen; no hallucination, dream, or vision, but the Lord Himself as they had begun to know Him, and now know Him as they could never have known Him had He tarried through lapse of years in flesh among them. Now that He is risen they are less than ever a school; they are an Ecclesia, His Ecclesia, as He had said Himself (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), a fellowship of human beings, the hidden source of whose privileges and gifts is fellowship with the exalted Saviour and Head. To Him they owed their liberation from sin which the elaborate institutes of the OT had failed to accomplish (Rev 15). From Him they derived that life which was the choicest privilege of the OT, but which could not be perfectly possessed till God was fully known (Jn 17<sup>3</sup>). Christianity as it is presented in the NT is life in fellowship with Jesus Christ. Such an experience cannot be stationary. It must be a growth in the grace and the knowledge of Jesus Christ. The NT throbs and thrills with life, exultant, buoyant, hopeful; expanding, deepening, increasing in energy; not without weaknesses, relapses, defects; but ever correcting its faults, cleansing its stains, renewing its vitality through fellowship with Christ, who is its unfailing source. It is intended to remind ourselves that the primary fact of the NT is an experience living and increasing; lest we be tempted to go to it as to a volume of theolog . . . a systematic statement of theolog . . . from it intellectual completeness, and feel proportionately disappointed if it provide not an answer to every question which may rise in our minds. Such a doctrinaire view, whether held by the destructive critic or the constructive theologian, is erroneous and misleading. The NT is ecclesiastical to its core, and is fundamentally a community to Him with whom believers are united in an ever-increasing fellowship. 'That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you also, that ye also may have fellowship with us : yea, and our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ' (1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>). When, accordingly, . . . the records of this testimony, we . . . the notes of experience will be found . . . (a) variety created by differences in the spiritual . . . individual writers, as well as by differences in the occasion and circumstances of their writing; (b) development throughout the whole period covered by the NT literature, the earlier stages being marked by attention mainly to the conspicuous activities of the risen Saviour, the later being characterized by a deeper insight into the personal relations of Christ to God and to man and to the world; (c) unity, fundamentally the same view of Christ being present in all the writings . . . and later, inasmuch as all . . . in its origin as well as in its progress, is rooted and grounded in the same almighty Saviour, the same exalted Lord. The witness may be briefly summarized as follows.

i THE EARLIER CHAPTERS IN THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.—In the midst of much critical discussion of these chapters, it can hardly be questioned that they reproduce, with substantial truth, the type of life and teaching in the primitive Church; and give us 'a Christology which must have come from a primitive source' (Knowing, Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, p. 171). How, then, did Peter and his associates preach Christ?

Three points seem plain. (1) They dwell on the humanity of Christ. They do not deny His divinity, nor do they dogmatically insist on it, as though it had been denied by some Docetic scheme. They use His human name. They dwell on His human life and character. He whom they preach as the Christ is the Jesus of that historic past which is so fresh in their memories, so lovely in their hearts. Upon what He had been and done as man all His followers and accusers are agreed. (2) They set the fact of the Resurrection before the eyes of all men, teaching. That event carries the victory of the Christian faith. (3) They stress the fact of the Resurrection as God's accomplished purpose of mercy. "He is risen," we are witnesses' (20th). The Resurrection is not merely the miracle of a dead man raised. It is a great historic act on the part of God, who hereby authenticates the mission and vindicates the claims of Jesus. It is not merely that Jesus survives a martyrdom. Through His resurrection He sits upon that of His father David, and He is seated in His Father's Majesty (28th 30th 37th). In doing so, He takes a mere man and make Him what a man cannot be, or set Him where a man could not breathe. Jesus is placed in the position which is His by right, to which His person perfectly corresponds. The earliest preaching is in complete harmony with Ro 14. The idea of pre-existence, though not explicitly stated is one of the implications of this teaching, even as it is of the Synoptic pericopae. (4) They apply to Him titles which describe Him as the culmination of the highest reach of OT prophecy, and carry with them, in some instances, a distinctly Divine rank of being: Messiah, in Jesus' own interpretation of Messiah and His mission (318 320 325 29); Lord (121 294 36 1036), i.e. the OT name of Jehovah, which could be borne only by a Divine being, though, it may well be, the theological bearings of such a title were not fully understood by His hearers; Prophet (318 320 325 331 330), Servant (314 26 27), Son of David (314 26 27), Son of Man (314 26 27), Son of God (320), a title used in this place only, yet significantly as a current description of preaching the gospel — (4) They dwell on certain present functions and activities, exercised by the exalted Saviour. He bestows the Spirit (28 33). He grants the forgiveness of sins (28 33 51). He operates in miracle of healing (316 416), the condition on the human side being faith in His name. He is the Source of Salvation (412). To Him, therefore, the preachers invite their hearers to come. They insist, however, on present not a result of a general, but of the specific guilt of the individual. They require faith as an act of personal decision. They announce His return, at the completion of the Messianic period, for judgment (321 1042). This announcement gave a distinctive character to the preaching, and rendered it not so much 'an argument as to certain truths,' as 'the proclamation of a message' (St. Matthews, The Messianic Hope, p. 145). None the less it bore, as its heart and centre, the truth of the Lord's superhuman personal dignity.

The Divinity of Christ is not discussed by these missionary preachers. They are concerned with the facts regarding Christ, His power, His promises, His benefits. They do not unfold the doctrine of His person which is implied in their statements: their own development of it were, probably, at a very early stage. They held and taught such things regarding Him as implied that conception of Christ which was set forth by later teachers. Those brethren who wrote at a later date, and more explicitly, were not moving away from the historic Christ. They were, rather, getting nearer to Him, and seeing Him more clearly, than had been possible to those who bore their witness at an earlier period.

II. THE MINOR CHRISTOLOGIES.—Some NT writings have scarcely advanced beyond the point of view of the Acts. They are mainly occupied with the saving functions of the Messiah, and do not enter deeply into the consideration of His Person. With respect to the simplest of them, however, it remains true that the place of Jesus in religious experience is central and unique. He is the object of faith, the source of blessing.

1. James.—His Epistle has sometimes been misdirected on as though it were little better than Jewish-Christian. We may content ourselves with Hort's more generous estimate: 'Unlike as it is to the other books of the NT, it is Jewish-Christianity by total fact' (Judaistic Christianity, p. 151). We may refer also to Dr. Patrick's recent volume, James, the Lord's Brother, p. 98 ff.

The doctrinal scheme of the Epistle is very simple and clearly religious. God is the absolutely good One (1:17). Man is made in His image (3:9), and is meant to be separate from the world (1:27), and wholly given up to God (1:8). Sin is the forsaking of God's law, and the choice of the world instead of God, and of the flesh instead of the Spirit. For men, under the power of sin, deliverance lies in the act of God who calls them into a new life. This He effects by His Word, and this word comes through the mediation of Christ, by whom the old law is transformed into a new law, a royal law, a law of liberty (2:12). Christ, accordingly, is the Saviour to whom we owe our salvation. He is the object of saving faith, which we must not belie by any inconsistent life (2:17).

To St. James, as to all Christians, Jesus is also Lord, ranked along with Jehovah in honour and dignity (1:21). To Him belongs 'the honourable name' (2:7). He will shortly come for judgment (5:7). Dorner's summary is borne out by the whole Epistle: 'Both in soteriological and in Christological form, James acknowledges the absoluteness of the Christian religion' (System, vol. iii. p. 159).

2. The First Epistle of Peter.—There is distinct advance in this Epistle beyond the statements in St. Peter's speeches reported in the Acts, though even yet the Christology is not so rich and full as in St. Paul or St. John. The sinlessness of Jesus is clearly stated (1:19 222); and this gives an impression of the Personality of Christ which is inconsistent with a merely humanitarian view of His person. The death of Christ, which had once offended Peter, but which in his preaching he had declared to be part of Messiah's redemptive work, he now glories in as the ground of salvation, and he describes it in its atoning efficacy with rich variety of phrase—covenant blood (1:19), ransom (1:18), sin-bearing (2:20), substitution (3:1). One who ascribed such efficacy to the death of Christ must have taken an exalted view of His Person. Lordship in the usual Christian sense is ascribed to Him (1:21 315). Sonship toward God is implied in 1:3. Resurrection, exaltation, supremacy have their wonted place in St. Peter's thoughts, as in all Christian faith (1:21 322). The wording of 1:11 and 1:20 scarcely allows us to regard these passages as implying a personal pre-existence of Christ. Such an interpretation of them is certainly legitimate, and is, besides, much more characteristic of St. Peter's non-speculative cast of mind than the ideal pre-existence which is held by some interpreters to be the meaning. In any case, Christ is to St. Peter a Being far more than man or angel; and this means, since the thought of a pre-existence is impossible to a Jewish monotheist, that he placed his Lord side by side with Jehovah, shared with God in Divine rank and worship. This he did with the memory full and clear within him of his Master's human life. That St. Peter, who so often spoke frankly and plainly to Jesus, and once rebuked Him and once denied Him, should have come to adore Him as Divine, is a fact most wonderful, and fraught with far-reaching consequences.

3. Jude and 2 Peter.—In these brief and, from many points of view, difficult writings, there is no Christological discussion. Both Epistles, however, assume the Lordship of Christ, and look forward to His coming as Judge. In 2 P 1:3, He is conjoined with the Father as the object of religious knowledge; and in the previous verse He is described as 'our God and Saviour Jesus Christ.'

4. Apocalypse.—Whatever view we take of the composition of this book, the key to which has so long been mislaid, there is no doubt that its pages glow with the glory of Jesus. It contains abundant recollections of the human life of Jesus (e.g. 5:5 2216 2114 118). It is the exalted, glorified, victorious Lord, however, who chiefly fills the seer's gaze. To Him the writer desires the eyes of the persecuted Church to turn, that she may be certified of her vindication and reward at the hand of Him whom she adores.

He is the Lord of the Second Threefold Son of God (1:10). He is the first and the last (1:12 20), the Living One, to whom belong 'the keys of death and of Hades,' is no mere earthly Being who has undergone apotheosis. He is a Divine being, who came out of eternity, entered into time, and on earth suffered and died, and now, within the unseen world, lives and reigns as God, who, also, will one day return for judgment (14:14 2220). He is on the Throne (3:21 715 125 221 3). Worship is paid to Him as God (1:6 17 23). He is the Son of God, as none other can be (1:3 17 23). He is a pre-existent and eternal Being (1:7 18 314 216 2213), such is the nature of which is required by these passages in view of the character of the book as a whole. See discussion in Stevens, pp. 535-540. To Him belongs the name 'the name of the Lord' (1:3 17 23). It is impossible to exaggerate the significance of the adoration of Jesus which pervades all the NT writings, and is so intense and sincere in this book. 'Although the writer is plainly a Jew of Jews, his mind saturated with Hebrew literature and Hebrew modes of thought, a true son of the race with which monotheism had become a passion, and the ascription of Divine honour to any other than the supreme God a horror and a blasphemy, he has yet seen in Jesus the man whom he had to adore as God' (C. A. Scott, The Book of the Revelation, p. 27).

The NT books are not efforts of solitary thinkers evolving schemes out of their inner consciousness. The Christian Ecclesia, the fellowship of Christ, the communion of saints lived by such thoughts and spiritual activities as these. Its members knew nothing of the subtleties of post-Nicene Christology; but they knew Jesus, the Lamb of God, who died for them, the Living Lord in whose right hand were seven stars, who walked amid the candlesticks.

iii. THE CHRISTOLOGY OF ST. PAUL.—

Amid the manifold discussions of this topic, three positions seem to be attracting to themselves an increasing volume of consentient opinion.

(a) St. Paul's Christology is the outcome of his experience.

He had seen the Risen Christ. The simplest, most obvious, of 1 Co 9:1-15<sup>49</sup> is surely the truest. Attempts to Paul's sight of Christ on the road to Damascus with ecstatic experiences, which he also records, betray, by a post hoc assumption that a fully objective kind alleged is impossible. St Paul's sight of Christ was of the same nature as that by which the faith of the Eleven was first established. If the 'vision hypothesis' does not do justice to the facts in their case, neither will it account for the sudden and complete revolution which took place in the life of St Paul. That he had seen the Risen Christ, in the same sense, with the same convincing 'objectivity,' as St Peter had seen Him, is the source of Paul's authority as an Apostle. It is the source, also, of his Christian faith. It warrants the utmost and the greatest which Paul can ever say regarding the wonderful being of his Lord. From that date, the hour when he heard the words 'I am Jesus,' he had been 'in Christ.' Christ had been a present reality to him, and out of it came every grace of his character, every activity of his career. 'That I the passion of his life, and his so-called 'Christology' is not a philosophy of the 'logos,' or 'avatar,' or any other type. It is the testimony he bears, incidentally, as the needs of his converts demand, to the Christ whom he knows.

(b) St Paul's conception of Christ does not stand wholly apart from the views entertained by the primitive Church. His experience, remarkable as it was, did not differ in kind from that of other believers. The Church was from the beginning a fellowship with Christ. Every member of it is united to Christ by faith. There were others who had been 'in Christ' before St Paul had gained that blessed privilege (Ro 1:6). The knowledge which he possessed of Christ was common to the fellowship of believers, and had been theirs while Paul was raging behalf of their Master, which called the young zealot to destroy a movement which he saw clearly was an invasion of the supremacy, not of Caesar, but of Jehovah. When, in later days, he himself is glorying in the lofty attributes and Divine dignity of Christ, he is well aware that he is setting forth no novelties, but is speaking out of the fulness of a faith which he has possessed by his readers as well as by himself. In 1 Th 1:1, are most memorable. 'An elaborate process of reflection, almost a system of theology, lies behind those familiar terms.' Dr Knowling's weighty and balanced statement ought to be borne in mind by every student of St Paul's thought. 'The evidence to be gathered from the Apostle's own writings is not to be judged as if it was only of a reflective character upon the events of the life of Jesus seen through a long retrospect of years in some particulars it carries us up to the existence of the Christian Church, in others it is plainly incidental, it is used as occasion justifies the inference that it has behind it a large reserve of early teaching and tradition' (Testimony, etc., p. 211).

(c) To say that St Paul's personal acquaintance with Christ grew richer as the years of his inner life and of his missionary activity passed over him. But this advance was not a speculation from without. He had not to speculate suggested it to him before. His most comprehensive to his later writings. Prof Bacon has strongly emphasized the presence of Paul's later thoughts 'in a partly developed form in the earlier Epistles' (Story of St. Paul, p. 208), and Dr Knowling's great work, already referred to, is largely devoted to an illustration of this fact (e.g. pp. 48, 90 f., 206, 211 f., 502).

1. Christ in His relation to God.—(1) He is a Divine Being.—St. Paul is an OT believer utterly removed from polytheism and wholly incapable of believing in demi-gods. He is not a Greek philosopher; impersonal abstractions or principles have no meaning for him. He of whom he speaks is 'Christ,' which with St. Paul is a proper name, the official designation being lost in the personal appellation. If, then, he ascribes to Christ the qualities which a Jewish monotheist, a member of the Old Covenant, attributed to Jehovah, he can mean nothing else than that this same person, Jesus Christ, is a Divine Being, equal with God and one with God.

(a) He attributes Lordship to Christ (2 Co 4:6); and uses the title 'Lord' habitually in connexion with the historic and personal names 'Jesus' and 'Christ.' It is no courtesy title; it is used in the sense in which the LXX uses it of God, and it has the 'connotation of Godhead.' Passages of the OT, according to which belong to Jehovah are applied to Christ (Ro 9:5; 1 Co 1:3). To the Lord, therefore, as to God, worship and prayers are addressed by St Paul and by all Christians (1 Co 12:13; 1 Co 12:13). (b) He designates Christ as 'the Son of God.' The teaching of St Paul on this subject is in harmony with the other NT representations.

Believers in Christ enter upon the life of God, and St Paul even calls them sons of God. But among such sons of God Christ is not one. He stands alone. They become sons. He is the Son (Ro 8:3; Gal 4:4). This Sonship is the very essence of Christ's being. It means Divinity in the fullest sense, in most complete reality. St Paul testifies to the Divinity of Christ while fully recognizing His humanity. On one side of His being He is linked to humanity; and St Paul has ample evidence of Christ's human life, and shows no less any reluctance, in referring to them. How should he, when it was his main business as a missionary to prove that this very Jesus was the Son of God? On the other side of His being, Christ possesses Godhead as the only Son of the Father. Of this Divine Sonship the Resurrection is declaration and proof (Ro 1:4). St Paul's Christology centres in this Divine Sonship of Christ (Gal 2:20; Eph 4:1). It was no invention of his brain, no borrowing from pagan adulation of the Emperor. It was the centre of Christianity as such, and belongs to the period of which we have literary record, being 1 Th 1:1. The faith in Christ as Son of God is the Christianity. They are Christians who think of 'as of God' (ὡς τοῦ θεοῦ), and so thinking they name Him, as St Paul did, 'God' (Ro 9:5).

(2) He is one with the Father.—The relation of the Divine Christ to the Godhead became an insoluble problem for subsequent thought. Let the presupposed conception of God be abstract simplicity and unity. Let Him be conceived as Pure Being Pure Form, Pure Thought, the Idea, or Substance. Then let the claim be advanced on behalf of a historic person that he is God. The result will be a problem which, in the nature of the case, must be insoluble. With such a Deity, the Divinity of the historic Christ is utterly incompatible. Christ must be lowered to the rank of a demi-god, or He must be etherialized into an impersonal principle.

Suppose, however, that God be conceived; in that case the claim advanced on behalf of one who lived a human life may not lead to intellectual confusion. It is certain, however, that neither St Paul nor any other NT writer held any such speculative idea of God as was prevalent in Greek Philosophy. To the men of the NT, God was the God of the OT, the living God, a Person, loving, exercising, seeking the accomplishment of an ever-living purpose of mercy, the satisfaction of His own loving nature. When, accordingly, the facts of the character and claims and resurrection of an historic person compelled them to recognize Him as Divine, they were constrained greatly to enlarge their thought of God; but they were saved the labour of stretching their thought to cover facts wholly inconceivable.

The plain reason that no such formula had any place in their thoughts. They set the Divine Christ side by side with the Divine Father, and thus found a manifoldness in the being of God which did not destroy its unity. St. Paul, therefore, includes Christ in the Divine circle (1 Th 3:13; 2 Th 2:17; 1 Co 8:6; 2 Co 13:14). 'Abstract monotheism' has ceased, and has been replaced by a Theism which finds within the one Godhead room for both Father and Son' (Fairbairn, Place of Christ, p. 309). Perhaps it would be more correct to say that the monotheism of the OT was never abstract, because the God of the OT was never a conception, or a substance, but always a Person. Personality, indeed, has never the bare unity of a monad. It always makes room for distinctions; and reaches its greatest wealth of meaning in the fellowship of person with person. Between an abstraction and a historic person there can be no unity. Between two historic persons there may be unity of the profoundest kind. St. Paul, moreover, is not thinking of a mere quantitative equivalence between the Divine Christ and God. He is true to the conception of Sonship. The relation of Christ to the Father is that of a real son including dependence and subordination (1 Co 3:23; 11:3; 15:24-28). To the Son, as reward of obedience, is given a glory and a fulness which enable Him to fulfil His mediatorial function.

(Ph 2<sup>9-11</sup>, Ro 14<sup>9</sup>, Col 1<sup>19</sup>) This, however, in no sense lowers the Divine being of the Son, or shuts Him out of the Godhead. The glory He had with the Father from eternity and the glory gained as He returns to the Father are not inconsistent. Without the former, indeed, the latter would be impossible.

2. Christ in His relation to mankind.—(1) Pre-incarnate.—The Being who thus existed from eternity as God has affinities in His very nature with men. Had He been a demi-god, a tertium quid, the passage from Him to us and from us to Him would have been impossible. It may seem an ingenious plan to effect the union of God and man by inserting between them a being who is neither God nor man. Really, it makes the problem insoluble. St Paul knows nothing of the supposed differences between the Divine and the human natures which make a tertium quid appear necessary to bring them together. God and man resemble one another in their constitution as personal beings. The problem at once of religion and of philosophy is to bring two persons together, not to force two disparate natures into an unreal unity. This problem is the problem of the human spirit, is solved in the Person of Christ. The heart of His eternal being is Sonship. He lives in a filial relation toward God, and upon the model of that relationship ours is formed (Gal 4<sup>4-6</sup>, Ro 8<sup>29</sup>). Our very existence depends on Him (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>). What we are to be is determined by what He is (Eph 1<sup>4</sup>, 2<sup>10</sup>). The deepest relations of man to man find their guarantee in the relations in which He stands to God and to man (1 Co 11<sup>3</sup>, Eph 5<sup>22-31</sup>). Even before the fulness of time He was not separated from us, with the problem of redemption. So, at least, we may interpret the mystical language of 1 Co 10<sup>4</sup> ἡ πέτρα δὲ ἦν ὁ Χριστός. This Rock, the fountain of life for the Church of the wilderness, was the Christ, not as an idea but as a person. Thus St. Paul conceives of Christ as existing in these past centuries fulfilling the functions for the Church which then was, which He now fulfils for the new Ecclesia (cf. Jn 7<sup>37</sup>).

(2) Incarnate.—The Son is a real person, who conceives, purposes, acts. 'Before the foundation of the world' He had assumed the vocation of Redeemer, constrained thereto by the love which is the essence of the Divine nature. When the time comes, in God's discipline of the race, He takes up His task, which requires for its fulfilment incarnation, the complete identification of Himself with men in life and in death. In two pregnant passages St. Paul sets forth this deed of wonder, in whose depths thought and feeling lose themselves, Ph 2<sup>9-11</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>. Three stages of the history of Christ are indicated, so far as human imagination can frame to itself a record so amazing.—(i.) A person, Divine in His being, enjoying the form and circumstance of Godhead, rich in the glory which is the manifestation of the Divine nature; cf. Jn 17<sup>5</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>. (ii.) This Divine Being surrendering that form and that wealth, assuming a form the most opposite conceivable, that of a servant, revealing Himself to men in their likeness, so that His humanity is no phantom, while yet it is not His by mere accident of birth, but is acquired in an act of will which extends to the assumption of man's condition as a sinner, exposed to sin's sign and seal, even death. (iii.) This same person raised from the dead, and receiving as a gift from the Father what He had not grasped at, namely, equality with God in form and circumstance, and the name which corresponds to that rank and honour, so that to this Being, known now through His humanity as Jesus, there should be rendered the worship of all intelligent creatures throughout the universe of God.

It is in connexion with the incarnation of Christ's career that the problem of the constitution of His Person presses most acutely. Questions press as to the relation of His Divinity to His humanity, of His knowledge as man, of His personality as a human being, of His relation to His contemporaries, of His activities in the Cosmos and in the circle of the Godhead. It is noteworthy that the answer to these questions is not indeed, as he thought, that His being open to the gracious love of the Father, with no other ambition on earth save to share in the Father's life, is the key to the solution of all these problems.

spiritual intimacy as person has with the Father, and entrance into, the power of Christ's resurrection, fellowship of His sufferings, and conformity to His death (Ph 3<sup>10</sup>). But to this Person of Christ, to lay out the Divinity on one side and the humanity on the other, and to treat Him as a diadematum, does not lie within the four walls of the human mind. This fact may suggest the doubt whether questions such as the above are rightly conceived. They evidently proceed from the point of view of dualism, according to which one nature is contrasted with another, whereas Paul's views of God and of man and of the God-man, are all synthetic. Personal unity, and not logical dualism, is the key to the thought of St Paul. Between God and man, there is the unity of moral likeness; between the Father and the Son, the unity of being and fellowship; between Christ and those whom He saves, the unity of reciprocal indwelling.

(3) Post-incarnate.—Having become man, Christ remains human. In the Kingdom whose Lord He is, He is Jesus who was so named in His earthly life. Mediator between God and man, He is Himself man (1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>). From Him, as the Head, life streams down to all members of the body (Col 1<sup>18</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>27</sup>, Eph 4<sup>12-13</sup>). In Him the members are 'complete,' receive fulness of satisfaction (Col 2<sup>10</sup>). In Him human nature finds itself raised to its highest perfection, hence in Him there can be none of the barriers that divide man from man (Col 3<sup>11</sup>, Gal 3<sup>28</sup>). This is the point of the comparison in Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup> and 1 Co 15<sup>45-47</sup> between the first Adam and the Second. In one sense Adam is the head of the race, in another the Risen and Exalted Christ is the Head, and from Him all life comes. This is the very heart of St Paul's experience, and therefore also of His Christology. Christ is living. St. Paul presupposes the pre-existent Christ; his Christ could not begin to be in time. He is acquainted with the historic life through which Christ gained His glory. But that which St. Paul gazes upon with endless adoration is the Person of the Risen and Glorified Lord. Between the living Christ and him there is such union as surpasses power of language to express. Christ dwells in the believer in His complete human-Divine personality, and imparts Himself in growing fulness to the believer; and there is thus developed identity of experience and identity of character, which will ultimately be crowned by identity of outward condition (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>, Ph 3<sup>21</sup>).

3. Christ in His relation to the Cosmos.—The intellect of the time was much occupied with speculation as to the relation of God to the world. To the Jews this was really an insoluble problem. The gulf between God and the universe yawned impassable. The place of a solution was taken by a mythology of 'powers,' 'principalities,' and the like supposititious beings, who existed only in the jargon of the philosophical sects. On Jewish soil this mythology was changed into a hierarchy of angels. Wild as these dreams are, they represent a real need of thought and of religious experience. The problems of creation and redemption cannot be held apart. The creative purpose must include redemption, and redemption must have cosmic bearings. We cannot rest in a harmony with God which leaves the universe outside, unreconciled, possibly the abode of forces against which the redeeming agency would be powerless to defend us. St. Paul's view is that the universe has a part in the history of man. Injured by human sin, it will come to its completion when the children of God enter on their heritage (Ro 8<sup>21</sup>). Christ, the Redeemer of men, is Lord of the universe. Nothing is His gracious sway. The clumsy machinery of angels, or powers, or whatever these needless creations are named, is replaced by the one Person, who is the Agent of God alike in creation and in redemption (Col 1<sup>15-17</sup>). Christ, who is the manifestation of God, is of infinitely higher rank than all the creatures. All things, whatever their place and dignity, owe to Him their existence, and find in Him their goal. This exalted Person is also Head of the Church, and Agent in reconciliation (vv. 18-20). That is to say, the work of redemption can be effected only by One who is also the Creator. The Redeemer must be God absolutely, else there will be needed a Mediator for Him also. The Redeemer cannot have, in our apprehension, the value of God, unless He is God in His own proper being.

The testimony of St Paul to Christ contains great heights and depths, but it exhibits no inconsistency with Jesus' self-witness. It is not a mosaic of Jewish and Hellenic elements. It is the product of experience, developed under the conditions of that Divine assistance which Jesus Himself described, Jn 16<sup>12-15</sup>.

iv. HEBREWS.—In this Epistle the Christian faith is defended. Any attempt to belittle the person and work of the Redeemer. However glorious other agents of the Divine purpose might have been, 'this man' is more glorious by far in the life of His person and in the vastness and power of His redemptive work. To Him, therefore, is applied the familiar Christian designation of Lord (2<sup>3</sup> 7<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>). The characteristic name applied to Him, however, is Son (1<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> 1<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>29</sup> 4<sup>14</sup>). This title expresses His Divine and eternal being. The author of this Epistle follows the example of the Apostle Paul in his Christian salvation under the aspect of the Son of God. This history moves in three stages.

(1) The pre-existent state—Not much is said on this mysterious topic. The NT writers are concerned to allude to it only in order that, in the light of it, the earthly life of Jesus may be discerned in its marvellous condescension as an act of self-sacrifice, and in order that His present position of equality with God may be intellectually credible.

In this pre-existent state the Son is the effulgence of God's glory, the very image of His substance (1<sup>3</sup>). Without formal question of the being of God, the Son surpassed any mere monadism. God is not bare abstract unity. With God there is One who exactly corresponds to Himself, who gives back to Him the glory which is His. Between Him and God there is perfect oneness. Between these two there is no room for a mediator. The functions of the Son in this state are not described further than to indicate that no department of the universe is outside of His power (1<sup>3</sup>). There is no room, for any being, other than the Son of God, for worship or gratitude is due.

(2) The incarnate life—This writer, like the Apostle Paul passes by all the questions, so abundantly discussed in later theology, as to 'two natures,' etc. His whole interest is concerned with the heart-subduing fact that the birth of Christ is the descent of a Divine Being from heaven to earth, the definite assumption by Him of a complete and true humanity (2<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>5</sup> 2<sup>14</sup>). To this writer the humanity of Jesus is wonderful and glorious. A Being truly Divine has become man, and has entered fully into human experience. There is nothing human that is not His, sin excepted. Temptation, suffering, death—He passed through them all. All this He endured in pursuance of the vocation with which He entered humanity. Before Him lay His task. Beyond shone the glory. Not once, for so great a glory, would He evade one human sorrow. It was all wanted to perfect Him in His vocation (2<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> 9). The resemblance to St. Paul's line of thought in Ph 2<sup>5-11</sup> is obvious.

(3) The position of majesty which the Son now occupies is described in two aspects. (a) Its due to what He was in Himself, to His human experiences. He has been appointed heir of all things, both because He is the Son of God and because, through Him, God made the worlds (1<sup>2</sup>). He has sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high, because He is, in His very nature, the effulgence of God's glory and the very image of His substance. No being less than God, in His own person, could occupy such a place. (b) Its attainment is due to His discharge of His redemptive mission, and is of the nature of a reward for His fidelity. His present position presupposes His pre-existent place and function, and yet is distinct from them. It is that of King in God's realm of redemption.

Here, just as in connexion with the incarnate condition, questions arise which this writer does not discuss. 'The relation of this rule to the primary rule of God, or to His own power, is of all things by the word of His power, is B Davidson's Com p 78). It is enough for faith that, in the universe of being, there is no other power than that of the exalted Redeemer.

v. THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—St. John's Christology, like that of St. Paul, is the transcript of his experience. He makes plain his object in telling the story of the life of Christ (20<sup>30</sup>). Out of all the mass of material which his memory provides, he selects those incidents which may be most useful in proving to the world that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. The principles of selection, and the insight into the meaning of words and deeds which are reproduced, are due to a lifetime of thought and communion, as well as to the continual illumination of the Spirit of Christ. St. John's conception of Christ is summarily set forth in the Prologue to the narrative (1<sup>1-18</sup>). No doubt these much-debated verses are meant to provide the point of view which the reader of the narrative is to occupy; but equally without doubt they do not present an idea, formed in speculation, and then employed to determine the narrative, to invent the incidents, and to create the discourses. The narrative, with the words and signs, logically precedes the Prologue, which presents us with the extracted meaning of the history. The Person portrayed in the narrative is One of whose history, in the wider sense, the earthly career is but a part. He had a being with God before He was seen on earth. He had a Divine mode of existence and exercised Divine functions, before He appeared as a man and wrought His earthly mission. At the set time He entered into the world, and, through living intercourse with men, revealed to them the glory of His person, and interpreted for them the character of the invisible God. The remarkable feature of the Prologue is its use of the term Logos to designate Him whom the narrative leads us to know as the Son. It is certainly not the key to the narrative, which is to be read from the point of view of the Divine Sonship, which it reveals. It is not used in the narrative, though it reappears in the First Epistle of John. It is certainly not taken over from Philo, and intended to create a new religious philosophy. Probably its presence is to be explained, as are the references in St. Paul's letters, by the technicalities of prevalent philosophy or theosophy. Christianity appeared when the problem of the relation of God to the world had reached its fullest statement; when, also, the utmost that human thought could do had been done in the way of a solution. The last and most strenuous effort of human thought to meet the demand of the human spirit was found expression in Philo's Logos speculation which owed its origin partly to developments of Hebrew thought as to the word and wisdom of God, and partly to ideas which had been the motive power of the whole history of Greek philosophy. It was not possible for Christianity to ignore the problem. Christianity is more immediately concerned with the problem of the redemption of man; but this cannot be dissociated from the wider problem of the relation of God to the world. The key to the one must unlock the other also. St. Paul and St. John, accordingly, take up the technical terms most in vogue, with whatever they stand for, and say in effect. What human thought has endeavoured to achieve by its machinery of angels or powers, or by its hypostatization of the Logos, has been accomplished in the Person of the Son of God. He is the life of the redeemed. He is the life also of the whole universe of God. There is but one purpose in creation and redemption, and that is summed up in Christ. He is the Logos

The term Logos accordingly is used by St. John to express the clarity of Him whom we know as Jesus Christ, with the personal Wisdom and Power of God, who is God's agent in creation, who alone could redeem men, and who achieved this in the only way possible, by Himself assuming human nature, and dwelling for a space with men. The term, having served the purpose of presenting Christ as the goal of the immemorial quest of the human spirit for union with God, is not again employed in the Gospel.

It is not new to the Logos of the Prologue (see v. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837,

The problems with regard to the life or the incarnate Logos, which press so heavily on our minds, are not discussed by St. John any more than by St. Paul. He is wholly occupied with the glorious fact. It is amazing, but it has happened; and in that great event, the whole purpose of G-d, creative as well as redemptive, has reached its consummation. Revelation is complete. No one can declare God save one who is God, and this is He, Jesus Christ, 'God only-begotten' (v.18).

From the simple missionary preaching of the Acts to the high intense thinking of the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel is a long movement. It is a movement, however, not away from the facts, but toward their inward, spiritual, universal, and eternal meaning. This movement, moreover, has not been dependent on unaided human reflexion, nor are its results mere guesses or inferences. It has been conducted under the guidance of Christ's own self-witness and the illumination of Christ's own Spirit; and its conclusions express the wealth of Christian experience, and in experience find their ultimate demonstration.

Conclusion and Outlook—A study of the character of Christ, and a close and reverent attention to His self-witness, compel the inference that His Person completely and really human though He is, is not constituted like that of other men. It is to be admitted, however, or rather it is to be urged, that what the facts suggest and demand cannot be fully apprehended by any merely intellectual process whatever. What Christ is, in His own Person, can be known only by those who know Him; and . . . . . has conditions which are not satisfied in any exercise of the mere understanding, however careful and exact. Such conditions are an attitude or direction of the human spirit, and an immediate operation, at once illuminating and quickening, of the Divine Spirit. When these conditions meet and interact, in that profound region where the Spirit of God and . . . . . man touch and interpenetrate one . . . . . is produced that . . . . . of God and of Christ which our Lord describes as life. There is no other knowledge of Christ; and if Christology is supposed to be an intellectual process, governed by rules of discursive . . . . . id issuing in propositions for which is . . . . . cogency of a logical demonstration, it stands condemned as being out of all relation to Christian experience. But this personal experience is knowledge of Christ. He is as really known in this spiritual fellowship as one human person is known by another, and is known more closely and fully than one man can be known by another. Christianity, accordingly, presents to the world the solution of its problem, the answer to its need; while, at the same time, it has before itself a constant problem, the answer to which it seeks, not with ever-growing weariness and sense of defeat, but with ever-renewed energy of faith and love

1. The problem of the world, the more or less conscious and articulate demand of the human spirit, is, as we noted at the outset, union with God. This union is, primarily, personal—an ethical fellowship, in which God shall fully disclose His character, and impart Himself, to man; in which man shall freely open his being to the communications of God, and find in God his life and development. Such personal union, however, carries with it cosmical union also, or the harmonizing of all those differences from God which are implied in the existence of the created universe, and find their most acute expression in the self-assertion of man against God. The personal man is the reconciling of all things. The cosmical problem, thus finally, personally personal, must be personally met; accordingly, met the personal problem, as it meets the same personally, century, by the preaching of the personal Christ. He is the Son of God; and therefore, also, He is the Son of Man. In Christ, God is fully present, through Him, God is perfectly known; with Him, God is one. In Christ, human nature is fully realized in all that it was meant to be, both in respect of its complete dependence upon God and of its complete fulfillment of spiritual function. In Christ, accordingly, the history of creation is complete. He stands at the head of a universe reconciled to God. He is its reconciliation. Wherever the problem of union with God takes expression in concrete facts—in the sense of guilt in the individual conscience; in death, which closes human life with a pall of impenetrable darkness; in the antagonism of man to man, manifested in personal animosities, or the war of nation with nation and class with class—in facts whose gloom no pessimism can exaggerate: there, the knowledge of Christ supplies the solution. To know Christ is to be at one with God and with man. Christianity is thus, both religion and ethic. It is an intense individual experience, which is the impulse of boundless social service.

And when the same problem finds the precision and articulateness of philosophical expression—as it did, for instance, in that Neo-Platonism which had such strange affinities to Christianity while it was also its bitterest opponent ; or as it does to-day, in that Absolute Idealism which, in some aspects, is the noblest ally of the Christian faith, and, in others, its proudest and least sympathetic rival—the key to its solution will still be found in the conception of a Personality at once Divine and human, a life lived under historic conditions, which was at once the life of God in man and the life of man in and through God. The words of the Master of Balliol apply to the present as well as to the primitive position of Christianity.

It contained implicitly the key to all the antagonisms of thought that had been developed in Greek philosophy—the antagonism of the material and the spiritual, the antagonism of the temporal and the eternal. In the principle of an optimism which faces and overcomes the deepest pessimism, of an idealism which has room in itself for the most realistic consciousness of all.

2 The Incarnation of the Son of God is therefore the article of faith. It is, at the same time, the basis of a living Church. It is not, however, a problem which is suggested by one faculty to be handed over to another for solution. Faith does not receive Christ, and then appeal to intellect to tell us who He is, and how His Person is constituted. It has been the profound error of Scholasticism, both before and since the Reformation, to suppose that faith supplies a mass of crude amorphous facts and experiences, upon which the intellect exercises its analytic, systematizing genius, distinguishing, defining, separating, and then tying into bundles by means of formulae. The result of such a method, applied to the problem of the Person of Christ, is a Christology in whose dogmatic construction the living Christ of history and experience is wholly lost. The Reformation was the protest against this attempt to rob it of the personal Saviour, whom it appropriates, whom the believer lives in and truly. Ritschlianism, however constructive work may be, is nevertheless, as a protest against formalism, in harmony with the spirit of the Reformation.

The value of such a protest, however, will be greatly lessened if it lend colour to the supposition that our knowledge of Christ is confined to His benefits, while He Himself, in the secret of His being, belongs to some supposed noumenal sphere, inaccessible to human knowledge, so that it is impossible either to affirm or deny His Divinity. 'Hoc est Christum cognoscere, beneficia ejus cognoscere' is a proposition true if it mean that no one can know Christ who is not vitally one with Him, and therefore a partaker of His benefits; but certainly false if it mean that, beyond His benefits, there is a supposed substratum of being, about which nothing can be known, which may or may not be Divine (cf. Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, p. 63). Thus does the mis-applied category of substance take revenge upon the critical method, which, while denying its validity, retains it as a kind of metaphysical phantom. To know the benefits of Christ, to live in fellowship with Him, to carry out His commission is to know Himself. No shadow of unreality lies upon that knowledge any more than it lies upon the knowledge we have of the friend whom we know better than we know ourselves. This does not mean, of course, that any believer, or the whole community of believers, now knows, or ever will know, all about Christ. Personality, even human personality, is a great deep; and the joy of friendship is the progressive knowledge which is the mark of personal knowledge. Much more is this true of the personality of Christ. Knowledge of Christ is boundlessly progressive, what more is to be known of Him than the Church at present apprehends, depends on those conditions belonging to the whole personal life which make any knowledge of Him possible. In short, the problem of the Person of Christ is presented by that faith, which is already knowledge, to that knowing power, which is simply faith itself, as it grows in apprehension of Christ. Christ is not divided; and there is no division in the faculty which apprehends Him, though the stages of its exercise and its acquisition advance endlessly from less to more. It follows that Christology, which is the reflective expression of the faith, must not subject the fulness of its material to any form of thought borrowed from an alien sphere; or if, in the exigencies of a defensive statement, it uses loan-words derived from philosophy, it must never for a moment imagine that it can exhaust the living reality with which it deals. These words float, like derelicts, on the ocean of the Church's thought, and many a promising speculation has struck thereon and foundered. Modern Christology to be on its guard against that dualistic mode of thought with the terminology which it employs, which is the damosa hereditas bequeathed to theology by Greek Philosophy, the shadow of which fell upon Kant, and has not departed from the new Kantians of recent times. The task of Christology at the present day is to restate and to defend two certainties of Christian experience.

(1) To Christian experience, educated and informed by Scripture and by the Spirit of truth, Christ is known as God. The problem of the relation of the Divine Christ to the Divine Father is thus necessarily raised, and will not be evaded. If, however, the conception of absolute Godhead be modelled upon the forms of Greek dualism, it becomes an insoluble problem, continuing to trouble and troubling faith. Within a Godhead conceived as abstract unity there is no room for the Divine Christ. The best that thought can do is to place the Son outside God, though as near to Him as possible. But this is straightway to deprive faith of its object, and to impel the fact of reconciliation. The Church, accordingly, would have none of the Arian honorific titles applied to Christ on the presupposition that He was less than God, and would be content with nothing less than the consubstantiality of the Son with the Father. The term ὁμοούσιος, borrowed not without reluctance from philosophy, was probably inevitable, and served sufficiently to utter the Church's faith-knowledge of the true Divinity of its Lord. The danger lay in supposing that ὁμοούσιος, or the category of substance, expressed the infinite wealth of the Father, or, worse still, in directing men's minds to conceive of God as Substance rather than as Personality. From the baleful effects of this point of view, theology has not yet shaken itself free. The only category which can apply to the mystery of the relation of the Father to the Son is that of organic union, whose highest illustration is in the domain of personal life. There are deep and living relations which subsist between persons even within the human family. If one person not only may, but must live in another person in order to be a person, and if between these two there is such community of life that each finds his life in the other, and these two are not so much two as one, we may find ourselves on the verge of a greater mystery and a far deeper unity: the abiding of the Father in the Son and the Son in the Father, and these two, along with the Spirit of both, forming the One God of redemption and of creation. By such a path as this must Christology move to a fuller grasp of the truth, which the Nicene Creed asserted, but did not adequately or finally set forth.

(2) To Christian experience, maintained in fellowship with the living Christ, He is known as man. Faith apprehends Him as incarnate, i.e. as a Divine Being, who became man, entered into the sphere and conditions of human life, and passed through a complete human experience. Humanity therefore, reaches its consummation in His Person; and human beings, divided though they may be from one another, find no impassable barriers between themselves and Christ. Christian experience, accordingly, is vitally concerned with the earthly life of Christ, as recorded in the Gospels. Docetism and Ebionism are both false to the conviction of faith. Between the Divinity and the humanity of Jesus Christ, faith finds no abstract opposition. Christ is known as at once Divine and human.

As soon, however, as faith seeks to make clear to itself its convictions, and to state and defend them in view of inquiry or attack, certain questions regarding the human-Divine life of the Lord inevitably arise.

(a) The problem of the origin of this life presented itself very early to the minds of those who had learned to see in Jesus Christ the Son of God. He is man, yet He is related to God as no other man can be. Is it possible that He could have come into the world, as other men do, as a child of a human father and mother? The answer to be found in two of the Gospels is that He did not; that the Holy Ghost came upon His mother, and the power of the Most High overshadowed her; that her Son had no human father. The truth of the narrative of the supernatural birth is challenged, in many quarters, on critical and on metaphysical grounds. In view of these objections, it ought to be freely admitted that the Incarnation might have taken place under normal human conditions. We are not in a position to determine a priori what course Infinite Power and Love shall take. It is impossible therefore, to place the mode of the Incarnation through a virgin-birth, on the same footing of religious or theological importance as the great fact of the Incarnation itself. If, however, from a study of the data presented in the NT, i.e. from a consideration of the character of Christ, of His claims and self-witness, as well as of the testimony of His disciples, apart from the narratives of His infancy, we have arrived at the conviction of His unequalled and supreme greatness; and if we then return to a study of these narratives, we cannot fail to find in them an ethical purity and a spiritual fitness which command our glad acceptance. Their value for Christian thought lies in their providing a physical fact correspondent to the conviction which a study of the person of Christ has wrought in us, viz. that He is not the product of a natural evolution from humanity, but is a Divine Being who has entered into the conditions and experiences of human nature.

The supernatural birth of Jesus is not our warrant for belief in His Divinity and His sinlessness. But belief in His Divinity and His sinlessness is our warrant for regarding the supernatural birth as being not merely possible or credible, but as being wholly congruous with the uniqueness of His personality, and, therefore, as serving as a welcome illustration and confirmation of the contents of Christian experience.

(b) In studying the record of the life of Christ, many questions arise in connexion with the relation of the Divine to the human aspects of His personality. Are not the notes of Godhead absoluteness, finality, completeness, independence of all the means by which human character is developed? How, then, are we to understand the evident facts of our Lord's life on earth, that He inquired, and learned, and was ignorant; that He passed through the stages of a temporal development, moving toward His goal through conflict and struggle in His communion with His Father; that the means of grace which are ordained for men—reading the Sacred Scriptures, and being much in prayer?

In considering such problems, Christian thought has been much hindered by the domination of conceptions such as 'nature,' and by the influence of a dualism which has separated the Divine and human natures, regarding them as possessed of contrary attributes. The history of Christology consists, mainly, in a series of attempts to bring into harmony with one another, in the unity of the person, 'natures' which, it is presupposed, are fundamentally opposed in their characteristics and activities. Eutychianism brings them so close together as to confound them in a result which is a compound of Divine and human. Nestorianism holds them so far apart as to make them almost the seats of independent personalities. The formula of Chalcedon is called a theory; it is rather an assertion of the contrasted elements and a mere assertion of the unity which comprehends them. The Lutheran Christology seeks to reduce the dualism of Divine and human to the lowest possible degree by the dedication of Christ's human nature. The Kenotic theories of more recent times have sought to reach the same result by the idea of a depotentiation of His Divine nature. However remarkable these schemes may be as intellectual efforts, and whatever value they may have in directing attention to one or another element in the complex fact, it is certain that they all fall under a threefold condemnation. (i.) They are dominated by metaphysical conceptions which are profoundly opposed to the ideas which prevail in Scripture; being dualistic to the core, the ideas of Scripture are synthetic, and are far removed from the distinctions which mark the achievements of the Greek mind. (ii.) They do not correspond with, or do justice to, the knowledge which faith has of the personal Christ; separating, as they do, what faith grasps as a unity, while their attempted harmonies are artificial, and not vital. (iii.) They fail to reproduce the portrait of Christ presented in the Gospels; they utterly fail to give adequate utterance to the impression which the Christ of the Gospels makes upon the minds which contemplate Him. This is true even of the Chalcedonian scheme, which, in substance, is repeated in many modern creeds and confessions.

'A Being who combines in an inscrutable fashion Divine with human properties, and of whom, consequently, contradictory assertions may be made, while His dual natures hold an undefined relation to one another. This is not a scheme to satisfy either head or heart' (Principal Dicks, papers on 'The Person of our Lord' in Expos Times, Oct. 1905-Jan. 1906).

Christian thought, accordingly, must abandon the dualism which has so long impeded its efforts. It can never, indeed, emphasize too strongly the 'oneness' of man, both as creature and as sinful creature, and must never, even in its most spiritual exercises, forget the reverence that is due from man to God. But it must reject as misleading all theories which presuppose a generic difference between the Divine and the human natures. It must, therefore, reject the 'two-natures' doctrine of the Person of Christ, in the form in which it has hitherto prevailed; and must start in its study of Christ from the Biblical point of view of the essential affinity of the Divine and the human natures.

In recent literature the influence of Psychology upon Christological study is deeply marked. Instead of two natures, two consciousnesses are

INCENSE.—The English word comes from the Lat. incensum, 'burnt' (incendere, 'to burn'), and is applied to the materials used for making a perfume which was emitted by the materials being burned. These materials consist of fragrant gum, spices, and scents.

'Incense' is the usual tr. of θυμία, which occurs in the NT 6 times only. Lk 11<sup>11</sup>, Rev 5<sup>8</sup> 3<sup>4</sup> 13<sup>12</sup> in Rev it is always in the plural, and in 13<sup>12</sup> is by 'odours' θυμιάται is the LXX equivalent of Heb. קָטָר, which comes from קָטַר 'to raise an odour by burning,' and so 'to burn incense.' Cognate Gr words are θυμιασ, 'to burn incense,' Lk 1<sup>9</sup> (α- ε), in NT, and θυμιασ-τήριον, He 9<sup>4</sup>, 'censer,' or 'altar of incense.' The root of these words is θω = (1) 'to be in heat,' (2) 'to burn,' (3) 'to sacrifice (by burning)'; see Grimm-Thayer, s.v., and cf. θυμιασ and θυμιασ. The word θυμιασ is to be carefully distinguished from λίβανος, 'frankincense' (Heb. לְבָנוֹת) The latter was an ingredient of the former. λίβανος is found twice in NT (Mt 2<sup>11</sup> and Rev 13<sup>12</sup>, in the latter together with θυμιασ).

Incense came to be used in connexion with the Levitical worship in the Temple. Special care was to be taken in the making of it (Ex 30<sup>34</sup>). Several passages in the OT indicate that the Israelites came to regard it (as they did other ceremonies) per se, apart from its spiritual meaning. Hence the denunciations of the prophets (Is 1<sup>13</sup> etc.). In the NT it is referred to only in connexion with the daily service of the Temple (Lk 1), and also as part of the symbolical heavenly worship in the Apocalypse. In Rev 5<sup>8</sup> and 8<sup>3</sup> it is associated with the prayers of the saints; in 5<sup>8</sup> apparently being identified with the prayers, and in 8<sup>3</sup> added to the prayers (cf. ταῖς προσευχαῖς in both verses), as though to render them acceptable. RV 'with' in Rev 8<sup>3</sup> seems impossible.

The symbolism seems to be that of worship, which, like incense, 'ascends' to earth to heaven. In Ps 141<sup>2</sup> prayer is thus likened to incense. Godet (on Lk 1<sup>10</sup>) thinks there was a close connexion between the two acts of burning incense and offering prayer.

'The one was the typical, ideal, and therefore perfectly pure prayer; the other the real prayer, which is imperfect and defiled. The former covered the latter, and communicated to the latter the holiness of the former; the latter was the complement of each other.'

Incense is used in worship in the Greek and Roman Catholic Churches, and by some congregations in the Anglican Church. Its earliest use in the Christian Church seems to have been as a fumigant (so Tertullian). No liturgical use is known for at least 4 if not 5 centuries. Up till then it was regarded as a relic of heathenism. As the Holy Communion came to be regarded as a sacrifice, and in some respects analogous to the Jewish sacrifices, incense became gradually associated with Christian worship. It is at least noteworthy that there is an entire absence of any reference to incense in the Christian Church of the NT in Acts and the Epistles, the only allusions being those in the symbolism of the Apocalypse. May not this be rightly regarded as an argument e silentio? Having the substance, what need is there of the shadow? (Jn 4<sup>23</sup>, 24).

INDEPENDENCE.—See ORIGINALITY.

INDIGNATION.—See ANGER, and FIERCENESS.

INDIVIDUAL.—It has almost become a commonplace of Apologetics that the significance of the individual is first recognized in Christianity. In Antiquity the idea that the individual might stand over against the State, either through the sense of duty or the sense of truth, was not entertained.

Most ancient civilizations were based on slavery, which at once refused to recognize a large section of the members of the State as individuals, and placed the individuality of the others not on an equal moral basis, but on a basis of social inequality.

Yet the Christian conception of the individual did not descend upon the earth without any indication of its coming. Socrates had instructed men to know themselves, and, though his greatest disciple did not consider this teaching inconsistent with a Republic in which the family and the most sacred rights of the individual are sacrificed to the interests of the State, the real significance of the Greek πρόσωπον was the growing clearness with which it came to bring out the importance of man to himself. Stoicism insisted that a man's dignity should not be at the mercy of events, and even Epicureanism taught that man's surest ground of happiness is within. Baur's contention, that the chief preparation for Christ was a growing need for a universal, a Weltanschauung, only another way of saying that the individual was not as a free man, or a citizen, or a member of a Greek State, but as an individual, was slowly coming to his rights.

This progress in the Gentile world, however, was not in any strict sense a preparation for our Lord's teaching, but, at most, of the world for receiving it. His true foundations are in the OT, and more particularly in the Psalms. For it is a commonplace of the OT that the individual at the religion of the OT is about the individual at all in the same sense as the religion of the NT. Worship is a social and even a civil act. The God men worship is the God of their fathers, i.e. the God of their race. The great body of the ritual exalts not the covenant person, but the covenant people. Even the prophets have very little to say about individual piety, but concern themselves with the rulers and the conduct of society and the destiny of the nation. We cannot be sure, even in what seem the most personal Psalms, that it is not the voice of a nation rather than of an individual that confesses sin and implores help. This uncertainty regarding the place of the individual is made greater by the indistinctness, at least in the earlier books, of the hope of individual immortality, which, however we may try to get round it, is essential to any high estimate of the worth of the individual.

No book, nevertheless, compares with the OT for the boldness with which the individual stands out in contrast and, if need be, in opposition to, the community, and that on spiritual, not social considerations. The standard of its teaching is personal responsibility, and that ultimately sets a man alone as an individual with his God. If it is a national and not an individual hope the prophets contend for, they place it on an individual not a communistic foundation. They are not concerned to reform institutions or demand new laws. The reform they seek is of personal action and manners, and the law they wish to see obeyed is God's. For this law it is the individual that signifies—the pressure of his personal call being so great that his duty to follow it is never questioned even though it should bring him into conflict with both the State and the people. Ezekiel may have been the first to recognize the full significance of this attitude, but he was by no means the first to take it up. Of every prophet it could be said, 'Behold, I have made thy face hard against their faces, and thy forehead against their foreheads' (Ezk 3<sup>8</sup>). To each of them the Spirit of God was a power to help him to be true to himself. It set each of them on his feet before speaking to him (Ezk 2<sup>2</sup>). The very mark of a true prophet was to hear God's voice only, and not man's, and to be true to the individuality God had given him, and not to be an echo of the party cries around. To have that most selfish kind of individualism which consists in agreeing with the majority of the powers that be, was the mark of the false prophet (Jer 20).

Such an attitude of independence could not be taken up without a very strong sense of the significance of the individual for God. The significance of the solitary figure of Jeremiah could not be less because he lived for the welfare of his people, and their ingratitude left him in isolation. Ezekiel naturally followed with the application. Were Noah, Daniel, and Job in a wicked land, they could but deliver their own souls. 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die' (18<sup>2</sup> 23-30). 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die' (v 4).

Of other OT writings the two most important are the Psalms and Job. The eye of the writers may at times be on the nation, but even that is part of their personal piety, and to our day the message of the Psalms is in walking with his God. Job is wholly occupied with the problem of the individual, even if this individual be supposed to stand for the nation; and no one has ever stated with greater splendour of or intellectual daring his right to not only from his fellow-men but from his God.

The OT conception of the relation of the moral individual to God, moreover, necessarily reached out toward the hope of immortality,—and that not merely as an extension of man's desires beyond time, but as the just of an individuality that defied time and the eternal.

That our Lord entered upon this heritage and accepted the estimate of each individual which we indicate by calling him an immortal soul, and that on the ground of the OT conception of the blessedness of the man whom God hears, appears from His argument with the Sadducees (Mt 22<sup>32</sup>, Mk 12<sup>27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>38</sup>), and is a postulate of His whole teaching. The saying, 'What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' (Mk 8<sup>36</sup>), may only indicate a man's value to himself, and the other, 'How much then is a man better than a sheep?' (Mt 12<sup>3</sup>), may not seem to go very far. Christ's true conception of the individual rather than the belief He offers for man's belief.

He requires that man should be of the centre of the Father. As revealed through the Son, He is a Father, which means that He does not, as a mere Ruler, deal with men in groups but that each man has to Him the distinctiveness of the importance, the whole significance he can have to himself. The side of God's infinity which our Lord insists on, is the infinity of His care for the individual. In God's sight also, nothing can be given in exchange for a soul. By His care and guidance, that frail thing, an individual spirit, can walk without anxiety amid all the forces which might threaten his destruction, not only sure of protection, but sure that everything will be used to serve his true welfare. This attitude toward earthly cares is not sustained by hardness or indifference, but by a belief that God regards these things as the servants of His children, whose individual well-being He sets far above material things. It is not a low view of the world, but a high view of the spiritual individual, which our Lord teaches.

Speaking as He always does, with this thought of God towards man in the foreground Jesus is led to dwell rather on the worth of the insignificant and imperfect individual in the concrete than on the general worth of the individual in the abstract. Hard-hearted religious people spoke lightly of 'this multitude' being 'accursed' (Jn 7<sup>40</sup>). He called none accursed, and warned His followers against calling any one Raca (Mt 5<sup>22</sup>); and when He used the word 'lost,' it became in His mouth tender and compassionate and full of the heart of God. The parables of the Lost Sheep, the Lost Piece of Money, and above all of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15), speak of God's unwillingness to let any one precious as an individual be lost. The type of what is greatest (Mt 18<sup>1, 2</sup>), and the little one in moral stature, whom to offend is worse than death, is guarded by the very angels of the Presence (18<sup>10</sup>).

The same estimate of the worth of the individual appears in the ideal of human duty. There is no one, however poor or humble, who should not set before him the goal of being perfect as our Father in heaven (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). It is better to cut off the right hand than use another individual for our lusts, or to put out an eye than purpose such a thing (5<sup>27-30</sup>). Most distinctive is the duty of forgiveness. Our Lord takes for granted that it will be difficult. We shall have so much respect for our own individuality that we must be hurt, and for the sake of others that we cannot pass over easily. Only by rising to the height of God's holiness can we hope to attain to God's way of dealing with the unthankful and evil. We are to understand that God also does not pardon lightly. He does not regard the whole mass of good and bad alike. On the contrary, He sets each individual before Him as something of great significance to Him, something whereby He can be deeply hurt and grieved, and then, out of the same love that can be hurt, He pardons him. It is the significance of the individual that gives its whole importance to the doctrine of pardon, whether on God's part or on man's.

But the very greatness of this relation to God might seem to make the distinctiveness of man's individuality of no worth of the individual is not ultimately from himself but from God. 'If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered' (Jn 15<sup>6</sup>). There seem to be a denial that there is such a thing as an individual. The individual would then be a mere manifestation of God. Spinoza's formula, omnis determinatio est negatio, would obtain, and the assertion of one's own individuality would only be as cutting off a certain portion of the air with a knife. But the inalienable secret of the gospel is that it enables a man to find God and himself at the same time. It does not deal with the endless substance, but with a Father. That He is an individual is not His limitation, but the condition of all His greatness; for it is the condition of His working by love, and love is greater than power. Conversion is thus not only a turning to God, but a finding of oneself (Lk 15<sup>17</sup>), and a coming to one's true home and to one's right possession. While no succour of God fails a man who will have it, it remains a necessity of God's love to set a man by himself in the task of working out his own destiny. He is allowed to go into the far country and waste his substance. In all the descriptions which glance out into the future there is a strange aloneness of the individual who has gone his own way, into which God Himself cannot intrude. Just because every human personality is so definitely an individual, we cannot be sure that, in the end, there may not be a lost individual. A relation of love in Christ's sense necessarily means a relation of individuals, and that means such a marking off of a man from God that even God cannot enter that personality again, except the door is opened to Him, as it were, from the inside.

This high gift of being an individual with the possibility of being a child of God, carries with it also the possibility of such exclusion of good as can make him a child of the wicked one (Mt 13<sup>38</sup>). Nor does the closest relation to God absorb the individual. Whatever ordinances there may be for public worship, the distinctive position is to enter into our closet and shut to the door, and be with our Father who sees in secret (Mt 6<sup>6</sup>). There is an individual who answers, which, how our minds may compass it, are essential both in God's giving and in man's receiving. Just as there is a strange pitiful isolation of the individual who rejects God, so there is a strange saving of his own individuality in losing it, in the soul that finds God. That we remain individuals is as essential to the relationship as that we find our joy in another individual. The revelation of the Father in the Son must preclude all idea of absorption in God.

This is the ground of Ritschl's contention not only against a catholicism which bears down the individual by the weight of the institution, but also against a mysticism which reduces all individuals to mere personality, upon which a Spirit, Himself mere personality, operates not as individual with individual, but as abstract spiritual force upon abstract spiritual substance. The influences of grace we must on the contrary, interpret through Christ, the Spirit having come in His place to bring His words to our remembrance (Jn 14<sup>26</sup>). Ritschl argues that God's revelation is not a mere disclosure of His nature and duties of life on the one hand, and His love and mercy on the other, but also to His people, yet his main contention is of great importance to understand the patient humanness of God's revelation, if we take it to be a dialogue in which God could not speak the next word till man had responded to the last.

The only influences our Lord used were the appeals of wisdom and love. In every case He respected the individuality of another, and sought to make men free in as much they were to themselves as well as to God. When any influence appeared as a substitute for personal choice, He sternly repressed it. He trusted no general movement, and appealed to nothing occult. He was always willing to leave a crowd for an individual (Mk 1<sup>37</sup>, Lk 4<sup>42</sup>, Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). The only miracle He ever wrought for the multitude He used for sifting them and for gathering individuals from among them (Jn 6<sup>27</sup>). And when a crowd did gather to hear Him preach, He gave them most individual teaching. He never departed from the method of being an individual dealing with individuals, and from requiring of them the most individual of actions—repentance and obedience to one's own call.

Nor is the individual overborne by the society (see artt. CHURCH, KINGDOM OF GOD, INDIVIDUALISM). Here it suffices to say that it is just the distinctive place Christ assigned to the individual that marks His Church off from the world, and His kingdom as a Kingdom of Heaven, a Kingdom of God. A kingdom which treats its subjects as mere pawns in a great game, is, in that very act, marked as temporal. Other-worldliness, indeed, is not the mind of Christ, and the attempt to derive everything from the far-sighted selfishness which does 'good according to the will of God and for the sake of everlasting happiness,' leaves no room for the highest things of Christianity. But it is not true, as is argued, that we reach a higher stage when we are able calmly to recognize that the individual passes and the society remains, that everyone should be content to live on in the lives of others, and that the Kingdom of God is everything and the individual nothing. The Kingdom of God is not thereby exalted. Nay there can be no Kingdom of God, but a mere fleeting earthly Utopia. If the individual is obliterated, then, in view of the endless ages, but a moment more, and the society is obliterated as well. It becomes the Kingdom of God only when it deals with the eternal, and that must always be the individual. It is of God and not of mere human regulation just because it respects the individual—his choice, his peace, his freedom; because it is a society of persons not constrained by force to a common purpose, but attuned to it by love and wisdom. All our Lord says of His society speaks of an association in which its members will realize what the Apostle calls the glorious liberty of the children of God, and, so long as the Church is content to stand over against men as an institution claiming external authority, Christ's great problem of how men were at once to live wholly for the Kingdom of God, and not surrender their Christian freedom, their rights as individuals, remains unsolved (For the general philosophical questions regarding the individual, see artt. PERSONALITY).

One question yet remains. Can a person whose isolation has been thus defined to himself, ever again pass into the great undifferentiable mass? A mere containing wall, is so adaptable whatever it may contain, it must abide. Ritschl, for one, argues that an alienation from God which the must mean annihilation. The very idea of a reality so important as to be while all its manifestations demand he would ascribe to the pernicious influence of the abstract Platonic idea of the soul. Nor can it be said that in the Gospels, or anywhere else in Scripture there is any metaphysical basis of a Platonic kind for a necessary individual immortality. The Scripture hope is not in man, but in the character of God, and we cannot suppose Him under any necessity to continue evil for its own sake. On the other hand, if, as Ritschl maintains, the personality of God and man is individual, and pantheism is wholly an abandonment of the religious problem, which is how to maintain the spiritual the whole material universe, this exalted Power that rules above it, it remains a problem whether evil can ever attain such power as to be able to blot out for God an individual.

INDIVIDUALISM.—The word individualism is used in two senses, and the difference of meaning is constantly employed in order to discredit one set of ideas by arguing against the other. In a general way the uses may be distinguished by calling the one philosophical and the other political. Individualism, in the philosophical sense, attempts to derive everything from the intellect and the interests of the individual. However much a man derives from others he ultimately depends, it argues, on his own judgment and his five senses; and, however benevolent he may be all his motives have their source in self-love. Descartes started to reconstruct our whole knowledge from the individual's knowledge of himself, and his successors naturally sought to construct our whole activity from the individual's love to himself. Shaftesbury and Butler had to affirm almost as a discovery that benevolence is as true and real a part of human nature as self-love. Only after Hume had reduced this kind of individualism to sensationalism, leaving the individual himself a mere series of sensations, and after Spinozism began to be surface and the water that comes down its hills, and we should then be enabled to accept many of Christ's commands as literal which we can only now live with as figures of speech.

One feels in reading the Gospels that what is more alien to them than either Individualism or Socialism, is the character of both, which defends all the Individualism that means personal profit and all the Socialism that means personal security and dignity, which finds all our Lord's concessions literal and all His demands figurative. The typical attitude, though not usually expressed so bluntly, is Loisy's. Christ, he says, conceived the Kingdom of God, which He thought was at hand, as the great social panacea. Though He enforced it with the enthusiasm and excess which are necessary to implant any great ideal, it was quite unworkable in this rough world. There rose up in place of it, therefore, the Church with its authorities for belief and for conduct, that useful, practical, enduring compromise between the individual and the religious society. It is this combination which most of our countrymen who love compromise as the oil, if not the water, of life, are concerned to maintain; and when they welcome the power of the visible authorities, they mean to hail the power of the visible authorities; and when they object to Socialism, they only mean that they do not approve of the purposes for which the power is to be used.

The method of Socialism, nevertheless, is not the method of the gospel, and the usual course of the Socialist is that which Mr. Headlam follows,—to prove that the aims of Socialism are Christ's, and then take for granted that He would approve of the means proposed for attaining them. Even supposing we make the large concession of granting the exegesis, we still do not find the slightest attempt to show that our Lord ever in any way trusted to the State as the instrument for accomplishing His design. The usual way of avoiding this difficulty is to say that He could not be expected to look to a Pagan State as we are justified in looking to the Christian State. To this there are two very evident replies. First, Is the State ever Christian in our Lord's sense? Second, It was not the Pagan but the Theocratic State our Lord dealt with nearly all His days. It was there waiting to be adopted; yet He lived chiefly in conflict with it, and He never attempted to reform it or work through it. He certainly expected His followers to have a good deal to do with States and kings and governors, but it would be in an extremely individualistic position (Mt 10<sup>23</sup>), and all that was expected of them was not to fear them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul (v. 28). Our Lord's action was not revolutionary in the sense of actually overthrowing existing institutions, but He cannot be said to have cherished them. A certain regard was to be paid to the Scribes and Pharisees who sat in Moses' seat (Mt 23<sup>2</sup>), but He also subjected them to such criticism as must have sapped their power. He Himself so far honoured the religious institutions as not to oppose them; but the only evil He ever put His hand to the task of reforming, was that which disturbed the private worshipper (Mt 21<sup>12-13</sup>, Jn 2<sup>13-17</sup>), and His entire indifference to ceremonial purity rejected a great deal of the institution to the advantage of the individual. All this might seem to refer rather to the Church than the State; but if He distrusted the leadership of the former, He would not be likely any more to trust the leadership of the latter, if it took over the guidance of life. It also would be the blind leading the blind. What our Lord manifestly expects to see, is what He calls the seed of the Kingdom (Mt 13<sup>38</sup>), those who in every place are worthy, who are prepared to be as lights shining in a dark place. Why should He speak of the result as a Kingdom of God at all, if, in the final issue, it is only of man's regulation? The meaning certainly lies very near, that it was a kingdom of souls regulated only by love, a kingdom of souls bent on a direct service and obedience to God, and requiring no other rule. This fundamental distinction between it and all other earthly kingdoms would seem to be the very reason for its being called a Kingdom of God.

This view of the Kingdom of God, by what seems the most convincing explanation of our Lord's temptations. To suppose that He was tempted merely by His own hunger and love of success and love of praise, is to ascribe to Him motives which had no power over Him at other times. But if they are temptations of His work, the temptation to provide a kingdom with fulness of bread and to rule by accepting the methods of force in the State and of display in the Church, we see how He could be touched in His deepest interests. When He turned from that way to the road that led by a solitary path to Calvary, to call many, but to choose only the few who also would be prepared to walk in it, He surely decided to look to the individual to save the institution, and not to the institution to save the individual. In view of all this, it cannot be questioned that the aristocrat in his digging his bread out of the earth, and the social revolution had come, in the high conviction that the Divine way is personal surrender and not social supervision, represents Christ's attitude better than the respectable persons who meantime take all the present system of competition will give, while they wait for salvation from the action of the State.

But Socialism only makes a pretence of being workable through the State, by ignoring the bearing which its action would have on the whole life of the individual, and it is with this larger question that our Lord is concerned. His Kingdom is not of this world, and its treasures are not upon earth, and it only concerns itself with the things upon earth as they have to do with the great treasure in heaven, which is character, and the great rule of the Kingdom, which is love. That He expected this idea to be embodied in an earthly society is plain, for the beginnings of it arose in His own lifetime. But it was to be a very singular society, in which none was to exercise authority on one hand, and none to call any man master on the other. The only dignity was to be service; and the higher the position, the lower one should serve. Nothing can reconcile this with the ecclesiastical embodiment of it in all ages, wherein the true succession has been placed in the officials, who determined not only action but belief, and who have penetrated further into the inner sanctuary of the individual life than any earthly government that ever existed. But no one recognized more fully than Christ Himself that the channel by which His influence would go down would intermingle their clay with the pure waters; and to assume that any organization is more than a dim human attempt at reaching out towards His ideal, is to neglect His own warnings. As the believer must be in the world, so he must be in the institution—in it but not of it, always retaining his right to consider whether Christ is there or not when men say, 'Lo, here, or Lo, there.' In so far as the institution serves this Kingdom of God, this kingdom of souls, whose only authority is God the Father as revealed in the Son, and whose only rule is love, it is to be honoured; but it must ever be prepared to be judged by that standard.

The great end of all progress, therefore, is not to subject the individual, but to call him to the realization of his own heritage of freedom. It is in the crowd that men have done all the great away, and men appear in all their real characteristics, often with the unhonoured to their honour, and with the honoured to their shame. Even the Pharisee, the type in all ages in which individuality is most suppressed by creed and custom, cannot keep the curtain drawn in His presence. At first sight this definiteness seems to be lost in the strange, vague atmosphere of the Fourth Gospel, which is so strongly irradiated by one individuality—that of the writer. But in life it is not the persons who are themselves colourless who do most justice to the individuality of others. So it is that in John we see, more than in any other Gospel, the vivid individuality, in particular, of Andrew and Nathanael, Philip and Thomas are mere names and shadows in the other Gospels, while in John they have each one his own characteristic note. Even Peter, in the other Gospels, is little more than an inexplicable mixture of insight and error; but in John he is drawn in a phrase by the Master Himself, 'When thou wast young thou girdedst thyself and walkedst whither thou wouldest' (21<sup>18</sup>). This petulant character appears in the mention of him in John, till, in the days of heaviness, he '... slackness which had fallen upon all ...' and said with his old grip at his girdle, 'I go a fishing' (21<sup>3</sup>). In the question of the authenticity of John, this, at all events, deserves consideration, that it leaves us with such a sense of the strong individuality of the Apostles, both as children of nature and as children of grace, as to make it not incredible that a handful of poor men should start to conquer the world. In this Gospel, moreover, faith is not only an individual act, which it must always be, but also an attitude which brings out a man's deepest individuality. Men do not believe, because they trust only what they see (4<sup>48</sup>). They cannot believe in Christ, because already they have not believed in the highest they knew (5<sup>47</sup>). It is a certain ... or Christ which makes men believe ... Belief is a special word to oneself, a hearing from the Father (6<sup>45</sup>). Unbelief arises from being from beneath (8<sup>33</sup>), from being of one's father the devil (8<sup>44</sup>). There is, throughout, a family likeness in unbelief; while belief, in the consciousness of its own special needs, finds its own call. It does not lean on Abraham, or fashion itself on the accepted model, but, like Nathanael, it seeks God under the fig-tree, like Philip it is ready to say to conventional questions, 'Come and see.' This faith, moreover, issues in an eternal life, the present effect of which is to give us possession of our own souls, to know God in such a way as not to be greatly concerned about men, to be in the world yet not of it (17<sup>15</sup>).

Though less prominent in the Synoptics, our Lord's regard to individuality is not less significant. To enter the Kingdom, so pronounced an individuality is required that it can take by itself the narrow way, while the common course is the broad road (Mt 7<sup>13</sup>); it is to be one in so characteristic a fashion as to cause more joy in heaven than the ninety and nine who, satisfied with the received standard, need no repentance (Mt 18<sup>13</sup>, Lk 15<sup>7</sup>). This strong insistence that many are called and only few chosen, indicates not arbitrariness in dealing with individuals, but the rarity of the individuality God requires (Mt 22<sup>14</sup>). His true disciples must be of so pronounced a type that, while they shun the poor glory of self-display (Mt 6<sup>2</sup>), they must yet be the salt of the earth, and not even fear the prominence of being as a city set on a hill. They must shun the all-pervasive, all-assimilative creed of the time, the heaven of the Pharisees; nor will the accepted Christian formula, the saying of 'Lord, Lord,' be any more approved (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>).

Our Lord does not differ from the pagan view that the worth of an individual depends upon his difference in the ... that wherein consists, and of th ... in each ... Even to Aristotle ... meant something ...

... a certain aloofness from the petty concerns of life, which could be possible for all men only when the great mechanical slave whom Aristotle dreamt of could be made to do the drudgery. With Christ, on the other hand, a man could have true individuality in the lowest seats and at the lowest services.

Nor is Christ's conception that of modern culture, which, Aristotle than Jesus. He does not seek, ... up as high as possible of his nature. A man does not fail of that ... the Kingdom of God requires, even though he have to cut off an offending hand or pluck out an offending eye, and enter blind and maimed (Mt 5<sup>29</sup>).

The classical presentation of the type of individuality permitted and required in the Kingdom of God is in the Beatitudes. Too often they are read as a suppression of individuality, which they are if a man's chief characteristics are possessions, popularity, self-assertion, self-indulgence. But in Christ's eyes this should not be the way of showing a man's true nature. The description, taken as a whole, presents an energetic type which, just because of its superiority both to society and to nature, is bound to be of marked individuality. To be poor in spirit is not to be poor-spirited, not to bend and break under every trial, but is to be rich in a faith which accepts poverty or anything else in the assurance of never being broken or bent. The mourner is not one given to tears, but one in ... opposition to wrong and in energetic ... with suffering. The meek is not the meek and mild, not the soft, timid person, but one who has too high a faith in a wiser power than his own to strive and cry. To hunger and thirst after righteousness is necessarily to take an independent and difficult course in the world; while to be merciful requires decided strength of character, most of the cruel things on earth being done not in self-will and malice, but in thoughtlessness and weakness. Purity of heart never could survive in this world as mere innocence and ignorance of evil; the soft people who seek to shun everything disagreeable are the chief makers of dispeace; and only persons of determined character and decided principles ever run any risk of being persecuted for ... ness's sake. Were there no other condition ... last, it would mark the contrast with the accepted type, with the person whose first motive is prudence, whose guiding star is agreement with the authorities, who feels an obtrusive individuality to be in bad taste, and who regards a somewhat colourless membership of the Church and of Society as the hall-mark of the Divine approval. Instead we see one who is the odd man in the hundred, one who will not walk with the crowd in the broad way, one who has something of the singularity of the prophet which will ensure for him the singularity of the prophet's reward.

This large scope for individuality is maintained chiefly by resting the guidance of life not on a rule, but on a relation to God, revealed not in a code, but in a Person. This was the basis of a rule of love to God and to man to which all the Law and the Prophets could be reduced. Love is the way of at once giving scope to our own individuality and cherishing the individuality of others. Not that love can be without law. As it has been well said, What is love at the centre is always law at the circumference. But love at the centre will always keep law mindful of human differences. It will be a law in accordance with the Apostle's interpretation of his Master's meaning when he enjoins us to be true to our own highest individuality, i.e. the special demands of our own conscience, to do nothing that is not of faith (Ro 14<sup>23</sup>), to attend so far to the weakness of our own individuality as not to be enslaved to anything; and to regard the individuality of our neighbour so far as to take heed to what edifies (1 Co 10<sup>23</sup>). Nevertheless it is no true development of Christian faith or morals, as Newman (in his Development) and countless others have argued, that the faith has been elaborated into a creed that omits no detail of doctrine, and the code to a code that lays down every detail of conduct. Can it ever be true humility to surrender our individuality to any other man made like to ourselves.

Yet a free Protestant code and a smaller creed do not necessarily give us a true and characteristic faith, or save us from a mainly negative standard of duty, and perhaps there is no kind of consideration for others more needed at the present day than to have courage to be ourselves.

To leave room for this individuality is one of the most difficult and most neglected tasks of theology, and to leave scope for it in the Church is a task that has never been very anxiously pursued by the ecclesiastic. Yet if the true manifestation of faith is power to become sons of God in spite of society and circumstances, a very important element of it should be the maintenance of our true individuality; and though truth can only be one, there should be something characteristic in each man's faith. The preservation of this difference among the Scripture writers is the real task of Biblical Theology, which should not aim at evaporating truth into what each man thinks, but at showing how important every man is for his faith.

JOHN OMAN.

INDIVIDUALITY (OF CHRIST). It is impossible to have a historical character, or a personality of a visible career among men, Christ undoubtedly presents as distinct an aspect of individuality as any concrete reality, as can be affirmed of any other personality. On the other hand, when we consider the historical point of view to that of Christological construction, we can hardly fail to raise the question whether it is possible to come from generalizing the category of individuality as applied to Christ on the side of His humanity. Proceeding from the latter point of view, and deferring to the Catholic Church respecting the union of our Lord's manhood with the pre-existent Logos or Son of God, we are confronted with the task of explaining how a real concrete manhood can be taken into veritable union with the Logos without effecting a heterogeneous and double personality. The task is a very difficult one, and in wrestling with it a temptation easily arises to strip the manhood of concreteness or individuality, and thus to accommodate it more fully to the demands of personal unity. But a resort to this alternative has its own difficulty, and that by no means a slight one, since the thought of an Incarnation which means the union of the Son of God with a mutilated manhood, or with a mere semblance of manhood, is far from being satisfactory. Indeed, there is little hazard in affirming that the mind and heart of Christendom would sooner tolerate an element of unresolved dualism in the person of Christ, than sacrifice in any appreciable degree the reality and perfection of His manhood.

1. Among the prominent theories involving a sacrifice of this kind the Apollonian is the most explicit and intelligible. By its supposition that the Logos took the place of the rational soul in the Redeemer, so that the Incarnation involved only the assumption of a human body with its principle of animal life, it evidently simplifies very much the problem of Christ's person. But the simplification takes place at too great a cost. The immutable Logos clothed in a human body is obviously no proper subject for suffering, and thus has a real implication in human experiences generally. He cannot be brought into accord with the Gospel representations, except by resort to an artificial, Docetic, hypothesis. As lacking the most essential fact of incarnation, He is destitute of the most apprehensible bond of brotherhood and ground of companionship. In short, the advantage which pertains to this theory, on the score of simplicity, is overmatched by the disadvantage which it incurs by its incompatibility with Gospel facts and by its necessity of Christ's coming only to enter into the human condition, and thus only to complete office of mediation. In effect it abolishes the Son of Man; for the archetypal manhood, which Apollonaris supposed to be resident in the eternal Logos, is as far off thing in comparison with the concrete reality which naturally is present to our thought when we use the term 'manhood.'

2. A second historic theory which has a distinct bearing upon our theme is that of Incarnationism from Apollinarism in its origin. It is based upon the knowledge that by the incarnation of the Son of God it is to be understood the assumption of a complete human nature. This acknowledgment, however, turns out to be rather verbal than substantial. The Monophysite assertion of a single nature in the incarnated Christ involved the compounding of the human nature in Him with the Divine; and this, in connexion with the vast preponderance assigned to the Divine in post-Nicene thinking, meant virtually the reduction of the human to the rank of an accident, a secondary and contingent property or group of properties, superinduced upon a Divine subject. Such an outcome, it is needless to say, runs very close to the submergence of the human side of Christ. It leaves no place for the thought of a real ethical manhood; for a proper ethical character is not predicable of a selfless accident. And with this deficit is conjoined a serious metaphysical difficulty, since fundamental thinking insists upon a relation of commensurability between attributes and their subject, and does not approve the notion that attributes appropriate to a finite personality can be made properly to inhere in an infinite subject.

3. A theory favoured with more orthodox associations than the Monophysite, but having a somewhat questionable bearing on the Christological problem, is the theory of the impersonality of Christ's manhood, or more specifically, the theory that His manhood, being devoid of a personality of its own, obtained from the first moment of subsistence its personal subject in the Ego of the pre-existent Logos (the so-called doctrine of enhypostasis). This theory was broached by Leontius in the 6th cent., was advocated by John of Damascus in the 8th cent., and has had in later times considerable currency among theologians of reputed orthodoxy, though never receiving any distinct oecumenical sanction. As handled by John of Damascus, the notion of the impersonality of Christ's manhood cannot be said to have been suitably reconciled with the full reality of that manhood. While formally he assigned to the Redeemer the full complement of human faculties, he 'in one connexion or another to deny to characteristic forms of activity. It would not do, as he conceived, to admit progress in knowledge on the part of Christ, as this would contravene the truth that the hypostatic union of the human with the Divine in Him was complete from the start. For a like reason it was considered inadmissible to impute real prayer to Him. Divinity needs nothing, and a humanity that is perfectly united with Divinity shares in its sufficiency. In relation to the will also the Damascene considered it necessary to retrench from the proper human mode. The logical issue of his representations is to deny to the human will in Christ all power of initiative, and to reduce it entirely to the office of a 'medium through which the Logos moved the man Jesus.' Quite possibly John of Damascus does not afford the best specimen of what can be done in Christological construction with the notion that the human nature of Christ, being without personality of its own, derived such personal character as pertained to it from its relation to the person of the Logos. But certainly it is difficult in the light of his exposition to discover the real Son of Man. The image of a genuine and living manhood does not stand forth in his representation of the Redeemer.

It has sometimes been concluded that a special advantage belongs to the doctrine of the impersonality of the human nature of Christ, as helping to explain the atoning efficacy of His work. The inference is made that human nature in this character is not a concrete, limited entity, such as is the human nature of the individual man, but rather generic or universal. It is then argued that Christ in perfecting His own human nature sanctified human nature in general. Again, it is claimed that, in virtue of His literal community with men, His doing was in the proper sense a transaction within, as well as for, the whole body of humanity. As an eminently spiritual writer has thought, 'every man was a part of Him; He felt the sins of every man, not in sympathy but in sorrow and abhorrence' (Thomas Erskine). To such representations it is legitimate to reply, that what needs to be sanctified is not human nature in itself, but myriads of human beings; that the sanctification of human nature in Christ cannot rationally be conceived to have any immediate effect upon its sanctification elsewhere, inasmuch as human nature in Christ cannot be regarded as a stuff out of which men universally are fashioned; and that a generic or universal human nature belongs purely to the realm of the conceptual, and cannot possibly have any place in the sphere of real being. In short, the line of representation in question rests upon a fiction which modern philosophy for the most part has discommenced—the fiction of the real existence of universals.

4. While it is impossible to be satisfied with any one of these historic theories, as respects its bearing on the integrity or concrete reality of Christ's manhood, it is far from easy to offer a definite substitute which is not open to exception. Indeed, an attempt at strict construction is certain to miscarry. The extraordinary as such rebels against complete elucidation, and by supposition the union of the Divine and the human in Christ is an extraordinary fact. Any one who accepts the Incarnation must admit that the individuality of Christ's manhood was specially conditioned; but equally, any one who admits the extraordinary character of the Incarnation must grant the impossibility of giving a full explanation of the mode and measure of this special conditioning. We cannot fully construe our own relation to the Divine; how then should we expect to gain clear insight into the relation of the human to the Divine in the person of our Lord? Probably the best that can be done is to form an ideal picture of the normal relation of perfected manhood to the Divine, and then beyond this to postulate the mystery of a special bond between Christ's manhood and His Divinity. The ideal picture of the ideal picture will be distinctly having clearly apprehended the great truth that manhood loses nothing of its proper character by intimate union with the Divine, that the human spirit is never more itself than when it is possessed by and insphered in the Divine Spirit, that freedom is never so complete as when the human will by its own consent passes under the absolute direction of the Divine will, we shall be prepared to believe that manhood in Christ suffered no retrenchment by its extraordinary union with the Divine, but rather is to be accounted the full-orbed specimen of manhood as respects ethical worth and all tender and beautiful traits.

Taken in a popular sense, rather than in relation to Christological theory, the subject of individuality suggests a discussion of those characteristics which may be regarded as specially distinctive of Christ as a historic personage. This discussion, however, is reserved for the art. UNIQUENESS.

INDOLENCE.—The spirit of Christ's religion is inimical to indolence in the sphere of business (Lk 16<sup>11</sup>, Mt 24<sup>48-50</sup>), but more especially indolent Christianity is salt without savour (Mt 5<sup>13</sup>). Not only is a state of salvation hard to maintain (Mt 7<sup>14</sup>), but perfection is to be aimed at (5<sup>48</sup>). An enemy sows tares while we sleep (13<sup>25</sup>). The oil in our lamps consumes as we rest (25<sup>7</sup>). Watchfulness is the very opposite of indolence (26<sup>41</sup>). The hid talent will reproach the indolent in the day of reckoning (25<sup>18</sup>). Most deadly is the spiritual indolence which is satisfied to have Abraham for father (Lk 3<sup>8</sup>, Jn 8<sup>39</sup>), or Christ for Saviour, without response to the impulses of the Holy Spirit, the source of life and motion and progress.

A signal idleness may be executed upon the individual after a period of further probation (Lk 13<sup>27-30</sup>), or suddenly and unexpectedly when that day comes as a snare (Lk 21<sup>34-36</sup>) and the Judge pronounces the sentence (Mk 11<sup>14</sup>). The conscience must be kept awake and intelligent (Mt 5<sup>23, 24</sup>). The beginnings of evil must be checked (v. 18<sup>1</sup>). The ears must be open to learn, and the heart ready to believe (11<sup>15</sup>). The rock foundation to build the house upon may need much toil to reach it (7<sup>24</sup>). And continually the servant of Christ must be ready for his Master's coming, with loins girded and light burning (Lk 12<sup>35</sup>).—Love is not indolent in seeking the lost sheep (Mt 18<sup>12</sup>). Hope is not indolent in running to the sepulchre (Jn 20<sup>9</sup>), or hastening to the manger (Lk 2<sup>7</sup>). Faith is not indolent in pressing through the crowd to be healed (Mk 5<sup>27</sup>). 'The zeal of thine house shall eat me up' (Jn 2<sup>17</sup>). See also art. SLOTHFULNESS.

INFANCY.—

1. The period of infancy, properly speaking, may be taken as lying between the birth of a child and its weaning; and Hebrew children were usually weaned at two or three years of age or thereabouts. Quite a number of terms are used in Heb. to describe childhood and youth at various stages; and in this earliest period before a child has become a gāmāl (גָּמַל, 'weaned'), there are three different terms that may be applied to him. The infant is lālā (לָלָא), the (new-) born (cf. 'bairn,' playing on the Gr. terms for 'pig' (ῥῆς) and 'son' (υἱός). It has often been pointed out that the number of little ones slain must have been comparatively small (Edersheim says 'probably 20 at most,' i. 214), in correction of later exaggerations (perhaps helped by the vividness of v. 18); but this does not destroy the association in such an association with the infancy of our Lord in Christian tradition. But, all things considered, though it is plausible to suggest that we have here a designed Messianic parallel to the deliverance of the infant Moses, the parallel is not so close as to suggest pure invention, and it is difficult to imagine all substratum of fact to be wanting.

Suggestions, also, which see in the 'Repose in Egypt,' as it used to be called, only a typical indication of Jesus as the vine of Israel 'brought out of Egypt' (art. 'Gospels' in Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1780), are not wholly convincing and satisfactory. At the same time, as regards the whole narrative in Mt 2, we must be content to say that the state of our knowledge affords no solution of the difficulties to which it gives rise when compared with the representation of Lk., especially, e.g., in the impression that Joseph and Mary were continuously resident at Bethlehem probably until Jesus was nearly two years old, and that they went to Nazareth to live only after their return from Egypt.

3. The sources of the Infancy narratives remain a subject of debate. Speaking of the Mt. document in particular, Sanday says 'we are in the dark' (art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB ii. 644). Resch's attempt to establish an original Hebrew Childhood Gospel having as parts of its contents both the Lk. and Mt. stories, has failed to carry conviction. An important problem, however, is presented by a comparison of these narratives with the conspicuous features of certain of the Apocryphal Gospels, particularly the Protevangelium of James, the Gospel according to Thomas, and the Arabic Gospel of the Childhood. It may be said that it is just at such a point as this that the apocryphal writings come most noticeably into contact with our Canonical Gospels, as also it is in the ministry and teaching of Jesus that they depart most widely from them. A superficial glance of fantastic elements in these Christian Apocrypha is at once revealed on the most superficial comparison: still there are elements in common, and here and there points of close contact. In the Gospel of the Childhood, e.g., we have the story of the Magi woven into the narrative, and Mt 2<sup>1</sup> is almost literally paralleled, as also the adoration and offering of the threefold gift (see H. Sike's edition of 1697, with Lat. tr. p. 17), though at the same time the most curious divergences appear. It is most improbable that our narratives were directly borrowed from any of these apocryphal works and finally incorporated in the Canonical Gospels. It seems also unlikely that our Gospels were used specifically in the production of any of the Apocrypha and that out of our Gospels the narratives in Mt 1.2 and Lk 1.2 were simply taken for expansion into the extraordinary congeries of marvels of which these extra-canonical writings mostly consist. Why may not canonical and apocryphal accounts have alike originated in a common early tradition, though they have flowed so far apart? It is well to remember that those who promulgated and those who received most of the Apocryphal Gospels sincerely believed themselves to be Christians. Pseudo-Matthew indeed openly professes to be actuated by the love of Christ in writing his wonder-crowded account of the infancy and boyhood of our Lord. Our narratives, however, are characterized by a wonderful simplicity and restraint when compared with such accounts as his; they proclaim themselves so much nearer what the facts must have been. But one source of apocryphal development is the Arabic Gospel of the Childhood, The Apocryphal and Legendary Life of Christ, p. xix; and one great feature of such haggadōth was the interest shown in connecting OT prophecies with fulfilments. The question suggests itself whether haggadic elements may not even have found their way into our brief canonical narratives. If it be so, it cannot detract from the supreme value of the portraiture of Christ in the Gospels. G. H. Box (in ZNTW, 1905, p. 80 ff.) suggests that Mt 1.2 are to be regarded as a madrāsh, which means much the same thing, though otherwise expressed. The historical basis, that is to say, is treated in subservience to edification and the expression of a Messianic faith. See also artt. BABE, CHILDHOOD.

INFLUENCE.—1. THE INFLUENCE OF CHRIST DURING HIS LIFE.—(a) On His disciples.—This from the very first was remarkable. The short interview that John and Andrew had with Jesus after He had been pointed out by their old master as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, seems to have carried them away at once. Andrew has no misgivings, but goes off to his brother with the great news that they have found the Messiah (Jn 1<sup>37</sup>). The disciples, spiritually minded though they were, must have felt all the prejudices that widely existed against the appearance of the Messiah as a poor and undistinguished person from a northern village of no reputation, and yet they were at once conquered. One evening's conversation convinced them that He was their Prince. A like instantaneous recognition is recorded of Bartholomew, if he be, as seems likely, the same as Nathanael. He has difficulties to overcome which he had frankly stated to Philip when he ran in with the same great news that Andrew had told Peter. But they Nathanael wondering, and when this was followed by news which showed that He knew of some secret passage in his life, he confesses His greatness in the fullest terms, 'Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel' (1<sup>46</sup>). In all these cases it is to be noted that the impression made not by any miracle or sign, but by what Christ was and what He said. A little later there follows the first sign,—the changing of water into wine,—and with it the natural deepening of the hold Christ had on His disciples (2<sup>11</sup>). All their previous hopes were confirmed ('crediderunt amplius,' Bengel). Up to this time there are no hostile influences at work. As simple-minded men they probably supposed that all the world would share their sanguine hopes. The cleaning of the Temple, followed as it was by public questioning as to His right to take that bold step (2<sup>13</sup>), was probably the first indication that He would not be able to influence all men alike.

From that time onward the attempt to break down our Lord's influence becomes much more definite and decided. His supposed birthplace,—Nazareth,—His humble parentage, His lack of a really good education, all these and many other objections were constantly urged (Jn 7<sup>16</sup>), and must have caused some difficulty in the disciples' minds. His great assertions that He was the Bread of Life and the Light of the world (Jn 6<sup>35</sup>, 48 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>5</sup>), aroused great opposition and lost Him many friends. But when after eighteen months of critics . . . . . and insult, He asked His disciples . . . . . their opinion about Him, they . . . . . Peter without hesitation: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God' (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>). It is true that this was the conviction they had had at the outset, but it had not been tested, it had not been held against the whole world. The disciples were not fanatics, they were not indifferent to the opinion of their own Church and nation; they felt keenly the opposition and hatred which their view everywhere encountered, and yet they held it. It is a striking proof of our Lord's personal influence. That He knew their difficulties is plain from the fact that He prayed for them before He asked the question (Lk 9<sup>18</sup>). That He rejoiced in their loyalty is also plain from the great words spoken to Peter (Mt 16<sup>17-19</sup>). The T . . . . . followed quickly (Mt 17<sup>12</sup> ||), in or . . . . . three disciples who knew Him best might have something to fall back upon in the greater difficulties that lay before them. Soon our Lord became a proscribed person, not only excommunicated from all the synagogues of the land, but bringing under that ban all His friends (Jn 9<sup>22</sup>). Their loyalty, however, remained unbroken except in one case, that of Judas. This man must have felt our Lord's influence at one time, and indeed been always more or less under it. He could not tear himself away . . . . . he was feeling more and more . . . . . the barren prospects that Christ's language and the hostility of the world seemed to suggest. Only little by little he stifled it, and we may well believe that it was not till the very last, even after he had promised to betray Him, that it failed. Then St. John (13<sup>27</sup>) adds the significant words, 'After the sop, then entered Satan into him,' and the disciple was lost.

The severest test was felt after the arrest. That the Prince and Messiah should be betrayed by His own people into the hands of the heathen, and that they should clamour for His death, was the greatest trial that a faithful friendship has ever had to bear. It is true the disciples ought to have known their Saviour's . . . . . but, like good people to-day, they followed . . . . . interpretations instead of searching the Holy Writings for themselves. That our Lord's influence would have remained with them had He not risen again is, of course, certain; but it would have been the influence of a holy life and a great example, not of an abiding Presence and a magnificent hope. This was given them by the Resurrection, which at once illuminated all the perplexities of the past and made His Messiahship a felt reality. And after Pentecost they found their minds and imaginations extraordinarily stimulated by the presence of the Holy Ghost who witnessed to every word and act of the Crucified and Risen Christ.

(b) On the people—This was as surprising in its own way as His influence on the disciples. 'They heard Him gladly' (Mk 12<sup>37</sup>). They would have taken Him 'by force and made him king' (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). They prevented any open act of hostility against Him on the part of the rulers, who were afraid of them (Lk 20<sup>19-22</sup>). They never could make up their minds who He was, but yet were convinced He was no ordinary person. He was either Elijah, or the great expected Prophet, or Jeremiah, or even the Baptist risen again (Mt 16<sup>14</sup>). That they turned completely round at the last was no doubt due to the malign influence of the Pharisees joined to the great disappointment experienced when nothing followed the events of Palm Sunday. Like the people of Lystra, they were enraged at having openly declared themselves on the side of a movement which seemed to have no result. Our Lord's influence on the people was just what we should expect, as we shall see when we consider its particular character.

(c) On His enemies—At first it strikes us strangely that One who not only did no harm, but always went about doing good, One who refused to be entrapped into any political movement, One who observed fasts and festivals, attended synagogue and temple, should have excited such bitter hostility. He had none of the marks of a great social reformer, disliked crowds and great cities, refused to take advantage of any excitement caused by His words or deeds, chose for His intimate friends plain middle-class men who had no particular mark about them except their religiousness. All His teaching was constructive rather than destructive. He did not speak of the Gentiles as His servant Paul did, nor of the Temple as Stephen did. He was indignant at the abuses of the time, and was unsparing in His condemnation of Pharisees and scribes, but the hostility had set in before that, and its only explanation is the hatred of bad men to a holy life.

(d) On individuals.—(a) The visit of Nicodemus shows something of the power Jesus exercised in public. Although Nicodemus was a person of some importance, he treats our Lord, in spite of His humble circumstances, as not only a great but a Divine teacher from whom he would gladly learn (Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). And the conversation with Him on that occasion bore fruit. (β) Pilate, too, was evidently greatly impressed by Jesus. With his in-born contempt for the Jews he would have decided the matter the Sanhedrin brought before him very quickly, had it not been for the majesty of Jesus' presence and the brief but striking words He spoke. That he should have been afraid when the Jews told him that the prisoner had claimed to be the Son of God and at once sought another interview, shows that there was a mysterious influence about our Lord which made the governor feel uncomfortable; and this fear was only increased when his question, 'Whence art thou?' received no answer (Jn 19<sup>9</sup>). (γ) Even Caiaphas treats Christ with a respect which he would have gladly dispensed with. His continued silence led the high priest to take the very unusual step of forcing some statement out of Him by solemn adjuration (Mt 26<sup>63</sup>). (δ) The most touching illustrations of Christ's influence are found amongst the sinful. They were drawn to Him as steel to the magnet. He was their friend (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>), to whom they could give their confidences. Tired of life they turned instinctively to Him, and gladly gave Him their all. Matthew Zacchæus, Mary Magdalene, the woman that was a sinner, are only typical of hundreds of men and women who came to Him because they were sure of His love, and recognized that He had power to forgive.

2. SECRET OF HIS INFLUENCE—(a) Not the influence of His position as Son of God.—When we remember who He was, the Word made flesh, the eternal Son of God, we are perhaps surprised that our Lord never used the influence of His unique position. Had He chosen, He could have done what He was tempted to do, forced men to believe by some plain unmistakable wonder like that of throwing Himself from the pinnacle of the Temple (Mt 4<sup>5</sup>). He could have appeared as the great I AM attended by legions of angels (26<sup>63</sup>). He could have declared authoritatively that He was the great God, and proved it by the destruction of the towns and villages which denied it (Lk 9<sup>52</sup>). He could have used His position and forced men to recognize it. And again and again, as the above references show, He was tempted to do it. But He rejected the temptation. It is a method, as we know, freely employed in the world, and widely popular. People prefer the influence of the direct to the indirect. They like to have some sign from heaven which will save them the trouble of thinking, and be a short cut to a difficult conclusion. And the Jews were always seeking this (Mt 12<sup>38</sup>); always hoping that He would either show that His claims were invalid and that He was unable to give a sign, or satisfy their curiosity by some miracle. Our Lord tells them that, even if He gave them a sign, the sign of a man risen from the dead, it would have no effect in changing their lives (Lk 16<sup>32</sup>). It may be asked—But what about His miracles? In the first place, they were never done as a proof of His claims. He never proclaimed a great truth and then worked a miracle to show it was true. They were all in obedience to an earnest call for help; and faith, where it could be had, was a condition essential to His working (Mk 6<sup>5</sup>). When done, they were evidences, but only secondary to the evidence of His own personality. If men were too dull to believe in Him to what He was, then there was still the sign of His works. 'Though ye believe not me, believe the works' (Jn 10<sup>38</sup>); 'Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me; or else believe me for the very works' sake' (14<sup>11</sup>).

(b) Not the influence of popularity.—In the next place, Jesus did not seek influence through flattering people or rulers. Satan recognized in Christ extraordinary attractive powers. His love and manners were such that He could, had He chosen, have won over the whole world to His side. Never in anyone had there been such rich human gifts, such wide sympathies, such intimate knowledge of men's ways and hearts. Satan's attempt to persuade Christ to do him homage (Mt 4<sup>9</sup> || Lk 4<sup>7</sup>) was more subtle than is often supposed. It was the temptation to win, through flattery of the world-power, —a path that has again and again been pursued by great men. It is needless to point out that Christ never sought influence that way. The Pharisees and Herodians only expressed the general feeling in saying, 'Master, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth, and carest not for anyone: for thou regardest not the person of men' (Mt 22<sup>16</sup>).

(c) The influence of personality.—Christ influenced men not by the majesty of His position nor by His marvellous works, but by His personality. It was what He was more than what He said or did. Men felt about Him that He was always infinitely greater than anything He said. And it was because of the tremendous force that sprang forth from His personality that He could say the most amazing things without amazing. It must be remembered that the disciples were, during His lifetime, feeling their way towards the mystery of His Person. They did not know at first what they knew afterwards. And yet they could feel thankful for teaching which placed Him before wife and child, before brother or sister (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>). They welcomed Him as the Way, the Truth, and the Life. He did not point it out, for He was it. He did not give it as something apart from Himself. All this, which would have been intolerable from anyone else, was a relief from Him, as it expressed in words their own feelings (7<sup>29</sup>). So, too, the weight of His authority was not that of the scribes, dependent on others, but that derived from His own personality. It was this that astonished the people, who were accustomed in their teachers to quotations from others and to second-hand information. With Him it was always personal: 'We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen' (Jn 3<sup>11</sup>). Now and again it flashed forth in a way that dazzled and overpowered, as when the men of Nazareth wished to fling Him over the cliff, as when those of Jerusalem would have stoned Him, as when those sent to arrest Him fell back when He declared who He was (Lk 4<sup>29</sup>, Jn 8<sup>59</sup> 18<sup>6</sup>).

(d) Power of the Holy Ghost.—Beyond all this there is something far more difficult to explain, viz. the effect of the descent of the Holy Ghost at His Baptism. When the Baptist was asked to account for the influence of Christ, he replied, 'A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven,' and went on to say that not only was the Christ above all as coming from above, but that He was endowed with the Spirit beyond all measure (Jn 3<sup>27</sup>, 34). It would seem, though the passage is not clear, that part of His influence was due to the co-operation of the Holy Ghost with His own spirit. The Holy Ghost given to man in such measure as man's limitations allow, was given to the infinite heart and mind of Christ fully, infinitely, without bound. And in the power of that Divine Spirit He began His ministry (Lk 4<sup>18-21</sup>), not only teaching men's minds, but by the 'finger of God' (11<sup>20</sup>)—an expression interpreted by some of the Holy Ghost—casting out devils. But whatever may be the mystery of the union of the Holy Spirit with Christ, it is certain that He laid stress on this Power as being that which would be the source of the influence His disciples should exercise.

3. INFLUENCE OF THE DISCIPLES—All Christ's disciples, without exception, were to be influential. The words, 'Ye shall receive power, when the Holy Ghost is come upon you' (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>), were probably spoken to the 120 disciples, numbering some women amongst them. They were to rely upon Him. He had told them previously that in the difficult situations which persecution would create, they were not to be anxious as to how best to answer the accusations of their adversaries: He Himself would give them 'a mouth and wisdom,' and then further explained by saying, 'for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Spirit' (Lk 21<sup>14</sup>). They were then to influence the world not primarily by intellectual power or by wonderful signs, but by that which is deeper than intellectual gifts, namely, their own personality. Intellectuals be what they were, not what they had, the power of their own inner spirit, not that of cleverness; and this through the power of the Eternal Spirit. Spirit can be touched only by spirit, personality can be developed only by personality. When, then, the Holy Spirit came upon them on the Day of Pentecost, it was not the surface of their lives, that were touched. It was not the development of mere intellectual gifts which enabled them to communicate with others, but such a development of their own spirits that they felt in their own hearts a whole world, and in their struggle to express this rush of sympathy, found a language suitable for each person with whom they came in contact. So afterwards we do not find the gift of tongues a new language, but rather an endeavour to express the new enlargement of their own spirits. They felt more than they could express, more than their minds could recognize (1 Co 14<sup>13</sup>). And this growth of personality is what we see even in the brief records of the NT: Simon becomes Peter; Levi, Matthew; Bartholomew, Nathanael; Joseph, Barnabas; and Saul, Paul. Their characters are not only stronger, but fuller and larger, and through them they built up churches, and changed the face of the world in which they lived. Our Lord never supposes they will be effective through education or culture or the presence of gifts. 'Apart from me ye can do nothing' (Jn 15<sup>5</sup>). But the co-operation which He promises as the secret of their success is not that of a master who gets over his pupil's difficulty by solving it for him, but that of one who by his sympathy, power, and skill enables him to meet it for himself. Christ dwelt in them through faith by the power of the Holy Spirit, and worked in them and through them in every painful task they had to accomplish.

INHERITANCE (Mt 21<sup>28</sup>, Mk 12<sup>7</sup>, Lk 20<sup>14</sup>; Lk 12<sup>13</sup>. κληρονομία, derived from κληρος, 'lot,' 'portion,' 'possession,' and νέμειν, 'to own or administer')—The ordinary Biblical idea of inheritance is 'the enjoyment by a rightful title of that which is not the fruit of personal exertion. The heir being what he is in relation to others, enters upon a possession which corresponds with his position; but there is no necessary thought of succession to one who has passed away' (Westcott, Epistle to the Hebrews, p. 168). In the Gospels, however, the idea of succession to a deceased person is the prominent one, as with ourselves. The chief difference between the ordinary ancient and the ordinary modern conception of inheritance is this: We have more regard to the mere change in the ownership of certain property which takes place: the ancient civilized races looked rather to the position of the heir as executor and administrator of the deceased's property, and as the person who, being clothed, so to speak, with the personality of the deceased, took upon himself all the obligations of the testator, as well as the continuance of his race and the perpetuation of his family religion. The last considerations were the raison d'être and account for the prevalence of inheritance in ancient society. An adopted son, or a relative compelled to marry the deceased's daughter, could carry on the family and its rites as well as a real son. (See Maine's Ancient Law, ch. vi, and artt. 'Heir' and 'Inheritance' in Hastings' DB). See also art. HEIR.

INN.—Inns in the time of Christ were neither so infrequent nor so ill-equipped as many writers have represented.

Thus Stapfer (Palestine in the Talmud, 1866, p. 232), quoting from the Talmud a story of a man, travelling from Zoar, left at an inn one of their number who had fallen ill upon the road (Ex. xvi. 7), adds the comment, 'Such hostels were rare, and were found only in very remote places.' Other writers convey the impression that the only inns in Palestine were a few khans, as there are and now four in Jerusalem, and one in the Galilee and modern Syria. (See, e.g., Travels in Syria, p. 498, Kinglake, Lothien, ch. vi, Caravanserais; and Vigouroux's Dictionnaire.)

This seems to the present writer a mistaken inference, arising partly from exaggerated notions of Oriental hospitality and partly from attributing to the 1st cent. A.D. social conditions which prevailed, it is true, in patriarchal times, and are found even now on the great trade and pilgrim routes across the desert, but did not obtain to anything like the same degree in the busy, populated, and civilized cities of the Herods. The custom of hospitality in the East (see Hastings' DB, s.v., and Hamburger's RE) may, of course, be a reason why inns in the modern sense of the word should be less needed than in Western countries; but the statement that 'the warm commendations of hospitality in the NT show that even in the Roman period the buildings set apart for strangers to lodge in were of a simple character in Palestine' (Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Inn'), requires considerable modification.

Some of these commendations obviously refer to the interchange of courtesies among members of the Christian community only (e.g. Ro 12<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>9</sup>, 3 Jn 5), while others which definitely mention 'strangers' and 'enemies' are not necessarily any indication of the rarity and poverty of existing places of entertainment, but a sign of the new Christian spirit (Ro 1<sup>21</sup>, He 13<sup>2</sup>). Ramsay argues (Hastings' DB, 1st Vol p. 312a) that the motive of this urging of hospitality was the desire to preserve Christian converts from the corrupting influences among which they would be thrown at the public inns.

Numerous passages are cited from the Talmud to prove the extent to which hospitality prevailed among the Jews; but this traditional virtue was probably more praised than practised in the 1st century. The conditions peculiar to a nomad life came to be very materially modified when the countryside was covered with populous villages and towns. It is true that, at the Passover, if a Jew came up to Jerusalem from any part of the empire, he would find entertainment at a private house. It was the boast of the Rabbis that, notwithstanding the crowds, no man could say, 'I have not a bed in Jerusalem to lie in' (Lightfoot, Works, 1823, ix. p. 128); but what if the Jew came at some other time than at one of the great national feasts? What if a Samaritan came? Moreover, there was a large heathen population; and even if Jewish habits were equal in practice to those of the Jews, provision was made for the Gentile. Even to a Jew a Jew would shut his door. When Jesus is sending out His disciples to preach, He does not take it for granted that they will always find a ready welcome or free entertainment (Mt 10<sup>11-14</sup>, Mk 6<sup>10-11</sup>, Lk 10<sup>10-11</sup>).

Nor is it safe to argue from the comparative silence of contemporary records that inns were rare. It would be like saying to a reader of the Gospels that in Jerusalem there were many synagogues.* It is quite possible that there were almost as many inns in Jerusalem. At any rate, it is misleading to make the general statement, as though it applied to all periods of Jewish history, that 'inns in our sense of the term were, as they still are, unknown in the East' (McClintock and Strong, Cyc. s.v.). A truer view is given in the Jewish Encyc. (art. 'Caravanserais'): 'By NT times the Holy Land had been sufficiently developed to afford opportunity for real inns.'

The influx of Greeks into Palestine, the constant presence of a large Roman element, civil and military, the mixed retinue attached to the Herodian court, the increase of trade, the importation of foreign workmen, the presence in several towns of companies of gladiators, actors, and the like,—would necessitate not only inns, but various kinds and grades of inns.

There were inns built on a large scale, comfortable and elegant, suited for high officials (cf. Ant. vi. 123 where Menelaus is entertained by a king of the Nabataeans). There were also inns of a more modest character, where the poor could find shelter (cf. Ant. x. 123 where Herod the Great was celebrating games). As there were inns of various grades and other visitors at the public inns (cf. Ant. x. 123), on the other hand, there were inns of the lowest description. A Jewish port of Callaria (Ant. vi. 123) had a number of taverns for sailors (cf. Ant. vi. 123). The numerous Talmudic references to inns (where, of course, food was used with some degree of caution) indicate that they were a distinctive feature of social life, e.g. 'a public inn in which bread is sold and given' (Aboda Zara, v. 3); 'An Israelite and a heathen may dine at an inn drinking wine' (ibid.); 'R. Papa used to stand outside the store of the heathen and drink his beer' (ibid. 4). R. Ishmael bar Jose declared that his father used to pray in an inn (Ber. iv. 7); 'Cattle must not be placed in the inns of heathen' (Aboda Zara, ii. 1).

There can be little doubt that there were numerous taverns where food as well as drink could be obtained (cf. Franz Delitzsch, Jewish Artisan Life in the Time of Christ, p. 47). Not only heathen were innkeepers, but Jews; not only men, but women. 'A Jewish woman dealing in wine once left her keys in charge of a heathen, and the question came up whether her wine she has in the tavern is allowed' (Aboda Zara, v. 3).

Julicher (Gleichnisse, ii p. 590; cf. Bertholet, * See Talm. Bab. Kethub 105a, Jerus Megilla, 78d (although, of course, the 400 is a characteristic exaggeration).

Die Stellung der Israeliten und der Juden zu den Fremden, p. 24) rightly maintains that the inn of Lk 10<sup>34</sup>, to which the good Samaritan took his patient, was a hostelry ('nicht bloß Caravanseraison sondern Gasthaus'). The word used in this passage (πανδοχείον) is significant. It was taken over into Rabbinic Hebrew, and is the usual word (panḏōḥayōn) for 'inn' in the Talmud. The Greek name shows that inns were largely a product of the Hellenistic period (see Schurer, HJP II. i. 33). Other Rabbinic terms, אכסניא and אכסניא, are equivalents of hospitium and ξενία; and as these terms are OT terms אכסניא and אכסניא, they seem to indicate that something is intended quite different from the khan of the lonely road or the caravanserai of wayfaring men in the wilderness' (Jer 9).

It is difficult to fix the exact meaning of κατάλυμα, the other word used in the NT for 'inn'. Etymologically, it means 'the place where burdens were loosed for the night.' In Lk 27 it is generally taken to mean an inn of the khan type. Polybius uses it in the plural form (II. xxxvi. 1). Diodorus (xiv. 93) relates that the Romans, in gratitude for the services of one Timasitheus, granted him δημόσιον κατάλυμα.* The κατάλυμα of Mk 14<sup>14</sup> and Lk 22<sup>11</sup>, where the Last Supper was eaten, is supposed to have been a private house (H. B. art. 'Inn'); and the use of the verb καταλύω, as in Lk 19<sup>7</sup>, is quite in keeping with this. Nothing very definite, however, can be deduced from these names as to the precise character of the place of lodging.

Did Jesus Himself ever enter or stay at inns? It is usually assumed that His disciples always provided hospitality for Him. Yet the only recorded cases in which He accepted it are those of Peter's house at Capernaum and the house at Bethany. The words, 'the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head' (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>33</sup>), suggest that hospitality was not always forthcoming. We know that it was not in Samaria (Lk 9<sup>4</sup>) and among the Gerasenes (8<sup>7</sup>). During a considerable part of the year it would be no hardship to spend the night in the open air, and apparently Jesus often preferred this, that He might have opportunity for quiet prayer, and more privacy than would be possible in a house or an inn. (Cf. J. L. Porter, Great Cities of Bashan, 1866, pp. 157-159; also, for the habits of St. Francis and his followers, P. Sabatier, Vie, 1894, p. 88 f.). There is, however, no reason against His having resorted upon occasion to places of public entertainment. These were sometimes kept by Jews; but, if kept by a Gentile, this would not necessarily deter Him from going in. Strict Jews objected to entering the house of a Gentile, lest they should incur defilement (Jn 18<sup>28</sup>, cf. Hausrath, Hist. NT Times, ii. 85); but Jesus, while recognizing that His mission was to Jews primarily, never allowed His action to be limited by ceremonial considerations. For instance, He did not hesitate, in spite of protest, to visit the house of Zacchæus, and the freedom of His intercourse with all kinds of people brought on Him the charge of being a 'wine-bibber,' and of consorting with the lowest classes (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup>). His desire to seek 'the lost' suggests that He would not avoid the places where these were most likely to be found.

In this connexion it is interesting to note that the Talmud has the following passage: 'In the time of the Messiah the people will be impudent, and be given to drinking, public-houses will flourish, and the vine will be dear' (Sota, quoted in M'Cintock and Strong's Cyc., art. 'Inn').

The reputation of inns seems to have been generally bad; they were very often houses of ill-fame, and hostesses were looked upon with suspicion.

Yet some of the larger inns would bear a better character and be centres of influence, and there is no reason why Jesus should not have visited them. In most countries and periods the itinerant preacher has found the public inn to be a soil where the Gospel readily take root. (Cf. Fox, Journal, 1901, vol. I. pp. 118, 261, 258; Wesley, Journal, under March 1738; Borrow, Bible in Spain, passim).

INNOCENCE.—Innocence, strictly speaking, denotes the entire absence of sin in a human soul. As such, in its primary meaning, we have no personal experience of it in ourselves or in others. 'For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God' (Ro 3<sup>23</sup>). We can, therefore, have no actual knowledge of what would be the effect of this quality upon a human character. In this sense it is an attribute of Jesus Christ alone among men, who 'was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (He 4<sup>15</sup>); 'who knew no sin' (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>); who could address to His watchful foes the challenge, 'Which of you convicteth me of sin?' (Jn 8<sup>46</sup>). The gulf between innocence and the state of the soul that has once committed sin can be realized only as we comprehend the nature of sin and its immeasurable depravity and consequences. See art. SINLESSNESS. (For the subject of our Lord's innocence of the charges which led to His crucifixion, see art. TRIAL OF JESUS CHRIST).

Innocence in a comparative sense may be attributed to men who, though fallen, are yet, in respect of particular sins, innocent, or who from circumstances of upbringing, or by the grace of God, are shielded from that sin by personal experience which is the common lot of men. Such a man was John the Baptist, who 'was in the deserts until the day of his showing unto Israel' (Lk 1<sup>80</sup>). It has been said that there are only two states of life open to the man who wishes to serve God. The one is the state of innocence, the other of experience. John the Baptist may be taken as a type of the one, St. Peter of the other. It must not be supposed that innocence implies ignorance or weakness. If John the Baptist, in whose life no fall is recorded, the essence of whose career is one unbroken record of devotion to the service of God, be taken as a type of innocence, he is pre-eminently the stern masculine type of character, and he displayed great knowledge of men and power of dealing with the varied temptations of soldiers, pathos and professors of religion.

The temptation specially addressed to innocence is the knowledge of evil as well as good (Gn 3<sup>5</sup>), but the experience of evil which entails the irrecoverable loss of innocence is not wisdom in the true sense of the word. 'The knowledge of wickedness is not wisdom' (Sir 19<sup>22</sup>). Innocence possesses an intuitive perception of right and wrong, observable in the child, which becomes blunted by the indulgence of sin; it also implies a strength which is lost by a fall. Each successive lapse from innocence makes the soul weaker in that particular direction in which the fall has taken place.

INNOCENTS.—In Mt 21<sup>18-19</sup> we find the narrative of what is called the Massacre of the Innocents. Adopting the language of Jer 31<sup>15</sup>, the Evangelist represents Rachel, the ancestral mother of the people of Israel, as weeping over the cruel death of her children. Herod the Great, hearing from the Magi about the birth of a king of the Jews, foreshadowed by the star in the East which they had followed, inquired of the chief priests and scribes where this promised prince should be born. They quoted to him the words of Micah (5<sup>2</sup>), who speaks of the governor ruling Israel, who is to come out of Bethlehem in Judah, the city of David. When the Magi, having offered their gifts before the young child at Bethlehem, refused to inform Herod, but returned to their own country another way, the enraged king gave orders that all the children from two years old and under should be slain. This was done with much cruelty, so that in Bethlehem and the surrounding country there was great lamentation.

The truth of this story has been questioned. The chief ground is the silence of Josephus on the subject. While he speaks of many cruel deeds of Herod, he passes this one by. But it is plainly quite of a piece with Herod's well-known character, and, indeed, compared with his other deeds of monstrous cruelty, it would easily escape notice. The whole number of victims, probably not more than twenty or thirty, would not make a very great sensation at that time. Besides, the whole of Josephus' statements in regard to the Messianic expectations and doings of his time are to be looked upon with some suspicion, for he seems to have been afraid to make many clear and direct allusions to those matters. See INFANCY.

The deed illustrates well Herod's general character for cruelty and short-sighted folly. But . . . to defeat the purposes of God with His people turn out to be vain. Joseph, warned in a dream by the angel, took Mary and the young child hastily down to Egypt, where they could calmly await the death of the tyrant. He . . . soon fell on the blood-stained us . . . many inhuman crimes, and he . . . earth under the maledictions of . . . people.

INSIGHT.—In ordinary literary usage the word 'in-sight' is employed to signify the intellectual apprehension of the cause or processes to which an object or event owes its origin, as distinguished from the mere perception of the object or event itself. We get an insight into the working of a steam-engine, e.g., when we have mastered the principles of engineering, or into some great . . . when the various motives that . . . minds of the statesmen who took part in it are revealed to us. Insight is also used to designate the faculty that penetrates into the causes that lie behind appearances. A man of . . . is a man of quick discernment of . . . at determine the appearance of th . . . its that are recurrent in the business or intercourse of life. A man of political insight is a man who instinctively understands what the community will think, desire, or do at any particular period or special conjunction of circumstances.

In the spiritual or metaphysical sphere, 'insight' has the same double meaning. It is the immediate apprehension of the spiritual significance of truths that can be stated as objective facts. It is also the faculty of the higher reason which intuitively grasps this spiritual significance. Goethe says: 'There are men who put their knowledge in the place of insight.' Here the word is used in the first sense of intuitive apprehension of spiritual truth. 'Jealousy to resist metaphor,' says Francis Newman, 'does not testify to depth of insight.' Here it is the faculty that is referred to. The limits or even the precise nature of this faculty of insight have never been . . . used of those subtle . . . the syllogistic reason but with which all are more or less . . . in experience. It is used also to designate . . . faculty of the soul through which the . . . to attain to the immediate cognition of the Absolute in its pure being.

Generally it may be said that, in the religious meaning of the word, insight is direct perception of, or the faculty of the soul that perceives, the spiritual order that lies behind phenomena. Sight sees the visible, the phenomenal; insight grasps the invisible, the noumenal. The very definition involves a theory. It implies that there is in the universe a spiritual order, of which man is a constituent element, to perceive; that the noumenal is real, and that what is called immediate . . . of it conveys genuine knowledge, . . . can be relied upon as a safe guide . . . clear that this theory cannot be proved by any of the ordinary processes of reasoning, seeing it is the result of an immediate cognition which is valid only for the individual. Sight carries its own evidence; and insight, which is the higher sight, must do the same. Truths which come to us through . . . press themselves home to the . . . conviction, must prove themselves in experience by their power of explaining the facts and solving the problems of life. Experience must be the ultimate test of reality. Truths of insight are the postulates of experience. The soul recognizes its immediate cognitions as corresponding with reality, because they are necessary to make its experience rational.

It is a characteristic of Jesus that with Him sight is insight. The spiritual vision is to Him so clear that it is unnecessary to designate the faculty or its object by another term. Jesus is the only-begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>)—the Logos which was with God and which was God (v. 1). Jesus sees God as no man can see Him, for human vision of God can only be through the light with which He illumines the soul (v. 18). Because of this unique relation with the ultimate spiritual Reality, His insight into the nature of God is a clear and open vision. The claims He makes, therefore, as to His intimate union with God are the outcome of a . . . consciousness which is part of His . . . It is similar to our own assurance of selfhood. When Jesus says, 'I and the Father are one' (10<sup>30</sup>), He is as certain of the fact as when we say, 'I am I.' For Jesus is living in a realm where the object of consciousness is not deflected and refracted by the illusions of sense or the distortions of passion, but where the spirit sees things as they are. It is the realm of pure Reality. There the soul sees what is, not what seems to be. And, further, Jesus thus living in the Absolute and Eternal, sees the lives of men and the processes of history purely in the light of their spiritual issues. What touches His consciousness in the great human drama is the hidden movement that is working out human destiny. With Him the fact is merely the symbol, and the symbol has become so luminous that His vision is always of the spiritual processes of which it is an indication. Browning in the Epistle of Karshish, the Arab Physician, has made a daring attempt to get into a consciousness similar to that of Jesus, by trying to imagine how a man whose soul had assimilated the pure spiritual environment of heaven, would feel and act were he permitted to come back to earth and to envisage life from the standpoint of the new experience. It would be—

'Heaven opened to a soul while yet on earth, Earth forced on a soul's use while seeing heaven.'

The attempt is strikingly suggestive, but Lazarus remains a man with a finite soul, who cannot find his true function in what is now an alien environment. With Jesus this spiritual consciousness was so perfect that it mastered its alien environment and moved through it calmly and serenely, indicating its true place in the Divine purpose, and giving the right interpretation to all its manifestations. The teaching of Jesus is thus a key to the meaning of life, because He sees life in its essence, and has a sure insight into those hidden processes that are evolving the visible order of existence.

And again, from His very nature, the insight of Jesus into the individual souls of men is no less sure and unerring. He reads the human soul like an open book. He needed not that any should testify of man, for He knew what was in man (Jn 2<sup>25</sup>). He could trace accurately the working of the ideas He was instilling into the minds of His disciples, as they mingled with their own crude religious conceptions (6<sup>61</sup>). He understood perfectly the feeling of instinctive resistance that arose within the minds of the Pharisees at the impact of spiritual truth upon the hard crust of an artificial religionism which had become part of their very nature (Lk 6<sup>8</sup>, Mt 12<sup>25</sup>). And He recognized the uprising of a pure spiritual emotion in the hearts even of the Pharisees when it was spontaneous and genuine (Lk 6<sup>9</sup>). He could repress and discourage the most fervent offer of devotion when He detected in it a vein of insincerity (9<sup>57-58</sup>). It was this insight into human nature which was the secret of His amazing power over men in the days of His flesh. It is a faculty possessed by men in very varying degrees. Its accuracy and intensity depend upon the richness of a man's nature—upon his knowledge of and sympathy with the gamut of human emotion. There have been many men of wonderful insight, and therefore of strong personal magnetism. But man's insight is always obscured by individual bias and by the obstruction of the medium of sense which conceals the soul's working. Men are always more or less deceived, and even men of the keenest insight often break down in their reading of character at the point where it is most essential for them to be right. Jesus was perfect man, and therefore His sympathy with men was full and entire, and touched human nature at every point. For Jesus, who viewed human life in the light of eternity, the sense-medium did not exist. It was the spirit that was always before His vision, and therefore His knowledge of the human heart was instinctive and unerring. Hence it was that the method of Jesus in dealing with diverse types of character is so full of suggestiveness and instruction.

This conception of the consciousness of Jesus must be kept clearly in mind when we study His sayings. His is a consciousness that moves freely in the realm of pure Reality, and visualizes God, human destiny, and the individual soul in the light of their eternal relations. Hence those marvellous revelations of the essence of the Divine Nature in its correspondence to human needs and human aspirations. Hence, too, it results that it is the spiritual meaning of human actions alone that gives them value to Him, and the measure of their value is the degree of spiritual vitality they indicate. Thus Jesus continually reverses the valuations of the world, which are based on the theory of the reality of the objects of sense-perception. He that is greatest among men is he that is the servant of all (Mk 9<sup>35</sup>). The two mites thrown by the widow into the Temple treasury are a more magnificent offering than the costly gifts of the Pharisees, because they have a greater degree of sacrifice (12<sup>43-44</sup>). The anointing of Mary in breaking over the head of Jesus the alabaster box of very precious ointment, is one of the memorable events of history, because it indicates a fine perception of what is due to the Lord of life at the critical moment of world-development (Mt 26<sup>10-13</sup>, Lk 12<sup>3</sup>). Jesus gives to the penitent thief the assurance of immediate entry into Paradise, because full and adequate penitence for sin is itself the crossing of the threshold of the spiritual realm (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>). If this clue be rigorously applied, it solves many of the difficulties that beset a literal exegesis of the words of Jesus. It is especially significant when we study His sayings and utterances. Here the difficulty of interpretation frequently lies in the fact that the commentator often attempts to force upon them a materialistic meaning that was never intended. The material is material, and has been so since the beginning of time. It is used to describe the phenomena of the material world, but it must be detached from the medium of conveyance, if they are to be rightly understood. Jesus lived in the noumenal world. What He saw there He could convey to the souls of His hearers only by the use of words that had been coined to connote totally different conceptions. When Nathanael, struck by Jesus' recognition of him under the fig-tree, hails Him as the Son of God, Jesus says: 'Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? . . . Verily, verily, I say unto you, If ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man' (Jn 1<sup>50-51</sup>). AV translates an' apri 'here'. The words were evidently dominated by the idea that Jesus is describing a physical marvel which Nathanael will witness in the distant future. But Jesus clearly means that the intercourse of Nathanael with Himself will bring heaven to his soul, and enable him to realize that a living link of communication has been established between God and man.

The words of Jesus regarding death, judgment, His second coming, and the life to come, can be interpreted with a precision, even although they are not mere metaphors, for a metaphor is rarely, if ever, the exact counterpart of the idea it illustrates. Jesus is dwelling in eternity and contemplating the processes of the material world, and He conveys to the receptive soul the only medium at His command the impression He Himself receives from His direct vision of the truth He is envisaging. The medium is of value only in so far as it serves its purpose. To the irresponsible soul it has no meaning or value at all. To the soul that has the faculty of vision the words are luminous, and reveal God's secrets. There is no question here of metaphor except in so far as nine-tenths of spoken words are metaphorical. There is nothing overstrained or untrue.

The bearing of this on the doctrine of Revelation cannot here be overlooked. Revelation is insight in its intensest form. The revelation granted to the prophets in OT times was their insight into the meaning of God's ways, their vision of the spiritual processes through which the higher life of humanity is evolved. The revelation granted to the Apostles was their response to the brilliancy of the light that streamed from the Eternal Word during the brief period of His Incarnation. Jesus reveals because He is the Light of the world. He never argues. He knows nothing of the dialectic process in pressing home the higher truths to the soul. He sees and He would have others to see, and only in so far as they see in Him capable of blessing them (Jn 12<sup>44-46</sup>). It follows that all revelation is personal, and incommunicable from one man to another. Only the Triune God is the Revealer of the spiritual mystery. A written revelation is thus, in the strict sense, not a revelation, but a record of a series of revelations that were given to men of insight, men who possessed the faculty of vision. Its purpose is not to reveal, but to put the soul in an attitude of expectancy by telling what other men have seen. It is the Holy Spirit that quickens the soul and conveys the gift of vision to which alone Divine Truth can be revealed. Thus is everywhere the doctrine of Scripture, and has never been more clearly or beautifully stated than in the Westminster Confession of Faith (ch. i. par. 5).

Jesus invariably attaches a certain attitude apart from which nothing can be known. It is the pure in heart who see God (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>). It is the doer of God's will who alone can judge of the truth of His doctrine (Jn 7<sup>16-17</sup>). The sin of the Pharisees is that they are blind while they think they see (9<sup>4</sup>). No matter with what brilliancy the light may shine, so long as the spiritual orb is darkened it can reveal nothing of the wonders of the spirit-land (12<sup>3</sup>). And St. Paul says that no man knoweth the things of God; it is the Spirit of God alone who knoweth them; and only in so far as the spirit of man is illumined by the Spirit of God can they be revealed to him (1 Co 2<sup>11</sup>). Only when the Divine in man meets and mingles with the Divine that is without and around him can there result that spiritual certainty which is revelation.

Insight, then, in the spiritual sense of the term (which is the sense in which it is generally used), links itself on to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit (wh. see). It is the Light that lighteth every man that entereth the world; for we must assume that in germ at least, is universal as humanity, otherwise there would be some to whom religion is impossible. But it is given in varying degrees, and is conditioned by varying environments. The visions it sees are not always of reality, for the medium through which it looks is often obscured by earthly passions and prejudices. But when it does see right into the heart of things, it enunciates truths to which the soul clings as essential to its very life.

INSPIRATION.—The term employed to denote the action of the Divine Spirit upon the writers of Scripture. Literally signifying a breathing into, it has the secondary meaning of breathing a certain spirit into the mind or soul, and is therefore naturally employed to express the influence of God upon the sacred writers. 'Inspiration in general is the influence of one person upon another. Divine inspiration is the influence of the Divine Person upon the human' (Wood, A Tenable Theory of Insp. p. 10). In Scripture itself we find the idea in Hos 5<sup>7</sup> (LXX) expressed by the word πνευματόφορος—though in this case the inspiration was not Divine. In the NT 2 P 1<sup>21</sup> similarly πνεύματος ἀγίου φερόμενοι. In non-Christian literature inspired men are spoken of as θεοδιδάκτοι, θεόφοροι, θεοφοροίμενοι, θεόδοχοι, θεόπνευστοι, ἐνθεοί, ἐπίπνοοι, ζαλχόμενοι, μαυόμενοι, divino numine afflati, inspirati, fuicati. The use of the word 'inspiration' to express the Divine factor in Scripture is probably derived from the fact that the words of 2 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> πᾶσα γραφή θεόπνευστος are rendered in the Vulgate 'omnis Scriptura divinitus inspirata.' The definition given by Lee (Insp. p. 27 f) is sufficient as conveying the general idea attached to the word. 'By inspiration I understand that actuating energy of the Holy Spirit, in whatever degree or manner it may have been exercised, guided by which the human agents chosen by God have officially proclaimed His will by word of mouth, or have committed to writing the several portions of the Bible.' Sanday's explanation of the word is excellent. 'Just as one particular branch of one particular stock was chosen to be in a general sense the recipient of a clearer revelation than was vouchsafed to others, so within that branch certain individuals were chosen to have their hearts and minds moved in a manner more penetrating and more effective than their fellows, with the result that their written words convey to us truths about the nature of God and His dealings with man which other writings do not convey with equal fulness, power, and purity. We say that this special moving is due to the action upon those hearts and minds of the Holy Spirit. And we call that action Inspiration' (Bampton Lect. p. 127). Or we may say that as God revealed Himself in creation, in the history of His people, and especially in Jesus Christ, He also enabled certain persons to perceive and express the significance of that revelation; and this ability is what we mean by inspiration. It is claimed not only for our Scriptures, but for other sacred books of the world. The Vedas, the books of Zoroaster and of the Buddhists, the Koran, all rest their claim to be received on the belief that they proceed from a Divine source. Even where tribes are too uncivilized to possess sacred writings, there exists a belief that God makes known His mind through dreams, oracles, or inspired individuals; and the presence and influence of God is frequently spoken of as an afflatus, the blowing of a breath or wind upon the inspired person. To the idea that knowledge is supernaturally conveyed to persons who are not in the historic line of Scriptural revelation, sanction is given in the OT by the instances of Abimelech, Pharaoh, and Balaam. And while in the sacred books of the world there is a great deal that is superstitious, contemptible, and false, there is also much that illustrates man's need of God, and much also to show that God responds to that thirst. We naturally expect to find a fuller inspiration in those who were in touch with, and were called to record, the great progressive historical revelation which culminated in Christ; but we need not therefore deny all Divine response and assistance to those who on other lines were setting their faces Godwards.

1. THE CLAIM OF SCRIPTURE TO BE INSPIRED.—The OT was accepted as inspired both by the NT writers and by all their Jewish contemporaries. At that date certain of the books eventually included in the OT had not been definitely admitted to canonical authority; but, speaking generally, the writings of the OT were universally held to be Divine, and in some true sense the word of God. On this there is abundant evidence.

(a) Our Lord Himself appeals to the OT as a final authority (Mt 19<sup>4</sup>, Jn 5<sup>46</sup>). He refers to it as the prophetic index to, and justification of, the providential dealings of God (Lk 24<sup>4</sup>, Jn 10<sup>35</sup>). Expressly, in citing Ps 110, He introduces the quotation with the words, 'David himself by the Holy Spirit said' (αὐτὸς Δαυὶδ εἶπεν ἐν τῷ πνεύματι τῷ ἁγίῳ), Mk 12<sup>36</sup>. And significantly in adducing the Law in contrast to the traditions of the elders, the highest human authority. He altogether neglects the human writer, the writer, and simply says, 'For God said' (Mt 15<sup>4</sup>). His personal reliance upon Scripture is visible in His use of it as His defence in the stress of temptation (Mt 4<sup>7-10</sup>) and as the authentication of His ministry (Lk 4<sup>17-21</sup>). It was the OT which preserved the knowledge of the marvellous history of which He recognized Himself to be the culmination. In it He met all that was Divine in the past, and acknowledged the regulating Divine Spirit.

(b) As the Master, so with the disciples. In the First Gospel the writer has ever in his eye τὸ ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ κυρίου διὰ τοῦ προφήτου (1<sup>22</sup>). In their first independent action the disciples were determined by their belief that they must fulfil the Scripture ἣν προσέειπεν τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον διὰ στόματος Δαυὶδ (Ac 1<sup>16</sup>, cf. 28<sup>25</sup>). For St. Paul as for St. Peter the utterances of the OT are the λόγια θεοῦ (Ro 3<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>11</sup>). 'It is written' is the ultimate authority. The Scripture is identified with God, so that St. Paul can say (Ro 9<sup>17</sup>) 'the scripture saith unto Pharaoh'; and it is God who speaks in the prophets (9<sup>25</sup>). In the Epistle to the Hebrews the same conception of Scripture prevails. Quotations are introduced with the formula, 'the Holy Spirit saith'; and the revelation of Christ is but the completion of the revelation of the OT. It was God who spoke in the prophets (He 1<sup>1</sup>). The very titles under which the OT Scriptures are designated sufficiently manifest the belief that they were written under the inspiration of God. (For these titles, see Ryle, Canon of OT, p. 302).

(c) As representative of contemporary Jewish thought it is enough to cite Philo and Josephus. The former explicitly affirms the inspiration of Moses, speaking of him as 'that perfect mind which received at once the gift of legislation and of prophecy with Divinely inspired wisdom' (ῥήτω σοφία, de Congr. Erud. c. 24, ed. Mangey, i. 538) and as καταπνευσθεὶς ὑπ' ἑρωτος οὐρανίου (de Vita Mos., Mangey, ii. 145). To Isaiah and Jeremiah 'as members of the prophetic choir,' he expressly ascribes inspiration (τοῦ προφητικοῦ θιασώτης χοροῦ, de καταπνευσθεὶς ἐνθουσιῶν ἀνεφθέρχεται, de Conf. Ling. c. 12 Mangey i. 411). Josephus is equally explicit. Citing with Philo the universal esteem for the OT, he bases this esteem on the belief that the authors of the various books wrote under the influence of the Divine Spirit (Ant. iv. viii. 49, iii. v. 4, x. ii. 2; cf. c. Apion. i. 7).

No belief of later Judaism was more universal or constant than this acceptance of the OT Scriptures as inspired. 'Die heilige Schrift ist entstanden durch Inspiration des heiligen Geistes, stammt also von Gott selbst ab, der in ihr redet.' This statement of Weber's (Lehren d. Talmud, p. 78) is amply justified by the passages he cites, as, e.g., 'He who affirms that the Thora is not from heaven, has no part in the future world' (Sanhed. x. 1). Bousset (Die Religion d. Judentums p. 125) reaches the same conclusion: 'Die heiligen Schriften sind nach jüdischem Dogma inspiriert.'

This belief in the inspiration of the OT was the natural and inevitable result of the phenomena it presented; and was not, as has sometimes been suggested, the mere reflexion of the vague idea that all ancient writings, especially if poetical, were inspired.* Moses is represented as speaking face to face with God and as receiving the Law from Him. The prophets demand attention to their words by prefacing them with the announcement, 'Thus saith the Lord.' In Ex 4<sup>10-12</sup>, Is 59<sup>21</sup>, Jer 1<sup>9</sup> the equipment of the prophet is described by the expression, 'I have put my words in thy mouth.' From these two phenomena it was a necessary inference that at any rate the Law and the Prophets were inspired. Prof. Sanday (Insp. p. 128) justly remarks that 'the prophetic inspiration seems to be a type of all inspiration.' It is perhaps the one mode in which the most distinctive features of Biblical inspiration can be most clearly recognized. It must, however, also be borne in mind that among the Jews themselves it was the Law, rather than the Prophets, which satisfied, and perhaps suggested, their idea of inspiration. Latterly they went so far as to say that, had the Law found in Israel recipients worthy of it, nothing beyond would have been required. The Law itself was a perfect and complete revelation, and neither Prophets nor Hagiographa were indispensable (see passages in Weber, Lehren d. Talm. p. 79). The response of conscience to the Law confirmed the traditional accounts of its origin, and the belief in its inspiration was inevitable. Possibly it was the belief that the whole OT was normative that prompted the usage by which even the Prophets and the Psalms were cited in the NT as 'the Law' (see Jn 15<sup>25</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>21</sup>, Ro 3<sup>19</sup>).

The inspiration of the NT stands on a somewhat different footing. The supreme instance of inspiration is our Lord Himself (Lk 4<sup>17-21</sup>); and He is also its source to His followers. At His Baptism, Jesus was formally called to, and equipped for, His ministry; and His equipment consisted in His receiving the fulness of the Holy Spirit. Under the influence of this Spirit all His works were done and all His words spoken. 'He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God, for he giveth not the Spirit by measure' (Jn 3<sup>34</sup>); 'My teaching is not mine, but his that sent me' (7<sup>10</sup>); 'as the Father hath taught me, I speak these things' (8<sup>28</sup>). And it is His words, spoken under the influence of the Divine Spirit, that form the nucleus of the NT Canon. They were the first portion of that Canon to be recognized as authoritative, and however difficult certain writings found it to gain access to the Canon, the words of our Lord were from the first, and universally, regarded as Divine by all Christians.

But those whom He appointed to be His witnesses as to the world the significance of His teaching, required above all else the inspiration of the Author of salvation. This was promised, and reiteratedly promised to them. The presence of the Divine Spirit was not only to prompt and support them on occasions, as when they were summoned before magistrates (Mk 13<sup>11</sup>, Mt 10<sup>20</sup>, Lk 12<sup>11</sup>), but as the Spirit of truth He was promised as the very substitute of Christ Himself: 'He shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you' (Jn 14<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>13</sup>). This promise cannot be understood as meant to assure the disciples that they would be able to recall every word their Lord had said; as little as this assurance is conveyed to all Christians by the words of St. John (1 Jn 2<sup>27</sup>), 'His anointing teacheth you concerning all things.' At the same time it was meant to encourage them to believe that their sympathy with their Lord and their acceptance of His Spirit would give them a sufficient remembrance and understanding of His teaching.

That this promise was fulfilled is certain. The relation of the risen Lord to His Church, His presence with those who represented Him, and the aid He afforded them in accomplishing His purposes, compel the conclusion that His Spirit dwelt in those who taught and built up the Church by word and letter. Those who preached the gospel discharged their function 'with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven' (1 P 1<sup>12</sup>). Of this the outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost was the earnest. In guiding the Church the aid of this * Cf. Hatch, Hibbert Lect. p. 51.

Spirit was experienced (Ac 13<sup>25</sup> etc.) In writing to the Galatians, St. Paul claims to have been instructed by the Lord in the gospel he preached. In 2 Co 13<sup>3</sup> he is prepared to give 'a proof of Christ that speaketh in me.' And even in less essential matters regarding which he can claim no definite instructions or revelation, he yet in the exercise of his own powers believes himself to be guided by the Spirit (1 Co 7<sup>40</sup>). In his enumeration of the various manifestations of the Spirit, the writing of sacred books, it is true, finds no place, neither do the writers of the Gospels claim to be inspired. But 'the word of wisdom,' 'the word of knowledge,' the charism of the prophet and the teacher, may quite reasonably, if not even necessarily, be supposed to include written as well as spoken discourse.

2. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CLAIM TO BE INSPIRED, OR THE MEANING AND EFFECTS OF INSPIRATION.—Several opinions or theories present themselves. And in determining which of these is correct, we must be guided not by a priori ideas of the results which must flow from inspiration, but only by the phenomena presented in the Bible; in other words, by the actual effects of inspiration as these are seen in the writings of inspired men. 'What inspiration is must be learned from what it does. . . . We must not determine the character of the books from the inspiration, but must rather determine the nature of the inspiration from the books' (Bowne's Christian Revelation, p. 45).

(1) The 'mechanical' or 'dictation' theory, or theory of verbal inspiration.—This is the theory that in writing the books of Scripture the human author was merely the mouthpiece of the Divine, and that therefore every word in the Bible as truly represents the mind of God as if He had dictated it. 'Facts, doctrines, precepts, references to history or chronology, quotations from writers sacred or profane, allusions to scientific truth, visions or prophetic declamations, mere references to the most ordinary actions of life, according to this view, are not the work of man but of Omniscience. The only use which has been made of human agency in the book has been to copy down with pen, ink, and paper what has been dictated by the Divine Spirit.' Absolute inerrancy is on this theory presumed to be the result of inspiration. As one of its defenders says: 'God employed men in writing. But these men were so controlled by Him, that He is the Author of the writing; and so the Author, that any charge of inaccuracy against the record, or Scripture, as originally given, must be charged against Him' (Kennedy, The Doctrine of Inspiration, p. 6). To use the common way of putting it, the writers were 'the pens, not the penmen' of God. They were possessed by God, so that it was not so much their own mind and their own experience, but the mind of God that was represented in their writings.*

This theory has all the prestige which antiquity can give it, for it runs back to those primitive stages of civilization in which possession by a deity was produced by inhaling fumes, or by violent dancing and contortions. This frenzied state being induced, the words spoken were believed to be Divine. The theory has also the prestige which is conferred by the advocacy of great names. Plato countenanced the idea that the inspired man is so possessed by the Divine that his words and thoughts are not his own. In the Timæus (p. 71) and in the Phædrus (p. 244) he maintains that when a man receives the inspired word, either his intelligence is enthralled in sleep, or he is demented by some distemper or possession. The relation of the Divine to the human is viewed quantitatively. As the Divine comes in, the human must go out and make room for it. It was probably through Philo that this view came into the Church. Philo's account of it is quite explicit. 'A prophet,' he says, 'gives forth nothing of his own, but acts as interpreter at the prompting of another in all his utterances; and as long as he is under inspiration he is in ignorance, his reason departing from its place and yielding up the citadel of his soul, when the Divine Spirit enters into it and dwells in it, and strikes at the mechanism of his voice, sounding through it to the clear declaration of that which he prophesieth' (de Sp. Legg. ii. 343, quoted in Sanday's Insp. p. 74). Again (in the tract Quis rer. div. i. 511) Philo explains that 'so long as we are masters of ourselves we are not possessed; but when our own mind ceases to shine, inspiration and madness lay hold on us. For the Divine Spirit, but is restored to its own dwelling when that Spirit is ousted on the mortal; for it is unlawful that mortal dwell in the Divine.' A theory identical with or similar to this of Philo's has been largely held in the Church.

There are also expressions in the NT which seem, at first sight, to countenance such a theory. In Mt 5<sup>18</sup> our Lord is reported as saying: 'Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in nowise pass from the law, till all things be accomplished.' But, as the context shows, that which our Lord intimates in these words is that it was in Himself the Law and the Prophets were to find their fulfilment. Immediately upon giving utterance to this saying He Himself proceeds to repeal commandments of the Law, substituting for them His own better principles, and thus showing that what He had in view was not Scripture as Scripture. Another passage which to the superficial reader might seem to countenance this theory is that in which St. Paul contrasts the wisdom of God with the wisdom of men (1 Co 2<sup>1-16</sup>). After speaking of the things revealed by the Spirit of God, he says, 'which things we also speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth' (v. 13). But a consideration of the passage makes it apparent that what he means is that he had arrived at the conclusion that his style of address should be in keeping with his subject, and that 'the mystery of God' did not require the garnishing of rhetorical ornament or anything which the world might esteem as 'excellency of wisdom,' but such simplicity and directness as the Holy Spirit prompted. He is contrasting two methods, two styles, the worldly and the spiritual, and he is justifying the style he himself adopted. To conclude from this that St. Paul considered that every word he spoke was dictated by infallible wisdom is quite illegitimate.

This mechanical theory is beset by grave difficulties. (a) Inspiration and dictation are, as has more than once been pointed out, two different, even mutually exclusive, operations. Dictation precludes inspiration, leaving no room for any spiritual influence. Inspiration precludes dictation, making the prompting of words unnecessary by the communication of the right spirit.

(b) It is irreconcilable with the phenomena presented in Scripture. The authors, instead of being passive recipients of information and ideas and feelings, represent themselves as active, deliberating, laborious, intensely interested. The material used by the historical writers has been derived from written sources, or, as in the case of the Third Gospel, from careful critical inquiry at the most reliable witnesses. They do not tell us that their knowledge of events had been supernaturally imparted, but either that they themselves had seen what they relate, or that they had it from trustworthy sources. The Apostles were inspired witnesses of Christ, and proclaimed what they had seen and heard. But if supernatural information was even more abundantly given, why should they have been chosen only from those who had been with our Lord during His ministry? 'If they did not really remember those facts or discourses when they asserted their reality, they are found false witnesses of God. If they were the mere dictation of the Spirit to their minds, St. Peter's declaration which he made to the Jewish Council, "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard," would have to be corrected into, "We cannot but speak the things which the Spirit has introduced into our minds"' (Row, Insp. p. 154). Similarly, if the intense emotions expressed in the Psalms or in the Epp. of St. Paul are the outpouring of human sorrow and human experience, they at once become artificial and false. When St. Paul in 2 Co 11<sup>17</sup> says, "That which I speak, I speak not after the Lord, but as in foolishness, in this confidence of boasting," it is intelligible to say that an inspired man is speaking, it is not intelligible to say that this is God speaking. The mind of God is discernible through the words, but it is not the mind of God we are directly in contact with.

(c) Another class of phenomena mentioned by Scripture is inconsistent with this theory. If God be the sole Author, then it is impossible to account for errors in grammar, imperfections of style, discrepancies between one part and another. But such errors, imperfections, and discrepancies exist. The sayings of our Lord are variously reported in the several Gospels. Even in reporting the Lord's Prayer the Evangelists differ. It is impossible to remove from the Book of Acts all disagreement with the Pauline Epistles. And in the disagreement between Peter and Paul at Antioch, we see how possible it was that men equally inspired should hold divergent and even antagonistic opinions upon matters essential to the well-being of the Church. In the face of these discrepancies, it is impossible to suppose that inspiration carries with it literal accuracy of expression.

(d) The manner in which the NT writers quote the OT books proves that while they believed these books to be authoritative and their writers inspired, they did not consider that their inspiration rendered every word they uttered infallible. Taking 275 quotations from the OT in the NT, it has been found that there are only 53 in which the Hebrew, the LXX, and the NT writer agree: while there are 99 passages in which the NT quotation differs both from the Hebrew and from the LXX, which also differ from one another, and 76 in which the correct rendering of the LXX has been erroneously altered.* No doubt when the correct citation of a single word serves the writer's purpose, as in the insistence by St. Paul on the singular instead of the plural (Gal 3<sup>16</sup>), there stress is laid upon the very word; but in the face of the general style of quotation above indicated, it is impossible to believe that inspiration was supposed to make each word infallible.

(2) To escape the psychological and other difficulties of a mechanical, verbal inspiration, other theories have been devised. One of the different values of the various books of Scripture, the Jews themselves supposed that there were three degrees of inspiration corresponding to the tripartite division of the O.T. Attempts were made by the Rabbis, by the schoolmen, and by some modern writers to differentiate between suggestion, direction, superintendence, and elevation. Thus Bishop Daniel Wilson (Evidences of Christianity, i. 506, quoted by Lee) defines as follows: 'By the inspiration of suggestion is meant such communication of the Holy Spirit as suggested and dictated minutely every part of the truths delivered. The inspiration of direction is meant of such assistance as left the writers to describe the matter revealed in their own way, directing only the mind in the exercise of its powers. The inspiration of elevation added a greater strength and vigour to the efforts of the mind than the writers could otherwise have attained. The inspiration of superintendence was that watchful care which preserved every thing being put down derogatory to the revelation with which it was connected.' Obviously this theory is very open to criticism. That there are different degrees of inspiration is true, but it is very doubtful whether any such classification is complete. In this theory there are hints of truth, but not the whole truth.

(3) The so-called dynamical theory brings us somewhat nearer the truth, though it too falls short. This theory is a reaction against the mechanical, and affirms that the human qualities of the writers are not superseded, but are cleansed, strengthened, and employed by the Divine Author.

The Divine influence acted upon man's faculties in accordance with their natural laws'; classical expression is given to this theory in the words of Augustine (in Joan. i. i. 1), 'inspiratus a Deo, sed tamen homo.' The Divine Agent selects suitable media for His communications, and does not try 'to play lyre-music on flutes, and harp-music on trumpets.' The imperfections and weaknesses found in Scripture are human, the truths uttered are Divine. The theory in its most acceptable form, and as held by Erasmus, Grotius, Baxter, Paley, and many modern writers, suggests that the Biblical writers were so inspired as to secure accuracy in all matters of conduct and doctrine, while it leaves them free to use their own style to their perfect accuracy. Hence it is sometimes called

This theory, while it endeavours to recognize the facts of Scripture and to account for them, yet fails to give us an understanding of inspiration. It does not explain, or even attempt to explain, how writers should be possessed of supernatural knowledge while inditing one sentence, and in the next be dropped to a lower level. It fails to give us the psychology of that state of mind which can infallibly pronounce on matters of doctrine while it is as ready on the often simpler facts of history. It makes no attempt to analyze the relation subsisting between the Divine mind and the human which produces such results. Nor does it explain how we are to distinguish essentials from non-essentials, or disentangle the one from the other.

(1) Constructively we may make the following affirmations regarding Inspiration, derived from the facts presented in the Bible:

(a) It is the men, not directly the writings, that were inspired. 'Men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost' (2 P 1<sup>21</sup>). Inspiration does not mean that one inspired thought is magically communicated to a man in the form in which he is to declare it to his fellows, and in no connexion with the previous contents and normal action of his mind. As he sits down to write, he continues in that state of mind and spirit in which he has been living and to which the Spirit of God has brought him. The book he produces is not the abnormal, exceptional product of a unique condition of mind and spirit, but is the natural and spontaneous outflow from the previous experience and thought of the writer. All his past training and knowledge, all his past strivings to yield himself wholly to the Spirit of Christ, enter into what he now produces.

* These statistics are taken from D. McCalman Turpie's OT in the NT, 1863. There are many more quotations than those here given, but these give a fair sample of the whole. A full list of quotations from the OT in the NT, of Westcott and Hort's edition, is given in Westcott and Hort's New Testament in Greek, Vol. II, p. 100. Vetus Test. in Novo gives the statistics, Vol. I, p. 100.

(b) When we say that a writer of Scripture is Divinely inspired, we mean that as he writes he is under the influence of the Holy Spirit. All Christians possess this same Spirit, and are by Him being led into a full knowledge of the truth that is in Christ, to a full perception of that whole revelation of God which is made in Christ; and when some of their number are characterized as inspired, this means that such persons are distinguished above their fellow-Christians by a special readiness and capacity to perceive the meaning of Christ as the revelation of God and to make known what they see.

(c) Inspiration is primarily a spiritual gift, and only secondarily a mental one. The Spirit of God may dwell richly in a man and yet not render him infallible even in matters of religion. In 1 Th 4<sup>9</sup> St. Paul speaks of his converts as θεοδιδάκτοι, but to one end, and that a spiritual not a mental end. Our Lord (Jn 6<sup>45</sup>) applies to all those who come to Him in Spirit the prophetic words, 'They shall be all taught of God,' but no one can suppose that this involves infallible knowledge. It cannot be summarily argued that because God dwells in a man, all that the man speaks partakes of the Divine omniscience. Inspiration operates as any newborn passion, such as maternal love, operates. It does not lift the person out of all limitations, but it seizes upon and uses all the faculties, elevating, refining, and directing to one purpose. It illuminates the mind as enthusiasm does, by stimulating and elevating it; it enriches the memory as love does, by intensifying the interest in a certain object, and by making the mind sensitive to its impressions and retentive of them. It brings light to the understanding and wisdom to the spirit, as purity of intention or a high aim in life does. It brings a man into sympathy with the nature and purposes of God, enables him to see God where others do not see Him, and to interpret His revelations in the same Spirit in which they are given.

LITERATURE.—The history of opinion may partly be traced in Westcott's Introd. to Study of Gospels, Appendix on 'Primitive Doctrine of Israel' in Hengstenberg's Hist. of Doctrine, and in Sanday' and tra teaching is represented Anglican in Fitzjames Stephens Williams (1862).—From the mass of or two religious books may be named: The William Lee, 1854; The Nature Rev. C. A. Row, M.A., 1864; by Gaussen; Insp. and the Bul, at Leopold Theol. of Insp., in Professor Wood, of also the present work The Bul, its Origin and Nature—a strong statement of his views occurs in §§ 125-131. Westcott gives an excellent specimen of moderate opinion in D. & Return of NT, p. 312.

INSURRECTION (στάσις, Mk 15<sup>7</sup>, and Lk 23<sup>18, 25</sup> where AV gives 'sedition') is defined by Plato (Rep. v. 470B) thus: ἐπὶ γὰρ τῇ τοῦ οὐκείου ἔχθρᾳ στάσις κέκληται, ἐπὶ δὲ τῇ τῶν ἀλλοτρίων πόλεμος. Its use in these passages is important as showing that Barabbas was not merely a robber (ληστής, Jn 18<sup>40</sup>), but also a leader in one of those fierce fanatical outbursts which were so common in the last years of the Jewish nation, especially from the accession of Herod. Josephus tells of notable leaders such as Ezekias, his son Judas, and his four grandsons, all of whom were put to death (Ant. XIV. ix. 2, xvii. x. 5, xviii i. 1; BJ II. iv. 1, viii. i, xiii. 5, etc.; cf. Ac 5<sup>3st</sup> 21<sup>38</sup>). Josephus in his account of the final troubles uses ζηλωτής and λῃστής almost as convertible terms. Nothing further is known of this particular στάσις, unless, as Ewald (III vi. 67 f.) suggests, it may have arisen on account of the aqueduct which Pilate had built with money taken from the Temple treasury (Josephus, BJ II. ix. 4; cf. Lk 13<sup>4</sup>). Barabbas may have been moved by patriotic ideas at the first, becoming an outlaw and notorious robber when his rising was suppressed; or he may have used aspirations after freedom merely as a cloak for brigandage (see Westcott, Some Lessons of the Revised Version of the NT, p. 74 f.).* He was 'lying bound with them that had made insurrection' (στασιαστών, v. l. συστασιαστών, Mk 15<sup>7</sup>), including probably the two robbers who were crucified; for him the third cross may have been intended. Such men had a deep hold on the popular sympathy which goes to explain the strong demand of the people for the release of their hero, and the interest which the priests showed on behalf of him. His pretence of holiness. But the hollowness of their new-found zeal for Cæsar. They proposed, seeing that Barabbas was innocent of the crime which they alleged against Jesus. INTERCESSION (the act of one who goes between) is generally taken to mean that part of prayer in which we approach God on behalf of others. The corresponding word in NT, ἐντευξις, which occurs only at 1 Ti 2<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>5</sup>, does not necessarily mean what we now understand by intercession, but rather, as its connexion with ἐντυχάνω implies, drawing close to God in free and familiar prayer (see Trench, Syn. p. 190, where, however, it is added, 'In justice to our translators it must be observed that intercession had not in their time that limited meaning of prayer for others which we now ascribe to it').

Intercession has always been regarded as a characteristic duty and privilege of believers in Christ. There is no fact or aspect of it more distinctive of the Christian life than this, in which the Christian heart, rising above all consideration of self, expands with a Christ-like benevolent desire for the welfare of every living soul, and prays for all mankind. Accordingly, we find that from the beginning intercession has been looked upon as a specific and characteristic part of the mission of the Christian Church as a whole as well as of its individual members. The practice was enjoined by Christ, He Himself setting the example to His disciples. As prayer, in the general sense of the word, is essential to the Christian life, so intercessory prayer has always been looked upon as an essential part of Christian service.

Christ, when on earth, prayed for His to-be ones, and still continues to plead for them beyond the veil, though in thinking of this aspect of His intercession it is a mistake to confine it merely to prayer. This has been admirably and convincingly pointed out by Milligan in The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of our Lord (pp. 149-153), and though this aspect of Christ's intercession belongs to a subsequent heading (§ 2 below), yet, because the intercession of Christians must always be based upon the Lord's intercession, it may be premised here that in the intercessions we offer to God the idea is wider than mere petition on behalf of others. 'Intercession and giving of thanks' are to be made for all men (1 Ti 2<sup>1</sup>). It is a commonplace that prayer is more than mere petition; and so even in prayer on behalf of others mere asking of benefits for them cannot be the whole of prayer. Intercession, then, would appear to embrace thanksgiving for benefits bestowed on others as well as imploring favours for them. Further, intercession also seems to imply that in praying for others, if we pray sincerely, we place ourselves with our means and our energies at God's disposal for His purposes of grace towards those for whom we pray. Intercession thus leads up to and necessitates self-dedication. In proceeding now to examine our Lord's teaching, we note:

1. The duty of intercession.—The duty of intercession is explicitly and frequently taught by Christ in the Gospels. It has often been remarked about His teaching as to prayer that He seldom, if ever, gives a direct command to His followers to pray, but, taking it for granted that they do pray and do not need to be told to pray, He simply gives them directions how to pray, and shows them what are the essential elements, characteristics, and conditions of prayer (cf. e.g. Mt 6<sup>9-13</sup>, Mk 11<sup>24-25</sup>, Lk 18<sup>1</sup>).

It hardly needs to be remarked that the Christian religion, being a social religion, implies that prayer on behalf of others is an essential and distinguishing element in its devotions. It would have been surprising if Christ had not taught the duty of intercession. This, of course, must not be taken as meaning that He taught it for the first time. Under the OT dispensation God's people were admitted to the privilege of intercession, and their prayers for others were availing. In particular, 'the prophets were intercessors in virtue of their calling. The ground of this was twofold. The prophet was an acceptable person; but, further, he had the Spirit, and the possession of it enabled him not only to interpret the mind of God to man, but also the mind of man to God' (Bernard in Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 40<sup>b</sup>). But in the Gospels we might have expected to find, as we do find, that the duty and privilege of intercession is advanced and developed. In Christ's teaching, intercession takes a wider range and a higher view than under the OT dispensation. No section of mankind is excluded from the scope of His redemption. Jewish prayers, even of intercession, had been offered to 'the Lord God of Israel' or 'the God of our Fathers,' but in our Lord's pattern prayer, as well as throughout His teaching, every human being is invited to call upon God as his Father, and in so doing to regard all mankind as his brethren. 'When His disciples ask to be taught to pray, He gives them a prayer very unlike what John would have given, for it contains not a word of that petition for blessing upon Israel which, in any prayer that an Israelite offered, contained, to his mind, the gist of the whole' (Latham, Pastor Pastorum, p. 416).

The Incarnation has furnished a new motive and a new power for intercession. The man who is in Christ is no longer an isolated unit: he is a member of the Body of Christ, and therefore prays for all mankind as Christ did; for, knowing that God has loved him in Christ, he loves others for whom as for himself Christ came, and in the power of that love he prays for all men living.

When we come to our Lord's express teaching as to intercession, we are at once arrested by the fact that in the Lord's Prayer—given to the disciples in response to their request to be taught how to pray—intercession not only holds the first place, but the spirit of intercession pervades it all.

There is in the Lord's Prayer the peculiar prayer of the Christian, the use of which marks him out from all others (witness the fact that in the early Church it was not taught to the catechumens till they were competentes and on the eve of their baptism), is a prayer of intercession. 'Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.' Here the disciples are taught to pray that all mankind may be brought into the Kingdom of God, that they may reverence His name, that they may learn to do His will and submit themselves to His rule. Here all limits of space and time are transcended, and he who prays the Lord's Prayer prays for all mankind, even for the generation yet unborn. It would hardly, therefore, be an exaggeration to say that in Christ's teaching upon prayer, intercession holds the first place. This is in keeping with the whole tenor of His teaching and with the genius of His religion, who all His life took thought for others, and whose first utterance on the cross was a prayer for His murderers (Lk 23<sup>34</sup>). Following upon this, it is not surprising that, according to Lk 11<sup>9-13</sup>, it was in the Lord's Prayer, and by way of commentary upon the Lord's Prayer that Christ spoke the parable of the Friend at Midnight, in which He teaches the necessity of prayer.

Intercession, then, according to Christ's teaching, is not only to be offered, but it is to be offered with importunity.

2. Christ's personal example.—Besides His great prayer of intercession recorded in Jn 17, the Gospels afford several instances of our Lord's personal example in intercession. His prayer on the eve of the ordination of the Twelve, when He continued all night in prayer (Lk 16<sup>12</sup>), was, it is not unlikely, largely occupied with intercession for the Twelve. He prayed for St. Peter (22<sup>32</sup>). His first word from the cross was a prayer for His enemies. There is also the prayer recorded in Mt 11<sup>25-27</sup>, and His prayer at the grave of Lazarus (Jn 11<sup>41</sup>), both of which are intercessory.

Christ teaches that, as He is the Mediator between God and man, intercession must be offered through Him. He is the Intercessor, and our intercessions can avail only because He intercedes, for our prayers to the Father. He prays for His disciples and for all who through their word might believe, and now He prays within the veil, carrying forward the intercession begun on earth. This comes out clearly in His 'Intercessory Prayer' (Jn 17), or, as it has perhaps been more fittingly designated, His 'High Priestly Prayer.' Reading it in the light of the happily correct rendering of RV, we see that He is speaking as if He had already entered into the glory, and were looking back upon His earthly course. In the joy of His anticipated triumph He presents Himself before the Father and pleads for the fulfilment of the Father's will. Christ's intercession for mankind which was begun on earth is continued in heaven, and our prayers for others are presented by Him in virtue of His mediation. At the same time, this prayer affords an unfailing guide to our prayers of intercession, teaching us that prayer is to be offered for the ingathering of men into the Kingdom, for the unity of the Church of God, for the perseverance of believers, and for the sanctification, for all these ends, of those who are engaged in the Church's work.

3. The scope of intercession.—Our Lord is careful to tell His disciples to pray for their enemies (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>), and in so doing He bids them remember in prayer those whom they might not have thought of including, assuming that they would, without being specially directed, pray for all others. He thus teaches both by direct precept and by implication that intercession is to be full and universal. The only other special direction He gives in this connexion is that they are to pray for labourers to be sent into the Lord's harvest (Mt 9<sup>38</sup>, Lk 10<sup>2</sup>). Christ gives these few general directions as to the scope of intercession, leaving it to time and growing experience to suggest their amplification. The scope of Christian intercession must always be widening.

'It grows with the growth of the Church and her needs, it grows with the growing complexity of human society as new classes and new objects rise up to claim its help. Intercession is also an ever widening element in a man's interest and experiences widen, so must his prayers' (Frere, Sursum Corda, p. 1).

4. The conditions of intercession.—Two distinct, though sometimes confused, conditions of acceptable intercession are laid down by Christ. (1) In Mk 11<sup>25</sup> He shows that effectual intercession presupposes a giving spirit. Those who pray for others must have the spirit of Christ must have the spirit of Mt 5<sup>23-24</sup> the disciples are taught that a condition of prayer is that they must seek reconciliation with any one who regards them (rightly or wrongly) as having done him a wrong (see Zahn, ad loc.). There must be a removal of the sense of injury from his mind as well as forgiveness to those who have wronged themselves. He who prays for others must be in peace and charity with all men.

LITERATURE.—Most of the modern popular books on Prayer are astonishingly silent as to Intercession. In many of the so-called 'divisions of prayer' Intercession does not even find a place. But in M. J. H. H. Method of Prayer, a book little used now, Intercession is prominent. Of the few modern books in which the subject is dealt with, mention may be made of Worledge on 'Prayer' in the Oxford Library of Practical Theology; Frere, Sursum Corda; Reid's Christian Prayer.

INTEREST.—'Interest,' found twice in RV of the Gospels (Mt 25<sup>27</sup>, Lk 19<sup>28</sup>) instead of 'usury' of AV, represents the Greek tokos which in the LXX is the equivalent of the Heb. neshekh in the whole of the eleven passages in which the latter occurs (Ex 22<sup>25</sup>, Lv 25<sup>36</sup> etc.). Now neshekh is rightly rendered 'usury,' the reference being to the interest, often exorbitant, charged by money-lenders in the ancient East. In the NT tokos, though often used in the Greek in the sense just defined, 'interest on deposit paid by a banker.' There were many banks in the Roman period scattered over the Græco-Roman world, some called 'public banks' and others private firms (e.g. 'Theon & Co.', 'Herodes & Co.', at Oxyrhynchus). These, however, seem, from a papyrus document, text, to have farmed from the government, in Egypt at any rate, the right of administering business; the Roman authorities, it would appear, in some degree Ptolemaic precedent (Oxyrhynchus, No. 513, vol. iii.; cf. the note on p. 248 f.). Not much seems to be known about the deposit department of ancient banking. The technical term for a deposit on which interest was paid was creditum. The amounts lodged in Roman bank-towards the end of the Republic and under the Empire must have been, in some instances, very large. About the rate of interest paid to depositors there seems to be little or no information. The statement of Suetonius, that Augustus branded some people with infamy (notavit) because they borrowed at low interest and invested at high (Ortutius, 39) may hint how the bankers made money out of the funds entrusted to their care. The usual rate of interest on loans under the Empire seems to have been one per cent. per month, or twelve per cent. per annum. This rate is repeatedly mentioned in the Papyri of Oxyrhynchus (No. 243 of A.D. 79, and No. 270 of A.D. 94, etc.). The rate paid to depositors will have been much lower. A considerable banking business was also done in ancient temples. So in ancient Babylonia (Johns, Babylonian and Assyrian Contracts, and Letters, 211), and in the Roman world, at the temple of the Ephesian Artemis, for instance (Anabasis, v. iii. 6 f.). That the temple of Jerusalem was used in this way is expressly stated by Josephus (BJ vi. v. 2), and in the legend about Heliodorus (2 Mac 3<sup>10-12</sup> 15). About the management of this temple bank nothing seems to be known. Our Lord's reference to local trapezitai, the Eastern trapezites, the Roman argentarii. See also BANK.

INVITATION.—The method of public teaching adopted by our Lord being exclusively oral, it was necessary that two features difficult to combine should be prominent in the form of His instruction,—an immediate impression, and a firm grip on the memory. This He secured by mingling freely in the social life of the time, and by an abundant use of similes and illustrations drawn from facts in the daily life and social customs of the people whom He addressed. This is one of the reasons why He clothed so many of His doctrines in parables and figures centred in the idea of hospitality.

The Hebrews were an eminently social people. In the earliest times, the beit or house was specially sacred; strangers were made heartily welcome at the door of the patriarch's tent (Gn 18<sup>2</sup>, cf. He 13<sup>2</sup>); and in later times a surly attitude towards travellers needing refreshment was considered a serious offence against good manners (1 S 25<sup>4-10</sup>). Many strict injunctions were laid down in the Mosaic Law (Lv 19<sup>33-34</sup>, Dt 14<sup>29</sup> etc.) as to the duty of kindness to strangers. At a still later period, when the common people settled in towns and cities, an elaborate code of manners grew up, both as to giving and receiving hospitality. There was much entertainment of friends, relations, and strangers among the Jews in the time of our Lord; social meetings were frequent and religious gatherings were held on a large scale.

Jesus took advantage of such opportunities of social intercourse as were offered to Him; He was fond of being invited by His friends (Lk 10<sup>38</sup> etc.), and He withdrew Himself from the outset of His public life to an eminently sociable man (Mt 9<sup>10</sup>), often accepting invitations from quarters that gave offence to those who considered themselves leaders of society (v. 11, cf. Lk 19<sup>7</sup>). This, however, He did, not merely because He delighted in the fellowship of men and women, but mainly because of the unexampled freedom it afforded Him of spiritual instruction (Lk 7<sup>41-50</sup>), and of bringing His influence to bear on those around Him, whether they were His personal friends (Lk 10<sup>41-42</sup>), or secret enemies (7<sup>36</sup>), or the general public (Jn 12<sup>9</sup>), or individuals who were denied entrance into recognized society (Lk 18<sup>10</sup>). It was a sign of His insight and wisdom as well as of His broad sympathies, that in a community so eminently sociable as that in which He moved, He should make such free use of the machinery of hospitality for His Messianic purpose, and devise many parables and illustrations drawn from the customs of the day, and from the etiquette that ruled the relations of hosts and guests, from the highest circles of life to the lowest.

It is partly from this point of view that we are to understand His frequent habit of representing the gospel of grace as God's invitation to the soul to partake of the blessings of salvation. It made an instant appeal to the sympathies of His audience; it brought spiritual truths within reach of the intelligence of the humblest and most ordinary people, and it predisposed them to receive it willingly; and, as the smiles and which He clothed His teaching represented recurrent facts and exigencies in their lives, it helped to drive home deep into their memory the lessons which He taught, and to bring them back frequently to their recollection. In this way the method of His teaching helped to perpetuate its substance till the time when it took a written form. But the parables of invitation have a wider appeal, for the relationships from which they were drawn are universal, and belong to all nations and communities where the customs of social life are honoured. These customs vary in detail in different ages and lands, but the root-relations of hosts and guests are permanent. These parables are a kind of Esperanto of the spiritual life, and appeal to the universal intelligence and sympathies of mankind. Thus the human side of Christ's teaching forms an ideal channel for its Divine contents.

When we pass from the form to the substance of the teaching, which represents the gospel as an invitation, the simile is further justified by its appropriateness and its beauty.

1. It emphasizes the bright and genial aspects of religion, which shine with so clear a lustre in the teaching of Jesus. It has been a recurrent and baneful feature of theological learning that it has tended to envelop religion in an atmosphere of gloom, by making so much of the horror and mischief of sin, and dwelling so exclusively on the need of repentance, atonement and justification. Religious ritual introduced another baneful element into the spiritual life by representing its duties too much as a series of sacerdotal observances, which by frequent recurrence became mechanical and wearisome. Ethical writers have likewise been prone to dwell exclusively on the responsibilities of religion, to the obscuration of its privileges. In the teaching of Jesus there is nothing of this mischievous tendency. His parables are full of the sound of wedding-bells, of the voice of laughter, of the joy of a great deliverance, of the discovery of a precious and unsuspected happiness. There are clouds on the horizon, and the echo of distant thunders; but the foreground is full of happy figures intent on celebrating the marriage of the soul to its Divine Lover and Friend, and on enjoying the new-found fellowship of God as the Giver of life and salvation. Without in any way obscuring the evils from which the soul is delivered by the gracious ministries of the gospel, preachers should follow their great Model in placing greater emphasis on the sunny joys and holy privileges brought within our reach in Jesus Christ. One reason why the common people heard Him so gladly was, that He took them away from the word-splitting and elaborate discussions of the Rabbis, and transported them into that circle of happy human relationships from which He mainly drew His illustrations. What was true then is just as true to-day.

2. The presentation of the gospel as a Divine invitation throws emphasis on another of its essential features,—that it embodies a free gift of grace from God to man. The central idea of hospitality is that one gives freely what the many receive and enjoy 'without money and without price.' Jesus in the 'parables of grace' teaches us that the gospel contains something infinitely precious which is given to us, but which we could never deserve or buy. Religion is not a bargain between man and God; it is a boon, a largess bestowed by God on man. It is not commerce, it is reconciliation and friendship. It is thus represented not as an exchange of commodities in a market-place, but as a feast where the one who gives and receives nothing back, save in the happiness and loyal gratitude of the other.

Jesus justifies this idea of a one-sided benefit by nearly always making use of a simile of feasting in which a superior invites his inferior to a banquet. It is a king inviting his subjects to the wedding-feast of his son (Mt 22<sup>1-14</sup>); it is a great man entertaining a miscellaneous assemblage of guests from all quarters (Lk 14<sup>15-24</sup>); it is a father bringing home a renegade son with the best of the flock. In all these cases there could be no question of a return in kind. The conditions were satisfied by the coming of the guests, and their happy enjoyment of the good things provided. 'The gospel is ever a gospel of grace.'

3. A third significant aspect suggested by the simile of an invitation is its voluntariness on both sides. There can be no compulsion in the invitation to a feast of rejoicing. Unwilling guests have no place at it. Religion has no room for the idea of compulsion. The invitation is free to all: acceptance must be as free. Thus is the sacred function of spiritual liberty, of the freedom of the will, safeguarded by the gospel. Those who refuse or neglect a social invitation may be incurring a grave penalty; but they can do so if they choose. The appeal of religion may also be refused; it lies with the soul whether it will respond to the call of God or reject it.

The word translated 'compel' in Lk 14<sup>23</sup> (ἀναγκάζουσιν) must be understood in its proper meaning of 'constrain by persuasion.' It does not place the urgent desire of the master to have an absolutely full house, in the second the feeling that pressure will be needed to overcome the incredulity of country people as to such an invitation to them being meant seriously. They would be apt to laugh in the servant's face' (Bruce in Expositor's Gr. Test., in loco).

4. The idea of an invitation thus merges into that of response; and it is important to notice that great stress is laid on this side of the question in the parables. In not a few it is clearly the pivot on which the teaching turns. There is one way in which an invitation may be worthily accepted; there are several in which it may be rejected: e.g. it may be (1) openly scorned, (2) accepted and then rejected or ignored, (3) accepted in a wrong spirit, or with an imperfect realization of its privilege and value. Each of these situations is illustrated by Christ to typify the attitude of men to His gospel. In the parable of the Marriage of the King's Son, the first guests invited treat the offer with scorn (Mt 22<sup>8</sup>), and 'make light' of it, preferring to find their satisfaction in their own way, and even maltreating the king's son. In the parable of the Great Supper, this Jesus exposed the attitude of the Pharisees and scribes towards His gospel, and in a wider sense that of all those who in the earthly world spirit have since treated His offer of salvation with derision or disrespect. In the parable of the Great Supper, the guests first accepted the invitation, and then, finding other more absorbing interests, sent various excuses for not attending. These represent the fickle multitude, who at first thronged to hear the 'gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth,' and afterwards left Him, having exhausted the sensational aspect of His ministry and wonderful works, and having no love for His higher message. Returning to the parable of the Marriage, we find a final episode in which the man without a 'wedding-garment' is dealt with. Clearly he stands for those who, having heard and accepted the invitation of the gospel, show that they have failed to realize the lofty and decorous spirit in which the soul should respond to it, and who treat it as a common thing, with no sense of its high privilege. The care with which Jesus developed these situations in His parables, and the doom that followed, shows how He felt the importance of a right attitude towards spiritual realities. It is as though He were repeating in many tones and accents the fact that God offers man His best in the invitations of the gospel, and expects man to be at his best in response to them, otherwise he perils his soul (cf. Mt 14<sup>24</sup>).

When we turn from the teaching to the practice of Christ, the same attitude of appeal and invitation is manifested, and the same spirit of loyal and worthy acceptance is expected in turn. Everywhere in His dealings with men we find Him acting as God's messenger of goodwill, and urging them to respond to heavenly grace with grateful hearts and willing service. Where men do so He promises them a great reward (Mt 19<sup>27-30</sup>); where they fail to do so He shows a Divine and touching sorrow (23<sup>37-38</sup>); and though He is clear in revealing His own disappointment at such a result, He lays the chief stress on the loss and misery which rejection must bring on those who are guilty of spurning or ignoring His ever-renewed appeal.

The heart of the gospel is found in the central invitation given by Christ to all men in the words, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest' (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>).

ISAAC.—Named (1) in our Lord's genealogy, Mt 1<sup>2</sup>, Lk 3<sup>34</sup>; (2) in such collocations as 'sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob' (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>), 'see Abraham and Isaac and Jacob' (Lk 13<sup>28</sup>), 'the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob' (Mt 22<sup>32</sup>, Mk 12<sup>26</sup>, Lk 20<sup>37</sup>). See ABRAHAM, and FATHERS. The sacrifice of Isaac came at an early date to be used by Christian writers as a type of the sacrifice on the cross (cf. e.g. Ep. of Barn. ch. 7). It is just possible that some such thought underlies Ro 8<sup>32</sup> 'He that spared not his own Son.'

ISAIAH.—There are seven instances recorded in the Gospels in which Jesus quotes from the prophecies of Isaiah, besides numerous other cases in which His language is more or less manifestly reminiscent of expressions in the book. The most notable passages are two in which our Lord applies to Himself the terms used by the prophet of the Exile with regard to the Servant of Jehovah, viz. Lk 4<sup>16-22</sup>, where Jesus reads and expounds the words of Is 61<sup>1-2</sup>; and Lk 22<sup>37</sup>, where He adopts as a prediction of His own experience a clause of Is 53<sup>3-4</sup>. Our Lord thus plainly taught that, alike in the mission and in the vicarious suffering of the ideal Servant of Deutero-Isaiah, His own person and work were typified and foreshadowed. More general is the application of Is 69<sup>9-10</sup> to the people of His own time (Mt 13<sup>1-15</sup>, Mk 4<sup>12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>10</sup>); and also His use of Is 29<sup>13</sup> of the Pharisees and scribes (Mt 15<sup>7-9</sup>, Mk 7<sup>6-7</sup>). All three Synoptists record the quotation from Is 56<sup>7</sup> with which He rebuked the temple-traders (Mt 21<sup>13</sup> ||). St. John alone gives the quotation of a general character from Is 54<sup>13</sup> (Jn 6<sup>45</sup>), while St. Mark records an expression which manifestly comes from Is 66<sup>14</sup> (Mk 9<sup>14</sup>). In only three of the above seven cases is Isaiah mentioned by name, and in no case is there any indication that bears in the slightest degree upon the question as to the authorship of the various parts of the book.

In addition to these more direct references, there are many expressions in the discourses of Jesus in which we have echoes of Isaiah's '...'. Our Lord's mind was filled with the OT, and to be expected that His utterances should be cast in the mould, and often expressed in the very words, of psalmists and prophets. In Mt 5<sup>34-35</sup> we perceive a reference to Is 66<sup>1</sup>; Mt 21<sup>33-44</sup> || at once suggests Is 5<sup>1-2</sup>. Other less obvious instances are probably to be found in Mt 11<sup>23</sup> (cf. Is 14<sup>13-15</sup>) 16<sup>19</sup> (Is 22<sup>2</sup>) 6<sup>6</sup> (Is 26<sup>20</sup>); and various expressions in the eschatological discourses of Mt 24 and Lk 21. To these others might possibly be added; but it is not warrantable to find in every case of verbal similarity a reference to, or even a reminiscence of, the words of the OT. But apart from doubtful cases, it will be seen that the Book of Isaiah, both in its earlier and in its later portions, is fully acknowledged and used in the teaching of Jesus.

It is not less so with the Lord Himself. All four quote Is 40<sup>3</sup> with regard to the mission of John the Baptist (Mt 3<sup>1-3</sup> || || || || Mt., who uses the OT so largely in connexion with the ministry of Jesus, applies to His coming and mission the passages Is 7<sup>14</sup> (Mt 12<sup>23</sup>) 9<sup>1-2</sup> (Mt 4<sup>14-16</sup>) 53<sup>4</sup> (Mt 8<sup>17</sup>) 42<sup>1-4</sup> (Mt 12<sup>18-21</sup>). St. John (12<sup>38-41</sup>) quotes Is 53<sup>3-6</sup> in reference to the rejection of Christ by the people; and the Synoptists all record the voice heard at the Baptism and the Transfiguration as using the words of Is 42<sup>1</sup>.

As with the words of Jesus Himself, so, in the case of the Evangelists, no theory with regard to the actual authorship of any part of the book can claim to be supported by the manner of the references. 'Isaiah,' even when named, stands manifestly for the reputed author, and (as in Jn 12<sup>38</sup>) the mode of expression is naturally and rightly that popularly used and understood. No critical conclusions can be drawn from any of the references.

With regard to the original Messianic import of the passages applied in the Gospels to Jesus Christ and His work, there is no difficulty in those cases where the 'Servant of Jehovah' is identified with the Messiah. And even in such passages as Is 7<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>1-2</sup> quoted by Mt., we must recognize, beneath the immediate reference, an allusion to the justified specific application by the Evangelists. Especially is this so with the prophetic conception of 'Immanuel,' an ideal figure in whom we find the earliest portraiture of the Messianic King (Is 7<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>8-10</sup> 9<sup>6-7</sup>). Though in such cases as these we are without historical or other evidence (as in Mt 4<sup>15-16</sup> from Is 9<sup>1-2</sup>), it was quite legitimate to find unexpected correspondences between the earlier and the later stages of Providence and Revelation, based on the deep underlying unity and consistency of the Divine purpose and methods.

ISCAIOT.—See JUDAS ISCAIOT.

of Judah, and lived in the country of Judah, it became a wider term, after the return from Babylon, for all who were members of the Hebrew race. 'Israel' differed from both of these as being the name of privilege given by God to Jacob, the ancestor of the race (Gn 32<sup>28</sup> 35<sup>10</sup>), and the thought of the theocratic character of the chosen people and of God's presence with them always underlies the term. See esp. Mt 2<sup>6</sup>, Lk 1<sup>54</sup> 6<sup>3</sup> 2<sup>25</sup> 3<sup>32</sup> 24<sup>21</sup>, Ac 1<sup>6</sup>, all of which reveal the national conviction that the Messiah would come for the benefit of Israel, and that to Israel were God's attention and love especially given. But in marked contrast to these those which imply that the

has failed to fulfil the Divine purposes for it:—a Roman centurion exhibits greater faith than was to be found in the holy nation (Mt 8<sup>10</sup> || Lk 7<sup>9</sup>); the house of Israel are as a whole 'lost sheep' (Mt 10<sup>6</sup> 15<sup>24</sup>); they need someone to turn them to the Lord their God (Lk 1<sup>16</sup>); an honoured and official teacher of Israel is shown to be ignorant of the fundamental principles of the spiritual life (Jn 3<sup>10</sup>); incidents in the OT prove that some Gentiles received God's care and blessing, and were preferred to Israelites (Lk 4<sup>25-27</sup>); and a mysterious intimation is given of the supremacy of the Church of Christ hereafter (Mt 19<sup>28</sup> || Lk 22<sup>30</sup>); it is character, and not theocratic privileges, that makes a man 'truly an Israelite' (Jn 1<sup>47</sup>). See NATHANIEL. Thus the Gospels teach incidentally what St. Paul lays down systematically: (a) that Israel does not comprise all who are called Israel (Ro 9<sup>6</sup>); (b) that Israel's real position of Israel is to be taken by Christians, for the latter are 'Israel of God' (Gal 6<sup>16</sup>, cf. Eph 2<sup>11-19</sup>); (c) that this is for the purpose of ultimate union of Israel to spiritual communion and life (Eph 3<sup>6</sup> 11-13).

2. The status of the chosen people before God is to be taken by Christians. But that does not mean that Christianity is merely to be substituted for Judaism. Christianity is not a completely new creation fallen from heaven, but rather a growth from the religion of Israel—a growth far surpassing the germ from which it sprang, as an oak surpasses an acorn, but yet containing elements which are discernible in the rudimentary form. In order, therefore, to estimate the relation in which the Gospels, and particularly our Lord's teaching, stood towards Israel, it is necessary to estimate broadly how much the New was indebted to the Old, and how much it discarded in rising out of it with its Divine and potent growth.

(a) Monothism was the chiefest glory of Judaism. Part of the inspiration of the people of Israel is seen in its 'genius for religion,' the capacity for realizing the supreme and only existence of God. A step towards this had been monolatry, the national adhesion to one Deity only, which was compatible with the recognition that other nations and lands were under the protection of other deities (Jg 11<sup>24</sup>, 1 S 26<sup>19</sup>). But it was not long before the Hebrew prophets taught that Jehovah was the God of all the nations of the earth, a spiritual Being whose service was incumbent upon all mankind, that 'the Lord is one' not primarily in ritual but in moral truth is the very fibre of Christianity; a Christian is in the truest sense a Unitarian. 'Jesus answered, "The chief [commandment] is—Hear O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God"' (Mk 12<sup>29</sup>). But even in the OT there are not wanting intimations that the God-head is not a 'monotonous unity,' but that there are distinctions within It; e.g. 'the Angel of Jahweh or of God,' i.e. His presence manifesting itself in outward act (Ex 3<sup>14</sup> 14<sup>19</sup> 22<sup>23</sup>); 'the Captain of Jahweh's host,' who is also called Jahweh (Jos 5<sup>14</sup>, 6<sup>2</sup>); 'His Holy Spirit' (Is 63<sup>10</sup>); see also the thrice repeated name (Nu 6<sup>24-26</sup>), and the Tersanctus (Is 6<sup>3</sup>).* According to the reports of His teaching as contained in the Gospel records, our Lord expressly formulated the truth of the unity of God, but never that of the Holy Trinity; and yet the latter pervades the whole record. 'In the gradual process of intercourse with Him, His disciples came to recognize Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as included in their deepening and enlarging thought of God.' But the truth is definitely implied in the discourses in the Upper Room (Jn 14-17), and in the baptismal formula (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). See Gore's Bampton Lectures, pp. 134 ff.; Illingworth's do. pp. 67 ff.; Gibson, The Thirty-nine Articles, vol. 1. pp. 93-101.

(b) Covenant.—The monolatry which preceded monotheism was calculated to give birth to the idea that between Jahweh and His people there was a close and mutual agreement. If He was exclusively their God and Protector, they were bound to do Him service. It is not easy to say at what period the idea arose. But the earlier prophets, though not expressly mentioning a covenant—except Hosea (6<sup>7</sup> doubtful, 8<sup>1</sup>)—all teach the truth that Jahweh requires moral, ethical service from His people. The relationship of the nation to God is firmly established in the religious thought of Israel. The covenant with Abraham (Gn 15) is the starting point. The covenant at Sinai (Ex 24<sup>1-8</sup>), opens the second stage of the history. It has yet another covenant, based on the contents of the Deut. law, and made on the borders of Moab (Dt 29<sup>1</sup> 9. 12. 14. 21; cf. 26<sup>16-19</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>2-21</sup>). But when Israel was carried into Babylon the Old Covenant was in reality at an end, broken by their sins. Jeremiah, therefore, speaks of a New Covenant (31<sup>31</sup>), forgiveness of sins, righteousness, peace and joy. It had been foreshadowed in the life story of Hosea, and was to be the fulfilment of the dreams and longings of all the prophets. 'In the visions of the new covenant the OT becomes Christian.' And the thought is the inspiration of Ezekiel and of Deutero-Isaiah. But there were two other crises in Israel's history where the idea of a covenant is prominent. God gave a covenant, i.e. a promise, to Levi of a perpetual priesthood in the tribe (Dt 33<sup>9</sup>, Jer 33<sup>18-22</sup>, Mal 2<sup>4-6</sup>), and to David of a perpetual kingdom (2 S 7<sup>12-14</sup>, 1 K 8<sup>13-14</sup>, Jer 33<sup>17</sup>). These covenants were the basis on which went to make up the fulness of the Christian covenant. In the Gospels, with the exception of Lk 1<sup>72</sup>, where the Abrahamic covenant is referred to, the only occurrence of the word is at the Last Supper (Mt 26<sup>28</sup> || Mk 14<sup>24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>20</sup>); our Lord uses Jeremiah's term, 'the new covenant,' but at the same time the words 'This is my blood' refer to the covenant at Sinai (Ex 24<sup>8</sup>). This application of the word to the results of His own Person and work served as a starting-point for the fuller working out of the thought by the Apostolic writers. The analogy of the Abrahamic covenant is drawn out chiefly by St. Paul (Ro 4, Gal 3), while the Ep. to the Hebrews deals with the kingship (ch. 1; cf. Mt 22<sup>44</sup>), the priesthood (7-10), and, closely connected with the latter, the spiritual covenant of the forgiveness of sins (10<sup>15-18</sup>).

(c) Law.—A study of the passages in the Gospels which speak of the Mosaic Law shows in a striking manner the relation of Christ's teaching to the religion of Israel. On the one hand, He recognized the Divine authority of the Law, in its true meaning and spirit, and not as interpreted and embodied in the 'deformed' . . . of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt . . . , Lk 16<sup>17</sup>). But, on the other hand, in order to 'fulfil' (πληρῶσαι) the Law He was obliged to take a negative or critical attitude. 'The Law and the Prophets,' as a dispensation, have had their day, and have given place to 'the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 11<sup>12f</sup> || Lk 16<sup>16</sup>), and to 'grace and truth' (Jn 1<sup>17</sup>; and see Mt 9<sup>17</sup> || Mk 2<sup>21f</sup>, Lk 5<sup>37</sup>). Even the Law and the Prophets meant something deeper than they had hitherto been understood to mean (Mt 7<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>34-40</sup>); and this deeper meaning is contained in a 'new commandment' which Jesus gives to the disciples (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>). The Law had generally been considered as a compendium of positive commands . . . the details of life; but the only parts . . . mattered were 'the weightier things,' judgment, mercy and faith (Mt 23<sup>23</sup> || Lk 11<sup>42</sup>). Other criticisms of the Law are found in Mt 5<sup>21-48</sup> 19<sup>8</sup> (divorce) 12<sup>1-12</sup>, Lk 13<sup>10-17</sup> 14<sup>1-6</sup>, Jn 5<sup>9-17</sup> 9 (Sabbath). Our Lord took care to avoid causing offence (Mt 18<sup>6f</sup>), though showing at the same time that He was raised above bondage to purely ritual and non-ethical enactments: e.g. in the payment of the Temple tax (Mt 17<sup>24-27</sup>); in touching the leper, but at the same time telling him to offer the requisite sacrifices (Mt 8<sup>1-4</sup>). The one decisive breach that He made with Jewish legalism was in dealing with the distinction between clean and unclean foods, and with ceremonial washings (Mt 15<sup>1-20</sup>, Mk 7<sup>1-23</sup> [note RV of v. 19], Lk 10<sup>7</sup> 11<sup>38-41</sup>).

(d) Sacrifice.—The Jewish ordinances of sacrifice formed part of the 'Law,' and were also in intimate connexion with the covenant idea; this section, therefore, must to some extent overlap the two preceding. Our Lord accorded to sacrifices the same . . . that He accorded to the Law as a whole; He accepted them as of Divine authority, and binding upon the Jews. He told the recovered leper to offer the prescribed gift (Mt 8<sup>4</sup>); He assumed that His hearers offered them as an ordinary practice (5<sup>23f</sup>). But the latter . . . also shows that He relegated them to a . . . place as compared with the higher moral duties. He twice quoted the saying of Hosea that God desires 'mercy and not sacrifice' (Mt 9<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>). And by the inauguration of the New Covenant in His own blood, the whole Jewish system was by implication abrogated by being transcended. The thought of sacrifice seems also to underlie the words in Mt 20<sup>28</sup> || Mk 10<sup>45</sup>. Christ gave His life as a 'ransom' (λύτρον)—a means of redemption or release. The word is used in the LXX as a rendering of כַּפַּר a 'covering' or 'atonement.' But such a passage as Nu 35<sup>31</sup> shows that it does not necessarily imply the death of an animal; and it is precarious to press our Lord's words to support any theory of the Atonement, as has been done with disastrous results by widely differing schools of thought. Further, Jn 19<sup>36</sup> refers to the Passover lamb; and possibly also Jn 1<sup>29, 36</sup>, but it is safer to regard the Baptist's words as an allusion to Is 53<sup>6, 7</sup>, where the sufferings and death of the Servant of Jahweh are described as being in some sense vicarious, and availing to 'take away the sin of the world'; this truth was depicted symbolically by the 'scapegoat' on the Day of Atonement. The words of our Lord at the institution of the Eucharist were, as has been said above, the starting-point for the fuller teaching of the Apostolic writers. Of the debts which Christianity owes to Israel, none is more fundamental than the conception of sacrifice. The references to the subject in St. Paul's writings, though not numerous, are quite enough to show that he had a deep and firm belief in the sacrificial and propitiatory character of Christ's death (Sunday-Illustration Romans, pp 91 f). See also 1 P 1<sup>2</sup> (an allusion to the covenant sacrifice at Horeb), 1<sup>19</sup> (the Passover lamb), 2<sup>24</sup> (a general description of an atoning sacrifice). And it is the paramount thought in Hebrews, which shows how Christ's sacrifice and priesthood were analogous to, but infinitely surpassed, the Jewish sacrifices and the Levitical priesthood (see art. DAY OF ATONEMENT).

(e) Messianic expectations.—(i.) The universal expectation in Israel in our Lord's time that One was to come who should be a national deliverer, had its roots as far back as the Divine promises to Abraham; but the focussing of all hopes on a King was due to the promise made to David that his line should have eternal possession of the throne. The hopes of national peace and glory under a king reach a climax in Isaiah and Micah. But they received a terrible reverse at the Captivity, and in subsequent OT writings the idea largely disappeared. It was revived, however, to a certain extent in apocryphal and especial literature. In two of the earlier . . . Oracles, in parts of the . . . Psalms of Solomon, there are indications of the hope, though the title 'Messiah' is not used. The Christian belief that Jesus was the Messiah (though the truth was guessed by the first disciples, Jn 1<sup>41</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>) was due to His own claims, which were not, however, put forward even to the Twelve till near the close of His ministry. He pronounced Simon Peter blessed because the truth had been Divinely revealed to him (Mt 16<sup>16f</sup>); and He . . . to Pilate that He was a king (Mt . . . Lk 23<sup>3</sup>, Jn 18<sup>36f</sup>). But while He declared the fact, He raised it into a new sphere of thought—'My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight . . . but now is my kingdom not from hence.' And in conversing with the Twelve He linked with it the clear announcement of His agonizing sufferings (Mk 8<sup>37-38</sup> and parallels; cf. Mt 26<sup>2-27</sup>).

(ii) The kingship of the Messiah was the only . . . which had been entertained by the . . . But 'in the minds of the first members of the Christian Church the experiences of the Cross, the Resurrection and Pentecost, . . . with the impression which the character . . . the life and teaching of Jesus had made upon them, led to a rapid transformation, pregnant with important consequences, of the idea of the Messiah which they held as Jews' (Hastings' DB iii. 356<sup>a</sup>). As they studied the OT Scriptures in the light of the . . . found scattered there the . . . complete ideal, which had been perfectly fulfilled in Jesus' (ib. 356). They conceived of Him and taught of Him as one who had fulfilled the prophecy of a 'king' (Is 9<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>1-10</sup> 49<sup>1</sup> 61<sup>1</sup> 69<sup>9</sup>). And in the miracles which He performed He appeared to be a counterpart of OT prophets. This work of miracles formed part of the current Messianic conception, as is implied by John the Baptist (Mt 11<sup>10</sup>), and in the questionings of the Jews (Jn 7<sup>21</sup>). Another trait in the prophetic office of the Messiah—that of the revealer of unknown truths—is implied by the Samaritan woman (Jn 4<sup>25</sup>). This had formed no definite part of the earlier Messianic expectations, though the nation had looked forward to a true prophet (1 Mac 14<sup>41</sup>). In our Lord's time men hoped for the return of one of the old prophets (Mk 6<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>27f</sup>), or the coming of one who was called 'the prophet' (Jn 1<sup>21, 25</sup> 6<sup>14</sup>); but there is no indication that 'the prophet' was identified with the Messiah.

(iii.) The more clearly the atoning value of Christ's death was realized, the more completely was He seen to be the ideal Priest foreshadowed by the Levitical priesthood. His own words would form the starting-point for this conception; He 'laid down His life, He 'gave' His life as a ransom (see above). The double thought of Christ as Victim and Priest is fully worked out in Hebrews on the basis of Ps 110<sup>4</sup>.

(iv.) The OT contains many passages which teach that Divine purposes are accomplished through the sufferings of the righteous: and in the later chapters of the Book of Isaiah the righteous portion of the nation merges into the vision of one representative Servant of Jahweh, whose preaching was to bring the whole nation, and even Gentiles, to the light, and whose sufferings were to have a vicarious value. This representation does not appear to have exercised any influence on the later Jewish expectations of the Messiah. The inspired utterance of John the Baptist (Jn 1<sup>29-36</sup>) pointed towards the truth, though his hearers do not seem to have understood his words. The Twelve could not realize the necessity for Christ's sufferings until He had suffered, when the great truth dawned upon them (Mt 12<sup>16-21</sup>, Ac 3<sup>17-26</sup>). It has been suggested that the servant (δoulos) of Lk 14<sup>26</sup> may be an allusion to the same figure of prophecy.

(f) Eschatology. The Jewish and Christian Messianic beliefs were closely bound up with eschatological teaching as a whole. In the OT the expectations with regard to a hereafter consisted mainly of the aspirations of saints who felt certain that righteousness is eternal, and that God's power and dominion are infinite. This intuitive assurance that the present life with its inequalities and anomalies cannot be the whole of life, maintained itself in some minds side by side with the popular notions held by the Hebrews in common with the Babylonian and other Semitic peoples, that Sheol was a state in which man would continue to exist, but only in a shadowy, nerveless, purposeless reproduction of his present personality. In apocalyptic literature an advance was made to some extent. The 'last things' began to be detailed in a great variety of forms—some of them, indeed, sensuous, and marred by narrow Jewish exclusiveness, but others more spiritual and universal; in some the Messianic kingdom is to be on this earth, in others in a transformed heaven and earth; in some the enemies of Israel are punished at death in Sheol or Hades, which thus becomes equivalent to Hell, while the righteous (i.e. Israel) attain to a resurrection; in others the resurrection is universal, and a prelude to a final spiritual judgment. And Christian teaching borrowed much, both from the OT and from later Jewish writings; but it rose to a spiritual height and a universality beyond the former, while at the same time it discarded the gross, exaggerated, and unspiritual elements which marred the latter. Christ's own eschatological teaching centres round the Kingdom of God. He, like the OT writers, does not discuss theoretical or speculative questions, but deals with broad moral issues. His teaching 'unfolds the course of the Divine kingdom which had been the object of OT faith and the centre of OT hope. It presents that kingdom as a thing of the actual present, brought to men in and by the Teacher Himself, but also as a thing of the future which looks through all historical fulfilments to a completer realization—a thing, too, of gradual, unobtrusive growth, yet destined to be finally established by a great conclusive event' (Hasting's DBI. 750<sup>b</sup>). Our Lord, as reported by the Synoptists, gave a large place to the promise of His own Return, an objective event, the time of which was not yet revealed even to the Son. In some places this is closely connected with a quite definite event—the destruction of Jerusalem (Mt 24<sup>1</sup> Mk 13; cf. Mt 10<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>27</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>31</sup> 21<sup>26</sup>). Connected with the Parousia, and the cause of it, is the Final Judgment, which will occur at the end of the world, a judgment of individuals, and of universal scope, in which Christ the Son of Man will be Himself the Judge. The Fourth Gospel, while not without allusions (cf. 12<sup>48</sup>) of this final judgment, lays stress rather on a present judgment, 'in which each is in a probation of character and a self-judgment which proceed now' (31<sup>7</sup>, 12<sup>47</sup>). With the teaching of Jesus on the Parousia, which is connected the doctrine of a resurrection, the OT this was not a doctrine, but a vague longing of a few great minds for a deliverance from Sheol, a life superior to death. It was only gradually and at a late date that the conception became more distinct. At first it was a re-animation of Israel as a whole, but Is 26<sup>19</sup> seems to breathe the more individual hope; and the clearest statement is reached in Dn 12<sup>2</sup>, the latest OT utterance on the subject. Nowhere in the OT is a resurrection doctrine as extending beyond the case of Israel. The doctrine of a resurrection of all men was gradually evolved, and had been accepted before the Christian era by the Pharisees and the mass of the people, though rejected by the Sadducees, in accordance with their principle of rejecting all traditions and accretions later than the OT. Our Lord's teaching holds a course between the two; it is based on the great principles of the OT, but is coloured, as to some details, by the eschatology of later writings, being at the same time free from the crudeness and extravagance of the popular beliefs. See Mt 22<sup>23-33</sup> || Mk 12<sup>27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>27-40</sup>; Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 13<sup>32</sup>; Mt 10<sup>28</sup>, Lk 14<sup>14</sup>, Jn 5<sup>28f.</sup> 11<sup>21-26</sup>.

(g) Angelology.—The NT belief with regard to angels is taken over almost entire from the later phases of Judaism. Angels are innumerable (Mt 26<sup>53</sup>, Lk 21<sup>26</sup>), and glorious in appearance (Mt 28<sup>3</sup>, Lk 2<sup>9</sup>; cf. δδξαι 2 P 21<sup>9</sup>); they minister to God's people (Mt 21<sup>41</sup>, Lk 22<sup>43</sup>), and carry the saints to Paradise (Lk 16<sup>22</sup>). As Jahweh, in the OT, was surrounded by them, so the Son of Man will be accompanied by them at His Parousia (Mt 16<sup>7</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>); and they are charged with duties connected with the Last Day (Mt 13<sup>41-49</sup> 24<sup>31</sup>). In OT and NT alike only two angelic names are recorded, Michael and Gabriel (Dn 10<sup>13-21</sup> 81<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>21</sup>, Jude<sup>9</sup>, Rev 12<sup>7</sup>, Lk 1<sup>19</sup> 26). Satan is an individual being (Mk 1<sup>13</sup>, Lk 10<sup>18</sup>). In a few points Christian conceptions show an advance upon the Jewish. In the Book of Daniel angels are guardians or patrons of particular countries (10<sup>13</sup> 20<sup>21</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>); in Mt 18<sup>10</sup> they appear to be human beings, especially of children. Satan is attended by a company of angels (Mt 25<sup>4</sup>, Rev 12<sup>7</sup>), an idea not found in earlier writings. Angels are spirits (He 1<sup>14</sup>). Christ, and men in union with Him, are better than angels (He 2<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>3</sup>).

(h) Scripture.—This has been placed at the end, and not at the beginning of the series, because the growth of the religion of Israel would remain a fact even if all the Jewish records had been destroyed. But it is true that the possession of, and devotion to, the OT Scriptures had an enormous effect on the formation of Christian thought and teaching and phraseology. The direct quotations from the OT in the NT are very many; and there are, besides, a mass of more or less distinct allusions and reminiscences which must be studied in their OT context if their meaning in the NT is to be understood. See artt. OLD TESTAMENT, and QUOTATIONS.

ISSUE OF BLOOD.—One peculiarly case of this ailment is mentioned in (Mt 9<sup>20</sup> αἱμορροῖσα, Mk 5<sup>25</sup>, and Lk 8<sup>43</sup> οἰστέρα ἐν ῥύσει αἱματος). The description indicates a very severe and obstinate form of uterine hæmorrhage possibly arising from internal growth, for the patient had suffered many things of many physicians and only grew worse for the treatment; and she had endured the complaint for twelve years. The malady was in general regarded as incurable by medical treatment, and was handed over to be dealt with by magic charms and amulets. Its painful character, apart from its enfeebling and prostrating effects, was increased by the fact that it involved a rigorous isolation from society, and was looked upon with particular horror. All female discharges, even the normal monthly occurrences, were peculiarly repugnant to the Semitic mind, and came under the cycle of custom and legislation to which the Polynesian term taboo has been applied. The terror arose from the dread of supernatural penalties and of malignant agencies which were supposed to emanate from women at such times. Supernatural powers were believed to reside in the blood of the meneses, on account of which it was itself held to be efficacious as a charm. The idea may have been modified before NT times, and yet would remain at least as a vague undefined repugnance and fear (see W. R. Smith, R.S., Note on 'Holiness, Uncleaness, and Taboo'). The sufferer would further be compelled to perpetual celibacy.

Among the treatments of this malady we find the following: "I took a little bit of oil putting on the ways with a cup of wine, and laid a little wine coming up behind stables her by calling out, Be healed of thine issue of blood." And, "Take three measures of onions, boil in wine and give the patient to drink, at the same time calling out suddenly, Be healed of thine issue"—An interesting anticipation of certain familiar features of modern therapeutics.

That our Lord's healing of the sufferer was regarded as memorable and attained to a considerable vogue apart from the NT record, is evidenced by the legend that the votive figure at Baniâs, supposed to be that of Christ, was erected by this woman out of gratitude to her Deliverer, and other kindred legends.

The chief feature of the miracle was the fact that the healing was gained surreptitiously, apart from the will and initiative of Jesus. Our Lord was pressing through the crowd on His way to the home of JARUS, when the woman, moved by a great expectation of healing, drew near to touch at least the fringe of His garment, in which special sanctity resided), and so obtained even this slight contact would remove her trouble. Having accomplished her object, she felt in her body that she was healed or the plague, and our Lord became conscious that 'virtue' had gone out of Him. The idea that healing power was resident in the body of Jesus, comparable to a charge of electric energy, is not to be entertained. The casual touching of His body by any sick person would have had no such result. We must understand (1) the touch of faith. The whole nature of the woman had been roused to activity and hopefulness. No labour of Jesus to create and evoke this essential condition of being healed was necessary or possible. The expectation existed at full tension, and she was prepared therefor to receive the And (2) to this exertion Divinely for sympathy resident in Jesus. While this capacity the forces of which exist in humanity, it still to operate on the same plane and to be not alien but kindred. The possibility of sympathetic relations being in existence between 'mind and mind,' quite irrespective of consciousness or will on the part of both or of either, is an ascertained fact, however it may be explainable. Various theories are put forward to account for the phenomena, but meanwhile the fact must be that the power of mind to affect mind by means of the channels of sense. Moreover, (3), our Lord's own teaching must be duly weighed, that His works were due to the indwelling Divine power. The nature of Jesus was strung to sympathy with the whole complex coil of human suffering and need. At the very moment of this occurrence His heart was full of intensest sympathy with the sorrowing ruler. Such a sympathy would present, quite apart from the immediate exercise of will, a fitting instrument for the Divine healing energy. The Divine power utilized and made more efficacious these already powerful sympathies and expectations; but while this is to be duly recognized, the chief emphasis is to be laid on the holy will of the unseen Father, with whom our Lord was morally and essentially one.

ITURÆA.—This term is used in Lk 3<sup>1</sup> among other designations of political and geographical districts, the identification of whose rulers is intended to give a fixed chronological starting-point for the ministry of John the Baptist. It does not occur as a substantive in any pre-Christian writer. Neither does it occur again in post-Christian literature until the days of Eusebius, and doubtfully then. The term 'Ituræans,' however, as the name of a people, is frequently mentioned. The first mention among Greek writers of the Ituræans is that of Eupolemus (B.C. 150) as Ἰτουραῖοι; Eusebius (Præp. Evan. ix. 30). Cicero (Prov. ii. 112) speaks of them as a predatory people, and Cæsar (Bell. Afr. 20) calls them skilful archers (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. xi. 3 Ἰτουραῖοι); but it is commonly agreed that the Ἰτουραῖοι of Eusebius and Naber's reading, Ἰτρούραροι is preferred; Strabo XVI. ii. 10, 18, 20; Dio Cass. xlix. 32. 5; Appian, Civ. v. 7; also Virgil, Georg. ii. 418; Lucan, Pharsal. vii. 230, 514).

The most important fact brought into view by the history of the Ituræans, so far as the understanding of Lk 3<sup>1</sup> is concerned, is their migratory character. They first appear as the sons of Jetur (Gn 28<sup>15</sup> 1 Ch 1<sup>31</sup>), a branch of the race of Ishmael

(cf. artt. 'Jetur' and 'Ishmael' in Hastings' DB). The original home was the territory to the S.E. of Palestine. In the course of their wanderings they drifted northward, and some time before the Exile reached the country adjacent to Israel, east of the Jordan. Late in the 2nd cent. B.C., Aristobulus I. drove out certain bands of non-Israelites who had settled in Galilee, and compelled them either to submit to circumcision or leave the country. It has been conjectured that among these there were some Ituræans, who moved still farther north. At any rate, in the next generation the Ituræans are definitely located in the region of Lebanon. Strabo (XVI. ii. 10) speaks of them as inhabiting the 'mountain country' which with Chalcis and Mar-syas was ruled by Ptolemy the son of Mennæus (B.C. 85-40). He further describes them in association with the Arabs as 'all lawless men dwelling in the mountain region of the Libanus and anti-Libanus territory,' and harassing the agricultural population of the adjacent plain. D. Amilius Secundus, a military commander under Quirinius, reports that in a campaign against the Ituræans in the Lebanon range, he had stormed a fortress of theirs (Mommsen, Fasti, p. 47, iv. 1881, p. 538). With the death of Herod, the government of this entire region passed into the hands of his son Lysanias, whom accordingly Dio Cassius calls 'king of the Ituræans' (xlix. 32). Lysanias was put to death by Mark Antony in B.C. 34, and a little over ten years later (B.C. 23) this territory came, by way of a lease, under the control of a chief named Zenodorus (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 1; BJ I. xx. 4); but in B.C. 20, upon the death of Zenodorus, Augustus gave a portion of it to Herod the Great; and when Herod's kingdom was broken up among his heirs into tetrarchies, it fell to the lot of Philip to possess it (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3; BJ II. vi. 3). Subsequently to the mention of Ituræa by St. Luke, the emperor Caligula bestowed it upon a certain Soemus (A.D. 38), entitled by Tacitus (Ann. xii. 23) and Dio Cassius (lix. 12) 'king of the Ituræans.' From A.D. 49, the date of the death of Soemus, and onwards, the country appears as a part of the province of Syria, furnishing a quota of soldiers for the Roman army (Ephem. Liturg. 1884, p. 194).

The mention of Ituræa by St. Luke raises the following questions: (1) Did he use the term as a noun or as an adjective? This is partly a question of correct Greek usage. A noun 'Ituræa' would be a linguistic anachronism at the time of St. Luke. It is unknown until the 4th cent.; but that the Evangelist fell into the error of using it as such is maintained by Schurer and H. Holtzmann, while Ram-ay (Expos., Feb. 1894, p. 144 ff., Apr. p. 288 ff.), contends against this position.*

(2) Out of this linguistic question grows the historical one: Did St. Luke speak accurately when he enumerated the Ituræan country as a part of the tetrarchy of Philip? For even if the Evangelist did use the word 'Ituræa' as an adjective, it does not follow that he correctly located the country. H. Holtzmann (Ituræa, Syn. Gosp. p. 58) calls it an error that Ituræa should be included with Trachonitis in Philip's tetrarchy, and explains that St. Luke probably had in mind a later arrangement of the territory under Agrippa. As a matter of fact, Josephus describes the tetrarchy of Philip as consisting of 'Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and certain parts of the house of Zeno (Zenodorus) about Paneas yielding a revenue of one hundred talents' (Ant. XVII. xi. 4; BJ II. vi. 3). Ituræa is not given in this description. But it does not seem probable that St. Luke, who is writing with so much regard for historical details, should have failed at this point. Hence efforts have been made to account for his statement as it stands. Of these it is easy to set aside as futile (a) the identification of Ituræa with Jedur (a region S.W. of Damascus), as etymologically unsound, and as not corresponding geographically to the descriptions given by Strabo. According to these, the Ituræans lived in a mountainous region. (b) Cheyne (art. 'Ituræa' in Encyc. Bibl.) proposes an interesting emendation of the text of Luke. Instead of Itroupalas he would read Αἰθριανίδος. But in order to get this substitution he assumes that by a transcriptional error α was dropped from Αἰθριανίδος, and the remainder of the word, thus left in confusion, was by another transcriptional manipulation converted into Itroupalas. Evidently this is too elaborate and too purely conjectural a proceeding to be accepted. (c) Statements of Eusebius (OS<sup>2</sup> p. 268, Itroupala ἡ καὶ Τραχωνίτις, and p. 298, Τραχωνίτις χώρα ἡ καὶ Itroupala; cf. also Jerome's translation of the same, 'Trachonitis regio sive Ituræa,' Lib. de Situ, etc., p. 238) definitely identify Ituræa and Trachonitis, and have been accepted as removing the difficulty. The terms Ituræa and 'Ituræa' do not, however, seem to be used by the Evangelist with the exact equivalency that the philology of Eusebius suggests. Hence (d) it is best not to identify Ituræa with Trachonitis as a whole, but to assume a certain overlapping of the two, giving a fairly painstaking writer ground for connecting them together in order to present the situation broadly. This conclusion is supported by the constantly changing character of the territory occupied by the Ituræans, as exhibited in the sketch of their history above given, as well as the repeated shifting of the boundary lines in this general region during the centuries before and after Christ.

JACOB.—1. According to the genealogical list in Matthew, Jacob ('Ἰακώβ) is the father of Joseph the husband of Mary (Mt 1<sup>15-16</sup>).

2. One of the reputed progenitors of the Jewish nation. Apart from the reference to Jacob's well

* The importance of this conclusion by Professor Ramsay, apart from the purely academic vindication of St. Luke as a master of good Greek, is that it establishes an analogy for the South-Galatian theory so strenuously advocated by himself.

early times (Ex 22<sup>3</sup> 35<sup>16</sup>, Lv 26<sup>42</sup>, 1 K 18<sup>36</sup>, 2 K 13<sup>23</sup>, Jer 33<sup>26</sup>, 1 Ch 29<sup>18</sup>, 2 Ch 30<sup>9</sup>), and occupied a place apart in Jewish thought. אָבִיּוֹת to the Rabbis, they alone were entitled to be called אָבִיּוֹת 'fathers.' To them was traced not only the origin of the nation, but also the beginning of true worship. As a descendant of these three, a Jew might claim nobility and a special relationship to God. This claim was recognized as אָבִיּוֹת of the fathers, and was based on Ex 32<sup>1</sup>. It was denounced by John the Baptist (see ABRAHAM, and cf. Mt 3<sup>9</sup>, Lk 3<sup>8</sup>), and it figured prominently in the conflicts between Jesus and the Pharisees (cf. Jn 8<sup>33</sup> 37). Apparently in the time of Jesus it was liable to be abused, and on this account later Rabbis refused to lay stress upon it, declaring it no longer valid. In Rabbinic literature, Jacob is recognized as the most important of the three patriarchs (cf. Lv 26<sup>42</sup>). He prevails with God (Gn 32<sup>28</sup>). He names the sanctuary the house of God (28<sup>22</sup>), and, in contrast to Abraham the father of Ishmael, and Isaac the father of Esau, Jacob inherits the promise in all his children (49).

LITERATURE.—A most suggestive analysis of the character of Jacob, and a full discussion of the problems of the narrative in Genesis, including the names 'Jacob' and 'Israel,' is given by Driver in Hastings' DB ii. 526-535; cf. also Chr. Ch. i. pp. 46-66; Gore, Studies in Bible, in ibid. i. 101-110; La Signification Historique des Noms des Patriarches Hébreux, in Mémoires de la Société Linguistique, vi. 150.

JACOB'S WELL.—On the arrest of John the Baptist by Herod Antipas, Jesus left Judaea and returned with His loosely-attached followers to Galilee (Mk 1<sup>14</sup>). He travelled by 'the great north road' through Samaria. This road, after skirting the W. edge of the plain of Mukhlneh, and passing under the slopes of Gerizim, enters the wide bay forming the approach to the Vale of Nablus. Here it divides, one branch striking west the other going north across the bay, past the ruins and ruins of Askar. In the fork of these roads is Jacob's Well (Bir Yāqūb), where Jesus, being wearied with His journey,—it was about the hour of noon,—sat down and rested (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>).

The well is described (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>) as in the neighbourhood of 'a city of Samaria called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph.' This parcel of ground (χαρπὸν) is evidently the plot referred to in Gn 33<sup>18-19</sup> as lying 'before' (or 'to the east of') Shechem, which Jacob purchased from the native Shechemites for 100 qosittahs. Somewhere within its borders the bones of Joseph were afterwards buried (Jos 24<sup>32</sup>, cf. Ac 7<sup>36</sup>); and the plot came to have for the N. Kingdom the kind of sanctity that Machpelah had for the Kingdom of Judah. It is nowhere recorded that Jacob dug a well here; but the fact had become a matter of common and well-established belief by the time of Jesus, and no serious doubt has since been raised as to the origin or locality of the well. The traditional sites of Jacob's Well and Joseph's Tomb (a little to the N.) are acknowledged by Jews, Christians, and Moslems alike. The well goes back to Eusebius (OS, s.v. 'Sychar'). See also art. SYCHAR.

In v. 8 the well is called πηγή ('fountain') τοῦ Ἰακώβ; in v. 11 the woman refers to it as τὸ φρέαρ ('the cistern or pit') which Jacob gave. The latter is the more exact description, inasmuch as it 'is not an ain, a well of living water, but a ber, a cistern to hold water' (PEFSst, 1897, p. 197). Rain-water probably formed the greater part of its supply, though another smaller portion may have been due to infiltration from the surrounding strata. This would partly account for the 'great local reputation' of the water 'for purity and flavour among the natives of El-Askar and Nablus.' The neighbouring springs were 'heavy' (or hard), being strongly mineralized with lime, while Jacob's Well (or softer) water, 'cool, palatable, and refreshing' (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 676). The woman's presence at the well at noon may have been due to the fact that she was seeking water for workmen on the adjacent coinlands, rather than for domestic use (PEFSst, 1897, p. 149). The sacred associations of the spot, together with the 'real excellence' of the water, probably drew visitors regularly both from Askar ( $\frac{2}{3}$  mile away) and from Nablus ( $\frac{1}{2}$  miles distant), in spite of nearer and more copious supplies.

The true mouth of the well is several feet below the surface, and beneath a ruined vault, which once formed part of the ancient cruciform church mentioned by Arculph (A.D. 700), and referred to by Jerome (OS, s.v. 'Sychar'). This narrow opening, 4 ft. long and just wide enough to admit the body of a man, broadens out into the cylindrical tank or well itself, which is about  $7\frac{1}{2}$  ft. in diameter and over 100 feet deep (G. A. Smith, l.c. p. 373). The interior appears to have been lined throughout with masonry, and thick layers of debris cover the bottom.\*

If the uniform tradition as to the well's origin be correct, probably the incomer Jacob sank this 'deep' pit to avoid collision with the natives among whom he settled. A well of his own, on his own ground, would make him secure and independent.

JAIRUS.—1. The name Idepos occurs in Mk 5<sup>22</sup> and in the L (8<sup>41</sup>), but not in Mt. (9<sup>18</sup>). Such ἰδῖπος, Idepos, Idepos (as Cod. A) are also to be met with in the MSS. It cannot be positively identified with the Heb. name יָאִיר (as in Jg 10<sup>3</sup> = prob. 'Jahweh enlightens'), the LXX equivalent of which is variously Iaelp, Iahp, Ialp, by simple transposition. In favour of regarding Idepos as the form of the Heb. name is the fact that this form occurs in LXX in Est 2<sup>5</sup> for יָאִיר, the father of Mordecai (Cod. A, by a curious slip, has Iarpós), as also in the LXX Est 11<sup>2</sup>, where the EV has 'Jairus' as the name of the same person. In any case, however, analogy permits the adoption of 'Jair' as the English equivalent of Idepos; and were the name in familiar vogue, like such names as 'Paul,' this would naturally be its form. The AV 'Jairus' follows the Vulg. (Wyckif, 'Jayrus'). Note the RV 'Jairus,' fixing it as a trisyllable; and cf. other modes of transcription, as e.g. 'Jaeirus' (Twentieth Cent. NT, ed. 1904).

Cheyne (Ency. Bibl. ii s.v.) regards the name as una thetic, 'the spontaneous invention of a pious and poetic imagination.' He rejects its identification with OT יָאִיר, and yet he does not hesitate to explain it by reference to יָעִיר, simply because the meaning of the latter (to awaken, to rouse) suits his theory of a later addition to the story. This is quite arbitrary and unconvincing. (Note, the name יָעִיר occurs in 1 Ch 20<sup>5</sup> as the Keri, יָעִיר.)

2. Jairus is described in Mk. as εἰς τὴν ἀρχισυναγωγὴν (5<sup>22</sup>) and similarly afterwards as ἀρχισυναγωγος. Lk.'s ἀρχων τῆς συναγωγῆς (8<sup>41</sup>) is perhaps simply explanatory of this term which he himself uses later (v. 49). Mt. has ἀρχων alone (9<sup>18</sup>); but there is no need to suppose that this is intended to represent Jairus as a member of the Sanhedrin, or in any other capacity than that indicated in the other Gospels. The brevity and conciseness of the form in which Mt. gives the story probably explain this loose use of ἀρχων. Wyclif's 'prince' here is due to the Vulg. princeps, and elsewhere he invariably uses 'prince of the synagogue' as ἀρχισυναγωγος. The Vulg., however, uses archisynagogus in the Markan passage, whilst in Lk 8<sup>33</sup> it has principem synagogae, perhaps through the influence of the phrase in v.<sup>41</sup>. The Gr. term exactly = the Heb. title מְשִׁנֵּי שָׂרָא, and the office held by Jairus had well-defined functions. Pre-eminently the 'ruler' (al. 'president' or 'leader') was the director of public worship. Schurer holds that generally there was 'but one archisynagogus for each synagogue' (HJP II. ii. 65). The expression used in Mk 5<sup>22</sup> quite agrees with this, as it describes the class to which Jairus belonged (one of the 'synagogue-rulers' or 'synagogue-presidents') rather than a particular body of 'rulers' of which he was a member. The locality of the synagogue in which he held office is not definitely indicated. See artt. RULER and SYNAGOGUE.

3. In the triple narrative in which Jairus figures, Mk 5<sup>22-43</sup> = Mt 9<sup>18-26</sup> = Lk 8<sup>40-56</sup>, the condensed form of Mt.'s account is most noticeable. In addition to the omission of the ruler's name and the loose use of ἀρχων (see above), there is no mention of the servant who met our Lord and Jairus on the way with the news that the child was dead (Mk 5<sup>35</sup> = Lk 8<sup>48</sup>). In harmony with this, whilst Mk. says she was in extremis (ἐσχάτως ἔχει), and Lk. that she 'was dying' (ἀπέθνησκειν), when her father came to Jesus, Mt. represents her as already dead (ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐπελεύθησεν). Perhaps, as a matter of structure, the prefatory link in Mt 9<sup>18</sup> may be compared with the phrase in Mk 5<sup>35</sup> (= Lk 8<sup>48</sup>) ἐπεὶ αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος, with a bearing on this point.

Cheyne thinks the Mt form of the story the most original, and notes the difference between Mt. on this point as due to the fact that Mt. alone would have had a sufficiently bold faith to ask Jesus to restore one who was already dead. So far as that goes, however, the Markan account is parallel with the situation in the story of Lazarus (Jn 11); and we have no other instance in the Gospels besides this in Mt. of a request that one dead should be restored to life. Compression still best accounts for the form in Matthew. The account of the actual restoration to life is also given with the greatest brevity.

The effort to explain this incident as a case of restoration from trance is not quite successful. Mk.'s narrative would admit of such an interpretation, but Lk.'s definite phrases in vv.<sup>33, 55</sup> distinctly fix the sense otherwise. In the primitive tradition the daughter of Jairus was believed to have been brought back from death to life. The story as a whole is full of grace and beauty, and 'belongs to the earliest stratum of the Gospel tradition' (Cheyne, Ency. Bibl. ut supra).

JAMES (Heb. יָעֲקֹב, Gr. Ἰακώβ, Ἰάκωβος. The English name James is analogous to the Portuguese Xaime and Gael. Hamish).—The name does not occur in the OT except in the case of the patriarch, but had become common in NT times, and is borne by several persons mentioned in the Gospels. Passing over the father of Joseph the husband of the Virgin Mary, according to St. Matthew's genealogy (Mt 1<sup>16</sup> where the form is Ἰακώβ), we have—1. James the father (AV 'brother') of Judas, Lk 6<sup>16</sup> ('not Iscariot,' Jn 14<sup>22</sup>, the Thaddæus of Mt. and Mk.). The AV translation is derived from the Latin of Beza, and is due to a confusion of this Judas with a quite different person, Judas (Jude) the 'brother of James' (Jude<sup>1</sup>, Mt 13<sup>35</sup>). The older English versions have either 'Judas of James' (Wyclif = Vulg. Iudam Iacobi) or 'Judas James' sonne' (Tindale, etc.). Further, St. Luke's practice is to insert ἀδελφός when he means 'brother' (Lk 3<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>14</sup>, Ac 12<sup>2</sup>). Nothing more is known of this James.

2. James the brother of John (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>, Mk 3<sup>17</sup>, Lk 6<sup>14</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>), elder * son of Zebedee, a well-to-do Galilean fisherman, most probably a native of Capernaum. The call of James to Apostleship is related in Mt 4<sup>21, 22</sup>, Mk 1<sup>19, 20</sup> and (perhaps) Lk 5<sup>10</sup>. The two sons of Zebedee appear to have been partners (κοινωνοί, μέτοχοι) with Peter in the fishing industry. Their mother's name was Salome, who was probably a sister of the Virgin Mary (see art. SALOME). The two brothers received from our Lord the name Boanerges ('sons of thunder'), perhaps because of their impetuous zeal for their Master's honour, shown by incidents like the wish to call down fire to consume certain Samaritans who refused Him a passage through their country (Lk 9<sup>54</sup>; cf. Mk 9<sup>38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>49-50</sup>). James is specially mentioned as present at the healing of Peter's wife's mother (Mk 1<sup>29</sup>), at the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5<sup>37</sup>), at the Transfiguration (Mk 9<sup>2</sup>), at the Mount of Olives during the great 'eschatological' discourse (Mk 13<sup>3</sup>), and at the agony in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mk 14<sup>33</sup>). On two of these occasions, the first and the fourth, Andrew is associated with the three; but on all the others, Peter, James, and John are alone with Christ. The special favour accorded to the two brothers (and perhaps their kinship to Jesus) probably prompted the ambitious request of Salome that they might sit as assessors to Him in His kingdom (Mk 10<sup>35-40</sup>, Mt 20<sup>20-28</sup>). James was called upon to 'drink the cup' of suffering (Mk 10<sup>38, 39</sup>) first of all the Apostolic band, being beheaded by Herod Agrippa I. in A.D. 44 (Ac 12<sup>2</sup>). An untrustworthy tradition represents him as preaching the gospel in Spain, of which country he is patron saint. Eusebius (HE II. 9) relates, on the authority of Clement of Alexandria, that, when he was tried for his life, his accuser was so greatly affected by his constancy that he declared himself a Christian, and died with him after obtaining his forgiveness and blessing. See, further, Il-lustrations DB II. 541.

3. James the son of Alphæus, one of the Twelve (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>, Mk 3<sup>18</sup>, Lk 6<sup>15</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>). In each list he stands at the head of the third group along with Simon Zelotes (with whom he is coupled by St. Luke), Judas of James (= Thaddæus, with whom he is coupled by Mt. and Mk.), and Judas Iscariot. The Gospels tell us nothing more about him, but he was most likely a brother of Matthew, who also was a 'son of Alphæus' (cf. Mt 9<sup>9</sup> with Mk 2<sup>14</sup>). He has been identified with (4) and (5); but the probabilities seem to the present writer to be against the former identification, while the latter is almost certainly wrong.

4. James ὁ μικρός § (Mk 15<sup>40</sup>; cf. Mt 27<sup>56</sup>, Jn 19<sup>25</sup>). He is mentioned as the son of a Mary, probably the wife of Clopas, one of the 'other women' of whom the other three were Mary the Lord's mother, Mary Magdalene, and Salome, present at the crucifixion. This Mary, with Mary Magdalene, re-

* The usual order is 'James and John.' St. Luke sometimes inverts the order (Ac 1<sup>13</sup>), probably because of the early death of John, which is noted in the prominence of John.

† The 'other women' (Mk 13<sup>3</sup>). His wife was one of those who ministered to Christ 'of their substance' (Mk 15<sup>41</sup>, Lk 8<sup>3</sup>).

‡ The question whether the Lukan narrative refers to the same incident as that related by Mt. and Mk. is not easy to decide. Hammond, Trench, Wordsworth, and other commentators answer in the affirmative; Alfred Guillebert, on the negative. Plummer ('St. Luke' in Intercat. Crit. Com.) is doubtful. A. Wright regards it as a (culinary) of the Markan narrative with that found in Jn 21<sup>6</sup>. The characteristic features of the Lukan account are: (1) there is no mention of Andrew or Zebedee; (2) St. Peter is the prominent figure; (3) there is no command to follow Christ; (4) the fishermen are washing (not casting or mending) their nets; (5) there is a miraculous draught of fishes.

§ St. Jerome's rendering minor (Vulg. Maria Jacobi minoris), on which he founds an argument for the identification of this James with (3) and (5), takes no account of the fact that the Greek is positive, not comparative.

mained to see where Jesus was buried. She had another son Joseph. Those who identify this James with (3) argue that Alphæus (Ἀλφᾶιος, ἄλφ) and Clopas (Κλωπᾶς) are two forms of the same name (Meyer, Alford). Philologically this is improbable. The extant Syriac Versions render 'Alphæus' by Chalpa, while 'Clopas' is rendered by Kleopha. Nor can it be said to be absolutely certain that ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ of Jn 19<sup>25</sup> means the wife of Clopas. It may mean 'daughter of Clopas.' And it is unlikely that St. Mark would describe James the son of Alphæus by a name which James 'the Little' (in stature).* It is hard to see why St. John, writing for readers acquainted with the Synoptic Gospels, should introduce into his Gospel the name Clopas if he meant Alphæus. On the whole, therefore, we must conclude with Ewald (Hist. of Israel, vi. 305, note 4) that the identification is unlikely.† Of this James we know nothing further.

5. James the Lord's brother. He is mentioned by name twice in the Gospels (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>, Mk 6<sup>3</sup>). He is the eldest of four brothers, James, Joseph, Judas, and Simon (Simon and Judas, Mt 13<sup>55</sup>). Other references to the Brethren of the Lord are found in Mt 12<sup>46-50</sup>, Mk 3<sup>31-35</sup>, Lk 8<sup>19-21</sup>, Jn 7<sup>3-5</sup>. From these passages we learn that they thought Him mad, and opposed His work. St. John tells us plainly that His brethren did not believe in Him.

The Epistle of James is named, which is almost universally acknowledged to be the brother of the Lord, is of the greatest interest to students of the Gospels. There is no Epistle which contains in a small compass so many allusions to the teaching of Christ subsequently contained in the Epistle. The following list includes all the more striking parallels: Mt 5<sup>2</sup> 7<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>22</sup> 23 34-37 = Ja 2<sup>5</sup> 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48 49 50 51 52 53 54 55 56 57 58 59 60 61 62 63 64 65 66 67 68 69 70 71 72 73 74 75 76 77 78 79 80 81 82 83 84 85 86 87 88 89 90 91 92 93 94 95 96 97 98 99 100. Cf. also Mt 12<sup>36</sup> with Ja 3<sup>2</sup>, Mt 18<sup>4</sup> with Ja 4<sup>6</sup>; Lk 6<sup>24</sup> = Ja 5<sup>1</sup>; Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup> = Ja 4<sup>14</sup>; Lk 8<sup>15</sup> 21<sup>19</sup> (ὑπομονή, used by Lk. only in the Gospels) = Ja 1<sup>3</sup> 4 5<sup>11</sup>; Jn 3<sup>3</sup> = Ja 1<sup>17</sup>; Jn 5<sup>1</sup> = Ja 1<sup>25</sup>; Jn 13<sup>17</sup> = Ja 4<sup>17</sup>. On these parallels may be remarked (1) that, while some of them may be explained as coincidences, there remain others which even Renan (l'Antéchrist, p. 54) admits to be reminiscences of the words of Jesus; (2) that the evidence is cumulative, and includes correspondence in teaching (e.g. on riches, formalism, prayer) as well as in language; (3) that the most striking parallels are with the Gospel according to St. Matthew, and with the earlier parts of that, suggesting the possibility that James may at first have been a hearer of our Lord, and making it fairly certain that he was acquainted with the special Matthaean 'source.'

A second point to be noticed is that the Epistle of James is clearly the work of one trained in the strict observance of the Law, while at the same time his obedience to it is the obedience of zealous love, as far removed as possible from the Pharisaic formalism denounced by our Lord (Ja 1<sup>22-27</sup> 2<sup>3-12</sup> 4<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>10</sup> 11). Both in his case and in that of St. Paul, although they developed on somewhat different lines, the Law was a παιδαγωγὸς εἰς Χριστόν. This view of the training of James, and of his view of our Lord his Brother, is confirmed by the names of the four brothers, James, Joseph, Simon (=Simeon), and Jude (=Judah), are those of patriarchs. The parents are careful to observe the Law in our Lord's case (Lk 2<sup>21-24</sup> 39. 41. 42).

The Western Church, in regarding James the Lord's brother as identical with James the son of Alphæus, seems to have been influenced by the authority of Jerome, who, in replying to Helvidius (circa 383 A.D.), urges that, as James the Lord's brother is called James by St. Paul (Gal 1<sup>18</sup> 19), he must be identical with James the son of Alphæus, since James the son of Zebedee was dead; that he was our Lord's first cousin. (Jerome does not identify Alphæus with Clopas). But it may be observed (1) that Jerome himself seems to have abandoned this view (Ep. cxx. ad Hedibram); (2) that δέλεφός never = ἀνεψιός in the NT; (3) that James the brother of the Lord is always distinguished from the Twelve (Jn 2<sup>12</sup>, Ac 1<sup>14</sup>; cf. Mt 12<sup>47-50</sup>); (4) that 'His brethren did not believe in him' (Jn 7<sup>3</sup> 5); (5) that the word ἀπόστολος, on which Jerome relies, is not confined to the Twelve (Ac 14<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>7</sup>).* [For a fuller discussion of the question see the article BRETHREN OF THE LORD].

JEALOUSY.—This word is not used in the Gospels, though in 2<sup>17</sup> has ὁ ζῆλος τοῦ οἴκου σου = 'thy jealousy for thy house'; and one of the names of Simon ὁ ζηλωτής (Lk 6<sup>15</sup>, Ac 1<sup>6</sup> 13 Simon ὁ Καναανὸς (Mk 3<sup>18</sup>), a man who had belonged to that party in the Jewish State which was so jealous for the honour of God in Israel that it would have resented any other (e.g. by the Jews to Cæsar) as a form of treason. But the thing which the OT means by zeal, in all its aspects, is everywhere present in the NT, and especially in the Gospels.

1. The jealousy of God. The OT is connected with the truth that He is God alone, and it is expressed mainly in two ways. First, in the exclusive claims which He makes for Himself 'Thou shalt have no other gods before me' (Ex 20<sup>3</sup>); 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy

‡ Fuller lists will be found in May or Epistle of St. James (2nd ed.), xxxv-xxxviii, Salmon, Introduction to N.T., 4.3 (5th ed.); Zahn, Erklärung, i. p. 87; Knowling, St. James, xxi-xxiii.

* In favour of the identification of (3), (4), and (5) it is sometimes urged that it is unlikely there would be four persons, all named James, closely connected with our Lord. But it must be remembered (1) that the name was certain to be popular among patriotic Jews; (2) that 'Jewish names in ordinary use at that time were very few' (Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 268). Twelve persons are mentioned in the NT as bearing the name Simon (Simeon), and nine that of Joseph (Joses).

heart,' etc. (Dt 6<sup>5</sup>); 'I am the Lord, that is my name; and my glory will I not give to another, neither my praise unto any' (Is 42<sup>8</sup>). This exclusiveness or 'I am the Lord'—God—His jealousy for Himself, as it may be called—pervades the OT. It is the source of that which He puts upon the human race to learn the most important lesson which the mind is capable of receiving, that there is one only, the living and true God. This is the presupposition not only of all uplifting religion, but of all science, and of all morality which rises above caste and convention; and what we see in the OT is the jealousy of God working monotheism into the constitution of a race who should impart it to the world. In this sense the jealousy of God is represented in the mind of Christ by the exclusive claims which He makes for Himself, and in the rest of the NT by the reiteration of these claims through the lips of His disciples. Sometimes the expression of it is informal: e.g. 'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me' (Mt 10<sup>47</sup>); or, 'Blessed is he whosoever shall find none occasion of stumbling in me' (11<sup>6</sup>). Sometimes, again, it is quite explicit: 'No one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (11<sup>27</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel this tone predominates, and there could not be more precise and formal expressions of the jealousy of God, as God is revealed in Christ, than are found, e.g., in Jn 1<sup>18</sup> 8<sup>24</sup> 14<sup>9</sup> (see art. PREACHING CHRIST). This jealousy of God for Himself is echoed: 'There is none other name' (1<sup>31</sup>); 'Other foundation can no man lay,' etc., Gal 1<sup>8</sup>. 'Though we or an angel from heaven should preach unto you any other gospel,' etc.: the peculiarity of the Pauline as opposed to the Judaizing gospel being that it ascribed the whole of salvation to Christ alone, and did not share His glory with the Law, and 2 Jn 9<sup>1</sup>.

The second way in which the jealousy of God expresses itself in the OT is in God's unreserved love for Himself with His people. It is a jealousy for them, in which their cause is His, in which His honour (if such a word can be used in such a connexion) is touched if they are wronged, in which His love rises into passion, and takes on itself responsibilities for them of which they would not have dared to think. Sometimes this, too, is informally expressed: e.g. 'He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye' (Zec 2<sup>8</sup>). Sometimes it is quite explicit: e.g. the great Messianic promises of Is 9<sup>11</sup> are sealed in v. 7 by 'The jealousy of Jahweh of hosts shall do this.' Cf. also the striking passage Zec 8<sup>22</sup>. All this is reproduced in the mind and words of Jesus. He is jealous for His people, especially for 'the little ones' (who, however, are not so much a class of Christians, as Christians generally—a weak and inconsiderable folk in ordinary eyes), and nothing that concerns them is alien to Him. The very slightest service done them has a reward solemnly assured to it (Mt 10<sup>42</sup>); the sin of causing one of them to stumble is denounced with a passion which startles us still as we read (18<sup>6</sup>); cf. art. ANGER, 2 (a). The most thrilling illustration of this jealousy of Jesus for His 'little ones' is given in the Final Judgment: 'Inasmuch as ye did it (or, did it not) to one of these least, my brethren, ye did it (or, did it not) unto me' (25<sup>40, 45</sup>). Jealous love can go no further than this.

2. Since God especially God revealed in Christ, is in this twofold sense a jealous God, it is clear that there must be in the Christian religion and character a corresponding intensity and passion. Christians ought to be jealous for Christ, sensitive to all that dishonours Him, and especially to all that degrades Him from the place which He claims, and which belongs to Him alone. The NT gives Him what is above the name which is above every name; and it is necessary for Him to give Him only a name—to classify Him, as is often done, with prophets or religious heroes or founders of religions. Jealousy, no doubt, is apt to be a turbid virtue; the OT examples of it—Phinehas, Elijah, and Jehu—all illustrate this; and even in Christian history jealousy for Jesus as sole Lord and Saviour has often been confounded with zeal for a definition of one's own making, or for the predominance of one's own ecclesiastical or political faction. Of all virtues, it is the one which most readily calls the old man into the field to reinforce the new, a process which always ends in disaster. Nevertheless, it is the primary virtue of a Christian, just as the keeping of the first commandment was the primary virtue of a Jew.

3. Apart from their use in the sense of an ardent and exclusive devotion to God in Christ, and to the cause of Christ in His people (2 Co 11<sup>2</sup>), the associations of the words ζῆλος, ζηλοῦν in the NT are rather repellent. Sometimes ζῆλος is anger (Ac 5<sup>17</sup>), the Heb אָרָץ being at least once rendered θυμός in LXX; often it is envy (Ac 13<sup>45</sup>: so the verb 7<sup>17</sup>); in this sense, too, it is frequently combined with ἐρις (Ro 13<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>30</sup>, Gal 5<sup>20</sup>); only rarely does it denote a keen and affectionate interest (2 Co 7<sup>11</sup>). But this last sense is the one which is really congruous with the fundamental import of jealousy: the sense of self-respect and of honour in the God who is revealed in Christ as Love.

JECHONIAH.—Also called in OT Jehoiachin and Coniah; mentioned in Mt 1<sup>12</sup> as a link in our Lord's genealogy.

JEHOSHAPHAT.—A king of Judah, named in our Lord's genealogy (Mt 1<sup>8</sup>).

JERICHO was situated in the valley of the Jordan, about 5 miles west of the river and about 6 north of the Dead Sea. The distance between Jerusalem and Jericho was about 17 miles. The immediate neighbourhood enjoyed the advantage of (2 K 2<sup>19</sup>), and showed great fertility, 'city of palms' (Dt 34<sup>8</sup>, 2 Ch 28<sup>15</sup>), and Josephus gives an enthusiastic account of the abundance and variety of its products (BJ IV. viii. 2, 3).

The Jericho which was destroyed by Joshua was a considerable town, characterized by the wealth of its inhabitants and the strength of its fortifications (Jos 6 and 7). The rebuilding of the city is described in 1 K 16<sup>34</sup>, but the place is referred to a. 1 Ch 19<sup>5</sup>. A school of prophets, Jericho that Elijah and Elisha went down references are found in 2 Ch 23<sup>15</sup>, 2 K 25<sup>20</sup>, 32<sup>73</sup>.

In the time of our Lord, Jericho was a large and important town. Although granted the revenues of Jericho and the surrounding district to Cleopatra, and these were turned over to Herod the Great. Afterwards Herod received Jericho by gift from Augustus, and erected a citadel, which he called Cypros, above the town. He also built within the city a palace, in which he died. This palace was rebuilt by Herod Archelaus after it had been burned down by Simon during the troubles which followed upon the death of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. XVII. x. 6 and xiii. 1). After the deposition of Herod Archelaus as tetrarch of Judaea, Jericho was held directly by the Roman procurator, who farmed out its revenues.

Modern Jericho (er-Riha) is a miserable village of 300 inhabitants; the forest of palms has entirely disappeared, and only here and there can traces of the former fertility of the district be seen. The exact site of the Canaanite Jericho does not correspond with that of the modern village, and probably there were two towns, a little apart from one another, which, during the prosperity of the Roman occupation, may have been united by continuous building.

By tradition, Jericho has been closely associated with the Baptism of Jesus and the Temptation. The site of Bethany or Bethabara (wh. see), however, cannot be fixed with certainty, and some (e.g. Conder) maintain that the ford east from Jericho cannot be the place, but rather a ford farther north, lying east from Cana of Galilee. The traditional scene of the Temptation is a mountain called from this association Quarantania, lying to the west of Jericho. But the uncertainty of the scene of the Baptism and the vagueness of the phrase 'the wilderness' (Mt 4<sup>1</sup> ||) make this a matter of tradition only.

From Jericho to Jerusalem there are three roads. The central one of these is the most direct, and was that used by pilgrims going from Galilee to Jerusalem, who took the circuitous route in order to avoid entering Samaria. It is an extremely arduous path, and wayfarers were much exposed to the attacks of robbers, who easily found secure concealment among the bare and rugged hills which it traversed: a fact which gives vividness to the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>30</sup>). This road was that which Jesus took on His last journey to Jerusalem. After the raising of Lazarus, Jesus and His disciples withdrew 'into a city called Ephraim' (Jn 11<sup>54</sup>). (On its site see art. EPHRAIM). From this place Jesus could see the pilgrim bands from Galilee going down to Jericho on their way to Jerusalem. And in all probability, when 'the Passover was nigh at hand,' He joined one of these bands, and so paid that visit to Jericho with which the names of Bartimæus and Zacchæus are associated. See art. ### Literature.

1. NAME.—This appears in the Gospels as Ἱεροσόλυμα and Ἱερουσαλήμ. The former of these names, and the more used, appears to have come into common vogue a century or so before the commencement of the Christian era. It occurs in 2 Maccabees (3<sup>9</sup>), in the Letter of Aristeas, and in Strabo, and it is the form always employed by Latin Pagan writers, e.g. Cicero, Pliny, Lucan. It is employed transliterated as Ἱεροσόλυμα. Ἱερουσαλήμ unquestionably is much nearer to the Hebrew ירושלים, however this was vocalized, and is therefore the more primitive. St. Luke specially employs this both in his Gospel and in the Acts. It is noticeable that it is the form put into the mouth of Jesus when His words are professedly reported verbatim (Mt 23<sup>37</sup>, Lk 13<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>38</sup>). The name Jerusalem, as used throughout the Western world, and the Arabic form used in Palestine to-day, Yerusalīm, are both derived from this Greek form. In Mt 4<sup>5</sup> 27<sup>53</sup> we have the expression, used previously too in the OT, 'the holy city' This is familiar to us in Western lands, but it is also, for other reasons, the name for Jerusalem throughout the Moslem world. El-Kuds, or, more classically, el-Mukaddas, 'the sanctuary,' or 'holy place,' is the common name for this city in the East.

2. NATURAL SITE.—Modern Jerusalem occupies a situation which is defined as 31° 46' 45" N. lat. by 35° 13' 25" E. long. It is situated on a high plain, and lies at levels between 2300 and 2500 feet above the Mediterranean. It is overlooked by somewhat higher ground to the N., to the E., and the South. On the West the outlook is somewhat more open, but even here the view is not very extensive; only along a narrow line to the S.E. a gap in the mountains exposes to view a long strip of the beautiful mountains of Moab across the Dead Sea, itself invisible in its deep basin. Although the exact situation of the city has varied considerably during historical times, yet the main natural features which gave Jerusalem its strength—and its weakness—both as a fortress and as a sanctuary, may be easily recognized to-day. Built, as it has been, in a peculiarly bare and ill-watered region, off the natural lines of communication, it could never have enjoyed its long and famous history but for certain compensating features. The site lies slightly to the east of the great mountainous backbone of Palestine, upon a tongue-shaped ridge running from N.W. to S.E. This 'tongue' is the central of three branches given off at this point. The N.E. one terminates opposite the city as the Mount of Olives, while a southern branch, given off near the highest point before the modern Jaffa road commences to descend to the city, runs almost due south, and terminates near the commencement of the Wady el-Ward, at a point on which is situated to-day the summer residence of the Greek Patriarch, known as Katamin. The whole mountain group is isolated from its base by the N.W. and W. by the deep Wady es-Surâr, and to the S.W. by the roots of the Wady en-Nâr and other steep valleys running down towards the Jordan and the Dead Sea. To the north and south, where the ancient caravan road from Hebron and the Negeb runs towards Samaria and Galilee, it is separated from the main backbone by only shallow and open valleys. The special ridge of land on which Jerusalem stands is roughly quadrilateral in shape, but merges itself into higher ground towards the N. and N.W. The surface direction is generally downwards from N. to S., with a slight tilt towards the E.; this is due to the dip of the strata, which run E.S.E. Like all this part of the country, the rocky formation is grey chalky limestone, deposited in beds of varying hardness. The least durable, which still lies on the surface of the Mount of Olives, having been denuded here, the top layer over the city's site, is a hard limestone with which is known locally as the Mezzeh. This is the most suitable for building-stone, though the hardest to work upon. Under this are thick strata of a soft white stone of uniform consistence, known locally as Melchir. These softer layers have been of the greatest importance in the history of the city, as in them have been excavated the countless caves, cisterns, and tombs which cover the whole district, and from them in ancient times most of the building-stones were taken. In many places this Melchir rock when first excavated is quite soft and easily worked with the most primitive tools, but on exposure to the air it rapidly hardens. The stones from this soft layer, however, never have the durability of those from the Mezzeh; and doubtless it is because of the poor material used that so few relics of real antiquity have survived till to-day. Under the Meleki is a layer of dolomite limestone which comes to the surface in the valley to the south of the city, and is of importance, because along its non-porous surface the water, which percolates through the other layers, is conducted upwards to the one spring—the Virgin's Fountain.

* The statement is frequently met with, in connexion with our Lord's treatment of Zacchæus and also in connexion with the parable of the Good Samaritan, that Jericho was a sacerdotal city. In regard to this, it is certain that the priests and Levites did not all reside in Jerusalem, but were scattered throughout the towns and villages of Judea. Jericho, as within easy reach of Jerusalem and an important place, may have been a favourite residence for the priests (see Schurer, UJP ii. 1. 229).

The enormous accumulation of débris over the ancient site renders it difficult to picture to-day its primitive condition. The extensive investigations made here during the past fifty years, as well as the examination of many kindred sites in other parts of Palestine, lead to the conclusion that the whole area before human habitation consisted of an irregular, rocky surface, broken up by a number of small shallow valleys in which alone there was sufficient soil for vegetation. To-day the rock is everywhere covered with a layer of a depth varying from 40 to 70 or more feet. Only those who understand how much this vast accumulation has blotted out the ancient natural landmarks can realize how very difficult are even the essential and elementary questions of Jerusalem topography.

Of the broad natural features that survive, most manifest are the two great valleys which demark the before-mentioned tongue of land. The Eastern Valley commences a mile north of the city wall in a shallow depression near the watershed, a little to the N. of the highest point on the Jaffa road. It at first runs S.E., and is shallow and open: it is here known as the Wady el-Jôz. It then turns due south, and soon becomes a ravine with steep sides, called by the Moslems the Wady Sittî Mirâm, and by Christians since the 4th cent. the Valley of Jehoshaphat* (a name very probably connected originally with the neighbouring village of Shafat, and corrupted to Jehoshaphat because of J1 32<sup>12</sup>). This ravine, on reaching the north-western extremity of the village of Silwan, turns S.W. and forms the Western Valley near the well now called Birket el-Sultan. In ancient times this part of the valley with its steep and, in places, precipitous sides, must have formed a most efficient protection to the whole E. and S.E. sides of the city. It is mentioned in the NT as the 'brook' (χελυαππος) Kidron (Jn 18<sup>1</sup>). The valley is almost all the year quite dry, but after a sudden heavy storm quite a considerable torrent may pour down its centre. The present writer has traversed the road along the lower parts of the valley immediately after such rain, with the water half-way to his knees.

The Western Valley—known to-day as the Wady er-Rabâbi—is shorter and more crooked than that on the East. It commences to the S. of the modern Jaffa road close to the Birket Mamilla, its head being now occupied by a large Moslem burying-ground. After running E. towards the Jaffa Gate—near which it has been extensively filled up with rubbish during recent years—it curves south, and some 300 yards down is crossed by the arched, though now half-buried, 'low-level aqueduct.' A little further on it is transformed by the erection of a barrier across its breadth into a great pool—the Birket es-Sultân. Below the barrier it rapidly deepens and curves S.E., until at Bîr Eyûb it joins the Kidron Valley; the new valley formed by their union runs, under the name of the Wady en-Nôr (the Valley of Fire), down to the Dead Sea. The Wady er-Rabâbi is very generally considered to be the Valley of Hinnom. Several good authorities are against this identification, but for the present purpose there is no need to enter into this discussion and here it may be provisionally accepted. Although not so steep a valley as the Eastern one, the Wady er-Rabâbi presented a much more effective protection to the walls in ancient days than present conditions suggest. In NT times it must have made attack along the whole W. and S.W. sides almost impracticable. Only to the N. and N.W. was the city without natural defence, and it was from these points that she always proved vulnerable.

The quadrilateral plateau enclosed by these valleys, about half a mile in breadth and some 1000 acres in extent, was subdivided by several shallow natural valleys. Of these the most important, and the only one which to-day is clearly seen, is a valley known as el-Wad. This, the present Damascus Gate, runs in a curved direction, dividing the modern city into two unequal halves, and after passing out near the Dung Gate joins the Kidron Valley at the Pool of Siloam. Although extensively filled up in places, the outline of the valley may still be clearly seen from any high point in the city near the Damascus Gate, and its bed is to-day traversed by one of the two carriage roads in the city. Though crossed near the Bab es-Silsileh by an artificial causeway in which was discovered 'Wilson's Arch,' it again appears near the Jews' Wailing-place, much of its bed being even to-day waste ground. At this point the W. hill still preserves something of its precipitous face,* but on its E. side it is largely encroached upon by the S.W. corner of the Haram. This valley is evidently that described as the Tyropœon or Cheese-vale, and by it the whole natural site of Jerusalem is divided into Western and Eastern hills.

The broader and loftier Western hill is without doubt that called by Josephus the Upper Market-place and the Upper City, and it is the one which since the 4th cent. has been known as Zion. Josephus (BJ v. iv. 1) mentions that in his day it was called the Citadel of David, and this tradition survives in the name the 'Tower of David,' given to the fortress at the Jaffa Gate. This is not the place to discuss the position of Zion, but it is now fairly generally admitted that the tradition which placed the Citadel of David and Zion on this Western spur was wrong, and that these sites lay on the Eastern hill south of the Temple. Josephus (BJ v. iv. 1) describes the Western hill as 'much higher' and 'more fortified' than the other hill opposite to it. The latter, as it extended southward to the Valley or Hinnom, but to the north it is bounded by a valley which runs eastward from near the modern Jaffa Gate to join the Tyropœon Valley opposite the Western wall of the Temple area. It is to-day largely filled up, but its direction is preserved by David Street. The first wall ran along the S. edge of this valley, and the suburbs which grew up to its north were enclosed by the second wall.

Regarding the Eastern hill, or, rather, regarding the name for part of this Eastern hill, there is much more dispute. Josephus (BJ v. iv. 1) wrote of the 'other hill, which was called Akra, and sustains the lower city': it 'is the shape of a moon when she is horned; over against this there was a third hill'—evidently, from the description, that covered by the Temple—'but naturally lower than Akra, and parted formerly from the other by a deep valley.' He narrates how Simon Maccabæus, after capturing the fortress which stood there, set his followers to work night and day for three years levelling the mountain, so that it should no longer be able to support a fortress which could overlook the Temple. As a result of this work, the valley between this hill and the Temple was filled up.

The conclusion is therefore that this hill, which we learn was the 'City of David' at the time of the Maccabees, formed in the days of Josephus one hill with the Temple hill, and further that it was separated from the Western hill, whereon was the Upper City, by the valley which 'extended as far as Siloam.' All this points to the Eastern hill south of the Temple as the site of Akra,* and of the Lower City. Akra cannot have lain north of the Temple, for here lay the Antonia (Ant. XV. xi. 4; BJ v. v. 8), the ancient Baris or tower, a fortress distinct from the Akra, indeed largely its successor; and north of this again was Bezetha, the New City.

There is much to confirm this view of the position of the Akra. The Akra was built on the 'City of David,' and this is identical with the Jebusite Zion. On quite other grounds Zion has been placed on this hill by many modern authorities. Then Akra is associated, in the description of the taking of Jerusalem, with 'the fountain,' i.e. the Virgin's Fountain, and Siloam (BJ v. vi. 1).† The appropriateness of the name 'Lower City' for the part of Jerusalem which sloped down south from the Temple is as evident as 'Upper City' is for that which actually overlooked the Temple on the west. If this, the most ancient part of Jerusalem, is not that described by Josephus as Akra and Lower City, what name did it have? It must have contained a very large share of the ordinary dwellings of the people. Ophlas (the Ophel of the OT) seems in Josephus' (BJ v. iv. 2) time, at any rate, to have been only a particular knoll near the S.E. corner of the Temple.

Difficulties are not insurmountable. The story is borne in mind. It is highly probable that a valley does exist either south of the present Temple area or even on a line between the present Temple platform and the el-Aksa mosque. The name may have remained associated with the highest parts of the hill, even though the wall of the Temple at the time of Josephus may have encroached on the hill, and even have covered part of the site of the ancient fortress. The Lower City seems to have extended up the Tyropæon Valley at least to the first wall, and hence the descent by steps from one of the W. gates of the Temple described by Josephus presents no real difficulty to the view of the position of Akra here maintained.

The older view of Robinson, Warren, Conder, and others, that Akra was the hill now known as the Muristan and the Church of the Svev north of the W. branch of the Tyropæon Valley, presents many difficulties. This was the area enclosed by the second wall, and Josephus calls it not the Lower City, but 'the northern quarter of the city.' Then the condition of neither the hill nor the valley tallies with the description of Josephus, and in his day the valley between this and the Temple must have been very much deeper than it is to-day. Josephus is more likely to be wrong in stating that the hill had once been higher than the Temple and was separated from it by a deep valley—a statement which depended on tradition—than in describing the hill as lower in his time and the valley as filled up—facts which he must have seen with his own eyes.

3. CLIMATE AND DISEASES.—The climate of Jerusalem, while bearing the broad characteristics common to the land, presents in some respects marked features of contrast to that of the Jordan Valley and other low-lying places which were the scenes of the ministry of Jesus. There is every reason for believing that the general climatic features are the same to-day as then. On the whole, Jerusalem must be considered healthy, and what disease there is, is largely due to preventable causes. The marked changes of season, the clear pure atmosphere, with frequent winds, and the cool nights even in midsummer, combine to give Jerusalem a climate superior to the lower parts of Palestine. In winter the cold is considerable but never extreme, the lowest temperature recorded in 20 years being only 25° F. As a rule, a frost occurs on some half a dozen nights in each year. January, February, and December are, in this order, the three coldest and wettest months, though the minimum temperature has occurred several times in March, and a night temperature as low as 40° at the end of May (cf. Jn 18<sup>18</sup>). Snow falls heavily at times, but only in exceptionally severe winters. The average rainfall is about 26 inches, a lower mean than at Hebron, but higher than in the plains and the Jordan Valley. The maximum fall recorded (1847) was 41.62 inches, the minimum (1870) was 13.39. So low a fall as this, especially if preceded by a scanty fall, means considerable distress in the succeeding dry season. During the summer no rain falls, and the mean temperature steadily rises till August, when it reaches 73.6, though the days of maximum heat (near or even over 100°) are often in September. It is not, however, the seasons of extreme heat or cold that are most trying to the health, but the intermediate spring and autumn, especially the months of May and October. This is largely due to the winds. Of all the winds the most characteristic is the S.E.—the sirocco—which in midwinter blows piercingly cold, and in the spring and autumn (but not at all in the summer) hot, stifling, and often laden with fine dust from the deserts whence it comes. On such days all Nature suffers, the vegetation droops, and man not only feels debilitated and depressed, but is actually more liable to illness, such as typhoid and ophthalmia. The N.W. is the cold sirocco wind which, almost every summer afternoon and evening, mitigates the heat. The S.W. wind blows moist off the sea, and in the later summer brings the welcome copious clouds and, in consequence, the refreshing 'dews.' In the early mornings of September and October thick mists often fill the valleys till dispersed by the rising sun. The onset of the rains, in late October, is not uncommonly signalized by heavy thunderstorms and sudden downpours of rain, which fill with raging and destructive floods the valleys still parched by seven months' drought. As much as 4 inches of rain has fallen in one day.

The diseases of Jerusalem are preventable to a large extent under proper sanitary conditions. Malarial fevers, ophthalmia, and smallpox (in epidemics) are the greatest scourges. Enteric fever, typhus, measles, scarlet fever, and cholera rarely occur in epidemics. Tubercular diseases, rheumatism, erysipelas, intestinal worms, and various skin diseases are all common.

4. WATER SUPPLY.—The water supply of Jerusalem has in all its history been of such importance and, on account of the altitude of the city, has involved so many elaborate works, which remain to-day as archaeological problems, that it will be well to consider it separately. The city never appears to have seriously suffered from want of water in sieges, but probably at no period was Jerusalem more lavishly supplied with water than it was during the Roman predominance, and most of the arrangements were complete before the time of Christ.

Of springs we know of only one to-day, and there is no reason to believe there were ever any more. This spring is thus known to the Christians as 'Ain Maryam'—the spring of the Lady Mary—or the Virgin's Fountain (from a tradition that the Virgin washed the clothes of the infant Jesus there), to the Moslem fellahin as 'Ain umm ed-deraǵ'—the spring of the mother of the steps,' and to the eastern Jews as 'Aaron's (or 'the priests') bath.' The water arises in a small cave reached by 30 steps, some 25 feet underground, in the Kidron Valley, due south of the Temple area. Though to-day lying so deep, there are ample evidences that originally the mouth of the cave opened out on the side of the valley, and that the water flowed out thence. It has become buried through the accumulated débris in the valley bed. At the back of the cave—some 30 feet from the entrance—is a tunnel mouth, the beginning of the famous Siloam aqueduct (see SILOAM). The flow is intermittent, about two or three times a day on an average. This fact is recorded by Jerome, and is by many authorities considered a reason for locating here the Pool of Bethesda (see BETHESDA). The water is brackish to the taste, and chemical examination shows that, to-day at any rate, it is contaminated with sewage. It is unfit for drinking purposes: it is used chiefly by the people of the village of Silwan, especially at the Siloam-pool end of the aqueduct, for watering their gardens.

* This view was apparently first put forward by Olshausen, and has been recently revived by Benzinger, G. A. Smith, and Sanday.

† Cf. BJ v. iv. 1, vi. 3, and v. vii. 2.

Further down the valley, at its junction with the Valley of Hinnom, there is a well, 125 feet deep, known as Bir Eyyûb, or Job's Well. This, though rediscovered by the Crusaders, is almost certainly ancient and may have been the En-rogel of the OT. From here great quantities of water are drawn all the year round, much of which is carried in skins and sold in Jerusalem, but it is in no way of better quality than that from the Virgin's Fountain. After a spell of heavy rain the water rises up like a genuine spring, and overflowing underground a little below the actual well mouth, it bursts forth in a little stream and runs down the Wady en-Nâr. Such an outflow may last several days, and is a great source of attraction to the people of Jerusalem, who, on the cessation of the rain, hasten out to sit by the 'flowing Kidron' and refresh themselves beside its waters. During the unusually heavy rains of 1904-5 the 'Kidron' ran thus four times. A little farther down the valley there occurs, at the same time and under the same circumstances, another apparent 'spring'—the Ain el-Lûz—due to the water of Bir Eyyûb finding its way along an ancient rock-cut aqueduct and bursting up through the ground where the conduit is blocked.

The Ḥammâm esh-Shefa (bath of healing) under the W. wall of the Ḥaram area has by many been considered an ancient spring. To-day the water collects in an extensive underground rocky chamber at the bottom of a well 86 feet deep. Quite possibly before the area to the north was so thickly inhabited, when, for example, this well was outside the walls, a certain amount of good water may have been obtainable here, but now what collects is a foul and smelly liquid which percolates to the valley bottom from the neighbouring inhabited area, and it is unfit for even its present use—in a Turkish bath.

More important than springs or wells are the innumerable cisterns with which, from the earliest times, the hill of Jerusalem has been honeycombed. It has already been pointed out that the rainfall of this region is considerable, and rain-water collected on a clean roof and stored in a well-kept cistern is good for all domestic purposes. There are private cisterns under practically every house, but there are in addition a number of larger reservoirs for public use. In the Ḥaram—the ancient Temple area—there are 37 known excavations, of which one, the 'great sea,' it is calculated, can hold about 2,000,000 gallons.

In other parts the more important cisterns are—the Birket Mamilla, Ḥammâm el-Batrak, Birket Israel, Birket es-Sultân, 'The Twin Pools,' the so-called 'Pool of Bethesda,' and the two Siloam pools—Birket Silwan and Birket el-Ḥamra. The last three are dealt with in the special articles BETHESDA and SILOAM respectively. The Birket es-Sultân, the misnamed 'Lower Pool of Gihon' in the Valley of Hinnom, was probably first constructed by German knights in the 12th cent., and was repaired by the Sultan Suleiman ibn Selim in the 16th cent., while the Twin Pools near the 'Sisters of Zion' were made in the moat of the Antonia fortress after the destruction of the city in A.D. 70; so neither of these needs description here. The other three require longer notice. The Birket Mamilla, incorrectly called the 'Upper Pool of Gihon,' lies at the head of the W.N.W. of the surface water from the higher ground around; in recent years the Moslem cemetery in which it lies has been surrounded by a wall, which has largely cut off the supplies. After a spell of heavy rain it often used to fill to overflowing. It is 97 yards long, 64 yards wide, and 19 feet deep. It appears to be 'the Serpents' Pool' of Josephus (BJ v. iii 2). The outlet on the E. side leads to a conduit which enters the city near the Jaffa Gate and empties itself into the great rock-cut pool—Birket Ḥammâm el-Batrak (the pool or bath of the Patriarch), commonly known as the Pool of Hezekiah. It is long by 48 yards wide, is largely across the W. arm of the Tyropoeon Valley; there are indications that it extended at one time further north than it does at present. Josephus apparently refers to this as the Pool Amygdalon (κολυμβήθρα Ἀμυγδαλον), a name perhaps derived from Berekat ha-migdâlîm (Pool of the Towers) on account of the towers of some of the great fortresses on the walls. As the pool is not mentioned in Josephus until after the second wall had been captured, it may be presumed that it was within that wall (BJ v. xi 4).

The Birket Israel is built across the width of a natural valley which runs from N.W. to S.E., and passes under the N.E. course of the Ḥaram at this point. It is supposed by some authorities that the pool itself did not exist at the period of Christ's ministry, but as a defence to the Temple enclosure and to the neighbouring Castle of Antonia (wh. see) it may well have been the Pool Struthius mentioned by Josephus (ib.). He says the fifth legion raised a bank at the tower of Antonia, the middle of the pool that is. It must, however, be stated that M. Ganneau and others propose to identify the 'Twin Pools' with Struthius.

Constructed for Jerusalem, though seven miles from the city, are the three great reservoirs known as 'Solomon's Pools,' or el-Burak. They lie one below the other down a valley; their floors are made of the valley bed, deepened in places, and they are naturally deepest at their lower or eastern ends; they increase in size from above downward. The largest and lowest is nearly 200 yards long, 60 yards wide, and 50 feet deep. To-day they are useless, but when kept in repair and clean were no doubt valuable as storeplaces of surplus supplies of surface water from the surrounding hills and of water from the springs. Regarding the question when these pools were made there are most contrary opinions. It is highly probable that they go back anything like as far as Solomon's time, and the association of his name with any great and wise work is so common in the East that the name 'Solomon's Pools' means nothing. On the whole, it is likely the work was not later than Roman times.

The system of aqueducts which centre round these pools has a special interest. Two were constructed to bring water from the four springs in the Valley of the Pools to Jerusalem, and two others duct, still in use along a good part of its course, may easily be followed to-day along its whole length of 11½ miles. It brought water from the springs into the Temple area. It is very probably the source of the 'spring' which is said by Tacitus (Hist. v. 12) to have run perpetually in the Temple. Of the two aqueducts, one, of exactly the same principle as the last mentioned, brought water from the copious springs at Wady Arrüb—two-thirds of the way from Jerusalem to Hebron—along an extraordinarily winding conduit 28 miles long. The other, built on an altogether different principle, is a four-mile channel which gathers water from a long chain of wells in the Wady Bär on the plan of a Persian kharij, such as is extensively used in Northern Syria. This, pronounced by Sir C. Wilson 'one of the most remarkable works in Palestine,' is probably comparatively late. It seems to have been used to supplement the water of the springs in the Valley of the Pools.

The special interest of the great 'low-level aqueduct' described above, with its total length of 40 miles, lies in the historical fact that it, or some part of it, was one of the causes of the recall of Pontius Pilate. 'Pilate (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2) undertook to bring water to Jerusalem, and did so by a long conduit, and derived the origin of the stream from the distance of two hundred furlongs.' A riot took place, and a 'great number' of people were slain. This may be the incident referred to in Lk. 13:1. If Josephus is correct in saying that Pilate was bringing water a distance of 200 stadia (=26 miles), then this must apply to the extension of the aqueduct to Wady Arrüb. In any case, it is highly improbable that his was the initiation of the whole work. The very absence of inscriptions and of contemporary references makes it probable that the conduit was at least older than Roman times. If we allow that the high-level aqueduct goes back to the days of Herod the Great, then the low-level aqueduct may well go back some centuries earlier.

5. TOPOGRAPHY OF THE CITY IN THE TIME OF CHRIST—The city walls.—At the time of Christ, Jerusalem had two walls which had been restored by order of Julius Cæsar (Ant. XIV. x. 5). In A.D. 43, Agrippa I. commenced a third one of great magnificence, which, however, seems never to have been properly finished.

(a) The first wall had 60 towers; it encompassed the ancient and most important secular buildings of the city. Though some minor details are yet unknown, its general course is perfectly clear. The tower Hippicus, at which it arose—one of those magnificent towers built by Herod—was situated close to the present so-called 'Tower of David,' in which indeed its remains may even be incorporated. From here it ran along the S. edge of the W. arm of the Tyropoeon Valley. It then passed the Xystus, joined the Council House near the present Mehkemeh or Town Hall, and ended at the Western Cloister. It probably crossed the Tyropoeon Valley, where to-day there is the causeway leading to the Bab es-Silsileh of the Haram. The western wall commenced at the tower Hippicus, and probably followed the line of the present western wall to the great corner tower, the rocky foundations of which are now included in the C.M.S. Boys' School. Somewhere near this part of its course it passed 'a place called Bethso'—unidentified; it then bent S.E. 'to the gate of the Essenes, and went thence southward along the steep edge of the Valley of Hinnom down to the Pool of Siloam.' It had 'its bending above the fountain Siloam,' which probably implies that it surrounded the pool on the W., N., and E., but did not enclose it, as a wall at another period undoubtedly did. It then ran on the edge of the steep rocks above the Virgin's to supplement this supply. The first two are the well-known high- and low-level aqueducts. The former appears to have reached the city somewhere about the level of the Jaffa Gate, and may also have crossed the Birket Mamilla. It is specially interesting the way it crossed a valley on the Bethlehem road by means of an inverted syphon. Large fragments of this great stone tube have been found, and from inscriptions carved on the limestone blocks the date of its construction or repair must have been in Roman times and, as late as about A.D. 145. However, the account given of the royal palace gardens of Herod is greatly exaggerated, the aqueduct must have been in use in Herod's days, as it is the only conduit by which running water could have reached the city at a level high enough to have supplied these gardens. The low-level aque-

Fountain—called, apparently, by Josephus 'Solomon's Pool'—and thence to 'a certain place which they called Ophlas, where it joined to the eastern cloister of the Temple' (BJ v. iv. 2).

Extensive remains of this wall have been traced. Those of the great tower at the S.W. corner were examined by Maudslay in 1874. He found the base of a tower 20 feet high hewn out of the native rock. It was nearly square, and projected 45 feet from the scarp to which it was attached—a noble and great work, and at a point which has been specially well fortified.* A little to the east is another great scarp, and here Bliss† began to trace out the buried remains of the south wall. He found near the commencement of his excavations a gate which may very probably be the Gate of the Essenes. In tracing the wall towards Siloam, foundations belonging to two distinct periods were excavated. Bliss considered that the higher of these belonged to the wall of the period between Herod and Titus. A little to the W. of Siloam he found the remains of a fine gateway showing three periods of use—the sill-lying at different heights in each period—and a fine rock-cut underground drain, almost certainly Roman work, which he traced for a great distance up the W. side of the Tyropœon Valley, where it came to lie under a paved street ascending the valley in the direction of the Temple. After leaving the scarp, there were indications—not, however, decisive—that the wall at one period surrounded the pool on three sides, as Josephus apparently describes, while at another period it crossed the mouth of the Tyropœon Valley on an elaborate dam. To the east of the pool the rock scarp is exposed, and almost every trace of the wall has been removed. As regards the E. section of this southern wall, Sir Charles Warren in 1875 traced the buried remains of a wall 14½ feet thick and, in places, 70 feet high from the S.E. corner of the Temple southwards for 90 feet, and then S.W. for 70 feet. Two hundred feet from the end he unearthed the remains of a massive tower standing to the height of 66 feet and founded upon rock. The wall itself had been built, not on rock, but on virgin soil. The course of the wall, as described by Josephus, thus appears to be very fully verified by modern discoveries.

(b) With regard to the second wall a great deal of uncertainty prevails. There are few more hotly disputed questions in Jerusalem topography. This second wall appears to have been on the line of that made by the later kings of Judah, to have been repaired by Nehemiah, and used by the Hasmonæans. It is dismissed by Josephus (BJ v. iv. 2) in a very few words; it 'took its beginning from that gate which they call Gennath, which belonged to the first wall; it only encompassed the northern quarter of the city and reached as far as the tower of Antonia.' It had 40 towers on it. No remains of the gate Gennath have been found, but the configuration of the ground makes it improbable that the wall could have taken its rise very far to the E. of the present Jaffa Gate, as here there exists a narrow neck of high ground, but a little to the E. the level abruptly descends into the W. arm of the Tyropœon. In 1886 some 30 yards of the remains of what seemed a city wall were discovered 15 feet below the street, where the foundations of the Grand New Hotel were dug. They were supposed by Messrs. Merrill and Schick to be part of the second wall at its W. end, but too short a piece was examined to allow of positive conclusions. The other supposed traces of the second wall are even more ambiguous. In the N. part of the Muristan, where to-day stands the German church, Schick found remains of which he said, 'I am convinced that these are traces of the second wall'; these would fall in line with a wall 10 or 12 feet thick, which, according to Robinson (BRP i. 408), was found N. of the Pool of Hezekiah, when the foundations of the Coptic Convent were laid. Again, just to the N. of the German church and E. of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre were found extensive ruined walls, which are to-day treasured by the Russian ecclesiastical authorities as sure evidences that the site of the traditional Holy Sepulchre was outside the ancient walls. It is, however, much more probable that these remains, which are quite unlike city walls, are really fragments of Constantine's Great Basilica.

The question is thus quite an open one, but the argument that the second wall cannot, on military grounds, have followed a course S. of the site of the Sepulchre is an unsafe one. As Sir C. Wilson* points out: 'There are several Greek towns in Asia Minor where the city walls or parts of them are quite as badly traced back to modern ideas. In ancient times the Acropolis was the principal defence, the city wall was often weak.' It may indeed be suggested that this very weakness made Agrippa undertake his new wall along a better line for defence.

(c) The whole question of the second wall depends largely on what view is taken of the course of the third wall constructed by Agrippa I. The most widely accepted opinion to-day is that this followed much the same course as the present N. wall. It was begun upon the most elaborate plan, but was never completed on the scale designed, because Claudius Cæsar, 'lest he should strengthen a wall was built in order to make some innovation in public affairs' (BJ v. iv. 2). It was, however, at the time of the siege, over 18 feet wide and 40 feet high, with 90 massive towers. It began at the tower Hippicus, and had its N.W. corner at a great octagonal tower, called Psephinus, 135 feet high and overlooking the whole city.† From here was an extensive view of Arabia, i.e. the Land of Moab, at sunrise, 'as well as of the utmost limits of the Hebrew possessions at the sea westwards' (BJ v. iv. 3). The foundations of this tower are supposed to survive to-day just inside the N.W. angle of the modern city, under the name Kalât el-Jalud, or Goliath's Castle. From this corner the wall 'extended till it came over against the monuments of Helena, queen of Adiabene, the daughter of Izates' (BJ v. iv. 2). This, however, must be read in the light of the statement of Josephus in another place (Ant. xx. iv. 3) that this tomb is 'distant no more than three furlongs from the city of Jerusalem.' The so-called 'Tombs of the Kings' are now very generally identified as the very notable tomb of Queen Helena, and, that being so, the distance given, 3 stadia or furlongs (700 yards), is a fair description of the distance of this monument from the present north wall near the Damascus Gate. He next states that 'it extended further to a great length, and passed by the sepulchral caverns of the kings'—these last may very well be the extensive caves known as 'Solomon's Quarries.' The wall 'bent again at the tower of the corner,' which then may have been where the present Stork Tower at the N.E. corner of the city is, 'at the monument which is called the monument of the fuller'—probably destroyed—and joined the old wall at the valley called the Valley of the Kidron.' This was probably near the present St. Stephen's Gate. The exact course at the N.E. corner is very doubtful; it is quite possible that it turned S.E. near 'Herod's Gate.' It will be observed that the description fits in very well with the course followed by the existing N. wall. At the Damascus Gate there are unmistakable evidences that a gate at least as ancient as Roman times stood there. The supporters of the view that the second wall ran here lay stress on certain supposed remains of the third wall further north. A candid examination of such of these as survive, and of the accounts, both verbally and in publications, of those that have been removed, does not seem very convincing. One of the best marked pieces, forming the side of a cistern near Helena's Tomb, proved on recent examination to be but a piece of smooth scarp facing towards the city, and not remains of a building at all.

As is clear from the history of the taking of the city, there was another wall, no doubt greatly inferior in strength to those before mentioned, which ran along the western side of the Tyropœon, bounding in that direction the 'Upper City' (Tacitus, Hist. v. 11), and it is probable that some kind of wall, though doubtless only a temporary one, ran along the opposite or eastern side of the valley.

Towers.—Of the great towers the three erected by Herod the Great yet remain to be described. Josephus, in his usual exaggerated manner, says they 'were for largeness, beauty, and strength beyond all that were in the habitable earth' (BJ v. iv. 3). They were dedicated to Herod's friend Hippius, his brother Phasael, and his wife Mariamne, whom he had murdered. Each of these towers was of solid masonry at the base. The base of Hippius was about 44 feet square and 50 high, over which was a reservoir and several rooms, and, surmounting all, battlements with turrets: the total height was 140 feet. The second tower, Phasael, was 70 feet square at the base and nearly 160 feet high, and, it is said, 'wanted nothing but a high market to appear to be a royal palace.' The Mariamne tower was smaller and less lofty, but 'its upper buildings were more magnificent.' As to the position of these towers, the present 'Tower of David' is generally considered to contain the remains of Phasael, with various Crusading and Saracenic additions. Hippius must have been near this spot, perhaps where the Jaffa Gate now stands, and Mariamne probably a little more to the east on higher ground. The three are all described as being 'on the north side of the wall,' and from a distance they all appeared to be of the same height. The N.W. corner of the city, where they stood, was one without much natural defence, and they bore the same important relation to the King's Palace as the other fortress, the Antonia, did to the Temple.

Of the other great architectural works of the period we have but scanty description and still scantier remains, with the exception, of course, of the Temple, for which see art. TEMPLE.

Herod's great palace, built on the site of the palace of the Hasmoneans (Ant. xx. viii. 11), evidently adjoined the before-mentioned towers on the south, and occupied an area of land now covered by the English church and schools and the Armenian quarter, probably extending also to the Patriarch's house and gardens—the greater part, indeed, of the area between the present David Street (along the line of which the first wall ran) to the N. and the modern city walls as far east as the Zion Gate to the south. It is quite possible that the present course of the southern wall was determined by the remains of the S. wall of this palace. From the walls an extensive view could be seen, and at a later time Agrippa II. gave great offence when he added a lofty dining-room from which he could watch all the doings in the Temple. To frustrate this, the Jews raised a wall upon the 'inner' building which belonged to the inner Temple towards the west.' This gave annoyance not only to Agrippa but also to Festus, who ordered it to be removed. On appeal, however, Nero gave his verdict in favour of the Jews. The palace had walls, in parts over 50 feet high, with many towers, and was internally fitted with great luxury. Around it were numerous 'curious pillars' buried among the ruins, 'well irrigated and filled with brazen pipes, which the water ran out.'

Between the palace grounds and the Temple lay the Xystus, a ground surrounded with columns, for Greek games. On the W. wall of the Temple with the W. hill and the 'Upper City,' was a bridge which had been broken down when Pompey (Ant. xiv. iv. 4; BJ i. vii. 2) besieged the Temple in 63 B.C., but had been repaired. The arch of this bridge was first recognized by Robinson, and the PEF excavations not only uncovered the central pier, but beneath the early Roman pavement found an old voussour of the earlier bridge of Pompey's time, which had fallen through into an ancient drain below the street. No remains of this bridge have, however, so far been recovered further to the west.

The hippodrome apparently lay somewhat to the south, on the borders, perhaps, of the Tyropœon Valley near the present Dung Gate; this was very probably the 'place of exercise' of 2 Mac 4<sup>12</sup> (cf. 1 Mac 1<sup>17</sup>), and the description 'under the very castle' would well suit this place if Akra was where it is here proposed to locate it. Of the position of Herod's theatre nothing at all is known.

Next to the Temple, perhaps the most famous building in Jerusalem was Antonia, the great fortress of the Temple, and the acropolis of the city, which from its lofty height is described by Tacitus (Hist. v. 11) as pre-eminently conspicuous. It had received the name Antonia from Herod after Mark Antony, but it had in Hasmonean times been known as Baris. Nehemiah (2<sup>8</sup> RV) mentions a castle (birah) as being here—to the north of the Temple; this the high priest Hyrcanus (BJ i. vi. 1) made his headquarters. It is interesting that at least a portion of the site with so great a reputation as a military stronghold should even to-day be occupied by troops—the Turkish garrison. A great rock scarp on which part of the ancient fortress stood is still clearly visible from the Haram, and in the moat cut to protect its northern aspect lie the 'Twin Pools.' The fortress lay at the N.W. corner of the Temple enclosure, and is described by Josephus as being built on a rock over 87 feet high, 'on a great precipice'; the rock was covered with smooth stones, and upon the rocky platform was a building 70 feet high fitted up with great magnificence. At the four corners were towers 87 feet high, except that at the S.E. corner, which was over 120 feet high; from it the whole Temple was overlooked, but a considerable space separated it from the Temple itself (BJ vi. ii. 5-7). At the W. corner there were passages into the W. and the N. cloisters by which the Temple guards could obtain access to the Temple. The Western boundary was probably on the line of the present W. wall of the Haram, and the moat (BJ v. iv. 2) to the N. appears to have been demonstrated, but the S. and E. boundaries are unknown. The total area must have been large, as it held a whole Roman legion, and it is clear from history that it was a powerful fortress. Even before its extension by Herod, Antigonus could not capture it until after the city and the Temple had been taken by storm, and in A.D. 70 the capture of Antonia is recorded as one of the fiercest (cf. BJ VI i and ii.). It is ... that the Prætorium (Mk 15<sup>38a</sup>.) was in part of Antonia, for there undoubtedly was the Roman garrison (Ac 21<sup>34</sup>). See PRÆTORIUM.

Near the W. wall of the Temple where is now the Turkish Town Hall (el-Mehkemeh) was the Town Council House. Possibly it was here the high priest held his court.

The palaces of Monobazus, king of Adiabene, and of his mother Queen Helena appear to have been on the southern slopes of the Eastern hill, the former probably due east of the Pool of Siloam.

Of the great number of tombs around Jerusalem the majority of the most conspicuous and notable belong to a later period than Christ's life. The monuments of Queen Helena, known as the 'Tombs of the Kings,' and probably almost all the tombs in the valley in which the 'Tombs of the Judges' are situated, are of a date very soon after Christ's death. The same is probably true of the famous group of tombs near the S.E. corner of the Temple, the so-called 'Pillar of Absalom,' the 'Tomb of Jehoiachin,' the 'Grotto of St. James,' and the 'Pyramid of Zacharias.' It is very tempting to connect these highly ornamented tomb structures with the words of Jesus (Mt 23<sup>27-35</sup>), spoken as they probably were almost within sight of this spot. If so, the indications of work of a later period may be additions to earlier constructions of the Herodian era. The so-called Tombs of Joseph of Arimathea and of Nicodemus, to the W. of the shrine of the Holy Sepulchre, though only by a late tradition associated with these NT characters, are undoubtedly old tombs, probably much before Christ's time. The traditional tomb of Christ has been treated in a separate article. See GOLGOTHA.

A general view of the city in the time of Christ from such a height as Olivet must have been an impressive sight. In the foreground lay the great Temple in a grandeur and beauty greater than it had ever held in all its long history, its courts all day crowded with throngs of worshippers from every corner of the known world. To the north of this, Antonia, with its four massive towers, stood sentinel over the city and the Temple. Behind these lay the Upper City crowned by the magnificent palace-fortress of Herod, with its great groves of trees and well-watered gardens. To the right of this lay the great towers Hippicus, Phasaël, and Mariamne. Then between these buildings and the Temple lay the central valley with the Xystus and its many columns, the lofty bridge, and, a little to the south, the great Hippodrome. Then somewhere among the houses probably in that part of the city which is described by Josephus (Ant. XV. viii.) lay the theatre of Herod, and the mountains of Moab. Then southward, covering both the hills as they descended into the deep valleys towards Siloam, were the thick built houses of the common folk, with other palaces such as those of Monobazus and Helena rising like islands from among them. Enclosing all were the mighty walls of the Temple and of the city—these latter alone with a hundred towers—rising up, in many places precipitously, from deep valleys, suggestive at once of strength and security. To the north lay the New City, yet unwall'd, where, doubtless, countless villas rose amid the fresh greenness of gardens and trees.

'The devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them' (Mt 4<sup>8</sup>). Did they not all lie beneath the gaze of the Man of Galilee if He were brought from the neighbouring wilderness into the blaze of material glory—Greek, Roman, and Hebrew—spread out beneath Him in the Holy City?

The city over which the Son of Man wept (Lk 19<sup>41</sup>) must have been a city representing, in small area, more extravagant display, more intense contrasts of materialism and religious zeal, of Rome's iron discipline and seething rebellion, of the East and the West, and more seeds of that fanatic hatred that spells murder than the world has ever seen. Elements were here gathered that made the city a miniature of the whole world, of a world, too, in the process of destruction.

The total population of the city cannot have been large, and the numbers given by Josephus (BJ II. xiv. 2, v. vi. 1, vi. ix. 3) and Tacitus (Hist. v. 13) are manifestly exaggerated. The present permanent population of modern Jerusalem, which covers a considerably larger area than the city in the time of Christ, is about 65,000. However closely the people were packed in the ancient city, it is hardly possible that there could have been so many as this, and many put the estimate at one-half this number. At the time of the Passover, when numbers were camped on the Mount of Olives and at other spots around, it is possible to believe that the population may have been considerably higher than that of to-day.

6. HISTORY OF JERUSALEM DURING THE PERIOD OF THE GOSPELS.—For a few short years before the birth of Jesus, Jerusalem enjoyed a time of extraordinary material prosperity, and the great architectural works of Herod were completed. It is evident, as has often been the case in the East, that this work was carried out only by means of great oppression, so that the king, while he left behind him vast monuments in stone, left also a memory execrated in the hearts of the common people. Some twenty years before the birth of Jesus the magnificent palace of Herod was finished; * the three great towers, the theatre, the Xystus, and the Hippodrome (these last two adorned, if not initiated, by Herod) were completed early in his reign. Several years (B.C. 19–11) were also spent in adorning and extending the Temple, a work which was being continued during the life of Christ (Jn 2<sup>20</sup>). At this time the Temple must have attained a grandeur and beauty exceeding all previous eras. Yet the declining day of Herod the Great found the city seething with rebellion which, just before his death, found vent in the public destruction of the Temple (BJ I. xxxii.) which he had so gloriously adorned. In revenge for this forty persons were burnt alive, and many more were executed in less terrible ways. When the king considered that his last hour was imminent, he shut into the Temple the most illustrious of the Jews, so that they should be executed when he died, so that the city might on his death be filled with mourning, even if not for him.

Herod's death in 4 B.C., before the Nativity, let loose on all sides the elements. Archelaus, the heir by Herod's will, hastened his accession by ascending a golden throne in the Temple on a 'high elevation made for him,' and hastened to ingratiate himself by promising all kinds of good (things) to the expectant and worshipping crowds. He was, however, unable to satisfy the excessive and exacting demands of the unruly crowds, who had been deeply stirred by the heavy punishment meted out by Herod in the affair of the golden eagle and at the approach of the Passover a riot followed which ended in the massacre of three thousand Jews—mainly visitors to the feast, who were encamped in tents outside the Temple. Archelaus forthwith hastened to Rome to have his appointment confirmed, leaving the city in utter confusion. As soon as he had taken ship, Sabinus, the Roman procurator, hastened to the city, seized and . . . king's palace and all the fortified . . . he could get possession, and laid hands on all the treasures he could find. He endeavoured to assert his authority with a view to opposing the absent Archelaus, for he at the same time sent to Rome a letter accusing him to Caesar. At the succeeding feast of Pentecost the crowds of Galileans, Idumeans, and trans-Jordan Jews, with recruits from the more unrestrained elements from Jerusalem, rose in open rebellion, and commenced to besiege Sabinus in the palace. One party assembled along the whole W. wall of the Temple to attack from the east, another towards the south at the Hippodrome, and a third to the west—apparently outside the W. walls of the city. Sabinus, who seems to have been an arrant coward, sent an appeal for help to Varus, the governor of Syria, who was then in Antioch, and shut himself up in the tower Phasaël. From there he signalled to the troops to fall upon the people. A terrible fight ensued, at first in the city itself and then in the Tyropœon Valley, from which the Roman soldiers shot up at the rioters assembled in the Temple cloisters. Finding themselves at great disadvantage from their position in the valley, the soldiers in desperation set fire to the cloisters, and their Jewish opponents, crowded within and upon the roof, were either burnt to death or . . . Some of . . . the flames . . . the Temple precincts and seized the . . . Sabinus is stated to have received 400 talents for himself. Upon this, other parties of Jews, exasperated by these affairs, made a counter attack upon the palace and threatened to set it on fire. They first offered a free pass to all who would come out peaceably, whereupon many of Herod's soldiers came out and joined the Jews; but Rufus and Gratus with a band of horsemen went over to the Romans with three thousand soldiers. Sabinus continued to be besieged in the palace, the walls of which the Jews commenced to undermine, until Varus arrived, after which he slunk away to the seacoast. The Jerusalem Jews excused themselves to the governor by laying all the blame on their fellow-countrymen from other parts. Varus suppressed the rebellion with ruthless firmness, crucifying two thousand Jews; and then, leaving a legion in the city to maintain order, he returned to Antioch. Archelaus returned some months later as ethnarch, and ruled for ten years, until, being accused to Caesar of oppression, he was banished to Vienne.

During the rule of Coponius (6-10), the procurator who succeeded, another Passover disturbance occurred. This was due to the extraordinary and defiant conduct of a party of Samaritans, who threw some dead bodies into the cloisters of the Temple just after midnight,—a step which must, without doubt, have deepened the smouldering hatred between Jews and Samaritans (Jn 4<sup>9</sup>). Marcus Ambivius (11-12) and Annianus Rufus (13) after short and uneventful terms of office were succeeded by Valerius Gratus (14-25), whose eleven years were marked only by the many changes he made in the high priesthood. His successor, Pontius Pilate (26-37), left the stamp of his character on secular history by making a great show of authority, in constituting Jerusalem the military headquarters, and introducing Cæsar's effigies into the city, but entirely reversing this policy when it was vigorously opposed by the more fanatic elements of the Jews. On this occasion a great gathering of Jews assembled in, apparently, the Xystus (ἐν τῷ μεγάλῳ σταδίῳ), and preferred to bare their necks to Pilate's soldiers to . . . demands (Ant. XVIII. iii. 1). Mention has already been made of the 'current of water' Pilate brought to Jerusalem, and the riot which followed because he used for the work 'sacred money' of the Temple. When persuasions had failed to quell the tumult, Pilate gave a signal to the soldiers, whom he had distributed in disguise through the crowd, and many were killed and wounded (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2).

The whole secular history as given by Josephus shows in what an excitable and unstable condition the Jews were, specially at the time of the feasts, when the city was filled by outsiders. In such a city it is not wonderful that twice (Jn 8<sup>59</sup> 10<sup>31</sup>) Jesus was threatened with stoning. The histories of past Passovers in the Holy City may have made Pilate acutely anxious as to whither the commotion connected with the arrest of Jesus was tending; the leaders of the Jews, on the other hand, had doubtless learnt by their victory in the matter of Cæsar's effigies to anticipate that, if they blustered and threatened enough, Pilate was unlikely . . . and their demands.

7. JESUS IN THE GOSPELS.—The earliest Gospel incident connected with the city is the foretelling to Zacharias in the Temple of the birth of John the Baptist (Lk 1<sup>5-23</sup>); the second, the arrival of the Magi to inquire in the city where the 'king of the Jews' was born (Mt 2<sup>1-10</sup>). Shortly after this occur the purification of the Virgin Mary and the presentation of Jesus in the Temple (Lk 2<sup>22-39</sup>); and some twelve years later the first (?) Passover of Jesus in the Holy City and the incident of His staying behind to discuss with the doctors in the Temple (Lk 2<sup>41-49</sup>). After this, with the exception of one brief scene in the Temptation (Mt 4<sup>5</sup>), the Synoptics are silent regarding any events in the city until the last week of His life. It is clear that Jesus rather avoided the city, and that the city was hostile to Him. It was Jerusalem as the centre of Jewish religious life which alone drew Jesus there; almost exclusively His being there was connected with attendance at a feast; and, with the single exception of the incident at the Pool of Bethesda, all His doings were, till the last week, in the courts of the Temple. In the Fourth Gospel there is mention of a Passover at which Jesus cleansed the Temple, and later had His discourse with Nicodemus (Jn 2<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>1-21</sup>). Then a year and a half after, while He was . . . the Feast of Tabernacles, occurred the . . . the adulteress and the blind man (Jn 7<sup>2</sup> 8<sup>57</sup> 9<sup>17</sup>), ending in an attempt to arrest Him and a threatened stoning. A little later in the year, at the Feast of Dedication, He appeared in the Temple and was again threatened with stoning (Jn 10<sup>23-39</sup>). After the raising of Lazarus at Bethany, Jesus deliberately avoided entering the city, but shortly afterwards He determinately turned His face towards it, with the consciousness that suffering and death inevitably awaited Him there (Mk 10<sup>32-34</sup>).

When at last the step of return to the metropolis had been taken and the triumphal entry into the city (Mt 21<sup>1-11</sup>, Mk 11<sup>1-10</sup>, Lk 19<sup>29-44</sup>, Jn 12<sup>12-19</sup>) and the second cleansing of the Temple (Mt 21<sup>12-18</sup>, Mk 11<sup>11</sup>, Lk 19<sup>45</sup> 46) had occurred, Jesus seems to have gladly withdrawn Himself night after night from the turmoil of the city to the quiet of the village life of Bethany, out of sight of the sad and tragic city over which He could but weep (Lk 19<sup>41-44</sup>). The night of His arrest seems to have been the first in that fateful week He spent in the immediate environs of the city. Then during the closing days came teaching by the miracle of the fig tree (Mt 21<sup>20-22</sup>, Mk 11<sup>12-14</sup>) and by parable the Wicked Husbandmen, the Ten Virgins, the name has not yet been explained with certainty. 'Iησοῦς (gen., dat., voc. 'Iησοῦ; acc. 'Iησοῦν, Mt 1<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>34</sup>, Mk 1<sup>34</sup>, Mt 1<sup>21</sup> [on 'Iησοῖ as gen. and dat. see Winer-Schmiedel, § 10, note 6]) is the Greek form of the Hebrew יְהוֹשֻׁעַ or יְהוֹשֻׁעַ. Aquila has for the latter (Dt 1<sup>38</sup>) 'Iησοῦς; in some passages 'Iησοῦς is found (1 Ch 7<sup>27</sup>, 2 Es 2<sup>8</sup>. 40); see Redpath's Concordance.

No satisfactory explanation has yet been offered of the varying forms יְהוֹשֻׁעַ and יְהוֹשֻׁעַ. The high priest, for instance, who led the Jews back from Babylon with Zerubbabel, is constantly called יְהוֹשֻׁעַ in the prophetic books of Haggai and Zechariah (RV 'Joshua,' not 'Jehoshua,' as in the name of his father 'Jehozadak'), and with equal constancy יְהוֹשֻׁעַ in the historical books of Ezra and Nehemiah (where also the name of his father is written in the abbreviated form 'Jozadak'). Were, then, both forms used at the same time? Or is this a hint that the difference is due to later recensions, and that the form 'Jeshua' is later than the time of the Exile? Again, how did 'Jehoshua' become 'Jeshua'? The question is the more difficult as noucheie is the intermediate form 'Joshua' found, as in the other names formed with 'Jeho-,' e.g. יְהוֹנָדָב side by side with יְהוֹנָדָב, etc. The nearest parallel seems to be the name of the king of Moab, who is called 'Mesha' (מֶשָׁה) in the MT of 2 K 34, but מוֹשָׁה in the LXX; or the name 'Moab,' which is explained as if = מוֹשֶׁה in Gn 19<sup>37</sup>. The reason for the vowel change has been sought in the analogy of names beginning with h, or merely on phonetical principles (differentiation, as rishon from resh, etc.). (For quite a different explanation, which will hardly stand examination, see Fr. Pratorius in ZDMG lx. 342.) The difficulty is increased by the fact that the name is spelt יְהוֹשֻׁעַ (with y) but twice (Dt 32<sup>1</sup>, Jg 27); and יְהוֹשֻׁעַ may therefore have been originally 'Jehoshua,' like יְהוֹשֻׁעַ alongside of יְהוֹשֻׁעַ.

Hitherto it has been presupposed that the name was יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, the root יָשָׁע 'to save' (or rather 'to be safe'), like יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, which, according to Nu 13<sup>16</sup> and Dt 32<sup>44</sup>, was the earlier name of 'Joshua'; cf. the name יְהוֹשֻׁעַ with a Palestinian jar-handle, combined by Macalister with the name יְהוֹשֻׁעַ 1 Ch 4<sup>20</sup> (PEFS, 1905, p. 330). But the dropping of the first letter is not easily explained on this theory. And the analogy of the names יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ side by side with יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, points to the possibility that יְהוֹשֻׁעַ is related to יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, as יָשָׁע is to יָשָׁע. As to the meaning of these names nothing is certain. That to popular sentiment the name recalled the idea of salvation is proved for the OT by Nu 13<sup>16</sup>, and for the NT by Mt 1<sup>21</sup> 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins.' Perhaps also in 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup> 'Iησοῦν ὃν ἠσπόμενον ἡμᾶς, we have an allusion to this etymology. Greek Christians were reminded by the name of the root idomi, 'to heal'; cf. Sib. Or. i. 351 καὶ τότε δὴ νοσηροῦς ἰήσεται; Clem. Al. Pædag. i. 7. 61 τοιοῦτον ἡμῶν ὄνομα σωτήριον προφητεύει παιδαγωγῶν. . . ὡς ὁ λόγος ὁ πειθήριος οὐκ ἰάται, ἀπελθὶ ἰάσεται κ.τ.λ. ib. iii. 12. 98 ὁ ἰώμενος ἡμῶν καὶ σῶμα καὶ ψυχὴν, τὸν αἰδῶν ἄνθρωπον, 'Iησοῦς; Cyril of Jerusalem, Cateches. x. p. 88 'Iησοῦς τοῖνυν ἐστὶ κατὰ τὴν Ἑλλάδα γλῶσσαν ὁ ἰώμενος. 'Επειδὴν ἱατρός ἐστι ψυχῶν καὶ σωμάτων, καὶ θεραπευτὴς πνευμάτων, τυφλῶν μὲν αἰσθητῶν θεραπευτὴς . . . χωλῶν φαινομένων ἱατρός; Epiphanius, Hæc. 29, Nazar. § 4 'Iησοῦς γὰρ κατὰ τὴν Ἑβραϊκὴν διάλεκτον θεραπευτὴς καλεῖται, ἥτοι ἱατρός καὶ σωτήρ. Epiphanius betrays in these last words also a knowledge of the Hebrew root; and the same is the case with Chrysostom, who expressly states (Hom. 2 in Matth. p. 23), τὸ γὰρ 'Iησοῦς τοῦτο ὄνομα οὐκ ἐστὶν Ἑλληνικόν, ἀλλὰ τῇ Ἑβραίων φωνῇ οὕτω λέγεται 'Iησοῦς' ὅτι ἐστὶν εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα γλῶτταν ἐρμηνευόμενος, σωτήρ' σωτήρ δέ, ἀπὸ τοῦ σῶσαι τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ. To the same effect is the statement of Eusebius (Dem. Ev. iv. 17, p. 199), who compares Christ with the high priest of the Return, and writes on their names, § 23, Εἰκότως οὖν τῆς εἰκότως ἔρεκα καὶ οὗτος τῆς τοῦ σωτήρος προσηγορίας ἤξιοιτο . . . ἐπειδὴ σωτήριον θεοῦ εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα φωνὴν τὸ τοῦ 'Iησοῦ μεταληφθέν ὄνομα σημαίνει. 'Ιησοῦ μὲν γὰρ Ἑβραίοις σωτήρια, υἱὸς δὲ Ναυὴ παρὰ τοῖς αὐτοῖς 'Ιωσὺν ὀνομάζεται. 'Ιωσὺν δὲ ἐστὶν 'Ιάω σωτήρια, τοῦτ' ἐστὶ θεοῦ σωτήριον. εἰκότως εἰ που θεοῦ σωτήριον ἐν τοῖς Ἑλληνικοῖς ἀντιγράφοις ὀνόμασται, οὐδ' ἄλλο τι ἢ τὸν 'Iησοῦν κατὰ τὴν Ἑβραίων φωνὴν πέπεισο δηλοῦσθαι; cf. also Theodoret, ii 385, on Is 61<sup>10</sup>, ἐν τῇ Ἑβραίων φωνῇ τὸ 'ιμάτιον σωτήριον' ἱμάτιον ἰεσῶν καίται, τοῦτ' ἐστὶ Χριστοῦ. Lagarde (Übersicht, p. 97) concludes from this that YCO, the Syriac form of the name, had a double s.

Already in the oldest MSS of the Gr. Test. the name is written with abbreviations IC, IV, IN; but occasionally in some MSS, and regularly in the Codex Bezae, IHY is found (in the Codex Sinaiticus IHY and IV in consecutive lines in Rev 22<sup>20</sup> 21). The Epistle of Barnabas seems to have known the abbreviation IH, because the number 318 (= TIH) in Gn 14<sup>24</sup> is explained there of the cross of Jesus; and the same inference may be drawn for Iienæus from a comparison of the texts of Iienæus, Hippolytus and Epiphanius on the Marcosians (see ExpT xlvii. [1903] pp. 44, 139).

H. Leclercq, in art. 'Abréviations' in Cabrol's Dict. d'Archéol. Chrétienne, has a special paragraph 'de l'abréviation IHY, IHS' (col. 177-180). The earliest coins exhibiting the symbol IHS are of Justinian II (685-695, and 705-711). In the legend 'IHS XPI S P C A found on coins of Constantine II. (780-781) the C in NICA. On a coin found written on the reverse . . . [1901] p. 205.

On the power of the name 'Iησοῦς, which cannot be translated, see Origen, c. Cels. i. 25. like the names Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, καὶ ὁ ἡμέτερος 'Iησοῦς, ὃς τὸ ὄνομα κυρίου ἦδη ἐναργὲς ἔαται δαίμονος ἐξελάναν ψυχῶν καὶ σωμάτων, ἐνέργησαν εἰς ἐκείνους ἀφ' ὧν ἀντηλάθονταν.

We have as yet no explanation of the statement of Irenæus: 'Jesus autem nomen secundum litterarum est duarum ac dimid significans dominum eum, qui continet cælum et terram, quia Jesus secundum antiquam Hebraicam linguam cælum est. terra autem iterum SURA USSERA dicitur' (= SMA UERSA 'heaven and earth'). In another passage Irenæus writes: 'Nihilominus autem et unigenitus et maxime autem super omnia nomen, quod dicitur Deus, quod et ipsum hebraice Baruch dicitur, et duas et dimidium habet literas.'

The Jews now write יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, which is explained by Handler (Lexicon der Abbréviationen, 1897) by יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, by Lagarde (Mon. de la Bible, ii. 290) יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, 'may his name (and memory) be wiped out (and perish)'; Jastrow's Dictionary explains it as an abbreviation of יְהוֹשֻׁעַ; Reuchlin and other Christian Hebraists wrote the name יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, as a combination of the tetragrammaton יהוה, with w, wherein they found deep mysteries.

The first letter of the Greek 'Iησοῦς seems to be treated as a consonant in the hexameter

'Ισαακ | ἡδ' | Ια | κωβ | 'Ιη | σους Δαμ | ηλ | τ' | Ἡλίας, Sib. Or. ii. 247; also in the verse of Theodorus Prodromus: τοῦ δ' 'Iησοῦ θανόντος 'Ιούδας μένει. On its numerical value (10) and its straight form see speculations in Clement's Pædag. i. 9. 25 ἡ εὐθεία καὶ κατὰ φύσιν, ἣν αἰνύττεται τὸ ἰῶτα τοῦ 'Iησοῦ, ἡ ἀγαθωσύνη αὐτοῦ, and ii 43. 3, the psalter of ten strings; in Epiphanius, Hæc. i. 3 = the 10th of Nisan, on which the Paschal lamb was chosen; the tithes (δενάται σιγῆτοι δ' ἡ χ' ἡν' αὐτὸς 'Iησοῦ) in Apost. Const. ii. 25; in the Orus unus in Mt. (Migne, lvi. 618).

On the spelling of the name in the Latin MSS of the Bible, Iesus, Ihesus, Hiesus, see Wordsworth-White on Mt 1<sup>1</sup> and p. 776; H. J. Lawlor, Chapters on the Book of Mulling, p. 76; the letter of Amalarius to Bp. Jonas of Orleans and to Abp. Jeremias of Sens 'de nomine dñi Iesu,' whether IHC or IHS is the correct spelling. whether the middle letter is the Greek η or the Latin h, whether the last letter is Greek or Latin. In the Russian Church there was at one time a violent dispute about this orthographical question. In mediæval poetry, for instance in Ekkehart iv. of St. Gall, Isus is made to rhyme with visus, etc.:

Virgo prior vis
Sed nec ab his

Damasus formed the lines:

In rebus tantis Trina conjunctio mundi
E. venustE,
S. potestas
S. ternis

The Mohammedan form Isā was certainly adapted to get an assonance with Mūsa (like Ibrahim with Ismāil, Kābil with Hābil), and not to identify the name with Esau. This was the more easy because the Nestorians called the name Isḥō, not Jeshū like the Latins. On the proposal to introduce the Mohammedan form Isā instead of Gāsi into the Urdu NT, see Bible House Papers, No. iii. p. 28.

That the name contains 4 vowels and one consonant doubled, and has the numerical value 888 (10+8+200+70+400+200), is shown by Sib. Or. i. 326 ff. and by the speculations of the Marcosians (Iren. xv. 2, Hippol. vi. 50).

On the monograms for the name of Jesus see PRE<sup>3</sup> xii esp. p. 371 f., Jerome, 'de Anecdota Maredsolana, iii. 3 (1903), pp. 100, 101, 'Debre nome Gesù, Napoli, 1890, p. 390.

In the Ethiopian Church the name Jesus is avoided as a proper name (ZDMG xxviii. 309); in the Syriac Church it is 'still very commonly used as a man's name' (Maclean, Dict. of the Idioms of Vernacular Syriac, 1901). It would be an interesting task to collect the proper names borne with Jesus as first or second part; they seem especially frequent in the Syriac and Persian Churches.

JEWS.—This term, originally perhaps applied only to men of the tribe of Judah, 'men of Judæa,' is employed in the Gospels (1) in opposition to Gentiles, or to Samaritans: Mk 7<sup>8</sup>, Jn 26<sup>13</sup> 49<sup>23</sup> 51 6<sup>7</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>, (2) specially of Jews as antagonists of our Lord, a usage which is characteristic of the Synoptists from the Synoptists: Mt 28<sup>15</sup>, Jn 6<sup>41</sup> 9 10<sup>19</sup> 11<sup>19</sup> 31. 33 36 12<sup>9</sup> 11. On the inferences that have been drawn from this usage as to the authorship and date of the Fourth Gospel, see art. JOHN (GOSPEL OF). 'The Jews' in this sense were blind followers of the Pharisees, and bitter opponents of Christ. Scrupulous about all things, by the elders,—washing of hands, etc.; and brazen vessels, Sabbath observance, etc. (Mk 7<sup>3,4</sup>, Jn 5<sup>10</sup> etc.),—they had forsaken the 'old paths' trodden by their fathers, and the things commanded by God. 'For fear of the Jews' men hesitated to confess Christ (Jn 7<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>22</sup>).

JOANNA (Ἰωάννα, Tisch. and Revisers' Text; but Ἰωάννα, WH and Nestle; from Aram. ܝܫܬܪܐ, Heb. ܝܫܬܪܐ).—The wife of Chuza, the 'steward' of Herod Antipas. In Lk 8<sup>1-3</sup> she appears as one of certain women who had been healed, and in gratitude ministered to Jesus and His disciples. The passage reads as though she had herself derived physical benefit from Jesus; but it is possible, as Godet suggests in loc., that the 'nobleman' or king's officer of Jn 4<sup>46-53</sup> was Chuza. If so, Joanna may have been led to attach herself to Christ through the restoration of her son's health, or even of his life if the Johannine narrative is to be identified with Mt

8<sup>5-13</sup> and Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup>. The latter identification, as early as Irenæus (adv. Hær. i. 33), and not without distinguished support (Wetstein, Ewald, de Wette, Baur), is attractive but precarious. Joanna is mentioned again in Lk 24<sup>10</sup> as one of the women who went to the sepulchre to embalm the body of Jesus. She is almost certainly the same person as in 8<sup>3</sup>, though her husband's name does not occur in the later passage. There is no need to explain the omission by a suggestion that he was dead, or had become obscure through dismissal from his office by Antipas because of the relations of his household with Jesus. The Evangelist had already sufficiently marked the identity of Joanna, who was known to her own devotion would be well known to the reader. See also CHUZA.

iii. John the Baptist is History.

iv. John the Baptist is History.

v. John the Baptist is History.

vi. John the Baptist is History.

vii. John the Baptist is History.

i. JOHN'S IMPORTANCE, AND SOURCES FOR HIS HISTORY.—The history of John the Baptist for the history of Jesus is shown by the place given him in the Gospels by every one of the four Evangelists. St. Mark describes John's mission in the very first words of his narrative as 'the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God' (1<sup>1</sup>). St. Luke makes the story of John's birth the prelude to his wonderful narrative of the greater birth at Bethlehem (1<sup>57</sup>). The three Synoptists are agreed in representing his mission as the necessary introduction to the mission of the Christ (Mk 1<sup>2,3</sup>, Mt 3<sup>1</sup>, Lk 3<sup>4</sup>), while in all the Gospels his baptism of Jesus becomes the moment of the Lord's anointment with the Spirit for His Messianic office (Mk 1<sup>10</sup>, Mt 3<sup>16</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21</sup>; cf. Jn 1<sup>32</sup>). In the Prologue to his Gospel the Fourth Evangelist describes John as 'a man sent from God' who 'came for a witness, to bear witness of the light, that all men through him (i.e. Jesus) might believe' (1<sup>6-7</sup>). In accordance with this general sense of John's great importance for Christ and Christianity is the space devoted to him in the Gospel narratives as a whole. It is true that Lk. alone furnishes any information about him previous to the moment when he suddenly issued from his retirement in the wilderness and began to preach the baptism of repentance in the Jordan Valley, and true also that in the case of the Fourth Gospel it is difficult often to distinguish between the Evangelist's statements as a historian and his own subjective exposition. But when we put together all the references to John's ministry and history and character which we find either in the form of historical narrative, or testimony from the lips of Jesus, or reflexion on the part of an Evangelist, and when we make use besides of one or two side-lights which fall from the book of Acts and the pages of Josephus, we find that for knowledge regarding the Baptist's mission, his character, his relation to Jesus Christ, and his place in the history of both the old and the new dispensations, we are in no lack of plentiful and trustworthy sources of information.

ii. BIRTH, YOUTH, AND PRE-PROPHETIC LIFE.—

The fact that Lk. alone of the Gospels gives an account of John's earlier life, together with the artistic nature of the narrative and its presumed discrepancy with the representation of the Fourth Gospel in respect of a connexion between John and Jesus previous to the baptism of the latter (cf. Lk 1<sup>38-56</sup> with Jn 1<sup>31-33</sup>), has frequently been supposed to reduce this exquisite story to the level of pure legend. In view, however, of St. Luke's claims to historical accuracy (1<sup>14</sup>), and of the vindication of these claims at so many points by modern research (cf. W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, ch. 1, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?; Chase, The Credibility of Acts), it is impossible to set his narrative aside as if it rested on no basis of historical fact. It is full of poetry, no doubt, but it is the kind of poetry which bursts like a flower from the living stem of actual truth. Any attempt to dissolve the narrative into fictions of a later growth must reckon with the fact that the Evangelist is evidently making use at this point of an early Aramaic source steeped in the colours of the OT—'the earliest documentary evidence respecting the origins of Christianity which has come down to us, evidence which may be called contemporary' (Plummer, 'St. Luke' in The New Testament in Greek, p. 7). This document, which rests in large part upon the St. Luke, 'as a faithful collector allows to speak for itself, with touch' (Bruce, Expositor's Gr. Test., ad loc.). To appreciate the historical sobriety and manifestly primary character of this early Jewish-Christian source, we must turn to the chapter of Lk. with the relative sec. Jacob, and especially with those which call the Apocryphum Zachar (vol. p. 431).

According to Lk., John was the son of Zacharias, a priest of the course of Abijah (see art. ZACHARIAS), and his wife Elisabeth who belonged to the family of Aaron (1<sup>56</sup>). Elisabeth was a kinswoman (not 'cousin,' see Plummer, op. cit. p. 25) of the Virgin Mary (1<sup>36</sup>), who paid her a three months' visit immediately before the birth of John (v. 56, cf. vv. 38-40). John was the senior of Jesus by six months (1<sup>36-57</sup>, cf. 2<sup>6</sup>). The name John, properly Johanan (Ιωάννης = יהוάν, cf. Heb. text and LXX of 1 Ch 3<sup>24</sup>, 2 Ch 23<sup>12</sup>), was given to the child by his parents in obedience to a Divine direction (1<sup>13</sup>), and in spite of the opposition of neighbours and kinsfolk (vv. 58-63).

Regarding the birth of John's birth there has been much discussion. Lk. describes the birth of Zacharias as in 'a city of Judah' which lay in 'the hill country' (vv. 39-40). A number of commentators have assumed, without any warrant, that this must have been Hebron, as being a priestly town in that region. Others have suggested that τοπος Ιουδα is a corruption for τοπος Ιερουσαλ (Reiland, Pal p. 870; Robinson, BRP ii. 206), so that the birthplace would be Judah or Jutta, to the south of Hebron (Reiland, op. cit. p. 870, and i. 495), which is mentioned in the OT as 'lotted to the priests' (21<sup>10</sup>). The OT assigns the honour to 'Ain J' (Jerusalem and Bethlehem). It is best to be content to say that John was born in a town unknown, in the hill country of Judah. See, further, art. JUDAH.

Of the external incidents of John's childhood and youth Lk. gives no information. All that is told us bears upon his spiritual growth. According to an announcement of the Holy Ghost, he was to be 'filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb' (1<sup>15</sup>). That a peculiar Divine blessing did rest upon him from the first is implied in the words, 'the hand of the Lord was upon him' (v. 66); that this Divine presence made itself manifest in the development of his character is evident when the Evangelist adds, 'and the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit' (v. 80).

But whatever the outward tenor of John's way in that priestly house in the hill country of Judah, a great crisis must have come at last, followed by a sudden break in his manner of life. A priest's son, he would naturally, according to all Jewish traditions, have stepped into the priestly office, and enjoyed the honours, abundance, and comparative ease that were parts of his birthright. But spiritual instincts and powers which had long been unknown in Israel began to make themselves felt in the young man's heart, and this son of a priest went forth into the deserts to be shaped in solitude into a prophet mightier than Elijah or Isaiah. Of the precise nature of the impulse which first led him to withdraw himself from his fellows, the duration of his stay in the wilderness, and the fashion of his life while there, no Evangelist has anything to tell us. But it is certainly a grotesque mistake to suppose that he left his home and the haunts of men in order to become an Essene (see the excellent remarks of Godet on this point, Com. on Lk. i. p. 117 f.).

There was absolutely no resemblance between John, the desert solitary, as he is described to us in the pages of the Gospels (Mt 3<sup>4</sup> || 11<sup>7</sup> || 11<sup>18</sup>), and the Essenes with their white garments and their cenobitic establishments, as we come across them in the pages of Josephus (BJ II. viii. 2-13, Ant. XVIII. i. 5). All that can be said is that John was an ascetic as the Essenes were, and that in both cases the revolt against luxury and corruption sprang out of a seriousness which marked the more earnest spirits of the time (see Ruegg, art. 'Johannes der Täufer' in PRE<sup>3</sup>). John's withdrawal into the wilderness indicated his disapproval of society as he found it, it signified more especially an absolute break with the prevalent Pharisaic type of piety. But in his case it meant much more than this, much more even than the adoption of severely ascetic habits in the interests of his own spiritual life. It was as one who was conscious that he was set apart for the office of a prophet (cf. Lk 1<sup>14-17</sup>, 76a.), and who felt himself called in particular to take up in Israel a work of reformation similar to that of Elijah (Lk 1<sup>17</sup>; cf. Mt 11<sup>14</sup> 17<sup>12</sup>, Jn 1<sup>21</sup>), that John betook himself to the deserts (Lk 1<sup>80</sup>) and there lived the life of one who hides himself from men that he may the better see the face of God. Locusts and wild honey were his food, while his clothing was a loose cloak (ἐνδυμα) of woven camel's hair and a leathern girdle about his loins (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>; cf. 2 K 1<sup>8</sup>).†

How long John remained in 'the deserts,' by which is doubtless meant the awful solitudes of the Wilderness of Judaea, and how he grew into the full sense of the precise nature of his prophetic vocation as the forerunner and herald of the Messiah, we cannot tell. But the Holy Ghost who had been working in him, and the hand of the Lord which had been laid upon him from the first, his own constant brooding over words of ancient prophecy (Jn 1<sup>23</sup>, cf. Mt 3<sup>3</sup>), and a deep intuitive reading of the signs of the times, would gradually bring him to a clear knowledge both of his function as a prophet and of the time when he must begin to exercise it. And so came at last the day of his 'shewing' (ἀνδείξεις) unto Israel (Lk 1<sup>80</sup>).

iii. THE PUBLIC MINISTRY.—It was in the 15th year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar that the word of God came to John in the wilderness summoning him to enter upon his work as a prophet (Lk 3<sup>3</sup>). Immediately he obeyed the summons (v. 3). The scene of his ministry, according to Mk., was 'the wilderness' (1<sup>4</sup>), according to Mt. 'the wilderness of Judaea' (3<sup>1</sup>), according to Lk. 'all the country about Jordan' (3<sup>3</sup>). Probably, as hitherto, the Wilderness of Judaea continued to be his home—that wild region which stretches westwards from the Dead Sea and the Jordan to the edge of the central plateau of Palestine; but when he preached he must have done so in some place not too far removed from the haunts of men, while, owing to his practice of baptism (almost certainly by immersion), the Jordan necessarily marked the central line of his activity (Mt 3<sup>6, 13, 16</sup>, Mk 1<sup>5, 9</sup>). To Jn. we owe the information that he baptized on both sides of the river (1<sup>28</sup> 3<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>40</sup>). John's work may be considered under two aspects, (1) his preaching, (2) his baptism.

* This theory, put forth by Gratz (Gesch. der Juden, iii. p. 100) and adopted by many since, has been repeated once more in the art. 'Essenes' in Jewish Encyc., where it is added that the silence of the NT about the Essenes 'is perhaps the best proof that they furnish the new sect [i.e. Christianity] with its main elements as regards personnel and views—as striking an illustration as could well be discovered of a religious use of the argumentum a silentio. On John's relations to the Essenes see Lightfoot, Colossians, Dissert. iii.

† That he ate locusts, as the Bedawin still do, not carob-beans, is now the prevalent opinion of scholars (cf. art. Locust, and in Hastings' DB, s.v.). Cheyne, however, holds out for carob beans (Encyc. Bibl., art. 'Husks' and 'John the Baptist'). See also Expos. Times, xv. [1904] pp. 285, 335, 429, xvi. [1905] p. 352.

1. John's Preaching.—According to Mt. the essence of John's preaching, the text as we might say of all his sermons, was this: 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand' (3<sup>2</sup>). The second part of this text was the fundamental part. It shows that John was fully conscious that the long-expected Messianic age was now about to dawn, and that it was his mission to proclaim the fact. By his trumpet-voiced of this fact he thrilled the nation and drew forth the multitude into the wilderness to hear him (Mt 3<sup>5</sup>, Lk 3<sup>7</sup>; cf. Jos., Ant. XVIII. v. 2)—men from Jerusalem and men from Galilee (Jn 1<sup>19</sup> 35<sup>ff.</sup>), civilians and soldiers (Lk 3<sup>10, 14</sup>), Pharisees and publicans side by side (Mt 3<sup>7</sup>, Lk 3<sup>12</sup>).

But while the preacher's fundar was the announcement of the near Messianic Kingdom, he combined with these glad tidings of good a stern summons to repentance. Repentance, he said, μετάνοια, a change of mind and heart, were indispensable as a preparatory condition for all who would share in the privileges of the new order about to be set up. To the Jewish mind this was an unexpected and unwelcome note in a herald of the Messiah; and John's utterance of it and strenuous emphasis upon it form one of the marks of his profound originality as a prophet.

to the popular conviction, all Israel a lot and a part in the blessings of the Messianic age, and that specifically because of their descent from Abraham. It was recognized that judgments would accompany the appearance of the Christ, but were to fall upon the Gentiles, children would be secure and happy in that day of the Lord. The Talmud explains the cry of the prophetic watchman, 'The morning cometh, and also the night' (Is 21<sup>12</sup>), by saying, 'The night is only to the nations of the world, but the morning to Israel' (Jerus. Taan. 64a, quoted by Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 271). Not so, said John. Repentance is the prime requ for all who would enter the Kingdom of heaven. Descent from Abraham counts for nothing (Mt 3<sup>9</sup>). Every fruitless or worthless tree must be hewn down and cast into the fire (v<sup>10</sup>). The very leaders of the nation themselves, the Pharisees and Sadducees, must bring forth fruit worthy of repentance if they are to escape from the wrath to come (vv. 7-8).

2. John's Baptism. Alongside of the spoken word John set that great objective symbol of his ministry from which his title 'the Baptist' (ὁ Βαπτιστής) was derived. He came not only preaching but baptizing, or rather, so closely was the symbol interwoven with the word, he came 'preaching the baptism of repentance' (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>, Lk 3<sup>3</sup>). To understand John's doctrine it is necessary to think of the historical roots out of which it sprang. For though he gave to the rite a depth of meaning it had never had in Israel before, he evidently appealed to ideas on the subject which were already familiar to the Jewish people. In particular, three moments in the preceding history of the religion of Israel appear to be gathered up in the baptism of John as it meets us in the Gospels.

βαπτίζω had come to be the regular term alike for those ceremonial washings and for the Messianic baptism of the Forerunner (for detailed proof and refl. on these points see the present writer's Sacraments in the NT, p. 56 f.). And yet, though John's baptism finds its earliest historical roots in the Levitical washings, it is far from finding its complete explanation there. It was essentially an ethical rite, and thus very different from an outward ceremony to which some value could be attached apart from the moral and spiritual condition of the recipient. In the case of all who came to him John insisted upon repentance; and they 'were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins' (Mt 3<sup>2, 6</sup>).

(b) The Messianic lustration foretold by the prophets.—Long before the time of John, prophetic souls in Israel had seen that for a true cleansing the nation must look to those Messianic days when God should open a fountain for sin and for uncleanness, sprinkling His people with clean water, and putting a new heart and a new spirit within them (Jer 33<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 36<sup>25, 26</sup>, Zec 13<sup>1</sup>). It was John's function to declare that those great Messianic promises were to receive their fulfilment at the Messiah Himself. 'We have said, we have said, was a baptism of preparation to the Kingdom, which took the form of repentance and confession. But even more than of preparation it was a baptism of promise, promise both of the Kingdom and the King, being a promissory symbol of a perfect spiritual cleansing which the Messiah in person should bestow—'I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but he that cometh after me . . . shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire' (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>)).

(c) Another historical moment which should not be lost sight of is the proselyte baptism of the Jewish Church. It may now be regarded as certain that the baptism of proselytes had been the rule in Israel long before NT times (see especially Schurer, HJP II. ii. 319; Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 745 ff.); and proselyte baptism helps us to understand the baptism of John in certain of its aspects. When a Gentile 'sought shelter under the wings of the Shekinah,' it was understood that he was utterly renouncing his past. And John insisted on a like renunciation in the case of candidates for his baptism. The danger of the proclamation that the Kingdom of heaven was at hand lay in the fact that multitudes would claim to enter that Kingdom as a matter of course, without being prepared to submit to the necessary conditions. Not so, said John. God does not depend upon Israel alone for the peopling of His Kingdom. He 'is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham' (Mt 3<sup>9</sup>). Even a Jew, if he is to be received, must come as a humble penitent who casts himself upon the Divine grace. He must come like a stranger and a proselyte renouncing the past, not as one who claims an inalienable right, but as one who seeks by fruits of repentance to flee from the wrath to come (Mt 3<sup>7, 8</sup>, Lk 3<sup>7, 8</sup>). For the baptism of the Coming One is a baptism of judgment. His winnowing-fan is in His hand; and while He will gather His wheat into the garner, He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 3<sup>17</sup>).

On the baptism of John see, further, art. BAPTISM.

iv. JOHN'S BAPTISM OF JESUS AND WITNESS REGARDING HIM.—1. The baptism of Jesus by John is recorded in all the Synoptics (Mt 3<sup>13</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21</sup>), but is not mentioned in the Fourth Gospel. The author, however, makes the Baptist refer to the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus in the form of a dove (Jn 1<sup>32</sup>), as an authenticating sign which he received that He was the Messiah; and this incident is represented by the other three as following immediately upon the baptism, though the first two, and probably the third also, describe the visible sign as bestowed upon Jesus Himself along with the approving voice from heaven (Mt 3<sup>16</sup>, Mk 1<sup>10a</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21</sup>). If the scene of the baptism was the same as that of John's witness to Jesus recorded in the Fourth Gospel, it took place at a 'Bethany beyond Jordan' (Jn 1<sup>28</sup>), a site which has been much discussed, but cannot be said to have been certainly identified (see art. BETHABARA).

It was here, then, in all likelihood, that Jesus met John when He came from Galilee to be baptized of him (Mt 3<sup>13</sup>). At first John was unwilling to perform the rite upon such an applicant, but Jesus insisted. 'Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness' (v. 15). It is as an appointment of the Divine will which it was proper that He should accept. If the fitness of that baptism in the case of Jesus is called in question, we must remember that it had an initiatory aspect which would commend it to Him as He saw in it an opportunity of entering His kingdom and its tasks. But if John's words of protest (v. 14) imply that even in the baptism of Christ the cleansing aspect of the rite was in view, was it not proper that the 'Lamb of God' (Jn 1<sup>29-36</sup>), who had no sense of personal guilt, nothing to repent of or confess, should even now begin to bear upon His heart the burden of the sins of others, even as on a coming day He was to bear them 'in his own body on the tree' (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>)?

2. Of the intercourse of John with Jesus, the Fourth Gospel gives an account which differs widely from that presented in the Synoptics; but apart from the Johannine colouring of the later narrative, the difference is sufficiently explained on the ordinary view that the Synoptics describe the meeting between the two at the baptism of our Lord's baptism, while the Fourth Evangelist concerns himself only with John's subsequent testimony to the now recognized Messiah (cf. Jn 1<sup>7a</sup>). There is no real discrepancy between John's 'I knew him not,' repeated in the Fourth Gospel (1<sup>31</sup>), and the representation of Mt. (3<sup>13a</sup>), that when the Man from Nazareth presented Himself at the Jordan, John declined at first to baptize Him, on the ground of his own unworthiness in comparison. Even if we suppose that in spite of their kinship and the friendship between their mothers the two had not met before, the fact that John's baptism was a baptism of repentance and confession seems to imply a previous view of the Messiah, a view which in the case of Jesus must have revealed to one with the Baptist's insight the beauty and glory of His character. On the other hand, the 'I knew him not' of the last Gospel, as the context shows, only means that John did not know that Jesus was indeed the Messiah until he received the promised sign (1<sup>32f.</sup>).

It is true that in the Fourth Gospel John is made to bear a witness to Jesus by the banks of the Jordan (1<sup>19-36</sup>) which finds no parallel in the earlier narratives; but if we follow the ordinary view of students of the chronology of our Lord's life—that the narrative of the Fourth Evangelist comes in after the forty days of the Temptation have intervened, and that John now sees Jesus in the light not only of the authenticating sign given at the baptism, but of his own reflexion ever since upon the subject of the character of Jesus and the fulfilment of the Messianic promise—the fullness and explicitness of his testimony upon this later occasion appear perfectly natural. The twice-repeated ἐμπροσθέν μου γέγονεν (vv. 15, 30), it is true, cannot be understood, so far as the Baptist himself is concerned, as referring to pre-existence, though this was probably involved in the thought of the Evangelist. But the designation of Jesus as 'the Lamb of God' (vv. 29, 36), and especially the phrase 'which taketh away the sin of the world' (v. 29), reveals a conception of the Saviour's Messianic functions which is certainly profound, but which, in spite of the objections which have been taken to it, cannot surprise us in the case of one who had brooded like John over the utterances of OT prophets, especially Is 53).

The Fourth Evangelist records a further witness regarding Jesus which John bore to his own disciples on a later occasion, when he was baptizing in Aenon (wh. see), near to Salim (3<sup>24a</sup>). In this passage the difficulty of discriminating between the original words and facts of history and the Johannine setting and atmosphere is more than usual, but the figure of the 'friend who hath the bride' and the Bridegroom's friend who rejoices in the other's joy (v. 34), and the saying, 'He must increase, but I must decrease' (v. 30), are so well kept in keeping with other utterances of the Baptist recorded in the Synoptics as well as in the Fourth Gospel regarding the relations between the Messiah and himself (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>, Jn 1<sup>33-37</sup>), that it is difficult to resist the impression of historical reality which they make upon the reader.

3. JOHN'S IMPRISONMENT AND DEATH (Mt 14<sup>3-12</sup>, Mk 6<sup>17-29</sup>, Lk 3<sup>19, 20</sup>; cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII v. 1, 2). According to the Synoptics the arrest and execution of John were the result of the spiteful hatred of Herodias (wh. see), because he had rebuked Herod for making her his wife in flagrant defiance of the law of Israel (Lv 18<sup>16, 20</sup>). Josephus, on the other hand, says that Herod put the prophet to death because he 'feared lest the great influence John had over the people might put it in his power and inclination to raise a rebellion; for they seemed ready to do anything he should advise'. The two statements, however, are not irreconcilable; and certainly the evidence of Josephus, whose interests as a historian lay altogether in the political direction, is not such as to cast any suspicion on the trustworthiness of the more detailed and more intimate Gospel narrative. It may very well have been the case that, while John's death was really due to the implacable hate of Herodias, Herod felt that this was hardly a sound, or one that he would care to see carried out, the execution of the Baptist, and so he found reasons his excuse. Assuredly the political influence of the political revolutionary about John; yet his extraordinary influence over the people and the wild hopes raised among certain classes by his preaching might make it easy for Herod to present a plausible justification of his base deed by representing John as a politically dangerous person.

There may seem to be a contradiction within the Evangelic narratives themselves, when we find Mt. saying that Herod would have put John to death but that he feared the multitude (14<sup>5</sup>), while Mk. alleges that Herod 'feared John, knowing that he was a righteous man and an holy, and kept him safe . . . and heard him gladly' (6<sup>20</sup>). But the contradiction lies in Herod's character rather than in the testimonies of the two writers, and the words πολλὰ ἠπόρει, 'he was much perplexed' (Mk 6<sup>20</sup> WH and RV), explain adequately enough a moral situation of which we have the final revelation in Herod's weakly vacillating behaviour, 'letting I dare not wait upon I would,' when Herodias through her daughter Salome (Mt 14<sup>6</sup>, Mk 6<sup>22</sup>; cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII v. 4) presented her horrible request. That Herod did not really regard John as a political fanatic is suggested by all that the Gospels tell us as to the way in which he treated him while he lay in prison; by the personal audiences he granted him (Mk 6<sup>20</sup>), and by the fact that he allowed him to have intercourse with his disciples (Mt 11<sup>2</sup>, Lk 7<sup>18, 19</sup>), and through them to exchange messages with Jesus (Mt 11<sup>2-6</sup>, Lk 7<sup>19-23</sup>).

The message which John sent to Jesus has often been regarded as exceedingly strange on the part of one who had previously borne so signal a witness that Jesus was the Christ, and it has even been suggested that he sent his message because there was any wavering of Jesus, but for the sake of his disciples, to whom he wished some confirmation of the Messianic office of Jesus to be given (see Bebb in Hastings DB II 680<sup>a</sup>). But the more simple explanation is also the one which is truer to human nature. The depression wrought in John on one accustomed to the freedom of his life together with his disappointment at the seeming delay of Jesus to assert His power and authority as the Christ of Israel, had resulted in an hour of the power of darkness in the soul of the great prophet, when he began to wonder whether after all he had not made a great mistake. That in spite of his doubts he had not lost his faith in Jesus is shown by the very fact that it was to Jesus Himself that he applied to have these doubts removed, as well as by that message of encouragement and 'strong consolation' which the Bridegroom sent back to His sorely tried friend 'Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me' (Mt 11<sup>6</sup>, Lk 7<sup>23</sup>).

From Josephus we learn that the Castle of Machærus (wh. see) was the scene of the Baptist's imprisonment (Ant. XVIII. v. 1, 2). Machærus was a powerful stronghold, at once a fortress and a palace (BJ VII. vi. 1-3; cf. Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. xvi. 72), situated on the eastern shores of the Dead Sea (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 569 f.). Within these gloomy walls, then, the death of John took place, one of 'those awful incidents for which nature has provided here so singularly a theatre' (op. cit. in loc.). Of this tragedy St. Mark has furnished us with the fullest account (6<sup>21-29</sup>) in a narrative which is not more thrilling in its dramatic vividness than it is instinct with the elements of what might almost be described as self-evidencing moral and historical truth.

vi. JOHN AND HIS DISCIPLES.—Besides the crowds that came to him to be baptized, John appears to have drawn around him a circle of closer followers, who are referred to in all the Gospels as his 'disciples' (Mt 9<sup>14</sup> [Mt 2<sup>18</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33</sup>] 11<sup>2</sup> [Lk 7<sup>18, 19</sup>], Mk 6<sup>29</sup>, Lk 11<sup>1</sup>, Jn 1<sup>35, 37</sup> 3<sup>26</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>; cf. Ac 13<sup>25</sup> 19<sup>1ff.</sup>). It appears that, unlike Jesus, he enjoined regular fasts upon his disciples (Mt 9<sup>14</sup> [Lk 5<sup>33</sup>]), and that he also gave them forms of prayer (Lk 11<sup>1</sup>) which they were in the habit of employing frequently (Lk 5<sup>33</sup>). Possibly he utilized them as assistants in the work of baptizing, for which he could hardly have sufficed personally when his movement was at its height.

It was from the circle of these disciples of the Baptist that the disciples of Jesus were immediately drawn (Jn 1<sup>28-31</sup>), and that not only with John's full consent, but through his own express witness both in public (Jn 1<sup>19ff. 28ff.</sup>) and in private (v. 35<sup>ff.</sup>) to the superior worth of Jesus and to his own function as the mere herald and forerunner of the latter. And yet he did not as we might have expected, decline, after Christ's baptism to stand any longer to others in the relation of a master to his disciples. Perfectly loyal as he was to Him whom he recognized as the Messiah, he evidently felt, as Jesus also did previous to John's imprisonment (Jn 3<sup>22-24</sup> 4<sup>1-2</sup>), that there was still need for a work of preparation, and room therefore for a discipleship to the Forerunner. But when his disciples grew jealous of the rapidly growing popularity of Jesus, and came to him with their complaint, he proclaimed to them once more the true relation between that Other and himself, 'He must increase, but I must decrease,'—and reminded them how he had said from the first that he was not the Christ, but was sent before Him (Jn 3<sup>28</sup>; cf. Mt 3<sup>11</sup> [Lk 3<sup>16</sup>]).

The fidelity of John's disciples to their master is shown by their holding together and continuing to observe his teaching after he was cast into prison (cf. Mt 11<sup>2</sup> [Lk 10<sup>9</sup>]), by their attendance upon him during his captivity (Mt 11<sup>2ff.</sup>, Lk 7<sup>18, 19a</sup>), and by their loving and reverent treatment of his corpse (Mk 6<sup>29</sup>). The vital impression he made upon them, and the self-propagating power of the baptism of repentance in the absence of a higher teaching, is proved by the fact that more than 20 years afterwards, and in the far-off city of Ephesus, St. Paul found certain disciples, including no less a personage than Apollos, the Alexandrian Jew, who knew no other baptism than that of John (Ac 19<sup>1ff.</sup>, cf. 18<sup>24ff.</sup>). Before the growing light of Christianity John's baptism as a preparation for the Messiah soon vanished away, but the traces of his memory and influence are found lingering long afterwards in the name, doctrines, and practices of the Hemerobaptists, who claimed John as one of themselves (Clem. Rom. ii 23; cf. Hieronimus in Euseb. HE iv. 22; Justin Martyr, Dial. c. Tryph.). On the relation of the Hemerobaptists to John, see Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 402 ff.).

vii. OUR LORD'S ESTIMATE OF JOHN.—The task of the evangelist in the character and activity of John the Baptist is rendered easy for us by the frequent utterances of Jesus Himself. If the worth of praise is to be measured by the lips from which it falls, no mortal man was ever praised so greatly as he whom Jesus described as 'a burning and a shining light' (Jn 5<sup>35</sup>), as one who was 'much more than a prophet' (Mt 11<sup>9</sup> RV, Lk 7<sup>26</sup>), as the Elijah who by his coming was to 'restore all things' (Mt 11<sup>14</sup> 17<sup>10ff.</sup>, Mk 9<sup>11ff.</sup>); and of whom He said, 'Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist' (Mt 11<sup>11</sup>; see the whole passage, and cf. Lk 7<sup>24ff.</sup>). That John had his limitations Jesus made clear (Mk 2<sup>18a</sup>), but He attributed these not to any personal shortcomings, but to the fact that he belonged to the time of preparation and so stood by a transitional process outside of the realized Kingdom of God (Mt 11<sup>1</sup>, Lk 7<sup>28b</sup>).

Again and again Jesus revealed His sense of the Divine value that attached to the baptism of John. He showed it when He insisted on submitting to that baptism Himself, and by the words He used on the occasion (Mt 3<sup>15</sup>). He showed it when He asked the question, 'The baptism of John, whence was it? from heaven, or of men?' (Mt 21<sup>25</sup> [Lk 20<sup>1</sup>]), a question to which His own answer was self-evident, and which St. Luke answers for us when he says that 'all the people when they heard, and the publicans, justified God being baptized with the baptism of John. But the Pharisees and the lawyers rejected for themselves the counsel of God, being not baptized of him' (Lk 7<sup>29ff.</sup>). And may we not say that in His words to a certain Pharisee (Jn 3<sup>1</sup>) about the necessity of a birth 'of water and the Spirit' (v. 5), He was indicating once more the deep religious value of John's water-baptism, while insisting at the same time on the indispensableness of that spiritual birth which comes only from above (v. 6)? Time after time, too, even to the closing days of His ministry, words which Jesus let fall reveal to us that He carried about with Him continually the thought of His predecessor's career, and perceived the bearing of its lessons upon His own ministry and earthly lot and fate (see Mt 9<sup>12ff.</sup>).

11<sup>12ff.</sup> 18f. 17<sup>9ff.</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>, Lk 16<sup>13</sup>). And, finally, after His resurrection, we find that as He had justified John at the first by taking up his baptism of preparation, so now He crowns the work of the Forerunner by instituting the baptism of the Kingdom itself (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). John had adopted the rite as the distinctive symbol of his reforming activity and the gateway into the sphere of Messianic preparation. Jesus transformed it into a sacrament of the Christian Church—at once the token of the work of forgiveness and the sign and seal of union with Himself.

JOHN (THE APOSTLE).—As the Gospels are but memorabilia of Jesus, giving relatively but meagre accounts of His life and works, it is to be expected that they can afford us only glimpses of the Apostles. Such is the case; and, while a few more references are made to Peter, James, and John than to the others, we have no such material as allows any more than a fragmentary account of any one. Tradition has, in the case of John, added to the Scripture narrative a subsequent life and fate. For convenience of reference, we add to all that is known of John we may group the materials under the following heads: (1) those found in the Scriptures; (2) those given us by tradition. To the account thus obtained we shall add a brief delineation of his character.

i. THE TESTIMONY OF SCRIPTURE.—Preliminary to giving the facts in their chronological order, it is well to call attention to the universal identification of the unnamed disciple of the Fourth Gospel with John.*

John is first introduced to us as a disciple of John the Baptist (Jn 1<sup>35</sup>). How long he had been with this stern preacher of the desert we do not know, but the time was one of preparation for the higher discipleship soon to follow. After the Temptation Jesus returned to the Jordan. Then and there John first met Jesus, and, with Andrew, showed such deep interest in Him that He invited them to go with Him to His abode. So critical was the hour when they went—four o'clock in the afternoon—that it was remembered long years after (1<sup>38-40</sup>). John's home was in Galilee (probably at Bethsaida), where his father, Zebedee, a man apparently of means (Mk 1<sup>20</sup>), was busy as a fisherman on the Lake. His mother was Salome (cf. Mt 27<sup>56</sup> with Mk 15<sup>40</sup>). On the next day after his first meeting with Jesus, John accompanied Him to Galilee, and was present at the marriage feast at Cana (Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup>). From Cana they went to Capernaum, in order, perhaps, to make ready for going up to Jerusalem to the Passover. At this first Passover Jesus cleansed the Temple, and also 'did signs' which awakened popular interest. Here also He conversed with Nicodemus (2<sup>13-32</sup>). The capital had not shown itself ready for the work He wished to do, so Jesus withdrew into the country of Judæa and summoned the people to the baptism of repentance, just as the Baptist himself was doing.

* Dr. Delfs has with considerable force advanced and defended the theory that 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' was not the Apostle John, but a younger disciple, who shared all the privileges of the Twelve, but who was a native of Jerusalem and a member of the higher aristocracy. While this theory explains satisfactorily some of the facts given in the Gospels, it is beset with grave difficulties.

John was with Him all through this sojourn of over seven months in Judæa, and doubtless assisted in the baptism of the multitude of the baptismal rite, for Jesus did not baptize (4<sup>2</sup>). At the end of this period Jesus returned by way of Samaria to Galilee. On the way occurred the incident of the Samaritan woman, so fully depicted for us in the Fourth Gospel (4<sup>1-42</sup>). Once more the Master came to Cana, and while there cured the nobleman's son (v. 46-54). For a brief time John seems now to have been at home, and to have engaged in his customary business of fishing; but the Baptist's imprisonment was the signal to Jesus for more vigorous work, and He appeared at the Lake-side to call to be His permanent escort the men who had already acknowledged Him and given Him some service (Mk 1<sup>16-20</sup>, Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>1-11</sup>). John now entered upon that second stage of discipleship which was to prepare him for his life-work. The record of events which shows Jesus performing miracles and preaching in the towns and villages of Galilee is the record of John's training (see Mk 1<sup>21-22</sup>). When, some time afterwards, John was chosen to the Apostolate (Mk 3<sup>13-19</sup>, Mt 10<sup>2-4</sup>, Lk 6<sup>12-13</sup>), it was but to confirm him in the position he had already occupied, and to make more definite his mission. At this time Jesus called him and his brother Boanerges—that is, 'sons of thunder' (Mk 3<sup>17</sup>). See BOANERGES.

As from this time onwards the most of John's experiences were common to all the Apostles, it is necessary to mark only those which were in any way exceptional for him. They are sufficient to show that he was among the most prominent of the little band, and that he was especially close in friendship to the Master. With Peter and James he saw the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5<sup>37</sup>, Lk 8<sup>51</sup>). These three were with Jesus upon the Mount of Transfiguration (Mk 9<sup>2</sup>, Mt 17<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>28</sup>). It was John who 'answered and said, Master we saw one casting out devils in thy name: and we forbade him, because he followeth not with us' (Mk 9<sup>38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>49</sup>). It was he and James who wished to call down fire upon an inhospitable Samaritan village (Lk 9<sup>54</sup>). His mistaken ambition for high place at the side of his Master is recorded in Mk 10<sup>37</sup>, Mt 20<sup>21</sup>. He took part in the fulfilment of the prophecies concerning Jerusalem (Mk 13<sup>3</sup>). He and Peter were sent to make ready the Passover (Lk 22<sup>8</sup>). At the supper itself he reclined 'in Jesus' bosom' (see art. BOSOM), and asked Him who it was that was to be the betrayer (Jn 13<sup>23-25</sup>). In the garden of Gethsemane he was, with Peter and James, near his Master (Mk 14<sup>33</sup>, Mt 26<sup>37</sup>). Panic-stricken, he fled with all the other disciples at the time of the arrest (Mt 26<sup>56</sup>), but soon recovered himself, and followed Jesus to the palace of the high priest (Jn 18<sup>15</sup>). Known to the high priest, he was in the court of the palace, and secured entrance for Peter (v. 16). Faithful now to the last, he stood near the cross, and there received the commission to care for the mother of Jesus (19<sup>26-27</sup>). On the morning of the resurrection Mary Magdalene tells him and Peter of the empty grave, and they hasten together to the spot (20<sup>2-8</sup>). In the account of the appearance of the risen Lord in Galilee (21<sup>2-7</sup>) the 'sons of Zebedee' have special mention, and again in the closing scene and words of the Fourth Gospel the impression that he should not die before the Lord's coming is corrected, and the truthfulness of his witness as given in this Gospel confirmed (21<sup>20-24</sup>).

Outside of the Gospels there are but few references to him in the NT. In the Acts he appears twice in the company of Peter. As they were going together, at the hour of prayer, to the Temple, they met a man, lame from birth, at the Beautiful Gate, and cured him. The deed caused great excitement, and a large crowd gathered around them in Solomon's porch. While they were speaking to the people the authorities came, and 'being sore troubled because they taught the people,' arrested them, and on the following day brought them before the Sanhedrin (Ac 4<sup>2</sup>). Later, he and Peter were sent to Samaria to those who had received the word of God under Philip's ministry, and 'they . . . these that they might receive the Holy Spirit' (8<sup>14-15</sup>). About A.D. 50 we find John in Jerusalem, for at that time Paul meets him there and consults with him regarding his work among the Gentiles (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>). He was at this time one of the pillars of the Church. The only other mention of him in the NT is in Rev 1<sup>4-9</sup>.

ii. THE TESTIMONY OF TRADITION.—1. Regarding John's residence in Ephesus—From the time of his meeting with Paul in Jerusalem until his activity in later life at Ephesus, we have no certain knowledge of the Apostle. Irenæus (HE ii 2) tells us that Mary lived with John in Jerusalem for eleven years after the death of the Lord. There is nothing unlikely in this story, unless it be, as Godet suggests, that 'his own home' (Jn 19<sup>27</sup>) was in Galilee rather than in the capital in which case there would be an explanation of the Apostle's absence at the time of Paul's visit to the city (Gal 1<sup>18-19</sup>). It is but conjecture, however, which fixes the date of his final departure from Jerusalem, though we know that he was not there when Paul came for the last time (Ac 21<sup>18</sup>), and that the signs of the impending destruction of the city caused all the Christians to retire to Pella, c. 68 A.D. (Eus HIE iii. 5-3). It is of more moment to inquire why he should go to Ephesus, and in answer two reasons may be given: (a) the importance of this city as a centre for missionary activity; and (b) the necessity of carrying on and developing the work of Paul. In the latter part of the 1st cent. 'the Church's centre of gravity was no longer at Jerusalem; it was not yet at Rome; it was at Ephesus' (Thiersch, quoted by Godet, Com on John, vol. i. p. 45). Not only within the borders of this city had Christianity made a marked impression, but all about were cities in which the Church had been established. The seven letters in the Apocalypse enable us to see what ceaseless vigilance and untiring care were needed to protect these Churches from error in doctrine, and to keep them faithful in life. No longer call for Apostolic service could be given than this part of the world was then giving, and, as far as tradition is concerned, there can be little doubt that John responded to this call. Just at this point, however, criticism, in the interest of its discussions regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, has taken its stand, and tried to make it appear that John is not the author. The traditional residence of John is thus called in question, and as such must be given somewhat extended attention. The main witnesses for the common tradition are Irenæus, Polycrates (Bishop of Ephesus), and Clement of Alexandria.

(a) Irenæus bears repeated testimony to the Apostle's presence in Asia, and says explicitly 'Afterwards, after the first three John the disciple of the Lord, who also lay on his breast, likewise published a Gospel while dwelling at Ephesus' (adv. Hæc iii. 1). Polycarp was not only instructed by the Apostles, and had intercourse with many who had seen Christ, but he was also installed by the Apostles as Bishop in Asia in the Church at Smyrna. 'We also saw him (Polycarp) in our earliest youth, for he lived very long, and left this life at a great age, having suffered a glorious and brilliant martyrdom, and having always taught what he had learned from the Apostles.' Also the Church at Ephesus, founded by Paul, and with which John lived till Trajan's time (98-117), 'is a truthful witness to the tradition of the Apostles' (ib. iii. 3, 4). In a letter to Florinus, a part of which has been preserved by Eusebius (HE v. 20), Irenæus tells of his vivid recollections of Polycarp. The way of the venerable martyr's life, his bodily form, the discourses he gave to the people, and the account which he gave of his intercourse with John and with the rest who had seen the Lord, were clearer to him (Irenæus) in memory than many . . . . . Again, when Victor the Bishop of Rome . . . . . Quatreciman Churches, Irenæus wrote admonishing the Bishop, and, in the course of what he had to say, referred to the difference between Amicetus and Polycarp over the Paschal question, in these words: 'Amicetus could not persuade Polycarp not to observe what he had always observed with John the disciple of our Lord and the other Apostles with whom he had associated' (Eus HIE v. 24).

The value of all this testimony is enhanced when one marks the overlapping of lives which is here evident. Polycarp suffered . . . . . in the year A.D. 155 at the age of 86. He . . . . . therefore, in the year 69. If John lived until Trajan's time, it were easily possible for the two to have associated with each other. Irenæus while a boy (12-18 years of age) listened with peculiar and observant attentiveness to Polycarp. These three names cover over a century. They link together in such a manner the . . . . . of personal associations and reverent remembrance that the evidence for John's presence in Ephesus seems well-nigh conclusive. Its cogency, however, is supposed to be greatly weakened by two important considerations: (a) the silence among older writers regarding the Ephesian residence, and (b) the possible confusion, on the part of Irenæus, of John the Apostle with John the Presbyter. At first sight the silence of Polycarp and Ignatius is surprising, but it is not beyond explanation. Polycarp's letter is to the Philippian Church, and calls for no reference to John. The absence of all mention of the Apostle in the Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians is not so easy to account for, but an argument from silence is precarious when one considers how sparingly he brings in even the name of Paul. It . . . . . the similarity of their fortunes which . . . . . speak of this Apostle at all, for just as Paul had sent for the elders of the Ephesian Church to meet him at Miletus on his way to imprisonment in Rome, so Ignatius at Smyrna received a delegation from Ephesus (Ephes. 12). This would exclude any reference to John; and in view of all other evidence, it can be as certainly affirmed, as it can be denied, that the general reference in the previous section covers the name of John. This reference is, 'May I be found in the lot of the Christians of Ephesus who have always been of the same mind as the Apostles through the power of Jesus Christ' (Ephes. 11). When, moreover, one takes into account the scantiness of the remains of this early period, the probable growth of John's reputation during the 2nd century, and the prevalence in the Ignatian Epistles themselves of a Johannine type of teaching . . . . . der Goltz's 'Ignatius von Antiochien als Theolog' in ThU, Bd. xii. [1894]), the argument from silence loses much of its force. The other consideration urged against the testimony of Irenæus is really a . . . . . correction made by Eusebius . . . . . of Irenæus that 'Papias was a hearer of John and a companion of Polycarp' (adv. Hæc. v. 33. 4). The words of Eusebius are found in his History, iii. 39. After quoting the above words from Irenæus, he says, 'But Papias himself by no means declares that he was himself a hearer and eye-witness of the holy Apostles'; and then he goes on to infer that it was the Presbyter John who was meant in the statement of Irenæus. This brings us to the examination of the witness of Papias in its bearing upon the whole question. In his preface to his Expositions of the Oracles of the Lord he says:

* This objection is urged by Keim, Harnack, Holtzmann, and other modern critics in their discussion of the authorship of John's Gospel.

'But I shall not hesitate also to put down for you along with . . . I have at any time learned . . . ly remembered, guarantee . . . he multitude, take pleasure . . . ose that speak the truth; not in those that relate strange commandments, but in those that deliver . . . by the Lord to faith and springing fr . . . en, anyone came who had been a follower of the elders, I questioned him in regard to the words of the elders—what Andrew or what Peter said, or what was said by Philip, or by Thomas, or by James, or by John, or by Matthew, or by any other . . . and the . . . the . . . not think that what was . . . from the books would profit me as much as what . . . living and abiding voice' (Eus. HE iii. 39).

A just interpretation of these words must allow for a distinction between the Apostle John and the Presbyter John, but the inference based on the tense of the verb in the sentence, 'What things Aristion and the Presbyter John, the disciples of the Lord, say,'—that Papias was actually a hearer of the Presbyter,—is very questionable. Much discussion has been given to the import of this latter part of Papias' preface. A thoroughly satisfactory understanding is, however, that which makes these words we have just quoted refer not to the spoken witness, but to the written testimony of Aristion and the Presbyter John.* In his search for enlightenment Papias inquired after the unwritten sayings of all referred to except Aristion and John the Presbyter. In their case his inquiry was concerning their written sayings about which there might be some doubt. 'The book,' bearing possibly such titles as 'Narratives of Aristion, or Tradition of the Presbyter John,' needed confirmation by competent witnesses. Papias had not the same confidence in them as in oral reports. Points which confirm this understanding are (1) the hesitation of Eusebius about his own inference that Papias was an actual hearer of John the Presbyter, at least he mentions them frequently by name and gives their traditions in writing' (HE iii. 39); (2) the suggested antitheses in the phrases 'his own writing' and 'unwritten tradition' which are found in the accounts of the sources of Papias later on in the same section (HE iii. 39: 'The same author has communicated also other things that came to him as from unwritten tradition'; 'but he also commits to his own writing other narratives of the sayings of the Lord of the aforesaid Aristion and traditions of the Presbyter John'). 'His own writing' suggests somebody else's writing; the 'unwritten tradition' suggests written tradition. If this interpretation of the words of Papias be true, then it affords no evidence that Papias was a hearer of the Presbyter John. Indeed, it does not require us to think that he was living at the time the words of Papias were written, or that he was even ever in Ephesus at all. The only support we have for this last supposition is Dionysius of Alexandria, who in the interests of the authorship of the Apocalypse by some other John than the Apostle cites the tradition that 'there are two monuments in Ephesus, each bearing the name of John.'

We come back now to Irenæus. The statement which he makes regarding the relationship of Papias to the Apostle John and to Polycarp is not derived from the preface of Papias (see above), and if there is no possible confusion in the two Johns, we need only ask what value the positive statement of Irenæus really has. Recall for a moment his reference to Polycarp. If these words are true, and there is no reason to doubt them, then it was no mere passing acquaintance which Irenæus had with Papias. He had carefully observed him, and he had listened to his discourses. Can it be . . . that he understood him, whenever he spoke of John, to be referring to John the Presbyter, and was Polycarp himself talking of his intercourse with John the Presbyter? Such confusion as this on the part of men so intimately related is quite impossible. Certainly it is equally improbable that at the early time of Polycarp, John the Presbyter should have become such a figure in Ephesus that Polycarp could speak of him exactly as if he were John the Apostle. There is therefore no sufficient reason for doubting the testimony of Irenæus.

(b) In turning to the witness of Polycrates, it is well to note that he was Bishop of Ephesus, had seven relatives who were bishops, and was at the time of his letter to Victor, Bishop of Rome, an old enough man to have been living at the time of Polycarp. He was therefore in a position to know fully whereof he wrote. This fact of the continuity of experiences as lying behind these several testimonies needs repeated emphasis. In his letter to Victor (see Eus. HE v. 24) he is writing upon the Quartodeciman question, and citing his authorities for the observance of the 'fourteenth day of the Passover according to the Gospel.' Among these he places 'John, who was both a witness and a teacher who reclined upon the bosom of the Lord, and being a priest wore the sacerdotal plate. He fell asleep at Ephesus.'

The reference to one 'who reclined upon the bosom of the Lord' seems to point unmistakably to the Apostle, but two statements of Polycrates seem to come to run counter to this. (1) That he was a priest and wore the sacerdotal plate (ἐπίτολον). From the fact that Epiphanius (Hæc xxvii. 14) says the same of James the brother of the Lord, it is probably a . . . brethren. (2) The other counter-statement is derived from the notice given of Philip in this same letter. It is claimed that Polycrates has clearly confused the Apostles and Evangelists, hence he may have in the same way confused John the Apostle with John the Presbyter. The whole question turns upon the allusion to the fourteenth day of the Passover. It is stated, the disputed evidence is this: Papias, the earliest witness, places Philip among the Apostles (HE iii. 39). Then he goes on to relate a wonderful tale which he heard from t who had died in Asia was . . . who sleeps in Hierapolis, and his two virgin daughters and another daughter who lived in the Holy Spirit and now rests at Ephesus' (HE iii. 31). Again the reference to the Apostle is clear. Clement of Alexandria declares that the Apostles Peter and Philip had children, and that Philip gave his daughters to husbands (Strom. iii. 6). From all this it is clear that the Apostle Philip had daughters. So far there seems to be no confusion. If this comes in at all, it appears in a statement of Proclus, who, speaking of the death of Philip and his daughters, says: 'After this arose four prophetesses, the daughters of . . . in Asia. Their tomb is there, and the tomb . . . (HE iii. 31). The close resemblance of this record to the statement in Ac 21<sup>9</sup> makes it appear that the . . . identification of the two . . . relatively late, and need . . . Polycrates deserves our . . . cause, in the first place, . . . in the second place, . . . exact, and it . . . how, . . . one place, the . . . port of Polycrates could have arisen, while on the other hand it is quite easy to explain the rise of the more general but inexact account of Proclus' (McGiffert on Epistles in new). It should be noted also that we have in Polycrates, as a contemporary of Irenæus, an independent witness.

(c) It is in connexion with the story of the young convert who subsequently became a robber that Clement of Alexandria speaks of John's residence in Asia. The value of this testimony lies in the fact that Clement, in gathering memoranda to be 'stored up against old age as a remedy against forgetfulness, had collected traditions handed down 'from the holy Apostles Peter, James, John, and Paul, the sons receiving it from the father.' As Drummond says of this witness, 'It seems probable that we have here a distinct line of tradition which affords independent confirmation of the statements of Irenæus and Polycrates.' The clearness, positiveness, and fulness of the witness of these three, taken together with the personal relations involved, affords adequate basis for the general belief of the Church that in the latter part of his life John made his home in Ephesus.

2. Regarding John's banishment to Patmos.—The discussion of the deliverances of tradition in regard to John's exile in Patmos is vitally connected with the authorship of the Gospel (see art. 'John, Gospel of,' in Hastings 11:3 707 ff.). The references to this fact are quite numerous in the Fathers, and begin with Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 190). Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome all speak of it, but do not agree as to the time of it. Epiphanius (Hær. 12) refers it to the reign of Claudius, while (Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Jerome place it in the reign of Domitian. Internal evidence from the Gospel itself favours an early time, while the Fathers are explicit about the later date. All testimonies to the exile are probably based upon the statement found in Rev 1<sup>9</sup>, and thus gives no real foundation for any banishment at all. If John was in Patmos, it may be that he went thither, as Weiss supposes, to find a religious retreat, or, as others think, to avoid persecution.

3. Regarding John's death.—In accord with the statement of Irenæus—that 'John remained among them (the disciples) in Asia up to the time of Trajan' (adv. Hær. ii. 22), it has been generally believed that the Apostle lived to a ripe old age, and died quietly at Ephesus. Of late this opinion has been earnestly disputed, on the basis of a statement found in the Chronicle of Georgius Hamartolos (9th cent.), which reads, 'Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis declares in the second book of the Chronicle that John was put to death by the Jews.' This testimony has been confirmed by the de Boor Fragment, which expressly says that Papias tells in his second book of the death of James and John at the hands of the Jews. Of course, if John the Apostle died in this way, there is nothing left but to take some other John as the John of Ephesus; and all the statements of Irenæus, Polycrates, and Clement of Alexandria have a confusion of names underlying it; also the John of the Apostolic council (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>) was not the son of Zebedee. All this is by no means likely. Various attempts have been made to account for the record of Georgius—such as Lightfoot's supposition of a lacuna, which was later filled in as we now have it (see Essay on Supernatural Religion, p. 211 ff.); or Zahn's (Forsch. vi 147-151) of an interpolation, and that Papias was really referring to the Baptist; but the more probable explanation is that the statement arose from a desire to find a fulfilment of Mk 10<sup>38, 39</sup>, and a mistaken interpretation of the word μαρτυρῶν, which in its earlier sense did not necessarily involve death. It is certainly not easy to understand why Eusebius and others ignored the fact, if such it was.

Thus far we have sought to get at the real facts of tradition. It will surprise no one to know that the life of one so prominent as John was embellished with all manner of legends—such as his meeting with Cerinthus in the bath-house at Ephesus (adv. Hær. iii. 3, 4); his being carried in extreme old age to the church, and saying, 'Little children, love one another' (Jerome, Comm. ad Gal. vi. 11); his recovery of the young robber from his life of shame (Eus HE iii. 23), his immersion in a caldron of boiling oil (Tert Præscript. Hær. ch. xxvi.); and many others. Some of them may have germs of truth in them. They all seek in some way to illustrate the noble character of the man, or to interpret the prophecy of the Gospels regarding his earthly destiny.

iii. THE CHARACTER OF JOHN.—It is commonly thought that John was of a gentle, contemplative nature, and almost effeminate in character. Contemplative he was, and the Gospel is but an expression of his profound meditation upon the character and work of his Master; but a moment's reflexion upon some of the scenes of the Gospels (see Mt 20<sup>20-24</sup>, Lk 9<sup>49-54</sup>), in correspondence with which are some of the legends regarding his later life, will show that this Apostle was, at least in earlier life, impetuous, intolerant, and ambitious. Doubtless he was effectively moulded by the Spirit of Christ during his long discipleship, but he was always stern and uncompromising in his hatred of evil and in his defence of truth. He loved with a strong, passionate devotion, and he hated all wrong and untruth as only one can who understands as he did the significance of his Lord's teaching. Because of his profound understanding, he writes as one who has an immediate perception of truth. He does not reason as does Paul. He saw 'the King in his beauty,' or, to use his own words, 'the glory of the only-begotten of the Father' (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). His strength and devotion made him courageous; his affection made him tender and abundantly beautiful by spiritual purity.

Introduction.—It is important to remember that the Kingdom of Christ was in being before the Gospel records were written. They did not originate the Kingdom but are themselves the expression of it. Previous to the publication of the Johannine Gospel which is the latest of the four, St. Paul had completed his mission to the Gentiles; and in Ephesus, where the Gospel was written, his doctrine had already an assured place in the Christian Church. It is therefore historically untrue to say that faith in the Divine Person and work of Jesus is destroyed if the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel cannot be proved. For the basis of our faith we must dig deeper than the results of critical investigation.

The question, however, of the authorship of this Gospel is more than a merely academic one. It occupies a unique position. None of the other three claims to be written by the man whose name it bears, but the Fourth Gospel is issued with an explicit statement to that effect (21<sup>24</sup>). Moreover, its contents are vitally connected with the individuality of the author. The very way in which his identity is studiously concealed shows that the writer is himself conscious that the Gospel contains a personal testimony, which he does not hesitate to present as objective and impersonal. We desire to know who it is that claims to be an eye-witness; who it is that narrates events and discourses of Jesus so distinct in character from the Synoptics, and yet meant to occupy a place alongside these without contradiction, who it is that has so boldly mingled historic fact and ideal conceptions, that has given to the Person of Christ a timeless cosmic significance, and has represented our Lord in His acts and in His words as Himself justifying that impression and those claims. If, as is certain, the work is influenced by developed theological conceptions, and reflects the contemporary historical situation of the Christian Church, we desire to be certain that the writer was in a position not seriously to misrepresent the actual facts. This is no merely antiquarian question. There can be no doubt that the Gospel is intended to be read as the work of the Apostle, and it would seriously detract from its value, if, as extreme critics are more and more inclined to allow, that claim means only that it contains a nucleus of Johannine tradition. The same objection applies to the popular theories of the Gospel of Werner, which are assumed in this article that their authors have failed to prove their case. If, on the other hand, the writer was the beloved disciple, an eye-witness possessing a specially intimate knowledge of the mind and character of Jesus, we have an assurance that when, for example, he wrote the opening sentences of the Gospel, he felt himself in touch not merely with current theological thought, but with the historic fact of the consciousness of Jesus of Nazareth. So far from being a stumbling-block to the Johannine authorship, the Prologue even gains in value and significance with the acceptance of the traditional view. The striking juxtaposition of the Prologue of the timeless Logos with the Prologue of the Baptist, to whom the conception was unfamiliar, and the frequent mention of the Baptist throughout the Gospel, even at times when the tradition scarcely demands it (e.g. 10<sup>40-42</sup>), are saved from abruptness only if the writer is developing an impression made on him by his earliest teacher, who led him to Christ. His experience stretches in one continuous whole from that time to this when he begins to write.

I. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE FOR THE AUTHORSHIP OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—The face of the Johannine problem has greatly changed since the days of Baur and his school. The opinion of Lightfoot, that 'we may look forward to a time when it will be held discreditable to the reputation of any critic for sobriety and judgment to assign to this Gospel any later date than the end of the first century or the very beginning of the second,' has been amply fulfilled. 80-110 A.D. may be taken as the terminum quo and ad quem for the Gospel's writing, and the trend of modern opinion is towards the end of the 1st century. This result makes it desirable to throw the emphasis in a less degree on the external evidence for an early date, and in a greater degree on the evidence for the Apostolic authorship. If, however, the problem of external evidence be presented in this form, we must guard ourselves against a certain feeling of disappointment at the meagre results. In the first place, there is no evidence that the Apostolic authorship was contested in the 2nd cent. except by the Alogi; and none that it was ever debated. The questions that agitated the mind of the Church in this period seem to have been entirely doctrinal (Gnosticism and Montanism). Again, it is not until the latter part of the century that there are indications of a distinct value attached to each separate Gospel. Εὐαγγέλιον was the term employed to denote the general contents of those books that embodied the facts concerning the life and teaching of our Lord, and we first find the term εὐαγγέλιον in Justin (Apol. I. lxxvi.). The contrast between the Synoptics and John in this period arose entirely from the differences in subject-matter, and there is no indication that the Fourth Gospel was set on a lower plane of authority.

One remarkable fact in connexion with the external evidence is that none of the writers in question actually calls St. John an Apostle. This fact is never lost sight of by opponents of the Apostolic authorship. It is true that Irenæus speaks of 'John and the other Apostles'; but in the same passage alone he always calls him 'the disciple' (the ἀπόστολος), with the usage of the Fourth Gospel, where the title ἀπόστολος is only once used (13<sup>16</sup>), and there in a sense that seems to deprecate any presumptuous or mercenary claim to official position. If such claims were rife in Ephesus, perhaps St. John himself would have been called an 'apostle' (Cf. H. T. Purchas, Johannine).

We shall now proceed to examine in detail, working backwards from the end of the 2nd cent., the evidence of those Ecclesiastical writers who have made direct or indirect reference to the Fourth Gospel.

1. A group of writers in the last quarter of the 2nd cent. whose geographical distribution over the Christian Church gives evidence of a widespread tradition.

(1) Irenæus was bishop of Lyons in Gaul. His work entitled Against Heresies has come down to us, and in the writings of Eusebius we possess other fragments. An important letter to Flouinus has also been preserved. The date of his literary activity may be put within the limits 173-190. He explicitly attributes the Fourth Gospel to the Apostle, and gives it a place alongside Matthew, Mark, and Luke. He says that 'John, the disciple of the Lord, who leaned upon His breast,' wrote it 'while dwelling in Ephesus, the city of Asia' (adv. Hæc. III. i. 1). Stress is also to be laid on the fact that Irenæus speaks of the Gospels not merely as Apostolic, but also as inspired by the Holy Spirit. For him the tradition of the fourfold Gospel, which he supports strongly, has passed into a deep spiritual fact, which he seeks to establish, not by bringing forward proofs of authorship, but in his well-known mystic fashion. 'The gospel is the Divine breath or word of life for men; there are four chief winds; therefore four Gospels.' He brings forward other analogies, all of which are equally fanciful, but serve to show that this firm belief in the fourfold Gospel as a Divine arrangement could not have been a creation of his own mind, but represents a tradition of considerable antiquity. The opinion of Irenæus is corroborated by a contemporary letter written by the members of the Churches at Vienne and Lyons to the brethren in Asia Minor during the time of persecution in 177. Thus Irenæus is in touch with the living Church around him.

(2) Clement of Alexandria is the author of a statement preserved by Eusebius (HE vi. 14), which professes to represent 'the tradition of the Presbyters from the first (παράδοσιν τῶν ἀνέκαθεν προεβυτέρων) that John, having observed that the bodily things [σωματικά, i.e. the simple facts relating to the life and teaching of Christ] had been set forth in the Gospels, on the exhortation of his friends (γνώριμοι), inspired by the Spirit, produced a spiritual Gospel.' From about 189, Clement was head of the celebrated catechetical school at Alexandria. His great reverence for his teacher Pantenus, who also preceded him in office, may fairly be regarded as indicating that he represents the ecclesiastical tradition at Alexandria. He was also in living touch with opinion at other centres. He travelled in Greece, Magna Græcia, Syria, and the East, expressly for the purpose of collecting information about the Apostolic tradition. In his extant writings he quotes words from all the four Gospels, regards them as possessing Divine authority, and lays great emphasis on the differences between them and other writings professing to be Gospels.

(3) Tertullian was a famous theologian of the Western Church, and was born at Carthage about 160. The style of his writing suggests that he was trained as an advocate. He was reputed a man of great learning. Jerome speaks of his 'eager and vehement' style, and his habit of mind is in striking contrast to the philosophic temper of Clement. It is needless to question the genuineness of the Gospel, and lays under contribution every chapter. Little is known of his personal life, but he was certainly in touch with theological opinion, not only at Carthage, but also at Rome. In the line of argument that he adopts in his reply to Marcion he is concerned above all else to show that the doctrine of the Church is in line with Apostolic tradition. He makes appeal in another writing, de Prescriptione Hæreticorum, to the testimony of those Churches that were founded by Apostles, or to whom Apostles declared their mind in letters. Among these he mentions Ephesus, evidently in connexion with the name of St. John. His term for the fourfold Gospel is a legal term, Evangelium Instrumentum, i.e. a valid document finally in the mind of the Church with regard to

He became a distinguished leader of the Montanists, and would on that account be predisposed to combat any objection, if it had been urged, against the authenticity of the Gospel. At the same time, he is not indifferent to questions of literary criticism, applied to the Gospels. In his reply to Marcion he makes careful and scholarly investigation into the text of St. Luke, and is able to prove that Marcion's Gospel is a mutilated copy.

(4) The Muratorian Fragment on the Canon.—This contains the earliest known list of the books regarded at the date at which it was written as canonical. It was published in the year 1740 by an Italian scholar, Muratori.

Westcott, and Harnack, 175; but late, from internal evidence not earlier than A.D. 200. Sanday, in his Gospels in the Second Century (pp. 264-266), suggests 170-180, and perhaps within ten years later. Stanton, in The Gospels as Historical Documents (p. 247, n. 1), inclines to the later date.

The writer gives an account of the origin of the Fourth Gospel which is plainly legendary. The important statement in it is that the Gospel is the work of St. John (Johannes ex discipulis), who is also the author of at least two of the Epistles (in suis epistolis). The further statement is made that he resolved to write it after a fast had been held, and at the request of the Christians (cohortantibus suis), and the concurrence is also claimed of the rest of the Apostles (recognoscentibus cunctis). The second statement seems, like the πρόβλημα of Clement, to be founded on Jn 1<sup>14</sup> and 21<sup>24</sup>, and possesses no independent value, except as an interpretation of internal evidence.

The object of the author was clearly controversial, 'to draw a broad line of separation between the inspired writings of the Apostolic age and modern additions' (Salmon, Introduction p. 46). He strongly protests, for example, against the inclusion of Hermas in the Canon, though he has no objection to its being 'read' Bacon (Hibbert Journal April 1903) has interpreted the Muratorian Fragment as a statement of the existence of controversy in the early Church as to the Apostolic authorship; but the emphasis on that question might easily be taken to mean the fact that the historicity—the veritas—of the Gospels—was alone in question. There is no attempt to harmonize the statements in the various Gospels; but it is sought to secure for the contents of the Fourth Gospel a place of equal authority with the other three.

Throughout the whole history of the NT Canon the admission of a book was not decided solely on the question of authorship, but far more on the general consideration whether its contents were congruent with the received doctrine. Salmon thinks that the writer of the Muratorian Fragment is arguing against the Montanists, and Zahn and Drummond that he is opposing the Alogi (see below). The legendary account of the origin of the Gospel would seem to indicate that the fact of the Apostolic authorship was already well established and well known. An additional confirmation of the view that the historicity alone is within the purview of the writer is that the words of the First Epistle (it is true in a somewhat inaccurate rendering), 'What we have seen with our eyes, and heard with our ears, and our hands have handled, these things we have written' (hæc viderimus, hæc audimus, hæc tangimus, hæc scripsimus) are by the author of the Gospel.

Theophilus, bishop of Antioch (c. A.D. 180), wrote, among other works, a defence of Christianity, addressed to Autolytus, 'a real or imaginary heathen friend of wide learning and high culture' (Watkins). He is the earliest writer of the 2nd cent., who, while quoting a passage from the Gospel (1<sup>13</sup>), also refers to St. John by name. His words are, 'We are taught by the Holy Scriptures, and all Spirit-bearing men, that Jesus Christ, whom John says; and then follow from the Prologue to the Gospel. There are also other sentences in his work that recall the Fourth Gospel. It is significant also, as belying any appearance of controversy as to the authorship of the Gospel, that he introduces the name of St. John in this quite incidental fashion. Commentaries on the Gospels are also attributed to him, but their authenticity, upheld by Zahn, is assailed by Harnack. This part of his evidence must at present be set aside.

2. Justin Martyr.—The works of Justin that are relevant in this connexion are the two Apologies and the Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. They may be set within the limits A.D. 140-161. Palestine was his birthplace and he was brought up in the religion of his father, who was a heathen. He was an ardent student of philosophy, and after an unsatisfying experience of various teachers he ultimately became a Platonist. After his conversion to Christianity, of which he gives a full account in Trypho, he was 'kindled with love to Christ,' and consecrated his philosophic attainments to the defence of the Christian religion.

Among the authorities to which Justin refers in the course of his writings, he gives an important place to 'The Memoirs of Christ, composed by the Apostles and those who followed them.' The battle of criticism still rages around the question whether Justin includes in these Memoirs only the four Gospels. It may now, at least, be regarded as settled amongst all classes of critics that Justin makes use of the Gospel (cf. Schmiedel, Encyc. Bibl., art. 'John, Son of Zebedee,' ii. 2546). It is not so generally admitted that he includes it among his Memoirs of the Apostles. Those, however, who hold that Justin regarded the Gospel as the work of the Apostle are laid under the necessity of explaining how his contemporary Irenæus could be so assured that the Gospel is a genuine Apostolic work.

(1) Quotations.—The locus classicus in Justin is the passage on Baptism (Apol. i. lxi). He describes how those who are about to make a Christian profession—

'are brought by us where there is water, and are born again in the same manner in which we ourselves were born again. For in the name of God the Father and Lord of the universe, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ and of the Holy Spirit, they then receive the washing with water. For Christ also said, "Except ye be born again, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven" (ὅτι μὴ ἀναγεννηθέντες, οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθῃτε εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ οὐρανοῦ).

Now that it is impossible for those who have once been born to enter into the kingdom of God, is manifest to all.

This passage immediately recalls Jn 3<sup>3-5</sup>. The language, however, reveals some striking variations from the text of the Gospel. No one would now endorse the verdict of the author of Supernatural Religion, that 'the Gospel of St. John is a complete and connected trace by which the Gospel of St. John is connected with the Fourth Gospel'. It may be conceded that some of his expressions have more than an accidental relationship with Mt 18<sup>3</sup>. Justin certainly uses ἀναγεννηθῆτε ('born again') instead of γεννηθῆναι ἀνωθεν ('born from above') of the Fourth Gospel, but this variation is at least a possible rendering of the Johannine expression. There are, however, other variations. The difficulty is increased by the fact that in the Clementine Homilies (1.20) there is a variation in the linguistic deviations from the Gospel. Has the author copied Justin, or does he represent a source to the use by both of a common source other than the Gospel? The fact that the context in each is quite different excludes the first hypothesis, and the second may well be viewed as improbable, until the Gospel of St. John is shown to be the source of the Gospel of Justin. The Gospel of St. John is the only source known to us from which he could have derived such ideas. The idea of birth as applied to a second change is found in none of the Gospels but St. John; and it is significant that both Justin and St. John expressly connected this thought with the rite of Baptism. As regards the impossibility of a second physical birth, it is to be noted that this somewhat unusual, and at the same time, wilfully absurd, objection of Nicodemus—which in the Gospel is the symptom of a heart profoundly moved, and has a living place in the context—is practically reproduced by Justin. This is evidently the result of a familiar association of ideas derived from the passage in Jn 3. The words, 'for Christ also said,' introduce the quotation, and the document from which it is taken is clearly looked upon as an authoritative source for the words of Christ.

Justin has other correspondences with the peculiar thought of the Fourth Gospel. He uses the title μονογενὴς of Christ, and in the next sentence speaks of the Virgin-Birth (Dialogue 105), adding the words, 'as we have learned from the Memoirs.' This seems to point to a combination of St. John and the Synoptics. Justin has also made much use of the thought of the Logos-Gospel in his doctrine of the Logos, and his teaching on that subject is influenced by the theology of the Gospel. It is sometimes urged as an objection that Justin does not make more use of the authority of the Gospel in his teaching about the Logos, but this is to presuppose that the thought was first suggested to him by that source. Justin's philosophy is filled with Alexandrine ideas, but the thought of the Incarnation of the Logos of which Justin makes use is found only in St. John (Apol. i. 32). The Johannine expressions φῶς, σὰρξ are also found in Justin.

On the question of the relationship between Justin and the fragment of the Gospel of Peter, discovered in 1892, see Hastings' DB iii. 533b; Drummond Character and Authorship, pp. 151-153. The evidence is insufficient to prove that this Gospel is one of Justin's Memoirs. Loisy and Harnack hold that the Gospel of Peter is dependent on the Fourth Gospel, to whose existence it would therefore be the most ancient witness. The date of the Gospel of Peter is put c. 110-130 by Loisy (Le Quatrième Évangile, p. 16) and Harnack (Chron. i. 623).

(2) His use of the Gospel.—Another consideration is adduced to prove that Justin did not regard the Gospel as an authority on the same level as the Synoptics, and therefore viewed it as non-Apostolic.

Justin's art, 'John, Son of Zebedee,' is employment of it is not only more sparing but also more circumspect than his use of the Synoptics. There are occasions on which it would be open to him to use it in proof of his doctrine of the Logos and of the pre-existence of Christ. Why has Justin not used the Fourth Gospel more? It is perfectly relevant to reply that we do not know, and perhaps never shall know, with complete certainty. At the same time, there are certain considerations that ought to be borne in mind. Justin is certainly the first writer who displays the tendency to attach a separate value to the four Gospels; he is the first to speak of εὐαγγέλια instead of εὐαγγέλιον; but he can scarcely be expected to have completely emancipated himself, at this transition stage, from the older conception of the gospel as embracing equally the contents of the four. Justin's purpose and his audience must be borne in mind, and these would insensibly lead him to rely mostly on the Synoptic Gospels. It is specially noticeable that the witness of Christ to Himself, so prominent in the Fourth Gospel, is nowhere used by Justin as an argument, and in one place in the Dialogue with Trypho (ch. 18) he even apologizes for citing the words of Christ alongside the words of the prophets. His Apologies are addressed to the Emperor, Senate, and Pagan Philosophers, and to quote to them the Christian doctrine of Christian doctrine would have been to reason in a circle. Moreover, it may be suggested that not even at that date was the Gospel, as strictly speaking, historical, and its reflective character rendered it unsuitable for Justin's purpose as the synopsis.

(3) Evidence as to Apostolic authorship.—Is there any evidence in Justin that he attributed the authorship to St. John the Apostle? In the first place, if the Memoirs are composed of our four Gospels, we may answer the question with certainty in the affirmative. Justin describes them as composed by 'the Apostles and those that followed them,' a phrase which tallies completely with the four.

The plural 'Apostles' could be used only if he believed in the Apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel. Again, the strongest argument adduced in Justin's evidence is still the argument from the name of the author. It seems, however, to have been the custom among apologists not to mention the Evangelists by their names, which would carry no weight with unbelievers. Moreover, it has been pointed out that Justin never mentions the name of St. Paul, although it is certain that at least four of his Epistles from which he quotes are of undoubted authenticity. Justin once names St. John as the author of Revelation (Dialogue 81), but 'he nowhere quotes this work, which he regarded as inspired, apostolic, prophetic, though it contains so much which might seem to favour his view of the person of Christ' (Ezra Abbot, p. 61). In the passage he speaks of the author as one whose name is not likely to carry weight ('a certain man with us, whose name was John'), but it is essential to his argument, in thus making use of a Revelation or Vision, that he should mention the recipient. (Cf. Stanton, Gospels as Historical Documents, i. p. 89).

3. Tatian was a native of Syria, and, like Justin, travelled as a wandering philosopher. His conversion to Christianity took place at Rome about A.D. 150. He became a disciple of Justin, during whose lifetime he wrote the Oratio ad Græcos. After Justin's death in 166, Tatian taught in Rome, and ultimately adopted a heretical position. He died about A.D. 180.

Tatian clearly quotes the Gospel in his Oratio, which was written perhaps as early as 153 (so Zahn and Harnack), although he does not refer to the author by name. The important work, however, for our purpose is the Diatessaron. It is a compendium of the Life and Teaching of our Lord, founded on our four Gospels, and containing also some material taken from the Apocryphal Gospels. The book had . . . an ancient place in the worship of the Syrian Churches. Theodoret, bishop of Cyrrhus, near the Γαβριήλ, in 453, tells how he found more than 200 copies of the work in the churches of his district. These he collected and, with considerable difficulty, put away, substituting for them the four Gospels.

The Diatessaron includes the whole of the Fourth Gospel, except 1st, the first half of 2nd, the Pericope Adulteræ, and some other passages that are common to the Synoptics.

The . . . Tatian's work lies in the fact that its . . . value is attached to the contents of our four Gospels, and that the Fourth Gospel is placed on a level with the Synoptics. Moreover, Tatian's use of the Fourth Gospel renders it very difficult to doubt that it was also one of the Memoirs of his contemporary, Justin.

4. The Apostolic Fathers.—(1) Papias was bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia. Unfortunately his testimony has given rise to more questions about the Gospel than it solves. Only one or two fragments of his work preserved by Eusebius have come down to us. We know that in the time of Eusebius the only writing of Papias to which he had access was a work in five books, entitled ' . . . the Oracles of the Lord' (Λογίων [or -εσι]). Cf Drummond, op. cit. note 4, p. 195.

The 'Oracles' were probably a collection of sayings of our Lord, together with some kind of historical setting.

There is a tendency among modern critics to fix a later date than formerly for the writings of Papias. His written work seems not to have been produced till about the age of sixty. The change in the date . . . the discovery of a fragment, . . . by Papias, that was published . . . It dates from the 7th or 8th cent., and is in turn probably based on the Chronicle of Philip of Sidé (c. A.D. 430). Among other matters it relates that those individuals who had been raised from the dead by Christ survived 'till the time of Hadrian.' Hadrian . . . 138, which compels us to fix a date for Papias' work . . . than 140-160 (so Harnack, . . . Sanday in his most recent work, . . . Gospel, includes the date of Papias among the 'unsolved problems'). The date of his martyrdom is also very uncertain.

Eusebius says that Papias 'evidently was a man of very mean capacity, as one may say, judging from his statements' (HE iii. 39). This judgment must be considered strictly in connexion with the context. Eusebius is speaking of his millenarian notions, and of the unimaginative way in which he interpreted the figurative language of the Apostolic writings. These defects do not reflect on his accuracy in matters of fact, but rather indicate a literalness and exactness which may at times be painful, but are yet a source of strength in the present discussion.

(1.) Papias is best known by the famous extract from the Preface to his work which is preserved by Eusebius.

'I will not hesitate to place before you, along with my interpretations (of the words of the Lord), everything that I carefully learned, and carefully remembered in time past from the elders, and I can guarantee its truth. For I take no pleasure, as do the many, in those who have so very much to say, but in those who teach the truth: nor in those who relate commandments foreign (to the mind of the Lord), but in those (who record) such as were given to the faith by the Lord, and found on the truth itself. Moreover, if I met with anyone on any occasion who had attended the elders, I used to inquire about the words of the elders, what Andrew or what Peter said, or what Philip, or what Thomas, or James or John or Matthew, or any other of the disciples of the Lord said, and what Aristion and the elder John, disciples of the Lord, say. For I was not inclined to suppose that statements made by the books would help me, so much as the utterances of a living and abiding voice' (HE iii. 39).

Several questions of moment are raised by these words of Papias.

(a) Who are the elders or presbyters of whom he speaks?—They clearly include the Apostles themselves, and Papias derives his information from their friends, i.e. those who not merely 'had followed them' in the literal sense, but had 'attended to' (παρηκολουθηκώς) their words. He is in search of direct oral tradition about the 'Oracles'. At the same time he mentions two, Aristion and John, who are not Apostles, and whom he regards as 'presbyters' or elders. He also designates the whole group as 'disciples of the Lord.' In the case of Aristion and the Presbyter John, οι μαθηται is found only in one MS, and the preferable reading is to omit the article. In the first case, the use of the article with μαθητων means 'the disciples' specially known as such, and the key to the use of the term 'disciple' in the second case, is found in the statement of Ac 6<sup>7</sup>, where all those who were members of the first Christian community are called 'disciples.' The 'Elders,' then, signify all those men who were members of the primitive Christian Church who may or may not have followed the Lord Himself.

He himself was a nearer . . . the holy Apostles.' Yet even with the later date assigned to Papias, there is no chronological impossibility in his having known the Apostle, and . . . be forgotten that Irenæus was not necessarily dependent solely on the words of the Preface, but may have had other statements of Papias, or the living tradition of the Church, on which to found his assertion. If the position has to be surrendered that Papias was a 'hearer of John,' it is at least certain that he put himself in the most favourable position to hear clearly 'the living and abiding voice' of Apostolic times, conveyed to him through the 'friends' of the Elders.

(b) What can we determine regarding the nature and purpose of the work of Papias?—He contrasts his sources with 'those who have . . . to say' (τοῖς τὰ πολλὰ λέγουσιν), with ' . . . ate commandments foreign to the mind of the Lord' (τοῖς τὰς ἀλλοτρίας ἐντολὰς μνημονεύουσιν) and with 'the contents of the books' (τὰ ἐκ τῶν βιβλίων). 'The books' which he mentions have been interpreted as meaning some form of 'the Gospel' (Tischler, Introd., Eng. tr. p. 487), and also as 'works' of Aristion and the Elder John' (Drummond and Bacon). In regard to the former interpretation, it seems out of the question that Papias should oppose 'the living and abiding voice' to the sources of his Logia. On the other hand, it is hardly likely that Papias would minimize the value of the oral evidence of Aristion and the Presbyter John by disparaging their written work. The simplest explanation is that given by Lightfoot (followed by Schwarz, Ueber den Tod der Sohne Zebedæi, p. 11), that the exegetical commentaries on the Gospels written by Gnostics like Basilides are meant. It is to these also that he refers when he speaks of 'foreign commandments' and of 'those who have so very much to say.' Papias himself seems to have been a commentator on the 'Oracles of the Lord,' and seeks to support his own explanations (ἐξηγήσεις) by direct oral tradition from those who were in touch with the first Christian community.

(c) What position do the Presbyter John hold in Papias' view?—It is noticeable that while the past tense 'said' (εἶπεν) is used of the first group of Apostles, as though they were dead at the time of writing, the present tense 'say' (λέγουσιν) is used of Aristion and the Presbyter John. The entirely unconvincing explanation of Lightfoot, that the tense should probably be regarded as an historic present, introduced for the sake of variety, must be rejected. On the other hand, the present tense seems rather meagre evidence on which to rear the hypothesis that books written by these two men were before Papias (so Drummond, Character and Authorship, p. 200), especially as he distinctly tells us that it is oral evidence of which he is in search. There is evidence in the writing of Papias that some literary productions of these men were extant, but the intention of Papias in his Preface seems to be to convey the impression that they were alive at the time he wrote. Papias had begun, at a much earlier time ('in time past'), to collect information from the elders, and had gone on doing so up to the time of writing. He means that Aristion and John are still alive for anyone who wishes to check the authority of the explanations he gives.

The foregoing establishes the reality of the second John. It is no longer possible to regard the existence of the Presbyter 'as due to a confusion of Eusebius,' or to accuse Papias of 'slovenliness of composition,' which would lead us to suppose that two Johns are mentioned, while all the time he is only referring to the same man a second time. The question is debated by modern critics whether this Presbyter John has any connexion with the authorship of the Gospel. It is necessary only to indicate the grounds on which the suggestion is based. Eusebius, in the passage from which we have quoted (HE iii. 39), suggests that he is the author of Revelation. He controverts the statement of Irenæus that Papias means to be looked upon as a hearer of the Apostle John, and gathers from the use of the present tense (λέγουσα) that he is really a hearer of Aristion and the Elder John. We have seen that in the time of Papias these two men were still alive, but the evidence as to his relationship with them rather suggests that he had not himself met them. Papias seems to have had to collect information about what they 'say,' and Eusebius himself puts forward his statement about an oral tradition merely as a suggestion. It does not Eusebius, in attributing the authorship of Revelation to the Presbyter, even hints at the idea that he is also the author of the Gospel. He may have regarded it as an advantage to assign another authorship to the book, than the Apostle John might not be held responsible for the millenarian ideas of Papias. Papias accords the Presbyter no special place or honour in his list, and indeed places him last, after Aristion. If Papias had recorded anything of importance about him, no doubt Eusebius would have noted it, in order to support his view of the authorship of Revelation. See also artt. ARISTION and PAPIAS.

(ii.) We have next to inquire whether there is any evidence in the writing of Papias that he used the Fourth Gospel. (a) A passage occurs in the writings of Irenæus which contains a quotation of Jn 14: 'Our Lord has said, that in the abode of my Father are many mansions.' The passage is introduced, like many others in Irenæus, as a quotation from the words of 'the Elders.' Is Irenæus here quoting from the sayings of 'the Elders' as reported by Papias? By the way in which the Johannine quotation is prefaced, it is fair to suppose that 'the Elders' are here referring to a written record, and not reproducing merely oral tradition, and that some well-known and accepted source for the words of our Lord is meant.

An additional confirmation of the position that Irenæus quotes verbatim from the Elders of Papias is found in another portion of his work. He is speaking of the fruitfulness of the earth at the millennium, and inserts a fanciful passage about vines with ten thousand shoots. He says that he received it from 'the Elders who saw John, the disciple of the Lord.' After quoting the passage, he adds, 'Papias also, a hearer of John and . . . Polycarp, an ancient man, confirms these things.' Harnack contends that the words 'also' and 'writing' 'certainly ought not to be pressed' to mean that Irenæus is giving a confirmation from Papias of the words of the Elders, but that he only means to indicate the written source from which he takes them. (This position is stoutly opposed by Schmiedel, op. cit. ii. 2549, where see a statement of the whole controversy and its issues.)

If Papias quotes 14th we have here an important clue to an early date for the Gospel. The Elders of Papias belonged to the early Christian community.

(b) There are indications in the Preface of Papias that the Gospel permeates his thought, and that the references would be apparent to his readers. He speaks of 'those who teach the truth' (τοῖς τἀληθῇ διδάσκουσιν), and he also applies the term 'the Truth' to Christ. It is also not without significance that St. Andrew and St. Peter and St. Philip are named in the exact order in which the names occur in the first chapter of St. John, while St. Philip and St. Thomas are prominent only in the Fourth Gospel.

(c) Eusebius (HE iii. 39) says that 'Papias has used testimonies from the former Epistle of John and from that of Peter similarly.' If 1 John and the Gospel are by the same author, we have here additional confirmation that Papias knew and used the Fourth Gospel. This item of evidence, however, can have weight only in connexion with the rest of the evidence. Formerly the fact that Eusebius, while mentioning his use of the Epistle, is silent as to any use of the Gospel by Papias, was relied upon as a strong argument for the non-existence of the Gospel before 160-170 (e.g. in Supernatural Religion). After Lightfoot's complete answer to this position (Essays on Supernatural Religion i. 1), it is not now possible to deny . . . date for the Gospel. Modern opponents of the traditional view now rely on the argument from the silence of Eusebius, as proving that Papias nowhere appeals to the Gospel as of Apostolic authority (e.g. Bacon). It is therefore necessary to examine anything in Papias which seems to indicate that he regarded the Gospel as the work of St. John the Apostle.

(iii.) The evidence of Papias as to the authorship of the Gospel.—(a) Eusebius, in the often quoted passage, says that Papias . . . the Presbyter John from John the Apostle, 'evidently meaning the Evangelist.' The words in inverted commas would seem to point to some indication that Eusebius found in Papias' writing that he spoke of St. John the Apostle as the author of the Gospel. To this may be added the naming of St. John immediately after the Evangelist St. Matthew in the Preface.

(b) A Vatican MS of the 9th cent. contains the statement: 'Evangelium Johannis manifestatum et datum est ecclesiæ ab Johanne adhuc in corpore constituto: sicut Papias nomine Hierapolitanus, discipulus Johannis carus, in exotericis—id est in . . . obis retulit. Descripsit vero . . . Johanne recte.' The words are part of a translation of an early Greek argumentum or proof that the Gospel was written by John the Apostle. As the passage stands the words exotericis and extremis are unintelligible, and the conjecture of Lightfoot may be accepted that the former should read exegeticus and extremis should read externis, which was an explanation of the false reading exotericis. Again, it is nonsense to say that the Gospel was published 'by John while he was yet alive'; and Harnack suggests (Chron. i. 665) that the preposition ab should be deleted. With these changes it is possible to make sense of the words. The statement 'Johanne adhuc in corpore constituto' would then imply that there was an interval between the writing and the publection of the Gospel, and has reference to Jn 21<sup>25</sup>. This would explain why Papias had found it necessary to say that the Gospel was published 'in the lifetime of the Apostle'. The statement at the end, that Papias wrote the Gospel at the dictation of St John, may safely be set aside. At the same time, apart from the fact that it is necessary so to edit the text, there are serious difficulties in the way of its being taken as reliable evidence. For one thing, it is strange that Eusebius does not mention such a statement in Papias, although he mentions similar statements of his with regard to St Matthew and St Mark. Moreover, in view of the modern question of the Presbyter authorship, it is not surprising to indicate which John is meant (for discussion of the alleged statement of Papias recorded by Philip of Sidé, that John died a martyr in Jerusalem, see art JOHN [THE APOSTLE]).

If the direct testimony of Papias must be regarded as inconclusive, it may fairly be asked whether we have a right to expect more. There is a very high probability that the Gospel was one of the sources of the Oracles which he expounded, and his silence as to the author, so far from indicating uncertainty on the question, may be interpreted as meaning that the Gospel of St. John was eclipsed in the mind of Papias by the desire to hear the living voice of the Lord in the Gospel. It is probable that in Papias we are in the presence of a certain conservatism which marked with some regret the dying out of those who were in possession of the oral tradition about the life and teaching of Jesus, and the gradual substitution of the written word as the authority for the Christian life which, of necessity, was taking place. It was his aim from an early period in his activity to collect the oral tradition. One thing at least is certain, that if Papias knew and quoted the Gospel, it must have been for him an authentic record. If the Gospel emerged at the close of the 1st cent. or the very beginning of the 2nd, as it undoubtedly did, and did not bring with it the strongest credentials and most unmistakable indications that it was in complete accord with the accredited oral teaching so much valued by Papias, it is difficult to think that in a mind of such simplicity his it could have raised, as it appears to have done, only the merest ripple on the surface.

(2) Ignatius was bishop of Antioch in Syria. A number of letters have come down to us under his name, of which only seven are genuine. The writer was at the time on his way from Antioch to Rome under sentence of death. The date 110-117, the closing years of Trajan's reign, may be assigned to them.

In Romans vii. 2, Ignatius says, 'There is not in me a fire fed by fleshly motive, but water living and speaking in me, saying within me, Come to the Father.' These words inevitably recall Jn 4<sup>10, 14</sup> (cf. also 4<sup>23</sup> 'the Father seeketh to glorify himself by him'). Not only the ideas, but the words themselves seem to point to the story of the woman of Samaria as to a passage in the Gospel which is affording him comfort in his trial. Again, in Phlad. vii 1, he says, 'The Spirit is not deceived, being from God; for it knoweth whence it cometh and whither it goeth, and searcheth out the hidden things' (cf. Jn 3<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>14</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>11</sup>). There are some striking differences in the thought of the parallel passages; but it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the words of Ignatius are due to the influence of these Johannine passages 'floating in his mind' (New Test. in Apost. Fathers, Oxford Society of Historical Theology, 1905, p. 82, where see other parallels). Both in expression and in doctrine there is an undoubted affinity between Ignatius and the Evangelist. Loisy admits that Ignatius in his Christology, is dependent on the Gospel (Le Quatrième Evangelie, p. 7). Von der Goltz holds that the affinity of thought is so deep that it cannot be explained by the influence of a book, and that the writer of the letters must have been imbued with the tradition and the school (quoted by Sanday, Crit. of the New Testament, p. 243). Sanday himself 'doubts whether there is any other instance of resemblance between a Biblical and patristic book that is really so close' (ib.).

Two arguments taken from the writings of Ignatius are relied upon by some of the Apostolic authorship. (a) It is true that he nowhere quotes the Gospel as of Apostolic authority, although there are occasions (notably Smyrna iii. 2) where it would have been exceedingly apposite to do so. It may be pointed out as having a bearing on this objection, that, although it is quite evident that Ignatius knew 1 Cor 'almost by heart,' he has 'no quotations (in the strictest sense, with mention of the source) from that Epistle' (NT in Apost. Fathers, p. 67). This is only another instance of the precariousness of the argument from silence, considered apart from the idiosyncrasies of a writer. (b) Again, it is also objected that in writing to the Ephesian community in which St. John is said to have laboured, Ignatius mentions St. Paul as a hero of the faith, whom he sets before himself and them for imitation, but makes no mention of St John (Ephes. xii.). To this argument it must be admitted that no very satisfactory answer has yet been given. Ignatius is, indeed, predisposed to mention St. Paul's name, through his evident desire to compare his own experience and the Apostle's in calling together the elders of Ephesus. Again, the writings of St. Paul, which have more clearly in view the various heresies of the time, would perhaps suit his purpose better.

It cannot be regarded as certain that Ignatius used the Gospel. His evidence is on the borderline between evidence for the existence of the Gospel and proof of the influence of a milieu of Johannine teaching and thought. It is probable that Ignatius had access to some document containing Johannine teaching (cf. e.g. his reference to the narrative of the woman of Samaria); on the other hand, that might easily have been a story told orally by the Apostle in the course of his preaching and teaching, and embedded in the hearts and minds of those who heard him.

(3) Polycarp was bishop of Smyrna. His writing has come down to us in the form of an Epistle to the Philippians. The date of his martyrdom was long uncertain, but the investigations of Lightfoot and Harnack have led to the almost certain conclusion that he died in 155 at the age of 86.

As regards the Gospel, we have two sources from which we may derive evidence as to his opinions, viz. the Epistle and some reminiscences of Irenæus.

(a) In the Epistle, Polycarp makes no reference to any document, except that he refers to St Paul's Epistle to the Philippians immediately after mentioning his name, and in another passage again quotes the Epistle without remark. There is also a sentence which, though not verbally accurate, bears every trace of having been taken from the First Epistle of St John. 'Everyone who shall not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is Antichrist' (cf. 1 Jn 4<sup>2-3</sup>). He has also a passage that recalls at once words of Christ in the Gospel and the thought of the Epistle: 'He that raised Him from the dead will raise us also, if we do His will and walk in His commandments, and love the things which He loved' (cf. Jn 7<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>15</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>6, 17</sup> 5<sup>1-2</sup>). We also find in Polycarp, v. 2, 'As He hath promised to raise us from the dead.' This promise is found only in Jn 6<sup>44</sup>. These parallels at least show that he was familiar with a circle of Johannine thought. He does not once mention the name of St. John; but the Church at Philippi had not been directly in contact with that Apostle. Moreover, his habits of quotation hardly lead us to expect any other result (cf. NT in Apost. Fathers, p. 84).

(b) Irenæus gives Polycarp a foremost place among the elders whom he quotes. He says that he 'had not only been instructed by Apostles, and associated with many who had seen the Christ, but had also been placed by Apostles in Asia in the Church as a bishop, whom we also saw in our time' (ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ ἡλικίᾳ) (Hær. III. iii. 4). Eusebius has preserved for us a letter of his to Florinus, in which he gives an account of his listening with peculiar attention to Polycarp, and vividly recalls the very place where he sat when he discoursed, his manner of life, and his personal appearance, 'and how he would describe his intercourse with John, and with the rest who had seen the Lord, and how he would relate their words. And whatsoever things he had heard from them about the Lord, and about His miracles, and about His teaching. Polycarp, as having received them from eye-witnesses of the life of the Word, would relate them in accordance with the Scriptures' (op. Euseb. HE v. xx. 6). Again, Irenæus also, in a letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, on the Paschal controversy, uses as an argument the fact that Polycarp followed the example of 'John the disciple of the Lord, and the rest of the Apostles with whom he consorted.' Irenæus is undoubtedly referring to the Apostle John; and if that be so, there can be little doubt that 'the Scriptures' to which Polycarp referred contained the Fourth Gospel in some form. Thus the silence of Polycarp, in the solitary writing that has come down to us, is balanced by the explicit statement of Irenæus that Polycarp knew St. John, and referred to him in his discourse.

Opponents of the Johannine authorship of the Gospel have cast doubt on the trustworthiness of Irenæus in this matter. They allege that he made a mistake in regarding Papias as a hearer of John, and that he has possibly done the same in the case of Polycarp. But John to whom Polycarp referred may have been a younger John. Irenæus was still a boy (ἐκ τῶν δέκων) when he heard his teacher. At the same time, it is hardly likely that the vivid personal impression he has of Polycarp contains a mistake of this kind. Polycarp evidently mentioned the name of John with some frequency, and there is no evidence that the Presbyter John was a man of such note in Asia as to be thus referred to in Polycarp's lectures. It is inconceivable that, if there had been any prospect of confusion in the mind of a youth who was listening to him, Polycarp would not have guarded against it (see Stanton, op. cit. Doct. pp. 214-218).

(4) We have still to deal with a group of writings classed among the Apostolic Fathers, whose evidence on the subject is rendered vague and inconclusive, inasmuch as they contain no definite quotations from the Gospel, and there is also uncertainty as to their dates. (a) The Epistle of Barnabas reflects the condition of thought in Egypt, and the date may lie anywhere between 79 and 132. The theory that Barnabas used the Fourth Gospel found strangely a strong champion in Keim, who assigned the date 120-130 (Jesus of Naz. i. 192-195). Loisy, on the other hand, accepting the date c. 130, urges complete ignorance of the Gospel on the part of Barnabas, and uses the argument to prove that the Johannine writings had not yet taken complete possession of ecclesiastical usage (Le Quatrième Évang. p. 51). In Barnabas, use is made of the idea of the Brazen Serpent: and the conceptions of 'eternal life' which often occurs, and of 'feeding upon the words of life,' seem to point to the influence of a Johannine current of thought. (b) Only one of the epistles known under the name of Clement of Rome is genuine. It was written from the Roman community to the Corinthian, c. 100. Here, again, the writer seems to be influenced by Johannine teaching (cf. Clem. xlix.

and Jn 14<sup>15-23</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>1-3</sup>). (c) The Didache, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, is a composite document, and is the earliest manual of Church procedure extant. The elements of which it is composed may have been in use at the end of the 1st cent., but the work in its present form was published much later. It contains a specimen of a prayer of thanksgiving for use after the Eucharist, in which there is a very remarkable parallel to the anti-sacramentarian treatment of the ideas of the Supper in the Fourth Gospel (ch. 6): 'Thou, Almighty Master, didst create all things for thy name's sake, and didst give food and drink unto men for enjoyment, that they might render thanks unto thee; but didst bestow upon us spiritual food and drink and eternal life through thy Son' (Did. x. 3). (d) The Shepherd of Hermas (c. 100 Zahn, 135-145 Harnack) displays a Johannine colouring of thought.

5. Evidence derived from Opponents of Church doctrine in the 2nd century—(1) The Clementine Homilies.—These are the work of a Jewish Christian, and were published at Rome not earlier than A.D. 160-170. In one of the Homilies (discovered by Driessell in 1837) there is an undoubted quotation (xix. 22) from Jn 9<sup>2-3</sup>. There are also in the Homilies other apparent references to the Gospel.

(2) The Gnostics.—There were two great schools of Gnostics—the Valentines and the Basilidians. The date of the literary activity of Valentinus is uncertain, but we know that there existed a school of his followers before A.D. 150. Heracleon was a pupil of Valentinus; and it is exceptionally strong evidence, not only for the early existence but also for the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel, that he composed a Commentary on it which is quoted by Origen. Tertullian contrasts Valentinus and Marcion as to the way in which they use the Gospel. Valentinus 'accepted the whole instrument' (i.e. the four Gospels), but with an ability not less than Marcion's 'laid hands upon the truth.' We hear of a school of Basilides c. 133, and his own period of activity was A.D. 117-138. Heracleon in his Refutatio quotes Basilides, and in the quotations there are undoubted extracts from the Gospel. The question discussed by modern criticism is whether these are quotations from Basilides or from the representative of a school (cf. Drummond, op. cit. 296-301). There is a strong preponderance of evidence in favour of Basilides himself as the source.

So far as the earlier Gnostics are concerned—the Naasseni, Peratæ, Ophites, etc.—they have generally admitted that the Gospel was the source of their controversies; and Heracleon tells us that they made abundant use of the Gospel.

(3) Marcion was a contemporary of Valentinus. —The principle of his work is to secure a Gospel that shall represent the pure doctrine of Christ, unmixed with Jewish prejudices, which he regarded as inherent in the minds of the primitive Apostles. We find him rejecting all others in favour of St. Luke, which was written under Pauline influence; and he mutilated even that Gospel to suit his purpose. We cannot expect to find in his writing any reference to the Gospel of John, but, from his action in rejecting the writings of the early Apostles, we may draw the negative conclusion that if the Gospel was regarded as written by St. John it would be sufficient reason for its rejection. He made use of the passage in Galatians where St. Paul rebukes 'Apostles themselves,' 'who walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel' (2<sup>14</sup>). His silence as to the Fourth Gospel is all the more striking because of its anti-Judaic tendency, which would have predisposed him in its favour had it not been written by a primitive Apostle.

6. The Quartodeciman controversy.—In the latter part of the 2nd century a controversy was life between certain Asiatic Christians and the Church with regard to their Paschal observance on the 14th Nisan. They appealed to the example of the Apostle John in defence of their practice. In the Gospel the Paschal meal falls on the 13th, and it was contended by Bretschneider, followed by the Tübingen School, that therefore the Apostle could not be the author of the Gospel. A fuller investigation, however, into the rationale of the Quartodeciman controversy goes far to remove the difficulty. In opposition to the Tübingen School, it was held that the 14th was kept not in commemoration of the Passover, but in commemoration of the death of Christ, which would be in accord with the Fourth Gospel. This still leaves the difficulty unsolved, that in the Synoptics the death of Christ falls on the 15th. Accordingly, Bleek (followed by Schurer) and Stanton maintain that the observance in question was neither of the institution of the Supper, nor of the death of Christ alone, but that the Christian Jews gave to the Passover day a new significance, which made it a commemoration of the death of Christ. If such an appeal was made in the earlier part of the controversy, and at the same time the example of St John was used in support, we should be face to face with an argument against the Apostolic authorship of the Gospel. There is no proof, however, that the argument from the example of Christ was used before the time of Apollinaris. Apollinaris distinctly assumes the Apostolic authorship, and St John must not be made to support his view; and Polycrates as distinctly holds the Apostolic authorship, though he is a Quartodeciman. op. cit. ii. 2552–2553, who regards the Quartodeciman argument as still valid against the Apostolic authorship. The question is fully discussed by Stanton, op. cit. i. pp 173–197, with a result favourable to the traditional view.

7. The Alogi.—These were a party in Asia Minor (c. A.D. 180) who rejected the Johannine authorship of the Gospel and the Logos doctrine. They are first mentioned by Epiphanius and Pseudo-Dionysius (4th cent.), but it may now be safely admitted that Irenæus opposes their views in Hæc iii. xi. 12 (Zahn and Harnack). They attributed the authorship to Cerinthus, and founded their argument chiefly on the chronological disparity with the Synoptics. The main interest in the Alogi centres round the question whether they betoken uncertainty in the ecclesiastical tradition. Epiphanius ranks them among heretics, but it is certain that they were a party in the Church (Schurer and Harnack). The name 'Alogi' is a jest of Epiphanius, and indicates merely that they rejected the Logos Gospel, with more than a hint at their stupidity (alogos = 'unreasonable'). It gives no clue to their doctrinal position. Epiphanius, himself very orthodox, says 'that they seem to believe as we do.' Probably they were opposed to some form of the Montanist heresy, and in their zeal sought to get rid of the teaching of the Gospel on the Holy Spirit by rejecting the whole. This step they strove to justify by the chronological disparities with the Synoptics and other internal discrepancies. Irenæus says of them that 'they frustrate the gift of the Spirit.' The millenarian views of the Montanists may have directed their first attack on the Apocalypse, which they extended to the Gospel 'by a piece of sheer bravado' (Sanday, Crit. of Fourth Gospel, p. 65). Their influence seems to have been small. Irenæus and Epiphanius refer to them contemptuously, and Schwaiz (op. cit. p. 33), in common with Schurer, although from a different motive, narrows them down to a single individual with perhaps a coterie behind him. We may admit that the presence of the Alogi in the Church indicates that the belief in the Johannine authorship had not reached that stage of clear definition and regular acceptance which only controversy and time could give. They 'came upon the tradition unawares' (Loisy). The Church was not yet in a position either to challenge with critical weapons, or to expel as heretics those who differed from her traditional beliefs about authorship (Irenæus could only defend the Gospel as 'apostolically', especially when the Alogi were so numerous); thus case, a common foe in Asia Minor. The Alogi can really be pressed into the service of tradition. 'Its ascription to Cerinthus, an impossible author, betrays the recklessness of the judgment pronounced; while the naming of a contemporary and fellow-townsmen of the Apostle may be accepted as an indication of the true date of the Gospel' (Dods, Expos. Gr. Test. i. p. 659).

II. THE INTERNAL EVIDENCE.—No text of the Gospel that we possess is without the categorical statement of 21<sup>24</sup> that the book contains the witness of the Apostle John and is written by him. It seems the more probable view that this whole chapter was composed by friends of the Evangelist, either towards the end of his life, or after his death, in order to remove a misinterpretation of a saying of Jesus about him. The position assigned to St Peter in the chapter might be explained by the desire to show that, although the Gospel leaves him weighted with the guilt of his denial, he was restored to his place in the Apostolic circle, and that no supersession is intended of the other Apostles. What lies at the basis of the Synoptics. We have no moral right to regard the statement of 21<sup>24</sup> as anything but a bona fide statement of the earliest view of the authorship, and in the internal evidence we have to consider how far the book itself corresponds with this suggested view.

1. The author is a Jew.—(1) His attitude towards the OT shows unmistakably that it was for him a valuable aid to faith and a deep source of religious experience. The opening words of the Gospel are reminiscent of Gn 1<sup>1</sup>; 3<sup>13</sup> recalls Dt 30<sup>12</sup>. 'His own' in 1<sup>11</sup> can betray only the tragic consciousness of a Jew that the chosen nation rejected the Christ. The words in 10<sup>38</sup> 'the Scripture cannot be broken,' may be taken as expressing the Evangelist's own conviction. He sees in certain incidents of the life of Jesus that would otherwise cause perplexity, especially some connected with the Passion, the fulfilment of the OT. Twice the conduct of Judas is explained by Scripture (13<sup>18</sup> 17<sup>12</sup>). The mournful sight of the garments of Jesus distributed among the rough soldiers brings to mind a prophecy (19<sup>24</sup>). The thirst of Jesus, who Himself had the gift of the living water, is a fulfilment of Scripture (19<sup>28</sup>). It is in Scripture that he finds a solution for the problem of the failure of Christ's ministry and teaching (12<sup>37</sup>). The very spear-thrust has a place in the counsels of God (19<sup>36</sup> 37), and becomes an aid to faith (19<sup>35</sup>). While the Evangelist rarely cites incidents from the OT, and the great majority of the OT references are contained in the discourses of Christ, it has to be borne in mind that the Gospel was written for Gentile readers, to whom only the outlines of the history would be familiar.

(2) The writer is familiar not only with the Messianic expectation, but also with the limitations that it suffered in the popular mind. The hope is current in Galilee (1<sup>41</sup> 46, 48 6<sup>15</sup> 28 30<sup>1</sup>), in Samaria (4<sup>25</sup> 29 42), in Judea (5<sup>30</sup> 45<sup>1</sup>, 7<sup>20</sup> 40-43 8<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>24</sup>). 'Among friends, among foes, among neutrals alike, it is discussed.' The purpose of the Gospel is to induce belief that Jesus is the Christ (20<sup>31</sup>). Not only so, but the limitations and misconceptions of the idea of the Christ in the popular mind are familiar to him. Elijah and the Prophet are not yet come (1<sup>21</sup>); the outlook is unspiritual (6<sup>14</sup> 15), the Messiah will never die (6<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>34</sup>); Jesus does not satisfy their conventional ideas (7<sup>27</sup> 42).

(3) The writer is familiar with the ideas and customs of the Jews. We have a picture of a Jewish marriage feast (21<sup>10</sup>), of pastoral life (10<sup>1-14</sup>), of burial customs (11<sup>38-44</sup> 19<sup>40</sup>), the estimate of women (4<sup>27</sup>), the dis-paragement of the Dispersion (7<sup>35</sup>), the heredity of sin (9<sup>1</sup>). The religious observances of the people are known to him, and he displays great familiarity with the Temple and its service. The Synagogue and the Temple are places of resort (18<sup>20</sup>); he knows the side of the Temple where shelter is to be had in inclement weather (10<sup>22</sup> 23); it was forty-six years in building (2<sup>20</sup>); he speaks of the treasury (8<sup>20</sup>). The two feasts of Tabernacles and of Dedication are familiar to him, even to the implied ritualistic details (Westcott, vi). He speaks of the 'great day' of the feast of Tabernacles. He is familiar with the narrow Sabbatarian views of the Jews (5<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>21-22</sup>). In the last passage a subtle argument is founded on the knowledge that circumcision is allowable on the Sabbath.

Does it not imply that Caiphas was 'high priest that same year' (11<sup>51</sup>, 12<sup>1</sup>, 18<sup>19</sup>, 19<sup>9</sup>) imply that the writer imagined that the office was tenable only for a year? The repetition after the manner of the Evangelist is meant to impress more than a chronological fact. Either the words may have an ironical character, or they may be intended to suggest the tenure, and would be applicable to any of the three predecessors of Caiphas, or to the office (Delff, Gesch. des Judentums, vol. 1, p. 35, 80), or the Evangelist may be referring to the high priest with whom Christ was crucified, who entered alone once a year into the Holy of Holies, where he offered atonement for the sins of the people (He 9<sup>7</sup>), and in 'that memorable year' Caiphas is but an unconscious instrument in bringing Christ to the cross (Westcott, vi; cf. also B. W.).

(4) It has been contended against these indications that when the writer mentions the Jews he seems to speak of them as a foreigner would speak. They are throughout represented as the bitter enemies of Christ (2<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>24</sup> 11<sup>36</sup> 13<sup>33</sup> 20<sup>19</sup>). The term οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι is sometimes used to denote the Jews as a nation, in distinction from other nations: sometimes as Judeans distinguished from Galileans or Perseans; and sometimes the leaders of the Jewish people alone are meant. This somewhat indefinite mode of speech has a sufficient explanation if the Evangelist wrote as he used to speak (Drummond, op. cit. 416, note). There is no indication in his tone of national antagonism. Rather his attitude is like that of St Paul to his countrymen. The Jews are 'His own' (1<sup>11</sup>); Jesus Himself is a Jew (4<sup>9</sup>); salvation is of the Jews (4<sup>22</sup>); Nathanael is an 'Israelite indeed' (1<sup>47</sup>); there are believing Jews (8<sup>31</sup> etc.).

This Gospel also preserves words of Christ that trace the subsequent persecution by the Jews to its roots in their ignorance of the Father and the Son (16<sup>2-3</sup>). In this Gospel Jesus never denounces the leaders of the people in as strong terms as He uses in the Synoptics. That He expressly distinguishes His disciples from the Jews (13<sup>33</sup>), and also speaks of 'your law' (8<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>), 'their law' (15<sup>25</sup>), implies that this external attitude adopted by the writer was not unknown during the ministry on earth (cf. Dods, Expos. Gr. Test. i. 666).

2. The author is a Jew of Palestine.—Many of the preceding characteristics are already indications that the writer is a native of Palestine. (1) is the accurate knowledge of the geography of Jerusalem and its environs (cf. 5<sup>2</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>) the Kidron; which is a ravine on the way from the city to the Mount of Olives, and a torrent only in winter (χειμάριον, 18<sup>1</sup>); the Pavement (Gabbatha) in the Prætorium (19<sup>13</sup>); Golgotha (19<sup>17</sup>). The acclaiming multitude carried in their hands 'the branches of the palm trees' which grew on the Mount of Olives (12<sup>13</sup>).

He is also familiar with sites and places. Jacob's well is deep (4<sup>11</sup>); the mountain and the ripening cornfields are suggested in the most natural fashion (vv. 20 21 22), it is a descent from the high ground where Cana stood to the shores of Gennesaret at Capernaum (v 27). Ch. 6 contains some minute information as to the district Bethsaida (1<sup>4</sup> 12<sup>21</sup>) and Bethany (11<sup>1</sup>) are not merely localities, but connected with the names of friends. He carefully distinguishes Bethany 'high unto Jerusalem about 11 miles' (11<sup>1</sup>) from 'Bethany beyond Jordan' (10<sup>41</sup>). Nazareth is mentioned not only as the home of Jesus, but as a place so well known to Nathanael that he considered it unlikely that 'any good thing' could spring from such commonplace locality (1<sup>46</sup> cf. the details as to Sychar (4<sup>5</sup>), 1<sup>44</sup> 1<sup>45</sup> 1<sup>46</sup> 1<sup>47</sup> 1<sup>48</sup> 1<sup>49</sup> 1<sup>50</sup> 1<sup>51</sup> 1<sup>52</sup> 1<sup>53</sup> 1<sup>54</sup>).

(2) It has been customary to regard the so-called Hebraisms of the Fourth Gospel, while it was supposed to share with the other NT as an indication that the writer was a Palestinian. The study of the papyri has revolutionized this idea. It is now no longer permissible to speak of Hebraistic Greek. The papyri are written in the vernacular Greek, and range in date from the 3rd cent. B.C. to the 7th cent. A.D. The earlier specimens furnish a convincing parallel in language to the Greek of the NT. Where there are Hebraic modes of expression, these must be traced to direct translation from the Aramaic, or to those causes that operate in the introduction of foreign elements into the vernacular of any language (Moulton, Grammar of NT Greek, Prolegomena, vol. i pp. 18, 19). At the same time, while we must attribute the simple structure of this Evangelist's sentences and the absence of connecting particles to his use of the vernacular, we are not left without evidence that he knew Hebrew. In his quotations from the OT he made use of the LXX (2<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>38</sup> 19<sup>34</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>); but he is also independent of it (19<sup>36</sup> 7<sup>38</sup> 12<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>31</sup>); and there is an interesting group of cases where the LXX seems to be corrected by reference to the Hebrew (6<sup>45</sup> 13<sup>18</sup> 19<sup>37</sup>; cf. Westcott, Gospel of John, xiii-xiv; Drummond, op. cit. p. 364).

(3) Can the Logos conception of the Gospel be shown to have greater affinity with Alexandrian than with Hebrew thought? It is noteworthy that the term λόγος is not used throughout the Gospel, either in the discourses or in the narrative parts, except in the ordinary sense of 'word'; but we must not neglect other passages where the Logos idea is in the background. The lofty and undefined sense of the plural subject in such passages as 3<sup>11-13</sup>, the well-known pre-existence passage—the assertion by Christ of what He had seen with the Father (6<sup>46</sup> 8<sup>38</sup>, cf. 1<sup>18</sup>), His teaching which is not of Himself (7<sup>14-17</sup>), His complete unity of existence with the Father (14<sup>7-11</sup>), are all expressions of the Logos consciousness (cf. Grill, Untersuchungen über die Entstehung des vierten Evangeliums, i. pp. 32, 33). On the other hand, in order to prove that the Evangelist had either a literary acquaintance with the works of Philo, or was deeply influenced by his thought, it would be necessary to discover a much closer correspondence between them than is actually to be found. In the Stoic philosophy with which Philo closely identifies himself, the term 'Logos' has the double significance of 'reason' (λόγος ἐνδύθερος) and 'word' (λόγος προφορικός), and in the Fourth Gospel there is not a trace of the former sense. Jesus is the manifestation of God, the uttered Word. Again, in the Gospel the Logos is identified with the Messiah, and in Philo there is no such identification. It is doubtful whether Philo attributes personality to the Logos; but there can be no doubt of the personal existence of the Logos in the Gospel. At the same time, the author of the Fourth Gospel, like every Hebrew thinker, is no metaphysician, and he simply projects the conception of personality which he derived from the knowledge of the Incarnate One, into the Word in its pre-incarnate existence. The Angel of the Lord and the personified Wisdom in the OT are not so much independent existences as immanent determinations of the Divine Being. Moreover, the Incarnation of the Logos is an idea quite foreign to the mind of Philo, not because with him matter is essentially corrupt, but because it is 'regarded as a principle purely negative, anything limiting, restraining the penetration of the Divine action, in proportion to its thickness and opacity' (Réville, Le Quatrième Évangile, p. 87). For Alexandrian thought an Incarnation of the Logos could only be Docetic; and thus may have given rise to the heresy of 1 Jn 2<sup>22</sup>.

There are, however, some very striking affinities of expression between Philo and the Fourth Gospel. Philo speaks of 'a second God' (δευτερος θεός), the Word Himself is God and the Son of God (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ), the Word is the agent or instrument in creation (ὁ λόγος κατεργασίας), Light and Life are conceptions of Philo, the Logos, he uses the term 'Paraclete,' but 'cosmos' and not to the 'Logos' in heaven, reveals the name of God, possesses knowledge and power, is continually at father, guide, steersman, is the food of the soul, the whole question see Sanday, loc. cit. pp. 185-200. These coincidences cannot be overlooked in deciding the question of the bearing in mind that 'Logos' is the word by which the Word of God is translated in the OT, the Apocrypha, and in the Jewish Targums that afford coincidences of thought (Ps. 33 10<sup>20</sup> 147<sup>1</sup> Wis 9 13<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>16</sup> 16 For the Messa of the Targums, see Edersheim, Life and Times, i. pp. 40-48). The Evangelist would meet with these ideas nowhere more readily than in Ephesus, which was also the home of the Logos of Hieroclitus. He would be disposed to keep in mind the readers, among whom these expressions were current. Again, we find similar coincidences of thought with Philo in the writings of St Paul and in the Epistle to the Hebrews. If, indeed, we were to isolate the Prologue to the Gospel, which may be regarded as containing all that was in the author's mind essential to the Logos idea, and to rid ourselves of all associations of the word 'Logos' derived from Greek philosophy, we should find that the thought remains very much in the OT, except in the case of vv 1-14.

3. The writer is a contemporary of the events and persons in his narrative.—(1) His knowledge of the ecclesiastical situation and feeling of the time.—A deputation is sent to the Baptist from the ecclesiastical authorities in Jerusalem consisting of priests and their attendant Levites (1<sup>19</sup>), and the writer breaks the narrative of the deputation to insert the remark, evidently meant to explain the question that follows, that the deputation included some Pharisees (v. 24). Their inquiry betrays an interest in ritual and observance of the Law which is that party, as distinct from the Sadducees. The Sadducees seem to have applied rationalist principles to the old religion, and were distinguished by dogmatic differences not only of faith, but in connexion with life after death, and the question of predestination (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. pp. 310-324). The writer does not speak of Pharisees and Sadducees, but of Chief Priests and Pharisees, showing that he is acquainted with the fact that the Sadducees held the offices in the time of Christ. The passage 11<sup>47-53</sup> is full of ecclesiastical knowledge. The discussion in the Sanhedrin is occasioned by the influence on the people of the raising of Lazarus, and we can clearly distinguish the attitude of the two parties. The Pharisees are represented as in touch with the people (11<sup>48</sup>, cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6), and they are afraid lest a tumult should arise, and thereby the ecclesiastical influence (τόπος) and the national existence be destroyed by Rome. The reply of Caiaphas is characteristic. He scornfully sets aside the question of the miracle, an opportunist policy to deal with the situation (vv 49-50). It can scarcely be without meaning that the Pharisees should know the Sadducean disbelief in miracles should represent Caiaphas as the unconscious prophet and instrument of the death of Christ (vv 51-52). In 7<sup>45-52</sup> there is displayed a similar knowledge of ecclesiastical circles. After the triumphal entry the Pharisees seem to have been filled with dismay at their loss of influence with the people, and at the popularity of Christ (12<sup>19</sup>), and it is the ruling Sadducean party who plot the death of Lazarus (v. 30). Again, it is the Fourth Evangelist who tells us of the informal trial before Annas, who, though still wielding much power, had been deposed in favour of his son-in-law (18<sup>12-24</sup>).

These indications of an acquaintance with opinion in ecclesiastical circles are in complete correspondence with the statement in 18<sup>15</sup> about the disciple 'who was known to the high priest.' In this Gospel alone are we told the name (Malchus) of the servant of the high priest whose ear was cut off by Peter. It is noteworthy, also, that the Evangelist is acquainted with Nicodemus, and with Joseph of Arimathea, who belonged to the Pharisaic party. In this connexion may be mentioned the tradition of Polycrates that 'John, who leaned on Jesus' breast,' also wore 'the frontlet' (πέταλον) of the high priest (Eus. HE III. xxxi. 3).

Delf has propounded the theory that the author of the Fourth Gospel was an unnamed native of Jerusalem, not of the number of the Twelve, but a man and a member of the higher aristocracy. On the statement of Polycrates, and on the other indications in the Gospel, he identifies the author with 'the disciple whom Jesus loved,' and describes him as a kind of 'apostolic' disciple. Sanday (Cr. of Fourth Gospel, p. 10) states a further theory of the author, and some insuperable difficulties attend it. He identifies the author with the 'disciple whom Jesus loved' (20<sup>2</sup>), and in the other Gospels, the 'disciple whom Jesus loved' is named together with the other disciples. That within the Apostolic circle there were two pairs of friends identical in each other is not once referred to. Again, if Delf is right, the Apostle John is not once referred to. On the other hand, this unknown disciple is a man of history, unless he be the timorous man who fled at the arrest, leaving his linen cloth to the other disciples. It will be seen that the theory of Delf is not only inconsistent with the Gospel, but also with the history of the ship, and the other indications of the time.

(2) His knowledge of the opinions of the populace (ὄχλος).—He knows their varying verdicts about Christ (7<sup>11-13</sup>); the wonder of the 'Jerusalemites' at the immunity Jesus enjoys from injury, notwithstanding His fearless speaking (7<sup>25-27</sup>); the belief of some of the crowd (7<sup>32</sup>, cf. v. 40); the fickleness of the populace (v. 31); the excitement among the people in view of the request of the Sanhedrin for information as to the whereabouts of Jesus, and the possibility of His appearance at the feast, is vividly portrayed (11<sup>54-57</sup>). The climax of popular acclamation is reached in 12<sup>12-19</sup>.

(3) The writer speaks as one to whom the men and women of his narrative are personally familiar.—Nicodemus is introduced somewhat suddenly into the narrative, but that is in the manner of the Evangelist, and presupposes that his readers are aware, either from the other Gospels, or from the oral tradition, or from personal acquaintance, of his historical existence. Nicodemus is introduced almost in the same words as John the Baptist (cf. 1<sup>6</sup> and 3<sup>1</sup>), a fact which must not be forgotten in view of the tendency to find allegorical meanings in the characters (cf. 1<sup>29</sup> and 1<sup>31</sup>). It would be strange if the Evangelist should take so little pains to distinguish between characters known to be historical, and those that are allegorical. The reality of the characters is witnessed by the words they utter. It is not stupidity, but a profound emotion that makes Nicodemus speak as he does in 3<sup>4</sup>, when he discovers that all that he has learned must be unlearned, and that he must begin the process of human experience anew. He is on the threshold of a world of facts as yet unrealized by him (3<sup>4</sup>). The woman of Samaria is introduced upon the scene, amid real surroundings at Jacob's well, on the road from Jerusalem. Her character is revealed in her nonchalant air and bantering mood, behind which she conceals an aching and guilty heart, and is much too true to life for allegory. How can the woman of Samaria be an allegory of the Samaritan Church, and her five husbands symbolize her idolatrous worship? (so, e.g., Keim, Jesus of Naz. i. 159, note 1; Loisy, Le Quat. Évangile, p. 354). It is not necessary to suppose that the Evangelist was present at these interviews. It is possible that the Christ was present, and that the Evangelist is the 'disciple whom Jesus loved,' with whose intimacies of that kind would be consistent. Leaving for the moment the lifelike character of the Apostolic circle, we are confronted in the closing scenes with a group of men that could have been painted only by a contemporary hand. The writer knows Caiaphas so well that he is able to reveal the man in a single sentence that fell from his lips (11<sup>49</sup>). Pilate is depicted, irresolute, and fettered by a guilty past of oppressive and cruel government. At the critical moment the Evangelist uses in his hands of the people the powerful weapon of a covert threat to denounce him to the Emperor (19<sup>12</sup>).

4. Relationship of the Evangelist to Jesus and the Apostolic circle.—It is evident that the author was able in a peculiar degree to interpret the mind of our Lord. He tells us of His emotions, thoughts, and motives (11<sup>33</sup> 13<sup>21</sup> 24<sup>4-5</sup> 6<sup>15</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>4</sup>). Is the writer identical with 'the disciple whom Jesus loved'? Jn 21<sup>20, 24</sup> leaves us in no doubt. It is an entirely inadequate interpretation to say that the phrase is meant to stand for 'the type of the perfect Gnostic, the spiritual witness of Jesus' (so Loisy, Le Quat. Év. p. 125). It is a strong argument against the view that the ideal figure is meant, when we note the variety of the references. His existence is implied in 14<sup>0</sup>; in 13<sup>23</sup> he is described as leaning on Jesus' breast; in 18<sup>15</sup> he is mentioned as 'another disciple who was known to the high priest.' It would also be necessary to interpret the scene in 19<sup>28</sup> as allegorical, if the disciple is not a historical figure. The variety of the situations shows that the author had a real person in his mind.

We have, however, to explain the difficulty that when the personality of the Evangelist is obtruded, he describes himself as 'the disciple whom Jesus loved.' If there is an apparent lack of modesty in the use of the phrase, it may be questioned whether this charge would not be equally relevant in those passages where the Evangelist confidently interprets the inmost thoughts of our Lord. The fact that he should describe himself in this indirect fashion at all will be matter for discussion under the question of the historicity of the Gospel. In the meantime it is sufficient to point out that in every case where the phrase is used, the writer is laid under the necessity of referring to himself individually. In 13<sup>23</sup> he explains the fact that he is lying on Jesus' breast. And in 19<sup>28</sup> Jesus addresses him directly. Perhaps in 20<sup>2</sup> there is the suggestion of a thought in Mary's mind that the disciple would tell the mother of Jesus. The only alternative in these cases is to use the personal pronoun or to mention his own name, a course which the Evangelist avoids. If ch 21 is a later addition by another hand, there is no difficulty in the use of the phrase in vv. 7<sup>20</sup>.

It is also apparent that the author of the Gospel stood in a very intimate relationship to the Apostolic circle. We have miniature portraits of several of the Apostles, conveyed often through questions they put. Philip throughout appears as a man of somewhat practical and business-like turn of mind (14<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>15</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>). Andrew is wise, helpful, and unobtrusive (14<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>8, 9</sup> 12<sup>22</sup>). Thomas is despondent: his moods colour his outlook, and he experiences violent reaction (11<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>5</sup> 20<sup>24ff. 27a</sup>). Peter is over-confident and impulsive, and at a time cowardly (13<sup>6ff. 36ff. 18<sup>10ff. 16ff.</sup></sup>). The scandal of Judas' presence among the Twelve is referred to as if by one who felt the shame of it and was eager to clear the situation (12<sup>4-6</sup> 13<sup>2, 26-30</sup> 18<sup>2</sup>). He knows also their places of resort (11<sup>54</sup> 18<sup>20<sup>10</sup></sup>), and the thoughts of the disciples at critical moments (2<sup>2</sup> 7<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>19, 60</sup> 12<sup>15</sup> 13<sup>22</sup> 28<sup>20<sup>9</sup></sup>).

5. Is St. John the Apostle the author of the Gospel?—Is he the unnamed disciple who is identified with the writer? This unnamed disciple is called among the earliest disciples, and remembers even the hour of the day (13<sup>39</sup>). He is closely associated with St. Peter in the closing scenes. We know from the Synoptics that St. Peter and the two sons of Zebedee were in specially close relationship with Jesus. St. Peter is out of the question, St. James died early; only St. John is left. Unless John be the beloved disciple, one of the 'pillar' Apostles (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>) is never once mentioned in the Gospel, except indirectly in 21<sup>2</sup>. A very strong argument for supposing that St. John is meant may also be founded on the fact that nowhere does the author refer to 'the Baptist,' but always to 'John.' Elsewhere he is very careful to distinguish names (e.g. 14<sup>22</sup>), but in this case he seems to have thought that no confusion was possible.

If St. John is the writer of the Gospel, why does he so studiously conceal his identity? The Fourth Gospel is distinguished from the Synoptics by the fact that, while in them we have a purely impersonal narrative except in the preface to St. Luke, in St. John we have a narrative where individual experience ('testimony') is prominent. Is it solely because St. John is himself the author and writer of the Gospel, that he sedulously veils his own name? Why was it not possible for him to incorporate his own testimony in the Gospel without keeping himself in the background in such a way as really to attract attention? There must be some reason for this conduct other than a modesty which thus defeats its own end. It is quite evident that the authority of the Gospel for the Church is regarded as depending on the fact that St. John the Apostle wrote it. It is permissible to see in 21<sup>24</sup> an indication that it was felt necessary, even at that early date, to authenticate the position that the Apostle John made himself responsible for the statements contained in this Gospel. This is not because there was doubt as to the Johannine authorship, but because the Gospel differs so much in character, subject, and content from the Synoptics, which already held the ground as authorities for the life and teaching of the Lord.

We shall be able to find an answer to these questions if we consider the two passages in the Gospel itself that have been most relied on as direct statements of Johannine authorship. (a) 1<sup>14</sup>. In what sense is 'we beheld' to be taken? It has been contended that a seeing with the bodily eye is not meant, but spiritual vision. If we compare the parallel passage in 1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, there can be little doubt that the 'hearing' and the 'handling' there mentioned demand the sense that the 'seeing' is also literal. The presumption is in favour of applying the same interpretation to the passage in the Gospel. By 'we' is meant a group of eye-witnesses who are associated with St. John in the statement. Who these were it is impossible actually to determine, but perhaps it is unnecessary to limit the range of 'we' to the circle of the Twelve. The Gospel shows that the writer is interested in the testimony, however imperfect it may sometimes be, of many others besides his fellow-Apostles. Clement of Alexandria says that 'last of all, John, perceiving that the bodily facts had been set forth in the other Gospels, at the instance of his disciples and with the inspiration of the Spirit composed a spiritual Gospel.' With this may be compared the statement in the Muratorian Canon: 'It was revealed to Andrew, one of the Apostles, that John should narrate everything in his own name, subject to the revision of the rest' (ut recognoscentibus cunctis Johannes suo nomine cuncta describeret). While these statements may not have independent historical value, and may themselves be based on the internal evidence of the Gospel, and especially on 21<sup>24</sup>, surely they must be regarded as the simplest and most direct interpretation of the facts. A group of eye-witnesses was concerned in the origin of the Gospel. We may therefore offer the hypothesis that, while St. John wrote the Gospel and impressed upon it his own personality, the form in which he expresses himself, the philosophical mould in which the writing is cast, the Philonic power of his thought and characters, would owe much to the intellectual environment of Ephesus, and in some cases to direct suggestion on the part of some fellow-disciple not necessarily one of the Twelve. The value of the Gospel and its authenticity are confirmed by the fact that it is the expression of St. John's own experience attested by that of his fellow-disciples who had seen the Lord. The purpose of the Gospel is to treat the facts of the life and teaching of Jesus in such a way as to advance faith in the hearts of those who had not been eye-witnesses, and were therefore all the more inclined to regard their position in relation to the 'bodily facts' as a loss and a hindrance to faith. So far from this, the climax of faith is not to have seen and yet to believe (20<sup>29</sup>). There would, no doubt, be men like Thomas in the early Church, easily cast down, and satisfied only by the bodily presence of Christ, to whom all else was unreal. No personal assurance was sufficient to convince them. St. John, therefore, veiled his identity, and emphasized the joint-testimony of the group of eye-witnesses to which he also belonged. This is the origin of the impersonal reference in 20<sup>31</sup> 'These things are written,' etc.

(b) 19<sup>35-37</sup>. Here is an instance where the Evangelist is compelled to distinguish his own personality from the circle in whose name he speaks. St. John alone of that group was present at the Cross (19<sup>28</sup>). In this case he has to limit in accordance with his principle, some means of authenticating his testimony. It is interesting to notice how this is done, and the character of the Gospel as not dependent on the evidence of a single testimony alone vindicated. A threefold corroboration is adduced: (a) 'His witness is true' (ἀληθινός), i.e. confirmed by the 'Spirit of truth' (14<sup>17, 26</sup>). (β) Reference is made to One who 'knoweth that he saith true.' It is possible, but awkward, to refer ἐκείνος to the Evangelist. Rather it is meant to denote Christ Himself (cf. 1<sup>18</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>). It is so taken by Sanday (op. cit. p. 78) and Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. in 1899). This interpretation is as old as Erasmus. (γ) The Scriptures are adduced as a witness, i.e. the witness of God Himself (vv. 36-37). The fact of the flow of blood and water from the pierced side can be explained medically, and the emphasis is laid not on the fact, but on the interpretation to be put upon it. It is a 'sign,' and the writer must have regarded it as of peculiar value to his readers. Perhaps some form of the Docetic heresy is aimed at (cf. Haussleiter, Zwei Apost. Zeugen, p. 29).

In conclusion, the Gospel is a genuine Johannine work from the pen of the Apostle, who wrote from Ephesus.* We cannot, however, overlook the undoubted fact that the writer is concerned to hide his own identity, and thereby to impress the fact that the Gospel is not the work of a single individual, but the testimony of a group of eye-witnesses. With John's as the mind, they conjointly made themselves witnesses for the statements contained in the book. This is at once the oldest and simplest solution of the problem of authorship.

Two objections, on general grounds, to the traditional authorship may here be mentioned.

1. Can a Galilean fisherman have written this Gospel?—There is no question of NT criticism where the need is more imperative to rid ourselves of prejudice than this question of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel. It is possible to have a completely mistaken conception of the connexion between letters and handicraft in the days of the Apostles. St. Peter and St. John are described in Ac 4<sup>13</sup> as 'unlearned and ignorant men' (ἀγράμματοι καὶ ἰδιῶται). ἰδιῶτης marks a caste distinction, in opposition to the learned or academic classes. The use of the vernacular tongue by the Apostles would be sufficient to suggest the expression. The Pharisaic objection is, as Dehltzsch reminds us, a decline from the traditional honourable connexion between the Rabbi and the handworker (Jewish Artisan Life, p. 54). Zebedee owned his own fishing vessel and the presumptuous request of the mother of Zebedee's sons betrays a somewhat overweening sense of social position. St. John was 'known to the high priest.' Moreover, we too must take knowledge that he 'had been with Jesus,' and it would not be easy to estimate, in addition to the spiritual training, the purely educative influence of companionship with Jesus of Nazareth. The over-zealous scribe that sought to call down fire on a lost Samaritan village, finds a nobler expression in the withering exposure of Judas (12<sup>6</sup>) and of Caiaphas (11<sup>49-52</sup>). He who with such insight lets us into the spiritual incapacity of Nicodemus, must have been himself born again into a new world, and have gained a new outlook.

2. Is it impossible that John, a 'pillar' Apostle (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>), who so far famed the claims of the circumcision, should also have written such an anti-Judaic Gospel?—Yet even then he cordially recognized, by the giving of the right hand of fellowship, St. Paul's mission to the Gentiles. But the love for his own nation and race in the emphasis he lays in the Fourth Gospel on the tragedy of their rejection of Christ. The effect of the destruction of Jerusalem must have been very great on a mind like John's, and the Gospel was written forty years after that event. None of the other Evangelists lays such stress on the teaching of events as the Fourth. In Ephesus also he would breathe the atmosphere of the Pauline gospel, full of thoughts of the sovereignty of God, the condescension of the Divine grace, and the universality of the gospel message. He who beheld the awe-inspiring vision of the Risen Christ in Patmos, might well, in the calm of later years, write the majestic words of the Prologue.

III. RELATION TO THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.—It is impossible to doubt that the Fourth Evangelist presupposes that his readers are acquainted with the contents of the first three Gospels, or that he himself is acquainted with them. We shall confine ourselves in this discussion to certain points of divergence between John and the Synoptics.

1. The scene of the ministry of Christ is for the most part confined to Jerusalem. The Galilaean ministry is referred to in 2<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>1-39</sup> 7<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>1</sup>. We are not now concerned with the demand for chronological correspondence with the Synoptic account. It will be sufficient to show that there is no inconsistency in the prominence given in this Gospel to the events in Jerusalem. The Judean ministry is presupposed in Lk 4<sup>4</sup>, but the reading is doubtful. Scribes and Pharisees from Jerusalem came to attend on the Galilaean ministry (Lk 5<sup>17</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>1</sup>). Judas was a native of Kerioth, in Judaea. The friendship of Joseph of Arimathea, who in all probability resided in Jerusalem, has to be explained. The relations with Martha and Mary point to frequent visits to Bethany. We have also the 'How often' of Mt 23<sup>37</sup> and Lk 13<sup>34-35</sup>, which indicates, not merely unfulfilled desire, but baffled effort. After the Ascension the disciples make their headquarters in Jerusalem. It is well-nigh impossible to suppose the attitude of the authorities, and particularly of the closing days (e.g. the friend at whose house the Supper was eaten), unless by the Johannine accounts of the visits to Jerusalem. The Synoptics tell us of only one Passover, but events could hardly have ripened there as they did unless Jesus had been previously known in Jerusalem.

2. Certain incidents are omitted in St. John which in the Synoptics are crises in the life of Christ.—The omission of the Temptation narrative is perhaps not strange in one who knew the mind of Jesus so intimately. The beloved disciple would be well qualified to understand the parabolic nature of the story. The essence of the Temptation narrative is the possession of Divine power and the refusal to use it for selfish ends. Similarly, Christ's freedom of action, especially in regard to His death, is frequently emphasized in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 10<sup>17-18</sup>). The outward glory of the Transfiguration is merged in a higher glory, which is seen in the communicating of Life and Light to men (14). As regards the omission of the narrative of the institution of the Lord's Supper, it was no doubt unnecessary, at the time at which the Gospel was written, to repeat words that were in common use in the Church. The inner meaning of the sacrament is perhaps displayed in chs. 6, and throughout chs 13-17, as an abiding union with Christ, and the redemptive death is emphasized elsewhere in the Gospel. It is possible that there had been creeping into the Church superstitious views of the ordinance, and the author is concerned both to bring out the spiritual meaning and to show that the ideas usually connected solely with the institution, of eating and drinking the flesh and blood of Christ, were already familiar to His disciples. It is the washing of the disciples' feet in the Fourth Gospel to which a symbolic meaning is attached (13<sup>8-10</sup>). The Fourth Evangelist omits the Agony in the Garden. It is suggested that he would regard it as incompatible with the dignity of the Logos, and damaging to his conception of the Person of Christ. Certainly the Christ of the Fourth Gospel retains no trace of the Agony when at His word the Roman soldiers fall back on the ground. The Intercessory Prayer also preserves 'an imperial calm. Yet we must take into account such statements as 12<sup>27-28</sup>, and the recalling of the very words of the Agony in 18<sup>11</sup>. Moreover, it is untrue to say that the Fourth Evangelist's bodily weakness as incompatible with his position as Jesus sits at Jacob's well tired and sleeps at the grave of Lazarus, and thirsts on the cross (19<sup>28</sup>). The last passage gives us a key to the author's attitude in reference to the person of Christ. Jesus spoke the words in full consciousness ('knowing,' etc., i.e. they were not wrung from Him), and in fulfilment of a great Divine purpose ('that the Son of Man might be fulfilled'). In his picture of Jesus upon earth, the Evangelist brings out in strong relief attributes of His Person which presented themselves to him in their full perception of the Risen Christ. Christ's humanity and Divinity are naively set side by side (cf. 6<sup>6</sup> 12<sup>30</sup> 11<sup>5</sup> 6 41, 42).

The reverse side of the question is presented in the miracle of the Raising of Lazarus. Here the Fourth Evangelist inserts an occurrence which is also a crisis in the last days, and yet the Synoptics do not mention it. The contradiction is partly resolved if we remember that the Synoptic account may really be reduced to one original document closely corresponding to our Gospel of St. Mark, and containing recollections of the teaching of St. Peter. Again, the mere fact that the raising of the dead has been omitted in the Synoptics, and that the daughter of Jairus also was raised, suggests that the miracle should be one of such central importance in the working out of the end. It may be that in the preaching of the early Apostles, which is the basis for the oral tradition of the Synoptics, the incident would not be dwelt on, considering the hatred provoked against Lazarus himself (12<sup>10</sup>). At all events, the extraordinary miracle played by the Fourth Evangelist in the closing days at Jerusalem, leads to the presumption that he is right in the place he gives to the miracle.

3. The date of the Last Supper.—All the Synoptics agree in putting the Last Supper on the evening of 'the first day of unleavened bread,' i.e. on the evening which began Passover day, according to Jewish reckoning (Mt 26<sup>17-20</sup>, Mk 14<sup>12-17</sup>, Lk 22<sup>7-14</sup>). Thus the day of the Crucifixion is the Passover day, or 15th Nisan. On the other hand, the Fourth Gospel regards the day of the Crucifixion as identical with the day of Preparation for the Passover (19<sup>14-31</sup>, 42). The rulers would not enter the Praetorium lest they be prevented by defilement from eating the Passover (18<sup>28</sup>). Jn 13<sup>1</sup> puts the Supper 'before the feast of the Passover.' Elaborate and ingenious attempts have been made to bring either the Synoptics into harmony with the Fourth Gospel or vice versa. No successful attempt has yet been made to reconcile the two accounts chronologically and it does not appear probable that any solution can be found in that direction. The only points on which all four are agreed are that our Lord suffered on Friday (but see Westcott, Intro. to Study of the Gospels, 322), and rose again on the following Sunday. We must choose between the Crucifixion on the 14th Nisan (John) or on 15th Nisan (Synoptics).

There are two questions that call for answer. (1) Is this Friday Passover day (i.e. 15th Nisan according to Jewish reckoning from sunset to sunset)? (2) Is the Last Supper held on the evening of Friday the regular Paschal Supper?

(1) There are various internal contradictions in the Synoptic account. Chwolson has challenged the accuracy of the expression 'the first day of unleavened bread' as applied to the day of preparation. He holds that the words can strictly be used only of the first day of the Passover week, i.e. of Passover day itself. It was the case, however, that the leaven began to be removed from Jewish houses in the daytime of the 14th Nisan, and this would be sufficient to account for the phrase. Again, we are told that the Sanhedrin determined to avoid putting Jesus to death during the feast (Mk 14<sup>2</sup>). Did they change their plans (Mk 14<sup>12-17</sup> and 43-46). Peter is armed, and the servants of the high priest are accompanied by an armed band. This was, strictly to Jewish law, on the Passover days.

Simon of Cyrene is coming up out of the country (Mk 15:21)—not necessarily from his work, which would, of course, indicate that it was not yet Passover, but more probably to purify himself for the Passover (Jn 11:55). Again, it is not easy to account for the haste with which it was sought to take down the body of Christ (Mk 15:42), unless the Passover was imminent. Joseph buys fine linen, and lays the body in the tomb, which could scarcely be done on Passover day. These considerations serve to show that the account is at least uncertain. Thus there are also in the Synoptic story that go to confirm the clear statement of the Fourth Gospel that Jesus ate the Supper and was crucified on the day of Preparation for the Passover. The only argument against the Johannine position is that urged by Baur and his school, that an attempt is made, in a theological interest, to show that Jesus died on the day on which the Passover lamb was slain.

(2) If we accept the Johannine view, it follows that the Last Supper was not the regular Paschal meal. It is remarkable that in none of the Gospels is there mention of the lamb. John mentions it from the Passover (13:14). At the same time in Lk Christ speaks of the meal as a Passover (22:14), and in such a way as to imply that there was some foreboding in His mind that they would not celebrate the Passover together on the legal day. The Chronicon Paschale, quoting Clement of Alexandria, says that the disciples learned that Jesus was Himself the Lamb, the food and the wine of the feast. St Paul seems to imply that he identified in his mind the Crucifixion with the sacrifice of the Paschal lamb (1 Co 5:7). If the Supper is meant by Jesus to anticipate the Passover meal, the shifting of the day would have as its secondary cause the haste with which the final preparation was made.

At the same time it is hardly the Evangelist is himself conscious of the Synoptics. Otherwise the phrase in 13:14 is more exact. His references (13:1, 19:14, 31:42) to a definite tradition is before him. A discussion of the question will be found in Hastings' DEU p. 711; ibid. pp. 47-59. See also artt. DATES, LAST SUPPER.

4. The conception of miracles.—In the Fourth Gospel the miracles are interpreted as manifestations of Christ's glory, with the view of calling attention to His Person. In the Synoptics they are performed as the outcome of His compassion. St. John certainly lays stress on the evidence of the miracles, but he cannot be said to have as his motive of compassion. Jesus created wine to add to the happiness of a perplexed multitude (2:11). 'Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?' is a question full of tender feeling (6:5). After their interviews with the Jews, Jesus 'found' a man of Bethesda and the man born blind (5:14, 9:35), and spoke further words of spiritual healing. The allegory of the Good Shepherd is spoken for the sake of the excommunicated man, and breathes compassion (10:1-18). The Evangelist's quarrel against the delay of two days being interpreted as a want of compassionate love for the sisters of Lazarus (11:5). The high claims of Jesus inconsistent with the account. Compare the lofty claims of Jesus in the sending forth of the Apostles in Mt 10, and the impression produced by His calming of the storm (Mk 4:41). Note the tenderness and solicitude for the troubled and sorrowful disciples in the valedictory discourses (cf., further, 5:40, 6:27, 10:9 and Mt 11:28-30, Lk 10:21-22). We may admit that there is 'a certain quality of the effect,' as, for example, when the man at Bethesda had been a cripple for thirty-eight years, and that Lazarus was four days in the tomb. On the other hand, this Gospel is alone in declaring that the miraculous is an inferior kind of evidence (14:10-14, cf. 2:23-25).

5. The picture of the Baptist has been regarded as inconsistent with the Synoptics. Sometimes, indeed, the Baptist speaks in the manner of the Evangelist, but it has to be remembered that only one aspect of the Baptist, viz. his witness to the Person of Christ, is emphasized. Baldensperger has contended (Prolog des vierten Evangelium) that the Gospel is written with the purpose of combating a sect in Asia Minor who were inclined to exalt the claims of the Baptist above those of Jesus. If we modify his statement so far as to admit that this is one of the aims of the Gospel, and that it has in view such a sect as we are told of in Ac 18:24-19:7, we are provided with the means of explaining the striking introduction of the Baptist as 'a man' sent from God (1:6); his being contrasted with the Logos in the Prologue; why he is represented in the Fourth Gospel solely as directing his disciples to Jesus (1:36); why it is stated that the Baptist's work and Christ's went on simultaneously, and that Jesus did not merely take up John's work where he left it (3:22-30); why the baptism of Jesus is mentioned in such a way as to exclude the conferring of any charism on Him by the Baptist (1:31-33).

6. It is urged as an objection to the Fourth Gospel that there is a lack of development in connexion with the claims of Jesus. At the very beginning He is hailed as the Messiah (1:41, 45), and as Son of God (1:34, 49). He reveals Himself as Messiah to the Samaritan woman (4:26). A process of development, however, is represented (e.g. 2:22) as going on in the minds of the disciples, and the transition is easy, from remembering what Jesus had said, to the actual meaning of words and events. Moreover, the narrative moves in growing cycles of belief and disbelief. His reply to His mother (2:4), His brethren's insinuation (7:3, 4), His own words in 7:17, the reproof of Philip (14:9), and the speculations of the crowd (7:12, 26, 27), all indicate that the disciples of men did not keep pace with His teaching. In this Gospel we still find the echo of the Messiasgeheimniss (10:24; cf. Sanday, op. cit. pp. 162-165). Again, is it not to be expected that if a Fourth Gospel was thought necessary, it would present a somewhat different aspect of Christ's claims and teaching? The Synoptics tell us how Jesus taught the peasants. The Fourth Gospel deals largely with the educated individuals, and of the inner group, and the way in which Christ's claims were met by the authorities at Jerusalem (cf. Dods, Expos. Gr. Test. Introduction, pp. 671-676).

IV. HISTORICITY OF THE GOSPEL.—Clement of Alexandria described the Gospel as 'spiritual,' in contrast to the Synoptics, which relate the 'bodily facts' concerning Christ. In the Prologue itself we have an example of the way in which statements of spiritual truth and historical fact are characteristically interwoven, and the Evangelist tells us that he aims at presenting, out of the fulness of his knowledge, such an impression of Christ and of His teaching as we may believe' (20:30, 31). Can we clearly from the character of the Gospel itself the impulses that actuated his mind? Can we in any measure detach the ideal element from the historical in the Gospel?

1. The narrative of events.—There are many signs in the Gospel that the author is writing for a personal interest. He claims to be an eye-witness (1:14). He gives exact notes of time (1:29, 2:14, 4:40, 6:22, 7:14, 11:6, 12:1, 13:1). The hour of the day is mentioned (13:46, 19:14). Similarly, exact numbers are given (1:35, 2:6, 6:9, 10:19, 4:18, 19:38, 39). The significance of these marks of real recollection is increased by the fact that they occur chiefly in connexion with incidents of critical importance in the life of Jesus or in the experience of His followers. Note the accurate chronology dealing with the rise of faith in the Apostolic circle (1-2:11), and with the Passion week (18-20). This Evangelist alone tells us of 'the barley loaves' (6:9, 13), that Mary 'fell down at his feet' (11:32), of 'the house filled with the fragrance of the ointment' (12:3). Note also such personal impressions as 13:24, 18:19. These touches

Again, it is evident that a selection has been made out of a number of incidents that were available (20<sup>30-31</sup>). Incidents related in detail in the Synoptics are implied (7<sup>42</sup> 3<sup>34</sup> 13<sup>32-33</sup>). Barabbas is mentioned without introduction, and the single comment, 'Now Barabbas was a robber,' is full of suppressed meaning (18<sup>40</sup>). The trial before Canaphas is not described. Two great miracles are related substantially as in the Synoptics (6<sup>1-21</sup>). Compare also the Anointing (12) and the Triumphal Entry (12<sup>1-11</sup>). The trial scenes and the Crucifixion correspond in the main with the Synoptics. The Denial of Peter gains in verisimilitude by being broken up into separate incidents. The Baptist's words in 3<sup>30</sup> are confirmed by Mt 9<sup>15</sup>. The Baptist's ministry is implied in 10<sup>40-41</sup>.

(2) The Evangelist describes himself not as a biographer, but as a 'witness.' He brings forward others as 'witnessing.' In 21<sup>24</sup>, if the order is significant, 'witnessing' is looked upon as of prior importance to 'writing.' A governing idea in the writer's mind is 'the truth,' which consists not in historical fact, but in having the mind brought into tune with the Divine facts of love and self-sacrifice. The miracles are not only actualities (ἔργα), they are also signs (σημεῖα). The Evangelist's mind is specially open to any suggestion of spiritual truth conveyed by the actual facts (e.g. 21<sup>1-17</sup>). Siloam is 'sent,' the sending forth of the waters being typical, perhaps, of the Christ sent of God (9<sup>7</sup>). Judas goes out of the light of the upper room 'into the night' (13<sup>30</sup>). 'It was winter' at the Feast of the Dedication (10<sup>6</sup>), symbolizing the storm of hatred and the chill of indifference that met the warmth of Jesus' love. The use made of the sign in 19<sup>35</sup> is also typical of the Evangelist's mind. The reflective character of the writing is seen in the frequent use of καὶ and οὐν as connective particles. He emphasizes on various occasions the doctrine of a higher purpose running through the history (e.g. 11<sup>51</sup>; cf. 'the hour,' 2<sup>4</sup> etc. 3<sup>27</sup> 19<sup>28</sup>). This idea of the sovereignty of God in events is found also in St. Paul, and is not represented in the Christian tradition solely by the Fourth Evangelist. There is also the frank confession that the disciples failed to understand some sayings and incidents at the time, and that only the Spirit, mediated through the teaching of events, revealed the hidden meaning (e.g. 2<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>16</sup>). This is in accordance with the abstract expression of the same idea in 14<sup>26</sup>.

It is impossible fully to understand the author's conception of history without taking into account his clear consciousness that the gift of the Spirit of Truth must be part of the equipment for writing such a narrative as this Gospel (14<sup>17</sup>, cf. 19<sup>35</sup> and the use of ἀληθείας). The theory of history that is exemplified in the Gospel is summed up in 15<sup>24-27</sup>. Even the situation of distress in the Church at the time he wrote finds its interpretation only in the prophetic words of Christ (14<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>).

With a conception of history so far removed from that of the mere chronicler, it is not surprising that the perspective of certain incidents (e.g. the Cleansing of the Temple) has been disturbed. There was a careful selection of those events in the life of Christ that were best fitted to illustrate in all their varying phases the belief and unbelief called forth by the Person and teaching of Jesus, but the Evangelist always starts with what he has seen (1<sup>14</sup>). There are some difficulties of sequence that would be removed by giving a different order to the narrative; e.g. 'Arise, let us go hence' (14<sup>31</sup>), where the discourse is resumed in ch. 15. Again, the discourse in 7<sup>15-26</sup> would be eminently in place at the end of ch. 5. These transpositions might have taken place through various causes after the document had left the writer's hands (see Bacon, Introduction, pp. 271-274).

2. The discourses. — There are differences in style and in length between the discourses of Christ in the Fourth Gospel and those in the Synoptics. At first sight they seem far removed in character. Yet nothing could be farther from the truth than to say that the personal contribution of the Evangelist in the discourses is more apparent than his desire to reproduce the exact words of Jesus, or that he makes use of the Synoptics in mechanical fashion. He has preserved one or two isolated sayings (1<sup>43</sup> 5<sup>38</sup> 6<sup>30</sup> 13<sup>31-33</sup> 20<sup>19</sup>) which are also found in the Synoptics, and the discourse in 5<sup>19-47</sup> contains many coincidences of word and thought with Mt 11<sup>2-10</sup>. (For other coincidences see Westcott, LXXVI). Yet there is no sufficient evidence to warrant the hypothesis that even in these cases the Evangelist was entirely dependent on the Synoptic narratives, although it is probable that he had them before him. Even the discourses of the Fourth Gospel, when reduced to their elements, are full of short and pregnant sayings, such as we are accustomed to connect with Christ (see a most suggestive collection in Drummond, op. cit. p. 16 ff.). Discourses much longer than any that are found in John are to be found in the Synoptics. It is true that the style of the discourses and the style of the Evangelist are practically identical, but that may be partly due to the fact that the words of Jesus have been translated from the Aramaic. The dialogue form is more fully represented in the Fourth Gospel than in the others, which would rather make for authenticity.

There are indications in the Gospel that the Evangelist is concerned to keep his own ideas separate from those of Christ. The actual Logos idea outlined in the Prologue is never put into the mouth of Christ except as underlying His words in certain cases. He keeps separate his own explanations of words of Christ (2<sup>19-21</sup> 12<sup>33</sup> 7<sup>39</sup>). What can only be an actual saying of Christ is represented as haunting the minds of the disciples in 16<sup>1-19</sup>. Again, in 12<sup>44-50</sup>, in the midst of a passage containing his own reflexions, there is a summary containing a free rendering of words of Christ that are repeated elsewhere in the Gospel; 14<sup>2</sup> would seem to indicate that the same ideas had been expressed before, and would be familiar to the disciples.

On the other hand, it is clear that it is not the concern of this Gospel to record the precise phrase that 'once . . . ruffled the air of Palestine.' 'The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life' (6<sup>63</sup>). At one point the disciples think they understand clearly the words they hear, but Jesus shows them their ignorance still (16<sup>29-30</sup>). The teaching by parables appears only as transformed into allegory. In 10<sup>1-18</sup> the image and the interpretation are inextricably intermingled. In some of the discourses the meaning is carried up to a certain point, and is then repeated like a motif, as though the Evangelist sought to express himself more clearly (e.g. the valedictory discourses). There are some cases where there is doubt as to where the words of Jesus end and the words of the Evangelist begin. It is conceivable that a more exact study of his language would afford us critical appliances more capable of detaching the two elements than those we now possess. Abbott, in his Johannine Grammar (2066b), has suggested that where γάρ is used as a connective it is an indication that the Evangelist is entering on his own words. This would certainly suit such cases as 3<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>21-23</sup> 26. 27. At the same time, whatever further grammatical study may reveal, we must be prepared to regard the Johannine tradition of the words of Christ as differing in many aspects from that of the Synoptics. On the other hand, affinities are found in earlier NT writings with the words of Christ as reported in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 1 P 5<sup>2-4</sup> and Jn 10<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>25</sup> and Jn 10<sup>16</sup>, also 1 P 1<sup>8-23</sup>, Ro 6<sup>10</sup> and Jn 8<sup>34</sup>; Gal 5<sup>17</sup> and Eph 2<sup>13a</sup> and Jn 10<sup>16</sup>; Ph 2<sup>5</sup> and Jn 10<sup>17</sup>), and in all probability the question of the historicity of the words of Christ is not a problem peculiar to the Fourth Gospel (see P. Ewald, Das Hauptproblem der Theologie with the Jews). The discourses have an abstract form that we should expect if they had often been orally repeated by the Evangelist in his preaching, before they were written down. The discourses themselves are definitely connected with historical situations, and may, in some cases, be the expansion of fragmentary reminiscences. On the other hand, the gaps in the thought seem sometimes to point to the fact that the problem is the same as in the Gospels on the Mount. The valedictory discourses have no doubt taken their continuous form through the welding together of recollections of the closing days, suggested by the desire to make plain to the early Church that her present condition of anxiety and distress was anticipated with solicitous forethought in the prophetic words of the Saviour. The prayer in ch 17 is the prayer of One who has become the Great High Priest of His Church and of humanity. There is no reason for denying that the mind of the writer had a place in the composition of these. The spiritual equipment of the Evangelist is the guarantee for the fidelity of his psychological attitude as a 'witness,' and we must be prepared to trust not only the man himself, but above all his peculiar and intimate knowledge of the mind of Christ. We may thus reverently examine the material of which his unique spiritual experience is composed, but may well refrain from dividing a seamless robe.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF (II : Contents).—1. Character of the Gospel.—The fragment of Eusebius (HE vi. 14), quoted in the 'lost Outlines' of Clement of Alexandria, gives us the earliest view which was taken of the Fourth Gospel. 'John, last, having observed that the bodily things had been set forth in the [earlier] Gospels and exhorted thereto by his friends, and inspired by the Spirit, proclaimed the Gospel.' The word 'spiritual,' or here, as usually with the Alexandrians, opposed to 'bodily,' or 'somatic.' And what the difference was, as regards the records of the past, is shown admirably by the comment on Jn 2<sup>12</sup>. He says that if all that is said is to be believed, the truth of them cannot be in their 'bodily characters,' but in their spiritual meaning. The Gospel, he says elsewhere (de Princ. 4), contain many things which are said to have happened, but which did not happen literally; and in one place of his Commentary on St John he says that when the writers of Holy Scripture were unable to speak the truth 'at once literally and bodily' (i.e. at once literally and in a deeper symbolical or allegorical meaning), it was their practice to prefer the spiritual to the corporeal, 'the true spiritual meaning being often preserved in the corporeal falsehood' (σωζομένου πολλάκις τοῦ ἀληθοῦς πνευματικῶ ἐν τῷ σωματικῷ ψευδεῖ). So Epiphanius says of St. John's Gospel: 'most of the things spoken by him were spiritual, the fleshly things having been already attested' (Hær. li. 19).

These passages are very important for the study of the Fourth Gospel. They are evidence, not, of course, for the author's method of composition but for what was thought of the Gospel in the latter part of the 2nd cent. and the first half of the 3rd, that is to say, as soon as it was widely known. It was accepted as 'a spiritual Gospel,' and by spiritual was meant, not devotional, ethical, and philosophical, but allegorical as opposed to barely historical.

The distinction between the two modes of treatment was familiar at Alexandria, and had been familiar long before the Fourth Gospel was written. Philo compares the literal meaning to the body, and the spiritual to the soul. He applies this exegetical principle to the OT narratives with great thoroughness. To the literal truth of ancient sacred history he is very indifferent. Particular events are important only in proportion to their universal significance. To grasp the truth of a narrative is to see its relation to universal spiritual law or fact. He would have considered the laborious investigation of historical detail to be merely le... only of a grammarian or a pedant. Moral... were the only objects for which it was at a... ble about the records of the past.

We have, of course, no right to assume that the 2nd cent. was right in classing the Fourth Gospel as a 'spiritual' work. We shall have to consider its allegorism in detail before we can pronounce on its relation to history. But it should be perfectly obvious that its author did not mean it to be studied as a plain historical narrative. He would probably have said that he had a higher aim than to record trivial details, some of which had no spiritual meaning. The Gospel is, and claims to be, an interpretation of our Lord's Person and ministry, an ideal construction which aims at producing a certain impression about the Person of Christ. This impression is to be the true interpretation of the historical Jesus—the author is infinitely anxious about this. He is writing no mere historical romance, like the Life of Apollonius of Tyana, which was afterwards concocted as a rival to the Gospels. He is no Docetist, as is shown by several passages in the Gospel, and more categorically in 1 John, which, if not by the same author, is in closest connexion with the Gospel. But a very slight critical investigation is enough to show that he allows himself a free hand in... its on which he is working.

... history, as history was understood. But even the most scientific of ancient historians did not scruple to put his own views of the political situation into the mouths of the chief characters in his period; and among the Jews the composer of a haggadah had no fear of being branded as a romancer or a forger.

The plan of the Gospel is clearly stated in 20<sup>30, 31</sup>, an impressive passage which was intended to be the conclusion of the book, and was so until the appendix was added. The object here avowed is strictly adhered to throughout. No other book of the NT is so entirely dominated by one conception. The theology of the Incarnation, taught in the form of a historical narrative, with an underlying framework of symbolism and allegory, which, though never obtruded, determines the whole arrangement and selection of incidents—this is the topic of the Fourth Gospel. And unless it is read in the light of this purpose, and with a due recognition of the peculiar method, the seven seals of the Apocalypse will remain set upon the 'spiritual Gospel.'

Different opinions have been held as to the readers whom the writer has mainly in view. Réville thinks that 'the author has wished to prove to his contemporaries—who had remained in the liberal and philosophical Judaism of the Diaspora, that, in Jesus Christ, the revelation of the Logos, admitted by them in the OT, has its full and definitive fulfilment.' But the Gospel is not an apologia written for the Jews. The extremely unconciliatory tone, used throughout in speaking of them, is enough to disprove this hypothesis. There is a subordinate element of apologetic, but the main object is clearly to edify and teach the faithful, not to convert the unbeliever. The author never descends to his opponents' ground, but remains throughout on his own. His aim is didactic, but not exactly dogmatic. He wishes, not to prove a theological thesis, but to confirm and perfect the believer in his adhesion to Christ as the Incarnate Word, the principle of spiritual regeneration, and the nourishment of 'eternal' life. This is the foundation of his own faith, and the characteristic Johannine ideas are the intellectual form of this faith, which is centred in the unio mystica. There is no sign of a... Ebionism, or against Cerinthus. Still less is it warring against liberalized Judaism, as Réville seems to suggest. Whatever was his attitude towards Philo (and the question is not an easy one to answer), it was not one of conscious... for Christians. But for what Christians? It has often been maintained or assumed that his object is to teach a philosophy of religion—that he is, in fact, the author of the formula 'Jesus Christ, the promised Messiah of the Jews, is the Incarnate Logos of God.' But this view is untenable. There is no systematic philosophy in the Gospel—not even in the Prologue. And besides, the Logos theology was not new. It is not propounded as new in the Gospel; and it exists in substance in St. Paul's Epistles, as well as in the Hebrews. There can be little doubt that Apollonius, the learned Jew of Alexandria, made this identification in his preaching, which was so... For at this time 'Logos' was... a term to all educated persons as 'Evolution' is to our own generation.

The Gospel is not a philosophical treatise. Is it, then, an attempt to mediate between two parties in the Church, between the advocates of 'Faith' and 'Knowledge,' of Gnosis and Pistis? The conflict between these two parties was acute at the end of the 2nd cent., as we see from the caution imposed upon Clement of Alexandria by conservative prejudice, and on the other side by the diatribes of the obscurantist Tertullian against... At that period Gnosticism had... within the Church, and orthodoxy had become alive to the dangers which threatened the Christian religion from this side. The intellectualists were even strong enough to drive Montanism out of the Church. During the first quarter of the 2nd cent. the great Gnostics were outside the Church, and the chief danger was that the party of ψυχισμός, ignorant and superstitious, with materialistic notions of religion and hopes of a coming reign of the saints, might make the position of the Christian philosopher impossible, and drive him into the arms of the Gnostics. Moreover, at the time when the Gospel was written, the inadequacy of both presentations of Christianity was becoming apparent. The... the hopes of a... on the other hand, Docetism and the fantastic schemes of the Gnostic party were visibly tending to discard the Gospel in favour of a barbarized Platonism. The author of this Gospel interposed his powerful influence to save Christianity from being either swamped in a mythology or sublimated into a theosophy. 'The Jews' demanded miracles, 'the Greeks' a philosophy; (his Gospel, like St. Paul, presents both with Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God' (1 Co 1<sup>22-24</sup>). The author addresses himself chiefly to the Faith-party, who most needed teaching. He tries to recall them to real history, by subtly spiritualizing the miraculous narratives, to which they attributed too much importance, and bringing out their moral and spiritual significance. He never makes the slightest attempt to rationalize a miracle,—on the contrary, the miracles which he records are more startling than anything in the Synoptics,—but no stress is laid on any physical potency as momentous in and for itself, or as evidence, apart from its symbolical value as a type of the Person, work, and office of Christ. This design of spiritualizing the tradition is kept in view throughout; but it is carried out so subtly and quietly that it has often been overlooked.

A glance at one of the old-fashioned 'Harmonies' of the four Gospels makes us realize how few of the even Lord's life, before the last few days, are recorded by the Synoptists and also by St. John. And even the few common elements are employed differently, and in different settings. There are notable and irreconcilable differences in the chronology, including, as is well known, a discrepancy as to the date of the Crucifixion. The development of Christ's mission is differently conceived, the Johannine Christ making the most exalted claims to equality with the Father near the beginning of His career, and in the presence of His enemies (2<sup>19</sup> 6<sup>40</sup> 8<sup>58</sup> etc.), whereas in the Synoptics the question and answer at Cæsarea Philippi are clearly intended to be of crucial importance (Mt 16<sup>18ff.</sup> ||). The form and substance of the discourses are also very different, the Christ of the Synoptics speaking as a man to men, as a Jew to Jews, conveying His message in pithy aphorisms, easily understood and remembered, and in homely parables, adapted to the comprehension of country folk. These discourses are directed rather to bringing men to the Father, and to righteousness and consistency of life, than to expounding any doctrines about His own Person; synopsis. He expresses His attachment to the Law, and repudiates any intention of abrogating it. Our Evangelist, on the other hand, represents Jesus as taking part in long polemical disputations with 'the Jews,' who are as much His enemies as they were the enemies of the Christian Church 80 years later; the parables have disappeared, and their place is taken by 'proverbs' or symbolic language; and, above all, His whole teaching is centred upon faith in and devotion to Himself. The emphatic ἐγώ occurs 15 times in St. Matthew, 117 times in St. John. Many facts to which our Evangelist attaches great importance are completely strange to the Synoptists. Such are the marriage in Cana of Galilee, with which the public ministry opens; the conversation with the Samaritan woman; the healing of the paralytic at the pool of Bethesda; the incident of the man born blind; the raising of Lazarus, which in St. John's Gospel appears to have been the immediate cause of the plot against the life of Jesus; the washing of the disciples' feet at the Last Supper; the conversation with Pilate at the trial; the presence of the beloved disciple and Mary at the Cross; the appearance to Thomas after the Resurrection. On the other hand, the writer of the Fourth Gospel omits the genealogy and the birth from a virgin, because it could be of no interest to him to prove that Jesus (or rather Joseph) was descended from king David, and the Incarnation of the Logos is a far grander conception than a miraculous birth by the operation of the Holy Ghost; he omits the Baptism of Jesus, of which notwithstanding he shows because, again, the true Logos is the Logos in Jesus, partly, because he is anxious to discountenance views of the Person of Christ which were prevalent at the time when he wrote; he omits the Temptation, because it is no part of his plan to exhibit Jesus as expending any temptation or weakness; he omits the Transfiguration because in his view the whole life of Christ on earth is a manifestation of His glory, not by visible light but to the spiritual eye; he omits the institution of the Eucharist, because he has already given his sacramental doctrine in his discourse about the Bread of Life (Jn 6<sup>28ff.</sup>), following the miracle of the 5000, and does not wish the truth of the mystical union to be bound up too closely with the participation in an ecclesiastical rite; he omits the Agony in the Garden of Gethsemane and the cry, 'Eli, Eli, lama abachthan,' because the impression which he wishes to convey of the complete voluntariness of Christ's sufferings and death, and of the 'glory' which was manifested by His humiliation as well as by His triumph over death, might be impaired by incidents which seem to indicate human weakness and hesitation; and, lastly, he omits the Ascension and the descent of the Paraclete, because he does not wish the withdrawal of Christ's bodily presence, and the continuation of the Incarnation in another more spiritual form, to be associated with physical portents, or to be assigned to particular days.

There can be no question that these omissions are deliberate, and not the result of ignorance. Those who wish to discredit any of the narratives which appear in the Synoptics cannot rightly draw any inferences from St. John's silence. Such features of the Christian tradition as the Birth at Bethlehem and the Ascension must have been well known by any well-instructed Christian at the beginning of the 2nd cent., and there are no signs that our Evangelist wishes to correct his predecessors from the standpoint of one who has had access to better information. Not only are incidents like the Baptism referred to incidentally (1<sup>32</sup>), but an attempt is made to substitute for several of the omitted *Instead of the Davidic ancestry of Joseph, we have the eternal generation of the μονογενής; instead of the Lord's Prayer, taught to the disciples, we have the High-Priestly prayer of ch. 17, in which almost every clause of the Lord's Prayer is *ough in each case, except the last ('the evil one'), the petition is changed into a statement that the work has been done, the boon conferred. The institution of Baptism is *discourses with Nicodemus at woman; that of the Eucharist by the miracle in ch. 6 and the discourse on the Bread of Life which follows it. The Transfiguration is represented by the voice from heaven in 12<sup>35</sup>; while the preceding verse (which should be printed as a question, 'Shall I say, Father, save me from this hour?') is intended to compensate us for the loss of the Agony in the Garden. Lastly, the words to Thomas in 20<sup>28</sup>—the last beatitude—more than reconcile us to the loss of any description of the Ascension.

The number of miracles is much reduced; but those which are given are representative, and in some cases are more tremendous than those of the healing of the son of Herod's only miracle which has the true Synoptic ring; in the others no 'faith' is required in those who are to benefit by the sign, and the object seems to be to manifest some aspect of Christ's Person and work. In the marriage at Cana, the feeding of the multitude, the healing of the blind man, and the raising of Lazarus, the Evangelist himself tells us the spiritual meaning of the miracle, in words spoken either by the Lord Himself or by some one else.

There is, however, a great deal of symbolism in the Gospel which is unexplained by the author, and unnoticed by the large majority of his readers. The message *to us, and we do not look out for *would be at once understood by Alexandrians in the 2nd century. A few examples are necessary, to justify the view here taken that symbolism or allegorism pervades the whole Gospel. In 1<sup>29</sup> John the Baptist designates Christ 'the Lamb of God,' with clear reference to the Paschal sacrifice. The prophetic type of the Paschal lamb dominates the whole of the Passion narrative in St. John. Even the date, it would appear, is altered, in order that Christ may die on the day when the Paschal lambs were killed. The change of the 'reed' of the Synoptics to 'hyssop' seems to have been made with the same object, when we remember the ritual use of hyssop at the Passover. The Gospel abounds in enigmatic utterances, such as 'Thou hast kept the good wine until now' (2<sup>10</sup>); 'It is expedient that one man should die for the people' (11<sup>50</sup>); 'Judas went immediately out, and it was night' (13<sup>30</sup>); in which the reader is plainly meant to see a double meaning. The symbolism is often in three stages. The text presents an apparent sense, which is in figure a second, which in turn points to a third and still deeper signification. . . . in the narrative, a prophetic utterance . . . the OT is sometimes the intermediate stage in this allegorical construction. The type of the Paschal lamb comes as it were between the literal feeding of the 5000 and the idea that Christ gives His life to take away the sin of the world, and that He may be our spiritual food and sustenance. The words quoted from the Psalms, 'the zeal of thy house shall eat me up,' come in like manner between the cleansing of the Temple at Jerusalem and the idea of the glorification of Jesus as the building of the true Temple, the body of Christ, the Church. There are, we might venture to say, three temples in the mind of the Evangelist—the material temple built by Herod, the temple of Christ's natural body, which was to be destroyed and raised up 'in three days,' and the temple which is the spiritual body of Christ—namely, the Church. Similarly, in 7<sup>38</sup>, the quotation, 'out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water,' comes, as it were, between the thrust of the lance and the effusion of the Holy Spirit on the disciples and the Church.

But the most remarkable part of the allegoric method is that connected with numbers. There can be no doubt, in the opinion of the present writer, that the Philonic method of playing with numbers had a strong fascination for our Evangelist. The examples are far too numerous to be accidental. The number 7 recurs in the number of the miracles (omitting ch. 21 from our calculations), in the number of solemn declarations beginning 'I am'; in the number of 'witnesses' borne to Christ, and perhaps in other places. The officer's son is healed at the seventh hour; the paralytic on the seventh day. It is thoroughly in accordance with the method of the Philonic that he avoids the word ἑπτά, just as he avoids the two crucial words γένος and πίστις, which had become watchwords of parties. As for the number 3, perhaps too much ingenuity has been shown in cutting up the whole Gospel into arrangements of 3; but unquestionably the book does lend itself very readily to such classification, and the fact that it is concealed rather than obtruded is in accordance with what seems to have been the method and design of the writer. With regard to higher numbers, the extreme precision of the Evangelist must excite suspicion of an allegorical motive; and when we find that 38, 46, and 153 can be plausibly explained on Philonic principles, the suspicion becomes almost a certainty. For example, the 153 fish may be the 'fulfilment' of  $10+7; 1+2+3+ . . . +17=153$ ; or, as Bishop Wordsworth suggests, it may be the square of 12+the square of 3. It is said that 200 (Peter is 200 cubits from the land) signifies, in the Philonian lore, repentance. The 'forty-six years' since the beginning of the building of the Temple may possibly be connected with the age assigned to Jesus ('not yet fifty years old'); it has been suggested that the Evangelist wishes to make Him seven times seven years old at the Crucifixion; but this is very doubtful. The frequent use of number-symbolism in the Gospel is more certain than the correctness of particular interpretations. These interpretations would occur readily to the 'Gnostic' of the 2nd cent.; to us they must be guesswork.

Some have objected to this discovery of allegory in the Gospel, that the allegorist always tries to attract attention to his symbols, whereas St John clearly does not, but conceals them so carefully that the large majority of his readers do not even suspect their existence. This sounds plausible. But the question really is whether the Evangelist has not done all that he need have done in order to be understood by those among his first readers who knew his method. It is not suggested that he meant for all to understand. The Gnostics, those who valued the 'Gnosis', that it must not be profaned by being explained. I this conviction in Philo, and very strongly in Clement of Alexandria, who, as a Christian, is important evidence. He says that to put the spiritual exegesis before the common people is like giving a sword to a child to play with. He will not write all that he knows, because of 'the Gnostics' that it may get into wrong hands. There are some 'Gnostics' which can only be safely imparted orally. . . . on to think that he abandoned his project of putting the coping-stone on his theological works by a book of an esoteric character, because a published treatise cannot be confined to those who ought to read it. Since, then, the existence of the symbolic method, and the . . . concealing it from the ordinary reader, are both . . . is nothing strange in the veiled symbolism which we have found to characterize this Gospel.

The Evangelist writes throughout for two classes of readers—for the simpliciores who would be satisfied by the narrative in its plain sense, and for the 'Gnostic,' who could read between the lines without difficulty. And yet he wishes all his readers to rise towards a spiritual understanding. Again and again he puts the key in the lock—in such solemn utterances as 'I am the Bread of Life—the Light of the World—the Resurrection and the Life.' His own word for the allegoric method is 'proverb' (παροιμία). Up to the end of the last discourse, Jesus has spoken to His disciples in proverbs; but the time was coming (after the withdrawal of His 'disciples') in which, through the medium of the 'Gnostics', He should no more speak to them in proverbs, but should show them plainly of the Father. The proverb is different from the Synoptic παράβολον, which is a story with a religious and moral application—a story which has a complete sense in itself, apart from the lesson, which is generally conveyed by the story as a whole, and not by the detail. St. John, however, tries to keep the historical παροιμία in which Jesus actually taught. . . . himself, he half substitutes the Alexandrian and Philonic allegory for the Synoptic parable. The double sense runs all through the narrative. Whenever the Johannine Christ begins to teach—whether His words are addressed to Nicodemus, the Samaritan woman, 'the Jews,' or His own 'disciples'—He nearly always begins by enunciating a παροιμία which contains, under a sensible and symbolic image, a religious truth. The auditor regularly misunderstands Him, interpreting literally what should have been easily perceived to be a metaphor. This gives Jesus an opportunity to develop His allegory, and, in so doing, to instruct the reader, if not the original hearer of the discourse, whom once or twice (as in ch. 3) the Evangelist seems to have quite forgotten. The Johannine Christ loves words which, at any rate in Greek, have a double sense, such as ἀναγεννᾶν, πνεῦμα, λόγος (cf. esp. 10<sup>31-38</sup>). Whether the very numerous cases where a verb may be indicative or imperative are intentionally ambiguous, it is not easy to say. The symbolism reaches its height in some of the discourses to the Jews; the last discourses to the disciples are more plain, and in ch. 17, which is the climax of the teaching of the Gospel, the mystical union is expounded with much directness.

One of the most difficult problems in connexion with the classes of readers for whom the Gospel was intended is presented by certain explanations introduced by the Evangelist. The chief of these are 2<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>64</sup> 65 7<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>27</sup> 12<sup>38</sup> 18<sup>9</sup>. These explanations seem to us at times superficial and unworthy of their context. We cannot be surprised that they have given force to partition-theories like that of Wendt, who maintains that the discourses are on a higher intellectual and spiritual level than could be within the compass of the author of parts of the narrative. The difficulties in the way of partition-theories seem to be insuperable. A more plausible hypothesis is that the Evangelist deliberately introduced these childlike observations for the benefit of the simpliciores, trusting to the educated reader being able to divine his purpose. But this theory is not very satisfactory. We have seen that St. John is able to see as many as three meanings in a simple occurrence. And so he may have felt that 'the Temple' might mean Christ's natural body as well as the stone building and the Church of Christ, which last must have been mainly in his mind when he foresaw the downfall of the Jewish sanctuary and all which it represented.

The style of the Fourth Gospel is as different from that of the Synoptics as the matter. Instead of the variety which we find in them, we have a small number of essential 'images' repeated again and again under a small number of images. From this results a strange commonness in mystical writings, which is a peculiarity, though to some readers the monotony appears tedious and inartistic. The discourses of Christ have a sweet and melancholy charm, with an indescribable dignity. They all hang the luminous in which mystery seems clear, but is mysterious. The phraseology is Hebraic, not Greek; in the Prologue we have a species of rhythm which recalls the old prophets, and in many places we find the parallelism of Hebrew poetry. The arrangement is that of the writer's own thought, not chronological. The appearance of detailed accuracy is not, as has often been seriously argued, a proof of first-hand knowledge, but is due to the vividness of the mental images. The numbers, as has been said, seem often to have a symbolic meaning; the figures, such as Nicodemus and the Greeks who asked for an introduction to Jesus, disappear from the writer's mind as soon as the point is made. No difference can be detected between the style of the various speakers, or between the discourses of Christ and the Evangelist's own comments.

2. Theology of the Gospel.—The first question which meets us is the relation of the Prologue to the rest of the Gospel. Harnack, whose antipathy to the Logos theology apparently influences his judgment, suggests that the Prologue was merely prefixed to the narrative in order to 'show the Greeks in favour of the views which the Evangelist held'. But the views which do not really at all agree with the Logos philosophy as they understood it.

'The Prologue brings in conceptions which were familiar to the Greeks, and enters into these more deeply than is justified by the presentation which follows; for it is not one of the incarnate Logos is by no means the dominant theme of the Gospel. Though faint echoes of the Platonic philosophy are met with here and there in the Gospel, it is essentially that of the Son of God, who obediently executes what the Father has shown and appointed Him' (ZThK ii. 189 ff.).

This strangely perverse judgment has evoked protests from several critics who understand the Gospel better than Harnack, among others from Réville, who has certainly no bias in favour of traditional views. It would be easy to show that every one of the dogmatic statements in the Prologue is reasserted in the body of the Gospel. For the pre-existence of the Logos, beyond time, in personal relation to, and in essential union with, God, cf. 6<sup>52</sup> 8<sup>58</sup> 14<sup>10</sup> 17<sup>5</sup>.<sup>24</sup> For the Logos as the Agent in creation, and its life-giving and sustaining principle, cf. 5<sup>26</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>5</sup>. (From the nature of the subject-matter, there is not much cosmological teaching in the Gospel; but what there is, is in full accordance with the Prologue.) For manifestations of the Logos before the Incarnation, by revelations and by His immanent presence, cf. 8<sup>56</sup> and 9<sup>5</sup>, 'whenever I am in the world,' etc. There is thus chapter and verse in the Gospel, and in Christ's own words, for every statement in the Prologue; and though Jesus never calls Himself the Logos, this sublime conception of His personality pervades the whole narrative. The stumbling-block to Harnack and others has been what some critics (e.g. Beyschlag and Réville) have called the 'contradictory double theology' of the Gospel. By the side of a 'theology' of Christ's Person which seems to class Him as a speculative mystic or Gnostic, we have statements which seem to belong to the school of Christianity which was dominated by Jewish positivism. Such doctrines are the actual 'becoming flesh' of the Logos, as opposed to a theophany under human form; and the repeated mention of 'the Last Day,' a conception with which, as Reuss says, 'mystical theology has no concern.' But the Evangelist does not write or think as a philosopher. The supreme merit of his book as a Gospel is that he does not write the life of Christ as a Christian Platonist might have been tempted to write it, but keeps a firm hold on the historical Jesus, and on the concrete facts in His teaching. There is, undoubtedly, a double thread of thought indicated. In some parts of the narrative we feel that 'tabernacled among us' is a truer description of the character of the Johannine Christ than 'became flesh'. There is an aloofness, a solitary grandeur, about the central figure which prevents Him from seeming fully human; while in other places there is an approximation to the 'fleshly' portrait. But it is only to the minute details that these difficulties become apparent. To the religious consciousness of Christendom there has never been any hesitation in recognizing the profound agreement between the Synoptic and the Johannine presentations of Jesus Christ. See, further, art. LOGOS.

The intense ethical dualism of the Fourth Gospel is another perplexing phenomenon to those who look for philosophical consistency in a religious treatise. Christian Platonism, into which the Logos theology passed as its most important ingredient, seems to leave no room for a personal devil, or for human beings who are children of the devil. It seems rather to favour the conception of evil as mere privatio boni. St. John, however, is quite unconscious of any such difficulty. Although the Logos is the immanent cause of all life, so that 'without him nothing whatever came into being,' the 'darkness' in which the light shines is no mere absence of colour, but a positive malignant thing, a rival kingdom which has its own subjects and its own sphere. Some critics have even been reminded of the metaphysical dualism of Manichæan speculation. This last, however, is in too flagrant contradiction with the Logos theology to effect a lodgment in the Evangelist's mind. The Logos is the true light which lighteth every man as it comes into the world. But since the philosophical problem is not present to the mind of the writer, he is not careful to draw the line between the ethical dualism which was part of his religious experience, and the metaphysical dualism which would have subverted the foundations of his intellectual system. The sources of this ethical dualism may be found partly in the spiritual struggles of an intensely devout nature, but to a greater extent, probably, in the furious antagonism of Judaism to nascent Christianity, a hostility which, to a Christian, must have seemed really diabolical. The temper of his own age was unconsciously transferred to the ministry of Jesus, who certainly could not have adopted the attitude of uncompromising antagonism to 'the Jews' which we find in this Gospel. But it is worthy of note that some of the devotional literature of later times, which shows the closest affinity with Johannine ideas,—the Theologia Germanica is a particularly good example,—displays the same extreme ethical dualism as the Gospel. Stockl, in criticising the Theologia Germanica from the standpoint of modern Romanism, finds in it the 'Gnostic dualism' which, with equal justice, he might have detected in parts of the Fourth Gospel. In neither the one nor the other does the distinction correspond with the Gnostic division of mankind into pneumatic and psychic, with an impassable gulf between them. Compare, e.g., the Evangelist's use of 'the world' in 15<sup>19</sup>.

(1) Doctrine of God the Father.—According to the logic of the system it has often been said, God should always have been Himself through the Logos. No man hath seen or heard God at any time (1<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>37</sup> 6<sup>46</sup>). So Philo holds that there can be no immediate communication between God, who is transcendent and unknowable, and the world. Nevertheless, it is impossible to impose this philosophical idea upon St. John. His God is not the unknowable 'One' of the later Platonism. He is Spirit (4<sup>24</sup>), that is, on the negative side, He is non-material, not appreciable by sense, spaceless and timeless. Yet He is not darkness, but Light; and light includes the ideas of radiation and illumination. Further yet, He is Love. He loves the world. As loving the world, He is the principle of action, the principle of the activity of the Logos. He is the Father, who 'draws' men to Himself. Several other passages (e.g. 5<sup>17</sup> 21 9<sup>29</sup>) imply independent direct action by the Father. Still, we must not over-emphasize this as a proof of the Evangelist's disagreement with Philo. Philo, no doubt, could not acknowledge an Incarnation; but the idea of theophanies was naturally very familiar to him from his OT studies. There is nothing un-Philonic in the 'voice from heaven' (12<sup>28</sup>). Philo, too, speaks of 'a voice formed in the air, not coming from any animate body.'

(2) Doctrine of the Holy Spirit.—The dualism of Flesh and Spirit in St. John is one expression of the ethical dualism of which we have spoken above. It is very clearly set forth in the conversation with Nicodemus, when Christ says that no one can see the Kingdom of God unless he be born from above (or afresh). This He explains by repeating, that unless a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot see the Kingdom of God. 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.' This regeneration by water and the Spirit is the birth from above, not a simple moral renovation, but a real communication of the Divine Spirit. Natural generation is only a feeble image of this supernatural generation, which, says Loisy (perhaps too boldly, in the absence of any expression of this thought in the Gospel), 'is attached to the same order as the Incarnation of the Word.' St. John does not draw this comparison; but he says of the elect that they 'were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God' (1<sup>13</sup>). The sphere of the Spirit forms a world opposed to the world of the flesh. What is the content of this world of Spirit? The world of God is Spirit, the world of Spirit is the world of God, and partakes of the Divine attributes. It is absolute and indestructible; the Father 'hath life in himself,' and has given this absolute life to the Son also. Even so the Son can transmit it, 'quickening whom he will.' The Spirit quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing: it was to communicate to men a life which they have not naturally, that the Word became incarnate. This gift of spiritual life is figured as 'the bread from heaven' and 'the living water,' symbols which, as the Evangelist was far from forgetting, are the outward and visible signs in the two great Sacraments. The Divine gift is also typified as Light and Truth, words which imply an illumination of the intellect. So in 17<sup>3</sup> life eternal is defined as the knowledge of (or rather, the process of knowing) the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom He sent. Thus advancing knowledge is the highest form of life. Those who 'are of the truth' listen to the words of Christ; but the contemptuous or careless question of Pilate, 'What is truth?' receives no answer. The truth also 'makes us free'; it breaks the yoke of sin. In opposition to this higher world, St. John develops the idea of the cosmos, which is the direct opposite of the Spirit. It has only the semblance of life; he who has been redeemed has passed from death into life' (5<sup>24</sup>). It is therefore possible to call the devil the prince of this world; although the passage from the kingdom of the world to that of the Spirit is open (3<sup>17</sup> and 17). Jesus Christ, who has full possession of the Spirit, is come to raise men from the sphere of the world into that of the Spirit. Thus, the Johannine soteriology contemplates an enrichment, not a restoration, of human nature. The Evangelist regards sin as essentially a failure to recognize the Divine in the world. Those to whom the light has not been brought are blind, but not guilty: those to whom it has appeared, and who turn their backs upon it, are the typical sinners. From henceforth, these lovers of darkness are doomed to destruction (ἀπώλεια), when Jesus shall 'overcome the world' as a triumphant conqueror.

The relations of the Spirit to the Logos are difficult to define. What, for example, was the office of the Spirit in the world before the Incarnation? Life, as we know, was immanent in the Logos: there seems to be no room for another πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν. The descent of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus at His baptism is referred to in St. John, but not described. To him, the Baptism could have no such importance as it appears to have in the Synoptic record. The Spirit was given to Christ 'without measure' from the first.

During the ministry we do not hear much of the Spirit. St. John tells us bluntly (7<sup>39</sup>) that 'There was as yet no Spirit, because Jesus was not yet glorified.' Instead of the Spirit, we have the power ascribed to the words which are spoken of in the same sort of way in which Philo speaks of the λόγοι and δυνάμεις. Jesus insists that the words are not His own, but come from God (3<sup>34</sup> and several other places). The words are, of course, inoperative, unless they are received and taken into the heart: but if they are so received, they will abide in the heart as a living and spiritual principle (15<sup>7</sup> 6<sup>64</sup>). 'He that keepeth my words shall never see death,' says Jesus (8<sup>51</sup>); and St. Peter exclaims, 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life' (6<sup>68</sup>): that is to say, not words about eternal life, but words which confer eternal life, as in 8<sup>51</sup>. Of the disobedient, He says, 'The word which I have spoken will judge him at the last day' (12<sup>48</sup>); and to His disciples, 'He that heareth my words hath life: he shall not see death unto life' (5<sup>4</sup>). 'Now ye are witnesses of the word that I have spoken unto you: the word or words would thus seem to exercise all the functions of the Paraclete. But they must not be identified; for the words were addressed to all who heard them; the Paraclete was given only to the faithful disciples. Moreover, the ministry of the Spirit, properly speaking, begins only after the glorification of Jesus Christ. Remembering that the Johannine theology implies a Trinitarian doctrine of equality and oneness between the three Persons of the Trinity, we may still say that the office of the Son, during the period of His sojourn on earth, was to reveal the Father, while the office of the Holy Spirit was, and is, to reveal the Son.

St John takes no interest in purely speculative or dogmatic questions, and therefore he does not trouble himself about such questions as the office of the Holy Spirit, as distinguished from that of the Logos, before the Incarnation. From the practical point of view it is possible to say, as he does, that 'there was as yet no Spirit' before Jesus was glorified. After this glorification, although the action of the Holy Spirit is often represented as that of Christ Himself returning to His own, there is a difference between the mode of action of the Incarnate Christ and that of the Holy Spirit. Not only is the former external, the latter internal; but the Incarnate Christ addressed Himself to all who came into contact with Him, and was obliged to adapt His teaching to the limited intelligence of His auditors. The Paraclete is a principle of spiritual life in the hearts of believers, on whom He acts directly and without intermediary. His work consists in glorifying Christ, bearing witness to Him and continuing His work of revelation. It is quite useless to ask whether, for St John, the Paraclete is a distinct hypostasis in the Godhead. The category of personality is quite foreign to the Evangelist, as to his whole school, and no answer to such a question can be drawn from his words. The Evangelist does not speculate about the relation of the Spirit to the Father, who 'sends' Him. The expression 'God is Spirit' (not 'the Spirit') expresses, so to speak, the quality of the Divine nature; it does not assert the identity of the Father and the Holy Ghost, any more than θεός ἦν ὁ λόγος in the Prologue asserts such an identity between the First and Second Persons. The Evangelist is much more concerned with the relation of the Paraclete to Christ. This indeed is one of the dominating thoughts of the Fourth Gospel. Jesus 'gives' with the Holy Ghost' (1<sup>39</sup>); that is to say, the gift of the Holy Ghost is an end of the ministry of Jesus. A very important passage is 14<sup>17</sup>, in which Jesus says that the world cannot receive the Paraclete 'because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; because he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.' The words 'dwelleth with you' must refer to the presence of Jesus Himself, who has received the Spirit in absolutely full measure, in the midst of His disciples: after His departure the Spirit 'shall be in you,' a condition which did not yet exist at the time when the words were spoken. This gift was, in a manner, communicated when, after the Resurrection, Jesus breathed on the disciples and said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost.' But it would be quite foreign to the thought of the Gospel to attach importance to the physical 'insufflation' as the vehicle of the gift of the Holy Ghost. The gift would follow in response to the prayer of Christ (14<sup>16</sup>). He would be sent in Christ's name (14<sup>26</sup>). Jesus Himself will send Him (15<sup>26</sup>). After the gift has come, when the disciples have entered into the sphere of the Spirit they will still look to Christ as the principle of their life. He will still be the true Vine, of which they are the branches. It is even possible for Him to promise, 'I will see you again'—certainly not with reference to the appearances after the Resurrection, but to the spiritual vision which has nothing to do with bodily presence (16<sup>16-23</sup>). So when He says, 'I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it' (17<sup>26</sup>), the intention does not refer to any future discourses with the disciples on earth, before or after His Passion, but to the relations which will exist between Him and them under the dispensation of the Spirit. The expressions 'we will come unto him, and make our abode with him' (14<sup>23</sup>); and 'I will come again and receive you unto myself' (14<sup>3</sup>), have the same meaning, though in the latter passage there may be a special reference to the 'coming' of Christ at the death of each believer. There is no reference in St. John to such a picture as that drawn by St Paul in 1 Co 15. In Jn 16<sup>13</sup> there is a remarkable statement about the Paraclete, that 'he shall not speak of himself . . . he shall take of mine and shall show it unto you.' The relation of the Paraclete to Christ is thus exactly the same as that between Christ and the Father (cf 5<sup>30</sup> 6<sup>38</sup> etc).

But the special office of the Spirit in the world begins with Christ's departure from earth. The death of Christ, in St. John, has not the same significance as in the Pauline theology. St John even shrinks from the idea of death in connexion with the incarnate Logos. 'The death of Christ,' says Reuss, 'in the Johannine theology, is an exaltation, not an abasement.' 'The end of the ministry of Christ,' says Réville, 'is not, properly speaking, His death. His death is in reality a deliverance.' The redemptive element in the death of Christ is not His suffering, but His glorification. And yet we must not forget that the idea of sacrifice, and of Christ as the true Paschal Lamb, is frequently in the mind of the Evangelist. It appears not only in the 'testimony' . . . of the Baptist (1<sup>29-36</sup>), but in the High-Priestly prayer, where the words 'for their sakes I consecrate myself' (17<sup>19</sup>), have a definitely sacrificial meaning. This doctrine was part of the Christian tradition, which St. John accepts heartily . . . to bring it into line with his . . . It is, however, true to say that it is by His life, and not by His death, that the Johannine Christ gives life to the world. 'Because I live, ye shall live also' (14<sup>19</sup>). The principle of life within them will be the Holy Spirit. As Paraclete, He will be their defender and helper against all adversaries, ghostly and bodily. He will also be their Comforter (we cannot wonder that some have defended this meaning of Paraclete); He will change their sorrow into joy, as a grain of wheat dies only to live again, or as a woman, when she is in travail, exchanges her pain for joy that a man is born into the world; He will guide them into all truth—a word which in St. John has a predominantly moral significance. His action on the unbelieving world is one of 'conviction' (ἐλέγχει, 16<sup>8</sup>—a Philonic expression, of somewhat obscure meaning. St. John does not seem to contemplate any direct action of the Holy Spirit, except in the hearts of the faithful. . . . Him in the Anglican Catechism, . . . of all the elect people of God,' is quite Johannine; but indirectly He will show in their true colours, and condemn, those who are the enemies of Jesus Christ. See, further, art HOLY SPIRIT, 14 (b).

3. Scheme of the Fourth Gospel.—After the Prologue begins a section of the Gospel which may be called 'The Testimony.' We have first the testimony of John the Baptist, then of the disciples, then of 'signs'—the miracle at Cana. The Evangelist next describes how Jesus manifests Himself, first in Judæa, then in Samaria, and thirdly in Galilee. But another thread seems to run through these chapters, which also lends itself to the arrangement in triplets. We might call these first chapters the doctrine of Water. First we have the water of the Law superseded by the wine of the Gospel, typified by the changing of the water into wine at the marriage-feast; next we have the water of purification mentioned in the discourse with Nicodemus; and thirdly, the water of life, the nature of which is expounded in the dialogue with the woman of Samaria. In ch. 5 begins the second of the three great divisions of the book, which should be called the Conflict or κρίσις. After two more 'signs' a prolonged controversy with the Jews is described, in which the divergence between Christ and the hierarchy becomes more and more acute, till the final catastrophe is seen to be inevitable. The tension comes to breaking point after the final 'sign,' and the end of Christ's public ministry. It is at this point that the unstable 'multitude' quits the scene with the significant question, unanswered like that of Pilate, 'Who is this Son of Man?' (12<sup>34</sup>). In these chapters also a subordinate thread may be discovered in the doctrine of Bread (ch. 6), the doctrine of Light (ch. 8), and the doctrine of Life (the transit through death into life a spiritual law). The third part of the Gospel may be called the Revelation. Jesus reveals Himself to His disciples in a series of esoteric discourses, addressed to them only, in view of His approaching departure from them. This section culminates in the High-Priestly prayer (ch. 17). Then follows the narrative of the Passion, conceived throughout as the glorification of Christ through self-chosen suffering. The humiliation and sacrifice, no less than the triumph of death, are part of the δόξα. This part of the Gospel ends with the appearance to Thomas, and the 'last beatitude.' Ch. 21 is an epilogue.

4. Characteristic Words in the Fourth Gospel.

—(1) Life (ζωή).—In the Prologue an interesting and rather important question of punctuation arises in connexion with this word. Ought we to read with AV ζωὴς αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο οὐδὲ ἐν ὁ γέγονεν, ἐν αὐτῷ ζῶν ἦν, or, with ACD and nearly all the Ante-Nicene Fathers who comment on it, should we put the full stop at ἐν? The former view, which is supported by Chrysostom, has prevailed in modern times, though several authorities, such as WH, put the stop at ἐν. The latter theory seems to give a richer and deeper meaning, and one more in accordance with the religious philosophy of the Gospel. 'All things were made by Him (as the Instrument), and without Him nothing came into being. That which has come into being was, in Him, life.' The Logos is the vital principle from whom all that lives derives its life. Whatever life exists in the world was, eternally, timelessly, in Him. To have 'life in Himself' is an eternal attribute of God the Son; all that appears on this fleeting scene exists, so far as it exists, by participation in His life. In short, the Logos, as life, is a cosmic principle. The idea that all things pre-existed eternally in the mind of God, and are, as it were, unrolled as the ages go on, was familiar to Jewish thought. But St. John's doctrine is more Greek—that the things of time derive whatever reality they possess from a sphere of higher reality beyond time and place. With this accord the other passages in the Gospel where Life is mentioned. In 6<sup>53-56</sup> Christ is declared to be the Bread of God which cometh down from heaven to give life to the world. Whoso eateth His flesh and drinketh His blood hath eternal life. He who is closely united to Christ—who makes the life of Christ his own—has the principle of life within him. In 17<sup>3</sup> the knowledge of the Father and of the Son is said to constitute eternal life. This knowledge can be possessed only through the indwelling of Him who is the principle of life. The same idea recurs in 11<sup>25</sup>, and in 14<sup>6</sup> Christ, 'in whom all things consist,' as St. Paul says (Col 1<sup>17</sup>), is Himself the Resurrection and the Life, and the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Accordingly, the Life is a present possession rather than a future hope. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life (3<sup>36</sup> 5<sup>24</sup>).

Christ came that we might have life, and have it abundantly (10<sup>10</sup>). See LIFE.

(2) Truth (ἀλήθεια).—St. John's use of this word cannot be paralleled in the Synoptics; it occurs in the Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and St. Paul. Typical examples of the use of the word in this Gospel are 1<sup>17</sup> 'grace and truth came by Jesus Christ'; 8<sup>12</sup> 'the truth shall make you free'; 14<sup>6</sup> 'I am the truth'; 16<sup>13</sup> 'the Spirit of truth shall guide you into all truth'; 17<sup>17</sup> 'thy word is truth'. Christ, however, came 'to bear witness to the truth' (18<sup>37</sup>), so that it must have been in the world before the Incarnation. Those that 'are of the truth' heard and accepted Him. From these passages we gather that 'the truth' is all that really exists in every sphere, and this is why Jesus Christ, as the Logos, calls Himself the Truth (cf. Scotus Erigena, 'certitū est quod Verbum naturam omnium esse'). The truth of this brings freedom, because truth corresponds with the law of our being. For those who have eyes to see, all experience is a commentary on, and witness to, Christ's religion. But the children of the evil one, who was a liar from the beginning, cannot hear the words of truth (8<sup>44</sup>).

(3) Closely akin to Truth is Witness (μαρτυρία).

This idea is never absent from St. John's mind, particularly in the earlier part of his Gospel. Every event in history, every experience, is valuable as a witness to the truth. Christ is the centre, to whose Person and claims everything testifies. The Father bears witness concerning Christ. Christ bears, and yet does not bear, witness concerning Himself (5<sup>31</sup> contrasted with 8<sup>14</sup>); the Spirit will bear witness . . . . . Him (15<sup>26</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>9</sup> 'it is the Spirit . . . . . witness, bearing witness to the truth'); John the Baptist and . . . . . witness (1<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>27</sup>); especially the . . . . . he . . . . .

witness (5<sup>30</sup> 40); and . . . . . bear witness (10<sup>25</sup> 11 . . . . . witness,' therefore, is found in every avenue through which the truth can reach us. Converging from all sides upon the Person of Christ, it is the means of progressive initiation (ἵνα γινώτε καὶ περὶ ἡμῶν, 10<sup>38</sup>) into the whole truth—that is to say, into the knowledge and love of Christ. The contradiction in 5<sup>31</sup> and 8<sup>14</sup> is only partially explained. Christ makes a unique claim for Himself in 8<sup>12</sup>; as having full knowledge of past, present, and future.

(4) Light (φῶς).—When the First Epistle, putting into terse and definite phrases the teaching of the Gospel, says that 'God is light' (1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup>), it means, in modern language, that it is the nature of God to communicate Himself. This self-communication is effected through the Logos as the principle of life. 'The life was the light of men' (1<sup>4</sup>). Christ is 'the true light which lighteth every man as it comes into the world.' There is not much room for doubt that this is the right translation of 1<sup>9</sup>. The 'coming' is repeated or continues; cf. 9<sup>5</sup> 'whenever (ὅταν) I am in the world, I am the light of the world.' The Evangelist certainly asserts that there were earlier partial Christophanies, as there will be later and even greater Christophanies through the Spirit. And yet there is a sense in which Jesus could say, 'Yet a little while is the light with you' (12<sup>35</sup>).

(5) The light converges upon one point, where it shines forth as Gloria (δόξα), another very characteristic word. Christ was in glory with the Father before the world was (17<sup>2</sup>); an important passage as negating the pantheistic conception that the Word is only the life and light of the world—that the world is the complete and only expression of His being. He was incarnate to 'glorify' the Father on the earth (17<sup>5</sup>), and thereby was also glorified Himself (13<sup>31</sup> 14<sup>13</sup>). The Spirit, too, will glorify Christ by making Him more fully known (16<sup>14</sup>). It has been said that in St John the universe is the poem of the Word to the glory of the Father.

(6) ἡ ἀφ' οὗ (ἐκ τῆς).—As at the creation God divided οὐρανὸν καὶ γῆν from the darkness, so the Incarnation necessarily and naturally divided mankind, condemning those who would not receive the light. This is ἡ ἀφ' οὗ (5<sup>9</sup>). With regard to Christ's own ἐκ τῆς we have another formal contradiction (cf. 12<sup>48</sup> 31<sup>7</sup> 12<sup>47</sup> with 5<sup>22</sup> 27 9<sup>39</sup> 5<sup>30</sup>). The contrast is striking, but the Evangelist's meaning is clear. The coming of Christ disclosed an actual relation; He made no new, more severe laws; He only revealed, in all its unfathomable depth, the gulf that yawns between God and the devil, and between their respective servants. The 'one that seeketh and judgeth' (8<sup>30</sup>) is the eternal power of righteousness which is ἐκ τῆς in the Law (5<sup>40</sup>), and expressed in the Gospel. At the same time, the judgment is a personal one, and is committed to Christ as a son of man (5<sup>27</sup>). Mankind is ἐκ τῆς by a human standard, though by the ἐκ τῆς humanity at its best.

(7) World (κόσμος).—It is remarkable that St John uses κόσμος, while the Synoptics use αἶων. The former is the Greek, the latter the Jewish way of envisaging reality; for the Greeks pictured it more readily under the form of space, the Jews under that of time. The 'world' is the sum-total of existence viewed (by abstraction) without the spiritual world. It is 'the things below' (8<sup>23</sup>), as opposed to 'the things above.' The concept is therefore an abstraction for certain purposes, and has no real existence, for the world is upheld in being only by the Logos, who is 'not of the world.' It comprises all that belongs to the categories of time and place. Christ 'came into the world' at His incarnation, and He is 'in the world' till His death and glorification. He prays not that His disciples may be taken out of the world, but that they may be kept from the evil. From this idea comes that of the world as human society as it organizes itself apart from God, hence the severe judgments passed upon the world; e.g. 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup> 'the whole world lieth in the wicked one,' and similar phrases in the Gospel. Thus the world is that which is external, transitory, and corrupt. The Evangelist it need hardly be said, does not follow up the thought of the unreality of the world apart from God, into acosmistic speculations. Thinkers who have done so have been driven into a purely negative conception of evil, and have often drifted into a cynical pessimism. But St John, as we have seen, presents us with an intense ethical dualism, including a belief in a quasi-personal devil, who is the ἐκ τῆς of this world.

(8) To believe (πιστεύειν).—This, and not the substantive πίστις, is St. John's chosen expression. The verb has two constructions. (1) with the dative (5<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>31</sup>, both mistranslated in AV), to believe a person or statement—accept the veracity of the former, or the truth of the latter; and (2) π. εἰς τινα—a construction which the Evangelist, following the Johannine, which occurs in the Synoptics (Mt 18<sup>6</sup> Mk 9<sup>22</sup>). In the Synoptics generally faith is relative to a particular object—the condition of obtaining some special miraculous benefit. But in St. John faith is allegiance to Jesus Christ, and, as such, a condition of eternal life (1<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>4</sup>), which is also a progressive state, depending on knowledge (17<sup>8</sup>) as well as faith. The Evangelist studiously avoids γνώσις as well as πίστις, using in both cases the verbs only.

(9) Love (ἀγάπη).—This is the new commandment (13<sup>34</sup>). Love is the bond which unites the Son to the Father, the disciples to the Son, and the disciples to each other. 'As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you' (15<sup>9</sup>). That the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them.' The virtue of love is no vague sentiment, but shows itself necessarily in action. 'He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me' (14<sup>21</sup> 26). Love is not to be sharply distinguished from faith, though the former is a state mainly of the affections, the latter of the will and the intellect. The Evangelist who developed the Johannine ideas further, in the comment of Alexandria, agree that faith is the beginning, love the crown, of the spiritual life. Faith and love are both simple states, and, as Clement says, 'are not taught.' The soul passes out of the simplicity of faith, through the multiplicity of strenuous interests in the life of duty, into a second and more Divine simplicity, and immediacy of intercourse with God. St. John's teaching about love culminates in ch. 17, in which our Lord seems to imply that the 'name' of the Father, which He has declared to His disciples, is Love.

3. The miracles of the Fourth Gospel.—The miracles in St John are either 'signs' (σημεῖα), in which case their abnormal and also their symbolic character is emphasized, or 'works' (ἔργα), in which case no distinction between natural and supernatural is thought of, and the 'works' are only component parts of the one 'work,' to do which Jesus came into the world. The Johannine Christ does not wish faith in His person to rest on the signs, though He allows them a legitimate weight in fortifying a weak faith. It is better to believe for the sake of the words than of the works, He implies in 14<sup>11</sup>; and the last beatitude (20<sup>31</sup>) is a reproof of Thomas, who believed only when he had ocular testimony to the Resurrection. The seven miracles selected by the Evangelist have the value of acted parables, and in some cases the symbolical significance is clearly indicated.

(1) The wedding at Cana (2<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>11</sup>).—Christ is represented as beginning His public ministry at a wedding. Unlike the Baptist, and unlike John the Baptist, Jesus was not personally an ascetic. He drank wine, and ate what was put before Him. There was, indeed, a special appropriateness in this festivity at the beginning of His ministry, when He had just left His family of Apostles, whom He was to lead to a bridal party (cf. Mt 9<sup>15</sup> ||). The miracle may have taken place on the last of the seven days usually given up to bridal festivities. The occasion gives Christ an opportunity to assert the superior sacredness of His mission to any family ties (His words to His mother convey an unmistakable rebuke), and also (through the mouth of the master of the ceremonies) to indicate symbolically the supersession of the water of the Law by the good wine of the Gospel.

(2) The healing of the official's son (4<sup>46</sup> ||).—The miracle of healing, performed for the benefit of a court official βασιλικὸς of Herod Antipas, is the only 'sign' of the Synoptic type recorded in St. John. The miracle is conditioned by the faith of the father; it is a work of mercy, pure and simple, and no symbolic meaning can easily be detected in it.

(3) The paralytic at Bethesda (5<sup>1</sup> ||).—This work of healing at first sight resembles the last, and it introduces the situation, familiar in the Synoptics, of a quarrel with the strict legalists about Sabbath observance. But the Evangelist has a deeper lesson to convey by this work of healing on the Sabbath, one which profoundly modifies the whole conception of the way in which that day should be kept. 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work' (v<sup>17</sup>). That is to say, the Sabbath rest of God is unimpeded activity, and that is the true notion of rest, as opposed to inertia. It follows that a mere negative abstinence from exertion of every kind is not an intelligent or acceptable mode of honouring God. The verse is also theologically important, as separating the Christian idea of God the Father from the Neo-Platonic Absolute, and from the God of such mystics as Eckhart and Silesius. Last, by co-ordinating His own activity with that of the Father, Jesus claims to be Himself Divine.

(4) The feeding of the five thousand (6<sup>35</sup>).—This miracle is also recorded by the Synoptists, but St. John tells it with a very different purpose. In no other miracle is the didactic purpose, referred to by St. Augustine, more apparent. 'Interrogemus ipsa miracula quid nobis loquantur de Christo; habent enim, si intellegantur, linguam suam. Nam quia ipse Christus Verbum Dei est, etiam factum Verbi verbum nobis est.' How much this miracle is an acted parable is shown by v.<sup>30</sup>, where, in answer to the challenge of the Jews, Christ does not make any appeal to the miracle as a 'sign.' His answer is, 'My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven'—not only in one miraculous act, but always. In v.<sup>34</sup> the metaphor is misunderstood by the hearers (a favourite literary device of the Evangelist) and then comes the great saying in v.<sup>35</sup>. The device recurs in vv.<sup>52-54</sup>. The discourse on the Bread of Life does not refer directly to the Eucharist, which had not yet been instituted; but the Evangelist undoubtedly wishes, by narrating it, to spiritualize and generalize the Eucharistic doctrine current when he wrote, and to check the tendency to formality and materialism (cf. esp. v.<sup>63</sup>). In v.<sup>51</sup> there is clearly an allusion to the Paschal lamb, the blood of which was sprinkled on the lintels and doorposts; and therefore the thought of salvation was already in the mind of Jesus. But the leading idea is that of identifying ourselves with the life of Christ, being reborn into His spirit: this union constitutes eternal life. Christ is Himself the gift which He brings; even through apparent failure He fulfils His work (vv.<sup>54-58</sup>). A spiritual preparation is needed to understand how a man can thus unite earth and heaven (vv.<sup>43, 44</sup>); but in part the question is answered in the OT (vv.<sup>45-46</sup>), and in part the believer must co-operate (vv.<sup>47-50</sup>). Man lives only by participation in the virtues of Christ's life and death, which brings with it a personal union between the believer and Christ (vv.<sup>52-58</sup>). The whole discourse (λόγος, not 'saying,' v.<sup>60</sup>) seemed 'harsh' (σκληρός) to those who heard it: it pointed to self-devotion, and surrender even to death. Accordingly, many even of His disciples left Him. Christ thereupon said (v.<sup>61</sup>), 'Does this offend you? What if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend where he was before?' When the bodily presence is withdrawn, and the flesh entirely disappears, the meaning of the 'harsh discourse' will be made manifest—viz. that the union with Christ is spiritual, and therefore a truth for all times and places. Unlike the eating of manna by 'the fathers,' which only nourished their bodily frames for a few hours, the bread from heaven confers eternal life. The flesh profiteth nothing; the words which He spoke to them were spirit and life. This language would bring great comfort to the disciples of the Evangelist's own day, when the 'hope deferred' of the Second Coming was making many hearts sick. It can hardly be an accident that the designation of the traitor, which in the Synoptics occurs at the same hour as the institution of the Eucharist, in this Gospel follows immediately the discourse on the bread of life. The whole passage represents under another form, the narrative of the Last Supper.

(5) The walking on the sea (6<sup>16</sup>).—is closely connected with the more important miracle, and

(6) The man born blind (ch. 9).—The disciples are confronted by one of the most perplexing problems of life—that of a vie manquée. A beggar lies before them, who has been blind from his birth. Was this crippling infirmity a punishment for his own sins, either in a previous state of existence or in anticipation of those which he was going to commit, or for the sins of his parents? Jesus says that neither explanation is the right one; the reason is 'that the work of God might be made manifest in him.' He adds that for all alike 'the night cometh, when no man can work.' The moral difficulty about the justice of human suffering receives no direct answer. The most significant verses in the discourse about the Light of the world are 25, 39, 41. Jesus has come into the world for judgment, not only for a discernment of good and bad people, but (as a necessary result) to procure for the first eternal life, and to pardon the last. The blind man typifies humanity converted to Christianity, coming out of darkness and made to see by Christ; while the representatives of Judaism, proud of their 'signs,' are struck with blindness—'blind' and 'dark.'

(7) The raising of Lazarus (ch. 11).—The narrative of this, the last and greatest of the seven 'signs,' contains several characteristic features. The suggestion implied in v.<sup>3</sup> does not induce Jesus to hurry His action at all. He deliberately waits two days before starting for Judæa. Similarly in 28th the Evangelist is anxious to show that He did not act upon His mother's suggestion. Still more instructive is the sign of Christ's words in v.<sup>12</sup>, and sign of Martha (v.<sup>21</sup>). She makes a half request, which she does not dare to put directly (v.<sup>22</sup>), to which Christ answers: 'Thy brother shall rise again.' Martha misunderstands this to refer to the resurrection at the last day. But Christ did not mean either this or that He intended to bring Lazarus to life again. Just as in ch. 6 He refuses to mention the miracle, in reply to the question 'What sign showest thou?' (v.<sup>30</sup>), but gives as the sign the declaration, 'I am the bread of life'; so here He does not invite attention to what He is about to do, but to His own Person. 'I am the resurrection and the life.' The deep significance of this is often missed. If the words referred only to the miracle, they would convey but sign to the Christian mourner, for whom no miracles are wrought; if we take them to refer to the future resurrection at the last day, we are forgetting that the words were spoken as a sign of that thought. The words bid us concentrate our thoughts upon the Person of Christ. 'He that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live; and he that liveth and believeth on me shall never die.' This is not a promise of resurrection; it is a denial of death. The resurrection is a personal communication of the Lord Himself, not a gift to be obtained from another. Martha had spoken of a gift to be obtained from God and dispensed by Christ. Jesus answers that He Himself is (not 'will give or procure') the Resurrection and the Life. By taking humanity upon Himself He has revealed the permanence of man's individuality and its indestructibility. The Incarnation brought life and immortality to light. Death is abolished; the grave has been robbed of its victory by the fact that Christ lives, and is the life of the individual believer. In Him all that belongs to the completeness of personal being finds its permanence and consummation. Because He is the Life, He must also be the Resurrection; in other words, our true life is hid with Him in God. The dead in Christ are alive, in virtue of their union with Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. After this sublime lesson, the physical miracle seems almost an anti-climax, a thing to be half regretted, like the restitution of Job's large fortune and his flourishing family by his second marriage. But not only is the miracle a parallel in act to the verbal revelation which precedes it, but it emphasizes the very deep lesson that though life in this sense is indestructible, we must pass through the gate of death in order to reach it. This is one of the profoundest and most characteristic doctrines of Christianity. Those who have found in the maxim 'Die to live' the kernel of Christ's religion, have penetrated a large part at least of His 'secret.' Thus, and the lesson that it is the Person of Christ Himself, revealed as the Resurrection and the Life, rather than the hopes of a gift to be one day conferred by Him, that should be the truest consolation for mourners, are the two main points in the narrative of the raising of Lazarus.

Conclusion—The Fourth Gospel gives us an answer to the question 'What think ye of Christ?' Moreover, the answer to this question is the dividing-line between light and darkness. To know Christ is to know the Father; and no man cometh to the Father except by Him. The Christ 'whom to know is to live' is not, of course, merely the human Jesus, but the eternal Word who tabernacled among us in human form. The Evangelist would have accepted Bengel's dictum, that conversio fit ad Dominum ut Spiritum. But he does not identify this spiritual power of Nazareth as essential. The vigorous words of 1 John (1<sup>1-3</sup> 4<sup>1-3</sup>) express the Christological position of the Gospel, even if some doubts exist as to the common authorship of the two books. It is the peculiarity of the Johannine theology that we pass backwards and forwards between the universal and the particular, between time and eternity, present and future, outward and inward. To the philosopher this oscillation is most natural; but it is the true normal pulsation of the moral life, in which we may always trace a double movement of expansion and concentration. On the one hand, we must lose our souls in order to find them, we must die daily in order to live. We must continually pass out of ourselves, forget ourselves, and identify ourselves with interests of which we are not the centre. We must enlarge our life till there is nothing selfish, personal, or limited about it. And, on the other hand, exactly in proportion as we succeed in doing this, we shall live and become more keenly conscious of the worth and value of our own souls in God's sight. There will be no blurring of individual distinctions, no Buddhist absorption in the Infinite, but a growing sense that the soul of man is the throne of the Godhead, and his body the temple of the Holy Ghost.

LITERATURE.—See at end of preceding article.

W. R. INGE.

JONAH (Ἰωνᾶς, Heb. נִינְוֵה 'dove,' AV of NT Jonas).—A prophet, the story of whose mission to Nineveh is related in the Book of Jonah, and who is probably to be identified with the Jonah of 2 K 14<sup>25</sup>; referred to by our Lord twice at least (see below) in the Gospels (Mt 12<sup>39-41</sup> || Lk 11<sup>29-32</sup> and Mt 16<sup>4</sup>).

Certain of the scribes and Pharisees, not content with our Lord's many miracles or signs (cf. Jn 12<sup>37</sup>), some of which were, after all, like those performed by their 'sons' (Mt 12<sup>37</sup>, Lk 11<sup>19</sup>), demanded of Him a special sign, most probably, as in Mt 16<sup>1</sup> || Mk 8<sup>11</sup>, from heaven, since such a sign would at once attest His Divine mission (cf. Jn 6<sup>30-32</sup>). He replied: 'An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign, and there shall no sign be given to it [and we must naturally understand such a sign as they sought] but the sign of Jonah the prophet. For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. The men of Nineveh shall stand up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonah; and behold, a greater than Jonah is here.' The parallel account in Lk has the appearance of being a summary report of that in Mt., and there are some notable differences. In place of the reference to the three days, Lk. has, 'For even as Jonah became a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of Man be to this generation,'—words which many think refer only to Jonah. Again, the verse concerning the men of Nineveh in the judgment follows that referring to the queen of the south instead of preceding it as in Mt. The reference to Jonah in Mt 16<sup>4</sup> was obviously made on another occasion; it contains only the words, 'An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign [here plainly from heaven, cf. v. 1]; and there shall no sign be given unto it, but the sign of Jonah.'

Although it is not the purpose of this article to discuss the difficulties connected with the story of Jonah as told in the OT, or to consider the arguments advanced for and against the historicity of the book, it will yet be necessary to allude to some of them in connexion with the problems arising out of our Lord's references to the prophet. Those who maintain the historicity of the Book of Jonah, and who hold that it contains a record of facts, find no special difficulties in our Lord's allusions to it.—He referred to Jonah and to facts in his history, just as He referred to other historical facts, and to facts in their history, as to the instance, to Moses, or to the queen of Sheba; for such difficulties are the subordinate to the exegesis and application of the passages in question. On the other hand, those who deny the historicity of the book, and who hold, with whatever modifications, that the story is a fictitious symbolic narrative with a didactic purpose, like some others in the OT and in the Apocrypha, find many grave difficulties in our Lord's use of the book—difficulties which perhaps do not admit of an absolutely certain solution. Before, however, adverting to them there is a preliminary point to be considered.

It has been maintained by some that Mt 12<sup>40</sup> is no part of our Lord's original utterance, but is either an amplification by the Evangelist of 12<sup>39</sup> (and cf. Lk 11<sup>30</sup>, Mt 16<sup>4</sup>), or at least a very early interpolation. In the latter case it is said: (1) It runs counter to the history, for according to that history he wrought many signs, and could not therefore say, 'No sign shall be given.' (2) The resurrection was not a sign to the men of that generation, i.e. such as they demanded (cf. Ac 10<sup>41</sup>). (3) The clause is unnecessary, and interferes with the balance which without it exists in Mt 12<sup>41, 42</sup> || Lk 11<sup>31, 32</sup>, for it was Jonah's preaching and the consequent repentance of the Ninevites, in contrast with His own preaching and the indifference of the men of His generation, to which Jesus especially alluded; His words without v. 40 are a complete answer to their demand for a sign: the repentance-preaching Jonah was a sign to the Ninevites of God's mercy; the repentance-preaching Jesus of Nazareth was a sign, though a greater one, to the Jews. (4) Add that (3) harmonizes well with Lk 11<sup>30</sup>, which was perhaps the original out of which Mt 12<sup>40</sup> was evolved. (5) There is the difficulty about the reckoning of the three

To these objections it may be replied: (1) There is no contradiction of the Gospel story, for the scribes and Pharisees plainly demanded a sign of a different character from those which they had so far witnessed (see above). (2) The resurrection was a sign, since the Apostles proclaimed it (Acts and Epistles passim), and made it the corner-stone of their teaching about the Christ. (3) V.<sup>40</sup> is unnecessary only on the gratuitous assumption that Jonah's preaching was the only way in which he was to be a sign to the men of Christ's generation; the introduction in v.<sup>40</sup> of another particular in which Jonah was to be a sign does not weaken or interfere with what our Lord says about the prophet's preaching. (4) Lk 11<sup>30</sup>, instead of being the original, may well be a summary report of Mt 12<sup>40</sup> as suggested above,—an explanation rendered not improbable by the whole form and tenor of the passage in Lk. referring to Jonah. (5) This difficulty, such as it is, makes rather for than against the authenticity of the verse (see below). To these replies it may be added: (6) There is some ground for the conjecture that allusion was made on another occasion by our Lord, and also by St. Paul, to Jonah's deliverance after three days from the 'whale' as typifying the resurrection (Lk 24<sup>46</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>), it being much more unlikely that the reference in these places is to Hos 6<sup>2</sup> or Gn 22<sup>4</sup>; and this may be thought to add some strength to the probability that our Lord did utter the words recorded in v.<sup>40</sup> (cf. also Mt 27<sup>63</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Jn 2<sup>19</sup>). (7) There is no textual authority for the rejection of the verse. On the whole, the conclusion that this verse is really part of our Lord's original utterance can be fully justified.

We have now to consider briefly the difficulties connected with our Lord's use of the story of Jonah on the supposition that the book is not historical, but a fictitious narrative with a didactic purpose. (1) Did our Lord cite details from the story of Jonah as facts, He Himself thinking them to be facts? If we reply in the affirmative, we must admit that our Lord was not completely omniscient, and that on a point of literary knowledge He was and could be in error. Into a discussion of the great question of the limitation of our Lord's human knowledge we cannot, of course, enter here; it must suffice to point out that the most earnest maintainers of our Lord's Divinity have in all ages recognized, in view of such passages as Mt 24<sup>38</sup> (RV), Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, Lk 24<sup>46</sup>, Ph 2<sup>7</sup>, not only a gradual growth of His human knowledge, but even a mysterious limitation of His knowledge of Divine things; and however difficult it may be to understand the union of the Divine and the human in one Person, we must not, in maintaining His Divinity, forget that He was 'perfect man'. 'Is it,' asks Dr. Sanday, 'inconsistent with our Christian belief to suppose that He who called Himself the Son of Man, along with the assumption of human flesh and a human mind, should also have assumed the natural workings of such a mind, even in its limitations?' (Bamp. Lect. viii. p. 415). (2) But did our Lord know in Himself that the story of Jonah was fiction and yet cite details from it as though they were facts, His hearers thinking them to be such? Here, again, we might reply in the affirmative, and that without detracting from our Lord's honesty as a moral and religious teacher, for He would have been but speaking according to the beliefs of His hearers, as many other teachers in all ages have done. Speaking to children in knowledge, He spoke to them as such. In this way, it is nearly universally agreed, we are to explain His words about Hades and Abraham's bosom in the graphic parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus; i.e. in warning and in inculcating truth He spoke according to the beliefs or His hearers and of His age, without necessarily endorsing those beliefs as true. (3) Or did both our Lord and His hearers, the scribes and Pharisees, regard the story of Jonah as a parable or fictitious narrative, like others in the OT and in the Apocrypha, and did He thus refer to it? Although in view of To 14<sup>4</sup>, 3 Mac 6<sup>8</sup>, Jos. Ant IX x it is not very probable that our Lord's hearers regarded the book as fictitious, we might yet admit without hesitation that part of our Lord's reference could be thus explained. Even so, a main tenet of the historicity of Jonah as Huxtable writes in the Speaker's Commentary: 'The reference to Jonah's experiences, as yielding an illustrative parallel to what would be seen in His own case, or even as predictive of it, seems as cogent on the supposition of the book being an inspired parable as on that of its being authentic narrative.' And in fact a teacher might, without doing any violence to right teaching, cite well-known fiction (The Pilgrim's Progress, Rasselas, Shakespeare's characters) to enforce warnings or moral truth, and so could our Saviour have done. There is, however, an objection to this explanation, besides that referred to above, which, if it be not a fatal one, is at least of considerable force, viz. that our Lord would not naturally have said of persons whom a fiction represented as recent, that they would rise up in the judgment, nor would He have put as a parallel case to a fiction the facts of the queen of Sheba's visit to Solomon.

It does not seem possible to pronounce a decided verdict in favour of any one of these hypotheses to the exclusion of the others, though it may be allowed that (3) contains more of difficulty than (1) or (2); and whilst of these latter (2) is perhaps the more attractive, (1) can certainly be held without belittling our Lord's Divinity or detracting from His teaching as a moral and religious Teacher.

Turning the force of the lessons for all generations derivable from the use He made of the story of Jonah for the edification and warning of the men of His own day.

It remains to notice the difficulty connected with the reckoning of the three days and three nights. It is certain that this length of time did not literally elapse between the burial and the resurrection of Christ, and the commentaries in explanation usually follow the lead of St. Jerome and of St. Augustine, who point out that we must understand the phrase on the principle that the part is taken for the whole; and accordingly it is usually said that our Lord was in the 'heart of the earth' on three day-night periods or νύκτες (reference is made to Gn 1<sup>5</sup> etc., Lv 23<sup>32</sup>, 1 S 30<sup>12, 13</sup>, 2 Ch 10<sup>8, 12</sup>, Dn 8<sup>14</sup> margin). It must be confessed, however, that this explanation seems somewhat forced, in view of the peculiar form of the sentence in v.<sup>40</sup>, and there is not a little to be said against it; and it is perhaps more satisfactory to suppose that our Lord was speaking only in general terms. At any rate the difficulty, such as it is, lends support to the arguments for the authenticity of the verse since if it were an amplification by the Evangelist or an interpolation, the Evangelist or the interpolator would hardly have made our Lord utter a prediction expressed in a form not in literal and precise accord with the facts of the resurrection as related in the Gospels.

It is worth noticing that the story of Jonah had a peculiar interest for the early Christians; his deliverance from a strange sea-monster is depicted many times in the Roman catacombs as typifying the resurrection.

LITERATURE.—Jerome Com. in Jonam, ii 405, also in Evang. Matth. ii 12. 83, Augustine, de Consensu Evang. iii 24, 66; over a long period of time. The result of it was the formation of the parallel chains of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and further south that of the two ranges of hills which skirt the Jordan valley. The southern end of this depression is, from the point of view of the flow of water, a transverse ridge reaching 650 feet above the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, and situated about 46 miles from Akabah and more than 73 miles from the Dead Sea.

At the end of the Miocene and the beginning of the Pliocene period, the waters in the Jordan valley must have been just about at their present level. But the physical period Pliocene brought about a considerable change in the appearance of the enclosed Jordan valley became a lake which must have been about 200 miles long and more than 2000 feet deep. The glacial period (post-Pliocene), during which the temperature sank considerably and the rainfall increased, only served to accentuate this state of affairs still more. Then, at the close of this period, the streams of water diminished, and also the lake, until things once more arrived at their present state. On the lateral slopes of the valley traces of the heights to which the waters rose are still distinguishable; some of the most notable of these traces are 1180, others 347, feet above the present level of the Dead Sea.

Alongside of this theory, held in common by those who have studied this question, we must mention, as worthy of attention, the one which W. Libbey, Professor of Physical Geography in the University of Princeton, has recently published. (Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra, pp. 27-36.)

The ancients were completely ignorant of the fact that the bottom of the Jordan valley lay below the level of the Mediterranean Sea. Nor were they aware at that time that the depression between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah was intersected by a sort of natural barrier, forming two anticlinal slopes and making a dividing line for the waters. And even in the first part of the 19th cent. it was held by Carl Ritter, W. M. Leake, de Hoff, Léon de Laborde, etc., that formerly—perhaps even in historical times before the catastrophe of Sodom and Gomorrah—the Jordan passed through the Dead Sea, continued its southward course, and flowed into the Red Sea. Those are ideas which have had to be given up. It was in 1836-37 that two German scholars, von Schubert and Roth, and at the same time two Englishmen, G. H. Moore and W. G. Beke, discovered that the Jordan valley sank far down below the level of the sea. The Austrian Russegger, the Frenchman Jules de Berton, and the Englishman Symonds soon confirmed this conclusion as a consequence of explorations carried on in quite an independent way. Before them, famous travellers, such as Seetzen (1806-07), Burckhardt (1810-12), Irby and Mangles (1817-18), had visited those same parts without any suspicion of the strange phenomenon regarding the altitude.

The course of the Jordan is interrupted twice—first by the Lake of Huleh, a depression of which occurs later in the course of the present article, then by the Lake of Tiberias or Sea of Galilee (which see); we have not to examine this here. These interruptions quite naturally cause us to divide the next part of this article into three sections: (a) the sources of the Jordan, (b) the Upper Jordan as far as Lake Tiberias, (c) the Lower Jordan from the Lake of Tiberias to the Dead Sea.

3. The sources of the Jordan.—Just as in the Alps the traditional opinion of mountaineers does not always show as the principal source of a river the one which tourists or even geographers would denote as such, so is it with the Jordan. The most northerly of its sources, the one which gives rise to the stream which covers the longest distance, is found near Hasbeya, at 1846 feet above the sea, at the foot of the Great Hermon. The name Hasbani is given to the river which starts there and flows towards the south, following a course parallel at first to that of the Litani; between these twin valleys there is only a short distance and a ridge of mountains of moderate height; so that one might quite well imagine the Hasbani rejoining the Litani, and falling along with it into the Mediterranean. But, on the contrary, it remains faithful to its course from north to south, and is joined by a tributary, which some modern scholars would include among the sources of the Jordan—the Nahr-el-Flea (River), 'the smallest of the four sources of the Jordan' (Libbey and Hoskins, i. p. 89), but which is usually left aside, so that attention may be given only to the three other more important ones. These are, besides the Hasbani, the one which springs forth at Tell el-Kadi, and the one which emerges from the grotto of Banias. The Tell el-Kadi source is called the Leddán. This unexplained name is interpreted by some as containing an allusion to the city of Dan, situated in the region, and generally (G. A. Smith, however, is an exception, HGH, pp. 480, 678) identified with ḏān, Kādī, 'judge,' being considered the exact equivalent of the Heb. Dan. The source of Tell el-Kadi is double, in the sense that it streams forth, at 500 feet above the sea, in two places close to each other, a hillock which is about 300 feet broad and covered with tall trees, and rises in a very striking manner from the plain, over which it towers about 60 feet. The stream which flows from it is the shortest but most copious of the sources of the Jordan; it is not, therefore, on account of its abundance, but because of its short length, that Josephus calls it 'the little Jordan' (BJ IV. i. 1; Ant. VIII. viii. 4), or 'the lesser Jordan' (Ant. v. iii. 1). Lastly, we find the 'river of Banias,' Nahr-Banias, which starts at 1200 feet above the sea from a grotto the ancient shrine of the Semite, and named by the Greek-Roman, gods, well known under the name of Paneion, and round which arose the city known under the names of Cæsarea, Panias, and Paneas, and now called Banias, a corruption of the latter name. Josephus mentions, under the name of Paneas, both the town and the district of which it was the centre; he also mentions the Paneion, and speaks of 'the famous fountain' (cf. BJ I. xxi. 3, III. x. 7; Ant. xv. x. 3, XVIII. ii. 1). He adds that the water of the source comes from Lake Phiala, situated 120 stades from Cæsarea; this is, undoubtedly, the small lake nowadays called Birket-Ram (cf. Schumacher in ZDPV ix [1886] p. 256 f.), but it is only 60 stades distant. There is, however, no subterranean communication between this lake, an ancient volcanic crater, and the Paneion source.

The Leddán and the river of Banias meet at an altitude of 148 feet, after the Leddán has flowed 5 miles. A little farther down, the Hasbani, in its turn, becomes united with them, whence the Jordan is formed.

4. The Upper Jordan.—From the confluence, which we have just mentioned, to the Lake of Tiberias the course of the Jordan is unimportant from a historical point of view. The books of the Bible do not speak of it, and later writers very seldom. Nor, from a specifically geographical point of view, has this part of the river any great importance. Its chief interest lies in the fact that at 10 miles distance from the confluence it forms a lake or lagoon, the Bahr or Buḥayrat (lake or small lake) Huleh, triangular in shape, the level of which is 7 feet above the Mediterranean, and which is rich in papyrus plants. The size of this sheet of water varies very much according to the seasons:

at one time it is a considerable hmpid stretch, at another it is a kind of huge morass. Its traditional name, 'the waters of Merom' (Jos 11<sup>5</sup> 7) must be regarded with caution (cf. ZDPV ix [1886] p. 252); the evidence of Josephus is not favourable. He gives this lake another name, that of 'the lake of the Semechonites' (BJ iv. 1 1; cf. ZDPV l.c. and p. 348 f). As regards the modern name Huleh, it is perhaps derived from the word Ultha, by which Josephus denotes a district near Banias. For the description of the whole upper course of the Jordan from its sources to the Lake of Tiberias, including Lake Huleh, see Macgregor, The Rob Roy on the Jordan, 1869, 5th ed. 1880.

As soon as it leaves Lake Huleh, the Jordan begins to flow below the level of the sea, and falls almost 700 feet in a distance of 10 miles. We must here notice a bridge, the Jisr Benât-Yakub, 'bridge of Jacob's Daughters', sometimes wrongly called 'bridge of Jacob' or 'bridge of Jacob's Sons'; the name itself is really difficult to explain; see on this subject an ingenious solution suggested in PEFSt, 1898, p. 29 f., by B. Z. Friedmann.

5. The Lower Jordan.—The Jordan issues from the Lake of Tiberias at a place called Bab et-Tum, leaving on the east the little modern village of Semakh, which has no bridge connecting it with the right bank, and as the river is not fordable at this place, the passage, naturally of frequent occurrence, is accomplished by means of boats. A little farther down there are the remains of an ancient bridge called at the present day Umm el-Kanatur, and again at a short distance below, the ruins of another bridge, Umm es-Sidd. There the Jordan begins to assume a very sinuous course, describing endless meanders; Pliny spoke of it as an amnis ambituosus, i.e. a winding river. The distance in a straight line from the Lake of Tiberias to the Dead Sea is about 65 miles, but if we take into account all the sinuosities of the river it reaches a total of 200 miles.

The Jordan valley at this part is now called the Ghôr, i.e. 'depression,' 'valley.' Even in the OT it was called 'the valley' (Jos 13<sup>19</sup> 27) by the name hā-ēmek, in opposition to the neighbouring heights. But a name much more frequent in the OT is Arabah, which was applied to the valley to the north as well as that to the south of the Dead Sea; nowadays the name Arabah, which has been preserved, is applied only to the valley to the south of the Dead Sea. In Greek, not in the LXX, but in Jos., Eusebius, etc., Arabah is rendered ἀβάβη. Josephus also uses the expressions 'wide wilderness' and 'the great plain' (BJ iii. 5 7, iv. viii. 2; Ant. iv. vi. 1).

The Ghôr is hemmed in on either side by chains of mountains, or at least hills, of variable height, but sometimes rising 1500 or even 1800 feet above the bed of the river. The slopes are generally somewhat steep, but not to such an extent as to prevent their being scaled. Especially at the spots where the wadis come down from one of the side mountains, means of access are opened up. The Ghôr is very fertile, especially in the northern and middle parts. As to the river itself, it flows in a bed which it has hollowed out for itself, called the Zôr. This bed is somewhat variable in breadth, and it may be easily seen that the river has frequently changed its course. Thus at Damieh, of which we shall speak below, and where we find the half-ruined arches of a bridge of the Middle Ages, the Jordan actually no longer passes under the bridge, but at some distance from it. The ground bordering either side of the river is covered with very thick brushwood; this is undoubtedly what is called in Jer 12<sup>5</sup> 49<sup>18</sup> 50<sup>44</sup>, Zec 11<sup>8</sup> the ḥayyâ, i.e. 'the majesty' (RV 'pride') of Jordan' (AV 'the swelling of Jordan' [in the Jer. passages] arises from a wrong interpretation, as if the reference here was to the floods of Jordan; these do exist; they are sometimes sudden and very violent, rendering the fords impassable; cf. Jos 3<sup>15</sup>, Sir 24<sup>26</sup> (36)).

The vegetation, especially as we go further south, becomes very nearly tropical, and the fauna resembles that of Africa. The lion, which abounded in ancient times, and continued to be encountered even in the Middle Ages, has completely disappeared. But other carnivorous animals are found here, leopards and hyenas, as well as wild boars, porcupines, etc. In Palestine 58 species of birds are met with, which are also N. African: nearly all of them belong to the Ghôr. The flora has the same character, it recalls that of Nubia, Abyssinia, the Sahara, and the region of the great African lakes. Great.

Throughout this whole region, a fact is naturally explained when we remember the valley shut in between high walls, at its highest point 682 and at its lowest 1292 feet below the sea-level. The temperature varies from 77° to 130° Fahr. This circumstance undoubtedly accounts largely for the fact that there are not and never have been any towns on the banks of the Jordan. But another reason for the latter important fact may be found in the danger to which the inhabitants would be exposed, owing to the impossibility of effectually fortifying themselves against attacks. The few towns of the Ghôr at one time populated, e.g. Phasael and Jericho, are on the height at some distance from the river, near protecting mountains. The other inhabited places are only wretched villages.

The Jordan forms a very large number of rapids; about thirty may be counted, apart from the whirlpools, which are numerous. There is also a considerable number of fords; the majority of them—22—are in the northern part, to the north of Karn Sartabeh, there are 5 more in the south. A little to the north of Beisan there is a bridge, which dates from the Middle Ages, the Jisr el-Batani on the way—an ancient Roman bridge, from the plain of Jezreel to Gadaia and Damascus. Further south is the ruined bridge of Damieh, and lastly, near Jericho, a modern bridge, the Jisr el-Ghor-anneh, at the place where the mosaic map of Madaba indicates a ferry-boat. For information regarding the fords of the Jordan, see G. A. Smith, UGHL p. 336 f.

The formation of the Jordan valley is remarkable for its transition into terraces (in Arabic ṭabaṭāt), the river flowing between the lowermost of these. There is no equal and continuous incline from the mountain to the river, but a succession of horizontal platforms with sudden and very steep slopes, which form what are called the steep banks or cliffs of Jordan. They are marly, and have a tendency to become worn, and even to give way. The Zôr itself is bordered by them, and the Jordan often flows, at least at one side, along the foot of a declivity impossible of ascent. This is the case, e.g., in front of the so-called place of the Baptism at the latitude of Jericho. These terraces correspond to the different levels attained by the waters of the great lake which at one time filled the whole valley, and which first increased and then sank down again.

The Jordan is fed by numerous tributaries. The most important of these are on the left bank. One of them, the Hieromax of the Greeks, the Yarmuk of the Rabbits, the Sheri at el-Manadreh of the Arabs, already mentioned above, flows down from the high plateau on the east of Lake Tiberias, and passes between the warm springs of el-Hammah and the ancient Gadara (modern Umm Kcis). Further south, also on the eastern bank, the Jordan receives the Zerka (blue river), the Yabbok of ancient times, and there the shepherds, to whom the angel had announced the birth of the Saviour, found Mary and Joseph and 'the babe lying in a manger' (Lk 2<sup>16</sup>). At the circumcision, on the eighth day after the birth, the child received the name 'Jesus' which Joseph had been commanded to give Him; and on a later day, when Mary's purification was accomplished (cf. Lv 12<sup>2-3, 4</sup>), she and Joseph took Jesus to the temple in Jerusalem (Lk 2<sup>22</sup>), to 'present him to the Lord'* and to offer a sacrifice, according to the requirements of the law (Ex 13<sup>2</sup>, Lv 12<sup>5</sup>). Joseph fulfilled the law as if he were the father of Jesus; and after the ceremonies in the temple he must have returned with Mary and her son to Bethlehem, which was 6 miles distant from Jerusalem. In Bethlehem the Wise Men who had come from the East saw Mary and 'the young child' and worshipped Him; and after their departure the angel of the Lord appeared again to Joseph, bidding him take Mary and the child and flee into Egypt on account of Herod, who would seek to destroy Him (Mt 2<sup>13</sup>). Joseph was quick to obey, and rising in the night he took the young child and His mother and departed for Egypt, where Herod had no authority (v<sup>14</sup>). In Egypt they were to remain till the angel brought word to Joseph (v<sup>13</sup>); and there they dwelt, possibly two or even three years, till the death of Herod, when the angel again appeared in a dream to Joseph. The angel commanded him to take ' . . . and His mother and go into the land of Israel' (v<sup>19</sup>). Obedience was at once given by Joseph, but he became afraid when he learned that Archelaus was reigning in Judaea. Again the angel appeared in a dream, and after a warning Joseph proceeded to Nazareth, which was not under the rule of Archelaus, who had an evil reputation, but under that of the milder Antipas (vv<sup>14-23</sup>).

It is recorded of Joseph that he and Mary went every year, at the Passover, to Jerusalem, and that when Jesus was twelve years of age He accompanied them. On that occasion Jesus tarried in Jerusalem, after Joseph and Mary, thinking He was with them in the company, had left the city. When they had gone a day's journey they found He was not with them, and they turned back to Jerusalem. After three days they found Him in the temple among the doctors, and they were amazed. Mary's words, 'Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing,' called forth an answer which Joseph and Mary did not understand. But after the incident in Jerusalem, Jesus went with them to Nazareth and 'was subject unto them' (Lk 2<sup>51-52</sup>). Mary's words and the record of the subjection of Jesus to her and Joseph indicate that Joseph stood to Jesus in the place of an earthly father. How long that relationship continued is unknown, since the time of the death of Joseph is not stated in the Gospels. It may be accepted as a certainty that he was not alive throughout the period of the public ministry of Jesus, seeing that he is not directly or indirectly mentioned along with His mother and brothers and sisters (Mk 3<sup>31-35</sup>).

6. Joseph of Arimathea (Ἰωσήφ ὁ ἀπὸ Ἀριμαθαίας, see ARIMATHAEA).—A rich and pious Israelite (Mt 27<sup>57</sup>), a member of the Sanhedrin (Mk 15<sup>43</sup>), who, secretly for fear of the Jews, was Jesus' disciple (Jn 19<sup>38</sup>). He had not consented to the death of Jesus (Lk 23<sup>51</sup>), and could not therefore have been present at the Council, where they all condemned Him to be guilty of death (Mk 14<sup>64</sup>). The timidity which prevented him from openly avowing his discipleship, and perhaps from defending Jesus in the Sanhedrin, fled when he beheld the death of the Lord. Jewish law required that the body of a person who had been executed should not remain all night upon the tree, but should 'in any wise' be buried (Dt 21<sup>22-23</sup>). This law would not bind the Roman authorities, and the custom in the Empire was to leave the body to decay upon the cross (cf. Hor. Ep. i. xvi. 48; Plautus, Mil. Glor. ii. iv. 19). But at the crucifixion of Jesus and of the two malefactors, the Jews, anxious that the bodies should not remain upon the cross during the Sabbath, besought Pilate that the legs of the crucified might be broken and death hastened, and that then the bodies might be taken away (Jn 19<sup>31</sup>). According to Roman law, the relatives could claim the body of a person executed (Digest, xlviii. 24, 'De cadav. punit.'). But which of the relatives of Jesus had a sepulchre in Jerusalem where His body might be placed? Joseph, wishing the burial not to be 'in any wise' (cf. Jos 8<sup>29</sup>), but to be according to the most pious custom of his race, went to Pilate and craved the body. The petition required boldness (Mk 15<sup>43</sup>), since Joseph, with no kinship in the flesh with Jesus, would be forced to make a confession of discipleship, which the Jews would note. Pilate, too, neither loved nor was loved by Israel, and his anger might be kindled at the coming of a Jew, and the member of the Sanhedrin be assailed with insults. Pilate, however, making sure that Jesus was dead, gave the body. Perhaps he had pity for the memory of Him he had condemned, or perhaps the rich man's gold, since Pilate . . . to Philo (Op. ii. 590), took money from . . . secured what was craved. Joseph, now with no fear of the Jews, acted openly, and had to act with speed, as the day of preparation for the Sabbath was nearly spent. Taking down the body of Jesus from the cross (and other hands must have aided his), he wrapped it in linen which he himself had bought (Mk 15<sup>46</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel it is told how Nicodemus, bringing a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight, joined Joseph, and how they took the body and wound it in linen clothes with the spices (Jn 19<sup>40</sup>). Near the place of crucifixion was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre, which Joseph had hewn out in the rock, doubtless for his own last resting-place; and in that sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid, was placed the body of Jesus prepared for its burial (Mt 27<sup>60</sup>, Jn 19<sup>41</sup>). In the court at the entrance to the tomb, the preparation would be made. All was done which the time before the Sabbath allowed reverent hands to do; and then Joseph, perhaps thinking of the pious offices that could yet be done to the dead, rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre and departed (Mt 27<sup>60</sup>). On late legends regarding Joseph of Arimathea see Hastings' DB, vol. ii p. 778.

JOSES (Ἰωσῆς, יוֹסֶה, a shortened form of יוֹסֵף, 'he adds'; cf. Gn 30<sup>24</sup>). The identity of the two names is doubted by Lightfoot [Gal. 3<sup>261</sup>, note 1], chiefly on the ground of the use of different forms in the Peshitta; but Dalman [Gram. Aram. 75] rightly views יוֹסֶה as a dialectical, and probably Galilean, abbreviation of יוֹסֵף. The names are interchangeable in the Gospels (cf. Mt 13<sup>55</sup> with Mk 6<sup>3</sup>, v. 16; Mt 27<sup>57</sup> with Mk 15<sup>43</sup> with Tisch. read Ἰωσήφ, and in all the passages there is textual evidence, sufficiently strong not to be overlooked, for the name rejected).—1. A brother of Jesus (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>). This brother is not mentioned anywhere else except in the above passage of Matthew (27<sup>57</sup>). For views as to his real relationship see Hastings' DB i. 320 ff., and art. BROTHERS OF THE LORD in present work. 2. The brother of James the Little (Mt 27<sup>56</sup>, Mk 15<sup>40-47</sup>). The name of Joses stands alone in the last passage, but that of his better known brother is substituted by the 'Western' text.

* 'The earliest period of . . . was thirty-one days after birth, so as to make . . . quite complete' (Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 193).

The father was Clopas (Jn 19<sup>25</sup>); but of him, as of his son Josès, nothing certain is known. Both must have been familiar to the members of the early Christian community; but the Syriac versions are against the identification of Clopas with Alphaeus, and Hegesippus does not say enough (Eus. HE iii 11) to warrant the conclusion that Josès was a nephew of Joseph of Nazareth.

JOSIAH.—The well-known king of Judah, named in our Lord's genealogy (Mt 1<sup>10f.</sup>)

JOT.—This modern spelling of the AV, followed by RV, which has discarded the 16th cent. 'iote' (in Tindale, Coverdale, Crammer 'iott') of Rhemish. Bishops', AV (1611), somewhat obscures the etymology of the word, which is simply a transliteration of the Greek term (iōta = 'i'). Wyclif's translation and paraphrase ('oon 1, that is lest lettre') was not adopted by any of the ab original English versions. The Greek unsyllable being pronounced 'jota' (cf. Spanish 'jota', German 'jota', 'jott', 'jott', 'jot'), the reduction to the monosyllable 'iote' (pronounced 'jote') with its variants 'ioyt', 'iott' (Scots form. see J. Knox, Hist. Ref. 1572, Wks. 1846, 1. 107, and Davidson, Command. Vpriehtnes, 152 (1573), in Satir. P. Ref xl) and 'iott', was natural and normal. The German authorized version is still Luther's paraphrase: 'der kleinste Buchstabe' for which Weizsacker prefers the transliteration 'ein Jota,' while the French versions also transliterate 'un (seul) iota'.

The proverbial phrase iāra ēv η̄ ῥα κεπαλᾶ (Mt 5<sup>18</sup> only) derives its point from the fact that iāra in the Greek alphabet, like its . . . er and original yod in the Hebrew, . . . character. In fact, as Dr. Hastings notes (s.v. in DB), the yod being more distinctively the smallest, provides an argument in favour of those who regard Aramaic as the language of Jesus

After Tindale's introduction of the word (1526), its meaning, derived from the passage above cited, was not so much 'the least letter or written part of any writing,' as in a more general application 'the very least,' 'a whit,' and was usually preceded by a negative expressed or implied. Thus: Bale (1538), God's Promises, in. in Dodsley OPl. 1. 1. 'I will not one iote, Lord, from thy will dyssent'; Shakspeare (1596), Merch. of Ven.: 'This bond will giue thee here no iot of bloud'; Spenser 1595 Shep. Cal. lviii: 'That wonder is how I should liue a iot.'

JOTHAM.—A king of Judah, named in our Lord's genealogy (Mt 1<sup>9</sup>).

JOURNEY.—See TRAVEL.

JOY.—In the Greek of the NT there are two verbs, with their corresponding nouns, used to express the idea of joy. These are ἀγαλλιᾶν, ἀγαλλιασις, and χαίρειν, χαρά.

The word αγαλλῆν conveys rather the idea of exultation or exuberant gladness, and is a favourite with St. Luke, who has been called the 'most profound psychologist among the Evangelists.' It is in the pages of his Gospel also that we find the most frequent mention of circumstances of joy attending the proclamation and reception of the gospel message, and the whole character of his writing reveals our Lord in the most joyous relation to His own disciples and to the world at large. The Gr. word for 'gospel' (εὐαγγέλιον) means 'good tidings,' or, as it is described in Mk. 2 in the message of the angel to the shepherds, 'good tidings of great joy' (εὐαγγελίζομαι ὑμῖν χαρὰν μεγάλην). In the case of the angel messenger to Zacharias, the two words are combined in his greeting. Thus at the very outset the idea of joy attends the ministry of even the harshest ministry of John the Baptist: 'Thou shalt,' says the angel, 'have joy and gladness (χαρά καὶ ἀγαλλίασις), and many shall rejoice (χαρῆσονται) at his birth' (Lk 1<sup>4</sup>). Another strong circumstance of the joy of these days is our Lord's incarnation is the utterance of Elisabeth, who, when Mary, the predestined mother of the Messiah, comes to visit her, cries out in an ecstasy of wonder and joy, 'Behold, when the voice of thy salutation came into mine ears, the babe leapt in my womb for joy' (v.<sup>44</sup>). In the same scene there immediately follows the song of thanksgiving known in the Church as the Magnificat (wh see), in which is pervaded by the ἡ δόξα τοῦ κυρίου (wh see), and in which the word 'rejoiced' occurs at the very outset (v.<sup>47</sup>).

When we turn to the historical account of the beginnings of the proclamation of the gospel, we find that, according to Jn's narrative, when John the Baptist declared the coming of the Greater than himself, he heralded His advent in the words, 'He that hath the bride is the bridegroom: but the friend of the bridegroom, who standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice: thus my joy therefore is fulfilled' (Jn 3<sup>29</sup>).

as There the says that, because John came ur Lord who a devil (Mt 11:10) the Fourth Evangelist had carried back the conception of his Lord's ministry description it given by His forerunner or decide in any case, the statement here attributed to John the Baptist stands alone, and is not character or at Lord Himself

In the parables in which the secret of the Kingdom is itself set forth by our Lord, we meet the word 'joy' several times. In the interpretation of the parable of the Sower we are told: 'He that was sown upon the rocky places, this is he that heareth the word, and with joy receiveth it' (Mt 13<sup>20</sup>), a striking characterization of the temper of those who eagerly adopt a new idea, but are just as ready to exchange it for some more recent fashion. It is a temper that our Lord describes in another place, when, discussing the ministry of His forerunner, He says: 'He was the lamp that burneth and shineth, and ye were willing to rejoice for a season in his light' (Jn 5<sup>35</sup>). Joy of a deeper and more permanent character is that of the man who found a treasure hidden in his field, and 'in his joy he goeth and selleth all that he hath and buyeth that field' (Mt 13<sup>44</sup>). This is the true and evangelical temper of a proper reception of the gospel message. In Lk 15 joy is given a higher place and a yet more spiritual significance. In the three famous parables that fill that chapter, the joy of God's own heart is set forth under the images of the shepherd with his sheep, the woman with her precious coin, and the father with his restored son. Joy, says our Lord, in the two former cases, fills all heaven, even increasing the gladness of the angels in sympathy with their King; while the exuberant picture of the joy of the household at the prodigal's return gives a still more tender and touching picture of the Divine Fatherhood. The reward promised to the faithful servant in the parable of the Talents is to enter into 'the joy of his Lord' (Mt 25<sup>21</sup>). The meaning of this is obviously that the servant should be partaker in the richer and fuller joy that is his Lord's portion, which may probably be the joy that comes from the exercise of higher responsibilities, and the opportunities of fuller usefulness (see the Comm. in loco).

In the narrative in Lk. descriptive of the return of the seventy disciples from their mission in Galilee, we read (10<sup>17</sup>) that they 'returned with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us in thy name.' It may be that our Lord regarded this as too much akin to the shallow joy which He had exposed in the parable of the Sower, or, at any rate, as detrimental to the more serious thought with which He wished their minds to be filled; for He replied (v.<sup>20</sup>). 'Howbeit in this rejoice not that the spirits are subject unto you, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven.' The keynote thus given to the real joy of the disciple is the assurance of his belonging to the Kingdom of God, a joy, therefore, that is 'with trembling.' According to Lk.'s account, it is at the same moment that we read of Christ's rejoicing, but the parallel in Mt. does not bear out the same historical connexion (cf. Lk 10<sup>21</sup> and Mt 11<sup>25</sup>).

In Lk.'s narrative also there is the unique expression, 'He rejoiced in you and in your works.' What exactly is meant by this is not clear, and some have even supposed strange experiences of the Christian Church after Pentecost. This does not seem very probable, and it may be that Lk. is only expressing with greater fulness and exactitude the truth that it was through the inspiration of the Spirit that our Lord was able clearly to thank His Father for the manner in which His mighty works were done, as well as to perform these works themselves.

In the passage in which Lk. gives his setting of the Beatitudes, he puts very strongly the blessing of suffering for righteousness' sake, the words being, 'Rejoice in that day, and leap: for, behold, your reward is great in heaven' (Lk 6<sup>38</sup>).

In Jn. there is a very striking use of the verb 'rejoice' in a passage of great difficulty (8<sup>56</sup>). It occurs in the reported controversy of our Lord with the Jews, where He tells them, 'Your father Abraham rejoiced (ἡγαλλιάσατο) to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad' (εὐχάρη). The force of the Greek implies that Abraham 'exulted that he should see,' that is, presumably, in the promises that were made to him, while the actual seeing of it, of which the Lord speaks, is possibly an assertion of Abraham's living with God as in Christ's similar use of the text 'I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob,' to prove the reality of the doctrine of the resurrection.

We must next turn to a class of passages contained in the closing addresses of our Lord to His disciples, as recorded in the Fourth Gospel, where much stress is laid upon our Lord's own joy and the disciples' share in it. The clear declaration of His commandments is to effect the purpose of their partaking in His own joy of obedience, and to secure the permanence and completeness of their own glad following of the Divine will (Jn 15<sup>11</sup>). Again the natural sorrow at His approaching departure is to be a sorrow like that of a woman in her travail, sorrow, that is, which is not only painful, but is a necessary element in a great deliverance; and the joy that will succeed not only cause forgetfulness of the previous suffering, but abides, while the pain is only a passing and comparatively unimportant experience (16<sup>20-24</sup>).

And, finally, in the great prayer of intercession contained in Jn 17, our Lord requests that the joy which was His own peculiar possession should find its full accomplishment in the hearts of His disciples (v.<sup>13</sup>). The joy thus foretold and interceded for is noted by the Evangelist as a possession of the disciples immediately after the resurrection. In Mt 28<sup>8</sup> we are told that the women departed from the tomb 'with fear and great joy,' while the effect of the gladness is noted by Lk., with a truthfulness to human experience that is most remarkable, as being itself a ground of scepticism (see Lk 24<sup>41</sup>). This joy was not only the possession, but the abiding possession of the early Church, as frequent notes in the Book of Acts prove; and many passages in St Paul's Epistles speak of joy as one of the true fruits of the Holy Spirit (see Ac 13<sup>52</sup> and Gal 5--).

While the passages above examined contain most of the instances in which the words 'joy' or 'rejoice' are used in the Gospels, there remain very many passages in which the idea is prominent. Our Lord's own description of Himself, for instance, as the Son of Man when He is vindicating the liberty of the Son of Man to abstain from the ascetic practices of the Pharisees, shows how He conceived His mission and ministry (see Mk 2<sup>18-22</sup>). Many of the parables, other than those already named, set forth the inherent joy of the Kingdom, as, for example, those of the Wedding Supper and the Ten Virgins. The Lord's Supper itself was a feast of joy, for, according to Lk's account (22<sup>15</sup>), our Lord said, 'With desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer,' thus indicating that He had eagerly and gladly anticipated it, and in the further words that He speaks on that occasion He indicates that there is only to be a pause in the joy which will be resumed and heightened in other words, 'I will not,' He continues, 'drink from henceforth of the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God shall come,' or, as Mt. phrases it (26<sup>29</sup>), 'until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.'

There must have been much in our Lord's intercourse with the people that led them to see in Him a helper of their joys rather than a restraint upon their merriment. He was, for example, an honoured guest at a wedding feast (Jn 2<sup>1</sup>), and at many a social meal (cf. Lk 14<sup>1</sup> and Jn 12<sup>2</sup>); and when He decided to abide at the house of Zacchæus, we are told that the latter 'received him joyfully.' In His triumphal entry into Jerusalem the people gladly welcomed Him (Lk 19<sup>37</sup>), and the children cried, 'Hosanna to the Son of David' (Mt 21<sup>15</sup>). All these more or less exuberant outbursts of spontaneous joy greatly offended the Pharisees and other formal religionists; and while it would not be correct to say that our Lord designedly arranged circumstances in which the contrasts would be clearly manifested, still the conditions in which they were so displayed were admirable parables in action of some of the deepest truths of His kingdom.

There is much beauty, as well as truth, in the imaginary description of Renan. 'He thus traversed Galilee in the midst of a continual feast. When He entered a house it was considered a joy and a blessing. He halted at the large farms, where He received open hospitality. East when a stranger enters a house it becomes at once a public place. All the village assembles there, the children invade it, they are put out by the servants, but always return. Jesus could not suffer these innocent auditors to be treated harshly. He caused them to be brought to Him and embraced them. . . . He protected those who wished to honour Him. In this way children and women came to adore Him' (Life of Jesus, ch. xi.).

The joy that emanated from our Lord's person and presence during His earthly ministry was without question a great part of its power. His attitude stood in such clear contrast to the general character of the religious people round about Him, that the consciousness of it must have been felt by all the onlookers, but in addition to this fact was the whole teaching about His kingdom, which, as set forth in parable and precept was to be a kingdom of gladness. In this latter respect it came into line with the teaching which the prophets had described as the marked characteristic of the Kingdom of God, and also with what the Jewish people had viewed as the outcome of the Messiah's advent. That a more earthly conception of joy filled the hearts of many of the disciples there is little reason to question, but a great deal of our Lord's teaching was directed to spiritualize their hopes and to deepen their insight into the true character of spiritual joy.

JUDÆA.—1. In its earlier signification the term 'Judæa' (Ἰουδαία) was applied to a limited district, of which Jerusalem was the centre, occupied by the captives who returned from Babylon after the decree of Cyrus. The scattered remnants of the Israelites who availed themselves of this opportunity, representing most, if not all, of the several tribes, joined forces with the men of Judah in rebuilding the Temple and its defences; and from this date, except on the lists of the genealogical and tribal records, they were not distinguished from them. Hence the tribe of Judah, which, according to Josephus, arrived first in those parts, gave name both to the inhabitants and the territory, the former being designated as Jews and the latter as 'Judæa' or 'Jewry' (Ant. xi v. 7). At a later date both names were used in a wider sense, including all the Israelites who returned, and also their settlements or possessions in other sections of the land. Under Persian rule the land of Judah was designated as a province of the Empire, and was administered by a governor, who resided at Jerusalem (Ezr 5<sup>8-14</sup>, Neh 11<sup>3</sup>, Hag 1<sup>1-14</sup>). During the period of the Roman occupation the term was sometimes used as a general expression for Palestine as a whole (BJ i. viii 2; Strabo, xvi. 2 21; Tacitus, Hist. v 6; Lk 1<sup>5</sup>, Ac 28<sup>21</sup>), also to include a portion, approximately, of the trans-Jordanic country (Ant. xii iv 11; Mt 19<sup>1</sup>, Mk 10<sup>1</sup>, Ptol. v 16. 9). Apart from this usage, the name ordinarily—as we find in NT and the writings of Josephus—was applied to the southernmost of the three provinces of Palestine, Samaria, Judæa—into which Western Palestine was divided in the time of Christ. With some variations on the north and west borders at different periods, Judæa covered all of the territory south of the Wady Ishar and the village of Akrubbeh (PEFSt, 1881, p 48), from the Mediterranean to the Jordan Valley and the Dead Sea. According to Josephus, its limits extended from a point on the north called Anuath, or Borkeos, with Anna Berkut, to Iardas (possibly Tell Arad), on the edge of the desert, to the south. Its breadth he defines, in general terms, as extending from the river Jordan to Joppa (BJ iii. iii. 5). In other places it is said to have responded with the limits of Samaria and Galilee in the period of its independence. It included the tribal possessions of Simeon, Judah, Benjamin, Dan, and, to some extent at least, of Ephraim.

A distinction should be noted here between the use of the word Judæa to designate strictly Jewish territory, from which the outlying Hellenistic or Gentile towns were excluded, and the Roman usage of the word to designate a political division, which for administrative purposes included all the coast towns south of Mt Carmel, the chief of which in the time of Christ was Cæsarea, the residence of its Procurator. In the one case its northern limit was Antipatris, on the plain of Sharon; in the other it extended to Acre (Ptolemais) beyond Mt. Carmel. The S.E. portion of Judæa has sometimes been designated as a separate district under the name Idumæa, but this term properly describes a settlement of the Edomites in Judæa, and not a separate division of the country. Idumæa, according to Josephus, was one of the eleven toparchies into which Judæa proper was divided for administrative purposes under Roman rule (BJ iii. iii. 5). See IDUMÆA.

2. When our Lord was born, Judæa constituted a part of the dominion of Herod the Great, who accordingly is called by the Evangelists 'king of Judæa' (Lk 1<sup>5</sup>, cf. Mt 2<sup>1</sup>). After the death of Herod, the Roman emperor assumed the right to settle the dispute which had arisen among his sons concerning the division of the kingdom and by his decree Judæa and Samaria were in the partition assigned to Archelaus. The sovereignty of Rome was more fully asserted also at this time in refusing to any of Herod's sons the title 'king.' When by the same authority Archelaus was deposed (A.D. 6), the territory over which he held rule was attached to the province of Syria, and thus for the first time came under immediate Roman rule. From this date it was administered by a governor or procurator, who was chosen from the equestrian order. Following Archelaus the province was administered by five procurators during the life and ministry of Jesus, viz. Coponius (c. A.D. 6-9), Marcus Ambivius (c. 9-12), Annus Rurus (c. 12-15), Valerius Gratus (15-25), Pontius Pilate (26-36). It was during Pilate's rule that the word of God came to John the Baptist in the wilderness, and some years later this Roman procurator made his name for ever infamous by giving sentence that the Christ, whom he had openly declared to be innocent of crime, should be led away to be crucified.

3. The physical features of Judæa are sharply outlined and singularly diversified. Its distinctive characteristics fall naturally into five subdivisions, originally suggested by the OT writers, viz. the 'Plain of the Coast,' the 'Shephelah' or region of the low hills, the 'Hill country,' the 'Negeb' or dry country, and the 'Wilderness.'

The Maritime Plain varies in width from 10 to 16 miles. It is for the most part flat or rolling, and rises gradually toward the base of the mountains. The upper portion (Sharon) is noted for its rich pasturage; the lower (Philistia) for its vast grain-fields, which have yielded enormous crops without the use of fertilizers, except such as nature has distributed over its surface from the wash and waste of the mountains, for forty centuries. The international highway which follows the line of the coast inside the region of the sand-dunes is one of the oldest caravan and military roads in the world. Most of the noted towns of the Plain are on or near this ancient highway. This section of Judæa has no associations with the life or ministry of Jesus, but in the Acts there are several references to visits which were made, or events which took place, in its towns, in connexion with the work of the Apostles or their associates (chs. 8-10 and 18-21).

The 'Shephelah' belongs to the plain rather than to the central ridge of the mountains, from which it is distinctly separated by a series of almost continuous breaks or depressions. It has been aptly described as 'a loose gathering of chalk and limestone hills, round, bare, and featureless, but with an occasional bastion flung well out in front of them.' There are several noted valleys, which begin their courses as wadis in the central range, and cut their way through the Shephelah to the plain. Each of these affords a passage-way into the heart of the mountain stronghold of Judæa, and each has its distinct characteristics and historical associations. Apostles and evangelists entered this region soon after the dispersion of the believers at Jerusalem, and in its limestone grottoes, in the days of the persecutions, multitudes of hunted and outlawed Christians found refuges and hiding-places (HGHL, ch. xi.).

The 'Hill country' or highland region fills most of the space between the Jordan Valley and the sea, and gives character to the district as a whole. In its present condition it is the most rugged and desolate section of the Lebanon range. In former times its hillsides were terraced, and every available break in its table-lands was carefully cultivated; and yet in every period of its history it has been regarded as a rough, stony land, more suitable for pastoral than for agricultural pursuits. Its watershed is an irregular, undulating plateau, which varies in width from 12 to 18 miles. The numerous ravines or torrentcorrugate, its sides, is east and west. On the east side they are short, direct, and deeply cleft; on the west, comparatively long and on the coast often by circuitous routes. The highest elevation (3564 ft.) is er-Ramah, a short distance north of Hebron. The general average of the plateau on which Jerusalem is located is about 2500 ft. South of Hebron there is a gradual descent by steps or terraced slopes to the region which for many centuries has borne the distinctive name 'Negeb,' or dry country.

The 'Wilderness' includes the whole of the eastern slope or declivity of the Judæan mountains. It is a barren, uncultivated region, unique in its setting, and notable above all other sections of the land for its desolation, its loneliness, and its scenes of wild and savage grandeur. The variation in levels from the edge of the plateau to the surface of the Dead Sea is but little short of 4000 ft., nearly one half of which is a precipitous descent from sea-level to the edge of the deeply recessed basin amid the mountains. In this 'land not inhabited' John the Baptist sought seclusion while preparing for his ministry as the forerunner of the Messiah; and here the Holy One, concerning whom he bore record, abode 'forty days tempted of Satan; and was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered unto him' (Mt 3<sup>1-6</sup> || Lk 3<sup>2</sup>, Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup> || Mk 1<sup>12-13</sup>).

4 The sacred memories and thronging events which have been, and for ever shall be, associated with these holy hills cannot be fittingly expressed by voice or pen. In the long ages past the highways of this Judæan plateau have been trodden by the feet of patriarchs, prophets, priests, and kings, and for centuries its sanctuary on Mt. Zion was the dwelling-place of Jehovah; but, more than all else in its wonderful history, it was the place of the incarnation, the self-denying ministry, the agony, the death, the resurrection, and the ascension of the Son of God, the Saviour of the world.

ROBERT L. STEWART.

JUDAH (Ἰούδα).—Two passages in the Gospels mention 'Judah' (RV), or 'Juda' (AV), which is orthographically distinct from 'Judæa' (Ἰουδαία) as well as geographically smaller. The one is Mt 2<sup>6</sup> 'And thou Bethlehem, land of Judah, art in no wise least among the princes of Judah,' etc., alluding to Bethlehem, the birthplace of Christ, in the heart of the hill country. The other is Lk 1<sup>39</sup> 'And Mary arose in these days and went into the hill country with haste, into a city of Judah'; which also probably alludes to some town in the centre of the hill country, the birthplace of John the Baptist. In the latter passage, however, instead of εἰς πόλιν Ἰούδα, Reland in 1714 (Pal. p. 870), endorsed by Robinson in 1841 (BRP 2 i. 206) and others of more recent date, emend to read εἰς πόλιν Ἰούδα, i. e. 'Juttah' in lieu of 'Judah.' But there is no good philological reason for thinking that the latter is a corruption or softer pronunciation of the former; and, as the context would indicate, the word 'Judah' in v<sup>39</sup> seems to be parallel to the 'hill country' of v<sup>65</sup> (cf. Cheyne, art. 'Juttah' in Encyc. Bibl., also Plummer, Int. Crit. Com. ad Lk 1<sup>39</sup>). It is, therefore, probably better to treat the passage as a reference to that portion of the hill country of Judah round about Hebron, or to the south of it. Tradition has fixed upon ʿAin Kārim, a little west of Jerusalem, as the birthplace of John the Baptist. See, further, art. JUDÆA, HILL, etc.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

JUDAS.—1. Judas the son of James. The eleventh name in two lists of the Apostles (Lk 6<sup>16</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>) is Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου. RV 'Judas the son of James' is a better rendering than AV 'Judas the brother of James'. The note in RVm is 'Or brother'. See Jude<sup>1</sup>, but in Jude<sup>1</sup> there is no reference to the Gt text is ἀδελφός Ἰακώβου. The AV text is 'the brother of James'; possible; but it is improbable that Ἰούδας has two different meanings in one short list of names (cf. AV and RV 'James the son of Alphaeus'), and it is noteworthy that in Lk 3<sup>16</sup> ἀδελφός is expressed. The AV rendering may have been caused by Jude<sup>1</sup>; certainly it has led to the erroneous identification of these two Judases. The evidence of Versions is in favour of RV. Syr<sup>peab</sup> and Theb have 'son of'; 'none suggests the exceptional rendering "the brother of"' (Plummer in Smith's DB, vol. i, pt. 2). Syr<sup>ant</sup> has 'Judas son of James' instead of Thaddæus or Lebbaeus in Mt 10<sup>4</sup>.

In two lists of the Apostles (Mt 10<sup>4</sup>, Mk 3<sup>18</sup>) 'Judas the son of James' has no place; the other names correspond in all four lists. In Mt and Mk. Thaddæus (v l, in Mt, Lebbaeus) is one of the Twelve. There is little doubt that 'Judas the son of James' had a second name 'Thaddæus', and perhaps a third name 'Lebbaeus'. Jerome (Com. in loc) calls him trinomius. Cf. Nestle in Hastings' DB iv. 741.

It is significant that on the only occasion when this obscure Apostle is referred to in the Gospels, he is mentioned from his notorious namesake as 'Judas, the brother of James' (Jn 14<sup>22</sup>). All that we know of 'Judas Thaddæus' is that he asked the question, 'Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?' He could not understand how the kingdom was to come unless the Messiah would make a public disclosure (ἐμφανίσω) of His glory. The answer of Jesus explains that in the very nature of the case it is not possible for Him to reveal His glory to unloving and disobedient hearts. The question of Judas Thaddæus expressed the thought not only of other members of the Apostolic band, but also of many who have since believed in Christ. Our Lord's words have a message for all disciples whose impatience is an evidence of the influence of the world. Well may St Paul claim to have the mind of Christ when he affirms that 'the natural man' is not only unable to 'receive' and to 'know' spiritual things, but is also incompetent to 'interpret' and to 'judge' them (cf. 1 Co 2<sup>13ff</sup>).

Concerning this Apostle, who is little more than a name in the Gospels, there has been much discussion. In Jn 14<sup>22</sup> Syr<sup>sin</sup> has 'Thomas', Syr<sup>cur</sup> has 'Judas Thomas'. Plummer (op. cit.) is probably right in regarding the latter as 'a corrupt reading arising from the fact that the Syrian Christians called Thomas the Apostle Judas'. Eusebius (HE i. 13. 10) refers, in his narrative concerning Abgar, king of Edessa, to 'Judas who was also called Thomas'. McGiffert (Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers i. 562) suggests that 'it is possible that Eusebius, or the translator of the document, made a mistake and applied to Thomas a name which in the original was given to Thaddæus'.

But Thomas is also called Judas Thomas in Acts of Thomas, c. 111, 31, 39, and in the Syriac Doctrina Apostolorum. Vreuschen (Heinecke, Handbuch zu den NT Apokryphen, p. 562) says 'In regard to the name Judas-Thomas, i.e. Judas the Twin, cf. Doctrina of Addai (p. 5, ed Phillips), Bar-Hebraeus, Chronicon Ece in 2 The Syriac translation of Eusebius, Ch. Hist. 1.13.10, renders the Gr. 'Ιούδας ὁ πάλαι σωμαίος by ܝܘܕܐܬܐ ܕܥܡܐܝܐ which, according to the Nestorian pronunciation of the Syriac, must have been understood to mean Judas the Twin'. It is possible that these Syriac traditions preserve the personal name of Thomas 'the Twin', it is impossible to believe that in the Fourth Gospel the Judas of 14<sup>22</sup> and the doubting Apostle are the same.

2. Judas the brother of James.—In two Gospels (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>, Mk 6<sup>3</sup>) 'James and Joseph and Simon and Judas' are named as brothers of Jesus. In Jude<sup>1</sup> the author of that Epistle is described as 'Judas . . . the brother of James' (RV). The AV has 'Jude', and in Mk 6<sup>3</sup> 'Juda'. 'Judas the brother of James' is, therefore, a Scriptural and simple, yet sufficient name for the person so named from 'Judas t . . . who was an Apostle. The use of the full expression ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου in the Epistle of Jude, and the statement (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>) that Judas and James were οἱ ἀδελφοί [Ἰησοῦ], justifies the limiting of the title 'the brother of James' to the Judas who was also a 'brother of Jesus.' Much confusion has been caused by the erroneous AV rendering of 'Ιούδας Ἰακώβου (cf. No. 1 above).

Of 'Judas the brother of James' as an individual we know nothing; but account should be taken of what is said collectively of our Lord's brothers. He was probably a son of Joseph and Mary, and a younger brother of Jesus (cf. 'Brethren of the Lord' in Hastings' DB); he misunderstood the popularity of Jesus (Mt 12<sup>40ff</sup>), who was, in his estimation, a foolish enthusiast (Mk 3<sup>21</sup>), before the resurrection of Jesus he did not acknowledge his Brother as the Messiah (Jn 7<sup>35ff</sup>), but after the resurrection he is found 'in prayer' in the upper room (Ac 1<sup>14</sup>); his doubts, like those of his brother James (1 Co 15<sup>7</sup>), may have vanished in the presence of the risen Lord. The distinct mention of the brothers of Jesus (Ac 1<sup>14</sup>) after the Eleven have been named, is another reason for rejecting the tradition which identifies 'Judas the brother of James' with Judas Thaddæus the Apostle.

The authorship of the Epistle of Jude is much disputed. Harnack regards the words 'brother of James' as an interpolation added towards the end of the 2nd cent. to enhance the value of the Epistle 'as a weapon against Gnosticism'. But 'the simplest interpretation of the salutation, which identifies the writer . . . with the brother of the Lord, is the best' (Chase, Hastings' DB n. 804a).

Eusebius (HE in 19. 201<sup>8</sup> 32) quotes from the Acts of the Apostles an accusation brought against Jesus, 'that he had called his brothers of the Saviour, whose name was Judas', it is further said that 'after they had borne testimony before Domitian in behalf of faith in Christ . . . they took the lead of every church as witnesses and as relatives of the Lord'. If 'Judas the brother of James' presided over the Church in the East, where he lived, he may well have been the author of an Epistle. Mr. Lewis conjectures that 'Thomas, the doubting disciple, is identical with Jude, the brother of James of our Lord', but this theory involves his being the author of our statement in Jn 7<sup>3</sup> that our Lord's brothers did not believe that He was the Messiah (cf. Expt xiv. 398; also Rendel Harris, The Discourse in the Christian Legends).

i THE NT SOURCES.—The basis of any satisfactory solution of the complex and perplexing problem of the Judas must be a comprehensive and careful study of the words of Jesus and the records of the Evangelists. Interest in his life and character may have been unduly sacrificed to dogmatic discussions of 'fix'd fate, free will, absolute,' but the reaction in favor of 'deterministic' methods of study may be carried to excess. Conclusions arrived at by the use of these methods are not always consistent with the historical data furnished by the Gospels. In psychological as well as theological investigations, the Gospels may prove an unsafe guide; at least the lines laid down in the documents which are the main sources of our information. Theories framed by induction from a critical comparison of the narratives may claim to be attempts to untie the knot, but theories involving excisions from, and conjectural emendations of, the text of the Gospels and Acts are mere cuttings of the knot. A frank admission that there are difficulties at the present time is preferable to the adoption of such violent methods of removing them. The NT material available for the investigation of the subject in its manifold aspects is found in the following passages:

- 2 Early allusions to Judas. Jn 6<sup>4ff</sup> 12<sup>4ff</sup>, Lk 22<sup>4</sup> (cf. Mk 14<sup>4ff</sup>, Mt 26<sup>4ff</sup>).
- 3 The narratives of the Betrayal. Mk 14<sup>10ff</sup>, Mt 26<sup>14ff</sup>, Lk 22<sup>4ff</sup>, Jn 13<sup>2ff</sup>, Mk 14<sup>18ff</sup>, Mt 26<sup>21ff</sup>, Lk 22<sup>21ff</sup>, Jn 13<sup>21ff</sup>, Mk 14<sup>43ff</sup>, Mt 26<sup>47ff</sup>, Lk 22<sup>47ff</sup>, Jn 13<sup>21ff</sup>.
- 4 The two accounts of the death of Judas. Mt 27<sup>3ff</sup>, Ac 1<sup>16ff</sup>.

From this classification it will be seen that, with the exception of Lk 22<sup>3</sup>, the Synoptists say nothing about Judas before the Betrayal; their account of the Betrayal also differs in many details from that given in the Fourth Gospel. Some divergent traditions it is difficult, and perhaps impossible, to harmonize. That the one is an intentional contradiction, or that they are contradictory, must be carefully examined; suggestions that they are supplementary, or mutually explanatory, must be fairly considered. Statements in the Fourth Gospel which are said to show John's bias against Judas will be investigated in due course.

ii. NAME AND DESIGNATIONS.—(a) Judas.—In all the lists of the Twelve this is the name of the Apostle mentioned last. Another Apostle (see preced. art. No. 1) bore this common Jewish name, but 'Judas' now means the Betrayer of Jesus. His sin has stamped the word with such evil significance that it has become the class-name of traitors, who are 'no better than Judases', 'Judas-trap,' etc.).

'Ιούδας is the Gr. form of the Heb. Judah (יְהוּדָה), which in Gn 29<sup>35</sup> is derived from the verb 'to praise' (הָלַל), and is taken to mean 'he who is the subject of praise' (cf. Gn 49<sup>8</sup>). The name is not counted, but in its popular sense it suggests a synonym for shame.

(b) Iscariot, the usual surname of Judas. 'Ισκαριώθ, a transliteration from Heb. is the subject of the reading in Mk 3<sup>19</sup> 14<sup>10</sup>, Lk 6<sup>11</sup>. The Greek form in the Græcized form in Mt 26<sup>14</sup>, Lk 22<sup>4</sup>, Jn 13<sup>21</sup>; δ' Ἰσκαριώτης in Mt 10<sup>4</sup>, Jn 12<sup>4</sup> 14<sup>22</sup>. Eight of these passages refer to Judas; in two (Jn 6<sup>71</sup> 13<sup>26</sup>) his father Simon is called Iscariot; once (Jn 14<sup>22</sup>) his fellow-Apostle is distinguished from his more famous namesake as 'not the Iscariot.' Only in Jn 13<sup>2</sup> does the full phrase occur—'Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon.' Nestle thinks that ἀπὸ Καριώτου, a reading of Codex Bezae, found four times in Jn instead of Ἰσκαριώτης, is a γαλιλιθαῖος rendering of Iscariot by the author of the Fourth Gospel. Chase furnishes other evidence for this reading (The Syno-Latin Text of the Gospels, p. 1021), but argues that it cannot be part of the original text. His conclusion is that an early Syriac translator represented Ἰσκαριώτης by this paraphrase (cf. ExpT ix. pp. 189, 240, 285).

Two facts already mentioned have an important bearing on the interpretation of Ἰσκαριώτης (1) the true reading, 'Simon Iscariot,' shows that the epithet was applicable to the father and the son, and (2) the use of the word suggests that it is a local name; (2) the paraphrase ἀπὸ Καριώτου confirms the view that Judas is named after his place of abode (cf. Zahn, Das Evangelium des Matthäus, p. 393). Cheyne says 'we should have expected ἀπο Κεριώθ,' yet admits that 'it is a plausible view' that Ἰσκαριώτης is derived from Ish-Kerioth (קריה איש), 'a man of Kerioth' (Ency. Bibl. ii. 2624). Dalman (The Words of Jesus, p. 51 f.) thinks that Ἰσκαριώθ was the original reading, and points back to the Hebrew, whilst ἀπὸ Καριώτου corresponds to the נקריה קריה. Hence the name probably means 'a Keriothite.'

It is impossible to say with certainty where the Kerioth was situate of which Judas was a native. (1) On account of this difficult reading, Ἰσκαριώτης, that Ἰεριχωῖτης, 'a man of Jericho,' is a possible reading. (2) The majority of scholars incline to the view that Kerioth is the Kerioth-Hezion or Hazor of Jos 15<sup>28</sup> (Vulg. Carioth); Buhl identifies the place with 'Kerioth' in South Judah (GAP p. 182). (3) The Kerioth mentioned in Am 2<sup>3</sup>, Jer 48<sup>34</sup> (LXX Καριώθ),—an important city, either Kir-Moab, or Ar, the capital of Moab. Harper ('Am. and Hos.,' Int. Crit. Com. p. 42) says that 'the reference in the Moabite stone (l. 13) favours Ewald's view that it is another name for Ar.' A less probable opinion is that the town referred to is Kopeau or Kurawa (Jos. BJ i. vi. 5, iv. viii. 1; Ant. xiv. iii. 4) in North Judaea (Buhl, GAP p. 181). If any one of these towns was the birthplace of Judas, he was not a Galilaean.

(c) 'One of the Twelve.'—In the Synoptic Gospels this phrase is found only in the narrative of the Betrayal, and it is applied only to Judas. It marks the mingled sorrow and indignation of the Evangelists, that within that select circle there could be a single treacherous heart. The simple formula is once changed by St. Luke (22<sup>3</sup>), who adds to his statement that 'Satan entered into Judas' these significant words: 'being of the number of the twelve'—i.e. counted among those whom Jesus called His friends, but about to become an ally of His foes, because in spirit he was 'none of his' (cf. Mt 26<sup>47</sup>, Mk 14<sup>10, 20, 43</sup>, Lk 22<sup>37</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel the phrase is used once of another than Judas; like a note of exclamation, it expresses surprise that Thomas, a member of the Apostolic band, was absent when the risen Saviour appeared to His disciples (Jn 20<sup>24</sup>). But St. John also applies the phrase to Judas, giving it a position in which its tragic and pathetic emphasis cannot be mistaken: 'You—the twelve, did not I choose? and of you one is a devil. Now he spake of Judas, the son of Simon Iscariot; for it was he that was about to betray him—one of the twelve' (6<sup>70, 71</sup>). St. John's phrase (ἐκ ἐκ τῶν δώδεκα) differs slightly from that used by the Synoptists (ἐκ τῶν δώδεκα); Westcott suggests that it marks 'the unity of the body to which the unfaithful member belonged' (Com. in loc.).

That Judas was 'one of the twelve' is an important factor in the problem presented by his history. It implies that Jesus saw in him the material out of which an Apostle might have been made,—the clay out of which a vessel unto honour might have been shaped; it implies that Judas, of free-will, chose to follow Jesus and to continue with Him; and it implies that Judas heard from the Master's lips a serious warning against the peril of his

On the other hand, the fact that Judas was 'one of the twelve' does not imply that Jesus had the betrayal in view when He chose this Apostle and entrusted him with the common purse; it does not imply that even in that most holy environment Judas was exempted from the working of the spiritual law that such 'evil things' as 'thefts . . . covetings, . . . deceit . . . proceed from within, and defile the man' (Mk 7<sup>21</sup>); and it does not imply that there were no good impulses in the heart of Judas when he became a disciple of Jesus. Or Judas in his darkest hour the words of Lavater are true: he 'acted like Satan, but like a Satan who had it in him to be an Apostle.'

In Mk 14<sup>10</sup> the best supported reading (NBCLM) is ὁ ἐκ τῶν δώδεκα, with a note in RVm—'Gr. the one of the twelve.' Wright (Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, p. 31, cf. p. 147) is of opinion that Mk. distinctly calls Judas 'the chief of the twelve.' He takes ὁ ἐκ as equal to ὁ πρῶτος, as in τῇ μὲν τῶν σαββάρων (Mk 16<sup>2</sup>). But the definite article is not found with ὁ ἐκ in any other passage in the Gospels; it is almost impossible to believe that when the Gospels were written the assertion that Judas was 'the chief' or even primus inter pares had a place in the original text. On the other hand, Field (Notes on the Translation of the NT, in loc.) is scarcely justified in saying 'ὁ ἐκ τῶν δ. can mean nothing but "the first (No. 1) of the twelve," which is absurd.' The unique reading may, however, preserve a genuine reminiscence of a time in the earlier ministry of Jesus when Judas, the treasurer of the Apostolic company, had a kind of priority. If this were so, there would come a time when, as Wright suggests, the supporters of Judas would become 'jealous of the honour bestowed on Peter.'† Jealousy would account not only for the dispute about rival claims to be the greatest, but also for the respective positions of Judas and Peter at the Last Supper. The most probable explanation of the phrase (Mt 26<sup>23</sup>, Jn 13<sup>28, 29</sup>) is that John was reclining on the right of Jesus; but Judas 'claimed and obtained the chief seat at the table' next Jesus, and was reclining on His left, whilst 'the lowest place was voluntarily taken by Peter, who felt keenly the Lord's rebuke of this strife for precedence' (cf. Andrews, The Life of our Lord, p. 485; Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 493).

(d) 'A thief.'—The meaning of the statement that 'Judas was a thief' (Jn 12<sup>6</sup>) is quite plain, if the RV correctly renders the following sentence 'and having the bag, took away . . . what was put therein' βαρύνω means (1) 'to carry' (2) to bear away, as in Jn 20<sup>15</sup> (cf. 'cattle-lifting'). Its use in the sense of bearing away secretly or pilfering is established (cf. Field, op. cit. in loc.). In this context the statement that Judas carried the money put into the bag which was in his possession seems singularly tame, if it is not mere repetition. On the other hand, to say that Judas had formed the habit of pilfering is a natural explanation of

† There is force in Edersheim's remark (Life and Times, ii. 536), that 'viewed in its primary elements (not in its development) Peter's character was, among the disciples, the likeliest to that of Judas.'

the assertion that he had been guilty of theft Weiss (Leben Jesu, II 443) thinks that 'John had found out thefts committed by the greedy Judas', this does not necessarily imply that the thefts were known to John at the time of Mary's anointing, for they may have come to light after that act, but before the narrative was shaped in this form.

The rendering of ἔβαστασεν by the neutral word 'bare' is adopted by some, who hold that John's words do not imply more than that Judas had a thievish disposition. Ainger adopts this interpretation in a finely-wrought study of the character of Judas (The Gospel and Human Life, p. 231). It is true in a sense that 'he may have been a thief long before he began to steal,' but this exposition involves the unlikely assumption that the betrayal of Jesus was the 'first act by which he converted his spirit of greed into actual money profit.' If Judas had not formed the habit of pilfering, it is more difficult to understand how the thirty pieces of silver could be a real temptation to him.

Cheyne gets rid of the difficulty by assuming that the text is corrupt. In his conjectural emendation the word 'thief' has no place, he reads 'because he was a harsh man, and used to carry the common purse' (ὅτι ὁ κοινὸν βαλάντιον ἔβασταζε). The statement 'in this text the text is then naively said to be 'worthy of more notice' has sometimes received from advanced critics' (Ency. Bibl. II 2025).

(e) 'Betrayal' or 'traitor'.—In the list of the Apostles given in Lk 6<sup>16</sup> there is a variation from the phrase by which Judas is usually described. Instead of ὁς καὶ παρέδωκεν αὐτὸν ('who also betrayed him,' lit. 'delivered him up') St. Luke has ὁς ἐγένετο προδότης, well rendered by Field—'who turned traitor' (cf. Amer RV 'became a traitor'; Weymouth, 'proved to be a traitor'). The translation in the EV—'which was the traitor'—neither brings out the force of γίνομαι, nor the significance of the omission of the article.

The statement that Judas 'turned traitor' should be remembered in framing or interpreting the stories to account for his history; it comes in what has been said on this subject under (c). From this point of view the various phrases used in the Gospels will repay careful discrimination: most frequent is the simple statement of the tragic deed as a historic fact—'who betrayed him' (Mk 3<sup>19</sup> παρέδωκεν); but there is also the prophecy, 'The Son of Man is about to be betrayed' (Mt 17<sup>22</sup> μελλεῖ παραδίδωσθαι), and the statement, when the time was drawing nigh, that the process had already begun, 'The Son of Man is being betrayed' (Mt 26<sup>4</sup> παραδίδωται). Similarly, Judas is described as 'he who would betray him' (Jn 6<sup>64</sup> ὁ παραδίδωσκων), 'he who is betraying me' (Mt 26<sup>46</sup> ὁ παραδίδούς), and as 'he who had betrayed him' (Mt 27<sup>3</sup> ὁ παραδούς). In this connexion Jn 6<sup>64</sup> deserves special attention: 'Jesus knew from the beginning who it was that should betray him. Needless difficulties are occasioned when 'from the beginning' is regarded as referring to any period before the call of Judas; the thought seems to be that Jesus perceived 'from the beginning' of His intercourse with Judas the spirit that was in him. Hence the statement is wrongly interpreted in a fatalistic sense. The rendering, 'Jesus knew who it was that would betray him' has the advantage of suggesting that Jesus discerned the thoughts and intents of His unfaithful Apostle, and knew that 'the germ of the traitor-spirit was already in the heart of Judas' (cf. W. F. Moulton in Schaff's Popular Commentary, in loc.).

(f) 'A devil'.—In Jn 6<sup>70</sup> there is a contrast between the hopes of Jesus when He chose (ἐξελέ- ἐξέμην) the Twelve, and His present grief over the moral deterioration of one whose nature is now devilish (διάβολός ἐστιν). Our Lord's spiritual discourse to the multitude brought all who heard it to the parting of the ways, it shattered the hopes of those who were eager to share in the glories of an earthly kingdom. On the inner circle of the Apostles that teaching also cast its clarifying light; to Jesus, though not to Peter, it was plain that Judas was at heart a deserter,—in sympathy with those who 'went back and walked no more with him.' What Jesus detected in Judas was 'a sudden crystallization of evil, diabolic purpose, which made him a very adversary of the one whom he called friend' (Wright, op. cit. in loc.). But an adversary is not an irreconcilable foe; the assertion taken in its full strength of ἐναντίος is a message of conciliation as well as of warning. It involved no lowering of the position of Judas among the Twelve, for his name is not mentioned; and it assuredly involved no relaxing of our Lord's efforts to scatter with the light of love the gloom which was creeping into the heart of one whom He had chosen 'to be with him.' A strained interpretation of the saying underlies the statement that it 'appears to be inconsistent with the equal confidence in all the disciples shown by Jesus according to the Synoptic tradition' (Ency. Bibl. II. 2624). 'No man,' says Pressensé, 'could be more akin to a devil than a perverted apostle' (Jesus Christ, p. 324).

(g) 'Son of perdition'.—The Gr. word rendered 'perdition' in this phrase (Jn 17<sup>12</sup>) is ἀπώλεια, 'state of being lost'. It is the same word as ἀπώλετο, from the same root as the main verb of the sentence (ἀπώλετο). The connexion of thought is not easy to reproduce in English. Ainger (op. cit. p. 227) brings out the sense of the passage in a paraphrase: 'None of them is lost, but he whose very nature it was to be lost—he (that is to say) whose insensibility to the Divine touch, whose inconsiderateness to the heavenly discipline, made it a certainty that he should fall away.' The apostasy of Judas is traced to the 'natural' quality of his character. By a well-known Hebraism Judas is described as the 'son of' that which stamps his nature; he is of such a character that his proper state is one of loss (cf. 2 Th 2<sup>3</sup>). The same word (ἀπώλεια) is rendered 'waste' in the Synoptic account of Mary's anointing (Mt 26<sup>9</sup>, Mk 14<sup>6</sup>). To what purpose is this waste? was the expression of indignation of 'some' (Mk.) of the disciples; perhaps it was originally the question of Judas, though St. John does not say so. It may well be, however, that he whose audible murmur, 'Why this loss or waste?' was echoed by the other disciples is himself described by Jesus as 'the son of loss'—'the waster.'

This verse (Jn 17<sup>12</sup>) is often appealed to by rival champions of Calvinism and Arminianism. Dr. B. Shop Sanderson's Works (v. 324f) there is a letter to him from H. Hammond, who affirms that 'here it is expressly said that Judas, though by his apostasy now become the son of perdition, was by God given to Christ.' But the true reading is, 'I kept them in thy name which thou hast given me' (RV), and the thought (cf. v. 13 'those whom thou hast given me') is rather that 'the Father's object is attained' are those 'given' to the Son, therefore, was not so given. 'To suppose that Judas was brought before us as one originally doomed to perdition, and that his character was but the evolving of his doom would contradict not only the meaning of the Hebraic expression 'son of' (which always takes for granted moral choice), but the whole teaching of this Gospel. In no book of the NT is the idea of will, or choice on the part of man, brought forward so repeatedly and with so great an emphasis' (W. F. Moulton, op. cit. in loc.).

iii. OTHER NT REFERENCES TO JUDAS.—(a) Before the Betrayal.—The obscurity which rests upon the early history of Judas accounts to a large extent for the difficulty of estimating his character. But for occasional allusions in the Fourth Gospel, all that is related of him before the Betrayal is that he was one of the chosen Twelve, and that he turned traitor. There is, however, a statement peculiar to St. Luke among the Synoptists, which is obviously intended to furnish an explanation of the act of Betrayal—'Satan entered into Judas' (22<sup>3</sup>). It finds a fitting place in the introduction to the narrative of the Betrayal in the psychological Gospel which so often gives internal reasons; 'the Gospel of the physician' is also the Gospel of the psychologist' (Alexander, Leading Ideas of the Gospels, p. 107). The same phrase, 'Satan entered into him' (εἰσῆλθεν εἰς ἐκεῖνον ὁ Σατανᾶς), is also found in Jn 13<sup>27</sup>, and it is preceded by the statement (13<sup>2</sup>) that the devil had 'already put into the heart (ἡδὴ βεβληκὸς εἰς τὴν καρδίαν) of Judas' the thought of betrayal. It is true, as Cheyne says (Ency. Bibl. ii 2625), that in Jn. we have 'a modification of the Synoptic tradition,' but that is not equivalent to 'quite a different account.' So far from asserting that 'it was at the Last Supper that the hateful idea occurred to Judas,' St. John prefaces his discussion of the proceedings at the Supper (δείπνου γινόμενου) by the emphatic assertion that 'already' (ἡδὴ), i.e. at some time other than the Supper, the suggestion of the devil had been entertained by Judas. In St. Luke's brief account it is said, once for all, that 'Satan entered into Judas.' In the Fourth Gospel the genesis of the foul purpose is distinguished from its consummation; the Satanic influences were not irresistible; the devil had not full possession of the heart of Judas until, 'after the sop,' he acted on the suggestion which had then become his own resolve.

* Our Lord's words to Pilate, 'He that delivered me unto thee hath greater sin' (Jn 19<sup>11</sup>), are sometimes applied to Judas; but the reference is almost certainly to Caiaphas.

The Fourth Gospel also makes the Anointing at Bethany (12<sup>4</sup>) a definite stage in the process which is sometimes called the 'demonizing' of Judas, but is better described as his 'giving place to the devil' (Eph 4<sup>27</sup>). St. Luke does not mention Mary's anointing. St. Matthew and St. Mark have full accounts of it, but Judas is not named; yet immediately after the narrative of the Anointing both Mt. and Mk. place Judas' offer to the chief priests to betray Jesus for money, thus clearly recognizing an intimate connexion between the two events. St. John explains this sequence by adding the significant detail that the murmuring against the Anointment had its origin in the fact that Judas' defence of Mary's beautiful deed implied a rebuke to Judas, and unmasked his covetousness. Moreover, our Lord's plain references to His coming death involved the discomfiture of His apostles. The reproof would rankle; the disappointment would be acute. The angry spirit engendered by such emotions is closely akin to the spirit of treachery and revenge. On insufficient grounds, therefore, could speak of 'John's evident attempt to belittle Judas' (Int. Crit. Con., note on Mk 14<sup>4</sup>). No more likely origin of the murmuring, which was not confined to Judas (Mk 14<sup>4</sup>, Mt 26<sup>8</sup>), is suggested. On the other hand, there seems to be no reason for belittling St. John; his addition to the Synoptic Gospels justifies their association of Mary's anointing with Judas' desertion of Christ; it also furnishes a link between the Anointing of which St. Luke gives no account and his statement 'Satan entered into Judas,'—that statement is the psychological explanation of the actions of Judas recorded in the narratives of the Anointing and the Last Supper.

(b) Describing the Betrayal.—In the Passion narratives all the Gospels refer to our Lord's consciousness of His approaching Betrayal; all record His announcement, at the beginning of the Supper, of the presence of the Betrayer; and all mention the consternation and self-questioning of the Apostles to which that statement gave rise (Mk 14<sup>18f</sup>, Mt 26<sup>21f</sup>, Lk 22<sup>21f</sup>, Jn 13<sup>21f</sup>). There is no reason to suppose (Weiss) that Judas was definitely indicated by our Lord's words, 'He that dipped his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me' (Mt 26<sup>23</sup>). Before the lamb was placed on the table, each guest dipped his own bread into the bitter sauce and ate the sop. The aorist participle (ὁ ἐμβαλῶν) refers to this act, but does not necessarily fix its time; as thus interpreted, the phrase is in harmony with the vague expression 'that man,' used twice in v. 24, with the passage quoted (Jn 13<sup>18</sup>) from Ps 41<sup>9</sup> ('He that eateth my bread'; cf. 'messmate'), and with the parallel passage in Mk 14<sup>20</sup> where the present participle is used (ὁ ἐμβαλλόμενος). An addition to the Synoptic tradition is found in the Fourth Gospel, which describes Jesus as giving a sop to Judas (13<sup>26</sup>). At Eastern meals this was a mark of special attention (cf. Macmillan, 'A Mock Sacrament,' in F. M. T. iii. 107 f.); our Lord's action would indicate that he was to the disciple who was 'leaning back' on His breast, though it left John, like the rest, in ignorance of the meaning of the words with which Jesus urged Judas to hasten the work he was already doing (v. 27). To the traitor himself the words of Jesus, gradually narrowing in their range and therefore increasing in intensity, were at once a tender appeal and a final warning. St. Matthew alone records the question of Judas, 'Is it I, Rabbi?' and our Lord's answer, 'Thou hast said' (26<sup>26</sup>). If Judas had the chief seat at the table next to Jesus (cf. above, i (c)), the assent conveyed, perhaps in a whisper and certainly not in the ordinary form (cf. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, 308 f.), must have had for him a tragic significance. As Zahn points out (op. cit. in loc.), the pronoun in σὺ εἶπας heightens the contrast between the questioner and the speaker, and conveys the meaning, 'What thou hast said, there is no need for me to say.' St. Matthew does not state that at this juncture Judas left the Supper-table, but the next allusion to Judas (v. 47) implies an absence of some duration. The probable solution of the much-discussed problem, 'Did Judas eat the Passover?' is that, although he ate the sop given to him by Jesus at the beginning of the Supper, he had gone out into the darkness (Jn 13<sup>30</sup>) before Jesus gave the bread and the wine to His disciples. It is true that in Lk 22 the narrative of the Supper precedes our Lord's announcement of the Betrayer's presence, but the 'order' (13) characteristic of this Gospel does not imply chronological sequence in every detail; Wright (op. cit. 132) accounts for the variation from the parallel passages by the suggestion that St. Luke was influenced by the language of St. Paul in 1 Co 11<sup>29</sup>.

In their accounts of the actual Betrayal of our Lord the Synoptists state that the kiss of Judas was the prearranged signal for His arrest (Mk 14<sup>45</sup>, Mt 26<sup>48</sup>; cf. Lk 22<sup>47</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel nothing is said of the kiss, but a graphic account is given of our Lord's unexpected declaration to His foes that He was the Nazarene for whom they were seeking (18<sup>4</sup>). The silence of St. John is no proof that the kiss was not given, nor is the fact which he records any evidence that the kiss was superfluous. A sufficient motive for the self-manifestation of Jesus is mentioned: 'let these go their way' (v. 8); such a request is appropriate whether the kiss of Judas be placed before or after the question of Jesus, 'Whom seek ye?' If before, our Lord supplemented the Betrayer's signal owing to the hesitancy of the awestruck soldiers, who shrank from arresting Him. If after, Judas must have been disconcerted by our Lord's action; the kiss would not be given until later, when, as his courage returned, he did not scruple to kiss his Master with the unnecessary demonstration of a feigned affection (κατεφίλησεν, Mk 14<sup>48</sup>, Mt 26<sup>48</sup>). Our Lord's discernment of the evil purpose underlying this emotional display is indicated by His question, 'Judas, betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss?' (Lk 22<sup>48</sup>). In Mt 26<sup>50</sup> Jesus is reported to have also said (RV), 'Friend, do that for which thou art come' (cf AV 'Friend, wherefore art thou come?')

Bruce (Expos Gr Test in loc) takes the laconic phrase ἰσὶς ταραί as a 'question in effect, though not in form', its probable meaning is 'Comrade, and as a comrade here?' (cf Bengel, in loc 'Hocce illud est cuius causa ades?'). Blass unnecessarily (cf 22<sup>12</sup>) changes ταραί into αἰρε, which yields the meaning 'take away that for which thou art come,' or 'art thou . . . ταραί is taken from ταραίνω or ταραίνω (cf 22<sup>12</sup>) conjectures that the true reading is ὑποκριναι, 'thou actest a part,' or 'thou art no friend of mine', ταραί is got rid of as a dittograph.

(c) After the Betrayal.—In three of the Gospels (Mk, Lk., Jn) there is no mention of the Betrayer after the arrest of Jesus; but Mt 27<sup>3a</sup> relates the after-history and fate of Judas as the fulfilment of prophecy. The ascription to Jeremiah of Zec 11<sup>13</sup> . . . to a failure of memory; the . . . quoted, and may include reminiscences of the language of Jeremiah (cf. 18<sup>28</sup>, 19<sup>10</sup>, 32<sup>34</sup>). The absence of Ἰερεμίου from some of the Old Lat. and ancient Syr VSS shows that the name was a . . . to early translators of the NT. Z . . . NT Kanons, II. 696) says that the Nazarenes had a Hebrew MS ascribed to Jeremiah, in which the passage is found verbatim,—'manifestly an . . . invented to save the honour of Matthew. The variations from the Heb and LXX are not consistent with the theory that the Evangelist's narrative is a legend evolved from the passage in Zechariah; they . . . on the supposition that the facts . . . the prophecy. J. H. Bernard 'T . . . 6th series, ix. 422 ff.) shows that St. Matthew's account must be based upon 'a tradition . . . of the prophecy cited.' The . . . of this tradition are thus summarized.—(a) Judas, stricken by remorse, returned the money paid him; (b) he hanged himself in despair; (c) the priests with the money bought a field called the 'Potter's Field,' which was henceforth called Ἀγρός Αἰματός; (d) the field was used as a cemetery for foreigners.' The point of connexion between the fact and the prophecy is the exact correspondence between the amount paid for the prophet's hire and for the prophet of Nazareth's betrayal. In both cases the paltry sum was the expression of the nation's . . . the thirty pieces of silver was the pri . . . (Ex 21<sup>32</sup>). Meditating on the details of the Betrayal, the Evangelist called to mind the experience of Zechariah, and saw in it the treatment of Jesus in which . . . people reached its climax.

In Ac 1<sup>18, 19</sup> a different account of the death of Judas is given. Plummer regards the tradition preserved in the Gospel as 'nearer in time to the event, . . . the truth' (Hastings' DB II. 700). B. . . that the Lukan tradition 'represents the actual facts most nearly' ('Acts' in Cent Bible, Note A). The chief argument for the latter view is a saving of Papias which resembles the statement in Acts, though it adds repulsive details (Cramer, Catena on Mt.). Dr. Rendel Harris, AJTh iv 490 ff., thinks that the Papias tradition is 'the fountainhead of the Judas legends, to which fountainhead Luke lies nearer than Matthew.' The difficulties involved in this supposition are, (1) that it treats the account in Matthew as 'a mere substitution'; (2) that it involves the conjecture of an original reading in Acts, 'he swelled up and burst asunder.' It is more probable that the Papias story contains later additions from folk-lore than that the present text of Acts omits essential details. Dr. Harris points out striking coincidences between the Judas narratives and the accounts of the death of Nadan, the traitorous nephew of Ahikar, Sennacherib's grand vizier; but the . . . not prove that the Ahikar stories are . . . parent' of the Judas stories. Knowing (Expos. Gr Test. in loc.) rightly says 'Whatever may be alleged as to the growth of popular fancy and tradition in the later account in Acts of the death of Judas, it cannot be said to contrast unfavourably with the details given by Papias, Fragment 18, which Blass describes as "insulissima et foedissima." See, further, AKELDAMA.

iv. THE CHARACTER OF JUDAS.—(a) The good motives theory.—Many have . . . to explain the action of Judas as arising . . . treachery and avarice, but from an honest endeavour to arouse Jesus to action and to hasten His Messianic triumph. Modern writers . . . with slight modifications, the theory to . . . charm of De Quincey's literary style . . . fascination out of all proportion to . . . (Works, vi. 21 ff.; cf. Whately, Essays on Dangers to the Christian Faith, Discourse iii.). The theory assumes (1) that Jesus, like Hamlet, was 'sublimely over-gifted for purposes of speculation, . . . but not . . . endowed for the business of action'. . . Judas was alive to the danger resulting from this morbid feature in the temperament of Jesus, and acted not fr . . . with a genuine conviction that if . . . was to be set up on earth, He 'must be compromised before doubts could have time to form.' This theory implies that the judgment of Judas was at fault, but that he had no evil intent; it . . . in the Gospel history, and it is . . . our Lord's stern words of condemnation.

(b) The Satan incarnate theory.—Dante (T. fi. c. xxxiv. 62) places Judas in the Giudecca, the lower circle of the frozen deep of Hell, accounting him a sharer in the sin of Satan, inasmuch as his treachery was aggravated by ingratitude towards his benefactor. A similar tendency to set Judas apart as the arch-villain is manifest in works which reflect the popular imagination. Critics of the Ober-Ammergau Passion-play complain that the Betrayer is represented as a low, cunning rascal, and is often made to look ridiculous. But the comic per-orifications of Judas, as of Satan himself, in folk-lore are really tokens of popular abhorrence (cf Buttner, Judas Ischaroth, p. 11 f.); they are the result . . . as an incarnation of Satanic . . . in the Introduction to . . . on the relation of good to evil . . . oder Betrachtungen über das Böse im Verhältniss zum Guten), conceives Judas as the Satanic kingdom personified in contrast with Jesus who is the Divine kingdom personified; Judas is 'an incarnation of the devil' Dr. Fairbairn, who gives (Studies in the Life of Christ, p. 264 f.) a succinct summary of Daub's 'gruesome book,' truly says that he is 'unjust to Judas, sacrificing his historical and moral significance to a speculative theory.' The practical effect of such exaggerations of the innate vice of Judas is to place him outside the pale of humanity; but they are as untrue to the Evangelists' delineation of his character as are the attempts to explain away his sin. The same objection may be urged against theories which portray Judas as a mere compound of malice and greed, uninfluenced by any high impulse or noble ambition. In the Gospels he appears as a man 'of like nature with ourselves'; he was both tempted of the devil and 'drawn away by his own lust'; Satan approached his soul along avenues by which he draws near to us; he was not 'twofold more a son of hell' than ourselves (Mt 23<sup>15</sup>); he went to 'his own place' in the 'outer darkness,' because he turned away from the 'light of life'; the darkness 'blinded his eyes' because he would not abide in the light, though 'the true light' was shining upon him (cf 1 Jn 2<sup>8ff.</sup>).

(c) The mingled motives theory.—The key to the complex problem of the character of Judas is not to be found in a single word. The desire to simplify his motives has led, on the one hand, to an attempt to exonerate him from guilt; and, on the other hand, to a description of him as the devil incarnate. The truth lies between the two extremes, in Judas, possibilities of good were unrealized because he was 'to the devil'. It is a mistake to say that he was 'against another,' as though a man of covetous disposition may not also be ambitious, and as though an ambitious man may not also be jealous. The references to Judas in the Gospels, to which attention has already been called in this article, furnish reasons, it is believed, for saying that Judas was swayed by all three motives, one being sometimes more prominent than another, and the one reacting upon the other. It may well be that ambition would, for a time, restrain covetousness, and yet revive it in the hour of disappointment; whilst, in turn, jealousy would embitter, and covetousness would degrade ambition.

(a) Violence is done to the statements of the Evangelists when covetousness is eliminated from the motives which influenced Judas. His covetous disposition is not incompatible either with the fact that he was a disciple of Jesus of his own free will, or with his position of trust, or with his remorse at the consequences of his perfidy. (1) The call of Jesus would arouse 'a new affection,' powerful enough to expel for a time all selfish greed, even though Judas, like the rest of the disciples, cherished the hope of attaining to honour in the Messianic kingdom. (2) His position of trust by Jesus to a position of trust (cf. ibid. p. 266); to entrust a man possessing more than ordinary business gifts with the common cash-box is to provide him with an opportunity of honourable service which may become the occasion of his downfall; it was along the line of his capacity to handle money that the temptation came to Judas to handle them to his own gain. (3) The objection that the remorse of Judas discredits the idea of his being actuated by greed of money has force only when covetousness is regarded as the sole motive of the betrayal. What we know of the conduct of Judas towards the close of his career suggests that covetousness—the sin against which Jesus had so earnestly warned His disciples—was once more gaining the upper hand.

(β) To say that Judas was ambitious is not to differentiate him from his fellow-Apostles. The contrast between him and them was gradually brought to light as together they listened to the spiritual teaching of Jesus; that contrast is definitely marked by St. John when he first mentions Judas (6<sup>7</sup>). It was a time of crisis; the Apostles had been severely tested (1) by the refusal of Jesus to accept the homage of the Galilean crowd, who had been impressed by His recent miracles and desired perforce to make Him king; (2) by the searching question, 'Would ye also go away?' (v. 6<sup>7</sup>) put by Jesus to the Twelve, when Master and disciples were alike saddened by the desertion of the many. St. Peter thought he was speaking for all the Twelve when he made his confession of faith; but within that select circle there was one who had not found in Christ all that he was seeking. Jesus saw that already in spirit Judas was a deserter, and, as Westcott points out, a man who regards Christ 'in the light of his own selfish views' is 'turning good into evil' (διαβάλλειν), and is, therefore, a partaker of 'that which is essential to the devil's nature' (Speaker's Com. in loc.). It was in the light of the Betrayal that St. John came not only to recognize in Judas the disloyal Apostle to whom Christ referred without mentioning his name, but also to perceive the meaning of the words of Jesus, 'One of you is a traitor' (6<sup>70</sup>). The whole incident shows that the words and actions of Jesus had proved a disillusionment to Judas; when he joined the disciples of Christ, he hoped for more than 'words of eternal life'; baffled ambition was one of the motives which prompted him to do the devil's work of betrayal.

(γ) Reasons for believing that jealousy was one of the motives which led Judas to turn traitor have been given above (cf. n. (c)). An ambitious man is peculiarly susceptible to this temptation. It would enable Judas to realize that he was in a false position owing to his misconception of the aims of Christ, that his chances of advancement in the coming kingdom were dwindling, and that some of the least of his brethren would be greater than he. In proportion as others gained a higher place than himself in the esteem of Christ, the expectations he had been cherishing would fade. 'Trifles light as air are to the jealous confirmation' of their fears. Fuller knowledge of the life of Judas would probably enable us to see this sin in him more clearly. I may also suggest (cf. op. cit. p. 231) that the 'silence' of Judas is described as 'a sullen and silent person . . . dwelling ever on himself—how he should profit if the cause were victorious, how he might suffer if the cause should fail.' Such a man would be prone to jealousy and 'fit for treasons'.

Whether covetousness, ambition, or jealousy was the basal motive of Judas when he betrayed Jesus, it is difficult, perhaps impossible, to say. It is probable that the flame of resentment, kindled by baffled ambition, was fanned by malign jealousy and base desire to snatch at paltry gain when all seemed lost. That the thirty pieces of silver tormented Judas does not prove that they had never attracted him; that he keenly suffered from the pangs of remorse makes neither his evil deed nor his evil motives good. All that we are warranted in saying is well expressed by Bruce (The Training of the Twelve, p. 367): 'He was bad enough to do the deed of infamy, and good enough to be unable to bear the burden of its guilt. Woe to such a man! Better for him, indeed, that he had never been born!'

v. REFERENCES TO JUDAS IN POST-BIBLICAL LITERATURE.—(a) Apocryphal works.—In the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles Judas Iscariot is mentioned (§ 2). In the Arabic Gospel of the Childhood (§ 35) Judas is represented as being seduced by Satan at the birth of Jesus; he tried to bite Jesus, but could not; he did, however, strike Jesus, and immediately Satan went forth from him in the shape of a mad dog. In the Gospel of Judas (Iren. adv. Her. i. 31; cf. Epiph. xxxviii. 1. 3) the Cainites—an important Gnostic sect—are said to have declared 'that Judas the traitor . . . knowing the truth as no others did, alone accomplished the mystery of the betrayal.' In the Acts of Peter (§ 8), Peter speaks of Judas as his 'fellow-disciple and fellow-apostle'; he also refers to his 'godless act of betrayal.' In the Acts of Thomas (§ 32) the dragon or serpent says, 'I am he who inflamed and bribed Judas to deliver the Messiah to death.' Later (§ 84), there is a warning against 'theft, which enticed Judas Iscariot and caused him to hang himself.' The account of the death of the serpent (§ 32) probably contains reminiscences of the story of the death of Judas; after sucking the poison the serpent 'began to swell,' and ultimately 'burst.' Dr Rendel Harris (op cit. p. 508) quotes from Solomon of Bassora, The Book of the Bee, the following passage: 'Judas Iscariot, the betrayer, . . . was like unto the serpent, because he de . . . with the Lord'.

(b) Early Christian. Clement of Rome (1 Ep. ad Cor. xlv. 8) combines 'the words spoken by our Lord with regard to Judas' (Mt 26<sup>24</sup> = Mk 14<sup>21</sup>) with 'a saying recorded in another connexion in the three Synoptic Gospels' (cf. Mt 18<sup>6f.</sup> etc.). Hermas (Vis. iv. ii. 6) probably borrows the same saying from the Synoptists, 'the change being no greater than we may expect when there . . . (cf. The NT in the Apostolic

Papias refers to the horrible end of Judas (cf. above, iii. (c)) in the fourth book of his 'Expositions of the Oracles of the Lord' (Cramer, Catena in Mat. 27). From the same book Irenæus (adv. Hæc. v. 33<sup>8f.</sup>) quotes an 'unwritten' saying of . . . 'ys when the earth shall be and the animals shall be at peace. Papias further says that 'when the traitor Judas did not give credit to these things, and put the question, "How then can things about to bring forth so abundantly be wrought by the Lord?" the Lord declared, "They who shall come to these [times] shall see".'

Tertullian, like Irenæus (cf. above, v. (a)), condemns the Camites because they held the conduct of Judas to be meritorious; he represents them as saying (adv. omnes Hæreses, ii.) 'Judas, observing that Christ wished to subvert the truth, betrayed Him.' Tertullian also (adv. Marcionem, iv. 40) refers to the treachery of Judas as predetermined by prophecy.

Origen (contra Celsum, ii. 11 f.) replies to the 'childish objection that no good general was ever betrayed'; Celsus is reminded that he had learnt of the betrayal from the Gospels, and that he had called 'the one Judas many disciples,' thus unfairly stating his accusation (cf. also Tract. in Mt. 35).

(c) Folk-lore.—Some of the wild fables about Judas may be traced to the legend of the Wandering Jew (cf. Moncreau D. Conway, art. 'Jew' in Lower Brit. xxi. 674). Another source of popular tradition is a 17th cent. work by Ulrich Vegerle, a Vienna priest, generally known as Abraham a Santa Clara. His Judas der Erbschelm, . . . Lebensbeschreibung des Ischariotschen Bosenichts was translated into several European languages; the English edition bears the title, The Arch-Knave, or the History of Judas from the cradle to the gallows. From the Polychronicon (14th cent.) and the Golden Legend (13th cent.) many stories of Judas, current as folk-lore, are supposed to be derived. Many curious allusions to Judas and quaint customs connected with his name are mentioned in Notes and Queries, ii. 5, 6, 7, iii. 7, iv. 1, v. 6. Cholevius, Geschichte der deutschen Poesie nach ihren antiken Elementen, compares the Judas legend with the Oedipus story.

LITERATURE.—It is superfluous to name Lives of Christ, Commentaries on the Gospels, and articles in Encyclopedias. Mention has already been made of the most important works which deal with the narratives of the life of Judas, to which may now be added Expositor, iii. x (1899) 161 ff., Ker, Sermons, i. 282 ff., Stalker, Trial and Death of Jesus Christ, 110 ff. Interesting studies of references to Judas will be found in the following poems: Story of Rapunzel in Jerusalem, Matthew Arnold, Barabbas, Robert Browning, The Ballad of Judas Iscariot, K. . . . Madrigal Songs, 13 in Lyra Innocentium. Dr. A. B. Grosart mentions Giannini

Sonnet on Judas, a few German poems may be added. Klopstock, Messias, 3d Aufzug, Geibel, Judas Ischariath; Max Crone, Judasutzel and Der Sohn des Verderbens.

J. G. TASKER.

JUDGING (by men).—

In the NT 'to . . . of ἀξιων or its compounds, although ἀξιων . . . ed by other words than 'judge' . . . meaning of ἀξιων is to separate, put aside . . . derivative signification to search into, to investigate, it came to mean to . . . ermine, to dispute . . . to judge.

of the authoritative decisions Christ will declare as to conduct and destiny at the general judgment of the last day. When ἀξιων is not rendered by 'judge' in the NT, it always involves the kindred meaning of reaching a decision, or of action consequent upon a decision. In a number of instances it means to determine to pursue the course decided upon as best. St. Paul had determined (εἰσέπραξεν) to sail past Ephesus (Ac 20<sup>16</sup>); he determined (εἰσέπραξεν) not to know anything among the Corinthians save Jesus Christ and Him crucified (1 Co 2<sup>2</sup>); not to come to them in sorrow (2 Co 2<sup>1</sup>). The Jews denied Jesus before Pilate when he was determined (ἀπεκρίνατο) to let Him go (Ac 3<sup>14</sup>, see also 24<sup>21</sup>, 25<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>27</sup>). In Mt 5<sup>40</sup> ἀπεκρίνατο is rendered 'go to law' in RV, and other forms are rendered 'condemn' (Ac 13<sup>27</sup>), 'called in question' (24<sup>2</sup>), 'ordained' (16<sup>4</sup>), 'esteemeth' (Ro 14<sup>3</sup>).

1. Judging by men permitted and commended.—The right to pass judgment upon both the actions of men and their characters as manifested in their conduct is implied in the power of rational and moral discrimination which all possess. Its exercise is also made imperative by the very nature of things. Men must form an opinion not only of the quality of deeds, but also of those who do them, if there is to be the prudent and wise action in our necessary relations to others, which shall be best for us and for them. St. Paul recognizes this power of moral judgment in even the heathen (Ro 2<sup>14-16</sup>). To this, truth and right conduct may confidently appeal (2 Co 4<sup>2</sup>). He commends those who exercise it upon all moral questions, and hold fast the good it approves, and abstain from the evil it condemns (1 Th 5<sup>21-22</sup>). It is to this moral judgment that all true teaching and preaching appeal. Our Lord assumes that all have the power to know the quality of outward deeds of men, and lays down the principle that the quality of the man corresponds with that of his deeds (Mt 7<sup>15-19</sup>), and, therefore, that we can form a right judgment of men, when the fruitage of their lives matures, however much they may seek to hide under false pretences. To this great principle of judging our Lord made frequent appeal in His controversies with the Pharisees. The Satanic conduct of these leaders proved them the children of the devil,—as having his nature (Jn 8<sup>38-44</sup>),—while His own works made it plain He was from God (Jn 5<sup>36</sup> 10<sup>25</sup> etc.). Even in Mt 7<sup>1-5</sup>, in connexion with our Lord's strongest condemnation of judging, it is implied (vv 2-5) that men may judge others guilty of faults and help to cure them of the failings discovered, if they but be free enough from faults themselves to have the clearest discernment. He also censures the Jews (Lk 12<sup>27</sup>) because they do not judge what is right as to the Messianic time of His preaching, as they do the signs of the sky, and are therefore in danger of arraignment and condemnation at the highest tribunal.

2. The judging which is condemned.—(a) That prompted by a wrong spirit. Of this kind is that forbidden by our Lord in Mt 7<sup>1-4</sup>. It is prompted by a critical and censorious spirit. The man possessed by this disposition subjects others to searching scrutiny to find out faults. Where even the smallest defects are discovered he becomes so absorbed in them that he is oblivious alike of his own greater faults and the greater virtues which may be associated with the minor faults of others. Those who are critical of others in order to find something to blame, instead of being critical of themselves in order to become fitted to help them, will but bring upon themselves from God as well as from men the condemnation they are so ready to mete out to others (see also Lk 6<sup>37</sup>).

(b) Judging according to false or inadequate principles or standards. In Jn 7<sup>23-24</sup>, (c. 5), our Lord condemns judging upon superficial principles—mere literal conformity to outward rules. Had the Jews seen the deeper intent of the Sabbath law, they would not have condemned Him for apparently breaking it by healing a man on that day. It was this superficial standard of conformity on literal and mere legal grounds upon the deeper underlying principle—which constituted judging after the flesh rather than after the spirit. It is only the judging after the spirit that is righteous and to be commended (Jn 8<sup>15</sup>). It is for this reason that the natural (ψυχικός) man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, but he that is spiritual (πνευματικός) judgeth (ἀνακρίνει) all things (1 Co 2<sup>14</sup>). The one has in his nature only that to which the mere outward and superficial appeals—the other has in him that in which the deepest inner principles of life and action find a response. The latter, through this sensitive response of his nature to the deepest truths, can give strict judgment as to their character.

C. GOODSPEED.

JUDGMENT.—The Synoptic Gospels differ from the Gospel of John in their view of a judgment. The former set forth a multitude of external tests which furnish ground for continuous judgment in this life. The 'deeds' or 'works' of a man are a measure of his attitude toward Jesus Christ. The Gospel of John is more especially concerned with the inner and hidden judgment which is being pronounced continually in man's soul. The sensuous and external aspects are little emphasized. All the Gospels hint unmistakably at a final crisis or judgment.

Mt. is pre-eminently the Gospel of judgment, for it is full of Jesus' judgments of men and subjects concerning a separation of good from the bad, as seen in the goats, the wheat from the tares, grain from the chaff, the sincere man from the hypocrite (Mt 23<sup>23-25</sup>, 23<sup>33-35</sup>, 23<sup>36-38</sup>). The present judgment is a foretaste of the final judgment, selected from among His varied teachings in this Gospel, may arise from Matthew's Hebrew predisposition to consider Israel as a people separated from the Gentile world. Almost every utterance carries within it an unmistakable voice of judgment which separates men into two classes, in blessedness, as in the Beatitudes of my Father (25<sup>34</sup>), as is notable as that which leads to separation from Christ and to eternal wretchedness (25<sup>46</sup>).

1. Jesus is the Judge.—This is the view of all the Gospels. The Father gives all judgment to the Son (Jn 5<sup>22-27</sup>). Jesus came into the world for judgment (9<sup>30</sup>). He separates men under moral tests (Mt 23<sup>31-32</sup>, cf. 7<sup>23</sup>). He pronounces judgment on the Pharisees (22<sup>15-16</sup>). He judges Satan (16<sup>23</sup>). He imparts the authority for judgment to men (16<sup>19</sup>). (Cf. Ac 10<sup>42</sup>, Ro 14<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>). His judgment-seat is at the same time the throne of His glory (Mt 25<sup>31</sup>), as it marks the culmination of the work which He has mediated in creation and in redemption. The judgment will be glorious because then will be the final overthrow of holiness among men, and the deposition of evil. It is to be noted that He associates with Himself the twelve disciples (like the Roman assessors of judgment) who are to judge the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>, Lk 22<sup>30</sup>; cf. 1 Co 6<sup>2-3</sup>). This exhibits the vital union of righteous souls with Christ, for the new life which His disciples obtain through Him would dispose them to pronounce judgment upon the same principles of justice as does their Lord. It is fitting that He who has mediated creation, maintenance, and redemption, should pronounce judgment upon man with regard to his attitude and responsibility toward each of these sovereign acts and relations. All judgment is determined by the attitude which men hold towards Christ. He is set forth as a perpetual challenge to men to live a right thinking and right

2. The Judgment.—Jesus in presents an almost numberless series of tests by which men may judge themselves in this present age. Their 'works' or 'deeds' are reviewed (Mt 16<sup>27-28</sup>, cf. Ro 2<sup>6</sup>, Rev 20<sup>12</sup>). Every kindness to a disciple will be rewarded (Mk 9<sup>41</sup>, Mt 10<sup>42</sup>). Every cause of stumbling to one of these little ones (Lk 17<sup>2</sup>) will be punished. Jesus presents Himself as the supreme and personal test. What is man's attitude towards Him as proved by 'his deeds and works'? This kind of judgment is continuous and cumulative here, and comes to a conclusion at the final crisis or judgment. These are some of the tests.

(Mt 418 22 1038 1928, Mk 534); confessing Him (Mt 10 32-33), failure to appreciate His presence and work (Mt 13 12-13), failure to come to Him (Jn 5 40), failure to believe Him (Jn 3 18), failure to obey Him (Jn 3 36), failure to honour Him (Jn 5 23), failure to stand with Him (Mt 12 30), failure of right fruitage (Mt 21 31-42 716, Lk 6 44), failure to be obedient (Mt 23 13), failure to help men (Mt 25 31-32), failure to repent (Jn 5 40), failure to use the gifts of God (Mt 25 14-30), making light of His word (Mt 23 13), unwillingness to hear His word (Mt 23 13), unwillingness to forgive an offender (Mt 18 21-22), being ashamed of Him (Mk 8 38), breaking the spirit of the law (Mt 23 23), failure to love others (Mt 22 37-39), faith or lack of faith (Mt 23 23-24), heart unreceptive to His words (Mt 10 14 15), hypocrisy (Mt 23 36), idle words (Mt 13 18), lip service without the heart (Mt 15 7), selfish conceit (Mt 6 2), wicked pride (Mk 12 38), love of darkness (Jn 3 19), rejection of Him (Mt 23 38), adultery (Mt 19 18-19), loving others more than God (Mt 22 37-39), hearing, seeing the Son, with belief or with failure to believe (Mt 7 24 13-14), love to enemies (Lk 6 27), fidelity of service (Mt 23 23-24), endurance (Lk 21 19), doing will of God (Lk 11 28), deeds in general (Lk 11 28), thoughts and motives (Mk 7 21, Lk 5 22-23).

These are clear, varied, and concrete tests which men may apply daily to conduct and character, and which bring them into continual judgment. They cover almost every phase of human life, both inward and outward. The great first and second commandments in the law which our Lord enunciated to the lawyers (Mt 22<sup>37-39</sup>) are in the nature of a judgment for men know whether or not they have been kept. Judgment is continuous in the sphere of moral life, as conscience continually affirms. They are continuous in the principles and the principles upon which they are based are found in these teachings and in the character of Jesus. No man can plead ignorance of the grounds on which judgment is pronounced on him, because these varied tests cover clearly and openly so much of his life. Jesus always holds Himself forth ('I am the way and the truth and the life,' Jn 14<sup>6</sup>) as the supreme standard of life; and the invitation to come to Him leads to a comparison and judgment of likeness or unlikeness. The work of the Holy Spirit (whom Jesus sends, Jn 16<sup>7</sup>) is to convict men of sin, righteousness, and judgment (v. 8), and He does this by showing men their unlikeness to Christ. The character of Jesus is thus continually a challenge to men, and the measure of the judgment which they must pass on themselves. In all the Gospels, judgment is determined by the relation which a man holds to Jesus Christ. But the Gospels also teach that this continuous judgment will culminate in a crisis or Final Judgment. The inadequacy and inequalities of punishment here seem to demand a final adjusting of the accounts of all men on principles of eternal equity. The parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-26</sup>) exhibits this final accounting and the equitable readjustment of their respective conditions. Lazarus had wretchedness. Dives had luxury. The continuous judgment in this life did not result in the proper rewards and penalties, hence the balances are struck after death. Final judgment and penalty are then reached.

3. The time of this Final Judgment is set forth in the Synoptics as at 'the end of the world' (Mt 13<sup>39</sup>). Some have held that this means at the end of each man's life, but the more obvious meaning is the end of this time-order of race, life, and things (cf. He 9<sup>27</sup>). The words 'the time' (Mt 8<sup>28</sup>), and 'then' (16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>1</sup>), point to a time which follows the resurrection in glory with His angels after the resurrection of the dead. 'That day and hour' (24<sup>36</sup>), 'the resurrection of life' and 'the resurrection of life' (Jn 5<sup>28</sup>), are the antithetical judgments that takes place after the resurrection, which to one class of men is entrance into life, and to the other entrance into judgment followed by spiritual death. The Gospels do not give information as to whether or not the Final Judgment follows immediately on the general resurrection. The weight of impression is that judgment does follow immediately, but it would be by no means an entire misinterpretation of the sayings of Jesus if one held that there was a considerable period of intervening time.

4. All mankind and all evil spirits are to be judged—All nations' (Mt 25<sup>32</sup>) and all men (12<sup>36</sup>, Jn 5<sup>29</sup>) shall be judged (cf. Ro 14<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, Rev. 20<sup>12-15</sup>). It is implied in Mt 8<sup>28</sup> that evil spirits also are to stand in the judgment. But it is clear that the holy angels do not come into judgment, for they accompany and serve the holy Judge (Mt 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>). Judgment would not be necessary for men if it were not for their sin. Wherever there has been need of a redemption, there will be need of a Final Judgment.

5. Characteristics.—Jesus Christ the Judge in His glory (Mt 16<sup>27</sup> 19<sup>28</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup>) [the glory of Jesus will be as manifest in His judgments as in His forgiveness]; 'the throne of his glory' (Mt 25<sup>31</sup>); the holy angels as His servants (cf. Mt 13<sup>1</sup>), mankind gathered before Him; evil spirits awaiting their final doom; the sharp separations of the facts upon which judgment is based; the uncovered moral life of every man; the irrevocableness of the decision (Mt 25<sup>46</sup>),—all these, together with the manifestly diverse feelings of the righteous and the wicked, present a scene of surpassing grandeur, extent, and interest. Judgment stands in the Gospels as the natural terminus of an æon in the life of the race which began with Christ. It was continued under a purpose and a plan of Redemption, and demands a Judgment as its proper culmination.

JUST and 'righteous' in AV represent the same word, dikaos, which, however, has usually the wider meaning of 'righteous, observing Divine and human law, one who is such as he ought to be, prop. the Heb. צדק (Grimm-Thayer), and comprehends duty both to God and to man. The Vulg. had no word available except justus, which means 'what is according to ius, the law', hence 'just' in many places in AV. In the Gospels it is used of Joseph (Mt 1<sup>19</sup>), Simeon (Lk 2<sup>25</sup>), John the Baptist (Mk 6<sup>20</sup>), Joseph of Arimathea (Lk 23<sup>54</sup>), and Christ (Mt 27<sup>19, 24</sup>). In Ac 3<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>62</sup> 22<sup>14</sup> (cf. 1 P 3<sup>18</sup>, and possibly Ja 5<sup>6</sup>) 'the Just One' is a Messianic name corresponding to the prophecies of the Righteous Servant of Jehovah (Is 53<sup>11</sup>; cf. 11<sup>36</sup>, Jer 23<sup>5</sup>); its use 'affords in itself a marvellous proof of the impression made by the human life of Jesus upon those who knew Him best, or who, at all events, like St Stephen, had ample opportunities of learning' (Expos. Gr. Test.). In nearly every case RV uniformly gives 'righteous,' exceptions being Mt 5<sup>45</sup> ('rain on the just and the unjust'), Lk 1<sup>17</sup> ('wisdom of the just') 14<sup>14</sup> ('resurrection of the just'). In Lk 2<sup>25</sup> 'just' might perhaps have been retained with advantage to bring out the difference in the same verse between dikaos and eulabēs, which latter means 'reverencing God, devout' ('dikaos, justus, in officiis: ἀντὶ τοῦ, Vulg. timoratus, in habitu animæ erga Deum'—Bengel).

For full discussion of dikaos see art. RIGHTEOUS.

JUSTICE.—

In the AV of NT the word 'justice' does not occur, dikaos being always translated 'righteousness.' For the adj dikaos we have 'just' and 'righteous' interchangeably. God is just (1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>, Rev 15<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>8</sup>), Christ is the Just One (Ac 3<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>52</sup>), and righteous (1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>). Men, both as individuals and collectively, are just or righteous (Mt 13<sup>19</sup> 54<sup>6</sup> 104<sup>1</sup> 134<sup>3</sup>, Ac 10<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>15</sup>). In Jn 5<sup>30</sup> we have just, and in Rev 18<sup>7</sup> righteous judgment. In Col 4<sup>1</sup> to dikaos refers to what is due by masters to their slaves, and in Mt 20<sup>4</sup> to a money payment for work done. as is partially rectified in the and the adj are sometimes used in the wider sense of moral rectitude in general; but under the influence of the Platonic and Aristotelian later usage inclines to the sense of 'al justice.' Aristotle (Nic.) refers to what is due to one's neighbor. Bks 1111 IV deals with but almost exclusively in the sense of the idea of Good. In 13 wider meaning is restored, and is the common one. In Lk 16 Zacharias and Elisabeth are said to be dikaos; and this is explained, if not defined, by the words πορευόμενοι ἐν τάξει τοῦ ἐντολαῖς καὶ δικαιώμασι τοῦ Κυρίου κεκλιμένοι. This is the general idea of righteousness; but our word 'justice' must be taken as signifying the recognition and fulfilment of what is due from one to another, righteous dealing between persons, each rendering to others what is their right and due. See also art. RIGHTEOUS.

1. The justice of God.—The justice of God is an aspect of His nature and belongs, therefore, to His essence. It may be shown to have significance for the Divine life, even apart from His relation to others. God's attributes are not all of co-ordinate worth. His omnipotence, e.g., is subordinate to His ethical attributes; it does not use them as a means to accomplish its ends, but they use it. Omnipotence is not a power to do what it wills, but to do what God wills; and as His will is holy, it can be only ethically determined. If in God's nature mere power were supreme, and holiness and love subordinate, this would be as contrary to justice as when, in a kingdom, the rule of right has been overturned by irresponsible violence. As in the State, justice is the controlling principle which preserves the body politic for the discharge of its several functions, so, in the Divine justice, we have the regulative principle of order in the Divine nature.

(1) God's justice in His relations with men.—He shows favour to the righteous. He could not withhold His favour from that in them which is the object of His love and delight in Himself. This does not mean that they have a claim on God for a happy earthly lot, and exemption from earthly troubles. This doctrine of recompense was the prevalent one during the early and non-reflective stage of Israel's religious progress; but it did not bear the strain put on it by the national calamities. In the teaching of Christ it is repudiated (Mt 5<sup>45</sup> 13<sup>28, 29</sup>, Lk 16<sup>25</sup> 18<sup>1-5</sup>, Jn 9<sup>2, 3</sup>; and in Ro 8<sup>18-39</sup> and He 12<sup>11</sup> an explanation of the sufferings of the righteous is given which goes far to remove their seeming variance with the justice of God. They are part of His fatherly discipline by which His children are prepared for their heavenly inheritance (2 Co 4<sup>16, 17</sup>, He 5<sup>8</sup>). Even here they have their great reward in the favour and friendship of God (Mt 5<sup>10-12</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>19, 20</sup> 3<sup>12-14</sup>).

(2) God's justice in relation to sin.—God is just, and will therefore punish sin. This is one of the Christian certainties (Gal 6<sup>7</sup>). Different views, however, have been held as to the nature of the punishment and its object. Some think (and this is Ritschl's opinion) that the true punishment of sin consists in the sense of guilt and alienation from God which a persuasion of the Divine displeasure awakens; and that the outward evils which are regarded as punishments are really due to natural causes that have no relation to human guilt (Ritschl, Justification and Reconciliation, 47 ff., 257 ff.). Now, the sense of God's displeasure must always be a most important part of punishment, and might almost be the whole of it, if we could suppose the sinner as responsive to it as he ought to be, as, e.g., a saint made perfect in holiness would be. To such a saint the sense of alienation from God would be harder to bear than the most untoward outward calamity. But sin increasingly blunts the sinner's susceptibility to suffering from this source; and if no effective provision has been made to bring God's displeasure home to him, he would at last work out his term of punishment. There may be no link of causation between our sin and most of the outward evils of life. Maeterlinck may be right in saying that nature knows nothing of justice; but in that case we should have to believe with him that neither can nature be regarded as the creation of a Being in whom ethical attributes are supreme (Maeterlinck, Buried Temple, Essay on the 'Mystery of Justice').

God's justice in relation to sin is at once retributive, educative, and protective. It is retributive because it punishes sin simply as sin; it is educative or reformatory because the punishment is also intended for the moral improvement of the sinner; it is protective because by the punishment sinners are restrained from wrong-doing and are themselves guarded against the evils which would result from the prevalence of unpunished sin. That the Scriptural view of God's justice implies retribution may be shown from many passages - Mt 16<sup>27</sup> 24, 25, Lk 12<sup>45-48</sup>, Ro 2<sup>6</sup> 16, 23, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, Col 3<sup>25</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, He 2<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>27</sup>. One could scarcely gather from these passages that God's sole aim in punishment is the reformation of the offender. Yet this is the popular view with many modern theologians. As a protest against the once prevalent opinion that God, in punishing, desires merely to exact vengeance without any regard to the sinner's repentance, it has its justification. But, like other reactionary views, it carries us too far in the opposite direction. The whole drift of Biblical teaching is that God punishes sinners because they deserve it. Punishment is the reaction of His holy nature against wrong-doing, and without it the moral order of the world could not be maintained. If sin did not arouse His displeasure, He would not be holy; and if He did not manifest His displeasure objectively by punishing men could not know that He is holy. But we should that God is love, and that what love inflicts is chastisement, not punishment in the retributive sense. Holy love, however, cannot accomplish its end unless the sinner is brought to feel that he deserves punishment. How could punishment benefit him if, while undergoing it, he believed that it had not been merited? Retribution does tend to the offender's improvement, and this is part of God's purpose in it; but its reformatory influence never takes effect until the sinner acknowledges its justice. His improvement begins only when he is brought to this state of mind and feeling. If, therefore, God's sole aim were reformation, it would follow that rewards carried with them the same benefits as punishments, as in many cases they do, then the offender would deserve them, and this because of his sin. In like manner it would be very difficult to persuade people that it is right that they should be protected from the spread of violence by the punishment of those to whom punishment was not justly due.

God's justice is also shown in the forgiveness of sins on condition of repentance. Repentance is a sign that the disciplinary purpose which accompanies retribution has not missed its mark; and if now God withheld punishment it would imply a failure of justice. 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>, 'God is faithful and just (δίκαιος) to forgive.' Forgiveness and punishment are alike connected with the justice of God. The justice of forgiveness further appears from this, that the man who repents is a different moral person from the man who had sinned. His relation to his sin has been reversed; for whereas formerly his will was identified with sin, it is now identified with the mind and will of God.

In proportion to the depth and repentance, we feel that he is a changed man, and should no longer be treated as if sin still formed part of the texture of his being. He has separated from, and now unsparingly condemns, his past sinful self; and, having thus come over to the side of God, he is no longer a fit object of the Divine retribution. Theologians, who first make logical distinctions between the Divine attributes and then reason from these as if they were real distinctions, say that justice cannot, but love alone can, forgive; as if love and justice were two contending powers in God's nature. In reality, it is holy love that forgives; and this means that love and justice are joined hand in hand in forgiveness as they are in punishment. From a non-moral love gifts would come, but they might not be blessings; and justice without love never could be perfectly just, for love is part of the tribute which justice demands. The OT and NT writers never attempt to reconcile love and justice, because they were not conscious of any contrariety between them (see Mt 6<sup>12</sup> 14, 15 12<sup>31</sup>, 32 18<sup>15-17</sup>, 21-25, Lk 6<sup>37</sup> 7<sup>37-50</sup> 13<sup>1, 5</sup> 15<sup>11-32</sup> 17<sup>3</sup> 4 18<sup>10-14</sup> 22<sup>61</sup>, 62; cf. Jn 21<sup>15-17</sup>, Ac 2<sup>39</sup> 3<sup>19</sup> 5<sup>31</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>). Of course, imperfection clings to all human repentance, because past sin disqualifies even the sincerest penitent for that godly sorrow for sin 'which worketh repentance not to be repented of' (2 Co 7<sup>10</sup>). Hence the need for the work of Christ and the regenerating influence of the Spirit, by which imperfect repentance is atoned for and made perfect.

2. Justice in man.—If man has been created in the image of God, we should expect to find reflected in him the same supremacy of the ethical attributes as exists in God. Thus for him also justice or righteousness will be the supreme law of his being, obligatory, not through any human convention, but in virtue of man's Godlikeness. As supreme, it will be regulative of his whole life, determining his use of his freedom, the outflow of his emotions and thoughts, his activity in all human relations. Justice will regulate his life Godward, for God has definite claims on man for devotion and service; and as in Christ He has made Himself known as a Father and Saviour, these claims are, for the Christian, raised to a higher sphere of obligation. These are duties which man owes to God, and, when they are withheld, justice is violated. God is robbed when that which is His due is not rendered (Mal 3<sup>6</sup>). Hence the just or righteous (δίκαιος) man is represented as walking 'in all the commandments of the Lord blameless' (Lk 1<sup>6</sup>), and of these the first and greatest is, 'Thou shalt love the Lord with all thy heart' (Mt 22<sup>37</sup>). Not until we give God this whole-hearted love do we give Him His due. We are then 'just before God'; and from 1 Jn 3<sup>10</sup> 17 4<sup>20</sup>, 21 5<sup>1</sup> we learn that only when man responds to God's claim can he fulfil the obligations of love and justice to his fellow-men. That man can be just or unjust in relation to God appears also from passages in which sin is spoken of as a state of indebtedness—God being the creditor and man the debtor (Mt 5<sup>26</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>23-25</sup>, Lk 7<sup>41-43</sup>); and from those parables in which God and man are related as Master and servant, or King and subject (Mt 20<sup>1-16</sup> 21<sup>33-41</sup> 25<sup>14-30</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1-12</sup>).

One characteristic of the NT doctrine of justice, as compared with the views current in the Jewish and classical worlds, is a noteworthy enlargement of its sphere. Justice to man as man was a subject of speculation among the Stoics, but in the popular morality its obligation was ignored and even repudiated. The Jew hated the Samaritan (Lk 9<sup>54</sup>) and despised the Gentile, with whom he would not share his privileges (Ac 21<sup>27-30</sup>). Why should they show favour to those whom God had not honoured? The Greek was bound by moral ties to his fellow-citizens, but between him and the barbarians there was no moral reciprocity; if he was conscious of any obligation, it was an obligation to do them all the injury he could. Then again there was the slave class, who were regarded as incapable of virtue, and, therefore, like the lower animals, outside the ethical sphere. Thus Jew and Gentile alike acknowledged no moral relationship between themselves and the vast majority of the race. It was, therefore, a great step in advance when Christ proclaimed a universal Kingdom of justice and love, and taught that, since God was the Father of all, they were due to all men, on the basis not of citizenship or nationality, but of brotherhood and of their common relationship to God (Mt 5<sup>44-45</sup> 23<sup>19</sup>, Lk 10<sup>30-37</sup>, Jn 3<sup>16</sup> 17).

There was also a subjective enlargement of its sphere. Under the influence of Pharisaic teaching and example, the moral law had come to be regarded as an external rule of conduct, the inner thought and motive and feeling being overlooked or regarded as of only secondary importance. All the virtues had thus suffered deterioration, and justice among them. But in the Sermon on the Mount, Christ claimed this neglected sphere for the moral law. Its authority was extended so as to cover the entire life of men, for in the spiritual realm of being, thoughts and feelings are accounted as deeds, as acts of the moral self. And this was an infinite extension of the sway of justice. 'Out of the heart proceed adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts' (Mk 7<sup>21</sup>). Sin is not confined to outward acts; it begins the moment evil thoughts and desires arise in the heart; and a régime of justice is necessary there. To be angry with our brother without cause is to do him wrong (Mt 5<sup>22</sup>); and the man is accounted guilty who, while refraining from actual murder, yet thinks in his heart, 'I would, if I dared.' Our neighbour has a claim on us, that we should think and feel justly regarding him; and when this is withheld, we fail to give him his due. Again, the sin of adultery may be begun and completed by simply looking on a woman to lust after her (Mt 5<sup>27</sup>). Before the tribunal of the Kingdom, the man is condemned to have wronged the woman. The Christian law of justice is embodied in the Golden Rule, 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them' (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>), and also in the second of the great commandments, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Mk 12<sup>31</sup>). According to the Golden Rule, we are to regard our fellow-man as an alter ego, to put ourselves in his place, and judge his claims or needs and our duties from his point of view (Ph 2<sup>4-8</sup>). Then the commandment tells us positively what our obligation is. 'Thou shalt love him as thyself,' not with a non-moral love, which seeks nothing higher than the happiness of its objects. We are to care for him with that holy love which attaches itself to that in him which in ourselves is the legitimate object of our self-love,—the moral self or soul which was created in, and can be restored to, the image of God. It is for His moral perfections that we love God; and the claims of Christian justice are met, only when our love for others has as its aim their restoration to Godlikeness (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>, Ja 5<sup>20</sup>, He 13<sup>17</sup>). The Christian law requires us not merely to refrain from doing our neighbour wrong, but to promote, even at the cost of self-sacrifice, his highest well-being as we would our own. For a Christian man to say, 'I have done my neighbour justice, and he has no claim on me for more,' is to prove false to the Christian ideal; for, in the Kingdom of God, benevolence is not something that is withheld, but is simply justice made perfect.

I. BIBLICAL DOCTRINE.—1. The OT and Pharisaic doctrines.—The doctrine of justification in the OT is the outcome of two factors, his Jewish training on the one hand, and his Christian experience on the other. The idea of justification itself was derived by the Apostle from the Rabbinic theology, whose doctrine of justification by the works of the Law is at once the antithesis and the necessary background of his own. The Rabbinic doctrine again rested upon an OT basis. We can trace the development of the idea of righteousness before God in the prophets, who from the first judge Israel by the standard of the righteous demands of Jahweh. In the OT, Jeremiah and Ezekiel the idea is brought into connexion with the individual (Jer 20<sup>12</sup>, Hab 1<sup>13</sup> 2<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 33<sup>20</sup> 21 18<sup>19</sup> 33<sup>12</sup> etc.). Further, this age being also that of the development of the Law, whose authors aimed at embodying the demands of Jahweh in a practical form, we find the idea connected with the fulfilment either of the Law as a whole (Dt 6<sup>25</sup>), or of a single commandment contained in it (24<sup>13</sup>). Finally, in the post-exilic period the idea receives a great development. God is regarded as the righteous Judge (Ps 97<sup>8</sup> etc.), whose righteousness results in the punishment of sinners (15<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>15</sup> 11<sup>5</sup> etc.). The recognition of the righteousness of the righteous is said in Ps 62<sup>12</sup> to depend on the Divine grace; the latter term, however, is practically synonymous with righteousness in its beneficent aspect (33<sup>5</sup> 36<sup>7</sup> 43<sup>1</sup> 145<sup>17</sup>). Sinners God can justify so far as they are at bottom righteous (Job 33<sup>26</sup>). But the godless He may not justify (Ps 69<sup>27</sup>). The general idea is, further, that the recognition of righteousness by God is manifested by outward good fortune; just as His displeasure is shown by outward calamity (Is 65<sup>13, 14</sup>, Mal 4<sup>2, 3</sup>, Ps 37<sup>19, 20</sup> etc.; cf. Wellhausen, IJG 5 p. 220, n. 1). In the later post-exilic literature, however, the idea that the righteous is always rewarded and the wicked always punished in this life, is abandoned, and there appears the conception that the final justification or condemnation takes place after death (Job 19<sup>23, 26</sup>, Dn 12<sup>2, 3</sup>). This conception is henceforth predominant, as in the Pharisaic theology, to which we now turn.

The Pharisaic conception of the relation of man to God was purely legal, and based upon the idea of the Law as a contract between God and man. The idea of grace which qualifies the legalism of the OT sinners into the 'righteous'. The Pharisaic idea is that the Divine demands expressed in the Law can be satisfied, and that the fulfilment of them gives a claim to reward. It is the recognition of this claim that is now meant by 'justification'. The conception is further carried out into detail in that the Law is regarded atomically as the sum of the commandments it contains (cf., however, Dt 6<sup>5</sup>). Every act of obedience is entered by God in the heavenly books, as is also every act of transgression. The decision is according to the preponderance. If this is on the side of the good, the Divine sentence of justification follows, which consists in the declaration that the man is righteous. The account is finally made up at death (Weber, Jud. Theol. 1897, p. 277 ff.).

It will be apparent that the whole idea, both in the OT and still more distinctly in the Pharisaic theology, is forensic. With this, again, agrees the derivation of the group of technical terms used in the OT in connexion with the idea of justification (צדק, 'righteousness,' צדיק 'righteous,' צדק 'justify'). This group has almost universally a forensic sense. The words are so used secularly, and are therefore naturally applied with this meaning in religion (Smend, Alttest. Religionsgeschichte, 1899, p. 388 f.). In the LXX the equivalents are δικαιοσύνη, δίκαιος, δικάω. On the constant forensic use of δικάω in the LXX (OT and Apoc.), also in the pseudepigraphic books (cf. Sanday-Headlam, 'Romans' in Internat. Crit. Comm. p. 31. In Talmudic theology צדק is replaced by נחם 'innocence,' and צדיק by נחם; צדק also appears for צדיק, but the latter is maintained in use along with it (Weber, p. 277 f.).

It is finally to be observed that, both in the OT and in the Rabbinic theology, righteousness before God and justification, whether looked for from the Divine grace or on the ground of human merit, are religious ideas. Righteousness is not sought for its own sake, as a moralist might seek it, but always as the condition of acceptance with God, and the blessings which flow from this, in this world or the next. It is at this point that the Pauline conception of justification by faith links itself on to the older theologies. What St. Paul has in view is always the question of acceptance with God, and his doctrine is the answer of Christian experience to a problem set in the terms of the Pharisaic theology.

2. The Pauline doctrine.—There is no doubt that St. Paul's idea of justification is essentially the same as the Pharisaic, and, like it, forensic. In the fundamental passage Ro 3<sup>19c</sup>, the whole setting is forensic. Note the words ὑπὸ νόμῳ (v. 19); ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ (v. 20). Mankind is arraigned before the judgment-bar of God, and the justification which follows must be forensic. So in Ro 4<sup>5</sup> justification is connected with imputation, a distinctly legal conception: λογίζεσθαι = 'is reckoned,' i.e. in the heavenly account-books. See, further, Sanday-Headlam, l.c. p. 30, who decide on general philological grounds that δικαιοῦν means to pronounce righteous: 'It has relation to a verdict pronounced by a judge. . . It cannot mean to make righteous.' So far, then, St. Paul is in agreement with the Pharisees. But the deeper insight of his conscience will not allow him to suppose that God can be satisfied with a mere preponderance of performance over transgression. For him to attain . . . by the works of the Law would . . . complete fulfilment of it. But this is impossible; for all are sinners (Ro 3<sup>23</sup>). Hence St. Paul concludes that 'by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified in God's sight' (3<sup>20</sup>).

Here is the point where St. Paul introduces his doctrine, based on his own personal experience, of a new method of justification (3<sup>21ff</sup>), of which the principle on God's side is grace (χάρις), i.e. the free unmerited love of God (3<sup>24</sup>), and on man's side faith (1<sup>17, 45</sup>). As . . . the Divine grace, justification by . . . is opposed to justification by works, which depends on merit (4<sup>4</sup>). Instead of attaining a righteousness by his own efforts, the believer submissively receives . . . which is wholly of God, and His . . . This casts light upon the Pauline conception of faith. It is the method by which the grace of God is subjectively appropriated. In so far as the believer, instead of acting on his own initiative, allows himself to be determined by God (Ro 10<sup>8</sup>), faith is a species of obedience; thus St. Paul speaks of the obedience of faith (1<sup>5</sup>). But as correlative to grace, or the free love of God, faith is psychologically turned . . . 'on God' (4<sup>24</sup>).

. . . of the Divine grace which awakens faith takes place, according to St. Paul, in the Person of Christ (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>) and in His work, more especially in His death, but also in His resurrection. Christ's death was the work of the Divine grace in that God ordained it as an expiatory sacrifice for sin, Christ dying instead of sinners, that in the act of . . . He might not appear indulgent of sin (Ro 3, 1 Co 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, Ro 5<sup>8</sup>). Christ's resurrection is also included in the revelation by which God's grace to sinners is made known (Ro 4<sup>25</sup> 8<sup>34</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>17</sup>), but St. Paul does not define its exact place in it. In fact, Christ's resurrection, as the object of faith, is hardly separable from the Risen Christ. It is God's act by which He presents Christ alive, in spite of His death (Ro 4<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>), as the object of faith.

It is to be observed, finally, that justification requires for its complete . . . both sides of the correlation, grace and . . . in St. Paul's mind are associated in the closest possible manner. Thus he speaks of the revelation of the righteousness of God through faith (1<sup>17</sup> 3<sup>22</sup>); the whole is really one idea. Only thus can we explain the remarkable interchange of language which the Apostle uses with respect to the two sides of the correlation. Justification is generally associated more closely with faith, or the subjective side (3<sup>26</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>). But in 2 Co 5<sup>19</sup> St. Paul says that God was in Christ, not imputing to men their trespasses, which last phrase is synonymous with 'justifying men'; so that here justification is associated with the objective side, or the revelation of grace (cf. Ro 3<sup>24</sup>). So also in Ro 5<sup>16</sup>, if δικαιώματα be rightly translated 'sentence of justification' (so Sanday-Headlam, l.c. p. 141), then St. Paul here represents this sentence as falling once for all at the death of Christ. On the other hand, the sacrifice of Jesus Christ belongs to the objective side of the correlation; yet St. Paul speaks of Christ in Ro 3<sup>26</sup> as propitiatory through faith in His blood. Evidently, then, grace and faith are so organically related that the one implies the other, and is properly understood only through its correlative.

Paul has expressed his doctrine of justification. It is, as we have seen, determined by his Pharisaic training, and is that of a forensic judgment. But the form is all that the Apostle has in common with the Pharisaic idea. The judgment of justification in his conception is extra-judicial, i.e. God has regard in it to considerations outside the Law. The Greek phrase 'apart from law' (χωρίς νόμου) as such takes account only of merit, as St. Paul himself testifies 'He that doeth them shall live in them' (Gal 3<sup>12</sup>). But the Divine sentence of justification takes account of faith, which is a consideration beyond the purview of the Law: 'The law is not of faith' (ib.) In fact, in justification the Law is transcended by grace, which reckons faith for righteousness (Ro 4<sup>5</sup>). St. Paul does not mean that faith is a work, and that grace simply reckons the work of faith instead of the works of the Law. This would be, after all, half legalism. With the Apostle, as we have seen, faith is not a work, but a receiving; not a second principle of justification over against grace, but simply the reflex of Divine grace in man. Grace therefore sees in faith simply this reflex of itself, and in justifying the sinner by faith in reality justifies on the ground of itself (cf. Is 43<sup>25</sup>).

What, then, is the essential point in the Pauline conception of justification as forensic? It is, to use the language, that justification is an analytic judgment. It is not based on anything in the believer—not even on his faith, which comes into view only so far as the Divine grace is reflected in it. In justification God 'justifies the ungodly' (Ro 4<sup>5</sup>)—the words are involved, as the deliberate opposition of language to the OT shows (cf. Ex 23<sup>7</sup>, Dt 25<sup>1</sup>, Pr 17<sup>15</sup>, Is 53<sup>9</sup>). God does not, as the Pharisees recognize the presence of any sin in the sinner; on the contrary, He adds to him an attribute while he is still a sinner, viz. that of righteousness. It is evident that the paradoxical character of this doctrine created misunderstanding even in St. Paul's time (Ro 3<sup>8</sup>; cf. 6<sup>4</sup>); and it has done so ever since. The paradox, however, resolves itself at once as soon as we remember that it is 'righteousness,' not in the ethical, but in the religious sense, as the condition of acceptance with God, which is meant. The OT righteousness was the condition of acceptance with God; the Pharisees transferred this into the doctrine that the performance of the Law was the condition. St. Paul's language is determined by this form in which he found the problem of acceptance with God stated; his meaning simply is that God accepts the sinner on the ground of His mere grace, apart from any merit. It is consequently 'only a less difficult, expression for the same act of the Divine judgment' when St. Paul speaks of adoption (viobecleia, Gal 4<sup>5</sup>), or the reception of the sinner into the position of a child of God (Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. ii. p. 134). Adoption is also formally a judicial act, and really a reflection of the Divine judgment. The identification of justification with adoption, viz. that justification is the act of God as Judge, but adoption His act as Father, falls to the ground as soon as it is remembered that justification is really an extra-judicial judgment proceeding from the Divine grace (Ritschl, Justification and Reconciliation, Eng. tr. p. 86 ff.).

Finally, we get still further light on St. Paul's meaning as to justification from the fact that in Ro 4<sup>7</sup> he introduces, as synonymous with the imputation of righteousness or justification, the OT idea of the forgiveness of sins (cf. also Eph 1<sup>7</sup>), which links his teaching on at once to that of Christ Himself; and it appears that the Pauline conceptions of justification and adoption are simply the same as the Fatherly forgiveness taught by Jesus in the Dogmatik, p. 223. The idea that forgiveness is something merely negative, while justification conveys a positive status, turns on an inadequate conception of the Biblical idea of forgiveness.

So far we have considered justification as a Divine operation; it now remains to consider its practical issues, when it takes effect in the admission of the sinner to fellowship with God. Faith now comes into view, not simply as the reflexion of grace, but as the nature as trust, including the will to God, and the practical effects of justification appear as the trust in its various aspects. The trust is the sense of present peace with God (Ro 5<sup>1</sup>), or the consciousness of acceptance with Him. Here appears a strong contrast with the Pharisaic theology, which, teaching not the justification of the sinner, but only of him who has kept the precepts, defers justification till the hour of death, and consequently demands in the present a condition of anxious fear lest in the end justification should not be attained (Weber, l.c. pp. 284, 334 ff., cf. Ro 8<sup>15</sup>). Along with present peace goes patience in all present suffering (Ro 5<sup>3-5</sup>), in the belief that it is Divinely ordered for the best ends (8<sup>28</sup>), while there is at the same time a consciousness of the Divine love (5<sup>8-9</sup>). Here appears a contrast to the OT point of view, from which sufferings appeared as signs of the Divine displeasure. This contrast is strikingly brought out by comparing St. Paul's triumphant use of the quotation in Ro 8<sup>36</sup> with its original despond in Ps 44<sup>22</sup>. While St. Paul finds it no persecution should separate the believer from the love of God, the Psalmist sees in it a proof that God has cast off His people (cf. Ps 44<sup>9</sup>). Finally, there is no fear of final punishment (Ro 5<sup>1</sup>), but rather a joyful hope, nay certainty, of ultimate salvation (5<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>23</sup> 8<sup>30, 38, 39</sup>). The sum of all these things, in fact the whole consequence of justification, St. Paul expresses by saying that, for the believer, 'There is now no condemnation' (8<sup>1</sup>), or that he is not under law, but under grace (6<sup>15</sup>). From this point of view the work of Christ appears as a redemption from the curse of the Law. Christ, in His death, bore its curse, and its power is therefore at an end (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>). St. Paul refers in this passage to the Jewish Law, as the antithesis with v. 14 shows: 'Christ redeemed us [Jew-] from the curse of the law . . . that upon the Gentiles might come the blessing of Abraham in Christ Jesus. But his idea of freedom from the Law is not to be limited to freedom from the Jewish Law. Though, historically, this special case was of the greatest importance St. Paul means that the Christian religion is a religion not of law, but of grace. He also expresses the same idea in terms of the parallel conception of adoption, by saying that the believer has received, in place of the spirit of bondage, leading to fear, the spirit of adoption, 'whereby we cry, Abba, Father' (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>).

The doctrine of the Epistle of James on justification, whether the author has the Pauline doctrine or abuses of it in view or not [on the critical question connected with the Epistle see Moffatt, Historical NT, p. 576 for a good statement of the alternatives, also Sanday-Headlam, 'Romans' p. 17], and W. Patrick, James the Lord's Brother, raises an important problem in connexion with it. It is to be noted, first, that the idea of faith in the Epistle is quite different from St. Paul's. When the author teaches that justification is not by faith only, but by works also, the faith he has in view is a mere intellectual assent to Christian truth, especially to the doctrine of the Divine unity (Ja 2<sup>19</sup>). Further, his idea of works is not that of meritorious performance deserving reward but of practical morality. He solves the problem of justification in reality by going back behind the legalism of the Pharisees, and behind the Law altogether, to demanded condition of acceptance with God therefore, touch nowhere except in language, in thought they are altogether apart. At the same time, the Epistle of James serves forcibly to raise the question, which St. Paul's doctrine is always liable to provoke, viz. what safeguard it offers, while satisfying the religious needs of man, for his moral interests. Reference has already been made to the passage in which St. Paul speaks of opposition to his teaching, it was its apparent antinomianism (cf. the opposition (Ro 3<sup>d</sup>, cf. 6th)).

We return to St. Paul, and ask how he met this difficulty. He does it by opening a new line of thought in which he presents a fresh view of the death of Christ, where these acts appear in the ethical sense of a death to sin and a resurrection to a new life unto God (Ro 6<sup>10</sup>), and where, further, Christ in His death and resurrection appears as inclusive of all for whom He died (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>). In connection with this view, faith also takes on a new significance, it is no longer a mere obedience, but as it is the power which receives is diffused with new power (Ro 8<sup>13</sup>). His death and resurrection are the symbol of which is baptism (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Ro 6<sup>16</sup>, Col 2<sup>12</sup>), from which union St. Paul draws the conclusion that the believer being dead with Christ to the world, to God, should live accordingly (Ro 6<sup>11-13</sup>, Col 3<sup>1-5</sup>). A parallel line of argument is drawn from the death and resurrection of Christ (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>). The death of Christ is the death of the Spirit demands (Ro 8<sup>13</sup>). Along these lines St. Paul makes provision for Christian morality. He presents, as we see, his total thought on the salvation of the individual through the work of Christ in two hemispheres—the former doctrine of justification and this further doctrine which corresponds to the ecclesiastical doctrines of regeneration and sanctification. St. Paul passes continually from the one hemisphere to the other in a way that shows that he feels them to be vitally related; and there are not wanting points of contact between them, amongst which we may note especially the fact that the idea of faith is common to both hemispheres, as is also that of the Spirit, who appears in connexion with justification and adoption as diffusing the consciousness of the love of God (Ro 5<sup>5</sup>) and as witnessing to our adoption (8<sup>16</sup>), as well as in connexion with regeneration and sanctification as the potency of the new life. Further, there is a cycle of passages in which there appears a tendency to the unification of the two hemispheres, of which the doctrine of justification conditional on regeneration and sanctification, and thus still future and the object of effort (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, Gal 2<sup>17</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>9-24</sup>, Ph 3<sup>10-14</sup>). See on this subject, Harnack, Neutest. Theol. ii. p. 137 ff. In the latter hemisphere, St. Paul leaves the two hemispheres apart. He is followed by Luther, and Pfleiderer, who, using another phrase, speaks of a 'blending' which unite in Paulinism in one belief, with one, however, named.

II. HISTORICAL.—1. The Catholic doctrine.—St. Paul's doctrine of justification remained after his death in practical abeyance, until it was revived at the Reformation. There is little trace of it in the NT outside of his own Epistles (i.e. of the specific Pauline form of the doctrine of forgiveness). Only uncertain echoes of it are found in the post-Apostolic age, in the régime of Catholicism, both ancient and modern; it remained practically a dead letter. Common Catholicism, in fact, returned substantially to the Pharisaic doctrine of salvation by merit, against which St. Paul had fought, with its accompanying atmosphere of fear of coming short at last. According to Gregory the Great, who is here typical, assurance is the mother of indolence, and the fear of Divine judgment is the only fit attitude for the Christian till his last day on earth (Harnack, Dogmengeschichte<sup>3</sup>, iii. p. 250, n. 1). In such an atmosphere the words of the Pauline vocabulary necessarily lost their original meaning, and took on a new significance. Faith came to mean, not trust, but intellectual assent to revealed truth; grace, not the unmerited love of God, but the Holy Spirit, as sacramentally communicated or infused (so Tertullian—see Loofs, Leitfaden, p. 104). It was the work of Augustine to create a new doctrine of justification by the combination of these ideas. First he interpreted the word 'justification' itself to mean not 'a declaring righteous', but 'a making righteous'; what else is justificatio than justi facti? (de Sp. et Litt. 26, 45). Then, further, he combined the idea of justification in this sense with that of 'infused' grace. Augustine teaches that it is this infused grace which justifies or makes righteous by renewing the nature. He is able thus, with St. Paul, to conceive righteousness as a gift, the gift, however, is not of forensic, but of inherent righteousness. This idea of justification by infused grace, it is to be noted, lacks that immediate and necessary connexion with the work of Christ which lies at the base of the Pauline doctrine. Augustine, indeed, regards the infusion of grace as an effect of grace, parallel with the renewal of the nature; but faith is not brought into the connexion. The idea of faith remains with Augustine simply the common Catholic idea of assent to revealed truth; so that faith is no more than a presupposition of salvation. Only as it is completed by hope and love through the infusion of grace, is it Christian and saving faith (Seeberg, Dogmengeschichte, i. 276). It is obvious how far Augustine is here from St. Paul, though he constantly uses the Apostle's formula 'justification by faith' (Seeberg, p. 277). The climax of his departure from Pauline doctrine, however, is reached when the idea of merit is drawn into the scheme. The combination is thus effected. Grace alone renders merit possible. God in His condescension accepts as meritorious the works which are really His own gifts: 'what are called our merits are His gifts' (de Trinitate, xiii. 10, 14).

In Western Catholicism the doctrine of justification remains substantially that of Augustine. The Roman Catholic doctrine was finally formulated in opposition to Protestantism at the Council of Trent. It is necessary to refer to two points only. The first is that, in the Middle Ages, Duns Scotus taught a modification of the Augustinian doctrine, which makes still wider room for the idea of merit. He avails himself of a distinction already found in Thomas Aquinas between merit of congruity (meritum de congruo) and condign merit (meritum de condigno). The former is based upon the idea of the Divine equity, to which it is due, to reward every one who works according to his power after the excellency of the Divine power. The latter is based on the idea of strict justice, which rewards according to desert (Seeberg, l.c. ii. 105). According to Duns, the first grace itself can be merited de congruo by attrition, i.e. such repentance as is possible without grace. The second point to be observed is that the Council of Trent draws a natural consequence from the Augustinian idea of justification, by teaching that justification is progressive, and can and ought to receive continual increment (Sess. VI cap. x.).

The great contrast between the Catholic doctrine and that of St. Paul is obvious at the first glance. A second look, however, might suggest that perhaps the contrast was not so great after all. For the Catholic doctrine of justification corresponds, though by no means exactly, to St. Paul's doctrine of justification. It might, therefore, be said that the Catholic doctrine was really one of language. Nevertheless in the end the contrast remains unmitigated by this seeming possibility of reconciliation; as Ritschl has acutely observed (op. cit.<sup>3</sup> iii. 36). Catholicism still remains in opposition to St. Paul's idea of justification. What the Apostle calls 'justification,' viz. acceptance with God, including the assurance of eternal life (Ro 5<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>22</sup> 8<sup>30-33</sup> 39), Catholic doctrine includes under the conception of hope. So Conc. Trid. Sess. vi. cap. xiii.: Christians 'ought to fear, knowing that they are regenerated unto the hope of glory, and not yet unto glory. . . . No one, indeed, can be absolutely certain even of present grace (cap. ix.). It is true that within Catholicism the practical attitude of trust for salvation to the Divine mercy alone, apart from all merits, and the consequent sense of assurance, are to be found, as to some extent in Augustine Harack op. cit. in p. 85 f.), but pre-eminently in Bernard or Clairvaux. In this attitude is the 'he return to St. Paul at the . . . op. cit.<sup>3</sup> i 109 ff'). But we are now concerned with the Catholic doctrine, not with an attitude maintained in spite of it

2. The Protestant doctrine.—With the Reformation we have a return to the Pauline idea of justification. The absolutely fundamental character for the Christian religion of the Pauline conception is firmly seized. As is well known, Luther called justification by faith 'the article of a standing and falling Church'. The Protestant doctrine, however, assumes a special form, in antithesis to the interim Catholic development, and St Paul's formula is sharpened into the still more definite shape 'justification by faith alone'.

We have to note, first of all, a reversion to the original Pauline ideas of grace, faith, and justification. Luther, indeed, especially in his earlier period, remained somewhat entangled with the Catholic . . . of the last, making the term include . . . ensic and a real justification. This, however, was merely a matter of terminology, and has only a historical significance. Practically Luther held the Pauline view—the emphasis with him falls on the forensic aspect of justification. Moreover, the somewhat confused terminology of Luther was corrected by Melancthon, who says decidedly that justification with the Hebrews was a forensic word, and opposes the idea of a real justification (Loc. Theologici. 'De gratia et justificatione').

The Protestant theology, further, like St. Paul, found the revelation of the Divine grace in Christ, and His work for sinners. Here, however, a considerable development takes place, based upon the mediæval development of the doctrine of the Atonement due to Anselm. The latter had viewed the death of Christ in the first place as a satisfaction to God's honour, which liberated Him from the necessity of punishing sinners, and in the second place as a merit or work of supererogatory obedience, which could be made available for His followers. The Protestant theology accepted both these ideas, but with such modifications as made it possible to combine them with the forensic idea of justification. The death of Christ was viewed not as a satisfaction to God's honour, but to the penal sanctions of His Law. To this was added His active obedience to the Law in His life as a satisfaction to its positive . . . The whole was summed up as . . . and passive obedience or merit, and . . . as a provision of the Divine grace with a view to the justification of sinners. Justification consists in the gracious imputation of this twofold merit or obedience to the sinner on the sole condition of faith, so that he becomes not only guiltless before the Law, but also totally free from its claims. This conception is common to both the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches. It did not grow up all at once; but the roots of it can be traced in the earlier Reformers, and it finally established itself firmly in both Churches. It is completely stated in the Formula of Concord (pars II. Solida Declaratio, iii. 14, 15).

The change from the Pauline doctrine is marked by the alteration of his formula, the imputation of faith for righteousness, into that of the imputation of Christ's righteousness. It is not merely one of language. The conception of Christ's death as a satisfaction to the penal sanctions of the Divine law on the ground of which God forgives sinners, may indeed, be . . . interpretation of the Pauline conception . . . expiatory sacrifice for sin, if this conception is to be translated into terms of law. Whether, however, such translation is desirable is questionable. As we saw that the forensic point of view is only formally and not materially regulative for the Pauline conception of justification. Thus instead of seeking to translate related conceptions into legal terminology, we ought rather to seek such an explanation (or, if need be, modification) of them as accords with the material element in St Paul's idea of justification, viz that it is entirely the work of grace, 'apart from law'. The Protestant theology, in fact, misinterprets Paul by taking his legal phraseology as essential, and seeking to systematize his whole view of justification and its presuppositions under legal ideas. The attempt of the Protestant doctors to conceive the whole process of salvation in legal forms, made them introduce into theology a number of axioms which are in no way part of the Christian view of the world. Such an axiom is that all sin must be punished, whereas the Christian religion teaches that it can be forgiven, and forgiveness and punishment are mutually exclusive (cf W. N. Clarke, Christian Theology, p. 380). Another axiom is that the punishment of sin may be transferred from one person to another, whereas the very essence of the idea of punishment is its connexion with guilt. The vicarious suffering of the innocent for the guilty is not punishment. A third axiom is that merit may similarly be transferred from one person to another, whereas the moral result of a life, which is what is meant, is personal, and while it may result in the good of others, cannot possibly be separated from the person of its author, and treated as a commercial asset. That the Protestant doctors had to base their theology on axioms like these, plainly shows that they were on the wrong line in attempting to translate the doctrine of salvation into legal terms. We may no doubt recognize behind the forms of the Protestant theology the intention to show that the Divine grace itself is the grace of a Holy and a Righteous God. But the immediate identification of the Divine Righteousness with its . . . law is fatal to a full and complete view of grace. . . might have taught . . . of law as a temporary and preparatory . . . Divine righteousness, whose end is fulfilled in a higher way by grace (Gal 3<sup>24</sup>).

This defect in the view of the revelation of the Divine grace in Christ does not, however, . . . Protestant theology from being true in the main to . . . conception of justification. Over against Catholicism, Protestant theology teaches justification by God's grace . . . alone, and apart from all question . . . in the total view the emphasis, at any rate with the earlier Reformers, does not fall on . . . of the Divine revelation in Christ, but . . . self. A remarkable proof of this is to be found in the fact that in Melancthon's Loc. Theologici there is no locus devoted to the doctrine of Christ's satisfaction. Even so late as Gerhard in the early part of the 17th cent., the doctrine is treated by him simply as a part of the locus de justificatione.

After this critical excursus we return to the Protestant theology itself, in order next to describe the positions by which it further defined its conception of justification as over against Catholicism. As regards what the Catholics call 'justification,' but the Protestants 'regeneration,' it is taught that the latter is the necessary accompaniment and logical (the later Lutheran theology says, temporal) consequence of justification. Its objective principle is the gift of the Holy Spirit, its subjective manifestation the activity of faith in good works.

On some further points the two Evangelical Churches diverge not only from Catholicism, but from one another. The first of these has to do with the question of assurance. The Lutherans teach that the believer's consciousness of justification is in itself an immediate certainty of the reality of justification, operated by the Holy Ghost (fides divina). Where, however, doubt enters, recourse must be had to the Word and the Sacraments, that the Holy Ghost, who works through the Word, may rekindle faith. The Reformed theologians teach that the guarantee of the reality of justification is God's eternal predestination to salvation, which manifests itself subjectively in perseverance in the state of grace. Hence assurance of justification cannot be gathered directly from faith itself, but by a reference to its evidence in its fruits (sylllogismus practicus). [See Lipsius, Dogmatik<sup>2</sup>, p. 675 f.].

The second difference between the Protestant Churches is that the Lutherans make the moment of justification, alike in earth and heaven, the moment when saving faith comes into being. The Reformed, on the other hand, regard justification as accomplished in the resurrection of Christ for the whole Church as His mystical body (justificatio activa), but as regards individual believers based on the decree of justification, which accompanies their eternal election, and realized when saving faith arises (justificatio passiva). It is to be noted that the objective justification, which is accomplished for believers in Christ's resurrection, depends only upon their ideal incorporation in His mystical body. The Reformed doctrine does not therefore, as has sometimes been said, make justification dependent on regeneration. Christ's resurrection is regarded as the acceptance of His satisfaction, made for believers, and thus as ideally their justification in Him (cf. Lipsius, Dogmatik, p. 677 f.; Ritschl, op. cit. i. 293 ff.).

The third difference is as to the doctrine of perseverance. The Lutherans teach that a man may fall from faith, and thus from grace, but that he may regain his position by renewed repentance and faith. On the contrary, the Reformed teach that the members of Christ's body cannot fall, but must persevere in faith to the end. A faith that does not endure, is not real faith; and the consciousness of justification it may bring is only self-deception (Lipsius, p. 679).

Reference must now be made to certain views within Protestantism which deviate from the orthodox conception. The first of these is that of Osiander, who, attaching himself to many expressions in the teaching of Luther, attempted once more to teach imputed righteousness, and yet avoid introducing the doctrine of justification by merit. In his view, the doctrine of justification by the mere external imputation of Christ's righteousness he taught that the essential ground of justification is Christ's righteousness as really communicated to us; though at the same time he regards this indwelling righteousness of Christ not as our own, but as an alien righteousness, and in so far as a communicated righteousness (Lipsius, p. 668).

Another line of thought is opened by the Socinian theology. A criticism of the legal forms of the ecclesiastical doctrine of reconciliation leads to the complete rejection of it. Socinus, however, retains a doctrine of justification by faith, regarded as including not only trust in God as revealed by Christ, but consequent obedience to His will. There is no justification by works without faith; but, on the other hand, works are not merely the fruit of faith, but its execution and perfection, and in so far the works which follow faith justify (Socinus, de Fide et Operibus, Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum, 1656, tom. i. p. 623). But as works done in faith are not perfect, justification is also said to be by faith in opposition to works, because the mercy of God imputes righteousness to the believer (de Jesu Christo Servatore, p. iv, c. 11). In other words, faith is here considered as the principle of active righteousness, and the doctrine of justification comes to mean that God judges not by the outward work, but by the inward disposition. This conclusion is distinctly drawn by the Rationalism of the German Illumination (Lipsius, p. 684).

3. Modern theories.—The most important forms in which the doctrine of justification has been stated in modern theology, so far as that does not simply repeat older theories, trace their origin chiefly to Kant. His theory, particularly the latter. Kant took up the subject where it had been left by the Illumination, but in view of his deeper ethics stated it as an ethic-religious problem, viz. how a man conscious of guilt could obtain power to live a new life. The solution is to be found in the conception of faith in the ideal. On the one hand, this appears as the principle of a good life; on the other, it affords the principle of acceptance with God, in so far as God judges men by the ideal they follow, though their realization of it may be imperfect. The Kantian theologian Tieftrunk further pointed out that from a psychological point of view the operation of the Divine grace is absolutely necessary in a man, in spite of his consciousness of guilt, is to be able joyfully to fulfil the moral law; so that it is required from the point of view of the law itself, in so far as it looks for fulfilment (Lipsius, p. 685; Ritschl, i. p. 429 ff.).

The defect of the Kantian conception, from the point of view of the Christian religion, is its lack of organic connexion with the historical revelation of God in Jesus Christ. In the system of Schleiermacher, however, the fundamental character for Christianity of this revelation is fully recognized, while at the same time, instead of a return to the standpoint of the older Protestant dogmatics, there is introduced a new and fruitful theological principle. Schleiermacher demands that all conceptions concerning Divine operations shall be verified by their correspondence with Christian experience, not indeed the experience of an individual, but of the Christian community as a whole (Der christliche Glaube, i. § 30 p. 162).

From this point of view Schleiermacher treats justification. He begins with the Christian consciousness of redemption and reconciliation through Christ. 'The Redeemer receives believers into the power of His God-consciousness, and this is His redeeming activity' (i. § 100 p. 94). 'The Redeemer receives believers into the fellowship of His undisturbed life; this is His reconciling activity' (i. § 101 p. 95). Schleiermacher thus views the work of justification as the work of God in the life of the believer. His sufferings come into question, and the latter do not remain external to the work of justification, but are taken into account (i. § 108 p. 108). In accordance with this groundwork follows the doctrine of justification. Justification and conversion are the two inseparable parts of regeneration or assumption into union with Christ. Assumption into union with Christ is, viewed as an altered relation of man to God, his justification; viewed as an altered form of life, his conversion' (i. § 107 p. 165). Justification is by faith, and includes the forgiveness of sins and adoption into the family of God (i. § 109 p. 190). All these things flow naturally from the union with Christ, which alters alike the relation of the man to God and to the world. In particular, the fact that the new man is not bound by the law of the old man or their penalties. Present suffering he regards simply as evil, not as a punishment, and of future suffering he has no fear (i. § 109 p. 190). The new man, who is not bound by his own consciousness, we view as a Divine act, and this act is not to be separated from the effective working of Christ in conversion. The Divine act of justification, moreover, is one with the sending of Christ into the world. There is no 'declaratory' act of justification; this is only figuratively can be spoken of. Justification of the individual the case is simply that the one Divine decree of justification in Christ is operative at all points of time. Finally, faith is not an instrumental cause, or the organon salutis, but brings nothing to the Divine grace in Christ but our mere receptivity (i. § 109 p. 195 f.). Faith is awakened wholly by the operation of Christ (i. § 108, 6, p. 186).

The influence of the Reformed theology is plainly visible in the position of Schleiermacher, that justification is, as a Divine act, to be viewed as realized first of all in Christ, and then successively in believers. Compare what is said above, also Turretin (Inst. Theol. Elencticae, Loc. xvi. Qu. ix. 12), who says that justification is one from the point of view of God, though from our point of view it appears in successive acts, viz. God's eternal decree of justification, the realization of it in Christ's work, the application of it in experience, and the declaration of it at the last day. But, further, the correspondence of this point of view with the tendency previously noted in St. Paul to bring the objective and subjective sides of justification into close and indeed inseparable relation, may also be remarked. Schleiermacher, however, brings the principle which underlies this tendency to clear consciousness and bases on it his theological method, for which, as we saw, the continuity of Divine operation and human experience is fundamental.

Schleiermacher's doctrine of justification has been differently understood. Most theologians have considered that he means to make justification conditional on a real union with Christ (cf. Lipsius, p. 686 ff.). Ritschl, however, thinks that only an ideal union is referred to (iii. § p. 559). Two different developments, therefore, have taken place, starting from either view of Schleiermacher's position.

In the first place, one of the commonest views in modern theology makes justification dependent on a real union with Christ, breaking down the sharp distinction between justification and regeneration, and treating them simply as aspects of the same process. Faith, on this view, is to be regarded in justification not simply as the reflex of Divine grace, but as the spiritual content of union with the gift of the Spirit, which is the basis of the ethical life of the Christian. Hence this view of justification is claimed to be 'ethical'; justification according to it being a recognition of what really is in the believer his new life, as well pleasing to God. A reconciliation with the forensic view is found in the Kantian thought that God judges by the ideal; so that justification appears as a prophetic whole which sees in the first germ of the new

This view is closely akin to Osiander's. It has undoubtedly points of contact with the broader use of the word 'faith' in St Paul, who, as Pfeiderer points out, often uses it as practically equivalent to the whole of Christianity (Urchristentum<sup>2</sup>, i. p. 250; cf. 1 Co 12<sup>9a</sup> 16<sup>13</sup>). It is further along the line developed in the cycle of passages like Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, Gal 2<sup>17</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>24</sup> 27, Ph 3<sup>10-14</sup>, as previously explained. But it does not represent St Paul's main line of thought with respect to justification, and the objection to it further is that in the end it bases justification either upon the imperfect realization of Christ in us, or, in so far as the imperfection is counterbalanced by a reference to the ideal, upon what is still future, thus resembling the Catholic view. This view does not, therefore, meet the religious need of a firm and unshakable ground of trust as to acceptance with God.

In opposition to it, therefore, Ritschl develops the doctrine of justification on another line, which he takes as the basis of his theology, giving in his theology also prominence to a conception which with Schleiermacher is the basis of his theology of revelation. Justification is not a process, but is construed directly through the idea of the Divine grace as revealed in Christ, and faith is thought of as of a piece with this revelation and the realization of it in human lives. Justification is thus in the first instance through grace, but by faith. Ritschl's way of construing it is by the Father, the sentence of justification falls in the first instance on the religious community founded by Christ as a whole, to which God imputes the position towards Him of Christ its Founder, and on individuals as by faith in the Gospel they attach themselves to this community; justification thus becoming effective for them. Faith is simply obedience to God and trust in the revelation of His grace in Christ. Its functions are religious, not moral (iii.<sup>3</sup> p. 139; cf. also p. 70). As regards the effects of justification, the comprehensive description of them is that it is 'the acceptance of sinners into fellowship with God, in which their salvation is to be realized and carried out into eternal life.' In particular, the consciousness of guilt is removed, in so far as the element of mistrust of God, which is the essence of it, is removed (p. 85). Assurance of justification can be obtained only by the exercise of faith in patience or 'lordship over the world.' Finally, the course of moral action is conditioned by justification; but the direct aim of the latter is not the product of moral action, but the bestowal of eternal life, which is realized here and now in lordship over the world (pp. 192, 534 f., 670).

III. CONSTRUCTIVE TREATMENT.—It appears to the present writer that a correct modern interpretation of the Pauline conception of justification must move generally along the lines suggested by Ritschl. Perhaps it may be necessary to observe that such an interpretation is required, and that it is not sufficient simply to rest in the Pauline statement as it stands. In the first place, we have seen that St Paul suggests more than one point of view, and we have to settle which is to be regarded as determinative. Then, again, there are gaps in the Pauline presentation which require to be filled up, especially those presented in the Gospels. We proceed, then, to present the doctrine of justification along the general lines of Ritschl, but with regard also to the treatment of other theologians, who have, as it seems to the writer, dealt more fully than Ritschl with particular points. Reference is made particularly to Ritschl's own followers, Kaftan and Haring, but also to Lipsius and Kahler, and finally to W. N. Clarke.

Instinctively with St. Paul's technical term justification shall first make use of its material equivalent, the idea of forgiveness, having thereby established our right to do this. We thus, as Kaftan says (Dogmatik<sup>3</sup>, p. 523), present the issue in a simpler and more direct form, with the advantage also of the mind the connexions of the subject in the teaching of Jesus. What Paul calls grace is to Jesus the Fatherly forgiving love of God.

We begin, then, with the analysis of forgiveness as a Divine act, and consider, after Paul, the objective side of this act—revelation,—and then the subjective side—faith, by which the revelation is appropriated and fully realized. The revelation of forgiveness is in Jesus Christ, His Person and Work; not merely, however, as St. Paul teaches, in His death and resurrection, but as the Gospels clearly show, and as Schleiermacher, after them, recognized, in His whole life, including these culminating acts. Forgiveness is revealed by the whole of Christ's activity as well as by His suffering. In fact, His suffering is a real forgiveness because of the love which is revealed in the endurance of them. Jesus reveals this revelation of forgiveness as a perfect representative of God in His work and in His attitude towards the Father in thought and feeling; so that by every word and deed and by His whole attitude He incarnates God in the world, to do which is His earthly mission and vocation.

The Fatherly forgiveness of God, which Jesus reveals, is no mere good-natured indulgence; on the contrary, the Father is the Holy Father, the Righteous Father (Jn 17<sup>11</sup>), and His forgiveness is holy and righteous forgiveness. Jesus guarantees this by His revelation not only of the Divine forgiveness, but also of the Divine holiness in its stern condemnation of sin. A holy hatred of sin is evident in His whole attitude.

But, finally, Jesus reveals the holy forgiving love of God not only in these two separate moments, but in its entirety, by His bearing in love the sins of men upon His soul. We can explain His sorrow over Jerusalem only as the pain of One who, full of love to men felt their sin as the heaviest burden. We can explain the agony in Gethsemane and the cry of desolation on the cross only along the same lines, as caused by the pressure of the sin of the world upon the loving heart of the Saviour. In this bearing of sin, however, Jesus was still revealing the attitude of God towards sinners. The fact that the burden of sin upon His soul broke in upon the peace and bliss of His personal communion with the Father, makes no difference as to this point. Christ's actual communion with the Father had to be maintained, indeed, by an act of supreme self-surrender (Mk 14<sup>26</sup>), or of faith, unaided by any evidence of the Divine presence (15<sup>4</sup>). It was necessary that the holy love of God should come to complete self-expression in the world, which could only be by the revelation of the depth of suffering caused to sinless love by sin; and this revelation could not be made except by the Revealer proceeding along a path which brought upon His human spirit the sense of separation from God. This path was, however, not a new one; it was but the continuation, to the end of the path, of Christ's vocation as Revealer of God. To reveal the holy love of God in a world of sin could have but one issue, that which it historically had, viz to rouse up the opposition of sin as much to the love as to the holiness (Lk 15<sup>2</sup>), to the uttermost. The final act of self-surrender and faith, therefore, by which Jesus gave Himself to the death at the hands of sinners, which was inevitable, if He persevered in His vocation, was simply the climax of the self-surrender and faith by which as man He gave Himself at every moment to the work of His vocation. The whole revelation of God made by Jesus being a revelation within humanity, was made at every point by the offering up of the human will of Jesus to the Father. His whole life and death together constituted a sacrifice, which He offered up to God as the necessary means of the revelation in the world of His holy love. And this He did for the sake of men, that they might come to know the holy forgiveness of the Father.

Such, then, would seem to be the necessary re-statement of the Pauline doctrine of the revelation of the grace of God in Christ in view of the historical statements of the Gospels. To complete it, however, it is necessary to add that the function of the resurrection is to make the historical revelation permanent and abiding, by presenting Christ as the perpetual object of faith. This leads to the next point, which is that of the doctrine of faith, or the subjective appropriation of the revelation. There St. Paul's conception of faith as in the first place, on the side of the will, a species of obedience or submission to God, remains fundamental. It is in essential agreement it may be observed, with the teaching of Jesus Himself, in which πείθομαι, or turning to God, is made the subjective principle of forgiveness. But in order that the subjective appropriation may correspond in all points with the objective revelation, faith must not be limited psychologically to trust, but must include penitence also, in this way appearing as the proper correlative of both the love and the holiness of forgiveness. When the revelation of forgiveness in Christ awakens this faith in the heart, then the Divine act of forgiveness is completed, and forgiveness is fully realized.

We turn next to forgiveness as an experience, where St. Paul gives ample guidance, and all that is necessary is to explain some points in reference to the problems raised by later theologians. The first practical effect of justification is peace with God, or the removal of the consciousness of guilt which separated the sinner from God. This is removed by the appropriation of the Divine forgiveness, which is realized as the removal of guilt. Nor does conscience offer any obstacle to the realization of the removal of guilt in the consciousness of the believer; since the holiness of the Divine forgiveness is assured by the very revelation which brings the knowledge of it. In fact, the penitence which accompanies trust in the Divine forgiveness as the result of the revelation in Christ, is an inward peace with God as the result of faith, and that upon the sure and certain basis of the knowledge of God's holy love, in which both the conscience and the heart find rest.

Forgiveness is also realized as the remission of the penalties of sin. The chief penalties of sin, eternal death, or separation from God, and physical evils some are clearly the effects of sin; and these, to the sinner conscious of separation from God, also tend to appear as the tokens of His displeasure. Forgiveness removes the fear of eternal death by the establishment of communion with God; while, so far as physical evils are concerned, though the consequences of former sins may continue to abound, yet all these appear no longer as tokens of God's displeasure, but as fatherly chastisements, so that the believer's communion with God remains unbroken by them. Finally, the positive expression of the whole experience is that the believer enjoys the privilege of Divine sonship, and has, in his communion with God, here and now, the gift of eternal life; while his trust in God enables him confidently to leave to Him the maintenance of this life into the future. The negative statement of this is that the merit of the believer with God is not on terms of law, but of grace. In other words, to sum up the whole matter, the Christian religion is not a religion of law but a religion of grace. This is the real meaning of the article of justification by faith, which shows at once why it is so fundamental for Christianity, and why it is so necessary to maintain that justification is by faith alone.

We have now reached the end of the exposition of the subject-matter of the doctrine; some necessary questions, however, remain to be discussed. The first is formal. With what point in time is the Divine act of justification to be connected? If the exposition above has been followed, it will be seen that the question is one of definition. Forgiveness is revealed in Christ, and realized in faith. We may, therefore, connect the Divine act more particularly with the death of Christ as the climax of the revelation, as Kaftan does (Dogmatik<sup>3</sup> 4, p. 523), which is the most logical; or we may, with Lipsius (p. 696), connect it with the awakening of the new sense that then God by His Spirit speaks pardon to the soul. The one is the justification activa, the other the justificatio passiva of Reformed theology; each is simply an aspect of one process.

The next question is that of assurance. The view of Lipsius here seems most in accordance with the spirit of Paul, viz. that 'when faith becomes uncertain, there remains to us nothing but ever to return anew in believing trust to the objective message of grace, which meets us in the gospel or in the historical revelation in Christ, till the lost consciousness of salvation revives again.'

There remains the most difficult question of all, as Lipsius calls it, 'the master question of theology' (Dogmatik p. 699), viz. the question of the relation of justification to regeneration and the Christian life. The Pauline answer to this question is, as we have seen, that the same Divine revelation in Christ by which forgiveness is revealed, is also the revelation of an ethical ideal as an energizing spirit; and that, as faith receives the revelation of grace in forgiveness so it receives also at the same time the revelation of the ideal as a quickening influence upon the life. It is still an act of obedience or submission to God, but, in this latter aspect, the act of obedience or submission to the Christian ideal, or the reception of the Spirit of Christ as the principle of life. It is one and the same revelation in both cases, and one and the same faith or receptivity in both cases. Justification and regeneration are therefore vitally connected, and it is impossible to experience one without the other. Nevertheless Christian theology is compelled to treat them as separate articles, in order to do justice to each. In spite of the oneness of the revelation in Christ, and of the faith of the Christian, it remains true that justification has its ground simply in the Divine grace, and that faith comes into view in the matter, not in its general reference to the Christian life as a whole, but as it reflects the Divine revelation of God's holy forgiveness.

JUSTIFYING ONE'S SELF.—When our Lord

told the lawyer that loving God with all the heart and one's self as one's self was the way to inherit the man, 'willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, And who is my neighbour?' (Lk 10<sup>26</sup>). And on a later occasion, in opposition to the Pharisees who derided Him, our Lord said to them, 'Ye are they which justify yourselves before men' (16<sup>15</sup>). The English word 'justify' always means 'to show to be just,' and in the different passages the idea of the Greek also is that of showing one's self to be just or righteous. In the first case the lawyer wished to justify either his past neglect of the command to love his neighbour, or else his having asked the question, by seeking to be told to whom the term 'neighbour' was to be applied. He would thereby suggest the impossibility of fulfilling the command until he knew for certain to whom the term was rightly applicable. In the case of the Pharisees in the latter passage the emphasis is clearly laid upon the fact that they were endeavouring (with apparent success) to show themselves to be righteous persons. With reference to the lawyer's question, 'Who is my neighbour?' the precise form of the inquiry is noteworthy. Just as if a man could pick and choose among his neighbours, he would tell who and what constitutes a neighbour. The question really comes from a self-centred man who meant, 'Who is neighbour to me?' Bishop Lightfoot once preached a sermon on this subject, in which he pointed out that the true question is, 'Who my neighbour is,' that is, 'What is he like?' 'What are his characteristics?' It does not call attention to this or that person as a possible neighbour, but concentrates thought on my getting to know all about the man who is 'nigh' me, my neighbour in every sense. Thus by his very question the man, so far from justifying himself, that is, showing himself to be just, really condemned himself. The character of the question reveals a selfish man whose one thought was about some one being neighbour to him instead of inquiring as to whom he could be neighbour to. Our Lord's parable of the Good Samaritan is a direct application, 'Which of these was neighbour unto him?' revealed the true aspect and attitude. This is but one instance of the great law that no man can justify himself before God. 'By the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified' (Ro 3<sup>20</sup>).

KEEPING.—The Eng. verb 'keep,' with its equivalents 'watch,' 'beware of,' 'preserve,' 'observe,' is a tr. of several Gr. words. τηρέω (and its compounds διατηρέω, συντηρέω), φυλάσσω (and its compound διαφυλάσσω), ποιέω, ἐχω (and its compounds κατέχω, συνέχω), κρατέω, ἀγω.

The most important of these words are τηρέω and φυλάσσω with their respective compounds, and for a discussion of the difference in meaning between them the reader is referred to Grimm-Thayer's Gr. Lex., and Westcott's St. John (note on 8<sup>51</sup>).

1. Two common usages of the word have to be noticed first. (a) It is exercise watchful care. The participle tr. in AV 'the keepers' (Mt 28<sup>4</sup>) is a part of the same verb (τηρέω) as is rendered 'watch' in Mt 27<sup>38</sup> and 'they sat and watched him there' (RV), and in v.<sup>54</sup> 'The centurion and they that were with him watching . . . feared exceedingly' (RV). It is a compound of that verb, too (συντηρέω), which is used to describe the action of putting 'new wine into new bottles'—'both are preserved,' i.e. properly cared for (Mt 9<sup>17</sup>). And the same compound occurs again in the passage in Mk. (6<sup>20</sup>), where it is said that Herod 'observed' (AV) John, or 'kept' him 'safe' (RV). (b) It is guard, the direct implication being that this action is necessary in view of possible assaults. For instance, 'There were shepherds in the same country abiding in the field, and keeping watch (φυλάσσοντες φυλακὰς) by night over their flocks' (Lk 2<sup>8</sup>); 'It is written, He shall give his angels charge over thee to keep (RV guard) thee' (Lk 4<sup>10</sup>, where the verb used is διαφυλάσσω). Other instances of the same usage of the word are to be found in Lk 8<sup>29</sup> 11<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>15</sup>.

2. Retain may be taken as another general synonym for 'keep' as it is used in the Gospels. For example, at the marriage in Cana the ruler of the feast is reported as having said to the bridegroom, 'Thou hast kept (τηρέω) the good wine until now' (Jn 2<sup>10</sup>).

Retention (κατέχω) is described as a stage in the process whereby 'an honest and good heart' brings to the fulfilment of fruitfulness the experience of 'hearing the word' (Lk 8<sup>15</sup>). It is opposed to 'hearing with joy, but having no root,' and to 'hearing and going on one's way, and being choked with cares and riches and pleasures of this life.'

But, apart from Mk 9<sup>16</sup>, where the disciples are said to have 'kept (ῥημα) the saying' which Jesus spoke to them on their way down from the Mount of Transfiguration (Luke says, 9<sup>28</sup>, they 'held their peace' (ἐσίγησαν) about the things they had seen on the Mount], the two most striking contexts in which the word is used with this meaning are found in Luke's Gospel. When the shepherds made known concerning the saying which had been spoken to them about the child in Bethlehem, 'all that heard it wondered. . . But Mary kept (εἰστήκει) all these sayings (or things), pondering them in her heart' (Lk 2<sup>19</sup>). She kept them to herself, and did not allow the impression of them to dissipate in mere astonishment. 'The wonder of the many was a transient emotion; this . . . was an abiding abode' (Lk 2<sup>19</sup>, Gr. Test.). Again, referring to what took place on the occasion of the visit to Jerusalem, the narrative goes on to say that Jesus went down with His parents 'and came to Nazareth; and he was subject unto them; and his mother kept (διετήρει) all these sayings (or things) in her heart' (Lk 2<sup>51</sup>). She kept them continually and carefully. They were never absent from her consciousness. They were always the subject of her thought. Motherhood, in all its pathos and beauty, in all its self-forgetfulness, and devoted intentness, and jealous vigilance, is revealed in these simple words—'His mother kept all these sayings in her heart.'

3. Two further usages of the word may be grouped together here. (a) In certain contexts it means to celebrate. For example, we read that Herod 'exercised a watchful care' over the Baptist, 'but when his birthday was kept' (ἔγω, AV), he was found off his guard (Mt 14<sup>6</sup>). Again, the verb used to describe the celebration of the Passover (26<sup>18</sup>) is 'keep' (ποιέω—a most appropriate term to use in connexion with an ordinance which largely consisted in representing ancient events by means of symbolic actions). Once more, in the report given in John's Gospel of the anointing by Mary in Bethany, we read that Jesus said of Mary's action, 'Suffer her to keep (τηρέω) it against the day of my burying' (Jn 12<sup>7</sup> RV)—the meaning of 'keep it' evidently being to 'celebrate this as a rite.' (b) In several contexts it means generally to observe or conform to. For instance, we read that when the Pharisees and scribes asked Jesus why His disciples walked not according to the tradition of the elders, but ate their bread with defiled hands, He replied, 'Full well do ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep (τηρέω) your tradition' (Mk 7<sup>9</sup>). Again, the conclusion to which some of the Pharisees are reported to have come with regard to our Lord's action in healing a man blind from his birth on the Sabbath, was, 'This man is not from God, because he keepeth (τηρέω) not the Sabbath' (Jn 9<sup>16</sup>).

4. But 'keep' has the more precise meanings of: (a) believe, in such passages as 'Blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep (φυλάσσω) it' (Lk 11<sup>28</sup>), and 'If any man hear my sayings, and keep (φυλάσσω) them not, I judge him not' (Jn 12<sup>47</sup>); and (b) obey, in such passages as that in which the rich young ruler is reported as having said with reference to the commandments cited by Jesus, 'All these things have I kept (φυλάσσω) from my youth up' (Mt 19<sup>20</sup> AV, cf. Mk 10<sup>24</sup>, Lk 18<sup>21</sup>), and that in which Jesus is reported as having taxed the Jews with failure to 'keep' (AV) or 'do' (RV; ποιέω) the Law of Moses (Jn 7<sup>19</sup>).

But the significance of this connexion are those which (with the exception of Mt 19<sup>17</sup> and 28<sup>30</sup>) occur in the Gospel in every instance in which the verb to 'keep' (τηρέω in every instance) is associated with the terms λόγος (sing. or plur. 'word' or 'words') and ἐντολαί (plur. 'commandments'). (1.) Westcott points out (note to Jn 8<sup>51</sup>) that the phrase 'keeping Christ's word' (or 'words') refers to 'the observance of the whole revelation in its organic completeness.' The opposite of 'to keep' in this connexion is 'to disregard or disbelieve.' He who 'keeps' Christ's 'word' (or 'words') is he who first attends to it, and lets the wonder and significance of the message it conveys sink into his mind, and who then appropriate- and makes his own by faith the revelation it brings. To pay no heed to Christ's 'word' (or 'words'), to be at no pains to think out the purport of His appearance in history, and of the tidings of salvation He proclaimed; or, the meaning and worth of the gospel having in some measure been realized, to set it aside, to neglect it, to occupy one's self seriously with other things only—that is the attitude to Himself which Christ describes when He speaks of a man not 'keeping His word.' To 'keep' Christ's word, in short, is to take Christ at His word—to believe in Him (cf. Jn 8<sup>51</sup> 52 14<sup>23</sup> 24 15<sup>20</sup> 17<sup>6</sup>). The word of Christ is the word of the Father (14<sup>24</sup> 17<sup>6</sup>), and it is the word which the disciples are to proclaim (15<sup>20</sup>). (2.) The phrase 'keeping Christ's commandments' refers to 'the observance of definite precepts' (Westcott, ib.). The opposite of 'to keep' in this connexion is clearly 'to disobey.' He that 'keeps Christ's commandments' is he who recognizes their supremacy over his will, and seeks to regulate his inward and his outward life by them. To slight the obligations, which Christ imposes, to look upon the principles of conduct which He enjoins on men as subject . . . as mere alternatives to other . . . perhaps more congenial maxims, or . . . being acknowledged, to limit one's conformity to them to an external . . . obedience, an obedience that is only a . . . active Christian discipleship—that is the attitude to Christ which is described when it has to be said of a man that he 'keeps not' His commandments. 'To keep Christ's commandments' is to own Him as the sole sovereign of one's life, and to bring one's whole self—mind and will and heart—into captivity to the obedience of Christ (cf. 14<sup>15</sup> 21 15<sup>10</sup>).

Love for Christ is described by Him as being the condition that ensures both belief in His word or words (14<sup>23</sup> 24), and obedience to His commandments (v. 15); and obedience to His commandments, on the other hand (v. 21), is described by Him as being the evidence that bears witness to the reality of that love. Further, to believing in His word He attaches two promises. 'If a man love me, he will keep my word and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him' (v. 23), and 'If a man keep my word, he shall never see death' (8<sup>51</sup>)—a combination of passages which shows what 'death' involves. Similarly with obedience to His commandments Christ connects this promise, 'If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I . . . abide in my Father's love' (15<sup>10</sup>); and with the love to Him that is borne witness to by obedience to His commandments, this other: 'He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself unto him' (14<sup>21</sup>).

Finally, Christ describes Himself as 'this twofold relation to the Father, viz. 'keeping his word,' and 'keeping his commandments'; 'I know him, and keep his word' (8<sup>28</sup>); 'I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love' (15<sup>10</sup>).

5. The last usage of the word 'keep' refers to the Divine care of men, and occurs in our Lord's Intercessory Prayer (17). (a) V. 11 lets us see one aspect of the meaning of this 'keeping'. 'Holy Father, keep (τηρέω) them [i.e. 'those whom thou hast given me' (v. 9)] in thy name which thou hast given me, that they may be one, even as we are.' This was the work which Christ had wrought for the disciples while He was with them. He had kept (τηρέω) them in the Father's name, and guarded (φύλασσω) them (v. 12). In these two phrases—the former of which suggests positive communication of truth and solicitude that the recipients might not be dispossessed of it, and the latter protection against the assaults of temptation—the 'educative care' which Christ spent on the disciples is summed up (see Expos. Gr. Test. ad loc.). And now that He is to be 'no more in the world,' He prays the Father to keep them in the name of Himself as Father. 'To be kept in the name' means not only 'to be kept in the knowledge,' but 'to be kept in the experience'—there being other modes of relation and sensibility to God on man's part besides that of knowledge. That the disciples' faith in God as Father might be characterized by assurance, is the burden of Christ's prayer (see Westcott, ad loc., on the title 'Holy Father'). (b) V. 15 shows us another aspect of the meaning of the Divine 'keeping'. 'I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from (Gr. 'out of') the evil' (RV 'evil one'). Whether 'evil' should be interpreted as masculine or neuter need not be discussed here. The point to notice is that the experience, and the only experience, of Divine 'keeping' which Christ by His example encourages men to pray for and anticipate consists not in immunity from adversity, injuries, suffering, sorrow, and death, but in maintenance in a condition of certitude with regard to the Father's love and of perseverance in the path and practice of goodness—freedom from evil. The man who does not lend himself and the man who does lend himself to this keeping are described in 12<sup>26</sup>: 'He that loveth his life loseth it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep (φύλασσω) it unto life eternal' RV).

KENOSIS.—The word κένωσις is not itself found in the NT, but the verb κενῶ to empty, to make empty, occurs in Ph 2<sup>7</sup>, where AV renders 'made himself of no reputation,' but the RV correctly 'emptied himself' (see Interp. Com. in loc., and Grimm-Thayer's Lexicon). It is disputed among theologians as to whether it is to which the Son of God stripped Himself of His Divine prerogatives, but it is not necessary here to discuss these differences, as the purpose of this article is only to collect the evidences the Gospels afford of the actual conditions of the Incarnation. But two questions may here be very briefly touched on before we pass to this subject.

(1) We may glance at the description of this Kenosis of the Son of God found in the Apostolic writings. The passage in Philippians (2<sup>6-8</sup>) lays stress on the surrender, on the one hand, of the form of God ('the glories, the prerogatives of deity,' Lightfoot), of equality with God; and the assumption, on the other hand, of the form of a servant, the likeness of man, self-humiliation and obedience 'even unto death, yea, the death of the cross' In 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup> St. Paul describes the Kenosis as the abandonment of wealth for poverty (the Divine for the human mode of existence). In four pregnant statements, in which the Christian salvation is brought into most intimate relation with the Incarnation of the Son of God, this Kenosis is more fully defined: 'God, sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh [He shared the flesh, but not the sin], condemned sin in the flesh' (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>); 'God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law' (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>); 'Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf' [the penalty of sin was endured by the sinless for the sinful (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>)]; 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us' [Christ as the sacrificial victim 'became in a certain sense the curse of the sin and of the curse,' Lightfoot, ad loc.]. The writer of the Epistle lays emphasis on the participation of the Son of God in flesh and blood, in order that He might be capable of dying (2<sup>14</sup>); on His experience of temptation as enabling Him to sympathize with and succour the tempted (2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>); on the obedience He learned by suffering (5<sup>8</sup>). The prologue to John's Gospel may be regarded as Apostolic interpretation; and there the Kenosis is described in the words 'and the Word became flesh' (1<sup>14</sup>, see Westcott in loco). It is the intention of all these statements to affirm the complete reality of the manhood of Jesus.

(2) We may glance at the attempts to define theologically the process of the Incarnation in the Kenotic theory, 'which seeks to make the manhood of Christ real by identifying the Logos as Himself within human dimensions and as the "coming man" (Bruce's The Humiliation of Christ, p. 136). This lecture contains the best account in English of the modern Kenotic theories. Bruce divides them into four types, the absolute dualistic, the absolute metamorphic, the absolute semi-metamorphic, the real but relative. The differences in these theories concern two points: the degree in which the Logos laid aside the Divine attributes of omnipresence, omnipotence, and omniscience in order to become man, and the relation between the Logos and the human soul of Christ, as retaining distinctness, or as being identical. As regards the first point, the theories are either absolute or relative; as regards the second, dualistic, metamorphic, semi-metamorphic. Of the speculative attempts to formulate the doctrine of the Incarnation, Ritschl says that 'what is taught under the head of the Kenosis of the Divine Logos is pure mythology' (see Reconciliation, pp. 409-411).

As regards the second point, the terms of this condemnation, the present writer may repeat what he has elsewhere written on this matter. 'The Kenotic theories are commendable as attempts to do justice to the historical personality of Jesus, while assuming the ecclesiastical dogma; but are unsatisfactory in putting an undue strain on the passages in the New Testament which are supposed to teach the doctrine, and in venturing on bold assertions about the constitution of deity which go far beyond the compass of our intelligence in these high matters' (see Reconciliation, p. 271 note). The study of the facts of the life of Jesus proves undoubtedly the Kenosis, of which none of these theories offers a satisfactory explanation as partly the data—the inner life of the Godhead—he beyond our reach. We now confine ourselves to the data offered in the Gospels. (A useful summary of the data, although by no means exhaustive, will be found in Gore's Dissertations, 'The Consciousness of our Lord in His Mortal Life.' Adamson in The Mind in Christ deals very thoroughly with all the data bearing on the knowledge of Christ).

The Kenotic theories concern themselves specially with the three attributes of God, manifest in His Son, yet immanent, relation to the world of His omnipotence, omniscience. The Son of God that Jesus possessed none of these. He was localized in a body (Jn 14 'tabernacled among us'), and moved from place to place as His mission required. The cure of the nobleman's son (Jn 4<sup>30</sup>) does not prove omniscience, but is explicable as an act of faith in God. In the absence of then Master the disciples become faithless (Mk 9<sup>19</sup>), and He has to return to them to restore their confidence. In His farewell discourse He promises His constant presence as a future gift (Jn 14<sup>18, 19</sup>), and fulfils His promise after the Resurrection (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>). His miracles do not prove omniscience as they were wrought in dependence on, with prayer to, God (Mk 9<sup>28</sup>, Jn 11<sup>41-42</sup>), were restrained by unbelief (Mt 13<sup>28</sup>), seemingly involved physical strain (Mk 5<sup>30</sup>), and sometimes were accompanied by means of cure (Mk 7<sup>33-34</sup>; see The Expositor, 6th series, vol. vi., 'The Function of the Miracles'). Jesus never claimed omniscience. He claimed to know the Father as no other knew Him (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>), but, on the other hand, He confessed that His knowledge as Son was limited in so important a matter as the time of His Return (Mt 24<sup>36</sup> RV, Mk 13<sup>32</sup>). The express distinction between the knowledge of the Son and of the Father made in this statement disproves the view sometimes advanced, that the Son's perfect knowledge of the Father must include a knowledge of all the Father knows. It is the character, purpose, and activity of God as Father that the Son knows and reveals. When Jesus Himself thus confesses ignorance in a matter affecting Himself so closely, it is not reverence to claim for Him universal knowledge regarding such matters as the date and authorship of Old Testament writings, the causes of disease, the course of events in the remote future; nor is it any lack of homage and devotion to acknowledge the other evidences of limitation of knowledge the Gospels offer. He made a barren barren (Mt 11<sup>12</sup>); He surprised (see art. SURPRISE) (Mt 3<sup>10</sup> 26<sup>40</sup>, Mk 14<sup>21, 22</sup> 6<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>24</sup> 25. 38 8<sup>12</sup>, Lk 24<sup>49</sup>); information came to Him by the ordinary channels of hearing and seeing (Mt 4<sup>12</sup> 17 14<sup>12, 13</sup>, Mk 13<sup>37, 38</sup> 21<sup>7</sup>, Jn 4<sup>2-8</sup>), and He sought it in this way (Jn 13<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>15</sup>, Mk 5<sup>30-32</sup>, Lk 4<sup>17</sup>). He asked questions not rhetorically, but because He desired an answer (Mt 16<sup>13, 15</sup>, Lk 8<sup>80</sup>, Jn 11<sup>34</sup>). He developed mentally (Lk 2<sup>52</sup>), and during His ministry learned by experience (Jn 2<sup>24</sup>; the verb used is γινώσκω, see Westcott in loco). He sought guidance from God in prayer (Lk 5<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>18, 20</sup> 10<sup>21</sup>). The necessity of the cup offered by His Father's will was not at first evident to Him (Mt 26<sup>39</sup>), and, when convinced that His Father's will required it, He was not sure that His strength to drink it would endure (v. 42; cf. He 5<sup>7-8</sup>). His cry of desolation (Mt 27<sup>46</sup>) on the cross was not only the culmination of His Passion, but in being thus it was also the temporary obscuration of His knowledge of the Father, who in that moment had not forsaken Him. Instances of supernatural knowledge are found in the Gospels. Some of these: the getting of the ass (Mt 21<sup>2</sup>), and of the upper room (26<sup>17-18</sup>), the finding of the money in the fish's mouth (17<sup>27</sup>), are only apparent, and allow another explanation. The statement to the woman of Samaria about the number of her husbands (Jn 4<sup>17</sup> 18) is very perplexing; and possibly, as the conversation was probably reported by the woman, may have been made more definite by her guilty conscience than it actually was, even as she exaggerates in her account of what Christ had told her (v. 29). The command to the disciples about casting their net (Lk 5<sup>5</sup>) was probably an act of faith in God, even as the command to the storm (Mk 4<sup>39</sup>). The other cases fall into two classes: prophetic anticipations (His own death and resurrection, the doom of Jerusalem), or exercises of an exceptional moral insight and spiritual discernment. We may admit occasionally, for the fulfilment of His vocation, miraculous knowledge as well as power, without the constant possession of omniscience or omnipotence.

We cannot disengage the intellectual from the moral life; and the development of the latter involves necessarily some limitations in the former. Omniscience cannot be 'tempted in all points even as we are,' nor can it exercise a childlike faith in God such as Jesus calls us to exercise along with Him. Moral development is excluded from the history of Jesus by the limitation of His knowledge. He was tempted (see articles on TEMPTATION and STRUGGLES OF SOUL). In the Wilderness the temptation was possible, because He had to learn by experience the uses to which His miraculous powers might be put, and the proper means for the fulfilment of His vocation. Without taint or flaw in His own nature, the expectations of the people regarding the Messiah, and the desires they pressed upon Him, afforded the occasions of temptation to Him. The necessity of His own sacrifice was not so certain to Him as to exclude the possibility of the temptation to escape it. That Jesus was Himself conscious of being still the subject of a moral discipline is suggested by His refusal of the epithet 'good' (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>). Although morally tempted and developing, Jesus betrays no sign of penitence for sin or failure, and we are warranted in affirming that He was tempted without sin, and in His development knew no sin. But that perfection would have been only a moral semblance had there been no liability to temptation and no limitation of knowledge. As Son of God, He lived in dependence on the Father (v. 11<sup>27a</sup>) and submission to Him (v. 26<sup>39</sup>). It is the Fourth Gospel that throws into special prominence this feature (Jn 3<sup>34</sup> 5<sup>19</sup> 20 8<sup>28</sup> 15<sup>15</sup> 17<sup>1-8</sup>). The Son delivers the words and performs the deeds given by the Father. There are a few utterances given in this Gospel which express a sense of loss for Himself and His disciples in the separation from the Father that His earthly life involves (Jn 14<sup>28</sup>), a desire for the recovery of the former conditions of communion (17<sup>5</sup>), and an expectation of gain in His return to the Father (14<sup>19, 20</sup>). Jesus was subject to human emotion: He groaned (Jn 11<sup>38</sup> 38), sighed (Mk 7<sup>34</sup> 31<sup>2</sup>), wept at the grave of Lazarus (Jn 11<sup>35</sup>) and over Jerusalem (Lk 13<sup>34</sup> 19<sup>41</sup>, Mt 23<sup>37</sup>). He endured poverty (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>58</sup>), labour (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>), weariness (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>, Mt 21<sup>7</sup>), weakness (Mt 27<sup>32</sup>), hunger (Mt 4<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>18</sup>), thirst (Jn 4<sup>7</sup> 19<sup>28</sup>), pain (Mt 27<sup>34-35</sup>), and death (Mt 27<sup>50</sup>, Jn 19<sup>30</sup>). Some have conjectured from the evidence of Jn 19<sup>34</sup> that He died literally of a broken heart (see Farrar's Life of Christ, note at the end of chap. lxi.). Thus Kenosis did not obscure His moral insight and spiritual discernment, did not involve any moral defect or failure, any religious distrust; did not weaken or narrow His love, mercy, or grace; did not lower His authority or lessen His efficiency as Revealer of God and Redeemer of men; but, on the contrary, it was necessary, for only under such human conditions and limitations could He fulfil His mission, deliver His message, present His sacrifice, and effect His salvation. That He might receive the name of Saviour and Lord, which is above every other name, He must empty Himself.

KEYS.—The word (κλεις) occurs 6 times in the New Testament, twice in the Synoptic Gospels, and 4 times in Revelation. In Lk 11<sup>52</sup> Jesus upbraids the lawyers on the ground that they have 'taken away the key of knowledge,' the instrument by which entrance into knowledge could be obtained, and thereby hindered the people from the privilege which should have been theirs. This they had done by their false confidence in the wrong teaching, with the result that the right kind- and forgotten. The knowledge from people are excluded is 'that of the way of salvation' (Plummer), or, more profoundly, that knowledge of the Lord, for lack of which the 'people perish' (Hos 4<sup>6</sup>), to seek which they had been urged by the prophets (cf. Jn 17<sup>3</sup>).

In Mt 16<sup>19</sup> the word is in the address to Peter. 'I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven.' The apparent limitation of the promise to one Apostle is to be controlled by the repetition of the following and interpretive clause addressed to the Apostles in general in Mt 18<sup>18</sup>. The keys are to be intrusted to Peter as to a steward of the house (and in like manner to the Apostles in general), to whom might be given the power of locking and unlocking, but not of deciding who did or did not belong to the household (Weiss). The significance of this promise would be fully met if it announced the effectual entrance through the Apostles, of the kingdom of which the believer obtains entrance into the kingdom. On the passage as a whole see artt. CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, p. 249, and PETER.

In Rev 1<sup>8</sup> the Son of Man in John's vision says: 'I have the keys of death and of Hades,' i.e. control over the entrance to the realm of the dead. The figure of death as a realm with portals comes down from Ps 9<sup>13</sup>, and was freely developed in the Rabbinic writings. The 'key of death' was one of the three (four) keys which were said to be in the hand of God alone. Thus in Sanhedrin, 113, 'Elijah desired that there should be given to him the key of rain; he desired that there should be given to him the key of resurrection of the dead: they said to him, 'Three keys are not given into the hand of a representative, the key of birth, the key of rain, and the key of resurrection of the dead.' There is therefore strong significance in the claim here made by the Risen Messiah.

In like manner a claim to at least Messianic dignity is involved in the phrase in Rev 3<sup>7</sup> 'he that hath the key of David.' The allusion is clearly to the promise in Is 22<sup>22</sup> 'I will give to him (Eliakim) the key of the house of David upon his shoulder,' a passage which is commonly referred by the Jews to the Messiah.

In the two remaining passages (Rev 9<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>) the use of the word ('the key of the pit of the abyss,' 'the key of the abyss') depends on the idea familiar in Jewish cosmogony, viz that there was a communication between the upper world and the under world or abyss by means of a pit or shaft, the opening to which might be conceived as covered and locked. According to Rabbinic tradition, this opening was placed beneath the foundations of the Temple, as the Moslems hold to this day that it is to be found beneath the Dome of the Rock, or Mosque of Omar (see Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, pp. 91-98).

VOL. I.—59

KIN, KINDRED, KINSHIP.—The antique conception of kinship is participation in one blood, which passes from parent to child, and circulates in the veins of every member of the family. The unity of family or clan is viewed as a physical unity; for the blood is the life,—an idea familiar to us from the OT,—and it is the same blood, and therefore the same life, that is shared by every descendant of the common ancestor. The idea that the race has a life of its own, of which individual lives are only parts, is expressed even more clearly by picturing the race as a tree, of which the ancestor is the root or stem and the descendants the branches' (W. R. Smith, RS 2 40 f.). This conception underlies the words 'kin' (συγγενής, Mk 6<sup>4</sup>) and 'kindred' (συγγένεια, Lk 1<sup>61</sup>). But it was Christ's purpose to organize society according to another conception of the basis of unity. He made kinship depend not upon physical but spiritual affinities (Mt 12<sup>48</sup> etc.). 'Already, in the spiritual religion of the Hebrews, the idea of Divine fatherhood was associated from the basis of natural kinship. Christ was created in the image of God, but he was not begotten; God is not a thing of nature, but of grace. There, however, the sonship of the nation is emphasized: in Christ's teaching the personal relationship is brought into prominence. Sonship depends on personal faith (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>), and its evidence is individual submission to the will of God (Mt 12<sup>48</sup>). In His allegory of the Vine (Jn 15<sup>1</sup>), Jesus practically adopts the old figure. He Himself takes the place of stem or root, but the branches share the common life only on condition of an abiding faith (cf. St Paul's figure of the olive-tree, Ro 11<sup>17</sup> etc.). The ancient kindred of blood, with its narrow physical limits, gives place in the NT to a fellowship of faith which is open to all mankind. See also art. FAMILY.

KINDNESS.—The NT term χρηστότης, which is rendered in the EV both by 'kindness' and by 'goodness' (once in Ro 3<sup>2</sup> a 'good' following the LXX of Ps 13 (14) 1, 2, here quoted, in which χρηστότης = טוב), nowhere occurs in the Gospels. The quality it denotes, however, is an evangelical virtue. Like its OT counterpart נְכוּנָה, it is attributable both to God (as in Ro 2<sup>4</sup> et al.) and to man (as in 2 Co 6<sup>6</sup> et al.). The adj. χρηστός, EV 'kind,' is found once in the Gospels as referring to God (Lk 6<sup>35</sup>). The other instances of its use in very different connexions, as applied to a yoke (Mt 11<sup>30</sup>) and to wine (Lk 5<sup>39</sup>), though such use is a natural outgrowth of its root-meaning, need only be mentioned.

1. The Kindness of God in the Teaching of Jesus.

—The passage in which God is explicitly represented as 'kind' occurs in Lk's version of the logion of Jesus concerning love of friends and hatred of foes (Lk 6<sup>27-36</sup>, Mt 5<sup>43-48</sup>). The highest reward attendant upon a love that extends to both friends and foes and is ready to show kindness to all men without distinction is that thereby men become 'sons of the Most High' 'Sons of your Father which is in heaven,' as it runs in Mt 5<sup>45</sup>, would appear to be the primitive phrase, but 'the Most High' (ὁ ὑψίστος) is quite a favourite name for God with Lk., and its substitution here is probably due to this preference (see Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr p 199). God is kind to the ungrateful and wicked. In the Mt parallel this benign goodness is expressed in the concrete picture of sunshine and rain bestowed equally upon the evil and the good, the just and the unjust. Clearly the expression of an all-embracing benignity can go no further so far as extent is concerned. The only enhancing possible is in connexion with the gift which betokens that bemagnity, and this we have in the great saying of Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, along with the same sweep of reference, 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son.' That fountal love is manifested in the kindness (cf. Tit 3<sup>4</sup>) on which Jesus lays so much stress in His presentment of God as our Father, a kindness going far beyond the providential bounties and mercies of this life, and concerning itself with the profoundest needs of sinful men.

If explicit statements of the character of that now considered are not multiplied in our Lord's teaching, it is to be pointed out that the same conception of God is necessarily involved in a considerable group of the parables—most in particular, that of the Prodigal Son. The great trilogy of Lk 15, exhibiting the Divine concern for man as τὸ ἀπολωλός; the parables which show how royally and wonderfully God pities and forgives, whether that forgiveness is gratefully realized (the Two Debtors, Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>) or is strangely disregarded (the Unmerciful Servant, Mt 18<sup>23-35</sup>); the parable of the Great Supper (Lk 14<sup>16-24</sup>), with its comprehensive 'welcome for the sinner'—these and other such are full of the wide-reaching kindness of God.

An OT basis for this conception of God in Jesus' representation of God is to be found in the fact that God was sometimes known in Israel as ḥesed, a term which is not obscurely dwelt upon in OT writings, particularly in the prophets (e.g. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea). God's goodness and graciousness are gratefully celebrated in the Psalms, witness the refrain of Ps 107, 'Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness' (ḥesed). Stress on this Divine quality is the great characteristic of Hosea. Ḥesed is the bond uniting Jahweh and Israel in one covenant relation: the ḥesed of J<sup>h</sup> to Israel being His grace, of Israel to J<sup>h</sup>, piety or dutiful love, and of Israelite to Israelite, love and mutual consideration. Love to J<sup>h</sup> and love to one's brethren are identical (cf. Hos 4<sup>1</sup> and 6<sup>4-6</sup>), and both are made imperative by a right sense of J<sup>h</sup>'s fatherly affection and ḥesed towards His people (see W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel, p. 166 ff.). This line of thought, however, regarding God was arrested in later Judaism; God's transcendent kingly greatness was emphasized in Jewish thought in our Lord's time, and His grace and loving-kindness had fallen into the background. Jesus deliberately chose this conception of fatherly kindness as the one predominant characteristic in His revelation of God, and, what is more, proclaimed this gracious God as the Father of all mankind.

No difficulty need be raised as to the reconciliation of such a conception of God with His character as 'Rex tremendæ majestatis,' or as the holy God who cannot regard wickedness with indifference. That God is gracious does not mean that He is an easy-going God. Moral distinctions cannot be obliterated. Though in Christ's simple language God sends sunshine and rain upon the unjust, though He is kind to the ungrateful and wicked and they enjoy great prosperity, it cannot be other than an evil thing to be unjust, ungrateful, and wicked. And even though such blessings should appear to be withheld from the just and good, it still must be an altogether good thing to be just and good. Is it not significant that Jesus declares God's kindness without any qualification whatever, and shows Himself all unconscious that any difficulties are thereby occasioned, that there is anything requiring to be explained and adjusted? The parable of the Unmerciful Servant displays God's benignity; but the truculence which shows itself unaffected by an amazing experience of forgiving mercy must needs lose the boon which that benignity bestowed. The conclusion of the parable (Mt 18<sup>35</sup>) expresses what must needs be; and Jesus presents the doom of the 'wicked servant' as a picture of God's dealings with men just as directly and simply as He sets forth the kindness of our Father in heaven. The one presentation is perfectly consistent with the other.

Similarly, the problem of suffering and misery, which times without number has evoked the cry 'Is God good?', is not allowed by Jesus to qualify in any way His declaration of the kindness of God. It is not because He ignored the problem; He is Himself conspicuous as the Sufferer. And with our Lord the Divine kindness is not involved in doubt, because, as we say, God permits so much suffering amongst men, but rather that kindness is represented by Him as specially called forth by human misery. God is particularly set forth as viewing the sufferings and sorrows of men with compassion and pity, and pity is simply kindness brought into relation to suffering and distress. God declares Himself 'most chiefly in shewing mercy and pity' (Collect for 11th Sunday after Trinity). So also it is significant that in enforcing the lesson of Lk 6<sup>25</sup>, Christ does not say, 'Be ye kind, as your Father is kind,' but (v. 36), 'Be ye compassionate, as your Father (οἰκτίρμων). And what a vast sum of human misery would result, and how the problem would be simplified, if everywhere 'man's inhumanity to man' gave place to such a spirit!

2. Kindness as the Law of Human Life.—'Love one another' is the new commandment of Jesus (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>); and kindness is love in its manifestation. From what has been said, we see that the law of life is directly enforced by the loving-kindness of God our Father. This is the case notably in the comment of our Lord on the dictum, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy' (Mt 5<sup>43-48</sup>).

The ideal of a relation of kindness between man and man is, however, not altogether an original and peculiar feature in our teaching. It is a principle which is common to all those who are linked together by ties of social unity, owe to one another more than can be expressed in the forms of legal obligation' (W. R. Smith, op cit p. 161). And Jesus quotes Hosea with approval: 'I desire mercy (ḥesed) and not sacrifice' (Mt 12<sup>7</sup>). A principle which makes that quality of kindness of which we speak in our worship, and worship vain without it. It is a principle, and philosophies, too, ideas are found in the Bible, or less to such a conception of the social bond.

Further, it is true that our Lord very emphatically insisted on the application of the principle of kindness as a law of life to relations of men with men in general, and not only to those who are His disciples and people of the same faith. What can equal the parable of the Good Samaritan as helping to a definition of the 'neighbour' to whom the service of kindness is due?

Yet the OT and other forms of teaching of a wider view than the strictures of the Law. The duty of kindness to the stranger (Dt 10<sup>18f et al.</sup>), and of kindness to enemies, with readiness in forgiving injuries (as in Ex 23<sup>4f</sup>, Pr 24<sup>29</sup> 25<sup>21f et al.</sup>), is explicitly set forth in the OT. We get one glimpse (among many) of this wider humane feeling, from a very different quarter, in the Indian saying, 'I met a hundred men going to Delhi, and every one of them was my brother.'

Our Lord's exposition of this law of kindness is pre-eminent and sui generis. And the newness of His teaching in this respect appears in His having established this duty on a firm religious basis and given it 'an essential place in the moral consciousness of men' (Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. p. 332). It is significant that the judgment of men in Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup> is made to turn on the performance or neglect of the acts of mercy or kindness. The kindness inculcated is to be extended to all creatures: and it is to express itself in the little courtesies of life (Mt 5<sup>47</sup> 10<sup>12</sup>).

A view of Christ's ethical teaching as a whole makes it clear that the stress thus laid on the duty of kindness favours no loosening of obligation to justice and fidelity in the manifold relationships of men, nor does it do away with the duty and need of punishment when that obligation is violated. The maintenance of just and faithful dealing does not necessarily involve severity and harshness; rather it is itself part of the law of kindness rightly considered. Love of neighbour and of enemy is as truly reconcilable with the claims of justice on the human plane is God's benignity with His righteous . . . . . And Christ makes us see once for all that love is the only satisfactory basis for human relationships, and indeed the only possible bond in the perfected social state. See also artt. LOVE, NEIGHBOUR.

3. The Kindness of Jesus.—The perfect embodiment of this kindness in human life is seen in Jesus Himself. 'As I have loved you' is the Johannine counterpart (Jn 13<sup>34</sup> 15<sup>12</sup>) of the Synoptic 'as your Father is compassionate' in the enunciation of the Law of Love. The whole Gospel portraiture shows us that in Jesus the kindness and pity of God fully dwelt. His dealing with sickness and suffering in all forms, His attitude towards sin, His sense of social disorder, His regard for men as men and indifference to class . . . . . His whole demeanour, His gracious speech (Lk 4<sup>22</sup>)—all proclaimed the Divine kindness. His fiery denunciation of scribes and Pharisees (see Mt 23) presents no exception; for His wrath is the wrath of love, and the denunciation must be read in the light of the yearning lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23<sup>37ff.</sup>)—Jerusalem in which Pharisaeism and scribism were specially entrenched. The key to this perfect life of kindness and love is found in His own words—'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many' (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). The declaration of vivid and loving remembrance is that He 'went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). J. S. CLEMENS.

KING.—The primitive Christian Church regarded herself as the vassal of Jesus Christ, her exalted Lord and King, under whose regal sway she had been brought by Divine grace (Col 1<sup>13</sup>). The current belief was that Jesus had been installed in His royal office by the Resurrection; in that event God had made Him both Lord and Christ (Ac 2<sup>36</sup>), and in it had been fulfilled the prophecy regarding the Messianic King, 'Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee' (Ps 27, cf. Ac 13<sup>33</sup>), as also another prophetic utterance, 'Sit thou at my right hand' (Ps 110<sup>1</sup>; cf. Ac 2<sup>34</sup>, Rev 3<sup>21</sup>). This sovereignty is indeed temporary; it will come to an end with the final overthrow of the enemies of God: 'Then shall he deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father' (1 Co 15<sup>24-28</sup>). It was the conviction of the primitive community that the idea of a Messianic kingdom upon earth—whether eternal (Lk 1<sup>33</sup>) or of limited duration (Rev 20<sup>4ff.</sup>)—as it gleams through the Jewish Apocalyptic and in the earlier Messianic hope, had at last been realized in the Kingdom of Christ, i.e., the Church as subject to her exalted King.

Now the question which we seek to answer in the present article is this:—Did Jesus Himself in His lifetime put forward a claim to be the Messianic King? Here we light upon a problem which is . . . . . canvassed among theologians, particularly in the present day. While there are scholars . . . . ., such as Wellhausen and Wrede,* who deny that Jesus thought of Himself as the Messiah at all, there are others who are convinced that He was in possession of some kind of 'Messianic consciousness'; and among the latter the controversy turns upon the peculiar significance and the specific colouring of the implied claims and expectations. It is impossible in the space at our disposal to discuss the problem in all its bearings; for the details reference must be made to other works of the present writer.† The task of is to . . . . . the sense in which Jesus assumed the title of King; is all that meanwhile concerns us.

The prophecy regarding Jesus uttered by the angel Gabriel: 'The Lord shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end' (Lk 1<sup>32ff.</sup>), was not brought to fulfilment in the lifetime of Jesus. But the writer of the Gospel of the Infancy in Lk. would hardly have recorded the prophecy had he not entertained the hope that its fulfilment was but a matter of time. It is beyond question that the earliest Jewish-Christian communities believed that Jesus would come again in kingly glory, as is acknowledged by the repentant thief upon the cross (Lk 23<sup>42</sup>, reading ὅταν ἔλθῃς ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ σου as preferable to εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν σου). This belief appears also in the emphasis which the early churches laid upon the descent of Jesus from David (Ro 1<sup>3</sup>), and in the endeavours which were made to substantiate it by the construction of genealogical tables (Mt 1<sup>1-16</sup>; Lk 3<sup>23-38</sup>). These tables were not constructed for merely academic or theological purposes; they were designed to support the contention with which the Jewish Christians confronted their unbelieving compatriots, viz. that Jesus was the King of Israel. It is true, indeed, that in the primitive tradition of the life of Jesus . . . . . is not explicitly asserted. The . . . . . the multitude on the occasion of the Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem, 'Hosanna to the son of David' (Mt 21<sup>9</sup>), 'Blessed is the kingdom that cometh, the kingdom of our father David' (Mk 11<sup>10</sup>), cannot have been more than a bold anticipation of the future. The crown of thorns (15<sup>2</sup>) was an act of derision, to the true significance of which the soldiers were blind; while the inscription on the cross (15<sup>26</sup>) was a prediction which Pilate, in opposition to the wishes of the Jews and in ignorance of what he was doing (Jn 19<sup>19ff.</sup>), was constrained to set forth in all the great languages of the world. In point of fact the primitive tradition makes it perfectly clear that Jesus deprecated and even disclaimed the ascription of royalty, or at all events that He thought of the dignity as something to become His only in the future.

To the question of Pilate, 'Art thou the King of the Jews?' Jesus answers, according to Mk 15<sup>2</sup>, neither yea nor na, but leptis anti in the words 'Thou sayest it. Is this an Arabian word? St. Mark certainly regarded it as such (cf. 14<sup>62</sup>), but St. Luke shows unmistakably that the words were not so understood by Pilate, since, if he had regarded them as equivalent to yea, he could not have said, 'I find no fault in this man' (23<sup>4</sup>): a claimant to the throne must necessarily have been convicted of sedition. St. John also indicates that Jesus at first replied evasively to the question (18<sup>34ff.</sup>), but that afterwards He frankly avowed His claim to the title of King, though with the reservation that His Kingdom was 'not of this world' (18<sup>36</sup>). Even more clearly than in the Synoptists we see in St. John's account a definite purpose—he aims at showing that Jesus was no political usurper, no pretender to the crown, who designed by force of arms to deliver His people from the thraldom of Rome, and to reinstall the dynasty of David. Notwithstanding the obvious tendency of the writer of the Fourth Gospel, we must grant that in this instance his narrative equally with those of the earlier Evangelists, is essentially faithful to fact.

That Jesus harboured no design of restoring the Davidic monarchy may be asserted without misgiving. To the policy of the violent, who would take the Kingdom by force (Mt 11<sup>12</sup>), He lent no countenance, and when, after the feeding of the multitude, they wanted to make Him a King, he betook Himself elsewhere (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). We shall be asked, however, if He did not, on the occasion of His Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem, carefully organize and carry through a demonstration designed to further His royal claims. In answer to this it is to be said that St. Mark's account of the episode (11<sup>11</sup>) cannot be taken as historical; and we must either accept the narrative of Jn. (12<sup>12a</sup>), according to which the demonstration emanated from His supporters among the people and was only permitted by Him and which weakens the impression of the incident by its quotation from Zec 9<sup>9</sup>;* or else we must abandon the hope of winning from the event any light for our theme at all. Had the Triumphal Entry been of such capital importance and of such character as St. Mark represents, the emperor certainly have intervened, and the matter would have figured in the trial of Jesus as a count in the indictment [but see ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM].

In the discourses of Jesus we find telling arguments, both positive and negative, in favour of the view that He made no claim whatever to the title of Messianic King, or that He did so in a most unobtrusive way. To His descent from David, if He gave it credence at all, He did not attach the slightest importance; indeed, He even sought to convince the scribes that in regarding the coming Messiah as the Son of David they fell far short of the truth. To all appearance He desired to eradicate from the minds of His hearers the prevailing idea of a Davidic ruler, and to substitute for it another Messianic figure, viz. the 'Son of Man,' the 'Man' who, as Daniel (7<sup>13a</sup>) had prophesied, was to come in the clouds of heaven at the end of the age. This 'Son of Man' is no earthly monarch, but a Being of Divine and heavenly nature; not one who by means of a revolution rises from his native obscurity to a throne, but one who descends from heaven to earth. With such a figure dominating the outlook of Jesus, there is no place for a Messianic King. It is thus quite in keeping with these facts that He announces, not that God is about to send forth the Messiah, the Son of David, not that the kingdom of David is at hand, but that 'the kingdom of God is at hand.' The purport of this message has been dealt with elsewhere:† suffice it to say here, that the announcement of a cosmical catastrophe, of a new æon, in which the existing sway of Satan shall be destroyed, and God shall be all in all, is intrinsically incompatible with the idea of a Messianic King standing side by side with the Most High. Nor do the prophecies of Daniel, when rightly interpreted, present us with the figure of a Messiah. Hence it is by no mere accident that in the utterances of Jesus the title 'King' is applied to God alone: cf. Jerusalem 'the city of the great king' (Mt 5<sup>35</sup>), the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (18<sup>23</sup>); and in particular, the parable of the Marriage Feast (22<sup>1a</sup>), where the Messiah appears as the King's son. It is only in the description of the Last Judgment (25<sup>31</sup>) that the 'Son of Man' appears as King—note the abrupt change vv. 34, 40; probably, however, we have in this passage reminiscences of some older parable, which had to do with a king and not with the Messiah at all. Only on one recorded occasion (Lk 22<sup>29</sup>) does Jesus invest Himself with the basileia, but that is for the future. This occurred, according to Lk., during the Last Supper,—a circumstance which leads us to infer that Jesus did not in any sense regard Himself as being a king in the days of His flesh. What He has in prospect here is simply a participation in the Divine Sovereignty, a prerogative guaranteed also to those who accept Him.

He believes, indeed, that He will occupy the chief place among them that are His; that He will take the seat of honour at table, having them on His right hand and on His left (Mt 20<sup>21</sup>); but of a Messianic King-ship in the ordinary sense of the word there is no suggestion at all. If Jesus deemed Himself to be the predestined Messiah in any sense whatsoever, He certainly thought of the Messianic office as being different from that of a king. See, further, art. MESSIAH. JOHANNES WEISS.

KING OF THE JEWS.—S DIVINITY OF CHRIST (p. 477<sup>b</sup>), OF CHRIST.

KINGDOM OF GOD (or HEAVEN).—To learn what Jesus meant by the term 'kingdom of heaven,' or 'kingdom of God,' we must go first and chiefly to His own words. The simple fact that He employed a term which was in common use, and which had parallels also in the Jewish Scriptures (e.g. 1 Ch 28<sup>5</sup>, Dn 2<sup>44</sup> 4<sup>3</sup>), does not justify one in assuming that His conception can be defined by the current view of His day, or by a study of the OT. It is plain that He might make use of the familiar term, but might put into it a new and higher meaning. Indeed, it is quite certain that Jesus, as a wise teacher, started from the beliefs and longings of those whom He sought to help, and that He aimed at fulfilling rather than destroying. We should expect, then, to find Him using old terms, but pouring into them new meanings. Moreover, the thought of Jesus in regard to the kingdom of heaven is presented to us more fully and clearly than is that of His Jewish contemporaries. Hence there is no occasion for approaching our topic indirectly either by the way of the OT or that of the Rabbinic usage. It will be best to go at once to the main source of information, and seek the thought of Jesus from His own words, though availing ourselves of any light that can be found in other quarters.

1. Survey of the data. According to Mk and Mt., the memorable word of Jesus in Galilee was the announcement of the nearness of the kingdom of God [or of heaven] (ἤγγικεν ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ [or τῶν οὐρανῶν], Mk 1<sup>15</sup>, Mt 4<sup>17</sup>); and in the last interview with His disciples, on the evening before His death, He still spoke of the kingdom, anticipating a union with them there (Mk 14<sup>25</sup>). In all the interval between these events the term was frequently on His lips both in public and in private. St. Mark records 13 instances of its use by Jesus, St. Luke 34, and St. Matthew 48. Its central importance in the teaching of Jesus is frequently apparent. Thus the gospel itself is spoken of as the gospel of the kingdom (Mt 9<sup>35</sup>); the Twelve and the Seventy are sent out to announce that the kingdom is at hand (Mt 10<sup>7</sup>, Lk 10<sup>9</sup>); more than a third of the parables are explicitly said to be an unfolding of the truth of the kingdom;* the disciples are taught to pray for the coming of the kingdom (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>); it is the preaching of the kingdom of heaven that terminates the period of the Law and the Prophets (Mt 11<sup>12</sup>, Lk 16<sup>16</sup>); the kingdom is presented as the summum bonum (Mt 13<sup>44</sup> 4<sup>5</sup>); and the kingdom is the great fact of the future (e.g. Mt 25<sup>34</sup>).

But while the kingdom of God is thus seen to be of great significance in the teaching of Jesus, it is equally obvious that its meaning varies widely in different passages. Thus Jesus says that the kingdom is to be entered at once by those to whom He is speaking (Mt 13<sup>12</sup> 14), and again, that the righteous are to enter it when the Son of Man shall have come in His glory (25<sup>34</sup>). At one time Jesus says to the Pharisees, 'The kingdom of heaven is among you' (ἐν ὑμῖν),* and at another He teaches that it is the place where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with all the prophets, rest and are blessed (Lk 17<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>). Now the kingdom is thought of as something that can be taken away from the Jews and be given to the Gentiles (Mt 21<sup>43</sup>), and again, it is that for whose coming the disciples are instructed to pray (6<sup>10</sup>). The kingdom is thought of at one time as a good that can be obtained by seeking (6<sup>31</sup>), and as something to be slowly developed from within the soul (Mk 4<sup>26</sup>); at another time, as an event of the future, realized suddenly and by Divine power (8<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>).

From this survey it is readily seen that the term 'kingdom of God (or heaven)' in the usage of Jesus is not easy to be defined; that it appears to be an elastic, poetic symbol rather than the vehicle of a single conception.

2. The origin of the expression.—With the exception of two passages in Mt. which speak of the kingdom without any qualifying word (Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>), and three passages in which the kingdom (always thought of as future) is spoken of by Jesus as 'His' [or 'My'] kingdom (Mt 13<sup>41</sup> 16<sup>28</sup>, Lk 22<sup>30</sup>), His usage fluctuates between 'kingdom of heaven' and 'kingdom of God,' the former greatly prevailing in Mt. and in Matthew, and the latter being used in Mark and Luke. It seems probable that the term ordinarily used by Jesus was 'kingdom of heaven,' and that for the following reasons. (1) It is the prevailing term in the Logia of Matthew, and the Logia, unlike the Gospels of Mark and Luke, are regarded as directly Apostolic. (2) The presumption is that Jesus used a current Jewish term, and 'kingdom of heaven' has a distinctly Jewish origin; it does not belong to the term 'kingdom of God.' For the Greek word for 'heaven' in this phrase is a plural (τῶν οὐρανῶν) in accordance with the Hebrew usage (שָׁמַיִם), but contrary to the Greek. And, further, the expression 'kingdom of heaven' accords better with the popular Jewish belief that the kingdom of the Messiah was to come from above. (3) The originality of the term 'kingdom of heaven' is favoured by the consideration that the Second and Third Evangelists, since they wrote for Gentile readers, may more readily be thought to have modified a Jewish expression than that the author of the Logia, who wrote for Jews, modified the term used by Jesus.†

But, while there is therefore every reason to conclude that Jesus ordinarily used the term 'kingdom of heaven,' we certainly are not justified in saying that He did this to avoid speaking the Divine name (cf. O. Holtzmann, The Life of Jesus, pp. 163, 164; Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, p. 92, Eng. tr.). It is impossible to suppose that the man who called God His Father, and who felt that God was always with Him, the man who brought God near to His disciples and convinced them that He numbered the hairs of their heads, that they could approach Him at any time without priest or outward sacrifice,—that such a man shared the superstitious regard for the Holy Name. If Jesus habitually used the term 'kingdom of heaven,' which we believe to have been the case, He probably did so because that was the name in common use among His hearers.

3. Fundamental thought of the term.—To ascertain the central idea of the term 'kingdom of heaven,' as used by Jesus, we may well begin with a passage in which He seems to give a general interpretation of it, viz the second and third petitions of the Lord's Prayer, 'Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>). The second of these petitions appears to explain the first. It seems to imply that where the will of God is done, there the kingdom of God has come. That will is thought of as being done perfectly in heaven; and when it is done thus on earth, then the kingdom of heaven is realized. Accordingly this passage suggests that the fundamental idea of 'kingdom of heaven' is the rule of God.

Another passage which, though not using the word 'kingdom,' seems to throw light on the conception of Jesus, is that which records His answer to those who, while He was teaching on a certain occasion, told Him that His mother and brothers desired to see Him (Mk 3<sup>31-35</sup>). He said, 'Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.' But if these people who sat around Him to His word, were owned as His kindred, it is reasonable to think that what made them His kindred made them also members of His kingdom. And that which brought them near to Him was the doing of God's will—the very thing which in the Lord's Prayer seems to explain the term 'kingdom.'

In line with the thought of these passages, which have been considered, is the teaching of a considerable number of important sayings of Jesus concerning the kingdom. Thus, in the Sermon on the Mount, He told His hearers to seek the kingdom and the righteousness of their heavenly Father (Mt 6<sup>33</sup>). Here, as in the Lord's Prayer, the kingdom is something to be desired and sought. It is contrasted with food and drink and clothing,—things that the Gentiles seek,—and is thus characterized as an inward and spiritual good. We may then regard the word 'kingdom' as giving here the dominant thought of the kingdom which is to be sought. Not otherwise are we to understand the word in that passage which deals with the young scribe who answered Jesus discreetly (Mk 12<sup>34</sup>). The Master told him that he was not far from the kingdom of God. Now, in these words He was obviously characterizing the moral and spiritual state of the young man; and thus the content of the term 'kingdom' is here moral and spiritual. So in the teaching of the Automatic Earth. As it is the function of the earth to carry forward the development of the seed lodged in it, so by analogy it is the function of the heart to develop the kingdom of heaven (4<sup>26-29</sup>). Manifestly, then, the kingdom is here thought of as a spiritual principle to be received into the heart.

Another passage in which the content of the term is virtually indicated by Jesus is the reply which He gave to the question of certain Pharisees. They asked Him when the kingdom of God should come, and He replied: 'The kingdom of God is in the midst of you' (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>). That is to say, the kingdom is already present, already an accomplished fact. It had not come with outward show and noise, but quietly and naturally. There seems to be only one way of understanding this remarkable utterance, for the view that it refers to the future, and means that the kingdom will come as a surprise, rests on the identification of the coming of the kingdom with the Parousia of the Son of Man (see Wernle, The Beginnings of Christianity, 1 62). But this identification cannot be made, for the Parousia will have the very characteristic which Jesus here denies to the coming of the kingdom. It will be 'with observation' (μετὰ παρατηρήσεως; see, e.g., Mk 13<sup>24-26</sup>, 29). We must hold, then, that the utterance of Jesus had a present force, and must find the justification of it in His own experience. He was conscious that the kingdom was realized in His own heart, and was beginning to be realized in His disciples. Thus this passage falls into line with those in which Jesus suggests that He meant by the term 'kingdom of heaven' an inner spiritual fact, viz. the rule of God in the heart.*

Now these passages which have been considered present a conception of the kingdom of heaven which Jesus unquestionably entertained. That this conception was central in His usage, and must be called the fundamental content of the term 'kingdom of heaven,' is seen from the following considerations. (a) It is the only explanation of a number of most important passages which is suggested by Jesus Himself. (b) It is an explanation in perfect harmony with the other teaching of Jesus. For that teaching, as seen, for instance, in the Sermon on the Mount, is inward and spiritual; and such is the 'rule of God' in the 'kingdom of heaven' as the rule of God in the heart of man. (c) The Fourth Gospel, with the exception of two passages (3<sup>3-5</sup> 18<sup>36</sup>), does not employ the term 'kingdom of heaven'; but the term which it does employ, where the Synoptics have 'kingdom of heaven,' is the equivalent of 'kingdom' in the sense of God's rule. This term is 'eternal life.' That is the summum bonum in John, as the kingdom of heaven is in the early Gospels (Jn 4<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>36</sup> 10<sup>25</sup>). This eternal life, like the kingdom of heaven, is bound up with the personality and mission of Jesus (4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>27</sup>). Again, like the rule of God in the Synoptics, the gift of eternal life in John is both for the present and for the future (4<sup>36</sup> 12<sup>26</sup>). Therefore we say that this early interpretation of the Gospel which we have in John helps to confirm the view that the fundamental conception of the term 'kingdom of heaven' in the mind of Jesus was the rule of God. (d) And, finally, the correctness of this view is established by the fact that, while the Synoptics use the term 'kingdom of heaven' in various other senses, these are all secondary to the thought of God's rule, and are derived from it. This will be shown in the next section.

4. Special uses of the term.—(a) There is a group of passages in which the term 'kingdom of heaven' evidently denotes a company of men. This is the prominent thought of the expression when Jesus says that he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than John the Baptist (Mt 11<sup>11</sup>); also in the parable of the Tares and the Drag-net (13<sup>24-30</sup> 35<sup>2-9</sup>). The tares are the sons of the evil one, and at the end of the present age they are to be gathered out of the kingdom. They are therefore in the kingdom up to that time. To be gathered out of the kingdom means to be separated from the sons of the kingdom. The interest of the parable centres in the teaching that these two classes—the sons of the kingdom and the sons of the evil one—must remain intermingled until the end of the age. Hence it is obvious that the kingdom out of which the 'stumbling-blocks' are to be taken is the company of those who inwardly belong to God.

Now, while the foremost thought in these passages is that of a certain company of persons, these persons cannot be defined without the aid of the thought of God's rule. They are the persons who are under that rule, or at least claim to be under it.

(b) A second special use of the term 'kingdom of heaven' is presented in the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (21<sup>45</sup>). Jesus said to the Jews at the close of the parable, 'The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you, and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof.' In this case 'kingdom' cannot mean the rule of God, for these Jews were hostile to this, and obviously it cannot mean those who are under the Divine rule. We take it in the sense of the high privilege and blessing which the Jews had enjoyed as God's peculiar people. It was these things which were actually taken from the Jews when the gospel of Jesus was freely proclaimed to the Gentiles. Another passage which may well be assigned to the same category is the first Beatitude (5<sup>3</sup>). The poor in spirit are blessed because 'theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' It is now theirs. They experience its blessing by virtue of the fact that they are poor in spirit. They will doubtless experience it in much larger measure in the future, but they have a foretaste of the experience now. In like manner they who hungered after righteousness began to be 'filled' by Jesus at once: the satisfaction of their longing was not deferred to a distant future. Again, as purity of heart brought a vision of God to Jesus, even in His earthly life, we cannot doubt that the promise of His beatitude for the pure in heart was a promise not merely of a future good, but of a good to be enjoyed in some measure here and now.

(c) Another special use of the term 'kingdom of heaven,' and yet one that is easily derived from its fundamental idea, is found in a considerable number of passages. Thus Jesus said, 'It is better to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into Gehenna' (Mk 9<sup>47</sup>). Since Gehenna stands here in contrast to the kingdom of God, it is obvious that the latter term denotes the place to which the righteous go at death. Again we read, 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven' (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>). It is plain from the following verse that Jesus is thinking of the end of the present age, and therefore the kingdom of heaven is here a synonym for heaven as the abode of the blessed. It is used in the same sense when Jesus says that many shall come from the east and the west, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven (8<sup>11</sup>); and again, in the parable of the Tares, when it is said that the righteous, after the judgment of the wicked, shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father (13<sup>43</sup>).

The prominent thought in these passages is the place to be occupied by those who are under the rule of God, rather than that rule itself. The kingdom of heaven in this sense alone is wholly eschatological. It belongs entirely to the future. Yet it is by no means the Jewish apocalyptic kingdom even in these passages. It is open to Gentiles as well as Jews (8<sup>11-12</sup>), and it is not a kingdom for this earth. It is where the spirits of the patriarchs are now.

Such are the special uses of the term 'kingdom of heaven' in the words of Jesus. No one of them furnishes a conception that binds the various uses together as does the idea of the rule of God.

5. The ideal of Jesus and that of the scribes—Jesus' conception of the kingdom of heaven was not developed out of that of the scribes. It was the antithesis of that. The story of the Temptation marks the definite rejection of the popular idea. For there would have been no ground for the temptation of Jesus, in regard to the Messianic office, if that ideal which He put away as fundamentally evil had not been the ideal of His people. His ideal was born out of His own inner experience of the rule of God. Hence for Him the kingdom in its fundamental idea was something to be realized from within, quietly and gradually, by spiritual means. The scribes, on the contrary, looked for a kingdom to be realized from without, in a spectacular and supernatural manner. This is plain from certain references in the Gospel itself. Thus, when Jesus entered Jerusalem riding on an ass, and all the crowds shouted Hosanna, His disciples thought that He was now at last to set up a visible Messianic banner, and they hailed the coming kingdom of their father David (Mk 11<sup>10</sup>). Thus the establishment of the kingdom was associated in their minds with outward pomp. The disciples of Jesus, even after the resurrection, seem to have thought that the kingdom was to be set up in some miraculous manner, at any rate it was not to come through them (Ac 1<sup>6</sup>).

* The AV and RV rendering of ἐντός ὑμῶν, viz. 'within you,' is sanctioned by general usage and by the context (see Godet, Com. in loc.) equally with the marginal 'among you,' 'in the midst of you,' and possibly receives some confirmation from the 2nd of Grenfell and Hunt's 'New Sayings of Jesus' (see art. IUDAS [LEADINGS], p. 770b). But, if adopted, it falls even more readily than the other into line with Christ's teaching as to the spirituality of the kingdom.

This idea of the kingdom is common also in other Jewish writings. Thus, e.g., in the Psalms of Solomon we read that the Messiah will destroy the ungodly nations by the breath of His mouth, and He alone will establish the kingdom (17:25). Of the same purport is the Shema in the Talmud. Deliverance by the Messiah, like the deliverance of Israel by Moses, is to come from without, miraculously, and not at all from within. The Jews who are alive at the coming of the Messiah seem to have no more to do with the establishment of the kingdom than the Jews who are dead, and who at the beginning of the Messianic age are raised up to enjoy the kingdom (see Weber, Jud. Theol. 2 pp 347-354; Hugenreide, Die jud. Apokalypitik, p. 86).

Again, the popular conception of the kingdom of heaven in the time of Jesus was political and national. This is made plain in the Gospel. Thus, e.g., the third temptation of Jesus presupposes that people thought of the kingdom as a political organism. For it suggests that Jesus might secure all the kingdoms of the world and their glory—He a carpenter from the little town of Nazareth, poor and as yet without a follower—would have been psychologically impossible, had not the popular view associated world-wide political dominion with Messiahship; and it would not have been a temptation of any power to the mind of Jesus, had it not been deeply rooted in the Jewish heart, and had it not seemed to have strong support in the OT itself.

The Fourth Evangelist tells us that after the miracle of feeding the five thousand, Jesus perceived that the people were about to make Him king (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). This word is capable only of a political meaning in this place, and therefore shows that the Galilean idea of the kingdom was political. The character and strength of the popular view are seen in the request of Salome, seconded by James and John (Mk 10<sup>37</sup>), and in the question of the disciples who, after the resurrection, asked the Lord if He would now restore the kingdom to Israel (Ac 1<sup>6</sup>).

In utter contrast to this view, the fundamental conception of Jesus was, from the first, non-political and universal. The rule which He contemplated was, primarily, the rule of God in the heart, a rule which He doubtless thought of as transforming the entire outward life, social and political, and as bringing it into harmony with the Divine rule, though on this consequence of the inner rule of God He gave no explicit teaching. He dwelt on the fundamental spiritual fact of God's rule in the heart. If at times He used the word 'kingdom' in the sense of the company of men who were under the rule of God, He did so without a suggestion of any political organization. And when by the 'kingdom of heaven' Jesus meant the full realization of His ideal in the future age, it is manifest that His conception is wholly religious in character and universal in its scope. Men enter the kingdom from the east and the west—all who have shown the spirit of Jesus; and what they inherit is eternal life (Mt 8<sup>11, 12, 25</sup>).

We conclude, then, that just as Jesus derived His conception of God from His own experience, so it was from His experience of the rule of God that He developed His teaching about the kingdom of heaven. This teaching was akin to the spiritual views of the great prophet, but was wholly unlike that of the scribes of His day. See also art. ESCHATOLOGY, p. 528 ff.

KISS.—Originally a token of affection belonging to the intimate conditions of family life, but extended to other relationships.

1. To kiss is the expression of respect towards seniority and higher rank. Children in Oriental homes are taught to rise at the entrance of visitors and salute in this way. It is also their first form of greeting to parents and adult relatives before being kissed on the lips and cheek by them. When two sheikhs meet they kiss each other's hands in recognition of the rank held by each. Kissing the hand or making an attempt to do so, often occurs when one person receives a commission from another or undertakes to do some work for him. The feeling of respect originating in the relationship of child to parent is extended to that of employed and employer.

With regard to the salutation of Judas Iscariot (Lk 22<sup>47, 48</sup>), to have kissed the hand of Christ after the interval of absence caused by his conference with the chief priests would have been but an ordinary tribute of respect, and as such would have escaped the notice of the disciples while giving the required information to those who had come with him. If, on the other hand, the kiss was on the face, it was an act of presumption for an Oriental disciple to take the initiative in offering to his master the salutation of equal rank. The prodigal son, in meeting his father, would be described as kissing his hands before being embraced and kissed by the latter (Lk 15<sup>20</sup>).

2. Among those of the same age, and where the relationships of life permitted it, the salutation is given sometimes on the lips, but more frequently on the cheek or neck. For intimate relatives or acquaintances of the same sex to part for a time, or to meet after a period of separation without such salutation, would seem strained and unnatural (Lk 15<sup>20</sup>). In this form of greeting all thought of superior and inferior is lost in the equality of affection and identity of interest (Ac 20<sup>17</sup>). Such was the kiss of peace or salutation of good-will that prevailed for a time in the congregations of the early Church. It testified to the new bond of fellowship in the family of the firstborn, and was called a holy kiss (Ro 16<sup>16</sup>) as a reminder of Christian sanctification, and also a kiss of love (1 P 5<sup>14</sup>) made possible by the love that had given them such discipleship and communion.

KNEELING.—A comparison of the passages that refer to bodily posture seems to prove that kneeling is nowhere intended unless the word 'knee' (γόνα) forms part of the expression. The word προσκυνέω, usually tr. 'worship,' always denotes prostration, not kneeling. Kneeling is referred to as—(a) A posture of homage. In this sense it was rendered to Christ in awe of His person (Mk 10<sup>17</sup>, Lk 5<sup>8</sup>), and in mockery of His claims (Mt 27<sup>29</sup>). There is no instance of Christ Himself paying this homage to any man. (b) The posture of a suppliant (Mt 17<sup>14</sup>, Mk 1<sup>40</sup>). In classical literature the suppliant kneels and touches the knees, or beard, of the person applied to. (c) A posture of prayer. Lk 22<sup>41</sup> is the only instance of this in the Gospels. Among the Jews the usual custom (and in the Temple and synagogues at ordinary times the invariable custom) was to stand at prayer (Mt 6<sup>1</sup>, Mk 11<sup>2</sup>, Lk 9<sup>18-19</sup>, 18<sup>11a</sup>, 22<sup>46</sup> etc.). The prayers of Solomon (1 K 8<sup>54</sup> = 2 Ch 6<sup>13</sup>) and Ezra (Ezr 9<sup>5</sup>), both offered kneeling in the Temple, are altogether exceptional. Beyond general (and ambiguous) expressions, e.g. Ps 95<sup>6</sup>, Is 45<sup>23</sup>, any references to particular cases of kneeling are very rare in the OT (cf. Dn 6<sup>10</sup>). In the Jewish Church, Solomon's prayer is the only instance prior to the Captivity. In the Christian Church, instances multiply after Pentecost (Ac 7<sup>60</sup>, 9<sup>40</sup>, 20<sup>36</sup>, 21<sup>5</sup>). This may have been due in some measure to Hellenistic and Gentile influences. In 1 Ch 29<sup>20</sup> LXX there is an alteration of 'heads' to 'knees' bowed. The description given in Lk 22<sup>41</sup> (not supported by ||) occurs in a Gospel of Gentile authorship; and Gentile connexions are found in all except one (Ac 9<sup>40</sup>) of the NT passages already quoted. If this supposition is correct, the spread of kneeling as a posture of prayer has an interesting association with the change from a national to a universal religion.

KNOCKING.—The guarding of the Oriental house-door led to the more elaborate precautions with regard to entrance by the city gate.

1. During the daytime any unannounced approach is felt to be unneighbourly, and open to suspicion. It is regarded as an act of thoughtlessness or implied contempt to ride up to a Bedawi tent from behind. The privacy of domestic life forbids a visitor from entering even the walled enclosure round the house, without first knocking and asking permission. He must wait until his call is heard, and the bar of the door or gate, if closed, has been removed by a member or servant who can conduct him into the house.

2. It is, however, at night that the difficulty is greatest. The family have retired together into a room with closed doors, and on account of the habit of drawing the coverlet drawn over the head it is impossible for a time to hear the knock at the door. In the still, elastic air it is also difficult to localize the sound. In this way one is often disturbed by the loud persistent knocking and summoning by name resorted to by a neighbour who has returned late at night to his house (Lk 12<sup>36</sup>). The large wooden key of ancient times was too cumbersome to carry about, so that even one who had the right to enter, or was sure of being welcome, had to wait outside until the door was opened (Ac 12<sup>16</sup>). It was to those already familiar with such obstacles and the way of overcoming them that Christ said with regard to a higher entrance, 'Knock, and it shall be opened unto you' (Mt 7<sup>7-8</sup>); cf. Rev 3<sup>20</sup> 'Behold, I stand at the door, and knock.'
