3. In Christ's teaching there is comparatively little which carries the thought of reward. Most noticeable is Lk 17¹⁰ 'We are unprofitable servants,' or, according to Wellhausen's fine correction, 'We are servants! we have done that which it was our duty to do.' Also there is an approach to the Pauline standpoint in the flavour of irony with which our Lord describes 'the righteous' in contrast to sinners. He 'came not to call' them (Mt 9¹³ ||). 'There shall be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine righteous persons which need no repentance' (Lk 15⁷ (10. 32)). Lk 7⁴⁷ has the clearest trace of irony. 'Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; [you can see that it is so] for she' showed such signs of love. 'But to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little.' Again, the call to self-sacrifice (Mt 16²⁴ ||) shuts out any vulgar conception of reward, though, in point of form, the acceptance of earthly suffering does not cancel heavenly reward.

4. We must recognize, then, that hope of reward is a legitimate motive. It bears the highest imprimatur; and it keeps a place in the general Christian scheme, even as unfolded by that Apostle who might seem most opposed to it on principle. We need not think to do without it, even while we pass on to higher motives and fuller conceptions of duty. Christian labour and sacrifice are never in vain. The struggle 'availeth' (A. H. Clough's Poems, 'Say not the struggle'). See also art. RETRIBUTION.

RICHES.—See WEALTH.

RIGHT.—In the AV the word 'right' is the equivalent of two distinct Greek words, δίκαιος, 'righteous' (Mt 20^{4,7}, Lk 12⁵⁷), and ὀρθός, 'correctly' (Lk 7⁴³ 10²³ 20²¹). The Eng. word is etymologically associated with Lat. rectus (from regere, 'to rule'; cf. 'direct' and cognates). It implies that which is straight, according to rule. In the Gospels the idea of 'right,' as distinct from the word, runs through the whole of our Lord's revelation of God. His teaching is at once a demand for that which is right and the source of all instruction about it.

1. The standard of right is always found in the will of God as expressed in His law. Everything is referred to that. Doing the will of God is the simple but exhaustive summary of all true life (Mk 3³⁵).

2. The extent of right is to be understood as absolute conformity to the law of God, with no immunity and no reservation. Not only actions and words, but also thoughts, desires, and motives, are always included in its scope (Mt 5^{22, 28}). Since 'right' means conformity to God's character and will, it necessarily follows that this conformity must be absolute. Our Lord contrasts the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees with that which He demanded from His followers (5²⁰). His requirement was higher because of His higher conception of the character, will, and claims of God. To them righteousness was nothing more than a superficial outward conformity to the Divine law as interpreted and altered by their tradition. They measured by means of an imperfect standard, while our Lord laid down an absolute law (5⁴⁸). See art. RIGHTEOUSNESS.

3. The motives to right are variously stated and implied. (a) First and foremost is the (always implied) motive based on the truth that right is right and therefore must be done. (b) Then obedience to the will of God, because it is God's will, is emphasized (5³³ 7²¹). (c) A secondary and yet important motive is found in the spiritual blessings associated with the performance of right (5¹⁻¹¹ 6^{1, 4, 6, 18}). (d) Yet again we have the spiritual influences and effects of right as no inconsiderable motive for righteousness of thought, word, and deed (5^{13, 14}).

4. The encouragements to right are found in (a) the joy of satisfaction in obedience to God; (b) the approving testimony of conscience as the result of righteousness; (c) the blessing of God manifestly resting upon the life (10²⁸⁻³¹); (d) fellowship with Christ in faithful and true living (10²⁵ 12⁵⁰). These points concerning right are only a bare summary of what is both implicit and expressed in the whole of our Lord's teaching, especially in the five great sections of teaching found in Matthew.

5. The secret of right is found in personal union and communion with Christ. There is nothing dry, formal, and abstract in 'right' as conceived of in the NT. It is no question of an impersonal abstract τὸ δίκαιον or τὸ καλόν, but a warm, loving, living, and personal life of right thinking, right speaking, right doing, in union with Him who is personally ὁ δίκαιος and ὁ καλός. It is this that differentiates Christian ethics from all others. Christianity not only depicts an ideal and insists on its realization; it proclaims and provides the power to realize it, in union with Him who has Himself lived the life and fulfilled the Divine ideal, and whose grace is sufficient for all who receive it. In all that concerns 'right,' the followers of Christ accept and know by experience the truths of two great statements; one of the Master, and the other of one of His Apostles: 'Apart from me ye can do nothing' (Jn 15⁵); 'I can do all things in him who is empowering me' (Ph 4¹³).

RIGHT HAND.—See SESSION.

RIGHTEOUS, RIGHTEOUSNESS.—i. HISTORY OF THE TERMS.—The root notion of the Heb. word ṣāḏīq is that which is just, right, and normal; and its exact meaning fluctuates in each epoch according to the standard by which right and wrong are measured. It is true that in the OT this standard is always based on the will of Jehovah; but we observe great changes of this comprehensive—in the Jewish notion—in the Heb. word. In more primitive times the conception of ṣāḏīq is mainly forensic, meaning that which accords with custom as fixed by the Divinely given decisions of the people's judges. But the prophets raised the whole conception of the law of God, and insisted that its moral aspect was infinitely more important than its ceremonial. Indeed, though like all OT writers they dealt with action rather than character, they almost foreshadow in places the NT teaching, that it is a clean heart that makes a righteous deed. Hosea and Jeremiah illumined the conception of man's duty to his neighbour by the preaching of God's loving-kindness to His people. Deutero-Isaiah goes further still, and finds in the thought of God's unfailing righteousness the pledge that He will comfort and redeem His servants. As used of Him, the word ṣāḏīq denotes moral consistency and faithfulness to His promises, and in the highest prophetic teaching this was felt to include the love which pardons the penitent, though ever stern to the obdurate.

In the age of formalism, which was marked by the cessation of prophecy, the notion of righteousness became more ceremonial and external. Already in some of the Psalms we have 'the righteous' as a regular party in the land, and the term ultimately became the self-designation of the Pharisees. ṣāḏīq was now identified mainly with almsgiving in the sphere of private morals; and, in the judicial sphere, with readiness to help the weak as opposed to the letter of strict judgment.* In the LXX the word is tr. usually by δικαιοσύνη, but also by κρίσις, ἔλεος, and ἐλεημοσύνη; and the adj. ṣāḏīq usually by dikaios, but also by ἄμεμπτος, καθαρός, πίστος, and εὐσεβής.

The Gr. δικαιοσύνη, like the Heb. ṣāḏīq, was generally used in a much broader sense than our word 'justice,' and denoted social virtue as a whole. Aristotle defines it as ἀρετὴ τριπλῆ καὶ οὐκ ἀπλῆς ἀλλὰ πρὸς ἑαυτὸν . . . ἐν αἷμας ἀρετῆς, ἀλλὰ οὐκ ἀρετῆς (Éthics, v. 3, 1129b; cf. Plato, Republic, 443). The chief difference between the Heb. and Gr. words lies, not in the terms themselves, but in the radical distinction between the religions of the two races,—the former being based on the relation of man to God, the latter on man's duty to himself; thus in Greek δικαιοσύνη is usually distinguished from ἀνδρεία.

* See Dalman, Die richterliche Gerechtigkeit im AT, as quoted in art. 'Righteousness (in OT)' in Hastings' DB iv. 281.

ii. NT USAGE.—The NT writers inherited the word ṣāḏīq with all its religious associations, and used as its equivalent δικαιοσύνη, and as its opposite ἀδικία. The latter word is sometimes contrasted also with ἀλήθεια (e.g. Ro 1⁸, 2 Th 2¹⁰); for 'truth passing into action' is 'righteousness' (Westcott on 1 Jn 1⁹). ἀδικος is also contrasted with πίστος (Lk 16^{10, 11}), εὐσεβής (2 P 2⁹, cf. Ro 4⁸), ἅγιος (1 Co 6¹). The first of these three words expresses an idea of 'righteousness' or 'righteousness' (namely, devotion to God), but the other two give its basis for man,—devotion to God,—but do not immediately express the notion of duty towards one's neighbour.

Jesus Christ transformed the whole conception of righteousness; for He broke down the externalism of His day by emphasising His character rather than action, and set forth an entirely new basis by making it a real response of the whole personality to God, and pointing to love as the essence of righteousness. It is significant in this connexion that it was Christianity that created the very conception of personality, and so ultimately the word itself. Jesus Christ tells His followers that their righteousness is to be based on the eternal character of God (Mt 5^{44, 45}), as uniquely revealed in human life by Himself (11²⁷). Accordingly the early Christians seem to have spoken of Christ as 'the righteous one' (see Ac 3¹⁴ 7⁵² 22¹⁴, Ja 5⁶). But we must examine in more detail the righteousness taught and exemplified by Him.

1. The Synoptists.—(a) General usage.—The Synoptic writers all use dikaios and δικαιοσύνη generally, of the man who tries to do his duty in the sight of God, whether Christian or not (Mt 1¹⁹ 5⁴⁵, Mk 6²⁰, Lk 1⁶ 2²⁵). But St. Matthew also uses the words especially of believers in Christ, to denote the character which He requires in citizens of the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 5¹⁰ 6¹ etc.). St. Luke, indeed, approximates to this in three passages at least (Lk 14¹⁴, Ac 24^{15, 25}); but with him it can scarcely be called a well-defined usage. The explanation of this peculiarity of the First Gospel no doubt lies in the fact that its chief aim is to represent Christianity as the consummation of Judaism (cf. Mt 5⁷). But a still more noteworthy fact is that the Synoptic writers do not directly speak of righteousness as a Divine attribute. [Mt 6³³ is no exception, for 'his righteousness' there means the character which God expects of us, though this is implicitly based on the nature of the Father]. Nor is Christ ever directly termed dikaios by them, except in the mouth of unbelievers (e.g. Pilate's wife in Mt 27¹⁹), and in the cases mentioned above from the Acts, where St. Luke represents three different speakers as calling Him ὁ δίκαιος. In this connexion it is significant that in recording the centurion's words at Calvary, St. Luke (23⁴⁷) writes, 'Certainly this was a righteous man'; but St. Matthew (27⁵⁴) and St. Mark (15³⁹) give ὁ υἱὸς θεοῦ in place of dikaios. Now, when we remember that our Lord, in the Synoptic accounts, does not speak of Himself as ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, though He accepts the title from others, and acknowledges His unique Sonship before the Sanhedrin (Lk 22⁷⁰ ||), we see why He does not call Himself ὁ δίκαιος. He does not put forward His own claims in the Galilean ministry, but leaves His followers to infer them from His words and acts (cf. Mt 16¹⁵⁻¹⁷). And when men have drawn the inference, then they call Him ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ rather than ὁ δίκαιος. Similarly, He Himself does not speak of the Father's righteousness, because to His hearers the word would not convey enough. He speaks rather of the Father's love.

(b) God's righteousness.—What we have said above leads us on naturally to ask, What is the central idea in Christ's teaching about the Father's righteousness (for though He does not Himself apply the word to God in the Synoptic accounts, the idea is not excluded)? Our Lord bases everything on the truth that God is a loving Father to all men, and they are potentially His sons; by love they may know Him, and so make that potentiality actual. Such is the teaching of the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15¹¹⁻³²). In Mt 5⁴⁵⁻⁴⁸ Christ tells us that God loves both good and evil, both righteous and unrighteous; and His followers are to do the same 'in order that ye may be (γενήσθε = 'show yourselves to be'; or else 'become') sons of your Father which is in heaven.' And His summary of the whole matter is, 'Ye therefore shall be perfect (i.e. in and through love) as your heavenly Father is perfect.' But this love in God, if it makes Him infinitely merciful to the penitent sinner, makes Him equally stern to the impenitent. Again, and again Christ, by means of a series of parables, teaches the future suffering of the wicked. It will suffice to quote one which shows the unity of the Divine love in its two aspects of mercifulness and sternness—the parable of the king that took account of his servants and punished him who showed no mercy to his fellow (Mt 18²³⁻³⁵). He is ready to forgive the largest of debts if only the servant proves his love; but he has no mercy for the ungrateful and unloving; 'he delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due.'

(c) Christ's righteousness.—If we may rightly speak of the absolute righteousness of God in the Synoptic accounts, we have no less reason for speaking of the absolute righteousness of Christ. A close examination of His words may even seem explicitly to sanction this. In Mt 5¹⁰ He pronounces a blessing on those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake; and in the next verse He goes on, 'Blessed are ye when men shall . . . persecute you . . . for my sake.' We may compare Mk 8³⁵ 'Whoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's shall save it' (also Mk 10²⁹). Throughout his Gospel St. Matthew makes δικαιοσύνη the character of the citizens of the Kingdom of heaven. But Jesus Christ is the imputation of that kingdom (Mt 11¹¹⁻¹²). It is He as the Son of Man, who sows the good seed of the Kingdom (13³⁷); He, again, who can give 'the keys of the kingdom' (16¹⁹). He has authority over the angels in His kingdom, which is the kingdom of the Father (13⁴¹⁻⁴³). He not only gives to men a unique revelation—the only revelation—of the Father (11²⁷—a passage which implies His sinlessness), but He is the giver of the Holy Ghost (3¹¹). This teaching is confirmed by the order of words in Mt 24³⁶ and Mk 13³² (men—the angels—the Son—the Father). So He claims to be the Son of God (Lk 22⁷⁰), and suffers condemnation for blasphemy; as such, He is transfigured, before three of His Apostles, with the Divine glory (Mt 17¹⁻⁸). And so again He assents to the statement that He is quite different from one of the prophets (Mt 16¹⁴⁻¹⁶); they were righteous, but He is the righteous Man, and more also. The whole teaching of the Synoptic Gospels is implicitly the same; nowhere does our Lord show any consciousness of sin; again and again He emphasizes the sinfulness of all men and their need of repentance. Therefore He is to be the judge of mankind, in the consummation of God's kingdom (Mt 7²¹, 13⁴¹ 16²⁷ 25^{31ff.}).

(d) The contents of righteousness.—What, in brief, was the ideal of which Christ was the perfect example, and which He sets before His followers? Obviously an adequate answer to this question is far beyond the limits of this article. But we must try to apprehend a few leading principles. This is the easier, because Christ sought to 'educate' His disciples by giving them principles rather than precepts; His service was to be a free development, not a slavish system. St. Matthew has collected for us, in the Sermon on the Mount, much of our Lord's teaching on the Kingdom of heaven and the δικαιοσύνη which marks it. They are to seek above all else 'the kingdom of God and his righteousness' (Mt 6³³); they are to 'hunger and thirst for righteousness' (5⁶). The Kingdom only reflects the eternal character of the King (5⁴⁵). Thus δικαιοσύνη, which is very close in meaning to our modern word 'morality,' is throughout based on religion, and treated as inseparable from it. Mt 6 opens with a warning against ostentation in δικαιοσύνη (if, indeed, that is the right reading); and the examples given are those of almsgiving (v.²), prayer (v.⁵), and fasting (v.¹⁶)—the second of which, at least, is often treated by us as outside morality. Now the central principle of God's being is, as we said, represented to be love. Consequently love is the unfailing measure of human δικαιοσύνη. The first commandment is 'Love God'; the second, 'Love thy neighbour as thyself' (Mk 12²⁹⁻³¹); and, according to St. Matthew (22⁴⁰), Christ adds the words, 'on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets' (words almost repeated in Mt 7¹² and presupposed in Gal 5¹⁴ and Ro 13⁸).

Here, then, is the principle by which we may test all our actions. God judges men by what they are rather than by what they do; we, being human, and unable to read the heart, are to judge by their deeds what men are (Mt 7¹⁶), though with much caution against rash and censorious judgments (7¹). But the final judgment is God's, who takes account of motive as well as act. He who nurses wrath against a brother, or treats him with bitter contempt, is guilty before God as well as the man who proceeds to murder (5^{21, 22}); and 'every one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart' (5²⁸). It has been well said that 'inwardness' is the guiding principle of the Sermon on the Mount. The hard sayings of Mt 5³⁹⁻⁴² must clearly be interpreted on the same principle of love towards our neighbour, resting on love towards God; they do not forbid all resistance of evil (such as resistance to a thief or one of overbearing temper), but they prohibit resistance which springs from personal resentment; they do not inculcate indiscriminate charity, but command us to do, without thought of self, whatever is best for those in need. On the same principle, Christ tells us that it is quality, not quantity, that matters. In prayer we are not to 'use vain repetitions,' as if we should be heard for our 'much speaking' (Mt 6⁷); yet it is to be observed that Christ Himself sometimes spent the whole or the major part of the night in prayer (Lk 6¹², Mk 6⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸). Men may 'cast out devils' and do 'many mighty works' in Christ's name, and yet be no true followers of His (Mt 7^{22, 23}). The widow who cast a farthing into the treasury was doing a greater thing than those who brought rich offerings (Mk 12⁴¹⁻⁴⁴).

Love to God is the first commandment; love to man is included in it, as the less in the greater. The motive which makes the service of men righteous in the highest sense is that it should be done for Christ's sake (Mk 9⁴¹, Mt 10⁴² 18⁵), or, in other words, in order that men 'may glorify your Father which is in heaven' (Mt 5¹⁶). We must really lose ourselves before we can find our true selves (Mt 16²⁵ etc.); i.e. self-development is included in the end, but it can never come through selfishness. The Christian's paradise is not like the Mohammedan's; the reward of self-denying toil in Christ's service is more toil (Lk 19¹⁷). The Lord's Prayer opens, not with petition, but with adoration and thanksgiving; and petition must be qualified with the thought, 'nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done' (Lk 22⁴²).

Thus one important aspect of love is filial trust, or faith in God. But this faith is certainly not intellectual in essence. Without love it is void and empty (Mt 7²⁴). It is the faith which seeks God's kingdom and His righteousness first, and makes the daily toil for the material necessities of life subordinate to these, in its calm certitude that God will give sufficient for our needs. But how, it may be asked, are we to win such faith as this? Partly by contemplation of God's love in Nature (Mt 5⁴⁵ 6³⁵⁻³⁹, Lk 12²⁴⁻³²); partly by the evidence of Christ's life, death, and resurrection (Mt 16⁸⁻¹⁰ 28^{19, 20} etc.); partly by turning into earnest prayer the measure of faith that we have (cf. Mk 9^{23, 24}); and partly by loving service of our brother men in all humility (see Lk 17⁸⁻¹⁰).

Again, as love for mankind is incomplete except when based on love for God, so is love for God an idle sentimentality unless it is realized by the service of men. 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 7²¹). This is set forth in detail in the picture of the Last Judgment (Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶). Here the test of men is whether they gave food, drink, and shelter to strangers and to those who were needy, or sick, or outcast. For the 'Golden Rule,' which sums up 'the Law and the Prophets,' is, 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also to them' (Mt 7¹², Lk 6³¹). Nor is any man to be outside the pale of a Christian's love. To the scribe's question, 'Who is my neighbour?' Christ replies by a parable, in which the Samaritan is represented as doing for one of his traditional enemies, the Jews, what the priest and Levite of the man's own race had left undone (Lk 10²⁹). So He abolishes the Jewish belief that 'neighbour' includes only those of one's own race. And His last words on earth lay before His Apostles their duty of teaching all nations (Mt 28¹⁹, Lk 24⁴⁷, cf. Mk 16¹⁵). He uses also the term 'brother' in a no less catholic sense, in all probability, though He never explicitly tells His disciples that they are to consider all men as brethren (see Mt 7³ and 18^{15, 21}, Lk 17^{3, 4}). The teaching of the parable of the Prodigal Son is still more emphatic on this point. It is also true that He uses the word 'brother' in a narrower sense, to denote specially the man, whoever he is, that does the will of God (Mk 3³⁵ ||). See art. BROTHERHOOD.

It was the simplicity and the 'inwardness' of this supreme test of righteousness by love that were to make Christ's 'yoke easy' (Mt 11³⁰), in contrast with the 'heavy burdens' imposed on men's shoulders by the externalism and endless rules of the Pharisees (23⁴). He said, 'Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven. Who-soever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven' (18^{3, 4}, cf. Mk 9³³); and He called the scribes and Pharisees 'children of hell' (Mt 23¹⁵)—a term which He never applies even to the publican or the harlot—because He found in their self-exaltation and censoriousness (cf. Lk 18¹¹, Mt 23⁵⁻¹⁰) the very antithesis of the meekness and humility which were to Him the essence of righteousness (Mt 11²⁹ 7¹⁻⁵, Lk 17⁷⁻¹⁰). His mission, He says, is not to the self-righteous, but to the man conscious of his sin (Mt 9¹³ ||, cf. Lk 15⁷). To the Pharisee ceremonial was everything, the spirit of action nothing (Mt 23^{25, 26}); to Him the ceremonial was useless unless carried out in the spirit of love (5²³⁻²⁹), and the rule of law must always give way to the rule of love (cf. His treatment of Sabbath-observance, Mk 2²³⁻³⁵). Therefore He said, 'Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 5²⁰).

This leads us to speak briefly of His treatment of the Mosaic Law. He made a rule of observing it, but never in a literal, slavish manner. In everything He acted on the principle that 'the Son of Man is lord even of the Sabbath' (Mk 2²⁸). He yielded to authority (cf. Mk 12¹⁷ ||, Lk 17¹⁴, Mt 17²⁷), except when doing so meant the violation of a higher law (see Mt 23³). The Law was to Him sound in principle, but not perfect. His work in respect to it was not revolutionary, but evolutionary (5¹⁷⁻²⁰). Not 'a jot or tittle' of its underlying principles was to perish; and the man who should 'break' (λύσῃ in v. 19 picks up καταλύσαι in v. 17; cf. Jn 7²³) them would be acting against Christ's command.*

On the other hand, He gives new and deeper applications to the laws of Moses, as in the case of the law of murder (Mt 5^{21, 22}). He does not hesitate to add new restrictions to it, as in the case of the laws of adultery, false swearing, and retaliation (vv. 27, 33, 38); and He definitely abrogates a law of Moses when He declares all meats clean (Mk 7¹⁵⁻¹⁹).

In connexion with the question of Christ's relation to the Law, there is one passage which calls for special mention—Mt 3¹⁵, where, in answer to the Baptist's protest against baptizing Him, He says: 'Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness.' We are sometimes told that δικαιοσύνη is here equivalent to the ceremonial law; but this cannot be so, inasmuch as there was no ceremonial law about baptism. Nor did baptism mean the same to Him as to most who underwent it. To them the ceremony selected by John brought assurance of forgiveness of sins, but no conscious outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Ac 19^{2, 3}); to Him it brought no forgiveness of sins, but a visible descent of the Spirit. For He never, all His life through, raised Himself above the ordinary human dependence on outward act and form, as His use of symbolic action and the institution of the two Sacraments show us. By δικαιοσύνη, then, in this passage, He clearly means the general use of outward religious ritual current at His time, and He makes this the occasion of receiving spiritual power.

(e) The communication of Christ's righteousness to His followers.—It would be going beyond the limits of this article to discuss the method of Justification and Sanctification (see sep. art.), as represented in the Synoptic writers; it only remains to show the place they give to the facts which these words represent (even though it is impossible entirely to separate method and fact). We have seen that Christ claimed a unique knowledge of the Father and a unique power of revealing Him to man (Mt 11²⁷ ||),—a revelation which He consistently represented as possible only through love. Nor was this power to fail at His death. As their risen Lord He would always be with His disciples, to pour upon them power from on high (28¹⁸⁻²⁰, Lk 24^{48, 49}). He was now to fulfil the Baptist's prophecy that He should baptize them with the Holy Spirit (Ac 1⁵ 2¹⁻¹³). The Holy Spirit, representing the risen Christ (Mt 28²⁰), was to give them the righteousness which should, by God's love, fit them for the Kingdom of heaven,—righteousness growing with their growing love and faith, which were to be its essence. Christ dis-

* This passage has caused such difficulties to the commentators that some of them have declared it inconsistent with Christ's teaching, and have held that He never said these words (cf. Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. p. 24 f.). But that v. 18 really applies to the principles of the Law, and not its letter, is surely proved by the addition of v. 20, where the scribes and Pharisees are denounced as having broken it while seeming to 'hedge it round.'

tinctly took His stand on the appeal to morality. Works were to be the necessary outcome of true love (Mt 7²¹ etc.). When He says, 'Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled' (5⁶), He does not mean in the next world only, but in this also. Indeed, throughout His teaching, the life to come is treated as an orderly development of this life. He speaks, on the one hand, of the Kingdom of heaven as already come in some measure,—'the kingdom of God is within you' (Lk 17²¹, cf. 6³⁰ 11³⁰), and it is to come with more marked power still within the lifetime of some of His disciples (Mk 9¹ ff.). Yet, on the other hand, its consummation is not for this life, but for the life to come (Mt 23³⁴, Mk 14²⁵=Lk 22¹⁸=Mt 26²⁹). So Christ taught His disciples to pray, 'Thy kingdom come,' i.e. in ever more and more fulness until the end (συντέλεια). Meanwhile (as is everywhere implied, and nowhere stated) God sees each member of the Kingdom not as he is, but as he is becoming 'in Christ,' and treats him as a son for his faith and love.

2. St. John.—When we turn to the Johannine writings, we pass into a new atmosphere. We are no longer dealing so much with the outer activities of Christ's life in its earthly setting. St. John had pondered through long years and with deep reverence over the inner meaning of that life. To him Christ was not the λόγος, the revelation of the eternal Father, though it had been given them to touch and see Him in earthly form. Consequently we have a series of sayings unlike anything in the first three Gospels: 'God is Spirit' (4⁹), 'God is Light' (1 Jn 1⁵), 'God is Love' (1 Jn 4^{8,16}), 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life' (Jn 14⁶). So the thought of righteousness as a Divine attribute is more fully developed in St. John. It is parallel to the use of ἀλήθεια, which he treats almost as a synonym for ἀγαπώνη, representing the less active side of righteousness (cf. ποιεῖν τὴν ἀλήθειαν in Jn 3²¹ and 1 Jn 1⁶ with ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην in 1 Jn 3⁷). So in Jn 8³²⁻³⁴ 'the truth shall make you free . . . but he that doeth sin is a slave.' Again, the conception of the Kingdom becomes in St. John the thought of life eternal; and the latter in Jn., as the former in the Synoptists, is spoken of now as a present possession (3³⁶), now as that which shall be fully bestowed only in the next life (12²⁵).

Thus the thought of righteousness as a Divine attribute meets us at every turn, and its explicit mention not infrequently. δικαίος εἰ, cries the angel to the Eternal in the Apocalypse (Rev 16⁵, where the thought is chiefly of His sternness to the wicked [cf. 15³ 16⁷ 19²] in delivering His saints). Πατήρ δικαίος are Christ's own words in prayer (Jn 17²⁰), where the thought is primarily of God's gracious mercy and faithfulness in revealing His love to His chosen ones. δικαίος occurs again in 1 Jn 1⁹ in a similar sense of 'true to his loving nature.' 'If we confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' In exactly the same way righteousness is predicated of Christ throughout as One who is consistent in His mercy to the penitent, and loving in His necessary sternness to the obdurate. 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous' (1 Jn 2¹); 'They that have done good (shall come forth) unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done ill, unto the resurrection of judgment. . . . My judgment is righteous' (Jn 5³⁰). Yet 'I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me . . . the word that I spake . . . shall judge him in the last day' (12^{47,48}). Christ, that is to say, seeks but to save the wicked, in His love for them; but if they will not have His mercy, they are self-doomed.

The Divine part throughout is that of absolute love: 'God is love,'—that sums Him up in a word; and that is the newness of the Christian teaching (13³⁴ 15¹²) which transforms the notion of what makes goodness in deed. Our whole duty is to love God, which involves obedience to Him (1 Jn 5³), and is declared to be the only means of knowing Him (4⁷). The love of God necessarily carries with it the love of man (4^{11,12,20}); it is the love of God, shown by sending His Son to die for the world, which teaches us to love other men (3¹⁶ 4^{9,10}), and the one love must be as catholic as the other (cf. Jn 12³²). Elsewhere, in emphasizing the inwardness of all true righteousness, Christ shows that it depends on God's nature as Spirit. 'God is Spirit, and they that worship him, must worship in spirit and truth' (4²⁴). And the corollary is that true worship is independent of locality and ceremonial (v. 21),—though this is not to be taken as implying that all ceremonial may be safely cast aside.

But it is by developing Christ's teaching about the second or spiritual birth that St. John especially marks both the essential inwardness and the continuous growth of . . . The locus classicus for this is the . . . given in 3³⁻²¹, where the eternal life given by the second birth is brought into immediate relation with His own pre-existence and resurrection (vv. 13-16). This chapter is illustrated in the First Epistle, where he writes: 'Every one that loveth is begotten of God' (4⁷).

'Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God' (5¹).

'If ye know that he (probably Christ) is righteous, ye know that everyone also that doeth righteousness is begotten of God' (2²⁹).

But here we must add a further point. Christ 'was manifested to take away sin; and in him is no sin. Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not . . . the righteous man is 'he that doeth righteousness, . . . even as he is righteous. . . . Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin, because his seed abideth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is begotten of God' (1 Jn 3⁵⁻⁹). At first sight this seems inconsistent with 1⁸, where the Apostle tells us, 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins . . . Clearly, in the former passages, sin is thought of as a lasting state of rebellion against God; in the latter, it is treated rather as an act due to weakness. He that is born of God cannot deliberately rebel against God, as long as the new life is in him; cf. Jn 13⁴⁰ 'Ye are clean, but not all' (Christ excepts only Judas, v. 11); 15³ 'Already ye are clean because of the word which I have spoken unto you'; for, as He goes on to say, this cleanliness of heart comes from the union of Himself with the disciple, effected by love. 'Abide in me and I in you. . . . He that abideth in me and I in him, the same beareth much fruit; for apart from me ye can do nothing' (v. 46, cf. 17^{21,22}). Here we have explicitly stated what is implicit in the Synoptic Gospels, namely, that only by the union of love with the risen Christ (cf. 8^{31,32} 15¹³⁻¹⁶) can we do righteousness, receiving more and more of 'his fulness . . . and grace for grace' (1¹⁶), having already in us the eternal life which is to be consummated at the last day (cf. 17³ 20³¹). This is the general meaning of 16⁸⁻¹⁰ 'The Holy Spirit, when he is come, will convict the world in respect of . . . righteousness . . . because I go to the Father, and ye behold me no more'; that is to say, the Holy Spirit will not only reveal Christ's righteousness to the world, but will show men the infinite possibilities which are theirs in union with Him, because Christ is henceforth alive for evermore with the Father, having conquered death and sin. All this implies, what St. Paul explains so fully, that God sees us as we are becoming 'in Christ,' rather than as we are; but St. John does not analyze forgiveness as St. Paul does, and throughout he looks rather at the eternal fact than the temporal process.

3. St. Paul.—In St. Paul's Epistles δικαίος generally bears the same meaning as elsewhere in the NT, and so is associated with θεῖος and ἅγιος (cf. Tit 1⁸, Ro 7¹²). However, once at least he seems to revert almost unconsciously to the Pharisaic idea of the δικαίος as one who conforms to law; for in Ro 5⁷ he apparently differentiates between the 'righteous' and the 'good' (ἀγαθός) man in much the same way as the Gnostics afterwards called the God of the OT 'righteous' (meaning 'just'), and the God of the NT 'good.' This is not his usual custom, however; indeed, in Eph 5⁹ he couples ἀγαθωσύνη and δικαιοσύνη; and in Ro 7¹² he puts δικαία between ἀγία and ἀγαθή.

In Ro 14¹⁷ St. Paul tells us that 'the kingdom of God is . . . righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost,'—words which remind us of St. Matthew. But, unlike the First Gospel, he often speaks of the righteousness of God. In the years which preceded his conversion, he had known all the suffering of a sensitive man who feels that, in spite of all his desire to keep God's law, he is constantly breaking it in act, and generally failing to live up to the spirit of it. The salvation of his life had come to him in the conviction that God takes the will for the deed, and that in union with the risen Christ the human will is kept constantly true. This is the truth that he has to work out intellectually in his Epistles. And he begins by showing that Christ had not lowered the standard of God's righteousness to meet human weakness, but raised it. . . . God is and must be true to His righteous nature; He is the righteous judge who will reward those who serve Him and punish those who do not. It is not the fact of God's righteousness that has been abolished by Christianity, but the old standard of service. This comes out very clearly in Ro 10. Israel, he says, were ignorant of God's righteousness (though they knew God's law, v. 3), for 'Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness unto every one that hath faith' (v. 4). The Jew had thought that he must 'ascend into heaven' or 'descend into the abyss,' that is, make superhuman efforts to keep the Law. But the righteousness which is of faith saith, ' . . . The word is nigh thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart; that is, the word of faith which we preach.' 'For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation' (vv. 6-10). It is not keeping the Law in act that God demands so much as 'faith working through love' (Gal 5⁶); 'the end of the charge is love out of . . . faith unfeigned' (1 Ti 1⁵). 'For the whole law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Gal 5¹⁴, cf. Ro 13⁸). Without love, the most wonderful of God's other gifts—even faith itself—or the most perfect acts of self-devotion, are vain and empty (1 Co 13¹⁻³): love is greater than faith (v. 13), though it necessarily contains faith (v. 7). Thus Mosaism is ἡ διακονία τῆς κατακρίσεως, but Christianity is ἡ διακονία τῆς δικαιοσύνης (2 Co 3⁹). God, 'the righteous judge,' shall give the crown of righteousness (i.e. perfect righteousness as a reward; cf. τὸν στέφανον τῆς ζωῆς, Rev 2¹⁰. Ja 1¹²) to all them that have loved His appearing (2 Ti 4⁸).

So St. Paul, though he constantly emphasizes the truth that 'faith is counted for righteousness' (Ro 4⁵ etc.), never means by faith merely an intellectual belief, but that faith which is part of love, i.e. a response of the whole personality to God. Therefore it is obviously quite unfair to represent his doctrine of justification by faith as entailing a legal fiction. The faith and the love must be actual in the believer, and must issue in action (2¹⁴), and as they grow, so must action become more perfect; it is not the action, however, that constitutes righteousness in God's sight, but the faith and love. God views us sub specie aeternitatis: He looks on us as we shall be some day by virtue of our union with Christ. St. Paul puts forward, in different language, the truth which St. John expresses by saying that the man who is begotten of God cannot sin. As the believer beholds through faith 'the glory of the Lord,' he is 'transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit' (2 Co 3¹⁸). Christ is the Second Adam (Ro 5¹²⁻¹⁵); we are, by the mysterious union of love, 'in Christ Jesus, who was made unto us . . . and sanctification' (1 Co 1³⁰). We may . . . righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5²¹). 'I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me' (Ph 4¹³). Sometimes St. Paul's language touches that of St. John: 'If Christ is in you . . . (your) spirit is life because of righteousness' (Ro 8¹⁰; cf. the opposition of θάνατος and δικαιοσύνη in 6¹⁶; cf. also 'reigning in life,' 5¹⁷, where χάριτος—God's gracious gift—is coupled with δικαιοσύνης).

4. The rest of the NT.—The other books of the NT present few new features which call for notice here. The Epistle to the Hebrews emphasizes Christ's absolute righteousness, in order to show Him as the one sufficient Victim and High Priest. He is 'the effulgence of (God's) glory and the very image of his substance' (1³). The Psalmist's words apply to Him uniquely, 'Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity' (1⁹). He was 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (4¹⁵). He is the 'king of righteousness' (7²). With regard to His work for His followers, the writer of the Epistle usually employs the words ἀγάωω and τελειόω. He exhorts his readers to have 'experience of the word of righteousness,' that is, 'to press on unto perfection (τελειότης), not laying again a foundation of repentance from dead works, fear of judgment toward God, of the teaching of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal life' (5¹⁻² and 6¹⁻²). This perfection comes on a threefold Christ (7¹¹⁻¹⁹); He is the risen High Priest, who 'ever liveth to make intercession for us' (7²⁵, cf. 4¹⁶ 5⁹ 6¹⁹⁻²⁰). His blood purges us 'from dead works to serve the living God' (9¹⁴). 'By one offering he hath perfected for ever (i.e. permanently) them that are being sanctified' (10¹⁴). Therefore we must 'follow after the sanctification without which no man shall see the Lord' (12¹⁴). The Epistle bases our sanctification on love through faith, just as St. Paul does (3¹⁹ with 4²). The OT heroes wrought all their great deeds through faith (ch. 11); but faith could not possibly bring them such τελειώσις as it can to the Christian, who is united with his risen Lord (11⁴⁰). The Christian's work rests on a fuller faith; but love is what makes it fruitful,—love to man rooted in love to God (6¹⁰ 10²⁴). Our first duty is to offer up loving worship to God; our second, 'to do good and to communicate' (13¹⁵⁻¹⁶).

The Epistles of St. Peter touch the subject at several points; but, being practical rather than doctrinal, they do not treat it systematically. The writer of the Second Epistle salutes those 'that have obtained a like precious faith with us in the righteousness' (i.e. consistent mercy) 'of our God and (the) Saviour Jesus Christ' (2 P 1¹). Christ, the righteous, died for us the unrighteous (1 P 3¹⁸; cf. St. Peter in Ac 3¹⁴); He is the 'lamb without blemish and without spot' (1¹⁹). 'He bare our sins in his body upon the tree, that we, having died unto sins, might live unto righteousness' (2²⁴), by the power of the risen Lord (1³). Our union with Him in love and faith works out the salvation of our souls (1⁸⁻⁹). For faith ends in love (2 P 1⁷). The Christian's duty, therefore, is to love his neighbour 'from the heart fervently' (1 P 1²²); 'above all things being fervent in love . . . for love covereth a multitude of sins' (4⁸). But the end of all his good works is that men may glorify God (2¹²). So shall he be saved unto the new heavens and new earth, where this righteousness shall dwell in perfection (2 P 3¹³).

The Epistle of St. James follows closely the Sermon on the Mount. He speaks once of God's righteousness, meaning the righteousness which God demands of us (1²⁰). And in all probability he refers to Christ as ὁ δίκαιος (5⁶). He speaks of love for one's neighbour as 'the royal law' (2⁸); and he insists at some length that the faith which was accounted unto Abraham for righteousness was not merely intellectual; it could not be separated from his works, in which it was realized and made perfect (2²²⁻²³).

LITERATURE.—The subject is treated, in some of its aspects, in so many books that it is hard to select any for special mention. There are chapters on it in almost every work on NT Theology; e.g. Bayschlag and Stevens; see also Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, vol. I. § iii. ch. iv.; Bruce, Kingdom of God, chs. viii. ix. For individual passages in the NT, reference must be made to the standard Commentaries. Probably the fullest analysis of the word is in Cremer's Bib.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek.
C. T. WOOD.

RING.—When the Prodigal Son in the parable returned to his father (Lk 15²⁵), the latter ordered a ring (δακτύλιος) to be placed on his son's finger. This was not only a mark of opulence (Ja 2²), it is perhaps intended also as a token that he was restored to a place of authority in the house, and allowed to issue orders in his father's name (see Gn 38¹⁸ 41⁴², Est 3¹⁰). For the allegorical fancies that have clustered round this ring, see the works on the Parables; cf., further, art. SEAL.

C. H. PRICHARD.

RIVER (ποταμός).—'River' (Mk 1⁵ etc.), 'flood' (Mt 7²⁵), 'stream' (Lk 6⁴⁸), and 'waters' (2 Co 11²⁶) stand for the same Greek word ποταμός. 'Stream' in Lk 6⁴⁸ corresponds to 'flood' in Mt 7²⁵.

The Jordan is the one true river in Palestine. The name occurs frequently in the Gospels, but only once connected with 'river' (Mk 1⁵). See JORDAN.

The 'stream' (Lk 6⁴⁸) or 'flood' (Mt 7²⁵) is evidently the rushing torrent raised by wintry rains. From Rev 12¹⁵⁻¹⁶ we gather that ποταμός may signify any great volume of water rolling over the land. St. Paul's 'perils of rivers' (1 Co 11²⁶) were doubtless such as the Eastern traveller has perpetually to face in fording bridgeless streams in times of rain and melting snow.

To one reared in Palestine, where only water is required to turn the wilderness into a garden, a river, with its beautifying and fertilizing power, might well seem an apt symbol of life (Rev 22¹⁻²).

ROADS.—Roads imply a certain amount of civilization. In primitive times it was only near the great centres that regularly built roads were to be found, and even there they were poor and few. In the days of the Empire it was different. The Romans knew the value of good roads, and spared no pains on them. The remains that have come down to us would do credit to modern engineers. They were well bottomed and well laid, and from ten to fourteen feet wide, generally broadest when the cutting was through solid rock. The foundations were of stone, and when allowed to fall into disrepair were rough and slippery, and very trying to the nerves of travellers. In the provinces the roads were under the care of the governors; elsewhere they were under the charge of special officers—frequently of high rank. Along the great military highways were stations, or guard-houses, where travellers had not only to see to the preservation of peace and the safety of travellers, but had also to attend to the maintenance of the roads themselves. There the tolls were levied. It was probably at one of these places that Matthew was sitting at the receipt of custom when Jesus called him (Mt 9⁹). As the highways between the East and the West passed through the land of the Israelites, making its geographical position unique, it may be well to indicate one or two of these. Cf. map of Palestine in vol. i.

1. The most northerly, and in some respects the most important, was that connecting the Mediterranean Sea and the Euphrates. Starting at Acco (Ptolemais), it ran, according to Ramsay, till it came to Karn Hattin near to Cana, and then almost due east to Tiberias. Skirting the shores of the Sea of Galilee, it crossed the Jordan near Bethsaida, and went over a spur of the Anti-Libanus, and then east by north to Damascus. This road is said to have been a rich source of revenue to the Romans. In the time of the Crusades it was known as the Via Maris.

2. From Damascus there came another road, a little to the east of the former, which reached almost to the Sea of Galilee, and then, bending southward on the east side of Jordan, passed beyond the Dead Sea. This was probably the way that the Syrian and Assyrian armies took in their advance on Israel (2 K 8²⁸ 9¹⁴ 10³², 1 Ch 5²⁶).

3. There was also the road along the Mediterranean; and this, both in peace and war, was of the first importance. It ran through Acco, Cæsarea, Joppa, Ashdod, and Gaza into Egypt. Along this road St. Paul was sent to Cæsarea (Ac 23³³).

4. From Jerusalem roads branched out to north, south, east, and west. (a) There was one through Samaria connecting Judæa and Galilee. Although the direct road from Jerusalem to Galilee, it was seldom used by the devout Jews, on account of the hatred that existed between them and the Samaritans. It was by this road that Jesus journeyed when He spoke to the woman of Samaria (Jn 4⁴). (b) In ordinary circumstances the Jews preferred to avoid intercourse with the Samaritans, hence in going northward they took the road leading down by Jericho, over the Jordan, and up through Perea. (c) To the west, another road ran from Jerusalem to Jaffa, passing Gibeah, Beth-horon, and Lydda; while (d) to the south the road went through Bethlehem to Hebron, where it split in two: one going through the wilderness by way of Beersheba, and the other going west to the coast and passing through Gaza. The latter is supposed to be the way taken by Philip (Ac 8²⁶), because tradition has it that the eunuch was baptized in the vicinity of Hebron.

These roads played an important part in the diffusion of the gospel. The people who live on the main avenues of traffic are usually of a freer spirit and more open mind than those who dwell in the quiet and cultured towns; and for this reason Jesus got a better hearing in Galilee than in the more polished south. By following the main routes of travel and traffic, St. Paul was led to the chief cities of his day, and found there acceptance for his message, which was carried thence by traders and others into the remote corners of the Empire. The roads were not, even in the days of the Romans, free from danger; witness Lk 10³⁰; but neither brigandage nor violence was common upon them.

R. LEGGAT.

ROBBER (λῃστής, Vulg. latro) is found in AV only in Jn 10¹⁻³ 18⁴⁰ (Barabbas). In RV it stands for the same Greek word also in Mt 21¹³=Mk 11¹⁷=Lk 19⁴⁶ ('den of robbers'); Mt 26⁵⁸=Mk 14⁴⁸=Lk 22⁵² ('Are ye come out as against a robber?'); Mt 27³⁸⁻⁴⁴=Mk 15²⁷ ('two robbers'); Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁸ ('fell among robbers'). In all these places AV has 'thief,' which elsewhere is the equivalent of κλέπτης. The two Greek words differ precisely as the two English; the λῃστής (robber, brigand, highwayman) takes by force, the κλέπτης (thief) by stealth. Judas was a thief (Jn 12⁶), Barabbas a robber (18⁴⁰, cf. Mk 15⁷). But earlier English versions join with AV in ignoring this distinction; 'thief' occurs in them all in the above passages from the Synoptists; in Jn 10¹⁻³ when another word was needed, Tind. and Geneva have 'robber,' but Cranmer 'murderer' (cf. Luther, Morder); in 18⁴⁰ Wyc. and Rhem. have 'thief,' Tind. 'robber,' Cran. and Gen. 'murderer.' But in 16th cent. English, 'thief' was used in a wider sense than now, including all kinds of robbery. Thus Shakespeare calls pirates 'water thieves' (Merchant of Venice, I. 3); Latimer (Sermons, Parker Soc. 208) calls Robin Hood 'a traitor and a thief,' and (139) applying Is 1³ says 'He calleth princes thieves. Had they a standing at Shooter's Hill or Standgate Hole, to take a purse?' So Cranmer (Remains, Parker Soc. 107), 'Job said not "These wicked thieves have wrought me this woe"; but referred all to God.' See Trench. NT Synonyms, §xiiiv.

Palestine has always, if its government has been weak, been infested by robbers, to whom its rocks and caves afford plentiful cover and shelter (cf. Jg 9²⁵, Hos 6⁹ 7¹). Herod, when quite young, first made his reputation by ruthlessly executing robbers in Galilee (Josephus, Ant. XIV. ix. 2, BJ I. x. 5). At a later time he destroyed robbers who lived in inaccessible caverns, by lowering chests full of soldiers from the cliff above (Ant. XIV. xv. 4-5, BJ I. xvi. 2-4). This reminds us of 'den of robbers' (Jer 7¹¹, Mt 21¹³). Not only had the Temple become a haunt of 'robbers'—the dealers in the Temple market were notorious for their extortion—but it gave them fancied security in their evil-doing. During the Jewish War the Temple was literally the stronghold of the robbers or Zealots, BJ iv. iii. 7, etc.). There was a great outbreak of robbery on the death of Herod (Ant. xvii. x., BJ II. iv.). We read later of robbers plundering a servant of the Emperor's, near Bethhoron, which was avenged on the neighbouring villagers by Cumanus (Ant. xx. v. 4, BJ II. xii. 2), and of Fadus, Felix, and Festus destroying large numbers of them (Ant. xx. i. 1, viii. 5, 10, BJ II. xiii. 2, xiv. 1). Under the later procurators the country swarmed with them. It is probable that some of these 'robbers' were really Zealots, in rebellion against the authority of Rome, so that there was an element of misplaced patriotism and even religion in their proceedings. Trench (l.c.) shows how this may throw light on the character of the 'Penitent Robber.' In any case, Josephus at a later date identifies robbers and Zealots (BJ iv. iii. 3. 9, etc.).

The road from Jerusalem to Jericho, the scene of the parable of the Good Samaritan, has always had a bad name for robbers. Near it Pompey destroyed two robbers' strongholds (Strabo, xvi. 2); Jerome (on Jer 3²) speaks of its dangers, and derives the 'ascent of Adummim' on this road from the blood shed there by robbers (Loc. Heb. s.v.). See Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 314, 424, and art. SAMARITAN (THE GOOD). HAROLD SMITH.

ROBE.—See DRESS.

ROCK (πέτρα).—1. In Mt 7²⁴ the word stands for a rocky foundation, which would remain solid, notwithstanding the sumping effect of floods; while the sandy foundation means a carelessly chosen site, where the loose formation of the soil would be very easily penetrated by torrents, thus making the building erected on it very insecure. The moral and spiritual parallel is that of two contrasted lives, one durable, the other perishing and worthless. The man who listens to Christ's words but does not carry them out, never allowing them to affect his character, is one who builds upon the sand. He, again, who hears the word and straightway carries it into action, doing the will of God with his might, has chosen the rocky foundation. To him the storms and trials of life act as tests of character, which show it to be securely founded, and make it more firm and durable. Perhaps faith and obedience are the two prominent characteristics of the man who builds his house upon the rock. See art. BUILDING.

2. At Caesarea Philippi, Christ asked His disciples about the various opinions men were holding regarding Him. St. Peter answered for the Apostles: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' The Saviour was pleased by this answer of faith, which had been revealed to Peter by the Heavenly Father, and commended him by saying (Mt 16¹⁸), 'Thou art Peter (πέτρος), and on this rock (πέτρα) I will build my Church.' St. Peter thus showed himself to be one who had profited by Christ's teaching, being a doer of the word as well as a hearer. Only the faithful and obedient heart could have given him such a deep knowledge of the truth. As Jerusalem stood on the rocky foundation of Mt. Zion, and was faced by the dark rocks of the valley of Hinnom, a scene of death and corruption; so the new city of God, the ἐκκλησία of Christ, is to be founded on imperishable foundations, so that the opposing gates of Hades (all the power of evil) should never prevail against it. St. Peter, in showing himself a man of faith, is a specimen of the believing ones who shall constitute the strong foundation on which the Church is to rest. As πέτρος is a fragment of πέτρα, so the believing St. Peter is an example of all who should hereafter believe (cf. 1 Ti 1¹⁶).

It is well to note that the Fathers took the rock to mean either Christ Himself, or the faith or the confession of St. Peter, but never St. Peter as an individual. In later days, the text Mt 16¹⁸ was used for polemical purposes, in defence of the Papacy. The Reformers returned to the earlier view of the Fathers, mostly holding that the confession of faith made by St. Peter was the rock. Another view held by Luther, following Augustine, was that Christ, in speaking the words, pointed to Himself as the rock. Perhaps this would best accord with the general teaching of the New Testament. St. Paul calls Christ the foundation (1 Co 3¹¹), and again speaks of Apostles and prophets being the foundation, while Christ is the chief corner-stone (Eph 2²⁰). Is it not most likely, however, that our Lord looked on St. Peter as the type of converted, believing men, on whom, as a foundation, an unconquerable Church should be built? Origen well says: 'If thou hast Peter's faith, thou art a rock like him. If thou hast Peter's virtues, thou hast Peter's keys.' See also art. CAESAREA PHILIPPI and CHURCH.

3. The word 'rock' occurs in Lk 8^{6, 13}, in the parable of the Sower. It is the equivalent of the 'stony' (RV 'rocky') places' of Mt 13^{3, 20} (τὰ πετρώδη), and gives at once the right sense, a thin coating of soil covering a hard rocky surface, where there could be no depth of earth. The rock here, in the interpretation, signifies a sinful worldly nature, incapable of being penetrated by the living seed. That which makes a good foundation is not at all fitted to be a good seed-bed. See art. SEED.

4. In Mt 27⁵¹ we read that the rocks (πέτραι) were rent, at the hour of Christ's death on Calvary. There is nothing figurative here; but the earthquake would make it appeal to men's minds as if the very earth shuddered at man's wicked deed, so that its hardest elements were broken asunder.

5. Finally, the sepulchre in which our Lord was laid was 'hewn out of a rock' (Mt 27⁶⁰=Mk 15⁴⁶).
D. M. W. LAIRD.

ROLL (βιβλίον, κεφαλῆς).—The word 'roll' is found in NT only in the RV, and in the Gospels only as a marginal reading. In the account in Luke of our Lord's sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth it occurs thrice in the margin, as the rendering of βιβλίον, where AV and text of RV give 'book.' In He 10⁷ 'In the volume of the book it is written of me' RV gives 'roll' for AV 'volume' as the rendering of κεφαλῆς. The latter word occurs here only in NT, but it is quoted from the Septuagint (Ps 40⁷), and thus its meaning is determined, as it is the translation of the Heb. קִפְּזָה, 'roll,' although in Liddell and Scott κεφαλῆς is given as meaning 'chapter or passage.' Why κεφαλῆς is taken to represent קִפְּזָה is uncertain, although it has been held that the reference was to the knobs or rounded heads of the roller about which the manuscript was rolled (see Grimm-Thayer, Lex. s.v.). The roll was the form of the book both in Palestine and Egypt, although usually, if not always, the Hebrew rolls were, originally at least, of skins which had gone through some process of tanning (see art. BOOK), while the Egyptian rolls were of papyrus. When papyrus began to be used in Palestine it is difficult to say. The codex form of book is generally held to have been introduced after the invention of parchment, but there is reason to believe that the Egyptians occasionally employed it for papyrus manuscripts, while the roll was the prevailing form.

ROME, ROMANS.—Though the name 'Romans' appears only once in the Gospels (Jn 11⁴⁸), if we except the adverb Ῥωμαῖστί (Jn 19²⁰), which is tr. 'in Latin' by AV and RV, Rome and the Romans are a very real presence in the Gospel narratives, forming a sort of background to the action of the leading figures. The influence of the world-power is shown by the references to the Emperor (Mt 22¹⁷, Mk 12¹⁴, Lk 21³¹ 20²² 23², Jn 19¹²), the governor Pontius Pilate (see PILATE), the tax-gatherers (Mt 5⁴⁶ etc.), the centurions (Mk 15³⁹, Lk 7² etc.), and the soldiers (Mt 27²⁷ etc.). The Gospels testify to the ultra-national feeling of those Jews who were antagonistic to the Roman power, and illustrate the hatred and contempt felt for those of their countrymen—the tax-gatherers, for example—who took employment from the government. The more intellectually enlightened among the Jews—the Sadducees, for instance—welcomed the Roman rule as they welcomed the Greek civilization and culture which it brought with it; but the great mass of the people were in a state of unreasoning opposition to it. The disposition of Pilate may be advanced as an excuse for their attitude, but in general it cannot be denied that the Jews did not deserve to retain their former liberty, that they were ungrateful to the Romans for the special privileges conferred on them, and that they forgot the advantages which the powerful protection of Rome and the advancement and security of trade thus accruing brought to them. The student of history will regard the fate which came upon them in A.D. 70, and which is referred to in Lk 21^{20ff.}, as deserved. The stiffneckedness of the Jews brought upon them a ruin which other subject-races in the Empire had escaped by a wise submission.

The beginnings of Rome are shrouded in obscurity, but the spade has helped to correct and amplify what we learn from history. The city was situated on the left bank of the Tiber, about eighteen miles from its mouth. The original Rome was built only on the Palatine Hill. When the people of Romulus were united with the Sabines, the Capitoline Hill, the Forum, and perhaps part of the Quirinal, were added. Mons Caelius was occupied by Etruscan colonists from the other side of the river, and conquest led to the later inclusion of the Aventine, the Viminal, the Esquiline, and Quirinal Hills, on which early settlements had existed. Tradition has it that one of the kings, named Servius Tullius, built a wall to enclose the now largely extended city. This wall, called the agger, because it was built agger for purposes of defence, remained the agger till, late in the Empire, in the time of Aurelian (3rd cent. A.D.), a new and extended line of fortifications was built. Outside the Servian wall there was a trench 100 ft. broad and 30 ft. deep. Within this the wall proper was built of large rectangular blocks, and behind this wall there was an embankment 100 ft. wide and 30 ft. high, pierced by the channels of aqueducts. Portions of the wall have been discovered in thirty-seven different places, and it is possible to trace its entire course. Advantage was taken by the engineers of all the natural features, and where these were lacking, as on the north-west, the above plan was followed. Between the Capitoline and the Aventine the river was thought to afford sufficient protection. The whole circuit of the wall was about 5 miles, and it was pierced by 19 gates. Within there was a large area of vacant spaces, which were probably built on later, and at the beginning of the Empire the city was not only not not buildings, but large areas without the wall were also covered with houses. In the year B.C. 10, Augustus divided the city into 14 wards (regiones), and these were in their turn subdivided into smaller quarters (vici). Some of the principal buildings must be referred to. The Roman Forum, an open space measuring over 300 ft. in length and about 150 ft. in breadth, was the centre of political, legal, and commercial life. At one end was the rostra or platform from which speeches were delivered to the public; at the other end were shops. On one side were the Curia or senate-house and the Basilica Aemilia, a law-court; along the whole of the other side, with the Sacra Via between, stretched the Basilica Julia, a very large law-court, surrounded by two rows of square columns. Other important buildings in the immediate neighbourhood were the Temple of Janus, the Temple of Caesar, the Arch of Augustus, the Temple of Vesta, the Temple of Castor and Pollux, and the Temple of Saturn, where was the treasury, with the Tabularium (record-office) behind. On the top of the Capitoline Hill was the Capitolium or great temple dedicated to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, and on the Palatine Hill the principal residence of the Emperor, and the Temple of Apollo containing the public libraries, Greek and Latin. In the Imperial period four additional fora were built, devoted entirely to legal, literary, and religious purposes—the Forum Julium begun by Julius Caesar, the Forum Augustum built by Augustus, the Forum Transitorium completed by Nerva, and the Forum Trajanum built by Trajan, the most splendid work of Imperial times. Considerations of space will not allow mention of the markets, circuses, theatres, baths, and gardens, which were characteristic features of the city and its life. The great roads which . . . Rome, and the aqueducts, can merely . . . Various estimates of the population of Rome in the time of Christ have been given, ranging from 800,000 to 2,000,000: the latter seems more likely than the former. All nationalities in the Empire were represented, and the slave population was very large.

Only a very brief sketch of the progress of the Romans can be given. Their history is curiously parallel to our own. They were a mixed race, and passed through the three stages, pastoral and agricultural, commercial, and imperial. The kernel of the race was Latin, but there was an early intermixture with Sabines and Etruscans, the latter, according to tradition, emigrants from Lydia, in Asia Minor. The Romans began as one of the members of the Latin league of which, having become presidents, they eventually became masters. After conquering Latium, they were inevitably brought into conflict with the other races of Italy. They rose again after the Gallic invasion and destruction of their city in 390, and by the time their trade interests brought them into conflict with the Carthaginians, about the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C., they were sovereign over most of Italy. The close of that century saw them possessors of Sicily and Sardinia, as well as conquerors over 'Africa.' About this time they began to interfere in Eastern politics, and the Macedonian wars and the conflicts which grew out of them resulted in the conquest of Macedonia and Greece in the same year as they finally became masters of 'Africa.' Ere this they had become possessed of most of Spain. The extension of Roman territory steadily continued, until in the time of Christ it included, roughly, Europe (except the British Isles, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, and Russia), the whole of Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and the north-west of Africa.

The internal history of the Roman people was no less remarkable. Great dangers from within were successfully repelled. The conflict between the patricians and the dependent class lasted for hundreds of years. At first the Roman State was ruled by a king, with a body of patrician advisers. On the substitution of a diarchy for a monarchy, a change effected not without difficulty, a new office, called the consulship, tenable for one year, was open only to the patrician class. Even from the earliest times there appears to have been a popular assembly, which played some part in legislation, but to define its powers or to state their exact relation to the powers of the king and senate is impossible. The consuls were elected by the citizen-army, which assembled in classes according to the property qualification of each citizen-soldier. The whole procedure of this assembly was in the hands of its patrician presidents, so that there was more of the semblance than the reality of power. Further, the plebeian had no appeal against the arbitrary authority of a chief magistrate. At the very beginning of the Republic the famous Valerian law was passed, that no magistrate should put a Roman citizen to death unless the sentence had been confirmed by the assembly of citizen-soldiers. This law was always regarded as the great charter of a Roman's liberties, but at first it was difficult to enforce. The plebeians adopted on more than one occasion the plan of deserting the city for a time, and thus wrung concessions from the unwilling patricians. It was in this way that they succeeded in obtaining magistrates of their own, called tribunes, who were authorized to protect them against the consuls. The development of the powers of this magistracy had more to do with the progress of the Roman democracy than any other factor, and even in the Empire the most important of the Emperor's statutory powers was his 'tribunician authority.' The tribunes convened assemblies of the plebeians, and carried resolutions of importance to that class. The resolutions of this body, which met by tribes, were later on to become the most powerful force in the State, having at a comparatively early period been declared to have the force of laws (B.C. 287). The first plebeian consul was elected in 367, about a century and a half after the traditional date of the establishment of the Republic, and by the end of the fourth century B.C. every office in the State was open to the plebeian class. The plebeians had won all they sought.

The establishment of the equality of the orders was not the establishment of a real democracy. It was the beginning of a new struggle between the governing class, which was mainly plebeian in origin, and the mass of the people. The rapid expansion of the Roman territory, the necessity for the appointment of new men to govern the new countries, and the . . . governing class alone possessed of the experience necessary for coping with foreign affairs, tended more and more to withdraw the real power from the popular assemblies and to concentrate it in the hands of the senate. By the theory of the constitution the popular assemblies had all the power, but in practice, between the middle of the 3rd and the beginning of the 1st cent. B.C., the senate was all-powerful. Circumstances also produced great distress among the people in general. In the absence of the farmer, serving in the army abroad, his farm was neglected, and trouble came upon him and his household. He had to borrow money, which in many cases he was unable to repay. His acres were bought by the rich, who worked them with slave labour, which was cheap owing to the enormous influx of captives seized in war. The small landholder disappeared, to join the hungry proletariat in Rome; and Italy became a country of large estates, which, in the words of Pliny, wrought her ruin. The attempts made by the Gracchi (B.C. 133-122) to redress this state of matters were rewarded with assassination. Periodically, to the end of the Republic, agrarian laws were brought forward, but were unable to check the evil. Even under the Empire it was only partially checked, and a large part of the Roman population was fed by the Emperors.

A Roman 'province' consisted of the sphere of duty of a magistrate, and the word had not primarily a territorial application. The inhabitants were disarmed and taxed. The main lines under which a province was to be governed were set forth in a special law, generally drawn up by the senate. This law always took account of local conditions, such as the form of government already in existence before annexation, and the favour shown to Rome by particular cities. In some provinces certain States were free, such as Athens in the province of Achaia. It was the custom to send a body of commissioners to start the new constitution on its way. Some of these constitutions were modified as time went on, but others which had been established in Republican times were found still existing in Imperial times. Much was left to governors in the time of the Republic. Cruelty and rapacity were very common, but incompetence was unknown. The provincials could hardly get redress for injuries inflicted on them in Republican times. All the eloquence of a Cicero, engaged to plead the cause of the province of Sicily, availed only to remove Verres, the cause of the evil; the evil was not healed.

During the last century of the Republic, Rome and Italy were torn by a long succession of ruinous civil wars. It said much for the machinery of the government that foreign enemies did not imperil its very existence. There was a longing among all the better citizens for an era of peace and prosperity, and it had become increasingly clear that this goal could be reached only under an Imperial rule. The need of the time was satisfied by Augustus, who ruled as autocrat under constitutional form. The appearance of a republic was retained, but the reality was gone, and the appearance itself gradually disappeared also. For the city the Empire was a time of luxury and idleness, but the provinces entered upon an era of progressive prosperity. The Emperor was responsible for the government of all provinces where an army was necessary, and governed these by paid deputies of his own. The older and more settled provinces were governed by officials appointed by the senate, but the Emperor had his financial interests looked after by procurators of his own even in these. The provinces were now much more protected against the rapacity and cruelty of governors. The Emperor stood for just as well as efficient administration, and most of them gave a noble example by strenuous devotion to administrative business.

The resident Romans in any province consisted of (1) the officials connected with the government, who were generally changed annually; (2) members of the great financial companies, and lesser business men, whose interests kept them there,—the publicans of the Gospels were agents of the former; (3) citizens of coloniae (or military settlements), which were really parts of Rome itself set down in the provinces; (4) soldiers of the garrison and their officers. These formed the aristocracy of any city in which they lived. A fifth class of Roman citizens might be made out of those natives of the province who, for services rendered to the State, were individually gifted with the citizenship. It was a great honour, which was not conferred on all the inhabitants of the Empire till A.D. 212.

The Romans have left a great legacy to the world. Architecture, engineering, and the arts have been surpassed. In literature they depended mainly on the Greeks, but they claimed that satire was a native product. So with sculpture, music, painting, and medicine. In the arts they never attained more than a respectable standard, by imitating the Greeks, who could turn their hands to anything.

LITERATURE.—For an account of Rome itself, nothing surpasses the various works of R. M. Macmillan: Ancient Rome (1891), The Pagan and Christian Rome, The Ruins and Excavations of Ancient Rome, The Destruction of Ancient Rome, and New Tales of Old Rome. See also his chapters in W. Ramsay, A Manual of Roman Antiquities (London, 1894); three excellent Maps, with Key, are in H. Kiepert and Ch. Huelsen, Formae Urbis Romae Antiquae: accedit nomenclator topographicus (Berlin, 1896). For the Forum, see Ch. Huelsen, The Roman Forum: its History and its Monuments (Rome, 1906). For the general history, Th. Mommsen, The History of Rome, 5 vols. (London, Macmillan) [the Republic], The History of the Roman Provinces, 2 vols. [one aspect of Imperial history]; H. F. Pelham, Outlines of Roman History (London, 1893, 4th edition, 1905), a masterly work; J. B. Bury, A History of the Roman Empire from its Foundation to the Death of Marcus Aurelius (London, 1893, 1896, and later). On the imperial life, A. H. J. Greenidge, Roman Public Life (London, 1901). On the literature, W. S. Teuffel, History of Roman Literature, 2 vols. (London, 1891-92); and esp. M. Schanz, Geschichte der Römischen Literatur, four parts (second half of part 4 to complete the work, as yet unpublished), (München; first three parts in second edition: publication began 1892). The above list constitutes only a small selection of the very best works on what appear to be the more important topics.

ROOT (ρίζα).—The 'root' is that part essential to the life of a plant (Mt 13^a, Mk 4^b), which penetrates the earth, and draws sap and nourishment from the soil. 'Root' is, therefore, taken to signify that condition of heart without which religious life is impossible (Mt 13^a, Lk 8¹³). The intelligent and stable Christian is described as 'rooted' in love (Eph 3¹⁷), and 'rooted' in Christ (Col 2⁷). Utter destruction is signified by plucking up by the root (Mt 13²⁹, Jude 12). The Baptist's vivid 'the axe is laid unto the root' (Mt 3¹⁰, Lk 3⁹) points to the complete overthrow he desired for the rampant growth of evils in his day. As applied to Christ (Rev 5⁵ 22¹⁶), the title 'Root' probably means more than 'branch or sucker from an ancient root.' Rather does it point to Him as Himself the 'root' whence David and his tribe sprang, appearing at last to manifest His transcendent power and glory.

RUE (πήγανον, Ruta graveolens) is a low-growing shrubby plant of the natural order Rutaceae, and is still cultivated in Palestine. It has a strong, unpleasant smell, and is bitter and pungent to the taste. The ancient Romans made use of the leaves of rue for culinary purposes. An essential oil, which is obtained by distillation with water, is used in medicine, chiefly as an antispasmodic. In Lk 11⁴², where the only Biblical allusion to rue occurs, it is named along with mint (wh. see) as one of the common garden herbs on which the Pharisees paid tithe.

RUFUS.—See ALEXANDER AND RUFUS.

RULE.—1. (a) ἀρχή.—Lk 20²⁰ παραδόναι αὐτὸν τῇ ἀρχῇ καὶ τῇ ἐξουσίᾳ τοῦ ἡγεμόνος, 'to deliver him up to the rule and to the authority of the governor' (RV) — ἀρχή = principatus, ἐξουσία = magistratus or munus (Stephanus, Thesaurus, ed. Hase-Dindorf). Here ἀρχή 'relates to Pilate's position and authority [as procurator], ἐξουσία to the executive power connected therewith' (Cremer, Lex. 115, 237). Pilate's rendering our Lord to 'Herod's jurisdiction' (Lk 23⁶) was intended as an act of civility to a reigning prince ('Jesus of Nazareth' being under Herod's tetrarchate), and perhaps also in order to gain time.

ἀρχή and ἐξουσία are also used together of earthly rulers, Lk 12¹¹, Tit 3¹; of the ranks of the angelic hosts, Eph 1¹, Col 1¹⁶ 210; of the powers of evil, Eph 6¹², Col 2¹⁵; apparently incl. of both heavenly and earthly powers, 1 Co 15²⁴, Eph 1²¹.

(b) ἄρχειν.—Mk 10⁴² 'Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles (οἱ δοκούντες ἄρχειν: in || Mt 20²⁶ οἱ ἄρχοντες) lord it over them, and their great ones exercise authority over them' (RV). Lk. reports that words of similar import were spoken at the parting meal, 22²⁶. οἱ δοκούντες ἄρχειν may mean 'they who are supposed to rule,' with the implication that they are not rulers in the true sense of the word.*

Swete (St. Mark, 239) renders 'they who are regarded as rulers,' and says that our Lord 'did not admit that the power of such a ruler as Tiberius was a substantial dignity: it rested on a pretence, and might be suddenly wrecked, as indeed the pretence of an emperor's power proved.' Cf. Harnack (What is Christianity?, 116) and Gould (Com. on Mk. 202) for a somewhat similar view.

In Gal 22.6.9 οἱ δοκούντες, 'the so-called leaders' (Com. on Gal. 107), is 'depreciatory,—not indeed of the Twelve themselves, but of the extravagant and exclusive claims set up for them by the Judaizers.' The Gr. commentators, however, do not find 'any shade of blame or irony in the expression' (see Elliott, Gal. 24b). Cf. also Ramsay (Com. on Gal. 289, 300), who renders, 'the acknowledged leaders,' and shows that the interpretation, 'the so-called leaders,' is opposed to the spirit of the narrative.

The two passages referred to by Winer (Gramm. 178 p. 710) are important: Sus 5 καὶ οἱ ἐξουσίαν καὶ δόξαν τοῦ λαοῦ, 'judges who were accounted or recognized as governing the people'; Jos. Ant. XIX. vi. 3 οἱ δοκούντες αὐτῶν ἄρχειν, 'they who are recognized as outstanding men among them.' In these passages the phrase appears to be used, without any disparagement being implied, in speaking of recognized authorities, or persons of admitted eminence.*

* There are parallels to this idea in Plato: e.g. Rep. 336 A, the tyrant is one who μέγα εἶναι δύνασθαι: he and his like have really no power (Gorg. 467 A). For the use of δοκούντες, cf. Rep. 406 C, ἐπὶ δὲ τὸν πλεονέκτην καὶ εὐδαίμονα δοκούντων εἶναι οὐκ αἰσθανόμενα, also 420 A, 423 C. Sometimes, however, in classical Greek δοκῆν does not exclude the reality: e.g. Plato, Rep. 539 A, and Soph. OT 402. [Note by the late Dr. Adam of Cambridge].

In the words κατακυριεύουσιν and κατεξουσιάζουσιν,—the latter found only here and in Mt.—an unfavourable judgment is passed upon the manner in which 'the recognized rulers' exercise their authority. 'Civium non servitus sed tutela tradita est.' 'Our Lord spoke at a time when free government all over the world lay crushed beneath the military despotism of Rome' (EBR xi. 11). There was present to His mind the fundamental law of His Kingdom, 'My kingdom is not of this world' (Jn 18³⁶).

But our Lord's words do not exhibit that 'moral hatred of all the visible power of the world regarded as a vast selfish manifestation and embodiment of evil,' which finds expression in the following passage from one of the letters of Gregory VII. (he is writing to Herman of Metz, one of his partisans): 'Who can be ignorant that kings and nobles took their beginning from those who, not knowing God, by their pride, robberies, perfidy, and murders, in short, by almost every kind of crime, no doubt at the suggestion of the prince of this world, the devil, have in blind ambition and intolerable presumption had a mind to tyrannize over other men who are undoubtedly their equals?' Milmar asks, 'Are we reading a journalist of Paris in 1791?' (Latin Christianity, iii. 191; cf. Mozley's Sermon on 'The Roman Court', ibid., serm. p. 1).

Our Lord, it is true, speaks of the exercise of domination and coercion that is characteristic of the rulers of the Gentiles as an example to be avoided by His disciples as members of a Kingdom not of this world: 'so shall it not be among you.' With them, greatness is to come through ministering love (cf. art. MINISTERS, 3). At the same time, in His great saying, Mk 12¹⁷—a saying which reveals that the whole domain of duty lay open before Him,—our Lord teaches that a kingdom of this world, even the principality of a Titius, has its own sphere of right and duty, and that it keeps within it, and exercises its administrative functions,—of which the levying of tribute is a representative instance,—it is to be obeyed without demur. This saying was probably present to the mind of St. Paul when he wrote, under Nero (but in the earlier and better part of his reign), his weighty exposition of the ethics of citizenship (Ro 13¹⁻⁷).

2. ποιμαίνειν.—Mt 2⁶ 'And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule (RV 'be shepherd of') my people Israel' (ὅστις ποιμαίνει τὸν λαόν μου τὸν Ἰσραήλ). Here three things demand our attention. (i.) Mic 5² (Heb.) and its context.—Like his older contemporary Isaiah (9. 11), Micah looks forward to the end of the Assyrian invasion as the time when the Messianic hope shall be fulfilled.

'The daughter of Zion must pass through the pangs of labour before her true king is born; she must come forth from the city and dwell in the open field; there, and not within her proud ramparts, Jehovah will grant her deliverance from her enemies. For a time the land shall be given up to the foe, but only for a time. Once more, as in the days of David, guerilla bands gather together to avenge the wrongs of their nation (51). A new David comes forth from little Bethlehem, and the rest of his brethren return to the children of Israel—that is, the kindred Hebrew nations again accept the sway of the new king, who stands and feeds his flock in the strength of Jehovah, in the majesty of the name of Jehovah his God. Then Assyria shall no longer insult Jehovah's land with impunity' (W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel, 291).

This being the meaning of the prophecy, it is evident that it was never literally fulfilled. But when we look at the deeper side of the Messianic hope which it sets forth—the heart-felt longing for a true Kingdom of God,—the perception that that Kingdom can never be realized without a personal centre, a representative of God with man and man with God,' who shall attain to true greatness through humility—we see that the purpose which was in the mind of God, when He moved the prophet to write, was fulfilled in the highest sense when He sent His Son into the world, and when Jesus Christ entered, by being born and that in a low condition, on that life of humiliation that led to His exaltation to the place of power, and will finally lead to 'all things being put under His feet.'

(ii.) The quotation in Mt.—It is not in verbal agreement with the LXX or with the Heb. text. The most important differences from the latter are the following:—

(α) Instead of לְיָסֵד לְיָסֵד, lit. 'little for being' ('a town too small to be reckoned as a canton in Judah,' W. R. Smith, loc. cit.), Mt. has οὐδ' αὖτως ἰσχυροτέρα δ', 'art in no wise least' (RV). Turpie (OT in the New, 190) translates the Heb. 'And art thou, Bethlehem, little for being (=so little as not to be) among the thousands of Juda'—following Grotius '... who received the suggestion from Pesh., ...', who rendered interrogatively. Others conjecture that a ל has dropped out of the Heb. text (cf. W. R. Smith, loc. cit. [1901] 253; Com. on Mt. p. 13). These ... are unnecessary. Micah says that the ideal king is to come out of Bethlehem, a town held in little estimation; and Mt., in view of the dignity bestowed on the town by the birth of Christ, says, 'Thou art by no means the least.' They agree in spirit.

(β) The words of Micah, 'he that is to be ruler in Israel,' are expanded by Mt. into 'ruler who shall be shepherd of my people Israel.' He thus introduces into his quotation the words of the promise to David, 'And thou shalt be shepherd of ... my people Israel' (2 S 5² || 1 Ch 11²). But in Micah's words, 'And he shall stand and be shepherd of' (וְהָיָה), are a reminiscence of the promise to David. The Evangelist simply gives the promise at full length.

To most Biblical scholars these differences will not seem of much account. The quotations in the NT are an important subject of study, but it is not now considered necessary, in the interests of revelation, to make out a verbal correspondence between these quotations and their OT equivalents. See art. QUOTATIONS.

(iii.) The nature of Christ's rule as set forth by ποιμαίνειν.—ποιμαίνειν is first applied to God by Jacob, Gn 48¹⁵ ('who shepherded me'), 49²⁴ (prob. 'the shepherd of the stone of Israel,' and = 'the God of Bethel' [Driver, Gen. Addenda xvii]). His people are 'the sheep of his pasture' (Ps 95⁷ 100³); He led them and fed them in the wilderness as a shepherd (Ps 77²⁰ 78⁸² 80¹, Hos 13⁵ [LXX] ἐποποιμαίνον σε ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, Is 63¹¹, Jer 2² 'thou wentest after me'—the shepherd leading); He will bring them back from the Dispersion (Ezk 34¹³, cf. Ps 147²); His care for His flock comprehends the most considerate tending of individuals (Ps 23¹⁻²⁴, Is 40¹¹, Ps 119¹⁷⁶ seeking the lost sheep). To David, as His vicergerent, He commits the care of His flock (2 S 5², Ps 78⁷¹), and He will yet set up one shepherd over them, who shall be pre-eminent in those qualities which David in a large measure manifested as a ruler (Mic 5⁴, Ezk 34²³ 37²⁴, Ps 2⁹ [LXX, following Pesh., ποιμανεῖς αὐτοὺς ἐν ῥάβδῳ αἰσθητῇ, so quoted Rev 2²⁷ 12⁵ 19¹⁵; cf. Briggs, Com. on Psalms, i. 22]). To Mt. this shepherd is Jesus Christ, and it is fitting that in this early chapter he should employ this title respecting Him whose life on earth, as set forth in the succeeding chapters of his Gospel, was to illustrate so abundantly His shepherd-rule in its tenderness and strength. Christ is the compassionate Shepherd (Mt 9³⁶ 15²⁴); His flock fear no evil, because He is with them (Lk 12³²); He goes after that which is lost till He finds it (Mt 12¹, Lk 15⁴⁻⁶); He is the noble (καλός) Shepherd, who gives His life for His sheep (Jn 10^{2-11.16}), who provides for their being fed and tended after His departure to heaven (Jn 21¹⁵⁻¹⁷; cf. Ac 20²⁸, Eph 4¹¹, 1 P 5²), and who still carries on in glory His own work as 'the great shepherd of the sheep' (He 13²⁰) and the ἀρχιποίμην (1 P 5⁴—a title combining the two words of our present study);—

moreover, their being under His shepherd-rule will be the blessedness and joy of His people to all eternity (Rev 7¹⁷).

It is well known that ποιμάνειν is a favourite figure with Greek writers to denote the kingly office. Plato is very fond of the comparison; see Rep. 343 A with the note in Adam's ed. (Camb. 1902). In a passage in the Nicom. Ethics (viii. 11), Aristotle refers to Homer's well-known words, ὃν γὰρ τοῖς τοῦ βασιλευμένους, εἴτερ ἀγαθὸς ἢν ἐπιβλέπεται αὐτῶν, ἢ ὃ πρῶτον, ὡς πρὸς τοὺς ποσειδάων' ἔστιν καὶ Ὀμήρου τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἐπιβλέπειν, λαὸν εἶπεν. 'It seems to me desirable,' Dr. Adam observes, 'whenever possible, to quote classical Greek parallels to the figures of the NT, as well as parallels from the Hebrew; the use of figures already familiar to the Greeks cannot but have made the NT writings more acceptable to Greek readers.'

JAMES DONALD.

RULER.—This word is used in AV of the Gospels to tr. six different Greek words, and it is therefore necessary to classify the instances according to the word represented. (1) In Mk 13⁹ and Lk 21³² ἡγεμών (RV '...') for which see art. GOVERNOR. (2) In Mt 23²¹ (33), Lk 12⁴² (44) κύριος, which means an owner of property, 'lord' or 'owner' of slaves. It is hardly too much to say that κύριος suggests the word δούλος, 'slave.' The one word is correlative to the other. A κύριος is one who possesses slaves; a δούλος is one who belongs to and is bound to serve an owner. St. Paul, for example, regarded himself as standing in that relation to Jesus Christ. (3) In one passage (AVm), βασιλικός, a general term, 'royal,' found, to indicate any one in the service of a royal person. In this passage a man in the service of Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, is doubtless meant. The word appears to be used only of those in the service of Eastern potentates, and never in connexion with the Roman Emperor. (4) In Jn 2⁹ the expression 'ruler of the feast' occurs. This is a tr. of the compound word ἀρχιτεράκιλος, lit. 'ruler of the dining-room' (with three dining-couches). His position at a dinner or banquet corresponded very much to that of a head-waiter at a modern public dinner. He had to see to the arrangement of the dining-couches, the laying of the table, the supply of food and drink; in short, to supervise everything connected with the comfort of the guests and the success of the banquet. (5) In the great bulk of the instances the word 'ruler' represents ἀρχων, a more or less vague term which generally answers to the legal archon, 'magistrate.' In the following passages it indicates a member or officer of the Sanhedrin (wh. see): Lk 23¹³, 24²⁰, Jn 3¹. In Mt 9¹⁸⁻²³, if we compare the parallel narratives (Mk 5²², Lk 8⁴¹), it would appear to mean 'ruler of the synagogue,' as in Jn 12⁴³, the context of which seems to settle the question. We are probably to understand this implication also in Lk 18¹⁸, Jn 7²⁶, 48. (6) The title 'ruler of the synagogue' (ἀρχισυνάγωγος) is explicitly used in Mk 5³⁴, 36, 38, Lk 8⁴¹, 49, 13¹⁴ (in all the passages except the last it is Jairus that is referred to). The name was applied in Palestine to the chief official of the synagogue as a place of worship. He had, for example, to maintain order in the building, and had to select those who were to take part in the service. Outside Palestine the title was frequently honorary, and carried no duties with it.

RUST (βρώσις [fr. βιβρώσκω, Lat. voro, 'to eat.'], Properly the act of eating, and so 'corrosion'], Mt 6¹⁹; also used for 'food,' Jn 4²² 6²⁷, 55).—The corroding influence liable to tarnish treasures or precious metals, which in Eastern countries were often stored in the ground (Mt 13⁴⁴) or on inhabited premises (Lk 15⁸).

SABBATH (Heb. שַׁבָּת, Gr. σάββατον).—1. Sabbath observance in the time of Christ.—Although the Mishna dates from c. 200 A.D., many of the provisions there recorded were current at a much earlier time; hence we may often use it to illustrate Jewish life in the time of Christ. Two of its treatises, Shabbath and Erubin, besides portions of others, deal with the observance of the Sabbath. Shabbath is concerned with regulations respecting what is lawful or unlawful on that day, and Erubin treats of modifications of the laws concerning travelling or moving anything from one place to another on the Sabbath.

In accordance with the Jewish custom (derived from the recurring expression 'the evening and the morning were the . . . day' in Gn 1, see Erubin, v. 5), the Sabbath was considered to begin at sunset on the Friday and to end at sunset on the Saturday. The day preceding the Sabbath (or other feast) was called the day of the Preparation, παρασκευή (Lk 23⁵⁴, Jn 19³¹, 42), on which all work must be finished, and nothing fresh attempted, unless there was time enough to complete it before sunset. For instance, a tailor must not go out carrying his needle near dusk on the Friday, lest through forgetfulness he should carry it on the Sabbath (Shabbath, i. 3); and meat, onions, or eggs must not be fried unless they can be quite done before the sunset at which the Sabbath begins (ib. i. 10). This explains the request of the Jews to Pilate that the bodies of Jesus and the two robbers should be taken down (Jn 19³¹), in accordance with Dt 21²². It was the custom of the Jews to take down the bodies of those who were condemned and crucified, and to bury them before the going down of the sun (Jos. BJ iv. v. 2). It also explains the haste in the entombment of the Saviour. He did not die until the ninth hour, i.e. 3 p.m. (Mt 27⁴⁵⁻⁵⁰), and Joseph of Arimathea and his friends had to finish the temporary burial and to return home before sundown when the Sabbath began, leaving the completion of the embalming until the Sabbath was past (Lk 23⁵⁶). They could prepare the spices after sunset on the Saturday, and be ready to go to the tomb very early on the following morning (Lk 24¹).

Just before sunset the Sabbath lamp was lighted: to neglect this was a transgression (Shabbath, 2). As no fire was allowed to be kindled, all meals had to be prepared before the Sabbath began. Three meals were customary (ib. xvi. 2), one on the Sabbath eve (Friday after sunset); another on the following morning, called ἄριστον (as Lk 11³⁸, see Edersheim, LT, ii. 205; but in later times the word was applied to 'dinner,' see Grimm-Thayer's Lex.); the third meal was towards evening, called δείπνον (Jn 12²). To preserve the festive character of the day, the provisions were the best obtainable, and the best clothes were worn. Religious exercises were provided by the synagogue services, which were generally two in number, one on the Sabbath eve (Friday night) and the other on the following morning.

The traditional rules of the Mishna, which at least partially existed in the time of Christ, introduced very embarrassing limitations to actions lawful on the Sabbath. The distance which might be travelled was limited to 2000 cubits. This rule was obtained as follows. According to Ex 16²⁹, no man may go out of his place on the Sabbath. The extent of a 'place' was fixed by the Rabbis at the traditional distance of the Tabernacle from the camp of Israel in the wilderness. This was somewhat arbitrarily set down as the same distance as that by which the Ark of the Covenant preceded the people at the crossing of the Jordan (Jos 3⁴). In this way arose the measurement called a 'Sabbath day's journey' (Ac 1¹², see Lumby, ad loc.). This limitation to the distance which might be travelled seems also to illustrate the words of Jesus in Mt 24²⁰ 'neither on the Sabbath day.' (For the way in which this traditional rule might be evaded, see Erubin, iv. and v.). The Mishna names thirty-nine aboth (אבות) or principal kinds of work unlawful on the Sabbath, and from these it deduces a number of others (called toledoth, תולדות), which it pronounces likewise unlawful; and it proceeds by casuistry to define what actions are permissible (see Shabbath; also Edersheim, LT, Append. xvii.). It must here suffice to refer to these rules only in so far as they illustrate passages in the Gospels.

2. Gospel incidents connected with the Sabbath.

—(a) Preaching in the Synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4¹⁶⁻³⁰ || Mk 6¹⁻⁶).—Some regard these passages as referring to two distinct incidents, of which that recorded by Lk. is the earlier (so Edersheim); others think the incident in Mk. is the same as the former, but related out of its chronological order.

(b) Healing of the infirm man at the Pool of Bethesda (Jn 5¹⁻¹⁸).—It was lawful to carry a sick person on a bed, because the bed was only accessory to the carrying of the person (Shabbath, x. 5), but to carry the bed alone was unlawful, as it was then an ordinary burden. Thus those who carried the man to the Pool of Bethesda escaped censure. Although it is difficult to see how they could do this according to the Mishna, unless the man were in danger of death [see Yoma, viii. 6], but this may be a more stringent rule than was then in force; but when the healed man carried his bed, he was decidedly breaking the Law as interpreted by the Rabbis. Indeed, the healing of the man, unless he were in danger of death, would appear to be regarded as an infraction of the Sabbath law (Mk 3¹⁻⁶). Food or outward applications to the body might be used on the Sabbath only if they were in customary use in health; thus a man who had toothache might not rinse his teeth with vinegar (for that was not a common act in health), but he might wash them as he did every day (Shabbath, xiv. 4). If, however, there were danger of death, the Sabbath law did not apply.

(d) Healing of Peter's wife's mother (Mt 8¹⁴⁻¹⁵ || Mk 1²⁹⁻³², Lk 4³⁸⁻⁴⁰).—The healing of those with divers diseases on the evening of this day took place when the sun set and the Sabbath was past.

(e) Plucking the ears of corn (Mt 12¹⁻⁸ || Mk 2²³⁻²⁸, Lk 6¹⁻⁵).—The action of the disciples was legitimate on week-days, according to Dt 23²⁵; but on the Sabbath it was held unlawful, as involving the two actions of reaping and of threshing. The illustration given by our Lord in His reply (Mt 12⁹)—the Temple service in its relation to the Sabbath—was a difficulty which the Talmud discusses (see Edersheim, LT, ii. 59). In this case the Law ordained service which apparently broke its own requirements.

Lk. specifies this Sabbath as δευτέρου (AY 'second Sabbath after the first'; RV omits in text, 'second-first' being placed in the margin as the reading of 'many ancient authorities'). The expression has been variously explained, and no aid is to be derived from the Talmud. The fifty days between Passover and Pentecost were reckoned from the second day of the feast (Nisan 16), on which the wave-sheaf was offered (Lv 23¹¹). Hence the Sabbath indicated has been taken as (i.) the first Sabbath after that second day of the feast (Scaliger, Ewald, de Wette, Edersheim, and others); or (ii.) the second Sabbath after the day (Nisan 16) which was the first in counting the time to Pentecost (Deltzsch). Other explanations are (iii.) the first Sabbath of the second year of the Sabbatical series of seven years (Wieseler); and (iv.) the first Sabbath of the second month. The reading of the text is doubtful; δευτέρου is omitted in NBL, 1, 33, 69 (see Plummer, 'St. Luke' (ICC), ad loc.; and Edersheim, LT).

(f) Healing of the man with a withered hand (Mt 12⁹⁻¹⁴ || Mk 3¹⁻⁵, Lk 6⁶⁻¹¹).—On the lawfulness of healing on the Sabbath according to the Mishna, see (b) above. The legitimacy of lifting a sheep out of a pit on the Sabbath is discussed in the Talmud (Shabbath, 117a; see Edersheim).

(g) The defence which Jesus made against the charge of Sabbath-breaking (Jn 7²³⁻²⁴).—The Mishna (Shabbath, 19) expressly permits all ceremonies relating to circumcision and all preparation for it to be carried out on the Sabbath.

(h) Opening of the eyes of one born blind (Jn 9¹⁻¹⁶).—This involved the 'making of clay' on the Sabbath for application to the man's eyes, which would be a breach of the Sabbath law, in addition to the general question of the legitimacy of healing discussed in (b) above.

(i) Healing of the woman who had a spirit of infirmity (Lk 13¹⁰⁻¹⁷).—Regulations for the watering of cattle on the Sabbath are found in the Mishna (Erubin, ii.). The Talmud even allows water to be drawn and poured into the trough for the animals to drink.

(k) Healing of the man who had the dropsy (Lk 14¹⁻⁶).

(l) The supper at Bethany (Jn 12¹).—Jesus reached Bethany on Friday, and the supper was the festive meal (δαιμον) on the following Sabbath.

(m) The Sabbath between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection (Mt 28¹ || Mk 16¹, Lk 23⁵⁵⁻⁵⁶).

3. Teaching of Jesus respecting the Sabbath.—The observance of the Sabbath was one of the most easily apparent points upon which the teaching of our Lord differed from the punctilious legalism of His time. Mistaken patriotism had employed itself in elaborating the provisions of the Law and raising a fence around it (Aboth, i. 1). The teaching of Jesus was more akin to that of the ancient prophets than to that of the scribes. He preferred spiritual obedience to ceremonial literalism. The traditions of the scribes, which added burdens to the original Law, were regarded by Him as obscuring the underlying truth, and thus hindering true godliness (Mt 15¹⁻⁹, 23¹³⁻²³). This is illustrated in His treatment of the Sabbath.

(1) The practice of Jesus upholds the general use of the institution.—It was 'his custom' to worship in the synagogue (Lk 4¹⁶). He observed the usual requirements of the Law, except in cases where casuistical refinements had brought it into opposition to spiritual service. He seems to have intended this to be the attitude of His Jewish disciples (Mt 24²⁰ possibly supports this), and they certainly understood that this was His will, and they only dropped Jewish ceremonies as the Church outgrew them. The decision recorded in Ac 15²⁴⁻²⁹ did not release Jews who became Christians from obedience to the Law. St. Paul himself kept the Law (Ac 21²⁴⁻²⁶).

(2) Christ asserted that the well-being of man was more important than the rigid observance of the Sabbath law as interpreted by the scribes.—This appears in the many instances of miracles of healing on the Sabbath, and the arguments with which He met criticism. He taught that the Sabbath law is to be subordinated to man's good (Mk 2²⁷). This is in accordance with the reason for the Sabbath in Dt 5¹⁴. The Sabbath was intended to afford opportunity for religious worship and the culture of the soul, and we may regard Jesus as teaching that attention to the physical well-being of man on the Sabbath was in so far as it ministered to spiritual life. Life spiritual exercises are to a certain degree dependent on bodily conditions, just as a sound body is a condition requisite for a sound mind. He taught that physical need supersedes the ceremonial Law, in His illustration from the life of David (Mt 12³, Mk 2²⁴⁻²⁵), and that God prefers mercy, exercised by man towards his fellows, and by Himself towards men, to sacrifices (Mt 12⁷).

(3) Christ taught that the ceremonial observance of the Sabbath must give way before any higher and more spiritual motive.—Upon this principle the Temple service to which Christ refers (Mt 12²) was abolished, and He did not find fault with it. In this way it is possible to explain the verse which in Codex Bezae (D) is inserted after Lk 6⁵ (which may possibly be an instance of a genuine saying of Christ which is not elsewhere recorded): 'On the same day, seeing one working on the Sabbath, He said unto him, O man, if indeed thou knowest what thou doest, thou art blessed; but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a transgressor of the law.' That is, the Sabbath in obedience to a higher motive, and the man is pronounced 'blessed' as being free from the trammels of Jewish tradition; but if his action lacks such motive, he is guilty of wilful disregard of the command.

4. The change of day from Saturday to Sunday in the Christian Church.—This change took place very early in the history of the Christian Church, but its date and reasons are somewhat indefinite. It scarcely requires any argument in justification, as (i) it preserves the spirit and purpose of the older practice; and (ii) the change occurred so early that it must have had the sanction of the immediate disciples of Christ. Probably the change arose owing to Sunday being the day of Christ's resurrection, and the day upon which He appeared to His disciples (Jn 20¹⁹⁻²⁶). The work of redemption, being the creation of the new world, was regarded as superseding in importance the work of physical creation; so the Ep. of Barnabas (15) speaks of Sunday as 'the beginning of another world,' and says: 'Wherefore also we keep the eighth day for rejoicing, in the which also Jesus rose from the dead, and, having been manifested, ascended into the heavens.' Evidences of the change are found in the NT in 1 Co 16², and Ac 20⁷. The name ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα for Sunday occurs in Rev 1¹⁰. In early Christian writings we find that the change had already taken place (Didache, 14; Ignatius, Magnes. 9; Pliny, Ep. x. 97; Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 67). Eusebius (HE iii. 27) says that the Ebionites kept the Jewish Sabbath and also Sunday (see Lightfoot, Ignatius, ii. 129; Allen, Christian Institutions, vol. 467). See also 'Lord's Day' in art. CALENDAR, vol. i. p. 251 ff.

SACKCLOTH.—A coarse, dark-coloured cloth, made of goat's or camel's hair (Gr. σάκκος, Heb. פַּר), used in ordinary life for sacking, sieves, strainers, and the like, but in the Gospels twice named in connexion with prevalent mourning customs (Mt 11²¹, Lk 10¹³), coupled with 'ashes' (wh. see) as an expression of penitential grief. The mourner wore the sackcloth garment, next the skin; and because of the garment's coarseness it became a constant reminder of his grief, its irritation being a sort of penance; sometimes it was worn as an outer garment as a visible expression of mourning. Closely related to this use of sackcloth was the use of it by ascetics and prophets (cf. later use by pilgrims). So John the Baptist wore a garment of camel's hair (Mt 3⁴, Mk 1⁶) as the expression of a certain austerity of life, and as a rebuke to the love of ease and luxury which characterized the age. E. B. POLLARD.

SACRIFICE.—The saving significance of the death of Jesus Christ is of necessity the most important part of any article on the NT idea of sacrifice; for it is in the light of the sacrifice of Christ that all Christian sacrifice must be viewed.

It is now universally admitted that there is development and difference in the doctrinal standpoint of the NT writers. The old method of taking passages from the various Gospels and Epistles and setting them side by side, has been given up. The only satisfactory results are to be obtained by examining in turn the teaching of each writer; and this is the method which it is proposed to adopt in considering the subject of the sacrifice of Christ.

1. We begin with the teaching of our Lord as set forth in the Synoptic Gospels. Here there is nothing to be found in the nature of dogmatic assertion. The statements of our Lord as to the significance of His death are far from numerous, and in no case can they be looked at wholly by themselves. His whole life and teaching is their context. To any one carefully reading the Synoptic Gospels it becomes plain that it is only towards the end of His life on earth that the meaning of His death begins to occupy anything like a prominent place in the consciousness of Christ. There is not a single word regarding it in the Sermon on the Mount. There He is the second Moses, the new Lawgiver, the Revealer of the Father and His will, the Preacher of that new Kingdom whose laws should be written upon the hearts of men. Man is to be transformed by the renewal of his mind as heaven was renewed. All external religious practices are valueless except in so far as they manifest inward spiritual life. But it is already a Father of infinite tenderness and love, a Father only waiting to be gracious, whom He reveals, not a God full of wrath against sinful man, who must be propitiated and reconciled by the death of His Son before He can pardon. Forgiveness is already offered to all who will do the Father's will, to all who in love forgive the trespasses of their brethren. There is not one word to suggest that pardon and reconciliation are conditional upon the sacrifice of Himself still to be offered. Here Christ is the Teacher of morality, with an authority greater than that of Moses, it is true; but He has not yet revealed Himself as the Way and the Truth and the Life. He is implicitly the Saviour in that His Person and work are alone the guarantee of the will of the Father, in that He embodies the attractive power of righteousness, in that He is the source of healing grace to all afflicted ones who come with faith in Him; but He has not yet made surrender to Himself the only way of salvation. It is only in consequence of the opposition of His countrymen that He gives expression to the thought that He is Himself the Mediator of salvation, the only Revealer of God (Mt 11²⁵⁻³⁰). He realizes that it is offence at His humility and lowliness that keeps 'the wise and prudent' from hearing His word, and that it is love to Him that draws the poor and despised and sin-laden to the revelation of the Father and the doing of His will. It is at that time the thought that He is the personal Mediator is frequently upon His lips (Mt 10⁴⁰ 12³⁰ 18³⁵, Lk 12⁸ etc.). It is opposition, too, that arouses in Him the consciousness of being the Conqueror and Dethroner of Satan and all the powers of darkness (Mt 12²⁸, Mk 3²⁷, Lk 10^{18, 19} 11²¹). As time goes on, this opposition develops into a bitter hatred which threatens His life. Selfishness and world-love array themselves against Him and His doctrine of world-renunciation. His power is too great to be overlooked. The world-spirit which dominates the bulk of His countrymen demands His death; and even His most faithful followers are still enslaved by the world's toils—bound to earth by that material glory which, according to their selfish hopes, His Messianicship is to procure for them. While He lives, they will still buoy themselves up with false hopes: they will not understand the pure spirituality of His life and work—that His 'kingdom is not of this world.' The perception of these dangers, then—of that which from the outside threatened His life, of that which from within threatened the purity of His disciples' faith—became to Him a further revelation of the Father's will,—a revelation that His death was decreed, and that by it He should accomplish that for which His whole life had been but the preparation. But we must not expect many explicit statements on the subject. His followers were not yet fit to bear this truth. He was leaving this to be made plain to them by the Holy Spirit after His departure. Yet there are hints enough to lead us to a right understanding. 'I have a baptism to be baptized with,' He says on one occasion, 'and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!' (Lk 12^{49, 50}). Manifestly the baptism was the baptism of death (cf. Mt 20²²⁻²³). In Mt 20²⁸ the reason for the necessity of His death is made plain—'to give his life a ransom for many.' The idea clearly is that men are enslaved, and that Christ gives His life to set them free; but the question still remains as to the nature of the bondage. 'From death, from the guilt of sin and its punishment,' says the old theology, or, as it is sometimes expressed, 'from the wrath of God.' But there is not a single word upon the lips of Christ to justify this interpretation; and, as we shall see later, wherever in the NT the death of Christ is called a deliverance or a ransom, it is always a being purchased for God, a being delivered from the bondage of sin to serve God, that is thought of (Ro 6¹⁻¹¹, 1 Co 6²⁰ 7²³, 1 P 1^{18ff.} etc.). Moreover, the whole mission of our Lord and the whole meaning of His teaching was to deliver man from sin, to make him love, and long for, righteousness. It is impossible to imagine the Preacher of the Sermon on the Mount accounting it the great work of His life merely to deliver men from the consequences of their sins. Can any one believe that such a Moralist would be content with less than the deliverance from sin itself, the worst bondage of all to which man is subject? The context of the words, too (Mt 20¹⁷⁻²⁸), must lead us to the same conclusion. There is no thought of death or even of guilt; but there is a thought of sin—of the sin of self-seeking, bound up as it was with the expectation of material glory in an earthly kingdom, which had just prompted the request of James and John, and of the selfish indignation of the other disciples who resented that request as an attempt to obtain an unfair advantage over them. That Christ should think of His coming death as certain to break for ever the cords of their worldliness, so that their love for Him might draw them away from the world unto righteousness and God, is perfectly conceivable. His cross, borne for love's sake as the last step in the path of perfect holiness which He was called to tread, must for all time crucify the world unto all who truly believed in Him, and them unto the world. To imagine that Christ in these words represents the Father as requiring a ransom at His hands before He can forgive mankind, is to render His revelation of the Heavenly Father wholly inconsistent, is to give the lie to all His earlier words regarding the mercy and compassion of God. The parable of the Prodigal Son in the context of this later presentation becomes an illustration of the Father's love.

But let us proceed to the institution of the Lord's Supper, whence the most definite teaching as to the import of His death is to be drawn (Mt 26, Lk 22¹⁹⁻²⁰, 1 Co 11²³⁻²⁴, Lk 22¹⁹⁻²⁰). Here He speaks of the surrender of His life as a thing advantageous to those who believe on Him, and St. Matthew adds the words—'for the remission of sins.' In the Sacrament thus instituted there is a twofold reference to the ritual of the Jews—(1) to the Passover, in the breaking of bread, the symbol of His broken body; (2) to the sacrifice of the covenant at Sinai, to which the giving of the cup with the words—'This is my blood of the new covenant' clearly alludes. Now the Passover signified exemption from the death of the firstborn which overtook the Egyptians. By the death of the lamb, which the Israelites appropriated to themselves by eating it, forgiveness of sins was granted to them. But the Passover meant more than this. It brought them freedom not only from death, but also from bondage. It transformed a multitude of slaves into a free nation; it made them God's people; and sent them forth to serve Him. Its aim was the service of God. Our Lord, then, in the institution of the bread expressed the thought that His life given up to death is to be appropriated by His followers, that it may become their life, that it may set them free from the bondage of sin, and make them free servants and sons of God. This, too, must be noted, that it is not the fact of His death in itself that is significant. Had He thought of abiding in death, the whole meaning of the institution would have been taken away. The idea is that He surrenders His physical life for their sakes, that His spiritual life may dwell in and inspire them. In the closing chapters of St. John's Gospel this thought is most clearly expressed. As to the institution of the cup and its reference to the ratification of the Sinaitic covenant, the idea here is that of purification on entering into communion with God. In Ex 24 the sprinkling of the blood is the completion of the covenant already made: it symbolizes the need of purity in those who would obey God. Just as the baptism of John was valueless without change of mind, and could confer no forgiveness without the bringing forth of fruit worthy of repentance, so the sprinkling of the blood expressed the thought that purity and sincerity are necessary for all who would enter into the covenant relationship with God—that there can be no forgiveness except it be followed by sincere obedience. There is further present to the mind of our Lord the prophecy of Jeremiah regarding the New Covenant (or Testament) (Jer 31³¹⁻³⁴) which should be an inward relationship, a covenant of regeneration—'I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it on their hearts.' In this covenant forgiveness was to be granted in consequence of an internal reformation (v. 34). When the power of sin is broken and cast out, when the heart is dead to sin, God is just to pardon. Thus Christ called His blood about to be shed the blood of the New Covenant, in the sense that His death of love would inspire His followers with new life, would be to them in the first place a means of breaking the power of sin in their lives, of recreating them in the love of holiness, and only in consequence of that an assurance of pardon. The saving significance of the death of Christ, then, as it is set forth in the Lord's Supper, is this—to create in the believer a new power of spiritual life which should make sin hateful and so destroy its bondage, and to assure him of pardon by the guarantee of God's perfect love as revealed in the life and death of His Son. Christ's death is a sacrifice in that it removes for ever all doubt of God's forgiving love, and makes man's willing, loving obedience possible; in that it proves the absolute victory of good over evil; and, lifting His life beyond the limits of time and space, makes it a spiritual force communicable to all who accept Him as their Saviour.

2. When we turn to the Gospel of St. John, we find at once much to confirm the hints which the Synoptics have already given us. He wrote long after the departure of his Lord, and his experience and spiritual insight had made clear to him the meaning of many words that had been dark to the earlier writers. In the teaching of Jesus as St. John presents it, the thought of His death as setting free a spiritual life-giving principle becomes with a greater distinctness. He is the Bread of Life, the Living Water, that giveth life to men (Jn 6. 7³⁷⁻³⁸ 31¹⁰⁻¹⁵); He is the Resurrection and the Life (11²⁵); but that this πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν may act with completed power, it must pass through death to larger life. 'Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone,' etc. (12²⁴). 'It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come to you,' etc. (16⁷). But the death itself has a value apart from the resurrection, for in it is revealed the triumph of holy love over the power of evil; it is the means whereby the Father glorifies the Son (12²⁷⁻²⁸ 13³¹⁻³²). All men are subject to this power save Jesus only; and the power of evil is broken through His meek submission to that death which the evil world forces upon Him (12³¹). The spirit of selfishness no longer rules the earth when its utmost wickedness is outdone by the obedience of perfect love even unto death. This power of overcoming the world and its spirit, He will communicate to those who follow Him. He will draw all men unto Him when He is lifted up (12³², cf. 16³³). The cleansing power of His death, which in the Synoptics is symbolized by the institution of the Supper, here finds its place in the washing of the disciples' feet (13²⁻⁵). They were cleansed by the word which He had spoken unto them (15³): the death was but the completion, the final cleansing. According to St. John, then, the efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ lay in this—that it was an act of perfect obedience to the will of the righteous Father (14²⁴) and of love to the world (10¹¹ 15¹³),—an example, therefore, and an inspiration; but also that it broke the power of sin, and, through the glorified life which of love He loved it, became a means of spiritual life and sanctification to all believers. Once again the word to suggest the judicial theory of satisfaction.

3. Proceeding now to the Acts of the Apostles and to the Epistle of James, we are met by this remarkable fact, that in neither is there a single reference to the saving significance of the death of Christ. The accusation of having put the Holy One to death is brought home most forcibly in the speeches of Peter and Stephen (Ac 2²³ 31¹³⁻¹⁵ 7⁵²); but the Cross is not once spoken of as necessary to salvation. Repentance and conversion are alone mentioned as essential to forgiveness; and even when (Ac 8^{28ff.}) Philip overhears the Ethiopian reading the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah and interprets it for him, though this chapter above all others seems to speak of Messiah's vicarious suffering and death, the all-important passage—'He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities,' etc. (v. 9), is not even quoted. The natural conclusion is that the sacrificial significance of Christ's death, so far from having been a cardinal doctrine of the Church from the outset, had not yet dawned upon the disciples' minds. The glad facts of the Resurrection and Ascension, with all of spiritual quickening that these had brought them, were the all-important things to them. The death, except in so far as it was the passage to life, was still obscure. They had no Christ's sacrifice alone procured their pardon; for if they had, they could not possibly have kept silence regarding it. It was the Resurrection they preached, not the Cross (3¹³⁻¹⁶ 10^{40, 41}).

4. When we turn to the First Epistle of St. Peter, we find a marked advance upon this early preaching. The Apostle explains the death of the Lord as an example, as a power of redemption, and as a deliverance from the sense of guilt. But throughout, this development is on the lines of Christ's own teaching. He does not speak a word to which a parallel could not be found in the Gospels. As the Lord told His disciples that the world would treat them as it treated Him, so St. Peter bids his readers follow in the steps of Christ; 'for this is thankworthy,' he says, 'if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully.' 'If, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God' (2^{19, 20}; cf. 3¹⁷ 4¹). Here he inculcates a sacrifice on the part of believers similar to the sacrifice of Christ, and asserts its acceptance in God's sight. Of the redemptive power of Christ's sacrifice he speaks in 1¹⁸⁻²² 2^{21, 24} 3¹⁸; and in each of these it is redemption from sin's bondage that is thought of, with the end in view of service to God. The sacrifice is never thought of by itself as a death, but as the death of the Saviour, but always in connexion with sanctification, its end and aim. Believers are redeemed from their vain conversation by the blood of the Lamb, that they may purify their souls in obeying the truth. He bears their sins that they should live unto righteousness. He suffered for sins to bring them to God, that death is only for those who let it act upon them. It is not a satisfaction of God that removes for ever the guilt of men by bearing their penalty: it is a moral deliverance: it is the impression which it creates upon the hearts of believers that is the delivering power—a power increased and fulfilled by the influence of the quickening Spirit (1²²). In 4¹ St. Peter says, 'He that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin.' By following Christ's example men are to be delivered. Just as the suffering of a mother for her erring son becomes to that son redemption,—a force to make sin hateful in his eyes,—so the picture of Christ's suffering for us acts upon our hearts; and our imitation of Him, our suffering borne for righteousness' sake, breaks the will of the flesh, so that in St. Paul's words we die to sin and live to God. That Christ 'suffered once for sin, the just for the unjust' (3¹⁸), means simply that human sin brought Him to death, a death which love and righteousness compelled Him to bear for our sakes, and that the spectacle of that Divine transcendent love becomes to all believers a power of regeneration. But, further, it is also a pledge of Divine forgiveness. In 1² he mentions the 'sprinkling of the blood of Christ' along with obedience and sanctification of the Spirit, and by it he can mean only the remission of sins—the removal of the sense of guilt. Moreover, in 1¹⁸⁻²¹ he speaks of the shedding of the blood of the Lamb as having for one object 'that your faith and hope may be in God.' What can this mean but that the love of the Father manifested in the death of His Son is to be to believers a means of breaking down the barrier which the sense of guilt had erected between them and God? It shows the Father ready to forgive and draw men unto Him (3¹⁸). To get rid of sin and to be assured of pardon are the two essentials to salvation, which by His death Christ has procured, but He has procured them only for those who make Christ their example by suffering Him to write God's law upon their hearts—who appropriate God's life unto themselves.

5. It is in the writings of St. Paul, however, that the Cross of Christ attains its pre-eminent position. The whole gospel is to him the preaching of the Cross. 'Christ and him crucified' is the subject of all his teaching. Yet the emphasis he lays on it is never one-sided; for the death of Christ is but the consummation of His holy life of Divine love, and at the same time the prelude to the fuller life of glory beyond; both of which are essential to the meaning and value of the sacrifice. Nor is it that the mind of the Pharisaic Saul has led him to the contemplation of the Cross because of his close study of the OT ritual. It is his own personal experience of salvation that has caused him to understand—the marvellous change wrought in him by the Lord who appeared to him on the road to Damascus, and which he has expressed in the words, 'I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2²⁰, cf. 6¹⁴).

It certainly cannot be denied that in many passages the Apostle speaks of the death of Jesus as a means of deliverance from guilt, or of justification (Ro 3^{25, 26}, 2 Co 5²¹, Gal 3¹³, Col 2¹⁴ etc.); and in the Epistle to the Romans the first place is certainly given to this doctrine; but justification is always conditioned by faith; Christ is never represented as reconciling God to us, but contrariwise, God through Christ reconciles the world to Himself; even our faith in Christ is useless except Christ be risen (1 Co 15¹⁷), i.e. except He be in us a living power to lead to sanctification; and Christ is never said to die ἀντὶ, but always ὕπὲρ ἡμῶν; all of which facts are radically opposed to the theory of legal substitution. But, most important of all, guilt is no more than sin's consequence, and we cannot conceive of St. Paul, who above all others understood the meaning of sin's bondage, ascribing to Christ a mere redemption from sin's consequences and not from sin itself. The Apostle, however, speaks for himself. It was, he says, to deliver us from the evil world, it was that we should live together with Him, it was that men should not henceforth serve sin, that Christ died (Gal 1⁴, 1 Th 5¹⁰, Ro 6⁶). The whole sixth chapter of Romans is on this theme—death to sin in Christ; and the seventh expresses the same thing in reference to the Law. The death of Christ is in his view, then, the direct cause of our death to sin, the breaking of sin's bondage, the putting off the sensuous selfish nature, the subjugation of its desires and appetites (Col 2¹¹, Ro 3²⁴ 6³⁻⁴ 7⁴); and this is the first step to the energizing of the life-giving Spirit of the glorified Lord within us. The passage in 2 Co 5^{14, 15} seems to express St. Paul's view with perfect clearness. Here we are told that it is the love of Christ that constraineth—that makes the death of the One a means of death to sin in all. It is as the Lord of humanity, the spiritual Head, spiritually related to all, that He dies; but He rose again and lives now, so that all who recognize the relationship are compelled, by the love which His perfect sacrifice excites, to break for ever with sin—sin which slew Him—and to live henceforth His life, the life of love and righteousness (cf. Ro 6^{10, 11} 5¹⁹, Gal 2^{19, 20}). It is not, however, the love of Christ only that is manifested by His death, but also that of the Father. 'God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us' (Ro 5⁸⁻¹⁰). The attitude of the fleshly mind is enmity against God (Ro 8⁷). Men are rebels toward Him. It is the sense of guilt that keeps them from Him. They cannot even believe it possible that God can pardon. It is this, then, that God seeks to remove by the death of His Son. He gives an infinite pledge of His desire to forgive (2 Co 5¹⁹). Yet it still remains true that this pledge is not the actual justification of the sinner. He must accept God's offer; he must allow God's love to enter his heart; and that means death to sin, and makes him a new creature (2 Co 5¹⁷). Sanctification in principle is his from that moment. Thenceforth he is 'a new creature' to God. In St. Paul, too, we find that aspect of Christ's death as a conquest of evil, an objective breaking of the power of sin, of which we have already spoken. He speaks of Christ coming in the likeness of sinful flesh and condemning sin in the flesh (Ro 8³). By this he means that Christ's death was the completion of a life of righteousness, and the final act of triumph over evil. He condemned sin in that He resisted it all His life, and in the end gave His life to that resistance. He submitted to the shameful death of the Cross, because to that the path of Divine righteousness led Him. It is for this reason that there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus (8¹). In Him they spiritually delight in the law of God; by their love to Him and life in Him they, too, condemn sin; and 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made them free from the law of sin and death' (8²). It is in the same manner that the Apostle represents the death of Christ as a 'propitiation through faith in his blood' (3²⁵). It is not a propitiation to God in the sense that it hides sin from His eyes, but in that Christ's sacrifice contains the power of breaking sin in all who accept Him by faith. God is just in forgiving the sin of the believer, because Christ's victory is the guarantee of ultimate victory to all who live in Him (cf. 2 Co 5²¹ and 1 Co 5⁷). Finally, the importance which St. Paul attaches to the resurrection of Christ enforces all that has been said. Without that fact his whole doctrine of the scheme of salvation would fall to pieces (1 Co 15¹⁷). It is not even the death of Christ, but only the risen Saviour that justifies (Ro 4²⁵). It is in Christ—therefore in a Christ who lives—that justification is obtained (2 Co 5²¹, Eph 1⁷), and that sanctification is rendered possible (Ro 5¹⁰ 8³⁴ 14⁹, 2 Co 3^{17, 18}, Gal 2²⁰). It is only because the believer is in living union with the holy Lord that God can justify him: for the union and communion are the guarantee that the work of sanctification begun will be carried to completion, that the believer will be conformed in all things to his Redeemer. To have Christ dwell in our hearts by faith, to be rooted and grounded in love, to know the love of Christ, is to be filled with the fulness of God (Eph 3¹⁷⁻¹⁹). If the old view of legal satisfaction through the sufferings of Christ be accepted, all this becomes absurd.

6. We now come to the Epistle to the Hebrews, which, more than any other NT writing, relates the sacrifice of Christ to those of the Mosaic ritual. In this relation the author views the sacrifice of Jesus as the only one that can satisfy the needs of men, the one which alone requires no repetition. Following the example of our Lord Himself in the institution of the Supper, the writer alludes to the covenant sacrifice of Ex 24; and it is perfectly manifest from the way in which he speaks of it that he no more regards Christ's death as having created the New Covenant, than he does the sacrifice at Sinai as having procured the Old. In each case it is but a dedication, a ratification. He also refers to the offering of the great Day of Atonement, and with it he compares the sacrifice of Christ, calling it the great atonement by which the conscience is purged from dead works to serve the living God (9¹⁴, cf. 10²²). The mention of conscience, of course, suggests deliverance from the sense of guilt; but the immediately following words—'to serve the living God'—point to something far beyond mere escape from punishment, namely, to sanctification and obedience. Repeatedly he tells us that the sacrifices of the OT could not take away sin (10^{4, 11}); but if by taking away sin he means merely remission of guilt, his words become meaningless; for why should not obedience to a Divinely appointed ordinance have procured deliverance from guilt? Wherein they failed—what made their continual repetition necessary—was not that they could not give the sense of pardon, but that they could not give deliverance from the bondage of sin. It was in this that Christ's sacrifice was superior to all the Mosaic offerings, that it led to the service of the living God, that it put sin away (9²⁶), that it perfected them that are sanctified (10¹⁴), that it worked a change in the will of the believer, realizing the covenant which Jeremiah foresaw when God's law should be written on the mind and heart (10¹⁶). If holiness is the great essential to salvation (12¹⁴), and Christ's sacrifice procured no more than deliverance from guilt, then it did not procure salvation. The old ritual could not make the worshipper 'perfect as pertaining to conscience' (9^{9, 10}), because it only pointed to the need of purity: it could not create the power to attain that purity: there was no force in it to break the power of sin and set free the will to attain holiness and communion with God. We are accustomed to think of atonement as meaning that God is made willing; but to make Christ's sacrifice an atonement in this sense is to charge it with exactly the same weakness as belonged to the old ritual. Unquestionably Christ's death does, in the writer's view, guarantee forgiveness; but everywhere this forgiveness is regarded not as an end in itself, but only as the accompaniment of deliverance from the power of sin and the attainment of actual holiness. Indeed, there can be no certainty of pardon to the conscience until it is sensible of sanctification. God forgives not because Christ's death has been accepted in lieu of the punishment of men, but because the perfect holiness and love of Christ's life consummated by a death of shame are a pledge to God for the sanctification of all believers (10^{9, 10}). Christ's life and death established perfection as an actual fact in human history, broke the hitherto victorious power of evil; and by virtue of His resurrection and ascension that power of victory can be communicated to all who believe. It is in this sense that Christ intercedes for men in heaven, in that He is there as a guarantee of the perfectibility of human nature; and because of His pledge that in those who are His, sin is, and will be, conquered and cast out, God is just to forgive (cf. 7²⁸ 8¹ 9^{12, 14, 24} 13²⁰ 7¹⁶ 2¹¹ 5⁹).

7. We come, finally, to the Epistles of St. John, with which we shall conclude our consideration. Here, as was to be expected in the Beloved Disciple, the ultimate explanation of the sacrifice of Christ is love, the love of God (1 Jn 4¹⁰). There is nowhere a suspicion of the thought that a change is made in God by the offering of Jesus. It was as the manifestation of the Father's love that the Son was sent to suffer and die, and it is the influence of this love on us that creates love in us (4¹⁹), and renders possible the keeping of God's commandments (5³). To be in the love is to dwell in God (4¹²), to be born of God; and this ensures the victory that overcometh the world, and sin, which is the world-spirit (5^{4, 5}). Selfishness and hatred are the signs of unregenerateness, because salvation means love to God, and consequently love to all mankind (4^{20, 21}). The death of Christ was the proof of His Divinity, because it showed perfect love. Once more, then, in St. John's view also it is a morally effective sacrifice, a power of renewal, not a substitution. God forgives all in whom sin is broken by the death of Christ, and who are being sanctified by His indwelling life. 'If we confess our sins,' he says, 'he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins' (1⁹); for if we confess, it is plain that the holiness and love of Christ are acting upon us, so that we realize our sinfulness, and hate it (cf. 1⁷). The belief in Christ, as the whole Epistle shows, to which forgiveness and cleansing are granted, is no mere passive acceptance of deliverance from guilt, no mere belief in substitutionary merit, but the perception of the perfect holiness and love of Jesus Christ, so that sin is revealed in all its hideousness as rebellion against a Father of love, and the man is delivered from its power by his hatred of it, and longing to serve and love God and the brethren. It is the creation in man of a spirit akin to that which fired the life of Jesus, that is man's salvation; and it is the power in Christ's self-sacrifice to produce this and to perfect it, that is the pledge to God of man's sanctification, and that makes Him just in forgiving sin.

On the whole subject this must be added, that sacrifice is acceptable to God only in virtue of the spirit which lies behind it and which it expresses. It is never the outward value of the offering, never the amount of suffering it entails, that makes it precious in God's sight. The multiplicity and costliness of the sacrifices under the old ritual became hateful in His eyes whenever they became a mere attempt to bribe God's favour, and ceased to be the symbol of dependence and gratitude and obedience in man (cf. Is 1^{13, 14}). Mercy toward man and love to God must always be the underlying, inspiring spirit of sacrifice, else even the minutest observance of ritual becomes worthless (Mt 23²³⁻³³ 9¹³ 12⁷). Christ's sacrifice, then, was acceptable to God, not because of the amount of suffering or the shame of the death,—the willingness to undergo so much was but the revelation of the greatness of the love,—but because it manifested perfect obedience, perfect holiness, perfect Divine love. It is in the same way—it is in Christ only—that the sacrifices of Christians are a sweet incense unto God. Men no longer need offer sacrifice for sin, but the Father still asks of the believer burnt-offerings of self-dedication (Ro 12¹), thank-offerings of grateful love. These are sacrifices which the love of God and the holiness for which the believer longs make it a joy to offer, because they are a revelation of the spirit which inspires his heart and works in his whole life—the spirit of Jesus Christ (Eph 5¹⁹⁻²¹, He 13^{15, 16}, Ph 4¹⁷⁻¹⁸, Mt 5^{22, 24}). SACRIFICES (of OT in relation to Christ).—

Sacrifice is an act of homage resulting in a degree of friendship with God. So long as the creature is not united into the Creator, homage must always be rendered from man to God. Not even under the gospel have we outgrown the attitude expressed by sacrifice. We have passed away from animal sacrifices, but we have passed into the region of the sacrifice of Christ.

The sacrifices of the OT may be divided into ritual or prescribed, and the spontaneous, primitive usages of which instances occur both before and after the time of Moses, and among heathen as well as in the direct line of revelation (Gn 4⁸ 8-10 12⁷, Ex 18¹², Nu 23¹, Jg 11³¹, 1 S 7⁹, 1 K 3⁴ 18²³, 2 K 3²⁷). This distinction, however, is not dwelt upon in the NT, and is relevant only for the light which the older form of sacrifice throws upon the origin of the Mosaic sacrifices.

1. It is generally agreed that the sacred record represents sacrifice as a practice found already in existence among men, when the special revelation to Israel begins (Gn 4²⁶). A sense of dependence upon God, the need of His friendship, and the duty of rendering homage to Him by gifts, are the universal elements in sacrifice. It is not clear whether the friendship of God was taken to be assured, and the sacrificial meal only expressed it, or whether it was usually felt that there was some amends to be made, and the favour of God obtained, before His friendship could be enjoyed. But this matter was made clearer afterwards in the separate appointment of sin-offerings and peace-offerings in the Mosaic system. Meantime, we have here a universally implanted instinct in human nature that responds to the sovereignty of the Unseen in homage, thanksgiving, to God, or fear. Thus there was in the Mosaic law of sacrifice a language being prepared that would be intelligible to all men, and that was fitted to be the vehicle of a world-wide revelation of God.

It is of importance to notice that the usage of sacrifice is not only adopted and regulated in the OT, but is expressly commanded by prophets of God from Moses to Malachi (Ex 23¹⁵, Mal 1¹⁴). This fact makes the use of sacrifice in the NT regard to the death of Christ to be of very much more importance than if sacrifice had merely provided a type for the Apostles with an illustration that lay to hand. And it is the more to be attended to because so often the sacrifices of the Mosaic law seem to be disparaged by the prophets. What they found fault with was that the people complied with the outward rules of God's worship, and did not lay to heart the high requirements of His law; for if these sacrifices meant that they were in friendly relations with God, this ought to have carried with it a friendly regard consistent with so high a religious profession (Isa 1¹¹⁻¹⁴, Jer 7¹⁷). Since therefore sacrifice was undoubtedly of Divine institution, through the prophets, we may take it that whatever feelings of confidence toward God, or of the consciousness of guilt, were expressed by sacrifice, these were not only Divinely allowed and sanctioned, but were required by God on the part of His people towards Him.

2. The Mosaic ritual was inaugurated by a covenant (Ex 24). The sacrifices then offered are called burnt-offerings and peace-offerings (v.³). This latter term usually implies that the flesh of the sacrifices was eaten by the worshippers, and accordingly we read that the elders did 'eat and drink' in the presence of God (v.¹¹). The covenant between Jacob and Laban (Gn 31⁵⁴) was of a similar nature. Other covenants are between God and Abraham (Gn 15¹⁸), and in Jer 34¹⁸. It was a feature of these sacrifices that the animals sacrificed were divided, or the blood was divided, so that the parties to the covenant were assumed into a mystic unity of life. It is this particular sacrifice that is adduced in the Epistle to the Hebrews as signaling the covenant between God and Israel (He 9²⁰). We have then these points to notice—(1) Everything in the subsequent history of the relations between God and Israel depended upon the fact that this covenant had been made. (2) It was a celebration of friendship between God and Israel, involving reverent obedience on their part, and securing to them the immense privilege of being welcome to draw indefinitely upon the aid of the Almighty. (3) The covenant was sealed by sacrifice, and more particularly by blood. This is insisted on in He 9¹⁸ as giving an element of effective force to what was done. An oath is spoken of in somewhat similar terms (He 6¹⁶). A covenant made by sacrifice was not only dramatic and memorable, but it had a sanctity, as of a visible oath (cf. 1 S 11⁷, Jer 34¹⁸⁻²⁰).

In all this there was no emergence of the question of sin, nor was amends offered to God for sin. There was set forth a tie of friendship between God and His people, to begin with: of the existence of which friendship the whole events of the deliverance from Egypt were incontrovertible proof. At the same time the root-idea of a friendship subsisting between God and His people, and the obtaining of His favour by propitiation, if that should be necessary, are not widely different. A usually friendly attitude on the part of God is the presupposition which underlies the offering of sacrifice to remove His displeasure because of particular sins, or to obtain His favour in any special enterprise (1 S 7⁹). The Creator has bestowed innumerable benefits upon His creatures, and is justly to be regarded by them as their Friend. If Israel limited this to themselves, and had a feeling of their proprietary interest in God, and if, therefore, there is in that feeling the germ of the doctrine of special providence, and of God's interest in the salvation of individuals; and all the confidence and intimacy of faithful affection therein contained may be appropriated to the believer's relationship with God. The ignorance of those who thought they alone had a portion in God does not invalidate the truth and beauty of the mutual affection which that very ignorance allowed them to realize.

3. Under the general shelter of this covenant relationship the sacrifices of the Mosaic law were instituted (Gal 3^{17, 19}). These consisted of two great classes. Sin-offerings and Peace-offerings. There were sin-offerings for the nation (Lv 4¹³), for the priests (v.³), and for individuals (v.²⁷): of which the first two were entirely consumed by fire, and the last were eaten only by the priests (v.²⁸). Guilt-offerings, with whatever differences, belonged to the same general class; and with them may be reckoned the various offerings of purification. All these assumed their most characteristic form in connexion with the yearly Day of Atonement (Lv 16). Peace-offerings, on the other hand, may be taken to include the Passover, and all offerings of first-fruits and tithes and bloodless sacrifices. Thus Christ acknowledged the one class (sin-offering) when He bade the leper 'offer for thy cleansing what Moses commanded' (Mk 1⁴⁴); and the other class (peace-offering) when He said, 'Leave there thy gift before the altar' (Mt 5²⁴). As we have seen, the sacrifices offered at the making of the covenant were peace-offerings. These were acts of homage, and seals of a happy relationship between God and His people. Thus Solomon offering sacrifices received a gracious revelation that he might ask what he pleased (1 K 3¹, cf. Ps. 20⁶).

Sin-offerings took notice of human unworthiness to approach God. The offences atoned for by sacrifice were sins of ignorance or inadvertence, and also misfortunes such as leprosy (Lv 14¹³). For wilful disobedience there was no sacrifice (Nu 15³⁰, 1 S 2²⁸ 3¹⁴, 1 Jn 5¹⁶). Where there was a civil penalty, there was a sacrifice as well. That is to say, the fact of sin against God was taken into account (Lv 6⁵). The holiness of God was the dominating principle of the OT sacrifices for sin. Whatever was unsightly and degrading was to be abhorred: regard to propriety was enforced. By purity and seemliness of outward behaviour everything that tended to pollute the mind was atro-phied, and only what was helpful to the higher nature was allowed to influence the future. Constituted as human nature is, physical purity is not only a picture of godliness but a help to it. Thus the OT sacrifices outclassed the customs of the heathen by their blamelessness, and collaborated with the prophets and with God's providences to inculcate a high quality of conduct (Lv 20²³, 1 Co 10³⁰).

In the sacrifices which involved the death of animals, a sense of the sacredness of life was expressed by the reverent use of the blood (Lv 17¹¹). Whatever was ratified by the taking of life obtained a sanctity thereby, and the putting away of human sin in making approach to God was so ratified, and the transaction made sacrosanct and secure. So far as we know, the animals sacrificed were put to death with no unnecessary pain; they did not expiate sin by suffering (1 K 18²⁸); it was the deprivation of life they suffered, and it was the blood representing life which had mysterious significance. No one might eat the blood of sacrifices, or of any animal (contrast Ps 16⁴ 'drink-offerings of blood'). There was no festive garland placed on the victim, to make believe that it went willingly; but it must be without blemish, partly because only the best should be given to God, and partly, it may be, because the mystery of death is greater in the case of a perfectly healthful life.

In a sense the life of the animal went for the life of the worshipper. This was signified when the offerer laid his hand upon the victim's head (Lv 1⁴, etc.). And the same substitution is suggested when a ransom (Mt 20²⁸) was paid for the firstborn, although no animal substitute is mentioned (Ex 13¹³, cf. Nu 3⁴⁷). But the vicariousness of the suffering of Christ is anticipated in the OT rather by the priestly feeling of responsibility expressed in Ezr 9⁶ and Dn 9⁵ (cf. also Is 53), than by anything explicit in the appointment of animal sacrifices. See § 5, below.

4. The prophecy of the New Covenant (Jer 31³¹) forms the principal link between the sacrifices of the OT and Christ's fulfilment of them. For in that passage the promise of a covenant between God and His people is connected with the forgiveness of sin; and in the NT this conjunction is all-important. The NT is full of allusions to the law of sacrifice: 'Christ died for our sins' (1 Co 15³); 'Christ our passover is sacrificed for us' (5⁷); and the words 'ransom,' 'redemption,' 'propitiation,' 'cleanse,' 'purify,' 'sanctify,'—all occur frequently. But especially this reference is to be found in Christ's words at the institution of the Supper: 'For this is my blood of the covenant, which is shed for many unto remission of sins' (Mt 26²⁸); and in the Epistle to the Hebrews (chs. 8-10). In both these places attention is drawn to the covenant at Sinai. That was the OT sacrifice which especially corresponds in its position and efficacy to the position and efficacy of the death of Christ. By it there was solemnly established a relation of friendship between God and His people, once for all. So for all believers Christ's one sacrifice avails to make them the people and children of God. As the slaying of animals, according to a well-understood language, gave sacredness to the older covenant, so the dying of the Saviour gave greater sacredness to a greater covenant. But these descriptions of the efficacy of Christ's death also refer, as does the prophecy of Jeremiah, to the taking away of sin, to which there was no reference in the Old Covenant. Moreover, the words, 'Take, eat,' 'Drink ye all of it,' taken along with Jn 6⁵³⁻⁵⁷, introduce in sacrificial language the thought of fellowship with God. Consecration is the other side of reconciliation (Ex 29^{15, 33}). 'We have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin' (1 Jn 1⁷). So in Hebrews, from the words 'Let us come boldly' (4¹⁰) to 'Let us draw near' (10²²), the whole matter of our salvation is pictured under the form of access into the happy condition of being at peace with God (cf. Ro 5^{1, 2}), which was given under the Mosaic law by the covenant sacrifice, and continued by the sacrifices that were commanded; but for us this has been obtained once for all by Christ (He 10¹⁰), and remains ours as we abide in Him. It is understood that more had to be done in the fulness of time to assure God's people of His favour than sufficed for that when they came out of Egypt. Now, they had a conscience of sin. This the Law had produced (Gal 3^{19, 43}). Accordingly, in the New Covenant provision was made for the remission of sin, for redemption, for propitiation (Ro 3^{24, 25}, 1 Jn 4¹⁰). Even while the Apostles are setting aside the sacrifices of the OT, they can express the work of Christ in no other than sacrificial language. There was something in the sacrifices for sin that could not be set aside. Thus, to meet the displeasure of God witnessed by an accusing conscience (Ro 2¹⁵) or by experience of the state of the world (1¹⁸), there was need of 'that which is in Christ Jesus, whom God set forth as a propitiation by his blood' (3²⁴).

In the last chapter of Hebrews the fate of the sin-offering is made into a parable of the state of believers (He 13¹⁰⁻¹⁶). They do not rest in the enjoyment of God's favour in this world, as the Jewish worshippers rejoiced before God and feasted on their peace-offerings. This is not our rest. Here we have no rest. We are not of the world, as Christ is of the world. But the sin-offering was burned 'in a clean place' without the camp (Lv 4²²), and it was most holy. The place where it was consumed by fire was made a holy altar by it. So not in a worldly but in a spiritual manner those who go out unto Jesus without the world, find the highest, happiest enjoyment of God; Christ Himself by His sacrifice, life and death is their Temple, and there they offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually.

5. Finally, the sacrifices of the OT do not cover in analogy the whole of the Saviour's work. The Epistle to the Hebrews employs the priesthood of Christ, as well as His sacrifice, to set forth all He is to us. Moses and Joshua and Aaron and Melchizedek were imperfect anticipations of Christ, besides the sacrifices. In Is 53 the prophet is compelled to go beyond his sacrificial parable, and to say, 'By his stripes we are healed,' 'He shall see of the travail of his soul.' The lamb could give its life, but it needs a human representative of the Saviour to show His priestly sympathy and responsibility and sufferings. And this being so, no doubt the decided preference of Scripture and of Christian feeling for dwelling rather on the sacrifices than on the men who were anticipations of Christ, is because it is so supremely important that Christ should be seen to stand alone among men, no one near Him. A prophet may be a man of God, but Christ is the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world,—that to God may be all the glory of man's redemption. See also the preceding article.

SADDUCEES.—1. Derivation and use of the name.—It seems impossible to attain certainty as to the derivation of the name 'Sadducees' (Σαδδου- כֹּהֲנִים; סַדְדֻסִּים). Formerly it was supposed to be connected with the adjective zaddik, 'righteous'; but this derivation is now generally given up, for philological and other reasons. No explanation can be given of the change from i to u: and the Sadducees were never regarded, either by themselves or by others, as specially righteous. In more recent times the commonly accepted derivation is from the proper name Zadok; but neither is this without its difficulties. The doubling of the d is not well accounted for, and the problem as to which Zadok gave name to the party is one upon which there is considerable difference of opinion. Many hold that it was Zadok the priest, the contemporary of David and Solomon (2 S 8¹⁷ 15²⁴, 1 K 1¹ 2² etc.), whose posterity officiated in the Temple down to the time of the Exile, and even formed the chief element of the post-exilic priesthood; but Kuenen says this conjecture is 'burdened with insurmountable difficulties' (Religion of Israel, iii. p. 122). A Jewish legend states that it was a disciple of Antigonus of Socho, named Zadok; but this is almost universally admitted to have no historical foundation. To solve the difficulty, Kuenen and Montet postulate a Zadok, 'perhaps a contemporary of Jonathan the Asmonean' (Kuenen, l.c.), from whom the name may have been derived; but this, again, is purely hypothetical. Yet another suggestion is offered by A. E. Cowley (art. 'Sadducees' in the EB), that the word may have been of Persian origin, connected with zindik, which is used in a general sense for 'infidel.' The suggestion is interesting, but is put forward 'with great diffidence' by its author.

But however uncertain the derivation may be, there is no dubiety about the application of the name 'Sadducees.' It is always used to designate the political party of the Jewish aristocratic priesthood from the time of the Maccabees to the final fall of the Jewish State. The chief authorities for its use are the NT, Josephus, and portions of the Mishna. It is important to note that, while any one, whatever his rank or station, could be a Pharisee, no one could be a Sadducee unless he belonged to one of the high-priestly or aristocratic families. It was not enough to be a priest. There was as great a distance between the higher and lower orders of the priesthood as between the aristocracy and the common people.

2. Outline of history.—From the beginning of the Grecian period of Jewish history, and even before that time, the whole conduct of political affairs was in the hands of the priestly aristocracy. Influenced by Hellenic culture, they sympathized to some extent with the policy of Antiochus Epiphanes which provoked the Maccabean rebellion; and although, as a consequence, they fell into the background during the earlier period of Hasmonæan rule, they recovered their position in the time of John Hyrcanus, under whom we find them, now known as Sadducees, in direct antagonism to the Pharisees, or party of the scribes. These for a short time acceded to power under Alexandra, but immediately afterwards the Sadducees came again to the front. In the Roman period their power was considerably diminished, in this respect that while they were able to retain the high offices for themselves, they were compelled to adopt the policy of the Pharisees, who had an overwhelming influence with the people. The high priests at the head of the Sanhedrin were Sadducees, but they were always in a minority; though essentially a political party, they had apparently no independent existence apart from Jerusalem and its Temple, and with the fall of the Jewish State they disappear entirely from history.

3. Special characteristics.—The chief outstanding feature of the Sadducees was probably their conservatism. They stood by the established position, held by the old points of view, and rejected everything that partook of the nature of novelty. They were priests, but priests of aristocratic family, and, as such, their duties were political as well as religious. Brought into close contact with their Gentile rulers, their political interests tended to thrust the religious into the background. Their aim was the welfare of the State as a secular institution, rather than the purity of the nation as a religious community. As sober, practical statesmen, representative of moderate Jewish opinion, they entertained no extravagant notions of the coming high position or brilliant future of Israel. And being themselves in comfortable circumstances, they were satisfied with the present, and felt no special need of a future rectification in the interests of justice. The intellectual standpoint of the Sadducees seems to have been mainly negative. They were characterized chiefly by their denial of certain doctrines, and had no positive religious or theological system of their own. They stood in most things in direct opposition to the Pharisees, yet in an opposition which involved no fundamental principle, but into which they had been driven by their historical development.

The leading difference between the two parties is to be found in this, that the Sadducees held by the written Law, and rejected the Pharisaic tradition. It is not, however, correct to say that the Sadducees acknowledged only the Pentateuch and rejected the rest of the OT. Kuenen even maintains that they accepted the Oral Tradition, 'in so far as this was already established when they constituted themselves a party' (Rel. of Israel, iii. p. 144). Schürer says that they agreed with the Pharisees on some—perhaps many—particulars of the tradition, but 'only denied its obligation, and reserved the right of private opinion' (HJP II. ii. 38). A number of minor differences are recorded in Rabbinical literature, of which full accounts will be found in Schürer, or in art. 'Sadducees' in Hastings' DB. The Sadducees are stated to have been more severe in penal legislation, adhering more strictly to the letter of the Law; and in questions of ritual, while admitting the principle of Levitical purification, they ridiculed the Pharisees for the absurdities of their traditional regulations. It has been maintained that the attitude of the Sadducees was largely determined by their desire to magnify the importance of the priesthood; but Schürer denies that any such motive can be traced. Probably they felt that the Pharisees vitiated the Law by their self-contradictions, and that only by an adherence to what was definite and authentic could the system be conserved according to which alone God could be rightly worshipped.

The distinctive Sadducean doctrines are usually classed under three heads:—(1) They denied the resurrection, personal immortality, and retribution in a future life. So far they merely stood by the old Hebrew position, and from their materialistic and worldly point of view they felt no need of a future life to compensate for the inequalities of the present. In the same spirit they also renounced the entire Messianic hope, at least in the form then current. (2) They denied the existence of angels and spirits. This was scarcely the position of the OT, but their worldly common sense and general culture were bound to prejudice them against the fantastic products of the Pharisaic imagination in the wild extravagances of its angelology and demonology. (3) They denied foreordination and the supremacy of fate, and upheld the freedom of the human will, maintaining 'that good and evil are at the choice of man, who can do the one or the other at his discretion.' This is quite in keeping with the rest of their views. They felt no special need of a Divine Providence to order their life, and claimed that whatever they possessed was due to their own efforts. Generally it may be said that, after the manner of an aristocracy, they resented any attempt to impose on them an excess of legal strictness, and that 'advanced religious views were, on the one hand, superfluous to their self-mindness, and, on the other, inconsistent with their higher culture and enlightenment' (HJP ii. 41). Yet the distance between them and the Pharisees was not so great as it might appear. Politically at least there was no insuperable barrier. The two could sit together in the Sanhedrin, and could combine to make common cause against Jesus and to plan His destruction.

4. Relations to Jesus.—The Sadducees are not often mentioned by name in the Gospels, but it has to be remembered that, when mention is made of the chief priests, practically the same persons are referred to. Jesus did not come into the same constant antagonism with the Sadducees as with the Pharisees. For the most part they seem to have ignored Him, at least in the early part of His ministry. They joined with the Pharisees to tempt Him to show them a sign from heaven (Mt 16:1-4), and shortly afterwards He warned His disciples to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, meaning probably, so far as the Sadducees were concerned, their utterly secular spirit. They resented His action in the cleansing of the Temple, and along with the scribes and elders they demanded His authority (Mk 11:27-33), and from this time forward sought to destroy Him (v. 18). They thought of Him with the Roman power by asking 'was it lawful to give tribute to Caesar' (Lk 20:20), and they attempted to discredit His teaching by presenting to Him the problem of the woman who had been married to seven brethren, and asking whose wife she should be in the resurrection; but they only brought upon themselves discomfiture, as the Scripture foretold (Mt 22:23-34). They sat in the Sanhedrin which condemned Him, and with the others mocked Him upon the cross. Their opposition to Christian doctrine did not cease with the death of Jesus. There is no record of any Sadducee being admitted into the Christian Church, and before long they were merely a memory, hazy and indistinct.

SADOC.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Mt 1:14).

SAINTS.—The word 'saints' (οἱ ἅγιοι) occurs in the Gospels in Mt 27:52 only. Elsewhere in the NT it is never used of any but Christians (e.g. Ac 9:13, Ro 12:13, Rev 11:18). In the LXX (Dn 7:23, 25, 27, 8:24) ἅγιοι is the equivalent of קדשים 'the holy ones' (i.e. angels). The root idea seems to be that of 'separation,' so that a 'saint' is one who is separated, consecrated, one who belongs to God. Its occurrence in Mt 27:52 opens up the entire question of the meaning of the section. The incident is peculiar to the First Gospel, and occurs in the course of the narrative of our Lord's crucifixion and death. It is stated that at the moment of His death there was a supernatural earthquake which caused the tombs to be opened, and that immediately following His resurrection on the first day of the week many bodies (σώματα) of dead saints arose from their graves, and the persons (ἐξελθόντες, masc.) thus raised from the dead appeared in the city of Jerusalem to many. Several theories have been put forward to account for this remarkable statement.

1. It is said to be an interpolation. In reply, it is argued that the textual evidence of MSS and Versions is exactly the same for this passage as for the rest of the First Gospel. It is also urged that the incident seems plainly referred to as early as Ignatius (Ep. ad Magn. 9).

2. It is said to be a legendary addition. It is thought that the graves were rent by an earthquake which actually occurred, and that then this statement was subsequently added as a spiritual explanation of the natural phenomenon. Bruce (EGT, in loc.) says: 'We seem here to be in the region of Christian legend.' Meyer takes the same general view. Those who oppose this view argue that textual considerations give no indication of a later addition, and that the writer of the First Gospel evidently believed in the incident, and wished his readers to do the same.

3. It is accounted for as a wrong explanation of incidents which were in themselves true. Farrar (Life of Christ) suggests that these ghostly visitants were the product of the imagination of those who were impressed by the events then taking place. To this it is replied that there is no trace of it in the narrative which now is, and apparently has been from the first, an integral part of the Gospel.

4. It is explained by saying that we have in the incident a striking testimony to the supernatural character and transcendent power of our Lord's death; that the earthquake affected nature (earthquake), the Jewish economy (the rent veil), and human life (centurion), but that its influence penetrated even to the unseen world. The narrative as it stands says that it was at the moment of His death that the tombs were opened, but that the actual rising of the saints did not take place until after the Lord's resurrection. He was 'the first-fruits of them that slept.' The fact that the incident is found in one Gospel only is, it is urged, no necessary argument against its credibility. On this view, the question as to who were the saints would seem to be answered by the narrative itself. The tombs were near Jerusalem, and the fact of their opening implied in the appearance of the risen saints. The city suggests that the saints were some of those who, during their earthly life, had been led to faith in Jesus as the Messiah: godly people of the type of Anna, Simeon, Zacharias, and Elizabeth. Those who accept its genuineness fully recognize that the incident is mysterious, but they point out that the narrative as it stands is a calm, quiet statement, marked by reserve and by the absence of all legendary details. The upholders of the authenticity consider it full of spiritual meaning as to the supernatural character of our Lord's death in relation to the holy dead, holding that it was a manifestation of His power over death and the grave (1) by the resurrection of some from Hades, (2) by the clothing of them with a resurrection body, and (3) by permission to appear to those who knew them. On this theory the narrative is to be accepted as it is, and the expositors of the passage strictly adhered to without endeavouring to draw conclusions which go beyond the brief record.

SALIM.—Mentioned only Jn 3:23 'Ænon near to Salim,' to fix the place where John was baptizing, 'because there was much water there.' Scrivener's edition of the AV gives as marginal references 'Gn 33:1' or Jos 15:23, or 1 S 9:4; other editions only the last passage (where the text has Shalim, or rather Shaalim, in Heb. שַׁעֲלִים), the RV only the first (margin). It is to be noticed that the former view is also that of Jerome, in his Liber interpret. Heb. Nom., when he writes: 'Salim pugilli sive volæ aut ortus aquarum, quod brevius græce dicitur βραβοντα'; pugilli and volæ = שַׁעֲלִים. And before Jerome, Origen also explained in a similar way (on Jn 10:39, p. 543 of the Berlin ed.):

Αἰὼν ὀφθαλμοὺς βασιάνου καὶ Σαλήμ αὐτὸς ὁ ἀναβαίνων. In the Com. on 3rd the new edition has in the text Σαλήμ, but thinks in the apparatus that Σαλήμ would perhaps be better. With the view of a plural agrees the fact that most MSS spell the ending -ειμ, and not -ημ, as in the Complutensian Polyglott; the latter spelling (Σαλήμ) would favour identification with ὁ ἄνθρωπος. In the article Ἄνον (vol. i. p. 35), most of the identifications proposed for these places. We may add that Αἰνὼν ἡ ἐγγὺς τοῦ Σαλήμ is entered already on the mosaic map of Madeba on the left bank of the Jordan, and that the oldest and most explicit discussion of these sites is found in the pilgrimage of the so-called Silvia of Aquitania (or Ætheria of Spain), about 385. A special monograph was published in 1903 by C. Mommert (Ἄνον und Bethania die Taufstätten des Täufer, nebst einer Abhandlung über Salim die Königsstadt des Melchisedech, Leipzig), on which see G. H. Gilbert, AJTh vii. 777; cf., further, Κλ. Μ. Κοκκινίδης: ὁ ἐν Ἱερὺδαρὶ τόπος τῆς βαπτισμοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ τὸ μοναστήριον τοῦ ἁγίου Προδρόμου (Jerusalem, 1905); also Löhr, 'Wie stellt sich die neuere Palästinaforschung zu den geographischen Angaben des 4. Jahrhunderts?' Deutsche Evangelisch. Blätter i. 1905, 194.

When Silvia had finished Jerusalem, she wished to go 'ad regionem Ausitidem' to see 'memoria sancti Job.' It took her eight days (mansiones) from Jerusalem to Carneas: 'in quo itinere vidi super ripam Jordanis fluminis vallem pulchram satis et amenam, abundantem vineis et arboribus, quoniam aquae multae ibi erant et optimae satis. Nam in ea valle vicus erat grandis qui appellatur nunc Sedima. In eo ergo vico, qui est in media planitie positus, in medio loco est monticulus non satis grandis, sed factus sicut solent esse tumbar, sed grandis: ibi ergo in summo ecclesia est.' She inquires after the place, and receives the answer: 'haec est civitas regis Melchisedech, quae dicta est ante Salim, unde nunc corrupto sermone, Sedima appellatur ipse vicus.' For further details, amongst which is the statement that when people dig for foundations of new buildings, they find 'aliquod et de argento et aramento modica fructus', the reader is referred to Silvia. She then remembered that in the Bible it was written: 'Baptizasse sanctum Johannem in Enon juxta Salim.' Therefore she inquired also after Enon, and was shown the place 'in ducentis passibus . . . hortum pomarium valde amenum, ubi ostendit nobis in medio fontem aquae optimae satis et purae, qui a semel integrum fluvium dimittebat. Habebat autem ante se ipse fons lacum, ubi parebat fuisse operatum sanctum Johannem baptistam. Tunc dixit nobis ipse sanctus presbyter: In hodie hic hortus aliter non appellatur graeco sermone nisi cepos tu agni Iohanni, id est quod vos dicitis latine "hortus sancti Iohannis" (for further particulars, see again the text). Going on for some time 'per vallem Jordanis super ripam fluminis ipsius,' the traveller sees after a little the town of the holy prophet Elia, 'id est Thesbe,' where his cave is, and also 'memoria sancti Gethae,' of whom we read in the Books of the Judges, (this is, of course, Jephthah, and not Gad, as has been suggested by Mommert).

This localization of the two places agrees exactly with the statement of Eusebius that Enon was 8 miles south from Scythopolis (see vol. i. p. 35, and supply from the Berlin ed. p. 152, the reference to Procopius, who helps to fill up the lacuna in the Greek text with Σαλονυπας, just as Jerome reads). But instead of seeking the place west of the Jordan at Sheikh Salim, Mommert now seeks Enon east of it at Ain Djirm ('well of the leprosy'), at the foot of the hill 'Scharabul,' as he spells it, or 'Scharhabul,' as it is spelt on the map of Fischer-Guthe, opposite to Tell Ridhgah, with which it has been identified hitherto.

We thus get the following identifications: (1) Tell Ridhgah, (2) Sharabul, (3) Salim east of Nablus, (4) Wady Salim near Anata, (5) Ain Karim, (6) Shilhim in the Negeb. A definite result has not been reached as yet; the identity of Enon and Bethany (Jn 1st RV) is not improbable.

SALMON.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Mt 1st, Lk 3rd [RV in Salu]).

SALOME (Gr. Σαλώμη, possibly shortened from Heb. שְׁלֹמִי'ל Shēlōmī'el, or the name = שְׁלֹמִי Shēlōm with Gr. termination).—1. The daughter of Herodias, mentioned (although not by name) in Mt 14th, Mk 6th. See HEROD in vol. i. p. 722^a, and HERODIAS.

2. The mother of James and John, and wife of Zebedee (Mk 15th 16th; cf. Jn 19th, Mt 20th 27th). In St. Matthew's account of the ambitious request of the sons of Zebedee, she is represented as coming with her sons and prostrating herself before Jesus. St. Mark does not mention her in this connexion. She was one of the women who followed our Lord and ministered to Him (ἡκολούθουν αὐτῷ καὶ διεκόνουν αὐτῷ, Mk 15th), and was present at the Crucifixion. Along with Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James the Little, she came after the Sabbath was over, bringing fragrant oils (ἀρώματα, μύρα [Lk 23rd]) with which to anoint the body of Jesus. In the narrative of St. John there are mentioned as present at the Crucifixion (standing 'by the cross') 'his mother and his mother's sister, Mary of Clopas and Mary Magdalene.' It has been argued by some that three women only are here mentioned, and that the words 'Mary of Clopas' are explanatory of 'his mother's sister.' Most of the more recent commentators, however, notably Westcott ('St. John' in Speaker's NT Commentary, p. 275), hold that four women are meant, and that 'his mother's sister' is Salome. The following considerations seem fairly conclusive in favour of this latter view: (1) it is most unlikely that two sisters in a private family should bear the same name; (2) the parallelism of his mother and his mother's sister; (3) 'the circuitous manner of describing his own mother is in character with St. John's manner of describing himself' (W. L. Bevan in Smith's DB, art. 'Salome'); (4) the Peshitta inserts 'and' before Mary of Clopas; (5) Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James the Little (who is certainly the same as Mary of Clopas), and Salome are mentioned by St. Matthew and St. Mark as present. The supposition that Salome = 'his mother's sister' harmonizes St. John's account with that of St. Matthew and St. Mark.* See also art. CLOPAS, MARY.

LITERATURE.—Besides the authorities quoted in the article, see Wieseler, SK, 1840, p. 648 ff.; art. 'Salome' in Hastings' DB (cf. art. 'Herod,' ib.), in Encyc. Bibl., and in Herzog's PRE; Commentaries of H. A. W. Meyer (Eng. tr. 1889), Alford, and Luthardt (on St. John's Gospel, iii. Eng. tr. 1889), where, against his former view, he identifies Salome with 'his mother's sister'.

H. W. FULFORD.

SALT (ἅλας).—Salt has been used from very early times to season and preserve food. In Palestine there was always a plentiful supply. The chief sources were (and are) the great rock-salt cliffs known as the Khasm Usdum to the S.W. of the Dead Sea, and the marshes and pools around its shores. The cliffs are from 30 to 60 feet high, and stretch from 6 to 7 miles along the coast. In the

* Epiphanius (Her. lxxviii. 8) says that Salome was a daughter of Joseph, and Nicephorus Callistus (HE ii. 3) makes her Joseph's wife. These traditions, at any rate, indicate a belief in some connexion between Salome and the house of Joseph.

Bible this sea is sometimes called the 'salt sea' (Gn 14³, Dt 34⁷). Three lbs. of its water are said to yield 1 lb. of solid salts.

In addition to its common use as a condiment or preservative of food, salt from early times had religious and social significance. As a fitting emblem of holiness it was habitually offered along with the sacrifice (cf. Lv 2³). The preservative qualities of salt probably led to its being regarded as an essential element in the making of any enduring covenant (cf. Lv 2¹³, Nu 18¹⁷, 2 Co 13⁵). As a sacrificial meal was usually celebrated in connexion with the making of a covenant, the salt of the meal naturally became the salt of the covenant. Among Eastern peoples, 'to eat of his salt' is a sign of enduring friendship and peace. The Arabs use the phrase 'there is salt between us' as expressing the fact that a bond of loyalty is in existence (cf. Ezr 4¹⁴).

In the Gospels, salt is used for the most part metaphorically: (1) As an emblem of preservation from corruption. 'Ye are the salt of the earth' (Mt 5¹³). The new spiritual life of the disciples was to purify and preserve the life of the world. Jesus solemnly warns them against the danger of losing the power which would enable them to fulfil this function, 'for if the salt have lost its savour ('become saltless,' Mk 9⁵⁰), wherewith shall it be salted?' (Mt 5¹³ || Lk 14³⁴). (2) There is also a suggestion of salt as a symbol of concord in the exhortation, 'Be ye salted yourselves, and be at peace one with another' (Mk 9⁵⁰); for it is given in connexion with disputes or discussions as to which of the disciples should be the greatest (Mk 9³³⁻³⁷). These disputings may also be connected with the influences which render:

(3) As a symbol of incorruption in connexion with sacrifice. In Mk 9⁴⁹ the words pāsa θυσία ἀλὶ ἀλσθησεται are omitted by Tischendorf, WH, and Nestle, following MSS $\alpha\beta\lambda\alpha$. The words in the text thus adjusted (pās γὰρ πυρὶ ἀλσθησεται) have been translated 'for every one shall be salted by fire' (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 121), and 'for every one shall be salted with fire' (RV). The latter is almost certainly the right translation, since 'with fire' (πυρὶ) takes the place of 'with salt' (ἀλὶ), as indicating the new spiritual element which was to be present in the sacrificial life of the disciples. In the old economy every sacrifice was to be salted with salt, and would not be accepted without it; so in the new economy, the 'living sacrifice' of the Christian disciple will not be rightly prepared without the 'fire' which alone makes it acceptable. As the old sacrifices were prepared with salt, so the new sacrifices must be prepared with fire. The fire is most probably to be interpreted as the fire of judgment, as in the verse immediately preceding ('where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched,' Mk 9⁴⁸). There is a twofold judgment by fire. It may be Divine and penal (Mk 9⁴⁸), or personal and corrective (cf. 'If we would judge ourselves we should not be judged,' 1 Co 11³¹). The previous context interprets the personal, salutary judgment by fire, by which the life is to be prepared as an acceptable sacrifice: 'If thy hand offend thee, cut it off; it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched' (cf. Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁷). Swete (St. Mark, ad loc.) interprets the fire of the Christian life as the Holy Spirit, but fire as a symbol of the Spirit is not found in Mark. It may, however, be said that no self-judgment will be complete, or sufficient, unless it is carried through under the influence of the Holy Spirit.

JOHN REID.

SALUTATION.—See GREETINGS.

SALVATION.—The Gospel usage of this word is closely connected with that of OT.

The corresponding Heb. words are derivatives of יָשַׁע and נָצַח. Of the former, the Niphal and Hiphil are found in the verb; of noun forms יִשְׁעָה or יִשְׁעָה, יִשְׁעָה, יִשְׁעָה, and some proper names, of which the most important is יְהוֹשֻׁעַ 'Jehovah is salvation.' The root נָצַח occurs in נִצְחָוֹת Hiphil of the verb; its only noun-derivative is נִצְחָוֹת, Est 4¹⁴. The fundamental meaning of יָשַׁע appears to be 'enlargement,' whence the notion of 'deliverance' naturally springs, the same association of ideas being observed in the use of 'compression,' 'confinement' as figures for 'distress.' So far as the verbal forms of both roots are concerned, the idea of 'saving' is entirely negative, that of deliverance from some evil, no reflexion being passed upon favourable.

A negative sense is very clear in such cases where the positive results of the saving act are named as something additional. From other words denoting deliverance 'to save' is distinguished by the constant presence of two elements, that of a delivering agent, and that of an active interposition on his part for the removal of actual evil or peril. For mere 'preservation' or mere 'escape' other words are used: 'healing' also שָׁלַם different terms; cf. Gn 45⁷ 47²⁵, Ex 17⁷, Jer 48⁶, Job 26⁸. The evil from which salvation takes place varies; in most cases it is that of Israel by its enemies; sometimes, though not always, it appears in the acute form of individual or national disaster (Ps 68¹⁹⁻²⁰). While the noun-forms frequently have the same negative meaning as the verb, they pass over more readily into the positive sense, so that the act of deliverance becomes the point of view of favour, blessing, and prosperity.

Salvation comes to mean 'victory' (1 S 14⁴⁵, 2 S 19², 2 K 5¹, Is 60¹⁸). 'Salvation' becomes synonymous with other positive terms like 'righteousness,' 'blessing,' 'light' (Is 45⁸ 46¹³ 49⁶ 61¹⁰ 62¹, Ps 24⁵ 106⁴). In the Prophets and the Psalter it obtains an eschatological character, and stands as one of the terms for the great blessing of the future and the final blessedness to follow (Is 12² 45⁷ 25⁴⁹ 49⁶ 51⁶ 52⁷ 56¹, Jer 23³³ 33¹⁶, Mic 7⁷, Hab 3¹⁸, Ps 147³⁵ 74¹² 85⁸ 93³ 109²⁷ 118¹⁵ 24). The religious importance of the conception in the OT springs not so much from the nature of the evil removed, or from the nature of the blessedness bestowed, as rather from the fact that salvation, of whatever nature, is a work of Jehovah for His people, a Divine prerogative; hence the frequently occurring statements that salvation belongs to Jehovah, is of Jehovah, that Jehovah is salvation, the Saviour of Israel (1 S 17³⁵, 2 Ch 20⁷, Is 12² 33², Ps 38⁶² 118¹⁵ 24). In so far as salvation is valued not merely from the point of view of its benefits for man, but as a pledge of the Divine favour, the idea becomes spiritualized in principle. Besides, in so far as all national calamities in the history of Israel have a religious and moral character, it is felt that every act of salvation must have for its antecedent a change in the people's spiritual condition (Is 32² 24). In a few passages the conception is directly transferred from the national-political to the purely religious sphere, being then named as the evil from which Israel or the individual is saved (Lk 3², Ps 51¹⁴).

The LXX renders the Heb. verbs by σώζειν, the nouns by σωτηρία and σωτήριον. These words, however, are likewise used to render Heb. terms of a different shade of meaning, and thus to a large extent the nice distinction of the original between 'salvation' specifically so-called and such more general terms is obscured. Thus σώζειν stands for יָשַׁע Niphal, Piel, and Hiphil, frequently in the Passive for mere 'escape,' also for forms of נָצַח and יָשַׁע. On the other hand, σώζειν never bears in the LXX the specific sense of 'healing' (Jer 17¹⁴).

In the Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphical writings the usage does not vary much from that of the OT; cf. Sir 51¹² (ἡ σωτηρία), Wis 10⁷, Jth 9¹¹, En 48⁷ (of 'the Son of Man'), 'in his name are they being saved, and he is the God of their life' 50⁸ (eschatological-negative, mere salvation without glory) 63⁸, 4 Ezr 6²² 7¹³ 9¹² 12²⁴ 13²⁶ 45⁶ (the righteous shall be satisfied with salvation in connexion with the Messiah), Ps-Sol 62¹⁰⁸ 126¹²⁶, Bar 42²⁴ 24²⁹, Test. Jud. 22, Test. Dan 5, Test. Napht. 8, Jub 23²⁹, 1 Mac 4⁸⁰ 9⁹, 4 Mac 11⁷ 15⁴ ('piety which saves unto eternal life') 15⁷. In most of these passages the conception is eschatological-positive, and in many of them it has reference to the issue of the Last Judgment, wherein lies a transition from the OT to the NT usage. There is also an advance in this, that in a couple of instances the act of salvation is connected with the Messiah.

In the Gospels σώζειν occurs 54 times (not counting Lk 17³³, where ζωογονήσει is better attested than σώσει of the TR, nor Mt 18¹¹, a verse omitted by the best authorities). The noun σωτηρία occurs 5 times (not counting αἰώνιος σωτηρία in the rejected shorter conclusion of Mk.)—Lk 1⁶⁹ 7¹⁷ 19⁹, Jn 4²².

τὸ σωτήριον is found twice—Lk 2³⁰ 3⁶. Of the instances of this use of the verb lā relate to the deliverance from disease or demoniacal possession—Mt 9²¹, 22 bis, Mk 5²³, 28, 34 6⁵⁶ 10³², Lk 8³⁶, 48, 50 17¹⁹ 18⁴², Jn 11¹²; in 20 instances the reference is to the rescue of physical life from some impending peril or instant death—Mt 8²⁵ 14³⁰ 16²⁵ 27⁴⁰, 42 twice, 49, Mk 3⁴ 8³⁵ 15³⁰, 31 bis, Lk 6⁹ 9²⁴, 56 23³⁵ bis 37, 39, Jn 12²⁷; in the remainder of cases, 20 times, the reference is to religious salvation technically so called—Mt 1²¹ 10²² 19²⁵ 24¹³, 22, Mk 8³⁵ 10²⁶ 13¹³, 20 16¹⁶, Lk 7⁵⁰ 8¹² 9²⁴ 13²³ 18²⁶ 19¹⁰, Jn 3¹⁷ 5³⁴ 10⁹ 12⁴⁷. The noun σωτηρία is used twice in the OT sense of deliverance from the enemies of Israel—Lk 1⁶⁹, 71; and 3 times in the more specifically religious sense—Lk 1⁷⁷ 19⁹, Jn 4²². τὸ σωτήριον in Lk 2³⁰ has the same distinctly religious associations; in 3⁶ it stands in a quotation from Is 40⁶, where the meaning is eschatological from the OT point of view.

1. First we examine the passages relating to the deliverance from diseases or demoniacal possession. The question is whether the import of σώζειν here is exhausted by the notion of 'healing.' The Greek word has this meaning, being connected with σῶς (saos), 'whole,' 'sound,' therefore σώζειν = 'to render whole, sound.' The AV accordingly renders in most of these cases 'to make whole' or 'be whole,' in two 'to heal' (Mk 5²³, Lk 8³⁶), in one 'to do well' (Jn 11¹²), and only once 'to save' (Lk 18⁴²). In one instance it offers 'to save' as a marginal reading for 'to make whole' (Mk 10⁵²). RV everywhere follows the rendering of AV except that it makes the two passages where the latter has 'to heal' and the one passage where it has 'to save' uniform with the others; further, that it renders in Jn 11¹² 'to recover,' and that it offers in all passages except Mk 6⁵⁶ the marginal alternative 'to save.' It should be noted that on other occasions the Evangelists use, and make Jesus use, different words, whose import is restricted to 'healing' in the medical sense, and that not only where the object is some disease or disability, but also with a personal object; so θεραπεύειν (Mt 4²³, 24 8⁷, 16 9³⁵ 10¹, 8 12¹⁰, 15 14¹⁴ 15³⁰ 17¹⁶, 18 19² 21¹⁴, Mk 1³⁴ 3², 10, 15 6⁵, 13, Lk 4²³, 40 5¹⁵ 6⁷, 18 7²¹ 8², 43 9¹, 6 10⁹ 13¹⁴ 14³, Jn 5¹⁰) and ἰάσθαι (Lk 6¹⁹ 9², 11, 42 14³ 22⁶¹, Jn 4⁴⁷). The question is not, of course, whether the element of 'healing' as a connotated idea should be entirely eliminated from σώζειν. Not only would this have been impossible to a Greek speaker or writer in cases where the saving act as a matter of fact consisted in or involved healing, but it is also excluded by the observation that Jesus more than once referred to His saving work as the work of a physician, and in the instruction to His disciples spoke also of it as 'healing' (Mt 9¹² 10¹, 8 13¹⁵, Mk 2¹⁷, Lk 4¹⁸ 5³¹ 9¹, 2 10⁹). The only point at issue is whether the Evangelists are aware of a difference between statements where 'healing' is designated as such, and other statements where 'healing' is implied, but where for a certain purpose it is characterized as 'saving.'

The data above cited show that this last question must be answered in the affirmative. In view of the fact that Aramaic lies behind the Greek form of the words of Jesus or the Evangelists, we shall also have to assume a clearly marked difference between the two sets of cases. The additional element which the use of σώζειν introduces into the situation is that of deliverance from the sphere or power of death. In Mk 3⁴, Lk 6⁹, while speaking of His healing work, our Lord contrasts σώζειν with ἀποκτείνειν, which implies that He regarded it as the opposite of 'killing,' i.e. as rescuing from death and restoring to life. According to Mk 5²³, the purpose of 'being saved' is 'to live.' In Lk 7³ διασώζειν, the use of the preposition marks the process as a transition from death to life. It is true that in some instances the disease or infirmity from which Jesus saves is not fatal in itself, e.g. the withered hand (Mk 3⁴), the issue of blood (5²⁸). Certainly some of the diseases of 6⁵⁶, blindness (10²). Still even here the act of saving is viewed not from a medical point of view, but from the religious point of view, according to which all disease and infirmity lie on the side of death, so that it belongs to the function of one who delivers from death to work deliverance from these consequences of sin and precursors of death likewise.

This is further confirmed by the general interpretation Jesus puts upon His healing miracles as ἐκ τῶν πνευμάτων ἀκαθάρτων ἐκβάλλειν (Mt 12²⁸, Lk 11²⁰). With regard to the casting out of demons, the correctness of this view is vouched for by the explicit statement (Mt 12²⁸=Lk 11²⁰). But it applies equally well to the other miracles of healing. Jesus did not look upon these as works of philanthropy merely, or as signs authenticating His mission primarily. While the latter was one of the purposes for which they were intended—and this is brought out prominently in the Fourth Gospel—in the Synoptics, where Jesus' teaching is centred in the Kingdom-idea, the miracles are before all else signs of the actual approach of the Kingdom,—proofs that the saving power of God, which calls the Kingdom into being, is already in motion, and therefore so many instances of σώζειν. Jesus' saving power is simply the Kingdom-power applied to the individual under the influence of sin and death. Thus only can we naturally explain the fact that, where 'salvation' has a direct religious reference, both in our Lord's own and in the later Apostolic teaching, the close connexion between it and the ideas of death and life is unmistakable. If this religious usage is at all dependent on the physical aspect of our Lord's saving activity, it can be only through the common element of victory over sin and death. Jesus Himself has sufficiently indicated the connexion between the two, both in the Synoptical sayings and in the Johannine discourses. In the former the physical evils, which the saving Kingdom-power removes, have a moral and spiritual background. Hence Jesus makes such physical salvation the occasion for suggesting and working the profounder change by which the bonds of sin are loosed, and the rule of God set up in the inner life of man. The external and the internal are significantly placed side by side as co-ordinated halves of an identical work (Mk 2⁹). And in the Fourth Gospel we are explicitly told that the physical acts are intended to point to corresponding spiritual transactions; the healing of the blind, the raising of the dead, are symbolic of Jesus' saving work in the spiritual sphere (5¹⁴, 19-29 9³, 39 12²⁵, 26). On three occasions our Lord has brought out the spiritual significance of the physical salvation by calling special attention to its dependence on the exercise of faith: the woman with the issue of blood (Mk 5³⁴=Mt 9²²=Lk 8⁴⁸), the blind man near Jericho (Mk 10⁵²=Lk 18⁴²), one of the lepers (Lk 17¹⁹). The words 'thy faith has saved thee' are on these occasions the same as were used in such a case of purely spiritual salvation as is recorded Lk 7⁵⁰. They were intended as a suggestion that faith, which had yielded such results in the physical sphere, could be made equally fruitful in the sphere of spiritual salvation. Thus the external and internal are linked together by the common factor of faith.

That σώζειν has to do with the contrast of life and death becomes plain also from those instances of its natural use where deliverance from evil other than disease or demon-possession is referred to, for here everywhere the evil is that of physical death (Mt 8²⁵ 14³⁰ 16²⁵ 27⁴⁰, 42, 49, Mk 8³⁵ 13³⁰, 31, Lk 9²⁴, 56 23³⁵, 37, 39, Jn 12²⁷).

2. In connexion with the directly religious use in the Gospels several questions emerge. (1) Is the saving act, when belonging to the spiritual sphere, still viewed as a translation from death into life, and what is the meaning of death and life as related to salvation in this sphere? (2) Is the deliverance conceived eschatologically, as something to be experienced in the Last Day, or as an experience already attainable in this present life? (3) Is the conception negative or positive, or both negative and positive, i.e. does it express merely the removal of spiritual evil, or also the bestowal of positive spiritual blessings, especially the gift of life in a positive, pregnant sense?

(1) The answer to the first question is that spiritual salvation still revolves around the contrast between life and death, and that in a twofold sense. Both as subjective and as objective states, death and life come under consideration here. In other words: Jesus saves from spiritual death as a condition of the soul, and He saves from eternal death as a punishment awaiting the sinner. As the object of His saving activity, our Lord names τὸ ἀπολλῶν 'that which has become lost and now is lost' (Mt 10²⁴ 15²⁴ 18¹²⁻¹⁴, Lk 15⁴, 6, 8, 24 19¹⁰). From the figures used it appears that the Gr. ἀπώλεια has in this connexion the sense 'miss,' 'be missing,' not primarily the sense 'destroy,' 'be destroyed.' The 'lost' are like sheep gone astray upon the mountains, like the coin slipped out of the hand of its owner, like the prodigal who has left the father's home. A lost condition means estrangement from God, a missing of all the religious and moral relations man is bound to sustain towards his Maker. But this lost condition is further identified by Jesus with spiritual death, for of the prodigal the father declares: 'This thy brother was dead and is alive again, and was lost and is found' (Lk 15²⁴, 32). Elsewhere also the state of sin is described as a state of death (Mt 8²², Lk 20³⁸). Salvation of 'the lost,' therefore, is salvation from spiritual death. As such it includes moral-religious renewal. To the woman who had anointed Him Jesus said: 'Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace,' and this obviously repeats in another form the preceding statement, 'Thy sins are forgiven' (Lk 7⁴⁵, 50). In the case of Zacchæus also assurance of pardon is undoubtedly implied when Jesus declares 'salvation' to have come to his house (19⁹). Here, however, the salvation manifests itself also in the moral transformation of the publican, issuing directly into repentance and good works. The prodigal is pardoned and restored to the privileges of sonship. But salvation is not confined to deliverance from this subjective spiritual death, just as the conception of being 'lost' is not exhausted by estrangement from God. ἀπώλεια is used in a retributive sense in connexion with the judgment of God to which the sinner is subject; it involves exposure to objective death as a result of condemnation. With reference to this the two senses of the verb, 'to be missing' and 'to be destroyed,' are used side by side. From the point of view of man the judgment may bring a 'losing' or a 'finding,' 'keeping' of the soul or life (Mt 10³⁹ 16²⁶, Mk 8³⁵, 1, k 9²⁴, 25 17³¹, Jn 12²⁶). From the point of view of God as Judge it may bring 'destruction.' This is the ἀπώλεια, which is spoken of in Mt 5³⁰ 7¹³ 10²⁸ 18¹⁴, Lk 13³, 5, Jn 3¹⁵, 16 6³⁹ 10²⁸ 17¹³ 18⁹. The two aspects of ἀπώλεια—the subjective spiritual 'being lost' and the objective retributive 'being lost' or 'perishing'—are joined together in Mt 18¹⁰⁻¹⁴, where first the sinning one is compared to a sheep gone astray and to be sought, and then, to give the motive for this search after the subjectively lost, Jesus adds: 'Even so it is not the will of your Father who is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish' (ἀπόληται); that which is already lost in the one sense must be diligently sought, lest it should be lost in the deeper, absolute sense. And the deliverance from this final ἀπώλεια, as well as the deliverance from the other lost condition, is σώζεσθαι, σωτηρία. Thus in Mk 16¹⁶ 'to be saved' is the opposite of 'to be condemned'; in Jn 3¹⁶, 17 of 'to be judged' and 'to perish,' in 10⁹, 10 of 'to be destroyed,' in 12⁴⁷ of 'to be judged.' This ἀπώλεια, however, not less than the other 'being lost,' is related to death. It is a losing of the life (ψυχή, 16²⁵, Mk 8³⁵, Lk 9²⁴, 25, Jn 12²⁶); its opposite is 'to have eternal life' (Jn 3¹⁶ 10²⁸), or 'to be raised up at the last day' (6³⁹). Thus it appears that salvation in its specific religious sense is still viewed throughout as a deliverance from death and an introduction into the sphere of life.

(2) The second question was whether 'salvation' is conceived eschatologically or as something experienced already in this present life. It has been answered in principle by the above, for present salvation coincides with deliverance from subjective spiritual death; eschatological salvation coincides with deliverance from objective death in the Judgment. In a number of the passages already considered the reference to the present is very plain. To the woman who anointed Him Jesus addressed the words, 'Thy faith has saved thee.' Of Zacchæus He declared: 'To-day is salvation come to this house'; and in the following statement—'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost,'—the 'saving' must be of the same time as the 'seeking,' i.e. to the present time of our Lord's earthly ministry. In the 'saving' of the world for which Jesus has come is a present thing as distinct from the judging of the world for which He has not come, but which is reserved for the future. In Mt 12¹ the sins of the people being the evil from which Jesus saves, the salvation is viewed as a present one. In other passages the eschatological reference is equally obvious. 'He that endures to the end shall be saved' (Mt 10²² 24¹³). Mt 16²⁵, Mk 8³⁵, Lk 9²⁴ speak of the finding or saving of life in the future Judgment as conditioned by the willingness to sacrifice one's life here. This is clear from the context (v. 28 in Mk., v. 27 in Mt. = v. 26 in Lk).

The point of the saying is not, as often interpreted, that for one kind of life, physical life, given up, another kind of life, spiritual life, will be received in return; in which case the future tenses might be purely logical, and reference implied. The meaning is that for 1 sense, sacrificed by accepting physical death, life in the same general sense will be received in reward through the escape from death, when Jesus comes to judge and to render every man according to his deeds. As Zahn observes, the distinction between two kinds of 'life' or 'soul' is scarcely in harmony with the Hebrew point of view, according to which the 'life' or the 'soul' is frequently called 'the only one' (Comm. on Matthew, in loco).

Eschatological is also the reference in the question of the disciples recorded in Mt 19²⁵, Mk 10²⁶, Lk 18²⁶ 'Then who can be saved?' The question was called forth by Jesus' declaration, that the rich would with great difficulty enter into the Kingdom of God, which was in turn called forth by the question of the rich young man, 'What shall I do, that I may inherit eternal life?' Here 'to be saved' = 'to enter the Kingdom' = 'to inherit eternal life,' and the qualification of life as eternal, as well as the further context,—St. Peter's question about future rewards, and our Lord's answer to this,—prove that the whole discussion is eschatological in its scope. Mt 24²² || Mk 13²⁰ 'Except these days had been shortened, no flesh would have been saved,' is best understood as follows: The temptation in these last times will be so severe, that, if their duration had not been kept within certain limits, all men, even the elect, would have fallen away, and so no flesh would have been ultimately saved in the Day of Judgment.

This interpretation seems to be required by the fact that the shortening of the days is for the sake of the elect. The mere preservation of physical life could have no special bearing upon the destiny of the elect, since, even when killed in the body, they would be sure to inherit the Kingdom; the whole representation concerning the possibility of none being saved, and the shortening of the days, is, of course, from a different point of view (cf. Zahn, Com. on Matt., in WBC).

In the remainder of the passages there are no means of determining whether 'salvation' be future or present. For Mt 18¹¹ (TR only) the reference to the present is supported by Lk 19¹⁰. In Lk 8¹² 'that they may not believe and be saved,' the eschatological sense would be quite plausible, but the other view is slightly favoured by the general import of the parables dealing with the present activity of the Kingdom. In general, the conception of the Kingdom as both present and future creates a presumption in favour of the view that our Lord regarded salvation as both a present and an eschatological experience. The form σῶσθαι, 'those who are being saved,' in Lk 13²³, probably reflects the two-sidedness of the process, as belonging to both present and future, and therefore unfinished in this life. In the case of the Johannine sayings (Jn 3^{16, 17} 4²² 5²⁴ 10⁹) we shall have to assume, in harmony with the generalization of the conception of 'life,' 'eternal life,' in the discourses of this Gospel—which makes out of it a conception indifferent to the distinction between present and future—that the same will be true of the synonymous conception of salvation. The future in 10⁹ is purely logical in its force.

(3) The third question concerned what may be gathered from the Gospels in regard to the positive or negative context of the idea of religious salvation. The negative aspect—escape from death—stands in the foreground in Mt 24²², Mk 13³⁰; if the days had not been shortened, not even the elect would have escaped the fate of death in the Judgment; similarly in Mt 16²⁶, Mk 8³⁵, Lk 9²⁴: he who will sacrifice his life here shall escape the loss of life in the Judgment. Probably Mt 10²² and 24¹³ should be interpreted on the same principle: the enduring now will save from greater calamity in the Last Day. On the other hand, in Mt 19²³, Mk 10²⁶, Lk 18²⁶, where 'salvation' is equivalent to entrance of the Kingdom and inheriting of eternal life, the emphasis rests on the positive side. In the Johannine passages the positive content of the idea is very marked. According to Jn 3^{16, 17}, 'to have eternal life' and 'to be saved' are synonymous. In Jn 5²⁴ also the preceding context revolves around the idea of life (vv. 21-29), and in the sequel the same idea is again brought forward (v. 39). Again, in 10^{9, 10} 'salvation' and 'life' appear in close conjunction; 12⁴⁷ receives its interpretation from 3¹⁷. The same difference as is observable with reference to eschatological salvation may be observed where present salvation is spoken of. Sometimes the conception is negative (Mt 1²¹, Lk 7³⁰), sometimes positive as well as negative (Lk 19¹⁰); the salvation which came to Zacchaeus' house certainly included more than pardon, since it issued in renewal of life. The facts, therefore, do not bear out the contention of B. Weiss, who maintains that σῶσθαι has everywhere a purely negative meaning.

In the saying of Lk 19¹⁰ Jesus declares 'saving' to be the highest category under which His Messianic activity is to be subsumed. He came to save,

22. His entrance into the world was for this specific purpose (cf. Mk 10⁴⁵). The connexion between Him and salvation consists not merely in this, that as a preacher of the gospel He proclaims it. Everywhere the supposition is that salvation is in some way bound to His Person. For the Johannine discourses this needs no proof. But it is no less true for the Synoptics. Because He lodged with Zacchaeus, salvation entered the latter's house. The rich young man was not saved, because he refused to follow Jesus. The saving acts in the physical sphere are suspended on faith, and this faith involves trust in Jesus,—in Jesus, to be sure, as the instrument of God, but none the less so that on Jesus' Person together with God the act of faith terminates. It is psychologically inconceivable that in those who were helped by the miracles of Jesus, faith should not have assumed the form of personal trust in Him. Faith in God and faith in Jesus here inevitably coalesce. On the occasion of the storm, Jesus rebukes the disciples for their lack of confidence in His presence with them as a guarantee of absolute safety (Mt 8²⁶). Similarly Peter, when walking upon the water, calls upon Jesus to perform the saving act. From the close connexion in which these transactions stand to the specific religious salvation, it may be safely inferred that in the latter also Jesus occupies a necessary place. This is confirmed by Lk 7⁵⁰, where the woman's faith, which is declared to have saved her, consists in the attitude of trust she had assumed towards Jesus; the love shown the Lord is here the result of the forgiveness of sins (v. 47), and inasmuch as this love terminated on Jesus, the faith which conditioned the forgiveness must likewise have had Him for its object. Similarly in the discourse at Caesarea Philippi, 'salvation' in the Last Day is made dependent on following of Jesus and sacrifice of life for Jesus' sake and 'the gospel's sake, and the corresponding acknowledgment by Jesus in the Judgment (Mk 8^{34, 35, 36}, Mt. and Lk.).

It is not true, as is being frequently asserted of late, that in the gospel preached by Jesus there is no place for His own Person, it being merely a gospel about God. Though not forgotten in the Synoptics, it is in acts we find our Lord seeking to establish His personal faith between the disciple and Himself and, in Himself, with God. If only once in the Synoptics we read explicitly of faith in Jesus (Mt 8¹⁰), and that in a passage where the authenticity of the words ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου is doubtful, this is counterbalanced by the fact that not more than once God Himself is mentioned as the object of faith (Mk 11²²). Jesus, conscious of being the Messiah, the Judge at the Last Day, who would finally dispose of the destiny of all mankind, could not help ascribing a central soteriological function to His Person as He was in His own view, to the act of faith in Him, the saving transaction, which in a certain sense forestalls the Last Judgment. The absence of more direct affirmations of this principle is simply the result of Jesus' method of not directly proclaiming at first His Messianic dignity, but rather allowing it to be gradually inferred from the impression made by His Person and the witness of His works. On the basis of our present Gospel, apart from critical reconstructions of the teaching of Jesus, no other view is possible than that our Lord represented salvation as in some way bound to and wrapped up in His Person. It did not represent salvation as something unconditional, flowing simply from the love of God, which would overlook every necessity of mediation. The parable of the Prodigal Son, so often quoted to the contrary, furnishes, when rightly read, the clearest demonstration of this, for it was spoken to describe not God's attitude towards sinners in the abstract, but the historic appearance of God to lost men in the appearance of His Son Jesus. It was the attitude of Jesus towards publicans and sinners that drew forth the parable, and therefore it describes God's attitude towards them as bound to that assumed by Jesus (cf. Ernst Cremer, 'Die Gleichnisse Luk. 15 und das Kreuz' in Beitr. z. Föder. Christl. Theol. 1904, Heft 4). The gospel is not a mere announcement of the love of God unprejudiced and unattended by any action on His part; it is the glad message of the love of God in action, of what God does in Jesus to give His love effect in actual, substantial salvation. The unfolding of what the Person of Jesus as the bearer and worker of salvation contains could not be fully given by our Lord before His saving work had actually transpired, but had to be left to Apostolic teaching.

3. Humanly considered, salvation is dependent on faith. This is not merely explicitly announced

(Mk 16¹⁶, Lk 8¹², Jn 3^{16, 17}), it is likewise presupposed or expressed in connexion with the healing acts of Jesus. It is a striking fact that in the Synoptics nearly the whole of our Lord's teaching on faith attaches itself to the performance of miracles. This is because miracles embody that saving aspect of the Kingdom to which faith is the

The miracles, almost without exception, have two features in common. Firstly, they are transactions in which the result depends absolutely on the forth-putting of the Divine supernatural powers, where no human effort could possibly contribute anything towards its accomplishment. And, secondly, the miracles are healing miracles, in which the gracious love of God approaches man for his salvation. Faith is the spiritual attitude called for by this twofold element in God's saving work. It is the recognition of the Divine power and grace,—not, of course, in a purely intellectual way, but practically so as to carry with it the movement of the whole inner life. How faith stands related to the saving power of God is most clearly illustrated in the narrative of Mk 9¹⁷⁻²⁴. When the disciples could not heal the child with the dumb spirit, Jesus exclaimed, 'O unbelieving generation!' The father says, after describing the gravity of the case: 'But if thou canst do anything, have compassion on us and help us.' To this Jesus replies: 'What, if thou canst! all things are possible to him that believeth.' Faith is the key to the Kingdom. To speak, with reference to it, of 'if thou canst' is an absurdity. Thus to faith is ascribed what can be affirmed of God alone. And elsewhere also this same principle is emphasized by our Lord (Mt 21^{21, 22}, Mk 11^{23, 24}, Lk 17⁶). The explanation lies in this, that faith is nothing else than that act whereby man lays hold of, appropriates, the endless power of God. This line of reasoning, however, is not applicable to the miracles only. The miracles, as has been shown, illustrate the saving work of God in general. All salvation partakes, humanly speaking, of the nature of the impossible: it can be accomplished by God alone (Mt 19^{25, 26}, Mk 10^{26, 27}, Lk 18^{26, 27}). All genuine saving faith is as profoundly conscious of its utter dependence on God for deliverance from sin and death as the recipients of our Lord's miraculous cures were convinced that God alone could heal their bodies from disease. Faith, however, is more than belief, more than a conviction regarding the necessity and sufficiency of the Divine power. It also involves trust, the reliance upon God's willingness and readiness to save. Jesus never encouraged the exercise of faith as a mere theoretical belief in supernatural power. The performance of a sign from heaven, such as men might have witnessed without trust in God or Himself, He persistently refused. He who truly believes, realizes that God is loving, merciful, forgiving, glad to receive sinners. Faith transfers to God in the matter of salvation what human parents experience in themselves with reference to their own children, the desire to help and supply (Mt 7¹¹). This reliance of faith is not confined to the critical moments of life; it is to be the abiding, characteristic disposition of the disciple with reference to his salvation as a whole. Faith, in those on whom the wonderful cures were wrought, may have manifested itself at first as a momentary act, but, as shown above, Jesus frequently called the attention of such people to what faith had done for them, thus suggesting that it was permanently available as an instrument of salvation.

4. In proper names, the conception of 'saving' occurs twice in the Gospels, namely, in the name Jesus, and in the exclamation Hosanna. A reflexion upon the meaning of the name Joshua is found also in Sir 46¹, and in Philo, who explains it by ἁγία ἡ ψυχή (Mut. Nom. 21). The meaning of Mt 12¹ is not that 'Jesus' bears this name symbolically in illustration of the fact that 'Jehovah is salvation,' but rather that in Him Jehovah saves, or even, He is Jehovah who saves; for thus only can we satisfy the demand of the joining together of the two statements, 'I will call his name Jesus,' and 'for it is he that shall save his people from their sins.' It has been held that in the cry 'Hosanna,' raised by the people at Jesus' entrance into Jerusalem, and by the children in the Temple (Mt 21^{9, 15}), the original idea of 'saving' inherent in this word as an appeal to God to bestow salvation (Ps 118²⁵ 'Save now, we beseech thee, Jehovah'), was no longer felt by the Evangelists, and the word meant with them simply a general shout of applause to the Messianic King, equivalent to 'Hallel' or the German 'Hoch.' Dalman (Die Worte Jesu, i. 180), who takes this view, couples with it the inference that the writer of the First Gospel was not a Hebraist. The Apostle Matthew, because no Hebraist

He finds the same meaning in the Hebrew. Both Evangelists, according to him, are ignorant of the Hebrew meaning. Dalman therefore assumes that what the people actually exclaimed was the simple 'Hosanna,' and that both 'to the Son of David' and 'in the highest' are unhistorical embellishments dependent on the Greek misinterpretation of the word. Zahn, on the other hand (Comm. on Matthew, in loco), takes the view that the cry of Jesus' time already the old meaning of the Hebrew word 'Hosanna' have become obliterated, so that they already used it as a shout of praise to Jesus, in which case the Evangelists would be reporting of the occurrence. Zahn does not explain what meaning, on this view, the people could have attached to the words ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις, which in a shout addressed to Jesus would remain meaningless. In view of this, only two explanations seem possible. Either the Evangelists adhere to the older opinion that ἡ σωτὴρ is consciously addressed to God, 'save now,' and that ὡς υἱὸς Δαυὶδ introduces Jesus as the object of the salvation invoked from God (צדק, as Dalman himself observes, being sometimes construed with ל of the object—Ps 72¹ 116⁶), and that ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις designates the place from which God is called upon to bestow salvation on David. That for the expression of the latter idea ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις would have been absolutely necessary can hardly be maintained. Or we may make a distinction between the two hosannas, assuming that the former is addressed to the Son of David, the latter to God, and both not as invocations, but as ascriptions of praise. This is suggested by Lk's version (19³⁸), which resolves the ἡ σωτὴρ ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις into the paraphrase ἐν οὐρανῷ ἰσχυρῶς, καὶ δόξα ἐν ὑψίστοις. This would be a modification of Zahn's view, preferable because it does not leave the ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις unexplained.

5. To the foregoing may be added a rapid survey of the usage of σῶζειν and σωτηρία in the remainder of the NT. 'Salvation' in connexion with healing, but at the same time projected into the specific religious sphere, reappears in Ac 4^{9, 14}. That the idea in the Apostolic teaching largely revolves around the contrast between life and death, is made abundantly plain by the following passages: Ac 3¹⁵ 5³⁰ 13^{46, 47}, Ro 1¹⁶ 17, 1 Co 5², 2 Co 2^{15, 16} 7¹⁰, Ph 3²⁰, 2 Ti 1¹⁰, Tit 3⁵, He 5⁷, Ja 5^{15, 20}, 1 P 3^{20, 21}. Where the saving act is referred to a definite point of time, this is most frequently the eschatological future (Ro 13¹¹, 1 Co 3¹⁵ 5³, Ph 1²⁸, 1 Th 5², 2 Th 2¹³, He 1¹⁴ 2¹⁰ 9²⁸, Ja 5²⁰, 1 P 1^{5, 9, 10} 4¹⁸). Instances where salvation is made a matter of the past or present are Eph 2^{5, 8}, 1 Ti 2⁴, 2 Ti 1⁹, Tit 3⁵, Ja 1²¹ (?), 1 P 3²¹, Jude 21. In many connexions, however, it is not possible to determine whether the usage is eschatological or not (Ro 1¹⁶ 10¹, 2 Co 7¹⁰, Eph 1³, He 2³, Ja 2¹⁰). For this peculiar indetermination of the idea the following passages are of interest: Ac 2⁴⁷, 1 Co 1¹⁸ 15², 2 Co 2¹⁵, in all of which the present participle σῶζόμενοι, 'those who are being saved,' is found (cf. with the past participle σωσμένοι, 'those who have been and are saved,' Eph 2⁵). The negative aspect of the deliverance is on the whole not more prominent than the positive: Ac 2⁴⁰ (from this crooked generation, i.e. from the judgment which will befall it), Ro 5⁹ (from the eschatological wrath of God), Ja 5²⁰ (from death), Jude 23 (from the fire); and, on the other hand, Ac 13^{46, 47} (eternal life), 2 Co 2¹⁵ (unto life), Ph 3²⁰ (Saviour through the resurrection), Tit 3³ (palingenesia), He 1⁴ (inherit salvation), 2³ (so great a salvation), 5⁹ (eternal salvation), 1 P 1^{4, 5} (inheritance=salvation), Rev 12¹⁰ (salvation parallel with power and Kingdom), 19¹ (salvation parallel with glory and power). In 2 Ti 1¹⁰ the negative and the positive side are named together: 'our Saviour, who abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.' Salvation from sin specifically appears in Ro 11²⁸ in a quotation from the LXX of Is 59²⁰.

6. It ought to be observed that σωτηρία in the NT relates to what is ἀπολύτρωσις, and 'the application of redemption' is not from 'the imputation of redemption,' or the objective work of Christ. This is the natural result of its original eschatological significance, for what takes place in the end lies on the line of the subjective transformation of the believer.

The view has recently been advocated by Wendland (ZNTW v. [1904] 351) that the original background of the conception of σωτηρία is the rule and influence of evil spirits, of which death and disease would be only the peripheral manifestations. The facts cited above do not bear out this hypothesis, or even favour it. In the Gospels there is only one passage which applies σωτηρία to the casting out of a demon (Lk 8³⁶). In all other cases of deliverance from demoniacal possession other expressions are used. It would be far more correct to say that sin and death lie at the centre, demoniacal influence in the periphery of the conception. On the other hand, it creates an equally wrong distribution of the emphasis to conceive of our Lord's σωτηρία as in its primary aspect a species of 'healing,' and of Jesus Himself as chiefly a spiritual physician. Against Harnack, who in his work, Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, goes too far in this direction, Wagner (ZNTW vi. [1905] 23) replies, that the NT writers do not, like the Stoic philosophers, who stood under the influence of the Stoic philosophy, view sin as a disease of the soul, but as a species of death, and that Jesus is to them far more than a physician, viz. One who leads from death to life.

GEERHARDUS VOS.

SAMARIA, SAMARITANS.—1. Description.—'Samaria,' originally the name of the city built by Omri (1 K 16²⁴), became in a very short time a common name for the Northern kingdom (Am 3⁹, Jer 31⁵, 2 Ch 25¹⁸); but during the Greek period it became limited to the province of Samaria, and so in NT times it is the designation of the district that lies between Galilee and Judaea (Jn 4⁴). The limits and extent of the Samaritan territory varied from time to time (Jos. Ant. xii. iv. 1; 1 Mac 11³⁴), and it is impossible to define with absolute certainty the boundaries in Gospel days. These, however, may be known generally. We learn that Ginea—the modern Jenin—on the south edge of the plain of Esdraelon, was its northern boundary (Ant. xx. vi. 1); and this is confirmed by the fact that Caphar Outheni—now Kefr Adan—4 miles distant, was in Galilee (M. Gittin i. 5). The southern boundary is stated as 'the Acrabbene toparchy' (BJ iii. iii. 4), and a village named Anuath or Borkeas was on the border (ib.). As these have been identified with the modern villages of Akrabe and Berūkin, we conclude that this boundary ran westward to the Shephelah along Wady Ish'ar. In that case it would then naturally run eastward to the Jordan down Wady Zamar. There seems, however, good reason to fix it farther north at this point, as Karn Sarabeh seems to have been in the hands of the Jews (M. Rosh. ii. 4), unless, indeed, it was a border hill accessible alike to Jews and Samaritans. This seems the more likely, as it was the only signalling station in the neighbourhood of Samaritan territory where false lights could be kindled to deceive the Jews on the occasion of the new moons, and this the Samaritans are accused of having done (Bab. Rosh. 22b and margin). The eastern boundary was, of course, the Jordan, while the hill slopes towards the Shephelah constituted the western—the plain between Caphar Outheni and Anuath being regarded as a heathen district (Bab. Sabb. 76a). This gives us a territory of about 20 miles from north to south, and 30 from east to west.

The region consists of scattered mountain groups and rounded hills with plains between, the chief of these being Merj el-Mahna, to the east of Nablus, Merj el-Ghuruk or the plain of Sanur (a lake in the winter and spring), and the plain of Dothan, which last opens into the plain of Esdraelon. Samaria presents a striking and beautiful contrast to Judaea with its barren hills. Here they are for the most part covered with fruit trees of every kind, chief among which are the olive, the fig, the mulberry, the orange, the apricot, and the pomegranate. On the Samaritan hills great flocks of sheep and goats find pasture. The whole country is studded with villages, and the fertile plains and valleys produce rich crops of grain. Only to the east, extending along the Jordan boundary, is the country rough and broken, and the mountains, which descend precipitously to the river, naked and barren; and this they have always been (BJ iv. viii. 2). The rest of the country is well watered everywhere, and in many places it is extremely beautiful. In the early centuries the gardens of Samaria (פארטן בוכס, M. Erakhin iii. 2) were famous, and to-day the fruit orchards and beautiful gardens of Jenin are equally well known, while all must agree with Thomson (LB ii. 110) when he says: 'One may be excused for becoming somewhat enthusiastic over this pretty vale of Nablus, sparkling with fountains and streams, verdant with olive groves and fig orchards, interspersed with walnut, apple, apricot, orange, quince, pomegranate, and other trees and shrubs.' But, notwithstanding its superiority in richness and beauty to the south country, the Jews of the 1st cent. were very unwilling to admit that Samaria was part of the Holy Land. When they spoke of it they reckoned only the three lands,—Judaea, Galilee, and Peraea (M. Sheb'ith ix. 2),—always omitting Samaria, as not being Jewish soil. But even the district we have described is not to be regarded as having been at any time fully occupied by the people we call Samaritans. The name was strictly limited to the religious sect, the metropolis of which was Shechem (Ant. xi. viii. 6). There, and in many of the towns and villages, they were numerous and strong, but almost everywhere there were also Grecian settlers, and with the city of Samaria itself the Samaritans had little or nothing to do.

2. History of the Samaritans in their relationship to the Jews.—Although the Samaritans claim descent from the patriarchs (Jn 4¹²), and present us with an unbroken history, and although it is to some extent true that they represent the spirit of the tribe of Ephraim (Renan, Lang. Semit. p. 230), we must date their characteristic existence as a people only from the time of their conflicts with Ezra and Nehemiah. We regard the Samaritan statement (el-Tolidoth), that 300,000 men besides women and children were brought back from captivity in the days of Sanballat, as baseless; but, on the other hand, when Israel was carried away captive, a remnant must have been left; and that such was the case we have abundant evidence (2 K 23¹⁷⁻²⁰, Jer 41⁵). Their appearance as a community dates only from the time of their mingling with the Assyrian colonists settled in the land, and it is from the leading party amongst these that they are frequently designated Cuthæans (2 K 17²⁴). There can be no question of the accuracy of the OT narrative of the originally mixed origin of the Samaritans, but repeated accessions from Judaism (Neh 13²⁸⁻²⁹; Ant. xi. viii. 2 and 6), probably ultimately outnumbering the original colonists, and the manifest reversion to the pure Semitic type, induce us to believe that the Samaritan race has but little connexion with the Turanian colonists, and is probably now of almost as pure Hebrew blood as the modern Jew.

For their part, the Samaritans never forgave the Jews (Ezr 4^{3,4}, Neh 2²⁰), and for their attempted hindrance of that work the Jews bore the Samaritans no less a grudge. The breach became irrevocable when a rival priesthood and temple were set up on Gerizim. Jewish and Samaritan tradition agree as to the date of this event, which Josephus sets down wrongly in the time of Alexander the Great and Jaddua the high priest (B.C. 332)—one hundred years too late (Ant. XI. viii. 2); but, though his account is clearly mixed with fable, there may still be some historical basis for the extra details he gives. About B.C. 200, during the weak rule of the high priest Onias II. (d. B.C. 198), the Samaritans, being then in a flourishing condition, are accused of having harassed the Jews and carried away captives to serve as slaves (Ant. XII. iv. 1). In his account of Maccabean times Josephus continually accuses them of denying all kinship with the Jews, when they see them in suffering and difficulties, and of claiming to be Sidonians (Ant. XII. v. 5); but, on the contrary, when good fortune befalls the Jews, they claim to belong to that race, and to derive their descent from Joseph (ib. IX. xiv. 3, XI. viii. 6, XII. iv. 5). John Hyrcanus (c. B.C. 128) made an expedition against Samaria (Ant. XIII. x. 2). After repeated successes against their ally and protector Antiochus Cyzicenus, he took Samaria, ravaged the country, subdued the Cuthæans who dwelt about the temple at Gerizim, and destroyed their temple (Ant. XIII. ix. 1). During the period of unrest that followed the deposition of Antiochus (A.D. 6), the Samaritans became so aggressive that they came privately into Jerusalem by night, and, when the gates of the Temple were opened just after midnight, they entered and scattered dead men's bodies in the cloisters to defile the Temple (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1). Another incident is later recorded, which led to very serious consequences. A number of Galilean pilgrims were attacked, and many killed, at Ginea (Jenin), the first Samaritan village on the way (Ant. XX. vi. 1-3). This led to civil war for a time, then to the intervention of the Roman authorities, and ultimately to a decision in favour of the Jews by Claudius himself (A.D. 51). At a still later period we find the Jews excluding the Samaritans, as also Christians and pagans, from Capernaum, Nazareth, and Sepphoris (Epiphanius, adv. Hær. i. 11). Nor was it only in Palestine that the jealousies continued to exist. Alexander and Ptolemy Lagi had taken many Jews and Samaritans to Egypt (Ant. XI. viii. 6), and there in Alexandria we read of rivalry and disorders between them (Ant. XII. i. 1), the disputes being, as usual, regarding the relative merits of Jerusalem and Gerizim.

Jewish literature is full of manifestations of the same spirit. Ben Sira speaks of 'the foolish folk that dwell at Shechem,' and characterizes them as 'no nation' (Sir 50^{25, 26}). Josephus invariably calls them 'Cuthæans,' and will not admit—except sometimes for a purpose—that they are of Hebrew blood. The Rabbis, though hesitating to call them 'Gentiles,' use the same name. Regarding their food, we read: 'Let no man eat the bread of the Cuthæans: for he that eateth their bread is as he that eateth swine's flesh' (M. Shebhith viii. 10; Bab. Kidd. 76a). In the matter of gifts and offerings to the Temple, including the half-shekel, the Samaritan was put on the same footing as slaves and heathen (M. Ab. Zar. i. 5; Jerus. Ab. Zar. i. 4). If a Samaritan were witness to a bill of divorce, that in itself made the document invalid (M. Gittin i. 5). Rabban Gamaliel, quite in keeping with the liberal spirit he always shows (cf. Ac 5³⁸), was, however, inclined to accept such testimony, and at a later period we occasionally meet with a less bitter tone; for, while some of the Rabbis, remembering 2 K 17²⁵⁻²⁸, called them 'proselytes of the lions,' Rabbi Akiba was ready to recognize the Samaritan as a Jew (Bab. K'ith. 75b), while others said it was permitted to have dealings with one who became a true proselyte (Bab. K'ith. 75a). Samaritan wine was universally condemned, but 'the victuals of the Cuthæans are permitted if not mixed with wine or vinegar' (Jerus. Ab. Zar. v. 4); and the unleavened bread of the Cuthæans is permitted (Bab. Kidd. 76a). Although Samaria is not part of Israel, 'the land, the roads, the wells, and the Cuthæans are clean' (Jerus. Ab. Zar. v. 4). It is not permitted to circumcise a Cuthæan, but the contrary was not permitted, as it might then be done in the name of Gerizim (Jerus. Jebamoth vii. 1). It was permitted to add 'Amen' to a blessing asked by a Cuthæan, but only after hearing the whole blessing (M. Ber. viii. 8). A Samaritan is allowed if an Israelite eats from it (Bab. Cholin 3b). Samaritan literature is, on the whole, less aggressive; but that arises from the fact that we have less of it, and the greater necessity the Samaritan had to stand on the defensive. Still, in every proof they bring forward in favour of their sanctuary as the one holy place, there is implied or expressed the idea that the Jew is schismatical, if not heretical. They use the designation 'Israelite' for themselves alone, and refuse it to the Jews. Still, they have no objection to be called 'Samaritans,' which they write שומרי תורה or שומריי תורה—'Guardians of the Law.' (See Letter to Ludolf). They have an intense dislike to Jerusalem, and the bitterness of their hate culminates in their play upon its name, when they describe the Jews as אורורי שלם—'accursed to perfection' or 'perfectly cursed' (el-Tolidoth). The more moderate attitude of which we have spoken seems to have been, on the whole, later than the days of the Gospels, and may have been caused by the Samaritans having made common cause with the Jews against Vespasian (BJ III. vii. 32). At that time they shared in the dispersion, and their synagogues were then to be found in England and Rome. At the present moment the relationship between the two races is no closer than in the past. Some twenty years ago, the Samaritans, fearing the extinction of their sect, sought to arrange for intermarriage with the Jews, but this was refused.

3. Religion.—The basis of the Samaritan religion is the Pentateuch, as they read and understand it; and to this they have been as loyal as the Jews to their Law. Since long before the Christian era they have been strongly monotheistic. Not only are they the enemies of images and every visible representation of the Deity, but they have ever resented as strongly as do the Jewish Targums every anthropomorphic representation of God; and, so far as we can judge, they have made no concessions to heathenism. They were, indeed, accused by the Rabbis of worshipping a dove on Gerizim (Cholin 6a), and also of worshipping the idols Jacob buried (Gn 35⁴) under the oak of Moreh (Ber. Rab. § 81); but these were malicious falsehoods. From the Jewish point of view another offence against the Law was that they pronounced the Sacred Name Jahweh—with its own vowels (Jerus. Sanh. x. 1; Bab. Sanh. 90). Theodoret seems to confirm this, and tells us that their pronunciation was Iaβé (β=v, as in mod. Greek)—a point of interest is that scholars for grammatical reasons pronounce it in the same manner. For some centuries, however, they have been accustomed to pronounce it Shima ('the name'), just as the Jews use hashshem in conversation (Letter to Ludolf). In the matter of their ritual orthodoxy we have even the testimony of Josephus; for, when he tells of Jewish fugitives accused of ritual irregularities being received by the Samaritans, he adds that they complained of being falsely accused (Ant. XI. viii. 7). To this we may add the remarkable confession of Rabban Simeon, the son of Gamaliel, who says: 'Every command which the Cuthæans keep they observe more strictly than the Israelites' (Bab. Cholin 4a). They practise circumcision, and keep the Law strictly. They observe all the Mosaic feasts; and, in accordance with their reading of the Law, they go three times a year to Gerizim for the feasts of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles, and at such times practically the whole community lives in the mountain. Only at the Passover season, however, do they offer sacrifices, and, as the arrangements at that time bring before us much more vividly the occasion of the institution of that feast than the calm order of the Jewish ritual, it claims our attention. The usual order is that seven days before the Passover the whole community camps out on the top of Gerizim in the neighbourhood of the sacred rock, which they regard as the site of their ancient temple. On the evening of the 14th Nisan the whole congregation assembles, and the high priest reads the words of institution in Ex 12¹⁻¹². Precisely at sunset, as he concludes the sixth verse, a sufficient number of lambs for the community is slain by men dressed in white clothing. Each member of the congregation then marks his forehead with the blood. The wool is removed by scalding with boiling water previously made ready. The bodies are now examined, to make sure that there is no blemish, and thereafter they are spitted and roasted in a pit arranged as an oven. An hour or two later, when they are sufficiently cooked, the Samaritans standing, eat in haste with their loins girded, with shoes on their feet, and with staff in hand. All that remains, together with the right shoulders and hamstrings previously removed, is carefully gathered up and burned in the night. Early on the morning of the fifteenth day they all return to their duties in the town.

In accordance with the Law, the Samaritan is practised; but with the difference that the brother, and the nearest friend that takes his wife. As among the Sephardic Jews also, a second wife is allowed during the life of the first when she has had no children.

Beyond these things their religious ideas are vague. The Pentateuch is their sole canonical book, and beyond its life they never seem to have passed. They were never called upon to go through a stirring national crisis, like the Jews during the Maccabean times, and so they never rose to the same vigour and intellectual life. The written sources of their dogma are late, but from these and from Jewish sidelights we can learn something. It is discussed in the Talmud as to whether they are to be classed with the Sadducees in belief, and the Jews seem to have had some ground for thinking so, for they are represented as saying that 'no resurrection is recorded in the Law' (Bab. Sanh. 90b). Still, the modern Samaritan believes in a resurrection, in the distinction between good and evil spirits, in a judgment, and in the creation from nothing. It is to be remarked, however, that Arabic writers in the Middle Ages tell us of Samaritan sects professing the distinctive beliefs of both Pharisees and Sadducees, so that the opinions of both parties must have been held by individuals at an earlier date. In Jn 4²⁵ we find that the woman of Samaria looked forward to the coming of a prophet whom she, like the Jews, designated 'the Messiah.' That this word should have been used by her has been regarded as peculiar, since it does not occur in the Law, but in the 1st cent. we find Samaritans familiar with and quoting the prophets (Midd. Debar. § 3); and, besides, we must see that it would be impossible for a faith like theirs, continually under the pressure of a foreign bondage, to survive without absorbing many of the elements of Jewish eschatology; and of these the Messianic idea was the most widely spread in the 1st cent., so much so that it was hardly possible for even the Samaritans to escape its influence. It was doubtless in connexion with such a hope that the prophet arose, and tumults occurred which were put down by Pilate, causing him finally the loss of his office (Ant. XVIII. iv. 1); as it also led Simon Magus to give himself out as some great one (Ac 8⁹). When the Messianic idea took final form, they expected the Messiah's coming in the year 6000 A.M., but did not think that he should be greater than Moses. Whether he should be of the tribe of Joseph does not appear, but they denied the application of Gn 49¹⁰ (where their reading varies from the MT) as proof that he should spring from Judah. From the Jews they adopted the synagogue system; and, apart from the feast days kept on Gerizim, all their worship is conducted in Keniset es-Sâmîrê, the synagogue of the Samaritans, in the S.W. of the town (Nâbiâs). The high priest, who is said to be of the tribe of Levi, conducts their services, and, according to the Law, he receives tithes from his people.

4. Literature.—The most ancient and important document the Samaritans possess is the (Hebrew-) Samaritan Pentateuch; and this they seem to have become possessed of at a very early date—indeed, before the Babylonian (𐤀𐤍𐤁𐤏) alphabet had supplanted the older Hebrew, for, like all the later books of this people, it is written in a character that is now peculiar to them,—the Samaritan alphabet,—but which in itself is nothing more or less than a cursive form of the old lapidary script of Hebrew, Phœnician, and Moabite. Another testimony to their early reception of the Torah is that it is not divided into parashahs like the MT, but, on a totally different principle, independent alike of the Rabbis and the Alexandrian critics, into ketzin. These number in all 962, Genesis containing 250, Exodus 200, Leviticus 134, Numbers 218, and Deuteronomy 160. While the language of this recension of the Pentateuch is Hebrew, it supports in the matter of various readings rather the LXX than the MT, the number of agreements being not less than 2000, while in the ages of the patriarchs it differs from both the LXX and the MT. But more to be considered than all these taken together are certain variations that have had an important bearing on their religion. The Jews were wont to accuse the Samaritans of having corrupted the Law; and the charge was well founded. In Dt 27⁴ (cf. also v. 7) we find the substitution of 'Gerizim' for 'Ebal,' and at the close of the Decalogue in both Ex 20¹⁷ and Dt 5²¹ a long passage is inserted—

'And it shall be when the Lord thy God shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanite, whither thou goest in to possess it, thou shalt set up for thyself great stones, and thou shalt plaster them with lime, and thou shalt write upon the stones all the words of this law; and it shall be when ye pass over Jordan, ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, on Mount Gerizim, and thou shalt build there an altar to the Lord thy God, and thou shalt offer upon it sacrifices to the Lord thy God, and thou shalt sacrifice peace-offerings, and thou shalt eat thereof, and rejoice before the Lord thy God. That mountain is beyond Jordan after the way from the rising of the sun, in the land of the Canaanite, who dwelleth in the West, over against Gilgal, near by the oak of Moreh, over against Shechem.'

This, according to the Samaritan division of the Decalogue, was reckoned the Tenth Commandment, and, like the others, of perpetual obligation, so that the Samaritans regarded not only the Temple at Jerusalem, but also the tabernacle at Shiloh, though in Ephraim, and the whole Jewish priesthood after the settlement of the land, as schismatical.

Other books of the OT they do not consider canonical. They do, indeed, have a deep veneration for Job and the Psalms, and they read Joshua and Judges, but they are all regarded as apocryphal.

The synagogue system, which among the Jews led to the formation of the Targums, was also the means of producing an Aramaic-Samaritan Pentateuch (ܡܬܬܬܐ ܫܡܪܝܬܐ), which, however, Nöldeke dates at not earlier than the 4th cent., though it may contain earlier elements; and in favour of this it is to be noted that in general it agrees with τὸ Σαμαρειτικόν of Origen. It closely represents the Heb.-Sam. Pentateuch, and in language it differs but little from the Palestinian Aramaic.

material directly connected with the people. They possess over a dozen volumes, mostly in Syriac, which they designate Tarteel ('chanting'). These are in Syriac mixed with Aramaic, and contain the services for the various seasons of the year, and they are probably ancient. Another dozen volumes are made up of commentaries on various portions of the Pentateuch text; and, although these also are written in Hebrew, they are usually accompanied by an Arabic translation. The best known Samaritan commentary is that of Mar Sargis, which was published in Europe by Heidenheim in 1896. The author probably lived in the 4th century. In addition to these they possess a few historical works:—Kitab es-Satir, a history of the period from Adam to Moses; et-Tabakh, an account of judgments which befell the Jews; the Book of Joshua (in Arabic, but probably in parts from a Hebrew original), which closely follows the canonical Joshua, but has many apocryphal additions and eight concluding chapters, bringing it to the reign of the Emperor Constantine Severus; Chronicle of the Samaritan high priests, accompanied by an Arabic translation.

So far as MSS are concerned, the only one that, on account of its antiquity, merits our consideration is the jealously guarded Pentateuch roll in Nâblus. It is preserved in a covering of crimson satin in a silver case engraved with a plan of the tabernacle. The roll itself is written on parchment much discoloured by age. The Samaritans claim that it was written by Abishua the son of Phineas, thirteen years after the settlement of the land; but this is incredible, though they show an acrostic made by the thickening of certain letters in the roll itself as proof. Socin thinks it may belong to the 6th cent.; but other scholars with whom the present writer has discussed the question, would carry its date back even to a short time before the Christian era, so that there is a bare possibility of its having been in use when Christ passed through the streets of Shechem: like ordinary synagogue rolls, the MS is written in columns. These are 7 in. wide, and contain 70 to 72 lines. The writing is small, and the letters are of the oldest Samaritan type.

Samaritan books are all un-vowelled, and in their pronunciation of both Hebrew and Aramaic this people differs widely from the Jews and Syrians. The gutturals, which the Galileans confounded with one another, are altogether omitted by the Samaritans. The vowel system also at first sight seems to have nothing in common with the Massoretic pronunciation, so much so that a recent writer on the subject expresses the opinion that 'it follows certain laws of language as yet unknown to us' (Rosenberg's Lehrbuch, p. 11). However, when we come to compare the modern Samaritan pronunciation of both Hebrew and Aramaic with that of the Jews and the Syrians, we see that the former in nearly every detail bears to the latter the same relationship as the vulgar Palestinian Arabic dialects bear to the older classical speech. It thus appears that, in the absence of vowels to preserve the memory of the sounds when Arabic supplanted these languages as the colloquial, and in the absence of any formulated grammar till the year 1400, the Samaritan pronunciation was allowed to go through the same processes of decay as the common sister Semitic dialects on the same soil. A careful consideration of these processes enables us to produce the Samaritan as a valuable testimony to the general accuracy of the Massoretic pointing; while, if we read the Samaritan Targum with the pointing of Onkelos, we shall attain to a very close approximation to the speech of Christ with the woman of Samaria and with the people of Sychar.

5. Relationship of Christ to the Samaritans.—To understand even imperfectly the beauty and tenderness of the attitude of Jesus to this despised race, we must remember that His ministry occurred during the period when the separation of Jew and Samaritan was most absolute, and the bitterness of feeling most intense. Yet they were invariably treated with respect and forbearance by Christ, as also by His Apostles after the Resurrection; and just as His gentleness won the affection and gained the gratitude of publicans and sinners, so also did His treatment of the Samaritans. It was the one Samaritan and not the nine Jews who returned to give thanks (Lk 17¹⁶), and who was contented to wait for the official verdict, and the freedom it would bring, that he might continue in the company of Jesus; and all that is related of the conversation at the well, and of the relations with the villagers of Sychar, reveals the same attractiveness and consideration. True it is that at the beginning of His ministry, and when sending out the Twelve, He directed them not to enter into 'any city of the Samaritans' (Mt 10⁹); but we can well understand the reason for that, when we see that not even the inner circle of the Twelve sufficiently understood the nature of the gospel to be entrusted with such a mission (Lk 9³⁴). We must also bear in mind that Samaria was designated by our Lord as the first circuit, beyond Judæa proper, that He meant to receive the gospel message. In the parable of the Good Samaritan, too (Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁵), He has taken and ennobled that name which till His time was almost a name for devil (Jn 8⁴⁸), and which no Jew would pronounce—even the law (Lk 10³⁷) when forced to confess that he 'showed mercy on him.' In view of such feelings between the two peoples, it would have been, in any mere man, an act of almost unpardonable rashness to have depicted to a Jewish audience the Samaritan as an example of noble generosity and of disinterested neighbourliness; and not only is this what Christ does, but He goes much farther. Priest and Levite are put into the balance and outweighed by this wayfaring stranger, and every later point in the picture is incalculably in favour of the Samaritan. He is in the country of the Jews, in a place of bad repute—Taldat ed-dam, the Ascent of Blood,—in danger from the Jewish people—robbers, friends of the man-assailers,—even of insult and rejection by the khan-keeper, and of perhaps being taken and treated as the robber himself. He had every reason for exercising himself. He and his provision, especially the wine, were impure, and there was every prospect that it would be an ungrateful task. What must we think of the Lord Jesus Christ, who, in opposition to every racial prejudice and purely human feeling, depicts with such beauty the hated Cuthæan, and that just after He had been rejected (Lk 9⁵²⁻⁵⁴) by the Samaritans in such a manner that the hearts of His disciples were filled with bitter indignation? Controlled by circumstances, or a product of the age in which He lived, could He have risen to this?

WM. M. CHRISTIE.

SAMARITAN, THE GOOD (Lk 10²⁵⁻³⁷).—Jesus had bidden His last farewell to Galilee, and was travelling to Jerusalem (Lk 9⁵¹). He had passed through Samaria and reached Judæa, and in some town on the route, probably Jericho, He visited the synagogue,* as He was wont (cf. Lk 4¹⁶), and discoursed to the congregation. It was customary for the hearers, when the preacher had concluded, to ask him questions,† and so it happened on this occasion. One of those whose business was the interpretation of the sacred Law, rose and asked, 'Teacher, what shall I do to inherit "eternal life"?' He was no anxious inquirer. He thought to display his strength and humble Jesus before the . . . his question was a foretaste of the dialectical warfare which awaited Jesus in Jerusalem, and which reached its climax in that succession of encounters with the rulers in the Temple court during the Passion week. Nor was Jesus deceived. 'What stands written in the Law?' He asked, 'how readest thou?' Glad to display his theological proficiency, the lawyer glibly replied, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole strength, and with thy whole mind, and thy neighbour as thyself.' Jesus accepted the answer: 'Thou hast answered rightly. This do, and thou shalt live.' The lawyer was an astute controversialist, and he perceived a new opening for disputation. 'Neighbour' was defined both by the Law and by the Rabbis as a fellow-Israelite, 'a son of thy people,'‡ and he expected that Jesus would give the word a larger significance, thus exposing Himself to a charge of heresy. He clutched at the opportunity. 'And who,' he asked, 'is my "neighbour"?' Jesus answered with a parable.

The road from Jericho to Jerusalem had a very evil reputation. It wound up barren and rugged hills, infested by brigands, who assailed travellers, robbing and sometimes murdering them; and from those deeds of violence it carried a ghastly name—the Ascent of Blood.§ It was much frequented. It was the highway between the capital and the prosperous City of Palm-trees; and, moreover, since half of the officiating 'course' lodged at Jericho, where provision was abundant, there were continually priests and Levites passing to and fro. Jesus told how a man, travelling down the Ascent of Blood, was set upon by brigands, plundered, maltreated, and left half-dead. Presently a priest came down the road, and, when he spied the wretch, he 'passed by on the other side.' Next came a Levite, and he behaved with like inhumanity. Then came one riding on an ass, a merchant, probably, who often passed that way in the prosecution of his business.¶ Since the holy men had 'passed by on the other side,' it would have been no marvel had he done the like, especially since he was a Samaritan, one of that hated race with which the Jews had no dealings. But he was moved by the piteous spectacle, and, dismounting, he dressed the sufferer's wounds, according to the medical prescription of that day, with oil and wine; then he mounted him on his beast, and conveyed him to an inn and tended him. Those offices of humanity detained him from his journey, and he rose betimes 'toward the morrow' (ἐπὶ ῥῆν αὐριον), to push forward. But ere he set out he handed the host two denarii, and bade him see to the unfortunate man until he should be fit for the road. Since a denarius was a day's wage,* the two would probably suffice; but in case of need he enjoined that no expense be spared, undertaking to settle the account on his return journey.

'Which of these three,' says Jesus, 'seemeth to thee to have proved "neighbour" to the man that fell in with the brigands?' Only one answer was possible. The lawyer should have replied, 'The Samaritan'; but he could not endure to utter the odious name, and he reluctantly faltered out, 'The one that took pity on him.' 'Go thy way,' said Jesus; 'do thou also likewise.' It was a masterpiece of dialectic. He had avoided entanglement in an unprofitable and perilous controversy, and had forced His adversary to pronounce judgment on himself. See also art. NEIGHBOUR.

SANCTIFY, SANCTIFICATION.—Sanctification is the tr. of ἁγιασμός, which is one of the group of words that includes ἅγιος, and ἁγιάζω, and ἁγιασθήτω. The root idea of the group seems to be 'separation' or 'restricted use' (see HOLINESS). ἁγιασμός denotes primarily a process; but in NT it is used also to describe the state resulting from that process. This wider usage is familiar in our language, and therefore we take 'sanctification' to describe both a state and a process. It is the process by which men are made holy, and it is also the state into which men pass as they become holy. Therefore this article must discuss what state is considered by Jesus Christ to deserve the name 'sanctification,' and what is the process whereby He conceives men are sanctified.

The first fact to be noticed about this entire group of words is that it occupies a meagre place in the teaching of Jesus. The number of times when either of them is put into His lips is very small, and none of these few usages refers to man. ἅγιος is used as follows: He addresses God as 'Holy Father' (Jn 17¹¹); He speaks of 'the holy angels' (Mk 8³⁸); He uses the name 'Holy Spirit' (Mt 12³² || 28¹⁹, Mk 12³² 13¹¹, Lk 12¹⁰, Jn 14²⁶); He warns against giving 'that which is holy' unto the dogs (Mt 7⁹); and He refers to the abomination that stands 'in the holy place' (24¹⁵). ἁγιάζω is used of 'the temple that sanctifieth the gift' (Mt 23¹⁷⁻¹⁹); and there are three very important usages in Jn 10³⁸ 17¹⁷⁻¹⁹. It occurs also in the Lord's Prayer in the sentence, 'Hallowed be thy name' (Mt 6⁹). This petition suggests that both the ceremonial and ethical aspects of the word were present to our Lord's mind. The 'name' of the Father is to be revered. It casts awe upon the worshipping soul. But also the name stands for righteousness. It is a name whose ethical splendour must not be smirched. The same double reference can be traced in His usage of ἅγιος. When Jesus employs these words, He seems to give them their true historical sense as implying (1) a state of consecration to the Divine purposes, and (2) a state of ethical holiness.

ἁγιασμός, the NT word for 'sanctification,' does not occur at all in the recorded sayings of Jesus. But He was constantly speaking about the thing itself. Therefore we are constrained to recognize some special significance in the absence of the familiar words from the Lord's teaching. Probably the explanation is found in the state of religious feeling in His day. ἅγιος is the nearest Greek equivalent of the Hebrew קדוש. This term, with its kindred terms, had acquired a distinct connotation. It has been pointed out that the idea of holiness in OT is progressively spiritualized, and receives more and more ethical content. But whilst this is true of OT usage, the Greek period in Jewish history had ushered in a time of reaction in the significance of religious terms. The struggle of pious Jews to resist Hellenizing tendencies threw the emphasis of religion back to the Law. Thus arose the Pharisaic conception of piety as rigid obedience to the Law. Under this influence holiness was again interpreted ceremonially instead of morally. When Jesus was born, the religious idealism of the day was legal rather than ethical. Now this conception of sanctification was the subject of unsparing denunciation by Jesus. One long chapter in Matthew's Gospel gathers up scathing rebukes of those who put the emphasis of religion upon what is external (Mt 23¹⁻³⁶; cf. Lk 11³⁹⁻⁵²). In the Sermon on the Mount He said: 'Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 5²⁰). So that, if Jesus had used the current terms, He would have been understood in the current sense. In order to secure new moral contents for the terms, He had to drop them, and to use other phraseology to describe the new teaching.

A further explanation of the absence of the familiar terms is found in Jesus' method of teaching. His teaching was not doctrinal. He did not express His ideals in formulas, but in pictures of what men ought to be. Instead of reiterating familiar maxims, He minted new precepts for men's daily use. Neglecting the outworn dogmas of the scribes, He uttered sharp calls to men as to what they ought to do. His teaching was 'new,' and was 'with authority' (Mk 1²²⁻²⁷). When we turn to the Epistles, we discover that the old terms reappear, they reappear, they reappear. They have no longer the Pharisaic connotation. They have a new Christian connotation, which lifts them above the highest ethical attainment of OT. The NT writers use OT words with the significance that Jesus Christ has given to the idea they represent.

1. Christ's teaching about sanctification.—i. HIS TEACHING ABOUT THE IDEAL OF SAINTHOOD.—Jesus Christ's conception of sanctification started from the holiness of God the Father. He found certain attributes in God that are capable of being the ideal for men. These attributes belong to the Fatherhood of God. He summed up many exhortations in the words, 'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5⁴⁸). This command held out a new ideal of perfection. Hitherto men had found their ideal in various human excellences. Jesus fixed attention upon God the Father. There are many Divine attributes that are inaccessible to men. No man can be perfect even as God is perfect. The omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence of God are absolutely beyond human reach. But as 'Father,' God displays certain qualities that may be copied by men; and these qualities unite to form the Christian ideal. Such teaching rested upon the underlying belief of Jesus that man has a capacity for sonship of God, and that he reaches his ideal by realizing his sonship. And Jesus could conceive sonship only in the ethical realm. To give men power to become children of God, is to make them resemble their Father ethically (Jn 1¹²).

The details of the teaching may be summarized conveniently under some of the leading categories of thought used by Jesus:—(1) His own example. He claimed to set forth the moral ideal, because He was the Son of God (Jn 14⁶). As the Son, He revealed the Father (Mt 11²⁷, Jn 14⁹⁻¹⁰); therefore the children of God are those who resemble Him (Mt 11²⁹). The imitation of Christ is the true sanctification.

(2) Love. The central and all-pervading glory of the Divine Fatherhood is love (Mt 22³⁷, Jn 14²¹⁻²³). The Apostolic phrase 'God is love' (1 Jn 4⁸) sums up the irresistible testimony of Jesus to the Father (cf. 1 Jn 3¹⁻⁴⁹⁻¹⁰, Jn 3¹⁶). Therefore holy people must be loving. The first demand is for love towards God. To 'love the Lord' is the greatest commandment (Mt 22³⁷ ||). The character that lacks this devoted love for the heavenly Father is fatally defective. But Jesus bracketed the commandment to 'love thy neighbour as thyself' with this 'first and greatest' (22³⁹ ||); and the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10²⁵⁻³⁷) has been interpreted as teaching that 'charity is the true sanctity' (Bruce). Likeness to the Father is impossible without the possession of a loving spirit (Mt 5⁴³⁻⁴⁸, Lk 15²⁵⁻³²). This love must be unselfish (Lk 14¹³⁻¹⁴). It must forgive freely and unweariedly (Mt 18²¹⁻²²). It must not judge (7¹⁻²). It must be full of compassion towards all needy ones, and must find a neighbour in any one requiring assistance (Lk 10²¹⁻³⁵). Jesus also inculcated the supreme importance of love by His rebukes of its opposites: of lack of compassion (Mt 18²³⁻³⁵, Lk 10); of selfishness (Lk 16¹⁹⁻³¹); of inhumanity (Mt 25⁴¹⁻⁴⁵). Equally terrible were His denunciations of Pharisaic injustice to the weak (23¹⁻¹⁴ ||).

(3) Righteousness. The love of the Father is a holy love. God is the 'righteous Father' (Jn 17²⁵). Jesus came into the world from the Father to save from sins (Mt 11¹⁹, Lk 15⁷⁻¹⁰⁻¹⁸, Mt 26²⁸, Jn 3¹⁶⁻¹⁷). Therefore no man can resemble the Father who does not desire supremely to be cleansed from sin. Likeness to the Father involves complete consecration to His holy purpose, and readiness to be separated from every evil thing (Mt 5⁶⁻¹³⁻¹⁸ ||). The Christian must seek first the righteousness of the Heavenly Father (6³³). His goodness must be manifest in deeds as well as words (7²¹). He must be pure in heart (5⁸). His righteousness must be inward and real, not outward and ceremonial (5²⁰⁻²³⁻²⁸).

(4) Life. Jesus came that men might have life (Jn 10¹⁰). Moral perfection is conceived as the true self-development (Mt 25⁴⁶, Mk 10¹⁰). God has made us for Himself; unflinching obedience to the will of God leads to fulness of life (Mt 19¹⁷, Jn 17³). Mutilation is urged in preference to the loss of life (Mk 9⁴⁵⁻⁴⁶ ||). But mutilation is only second best. The moral ideal is to find perfect life (8³⁵ ||).

(5) Citizenship in the Kingdom. Jesus taught that moral perfection cannot be realized by men in isolation. This is the aspect of sanctification brought out by His teaching about the Kingdom of God. His ideal man is a citizen as well as a son. He must live as a member of a Society, showing those qualities that help to build the City of God (cf. Mt 5⁹⁻¹³⁻¹⁶⁻¹⁹). Such a recognition of other lives will keep men meek (5⁵⁻¹¹⁻¹²), and will fill their hearts with humility (18¹⁻⁶ ||).

ii. CHRIST'S TEACHING ABOUT THE PROCESS OF SANCTIFICATION.—(1) We note that sanctification is a process having a definite beginning. It is not another aspect of natural development. Its history is distinct from the record of physiological and psychological growth. We note the striking saying about His forerunner: 'Among them that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist: yet he that is but little in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Mt 11¹¹). Here two kingdoms are distinguished: the natural kingdom into which men are 'born of women,' and the Kingdom of heaven. The latter kingdom belongs to a higher order than the former, as the animal kingdom is higher than the vegetable, or as the weakest mammal is greater than the strongest reptile. The babe in the higher kingdom of men is more than the tiger in the kingdom of beasts. So, the least in the Kingdom of heaven belongs to a higher order, and has larger possibilities of spiritual development, than the greatest among those 'born of women,' i.e. produced by natural birth and growth. This implies that entrance into the Kingdom of heaven is secured by a new principle of life. This necessity is further hinted at in the teaching about defilement proceeding from the heart (15¹¹). It is not enough to adorn a life with kind actions, to hang bunches of grapes on a thorn bush (7¹⁶). Good actions must be the fruit that grows on a good tree (Mt 7¹⁶⁻¹⁸, Jn 15⁴). The tree must be made good; the heart must be cleansed; the river of life must be purified at its source. It will not suffice to build a fine house on a wrong foundation. The hidden principle must be made secure if the life is to be saved (Mt 7²⁴⁻²⁷). These hints prepare us for the demand, 'Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (18³). Sanctification involves the quickening of a new life in men. The maturing of their physical nature cannot suffice; their spiritual nature must pass through the stages of birth and childhood before it can attain maturity. This teaching finds exact expression in the words addressed to Nicodemus: 'Except a man be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God' (Jn 3³). Man's destiny is not achieved through his physical birth into a physical kingdom. 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh' (3⁶); therefore no number of reincarnations can produce a spiritual result. Before we can be born into a spiritual kingdom, we must have a second kind of birth corresponding to the kingdom; we must be 'born of the Spirit' (3⁵).

(2) A second group of passages hints that sanctification may be a long process before it is completed. This is suggested in the parable of the Sower (Mt 13³, Mk 4³); the parable of the Seed as growing up—first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear' (Mk 4²⁸); and in all the figures of fruit-bearing, because fruit-bearing is the late result of a long process (cf. Jn 15², Lk 13⁸). Another set of parables represents men as servants of a long-suffering Lord, who have to show diligence in trading with the pounds, fidelity in the use of talents, and patience in watching (Mt 25¹⁴, Lk 19¹², Mt 24⁴²). Probably this thought is contained also in the identification of true life with the knowledge of God (cf. Jn 17³, Mt 11²⁷). Such knowledge is not merely an intellectual apprehension; it is a spiritual fellowship. It implies ethical likeness through surrender of the whole being to the Divine will. Such likeness can be secured only through long conformity of the heart and mind and will to God. A pure heart is the organ of such a vision of God (Mt 5⁸).

(3) There are definite statements as to the means whereby this ethical likeness to the Father is secured. (a) By prayer. Jesus was a man of prayer. There are fifteen references to His prayers in the Gospels. It is specially noteworthy that He betook Himself to prayer when any fierce temptation assailed Him (Lk 5¹⁶ 9²⁸, Jn 12²⁷, Mt 26³⁶), when any work of critical importance had to be undertaken (Lk 6¹², Jn 11⁴¹ 17), or when He was exhausted with toil (Mk 1³⁵, Mt 14²³); and that it was while He was praying that He was anointed with the Holy Spirit (Lk 3²¹), and that He was transfigured (9²⁹). But it is clear also that He was accustomed to pray on all occasions (cf. 10²¹ 11¹ 22³² 23⁴⁶). It is instructive, therefore, that He urged men to pray (Mt 5⁴⁴ 6⁶ 26⁴¹, Lk 11² 18¹ 21³⁶). He encouraged prayer by promising large blessing (Mt 7⁷⁻¹¹, Mk 11²⁴). He declared that true prayer 'justified' a man (Lk 18¹⁴). All these references seem to make it clear that prayer ministers to our sanctification.

(b) Self-denial. Jesus had a very definite philosophy of life; but it was clean contrary to worldly wisdom. He summarized it thus: 'Enter ye in by the narrow gate: . . . for narrow is the gate, and straitened the way, that leadeth unto life' (Mt 7^{13, 14}). 'Whosoever will lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, shall save it' (Mk 8³⁵). Self-denial is thus taught not for its own sake, but as the only way to reach self-perfection (16²⁴).

(c) Good works. We have noticed the emphasis put by Jesus on works of love and mercy. It must be pointed out now that He taught their sanctifying efficacy. The blessed of the Father, who inherit the Kingdom, have qualified by good works (25³¹⁻⁴⁰). The young ruler could be perfect if he would keep the commandments (19²¹), and the lawyer could inherit eternal life in the same way (Lk 10²⁸). Several times Jesus promised a reward for obedience, fidelity, and diligence (cf. Mt 25^{10, 14-30}, Lk 19¹²⁻²⁷, Mk 10^{42, 43}); and if heavenly rewards are granted to those morally fit, as is taught clearly by the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19), these passages imply that sanctification is advanced by a life of obedience to God's will. (d) Faith in Christ. There is a large group of passages in all the Gospels, and there are specially important discourses in John, in which Jesus Christ is offered to men as a means of their sanctification.

(a) Sometimes sanctification is promised to those who copy His example. This is done in the gracious invitation (Mt 11²⁸⁻³⁰). Learning of Jesus, we may become meek and lowly in heart; yoked with Him under the yoke which He wears and which He graciously invites us to share, we may bear our burden easily. It is also taught that it is only to be the one Master.

(b) Sometimes sanctification is promised to those who follow His teaching. The wise man is one who builds on the words of Jesus (Mt 7²⁴). He offered His words as the rock of eternal truth on which men may build for eternity, in place of the shifting sand of opinion and hypothesis which will not continue. Eternity will put the strain of judgment upon the characters we are building; and only those characters resting on the rock of His words will stand the strain (v. 27). The same truth is taught in the impressive words of Mt 10²²⁻²³. To confess Him and His words is the same as building upon them; whilst to be ashamed of them is to refuse to make them the foundation for conduct. The same sentiment is expressed in Jn 5²⁴. He that 'cometh not into judgment' is because 'he hath passed out of death into life,' is one in whom the signs of sanctification are recognized. This sanctified man is 'he that heareth my word and believeth him that sent me.'

(c) Sanctification is secured by union with Jesus as the Son of God. It has been pointed out that 'knowledge of the Father is one of Jesus Christ's descriptions of sanctification. And a very solemn condition made by Jesus is that 'none knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 11²⁷). The Son willeth to reveal the Father to all, for the very next word is, 'Come unto me all ye that labour'; but there is no relaxing of the claim that men must come to Him and learn of Him if they would know the Father; cf. Jn 6⁴⁴ 14⁶. Other conceptions of God may be attained by other means. 'The Father' can be revealed only by One who fulfils perfectly the complementary relationship.

(d) Separate references may be made to the discourses in John's Gospel, because these amplify the teaching in the Synoptics, though the germs are found there. We may note the claim of Jesus to be the light of the world (Jn 8¹² 9⁵ 12^{35, 38, 46}; and cf. 1^{5, 9} 3¹⁹); to be the living water (7^{37, 38} 4¹⁴); to be the bread of God come down from heaven to feed the world (6^{32-33, 47-58}). These figures imply that men must follow Him if they would walk in the ways of holiness, and must sustain their life by union with Him, if they would have it strong and healthy. This last means of sanctification is described quite definitely in the words, 'He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me and I in him' (6⁵⁶, cf. 15¹⁻¹⁰). The words have been interpreted sacramentally, as referring solely to the elements offered to the participants in the Lord's Supper. But such an interpretation is entirely opposed to the spirit of Jesus, and would have been inexplicable to the people addressed. And though an allusion to the Lord's Supper as a 'means of grace' need not be denied (cf. Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁸), it is plain that our Lord was thinking of a spiritual union between Himself and His followers, maintained by their faith. Another significant passage occurs in 8³¹⁻³⁸. It has affinity with passages emphasizing the importance of His words (vv. 31, 38). But it passes on to the statement, 'Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.' This is explained to mean freedom from sin (v. 34); therefore it implies sanctification. And as 'the truth' is changed in v. 36 to 'the Son,' this is another direct claim on the part of Jesus to be our Sanctification (cf. 14¹⁰ 15: 4 10). It leads us naturally to the very important text 17:17-19. Jesus prayed for His disciples, 'Sanctify them in the truth: thy word is truth. . . . For their sakes I sanctify myself, that they themselves also may be sanctified in truth.' 'Sanctify' seems to be used here with its full meaning. The idea of consecration is not absent (cf. v. 18 and Rv); but vv. 14-16 prove that the ethical significance is prominent. This sanctification is secured 'in truth'. The truth is identified with 'thy word,' which has been given to the disciples by Jesus (v. 14), partly by His words (14:16), and partly by His character and example (14:14). The thought seems to be that the disciples are to be sanctified in the truth which is revealed, and by being led farther into the truth. 'The truth' . . . is (as it were) the element into which the believer is introduced and by which he is changed. The 'truth' is not only a power within him by which he is moved; it is an atmosphere in which he lives. The end of the truth is not wisdom, which is partial, but holiness, which is universal' (Westcott, in loco.). This teaching finds more complete expression throughout chs. 14-16. The disciples must abide in Christ, who is the true Vine, if they would bear much fruit (15:1-9). When the Master is gone, He will send another Comforter, the Spirit of Truth, who will abide with them and will be guided into its deeper recesses by the Spirit of truth. Thus they will be sanctified, knowing the Father more perfectly as He is revealed in the Son (16:1-3), and bearing much fruit through this knowledge (16:5). All their consecration of themselves to the work to which their Master sent them must move within the sacred sphere of 'the truth'.

(d) One sentence in this prayer is very valuable for our purpose, 'For their sakes I sanctify myself, that they themselves also may be sanctified' (Jn 17:19). Jesus Christ's sanctification of Himself is primarily His devotion of Himself to the Father's will. His sanctification was unique in that there never was any refusal of that will as it was made known to Him. But such a refusal was always possible whilst His earthly life lasted. In that sense Jesus had to be progressively sanctified. He had not fulfilled the entire will of His Father until He could say 'It is finished' (19:30). Therefore He had to continue to sanctify Himself until then. The immediate reference of the words in the prayer seems to be to His death. The prayer is the renewal of His surrender. Again He takes up His cross. He is willing to die, in obedience to the Father's will, that the disciples may be sanctified. Two points must be noticed. (1) This complete surrender to the Father's will, 'obedience even unto the death of the cross,' makes Jesus the absolutely perfect example for our sanctification (Ph 2:8). (2) But also there is a distinct reference to His death as helping to secure the sanctification of His disciples. This hint is not solitary. It gathers other words to itself. 'If I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me' (Jn 12:32). This drawing is part of the process of sanctification. 'Except a grain of wheat fall into the earth and die, it abideth by itself alone; but if it die, it beareth much fruit' (12:24). By dying Jesus will become a fruitful Personality in the world, producing 'much fruit' in His disciples. 'This is my blood of the covenant, which is shed for many' (Mk 14:24). The New Covenant is written on men's hearts. It is concerned with a spiritual sanctification as distinguished from one that is merely ceremonial. Jesus connects His death with this New Covenant as a means of securing sanctification 'for many.' The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep' (Jn 10:11). This sacrifice by the Shepherd ensures that the lost sheep are found, and being 'found' is one of Jesus Christ's words for at least the beginnings of sanctification (Lk 15:9-32). These sayings make it certain that Jesus thought of His death as playing an important part in the process whereby sin's prisoners are delivered, and are set forth upon the road to holiness.

At the same time the reference of Jn 17:19 cannot be confined to His death, if only because His sanctification of Himself in His death was but the perfect flower of a life that was one long sanctification. His death cannot be isolated from His life. He came into the world to save sinners; and His entire earthly experience ministered to that salvation. At each critical stage He sanctified Himself: the act of the great moments reflected His daily temper. It is this continued sanctification, culminating in His death, that is the means of the sanctification of His disciples. See, further, on the sanctification of Christ, art. CONSECRATE, CONSECRATION, in vol. I.

(e) The teaching of Jn 17:19 led us already to the teaching of Jesus that sanctification is 'through the Holy Spirit'. Although this teaching is developed in John, it is not absent from the Synoptic tradition. The unpardonable sin is blasphemy against the Holy Spirit—called 'an eternal sin' (Mk 3:29 ff.). Luke's Gospel substitutes 'give the Holy Spirit' for 'give good things' (Lk 11:13, cf. Mt 7:11). All the Synoptists concur in ascribing to Jesus the promise, 'The Holy Spirit will teach you what you ought to say' (Lk 12:12; Mt 10:20; Mk 13:11). Moreover, a large place is given to the Spirit in the sanctification of Jesus. His miraculous birth is ascribed to the Spirit (Mt 1:18, Lk 1:35). The descent of the Spirit upon Jesus at His baptism was the Father's anointing in response to the Son's consecration (Mk 1:10-11 ff.). It was the Spirit that drove Him into the wilderness to be tempted (Mk 1:12). Jesus returned to His work 'in the power of the Spirit' (Lk 4:14), and He claimed to fulfil the prophecy, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me' (4:18). In answer to the charge that He cast out devils by Beelzebub, He asserted that He cast them out 'by the Spirit of God' (Mt 12:28). These texts furnish considerable material for a doctrine of sanctification through the Spirit.

But the doctrine is stated very clearly in Jn 14-16. The Holy Spirit is described as the alter ego of Jesus: He will do for the disciples, after His departure, at the latter has done for them during His presence. The Spirit of truth will abide with the disciples and will be in them (14:17). He will teach them (14:26), and will guide them into all truth, declaring to them things that are to come (16:13). He will also convict the world of sin, of righteousness, of judgment (16:8). The promise of the Spirit is the consolation offered by Jesus in view of His departure (16:7); and His coming will secure their development. Indeed, it may be said that the language of Jesus suggests that the Holy Spirit will be Himself returning in His glorified spiritual nature, and continuing in more complete form the work He has begun in the disciples during His ministry.

2. Christ and sanctification in the NT outside the Gospels.

(1) The teaching of St. Peter.—The Petrine conceptions are simple and practical. 1 Peter exhorts to the practice of various virtues that go to make up the Christian character. The starting-point for Christian sanctification is entirely reminiscent of the teaching of Jesus: it is found in the obligation of Christians as children of a holy Father, whose holiness constrains theirs (1 P 1:4, 15, 16). The attainment of holiness is called 'salvation' (1:9); and 'the two pillars of salvation are the sufferings and death of Christ and the resurrection and exaltation of Christ' (Beyschlag). He is the Son of God whose resurrection 'began us again' (1:3). He is the Lamb whose offering has redeemed Christians from their old sins (1:8, 19). He is 'the chief corner-stone' of that temple of God in which Christians are placed as living stones (2:5, 6). He is the Example for all who are suffering (2:21): especially has He shown us the right attitude to sin by His suffering for sins (2:22-24). By giving Himself to die for us, He has become the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls (2:25). He is 'the Lord' who is to be revered in our hearts (3:15). He is the adorable Saviour whose name is potent enough to secure our devotion (2:13, 4:4). Finally, He is the coming One, whose appearing will consummate the purposes of God, and will perfect us in salvation (1:7, 5:10). Thus Jesus Christ focusses all Christian effort and hope and faith upon Himself. The Christ who lived, died, and rose again, and was exalted—the Christ of the Gospels, whom Peter had known (1:8)—is the Divine original for our sanctification, and is the Divine Mediator through whom our deliverance from sin is secured.

(2) The teaching of St. John.—St. John makes very slender use of the ayos group of words. In this he is like his Master. In his First Epistle 'sanctify' and 'sanctification' do not occur. 'Holy' is used only once, and then in reference to God (1 Jn 2:20). In Revelation 'holy' is used 11 times. It describes God Almighty (4:8, 5:12, 6:10), the City of God (11:2, 21:3, 22:3). Also in Revelation 'saints' is constantly used to describe believers in Jesus Christ. But though the more usual words are absent from the Epistle, it is a passionate plea for sanctification in Christ. John describes sanctification under such phrases as 'walking in light' (1:7, 2:11), 'not sinning' (2:3, 5:18 [the idea of a prevailing habit being prominent]), 'keeping his commandments' (2:3, 3:23, 4:19, 5:2, 3), 'overcoming the world' (5:4, 5, cf. 2:13, 14, 4:4, and Rev 2:7, 11, 12, 17, 21), 'having life' or 'having eternal life' (2:25, 3:15, 5:11, 12, 13, 16, 20, and cf. Rev 2:7, 10, 3:13, 17, 20, 12, 21, 21:6, 27, 22:1, 2, 14, 17, 19). The core of sanctification is love (4:16-19), manifested toward God (2:15, 4:20, 5:1, 2), and towards brethren (2:10, 3:10-18, 4:7-12, 20, 21). This sanctification is connected intimately with the Person and work of Jesus Christ. He is the propitiation for sins, through whom believers are forgiven, and by whose blood they are cleansed from sin (1:7-2:2, 4:10). He is the Advocate upon whom we may rely for help in the struggle with sin (2:1). He is the Ideal towards whom all Christian effort must be directed (3^{3, 16} 4¹⁷). He is the Son of the Father, whose presence in the world manifests the Father's love (3¹⁶ 4^{9, 10, 14, 16}), and through whom believers may become possessed of the Father (2²³ 4¹⁵). So He brings to men that eternal life which makes sin impossible (3⁹ 5¹⁸); and He communicates to them that eternal love which is the very essence of goodness because it is the essence of God (4^{12, 16}). So intimate is this connexion between Christ and sanctification, that the object of His manifestation is declared to be 'to take away sins' (3⁵), and 'to destroy the works of the devil,' which are 'sins' (3⁷⁻¹⁰). It is clear, therefore, that St. John, as well as St. Peter, conceives Christ's redeeming work under the category of sanctification, and also conceives it as possible only through faith in Christ. Both of them view sanctification as a state into which the believer is introduced by an initial act of faith in Christ, through whom he is begotten of God (1 P 1^{3, 18, 23} 2^{3, 9}, 1 Jn 1⁹ 5⁴); but it is also a state which has to be realized by abiding union with Christ (1 P 1¹ 2¹⁰, 1 Jn 1⁷ 2¹ 3³).

(3) The teaching of St. Paul.—This may be summed up under the chief categories used by St. Paul to describe Jesus Christ's relation to men.

(a) Jesus Christ as the second Adam.—St. Paul thought of Adam as the first man of the race; and he could not escape the thought of pioneers. The entire subsequent history of the race is influenced by the course taken by the first man. His sin caused a divergence from the path of rectitude, which grew wider as the race progressed, because the initial direction was wrong. Jesus Christ was introduced into the world as a new pioneer. He was not an ordinary child of the race. He did not inherit the entail of bias to evil. 'The first man is of the earth, earthy' (1 Co 15⁴⁷). He was the child of an animal ancestry, and was weighted by animal instincts: to him holiness was only a possibility. 'The second man is of heaven.' His antecedents were spiritual. With Him holiness was the instinct, and evil was only a possibility. So He gave a new start in the direction of holiness. He stopped the race's drift from God, and He began a new movement Godward (Ro 5¹²⁻²¹, 1 Co 15^{20-26, 45-49}). Therefore all who become followers of Jesus Christ are rescued from the fatal effects of Adam's sin. They are led into the right road and are under the direct influence of the Spirit of God (Ro 8¹²⁻¹⁷). Thus they are being sanctified in accordance with the will of God, and will last to the perfect state He has planned for them (cf. Ro 5²¹ 8¹⁷, 1 Co 15^{49, 54}).

(b) A corollary from the previous thought is that men may be 'in Christ.' The second Adam is more than a leader of a redeemed race. He is the Head of a new humanity, which secures its life from Him by vital communion with Him. He brought new spiritual energy into the world: this energy can be communicated to all who are united to Him by faith. The bonds between the first Adam and the race were physical and mechanical; those between the second Adam and the race are spiritual and personal (cf. Jn 5²¹⁻²⁹, 1 Co 15⁴⁵, Eph 1^{6, 13}). This state of union between Christ and the believer is described by St. Paul under the phrase 'in Christ'; and it is mentioned as a condition of sanctification (1 Co 1² 6¹¹; cf. Ro 1^{6, 7}, Eph 1^{2, 4, 7, 11, 13} 2^{10, 13}, Ph 1¹, Col 1²). The idea is the Master's (cf. 'I am the vine, ye are the branches,' Jn 15⁶): He connected it with sanctification (15⁴⁻⁶). St. Paul emphasized this message. Thus we are 'complete in him' (Col 2¹⁰). Every human being comes into the world as a possibility. A process of involution must go forward, by which the germinal life will absorb from its environment those elements that minister to its development. Our moral possibilities can be realized only when we are 'in Christ.' The soul that lives without Him is stunted, or maimed, or becomes a moral freak. The soul that lives 'in him' becomes 'complete.' All the fullness that can realize our possibilities is gathered into Him (Col 2⁹). He is the way in which men must 'walk' who would attain to holiness, the plant in which men must be 'rooted' who would bear much fruit, the plan according to which men's lives must be 'built up' if they are to become temples of God (Col 2^{6, 7} 1²³, and cf. Jn 15¹⁻¹⁰ 14⁹).

(c) Another category used by St. Paul is Jesus Christ's death and resurrection as the source of the believer's renewal. This thought has affinities with the preceding one. But it shows, from another standpoint, how intimately the Apostle connects our sanctification with Christ. The teaching is developed in Ro 6; it occurs also in Ro 8¹¹, Gal 2²⁰, 2 Co 5^{14, 15}, Col 2^{12, 13} 3¹⁻⁴. The believer is associated with the Saviour in His death and resurrection. These crises are not only an ideal for the Christian, but also an experience which in some real spiritual sense he shares with his Lord. By them Jesus Christ became the Conqueror of sin and death. The believer identifies himself with Jesus Christ in the spiritual significance of these tremendous events: then he becomes 'dead unto sin and alive unto God,' though actually he is rather dying than dead to sin, and though the physical process of dissolution has still to be faced—but without its sting. This union with Christ secures the imparting of eternal life, and makes the believer a 'new creature' (2 Co 5¹⁷), who is renewed in holiness. Such teaching harmonizes with the demand of Jesus for a new birth (Jn 3³).

(d) A fourth category is the work of the Spirit using the truth 'as it is in Jesus' as His instrument in sanctification. This is another of the ideas of Jesus emphasized by St. Paul. The Pauline Epistles connect sanctification with the work of the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 P 1¹¹, Ro 8, 1 Co 2^{3, 16, 17, 12}). 'The Spirit's work is to sanctify us, before all things, to help the Christian to be holy' (Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, p. 248). The instrument used by the Spirit in sanctifying men is the revelation made in Jesus Christ. This had been foretold by the Master (Jn 16¹⁴); St. Paul sees His word fulfilled in all the work of the Spirit. 'The Lord' and 'the Spirit' are identified sometimes (2 Co 3^{17, 18}), and the Spirit dwelling in the heart sanctifies through Christ dwelling in the heart (cf. Eph 3¹⁷, Ro 8⁹⁻¹⁰, 2 Ti 1¹⁴). Man is pictured as a shrine in which the Spirit dwells. This 'temple of the Holy Spirit' must be kept free from all defilement, and must ever be the dwelling of its Divine guest (1 Co 3^{16, 17} 6^{19, 20}, 2 Co 6¹⁶).

(e) The Church as the Body of Christ is an important Pauline conception. It bears upon the problem of sanctification, inasmuch as the moral health of each individual member is influenced by the condition of the body (1 Co 12¹²⁻²⁷, Eph 1²³ 4¹⁶, Col 2¹⁹). The Apostle does not contemplate Christians remaining outside the visible Church, and he always assumes that a Christian's sanctification will be perfected within its fellowship. This does not imply any sacramental view of sanctification. It rests upon the fact that the Church is indwelt by the living Christ (Eph 1²³, Col 1²⁴). Therefore all believers who remain living members of the Church maintain a vital union with their Lord, through means of His own appointing. This secures their due spiritual development.

(f) Finally, we may note St. Paul's thought of Jesus as 'Lord.' This name was used by the early Church to express their faith about Jesus. All the NT books reflect the usage, except the Epistles of John. But, owing perhaps to the circumstances of his conversion (Ac 9⁵), the designation dominates court of justice, and so, still more explicitly, does ביה דין. γερονσία is a term applied only to aristocratic councils, and the Hasmonæan הנה suggests an aristocratic body associated with the monarch.*

(b) Of its component parts. Quite as suggestive are the names of the various classes of members of the court. The principal expressions, ignoring minor variations, are οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς, οἱ ἀρχόντες, οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, οἱ δυνατοί, οἱ πρῶτοι, οἱ γνῶριμοι, οἱ γραμματεῖς. Some of these terms are interchangeable, or nearly so, and they fall into three main classes. (1) Most important of all were the ἀρχιερεῖς, the chief priests, the members of the sacerdotal aristocracy. In Josephus and NT they are almost invariably mentioned first when the names of the classes of the Sanhedrin are given (cf. Mt 27⁴¹; Jos. BJ II. xvii. 2, and frequently). Often they are the only class particularly mentioned (cf. Mk 14⁵⁵ οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ ὅλον τὸ συνέδριον). The high priest was president of the court according to Josephus and NT (cf. Ac 5¹⁷, which testifies not only to the presidency of the high priest, but also to the fact that the priestly party was Sadducee; cf. also Jos. Ant. XIV. ix. 3-5, and other passages from both sources). This is in agreement with the constitution of the Jewish community, in which civil as well as religious authority was in the hands of the high priest. The priestly nobility were the leading persons in the community, and they were the most conspicuous members of the Sanhedrin. See CHIEF PRIESTS, HIGH PRIEST. The ἀρχόντες may be roughly identified with the ἀρχιερεῖς as the 'rulers' of the community. Occasionally they are mentioned where one would expect ἀρχιερεῖς: so frequently in Josephus (cf. Ac 4⁵ τοὺς ἀρχοντας καὶ τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους καὶ τοὺς γραμματεῖς, v. 8 ἀρχόντες τοῦ λαοῦ καὶ πρεσβύτεροι || v. 23 οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ οἱ πρεσβύτεροι). Very occasionally, however, the ἀρχόντες are mentioned alongside of the ἀρχιερεῖς (cf. Lk 23¹³), showing that the term might be used loosely for 'leaders' or 'rulers.' (2) πρεσβύτεροι = זקנים, in the first instance a general name for the principal men of the community, and so, הזקנים, a general designation of members of the Sanhedrin (cf. πρεσβυτέριον). But in actual practice it describes those members who were neither ἀρχιερεῖς nor γραμματεῖς. The πρεσβύτεροι made common cause with the ἀρχιερεῖς against the γραμματεῖς, i.e. they belonged in general to the Sadducee party (cf. Ac 23⁷). With this class may be identified the δυνατοί, πρῶτοι, or γνῶριμοι (unless qualified in some way, as, γνῶριμοι τῶν Φαρισαίων). Josephus frequently uses δυνατοί along with ἀρχιερεῖς, evidently as the equivalent of πρῶτοι. They were the secular nobility of Jerusalem, closely allied to the sacerdotal aristocracy. (3) οἱ γραμματεῖς, the scribes, a class which hardly requires description here. In the main they formed the Pharisee element in the Sanhedrin, though individual members of the other classes may have been Pharisees, and many Pharisees may have been scribes. See SCRIBES.

These names indicate with sufficient clearness the general character and composition of the court. It was an aristocratic assembly and high court of justice, in which, alongside of the priestly nobility and the noble families outside the priestly circle, representatives of the more numerous Pharisee party found a place, the Sadducee element, however, retaining the weight of influence.

As to the method of appointment to the Sanhedrin, nothing definite can be gathered from the Greek sources. According to the Mishna, new members were appointed by the court itself. At first, membership was confined to the aristocratic families. Subsequently the political rulers of the country seem to have appointed members by their own authority in some cases at least (cf. Salome's introduction of a Pharisee element).

The Greek sources agree that the Sanhedrin, while the Mishnic Sanhedrin was different, that the representations of the Sanhedrin in all respects, is now generally recognized. The point requires to be stated rather than argued here. The Greek sources, as appears from the above, were composed of chief priests, elders, and scribes presided over by the high priest. The chief priests and elders belonged in general to the Sadducee party, while the scribes formed the Pharisee element, which, however influential among the people, was seldom in the ascendant in the Sanhedrin. The Sanhedrin was thus a court of justice, representing the Jewish community. According to the other hand, it was a court of the leading Rabbis of the time, in which the Sadducees are mentioned only as heretics to be refuted. The presiding Rabbi bears the title Nasi (otherwise a political title), and another, apparently the vice-president, is called Ab-beth-din. It was an ecclesiastical rather than a political assembly. The two representatives of the two parties, marked in the Sanhedrin, give to the question: Who was the President of the Sanhedrin? We have lists of Rabbis filling the offices of Nasi and Ab-beth-din during the two centuries preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, whereas the Greek sources, which are contemporary, that during this period the high priest presided. The evidence is very evident: e.g. Gamaliel (cf. Ant. XVIII. 1, 2) is mentioned in the Mishna, but in Ac 5³⁴ he appears simply as Φαρισαῖος ἀνὴρ καὶ σοφὸς. The Greek sources are contemporary, while the Mishna is late and was compiled by the Rabbis of the Talmud.

The constitution and history of the Jewish community, from the Maccabæan revolt to the destruction of Jerusalem. Further, the evidence they furnish, while perfectly explicit, is largely incidental, proceeding from no theory, but simply reflecting the actual state of affairs. There is no trace of 'tendency,' and no trace of the influence of the Mishnic Sanhedrin, which sat at Jerusalem after the destruction of the Temple. The character of this Sanhedrin, which bore little more resemblance to the older court than the 'Sanhedrin' which Napoleon endeavoured to establish, was transferred to the assembly of which the contemporary Greek sources speak. The Sanhedrin served reliable traditions on political and legal matters. The Sanhedrin is not easy to determine. Considerable light is thrown upon it by those who admit its existence. See Bacher, art. 'Sanhedrin' in Encyclopædia Biblica (DB). In view, however, of the chaos which the destruction of Jerusalem made in the constitution and history of Judaism, and the radically false statements of the Sanhedrin which appears in the Mishnic tradition, statements based on the unsupported authority of the Talmud must be regarded as little better than conjectures.

2. History.—The Mishnic tradition connects the Sanhedrin with Moses' seventy elders, then with the alleged Great Synagogue of Ezra's time, then with such names of Rabbis as had escaped oblivion (cf. opening sections of Pirke Aboth), and so gives the Sanhedrin of Jamnia an appearance of historical continuity with the past. In point of fact, however, the Sanhedrin emerges into authentic history first in the Greek period. It must have existed earlier, but its origin is covered by the darkness which obscures all Jewish history from the time of Nehemiah (and even earlier) till the Maccabæan rising. The post-exilic Jewish community was nominally a theocracy, enjoying a certain measure of independence under foreign rule. At its head was the high priest, who was assisted by a γερονσία consisting chiefly of members of the aristocratic sacerdotal caste. The administration of secular affairs tended to produce in this caste a certain worldliness, a more or less exclusive interest in worldly business and culture, and consequently a readiness to fall under the influence of Hellenism. Passively opposed to them were the Hāsīdīm, the pious students of the Law and the legal tradition, whose interests and aspirations were exclusively religious. When the crisis came, the aristocratic caste, and consequently the γερουσία, or Sanhedrin, was in the main ready to yield completely to the pressure of an enforced Hellenism. The Hāsīdīm continued to offer steadfast but passive resistance to the persecutor. There arose, however, a third group, consisting of men who, while not specially in sympathy with the Hāsīdīm, wished to maintain the ancient religion and also the liberties of the people. The Hasmonæan family led them in armed revolt, and under the skilful leadership of Judas Maccabæus and his brothers they not only secured liberty, but achieved the independence of the Jewish State, of which the Hasmonæans and their loyal followers became the rulers. The old aristocracy was completely destroyed, and the remnants of it were reduced to acquiescence in the rule of the new dynasty. The Hāsīdīm, who had supported the Hasmonæans until liberty was secured, drifted away from them as the aspect of the struggle became more pronounced, and resumed towards them the same passive opposition which had characterized their relation to the older aristocracy. They were especially incensed at the Hasmonæan assumption of the title and functions of the high-priesthood, which they regarded as a usurpation and as a violation of the theocracy. At the death of John Hyrcanus, therefore, the Sanhedrin consisted of adherents of the Hasmonæan dynasty—the new aristocracy combined with the remnants of the old, comprising two of the three elements of the late commonwealth: the chief priests and the elders—and was overwhelmingly, if not exclusively, Sadducee. The Pharisees, the representatives of the earlier Hāsīdīm, stood aloof, and devoted themselves to the cultivation of their moral and religious influence with the view of making it necessary to conciliate them, and thus made an effort to do so.* But their terms were too high. They demanded that Hyrcanus should retain the high-priesthood, and thus destroy the new government which his father and uncles had established. His refusal to concede the demand made the opposition of the Pharisees to the ruling party more acute, and under Alexander Jannæus there was open war. The Sanhedrin, composed as it was of the Hasmonæan nobility, supported Jannæus. But the attitude of the people showed that the Pharisees could no longer with safety be left in opposition. Salome reversed the policy of her predecessors, and admitted them to a share in the government—for a time the dominant share—and to the Sanhedrin.

* Ac 5²¹ presents a certain difficulty in its use of the phrase τὸ συνέδριον καὶ πάντες τῆς γερονσίας. According to this, the γερονσία would have a wider meaning than πρῶτοι, which, in OT Apocrypha it is the regular word for synedrion. The identity of the two terms can hardly be doubted, as there is no evidence of the existence of any other court to which the name γερονσία might be applied. As it is unnatural to take xx in an explanatory sense (i.e. here), it must be supposed that the author used one of the words loosely, regarding συνέδριον as an inner circle within the general court. Possibly he wished to emphasize the fact that on this occasion not only the necessary quorum but the whole council of 71 members was summoned.

From that time onwards the Sanhedrin consisted of chief priests, elders, and scribes. It was a house divided against itself, and the bitter conflicts of Sadducee and Pharisee contributed in no small degree to the confusion and decay of the Jewish state, a half preceding the destruction of Jerusalem. The path of the Romans and of the Herodian house was made smooth by the inability of the Sanhedrin to act in unity and lead a united people. Pompey abrogated the kingship, but left the high priest at the head of the people and of the Sanhedrin, as heretofore. Gabinius went further, and established five συνέδρια in place of the single court, thus largely destroying its influence (57–55 B.C.). Some years later, however, the Sanhedrin was restored to its former position, and resumed the exercise of authority over the whole Jewish territory. Herod is stated to have commenced his reign with a massacre of the members of the Sanhedrin (Jos. Ant. XIV. ix. 4). According to another account (ib. XV. i. 2), he put to death 45 members of the party of Antigonus. His object was to destroy the influence of the Sadducee nobility, his constant opponents and only possible rivals. With the same object in view, he reduced the dignity and importance of the high-priesthood by making it no longer hereditary and tenable for life, and by frequent changes. Under his rule the Sanhedrin had but little influence,—less probably than at any other time. Herod's death was followed by the dismemberment of his kingdom, and the authority of the Sanhedrin ceased to extend beyond the limits of Judæa.

The procurators of the Roman procurators was on the whole amenable to the Sanhedrin. They had not the Herodian jealousy of the local nobility, and were content to leave considerable powers of internal control in their hands. Josephus and the NT bear witness to the influence and authority of the Sanhedrin during this period. So long as it retained control of the people, there was a fair measure of peace and good government. Ultimately, however, the people, under the influence of the Zealots, became unmanageable, and, against the advice of the older and more experienced aristocrats, embarked on the fatal revolt against the Roman procurators. Even then the Sanhedrin, had it been able, might have saved Jerusalem from total destruction. But the Zealots usurped its authority, rid themselves of those who counselled moderation, and inaugurated a Reign of Terror, which was terminated only by the entry of the Roman troops into the city.

Under the totally new conditions which prevailed after the destruction of Jerusalem, a new court established itself, bearing the name 'Sanhedrin,' but differing in essential features from the older body. The new Sanhedrin had no political authority, and was composed exclusively of Rabbis, whose discussions were purely theoretical. It exercised considerable judicial authority over the Jewish people, owing to its moral influence, but was quite without governmental importance. The real Sanhedrin fell with the city.

3. Functions and authority.—The trustworthy sources give only incidental indications of the functions of the Sanhedrin and the extent of its authority. The changes in the constitution, also, from the time of the Hasmonæans to the fall of the city, were so great, and the evidence so scanty, that it is difficult to say how much authority was actually vested in the Sanhedrin at any one time. Under the Hasmonæans it must have been considerable, both in administration and jurisdiction, though the stronger kings, like Jannæus, may have ruled very independently. It was much more limited under the Herodian kings, whose authority was quite independent of the Jewish constitution. By the Romans the constitution was as far as possible respected, and the Sanhedrin, though subordinate to the Roman authority, had again considerable powers, perhaps greater than at any other time. The system of short tenure of the high-priestly office would throw more influence into the hands of the permanent body. In these later days, also, its moral influence over the Jewish people was much wider than its actual power. Territorially

* Josephus (Ant. XIII. x. 5–8) relates a story which tells how Hyrcanus broke with the Pharisees, to whom he had hitherto been attached, and went over to the Sadducees. But a critical examination of the story, and a comparison of its presuppositions with the previous history as related in 1 Mac., show that what took place was not a breach with the Pharisees, but an unsuccessful attempt to conciliate them. There is no evidence that they sat in the Sanhedrin before Salome's change of policy. Cf. Wellhausen, Pharisæer und Sadduceer.

4. Sessions and procedure. — The Sanhedrin could sit on any day except the Sabbath and holy days; and as sentence of death could be pronounced (according to the Mishna) only on the day after a trial on a capital charge, such charges were not heard on the day preceding a Sabbath or holy day. The place of meeting is called by Josephus the βουλή, and was near the Xystus, which appears to be indicated in the Mishnic הלל קמח 'hall of hewn stone' (cf. Schürer, *GVV*³ ii. 211). It was close to the upper city, but not in it, as it was destroyed by the Romans before they had reduced the upper city (Jos. BJ vi. vi. 3). The references in NT to meetings of the Sanhedrin (cf. Ac 23) show that its proceedings might be enlivened by stirring debates, and by the stormy scenes which so often take place even in the most dignified public assemblies. In the case of ordinary trials, the procedure may have resembled that described in the Mishna. According to its account, the proceedings were conducted according to strict rules, and the members gave judgment in regular order. Twenty-three members formed a quorum, and while a bare majority might acquit, a majority of two was necessary to secure condemnation. If a majority of one gave a verdict of guilty, more members were summoned, until either the requisite majority was obtained for a legal verdict, or the full number of seventy-one members was reached, when a majority of one was decisive on either side.

LITERATURE.—This is extensive, comprising all Histories of the Jews during the period 200 A.D. to 70, as well as the relevant articles in all Bible Dictionaries and some special works. The most useful and accessible comprehensive statement is that of Schürer, *GPJ*³ ii. 122-211 (J.H.P. ii. 1, 163 ff.). The most illuminating account of the history and composition of the Sanhedrin is Wellhausen, Pharisæer und Sadducæer. To these may be added Hastings' DB, art. 'Sanhedrin' (Bacher); EBJ, art. 'Synedrion' (Canney), and 'Government' (Benzinger), § 28-31.

SATAN.—1. The word ‘Satan’ (שָׂטָן, Σατανᾱς),

This fact, together with the circumstance that references to Satan as an accuser of mankind occur only in those books of the OT which belong to a comparatively late period, has been taken as a proof of the theory that the Jewish belief in Satanic agency was introduced into the Hebrew theology from a foreign source. Traces appear elsewhere of early beliefs current among the Hebrews in the existence of demons, satyrs, liliiths, and the like, as in the use of the name 'Azazel,' a mysterious being mentioned in the Pentateuch in connexion with the ordinance of the scapegoat (Lv 16).

It has been supposed that upon those popular beliefs of early Semitic religion there was grafted, from Persian sources, the conception of a Prince of Darkness whose agency is similar to that which, in the religion of Zoroaster, is ascribed to the demon-god Ahriman, and that the belief in Satan and his angels as fallen spirits was thus introduced into Hebrew theology. But, as a matter of fact, the connexion between Satan and the Zoroastrian Ahriman is more apparent than real. A simpler explanation of the history of the doctrine of the personality and agency of Satan is that it has been the subject of development under the influence of a progressive revelation. The complete revelation of such a being as the malignant author of evil was reserved for the time when, with the advent of Christ's Kingdom, the minds of God's people were prepared, without risk of idolatry, or of the mischievous dualism of such a religion as that of Zoroaster, to recognize in the serpent of Eden and in the Satan who appeared as the adversary of Job and of Joshua, the great Adversary of God and man, whose power is to be feared and his temptations resolutely resisted, but from whose dark dominion the Son of God had come to deliver mankind.

2. If the OT is remarkable for its reticence on this subject, we find in the NT the doctrine of Satanic agency very fully developed. It meets us on the threshold. It is one of the elements of NT teaching. Jesus distinctly assume the reality of Satan and his kingdom as a mighty power for evil, opposed to the Kingdom of God in the world and in the hearts of men. This is nowhere more noticeable than in the Gospels, and there in the direct teaching of our Lord. At the outset of the Gospel narrative Satan appears as the antagonist of Christ. The story of the Temptation must have been communicated from the lips of Jesus Himself, is related by the three Synoptists. St. Mark (1¹³) informs us that Jesus was forty days tempted of Satan, using that word or title as a proper name. St. Matthew (ch. 4) and St. Luke (ch. 4), who relate the incident with clear circumstantiality of detail, note three distinct temptations. The arguments used by the Tempter are returned by Jesus. They describe the Tempter as ὁ διάβολος, 'the devil,' using the word for the malicious accuser. According to St. Matthew's account, Jesus addresses him as 'Satan.' St. Luke concludes the narrative with the significant words, 'When the devil had ended all the temptation, he departed from him for a season,' as if to indicate that the conflict with Satan was renewed and continued throughout our Lord's ministry. St. Matthew tells us that when the devil left Him, angels came and ministered unto Him. Thus the Synoptic Gospels clearly indicate the source of the temptation as being the suggestions of a person, and that one who is variously called Satan and 'the devil.'

Again, these same Gospels, as also the Acts of the Apostles, take notice of Christ's works of healing, and especially of those wrought upon persons possessed with demons, as illustrating the nature of His mission, which was to heal 'all that were oppressed of the devil' (Ac 10³⁸). St. Luke (22³) no less clearly than St. John (13²) informs us that Satan entered the heart of Judas and prompted him to betray his Lord.

In the recorded utterances of Jesus, in His express teaching, allusions are clearly made to the power and activity of Satan as a personal being, and the great Adversary of God and man. He attributes the trouble of the woman who had the spirit of infirmity to the malign power of Satan to afflict even the bodies of men (Lk 13¹⁶). Thus, so far from discouraging the popular belief which ascribed to Satan and his angels power over soul and body, Jesus distinctly affirmed it. Accused by the Pharisees, those to whose speculations in angelology and demonology that popular belief has been traced, of casting out demons through Beelzebub the prince of demons, Jesus, so far from controverting or throwing doubt upon the current opinions of the time, repels the charge by the argument that if Satan should cast out Satan, he would only be defeating his own ends and destroying his own work. Then He proceeds to say, 'But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you' (Mt 12²⁸, cf. Lk 11²⁰), illustrating His argument by the similitude of the strong man and the Stronger than he, implying that Satan is the strong man who would enslave mankind, but that Jesus Himself is the Stronger than he, who is to deliver the victims of Satan's power. That Jesus should thus have argued in controversy with the Pharisees has its own significance. We cannot explain it away on the principle of accommodation. Jesus could and did rebuke the spirit of Pharisaic traditionalism which led them to introduce all manner of mischievous subtleties to avoid the Law by their unauthorized interpretations, but never once did He even cast suspicion upon this part of the doctrine of the Pharisees. He accepted it without question.

Again, when the Seventy expressed their joy at the success of their mission, and exclaimed, 'Lord, even the demons are subject unto us,' Jesus replied, 'I beheld Satan fall from heaven,' and went on to say, 'But you power to tread upon serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy' (Lk 10¹⁷⁻¹⁹). Passing over such passages as those in the Sermon on the Mount, 'Whosoever is more than these cometh of evil' or 'the evil one' (Mt 5³⁷); 'Deliver us from evil' or 'the evil one' (6¹³), which have been explained, and even, as in the RV, translated as referring to the personal Author of Evil, we find Jesus in His discourses and in warnings addressed to His disciples making distinct allusion to Satan as the great adversary whom they have cause to fear. In the parables of the Sower and the Tares, the Evil One, variously termed 'the devil,' 'Satan,' 'the enemy,' 'the wicked one,' is described as seeking to frustrate the work of Christ by catching away the good seed sown in the heart (Mt 13¹⁹, Mk 4¹⁵, Lk 8¹²); or by sowing among the wheat (Mt 13²⁸⁻³⁰), the tares, 'the children of the wicked one' as the enemy that sowed them is 'the devil.' Here we see clearly illustrated the New Testament doctrine of the irreconcilable antagonism between the Kingdom of Christ and that of Satan.

Again, Jesus warns Peter on one occasion that Satan has asked and obtained the Divine permission to sift the disciples as wheat; and indicates that their only hope lies in the intercession of Christ Himself, who has prayed for Simon that his 'faith fail not' (Lk 22³¹).

Once more, in Christ's discourse on the Last Judgment, it is expressly stated that the everlasting punishment to which the unfaithful are condemned was 'prepared for the devil and his angels' (Mt 25⁴¹), a passage which well illustrates the manner in which, in the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus is consistently represented as a being of Satan and his power and kingdom. That is, that the doctrine is not so much set forth by way of dogmatic statement as assumed, taken for granted. Jesus does not enlarge upon it, but quietly accepts it, presupposes it as a matter about which there is no dispute. The belief is there, and Jesus sets upon it the seal of His authority.

To these examples from the Synoptic Gospels must be added the testimony of the discourses of the Fourth Gospel. The darkness under whose dominion, according to the introductory verses, the world is held, the dead weight, the vis inertiae of human insensibility to the Divine light, is no negative thing, but itself a power, a kingdom in deadly opposition to the Kingdom of Christ, and under the rule of Satan. The darkness attributes the opposition of His antagonists to the malice of the devil. So He says to the Jews, 'Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do' (Jn 8⁴⁴). The false accusations of Scribe and Pharisee, and the untiring malignity of their persecuting zeal, show the spirit and are the work of him who was a liar and a murderer from the beginning. Again, He speaks of Satan as the Prince of this world, and represents as the aim and the certain result of His own work, the judgment and the casting out of Satan and his kingdom (12³¹; cf. 14³⁰ 16¹¹).

3. The other portions of the NT confirm but do not materially add to the testimony of the Gospels on the subject of the personal power of the Evil One. Thus St. James (4⁷) merely counsels his readers to resist the devil, assuring them that he will flee from them; while in another passage (2¹⁹) he speaks of 'the demons' (τὰ δαιμόνια), evidently meaning by the term the subordinate agents of Satanic power, as believing that there is one God—a belief which fills them with terror. St. Peter assures us that Satan, whom he describes as ἀντίδικος ('adversary,' a technical or official word), and compares to a roaring lion, may be successfully resisted by the power of steadfast faith (1 P 5^{8,9}). St. John in his First Epistle repeats the teaching of his Gospel, and in the Apocalypse identifies Satan with the serpent of Gen. 3. He also with the accuser of Job (Job 1⁹), and foretells his coming doom. St. Paul accepts the current doctrine; but though in his Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians he seems to add to the teaching of Christ in the Gospels other elements from the demonology of the Pharisaic schools and from other sources (Eph 2^{6,11}, Col 2¹⁵), and in his Epistles to the Corinthians and to Timothy (1 Co 5⁵, 1 Ti 1²⁰) ascribes to Satan a certain power of discipline as a minister of Divine justice, really contributes to this branch of the current doctrine no essential element additional to that which is furnished in the Gospels. See, further, articles ACCOMMODATION and DEMON.

SAVIOUR.—'Saviour,' like 'to save' and 'salvation,' is a word of frequent occurrence in the OT.

It occurs mostly in the form of the ptepl. Hiph. of יָשַׁע = יָשַׁע. For the specific meaning of 'to save' in distinction from other cognate Heb. verbs, cf. art. SALVATION. Most commonly God is called the Saviour of Israel or individuals. A standing combination is 'God the Saviour' often with a possessive genitive (1 Ch 16³⁵, Ps 24⁵ 27^{1,9} 32² 65⁵ 79⁹ 95¹, Is 12² 17⁴⁰, Mic 7⁷, Hab 3¹⁸). To be a Saviour is God's exclusive prerogative (Ps 60¹ 108¹², Is 43¹¹ 43²²). As instruments of God, however, human deliverers likewise receive the title (Jg 3⁹ 13, Neh 9²⁷). There is no passage in the OT where the Messiah is called 'Saviour.' Wherever the Messiah is connected with the idea of salvation, He is not the subject but the object of it (Ps 28⁹ 144¹⁰, Zec 9⁹). This is different in Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphical literature, for here it is not merely declared that in the name of the Son of M...d, and that He is the Goel of their life in connexion with Him shall be... (4 Ezr 45⁶), but also that Christus liberabit creaturam (4 Ezr 13²⁴ 13²⁵), and that... the Lord will raise a Saviour for Israel (Test...), however, here also is more frequently called Saviour (πάντων σωτήρ, Ps-Sol 16⁷; αἰώνιος σωτήρ, Bar 4²²; ἄγιος σωτήρ, 3 Mac 6²⁹ 7¹⁶). Used of God, σωτήρ is synonymous with such terms as לַהֲשִׁיב, הַרְשִׁיעַ, הַלְוֶה (En 48⁷, 1 Mac 4¹¹, 3 Mac 7²³).

1. In the Gospels σωτήρ occurs but three times—Lk 1⁴⁷ 2¹¹ and Jn 4⁴². In the Song of Mary, the words 'My spirit has rejoiced in God my Saviour' are a reproduction of the common OT usage. In Lk 2¹¹ σωτήρ is not a formal title, but a descriptive designation of the Messiah, 'a Saviour who is Christ the Lord.' But the word evidently has a deeper meaning to the angels than the noun σωτηρία and the participle βυσθέντας have to Zacharias in Lk 1⁷¹ 74; for in the two latter passages the conception moves entirely within the OT limits. The doxology of Lk 2¹⁴ associates Jesus' saving work with the production of peace on earth among mankind as the objects of God's good pleasure. Here σωτήρ undoubtedly covers the Lord's Messianic work in the most universalistic sense. And it will be noticed that σωτήρ is synonymous with χριστός κύριος, so that the reference cannot be confined to our Lord's earthly ministry, but extends to His activity as the... Messiah. As 'peace' and 'good pleasure'... not the giving of life but the bestowal of reconciliation with God stands in the foreground (for the connexion between σωτήρ and εὐδοκία, cf. Ps-Sol 8³⁹). In Jn 4⁴² ὁ σωτήρ τοῦ κόσμου receives its import from the rich and pregnant meaning σώζειν and σωτηρία acquire in the discourses of the Fourth Gospel. As Jesus had represented Himself to the woman not as a mere revealer (vv. 19, 26), but as the giver of 'living water,' and 'water unto eternal life' (vv. 10, 14), so the Samaritans, in acknowledging Him as σωτήρ τοῦ κόσμου, prove to have attained a deeper conception of Messiahship than was commonly current among them, both as to the nature and extent of the Messiah's calling (cf., however, for σωτήρ τοῦ κόσμου, 4 Ezr 13²⁶).

2. The fact has not escaped observation, that St. Luke, who alone of the Synoptists introduces into his record the word σωτήρ, also employs it twice in Acts, where it occurs once in a speech of St. Peter (5³¹), and once in a speech of St. Paul (13²³). In 5³¹ we have the combination ἀρχηγός καὶ σωτήρ: Christ was made both by the Resurrection and by the Ascension. ἀρχηγός is found also in Ac 3¹⁵, another speech of St. Peter, and is here combined with ζωή; the Jews asked for a murderer to be granted them and killed the Prince of Life, whom God raised from the dead. It is plain that the meaning of σωτήρ in 5³¹ is determined by that of ἀρχηγός, and 3¹⁵... ἀρχηγός has specifically to do with... power, whence also in both passages the Resurrection is emphasized. Besides Lk., Hebrews is the only NT writing which employs ἀρχηγός (2¹⁰ 12²). The former of these two passages confirms the close connexion already found between σωτήρ and ἀρχηγός, for it calls Jesus ἀρχηγός σωτηρίας; in the other passage He is called ἀρχηγός καὶ τελειωτής πίστεως, 'the leader and perfecter of faith.' (For a thorough discussion of ἀρχηγός, cf. Bleek, Der Brief a. d. Hebräer, ii. pp. 301-303). The use of the word in combination with σωτήρ is interesting, because both are employed in the LXX of the 'judges' sent by God to deliver Israel (Jg 3⁹⁻¹⁵ 11⁶ 11¹² 12³ [σωτήρ = יָשַׁע, ἀρχηγός = יָצָא]). In Hebrews, however, the rendering 'captain,' which brings out the idea of military leadership, and the general rendering 'author,' are inadequate; the word plainly has the connotation of 'model,' 'example,' 'fore-runner,' the leader first experiencing in Himself and receiving in Himself that to which he leads others. Thus Jesus is ἀρχηγός σωτηρίας in 2¹⁰, because He Himself is conducted to glory by God, and in His attainment to glory draws with Him all the other sons of God. In 12³ Jesus' career of faith is represented as exemplary for believers; by preceding in the exercise of an ideal faith He enables others to follow in the same ἀγών of faith. He 5⁹ proves that where the author does not wish to emphasize this peculiar idea of precession, but merely to express the causal relationship between His work and the salvation of believers, he uses the general term αἰτίος: 'He became author of eternal salvation.' The reference to the Resurrection in both Petrine passages renders it probable that the word ἀρχηγός is here used in the same pregnant sense: Jesus is in virtue of the Resurrection a leader of life, one who has Himself attained unto life, and now makes others partakers of the same. As the murderer in Ac 3¹⁴ inflicts death, so the ἀρχηγός τῆς ζωῆς bestows life. σωτήρ, then, is identical with ἀρχηγός so far as the impartation of life is concerned, but leaves the exemplification of the life-content of the σωτηρία in Jesus' own Person unexpressed. In the speech of St. Paul (13²³) the use of σωτήρ clearly attaches itself to the LXX of the Book of Judges, if the reading ἡγάγε, of the TR be followed, for this is the verb by which the LXX in Jg 3^{9, 19} renders the Heb. הָגַעַ. If, on the other hand, we read with WH ἡγάγε, the more immediate reference seems to be to Zec 3⁸; but even then the word σωτήρ itself points back to the Book of Judges.

3. In St. Paul's writings, apart from the Pastoral Epistles, σωτήρ is found only twice—Eph 5²³ and Ph 3³⁰. The interpretation of the former passage is much disputed. The husband's relation as head to the wife and Christ's relation as Head to the Church are compared, and in this connexion Christ is called σωτήρ τοῦ σώματος (of the Church). This last statement seems to imply that Christ's headship over the Church is based on His being the Saviour of the Church-body. The question is whether this must be understood in the sense which will likewise be applicable to the relation between husband and wife. In the ordinary sense the husband could hardly be called the saviour of the wife's body. But Wagner (ZNTW vi. [1905] p. 220) has called attention to a passage in Clement (Ped. ii. 5) where it is stated that the Creator provides man with meat and drink τοῦ σώζεσθαι χάριν, 'for the sake of becoming alive.' Applying this to our case, it is evident that the very congruous sense: As the Creator is σωτήρ of the wife, by supplying the sustenance of her body, so Christ is σωτήρ of the Church, inasmuch as He endows her with eternal life; and for this reason both hold the position of head. This secures for σώζω the sense of 'endowing with eternal life.' The ordinary use of the passage, thus understood, would be that the ordinary religious use of σώζω is illustrated by analogy with a natural use of the verb which seems to be without precedent in earlier Biblical Greek. In Ph 3³⁰ the word σωτήρ has a specific eschatological reference: Christ is σωτήρ, because at the resurrection He will transform the body of believers into the likeness of His own glorious body. σώζω therefore here also is equivalent to the bestowal of life.

4. With sudden and remarkable frequency σωτήρ emerges in the Pastoral Epistles (10 times) and in 2 Peter (5 times). In the Pastorals there is further the peculiarity that the name is applied to both God and Christ: to God, in 1 Ti 1¹ 2³ 4¹⁰, Tit 1³ 2¹⁰ 3⁴; to Christ, in 2 Ti 1¹⁰, Tit 1⁴ 2¹³ 3⁶. In 2 Peter the reference is always to Christ. In Jude also God is once called 'our Saviour through Jesus Christ' (v. 25). The designation of God as Saviour can appear strange only on the basis of our established custom to reserve this title for Christ; on the basis of the OT it was a perfectly natural usage, for here always God, never the Messiah, is called σωτήρ. And in the NT itself the act of saving is, where a subject is indicated, as naturally ascribed to God as to Christ. In the few passages which reflect on the subject). Except perhaps for the one passage, 1 Ti 4¹⁰, it cannot be said that the meaning of σωτήρ in the Pastorals and 2 Peter differs from its ordinary import, or that of σώζω in the NT elsewhere. Christ is Saviour, because He abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel (2 Ti 1¹⁰); as Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ has an eternal Kingdom into which believers receive entrance (2 P 1). He is called 'the great God and Saviour,' in so far as believers look for the blessed hope and appearing of His glory (Tit 2¹³). The hope of eternal life comes from God our Saviour (Tit 1² 2¹⁴). The eschatological also is the reference in 'the commandment of the Lord and Saviour' (2 P 3²). In Tit 2¹⁰ the thought is implied that God is Saviour in the ethical sphere, whence 'the doctrine of God our Saviour' becomes an incentive to holy living. But peculiar is 1 Ti 4¹⁰ where God is called 'the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe.' Wagner proposes to apply here the same sense given to σωτήρ in Eph 5²³: God is Saviour of all men, inasmuch as He supplies them with natural life; Saviour especially of believers, because He supplies these with the higher life of the Spirit (l.c. p. 222, where Philo [de Mundi Opif. 60: God = εὐεργέτης καὶ σωτήρ] is quoted). This might seem to be favoured by 1 Ti 6¹³ 'God who keepeth all things alive,' or 'who giveth life to all things' (cf. the alternative reading ζωογονήσει for σώσει in Lk 17³³). But it is less in keeping with Tit 2¹⁴ where a similar universalism of God's σώζω is affirmed, and yet this is a matter of redemption, not of nature. Wagner is quite correct, however, in urging against von Soden that 'God σωτήρ of all men' cannot mean 'God is willing to be σωτήρ of all men'; and against B. Weiss, that it cannot mean 'God has made salvation objectively available for all men, while subjectively He realizes it only.' The solution of the difficulty must be sought elsewhere, viz. in connexion with the pronounced universalism of the Pastoral Epistles in general. The emphasis and the frequency with which this principle is brought forward is so probable that it is almost certain that the historical situation to which the Pastoral Epistles themselves lie at its basis, and at the basis also of the frequency with which the words σώζω, σωτηρία, σωτήρ, σωτήριος, σωτήριον are employed. There is absolutely no reason to suspect the writer of any intention to weaken or neutralize the principle of universalism. Besides involving deification of Christ in the Epistles, this would leave unexplained why, in other passages, the principle of universalism is enunciated with all desirable emphasis. The only plausible view is that the passages under review contain a warning against the dualistic trend of that incipient Gnosticism to whose early presence in the Apostolic period the Epistles of the First Captivity also bear witness. In a twofold sense it might become of importance to vindicate, over against this theory, the universalism of saving grace: on the one hand, in so far as Gnosticism on principle excluded from salvation those who lacked the pneumatic character; and, on the other hand, in so far as those belonging to the pneumatici might be considered to carry the power of salvation by nature in themselves. In other words, it might become necessary to emphasize that God saves all men, not merely one class of men, and that no man is by his subjective condition either sunk beneath the possibility or raised above the need of salvation. Perhaps also the emphasis upon the fact that God as well as Christ is Saviour, though perfectly natural from the OT point of view, is specially directed against a system which tended to separate between the Creator-God of the old dispensation and the Saviour-God, Christ, of the new. The recent investigations of Friedländer have shown that there existed long before the 2nd cent. of our era a Jewish type of Gnosticism, so that it can no longer be asserted that an anti-Gnostic polemic of this type per se militates against the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epistles.

In recent times attempts have been made to explain the rise and development of the NT conception of sōtēr.

In the cult of the 'Mysteries' sōtēr, in the sense of soteria, Wobbermin (Revue de théologie, 1896), who asserts that especially in the cult of the subterranean gods the word sōtēr was common as a name for the Deity. In two articles published in the Christliche Welt for 1899 and 1900, entitled 'Als die Zeit erfüllt war' and 'Der Heiland', Harnack calls attention to certain inscriptions from Priene and Halicarnassus, in which the Emperor Augustus is invested with Divine predicates, and called sōtēr, the one who has been filled for the good of mankind with gifts, a god whose birthday has brought to the world the evangelists connected with his person, the Zeus of the human race. Harnack assumes that the NT sōtēr calling Jesus sōtēr was influenced by these and similar pagan forms of sōtēr prevalent in the cult of the Emperors, and that the NT sōtēr may be seen at work with which the Pastoral Epistles and 2 Peter. He further suggests that St. Paul purposely used sōtēr because of the eudemonistic, political favour it had acquired from these pagan associations. St. Luke, in the Gospel of the Infancy, the writer of the Pastorals, the writer of 2 Peter, and the Fourth Evangelist, meant to represent Christ as the true sōtēr who lay the reality of what dead or living.—Soltan (LXX), who reaches the same conclusion. Harnack, on the basis of the same and other classical material, and also asserts derivation of the story of the virgin birth from the same pagan circle of ideas.—Wendland (ZNTW v. [1904], p. 100) also points out the use of sōtēr in the NT.

It is not proposed here to subject the above hypotheses to an exhaustive criticism. To some extent the later forms have been effectively criticised the earlier ones. Thus Wendland disposes of much in Anrich, Wobbermin, and Soltan. Wagner (ZNTW vi. [1905]) skilfully attacks the position of Wendland. A few remarks must here suffice. The derivation of the whole idea of sōtēr and soteria from the Oriental expectation of the Saviour-King is impossible, because OT prophecy not at all, and Jewish theology very rarely, applies the name מָלִיךְ, sōtēr, to the Messiah, and yet in eschatological Messianism it would be natural to look first of all for the evidence of such Oriental importation. As to the alleged connexion between the Greek mysteries and Christianity, it should be observed that the cult of the mysteries flourished in the 2nd cent. of the Christian era, and that none of the authorities quoted by Anrich in support of his view dates further back than this. The Asian inscriptions, of which Harnack and Soltan make so much, offer at the best some striking analogies to the NT mode of representation; but a real literary dependence cannot be made out, as even Wendland admits. In his second article, 'Der Heiland', Harnack expresses himself much more guardedly than in the first, after this fashion: 'On the Jewish and on the Grecian line numerous religious conceptions existed, which covered each other and so simply could pass over into each other.' sōtēr in the cult of the Emperors has quite a different sense from what it has in the NT; in Hellenism it never means 'the one who translates from death into life.' It is also exceedingly doubtful whether St. Paul consciously and purposely avoids the use of σωτήρ with reference to Christ, because of its pagan, idolatrous associations. Why did not St. Paul avoid κύριος for the same reasons? Why not σῶζειν and σωτηρία themselves as well as σωτήρ? A far more simple explanation is that the non-use of σωτήρ in the OT with reference to the Messiah continued to exert its influence in the usage of St. Paul. An allusion to the Emperor-cult and the rôle played in it by σωτήρ in Ph 820 is not impossible, for in the words 'our πολιτευμα is in heaven' πολιτευμα is emphatic. Where, apart from St. Paul, the σωτήρ is first joined to the Person of Christ, this is done in dependence on the Hebrew meaning of the name 'Jesus', i.e. in dependence on the OT (Mt 12). A priori there would be no objection to the hypothesis that in Luke and the Pastoral Epistles and 2 Peter and the Fourth Gospel there is a conscious appropriation of, and at the same time a protest against, the pagan use of the word, and that the sudden frequency of its occurrence in the Pastorals and 2 Peter is to be explained from this. As a matter of fact, however, this involves, according to Harnack, the unhistorical character of at least the present form of the Magnificat and of the message of the angels to the shepherds (Lk 147 and 21); further, the unhistorical character of at least the speeches of St. Peter and St. Paul (A 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). But even here considerable weeding of sōtēr is necessary. Thus he brings the χάρις, which is named as the motive of the Divine act of σῶζειν, into connexion with the benignitas and elementia of σωτήρ. P. 100. 25-9 shows how all this can be explained by the use of such far-fetched analogies. Similarly the με χρεὼν αἰωνίων of Tit 12 and 2 Ti 19 is treated by Wendland as an allusion to the eternity of the Roman Emperors, which takes no account of the fact that the latter was an eternity of post-not of pre-existence. In Tit 37, where he would find the same analogy, the eternity is not that of the σωτήρ, but of believers. Most, perhaps, could be said in favour of the Hellenistic association of such terms as ἐπιφανείας, μεγας θεός, and οὐρανολατρία in their joint use with σωτήρ (cf. Wagner, p. 232). But, taken as a whole, σωτήρ is shown to be a thoroughly OT conception by its dependence on σῶζειν and σωτηρία, about whose OT provenience there can be no reasonable doubt.

SAYING AND DOING.—The contrast between 'saying' and 'doing' is based on an axiomatic principle of the moral and spiritual life, which, notwithstanding its simplicity and obviousness, is apt to be overlooked, viz. the importance of character as distinguished from profession, the supreme value of ethical ideals and practice above ritual observance, the vital connexion between creed and conduct. The distinction thus suggested necessarily finds a large place in the teaching of our Lord, who, as the founder of a religion of inward reality, frequently emphasized the importance of 'doing' rather than 'saying.' 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 7²¹). Not that Jesus by any means underrated the importance of 'saying'; He made confession of His name one of the most solemn obligations of discipleship (Mt 10^{32, 33}, cf. Lk 8^{38, 39}). But a profession must rest upon a solid foundation of character. The recurrence, in various forms, of the phrase 'to do the will of God,' and the prominent place given to this conception, is a marked feature of Christ's teaching; see Mt 12⁵⁰; cf. 7²⁴⁻²⁷ 16²⁷ 25^{40, 45}, Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁷ 11²⁸ 13⁶⁻⁹ etc. 'Doing' is the testing quality of the Christian life (Mt 5^{19, 47}), and the sure and only way to spiritual enlightenment (Jn 7¹⁷). Of this doing of God's will Jesus Himself set the supreme and inspiring example (Jn 4³⁴ 5³⁰ 6³⁸). In contrast with this ideal of 'doing,' Jesus warned men against the subtle dangers of mere 'saying.' Even when sincerely meant. He checked the impulsiveness of a hasty and ill-considered profession (Mt 8^{19, 20}; cf. 26^{33, 34}, Lk 14²⁸); but His severest rebukes were reserved for those who substituted a hollow and obtrusive pretension for the realities of moral and spiritual character. It was the great sin of the religious leaders of the time that they were so strong in profession and precept, and so neglectful of practical righteousness; 'they say, and do not' (Mt 23⁸); and many too readily followed their example of easy formalism.—'This people honoureth me with their lips' (Mt 15⁸). The same contrast is boldly presented in the parable of the Two Sons (Mt 21²⁸⁻³²), with special reference on the one hand to the Pharisees and scribes, and on the other to the publicans and sinners, who were the true servants of the Kingdom of heaven. It is the profession, or even in the case of the Pharisees, the better than promises unfulfilled by practice. In this, as in other ways, 'many shall be last that are first; and first that are last' (Mt 13³⁰). The 'acted parable' of the withering of the barren fig-tree with its deceptive show of premature leaves, was a solemn warning against the danger and sin of 'saying' without 'doing' (Mt 21¹⁸⁻¹⁹, Mk 11¹²⁻¹⁴). Better that the 'saying' should follow than outrun the 'doing,' and be inspired by a truthful and humble judgment of even our best efforts and achievements; 'when ye shall have done all the things that are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which it was our duty to do' (Lk 17¹⁰).

SAYINGS (UNWRITTEN).—Certain sayings ascribed to Christ, though recorded by early writers, are not found written in the Gospels, and therefore are known as the Agrapha, or Unwritten Sayings of Our Lord. They are not as numerous as might perhaps have been anticipated, in view of the reported facts of Christ's ministry, and the comparative brevity of the actual reports of His discourses. The active ministry seems to have lasted for nearly three years. The records convey the impression of preachings and teachings, continued from day to day, with only rare intervals of repose. The audiences were frequently very large; they came from all quarters; the interest was widespread and intense. The words of this Galilæan Rabbi, who attracted some and provoked the wrath of others, but could not be disregarded by any, did not die in their utterance. It was an age when the memory was much cultivated. Christ's hearers would be ready to retain, and repeat at home, and amongst their friends, whatever had impressed them most in the new doctrines. It was a literary age also. Before the Third Gospel was written, many had already composed histories of Christ (Lk 1¹). The Fourth Evangelist states that he made a selection from available materials (Jn 20^{30, 31} 21²⁵).

There must once have been a large amount of Agrapha—of teachings and sayings which have not reached us in the pages of Holy Writ. While these were for the most part current in Palestine only, a few would spread farther, through the visits of Hellenists, and even Greeks (Jn 12²⁰), to Judæa. But the work of converting the world was reserved for the preaching of Christ's Apostles; and the converts' knowledge of Christianity was derived from the traditions which were delivered by the Apostles, and which were subsequently supported by the texts of the written Gospels. Meanwhile, the Hebrew Church of Palestine, which alone possessed first-hand knowledge of Christ's teachings, faded and ultimately perished with the scattering of the Hebrew race. In these historical conditions we find the reasons why so little of the teaching of the Master has survived beyond the actual contents of the four canonical records. The entire collection of Agrapha, gathered from all sources, is not large. When what is apocryphal, or certainly spurious, has been eliminated, the residuum is found to be small in amount, and not very valuable.

The extra-canonical Sayings are preserved in some MSS of the Gospels, and in those religious romances known as the Apocryphal Gospels, also in the Commentaries of the Fathers; but there are, besides, a few sayings which . . . that they are not included in the . . . but yet possess high attestation as being parts of the text of Acts and 1 Cor. They stand, or fall, with the estimate held of the authenticity of those books. In Ac 20³⁵ St. Paul quotes the words of the Lord; 'how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.' This is a specimen of the traditions (2 Th 2¹⁵) which were delivered by the first preachers of Christianity to their converts. In 1 Co 11²⁵ St. Paul adds a phrase not found in the Evangelists' accounts of the Institution, 'This do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me'; but v. 23 may be interpreted to intimate that the Apostle had enjoyed a special revelation ('I have received of the Lord'), independently of any tradition of the words heard by the Twelve. The report of our Lord's last commands to His Apostles (Ac 14-8), though in part a repetition of texts in the Gospels, is distinct in some expressions, and v. 5 has no parallel in the Evangelists. This verse is repeated by St. Peter in Ac 11¹⁶.

The sayings preserved in some MSS of the Gospels are of the nature of textual variations for the most part. A few are absolutely inadmissible on textual grounds; others are accepted only by certain MSS, which are not universally admitted may yet be authentic traditions, though extra-canonical: relics of the many sayings which were not recorded by the Evangelists. The test of these, and of others which are handed down by the Fathers, is by comparison with the sentiments which are recognized as elements in the character of Christ's teaching. The very ancient MS at Cambridge known as Codex Bezae, which exhibits many remarkable variations from the usual text of the Gospels, has between Mt 20²⁸ and 29 the following:

'But ye, seek ye from little to increase, and from greater to be less; but also when, having been invited, ye enter in to sup, not to go and sit down in the prominent places, lest a more honourable than thou should come in, and he that invited to the supper should come forward and say to thee, "Withdraw thyself"; and thou shouldest be put to shame. But if thou shouldest go and sit down in the inferior place, and one inferior to thee should come in, he that invited to the supper will say to thee, "Draw together still higher"; and this shall be to thee profitable.'

Between Lk 6⁴ and 5 the following occurs:

'On the same day he beheld a certain man working on the Sabbath, and said to him, "Man, if indeed thou knowest what thou art doing, thou art blessed; but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a transgressor of the law."

These paragraphs are not supported by sufficient evidence to warrant their inclusion in the text of the Gospels: whether they are worthy to be considered part of those traditions of Christ's teachings which preceded, and for a time accompanied, the written word, the English reader can judge for himself. Textual criticism has no place outside the region of documents.

The following Sayings, however, are in a different class. The evidence for them is so weighty that they are received into the text by some critics; but to others the evidence is insufficient; yet it will hardly be denied by any that the presence of the words in so many ancient documents stamps them with distinct authority, and demands their recognition as traditions of the Master's teachings. We refer here to the Doxology (Mt 6¹³); the verse Mt 17²¹; the words, 'and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt' (Mk 9⁴⁰); 'Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them' (Lk 9^{55, 56}); 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do' (Lk 23³⁴). All these passages except the last are rejected as parts of the text by the Revisers, and those of the same school of criticism; nor do they accept as undoubtedly genuine the story of the Adulteress in Jn 8, and the concluding verses of Mk.; yet the words attributed to Christ in these two sections, and in the texts cited above, must certainly commend themselves to unprejudiced ears as authentic reminiscences of the Master's sayings, even if we refuse them a place in the canonical records.

The Sayings of Christ which have been preserved outside the NT by ecclesiastical writers, though not actually numerous, are too many for quotation in this article. The following are specimens; and, in different ways, of interest and importance.

Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 5. 43) quotes Peter thus:

'The Lord said to the Apostles, "If, then, any one of Israel wishes to repent and believe through my name on God, his sins shall be forgiven him. After twelve years go forth into the world, lest any one say, We did not hear."

Origen (in Joan. ii. 6) has:

'If any one goes to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, there the Saviour himself saith: "Just now my mother the Holy Spirit took me by one of my hairs and carried me off to the great mountain Tabor."

Jerome quotes from the same Gospel as follows:

(a) 'After the resurrection of the Saviour, it records: "But when the Lord had given the linen cloth to the priest's servant, he went to James and appeared to him. For James had taken an oath that he would not eat bread from that hour in which he had drunk the cup of the Lord, until he should see him rising from them that sleep." And again, a little farther on, "Bring me, saith the Lord, a table and bread." And there follows immediately: "He took the bread, and blessed, and brake, and gave to James the Just, and said to him, "My brother, eat thy bread, inasmuch as the Son of Man hath risen from them that sleep"' (de Vir. illust. ii.).

(b) 'There is the following story: "Behold, the Lord's mother and his brethren were saying to him: "John the Baptist baptizes unto remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him." But he said unto them: "What sin have I done, that I should go on?"' is very thing, which iii. 2).

(c) 'We read, too, of the And never rejoice, except when brother in love" (in Eph. 5⁴¹).

The 'Sayings' contained in a fragmentary papyrus of the 3rd cent., discovered at Oxyrhynchus, are in part equivalent to texts in the Gospels, but the following have no parallels:

(a) 'Except ye fast to the world, ye shall in nowise find the kingdom of God; and except ye make the Sabbath a real Sabbath, ye shall not see the Father.'

(b) 'I stood in the midst of the world, and in the flesh was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them; and my soul grieved over the sons of men, because they are blind in their heart, and see not.'

(c) 'Wherever there are two, they are not without God; and wherever there is one alone, I say, I am with him. Raise the stone and there shalt thou find me; cleave the wood and there am I.'

The so-called 2nd Ep. of Clement of Rome (c. iv.) has:

'For this cause, if we do these things, the Lord said, "Though ye be gathered together with me in my bosom, and do not my commandments, I will cast you away, and will say unto you, "Depart from me, I know you not whence ye are, ye workers of iniquity."'

Hippolytus (Philosop. v. 7) quotes the Gospel according to Thomas thus:

'He that seeketh me shall find me in children from seven years old onwards, for there I am manifested, though hidden in the fourteenth age.'

* Other fragments of MSS containing words ascribed to Christ have lately been procured from the same place, but the text was not available when this article was printed. It is not unreasonable to anticipate additions to our store of Agrapha by future discoveries amongst Egyptian ruins.

Many sayings ascribed to Jesus have been collected from Mohammedan sources (cf. art. CHRIST in MOHAMMEDAN LITERATURE [in Appendix]). One such passage is: 'When Jesus was asked, "How art thou this morning?" he would answer, "Unable to forestall what I hope, or to put off what I fear, bound by my works, with all my good in another's hand. There is no poor man poorer than I am."' The last sentence agrees in sentiment with a well-known text; but these Mohammedan traditions of Christ's words are for the most part of no value.

SCARLET.—1. Scarlet, as a dye, was obtained from the body of the female kermes insect (Lecanium ilicis), a native of S.E. Europe, where it lives upon a species of dwarf oak (Quercus coccifera). The insect is of the family Coccidæ, to which also the cochineal of Mexico belongs. Its Latin name (derived from its appearance) was grana; hence the dye was called 'grain' (cf. Milton, Penser. 33, Par. Lost, xi. 242; Spenser, FQ i. vii. 1; see Skeat, Etym. Dict. s.v.).

2. The colour is correctly represented by its name. Mt 27²⁸ is the only passage in the Gospels where the word 'scarlet' (κόκκινος) occurs, and it is there a substitute for the 'purple' of || Mk 15^{17, 20}, Jn 19^{2, 5}. It is the latter word that has changed its meaning (see art. PURPLE).

The Gr. sense of colour seems to have been so comparatively dim and uncertain, that it is almost impossible to ascertain what the real idea was which they attached to any word alluding to hue' (Ruskin, Mod. Painters, iii. 225. Cf. also Gladstone, Juv. Mundi, p. 540).

Yet the ancients, as a rule, distinguished scarlet from purple p. 116). Probably Mt. gives the colour actually used, Mk. and Jn. the colour intended.

3. The 'scarlet robe' was undoubtedly a military cloak, either that of a common soldier (sagum) or that of a officer (paludamentum). The latter was of better quality; both were regularly of scarlet (Ellicott, Hist. Lectures, p. 348 n.). Westcott (on Jn 19^{2, 5}) emphasizes, in the crown and robe, the idea of victory as well as of royalty: 'this blood-stained robe was the true dress of a kingly conqueror. . . . So He was through life the suffering King, the true Soldier.'

SCIENCE.—1. The word 'science,' in the language of to-day, refers sometimes to a process and sometimes to the results of that process. The process itself is the representation in thought of the facts and events of human experience. The result of this process is the formulation of statements and doctrines which are regarded as true. We therefore use the word 'science' generally to embrace both (1) scientific method and (2) scientific truth. The object of science is to apply its method to every field of possible knowledge, and so to include within its doctrine all the facts of human experience.

I. STATE OF SCIENCE IN THE CIVILIZATION IN WHICH CHRIST LIVED.—1. Relation to Hellenism.—The civilization of Palestine was complex and syncretic. The two main factors in it were the ancient Hebrew culture (largely tinted by other Oriental elements), which preponderated, and Hellenism. This latter was a power extending throughout the Greco-Roman world, and tending to influence every department of life; and so, despite the innate conservatism of the Jews, the more external elements of Palestinian culture received a strong Hellenistic tincture. The organism of the State was deeply affected, public institutions were modified, and social relations not untouched. The arts, too, were influenced, but, by the time the science of the Hebrews was reached, the wave of Hellenism had lost much of its vigour. The mind of the Jew was equipped against it. The Greek language was, after all, but slightly known (cf. Ac 21⁴⁰ 22³), and, though Herod surrounded himself with Greek literati and many Jews received a Greek education abroad, these facts indicate the limit of the penetration of Greek science into the life of the Jews. This may be illustrated by reference to St. Paul. Though brought up to some extent under Hellenistic influences in Tarsus, his culture was Greek only in its form and in certain of its graces. To the Hebrew mode of thought and Rabbinic logic—inward and characteristic elements of Jewish culture—he tenaciously clung. His writings are all those of a Jew rather than of a Hellenist. It is, then, unnecessary to attend to Hellenistic thought when considering the 'science' that formed the intellectual background of the teaching of Christ. The Aristotelian logic had no nameable influence upon His own thought, or upon the mind of the Scribes who reported His words, or upon the common people who 'heard him gladly.' The logic of the society in which Christ moved was Rabbinic and not philosophic, and its standard of truth was religious rather than scientific.

2. Hebrew standard of truth.—We recognize the difference between the scientific standard, those facts which accurately and impartially describe observed facts; that is, the test of truth is its logical form as descriptive. This notion of truth was originally foreign to the Hebrews. The words in the OT which are translated 'true,' 'truth,' etc., may be traced to roots which have primarily an ethical meaning and convey 'the notion of constancy, steadfastness, faithfulness' (see art. 'Truth' in Hastings' DB). Hence they are more generally applied to a person than a proposition, and attach to a proposition only in a derivative way, the sayings of God being 'faithful' because His character is beneath and behind them,—they are established in the Divine nature, and so cannot be moved. Thus, that a proposition should tally with facts did not stand out with such importance as it does for us moderns: indeed, to the ancient Hebrew, truth was a matter of motive and character rather than of accuracy. Thus in the Decalogue there is no actual and direct condemnation of lying, but the prohibition is directed against the bearing of false witness, the dastardly motive being the thing denounced, rather than the failure accurately to describe facts. This comes out in strong relief in the Jewish notion of history. The aim of the historian was less to give a record of events than to edify. Indeed, by the time of Christ the whole circle of historical ideas had received a fanciful character, because that narrative was deemed to be the best which gave the most laudatory account of the Hebrew heroes.

Truth then, according to the Hebrew mind, was that which edified, and not merely accurate description of fact. Only from this point of view can we understand many NT sayings with reference to truth. Jesus claimed that He Himself was the truth. In saying 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life' (Jn 14⁶), He is not referring to what we call scientific truth, but rather edifying and ennobling thought, or, as explained above, religious truth. Pilate, a Roman logician, had quite a different conception of truth. When he said 'What is truth?' (Jn 18³⁸), he was moving in a universe of thought foreign to the Jews.

3. Hebrew method of attaining truth.—The Hebrew idea of truth being so different from our scientific standard, it is to be expected that their way of reaching it would correspondingly differ from our scientific method,—the observation and description of facts. The Hebrew method did not always seek facts, and, when they were at hand, was not content simply to describe them.

(1) Facts were sometimes 'invented.'

This may be illustrated by reference to Talmudic geography. The Talmud answers the question * as to which islands belong to Israel and which do not, by saying that if a straight line be drawn from Amanus (a mountain in the north) to the River of Egypt, those islands situated within this line belong to the land of Israel, etc. But, of course, no islands ever belonged to the land of Israel at all. Again, it is deliberately asserted that there are seven seas in Palestine. Only six are named, but one of these is named twice in order to make up the number seven, merely so that the holy number may be introduced. And, further, apart from this specific enumeration, as included in Palestine. These islands, the first, islands are said to exist which have never been actually increased in order to bring in the sacred seven.

(2) Metaphysical explanation was sometimes attempted, description in itself being considered inadequate. The introduction of the number seven above is an illustration of this. Ps 24 gives another type, where Jahweh is praised for His power and skill in making the solid and immovable earth to rest upon the fluid and boundless sea. The observation is a bad one, but it is not concern us. The point for us to notice is that to the observation that the land is 'founded upon the sea' is added the metaphysical explanation that this is a miraculous exhibition of the power of God. The fact that this is poetry, and could be paralleled with passages taken from modern Western poetry, does not affect the fact that in Jewish passages are admitted. In contradiction to scientific statements, whereas in Hebrew literature there is no such distinction. What is said in poetry is equally true to the Hebrew mind when written in prose, as when the idea of the windows of heaven is repeated in such various literary styles as are found in Gn 7¹¹, 2 K 7², Mal 3⁰. Hence the indiscriminate Jewish doctrine of inspiration, which made no distinction between styles of literature, and applied to all passages of the Canon an equal measure of truth.

The Jews did, of course, accumulate, as the Talmud and the OT sufficiently show, a mass of valid technical knowledge. They knew much concerning metals, such as gold; other chemical substances, such as soda; and certain processes of metallurgy. The Jews, says Ernst von Meyer, 'did indeed possess a certain disjointed knowledge of chemical processes acquired accidentally, but these were not scientific results alone, and not with the comprehensive scientific explanation which we have here von Meyer means what has been called "miraculous" above. They never made experiments. Any knowledge concerning nature at which they arrived were due to haphazard reflexion upon chance occurrences. Accurate description was not their object, nor did they attempt it. The facts of nature, like the incidents of history, were to them properly explained by reference to other things than those which might be observed. Rabbi Joshua, for instance, in the following account of rain: "The clouds ascend to the heavens, then stretch themselves out like a sponge and take up the rain-water; but having holes in them like a sieve, they let the water fall through on to the earth." The only one drop falls at a time is due to a miracle. If otherwise great harm would be done to the earth. The Rabbis explained thunder as the crash of the clouds, or as the splitting of ice in the clouds when struck by the hot lightning. Earthquakes were variously described as God clapping His hands, or sighing, or treading upon His footstool. Of all scientific efforts the Jewish teachers seem to have been most successful in Astronomy. They described the heavens as a hollow, dome-like, half-ball, spread over the flat earth. The stars they held to be fixed to the inner surface of this dome, firmly fastened and others moving along

To whatever branch of knowledge we turn, we find that observations are an insignificant part of the system of teaching about nature, and for the method of mere description we have the method of metaphysical explanation.

4. Defects of Hebrew thought.—The history, political and social situation, and religious exclusiveness of the Jews assisted in the cultivation of a type of thought as characteristic and powerful as any that the world has seen. It is not enough to say that the Hebrew mind was 'scientific'; for, while it shares many of the characteristics of the thought of other Semitic peoples, in some respects it stands out from them in bold contrast. Among the fine qualities of the Hebrew mind were: (1) a sanity and sobriety of thought which preserved their religion and literature from all those offensive and extravagant traits which mark the popular religions of Syria, Asia Minor, and Arabia; (2) an extraordinary gift for the observation of individual incidents and facts, as appears in the inimitable narratives of the historical books of the OT; the vivid portraiture, satire, and denunciation of the prophets; and the marvellous, if often trivial, minuteness of Rabbinic discussions; (3) unparalleled energy and sense of individuality; and (4) a will that alone can account for the fate of a people which has been exposed to a more bitter persecution and more relentless fate than any other race in history. Of these four notable characteristics the third and fourth are obviously not such as tend to the cultivation of the scientific frame of mind. With the first and second it is quite otherwise—sobriety of thought and a keen eye for particulars are necessary to a scientific observation. But at the same time they are insufficient for scientific description, which demands certain mental qualities in which the Hebrew mind was notably deficient—breadth of vision, systematic and architectonic power, consistent and persistent thinking. An examination of Hebrew thought discovers, in general, a notable defect, attributable to this failure in breadth of grasp and over-emphasis on the particular, the undeveloped character of the emotional and moral life. This defect is the absence of the power of logical abstraction, and it shows itself in two ways that are of considerable importance—first, the Hebrew mind could not frame general definitions; and, secondly, it had no notion of general law.

The Western (Greek) mode of definition per genus et differentiam we commonly assume not only to be the only mode possible, but also to be indispensable to thought. While it is indispensable to our modern thought, especially with its highly developed scientific method, it was not indispensable to the Hebrews, for they did without it. The Hebrews defined, not by reference to a class—as when we say 'man is a rational animal'—but by reference to a type, as when it is implied that natural man is Adam, and redeemed man is Christ, the second Adam (Ro 5, 1 Co 15).

In the second place, this inability to think abstractly prevented the Hebrews from arriving at the notion of natural law. The word 'law' in Hebrew literature always meant the arbitrary pronouncement of a ruler (of course a despot) or deity. Law meant nothing general or abstract. The Torah was an actual and definite direction given in Jahweh's name by the priest, and was either judicial, ceremonial, or moral. The various synonyms for torah have in general the same definite, particular character—'judgment,' 'statute,' 'commandment,' 'testimonies,' and 'precepts'*

* Respectively mishpāt, hukkah, mitwah, 'edoth, pikkudim.

(see art. 'Law (in OT)' in Hastings' DB). When used in a general sense to indicate a large section of the OT, it is in no way abstract, but only collective.

The nearest approach which Hebrew thought offers to our highly abstract natural laws is to be found in certain proverbial sayings (e.g. Jer 31²⁹, Mt 18²⁻³), and a few rough groupings of empirical facts which we shall notice later on. There is nothing, however, that in any real sense corresponds with the modern idea of law as 'the résumé or brief expression of the sequences of certain groups of perceptions existing only 'when formulated by man' (Nari Pearson). The same characteristic explains the absence of abstract philosophic terms from Hebrew literature. The doctrine of freewill, e.g., though constantly implied in the OT, is never abstractly stated. 'Instead of saying man is free, Scripture says man can choose; he can act; he can do' (Delitzsch, Syst. of Bibl. Psychol. p. 192).

5. Hebrew knowledge of Nature.—It follows from what we have seen that the Jews had no sound body of scientific doctrine. They had no very clearly defined conception of the earth and its surroundings, either in space or at the time of Christ. They regarded the earth as the 'middle point of the universe. The heavens were a mere material covering or dome (Is 34⁴ 40²², Ps 104², Job 37¹⁸), with doors (Gn 28¹⁷, Ps 78²³) and windows (Gn 7¹¹ 8², 2 K 7²⁻¹⁹), and the earth rested on the sea (Ps 24²). These are obviously little more than childish impressions of sense-impressions. The same is true of the department of physical science, including Astronomy. There is no criticism, no classification, no formulation of laws, no definite effort towards a coherent description of phenomena. When we turn to Mathematics, we find traces of very rudimentary knowledge. The square is mentioned (Ex 27¹ 28¹⁶), and the circle (Is 44¹³), the plumb-line and scales were known (Am 7⁷, 2 K 21¹³). The four simple mathematical processes appear also to have been practised: Addition (Nu 12² 26⁷), Subtraction (Lv 27¹⁸, Ex 16²³), Multiplication (Lv 25⁸, Nu 34⁶), Division (Lv 25²⁷⁻⁵⁰).

The only department of thought in which the Hebrews can claim to have elaborated anything at all worthy to be called 'science' is literary criticism. This, however, was pursued, not in a modern spirit of desire for knowledge, but because the disasters which the nation had experienced drove its religious leaders to a more careful study and preservation of the Law, in order that, by obeying it, the anger of God might be appeased and the prosperity of the people might return. The scribes 'busied themselves in providing for all conceivable' legal 'cases that might occur, and especially in making a hedge or fence round the Law, i.e. in so expanding the compass of legal precept beyond what was laid down in the Pentateuch and in the oldest form of tradition, that it might be impossible for a man, if he observed all their traditional rules, to be even tempted to transgress the Law' (see art. 'Scribes' in Hastings' DB). Thus the literary and legal 'science' of the scribes had all the defects of the 'scientific' temper of the Jews—the criterion of truth was not descriptive accuracy, but edification, the method was inventive and metaphysical, there was an absence of generalizing and systematizing power, and an over-emphasis of the particular and concrete.

II. RELATION OF CHRIST TO THE 'SCIENCE' OF HIS TIME AND RACE.—We have now to inquire as to the mind of Christ in respect of the various matters discussed above, that is, we have to ask whether His standard of truth was Hebrew or modern; whether He sought to explain nature by the metaphysical or the descriptive method; whether He shared the mental characteristics of the Hebrews or not, and whether we are to assume that He held those erroneous views of nature which were common among the Hebrews.

1. Among the most obvious characteristics of the mind of Christ is His sense of the radical opposition between Himself and the life of His own day. This opposition expresses itself at every turn in many ways. The political ambitions of the Herodians, the worldlyness of the Sadducees, the pride of the Pharisees, and the carnal carelessness of the generality, alike met with His denunciation and appeal. The traditions of the scribes He altogether rejected, and even the authority of the Law He subjected to a criticism. Against all existing systems of thought, all Rabbinical teaching, all conventional observance, He set up one authority—His own consciousness of God, Himself. In a unique way He lived in the realities of things, never compromising, never with double mind. To the great reality of the Father and of the Kingdom was added the great reality of Himself, in simple deep-founded truth.

2. We have seen that the Hebrew notion of truth differed from the modern notion, in that it rather attached to the nature of a person than to the quality of a proposition. A proposition was true, not so much because it tallied with certain facts as because it had its origin in a certain character. In other words, the Jewish idea of truth was religious, while the modern idea is scientific. But the Jewish idea was never purely religious. It was confused with metaphysical and mechanical elements. In the mind of Jesus, however, this Hebrew notion of religious truth is purified of all foreign elements, and ceases all contact with the accidents of experience, making its home in the soul and in God.

It is noteworthy that the Synoptists report no sayings of Jesus from which these conclusions as to the meaning of Christ attached to the word 'truth' can be drawn, though, when once they have been drawn, it is seen that none of the sayings of Jesus contradicts them. In the Synoptics the word 'truth' is not used by Jesus except in such phrases as 'of a truth,' the Gr. equivalent for 'Amen' (Lk 9³⁷ 12⁴⁴ 21⁵). When we come to the Fourth Gospel, however (which we assume to be of sufficient historicity to allow us to use the words ascribed to Jesus as representing His thought), we find the words 'true' and 'truth' continually in the mouth of Christ. Now, while the criterion of truth in the mind of Christ does not vary, we must not be surprised if different shades of meaning are expressed from time to time by the same words 'true' and 'truth.' Indeed, Jesus does not use the word 'truth' always with the same nuance of meaning. In the first place, it represents a quality in a person (4²³ 18³⁷), then a quality which attaches to actions (3²¹), and, finally, that which may be communicated from God to man in thought so as to affect the life and give the quality referred to above (8³² 14¹⁷ 16¹³ 17¹⁷). The whole conception is summed up in 14⁶, where Jesus says, 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life'—the Personality of Jesus is a revelation that is ethical and vitalizing, and that comes to men to quicken consciences, illumine minds, and arouse affections. There is, indeed, in this thought an element answering to our modern notion of accuracy; it is not, however, explicit, but implicit in the idea of a faithful or reliable character. Thus Jesus carries the Hebrew idea of religious truth to its final expression, and in so doing neither anticipates nor challenges the modern notion of scientific truth. To the modern mind truth is description of phenomena—to Christ it meant spiritual insight: by the modern mind it is reached through demonstration—as for Christ it was instinctive or intuitive—the modern mind it is part of a system of thought—with Christ it was an element or moment in life.

'ἀληθεια,' says Beyschlag, 'is to Him not this or that worldly and finite truth, but the truth of God, the revelation of God as the eternally good, who, as such, is related to the world . . . it is the sister of ἀγάπη, for the revelation of God is a revelation of holy love' (NT Theol. ii. 429). See also TRUTH.

3. But although 'truth,' according to the mind of Christ, was a Hebrew and Jewish concept and not the modern scientific notion, the thought of Jesus was free from a scientific spirit which we have seen to be characteristic of the Jews, though it shared some of their conceptions as to natural phenomena.* If His thought was not scientific, neither was it pseudo-scientific. Neither the midrash of the Jewish annalist nor the magical metaphysics of the Rabbis has any place in His teaching. While He was a keen observer of nature (Mt 6²⁶⁻²⁸ 13³¹⁻³² 36-43, Mk 4²⁶⁻²⁹, Lk 13⁹⁻²⁰ 21²⁷), His utterances about nature never attempted explanations beyond the reach of observation; and while His judgment was to an unequalled degree independent, He neither criticised the scientific opinions of His day nor attempted to add to humanity's inadequate store of knowledge. Whether this abstinence from scientific speculation and instruction was intentional (as Wendt suggests), or the natural result of His unwavering and complete concentration of soul upon 'His Father's business,' is not important in this connexion. It is sufficient to note that He eschewed alike Rabbinical explanations and scientific research, dealing finally only with 'those matters which are naturally the objects of spiritual intuition,' and which, unlike natural phenomena, cannot be adequately investigated by the human understanding.

So far as nature is concerned, then, we may say that the knowledge which Jesus exhibits in His sayings is just such as a free mind with great natural powers of fresh observation might gather from a joyous intercourse with the ordinary aspects of the material world.

4. One matter of considerable controversial importance, however, in this connexion demands brief attention. What was the attitude of Jesus to the literary 'science' of the Rabbis? It was a double attitude. First, He abolished certain precepts of the Law itself (Mt 5²²⁻³⁸), and added others on His own authority (vv. 32-34, 39); and, secondly, He disparaged and discredited the learned societies of scribes, and, by the weight of His own authority, overthrew their teaching. But this repudiation of the teaching of the schools and criticism of the Law was not conceived in any modern scientific temper, or achieved by means of modern critical apparatus. It was the inevitable outcome of Christ's conception of Divine truth as a living reality within Himself. His utterances concerning the OT were all from this point of view. He judged the OT not to their own value, but to their value as they stood to any modern scientific criticism, modern or ancient. This is true even in the case of the quotation from Ps 110. 'He did not weigh a truth,' says Bishop Moorhouse, 'in what we should call critical balances . . . the question of the age or authorship of any passage in the OT was never either stated by our Lord Himself or raised by His opponents.'

5. We have next to ask whether we may conclude from His recorded sayings that Jesus shared those logical characteristics which we have seen to be at the foundation of Hebrew 'scientific' thought. We noticed two main marks of the Hebrew mind—its vivid, simple, and temperate apprehension of the details of life and nature, and its inability to take such a wide and comprehensive view of fact and experience as would make the generalizations of modern science possible. The first of these is pre-eminently characteristic of the thought of Jesus. The vivid originality, profound simplicity, and pictorial impressiveness of His speech make every reader of His words agree that 'never man so spake.' His insight into the human soul, His parables so true to life, His startling paradoxes, His telling object-lessons, all show the best traits of Jewish thought carried to their highest power. The concrete, stirring, and simple elements of life are seized and appreciated with the imagination of the poet and the practical sense of the workman. Jesus is never abstract, never modern—but always particular and Hebrew. But, on the other hand, it is impossible to speak of the mind of Jesus as defective in the sense given above. While He always expressed Himself with the simple concreteness characteristic of Hebrew thought, it cannot be said that He is limited by it, for it is the best possible medium or dialectic in which to enunciate religious truth. It is scientific truth which demands abstraction, with definitions per genus et differentiam and laws. We have seen that Jesus remained always and wholly within the world of religious truth, and always and wholly outside the world of scientific statement. He was not a theologian who theorized about religious truth—He was the Truth. He was not a philosopher who tried to prove the being of God—He declared God. And so the apparatus of scientific description was for Him unnecessary. It would be futile to speculate as to whether He could have used it had He wished. All we need say is that He was a Jew with a Hebrew mind of the highest possible type, and so in the fullest possible sense equipped to utter the highest revelation of God which has been vouchsafed to man.

* Jesus' evident acquiescence in Jewish demonology, at least in its main features, is a case in point.

SCORN.—Of scorn pure and simple there is remarkably little trace in the recorded words and actions of Jesus Christ. Whereas other teachers of lofty morality have usually treated with some contempt those who made no effort to approach their ideals, Christ's attitude towards the sinner was uniformly one of sympathetic help. He alone recognized the intimate relation which exists between the Creator and the human race, and His knowledge of this relation and of the possibilities of each individual prevented Him from despising man, whom the Father had made in His own image, however much that image might have been defaced. Thus it is that we never find Him using sarcasm, a form of scorn calculated to wound rather than to improve. Even the elpweta of Socrates, the affected self-depreciation which threw ridicule upon the egotism of others, has no counterpart in the Gospels. When Jesus used scorn, He employed it as a skilled physician, who wounds with the intention of healing. It is thus that He uses it to the Pharisees, whose cloak of self-righteousness needed to be pierced through with some sharp weapon, if they were to be brought to the state of mind in which they might be capable of any improvement.

1. The scorn of contempt.—A single word of unmitigated contempt is recorded by St. Luke as used by Christ. It occurs in His answer to the threat used by certain Pharisees of danger from Herod Antipas (Lk 13³¹⁻³²). 'Go ye,' He said,

'and tell that she-fox.' The phrase τῇ ἀλώπεκι παύει is certainly surprising at first sight, and unlike any other phrase employed by our Lord, not even excepting His comparison of the scribes and Pharisees to 'whited sepulchres,' 'serpents,' and 'offspring of vipers' (Mt 23²⁷⁻³³). The fact of the word ἀλώπεκι being in the feminine gender is perhaps only an accident. The word is found, it is true, in the masculine gender in Ca 21⁵, but it is also found in the feminine, e.g. Jg 1³⁵, 1 K 21¹, Mt 9³⁸. The fox was and is a type of knavish craftiness. The particular offence of Herod on this occasion was his crafty endeavour to get rid of an influential preacher of righteousness by uttering a threat by the mouth of others, which he had not the courage himself to carry into effect. He was unwilling to add to the unpopularity caused by his treatment of John the Baptist a repetition of it in the case of Jesus. No doubt the general character and conduct of Herod helped to suggest the application of the expression,—his crafty nature (Lk 3¹⁹ περί πάντων ὡς ἐποίησε τὸν βασιλῆα), his tyranny (13³¹), his weakness (Mk 14⁹), his profession of Judaism, combined with his heathen practices, his adultery and incest, and his murder of the prophet John. Such is the character which elicits the one recorded word of contemptuous scorn from the lips of Jesus.

2. The scorn of denunciation.—While remarkably free from any contempt for those people who had ideals and failed to reach them (e.g. the young man with great riches and the Apostle Peter), or for those who from lack of any ideal were for the time outcast from society (e.g. the despised publicans, Mk 2¹⁵⁻¹⁷), He showed clearly His contempt for all religious professions and practices which were not of the heart. 'The vain practices of devotees,' says Renan, 'the exterior strictness which trusted to formality for salvation, had in Him a mortal enemy . . . He preferred forgiveness to sacrifice. The love of God, charity, and mutual forgiveness were His whole law.' Yet in all His dealings with the systems of the scribes and the teaching of the legal doctors, His words bear little trace of mere contempt, but rather of stern denunciation. His attitude was defined at a very early stage during the ministry in Nazareth of Galilee, when He gave His definition of moral defilement (Mt 15¹¹, Mk 7¹⁵) by saying, 'Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth the man; but that which proceedeth out of the mouth, this defileth the man.' This attitude culminated in the sublime anti-Pharisaic discourse in which the foibles and vices of a degenerate piety were depicted with prophetic plainness and scornful denunciation (Mt 23; cf. also Mk 12³⁸⁻⁴⁰ and Lk 20⁴⁵⁻⁴⁷).

3. The scorn of silence.—Of all the occasions of scorn displayed by Jesus, none are more marked than those when He met mere captious questions and criticism either by a definite refusal to answer, or by absolute silence. Such an instance is recorded (Mt 21²⁸⁻²⁷) when Jesus met the question of the chief priests and scribes, 'By what authority doest thou these things?' with a counter question, and on their refusal to answer declined in turn to reply to their question. Still more impressive was the silent scorn with which He met His accusers at the various stages of His trial, refusing in turn to answer the accusation of false witnesses (Mt 26⁶⁰⁻⁶³, Mk 14⁶¹) and the questions of the chief priests and elders (Mt 27¹², Mk 15³⁻⁵), of Herod (Lk 23⁹), and lastly of Pilate himself (Mt 27¹⁴, Jn 19⁹).

In comparing these instances, we find no word used simply for the purpose of causing pain. The contemptuous expression used on the occasion of Herod's threat is, we have seen, amply justified by the character of the man, and destined to hold up to reprobation so paltry a device and so wretched a personality. In the rest His silence is an expression of His own dignity, and of His refusal to give an answer to questions and charges which were not intended to bring the man to light, but merely to raise unreasonable prejudice; while His severe attacks on the character of those who were too blinded by their imaginary virtues to try to amend their lives, are wonderful instances of a scorn unmarred by ill-nature and untainted with cynicism.

On scorn of which Christ was the object, see artt. DESPISE, MOCKERY, REPROACH.

SCORPION (σκορπίος).—A real nuisance in hot countries, especially in Bible lands, scarce and comparatively innocuous in Southern Europe, the scorpion is unknown save from hearsay in Central and Northern Europe. It has, however, left its mark in the familiar expression in cauda venenum, as well as in astronomical science, where it counts amongst the constellations of the Zodiac.

1. Zoological.—The scorpion is an arthropod, of the sub-class of the sub-class of Arthrogastera, of the order . . . It has four pairs of legs, and in front . . . extremely strong claws (palmi). Its abdomen consists of 7 anterior segments, broad and intimately connected with the cephalo-thorax, and of 6 posterior segments, which are narrower, and constitute the tail (or post-abdomen). The last of these 6 posterior segments is incurved underneath, and terminates in a pointed hook surrounded by two powerful venomous glands. The scorpion catches its prey with its strong claws, curves its tail towards it above its own back, and inflicts the death sting. The scorpion's sting is very painful even for man; it may prove fatal when the insect belongs to one of the big tropical species; and even when a smaller species life may be imperilled when the throat is concerned; cf. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 303), who has 'known one instance [in Palestine] of a man dying from the effect of the scorpion's sting.'

There occurs in Southern Europe, sometimes even in Switzerland and Southern Germany, a species of scorpion relatively innocuous—the scorpius Europæus. In the Mediterranean peninsula as well as in the South of France, another more dangerous species is to be found, the Buthus occitanus. In the Eastern lands of the Bible there are six, eight, perhaps even twelve different species of scorpions belonging to the genera Buthus and Androctonus. They reach a length of 5 to 6 inches (in tropical countries 12 inches; cf. Morris, Bible Natural History, Calcutta, 1896, p. 101). Palgrave (Central and Eastern Arabia, 1883, p. 28) was stung in Arabia by one of the numerous 'desert scorpions,' which he describes as 'curious little creatures, about a fourth of an inch in length, and apparently all claws and tail, of a deep reddish-brown colour, and very active.' The Talmud of Jerusalem (Ber. 9a) says that the scorpion's sting is even more dangerous than that of the snake, because it repeats it. Conder (Tent in Palestine, p. 113) tells that he was stung by one scorpion in six places along the leg.

Scorpions are exclusively carnivorous, feeding upon insects and worms. They are useful in destroying mosquitoes. Not infrequently they devour each other. The female scorpion eats up the male after fecundation.

Ancient authors (Aristotle, Pliny) report that scorpions devour their own parents. This assertion is connected with a false etymology of the Heb. word עֲקָרָה (true etymology unknown), as if it were derived from עָקַר 'to exterminate,' and אָב 'father.' Thomson (LB ii. 480) 'tried the experiment of surrounding a scorpion with a ring of fire, and when it despaired of escape, it repeatedly struck its own head, and soon died either from the poison or 'ts Satanic rage—I could not be certain which—perhaps from both combined.'

There are differently coloured scorpions: some are black, others brown, reddish, yellowish, grey or white, some are striped. They are frequently found in Palestine under stones, among ruins, in crevices of walls, in dung-heaps, and empty cisterns. Travellers camping in tents or lodging in the houses of natives, as well as archæologists conducting excavations, have to be careful to guard themselves and their men from scorpions; for even when the sting is not fatal, it is a cause of acute pain, and prevents walking and working.

According to a popular superstition, a man who has eaten a scorpion is immune against the sting of any of these animals, and able to relieve a victim by sucking the wound (Conder, l.c.). It is also believed that by applying to the wound a squashed scorpion, or reading some magic formulae over the patient, a cure is effected.

2. OT references.—In geography, scorpions gave their name to a place mentioned in the OT—the 'Ascent of Scorpions,' מַדְלֵחַ אֶקְרַבִּים (Nu 34, Jos 15³, Jg 1³⁶), at the limit of the territory of Judah, towards Idumæa, south-west from the Dead Sea; it is probably the pass now called Nabbes-Safâ, leading to Wady-Fikreh, or another pass near the same wady.

This place took its name to a toponym (1 Mac 5⁸, Jos. Ant. xii. 10, 11), the Idumean Akrabattene, which is not to be confused with another toponym also called Akrabattene (Jos. BJ ii. xii. 4, xx. 4, xxii. 2, iii. iii. 5, iv. ix. 3, 9), from its chief city, Akrabattin—in the Onomasticon Ἀκραβῆτιν (cf. Pliny, HN v. 14), in the Chorographia Samaritanum Akrabith, in modern times Akrabeh—9 Roman miles (8 English miles) east from Nâblus, on the way to . . . BRP ii. 280, iii. 296 f.; Guérin, Samarie, ii. . . 389; PEFS, 1876, p. 196). There is also near Damascus a village Akraba, . . . its name to the Akrabani, a canal of the Barada (l.c. BRP iii. 447, 459).

Once only in the OT is there mention of scorpions in the proper sense, Dt 8¹⁵, where they are named as one of the plagues of the desert of the wanderings.

In 1 K 12^{11, 14} (and v. 24 in LXX, a verse missing in MT) and 2 Ch 10^{11, 14} the . . . occurs in the threats of King Rehoboam to . . . be simply a metaphor; but it is also possible that the name the Israelites were acquainted with some instrument of torture, either a whip consisting of several thongs loaded with knobs and hooks of metal, or a knotty stick armed with prominent nail heads. . . instrument; cf. Isidorus of Sevilla (Orig. . . et aculeata).

In Ezk 2⁶ scorpions symbolize (with briars and thorns) the vexations inflicted on the prophet by his companions. In Sir 26⁷ the wicked woman is compared with the scorpion; in 39³⁰ scorpions are numbered among the plagues God uses for chastising the ungodly. In 4 Mac 11¹⁰ a man fastened in the torture-wheel is compared with a scorpion curving its body. Finally, in 1 Mac 6⁵¹ a kind of machine of war for throwing projectiles is mentioned under the (diminutive) name of σκορπίδια (cf. Caesar, BG vii. 25).

3. NT references.—The Gospels mention scorpions twice. (1) In Lk 11^{11, 12} we have three questions concerning a father giving to his son a stone instead of a loaf, a serpent instead of a fish, a scorpion instead of an egg. In the parallel passage (Mt 7^{9, 10}) the third question is omitted (and in certain MSS and Versions of Luke the first question); hence it has been asserted that the saying of Jesus in its primitive form contained only two questions or perhaps one. But Jesus may have given more than one or two illustrations of His meaning, and we have to remember that bread, fish, and eggs were (and are still) the usual food of the inhabitants of Galilee. It has been frequently asked whether a scorpion bears such a likeness to an egg that a confusion between the two would be natural. But there is no question of likeness or confusion in this third case any more than in the case of the loaf and the stone, the fish and the serpent. It is not at all satisfactory to say with Thomson (LB ii. 479), that 'old writers speak of a white scorpion; and such a one, with its tail folded up . . . would not look unlike a small egg.'

The Greeks had a proverb resembling the text of the Gospels we are . . . τίττηναι σκορπίον, and they used to interpret . . . τί τῶν τῶ χεῖρα αἰρουμένων ἀντὶ τῶν βελιόνων, of that proverb does not prove that Jesus necessarily associated in one single sentence the fish and the scorpion, and that φόν has to be corrected into δόνον.

(2) Jesus says (Lk 10¹⁹) that He has given His disciples τὴν ἐξουσίαν τοῦ πατεῖν ἐπὶ ὄφεις καὶ σκορπίων. There seems to be in these words an allusion to Ps 91¹³, where the LXX has (90¹³) ἐν ἄσπιδι καὶ βασιλικῶν ἐπιβήσῃ, whereas the MT has 'lion' and 'adder.' The Hebrew and Greek disagreeing, it is not impossible that in another transmission the scorpion has been substituted for one of the terms signifying serpent. It is certainly more natural to combine Lk 10¹⁹ with Ps 91¹³, than with Dt 8¹⁵ or with Ezk 29: both these texts are more similar ad verbum, not ad sensum.

Another question is whether 'serpents and scorpions' means here animals in the proper sense of the word (Mk 16¹⁸ and Ac 28³⁻⁶ might be quoted in support of this interpretation), or if it is a metaphor indicating the powers of evil. This alternative, however, does not correspond to the notions of the ancients, who did not, as we do, make a rigorous distinction between terrestrial and supernatural beings. Joh. Weiss (Schriften des N. I., ad loc.) says rightly that an excellent illustration of this passage of the Gospel is given in the famous verse of Luther's hymn: 'Und wenn die Welt voll Teufel wär . . .' Moreover, we have to observe that Rev 9^{3, 5, 10} describe supernatural destructive beings similar, at least partially, to scorpions. This has to be brought into conjunction with an antique Babylonian conception. In the epic of Gilgamesh (Table ix. cols. ii.-iv.) we find the mention of two scorpion-men, one male and the other female, terrible . . . of a door (cf. P. Jensen, 'Assyr. B. . . und Epen' in KIB vi. p. 205 ff., and the same writer's Das Gilgamesch-Epos in der Weltliteratur, i. pp. 24-27, 79, 93). A. Jeremias (Izdubar-Nimrod, 1891, p. 66 f.) and F. X. Kugler ('Die Sternenfahrt des Gilgamesch', in Stimmen aus Maria Laach, lxvi., 1904, p. 441 ff.) have shown that those two celestial scorpions—reproduced in Babylonian sculptures—were the two zodiacal constellations Scorpio and Sagittarius. We might also see, but less probably, in the second scorpion, the constellation of the Balance, which was called by the ancient Greeks Chelae, i.e. the 'Claws' of the Scorpion (cf. Ideler, Sternnamen, pp. 174-178).

In Christian art the scorpion has received a symbolical character, as an emblem of the anti-Christian power. Thus a scorpion is to be seen on the shield of a Roman soldier in B. Luini's celebrated fresco, 'The Crucifixion,' in Santa Maria degli Angeli, Lugano.

SCOURGE, SCOURGING.—In the Gospels the vb. 'scourge' is tr. of two Gr. terms, μαστιγίζω (fr. μάστιξ, found in Gospels only in a metaphorical sense [EV 'plague', RvM 'Gr. scourge'], but used in its literal meaning in Ac 22²⁴, He 11³⁶); and φραγελλῶ (fr. φραγέλλιον, Lat. flagellum, which occurs in Jn 2¹⁵). φραγέλλιον denotes the scourge proper as an instrument of punishment, while μάστιξ in class. Gr. is often used of an ordinary whip for driving, etc. In NT, however, μαστιγίζω is a synonym for φραγελλῶ (cf. Mk 10³⁴ and 15¹⁵, Mt 27²⁶ and Jn 19¹). The subject of scourging comes before us in three connexions.

(1) In Jn 2¹⁵ Jesus makes a scourge (φραγέλλιον) of cords (ἐκ σχοινίων) and drives the dovecating crowd of traders, as well as their sheep and oxen, out of the Temple. Farrar and others have represented this scourge of Jesus as nothing more than a whip twisted hastily out of the rushes with which the floor would be littered—a pure symbol of authority, therefore, not a weapon of offence. In this case, however, we should have had σχοίνων, not σχοινίων. σχοίνιον is a rope, not a rush, and though originally applied to a rope made from rushes, is used in class. Gr. in a general sense. On the only other occasion of its employment in the NT it means a rope strong enough to tow a ship's boat in a gale (Ac 27³²). To drive a herd of oxen out of the Temple courts, moreover, something more than a symbol of authority would be required. But we need not suppose that Jesus, even in His indignation, struck the merchants themselves. For from the sign of His authority would be sufficient (cf. Jn 18⁶), and, as Bengel says, 'terrore rem perfect.' (2) In Mt 10¹⁷ Jesus forewarns the Apostles of a time when men would scourge them in their synagogues; and in 23³⁴ He predicts that the scribes and Pharisees will thus treat those whom He sends unto them. The later history . . . of the fulfilment of these words . . . (2 Co 6⁶ 11^{23, 24}).

(3) But, above all, we must think of the scourging endured by Jesus Himself. According to all the Synoptists, Jesus foresaw this as part of the suffering that lay before Him (Mt 20¹⁹, Mk 10³⁴, Lk 18³²). It was, indeed, almost inseparable from His vision of the Cross, for scourging formed the ordinary accompaniment of a Roman crucifixion (cf. Jos. BJ v. xi. 1). Sometimes it was employed in criminal cases as a means of extracting confession, but regularly as the brutal preliminary to the still more brutal death of the cross. Because of the apparent inconsistency between Mt 27²⁶, Mk 15¹⁵, on the one hand, and Jn 19¹, on the other, as to the particular stage of the trial at which Jesus was scourged, some have thought that the torture was twice inflicted. A careful comparison of the four Gospels, however, does not support this idea. The statements of Mt. and Mk., though they convey, when taken alone, the impression of a scourging immediately before the crucifixion, do not necessarily bear this meaning, but may quite well be understood respectively, and as implied by the fact that Jesus had to endure the scourge . . . to the cross. Probably the key to the difficulty is to be found in Lk.'s narrative, where Pilate says, 'Why, what evil hath this man done? I have found no cause of death in him: I will therefore chastise him and release him' (23²²). These words show that Pilate meant the scourging to be a compromise between the death which the Jews demanded and the verdict of absolute innocence which was called for by his own sense of justice. And this is confirmed by Jn.'s narrative, which shows Pilate scourging Jesus (19¹) and holding Him up to mockery (vv. 2-3) in the evident hope of satisfying the multitude, still insisting that he found no crime in Him (v. 4), and yielding at last, only with reluctance, to the demand for His crucifixion (v. 6¹⁶). See art. TRIAL OF JESUS CHRIST.

A Roman scourging might be carried out either with rods (virgæ, πάβδοι)—the weapons of lictors, or with the scourge proper (flagellum, φραγέλλιον), in which leather thongs weighted with rough pieces of lead or iron were attached to a stout wooden handle. St. Paul's stripes were as distinguished from his scourging as inflicted by means of rods (παβιζω, 2 Co 11²⁵, Ac 16^{22, 23}). But Jerusalem was not a Roman town, like Philippi (Ac 16¹² RV), and Pilate had no lictors. Jesus was scourged by soldiers, and the implement they used, as the vb. φραγελλῶ (Mt 27²⁶, Mk 15¹⁵) almost implies, would be the dreadful Roman flagellum. St. Peter may have witnessed it all; and what a world of meaning then lies in his words, 'by whose stripes [Gr. 'bruise' or 'weal'] ye were healed' (1 P 2²⁴, cf. Is 53⁵).

SCRIBES.—The Scribes were a class of learned Jews who devoted themselves to a scientific study of the Law, and made its exposition their professional occupation. The word which we translate 'scribes' is γραμματεῖς, 'the learned,' which corresponds to the Hebrew soferim. This is their usual appellation, but they are also called in the Gospels, especially in Lk., 'lawyers' (νομικοί) and 'doctors of the law' (νομοδιδασκαλοί). See LAWYER. They are very frequently associated in the Synoptics with the Pharisees, and with the chief priests and elders, but there is no mention of 'scribes' in the Fourth Gospel at all, except in the special passage dealing with the woman taken in adultery (Jn 8⁹).

1. Origin, development, and characteristics.—

(1) After the return from the Exile the Jewish community was organized under Ezra and Nehemiah on the basis of the regulations of the so-called Mosaic Law. At a great gathering of the people, of which an account is given in Neh 8–10, the Law was publicly read by Ezra, and a solemn covenant entered into for national obedience to it. Being thus established as the binding rule of both civil and religious life, it became necessary that the Law should be thoroughly studied and interpreted to the people, who otherwise could not reasonably be expected to comprehend fully its principles and their application. This duty at first fell naturally to the priests, who for a time continued the main teachers and guardians of the Law. But gradually there grew up an independent class of men, more than the priests, who devoted themselves to the study of the Law, and made acquaintance with it their profession. These were the Scribes. Possibly at first their chief duty was to make copies of the Law, but the higher function of interpretation was soon added; and as the supreme importance of the Law came more and more to be recognized, so the profession of a Scribe came to be held in higher estimation than even that of a priest.

(2) During the Grecian period of Jewish history, a strong feeling of opposition was developed between the Scribes and, at least, the higher order of the priests. Even in the time of Ezra a feud had arisen between those who held strictly by the Law, especially in the matter of foreign alliances—and those who, like the aristocratic high-priestly families, had sought to increase their influence by marriage with outsiders. And when, through the influence of Hellenic culture, the priestly aristocracy became infected with heathen ideas, and fell away from the laws and customs of Judaism, the duty of upholding the Law fell mainly upon the Scribes, who from that time forward became the real teachers of the people, and dominated their whole spiritual life. They were still, however, mainly religious students and teachers, and had taken little part in political life. Their ideal was not to engage in any strife, or even for throwing off the foreign yoke, but to establish the Law of God in their own midst. The attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to suppress the Jewish religion compelled them to change their character, and drove them into open rebellion. Among the most strenuous opponents of his endeavour to Hellenize the Jews were the Hasidæans, or party of 'the pious,' who may be taken to represent the strictest adherents of the teaching of the Scribes, and who carried their ideas of the sanctity of the Law to the suicidal extent of defending themselves when attacked on it. But it was only the maintenance of the Jewish religion for which they fought, and they had no objections to alien rule, provided they were allowed freedom of faith. This object they regarded as accomplished by the treaty with Lysias, which provided at once for their political subjection and for their religious freedom. When, therefore, it became clear that the Maccabæan party were aiming also at the political independence of the nation, the Hasidæans separated from them, and in the time of John Hyrcanus we find the Pharisees—'the separated'—who practically represented the same party as the Hasidæans, in opposition to the Hasmonæan or Maccabæan dynasty. See PHARISEES.

(3) From this time onward to the time of Christ the influence of the Scribes became more and more predominant. They were given seats in the Sanhedrin, and were held in very high respect by the people. They never, indeed, became the governing class, but in the councils of the nation their influence could always be depended upon to outweigh that of the priestly aristocracy, who held the high appointments. They were usually addressed as 'Rabbi,' i.e. 'my master,' an appellation which gradually developed into a title, though not till the time of Christ. The honour in which they were held by their pupils, and by others, was extraordinary, even exceeding the honour accorded to priests; and they were very particular in exacting it. In fact, generally everywhere the first rank. Their scribal labours were understood to be gratuitous, and if they had no private fortune, they had to provide for their livelihood by combining some secular business with their study of the Law; but the latter was always regarded as their most important occupation. It is questionable, however, if the theory of gratuitous service was always strictly adhered to.

From the earliest period there is evidence to show that they tended to associate themselves in guilds or families—an arrangement which would facilitate the interchange of opinion on difficult points in the study of the Law. Up till the destruction of Jerusalem the main seat of their activity was in Judæa, 'the scribes from Jerusalem' (Mt 15¹, Mk 3²²) being spoken of as the most important and influential members of the party. But they were to be found elsewhere as well, in Galilee and among the Jews in other lands, wherever the Law and its precepts were held in esteem. As a rule, they may be said to have been Pharisees, although not exclusively. The Pharisees, indeed, were those whose professed object it was to regulate their lives in strict accordance with the Law, written and oral, as that was expounded by its best accredited interpreters. Hence there was a natural affinity between them and the Scribes, whose profession it was to interpret the Law. But it is extremely probable that there were also Scribes who were Sadducees, for the Sadducees also adhered to the written Law, and doubtless had their Scribes to interpret it. Support is lent to this view by the expressions in Mk 2¹⁶ 'the scribes of the Pharisees,' and in Lk 5³⁰ 'the Pharisees and their scribes,' which seem to indicate that there were other Scribes than those of the Pharisees. In the time of Christ the great mass of the Scribes was divided into two schools, named after the famous leaders, Hillel and Shammai, about whom little is certainly known. The School of Hillel was distinguished for its mildness in the interpretation of the Law, and that of Shammai for its strictness, corresponding to the traditional characters of the respective founders; but the points of difference between them concerned only the trivial minutiae, and never touched the weightier matters of the Law.

2. Functions.—The functions of the Scribes are well summed up in the traditional saying ascribed to the 'Men of the Great Synagogue.' 'These laid down three rules: Be careful in pronouncing judgment! bring up many pupils! and make a fence about the Law!' The professional employment of the Scribes, therefore, fell under three heads:—(1) The study and development of the Law itself; (2) the teaching of it to their pupils; and (3) its practical administration in the Sanhedrin and other courts; that is to say, they acted as students, teachers, and judges.

(1) The study of the Law.—The Mosaic Law, as recorded in the sacred records, was definitely recognized by the Jews as the absolute rule of life. To direct his conduct in accordance with it in every minute detail was the ideal of the pious Jew. But there were many subjects upon which the Law, as recorded, gave no precise direction, and much of it, for popular apprehension, required interpretation and exposition. To interpret and expound it, and to fill up what was lacking in the way of casuistic detail, was the business of the Scribes. They devoted themselves to a close and careful study of the Law, to the accumulation of precedents, to the working out of inferences and deductions, and to a general development of legal regulations so as to meet every possible circumstance which might occur in human life, and to keep the Law in harmony with the changing wants of the times. So diligently did they pursue this course, and so extensive and complicated did Jewish Law in consequence become, that only by the assiduous study of it could a man become an expert in its various branches. The difficulty of doing so was greatly increased by the fact that this mass of accumulated detail was not committed to writing, but was propagated entirely by oral tradition. It was called the Halacha, or Law of Custom, as distinct from the Torah, or Written Law, upon which it was understood to be based. See, further, art. PHARISEES, p. 353 f.

But the Scribes did not confine their labours to the Law. They studied also the historical and didactic portions of Scripture, and elaborated with a very free hand the history and religious instruction contained therein. This elaboration was called the Haggadah. It ran into various extravagant forms—theosophic, eschatological, and Messianic. Imagination was given free play, so long as its products would fit in with the general framework of Jewish thought, and to its influence was largely due the circle of religious ideas existing in New Testament times.

(2) Teaching of the Law.—To teach the Law was also the professional business of the Scribes. In order that people should obey the Law, it was necessary that they should know it; and an elaborate system of rules such as was contained in the Jewish tradition could be learned only with the assistance of a teacher. None of these traditional rules having been written down, the teaching was of necessity entirely oral, and round the more famous of the Scribes there gathered large numbers of young men, eager for instruction as to the proper conduct of life. Of these, some in their turn would become Scribes and teachers of the Law. The chief requisite, for both pupil and teacher, was a capacious and accurate memory. The method of teaching was by a constant repetition of the precepts of the Law, as only by this means could its multitude of minute details be at all kept in remembrance. The disputational method was also followed. Concrete cases, real or imaginary, were brought before the pupils, and they were required to pronounce judgment upon them, which the teacher would correct. The pupils were allowed to ask questions of the teacher, and to discuss amongst themselves amongst teachers over difficult problems. But the two chief methods were these—first, to keep the Law in memory; and, second, never to teach anything otherwise than it had been taught by the master. Not even the expressions of the teacher were allowed to be changed. Accuracy in the minutest detail was the most commendable achievement.

For purposes of teaching and of disputation there were special places set apart—'houses of teaching,' as they were called—where the teacher sat upon an elevated bench, and the pupils on the ground. In Jerusalem, lectures were delivered in the Temple, somewhere in the outer court. The 'houses of teaching' were distinct from the synagogues; but as it was through the influence of the Scribes that the synagogue service originated, so doubtless they availed themselves of the opportunities which the synagogue gave them of teaching the Law to the people. The Scripture exposition, which usually formed part of the service, might, indeed, be given by any one qualified to speak; but ordinarily it fell to a Scribe, if any were present, as the one most competent to discharge the duty.

(3) The Scribes as judges.—To the Scribes, as specially skilled in knowledge of the Law, it also naturally fell to take a leading part in its practical administration. From the time of the Hasmonæans they had formed a constituent element in the Sanhedrin, being associated in that body with the chief priests and elders, and it was usually the Scribes who exercised the greatest influence in its deliberations. In the local courts they were also naturally looked to for advice and assistance. Any one, indeed, who possessed the necessary qualifications, the community might be appointed a local judge, and probably for the most part the small local courts were presided over by unprofessional men. But whenever a Scribe—a skilled lawyer—was available, the choice of the community naturally fell upon him, as, in virtue of his qualification, he was considered best fitted for the post.

3. Relations of the Scribes to Jesus.—The ministry of Jesus could not but excite interest amongst the Scribes. His first call, like that of the Baptist, was to repentance as a preparation for the Kingdom of God. With this they were bound to sympathize. They held that what the nation needed for its salvation was a stricter obedience to the Law, and they naturally thought that the new Teacher, who was calling to repentance for the past, would be calling also to a new and more rigid obedience for the future. There are not wanting indications that at first they were inclined to regard Him with favour. But they speedily discovered that His teaching was on very different lines from theirs, both in manner and in substance. In the exposition of Scripture their method was to give out a text, and then quote the various comments made on it by recognized authorities. Jesus followed a different plan. He had a message of His own, which He delivered with conviction and enthusiasm, not appealing to authorities, but speaking with the conscious authority of truth. And the substance of His teaching was also very different. He condemned the external, mechanical formalism which they encouraged, and declared that only the inward purity of the heart was of value in the sight of God. See, further, art. PHARISEES, p. 355 f.

4. Later history.—The Scribes did not properly belong to our subject, but it is worth noting that after the fall of Jerusalem in 70, the authority of the Scribes increased in importance. Under much discouragement they undertook the difficult task of the preservation of Judaism. Working on calmly and peacefully, they were able to avoid extremes, and were successful in keeping what was left of the nation faithful to the religion of their fathers, and in stimulating hope for the future. The ordinances of the Oral Law were at last written down, and to their careful preservation by the Scribes we are indebted for the Hebrew Scriptures we now possess.

LITERATURE.—The literature on the subject is very extensive. Every History of the Jews, every Life of Christ, every Commentary on the Gospels, deals to some extent with the Scribes. Schürer's HJP may be taken as a standard authority; Ewald, Kuenen, and Wellhausen are also important; so are Edersheim's LT and W. R. Smith's OTLC. A very full bibliography is given in Schürer. See also art. in Hastings' DB and in the EBI. JOSEPH MITCHELL.

SCRIPTURE.—The scope of this article does not permit the discussion in it of the employment of Scripture, or of the estimate put upon Scripture, by either our Lord or the NT writers; it is strictly limited to the use of the word in the NT, particularly in the Gospels; and to the immediate implications of that use.

1. The use of this term in the NT was an inheritance, not an invention. The idea of a 'canon' of 'Sacred Scriptures' (and with the idea the thing) was handed down to Christianity from Judaism. The Jews possessed a body of writings, consisting of 'Law, Prophets, and (other) Scriptures (Kethubim),' though they were often called, for brevity's sake, merely 'the Law and the Prophets' or simply 'the Law.' These 'Sacred Scriptures,' or this 'Scripture' (כְּתוּבִים) as it was frequently called, or these 'Books,' or simply this 'Book' (סֵפֶר), they looked upon as originating in Divine inspiration, and as therefore possessed everywhere of Divine authority. Whatever stood written in these Scriptures was a word of God, and was therefore referred to indifferently as something which 'Scripture says' (אָמַר הַכְּתוּבִים, or אָמַר קֵרָא, or 'the All-Merciful says' (אָמַר רַחֲמָנָא), or even simply 'He says' (וְכֵן הוּא אָמַר) or merely (אָמַר); that God is the Speaker in the Scriptural word being too fully understood to require explicit expression. Every precept or dogma was supposed to be grounded in Scriptural teaching, and possessed authority only as buttressed by a Scripture passage, introduced commonly by one or the other of the formulas 'for it is said' (כִּי נֶאֱמַר) or 'as it is written' (כִּי כָתוּבִים, or כִּי רְבוּבִים), though, of course, a great variety of more or less frequently occurring formulas of adduction are found. Greek-speaking Jews naturally tended merely to reproduce in their new language the designations and forms of adduction of their sacred books current among their people. This process was no doubt facilitated by the existence among the Greeks of a pregnant legislative use of γράφω, γραφῆς, γράμμα, by which these terms were freighted with an implication of authority. But it is very easy to make too much of this. In Josephus, and even more plainly in the LXX, the influence of the Greek usage may be traced; but in a writer like Philo, Jewish habits of thought appear to be absolutely determinative. The fact of importance is that there was nothing left for Christianity to invent here. It merely took over in their entirety the established usages of the Synagogue, and the NT evinces itself in this matter at least a thoroughly Jewish book. The several terms it employs are made use of, to be sure, with some sensitiveness to their inherent implications as Greek words, and the Greek legislative use of some of them gave them, no doubt, peculiar fitness for the service asked of them. But the application made of them by the NT writers had its roots set in Jewish thought, and from it they derive a fuller and deeper meaning than the most pregnant classical usage could impart to them.

2. To the NT writers, as to other Jews, the sacred books of what was now called by them 'the old covenant' (2 Co 3¹⁴), described according to their contents as 'the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms' (Lk 24⁴⁴), or more briefly as 'the Law and the Prophets' (Mt 7¹², Lk 16¹⁶; cf. Ac 28²³, Lk 16²⁹⁻³¹), or merely as 'the Law' (Jn 10³⁴, 1 Co 14²¹), or even, perhaps, 'the Prophets' (Mt 23³⁵, 11¹³ 26⁵⁶, Lk 17¹⁰ 18³¹ 24²⁷, Ac 3²⁴ 13²⁷, Ro 1² 16²⁰), were, when thought of according to their nature, a body of 'sacred scriptures' (1 Ti 1¹, 2 Ti 3¹⁶), or, with the omission of the unnecessary, because well-understood adjective, simply by way of eminence, 'the Scriptures,' 'Scripture.' For employment in this designation either of the substantives γραφῆς or γράμματα offered itself, although, of course, each brought with it its own suggestions arising from the nature of the form and the general usage of the word. The more usual of the two in this connection in Philo and Josephus, is γράμματα, or γράμματα; for, although it is sometimes so employed in the singular (but only late, e.g. Callimachus, Epigr. xxiv. Church Fathers, passim), it is in the plural that this form more properly denotes that congeries of alphabetical signs which constitutes a book. In the NT, on the other hand, this form is rare. The complete phrase τὰ γράμματα, found also both in Josephus and in Philo, occurs in 2 Ti 3¹⁵ as the current title of the sacred books, freighted with all its implications as such. Elsewhere in the NT, however, γράμματα is scarcely used as a designation of Scripture (cf. Jn 5⁴⁷ 7¹⁵). Practically the only use of γραφῆς in its varied uses, remains the sole form employed in the NT in the sense of 'Scripture,' 'Scriptures.'

3. This term occurs in the NT about fifty times (Gospels 23, Acts 7, Catholic Epistles 6, Paul 14); and in every case it bears that technical sense in which it designates the Scriptures by way of eminence, the Scriptures of the OT. It is true there are a few instances in which γραφῆς is added as γραφῆς are not easily identified in the OT text; but there is no reason to doubt that OT passages were intended (cf. Hühn, Die alttest. Citate, 270; and Mayor on Ja 4⁵, Lightfoot on 1 Co 2⁹, Westcott on Jn 7³⁸, and Godet on Lk 11⁴⁰). We need to note in modification of the broad statement, therefore, only that it is apparent from 2 P 3¹⁶ (cf. 1 Ti 5¹⁸) that the NT writers were well aware that the category 'Scripture,' in the high sense, included also the writings they were producing, as along with the books of the OT constituting the complete 'Scripture' or authoritative Word of God. In 20 out of the 50 instances in which γραφῆς occurs in the NT, it is the plural form which is used, and in all but two of these cases the article is present—αἱ γραφαί, the well-known Scriptures of the Jewish people; and the two exceptions are exceptions only in appearance, since adjectival definitions are present (γραφαὶ ἀγίαι, Ro 1², here first in extant literature; γραφαὶ προφητικαί, Ro 16²⁶). The singular form occurs some 30 times, all but four of which have the article; and here again the singular forms are only apparent, the term being defined in every case (Jn 1937 'another Scripture'; 1 P 2⁶, 2 P 1²⁰, 2 Ti 3¹⁶, used as a proper name). The distribution of the singular and plural forms is perhaps worth noting. In Acts the singular (3 times) and plural (4) occur almost equally frequently: the plural prevails in the Synoptics (Mt. plural only; Mk. two to one; Lk. three to one), and the singular in the rest of the NT (John 11 to 1, James 3 to 0, Peter 2 to 1, Paul 2 to 5). In the Gospels the plural form occurs exclusively in Mt., prevaillingly in Mk. and Lk., and rarely in Jn., of which the singular is characteristic. No distinction seems to be traceable between the usage of the Evangelists in their own persons and that of our Lord as reported by them. Mt. and Mk. do not on their own account use the term at all; in Lk. and Jn., on the other hand, it occurs not only in reports of our Lord's sayings and of the sayings of others, but also in the narrative itself. To our Lord is ascribed the use of the plural (Mt 21⁴² 22⁴⁹ 26^{54, 56}, Mk 12¹¹, Jn 5³⁹) and the singular (Mk 12¹⁰, Lk 4²¹, Jn 7^{38, 42} 10³⁵ 13¹⁸ 17¹²).

4. The history of γραφῆ, γραφαί, as applied to literary documents, does not seem to have been exactly the same as that of its congener γράμμα, γράμματα. The latter appears to have been current first as the appropriate appellation of an alphabetical character, and to have grown gradually upward from that lowly employment to designate documents of less or greater extent, as ultimately made up of alphabetical characters. Although, therefore, the singular τὸ γράμμα is used of any written thing, it is apparently, when applied to 'writings,' employed of brief pieces like short letters or of the shorter portions of documents such as clauses though it is also used of those larger sections of works which are more commonly designated as 'books.' It is rather the plural, τὰ γράμματα, which seems to have suggested itself not only for extended treatises, but indeed for documents of all kinds. When so employed, the plural form is not to be pressed. Such a phrase as 'Moses' γράμματα' (Jn 5⁴⁷), for example, probably ascribes to Moses only a single book—what we call the Pentateuch; and such a phrase as τὰ γράμματα (2 Ti 3¹⁵) does not suggest to us a 'Divine library,' but brings the OT before us as a unitary whole. On the other hand, γραφῆ, in its use, seems to have sprung from the steps to designate which γράμμα is most appropriately used, and to have been carried over at once from the 'writing' in the sense of the script to the 'writing' in the sense of the Scripture. Kindred with γράμμα as it is, its true synonymy in its literary application is rather with such words as βιβλος (βιβλίον) and λόγος, in common with which it most naturally designates a complete literary piece, whether 'treatise' or 'book.' Where thought of from the material point of view as so much paper, so to speak, a literary work was apt to be called a βιβλος (βιβλίον); when thought of as a rational product, thought presented in words, it was apt to be spoken of as a λόγος: intermediate between the two stood γραφῆ (γράμμα), which was apt to come to the lips when the 'web of words' itself was in mind. In a word, βιβλος (βιβλίον) was the most exact word for the 'book,' γραφῆ (γράμμα) for the 'document' inscribed in the 'book,' λόγος for the 'treatise' which the 'document' records; while as between γραφῆ and γράμμα, γράμμα, preserving the stronger material flavour, gravitates somewhat towards βιβλος (βιβλίον), and γραφῆ looks upward somewhat toward λόγος. When, in the development of the publisher's trade, the system of making books in great rolls gave way to the 'book' system, and books came to be broken up into 'books,' these separate 'books' attached to themselves this whole series of designations, each with its appropriate implication. Smaller sections were properly called περιοχαί, τόποι, χωρία, γράμματα (the last of which is the proper term for 'clauses'), but very seldom, if ever, in classical Greek, γραφαί.

5. The current senses of these several terms are, of course, more or less reflected in their NT use. But we are struck at once with the fact that γραφῆ occurs in the NT solely in its pregnant technical usage as a designation of the Sacred Scriptures. There seems no intrinsic reason why it should not, like γράμματα, be freely used for non-sacred 'writings.' In point of fact, however, the NT γραφῆ is ever something 'which the Holy Ghost has spoken through the mouth' of its human authors (Ac 1¹⁶), and which is therefore of indefectible, because Divine, authority. It is perhaps even more remarkable that even on this high plane of technical reference it never occurs, in accordance with its most natural, and in the classics its most frequent, sense of 'treatise,' as a term to describe the several books of which the OT is composed. It is tempting, no doubt, to seek to give it such a sense in some of the passages where, occurring in the singular, it yet does not seem to designate the Scriptures in their entirety, and Dr. Hort appears for a moment almost inclined to yield to the temptation (on 1 P 2⁶, note the 'probable'). It is more tempting still to assume that behind the common use of the plural αἱ γραφαί to designate the Scriptures as a whole, there lies a previous current usage by which each book which enters into the composition of these 'Scriptures' was designated by the singular ἡ γραφή. But in no single passage where ἡ γραφή occurs does it seem possible to give it a reference to the 'treatise' to which the appeal is made; and the common employment in profane Greek of γραφαί (in the plural) for a single document, discourages the assumption that (like τὰ βιβλία) when applied to the Scriptures it has reference to their composite character. The truth seems to be that whether the plural αἱ γραφαί or the singular ἡ γραφή is employed, the application of the term to the OT writings by the writers of the NT is based upon the conception of these OT writings as a unitary whole, and designates this body of writings in their entirety as the one well-known authoritative documentation of the Divine word. This is the fundamental fact with respect to the use of these terms in the NT from which all the other facts of their usage flow.

6. It is true that in one unique passage, 2 P 3¹⁶ (on the meaning of which see Bigg, in loc.), αἱ γραφαί does occur with a plural signification. But the units of which this plural is made up, as the grammatical construction suggests, appear to be not 'treatises' (Huther, Kühl), but 'passages' (de Wette). Peter seems to say that the unlearned and unstable of course wrested the hard sayings of Paul's letters as they were accustomed to wrest τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς, i.e. the other Scripture statements (cf. Eurip. Hipp. 1311; Philo, de Praem. et Poen. § 11 near end)—the implication being that no part of Scripture was safe in their hands. This is a sufficiently remarkable use of the plural, no other example of which occurs in the NT; but it is an entirely legitimate one for the NT, and in its context a perfectly natural one. In the Church Fathers the plural αἱ γραφαί is formed freely upon ἡ γραφή both in the sense of 'book' of Scripture and in the sense of 'passage' of Scripture. But in the NT, apart from the present passage, there is in no instance of the use of ai graphai: the slightest hint of a series whether of 'treatises' or of 'passages' underlying it. Even a passage like Lk 24²⁷ forms no exception; for if graphai is employed in a singular sense of a single document, then pasa ai graphai remains just the whole of that document, and is the exact equivalent of pasa hē graphē, or (if graphē has acquired standing as a quasi-proper name) as pasa graphē (2 Ti 3¹⁶). Similarly ai graphai tōn prophētōn (Mt 26⁵⁶), graphai prophētikai (Ro 16²⁶) appear to refer not to the OT as a whole, deemed prophetic, or to the OT as a whole, called 'the Prophets,' but to the entire OT conceived as prophetic in character (cf. 2 P 1²⁰, Ac 2³⁰, 2 P 3¹⁶).

7. In 2 P 3¹⁶, however, we have already been brought face to face with what is the most remarkable fact about the use of graphai in the NT. This is its occasional employment to refer not merely, as from its form and previous history was to be expected, to the Scripture as a whole, or even, as also would have been only a continuation of its profane usage, to the several treatises which make up that whole, but to the individual passages of Scripture. This employment finds little support from the classics, in which graphai rather than graphē is the current form for the adduction of 'clauses' or fragmentary portions of documents (cf. e.g. Plato, Parmen. 128 A-D, Ep. 3 [317 B]; Thucyd. v. 29; Philo, de Congr. Erud. Grat. 12, Quod Deus immut. 2). It has been customary to represent it as a peculiarity of the Hellenistic Greek. It seems to be found, however, in the use of graphai in Philo (Quis rerum div. hær. 53, de Præm. et Pæn. 11; cf. Euripides, Hipp. 1311), and is probably an extreme outgrowth of the habit of looking upon the Scriptures as a unitary book of Divine oracles, every portion and passage of which is clothed with the Divine authority which belongs to the whole and is therefore manifested in all its parts. When the entirety of Scripture is 'Scripture' to us, each passage may readily be adduced as 'Scripture,' because 'Scripture' is conceived as speaking through and in each passage. The transition is easy from saying, 'The Scripture says,' namely, in this or that passage, to saying, of this and that passage, severally, 'This Scripture says,' and 'Another Scripture says'; and a step so inviting was sure sooner or later to be taken. The employment of hē graphē in the NT to denote a particular passage of Scripture does not appear then to be a continuation of a classical usage, but a new development on Jewish or Judæo-Christian ground from the pregnant use of graphē for the Sacred Scriptures, every clause of which is conceived as clothed with the authority of the whole. So far from throwing in doubt the usage of graphē pregnantly of Scripture as a whole, therefore, it rather presupposes this usage and is a result of it. So it will not surprise us to find the two usages standing side by side in the NT.

8. It has indeed been called in question whether both these usages do stand side by side in the NT. Possibly a desire to find some well-marked distinction between the usage of the plural and singular forms has not been without influence here. At all events, it has every now and then been suggested that the singular hē graphē bears in the NT the uniform sense of 'passage of Scripture,' while it is the plural ai graphai alone which in the NT designates Scripture as a whole. The younger Schulthess, for example (Lucubr. pro divin. discip. ac pers. Jesu, 1828, p. 36 n.), having occasion to comment briefly on the words pasa graphē theopneustos of 2 Ti 3¹⁶, among other assertions of equal dubiety makes this one: 'graphē in the singular never means βιβλος in the NT, much less the entirety of tōn ierōn grammātōn, but some particular passage.' Hitherto it has been thought enough to meet such assertions with a mere expression of dissent: Christiaan Sepp, for example (De Leer des NT over de HS des OV, 1849, p. 69), meets this one with equal brevity and point by the simple statement: 'Passages like Jn 10³⁵ prove the contrary.' Of late, however, under the influence of a comment of Bishop Lightfoot's on Gal 3²² which has become famous, Schulthess' doctrine has become almost traditional in a justly influential school of British exegesis (cf. Westcott on Jn 2²² 10³⁵; Hort on 1 P 2⁶; Swete on Mk 12¹⁰; Page on Ac 1¹⁰; Knowing on Ac 8³²; Plummer on Lk 4²¹). The attempt to carry this doctrine, however, appears to involve a violence which breaks down of itself. Of the 30 instances in which the singular graphē occurs, about a score seem to refer to the proposed interpretation (Jn 2²² 7³⁸, 42 10³⁵ 17¹² 19²⁸ 20⁹, Ac 8³², Ro 4³ 9¹⁷ 10¹¹ 11², Gal 3²⁸ 4³⁰, 1 Ti 5¹⁸, Ja 4⁵, 1 P 2⁶, 2 P 1²⁰ [cf. Cremer, sub voc., who omits Jn 17¹² 20⁹; E. Hühn, Die alttest. Citate, etc., 1900, p. 276, who adds Jn 13¹⁸ 19²⁴, 36, Ja 2⁸; and Vaughan on Ro 4³, Meyer on Jn 10³⁵, Weiss on Jn 10³⁵, Kübel on 2 P 1²⁰, Abbott on Eph 4⁸, Beet on Ro 9¹⁷, Mayor on 2 P 3¹⁶; EBi 4329; Franke, Das AT bei Johannes, 48; E. Haupt, Die alttest. Citate in den vier Evang. 201]). In some of these passages it would seem quite natural to refer graphē to a particular passage of Scripture. No particular passage is suggested, for example, in Jn 2²² or in Gal 3²², and it is sought and found only by the commentators only in support of the theory. The reference of Jn 20⁹ is quite as broad as that of Lk 24⁴⁰. In Jn 10³⁵ the argument depends on the wide reference to Scripture as a whole, which forms its major premise. The personification of Scripture in such passages as Ja 4⁵ and Gal 3⁸ carries with it the same implication. And the anarthrous use of graphē in 1 P 2⁶, 2 P 1²⁰, 2 Ti 3¹⁶, is explicable only on the presupposition that graphē had acquired the value of a proper name. Perhaps the two passages, 1 P 2⁶ and 2 P 1²⁰, are fairly adapted to stand as the tests of the possibility of carrying through the reference of graphē in the singular to particular passages: and the artificial explanations which are given of these passages by the advocates of that theory (cf. Zahn, Einführung, etc., ii. 108; Hort on 1 P 2⁶) may stand for its sufficient refutation. There seems no reason why we should fail to recognize that the employment of graphē in the NT so far follows its profane usage, in which it is prevailingly applied to entire documents and carries with it a general implication of completeness, that in its more common reference it designates the OT to which it is applied in its completeness as a unitary whole (cf. Franke, op. cit. p. 48). It remains only to add that the same implication is present in the designation of the OT as ai graphai, which, as has already been pointed out, does not suggest that the OT is a collection of 'treatises,' but is merely a variant of hē graphē in accordance with good Greek usage, employed interchangeably with it at the dictation of nothing more reconducive than literary habit. Whether ai graphai is used, then, or hē graphē, or the anarthrous graphē, in each case alike the OT is thought of as a single document set over against all other documents by reason of its unique Divinity and indefectible authority, by which it is constituted in every passage and declaration the final arbiter of belief and practice.

9. It is an outgrowth of this conception of the OT that it is habitually adduced for the ordinary purposes of instruction or debate by such simple formulas as 'it is said,' 'it is written,' with the that what is thus said or written is of final authority. Both of these usages are illustrated in a variety of forms, and with all possible high implications, not only in the NT at large, but also in the Gospels, and not only in the comments of the Evangelists, but also in the reported sayings of our Lord. We are concerned here only with the formula, 'It is written,' in which the consciousness of the written form—the documentary character—of the authority to which it refers is expressed. In its most common use this formula is the simple γέγραπται, used either absolutely, or, with none of its authoritative implication thereby evacuated, with more or less clear intimation of the place where the cited words are to be found written. By its side occurs also the resolved formula γεγραμμένον ἐστίν (peculiar to Jn.; cf. Plummer on Lk 4¹⁷), or some similar formula, with the same implications. These modes of expression have analogies in profane Greek, especially in legislative usages; but their use with reference to the Divine Scriptures, as it involves the adduction of an authority which rises immeasurably above all legislative authority, is also freighted with a significance to which the profane usage affords no key. In the Gospels, γέγραπται occurs exclusively in Mt. and Mk., and predominately in Lk., but only once in Jn.; most commonly in reports of our Lord's teaching, as in Lk. 4¹⁷ of Lk., on the other hand, the use of the formula of the OT is accomplished by the use of the participle γεγραμμένον, while in Jn. the place of γέγραπται (8¹⁷ only) is definitely taken by the resolved formula γεγραμμένον ἐστίν. The significance of these formulas is perhaps most manifest where they stand alone as the bare adduction of authority without indication of any kind whence the citation is derived (so γέγραπται, Mt 4⁶ 7¹⁰ [11¹⁰] 21¹³ [26³⁴] 26³¹, Mk 7⁶ 9¹² 13¹¹ 14²¹ 27, Lk 4⁴ 8¹⁰ 7²⁷ 19⁴⁶ 20¹⁷ 22²⁷; γεγραμμένον ἐστίν, Jn 21⁷ 6³¹ 12¹⁴ [16⁷]). The adjunction of an indication of the place where the citation may be found does not, however, really affect the authoritativeness of its adduction. This adjunction is rare in Mt. and Mk. (Mt 2⁵, Mk 1⁹ only), more frequent in Lk. (2³ 3⁴ 10²⁶ 18³¹ 24⁴⁶) and Jn. (6⁴⁵ 8¹⁷ 10³⁴ 15²⁵); and by its infrequency it emphasizes the absence of all necessity for such identification. When a NT writer says, 'It is written,' there can arise no doubt where what he thus adduces as possessing absolute authority over the thought and consciences of men is to be found written. The simple adduction in this solemn and decisive manner of a written authority, carries with it the implication that the appeal is made to the indefectible authority of the Scriptures of God, which in all their parts and in every one of their declarations are clothed with the authority of God Himself.

SEA OF GALILEE.—i. NAMES.—The OT name Chinnereth had disappeared, so far as our purpose is concerned, by the time of the Maccabees, and in its place we find a variety of designations. It is then that the familiar name Γεννησαρετ first makes its appearance in the τὸ ὕδωρ Γεννησαρετ of 1 Mac 11⁶⁷. Josephus uses the forms λίμνη Γεννησάρ (BJ III. x. 1), ὕδατα Γεννησάρα (Ant. XIII. v. 7), λίμνη Γεννησαρίτις (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1; Vita, 65); Pliny has Gennesara (HN v. 15). In the Targums and other Jewish writings the name of the Sea appears as גנין or גניז, these forms supplementing the Heb. Chinnereth. But though the word Gennesaret was so familiar to contemporary writers, it appears only once in the NT as applied to the Lake, in the ἡ λίμνη Γεννησαρετ of Lk 5¹. Following close upon this, however, ἡ λίμνη occurs alone in Lk 5² 8²² 23³³. The most popular name in the NT is 'the Sea of Galilee' (ἡ θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας), which occurs five times (Mt 4¹⁸ 15²⁸, Mk 1¹⁶ 7³¹, Jn 6¹). The word 'Sea' (θάλασσα) stands alone in Jn 6¹⁷⁻²⁵, and the form 'Sea of Tiberias' (θάλασσα τῆς Τιβεριάδος) occurs in John 6²¹. The modern designation, 'Lake of Tiberias,' does not occur in the NT. It is found for the first time as λίμνη Τιβερίς in Pausanias (v. 7).

Man has been offered of the origin of the word Gennesaret (and others) sought to derive it from the OT Chinnereth, which it was supposed to replace. Such an origin, however, seems very improbable, not only on philological grounds, but because the latter name also remains in the OT. Chinnereth (or Gennesaret) suggests that it is derived from גנין or גניז 'garden of treasure,' which term, of course, he refers to the Plain, the name of the adjoining Sea. This process is probably correct, but still we must not doubt his derivation of the name. G. A. (1861) 13 n.) has also noted that the form points to some compound of גן 'garden,' or נָחַל 'valley'; and to us this seems indisputable, so that on the whole we must admit that either the explanation given by Caspari (§ 64), גנין 'gardens of the lake' (as in), or that of the older Rabbis (Ber. Rab 98), גנין 'gardens of the prince,' is most satisfactory. The termination in Gennesaret might then be regarded as the Aramaic determinative form, and compared with Nazareth from Nazara.

With reference to the name 'Galilee,' it has been said that it originally designated only that small tract of land given by Solomon to Hiram (1 K 9¹¹), and that the name was extended till in the days of the Maccabees included Zebulun and Naphtali, so that only after this took place could the Sea be known by that name. Furrer (Wanderungen) has also drawn attention to the other names. He asserts that Gennesar or Gennesaritis is characteristic of the 1st cent., being found in Josephus, Pliny, and Strabo, while from the 2nd cent. onwards the official designation became 'Sea of Tiberias'; and as proof of this statement he cites the Palestinian Talmud. He then ventures to infer that Jn 21¹ indicates a later date than the rest of the book demands, and at the same time he suggests that Jn 6¹ has been emended. This reasoning, however, seems inconclusive; for apart from the fact that the Palestinian Talmud contains much that is old, it seems impossible, in view of the conservatism of the Rabbis, that such a name as 'Sea of Tiberias' should be found in their writings, unless it had been in common use for a considerable time. For the history of the district surrounding the Lake see art. GALILEE.

ii. DESCRIPTION.—The Lake presents 'a beautiful sheet of limpid water in a deeply depressed basin' (BRP ii. 380), its average below sea level being 682½ ft.; but with the season of the year the level may vary to the extent of 10 ft. The rise and fall are dependent on the rainy season on the one hand, and, on the other, on the melting of the snows on Hermon as the spring advances; and it is this latter cause that generally, in conjunction with the later rains, brings about the high level at the time of harvest (Jos 3¹⁵). But as the heavier rains decrease before the melting of the snow begins, there may have been already a fall of as much as 3 ft. even in March. The Sea is 13 miles long by 7 across at its broadest part—between Mejdél and Kersa; but in the clear Eastern atmosphere it looks much smaller than it really is. From no point on the western shore can it be seen in its whole extent at one time; but from the slopes above Tell Hûm, or from almost any point on the eastern shore, it is all visible. It is not quite oval, but rather pear- or harp-shaped (חֶסֶד), with a narrow southern end. The sea level of the shores have not changed to any considerable extent during the past nineteen centuries, so that, in so far as hills and valleys, ravines and slopes to the seashore are concerned, their present description gives a very true conception of what they were in Gospel days. On the west the hills are not so high and generally not so steep as on the eastern side; but they approach more closely to the shore, and are more rugged and stony. On the western side, from a short distance above what was once the western outlet of the Lake into the Jordan, and stretching some 3 miles up the Lake-side, the hills—here somewhat rounded and tame, and with but little that is picturesque in their form—slope down to the water's edge. Then to the north of this comes a strip (Heb. נָפֶת, which seems to justify the identification of Tiberias with the older Rakkath, Jos 19²⁵; Megilla, 5b, 6a; G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 447) about 2½ miles long and ¼ of a mile broad at its widest part, and at the north end of this is the modern town of Tiberias. Passing it, we have another 3 miles of sloping hills, broken about midway by the Wady Abu el-Amis. At Mejdél we now enter el-Ghauweir, the well-known Plain of Gennesaret. Behind the village to the west is Wady Hamâm, known in the early centuries as נַחֲלֵי חַמָּם, and containing in its cliffs the once famous caves of Arbela (cf. Gen. xiv. xv. 4). This is certainly the wildest and most impressive gorge around the whole Lake. On its south side it bears some resemblance, though on a far grander scale, to the crags around Arthur's Seat. There is the same perpendicular wall, but here it rises to a height of 1500 ft.; and there is a great mass of broken rocks, making a steep slope to the plain below.

El-Ghauweir curves along the Lake from Mejdél to Khân Minyeh, a distance of 3 miles, and it has a breadth of one mile. In addition to the stream from Wady Hamâm, it is watered by three others from Ain Mudawwarah, Wady Rub'at, and Wady Leimôn, and these flow throughout the year. Just behind Khân Minyeh and its fountain Ain et-Tin at the N.W. corner of the Lake, the rounded hill Tell Oreime slopes down to the water's edge, ending in a series of sharp rocks—the only place around the Lake where we find anything like a cliff be-side the shore. Around the face of Tell Oreime there is a deep rock-cutting now used as a pathway, but in ancient times an aqueduct, as is attested by the discovery of the remains of the old piers of its continuation across the next valley to Ain et-Tâbigha. Remains of masonry show that the water was led eastward as well as westward from the towers built around the springs of et-Tâbigha (Εὐδαίμων of Nicephorus), so that there can be little doubt that this is the spring of Capernaum mentioned by Josephus (BJ III. x. 8). From this point onward to the Jordan the hills again extend down to the shore, but by gentler slopes than even to the south of Tiberias. Between et-Tâbigha and Tell Hûm the shore forms a number of semicircular creeks, which, with the sloping embankment at this point, assume the shape of amphitheatres. Studying the subject on the spot, the present author was convinced that one of these must be the place where the sermon from the boat was preached (Mt 13² etc.). Something peculiar in the tones of our voices induced us to test the acoustic properties of the place, and we found that a speaker on the boat could be heard far up the slope, while the hum and bustle of a crowd on the shore would not disturb him.

At Tell Hûm we meet with another creek, but somewhat more extensive. It is covered with green grass (Mk 6³⁹, Jn 6¹⁰) at nearly all seasons of the year. With a breadth of 1 to 1½ miles, it extends 3 miles along the coast, and then narrows, extending nearly 3 miles more to Kersa, a short distance to the south of which we meet with the only steep place (Mt 8³²) on the eastern side of the Lake. At this point there is practically no shore, but immediately the eastern rampart of hills—2000 ft. high, now bleak and bare, but showing streaks of green where the springs trickle out between the white sandstone and the black superimposed lava—begins to recede, leaving a plain ¼ to ½ mile broad, and this to the south of Kul at el-Huṣn widens out into the Ghor or Jordan Valley. At the village of Semakh, the southern end of the Lake forms a beautiful circular bay, which is enclosed by earth walls 16 to 32 ft. in height. There is deep water close in to the shore, and the currents manifestly wear away the rich alluvial soil. In so far as changes have taken place, we should say that the land has suffered losses here, while there may have been slight gains by deposits on the shore of the plains of el-Batîha and el-Ghauweir (Gennesaret). What used to be the western outlet of the Jordan has also become silted up, for it must be remembered that in former times the Jordan flowed out from the two sides of a triangular island, now occupied by the ruins of Kerak—without doubt the remains of the once famous Taricheæ (BJ III. x. 1).

Compared with other lakes, the Sea of Galilee cannot be said to be deep. The maximum depth is from north to south along the course of the Jordan, and here it is 130 to 148 ft. according to the season [greater recorded depths have been proved to be in error], and except along the shores of the Plain of Gennesaret, deep water is reached all round the Lake within a few yards of the shore. The steep place at Kersa slopes down at once to a depth of 49 ft., and a short distance farther out the sounding gives 102 ft. A mile to the south-east of Tell Hûm the depth is 78 ft., and midway between Tiberias and Kersa it is 114.

One more notable feature of the Lake valley is to be found in the hot springs with which it abounds. The best known of these are at Ham-mam (cf. Jos. Vita, 16), south of Tiberias (132° to 144°), Ain Bârideh (80°), Ain Mudawwarah (73°), Ain et-Tin (82°), and Ain et-Tâbigha (73° to 86°). Others certainly exist in the Lake itself. A brackish taste can be perceived at different places, and especially at a point ¼ across between Tiberias and Kersa, where in the warmer water great shoals of fish are wont to congregate. It was probably the drinking from a spot of this kind that led Strabo (Geog. xvi. 45) to express so bad an opinion of the waters of the Lake (ὕδωρ μοχθηρὸν λιμνῶν). These springs are all more or less sulphurous, and in all the centuries they have been used for medicinal purposes—especially those at Tiberias (BJ II. xxi. 6). A reference to these in the Talmud shows us the relationship of the Rabbis to the Sabbath, and throws some light on their attacks on Jesus (Lk 13¹⁴ etc.). The use of the means of '...': forbidden on the Sabbath; but these medicinal, were permitted, because in ... ministered to indulgence in pleasure and luxury, and that was permitted. (Pesach. 8b).

Complaint has been made by some of the tameness of the scenery around the Lake, and of the want of ... of the hills; while, on the other ... (risen, in loc.) has declared that 'in the whole land of Palestine there is no district whose natural charms could compare with those of this.' There can be no doubt that much depends upon the season of the year when the district is first visited, as well as upon the expectations formed. In the present unwooded state, with its uncultivated fields and barren hills often, as at the north end of the Lake, washed down to the bare rock by the rains of centuries, there may be little to attract, especially when the whole country has been blackened by the summer suns and the burning siroccos. But even now the earliest rains change the whole aspect of nature. The hills and the valleys on both shores become clothed in a luxuriant greenness, while, as the season advances, the fresh bursting buds of the olive, the fig, the vine, and the pomegranate, with here and there a palm tree, add variety and pleasantness to the landscape. Very soon, too, the fields are covered with great patches of anemones of varied colours—white, red, purple, and deep dark-blue, interspersed with various species of the lily family and stretches of the dark green-leaved and yellow-flowered mustard, while the watercourses and shores of the Lake are marked out by the red blooms of the oleander with its dark-green and silvery-backed leaves; and on the western shore variety is added by the gigantic reeds of the papyrus, topped by their reddish-brown waving plumes; on the higher grounds, too, every crevice of the rock is shaded by the blossoms of the cyclamen and many another flower of the field. But what must it have been in the year A.D. 27–28? It had been passing through, was indeed still in the period of transition after, the desolations of war, famine, and pestilence; but the worst was now long past, and 20 years of uninterrupted peace and prosperity had made it blossom like the rose. There was nothing in the rule of the tetrarchs Antipas and Philip to discourage perseverance, so that the land was coming more and more under cultivation. It must have been beautiful, indeed, when human industry was developing all its resources and the whole scene into a blooming paradise. ... can give a better idea of what the whole district was becoming, than the classic passage in which Josephus (BJ III. x. 8) describes the Plain of Gennesaret in his own day (see art. GENNESARET [LAND OF] in vol. i.).

With Josephus' glowing description the Rabbis are in fullest harmony. Rish Laqish says: 'If Paradise be in the land of Israel, Beth-Shan is its entrance' (בֵּית שָׁנַן פִּתְחוֹהָ). Again we read: 'Seven seas,' spake the Lord God, 'have I created in the land of Israel, but only one have I chosen for myself, that is the sea of Gennesaret' (פֶּלֶא דְּגֵנְסַרְתָּא, fol. 4). Siphra on Dt 32²⁷ explains the fulness of the Lord as the Plain of Gennesaret. On the hills around the Lake were 'vines and fruitful fields' (Meg. 6a). 'It is easier,' saith Rabbi Eliezer ben Simon, 'to nourish a legion of olives in Galilee than to bring up one child in the land of Israel' (Ber. Rab. c. 20). The oil of the Galilean hills was more plentiful than any in Palestine (Men. 85b), and the wheat of Chorazin is specially commended (ib. 86a). An illustration of the productivity of the district, and a parallel to the fertility of the paradise, may be seen in the enumeration of the products of a single אֲרֵבָלִית טָמֵא 'half bushel of Arbela' (Jerus. Peah, vii. 3). The Gentile world also lends its testimony. To the early Fathers the district was ἡ ἀγαθή τῆς Γαλιλαίας, 'the crown of Galilee,' while in the 3rd cent. C. Julius Solinus (Collectanea, xxv. 18) says: 'Lacus Tiberiadis omnibus anteponitur ingenuo astu et ad sanitatem usu efficaci.'

But the district was not yet reduced to the calm beauty of a prosperous agricultural country. There would still be stretches of woodland remaining, tenanted by birds of brilliant colours and various forms. There would be here and there beautiful oaks, either singly or in groups, that had grown up during the years when the population was small (Baba Bathra v. 1). There would be rocky stretches, especially to the north-east of the Lake, covered with brambles, wild mustard, and coarse grass, or dotted with prickly bushes (nabli), where the wolf, the jackal, the fox, and the hyena would make their homes, and where the brown serpent and the silvery-breasted poisonous snake would glide about.

The population would not be so dense nor the land so fully cultivated as in the days when Josephus wrote, so that there would be a more equal mingling of the wild beauties of nature with the advancing and taming conquests of agriculture. The landscape, too, was becoming varied by the presence of many buildings. It has been said that 'the shores of the Lake seem to have borne cities and towns instead of harvests' (Tristram, Land of Israel, 444); and this, understood in the light of what we have already said, is very true. These would for the most part be constructed of black stone, but varied at times by patches of white marble, while even the palaces of Syene helped to break the monotony; and although, on the whole, the majority of the buildings would be dull and sombre, still, in the fields of green and gold, the prehistoric village, and the beach sparkling with the houses and the palaces, the synagogues and the temples of Jewish and Roman times would present a scene of great beauty, so that we can well understand how the wild desolations of the pre-Christian century, and the calm and peaceful years that followed the advent of the Messiah, combined to render the district more beautiful when Christ was a citizen of Capernaum than at any other time during its whole history.

iii. CLIMATE.—The climate of the Jordan Valley is in many ways very peculiar. Its low level—the lowest depression in the world—gives it many characteristics which are all its own. The absence of all frost, and the general warmth throughout the whole year, explain to us fully the peculiar open-air life that we meet with in the Gospels. For the most part Christ speaks out of doors. So did the Rabbis of His time. Ben Azzai taught on the shores of Tiberias (Erubin, 29a), and Rabbi Jehudah in the open air (Moed Katon, 16a). In the Gospels the sick are freely carried about (Mt 4²³, Mk 2³), are allowed to wait in the crowd (Lk 8⁴³), and are indifferent if the night find them at home (Mt 15³², Mk 8²³). The average temperatures of the air (night and day) in January are 37° and 74°; in June they are 68° and 108°; but the thermometer frequently rises much higher.

The present writer has seen it rise to 110°, and 139° has been recorded on the shore of the Lake at midday in August; and even the soil, the rocks, and the pebbles around the Lake side become so heated that the bather must wait till long after sunset if he would enter the water without the risk of burning his feet. In such conditions, under the fiery glow of the sun and with months of drought, we can well understand that all the grass and herbage are burned up, and so in its present state of naked dreariness, visitors at such a season are naturally disappointed; but in other circumstances, and in days of universal irrigation, the whole scene would be very different (cf. Robinson's Researches under 19th June). Another noteworthy point is that the temperature of the body may rise much higher in cases of fever, and without serious results, than would be possible in other climates, e.g. a temperature of 110° is not uncommonly recorded. This may explain the expression 'great fever' (πυρετός μεγάλη) of Lk 4³⁸.

The temperature of the waters of the Lake does not vary so much as might be expected, and is very little lowered even by the melting of the snows on Hermon. This is to be accounted for by the fact that such waters have already passed through Lake Huleh and have also had a considerable course in the upper Jordan. The average to a depth of 30 ft. is 68°, from 30 to 50 ft. it is 62°, and at a greater depth there is a constant temperature of 59° (PEFQSt, 1894, pp. 211-220).

Rain.—The average number of rainy days during the year is 60, and the rainfall is 14.5 inches. There is no rain during the months of June, July, August, and September. Two-thirds of the rainfall occurs in December, January, and February; the other months having only one to five days on which rain falls, which may mean either now and again, a whole day, or merely slight showers. The degree of humidity is greatest in January, when it stands at 77. It decreases till June, when it is 42; but in August, again, it has risen to 45; while in September it drops as low as 39.

Winds.—From May till October there are often sirocco days. They generally come 3, 7, or 10 at a time, though sometimes the hot wind lasts but one day, and then the day following brings a delightful sensation of coolness, enjoyment, and satisfaction. On the sirocco days the heat on the Lake and in the surrounding region is intensely depressing, but between the blasts of the hot wind, westerly breezes blow in summer, and this makes the east side of the Lake pleasant. The western shore, however, south of Mejdél benefits little, as the winds pass over the hills and strike the Sea far out, leaving the air inshore close and stifling. The north end of the Lake does not suffer to the same extent, because to the west of the Plain of Gennesaret the hills are somewhat lower and farther back, and, besides, the wind blows freely down the Valley of Pigeons, and gives the district around Capernaum all that the east side enjoys at such seasons. These westerly winds usually spring up in the afternoon, they become strong as the evening advances, but generally cease about 10 p.m. During the rest of the year the weather is more variable, and the winds blow from different directions. Storms generally come from the north-east, and the temperature to the north and come over Hermon the temperature is still more reduced, and a sensation of chill is felt in the atmosphere. This sometimes occurs till well on in May; while, on the other hand, a hot south wind will sometimes blow up the Ghor (Jordan Valley) in April, bringing with it clouds of dust which dim the hills, and darken the hills, giving one a premature feeling of the summer's glow.

Storms.—The rainy season is generally introduced by thunderstorms. In October and November, small clouds, scarcely larger than a man's hand, gather on Tabor, Jebel Jarmuk, and the other hills of Upper Galilee. They grow in size and in threatening aspect, and generally in three days' time a violent thunder-storm with heavy rains bursts over the valley. This is then usually followed by a time of calm with a clear blue sky overhead. Such storms, but not generally so violent, occur from time to time during the winter, and the rainy season may be closed by something of the same nature. In the beginning of May the sky will be clouded, and there will be one or two days' rain with or without thunder. Sometimes, however, when the valley has been enjoying the most peaceful calm, it will be affected by storms that have occurred elsewhere. The hills of Upper Galilee may have been hidden in dense mists for a day or two, but nothing has disturbed the peace of the Lake. There have been rains, however, on the high lands only a few hours distant, and these, forming themselves into mountain torrents, have come down, sweeping all before them (Mt 7²⁷, Lk 4⁴⁹) in their descent, and flooding what but a few minutes earlier had been a dry channel. The present writer has personally watched the Wady Rabadiyeh and the Wady Leimôn, both of which cross the Plain of Gennesaret, as they became in an incredibly short time changed from little more than dry, stony river-beds to impassable foaming torrents; and, when the hills have been dark with clouds, has heard the warning given to get over these wadys 'before the stream comes down.'

Storms may occur on the Lake at any season, and there are few places where changes come so suddenly. The experience of Lynch is that of every one who has spent any time here: 'While pulling about the Lake, a squall swept down one of the ravines, and gave us a convincing proof of how soon the placid sea could assume an angry look' (p. 164). The storms on the Sea of Galilee are in many ways peculiar, and sometimes the wind seems to blow from various directions at one time, and the boat about. This arises from the fact that the winds blow violently down the narrow gorges and strike the Sea at an angle, stirring the waters to a great depth. Many of the storms, too, are quite local in their character. This may be understood by the fact that when a westerly wind is blowing, all may be smooth along the shores to the north and south of Tiberias and for a mile out, but there we may pass in a moment from the region of perfect calm into a gale so violent that the only chance of safety is to run before the wind to the eastern shore. At other times the south end of the Lake may be comparatively peaceful, but, sailing northward, we no sooner reach Mejdél than the wind from Wady el-Hamâm will seize the sail, and, unless it be instantly lowered, overturn the boat. These winds are from the west, but it is generally the wind from the north-east that raises a general storm over the whole Sea. This wind blows right into the Sea from el-Batîha, and from this direction no part is sheltered. The suddenness, too, with which the storms spring up may be illustrated by a storm which came from this direction, and which the present writer observed. A company of visitors were standing on the shore at Tiberias, and, noting the glassy surface of the water and the smallness of the Lake, they expressed doubts as to the possibility of such storms as those described in the Gospels. Almost immediately the wind sprang up. In 20 minutes the sea was white with foam-crested waves. Great billows broke over the towers at the corners of the city walls, and the visitors were compelled to seek shelter from the blinding spray, though now 200 yards from the Lake side. It is further to be noted that the north end of the Lake, being less sheltered than the rest, is more subject to storms. Indeed, only in peculiar circumstances could it escape having a chief share in any storm.

These facts may now be used to illustrate the two occasions on which Jesus is recorded to have been on the Sea in a storm (Mt 8²³, Mk 4³⁷, Lk 8²³; and Mt 14²⁴, Mk 6⁴⁸, Jn 6¹⁸). On the former of these the journey was from Capernaum to Gergesa, and the wind was from the north-east. Thus the boat was struck on its side, and so 'the waves beat into the ship' and it became 'filled.' On the second occasion they were attempting to pass from Bethsaida Julias to Capernaum. The wind was against them, blowing down the Wady Hamâm and over the Plain of Gennesaret, so that they were 'toiling in rowing, for the wind was contrary.' It is also made clear to us that, although the wind prevented their getting to Capernaum, it was not such as would prevent boats coming from Tiberias (Jn 6¹⁸⁻²⁴). Even in the height of the storm they could have, under the shelter of the western hills, proceeded as far as Mejdel, and thus come early upon the scene at any point at the north end of the Lake when once the storm was calmed.

It might be imagined that the cessation of the storms might mean simply the passing from an exposed and stormy to a calmer and protected region, but in both the cases recorded this is impossible. In the first instance, when the wind was from the north-east, the whole Sea would be disturbed; while in the latter case the Sea to the north of Mejdel would be all affected by the storm; and as the passage was between el-Batîha and the Plain of Gennesaret, the boat would not even approach the region of calm.

iv. INDUSTRIES.—During the peaceful years of Christ's ministry the whole Lake-basin was becoming a focus of life and energy. We have already indicated, by references to Josephus and the Rabbis, what the land was in the process of becoming in so far as agriculture was concerned. The tilling of the soil must have been a tempting occupation where the land was so fertile, so well watered everywhere, and enjoyed so much of the sunshine. Besides, it could be sown two and even three times in the year. At the present time in the plain of el-Batîha this is the case. After the corn harvest is gathered in, Indian corn may be sown; and when this also has ripened and been cleared off, the land and the season are ready for vegetables and water melons. The melons, too, ripens the harvest a month earlier than on the higher lands of Galilee and Bashan. The melons and the cucumbers are ready for use fully four weeks before those of Acre and Damascus, so that the prospect of greater gain by being able to anticipate the markets in all the larger towns must have been a powerful incentive to diligence when the means of transport were easier than now. We know that the fruits of Gennesaret were taken to Judaea (M. Ma'aser Shenî ii. 3), though it is said that they were not allowed in Jerusalem, lest on account of their goodness they should form an inducement, apart from the spiritual one, to the Jews (Jerus. Bab. Pesach, 8b). With the peaceful activity of the work pursued, that the hiring of day-labourers seems to have been quite common, and they were wont to go from Tiberias to till the lands of Beth-maon (Ku'at ibn Ma'an), which lands we believe to have been in the Plain of Gennesaret (Jerus. Bab. Met. vii. 1; and cf. Mt 20¹⁻¹⁷). Nor can we overlook the work of the shepherd, so closely bound up with agriculture, and to which there is so frequent reference in the Gospel story; but, just as in modern times, this work would be less pursued by the Lake side than on the neighbouring hills, where we know that even the flocks of Judaea were pastured (Baba Bathra v. 1).

Then the Gospels set before us a very great activity in fishing. There was a Jewish tradition that the fishing in the Lake was to be free to all, subject to the one condition that stakes were not to be set that might impede the progress of boats; and tradition further said that the freedom had been conferred by Joshua (Baba Qama, 80b). Not only the statements of the NT, but the names of the towns and villages, lead us to the knowledge of activity in this direction. Thus we have two towns of the name of Bethsaida ('Fisherrow'); a village called Magdol Nunia ('Fish-tower'), probably situated at Ain Barideh (Pesach, 46a), and the great city of Taricheae ('Fish factory') at the south end of the Lake. At Taricheae, as the name indicates, the fish were salted and dried, and to-day the salt can be seen here encrusted on the sand like hoarfrost. So far as the Mosaic law was concerned, the fish in the Sea of Galilee were all clean; but, as one passage in the Gospels draws a distinction between 'good' and 'bad' (Mt 13⁴⁷⁻⁴⁸), it may be of interest to note that the Jews of the present day, for some superstitious reason, refuse to eat one kind named burbût (Lynch, p. 165). Josephus (Vita, 12) found that the fishers were a strong party in Tiberias also, so we may conclude that the boats that came thence were used for fishing (Jn 6²³).

The chief fishing ground to-day is in the neighbourhood of el-Batîha, and here the work is conducted in boats with drag-nets (σύνροντες τὸ δίκτυον, Jn 21⁸); but in other places the want of a boat need not prevent a man becoming a fisher. If he simply possess a net and learn to cast it (βάλλωντες ἀμφιβληστρον, Mt 4¹⁸), he may be very successful in places where the water is not deep. Where the warm springs flow into the Lake the fish congregate in great numbers. We have seen shoals at Ain Barideh and Ain et-Tabigha so great as to cover an acre of the surface, and so compact together that one could scarcely throw a stone without striking several. In such cases the hand-net is thrown out with a whirl. It sinks down in a circle, enclosing a multitude, and these are then pulled in by the hand, while the net lies at the bottom. The hook (ἄγκιστρον, Mt 17²⁷) is also used in our day, and frequently a large quantity is taken in a short time. In the days of Josephus (A.D. 67) there were many boats on the Lake,—230 at Taricheae alone (J. D. ii. xxi. 8),—but in the year A.D. 27-28 they must have been still far below the number they reached in later years.

The fishing industry implied many others. Delitzsch (Handwerkeleben zur Zeit Jesu) tells us that the fish from the Lake were sold in Jerusalem; and when we think of the greater refinement of the Apostle John, his acquaintance with the high priest (Jn 18¹⁸), and his having a house in the Holy City (Jn 19²⁷), we feel almost compelled to infer with Nonnus that he had acted there as agent. The sale of fish in Jerusalem and elsewhere would mean the employment of a goodly number of muleteers, and in ordinary circumstances the Apostolic band would travel in such caravans, just as Joseph and Mary had previously done (Lk 2⁴⁴). We must get away from the idea that they always travelled on foot.

Then on the shore of the Lake itself the fishing industry implied boat-building and repairing, and this, amongst other things, may have helped to decide our Lord's settlement in Capernaum, for there, as a carpenter, He could still from time to time exercise His own calling. At any rate, after He had settled here for some time, He was still known as 'the carpenter' (Mk 6³). That this should be the case was quite in harmony with the practice of the teachers of those days. We find Rabbi Abin also working as a carpenter (naggâr), while Rabbi Ada and Rabbi Ise are said to have been fishers (zayyâdîn). To some extent also the boats may have been used for transport trade; but we are inclined to think that the fact that the two sides of the Lake belonged to two different tetrarchies, each with its own customs and taxation, would militate against this.

The Talmuds and Midrash bring to our notice other occupations carried on beside the Lake, especially at Magdala, a portion of which was named Magdol Zebaya (Erubin v. 7) from the dyeing operations there conducted. So late as the year 1862, Sepp found this work still in existence, and indigo being grown in the fields of Mejdel. Then we read that there were 80 shops in the same town for the sale of linen (Taan, iv. 5), and we learn later that the linen of Galilee was fine (Baba Qama, 119a; Ber. Rab. c. 20). But perhaps of more interest than either of these is the fact that Magdala contained 300 shops for the sale of pigeons (Midr. Echa, 75d), which were used for purifications in the Temple (Lk 24^a). These, where they are so plentiful to-day, or trapped in nooses laid out in the adjoining fields (cf. Baba Qama vii.). These would be transferred to Jerusalem, where we learn that there were booths on the Mt. of Olives for the sale of such (Cholin, 53a), as well as in the Temple courts where the sellers had invaded the sacred precincts (Mt 21¹⁹ etc.). In this connexion it is to be noted that when those who sold doves were driven out of the Temple they could not be ignorant of the power of Him who expelled them. Magdala, being thus connected, another item is cast into the balance in favour of some relationship between Mary of Magdala and the family of Bethany (cf. Baronius, Annales, cap. 32). It may also be interesting to note here a still further connexion, for in the year A.D. 67, when the Jewish war broke out, the Jews took occasion to destroy the booths on the Mt. of Olives because the occupants established their doings on the Law, and did what was forbidden by the words of the wise (Cholin, 53a); and during the same year Magdala and other towns in Galilee were destroyed, and the epithets used in the reasons given seem to indicate that the inhabitants were Christian (Jerus. Taanith iv. 5; Baba Mez. 88a; Midr. Echa ii. 2). These industries gave the Lake valley a trade connexion with the outside world; but, apart from those engaged in these occupations, multitudes would be employed in making articles for home use, as well as for the supply of the two courts and the Temple. All trades would be represented, and there would be a great deal of incidental, as in the case of tanning and the manufacture of earthware at Migdol Zebaya.

v. GEOGRAPHY.—This has long been a vexed question, and is likely to remain so till excavating work is undertaken. Tiberias, Magdala, and Julias seem alone to be undisputed, so far as the Gospel history is concerned. The questions regarding the various sites will be treated each in its own place. The towns with which we are concerned were for the most part Jewish; but there were also Greek cities (πόλεις Ἑλληνίδες) around the Lake. In Tiberias and Julias, built by the tetrarchs, in Gamala, Hippos, Gadara, Taricheæ, and in Philoteria (Polybius, v. 70), all trace of which has been lost, Greek influence would be paramount, though, of course, there was a Jewish element dwelling among the Gentile population (Rosh-Hash. ii. 1). These cities would have their own influence on the people of the surrounding districts. It may seem strange that the Gospel never touch them, and that the fact of their existence is no more than recorded, though they were large and important in comparison with the Jewish towns named. We feel justified in believing that Christ never entered these fashionable Greek cities. We know that the pious Jew specially abhorred Tiberias, and would not enter it, as it had been built on an ancient cemetery (Shebhuith ix. 1). We read, indeed, of a circuit through Decapolis (Mk 7³¹); but in view of Christ's relationship to the nearer towns, and His own statement (Mt 15²⁴), we are constrained to believe that He confined Himself to the country districts as occupied by the Jewish population. In harmony with this is His desire not to have His works proclaimed in these Greek towns (Mk 8²⁶).

Roads.—The Sea of Galilee was in no sense in the 1st cent. what it is now, something of the nature of a retired mountain lake. On the contrary, it was kept in constant touch with the whole world. The western shore was one of the chief meeting-places of the world's highways. The Via Maris (the Way of the Sea, Mt 4³⁵), a well-known trade route, along which the wealth of the East passed westward, touched its north-eastern shore. Paved portions of it still remain. Details of the network of highways meeting in this region will be found in their own place (see ROADS); but we have to remark that the Jordan could be passed not only at the usual fords, but, during the spring and summer months, also by wading knee-deep along a kind of bar formed by pebbles and sand, where the river enters the Lake (Mt 14¹³, Mk 6³⁸). Further, it is to be noted that most if not all of these roads were available not only for mules and camels, as in modern times, but also for vehicles, for we learn that on account of their quantity the contributions were sent from Magdala, Cabul, and Sogane to Jerusalem in waggons (Taanith, iv. 5).

vi. POPULATION.—We can now well understand the various classes of people who dwelt in and around this district. In the Greek towns the population would be chiefly Greek-speaking sojourners of mixed race—the Levantines of those days. The Roman soldiery would be there in considerable numbers as well as scattered through the towns, especially where customs were collected. There would be courtiers around the Herods in Tiberias and Julias—'Herodians,' as they were called; and they were, for the most part, Sadducees. The publicans would have their headquarters in the two capitals, but they would be employed everywhere, and would be specially active at the north end of the Lake, on the great trade routes. There, too, the Pharisees and probably also the Essenes (BJ II. viii. 4) would be chiefly in evidence. It is the population at this north end that chiefly concerns us; for amongst them the Lord dwelt, and there He had His own city (Mt 9¹). The people here were essentially Jewish, but there was a world of difference from the Judaism of Judæa. Graetz (ii. 148, Eng. ed.) has well described this when he says: 'Morality was stricter in Galilee, and the laws and customs more rigidly enforced. The slightest infraction was not allowed, and what the Judæans permitted themselves the Galileans would by no means consent to.' We might almost put it, Judæa had much of the semblance of piety, Galilee more of the reality. Indeed, their piety as Jews had already impressed even the heathen world (Lk 7⁹). The Talmuds tell us that the Galilean loved honour more than wealth, and that the contrary was the case in Judæa (Jerus. Keth. iv. 14); that the marriages were simpler and more decently conducted (Keth. 12a, with which cf. Jn 2¹⁻¹¹; Edersheim, Sketch of Jewish Social Life, p. 152ff.), and also that the widow's right of occupancy of her husband's house was fully recognized (Mishna, Keth. iv. 12 and Jerus. Keth. iv. 14; cf. Mt 8¹⁴). The Galileans, too, were accused by their neighbours of being too talkative with women; and in this connexion the expression טמא גלילאי 'foolish Galilean,' came into use (Erubin, 53b; cf. Jr 2²⁷). The Talmud also speaks well of the Galileans, and adds that they were inured to poverty from infancy (BJ III. iii. 2). There is another remark in the Talmud regarding their character that is worth noting: אנשי גליל קטריני הוי 'the men of Galilee were disputatious' (Nedar. 48a). This has always been a characteristic of the Jew; he has never been able to argue calmly; and when we add to this a characteristic of the people the Galileans had—a fishing and boating life, we must admit the truth of the accusation; and knowing this, we can well understand that many of the scenes around the Lake were much noisier than the calm words of Scripture would lead us to suspect (Mt 9²⁴⁻²⁵, Mk 3²², Lk 8³⁷ etc.); and we can appreciate the facility with which Peter relapsed into what must have been an old habit (Mk 14³⁰). Then the inhabitants of the district would not be over cleanly in their habits. We can infer nothing from the neglect of hand-washing (ניטיל), for it is at best purely ceremonial; but the Jew generally was, in the 1st cent., the butt of the Gentile world on account of his uncleanness, just as he is to-day (Seneca, Ep. 5; Perseus, Sat. v.). Apart from the Greek towns, which, like Tiberias and Gamala, were supplied by aqueducts (portions of which still remain), the general water supply was from the Lake; and in consideration of the traffic that existed and the absence of sanitary arrangements, this could not be satisfactory in the neighbourhood of a town like Capernaum. Then every village would have, as at the present time, its own dunghill, a fruitful source of swarms of flies.

Great extremes of wealth are not to be met with in Galilee. We meet, indeed, extremes of wealth (Mt 7⁶ 13⁴⁶ 18²⁴, Lk 12^{18, 49}); but on the whole the life was of the simplest, as we see from the nature of the household furnishings.—the bushel, the candlestick (Mt 5¹⁵), there being but one; and the mention of the food—bread, eggs, fish (Mt 7^{9, 10}, Lk 11^{11, 12}).

Then it is to be noted that the people were to a certain extent bilingual. Judging from similar conditions in this district and elsewhere at the present day, we should say that the language of the homes and of the Jewish population among themselves was Aramaic, but that the men would generally be acquainted colloquially with the Hellenistic speech of the larger towns. The native language, too, had its own peculiarities (Mt 26⁷³), the chief of which was a remarkable confusion of the gutturals, which is repeatedly ridiculed in the Talmuds, where a notable example is given of a Galilean being asked, when shouting on the street, whether he wished to sell 'wool,' 'a sheep,' 'wine,' or 'a donkey' (Bab. Eruvin, 53b; Berakhoth, 32a).

To sum up, then, the population of this district was as manly, industrious, independent, moral, pious, and experienced in the world as any in Palestine. It was among men who were morally right that our Lord chose to settle. It was such that He made His first disciples, and finally His Apostles. Had these been willing to compromise conscience, they might easily have passed into easier walks of life. In the full strength of early manhood, they might have had a share in the settlement of Tiberias (Ant. XVIII. ii. 3), but they had resisted that temptation. It is true that Matthew the publican (Mt 10⁸) was among them, but it is to be remembered that here he did not serve an alien like the publicani in Judæa. The taxes he collected would go to the coffers of Antipas in Tiberias (Titus Livius, 32 F; Cicero, in Verr. ii. 72), and they would be drawn from the tax on goods passing along the highways as well as on the fish from the Lake, as at the present day. This latter fact suggests a peculiar relationship between Matthew and the 'fisher-folk' among the Twelve, and a still more interesting one between him and Simon the Zealot, who had fought against these taxes.

We conclude by observing that, as no land in the world save Palestine could have given us the Bible, no part of the land save this, with its wealth of recent historical association and variety in nature, from the torrid heat of el-Ghurweir to the perennial snows of Hermon, could so well have suited the Great Teacher in His appeal to men of every kindred and every clime. In its calm beauty it was in many ways worthy of the presence of the Son of Man, and it presents us with a beautiful picture of many aspects of His life and character. It deserved all that Jew and Gentile said in its praise even in their playing with its names—Tiberias (טבריא), 'beautiful of appearance'; Capernaum (כפר נחום), 'land of pleasantness or consolation.' Before the time of the Lord Jesus the Sea of Galilee was to the world an unknown, neglected, and almost unnamed distant inland lake; but He has changed all this. He has rendered it immortal.

SEAL.—The only reference in the Gospels to the literal use of a seal is Mt 27⁶⁶ * where we read that the chief priests and Pharisees, after consultation with Pilate, in order to prevent the removal of our Lord's body by the disciples, secured the sepulchre to the best of their power by setting their seal upon the entrance stone (cf. Dn 6¹⁷) as well as by placing soldiers to guard it. The process would be accomplished by stretching a cord across the stone that blocked the entrance, and by sealing the two ends of the cord against the wall of rock. Twice in the Fourth Gospel the act of sealing is mentioned in connection with the solemn promise to the believing, from his own experience, of the resurrection (Jn 3³³); (b) the destination and authentication of the Son by the Father as the bestower of the food which nourishes eternal life (Jn 6³⁷). In all of these three cases it is the verb σφραγίζω that is used, the noun σφραγίς not being found in the Gospels.

SEAM.—See COAT.

SEARCHING.—Search (of Latin-French derivation) is a richer word than seel (of Saxon origin), because it implies as well as looking and asking (cf. 1 P 1¹⁰). Thus while ζητέω and its compounds are always translated 'seek,' the words ἐρευνάω to 'search' are ἀνακρίνω (Ac 17¹¹ only) and ἐρευνάω. In Mt 28 ἐρευνάω is appropriately used for the identifying of the child of Messianic promise: 'Search out carefully concerning the young child' (RV); whereas AV tr. as if it were ἐκζητέω. In Mt 10¹¹ it means 'get to know exactly who is genuinely worthy,' rather than settle down with the first man who is spoken of for his piety. In Jn 21¹² the same word is used to suggest that the disciples did not venture to probe the mystery any further. Reverence held them back,—the sense that faith must at such a moment take the place of criticism.

But the exact equivalent of 'search' is ἐρευνάω. It is used twice in Jn. (5³⁹ 7⁵²) of 'searching the Scriptures.' It may well be believed that it connoted more on the lips of Jesus (5³⁹), who knew how to 'search' the spirit from the letter (Mt 7¹², Lk 7¹²), and to bring forth treasures new as well as old (Mt 13⁵², cf. 5¹⁹ 9¹² 12⁴⁰), than it did upon the lips of the chief priests and Pharisees (Jn 7⁵²).—With Christ it meant to search the Scriptures with a candid mind and reverent spirit to find the will of the holy Father whose name is Love. But there was a 'veil upon the faces' of the Jews (2 Co 3¹⁵), because they did not look behind a private or traditional interpretation. The priests, who were mostly Sadducees, 'searched' for passages that would serve a casual purpose (Mk 12¹¹), and the Pharisees 'searched' for what would maintain their burdensome traditions (Mk 2²⁴, Lk 13¹⁴, Jn 9²⁸), or even enable them to evade a moral issue (Mt 19⁷).

In Jn 5³⁹ ἐρευνάω may be either Imperative (as AV) or Indicative (as RV) [cf. πιστεύετε in Jn 14¹]. The former falls into line with the general tenor of Christ's teaching, that the Jews had only to use the means at their disposal in order to see in Himself the fulfilment of the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5¹⁷, Lk 16³¹ 24²⁷, Jn 7³⁸). But the Indicative seems in best accord with the immediate context ('because ye think,' and these are they,' 'ye will not come to me') (cf. Westcott, in loc.).

SECOND COMING.—This is the designation commonly given to the final return of Jesus in glory at the end of the ages, to perfect His Kingdom. The term does not occur in the Gospels, but it has long been adopted in general usage to signify the supreme crisis of the Parousia, the most momentous and decisive of the various future comings which Jesus foreshadowed when He spoke of His death at the hands of men, and the manifestations of His triumphant life and power that would follow it. The subject is dealt with under COMING AGAIN, and more fully, with a note on the Literature, under PAROUSIA.

G. M'HARDY.

SEED.—Excluding the use of this term as equivalent to progeny, offspring, or race (cf. e.g. Mk 12¹⁹⁻²⁴, Lk 1³⁵, Jn 7³⁷), we find it exclusively employed in the parables of Jesus as a symbol for Divine influence, or for the effect of Divine moral and religious life in communities or individuals.

1. In Mk 4²⁶⁻²⁹, a parable peculiar to Mark, Jesus uses the process of sowing and the subsequent conduct of the farmer to illustrate the certain success of His Kingdom upon earth. What He preached about seemed perhaps to the disciples, as well as to outsiders, as weak as a grain of seed flung upon a field. Yet neither is an isolated or foreign thing in the world. On the side of the gospel were certain mysterious powers which would ensure it success, apart from human aid or interference. All it required was time. The order of things was a ripening order, and at the proper moment these favourable conditions would bring about the fruit and result of what at present seemed a very precarious and unpromising movement among men. Such is the general point of the parable. The seed's vital energy and ir-appointed correspondence with the powers of nature symbolize features in the gospel which enable Jesus to await the future with quiet confidence and an easy mind. Neither is just what it seems to the outward eye. Each sets in action a slow but sure process of growth, upon which the sensible person will count. 'Fruit grows thus,' said Epictetus; 'the seed must be buried for some time, hidden, and then grow slowly if it is to reach perfection.' This, by an extension, or rather by a natural application of this usage that the self-sowing seed is compared to the burying of the seed, is the meaning of the parable with special reference to the death of Jesus Himself. The ultimate effects of such self-immolation depend on the thoroughness of the process itself.

The Kingdom, compared to seed in the parable (Mk 4³⁰⁻³² = Mt 13^{31, 32} = Lk 13^{18, 19}). A small thing to begin with, it ultimately surpasses all other movements which make a greater show at first to the untrained eye. Here the Kingdom is conceived of, not eschatologically, but historically. When it is likened to 'seed,' the thought is mainly of the immense possibilities of growth in it, as compared with its initial size, the correspondence between it and the soul of man, and the pledge, which it contains, of some final and splendid issue.

2. Seed, on the other hand, depends to a certain extent upon soil. While essentially designed to co-operate with the vital forces of nature, it may be rendered wholly or partially barren. And in this further sense it forms a symbol for Jesus of the Divine word and its fortunes in the world of men. Consequently we find that in two other parables the seed represents not the Kingdom, but the word (cf. Mt 13¹⁸).

The first of these, the parable of the Sower and the Soils (Mk 4^{2f} = Mt 13^{2f} = Lk 8^{2f}), bears on the difficulties and disappointments encountered in the preaching of the word of God. The latter is compared to the vital germ or grain of the plant, which, through no fault of its own or of the sower, may fail to germinate, owing to the unpromising nature of the ground on which it chanced to fall. Nevertheless, the work of the sower must proceed. The partial failure of his efforts is not to render his career or calling void. In the parable itself, which is undoubtedly genuine, the original reference is to the experience of Jesus Himself as a preacher. 'Jesus has to preach; the rest is God's concern' (Wellhausen). But in the subsequent interpretation of the parable, which, like other interpretations, must be held to contain in whole or part reflexions of the Apostolic age and traces of the editor's hand, the scope widens to include the general preaching of Christian evangelists, who are counselled not to let themselves be daunted by finding the unresponsive and the preoccupied among their hearers. The seed must be sown. The word must be trusted to do its work in congenial hearts. The teaching must be imparted. Such is the supreme lesson for evangelists drawn here by Jesus from the parable of the Sower.

The other parable is that of the Tares, or darnel (Mt 13^{24f}), which may be an allegorized variation, and in part an expansion, of the ideas contained in Mk 4²⁶⁻²⁹. Certainly, whatever be the original nucleus, the editorial reflexions indicate a rather advanced period in the history of the early Church's mission and discipline. Growth, here too, is a partial feature of the situation. But the seed or word is further exposed to deliberate and widespread corruption and rivalry. Another power of influence is stealthily at work among men. God's message finds no virgin soil, for the growth of the seed is thwarted; and specious, vigorous rivals abound.

Both of the latter parables, in so far as they emphasize the nature of God's word or message as seed, thus touch wisely and earnestly on its mysterious power of growth. The spoken word is essentially fruitful. It is the instrument of the Divine mission. 'We forget too often that language is both a seed-sowing and a revelation,' says Amiel. 'Man is a husbandman; his whole work rightly understood is to develop life, to sow it everywhere.' And the supreme method is the contact of one personality with another, especially through the medium of that spoken intercourse which conveys the truth of God to the soul of man. This, and no external means, is the chosen way of Jesus.

SEEING.—In the Gospels there are three Greek words (βλέπω, θεωρέω, ὁράω) used for 'see,' sometimes rendered in the EV by 'behold,' 'take heed,' 'beware,' 'regard.' The most ordinary significance of the word 'see' is, of course, the natural one—to recognize by the act of vision ordinary external objects, as when the blind are described as seeing (Mt 15³¹, Jn 9⁷), or men are promised that they shall see the Son of Man, or when the disciples think they see a vision, or the multitude see the miracles of Jesus (Mk 14⁶⁹, Lk 24²³, Jn 6²).

The other two uses of the word are, however, less common. The first usage under this head is where the verb 'to see' is used of the recognition of objects not strictly visible, as, for example, when it is said of Peter that he saw the Son of Man; or when men are told that, if they first cast out the beam out of their own eye, they will then be able to see clearly to cast the mote out of their brother's eye (Mt 7³); or, again, when it is said that a man shall see death (Lk 2²⁶, Jn 8⁵¹); or when the Lord speaks of a man as 'seeing the light of this world' (Jn 11⁹), where, of course, it is more strictly the vision of objects made possible through the presence of the light of day.

2. The second, but in a very ordinary sense, is the seeing of the Gospels, where the verb 'to see' is employed in the sense of the spiritual vision of the mind and soul. In the Beatitudes, for example, the blessing of the pure in heart is that they shall see God (Mt 5⁸). The angels also possess the same privilege (Mt 18¹⁰). The disciples are told that in seeing Christ they have already obtained the vision of the Father (Jn 14⁹); while in another passage of the same Gospel the seeing of Christ and believing on Him are the conditions of possessing eternal life (6⁴⁰). In the Lord's great prayer for His disciples He desires that they may see His glory (17²⁴), which is participation in the understanding of the highest and most intimate character. In this connexion also is to be noted the statement of our Lord in Lk 10¹⁸, where, on the parting of the Seventy, He speaks of His beholding Satan 'fallen as lightning from heaven,' which must imply His spiritual prevision of the final overthrow of the powers of evil, and the establishment of His Divine kingdom. Most significant of all this class of passages, however, are those found in Jn 9³⁰, and Mt 13¹⁴⁻¹⁶ with its parallels in Mk 4¹² and Lk 8¹⁰. The passage in Jn. distinctly states that the purpose of Christ's presence in the world was first to bring light to blind eyes, but, secondly, to make blind those who were able to see; and this last statement is further explained in the answer given to the indignant question of the Pharisees as to whether they also were blind, that their fault consisted in claiming to possess the power of spiritual vision, while their hearts were closed to the revelation of Christ's message; and so their spiritual perception only magnified their sin. On Mt 13¹⁴⁻¹⁶ see PARABLE, p. 315 f.

(3) A third general significance of the word 'see' is that of an ethical warning in the sense of the English phrase 'take heed.' For example, in Mt 24⁶ we read, 'See that ye be not troubled'; and in Mk 8¹⁵ two words are combined in the warning, 'Take heed (δρᾶτε), beware (βλέπετε) of the leaven of the Pharisees, and the leaven of Herod.'

When combined with a preposition (εἰς), the verb βλέω signifies 'regard,' in the sense of 'pay obsequious attention to,' as in Mt 22⁶; and, finally, the word is used of God Himself in His vision of the hearts of men, as in Mt 6⁸, which reads, 'Thy Father which seeth in secret shall recompense thee.'

As a general result of the examination of the above passages, it will be noticed that in Jn. the word 'see' has a special significance. It is, indeed, one of the words that form a leading conception in his writing. Just as the idea of life arises out of the miracle of the feeding of the multitude, so does that of light spring from the miracle of the healing of the man blind from his birth. In Jn.'s spiritual vocabulary, Christ Himself is the light of the world; and the illumination of the souls of men and the blessing of the gospel can be spoken of in terms of light and its enjoyment as suitably as in terms of life and its possession. Thus the miracles of giving sight to the blind become peculiarly significant; but we need not, therefore, assume that, though they are in this way acted parables, the narratives of such miracles are not to be regarded as of any historical value, but as mere pictorial representations of the spiritual truths they are meant to convey.

SELF-CONTROL.—The Scripture term for self-control is ἐγκράτεια, which with its cognates occurs several times in the NT; but in the Gospels only the privative ἀκρασία is found, with the rendering 'excess' (Mt 23²⁹). The English word is not used in AV, and in RV is confined to the margin, with the single exception of 2 Ti 3⁸. It denotes (see Chrysostom, Hom. Tit 1⁸ τὸν πάθος κρατοῦντα) the exercise of dominion by man over the constituents of character within, as well as over external influences that would tend to baffle or frustrate him. It may be distinguished from self-denial as discipline is from destruction, the one making the self the centre of purpose and effort, the other aiming at its extinction or suppression. The one reduces the self, or certain of its elements, to zero; the other directs and uses it, turning all its powers into the channel of some activity, viewed as advantageous or benign. Mastery within the living organism of man is the principal suggestion of both; but self-denial gives greater prominence to the possible conquest of evil and to the ascetic processes by which it must be purged, whilst self-control implies rather freedom and strenuousness, and involves no depressing view of man or of life (see art. SELF-DENIAL). More particularly, self-control means the control of the temperament, the instincts, emotions, and will, both in themselves and against the various appeals that are made to them in daily life, with a view to the accomplishment of some purpose or the maintenance of some phase of character. In the Gospels it is exhibited in the Man Jesus Christ in a perfect degree, and by Him commended to His disciples, together with the secret of its attainment and retention.

1. Self-control on the part of Christ.—(1) It is rather doubtful whether, in the current, though vague, sense of the word, temperament can be predicated of Christ. Strictly the word denotes a certain general characteristic of a man's temper and mood, by which his progress in intelligence and morality is in various ways promoted or hindered. It means the set of the inner life towards some specific expression or action, and implies both a disproportion in the constituents of character and a consequent degree of imperfection and disapproval. From a very early time the typical temperaments have been classed as four—sanguine, choleric, melancholic, choleric, and phlegmatic; and in each of them is found in varying measure a surplus of some quality which, by reason of its excess, spoils the proportion, and makes self-control under certain conditions specially difficult. As the humanity of Christ is perfect, and in Him all the virtues meet and harmonize, an excess in any direction is out of the question. He had moods of unbounded hope (Jn 12³²), of depression and shrinking (Mt 26³⁸, Jn 12²⁷), of indignant anger (Mt 23¹³⁻³⁶), of equanimity and comparative insensibility to passing impressions (Lk 13³³, Jn 19¹⁴); but there was no such long-continued pre-eminence of one good quality over another as would allow the placing of Him, in regard to temperament, in any of the ordinary categories. If He is to be placed at all, a new class must be formed, and He may be regarded as the type of the religious temperament (Lk 2⁴⁹, Jn 6³⁸), with the right principles of self-control in action from the beginning. In the same group, though by no means on the same level, may be put all the animæ naturaliter Christianæ, amongst whom the obligation of self-control, if rendered easier of discharge by their disposition, should be more quickly and actively met (Mt 13¹² 25²⁹, Lk 12^{47a}).

(2) Control over instincts and the life, wherein the ethical rule is restraint, is traceable in Christ particulars of His historical manifestation, and as sustained with completeness in times of special temptation. By 'instinct' is meant the impulse and faculty of acting in such a way as to produce certain results, without deliberate or even conscious foresight. Some of these impulses are rooted in the body and aroused into activity by its uneasiness and recurring needs. Christ, for instance, knew weariness and its massive appeals for physical rest, but was so completely master of Himself as to be able to postpone, if not to withhold, the response (Mt 8²⁴, Jn 4^{6ff}); and of sluggishness on His part there is no record in the Gospels. During the week of the Passion the nights were spent at Bethany (the village or its neighbourhood: Mt 21¹⁷, Mk 11¹¹), in part probably with a view to bodily rest after the busy days. So, too, with hunger and thirst, whose importunity was sometimes clamorous, yet easily silenced or put off (Mt 4³, Mk 3²⁰ 6³¹, Jn 19²⁸). In regard to the physical nature, Christ neither practised nor indulged, but only the maintenance of its most honest natural promptings and activities. To Him there were no exceptions, the apparent ones proving on closer examination to be designed each for a special didactic or ethical purpose. The cursing of the fig-tree was not done unthinkingly under the stimulus of a disappointed appetite (Mk 11^{12ff}), but in illustration of the doom awaiting Israel, emblem of all who abound in leaves but fail in fruitfulness (cf. Lk 13⁶⁻⁹), and of the power of faith in dealing with evil (Mt 21^{20ff}). 'A gluttonous man and a winebibber' (Mt 11¹⁹, Lk 7³⁴), on account of its very difficulty to some expositors, must not be rejected as an interpolation. It is not meant to indicate Christ's real habit; but it is an almost amused comment by Him on the equal readiness with which certain types of men protest against the severity of one teacher and the graciousness of another. A professed gentleness which is really childish and angry, with a touch of necessity in exaggeration; and in this case its evidence proves no degree of self-indulgence on the part of Christ, but merely magnifies His geniality, and the gentle way in which He moved amongst all innocent forms of human life, into a charge against Him of excess.

Of the mastery exercised by Christ over His emotions the characteristics appear to be a recognition of the legitimacy of emotion, sometimes even of free and unrestrained emotion, with the avoidance of all such qualities and extremes as the world has learned to condemn. Sympathy was full at Bethany (Jn 11³⁵) and on the approach to Jerusalem (Lk 19⁴¹), but not allowed to become so sentimental or overwhelming as to interfere with service. The anger of just indignation finds expression and becomes even torrential in Mt 23³³⁻³⁶; but there is nowhere any trace of personal rancour. In Gethsemane the sacred anguish transcends analysis, for the vicarious Passion was begun; but if any influence of fear or regret or intolerable burden (Lk 22⁴⁰) is to be acknowledged, the shrinking is quickly mastered, and the Saviour goes forth calmly to die (Mt 26^{45ff}, Mk 14^{41ff}, He 5^{7ff}). Similarly the cry on the cross (Mt 27⁴⁶, Mk 15³⁴) is no sign of a temporary loss of control, the collapse of the human spirit of Christ in the bitterness. It should be connected with rather than with His personal experience, and marks the culmination of the pressure of the world's sin (Gal 3¹³). For man Christ passes through the deep valley of sin's doom, and at the supreme moment is compassed about by darkness unrelieved; but He did not falter, nor was the ordered unity of His inner life in His oneness of person with the Father broken. At the other extreme of emotion are the sense of relief after long strain, with its associated perils of 'letting oneself go,' and such an exultation of joy as is apt to cause a lapse in vigilance. The relief and the joy are traceable in Christ (Mt 11²⁵, Lk 10²¹, Jn 17¹⁻⁴), who on the earlier occasion immediately proceeds, according to the one tradition, to offer rest to the weary, and, according to the other, to pronounce a benediction upon His disciples. Joy that becomes exuberant and beyond control, and wastes itself in moods of sheer ecstacy, is nowhere recorded of Him. He preserves consistently the wise mean, well removed from the ordinary dangers, on either side, of excess and of defect. His self-respect was complete, never degenerating into immodest vanity or giving place to servility (Jn 6¹⁵ 12¹³⁻¹⁵ 18²¹⁻³⁷). Fear could not be excited in Him by the antagonism of the people or by His apparent powerlessness in the hands of the authorities (Mt 12¹⁴, Lk 11¹⁴, Jn 18²³ 19¹¹). He was sociable yet free, interested but not absorbed in nature and in man, subject to every pure emotion but possessed and mastered by none. And the sensitive life of Christ is most correctly viewed as an organized comity of well-graded sentiments and feelings, in which due order was maintained without effort or occasional failure.

(3) To this, the negative side of self-control, the subjection of the various instincts and sensibilities, must be added the positive intention of some controlling end or purpose, without which the main factor in determining the merit of self-control and the moral quality of the life will be absent. Self-control by itself may be simply a tribute to strength of will, neutral in regard to quality, and capable of being turned to bad uses. As exhibited in Christ, it means not only steadiness and freedom from irritability, a calm temper unruffled by influences from without, but the inflexible direction of the spirit and will upon the accomplishment of purposes which neither ethics nor religion can consider any worthier. This superiority to disappointment, difficulty, apparent disaster, is shown in many lights; and if there are times when it appears for a moment to be obscured, it is recovered in another moment, and unflinchingly held. The atmosphere in which Jesus lived was often impure, vitiated by the influence of successes that were won by insincerity as well as by the prosperity of many vices; yet by men who are competent to judge, no moral fault or compromise with wrong has ever been charged against Him (Jn 8⁴⁶). There is no instance of His having been diverted from His purpose by the 'temptations of sinners' (He 12³), the blinding clamour of the people, or their unbelieving disavowal of His mission (Mk 14²⁸); and even widespread alienation amongst His followers was turned in an instant to deepening the convictions and strengthening the loyalty of the others (Jn 6⁶⁷). Neither the bitter craft of the religious leaders with their emissaries dogging His footsteps (Mt 22^{15ff}, Lk 11^{53ff}), nor the jealousy or fear of the petty overlords (Lk 13^{31ff}), could break the inward unity of His spirit or the stability of His will. In the select group of His disciples were dispositions to protest or interfere (Mt 16²³, Lk 9⁵⁴), sometimes ignorance and unwillingness to learn (Mt 20^{30ff}, Lk 17²⁰; cf. Ac 1⁶), tempers and views that were discordant and unseemly, with a traitor lurking in the midst; yet Christ never allowed the strain of His work, or the uncongeniality or impotence of the men who were nearest to Him, to divert His sympathy or to ruffle the settled quiet of His demeanour. Death itself, rendered so horrible by the concentration upon it of every man's sin (He 2⁹), was anticipated without alarm, and undergone in all its shame without loss of personal dignity or any weakening of His heroic resolution to save. He set His face steadily (Lk 9⁵¹) in no sudden bracing of His will in the presence of an unexpected peril; but the perfect self-control, which made it possible for Him to become incarnate, was maintained through all the incidents of the historical manifestation, and even on the cross itself. In the freedom of His contact with nature and man, His heart never more than momentarily failed, and His self-control in times of confusion and danger helped to make Him the most consummate Leader of sinful men, serene and strong, and always confident in God and in the issue.

(4) Beyond the action of Christ's own will, two further causes of His self-control may be distinguished. The one was His personal trust in God the Father, and the other the influence of the Holy Spirit in response. (a) At the beginning of His career the part played by His practice and in His inner life was the recognition of His Father's will, against the attractions that appeal to youth, and the dependence and clinging that earthly parents naturally desire, was indicated in His reply in the Temple (Lk 2⁴⁹), and on later occasions (Jn 4³⁴ 5^{30b} 6³⁸ 14³¹). A sense of security in the remembrance of the Father's power and purpose is part of the secret of Christ's complete possession in the final crisis (Mt 26⁵³). He entered upon His Agony with bitter forebodings, which in solitude became almost unendurable (Lk 22⁴⁴); absolute acceptance of the Father's will (Mk 14³⁶) enabled Him to press down any reluctance to die (He 5^{7b}).—'made perfect' Himself thereby, and fitted to be 'the author of eternal salvation.' So important was His consciousness of this relationship with the Father, that in it lay for Him the kernel and germ of all truth, and in its revelation to man the sum of all duty and pleasure. (b) The action of the Holy Spirit in sustaining the self-control of Jesus against appetites and evil appeals is conspicuous in the records of the Temptation (Mt 1, Mk 1, Lk 4¹), and referred to by each of the Synoptists (see TEMPTATION). But it also appears elsewhere. From His childhood 'the grace of God was upon him' (Lk 2⁴⁰); and that communicated grace of the Spirit wrought in Him (Lk 2^{52b} RVm) all that He as a man accomplished or became. The unction or illapse at His baptism was not temporary, but the Spirit permanently abode with Him (Jn 1^{32c}); and if Acts refers primarily to invigoration for service, St. Luke elsewhere represents Jesus as 'full of the Holy Ghost' (4¹, cf. Jn 3³⁴), and as thereby prepared for personal testing and discipline as well as for His mission of mercy and redemption. For Him, as for His disciples, the soul's thirst for unity and self-mastery is assuaged, and all needed resources are obtained, in the same way and from the same fountain (Jn 7³⁷⁻³⁹).

2. Self-control on the part of man.—For man self-control assumes a double aspect, according as it is a rule of restraint or of activity. On the one hand, it keeps the indulgence of the natural appetites and impulses within the bounds of reason, grading and coordinating them all as elements of a coherent rational life. On the other, it concentrates the energies of the original tendency to diffusion, and directs them into a moral life under the steady pressure of a master conviction and a master purpose. In other words, since Christianity is not an ideal or a theoretical ethic, but a practicable way of living, and since each man's difficulty does not arise from the impulses generally, but from the predominance of some single group of impulses, self-control as exhibited and required by Christ comes to mean the control of individual temperament, the avoidance of the various evil excesses to which each man is prone, and possibly even the substitution of some form of good for some form of evil as an instinctive besetment. Symmetrical development of each man's spirit may be said to be the object of the Gospels, which are far from silent either as to the method by which it is to be effected, or as to the pains and satisfactions of the process.

Control of the senses and appetites is to be carried, if necessary, to the point of mutilation, for excess must be prevented, whatever the pain or cost (Mt 5^{29c} 18^{8c}, Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁸); and not even relationships that are intimate and pure must be allowed to interfere with the interests of the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 19¹², cf. 1 Co 7³²). Inclinations and impulses are to be distrusted, and the Christian should be their master and not their slave (Mt 5³⁹⁻⁴¹, Lk 6^{29c}, cf. Ro 12^{17a}). The need of integrating the life by giving supreme sway to some right and nobly conceived purpose at its centre is shown in the contrast with the young ruler (Mt 19²¹, Mk 10²¹, Lk 18²²), where the renunciation of wealth is a necessary preparation for all-absorbing devotion to Christ, the great test of which is given in Jn 10²⁷ 12²⁶), as well as the bearing of the sayings as to the 'single' eye (Mt 6²², Lk 11³⁴), the impossibility of serving God and mammon (Mt 6²⁴, Lk 16¹³), the necessity of becoming 'as a little child' (Mk 10¹⁵), as well as the observance of which is the spirit from the distressing and fear, but especially from the unity, with God, strong in the desire to act as its proper end. If the control be threatened from within, it is recovered or retained by recognizing God's superior claims, and counting nothing so important in experience as His good pleasure (Mt 10²⁸, Lk 12^{4c}). Against opposition and difficulty of every kind the rule is steadfastness (Mt 10¹⁶⁻²⁶ 24³⁹), neither purpose nor self-control being shaken, because of the unrivalled constraint of the love of Christ (Mt 24⁹, Jn 15¹⁸⁻²¹ 16²⁰⁻²²). 'For my sake' gives the secret of a self-control that never breaks down; and the love and devotion are continuously fed by the Spirit of the Father (Mt 10²⁰, Jn 16¹⁴). By the forgiveness of sins Christ sets the will free from bondage to past evil, and His Spirit, ruling in the life because in the heart, becomes an un-failing source of strength and peace, reproducing in mortal experience the self-control of Him who never wavered from duty, or yielded to temptation, or allowed the Kingdom within to be disturbed by a breach of will between Himself and the Father. His self-control, in its completeness and in its means, is the measure and guarantee of what is possible to man. See also art. TEMPERANCE.

SELF-DENIAL.—Self-denial is undoubtedly an essential part of the religious life as set before men by Jesus Christ. 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself' (Mt 16²⁴). The word used (ἀπαρνησάμενος) occurs elsewhere only in the parallel passages (Mk 8³⁴, Lk 9²³); in the accounts given by the four Evangelists of St. Peter's denial (Mt 26^{34, 35, 75}, Mk 14^{30, 31, 72}, Lk 22⁶¹, Jn 13³⁸); and in our Lord's denunciation of apostasy (Lk 12⁹). It is used in the LXX to tr. ἀσπ. It is a strong word, and its meaning is best understood perhaps by comparing it with the corresponding expression of St. Paul, 'I count as loss' (ἡγούμεαι ζημίαν, Ph 3⁷⁻⁸). It must be understood to include a conquest of the insistent and unruly demands of the body, denial of the lower self; and a bringing into subjection of the ambitions and emotions of the intellect and spirit, denial of the higher self.

1. The denial of the carnal self.—The practices by which men have sought to accomplish this kind of self-denial pass generally under the name of asceticism. There are five such kinds of discipline recommended or countenanced by our Lord's teaching and example: (1) fasting, (2) celibacy and sexual restraint, (3) almsgiving, (4) vigils, (5) the refusal of luxury in the surroundings of life.

(1) Fasting was practised by our Lord Himself (Mt 4^{1ff.}). It was presupposed as likely to form part of the religious life by His disciples (Mt 6^{16ff.}, Mk 2²⁰). It was practised by the Apostles and the Church in their time (Ac 10^{9, 30}, 13³, 14²³, 1 Co 7⁵), and traditions of the severity of their fasting survived into the 2nd cent. (Clem. Recog. vii. 6; Clem. Alex. Pædag. ii. 1; Can. Murat. i. 11). In the sub-Apostolic age the result of the example of the Lord and His Apostles stated days became a common practice of self-denial (Did. viii.; Hermas, Sim. v. 1; Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. 12). The Lenten fast grew from an 11 days (Tertull. de Jejun. 15) to 40 days, of our Lord's fast in the wilderness. The Friday fast, the Lenten fast, and the custom of fasting before receiving the Communion, were very general, if not universal, in the early Catholic and the mediæval Church. See art. FASTING.

(2) Celibacy is countenanced by our Lord, but not generally recommended (Mt 19¹², Lk 14²⁶). It and temporary sexual restraint are recommended and even deemed specially honourable by the Apostles (1 Co 7^{29, 35}, Rev 14^{3, 4}). In the sub-Apostolic age the idea of the superior sanctity of the virgin state grew rapidly (Did. xi. 11; Ignat. Ep. ad Polyc. v.; Just. Mart. Apol. i. 15; Athenag. 33, etc.). See art. CELIBACY.

(3) Almsgiving, as a form of self-denial, is distinctly recommended by our Lord (Mt 6^{1ff.}, Lk 11⁴¹, 12³³, Mk 12⁴³; cf. Lk 6³⁸, Mt 5⁴², Ac 20³⁵), and He Himself, though poor, practised it (Jn 13²⁹). The Apostles insisted on the duty of almsgiving, at first apparently indiscriminately (Ac 2^{44, 45}), afterwards with more caution (Ro 12², 2 Co 8³, Ja 2¹⁴, 1 Jn 3¹⁷, He 13¹⁶, Ja 1²⁷, 2 Co 9^{6, 7}, Gal 6⁹, 1 Co 16¹, 2 Co 9¹, Ro 15²⁶, Ac 11²⁷⁻³⁰; cf. 2 Th 3¹⁰). In the early Church almsgiving was a necessary part of the Christian life (de Oper. et Elem.). See ALMSGIVING.

(4) Vigils.—Watching and wakefulness as a form of self-denying service to God were no doubt suggested by our Lord's commands (Mt 24⁴², 26⁴¹, Lk 12²⁷) as well as by His own practice (Mt 14²³, 26³⁸), and in this sense were understood many of the Apostolic exhortations (1 Co 16¹³, 1 Th 5⁶, 1 Ph 6¹). Examples of vigil services are to be found in the records of the Apostolic Church (Ac 12¹³, 20⁷) and in the practice of St. Paul (2 Co 6⁵, 11²⁷). The heathen Pliny's description (Ep. x. 97) of the Christians as 'meeting before daybreak' probably points to nothing but a desire for privacy and a feeling of the necessity for avoiding public notice, but we have certainly allusions to vigils in the strict sense of the word in the writings of several of the early Fathers (Clem. Alex. Pædag. ii. 9; Tertull. ad Ux. ii. 5; Cypr. de Laps. 34 ff.; Lactant. vii. 19; August. Ep. ad Januar. 119; Socr. i. 37, v. 21; Sozom. ii. 29, iii. 6).

(5) Refusal of luxury.—Another region in which self-denial might be exercised was found in the life, clothes, household arrangements, etc. Our Lord's own example (Mt 8²⁰) was appealed to, and certain hints in His teaching were felt to have a bearing on the subject (Mt 10¹⁰, 11⁸, Lk 16¹⁹). The teaching of the Apostles was more detailed and definite (1 Ti 2⁹, 1 P 3^{3, 4}). The question of the amount of luxury permissible to Christians came up in the Montanist controversy (Euseb. v. 18. 4; Tertull. de Coron. Mil. 5, 10, 11). It occupies a considerable part of the Pædag. of Clem. of Alex. (i. 17, ii. 8-12, iii. 2, etc.), and is treated in de Virg. vel. et de Cult. fem..

2. The denial of the higher intellectual and psychical self.—When we consider the teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ, we are at once struck by His definite and marked departure from the ethics of classical antiquity. For Him there is no such word as ἀρετή (cf. ἄρης, and the Lat. virtus) with the sense of elevated manliness. Nor has He anything to correspond with the classical tetrad φρόνησις (or σοφία), ἀνδρεία, σωφροσύνη, δικαιοσύνη. These express the completest development of the higher, better self in man, and proclaim as the ideal the attainment of the truest 'manliness' in the face of an appreciative and admiring world. For our Lord the ideal is a different one. His life fulfils the conception of the prophet. He has no beauty that men should desire Him. He is despised, rejected, a Man of sorrows, acquainted with grief. He is 'meek and lowly of heart' (cf. Zec 9⁹, 2 Co 10¹, Ph 2⁷). He is 'one that serveth' (Mt 20²⁸, Jn 13¹³⁻¹⁷). It is 'the poor in spirit,' 'they that mourn,' 'the meek,' and those that 'are reviled' whom He calls blessed (cf. Mt 18^{3, 4}, 19³⁰, Mt 10^{23ff.}, Lk 14⁸). It is quite evident that the ideal here set up is wholly different from that of the classical antiquity. The two are, in fact, in fundamental opposition. The one is the ideal of the development of the other the ideal of the denial of the higher self. The Apostles understood the Master very well and taught as He did (but see the use of ἀρετή in what may be its classical sense in Ph 4⁸ and in 2 P 1⁵). Indeed, they insisted with even more than His iteration on the denial of self (1 Co 12^{28, 29}, 2 Co 1⁵, 6¹⁰, Ph 2⁸⁻⁹, 2 Co 10¹, 1 P 2²¹, Gal 5²³, 6¹, Eph 4², Col 3¹², Ja 1²¹, 3¹³, 1 P 5⁵, 2 Co 12²¹).

SELF-EXAMINATION.—Our conclusion, then, is that the state of mind which is now most naturally expressed by the unspoken questions, 'Have I been what I should be? Shall I be what I should be, in doing so and so?' is that in which all moral progress originates' (T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, p. 337).

1. Duty of self-examination.—Every man's conscience bears witness to the reasonableness and necessity of self-examination. It means taking oneself seriously, and applying to the moral and spiritual life methods analogous to those adopted in all other departments of knowledge and skill.

found not in separation and independence, but in union and communion with universal life,—life as it is in God, life as God has put it into the world (cf. Mt 5. 6. 7). To pour out oneself in love, to lose oneself for Christ's sake, to give oneself to God and to the world of men, is 'to find,' 'to save' oneself in Him. To make the law of God, the Creator of the world and the Heavenly Father of each human soul, the fundamental law of one's life, is to render all temporal and corruptible things innocuous. It then becomes possible to employ them, in a way of which the Stoic hardly dreamed, to the end of perfect self-development (Mt 6³³). 'What is a man profited,' Christ asks, 'if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' To preserve and to save his soul is thus a man's highest profit, his one great task. But to seek to save it in the worldly sense is to lose it in the spiritual and eternal. Natural selfishness is humanity's greatest danger—the great source of sin. It is manifest that our Lord accepts the common division of human nature into its two spheres of flesh and spirit. He has, it is true, no explicit psychology such as St. Paul elaborated; but to Him the natural and the spiritual man are as evidently in continual conflict as to St. Paul. It is the natural self that must be denied, that must be subjected, if the spiritual self is to grow. Each of these Christ calls the 'self,' the 'life'; but it is the latter only—'the soul'—that is of absolute value. The value of the former is but relative; and its good, which has a measure, must always be subordinated to that of the other, which is measureless. Even the gaining of the whole world by the natural self is worthless if it entails spiritual loss; for to lose the true self is to have but the life of time, is to miss that of eternity (cf. the parable of the Rich Fool, Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹, and the profound statement of the same truth in Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness, Mt 4¹⁻¹¹, Lk 4²⁻¹³). Moral self-love, therefore, consists primarily in love to God; and whenever the good of the natural self conflicts with the dictates of that love, it must be denied as a temptation of Satan (Mt 16²¹⁻²³). To sink the self in the sensuous and finite, to cultivate the lower nature, to lay up abundant goods, and to imagine that the joy of one's soul is to be found therein, is to lose one's soul; and when death comes, the loss of all is immediately manifest (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹). It is in the light of eternity that man must view the world. It is the aim of the true self to lay up treasure in heaven, that the heart may dwell continually in the atmosphere of the eternal life.

That the denial of selfish desires is not to be regarded as an end in itself, is made clear by a whole series of parables uttered by our Lord upon the subject of labour. An idle faith, an idle self-sacrifice, did not satisfy Christ. To serve God is the soul's great aim, and at the same time its salvation (cf. parables of the Talents, Mt 25¹⁴⁻³⁰; the Pounds, Lk 19¹¹⁻²⁷; the Servants Watching, Lk 12³⁵⁻⁴⁸; the Ten Virgins, Mt 25¹⁻¹³; the Labourers in the Vineyard, Mt 20¹⁻¹⁵). From all these it is clear that the reward is in no sense proportionate to the work done, but to the zeal and fidelity shown; and, further, that the reward is the labour itself, and grows out of it. It is true that life eternal is the grand reward, but in that life he is already a sharer who makes God's service his aim in this world. The complete perfection of the self comes only when sin has passed away with mortal life; but there will be no gap between this world and the next. To serve God hereafter will be the heavenly joy of the redeemed, just as it is their chief joy on earth. Heaven is not idleness, but holy service rendered in perfect freedom from the constraints of sin. It is thus manifest that there is not the slightest ground for bringing against Christianity the charge of inculcating a higher form of selfishness; for selfishness implies an opposition between the self and the not-self—that the well-being of the former is sought at the cost of the latter, whereas in the religion of Jesus there is no such opposition. The good of the self is itself the good of the world, the fulfilment of the will of God; and even the reward is nothing other than the enlargement of the human powers so that the man becomes capable of yet greater labour for the world's welfare. Selfishness is hurtful alike to self and to mankind. Spiritual self-love is the self's completion, God's glory and the world's joy. By faithfulness in the unrighteous mammon, in that which is another's, we receive that which is our own (Lk 16¹⁰⁻¹²).

SELF-RENUNCIATION.—See RENUNCIATION and SELF-DENIAL.

SELF-RESTRAINT.—See SELF-CONTROL.

SELF-SUPPRESSION.—Religion may be thought of as having for its aim either the complete suppression or the development to its highest expression of the individuality of man. In the history of Christianity both these conceptions have been adopted, and each has been regarded as the true expression of the spirit of the Lord.

Those Christian teachers whose bent is towards Mysticism have for their ideal the ultimate suppression of self. The elevated expression which their doctrine found in the German mystics of the 14th cent. gives us the clearest view of this tendency. Eckart, and afterwards Tauler, taught that the spiritual life was at its highest when self was annihilated. The complete suppression of self was attempted in a wholly different spirit by certain societies of late origin, notably by the Society of Jesus. In the Jesuit system the individual is completely subordinated to the community, and the suppression of each man's self is of vital necessity for the accomplishment of perfect discipline. The tendency of Protestantism, on the other hand, has been towards the development of individuality. Its teachers have aimed at allowing free play to natural diversities of character, and have even justified the accentuation of the various ways in which men differently constituted have apprehended the gospel message.

Our Lord, in His dealings with men, seems always to have assumed that natural varieties of character and the varied environment of each individual required differences of treatment. His advice changes according to the temperament and circumstances of those to whom it was given. A leper, after his healing, is bidden to 'tell no man' what was done for him (Mt 8⁴). Other lepers are told to go and show themselves to the priests and make the offerings commanded in the Law (Lk 17¹⁴). One who wished to follow Him but desired first to bury his father, receives the stern word—'Let the dead bury their dead' (Mt 8²²). A restored demoniac, anxious 'to be with him,' is told to go home to his friends (Mk 5¹⁹). One rich man is commanded to sell all that he has (Mt 19²¹). Others are allowed to continue in possession of the whole or part of their property (Lk 19⁸, Mt 27⁶⁷). To a certain hard saying the Lord appends the caution, 'He that is able to receive it, let him receive it' (Mt 19¹²). These and other sayings which might be quoted display our Lord's evident desire to develop rather than annihilate individuality. In the training of the Twelve, who were to carry on His work after the Ascension, He aims not at creating a spirit of unquestioning obedience to plain commands, but rather at developing a highly intelligent and spiritually energetic kind of character. We are necessarily ignorant of much that passed between Him and them especially during those forty days when He spoke to them 'of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God' (Ac 1³), but we know enough to feel sure that He wished the Twelve to work for His cause with a certain independence and personal responsibility, rather than to suppress in them personal freedom of intellect and will. SEMEIN.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3³⁶, AV Semei).

SEPARATION.—In discourses descriptive of the present condition and future prospects of the Kingdom of God, Christ taught that the Kingdom in its ideal state of purity would not be realized till the end of the world, when the object in view is to be attained by means of a judicial separation between real members and those who are members only in outward appearance or profession (Mt 13⁴¹⁻⁵⁰, 36-43, 47-50). In opposition to prevailing ideas on the subject, Christ plainly indicated that the Kingdom of God, throughout the course of its earthly development, must contain conflicting elements of good and evil, and gravely deprecated any premature attempt at separating them. The intermixture foreshadowed was not a pure kingdom existing amid a corrupt environment, but a kingdom itself invaded and pervaded to some extent by a corrupt element.

Wendt maintains that Christ did not foretell persecution and separation of His disciples from the world, but only the separation of the Kingdom of God from the world, and that the parables of the Tares and the Wheat are not to be referred to in the parables is not that which has always existed in the world, and must be expected to continue, but that which has entered the Kingdom in the course of, and as the result of, its own operations, which tend to gather within its pale spurious adherents as well as genuine (Mt 13⁴⁷). A separation, moreover, from the Jewish Church, as Christ must have foreseen, was imminent and inevitable, if for no other reason, because the spirit and aims of the society founded by Him were so widely different (Mt 9¹⁴), and it is clearly implied in the announcement of the approaching downfall of the Jewish State (Lk 19^{43f}).

Serious objection must also be taken to the view, which has often been advocated, in the interests of a pure Church, since the Donatist controversy in the beginning of the 4th cent., that the evil element is in the world, the good element in the Kingdom, and the blending of the two merely contiguity or co-existence in space. It is hard to see why our Lord should have been at such pains to point out what must be perfectly obvious to everybody, that the world is evil, and why He should recommend a tolerant attitude toward the evil, instead of making it a reason for earnest evangelistic effort. Such a condition of things had long existed, and was only what might be expected. It could be no possibility, for the world is a painful reflexion and inquiry described in the Bible (Mt 13⁴¹), which are in reality due to the circumstance that the Kingdom of God exists in the world. It is always forcing its way anew into the circle in which the Kingdom of God is being realized. The surprise and disappointment expressed by the servants are occasioned by the emergence of a phenomenon wholly unexpected, when the field originally sown with good seed is found afterwards to contain tares—an alien and unwelcome addition; and then in patient zeal to begin at once the work of purification is, in the circumstances, extremely natural. It is almost needless to remark that in the Son of Man at the end of the world is to 'gather out of his kingdom all things that offend' (Mt 13⁴¹), and then which do iniquity, they must have existed previously within it (Mt 13⁴¹).

The contrast is obviously between the mixed state of affairs now prevailing, and the Kingdom as it shall be, when, freed from all admixture, it shines forth in its pure native lustre (Mt 13⁴³). Meanwhile the disciples are directed to exercise a wise patience, and to refrain from drastic measures of reform which serious to the cause they have of tolerance is by no means to be taken, however, as implying sanction or approval of existing abuses. Christ freely admitted that the presence and conduct of unworthy members were inconsistent with the Divine ideal of the Kingdom, and could not but prove injurious to its best interests (Mt 13^{38, 39}). But the possibility of admixture was unavoidable, in view of the fact that the Divine Kingdom welcomed all without distinction, on their professed compliance with the conditions of admission to its membership. The wide and sweeping character of its operations exposed it to the intrusion into its bosom some who might do it serious harm, the eyes of those who had its purity and welfare at heart, as well as of the world at large (Mt 13⁴⁷).

It would be a mistake to suppose that Christ meant to withhold from His disciples authority to exercise discipline in the case of grave offences against the laws of the Kingdom, the discipline which they did, in point of fact, exercise (Mt 18¹⁵⁻²⁰, 23, 1 Co 5³⁻⁵), but which had for its object not the destruction, of believers (2 Co 10⁸). The infliction of censure or punishment in the case of gross offenders was intended to have a healing effect, and instead of aiming at permanent exclusion from religious fellowship and privileges, had ultimate restoration to these in view. What our Lord deprecates is not exclusion from the Kingdom, but exclusion from the final judgment by the absolute separation from religious fellowship, a separation issuing only in destruction (Mt 13⁴¹). Having regard to the imperfections that cleave to human nature while still in a state of probation, it is evidently His intention that lenity rather than severity should characterize the treatment of offenders, lest good and evil be rashly included in one common condemnation, and the remedy prove so violent as to be worse than the disease (Mt 18²⁹). Besides, the exercise of a decisive judgment would in many cases require a delicacy of discrimination and an insight into human character possessed only by a Divine person, and it is accordingly reserved for the Son of Man, in His capacity as Judge, at the end of the world. Even strong presumptive proof of moral unworthiness would not, in the case of mere human judgment, afford sufficient guarantee against the risk of mis-judgment (Mt 13⁴¹). See CHURCH, EXCOMMUNICATION.

While the disciples are enjoined to preserve an attitude of patient endurance toward evil within the Kingdom, Christ held out to them the prospect of a day of final sifting in which it would be completely eliminated (Mt 13^{40, 48}). The period of intermingling is at last to come to an end. The great separation to be then effected between the two elements so long opposed, has primarily in view the interest of an ideal purity, for which all earnest ones have anxiously hoped and striven. The burning of the tares does not refer so much to the fate which ultimately overtakes evildoers, as to the fact that they can no longer exert a depressing effect on the fortunes of the Kingdom. Hitherto they have existed as an obscuring medium, but with the removal of the scandals and their authors (v. 41) the character of the righteous at last appears, without shadow of alloy, in all its unsullied purity and splendour (v. 43). The sifting out of unworthy members results in irreparable loss, at the same time leading, as it does, to their permanent exclusion from heavenly privileges (2 Th 1⁹, 10). The grounds of separation are quite general, consisting in broad fundamental distinctions of moral character, not clearly apparent at the outset, but becoming increasingly manifest as time goes on (13⁴⁰), so that at last a division into two classes, the righteous and the wicked, becomes inevitable (vv. 41, 43, 49). Elsewhere the twofold classification is made to turn on characteristics of a more specific kind, such as confession or denial of Christ in times of peril (10^{32f}), faithful or unfaithful exercise of stewardship (24^{45, 48}), diligence and fidelity in the use of entrusted gifts, or failure to do so (Mt 25¹⁴⁻³⁰) due to unbelief and indolence (Mt 23¹³). Profession without practice (7²¹⁻²³), selfish ambition (18¹⁻⁸), an unforgiving disposition (v. 34f.), mark men out for exclusion from the perfected Kingdom; while childlike humility (v. 3), lowly acts of service (Lk 22²⁴⁻³⁰), preparedness for all kinds of sacrifice up to that of life itself (Mt 16^{25, 27}, 19²⁷⁻²⁹), are sure passports to participation in its benefits. SEPTUAGINT.—The Version 'according to the Seventy.' 1. This name for the Greek translation of the OT has its origin in the legend that Ptolemy II. Philadelphus was advised by his librarian Demetrius Phalereus to procure from Jerusalem copies of the Hebrew Scriptures, and men learned in the Hebrew and Greek languages to translate them. Ptolemy accordingly sent ambassadors to Eleazar the high priest, who sent back to Alexandria seventy-two elders, six from each tribe, with magnificent copies of the Hebrew Scriptures. They were treated with the highest honour; they were assigned a quiet and convenient building on the island of Pharos, removed from the distraction of the city; and there, in seventy-two days, they translated the Hebrew Bible into Greek, for the enrichment of Ptolemy's library; and the translation was received with delight by king and people.

This legend is related in a pseudonymous letter written by Aristean (an Alexandrian, and an ambassador to Jerusalem) to his brother Philocrates. The text, edited by St. J. Thackeray, is printed at the end of Swete's Introduction to the OT in Greek, and a translation by Mr. Thackeray appeared in the JQR, April 1903. Other forms of the tradition are given by the Alexandrian writers Aristobulus and Philo, and by Josephus. And the early Fathers of the Christian Church from the 2nd century onwards received the story without suspicion, and amplified it. What amount of truth underlies the legend it is difficult to decide; but the following facts are probable: (1) that the translation was begun at Alexandria; (2) that it was not undertaken officially, by order of the king (though he probably encouraged it), but resulted from the needs of the Alexandrian Jews, who knew no Hebrew and probably little or no Aramaic; (3) it may be true that Hebrew rolls were brought from Jerusalem; (4) the translation was, as might be expected, cordially received by Hellenistic Jews, who would be glad to have a Greek account of the origins of the Hebrew people.

The Alexandrian version embraced only the Pentateuch; and the letter of Aristean professes no more. Josephus and Jerome recognized this, but Christian writers, generally, failed to notice the limitation. It could not, indeed, have embraced more in the reign of Ptolemy II., for the Torah alone was complete by that time, secure in its position as a collection of sacred books and its official translation (Ryle, Canon of the OT, p. 10). Other books would be translated from time to time when they reached Egypt with Palestinian recognition of their canonicity. And before the Christian era Alexandria probably possessed the whole of the Hebrew Bible in a Greek translation, with the possible exception of Ecclesiastes.

2. The importance of the LXX version to the student of Hebrew literature and philology can scarcely be overestimated (see Swete, Introduction, Pt. iii. c. 4). And it is hardly less essential to the student of early Christian writings. Patristic writers for the most part accepted it not merely as the best version of the Hebrew OT, but as no less inspired than the original. Even Augustine could say: 'Spiritus qui in prophetis erat quando illa dixerunt, idem ipse erat in LXX viris quando illa interpretati sunt' (de Civ. Dei, xviii. 43). Being entirely dependent on it, and unable to appeal to or form comparisons with any other version, 'they adopted without suspicion and with tenacity its least defensible renderings, and pressed them into the service of controversy, dogma, and devotion.' 'It was argued that the errors of the Greek text were due to accidents of transmission, or that they were not actual errors, but Divine adaptations of the original to the use of the future Church' (Swete, Pt. iii. c. 5).

But the present article is concerned with that which is the chief importance of the LXX—its relation to (a) the beginnings and the growth of Christianity, (b) the expression of Christian doctrines and ideas.

(a) The LXX was an important factor in preparing the way for the reception of the Christian religion. In our Lord's time the Jews were scattered throughout the known world. And though they preserved their religious connexion with Jerusalem by payments of money and by frequent attendance at the three annual festivals (see art. DISPERSION), yet one and all had lost the knowledge of the classical Hebrew of the Scriptures, with the exception of the learned—the priests and Rabbis—of whom the original language of the OT was almost the exclusive property. It may be realized, therefore, what a blessing was conferred upon the Jewish race by Alexandria when she gave them their own Scriptures in the universal language of the day. They were provided with a valuable controversial weapon, whereby they could prove to their heathen neighbours the real importance and the hoary antiquity of the Hebrew nation. An army of apologists was raised up, of whom Josephus and Philo are, for us, the chief, because so much of their work is extant; but they must have been well-nigh equalled in weight and influence by such writers as the historians Alexander Cornelius ('Polyhistor'), Demetrius, Eupolemus, and Aristean, the poets Philo, Theodoros, and the philosopher Aristobulus, and Cleodemus or Malchus, small fragments of whose writings are preserved in Clem. Alex. Stromateis, i. 22, 141, 153 ff., and Euseb. Præp. Evang. viii. 10, ix. 6, 17–34, 37, 39, xiii. 12.

But though she knew it not, Alexandria provided them with something greater. Christianity, by the power of God and by the coming of Christ, sprang out of Judaism. 'Novum Testamentum in Veterelatet; Vetus in Novo patet' (A. B. 1891). Enabling Jews and Gentiles to read the Scriptures, the Greek version, in spite of all its mistakes and grotesque mistranslations, revealed the guiding providence of God in Hebrew history, and the gradual development of religious ideas of which the OT is the record; and above all it gave a last-impetus to the growth of Messianic expectations. A train was laid which only needed the Divine spark to burst into flame. Christ came 'to send fire upon the earth,' and the LXX had been instrumental in supplying fuel.

The quotations from the OT in the NT are seldom mere literary adornments, such as a modern author might introduce from Shakespeare or other classical sources; they are for the most part used as a definite foundation for Christian teaching, or at least weighty illustrations of the writers' statements and arguments. Our Lord's teaching struck His hearers with amazement, because it did not blindly follow the footsteps of the scribes. Against the Jews He used their own Scriptures with conclusive force; and with His loving and faint-hearted and ignorant disciples He adopted the same course; 'beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself' (Lk 24²⁷). And His disciples afterwards followed His example both in their speeches and in their writings (Ac 8²⁵).

(b) The LXX played a large part in the moulding of Christian terminology. It is difficult to gauge the extent to which religious conceptions were affected by the results which ensued from the wedding of the Greek language to Hebrew thought. Their offspring the LXX was the parent of a yet nobler heir. There are few more interesting lines of study than to trace the debt which Christianity owed to the LXX in the matter of words and terms, and to see how the borrowed terminology was consecrated and adapted to higher uses.

appear: the majority are verbally exact, but many contain important variants; sometimes the Apostle appears to quote from memory; in some cases he freely conflates two or more passages. In Hebrews, in which the argument is carried on largely by a catena of quotations from the LXX, the text of the quotations agrees in the main with some form of the present text of the LXX (Westcott, Hebrews, p. 476). On 1 P 2⁶ see Hort, St. Peter, in loc.

In this short summary of Prof. Swete's results enough has been said to show the large extent to which the Alexandrian Greek version influenced the direct quotations made by the NT writers. But direct citation formed only a fraction of the immense use which they made of the LXX. Their writings, and the utterances of our Lord, abound in expressions and phrases from the LXX which are not formal quotations, but which were due to their intimate knowledge of the OT. These are conveniently marked by uncial type in WH's text of the NT. In many cases the force and meaning of the NT passage are multiplied when the OT context is taken into consideration. [N.B.—There are no quotations from the Apocryphal books which were included in the Greek Bible. There are, however, in the Epistles some half-dozen reminiscences; see Wis 7²⁶ 9¹⁵ 13¹ 15⁷, Sir 5¹¹ 7³⁴ 15¹¹].

B. Borrowed terminology.—It must not be forgotten that the LXX was but a very small part of a large Greek literature whose ideas and vocabulary and grammar differed materially from those of the old classical writers. New politico-social and theological conceptions, changes political and social, developments in the arts of life, increased opportunities of intercourse with foreign nations, all combined to alter the language. The κοινή or 'Ελληνική διάλεκτος' was based on Attic Greek, but embraced elements drawn from all Hellenic dialects. It was the literary language of the cosmopolitan Hellas created by the genius of Alexander (Swete, Intr. p. 294). 'The language used by the writers of the Greek Diaspora may be regarded as a subsection of an early stage of the κοινή' (ib.), and of this subsection the LXX and the NT are the best representatives in Egypt and Palestine respectively. Though a change began to appear as early as Xenophon, the era of the κοινή may be said to have opened in the latter half of the 4th cent. B.C.; and its golden age extends from c. B.C. 145 (Polybius) to c. A.D. 160 (Pausanias). The NT vocabulary, then, was derived not only from the LXX but from the current language of the day. See the Appendix in Grimm-Thayer's Gr.-Eng. Lexicon of the NT (pp. 691-696), in which are collected a large number of non-classical words which find parallels in Greek writings (including LXX) from B.C. 322 to A.D. 100.

For our present purpose, however, a supreme interest attaches to the NT words which, though found in classical Greek, have acquired a new moral or theological meaning. Many words as used in the NT are exclusively Christian, and their special significance is not derived from any literary source (e.g. ἀνακεφαλαίωμα, ἀντίτυπον, ἀντίχριστος, δόναμις (miracle), πρωτότοκος, σταυρός — δώ, χάρις). But many others have gained, or at least advanced towards, their new meaning by contact with Hebrew thought. The following are among the more important, and will repay careful investigation with the help of Thayer's Lexicon and the NT commentaries. The short notes here attached to each word are not intended to be in any way exhaustive of their meanings or applications, but may be helpful in suggesting lines for study. Words which do not occur in classical Greek are marked with *.

ἄγγελος. Classical meaning 'messenger.' Early

Heb. thought conceived of the 'Angel of Jahweh' as a visible or active manifestation of Himself, Gn 22¹¹, Ex 3², Mt 1²⁰, Lk 2⁹. But the more developed angelology of later times is reflected in the NT, e.g. the names of two great angels appear—Michael (Dn 10^{13.21} 12¹, Jude⁹, Rev 12⁷) and Gabriel (Dn 8¹⁶ 9²¹, Lk 1^{19.26}). See also Mt 18¹⁰.

ἅγιος. Class. 'sacred (to a god)'; 'holy.' Note two special uses: (a) οἱ ἅγιοι, the ideal body of consecrated people, Dn 7^{18.22}, 1 Es 8⁸⁷ (88); τὰ ἅγια Paul's writings of Christians. Not in . . . see Jn 17¹⁴⁻¹⁹. (b) τὰ ἅγια, the holiest Tent; in NT typical of Heaven where Christ our High Priest intercedes for us, He 9. 10.

ἀδελφός. Class. 'brother'; 'near kinsman.' LXX and NT a member of the same privileged race, Dt 18¹⁵, Ro 9³. Hence in NT a fellow-Christian, Mt 23⁸ and freq. in Acts and Epistles.

αἷμα. Class. 'blood'; 'bloodshed'; always emphasizes the fact of death. In the Jewish sacrificial system the blood is the life, Gn 9⁴, Lv 17^{11.14}, Dt 12²³. On the Christian use of this thought see Westcott, Add. note on 1 Jn 1⁷ and on He 9¹².

αἰών. Class. 'human life-time'; 'eternity.' (a) In LXX freq. in plur., denoting the sum-total of the fixed periods (each being an αἰών) into which eternity is divisible, Ps 77 (76)⁸, Lk 1³³. (b) The NT adopts the Rabbinic conception of two 'ages,' ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος (ἡν ἡμεῖς) and ὁ αἰὼν ὁ ἐρχόμενος or ὁ μέλλων (ἡν ἡμεῖς) the age before, and after, the advent of the Messiah, Mt 22³², Mk 10³⁰.

ἀνάστασις. Class. 'a rising up' (e.g. from a seat); 'a making to rise'; 'a removal.' LXX 'resurrection,' 2 Mac 7¹⁴ 12⁴³; cf. Dn 12². Mt 22³² and freq. (See Æsch. Eur. 617 f.).

ἀναφέρω. Class. 'bring up'; 'undertake'; 'refer'; 'restore.' LXX freq. 'offer up' (as a sacrifice) = ἡγεῖν. He 7²⁷ bis, 1 P 2⁵⁻²⁴ al.

ἀποκαλύπτειν (*ἀποκάλυψις). Class. 'reveal.' In LXX and NT freq. Divine revelation of things which man of himself could not know.

ἀπολυτρόω (*-τρωσις). Class. 'release on payment of ransom.' In the OT the word is applied (with little or no idea of ransom) to the action of God for His people, in delivering them (λαὸς ἡμῶν) from trouble or death. This, with the thought of ransom partially restored, appeared in the NT as the Christian 'redemption' from sin. See Westcott, Hebrews, pp. 295 ff.

ἄφεσις. Class. 'a setting free' (of a captive); 'discharge' (from the obligations of a bond). In LXX mostly the periodical 'release' of Hebrew slaves. But the Messianic interpretation of such passages as Is 61¹ (cf. Lk 4¹⁸) was a step towards the NT meaning of 'release from the chain and the guilt of sin.' In Is 22¹⁴ ἀφεθήσεται is used in connexion with ἀμαρτία. See Mt 26²⁸, Mk 1⁴ 3²⁹, Lk 1⁷⁷ 3⁸ 24⁴⁷.

βαπτίζομαι. Class. metaph. 'to be soaked' (with wine); 'to be drowned' (with enemies). LXX 2 (4) K 5¹⁴ uses the word in connexion with miraculous cleansing; Sir 34 (31)³⁰ with cleansing from ceremonial pollution. Both are perverted by Christian baptism.

βεβαιόω. Class. 'confirm' (a statement); 'secure' (a person in one's own interests). In LXX Ps 41 (40) 119 (118)²⁸ the word is used of God establishing or strengthening man. Hence in NT of Jesus Christ strengthening the soul and character, 1 Co 1⁸.

δαίμόνιον. Class. 'deity'; 'divinity'; also an inferior divine being, 'between divine and mortal' (Plat. Symp.). It needed the OT monotheism to condemn the thought of divine beings other than Jehovah, Dt 32¹⁷ Ps 96 (95)⁵. Hence in NT 'evil spirit.' [δαίμων (Mt 8³¹), which is very similar, is not found in the LXX? Is 65¹¹].

διάβολος. Class. of one who accuses maliciously or slanderously. LXX (= $\pi\alpha$ or $\pi\alpha\psi$) 'an adversary,' used of a superhuman agent of evil, Job 1^{6,7} etc., Zec 3¹⁻², 1 Ch 21¹. Hence in NT 'the devil,' used by every NT writer except St. Mark.

δικαίος, δικαιοσύνη. Class. mainly 'just,' 'justice.' Add. note on Ro 1¹⁷, 'The word δικαίος and its compounds.'

δόξα, δοξάζω. Class. 'opinion'; 'credit' or 'renewal.' LXX Ex 24¹⁷ al. (= דָּבָר , New Heb. דְּבָר) the 'glory' of God, the visible manifestation of His presence. Hence in NT (a) the manifestation of God's character, Jn 1¹⁴, (b) the spiritual participation of it by men, Jn 17²². See 2 Co 37-18.

ἔθνος (* ἐθνικός). Class. 'nation.' LXX, NT of nations other than the chosen people; 'Gentiles.'

εἰδωλόν. Class. 'phantom'; 'reflected image'; 'fancy.' LXX, NT 'image of a god'; 'idol.'

ἐκκλησία. Class. 'assembly of citizens.' LXX (= קָהָל) an assembly of Israelites, the chosen people. Hence in NT the body of Christians called out from the rest of mankind by Christ, Church.

ἐλεκτός. Class. 'selected.' LXX the 'elect' people of God, Is 65^{9,15,22} (23), 1 Ch 16¹³, Wis 3⁹ 4¹⁵. Hence in NT of Christians, Mt 24²¹ al.

ἐπισκοπεῖν, -πος (* πῆ). Class. vb. 'inspect,' 'examine,' 'visit'; subst. 'overseer,' 'guardian.' The use of the words in the LXX (esp. ἐπισκοπή) of the action of God, either for help or punishment, gave rise to the spiritual force acquired in the NT, Lk 19⁴⁴, 1 P 2^{12,23}.

εὐαγγελίζομαι (* -ζω), εὐαγγέλιον. Class. vb. 'bring good tidings'; subst. 'reward for good tidings.' In the OT such Messianic promises as Is 40⁹ al. led to the Christian use of the word. [Sing. εὐαγγέλιον not in LXX, which always has plur.].

εὐλογέω, -ία. Class. 'praise.' (a) LXX (= בָּרַךְ) 'bless'; and so in NT of the action of either God or man. (b) 'Consecrate with prayer,' 1 S 9¹³, Lk 9¹⁶, 1 Co 10¹⁶. (c) εὐλογία is a concrete blessing or benefit, Dt 11²⁸ al., Eph 1³, He 12¹⁷ al. (not in Gospels).

ζωή. Class. 'life'; 'existence.' In the LXX (= חַיִּים) it is freq. used of a happy life, blessed by God. Hence in NT of spiritual life (Jn 5²⁴) gained by union with Christ, the source and principle of life (Jn 10¹⁰ 14⁶, 1 Jn 5¹²).

ζωογονέω, ζωοποιέω. Class. 'breed animals, or germs.' LXX 'give life to,' Neh 9⁶; 'preserve alive,' Ex 17², Ps 71 (70)²⁰. Hence in NT 'endure with spiritual life,' Jn 6⁶³; 'restore to life,' Jn 5²¹.

ἡμέρα. Class. 'day.' In LXX freq. of the 'Day of Jahweh,' a future time of judgment (Am., Is., Zeph. etc.). Hence in NT of the coming of Christ to judgment, Mt 7²² al. (The thought of judgment was so closely attached to the word that St. Paul could use the expression ἀνθρωπινή ημέρα, 1 Co 4³).

θάνατος. Class. 'death' of the body. From the OT teaching that death is the punishment of sin is derived the NT use of the word for spiritual death, either as a present, unregenerate state (Jn 5²⁴, 1 Jn 3⁴), or as a future penalty (Wis 1¹² 2²⁴, Ro 1³²).

θεός. Class. 'a god.' OT monotheism led to the use of δ θεός for the One God in LXX and NT. (God's representatives are called θεοί, Ps 82 (81)⁶, quoted in Jn 10³⁴).

ἱλάσσομαι. Class. 'propitiate,' 'appease.' (a) LXX pass. 'be propitiated,' Ps 78 (77)²⁸ 79 (78)⁹. So NT Lk 18¹³. (b) LXX ἐξιλάσσομαι (not in NT) 'make propitiation for,' 'expiate.' So in NT ἱλάσσομαι, He 2¹⁷.

* ἱλασμός 'a means of propitiating,' Ezk 44²⁷, 1 Jn 2² 4¹⁰.

* ἱλαστήριον 'the place of propitiation,' 'the mercy-seat,' LXX and He 9⁶. [In Ro 3²⁵ masc. adj. of Christ].

κακία. Class. 'badness, depravity'; 'cowardice.' LXX, NT 'evil,' 'trouble,' Am 6³, Mt 6²⁴.

κατάπαυσις. Class. 'a putting to rest'; 'a causing to cease.' LXX (= קָנַח) 'rest,' 'cessation,' Ps 95 (94)¹¹. NT He 3^{11,18} 4^{1,3,5} etc.

κέρας. Class. 'horn.' LXX, NT symbol of strength, 1 S 2¹⁰, Ps 89 (88)¹⁸, Lk 1⁶⁹.

κληρονομέω, -ία, -ος. Class. 'inherit.' In OT the words are frequently used for the occupation of Canaan by the gift of God. So in NT they are used spiritually for the gaining of the privilege involved in Divine sonship in union with Christ, Mt 5⁹ 25³⁴.

κλήρος. Class. 'an object used in casting lots.' LXX 'an allotted portion,' a possession or privilege assigned by God to His people, Wis 5⁵. NT in Mt 27³⁵ ||, Ac 26¹⁸, Col 1¹².

κοινώνω, -ός. Class. 'to make common,' 'to communicate' (opp. ἰδιος). LXX 'to make unhallowed,' 'profane,' 'defile' (= βεβηλώω , -ος), 4 Mac 7⁶, 1 Mac 1^{47,62}. NT Mt 15^{11,18,20}, Mk 7^{2,5}, Ac 10^{14,28}.

κόσμος. Class. 'order'; 'ornament'; 'the Universe' (as a system of order). LXX 'the inhabitants of the world,' Wis 2²⁴ 10¹⁴ 14^{6,14}. NT in Mt 13³⁸ and frequently. Hence in NT 'the ungodly masses of men,' Jn 7⁷ and freq.; also 'things of the world,' 'desires, pleasures,' etc., Mt 16²⁶ and frequently.

κτίζω, κτίσις. Class. vb. 'to found' (city, colony, etc.); subst. 'the act of founding.' LXX vb. 'create' (= בָּרַא), Dt 4³², Ps 51 (50), 1 S 15⁷; subst. 'the sum of created things,' Jth 9¹² 16¹⁴, Wis 5¹⁷ (18) 16²⁴ al. NT vb. Mk 13¹⁹ al., subst. Mk 10⁶ al.

κύριος. Class. 'lord,' 'master,' 'owner.' LXX passim for יהוה 'Jehovah.' NT both with and without the article (a) for Jehovah, (b) for Christ.

λαός. Class. 'nation,' 'people.' In LXX specially of the chosen people. Hence in NT applied to Christians, Lk 1¹⁷, Ac 15¹⁴, He 4⁹ al.

λειτουργέω, -ία. Class. 'render a service to the state at one's own expense.' LXX (vb. לָעָבַד , subst. לֵוִי), the service of the priests in the Tent and the Temple. So NT Lk 1²³, He 8⁹ 21¹⁰ 10¹¹. [The classical idea is adopted in 2 Co 9¹², Ph 2³⁰.]

λυτρόω. Class. 'release on payment of ransom'; 'deliver by payment of ransom.' In LXX of the action of God, 'deliverance' from evils, Dt 13⁸, 2 Sam 7²³, Ps 49 (48)⁹ al. So in NT Lk 24²¹ (cf. Ac 7³⁵). λύτρον (* λύτρον). Class. 'the price paid for ransom.' In LXX λύτρον ψυχῆς (= כֶּסֶף 'atonement') Nu 35³¹, Pr 13⁸, and λύτρωσις coupled with λυτρώσεται ἐκ πασῶν τῶν ἀνομιῶν αὐτοῦ, Ps 130 (129)⁷, show that the later writers of the OT were approaching the spiritual use of the words. Hence in NT λυτρώω Tit 2¹⁴, 1 P 1¹⁸, -ρον Mt 20²⁸, Mk 10⁴⁵, -ρωσις He 9¹².

μυστήριον. Class. 'a secret,' a mystery known only to the initiated. LXX 'hidden purpose, or counsel'; of men, To 12^{7,11}, Jth 2²; of God, Wis 2²² 6²². In NT of God's plan of salvation which was not known until revealed to the Apostles, Mt 13¹¹ (= Mk 4¹¹, Lk 8¹⁰), Ro 11²⁵ al.

νόμος. Class. 'usage,' 'custom'; 'law.' LXX 'the Mosaic law.' NT (a) the volume of 'the Law,' Mt 12⁵, or its contents as binding upon Jews, Mt 5¹⁷; (b) a burdensome and ineffectual system of commands and ceremonies from which Christ has freed us, Ro 3¹ etc.

οικοδομέω (* -μῆ). Class. 'build.' LXX metaph. 'grant prosperity to,' Ps 28 (27)⁵, Jer 33 (40)⁷. In NT 'help and prosper spiritually,' 'edify' (this use of the word was rendered easier by the thought of Christians as being the 'building' and 'temple' of God, Ac 20³² al.).

ὄνομα. Class. 'name'; 'fame'; 'pretext.' LXX, all that a person's name implies, his personality and attributes, 1 K 21 (3 K 20)⁸, Ca 1³. Very freq. of the Name of God. So in NT, of men Mt 10⁴¹, Jn 5^{43b}; of God Mt 6⁹, Jn 12²⁸, and frequently.

οὐρανός. Class. 'heaven,' 'sky.' LXX, a periphrasis used by late Jews for the Divine Name (Dn 4^{38a}, 1 Mac 3¹⁸¹, and freq.). NT in Lk 15^{18, 21} (see Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr. 217-220, and 91 ff.).

παῖς. Class. 'child'; 'slave.' In LXX the word acquired a special force as representing a 'servant of Jehovah'; of men, Ps 113 (112), Wis 2¹³ al.; of the Messianic Figure in Is 41, 42 etc. So in NT of men who devoutly serve God, Lk 1^{54, 69}; of the Messiah, Mt 12¹⁸, Ac 3^{25, 26} 4^{27, 30}.

παράδεισος. Class. 'park,' 'garden.' From the story of the garden of Eden (Gn 2, 3), the word came to be used in the OT for Divinely given peace, Is 55, Ezk 28¹³. In Jewish apocryphal literature it had the meaning of an upper region in the 'third heaven'; cf. 2 Co 12^{2, 4}. Hence it was used of the abode of the pious after death, Lk 23⁴³, Rev 2⁷.

πειράζω (*-ασμός). Class. 'test,' 'try.' LXX (=πει) (a) of men trying God, Ex 17², Dt 6¹⁶, Is 7¹²; (b) of God testing men, Gn 22¹. So in NT (a) Mt 4⁷, Ac 15¹⁰; (b) 1 Co 10⁹. Hence freq. of 'temptation' by the Devil.

περί. The LXX use of περί [τῆς] ἀμαρτίας to express ἁμαρτία or ἁμαρτία 'a sin-offering,' Lv 6^{18 (25)} 14¹⁹ al., Ps 40 (39)⁷, led to the use of περί in the NT with a sacrificial force, 'to expiate or atone for (sins)' (He 10⁶), Ro 8³, He 5³ 10^{18, 26} al.

περιτέμνειν (*-τομή). Class. 'cut round'; 'curtail'; 'intercept.' LXX freq. 'circumcise,' NT (a) 'circumcise' (physically); (b) 'separate from lust and spiritual impurity,' Col 2¹¹, Ro 2²⁹ (cf. Ex 6^{12, 30}, Lv 26⁴¹, Ezk 44⁷, Ac 7⁵¹).

πιστεύειν, πίστις. The broad distinction between the classical and the Biblical use is that in the former 'belief' is intellectual, in the latter it is spiritual. (See Hatch, Hibbert Lectures 1888, Lect. xi., and Essays in Biblical Greek, pp. 83-87; Seeley-Wadsworth on Ro 1⁷, 'The meaning of faith'.)

πνεῦμα. Class. 'wind,' 'air'; 'spirit,' the life principle of all created things; also 'affluence'; later 'the all-pervading spirit' of the Stoics. In the OT a moral force is added to the word, a power derived from God, Ps 51 (50)^{12, 13}, Job 32⁸, Is 48¹⁶ 61¹. Hence in NT (a) the 'spirit' of man, the highest part of his trichotomy; (b) the Holy Spirit.

πορνεύω, -νεία, -νή. Class. 'commit fornication.' LXX metaph. of the worshipping of idols by Israel, God's bride, Hos 1² 9¹, Ps 73 (72)¹, Jer 3⁶ al. Hence freq. in Apoc., and at least with the underlying thought in Jn 8⁴¹.

προφήτης, -τεῦα (*-τεία). Class. 'interpret an oracle,' 'foretell.' In LXX and NT the words gain a higher meaning than that of interpreting the frenzied utterances of a μάντις. A 'prophet' is one inspired with a Divine intuition to declare God's will both in historical events and in things spiritual.

σκότος (*σκορία). Class. 'darkness,' 'obscurity.' LXX attaches to it a moral significance, Job 30²⁶, σώζω, σωτήρ, -τηρία, -τήριον. Class. 'save' (from injury, death, etc.). LXX to deliver from the penalties of the Messianic judgment. Jl 2³² (3⁵), Is 45¹⁷ 49⁸ al. Hence in NT 'save from sin,' Mt 1²¹, Lk 2¹¹ 16⁹ 23⁰ and frequently.

Ps 112 (111)⁴, Is 5²⁰ 9². So in NT, Mt 6²³, Lk 17⁹ 11³⁵, Jn 1⁵ 3¹⁹ 12³⁵ al.

φῶς, φωτίζω (*-τισμός). Class. subst. 'light'; vb. 'shine,' 'give light.' In LXX the subst. acquires a moral force (opp. σκότος), Ps 27 (26)¹ 119 (118)¹⁰⁵, Is 5²⁰ and freq.; and the vb. is used transitively 'to teach,' Ps 119 (118)¹³⁰, Sir 45¹⁷. Hence both in NT freq. of spiritual enlightenment and freedom.

χάρις. Class. 'kind feeling'; 'a kindness done'; 'gratitude' and 'thanks'; 'enjoyment.' In LXX (=ἵπ) freq. in the expression 'find favour before God.' In NT this kind of favour before God becomes a two-fold theological conception: (a) the undeserved kindness by which man is saved from sin, (b) the state of heart kept alive by the Holy Spirit in one who has received God's grace.

χριστός. Class. 'to be rubbed on,' 'used as ointment.' LXX 'a person who is anointed'—king, priest, or prophet—for ὁπ. Hence the Messianic conception which gave rise to the NT title ὁ χριστός.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT.—Professor Votaw's learned and exhaustive article in the Extra Vol. of DB is a mine of information and to which the reader is referred for a full treatment of questions concerning the Sermon on the Mount that must here be treated more briefly.

1. Sources.—The contents of Mt 5, 6, 7 are commonly regarded as a single discourse, with the title 'The Sermon on the Mount' on account of the introductory statement in 5¹. Some portions of the contents of these chapters reappear, with more or less difference of form, introduced in a somewhat similar way, in Lk 6. Other sayings of Jesus contained in the three chapters of Mt. are found scattered over the narrative in Lk., and a few are in Mk.; two are duplicated in Mt., and one is duplicated in Lk. The following is the Synoptic distribution of the Sermon:

Matthew.	Mark.	Luke.
51		617, 20a
53, 4, 6		620b, 21
511, 12		622, 23
518	950	1434, 35
515	421	(1) 816, (2) 1133
518		1617
525, 26		1258, 59
(1) 529, 30, (2) 187, 8	947, 48, 43, 45	1618

713, 14		644-49
716-27

A comparison of these columns will bring out certain clear results, viz.:

(1) Mk. is not the source of any of these sayings. Only four verses or paragraphs of them are in that Gospel at all. Of these four, three are also in Lk.

A comparison between the several forms of the three shows (a) that Lk. and Mt. are nearer to one another than either of them is to Mk., and (b) that in the two cases of duplicates in Mt., Mk. is nearer to Mt.'s second renderings of the sayings than to his earlier renderings, which are those of the Sermon on the Mount, showing that if Mt. is dependent on Mk. in either case, it is in the later passages where the sayings are given in another connexion, not in the Sermon. We may account for the duplicates in this way. The first appearance of them is due to the non-Markan source; the second is perhaps derived from Mk.

(2) It is now generally conceded that the main sources of the common elements in the Synoptic Gospels are Mk., and the collection of Logia which Papias says Matthew compiled and wrote in Hebrew, or Aramaic. Further, it is agreed that the Logia must have been translated into Greek, and that it was in a Gr. form that our Evangelists used it. More differences between Mt. and Lk. in the rendering of the same sayings, as well as other phenomena connected with them, have led scholars to the conclusion that (a) there were two or more versions of Matthew's Logia, or (b) that there were other collections of sayings of Jesus besides that made by Matthew (Wendt, Jülicher, Wernle, J. Weiss, Feine, Hawkins, Votaw, Baer, etc.).¹ Nevertheless, even after admitting this, we may still recognize the probability that the Sermon, as we have it in our First Gospel, is derived from Matthew's Logia; for (a) that Gospel—apart from its opening and closing sections—consists virtually of Mk., split at 5 places, or as some reckon at 7 places, with blocks of Logia wedged in at these openings, the Sermon being the first such insertion; and (b) since our chief collection of the sayings of Jesus is that contained in Mt., since Papias ascribed to the Apostle Matthew the only collection of Logia he is reported to have mentioned, and since the Gospel containing it bears the name of that Apostle in all Patristic references to its origin, there is a strong presumption that the Logia it contains are from Matthew's collection, although this does not forbid us to conclude that the collection may have been used by the Evangelist in a revised form. Nor, of course, does it exclude the suggestions of independent sources, etc., which can only be considered in detail as they arise in the course of the study of the text. The general conclusion is that as a whole our Sermon on the Mount is derived from Matthew's Logia in a Greek version.

2. Integrity.—The question of the integrity of the Sermon must be considered quite apart from that of its genuineness. We may be convinced that the three chapters of Mt. contain only true Logia of Jesus, and yet see reason to think that these Logia were not all spoken on one and the same occasion, in fact, that they do not actually constitute a sermon. (a) The first difficulty arises from the wealth and multiplicity of the utterances. We have here a concise concentration of many most pregnant sayings of Jesus. It is not to be supposed that a popular audience could take in so much at one hearing. But Jesus was welcomed everywhere by simple peasants and the people generally much more than by trained thinkers and the educated classes. Since 'the common people heard him gladly,' His style must have been adjusted to slow-moving minds; but no popular preacher would pack so much into one sermon as we have in Mt.'s three chapters.

(b) The variety of topics treated in the three chapters is inconsistent with the unity of a single discourse. Thus the encouragements to prayer and the warnings against anxiety are alien to the main topic in which the principles of the new order are contrasted with the old laws and customs.

(c) A more important consideration arises from a comparison of the portions of these chapters which reappear in Lk. with the circumstances in connexion with which they are there introduced. A priori it is improbable that any Evangelist would break up a discourse of Christ and scatter its sentences among his narratives, fitting them into the incidents gratuitously. But a study of the circumstances under which these sentences are met with in Lk. inclines us to think that they are in their right place. It will be observed that the Gospel's most full and consecutive rendering of sayings found in St. Matthew 5-7 is in St. Luke 6. Provisionally we may regard this chapter as giving St. Luke's version of the Sermon on the Mount. Let us turn to those sayings of the Mt. chapters that are in other parts of Lk. First we have Mt 5¹⁸ reappearing in Lk 14^{34, 35}. This is a warning against becoming as salt that has lost its savour. In Mt. it has no evident connexion with the Beatitudes that it follows; in Lk., however, it occurs in connexion with warnings of the danger of abandoning the following of Christ after having commenced, and serves to clinch those warnings with a final illustration. Moreover, this saying is also in Mk. (9⁹⁰), where it seems to have been introduced by association with another reference to salt in the previous verse. Therefore it would seem to have been a floating logion, which naturally found its way into Mt.'s collection. In Mt. the saying about salt losing its savour is followed by that of the lamp under the bushel—a logion which appears in Mk. (4²¹) and twice in Lk. (8¹⁶ 11³³). None of these passages evinces much connexion with its context. It is to be observed that the second appearance in Lk. is nearer to Mt. than the first, since it has 'the bushel' as the illustration, while Mk. has, while the first in Lk. has 'a vessel.' Here again we have another floating logion. The solemn assurance that the Law cannot fail is not more intelligible in Lk. (16^{17, 18}) than in Mt 5¹⁸; this, therefore, is rather exceptional.—The next of the Third Evangelist's departures from the order of the Sermon on the Mount in Mt. is Lk 12^{58, 59} which corresponds to Mt 5^{25, 26}. This is the advice to agree quickly with an adversary lest it be too late, and a serious judicial sentence have to be submitted to. In Mt. this follows advice to be reconciled with a brother on account of the higher principles of Christ's teaching, which forbid the quarrelsome temper. In Lk. it follows the warnings of the approach of a day of reckoning. In neither place is it inappropriate. Perhaps it was spoken on two occasions. We must always allow for that possibility.—The next three cases are more convincing. Mt. has the Lord's Prayer following warnings against hypocrisy in prayer, which are associated with other cases of hypocrisy (Mt 6¹⁻¹⁸). The subject of this whole paragraph is unostentatious sincerity, as opposed to pretentious hypocrisy. In Lk. (11¹⁻⁴) the Lord's Prayer is introduced after Christ's disciples have asked Him to teach them to pray, as John had taught his disciples to pray. Thus it comes appropriately as a model prayer, while in Mt. no form of prayer is immediately required when the subject is privacy in prayer as against public display. Next, the warning against worldly anxiety (Mt 6¹⁹⁻³⁴) has no direct connexion with the rest of the Sermon on the Mount. In Lk 12²²⁻³⁴ it follows the warning against covetousness and the parable of the Rich Fool, which were occasioned by one of the multitude appealing to Jesus to decide a question of inheritance between himself and his brother.—Lastly, the saying about the narrow gate (Mt 7^{13, 14}) appears in Lk. in reply to the question whether they are few that be saved (Lk 13²²⁻²⁴).

For such reasons it is now generally admitted that the three chapters in Mt. contain sayings of Jesus which were not parts of the original Sermon. This fact, however, does not justify the assertion that Matthew's Sermon on the Mount 'is a composition rather than an actual address' (Moffatt, EBi, vol. iv. col. 4377). While Bacon rules out the matter which is not in Lk 6, and is scattered over other parts of Lk., he allows that the Sermon, apart from such interpolations of alien sayings of Jesus, is a connected discourse (The Sermon on the Mount: Its Literary Structure, etc.). Votaw, while admitting some interpolations, vindicates the greater part of Mt.'s rendering of it (loc. cit. pp. 7-9). The fact that we have a block of Logia here inserted in the narrative of Mt. is no proof that much, if not all of it, may be the original single discourse. Moreover, the Logia in the introduction (4²³⁻⁵¹) indicates an address given on a specific occasion. It is the same with the parallel in Lk 6¹⁷⁻²⁰. Then there is a clearly marked unity in those parts of the Sermon in Mt. that remain after the apparently alien matter has been removed, and this is the case with the whole of Lk.'s shorter version. Nor need we cut down the Sermon to the limits of what is contained in Lk., for there was an evident reason for the Third Evangelist's omission of the references to the Pharisees and to Jewish customs which Mt. has preserved, since the former was writing for Gentiles who would not be interested in these matters; while, on the other hand, they are evidently integral to the discourse as this is given in Mt., because they help to bring out the ethical principles of the new order that Christ was introducing by contrast with the old order that He was superseding.

3. Original form.—A comparison of Mt 5-7 with the parallel passages in Lk. (with the discourse in Lk 6) raises the question as to which of these two versions of our Lord's utterances is the more original. For, while it has been maintained (by Auger, Greswell, Osiander, Patricius, Plumptre, Sadler, etc.) that we have here reports of sermons given on two occasions, this view is not widely accepted by scholars at the present day.* It is not to be denied that Jesus may have repeated the same discourse on more than one occasion. But, in the present case, it is to be observed: (a) Each Evangelist has only one report, neither betraying any knowledge that the Sermon was preached twice. (b) Both Evangelists describe the same circumstances in introducing the Sermon—i.e. the gathering of the multitude, the collecting of disciples, and the connexion of the scene with a mountain. For though in Mt. the Sermon is on the mountain and in Lk. on a level place after Jesus had come down, this is only one of the small discrepancies invariably met with in separate accounts of the same event, and, in fact, it does not involve a direct contradiction even in the details referred to. (c) The character of the Sermon and its position in the life and work of Christ give it a unique value as the presentation of fundamental principles for the guidance of Christ's disciples in their conduct among men. But if we grant that we have here two reports of one and the same discourse, the striking differences between them lead us to ask, In what form was this discourse actually given? In the first place, it cannot be that either of the two Evangelists simply used and altered materials that he had derived from the other, for on wider grounds it seems to be demonstrated that neither drew upon the other in any case; the probability is that while both knew Mk., neither the First nor the Third Evangelist knew the other (see Wernle, Die Synopt. Frage, p. 20). Nor can so violent an alteration of materials be charged against either. For a similar reason, we cannot suppose that both were both dependent on the same version or Matthew's Logia; because, if so, one or both of them must have treated its venerated contents—consisting of reports of the sayings of Jesus—in the same unscrupulous way. They must have been working on two different collections of Logia, though perhaps both originally based on Matthew's Hebrew collection; and the divergence must have taken place earlier—among irresponsible transcribers—by means of which the two reports are exceedingly different. Probably neither can be preferred in all respects to the other. In some cases Mt. appears to be the more correct, but in other cases the probability is with Luke.

In this connexion the most important question is that of the original form of the Beatitudes, in regard to which the following points claim our attention: (1) In Mt. there are 7 (or perhaps 8) Beatitudes; in Lk. there are 4 Beatitudes, followed by 4 Woes which do not appear in Mt. (2) The Beatitudes in Mt. are (all but the last) in the 3rd person: those in Lk. are in the 2nd person. (3) The Mt. Beatitudes describe character and its corresponding rewards; those in Lk. describe only social conditions and the future reversal of them. Now, in favour of the originality of Mt., it may be urged that the greater spiritual value of its version of the Beatitudes points to their originality, for we cannot believe that it was given to copyists and catechists to greatly enrich their Master's teachings. On the other hand, the following points should be noted: (a) It is not denied that the four Beatitudes not found in Lk. are genuine and characteristic sayings of Jesus. Assuredly the blessing on the pure in heart, which is among them, fell from His lips. But we may admit the genuineness of the sayings and yet deny them a place in the original Sermon on the Mount; for it has been shown above that Mt.'s three chapters contain insertions of sayings of Jesus spoken on various occasions. (b) The First Evangelist—or St. Matthew himself, the author of the Logia—elsewhere makes collections of sevens. Thus he gives 7 clauses in the Lord's Prayer (6⁹⁻¹³), 7 parables (ch. 13), 7 woes (ch. 23). The genealogy consists of a triad of fourteens (11¹⁻¹⁶). [See Hawkins, Hor. Synopt. pp. 133, 134]. We know that Jesus uttered beatitudes on other occasions (e.g. 11⁶ 13¹⁶ 16¹⁷ 24⁴⁶). (c) It is difficult to think that if our Lord gave the saying originally with their ethical and spiritual characterisation, this could have dropped out accidentally, or have been deliberately eliminated so as to confine them to social relations. To attribute the alteration to St. Luke's 'Ebionism' is to accuse the Third Evangelist of an offence in flat contradiction to his honest, declared purpose (καὶ μὴ παρηκολούθηκόντι ἀνοθεῖν πᾶσιν ἀκριβῶς, Lk 13). (d) If, however, Jesus gave the Beatitudes as in Lk., His disciples may have discerned in them a deeper meaning, knowing that He was accustomed to speak in parables; or He Himself may have explained them, for we must remember that in the Gospels we have excerpts from the teachings of Jesus, pregnant sayings, parables, and aphorisms that stuck in the memory, while the fuller exposition which must often have followed is rarely given, perhaps never completely. (e) It is more likely that Jesus, when addressing His own disciples, would have used the 2nd person than that a later hand would have turned the 3rd person style of speech into the 2nd. The direct address is the more original in form; it would be natural for catechists to address the people, rather than the reverse. We cannot say that it was according to St. Luke's style for the 2nd person to be substituted for the 3rd, for the reverse is the case; almost every other ascription of blessedness in Lk. is in the 3rd person (i.e. 1⁴⁵ 7²³ 10²³ 11²⁷ 28 12³⁷ 38. 43 14¹⁵ 23²⁹). * while in Mt. we have benedictions in the 2nd person (i.e. 13¹⁶ 16¹⁷, although 11⁶ 24⁴⁶ are in the 3rd person). Mt. even concludes the Sermon on the Mount Beatitudes with one thrown into the 2nd person style (5¹¹). (f) It must be admitted that the Woes upon the rich seem out of place in an address to Christ's disciples. These, like the Beatitudes in Lk., are in the 2nd person; they must be taken as apostrophizing the absent. Still, it was our Lord's method on other occasions to speak antithetically (e.g. Mt 6¹⁹ 20 7¹³ 14. 24-27 8¹¹ 12). On the whole, these considerations point to Lk.'s as the original version of the Beatitudes.

In the teaching on divorce, Lk.'s absolute statement (16¹⁸) must be preferred to Mt.'s more qualified form of the saying (5³²), containing the clause παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας, although that recurs in Mt 19⁹ (so Holtzmann, Hand-Com.; but Swete, St. Mark, accepts the clause as original), because (a) it is not found in the more primitive version of the saying in Mk 10¹¹ 12, and (b) the softening of an apparently harsh saying by a gloss was in accordance with the tendency of scribes.

The case of the Lord's Prayer is more difficult. We saw above that the way in which it is introduced in Lk. points to the conclusion that the original setting of it was in the incident there recorded rather than in the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus may well have given the Prayer more than once (so Bernard in Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 43*), but in Lk. it certainly appears as something new for the benefit of the disciples in answer to their request, and this is later than the version in the Sermon.

The two versions are as follows:

Mt 6 ⁹⁻¹³ RV.	Lk 11 ²⁻⁴ RV.
Our Father which art in heaven,	Father,
Hallowed be thy name.	Hallowed be thy name.
Thy kingdom come.	Thy kingdom come.
Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.
Give us this day our daily (ἐπιούσιον) bread.	Give us day by day our daily (ἐπιούσιον) bread.
And forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors.	And forgive us our sins: for we ourselves also forgive every one that is indebted to us.
And bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one.	And bring us not into temptation.

AV of Lk. had all the clauses in Mt., but there is ample justification for the omissions seen in RV (see art. LORD'S PRAYER, p. 57^b). They could easily have come in through assimilation to Mt. The enrichment of the Invocation would be a natural growth. Elsewhere Mt. shows a penchant for the use of the word 'heaven.' Thus he, and he alone, has the expression 'the kingdom of heaven,' elsewhere invariably 'the kingdom of God.' In Ro 8¹⁵ we have 'Abba, Father,' as the Christian invocation; cf. Mk 14³⁶ (see Wellhausen, Einleit. in die drei ersten Evangelien, p. 38). The clause 'Thy will be done,' etc. (which is better attested than the other omitted words, since it is in N), may be regarded as an expansion of the clause which precedes it—'Thy kingdom come'—founded on words of Jesus spoken on one occasion (Mt 26³⁶, Mk 14³⁶, Lk 22⁴²). The final clause in Mt. may be taken as the antithesis and completion of the clause 'and bring us not into temptation.' These points seem to be in favour of the originality of Lk. Nevertheless, it was the Mt. form of the Prayer that was adopted in the Church, as far as we have evidence, from the earliest time, for this is the form in the Didache (viii.). Both forms must be traced to a common Greek tr. of the Aram. original, since they both contain the rare and difficult word ἐπιούσιον. Dr. Chase considers that they both exhibit the Prayer as changed for liturgical purposes.* Dr. Plummer considers that Mt.'s form of the Prayer is the nearer to the original (Hastings' DB iii. 141 f.). Thus he points out that the δὸς ἡμῖν σήμερον of Mt 6¹¹ is more likely to be genuine than the διδου ἡμῖν τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν of Lk 11³, because (a) καθ' ἡμέραν occurs in NT in St. Luke's writings only (Lk 19⁴⁷, Ac 17³¹), and (b) the present form of the verb (δίδου), which this involves, is an exception to the forms in the other clauses, which have aorists, as Mt. has here (δός).

It is not so easy to account for the omission of whole clauses by Lk. Accordingly, Dr. Plummer holds that Christ gave the Prayer on two different occasions in two different settings. But it has been pointed out that Lk.'s occasion requires us to view it as the first introduction of the Prayer, and yet this is later than the Sermon on the Mount. Besides, we must compare the briefer form of the Prayer with the briefer form of the Beatitudes. In both cases it is likely that the explanation is the same. Either Lk. abbreviates in both cases, or Mt. expands in both cases. With the Beatitudes we saw that the latter is the probability. Moreover, viewing Mt. as a whole, we see in it a fulness of expression not found in the other Gospels, due possibly to a catechetical use of the sayings of Christ. Thus we have the sign of Jonah explained in Mt 12⁴⁰ with a reference to the whale, while it is left indefinite in Lk 11³⁰; in Mt 16¹⁶ 'the Son of the living God' added to St. Peter's confession in Mk 8²⁹ 'Thou art the Christ,' where Lk 9²⁰ has 'the Christ of God'; in Mt 16²⁸ 'the Son of Man coming in his kingdom,' while Mk 9¹ and Lk 9²⁷ have only 'the kingdom of God,' etc.; at Mt 26²⁸ 'unto remission of sins' with reference to the blood of the covenant at the Lord's Supper, a clause not found in Mk 14²⁴, Lk 22²⁰, 1 Co 11²⁵. Still Lk. has characteristic additions, such as in the verse, 'I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance,' where the last two words appear in the RV. A gloss, since they are not found in Mt 9¹³, Mk 2¹⁷, and are not required by the context, but are congenial to Lk., the penitents' Gospel. Lk. has also characteristic alterations; for instance, for 'good things' in Mt 7¹¹, Lk 11¹³ has 'the Holy Spirit,' in accordance with the Gospels. The frequent references to the Holy Spirit in Lk. increase the probability of originality with Mt. in this case. Therefore we cannot make an invariable rule of giving Lk. the preference. While, however, we cannot be positive in deciding the question, the reasons stated above seem, on the whole, to point to Lk.'s version of the Lord's Prayer as the more original. While admitting this, we may hold it that at Mt.'s additional clauses are echoes of Jesus given on other occasions, or of His own explanations of the Prayer, analogously to the case of Mt.'s Beatitudes compared with Lk.'s. See, further, art. LORD'S PRAYER.

In other parts of the Sermon on the Mount the question of priority and superiority of authority is of less importance, since the divergences between

* Lk 14¹⁴ is in the 2nd person; but this takes the form of a promise, not that of benediction; similarly Lk 12²¹.

Mt. and Lk. are less significant (see Wellhausen, Einführung, pp. 67-73).

4. Scene and circumstances.—A Latin tradition, that cannot be traced back earlier than the 13th cent. and is not found in the Eastern Church, gives Karn Hattin, a two-peaked hill a little south-west of the plain of Gennesaret, as the locality of the delivery of the Sermon. All that can be said in its favour is that this mountain would be a very suitable spot; but there is no means of confirming so late a tradition. There is a discrepancy between Mt. and Lk., the one stating that Jesus gave the Sermon when He was on the mountain, the other that it was on a level place after He had come down from the mountain. It has been suggested by the harmonists that the level place might be somewhere among the hollows and shoulders of the mountain, so that, while Jesus had to descend to it, it was still in some degree on the mountain. But while this may be allowed as a possibility, the discrepancy is only one of many that are scattered over the Gospels, most of which may be regarded as too trivial to affect the question of authenticity.

The circumstances under which the Sermon on the Mount was delivered justify the exceptional importance that has always been attached to it. It was given early in our Lord's ministry, though not at the commencement. It belongs to the first year, before the disfavour of the authorities had arisen, or at all events before it had become serious; but it is sufficiently late for the popularity of the new Teacher to have reached a climax. The primitive stage of the Galilean mission consisted of a round of preaching in the synagogues; the second stage, still in the first year, is characterized more by open-air preaching, necessitated by the vast growth of the crowds who pressed to hear the popular Teacher, and by their insistence on hearing Him in season and out of season without waiting for the set times of the synagogue services. Internally the teaching of Jesus has undergone development. At the primitive stage it followed closely the lines laid down by John the Baptist, and could be summarized under the formula, 'Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand,' that is to say, it was an announcement of the coming Kingdom. But at the more advanced stages, to which the great Sermon belongs, Jesus had passed on from 'preaching' (κηρυγμα) to teaching (διδασκαλία), and was now expounding the nature of the Kingdom, its character, principles, processes. The Sermon on the Mount comes into this category. It is teaching, rather than preaching. Further, as a consequence, it was originally designed for disciples, for those who seriously desired to learn. This is made evident by the introductions of both Evangelists. In Mt. we read, 'And seeing the multitudes (τοὺς ὄχλους), he went up into the mountain: and when he had sat down, his disciples (οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ) came unto him; and he opened his mouth, and taught them (αὐτοὺς), i.e. the disciples (Mt 5¹⁻²). Here the distinction between the crowd and the learners is very marked. It was to avoid the crowd that Jesus retreated to the mountain—a common habit, referred to on several occasions. Then the eager inquirers followed; and finding Him there, led Him to speak to them, or, as seems more likely, they came at His own invitation. The situation is not so clear in Lk., where the coming of the crowd to Christ follows His visit to the mountain, which He had ascended for prayer (Lk 6¹²), and where He had chosen the Twelve Apostles (v. 13); and whence He had come down with them, after which He 'stood on a level place' (v. 17). Still Lk. preserves the distinction between the disciples and the crowd by saying, 'And a great multitude of his disciples, and a great number of the people from all Judæa,' etc. (v. 17). Having described the cures, which in Mt. preceded the ascent of the mountain, he says, 'And he lifted up his eyes on his disciples, and said,' etc.—here commencing his version of the great Sermon. Thus in Lk. this is delivered to the first of the two groups, the disciples in distinction from the crowd, as in Mt. Moreover, the use of the 2nd person in the Lukan version of the Beatitudes evidently indicates disciples—a fact which the apostrophe of the absent rich does not nullify; because in each case a specific class, not the mixed multitude, is addressed. As we proceed with the Sermon, the people emerges. It is only to His own disciples that Jesus could say, 'Ye are the salt of the earth' . . . 'Ye are the light of the world' (Mt 5^{13, 14}). It is no objection that towards the end of the discourse Jesus says, 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven,' etc. (7²¹), and concludes with the parable of the Two Foundations, because these warnings might well be needed by many disciples. There was a traitor even among the Twelve. We are not to conclude, however, that these disciples consisted only of the Apostles. St. Luke had expressly said that 'there was a great multitude of disciples' (Lk 6¹⁷) present on this occasion.

In Lk. (6¹⁸) the Sermon follows the choosing and appointment of the Apostles; and this fact has led some to regard it as 'the charge to the Twelve.' But in Mt. there is no description of the choice of the Apostles, and they are not expressly associated with the Sermon. In both Gospels the introduction of the Sermon introduces a much larger audience. All the genuine 'hearers of the word,' all who expressly sought out Jesus and set themselves to learn of Him, are included in the comprehensive group of 'disciples.' Still the audience was virtually confined to this group. The Sermon was for disciples, not for the world at large. It may be pointed out, on the other hand, that while the introduction to the Sermon in both Gospels has this indication, the comments which follow it in each case seem to point to the general public. Thus in Mt 7²⁸ it is said, 'And it came to pass, when Jesus ended these words, the multitudes were astonished at his teaching,' etc., and in Lk 7¹ 'After he had ended all his sayings in the ears of the people.' The language, however, is indefinite in both cases and perhaps not specially considered, for no emphasis is here laid on the nature of the hearers, as was the case in the introductory descriptions.

5. Purpose and character.—The purpose of the Sermon on the Mount can be understood only when account is taken of the audience to which it was addressed. Since this audience consisted of disciples and not the public, we must read the discourse as an ethical directory for Christians. Therefore the question as to whether its precepts can be embodied in the laws of the State is irrelevant. A group of Galilean peasants in a province of the Roman Empire, whatever they had to do with the business of the State, even in connection with the future spread of Christianity it was not the intention of Christ that principles which He desired to see working outward from the heart should be imposed upon a community by force with the external authority of the magistrate. But while it is a mistake to regard the Sermon on the Mount as a model for civil and criminal law, on the other hand it would be an error to abandon its ideal in favour of a lower code of ethics even in the police courts. The Sermon of Christ will always desire to see His will done; but this does not mean that he is at liberty to force his Master's precepts on a society that is reluctant to obey them because it has not submitted to the authority from which they emanated. If we can look forward to a condition in which the State is effectually Christianized, then we shall have a society in which the magistrate is not needed; that is to say, the removal of the conditions which now prevent the Sermon on the Mount being applied in the police court will abolish the police court itself as an anachronism. Therefore we must view the Sermon on the Mount as primarily aiming at the direction of the conduct of Christians in their personal behaviour as individuals and members of a brotherhood. It has relations to the outside world in so far as Christian men and women have such relations. For instance, commands about love to enemies and kindness to persecutors are especially concerned with the conduct of Christians towards people who are not of their own fellowship. Still, it is the conduct of Christians only that is considered. These considerations should safeguard the interpreter against two other misapprehensions: (1) It is an error to regard the Sermon on the Mount as the sum and substance of Christianity, and to condemn later developments as not of the essence of Christianity (Hatch, Harnack). We have no evidence that Jesus Christ intended to put His whole message into this one discourse. He is here discussing the ethics of the Kingdom of heaven. Elsewhere He treats of other features of the Kingdom. (2) Since this discourse lays down the proper conduct for discipleship, the discipleship must have been previously established in other ways (e.g. denying self, taking up the cross, following Christ, turning and becoming as little children, etc., as elsewhere indicated by Jesus Christ).

In the main, the Sermon on the Mount indicates the character of life and conduct that Jesus Christ commands to His disciples as the rule of life. Commencing with the Beatitudes, He points out the way to true happiness. This is more apparent in Mt. than in Lk.; but if the Beatitudes in the former Gospel may be taken as at least a true exposition of the deeper meaning of the simpler felicitations in the latter Gospel, it is safe to say that Jesus here teaches that blessedness is associated with character. The conduct commended throughout the Sermon is set forth by Christ as a fulfilment of the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5¹⁷). It completes what was imperfect in the earlier religion by realizing its essential principles and developing them to perfection. The consequences that external precepts of the more primitive condition are abrogated—not universally, but wherever they conflict with a later ethical development. This applies to the Sacred Torah as well as to traditions of the scribes, as in the examples of hatred, divorce, swearing, and revenge, formerly permitted under certain conditions, though regulated and restrained by the Law, but now absolutely forbidden by Christ. In the next place, conduct condoned or even honoured hitherto is condemned as unworthy of the higher standard set up by Christ. In particular, ostentation in almsgiving, in public praying, and in fasting is reprobated, and the habit of judging others is reprovied. The Sermon closes with warnings against being deceived by false prophets, and insists forcibly that mere discipleship in hearing the teaching is vain; the end of all is energetic conduct in obedience to this instruction. The principal interpolations consist of (1) two passages encouraging prayer (Mt 6⁹⁻¹³ 7⁷⁻¹¹), and (2) one long passage discouraging worldly anxiety (6¹⁹⁻³⁴). They rest their exhortations equally on the Fatherly goodness of God. They are among the choicest and most beautiful of our Lord's teachings, plainly indicating their right to places in the Logia by their character as of the inner essence of His message, even if their inconsistency with the flow of the argument in the Sermon, supported by the fact that they are placed in other parts of His narrative by Lk., leads us to regard them as out of place when inserted in this particular discourse.

SERPENT.—The prevalence of serpents in ancient Palestine is illustrated by the fact that no fewer than 11 Heb. words are rendered 'serpent' in OT. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of Bible) states that 33 different species of serpent are still found in Syria. Of 18 varieties which he himself secured, 13 were innocuous and 4 deadly, including cobras and vipers. Naturally there are numerous references, in the OT, in the NT, and in Rabbinical literature, to serpents as well-known but generally disagreeable inhabitants of the country. So unpleasantly common were they, that it was regarded as one of the perpetual miracles of Jerusalem that no one was ever bitten by a serpent there. The references in the Gospels may conveniently be grouped under three heads.

1. In Mt 10¹⁶ our Lord charges His disciples, 'Be ye wise as serpents' (ὡς οἱ ὄφεις). There may be here a reference to the serpent which is more subtil (עָרִם) than any beast of the field.' The Heb. word means 'shrewd,' and is used also in a good sense (cf. Pr 12^{16, 23}), although the parallel root in Arabic suggests only a bad sense. It is probable, however, that our Lord refers to the well-known habits of the serpent, its ability to conceal itself in unexpected places, and to escape swiftly and silently in time of danger (cf. Job 38³⁶ 'the swift serpent' RV, Job 26⁷, Is 27¹).

2. But the phrase which follows in Mt 10¹⁶ 'and harmless (ἀνέπατοι) as doves,' suggests that there was also in the mind of Jesus the equally well-known reputation of the serpent as a dangerous reptile; and this is borne out by other passages in the Gospel. Almost parallel are Mk 16¹⁸ 'they shall take up serpents,' and Lk 10¹⁹ 'I give you power over serpents'; while the noxious and repulsive nature of the serpent is referred to in Mt 7¹⁰, Lk 11¹¹ 'if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent?'

In all the above passages, ὄφις, the generic name for a serpent, is used. But in Mt 3⁷ 12³⁴ 23³³, Lk 3⁷ we find ἐχιδνα, which probably means a poisonous serpent, and is rendered 'viper' both in AV and RV. In Mt 23³³ both words are used to describe the Pharisees—ὄφεις, ἡνικαὶ ἐχιδναί, 'serpents, offspring [see GENERATION] of vipers' (cf. Mic 7¹⁷).

3. Very different is the passage Jn 3¹⁴ 'and as Moses lifted up the serpent (τὸν ὄφιν) in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up,' where the reference is to the plague of serpents among the Israelites in the wilderness and the miraculous cure, as recorded in Nu 21⁶⁻⁹. Full consideration of this passage, and of its relation to 2 K 18⁴, does not fall within the scope of this article (see art. 'Nehushtan' in Hastings' DB iii. 510^b). It is interesting, however, to note, in connexion with Jn 3¹⁴, that both passages in the OT have been regarded as pointing to serpent-worship in some form among the early Hebrews.

SERUG.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3³⁵, AV Seruch).

SERVANT.—See artt. SERVICE, SLAVE; and for 'Servant of the Lord' see PROPHET, p. 432^a.

SERVICE.—There are 5 words which with their derivatives are used to convey the idea of 'service' in the NT: leitourgeîn, λατρεύειν, ὑπηρετής, διάκονος, and δοῦλος. Of these leitourgeîn (leitōs = δημόσιος and ἔργον) is used to denote service rendered to the State. It indicates the unreckoned generosity, the uncalculating devotion of patriotic service of city or country. This idea is fully indicated in such passages as Ro 15¹⁶, Ph 2¹⁷, and in connexion with διακονία in 2 Co 9¹². The word was early used in the Christian Church to indicate the service of God in special offices and ministries. Thus in the one passage in which it appears in the Gospels (Lk 1²³) it is used of the priest Zacharias, as it is afterwards used of the great High Priest in He 8³². Very much the same may be said of the second word λατρεύειν. In classical Greek it was used of the service of the gods, and in the NT it is used of the service rendered to Jehovah by the whole tribe of Israel (Ac 26⁷ and Ro 9⁴). Thus Augustine says: 'λατρεία . . . aut semper aut tam frequenter ut fere semper, ea dicitur servitus quæ pertinet ad colendum Deum' (c. Faust. 20, 21). This distinct use of the word appears in all those passages in which it is used in the Gospels: Mt 4¹⁰, Lk 1⁷⁴ 2²⁷. Though these words are full of significance as used in the NT, we need not in this article examine further into their use, inasmuch as they do not appear in the Gospels in connexion with that form of service which Christ either illustrated in Himself or explicitly taught. It is in the remaining words that we must find whatever teaching is suggested by the terminology of the Evangelists.

ὑπηρετής is used in what was doubtless the original meaning of the word, i.e. 'one who waits at table,' in Jn 2^{5,9} (see also Mt 22¹³ and Jn 12²). It represents the servant in his activity rather than in any relation to his Lord. The διάκονος executes the commands of his master. Thus, while in Mt 22¹⁴ the δοῦλος invites the guests to the feast, it is the διάκονος who expels the unworthy guest. Another word closely allied in use to διάκονος is ὑπηρετής, 'the rower, then the subordinate official, and then the performer of any hard labour' (Mt 5²⁶, Lk 4²⁰). The difference between the two words is to be sought in the direction of the official relation of the ὑπηρετής to his master.

By far the most commonly used word in this connexion is δοῦλος, 'the bondservant.' It is used almost as an equivalent to διάκονος to indicate the lowliness of the service rendered. Where the two words are brought into comparison, the difference between them seems to be that while διάκονος indicates the activity of the servant, δοῦλος indicates rather the completeness of his subordination. Thus, in speaking of Christ, St. Paul calls Him the διάκονος of the circumcision (Ro 15⁸), while he says that He took upon Him the μορφὴν δούλου (Ph 2⁷). So also in Lk 12³⁷ watchfulness is the token of the activity of the servant. The humility of service, therefore, while not lacking entirely from the word διάκονος, belongs more particularly to δοῦλος. It is on the lines of this distinction that the words of Christ as recorded in Mt 20^{26,28} may be explained. There it will be seen that, while διάκονος is the antithesis of μέγας, the antithesis of δοῦλος is found in πρώτος; as though Christ would teach that true greatness lies in the doing of service, while the highest position in His Kingdom belongs to him who will accept the lowly position of the slave.

In this last passage and again in Lk 22²⁶ Christ lays down service as the law of His Kingdom. The position of a minister was that which He accepted for Himself; 'He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister' (Mt 20²⁸), and He looked to those who would follow Him to accept a similar rule of life for themselves (Lk 22²⁶, Jn 13¹⁶, cf. 12¹⁶). This idea of service as the law of the Kingdom of God was no new one in Jewish thought. Many years before, the author of Is 40-56 had spoken of both the deliverer and the delivered as 'the servant of Jehovah.' Both He who through suffering should redeem the people, and the people themselves, idealized as they were in the vision of the seer, were to serve. The one was to be 'despised and rejected of men,' and the other, blind, deaf, plundered, and despised, was to be exalted by the very service in which he proved his submission and obedience. Each was to be Jehovah's δοῦλος.

Throughout the parabolic teaching of Jesus the use of this word is sufficiently frequent to be significant; but if He had given no other teaching in this connexion, His mind would have been sufficiently expressed by His acted parable on the occasion when He Himself stooped to the most menial of all menial service, and washed the feet of His disciples. When at length His self-imposed task was complete, 'He said unto them, A servant is not greater than his Lord; . . . I have given you an example that ye also should do as I have done unto you' (Jn 13¹⁻¹⁷). In this service, which Christ enjoins as well as accepts, there are one or two notes which are peculiarly His own. The first of these is, that it is a service which is not imposed upon the individual from outside, but is a spontaneous act of submission. It was in this way that He Himself had entered upon that service μορφὴν δούλου λαβών (Ph 2⁷), and it is in this way that He calls upon His disciples to serve (Mt 20²⁶). Indeed, it was only thus that service could be of any moral value to the servant. The compelled service is barren of aught but the spirit of rebellion, and it finds no place in Christ's scheme. The service that is grudging or unwilling is not to be discovered in His example. As St. Paul afterwards taught, there is a recognition of the freedom of the individual in this, that he is allowed to 'yield himself a servant unto obedience,' and the bond which he thus casts upon himself grows closer with every subsequent act of obedience (Ro 6¹⁹). The second note is that of completeness. This service is complete in its self-dedication and exclusive in its object. Christ, from the beginning a sense of constraint, said that He must be in His Father's house (Lk 2⁴⁹). His surrender to that compelling force was full; He found it His 'meat to do the will' of His Father, and to accomplish His work (Jn 4³⁴). Equally full was the devotion which He realized, for He 'did always the things that pleased him' (Jn 8²⁹).

These with the other passages already cited sufficiently indicate the character of the service which belongs to the Kingdom of God. It has a definite and undivided purpose. It is not qualified either in its sanction or in its claim to occupy and dominate the whole life of the Christian. Equally marked is its measure or intensity. Both in the terms that are used and in the examples afforded, it is taught that sacrifice, even that ultimate form of sacrifice which for mortals is realized in death, is the one condition of service.

SESSION.—In the exaltation of Jesus Christ which followed His death upon the Cross, three distinct stages are indicated, viz. the Resurrection, the Ascension, and the Session, which means the sitting or the state of being seated. Harnack indeed thinks that in some of the oldest accounts the resurrection and the sitting at the right hand of God are taken as parts of the same act, without mention of any ascension. But take one of these accounts: in Ro 8³⁴ St. Paul writes: Χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς ὁ ἀποθανὼν μάλλον δὲ ἐγερθεὶς ἐκ νεκρῶν, ὃς ἐστὶν ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ θεοῦ, ὃς καὶ ἐντυγχάνει ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν. 'Here,' writes Swete (Apostles' Creed, p. 67 f.), 'are four well-marked links in a chain of facts—our Lord's Death, Resurrection, Session, Intercession. It is difficult to see why the second and the third, the Resurrection and the Session, should be taken as parts of the same act, when the first is clearly distinct. If the Ascension is not mentioned, it is implied in the Session, for it is contrary to the usage of the NT to interpret ἐγείρεσθαι of any exaltation beyond the mere recall from death. In other passages the ellipsis is equally easy to supply. Thus St. Peter's words in Ac 2³² (τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀνέστηεν ὁ θεός . . . τῇ δεξιᾷ οὖν τοῦ θεοῦ ὑψώθη) are interpreted by 1 P 3²¹⁻²² (δὲ ἀναστάντος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὃς ἐστὶν ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ θεοῦ, πορεύεται εἰς οὐρανόν). It would go against the whole tenor of the NT to regard them as merely different names for the same event; the Session is the glorified state into which the Ascension was the solemn entrance.

The Session is related as a fact of history only in Mk 16¹⁹: He 'sat down at the right hand of God,' which belongs at latest to the earlier sub-Apostolic age. Yet this is not so remarkable when we remember that St. Matthew and St. John do not carry their accounts beyond the Resurrection. Its truth, however, is established by the fact that it was expressed by Christ Himself (Mt 19²⁸ 25³¹). It was the fulfilment of prophecy; cf. Ps 110¹, to which reference was made by the Lord (Mt 22⁴²), which was quoted by St. Peter (Ac 2³⁴) and the author of Hebrews (1³), and enlarged upon in Eph 1²⁰; cf. also Ps 2⁶ 45⁶, Is 16⁵, Lk 1³². And it found a prominent place in the doctrinal system of the NT writers (Eph 1²⁰, Col 3¹, He 1³ 13³ 8¹ 10¹², Ro 8³⁴, 2 Co 5¹⁰ (βῆμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ), 1 P 3²², Rev 3²¹).

That Ps 110¹ is Messianic sense by the Jews of Mt 22⁴², where His opponents did not speak of the Christ; and in many of their older exegetical writings this interpretation was adopted. The following passage from the Midrash Talmud on Ps 138⁶: 'Blessed be He, our King Messiah to whom it is said, "The utterance of Sit Thou on My right hand," and Abraham on His left. And the face of Abraham grows pale, and he says, "The son of my son sits on the right hand, but I on the left"; and the Holy One, Blessed be He, says to him, "The son of thy son is at My right hand, but I on the left hand"; and this is implied by (כִּי יֵשׁ), "Jehovah upon thy right hand." Later Jewish writers seek to explain the words as referring to Abraham (Rashi), David (Aben Ezra, Mendelssohn), Hezekiah, or Zerubbabel, with regard to which interpretation see, e.g., ibid.; Pearson, On the Creed, i. 405. Kautzsch in his Introduction to the Bible (Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. p. 727), thinks that the Psalm was as to a Messianic resolution hereditary high priest and prince or the people. Delitzsch considers this Psalm the only one which is directly Messianic, in the sense that it contains prophecy immediately pointing to the person of a coming Anointed One, who was fully to set up God's Kingdom on earth. On the whole question of interpretation consult Davison's art. 'Psalms' in Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 160.

Accordingly the Session forms a distinct article ('ascendit in coelos, sedet ad dexteram Patris') in the old Roman Creed as represented in the Greek confession of Marcellus and in the Latin of Rufinus, of which Harnack writes: 'We may regard it as an assured result of research that the old Roman Creed . . . came into existence about or shortly before the middle of the second century.' It is found also in a form of creed given by Tertullian (de Præscr. Hæret. c. 13), 'in coelos ereptum sedisse ad dexteram Patris,' and in another (de Virg. Vel. 1), 'receptum in coelis sedentem nunc ad dexteram Patris.' Its importance is equally marked in the formulae of the Eastern Church, καθίσαντα ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ Πατρὸς (early Creed of Jerusalem collected from Cyril), καθεσθέντα ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ Πατρὸς (Creed of the Apostolic Constitutions, vii. 41), καθεζόμενον ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ Πατρὸς (Creed of Constantinople).

In NT the reference is sometimes to the act of taking a position; cf. He 1³ 'sat down (ἐκάθισεν) on the right hand of the Majesty on high,' which describes the solemn assumption of the seat of authority, which rightly belongs to One whose dignity is expressed in such unique terms as are used in the preceding clauses; and 'throughout the Epistle to the Hebrews (except 1¹³, καθού from LXX) the reference is uniformly to the act of taking the royal seat' (Westcott on 10¹², cf. also Rev 3²¹); in 12² the Perfect (κεκάθικεν), found in the best MSS, denotes the entrance on a permanent state. In Mt 19²⁸ 25³¹ the reference is to taking the throne of His glory for His Father. The verb is twice used transitively in the NT, in the action of the Father in raising Christ from the dead and making Him to sit at His right hand (Eph 1²⁰ and Ac 2³⁰ RV). Elsewhere the Session is described rather as a state; cf. Mt 26⁶⁴, Lk 22⁶⁹ (RV 'shall be seated,' Vulg. 'erit sedens'), Col 3¹ (ὁ ὁ Χριστὸς ἐστὶν . . . καθήμενος, 'where Christ is seated,' RV), and Ro 8³⁴, 1 P 3²² where ὃς ἐστὶν ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ θεοῦ has the same meaning as Ps 110¹ καθού (LXX) also marks the Session as distinct from assumption of place.

The Session is spoken of as 'at the right hand of God' (Mk 16¹⁹, Col 3¹ et al.; cf. Eph 1²⁰ and Ac 2³⁴ RVm), elsewhere variously, 'at the right hand of power' (Mt 26⁶⁴), 'of the power of God' (Lk 22⁶⁹), 'of the Majesty on high' (He 1³), 'of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens' (8¹), 'of the throne of God' (12²). The Greek is either ἐκ δεξιῶν, which is the uniform phrase in the Synoptics and in quotation of Ps 110¹ (Ac 2³⁴, He 1³), or ἐν δεξιᾷ, which is used in the Epistles (Ro 8³⁴, Eph 1²⁰ et al.; cf. Ac 2³³ τῇ δεξιᾷ, 'at the right hand,' RVm). It is difficult to determine what is the exact force of the expression. God is Spirit, He has no body, and He is omnipresent, and His right hand of God is everywhere (He is everywhere). Therefore its use as referring to the Father is to be taken as a necessary accommodation to our limited minds, which can think only in terms of time and space, and which can have no conception of pure spirit. Among men, to be set on one's right hand has a well-defined meaning: it signifies to be in the highest place of honour, to be recognized as a sharer in rule; cf. 1 K 2¹⁹, Ps 45⁹, Mt 20²¹; Jos. Ant. vi. xi. 9 (παρὰ καθεσθέντων αὐτῶν, τοῦ μὲν παῖδος Ἰωάννου [1 S 20²⁵] ἐκ δεξιῶν). Thus 'Hiempsal . . . dextra Adherbalem adsedit . . . quod apud Numidas honori ducitur' (Sallust, Jugurthina, vi. 3). See art. 'Symbol' in Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. p. 172. This is the sense in which the Fathers interpret the words; as Westcott points out in his notes on

He 8¹, they carefully avoided all puerile anthropomorphism in their treatment of 'the right hand of God'; for example, '... majestatis summaeque gloriam ... prosperitatis debemus per dexteram intelligere in qua filius sedet' (Primas.); οὐχ ὅτι τότε περιέλεται ὁ θεός, ἀλλ' ἵνα τὸ ὁμότιμον αὐτοῦ δεῖχῃ τὸ πρὸς τὸν πατέρα (Theophylact).

As regards Jesus Christ, however, it is not so clear that the expression is entirely figurative. He ascended with His human body, which was indeed glorified and freed from many of its previous limitations; but it belongs to the very essence of the idea of a body that it should occupy a certain definite space. Since, then, His body cannot be ubiquitous, it seems necessary to think of it as raised at the Ascension to some distinct place. 'He went into the place of all places in the universe of things, in situation most eminent, in quality most holy, in dignity most excellent, in glory most illustrious, the inmost sanctuary of God's temple above' (Barrow, Sermon on the Ascension). Thus Stier holds fast 'the certain τοῦ of heaven, yea, of the throne of God in it.' And Meyer (on Mk 16¹⁹, Eph 1²⁰) says the expression is not to be transferred into a vague conception of a status celestis, of a higher relation to the world and the like, but is to be left as a specification of place; for Christ is with His glorified body, as σύνθετος of the Father, on the seat where Divine Majesty is enthroned (cf. Mt 6⁹), from which hereafter He will return to judgment; meantime He is patiently waiting at the centre of all worship and power (He 10^{12, 13}): cf. also Ellicott on Eph 1²⁰. This view agrees with the tenor of the Holy Scriptures, which seem to imply that while God is everywhere, yet there is a place (described as ἐν ὑψηλοῖς, ἐν οὐρανοῖς) where He specially manifests Himself in peculiar glory to heavenly beings (cf. Is 6¹, Ps 2⁴ 102¹⁹, 1 Ti 6¹⁶), whence the Holy Spirit and the voice of God came (Mt 3^{16, 17}, Jn 12²⁸). Yet, on the other hand, Milligan (The Ascension of Our Lord, Lect. I.) points out that heaven in the NT 'is contrasted with earth less as one place than as one state is contrasted with another,' comparing Jn 3¹³ 'No man hath ascended into heaven, but he that descended out of heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven' [but NBL do not give ὁ ὢν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ], and quoting Westcott (on He 1³), 'all local association must be excluded,' the reference being to dignity and honour, not locality; cf. also Jn 1¹⁸, Eph 4¹⁰. And Grimm-Thayer says 'that these expressions are to be understood in this figurative sense and not of a fixed and definite place in the highest heavens, will be questioned by no one who carefully considers Rev 3²¹.' See also Abbott, 'Ephesians' (ad 1²⁰), in the ICC.

Sitting at the right hand of God is the conspicuous description of the present life of Christ in glory. It is evident from those passages which speak of it as a continuous state, that the expression cannot be taken literally, otherwise they would convey the idea that the attitude of sitting is perpetual. Besides, we find simply 'is at the right hand' in Ro 8³⁴, 1 P 3²²; in other places He is at the right hand in a different attitude, as standing (A. C. 1⁹, Rev 2¹ 3¹⁴); and John (Rev 1¹³), saw Him 'sitting about at the breasts with a golden girdle' (which was 'worn in this manner by priests when they were engaged in active service' [Milligan]).

In the vision of St. Stephen a beautiful explanation of the 'standing' has long been given, viz. that he saw Jesus as risen from His throne and in the act of coming to help His suffering servant and faithful martyr. So Meyer, Trench, Conybeare and Howson, et al., following Chrysostom, τὴν αὐτὴν καὶ οὐχὶ καθύπευθε; ἡ δὲ εἰρήνη τὴν ἀντίληψιν τὴν εἰς τὸν μάρτυρα καὶ γὰρ τῶν τοῦ πατρὸς λειτουργῶν ἀνάστα ὁ θεός, and Gregory the Great, 'Stephanus in labore certaminis positus stantem vidit quem adiutorem habuit.' See the Collect for St. Stephen's Day, and Alford's note on Ac 7⁵⁵, where he inclines to a different interpretation.

The Session of Christ is connected with His work as King, Priest, Intercessor, and Judge. (1) It expresses His kingdom and majesty; thereby He entered on the full and permanent participation in the Divine glory, not merely resuming the glory which He had resigned at the Incarnation (Jn 17⁵), but receiving the added glory won by His obedience even unto the death of the Cross (Ph 2^{8f}, He 2⁹); thereby the promises made to David concerning his son were fulfilled (cf. Ps 2⁸ 24⁹, 1 Co 15-16, 1 P 1^{20f}). All power is given unto Him in heaven and in earth (Mt 28¹⁸), God 'hath put all things in subjection under his feet' (1 Co 15²⁷). (2) It betokens a continuous work (He 10^{12f}); His earthly life ... suffering and the humiliation ended; yet not inactivity, for Jn 5¹⁷ still holds true of the exalted Christ; such perfect rest as 'answers to the being of God "who worketh hitherto" without effort and without failure' (Westcott, The Historic Faith, Art. vi.), and is consistent with His readiness to sympathize with His people on earth, and to help them in time of need; cf. He 2¹⁸ 4^{15f}. (3) It signifies His unique dignity and honour. In God's presence the angels stand, or fall on their faces (Is 6², 1 K 22¹⁹); the priests stood in the Temple when ministering (He 10¹¹). He alone is said to sit on God's right hand. τὸ ἐστάναι τοῦ λειτουργεῖν ἐστὶ σημεῖον, οὐκοῦν τὸ καθῆσθαι τοῦ λειτουργεῖσθαι, and τοῦτο οὐχὶ τοῦ ἱερέως ἀλλὰ τοῦτο ὡς ἱεραῖο ἐκείνου χρῆ (Chrys.). Θεὸν ἔχομεν ἀρχιερέα, τὸ γὰρ καθῆσθαι οὐδενὸς ἄλλου ἢ θεοῦ. (4) It expresses His dignity as Priest. Westcott remarks (Add. Note on He 1³), 'In the Epistle to the Hebrews His Session is always (except in 1¹³) connected with the fulfilment of priestly work, of which it marks two different aspects. Before He sat down He fulfilled the type of Aaron, offering the sacrifice of Himself and ascending into heaven, into the presence of God. Since that time He fulfils the royal priesthood of Melchizedek; He intercedes for His people as their representative (Ro 8³⁴, He 7²⁵, 1 Jn 2¹); He secures access for His people now to 'the holy place' where He Himself is, by His blood (He 4¹⁴ 10^{19f}), and acting as a minister (λειτουργός) of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle (8² where see Westcott's note); He also rules and guides His Church, being with His people always, even unto the end of the world (Mt 28²⁰); and in the midst where two or three are gathered together in His name (18²⁰). (5) It implies His work as Judge, which is the aspect ... the Gospels (Mt 19²⁸ 25³¹, Mk ... 2 Co 5¹⁰ 'the judgment-seat of Christ'). Thus we are to understand by the Session that Christ, having accomplished on earth the work of redemption, now occupies the place of highest honour, most exalted majesty, and perfect bliss, and that God has conferred upon Him all pre-eminence of dignity, power, favour, and felicity. With regard to the particular form in which this is expressed, Sanday (in his art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB ii. p. 642^b) well says: 'We speak of these things κατὰ ἄνθρωπον; or rather, we are content to echo in regard to them the language of the Apostles and of the first Christians, who themselves spoke κατὰ ἄνθρωπον. The reality lies behind the veil.' See also art. ASCENSION.

SETH.—The patriarch, mentioned as a link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3³⁸).

SEVEN, SEVENTY.—See NUMBER.

SEVEN WORDS, THE.—These words, spoken by our Lord from the cross, are recorded by the different Evangelists: one by St. Matthew and St. Mark, two by St. Luke, and three by St. John. The progressive stages by which they are characterized may be taken to show a gradual unfolding of the will and purpose of God for the redemption of mankind. They seem to sum up in themselves the whole of the Gospel. The first three words, 'Father, forgive them; they know not what they do' (Lk 23³⁴), 'Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise' (Lk 23⁴³), and 'Woman, behold thy son . . . behold thy mother' (Jn 19²⁶⁻²⁷), were spoken between the third and the sixth hour, and they reveal to us the great High Priest, in His life of ministry, interceding for the transgressors, proclaiming pardon to the penitent, and blessing His own. The two next words, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mt 27⁴⁶, Mk 15³⁴), and 'I thirst' (Jn 19²⁸), were spoken in the darkness; nature is wrapped in gloom as the God-man, bearing the burden and the curse of sin that is not His own, reveals to us something of the mystery of suffering. The two last words, 'It is finished' (Jn 19³⁰), and 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (Lk 23⁴⁶), were spoken in the restored light. They reveal to us the victory, the completed work, and the entering into rest. All seven words are words of love. It was love that animated Him from the time when 'for us men and for our salvation He came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made Man' (Nicene Creed). It was love that entered into the whole of His life on earth, but that love shines with its brightest lustre in the cross. His ministry of intercession, of reconciliation, of blessing, His suffering, His thirsting, His triumph, all reach their climax in the cross. They are the outcome of the great love wherewith He so loved us that He gave Himself for us.

1. 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.'—This first word was probably spoken when the soldiers were driving the nails into His hands and feet, and were about to lift up the cross with its sacred burden and plant it in the ground. From His hard bed, the cross, while suffering untold agony, He intercedes for them, and adds to His intercession an excuse for their deed, 'They know not what they do.' In one sense they did know, they must have known, even those rough Roman soldiers, that they were perpetrating an act of cruelty; but familiarity with suffering had rendered them callous. It was part of their work; they were paid to do it, and they did it. But they did not know all, they did not know that they were crucifying the Lord of glory, they were but unconscious instruments doing what they were bidden; and so the Saviour prayed for them and made excuse for them, and not for them only, but for all who had taken part in that deed of violence, for all who, during all the ages that have since elapsed, have been crucifying the Son of God afresh.

2. 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.'—Having interceded for the transgressors, Christ from His cross proclaims pardon to the penitent robber on his cross. This man had been one of a band of robbers, perhaps the same band to which Barabbas belonged, a band of men living wild and reckless lives; and now both he and his fellow, having fallen victims to the power against which they have been in revolt, are suffering the extreme penalty of the law. Crucified with them, in the same condemnation, is the pure and holy Jesus, who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth. He was numbered with the transgressors. He descended to the lowest depth of human degradation that He might lift humanity to the height of holiness and heaven. From His cross He will exert a world-wide attraction; 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me' (Jn 12³²); and now this attraction is beginning. Both these robbers had at first reviled the Holy Sufferer; one remained hardened and impenitent to the end, but the other was brought to a better mind. Perhaps this was not the first time that this man had seen the Christ; he may have been among those who listened to His words on some previous occasion, he may have seen some of His miracles; now, however, he is brought face to face with the power of His love, conviction dawns within him, he sees himself in his true light; looking to his fellow, he says, 'Dost not thou fear that thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly, for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but this man hath done nothing amiss' (Lk 23⁴⁰⁻⁴¹). He confesses his sins, and not only is there a confession of sins but a wonderful faith, and this faith is manifested, not when Christ is at the height of His popularity, but in the depth of His humiliation. He sees in the cross a throne, and in the thorn-crowned sufferer a king seated upon it, and he prefers his request, 'Lord, remember me, when thou comest in thy kingdom.' And Jesus turns to this penitent robber and proclaims the gospel of forgiveness, 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.'

3. 'Woman, behold thy son . . . behold thy mother.'—Christ from His cross has interceded for the sinful world, He has proclaimed the gospel of forgiveness to the penitent robber; but He has yet, in the progressive stages of His ministry of love, another blessing to bestow. In this word our Lord comes near His own. His first word was for His enemies; His second for one who had been His enemy, but was no longer one; His third was for those who had never been His enemies—for His mother and the disciple whom He loved. 'There stood by the cross of Jesus His mother' (Jn 19²⁵). For this the aged Simeon had prepared her, when, taking the infant Jesus in his arms, he had told her that a sword should pierce her own soul (Lk 2³⁵); and now these words are being fulfilled. Jesus from His cross beholds His mother, and is mindful of the years which He had spent under her tender care in the quiet home of Nazareth. He had told her, both when she found Him in the Temple and also at the marriage feast in Cana (Lk 2⁴¹, Jn 2⁴), that there was a higher duty than that which He owed to her, a higher relationship than that between mother and son.—He was not only her son, He was also her Lord,—yet the earthly relationship is not forgotten. He will not depart before He has provided a home for her; with His parting breath He commits her to the care of the disciple whom He loved: 'Woman, behold thy son . . . behold thy mother.'

4. 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'—A long space of time intervenes between the third and fourth words. 'From the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour' (Mt 27⁴⁵). The first three words were spoken before the darkness, but now a change has come—darkness reigns on Calvary, as if God had drawn a veil over the scene. Three hours of silence and darkness. It is the climax of the sufferings of our Lord, the hour and power of darkness; what takes place we know not; He trod the winepress alone (Is 63³). He is alone in His conflict with the powers of evil, dark without, dark within,—how dark we may gather from the awful cry that escaped from His lips at the end of those long hours, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'

What did it mean? It did not mean that He was forsaken by His Father. Had not the Father said, 'This is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased' (Mt 3¹⁷)? Had not He Himself said, 'Behold the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone; and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me' (Jn 16³²)? But there was a connexion between the death of Christ and sin; it was an atonement for sin: 'The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all' (Is 53⁶). And the misery of sin is that it hides the face of God. It is the loss of God's presence; and Christ, as our representative, in bearing our sins, entered into our condition, involving the consciousness of the loss of God's presence. He felt as though God had hidden His face. He descended with us into the depth of our darkness, made like unto us in all things, yet without sin. But the mystery of this bitter cry we, with our finite understandings, can never fathom: 'I and the Father are one,' and yet 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' This the early Christians fully realized, for in their oft-repeated litanies they used to say, 'By Thy sufferings known and unknown, good Lord deliver us.' See also art. DERELICTION.

5. 'I thirst.'—The last word, it has been said, 'was the cry of the human soul in separation; this is the cry of the human body in its weakness.' The darkness is now passing away, and as, at the Temptation, He suffered hunger when the crisis was over, so now He gives expression to the thirst that is parching Him. Intense thirst was usually the most intolerable part of the suffering of those who were crucified, and He had been hanging there for six long hours, His open wounds scorched by the blazing sun. Two draughts were offered to our Lord: the one He refused, the other He accepted; the one which He refused was the 'vinegar mingled with gall' (Mt 27³⁴) or the 'wine mingled with bitter herbs of a narcotic tendency, and it was given in kindness to condemned malefactors to deaden pain. Our Lord refused the soporific; He would not meet death with His senses stupefied; but the undrugged wine which was offered to Him when He said 'I thirst,' He accepted. He would not add to His sufferings by refusing the cooling draught.

6. 'It is finished.'—The conflict is over and the victory won. Christ from His cross announces to the world that all is finished. Τετέλεσται. In one word He sums up the whole of man's redemption. Finished was all that prophecy had foretold and type foreshadowed. Finished was the work which His Father had given Him to do. He looks back on His life from the time when He said, 'Lo, I come to do thy will, O God' (He 10⁵), and is able to say with regard to every jot and tittle of His life's work, 'It is finished.' He has made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. We enter into no theory of the Atonement, we accept it as a fact; we know that the chasm between God and man, formed by the sin of man, has been bridged over, and that the way to the Father is open, for 'when He had overcome the sharpness of death, He opened the Kingdom of heaven to all believers' (Te Deum).

7. 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.'—The two last words were spoken in rapid succession. The word of victory is followed by the word of rest—rest after the burden and heat of the day. It is a word of calm, beautiful trust, of perfect sympathy between the Father and Son, revealing to us what death was to Christ and what it is to all those who are united to Christ by a living faith; that it is not a leap in the dark, not a plunge into an unknown void, but a going home. 'Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour until the evening' (Ps 104²³), and then cometh rest—rest with Christ in Paradise. Death is the summing up of the life; repeated acts form habits, habits form character, and character is the sum-total of the life, which we carry with us into the unseen world. To live the forgiven life, the life that is being formed and fashioned after the life of Christ, by the power of the Holy Ghost—this is the true preparation for death. This alone can rob death of its sting; one with Christ in our life, we shall be one with Him in our death. 'To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain' (Ph 1²¹). 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.'

SEVENTY.—The mission of the Seventy,* recorded in Lk 10, belongs to the third year of our Lord's public ministry. They were sent forth some time after the Transfiguration (10¹), when the Galilean ministry of Jesus had closed, and when He had 'set his face to go to Jerusalem' (9³¹). The mission of the Twelve had taken place in the previous year (9¹⁻¹⁰).† Seventy was regarded by the Jews as a complete number of persons for any important work.‡ Our Lord may have had specially in view (1) the seventy elders under Moses, who was a type of Himself; (2) the Hebrew tradition that the nations scattered at Babel were seventy in number (pseud.-Jon. Targ. on Gn 11⁸); § just as the appointment of the Twelve may have been suggested by the number of the tribes of Israel.

1. The office and mission of the Seventy resemble those of the Twelve.—(1) A twofold commission is given in each case to preach and to heal, Mt 10⁷⁻⁸, Lk 10⁹. (2) Instruction is given to both (a) to go in pairs, two and two, Mk 6⁷, Lk 10¹, in order to strengthen their testimony and to give mutual help and sympathy; (b) to take with them neither purse (for the labourer is worthy of his entertainment), nor wallet (for needless encumbrance was to be avoided), nor shoes, i.e. in addition to the sandals which they wore (for sandals befitted the poor, shoes the well-to-do), Mt 10⁸⁻¹⁰, Mk 6⁹, Lk 10⁴. || (3) In each case the burden of the message was 'Peace' and the 'Kingdom of God.' Peace was and still is the evangelium of the Kingdom; salutation;

* Some very ancient MSS (BDMR) read Seventy-two (ἑβδομήκοντα δύο); but NACLE, etc., omit δύο.

† Although only Luke mentions the Seventy, indications of Jesus having a wider circle of 'disciples' than the Twelve are found elsewhere, as in Jn 6⁶⁸, Ac 1¹⁸, 1 Co 15⁹.

‡ The descendants of Jacob who entered Goshen were seventy (Gn 46²⁷). Seventy elders assisted Moses in the work of judgment and instruction (Ex 18²² 24⁹, Nu 11¹⁶⁻²⁵). The Sanhedrin consisted of seventy besides the president (Hastings, DB iv. 399). The LXX is so called from the tradition (first told in a literary fiction usually ascribed to about B.C. 200) that seventy or, more exactly, seventy-two elders executed the version (Hastings' DB iv. 458). Josephus appointed seventy rulers of Galilee (J. J. ii. xx. 5).

§ Seventy-two, according to Clem. Recogn. ii. 42. See Driver, Dt. p. 355 f.

|| A somewhat similar prohibition existed (no staff, shoes, scrip, or purse) for those about to enter the Temple: so that this particular instruction to the Seventy may suggest that those sent forth were to perform their service in the spirit of worshippers (Edersheim, The Temple, etc. p. 42).

the Kingdom of God was the Jews' highest aspiration. The Seventy, however, like the Twelve, would use these words, doubtless, with a fresh significance. Peace would include peace with God as well as with men, peace of conscience, the peace of discipleship to a perfect Master (Mt 11²⁸⁻³⁰): the Kingdom of God would be, not a mere external, but an internal theocracy, the reign of God within as well as over men (Mt 12²⁸, Mk 4^{26, 27}); and this Empire of God was Peace. (4) In both instructions the warning is added that they would be as sheep or lambs amid wolves, Mt 10¹⁶, Lk 10³. The Seventy, like the Twelve, were to be prepared for persecution and tribulation. Even in Christ's lifetime there are indications of His followers being persecuted (Jn 9³⁴ 12¹⁰); and some of the Seventy at least were destined to suffer for Christ's sake.

2. On the other hand, there are important differences in the two commissions. (1) The mission of the Twelve was permanent; they were pre-eminently Christ's Apostles: that of the Seventy was temporary; they were only a body, from view, like the Seven of the office of evangelist, without Apostolic status, continues (Ac 21⁸, Eph 4¹¹). (2) The Twelve were not only to minister, but to administer—to exercise discipline and government (Jn 20²³, Ac 1²⁰⁻²⁶). To the Seventy no such functions were committed: they were simply preachers and healers. (3) The commission to the Twelve was expressly limited to 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not' (Mt 10⁵⁻⁶). It was expedient at first to postpone the obtrusive extension of the privileges of the Kingdom beyond the Jews, lest these should be prejudiced against the gospel. By the time, however, that the Seventy were sent forth, Christ Himself had gone into 'the borders of Tyre and Sidon' (in addition to His earlier visit to Samaria), and had healed the Syrophenician's daughter (Mk 7²⁴). His disciples had thus been educated so far into realization that the Kingdom was intended to embrace others than Jews. The restriction, accordingly, is omitted in the commission to the Seventy, although there is no positive evidence that any of them preached, at this time, to Gentiles. (4) The commission to the Twelve included not only healing, but raising from death: that to the Seventy omits the latter. It is notable that only Apostles in the special sense are ever represented in the NT as raising the dead (Ac 9⁴⁰ 20⁹⁻¹⁰). (5) A definite itinerary was arranged for the Seventy: they were to go 'into every city and place where Jesus himself intended to come' (Lk 10¹⁰), so as to prepare the way for Him. Their mission field thus included the country east of the Jordan, which was visited by our Lord during this closing year of His ministry. (6) A special feature of the directions to the Seventy was the injunction to 'salute no man by the way.' The 'time when he should be received up' was at hand: there were many places still to be visited; delay in preparing the way must be avoided; the profuse and elaborate salutations, customary on a journey, must be

3. Return of the Seventy (Lk 10¹⁷⁻²⁰). (1) Their return collectively is related; but we need not infer, what the nature of the case must have prevented, that they all returned simultaneously. As Christ approached some town or district in the itinerary, some pair out of the Seventy would report the outcome of their particular mission. (2) The Seventy return with exultation. Their satisfaction culminated in this: 'Even demons are subject to us in thy name.' There was something commendable, and something defective in their joy. It was right to rejoice in the power of exorcism, but there was a higher joy of which, apparently, they thought little, the joy of enrolment among the servants of God. Accordingly (3) the Lord (a) manifested His servants. 'I was watching Satan fall like lightning from heaven'; as if he had been 'in the air' in spirit during the progress of their mission. (b) He assures them of security against real harm from the powers of evil. Although they were among 'serpents and scorpions,' 'nothing shall in any wise hurt you'; a special providence would be their privilege. (c) He raises their aspirations to a higher level. Even to die in such a service would be 'gain'; their 'names are written in heaven' (cf. Is 43, Dn 12¹). They were fellow-workers with the King, whose cause, even should they suffer tribulation, must prevail.

* Gen'ic (Th' Holy Land and the Bible, i. pp. 328-329) describes graphically 'the salutation of two Orientals in Palestine even at the present day. On meeting, each lays his right hand on his heart, then raises it to his brow or mouth. Thereafter they take hold each of the other's hand, and a series of particular inquiries follows, taking up considerable time.

4. The credibility of the mission of the Seventy has been doubted by Strauss, Baur, de Wette,* and others, on account of: 1. the silence of the other Gospels respecting it; 2. the lack of later authentic trace of the Seventy; the close resemblance between the mission of the Seventy and that of the Twelve, being suggestive, it is argued, of confusion.

(1) The argument from silence is not strong; because, owing to the temporary character, so far as appears, of the commission, there was nothing in the organization of the Church, as it existed when the three Gospels were written, such as would constrain an Evangelist to relate the history of the Seventy; whereas the position and work of the Twelve made it natural, if not necessary, to give some account of the origin of the Apostolate. (2) The fact that Luke relates also the mission of the Twelve, and the notable differences (chronological and circumstantial) between the accounts of the two missions, render it highly improbable that the two narratives refer to a single event. (3) It is inaccurate to say that there is no authentic trace of the Seventy in later times. Philip 'the evangelist' was probably, from this designation (Ac 21⁸), one of them. Clement of Alexandria, writing in the latter part of the 2nd cent., names Barnabas, Matthias, and Cephas, who 'had the same name with the Apostle,' as others of the Seventy. The historian Eusebius, without giving names, states that the Barsabbas of Acts 1:23 was the same as the Silas mentioned in 1 Co 1¹ are said to have been of the same company.† The early disappearance of the Seventy as an organization is readily accounted for. They had no authority as rulers such as would make the appointment of successors requisite. One, as we have seen, became an Apostle; Philip became one of the 'Seven' of Ac 6; a considerable number were probably included in one or other of the orders of evangelists, prophets, pastors, and teachers (Eph 4¹¹). The individuals thus, for the most part, doubtless survived, and occupied more or less influential positions; although the office itself, like that of the 'Seven,' disappeared.

A printed, complete catalogue of the Seventy is given by pseudo-Dionysius (6th cent.) as follows:—James (brother of the Lord), Thimothe, Titus, Barnabas, Ananias, Stephen, Philip, Praxiteles, Nicanor, Simon, Nicolas, Parmenas, Cleopas, Silas, Simeon, Cleopas, Epenetus, Andronicus, Appulus, Urbanus, Stachys, Appelles, Aristobulus, Narcissus, Herodion, Rufus, Asyncritus, Philegon, Hermes, Hermas, Patrobas, Rhodion, Jason, Agabus, Linus, Gaius, Praxiteles, Onesimus, Sergius, Lucius, Tertius, Erastus, Philadelphus, Hermas, Demetrius, Quartus, Apollon, Cephas, Simeon, Cleopas, Cleopas, Marcus, Joseph Barsabbas, Athanas, Cleas, Cleas, Cleas.

5. The appointment . . . for a definite ministry, yet without . . . authority such as was conferred on the Twelve, is significant and instructive. Our Lord does not appear to have instituted any definite and detailed form of Church government, but to have left such outward arrangements to the Apostles as His chosen disciples, and through them eventually to the Church itself, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Yet the appointment of the Seventy clearly indicates the principle that Christian ministry, including preaching, is neither to be confined to those who bear rule, nor regarded as entitling those who exercise such ministry to receive office as rulers. On the one hand, some who are able to give valuable service to the Church as . . . or teachers may not be suitable, or even . . . may not be required at the time, for rulership. On the other hand, those who bear rule in the Church are not, in the spirit of hierarchical exclusiveness, to discourage brethren who (without having the faculty or opportunity of government) possess some useful gift, from exercising it under due . . . for the good of the Church and of the . . . at large.

SHAME.—1. Objectively = dishonouring treatment, that which causes shame; usually ἀτιμία, ἀτιμάζειν (Mk 12⁴, Lk 20¹³). Shame is mentioned in several passages of the OT which are usually applied to Christ's sufferings (Ps 44¹⁵ 69^{7, 19} 89⁴⁵, Is 50⁶); but the word is, curiously enough, never so used in the Gospels. He 12³ speaks of the shame (αἰσχύνη) of the cross, 13¹³ of Christ's reproach (ὀνειδισμός), and in 6⁶ those who fall from grace are said to crucify Him afresh and put Him to an open shame (παράδειγματιζεν). In Jn 8⁴⁹ the unbelieving Jews dishonour (ἀτιμάζω) Him, and in Ac 5⁴ the Apostles rejoice at suffering shame (ἀτιμασθήναι) for His name.

The shame which Christ in fact bore is seen specially in such incidents of the Passion as the night arrest as of a thief or robber, the spitting, the scourging and the mockings, the public procession through the streets of Jerusalem, the taunts, the stripping naked of His body, and the hanging side by side with criminals. But above all, it is seen in the manner of His death, the cross being peculiarly the death of shame.* In the passages in the Gospels which speak of crucifixion and taking up the cross (Mt 20¹⁹, Mk 8³⁴ etc.), though the prominent thought is that of suffering, the idea of shame and ignominy is undoubtedly present as well. This shame must be willingly borne both by Christ and by His followers.

2. Subjectively = the feeling of shame; usually αἰσχύνη and cognate words.† It is interesting to note that the typically Greek and almost untranslatable αἰδώς has practically dropped out of Biblical Greek. In the LXX it occurs twice in

Mac.; in NT only in 1 Ti 2⁹ μετὰ αἰδοῦς κ. σωφροσύνης ('with shamefastness and sobriety,' RV; 'shamefacedness,' AV*), and in TR of He 12²⁸ (AV 'reverence'), where edd. read δέους. It may be that, like such words as ἀρετή and φιλία, it was avoided as having a technical and unsuitable sense. In Homer and Hesiod it ranks high, being coupled with νέμεσις, and personified; it is the sense of what is due to oneself and others. Aristotle,† however, regards it not as a virtue, but an emotion (πάθος), which he does not consider very valuable to ethics. It is the fear of ἀδοξία, the loss of reputation, and, while proper to the νέος, it is out of place in the πρεσβύτερος or ἐπιεικής (the good man). They ought never to do, or wish to do, things that might evoke the feeling of shame.

Shame is not, then, a motive which we shall expect to find prominent in Christian ethics. Its essential idea being φόβος ἀδοξίας, it looks only to the varying standard of public opinion, to what people would say, or might be conceived of as saying if they knew. And its source is not the moral sense of right and wrong, but at best the feeling of propriety and decency. At its highest it is a neutral word. If it may sometimes deter from a wrong action, regarded as . . . is even more likely to deter from . . . as unpopular.

It is in this sense that it is most prominent in the Gospels. It may keep a man from honest work (Lk 16³). Christ warns those who are ashamed of Him and of His words, that He too will be ashamed of them (Mk 8³⁸, Lk 9²⁶; cf. Jn 12⁴³). It is this false shame that . . . repudiated by the Apostles (Ro . . . , 1 P 1¹⁷).

Shame may also follow an action; and here too the idea is not the conviction of sin, but the confusion which comes from discovery, though this may be an element in a future awakening of conscience. It is the fate of one who unduly exalts himself (Lk 14¹⁰). Christ's enemies are put to shame (13¹⁷), i.e. they are enraged at being exposed before the people. Though the word is not mentioned, it is presumably the feeling of the man who hid his talent or pound, when brought face to face with his master (Mt 25²⁴, Lk 19²⁰); and it is certainly implied in Jn 8⁹, whether the words 'convicted by their conscience' are genuine or not. The Pharisees are ashamed of being found exploiting a sin for their own ends.

It is possible that in the passage last quoted (the episode of the woman taken in adultery) we have an instance of shame in another aspect, the sympathetic shame evoked by sin in others. Christ was face to face with the type of sin which particularly rouses that feeling, and with a callous attempt on the part of His enemies to use that sin for their own advantage. He blushed for those who did not blush for themselves.

* He was seized with an intolerable sense of shame. He could not meet the eye of the crowd, or of the accusers, and perhaps at that moment least of all of the woman. . . . In his burning embarrassment and confusion he stooped down so as to hide his face, and began writing with his finger on the ground' (Seeley, Ecce Homo, ch. ix.).

We may note that the word is far rarer in the NT, and particularly in the Gospels, than in the OT. The typically Hebraic use of חָשָׁב = to be disappointed of a hope, is not found in the Gospels; it occurs in Ro 5⁵ 9³⁸ 10¹¹, 1 P 2⁶. In each case a quotation is implied or expressed, though, curiously enough, from a passage (Is 28¹⁶) where חָשָׁב does not occur in the Hebrew. The shame or reproach of childlessness, which is so prominent in the OT, is referred to in Lk 12²⁵.

Tychicus, Carpus, Euodius, Philemon, Zenas, Aquila, Priscas, Junias, Marcus (2), Aristarchus, Pudens, Trophimus, Lucas the Eunuch, Lazarus. The list is manifestly untrustworthy. With some probability, indeed, are included all the seven 'deacons' (so called), along with some others (as Barnabas, Barsabbas, Mnemon, Cyprian, Gaius, and Ananias), who were primitive Christians of the Diaspora or Palestine. But many others, including such names as Titus, Tychicus, Trophimus, and Apollos, who became converts long after our Lord's Ascension, are obviously the outcome of indiscriminating conjecture.

* See the well-known passage in Cic. in Verr. v. 66: 'Quid dicam in cruce tolli? Verbo satis digno tam nefaria res appellari nullo modo potest.'

† For distinction between αἰσχύνη and αἰδώς, see Trench, NT Syn. §§ 19, 20. The latter is the better word; 'αἰδώς would always restrain a good man from an unworthy act, while αἰσχύνη would sometimes restrain a bad one.'

SHEEP, SHEPHERD.—

ἀμνός, 'lamb': Jn 129. 36, Ac 8³², 1 P 1¹⁹; with the classical acc. plur. ἀμναι, Lk 10³ (where Cod. A reads -ελθων), and the diminutive from the same stem, ἀμνίον, in Jn 11 (NABCE); (of Christ) Rev. passim (56-223). All three words are used only figuratively in NT.

πρόβατον, 'sheep': Mt 936 1211. 12 1812, Lk 154. 6, Jn 214. 15 10, Rev 1813, and (figuratively) Mt 715 106. 16 1534 2532f. 2631, Mk 634 1427, Jn 10. 21 (1 P 1¹⁹) 17, Ac 832, He 1320, 1 P 225; its diminutive προβάτιον in Jn 216. 17 (B, C, Tisch., WH).

ποιμήν, 'flock': Lk 28, 1 Co 97, and (fig.) Mt 2631, Jn 1016; its diminutive ποίμνιον, always figurative, in Lk 1232, Ac 2028. 29, 1 P 52. 3.

ποιμήν, 'shepherd': Mt 936 2532, Mk 634, Lk 28. 15. 18. 20, Jn 102. 12, and (fig.) Mt 2631, Mk 1427, Jn 1011. 14. 16, Eph 411, He 1320, 1 P 225.

ἀρχιποιμήν, 'chief shepherd' (fig.), 1 P 54.
ποιμαίνω, 'shepherd', 'tend', a flock: Lk 177, 1 Co 97, and (fig.) Mt 28, Jn 2116, Ac 2022, 1 P 52, Jude12, Rev 227 717 125 1915.
βόσκω, 'feed a flock': Mt 830, Mk 511, Lk 832 1515; οἱ βόσκοντες, Mt 838, Mk 514, Lk 834. Βόσκω is fig. only in Jn 2115. 17.

1. The sheep of Palestine are still the broad-tailed breed of Biblical times (Ex 29²², Lv 39. 11 RV 'fat tail'). The tail is from 5 to 15 inches wide, and weighs from 10 to 15 lb., sometimes even as pure as 30 lb., supplying 10 lb. and upwards of pure fat, which is packed for winter use. The sheep are white, though some have brown faces: only the rams have horns. They 'find pasture' (Jn 10⁹) in the lower lands in winter and on the mountains in summer, the best pastures being in S. Palestine (the Negeb and Gerar) and on the plain to the E. of the Jordan; but even 'the pastures of the wilderness' (Ps 65¹², Jl 2²²) are welcome in spring, when grass and flowers have grown which are burnt up in summer. The shepherd leads his sheep (Jn 10⁴) during the day in the cool months, but in the hotter part of the year from sunset to . . . when he brings them back to the fold (vv. 4-6) or leaves them to lie under a prepared shelter in the bushes (Ca 17). The fold (αὐλή) is a low flat shed or series of sheds, with a yard surrounded by a wall (Jn 10¹; cf. Nu 32¹⁶, Jg 5¹⁶, Zeph 2⁹); on cold nights the flocks are shut in the buildings. The wall is surmounted by a fence of sharp thorns to keep out the wolves (Jn 10¹²) and other wild beasts (Is 31⁴, 1 S 17³⁴); jackals and hyænas prey almost up to the walls of Jerusalem, while leopards and panthers often leap over the high fence of the fold, and the shepherd is still at times known 'to lay down his life for the sheep' (Jn 10¹¹). Robbers are as great a source of danger; a lamb or a kid is sometimes carried off by a bird of prey, and there are deadly snakes in the limestone rocks. The Gospel parable does not exaggerate the rejoicing of the shepherd when he has recovered a sheep that has gone astray 'upon the mountains' (Mt 18¹²⁻¹⁴, Lk 15⁴).

The shepherd keeps watch by night in the open air (Lk 28, cf. Nah 3¹⁸), sometimes using a temporary shelter or a shepherd's tent (Ca 18, Is 38¹²), which recalls the nomad habits of the early Israelites and their Semitic ancestors (He 11⁹, Gn 4²⁰). On the march he carries a bag or wallet (Mt 10¹⁰), a staff (Mt 10⁸, Ps 23⁴), and a sling (1 S 17⁴⁰). At the watering-places (Ps 23²) the sheep answer to the shepherd's call (Jn 10³⁻⁴), and, when they have drunk, move on at his word to make room for another flock. A shepherd is sometimes followed by several flocks, but each comes or goes at a separate call, and he often knows each sheep by a name (Jn 10³). Sheep-dogs (Job 30¹) are not mentioned in the NT, but they must have been used, as they are still, to protect the flock and keep the sheep together.

2. Sheep were used for food (Rev 18¹³), and their milk for drink (1 Co 97, Dt 32¹⁴); their skins were used for tents and for a baggy kind of coat (μῆλωρ, He 11³⁷). The importance of sheep to a pastoral people like the Israelites is emphasized by one of their favourite names, Rachel, which means 'ewe' (W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem. 2 311), and by the choice of a lamb for the Paschal Supper in their most sacred festival. Every morning, also, and every evening, they had to offer in sacrifice 'a he-lamb without blemish for a continual burnt-offering' (Nu 28³⁻⁶), with two he-lambs in addition every Sabbath day (v. 9). Seven he-lambs and one ram were required at every new moon, on every day of the Passover, and at the Feast of Weeks (vv. 16-31), at the Feast of Trumpets, and on the Day of Atonement (29¹⁻¹¹). At the Feast of Tabernacles (vv. 12-38) this offering was included on the eighth day, but was doubled on each of the first seven days, with varying numbers of bullocks. Goats were generally used for . . . but a leper in the day of his cleansing . . . had to bring a he-lamb for a guilt-offering, besides a he-lamb for a burnt-offering and a ewe-lamb, the two latter being commuted for a pair of turtle-doves in the case of the poor (Lv 14¹⁰⁻²²). Any of the common people, also, might substitute for the male goat of the ordinary sin-offering a female lamb without blemish (Lv 4⁷⁻⁸). This peculiar offering of sheep was a Semitic practice which is found also in ancient Cyprus, and was adopted by Epimenides at Athens when he was summoned from Crete to purify the city from the Alcæonid pollution (W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem. 2 note G).

3. The interest of these sacrificial requirements centres in the NT round the representation of Christ as 'the Lamb' (Rev 5⁶ 22³). To some extent, of course, the figure is suggested by 'the meekness and gentleness of Christ' (2 Co 10¹, Mt 11²⁹), the perfect realization in Him of the spirit of beautiful confidence and loving obedience which we associate with Ps 23 (cf. Eccle Homo, chs. i. and ii. pp. 5, 6, 10, 12). But where the figure is explained, it is always in a sacrificial sense: 'He was led as a sheep to the slaughter' (Ac 8³²); 'redeemed . . . with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, (even the blood) of Christ' (1 P 1¹⁸⁻²⁰); 'a Lamb standing as though it had been slain'; 'worthy is the Lamb that hath been slain' (Rev 5⁶⁻¹²); 'the book of life of the Lamb that hath been slain from the foundation of the world' (Rev 13⁸). In the same way John the Baptist hailed Jesus of Nazareth as 'the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1²⁹). It is superfluous to say (with Alford) that the reference is not to the Paschal lamb, 'which did not suggest atonement for sin'; on every day of the feast, as we have seen, lambs were offered as a burnt-offering; and if it was not Passover-time when John spoke, his hearers would readily understand his meaning from the sin-offering of the poor, or the morning and evening sacrifice of every day. These kept before the eyes of all Israelites the principle of substitution, the surrender of another life for the human life that was forfeited or consecrated (He 11⁴ 10¹⁰). John may have uttered his prophecy at the time of the regular evening sacrifice, the time at which the prophecy was afterwards to be fulfilled (Mt 27⁴⁹); but the language of Is 53⁷⁻¹² would of itself explain the meaning of his words. The correspondence of Christ's death with a sin-offering is distinctly assumed in He 13¹⁰⁻¹³, and St. Paul also sees in the occurrence of that death at Passover-time the true Passover sacrifice of the Lamb (1 Co 5⁷). We need not be concerned to limit to any one

† A similar idea may be implied in the words ascribed to our Lord in Jn 11⁴⁰, where, with reference to the release of Lazarus from the grave, Jesus says to Martha: 'Said I not unto thee, that, if thou believedst, thou shouldst see the glory of God?'

(b) 1 P 4¹⁴ 'the (Spirit) of glory and the Spirit of God' (τὸ τοῦ δόξης καὶ τοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ πνεῦμα). Here 'glory' may=Shekinah, which is identified with Christ. This identification may be seen more clearly, perhaps, in (c) Ja 21 τὸν πῶτον τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τῆς δόξης, which not 'glory' but 'the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Shekinah' (Nag. 17). For further doubtful ref. in the NT, see below.

There can be no doubt that the word σκηνή, 'tabernacle' (and its verb σκηνοῦν, 'to tabernacle'), has been chosen for use in Jn 1¹⁴ and Rev 21³ from its likeness both in sound and meaning to the word Shekinah, and conveys a direct allusion to the latter. The Revelation passage runs: 'Behold the tabernacle (σκηνή) of God is with men, and he will tabernacle (σκηνώσει) with them.' In Jn 1¹⁴ 'The Word (Logos) . . . tabernacled (ἐσκήνωσεν) among us, and we beheld his glory,' etc., all the three Hebrew terms, Memra (מְרָמָה=ὁ λόγος), Shekinah, and Yefkara (דְּבָרָא=מְרָמָה) are represented. 'All the three entities became incarnate in Jesus.'*

The identification of Jesus with the Shekinah has already been referred to above in connexion with 1 P 4¹⁴ and Ja 21. Another example where the same idea may be implicit is Mt 18²⁰ 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them'; compare with this Pirke Aboth iii. 5: 'Two that sit together and are occupied with words of Torah, have the Shekinah among them.' Cf. also 2 Co 4⁶ 'God that said, Out of darkness light shall shine, is he who shone in our hearts for the illumination of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.' The last phrase may=the glory of God made manifest in the presence of Jesus Christ, i.e. Jesus is the Shekinah of God. Shekinah in 'God with us').

'her of the glory' [ὁ

πατήρ τῆς δόξης]=? 'the father of the Shekinah (incarnate in Jesus)', Lk 22²⁸ ('the glory of thy people Israel'). Cf. also 1 Co 2⁸ (Jesus 'Lord of glory'). The representation of man as a temple in which God dwells (cf. 2 Co 6¹⁶ 'we are a temple of the living God', Jn 14²³ 'we will come . . . and make our abode with him') was probably suggested by the Shekinah-idea, which may also have influenced the language applied to Christ in Col 2⁹ ('for in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily').

In the identification of the Shekinah and . . . with the incarnate Christ, 'a use is made Dalman says, 'which is at variance with their primary application.' It marks a specifically Christian development. The way had certainly been prepared by Jewish apocalyptic tendencies.

SHELAH.—A Judahite ancestor of our Lord (Lk 3³⁸).

SHEM.—The patriarch, mentioned as a link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3³⁸).

SHEWBREAD, 'bread of the face or presence' (lehem pānīm), was placed on a special table in the Holy Place, in the presence of God. This was a very ancient custom in Israel, and is found also among other Semitic peoples. The bread was originally . . . to eat, but, of course, this early . . . consist; the bread, however, was still held to imply the presence of God, and His acceptance of the worship rendered to Him.

Shewbread is mentioned in the Gospels on only one occasion, Mt 12⁴ || Mk 2²⁶ and Lk 6⁴. Jesus and His disciples, passing through the cultivated fields on the Sabbath, were plucking the ears of grain, rubbing out the kernels, and eating them. They were challenged by the Pharisees for doing what was unlawful on the Sabbath. The plucking of grain without instrument, while walking through another's field, was . . . involved was interpreted as harvesting and threshing, which were forbidden on the Sabbath. Jesus replied to the Pharisees by citing two illustrations . . . to Mt.), one of which was an act of David as recorded in 1 S 21¹⁻⁶. In David's flight from Saul he had come to Nob, to Ahimelech the priest. He was hungry, and asked for food for himself and his men. There was no bread at hand except the shewbread, which, after lying on the table for the week, had been replaced by fresh bread. The bread is described as 'holy.' There is no hint in the passage that David did an unlawful thing in eating the bread. He did not do it without due deliberation, for the question of the legality was expressly raised by the priest. Before giving the men the bread, he asked if they were 'clean.' This was his one concern, and, being satisfied on this point, he readily gave it to them. If it had been unlawful for any to eat except the priests, that surely would have been stated, and the 'cleanness' would have been of no moment. In case the parley is considered, as it may be, to have been the effort of later tradition to clear the king from the charge of breaking the law, in the matter, the state of the case is not altered. The passage seems to show that no law was knowingly broken in the transaction.

Jesus, however, says that it was unlawful. The statement is in accord with the Jewish law of His day, which can be traced back to a provision of the Priests' Code from post-exilic times (Lv 24⁹), which says that the shewbread was for the priests, and must be eaten by them in the Holy Place. Such an act as David's was illegal in the time of Christ; it was not illegal in the time of David. The real issue between Jesus and the Pharisees in Mt 12 was the extent to which such laws as that of the Sabbath were binding. The Jews held that the law was eternal, unchangeable, supreme. Jesus held that it was 'for man,' and the Son of Man was lord of it. More recently the argument of Jesus has been vastly strengthened by the . . . of the gradual development of the OT . . . According to the Jews, their great king had violated the Law, and the only justification was the stress of his hunger; but to use this argument to justify David was in effect to acknowledge the very principle upon which Jesus acted in allowing His disciples to pluck the grain.

SHILLING.—See MONEY.

SHIP.—See BOAT.

SHOE.—See SANDAL.

SHORE.—See BEACH.

SICK, SICKNESS.—See DISEASE.

SICKLE (δρέπανον).—The crops in Palestine are, to this day, reaped almost entirely with the sickle (Mk 4²⁹). The scythe is seldom seen save in the hands of a foreigner, and the whirr of the reaping machine is still unknown. δρέπανον is the LXX equivalent of two Heb. words קַרְבַּשׁ and קַלָּה which seem to have been two names for the same thing. The Palestinian sickle is a little longer than our common shearing-hook; the blade describes a somewhat wider curve, and the point, instead of terminating sharply, is slightly curved backward. Sometimes the edge is toothed like a saw, but oftener it is plain and sharp like our own hook. The total length of handle and blade is from 18 to 24 inches.

SIDON (for much of common reference, see TYRE).

* Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 231. To these should be added the great passage in He 1³, where the Son is said to be the 'effulgence of the glory,' i.e. of the Shekinah-glory as 'the manifested Deity.'

—A narrow, rocky district as well as a once famous city in Phœnicia, the city being 30 miles S. of Beirût and 26 miles slightly N. by E. of Tyre, and 60 miles N. of Capernaum. Like nearly all settlements on the east coast of the Mediterranean, Sidon owed its location to certain prominent rocks in the sea, which at first served as a breakwater, and then, through gradual connexion with the land, produced a northern and a southern harbour, the latter now filled with sand.

Sidon is so ancient that all certainty as to the origin of its name has vanished. Some have deemed it 'fishing'-town, others the seat of the worship of a deity Sid. Sidon and the Sidonians are heard of earlier and more influentially than Tyre, which finally distanced its northern rival. All the Phœnician cities seem to have known little but rivalry down to the appearance of such world-powers as Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Greece, and Rome, which made them all, sooner or later, subject and abject. Each had its 'king,' its 'god,' its colonies, its coinage. Each sent its trading vessels seaward to the Mediterranean world; landward, each was in touch with the markets of Damascus and the East by means of those caravans of 'ships of the desert'; each sat as queen over a semicircular domain with a radius of some 15 to 20 miles. Through faction in the 8th cent. B.C. Sidon lost many of her merchants, chiefly to Tyre. At length her limited territory, her merely commercial aim, her being sapped by colonization and dissension, her final surrender of leadership to Tyre, combined with her conquests by the world-powers, left her under the Romans in the days of Christ a merely provincial capital, richer in the vices of ancient paganism than in its virtues. Some from Sidon were in the multitude that thronged Jesus at the Sea of Galilee (Mk 3⁸), and Sidon was pronounced more excusable in the day of judgment than the more favoured cities of Jesus' own country and race (Mt 11²⁴). The present Saida has about 10,000 inhabitants, and is surrounded by delightful orange groves, beneath which lie archeological treasures. Beirût, with its Damascus railway and its harbour, has robbed Sidon of its last vestige of commerce.

In a sense Sidon was, and in another sense was not, within the limits of the Holy Land. In the ideal distribution of Canaan recorded in Joshua the lot of Asher would seem to have included about all of Phœnicia, extending 'even unto great Sidon' (Jos 19²⁸). The coast cities and their daughter villages, however, remained utterly unconscious of their assignment, while Asher became so assimilated thereto as to retain in Israelitish history little more than a name.

The RV declares that Jesus 'came through Sidon,' a distinct and exact statement unknown to the AV; and thereon depends our conception whether or not Jesus Himself, from choice, ever went into the way of the Gentiles. Many points as to the primariness, structure, and transmission of the Gospels are illustrated by this case.

Mt 15²¹ AV

v. 21 Then Jesus went thence, and departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. v. 22 And, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, etc.

Mt 7²⁴ AV

v. 24 And from thence he arose, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, and entered into an house, and would have no man know it: but he could not be hid. For a certain woman, etc. [A Greek].

v. 29 And Jesus departed from thence, and came nigh unto the sea of Galilee; and went up into a mountain, and sat down there.

v. 31 And again, departing from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he came unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis. [East of the Jordan].

After the Revisers' most conscientious work, with their better evidence, this is the form in which we read the same:

And Jesus went out thence, and withdrew into the parts of Tyre and Sidon. And, behold, a Canaanitish woman came out from those borders, etc.

And from thence he arose, and went away into the borders of Tyre and Sidon. And he entered into an house, and would have no man know it: and he could not be hid. But straightway a woman, etc. [A Greek].

Marg. 'Some ancient authorities omit and Sidon.'

And Jesus departed thence, and came nigh unto the sea of Galilee; and he went up into the mountain, and sat there.

And again he went out from the borders of Tyre, and came through Sidon unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the borders of Decapolis.

B. W. . . . the 'some ancient authorities' of RVm, and reads: Jesus 'went away into the borders of Tyre. . . . And again he went out from the borders of Tyre, and came through Sidon unto the sea of Galilee,' etc. Thus the primary Gospel of Mark, the more ancient Sinaitic and Vatican MSS, Professor Weiss, and the Revisers do not hesitate to depict Jesus as entering Gentile territory (twice), entering a (probably) heathen house, and dispensing blessings upon a pagan woman, going then yet farther 'through Sidon' and Decapolis. The more theological First Evangelist, however, and the judicious transcribers disliked so to state the case. So Edersheim: the 'house in which Jesus sought shelter and privacy would, of course, be a Jewish home'; and 'by "through Sidon" I do not understand the town of that name, which would have been quite outside the Saviour's route, but the territory of Sidon' (Life and Times, ii. 38, 44).

Anything like a direct 'route' from the Israelitish borders of Tyre, or of Tyre and Sidon,—for Edersheim emphasizes Matthew's indication that the woman came from her territory to that of Jesus,—would take one in a south-easterly direction, and therefore away from Sidon. Accordingly, Jesus' choice to go in a northerly direction, 'through Sidon,' shows that He was not 'near and direct and usual 'route,' but . . . was seeking travel into heathen territory. Mk's connexion indicates that Jesus journeyed into the Gentile land with His disciples, on the occasion of the abolition of the Levitical distinctions as to the clean and unclean, so as to give to His journey a more complete and object lesson as to the same. Sidon on the coast was for this reason included, as was the bordering Decapolis. It was at Cæsarea, a similar Gentile city almost 100 miles nearer Jerusalem, that St. Peter received his fuller lesson on the same subject.

SIFTING.—The vb. 'sift' (Gr. συνίω, fr. σύνω, a late word for a sieve) occurs only in Lk 22³¹. Two varieties of sieve were used for sifting, the finer particles of substances from . . . (see art. AGRICULTURE). Scripture refers to the sieve and the process of sifting only rarely (Is 30²⁵, Am 9⁹, Lk 22³¹), but is full of the idea of sifting. In this process the methods of different industries join to give force to the metaphor which they supply. Of these farming is the chief, with its floors, fans, etc. (Mt 3¹², Lk 3¹⁷). The preparation of wine also enters in with its emptying from vessel to vessel (Jer 48¹¹). The refining of metals (Is 1²⁵, Mal 3²), too, contributes to the contents of the idea of sifting. All these moralize it. It concentrates on character. St. Peter and his fellow-disciples [plur. διδάσ] are sifted; Pharisees strain out gnats (Mt 23²⁴); evil work avoids the sifting of the light (Jn 3²⁰). The ministries of John, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit (Jn 16⁸), all have this trait—they sift men. Yet Jesus is Himself sifted by Satan, whose 'findings' are nil (Jn 14³⁰), while, also, the disciples are not above the Master. 'As the wheat in the sieve is shaken backwards and forwards, and thus the refuse separates itself from the grain, and falls out; so Satan wishes to trouble you and toss you about (by vexations, terrors, dangers, afflictions) in order to bring your faithfulness to me to decay' (Meyer's Luke 22³¹).^{*} The case of St. Peter is not singular. St. Paul underwent the process (Ph 3⁷, 2 Co 6⁴⁰). The sifting is a law of life. All the Father's chastenings are with a view to sift His children as wheat. It is of the essence of the ways of God with men alike in providence and grace. Its place in that economy is among the final, not initial, processes. Readier and rougher means of grace have their earlier day; this is a delicate, even final, means of dealing with the finest of the wheat.

SIGHING.—The expression of trouble by means of στενάζω. This expression is used in the Gospels by our Lord twice, both times in St. Mark's Gospel. It is expressed in 7³⁴ by the word στενάζω—in the LXX the equivalent of πένω—and in 8¹² by the compound ἀναστενάζω. In both instances the words appear in this Gospel alone, and only in these passages. The expression is evidently meant to convey the fact of the Lord's sympathy with men. In the first, the healing of the deaf and dumb man, our Lord felt the burden of the disease which He was about to cure. And here the expression is associated with prayer on His part: 'And, looking up to heaven, he sighed.' In the second, where a stronger expression is used through the compound, the Pharisees are asking for a sign, and He 'sighed in his spirit,' evidently thinking of the speedy appearance of the sign for which they asked, and mourning over the terrible nature which it would bear. On the 'groaning' of Jn 11³⁸,³⁸ see ANGER in vol. i. p. 62^b.

SIGHT.—Christ rejoiced in His power of restoring sight to the physically blind (see below), and points to it as a most fitting exercise for One sent of God (Mt 11⁵, Lk 7²¹⁻²²; see also art. SIGN). When He speaks of Himself as Deliverer, in terms borrowed from Isaiah combining Is 61¹ and 42⁶⁻⁷), one of the objects of the commission He announces is the recovering of sight to the blind (Lk 4¹⁸⁻¹⁹). At that rapt moment of high spiritual vision it is certain that, while bodily sight was restored to the blind, the emphasis lies on the higher vision He had come to impart. The need of man for true inward sight, for the knowledge of God and of self, was ever central to Jesus. That men should see Him and thus see the Father was the one burning passion of His life (Jn 14⁹, cf. 16¹²⁻¹³, 17^{3, 6, 25-26}). That men should have the capacity of vision and yet be blind to the true significance of Himself and His work, was a sincere embarrassment to Him (Mk 8¹⁸).

In Mt 6²² and Lk 11³⁴⁻³⁵ He employs bodily sight with its commanding relation to the whole of human activities as an image of inward vision. The eye was the means of guidance and surety and power to the whole body—the lamp (λύχνος) of the body. If the eye be unperforated 'single,' or, literally, 'simple,' ἀπλοῦς, the whole body is lighted for all the work it has to do. If 'evil' (πονηρός), the whole body is darkened, and every part of the complex activity is rendered inefficient if not impossible. So of the inward, mental and spiritual eye. The power of vision is central. If that capacity to see things as they are be unimpaired, the man can be and do that for which God created him. But the man who has lost his power of inward sight is enveloped in the deepest and most hopeless gloom. If the light in a man be darkness, how great is that darkness! On Mt 13¹², see PARABLE, p. 315 f.; and on Jn 19³⁰, see SEEING.

In our Lord's healing of the multitude which the Gospels on several occasions record, cases of blindness were found, loss of sight being then as now common in Syria. The common cause of loss of sight was and is ophthalmia, which varied in severity from a minor form causing redness of the lids and loss of the eyelashes, to an extreme form affecting the whole eyeball, lachrymal ducts, the glands, eyelids and lashes, and resulting in the total destruction of sight and the eyeball. The disease is still prevalent in the East, and especially in Syria, being traceable to the intensity of light and heat, and to the strong winds bearing sand and other injurious matter. The matter secreted from the inflamed glands is also transferred to other persons, making the disease highly contagious. Ophthalmia might also give rise to blindness from birth, by causing permanent opacity of the cornea.

Other affections of the parts connected with the organ of vision might produce blindness, e.g., affection of the nerves. Mt 12²² was a case of this kind, being probably also complicated with nervous disorder. The blindness, deafness, and dumbness point to some serious defect or disease in the nervous tissue which controls the organs of vision, hearing, and speech; and the mental disorder is organically connected with the cerebral disorganization.

As a rule, the cases of loss of sight are not sufficiently described to enable us to know what particular cause produces the blindness. Mt 9²⁷⁻³¹ is a case in point, the interest of the narrative being the quick faith of the blind and the sympathetic response of Jesus. The case of the man blind from his birth may have been due to any of the causes above mentioned, or to cataract (Jn 9). The feature of our Lord's cure of the blind is narrated in the above instances—His touching of the eyes. The blind man of Bethsaida (Mk 8²²⁻²⁶) was treated similarly. Twice Jesus laid His hands upon the blind eyes. Also He spit upon his eyes—having previously gently led him by the hand out of the village. He spoke to him also of the healing which they both desired, and called forth the energy of the man in response to His own power: 'Seest thou aught?' In this instance a process was observable in the recovery, or possibly there is indicated the difficulty in one who had never seen of being able to interpret to himself new sensations. In Jn 9 we note that Jesus speaks concerning the cure to be wrought. His words in Jn 9³⁻⁵ would be spoken in the hearing of the one to be healed, and would have a salutary effect in restoring hopefulness to one who might not unnaturally have given up all hope of restoration. The eyes are anointed with clay and saliva, and the man sent in the obedience of a strong faith to a distant pool.

These two instances in which our Lord uses saliva recall the familiar folk-lore of curing sore eyes. The use of saliva, especially of fasting saliva, for bleared eyes, still persists. The Talmud ascribes special efficacy to the saliva of an eldest son. Royal saliva was greatly in request for healing purposes, and an instance is recorded of Vespasian using his saliva with excellent effect, after having first inquired of the physician if the malady were curable (Tacitus, Hist. iv. 2; Suetonius, Vespasian, 7). Our Lord's use of saliva, or of saliva and clay, had no connexion with these as physical remedies, but may have been designed to concentrate the mind of the patients, who were assisted with the remedy. And it is significant that all the action of Jesus was upon the psychological side. The means taken were exactly adapted to call out the response of the patient, and to evoke a real co-operation between Healer and healed. Cf. the means used in Mk 8²²⁻²⁶, and for the deaf mute in Mk 7³¹⁻³⁵, the signs employed being evidently meant for the one to be restored.

^{*} Note that the point of the comparison lies in the shaking. Satan aims at destruction; Jesus is thinking of purification as the real result. Christ comes with His fan to get rid of chaff (Mt 3¹²); Satan sifts in order to get rid of wheat. For, as Thomas Fuller says somewhere, when Satan comes with his sieve, he desires to find the chaff and not the wheat.

We may note (1) that both Jn. and Mk. in the last two cases, give substantially the same account of the methods employed by Jesus. Considering the wide difference in the standpoint of the two writers, this is most significant, and indicates clearly that both descriptions are drawn from life, and that the actual method of Jesus was remembered and so far understood as to be regarded as memorable. (2) The suggestive likeness between the action of Jesus and modern therapeutic methods. Not that these deeds of Jesus are explained by the latter, but that the Divine life manifested in Him did not work on totally different lines, although His method completely overpassed and overwhelmed them in essential power. SIGN (σημεῖον, signum).—The Gospels contain many references to signs in connexion with the anticipations of Messiah's advent and with the life and work of Jesus Christ. But the various shades and degrees of meaning attached to the word 'sign' by the Jews, and the people generally, must be carefully discriminated by a close regard to the particular occasion on which it is employed. Most of all must distinction be made between the value placed upon the word by the people of our Lord's time and by our Lord Himself.

1. The fixed expectation of the generation into which Jesus was born, that signs would be associated with every true prophet and reformer and supremely with the Messiah, that marvellous events, largely of a material character, would occur in connexion with every authoritative teacher, and with every manifestation of the will of God, was part of the mental fabric of the Jewish people. The depth to which this expectation penetrated into the general consciousness may be judged by the traces of it in the Apostolic writers and in those trained under their influence. The Apostles generally did not easily throw aside Jewish preconceptions in regard to the kind of phenomena which might be expected to accompany a Messianic advent or a Divine revelation. Although they lay the main emphasis on the ethical and spiritual elements of Christian authority, the lower conceptions persist, and often no clear distinction is made between the σημεῖον and the τέρας (cf. Mt 24²⁶, Mk 13²⁴, Lk 21^{11, 26}, Ac 2²², He 2⁴, 2 Co 12¹², Rev 12¹ 13¹⁸ 15¹ 16¹⁴ 19²⁰, 2 Th 2^{8, 9}).

It is abundantly clear that the general assumption was made that credentials of a striking and material character must be demanded of the Messiah as a proof of the authority of His teaching and Person. Repeatedly the Jews, and especially the scribes, Pharisees, and Sadducees (see below), pressed this demand upon Jesus. They wanted a clear convincing proof of His authority. The signs they had seen were possible by collusion with the powers that rule the lower world, by a compact with Beelzebub (Mk 3²²). Only a sign in the heavens would satisfy them. Clearly what they sought was of the nature of a prodigy, properly to be classed with the τέρατα, with which our Lord steadfastly refused to have any part or lot. Similarly, Herod's desire to see Jesus was animated by his wish to see a miracle (σημεῖον) performed by Him. We can be sure that what Herod desired had more relation to prodigies, as most in harmony with his nature and suited to his capacity, and the word used is due to the Evangelist, who himself drew no clear line between the σημεῖον and the τέρατα (Lk 23⁸).

2. Our Lord's attitude towards signs.—Indications are given that the common expectation of signs on the part of His generation was not without its solicitation to Him. The temptation in the wilderness was an urgent pressure on the noblest side of His nature to give a sign of this character with the view of gaining a more speedy influence over the people (Mt 4⁵⁻⁷, Lk 4⁹⁻¹²). The temptation was resisted and overcome. Our Lord would put no trust in external and magical signs for the furtherance of His work or the emphasizing of His authority. He knew their purpose and their real conviction to men (Lk 16²¹). And the strenuous effort of His life was to resist these unspiritual conceptions of truth and reality.

The request for a sign in confirmation of His teaching He uniformly refused. The apparent response in Jn 2¹⁸ is no exception. The sign He would give would be granted only in its due place as His career was consummated by His own resurrection. Jn 6²⁶ contains an apparent commendation of those who accepted Him because of His wonder-working, but it was only a relative commendation in comparison with the far lower spirit which was unconcerned about any spiritual authority so long as their physical wants were easily and bountifully provided. Lk 7¹¹⁻¹⁷ on the surface appears to be a sign given for the sake of convincing John the Baptist, and if ever our Lord could have departed from His habitual way, it was to help that lone prisoner, suffering mental and spiritual anguish because the work Messiah was doing was so unlike what he had expected—deeds of quiet beneficence instead of sharp vengeance against iniquity. But the action sprang out of the Divine impulse as our Lord, deeply moved by John's doubt, realized afresh that to bless and heal men was the truest mark of One sent of God.

Jesus resolutely and uniformly refused to give any external sign for the purpose of evidencing His claims, and only in the most chary manner spoke of His miracles as signs. He chose rather to call them ἔργα ('works') arising out of the need of man and prompted by His own inner life in response to that need (see art. MIRACLES). His works were 'signs' because they were part of His whole revelation of God, and elsewhere He regards opportunities for His miracles as occasions for the manifestation of the works of God (Jn 9³), or for the glorifying of Himself (11⁴). Self-manifestation and Divine revelation were identical in the mind of Jesus (14¹⁸). Clearly our Lord only refrained from applying the word σημεῖον to His miracles because of the general associations of the word. To Him they were vital parts of the revelation of Divine power which He came to give.

A very particular and urgently-pressed demand for a sign 'in the heavens' is recorded in Mt 12²⁸⁻⁴¹ 16¹⁻⁴, Mk 8¹¹⁻¹², and Lk 11¹⁶. 29-32. The various accounts give a full idea of the occasion, or occasions. Mk. records the astonishment and bewilderment of Jesus at such a claim made by those who professed to be religious leaders. In an age which was full of signs, in which He Himself had been the most signal manifestation of the Divine presence and power, these religious teachers were still asking for signs. 'Why doth this generation seek after a sign? No sign shall be given.' Mt. and Lk. record our Lord's answer that no sign should be given but that of Jonah. Lk. gives the explanation of that sign to the Ninevites as consisting in the man and his message, not in his deliverance from the sea-monster, which they could only have believed on the strength of their faith in the man himself. Mt. gives a different interpretation, as also does Mt. 12⁴⁰, which seems a consistent whole and regards Jonah's preaching as a sign. Mt. 12⁴⁰, with its parallel to the Gospels, Jesus, must be regarded as an afterthought incorporated incongruously into the narrative. And the chief point is that our Lord declares that the one Divine sign to that generation was Himself, the Son of Man, His Person and His teaching. Simeon, under the exaltation of the Spirit, gives expression to the same essential truth (Lk. 22⁶). Jesus entirely severs Himself from the common conception of a sign. A sign was the prodigy desired by an evil generation. His 'works' were signs in the truer and higher sense of having in them a spiritual and Divine significance, and as pointing to greater possibilities of soul and higher relations of reality. They were signs of the Divine power and life which dwelt in Himself.

Jn 10⁴¹, declaring the embarrassment felt by those who were conscious of the truth of the Baptist's message regarding Christ, together with the fact that he 'wrought no sign,' is witness that more spiritual conceptions were breaking through the ancient crust of superstition. And the Fourth Gospel is evidence that one Gospel was able to disentangle the spiritual from the material and catastrophic. The conceptions of Christ's power set forth in this Gospel are of a distinctly more spiritual order. The word used by the writer is invariably σημεῖον (Jn 2¹¹ 3² 4⁵⁴, etc.), and there are plain indications that the truer and higher significance was attached to it. The value of the sign is seen to be its revealing quality. The miracle of the Cana-marriage is described as the beginning of His signs, in which He manifested forth His glory (ἐφανερώσε τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ), and the disciple had truly apprehended the Master's teaching.

SILENCE. — 'Speech is of time, Silence is of Eternity. Thou wilt not work except in Silence; neither will Virtue work except in Secrecy.' Carlyle's words (Sart. 151) are well known and profoundly true. The silences of great men are often more significant and self-revealing than their words. Silence has an eloquence that speech cannot rival. It is in silence that souls meet and strong emotions pass from one to the other. This is peculiarly true of Jesus, whose character can never be fathomed without a special study of His silences. The sayings of Jesus are limpid gems of ethical thought, flawless in their purity, enunciating principles of universal applicability. His deeds are the perfect expression of His sinless nature. But His silences are as essentially significant of the impression He made upon the world, for they reveal His inner atmosphere in which He lived and His attitude to human life and to the problems of human nature.

1. For thirty years after His advent, Jesus was silent as to His mission. He allowed Himself ample time for the natural development of all His powers and faculties. He passed through the ordinary phases of childhood, boyhood, youth, and attained the maturity of manhood before He took up the burden of His brief career. It is the lesson of self-repression, of concentrated preparation for a great work. Jesus took no step He was obliged on maturer consideration to retract.

2. And before He took up His lifework there is a still deeper and more significant silence, the silence of the Temptation (Mt 4¹⁻¹¹, Mk 1^{12,13}, Lk 4¹⁻¹³). Acts are but symbols, the true human drama is the drama of the soul. All epoch-making events have been lived through by some human soul before they emerged into the arena of history. It was in the monastery of Erfurt that the Reformation was wrought out. It was in the cave of Manresa its victorious progress was stayed. And it was in the wilderness that Jesus lived His life, fought His tremendous battle with evil, faced every possible contingency of temptation, and came out victorious. In the silence of His own great soul was the campaign finished and the adversary baffled.

3. After the ordeal in the wilderness, Jesus began His active career, which was merely the symbol and seal of the victory already gained. The Synoptists are uniform in asserting that during the greater part of His ministry He was silent as to His Messiahship and His supernatural origin. His teaching, of which the Sermon on the Mount is a summary, is purely ethical. The first indication of any recognition of His true nature is to be found in the incident near Caesarea Philippi, and it is there that it is the spontaneous acclamation of His disciples. It is Peter who gives expression to the general feeling in the historic words, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' Peter's confession draws forth the immediate injunction to the disciples that they tell no man that He was Jesus the Christ (Mt 16²⁰). This silence of Jesus as to His Messiahship was not merely, or mainly, from modesty. It was because the only homage that sprang from a real perception of the inherent Divineness of His character. He sought to draw out of men a recognition of His Divine nature by the sheer force of His Personality. It was the tribute of the heart, the spontaneous uprising of the spiritual instinct in response to His Godhood, that alone had ethical worth. The mere tribute of the lips, the result of convention or authority, was meaningless to Him. Jesus was silent in order that those who knew and loved Him, and in whose soul the Divine energy was working, might testify of Him.

4. The silence of Jesus regarding His miracles is significant of His own attitude towards them (Mk 3²³, Lk 5²⁹). Silence here cannot have been from prudential considerations, for miracles must undoubtedly have enhanced His reputation among the people, and it was His refusal to work miracles to gratify the Pharisees that formed the ground of their offence against Him (Mt 16¹⁷). But Jesus knew how little miracles really proved. He knew that the faith given to Him merely on account of the physical marvels He did was on a distinctly lower level than the soul's spontaneous recognition of His spiritual transcendence (Jn 14¹¹). He was afraid that the unhealthy craving of a superstitious people would dull their perception of ethical truth.

5. Very striking is the silence of Jesus to direct questions asked. He never ignores a question sincerely put, or even when it is put as a challenge, but He rarely gives it a categorical answer (Mt 11³ 16¹ 21²³ 22^{16,34}, Mk 10¹⁷, Lk 13¹⁸). He generally rises above the individual case and settles the general principle of which it is an instance. Jesus knew what was in men. He answers their thought rather than their words. Soul meets soul with no interposing medium of physical utterance. The sincere seeker after truth gets a truth deeper than he dreamt of, while the insincere casuist is put to silence.

6. There are various striking silences of Jesus to individuals which have each its own peculiar meaning. (1) The silence of probation (Mt 15²³). When the Syrophenician woman pleads with Jesus to cure her daughter, He answers her not a word. When she persists in her pleading, in spite of all dissuasion, He speaks, but the ethical position of the two is strangely inverted. The words of Jesus breathe the narrowness of Judaism. Those of the woman reflect the universality of the gospel. This silence of Jesus to her pitiful entreaty is the silence of probation. He recognizes her faith; and because He sees it will stand the strain, He tests it to the uttermost. See SYROPHENICIAN WOMAN.

(2) The silence of horror (Mt 14¹⁸). When Jesus heard of the death of John the Baptist, He said no word, but departed into a desert place to calm the tumult of His spirit in silence. The iniquity of the world He had come to redeem swept over the pure spirit of Jesus with such overwhelming force that utterance was choked, and His human nature had to seek, in silence, communion with the Father in order to regain its equanimity. It is a silence more eloquent than words of vehement denunciation would have been. It is the instinctive shrinking of a high nature from the grossness and baseness of sin.

(3) The silence of shame (Jn 8⁶). The Pericope Adulteræ, though not in the original Gospel of St. John, must have belonged to a very early tradition. It is the birth of the Christian era. When confronted with the woman, Jesus stoops down, and writes upon the ground. He averts His face from the shameful spectacle. He is filled with pity and sorrow for the woman who has lost the glory of her womanhood, and against the men whose shameless insistence upon her fault shows that they utterly fail to realize in what the true gravamen of her offence consists. To the pure soul of Jesus the sin of the one is greater than the sin of the other. Hence His words, 'He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.' The rebuke strikes home, the sense of shame flushes their cheeks, and the woman's accusers silently steal away.

(4) The silence of indignation (Mt 26⁶⁸, Mk 14⁶¹). Jesus, after His apprehension, was first led before Caiaphas, the high priest. Caiaphas sought to incriminate Him by irrelevant statements of words they had heard Him utter. The high priest urged Him to say something in His defence, but Jesus held His peace. It was the silence of indignation against the utter mockery of His trial and the attitude of the time-serving president of the Court.

(5) The silence of contempt (Lk 23³). Herod was a different type. He is the representative of superstitious profligacy. Herod was a weak man, with a conscience certainly, but a conscience that could be touched only by his superstitious fears. He liked to have a saint under his patronage, provided the saint would be pliable enough to leave his patron's vices unrebuked. He had tried John the Baptist, but that experiment had failed, and now he would try Jesus. And so he questioned Him in many words, but Jesus answered him nothing. Here is apparently a seeker after truth to whom Jesus has nothing to say. It is not so. The gospel refuses the patronage of the vicious. Jesus has nothing to say to craven superstition seeking to condone its own vices by taking religion under its protection.

(6) The silence of self-containment (Jn 19⁹). Pilate, again, represents another and a higher type. To him Jesus opened Himself more fully than to any of His judges. He recognized in him one whose instincts were those of a capable and genuine ruler, and He sympathized with the dilemma in which Pilate was placed. Though the final decision rested with Pilate, he was the least guilty of all who were responsible for the tragedy of Calvary (Jn 19¹¹). In Pilate's soul a great struggle was going on. He was seeking for a way of escape from a difficult position, but he dared not take the only way that true magnanimity required. He dared not be true to his own high function of asserting the impartial justice of Imperial Rome, and the result was moral ruin. It is always so with Jesus. To the soul that once recognizes His claims no half measures are possible. It is all or nothing—absolute loyalty or a treason that leads downwards to the pit. And Jesus had a clear perception of the character of the Roman ruler, who alone had insight enough to recognize the essential greatness of his prisoner. One imperial soul met another. On the plane on which they met there was no difficulty of intercommunication. Jesus has no hesitation in asserting His royalty and His claim to be the Ruler of eternal truth. Pilate has culture enough at least to understand what He means, and his scepticism is the scepticism of sadness and perplexity rather than of scorn. But when Pilate, struck with the largeness of soul that Jesus, touches on the question, 'What do you say?' Jesus has nothing to say. It is not that He fears to commit Himself. It is simply that He cannot give an answer that would be intelligible to Pilate.

(7) The silence of self-absorption. There have been many commentaries on the seven words of Jesus on the cross, but His silence there is as striking as His speech. Jesus has nothing to say to the jeers and mockery of the infuriated people, or to the taunts of priests and Pharisees. He is self-absorbed. For the self-hood of Jesus is His mission, His purpose, the idea of His life. And even in the agony of the cruellest death the malignity of man has ever devised, He is not shaken out of this self-absorption. His words have all reference to the central idea which constitutes His earthly existence. Pity for sinning humanity, love for those whose hearts are His, His attitude to the Father with whom all along He has realized His oneness,—these are the emotions that dominate His soul. There is not even the faintest trace of anger against those who have wreaked their vengeance upon Him. There is scarcely even a consciousness of their presence.

7. It is instructive to note the different valuation put upon speech and silence by Jesus and those who surrounded Him. Jesus silenced the Sadducees when they propounded to Him knotty points of theology (Mt 22³⁴), and suffered not the demons to speak (Mk 13³⁴). But when the multitude rebuked the blind men who cried for Him at the gate of Jericho, Jesus encouraged them to appeal (Mt 20³¹); and when the disciples sought to silence the mothers who brought their children to be blessed, Jesus encouraged them with one of His most striking and characteristic sayings (Mt 19¹³, Mk 10¹³, Lk 18¹⁵). And, further, He who in the earlier part of His career carefully concealed His Messiahship from the people, on the critical occasion when He made His triumphant entry into Jerusalem gave an emphatic refusal to silence the acclamations with which He was hailed by the people.

SILOAM.—Josephus (BJ v. iv. 1) places the spring at the mouth of the Tyropœon Valley. This, and references of later writers, point to Birket Silwân, on the slope S. of the Temple area. A larger pool, Birket el-Hamra, now almost filled up, lies lower in the valley. Birket Silwân is built within the rock-hewn space occupied by the original pool, 75 ft. × 71 ft. The water was approached by steps cut in the rock. In NT times a covered arcade within the pool, 22½ ft. high and 12 ft. wide, ran round the four sides. From 'Ain Sitti Maryam, the Fountain of the Virgin, on the slope below the eastern battlements, a conduit led the water to the pool; but, probably in Hezekiah's time, a tunnel was cut through the rock, and the fountain apparently covered over, as Josephus does not seem to have known it apart from Siloam. An inscription in ancient Heb. characters was found on the wall of the tunnel in 1880, which gives an account of the cutting. The tunnel is about ½ of a mile in length. It is bent as if to avoid obstructions. Two shafts to the surface, at important points, would afford guidance as to direction.

The spring is intermittent. During the rains it may flow twice a day, but in the late summer, once in two days. Such springs are held in superstitious reverence, and credited with power to heal many diseases. Josephus pronounces the water good and plentiful, and says that this and other fountains flowed more copiously after falling into the hands of Titus.

The phrase 'tower in Siloam' (Lk 13⁴) perhaps indicates that this part of the city was called Siloam, 'the tower' being part of the adjoining wall.

A church was built above the pool in the 5th cent., and later was altered by Justinian. Ruins, possibly of this building, block a great part of the pool.

On the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, water from this fountain was poured on the altar (Neubauer, Géog. du Pal. 145). In the 10th cent. the water was 'good' (Mukaddasi); it is good no longer, percolating, as it does, through vast accumulations of refuse. The village of Siloam, Kefr Silwân, on the E. slope of the valley, over against the pool, dates from post-Arab times. Its handful of poor inhabitants still use the impure water for domestic purposes. W. EWING.

SILVER.—See MONEY.

SIMEON (Συμεών) is a transliteration into Greek of the common Heb. name שִׁמְעוֹן, which is first met with as that of the second son of Jacob and Leah in Gn 29³³, where a derivation from שָׁמַע, 'hear,' is suggested.

1. An aged saint (Lk 22⁵⁷), who took the infant Jesus in his arms at the Presentation in the Temple on the completion of the mother's period of purification, and broke out into an exultant song of praise. Afterwards he foretold to Mary the varied results that would attend the mission of her son.

He has been identified with a Rabbi of the same name, who is described as the son of Hillel and father of Gamaliel I.; but the original name (Sabbath. 150) merely identifies him as intermediate between Hillel and Gamaliel as Vas of the Sanhedrin. Beyond that statement, which is not in the Mishna, nothing is known of him; and the Lukan phrase, 'the son of Joseph' whose name was Simeon, is too modest to allow of identification with one who was at once the son of Hillel and the leading authority on the observance in the nation. Another legend is preserved in the Genesis Rabbah to the effect that Charinus and Leucius, two sons of Simeon, had been raised from the dead, and had been summoned to describe before the Sanhedrin the occurrences they had witnessed in the underworld at the death of Jesus. Their narrative is said to have been afterwards reported to Pilate, who ordered its incorporation in the official Acts of his procuratorship. This apocryphal Gospel is not only of a late date (4th or even 5th cent.), but was evidently composed in the interest of apologetics, with a view particularly to represent the resurrection of Jesus as attested by evidence which even His enemies regarded as irrefutable. Until the period of uncritical search for legends in the 13th cent., little historical value was ascribed to the story, which may be confidently regarded as destitute of any.

Of the lineage or descendants of Simeon no contemporary evidence has survived; and for the man himself St. Luke is our only authority.

Simeon is described as (1) 'righteous and devout,' or conscientious in regard to God and His law (cf. Ac 22¹²); (2) as looking for the Messiah; and (3) as moved by the Holy Spirit (not merely the spirit of prophecy) to believe that he would not die before he had seen the Messiah. Guided by the Spirit to the courts of the Temple, he no sooner saw Jesus there than the words of the famous Nunc Dimittis (wh. see) rose to his lips. Whilst Mary was wondering at the meaning of such words, Simeon turned to her and foretold the diverse results of the mission of Jesus. A and an offence to some, it would of a new life to others; and with her own blessedness would mingle anguish unspeakable. In the issue the deepest needs of many souls would be excited and met, and men's hearts would be probed, enriched, and satisfied. After this brief appearance in history, Simeon passes again into obscurity, leaving only a few imperishable words behind him.

2. An ancestor, otherwise unknown, of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Lk 3³⁰). In this case, with some inconsistency, RV turns the name into 'Symeon' (as in Ac 13¹ 15¹⁴), which is the more normal vocalization of the Greek, though not of the Hebrew. R. W. MOSS.

SIMON.—The form Simon is not a transcription of שִׁמְעוֹן, but is either a contraction for Simeon or an independent Greek name. The latter view is much the more probable. In the NT the name is frequent. The Gospels mention—1. Simon the brother of our Lord (Mt 13⁵⁵, Mk 6³). 2. Simon the Zealot (see CANANÆAN), one of the twelve Apostles (Mk 3¹⁸ ||). 3. Simon of Cyrene, who was impressed to bear our Lord's cross (Mt 27³² ||). 4. Simon 'the leper,' in whose house the anointing of our Lord by Mary of Bethany took place (Mt 26⁶, Mk 14³). 5. Simon the Pharisee, in whose house the penitent woman anointed our Lord's head and feet (Lk 7^{36ff.}). See ANOINTING. 6. Simon the father of Judas Iscariot (Jn 6⁷¹ 13² 26). 7. Simon Peter. See PETER. W. PATRICK.

SIMPLE, SIMPLICITY (ἀπλούς, ἀπλότης; the latter does not occur in the Gospels; the former only in Mt 6²² and Lk 11³⁴).

The words ἀπλούς, 'simple,' and 'single' (Gl. of Comp. Philol. p. 156). ἀμα, and as ἀ in ἀπαξ and ἀπὸς; semel, simul, simplex, and similis; in Eng. in same, single, and single. The basal meaning, therefore, is one and the same (cf. 'one and the same'); derivatives does it branch out into medicines it yields the antithesis: simple or pure v. mixed or adulterated; in other realms, that the sole of a shoe, etc. The sphere, gives the idea of purit of singleness, open-

These meanings are found throughout the classical and NT periods. A third appears in Isoc. and Arist., where the word sometimes descends to silliness or folly, as in English. But this is never so in LXX or NT (see Liddell and Scott, Cremer, and Hastings' DB, s.v.). Of the meanings given almost exhausts the thought of simplicity in 'guilelessness' is so close to it that it must treated. Other Eng. senses of the word, as well as the idea of purity above, do not properly come under this head in the Gospels.

1. The leading passage is Mt 6²². In that chapter Jesus expounds the first great commandment touching our duty to God, as in 7¹⁻¹² He enforces the second, which concerns our duty to man (cf. Mk 12²⁹⁻³¹). The form of the teaching was determined by Pharisaism, which serves as a dark foil for the truth. Outwardly religious, the Pharisees were essentially worldly. Professed to be servants of God and to be in the service of the people, they were oppressors of the people and servants of their own selfish ambitions. Thus they lived a double life, loving the praise of men more than the praise of God. Our Lord's teaching, with its doubleness and its singleness, sets us the obligation to obey and please God in everything as our supreme duty (vv. 1¹⁸), while in vv. 19-32 He meets our unbelieving fear that such a course would bring loss and bankruptcy, by assuring us that we may well trust our Heavenly Father's care. It is all summed up in v. 32, in the command to seek first God's Kingdom and righteousness, and in the promise that He will give all needful earthly good, so that we need not worry. That this singleness of aim is the main thought, is clear from the illustration He employs in v. 22. The 'single' eye is that which looks at one object alone, and sees that clearly; as contrasted with it, the 'evil' eye is that which (not 'sees double,' but) endeavours to look at two objects at the same time (and the context suggests two in opposite directions), and therefore sees neither clearly. The natural antithesis to ἀπλοῦς would have been διπλοῦς, instead of which πονηρός is used, both to turn attention sharply from the physical to the moral which it was meant to illustrate, and, by avoiding the thought of 'seeing double,' which διπλοῦς in itself would naturally suggest, to make it easier to think of the unusual attempt to see things in opposite directions, and so pass to the common moral experience of cherishing, as objects of ambition, things that are diametrically opposed. Accordingly, πονηρός must be interpreted as 'evil' in this particular sense. For the double aim to serve God and mammon is evil, both in its very nature, as being really a rejection of the sole sovereignty of God, and in its results, as leading inevitably to the double life with its darkness and doom. Such a life is only apparently possible. Really it is impossible; a choice must be made. We cannot serve God and mammon. Pharisees could not believe, because they sought glory from one another rather than the glory that comes from God (Jn 5⁴⁴; cf. Jn 12⁴²). Life becomes simple when we accept God's will as our law and His Kingdom as the object of our endeavour. And that life leads to the blessedness here mentioned. It floods the whole being with light. It means, as surely as God cares for birds and flowers (v. 22), that He will care for our temporal needs better than any man can care for himself, though he be rich, cultured, and powerful as King Solomon (vv. 25-32). Moreover, it ensures imperishable treasures in heaven (v. 19).

2. The passage in Lk. (11³⁴⁻³⁶) is to the same effect. That wickedness forms the background (v. 29). Some have charged Jesus with being in league with Beelzebub (v. 15; Mt. calls them 'Pharisees,' 12²⁴; Mk. 'scribes,' 3³²). In refuting that charge, He declares that it is by the finger of God He casts out demons, and that therefore in Him the Kingdom of God has come near to them (v. 20). The man who is not with Him is against Him (v. 23), and therefore against God. None such can be blessed, but only those who hear God's word and keep it (v. 28). Then to the thronging multitudes He points out the sin of that generation (v. 29). He is a sign to them, as Jonah was to Nineveh. But inasmuch as He is superior to Jonah and all who have gone before Him (vv. 31-32), and His light has not been hidden, but conspicuous (v. 32), He has, with unparalleled clearness, presented to men God's claim upon themselves. Then, with a swift turn to personal warning and appeal (shown in the singular pronoun), He declares to each of them that, if he strives to lead the double life, he will inevitably be guilty of refusing God's claim, and so will sink into darkness and condemnation; but if, with single-eyed devotion, he heeds God's message and claim, he shall be filled with light and blessedness.

3. Very similar to this is the thought in Mt 11¹⁶⁻³⁰, though the word ἀπλοῦς is not employed. The upbraided cities, with much formal religion, were yet devoted to mammon and had no real heart for God. Hence their darkened judgment, as shown by their inability to understand John or Jesus, and hence their inevitable doom. Over against these worldly 'wise and understanding' people Jesus sets the 'babes'—those who, less wise in their generation than the children of the world (cf. Lk 16⁸), cry out in their need and helplessness not for the world's prizes, but for the One they must have, even the Father. Their cry the Father answers; to all such the Son gives rest. The same idea is expressed pointedly in Lk 10³⁰ ('rather rejoice that your names are written in heaven') and Lk 10⁴², where the one thing needful is to listen to Him. The passage (Mt 11¹⁶⁻³⁰) shows how easily the thought made from 'singleness of aim' to 'childlike guilelessness.' In the eyes of the world this may seem foolishness, but in Jesus' thought it is wisdom (11¹⁹). It is a mark of those in His Kingdom (Mt 18³⁸, Mk 10¹⁵, Lk 18¹⁵⁻¹⁷). Apart from these, there are only two or three things that properly belong here. One is Mt 10¹⁶. The Eng. 'harmless,' based on a false derivation of ἀκέραιος, is unfortunate. It should be 'guileless' or 'simple' as in the Lat. and many Eng. versions. Prudence alone may lead to trickery; simplicity alone, to silliness. The Apostles are to be both prudent and guileless. Nathanael is already an illustration of it—it constitutes the true spiritual Israelite (Jn 1⁴⁶).

Such is the gospel conception of the simple life—a life of trustful obedience to the will of God. It will manifest itself in various ways:—in unequivocal speech (Mt 5³⁷); in healthy independence of the opinion of men (Mt 6¹⁻⁵ etc., Jn 5⁴¹); in judgments based on principle and reality rather than on appearance or custom—as about the Sabbath (Mk 2²⁻³); and the two anointings (Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰, Mk 14³⁻⁹); in righteousness (Mt 6³³), calm (Mt 12¹⁹ 11²⁹), courage (Mt 11⁷), etc. It is indeed the very root of all virtue, the very heart of the Christian life. It underlies all Christ's teachings. To exhaust it in all its implications would be to exhaust the Gospels.

Jesus Himself is in this, as in all other matters, the incarnation, the living illustration, of His own teachings. His first recorded utterance strikes that note (Lk 2⁴⁹ AV); it is repeated on the threshold of His public career (Mt 3¹²), and repeatedly in the course of His ministry in conversations with disciples or controversies with opponents (Jn 4³⁴ 6³⁸ 8²⁸ 42-47 9⁴), and even in His prayer to the Father toward its close (17⁴). And, as we study His conduct and character as He moves in the midst of friends and foes, we can see how unfailingly that life of single-hearted devotion to God is marked by insight and wisdom; courage and calm; steadfastness and consistency; beauty and strength; loyalty, patience, and heroism; righteousness, truth, and love; grace, majesty, and blessedness. It cuts a straight path through all the shams and sophistries of men, and rises victorious over all weakness and worry, all waywardness and wickedness.

SIN.—Sin is personal hostility to the will of God. Christian regard to it is relative to the facts . . . being necessarily implied by the death of Christ considered as a work of redemption. It is the Christian interpretation of facts of experience, which are independent of any explanation of life, whether offered by theology, philosophy, or scientific theory. Its value is irrespective of the view which historical criticism may suggest of the literature of the OT. Neither is it affected by theories of the organic development of the world or human life derived from modern biological thought. Philosophic systems, monistic or otherwise, cannot be allowed to govern or modify a doctrine which in the first instance can be tested only by relation to beliefs grounded not upon metaphysic, but experience. The Christian will rather hold that a philosophic theory . . . to the facts of the gospel has been too hastily identified with reality.

1. The Christian never rises above the limits of its first publication as the Kingdom of God (Mk 1¹⁴⁻¹⁵). No doubt the terms are deepened and spiritualized, as well by the subsequent teaching of Jesus (Lk 17²⁰ 19¹¹, Ac 1⁷⁻⁸) as by the accomplishment of His atoning work (Lk 24⁴⁴⁻⁴⁹). But though what might have remained an external and almost physical conception became the manifestation of one eternal life (Jn 3^{15, 16}, 1 Jn 1³⁻³), nevertheless the Church of the living God (1 Ti 3¹⁵), the relation of a people of possession to their rightful Lord, King, and Father (Tit 2¹⁴) is constant. Allegiance, faith, sonship are the marks of those who share the membership of this Kingdom. What Jesus the Messiah found was disobedience and . . . Human life, as He was called upon to deal with it, involved subjection to another prince (Jn 14³⁰), bondage to another master (8³⁴), 'sonship' to another 'father' (8³⁴). To the consciousness of Jesus, Satan was present, not as a convenient personification of evil that became actual only in the individual wills of men, but as the author of sin, the person in whom evil has its spring, even as God is the fount of life. Jesus' sense of dependence upon the Father did not carry with it a monism which saw God in all and all in God. For Him, as for St. John, the whole world lay in the Evil One (1 Jn 5¹⁹, cf. Lk 4⁶). His own conflict was with the prince of this world (Jn 14³⁰). To be delivered from the Evil One was the converse of being brought into temptation (Mt 6¹³: the insertion of ἀλλὰ in Mt., and the absence of the clause in the best MSS of Lk 11⁴ suggest that it is correlative to the preceding clause, representing the same act differently). He had seen Satan fallen . . . from heaven (Lk 10¹⁸). Over against the Kingdom of God was the kingdom of Satan (Mt 12²⁶⁻²⁸ 16²⁷ 25⁴¹, cf. Rev 16¹⁰). The drama of human life was accomplished in presence of this already existing dualism. Christ assumes the current Hebrew conception of a world of spiritual personalities under the leadership of Beelzebub (Lk 11¹⁴⁻²⁶). The stampede of the swine at Gerasa witnesses to their control, within the limits of Divine permission, over natural forces (Mk 5¹³). Physical disease results from Satan's bondage (Lk 13¹⁶). Possession by demons is an abnormal case of its influence over human beings (e.g. Mk 9²⁰⁻²²). And all opposition to the purpose of God is inspired by Satan (Jn 8⁴²⁻⁴⁷). The Jews were of their father the devil, so that the works wrought by them were antithetic to the works of God manifested in Jesus (v. 44). Even the chosen Twelve Satan had asked to have, that he might sift them as wheat (Lk 22³¹). So the Passion was a continuation of the Temptation, a direct agony and death-struggle wherein the prince of this world was cast out (Jn 12³¹ 16¹¹), the strong man spoiled (Lk 11²¹).

From the first the proclamation of the good news, accompanied as it was with the curing of diseases and the casting out of demons (Mt 10⁷⁻⁸, Lk 9¹⁻²), witnessed to the real character of Christ's work as redemption, ransom, and salvation. For the true unification between the normal and universal purpose of the gospel—the forgiveness of sins—and the occasional and particular accessories of it—exorcism and . . . not so much in the analogy between . . . and spiritual wickedness, as in the fact that both are the exercise of the one Satanic power within the usurped kingdom of evil. No doubt there is a certain suggestiveness in the parallel between disease and sin, which Jesus Himself recognized. But there is nothing in His teaching to suggest the later ideas of taint, infection, vitiated nature. It is trespasses which the Heavenly Father . . . and that by forgiveness (Mt . . . sins (1²), i.e. actions involving guilt, is implied by the name Jesus (see art. GUILT). The bringing forth of the people from Pharaoh's bondage to serve Jehovah is the ancient experience which is before the mind of devout men under the old covenant as the pattern of the deliverance which Messiah was to bring (Mt 2¹⁵, cf. Hos 11¹). Salvation is . . . the restoration of spiritual health, but the liberation of God's people from an evil service. The ministry of the Son of Man consists in giving His life a ransom (Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²⁸; cf. 1 Ti 2⁶). And the Fourth Evangelist only interprets the mind of the Master when he speaks of Jesus as dying for the nation, and destined to gather together into one the scattered children of God (Jn 11^{51, 52}). He was the shepherd bringing home the lost sheep dispersed upon the mountains (10⁶); or, somewhat to vary the idea, the Redeemer coming into the world, not to judge it along with its prince, but to save it from the Evil One (3^{17, 18} 12^{31, 47} 17¹⁶), and casting out the indwelling Satan by the finger or Spirit of God (Lk 11²⁰). The acceptable year of the Lord is a year of release . . .

2. From the implications of the Gospel narrative we pass to the theology of the Epistles. In order to gain a clear view of St. Paul's doctrine of sin in its completeness, it is necessary to go behind the Epistle to the Romans. We must bear in mind, first of all, the essentially Jewish basis of his thought. To him salvation, or redemption, carried all the associations which had . . . it in Hebrew history. The Kingdom of Messiah was a vivid reality, and the earlier Epistles show that at first he was not without the common anticipation of its immediate establishment in manifested power. Satan was a concrete fact. If at one time it was the Spirit of Jesus that suffered him not (Ac 16⁷), at another Satan hindered him (1 Th 2¹⁸). The thorn in the flesh was a messenger of Satan (2 Co 12⁷). The Christian is armed in order to ward off the fiery darts of the Evil One (Eph 6¹⁶). Principalities and powers were the unseen antagonists of Christ's servants (Eph 6¹², cf. Lk 22⁶³), the enemies over whom Christ triumphed in the Cross (Col 2¹⁵). If Messiah was to be manifested at the Parousia, Satan was also destined to be manifested in the Man of Sin (2 Th 2⁸⁻¹¹). A remarkable parallel to the conception of 'the Evil One,' which appears both in the Synoptics and in the Fourth Gospel, is found in 'the prince of the power of the air' (Eph 2³). The same passage describes those who become sons of God as by nature children of wrath (2³), dead not in sin but through trespasses (v. 5), sons of disobedience because inwrought by this evil spirit (v. 3). Demons are as much part of St. Paul's world as of that which appears in the Synoptists. He identifies them with the heathen gods (1 Co 10^{20, 21}). Belial is the antithesis of Christ (2 Co 6¹⁵). To lapse from Christian conduct is to turn aside after Satan (1 Ti 5¹⁵); to be separated from Christian fellowship is to be delivered to Satan (1 Co 5⁵, 1 Ti 1²⁰). And that redemption meant primarily for St. Paul translation from the kingdom of Satan to the Kingdom of God (Col 1¹³), is attested by the form in which he narrates before Agrippa the story of his commission as Apostle of the Gentiles (Ac 26¹⁸). All this is in close correspondence with the mind of Jesus, and must be brought with us to a closer examination of the Pauline doctrine of sin.

That sin is essentially disloyalty to God is the substance of the locus classicus on the nature of sin, Ro 1¹⁸⁻²⁰. 'For through their ungodliness God, they glorified him not as God, but as men, and became unthankful' (v. 21). It will be observed, first, that the Apostle here speaks of sin in its widest signification, such distinctions as are involved in the conceptions of original and actual. We have here, therefore, a definition of sin which must govern all subsequent uses of the term. All the elements which enter into particular sins, or transgressions of known law, are represented—knowledge of God and dependence upon Him (v. 20), wilful and therefore inexcusable refusal of due homage (v. 21), the incurring of guilt and of God's wrath (v. 18). Further, it is not the plural 'men,' not the collective 'man,' is used throughout the passage. There is nothing abstract in this general view of sin, even though it be universal (cf. 'all sinned,' Ro 5¹²; 'all died,' 2 Co 5¹⁴). Another point is, that St. Paul is led to disclose this 'vision of sin' as the necessary postulate of the gospel (Ro 1¹⁶⁻¹⁸), in which is revealed a righteousness of God' (v. 17 3²¹). Lastly, there is no confusion, as in the popular mind, between those physical excesses which are called vice, and the inward refusal 'to have God in their knowledge' (v. 23), whether it applies to the sensuous or the spiritual nature of men, which alone is sin. 'God gave them up unto a reprobate mind' (v. 28), with all its consequences to the complex personality of man. This is of course the basis of St. Paul's appeal is not to the knowledge of external facts, which concern the intellect, but to facts as interpreted by conscience. Fundamentally this is the appeal to the inner experience, and it is clear from the locus classicus of Romans, as from the whole Pauline theology, that the Apostle is universalizing his own experience, as he saw himself in the light of the vision of Jesus of Nazareth (Gal 1¹², Ro 7⁴).

Now St. Paul expresses his relation to sin in the phrase 'sin dwelleth in me' (Ro 7¹⁷). He is describing the common experience of an inward struggle, when neither good nor evil is finally in the ascendant. The complete sinful condition would be one of consent (Ro 1³², 2 Th 2¹³), in which 'the law of sin' was unchecked by 'the law of the mind' (Ro 7²³, Gal 5¹⁷). The terms must not be misunderstood in view of the modern conception of scientific law. 'Law' in St. Paul's theology involves the personality of the lawgiver, so that to find this 'law in the members' (Ro 7²³), to be inwrought by sin, seems to point to an indwelling spiritual presence. Is this a mere figure? St. Paul reverts to it in a still more significant form. Christians are not to let sin reign in their mortal bodies (Ro 6¹²). Compliance with evil involves an obedience (v. 16), a slavery (v. 17). There is a close parallel between those who, as alive in Christ Jesus, are servants of God, and those who being dead in trespasses serve sin (vv. 15-23). Two hostile kingdoms, two rival loyalties, make their claim upon a man's allegiance. So, when under the form of 'Adam's transgression' sin is considered in its universal aspect (Ro 5¹²), a personal sovereignty is again suggested—'death,' i.e. sin in its consequent development, 'reigned through the one' (v. 17). The effect of Adam's transgression is represented as the establishment of an authority (cf. 1 Co 15²⁴, Eph 2^{6, 12}, Col 1¹³) over his descendants rather than as a corruption of their nature, carrying with it therefore condemnation (Ro 5¹⁸; see art. GUILT) as the due sentence of God upon those who reject His law. This personal embodiment of hostility to the Divine law and government, in view of St. Paul's general outlook on the spiritual world, can be none other than Satan, exercising, as captain of 'spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places' (Eph 6¹²), not an external compulsion but an inward influence, not therefore limiting the responsible personalities that are involved. Then St. Paul can say, 'Death passed unto all men, for that all sinned' (Ro 5¹²). Sin is always a personal attitude, never a pathological condition. Death is its consequence (v. 12), but the physical analogy of St. James (1¹⁵) has no parallel in St. Paul. It is always the sentence, punishment, or wages (6²³; see art. GUILT), the sequel to the righteous judgment of God (2⁵). So, too, salvation is not a remedy for mortal disease, but a personal act of kindness and mercy on the part of an offended but loving God (Eph 1⁵⁻¹⁰ 27, Tit 3⁴⁻⁶). Looking to the men which are rescued, it is redemption (Gal 3¹³ 4⁵); looking to that into which they are brought, it is reconciliation (Ro 5^{10, 11} 11¹⁵, 2 Co 5^{18, 19}). Both involve the personal action of the Father's love. He chooses to forgive the past and to bring his children into fellowship with Him (Ro 5¹⁰, Col 1¹⁹⁻²²; cf. 1 P 3¹⁸). As applied to the individual, this is justification (Ro 3²⁴ 4²⁵ 5⁹ al.), which represents not a process of renewal, but an amnesty extended to the sinner. What Christ slew by the Cross was the enmity (Eph 2¹⁶ 16). Its effect, therefore, is not an infused righteousness, but a free pardon whereby sins are no longer reckoned (Ro 4⁷⁻⁸, 2 Co 5¹⁹).

3. The rest of the NT is in general agreement with St. Paul. St. James, though he speaks of sin as the intermediate stage between lust and death (Ja 1¹⁵), yet by the very figure used to describe their relationship, clearly recognizes that all three are essentially the same in kind. Lust is not animal impulse, but a personal attitude. The sinner is one who has a will, which may be covered by repentance (v. 20) and forgiven in answer to prayer (v. 15). Sins, therefore, are personal transgressions against God, which, if unremitted, involve judgment (v. 12), a personal condemnation and sentence on the part of God (v. 12 5⁹). Lust is not even a pathological condition of the will. It has the nature of sin, being not a result of ignorance, but essentially a personal determination of will. This is more clearly brought out by the assertion that lust, not God, is the tempter (1^{13, 14}), which suggests the presence of an evil will, the source of that friendship of the world which is enmity against God (4⁴), taking occasion of the natural passions and desires of men to influence spiritually the human mind. The wisdom which cometh down from heaven is set over against a wisdom which is devilish (3¹⁵, 16, 17).

St. Peter, while he speaks of fleshly lusts that war against the soul (1 P 2¹¹), is even more emphatic than St. James in his recognition of the personality of evil. Sin is part of a man's activity, a vain manner of life from which we are redeemed by the blood of Him who bore our sins, i.e. our actual transgression, that He might bring us to God (1 Jn 2:2). For the redeemed Christian it still exists in the person of God's enemy, who is now the adversary of God's people also, seeking once more to draw them away from their allegiance (5⁸).

St. John, with his profounder insight, gives to the doctrine of sin what is perhaps the widest and most comprehensive sweep in the NT. 'Sin is lawlessness' (1 Jn 3⁴). This sentence, with its co-extensive subject and predicate, is all but a definition. It recognizes no distinction in kind between 'sin' and 'sins,' which are perfectly interchangeable in the Johannine writings. If the Lamb of God 'taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1²⁹, Vulg. peccata mundi), the Son is manifested 'to take away sins' (1 Jn 3²). If the blood cleanseth from all sin (1⁷), Jesus Christ is the propitiation for our sins (2²). The cleansing is sacrificial (ἱλαστήριον), involving personal dealings with God. It is the forgiveness of sins which those for whom it is prevalent receive (1⁹ 2¹²). St John does not speak of sin as a state. Doing sin is opposed to doing righteousness (3⁴ 7⁸). 'In him is no sin' (3⁶) is equivalent to 'Which of you convicteth me of sin?' (Jn 8⁴⁶, cf. 1 P 2²³),—a clear record rather than a perfect state. That which abides in him who believes in the name of Jesus (1 Jn 3²³) is the love of the Father, a personal relationship between established which is opposed to the carnal world (2¹⁵, 16). Here, however, is no condemnation of the natural impulses or of matter. That Jesus Christ is come in the flesh to save the world is St. John's cardinal doctrine (4², 2 Jn 7). But, as with St. James and St. Peter, it is lust, and the corruption that is in the world through lust, which constitute the bondage from which men need deliverance (1 Jn 2¹⁶ 5⁴, 5). What then is lust? That is the point at which St John's whole view opens out before us. The Fourth Gospel has recorded the prayer of Christ for His disciples, not that they should be taken from the world, but that they might abide in the Evil One (Jn 17¹⁵); and also His warning of the Jews because, continuing in the bondage of sin, it was their will to do the lusts not of their body, but of their father the devil (Jn 8⁴⁴). And the Apocalypse unfolds the mystery of iniquity in language fully accordant with the view of sin implied in the Gospel. The old serpent the devil (Rev 12⁹ 20²) deceives the whole world (12⁹ 20² 10), having power (δύναμις, 13²) and even authority (ἐξουσία, 13⁴; cf. Lk 4⁶) over the nations, manifesting his rule in the mystic Babylon (16¹⁹ 17¹⁻⁶), and the kingdom of the beast (13 passim), until He who is the Alpha and Omega, having by His angel sealed the servants of God (7²⁻³), brings in the final salvation, the Kingdom of God and the authority of His Christ (12¹⁰). St. John's last word is written in the First Epistle. Behind human history is the devil, 'who sinneth from the beginning' (1 Jn 3⁸). The explanation of human sin, therefore, is the relation of the world to this spirit. 'The whole world lieth in the evil one' (5¹⁹). 'To be begotten of God (3⁹), who is light (1⁵), truth (5²⁰), and love (4⁸), is a reversal of those relations described as being 'of the devil' (3⁸), who is a murderer and liar (Jn 8⁴⁴), and the power of darkness (1 Jn 2¹¹; cf. Lk 22⁵³, Ac 26¹⁸). Philosophically, there can be little doubt that St. John is content with a dualism, which he is not concerned to resolve, starting as he does from the facts of experience (1 Jn 1¹ 4¹⁴; cf. Jn 19²⁸). Though evil is antithetic to good, it is not in a Platonic sense as non-being (τὸ μὴ ὄν). The problem is approached from the positive and concrete standpoint of personality. Though God is indeed the beginning and the end (Rev 1⁸ 21⁶ 22¹³), yet a similar phrase is used in speaking of the author of evil as in describing the Word (1 Jn 3⁸ 1¹): both are 'from the beginning.' The final triumph, though complete, is represented symbolically as the imprisonment (Rev 20² 3.7.10), not the annihilation, of Satan. The Hebrew mind, which, in spite of its affinities with Platonism and, possibly, of its influence from Greek sources, is dominant in St. John, did not feel the necessity of a dualistic monism, being content to respond to the revelation of a supreme spiritual Person, the fear of whom was the beginning of wisdom and man's chief end (Job 28²⁸, Ps 111¹⁰, Ec 12¹³). It is enough to know that they who 'abide in him that is true' have by a transference of allegiance overcome the Evil One (1 Jn 2¹³).

The Epistle of Jude, with which 2 Peter must be closely associated, clearly exhibits that apocalyptic view of the spiritual issues behind the facts of human life and experience of which there are abundant traces in the NT outside the Book of Revelation, and which indicate a 'war in heaven' (Rev 12⁷) as the ultimate explanation of sin (Jude 6.9.14, 2 P 2⁴ 3⁷, 12). To the Jewish mind this language is not what Western thought would understand by mere symbol. It is rather the symbolic representation of real existence, the Hebrew equivalent of Greek mysteries. It is a mistake, therefore, to neglect either the Apocalypse or the apocalyptic passages of other writings in the interpretation of the NT, or to fail to perceive that their characteristic ideas underlie the theology of the Apostolic age, as the Platonic mould of thought governs the religious philosophy of the 4th cent., the biological that of the 19th. The contempt of millenarianism, while it banished much that was fantastic in Christian teaching, had the correspondingly unfortunate result of obliging interpreters of the NT to arrange its statements against a background not contemplated by the writers themselves. The result in the case of sin has been the assigning of inadequate and shifting values to the term, and the misapplication of other analogies. For Apostolic language, in which angels and men on the one hand, and the devil with his angels, extending his usurped authority over those human servants whom he holds captive. Sin is active hostility to God.

4. The whole question of original sin is removed from the atmosphere in which it is usually discussed, when it is realized that the difference between sin and righteousness is not one of infused or implanted characters, but of relationship to God. It need not be either affirmed or denied that moral and spiritual tendencies are, like the physical organism, capable of transmission. Still more irrelevant is the discussion whether acquired characters descend by inheritance. These are questions for psychological research, and may be left for decision upon scientific grounds. No doubt theories of transmission, from the crudest Augustinian notions of sexual propagation to the subtlest doctrine of heredity, have been advanced by religionists to account for the universal need of redemption. So inveterate has this type of thought become, that it adheres to the phrases, e.g. 'depravity,' 'corruption of nature,' and the like, in which theology has endeavoured to express the Scripture teaching. Though the confessional formulas that employ such phrases are not committed to interpretations of the NT which imply a theory, opponents of what is supposed to be the traditional doctrine have in consequence been allowed to attack it in the interests of a more scientific psychology, on the assumption that original sin is held to be a predisposing cause of actual sin. Mr. F. R. Tennant, for example, in his Hulsean Lectures, starting from the premiss that ethical attributes are not rightly applied to anything but the activities of a will that knows the moral law, has no difficulty in proving that appetites and passions are the raw material of morality, belonging to the environment of the will, not an 'universal and hereditarily transmitted disturbance of man's nature.' The consequence follows that sin, which must involve guilt, applies properly only to the individual, while 'original sin' is little more than a name for the solidarity in nature and environment of the race of actual sinners. Whatever may be said of the background of Augustinian thought or the atmosphere in which the confessions of the 16th cent. were drawn, there can be no doubt that they only reasserted the language of the NT in ascribing the wrath of God to the race no less than to the individual. Terms like 'abnormal humanity,' 'taint of nature,' 'infirmity of will,' may be useful practical analogies, but, like all analogies, they defeat their end if rigorously pressed. For what Scripture means is, not that individual responsibility is conditioned by racial defect, but that the guilt attaching to individuals belongs, in the first instance, to the community (see art. GUILT).

5. The controversies that have arisen about the question whether sin is a privation or a depravation of nature, would have lost much of their force if theological thought had adhered more closely to the Scripture mode of regarding sin. The later mediaeval view, stereotyped by the standards of Trent, represented man as deprived of a gift which raised him above nature (supernaturale donum). The unsophisticated experience of human nature leads us to regard it as not in its chief outlines evil, and so far as it denies an inherent position is sufficiently justified. But the Reformers were right in their main contention, which was that sin involved a positive departure from the Divine purpose. If sin in its essence is neither the loss nor the disturbance of 'original' endowments, but simply disloyalty to God, to be outside the Kingdom and to own allegiance to the Evil One means that positive hostility to the law of God which is to be 'very far gone from original righteousness.' For sin disturbs nature only in the sense in which all personal action disturbs, by directing towards spiritual ends the material which nature supplies. Again, we have to emphasize the truth that sin enters only when spiritual relations have been established.

6. This consideration will also show the irrelevance of inquiring whether sin is 'inherited' so far as this means an ereditary transmission of human history. For if sin is a positive departure from the Divine purpose, we are no nearer a solution by regarding it as a transmission of the rudimentary forms of what, in the process of development, we call conscience. Only if emotions and passions be regarded as sinful, can it be of use to note that impulses, the ultimate restraint of which becomes imperative, are at certain stages necessary for the preservation of the individual or the propagation of the race. There need be no desire on the part of any Christian theologian to question the premisses on which the scientific evolutionist pursues his investigations into the origin of the human species. We may grant, for example, that no chasm separates the appearance of man upon the earth from the development of other and lower forms of life. It is hazardous, and quite unnecessary, to contend for organic and moral life as new departures. Taking a merely external view of man, we may say that the conditions under which sin not only becomes possible but actually takes place, are 'the perfectly normal result of a process of development through which the race has passed previously to the acquisition of full moral personality' (I. R. Tennant, Hulsean Lect. p. 81). But then sin is a determination of the 'full moral personality.' Even if we accept the story of man's first disobedience as historically a fact, it is no more explicable as a necessary stage in human evolution than the latest instance of wrong done by one man against another. That all men are the enemies of God until reconciled by the mediation of Christ, is a question of personal relationship unaffected by scientific research. The observer can do no more than register, so far as he can discover them, the conditions under which activities have resulted which, in view of the will of God, assumed to be known, are recognized as disloyalty and therefore as sin. No doctrine of sin is possible except on the assumption of a personal experience involving the recognition of God. The universality of the need which it expresses is attested, not by any demonstrative proof, but by the conviction of sin through which each individual has passed to the freedom of the Christian life. Of such Christian experience the witness of the Church is the summary, and its missionary labours are the measure of its faith that redemption is applicable to all. With this alone is Christianity as such concerned. It does not go behind the activity of a will to which being, judged by conscience. Its account of the 'Fall,' therefore, is not a pseudo-scientific account of the strength of passion or of the 'survival of habits and tendencies incidental to an earlier stage in development,' which is refuted by the discovery that the history of mankind is that of a continuous progression. It has nothing to do with the material of actual sin, which, though environment may have been vastly modified by corrupt action, cannot rightly be spoken of as 'polluted.' But it is the only manner in which language can express the postulate of guilt and slavery involved in preaching the gospel. God's message of free salvation, to every creature.

The story of the Fall, recorded in Gn 3, though it shaped the form in which St. Paul stated the universality of sin, does not vitally affect a teaching which, in its absence, would have sought another method of expression. Indeed, its essential features are all present in the Epistle to the Romans before it is stated in terms of Adam's transgression. To say that the doctrine is 'illustrated by the story,' would be to reduce the Hebrew Christian mind of the 1st cent. to an attitude towards the OT possible only in a critical age. Nor will the use of 'Adam' as a category for summing up the human race in 1 Co 15²² warrant us in believing that St. Paul was led to his characteristic idea of human solidarity otherwise than along the lines natural to a Jewish interpreter of the OT in Apostolic times (see Sunday Homilies, Evangelium, p. 136, 'Effects of Adam's Fall'; etc.). But it is equally certain that St. Paul's use of the OT is far removed from a hard Western literalism, its narratives being the authoritative forms under which spiritual truths are apprehended rather than the material of historical science (see Sunday Homilies, p. 302, 'St. Paul's use of the OT'). The interpretation applied to the early narratives of Genesis cannot affect their doctrinal use in the NT. If the first truth which concerns the moral life of man be the Divine origin, and therefore the essential goodness, i.e. conformity to the Divine intention, of the material world and of his own personality, the second is that nevertheless he is an alien from God. This interpretation of the facts of life, which escapes the negation of a true morality involved alike in Oriental dualism and philosophic monism, is entirely independent of the Genesis stories, and separable from them in the NT. It is, however, remarkable that even in these early narratives the religious truth is presented with a completeness conspicuously absent from many later theologues. The personalities of God, Man, and the Evil One,—disobedience, guilt, exclusion from the Kingdom, the need of liberation from an external tyranny typified in the promised bruising of the serpent's head,—all are essential to the reality of sin. It is difficult to understand how this could be better represented than by the act of disobedience against God and the voice of 'the voice of a stranger' to a common ancestor of all living. The situation thus expressed is briefly summarized by St. Paul, 'All have sinned, and (therefore) fall short of the glory of God' (Ro 3²³).

Confusion is often caused by the tendency to revert to a materialistic conception of sin on the part of those who would explain its presence in terms of the evolution hypothesis. It is sufficient, so the argument runs, to observe the difficulty that each must encounter 'of enforcing his inherited organic nature to obey a moral law' (Tennant, Hulsean Lectures, p. 81). But, apart from the fact that what needs explanation is the self-arraignment which the process entails, it is contrary to experience, no less than to Scripture, thus to place the 'organic nature' in an essential relation to sin, which is made to consist in the failure to 'moralize' it. The publicans and harlots go into the Kingdom of heaven before those with whose wilful rejection of God the physical and emotional nature has least to do. Even popular Christianity places 'the devil' at the climax of temptation; nor are 'youthful lusts,' though they may constitute the earliest and most obvious material of transgression, the deadliest and most intimate occasion of sin. The impulse to make stones bread, or appropriate the kingdoms of the world, masks a temptation to independence of Divine authority which is the essential element in guilt. St. Paul's doctrine of the Flesh with its passions and lusts (Ro 7⁵ 8³, Gal 5²⁴ etc.) cannot be set against this. It has been abundantly shown that the Pauline anthropology, to use the words of Lipsius, 'rests entirely on an OT base.' The 'old man' (ὁ παλαιὸς ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος, Ro 6⁶ etc.) is, therefore, the body, not as uncontrolled by spirit, but as inwrought by the Evil One (see above). According to Christian teaching, sin 'takes occasion' by any commandment or recognized purpose of God, whether related to the physical nature or not; nor would the theologian of any age be a whit less emphatic than the modern thinker in placing it, not in the impulse, but in the intention to reject the commandment. All men are born in sin, not as possessing inherited and abnormal appetites, which, however strong, are still outside their personal responsibility, but as subject to influences which, 'felt within us as ourselves' (Tennyson, Locksley Hall Sixty Years After), well up in personalities hostile to the Kingdom of God.

It will be urged that influences such as these are still external to the individual, of whom, therefore, sin cannot be predicated anterior to positive acts of transgression. But, in the first place, this separation between actions and character does not correspond with experience. The man as distinct from his activities is an abstraction. The 'psychological infant' is an ideal construction (see Martineau, Types of Ethical Theory, bk. ii. c. 2). No one has any knowledge of himself except in action. It is empirically true that 'concupiscence hath of itself the nature of sin' (Thirty-nine Articles, 9), because in experience the line between suggestion and acquiescence is imaginary, and 'he that looketh on a woman to lust' knows that he has already committed adultery. And this is not inconsistent with the complementary truth that temptation is not sin. But, secondly, while it may be admitted that sin on this view is metaphysically not free from difficulty, it must be observed that no peculiar problem is created by it. It is not exposed to the objection which arises if it is explained in terms of a theory of heredity. Such theories are necessarily tentative and provisional, and it is the vice of all explanations based upon the current hypotheses of scientific investigation, that they tend to outrun assured results, and to involve religious truth in the imperfections of systems always in process of becoming antiquated. As soon, however, as it is perceived that the supposed analogy of an 'acquired character' transmitted by propagation to descendants does not accurately represent the teaching of Scripture, objections raised on this point of view of advancing science lose their force. The problem involved in the exercise of personal influence acting through the self-determining will of another personality, remains just where it is, whether sin be a reality or not; St. Paul's 'I, yet not I' stands for an experience which is constant, whether the inspiring influence be 'the grace of God' or 'sin that dwelleth in me.' Whatever may be true of hypnotic suggestion or of abnormal conditions like demoniacal possession, the normal course of personal influence, even of one man upon another, is not to paralyze the individual, so that the resultant action is not his but another's. That sharp separation of personalities which makes one human being wholly external to another may to some extent be due to the illusion of physical limitations. But at any rate, in dealing with 'spiritual wickedness,' we reach a sphere where these conditions are left behind, and the distinctions which they involve are inapplicable. That spirit should thus act upon spirit involves no new difficulty, because its possibility is involved in the creation of free, responsible personalities, capable of love and therefore of enmity, of responding to a spirit of evil no less than to the spirit of good. This may involve a race, just as the Holy Spirit indwells the Kingdom of heaven and each member of it. Sin is the antithesis, not of freewill, but of grace. The true analogy of redemption is rather the exorcism which leaves the subject 'clothed and in his right mind,' than the remedy which repairs the ravages of disease. Salvation is not the process by which the sinner is gradually transformed into the saint, but the act whereby the unrighteous is brought into the Kingdom of grace. No doubt the evil spirit may return to the house from which it went out, and we are not, therefore, compelled to reject facts of experience, and deny the gradual nature of self-conquest. But to think of sin as an inherited or acquired character which is being gradually reduced, is to introduce a distinction between original and actual sin which removes the former altogether from the category of guilt. Satan 'entered into Judas' (Lk 22³, Jn 13²⁷); and our Lord's statement—'He that is bathed needeth not save to wash his feet' (Jn 13¹⁰)—seems to imply liability to incur fresh guilt rather than a redemption as yet incomplete. That sin remains even in the regenerate is sufficiently accurate as an expression of the observed fact of the imperfect lives of Christians. But the deeper view of St. John is that disciples, being still in the world, have constant need to be kept from the Evil One in whom it lies, and to 'confess their sins' and 'forgiveness for sins' as the consequence of this spiritual contact.

7. The Biblical doctrine of sin, as here outlined, enables us to interpret the Incarnation in harmony with the best modern psychology. It is no longer possible to think of human nature apart from personality as a bundle of facilities, among which, as we have experience of it, is the faculty of sin. Sin therefore is not an ingredient in ordinary humanity, which must be regarded as absent from the pure humanity assumed by the Son of God. To inquire whether the manhood in Christ was capable of sin is irrelevant, when it is perceived that impersonal natures are abstractions of thought with no existence in fact. Sin is hostility to what Jesus Christ is, the living God. The house of a human or Divine, or, as in the case of Christ, both, cannot be divided against itself. The truth expressed in the Christian conception of the impersonal nature of the Lord is simply this, that He received by inheritance from the human race whatsoever is capable of transmission, the structural fabric with which biology is concerned, the material within which conscious personality expresses itself. Thus He is in all points like to His brethren, who inherit from their ancestry what in itself is morally neither good nor bad. He was identified with human sin, not only representatively but vitally (Ro 5¹²⁻²⁰, Ps 2²⁴)—a truth which so far eludes statement as almost inevitably to involve in heresy those who, like Edward Irving, seek to express it. But the Word became flesh, and that without sin, not because the virus was omitted in the act of conception, but because, being God, He cannot deny Himself, the terms 'sin' and 'God' being mutually exclusive. God became man under those conditions which sin had created, viz. the environment of Satan's Kingdom together with the guilt and penalty of death. He did not therefore redeem by becoming man, but by surrendering Himself to the entire consequences, reversing the sentence of condemnation, by death overcoming death, and opening the new environment of the Kingdom of heaven to all believers. The fact of the Atonement witnesses against the view that the Incarnation was the destruction of an evil heredity through union with the Divine nature. Its principle is the indwelling of the Personal Spirit of holiness first in Jesus Christ (Ro 1⁴) and thereafter in the free personalities of the children of God (8¹¹), expelling by His presence and power 'the spirit that now worketh in the sons of disobedience' (Eph 2²).

SINCERITY.—

The term.—In the English of 1611 'sincere' was an apt tr. of ἀδόλος applied to γάλα—'the sincere milk of the word' (1 P 2²). It has no longer, however, the sense of 'unadulterated' other than in an ethical sense, so that the RV goes back to the older version of Wyclif—'without gile.' 'Sincerity' must, however, always bear the association of that which is unmixed. In origin and in meaning it is akin to 'simplicity' and 'singleness' (ἀπλοῦς); in meaning to 'purity' (καθαρός, ἁγνός); but it is most often used in the RV to tr. ἀμεμιγμένος. In so far as this word differs from others of like meaning, it contemplates character as 'the purged, the winnowed, the unmingled.' If 'purity' (καθαρός) speaks of freedom from the defilements of the world as soiling the soul, 'sincerity' speaks of freedom from its falsehoods as from a foreign admixture (Trench, Synonyms, § LXXXV.). The word is used also to tr. ἀγνός and ᾠγιανός; but in every case it implies the absence of all that is false and that makes life double (Lightfoot on Ph 1¹⁰).

It follows from the usage of the word that it may be applied to mind, or to act, or to speech; but everywhere it carries the sense of unadulterated or unmingled, so that, while the word is not used in the Gospels, it is plain that these set forth in Christ the pattern of sincerity. It is also clear that Christ demanded of men sincerity, if they were to enter and to abide in the Kingdom of God. It is at once the characteristic of a Christian experience, and the mark of a Christian society.

1. The sincerity of Jesus.—The character of Jesus sets the standard of perfect sincerity; 'guile was not found in his mouth' (1 P 2²²); He is 'the true one' (ὁ ἀληθινός, 1 Jn 5²⁰), opposed by that title to all that is counterfeit. To know Him is to know the Truth and the Life (Jn 17³). The perfectly sincere man must be one (a) whose mind is perfectly responsive to the truth. It is not enough that he should speak and act from conviction. The conviction must be sincerely formed, without double-mindedness, without any falsehood of heart (Mt 5⁸, 2 P 3⁴). All that Jesus said and did must be the manifestation of an inner life; but the believer needs also the assurance that there was nothing in the mind of Jesus to distort the truth. It is not enough to believe that He means what He says; we must believe that He is able to receive without loss or deflexion the rays of the truth. In the Fourth Gospel much is said of the truth of Christ; this is more than His veracity (cf. Robertson's Sermons, vol. i. 'The Kingdom of the Truth'). He is the Way because He is the Truth (Jn 14⁶); He is the Light of the world (8¹²), and His light is the light of life. He is full of grace and truth (1¹⁷). His Kingdom is of the truth (18³⁷). He is set over against all that is unreal and partial and transitory. In Him there is an unbroken course for the revelation of the light and life of God (17^{6, 10, 21} etc.). Sincerity implies the single heart and eye, which alone can receive the vision of God. The sincerity of Jesus is more than the consistency of His action and speech with His thought; it involves His trustworthiness as a mediator of the truth. (b) But sincerity, in the more common usage of the word, implies that between the inner self and the expression, nothing intervenes to confuse or to distort. In the Gospel there is a picture of a life in which there is nothing to conceal; Jesus speaks and acts in such a way as to convince men that He is revealing His conviction. The Gospels manifest a life of perfect harmony. The manifestation is varied, but the motive is single. His gentleness and His sternness are alike the expression of His holy love, and never spring from idle sentiment, or personal feeling, or those cross-motives which break the peace of other lives.

At the outset of His ministry there comes the temptation to accept a compromise in the pursuit of His aims: He answers, 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve' (Lk 4⁸); no tampering with the mission in its means or in its ends could be tolerated. 'His means are pure and spotless as his ends' (Wordsworth). He is early contrasted with the scribes because of His authority (Mk 12⁷); this impression could have been made only by One acknowledged to be sincere. He wins from the first group of disciples the confidence accorded only to a manifest conviction. Even the scribes come to shrink from His clear gaze (11¹⁸). The accepted opinion is that Jesus speaks truly (Lk 20²¹). Many think Him mistaken, or beside Himself (Mk 3²¹), or blasphemous (14^{63, 64}), but none treat Him as a conscious deceiver. Jesus proves His sincerity by His steadfastness in His calling; dark as the way becomes, He never wavers (Mt 16^{22, 23}). It is possible that the Pharisees would not have been unwilling to compromise with Jesus, but He would keep back nothing of the truth.

In his Life of Jesus, Renan makes allowance for a lower standard of sincerity in the East than that to which the Western nations conform. 'To the deeply earnest races of the West, conviction means sincerity to one's self. But sincerity to one's self has not much meaning to Oriental people, little accustomed to the subtleties of a critical spirit. . . . The literal truth has little value for the Oriental; he sees everything through the medium of his ideas, his interests, and his passions. History is impossible if we do not fully admit that there are many standards of sincerity' (ch. 16). By such means Renan seeks to explain the attitude of Jesus to popular illusions, and the willingness which he finds in Jesus to take advantage of them in the interest of His enthusiastic purpose.

A truer criticism would rather attribute the story of such accommodation, if it were discerned, to the imperfect understanding of the East. However, no need to resort to such expedients to make it sufficiently plain that Jesus deliberately refused to work upon the popular imagination. Nor can it be forgotten that the standard of sincerity which Renan speaks, has been set by Christianity. There is there a more stern demand for truth and sincerity than in the Apostolic writings, which owe their inspiration to 'the mind of Christ.' It is impossible to regard as one among many phases of Oriental religion a faith which in its preparatory history declared that God demanded truth in the inward parts, and in its fulfilment manifested to the world One who was known as 'the Truth.'

2. Teaching of Jesus.—Everywhere Jesus demands reality. It is the pure in heart who see God (Mt 5⁸). It is the condition of spiritual vision. If the eye be single, the whole body shall be full of light (6²²). Jesus calls for truth of heart. 'There is a truth which lies behind the recognition of particular truths. It is the basis of all right beliefs.' 'Sincerum est nisi vas quodcumque infundis accipit' (Horace, Ep. i. 2. 54). Those who receive the revelation which Jesus brings are likened to babes (νῆπιος) (Mt 11²⁵). Only those who become as little children can enter into the Kingdom (18³). It is the singleness of the child, his truth of heart, and freedom from ulterior motives, that are praised. In the life that is in the Kingdom there must be no confusion of ends; it must be perfect (τέλειος), as the Father is perfect (5⁴⁸). It is the unpurged mind that misses the vision. If the soul is divided, the profession of the lips will be of no avail (7²²). Words must not be idle (12²⁶) (ἀργον), without any corresponding inward thought and outward action. Words must be the 'incarnation of thought.' Nothing must intervene between the mind of the speaker and his word. Oaths are condemned as likely to take from the severe demands of truthful speech. The yea must be yea, the nay, nay (5³⁷). An oath lowers the value of normal speech. In all other parts of life there must be the same absence of artificiality. There cannot be two masters (6²⁴). One must seek first the Kingdom (6³³), and must not be over-anxious for food and raiment. He must not only be wise as a serpent, but sincere, simple (ἀκέραιος) (10¹⁶) as a dove (cf. Ph 2¹⁵). He must worship in spirit and in truth (Jn 4²⁴). It was this simplicity that Jesus found in the disciples whom He chose; like Nathanael, they were Israelites without guile (14⁷), ἰσραηλῆται οὐκ ἔσθλ.

SINLESSNESS.—'The sinlessness of Jesus' is a phrase which only imperfectly indicates the ground it is intended to cover. It is too negative. 'The sinless perfection of Jesus' would be a more adequate phrase. But 'the sinlessness of Jesus' has an attractive sound; it is the title of a book—that of Ullmann cited below—which may be called classical; and it would be unwise to displace it from the position of honour it occupies, although we must use it with the understanding that it means more than it says. It is not to be confounded with the errorlessness of Jesus. Indeed, the very latest writer on the subject (Max Meyer, op. cit. infr.) refers with the utmost frankness, if we ought not rather to say thoughtlessness, to the mistakes of Jesus (p. 9), while vigorously defending His sinlessness. But on this subject see the much more profoundly considered judgment of Dörner (Glaubenslehre, ii. p. 472^f.) and Tholuck (Das AT im NT, p. 24 ff.).

An argument for the sinlessness of Jesus has been elaborated by Ullmann from the prevalence of holiness in Christendom.

Wherever Christianity exists—thus there holiness also is to be seen. While holiness may be of rare occurrence in any society, there is not a country, or even a town or village, in which Christianity is established but there will be found in it numbers of persons striving after a holy life. In every Christian congregation there are at least a few specimens of character so striking that even those who are themselves destitute of religious aspiration acknowledge them to be no earthly products, but to have a heavenly origin; while more fervent servers will say that to them the sight of one such holy person has been a more potent agent for the reality and the blessedness of religion than they have ever known in this Christian. It is true that heathenism—men—that is, persons separated from the world and devoted to God—but it requires little discrimination to perceive the difference between an Indian fakir and a Christian saint. The classical nations produced many a splendid specimen of human nature; but the best of them were essentially different from those whom Christendom would recognize as holy. One must know who has read the history of the world was not holy in the Christian sense, but, at certain points, very much the reverse. In what precisely the difference consists it may not be easy to say, but it is quite easy to feel, holiness being, like beauty and some more of the finest things, in the last resort indescribable. But whatever may be its exact definition, holiness is, at all events, essentially Christian. Those who are possessed of it would acknowledge that they owe it to Christ, their communion with God being based on the sense of reconciliation through Christ, and their benevolence towards men due to their adoption of His views as to the dignity and destiny of human nature. They are imitators of Him, yet they always know Him to be infinitely above them. Here, then, is the argument: 'If Christ is the source of holiness in others, and if He stands far above the holiest of those who derive it from Him, it is a reasonable inference that He must Himself be sinless' (op. cit. pt. ii. ch. 2, § 3).

On different minds such an argument will make different impressions; but we are certainly going upon more solid ground when we turn to the testimony of Scripture.

1. Here the first thing to be noted is the impression which He made in the days of His flesh on both friends and foes. Thus, when He presented Himself for baptism among the multitude at the Jordan, the Baptist forbade Him, saying, 'I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?' (Mt 3). Whether this sense of inferiority and unworthiness on the part of the Baptist be ascribed to a long acquaintance with Jesus beforehand, or to the rapt dignity in the expression of Jesus at the moment, it is equally remarkable. Even more pronounced was the sense of the same contrast expressed by St. Peter, when, after the miracle wrought before his eyes in his own boat, he shrank away, exclaiming, 'Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord!' (Lk 5⁸). This was the spontaneous effect on a sensitive conscience of the proximity of the Divine; it was the terror of sin at the manifestation of sinlessness. These were testimonies of friends; but His enemies, in their involuntary tributes, were no less struck. The centurion who presided over the execution of Jesus exclaimed, as he saw Him expire: 'Certainly this was a righteous man' (23⁴⁷). The wife of Pilate made use of almost the identical expression when she sent to her husband the message: 'Have thou nothing to do with this just man' (Mt 27¹⁹). Pilate himself said: 'I find no fault in him' (Jn 19⁶). And even Judas Iscariot, though he had known Him long, and had, at the moment when he spoke, a strong interest in recalling anything with which he could have found fault as an excuse for his own conduct, . . . that he had betrayed 'innocent blood' . . .

2. Of more importance are the statements in what may be called the authoritative parts of the NT. St. John says: 'Ye know that he was manifested to take away sins; and in him is no sin' (1 Jn 3⁹). Such was the total impression his disciple from the years of Master. Elsewhere he expresses more positively, as for instance in the prologue to his Gospel; but this statement of the negative may here suffice. Next to St. John in intimacy was St. Peter; and he summed up his experiences, very soon after these had been received, when, in his great speech on the Day of Pentecost, he referred to Jesus as 'the Holy and Righteous One' (Ac 3¹⁴); and that, with the process of time, his convictions on this point had not changed is proved by the declaration in one of his Epistles: 'Christ also suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to himself' (1 P 1¹⁹). St. Paul echoes the same sentiment when he states: 'Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf, that we might become the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5²¹). No other NT writer has, however, set down statements on this theme so striking and beautiful as those of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who calls Jesus 'holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners' (7²⁶); and, in another passage, declares: 'We have not an high priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but one that hath been in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (4¹⁵). These quotations are not exhaustive; but they are so directly to the point that it is useless to add to them. If there be any virtue in proof-texts, the sinlessness of Jesus is proved beyond contradiction.

3. Of all the testimonies of the NT, however, the one to which we turn with the keenest curiosity is the testimony of Jesus Himself; and we have to see whether He committed Himself on this subject. The result of such an examination is perhaps less satisfying than what might have been hoped. On one occasion, indeed, He said to His opponents: 'Which of you convicteth me of sin?' (Jn 8⁴⁶); and if, as appears to be the case, this was a general challenge in reference to His whole life and conduct, and not a denial of a particular sin, it would hardly have been possible to make a more distinct claim to sinlessness. On the same occasion He said: 'He that sent me is with me: he hath not left me alone; for I do always the things that please him' (v. 29). Very similar was His statement on another occasion: 'My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work' (4³⁴). To the Apostles, at the Last Supper, He said: 'I will no more speak unto you: or the prince of this world cometh, and he hath nothing in me' (14³⁰), which seems to be a denial that in Him there was any point of contact where the Evil One might bring his accusations or fasten his temptations. It will be observed that all these citations are from the Gospel of St. John; and there are none of equal force in the other Gospels.

But if the things about Himself which He says in this connexion are less striking than might have been expected, all the more impressive are the things about Himself which He does not say. He never makes any confession of personal sin. This is one of the cardinal facts of the Gospels. It is not as if He had been one of those religious teachers who, whether deliberately or inadvertently, pass by the subject of sin. Not only did He spend a great deal of His activity in the denunciation of sin, but He taught His own intimate disciples to pray habitually for deliverance from it; no fewer than three of the petitions of the Lord's Prayer being to this effect. Yet what He advised others to do He never, as far as we can learn, did Himself. Of His intimate life of prayer we possess pretty ample records; but in none of these are there any confessions of sin. This omission is all the more remarkable when the practice of other conspicuous figures in Holy Writ is noticed. The most prominent names of the OT are all remarkable for their frequent and ample confessions of personal guilt. Thus the Psalmist says: 'Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me' (Ps 51⁵); Isaiah says: 'Woe is me; for I am undone; for I am a man of unclean lips' (6⁵); Job groans: 'I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes' (42⁶); Ezra prays: 'O my God, I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God: for our iniquities are increased over our heads, and our guiltiness is grown up unto the heavens' (9⁹). With the corresponding figures of the NT it is not different. Thus St. Paul cries: 'O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me out of the body of this death?' (Ro 7²⁴); and even the saintly St. John confesses: 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us' (1 Jn 1⁸). Thus, both the worthies of the OT, from whom Jesus learned, and the worthies of the NT, who learned from Him, speak on this subject with one consent; and it may be added that the more of religious genius any of them had, the more poignant were their cries for pardon. Jesus, however, differs in this respect radically from them all, and science must assign a reason for the contrast. If it was a defect, it was a serious one. If He sinned, like the other children of Adam, but failed to be humbled and to confess His fault, this brings Him down beneath the religious heroes of the race; for what feature of religious genius is more essential than humility? But if it was no defect, what other explanation of it can there be but sinlessness?

4. Objections. — Ever since the time of Celsus there have been objections raised to the sinlessness of Jesus, and exceptions, more or less specific, taken to His moral character. During the greater portion of Christian history, however, it has been taken for granted that He was without sin; this being the very least that has been almost universally conceded by any affecting to believe on His humanity and sense. Even the early Socinians were ardent defenders of this doctrine. It was not till the age of Deism and Rationalism that to express doubts on this subject became a common characteristic of unbelief. The revival of evangelical faith in the nineteenth century raised up a host of defenders, not only those in the full current of the revival being on this side, as a matter of course, but many distinguished scholars who stood somewhat aside, such as Schleiermacher, Schweizer, Hase, Keim and Weizsäcker being forward in the same cause. On the contrary, Strauss, in his books on the Life of Jesus, advanced further and further in the direction of denial; and Pécaut in Le Christ et la Conscience, 1859, displayed a zeal worthy of a better cause in heaping up every conceivable objection to the Saviour's conduct. On the whole, the great series of Lives of Christ, which have formed a leading feature of the theology of the last two generations, have been loyal to the conviction and testimony of Christendom; but, in the very latest productions which have appeared in this field, an uncertain sound is heard (see, e.g., O. Holtzmann, Leben Jesu, esp. p. 34; Weinle, Jesus im neunzehnten Jahrhundert, esp. pp. 61 ff. and 274 ff.), so that it is quite within the bounds of possibility, or even probability, that this belief may have to be earnestly contended for in the not distant future.

The objections alleged are either (a) of a more general and ; '.....' il order, or (b) relate to actions of Jesus in the Gospels which are considered inconsistent with a perfect character.

(a) In the days of the Old Rationalism the commonest objection was that sinless perfection is inconsistent with moral development: man has to raise himself from matter to spirit, and from imperfection to perfection. Kant held that virtue consists solely of moral conflict; and many, appealing to him, concluded that Jesus could not be a genuine man unless He began in imperfection and fought His way up to sinlessness. Similar to this is the well-known position of Strauss, that it is not the way of the idea, in fulfilling itself in actuality, to pour all its fulness into one specimen, which is thereby enabled to boast itself over all the rest; but that, on the contrary, it likes to display its riches in a multiplicity of specimens, which mutually supplement and complete one another. Such objections formed part and parcel of the intellectual world in which they were excoagitated; and, as that world has long ago passed, it is hardly necessary now to attempt the refutation.

Far more persistent has been the impression that sinlessness is inconsistent with genuine temptation; and as it is certain that Jesus was tempted, it may be argued that He cannot have been sinless.

Under the stress of this consideration, Schleiermacher, who made the sinlessness of Jesus the very basis of his speculative system, practically denied the reality of the temptation of Jesus. Edward Irving, on the other hand, held that the teaching of Scripture as Ro 8² and Col 1²², that Jesus was free from sin, of Jesus had in itself the principle of sin and error, and not only was capable of erring and falling, but was disposed to all evil; although, by the energy of the Holy Ghost within Him and the energy of His holy will, He overcame every temptation as it arose.

What Irving and others who have agreed with him or adopted kindred notions have felt has been that, without such imperfection in the human nature of Christ as they postulate, there can have been no real conflict with evil, and that so the accounts of our Lord's temptation, which are intended to be so priceless to His tempted disciples, lose their virtue, the conflict being reduced to a sham fight. To this it has been replied, by Dörner and others, that the presence in the human nature of our Lord of the contrast between knowing and acting, which is the very essence of the human condition, is not only possible, but necessary; for the knowledge is antecedent to the action, and must be brought up to the level of knowledge. Further, the contrast between body and spirit makes conflict possible, because the body may, without sin, feel strongly all the justness of law; yet the spirit may discern the necessity for overcoming these and accepting, as Jesus did, suffering and peculiar vocation. As a faultless man, Jesus, the rewards and pleasures which ought, in the nature of things, to ensue upon well-doing; and it could not be without conflict that He resigned His rights and embraced a lot so contrary to His deserts. In the little work of Meyer, mentioned below, the greater part of the space is devoted to the solution of these riddles.

However the enigma is to be solved, certain it is that Jesus was tempted. The scenes in the Wilderness, in Gethsemane, and on the Cross, when He is represented as in conflict with the powers of evil, were not less severe than the similar experiences of ordinary mortals, but far more so. His purity made the inrush of temptation more painful. His humanity had not the stolid calm of a lethargic temperament, but was sensitive at every pore; He felt not less but more than others the condemnation of unjust authority, the desertion of friends, and the apparent frustration of Providence. Even if the attempt to reconcile the two should be beyond the reach of human wisdom, we will not surrender either member of the great assertion, that He was tempted 'like as we are, yet without sin' (He 4¹⁵).

(b) The other kind of objection relates to specific statements of the Gospel history which are held to be inconsistent with sinlessness. Thus, it is contended that His staying behind at Jerusalem, when He was twelve years of age, and His answer to Joseph and Mary, were not worthy of an obedient child; and objection is, in like manner, taken to His sharp reply to His mother when she tried to turn Him back from the fulfilment of His vocation. In cleansing the Temple, He is charged with displaying undue vehemence, and it is held that He exhibited an arrogance unbecoming His youth and His position in His attacks on the scribes and Pharisees. In cursing the fig-tree, it is claimed, He gave way to temper; and, in the casting of the demons out of the possessed man of Gadara and giving them permission to enter the swine, with the result that two thousand of these were lost to their owners, He displayed a lack of respect for the rights of property. Most of such charges are venerable with age and have been answered so often that it may be scarcely necessary to attempt to answer them again; but there are two more, of which we may require to be said.

It is held that the action of Jesus in presenting Himself before John to receive 'the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins,' betrayed a consciousness of guilt. This objection has been recently revived by O. Holtzmann, who quotes from the Gospel to the Hebrews—a document to which he attaches great importance—as an argument to the effect that, when Jesus came to His mother and His brethren to accompany them to the Jordan, Jesus demanded wherefore He should go, as He had no sin to wash away, but immediately checked Himself by adding, 'Unless, indeed, this is uttered in ignorance'; and the author adds that, unless Jesus had said this, no writer of a Gospel would have invented it. Much more, however, is known of the Gospel to the Hebrews would require to be ascertained before this could be asserted; it may have been the organ of an Ebionite tendency in the early Church, to which such an invention would have been congenial (cf. Euseb. HE iii. 27). The movement of John had a positive as well as a negative side: it was not only a 'baptism of repentance,' but a great new consecration to God and country, in which Jesus was bound to take the lead; and many have believed that, even at this stage, He so identified Himself with His people that He felt their sin to be His own, and in the act of baptism symbolized that washing of it away which was to be accomplished through His death.

The other objection to which importance attaches is the answer of Jesus to one who addressed Him as 'Good Master'—'Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God' (Mk 10¹⁸). It is not obvious why Jesus should have objected to be called 'Good Master,' such a mode of address being, one would suppose, a form of courtesy in which there was no harm; and this suggests the probability that the humour or irony of Jesus may have been at play: so that it is dangerous to interpret Him too literally. What was it that He wished to turn the inquirer's attention to? Stier's dictum is not to be forgotten: 'Either, There is none good but God; Christ is good; therefore Christ is God; or, There is none good but God; Christ is not God; therefore Christ is not good.' The reading in Mt. (19¹⁷), where the point under discussion is the Good in the sense of the Summum Bonum, renders it dubious what was the real topic of the conversation. But if it really was about whether or not Jesus was good, then it is possible to say that Jesus was not 'good' in the same sense as God; because His goodness, being that of a human being, was only in process of becoming, and had to realize itself on every step of a long ascent. The comment of Dr. A. B. Bruce in EGT may be subjoined: 'The word "good" means not "The epithet is not applicable to Me, but to God only," but "Do not think that my goodness is a matter of mere outward appearance." The case is parallel to that of the man Jesus to be called Christ indiscriminately.' Weinel complains that this objection is usually answered with too much levity; and it cannot be denied that there is a body of objections worthy of candid and careful investigation. Not only will they bear pondering, but they will reward it; for if they do not cause the student to stumble, they will have the opposite effect of leading him further into the mystery of the Person of Christ.

SKINS.—See BOTTLE and WINE.

SKULL, PLACE OF.—See GOLGOTHA.

SKY.—In the two places (Mt 16², Lk 12⁵⁶) where this word occurs in the AV of the Gospels, the term 'heaven' is substituted in RV. There is no doubt that this tends towards correctness of rendering, as heaven is the translation of the Greek word (οὐρανός) elsewhere (see REDNESS OF SKY). Where 'sky' is referred to in the Gospels it is the usual sense of cloud region or aerial expanse that is intended. This was the primary sense, indeed, of οὐρανός—the firmament, the vault above the earth. There is nothing in the two passages above to differentiate the 'sky' from the 'heaven' of Mt 24³¹. The word is the representative of the Hebrew שָׁמַיִם the upper regions. It reflects the old supposition that the firmament was an actual canopy above the earth. Still the figurative use of the term is well-illustrated even in scientific treatises (like, for instance, Tyndall's Fracture of Science). In both passages the immediate reference is to the meteorological interpretations of the colour of the sky. W. S. KERR.

SLAVE, SLAVERY.—While δοῦλος is the general term for 'a slave,' οἰκέτης (Lk 16¹³; cf. Ac 10⁷, Ro 14¹, 1 P 2¹⁸) denotes specifically one employed in household service or in immediate attendance upon the master or δεσπότης. Except in the latter form the institution did not flourish amongst the Jews in NT times. Field-work was done generally by hired labourers (μίσθιος, Lk 15¹⁷); or less technically ἐργάτης, Mt 10¹⁰ 20¹, cf. Ja 5⁴). In large houses, especially of a Gentile (Lk 7²) or foreign type, there would be slaves, generally of non-Jewish or mixed blood, as also in the great establishments of the Sadduceean and priestly aristocracy. In Palestine the institution was familiar enough in experience as well as tradition to supply popular illustrations and give point to practical religious teaching; but features met with in Greek and especially in Roman usage must not be transferred without modification to the Jewish practice. Not only were the dimensions different, but the prevalent oppression and fear in the one case were replaced in the other by a general spirit of kindness and content.

1. Jewish slaves abroad.—On several occasions before the Fall of Jerusalem, large numbers of Jews had been deported and sold into captivity. Such incidents were frequent during the wars of the Seleucids and Ptolemies (cf. 1 Mac 3⁴¹, 2 Mac 8²¹), and recur during the period of the Roman over-rule (Jos. BJ vi. ix. 3). Herod ordained that thieves should be sold to foreigners; but the enactment aroused such a degree of animosity as rendered its enforcement impracticable (Jos. Ant. XVI. i. 1). The supply of Jewish slaves was kept up almost entirely from among prisoners taken in the numerous campaigns, and the children of those who were already in captivity, with a few who lost their freedom under the laws of the foreign country or city in which they resided. Their treatment, like that of other slaves, was as a rule cruel to the degree of barbarity. Exceptions are met with, where courtesy to slaves is commended, as by Seneca (Ep. xlvii.). But the great mass of evidence is on the other side. Pallas, a brother of Felix (Ac 23²⁴), considered his slaves too abject to be spoken to, and would signify his pleasure to them only by a gesture or nod (Tac. Ann. xiii. 23). The slave was merely property, and could be transferred like any other property. He was incapable of contracting a legal marriage, and was not regarded as invested with any rights. On the ground of expediency, he was gradually protected against excessive cruelty. By the Lex Petronia, which may have been first enacted in the time of Augustus, a slave could not be punished by condemnation to fight with gladiators or wild beasts; and the master's power of life and death was threatened, if not actually restricted, by Claudius. In such hesitating improvements of their condition Jewish slaves abroad would share.

The redemption of Jewish slaves was regarded in theory as a sacred duty (cf. Neh 5⁸); but there is no evidence of any general attempt during our period to acquire the merit of such service. The wealth of the country was chiefly in the hands of those sections of the people in whom racial feeling was not strong; and the majority were at once too poor and too much hindered by political conditions to be able to act in other than rare individual cases. The price of a slave, or of his redemption, varied with his condition, with the state of the market. Prices for the 1st cent. are not available. Ptolemy Philadelphus redeemed Jewish captives in Egypt at the price of 120 drachmæ, or about £4 each (Jos. Ant. XII. ii. 3). And Nicanor endeavoured to raise the Roman tribute of 2000 talents by the sale of Jews at the rate of ninety per talent (2 Mac 8¹⁰⁴).

2. Slaves in Palestine.—Nehemiah's influence had made it a fundamental rule in Jewish practice that no Jew should be held as a slave by another Jew (cf. Neh 5⁸); and as the rule obtained also in Talmudical times (cf. Winter, Die Stellung der Sklaven, 10 ff.), it is almost certain to have been observed in the intermediate period. Even thieves were not to be reduced to a state of permanent slavery; and while the disorganization of trade due to a strict observance of the Sabbath law of Dt 15¹⁻¹¹ was prevented by Hillel's statute of Prosbol, which made registered debts always recoverable, other means were adopted of freeing poor Jews from the burden of their mortgages than that of their reduction to actual servitude. Work was accepted and required as a substitute for repayment, but as far as possible the personal freedom of the debtor was respected. The rule, as to females, the Talmud decides that a wife can never be sold into slavery, but that a daughter under marriageable age can; with the apparent provision that, if she be sold again, the purchaser must not be a foreigner. Amongst the Essenes, the holding of slaves was unknown and not allowed (Philo, ed. Mang. ii. 457, 482; Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 5). In a few of the great houses of alien officials there would be the retinue usual in other lands; but even then the slaves would be chiefly of Canaanitish or mixed blood. In Jewish houses free service was the rule for men, whilst some of the girls might be servile in status, though comparatively unrestrained. By law, and even more effectively by usage and public sentiment, they were protected from many cruelties customarily practised against their class elsewhere.

3. Treatment of slaves.—Discipline without undue laxity was recognized as the right treatment of slaves (cf. Sir 33^{24a}), where the two prominent features are the severity to which the discipline might legally be carried, viz., 'yoke and thong' and even 'racks and tortures,' and the kindness that was the customary rule. So in NT times the master could legally imprison or chastise a slave (Mt 25³⁰, Lk 12⁴⁶ with the alternative rendering 'severely scourge'), though the power of life and death was withheld, as also any punishment that led to the loss of a limb. An early tradition recounts a controversy between Pharisees and Sadducees, assumed to have taken place in or about our period, as to the incidence of the responsibility for an injury done by a slave (Yadayim, iv. 7). The solution of the Pharisees was that the slave himself, and not the master, must be held responsible, as the slave was capable of reasoning, and not to be classed with beasts of burden. Another regulation (Babâ Lamda, viii. 4) required the slave to make compensation on his release, and thus has clearly in view a case of temporary servitude amongst Jews, akin to those met with in the OT.

At a time when Pharisaism was predominant, such slaves as were found in a Jewish household, whether Hebrews or aliens by birth, had on religious grounds to be treated humanely. They shared the . . . and in regard to obligations were . . . the women and children as bound to observe all religious ritual in the home, except the repetition of the Shema and the wearing of phylacteries. Laws of an earlier date required the circumcision of slaves (Gn 17¹²) and their participation in feast and sacrifice (Dt 12¹⁸ 16¹¹). Such regulations could not have fallen into desuetude without involving the ceremonial pollution from which it was one of the first objects of the legalists of the first century to . . . The knitting together of master and slave . . . bonds supplied a strong motive for kindness and forbearance. And in later literature the life of the Jewish home is represented as united and happy, master and slave partaking of the same food, exchanging words of respect and tenderness, and mourning over the separation effected by death (Berakhôth 16b, Kethubôth 61). Altogether the condition of slavery, as far as it existed, was much less oppressive than in Greece or Rome, and was already being superseded by the freer relationships of voluntary service, which alone are in complete accord with the genius of Christianity.

4. Teaching of the Gospels.—The institution of slavery was not directly condemned by Christ, but its continuance was undermined by the new principles of social life which He emphasized. Supreme praise is passed upon service marked by absolute submission (Mk 10⁴⁴). The title of slave is appropriated to the highest usage (Mt 21²⁴, Mk 12²⁴, Lk 20¹⁰⁶), and sanction is thus given to the practice which had applied it to Moses (cf. Jos 14⁷, Ps 105²⁶), and made it the formal style of a prophet (cf. Jer 7²⁵, Zec 1⁶, and the Pauline usage of the term). Redemptive love recognizes no distinctions of sex or status, but makes men of all social ranks equally responsible for their attitude towards God; and thus society becomes an organism of free men, amongst whom the only authority that is strictly imperial or beyond questioning is that of Christ. The bond-servant of Jesus Christ can be bound to no other master; and in their equal dependence upon Him disciples cease to be able to maintain artificial distinctions of grade or privilege.

SLEEP (ὕπνος, καθεύδω, ἀφνιπνῶ, κοιμώμαι).—The mention of sleep is frequent in the Gospels, both in its literal and in its figurative meanings.

1. Literally, e.g. 'Joseph being raised out of sleep' (Mt 1²⁴); 'Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep' (Lk 9³²); (Jesus) 'findeth them asleep' (Mt 26⁴⁰⁻⁴³); 'Simon, sleepest thou?' (Mk 14³⁷). Jesus, as is noted by all the Synoptists, fell asleep in the boat as He and His disciples were crossing to the other side of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8²⁴ || Mk 4³⁸ || Lk 8²³). Mk. adds the detail that He slept 'on the pillow' (ἐπὶ τὸ προσκεφάλαιον), probably a boat cushion, or a head-rest made of wool. Lk. indicates that He was fast asleep (ἀφνιπνῶ), which accords with the fact that the severe storm which had burst forth while they were crossing did not awake Him.

2. Figuratively: (i.) As a metaphor for death, 'The maid is not dead, but sleepeth' (καθεύδει, Mt 9²⁴ || Mk 5³⁹ || Lk 8⁵²); 'Our friend Lazarus sleepeth' (is fallen asleep, κεκοιμήται, Jn 11¹¹). No distinction is to be made between the verbs καθεύδει and κοιμώμαι, for the disciples reply, 'Lord, if he sleep (κεκοιμήται), he shall do well' (v. 12); cf. also Mt 27⁵² with Mt 28¹³ || Lk 22⁴⁸, and Ac 7⁶⁰ 13³⁰ with Ac 12⁶. St. Paul . . . uses κοιμώμαι to describe the dead (1 Co. 15. . . Th 4¹³⁻¹⁵), and to express the fact of death (1 Co 7³⁹ 11³⁰ 15⁶ 51; cf. also 2 P 3⁴). The metaphor is very ancient. It is found in the OT, 'Since thou art laid down' (in the LXX 'fallen asleep' [κεκοιμήσαι], Is 14⁸; cf. Is 43⁷ || 1 K 11⁴³); and in classical literature (Hom. Il. xi. 241; Soph. Elect. 509). (ii.) As symbolizing the lack of watchfulness: 'while men slept his enemy came' (Mt 13²⁵); 'lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping' (Mk 13³⁶). (iii.) The interpretation of the sleep of the virgins ('while the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered [νυστάζω, 'nodded'] and slept,' Mt 25⁵) is uncertain. Many of the ancient interpreters take it as the sleep of death which comes to all. By some modern writers it has been interpreted as the sleep of . . . symbolizing that the day of the coming . . . of Christ, is unknown, or as a hint that that day is not immediately at hand. Others take it as the sleep of security, indicating that the wise and the foolish virgins, having made such preparation as they thought necessary, awaited the coming of the bridegroom with such calmness of mind that they fell asleep. Probably the best interpretation is that which regards the sleep as the natural and innocent unconsciousness or obliviousness of the future and the eternal, and especially of the coming of Christ, which is . . . the wise and the foolish alike. This . . . however, is full of danger to those who do not keep themselves in such a condition of readiness for any event that they are prepared for it when it comes. We are not to be always thinking of the Lord's coming, but are to live so that that event will not come upon us in a state of unreadiness. 'The tension of the mind may innocently and must naturally vary. It is enough that its intention is ever the same—that we live under the power of the future and the eternal even when not thinking of it' (Bruce).

JOHN REID.

SLOTHFULNESS.—1. Gospel usage.—The noun 'sloth' is not found; the adj. 'slothful' (δοληρός) occurs once only (Mt 25²⁶). The wicked, slothful, and unprofitable servant is silhouetted once, for all men and time. The words, 'Thou wicked and slothful servant,' were in the Gospel well coupled; and the first epithet was grounded on the second, he being therefore wicked, because he had been slothful (Barrow). It is the man of one talent, and he who has buried the same, that is guilty of the sin of sloth. That is true psychology. But let every man give heed unto himself. Genius has yielded to this sin as well as mediocrity. Stewardship of five talents has been neglected and equally in that case the 'precipitate' or character has been sloth.

2. The life of Jesus a rebuke to slothfulness.—The Saviour was in all respects a complete opposite to 'the slothful servant.' The zeal of the Lord ate Him up (Jn 21⁷). Early and late He wearied not in well-doing, but accomplished what was given Him to do. 'Our great example, the life of our blessed Lord Himself, what was it but one continual exercise of labour? His mind did ever stand bent in careful attention, studying to do good. His body was ever moving in wearisome travel to the same Divine intent' (Barrow). His practice stimulates to diligence, His preaching warns to avoid sloth. The Apostle Paul was built on the same model. When he bids men be 'not slothful in business' (Ro 12¹¹ AV), these are the words of a man who was in labours most abundant (2 Co 11²³).

SLOWNESS OF HEART.—A disposition which our Lord discerned in His disciples, especially in relation to His Person and work (Lk 21¹⁰ ἡρησμένοι τῇ καρδίᾳ). He connects it with 'emptiness of mind' (ἀνοήτως, cf. Bengel, who paraphrases, 'void of mind and slow of heart') as the joint cause of their failure to understand and believe the things which He taught. This is characteristic of the disciples' attitude toward the whole of Christ's teaching (cf. Mt 15¹⁰⁻¹⁷ 16⁸⁻¹², Jn 14⁹); and the order in which the epithets are employed in Lk 24²⁵ suggests that slowness of heart is the root from which dullness of mind concerning spiritual truth springs. The disciples believed, but slowly, and with a heavy heart. There was an element of reluctance in their faith. Jesus was not the sort of Messiah they expected, and His teaching was not the kind of teaching they desired. Hence His words, in consequence, encountered in their hearts an unwillingness to believe which generated, in its turn, failure to understand. Slowness of heart thus reveals a moral fault. The free action of faith is hindered by prejudice of one kind or another. The will is biased in a different direction (cf. Jn 7¹⁷). As Godet says, 'If they had embraced the living God with more fervent faith, the fact of the resurrection would not have been so strange to their hopes' (Com. on St. Luke's Gospel, vol. ii. p. 354). Slowness of heart is the opposite extreme to that over-quickness of faith which our Lord dramatized in the parable of the Sower under the figure of the rocky ground. Between these extremes there is a quickness of heart which is ready to believe whatever bears the sufficient warrant of the Word of God. Of this quickness Nathanael is a striking instance (Jn 14⁴⁵⁻⁴⁹). Thomas, on the other hand, illustrates slowness of heart, while Christ's treatment of him shows us how He deals with such slow believers and quickens their faith into great confessions (20²⁴⁻²⁹).

SMOKING FLAX (λινον τυφόμενον, Mt 12²⁰).—The little earthenware lamp is largely replaced to-day, even in the houses of the fellahin in Palestine, by lamps made by travelling tinsmiths from the tins in which petroleum is imported. But the old-fashioned lamp, resembling those dug out of ancient graves, is still to be seen. Olive oil is poured into the bowl of the lamp, and for wick a few strands of flaxen fibre or cotton thread twisted together are inserted. As the oil is consumed the flame sinks, and the wick fills the house with peculiarly disagreeable smoke. The lamp must be replenished with oil, and the wick trimmed, or, as more frequently happens when the smoking stage is reached, the flax is 'quenched' and cast out.

SNARE (παγίς, βρόχος).—παγίς (Lk 21³¹, Ro 11⁹, etc.) is primarily a trap, then a trick or snare. βρόχος (1 Co 7³⁵) is a noose or slip-knot for hanging or strangling, then a snare for birds, or the mesh of a net. We can hardly take παγίς in Lk 21³⁵, with Godet (Com. in loc.), as a net enclosing a flock of unsuspecting birds. The idea in both words is simply that of a snare or snare, as the bird in the fowler's snare, or the hare in the use of which Arab boys are so expert—or the hare in the noose cunningly spread in its path.

SOCIABILITY.—See CHARACTER OF CHRIST in vol. i. p. 289 ff.

SOCIALISM.—1. Definition, etc.—'The watchword of the Socialist is Co-operation: the watchword of the anti-Socialist is Competition. Any one who recognizes the principle of Co-operation as a stronger and truer principle than that of Competition, has a right to the honour or the disgrace of being called a Socialist.' This definition was written by Frederic Denison Maurice in the first of a series of Tracts on Christian Socialism, which was published in 1849. Maurice, Kingsley, and T. Hughes deliberately adopted the word 'Socialist' for the movement which they founded, and incurred, as Hughes has testified, much 'anger and bitterness' as a result; but, since then, the Socialist idea has had a secure place in the speculations and activities of modern Christianity. It is evident, however, that Socialism so defined is a much broader thing than the State Socialism of economic theory, or than that of the Social Democratic parties of contemporary politics. Fifty years ago, indeed, many men did regard competition as a stronger and truer principle than co-operation; and Socialism (in Maurice's sense) has had an easy victory over the Individualism which was dominant in the thought of many of his day; in this sense the saying is true that 'We are all Socialists now.' But a man may be against Individualism or Anarchism, and to that extent a Socialist, and yet may hold the current conceptions both of economic theory and of Socialism; he may possibly regard the growth of municipal undertakings with alarm, and he may even look, as Thomas Carlyle did, to the 'strong man,' and not to the democracy, for deliverance from the evils of insufficiently restricted competition.

Yet general principles are of more importance than economic theories which must necessarily shift with changing conditions of life; and Socialism, defined as the principle of fellowship, may safely claim to be an integral part of Christianity, working itself out in one aspect in the abolition of feudalism and canon law, in another in the representative government and factory legislation, and tending, through the improvement of individual character, to the ideal state. That ideal state, whether it prove to be either socialist or anarchist, or whether society now is) somewhere between these two extremes; for, indeed, if men were perfect, the machinery of society would be a matter of indifference. It is because men are imperfect that the economic and political machinery is a matter of urgent importance. Here 'Socialism,' as an active Christian principle, comes in; for though Christians must always claim the supreme importance of personal regeneration, as against those who think that society can be made perfect by the mere operation of the State, it must also be admitted that a religion which attempts to deal only with the individual, and leaves society to its own devices and the laws of supply and demand, is untrue to itself, and is doomed to failure. Individual character cannot be regenerated while it is being destroyed by bad housing, or by intemperance, or by commercial selfishness and dishonesty, or while multitudes are 'submerged' and 'sweated.' Such things as these are therefore the immediate concern of the Christian; and far more so the great causes—economic, political, ethical—which lie behind them. Now it is undeniable that, for a considerable period before Maurice wrote, the 'religious world' as a whole had ignored this truth, and had neglected its social duty to the weak and oppressed,—a neglect of which the results are still painfully evident to-day. There had indeed always existed a better tradition: the Quakers* had been a powerful leaven of commercial morality; Wilberforce and his friends had, after a protracted battle of 20 years, conquered Individualism in the interests of the black slaves; Shaftesbury (a Conservative in politics) had already won a signal victory over the even more horrible 'white slavery' that went on in English factories. Both these men were devoted religious leaders: but they were not the 'religious world'; hence the protest of the Christian Socialists,—a protest which has really changed the face of British Christendom.

The Maurician definition of Socialism is thus a very real one, and is practical as well as fundamental. The Christian men who opposed Shaftesbury were Individualists; they left society to the laws of supply and demand—in other words, to competition; they regarded the aim of Christianity as the salvation of individuals—or perhaps of a small minority of the elect, for Calvinism was in truth the parent of this Individualism. If regarded broadly as the antithesis of Individualism, the theory of life and not only of economics, then it is true that the Christian Socialists won the day and now hold the field. It will clear the ground if we give here a definition of Bishop Westcott in which Maurice's words are repeated and expanded:

'The term Socialism has been discredited by its connexion with many extravagant and revolutionary schemes, but it is a term which needs to be claimed for nobler uses. It has no necessary affinity with any forms of violence, or confiscation, or class selfishness, or financial arrangement. I shall therefore venture to employ it apart from its historical associations as describing a theory of life and not only of economics. In this sense Socialism is the antithesis of Individualism, and it is by contrast with the latter that the true character of Socialism can best be defined. Individualism and Socialism correspond with opposite views of humanity. Individualism regards humanity as made up of disconnected or warring atoms; Socialism regards it as an organic whole, a vital unity formed by the combination of contributory members mutually interdependent.

It follows that Socialism differs from Individualism both in method and in aim. The method of Socialism is co-operation, the method of Individualism is competition. The one regards man as working with man for a common end, the other regards man as working against man for private gain. The aim of Socialism is the fulfilment of service, the aim of Individualism is the attainment of some personal advantage—riches, or place, or fame. Socialism seeks such an organization of life as shall secure for every one the most complete development of his powers; Individualism seeks primarily the satisfaction of the particular wants of each one, in the hope that the pursuit of private interest will in the end secure public welfare' (Westcott, Socialism, pp. 3, 4).

If the social principle the principle of brotherhood, had been forgotten, it certainly came to its own again in the 19th cent., though it may be at present rather overwhelmed by the problems which had grown up during its abeyance. Its rapid revival in the Churches was due to the fact that the men who proclaimed it were able to point to half-forgotten Scripture ideas—as with other objects men had gone back to the teaching of Scripture at the Reformation. It was easy for the pioneers of the social revival to show that the Gospels and Epistles were full of social teaching, and gave no support to the doctrine of 'the devil take the hindmost,' or (in more subdued language) of non-interference. The following extract from a pronouncement of the entire episcopate of the Anglican Churches in 1887, at the Lambeth Conference, 1887, on the one hand, how completely the principle was accepted within 40 years of the first Christian Socialistic movement, and, on the other, how entirely its justification was felt to lie in the NT. Such utterances seem commonplace now, only because the Christian Churches have changed. They are not to be found in the official documents of the preceding era:

'The Christian Church is bound, following the teaching of her Master, to aid every wise endeavour which has for its object the material and the moral welfare of the poor. Her Master taught her that all men are brethren, not because they share the same blood, but because they have a common heavenly Father. He further taught her that if any members of this spiritual family were greater, richer, or better than the rest, they were bound to use their special means or ability in the service of the whole. . . . It will contribute no little to draw together the various classes of society, if the clergy endeavour in sermons and lectures to set forth the true principle of society, showing that it is to be administered for the good of all, and that the good of what is good and true in Socialism is the good of Christ.*

2. The Gospels.—The Gospels are certainly full of those ideas which inspire the Christian Socialist. The Incarnation itself proclaims as the root principle of religion the unity and solidarity of the human race (this is worked out in Westcott, The Incarnation, a Revelation of Human Duties (S.P.C.K.)); and the manner of Christ's coming—His lowly birth, His humble companions, His hard life, His death at the hands of the Law—can well be claimed as democratic. He declared, indeed, at the outset, according to St. Luke (4¹⁸), that He had come to preach good tidings to the poor; to His mother His coming meant the exaltation of them of low degree (1⁵²); to His forerunner also it meant a certain levelling of existing conditions (3⁵), and indeed John the Baptist himself advocated that voluntary communism which is an undisputed characteristic of all early Christian teaching ('He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none,' etc., 3¹¹). There is in all this a definite proclamation of brotherhood. When we turn to the teaching of our Lord, we find quite clearly that He concerned Himself with secular things, and did not give any justification for that 'other-worldliness' which would ignore physical evils. His miracles were in the main works of mercy, designed to reduce the misery, or, as at Cana, to increase the happiness, of everyday life. His parables teach social principles of the most fundamental importance. The parables, e.g., of the Kingdom of Heaven, the nature of the Christian fellowship, its inclusiveness (e.g. Mt 13²⁴⁻³⁰), its ultimate world-wide extension (e.g. 13³¹⁻³³). The condemnation of riches could hardly be more strongly expressed than in the parables of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16), and of the Rich Fool (ch. 12), and in the warning about the needle's eye (Mk 10²⁵). The parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10) gives a new meaning to the word 'neighbour,' and teaches the obligation of what nowadays is called social service; and this lesson is even more strongly expressed in the most important parable of all—that of the Judgment (Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶)—where we are told that salvation will depend on whether we have succoured the poor and outcast, with whom Christ identifies Himself.

* This extract is given because it emanated at a comparatively early date from a body which had for long been specially associated with conservative opinions. Its sentiments can be paralleled from the statements of the Lambeth Conference of ten years later, and from the official utterances of most other religious bodies in recent years. The Church of Scotland, and some other Churches, and some other Christian Social societies. Nor must it be forgotten that the movement which it illustrates is confined to Great Britain. It is equally strong both among Protestants and Roman Catholics on the Continent of Europe and in America; indeed, it is numerically far stronger on the Continent than in Great Britain. The subject may be studied in Professor Nitti's Antique Socialism, Lavelley's Socialism of To-Day, the Preface to Ensor's Modern Socialism, and other works mentioned at the end of this article. The most recent English work on the subject is Woodworth's Christian Socialism in England.

The Sermon on the Mount in this aspect may be called a simple manual of social teaching. It is sufficient to allude to the Beatitudes, and to point out how much of the teaching in the rest of the Sermon is still related to Utopian, as that about love of enemies (Lk 6²⁷), oaths, non-resistance, litigation and property, free giving (Mt 5³³⁻⁴⁸), lending without interest (Lk 6^{34, 35}), worrying about the future (Mt 6¹⁹), worrying about the future (Mt 6¹⁹). The Christian Socialist may agree with the 'Socialist of the Chair' that Collectivism would make these principles less difficult of application than they are to-day; but he would add the warning that the secular regeneration of the world can only be accomplished by spiritual means. One sentence of the Sermon sums up the whole truth, when, after picturing in a vivid image material well-being (vv. 26-29), our Lord says, 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you' (v. 33).

If we turn to another central part of Christ's teaching, the Lord's Prayer, we find again the social side interwoven with the spiritual. It was given as a private prayer (v. 6), yet it begins, 'Our Father,' and is throughout a prayer for the human brotherhood. It asks for the hallowing of God's name, the coming of His Kingdom, and the doing of His will upon earth,—in other words, it teaches the Christian to pray for Utopia, and it makes incumbent upon him the duty of considering all social and political schemes with a view to the perfecting of society in this world. The prayer for daily bread asks that all may have the necessities of material life, and this again involves far-reaching social considerations. The prayer for forgiveness is accompanied by a special clause guarding it against an individualist interpretation. As for the prayer against temptation, the temperance movement alone shows that British Christianity has appreciated the social significance of that clause; and in other matters it is clear that, if the worship of Mammon be the antithesis of the worship of God, a society based upon commercial competition is constantly leading its members into the gravest temptation of all.

The Gospel teaches that man has a double duty—to love God and love his neighbour. He must love his neighbour not less than himself, and must do to others as he would have them do to him. Christ condemns the rich and blesses the poor; He teaches brotherhood, social service, and the abnegation of private possessions; He teaches that men are to strive to bring about a Divine Kingdom of justice on the earth, and that they will finally be judged by their works of mercy to those whom the world despises. And, binding it all together is the commandment which St. John has preserved most clearly: 'This is my commandment, that ye love one another' (Jn 15¹²).

3. The Apostles.—The rest of the NT contains abundant evidence that this social gospel was understood. Indeed, in the first flush of their enthusiasm the Christians of Jerusalem established a voluntary communism, and 'had all things common' (Ac 4³²⁻³⁵). It was voluntary, and did not deny the right of a man to possess his own property, as St. Peter said to Ananias (5⁴), but it shows that almsgiving had a very thorough meaning to the first Christians. The doctrine of equality and brotherhood was also strongly felt. St. Paul more than once had to remind slaves that though in the sight of God there was no respect of persons (Col 3²⁵, cf. Ja 2⁹), yet slaves must not turn against their masters: this balance between the brotherhood of master and slave on the one hand, and the duty of slave to master on the other, are very clearly expressed in Philemon (cf. 1 Co 7²⁰⁻²⁴). This is characteristic of the early Fathers also (see below, 'Patristic Teaching'); the conditions of society were to be accepted, and men were to do their duty in them, although the Christian fellowship was working out towards a higher ideal (e.g. 1 Ti 6¹⁻², cf. 1 P 2¹³⁻¹⁷). But St. James (whose Epistle contains passages which are often quoted on democratic principles at the present day) is very definite as to the levelling power of the gospel, e.g. 'But let the brother of low degree glory in his high estate: and the rich, in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away' (1⁹⁻¹⁰, cf. 2⁵⁻¹⁰). St. Paul is as strong as St. James as to the danger of riches (e.g. 1 Ti 6¹⁰), and the evil of covetousness (e.g. Col 3⁵), and the duty of mutual service (e.g. Ph 2⁴), and of mutual love (1 Co 13). But his most valuable contribution to the social aspect of Christianity is his teaching about the solidarity of mankind; the social principle in its very essence is in the declaration that 'There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male and female: for ye are all one man in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3²⁸; cf. Col 3¹, 1 Co 12¹³); nor could it be better taught than by the illustration of the body and its members in 1 Co 12, and the great description of the unity of the Christian body in Eph 4. The fundamental doctrine of brotherhood and love is the theme of the First Ep. of St. John, in which it is definitely stated that without loving his brother whom he hath seen, a man cannot love God (1 Jn 4²⁰); that the children of God are distinguished from the children of the devil by their righteousness and love of their brethren (3¹⁰); that to dwell in love is to dwell in God (4¹⁶), and that 'he that loveth is born of God and knoweth the Father, while he that loveth not, knoweth not God' (vv. 7-8). This is indeed the evidence of salvation—'We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren' (3¹⁴). It is clear, then, that from the beginning it was taught that Christianity had an intensely strong and real practical side in secular matters, that this side—the duty to the neighbour—was equally incumbent on the believer with the duty to God, and that it is bound up with the 'social' ideas of brotherhood, solidarity, unity, mutual love, co-operation, voluntary equalization of condition by giving up of possessions—in some cases, as in that of the Rich Young Man (Mk 10²¹), of all possessions; while there is throughout strong condemnation of riches, of luxury, pride, and the clinging to class distinctions.

4. Patristic Teaching. There is no space to do more than allude to the teaching of the early Fathers. Authorities on the subject are given at the end of this article: some of their more salient sayings will be found in Nitti's Catholic Socialism, where the character is exaggerated, and in Carlyle's Medieval and Modern Economy, vol. 1, where this side is perhaps undervalued. The Patristic writings are indeed very difficult to study, the use of the Greek in the original was idealistic, and the language to the Greeks plain (Jus commune) and what was right before the eyes of the Romans (Jus gentium)—and this which is characteristic of Cicero and Seneca as well as of the Christian writers of a later date. Thus the Fathers held that all men were naturally equal, but at the same time they accepted slavery, though indeed the manumission of slaves was a duty of the Christian. It was the same with private property. The Fathers gathered from the Fathers which is characteristic of the writings of modern socialists; St. Basil, for example, saying, 'La propriété, c'est le vol,' is almost exactly paralleled by St. Ambrose's 'Naturaliter jus commune generavit, usurpatio jus fecit privatum' (de Off. 1. 28). But St. Ambrose does not mean that property is unlawful, only that it is not a 'natural' institution—it belongs to the us gentium. In the same way he does not advocate land-nationalization when he says, 'Deus noster terram hanc posses-level of life, keeping themselves free at least from the polluting and demoralizing vices of the capital and its urban imitators. Of them the worst that could be said was that they pursued empty lives devoted to frivolous aims and bubble ambitions, whose vanity was accentuated by their unconsciousness of it. The age was not without its high ideals and earnest idealists. But aspiration was crippled through lack of clearness as to the ideals it would realize. There are abundant manifest indications that a deep, strong, spiritual movement which made for better things had begun. Springing from a profound realization of the evils current, it yet had no clear understanding of their origin and causes, and blindly groped for ways of cure.

(2) It would seem as if the coming of Jesus opened the channels for the inflow of fresh Divine influences which voicelessly and mysteriously began to permeate human hearts and quicken a new and healthy life. The vague ideal which hung in solution in so many minds began to take shape and form. The Divine Spirit gave content and direction to the semi-conscious aspirations and half-blind desires moving restlessly in the depths of the human heart, reinforced the spirit of reaction which had set in, imparting to its champions a new passion for the righteous, the pure, and the true.

2. Influence and methods of Jesus.—(1) Into the society in which this new life was stirring came Jesus, and very soon the influence of His teaching and spirit began to make itself felt. It would be an error, however, to attribute to that alone the social reformation which gradually evidenced itself as in progress. Other factors were already operating. The rebellion of misery against cruel economic conditions, a mutinous sense of the unjust and unjustifiable inequalities of life, the strong infusion of democratic sympathies into the governing circles, through the increasing number of those whose native ability had secured them wealth and position, the mixing of different races whose blood was strongly impregnated with inherited qualities often anti-toxic and mutually corrective,—these were factors which contributed to bring about radical changes in outlook and conduct. The social teaching of Jesus was not entirely new. Much of it had already been the staple propaganda of eloquent and earnest advocates. But Jesus made the body of principles He inculcated vitalizing forces in the life of human society, determining and directing its factors in its evolution, after an unprecedented fashion. He made them the accepted and controlling commonplaces of reform and reconstruction. He enunciated laws for the regulation of communal life which tended to eliminate the disorderly element of mere personal caprice and whim. In a word, He created a social conscience.

(2) In any consideration of Christ's influence upon social life, it must be clearly recognized that it operated not only, and perhaps not so much, through the propagation of His teaching as through the infusion of His spirit into society. The work of His Holy Spirit in awakening men to the evils amidst which they lived, and impelling them to energetic suppressive and alterative measures, must be assigned its due place and value. The changes wrought upon society in the course of generations are the product of men educated upon the principles of Jesus, but freely using their personal judgment under the guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

(3) Nor must it be left out of account that the fact of the Incarnation, theologically conceived and estimated, with its pregnant suggestions of the worth and destiny of man and the Divine hopes and aims regarding him, provided for thoughtful and responsive minds a purified impulse towards a new humanitarianism.

(4) Profound as the influence of Jesus upon social life has been, it was by no means His primary function to procure its reformation. The social rectifications which have since traced their original impulse to Him are but the by-products of His work. He came to reveal God to man and to bring man to God. Nevertheless, He had an ulterior purpose, to which this was in a sense a preliminary step, in the founding of an ideal community, designated the Kingdom of God, composed of individuals whose mutual relations were determined by the implications of their proper relationship to God. The immediate implication of the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God is the brotherhood of man. These two doctrines are basal to, and determinative of, Christ's whole ethical system. The ultimate aim of Jesus, then, may be said to have been social, inasmuch as the final end of His mission would be achieved only in the realization of a regenerate society.

(5) Jesus consistently set an ideal of perfection before men. Himself sinless, He would have all men sinless as well (Jn 5¹⁴ 8¹¹ 'Sin no more'; Mt 5⁴⁸ 'Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect'). But this perfection was not merely a negative condition, a state of freedom from every evil spot or stain. The context of Mt 5⁴⁸ clearly indicates the connotation the word teleos is intended to have. It meant such perfection as that of His Father in heaven, which, on the positive side, was determined by the glorious activities and loving ministries of which men were the objects and beneficiaries. Human perfection was then to be attained only through a life of similar beneficent activity. It cannot be achieved in isolation. Christ never contemplates human life so situated. He regards man as essentially a social being, whose full self-realization can only be attained in vital relationship with his fellows. No man may go apart by himself and live a truly godly or holy life (Jn 17^{11, 13}). The ideal character, then, which Jesus, is to be realized only through the full discharge of the social duties which are entailed by communal life (Mt 19²¹). He is, and sin of the most blameworthy kind, is largely neglect or failure to fulfil social duties and responsibilities (Mt 25⁴²). The virtues, on the other hand, which distinguish the good man after the mind of Christ are those which emerge in a life of vigilant and incessant beneficence and self-sacrificing love (Mt 25³⁵, Jn 15¹⁴). The whole spirit of Christ's teaching condemns the hermit existence as one which gravely imperils a man's title to be considered a citizen of the Kingdom of God. The root of the world's evil is selfish individualism.

(6) Jesus, then, was an inspirer of social reform. He was an inspirer of social reform. He enunciated principles in the light of which the evil of prevalent conditions, practices, and accepted institutions became increasingly apparent. He changed things by first changing men. He made many things impossible by making them intolerable to the sensitized conscience and Christianized heart.

3. Attitude of Jesus to existing social relationships.—(1) All this is borne out by the consideration of Christ's attitude to the society of His own day. Upon its constituent elements He passed no strictures suggestive of an attitude of protest or condemnation. He accepted its inequalities of position and possessions without demur; nor did He range Himself with that species of socialism which anticipates an epoch when the relationships of master and servant, rich and poor, employer and employed, capital and labour, shall cease to exist (Mt 10²⁴, Lk 17⁷⁻⁹, Mk 14⁷). These characterize the normal and stable state of society, which He seemed to regard as fittingly ordered to provide the opportunities or agencies for the evolution of the type of character which most conformed to the image of God, and the realization of the type of life which best expressed His spirit.

(2) If, then, the essential features of society as presently constituted undergo 'a sea-change into something rich and strange,' it will not be because Jesus deliberately legislated to that end, but because the spirit He infused into men, educated on His principles, demanded different conditions for its fuller and more perfect expression. His sympathies were inherently on the side of an industrial and economic order wherein individual talents, capabilities, and fidelities would have ample scope to prove and exercise themselves, and would meet with such suitable and proportionate reward as would stimulate and foster healthy honest ambition, and those qualities of integrity, and disinterested fidelity which go to form the ideal character (cf. Lk 12²², 19²⁷).

(3) Jesus did not forbid the accumulation of private property. Rather He accepted it as a fundamental right of every man to possess in security whatever property honestly belonged to him (Mt 20¹⁵ 25 13¹²). That is the underlying assumption of those maxims which inculcate giving, and of those utterances which approve a saintly charity (Lk 6^{30, 35, 38}). He had no word of censure for the many persons of means whom He numbered amongst His friends. His disciples continued to own property (Jn 21³⁷, Lk 19²⁻⁹), and His little company subsisted on a common, if meagre, purse (Jn 12⁶ 13²⁹). Poor Himself, He inflamed no envy of the rich, nor fostered any class feeling. Money He accepted as an effective instrument for the furtherance of the Kingdom of God. He recognized that, while for one it might be a snare and therefore should be foregone (Lk 18²²⁻²⁴), for another it provided means towards the better doing of God's will. He was urgent in His warnings regarding the spiritual dangers which attended its ampler use. He magnified its subtle power to blind affections and divorce the heart from God by winning that trust for itself which should be reposed in Him alone (Mk 10²⁴, Mt 13²²). He vividly portrayed how it dried up the spirit of unselfish sympathies and tended to render men indifferent and callous to human need (Lk 16¹³). He understood how its possession developed an unquenchable and therefore He admonished all to beware of covetousness: the greedy spirit which wants more than it can profitably or enjoyably use (Lk 12¹⁵). In various ways He impressed upon men that money was not the true wealth, and could not of itself procure true blessedness (Lk 18¹⁸⁻²³ 12²¹ 16¹¹). See, further, art. WEALTH.

(4) It is evident that Jesus held the institution of the family in profound reverence. He expounded His theology in terms of its relationships. He displayed a peculiarly anxious concern in dealing with questions that affected its integrity. The state of things in His day urgently called for outspoken protest and warning. There was an increasing laxity of view and practice with regard to marriage. Divorce (which see) was common, and resorted to upon meagre enough grounds. The school of Hillel sanctioned it for no better reason than that a wife had spoilt her husband's dinner, this opinion being founded upon a liberal interpretation of Dt 24¹. There is no subject on which Jesus spoke more uncompromisingly and unequivocally. He recognized that the stability and wholeness of social life depend largely on the health and purity of domestic life. While recognizing its physical basis, Jesus conceived of marriage as an essentially spiritual union. He regarded it as a Divine institution and ordinance, which involved the parties entering into it in the most solemn and sacred mutual obligations. In the highest, and to Him the only legitimate view of it, it was a consummation of mutual love mediated by God Himself (Mt 19⁶). That was therefore no mere marriage which was entered into for the sake of carnal passion or on the score of worldly considerations. It was not within the province of man to sunder those whom God had joined, i.e. to cancel their vows and annul the relationship that had bound them to one another. No human law-court has the right to undo the tie made and sealed by God Himself. See, further, artt. ADULTERY, DIVORCE, EUNUCH, FAMILY, MARRIAGE.

(5) Jesus, then, acquiesced in the indefinite continuance of the ordinary relationships of life then obtaining, as constituting the normal state of society. He gave no countenance to anarchism. He Himself offered an example of law-abiding citizenship, consistently demanding that due respect be paid to the requirements and enactments of the civil power, acting within its own proper sphere. He rebuked the spirit of revolt which demurred to the right of government to levy taxes, He himself submitting to be taxed, even when He might have claimed exemption (Mt 17²⁷). He insisted on the right of properly constituted authority to act in accordance with their legal powers; He would permit of no resistance to the emissaries of the Sanhedrin sent to arrest Him. The case against Him founded on charges of law-breaking collapsed. Pilate, with the best will, could find no fault in Him (Lk 23¹⁴).

4. Jesus nevertheless did not fail to denounce with vehemence current injustices and abuses. His recognition of the existence of oppression, extortion, corrupt and dishonest practices, and the pinched poverty due to them, not only finds explicit and scathing utterance (Lk 20⁴⁷), but is reflected in many of His parables and implied in many of His sayings. Yet He does not speak as if the cause of these were the inevitable outcome of existing social conditions. The blame is always laid upon individuals who guiltily abused their powers and opportunities. He allowed no word to escape His lips which might countenance the methods of violent revolution. He started no popular agitation to secure social reconstruction. No radical abrogation in the mere externalities of life would ensure the disappearance of prevalent evils. Jesus plainly taught that social amelioration must be brought about by the gradual assimilation of the mass to the ideal type, and the infusion of the principles of His gospel into all the veins of life (Mt 13³³). By evolution, not by revolution, was the path to the realization of the Kingdom of heaven. Jesus did not share the prophetic enthusiasm of impatient expectation to which the Day of the Lord seemed already at the doors. From the beginning He impressed it upon His disciples that it was indefinitely far off (Mk 4²⁶, Mt 24¹⁴). He had a profound appreciation of the protracted manner in which a regenerate state of society of a stable kind may only be attained, through the working of healthy spiritual forces in individual hearts (Mt 5¹³). In this He stood alone. His doctrine surprised and perplexed His contemporaries. It was out of harmony with the traditions and hopes on which they had been nurtured (Mk 13³⁷).

Nevertheless, Jesus did not anticipate that the Kingdom would come by a peaceful and progressive process of evolution, without the shocks of revolution. He foresaw that the forces of reform would rouse the strenuous hostility of antagonistic spiritual elements in society, and the consequent outbreak of anarchic violence (Mt 24¹⁵). Indeed, He anticipated that the ideal society would never be attained as the result of pure evolution. The forces of evil would refuse to be ousted, and would prove too strong to be suppressed. Successive Divine Incarnations would be required, culminating in a final catastrophic one, to secure their suppression and the realization of the Kingdom of heaven on earth in stable and universal sway (Mt 10²¹ 11¹² 13^{41, 49}).

5. Fundamental principles of Christ's social teaching, and their outcome.—(1) Jesus laid the foundation of the social structure of the future by His doctrine of the equal essential worth of the individual. This had already been preached with conviction and power, but with little practical outcome. Rigid lines of demarcation continued to separate the various classes in Roman society (cf. Dill, Roman Society, p. 270 ff.). It was through Jesus that the doctrine ceased to be little more than an academic proposition, and became a vitalizing element in civilization, and a regulative principle in the development of the new social organism. He laid the foundations of a pure, universal democracy—a democracy based, not on equality of personal possessions, but on equality of individuality. He awakened a new sense of the worth of human nature, and gave a meaning and a value to the most obscure life. He invested the common people with a new self-respect which elevated and fortified, and with a sense of personal responsibility which steadied and deepened, while eliminating the dangerous sense of purposelessness and insignificance. Every human being was a co-heir of Divine potentialities; His whole ministry consistently enforced and illustrated this pregnant truth. Though consenting to social inequalities, He did not allow these to be regarded as the sign or token of any differences in the intrinsic worth of the human soul. In His intercourse with all sorts and conditions He manifested a lofty indifference to rank and position, practically ignoring the artificial distinctions of society (Lk 7^{36ff.}). There was no human being beneath respectful regard or outside the radius of His love. This He drove home by declaring God's concern for the outcasts and the fallen, the pariahs of society. The express purpose of His mission was to seek and save that which was lost. By His self-sacrifice on the Cross, necessitated to procure redemption, approved and accepted by the Father, He made plain that the worth of the individual soul was, in God's regard, beyond calculation. Thus was a new sense of the sacredness of personality impressed upon the mind and heart of the world. From the acceptance of this doctrine flowed many and far-reaching consequences. Life might no longer be held cheap. Every human being, whatever his position, had certain rights which must be respected.

(a) Slavery could not and did not long persist as a normal institution of society. It speedily came under the ban of healthy Christian sentiment (Philem 16). Such a condition was not consonant with the essential dignity of human nature as hall-marked by Christ. It became impossible to regard human beings as mere goods and chattel, to be bought and sold as household furniture. Nor might they be treated with the callous brutalities of an inhumanity which made no distinction between slaves and beasts. The slave was also a man, and entitled at least to the regard proper to one possessed of an immortal and priceless soul.

(b) Woman also came into her kingdom. Generally speaking, she had been treated as an inferior being, who had duties but no rights, except what man chose to grant her. Her nature was 'cribb'd, cabin'd, and confin'd.' There were indeed many and brilliant exceptions in women who dignified the sex and won the warmest admiration. But the common contempt in which woman was held inevitably reacted on her nature, and, by lowering her self-respect, made of her what went to confirm the general opinion regarding her. Jesus changed all that. He emancipated her from her position of sex-inferiority. He did this by Himself treating her as an equal, in no wise of less essential worth than man (Lk 10^{38ff.}, Jn 11⁵). He gave her peculiar honour. Some of the most significant incidents in His life are associated with women (Jn 4^{9ff.} 11^{32ff.}). He overturned the estimates of the past and revoked its unquestioned judgments. See, further, art. WOMAN.

(c) Jesus was the Saviour of the child. He put an end to the inhumanities with which unwelcome infants were treated (Mt 18^{6, 10, 14}, Lk 17²). He gave the child an importance which resulted in increasing attention being paid to its well-being. The Early Church led the way in this, and applying the mind of the Master. What the Holy Spirit has been most active, there has the child been the object of the most thoughtful and solicitous care. One of the fruits of the Reformation was the new interest taken in the education of the young. The modern deep and earnest study of the child, the many and varied institutions for promoting the physical and moral welfare of the young, are the outcome of a deepening and more sympathetic appreciation of the worth Jesus gave to the child (Mk 9³³⁻³⁷, Mt 18⁶). See, further, art. CHILDREN.

(2) Jesus preached the brotherhood of men, based on their common relationship to the Father-God, to whom all alike owe their being. Thus He linked the whole human race in a common kinship. The Stoics had ineffectively taught this doctrine. Jesus made it a substantial fact. Through Him it became a principle profoundly influential in determining the nature of the relations between man and man. It operated towards the obliteration of the artificial distinctions between class and class which obtained in a society governed according to pagan ideas and ideas which almost implied the tacit assumption of a gradual differentiation of nature. The Early Church gave practical illustration of the necessary outcome of Christ's teaching in their gatherings for worship, where rich and poor, master and slave, employer and employed, mingled indiscriminately, with the freedom and mutual regard based on the cordial recognition of their common brotherhood.

(a) Through the inculcation of this doctrine Jesus generated a social conscience, the sense of individual responsibility for the corporate well-being. He sowed the seed of the fruitful idea of the solidarity of the race. He gave a new meaning to the word 'neighbour,' and exalted neighbourliness to the rank of a supreme Christian virtue (Lk 10^{29ff.}). He widened the area of duty till it embraced the whole of mankind (Ac 18). There is no horizon to the sphere of personal obligation. It reaches to the circumference of human need.

(b) Jesus thus evoked a new sense of humanity. He gave it a comprehensiveness, an outlook, and an insight, which it never possessed before. The Mosaic Code contains many enactments relative to the treatment of strangers and foreigners, but these rested on no broad human basis. They were instructed and qualified by religious, national, and prudential policy. Jesus refused to allow barriers of race to restrict the outflow of the spirit of beneficent love (Mk 7²⁶, Jn 4^{9, 40}). He taught it to reach out to the uttermost, as well as to reach down to the lowermost. His Church was to make the brotherhood of man a visible reality, envioning within it people of all nations and tongues (Lk 13²⁹, Jn 12^{20ff.}). The duty of preaching the gospel to every creature involves the obligation of treating all alike in the spirit of the gospel. The appreciation of the Heavenly Father's love to the erring and the wretched, as pictured in the parables, and as reflected in His own life, set men of whatever race or condition in a new light. The outcast, the fallen, the depraved, all those whose moral and spiritual condition classed them amongst the lost, became the objects of a compassion which yearned for their restoration. Their recovery became the serious concern of every soul bent upon the imitation of God. Christ infused the Saviour-spirit into the world, to which all need is a summons to help, and in whose eyes every sinner is a possible saint (Mt 12³⁰, Lk 23⁴³). There was no bondage to sin from which emancipation was not possible, no far country from which there was no return. Despair was a word foreign to Christ's vocabulary (Lk 6³⁵). He instituted the method of redemption by pity and love, whose intelligent application is practically operating to effect what He proved in His own instances it was actually fitted to achieve (Jn 8¹¹, Lk 19¹⁰). He discredited the method of spiritual cure which relies upon threats and penalties alone.

(c) He inaugurated the day of specifically Christian charity. Charity had been exercised before, but it was largely a matter of expediency, or the outflow of a mere pitifulness for misery and want. Jesus gave it a new heart and a new will, a new sight and a new insight. It was not to be left henceforth to a few munificent gentlemen like Pliny to dispense. Its exercise became the duty of every Christian, and opportunity.

It was the justly characteristic achievement of the Early Christians (v. Dobschütz). Jesus erected charity into a supreme Christian virtue. He regarded its absence as a convicting proof of the absence of that spirit which qualified for entrance into the Kingdom of God. That was a sure indication of a soul out of fellowship with God (Mt 25⁴¹, Lk 12²⁰, 16²⁷). Jesus enjoined as a primary duty the prompt and unhesitating use of one's means in the relief of whatever kind. The priest and the Levite who passed by on the other side were transgressing the first and last law of love. Jesus would allow of no limit to the sacrifices one must be prepared to make in obedience to its legitimate demands (Lk 12³⁰). Charity must not be of the nature of unwilling acquiescence in a bad request. It must be the fruit of that spirit which is ready to give more than is asked, and will err on the side of generosity rather than of meanness (Lk 6³⁰). Yet the exercise of charity must not be indiscriminate or unregulated. It must always tend to promote the ends of the law of Christian love. It must be regulated by regard to the Golden Rule, interpreted in the light of the Heavenly Father's example. It must be well considered, ever keeping in view the highest welfare of those who invite its aid. Each case must be taken on its own merits. Charity is legitimate only when it subserves the social interest of the individual assisted,—when it makes him not only better off, but a better man. It is forbidden to give after such wise as will only encourage or confirm evil habits. To do so were to keep the lower law while breaking the higher,—the law of Christian love, which forbids the infliction of the ultimate moral injury that inevitably eventuates from indiscriminate and heedless giving. We must always do the studiously loving thing. True charity finds its exemplar in the Heavenly Father, who will not give what is harmful or useless, but only good things (Mt 7¹¹, Lk 11¹³); and it seeks with wise concern to foster the virtues of self-reliance, self-help, manly independence, and industry, whose exercise reduces the occasions of charity.

(3) Jesus preached life as a stewardship, and its powers, means, opportunities as a trust from God for the proper use of which each man was answerable. Talents must be regarded as gifts, to be used, not for the possessor's selfish purposes, but for the ends of an altruistic love. The teaching of Jesus unambiguously condemns the life which is spent in the pursuit of wealth for what it may yield of selfish pleasure, and the expenditure of means on purely personal gratification (Lk 12¹⁶). We are given that we may give. 'A man does not own his wealth; he owes it.' From the highest point of view, there is no such thing as private means. All possessions are a public trust. Jesus was urgent in His demand for the generous openhandedness of a large-hearted benevolence whose instinct was always to consent or comply rather than to refuse or withhold (Mt 5⁴²). To those who exercised it He made the most lavish promises (Lk 6³⁸, 18²⁸). The only saying preserved in the Canon outside the Gospels is an incitement to unselfish liberality on the ground of the blessedness it procures (Ac 20³⁵). Jesus bestows as strong condemnation upon the indifferent spirit which fails to use its means for the right ends, as upon those who wantonly abuse them for the wrong ones (Mt 25²⁶, Lk 16¹²). Means must always be regarded as a means. Their exploitation for selfish or sinister purposes invites and incurs penalties of the direst kind (Mt 24⁵¹). The same duties and responsibilities are laid upon small means as upon large,—upon the man of one talent as upon the man of ten (Lk 16¹¹, 19¹²⁻²⁷).

SODOM.—The overthrow of the 'cities of the plain' was, according to Hebrew traditions, a Divinely-sent catastrophe, second only to that of the Deluge. The sinfulness of Sodom (often with the addition of 'Gomorrhah') is frequently referred to as typical of terrible wickedness (e.g. Dt 32³², Is 1¹⁰ 3⁹, Jer 23¹⁴, La 4⁸, Ezk 16⁴⁰⁻⁴⁸, Wis 10⁶⁻⁸); and even more frequently is the devastation of the guilty cities typical of Divine punishment. And similarly in the NT:

1. Mt 10¹⁵ || Lk 10¹². In St. Matthew the words occur in the course of our Lord's charge to the Twelve. If they came to any place in which their words were not received, they were to shake off the dust of their feet; 'Verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrhah in the day of judgment than for that city.' In St. Luke, on the other hand, the words form part of the charge to the Seventy; he has 'Sodom' for 'the land of Sodom,' 'Gomorrhah' is omitted, and instead of St. Matthew's favourite expression ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως ('in the day of judgment'), is used ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ ('in that day') [D ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ, so Syrr.]. In Mk 6¹¹ the whole phrase from St. Matthew (exc. Σοδόμους ἢ Γομόρροις for τῇ Σοδόμῳ καὶ Γομόρρῳ) is inserted in A and some Latin MSS. Hence it found its way, through the TR, into the AV.

Our Lord here implies the great fact, which in the passage dealt with in the following section He states more clearly, that since privileges bring responsibilities, their neglect brings punishment. And therewith He further implies the mysterious truth that at 'the day of judgment' the punishments awarded to men will vary. 'It shall be more tolerable—more bearable' cannot be a mere figure of speech. The same truth is taught in Lk 12⁷⁴, and its converse in Lk 19¹⁶⁻¹⁹.

2. Mt 11^{23, 24}. Our Lord uttered Words against three Galilean cities which refused to accept His mighty works and repent (v.²⁰). These denunciations were a practical carrying out of the figurative injunctions which He gave to His disciples in 10¹⁴. The three cities named are Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum. The two former He compares with Tyre and Sidon; and to the latter He uses somewhat similar language in referring to Sodom: 'for if in Sodom had been done the mighty works (δυνάμεις) which are being done in thee [the city], it would be remaining until to-day. However, I say unto you [the people] that for the land of Sodom it shall be more tolerable in the day of judgment than for thee [the city].' St. Luke has not preserved this reference to Sodom, though he gives the denunciation against Capernaum (10¹⁵). With regard to Mt 11²⁴ Wright (*Synopsis*², p. 216) says that the author 'appends a sentence which reminds us of [Mt] 10¹⁵. These refrains are very effective for Church reading, but they often seem to be editorial.'

The reference to 'Sodom' as an example of sin reaches its climax in Rev 11⁸, where Jerusalem is described as 'the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt.'

3. Lk 17²⁹. This passage, like the two preceding, is absent from the Markan tradition. Sodom is here not so much a type of sin as of sudden and fearful destruction. Our Lord uttered many logia concerning the coming of the Son of Man. In Mt 24²⁷⁻²⁹, Lk 17²⁶⁻²⁷ He likened the 'parousia' (Mt.)—the 'days' (Lk.)—of the Son of Man to the Deluge in the days of Noah. St. Luke alone adds, 'In like manner as it came to pass in the days of Lot; they were eating, drinking, buying, selling, planting, building; but in the day that Lot went out from Sodom, he rained [Gn 19²⁴ κίτριος ἔσπεσεν] fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed (them) all. Likewise shall it be in the day that the Son of Man is revealed.' The destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is also coupled with the Deluge in 2 P 2⁵⁻⁷ as an example of punishment. See also Jude 7, Ro 9²⁹ = Is 1⁹.

SOLDIERS.—Throughout the Roman Empire, and especially in a frontier province like Syria, of which the various divisions of Palestine practically formed part, soldiers were a common sight, and took a prominent share in the administration of affairs. The references to them, however, in the Gospels, except, as is natural, in connexion with our Lord's trial and crucifixion, are not numerous.

1. In Lk 3¹⁴ we read of soldiers who came to John the Baptist and asked him what they were to do. The word here is στρατευόμενοι (not στρατιῶται) and implies that they were on active service at the time. They can hardly have been Roman legionaries, but may have been members of Herod Antipas' army engaged in some local expedition, of which we know nothing, or even, as Ewald supposes, only a kind of police or gendarmes employed in custom-house duties. The Baptist's answer to their inquiry shows what the temptations of such folk were in those days. They must be careful, he says, henceforth not to do violence or extort money by false accusations, and to be content with their pay.

2. In Mt 8⁹ and Lk 7⁸ the centurion (no doubt a proselyte, though a Roman officer; cf. Ac 10¹) who desired to have his servant healed, speaks of the soldiers who were under his command, and, in contrast to (1) above, his remarks bring out forcibly the idea of discipline and organization, which was to be found in a Roman legion.

3. The armies (στρατόμεδα) that would encircle

Jerusalem in the fatal siege of Titus (A.D. 70) are referred to in Lk 21²⁰ (cf. 19⁴³).

4. In the parable of the Marriage of the King's Son (Mt 22¹⁻¹⁴) we read of the armies (στρατεύματα) which the king sent to avenge the murder of his servants.

5. After the trial before Pilate, when our Lord had been scourged and condemned to be crucified, Pilate's soldiers on duty took Him into their own quarters, and, gathering the whole band together, proceeded to treat Him with the grossest insults and mockery (Mt 27²⁷, Mk 15¹⁶, Jn 19²). And during the long hours of crucifixion He had to endure similar maltreatment from the soldiers who were in charge (Lk 23³⁶; cf. Mt 27⁴⁸, Jn 19²⁹). It is recorded also (Jn 19^{23, 24}) how they parted His garments among them (see COAT and CROWN); and further that, when the end had come,

He was already dead, they refrained from breaking His legs, as Pilate had ordered, before taking Him down; but 'one of them with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith there came out blood and water' (Jn 19^{32, 34}).

6. Lastly, soldiers were placed on guard at the sepulchre when the Resurrection took place (Mt 27⁶⁵⁻⁶⁶, 28¹¹⁻¹³; see WATCH). C. L. FELTOE.

SOLITUDE.—We may infer from the phrase used in Lk 5¹⁶ (ἦν ὑποχωρῶν, see BULLOCK'S note) that our Lord frequently sought solitude during the period of His ministry. Some times He retired from the multitude, but did not seclude Himself from His disciples (e.g. Mt 14²³ 17¹). At other times His solitude was absolute, and He only returned to His disciples or was rejoined by them after an interval (e.g. Mt 14²³, Mk 1³⁵, Lk 5¹⁶ 6¹²). It is this latter complete solitude that is of importance to the student of our Lord's Person and work.

1. We observe that He sought solitude, or, if the phrase is permissible, was forced into solitude, at certain critical times of special trial. The battle of the Temptation (Mt 4¹⁻¹¹, Mk 1¹²⁻¹³, Lk 4¹⁻¹²) was fought out in solitude. No human being was within call, and only after the victory was won did angels come to minister to Him. The final struggle against the weakness inherent in the flesh took place in solitude (Mt 26⁴¹, Lk 22²⁹). Although He yearned for human sympathy, He withdrew Himself from the companionship of His friends. The account of the supreme crisis of His work of redemption witnesses to a solitude too complete and awful for our understanding (Mt 27⁴⁶). We ought perhaps to class the solitude which He sought after the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14²³, Mk 6⁴⁶, Jn 6¹⁵) with the three instances just mentioned. The people wished to make Him a king, and may well have suggested a temptation similar to that recorded in Mt 4⁸.

2. Our Lord sought solitude in order to obtain spiritual help for specially important work (Lk 6¹²), and spiritual refreshment after periods of exhausting labour (Mk 1^{35, 46}, cf. Lk 5¹⁶). We may suppose that on these occasions, as on another, 'virtue had gone out of him,' and that in a literal sense 'Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses' (Mt 8¹⁷), thereby coming to feel the need for fresh intercourse with the Father unvexed with human companionship.

A very curious and suggestive commentary on this twofold use of solitude in our Lord's life is afforded by the experience of the earliest monks, these Egyptian recluses whom we shall not be wrong in regarding as specialists in the spiritual life. They believed that in solitude a man is exposed to the full fury of the powers of evil, that temptation is not completely conquered because not met in its utmost strength except by him who ventures to meet it alone (Cass. Coll. vii. 23; Athanas. Vita Anton. xiii.). Their thought would explain our Lord's 'being led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil' (Mt 4¹). It was, no doubt, necessary (cf. the general conception of Milton's Paradise Regained) that He should be exposed to the utmost strength of the Tempter. Therefore He faced the Evil One in solitude.

The hermits also believed '... alone in the world,' he cannot have peace' (Verba Seniorum, ap. Rosweyde, Interpr. Pelagio, x. 5; see also Cass. Coll. xix. 5, xxiv. 4). In this respect their experience fits in with our Lord's retirements in search of refreshment and strength.

The literature of early Western monasticism and much of the teaching of the later Mystics on the subject of solitude fall into line with the recorded experience of the Egyptians, and form a further commentary on the recorded facts of our Lord's solitude. On the one hand, there is an evident dread of the extreme temptations of solitude, and a feeling that they ought not to be faced except by those far advanced in the spiritual life. On the other hand, the ... ties of books

SOLOMON.—Jesus makes two references to Solomon, speaking on one occasion of his 'glory,' and on another of his 'wisdom.' In Mt 6²⁹=Lk 12²⁷ He places the pure natural beauty of the lilies above the consummate type of artificial splendour, and uses the contrast to point the lesson of trustful dependence upon God, the Giver of all that is necessary for the body as well as for the spirit. In Mt 12⁴²=Lk 11³¹ the eagerness of Solomon's contemporaries to hear his words of worldly wisdom is contrasted with the indifference and spiritual blindness of the men of Jesus' own day, who failed to understand and appreciate the truer wisdom of a greater teacher.

SON, SONSHIP.—

uios, which definitely ... occurrence in the G ... also frequently used ... πίστων in the vocat. ... of address ('child,' 'my child') is specially noticeable (see, e.g., Mk 2⁵, Lk 24⁸ 15³¹, Mt 21²⁸). The latter term is several times rendered 'son' in RV without discrimination. RV, indeed, usually indicates 'child' in mg. as the exact equivalent, but this is not always the case (see Mt 21²⁸ πίστων).

1. The duties and privileges of the filial relation find frequent incidental illustration in the Gospels. The son has a natural claim on parental bounty (Mt 7⁹); he is the object of deep parental love and solicitude (Mt 10³⁷ 20³⁰). (A peculiar appeal to such solicitude is made in Lk 14⁵, if we are to follow the best attested reading (see RVm); though the collocation of uios and θεός is so odd that it is a temptation to defy the canons of textual criticism, and, following rather the analogy of kindred passages (13¹⁶, Mt 12¹¹), still read θνος). By consequence, strife between father and son is a most painful form of estrangement (Lk 12⁵³), whilst the restoration of a happy relationship between those who have been so estranged calls for the highest rejoicing (Lk 15²⁰⁻²⁴). The natural heirship of the son appears in Mk 12⁶ (and parallels) and in Lk 15¹², where the technical term (τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος) for the heir's portion occurs (see Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr. p. 230). In the former instance—the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen—the position of an only son as carrying with it sole heirship is emphasized. The ὁ υἱὸς ὁ ἀγαπητός of Lk 20¹³ in this connexion, appears to be tantamount to ὁ υἱὸς ὁ μονογενής (Jn 3¹⁶), as denoting an only son (cf. also Mt 3¹⁷ 17⁵ etc.). In the latter case (Lk 15¹²) we have a son claiming and obtaining his inheritance during his father's lifetime. This serves the purpose of the parable; but it may be doubted whether such an occurrence was common in actual life. The counsels of ancient Jewish prudence (Sir 33¹⁹) were, at any rate, dead against it. The more usual course is exemplified in the case of the elder son, whose share in the patrimony was still in his father's hands (Lk 15³¹), but was fully assured to him in spite of his complaint in v. 30 (ὁ καταφαγὼν σου τὸν βίον). A special instance of a son's privilege is made use of in Mt 17²⁶; the sons of 'the kings of the earth' are exempt (ἐλεύθεροι) from the tribute exacted from their subjects.

On the other hand, the duty of sons to render obedience, service and help to parents similarly appears. The parable of the Two Sons (Mt 21²⁸) thus illustrates filial dutifulness and undutifulness. The ... of our Lord's words, 'Behold thy son,' in Jn 19²⁶, is at once understood as securing loving care and provision for His mother (v. 27). Christ's interpretation of the Fifth Commandment as involving the duty of helping and supporting parents in case of need, is ... denunciation of the Pharisees. ... duty could be nullified by a vow.

It is clear that Jesus found in sonship an instrument of prime importance for the illustration and enforcement of His teaching. It is certain His ... in His own ... The ... of Lk 24⁴⁰⁻⁵² (in such striking contrast to the volubility of the Apocryphal narratives) may ... as witnessing to such a fulfilment of ... during the long years of silence as makes Him the very 'flower and pattern' of all good sons. Mary's surprised exclamation in v. 48 suggests the perfect dutifulness of His childhood's years; and we may be sure the child was 'father of the man,' as to what He was in the after-time as (probably) the mainstay and head of the home at Nazareth on the death of Joseph. Yet the day also, when He illustrated in His own experience His own exacting demand (Mt 10³⁷), and showed how ... must yield to higher claims, summing all up in the impressive λογίον of Mk 3³⁴ (= Mt 12⁴⁷, cf. Lk 8²¹). Lk 11²⁸ embodies a similar sentiment.

2. Arising out of the notion of the filial relation in its natural sense, we have the idiomatic use of the phrase 'son of' as a familiar characteristic of the ... A poetic feeling underlies the ... the man as a 'son of wisdom,' and at the same time its appropriateness is self-evident. uios and τέκνον both occur in this connexion, and instances of the use of the idiom found in the Gospels may be grouped as follows: (a)=belonging to, connected with, or destined for. Persons are described as sons 'of the kingdom' (Mt 8¹² 13³⁸); 'of this world' (age) (Lk 16⁸ 20³⁴); 'of the bridechamber' (Mk 2¹⁹); 'of Jerusalem' (=inhabitants) (Mt 23³⁷); 'of the Pharisees' (followers, adherents, Mt 12²⁷=Lk 11¹⁹); 'of the evil one' (Mt 13³⁸; Twentieth Cent. NT renders simply 'the wicked,' evading a personal significance in τοῦ πονηροῦ); 'of Gehenna' (Mt 23³⁵); 'of perdition' (Jn 17¹²); 'of the resurrection' (Lk 20³⁸). (b)=characterized by certain qualities: 'sons of thunder' (Mk 3¹⁷); 'of peace' (Lk 10⁶); 'of light' (Jn 12³⁶); 'of wisdom' (τέκνα, Mt 11¹⁹=Lk 7³⁵); as similarly 'of consolation' in Ac 4³⁶ (this without reference to the correctness of the etymology indicated). (c)=descendants: 'sons of them that slew the prophets' (Mt 23³¹); 'of Israel' (Mt 27⁹, Lk 1¹⁶); 'of Abraham' (τέκνα, Jn 8³⁹; uios, Lk 19⁹, cf. 13¹⁶).

Deissmann (Bible Studies, pp. 161-166) labours to modify the common explanation of such circumlocutory forms as Hebraisms and due to 'the Oriental spirit of language' (Buttmann, quoted in loc. cit.). As features of NT diction he is willing to see in them a 'Hebraism of translation' (due to Semitic originals rather than to a Hebraistic style or habit in the writers themselves), but is eager to maintain that such constructions are not foreign to the genius of Greek. He is not, however, entirely successful. Of course, the use of the phrase 'sons of' as=inhabitants or descendants, may be widely paralleled in various languages (as, e.g., the Homeric υἱὸς Ἀχαιῶν='Achaiōi); but in manifold other uses, especially as in (b) above, the case is different. The expression υἱὸς τέχνης (in Horace, filius fortunae) is noteworthy, but 'one swallow does not make a summer'; and, moreover, Plato's use of τέχνης, in ἡμεῖς ἀδελφοὶ τῆς τέχνης, hardly affords a true parallel. The expression τέχνης ἔργον, denoting the productions of art, a painter's works, falls short of such uses as are indicated in (b), whereby personal qualities are described. The expression is, on the other hand, so characteristic of the NT that it is difficult to think that it has occurred in exactly the same way had the writers been writing in an independent Greek style.

3. An arresting feature in the teaching of Jesus is His description of men as the sons (υἱοί, τέκνα) of God. The most conspicuous name that He uses for God in His relation to men is that of 'Father,' usually with the Jewish addition of 'in heaven' or 'heavenly.' Some of His most noticeable parables and illustrative sayings are based on the relation of father and son as best representing the relation between God and man (see, e.g., Lk 15¹¹⁻¹⁷, Mt 7^{9ff.}). See artt. CHILDREN OF GOD, SON OF GOD.

Notice may be taken of the curious phrasing of Lk 20³⁶ υἱοὶ εἰσὶν θεοῦ διὰ τὴν ἀναστάσεως υἱοὶ θεοῦ. This phrase seems to limit the description 'sons of God' to those who are accounted worthy to attain the resurrection life (v. 35). They 'are sons of God through being sons of the Resurrection' (Weymouth). Or perhaps we may equally well interpret by saying that the fact of their having risen shows that they are God's sons. It has to be pointed out, however, that this is part of an answer to our Lord's reply to the Sadducees quite peculiar in itself, presenting a striking divergence from the Synoptic parallels. It seems to be merely an attempt to explain the term τέκνα itself a Lukan ἀπαξ λέγ. for the simpler υἱὸς ἀγγέλων (Mt 13⁴¹ and Mk. At any rate, it cannot be pressed so as to constitute a representation of men as being all God's sons, as another, found so often in the Gospels. A similar phrase may be suggested (cf. also phrasing in Ro 14).

4. The term 'son' is used of Jesus Himself in various ways. (a) In the ordinary sense of the word He is described as 'the son of Joseph' and 'the son of Mary.' See Mk 6³=Mt 13⁵⁵=Lk 4²². Jn 6⁴² (cf. 14⁵) is also in close agreement with Lk 4²², with the interesting addition, 'whose father and mother we know.' (This is one of the smaller points in which the Johannine Gospel stands on a basis of common tradition with the Synoptics.) The expression in Mt 13⁵⁵ ὁ τοῦ τέκτονος υἱός, may possibly have originally meant no more than ὁ τέκτων in Mk 6³. Cheyne's conjecture, that 'Jesus the son of Joseph' may mean 'Jesus a member of the house of Joseph' (EB ii. 2598), may be ingenious, but is an unnecessary departure from tradition. We cannot arbitrarily push aside the plain suggestions of the Birth-narratives and the genealogies as to the personality of Joseph in this connexion.

It is to be pointed out that it is only in the account of the visit to Nazareth, as above, that the Synoptists explicitly indicate such a designation of Jesus. (The Johannine instances are in quite different connexions.) Corresponding references to His parentage are found, however, in such passages as Lk 2²³⁻²⁴ ('his father and his mother,' 'his parents,' 'thy father and I') and Mk 3^{31ff.} with its parallels. τέκνον as applied to Jesus occurs just once, in Lk 24⁴⁸. The dominant presentment of our Lord in the Gospels transcends the interest in His human relations. See also the Introduction, p. 10. J. S. CLEMENS.

SON OF DAVID.—The phrase is used in the NT as a title of the Messiah, except in Mt 14²⁰ (cf. Lk 12⁷), where it has the ordinary genealogical force. For the general discussion of the Messiahship of Jesus, and of the Messiah as king, see MESSIAH; the present article concerns only the use of this particular title.

1. The Messianic value of the title comes out forcibly in the puzzling question put by Jesus to the Pharisees (Mt 22^{42ff.}, Mk 12³⁵, Lk 20⁴¹)—a question that they were unable to answer: 'The scribes say that the Christ is (to be) the Son of David; but David calls him Lord; how then is he his son?' The passage is not to be interpreted as a repudiation of the title on the part of Jesus. Of such a repudiation there is no evidence either in His own teaching, or in other parts of the NT. On the contrary, the relationship is specifically taught by St. Paul (Ro 1³, 2 Ti 2⁸), seemingly as of some importance, and it is assumed of the Messiah in the Apocalypse (Rev 5⁵ 22¹⁶). The passage is a repudiation of the notion of the Jews—implied in their use of the title—that it fully expresses the functions of the Messiah. The Messiah does not owe His dignity to His Davidic descent. His work far surpasses that of the great king of Israel. The proper answer to the question would have involved an entire re-orientation of the ideas of the Jews concerning the Messiah, of which they were, of course, utterly incapable. If Jesus did not expect this result to follow from His question, He could at least show by it the logical absurdity of the emphasis they put upon the Davidic sonship. The connexion of the Messiah with the royal house and city was deemed so essential, that Jesus, of Galilean extraction, was declared by some to be ineligible to the high office.

2. The particular phase of Messiahship which the title properly expresses is, of course, the royal estate and function. Such was the case when it was applied to Jesus on the occasion of His triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21⁹⁻¹⁵). It was so understood, and the anger of the priests and scribes was aroused in consequence. Compare also the Annunciation (Lk 1³²), where it is said that Jesus shall be given the throne of His father David.

3. There is, however, no reason to suppose that, as used in NT times, the title alludes to royal prowess, or to a career of conquest on the part of the Messiah. Indeed, the Hosannas of the people were in praise of very different qualities. Such a conception of the force of the phrase is entirely inconsistent with the cry of the blind men (Mt 20^{30ff.} [=Mk 10^{47ff.}, Lk 18^{38ff.}] and 9²⁷) and of the Canaanitish woman (Mt 15²²), 'Son of David, have mercy.' The title came naturally to the lips of those who sought Jesus' aid in their great distress. Likewise the work of healing which He had wrought called forth—so characteristic were they of the Messiah who was expected—the query whether this might not be the Son of David (Mt 12²³).

4. These NT applications of the title are in close harmony with the OT description of the Messiah. David was the founder of the kingdom of Israel. Whenever in later centuries the nation and its welfare were in the mind, the thought naturally turned to David. When the house of David no longer ruled, and the kingdom was shattered, prophets and singers lamented the misfortunes that had overtaken David and his house. When their hopefulness and faith in God expressed itself in visions of a bright future, they naturally spoke of a second David, a branch of his house, who should restore the nation to its former prosperity. As the past, and especially David's rule, grew fairer by contrast with the dismal present, so the new kingdom of David in the future was pictured in extravagant colours. The Kingdom should extend over the whole earth, irresistibly, triumphantly. But this conquest was not conquest for conquest's sake. It was a process without which the longed-for prosperity could, in their imagination, not be realized. It was but an incident in the larger blessedness of the future. To the Jew of the later pre-Christian centuries, David stood for much else besides military prowess and political prestige. If this element had been predominant, it would have been incongruous to ascribe to him so large a part of the Psalms as bear his name. If we seek for the cause of this change of emphasis, it is doubtless to be found in the very distress that they suffered. That distress was personal, individual. Character became the condition of enjoying the benefits of the new Kingdom, and in turn the new Kingdom itself—ideal—was to exist for the sake of the individual to save him from his woes, and to lead him to righteousness. Ps 72, in spite of its warlike sentiments, is the utterance of one to whom, after all, the welfare of the people, the oppressed and the defenceless, is paramount. These are the poor and the blind to whom Jesus gave salvation, by such ministry proving, even to His enemies, that He was worthy to be called the Son of God.

O. H. GATES.

SON OF GOD.—As the word 'Christ,' which was at first a title, has come to be a proper name, this change being, indeed, accomplished even in the NT, so the title 'Son of God' is now appropriated to the Second Person of the Trinity; and the ordinary reader of the Bible assumes this to be the meaning wherever he finds the phrase. He has only, however, to read with a little attention to perceive that this is an assumption which ought not to be made without inquiry, because in Scripture there are many 'sons of God.' (1) The angels are thus designated, as when in the Book of Job (38⁷) it is mentioned that at the dawn of creation 'the sons of God sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.' (2) The term is applied to the first man, when, in Lk 3, the genealogy of the Saviour is traced back to Adam, 'who,' it is added (v. 38), 'was the son of God.' And, if the general scope of Scripture may leave it questionable whether the same high title can be applied to all the first man's descendants, the authority of our Lord may be claimed, on the ground of the parable of the Prodigal Son, as deciding the question in the affirmative. (3) The Hebrew nation collectively is frequently thus designated, as when, in the land of Midian, Jehovah sent Moses to Pharaoh with the message: 'Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my firstborn, and I say unto thee, Let my son go' (Ex 4²²). Whether, according to Scripture usage, it was applicable to individual Israelites, is not so clear, but probably it was; for not only did the Jews, in speaking to Jesus, claim, 'We have one Father, even God' (Jn 8⁴¹), but Jesus Himself said, 'Let the children first be filled' (Mk 7²⁷). (4) It was a title of the kings of Israel. Thus, in Ps 89²⁶, an ancient oracle is quoted in which Jehovah says of King David, 'He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father, my God, and the rock of my salvation; also I will make him my firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth.' Similarly Jehovah says of King Solomon (2 S 7¹⁴), 'I will be his Father, and he shall be to me a son.' (5) In the NT the title is conferred on all who believe in the Saviour. Thus, in the Prologue to the Gospel of St. John, it is said, 'But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name' (Jn 1¹²); and, in his First Epistle, the Evangelist exclaims, 'Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God' (1 Jn 3¹).

It would require some investigation to determine what is the reason for the bestowal of this lofty title in each of these cases, and in all probability the reasons might be different in the different cases. In the case of the angels, it may be that of the Creator to His creature. It may cover also the application to men in general, who were made in 'the image of God.' The application to the nation of Israel refers undoubtedly to the choice which the grace of God made of the Hebrew people from among all the nations of the earth; and in the case of the kings this grace reached its climax. In the case of Christians, the reasons are obvious in the texts quoted in reference to them. It is usual to lay all the emphasis on the sentiments entertained by God towards those honoured with this title, as if it expressed solely His choice of them; but Nösgen (op. cit. infr.) contends that in all cases at least some reason for the designation must be given, either of the person designated; and this reason must be of a kind to have common sense on its side.

It will thus be seen that 'the son of God' was a phrase much in use in the world before it was attached to our Lord; and the question naturally arises, from which of its anterior uses it was that its transference to Him took place. In all probability it was from the fourth mentioned above—that is, its use by the Jewish kings. If the application to the kings culminated in that to the kings, so the application to the kings culminated in Him who was to be the fulfilment of the regal idea in Israel. That is to say, the term is, in the first place, political-Messianic. But it does not follow, as is often assumed, that this is its only sense. On the contrary, in all the places where it occurs, whether in the Synoptic Gospels or in the Epistles, it points strongly to the personal qualities of Him who bears it, and to an intimate relationship with Him whose Son He is said to be. The political title rests upon personal qualities and experiences; He is not the Son of God because He is the Messiah, but, on the contrary, He is the Messiah because He is the Son of God. That is to say, the term is ethico-religious. But it does not follow, as is often assumed, that because it is official-Messianic and ethico-religious it is not also physical or metaphysical. On the contrary, the closeness of the ethico-religious relation may be such as to demand a metaphysical relationship of an intimate and peculiar kind between Father and Son. It seems to be strangely forgotten in many quarters that ethical intimacy is, in all cases, limited by the closeness of metaphysical relationship; the limitation of the intimacy between a dog and a man, for example, is due to the lack of sympathy between them, whereas the sympathy and intimacy possible between a woman and a man is due to their metaphysical oneness. There is no reason whatever why all the three kinds of relationship indicated above should not be united; in point of fact, they often are. The kingship of a king, for example, may be, first, official, he being actually the reigning monarch; secondly, personal, he possessing the ethical qualities which become and secure his position; thirdly, physical or metaphysical, because he is of the blood royal, and has in his composition the hereditary instincts of long descent. In like manner the Messiahship of Jesus may rest on a spiritual and ethical relationship to God; but this may be of so intimate a kind as to demand a peculiar relationship to the Father physically or metaphysically; and in all the Gospel there is reference, more or less, to all the three.

1. The Synoptics.—In the Synoptics Jesus does not, of His own motion, call Himself in so many words 'the Son of God.' But the title is applied to Him in about twelve passages in Mt. and fully half that number each in Mk. and Lk., and in several of these cases He treats this application in such a way as to show that He acknowledges it. On several occasions (six times in Mt., once in Mk., thrice in Lk.) He denominates Himself 'the Son' in such a way as to prove unmistakably that He regards Himself as 'the Son of God'; and many times in all three Gospels (over a score of times in Mt., thrice in Mk., nine times in Lk.) He in the same way refers to God as His Father. (The quotations in detail will be found on p. 86 of Stalker's Christology of Jesus, mentioned below in the List of References.

(1) Beyschlag observes (NT Theol. i. 68) that the occurrence of the term in the mouths of others shows that it has its roots in the OT and was already current in Israel, and therefore, that for the sense in which Jesus applied it to Himself we must go back to the OT. It is also usual to state that it is employed in the pseudo-epigraphic literature of the period between the OT and the NT as a synonym for the Messiah. If, however, the only two passages of this sort supplied by Dalman (op. cit. infr.) be referred to, it will be found that this notion rests on a very slender basis. If the TR of Mk 1¹ be correct, — 'the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God,' — it would be rash to limit the Evangelist's intention to the Messiahship; but the reading is suspected. In Lk 1³⁵ the reason why Jesus is to be called 'the Son of God' is supplied in the memorable statement to Mary, 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee.' This is a physical explanation of the term, which it is rather surprising never to find elsewhere. The nearest approach to it in the Gospels would be the exclamation of the centurion at the Cross, 'Truly this was the Son of God' (Mk 15³⁹); but it is dubious what a heathen may have meant by such an observation.

Still more dubious, one would suppose, must it remain what the demoniacs intended by calling Jesus by this title, though it is usually taken for granted that they must have used it in the Messianic sense, because they also sometimes acknowledged Him as the Messiah. When Satan, in the Temptation, played with the title, he was obviously referring back to the voice which, at the Jordan during the Baptism, . . . Jesus as 'the Son of God'; but how . . . voice intended, or how much the Tempter understood of what it meant, might require considerable discussion.

When 'they that were in the ship' on the occasion when Jesus stilled the tempest and rescued St. Peter from the sea, 'came and worshipped him,' saying, 'Of a truth thou art the Son of God' (Mt 14³³), the most natural interpretation may be that they were acknowledging Him as the Messiah. If they were, they anticipated, in a remarkable manner, the subsequent confession at Caesarea Philippi; and this raises a doubt which may incline us to understand their language rather as an involuntary recognition of the Divine in Jesus, occasioned by the sight of a remarkable miracle.

Undoubtedly the most convincing case for the identity of . . . the terms 'the Messiah' and 'the Son of God' is the confession of the Twelve, through the lips of St. Peter, at Caesarea Philippi; because, whereas St. Matthew reports them as confessing, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (16¹⁶), the other two Evangelists omit the second phrase (Mk 8²⁹, Lk 9²⁰). Now, it is argued, they could not have omitted this, had it contained a momentous addition to the acknowledgment of the Messiahship; against which the only caveat that can be hinted is that there are many examples to prove that it is perilous to rest much on the silence of one or more of the Gospels.

Another passage which is confidently appealed to as demonstrating the identity of meaning between the two terms, is the demand addressed by the high priest to Jesus, on His trial, to say whether He were 'the Christ, the Son of God.' Yet, in reporting this incident, St. Luke excites doubt as to the identity, because he represents Him as being asked first simply if He were 'the Christ'; but when He wound up His reply with the imposing words,

'Hereafter shall the Son of Man sit on the right hand of the power of God,' they proceeded, 'Art thou, then, the Son of God?' and the affirmative answer to this second question seems to have shocked and irritated them far more than the answer to the first, occasioning a tempest of rage and insult in all present, with a unanimous agreement that He had been guilty of blasphemy (Lk 22⁶⁹). H. J. Holtzmann, who writes with extraordinary feeling on this subject, recently, in a review in the Theologische Literaturzeitung, declaring it to be a shame that Protestant scholars should even doubt the identity, affirms that 'the blasphemy can only have been found in the fact that a man belonging to the lower classes, one openly forsaken of God and going forward to a shameful death, should have dared to represent himself as the object and fulfilment of all the Divine promises given to the nation'; but the blasphemy is far more obvious if the claim to be 'the Son of God' was understood to mean more than even Messiahship.

From the foregoing examination of the passages in the Gospels where the phrase is used of Jesus by others than Himself, it will be perceived that there is considerable variety of meaning and application; it certainly is Messianic, but it is not uniformly or exclusively so.

(2) When we turn to the passages in which Jesus speaks of Himself as 'the Son,' or calls God His Father, the official-Messianic element is almost entirely absent, the language being that of intimacy and confidence. Here and there, indeed, there may be Messianic associations involved, as when Jesus promises to the Twelve that, in the day of the full manifestation of the Kingdom, they shall sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19²⁸), or when He predicts that on the judgment day He will appear in the glory of His Father and of the holy angels (Mk 8³⁸); but, as a rule, one might read the greater number of these sayings without being reminded that they proceeded from the lips of one claiming to be the Messiah. The consciousness to which they give expression is that of a personal relationship; and when, in Gethsemane, He prays, . . . if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt'; and, farther on, 'O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done' (Mt 26^{39, 42}); or when, on the cross, He cries, 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do'; and, farther on, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (Lk 23^{34, 46}).

The climax of this intimate religious sentiment is reached in the great saying of Mt 11²⁷ || Lk 10²² 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father; and no man knoweth the Son but the Father, neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him.' In recent times this passage has attracted great attention, not a few looking upon it as the profoundest utterance of Jesus in the Synoptics. Holtzmann, indeed, hesitates between such a decision and a suggestion of Brandt's that it is a cento, put into the mouth of Jesus, of words borrowed partly from other Scripture and partly from the Apocrypha; but by Keim it has been reverentially interpreted, and scholarship has, on the whole, knelt before it as expressing the innermost mystery of the consciousness of Jesus. The words were spoken at a crisis, when He was roused out of deep depression at the apparent failure of His mission, by the return of the Seventy, bringing a joyful account of the results of their labours. 'In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes; even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight' (Mt 11²⁵). Then followed the words already quoted. The first of them, 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father,' may be best understood, as is suggested by Lütgert (op. cit. infr.), of the Messianic dominion in its widest extent, as it had been: '... from of old; while the next words, 'For no man knoweth the Son but the Father,' etc., express the consciousness of His own right and ability to fill this position, because He has all the resources of the Divine nature to dispense to those who come to Him. This is why He proceeds immediately to say, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest' (v.²⁸). The mood in which He was consisted of a joyful uprising within Himself of the consciousness of all He was able to do for those who trusted Him; and this was due to His intimate and perfect union with Deity.

Most scholars, however, hasten to add that this sonship was purely ethical, and was not different from that to which He was prepared to introduce His disciples. He showed, it is remarked, the true pathway to this position, and the one by which He had reached it Himself, in such sayings as the following: 'Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you; that ye may be sons of your Father which is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust' (Mt 5⁴⁴). Certainly this sonship of Jesus is ethical-religious, and this indicates the pathway by which the disciples of Jesus may participate in His sonship; but that His sonship and theirs are in all respects identical is contradicted by the unfailing usage of Jesus '... of God as 'my Father' and 'your Father' never as 'our Father.' Of this difference Holtzmann makes light in the same way in which he lays down the wholly untenable assumption that Jesus prayed the Lord's Prayer with the disciples, including the fifth petition; but the fact is a radical one; and the conclusion to which it points is not without other confirmation.

Thus, in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, the owner of the vineyard, after sending servant after servant to negotiate with the labourers, sends his own son, Mk. adding 'his well-beloved,' by whom Jesus obviously intends Himself. Of course, it may be said that the Messiah was different from all the prophets, and that this difference may be indicated by the difference between a son and a servant; but the analogy would be closer if a more intimate and personal relationship were assumed.

One of the most striking passages pointing in the same direction is one that, at first sight, seems to point the opposite way. In Mk 13³², speaking of a date in the future, Jesus says, 'But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father.' Naturally this has been often quoted as a conclusive disproof of the orthodox doctrine of the Sonship of our Lord, and it has been one of the chief occasions for the invention of the kenotic theories, as they are called, of His Person; but, on the other hand, it is one of the clearest indications of a consciousness superior to mere humanity, for it places the speaker above both men and angels so obviously, that even Holtzmann, in an unwonted outburst of concession, exclaims: 'This is the single passage in which the Son, while opposed along with the angels to the Father, appears to become a metaphysical magnitude' (NT Theol. i. 268).

The inference appearing to follow from the passage just quoted is that Jesus was a Being above both men and angels, but inferior to God. But a more profound and true knowledge is supplied by the most impressive passage of all on this subject in the Synoptics: the words of Jesus with which the First Gospel concludes: 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world' (28¹⁹). The close resemblance will be noted between the opening words of this statement and the opening words of the saying in Mt 11²⁷, already commented on. The promise, 'Lo, I am with you alway,' has likewise a parallel in Mt 18²⁰ 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' But the association of 'the Son' with the Father and the Holy Ghost is the most remarkable expression in the Synoptics of the self-consciousness of Jesus. How much it implies is a problem or metaphysical. Of course, its saying actually proceeding from Jesus has been fiercely disputed, and in certain quarters the air is affected of treating it as beyond dispute an addition to the actual words of Christ; but its place in the ordinance of baptism connects it closely with the Author of that rite; and there is no reason for rejecting it which would not, at the same time, imply the rejection of the whole section of the life of our Lord which follows His death on the cross.

2. The Fourth Gospel.—When we turn from the Synoptics to the Fourth Gospel, we are immediately conscious of being in a different atmosphere and at a different altitude, and the effect is at first bewildering. Instead of a studied reticence on the subject of who and whence He was, such as we encounter in the previous Gospels, Jesus places this subject in the foreground, and instead of letting His higher claims escape only at rare intervals and in the society of His chosen friends, He proclaims them to all and sundry, and, as one might say, from the housetops. This raises many questions as to the origin and purpose of this Gospel, which cannot be fully discussed in this place; but it may be said that, if both representations are to be accepted as historical, we must conceive the words of Christ as having ranged over a wider area than is usually assumed. If in His mind there were circles of the most diverse as those of the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel, there must have been ample spaces round both circles, in which the outer elements of both might touch and blend. There is a tendency, due to the preoccupation of study, to narrow the life of Christ down to what has been actually recorded; but this is in many ways misleading, and it is mistaken. It is certain that the acts recorded of Him are only a few stray flowers thrown over the wall of an ample garden; and it is not unreasonable to infer that the same is true of His words.

As, however, we grow accustomed to the new environment in the Gospel of St. John, we begin to perceive that the figure which stands in the midst is not so different as it appears at first sight from the one we have just been studying. He is still 'the Son of Man' as well as 'the Son of God,' though the proportion in which these names occur is reversed. The way in which He here calls Himself 'the Son' and God His Father is exactly similar to the usage in the Synoptics, only He has these terms far more frequently on His lips. Not a few of the most astonishing statements He makes about Himself are substantially anticipated in the verse of an earlier Gospel so frequently referred to, Mt 11²⁷. He does not hesitate, even in Jn., to say 'my Father is greater than I' (14²⁸), or to speak of God as 'my God' (20¹⁷). We have here the same three elements in the sonship as formerly—the theocratic-Messianic, the ethico-religious, and the physical or metaphysical—only they may be mingled in somewhat different proportions. The Messianic we see in its most unmistakable form in the testimonies of the Baptist (1³⁴), of Nathanael (1⁴⁶), of Martha (11²⁷), and of others; but the boundaries of the other two will require more careful investigation.

Two things are new—the description of the Son as 'only begotten' (14¹⁸ 31⁶, 18), and the claim to pre-existence on the part of Jesus.

(1) The adjective μονογενής describes the unique Sonship of Jesus. St. John is not unaware that there are other sons of God. So far from it, his Gospel opens with the great statement, already quoted, 'But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name' (Jn 1¹²); and in his First Epistle he exclaims, 'Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is' (1 Jn 3²); but such are not sons of God in the same sense in which Jesus is 'the Son of God.' Wherein, then, does the uniqueness consist? It cannot lie in the ethico-spiritual region; for it is there that in this respect Jesus and those who receive Him are one, except in degree of intimacy with the Father. Most assume that it lies in Messiahship; and, no doubt, in being the Messiah, Jesus is unique. Even Weiss takes it for granted that this is where it lies, contending again and again that nothing metaphysical is suggested. This, however, is a mere piece of dogmatism; for the uniqueness might quite as well lie in this quarter. In fact, the verbal idea in the adjective rather suggests it; and it is very significant that St. John treats the claim of Jesus to Sonship as involving equality with God. In 5¹⁸ we read, 'Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the Sabbath, but said that God was his Father, making himself equal with God'; and in 10³³ 'The Jews answered him, saying, For a good work we stone thee not, but because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God,' this being because He had stated, 'I and my Father are one' (v. 30).

The force of this is turned aside by Wendt with the assumption that these notes are from the pen of a redactor, who, both here and elsewhere, has wrought confusion in the record emanating from the disciple whom Jesus loved. Beyschlag takes the bull more boldly by the horns with the suggestion that these remarks of the Jews are quoted as evidences of their perversity and stupidity, the sayings of Jesus on which they were comments not having implied at all what they supposed. But it may be left to everyone to say whether or not this is a natural manner of reading St. John's narrative. At all events, as a historical statement, it is of the utmost importance that by the contemporaries of Jesus His claim to be the Son of God, put forward as it was by Him, was interpreted in this way.

(2) The passages in which Jesus claims pre-existence are four—6⁶² 'What and if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before?'; 8⁵⁸ 'Verily I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am'; 17⁴ 'I have glorified thee on the earth, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do; and now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was'; and especially, 17²⁴ 'Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me; for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world'; to which may be added 16²⁸ 'I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world; again, I leave the world, and go to the Father.' In all these cases, not excepting the last, the leaving of the world—surely a real, historical event—is put in the plainest terms in opposition to His entry into the world, which must, therefore, be equally a real, historical event.

Beyschlag attacks the pre-existence with vigour, and displays remarkable ingenuity in explaining it of an ideal existence in the mind and purpose of God. Thus, before God thought of Abraham, He was thinking of Jesus, who was anterior and superior in the Divine plan. But, after the laborious analysis is over, these great sayings draw themselves together again and stare the reader in the face as a united and coherent aspect of the self-consciousness of Jesus. Wendt applies to these texts his favourite device of showing that what is said of Jesus, and is supposed to imply something superhuman, is also applied to others of whom nothing superhuman can be predicated. That, if Jesus (8⁵⁸) says to the Jews, 'I speak that which I have seen with my Father,' He adds, 'And ye do that which ye have seen with your father,' (10³³) 'Ye are on,' 'Ye are the devil, and the works which ye will do' (10³⁹), that if this implies that Jesus pre-existed with God, it implies also that the Jews with whom He was contending pre-existed with the devil. But how futile this kind of argument may sometimes be, is shown when the statement, 'that the saints shall judge the world' (1 Co 6²), is used to take all the grandness and solemnity out of the statements of Jesus as to the Father to which He is to occupy at the Last Day as the Judge of the quick and the dead. Wendt's method, as the great sayings of Jesus to the lowest point, and then assumes that this must be the meaning in every case. But the reader wearies of such a process: he feels that surely Jesus cannot have put the minimum of significance into His words on all occasions; or, if so, how is He to escape the charge of employing big language to express small ideas, or confusing His hearers with enigmas which might easily have been cleared up, had He only uttered a few plain words of explanation? Holtzmann gives up the attempt to read a comprehensive meaning into words like these. Such sayings, according to him, are not genuine words of Jesus: they are utterances of Christianity rather than of Christ, and of Christianity after it had passed through the mind of St. Paul (op. cit. p. 433). But the situation is in all probability the reverse: the deep resemblance between the Christology of St. John and that of St. Paul, which undoubtedly exists in spite of superficial unlikeness, is due rather to what St. Paul learned from the older Apostle either directly or through the knowledge and ideas of the beloved disciple being diffused in the atmosphere of that age; while the consent on this great subject, not only of these two but of the primitive Church as a whole, may be traced back without hesitation to the tradition of our Lord's own testimony to Himself.

The witness of Jesus to His own pre-existence is not confined to the texts just quoted, remarkable as these are, but pervades the whole mass of His words in the Fourth Gospel, and forms the presupposition of all the rest of His utterances about Himself. It is by commencing at this starting-point and following this clue that the student finds everything expanding before him as he goes on, and all the various ideas arranging themselves in their places on the right hand and on the left.

Whether there be any analogy to the consciousness of Jesus at this point in what some of the ancients believed about this life being a reminiscence of a life preceding, or in what some of the modern poets have hinted about human beings trailing clouds of glory from an antecedent home, may be left to everyone's own judgment; but Jesus habitually spoke as if He were conscious of having had an anterior existence, where He had seen and heard what He repeated during His earthly life, and had received confirmation how He should afterwards act. Thus to Nicodemus He says (3¹¹⁻¹³), 'Verily, verily, I say unto thee, We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness. If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things? And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven.' In the great intercessory prayer He says to His Father (17⁸), 'I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me; and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me.' Cf. also 6^{46, 62} 7^{28, 29} 8^{33, 26, 27, 38} 12⁴⁰ 14³¹ 15¹⁵ 17⁸.

Out of this pre-existent state Jesus was consconscious of having been 'sent' into the world. This recalls the mission of the prophets of the OT, who, though not haunted by any reminiscence of a previous state of existence, yet were all profoundly conscious that they had been chosen and ordained to do a particular work at a particular time; some, like Jeremiah, being told that even from the womb they had been destined to their peculiar vocation. With this prophetic consciousness that of Jesus was in close analogy; yet the references to it suggest a deeper mystery. Corresponding with this sending on God's part is a 'coming' on the part of Jesus Himself; and in some of the passages in which He says, 'I am come,' there is the same suggestion of something weighty and more than usually significant. Not infrequently both conceptions are blended, as in 6³⁸ 'I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me'; or 7^{28, 29} 'Ye both know me, and ye know whence I am; and I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not; but I know him; for I am from him, and he hath sent me'; or 8⁴² 'If God were your Father, ye would love me; for I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me.' Cf. 5^{23, 24, 36, 37, 38} 6⁴⁴ 7⁴² 9⁴ 10³⁶ 11⁴² 12^{44, 49} 14²⁷ 15²¹ 16⁵ 17^{8, 23} 20²¹; also 6^{38, 38} 7¹⁴ 9³⁰ 10¹⁰ 16^{27, 28}.

The object or purpose for which He was thus 'sent' and 'came' into the world is expressed in a great variety of forms, all of which, however, are more or less suggestive of the dignity and uniqueness of Him of whom they are predicated, though of course some make this impression more than others. Thus He comes to reveal the truth and to glorify God thereby. So He said to Pilate, 'To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth' (18³⁷). In His great High-Priestly prayer He says to the Father, 'I have glorified thee on the earth, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do'; again, 'I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou hast given me out of the world'; and again, 'I have glorified thee, O Father, by the men whom thou hast given me, and will declare it; that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them' (17^{4, 6, 26}). So illuminating and comprehensive is this revelation, that He calls Himself 'the light of the world' (see 8¹² 9⁵ 12^{36, 46}). Sometimes He comes to judge. He even goes so far as to say, 'The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son' (5²²). Sometimes He comes to 'save,' as in 10⁹ 'I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture'; or 12⁴⁷ 'I came not to judge the world, but to save the world.' But oftenest His mission is to give life, this being expressed in a great variety of forms. Thus, in 10¹⁰, He says, 'I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.' Sometimes the opposite alternative is tragically suggested, as in the well known 3¹⁶, where 'to perish' stands in contrast with 'life'; or in 8⁵¹ 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death,' where death awaits those who do not receive 'life' from Christ. Frequently the idea of 'eternal' is joined with life. It is one of the purposes of the Fourth Gospel to conceive of a life capable of being enjoyed even in the present world; but it also comprehends the future, and this is sometimes the ruling idea. The intimate connexion of Jesus Himself with the bestowal of this life is extremely significant. Thus, in 5²⁶, He claims, 'As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself.' At the grave of Lazarus He exclaimed, 'I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die.' The communication of natural life is interchanged with that of spiritual life; in 5²¹, for example, He says, 'As the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will'; and farther on, at 5²⁵, it is added, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live.' The personal share of Jesus in all this is further indicated in His claim to be the bread of life (6^{27, 32, 33, 47, 51}), and to give the water of life (4^{10, 14} 7^{37, 38}). In view of such sublime statements, the term 'Messianic' is frequently used in a way that is a delusion and a snare. What explanation of such pretensions is it to say that He who made them differed from other men and prophets by being the Messiah? The possession of no office whatever is able to make a mortal capable of such functions: there must be something far above the competency of mere man in any one who can be the subject of such predicates. In Our Deus Homo Anselm develops the argument that, the Person being such as He was, the work must be Divine; but the logic tells equally in the opposite direction: the work being such, the Person must be Divine.

Some of these works are, however, invisible, because spiritual, and some belong to the distant future. Hence Jesus could not show Himself in the act of doing them. But He did works, which all could see, that were signs and guarantees of these. He healed the blind, in order to prove that He was the organ of revelation; He raised the dead, in order to prove that He would be the Lord of the resurrection at the Last Day. So He Himself interpreted His miracles; 'I do this confidently to their evidential power . . . that the works of my Father, believe me not; but, if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works; that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me and I in him' (10^{37, 38}; see also 1⁴⁸ 4¹⁸ 8¹⁸ 10²⁵ 11^{4, 15} 14¹¹ 17^{23, 24, 26}).

All the time, however, whilst doing His works on earth, He was in uninterrupted communion with His Father in heaven, actually speaking of Himself once (3¹⁸) as 'in heaven,' if the reading can be trusted. Such expressions have been used to break down the testimonies to His pre-existence, as if none of these might mean any more than such an ideal presence elsewhere. But this is a distinct aspect of His testimony to Himself, and there is no inconsistency between the two. His doctrine, His words, His works He knew to be all the Father's (7¹⁶ 8²⁶ 14^{10, 24} 5^{19, 20}). He could say, 'He that sent me is with me; the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please Him' (8²⁹). With the most touching naïveté He spoke of the Father's love to Him and His own love to the Father (10¹⁷ 17^{23, 24, 26}). He strives for language strong enough to express the unity between His Father and Himself (6³⁶ 10³⁸ 14¹⁰ 17²¹). At last the climax is reached in the utterance which brought down on His head the charge of blasphemy, 'I and the Father are one' (10³⁰).

Though, however, thus united with God on earth, He longs for return to the other world, which is His true home. To this He often refers, not infrequently connecting the thought of going thither with that of having come from the same place; and what could be more natural? Thus, in 8¹⁴ He says, 'Though I bear record of myself, yet my record is true; for I know whence I came and whither I go; but ye cannot tell whence I come and whither I go'; and in 16²⁸ 'I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world; again, I leave the world, and go to the Father.'

‘I saw in the night visions, and, behold, there came with the clouds of heaven one like unto a son of man, and he came even to the ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given to him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom shall not be destroyed.'

It will be noted that in this more accurate rendering (that of the RV) the phrase which is of most moment in the subject now under discussion is quite indefinite: 'one like unto a son of man,'—i.e. one with human attributes in contrast to the ferocity of 'the beasts.' The question at once arises, Whom are we to understand by the 'one like unto a son of man'? The answer most commonly given has been—the Messiah; and there is much to be said for that answer yet, in spite of the dissent of a large number of more recent exegetes. They point to the fact that when Daniel receives the interpretation of his vision (7¹⁷⁻²⁷), not a word is said about the 'one like unto a son of man,' but with threefold iteration (vv. 18, 22, 27) it is asserted that after judgment upon the beasts, dominion will be given to 'the saints of the Most High.' Hence it is said that on the testimony of the text of Daniel itself, the 'one like unto a son of man' does not denote a person, but 'the glorified and ideal people of Israel' (see, e.g., Driver, Com. on Daniel, p. 102; Drummond, Jewish Messiah, p. 229). So strongly indeed has this view impressed itself upon the minds of some, that they apply the impersonal interpretation of the phrase in Dn 7¹³ as a test to the passages in which our Lord is represented by the Evangelists as using the words 'the Son of Man.' Thus J. Estlin Carpenter (The Synoptic Gospels, pp. 372, 388), regarding the phrase in Daniel as 'emblematic and collective, and maintaining that Jesus used it in its original meaning, arrives at the conclusion that 'wherever . . . the term is individualized and used Messianically, we have evidence of the later influence of the Church. Jesus never used it to designate Himself.' It is obvious that the application of such a canon would have far-reaching results. But is the interpretation upon which it is based quite sure? The writer of Daniel does not regard 'the saints of the Most High' as coming down from heaven. They are already upon the earth, suffering the oppression of the tyrant symbolized by the 'little horn,' and awaiting deliverance and reversal of condition, which come when the Most High sits for judgment. It would surely be somewhat incongruous to symbolize the saints passing from the depths of misery to exaltation by one who descends from heaven to earth. On the other hand, it accords entirely with the conception which dominates Dn 7 of a complete change of conditions, if by 'one like a son of man' we understand a Divinely empowered Ruler sent from on high to reign where the 'four kings,' the 'great beasts,' whose origin had been of the earth (v. 17), had borne sway.

If it be urged that had the writer of Dn 7 intended the Messiah in v. 13, he could not have omitted mention of Him when he goes on to say 'the saints of the Most High' shall receive the kingdom, and could not have spoken so unreservedly of 'kingdom and dominion' upon the saints of the Most High, it may be replied that the writer of Daniel, it may be supposed, was not concerned with what may be disclosed by other prophecies, if the thought of the author of Daniel is found to dwell more on the glories of the Kingdom of the latter days and the felicity of those who have part in it, than upon the Messianic King. Large sections of prophecy, so far as they seek to portray the better future, omit all direct reference to the Messiah. There is no warrant, therefore, as Driver (who, however, holds that 'the title . . . does not in Daniel directly denote the Messiah,' op. cit. p. 104) points out, for saying that 'the Kingdom is not to be thought of without its King.' And there is also no sufficient warrant to assume that if in the recital of a vision there is mention of the Messianic King, He, rather than His subjects, must have mention when the vision is interpreted. It is through failure to make allowance for this that N. Schmidt (ETB iv. 4710) complains that the Messianic interpretation of Dn 7¹³ 'fails to explain how the Messiah, once introduced, can have dropped so completely out of the author's thought, not only in the explanation of the vision, where He is unceremoniously ignored, but also in the future deliverance, with which Michael has much to do but the Messiah nothing.' Hence Schmidt suggests that the 'one like unto a son of man' is no other than Michael himself, 'Michael your prince,' (Dn 10²¹)—a figure who could give no real assistance. The absence of a figure of an angel in the interpretation of the vision is not more easy of explanation than the absence therefrom of the mention of the Messiah. Indeed, of the two conceptions, that of the gift of everlasting dominion over all peoples to the guardian angel Michael, being the more unfamiliar, would urgently demand some explicit word of explanation.

In order to discover how Jewish readers of the Book of Daniel in the time shortly preceding and shortly following our Lord's ministry interpreted that figure, which was presented so suddenly, to be so speedily withdrawn, we turn to the evidence of the Similitudes of the Book of Enoch and of 2 Esdras. Both books are quite certainly of Jewish origin, and both afford unmistakable testimony as to the deep impression made by the vision of Daniel, which would have been in accordance with the concept of 'one like a son of man.' The date of the Book of Esdras is undisputed: it belongs to the closing decades of the first century of our era, approximately to A.D. 81. The date of the Similitudes—a later portion of the Book of Enoch—is more open to doubt. R. H. Charles (Book of Enoch, p. 29) holds them to have been written between B.C. 94-79, or B.C. 70-64. Schürer (HJP II. iii. 68) places them somewhat later: 'at the very soonest, in the time of Herod,' i.e. between B.C. 37-4. Thus, according to both these authorities, the Similitudes are pre-Christian. Whether they have been subjected to interpolations at Christian hands has been much debated. The plea that such interpolations, had they taken place, must have gone further, appears conclusive. Schürer (l.c.) claims, with reason, that 'this much at least ought to be admitted, that the view of the Messiah presented in the part of the book at present under consideration [the Similitudes] is perfectly explicable on Jewish grounds, and that to account for such a view it is not necessary to assume that it was due to Christian influences. Nothing of a distinctly Christian character is to be met with in the Similitudes. We are concerned here with the Messianic teaching of the Similitudes only so far as they adopt and develop the concept derived from Daniel of a heavenly 'Son of Man.' The following extracts (cited from Charles' tr.) may suffice:

In ch. 46, Enoch is represented as saying, when relating his vision of the Judgment: 'And there I saw One who had a Head of Days, and His head was white like wool, and with Him was another being whose countenance had the appearance of one of the holy angels. And I asked the angel who went with me and showed me all the hidden things, concerning that Son of Man, who he was, and whence he was, and why he went with the Head of Days? And he answered and said unto me, This is the Son of Man who hath righteousness, with whom dwelleth righteousness, and who reveals all the treasures of that which is hidden, because the Lord of Spirits hath chosen him, and his lot before the Lord of Spirits hath surpassed everything in uprightness for ever. And this Son of Man whom thou hast seen will arouse the kings and the mighty ones from their couches, and the strong from their thrones, and will loosen the reins of the strong and grind to powder the teeth of the sinners. And he will put down the kings from their thrones and kingdoms, because they do not extol and praise him, nor thankfully acknowledge whence the kingdom was bestowed upon them.' In ch. 62 we read: 'And thus the Lord commanded the kings and the mighty and the exalted, and those who dwell on the earth, and said, Open your eyes and lift up your horns if ye are able to recognize the Elect One. And the Lord of Spirits seated him (i.e. the Messiah) on the throne of His glory, and the spirit of righteousness was poured out upon him, and the word of his mouth slew all the sinners, and all the unrighteous were destroyed before his face. And there will stand up in that day all the kings, and the exalted, and those who hold the earth, and they will see and recognize him how he sits on the throne of his glory, and righteousness is judged before him, and no lying word is spoken before him. . . . And one portion of them will look on the other, and they will be terrified and their countenance will reel, and pain will seize them when they see that Son of Man sitting on the throne of his glory. And the kings . . . will glorify and bless and extol him who rules over all, who was hidden. For the Son of Man was hidden before Him, and the Son of Man was revealed in the presence of His might, and righteousness is judged before him. And he sat on the throne of his glory, and the sum of judgment was committed unto him, the Son of Man, and he caused the sinners and those who have led the world astray to pass away and be destroyed from off the face of the earth.' These passages leave no room to question how the author of the Similitudes interpreted Daniel's 'one like unto a son of man.' To him the phrase characterized no symbolic figure, but a celestial person, Divinely endowed with world-wide dominion, and appointed to be the judge of all men. The descriptive phrase, 'the Son of Man,' is not a title, but a designation of becoming a title; passing from 'this Son of Man,' 'that Son of Man,' to 'the Son of Man.'

In 2 Es. 13 there is no such direct mention of the phrase, 'one like unto a son of man,' as we find in the Septuagint, but the dependence upon Daniel and the Messianic interpretation of Dn 7¹³ is not less clear. Esdras is represented as recounting a dream, in which he saw coming 'up from the midst of the sea as it were the likeness of a man; and I beheld [he proceeds], and, lo, that man flew with the clouds of heaven: and when he turned his countenance to look, all things trembled that were seen under him. . . . And after this, I beheld, and, lo, there was gathered together a multitude of men, out of number, from the four winds of heaven, to make war against the man that had come out of the sea.' This multitude he destroys by the mere breath of his mouth, and then he is seen to 'call unto him

When Esdras seeks the Whereas thou sawest a man coming up from the midst of the sea, the same is he whom the Most High hath kept a great season, which by his own self shall deliver his creatures : and he shall order them that are left behind. . . . Behold, the days come when the Most High will begin to deliver them that are upon the earth. . . . and it shall be when these things shall come to pass, and the signs shall happen that I showed thee before, then shall my Son be revealed, whom thou sawest as a man ascending. . . .
And this my Son shall rebuke the nations which are come for their wickedness. . . . And he shall destroy them without labour by the law, which is likened unto fire.' The 'peaceable multitude' is further explained to be Israel, of whom this 'son' of the Most High is not the symbol, but the Saviour.

The writings of Enoch and Esdras are, it is reasonable to assume, only the survivors of other Apocalyptic of the same period, which in like manner inspired themselves on the vision of Daniel, and sought to supply in their own way what the prophet had left untold concerning 'one like unto a son of man.' If so, that phrase would also inevitably turn in the popular mind into a definite Messianic title, calling for no question when it was heard from the lips of Jesus, unless it were as to His right to appropriate it. It is suggestive to find that later on a more subordinate expression in Dn 7¹³ was adopted in similar fashion, and that מְבִרַּבִּי = 'son of cloud,' or 'cloud-man,' became a Rabbinic title for the Messiah (see Levy, NHWB, s.v. מְבִרַּבִּי).

At this point it is needful to pause to consider how our Lord's use of the expression 'the Son of Man' is affected by the fact that He spoke Aramaic. If $\delta \nu\iota\delta\varsigma \tau\omicron\upsilon \alpha\upsilon\theta\rho\omega\pi\omicron\upsilon$ is turned into Aramaic, does it give an expression which could be employed as a title? Or, to put it otherwise, is perhaps $\delta \nu\iota\delta\varsigma \tau\omicron\upsilon \alpha\upsilon\theta\rho\omega\pi\omicron\upsilon$ a mistranslation of the words actually uttered by Jesus, or an expression of later growth imported into His sayings by Greek-speaking Christians? Within the last decade, more especially, these questions have been keenly discussed. Wellhausen gave stimulus to the debate by a footnote in his *IJG*² (1895, p. 346), in which he said: 'Since Jesus spoke Aramaic He did not call Himself $\delta \nu\iota\delta\varsigma \tau\omicron\upsilon \alpha\upsilon\theta\rho\omega\pi\omicron\upsilon$, but barnascha; that, however, means "the Man," and nothing else, the Aramæans having no other expression for the notion. The earliest Christians did not understand that Jesus called Himself simply the Man. They held Him to be the Messiah, made accordingly a designation of the Messiah out of barnascha, and translated it not by $\delta \alpha\upsilon\theta\rho\omega\pi\omicron\varsigma$, as they should, but quite erroneously by $\delta \nu\iota\delta\varsigma \tau\omicron\upsilon \alpha\upsilon\theta\rho\omega\pi\omicron\upsilon$.' Wellhausen further lays stress on the fact that St. Paul makes no use of the expression 'Son of Man,' and refuses to admit any evidence which might be cited from Enoch, on the arbitrary plea that 'the Son of man in the Book of Enoch must be left out of account, so long as it is not established that the relative portion of the book was known, or could be known, to Jesus.'

In 1896, H. Lietzmann published a brochure—Der Menschensohn, in which, after a review of previous opinions, he enters into a discussion of 'Son of Man' in Aramaic, with the result that he declares the expression 'Son of Man' has been in Galilee Aramaic, 'the most colourless and indeterminate designation of a human individual'—one that might be used as an indefinite pronoun (p. 38). The use of 𐤅𐤌 in the compound phrase is described as a 'genuine Semitic pleonasm,' and it is maintained that no intelligible distinction existed between 𐤅𐤌 and 𐤅𐤍. To say with Wellhausen that where the Gospels have ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου the ἀνθρώπος will not do, according to the teaching of the Gospels, is to say that the ἀνθρώπος and the υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου do most certainly mean the same thing, but 'Jesus I call the Son of Man' (p. 40). 'The Son of Man' of Himself, since in Aramaic it does not exist, and for linguistic reasons cannot exist' (op. cit. p. 85). The formula is 'the Son of Man' in the sense of the Hellenistic theology, which is not the case in the Aramaic. The formula was applied first to the Son of Man, and then to His Passion, and finally to the narratives.

In 1899, Wellhausen returned to this subject (Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, Sechstes Heft), and in the main declared his adoption of Lietzmann's conclusion that Jesus, speaking Aramaic, could not make the difference which is made in Greek between $\delta \alpha \upsilon \lambda \alpha \rho \alpha \tau \epsilon \varsigma$ and $\delta \ \omega \iota \circ \varsigma \ \tau. \ \delta \alpha \upsilon \lambda.$:—that so far as this difference is made in the Gospels it is not authentic, but is derived from interpreters and editors. Wellhausen withdraws from the position he had formerly advocated, that Jesus did adopt 'the Man' as a title, meaning thereby that He fulfilled the ideal of humanity. He now declares that to impute such a meaning to our Lord is not warrantable, and that in the absence of that meaning the supposed title would be wholly meaningless, and therefore it was not employed. The use of $\delta \ \omega \iota \circ \varsigma \ \tau. \ \delta \alpha \upsilon \lambda.$ in the Gospels is explained as due to the fact that th
Dn 7¹³ are put into the mouth of Jesus in Mk
after it became the custom in all passages which refer to the Return of Jesus to avoid the pronoun, and to place instead 'the Son of Man.' Then followed the same usage in other than eschatological passages (op. cit. p. 210). Wellhausen again adduces in confirmation of the position that this tion of Jesus is not authentic, and that the entire absence of the express than the Gospels.

On the other hand, Dalman (Die Worte Jesu, 1898 [Eng. tr. 1956], Protestant Monatshefte, 1898, Hefte 7-8) has shown that the linguistic premises of Lietzmann and Wellhausen, and contested their conclusions. They both maintain that Jesus did certainly call Himself 'the Son of Man,' using the title in a Messianic sense, and with direct reference to Dn 7¹³, though both hold the primary sense of 'a son of man,' in that verse, to be collective, and not personal. Dalman adduces evidence to show that 'the Jewish Palestinian Aramaic of the earlier period possessed the term אִנְשָׁא for a human being, while to indicate a number of human beings it employed occasionally בְּנֵי אִנְשָׁא. The singular number אִנְשָׁא was not in use; its appearance being due to imitation of the Hebrew text, where [apart from Ezekiel] אָדָם בֶּן אָדָם is confined to poetry, and, moreover, uncommon in it. The case in Dn 7¹³, where the person coming from heaven is described as בְּרַב אִנְשָׁא, 'one like unto a son of man,' is just as uncongenial to the style of prose as the designation of God in the same verse as עֶלְקָא יוֹמָא 'the advanced in days' (op. cit. p. 237). Moreover, just as in Hebrew אָדָם is never made definite, so is the definite expression בְּרַב אִנְשָׁא 'quite unheard of in the older Jewish Aramaic literature.' The common use of אִנְשָׁא = 'man' in Jewish Galilean and Christian Palestinian literature is to be regarded as a later innovation. That this later usage was not already in vogue in the dialect spoken by our Lord (of which no written specimen from His time is in evidence) is demonstrated by His words as recorded in the Gospels: "Man." of the controversy thus: the Aramaic Lexicon "must not say barnascha means "man," and nothing more, but it must run thus: barnascha, (1) man, (2) abbreviated designation of the form "like a son of man" (i.e. "like a man") in Dn 7¹³, which, although, according to vv. 18. 22. 27, signifying the saints of the Most High, was held to be the Messiah. We, on our part, declare that second meaning to be extant, and to have been so already before the time of Jesus' (i.e. 264). Reference is made below (§ 5) to the copies of Dalman and Schmiedel to the argument ex eorum quod dicunt, as already stated, it has been sought to build up the theory that "the Son of Man" in the Gospels is no genuine utterance of Jesus.

In 1901, P. Fiebig published the result of a fresh and very thorough examination of the linguistic evidence on the matter at issue. The main contribution in his dissertation (Der Menschensohn) is a demonstration that מְשִׁיחַ and מְשִׁיחָא were, in not concerned to assert His own personal rights, but those of His followers, and of all who suffered from restrictions which threatened to turn that which was given for man's benefit into a bondage. 'The Sabbath was made for man . . . so that man is lord [or rather "owner"]—κύριος answering here to a familiar sense of the Hebrew לַיהוָה—Swete, Com. on St. Mark] even of the Sabbath.'

Taking next the two remaining pre-Cæsarean occurrences of 'the Son of Man' in St. Luke, the earlier of the two, Lk 6²², presents little difficulty. It is an obvious case of an editorial insertion of the title. Where St. Luke has 'for the Son of Man's sake,' Mt 5¹¹ has, 'for my sake'—the latter being clearly the earlier form of the saying. Lk 7³⁴ (cf. Mt 11¹⁹) is quite conceivably another case of the reverent substitution by tradition of the title in place of a pronoun. Our Lord is If action with that of the Baptist. than that He should say, 'John the Baptist is come . . . I am come'? The title can be deemed here in no wise essential.

It remains to glance at six the First Gospel besides those already in which 'the Son of Man' is found prior to Peter's confession. Taking these cases in order of their occurrence in the Gospel, it is sufficient as to the first, Mt 8²⁰, to note that its parallel is Lk 9⁵⁸—i.e. according to St. Luke the incident of the scribe who volunteered to follow Jesus was subsequent to Peter's confession. There is no reason to suspect here any misconception of our Lord's words on the part of His translators. He cannot have said that in contrast to beasts and birds 'man' hath not where to lay his head. The contrast drawn is between such creatures and Himself, the Messianic 'Son of Man.' If even He had no resting-place, His followers might know thereby what hardship Mt 10²³ is quite order; it belongs of the Twelve, and to a connexion in which a larger work was contemplated than that with which they were then entrusted. But the Evangelist, following his preference for topical arrangement, has linked these later words to the instructions given to the Twelve when they were about to set out on their earliest missionary expedition.

Mt 12³², when compared with Lk 12¹⁰ and with Mk 3²⁸, is found to be a combination of two different reports of our Lord's saying as to the Holy Spirit. has no Son of Man,' but it has the expression, quite unique in the Gospels, 'the sons of men.' It runs thus: 'All their sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and their blasphemies . . . but whosoever shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit. In the parallel in St. Luke, the unwonted phrase 'the sons of men' disappears, and its place is taken by the familiar expression 'the Son of Man,' and the entire saying is modified in accordance therewith. That St. Mark has the utterance in its genuine form is unquestionable. Whether it properly belongs to the period before the incident at Cæsarea, or, as St. Luke suggests, was later than it, it did not contain the title 'the Son of Man.'

Mt 12⁴⁰ (cf. Lk 11³⁰). It is sufficient to point out that St. Luke places this saying in order of time considerably later than does St. Matthew, and as before, preference must be given to St. Luke in a matter of chronological order.

Finally, the parable of the Tares, in the explanation of which the title appears twice (Mt 13^{37, 41}), may, with good reason, be said to belong to a late period in our Lord's ministry. It owes its present position to St. Matthew's desire to bring it into the collection of parables comprised in his 13th chapter.

Thus, of the instances in which our Lord's self-designation appears in the Synoptic Gospels prior to their recital of Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi, there is not one which can, on examination, be held to afford proof that this Messianic title was used by Him before His follower had declared Him to be the Messiah, or to invalidate the assumption that the use of the title by our Lord began at the time of that declaration, not earlier.

In St. Matthew's account of the incident at Cæsarea there are remarkable additions, both to our Lord's question and to Peter's answer. In Mt 16¹³ we read: 'Who do men say that the Son of Man is?' 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living the question is: 'Who do men say that I am?' The answer is simply: 'Thou art the Christ.' with but slight variations, with St. Mark. multitudes say that I am? The Christ of God.' We have here another case—the most notable of all such cases—in which the title has been substituted for the pronoun which our Lord employed in this case the additional clause was first answer, and that the substitution in our occasioned by it—a substitution which represents the desired answer as already provided in the statement of the question. doctrinal interests are for such cit. vol. i. p. 258) that 'the First Evangelist appears as the theologian, who sees in the "Son of Man" of the "Son of God," and so prepares the way for the doctrine of the two natures.' Whether to be ascribed to St. Matthew himself, due to the theological tendency of a later hand, may be regarded as an open question.

For other instances than those already cited of this variation—the title appearing in one Gospel, but not in the parallel passage in another, or in the other two—see Lk 12³⁵ as compared with Mt 10²²; Mt 16²⁸, cf. Mk 9¹ and Lk 9²⁷; Mk 10⁴⁵ and Mt 20²⁸, cf. Lk 22²⁷; Mk 8³¹ and Lk 9³², cf. Mt 16³¹.

As to the occurrence of 'the Son of Man' in the earlier chapters of the Fourth Gospel, it need here only be pointed out that such occurrence is in entire accord with the representation of St. John, that from their earliest association with Him our Lord's followers knew that He was the Divine Christ. The declaration of Messiahship and the use of the title are concurrent in the Fourth Gospel as in the Synoptics. This agreement is to be emphasized here: the reconciliation of the view, which represents our Lord's Messiahship as declared from the outset of His ministry, with the threefold testimony that such declaration followed only when disciples had received prolonged training in the course of that ministry, does not come within the scope of our present purpose. The first occurrence of the self-designation in St. John's Gospel affords a striking parallel to our Lord's use of it in response to Peter's confession (Mk 8^{29, 31}). Nathanael declares Jesus to be 'the Son of God . . . king of Israel,' and to that confession Jesus responds with the promise: 'Ye shall see the heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man' (Jn 1⁵¹). Similarly in 3¹⁴, it is when Jesus has declared to Nicodemus that He has Himself descended from heaven and can therefore tell of heavenly things, that He goes on to designate Himself 'the Son of Man,' and to foretell His suffering on behalf of man. Here it may be noted that in the Fourth Gospel as in the Synoptics, not a hint is given that the title was unfamiliar and one that called for explanation. Nicodemus was not indisposed to ask questions; but St. John leaves us to infer that as to this designation he found no difficulty. Three times in ch. 6 (vv. 27, 53, 62), in connexion with the discourse in which Jesus speaks of Himself as 'the bread which came down out of heaven,' the title occurs and used to emphasize an open Lord's claims as to His Person and Work.

The later occurrences of the title in the Fourth Gospel all, with the exception of 9³⁵ (if ἀνθρώπου be the right reading there), are found—as is the case with most of its later occurrences in the Synoptics -- in passages relating to our Lord's Passion, or to the glory which would follow thereon. This fact suggests, at least in part, the answer to a further inquiry which must now be made.

4. Why did our Lord adopt this in preference to any other Messianic title?—Nowhere does He tell us in precise terms; but His usage leaves no room to doubt that its attraction lay in its freedom from the limitations which beset other Messianic names.

(a) First and foremost, it permitted the blending of the conception of the Suffering Servant with that of the Messianic King. That was the great enlargement which Jesus gave, in His use of it, to the title He adopted. True, there was nothing in Daniel's delineation of 'one like unto a son of man' to suggest such a blending, but there was also nothing to preclude it. Whether the coming of the heavenly Son of Man in glory, and for universal dominion, was to be preceded by a coming in humiliation and a reascension, or whether suffering, the writer of Daniel did not say. But what the prophet failed to disclose, Jesus revealed. He was indeed the son of man, whom Daniel beheld, but passing through a phase of existence anterior to that of which the seer had a glimpse, and a phase which none were anticipating. Jesus was indeed the Messiah; but the expectations which gathered about that name made no allowance for that which was foremost in the purpose for which He came to earth. Hence, no sooner did His disciple exclaim 'Thou art the Christ,' than 'he began to teach them [the disciples] that the Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders and the chief priests and the scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again.' Put even so,—as a fresh disclosure concerning the Son of Man,—the teaching was not easy of reception, as Peter's remonstrance showed; but to have said at that juncture that the 'Son of David,' or 'the Christ,' must suffer and be killed, had been to make the teaching yet harder of reception.

As Dalman says (op. cit. p. 265): 'The name Messiah denoted the Lord of the Messianic age in His capacity as Ruler; in reality it had taken actual possession of the Messianic dignity are, in fact, unimaginable according to the testimony of the prophets. When Jesus attached to the Messianic confession of Peter the first intimation of His violent death, He did so in order to make it clear that the entrance upon His sovereignty was still far distant. . . . But the "one like unto a son of man" of Dan 7:13 has (lit.) to receive the sovereignty. It was possible that he should also be one who had undergone suffering and death.'

Hence, in reiterated statements to the disciples concerning the death toward which He moved, the invariable self-designation on the lips of our Lord is 'the Son of Man.' See Mk 9³¹, 12³¹, 10³³, 14²¹, 41, and the parallels in St. Matthew and St. Luke. Only when the Crucifixion and the Resurrection were accomplished facts, in the light of which His disciples might discern how false and misleading had been their narrow conception of what Messiahship could be, does Jesus speak to them of Himself in other terms: 'Behoved it not the Christ to suffer these things?' and again: 'Thus it is written that the Christ should suffer' (Lk 24²⁶, 46).

(b) If 'the Son of Man' was a title capable of being associated with suffering and death, it was a title already associated with the glorious coming of One who should rule over a world in which the powers of evil should no more have sway. That was the form of expectation present to the mind of Jesus as He passed on His way to the baptism of suffering, and that was the form of Messianic hope which He sought to strengthen in His followers as He spoke to them, with growing frequency, of the coming of 'the Son of Man.' The utterances concerning the return of 'the Son of Man' in glory, and the predictions that 'the Son of Man' must suffer and die, are in strict correlation (see Bousset, Jesus, p. 92 ff.). It is this coming from heaven, this realization of the Kingdom of heaven upon earth, to which Jesus looks forward. Wholly unlike the anticipations entertained by men around Him concerning the Davidic Messiah, the vision of Daniel is that which Jesus again and again calls to mind. He will come 'in the glory of the Father with the holy angels' (Mk 8³⁸); 'They shall see the Son of Man coming in clouds with great power and glory' (Mk 13²⁶; see also 14⁶²); 'When the Son of Man shall come in his glory and all the angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all the nations: and he shall separate them one from another . . .' (Mt 25^{31ff.}). This function of separation, of judgment, is not in the Danielic sketch of 'the son of man'; it is a feature added by our Lord. In Daniel the judgment is effected by the Most High. It is significant of much, that Jesus, while adopting and citing that prophecy, does not hesitate to modify it in this important particular, and to declare that it is He who will come to be our Judge (cf. Jn 5²⁷).

(c) If 'the Son of Man,' telling of descent from heaven, spoke of a closer association with God than did any other current Messianic title, so did it speak also of closer association with man—with the race. All narrow particularism falls away. He who bears this title is no mere 'Son of David,' or 'King of Israel.' Especially when regard is had to the idiomatic use of bn in Aramaic, as of ben in Hebrew, such a title expresses in the strongest possible way that He who is called by it has the nature and the qualities of mankind, and that He who calls Himself by it claims thereby relationship with man everywhere.

It is in such reasons as these that we may find the true clue to our Lord's adoption of this name—not in its supposed unfamiliarity, nor in an ambiguity enabling the speaker to use it in one sense, while He could confidently anticipate that it would be understood in another by His hearers.

5. Why did our Lord's followers, with the exception of Stephen, not apply this title to Him? The fact that a title which meets us so frequently in the Gospels is, with the single exception of Ac 7⁵⁶, wholly absent from the rest of the NT, is remarkable and significant. But of what? Wellhausen and Lietzmann answer, of this: that it was unknown to St. Paul and the other writers of the Epistles and to the author of the Apocalypse that such a title was employed by Jesus, and that the presumption is that only after their day was it introduced into the Gospels. But how this could be done, and how such an important modification of the most cherished records of the Church could be carried out with such enduring success, there is nothing to show. Certainly it is not safe to conclude that St. Paul and other NT writers did not know that this was our Lord's self-designation because they make no direct reference to it. Schmiedel (loc. cit. p. 260 f.) points to He 2⁹⁷ as affording evidence that the name was not unknown to the writer of that Epistle. Similarly, he holds that St. Paul in 1 Co 15⁴⁷ makes his reference to Ps 8 because of the presence in that psalm of the terms which he associated with his Lord—'the Son of Man.' Schmiedel is on firmer ground when he goes on to rebut the contention, that had St. Paul known of the title he must have cited it in such a verse as 1 Co 15⁴⁷. He urges that it should be borne in mind that St. Paul wrote for Greeks, who would not, like the Jews, understand by 'the son of man' simply 'man,' but would take 'son' quite literally. To this may be added that, apart from the suggestion of a purely human Messiah, which Gentiles might receive from the Jews, and so would for them lay an undue, and therefore a misleading, stress on our Lord's humanity. To the Jew 'the Son of Man' suggested the Lord from heaven; not so to the Gentile. Where the association of the name with heavenly origin and majesty could not be assumed, there the Apostles and early exponents of Christianity adopted other terms as they spoke or wrote of their risen and ascended Lord, and proclaimed Him as 'the Christ, the Son of God' (Jn 20³¹). To use the words of Dalman (op. cit. p. 266), 'the Church was quite justified in refusing, on its part, to give currency to the title; for in the meantime "the Son of Man" had been set upon the throne of God, and was, in fact, no longer merely a man, but a Ruler over heaven and earth, "the Lord," as St. Paul in the Epistles to the Thessalonians, and the Teaching of the Apostles in its apocalyptic statement, rightly designate Him who comes with the clouds of heaven.'

In short, the absence of the title 'the Son of Man' from other early Christian records than the Gospels, is significant of the widening scope of the Church's appeal beyond the confines of Judaism; its retention in the Gospels is no less significant of the fidelity with which the words of Jesus were preserved by His followers.

SOP.—1. The meaning of the word.—‘Sop’ occurs in EV only in Jn 13²⁶ vs. 27, 30 (AVm ‘morsel’). It is akin in derivation to ‘sup’ and ‘soup,’ and denotes food soaked in liquid before being eaten. The Gr. word in each case is ψωμιον, dim. of ψωμός, ‘a morsel.’ ψωμιον does not occur in LXX, but ψωμός is found in Ru 2¹⁴, Job 31¹⁷, and in EV is rendered ‘morsel.’ Its use in Ruth—‘Dip thy morsel (ψωμόν) in the vinegar’—is exactly analogous to that of ψωμιον in John.

2. The nature of the sop given to Judas.—Edersheim (LT ii. 506) and others, on the ground especially of the definite art. (τὸ ψαλιν), Edersheim says, ‘Mark the definite article—not “a sop”’), hold that it was a specific sop, used at the Passover supper in the time of Christ, which consisted of a piece of the flesh of the Paschal lamb, a piece of unleavened bread, and some bitter herb; and dipped in the karōseth— dates, and other fruits, mixed with vinegar—and then passed round to the company by the host. Jesus, as the host at the Last Supper, would hand this sop, first of all, to Judas, who is supposed to have occupied the place of chief honour at the table (see art. PASSOVER [I.], p. 326^b, and UPPER ROOM). It is not enough to brush this view aside, as Meyer does, on the ground that, according to John, the Last Supper was not a Passover meal; for, even though it was not the regular Passover of the Jews, it may have been a Supper of a similar kind (see art. PASSOVER [II.], p. 327^b). On the other hand, Edersheim's argument from the definite art. is precarious, since its use in v. 26^b is doubtful

(see WH) ; and, in any case, the Evangelist, writing long afterwards and with a profound sense of the momentous character of the incident, probably wrote 'the sop,' meaning thereby 'the tragic sop,' 'that fatal sop'—which sealed the traitor's doom. It seems much more probable, then, that this sop was not the specific Paschal sop passed round to the company by the host, but a particular sop that Jesus offered to Judas on purely personal grounds. At an Oriental feast the host sometimes presented a guest with a special tit-bit from the food on the table, as a distinguishing mark of his favour. And it was not by any accident of Judas' position at the table, but because of a deep purpose in the heart of Jesus, that this sop was given.

3. Its significance.—This offering of the sop to Judas, which is not mentioned by the Synoplists (though Mt. and Mk. make Jesus say that the betrayer should be the one who dipped his hand with Him in the dish [Mt 26²³, Mk 14²⁰]), comes before us with a double significance. (a) It was a sign given to the betrayer in response to his question, 'Lord, who is it?' that Judas was the one of the company who was about to betray his Master (vv. 25-26). (b) But it was much more than this. There was nothing hypocritical on Christ's part in the action. He did not make a show of friendliness to Judas merely for the sake of giving John a private sign. What was commonly understood to be a token of hospitable goodwill was, without doubt, meant in this case to be the expression of a feeling deeper than any ordinary human affection, and at the same time to be a last appeal to the better nature of this erring disciple, with a note of warning underlying the appeal (cf. vv. 18-21). A whole world of blessed possibility lay for Judas in that proffered sop; Divine love was in it, and free forgiveness, and full restoration—if only he would repent of his meditated crime. And just because of the immensity of meaning that lay in Christ's gift was the awfulness of its result. Judas 'received the sop' (v. 30), and doubtless ate it. He understood what Jesus wished him to understand—the mingled love and warning and promise and appeal that lay in His act. But at this crisis of his fate he closed his ears to Christ's offers and his heart to Christ's love. And immediately the light that still shined on him was turned into darkness. For 'after the sop, then [τότε—at that very moment] Satan entered into him.' The violent effort he made to close his heart to the heavenly power opened it to the powers of evil' (Godet). Jesus knew that all was over. 'That thou doest,' He said, 'do quickly' (v. 27). And so Judas, 'having received the sop' [note the significant repetition of the ominous word], 'went out straightway: and it was night.'

SORROW, MAN OF SORROWS.—We shall find in the Gospels no theory of sorrow, or abstract discussion of the problem of pain and suffering. The problem is taken for granted, and a solution is given. The solution is experimental, and centres round the life of Christ. If we ask why sorrow comes, the answer is not speculative, but practical; we are simply pointed to His experience (He 12). The method of this article will be to show Christ as the Man of Sorrows, and afterwards with the meaning of sorrow in human life generally, and particularly in the life of the Christian.

1. The 'Man of Sorrows.'—The phrase comes from Is 53³ (נִשְׁאָל בְּעַל אֲשָׁמוֹת; LXX, ἄνθρωπος ἐν πληγῇ ὢν; Vulg. virum dolorum).

Objection has been taken (e.g. by Cheyne, G. A. Smith, Skinner, Workman) to the rendering 'sorrows,' 'pains' being preferred in this verse and the next as a nearer parallel to 'sickness' rather than 'grief'. But the Oxford Heb. Lex. gives many instances of both the vb. and noun as referring to mental pain, and classes this passage under that head. While allowing that the picture in Isaiah is primarily of physical suffering, we may without hesitation retain the familiar rendering of AV and RV.

The title is never applied to Christ in the NT. It belongs, in fact, to popular rather than to technical phraseology, expressing in picturesque form what the prophets means by speaking of Christ as the 'Servant of Jehovah.' Either phrase is equally applicable to the prophecy of Is 53 in a true sense fulfilled in Him. What ever may have been the primary historical bearing of that passage, it is generally admitted that in the time of Christ there was no expectation of a suffering Messiah. The indications of the Gospels and Acts agree completely with the evidence of pre-Christian Jewish literature. 'The idea of the Messiah's sufferings is not found in any Jewish document up to the close of the first century' (Stanton, Jewish and Christian Messiah, p. 123). 'Man of Sorrows' would have been the last title to have caught the popular imagination of that age. 'Son of David' expressed the contemporary hopes of what the Messiah was to be. That the one title has been retained, the other is significant. The one is more or less materialistic, pointing to an earthly kingdom. The other expresses the universal attraction of Christ, His spiritual empire over the hearts of men, and the means by which His influence has been won. See, further, art. MESSIAH.

2. The nature of the sorrows of Christ.—Though, as noted above, the phrase 'Man of Sorrows' may be retained as the translation of Is 53, there can be little doubt that the general picture of the passage in its literal sense is of one visited with the extreme of suffering, a Job; many see in it a leper, as in Ps 88. If the view that it was never intended to apply to an individual, but was typical of the nation, or of part of it, it will none the less remain true that the figure the writer has chosen is that of bodily sickness. The sorrows of Christ were not of this nature, nor was His appearance unattractive, still less repulsive, as of one suffering from a loathsome disease. In the Gospels but little stress is laid on the physical sufferings even of the last days. He Himself expressly deprecates so doing (Lk 23²⁶). He once refers to the privations of His life (Lk 9⁵⁸) in order to check one who had not counted the cost of following Him. He speaks of His needs. Where the thought of His own sufferings comes to His mind, the impression we have is of spiritual sorrow (Mk 10³² 14³⁴ 15³⁴, Lk 12⁵⁰, Jn 12²⁷), and commentators of all schools have connected this sorrow with His contact and conflict with sin. He sighs at the presence of the deaf and dumb man (Mk 7³⁴). When face to face with death, He is moved with sympathetic compassion (Lk 7¹³); He groans in spirit, is troubled, and weeps (Jn 11³⁸). The underlying thought in these passages seems to be His sense of what lies behind human suffering. So it is different degrees of sin at which His sorrow is implied or expressed;—dullness, unbelief, or hardness of heart in the disciples (Mt 16⁸, Mk 8²¹ 9¹⁸ 10¹⁴ 14^{27, 37}, Lk 22³⁸, Jn 14²⁹);—the wilful blindness and opposition of His countrymen (Mk 3⁵ 6⁸ 8¹², Lk 13²⁵). Specially significant are the laments over Jerusalem (Mt 23³⁷, Lk 19⁴¹). He is grieved at ingratitude (Lk 17¹⁷), at lack of hospitality (Lk 7⁴⁴), at the profanation of the Temple (Mt 21¹²), above all, at the treachery of Judas (Mt 26²⁰, Jn 13²¹). He feels sorrowful compassion over the multitude without a shepherd (Mt 9³⁶, Mk 6³⁴). On the other hand, His joy is mentioned at the conquest or removal (Mt 13¹³, Lk 10²¹ 15⁷). A study of these passages will show the sense in which He was a Man of Sorrows. On the one hand, He was brought into a relation to sin from which His nature shrank, and which even seemed at its climax to lead to a separation from God (Mk 15³⁴). On the other hand, in His conflict against sin He was spiritually alone. He knew more clearly than any the nature of sin and its results. He saw what man might be if he chose, and what in fact he was. He realized every hour the tragic irony of the situation, that He had come to His own and they would not receive Him. The horror of His rejection by His countrymen lay not so much in the suffering it implied for Himself, as in their own loss of opportunity. Is 53 was not perceived. They did not perceive or desire the message He brought. They despised and rejected His message; they hid their face from Him because they could not bear to look on the splendour of the goodness and love He came to reveal.*

3. The necessity of sorrow in the life of Christ came from the spiritual character of His work. From the point of view of the disciples, and the popular conception of the Messiah, a certain amount of conflict and hardship could readily be allowed for. The Roman could not be expected to yield without a blow; and as it became clear that opposition from within His own nation was to be expected, temporary disappointments and misunderstandings would fall within the disciples' scheme of the future. They were ready for the hardships of an earthly struggle, i.e. to drink His cup as they understood it. They were not prepared for the Cross, because they had not a deep enough conception of His work. Not Roman or Sadducee, but sin, was the enemy; His end was the establishment of a spiritual and universal empire. The national mission of the Son of David had passed into the world-wide mission of the Servant of Jehovah,† and the means which might have sufficed for the one would no longer serve the other. His work moved on a higher plane, and the weapons of His warfare must be more mysterious and spiritual than any outward miracle. These weapons were the attractive and atoning power of service, and sorrow. Mk 10⁴⁵ shows this clearly. The Cross, the life of service, and all it implied of sorrow and suffering, were necessary because He had come to give His life a ransom for many (cf. Jn 12³²).

The fuller discussion of the redemptive value of Christ's sufferings belongs to other articles (see art. ATONEMENT). It must suffice here to insist on what all theories admit, that only as Sufferer could He be Saviour. He had come to serve God as man; therefore suffering was necessary to the perfection of His obedience (He 2¹⁰ 5⁸). It is a fact of history that as the Sufferer He has conquered and drawn men unto Him. The title 'Man of Sorrows' expresses, more perhaps than any other, His attractive power; it has been the inspiration of Christian art and music. The thought underlying it is not primarily any logical theory of Atonement, but the all-embracing sympathy of the God-man. His 'Come unto me' (Mt 11²⁸) is a comfortable word, because it is spoken by One 'who, in that he himself suffered being tempted,

* From this point of view the nearest parallel to Christ is Jeremiah, the 'man of sorrows' of the OT. There, too, we have the one standing in moral solitude over against the whole nation, in bitterness of soul because he knows that none will listen to his message. If, as is often thought, his experience had some share in moulding the conception of Is 53, that chapter forms a close link between him and Christ, pointing back to the one and forward to the other (cf. G. A. Smith, Isaiah, vol. ii. ch. 2, etc.).

is able to succour them that are tempted' (He 2¹⁸ 3¹⁵, cf. Mt 8¹⁷).

4. The Christian conception of sorrow.—Sorrow is, properly speaking, a psychological term, being a description of a state of mind. It should be distinguished from the suffering, mental or physical, which may be its occasion. We may define it as the sense of discord, the consciousness that things are not as they should be, in ourselves, or in the world. It is an experience peculiar to man, and can be attributed to animals only by an effort of personification.* In the fact of its being a privilege peculiar to man we may begin to see something of its purpose.

'The inherent necessity in man of sorrow . . . testifies that his essential constitution and nature, as man, is something which all this world's life and the conditions of it—by the very fact that they are what they are—cannot match and cannot satisfy. The very constitution of his being and the necessary conditions of his life are out of harmony together. They do not and cannot fit; the one is too small to satisfy the other. Set man, being what man is, in this world, as the conditions of this world are, and the necessary result is, sooner or later, sorrow' (Moberly, Sorrow, Sin, and Beauty, p. 7).

To a creature made in the image of God, sorrow is the necessary condition of the struggle against sin in an imperfect world. Given the fact of sin, suffering ceases to be a problem. Only in a perfect state could it be desirable that sorrow and sighing should flee away.

Hence if sorrow is a privilege of the Christian being, we shall expect to find it in the Christian sense the privilege of the Christian. The second Beatitude (Mt 5⁴) speaks absolutely of its blessedness. The Christian's sorrow seems to be that dissatisfaction which arises from the fact that the effort to overcome sin within the soul, i.e. sin, is specially in view. Mourning is the evidence of the break-up of the self-complacency which is the chief obstacle to the Kingdom of God. Sorrow, indeed, is of no value unless it leads to the striving after higher things. There is no blessedness attached to vain regret for the past (Mt 25¹¹ 27³, Mk 10²⁹), or to the sorrow which finds its vent in weary lament instead of in prayer (Lk 22⁴⁸). The bearing of pain, voluntary or otherwise, is in itself neutral; it is effective only when it is the means of rooting out from the self a cause of offence (Mt 5²⁹, etc.). The sorrow which is fruitful is the travail which issues in the birth of a new life (Jn 12²⁴ 16²¹). The one object of the purging is that the branch may bring forth more fruit (Jn 15²).

If sorrow is a necessary accompaniment of the attempt to right things in oneself, it will also accompany the attempt to right things in the world. It was Christ's experience, and it will be the experience of His followers (Jn 15²⁰ etc.) as they share His work. The traditional saying of Christ that 'he who is near me is near the fire' (Orig. Hom. in Jer. xx. 3) is at least authentic in spirit. The disciples must bear the cross He bears (Mk 8³⁴), drink His cup, and be baptized with His baptism (Mk 10³⁸), carry His yoke (Mt 11²⁹). The sword must pierce the Virgin's heart because of her nearness to Him (Lk 2³⁵); even the Innocents suffer unconsciously on account of their connexion with Him (Mt 2¹⁷). The via dolorosa is the only road to union with Him.†

In Jn 16 the sorrow of the disciples is contrasted with the transient joy of the world. The world rejoices (16²⁰) 'as having been freed from one who was a dangerous innovator as well as a condemner of its ways' (Westcott, ad loc.); i.e. it is satisfied to have no Christ, even to have removed Him, and is content with things as they are. The sorrow of the disciples is connected with the departure of Christ. The primary reference is to the immediate crisis, but in all ages His disciples will have sorrow in all that hinders their full vision of Him, the complete establishment of His Kingdom, and His return in glory. Though He has overcome the world, they must have tribulation in it, till the victory won ideally is realized in fact (16³³). Sorrow cannot be completely turned into joy till what is, is identical with what should be, till He returns again and we see Him as He is (1 Jn 3²). As we said before, we find no abstract discussion of the nature and meaning of sorrow. The solution of the problem is found in the experience of Christ, which is the experience of the Christian.* Sorrow is bound up with evil . . . to combat sin in the self and in the world . . . is the reaction against sin, and those who feel this most keenly must drink most deeply of the cup. The consolation lies in the fact that the disciple is sharing the lot of His master here, and will share His joy hereafter (Mt 19²⁸, Ro 8¹⁷, 2 Ti 2¹¹).

5. Sorrow and happiness.—It would be an inadequate treatment of the teaching of Christ to treat sorrow merely as the condition of future happiness. Christianity is a religion of present happiness. An exultant joy is the note of the songs which hailed Christ's birth. Joy is a present fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5²²); the Kingdom of God is now joy and peace (Ro 14¹⁷). The promises of the New Heaven and the New Earth are not purely future; they belong, ideally at least, to our present life. One of the characteristic paradoxes of Christianity is that its sorrow and happiness co-exist. Again we turn first to the experience of Christ. He is the Man of Sorrows, yet we cannot think of Him for a moment as an unhappy man. He rather gives us the picture of serene and unclouded happiness. Beneath not merely the outward suffering, but the profound sorrow of heart, there is deeper still a continual joy, derived from the realized presence of His Father, and the consciousness that He is doing His work. Unless this is remembered, the idea of the Man of Sorrows is sentimentalized and exaggerated. And again the disciple shares the experience of His master. Neither Christ nor the true Christian can for a moment wish, like a Job or a Jeremiah, that he had never been born. The Beatitudes express His own humanly discovered secret of happiness; He has Himself known the blessedness of mourning, though never, of course, over His own sin, and He imparts the secret to His follower. And though the promises of Jn 16 can be completely realized only when the Christian departs to be with Christ (Ph 1²³), yet even now His joy is in him and is fulfilled (Jn 15¹¹); even now, in prayer and in communion with Him, he knows the joy which no man can take from him (Jn 16²⁰, 22, 24). 'Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing' (2 Co 6¹⁰), is the paradox of the gospel, and each side of the paradox is needed to counteract an unbalanced view of life. On the one hand, sorrow is no figment of the imagination, to be thought away. It is a fact of life, and a necessary fact, necessary to the perfection of the sinless One, much more to our own; the condition of all progress and of all true work for God. This is the truth ignored by the 'sky-blue' optimism, which strives to live ever in the sunshine and blind itself to sin.† On the other hand, sorrow is not the last word of life. The world is a κόσμος, a creation of order and beauty. We find in Christ's teaching

* See the remarkable passage in Ro 8²², where Nature is represented as sharing in the imperfection and hopes of man. Cf. Sanday-Headlam, ad loc.

† It need hardly be added that this thought dominates the rest of the NT (e.g. Ph 3¹⁰, Col 12⁴, 1 P 4¹³).

* 'The real Christian looks at sorrow not from without, but from within, and does not approach its speculative difficulty till he is aware by experience of its practical power' (Lux Mundi 15, p. 89).

nothing of the sentimental attitude, which looks at life with complacency, as though it were all for nothing. To Him evil is evil, and suffering is suffering. He came as the Saviour to destroy the world. His Christianity is in strong contrast to Buddhism, and to all forms of morbid asceticism. Bacon's aphorism that 'prosperity is the blessing of the OT, adversity the blessing of the NT,' is true only when it is understood that beneath the adversity, and the sorrow of heart which it brings, there is even here and now the peace which passeth understanding, the joy which comes of union with Christ, of sympathy with man, and of work for God.

SOUL.—In every act of thinking, a distinction exists between the thinker and his thought, or, as it is otherwise expressed, between the self and the not-self, the ego and the non-ego, the thinking subject and the object of thought. This ego, self, or thinking subject, is denominated the soul (ψυχή, נֶפֶשׁ), or spirit (πνεῦμα, רוּחַ; see SPIRIT); often also, both in the OT and NT, the heart (καρδία, לֵב; see HEART). In the OT the soul is sometimes confused with the blood or with some important physical organ, but in the NT it is clearly distinguished from the body as an immaterial principle, the seat of conscious personality, and essentially immortal (Mt 10²⁸ etc.; see LITERATURE). There was much speculation in our Lord's time, and had been for some two centuries, on the mysterious questions of the soul's origin and destiny. Some, following Plato and Philo, believed in its eternal pre-existence (cf. Wis 8¹⁹ RV); others (mainly orthodox Rabbis) in its creation at the creation of the world (cf. 2 Es 4^{36ff.}); others in its pre-existence in the body (Slavonic Enoch 23⁹); others (as held by the majority) in its creation with the body, which is apparently the doctrine of the OT (Is 44²⁻⁵, Job 31¹⁻⁵). A few supported the Platonic speculation of metempsychosis (so apparently Josephus; see BJ III. viii. 5). The disciples of Jesus were aware of these discussions, and on one occasion asked Him whether a certain man had been born blind as a penalty for sins committed by him in a former state of existence. It is a significant indication of the economy of revelation that Jesus avoided entering upon the discussion (Jn 9²).†

1. The use of ψυχή in the Gospels.—In the Pauline Epistles, as is well known, there is frequently a decided difference of meaning between ψυχή and πνεῦμα. There ψυχή is used for the principle of life of the natural man, while πνεῦμα is the principle of supernatural life which manifests itself in the regenerate Christian. Hence the derivative ψυχικός (literally 'soulish') comes to be used in a derogatory sense, and even in a bad sense (1 Co 12¹⁴ 15¹, 1 Th 5²³, 1 Tim 6¹⁹). But in the Gospels there is no such distinction of usage. As applied to the human soul, ψυχή and πνεῦμα are synonyms throughout the range of their meaning. Thus in the sense of natural life, we have Mk 3⁴, cf. Jn 13²⁷ (ψυχή); and Mt 27⁴⁰, cf. Lk 23⁴⁶, Jn 19³⁰ (πνεῦμα). (For the lower sense of πνεῦμα, cf. also Mk 8¹², Lk 8⁵⁵ 24^{37, 39}, Jn 11³³ 13²¹). ψυχή, as well as πνεῦμα, is used quite normally for the soul in its highest religious activities (see, e.g., Lk 1⁴⁶, where the identity of ψυχή and πνεῦμα is especially apparent; Mt 11²⁹ 22²⁷ ||; cf. 1 P 2¹¹ 1¹, 2 P 2²⁸ etc.; and even in the Pauline Epp. see 2 Co 1²³, Eph 6⁶, Ph 1²⁷; cf. He 6¹⁹ 13¹⁷). In one passage (Jn 10²⁴) ψυχή seems even to stand for the rational or deliberating faculty (λόγος, νοῦς). There is, however, between ψυχή and πνεῦμα, as used in the Gospels, one slight distinction. ψυχή emphasizes more strongly than πνεῦμα the idea of individuality. Hence ψυχῶν (not πνεύματων) is used for 'souls' or 'persons' (Ac 27³⁷, 1 P 3³⁰); and it is usual to speak of the salvation or loss of the ψυχή rather than of the πνεῦμα (Mt 6²⁵ 10³⁹ 16^{25, 26}, Mk 8³⁵, Lk 9²⁴ 17³³ 21¹⁹, Jn 12²⁵, He 10³⁹, Ja 1²¹ 5²⁰, 1 P 1⁹). Yet the salvation of the πνεῦμα is alluded to (1 Co 5⁵, 1 Th 5²³). πνεῦμα, however, is not by any means a strictly impersonal term (see Mt 5¹⁶, He 1¹⁴). It is used like ψυχή to denote a disembodied soul (Lk 24^{37, 39}, He 12²³, 1 P 3¹⁸, Rev 6⁹ 20⁴). In Mt 12¹⁸ (a quotation from Is 42¹) God is said to possess a ψυχή. In Jn 4²⁴ He is said to be spirit (πνεῦμα).

The following particular statements about the soul (ψυχή) are made in the Gospels. As the principle of physical life it is sustained by food (Mt 6²⁵); as the organ of spiritual life it 'magnifies the Lord' (Lk 1⁴⁶). It is capable of physical and sensuous pleasure (12¹⁹), also of spiritual rest and refreshment (Mt 11²⁹). It can suffer acute sorrow (Lk 2³⁵) and anxiety (Jn 10²⁴). It can grieve (Mt 26³⁸) and love (22³⁷). It can be lost and saved (10³⁹ etc.). At death it is yielded up (Jn 10¹¹⁻¹⁵ 12²⁶), but survives as a personal self-conscious being (Mt 10³⁹ etc.).* See, further, SPIRIT.

2. Christ's teaching about the soul.—According to Jesus, the soul, being a man's inmost self, the seat of his self-conscious personality, and inherently immortal (Mt 10²⁸), is precious beyond all price. Nothing can be accepted in exchange for it, and the gain of the whole world will not compensate for its loss (16²⁶). Jesus drives home this truth in the parable of the Rich Fool, who said to his soul, 'Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry'; and whom God rebuked with the awful words, 'Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: how canst thou say, Take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry, when thy soul shall be required of thee?' (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹). Much is said in the Gospels about the gain or loss of the soul, generally with a play upon the double meaning of ψυχή ('life' or 'soul'). Most of these passages take the form of exhortations to martyrdom, as, for instance, Mt 10³⁹ 'He that findeth his soul (i.e. he that saves his life by denying me in time of persecution), shall lose it (by eternal punishment in Gehenna); and he that loseth his soul for my sake (i.e. he who confesses me in time of persecution and suffers a martyr's death), shall receive it (in heaven)'; (see also 16²⁵, Lk 17³³, Jn 12²⁵). All these passages refer primarily to martyrdom, but in their secondary application teach that even lesser sufferings and trials endured patiently for Christ's sake have as their reward the salvation of the soul (Mt 10³⁸). The same idea is expressed in Lk 14²⁶, where the strange phrase 'to hate the soul' is a rhetorical expression for willingness to suffer martyrdom or any lesser inconvenience for Jesus' sake (cf. also Jn 12²⁵). The gain or salvation of the soul means certainly its eternal happiness in heaven, and the loss or destruction of the soul, as certainly, not its annihilation, but its eternal punishment in Gehenna. The endlessness of the soul's final retribution is not simply an inference from the soul's immortality,

* So Harnack most admirably, in What is Christianity? ch. vi.

† The Creationist view of the soul's origin was held by all Jews in our Lord's time. The Traducianist hypothesis first appears in Tertullian (A.D. 200).

* It follows from this, that in the view of Jesus and the Twelve, the ψυχή and πνεῦμα of man are not distinct principles or faculties, as, according to some, St. Paul affirms in 1 Th 5²³. The language of the Gospels is directed to the unity of the soul, and for a trichotomy of body, soul, and spirit, not for a trichotomy (body, soul, and spirit).

but is exegetically established from Mt 25⁴⁶ etc. According to the conceptions represented in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, retribution does not wait till the Last Day, but begins as soon as the soul leaves the body. At death the disembodied soul passes to a 'middle state' (Hades), where, if righteous, it experiences rest and refreshment in 'Abraham's bosom,' or 'Paradise'; or, if unrighteous, expiatory punishment (symbolized as a tormenting flame) in a limbus or 'prison,' which is separated by an impassable barrier from the abodes of the righteous. The disembodied souls are represented as conscious and intelligent, able to converse with one another, and interested in the welfare of their friends upon earth (Lk 16¹⁹ 23⁴³, 1 P 3¹⁸, Rev 6⁹).

... about the intermediate state is keenly debated, but the affirmative opinion seems to have the better exegetical support. For (1) the NT represents not death, but the Second Advent, as the time when the soul will render its final account to God. Presumably, therefore, the middle state is included in the period of probation. (2) Christ appears to the present writer to teach that some sins may be forgiven after death (Mt 12³²); and at least to hint that even grievous sinners may be released from torments, after adequately expiating their crimes (5²⁶). (3) The torments of Dives seem to have been remedial in effect, causing him for the first time to interest himself in the spiritual welfare of others (Lk 16²⁷). Hades, and His preaching to the ... plainly presuppose the possi-

At the Last Day, according to Jesus, there will be a bodily resurrection of all men, followed by a final judgment, and a final settlement of the destiny of each soul (Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶). The resurrection of the wicked is clearly taught in Mt 10²⁸, Jn 5²⁹. See, further, RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, ESCHATOLOGY, ABRAHAM (§ 'Abraham's bosom'), PARADISE, HELL [DESCENT INTO].

Jesus claimed to stand in the same relation to human souls as God Himself; and as the Lord of souls issued the universal invitation, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden . . . and ye shall find rest unto your souls' (Mt 11²⁸⁻²⁹). He also declared that His special object in coming into the world was to save souls (Lk 9⁵⁶) by laying down His own soul as a ransom (Jn 10^{11, 15} 17²).

3. The soul of Jesus.—If Jesus was perfect man, it follows that He must have possessed not only a human body, but also a human soul and a human spirit; and this is, in fact, the doctrine of the Gospels and of the NT generally. Thus He came to give His soul (ψυχὴν) a ransom for many (Mt 20²⁸). After the interview with the Greeks (Jn 12²⁷), His soul (ψυχὴ) was troubled, and He doubted what to say. In Gethsemane His soul was exceeding sorrowful (περὶ τούτων ἔστιν ἡ ψυχὴ μου, Mt 26³⁸). There are similar references to His human spirit. He groaned (or was angry) in spirit (ἐνεβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι, Jn 11³³); and was troubled in spirit (ἐταράχθη τῷ πνεύματι, 13²¹). On the cross He commended His spirit to God (παρτίθεμαι τὸ πνεῦμά μου, Lk 23⁴⁶), and yielded up His spirit (ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα, Mt 27⁵⁰; παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα, Jn 19³⁰). After death, His Divine Personality, still in hypostatic (i.e. personal) union with His disembodied human spirit, descended to Hades, and there preached to the disobedient spirits in prison (1 P 3¹⁸, cf. Eph 4⁹); visiting also, we infer from Lk 23⁴⁶, that compartment of Hades which is reserved for the spirits of the just. It is obvious from these and other passages, that the view of Apollinaris that Christ did not possess a human soul,* but that the Divine Logos took its place, is not Scriptural. The soul and spirit of Jesus were subject to human weakness and infirmity, and were therefore human, not Divine.

But the rejection of Apollinarism, and the adoption of the view that Christ possessed a perfect human soul, involves a great psychological difficulty. A perfect human soul is personal, and therefore, if Christ was perfect God and perfect man, it seems to follow that He must have been two persons, as Nestorius thought, or was supposed to think. This difficulty has never yet received a full solution. The solution of the ancient Church was that the human nature of the incarnate Christ was impersonal. The human ψυχὴ of Christ, which, under normal conditions, would have developed individual personality, was prevented, owing to its union with the Divine Logos, from doing so. It attained personality, not in itself, but in the Divine Logos with which it was united; and hence, though Christ possessed a true human ψυχὴ, His personality was single, being seated entirely in the Divine Nature. The Patristic view is open to criticism on several grounds, but it still holds the field as the best attempt to reconcile the two apparently conflicting principles of Scripture, that Christ is perfect God and perfect man, and yet only one Person.†

4. The human will of Jesus.—Jesus, as possessing a human soul, possessed also a human will, for volition is one of the most characteristic activities of the soul. The Gospels regard Jesus as endowed with a human will, which, though in the end always submitted itself to the Divine will, yet did so at the cost of an inward struggle. Thus in the Agony in the Garden, Jesus prays (Lk 22⁴²), 'Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless not my will, but thine be done' (πλὴν μὴ τὸ θέλημά μου, ἀλλὰ τὸ σὸν γινέσθω). The distinction of wills is evident also in Jn 5³⁰ (cf. 6³⁸) 'I seek not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me.' It is thus the teaching of Scripture that there are two wills in Christ, a Divine and a human, and that these two wills are united in one Person. The reconciliation of the two different points of view (duality of will, and unity of Person) is not easy. According to modern ideas, the faculty of willing is so essentially a function of personality, that it seems necessary to postulate two egos where there are two wills. The ancients, however, did not connect willing with personality so closely as we do; and, moreover, 'will' is too strong a term to translate their θέλημα (voluntas). θέλημα, it is true, in its stronger sense, carries with it the meaning of 'will,' but more often it carries the weaker sense of 'wish,' 'liking,' 'inclination,' 'propension.' The true Greek term for will in our sense is βούλησις, or more definitely προαίρεσις, or still more definitely αὐτεξουσίαν, or αὐτεξούσιον (self-determination). It is clearly in the weaker sense of 'inclination' that θέλημα is used in the Gospels, and it is probably for the same sense that Dyothelitism was adopted by the Sixth General Council (A.D. 680) to be the doctrine of the Church.‡

* Cf. the striking words of Clement of Alexandria: 'The Apostles, following the Lord, preached the gospel to those in Hades. . . [God's] punishments [in Hades] are saving and disciplinary, leading to conversion, and choosing rather the repentance than the death of a sinner. . . Did not the same dispensation obtain in Hades, so that even there, all the souls, on hearing the preaching, might either exhibit repentance, or confess that their punishment was just because they believed not?' (Strom. vi. 6). See also the Shepherd of Hermas, Siml. ix. 16: 'These Apostles and teachers, having fallen asleep, preached also to those who had fallen asleep before them, and themselves gave the seal of their preaching.'

* Apollinaris admitted that Jesus possessed the lower or animal soul (ψυχὴ ἀλογος), but denied to Him the distinctly human or rational soul (ψυχὴ λογική).

SOUTH (νότος).—1. The locality indicated.—The southern direction was called by the Hebrews Téman (Jer 49²⁰), that is, the country 'on the right side' to one facing eastwards in Palestine. In the same way their kinsmen and successors, the Moslem Arabs, called the southern part of their empire Yemen, the 'right hand' country, and designated Syria and Palestine to the North as al-Shâm, the 'left' region. The queen of Sheba was referred to as the queen of the South (Mt 12⁴²). In a more limited and special sense the Hebrews gave the name 'South Country' to the wilderness of Judæa and the region lying beyond it (Jos 12⁸, Ac 8²⁸).

2. Character of south wind.—Passing over an area with little or no vegetation, it was both hot (Lk 12⁵⁵) and lacking in vitalizing power. The rarefaction produced by the sun's rays on the bare desert gave rise to whirlwinds, which gathered up the dust in tall swaying columns that moved like evil genii over the land until they suddenly broke and dispersed (Job 37⁹, Zec 9¹⁴). It was essentially a transition current, being the dry east wind shifting round towards the humid west. It thus partook of the nature of both, and resembled the close steamy air of a palm-house. The allusion in Job 37¹⁷ is either to the lethargy induced by its enervating influence, or to the cool refreshment of the showers that usually follow it.

G. M. MACKIE.

SOWING.—For 'sowing' as a metaphorical expression of the activity and influence of Christ and His Apostles, see under SEED. The Gospels further contain, however, three semi-proverbial uses of the term which merit notice.

1. One is in connexion with the counsel against worldly anxiety (Mt 6²⁶=Lk 12²⁴ birds neither sow nor reap), where sowing denotes one of the ordinary operations and occupations of men in order to secure a livelihood. Jesus is here quoting a familiar proverb of the ancient world, which was current in several forms (e.g. 'aves sine patrimonio vivunt et in diem pascuntur').

2. In Mt 23^{21, 26}=Lk 19^{21, 22}, a grasping, unscrupulous character is defined as one that reaps where it has not sown, i.e. enriches itself at the expense of other people. Several ancient parallels, both from Jewish (cf. Taylor's Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, 1897, p. 143) and from pagan (e.g. Ælian, Var. Hist. iii. 46 and iv. 1; and Plato, Leges, xi. 913 C) sources, are quoted for the second clause of the verse, which is probably to be taken as an allusion to the first.

3. The two semi-proverbial (cf. e.g. Mic 6⁵, Ps 126⁶) sayings upon sowing, in a figurative sense, are preserved in Jn 4^{36, 37}. Taken as part of the story of Jesus at Sychar, the passage starts from the responsiveness of the Samaritans to the gospel (their full-grown faith being contrasted with the indifference and unbelief of Judaism upon the whole). The sight of the Samaritans streaming out of the city suggests to Jesus that a rich harvest of souls is to be reaped here, and reaped apparently without the usual delay and interval. Samaria is ripe already for the gospel. 'Four months more, then harvest,' may be the time in Nature; but here, in the order of the Spirit, sowing is hardly done ere reaping begins.

J. MOFFATT.

SPARROW.—See ANIMALS in vol. i. p. 66^a.

SPEAR.—This word occurs in NT only in Jn 19³⁴ 'one of the soldiers pierced Jesus' side with a spear' (ἀόχνη). A comparison, however, of Mt 27⁴⁸ 'put [the sponge] on a reed' (περιβέλις καλάμης), makes it probable that in Jn 19³⁴ for ὑσσώπω περιβέντες, 'put it upon hyssop,' ὑσσώπ. π. should be read. ὑσσώπ. is the Roman pilum (Polybius, i. 40. 12, etc.). The head of this spear is said to have been buried within the principal church of Antioch, where, under direction of Peter of Amiens, it was discovered by the besieged Crusaders, and proved their salvation from the onslaught of the prince of Mosul in 1098.

T. H. WEIR.

SPICES (Lat. spices). The word denotes primarily the kind of a thing: a sample or specimen of anything. Then it means a certain touch or taste of something. More definitely, it denotes any aromatic or pungent substance. In general, spices are aromatic condiments used for seasoning food, or fragrant ointments used as perfumes. In the NT the term is used in both of these senses; and, in a few cases, it has a somewhat wider meaning.

In the Gospels there are several words used to describe various kinds of spices. It is scarcely possible to classify them. See artt. MYRRH, FRANKINCENSE, NARD, SPIKENARD, MINT, ANISE, CUMMIN, RUE.

Spices (Gr. ἀρώματα, Lat. aromata) are mentioned in Mk 16¹, Lk 23⁵⁶ 24¹, Jn 19⁴⁰. We have here probably a general term to denote the mixed spices used in embalming the bodies of the dead.

FRANCIS R. BEATTIE.

SPIES (ἐγκάθετοι, best derived from ἐγκαθίστημι, 'to send down in (secret)') [Grimm-Thayer], 'men suborned to lie in wait'; Vulg. insidiatores).—Though the word occurs only once in the Gospels (Lk 20²⁰; cf. Job 19¹² 31⁹, Sir 8¹¹), there is abundant evidence of a regular system of espionage directed against Jesus from the time when He first attracted the notice of the ruling classes. Emissaries were sent from Jerusalem for this purpose (Mk 7¹ and Mt 15¹ RV), and in the latter portion of His public ministry He could hardly speak in any synagogue or other public place without seeing some of these spies in His audience. Their action is variously described: (1) 'They watched him' (παρτηρεῖν, παρτηρεῖσθαι, 'to watch in a sly, furtive manner'; ex ἀποκρίσει αὐτοῦ, cf. Mk 3²=Lk 6⁷ 14²⁰), where EV add 'him,' though the verb is probably used generally of watching for an opportunity. (2) 'They began to press upon him vehemently, and to provoke him to speak of many things' (ἐπεδρεβύνοντες αὐτὸν θορυβῶσαι τι ἐκ τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ, Lk 11⁵⁴), where ἀποστοματίζω is explained by Euthym. Zig. as ἀπατεῖν αὐτὸν ἐν τοῖς ἀντιστοιχείουσιν ἀποκρίσει ἐρωτημάτων αὐτοῦ, i.e. the Vulg. gives os ejus oppugnavit, as if from a reading ἐπιστοματίζω. So Lk 20¹ tells how the chief priests and scribes watched and 'sent forth spies, which feigned themselves to be righteous, that they might take hold of his speech, so as to deliver him up to the rule and to the authority of the governor.' The putting of the question about the tribute money, which immediately follows, was a plot, in which the Pharisees and the Herodians, two mutually hostile parties, joined (cf. for a similar union in Galilee, Mk 3⁶). The Pharisees sent their disciples (Mt 22¹⁶), young men apparently, fresh, earnest, zealous, and anxious to do right, hoping thus to avoid exciting suspicion of their designs. St. Mark (12¹³) states their object as 'that they might catch him in talk' (ἐνα αὐτὸν ἀρπύσαι λόγῳ); St. Matthew (22¹⁵) says they took counsel 'how they might ensnare him in his talk' (παγιδεύσασιν ἐν λόγῳ), the verb used being from παγίς, 'a trap or snare, into which if He fell He would be held fast with a view to further proceeding'. Compare also Mt 19³, Jn 11⁴⁶, and Lk 19³⁹ where some Pharisees mingled with the rejoicing multitude, no doubt for a similar purpose. The arrangement in favour of Jesus mentioned in Jn 7³² was possibly reported to the Pharisees by spies. Christ was always conscious of the presence of such men, and on these occasions seemed to court publicity for His actions; cf. the direction to the man with the withered hand, 'Stand forth' (Mk 3³). The futility of the system of espionage as directed against Him was shown at the trial, where all their efforts resulted in inability to bring forward anything as a charge except His words about the Temple.

The use of spies for a different purpose, viz. to facilitate His arrest, is implied in Mk 14¹, where His enemies sought how they might take Him with subtlety (ἐν δόλῳ), and in Jn 11⁵⁷ by the command that if any man knew where He was he should give information (μηνύσῃ), that they might take Him. Such a measure was necessary because of His popularity with the multitude. In this sense Judas was the great spy, being in close touch with Jesus, and familiar with all His movements,—a fact which explains the roundabout directions given to the two Apostles as to where they should prepare the Passover meal. It was essential that Judas should not know the place beforehand, in order that the solemn proceedings and Christ's last discourse might not be interrupted by the coming of the band from the priests to effect His arrest.

W. H. DUNDAS.

SPIKENARD (= 'spiked nard').—The AV and RV render ἐνδόξος πιστική in Mk 14³, Jn 12³, as 'the Vulg. nardi spicati' (in Jn. nardi pistici). The word 'spikanard' (sic) appears first in Wycliff's version, 'spikanard' being merely 'deorwyrdes'. The word has 'pure.' These various translations indicate the doubt as to the meaning of the Greek, which was felt from very early times, and is reflected in the Versions generally. The oldest Syriac version and some Old Latin texts simply translate it, while the Peshitta renders by rishāyā (= 'choicest'). Of the various explanations of the word πιστική, the most generally accepted are: (1) 'Genuine,' as though it were connected with πιστός (Meyer, Weiss, etc.). The word πιστικός does not occur in Artemidorus (Oneir. 2. 32) in 'faithful' (γυνή πιστική καὶ οἰκουρός); and we learn from Pliny (HN xii. 26) that adulterations of nard were frequent.* (2) 'Liquid,' as though it was connected with πῖνα. Ovid (Ars. Am. iii. 443) uses the epithet liquida with nardus; and Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. II. viii. 64) distinguishes between μύρα ὑγρὰ and μύρα ξηρά. (3) 'Drinkable.' Athenæus tells us that some unguents were drunk (639 C). But the Greek word for drinkable is ποτός, not πιστικός.† Some have suspected a 'primitive error' in the text here, and have proposed various emendations. It has been suggested that the true reading is ἰνδικήs. All our authorities agree in stating that the genuine nard came from India, while inferior sorts came from other countries. Others would read σπικάρης (= Vulg. spicati), a word found in Galen, vi. 178 C, 182 C, E. Naber (Mnemosyne, 1902, pp. 1–15) conjectures an original form, σπειστικός (= 'liquid'), which, being a ἀπαξ λεγόμενον, might have been corrupted into πιστικός. Prof. E. N. Bennett (Classical Review, 1890, p. 319) suggests that the true form may be πιστάκης, and points out that the resin of the Pistacia terebinthus was anciently mixed with the oil of nard, and that it was a very valuable scent (Dioscorides, i. 91). All these emendations, however, ingenious and interesting as they are, are rendered improbable by the fact that neither in St. Mark nor in St. John is there any variation in the MSS.

It is difficult to say with anything like certainty what the meaning of the word was. It may be a local name, as RVm suggests.* Possibly it is the Greek rendering of Pisita, one of the Skr. names for Nardus (Nardus jatamansi (Dymock, Pharmacographia Indica, ii. p. 233)). But most likely it is a technical term denoting some specially valuable kind of nard.† Modern experience goes to show how easily the exact meaning of similar technical or 'fancy' names can be lost. Such has probably been the case with the word we are discussing. See also artt. NARD, OINTMENT.

LITERATURE.—See the authorities cited at end of art. NARD. The word is discussed by C. F. A. Fritzsche (Com. on St. Jn. 1880) at great length, and very fully by Morison (Com. on Mk., in loc.). H. W. FULFORD.

SPINNING.—From very early times in Palestine, spinning of wool and flax by means of hand-spindles was one of the common occupations, especially of women. Jesus referred to spinning (μύθεον) in teaching God's providential care, even of the lilies of the field, which are richly clothed though they neither toil nor spin (Mt 6²⁸, Lk 12²⁷).

SPIRIT (πνεῦμα).—This word occupies a very important place in the writings of the Evangelists, covers a wide area of thought, and is not always clearly defined as to the particular use it is put to in a given context. The prominent place thus assigned to the word may be considered as indicative of the position which the principal idea embodied by it fills in the general scheme of constructive Christian psychology. In this respect we have a good example of the almost instinctively creative power of Jewish, and especially of Christian-Jewish, religious thought. In classical writings πνεῦμα is found largely employed in a physiological sense (cf. τῷ πνεύματι τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ, 2 Th 2²; and for a similar use see Jn 3⁵, He 1⁷), but in them it never appears as a psychological term, as it does so often in Biblical writings both of the OT and the NT (see Cremer's Bibl. Theol., Lez. s.v.).

The determining factor in the employment of this word by NT writers is the profound belief, inherited from the prophets and teachers of the OT, that there existed from the very beginning a unique fellowship between God and man (cf. πνοὴν ζωῆς, Gn 2⁷ [LXX]). In spite of much and repeated unfaithfulness on man's part (cf. the difficult, though, for our present purpose, the sufficiently significant passage, 'My spirit shall not remain [καταμείνῃ] for ever in man,' Gn 6³), this fellowship continued to be realized more and more intensely as one gene-

* Cf. Theophylact, τὴν ἀδελὸν νάρδον καὶ μετὰ πίστιος κατασκευάσαν (Com. on St. Mark, Migne, Pat. Gr. cxxix.).

† Scaliger derived the word from πρίσσειν, 'to pound.' But this does not give a satisfactory sense.

* Ὀπιστικός (from Opis, near Babylon), Ψιτακικός (from Psittake on the Tigris), and Πιστικός (from the (?) Persian town Pistaira) have been suggested as possible readings. But none of these is an Indian town.

† This idea is found as early as Theophylact (c. 1077 A.D.), who says that the word may denote εἶδος νάρδου ὅταν λεγόμενον.

ration succeeded another, and warriors and poets, prophets and priests, all found their inspiration in the firm belief that the Spirit of God was the living motive power animating their words and deeds.

There can be no doubt that the Incarnation formed the culminating point, as well as the final guarantee of the truth, of this historic realization. Henceforth there was established in the human consciousness a relationship between God and man which can be conveyed only in terms expressive of the closest mutual intimacy and communion. Not only can it be asserted that God's Spirit 'dwells in' man, but the . . . of that truth consists in the resultant . . . man 'in the Spirit' (πνεύματι, Ro 8:9). In consequence of the Divine Spirit's activity in this sphere is the co-operative activity of man's spirit attesting the reality of the relationship and working towards 'the . . . ness of God' (Ro 10:8, 2 Co 5:21; cf. Ro 8:16). The Pauline identification of 'the Spirit of Christ' and 'the Spirit of God' is for us ultimately justified in the twofold story of the birth of Jesus, narrated, as we must think, from two distinct points of view. The Spirit of God was the operative agency by which the Incarnation was accomplished (Mt 1:18, 20; cf. the interchangeable terms πνεῦμα ἁγίου and δύναμις ἱψίστου, Lk 1:2). The revelation of the Sonship of Jesus followed immediately upon His anointing (ἱχρυσεν, Ac 10:38) with the Holy Spirit, and the twofold connexion established by the Synoptists between this revelation and His Temptation seems to establish beyond doubt that, in their opinion, the consciousness of Jesus became then for the first time fully alive to the wondrous position which He occupied, and to the character of the work He was destined to undertake (cf. the burden of the heavenly message ὁ υἱὸς μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, and the implied doubt repeated in the Temptation εἰ υἱὸς εἶ τοῦ θεοῦ, as well as the part played by the Spirit in each of these incidents, Mt 3:16, 4:1, Mk 1:10, Lk 3:22, 4:1, also Jn 1:32; see Plummer, 'St. Luke,' in ICC, ad loc.).

The realization of the abiding presence of the Spirit continued to be for Jesus the dominating feature in His ministry of power (see Mt 12:28; cf. the corresponding expression ἐν δακτύλῳ θεοῦ, Lk 11:20), and gives terrible force and point to His solemn warning against that continued deliberate opposition to His claims which springs from love of darkness and obedience to the spirit of evil. Here, too, lay the secret of that absolute conviction of the truth of His message to the world, resulting as it did in . . . of its inherent authority (cf. Jn 6:63, 7:39, 49, Mt 7:28, 13:24, 22:33, Mk 1:22, 6:2, 11:18, Lk 4:32). Nor would Jesus confine this conviction to Himself. The descriptive title 'the Spirit of truth,' three times reiterated in the Johannine discourses, emphasized that side of His teaching which laid particular stress on the identity of the guiding principle of His life and work with that moulding the activity of His disciples. At the same time it guaranteed the continuity of the context of His message and theirs to the world (Jn 14:17, 15:26, 16:13, cf. the actual bequest in which His promises were, partly at least, fulfilled, Jn 20:22; see also 7:39). That they might entertain no doubt as to the authoritative position they were to occupy in carrying out the work begun by Him, Jesus spoke of His own permanent return to them as practically identical with the continual abiding of the Holy Spirit in and with them (cf. the phrase ἔρχομαι πρὸς υἱὰς, Jn 14:18). 'Christ is in fact from the moment of His Resurrection ever coming to the world and to the Church, and to men as the Risen Lord' (Westcott, Gospel of St. John, on 14:3). In fact the work of 'the Spirit of truth' is mainly the glorification of Jesus by gradually making Him known to the world as to His Person and work (ἐκεῖνος ἐμὲ δοξάσει, ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ ἐμοῦ λήμψεται καὶ ἀναγγελεῖ ὑμῖν πάντα ὅσα ἔχει ὁ πατὴρ ἐμὰ ἔστιν, κ.τ.λ., Jn 16:14; cf. ἐκεῖνος μαρτυρήσει περὶ ἐμοῦ, Jn 15:26).

The profound oneness of Jesus and His followers is nowhere more insistently dwelt on than in these passages, and that not alone in the character of the aims which He and they have in view, but also in the motive power helping and the underlying principle guiding them, which are identified by Him as the forces at work in His own life and Person. By an argument a fortiori He gives them an assurance that He will bestow the Holy Spirit on those who recognize their need of His guidance (Lk 11:13). To such the gift will always be proportionate to their immediate needs (12:12). We must not forget that the peculiar Lukan phrase πνεύματος ἁγίου ἐπέλησθη (15:41, 67) is used in connexion with the spiritual experiences of three people whose work lay in the preparatory stage of the coming Kingdom of the Incarnation.

Notwithstanding the transcendent relationship in which Jesus stood to the Holy Spirit, we are not left without witness that even in this sphere of His life He was like us in all things (see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, on Jn 11:33). It is this word (τὸ πνεῦμα) that is used to describe the death on the cross by three of the Evangelists (cf. Mt 27:50, Lk 23:46, Jn 19:30), although in other places we find ψυχὴ employed in a sense very similar (see Jn 10:15, 17, cf. 15:3, 10:11). It is possible, however, to see in the use of the former word a wider range of thought, as if it was intended to include the latter in its scope. It is as if Jesus desired to commend to His Father's keeping not only the spirit, the principle of His highest and Divine life, but also the soul, the seat of His personal earthly life (cf. Hastings' DB, vol. iv. 612ⁿ).

That ψυχὴ is, nevertheless, sometimes found to denote more than this is evident from references by Jesus Himself to its indestructibility and its incomparable value as the goal of all human progress, where we should have expected either πνεῦμα or πνεῦμα and ψυχὴ to convey His full meaning (cf. Mt 10:28, 38, Lk 17:33, Mk 8:36, Jn 12:25). The distinction and confusion, however, in these two words are in accordance with OT usage, where nāph (NT πνεῦμα) denotes the Divinely imparted principle of life, and nephesh (NT ψυχὴ) the result of the material creation (see 1 Co 15:45; cf. Gn 27, where nephesh hayyah occurs, an expression which is also used of the lower life of the animal creation, Gn 1:20). The indiscriminate use of these two words to denote the same idea is found, e.g., in Is 26:19 (LXX), a parallel to which we have in the Song of the Virgin Mary (Lk 1:46). See Supp.

In other places where this word is used in connexion with the Personality of Jesus, we find it employed somewhat vaguely and in loose contrast with the outward or physical senses. He is said to have perceived the gist of the murmured reasonings of His critics 'in his spirit' (ἐπιγινώσκω τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ, κ.τ.λ., Mk 2:8; cf. Gould, 'St. Mark' in ICC, ad loc.). There is here an evident contrast implied between that intuitive knowledge gained by inference and deduction, and that acquired by direct hearing with the ears. Again, He is spoken of as sighing inwardly, as distinct from audibly (ἀναστενάζας τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ, Mk 8:12), and being indignant 'within himself' or 'in his spirit,' without expressing His feelings in words (cf. ἐνεβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι, Jn 11:38, and ἐν ἑαυτῷ, 11:38). An interesting example of a subtle psychological distinction between πνεῦμα and ψυχὴ is found in the personal experiences of Jesus with two distinct sources of trouble and sorrow. As the cross drew near, His 'soul' (ἡ ψυχὴ μου τετάρακται, Jn 12:27) revolted from the horrors of the vision; while we, as we read the narrative of self-revelation, perceive the origin and cause of His sympathy with 'the feeling of our infirmities' (He 4:15). On the other hand, and in close connexion with His approaching death, there was the dark treachery of Judas; and when we remember the profound joy and holy satisfaction with which Jesus reviewed the success of His work in keeping near Him those committed to His charge (see Jn 17²), we can understand the grief caused by the loss of 'the son of perdition.' With reference to this fact, St. John notices that Jesus 'was troubled in spirit' ('Ἰησοῦς ἐταράχθη τῷ πνεύματι, 13²¹), as though he would wish us to infer that He was stirred to the very depths of His being by the sight of a soul hurrying to its doom.

Instances are not wanting in the Bible of contrasts, simple and definite, in which this word plays a part, though we have no example of the antitheses so familiar to students of the Pauline Christology. Perhaps the nearest to the latter is the reference by Jesus to the contrast between the strength and perseverance of the spirit and the weakness of the flesh (τὸ πνεῦμα πρόθυμον . . . ἡ σὰρξ ἀσθενής, Mk 14³⁹=Mt 26⁴¹). When, in His conversation with Nicodemus, Jesus refers to fleshly (ἐκ τῆς σαρκός) birth and spiritual (ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος) birth, He is not contrasting the limitations of the one with the inherent independence, as to time, space, etc., with their consequent imperfections, of the other. He has in His mind simply the two spheres of being to which man, quid man, stands related. By his σὰρξ he is in fellowship, spiritual, mental, and physical, with the whole visible creation. By his πνεῦμα he touches and enters the sphere of spiritual life in the entirety of his complete nature. Both orders of existence have their characteristic principles, and it is man's unique privilege to unite the two in his complete life and experience. The perfect synthesis is accomplished only in the Incarnation, and it is only by keeping steadily in view the two great constituent elements in Jesus' Person that we shall succeed in truly interpreting His language in His discourses at Capernaum, which were so vitally misunderstood. Neither the spirit alone nor the flesh alone can apprehend and appropriate the Christ, the Son of Man. 'The flesh' is of no avail (ἡ σὰρξ οὐκ ὠφελεῖ οὐδέν, Jn 6⁶³), 'the spirit' alone has the power of conveying life (τὸ πνεῦμα ἐστὶν τὸ ζωοποιόν). At the same time, in order to a genuine participation, the life-giving message must be clothed in language which may be heard; and, in part at least, understood (τὰ ῥήματα . . . πνεῦμα ἐστὶν καὶ ζωή). The historic fact of the Incarnation was necessary to meet the needs of man both on his spiritual and fleshly side, and so we understand the force of the words of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (οὐ γὰρ δὴ πού ἐγγέλων ἐπιλαμβάνεται, He 2¹⁸). And while it would be going beyond the strict limits of certainty to say that Jesus on this occasion is making specific reference to the rite which He afterwards instituted in words of similar import, it will be disputed that in His Last Supper He enunciated principles referred to above. In it, too, 'the flesh profiteth nothing,' it is the spirit that giveth life; but the invisible, intangible spirit is clothed with a visible, tangible body, while man, working through and by the latter, reaches upwards and partakes of the former (cf. Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.).

When Jesus, in His conversation with the woman of Samaria, identifies Spirit with the Being of God (πνεῦμα ὁ θεός, Jn 4²⁴), He at once proceeds to foreshadow the abiding result, as well as the condition of man's approach to Him. The arena, so to speak, upon which the activity of the Divine Spirit displays His manifold and world-wide character, is the human spirit. If we are to offer to God a spiritual (ἐν πνεύματι) worship, and apprehend clearly the methods by which He quickens human life, the first and last requisite is that we shall be in the Spirit (Jn 4²⁴; cf. Ro 8⁵, Eph 2¹⁸ etc.). It is not enough, though it is perfectly true, to say that 'the spirit in man responds to the Spirit of God' (Westcott, Gospel of St. John, on 4²³). The spirit in man becomes the spirit of man (τῷ πνεύματι ἡμῶν, Ro 8¹⁶), and acting, as it does, in harmony with the Spirit of God, is guided into all the truth (cf. the sequence τὸ πνεῦμα ἡμῶν ἀναγινώσκει εἰς τὴν ἀλήθειαν πάσαν, Jn 16¹³). Henceforth man's spiritual home is within the region of that absolute truth which the Person and the work of Jesus were destined to disclose and make real.

Just as we are led to believe in and hope for this co-operative activity of the Holy Spirit, so the Evangelists are insistent in the belief that the spirits of evil are ever watchful to make their home within us. In words of solemn warning Jesus implies that our need of spiritual guidance is so profound that we stand in constant danger of harbouring these active enemies (note εἰς τὸν οἶκόν μου, Lk 11²⁴), and that the only way of successfully resisting their presence is to admit the Holy Spirit as the supreme and only Guest (cf. Plummer, 'St. Luke,' in ICC, on 11²⁵). So close is the analogy between these conceptions that St. Mark does not hesitate to denote the presence, and the relation of the evil spirits to the possessed by using the same preposition (ἐν) which he employs when speaking of the guiding influence of the Holy Ghost (Mk 1²⁴ 3²² 5²; cf. 12²⁸, Lk 2²⁷). The diseases which these spirits were supposed to convey to their victims were often spoken of as belonging to them inherently (Mk 9¹⁷, 25 etc. See art. DEMON).

We shall not be surprised, after these considerations, to learn that when men have the same ends in view, pursue them by similar methods of work, and betray the same general characteristics in their mental and spiritual outlook, they are said to have the same spirit. John the Baptist and Elijah, though separated by centuries of time, were believed to be so far identified that the former lived and acted 'in spirit and in power' (ἐν πνεύματι καὶ δυνάμει, Lk 1¹⁷), i.e. under the shadow and guidance of the latter (cf. Jesus' method of interpreting the popular belief in the pre-Messianic return of Elijah, Mt 11¹⁴). At the same time, the historian is careful to note that the Baptist's childhood was marked by a gradual development and growth in spirit side by side with his bodily growth (Lk 1⁸⁰). SPIRITUALIZING OF THE PARABLES.—'The legs of the lame,' says a Hebrew proverb, 'hang loose; so is a parable in the mouth of fools' (Pr 26⁷); but it is possible to err in the application of direction by pressing a parable too far, and in the extension may be allowed, riding it to death. Such was the nature of the ancient interpreters, and it has been imitated by not a few in modern times. The error lies in forgetting that a parable is designed to teach one broad lesson, and insisting on discovering some significance in every detail. A glaring instance is Theophilus of Antioch's exposition, quoted approvingly by St. Jerome,* of the parable of the Steward (Lk 16¹⁻¹²), which inculcates simply the duty of being as shrewd in spiritual matters as men are wont to be in worldly affairs. The rich man, according to Theophilus, is Almighty God; the steward, St. Paul; the debtor who owed 100 baths of oil, the Gentiles, 'qui magna indigebant misericordia Dei'; the debtor who owed 100 cors of wheat, the Jewish people, 'which had been nourished by the wheat of God's commandments.' Trenchard Zigabenus, whose interpretation of 'the body of Christ' (Lk 15²³) as 'the holy body of Christ' is saved from being blasphemous only by the good monk's simple piety, makes out that the rich man is God (τὸν φιλόανθρωπον καὶ ἀνενδεῆ θεόν); the steward, every possessor of riches, such being 'not lords but stewards'; the steward's dismissal, death. Some modern interpreters have gone quite as far in extravagance. Schleiermacher makes the rich man represent the Romans, the steward the Jewish people, the debtors the Jewish people. Accord- ing to Zigabenus, the rich man is ἀρχὼν τοῦ κόσμου, while the steward is the man who applies earthly riches to spiritual uses.

Origen's exposition of the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁷) is a masterpiece of ill-applied ingenuity. The traveller is Adam; Jerusalem is Paradi- se; Jericho is the world; the robbers are hostile demons; the Priest is the Law; the Levite is the Prophets; the Samaritan is Christ; the wounds are disobedience; the beast is the Lord's body; the inn is the Church; the two denarii are the Father and the Son (the New and the Old Covenant, says Euthymius Zigabenus); the inn-keeper is the Bishop.*

The parable of the Ten Virgins (Mt 25¹⁻¹³) has furnished another fruitful field to spiritualizing interpreters. According to St. Chrysostom the lamps are the grace of virginity (τὸ τῆς παρθενίας χάρισμα); the oil is philanthropy, alms (τὴν φιλόανθρωπίαν, τὴν ἐλεημοσύνην); the sellers are the poor, who afford the opportunity for alms-giving; the sleep of the virgins is death; the cry at midnight (cf. 1 Th 4¹⁹) shows that the Resurrection will take place by night. The lesson of the parable is that virginity without charity is darkness. Accord- ing to Origen and St. Jerome, the five virgins are the five senses. As to the latter, the oil is good works; as to the former, it is teach- ing, the vessels being the souls of the learners. There is much shrewd sense in Calvin's caustic remark: 'Some greatly torment themselves about the lamps, about the vessels, about the oil; but the simple and real gist is that eager zeal for a brief space does not suffice, unless unwearied constancy be added thereto.' See, further, artt. PARABLE and CIRCUMSTANTIALITY IN THE PARABLES.

SPITTING, SPITTLE (πτύω, πτύσμα, ἐμπτύω).—References to spitting occur in the NT in the Gospels only, and there always in connexion with Christ.

1. Spitting was a common mark of derision and contempt. Christ foretold it among the insults which He as Messiah would endure (Mk 10³⁴, Lk 18³²); and during His Passion He was spit upon both by Jews (Mt 26⁶⁷, Mk 14⁶⁵) and by Gentile soldiers (Mt 27³⁰, Mk 15¹⁹). Allusions to the custom with this injurious meaning are found in the OT (Nu 12¹⁴, Dt 25⁹, Is 50⁸). Variant forms, still customary among Orientals, are spitting upon the ground before any one, or even at the mention of a despised and hated name.

2. Three occasions are recorded on which Christ made use of His spittle in the work of healing: with a deaf and dumb man in the Decapolis (Mk 7³³), when He touched the tongue of the afflicted with moisture from His own mouth; with a blind man at Bethsaida (Mk 8²³), when He 'spat upon his eyes'; and with one born blind, at Jerusalem (Jn 9^{6,7}), when He made clay of the spittle and anointed the eyes of the blind. In the two former instances Christ is stated first to have taken the man apart, and Meyer suggests that this secrecy was due to His use of the spittle; but no reason for secrecy suggests itself, and the third act of healing appears to have been performed publicly. Trench (Miracles, on Jn 9) adduces Pliny (HN xxviii. 7), Suetonius (Vespas. 7), Tacitus (Hist. iv. 8), to witness to the prevalence of an ancient belief in the medicinal value of human saliva, especially for eye troubles. SPONGE.—See ANIMALS in vol. i. p. 67^a, and VINEGAR.

STAFF.—Two different words occurring in the Gospels are rendered 'staff' in EV.—(1) ῥάβδος, (2) ῥύλον.

1. Only once is ῥάβδος found in the Gospels, viz. in the Synoptic account of the instructions given by Jesus to the Twelve as He sent them on their mission (Mk 6⁸=Mt 10¹⁰=Lk 9⁸). It denotes, of course, the ordinary walking-staff of the traveller, which, as used in the East, is somewhat longer than the walking-stick we know, and is simply a long, slightly-bowling rod, serviceable for support and for defence.

The main interest of the reference to the staff in the connexion above mentioned lies in the textual difference exhibited by the parallel passages. The instruction as given in Mk 6⁸ was that the Twelve were to take nothing with them, 'except a staff only' (εἰ μὴ ῥάβδον μόνον); whereas, according to Mt. (καὶ ῥάβδον) and Lk. (καὶ ῥάβδον), they were to take nothing at all, not even a staff. Wright has in this support of a suggestion that Mt. and Lk. were 'affected by the tendency to expect that Jesus would be followed by religious teachers' (Synopsis, p. 10). This suggestion is explained as due at first to the fact that the word ῥάβδος, 'neither staves.' This variant is ascribed to a set purpose to afford a loop- hole for introducing the accounts. The AV, however, reading 'staves' in Mt. 10¹⁰, lies open to suspicion on this point; for in Mt 10¹⁰ it gives 'nor yet staves,' with the extraordinary marginal note 'Gr. a staff,' showing that their text actually read ῥάβδον. So the way is left open for the puerile suggestion that the accounts are consistent, inasmuch as Jesus meant that His disciples were not to take more than one staff each! Yet Wyclif's earlier version (following the Vulg.) had rendered 'nether a yerde' in Mt 10¹⁰ (similarly Lk 9⁸), careless of the discrepancy with Mk 6⁸ ('but a yerde oneli'). Cf. Tindale in Mt 10¹⁰ 'nor yet a rodde.' The superiority of Mk's account is self-evident; there is a touch of perfect naturalness about it.

2. The ῥύλον mentioned in Mk 14⁴³ (|| Mt 26⁴⁷, and see Lk 22⁵²), like the sword, is distinctly a weapon. Jn 18³ uses the general expression ὅπλα. The ῥύλα (EV 'staves') were the wooden truncheons or clubs of the Jewish police (ὕπηρται). Josephus (BJ ii. ix. 4) mentions them as used by Pilate's soldiers in attacking a crowd in Jerusalem.

STALL.—See MANGER.

STAR.—1. Introductory.—Occasional reference is made in the NT to a star or stars, and, in most cases, an extraordinary significance of some kind is associated with the mention of such.

Two Greek words are employed, viz. ἀστὴρ and ἀστρὸν. The latter also bears a collective meaning (=a group of stars, a constellation), but not in the NT. ἀστὴρ is often applied metaphorically (see below). ἀστρὸν occurs in Lk 21²⁵, Ac 7⁴³ 'the star of the god Rephan' (a quotation from Am 5²⁵), 27²⁰, He 11¹². Elsewhere (exc. 2 P 1¹⁹, where φωσφίρος, 'day-star,' occurs) ἀστὴρ is used.

Sometimes these references are without any special significance (e.g. Ac 27²⁰, He 11¹² 'as the stars of heaven in multitude'), but more often some definite symbolical significance is apparent, as, for example, when a 'star' of glory is marking a Divine visitation (e.g. Mt 2² 'a time when the light of the sun and the moon is withdrawn and the stars fall from heaven' (Mt 24²⁹ || Rev 6¹³ 8^{10,11}; cf. Ezk 32⁷). In Rev 9¹ the image of the 'fallen star' has a personal reference, Satan denoted by it (cf. Lk 10¹⁸ 'I as lightning from heaven'); on the other hand, by the figure of 'the seven stars' which Christ holds in His right hand (Rev 1¹⁶ 2¹ 3¹) are signified the angels of the seven churches under the direction of Christ; cf. 1²⁰ (Grimm-Thayer). In Rev 12¹ the 'crown of twelve stars' may be intended to symbolize the twelve tribes (or the twelve Apostles 'regarded as the crowning ornament of the Jewish Church'). A mythological allusion is apparent in Rev 12¹ ('a woman arrayed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars'). One passage (22¹⁶) identifies Christ with 'the bright, the morning star' (ὁ ἀστὴρ ὁ λαμπρὸς, ὁ πρωϊνός), in accordance with which also 2²⁸ ('I will give him the morning star') and 2 P 1¹⁹ ('until the day-star [φωσφόρος] arise in your hearts') are probably to be interpreted (see, further, below).

2. The star of the Magi (Mt 2¹⁻¹²).—In its main outlines the story of the visit of the Magi to Jerusalem and Bethlehem is probably based upon what the compiler of the First Gospel believed to be facts. It rests upon a historical basis. The widespread expectation of the World-Redeemer, about the time of the Christian era, and the interest of Eastern astrologers in His advent in the West are well attested, and may well have led to some such visit as is described in Mt.* (See, further, art. MAGI). It must be remembered, however, that Mt.'s narrative is governed by an apologetic purpose. It was written for the special object of meeting the needs and objections of Jewish readers. One influential motive at work in Mt 2 seems to be a desire on the part of the Evangelist to suggest a likeness between the Divinely guided career of Moses, the instrument of Israel's redemption from Egypt, and the Messianic Redeemer who saves His people from their sins. 'Thus the story of the Magi and the star has a striking parallel in the Midrash Rabbā to Exodus in the section which deals with the birth of Moses. There we are told that Pharaoh's astrologers (חַסְדֵּי לוֹהִי) perceived that the mother of the future redeemer of Israel [i.e. Moses] was with child, and that this redeemer was destined to suffer punishment through water. Not knowing whether the redeemer was to be an Israelite or an Egyptian, and being desirous to prevent the redemption of Israel, Pharaoh ordered that all children born henceforth should be drowned.† But perhaps the leading motive in Mt.'s narrative in this section of it is to suggest the homage of the Gentile world, and the selection of the gifts (gold, frankincense, and myrrh) may have been influenced by passages from OT Messianic prophecy which predict the allegiance of the nations (Is 60^{1, 5}, Ps 72^{11, 12, 15}).‡ A contrast may also be intended to be suggested between the spiritual Kingship of the Messiah, and the earthly kingship of secular rulers like Pharaoh, who are instinctively hostile to the new force that has entered the world.

It is noticeable, however, that Mt. here does not cite any proof-passages from the OT (in vv.^{5, 6} the prophet Micah is placed in the mouth of the compiler). If the compiler had in mind the passage in Nu 24¹⁷ ('There shall come forth a star out of Jacob,' etc.), as has been sometimes supposed,§ his failure to cite it would indeed be surprising. But it is to be observed that in Numbers the star is identified with the Messiah, and would hardly be applicable in this story. (See, further, below).

7. ...* suggests, that Mt. regards the epiphany of the Magi to render homage to the newborn King not so much in the light of a fulfilment of ancient prophecy, as a new prophecy 'which indicates that the Messiah Jesus, who has been born to save His own people from their sins (12¹), will be sought out and honoured by heathen, while the leading representatives of the religious thought and worship of Israel ask no questions concerning Him, and leave it to the tyrant, who enslaves them, to concern himself about the true King of the Jews, and then only with the object of His destruction.' On this view the star ... astrologers—the Magi—become significant as proof that God uses even such imperfect means as astrology for bringing the heathen to the knowledge of the truth.

The 'star' of the narrative doubtless refers to some particular star, or to some unique astral phenomenon which the Magi were led to connect with the birth of the World-Redeemer in the West. The detail about the star 'which they saw at its rising' going 'before them, until it came and stood still above (the place) where the child was,' is, doubtless, not intended to be understood literally. It is merely a poetical description of the illusion which makes it appear that a luminous heavenly body keeps pace and maintains its relative position with the movement of the observer.

Various attempts have been made to identify the 'star' of this narrative with some exceptional conjunction, and to fix its occurrence by means of ... The most famous of these is ... thought of a close conjunction of the ... in the constellation Pisces,—a rare combination which takes place only once in 800 years, and which occurred no less than three times in the year 747 B.C. (=B.C. 7). See Edersheim, LT i. p. 213 f. But the data are too indefinite to allow of any certain conclusion in the matter. Moreover, the ignorance displayed by Herod and 'all Jerusalem' as to the nature of the star ... that its appearance would strike any but prac-

The association of the birth of great men with such phenomena was a common feature in the ancient world where ... in high esteem. Thus, e.g., 'on the birth ... Magi prophesied from a brilliant constellation that the destroyer of Asia was born' (cf. Cic. de Divinatione, l. 47, cited by Allen, op. cit. p. 12). On Jewish ground we have already seen the same idea at work in connexion with the birth of Moses in the Midrash passage cited above. Edersheim (op. cit. l. p. 211 f.) ... passages which connect the comi- ... of a star. But these are of very uncertain value.

3. The star of the Messiah.—Sometimes the Messiah Himself is ... referred to as a Star,† a description ... apparently, on Nu 24¹⁷:

'There shall come forth a star out of Jacob,
And a sceptre shall rise out of Israel';

In the Targum Onkelos this is rendered:

'When a king shall arise out of Jacob,
And the Messiah shall be anointed from Israel';

And in pseudo-Jonathan:

'When the mighty King of Jacob's ...
And the Messiah, the Power-sc ... shall be anointed.'

Here, it will be noticed, the Star is expressly identified with the Messianic King. A similar Messianic ... of this passage meets us in the ... Twelve Patriarchs, where (Jud., 21, ... [et]) the following occurs:

'Over you a star shall proceed out of Jacob,
And a man shall arise from my seed like the sun of righteousness' (cf. Mal 4²). Cf. also Test. Levi 18.

The Apocalypse of Baruch (ch. 53), the seer beholds the Messiah appear like lightning 'on the summit of the cloud'; and this lightning 'shone exceedingly so as to illuminate the whole earth' (cf. Mt 24²⁷ 'For as the lightning cometh forth from the east, and is seen even unto the west, so shall be the coming of the Son of Man'; Lk 17²⁴ and the other NT passages cited below; cf. Volz, Jüd. Eschatologie, p. 221).

It was commonly from Nu 24¹⁷, Messianically interpreted, that the false Messiah Simeon derived his designation Bar Cochba (i.e. 'Son of the Star'). When Rabbi Akiba took him as the Messiah, he expressly cited this Scripture passage (Bab. Sanh. 97b) as applicable to Simeon, though this opinion was not generally shared by the learned among the Jews. Bar Cochba seems to have been invested with a Messianic character by the irresistible force of popular public opinion. After the disastrous issue of his revolt it became necessary to apologize for Akiba's mistake, and one such explanation seems to be reflected in some of the minor Midrashim which make the reference apply to Messiah ben Joseph, who was destined to be killed in battle before Messiah ben David could appear.* There is thus good evidence that in the time of Christ the 'Star' of Nu 24¹⁷ was popularly identified with the Messianic King.†

This idea may have influenced those NT passages where Jesus is represented as the 'Morning Star' (Rev 22¹⁶ 28³), though it must be remembered that the angels are described symbolically in the Bk. of Enoch (lxxxvi. 1, 3) as 'stars'—a metaphor which helps to explain the symbolism by which Jesus is here described as 'the Morning Star.' 'Among the stars of the spiritual firmament,' Jesus is 'the brightest in the whole firmament' (Swete, Apocalypse, p. 306). A similar conception meets us in 2 P 1¹⁹ ('Take heed unto the law which is the light until the day dawn, and the day-star is in your hearts'), and, in fact, the 'Morning Star' is present in all those passages of the NT which speak of the spiritual illumination that accompanies the revelation of the Messiah (cf. the fragment of an old Christian hymn in Eph 5¹⁴ 'Awake, thou that sleepest . . . and Christ shall shine upon thee'; cf. Jn 1⁹ Christ 'the Light which lightens every man coming into the world,' etc.). There is also the remarkable description of the Messiah as the 'Day-spring from on high' (ἀνατολή ἐξ ὕψους) in the Song of Zacharias (Lk 1⁷⁸), which may possibly have been associated with the idea of the Messianic Star.‡

The idea of the 'Morning Star' as the Messiah and the Messianic age was well established in Jewish Literature. This idea is founded on—or, at any rate, finds classical expression in—Is 60¹ ('Arise, shine; for thy light is come'). The Midrash (Yalkut Shim.) on this passage is instructive. It comments thus:

'What is asserted by the words of the Psalm, "In thy light shall we see light" (Ps 36¹⁰)? It is the light of the Messiah that is meant. For when it is said, "God saw the light that it was good" (Gn 1⁴), it is thereby taught that the Holy One (Blessed be He) contemplated the generation of the Messiah and his works, before the world had been created, and that He concealed the light for the Messiah and his generation beneath His throne of glory. Then spake Satan before the Holy One (Blessed be He): "Lord of the world, for whom is the light hidden beneath Thy throne of glory?" Answered [for him who in the time to come shall be brought forth and bring thee to shame]."

The Midrash then goes on to relate that at his request Satan was allowed to see the Messiah, and at the sight of him trembled and sank to the ground, crying out: 'Truly this is the Messiah, who will deliver me and all heathen kings over to Gehenna.'*

Gressmann (Der Ursprung der isrl. Eschatologie, p. 307 f.) traces the association of light in connection with the servant of Jahweh, who is represented as the Light of the World in Deutero-Isaiah (Is 49⁶ 51⁴), to the mythical representation of the World-Ruler as a solar hero in the old Saga.

In fact, under the figure of light the salvation and felicity of the Messianic age are constantly depicted (see esp. Volz, Jüd. Eschatologie, pp. 328–331). The heavenly Jerusalem of the Apocalypse is a city filled with celestial light (Rev 21² 22³). The long drawn out contrast between light and darkness that pervades the Fourth Gospel is also significant in this connexion. G. H. Box.

STEWARD, STEWARDSHIP.—

The former word is a tr. of ἐπίσκοπος in Mt 20⁸, Lk 8³, and of οἰκονόμος in Lk 12⁴² 16^{1-3, 8}; the latter, of οἰκονομία in Lk 16^{2, 3, 4}. In v. 2 the verb οἰκονομεῖν occurs. The distinction between ἐπίσκοπος and οἰκονόμος has been variously stated. Horne treats them as synonyms; Meyer says the former is a more general term; Schleusner, that the ἐπίσκοπος is by law or a magistrate, the οἰκ. by will; Elliott and others agree in thinking that ἐπίσκοπος, like our 'guardian,' has special reference to 'persons'; οἰκ., like 'steward,' to 'property.' See notes on Gal 4² and references there cited, also on 1 Cor. 12²⁸ of Gr. and Rom. Ant., s.v. ἐπίσκοπος. The last view is probably the right one. But the exact duties of each of them doubtless varied in different cases and under different masters, and often the two are used interchangeably (so Meyer on Mt of the Gospels, although if in charge of the education of the royal children, it might lend further colour to Sanday's theory of Joanna's relation to the authorship of Lk 1, 2. In Mt 24⁴⁵ δοῦλος is used of one whose position is evidently that of the steward, as may be seen by comparison with 1 Cor. 4¹ 'the steward,' indeed, the steward is a slave or freedman, as in Lk 12, Mt 24; occasionally he is a procurator (Lk 16). See Plummer in ICC on Lk 16¹⁻³, and Bibl. Greek, p. 62.

The primary passages are Mt 20¹⁻²⁰ (Labourers in the Vineyard, 21¹⁻¹¹, Lk 8³ 12⁴²⁻⁴⁸ 16¹⁻²¹ (the Unjust Steward). Some would add the parables of the Prodigal and of Dives as illustrations of wealth wrongly used. The secondary are Mt 21³³⁻⁴⁶ (Wicked Husbandmen) 25¹⁴⁻³⁰ (Talents), Lk 19¹²⁻²⁷, (Minæ), Mt 10²⁴ 18²³⁻³⁵, Mk 13³⁴, Jn 15¹⁴⁻³⁰, Lk 17¹⁰. Of these Lk 8³ yields no teaching.

The facts and teachings of the others may be thus summarized:

1. The steward's position.—He was entrusted with the oversight of part or all of his master's estate, including persons and property. He had the management of his affairs, the care of receipts and expenditures, and the duty of dealing out the proper portion to every servant and even to the children (Grimm-Thayer). The education of the children as well as their maintenance was under his charge. His control was more or less absolute according as the master was absent or present. Christ teaches that we are all God's stewards. The trust covers (a) ourselves (for we are His); (b) others whom we can influence; (c) our time, means, opportunities, etc. For everything we rightfully have is from God (cf. Mt 5⁴⁸). What one has wrongfully seized is no part of his trust.

2. The steward's duty was to manage everything with most watchful fidelity and utmost efficiency, and to do it in the interest of his master. So with us. We should therefore (a) discipline ourselves—body, soul, and spirit, so as to realize God's ideal for us and be most efficient for service—a duty demanding care of the body, training of the mind, culture of the affections, discipline of the will, etc.; (b) pursue our calling, whatever it may be, in the interest of God's Kingdom, whether our work be that of the labourer, the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, physician, statesman, teacher, preacher, or any other; (c) utilize time, influence, money, in the wisest way; (d) urge . . . to do the same. One must plan one's probable life as a whole that it may subserve God's purposes in the largest measure possible.

3. The master's duty was (a) to assign to the steward only just and honourable work, and (b) to provide for his needs. The righteous God can be trusted to do both (Mt 6³³). This leads to the topic that is commonly uppermost when Christian stewardship is thought of; only it approaches the matter from a rather different, but the same, standpoint.

The arrangement between master and steward varied. Is it so in our relation to God? or is there any definite arrangement or understanding? Some have held that tithing represents it. Yet the relation like that does not seem fully in line with the spirit of the new dispensation (cf. Jas 3:1), which deals in principle rather than rules, just because God is more careful to develop character than to get men's gains. Perhaps the best way of stating the case, however, would be this: God wills that His stewards should spend on themselves such a proportion of the income as is necessary to their highest working conditions. This will vary with different persons and to conditions. Each must determine honestly for himself. 'To his own Master he stands or falls.' In general, it will mean less than is commonly supposed. It must be determined not by love of ease or pleasure, not by selfishness or pride, not by custom or fashion (where these are wrong), nor even by what would be reasonable and allowable in a normal world of sinlessness and blessedness, but wholly by the spirit of Divine love in view of the pressing needs of this abnormal world with its appalling sin, ignorance, and wretchedness.

4. Rewards and penalties.—All rewards are of grace (Lk 17¹⁰). These begin now, but their fulness is hereafter. Through faithful service there comes the perfecting of character, the richer development of the personality, and the final winning of our souls (21¹⁹). We are now stewards holding all on trust. We shall then receive as our own the inheritance prepared from the foundation of the world (Lk 16¹², Mt 25³⁴). We shall be welcomed into eternal tabernacles (Lk 16⁹) and be entrusted with the rule and authority for which we have become fitted (Lk 12⁴⁴, Mt 24⁴⁷ 25²⁰⁻²³). The unfaithful shall be beaten, or stripped of what they had, cut asunder as hypocrites, and cast into outer darkness with the unbelieving (Lk 12⁴⁶, Mt 24⁵¹ 25²⁸⁻³⁰).

STIGMATA (στigmata, EV 'marks').—The word occurs only in Gal 6¹⁷ 'From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus' (RV). The subject of the 'stigmata (or marks) of Jesus' comes before us in two ways: we have to consider (1) the meaning of the word stigmata as used by St. Paul; (2) the special sense in which it has come to be employed from the time of St. Francis of Assisi and onwards, esp. in the Roman Catholic Church.

1. St. Paul's use of the word.—(1) By the

'stigmata of Jesus' Bonaventura and many others have supposed the Apostle to refer to bodily marks resembling the nail-prints and other insignia of the Saviour's Passion—thus making him affirm an experience, in his own person, of the phenomena of 'stigmatization' (see 2). But the technical sense in which the word was used in the time of St. Paul—viz. as marks of ownership (either brands made with irons, or cuts which, as they healed, were prevented from closing, and so became broad scars), as well as the meaning of the whole verse when considered in the light of the context and its analogies in other parts of the Apostle's writings (esp. 2 Co 11^{23ff})—shows that ἰγσὸν must be taken as the gen. of possession, and that the reference is not at all to the wounds on the Lord's body, but solely to certain marks on St. Paul's own body that stamped him as belonging to Jesus Christ.

(2) A few commentators, following Augustine (Com. on Gal., in loc.), have transformed St. Paul's stigmata into his manifestation of the fruits of the Spirit, with special reference to his Christian asceticism (cf. 1 Co 9²⁷). But the technical significance of stigmata, as well as the expression 'on my body,' seems to put such an interpretation altogether out of the question.

(3) Assuming, then, that the stigmata were marks of ownership, what is the particular force that St. Paul means to suggest by ἰγσὸν in honour of an adored commander, sometimes branded on their bodies the initial letter of his name. But though the idea of the Christian life as a military service is a familiar one in the Pauline writings (1 Co 9⁷, 2 Co 10⁴, 1 Ti 6¹², 2 Ti 4⁷), it is not in keeping with the present context, which brings Jesus before us as Lord (vv. 14, 17), not as Captain. (b) Slaves attached to the service of a heathen temple (ἱερῶν) were branded with the names of the deities to whom they ministered; and Lightfoot (Com. on Gal., in loc.) and others (e.g. Westcott in Expos. vi. [1887] 241) have thought that the metaphor is most appropriately understood in the light of this fact. But, as Meyer pointed out (Com. in loc.), the references to the branding of ἱερῶν found in Herod., Plut., Lucian, etc., bear upon the usage of other nations, and we have no evidence for Galatia itself. Even if we had, a reference to the branding of the slaves in heathen temples would be needlessly recondite, in view of the much more familiar practice of branding domestic slaves. And, above all, as the ἱερῶν were very frequently women attached to a temple for immoral purposes, it seems unlikely that the Apostle would have in his mind a term that carried associations so degrading. (c) It is most likely, therefore, that St. Paul is alluding to an ordinary domestic custom. In the East (not in Rome, where branding was the mark of a runaway slave, and so a badge of disgrace) slaves were regularly branded by their owners, and Artemidorus Daldianus bears witness to the practice in Galatia (Oneirocritica, i. 8. The verb he uses is στίβω, from which στigma comes. See W. M. Ramsay, Hist. Com. on Gal. pp. 84, 472, who tells us that this ancient custom is familiar even yet to the observant traveller in Turkey). St. Paul never calls himself a ἱερῶν, but the thought that he was the δούλος of Jesus Christ was one of his ruling ideas (Ro 1¹, 1 Co 7²², 2 Co 4⁵, Gal 1¹⁰, Ph 1¹). And when he says, 'I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus,' he means certain marks that bore witness to the fact that Jesus was his Master and he was Jesus' slave. (4) But what were these marks that St. Paul bore branded on his body? Without doubt, he meant the scars he had earned in the service of Christ—perhaps the general signature upon his face and whole person of all his toils and trials, but, at all events, the laceration and disfigurement produced by Jewish scourges and lictors' rods and the cruel stones of the multitude (Ac 14¹⁹ 16²³, 2 Co 11²⁴ 25). These marks of his servitude to his Lord the Apostle looked upon not only as a badge of honour, but (and this is his reason for referring to them here) as seals set upon his claim to be the Apostle and minister of Jesus Christ (cf. 2 Co 11^{23ff.}), and so as tokens of his right to speak with authority. (For the idea of authority as springing out of complete subjection to a greater, cf. the centurion's 'I also am a man under authority' Mt 8⁹, Lk 7⁸). The verse thus falls into line with the whole Epistle as an intensely personal message of remonstrance and appeal. Once more, at the end as at the beginning (cf. 1¹), St. Paul exalts his Apostleship. And what he says here is, 'Let no man trouble me after this, by challenging my right to declare the truth of the gospel; for I bear branded on my body the marks which testify that I am the slave of Jesus—that He is my Master and my Lord.'

2. The ecclesiastical use of the word.—According to the earliest biographers of St. Francis of Assisi (Thomas of Celano, the 'Tres Socii', and Bonaventura, whose 'Vitas' are all included in the Legenda), the saint, while meditating in his cell on the sufferings of Christ, fell into a trance, and had a vision of the Lord in the form of a seraph. When he awoke he found that he was marked in hands and feet and side with the wounds of the Lord—wounds which remained till the time of his death, that in the side bleeding occasionally. Numerous witnesses testify to having seen these marks in the body of Francis, both during his life and after he was dead. Bonaventura (op. cit. xiii. 4) addresses the saint in the following words: 'Vulg. version of St. Paul's inference is natural that the text, conceived to be of a like kind'.

From the first the stigmatization of St. Francis was generally accepted in the Catholic Church, not only as a fact, but as a miraculous evidence of the Divine favour; though the Dominicans objected, and attributed the alleged miracle to Franciscan deceit. In the next century, however, similar marks were affirmed to have shown themselves on the person of the well-known Dominican nun, St. Catherine of Siena; and thereafter down to modern times (the last well-authenticated instance was in 1878) the phenomenon of stigmatization have repeatedly been recorded, though in the great majority of cases, being without doubt, the alleged instances were pure frauds or, at best, to have been nothing more than a state of epileptic hysteria. In the case of St. Francis, the positive evidence is too strong to be rejected on either of the above grounds (see esp. the biography of St. Francis by P. Sabatier, mentioned below). And now modern investigations, esp. in the region of psycho-physics, have furnished evidence that goes to support the historical testimony, by assuring us that there is a 'scientific background' to the phenomenon of stigmatization. It is certain that, in sensitive subjects, the influence of the mind in modifying bodily states and producing new conditions is exceedingly competent to produce such states. In fact, many persons have been known to hypnotic states, and to have nervous susceptibility. The phenomenon of stigmatization is identical with the phenomenon of the 'Passion of Religion' (1907) 351-52. But while modern science leads us to accept the historical testimony, it teaches us to be cautious as an evidence of Divine favour. And modern science is identical with the historical testimony, in Sir W. M. Ramsay's 'Ages of scholarship'.

STONE.—1. The Greek terms.—Apart from the vb. 'to stone' (for wh. see STONING), there are 5

Gr. words tr. 'stone' in the NT which call for notice in the present article. (1) λίθος (LXX for πῆμα) is the general term. It occurs very frequently in the Gospels, and is the word with which in this art. we are chiefly concerned. λίθος is distinguished from πέτρα as in Eng. 'stone' is distinguished from 'rock.' (2) λίθινος (fr. λίθος), 'made of stone'; found in the Gospels only in Jn 2⁶ λίθιναι ὕδρια, 'waterpots of stone.' (3) πέτρος is rendered 'stone' only in AV of Jn 1⁴² 'Cephas, which is, by interpretation, a stone.' AVm gives 'Peter,' while RV has 'Peter' in the text and 'rock or stone' in the margin. 'Rock' is certainly more adequate than 'stone,' for πέτρος properly denotes a mass of detached rock, as πέτρα does a living or solid rock. (So πετρώδης in the parable of the Sower [Mt 13⁵, 20, Mk 4⁵, 10] does not mean 'stony' [AV] but 'rocky' [RV]—not ground full of loose stones, but a thin soil with shelves of rock lying underneath). Probably, however, the sense is best conveyed by the proper name 'Peter'—the meaning of 'Peter' being, of course, understood (cf. Mt 16¹⁸). (4) λαξευτός, 'hewn in stone' (fr. λᾶς 'stone' and ξέω 'scrape' or 'carve'), applied in Lk 23⁵³ to the tomb in which Jesus was laid. Mt. (27⁶⁰) and Mk. (15⁴⁶), however, describe it as hewn out of rock (πέτρα). (5) ψήφος, 'pebble,' represents 'stone' in the 'white stone' which in the Ep. to the Church in Pergamum Christ promises to him that overcometh (Rev 2¹⁷).

2. Stones crying out.—The stones of Christ and the Gospels form a suggestive subject. There are sermons in these stones, we might say, for they have lessons to impart to us regarding Christ's history, His teaching, and His Person as the Messiah.

(1) His history.—(a) Whether or not we accept the ancient tradition that Jesus was born in one of the limestone caves of Bethlehem, it is very likely that His manger would be a manger of stone—built with stones and mortar if not hollowed out of the solid rock (see Thomson, LB [ed. 1878] p. 413). If so, the first bed on which the Lord was laid, like the last one to which He was carried by Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea (Jn 19^{38ff.}), was a bed of stone.

(b) In Christ's spiritual struggles on the very threshold of His public life, He had to do with the stones. It is a curious fact that they play a part in two out of the three acts that make up the drama of the Temptation in the Wilderness. In the one case, Jesus is tempted to use His miraculous powers to turn the stones that lie about Him on the rough mountain-side into loaves of bread wherewith to satisfy His hunger (Mt 4²⁻⁴, Lk 4³⁻⁴). In the other, He is tempted to leap from a pinnacle of the Temple by the reminder that it is written (Ps 91^{11, 12}) that God's child shall be upheld by angels, and so preserved from dashing his foot against a stone (Mt 4⁵⁻⁷, Lk 4⁹⁻¹²). In the one case, the stones were to nourish His life; but contrary to God's law of sowing and reaping. In the other, they were to refuse to dash Him to death; but contrary to the Divinely fixed law of gravitation. Satan meant the stones to be stones of stumbling to Jesus, on that difficult path of obedience and self-renunciation to which in His baptism He had just consecrated Himself. But Jesus by His faith and patience turned them into stepping-stones to higher things.

(c) At Cana of Galilee Jesus 'manifested his glory'; and there, we might say, He beheld to the stones; for the six waterpots of stone (Jn 2⁶).

(d) But not always were the stones His servants and ministers. Twice in Jn's Gospel (8⁹ 10³¹, cf. 11⁸) we read how the enemies of Jesus took up stones to cast them at Him, because He claimed that He was the Son of God.

(c) Against the cave which was Lazarus' tomb there lay a stone (Jn 11³⁸)—rolled there to shut in the dead during the awful process of decay (v.³⁹), as well as to shut out the ravening wild beasts. 'Take ye away the stone,' Jesus said (v.³⁹); and when they had done so, another word of command turned that grave-stone at Bethany into a parable to all the ages of the rolling away from human hearts of the crushing bondage of death (He 21¹⁴) by Him who is the Resurrection and the Life (Jn 11²⁵).

(f) It was not long after, when the Lord's own body was carried to another tomb 'hewn in stone' (Lk 23⁵³), and laid on one of the stone shelves prepared for such a purpose. Against the door of His sepulchre also 'a great stone' was rolled (Mt 27⁶⁰ ||), and a seal was set upon the guardian stone. And that great stone, which the Jewish rulers would fain have made the incontrovertible proof that the world had seen the last of Jesus of Nazareth (v.⁶²), has become the shining and perennial monument of His victory over death—proclaiming, in St. Peter's words, that 'it was not possible that he should be holden of it' (Ac 2²⁴). For whenever Christian men think of the Lord's sepulchre, they always see that great stone rolled back from the door, and the angel of the Resurrection sitting upon it (Mt 28² ||).

(2) His teaching.—One of the most self-evident proofs that Jesus ever gave of the Heavenly Father's love and the reality of prayer, lay in the question, 'What man is there of you, who, if his son shall ask him for a loaf, will give him a stone?' (Mt 7⁹). One of the most memorable examples of His heart-searching irony was when He said to the accusers of a sinful woman, 'He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her' (Jn 8⁷). One of the most striking assertions of His claim to Messianic dignity lay in His answer to the Pharisees when they appealed to Him to rebuke the enthusiastic shouts of His disciples: 'I tell you that if these shall hold their peace, the stones will cry out' (Lk 19⁴⁰). One of His clearest and most emphatic predictions of the coming fate of Jerusalem was when He said of the Temple, adorned with goodly stones, 'There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down' (Mk 13² ||).

In the Ep. to the Church in Pergamum the author of the Apocalypse represents Jesus Christ as promising a 'white stone' to the victor in the good fight of faith (Rev 2¹⁷). Numerous explanations of this white stone have been suggested, but the one that seems best to satisfy all the requirements is that which takes it to be the tessera gladiatoria, bestowed on the victorious young gladiator when he exchanged the name of tiro for that of spectatus (see Expt i. [1889] p. 2, viii. [1897] p. 291; Hastings' DB iv. 618^b).

The 5th of the Oxyrhynchus (1897) 'Sayings of Jesus' contains the striking words, 'Jesus saith . . . Raise the stone and there shalt thou find me; cleave the wood and there am I.' The words have lent themselves to various ingenious explanations; but the most probable interpretation is the one which also most readily suggests itself—that we have here an affirmation of the immanence of Christ in natural things. The saying may be understood in a sense that is perfectly in keeping with teaching that is found in the NT (e.g. Jn 1³, Col 1²⁶), but was more fully developed with a leaning to a kind of pantheism. It is generally agreed that, in their present form at least, these 'Sayings of Jesus' were not spoken by the Lord Himself, and do not even belong to the earliest age (see Lock and Sanday, Two Lectures on the 'Sayings of Jesus' (1897); cf. Expt ix. [1898] p. 194 ff.).

(3) His Person.—On one occasion (Lk 20¹⁷=Mt 21⁴²) Jesus took a stone (λίθος; cf. His symbolic use of 'rock' (πέτρα) in Mt 7²⁴, ||, 16¹⁸, and St. Paul's 'spiritual rock,' 'that rock was Christ,' 1 Co 10⁴) as a symbol of His own Person. He had just spoken the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, and, after their rejection of their doom, He quoted Ps 118²²: 'The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner.' Thus He identified the rejected 'Son' of the parable with the rejected stone of the Psalm, and the wicked husbandmen with the scribes and Pharisees as the 'builders' of Israel's theocratic edifice; but at the same time intimated to the latter that they must not think that by rejecting Him and putting Him to death they would be done with Him for ever. So far from that, He went on to say, 'Every one that falleth on that stone shall be broken to pieces; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will scatter him as dust' (Lk 20¹⁸=Mt 21⁴⁴).

In Ac 4¹¹ we find St. Peter taking up Christ's symbol, and boldly declaring to the Sanhedrin that Jesus Christ of Nazareth was the stone set at naught by them the builders, but made by God the head of the corner. And in his Epistle he returns to this parable of the stone as a symbol of Christ's Person, and dwells upon it with much greater fulness (1 P 2⁴⁻⁸). He describes the Lord now, with evident reference to His Resurrection (cf. Ac 4¹⁰ with v.¹¹), as a 'living stone,' rejected indeed by men, but to God chosen and precious, upon whom His people are built up into a spiritual house. The allusion to the verse in Ps 118 is unmistakable; but in what he proceeds to say the Apostle makes use further of two passages in Isaiah. First he quotes Is 28¹⁶ 'Behold I lay in Zion a chief corner stone,' etc., and next the words of 8¹⁴ about the 'stone of stumbling and the rock of offence.' And it seems clear that his reminiscence of the latter passage has been inspired by his recollection of the Lord's own words as to those who fall upon the Stone which is Himself, and those upon whom that Stone shall fall (cf. vv.⁷⁻⁸ with Lk 20^{17, 18}=Mt 21^{42, 44}). STONING.—There are three Greek verbs in the NT which mean 'to stone'—λιθοβολέω, λιθάω, and καταλιθάω. These, again, are the equivalents of the two Heb. גָּזַל and אָבַן, each of which may denote either the mere throwing of stones by a mob at any person who has incurred their ill-will (Ex 17⁴, Nu 14¹⁰), or the legal execution of a criminal by letting fall one or more large pieces of stone upon his body. Mere stone-throwing is mentioned in the Gospels in the following passages: The priests fear that the people may stone them (Lk 20⁶); the prophets were so treated (Mt 23³⁷, Lk 13³⁴); the husbandmen in the parable beat or stoned the vine-dressers (Mt 21³⁵, Mk 12⁴ AV); and in St. J the Jews threatened Jesus (8⁹ 10³¹⁻³³ 11⁸).

The Jewish Senate (Bêth Din) recognized four forms of capital punishment—stoning, burning, beheading, and strangling (Sanh. vii. 1). In the case of stoning, the two witnesses took their stand on an elevation of about twice the height of a man. The convict was laid on his back beneath, and one of the witnesses dropped a stone upon his heart. If this did not prove fatal, the second witness cast one; and if the victim still survived, then all Israel (Dt 17⁷). The bodies of all stoned persons were crucified according to one account; according to another, only those of blasphemers and idolators, a man being hung with his face to the people, a woman with hers to the tree. According to another account, women were not crucified (ib. vi. 4). A person who had been stoned was not buried in the sepulchre of his fathers (vii. 1).

In the Law and in practice capital punishment was inflicted for offences: the first seven ordinances of the Law are, upon of apostasy (Lev 24¹⁶, 1 K 21¹³), S. try (17⁵), obedience to parents (Lv 24²¹), unchastity (Dt 22^{21, 24}), as well as for practising sorcery (Lv 20²⁷), for kidnapping (Ex 21¹⁶), and for special offences (Jos 7). An ox which gored a man in the course of a bull-fight was not stoned (Baba kamma, iv. 4; Ex 21²⁸). In each of the above cases the penalty takes the form of stoning, though this is not explicitly mentioned in the case of murder, of kidnapping, or of unchastity on the part of a married woman (Dt 22²²). Stoning was thus the regular means of dealing with criminals among the Hebrews, as with the later Jews. Both processes avoided the shedding of blood, and reduced the risk of vengeance on the part of the relatives.

In the narrative Jn 8¹⁻¹¹, which is regarded as spurious, not being part of any of the best MSS, the scribes were therefore justified in stating that 'Moses in the law commanded us that such should be stoned,' the reference being to Dt 22^{22, 24}. This would imply that the woman was betrothed merely, but not married, the mode of execution in the case of a married woman not being specified (Dt 22²²), and being, in fact, at the time strangling (Sanh. 51b: 'A daughter of Israel who is married, by strangling, who is betrothed, by stoning').

STORM.—See SEA OF GALILEE, p. 591.

STRANGER.—The AV has only the one rendering—'stranger'—for five different words in the Greek. It is the natural translation of the term which has the most general use—ξένος (Mt 25^{25, 43} 27⁷ etc.); and there is another word in English to express the exact force of ἀλλότριος (Mt 17^{25, 26}, Jn 10⁵; cf. 10¹²—the ἀλλότριος is the one 'whose own the sheep are not'). For ἀλλογενής the proper equivalent is 'alien,' as in Lk 17¹⁸ (RVm). For παροικος and παρεπίδημος RV rightly uses 'sojourner' (Ac 7²⁶, 1 P 2¹¹; cf. Lk 24¹⁸, 1 P 1¹, He 11¹³). These words indicate a sentiment which is (1) racial or national (Mt 17^{25, 26} the kings of the earth take tribute from 'stranger,' not from sons), (2) humanitarian (Mt 25³⁰ 'I was a stranger, and ye took me in'), and (3) religious (1 P 2¹¹ 'I beseech you as sojourners and pilgrims to abstain,' etc.).

Generally, however, it may be said that the connexion in which the words occur in NT is illustrative of the difference between the current Jewish conception of the stranger in the time of Christ, and that which is suggested by the Gospel. Jesus found His countrymen steeped in the idea that all foreigners were 'dogs,' that 'the peoples' was a term almost synonymous with 'the heathen,' and that only under rigid conditions and upon sufferance might a non-Jew obtain any of the privileges considered to be the Divine right of a Jew. He left His followers possessed of the thought, however unconscious they might be of all that it involved, that to Him the Samaritan and the Gentile, the man outside the pale and the man of no caste, were as much the objects of His mission as the favoured son of Abraham. 'Stranger,' to the average Jew, was the name for one with whom he might have commercial dealings and certain social or political relations, but with whom religious affinity or fellowship was practically impossible; to Jesus it meant one who had a special claim upon Him and His (Mt 25³⁸). The impression which He created was not merely that Christianity meant a deepening and widening of that sense of the sacred duty of hospitality and kindness which already existed in the Jewish mind, as it does in the East (Ex 23²⁰ 22²¹, Lk 19³³, Dt 10^{18, 19}, Jos 24²; cf. the practice existing among the Essenes, Jos. BJ II. viii. 4, 5), but that it involved a complete change of the attitude which assumed that a different treatment was to be meted out to the stranger from that which was meted out to one's own kith and kin (Mt 5⁴⁴ etc.). See, further, artt. COSMOPOLITANISM, HOSPITALITY, GENTILES, UNIVERSALISM.

It is further to be noticed that Christianity gave a new signification to the word 'stranger.' The way had been prepared by the use of the Hebrew word 'Ger' (LXX. πάροικος, see artt. 'Ger' in DB and 'Stranger' in Encyc. Bibl.), which designated the sojourner who dwelt within the gates of Israel, and who, while having a certain status there and a temporary home, belonged to another country. The fact also that the Jews themselves had from the time of Abraham so often been sojourners in a land not their own (Ac 7^{6, 29}, He 11⁹), and the lessons taught by the dispersion in post-exilic times, led to that metaphorical use of the term which has entered so largely into religious speech. The follower of Christ saw in it a reflection of himself as of one who was absent from his proper country, and whose citizenship was in heaven (Ph 3²⁰). When St. Peter writes to the 'sojourners of the Dispersion' (1 P 1¹), and beseeches them 'as sojourners and pilgrims' to abstain from fleshly lusts (2¹¹), he is using the term from its application to a sojourner (cf. 1¹⁷). The Epistle to the Hebrews has the same thought, 'For we have not here an abiding city, but we seek after the city which is to come' (13¹⁴, cf. 11¹³⁻¹⁶).

STREAM.—See RIVER.

STREET.—In place of 'street' in Mk 6⁵⁶ we should read with RV 'alley' or 'lane,' the open space or square (ἀγορά) which was brought for disposal to the mercantile bazaars, and where people at leisure gather for conversation. πλατεία stands for 'street' in the ordinary sense. In Lk 14²¹ it is apparently distinguished from βύμη, as 'street' from 'alley' or 'lane.' But the distinction is ignored elsewhere; and certainly the 'street' (βύμη) called 'Straight' in Damascus (Ac 9¹¹) is no 'alley.' In the East it would be difficult to maintain the distinction. Even the main streets in cities like Jerusalem and Cairo are often narrow and crooked, more like 'alleys' than 'streets' in our sense. The footway is made narrow, the upper storeys frequently overhanging the road, for protection against the heat of the sun. Seclusion is a main object aimed at in building Eastern houses: the wall to the street is seldom pierced by windows; the door usually leads through a passage into a court, round which the rooms are arranged. All sorts of filth are cast into the streets (Rev 11⁸). In spite of the scavenging of dogs, their condition is often not only loathsome, but a source of danger to health.

STRUGGLES OF SOUL.—The Gospels use varied language in describing the conflicting emotions of Jesus. At the grave of Lazarus He groaned in the spirit or in Himself (Jn 11^{33, 38}, Gr. ἐνεβριμήσατο and ἐμβριμώμενος, from ἐμβριμάσθαι to snort in, to be very angry, to be moved with indignation, Mk 14⁵; sternly to charge, Mt 9³⁰, Mk 14³; He was disturbed inwardly by pity for the mourners, by grief at their hopeless view of death, and by indignation at their lack of trust in Him. His expression in tears (v.³⁹). When restoring hearing and speech by the unusual means of putting His hands in the ears (v.⁴⁰), and the word (v.⁴¹). Mk 7³⁴). Unbelief either in the sufferer or in the multitude seems to have been felt by Jesus as a hindrance to the cure, to which His pity moved Him (cf. Mt 13⁵⁸). Soon after, when asked for a sign, He 'sighed deeply in spirit' (ἀναστενάξας τῷ πνεύματι, Mk 8¹²), distracted by His desire to win the nation and His purpose not to use any illegitimate means (cf. the second temptation, Mt 4⁹). When the Greeks sought an interview with Him, He confessed, 'Now is my soul troubled' (τὸ ἐνδοκίμαζον, Jn 12²⁷); the possibility of finding faith among the Gentiles, and the necessity of His sacrifice on account of Jewish unbelief, were probably the thoughts that so distressed Him. The knowledge that Judas would betray Him troubled Him in spirit (ἐταράχθη τῷ πνεύματι, Jn 13²¹), love, grief, disappointment, indignation struggling together. His emotions in Gethsemane are described in varied phrases by the Evangelists (see AGONY). There, as Bengel comments on Jn 12²⁷, 'concurrat horror mortis et ardor obedientiae.'

Besides these descriptions of the Evangelists, we have other indications of the struggles of soul of Jesus. His prayers on other occasions than Gethsemane were probably strenuous efforts to discover and to submit to the Father's will. He withdrew for prayer after the first Sabbath of healing in Capernaum (Mk 1³⁵), after the cleansing of the leper (Lk 5¹⁶), and after dismissing the multitude which He had fed (Mk 6⁴⁶). He was prepared by prayer for the choice of the Twelve (Lk 6¹²), and for His willing acceptance of death (Lk 9²⁸). But inward conflict arose also from temptation (see TEMPTATION), for 'he was in all points tempted even as we are' (He 4¹⁵). This experience was not confined to one occasion, for, as Luke (4¹⁸) states, the temptations came from him for a season, and it is probable even that the narratives of the Gospels (Mt 4¹⁻¹¹, Mk 1¹²⁻¹³, Lk 4¹⁻¹³) bring together a series of trials, separated by intervals of time. The language He used shows that He felt as temptations to turn from His Divinely appointed path. His mother's appeal at Cana (Jn 2⁴) and Peter's remonstrance at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16²³); and even the request of the Greeks for an interview (Jn 12²⁷). Gethsemane must also have been a time of temptation (Mt 26⁴¹, Mk 14³⁸; cf. Lk 22^{40, 46}). His dread of encouraging curiosity or wrong belief by His miracles (Jn 4⁴⁸) came in conflict with His desire to help and comfort; and when the Evangelists call attention to compassion as the motive of His performing a miracle, we may conclude that there had been such a struggle of soul (Mt 14¹⁴ 15³² 20³⁴, Mk 1⁴¹, Lk 7¹³). So also this feeling of sympathy came in conflict with His desire for rest and privacy (Mt 9³⁰, Mk 14⁴ 6³¹). His conflict with the scribes and Pharisees regarding Sabbath observance, fasting, ceremonial washing, and intercourse with sinners must have distressed His spirit; for He too would need to face the issue—would He follow custom or conscience? We have more distinct evidence of the inward strain felt by Him, because His regard for Jewish prejudice and exclusiveness in relation to the Gentiles, in order that He might not estrange His countrymen, compelled Him to assume an attitude of aloofness to the Gentiles (the Roman centurion, Mt 8¹⁰; the Syrophenician mother, Mt 15²³; the Greeks, Jn 12²⁰).

What struggles of soul must have resulted from the thwarting of His love and grace by the misapprehension and unbelief of His relatives (Mk 3³⁴; cf. Mt 15¹⁷ 16²⁶ 26³¹, Mk 14²⁷), His fellow-townsmen (Mk 6⁴), and the Jerusalem which He so loved that He wept over it (Lk 13³⁴ 19⁴¹)! He strove to turn Judas from his betrayal (Jn 6⁷⁰, Mt 17²² 26²³, Jn 13²⁷, Lk 22⁴⁸), and to save Peter from his denial (Lk 22³²). His struggle of soul culminated, severe and privious as it had often been, in the agony and decolation of the Cross, when the beloved Son of God was so made sin (2 Co 5²¹) and a curse (Gal 3¹³) for mankind, that in His darkness and loneliness He felt Himself forsaken of God (Mt 27⁴⁶).

STUMBLE, STUMBLING-BLOCK.—See HINDRANCE.

SUFFERING.—Suffering was not a mere accident in the career of Christ. Neither is it so in the life of any of His true followers. It came to Him in the fulfilment of His Divine mission. Just so must it come to all those who are co-workers with Him in the Kingdom of God. Therefore in the NT the sombre background of physical suffering is never absent from the thought of the writers. St. Peter, perhaps more than any other, dwells upon it in its doctrinal and practical aspect, but all were profoundly impressed by the significance of Christ's sufferings, and endeavoured to interpret the tribulations of His followers in the light of His own varied experiences.

1. Concerning the distressing events in the Master's life, the NT gives us warrant for holding to several conclusions. We misinterpret the meaning of Christ's entrance into humanity, if we limit His tribulations merely to the agony of the Passion. The bitter experiences of His last week were typical of the harsh events of His life as a whole. His emptying of Himself (Ph 2⁷) to become the humble partner of humanity in its struggle against sin and for holiness, was itself the acme of suffering. The Agony in the Garden and the terrors of the death on the Cross were but the last scenes in the drama of His humiliation. Nor must the intensity of His physical sufferings blind us to the reality of the woes of His spirit. With His Divine sensitiveness to selfishness and disobedience and hard-heartedness and unresponsiveness and sin, how poignant must have been the griefs which His sinless soul endured! For this 'man of sorrows, acquainted with grief' (Is 53⁸), every day must have been one of crucifixion. Against Him who came to destroy sin was displayed all the violence of which evil was capable. That He must needs suffer in His effort to accomplish His mission was the inevitable consequence of His Messiahship (Ac 26²³, Lk 24²⁶). But not by His mere sufferings did He redeem humanity. These, in themselves, were not necessary to His office as the 'anointed One,' but were the certain results of the lifework upon which He had entered. Only as He was willing to endure whatever human experiences might come to Him could He reveal the Father and help to turn men to righteousness, by showing them the enormity of sin (He 13¹²). Against Him were displayed the fearful extremes to which sin would go in its effort to overcome good. But by this high discipline was His own spirit cultured (5⁸); and through His heroic, victorious endurance of sin-imposed suffering did He become our High Priest, able to succour those who are tempted (2^{17, 18} 4¹⁴). In this noble sense are the sufferings of Christ central to His gospel, so that St. Peter can justly call himself a witness of the sufferings of Christ (1 P 5¹).

2. Nor are the followers of Christ to escape the promise that came to Him (Jn 15²⁰). See art. SORROW.

SUMMER (θέρος, Mt 24³², Mk 13³², Lk 21³⁰).—This term stands in the Gospels for the time of heat as distinguished from χειμών, the season of cold and rain-storms. These terms indicate the great division of the year in the East. Scripture has no special words for 'autumn'; and while the Arab speaks of 'the time of fresh pasture,' and el-kharif, 'the time of gathering' of grapes and other fruits, they are hardly regarded as distinct seasons. Saif wa shittā, 'summer and winter,' sum up the year for him. When, in the less frequent showers of early April, the fig-leaves burst out and cover the immature fruit on the twigs, the days of cloudless sunshine are 'at hand.' These last from April, through the harvest in the end of May, the summer and winnowing that follow, and the fruits in August and September. The rains of October herald the coming of rains and cold.

W. EWING.

SUN.—The rising of the sun marks the morning (Mk 16²), and its setting the evening (Mk 13², Lk 4⁶). Its light is one of the gifts which the Creator bestows on all men (Mt 5⁴⁵). By 'signs in the sun' (Lk 21²⁵) we are to understand the phenomena of eclipse, as described more clearly in the parallel passages, Mt 24²⁹, Mk 13²⁴. The statement in Lk 23⁴⁵ as to 'the sun being darkened' (AV) or 'the sun's light failing' (RV) at the time of the Crucifixion, cannot be explained in this way, since an eclipse of the sun can happen only at new moon, whereas the Crucifixion took place at a Passover, when the moon was full. The sun's scorching heat, so destructive to vegetation, is an emblem of tribulation or persecution (Mt 13⁴¹, Mk 4¹⁷). The appearance of the face of Christ at the Transfiguration (Mt 17²) and in the vision of the Apocalypse (Rev 1¹⁶) is compared to the brightness of the sun. The same thing is said of the glory in which the righteous shall appear after the final judgment (Mt 13⁴³).

JAMES PATRICK.

SUPERNATURAL.—It is generally recognized that this word is difficult to define, and its definitions are difficult to defend. The reason of this is simple. It is not a scientific but a metaphysical term, and is therefore liable to the vagaries of metaphysical words which really involve metaphysical considerations, but which have grown into terms of any proper discussion of the metaphysical questions involved. The word means that which is beyond or above nature; but the word 'nature' is ambiguous, and it is therefore uncertain what, if anything, corresponds to the word 'supernatural.' In ordinary speech, 'supernatural' would appear to mean anything outside the ordinary course of the phenomenal world. Everything connected with ghosts, for instance, is described as supernatural, and such things as telepathy are said to border on the supernatural. But even in such cases as this the idea attached to the word is not clear. A ghost, let us say, raps on a table, or makes the sound of a carriage driving up to the door. These are perfectly natural and ordinary sounds: they are called 'supernatural' only in the sense that they are produced in an extraordinary way. And by this is apparently meant that the spiritual or volitional cause of the sounds is in an unusual relation to the material world. A chairman rapping on the table at a meeting, or a cabman driving up to the door, is a spiritual or volitional cause of the sounds produced, but he is in the ordinary relation to matter. So the phenomena of telepathy are said to border on the supernatural, because in them effects are produced in a way which the popular mind regards as peculiarly mysterious.

Those who hold that the world was made and is ruled by God, have to imagine to themselves in some shape the mode in which God exercises His sway. For ordinary purposes it suffices to treat the world as an independent organization, carried on by laws which are variable, and it is unnecessary to refer to the Primary Cause of all. This view is harmless enough, but it has the disadvantage of developing an inveterate tendency on the part of thought, by which the world is set up over against God, as equivalent to 'nature' or the 'natural order'; while all action on the part of God is treated as having the character of disturbance or interference in an order which possesses independent rights, or as 'supernatural' in virtue of the fact that it does not conform to the order of nature. From this habit of mind come all those phrases by which miracles are described as 'suspensions of the order of nature,' and the like. If a person under the influence of this habit of thought meets with the suggestion that miracles are themselves orderly, and illustrate a higher law than that of ordinary experience, he is disquieted, because he thinks that in losing the character of disturbance, miracles lose their 'supernatural' character.

Two things are clear in regard to this difficulty: (1) that the source of it lies in the (unverified) dualism between God and the world; (2) that there is a real point involved in the distress of the plain man at what he thinks is an attenuation of the meaning of miracle. We will consider the second point first. It is manifest that if the law which governs miracle differed from that governing ordinary experience, merely in complexity, the distinction of natural and supernatural would disappear; so far the plain man is right. A conjurer does not profess to use any but the most ordinary laws: yet a savage might look upon the common trick of bringing live pigeons out of a hat as a real, creative 'supernatural' act. Some of the language used by critics of miracles and the term 'supernatural' have a tendency to bring these events down to the level of tricks or deceptions. It is said, for instance, that a fuller knowledge of natural processes would lead us to see in the miracle at the wedding-feast at Cana merely an acceleration of such processes, which would quite surrender itself to ordinary methods of interpretation. If this were true, the miracle would cease to be in any sense 'supernatural'; it would be merely a special, imperfectly analyzed case of an ordinary occurrence. This is a real attenuation of the meaning of the word, and the plain man is right in objecting to it. But he is wrong if he objects to it on the ground, expressed or implied, that Divine action is necessarily explosive or disruptive; for this would mean that Divine action is irrational, and that a miracle must be as great a marvel to God as to man. Whatever the appearance of the supernatural to us, to God it must appear rational and orderly. God is the author of nature and its laws. Their uniformity represents His normal action and will for the world. But nature and its laws have no independent validity or rights as against God. They are entirely at His disposal and under His control. If, for whatever reason, He diverges from what is normal, it will be for sufficient cause. He will act in a new way upon the old material, reminding man of the dependence of all upon Him. And the difference between the normal and the abnormal action does not consist in the nature of the laws employed, as if the usual operation of natural law were broken or suspended by some intrusive and alien force; but in the fact that the action of God upon the order of created being is in one case what we expect, in the other widely different. There is no reason why the word 'supernatural,' which will certainly not be driven out of our vocabulary, should not be used as a label for certain characteristic groups of actions and events. It appears necessary to vindicate the freedom of God to take such action: otherwise we subject Him to the tyranny of His own laws. But there is no reason to associate the word with a variety of half-conscious dualistic assumptions, which cannot be defended in theory. See also art. MIRACLES.

SUPERScription.—See TITLE ON CROSS.

SUPPER (δειπνον).—The term applied in the time of Christ to the principal meal usually partaken of in the evening, and also to more elaborate collations for the entertainment of guests (weddings, birthdays, arrival and departure of friends or relatives, sons, sheep-shearing, completion of a journey, funerals, etc.). Invitations were conveyed by slaves (Mt 22³⁷). Guests were welcomed by the host with a kiss (Lk 7⁴⁵); their feet were washed by slaves (7⁴⁴); their hair, beards, and sometimes their clothes and feet were anointed with perfumed oil (Lk 7³⁸, Jn 12³); and garlands of flowers were sometimes provided for the decoration of their heads (Wis 2⁷; Jos. Ant. XIX. ix. 1). On formal occasions the guests were arranged at the table by the master of the feast (ἀρχιτεκλῆνος), usually a friend of the family, according to his conception of their relative social rank, nearness to the host being the mark of honour. Guests commonly reclined on benches (sometimes elaborate and luxurious), three or five to the bench, the feet of each extending behind, and the back of the head of each reaching to the bosom of his neighbour on the left (Jn 13²⁸ 21²⁰). The tables were usually three in number, arranged to form three sides of a square. The guests reclined upon the outside, and the slaves ministered from the inside. The left elbow was used for resting the right hand and arm were free for eating food. A somewhat formal giving of thanks preceded each meal (εὐλογία, εὐχαριστία). This practice was carefully observed by Jesus and His disciples (Mt 14¹⁹ 15³⁶ 26²⁶, Lk 9¹⁶, Jn 6¹¹). At suppers of the more formal or festive type the host served the guests with equal portions as far as was practicable, where no special honour was to be done to special guests. In the latter case, a double, triple, or even quintuple, or a particularly choice portion was bestowed upon the guest of honour. At less formal suppers the food was cut into small pieces and put into large dishes, from which the guests took them with their fingers and conveyed them to flat cakes of bread which served as plates, where they pulled them to pieces before conveying them to their mouths. Pieces of the bread were used as spoons for dipping gravy from the common dish. Individual knives, forks, and spoons were not used even by the wealthy until long after NT times. The practice of hand-washing immediately before the meal had thus its special appropriateness. When women were admitted to suppers of the more formal kind (which was probably unusual), they seem to have sat rather than reclined. Wine was drunk during the meal and after the eating (Mishna, Berakhoth vi. 5 f., cf. viii. 8). Thanksgivings and hand-washing closed the meal.

The ordinary supper of the well-to-do classes was far less formal. The suppers of the poor were no doubt partaken of without tables or seats, the family sitting, or squatting on the ground, around a skin or mat, and partaking of the plain food (flesh being rarely used) out of common vessels with the fingers. See also artt. FOOD, MEALS, and LAST SUPPER.

SUPREMACY.—Few things are more remarkable in the Gospels than the absolute supremacy over nature and man which Christ is represented as both claiming and exercising. In this respect the Synoptic Gospels are more striking witnesses than the Fourth Gospel. Christ appears from first to last as exercising lordship over matter and natural forces. He heals incurable diseases, stills the storm by a word, multiplies food, withers the barren fig-tree. And, beyond these things, He appears also as supreme over the world of spirits. He calls back the human soul to the body after they have been separated by death. He is acknowledged as lord by the unwilling and undesired testimony of the demons (Mk 1³⁴, Lk 4³³⁻³⁵ etc.). Such a supremacy He appears, in the Gospel narrative, to exert without laying any special claim upon it. He accepts, indeed, with praise the confession of the centurion (Mt 8⁵⁻¹³), that such authority belongs naturally to Him; yet He does not represent these wonders as being the chief purpose of His ministry. He appeals at times to their evidence; but His most characteristic claim is something even greater and more fundamental.

Christ plainly claims supremacy over the moral nature of man, over human conscience and human destiny—a supremacy claiming through all time, and without limitation. His association with or subordination to the Father is not referred to as limiting, but rather as justifying His own claim (Mt 16²⁷, Jn 5¹⁹⁻²⁷). On His own sole word He reverses human standards of judgment (Mt 5⁸⁻¹⁰ 19³⁰, Lk 6²⁰⁻²⁶). He creates, modifies, or abolishes by His own 'I say' the laws or institutions which were admittedly Divine in their origin (Mt 5. 19³⁻⁹, cf. 7²⁸⁻²⁹). Yet at the same time He refuses to enter into competition with temporal rulers, or to give decisions, as even a prophet might have done, on human matters of dispute (Jn 6¹⁵, Lk 12¹³⁻¹⁴). His supremacy is too great and too comprehensive for Him to involve Himself in such controversies, which men will learn to settle when they have learned the greater lesson. His words, He asserts, are more lasting than heaven and earth (Mt 24³⁵). He proclaims Himself King and Judge of the Kingdom which He is founding. The members of it are His servants, and responsible to Him alone (Mt 24. 25, Mk 13³⁴⁻³⁷, Lk 12³⁵⁻⁴⁸). But His supremacy extends beyond the limits of His own Kingdom. He claims to be the final Judge of all the nations, to allot the eternal punishment or reward of every individual soul (Mt 16²⁷ 25³¹⁻⁴⁶; cf. Mk 13²⁶⁻²⁷, Lk 21²⁷⁻³⁶). And this universal dominion over both matter and spirit is expressed finally in the tremendous closing verses of Mt., 'All authority hath been given (ἐδόθη, the aorist of an eternal fact) unto me in heaven and in earth.' It is indeed in this Gospel that the claim of Christ to be King and Judge of all men is stated in the most detailed and vivid manner. But there is no contradiction with the other Gospels. A similar claim is made in all; cf. esp. Lk 19¹¹⁻²⁷.

In the Acts, Christ is preached by the Apostles as 'Lord' (2³⁶), as 'prince (ἀρχηγός) of life' (3¹⁵), as universal Judge of men (10⁴² 17³¹). St. Paul from the moment of his conversion speaks of Jesus as his absolute Master, whose 'slave' he is (Ro 1¹), whose 'marks' he bears branded upon his body (Gal 6¹⁷). The descriptions of the nature and office of Christ in the Epistles of the First Imprisonment state and justify this supremacy in the most startling and comprehensive manner. 'In the name of Jesus' all creation must bow; all creation must confess His Lordship (Ph 2^{10, 11}). All things have been created through Him and unto Him: creation not only starts from Him, but converges in Him (Col 1¹⁶⁻¹⁸). Christ is the 'head of all principality and power' (2¹⁰). All things are 'in subjection under his feet' (Eph 1^{21, 22}).

The teaching of Christ is again the most characteristic of the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Everywhere the eye of the believer is directed to Him (2⁹ 3¹ 4¹⁴ 8¹ 12^{2, 3} 13^{8, 20}). His figure dominates the whole of man's life; and the writer plainly implies that this supremacy is essential and indefeasible.

The same teaching appears in a more pictorial form in the changing scenery of the Apocalypse. Christ receives the homage of all creation (Rev 5⁹⁻¹⁴). He is associated with God the Father in the possession of 'the kingdom of the world' (11¹⁵). He Himself is 'King of kings and Lord of lords' (19¹¹⁻¹⁶).

Christian worship, Christian art, Christian sufferings are full of the same testimony. Christ is worshipped personally as Lord and God. He is portrayed as universal ruler, bearing the insignia of empire over all the thoughts and needs and works of men. The martyrs incurred the reproach of disloyalty to temporal rulers, nay, even of being enemies to human society, by their unswerving loyalty to Christ as supreme over all human institutions and customs. Polycarp, confronted with death, confesses Him as 'Saviour and King.' The narrative of his martyrdom contrasts the brief authority of Jewish and Roman officials with 'the reign of the eternal King, Jesus Christ' (Letter of Polycarp, 21).

The Christ of the Gospels, the Christ of Christian experience, must be supreme or nothing at all. The idea of a limited or temporary supremacy is self-contradictory. The Christian conscience, however laggard the will, cannot but confess the justice of the Master's question: 'Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?' (Lk 6⁴⁶). See also artt. SURPRISE.—The word has an objective as well as a subjective reference: it means both 'the act of taking unawares' and 'the emotion caused by anything sudden.' The emotion is closely akin to wonder, 'the state of mind produced by something new, unexpected, or extraordinary'; but sudden emergence is its distinctive characteristic. It may enter in as an element in disappointment, when hopes are defeated, purposes miscarry, or efforts are frustrated suddenly. When the nature of an object is inexplicable, unintelligible, when the occurrence of an event is unexpected, uncalculated, surprise is felt. It necessarily implies limitation of knowledge, an incompleteness of the subject known to completely comprehend or command in thought the object known. In the objective reference, some instances of surprise, or at least the attempt to surprise, are found in the Gospels. The enemies of Jesus tried to 'catch Him in talk' (Mk 12¹³, Lk 11⁵⁴) by the questions they put to Him. They 'watched Him whether He would heal on the Sabbath day, that they might find an accusation against him' (Lk 6⁷). He had to be constantly on His guard against their malignity. By the treachery of Judas they were able to surprise Him, unprotected by the multitude, in Gethsemane. Peter's denial was in some measure due to his being taken by surprise, even although Jesus had forewarned him. It is in the subjective reference of the term that we are specially interested in reading the Gospels—the surprise Jesus felt and the surprise He caused. So different was Jesus in character, purpose, spirit, from His environment, that He could not always understand it, still less could it understand Him. During His earthly ministry the secrets of all hearts were not laid bare to Him, although He occasionally displayed an extraordinary insight into the thoughts and wishes of others; nor was the veil of the future altogether withdrawn, even although He did, in regard to His own death and resurrection, and the doom of the city which rejected Him, show an exceptional knowledge. But surprise was not a Divine omniscience—for which surprise is impossible, as for it there is neither the inexplicable nor the unexpected. The subject of the limitation of Jesus' knowledge is more fully dealt with in the art. KENOSIS. Jesus was surprised by the anxiety felt and the search made for Him by His parents, when He remained behind in the Temple. 'How is it that ye sought me?' (Lk 2⁴⁸); He 'marvelled because of their unbelief' in Nazareth (Mk 6⁶); He was disappointed at the dulness of understanding of His disciples (Mt 15¹⁷ 16^{9, 11}), and of His hearers in Jerusalem (Jn 8⁴³), and at the unbelief of His generation (Mk 8¹²). But, on the other hand, the faith of the centurion (Mt 8¹⁰) and of the Syro-phœnician woman (Mt 15²⁸), brought Him glad surprise. The storm on the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8²⁴) was a surprise to Him even as to His disciples, although His faith was not disturbed as theirs was; so also He knew not that He was sending His disciples into any danger when He dismissed them after the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14²²; see the discussion of these two incidents in Adamson's The Mind in Christ, pp. 5-10). He was surprised by His desire for rest with His disciples, and for secrecy (Mk 7^{24, 25}). He expected to find fruit on the barren fig-tree (Mk 11¹³). Although the growing estrangement of Judas was, from its beginnings, perceived by Him (Jn 6⁶⁴; see Dods' comment in loco in Expositor's Gr. Test. i. p. 759), yet when He called him He did not anticipate his treachery. His state in Gethsemane was one of amazement (Mk 14³⁸); there was an element in the doom He looked forward to that He could not understand, and had not looked for. His amazement is expressed in the cry of desolation on the Cross (Mt 27⁴⁶). What He then experienced was worse than He had anticipated. As man's sin had ever been a surprise to Him, so was its worst consequence when it fell on Him.

Jesus Himself so transcended the world in which He lived, taught, and wrought, that He was constantly a surprise to men. This He Himself expected (Jn 3⁷ 5^{20, 28} 7²¹). The marvel began with Joseph and Mary in the Temple at Simeon's prophecy, and at Jesus' own words (Lk 2^{33, 50}). The multitudes marvelled at His teaching, His healing, His forgiveness of sins, His wisdom in answering the questions of His opponents, and His grace in preaching the gospel (Mk 1^{22, 27}, Mt 7^{28, 29}, Mk 2¹² 5^{20, 42}, Mt 9³³ 12²⁸, Lk 9⁴⁸ 7⁴⁰, Mt 22²², Lk 20²⁶ 4²²). His disciples were astonished at His command over the storm (Mk 6⁵¹), His teaching regarding the rich (Mt 19²⁵), and the curse on the fig-tree (Mt 21²⁰). His disregard of the current customs caused surprise (Lk 11³⁸, Jn 4²⁷), as did the freedom from these He allowed to His disciples (Mk 2¹⁸ 7⁵). The world's surprise at Jesus is its tribute to His unique perfection; His surprise at man's sin and unbelief the evidence of its need of the grace and truth of the Son of God. See, further, AMAZEMENT.

SUSANNA (Σουσάννα fr. שושנה, fem. of ששן, which denotes a lily or any lily-like flower).—All that is known of her is that she was one of the women who ministered to Jesus (Lk 8³). The mention of her name without further particulars implies that she was well known. This may have been due to her special devotion, in which case reference to her on other occasions would have been expected, or to her social rank, which view may derive support from the succession of her name to that of Joanna (wh. see).

SWADDLING CLOTHES.—The custom of wrapping the newborn infant in bands of cloth (σπαργανῶν) has long prevailed, and still exists in the East. This treatment was supposed to make for the strengthening and proper growth of the back and limbs, as well as being convenient for carrying the child. The infant Jesus was not neglected in this particular, though laid in the manger (Lk 2⁷, 12); the absence of swaddling bands being regarded as a sign of extreme poverty or of neglect (cf. Ezk 16⁴).

SWEARING.—See OATHS.

SWEAT.—The word 'sweat' occurs only in one passage in the NT, namely Lk 22⁴⁴, in the narrative of our Lord's agony in Gethsemane, where we read: 'His sweat became, as it were, great drops of blood falling down upon the ground.' In approaching the discussion of this passage there are three matters to be considered: (1) the textual problem, (2) the interpretation of the words 'became, as it were,' and (3) the possibility of the phenomenon known as 'bloody sweat' (haemadrosis).

1. In turning first to the textual question, we find that vv. 43, 44 are omitted in many of the best authorities for the text of the NT (the great uncials N^aABRT). A number of other uncials (ESVΓΔII) mark the passage as doubtful; and in the case of Codex N the hand of one corrector has apparently inserted it, while that of another has deleted it. The Church Fathers, Hilary, Jerome, and others bear witness that there were many MSS known to them which did not contain these two verses; and certain MSS insert them in the parallel passage in Mt.'s Gospel, namely after Mt 26³⁹. Of the Versions, one MS of the Old Latin omits them, as do also the best of the Egyptian, Armenian, and the oldest Syriac versions. Cyril of Alexandria omits the verses in his Homilies on Lk.'s Gospel, while the silence of such writers as Clement of Alexandria and Origen cannot be without significance. One cursive MS (124) omits them, while No. 13 has them inserted by a corrector. In the Greek Lectionaries the verses are generally omitted from the lesson in which they would naturally appear, but are inserted in the Mt. passage, a custom that seems to have influenced Chrysostom in his reference to the passage, though, as WH admit, 'a mere comparison of the parallel narratives of the Evangelists would suffice to suggest to him the reference.' On the other hand, the MSS that include the verses as they stand in Lk. are the following: uncials N^aDPFGHKLM QUXA, and nearly all cursives. While A omits we have seen, it has the reference in the margin, showing that its presence in other MSS must have been known to the scribe. The verses are contained also in the majority of the MSS of the Old Latin, some few Egyptian, the Syr-Pesh. and Syr-Hier. They are known also to Justin Martyr (who quotes them in his Dialogue with Trypho, 103), Iren., Jerome, and Augustine. The verses gave rise to much discussion among early writers, some of whom held that they had been wilfully cut out by some who were afraid of their employment by unorthodox writers; though, on the other hand, they constituted a strong weapon of proof against those who denied the reality of our Lord's humanity.

The conclusion to be drawn from this evidence is that the main witness to the presence of the verses is of a Western order; but this need not mean more than that, as is the habit of the Western text of Lk. in particular, many elements of tradition that would otherwise have been lost are contained in it. This is the conclusion to which WH come. Their words are: 'These verses can only have originated from the traditions, written or oral, which came, or a while at least, locally current beside the canonical Gospels, and which doubtless included matter of every degree of authenticity and intrinsic value. These verses and the first sentence of 23³⁴ may be safely called the most precious among the remains of this Evangelic tradition which were rescued from oblivion by the scribes of the 2nd century.' Neither do these editors think that there is any evidence of the omission of the verses for doctrinal reasons. It would appear, therefore, as if they stood very much in the same position as does the Pericope Adulteræ; that is, as an early story of the Evangelic tradition that had not found its way into all the copies of the canonical Gospels.

2. The next point to consider is the interpretation of the words 'as it were great drops of blood.' Here again there is a secondary question of reading, because certain manuscripts and versions (N^{SVX}, Vulg. Beza) render the word rendered 'became, as it were,' by the word for 'blood,' and thus bring the expression into agreement with the word for 'drops,' as do the majority of the authorities. The Greek word ὀρούμενος, either with or without αἵματος, can itself bear the meaning 'a drop of blood,' and is so used in classical Greek writers (see Æsch. Eum. 184; Plato, Crit. 120 A). Tatian in his Diatessaron renders in an exaggerated form, 'like a stream of blood,' which Bernard supposes would be visible in the moonlight.

When Justin quotes the verse he also omits 'of blood'; but this may be because he regarded the word ὀρούμενος as bearing that signification. Even when all is said, however, the expression may not mean more than that there was a resemblance between the falling of the heavy drops of perspiration and the plashing of blood-gouts from a wound, so that the verse does not absolutely and necessarily assert that blood flowed from our Lord's body in the moment of His extreme anguish.

In a special discussion of the subject by Harnack, that writer maintains that the stamp of Lk. is clearly manifest on the verses in question, and it is to be remembered that it is a very remarkable thing that the only record of this event should occur in the Gospel attributed to the man whom tradition asserts to have been a physician, and whose own language supports the statement. This remarkable phenomenon is the very thing we should expect a physician to take special pains carefully to record. Harnack in the same discussion draws attention to the passage in Jn 12²⁷⁻³⁰, which he regards as that Evangelist's account of the same incident. It is remarkable that while the passage in Lk. speaks of an angel succouring Jesus, the passage in the Fourth Gospel tells of a voice from heaven that answered His prayer, which voice was regarded by some of the people as that of an angel. In Harnack's opinion the Fourth Gospel draws its material for the Passion narrative from the Synoptics, and here he thinks we have another version of the story contained in Luke. Harnack also reminds us that there are two points in the Lukan story that would offend orthodox readers, first, the mention of an angel as strengthening our Lord, which might be a strong support to those who exaggerated the importance of angel ministry; and, second, the fact that the agony was the result of an inward struggle, which might be taken as pointing to too great human weakness in our Lord's Person to be consonant with the full maintenance of His Divine nature.

3. There has been much discussion as to whether such a thing as a bloody sweat is a possibility, and here we come into the realm of medical evidence. Much has been written on the matter, both in older days and up to the present time; a great deal of it, one must admit, being irrelevant. The less critical medical writers of an earlier time were content to quote Galen as their authority for the statement that sometimes 'the pores are so vastly dilated by a copious and fervent spirit, that even blood issues through them and constitutes a bloody sweat' (see R. Mead, Medical Works, 1762, ch. 13). The most recent medical conclusion on the subject seems to be that it is physically possible for blood to exude through the sweat glands, as the contiguity of the blood vessels and these glands is so close and oftentimes the walls that divide them are so extremely thin.* It may thus be granted that such an event as the ordinary text describes was a possibility, though nothing very closely allied to it has ever been observed, and one would naturally manifest great caution in accepting the historicity of it, in view of all that has already been said about the passage.

Some writers have understood the phrase 'drops of blood' as a figurative one, being simply expressive of the agony undergone by the sufferer, and not in any sense to be taken either literally or as even suggesting that the perspiration was itself so heavy as to suggest the dripping of blood.

There remains one interesting instance of the use of the verb 'sweat' in a passage of the early Christian writing known as the Didache, where in ch. 1 we read, 'Let thine alms sweat into thine hands until thou shalt have learned to whom to give.' The words, indeed, are not actually quoted as Christ's, but there can be little question that the author regarded them as a traditional saying of the Lord.

SWORD.—In Lk 2³⁵ and in some passages in the Apocrypha the word for 'sword' is ρομφαία; elsewhere in the NT it is μάχαιρα. The former denoted a weapon used by barbarous nations, especially the Thracians (Livy, xxxi. 39: 'Thracas quoque romphaeae ingentis et ipsae longitudinis, inter objectos undique ramos impediabant'). It thus appears to have been rather a lance or javelin than a sword, and so may reflect the Hebrew rōmah. In the Syr. of Lk 2³⁵ the word used is romha, and the phrase is probably a reminiscence of Ps 37¹⁵ (LXX). The word μάχαιρα may denote nothing more than a knife or dagger, as in the LXX of Jos 5^{2,3} of flint knives, but also a sword. The people who came to arrest Jesus were armed with swords and clubs: Jesus' followers also had two swords, which Jesus declared to be enough; and one of them (Peter) drew his sword and wounded a servant of the high priest (Mt 26⁴⁷⁻⁵⁵, Mk 14⁴⁸⁻⁴⁹, Lk 22³⁶⁻⁵², Jn 18^{10, 11}).

The sword stands as a symbol for 'the edge of the sword' means to die in war, or for a divided state of society (Mt 10³⁴ 'I came not to send peace, but a sword' [in Lk 12⁵¹ 'division']]). In Mt 26⁵² 'They that take the sword shall perish with the sword,' the sword probably denotes the use of physical force generally, although we have also the belief that a tyrant is despatched with the very weapon which he employs against the victim of his tyranny. The expression in Lk 2³⁵ 'A sword shall pierce through thy own soul,' was sometimes interpreted as a prediction of martyrdom (Epiphanius, Hær. 78).

T. H. WEIR.

SYCAMINE.—The sycamine-tree (συκάμινος) is mentioned in the Gospels only once, viz. in Lk 17⁹. The Heb. שִׁטָּה, from which the Gr. name seems to be derived, denotes the sycomore, but the sycamine is by general consent identified with the black mulberry (Morus nigra). In his Hebrew NT, Delitzsch renders by מִרְיָא, which is the name given to the mulberry in the Mishna (cf. Arab. tit). Two species are common in modern Palestine, the black mulberry and the white (M. alba). The latter, however, which is cultivated for purposes of sericulture, and whose fruit, owing to its insipidity, was little eaten, was hardly likely to be known in our Lord's time. The black mulberry, on the other hand, yields a compound fruit which, eaten fresh, is of fine flavour, and is common in the East. This tree, which is deciduous, has a dense foliage, and affords a most welcome shade during the heat of summer.

Thomson (LB pp. 23, 24) would identify the sycamine with the fig. In support of this view he appeals to the Hebrew origin of the two names; but his main argument is that 'the mulberry is more easily plucked up by the roots than any other tree of the same size in the country, and the thing is often done. Hundreds of them are plucked up every year in this vicinity, and brought to the city for firewood. It is not to be supposed,' he adds, 'that He who would select this tree, with its short, the irresistible power of faith.'

The argument is plausible, but not conclusive. On the contrary, what weight it has must be laid in the scale against this theory rather than in its support. The rooting up of the mulberry tree was a common practice. Granted; but was it not from the commonest doings and happenings that our Lord habitually drew His illustrations? When He would find some fit emblem of the Kingdom of God, He appealed not to the unusual but to the familiar, not to the heroic but to the homely. One of the marked charms of His teaching is the gift He had of making the commonplaces of earth speak the language of heaven. When, therefore, He would figure forth 'the irresistible power of faith,' it need not surprise us that He selected the mulberry tree, the uprooting of which was quite familiar to His hearers. True, it was more easily plucked up than any other tree of the size. But that fact does not impair the force of the figure. The law of gravitation is as clearly manifested in the fall of the leaf as in the majestic order of the planets, and the power of faith is as vividly illustrated in the figure of uprooting a mulberry tree by the word of command, as in that of uprooting a sycomore, or even of moving a mountain.

HUGH DUNCAN.

SYCHAR (Συχάρ) is mentioned in connexion with the journey of Jesus from Judæa to Galilee recorded in Jn 4th. We learn from v. 5th that He came 'to a city of Samaria called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph: and Jacob's well (πηγή) was there'; v. 11 adds the information that 'the well (φρέαρ) was deep.' Jacob's fountain, referred to here, is one of the undisputed sites of the Gospels. It lies in the mouth of the valley running up between Mts. Ebal and Gerizim to Shechem, 1½ miles E. of the city and about 1100 yds. from the traditional site of Joseph's Tomb (Jos 24²²). The source of its water is still uncertain. Probably rainfall and ... contributed most to the supply. According to Sanday (Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 32), ... that the special sacredness and real ... the water (on a hot day it is beautifully soft and refreshing) had something to do with 'the presence of the woman from Sychar, though it has been suggested that she was fetching water for workmen employed on the adjacent cornlands and not for her own household. Now Sychar lay 'near' Jacob's ground and well, and the problem is whether it should be (1) identified with Shechem, or (2) located at the little hamlet of 'Askar, near the foot of Ebal, about a mile N. of the well and 1½ miles E.N.E. of Nâblus. The balance of ... seems to be in favour of the latter.

In support of (1), several considerations have been adduced. (a) Shechem could certainly be roughly described as 'near' Jacob's ground, and the disciples who went to 'the city' to buy bread were away during the whole of the conversation, that is, for some considerable time. Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4831) considers it unlikely that 'the city' which fills such a prominent place in the narrative of Jn 4 should be any other than Shechem. Then (b) Jerome (Ep. 86 and Quest. Heb. in Gen. 48. 22) states that Sichem and Sichar are one and the same place, and that Συχαρ is a corruption for Συχέμ. Cheyne defends Jerome's ... holding that modern criticism has ... its possibility. It has also been urged (c) that the Jews called Shechem Shikor (= 'drunken') and Sheker (= 'false')—hence the transition from Shechem to Sychar. It can be added (d) that, for centuries after Jerome's time, his view was adopted by 'pilgrim' writers, among whom may be mentioned Arculf (A.D. 700), Saewulf (c. 1102), Theoderich (1172), Maundeville (1322), and Tucher of Nürnberg (1480).

But strong objection has been taken to most of these contentions, in favour of (2). (a) Over against Cheyne's expression of opinion as to the likelihood of identification with Shechem may be set the view of G. A. Smith (HGHL 368), that the Evangelist, who ... in ... Jos 24²², have substituted (in error) Sychar for Sychem, and that if he possessed only such knowledge of the locality as the OT gave him, he would have used the name Συχέμ (like Stephen in Ac 7¹⁶). Then (b) Jerome offers no evidence for his identification, and Συχαρ has now been generally adopted as the correct ... Jerome translates Eusebius' note, ... Sychar from Neapolis (or Shechem), without comment or correction (in Onom. s.v. 'Sychar'). (c) There is no proof whatever that the nicknames 'Shikor' and 'Sheker' were ever given to Shechem (HGHL 369, and Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4830). And (d) in spite of the pilgrims' belief in Jerome, there is clear evidence for Sychar as a separate town, from the 4th cent. onwards.

The evidence just referred to is briefly as follows. Eusebius (Onom. s.v. Συχαρ) writes to the effect that Sychar lay 'before Neapolis, near the piece of ground which Jacob gave to his son Joseph, where Christ ... John, held discourse with the ... by the fountain: it is shown to this day.' Jerome simply translates this, adding in place of the last sentence, 'ubi nunc ecclesia fabricata est.' [But see Eusebius' Onom. s.v. Συχέμ and Βάλαρος Συχυάρ, where Shechem is distinguished from Neapolis]. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (c. 330 A.D.) mentions a Sychar distinct from Shechem, and about a Roman mile away—to which testimony must be added that of the Itinerary of Jerusalem (A.D. 333), and later on of the Abbot Daniel (A.D. 1106), of Fetellus (1130), and of John of Würzburg (c. 1165). In the Samaritan Chronicle (not later than the 14th cent.) a town spelt 'Ischar (with initial Aleph) is referred to, 'apparently near Shechem' and the same as Sychar. Finally, the traveller Berggren found the name 'Askar or ... given both to a spring and to the whole plain. This name still attaches to the modern village at the foot of Ebal. G. A. Smith (HGHL 371) and Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4831) agree that 'Askar may well have grown out of Sychar—the intermediary form being 'Ischar. There is a parallel in the case of 'Ashkelon, mod. 'Ashqalan. To this evidence for separating Shechem and Sychar must be added references in the Talmud (noted by Lightfoot) to a place called Sychar or Sichar, a 'fountain of Sychar' and 'a plain of en-Sychar.' The spring and the plain just mentioned can hardly be other than those referred to by Berggren (Reise, ii. 267).

These references and opinions seem to justify the conclusion that St. John's Sychar is the modern 'Askar, with its ruins and fine spring.

SYCOMORE.—The sycamore tree (συκομορέα, Lk 19⁴ only), of which mention is made in the story of Zacchæus, is the Ficus sycomorus. The Gr. name means literally a 'fig-mulberry,' and was bestowed upon it because it yielded a fruit akin to the fig, while its leaves, which are heart-shaped, bore some resemblance to those of the mulberry. In the OT it is called shikmâm (1 K 10²⁷ etc.), from which is probably derived the Gr. συκάμνος, though that denotes a quite different tree (see SYCAMINE). The sycamore, which must not be confounded with the British sycamore (Acer pseudo-Platanus), flourishes best in districts having a warm, equable climate. In Palestine it is found principally along the coast and in the low-lying plains around Jericho, and is often planted by the roadside. In the extreme north of Syria it is not met with, as it is not hardy enough to withstand the occasional frosts (Ps 78²⁷). It attains a great size, and its principal branches being long and wide-spreading, and its foliage plentiful, it yields a most delightful shade. It is deciduous, but the old leaves do not fall off till the new ones come out. Its fruit resembles that of the common fig (Ficus carica), but is much smaller, and very much inferior in flavour. It is eaten only by the poorer classes of the population. The 'figs,' of which there are several crops each year, grow on short, leafless stems which spring from the trunk and from the larger branches. The process of ripening is hastened by cutting off the apex of the fruit or making an incision in it (cf. Am 7¹⁴ where the prophet describes himself as בֵּיתִי שִׁקְמִים 'a nipper of sycamore-figs'). The tree is very easily climbed, and its lower branches are a favourite perch for children.

SYMPATHY.—The subject of sympathy, considered in its relation to Jesus Christ, is so large as to be almost co-extensive with His whole life and work. The Incarnation and the Atonement, whatever be the exact theological meaning of the two words, are undoubtedly exhibitions of the intense sympathy which resulted not only in the human ministry of Christ, but in the redemption of the world. It is therefore impossible here to treat fully of the sympathy of Christ in its broader aspect. The scope of the present article will be limited to the consideration how far the sympathy of Christ which made the redemption of the world possible was manifested in His dealings as the Son of Man with His fellow-men.

1. The miracles as expressive of sympathy.—

(a) Miracles of healing.—The miracles of healing are truer expressions of the sympathy of Christ to us to-day than they were in the earlier days when miracles were regarded more as a proof of His Divinity than an incident connected with it. The tendency of Biblical critics of late years has been to modify very considerably the scepticism of a generation ago. Especially in reference to cures of disorders of a nervous character, men of science have no hesitation in admitting the power of such a Personality as that of Christ in dealing with these complaints. Yet this admission of the power of the miracles adds greatly to the sympathy which they possess as expressive of human sympathy. The power to perform such acts of healing presupposes a combination of the tenderest sympathy with commanding authority, and it is interesting to consider that some, at least, of these miracles are instances of sympathy according to its etymological meaning (σύν, παθεῖν), and that Christ Himself shared the suffering in the act of relieving it. This idea is suggested by His remark with regard to the healing of certain demoniacs (Mk 9¹⁷), that the performance of the miracle must be preceded by prayer, and is illustrated in the healing of the woman with the issue of blood (Mk 5³⁰), when Christ perceived 'that virtue had gone out of him.' According to this view, the healing ministry is not to be regarded as a proof of His Divinity so much as an outcome of it; and in this context it is especially important to notice that He never appears as a mere worker of marvels, but in a larger and grander way as the friend of sufferers, relieving their physical suffering, no less than their sorrows and their sins, by human sympathy.

(b) Nature miracles.—The sympathy of Christ, as revealed in His miracles, was not confined to the relief of physical sufferings occasioned by disease. The feeding of the 5000 (Mk 6³⁵ etc.) shows sympathy for the ordinary needs of the body; the raising of Jairus' daughter, of the widow's son at Nain, and of Lazarus at Bethany, illustrates His sympathetic interest in family life with all its joys and sorrows. The stilling of the storm (Mk 4³⁷) shows His willingness to allay the fears of His disciples in the time of personal danger. Standing in a class by itself among the miracles is the turning of the water into wine (Jn 2), and yet this is an act of especial interest as revealing an aspect of the sympathy of Christ which must be borne in mind. It reminds us that His sympathy extended to a wider range than the mere relief of distress. He who watched the games of the children in the market-place, as they played at weddings and funerals (Mt 11¹⁷, Lk 7³²), and used their games as illustrations in His discourses, entered no less readily into the social pleasures of their elders. The sympathy of Christ was broad enough to cause Him to desire actively to promote social happiness, and to supply not merely the necessities of life, but the means of enjoying its luxuries.

2. Christ's teaching as expressive of sympathy.

—What Christ showed by His own deeds and actions to be the rightful attitude in dealing with others, He also enunciated clearly in His teaching, which may be regarded as the ethical counterpart of His sympathy. The central feature of Christ's teaching dealt with the 'Kingdom of God,' and the duties and members of this Kingdom in their relation to one another no less than in their relation to God. The Sermon on the Mount is full of His teaching on this subject. The 'Reign of God' is the transmission of the Divine love and sympathy into the various subjects of the Kingdom. The clearest enunciation of the principle is in His 'Golden Rule,' which bids us place ourselves in the position of others in order that we may be guided as to the effect of our actions upon them (Mt 7¹²). Combined with this are His various injunctions to be merciful (Mt 5⁷, Lk 6³⁶), forgiving (Mt 6¹⁴, Lk 17²), pitiful (Mt 18²³), and to show these qualities to enemies as well as to friends (Mt 5⁴⁴). In all these cases the Divine example is adduced as the chief motive. God makes His rain to fall on the evil and on the good, on the just and on the unjust; and His children must be ready to follow His example, to reconcile an offended brother, and to forgive an enemy. The teaching is further illustrated in several of the parables. The unmerciful servant (Mt 18²³⁻³⁵) forfeited his claim on God's mercy. Every act of love and kindness would be revealed in the final separation on the Judgment Day as done to Himself (Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶). The parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁰) taught the universal brotherhood of man, apart from the artificial distinctions of creed and country; that of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15¹¹) shows the Great Father as bestowing the same mercy and forbearance as He would have us display. The parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16¹⁹⁻³¹), again, inculcates the duty of mercy, while that of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18⁹) was directed against certain who 'despised others.' Such teaching as this is in keeping with the life of One whose mission was to go about doing good, and who on the cross prayed for His murderers.

3. Christ's relation to others as expressive of sympathy.—(a) Christ's relation to sinners.—By His friendly attitude towards 'publicans and sinners' He gave a practical expression of His doctrine of mankind, and of the power of human sympathy to reclaim. The great social gathering of disciples in Capernaum (Mk 2¹³⁻¹⁷), brought together by Levi or Matthew, was a concrete statement of the great truth that a man at his worst is still a man, and a bearer of the Divine image, however that image may have been defaced by faults of character and actual sin. It was this attitude towards the individual—an attitude so different from the conventional attitude of the religious world of the day—that gave Him power over such a soul as Mary Magdalene. Two classical instances of this power may be quoted, and both from St. Luke's Gospel. One is the feast in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰). The contrast is pointed between the self-righteous host and the sinful woman who loved much because she had been forgiven much. Christ had come to call not the righteous, but sinners to repentance, and so His work lay with the publican, with the harlot, and the poor. The other instance is that of Zacchæus (Lk 19¹⁻¹⁰). The reclaiming of Zacchæus is an illustration of the fact that a man will tend to assimilate his character to the opinions which others entertain of him. Zacchæus was an outcast only so long as he was treated as an outcast. Jesus reclaimed him not by condoling with his trials, not by talking to him about his soul or by preaching to him about his sins, but simply by treating him as a friend and an equal. His simple words, 'I will abide at thy house,' seemed to identify Him with the publican, and to make him a brother.

(c) His relation to various people.—His sympathy was not confined to publicans and sinners. He was sorry for the young man whose riches stood between him and life. He could deal with the unbelief of Thomas and the fall of Peter. His heart went out to those who were in any spiritual need. His conversation with the woman of Samaria shows how the 'doctrine of mankind' rose superior to the superficial cleavages of race, descent, occupation, or even character, and pronounced them all of small account in comparison with that which is common to all humanity—a soul. Indeed, as His whole mission was one of self-sacrifice and compassion for the race, it is fitting that the rare instances recorded of His weeping should be for the sorrows of others—at the grave of Lazarus—and for the sufferings of Jerusalem, rather than in the Garden of Gethsemane or for His own sufferings; and that in His death-pangs His thoughts should be on the daughters of Jerusalem, on His mother, on the dying robber, and on His murderers, rather than on Himself. It is left to the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (4⁵⁵) to state plainly the continuing nature of the Divine compassion of the Son of Man: 'We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly,' etc.

4. Characteristics of Christ's sympathy.—(a) It was universal.—It was not evoked by any one need, but by every need of which the human nature is capable. He could rejoice with them that did rejoice, and weep with them that wept. His presence at festivities of various kinds caused the Pharisees to bestow on Him the title of 'glutton and wine-bibber.' He appears at other times as the patron of family life, sharing alike in its joys and sorrows. Yet amid all this there stands out conspicuously the claim of the outcast, which He expressed Himself by saying that 'the Son of Man was come to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19¹⁰). The call of pain, whether bodily, mental, or spiritual, is especially strong.

(b) It was personal.—There is a vague way of speaking of the work of Christ in the Atonement which does not realize the tender, affectionate, and personal love by which that constant reconciliation is effected. The sympathy of Christ was not merely love of men in masses. He loved the masses, but He loved them because they were made up of individuals. 'He calleth his own sheep by name' (Jn 10³). Christ held the master-key to the being of each one. In the Garden He uttered the one word 'Mary' (Jn 20¹⁶). Many had called her by that name before, but none with the same revealing and interpreting inflexion. It is true that 'he had compassion on the multitude,' but He had also discriminating, special tenderness for erring Peter and Thomas. He felt for the despised and lonely Zacchæus in the sycomore tree. He had compassion on the discomfort of His disciples. He added His tears to those of others by the grave of Lazarus. He called the abashed children to His side. He detected the individual touch of faith: 'Master, the multitude throngs thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? . . . Someone hath touched me' (Lk 8⁴⁵).

(c) It was loving and judicious.—Sympathy is not always welcomed by those on whom it is bestowed. When it savours of superiority, it is resented more than scorn. Yet this was never the case with Christ's sympathy. 'He knew what was in man' (Jn 2²⁵), and was capable of sympathizing in the full meaning of the word,—of entering into the state of the individual for the time being, and of identifying Himself with it. An interesting question arises on account of the persistent mention of the need for faith on the part of the recipient of His acts of compassion, and it has been asked whether mutual sympathy was the medium of the miraculous cures. Suffice it to say here that the sympathy of Christ was so tactful and so judicious as to inspire confidence, and with it the faith that was needful on the part of the sufferer to co-operate in the work of relief.

(d) It was practical.—Christ did not openly sympathize with the sinner as such on account of the supposed beauty inherent in the sinner's nature, as has been suggested by a recent writer of the æsthetic school (Oscar Wilde, De Profundis, pp. 113-116). He sympathized only with the sinner in whom the germ, at any rate, of repentance was present. Compassion would have been wasted upon the Pharisees; stern treatment was necessary there. They were in the position of a man who suffers from a hidden disease, and must have it revealed to himself before he will co-operate in effecting a cure. Divine sympathy is a remedy which can operate only when the wound is open.

(e) It was not mere sentiment.—The sympathy of Christ has nothing in common with a type of modern literary sentiment, which is but a parody of the Divine compassion. There is a tendency to prize feeling qua feeling, and to praise and admire its possessor. There is a kind of sympathy which exists only to palliate sin,—to excuse it on grounds of environment, antecedents, and other causes. Such sympathy rarely does good, and generally leaves the sinner where it finds him. Christ's sympathy was no such exotic, beautiful to look at, too delicate to use. With Him feeling led to this: 'He went about doing good' (Ac 10³⁸). With Him sympathy expressed itself in this: 'grace to help in time of need' (He 4¹⁶).

(f) It was consistent with sinlessness.—There is an idea that it is necessary to have experienced a state of mind to be able to enter into it with proper sympathy, and that it is necessary for us to obtain experimental proof of the power of sin in order to sympathize with those who are under its sway. This was not so with Christ. He could sympathize with the sinner, because He knew what it was to be tempted. He had all the natural appetites of mind and body. 'He suffered being tempted' (He 2¹⁸). Yet He exhibited a sinless nature by a perfect subjugation of the desire to sin to the will to do right. And the sympathy of Christ is valuable in disproving the fallacy that only the guilty can sympathize with the guilty. 'We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (He 4¹⁵). See, further, art. PITY.

SYNAGOGUE.—1. The name.—συναγωγή is the Gr. equivalent for the Heb. min, derived from the rare verb anav, of which the radical meaning is 'to gather.' The term means primarily a gathering together of any objects or persons for any purpose, in Scripture an assembly of the members of a local community either for the purpose of worship or for joint action under professedly religious sanctions (Lk 12¹¹ 21¹³). Thence the word was applied to the building in which such a meeting was held, and in that sense is of frequent occurrence in the NT. For a time the term was current amongst Christians as the designation of their meetings or place of assembly (cf. Ja. 2²⁵, He 10²⁵ (Gr.), and such 1st century usage as Epiphanius, Haer. xxx. 18, συναγωγὴν δὲ οὗτοι καλοῦσι τὴν ἐκκλησίαν καὶ οὐχὶ ἐκκλησίαν. This usage lingered amongst the Ebionites and longer still amongst the Marcionites, but in other quarters a distinction early appeared. Either because of the growing divergence between the two faiths, or because ἐκκλησία was regarded as a better expression of the genius of Christianity with its preference for other than ethnic or racial ideals, the terms 'church' and 'synagogue' ceased to be interchangeable. The two senses of each were retained, as an assembly and a place of assembly; but a strictly Christian or Jewish association was definitely attached to each.

2. Origin and history.—In NT times the institution of the synagogue was popular and widespread, and was believed to date back 'from generations of old' (Ac 15²¹); but few materials are available for assistance in the attempt to trace its actual history, and its origin can only be conjectured. Later traditions (e.g. Pal. Targ. on Ex. 17:9, 18:1; rash in Pesikta, ed. Buber, 1296) connect it with the primitive times after the settlement in Canaan. During the exile in Babylon, worship at the Temple necessarily ceased, and the conditions of the Captivity have consequently been regarded as a favourite soil for the germs of the institution (Wellhausen, *IJG*² 193). But the purposes served by the synagogue make it indispensable that some such institution should have been in existence centuries earlier. The synagogue was a school and a court of local government before it became pre-eminently a place of worship. In ancient times the scattered peoples might go up to the Temple at the festivals, and in the intervals avail themselves of the local sanctuaries; but as business connexions multiplied (cf. § 7), the father could no longer be relied upon for the regular instruction of his sons, whilst a centre would have to be found in every village or group of villages for the administration of justice, and for the transaction of the affairs of the community, in subordination to the recognized authority, whether regal or sacerdotal. Hence the germs of the institution are to be traced far back in the exigencies that arose as civilization became more complex; and the Exile marks not the first stage in the origin of the synagogue, but an important modification of its functions, worship becoming thenceforward the principal though far from the sole occupation, and the administrative functions falling for a time into abeyance. After the Temple was rebuilt, popular usage may well be conceived as temporarily reverting to the previous practice; hence the silence of the later part of the OT, Ps 74⁸ (though Briggs in loc. substitutes 'festivals' for 'synagogues,' whilst retaining the latter term in his lexicon, cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. שְׁנִינָה) containing the only explicit reference. In the OT Apocr. the silence is even more complete; and the post-Maccabean revival of the strong accentuation upon the religious side of the functions of the synagogue was contemporaneous with the revival of interest in the study of the Law at the close of the bitter struggle for national independence.

3. A feature of normal Jewish life.—In the 1st cent. A.D. synagogues abounded wherever a Jewish population was found. In Jerusalem itself the number is variously given as 394 (Bab. Kethub. 105a) or 480 (Jer. Megilla, 73d). The figures are, of course, exaggerated, but are an indication of the degree to which the institution had extended.

In addition, there was a synagogue within the Temple itself, with others for the communities of foreign Jews settled in the city (Ac 6⁹, cf. 9²⁰). Galilee was studded with synagogues, as the thickness of its population would lead one to expect. Mention is made in the Gospels of those at Nazareth (Mt 13⁵⁴, Mk 6², Lk 4¹⁶) and at Capernaum (Mk 1²¹, Lk 7⁵, Jn 6⁵⁹). It is not improbable that the last-named should be identified with the ruins recently discovered at Tell Hâm—one of eleven groups of ruined synagogues found in Northern Galilee and dating in part from the 1st cent. (SWP i. 231 f., 252, 397 ff., 401). Agrippa I. built a synagogue at Dora (Jos. Ant. XIX. vi. 3), in imitation of his grandfather's practice elsewhere. The same sort of institution obtained outside Palestine. In Asia Minor and Greece, St. Paul found synagogues everywhere. Philo speaks of 'thousands of houses of instruction' opened on the Sabbath day (Mangey, ii. 282). And in our Lord's time the synagogue was as common a feature of Jewish life as places of worship are of conventional life in our own country to-day.

4. Site, architecture, equipment.—Two rules as to the building of synagogues require that they should stand on an elevated site, and, like the Temple, be entered from the east. The Galilean ruins show that these rules were not followed in the 1st cent. in Palestine; for the ruins do not occupy prominent positions, and in every instance except one the entrance is from the south. In different countries the local style of architecture was adopted, and there never was any style peculiar to synagogues. In Palestine, as the ruins indicate, Græco-Roman influences can be traced, with an over-elaboration of ornament that was rather Oriental in its character. The building proper consisted of a quadrilateral, divided into three or five aisles by means of two or four rows of pillars. Admission was gained through three doors, in front of which was sometimes a highly decorated portico. Of the equipment the most important was the press or ark containing the Law. Above it was a canopy, and in front a curtain; and each of the rolls was wrapped in an embroidered cloth. In small synagogues, near the ark, which stood probably against the wall opposite the entrance, was a raised tribune, furnished with a lectern for the reader and a chair for the teacher. In larger buildings this platform stood nearly to the centre. The chiton (Mt 23:16, 23:20, Lk 11:43, 20:46) were in front of the platform and ark, or in larger synagogues at the further end of the building, opposite the doors, and in either case faced the congregation, who generally sat on chairs or mats arranged across the building, sometimes between the aisles, with an open space between the first ranks on either side. Lamps were a regular part of the furniture, and were probably in use in our period, since two early traditions refer to the oil that was burnt and to the custom of keeping the lamps lighted through the Day of Atonement (Terumoth, xi. 10; Pesachim, iv. 4). The adoption of a screened gallery or even of separate seats for women was a late arrangement, and not the custom in our period. No such rule occurs in the Talmud or other ancient source, whilst the evidence points to the actual participation of women in the synagogal service (cf. JBL, 1898, 111 ff.; and Abrahams, Jew. Life in Mid. Ages, 25 f.), and their qualification to serve in the Diaspora even as ἀρχισυναγωγος (REJ vii. 161 ff.), which should not be resolved into a mere title of honour.

5. Officials.—In a large synagogue a numerous staff might be employed, the principal officials being duplicated, and a variety of teachers and interpreters added. But no synagogue would be without two officers. The duty of the ruler of the synagogue was not to conduct the service himself, but to choose and invite competent persons for the purpose (cf. Ac 13¹⁵), and to check any indecorum or disorder (Lk 13¹⁴). In all probability he was responsible also for the maintenance of the synagogue in good repair, and for the safe keeping of its property. He might or might not be, but probably generally was, one of the elders, who occupied with him the chief seats, and formed together the governing body of the community. The other indispensable official was the attendant (hazzan or synagogs, Lk 4²⁰), whose duties were varied and, whenever possible, distributed. He had to prepare the building for the public services, and to announce with a thrice repeated trumpet blast from the roof the advent of the Sabbath and other festivals. In the course of the services he presented the sacred roll to the reader, and in due course replaced it ceremoniously in the ark. In small congregations he had to read the lesson himself (Bab. Meg. 25^o gives an instance at the beginning of the 2nd cent.), and to lead the prayers (Jer. Berach. 12^d). Besides all this, he had to teach the children, and to scourge such culprits as the synagogue, when acting as a court of law, condemned to that punishment. For the faithful he had manifold duties he was treated as a scribe (ib. 6^a), and classed in rank with one of the grades of scribes. Other officials, where the synagogue was large enough to need them, comprised the administrators and collectors of alms, and the translators of the Scripture lessons from Hebrew into the vernacular of the congregation. In our Saviour's time these offices, where they existed, were honorary, as was probably always the case with the controllers of the church.

6. The synagogue as a place of worship.—Before the destruction of the Temple the ordinary services were simpler than they afterwards became; but the details of the service were prescribed at a late date (Bab. Meg. iv. 3). Of the four principal parts (a) the first was the Shema (so called from the opening word of Dt 6⁴, which should read 'Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God, the Lord is one,' as cited in Mk 12²⁹), with introductory and closing benedictions. It is true that this verse is cited in the NT without any mention of its liturgical use; but other evidences point to a contrary conclusion. The Shema comprised altogether Dt 6⁴⁻⁹ 11¹³⁻²¹ and Nu 15³⁷⁻⁴¹, in which the wearing of frontlets and fringes is prescribed as a symbolic reminder of legal obligations. That these injunctions were interpreted literally by the zealous legalists of our Saviour's time is shown by His references to the wearing of phylacteries (Mt 23⁵). This practice is difficult to explain except on the assumption that the passages quoted in justification were supposed to be invested with special sanctity. Both customs may be confidently referred to the period of the ascendancy of the Hasidim, a century and more before the birth of Christ; and the recitation of the Shema with its accompanying benedictions was a confession, both of faith in the God of Israel, and of the imperative obligation to keep His Law. (b) What prayers originally followed the recitation of the Shema, it is impossible at present to say. Those adopted at a later time would be inappropriate before the destruction of the Temple, the memory of which colours several of the phrases. From the example of the Baptist in teaching his disciples to pray, and from the request for similar instruction addressed to Jesus (Lk 11¹), it may be inferred that forms of prayer were not yet familiar to the Jews, and possibly that a disposition towards the adoption of such forms was now arising. Psalms or selections may have been used; but the time had apparently not yet come for anything more. (c) The reading of extracts from the Law and the Prophets was the central part of the synagogal worship on the Sabbath day. That this was customary in NT times is shown from many passages (e.g. Lk 4¹⁷, cf. Ac 13¹⁵, 17, 2 Co 3¹⁵). The sections of the Law were read by one of several members of the congregation, a male who was acquainted with Hebrew being eligible. Next a passage was read from the Prophets by any one upon whom the choice of the ruler of the synagogue fell. Eventually an official lectionary was adopted, so arranged that the reading of the Pentateuch was completed in a year, the section from the Prophets being selected as far as possible with a view to enforce the lesson of that from the Law, but in the time of Christ the reader of the Prophetic section seems to have been at liberty to select whatever part he liked (Lk 4¹⁷). (d) With the reading of the Scripture the service proper terminated. Gradually, as Hebrew ceased to be a spoken language, it was found necessary to translate the lessons into Aramaic or Greek or whatever might be the vernacular of the congregation. For this purpose an interpreter (methurgeman) was employed, or the schoolmaster or any competent man amongst the audience acted in his stead. The lesson from the Law was paraphrased verse by verse, that from the Prophets by three verses at a time (Meg. iv. 4). These paraphrases were not literal translations, but rather condensed interpretations, of a paraphrase and mark an important stage in the history of preaching. The next development was an extended exposition, which was the usage in NT times (Mt 4²³, Mk 1²¹ 6², Lk 6⁶, Jn 18²⁰). The instruction was didactic rather than rhetorical, as may be inferred from the sitting posture (Lk 4²⁰, cf. Mt 5¹ 26⁵⁵, Jn 8²); and though naturally the Rabbis were looked to for such service, they had not yet become a class of professional preachers, but any distinguished stranger (cf. Ac 13¹), or even any ordinary member of the community, might be invited to give an address.

7. The synagogue school.—The OT ideal makes parents responsible for the education of their children, and draws an idyllic picture of the father and the son turning every opportunity to profit for instruction in religion and in duty (Dt 6⁷). Such an arrangement was suitable only to primitive times (cf. § 2); and as trade increased and the father's absence from home became necessary and frequent, the need of public elementary schools made itself felt. The main idea of the synagogue service was originally instruction rather than worship, for which in its associated forms the Temple was provided, and in its intimate forms privacy could be secured. Not only does the NT make teaching the chief function, but Philo in one place (Mangey, ii 168) almost protests against synagogues being regarded as other than schools. The adults in their regular services educated themselves in the Law, and strengthened the social as well as the private sense of obligation. The children were gathered regularly for instruction of a similar kind in the synagogue itself or an adjoining room, under the care of the hazzan, or, in larger centres of population, of a professional teacher. For advanced studies and for technical Jewish training, provision was made in some of the towns or near the residences of some distinguished Rabbi; but everywhere the elementary school was an inseparable adjunct of the synagogue. See artt BOYHOOD (JEWISH), and EDUCATION.

8. The synagogue as a court.—Under the strict conception of a theocracy there can be no distinction between things ecclesiastical and things civil. Hence, in places where the population was preponderantly Jewish, local administration was in the hands of a court, which took cognizance of all the Jewish interests of the neighbourhood, and of which the Roman over-rule was apt to avail itself for both executive and minor judicial business. Where the Jews were outclassed in numbers or influence, the synagogal authority was proportionately reduced, though without any loss of respect within the Jewish community. If there were several synagogues in a Jewish town, all were knit together into some kind of organization, under a controlling council which regulated also all the civil affairs of the community. The case of a town with but a single synagogue was simpler, but not radically distinct. Here the council, or local Sanhedrin (Mt 5²² 10¹⁷, Mk 13⁹), met in the synagogue, where their plans were matured, their decisions taken, and often executed. The court proper consisted of members where the population was considerable, elsewhere of seven; and this college of elders (Lk 7⁹) or rulers (Mt 9^{18, 23}, Lk 8⁴¹) exercised a wide jurisdiction. For minor offences (Makkoth iii. 1) the penalty was scourging (Mt 10⁴¹ 23³⁴, cf. Ac 22¹⁹; not to be confused with the Roman penalty of scourging of Mt 20¹⁹ and Jn 19¹), limited to forty stripes save one (cf. 2 Co 11²⁴), and administered in the synagogue by the hazzan. Excommunication was the punishment of offences that were thought to imperil the stability of the Jewish community (Lk 6²², Jn 9²² 12^{42, 16}). See art. EXCOMMUNICATION in vol. i. p. 559^a.

9. Other uses of the synagogue.—There are indications in early Jewish literature, belonging some of them to the 1st cent., that the synagogue served also the purposes of a public hall or general meeting-place, and regulations for its reverent treatment were gradually adopted. Notices respecting the interests of the community at large, or even of private members, were given there (Baba mezia, 23b). It was the place for funeral orations over the death of men of distinction, and at a later period could be used for some of the ceremonies of private mourning. Josephus says (Vita, 54) that public banquets were held in the synagogues at the time of the revolt against Rome. They became increasingly a common meeting-place for the Jews of the neighbourhood, where their affairs might be discussed informally or in a summoned assembly, and a variety of matters might be conveniently settled. Thus a secularizing—or, from a Jewish point of view, a communal—tendency developed, such as had already shown itself in the case of the courts of the Temple (Mt 21¹³, Mk 11¹⁵, Jn 2^{14a}); and arrangements had eventually to be made in the interest of decorum. People were forbidden to discuss trifles on the premises of a synagogue, or to walk aimlessly about, to shelter there from the heat or rain, to come in with soiled shoes or garments, or to make a thoroughfare of the courts. Some of these regulations are of a later date than the Gospels, but their necessity arose from habits that were already becoming fixed. The synagogue was not only a place of authoritative instruction in the Law, but the centre of the Jewish life of a district, and, as such, its purposes were determined by both social and racial needs.

10. Financial administration.—Most of the officials of the synagogue were honorary; but the schoolmaster and the attendant would require at least partial support, whilst the cost of erection, with that of repairs and maintenance, must have been considerable, to say nothing of the fees paid at a later period to 'ten unemployed men' as the minimum of a congregation. It is a problem, for the settlement of which sufficient materials are not at present available, how these expenses were met. In some cases a wealthy man, Jew or Gentile, wishing to ingratiate himself with the people or out of pure kindness, may have provided a synaagogue (cf. Lk 7⁹; Jos. Ant. XIX. vi. 3). In other cases, though the authorities are not explicit, the synagogue must have been erected by means of a special levy from the community, and the revenue for its maintenance provided in the same way. The Mishna invests the whole property, including buildings and equipment, in the civic community (Meg. iii. 1; Nedarim, v. 5), and classes it thus with the baths and roads of the neighbourhood. But as to the principle on which the necessary moneys were raised, and the means by which payment was enforced, very little is at present known. A set of synagogue accounts from the early part of the 1st cent. would be a discovery of much value.

LITERATURE.—Of the works cited in Hastings' DB, Schürer is still the most valuable. The German edition is the best; the reference is in ii. 52–59. Add Dalman's art. 'Synagogaler Cultus' in *PRF*³ vii. 7–19; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 83 ff.; Dembitz, Jewish Services in Syn. and Home, 1891; but care must be taken in checking the periods for which they stand.

SYNOPTICS, SYNOPTISTS.—The term 'Synoptics' is, according to the universal practice of modern NT scholars, applied to the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke, as distinguished from the Gospel of St. John; and these three Evangelists are known as the 'Synoptists.' It is so used because these Gospels are so constructed that, together, they present a complete or conspectus of the leading features of the work and teaching of our Lord. From Tatian, in the 2nd cent., to our own day, frequent attempts have been made to exhibit the Canonical Gospels in the form of a Harmony. Such a Harmony usually took the form of a compilation of these accounts of the life of Jesus, arranged in parallel columns, so as to present a complete Gospel, constructed out of the materials supplied by each Evangelist. The title of Tatian's lost work, the Diatessaron (τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων, 'the one by means of four'), illustrates the principle adopted in such Harmonies. In the early Church, and indeed until the time when the modern view of the mutual relations of the Gospels was first stated by Griesbach in 1774, the example of Tatian was followed, and the Synopsis was made to embrace all four Gospels; some, like Irenaeus, being led by various reasons, more or less fanciful, to lay stress upon the fourfold nature of the Gospel. Modern scholars, however, observed that the Fourth Gospel differed from the others in so many important particulars as to call for separate treatment. It is recognized, for instance, that while St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke, except in their accounts of the closing scenes, relate almost exclusively the Galilean ministry of Jesus, St. John confines himself mainly to His work in Judæa. It may be observed, in particular, that the first three Gospels 'proceed in the main upon a common outline . . . variously filled up and variously . . . but' which 'can be easily traced as running through the middle and largest section of each of their Gospels.' These Gospels form, in fact, a group . . . in which, while each member has . . . peculiarities, all three are of a common type. See, further, art. GOSPELS, and the art. on each of the Gospels.

SYROPHŒNICIAN WOMAN.—So designated in Mk 7²⁶.* She is described further (1) in the same passage as a Greek (Ἑλληνίς), i.e., according to Heb. usage, one who spoke Greek as her ordinary language;† and (2) in Mt 15²² as a Canaanite

* The readings are various. NAKL and other MSS have Συροφινίστρια; EFGH, etc., Σύρα Φοινίστρια. For the Συροφινίστρια of the TR there is little authority.

† The word Ἑλληνίς is, indeed, often used in the NT in a yet wider sense, as the equivalent of Gentile (Ac 19¹⁰, Ro 11²⁹, 29, (Xavavala), equivalent here to Phœnician, in conformity with the LXX, which renders Canaan by Φοινίκη. The woman was apparently a Greek as regards language and culture, a Phœnician by descent, and a Syrian by provincial connexion.* Her name is mentioned in the Clementine Homilies (ii. 19, iii. 73) as Justa, and that of her daughter as Bernice.

1. The woman's approach to Christ on her daughter's behalf is remarkable, for (1) Jesus belonged to a race which hated or despised her countrymen, and were hated and despised by them. (2) He had healed none of her people, and had come into her district not for ministry, but for retirement and rest. (3) She had evidently received no encouragement from the disciples. Yet she comes to Him and addresses Him not as a general philanthropist, but as Son of David. She had heard about Christ, probably, from some of 'those about Tyre and Sidon' who had waited early on His ministry before the appointment of the Twelve (Mk 3⁹). Her national prejudice against Jesus and a Jewish Messiah had been broken down, her faith in His healing and exorcizing power was complete. The incentive to her faith and appeal is maternal love along with sore need. She is in great trouble, and one who has helped others in trial is at hand. She loves her stricken daughter, and warm affection surmounts all barriers.

2. Still more remarkable is our Lord's triple apparent repulse. (1) His silence at first and seeming indifference: 'He answered her never a word' (Mt 15²³). (2) His apparent refusal on account of lack of authority: 'I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' (3) His seemingly scornful reproach: 'It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to the dogs' (Mt 15²⁶, Mk 7²⁷). For this repeated repulse, however, there was a triple reason. (1) Consideration for Jews. It was part of God's providential plan to use the Jews for the education and conversion of the world; therefore they must not be needlessly and prematurely alienated from a Christ who was to be a Messiah equally for Jews and for Gentiles. The alienation was destined to come eventually for the nation as a whole, but it must not be hastened and intensified through any sudden process; the extension of the Kingdom must be shown to be natural and inevitable — the proper recompense of a faith in Jehovah which constituted Gentiles genuine sons and daughters of Abraham. (2) Education of disciples who shared more or less in the national prejudice and exclusiveness. The Twelve were to become Apostles to the world, and Christ wished their eventual mission not to be merely imposed by authority, but to be the outcome of inward prompting. Accordingly He excites (a) their pity, so as to cause them to become, even if selfishly, intercessors for the woman; † and (b) their admiration, by the manifestation in her of a faith which exceeded that of their own countrymen. (3) Development of the woman's faith and love. He who 'knew what was in man' saw the strength of the ¹ faith, and He desired to perfect it (Ja 1⁴) through such trials as, to His discerning insight, she appeared able to bear. He sought to deepen within her that humility which is the condition of exaltation, and to render yet warmer that motherly love which had opened her eyes to love Divine. Doubtless, had her faith been less strong, her humility less deep, her love less ¹ tender. He would have dealt more tenderly ¹ with her, so as not to 'break the bruised reed'; but these qualities being already well developed, He braced her character with the cold yet wholesome wind of seeming discouragement.

Col 311); cf. the Oriental use of the word 'Frank' as equivalent to 'West European.'

* In the reign of Hadrian, Syria was subdivided into (1) Syria proper, (2) Syria-Paphlagonia, (3) Syria-Palestina (Lucian, de Syn. Deor. 4). The political division, then officially made, probably followed an already existing popular nomenclature, so that a Syrophoenician may mean simply a Syrian resident in Phoenicia proper (Hastings' DB iv. 622). There is no distinct authority for the possible interpretation, half-Syrian, half-Phoenician; although Juv. (viii. 139) is regarded by some as such, and there is an analogy in the use of Libyphoenix to denote a mongrel person (Liv., xxi. 22).

† Mt 15:23, 24, where Christ's reply indicates that He understood the disciples to mean, 'Send her away with her entreaty granted.'

3. The woman's triumph and reward.—Over Christ's silent apathy, as it appeared (Mt 15²²), she triumphs with renewed supplication; over His seemingly narrow refusal of ministry to an alien, she triumphs with lowly confidence in Him as Son of David,—such worship as is accepted by His own countrymen, as a whole; His outwardly harsh description of her as a heathen dog, to whom it was not meet to give the children's bread, she overcomes with the apt rejoinder that the little dogs (κυνάρια) under the table eat of the children's crumbs.⁴ Her victory is signal. Her faith, like that of the centurion in Mt 8, is attested and glorified (Mt 15²⁸), and the more than willing service of Christ is graciously ascribed by Him to herself. 'For this saying go thy way' (Mk 7²⁹). The reward is complete and immediate: 'Be it unto thee even as thou wilt'; 'her daughter was made whole from that very hour' (Mt 15²⁸).

4. The main lessons of this incident are obvious.

(1) What the Christian preacher or teacher is tempted to regard as the least—individuals or communities outside the pale—is sometimes that from which the richest harvest is reaped. (2) What men most fear in their life's experience—poverty, adversity, trouble—often serves as a nearer path to God, often reveals itself as a husk of evil enclosing and concealing a kernel of spiritual blessing. While sorrow does not always sanctify, but sometimes breeds moroseness or scepticism, still it is Divinely fitted to move us to go to Him who can sympathize and relieve. (3) Warm love towards those nearest and dear to us, although sometimes leading the heart away from the Creator to idolatry of the creature, is intended and fitted to open the eyes of the soul to the Fatherly mercy of God, to the brotherly sympathy and saving grace of Christ. Love within us discerns, believes in, realizes love outside of us in God, in Christ, and in fellow-men. (4) What men dislike most in a request is among the things that please God best—importunity. This lesson taught us by the record of the miracle is also impressed on us by two of Christ's parables—those of the Midnight Guest (Lk 11⁵) and of the Importunate Widow (18¹). It is the same lesson that was inculcated long before by the suggestive story of Jacob's wrestling, when the patriarch cried, 'I will not let thee go, except thou bless me' (Gn 32²⁶).

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.—The Feast of Tabernacles is mentioned in Jn 7^{2, 37}. It was the third and the most important of the Jewish festivals, requiring the presence of all males at Jerusalem. It began on the 15th of the seventh month, the month Tishri, and in the time of Christ continued for eight days.

In early times it was called the Feast of Ingathering (Ex 23¹⁶ 34²²), a name that testifies to its agricultural origin and character. In the time of the Judges it appears as a Canaanitish festival at Shechem (Jg 9²⁷), and as an Israelitish festival at Shiloh (21¹⁹, 1 S 1). It was the occasion that Solomon chose on which to dedicate his Temple (1 K 8²). The date given in this chapter, viz. the seventh month, does not correspond with the date of the completion of the Temple as given in 1 K 6³⁸, and may be a later insertion giving the date of the Feast as fixed later. From the original character of the Festival, it is obvious that no precise date could be fixed at first. The early legislation in Exodus requires its observance, but does not give its date or duration.

The Deuteronomic Code calls it the Feast of Tabernacles, and requires it to be kept seven days, but does not fix a date. It describes it as a day of joy for all, including servant, stranger, and widow (Dt 16^{13ff}). In accordance with the sweeping centralization of worship of YHWH, it must be kept at Jerusalem, and we may be sure that the change involved very radical alterations in its character.

The Book of Ezekiel significantly assigns it an exact date (45²⁵).

The Priests' Feast. In the time of the people celebrating it to dwell in booths to commemorate the fact that their fathers did not dwell in booths when they came out of Egypt. Sacrifices are offered on the eighth day is added. At the time of the Deuteronomic Code as the law of the land in post-exilic times, the Feast was kept with the greatest observance (Neh 8^{14ff}), and as an examination of the Law (Lev 23⁴⁰), and booths was required, this was done, and the practice had doubtless died out as a realized observance from the time of Deut., but was now restored with a special significance attached to it.

Later Jewish laws added to the regulations, and the Feast was kept at Jerusalem until the destruction of the Temple. Since the destruction of the Temple, one of the great feasts of the Jews, its observance has suffered changes to accord with modified conditions.

One rite which was observed in NT times was the drawing of water from Siloam, and the pouring of it out as a libation in the presence of the people. This Feast was regarded as the appropriate time for special prayer for abundant rain to ensure a plentiful harvest for the ensuing year. Many hold that this rite and custom furnished our Lord the occasion for using the figure of water for the thirsty, in His invitation on the great day of the Feast (Jn 7^{37, 38}). This may have been the case, even though that particular rite was regularly omitted on the eighth day; but the teaching of Jesus seems to be very different, at least from the original thought of the rite on this Feast of Ingathering. It may be only a natural coincidence that an important part of Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple on the occasion of this Feast was for answer to prayers for rain, as they should be made steadily thereafter.

TABLE, TABLET (Lk 1⁶⁸ πινακίδιον, 2 Co 3⁸ and He 9⁴ πλάξ).—The word πινακίδιον, not wholly unknown in classical Greek, although it is not commonly used, occurs but once in the NT and not at all in the Septuagint. When it is used in Lk 1⁶⁸ it denotes, in all probability, a wax-covered wooden writing-tablet. The ordinary LXX word for 'tablet' or 'table' is the word πλάξ, which is found also, as mentioned above, in the NT in two pas-ages. In Is 30⁸ we find πυξίον (ἐπὶ πυξίον), which is a writing-tablet of box-wood, and in Jer 17¹ we have σῆθος (ἐπὶ τοῦ σῆθους τῆς καρδίας), 'breast,' 'surface.' Both πυξίον and σῆθος, however, stand for the Heb. ṣēṭ, which is the ordinary word for 'tablet' or 'table,' and is used, e.g. in Ex 31¹⁸, in reference to the tables of the Law. ṣēṭ (Is 8³), rendered in the AV 'roll,' is in the RV more suitably rendered 'tablet.' Tablets were in almost universal use in the ancient world alike for purposes of correspondence and for literary purposes in general, and were formed of various materials, such as stone, clay, and wood, the wood being sometimes whitewashed, sometimes covered with wax. Bronze also was employed for tablets, at least in some of the countries about the Mediterranean, but seemingly only for such tablets as contained inscriptions of an official nature.

TABOR, MOUNT.—A notable landmark, of rare beauty and symmetry, six miles east of Nazareth, on the north-east arm of the plain of Esdraelon. In the works of Josephus and the Septuagint its designation is Itabyrion; in Polybius, Atabyrion; elsewhere, Thabor. The modern Arabic name—identical with the name of the Mount of Olives—is Jebel et-Tur. Mount Tabor stands apart, clear and distinct, from the rugged elevations grouped around it, except on its western side, where a low narrow ridge connects it with the hills of Galilee. Its apparent isolation, and its noble domelike contour, rising directly from the level of the Plain, make it the most conspicuous mountain in Lower Galilee. Its outline varies somewhat when viewed from different positions. As seen from the south and south-west, it resembles the segment of a sphere; from the north-west a truncated cone. Its true figure, according to W. M. Thomson, is an 'elongated oval, the greatest diameter running nearly east and west to the summit, not easily distinguishable from the levels near its base, is 1400 feet above the average elevation of the plain, and almost 1900 above sea level. Like the hills south and west of it, Tabor is a mass of cretaceous limestone, and the soil on its summit and sides is deep and rich. It is conspicuous among the mountains of this section for its wooded slopes and lofty ridges, as well as for its regular form and peculiar outline, and yet it is not 'densely wooded,' as some have described it. There are dense clumps of undergrowth in places, but the trees, which for the most part are scrub and evergreen oaks, resemble the growth of an orchard or park rather than of a forest. The summit of the mountain is a flattened platform, oval in outline, and thickly strewn along its outer edges with ruined walls and massive substructions of different periods and styles of architecture.

A tradition as old as the 4th cent. locates the scene of the Transfiguration on Mount Tabor, and until the middle of the 19th cent. this was the generally accepted place of pilgrimage and devotion in commemoration of this event. The earliest references in this connexion are by Cyril of Jerusalem, Jerome, and others (Cat. xii. 16; Epp. 44 and 86). In the 6th cent., three churches, corresponding to the three tabernacles of Peter (Mk 9³⁰), were built on its summit. Saewulf speaks of three monasteries (c. A.D. 1103), which, with later reconstructions by the Crusaders, were destroyed in the 13th century. There is no mention of Mount Tabor in the NT, and no intimation which in any way connects it with the scene of the great Epiphany. It is an unquestioned fact, based upon the statement given above, that Tabor at the date of this occurrence was not a suitable place for a quiet retreat, such as is implied in the narrative of the Evangelists. Apart from this objection, not in itself decisive, all the events immediately associated with it unquestionably took place on or about the southern slope of Mount Hermon (Mt 16¹⁷⁻²⁸, Mk 8²⁷⁻³⁸, Lk 9¹⁸⁻³⁷). Of the six days which followed the prophetic declaration of Jesus concerning His sufferings and death, there is no intimation that He is in keeping with the entire narrative to assume that they were spent in retirement and prayer. There is no intimation that He passed the momentous hours of this transition period in travel, or that He sought another place in the most densely populated part of Galilee for this crowning manifestation of His Divinity and Messiahship. On the contrary, it is asserted in Mk 9³⁰ that Jesus 'passed through Galilee' after He had healed the spirit-possessed child at the foot of the mountain. While, for the reasons given, the time-honoured tradition which connects the parable with the 'beautiful mountain' with the Galilee has been almost universally abandoned, nevertheless true that it was one of the most prominent objects of vision from the outskirts of the early home of Jesus, and its graceful outlines were often before Him, as He journeyed to and fro during the greater part of His public ministry.

TALENT.—See MONEY.

TALENTS (PARABLE OF).—In Mt 25¹⁴⁻³⁰ we have the story of a man who went away on a journey into a far country, and entrusted to one of his slaves five talents, to another two, and to another one. The story resembles so closely the parable of the Pounds in Lk 19¹¹⁻²⁷ that many scholars have considered them to be different versions of the same parable.

1. It is therefore necessary to begin with an investigation of the relations between the two parables. (a) In the parable of the Talents we have three slaves mentioned, who seem from the expression chosen—'his own slaves'—to stand in a relation of ownership to their master. He is, therefore, a nobleman, and distributes to his slaves, according to their ability, with his knowledge. To the most capable he gives five talents, to one not so capable he entrusts two, and to a third with less ability than either he entrusts one. He does not give them any instructions, since they ought to understand that such large sums of money are not intended to lie idle, but should be used in increasing their master's possessions. As soon as his master has departed, the first servant goes at once and trades with his lord's money. The master is absent for a long time, so that by legitimate trading the servant doubles the capital he has received. The second servant, of less capacity, exhibits an equal indifference to his lord's interests, and while his capital is smaller, he also succeeds in doubling it. The third servant, however, while he does not squander the money entrusted to him, buries it in the earth, and keeps it safe for his master's return. After a long period has elapsed, the master comes back and reckons with his servants. The first two slaves bring the capital they have received and that which they have made. In each case they use the same formula; each receives precisely the same commendation and reward. The third servant is conscious that he must find some excuse for his failure, and he throws the responsibility for it on the character of his master. He is a driving, avaricious man, determined to enrich himself even at the cost of dishonest reaping where others have sown. He was therefore afraid to trade with the money lest misfortune should overtake him, and he lose some or all of the capital entrusted to him. The master, without justifying himself from the harsh character of his master, points out that were the slave right in his estimate, he ought at least to have taken the trouble to see that the money was entrusted to the bankers. Lazy as he was, he ought not to have grudged the trouble involved in taking the talent and flinging it down at the banker's, so that the capital might at least have accumulated interest. He is accordingly deprived of his talent, and it is given to him who has ten. And, of course, he cannot enter into the joy of his lord, but from the brilliantly lit banquet-hall where the feast is held is thrust into the homeless darkness outside the mansion. He has proved himself a useless servant, and the penalty of uselessness is that his master has no further use for him.

(b) The parable of the Pounds (see art. POUND) has many significant points of contrast with that of the Talents, and the contrasts harmonize with the difference of the situation presupposed. It is in this case not a merchant, but a nobleman, and his object in going to a far country is to receive a kingdom. It is, in fact, held by many that in the parable of the Pounds we have two parables blended together, one of which described how a nobleman was opposed in his efforts to obtain a kingdom by his fellow-citizens, and how, having received the kingdom, he executed vengeance upon them. The other parable went on similar lines to the parable of the Talents, the differences being due either to a difference in the lesson Jesus intended to teach, or to variations of the story that grew up as it was told and retold in the Christian Church. It is, however, important in this connexion to observe that the whole parable is dominated by the idea that it is of a prince that the story speaks. In other words, the situation from which the story of the nobleman starts out is reflected in the details of the story of the servants, some of which, indeed, become intelligible only in the light of it. It is probable that the parable rests on a historical incident, and the view of most interpreters is that it is the journey of Archelaus to Rome to secure his kingdom and the conspiracy of the Jews to thwart him to which Jesus here alludes. The internal harmony of the story speaks strongly for its unity. In this case the nobleman calls his ten servants and gives each of them a pound. It would, of course, be possible to suppose that, while nobly born, he is in indigent circumstances, and has little money to spare; but this is probably not the real reason why the sum entrusted is so small. In the parable of the Talents we have apparently to do with a merchant whose object is to make money. He therefore entrusts his servants with a large capital in order that they may have ample opportunity for gaining large sums of money. Moreover, he has already tested their capacity in precisely this kind of work. That accounts for the difference in distribution, and for the absence of any command that they should trade with the money. They know their master and his objects too well to doubt what he means them to do. But naturally a nobleman is not a merchant, hence his servants are quite unpractised in commercial enterprise. If, however, he is to receive a kingdom, it will be necessary for him to have men who are skilled in financial administration. He therefore employs the interval of his absence in testing the business capacity of his slaves, in order that he may know whom to appoint to the various offices of State when he comes into his kingdom. Accordingly he assigns to each an equal sum of money, that all may have equal advantages and be differentiated according to their zeal and capacity. And inasmuch as his object is not to make money, for he will have ample opportunities of doing that when he receives his kingdom, he does not entrust them with a large but with a slender capital. Fidelity and ability can be tested by the use of slender as well as of large resources. When the servants come back, three of them are specially singled out for mention. There is no need to suppose that this is an incongruity in the parable. Ten slaves are, it is true, selected, because there are several offices in the State to be filled, whereas in the case of the merchant only three are chosen, because the capital is more profitably distributed into few than into many hands if the purpose is to make money. It would have been tedious, however, to mention each slave individually in the parable of the Pounds, hence three only are introduced as specimens of the rest. Besides, the parable is subordinated to the aim of teaching its lesson, and attention would have been distracted by the multiplicity of detail, even if ten different lessons could have been drawn from the different conduct of the ten slaves. The vital thing was to bring out the main lessons, and not confuse the broad issues by minute differentiations. The first slave tells the prince that his pound had won ten pounds. His zeal and enterprise win the prince's warm approval, and, since he has been faithful in a very little, he receives authority over ten cities. The second has been less successful, his pound has made only five. He receives a reward pro tanto to that of the other; that is, he is given five cities; but apparently the prince suspects that his relative failure is due not simply to his slighter capacity, but to his feeble devotion to his master's interests. Accordingly he meets with a chastisement and there is no word of approval, but only a curt indication of the office he is to hold in the government. When we compare the treatment of the two servants in the parable of the Talents, the difference becomes significant. In that parable the two slaves have unequal capacity, but they have exhibited the same zeal for their master, and achieved a similar result; that is, each has doubled his capital: accordingly they receive the same reward with the same warmth of praise. In the parable of the Pounds the slaves start from an equal position, but achieve an unequal result. They therefore receive an unequal reward, and the commendation given in the one case is withheld in the other. The case of the third servant is substantially the same in both, though with verbal and other differences. It is, of course, obvious that the slave who has received a pound will treat it otherwise than the slave who has received a talent: the large sum is naturally buried in the earth, the smaller one is carefully put by in a napkin. He, too, is deprived of his pound, and it is given, in spite of the protests of the bystanders, to the one who has ten. The parable concludes with the genuinely Oriental trait of the execution of the malcontents who sought to keep the prince out of his kingdom.

It will be clear, then, from this comparison, that the two parables presuppose different situations, each of which is harmoniously worked out in detail, and that each has different lessons to teach. There is, therefore, no substantial reason for assuming that the same original parable has developed into these two very different stories. It is difficult to believe that, had this been the case, the internal consistency of each should have been what it is.

The above conclusion is due to no harmonistic prejudices, for it may be freely granted that different versions of the same sayings in our G. . . . the Church, and have been incorporated in our G. . . . is a mere prejudice, on the other side, to imagine that similarities are always to be accounted for as variants of the same original, and we may well hold that Jesus deliberately developed a similar story along these two different lines, just because He thus brought out significantly different lessons. It is by the comparison of the two that the full meaning of each becomes clear. At most, it might be admitted that the two stories exercised a mutual influence on each other. Possibly the words, 'I will set thee over many things,' are an intrusion in the story of the Talents. Apparently the main portion of the master's capital has already been entrusted to his slaves (v. 13), so that there is an incongruity when the five talents are called 'few things,' and that over which the slave is to be set is called 'many things.' And the incongruity is even greater when the same promise is repeated to the second slave. The total amount is in each case merely a doubling of the original capital, and the contrast between half and the whole is not created. It is described as a contrast between few and many. Accordingly, it is not impossible that here the parable of the Pounds has influenced the report. There the contrast between the ten cities might well be described as a contrast between few and many. The application determined the form of the story, and that Jesus, or perhaps His reporter, is thinking of the contrast between earthly and heavenly reward. In that case the contrast between the many and the few is quite appropriate. The contrast, however, reminds us strongly of Mt 24:45-47 = Lk 12:42-48, the faithful servant whom his lord set over his household in his absence, and whom on his return he will set over all that he has. In the parable of the Pounds the description of the sum entrusted as very little is entirely appropriate.

The significance attached to the contrast relating to the first two servants has been pointed out in the course of the comparison. In the parable of the Talents the lesson is, that difference in endowment or opportunity involves no difference in the reward. It is assumed that such differences exist; all that is demanded is that the opportunities afforded should be faithfully employed. Where like faithfulness has been shown, like reward will be given, in spite of the disparity of opportunity and of result. The significance in the parable of the Pounds is different: each starts from the same level, but they reach a very different result. To what the difference is due is not stated, but to a certain extent, at any rate, it seems to be to the comparative slackness of the second servant. The lesson again is that devotion to the master's interests is what counts in the final reward. Another lesson, common to both parables, is that reward for work is more work, but work on a larger scale with ampler opportunities. In the case of the third servant, some of the lessons are quite clear. Slothfulness in the service of the king is the unpardonable sin. The failure to use the talent is punished by the withdrawal of the talent and dismissal from the master's service. What further lessons can be drawn out depends on the view we take of the servant's excuse. If it really is his belief, it suggests that unbelief may paralyze a man's action. The servant had constructed a caricature of his master, and feared that his grasping avarice might be disappointed if he lost part of the capital in trade; and therefore he felt that his duty was done if he returned it to his master as he received it. But the words of the master, 'Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee,' suggest rather that the fault did not lie with the wrong estimate that he had formed of his master's character, but with the laziness of his disposition. If he was unwilling to trade with it himself, he might at least have taken it to those who would have traded with it and returned it with interest. And, in any case, the slave had his orders, tacitly, it is true, in the parable of the Talents, but explicitly in the parable of the Pounds. The responsibility for misfortune was therefore removed from his shoulders; his duty was to obey orders.

2. The question remains as to the relation between these two parables and the Second Coming. Lk. introduces the parable of the Pounds with the statement that it was occasioned by the approach of Jesus to Jerusalem, and the expectation entertained by His followers that the Messianic Kingdom was immediately to be established. The parable of the Pounds fits that situation in so far as it indicates that the master is going on a distant journey and will be away for a long time, and that the kingdom is to be established only upon his return. The opposition of the Jews to the Messianic claims of Jesus, and the vengeance that is to come upon them at the Parousia, are also suggested. The eschatological colour is not so deep in the parable of the Talents, still it is present. It is, however, noteworthy that the main point of both parables is not the explanation of the delay in the Second Coming. This comes out more clearly in Mt 24⁴⁸⁻⁵¹. There the unfaithful servant abuses his trust precisely because his lord delays his coming, and there are other closely related sayings and parables which bear on the need for watchfulness and on the suddenness of the Second Coming. There is no need to suppose that the parables of the Pounds and the Talents are a development of Mk 13³⁴⁻³⁷, or to think that the experience of delay in the early Church created the parables. Even if it be true that Jesus expected to return within a generation, the evidence that He warned His disciples that His absence might be protracted is very strong. Lk. may have accurately stated the occasion of the parable of the Pounds, though there are other parables that would suit better the particular situation.

TALITHA CUMI (for Greek ταλιθα κουμι, which, in turn, is a transliteration of the Aram. ܬܠܝܬܐ ܕܩܘܡܝ 'Maiden, arise').—The words occur in Mk 5⁴¹, and were uttered by our Saviour over the daughter of the Jewish ruler, Jairus. The Aram. noun is ܬܠܐ = 'lamb.' This has its emphatic form, masc. ܬܠܐܝܬ, fem. ܬܠܐܝܬܐ; or, according to the analogy of Edessene Aram. preserved in the Peshitta, ܬܠܐܝܬܐ. It is interesting to note that in Palestinian Aram. the word has passed from meaning 'lamb' to being a term of endearment for a 'child.' We thus reproduce the words of Jesus accurately, if we render them, 'Lambkin, arise.' In the Gr. of Mk 5⁴¹ the Aram. words are translated τὸ κοράσιον, ἔγειρε. The 'articular nominative' is in NT used sixty times for the vocative case (Moulton, Gram. of NT Gr. p. 70). In Lk 8⁵⁴ we have ἡ παῖς, ἔγειρε.

The Gr. codices ABC read κούμ for κούμι. The latter is more accurate for Galilaean Aramaic. The former is due to the fact that in some Aram. dialects the final letter, though written, was not pronounced.

TAMAR.—An ancestress of Jesus (Mt 1⁵). Cf. art. RAHAB.

TARES (ζιζάνια, Mt 13^{25ff.}; only in this passage in NT and only in Gr. and Lat. authors influenced by the NT; Arab. zawādin ['nausea']; Syr. zizna; Lat. and scientific name, Lolium temulentum ['drunken']).—The bearded darnel, a weed much resembling wheat in its earlier stages, and growing mostly in grain fields. Its area of distribution is wide, embracing Europe, Western Asia, North Africa, India, and Japan. The kernel is black, bitter, and smaller than wheat. As a matter of fact it is poisonous, producing dizziness, sleepiness, nausea, diarrhoea, convulsions, gangrene, and sometimes death; this is due, however, not to the darnel itself, but to the ergot which usually infests it. It does not harm poultry, for which it is raised and sold in Oriental markets. Though very closely resembling wheat till the grain is headed out, it is easily distinguished 'even a child knows the difference' (Thomson). See Tristram (Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 486), and Thomson (LB, vol. ii. pp. 395-397) esp. for an explanation of the common Oriental but unscientific idea that darnel is degenerate wheat.

The parable of the Tares and its explanation are found only in Mt 13^{24-30, 36-43}. Our interpretation of it is affected by a few exegetical details. In v. 24 the aorist ἐσπορεύθη is significant (as also the aorists in 18²³ and 22², and the future in 25¹) if the use of this tense means that the Kingdom of heaven has 'been made like,' etc., by the course of events, that in the progress of the history it has become like. This ties the parable to the historical situation in which it was spoken, forbidding an exclusive reference to the future; while the fact that it is the Son of Man (=Messiah) who has sown the good seed (cf. v. 37) excludes all reference to the origin of evil in the world. The time of the parable is the time of the question of the servants (v. 27), when the tares had been already recognized as such (ἐφάνη, v. 26). As to v. 25, it is not at all necessary to think that this was a common method of revenge in Jesus' day and country. Thomson did not find a person in Palestine who had ever heard of sowing darnel maliciously. If new to Jesus' hearers, it would emphasize this quite possible malice as extraordinary, unheard-of, and outrageous. In v. 26 χόρτος means the grassy crop, including all that grew in the field, and was chosen just in order to embrace both tares and wheat. 'Made fruit' does not mean 'produced fruit,' but refers to the period of the formation of the kernel. 'Then, and not till then, appeared also the tares as tares. V. 27 and the following verse show that the idea of wheat degenerating into darnel is foreign to the parable; the servants think of mixed seed, the master of an independent sowing of darnel. Still less is there any idea in the parable that darnel may become wheat (B. Weiss. Wortbuch wheat (vv. 28, 29) is common to-day in Palestine as in America, and has been observed there by Stanley, Thomson, and Robertson Smith; but it must be done either before the milk stage of the wheat, i.e. before it is headed out (impossible in this case on account of the similarity between wheat and darnel in the earlier growth), or later when the kernel has hardened. The reason for this is that any disturbance of the wheat when 'in the milk' is equally fatal to it. So the master will not allow the servants to pull up the wheat, lest the servants pull out the roots of the wheat, interlaced as they are with the roots of the darnel. There is no question here of pulling up wheat for darnel by mistake. The darnel has already appeared as darnel, and just on that account comes the servants' question (v. 27). The question of the servants is then, from the point of view of the Galilaean agriculturists addressed, an intrinsically foolish one. No one who knew anything about farming would think of removing the darnel at that juncture. The master's reply does not seem strange to the crowd. It is reinforced by their knowledge and common sense. So Jesus gains the approval of the common man to back His teaching. The harvesters of v.³⁰ (cf. v.³⁰) are different from the servants, although this is merely implied here, and is first made perfectly clear only in the explanation. It is absolutely necessary to avoid the mingling of the kernels of the darnel and the wheat, lest the bread be poisoned. This may be effected (a) by weeding, (b) by carefully picking out the stalks of darnel one by one from the cut grain, probably the former here (cf. vv.^{30, 28} συλλέξατε, συλλέξωμεν), or (c) by sifting (after threshing) with a sieve so constructed as to allow the smaller darnel seeds to fall through, while retaining the larger wheat. All three methods are used in Palestine to-day. The weeding would trample down the grain, to be sure; but, as to-day in America, it would rise again enough to be cut by the sickle, always used in Palestine; cf. Dt 16⁹ 23²⁵, Mk 4²⁹, Rev 14¹⁴⁻¹⁹. It is probable that τὰ σκάνδαλα in v.⁴¹ is to be taken personally as in 16²⁸. The πάντα, not repeated before τοὺς ποιούντας, seems to include both under one vinculum; up to this time all, both tares and wheat, have been interpreted as persons (v.³⁸); and, finally, only persons are subject to the final judgment (v.⁴²).

The correct interpretation of this parable flows directly from its historical setting. It is a stage in the development of the Kingdom which allows itself to be described (ἀμειώθη, v.³⁴) by the story of the Tares. The men addressed, whether the Twelve or the multitudes, were Jews, with the common Jewish ideas of the Messianic Kingdom, and these ideas Jesus was engaged in modifying and spiritualizing. The Sower had been a parable of disillusionment, disclosing that the success of the Messianic Kingdom would not be so universal or immediate as they had fondly imagined, that its method was to be preaching and not cataclysm, that it depended for its spread on its reception in human hearts. The Tares is equally a parable of disillusionment. John the Baptist had at least, publicly and unambiguously, described the Messiah as coming for judgment (Mt 3¹⁰⁻¹²), and this was in perfect accord with the popular anticipation that the Messianic reign would begin with a judgment (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 163-168, 181). But Jesus had not shown any indication of being such a judge, nay He had taken quite another course (Mt 12²⁸⁻³¹), so that doubt came into the mind even of John the Baptist (11²⁷). For the inauguration of the Messianic reign with a judgment the disciples were eagerly looking. 'Or (cf. v.³¹) of the parables, or at least a shadow of it, the Pharisees had shown their true colours by charging that Jesus cast out demons by Beelzebub, the prince of the demons (12²²⁻³²). Jesus had indeed given them a so-called sign (v.³²), but no lightning stroke had come, and the disciples were disappointed. Their spirit, described in the question of v.²⁸, was later expressed by James and John (Lk 9⁵⁴⁻⁵⁵), 'Lord, wilt thou that we bid fire to come down from heaven and consume them?' In this parable Jesus teaches them that the judgment which they momentarily expected, the separation of the sons of the Kingdom and the sons of the Evil One, shall surely come, not now, but at the end of the age, and that meantime the wicked shall continually spring up among the righteous. This is to be seen, but it is to be borne with patience. The parable herefore discloses the fact that, instead of being at one stroke, the progress of the Kingdom is continually hindered and hampered (cf. τὰ σκάνδαλα, v.⁴¹), till the consummation of the age.

This interpretation leaves unanswered those questions about Church discipline which have made the parable an ecclesiastical battle-ground for centuries, because the parable has nothing to do with such controversies. (1) The field is not the Church, but the world of men (v.³⁸), the Messiah's world which He is sowing, just as it is in the Sower, the Mustard Seed, and the Leaven. (2) The Kingdom is not the Church, but the Messianic Kingdom of Jewish expectation. It is extremely doubtful if the Kingdom ever = the Church, certainly never the visible, organized Church. (3) There was no background for the idea of 'Church,' much less of Church discipline, in the disciples' minds at this time. It is only at Caesarea Philippi (16¹⁸) and afterwards (only 18¹⁷), that Jesus begins to introduce that idea in a very rudimentary way, by what Aramaic word we know not. (4) If the parable refers to Church discipline, it forbids it in toto, while the parable of the Net on a similar subject makes it impossible. It is idle to say that only the exclusion of masses, and not of the very bad, or inculcates a general attitude of mind towards Church discipline. (5) All men are to appear at the Judgment, not merely professing Christians (25³¹). The Apostles did not so understand the parable, for they insisted on Church discipline (1 Co 5²⁻¹³, 2 Co 2⁵⁻¹¹, 2 Th 3⁶⁻¹³, Rev 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶, 20²⁻³; cf. Mt 18¹⁵⁻²⁰). The history of the interpretation of the parable shows that such a use of it was first made by Origen, during his bishopric (248-258), in support of his theories of the Church. Tertullian, a half century earlier, may have held it. Origen (b. 182, d. 250) knew of this interpretation, but rejected it. Irenaeus knew not of it. Last and most important, such an interpretation ignores the historical situation, would have been a riddle to the disciples (cf. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching, p. 43), a prophecy with no root in the present; it takes no account of the emphasis in Christ's interpretation, and of His omission of the servants' question and the master's answer therein (cf. vv.^{28b-30a} with vv.³⁷⁻⁴³).

Two objections to the interpretation of the parable proposed in this article deserve attention. (1) In v.⁴¹, Jesus says that the angels shall gather out of His Kingdom all offences and them that do iniquity, whence it is inferred that the tares were in the Kingdom and not in the world. It is admitted that the word 'Kingdom' is used in this parable in a very loose sense. But this is the universal fact throughout the Synoptics, in proof of which the long controversies in the theological world about its meaning are conclusive (cf. Sanday in Hastings' DB II. 619 f.). The Kingdom of v.²⁴, which the course of events has already made like the field of the following narrative, is a most intangible and indefinable entity, a congeries of truths and principles characteristic of the coming age, which take shape in the world as they embody themselves in the lives of men. In the process of taking shape, the parable tells us, opposition has risen in the world of men which these truths and principles claim as their rightful sphere, and which men expect them to occupy. The sons of the Kingdom (v.³⁸) are those who receive these truths and embody them in their lives and conduct. These are sown in the wide field of the world of men, which the Messiah claims as rightfully His—His Kingdom (v.⁴¹), or, if preferred, which He calls His Kingdom at His coming to claim it as such (cf. Mt 16²⁸, 2 Ti 4¹, Rev 11¹⁵; cf. Mt 13⁴⁰). Finally, the Kingdom of their Father (v.⁴³, cf. Mt 26²⁹ 25^{34, 46}) is the consummated Kingdom of glory. (2) The related parable of the Net (13⁴⁷⁻⁵⁰) is supposed to refer to the discipline of the Church. This is, however, a mistake. (a) The Kingdom is not like the Net; but its principles and history, here especially its consummation, are illustrated by the following story (cf. Mk 4²⁶). (b) The explanation of vv.^{43, 50} lays not the slightest emphasis on anything except the consummation.

(c) Those who draw the net and those who separate the good and the bad are the very same persons (v.⁴⁸), i.e. the angels (v.⁴⁹). (d) The parable, if it relates to Church discipline, makes that absolutely impossible. (e) Its position at the end of the sermon of Mt 13, whether due to Jesus or Mt. or an editor, is an additional proof that its teaching is the same as that of the Tares: i.e. at the end of the age, and only then, shall the good and the bad be separated.

The historical criticism of G. Holtzmann and Pfeiffer here. Holtzmann and Pfeiffer worked over and added new traits to Mk 4²⁰ etc. B. Weiss says that Mt. and Mk. have worked over the same original parable, Mt., however, adding only vv. 25, 27, 28a. The also that of the Sower, is from the Evangelist's acknowledges an unrecognizable parable, which lies at the bottom of both Mt. and Mk. The parable, as it stands in Mt., is, however, the result of a working over of Mk.'s parable and the original parable, the companion of the Net, while the explanation is from the same editor's hand. Hilgenfeld and Holsten look on Mk.'s parable as a weakened form of the Tares, or a substitute for it. J. Weiss thinks that the idea of gradual development is not in this or its sister parables.

TAX (ἀπογράφω, RV 'enrol'), TAXING (ἀπογραφή, RV 'enrolment'), occur in the Gospels only in Lk 21-5. The words refer to the registration of the inhabitants of Palestine, with a view to levying taxation upon them for Imperial purposes. In the present instance this appears to have been done, not by the usual Roman method of enrolling persons under their place of residence, but by the Jewish method of enumerating them according to the cities and towns with which their families were originally connected. For the enrolment is mentioned in order to explain why Joseph and Mary came from Nazareth to Bethlehem at the time when Jesus was born. The passage would need no further comment, were it not for the historical difficulty that has been raised in connexion with the statement of v. 2 about Quirinius. There was a well-known enrolment (Ac 5³⁷) which took place in Judæa under his supervision, after the deposition of Archelaus in A.D. 6 (Jos. Ant. XVII. xiii. 5, XVIII. i. 1); but it has been seriously questioned whether he held an earlier governorship of Syria before the death of Herod the Great, and whether such an enrolment as St. Luke describes really took place at that time. With regard to the first point, it is now admitted that Quirinius probably held a post of responsibility in Syria before the governorship which began in A.D. 6 (see Schürer, HJP I. i. 353 ff., and art. QUIRINIUS). With regard to the second point, it has been shown by Sir Wm. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?) that, in Egypt at least, enrolments took place every fourteen years, that traces of the same arrangement have been found in other parts of the Empire, and that it may have extended to Palestine. The dates, when traced backwards, would include A.D. 20, A.D. 6, and B.C. 8. If an enrolment were actually due in Palestine in the last-named year, its completion may have been somewhat delayed by the disturbed state of Herod's kingdom, and may have fallen as late as B.C. 6, which is the probable date of the birth of Jesus.

TEACHER.—διδάσκαλος, though strictly meaning 'teacher,' is tr. 'master' by AV throughout the Gospels except in Jn 3². In two other passages besides this, viz. Mt 23⁵ and Jn 3¹⁰, RV gives the correct translation; and in every case where both AV and RV translate 'master,' RVm gives 'teacher' as an alternative reading. In Lk 2⁴⁶ διδάσκαλος is rendered 'doctor,' and in Jn 1³⁸ it is stated to be equivalent in meaning to 'Rabbi' (see artt. RABBI and MASTER).

This was the word by which our Lord was always addressed. Even His enemies admitted His claim to be a teacher. And not only was He recognized as a teacher, but the superiority of His teaching was, and is, universally acknowledged. His contemporaries felt His superiority and could not withstand the influence of His teaching, 'for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes' (Mt 7²⁹), and 'never man so spake' (Jn 7⁴⁶). In modern times, too, even those who cannot assent to some of the cardinal doctrines of His religion bow before the majesty of His speech, and proclaim Him the greatest moral and religious teacher the world has ever seen. See SUPREMACY.

Christ's great bequest to the world as a teacher is His revelation of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. This twofold message is peculiar to His gospel, and forms the keynote of His teaching. Christ the Teacher is indeed Christ the Revealer. He reveals the truths concerning man's true nature and destiny, and his relationship to God; and sheds an ineffable light upon all the dark and perplexing problems of life, death, and immortality.

But Christ was more than a mere teacher. His teaching is not only instructive: it is also creative. His words do not come with power to the intellect alone: they also appeal to the heart and influence the will. 'They are spirit and they are life' (Jn 6⁶³). They pass into the soul of man and there quicken and create new life. The discourse with Nicodemus (Jn 3) was intended to emphasize this very fact, that Jesus was not only a Teacher but a Saviour, and that the passport into the Kingdom of God was not mere knowledge, but a new life which demands new birth. Christ is not merely the truth: He is also the life. His truth liberates and saves; and those who receive it into their hearts and minds are thereby raised to a higher and a nobler life of righteousness and holiness, and are endued with power to become 'sons of God' (Jn 1¹²). His teaching still exercises this cleansing and life-giving power; and everywhere men in quest of God and salvation receive the assertion of St. Peter, 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life' (Jn 6⁶⁸).

DUGALD CLARK.

TEACHING OF JESUS.—The place and meaning of knowledge in the Christian religion constitute a question of supreme importance. It has been answered in differing ways in different times and places, and with far-reaching effects, often of the saddest character. Yet the answers have usually been of the nature of instinctive assumptions rather than results of deliberate investigation into the grave problem involved; indeed, it has seldom been realized that a problem existed. In our own day, however, the spread of the mode of thought known as Agnosticism—a term coined in protest against the confident attitude of gnosis or full knowledge—has helped to bring home the fact and importance of the nature of the problem underlying the various bodies of 'doctrine' claiming the authority of Christ. In so stating the case, our thoughts travel back to the final form of the question,* which must control all others, viz., What sort of 'knowledge' did Jesus Himself offer to men, and how is it related to human knowledge in general and to man's religious consciousness as such? Some suggestions towards a true answer may be gained from a study of the terms found in our Gospels as used in this connexion, such as 'know,' 'teach,' 'teaching,' 'teacher,' 'mystery.' of their originals, Aramaic and Greek. Here, on the whole, it seems needless to distinguish between Christ's own usage and that of the Evangelists themselves, for these coincide generally. The few exceptions in the Synoptics can be noted incidentally, while the special Johannean usage is treated by itself.

* In this connexion Latham's Pastor Pastorum, chs. i. and iii., offers certain regulative ideas of high value.

The characteristic Greek term γνῶσις occurs in our Gospels only in Lk 17⁷ 'knowledge of salvation,' and 11⁵² 'the key of knowledge' (see below); and the intellectual interest connoted by it, as also by 'wisdom' (σοφία) and 'the Wise man,' among the Greeks, is here quite absent (ἐπιστήμη does not occur at all). All this points to the concrete, personal, or experimental nature of the knowledge implied in the religion of the Gospels, as of the OT,—a fact which comes out also in the contexts in which 'know' occurs.

The OT everywhere assumes that there is such a thing as the knowledge of God, but it is never speculative, and it is never achieved by man. God is known because He makes Himself known, and He makes Himself known in His character. Hence the knowledge of God is in the OT = true religion; and as it is of God's grace that He appears from the beginning speaking, commanding, active, so as to be known for what He is, so the reception of the knowledge of God is ethically conditioned. . . . It is in this sense of acquaintance with God's character, and of the knowledge of His will, that a universal knowledge of God is made possible. . . . Side by side with this, the OT makes room for any . . . This is especially brought out in . . . (DB iii. 8f.).

The distinction between gradual experimental recognition (γινώσκειν, ἐπιγινώσκειν) and the actual possession of knowledge (εἰδέναι) is well preserved; e.g. in Jn 14⁷ 'If ye had come to recognize me (in my true character), ye would have had . . . of my Father also.' Corresponding to the quality of the knowledge acquired by growing personal acquaintance is the nature of the 'teaching'.

by the contexts in which this term and its verb stand; e.g. Mt 7²⁸ 'The crowds were exceedingly astonished at His teaching: for He was teaching them as having authority, and not as the scribes' (after Sermon on the Mount). Finally, the fact that Jesus was habitually addressed as 'Rabbi,' and so treated, suggests that He dealt with the same subject-matter as the official 'teachers' of the Jewish Law (Tôrâh), viz. the sort of conduct . . . the God of Israel (cf. Mt 5¹⁷⁻²⁰), though . . . in going behind the act to the motive, and in setting this in the light of the Father's character. There was, we may be sure, a certain fitness in the plausible compliment, as coming even from Pharisaic lips, 'Rabbi, . . . of a truth thou teachest the way of God' (Mk 12¹⁴ ||, cf. 12³²). We do well, then, to approach the meaning of 'knowledge' and 'teaching' in the Gospels through the senses which these terms bore in contemporary Judaism. Philo describes Jews as 'taught . . . even long before the sacred laws and also the unwritten usages, to recognize as one God the Father and Creator of the world' (Legatio ad Gaium, 16). Here we have a starting-point for consideration of the knowledge Jesus offered to impart, as regards its substance.

i. THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.—Jesus' own knowledge was rooted in the essential teaching of the OT, interpreted by a unique religious experience, which even in childhood enabled Him to make marvellous use of its contents (Lk 2⁴⁶), and which developed as a 'wisdom' that matured with His years (v. 52). The determinative element in it was a consciousness of the God of Israel as His Father in a peculiarly intimate personal sense. Through this the OT revelation, as written and as currently taught, was gradually filtered, until only those elements and interpretations remained effective in His mind and speech which were valid in the light of the idea of the Holy Father and His practical relations with men. Thus the 'sacred laws' of Mosaism were transmuted into 'the teaching' of Jesus, the Messiah, with its new spirit and fresh emphasis. But the lines of the new were continuous with the old as regards the primarily practical reference of the new teaching, which superseded that of the scribes of the Pharisaic school, then dominant (Mk 1^{22, 27} 2^{16, 18}). Thus the . . . which Jesus aimed at imparting in His 'teaching' was analogous in scope to that recognized as such in current Palestinian Judaism, and bore essentially on true piety conceived as doing 'the will of God' (Mk 3³⁵). But the form of its pre-entation, and much of its resulting spirit, were largely determined by two features peculiar to Jesus as a teacher: (α) a note of fresh, personal authority, in contrast to the derivative authority claimed by the scribes (Mk 1²²); (β) constant reference to 'the kingdom of heaven,' the true Theocracy for which Israel had long been waiting and watching, in connexion with Messiah, its Divinely commissioned Inaugurator. John the Baptist had spoken of such a Theocracy as imminent. Yet so little had he . . . a spiritual experience proper to it in its fulness, that Jesus, even in the act of recognizing John's supremacy in the order of prophets, can declare that 'He that is but little in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Mt 11¹¹, Lk 7²⁸). The Messianic Kingdom, then, is bound up in a unique manner with Jesus Himself as its Announcer (κηρύσσων) and Legislator (διδάσκων)—the two aspects in which He conveys 'knowledge' of it, and so of religion as it is known to the Gospels.

Wellhausen, indeed, roundly denies this (Die Entstehung des ersten Evangeliums, 1905, 106ff.): 'From the Kingdom, as present, Jesus as already . . . and present Messiah is . . . Himself have spoken of it . . . only of the future Kingdom; but . . . is to bring it. . . . It is thought that the declaration of this future Kingdom was actually the proper content of His preaching. Far from this, it recedes completely into the background in Mark. In the Galilean period He does not as a rule preach at all, but He teaches: and indeed not about the Kingdom of God (which does not occur at all, save in the addition 4⁹⁰⁻⁹²), but, in unconstrained succession, touching this and that matter which comes in His way; obvious truths, with reference to the needs of a general public, which is misled by its spiritual leaders' (p. 106). As regards the Kingdom of God, the idea of which He could assume as present to His hearers' minds, 'He emphasized . . .'

at hand, repent! Like Amos before Him, and like John the Baptist, He . . . illusion of the Jews, as though to . . . and to bring the fulfilment of the . . . goes on to question whether the phrase 'the gospel' was ever found on Jesus' own lips, since even in Mark 'the gospel is tantamount to Christianity,' i.e. what the Church came to understand as the purport of its Master's life and death. Here Wellh. seems to take 'gospel' in too rigid and uniform a sense, rather than as 'good tidings' which . . . In any case, it is one thing to claim . . . have made Jesus use a phrase proper to that age, not His (yet Is 61¹, in view of Mt 11¹⁰, Lk 7¹⁶ at 11¹, makes His use of the verb 'preach good news' εὐαγγελίζεσθαι as unlikely, who never uses the substantive εὐαγγέλιον, far from unlikely.) It is quite another to have disproved the historic truth of the idea thereby conveyed, viz. that Jesus' own announcement of the Kingdom as imminent was in a different key from John the Baptist's. Both, no doubt, were . . . besetting such an expectation; but . . . be done, how different the motives . . . how different the spirit of the two messages! (see Mk 23³⁷, Mt 11¹⁰, Lk 7¹⁶⁻³⁰). In the one the note of severity was uppermost, in the other that of gladness. Surely the very point of the striking saying in Mt 11¹¹, Lk 7²⁸ is that the spirit of John's message was defective, as we feel it to be, in its negative and threatening tone, as compared with the positive and winning note of benediction and love added by Jesus, in the light of God's true attitude to men—a revelation which by no means took from the force of the summons to repentance for sins, now seen more clearly in the purer light. So we read in Mk 6¹², even after much of the Galilean teaching was already given, that the Apostles 'went out and preached that men should repent' (Wellh. l.c. p. 112, questions even whether there were any 'apostles' during Jesus' lifetime). The spirit of the above distinction is finely given by Longfellow's lines (cited in Sir A. F. Hort's Com. on Mk 11⁵):

* This didache consisted of didaskaliai or definite 'instructions' as to conduct, cf. Mk 7⁷, Mt 15⁹ 'teaching for instructions human injunctions' (διδασκαλίας ἀνθρώπων, after Is 29¹³).

'A voice by Jordan's shore,
A summons stern and clear:
Repent! be just, and sin no more!
God's judgment draweth near!

A voice by Galilee,
A holier voice I hear:
Love God, thy neighbour love! for see God's mercy draweth near.'

The idea of the Kingdom necessarily determines the sense and emphasis given to 'repentance': its relation to it; and as 'repentance' meant something very different from what it did on John's lips, so the respective teaching as to 'the Kingdom'.

As to the 'future' of 'the Kingdom', surely on Jesus' idea of the essentially 'present' Kingdom this distinction loses its full force; where the righteousness of the Kingdom is, there is the Kingdom already in a real sense.

As 'preaching' the Kingdom, He declares the fact of its near advent, so 'giving knowledge of salvation' as yet nearer than John's preaching was able to announce (Lk 17⁷). Reception of such knowledge meant repentance for sins as unfitting the sinner for membership in the Kingdom soon to 'appear,' and confidence in the forgiveness which was part of the expected Messianic blessings. Then as 'teaching,' He gave knowledge of the laws and principles of the coming era of the Father's realized sovereignty. Relying on this teaching and obeying its precepts, the man who accepted the 'preaching' of the Kingdom as at hand was assured of participation therein when it arrived. Of such 'teaching' the Sermon on the Mount is the summarized exposition (Mt 7²⁸). It represents 'the key of knowledge to the Kingdom of God,' as it should be done in the Theocracy or Kingdom, which the official guardians of the Law had removed out of men's reach by their traditions (Lk 11⁵²). But the same knowledge was also given less fully and formally, in occasional and piecemeal fashion, in the 'teaching' Jesus was wont in His earlier ministry to give at the Sabbath services in synagogues of Galilee, in close connexion with the reading of the Law and its regular exposition (Mk 1²¹ 6², Lk 4¹⁵; cf. v. 43 for 'preaching' also), as well as on other and less formal occasions. Its main subject would seem to have been the nature of the Kingdom and the character required in its members (Sanday), treated in the light of the Fatherhood of God.

At first, moreover, His own Person formed no part of His explicit teaching. Apparently the practical recognition of His plenary authority as Revealer of the Kingdom and the truths constitutive of it, enforced by the object-lesson of His deeds (Lk 10²³, 24) of beneficent authority in the healing of the body and soul (see Mk 2⁵⁻¹²), was what Jesus had most at heart in the earlier stage of His ministry at least. What went beyond this was allusive and suggestive rather than dogmatic, being contained in the title by which, in preference to all others, He chose from first to last to refer to Himself and His ways—'the Son of Man.' The sense which He gave to it, as distinct from the associations currently attaching to it in various circles of Judaism, seems to be chiefly 'brotherhood with toiling and struggling humanity, which He who most thoroughly accepted its conditions was fittest also to save' (Sanday). It was only as criticism and challenge forced Him to fall back upon His ultimate and inner credentials, that He referred explicitly to His mysteriously unique experience of Sonship to the Father as the ground of the revelation He imparted in His teaching—particularly as to the Divine Fatherhood which lay at the heart of that teaching (Mt 11^{26ff.}, Lk 20²¹⁻²⁴).

In this we get some insight into one of the most significant features of Christ's teaching, viz. His pedagogic method, which is that religious knowledge is not to be 'taught' or taught as if it were all on one level, or that it were of little moment how it is imparted and acquired. In other words, nothing is more characteristic of 'truth as it is in Jesus' than the psychological conditions under which it should be learned, by progressive assimilation, as the learner is able to bear it. His was the experimental method of religious knowledge to a degree surpassing all other teachers. It comes out in several connexions,* of which His use of parables deserves special notice.

As regards Jesus' use of the parable proper, as distinct from mere figurative maxims or illustrations, it is often strangely overlooked that the Gospels do not represent it as a form of communicating truth by Jesus from the first. It is only very late in His ministry, when already He had proved the general unreceptiveness of His hearers and the positive hostility of their official teachers. This appears not only from the first occasion on which, in the relatively historical order preserved in Mk., Jesus is said to have 'taught in parables' (Mk 4², Mt 13³; Mk 3²³, Lk 5³⁶ 6³⁹ do not prove the contrary), but also from the fact that His disciples ask Him as to the meaning of the first recorded parable, plain as its meaning is to us (Mk 4¹⁰⁻¹³). Further, that meaning is one which implies a disappointing experience of various types of hearer,—the good being in the minority,—such as suits a comparatively prolonged period of experiment, during which Jesus had proved how unprepared the majority of His countrymen were to embrace the Kingdom as He meant it. In fact the psychological moment at which He began His full parabolic method on principle, was that depicted in Mark's narrative (cf. Latham, op. cit. p. 324). Already the Scribes, both local (2⁶⁻¹⁶) and from the religious centre in Jerusalem (3²²), the Pharisees generally (2¹⁸, 24 3⁶), and even the disciples of John—presumably a specially prepared class,—had indicated pretty clearly that their attitude was likely to be unreceptive. Thus we read in Mk 3⁷ of His withdrawing from before Pharisaic hostility—which already felt that He must be got rid of at any cost (v. 6)—with His circle of disciples, from the synagogue and the city, where friction was likely, to the seashore, there to continue His effort to win the unresponsive hearts of the common people. Then follows the selection of the Twelve from the larger body of disciples habitually about Him, with a view to their acting as 'apostles' or missionaries, to assist in what was opening out before Him as a longer and more arduous ministry than had, perhaps, at first seemed needful. That in itself is significant; and its significance is enhanced by the scene which precedes the first parables, when He dwells on the spiritual ties binding Him to the disciples, in contrast even to His own blood relations. All this implies that Jesus fell back, as it were, upon the parabolic teaching which we regard as so beautifully characteristic of Him, largely under the necessity of adjusting the form of His teaching, for deep spiritual reasons, to the disappointing unreceptivity of His hearers generally. Nor was the state of His disciples much better in point of intelligence, though their practical self-committal to Him as their trusted authority and teacher implied a moral affinity of great latent possibility for future insight and knowledge. This comes out most clearly in Mark's narrative, which, though the chapter on the beginnings of parabolic teaching preserves the original historic atmosphere to a degree far surpassing what the other Gospels owe to their later perspective, paragon regards the intelligence at that time of Jesus' personal disciples (see Mk 4¹³, omitted by Mt. and Lk.), have been able to achieve.

Observe the following, compared with the parallel passages in Mt. and Lk.: 'He proceeded to teach them in parables many things, and to say to them in his teaching, Listen (Mk 4²) . . . He who has ears to listen, let him listen (v. 9). . . And he went on to say to them * (that the light of the lamp is meant to be seen, and so), there is nothing hidden except with a view to its being ultimately made manifest. . . If any one hath ears to listen, let him listen (vv. 21-23). And he went on to say to them, See to it what ye hear (= understand, cf. Lk 8¹⁸ 'how ye hear'). According to the capacity of the measure ye use, it shall be meted out to you, and with interest (ὑπερβαλλόντως, cf. Mt 13¹² 25²⁹ καὶ περισσεύουσιν, after the next clause); for he who hath (i.e. by receptiveness), there shall be given to him, and he who hath not (by unrecaptiveness), even that which he has. Cf. Lk 8¹⁸ 'what he supposes he has' (Mk 4²⁴ 25). Then, after two more parables,† we read: 'And with such parables, and many of them, he used to speak to them the word just as they were able to listen; but without parable used he not to speak to them, whilst privately to his own disciples he used to resolve (the meaning of) all things' (v. 33^f).

Running throughout the whole account in Mk. is a single coherent conception of the function of parable as a vehicle of religious knowledge, viz. that it is a sort of veil spread over the face of truth, in order that only those who are morally ready to act aright in regard to it shall perceive its Divine lineaments. This implies (a) that it is bad for a man to see the truth in the wrong, i.e. unsympathetic, mood, and (b) that it is the special nature of spiritual or religious knowledge to be morally conditioned in its reception. Accordingly it can be received, in the sense alone valued by Jesus, only gradually, by successive acts of use or vital obedience. But the teacher's ulterior object in parable, as in plainer modes of speech (as the context of the simile of casting pearls before swine helps to make clear, Mt 7⁶), was that as many, not as few, as possible of the average hearers addressed might, by seeking and its discipline, come to find aright, instead of resting in imaginary possession of a truth which was really error.‡ The treasure touching the Kingdom could not be real spiritual quest; it was a 'secret,' to be shared in only by awakened curiosity and desire. What is received too easily is held loosely; or rather, in the case of spiritual truth, it is not received at all, when taken passively and not by the activity that is also self-committal; or, again, it is received in so crude a sense—what comes from without being overlaid or distorted by what already exists within—that it had better not be received at all in this fashion. The remedy is that the reception should be gradual, through a process of piecemeal and even painful adjustment of the mind and will of the hearer to the essential form of the truth enshrined in the message or teaching. The truth so won becomes the basis of fresh spiritual quest of the same kind. In this beneficent yet deeply serious sense Jesus 'was wont to speak the word' to men 'just as they were able to listen to it.'

Such seems the philosophy of Christ's parabolic teaching, when we regard the trend of this fundamental section and the general effect of His teaching

ing in the Gospels. But what are we to make of the motive assigned to it in Mk 4¹² 'That seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest haply they should turn again and it should be forgiven them'? Can we believe that in these words—if read in the sense of a 'judicial blinding'—we have a quotation from Jesus' lips uncoloured by the tradition lying between Him and the Gospel records? Hardly. The saying is an isolated one in the Synoptics. But a like use of the passage in Isaiah (6⁹) here drawn upon, occurs in Ac 28²⁵⁻²⁷, in an address to leading Roman Jews, and in Jn 12³⁹⁻⁴⁰, which contains the reflexions of the Evangelist himself. Here we seem to have the clue to the 'paradox' as some would call it, 'incompatibility' as it will seem to others. That is, Jesus' own use of Isaiah's language underwent development in the Church's tradition, being first applied to specific Jewish unbelief (as in Ac 28), and then hardened in its spirit * (as in Jn.). The conclusive thing appears to be this. Not only are the words virtually quoted from Is 6⁹, but they are not given verbatim in the other Synoptics. Then it is only a natural development of the reflexions in Jn. that the sense of judicial blindness is given to them at all, by a deliberate change of form, which attributes the blindness to the hearers' own hardness of heart, and dulling of hearing to direct Divine action. It seems natural, then, to assume that Jesus simply made an allusive use of the phraseology of Is 6⁹, so far as it lent itself to His purpose; and that in the Church's tradition this reference was taken up, fully applied, and even, as in Jn 12⁴⁰, emphasized in an anti-Jewish direction. Here Mk. shows us the first stage in the tradition, at which the regret with which Jesus contemplates the inevitable effect of the law that unrecaptiveness tends to become a fixed habit, is apparent in the quick transition to 'lest haply they should turn back and forgiveness should be theirs' (ἀφεθῇ αὐτοῖς, an adaptation of Isaiah's ἰδοὺ αὐτοῖς on Jahweh's behalf). Against this the tolle 'with a view to' (ὅνα) cannot weigh decisively, since its exact degree of purposiveness is not always the same. Here it may well be no more than a recognition of the providential nature of the law of moral continuity, as well as of those inevitable effects which Jesus knew to be involved in His deliberate resort to parabolic teaching,† in place of plaine teaching, touching the Kingdom—its inner spiritual operation, and its fortunes, especially in the near future. Further, the less severe reading seems required by what follows in Mk 4²¹⁻²³, viz. that the object of the light's coming is to be seen; and any temporary 'covering' or 'hiding' is all meant to be subservient to this. All is simply adjusted to existing ability to hear (Mk 4²³).

Why then, it may be asked, resort to this obscurer form of instruction? Because He was now passing on to a new side or aspect of His teaching. Henceforth the more unambiguous form of declaration would have met immediately with a summary rejection‡ so decisive as to jeopard-

* Cf. Dr. Hastings' DB ii. 618) does not allow of the 'hardening' of spirit Jesus' own reference to the 'insensibility' involved in Isaiah, and the less sympathetic use of the words in John. Hence he speaks of their 'strange severity' in Mark's context, 'which would be mitigated if they could be put later in the ministry, where they occur in St. John.' We have argued that even in Mk. they do belong to a relatively late stage in the ministry; but we would give them a gentler sense on Jesus' own lips, viz. one of sadness, not of severity.

† Which is, as Matthew Henry puts it, a 'shell that keeps good fruit for the diligent, but keeps it from the slothful'; cf. also Bruce, l.c. pp. 21-23.

‡ The lessons as to the slow and gradual progress of the Kingdom, as bound up with its spirituality, 'were so strange to the Jews . . . that He had to adopt a method of instruction that might conciliate and provoke reflection, and gradually open their minds for new truth' (Salmond on Mk 4¹²).

* i.e. to the disciples, to whom He is explaining His new method.

† Probably not spoken on the same occasion, but added by the Evangelist (cf. the teaching tradition), by affinity of theme; and this addition leads up naturally to the use of 'to them' in v. 33=to the people.

ize the very completion of His own ministry and cut short the training of His disciples, the actual nucleus of the coming Kingdom, on whom its future realization depended. The popular receptivity towards such a Kingdom, as Jesus had in mind, one radically distinct from national and hedonistic,—had already been tested by clear enunciation of its ethical nature and requirements; and but few had definitely responded. That was the daunting experience which had been His for some months at least, months of such ethical intensity for all within range of His influence as to mean more than as many years of the ordinary testing of life. Already He saw that His lot was to be akin to that of the prophet of old, who achieved their mission only after and through a period of general rejection, during which disciples learned their message vitally, and then helped in the conversion of Israel. But while this was the case on the whole, there were still individuals to be gained over one by one to the 'little flock' of His disciples, if only they had time to ponder the new ideal of the Kingdom—as coming only gradually, from a very small nucleus (Mk 4²⁰⁻³²). Elect souls could do so most profitably under the very stimulus of curiosity aroused by the parabolic or suggestive method, regarded on its positive side; while for the impatient mass it had only its negative function, veiling the full truth from the profane gaze of those insensible as swine to the real charm of pearls—and apt, when disappointed, to turn like swine and rend the bearer of jewels. Hence Jesus spoke His parables publicly, to call such prepared or preparing souls, as well as to instruct His own inner circle in the deeper or more trying aspects of the Kingdom they had already in principle and at heart received. For this seems the point of Mark's 'To you the secret* (mystery) hath been given, touching the kingdom of God' (v. 11). Disciples as such had the qualifying 'secret' in their souls, the key to further understanding in the detailed knowledge of the Kingdom. It is rather this latter that Mt. and Lk. have in mind in writing (according to the form of the saying most familiar to them), 'to you it hath been given to recognize the secrets (mysteries) of the kingdom.' This presents a later turn given to the truth as found in Mk., the truth of what follows at once in Mt 13¹² 'he that hath, to him shall be given,' etc. Here the possession that is the basis for further additions, must be primarily the recognition of the Kingdom in principle. When this fundamental issue, as conditioned by the original historic situation, faded more and more into the background, and various detailed aspects of the Kingdom came practically to the front in the Church's experience, it was natural that the saying should be coloured thereby and its shade of meaning changed. Further, we can see how the later form would lend itself to the growing reflective tendency which showed itself in a mode of thought alike unbiblical in spirit, but akin to Greek intellectualism or one-sided reliance on 'knowledge' (gnosis) as such. Yet rightly understood, i.e. in relation to the whole genius of Christ's 'teaching' in the Synoptic Gospels at least,† not even the later form warrants the idea that 'Gnostic' or metaphysical doctrines are here meant in any degree. The 'secrets' in question are just those detailed aspects of the Kingdom and its development, as parts of the Divine counsels, which form the essence of the parables which follow in this connexion and elsewhere. They are of the nature of such as verify themselves in the loyal life, rather than remain 'mysteries of faith' in the later sense of these words.

This is not the place for full discussion of the limits of knowledge, even religious knowledge in a sense, attaching to the gospel in the mind of Jesus Himself. Such limits clearly exist as regards 'the times and seasons' of the Kingdom's temporal development. This is manifest in the saying in Mk 13³² 'But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father' (alone). It is also implied in the parable of the Seed Growing Unobserved (Mk 4²⁶⁻²⁹), if the Sower who 'himself knows not how' the seed grows, be none other than Christ, as seems to be the case,—a fact which at once explains the omission of the parable by Mt. and Luke. Such ignorance only confirms our general view as to the strictly spiritual character of the 'knowledge' conveyed by Jesus in His 'teaching,'—a statement of knowledge referred to in the high 'revelation' of Him to receptive souls. See, Lk 11²⁵⁻²⁷.

ii. THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—So far we have had in view 'knowledge' and the 'teaching' of it in the Synoptic Gospels only. But the Fourth Gospel also, though with characteristic differences as to form. There, while the special word for 'knowledge' (γνῶσις) does not occur, the corresponding verb, with its suggestions of progressive insight gained by moral affinity, is very frequent (e.g. 10³⁸ 'recognize and go on recognizing,' 13⁷ 'thou dost not know now, but thou shalt come to recognize hereafter,' cf. 14⁷). The knowledge in view is still such as can be verified by spiritual experience, and not such as must necessarily remain mere objective theory or 'dogma' in the later sense.

A typical passage is 31⁻³², where, however, it is impossible to say exactly how much is due, in form at least, to the Evangelist, and how much to Him of whom he writes. At 1¹⁶ even the form ceases to be historic, and passes into reflection on the principles involved in what precedes. But what underlies the whole is the idea of religious experience as conditioning insight into such knowledge as the new Rabbi had to convey (32nd). Its subject-matter is the 'Kingdom of God,' the nature of which dawns on a man's inner eye like the light of a fresh world of experience, into which he comes as by a new birth. This correlation of 'light' and 'life' implies that the knowledge in question is not abstract or impersonal, but vital and personal, such as can best be learned from and through a person, as it animates and gives him his specific character and attitude to life. Thus the 'life' in Jesus Himself was the 'light.' He bore about in His personal walk among men. This is why 'belief in' Jesus as a person and recognition of the 'light' of His message are so closely related, indeed practically identified, in the Fourth Gospel in particular. Both attitudes of soul are conditioned by a man's will, and this again by his underlying character—so far as developed—and the sympathetic affinities proper thereto. 'For everyone that doeth ill hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, lest his works should be reproved. But he that doeth the truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, that they have been wrought in God' (3²⁰). Here we get the

* The 'secret' or 'mystery' is the true nature of the Kingdom itself, as being revealed in Himself and His ministry of deed and word (corresponding to 'seeing' and 'hearing' in the next verse). This fundamental 'secret' made its possessor a 'disciple' (cf. Mt 13³² 'every scribe made a disciple to [or 'by'] the kingdom of heaven' καθηγουμένης τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ οὐρανοῦ), corresponding to the 'initiated' in the Greek and other Mysteries. Those who shared it not were 'those outside,' who move wholly in the sphere of 'parable,' the outer simile never opening and revealing the inner truth or reality thus kept 'secret.'

† Confirmed also by the character of 'the Teaching of the Lord through the Twelve Apostles' as it was understood in the circle represented by the Didache,—a fact the more striking if, as seems probable, this compilation of traditional material represents in the main Syrian Christianity (c. 75-100 A.D.), the source also of our Synoptic tradition.

Johannine terms in their most essential meaning, as defined by the context. Christ's manifestation of the knowledge of God (on which the Kingdom depends) as His essential life, is the 'truth' about God and man in their mutual relations,—a truth, therefore, practical in its scope,—and so the 'light' of men as regards their special concern, the art of life. 'He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life' (8¹²). 'My teaching is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself' (7¹⁶).

This agrees essentially with the Synoptic teaching as to 'righteousness' and its conditions;* it even coincides in form as regards the metaphor of 'light' for man's footsteps in the journey of life (Mt 6²³, Lk 11³⁵, Jn 8¹²), and the vision or blindness of men as determined by their prior moral affinities (Mt 15¹⁴ 23¹⁶⁻²⁶, Lk 4¹⁸ 6³⁹). What is peculiar to the Johannine presentation is the use of 'truth' where the Synoptic word is 'righteousness.' But OT usage† helps us to see their equivalence in idea, and that 'truth' is here at bottom no more speculative or dogmatic than 'righteousness.' It means 'the way of God in truth' (Mt 22⁹, Lk 20²¹, cf. 16¹¹); and the Fourth Evangelist's choice of the more intellectual synonym is probably due to a habit which he had adopted in bringing the message home to men of Greek rather than Jewish training. But the practical and vital sense in which the term is used appears, for instance, in the central saying: 'I am the way, the truth, and the life. No man cometh to the Father but by me' (Jn 14⁶). When, too, Jesus goes on with, 'If you had come to recognize me (for what I am), of my Father also you would have had knowledge' (ἐὶς ἐγνώκετε . . . ὅτι ἡθετε), He does not pass into another sphere than that of spiritual quality and power, experimentally perceived: 'He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.' The very fact that this is said in surprised reply to Philip's request, 'Show us the Father,' proves that distinct and explicit teaching as to the Father in Himself had formed no part of the teaching which had all been implicit in the Father's words, or filial mien with which He had spoken and acted for God.‡ How far any sayings recorded in the great discourse and chapters which follow, go beyond such manifested spiritual unity, into the realm of metaphysics, is still an open question among scholars. Yet it should be remembered that the thought moves ever on the devotional rather than the dogmatic level of thought, especially in the prayer in ch. 17; and that to all believers is open a like oneness to that between Jesus and His Father (ὡς ὅσον ἐν καθὼς ἡμεῖς ἐν, 17²²), though this comes to others through relation to Himself (ἐγὼ ἐν αὐτοῖς καὶ αὐτὸς ἐν ἐμοί, v. 28). In any case the unity is that of Love made perfect (vv. 28, 26), and rests on recognition of the Father's name, gained by recognition of Jesus as sent of the Father (v. 29¹).

In confirmation of this view, namely, that Jesus' teaching, even in the Johannine Gospel, moved essentially in the region of knowledge accessible to spiritual perception acting on kindred facts of experience, analogously to ordinary sense perception, we have the idea of Jesus as 'the true and faithful witness' (Rev 1⁵ 3¹⁴). Jesus 'witnesses' to His message in various aspects (Jn 3¹¹ 5³¹ 7⁸ 8¹⁸ 18³⁷), in such words and deeds as make failure to recognize its truth a self-inflicted blindness passed by each man upon the state of his conscience or of his moral faculty, as determined by past conduct (Jn 3¹⁷⁻²¹ 15^{22, 24}, cf. Mk 4²¹⁻²⁵ [1]). Thus 'the witness' of Jesus constituted a 'manifestation' (2¹ 7⁴ 17⁶) within the reach of men of varying degrees of intellectual capacity, on the sole basis of moral perceptivity and receptivity (see 7¹⁶, quoted above, cf. 5³⁰), in which the common folk excelled the learned (Mt 11²⁵). The real object of such perception by nascent moral affinity, the specific revelation in Christ, was the total effect of Jesus' teaching, what we should style its 'spirit.' To resist this impression by practically judging it evil in nature and origin, was sin against 'the Holy Spirit' at work in the conscience—the most fatal, because the most radical of all sins (Mk 3²⁸⁻³⁰, Mt 12³¹). The ultimate source, then, of insight into the message witnessed and the character of the Messenger as sent of God, especially in the full spiritual sense constituting Him the Messiah, was the revealing action of the Father Himself (Mt 16¹⁷, Jn 5³² 6⁴⁴ 8¹⁸, cf. Mt 11²⁷), as distinct from all mere human conditions of knowing (cf. Latham, op. cit. 337 f.). The Father Himself was the ultimate witness. Not only were Jesus' works manifestly God's works (Jn 5³⁶ 17¹⁰); His 'voice' gave the final silent confirmation within the conscience; His 'immanent word' answered to the word uttered without by His witness; the vaguely dim outline of His character or Name was but fulfilled in clearer form in the Name given by and in His witness (Jn 5³⁷). And so the 'light' from within met and recognized the light from without, and rose to the triumphant faith that the Light promised to Israel had indeed risen upon it.

iii. GENERAL RESULTS.—In all this there seems essential agreement between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel. In the latter the emphasis on the inner conditions of insight, and upon the Person of Jesus as summing up the spirit of His own teaching by word and deed, is more marked. In both types of Gospel the educative method* of Jesus appears, even if, from its different scope, the Fourth Gospel does not bring this out concretely and progressively, as does the Synoptic narrative by its very nature as a narrative largely concerned with the gradual 'training of the Twelve' through actual intercourse with their Master. But it is clear that the immediate influence of the Person of Jesus, through eye and ear, is more apparent in the Synoptic account; while in the Johannine, the universal significance of His 'Person' as Messiah and Divine Son is in relief—as it would be in later Christian experience. But in neither does the knowledge go beyond the scope of the Kingdom of God, the true Sovereignty of the Righteous Father—first its principles, and then its mature developments—in close connexion with the destiny of its Founder and Lord, the Messiah, seen in His true character as unique Son of God. It is continuous with the Covenant idea of personal relations between God and His chosen people, and with the Divine name or character revealed in concreto through those relations.† The † Cf. H. S. Reade, DB iii. p. 60: 'The conception of true religion as the knowledge of God is probably the true antecedent and parent of some NT expressions for which affinities have been sought in the phenomena of Gnosticism. John (6⁴⁷) quotes: Is 54¹³ ("All thy children shall be taught of the Lord").

‡ Latham, op. cit. p. 17, observes that Jesus 'trusts to men's believing that the Father is in Him, not because He has declared it in set dogmas, but because He has been "so long with them." This is part of His chosen method of teaching, to the most religious effect, in view of the nature of man as a being whose spiritual faculties are to be evoked and trained freely and ethically.

* The wonderfully original and characteristic of this is analyzed in Latham's Pastor Parson, p. 100, and elsewhere, perhaps, not excepting Eccle Homo.

† Cf. Ps 25¹⁴ RV, 'The secret (counsel) of the Lord is with them that fear him; and his covenant, to make them know it' (τὰς ἐκκρυφίας αὐτοῦ). Here the LXX inserts reference to 'the name of the Lord' between the parallel clauses, as a third synonym.

'secret' or mystery revealed is the more spiritual and less national nature of the Kingdom; and its essential contents form the New Covenant, which, towards the end of His private teaching to the inner circle of disciples, Jesus declared was destined to be consecrated or sealed in His own life-blood. The emphasis on the connexion between the message and the Messenger, the Messianic Kingdom and His own Person as Messianic Son of God, increased with the growing confidence in Himself so that confidence in Himself became the very sheet-anchor of the cause to which He was from the first consecrated. Thus the perspective of the teaching is somewhat. The side at first more and more explicit, especially in the intimate intercourse of Jesus and His inner circle. But there is essential continuity of spirit throughout. Nor is there any esoteric knowledge in the strict sense, different in kind from the public teaching. The inner side was simply the darker side of difficulty and rejection, that most apt to repel the hearer until his confidence in the Master was well grounded. These were 'the mysteries' of the Kingdom, if Jesus ever used such an expression (Mt 13³⁵, Lk 8¹⁰, where Mk. has 'the mystery,' and above, p. 702). There was no new 'theology' in the abstract and Greek sense, as distinct from that of personal relations with man. Accordingly there is in the teaching of Christ no real warrant for the Gnostic movements which began once the teaching was Jewish to Greek soil. It is not taken in a Gnostic sense among Palestinian Christians (as distinct from the mixed Samaritan type). This implies that Christ's teaching was felt to move within the circle of general Hebrew metaphysics, and not to have any direct knowledge here to convey.

Such a judgment is confirmed, positively, by the so-called 'Teaching of the Twelve Apostles,' which in its present form is probably of Palestinian or Syrian origin, and understands 'the teaching' (διδασκαλία) of the Lord to have differed from Judaism only ethically, in the deeper knowledge of God's will, fuller spiritual life, and firmer grasp on immortality (ὑπόστασις καὶ πῦρ, ζωὴ, ἀθανασία, ix. 3, x. 2), which it bestowed. Its negative confirmation lies in the very fact that Gnosticizing versions of Christ's teaching early arose in the centres where the Hellenic spirit was strongest. Such 'apocryphal' Gospels, professing, as a rule, to supply from a secret line of tradition the words of 'deeper wisdom' which it was assumed must have fallen from the lips of the great Revealer of the spiritual world (here regarded cosmically rather than ethically), only show what the speculative spirit missed in our Gospels, with their concrete, practical teaching, often in terms of an individual case. Most probably Christian Gnostics felt some encouragement and justification afforded them by the less Hebraic tone of the Fourth Gospel, even though it is mystical rather than metaphysical in its distinctive elements, and is filled with Christian experience rather than with philosophy. Probably also their first efforts at Gospel-writing were more ethical than metaphysical in scope and interest. This was certainly the case in some circles, notably that represented by the Gospel to which belong the Oxyrhynchus 'Sayings of Jesus' (published in 1898, 1904), in which the non-original element is largely inspired by the 'Wisdom' literature of Hellenistic Judaism, and takes the form mainly of glossing certain actual sayings of Jesus with developments and expansions in terms of the deeper moral philosophy of the day, e.g. of the maxim, 'Know thyself,' and the Platonic doctrine of Wonder as the mother of Wisdom. Once this process of free development was started, however, and sanctioned among Christians imbued with Hellenic and Oriental notions, both philosophical and mystical, for the age was one of syncretism and fusion of ideas of very diverse origin,—it was bound to go ever further and further away from the attitude and horizon of historic Gospels. If the remains of 2nd cent. Gospels known to us were not so scanty, we should be able to see the stages by which the later types, in which the historic element of Jesus' teaching in word and deed is at a minimum, evolved gradually, rather than sprang full-blown to life. Thus the uncanonical Gospel drawn on by the Oxyrhynchus homily is known traditionally as 'the Gospel according to the Egyptians,' whether it be the Gospel according to the Egyptians or not, represented the next stage of idealization to that marked by the Oxyrhynchus Gospel; but it still contained much matter found in (and probably borrowed from) our Synoptic Gospels.* Quite the opposite kind of development, though one which also carries us away from the historic teaching of Jesus, is seen in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, in its two forms or stages, in which the reactionary reading of Jesus' message, the tendency to make it Jewish in letter and spirit, becomes more and more manifest.

Midway between these two opposed tendencies—the Judaic or legal, and the Gnostic or esoteric, mysterious, metaphysical—lie our historic Gospels. They are full of the spirit of Hebraic teaching as to knowledge of Divine things; but raise it to a new power and universality by contact with the Personality and spirit of Jesus, Himself the heart of the Gospel within the Gospel, the prime source of their perennial vitality and authority. Nor must we overlook the fact that the very form of these Gospels fits them, in a wonderful way, to be the vehicles of religious teaching after the mind of Jesus Himself, through being narrative instead of didactic, and coming from the Evangelists instead of from Christ Himself direct. 'If our Lord,' says Latham (p. 13), 'had left writings of His own, every letter of them would have been invested with such sanctity that there could have been no independent investigation of truth. Its place would have been taken by commentatorial works on the delivered word, on the lines of the scribes and Rabbis. The letter of Jesus' teaching would have been so revered, that its 'spirit and life' would have had less chance of reproducing itself through personal effort freely to find its own inner moral quest. So would the very teaching have been frustrated. For in all His sayings and doings, our Lord was most careful to leave the individual room to grow.' 'He cherishes and respects personality.' And so 'He gave seed thoughts which should lie in men's hearts, and germinate when fit occasion came' (ib. pp. 5, 10, 12). All this is permanently secured by the simple narrative form of the Gospels, especially the Synoptics. Herein the outer form of the NT is infinitely less than its Gospels—is as barren as the religion it enshrines as the Koran is of Islam. It is a notable fact that the Apocryphal Gospels steadily moved away from the narrative to the didactic manner, many of them transposing their key from the third to the first person, by the device of making their teaching ostensibly post-resurrectional (even the Oxyrhynchus Gospel does this), with a view to make it more dogmatically impressive. In so doing they came nearer the Koran and most other sacred books representing founders of religions; but they receded further from the earlier type of Christian written Gospel, of which the four in the Church's canon are the most perfect samples.

LITERATURE.—As bearing on the form of Jesus' teaching and its leading terms, so by their original Aramaic character, Dalman's Jesus is invaluable [Eng. tr. of Jesus, Edinburgh, T. & T. TEARS.—The only two in EV of the Gospels where tears are mentioned are Mk 9³⁴, where the father of the epileptic lad is said in AV to have cried out with tears, 'Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief?' [RV, however, following decidedly the best MSS, omits the words 'with tears']; and Lk 7³⁸⁻⁴⁴, where, in Simon the Pharisee's house, the penitent harlot washed with her tears the Saviour's feet. If, however, we enlarge our article by references to weeping, we have several instances of sorrow calling forth those tears which are its frequent, but by no means invariable, expression. Mary of Magdala wept when on the third day after the crucifixion she found that the body of her beloved Lord was no longer in Joseph's sepulchre (Jn 20¹¹⁻¹⁶). Peter wept tears of bitter shame when the sound of the cock-crowing brought home to him his sin in denying the Master on the night of betrayal (Mk 14⁷² and parallels). In each of these cases it may be useful to notice that tears were turned into joy; for to the penitent woman Christ said, 'Go in peace'; Mary's grief was changed to adoring rapture when the risen Saviour pronounced her name; and to Peter, by a revelation of grace, He granted the forgiveness of the man whose transgression is forgiven and whose sin is covered. In no case was the lamentation vain remorse, like that of Esau, who found no place of repentance, though he sought the blessing of his father diligently with tears (He 12¹⁷).

Most important of all are the passages where Jesus Himself is reported to have wept. They are three. (1) On the day when He rode into Jerusalem on the ass's colt, while the multitudes were rejoicing with shouts of Hosanna, His heart was not in tune with their mirth. Lk 19⁴¹ says that when He was come nigh, He saw the city, and wept over it. There was good reason for His wails. [The word ἐκλαυσε does not actually express tears so much as loud cries]. The sins which that city had committed in killing the prophets and stoning them that were sent unto her—sins which were to culminate in a few days when He Himself was to be the victim of their malice—lay sore on the heart of Him who would gladly have gathered her children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and who saw His salvation rejected. The dishonour done to His Father and the desolation of His Father's house filled Him with grief. He not only made rivers of waters run down His eyes, but drew words of indignation from His lips. The sorrows which were about to swamp Jerusalem in a flood of woe wrung from His heart the agonizing cry, 'If thou hadst known in this day, even thou, the things which belong unto peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes' (Lk 19⁴²). It was not for Himself that He lamented, nor for Himself that He would allow tears to be shed by others. Even while He was ready to faint under the load of the cross that was to be His anguish and shame, He said, 'Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me.' If they had tears, let them prepare to shed them now for themselves and for their children, because of the fearful tragedies that were to be enacted in their city ere a few years had passed (Lk 23²⁷⁻³¹). The Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief (Is 53³) was in His characteristic attitude of agonizing for others when the load of their sins lay heavily upon Him that day, and He was like the prophet (Jer 9¹) who wished that his head were waters and his eyes a fountain of tears, that he might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of his people.

(2) Jn 11³⁵ 'Jesus wept.' The word here is ἐδάκρυεν, 'shed tears.' This was at the grave of Lazarus when He was about to raise him from the dead. There is something here to surprise us, though much that was very natural in the tears of the Saviour. To the widow of Nain who was following the bier of her only son He said, 'Weep not' (Lk 7¹³), as He had said to those who lamented the daughter of Jairus, 'Why make ye this ado, and weep?' (Mk 5^{38, 39}). He was about to dry their tears and silence their wails by restoring their dead to life. Yet here (Jn 11³⁵⁻³⁶) it is recorded that He Himself wept in spirit, and wept as He joined the company of those who were weeping with the bereaved sisters. The tears of Jesus on this occasion have been a source of much consolation to those who mourn their dead. One is reminded of the lines of Erasmus Darwin—

'No radiant pearl which crested Fortune wears,
No gem that, twinkling, hangs from Beauty's ears,
Not the bright stars which Night's blue arch adorn,
Nor rising stars that gladden the dawn,
Shine with such lustre as thy cheek does,
Down Virtue's manly cheek for others' woes.'

They prove to us the perfect humanity of the Redeemer. He who with Divine authority was about to call the dead to life yet had the human weakness to shed tears. The possession of a body enabled Him to weary; the possession of a soul enabled Him to weep. (F. W. Robertson). They also show His sympathy with those who have to endure bereavement, how in all their affliction. Perhaps they may also be evidence of the anguish He felt at the woe which was caused in the world by that sin in the train of which misery and death came into the world. Further, the tears may have been drawn forth as He thought of the anguish that would be caused to His mother and His friends when He Himself should be laid within such a sepulchre as that before His eyes. And no doubt while on this occasion in Bethany He was about to turn sorrow to joy and heaviness to mirth, yet He was aware that there were multitudes who would have to sorrow without hope, and bewailed that he who had the power of death must claim so many victims ere he was himself destroyed.

(3) He 5⁷⁻⁸. In this interesting passage, which, while it does not occur in the Gospels, refers to Christ, we are reminded how, in the days of His flesh, He offered up prayers with strong crying and tears unto Him who was able to save Him from death. The allusion is chiefly to the agony of Gethsemane, though possibly to other occasions of Christ praying to the Father. It is hardly within the scope of this article to discuss the question of what it was for which our Lord then prayed. It can hardly have been merely such a prayer as that of Hezekiah when he turned his face to the wall and wept sore on being told that his sickness was mortal (2 K 20¹⁻³), or that of the Psalmist who, as he mingled his drink with weeping, said: 'O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days' (P 102^{9, 24}). For a discussion of the subject see Westcott, Hebrews; Schauffer in Sunday School Times, of America, 1895; Expository Times, vi. 1894-95, pp. 433, 522. It is evident that the writer's thought is to a large extent linked with the mediatorial office of Christ in the perfect obedience of His humanity which was learned through suffering. Death to Him, as well as to all Christians, had an awful meaning; and however willing the spirit of Christ might be to meet it, yet the flesh was weak, and tears might well gush forth in prospect of its bitterness. Here, again, from the tears of the Saviour, we learn the thorough sympathy of Christ with men, even the identification of the Son of Man with those for whom He was to die.

ARTS AND CRAFTS.

TEMPERANCE.—In the Sermon on the Mount Christ dwells on the restraint under which not only our actions and our words must be held, but also our thoughts. He sees in the angry thought the germ of murder, in the impure thought the germ of adultery, and so He goes to the root of the matter. It is of no use to try to cleanse the stream at a certain point in its course, if the fountain from which it flows is impure; if the stream is to be kept pure the fountain must be kept pure; and if the words and actions are to be under control, the thoughts of the heart must be under control. It is from within, out of the heart, that all kinds of evil issues, therefore 'keep thy heart . . . or, as in the marginal note, 'above all that thou guardest, for out of it are the issues of life' (Pr 4²³).

In the parable of the Prodigal Son we see the depth of degradation into which a man is brought when he breaks away from his God. In the case of the prodigal, the initial step was taken when the young man's thought was harboured in the heart. His mind fretted and rebelled against the restraints of his father's house, he wished to go out into the world and to see life, he wanted to be free from all control. The next step was the undisciplined word, 'Give me the portion of thy substance that falleth to me.' And the final step was the undisciplined act, 'He took his journey into a far country, and there he wasted his substance with riotous living.' Here the thought first ran riot, and the rest followed.

Christianity, therefore, is a religion not merely for a part of our being, but for the whole man ; it touches him in every relationship of life and in every aspect of that relationship. It teaches him to 'live soberly, . . . and godly in this present world'. While righteousness represents his attitude towards his fellow-men and godliness his attitude towards God, soberness represents his attitude towards himself. Soberness (σωφροσύνη) is a right balance in all things ; it is the bringing of the lower part of the nature into subjection to the higher, the flesh into subjection to the spirit ; it means the spirit of man, guided by the Holy Spirit of God, governing the soul or intellect ; then the soul or intellect, thus sanctified, governing the flesh ; and the whole man, body, soul, and spirit, kept under control, held in hand, just as a spirited horse is held in hand by an experienced rider ; moving on, not torn asunder by conflicting interests, but advancing steadily in one direction upwards and heavenwards.

who lets every act that he performs have its own proper place, who gives everything its own due proportion, who does not eat too much, drink too much, sleep too much, talk too much, or do anything in excess. We live in days when there is an inordinate craving for amusement: amusements have their place, and, within limits, are not only necessary but good for us; but when they absorb so large a portion of our life that its more serious duties have to give place to them, then they become extremely hurtful. They should be regarded as subordinate to the main line of our life, opportunities for rest only. Our tired and weary charges, so that we may return to our work with renewed vigour; and when thus used they are very helpful. A temperate man will exercise self-control with regard to these as well as in all other matters.

But while temperance is an all-round virtue, the term has come to be used in a more restricted sense, viz. in the matter of strong drink. When we speak of 'the Temperance cause' or 'Temperance work' we generally mean the efforts that are being made to suppress intemperance in the use of alcohol. Our Temperance Societies are directed towards this object, and so the word 'temperance' has come to be used almost exclusively in this connexion; and it cannot be denied that there is some justification for it, because the effects of the abuse of strong drink are so patent and so terrible that they attract attention in a way that few other sins do. Temperance is not necessarily total abstinence; it is the use, as distinct from the abuse, of strong drink. Total abstinence may be necessary; for the inveterate drunkard it is necessary; for him the only remedy, under God, is to abstain altogether from that which he cannot use in strict moderation (cf. Jesus' words in Mt 5^{29, 30}). Again it may be necessary for others besides drunkards, viz., for those who are to rescue the victims of strong drink, for we all know that example is far more powerful than precept; we are far more likely to be able to help those who have fallen into this abyss by saying to them, 'Do as we do,' than by saying, 'Do as we tell you.'

But while total abstinence may be necessary for some, especially for those of us who are working in the slums of our large towns, it is not enjoined upon all; the strictly moderate use of alcohol cannot be said to be a sin; and to speak of it as though it were a sin, as has sometimes been done, is only to weaken the cause that we have at heart; it is the abuse of it that is a sin, and therefore, while abstinence is not enjoined upon all, temperance is enjoined upon every Christian man and woman.

Our Lord tells us what is the end and aim of our fallen but redeemed and regenerate humanity, 'Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5⁴⁸). This is the goal set before us; and to reach this goal our attitude must be that of the spiritual athlete, straining every nerve and exerting every muscle, keeping under the body and bringing it into subjection, running the race set before us, 'looking unto Jesus' (He 12²), looking unto Him as our example, looking unto Him for strength, pressing onward from stage to stage, from strength to strength, from one degree of perfection unto another, 'unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ' (Eph 4¹³).

And here our Lord stands before us as our Ideal. The Jesus of the Gospels presents to us a life which is the very embodiment of temperance, a life of perfect self-restraint, of complete self-mastery; a life free from excess on the one hand and defect on the other, well-balanced, well proportioned, without flaw, without spot, perfect in all its parts; a life which had for its object the glory of God, from the time when He came into the world, saying, 'Lo, I come to do thy will, O my God' (He 10⁷), to the time when, having finished all, He exclaimed with the voice of a conqueror, 'I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do' (Jn 17⁴). To copy this perfect Ideal and to reach this goal we, by a life lived in union with Him and by the power of the Holy Ghost, must strive to be temperate in all things. See, further, art. SELF-CONTROL.

TEMPEST.—See SEA OF GALILEE, p. 591.

TEMPLE.—i. USE OF TERMS.—1. The word which is most frequently used in the Gospels for the temple is τὸ ἱερόν (מִקְדָּשׁ); it occurs nearly 50 times. Under this term is included, generally speaking, the whole of the temple area, i.e. the Court of the Gentiles, the Court of the Women, the Court of the Israelites, the Priests' Court, and the Holy Place, together with the Holy of Holies. In this wide sense it is used in Mt 12⁶ 24¹⁻², Mk 11¹¹ 13¹⁻³ 14⁴⁹, Lk 19⁴⁷ 21³⁷⁻³⁸ 22⁵² 24⁵³; but in a number of passages it is used in a more restricted sense, viz.: in reference to the Court of the Gentiles, Mt 21¹²⁻¹³ 26, Mk 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸ 27, Lk 19⁴⁵ 22⁵³, Jn 2¹⁴ 15 5¹⁴ 8⁵⁹; in reference to the Court of the Women, Mk 12⁴¹, Lk 22²⁷ 21¹; in reference to the Court of the Israelites, Mt 26⁵⁵, Mk 12⁵⁵, Lk 24⁶ 18¹⁰ 20¹, Jn 7¹⁴ 23 11⁵⁶ 18²⁰. The particular part of the temple referred to cannot always be ascertained with certainty, . . . but presumably the mention of 'teaching in the temple' would usually refer to Christ teaching the Jews (in view of such passages as 'I am not sent save unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel,' Mt 15²⁴), in which case the women, according to Jewish custom, would not be present. In a few instances ἱερόν is used of some particular part of the temple, viz. of the actual sanctuary, Lk 21⁵, Jn 8²⁰; in this passage the treasury is spoken of loosely, as being in the temple (ἱερόν), strictly speaking it was in the Sanctuary (ναός). The same applies to the mention of Solomon's Porch in Jn 10²³. In reference to the wing or pinnacle of the temple (Mt 4⁵, Lk 4⁹) περιβόλιον τοῦ ἱεροῦ is used; as to where this spot was precisely scholars differ. See PINNACLE. Once the phrase τὸ ἱερόν τοῦ θεοῦ is used (Mt 21¹²), but the addition of τοῦ θεοῦ is not well attested.

2. The word ναός * (נֶאֱוָה) denotes the Sanctuary, i.e. that part of the temple which was holy, and to which, therefore, none but the priests had access; it included the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies (see Lk 12¹⁻²²). The ναός was built of white marble, overlaid in part with gold sheeting; this costliness is referred to in Mt 23¹⁶⁻¹⁷. Other references to the Sanctuary are: 23^{18, 19, 35}, which speak of the altar; 27⁵⁻⁶, the treasury (but see below); Lk 1⁹, the altar of incense (here the phrase ὁ ναός τοῦ κυρίου occurs for the only time); Mt 27⁵¹, the heavy veil between the Holy of Holies and the Holy Place (see also Mk 15³⁸, Lk 23⁴⁵). Finally, Christ speaks of His body as symbolizing the Sanctuary in Jn 2¹⁹⁻²¹, cf. Mt 26⁶¹ (where the only occurrence of the phrase ὁ ναός τοῦ θεοῦ is found) 27⁴⁰, Mk 14⁵⁸ 15²⁹. In Jn 2²⁰ ὁ ναός is inaccurately used in the words 'Forty and six years was this temple in building' (i.e. has this temple been in building up till now), for it was the whole temple area with all included in it that had so far been worked at for forty-six years; it was not finished until shortly before its final destruction by Titus in A.D. 70-71.

3. A few other expressions used for the temple may be briefly referred to: ὁ οἶκος μου, * Mt 21¹³, Mk 11¹⁷, Lk 19⁴⁶, Jn 2¹⁷; οἶκος προσευχῆς, Mt 21¹³, Mk 11¹⁷, Lk 19⁴⁶; ὁ οἶκος τοῦ πατρὸς μου, Jn 2¹⁶. All these expressions are used in the larger sense of τὸ ἱερόν. The 'Holy Place' is specifically referred to in Mt 23³⁵ 'between the sanctuary (ναός) and the altar,' i.e. the space between the outer veil (see below) and the altar for burnt-offerings; in 24¹⁵ ἐστὸς ἐν τόπῳ ἁγίῳ, but in the parallel passage (Mk 13¹⁴) the reading is ἐστῆκόρα θρου οὐ δεῖ.† Lastly, the expression ὁ οἶκος ὑμῶν, Mt 23³⁸ ('Your house is left unto you desolate'),‡ apparently also refers to the temple, for it is in the temple that these words were spoken, and it is to the temple that the disciples point when admiring the beauty of the building, in reply to which Christ says: 'There shall not be left here one stone upon another, which shall not be thrown down'; thus 'your house' evidently means the temple building in its external form, in contradistinction to the 'house of God,' the spiritual building not made with hands.

ii. HEROD'S TEMPLE.—There are several admirable descriptions of Herod's temple published and easily available; § all are based on the main sources, viz. Jos. Ant. xv. xi., BJ v. v., c. Ap. i. 22, and the Mishnic tractate Middoth.¶ It will, therefore, not be necessary to give a detailed account here, but a general outline to illustrate the Gospel references is necessary. Herod the Great commenced rebuilding the temple¶ in the year B.C. 20 (the eighteenth year of his reign), on the site of the second temple; but the available space was insufficient for the much larger building which he intended to erect. He therefore constructed immense vaulted chambers  on the south side of the hill on which the earlier temple stood; by this means the area at his disposal was doubled. A general idea of the whole will be best gained by indicating its main divisions:

1. The Outer Court.—This large space (two stadia†† in length, one in breadth, the perimeter being six stadia), which surrounded the temple proper, was enclosed by a battlemented wall. The main entrances to this enclosure were on the west, leading into the city; here there were four gates, of which only one of which have been discovered.‡‡

* ὁ οἶκος τοῦ θεοῦ (Mt 12⁴, Mk 2²⁶, Lk 6⁴) is used in reference to the sanctuary at Noh, 1 S 21⁴⁻⁶.

The best, however, is that in Hastings' DB; it is very full, and the excellent illustrations enable one to form a definite picture of what the temple looked like in the time of Christ; the art. in the Encyc. Bibl. is very good; there is also an interesting art. in vol. xii. of the Journal of Theological Studies. See, further, the literature at the end of this art.

The original sources are not always in agreement, but taking them together a sufficiently accurate picture of Herod's temple is obtainable.

¶ It was not completed until the procuratorship of Albinus (A.D. 62-64). Its site is to-day occupied by the Haram es-Sherif, though this includes also part of the site formerly covered by the Tower of Antonia, which stood at the north-west of the temple area.

 Called by the Arabs 'Solomon's Stables'; opinions differ as to whether they belong to an earlier period, and were only renovated by Herod, or whether Herod constructed them himself, or whether they belong to a later date altogether.

†† A stadium = 606½ English feet.

‡‡ Known, after the name of the discoverer, as Wilson's Arch (see Warren and Conder's Survey of Western Palestine, 'Jerusalem,' p. 196).

* It was that part in which God 'dwelt' (נֶאֱוָה), and corresponded to what was originally also the most sacred part, i.e. bēth-El (cf. the Hebrew name for the temple as a whole, מִקְדָּשׁ, 'house'), the 'house of God'; the early conception of a temple was that of being essentially a 'dwelling-place' for God (cf. 2 S 7⁵ 7).

On the south side were the two 'Huldah' gates, remains of which have also been discovered. On the south-west corner there was a bridge which led from the city into the temple area; a huge arch which formed part of this bridge was discovered by Robinson, and is called after him. There was one gate on the east, which has been walled up; this was called the 'Golden Gate,' which tradition identifies with the 'Beautiful Gate' mentioned in Ac 3².^{*} On the north there was likewise one gate, called in Middoth the 'Tadi Gate.'[†] All these gates led directly into the great temple area, or outer court; around the whole area, within the walls, were ranged porticoes with double rows of pillars; but the finest was that on the south side; here there were four rows of Corinthian columns made of white marble. All these porticoes were covered with a roof of wood. The eastern portico was called Solomon's Porch (Jn 10²³, cf. Ac 3¹¹ 5¹²); it belonged to an earlier building which tradition ascribed to Solomon. On the north-west two sets of steps led up to the Tower of Antonia; the Roman garrison stationed here kept constant watch on the feasts and other occasions of great excitement in case of tumult (cf. Ac 21^{35, 40}). This temple area was called the 'Court of the Gentiles'; it was not part of the temple proper, and therefore not sacred soil, consequently any one might enter it. It is to this outer court that reference is made in Mt 21¹²⁻¹⁶, Mk 11^{15ff}, Lk 19^{45, 46}, Jn 2¹³⁻¹⁷; the ἱερεῖς and those who sold animals for sacrifices had free access here.

2. The Court of the Israelites.—This inner court was raised fifteen cubits[§] above the outer one just referred to; it was surrounded by a terrace (ἡἐλ), ten cubits in breadth, which was approached from the outer court by ascending fourteen steps; these steps ran round the whole terrace, and at the bottom of them there was a low wall or breast-work, which was the limit to which non-Israelites might approach; along it were placed, at intervals, inscriptions warning Gentiles not to pass beyond, on pain of death; they were written in Latin and Greek; one of the latter has been discovered by Clermont-Ganneau. On entering this inner court, 'holy' ground was reached, which accounted for the prohibition just referred to; only the seed of Abraham might enter here, hence its name. It was divided into two portions:

(a) The Women's Court.—This was the smaller division; it occupied the eastern part. The court received its name from the fact that it formed the limit to which women might advance towards the sanctuary, not because it was reserved for the use of women.¶ It was on a lower level than the Men's Court, which was entered through six of the nine gates belonging to the Women's Court. Of these gates, three deserve special mention, viz. that presented by Alexander of Alexandria; it was one of the largest, and was covered with gold and silver; secondly, the Eastern gate, which was covered with Corinthian bronze; and, above all, the gate of Nicanor;^{*} this was called the 'Great Gate'; it was fifty cubits high and forty broad; fifteen steps, semicircular in form, led up to it from the Women's Court. Whether the 'Beautiful Gate' mentioned in Ac 3² referred to this or to the Eastern gate of the Outer Court (see above) is quite uncertain.

(b) But the Court of the Israelites proper was the western and larger court, called also the Men's Court, and to this only men had access. It ran round the whole of the Sanctuary itself, in which was included the Priests' Court (see below). In the Men's Court were (according to Josephus) the treasury-chambers, where all the more valuable temple treasures were kept. The 'treasury' spoken of in Mt 23¹⁷, Lk 21¹ was clearly entered by women; the discrepancy may, however, be explained by supposing that one of the trumpet-shaped receptacles into which offerings were cast, and which usually stood in the Men's Court, was at certain times placed in the eastern portion of the court, so that every one, including the women, might have the opportunity of making the offerings; on such occasions the Women's Court was, for the time being, a treasury. On the other hand, the treasury mentioned in Jn 8²⁰ would appear, from the context,† to refer to that in the Men's Court, the word being used here in the strict sense (see, too, Mt 27⁶).

3. The Court of the Priests.—Before entering the most sacred parts of the Sanctuary, the Priests' Court had to be traversed. In this court there stood, in the centre, the great altar for burnt-sacrifices, and close to it the brazen laver for the priestly ablutions. On the right of these, on entering, was the place for slaughtering the animals brought for sacrifice. On either side of the court were the priests' chambers; it is probable that one of these was the ἡδὴ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου, 'the Hall of the ἡδὴ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου' ('assessors'), in which the members of the Sanhedrin met in a quasi-private character before they met officially in the ἡδὴ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου, 'the Hall of hewn stone.' Where this latter was precisely, it is impossible to say, owing to the conflicting evidence of the authorities; the only thing that seems tolerably certain is that, while it was within the enclosure of the temple proper, it was not within the Priests' Court; this is certain from the fact that none but priests might enter the court called after them; the only exception to this was that which permitted the entrance of those who brought offerings, for they had to lay their hands upon the sacrifice, in accordance with the prescribed ritual.

4. The Holy Place (ἡἐκὼλ).—This was separated from the Priests' Court by a high porch (ἡἄλᾶμ, see above, i. 4), running north and south; it was a hundred cubits in height (the highest part of the whole temple) and breadth, but only eleven in depth. The Holy Place stood on a higher level than the surrounding court, from which twelve steps led up to it. Its furniture consisted of the altar of incense (see Lk 1⁹), the table of the shewbread, and the seven-branched candlestick.

^{*} Possibly to be identified with the 'Shushan Gate' mentioned in Middoth.

† The 'private' gate, used only by mourners and those who were ceremonially unclean.

‡ The temple tribute was paid in ἡδὴ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου; as this had to be paid in the form of the ἡδὴ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου, money-changers who exchanged them for current coin had a ἡδὴ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου, which they did not neglect, of making a ἡδὴ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου commission.

¶ It runs: 'No Gentile may enter within the balustrade and wall encircling the temple. Whosoever is caught (doing so) will have to blame himself for the consequence,—the death penalty' (cf. Ac 21^{26ff}); see PEFSt, 1871, p. 132; cf. Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 5.

‡ In modern Jewish places of worship a special gallery is reserved for the women.

^{*} An interesting reference to the gate of Nicanor is to be found on a recently discovered bilingual inscription, in Greek and Hebrew, in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem; it was found inscribed on an ossuary from a sepulchral cave, and runs: 'Ὁστὴ τῶν τῶ Νικάνορος Ἀλεξανδρινός ποιήσαντος τὰς θύρας. נקנר אלכסנדר' ('The bones of [the children of] Nicanor, the Alexandrian, who made the doors. Nicanor Aleksa.'). Prof. Clermont-Ganneau says that this inscription 'can scarcely refer to any other than the family or descendant of Nicanor,' and that the 'doors' must be understood as referring to 'the famous door of the temple of Herod, known as the Gate of Nicanor, after the rich individual who had presented it to the Sanctuary'; see PEFSt, 1903, pp. 125-131.

† ταῦτα τὰ ῥήματα ἐλάλησεν ἐν τῷ ἡεροσολύμοις διδάσκων ἐν τοῖς ἱεροῖς. It was teaching which, according to Jewish ideas, concerned men.

‡ The tribunal was called בית דין הגדול ('The great house of judgment').

5. The Holy of Holies (dēbīr).—No human foot might enter here, with the one exception of the high priest, who entered once a year, on the Day of Atonement, for the purpose of presenting sacrifice and incense before God. It was properly the place wherein the ark should have rested; but nothing is heard of the ark after the Captivity, and the Holy of Holies was, therefore, quite empty. The 'foundation stone' (אֶבֶן יסוד) upon which, in the first temple, the ark had stood, was nearly in the centre of the Holy of Holies; in the second temple it was exposed to the extent of about six inches;* there is no mention of this anywhere in reference to Herod's temple, but, as this was built on the site of the earlier temple, it is difficult to believe that it was not there. There was no means whereby any light could enter the Holy of Holies; it was, therefore, always in total darkness, excepting when artificially lighted. It was separated from the Holy Place by means of two veils, with the space of a cubit between them; in Mt 27⁵¹, Mk 15³⁸, Lk 23⁴⁵ (cf. He 6¹⁹ 9⁸ 10²⁰, though it is not Herod's temple that is referred to in these passages) only one veil† is spoken of; but as the two were so close together, they were probably regarded as two parts of one whole.

iii. CHRIST AND THE TEMPLE.—1. The earliest mention of the temple in connexion with Christ is on the occasion of His being brought there for 'presentation' and 'redemption' thirty-one days after His birth, in accordance with Jewish law (Lk 22³⁹, cf. Ex 13¹⁻¹⁶). This ceremony took place in the Court of the Women, as the presence of Mary and Anna shows; it was a simple one,† consisting only of the formal presentation of the child to the priest, who offered up two 'benedictions,' or thank-giving prayers, one on behalf of the child for the law of redemption, the other on behalf of the mother for the gift of the firstborn son.

From Lk 24 it may be assumed that Christ was brought annually to Jerusalem for the Passover celebration in the temple; there was no need for Him to be left behind,§ and the presence of children in the temple was evidently of common occurrence (Mt 21¹⁵); the visit, therefore, recorded in Lk 24² was not the first time that Christ was present at the yearly Passover feast in the temple.||

One other reference, prior to the time of Christ's public ministry, but on the threshold of it, is contained in the parable of His Temptation, whose second scene (in Lk. the third) is represented as having taken place on the pinnacle of the temple.

2. By far the most important part of Christ's connexion with the temple is His teaching given within its precincts. On a number of occasions we read of the representatives of different classes coming to Him in the temple, often, no doubt, with the genuine object of profiting by His teaching, but frequently also for a more sinister purpose (e.g. Mt 16¹ 22¹⁵). The most elaborate account of such teaching is probably that contained in the long passage Mt 21²⁸⁻²³; the whole of this discourse, addressed, as opportunity offered, to a variety of hearers, would appear to have been spoken in the large outer court (ii. 1). The many-sided character of Christ's teaching in the temple is well illustrated by this section; the first who are here mentioned as coming to Him were the chief priests and elders of the people, who asked Him by what authority He taught; the series of arguments which He constituted His reply to their question with an appeal to Scripture: 'Did ye never read in the Scriptures, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner?' (Ps 118²²); there was peculiar aptitude in the quotation being given in the temple, for 'stone' was a figurative expression for the leader of the people, which must have been familiar to His hearers (cf. Is 19¹³, Jg 20², 1 S 14³³, Zec 10⁴); a family, and also a nation, were conceived of as a building (cf. 1 P 2⁵), the head of which was regarded as the most prominent feature—the part of the spiritual building which stood out most conspicuously. There is ample evidence to show that the Jews regarded the temple as, in a real sense, a symbol of their nation. When Christ spoke of Himself as the 'corner-stone,' He was claiming for Himself the leadership of the people, i.e. He was, in effect, declaring Himself to be the Messiah.* Christ's teaching was next addressed in turn to the Pharisees, the Herodians, the Sadducees, the lawyers, and, lastly, to the surrounding people; the whole section gives a vivid picture of the use He made of the temple for His ... all sorts and conditions of men. Other ... to His teaching in the temple are Lk 19⁴⁷, 48, from which it is clear, on the one hand, how exasperated the chief priests and scribes were, and, on the other hand, how the people flocked into the temple to hear Him (Mt 26⁵⁵, Mk 14⁴⁹, Lk 21³⁷, 38, 22⁵³, Jn 18²⁰).

But perhaps the most impressive teaching of Christ in the temple was during the great festivals, when immense numbers of people from all parts of the country came up to Jerusalem. It is in the Fourth Gospel that the details of this teaching are, for the most part, preserved; thus in Jn 7^{10ff}, we read that during the Feast of Tabernacles, Jesus went into the temple and taught, so that the people marvelled at His teaching; and that on the last day of this feast a climax was reached; for, while on the one hand He was declared to be the Messiah, on the other this claim was disputed; and that the chief priests and Pharisees, believing that their opportunity had come, attempted to take Him, but in vain, for the majority of the people sided with Christ. The method of Christ's public teaching in the temple, together with the way in which the learned Jews sought to combat it, is graphically described in such passages as Jn 7. 8; the whole of the episode dealt with in these chapters took place in the outer Court of the Gentiles, where the largest number of people congregated: this is clear from the fact that some of the people took up stones† to cast at Christ (8⁵⁹). Again, at the Feast of Dedication, Christ was once more in the temple, teaching, with the like result, that the people threatened to stone Him: in this case we are definitely told (Jn 10²²⁻⁴²) that it took place in 'Solomon's Porch,' which was in the Court of the Gentiles (see above, ii. 1). Lastly, that Christ was again present in the temple, and teaching, during the other great feast, the Passover, seems tolerably clear from Jn 12¹²⁻³⁶.

It is certain, therefore, that Christ made every use of the opportunities afforded of pressing home

† This must not be confounded with the 'Babylonian' veil, which hung before the Holy Place, and which is not referred to in the Gospels. See Warren and Conder, 'Jerusalem,' pp. 340-341.

‡ Probably more simple even than among modern Jews; see FIRSTBORN.

§ Josephus tells us that the provincial towns of Judæa were empty and deserted on the occasions of the annual feasts, though there is an obvious exaggeration when he says that at the Passover in the year 63 there were no fewer than 2,700,000 Jewish people present in Jerusalem (Ant. xiv. xiii. 4, BJ vi. ix. 8).

|| Against Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 242. See also art BOYHOOD, vol. i. p. 225⁶.

* The 'corner-stone,' as implied above, has nothing to do with the foundation of a building; this is quite clear from the Heb. אֶבֶן יסוד and from the Syriac and Pesh. ܐܝܬܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ; the root-idea of ܐܝܢ is that of 'excrecence' (see Brockelmann, Syr. Lex. s.v.). Literally, the phrase might be rendered, 'the top of the highest point'; and the spot indicated would probably be the same as that referred to in the narrative of the Temptation.

† The other courts were paved.

His teaching in the temple;* no other spot offered the same favourable conditions, viz. it was the most convenient centre for the gathering together of the multitude; the frequent presence of priests, Pharisees, scribes, and lawyers enabled Christ, in the hearing of the multitude, to contrast His teaching with theirs; there was also the fact that teaching in the temple naturally appealed to the multitude more than if given anywhere else, as the temple was the officially recognized place for instruction.

3. It is extraordinary that no instance of a miracle of healing by Christ is recorded in the Gospels as having been performed in the temple; but in view of such passages as Ac 3¹⁻¹² 5¹² we cannot doubt that such did take place, especially as the Outer Court of the temple would be a natural spot for the lame and crippled to congregate for the purpose of arousing the pity of those going up to worship.

Only once is the temple the scene in a parable, namely, in that of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18¹⁰⁻¹⁴); while in one other, the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁶), temple officers are referred to.

4. There are, in the next place, a certain number of passages in the Gospels in which there are direct references to the temple, or something connected with it, though it is not mentioned by name. The temple and its furniture would have been so well known to the people that Christ could use both symbolically without actually mentioning them, and yet His hearers would fully understand the reference. The most striking instance of this is where the sanctuary is used as a symbol of Christ's risen body (Jn 2¹⁹⁻²¹; cf. Mt 26⁶¹ 27⁴⁰, Mk 14⁵⁸ 15²⁹). But, as a rule, these references are not so obvious to modern ears as to those who heard them. The significance of these examples is enhanced in the case of those which were spoken in the temple itself; among them are: Jn 8¹² 'I am the light of the world'; one may reasonably infer that there was a reference here to the seven-branched lampstand in the Holy Place;† but for this artificial light it was altogether in darkness; the context (he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness) receives emphasis when one remembers this. Christ is drawing out the contrast between the Jewish teaching, according to which the close approach to God in the Holy of Holies meant darkness, and His own, according to which the nearer one approached to Him, the Son of God, the greater the light. Again, there is a reference to the temple service of praise when Christ quotes Ps 8² (LXX): 'Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise' (Mt 21¹⁶); here again was an implied contrast between the formalism of the temple-worship and the whole-hearted praise of the children crying, 'Hosanna to the Son of David.' A further and more direct reference to the worship of the temple is to be found in Mk 12²⁹, where Christ quotes the Shema: 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One'; the Shema (Dt 6⁴) was one of the earliest portions of the temple liturgy,‡ and was recited every morning and evening.§ In the same section occurs a reference to the daily sacrifices in the temple, viz. that to love God and one's neighbour is 'more than whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices' (Mk 12²⁹). Other references of this kind are in Mt 5²², where Christ speaks of the Sanhedrin ('Council'); Mt 5^{23, 24}, where the offering on the altar in the Court of the Priests (see above, ii. 3) is mentioned; Mt 23^{16, 17}, which contains the prohibition of swearing by the temple or the altar; Mk 7¹¹, where Christ speaks against an abuse which was clearly of frequent occurrence;* the word korban (see CORBAN) was a technical term used in making vows, and meant that a gift was made to God; the abuse arose when a man would say to another (who as a relative or the like had a claim upon him): 'My property is korban to thee,' for by this means he could prevent his relative from deriving any benefit from his possessions. Korban means lit. 'offering'; it was used also of the sacred treasury in which gifts for the temple were kept; it is used in this sense in Mt 27⁶.† In Mt 23² Christ speaks of 'Moses' seat,' i.e. the Rabbinic college, the official deliberations of which took place in the temple. Not all of these references were spoken in the temple itself, but it cannot be doubted that Christ had the temple, or something connected with it, in His mind when He spoke. Lastly, there are other passages which record sayings or actions of Christ in which a connexion of some kind with the temple is to be discerned, e.g. Jn 15¹ 'I am the true vine'; golden vines, with immense bunches of grapes, were carved on the door leading into the Holy Place (Hekhal);‡ it is permissible to assume that Christ based His teaching here, as so often elsewhere,§ on what was familiar to His hearers. Again, at the washing of the disciples' feet, Jn 13⁵, recalls to mind the priestly ablutions at the brazen laver near the great altar in the Priests' Court,|| preparatory to their undertaking the duties of the priestly office; it must be remembered that Christ, in the episode referred to, was about to perform an act appertaining to His high-priestly office, and the disciples were being consecrated in a special manner to their future work.

One has but to bear in mind the part that the temple and its worship played among the Jews, not only of Palestine but also of the Diaspora, to realize that the references indicated above are not fanciful.

iv. CHRIST'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE TEMPLE WORSHIP.—The Gospels present to us two elements in Christ's attitude towards the temple and its system of worship which appear, at first sight, to be contradictory; but they can, nevertheless, be satisfactorily accounted for.

On the one hand, Christ evinces a great love and reverence for the temple; His frequent appearance there cannot have been only for the purpose of teaching the people, for, while it is true that the Gospels never directly record an instance of His offering sacrifice, there can be no reasonable doubt that He fulfilled the duties incumbent upon every true Israelite; this the following considerations will bear out:

The keynote of Christ's subsequent observance of the Law (cf. Mt 5¹⁸) was already sounded at His presentation in the temple (Lk 2²²⁻²⁴); from boyhood He was taught to observe the Passover (Lk 2⁴¹⁻⁴²), and it is inconceivable that He should, later on, have omitted what was a sacred duty in the eyes of every Jew, viz. taking His share in the family sacrifice in the temple at the Passover feast.¶

* See Ec 5²⁻⁵.

† Cf. Jos. BJ II. ix. 4, where it is spoken of as the 'sacred treasury'.

‡ Cf. Westcott, ad loc. Jos. (BJ v. v. 4, cf. Ant. xiv. iii. 1) and Talm. (Shab. v. 7) refer to this; the vine was the symbol of the Jewish nation; it is found as such on Maccabean coins.

§ See above, ii. 3.

¶ Although the Passover was celebrated in the home in our Lord's time as well as at the present day among Jews, yet the Paschal lamb might be killed only in the temple, the central sanctuary. At the Passover even laymen were permitted to kill the sacrificial animals, on account of the immense number that were offered. But, in any case, every Jew had to take part in the offering, by means of the consecrating act of laying the hand upon the victim on the altar.

* Cf. the account of Jeremiah in this respect.

† Cf. Jos. BJ II. ix. 4, ad loc.

‡ See Jos. BJ II. ix. 4, ad loc.

§ Queen Helen of Adiabene fixed a golden candelabrum in the front of the temple, which reflected the first rays of the sun, and the priests used to recite the Shema (Toma, 87b, Shab. 124a, Yoma, 22b).

Moreover, all Jews took a direct share in the ordinary services and worship of the temple; a crowd of worshippers was always present at the daily morning and evening sacrifice which was offered up on behalf of the congregation; they waited either in meditation or in prayer while the high priest entered into the Holy Place to present the incense-offering, and when he came forth they received, with bowed head, the priestly benediction; they listened to the chant of the Levites, and at the conclusion of each section, when the priests sounded their silver trumpets, the whole multitude prostrated themselves.* That Christ, furthermore, observed the Jewish feasts has already been shown, and His own words as to the celebration of the Passover (Lk 22^{7a}) clearly show His attitude towards the sacrificial system. . . . Then, again, several occasions are . . . His distinctly enjoining the fulfilment of the law of sacrifice: Mt 8⁴ (cf. Mk 1⁴, Lk 5¹⁴) 5^{23, 24} 23², Lk 17¹⁴ (cf. Jn 5⁴⁶ 7²³); and His reference to the shewbread in Mk 2²⁶, Lk 6⁴ is also to the point. Indeed one has but to recall His instinctive desire to be 'in his Father's house' (Lk 2⁴⁹), His zeal for the 'house of prayer' (Lk 19^{45, 46}), His sense of the holy character of the sanctuary (Mt 23¹⁷), His insistence on the need of paying the temple tax (Mt 17^{24c}), to realize how fully He acquiesced in the contemporary conceptions regarding the temple and its worship.

But, on the other hand, there are references, equally decisive, though fewer in number, in which both the temple and its worship are regarded as of quite subordinate importance. Thus in Mt 12⁶, where Christ speaks of Himself as 'greater than the temple,' He was uttering words which, at all events to Jews, must have implied a depreciation of the temple; in the same passage the quotation from Hos 6⁶ 'I will . . . not sacrifice' (repeated in Mt 9¹³) . . . to the relative unimportance of sacrifice. Again, the parable of the Good Samaritan illustrates what Christ thought of the priesthood (Lk 10³¹); and most striking is His reply to those who lavished praise on the beauty of the temple: 'Verily, I say unto you, There shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down' (Mt 24², Mk 13¹⁻³, Lk 21⁶), in connexion with which must be taken Jn 4²¹ 'Neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father.'†

This twofold, and apparently contradictory, attitude of Christ towards the temple and its worship has also a twofold explanation. There can be little doubt, in the first place, that Christ's realization of the relatively minor importance of the temple and its worship stood in the closest relation to His second coming (παρουσία) and the doctrine of the last things. This is very distinctly seen in that it is immediately after the prediction of the destruction of the temple (Mt 24², Mk 13¹, Lk 21⁶)‡ that He recounts the signs which shall precede His second coming (see esp. Mt 25^{31a}, cf. 2 Th 2¹⁻¹²); the near approach of the end (Mt 24¹⁴) emphasized the temporary character of the temple and all that pertained to it.§ In the second place, it is to be explained by the ever-widening conceptions which Christ experienced regarding His Person and work. In the early part of His ministry the influence of Jewish up-bringing and environment was strongly marked; but as the realization of His own Divine Personality and the world-embracing character of His work grew more and more clear, all that was distinctively Jewish and of local colour receded into comparative insignificance. The evolution of Christ's Divine consciousness brought with it a new perspective, which revealed Him to Himself not merely as King of the Jews, but also as the Divine Saviour of the world (cf. Mt 24¹⁴).

Cleansing of the temple.—This episode, together with the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, is one of the few events (apart from the story of the Passion) recorded by all four Evangelists; this is significant, for its importance can scarcely be exaggerated. There are slight variations in the four accounts, but the substantial fact is identical in each (Mt 21¹²⁻¹⁷, Mk 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸, Lk 19^{45, 46}, Jn 2¹⁴⁻²¹). It is necessary to realize clearly that this act of 'cleansing' (the expression is quite misleading) belonged to a definite course of action marked out by Christ for Himself, and that it formed the last great act [the narrative in Jn. being misplaced] of His public ministry prior to the Passion. It is therefore important to connect it with the leading events of the few months preceding it.

According to Mk., which may be regarded as offering the earliest and most trustworthy account, that which definitely and markedly the final breach between Christ and ecclesiastical authorities was the question of Sabbath observance (cf. Burkitt, The Gospel History and its Transmission, p. 68 ff.); the controversy on this subject culminated in the healing of the man with the withered hand on the Sabbath (Mk 3^{1a}). This occurred in the country under the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas, i.e. . . . the Galilean ministry, which had as one . . . notable results the adhesion to Christ of the masses. It was on account . . . that the religious authorities . . . get help from the secular arm, if this movement, so dangerous from their point of view, was to be checked. For this reason they appealed to the Herodians (Mk 3⁶); their appeal was evidently successful, for Christ found it necessary to leave Galilee, and to remain in such parts of the country as were outside the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas; thus freeing Himself from the molestations of the Herodians. During this time the multitudes flocked to Him; but His main purpose consisted in preparing His disciples for what was to come. This preparation went on for some months. Then Christ determined to go up to Jerusalem for the Passover and appear publicly once more,* though He knew what the result must be, and did not hide it from His disciples (10³²⁻³⁴). He thereupon entered Jerusalem publicly, accompanied by His followers (11^{7a}), and the next day the 'cleansing' of the temple took place. That is to say, in the cycle of events just referred to, the 'cleansing' formed the climax. Now, the essence of practical Judaism, according to the ideas of the religious official classes, consisted, above all things, in the strict observance of the Sabbath, and the due and regular carrying out of the sacrificial system. Christ had dealt with the former of these, as referred to above; and, in making it a real blessing, had of necessity run directly counter to the traditional rules of observance; that is to say, while holding firmly to the spirit of the Law, He abrogated the Sabbath in the old Jewish sense of the word. The 'cleansing' of the temple denotes His intention of doing the same

* See Bousset, Religion des Juifs, p. 91.

† This attitude of Christ towards the temple and its worship receives corroboration in an exceedingly interesting fragment of a lost Gospel, discovered at Oxyrhynchus, which contains an account of a visit of Christ and His disciples to the temple; they meet there a Pharisee who reproaches them with neglecting to perform the usual purification ceremony before entering the 'holy place' (presumably the Court of the Israelites is meant). Christ, in reply, emphasizes the need of inward purity, compared with which the outward ceremonial is as nothing (cf. Mt 23^{25, 26}, Lk 11³⁷⁻⁴⁰).

§ This was in direct contradiction to the Jewish belief in the inviolability of the temple, see Jos. B.J. vi. v. 2; cf. Bousset, op. cit. p. 97; cf. Ac 7⁴⁸.

* As Judæa was not under the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas, Christ would be more unfettered in His action there.

with the other prime mark of practical Judaism, viz. the sacrificial system. That this is really the inner meaning of the 'cleansing' of the temple, the following considerations will show:

(i.) Excepting on this supposition, there was no meaning in Christ's action: the 'Court of the Gentiles,' where the 'cleansing' took place (see above, ii. 1), was not 'sacred' soil; it cannot, therefore, have been on account of profanation of the temple that Christ acted as He did. The sheep and oxen, doves, and money-changers, were all absolutely essential for the carrying on of the sacrificial system of the time; (Christ's action was too significant to be misunderstood.—(ii.) The stress laid in each of the three Synoptics on the temple being a 'house of prayer,' seems to point in the same direction. There is some significance, too, in the dialogue which took place very shortly after between our Lord and one of the scribes (Mt 12²⁸), when the latter says: '... and to love his neighbour as himself, is much more than whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices,'—words which Christ describes as 'discreet.'—(iii.) The event took place just before the Feast of the Passover, i.e. at a time when the sacrificial animals would be crowding in as they did at no other time of the year. This made Christ's action all the more significant. The whole belief and attitude of the Jews, and people regarding the sacrifices were such that the abrogation of these latter was an indispensable necessity if Christ's teaching was to have practical and permanent results. Vast as the number of public, official sacrifices were, those of private individuals were of an infinitely greater number; it was these latter that formed one of the characteristic marks of the worship at Jerusalem.

'Here, day after day, whole crowds of victims were slaughtered and whole masses of flesh burnt; and when any of the high festivals came round, there was such a host of sacrifices to dispose of that it was scarcely possible to attend to them all, notwithstanding the fact that there were thousands of priests officiating on the occasion. But the people of Israel saw, in the punctilious observance of this worship, the principal means of securing for themselves the favour of their God' (Schürer, HJP II. i. 298).

These considerations seem to show that the 'cleansing' of the temple really did connote an intention in the mind of Christ to abrogate entirely the Jewish sacrificial system; if this is not what it meant, it is difficult to see any point in it at all. In how far Christ intended to mark Himself out as Him in whom was hereafter to be centred a purified, spiritual 'sacrificial system,'—or, in other words, what the relations were between the 'cleansing' of the temple and the words spoken in the upper chamber, 'This is my body,' 'This is my blood,'—is a question which cannot be dealt with here.

If the meaning of the Cleansing of the Temple here advocated be correct, it will at once be seen that few actions of our Lord possessed greater significance.

TEMPTATION.—The word πειράζω (noun πειρασμός, Lk 4¹³ 8¹³ 22²⁸, Mt 6¹³ 26⁴¹; intensive form ἐκπειράζω, Lk 10²⁵, Mt 4⁷) has a neutral, a good, and a bad sense. It may mean simply 'to try,' 'make trial of,' 'test,' for the purpose of ascertaining the quality of a man, what he thinks, or how he will behave himself; but usually there is either a good (Jn 1⁹ 17, also Mt 22⁴⁵) or a bad intent. In the latter sense it means 'to solicit to sin, to tempt.' That the word may be used in the wider sense, even when rendered 'tempt,' must not be forgotten. In Ja 1¹² 'temptation' is used of trial generally, the issue of which is intended to be the crown of life; but in v. 13 'tempted' is used in the sense of solicited to sin; and the writer very emphatically asserts, 'God cannot be tempted (ἀρτεfactus) with evil, and he himself tempteth no man.' This statement seems to be contradicted by Jesus' quotation from Dt 6¹⁶ in His answer to the second temptation in Mt 4⁷, as well as by the sixth petition of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6¹³); but tempting God does not mean soliciting Him to sin, but trying His justice and patience, challenging Him to give proof of His perfection to such a degree as to incur His displeasure, and to expose oneself to His judgment; and the temptations into which God is asked not to lead us, are the circumstances or the states of mind which, though to the strong they might prove the opportunities of winning 'the crown of life' (Ja 1¹²), to weakness may be the occasions of failure and temptation. This weakness of His disciples, notwithstanding their good intentions, Jesus recognizes in His warning in Gethsemane (Mt 26⁴¹), and commends their fidelity to Him in the trying experiences they had shared with Him (Lk 22²⁸). To the enthusiastic but shallow hearers of His words He affirmed that trials (persecution, etc.) would prove morally fatal (Lk 8¹³). The cares and ric of this life (v. 14) He regarded as hindering the higher life. Noteworthy is the emphasis He lays on the peril of wealth (Mt 19^{23, 24}). That Jesus discovered the moral peril in which Judas was placed from the very first indications of distrust and disloyalty to Himself, is suggested by Jn 6^{70, 71}, which shows also the danger He feared for the other disciples. His repeated references to His coming betrayal (Mt 17²² 20¹⁸ 26²), His plain allusion to the presence of the traitor at the Last Supper (Lk 22²¹), His giving the sop to Judas (Jn 13²⁶), may all be regarded as loving endeavours to strengthen him against temptation; and even when all these efforts had proved vain, what good was still in him was appealed to in the words, 'Betrayest thou the Son of Man who is with thee?' Peter, too, was warned against the temptation that threatened him (Lk 22³²); and Jesus, who feared his fall through his self-confident weakness, hoped for his recovery, and the help he could be to others after his recovery, because He believed in the power of His own intercessory prayer.

Jesus Himself was both tried and tempted. He seems to confess His own liability to temptation when He refuses the epithet 'good' (Lk 18¹⁹), although He never confesses to have fallen before temptation; and the attitude He assumes to sinners implies His own sinlessness. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (4¹⁵) states His moral position in the words, 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin'; and St. Paul seems to indicate this liability to temptation without the actuality of sin in the phrase, 'in the likeness of sinful flesh' (Ro 8³). St. Luke's statement that the tempter 'departed from him for a season' (4¹³), and Jesus' own reference to the temptations (Lk 22²⁸) which His disciples had endured with Him, show that the experience in the wilderness was not solitary. It is not improbable even that the narratives of the Temptation (Mt 4^{1–11}, Mk 1^{12–13}, Lk 4^{1–13}) are a summary of a succession of moral trials through which Jesus in the course of His ministry passed, or at least that this record of an early experience has been coloured by reminiscences of later experiences. Be this as it may, we can find in the Gospels indications of similar trials of His fidelity to God. The desire of the people for healing (Jn 4⁴⁸) and bread (6²⁶), the demand of His enemies for a sign (Mt 16¹), the attempt to make Him a king (Jn 6¹⁵), may be regarded as illustrations of the three kinds of temptation recorded. A careful study of the record of the early ministry (in Jn 2-4) warrants the assumption that Jesus was tempted by His enthusiasm (which see) to force the issue between Him and His enemies prematurely, and that the reserve in language and restraint in action He displayed as soon as He had discovered this peril, are to be regarded as a conquest over temptation. His 'escapes,' as Bruce calls them (With Open Face, ch. vii.), were intended, in the later part of His Galilean ministry at least, not only to secure quiet for the training of the Twelve, but to withdraw Him from the danger threatened by His enemies. Had He run risks before His hour, He would have fallen before what seems to be indicated by the Second Temptation (Mt 4⁵⁻⁶). His own family were a source of moral peril to Him. His words to His mother in Cana (Jn 2⁴) are explicable only if in her request He found a suggestion of evil, that He should use His miraculous power at the bidding of His natural affection instead of at God's command alone. The completeness of His repudiation of the claims of His mother and brethren upon Him in relation to His public ministry indicates how intensely He felt this peril (Mt 12⁴⁸⁻⁴⁹). The attempt to influence Him was nevertheless renewed by His brethren, when they advised Him to go up to the feast and so manifest Himself to the world (Jn 7³⁻⁴). Peter was rebuked as the Tempter (Mt 16²³) almost immediately after being commended as the Confessor, because he sought to turn Jesus from His sacrifice. May His refusal of the request of the Syrophenician woman (Mt 15²⁴⁻²⁷) not have been due to the fear lest a ministry of healing among the Gentiles might divert Him from the path of sacrifice to which He knew that His Father called Him? The request of the Greeks also (Jn 12²¹) stirred so deep emotion, because it seemed to suggest the possibility of an escape from the Cross, which had to be rejected as a temptation. The same temptation in its most acute form presents itself in the Agony (which see) in Gethsemane.

Tests or trials which were not felt by Jesus as temptations, but which were intended by His enemies either to discredit Him with the multitude or to obtain some ground of accusation against Him, were the questions addressed to Him at the tribute to Cæsar, the resurrection, and the greatest commandment (Mt 22³⁵⁻⁴⁰), and divorce (Mt 19³). The man with the withered hand in the synagogue (Lk 6⁶⁻⁷) was a trap set for Him, to involve Him in the guilt of Sabbath-breaking; so also was the woman taken in adultery (Jn 8⁶), that He might either by His severity estrange the people, or by His laxity be shown to be in opposition to the Mosaic law. The sufferings and sorrows Jesus passed through were Divinely appointed trials that He might learn obedience, and so be made perfect (He 5⁸⁻²⁰); but it is not necessary here to illustrate this discipline in detail (see STRUGGLES OF SOUL). To the data from the Gospels here presented, a few observations may be added regarding the possibility, the necessity, and the nature of temptation in Jesus' life.

As God cannot be tempted, the liability of Jesus to temptation proves that there was a Divine Kenosis (which see) involved in the incarnation of the Son of God. Jesus could be tempted, because He was limited in knowledge, subject to emotion, and undergoing a moral development. Omniscience has an insight into the moral character of all conduct, and a foresight into the moral issues of all choice, which exclude even the possibility of temptation; omnipotence has such a command over all its moral resources that its moral efforts can never involve any moral strain, such as is experienced in temptation; omniscience and omnipotence, therefore, cannot know the disturbance of feeling which is possible to limited knowledge and power. To ascribe these Divine attributes to the incarnate Son of God is to deny His liability to temptation, and to make His moral development a semblance and not a reality. Liability to temptation, necessary to moral development, does not, however, imply any necessity to sin. There may be growth unto perfection, with a constant choice of good. Temptation does not arise only in a sinful nature. Natural instincts and appetites, which are morally neutral, become sinful only when seen to be in conflict with the will of God as revealed in conscience. The opinions, sentiments, and desires of sinful men may become the occasions of temptation to a sinless nature. Temptation is not sin, involves no necessity of sin, and brings the possibility of sin.

It was necessary for the fulfilment of Christ's vocation as the Saviour of men that He should be tempted without sin. His moral teaching gains force from His moral example, and He can be a moral example to us only because He passed through a human moral development. His own moral struggles enable Him to feel with us in ours (He 4¹⁵). To condemn the sin of mankind (Ro 8³) it was needful for Him not only to suffer for sin, but also to overcome sin by withstanding its assaults.

The nature of His temptation was determined by His unique vocation. The lower passions and appetites seem never to have assailed Him. He was tempted to abuse His miraculous power, His privileged position, His supreme authority as Son of God, to fulfil the popular expectations instead of His own ideal of the Messiahship, to shrink from the agony and desolation of the Cross. His temptations transcended the common experience as much as He Himself did; but, though possible to Him alone, they were as real for Him as are the lower temptations for other men. TEMPTATION (in the Wilderness).—[On the general subject of temptation see preced. article]. The continuousness and variety of our Lord's temptations have probably been obscured by the circumstance that attention has been concentrated upon one episode in His life which is commonly known as 'The Temptation.' This incident is fully related in Mt. 4¹⁻¹³, mentioned in Mk. (12¹³), and omitted from the Fourth Gospel. St. Mark's account is of the briefest: 'And straightway the Spirit urges him forth into the desert. And he was in the desert forty days, tempted by Satan; and he was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered to him.*' The mention of 'wild beasts,' which is peculiar to Mark, is usually supposed to be introduced for the purpose of accentuating the solitariness of Jesus, and His remoteness from all human aid. But Professor Bevan (Trans. of Soc. of Hist. Theol. 1901-2) finds in this mention the key to the whole incident. It seems that in the East, or at any rate in Persia, there is a traditional custom, called 'the subjugation of the jinn.' In order to achieve this victory the candidate retires to a desert place, fasts for forty days, and when the *jinn*s appear in the forms of a lion, a tiger, and a dragon, he must hold his ground fearlessly. Doing so, power over the demons is attained. 'The conclusion,' says Professor Bevan, 'which we may draw from these facts is that the story of the Temptation, in its original form, was a description of a practice by means of which it was believed that man could acquire the power of controlling the demons.' The analogy is interesting. Our Lord in this critical conflict with Satan did 'bind the strong man,' and secured that in all future encounters He would conquer. But is there any evidence at all that the Persian custom prevailed among the Jews? Is there any ground for supposing either that our Lord would follow such a custom, or, on the other hand, that there is no foundation for the story of the Temptation in the facts of His career? And is not the simple expression, ἦν μετὰ τῶν θηρίων, inadequate to suggest such a conflict as is suggested?

* The 'desert' is possibly that known as Quarantania, from the forty days, and since the 12th cent. traditionally accepted as the same, a few miles from Jericho; or it may have been, as Conder thinks, some miles farther south—the dreary desert which extends between the Dead Sea and the Hebron mountains. See his picturesque description, pp. 213 to 214 of his Handbook.

Order of temptations.—In Mt. and Lk. the order of the second and third temptations is inverted, while the substance of them remains identical. The order followed by Mt. is generally accepted as correct. There seems to be an ascending scale in the temptations as recorded in the First Gospel, though Plummer (Lk 4th) says: 'The reasons given for preferring one order to the other are subjective and unconvincing. Perhaps neither Evangelist professes to give any chronological order.'

Source of the story.—As according to all the accounts, Jesus was not accompanied by anyone during His temptation, the question naturally arises, How did the knowledge of what took place become public property? To this there can be but one answer: Our Lord informed His disciples of what had taken place. That He should have done so is probable. At first, perhaps, they might not be prepared to understand the incident; but after they had acknowledged Him as Messiah many questions as to His procedure must have arisen in their minds, and to these questions an account of His initial temptations was the best answer.

Character of the incident.—The more clearly the reality of the Temptation is established, the less need does there seem for supposing that the tempter took a visible shape, or that any bodily transport to 'the wilderness' or 'the wing of the temple' took place. It is more difficult to determine whether such bodily transport was thought of by the Evangelists or is implied in their words. In Lk. the 'high mountain' is omitted except in so far as reference may be found to it in the word ἀναγών. In the Gospel of the Hebrews there occurs a characteristic apocryphal embellishment: 'Forthwith my Mother the Holy Spirit took me by one of the hairs of my head and carried me away to the high mountain of Tabor.'

Its connexion.—In all the Synoptic Gospels and in the development of our Lord's life, the Temptation follows upon the Baptism. In His Baptism He had been proclaimed Messiah, called out of private into public life, summoned to take upon Him a place which could be filled by Him alone. He was called from the carpenter's shop to redeem a world. The village youth was to represent in His person the wisdom, the holiness, the love, the authority of the Highest. How could He face this task? By what hitherto untried methods accomplish it? He had no counsellor, example, or guide. None had as yet attempted or even adequately conceived the part He was to play.

Its necessity.—The burden and glory, the hazard and intricacy and responsibility of His vocation must have stirred in His soul a ferment of emotions. O. Holtzmann may overstate the risk when he says (Life of Jesus, Eng. tr. 141): 'There was a grave danger of His personal life being disturbed by so august a revelation, of its causing Him to plunge headlong into fantastic dreams of the future, and into acts of violence, with the object of realizing His dreams.' Our Lord was not unprepared for the great vocation; He must often have considered how He could best bring light and life to His fellow-countrymen, but now that He was actually launched on the work, all past thoughts must have seemed insufficient, and He felt that still His decisions were to be made. Solitude was necessary. The Spirit that came upon Him in Baptism compelled Him to contemplate action, and in order that He might finally choose His path and His methods He must turn away from the expectant gaze and eager inquiries of John's disciples and seek the solitude of the desert.

Its conditions.—The intensity of our Lord's emotion and the difficulty of decision are conveyed by the Evangelists' statement that for forty days (i.e. for an unusually long period, 'forty' being used as a round number indicative of magnitude) He forgot to eat. This gives us the measure of His absorption in thought. The temptations indeed are spoken of as if they occurred at the close of the forty days' fast; naturally, because then only out of the turmoil of thought did these three possible lines of conduct become disengaged and present themselves as now finally rejected. To one who adequately conceives the stupendous task awaiting our Lord and the various methods of accomplishing it which He had often heard discussed, no statement of His absorption in thought or of the strife of contending pleas will seem exaggerated.

Lines on which the Temptation proceeded.—The key to the Temptation is found in the necessity laid upon Jesus of definitely determining the principles and methods of the great work that awaited Him. There were necessarily present to His mind as possible courses the various expectations current among the people. Eventually these presented themselves in three great questions: Am I as Messiah lifted above human needs and trials? What means may I legitimately use to convince the people of my claims? What kind of Messianic kingdom and Messianic King am I to represent? To each of these questions there was an answer present to the mind of the Lord, cherished by most of the people He was now to influence, and with much which superficially commended it, but which He recognized as Satanic.

The absence of the article before πίς has given rise to the idea that the temptations were not Messianic. Against this it has been pointed out that the predicate is regularly anarthrous. But Middleton (Gr. Article, p. 62) shows that 'we sometimes find that the predicate of the πίς has the Article, where the subject is a personal pronoun or demonstrative, ἐγώ, σὺ, αὗτος, etc.' This rule is borne out by NT usage: see Mt 16¹⁶ 26⁶⁸ 27¹¹, Mk 3¹¹ etc. For this and other reasons we should expect the Article here, if the meaning were, 'If thou art the Son of God,

* B. F. Westcott O. H. Holtzmann (Life of Jesus, 143) says: 'In old times the desert was still inhabited the thickets beside the Jordan (Jer 17) were the age of Jesus the chief beast of prey in Palestine was the jackal. But Mark's sole object in making this addition would appear to have been the desire to bring into greater relief Jesus' complete severance from human society, with the idea of imparting more body to his description.' Dr. Abbott's Chue, p. 115, is suggestive in this connexion.

* 'It is only by travelling that one becomes aware how universal is the application of the number 40 to the features of Oriental architecture. If there is a famous building with something over a score of columns, or a town with a like number of minarets, it will be styled the hall of 40 columns or the city of 40 towers' (Arthur Arnold in Academy, 12 March 1881). "'Forty" means "many"' (Angus, Bible Handbook).

or, the Christ.' The meaning rather is, 'If thou art God's Son' [the emphatic place being given to uios, ei uios ei es theu], if this relationship to God be the determining element in your life. But this by no means excludes reference to His Messianic dignity, it rather implies it. It was as God's Son He had been hailed at His baptism proclaiming His Messianic vocation, and fitly, because Divine Sonship was that out of which the Messiahship sprang, and which underlay the whole vocation of Jesus as the Christ.

First temptation.—The first temptation was to use for His own comfort and preservation the powers committed to Him as Messiah. The circumstances in which He found Himself lent immense force to the appeal. He found Himself faint and ready to perish. What a fiasco would His Messianic calling seem if He died here in the wilderness, and how easily might He find means of relief: 'Say the word.' 'How often shall I tempt you to do ill deeds makes ill deeds do.' Once only in His life can He have suffered more acutely from this same temptation: only when He knew He could command twelve legions of angels to His aid, only when He was tempted, 'He saved others, himself he cannot save.' The use He might legitimately make of His powers as God's Son must once for all be settled: and He settles it by recognizing that having taken human nature He must accept human conditions, and elevate human life not by facing life's temptations on wholly different terms from the normal, but by accepting the whole human conflict: 'Man lives—and I, being man, therefore live—not by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.' He accepted absolutely the human condition with its entire dependence on God. Duty was more than food. His life was to be ruled by intimations of God's will, not by fear of death by starvation. He, like all other men, was in God's hand.

Second temptation.—The second temptation was to establish the Messianic claim by the performance of some astounding feat, such as leaping from the roof of the wing of the temple into the crowded courts below. Once for all our Lord had to settle by what methods His claim could be made good. That which the people so frequently demanded, 'a sign,' must have suggested itself as a possible means of convincing them. And it was an easy means, for was it not written in the book He had pondered as His best guide: 'He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest haply thou dash thy foot against a stone' (Ps 91^{1st})? Were these words not prepared for this Messianic manifestation? Could the people, ever craving for signs, be in any other way led to accept Him as God's messenger? Might not His whole mission fail, might He not miss the accomplishment of God's purpose, if He did not condescend to the weakness of His countrymen and grant them a sign? But now, as always, He saw the incongruity and insufficiency of such signs: 'an evil and adulterous generation seeketh a sign, and no sign shall be given to it' (Mt 12³⁹ ||). But that which settles the matter in His own mind is the consideration that to attempt the performance of any such feat would be a tempting of God. He rebuts the temptation with the words, 'Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.' He perceived that He had no right to expect the protection of God in any course but the highest, in any course which His own conscience told Him was a short cut to His end. To abandon the region of man's actual needs and work wonders not for their relief and as the revelation of God's love, but for mere display, was, He felt, to trespass the Father's intentions. He could not count upon the Father's countenance and help if He departed in the slightest degree from His own highest ideal. Spiritual ends must be attained by spiritual means, however slow and uncertain these seem.

Third temptation.—The third question which had now once for all to be settled was, What kind of kingdom must the Messiah establish? Shall it be a kingdom of this world, such as many expected and would promptly aid Him to secure? The glory of the kingdom of the earth had a present lustre all its own. There was in their power and opportunity an appeal to beneficent ambition not easily resisted. What might not be accomplished for the down-trodden, the heavily-taxed, the outcast, the despised? He had Himself groaned with the lot of His countrymen under the unrighteous exactions of fraudulent publicans; why not win for His people the freedom? More than once this thought came in the attempts of the multitude to make Him a king. But our Lord perceived that for Him to depart from the idea of a spiritual kingdom in which God should be acknowledged would be to serve Satan. The craving for earthly dominion was inextricably mixed up with worldly ambitions, and could only be gratified by the use of means alien to the Divine Spirit. He felt such a kingdom to be incompatible with the sole and exclusive service of God—not that all earthly kingdoms are necessarily Satanic, but His calling was to introduce the true reign of God among men. He saw that in order to win earthly dominion He would require to appeal to evil passions and use such means as the sword—in a word, to avail Himself of the aid of evil. This was impossible.

MARCUS DODS.

TENT (σκηνή).—The light shelter of the nomad, here to-day and away to-morrow, is an apt symbol of what is fleeting and transitory. This lends the suggestion of irony to our Lord's phrase (Lk 16⁹) 'eternal tents.' The notion of transiency is uppermost also in 2 Co 5¹⁻⁴ (σκήνος).

The ordinary Eastern tent is made of black goats'-hair cloth, spun and woven by the women with very primitive implements. The women pitch the tents, and on removing they strike and pack them for the journey. The roof is supported by three rows of posts, from 6 feet to 8 feet in height, the middle row being highest. It is stretched by cords fastened to the edges, and attached to pegs driven firmly into the ground. The 'walls' are hung like curtains round the eaves, and a breadth of cloth across the tent cuts off the women's compartment from that open to the public. It is an effective shelter from the sun. When wet, the cloth shrinks and becomes quite waterproof. σκηνή may also mean a hut, booth, or other temporary structure, like those made by the Arabs of el-Huleh from the reeds that abound in the marshes close by the base of Hermon. Peter was doubtless familiar with these rude peasant structures, the leafy shelters erected on the roofs for cool retreat in summer, and the booths for the Feast of Tabernacles (Mt 17¹ etc.).

TERAH.—Father of Abraham; named as a link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3³⁴).

TESTAMENT.—1. The Gr. word διαθήκη, tr. 'covenant' Lk 17² AV, 'testament' Mt 26²⁸ || Mk 14²⁴, Lk 22²⁰ AV and RVm, is in RV, U. cc., uniformly 'covenant.' The last of these passages is bracketed by WH as a 'very early interpolation.' The word does not occur elsewhere in the Gospels. The rendering 'covenant' (wh. see) is unquestionably right: 'testament' has come from the Lat. Versions.

2. In classical literature διαθήκη denoted a will, and in the Greek sense (Ar. Av. 440, if an ancient Greek will, however, was rather than a will in the Roman (i.e. the modern) sense. In it the conditions of inheritance were, indeed, in the first place at the sole discretion of the testator, but it was publicly and solemnly executed, and thereupon at once became absolute, irrevocable, and unalterable.

3. The LXX translators adopted the word as the equivalent of the Heb. ברית. The following considerations are supposed to have influenced their choice:—(a) διαθήκη represented essentially a 'one-sided covenant,' συνθήκη (the ordinary word) a mutual one; (b) διαθήκη was charged with religious ideas, inasmuch as the Greek will conveyed the religious institutions as well as the property of the family (cf. the similar case of the Hebrew 'birth-right'). It may possibly also have been used, in the popular spoken dialect, in a wider sense than that of a will.

4. (a) The special reference in Lk 17² [= Ps 105^{ff.}] is to the covenant with Abraham (Gn 15. 17). (b) The words of Mt 26²⁸, Mk 14²⁴ [Lk 22²⁰] are plainly drawn from Ex 24⁸. The addition of 'new' (AV, RVM) in Mt. and Mk., ll. cc., has small MS authority, and is rejected in RV text: it is due to 1 Co 11². Yet the idea of a 'new covenant' had been the theme of OT prophets (cf. Jer 31^{31ff.} etc.), and its application to the Christian covenant was in current use among the Apostles: the 'old' covenant in the biblical sense was the Mosaic not the Abrahamic (2 Co 3⁶, He 9⁵ etc.), and the allusion to Ex 24⁸ seems tacitly to suggest the same contrast here.

F. S. RANKEN.

TETRARCH (τετράρχης is the classical form, but in NT the MS evidence is strongly in favour of τετραρχος [Tisch., WH, and Nestle]).—The title is used in the Gospels of Antipas (Mt 14¹, Lk 3¹⁻¹⁹ 9⁷), and of Philip and Lysanias (Lk 3¹). Originally it denoted the ruler of a fourth part of a country or province. Euripides (Alc. 1154) is the earliest writer to use the term τετραρχία, and applies it to Thebes, which in primitive times was divided for civil administration into four districts. This arrangement was restored in the constitution given by Philip of Macedon (Demos. Philipp. iii. 26, where the word is clearly technical and free from the doubt in which Euripides leaves it). A similar system was met with in Galatia, where each of the three tribes had its four tetrarchs (Strabo, 430, 566 f.). Pompey afterwards reduced the number to three, one for each tribe, but retained the original title (Appian, Mithridat. 46). Thenceforward, if not at an even earlier date, the name lost its etymological meaning, and could be applied to any petty dependent prince, subordinate in rank to kings but enjoying some of the prerogatives of sovereignty (Cic. pro Milone, xxviii. 76; Hor. epod. 12; Tac. Ann. xv. 25; et al.). Such tetrarchs seem to have been numerous, especially in Syria. Antony conferred the title upon both Herod and his brother Phasael (Jos. Ant. xiv. xiii. 1, BJ i. xii. 5); but the rank was almost purely titular, and left them inferior in dignity to the high priest, Hyrcanus II. In B.C. 30 another brother, Pheroras, was made tetrarch of Peræa (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3), the nominal honour being maintained on an income granted by Herod himself. In the Gospels the etymological signification of the term has evaporated. For, though Herod divided his kingdom into four parts, the one assigned to Salome consisted merely of a palace with the revenue of certain so-called free towns, and was in no sense a tetrarchy. With this exception, his kingdom was divided into three parts, and the title of 'tetrarch' was conferred by the will of Rome upon Antipas and Philip, whilst that of 'ethnarch,' or recognized head of a nation, was similarly bestowed upon Archelaus. On two occasions Antipas is styled 'king' (Mt 14⁹, cf. 14¹, Mk 6^{14-22.28f.}); and the obvious explanation is that his subjects were encouraged, and some of them perhaps disposed, to speak of him by the higher title, for which Rome had substituted a lower, without any allusion to its strict meaning. Similarly in the case of Lysanias. He was ruler of the district of Abila in the Lebanon, which had been severed from the kingdom of Ituræa on the execution of Lysanias I. in B.C. 36. That kingdom was in the course of time broken up into three parts, of which Abilene formed one, with another Lysanias as its tetrarch (Jos. Ant. xviii. vi. 10, xix. v. 1; CIG 4521, 4523). The term may have been selected because of the smallness of the district in comparison with the earlier kingdom: it preserves no record of the division into three parts, or association of tribes into four parts. In the Gospels the tetrarch is merely a petty prince, dependent upon Rome for the retention of his few emblems of sovereignty, whilst encouraged to self-repression and loyal service by an occasional recognition of a higher dignity.

TEXT OF THE GOSPELS.—1. The problem.—

All true criticism must begin by taking cognizance of, and as far as possible accounting for, the facts. The leading facts in regard to the text of the Gospels may be briefly stated as follows:

(i.) A Greek text substantially the same as the text underlying the AV has been almost universally accepted by Christendom as the authentic Greek text from about the year A.D. 350 till the development in modern times of the critical study of the text of the NT. This text is found in the great mass of existing Greek MSS, and was used by almost all ecclesiastical writers from Chrysostom onwards. Translated into Syriac, under the name of the Peshitta version, it was used by most of the Syriac-speaking Churches from at least the 4th cent. onwards. It was the only Greek text printed on the revival of learning in the West, and received the name of Textus Receptus (TR) from an expression used in the preface to the second Elzevir edition, 1633: 'textum ergo habes nunc ab omnibus receptum, in quo nihil immutatum aut corruptum damus.'

(ii.) Against this general unanimity in regard to the Greek text must be set the fact that the Churches of the West read the Gospels in the Latin translation of Jerome (A.D. 384), according to a text substantially different from the TR. Moreover, existing MSS and Patristic quotations of the earlier Latin versions differed from the TR even more fundamentally, and similar types of text are found to have been very widely spread, speaking in a general sense, and occur in some important MSS, in many ancient Versions, and in the quotations of many Christian writers, especially in the earliest times. This text (or, more correctly speaking, texts of this type) has been named 'Western'; and, although it has long been well known that the term is not exclusively applicable in a geographical sense (indeed, it is quite possible that at least some members of this family may have had their rise in the East), yet for the sake of convenience it must for the present be employed.

(iii.) But a few of our earliest Greek MSS, supported by the quotations of the most scholarly Fathers of the earlier centuries, and by a few Versions, present a different text, which has commended itself on its intrinsic merits, as well as on account of its proved antiquity, to most modern critical scholars: it forms the base of practically all the modern critical editions, and of our English RV.

2. The Received Text.—A text substantially the same as the TR has been called by Dean Burgon and his school the 'Traditional Text'; by Dr. Hort (in the Introduction* to Westcott and Hort's The New Testament in the Original Greek) the 'Syrian' Text. Hort also suggests the name 'Antiochian,' which is preferable, because it avoids any chance of confusion with the totally distinct Syriac versions. For reasons that will be explained later on in this article, Hort considers that the Antiochian text affords practically no evidence for the reconstruction of the original Greek of the NT, and he may therefore be considered as the most extreme opponent of the TR. In his opinion (Introduction, § 185) the Antiochian text 'must be the result of a recension in the proper sense of the word, a work of attempted criticism, performed deliberately by editors and not merely by scribes.' He further divides this into two stages in the revision, and thinks that the final process was completed by 350 or thereabouts, and that the first process took place at some date between 250 and 350. According to Burgon and his close follower Miller, these recensions are purely human creations; they believe the Church of Antioch (in company, no doubt, with practically all the Greek-speaking Churches) to have preserved the pure text from the first. It is at any rate certain that Chrysostom used this text: he was born at Antioch about the middle of the 4th cent., and lived in that city till 398, when he became bishop of Constantinople. We have seen above that even the main opponents of this text allow that it took its final shape probably about the time of Chrysostom's birth. From that time onwards it held practically undisputed sway, and the main mass of later MSS contain it. When at length, some time after the introduction of printing, the first New Testaments in Greek were published, they naturally rested on the MSS in ordinary ecclesiastical use, and thus the Antiochian text became the 'Received' Greek text of modern Christendom, from which our own AV was made.

As has been shown above, the history of the printed text in the 16th cent. is part of the history of the Antiochian text; although of no critical importance, it is a subject very full of interest. [A good short account of the early printed editions will be found in Scrivener's Plain Introduction (ed. Miller, 1894), vol. II. ch. vii. Cf. also Tregelles, Account of the Printed Text of the Greek NT, 1854]. The NT was first printed in Greek as vol. v. of the Complutensian Polyglot Bible. This magnificent work was completed by Cardinal Ximenes, Archbishop of Toledo, and was printed at Alcalá (now Madrid), where he had founded a university. The OT was printed in Hebrew, Latin, and Greek; the Apocrypha and NT in Greek and Latin. The edition containing the NT (which was the first to be printed) was completed on 16th Jan. 1514; but owing to the death of the truly great Cardinal, the publication of the whole work was delayed, the Pope's licence not being granted till 22nd March 1520. Meanwhile, in order to forestall the Spanish edition, John Froben, the celebrated publisher at Basle, employed Erasmus to prepare an edition of the NT in Greek, accompanied by a revised Latin version: this was hurried through the press, and published in 1516. Erasmus published subsequent editions in 1519, 1522, 1527, and 1535. Other editions followed, those of Robert Stephen (especially the first, which was regarded by many as the standard text), Theodore Beza (1565), and the brothers Elzevir. All printed editions of the NT prior to the great founders of textual criticism, were based upon the TR until 1831, when Lachmann published a text constructed directly from the ancient documents.

Whatever may be the ultimate verdict of textual criticism, the TR must always remain a monument worthy of deep veneration and of close study. It is an essential factor in the history of the development of Christianity. Through it the Spirit of God has, during the greater part of the existence of the Church of Christ, spoken to the greater number of her members. It has controlled the doctrine and the life of Christians, and by its means we have been freed, in part at least, from the heavy yoke of mediæval sacerdotalism and superstition. Those who translated it into modern languages have left us in their work something of their own life and spirit. If extent of influence for good is to be our criterion, then surely, whatever its origin, the TR and the translations made from it bear the impress of the seal of God's Spirit, and have an unsurpassed and almost unsurpassable claim to the veneration and gratitude of mankind.

This much every thinking Christian will surely grant. But it is a different thing to go on to say: 'therefore this text must be . . . authentic text.' It would be as logical to say: 'because the gospel was given to the world in the Greek language, therefore Jesus must have spoken in the same language. It is quite in accordance with our experience of God's methods of working that He should employ an instrument fashioned and conditioned not only by the circumstances under which it took its rise, but also by those through which it has passed in the course of its history.'

It is an unfortunate thing that Burgon and Miller's writings seem to imply (we believe, indeed, that the Dean stated it in so many words) that of necessity God must have provided for the accurate preservation of the text of the book which He had given to man. It appears to have been inconceivable to Burgon that the true text should be any other than that commonly accepted by the Church: to him the Church was the guardian of Holy Writ in the same sense as we believe her to be the guardian of the Christian faith. This view, even though not expressly stated, is felt to underlie the student's conclusions, then those conclusions are removed from the domain of matters with which the critic can deal. They may, as in the case of views as to the authority of the Church in matters of faith, or of theories as to the inspiration of the Bible, conceivably rest on a true spiritual perception, but they do not rest on evidence, with which alone the critic is competent to deal. We have pointed out above that a large, and the most enlightened, portion of the Christian Church read the Scriptures in the Vulgate, or Latin translation of Jerome, and regarded it as the only authoritative exponent of the true text and sense of the original. There never has been a unanimous tradition as to the text of Scripture: only for the three centuries that followed the first printing of the Greek NT has there been even an appearance of such unanimity. But though the writings of Burgon and Miller force one to the conclusion that for them personally their theory rested on a priori grounds, yet they have with great labour, assiduity, and learning collected a vast amount of evidence in support of the 'Traditional Text.' Unfortunately, Burgon wrote in such a contemptuous manner of the leading textual critics and of the most ancient MSS of the NT that most of his work has the appearance of an ex parte statement rather than of a solid contribution to the investigation of a difficult problem. Miller, who edited and completed many of Burgon's papers after his death, adopted a more temperate tone; but so much of Burgon's language is incorporated, that the subject is still treated rather after the fashion of a polemical controversy than of a critical investigation. Moreover, Burgon's contention was that the 'Traditional Text' is the only one that has any claim to be regarded as the true text; all documents that differ from it are treated as of practically no value. Hort, on the other hand, considered the 'Traditional' or 'Antiochian' text to be valueless as evidence. Thus the subject has been treated at its extreme points, and neither side has taken sufficient trouble to discover how much truth is contained in the views of the other side. We lay a good deal of stress on this matter, because we think there has been a strong disposition to regard the 'Traditional Text' as a hobby of Burgon's, and to treat his defence of it with the same contempt that he poured so freely on others.

* This Introduction was written by Dr. Hort, and will in this article be cited under his name, though the two editors accept joint responsibility for it.

3. Hort's 'Syrian' or 'Antiochian' Text. — In part iii. of Hort's Introduction, chapter ii. bears the heading, 'Results of the Inquiry into the "Proper" Text'. Section i. (§§ 130-168) is devoted to proving the posteriority of Antiochian to other known types of readings. We hope to show later on that the evidence here adduced is not entitled to be called 'conclusive' in a strict sense, but with this we are not at the moment concerned. Hort begins (§ 130) by stating the incontrovertible fact that all great variations of text were prior to the 5th cent., since the text of Chrysostom and other Syrian Fathers of the 4th cent. is substantially identical with the common late text: and § 131 the text of every other considerable group of documents is shown by abundant evidence of Fathers and Versions to be of equal or greater antiquity. If we were living in the age of Chrysostom, the problem to be solved would in all essential points be the same as it is now. Hort then adduces three lines of evidence to prove the posteriority of Antiochian readings: (i.) by analysis of conflate readings (§§ 132-151), (ii.) by Ante-Nicene Patristic evidence (§§ 152-162), (iii.) by internal evidence of Syrian (i.e. Antiochian) readings (§§ 163-168). We must deal with each of these divisions separately.

(i.) When one reading is found in one group of documents, another in a second group, and the two different readings are found combined in a third group, this reading is said to be 'conflate.' Of course it has to be assumed that the first two readings are prior to the conflate reading, or else it is not a conflate reading at all. Thus the argument goes in a circle, unless either it can be proved that the two separate readings existed at a time when it can be shown that the conflate reading did not, or the conflate reading is so obviously wrong that it cannot conceivably be the original reading. If neither of these conditions is fulfilled, then conclusions based on the so-called conflate readings are matters of judgment, not of evidence. Hort adduces and examines eight cases of readings which he believes to be conflate: in each case, according to his view, the Antiochian text has combined two separate readings found in earlier texts. Obviously eight examples, taken four from Mark and four from Luke, afford but a slender foundation on which to build: it may be, and has been, urged that these eight examples are only specimens taken from a large number available, but until further examples are collected and published the case must be judged by the eight given.

For the sake of illustration, we give here the main readings in the instance selected for special discussion by Hort. In Mk 6:3 (following and the people saw them going, and many knew them, and they ran there together on foot from all the cities) we find the following readings:

καὶ προῆλθον αὐτοῖς (and outwent them), NB lect 49 Lat. vg Boh Arm and (with προῆλθον for προῆλθεν) LA 13 lect 89; Syr. vg has καὶ προῆλθεν αὐτῶν ἐκεῖ.

καὶ συνῆλθον αὐτοῦ (and came together there), Dfr 28, 604 b (2nd d. ff. i. r have καὶ ἦλθον αὐτοῦ, a simply et venerunt, Syr. sin and when they came: these documents might be taken to support either of the shorter readings).

καὶ προῆλθον αὐτοῖς καὶ συνῆλθον πρὸς αὐτὸν (and outwent them, and came together unto him), all known uncials, except the five named above, all cursive except Gr. 17, f. q. Syr. hcl. Eth.

In this case it will be noticed that there is no evidence to show that καὶ συνῆλθον πρὸς αὐτὸν alone was ever read; moreover, the evidence for καὶ προῆλθον αὐτοῦ is very slender, and quite possibly later than the supposed conflation. Mill suggested with much probability that D omitted the words and outwent them because they contradicted Mt 14:13 and Lk 9:11 'the crowds followed him.' Swete, ad loc., quotes 33 as reading συνῆλθον πρὸς αὐτοῖς καὶ συνῆλθον πρὸς αὐτὸν: this appears to have been another way of getting rid of the words objected to. The reading of the mass of MSS. in good sense that Hort himself says (§ 136), 'The text is so smooth, and the sense that would tempt to alteration is so smooth, and there is neither contradiction nor manifest tautology'; and again (§ 138), 'Had it been the only extant reading, it would have roused no suspicion.' But Swete, ad loc., argues that the fresh point made by the reading 'simply spoils the point of ἐκεῖ' (which is allowed" (Mt., Luke) the Lord to the desert region (ἐκεῖ), but the actual arrival at His presence was due to His act, not theirs, for He "came out" of His retirement in some meet them." But Swete, ad loc., far too ἐξῆλθεν to mean 'having landed,' and that Hort could find to the language of the ground: the crowd were the first to reach the spot whither Jesus and His disciples came on the beach to meet Him; and that He realized that He could not secure the quiet He sought. It is therefore quite possible that the reading of NBLA is due to the accidental omission of a clause.

In none of the eight cases can it be proved that the two parts of the longer reading both existed separately at a time when the combined reading did not exist, and it is a matter of opinion whether the readings in which the two separate ones are combined are likely to be right or not.

Dr. Salmon (Some Thoughts on the Textual Criticism of the NT, p. 68) says that 'Canon Cook elaborately discussed Hort's eight cases, contending that in every one of them the conflation hypothesis gives the less probable account of the facts.' He adds: 'In each of these cases I did not myself follow Hort altogether without misgivings.' Miller also discusses the supposed conflations in Appendix ii. of his 'Causes of Corruption,' and makes out a fairly good case for the originality of the supposed conflate readings.

(ii.) Hort's next argument to prove the posteriority of Antiochian readings is founded on Ante-Nicene Patristic evidence.

It will be convenient to follow Hort's example in giving at this point a general outline of the character and the advantages and difficulties experienced in using it. To begin with, the material is necessarily very fragmentary in most senses than one. Each writer quotes but a limited number of passages, so that it is only in the case of a few specially prominent passages that we can get together a really representative collection of Patristic quotations. It follows that any kind of Patristic apparatus is more or less deceptive. It may be, for instance, that Origen has a reading which agrees with MSS. now lost, but by critical writers, but that the passage quoted by him is quoted by Clement of Alexandria. Here we are placed in a difficulty, because Clement and Origen did not by any means always agree, and, if a quotation had been preserved in which Clement used a different reading, it would be probable that Origen's reading did not belong to the text as it was at Alexandria, but that he had obtained it from some other source; his evidence, therefore, would be simply of a personal character. It is necessary, therefore, in weighing Patristic evidence to deal with the author's quotations as a whole, in order to form a judgment of the character of the text he used. When Clement's and Origen's quotations are thus dealt with, it is found that Origen in part agrees with the text most favoured by critical editors, but that his predecessor Clement used a substantially different text of a 'Western' type; Origen too, in part, followed 'Western' texts: the conclusions to which these phenomena lead will be discussed later on. The important point to note at this stage is that the whole mass of a writer's quotations must be treated as one whole, and that, while we are not at all to be deterred from using our knowledge of it as only fragmentary, and necessarily confined as far as details are concerned to the passages explicitly quoted.

A moment's reflection on the way in which the Fathers used in extempore sermons or in conversation their quotations will show that a writer's quotations may not always represent the text that he considered the best, supposing him to have formed a critical judgment on the subject. Natural looseness of quotation from memory, familiarity with more than one text, and the like, may all account for the existence of genuine variant readings. A knowledge of the proneness of the human brain to repeat a mistake once made, will render us cautious even when a writer quotes a passage more than once in the same unusual form. Even with great care and wide experience it is difficult for a student to feel sure that a quotation gives the reading which the writer, in answer to a direct question, would have deliberately stated to be the right one.

Moreover, we often feel great doubt whether the quotation stands in our printed editions in its original form. The works of many Greek Fathers have been notoriously badly edited, and it is only when we have had personal experience of the editor's methods that we can feel any security that full advantage has been taken of the MSS and other evidence available. Dr. Nestle (in his Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the Greek NT, Eng. tr. 1901, p. 145) refers to an extreme instance of supineness

And when we go behind the editions, we often find that only a few MSS are consulted, and we have to follow the editor's guesswork. The MSS are often so corrupt that the editor is forced to conjecture. The MSS are often so corrupt that the editor is forced to conjecture. The MSS are often so corrupt that the editor is forced to conjecture.

The case of Fathers writing in Greek presents further difficulties. The Greek text is often so corrupt that the editor is forced to conjecture. The MSS are often so corrupt that the editor is forced to conjecture. The MSS are often so corrupt that the editor is forced to conjecture.

We have seen how this matter in order to show how the MSS are often so corrupt that the editor is forced to conjecture. The MSS are often so corrupt that the editor is forced to conjecture. The MSS are often so corrupt that the editor is forced to conjecture.

But, again, we must remember that the remains of Ante-Nicene Christian literature that have come down to us are very fragmentary. The only period for which we have anything like a sufficiency of representative knowledge consists roughly of three centuries, from about 175 to 450 (Hort, § 138). Beside Clement and Origen, Hort names Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Tertullian, Cyprian, and Novatian, belonging to the period named; Methodius towards the close of the 3rd cent.; and Eusebius of Caesarea in the first third of the 4th century. 'The text used,' writes Hort (§ 159), 'by all those Ante-Nicene Greek writers, not being connected with Alexandria, who have left considerable remains, is substantially Western.'

We are now in a position to consider the value of the argument for the posteriority of Antiochian readings which Hort bases on Ante-Nicene Patristic evidence: it is an argumentum ex antiquitate—that no extant writer before Chrysostom used the Antiochian text. The force of this argument is considerably lessened if we reflect that, had the writings of Origen perished, we should have had practically no Ante-Nicene Patristic evidence for the type of text contained in the RV.

Miller (The Traditional Text, p. 94 ff.) has attempted to prove the antiquity of the Traditional or Antiochian text by a wide appeal to Patristic evidence. In a sense he fails, because if a reading is shown to be older than the supposed revision which produced the Antiochian text, it is said by the school of Hort to be not distinctively Antiochian, but a 'Western' reading adopted by the revisers. To one who does not adopt an extreme view on either side, this will probably appear very like a fight over empty names. The Antiochian text confessedly contained an ancient element, and the real question is whether critical editors have paid sufficient attention to the evidence afforded by it. Call the text by what name you will, but let it be judged on the intrinsic value of its readings, not in accordance with uncertain theories. Its very existence forms evidence in favour of certain types of the Western text, which must go back to the 2nd cent., as is shown by Miller; and the real question at issue is, What weight is to be attached to the evidence of these texts?

(iii.) The judgment of such a scholar as Dr. Hort on the intrinsic value of the Antiochian readings must carry the greatest weight. It will be most satisfactory to quote his own words. 'Another step is gained by a close examination of all readings distinctively Syrian (Antiochian) in the sense explained above, comparing them on grounds of Internal Evidence, Transcriptional and Intrinsic, with the corresponding passages. The result is... to the hypothesis which was... excluded by the phenomena of the conflate readings, namely that in other cases, where the Syrian text differs from all other extant ancient texts, its authors may have copied some other equally ancient and perhaps purer text now otherwise lost' (§ 163). This decision may be regarded either as an expression of subjective judgment, in which case its value will vary according to the estimate formed of its author's ability as a critic; or else it can be regarded as the result of certain lines of argument, in which case it is the business of other critics to examine those arguments.

The conclusions which Hort reached in regard to the conflate readings discussed above rest on, and indeed may be fairly considered to assume the truth of, his views as to the genealogical relations of the different families into which he divides all extant NT documents. His whole text is indeed based on those views; and therefore, if we are to discuss the problem before us intelligently, it is essential to have correct knowledge of the exact nature of genealogical evidence, and of how far it is available for the criticism of the NT text.

It is an obvious truth that, if the original of a document exists, no number of copies will possess any value for settling its text, which can be ascertained by reference to the document itself. This is the simple ground on which all genealogical evidence rests. If three independent copies have been made of a document which has itself perished, it may fairly be assumed that where all three agree they correctly represent the original; and further, in cases where two of the copies agree against the third, we shall confidently judge that these two preserve the right text, and that the third is in error. Now suppose that fifty copies have been made of this third original copy, and that it has itself perished, then it is clear that the evidence of the two extant primary copies outweighs the evidence of the fifty secondary ones. In this example it is assumed that the exact parentage of every copy is known. This is, of course, seldom the case with the MSS of ancient authors; but when the parentage of every MS concerned can be ascertained, from which there can be no appeal.

This matter is of such importance that it is worth while to illustrate further what we have said, by reference to an actual instance. A fair number of MSS exist of the Paedagogus of Clement of Alexandria. In one family of these, consisting of eight or more members, a passage of considerable length is left out. Now two leaves have been lost from a MS preserved at Florence (called F), which contained exactly this passage; it is therefore beyond doubt that the MSS referred to were copied from F after the loss of these leaves, and they are therefore of no value as evidence. There exists also at Paris another MS (P), considerably older than F. At one time there was some little doubt about the relation existing between these two MSS; but after a time it was pointed out by a German scholar, Dr. Stahl, that certain notes that were written in P by different people and at different times, are written in P in the hand of the original scribe; this makes it certain that F was copied, directly or indirectly, from P, and it can therefore also be put aside. Further researches showed that every known MS of the work was derived from P, which consequently forms our only authority for the text. It is very seldom that such certain results as these can be reached in actual practice. It is generally possible to group MSS to some extent by observing their agreement in obvious errors, because it is not likely that different scribes would make the same mistakes independently in several different places. It is obvious that the confidence with which we can employ genealogical evidence is proportionate to the certainty with which the relations of the MSS have been ascertained. In the case of certain cursive MSS of the Gospels strictly genealogical evidence is forthcoming, and it has been shown that the cursives 13, 69, 124, 346, and certain others, are derived from one common ancestor; but, except for this one important and interesting case, the genealogical relations of Gospel MSS are matters of deduction, if not of guesswork.

It appears, then, that it is impossible to acquiesce in Hort's unqualified condemnation of the Antiochian text, so far as that condemnation rests on (i.) the analysis of conflate readings, which presupposes certain 'Western' relations to exist between certain groups of MSS., and involves an argument in a vicious circle, because those relations cannot be independently shown to exist; and (ii.) so far as it rests on Patristic evidence, this being precarious from its fragmentary character, while at the same time it does prove that the Antiochian text contains a very ancient element. It remains, therefore, to judge this text on its intrinsic merits.

4. The generally accepted Critical Text.—Once again, it is a view that we must principally concern ourselves, because WH's text is the only one published which can be regarded as in any way self-consistent. No textual student would place much confidence in Tischendorf's judgment, which is embodied in his editio octava critica major; the Greek text underlying the RV does not appear to have been formed in accordance with any ascertainable principle; and Weymouth's 'Resultant Text,' and similar editions, founded on the consensus of critical editors, from their nature have no independent critical value. We have, therefore, to consider the principles on which WH founded their text. We have already shown how the great mass of documents, containing an Antiochian text, were set on one side. The pre-Antiochian texts Hort divided into three families, and, on what appears to many to be insufficient grounds, assumed that they stood in certain general relations to one another. One of these families consists of the group of texts commonly called 'Western'; after setting these aside as obvious corruptions of the original text, only a small body of MSS, Versions, and Fathers remains. This small residuum, however, Hort proceeds to again divide into 'Neutral' and 'Alexandrian' documents. It is now, we think we may say, generally admitted that this distinction cannot be maintained. Some Thoughts on the Textual Criticism of the NT, p. 50 ff. P. sees as 'Alexandrian' the documents which usually agree with Codex B, when they differ from B and are not supported by much Western evidence. We shall therefore treat these documents as forming one group, and distinguish the readings, as Salmon suggests, as early and later Alexandrian. Hort frankly admitted the close relation existing between his Neutral and Alexandrian readings, since he conceived both sets of readings to be derived from a common non-Western ancestor; this led him, in the case of an important set of readings, which he called 'Western non-interpolation,' to prefer the testimony of a small group of Western documents to the practically unanimous evidence of all other documents.

It will be convenient here to give a list of the main documents with which criticism has to deal. We begin with those which more or less regularly support the Alexandrian readings. See also art. MANUSCRIPTS.

- B, the famous Codex Vaticanus, assigned to the 4th cent., is by far the most interesting; according to Hort, it contains a purely 'Neutral' text in the Gospels.
- Ⲁ, Codex Sinaiticus, discovered by Tischendorf on Mt. Sinai, and probably to be assigned to the 4th century. This MS is thought by Hort to be free from Antiochian readings, but to contain a 'mixed' text, that is, one in which Western, Neutral, and Alexandrian elements are all found, though in the Gospels he looks on it as largely Neutral; this is equivalent to saying that its agreements with B are very numerous.
- C, Codex Ephraemi Rescriptus, a palimpsest preserved at Paris, and belonging probably to the 5th century. The text of this MS is undoubtedly of great importance. Miller (Plain Int. 4 vol. i. p. 128) well describes its text as 'standing nearly midway between A and B, somewhat inclining to the latter.' Hort considers C to contain an Antiochian and also a Western element.
- L, Codex Regius, preserved at Paris, belonging to the 8th century. This MS is especially remarkable for the number of readings it has in common with B. According to Hort (§ 209), 'The foundation of the text is Non-Western Pre-Syrian.' But he adds: 'The fundamental text has been largely mixed with late Western and with Syrian elements.'

- T. Under this symbol are placed several fragments of MSS containing a Greek text and a translation in the dialect of Lower Egypt (Sahidic or Thebaic). They range in date from the 5th to the 7th century.
- X, Codex Monacensis, preserved at Munich, of the 9th or 10th cent., has a fundamentally Antiochian text, but is of interest because it often joins with CL in giving readings which may be regarded as late Alexandrian.
- Z, Codex Dublinensis Rescriptus, perhaps to be assigned to the 4th cent., contains 235 verses of Mt. in 22 fragments. The text is apparently pre-Antiochian, and agrees more closely with Ⲁ than with B.
- Δ, Codex Sangallensis, of the 9th or 10th cent., has an ordinary Antiochian text, except in Mk., in which Gospel it has many readings in common with CL.
- Ξ, Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae, of the 8th cent., belongs to the Bible Society in London. This MS contains 342 verses of Lk., giving an apparently pre-Antiochian text, in which both Western and Alexandrian elements are found.
- 1, A minuscule, preserved at Basle, assigned to the 10th, 12th, or 13th cent., often agrees with ⲀB and BL.
- 33, A minuscule of the 10th cent., preserved at Paris, has been called 'the queen of cursives.' It has a very interesting text, containing many ancient elements, but agreeing now with one, now with another type of readings.

The ancient Egyptian Versions, as might be expected, to some extent support the Alexandrian text; but there is so much uncertainty in regard to these Versions that it is not easy to reckon with them as an element in the critical problem presented to us. Forbes Robinson, in his art. 'Egyptian Versions' in Hastings' DB, declines to follow Hort in assigning one, if not both, of the two Versions (i.e. the Bohairic and the Sahidic), or at least parts of them, to the close of the 2nd century. He thinks that the Sahidic Version, which was the earlier of the two; and it must be regarded as fundamentally Western rather than Alexandrian. The Bohairic (misleadingly called Coptic, a name of Memphitic Version, current in Lower Egypt, and usually agreed in general with B, and perhaps even more closely with the text used by Cyril of Alexandria. If it has to be assigned to a date as late as the middle of the 3rd cent., it is evident that it may be the result of the type of text then current in Alexandria, and cannot be used as evidence for the greater antiquity of that text. The remains of the other two Versions—those current in Middle Egypt—are so scanty that they offer little help at present.

It would be easy to extend this list by including documents which support the Alexandrian text, but it will be found that the nucleus of the attestation for most of Hort's readings lies practically in the group ⲀBCLX 33, often supported by the Egyptian versions.

At the same time, it is most necessary to bear in mind that the greater part of the attestation for Hort's readings is often afforded by documents which he classes as Western, and whose evidence he would put on one side were it not supported by some member or members of the Alexandrian group. We proceed, therefore, to give a list of the main Western documents, which have not already been mentioned as containing an Alexandrian element.

D. Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae, of the 6th century. This is in many ways the most interesting MS of the Gospels extant; its text is, to a great extent, unique, and gains in interest and importance from the support which it often receives from the most ancient versions known, the Old Latin and the Old Syriac. All evidence tends to show that it preserves for us a text which was widely read in the 2nd cent., and the questions connected with this text are likely to increase rather than to decrease both in importance and in practical interest.

P and Q. Two palimpsests preserved at Wolfenbüttel, assigned respectively to the 6th and 5th centuries. P contains 31 fragments, consisting of 518 verses from all four Gospels; Q 12 fragments of 247 verses from Lk. and John. The ancient element in these MSS is partly Western and partly Alexandrian.

R. Codex Nitriensis, a palimpsest of the 6th cent., in the British Museum, contains 25 fragments of Lk., consisting of about 516 verses. The pre-Antiochian readings are mostly Western.

Two groups of minuscules are of importance. 1-118-131-209 are fairly closely related, and offer some interesting readings; but far more important are the minuscules of the Ferrar group, mentioned above, 13-69-124-346-543-(788)-826. This group preserves the readings of a lost MS containing a peculiar Western text, different from that of D, but in a manner parallel to it. Another important minuscule, of the 9th or 10th cent., is preserved at St. Petersburg, and is named by Miller-Scrivener 473 (565 of Gregory, 81 of Hort, 2nd of Tischendorf).

The evidence of the Versions is of great importance in regard to the Western text, for it is in the earliest times, and this text was in the earliest times, and the 'Western' cannot properly be applied to it in a geographical sense. From East and West and from the south of the prevalence of distinctively Western.

The Old Latin (i.e. the pre-Vulgate) forms, which have been distinguished as African, European, and Italic; the last Vulgate text, that important MS of the African Latin is k (Codex Bobbiensis), of the 5th or 6th cent., preserved at Turin. Unfortunately, it contains only portions of M and Mark. The close agreement of its readings with the readings of Cyprian proves that it was written in Africa in early times; e (Codex Palatinus), of the 4th or 5th cent., preserved at Vienna, contains a version of a g as that of k, a, b, f (Mt. a MS, but a NT, known extent in c, f, and g, and in many fragments of MSS.

The text of the Latin Vulgate is preserved in very numerous MSS. It is fundamentally Western in character, as being a descendant of the Old Latin, but has been much modified, especially in the Gospels, by the influence of Greek MSS of the Antiochian type.

In Syriac, the Peshitta Version holds a place analogous to St. Jerome's Vulgate. The Antiochian text, Old Syriac, is preserved in two MSS; one in the British Museum, the text of which was published by Cureton, is called after him the 'Curetonian Syriac' (Syr^{cur}); the other was discovered by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson in the Library of the Convent on Mount Sinai, and is known as the 'Sinaitic Syriac' (Syr^{sin}). These Versions, allied, but by no means identical, have an essentially Western text. Another factor in the Syriac problem is the Diatessaron of Tatian (flourished A.D. 180), the text of which has to a great extent been recovered from an Arabic translation, from an Armenian translation of the Syriac commentary of Ephraem Syrus, and from the quotations of the Syrian writer Aphraates. The Diatessaron was a harmony of the four Gospels, which was widely used in Syriac-speaking countries in preference to the separate Gospels; and in compiling it Tatian used a Western text, similar in character to the Old Syriac. The mutual relations of these documents are still in dispute, but the most probable view is that the Old Syriac stands to the Peshitta as the Old Latin does to Jerome's Vulgate. Two later versions must be mentioned; one is the Harleian revision of the Philoxenian Syriac, made by Thomas of Harkel about the year 616, the text of which is based on the Peshitta; the other is a Greek MSS of a Western type, known as the 'Jerusalem Syriac,' which sometimes offers very interesting readings of the Alexandrian type. It has already been stated that the Sahidic version of Upper Egypt is fundamentally Western.

In order to complete this brief survey of the most important documents, we must here mention A—the important Codex Alexandrinus of the 5th cent., preserved in the British Museum; it contains a pure form of the Antiochian text, and it is quite possible that critics will learn to allow more weight to its evidence than is at present the case. The main point is that have not been here mentioned, and of the minuscules, may be regarded as a Western type, and of the value of the text of A.

We have now to consider in more detail the use which Hort makes of the Alexandrian group of documents. We have already tried to show how precarious any argument is which rests on genealogical considerations; owing to the lack of sufficiently full evidence; at the best, genealogical evidence affords us no help in judging between the Western and the Alexandrian texts, because they are confessedly parallel to each other, and have equal claims to consideration on genealogical grounds. But if it can be shown that the Alexandrian group consistently supports readings intrinsically better than those of the Western documents, this will afford good reason for following it. In other words, the question comes to this: Is the text of WH, which all critics admit to be substantially a text used at Alexandria early in the 3rd cent., on the whole preferable to the TR, and to such a text as would be formed by following exclusively Western documents? The answer of critics at the present time to this question would undoubtedly be in the affirmative. But, in the great majority of cases in which it differs from the TR, WH's text has the support of the best Western as well as of the Alexandrian documents; it is possible, therefore, to argue that its general excellence is due to the pure form of the Western element which it contains, and to look upon the distinctively Alexandrian readings as blemishes. On what grounds does Hort reject these distinctively Alexandrian readings? His main argument is the internal evidence of groups; all the readings supported by a group such as NB or ND are examined, and judgment is passed on them collectively, and also on the text common to the MSS forming the group. Now, the text common to N and D is, according to Hort's classification, Western, and in his opinion gives inferior readings (of course, when unsupported by other primary documents); whereas the text of N and B almost invariably gives readings which he considers intrinsically better. His method of forming a judgment on a wide consideration of the general readings of a group, to a great extent does away with the element which is so great a danger when readings are considered each on its intrinsic merits, but it still leaves plenty of room for the personal equation, since a general judgment is based on a special individual judgment in a number of cases; thus Hort's system is far less scientific than it appears to be at first sight. It is obviously impossible to enter into all this minute research unless one is able to devote many years of close work to the subject; yet, without doing so, it appears presumptuous to dispute Hort's conclusions.

But judgment in this matter really rests on a wider question. If it can be shown to be probable that the Alexandrian text is the result of a revision, then the greater part of Hort's work has been expended in restoring the original text of that revision, and is only a step, though an important one, in getting back to the readings of the original autographs. Now, recent investigations seem to tend to render two facts probable: (1) that all documents giving an Alexandrian text are connected with Egypt, and (2) that the text current in Egypt prior to the time of Origen was fundamentally Western, not Alexandrian. If a strong probability can be made out for these two views, then it will be a reasonable conclusion that the Alexandrian text had its rise in Egypt during the early part of the 3rd cent., and it will have to be treated as parallel to, though earlier and more important than, the Antiochian text. Egypt was the home of scholars, and if such a recension was made there, it is natural that the conclusions of early scholars should commend themselves on their intrinsic merits to men of similar training even at a much later date; we have also to remember that it is quite probable that those early scholars, with more evidence before them than we now have, did select the best readings, and may have preserved to us many true readings which would otherwise have perished. The dislike with which the later students of Antioch regarded the opinions of the earlier Alexandrian Fathers, and the taint of heresy which attached to them, easily account for the text they preferred not having continued in general use, if indeed it was ever widely current. Hort has declared that there are no grounds at all for believing in this Alexandrian revision, but we are not aware that he has gone beyond assertion on this point. In the same way, Burton and Millar declared that Hort's Antiochian revision was the creation of Hort's imagination. But the fact remains that the Alexandrian text cannot be traced earlier than the first quarter of the 3rd century. Clement of Alexandria used a distinctively Western text; it is true that he sometimes has what are commonly regarded as Alexandrian readings, but it is manifestly impossible to prove that these may not have been part of the Western text, current in Alexandria, and naturally taken up by the revisers. If it is the case that the Sahidic version is earlier than the Bohairic, again we find the Western type preceding the Alexandrian; and if Robinson is further right in assigning the Bohairic to the 3rd, and not the 2nd century, it may be concluded that the MSS with the Sahidic and Alexandrian text, and its character is thus accounted for.

The great importance which Hort assigns to the agreement of N and B depends on his contention that the two MSS are independent of each other; but there are really strong reasons for doubting this. Hort (§ 288) admits the truth of the fact pointed out by Tischendorf, 'that six leaves of the NT in N, together with the opening verses of the Apocalypse, besides corrections, headings, and in two cases additional notes to other parts, are from the hand of the same scribe that wrote the NT in B.' He adopts the obvious conclusion that the scribe of B was the corrector of N, and adds that it shows that the two MSS were written in the same generation, probably in the same place. He argues, however, that the evidence of the text, supported by differences in the order of the books and other externals, creates a strong presumption that they were copied from independent exemplars. But where so much depends on the absolute independence of two witnesses, this close local connexion must cause the most serious doubts. Have we any means of saying where it is likely that the two MSS were written? Both MSS contain a peculiar system of chapter numbers in the Acts, in each case in a very early hand, and with such differences that in neither case can the numeration have been copied from the other MS, but must have come from a common original. Dean Armitage Robinson, in his 'Euthaliana' (TS iii. 3), gives reasons for believing that this chapter-numeration is the same as that connected with the name of Euthalius, and points out (p. 35) that a Euthalian codex claims to have been collated with the accurate copies in the library at Caesarea of Eusebius Pamphili. The connexion of Origen with this great library is well known, and suggests though it can hardly be called more than a suggestion that the same library may have been the birthplace of these two great MSS which, when in agreement, support the text which Origen mostly used, and with the rise of which he may well have been connected. It is impossible to speak with any confidence until a great deal more work has been done, but it does seem as if the evidence in favour of an Alexandrian revision is growing (cf., further, Burkitt, TS v. 5).

We are able to judge of Hort's work only by the results, and to some extent our judgment must be based on a consideration of extreme instances; that is, we must judge the theory by cases in which he has pushed it to its furthest limits. No one denies that the greater part of his text, right or wrong, is of extreme antiquity, being based on the text of Alexandrian and Western manuscripts; the question is whether his theory has led to the inclusion of readings that cannot be shown to be earlier than Origen, and may therefore be due to an Alexandrian revision, or may be errors that had crept into the Western text current at Alexandria on which that revision was based. We propose to examine a few examples which throw light on the methods he employed.

One of the most important, instructive, and truly typical examples occurs in Jn 1¹⁸. The passage has been exhaustively discussed by Hort in the first of his Two Dissertations (1876). The verse runs in the Alexandrian MSS: θεὸς ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων πάντως μονογενὴς θεὸς ὁ ὢν ἐν εἰς τοὺς καὶ τὸν ἐκείνους ἐγένετο ἱσάοται. For μονογενὴς ἵσος the vast majority of documents give ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός; Hort's reading is supported by a small, and nearly homogeneous, group of documents, NBC*L 33, the Pesh. Syriac, the margin of the Hark. Syriac, and the Bohairic. The Sahidic and Gothic Versions and the Sinaitic Syriac are not extant here, and the evidence of the Æthiopic is divided. So far, this would appear to be an exclusively Alexandrian group, were it not for the support of the Pesh., which can hardly be supposed of complicity with BC*, and seems to show that must be older than the alleged Alexandrian revision. The Patristic evidence is as usual confused and doubtful, but there can be little doubt that Clement of Alexandria's usual reading was ὁ μονογενὴς θεός (the article is found with θεός also in № 33 Bohairic), but he was acquainted with the reading υἱός which comes once in an allusion of his own, once in the Excerpta ex Theodoto. Irenæus seems to have known the reading θεός, which is also found in several later Fathers, including Origen. But . . . have good evidence for the existence . . . the time of Origen. We may therefore regard it as an old reading current in Alexandria. On the other hand, the evidence of the great majority of MSS and Versions, supported by a good array of Fathers, shows that the rival reading was widely spread at an equally early period. Hort had no doubt how to decide on the evidence, impressed as he was with the general excellence of the Alexandrian group, and he argued so well that internal evidence supports μονογενὴς θεός that it is hard to read his words without feeling convinced that he is in the right. Yet it is at least doubtful whether such a phrase as μονογενὴς θεός could have been used before the Christian era, and Origen obtained a commanding influence over the Christian Church. Origen, who was second to none in the exegesis of St. John's Gospel, and was singularly unbiased in matters of textual criticism, deals with the rival readings in a few words (Comm. ad loc.): 'La leçon des Alexandrins: le Dieu fils unique, malgré l'autorité du Vatic., n'a été admise à peu près par aucun des éditeurs modernes, et l'appui du Sinait. ne lui procurera pas à l'avenir un meilleur accueil. Elle a trop la saveur de la dogmatique postérieure. Le fait qu'elle se trouve chez Clément d'Alexandrie et chez Origène, est un indice de son lieu d'origine.' It does, indeed, seem impossible to believe that the writer of the Gospel, immediately after saying 'God, no one has ever seen, should continue, 'the only-begotten God . . . has declared him.' In fact, the word θεός can apparently be in place here only if used in the secondary sense assigned to it by Origen, as distinguished from ὁ θεός, a term which he thought could not properly be used of the Logos. Hort thinks that the reading cannot have arisen from an accidental confusion of θε and υς, because of the omission of the article in most MSS reading θεός; but the testimony of Clement suggests that ὁ μονογενὴς θεός may have arisen accidentally; the reading would be welcomed by the school of Origen, but the article would naturally be omitted.

We next select an instance which exemplifies a particular excellence of the Alexandrian text—freedom from readings introduced to make one Gospel harmonize with the parallel passage in another. In Mt 12²⁸ NEZ 1, 33 read ἦν οὖ (B omits) ἔτεκεν υἱόν, and they have the important MSS of the Old Latin (avia b c gl k), of the Vulgate, and the Curetonian Syriac. The mass of MSS and Versions bring Mt. into harmony with Lk. by reading ἦν οὖ ἔτεκεν τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ τὸν πρωτότοκον.

A very similar group (with the addition of D, but without the Curetonian Syriac) omits the doxology to the Lord's Prayer in Mt 6:13.

In Mt 7:13 we have one of the instances in which WH desert B, omitting the words $\frac{1}{2}$ $\tau\acute{o}\nu\alpha\iota$ with \aleph^* and the Old Latin, supdence. But the Patristic evidence sions referring to the 'Two Ways' (cf. e.g. $\alpha\iota\tau\acute{o}\nu\alpha\iota$ 1) might easily result in no reference being made to the 'Gate'. Most people who are not professed textual critics would prefer to follow the main mass of MSS.

Mt 16^{2b,3} is omitted by MB, supported by 3 uncials (including X), 14 minuscules, the Curetonian Syriac, one MS of the Bohairic, and apparently Origen. It is not possible that it was omitted in most MSS. How, then, did it come to be omitted? The evidence and the impossibility of accounting for omission prove these words to be a part of the text of Mt. They can hardly have been an altered repetition of the parallel Lk 12^{94,95}, but were apparently derived from an extraneous source, written or oral, and inserted in the Western Text at a very early time.¹ This example brings us face to face with the question of the natural tendency of scribes was to omit rather than to add, and is usually impossible (except in cases of tampering or telescoping) to account for omission. B and its descendants frequently omit phrases or messages found in the majority of documents. Is this a proof of the superiority of their text? It is hard to resist the conclusion that the Western text is more correct, and indeed uncritical, than the Eastern. The omissions and additions are right, for they may have arisen from accidental causes which we cannot know of.

A far more interesting and important case is the omission of Mk 16:9-20. It is ~~not~~ necessary to go into the evidence fully. The internal evidence is so ~~overwhelmingly~~ ^{overwhelmingly} in reverse, renders it most probable (personally we think it almost conclusively proves) that they did not belong to the original Gospel. But textual criticism has to answer only the question, Were they in the copy from which our MSS are derived? They are omitted by δB : let us deal first with the evidence of these two MSS. Are they independent witnesses? The question is well discussed by Dr.

Salmon, Histor. Introd. to the Study of the Books of the NT, in a note at the end of ch. ix. The leaf containing the conclusion of Mk. in \aleph is admitted to have been written by the scribe who wrote B: apparently as corrector of the former MS he cancelled and rewrote the leaf. Lk. begins as usual on a new leaf, and there would be room on the last leaf of Mk. for the disputed verses. It is an obvious conjecture that the scribe of \aleph copied the verses from his archetype, and that the corrector deliberately removed them. We have seen that there is some reason for connecting \aleph and B with the great library of Caesarea: Eusebius was no doubt a great authority on points of Biblical criticism there, and we know that his opinion was against these verses (Mai, Script. Vett. Nov. Collect. i. p. 1). They were not reckoned in the Ammonian Sections or the Eusebian Canons. His 'testimony is to the effect that some of the copies in his time contained the verses, and some did not; but that those which omitted them were then the more numerous, and, in his opinion, the more trustworthy.' It is quite possible that the evidence we have so far considered comes to no more than this—'MSS preferred by Eusebius.' If he rejected these verses on internal grounds, we believe he was right in doing so, but we must take care that subjective evidence is not treated as objective textual evidence. It is probable that the scholia found in various minuscules, to the same effect as the testimony of Eusebius quoted above, are derived from him, and have no independent value. But a shorter ending to the Gospel was also current, which . . . and this affords indirect, but definite . . . omission of vv. 9-20, because it could arise only through the Gospel ending abruptly at v. 8. This shorter ending is found in the Old Latin MS ϵ , 247 margin, Hark. Syriac margin, one codex of the Bohairic margin, and in the Ethiopic Version. Both endings, the shorter coming first, are found in L 712 p. 4. It is obvious that the strictly textual evidence against vv. 9-20 is very inconclusive: apparently they were omitted (either on internal evidence, or through a strange coincidence by accidental damage to a papyrus roll) in an early group of MSS; and the omission commended itself to Eusebius, as it does to most scholars at the present day.

In Mk. 6 clearly a 'documentary-text' καὶ εἰσαθείσας τῆς θυγατρὸς αὐτῆς τῆς Ἡεροδιάδος: WH follow \aleph BDLA 2^o (238) in substituting αὐτοῦ for αὐτῆς τῆς, making the dancer a daughter of Herod bearing the same name as her mother Herodias. This is quite impossible, and we have to understand τῆς θυγατρὸς αὐτοῦ to mean step-daughter; but even so an unknown character is introduced, for the daughter of H. and P., according to Josephus, was named Salome. Clearly B and its allies, in spite of the support of D, must be wrong here.

In Mt 27⁴⁹ \aleph BCL, with some late support, add (after σώσαν αὐτόν) the words ἄλλος δὲ λαβὼν λόγχην ἐνύψεν αὐτοῦ τὴν πλευράν, καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ὕδωρ καὶ αἷμα. WH suspend judgment by placing the words in the text within double brackets; but they are fairly obviously an interpolation, put in at the wrong place, from Jn 19³⁴.

In Mk 6²⁰ WH read, with \aleph BCL Boh., ἡτόρμι for ἰστούς. Both readings are excellent sense, but many people will think the latter more likely.

In Lk 4⁴ WH read Ἰουδαίαις instead of Γαλιλαίαις. It is difficult to understand how any one can accept Ἰουδαίαις as even a possible reading in view of the context (but see Hastings' DB i. 406 f.). In the RVm we read that 'very many ancient authorities read Judaea.' It is interesting to observe the authorities which agree in this obvious error: they are \aleph BCL \aleph 1-131-209, 22, 157, and 11 other minuscules, 6 lectionaries, the Bohairic, and the text of the Hark. Syriac—an unusually wide and very representative Alexandrian group. Soon after (Lk 6¹), a similar though smaller group (\aleph B 1-118-209, 22, 69, 33, 157, with the Bohairic and some Latin and Syriac documents) omits the difficult word ἐνταῖς πόσιν. WH and the RV accept the evidence of this group.

The excellence of the Alexandrian group is well seen in Lk 11²⁻⁴; there can be little doubt that the short form of the Lord's Prayer is right in Lk., as Godet unhesitatingly declared. The constant element in the attestation for the three omissions consists of BL 1, 22, 130, Latin Vulgate; \aleph and 57 join in two of the three places.

The number of Patristic references to the omission in MSS of Lk 22⁴³⁻⁴⁴ (the ministering angel, the bloody sweat) renders it almost certain that they do not form part of the true text; they are omitted by \aleph ABRT 13^o-69-124 f, Hark. Syriac margin, and some MSS of the Egyptian Versions; they are marked as probably spurious in many later documents.

The variants in Jn 7³⁹ are of peculiar interest, because there can be little doubt about the right reading, οὕτω γὰρ ἦν πνεῦμα without addition. The difficulty of this statement is so obvious, that it is a wonder more attempts were not made to soften it down. We do not think any passage bears more conclusive testimony to the excellence of the text of the NT as transmitted to us. The words are found without addition in \aleph T \aleph 42, 91, some MSS of the Latin Vulgate, the Curetonian Syriac, the Bohairic, and the Armenian. The great majority of documents add ἄρμον—a natural insertion which does not affect the main point. Most Latin documents support the insertion of ἡδωμένον after πνεῦμα. It is very remarkable that B (254) (with ϵ q, Jerusalem and Hark. Syriac) has the fullest reading, πνεῦμα ἄρμον ἡδωμένον. D (with δ go) gets over the difficulty in a different way by reading το πνεῦμα ἄρμον ἐπ' αὐτοῖς.

It is not an easy thing to convey a fair impression by a selection of readings, but we hope the above passages are sufficient to show two things, the undoubted excellence of the Alexandrian tradition, and the inadvisability of . . . it against internal evidence . . . ! The views of the . . . main texts are, as we . . . then the Alexandrian group must stand on its merits alone, and we must bear in mind that its readings may be due to a definite revision; * in any case, however, whether there was an Alexandrian revision or not, the text preserved by this group of documents is the purest and the most important now known to us. We believe that the . . . passage from Dr. Salmon (Introd. to the NT, p. 161, note) well expresses what will be the ultimate verdict in regard to the work of the two great Cambridge critics:

'It seems to me that textual critics are not entitled to feel absolute confidence in the . . . of the obscurity that . . . Such a task as Bentley and Lachmann proposed to themselves, viz., to recover a good fourth-century text, was perfectly feasible, and has, in fact, . . . by Westcott and Hort with . . . could have been put into the hands . . . age to him, namely, the short conclusion on the last page of St. Mark, and that he would have pronounced the MS to be an extremely good and accurate one. But these editors aim at nothing less . . . to the original documents; and, in order to do . . . cases necessary to choose between two forms of text, each of which is attested by authorities older than any extant MS. Now, a choice which must be made on subjective grounds only cannot be made with the same confidence as when there is on either . . . And, further, . . . it have himself . . . two forms of text might both be entitled to claim his authority.'

In his treatment of this difficult subject, the present writer has tried to set out main principles rather than to go into minute details: he has also tried to show how a judgment must be formed rather than to express his own opinions. But it is almost impossible to move in textual criticism without having . . . working . . . Supporters either of the . . . WH's views have the advantage of starting from a clearly defined position, and attack or defend definite theories. The present writer has found it necessary to intimate, as a working hypothesis, what his own views are, and has attempted to show the reasons why he holds them. We can reconstruct a text which was current at Antioch by the middle of the 4th cent., and which won its way to practically universal acceptance in countries which used the Greek language; this would not differ in any material respects from the Textus Receptus. We can also reconstruct a text current in Alexandria probably as early as the first quarter of the 3rd cent.; this would be almost the same as Westcott and Hort's text, if we except those passages where they give the preference to Western documents. What are we to do with the documents of very divergent types, which are loosely classified as Western? This is really the main problem which textual critics now have to face. We may perhaps roughly distinguish the following groups of documents as attesting different types of readings, but it is necessary to remember that there is continual cross-attestation—(a) D supported by the old Latin; (b) groups in which \aleph sides with Western documents against distinctively Alexandrian readings; (c) the ancient text underlying the Antiochian revision, which is often very difficult to distinguish; (d) the Ferrar group of minuscules; (e) the Old Syriac; we also know of a certain number of readings which were evidently widely spread in early times, but which have left little or no trace of their existence in extant MSS and versions.

* Hort looked upon what he called the Alexandrian text (as distinguished from the Neutral) as the result of a revision; according to the view of the present writer, \aleph and B were not unaffected by the revision.

It is impossible within the limits of this article to enter on this very wide field. Nor is it possible at the present stage to say that any really definite results have been reached. Whatever may be the history of the origin of the Western texts, and however strongly certain isolated readings may commend themselves to the attention of a few students, it is not likely that any known type of Western text in its entirety will ever command the respect of a considerable body of students of textual criticism and of exegesis; and it must be borne in mind that the final decision must rest on exegesis, unless textual evidence at present not even guessed at should be brought to light. The truth appears to be that the Antiochian text adopted much of what was best in the various Western texts; but at the same time the agreement of Western and Alexandrian documents in many readings that are almost 'right' warns us that right readings may be found in most divergent texts, though it is improbable that much of value escaped both the Alexandrian and the Antiochian revisers.

But the existence of these early divergent types of text, in regard to which textual criticism can give no definite verdict, has a very distinct practical lesson to teach, and one which is greatly needed at this critical period in the history of Christianity; it is impossible to recover at present the ipsissima verba of the NT writers. Of course the limits of doubt are very narrow, and the possible variants are few and for the most part unimportant; but the fact of doubt remains, and the test against all mechanical theories of textual criticism, for however slight the discrepancies, the question must arise, 'Which text or reading is inspired?' We must build on the general sense, not on the mere letter of Scripture; this is the practical lesson which textual criticism teaches us at this moment. And what result can be happier than if the study of the letter, by its inconclusiveness, leads us to a firmer grasp of the general sense, in which is the 'spirit that maketh alive'?

THADDÆUS occurs only Mk 3¹⁸ and Mt 10³; in the latter place in the AV in the form: 'Lebbæus, whose surname was Thaddæus.' On the textual questions, see art. JUDAS (vol. i. p. 906), LEBBÆUS (above, p. 22), and 'Thaddæus' (DB iv. 741). In the Western Church neither 'Lebbæus' nor 'Thaddæus' became common, their place being taken by 'Judas,' occurring in Lk.'s Gospel and Acts as Judas Jacobi, and found in Mt. as Judas Zelotes in the oldest Latin witnesses, and as Judas son of James in Syr-Sin; his day falling with that of Simon on the 28th October.* But even under the name of Jude this Apostle never became very popular. The Calendar of the English Church, Illustrated (Oxford and London, 1851), knows only of two old churches in England dedicated in the joint names of Simon and Jude, and of several instances in modern churches of their names being honoured separately, as in Liverpool, Manchester, Bethnal Green, West Derby; 'but this is quite against the mediæval custom.' Neither was 'Thaddæus' frequent as a proper name; cf., however, for instance, the Italian painter Taddeo Gaddi. In the Greek Church the 19th June is kept as μνήμη τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ ἐνδόξου ἀποστόλου Ἰούδα, who by Luke, in the Gospel and Acts, is called Ἰούδας; by Matthew and Mark, Θαδδαῖος καὶ Λεββαῖος, ἀδελφὸς κατὰ σάρκα χρηματίζων τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ὡς υἱὸς Ἰωσήφ τοῦ μνηστῆρος, ἀδελφὸς δὲ γνήσιος Ἰακώβου τοῦ ἀδελφοθέου, ὁ καὶ τὴν φωτιστικὴν καὶ δογμάτων ἐμπλεον τοῦ Πνεύματος ἀνθρώποις ἅπασιν ἐπιστέλλας ἐπιστολὴν. It is then told that he was sent by Christ Himself ὡς ἀδελφὸς καὶ μυσταγωγὸς to Mesopotamia, came to Edessa, healed Abgar, and was shot with arrows by the infidels in the town Ararat. On 30th June, the day of all Apostles, he is numbered 12th; the place where he died in one MS being called ἐν Ἀράτῃ τῇ πόλει. On the 21st August the Greek Church celebrates μνήμη τοῦ ἁγίου ἀποστόλου Θαδδαίου τοῦ καὶ Λεββαίου ἐνὸς τῶν ἐβδωμήκοντα. He is said to have been from Edessa, a Hebrew by birth, who came to Jerusalem in the days of John the Baptist, was baptized, and afterwards followed Jesus till His Passion. Then he returned to his home, healed Abgar of the 'black' leprosy, came to Syria, and died in Βήρυτος; cf. the Acta Apostolorum Apocr., ed. Tischendorf.

On the identity of Lebbæus-Thaddæus-Judas Jacobi with the author of the Epistle and the brother of Jesus, see Mayor, 'Brethren of the Lord' (DB i. 320); Dom J. G. St vii. 412-433; Th. Zahn, Forschung, 225-363. For evidence that the Epistle of Jude is quoted occasionally under the name of Thaddæus, see ZNTW iii. [1902] 251. In the Syrian Churches, Jude is identified with Thomas, and sometimes regarded as twin brother of Jesus; see J. R. Harris, Dioscouri in the Christian Legends, and The Cult of the Heavenly Twins (1906), p. 105. In the Onomastica sacra the name 'Thaddæus' is explained by αἰνέσις (cf. Lagarde, 202. 83). The same etymology is followed in the Talmud, Sanh. 43a, where the last of the five disciples of Jesus is called Thoda, and Ps 100⁵ 50²³ are applied to him.

On monuments of Christian art the name does not seem to occur frequently (see Mrs. Arthur Bell, The Saints in Christian Art (1901), vol. i. ch. viii. 'The Twelve Apostles'; ch. xvi. 'St. Simon, St. Jude, and St. Matthias'). In the mosaic of S. Paolo fuori le Mura, Thaddæus is the last of the Apostles; on its bronze doors, cast at Constantinople in 1070, he is left out altogether along with James the Less and Matthias. The Romanic frontale aureum of the altar of the church at Comburg (Württemberg), representing the Salvator Mundi in the midst of the Twelve Apostles, gives him under the name S. Tatheus. When the Creed is apportioned among the Twelve, 'Thaddæus dixit: carnis resurrectionem.' In the Hexameters ascribed to Bernard of Clairvaux, 'Restituit carnem Judas'; with Firminius: 'Judas Jacobi dixit: sanctorum communionem, remissionem peccatorum' (Hahn, *Bibliothek der Symbole*³, pp. 52-54, 97, 104).

In the Const. Apost. the ordinances about widows are ascribed to Thaddæus (viii. 25).

* In the Calendar of Cordova for 961 the entry runs: 'festum Simonis Cananei et Tadei apostolorum'; see M. Férotin, Le liber ordinum en usage dans l'église Wisigothique et Mozarabe d'Espagne, Paris, 1904 (= Monumenta ecclesie liturgica, ed. Cabrol-Leclercq, vol. v.).

Very complicated is the question about the relation of the Apostle Thaddæus to Θαδδαῖος, who is said by Eusebius to have been one of the Seventy, and to have been sent after the Ascension, by Thomas, to Edessa to heal King Abgar. Jerome, on Mt 10⁴, tells the same about the Apostle Thaddæus, while in the Syrian legend the messenger to Edessa is called Addai (on the form Haddai in one of the MSS of the Syriac Version of the HE of Eusebius, see DB, s.v. 'Thaddæus'). Zahn thinks that Eusebius' confusion of Addai with Thaddaios. On the confusion of Addai, see Lagarde, Reliquie juris eccles. antiqu. syr. p. 32=Gr. p. 89; Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents; G. Phillips, The Doctrine of Addai (1876).

As the place of his burial there is mentioned, besides Beirut in Phœnicia, the town Ostracine in Egypt (see Const. Apost., ed. Lagarde, p. 283, ὁ ἁγὸς ῥαδδαῖος ὁ δεβδαῖος καὶ τοῦδας ἐκ τῆς οὐστράκινος). Judas Jacobi; the latter, after being crucified, was thrown out the whole of Mesopotamia, and was buried by the Jews, and lies at Edessa; the former preached to the Edessenes, was crucified, and buried in 'Ostracine,' the town of Egypt.

The most probable etymology of the name 'Thaddæus' seems to be that proposed by Dalman, who sees in it the Heb. abbreviation of a Greek name beginning with Theo-, as in Theudas. The 'Gospel of Thaddæus' mentioned in some MSS and editions of the Decretum Gelasii is due to a clerical error. On the legends connected with Thaddæus see Lipsius, Die apokr. Apostelgeschichten, ii. pp. 142-200 (1884).

THANKSGIVING (εὐχαριστία, εὐχαριστέω) is an important Christian virtue, and in pre-Christian Greek the word is rare. Used chiefly of man's attitude to God, it implies a recollection of Him, a recognition of His actions in the past (cf. ὁμολογεῖν and cognates, He 13¹⁵, Mt 11²⁵ etc.), quite apart from any thought of petition for the future. Meaning originally to do a good turn to a man (cf. ἔχω χάριν, 1 Ti 1¹²), εὐχαριστία acquires the meaning of repaying a favour, and hence of showing gratitude. Philo uses it in the technical sense of thank-offering. Outside the Gospels and Apostolic literature it occurs in the NT only in the writings of St. Paul.

1. Usage in the Gospels.—The word εὐχαριστέω (εὐχαριστία does not occur in the Gospels), though found in other connexions (Jn 11⁴¹, Lk 17¹⁶), occurs principally in relation to grace before meat, especially at the miracles of the loaves, and the institution of the Lord's Supper (Mt 15³⁶ 26²⁷, Mk 8⁶ 14²³, Lk 22¹⁷⁻¹⁹ [before the breaking of the bread we have in the EV Mt 26²⁶, Mk 14²² εὐλογήσας (EV 'blessed') for εὐχαριστήσας in Lk.], Jn 6¹¹⁻²³). From this fact, in later times, though not in the NT itself, the word Eucharist became a technical term for the Holy Communion, and is used in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (9¹) and other sub-Apostolic literature (Ign. Smyr. 7, Just. Mart. Apol. 1, 65), as well as in later writings. See, further, artt. BENEDICTION and BLESSING.

Besides εὐχαριστέω we find in the Gospels, as terms denoting the giving of thanks, (1) ἐξομολογέομαι (Mt 11²⁵ || Lk 10²¹, RVm 'praise'); (2) ἀνθρομολογέομαι (Lk 2³⁸); and (3) ἔχω χάριν (Lk 17⁹, cf. 6^{32a}). In (1) Jesus Himself thanks His Father for revealing to babes what is hidden from the wise and understanding. In (2) Anna the prophetess gives thanks to God for the vision of the infant Jesus. In (3) Jesus sets aside the idea that a servant should be thanked for doing the things which were commanded him.

2. Christ's lessons regarding thanksgiving.—(1) His own example is a lesson. He gives thanks to His Father for daily bread (Mt 15³⁶ || Mk 8⁶, Jn 6¹¹⁻²³; cf. Lk 24³⁰); for the revelation to babes of the secrets of the heavenly Kingdom (Mt 11²⁵ || Lk 10²¹); for the Divine hearing of His prayer (Jn 11⁴¹); for the bread and wine of the Holy Supper, and all the spiritual blessings which they connote (Mt 26²⁶, Mk 14^{22a}, Lk 22¹⁷⁻¹⁹, 1 Co 11^{24b}). (2) His words convey lessons. We have no claim to be regarded as profitable servants, deserving to be thanked; we have merely done our duty (Lk 17^{9b}). There is a kind of thanksgiving to God which is only a form of hypocrisy, being really a flattery of God (Lk 18¹¹). The truly thankful heart is rare (Lk 17^{16b}); it recognizes God's hand in the gifts of human benefactors (v. 18); it is inspired by faith, and wins great blessing (v. 19).

It is worth noting that it is to St. Luke alone that we owe the story of the Ten Lepers and the Grateful Samaritan, which is typical of the Christian grace of gratitude that finds expression in thanksgiving; while it is to St. Luke's beloved friend and teacher, St. Paul, as to no other, that we owe the repeated and characteristic Christian utterance of thanks to God for His unspeakable gift (2 Co 9¹⁵, and the Pauline Epistles, passim).

H. C. LEES AND J. C. LAMBERT.

THEOPHILUS.—The name of an early Christian to whom a couple of NT documents, the Third (canonical) Gospel and its sequel, the Acts of the Apostles, are addressed (Lk 1³, Ac 1¹). This does not, of course, imply that the writer had no wider audience in view. The two books in question are far too carefully composed to be mere private communications. In modern parlance they are 'dedicated' rather than addressed to Theophilus; that is, if we suppose the name to be a genuine proper name. On this point, however, there has been some difference of opinion. Conceivably Theophilus (= OT Jedidiah, 'God's friend') might be no more than a conventional title for the average Christian reader, an imaginary nom de guerre for the typical catechumen. This symbolic sense of the word was conjectured by Origen. At the same time, instances of Theophilus as a proper name are not uncommon, and it seems simpler, on the whole, to regard it as such in the NT. A modification of the above theory has also been proposed (e.g. by Ramsay and Bartlett), which would make Theophilus a baptismal name given to a Roman official, and employed here for the sake of safety. This is possible, but rather unlikely.

The name, then, is to be taken as denoting some contemporary of Luke (or of whoever wrote the Third Gospel and Acts). Otherwise he is unknown to history. Later tradition naturally busied itself with fanciful conjectures upon his person, turning him eventually into the bishop of Antioch or of Cæsarea (cf. Zahn's Einführung, § 58. 5). But this is the region of guesswork, though modern critics have often been tempted to stray back into it. As, for example, Beck, who, in his Prolog des Lk. Evangeliums (1900), deduces from ἐν ἡμῖν (1¹) the fact that the author was one of the two Emmanuel disciples, while Theophilus must have been a wealthy Antiochene tax-collector, an acquaintance of Chuza and Herod, who accompanied Herod and Bernice to Cæsarea, where he fell in with St. Paul and St. Luke. Godet opines that Luke was a freedman of Theophilus. The latter, at any rate, may have been the patronus libri, responsible for the publication and circulation of the Gospel and its sequel. Whether he was of Greek extraction or a Roman, possibly of equestrian rank, it is impossible to say; but one may cheerfully set aside the theories which identify him with Philo or Seneca.

We are thus reduced to an examination of the internal evidence for any knowledge of the position and character of the man. (1) Plainly, to begin with, he was a Christian when the Third Gospel was composed. He had been 'instructed' in the faith by some Christian teachers as a catechumen. But either he or his friend, the author, felt that some fuller acquaintance with the historic basis of the Christian religion (not of the Pauline gospel, as Hilgenfeld argues in Ztschr. für Wiss. Theologie, 1901, pp. 1-11) was advisable, and it was with this end in view that the Third Gospel and its sequel were addressed to him, in order to remove uncertainties caused by diversity, inexactness, lack of . . . and absence of order, in the current . . . Christ's life on earth. Some critics still hold that Theophilus was simply a pagan interested in Christianity. But the term κατηχούμενος (Lk 1⁴, cf. Ac 18²⁵ 21²¹), especially in the light of its context, seems to preclude this hypothesis. St. Luke's preface implies that he was more than merely an interested inquirer. It suggests, as Wright says (Composition of the Four Gospels, p. 55), that 'busy men like Theophilus had been catechized in their youth, but later occupations had driven out many of the lessons, and unless a man could secure the same catechist whom he had attended as a boy, the frequent discrepancies in the . . . tradition would jar on the precision of . . . memory, and produce a general sense of disappointment and uncertainty.' Oral tradition had its merits. It was vital and free . . .

(cf. Jos. c. Apoc. 2. . .). Furthermore, if there is no other instance of one Christian hailing another by a secular title in the NT, on the other hand there is no case of a Christian writing for the benefit of any save fellow-Christians. Besides, such a title need not have been incongruous with . . . If Theophilus was of high rank, the . . . bade Christian honour all men would not preclude a Christian author from employing such a title once in a semi-formal prologue to his work. (2) That Theophilus was a man of rank is suggested by the term κράτιστε = 'most excellent' or 'your excellency' (Ac 23²⁶ 24³ 26²⁵), which may be almost semi-technical, and in any case implies respect for exalted position and high authority, though the idea of intimacy and affection need not be excluded (cf. Jos. Ant. vi. 8, etc.). He may have been on the procuratorial staff, or an official of some kind in the Imperial service. And this would tally with the special emphasis laid by St. Luke upon the relation of the Church to the Empire, and the repeated connexions which he suggests between the political affairs of the age and the progress of Christianity (cf. e.g. Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? ch. iii.), especially in Acts. His social position is further suggested by the internal evidence of the Third Gospel, which, as has been often pointed out (cf. e.g. Encyc. Bibl. 1792), is specially concerned with the hindrances thrown up by money and rank in the path of a consistent Christian character. 'Lk. seems to see, as the main obstacles to the Faith, . . . nor Jewish backsliding, but the . . . of wealth and social position acting upon half-hearted converts; and his sayings about building the tower, putting the hand to the plough, renouncing all one's possessions, and hating father and mother, are pathetic indications of what must have been going on in the divided household of many a young Theophilus.' In the case of Theophilus, however, wealth and dignity did not form an obstacle to faith. It says something for this well-to-do Christian that he was willing to be instructed, and evidently keen to learn the historic principles of his faith. To his open-mindedness we owe, in one sense, two of the most important historical documents in early Christian literature. For it is plain that this man's need stirred his friend to write. Behind Theophilus he probably saw many a likeminded inquirer. This catechumen's case was in some ways typical and characteristic, and thus St. Luke was led to write his Gospel narrative, an instance of the 'first and noblest use' of the human imagination, 'that is to say, of the power of perceiving things which cannot be perceived by the senses,' viz. 'to call up the scenes and facts in which we are commanded to believe, and be present, as if in the body, at every recorded event of the history of the Redeemer' (Ruskin, Frondees Agrestes, § 9). The writer's aim was personal, as well as modest and religious. Early Christian literature . . . from no literary ambition. Even in its . . . it was practical and didactic. But in this case the writer, like Burke, who originally drew up his Reflections on the French Revolution for the benefit of a puzzled young friend, has gained a wider reach and range for his pen's product than perhaps he contemplated when he began.

The omission of the semi-formal adjective κράτιστε in Ac 1⁴ is not unnatural. It is needless to see anything subtle or significant in the change from Lk 1⁴. No doubt the excessive use of the term was one feature of ancient servility (Theophrastus, Char. 5). But St. Luke might well have used it twice in two volumes without any fear of incurring the charge of obsequiousness, and we cannot suppose he dropped the adjective lest he should be guilty of . . . Still less probable is the conjecture that the absence of the title in Ac 1⁴ denotes the conversion of Theophilus to Christianity since Lk 1⁴ had been written. For this there is no evidence whatsoever, and we have already seen that there was no necessary incongruity in applying such a title of honour, pagan though it was, to a fellow-Christian.

THIEF (κλέπτης).—Thieves are mentioned in the following passages of the Gospels, besides several others where RV substitutes 'robber' as the equivalent of ληστής. See ROBBER. 1. Mt 6^{19, 20} = Lk 12³³. Christ's disciples should have their treasure where thieves do not break (lit. 'dig') through and steal. Eastern houses, . . . monly of mud or sun-dried brick, are . . . into; cf. Ex 22³, Job 24¹⁶, Ezk 12^{5, 7}. 2. Mt 24⁴³ = Lk 12³⁹. The unexpectedness of Christ's coming is compared to that of a thief's entry. This figure seems to have greatly impressed the Apostles; it is echoed several times in the NT (1 Th 5²⁽⁴⁾, 2 P 3¹⁰, Rev 3³ 16¹⁵). 3. Jn 10^{1, 8, 10}. False and self-deceiving teachers—whether false Christs, or, more probably, Pharisees—are compared to thieves and robbers. 4. Jn 12⁶. Judas 'was a thief, and having the bag' (lit. 'box') 'took away what was put therein' (RV). HAROLD SMITH.

THIRST.—The occasions on which the physical suffering arising from thirst is noted by the Evangelists are connected in every instance with the personal experiences of Jesus. Early in His public . . . as He was journeying back from Judaea . . . leaving the former country as a result of Pharisaic hostility, the writer of the Fourth Gospel notices that Jesus suffered the pangs of thirst, and records His request for a drink of water from the Samaritan woman as she came to draw water from 'Jacob's spring' (πηγή τοῦ Ἰακώβ, Jn 4⁶). It is remarkable that this author mentions this fact, as well as the weariness felt by Jesus in His journey, side by side with the title (ὁ κύριος, 4¹) which betrays the writer's attitude towards His claims over human life and conduct.

The other instance of Jesus' suffering in this respect is also mentioned by the writer, who records His cry 'I thirst' (δυσψῶ, 19²⁸) from the cross. And although he seems to connect the expression with the fulfilment of Messianic prophecy (cf. Ps 69²¹), there can be no doubt as to the reality of the feeling which prompted the utterance of the Sufferer. The intensity of His suffering is attested by the unflinching courage of one of the soldier-guards, who, out of compassion for the Crucified, attempted to allay His thirst. One result of these and such like sufferings in the course of His life is to be seen in the vivid portrayal by Jesus of the great Day of final judgment. The common physical wants of struggling humanity afford opportunities of service in the sacred cause outlined by the two great commandments of the Law (Mt 22³⁷). Nor must we omit to notice the basis upon which Jesus has placed the service of man by men, and the grounds upon which He distributes the final awards. To every believer in the cosmic significance of the Incarnation the use of the first person (ἐγώ, etc.) by the Judge-King (Mt 25³⁴) who is 'the Son of Man' (v. 31), reveals the nature and character of His sympathy with our weaknesses (συνπαθήσαι ταῖς ἀσθενείαις ἡμῶν, He 4¹⁵), and guarantees the truth of the assertion that 'it was necessary that he should in all things become like his brethren' (ὥφειλεν κατὰ πάντα τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς ὁμοιωθῆναι, He 2¹⁷).

Following the example of OT thinkers, Jesus employed the idea embodied in the word 'thirst' to express the conscious needs of the human soul for something higher and more satisfying than it could discover in its earthly experiences (cf. Is 55¹, Ps 42² etc.). Just as man in the vigour of physical health revolts against physical deprivation in the shape of thirst, so in proportion to his spiritual health and energy he reaches out and cries for spiritual satisfaction, and cannot rest as long as his wants are unsupplied. In this restlessness Jesus sees a source of men's ultimate happiness, and those He accounts blessed (μακάριοι) who thirst for righteousness (δυσψῶντες τὴν δικαιοσύνην, Mt 5⁶). As might be expected, the Johannine writer makes the most frequent reference to this feature of Jesus' teaching. Belief in Himself, Jesus asserts to be the means by which spiritual thirst is assuaged (cf. Jn 6³⁵ 7³⁷); and if we compare this statement with its expansion and elaboration, we will observe that by belief He means the spiritual appropriation of His entire Manhood (ἡ σὰρξ μου . . . τὸ αἷμά μου ἀληθὴς ἐστὶ πῶσις, 6⁵⁶).

On two distinct occasions Jesus makes incidental, though didactic, reference to the profound union, between Himself and those who believe on Him, hinted at above. In His conversation with the woman of Samaria He characteristically emphasizes His teaching by the details in her drawing of the water from the fountain. For her the well was a source of the satisfaction of personal need, and at the same time a means of supplying the needs of others dependent on her. In a manner analogous to this, if she had drunk of the living water which He was ready to supply, Jesus promised her a part in His glorious work of sharing with others out of the fulness she had received (cf. 1¹⁶). In her the living water would become 'a fountain springing unto eternal life' (ἐν αὐτῇ πηγὴ ὑδάτος ἀλλομένου εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, 4¹⁴). This thought is more definitely and directly stated by Jesus during the Feast of Tabernacles which He attended in Jerusalem. His invitation to all who thirsted (ἐάν τις διψᾷ, 7³⁷) to come to Him and drink was followed by the promise, founded on the phraseology and thought of the OT (Is 12³ 58¹¹, etc.), that they who accepted would themselves become sources of blessing and satisfaction to their fellow-men (ποταμοὶ ἐκ τῆς κοιλίας, κ.τ.λ., 7³⁸). 'He who drinks of the Spiritual Rock becomes in turn himself a rock from within which the waters flow to slake the thirst of others' (Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.). It is impossible not to see in this living relationship between Jesus and believers the foundation upon which must ultimately rest all human activities, as they display themselves in the service of the race.

THISTLES.—In the NT thistles (τριβόλοι) are mentioned twice (Mt 7¹⁶, He 6⁸ RV). The term, however, is loosely employed, and probably embraces several genera of spinous plants, in which Palestine is peculiarly rich. In Hebrew there is a very extensive and varied nomenclature, about twenty terms being employed which denote prickly shrubs or weeds; but in many instances the precise meaning is unknown, while in many others the words are used in the most general way. Tristram, who goes very fully into the matter (Nat. Hist. of Bible, 423-432), identifies Heb. hōah with the common thistle (Carduus) and dardar with knapweed (Centaurea). Of the former there are many species, the most common among them being: (1) Natholus syriacus, a thistle with pink flowers; (2) the yellow spotted thistle (Scolymus maculatus); and (3) Carthamus oxyanthus, which has a yellow flower. Of the latter there are also many species, notably the star-thistle (Centaurea calcitrapa). These plants were exceedingly troublesome to the farmer, the corn-fields often being overrun with them.

The only reference to thistles which occurs in the Gospels is in our Lord's question, 'Do men gather . . . figs of thistles?' (Mt 7¹⁶).

THOMAS.—One of the twelve Apostles. (For the name see DIDYMUS). In the lists of the Twelve his name is always in the second group of four. In Mk 3¹⁸, where the names are not in pairs, he is eighth; so in Lk 6¹⁵, where he is coupled with Matthew. In Mt 10³ he is seventh, coming before Matthew. In Acts 1³ he is sixth, and is coupled with Philip. No incident is recorded of him in the Synoptics or in Acts; but he comes into some prominence in the later scenes in the Fourth Gospel. When Jesus is about to return to Judea because of the death of Lazarus, and the disciples are afraid of Jewish hostility, Thomas says, 'Let us also go, that we may die with him' (Jn 11¹⁶). In the conversation after the Supper, Thomas interjects the remark, 'Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way?' (14⁵); and thereby elicits the great saying, 'I am the way, the truth, and the life' (14⁶). When Jesus appeared to the disciples on the evening of the Resurrection day, Thomas was absent, and was unable afterwards to accept the testimony, 'We have seen the Lord.' He must himself not only see the Master, but touch His body before he could believe (20²⁴⁻²⁵). A week later Thomas is present when Jesus again appears; and then his doubts vanish, and he rises to the complete confession of faith recorded in the Gospels, 'My Lord and my God' (20²⁸⁻²⁹). Thomas is mentioned also in 21² as one of the group to whom Jesus appeared on the morning by the Lake-side.

Later traditions of Thomas, obviously of little value, are mentioned in Eusebius and in the Apocryphal Acts of Thomas. He is spoken of as a missionary to Parthia, or to India. Some traditions assign to him the honour of martyrdom; and his supposed grave was shown at Edessa in the 4th century.

The personality of Thomas has a clear and consistent expression in the incidents which the Fourth Gospel records. He belongs to the quiet, reflective group of the Apostolic company; and his temperament is that of a man who finds the best things too good to be true, and who usually imagines that the worst foreseen possibility will be realized. He requires direct personal evidence, and will not hastily accept the testimony even of his friends. Yet he is not lacking in devotion and love to his Lord. He chooses to stay with Him rather than desert His cause; and in his gloomiest days of unbelief he does not separate himself from the Apostolic company. Though not persuaded of the reality of the Resurrection, he keeps his old loyalty and love; and when the Master's presence is utterly sure, he gladly accepts the highest that the revelation of Christ implies. His unbelief was never a failure to respond to the spiritual truth and love brought to him by his Master; at most it was an inability to accept unexpected and marvellous external confirmations of that truth. 'In Thomas we have a man incredulous but tenacious; despondent but true; with little hope but much courage; sincere in love though perplexed in faith; neither rushing to the right conclusion as Peter might have done, nor rushing away from it into danger and dishonour as Peter did' (T. T. Lynch).

The scepticism of Thomas has a real apologetic value. It goes to disprove the contention that the Apostles were credulous persons easily misled by their hopes, and so deluded into a mistaken belief that their dead Master had spoken to them. Thomas believed because the fact which was too good to hope for became too certain to reject.

For further study of Thomas see T. T. Lynch, Sermon for my Curates, 38; H. M. Butler, Unity and other Sermons, 13; A. B. Davidson, The Called of God, 317.

THORNS.—Palestine is unusually rich in acanthous plants. As many as 50 genera and 200 species occur in Palestine and Syria, 'besides a multitude clothed with scabrous, -trigose, or stinging hairs, and another multitude with prickly fruits' (Post in Hastings' DB iv. 753). In the OT references to thorns are numerous, and many different words are used to express them. But the vocabulary, though full, is very indefinite, many of the terms employed being as vague and general as our own English word 'thorns.' We have the reflex of this uncertain terminology in EV, which renders almost indiscriminately by 'thistle,' 'thorn,' or 'bramble,' a single Hebrew word. In the NT three terms occur, viz. ἀκανθα, τρίβολος, and σκόλοψ. The last-named is found only in 2 Co 12⁷ 'There was given to me a thorn (σκόλοψ) in the flesh,' but in this instance the rendering should rather be 'stake' or 'pale.' The second (τρίβολος) has already been explained (see THISTLES). It remains that we should consider ἀκανθα (Mt 7¹⁶ 13⁷ 22²; Mk 4⁷ 18, Lk 6⁴⁴ 8⁷ 14, Jn 19², He 6⁸), which is invariably translated 'thorns.' Strictly speaking, this term denotes Acanthus spinosus, a showy perennial with deeply indented and spiny leaves, and bearing white flowers tinged with pink. In the NT, however, it is a quite general term for all thorny or prickly plants, and is applied to bushes and weeds alike. Among the most common are thorny Astragal, which abound in the higher mountainous regions, and many species of Acacia, Eryngium, Rhamnus, Rubus, Solanum, etc. Some of them, such as Poterium spinosum and Rhus punctata, are found in all parts of the country. In our Third Gospel mention is made of the bramble (βάρος, Lk 6⁴⁴). This may quite possibly be the common bramble (Rubus fruticosus), which is found in many parts of Palestine. It is noteworthy, however, that, except in this one passage, βάρος is always rendered 'bush,' and is used only of the 'burning bush' of Moses (Mk 12²⁸, Lk 20³⁷ etc.). The corresponding Heb. word (קנא) is similarly restricted in its use. As the bramble is not found on Horeb (Sinai), it has been thought by some that the 'bush' was a kind of acacia. For the crown of thorns which was set in mockery on the head of Christ (Jn 19²), see CROWN OF THORNS.

Much might easily be said regarding the symbolism of thorns in the Scriptures. But it may be sufficient merely to note that they were regarded as the direct consequence of human sin, and so became the natural symbols of sin and the sufferings in which it issues (Gn 3¹⁸, Nu 33⁵⁵, Pr 22⁵ etc.). In the light of this symbolism there is an apt pathos and beauty in the fact that Christ was crowned with thorns (see Cox, An Expositor's Note Book, 349 ff.; and Earl Lytton, Fables in Song, i.).

THREE.—See NUMBER.

THRESHING - FLOOR.—See AGRICULTURE in vol. i. p. 40^a.

THRONE (θρόνος) is a term applied, first of all, to the royal seat of a king; and, secondly, to the official seat of a judge or subordinate ruler. In the former sense it is employed of heaven as the throne of God (Mt 5³⁴ 23²²). The Messianic reign of Jesus is foretold by Zacharias in the words, 'The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David' (Lk 1³²). Jesus speaks of His own exaltation as the time 'when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory' (Mt 19²⁸ 25³¹). The universal dominion which He is to share with His Father is suggested by 'the Lamb in the midst of the throne' (Rev 5⁶ 7¹⁷), and by 'the throne of God and of the Lamb' (22³). So in He 8¹ 12² Christ is seated 'on the right hand of the throne' of God. The promise given to the Twelve, of sitting on thrones of judgment (Mt 19²⁸ || Lk 22³⁰), is practically given to all who overcome in the battle with evil (Rev 3²¹). In Col 1¹⁶ 'thrones' are among the subordinate powers of the universe which owe their creation to Christ.

JAMES PATRICK.

THUNDER (βροντή) is but twice mentioned in the Gospels (Mk 3²⁷, Jn 12²⁹). In mountainous Palestine, with the long deep gorge of the Jordan, it is perhaps the most awe-inspiring of natural phenomena. It seldom occurs save in the winter half of the year, and is almost invariably accompanied by rain. For the old Israelites thunder was the voice of God, with a meaning which persons specially gifted might understand. 'It seems probable that the "voice out of heaven" (Jn 12²⁸ 29) was a thunder-peal, as indeed most of those present thought, and that its significance was recognized and interpreted by Jesus alone' (Hastings' DB iv. 757^b). The surname 'sons of thunder' given to James and John (Mk 3¹⁷) disappears at once and finally from the records. On the available data no sure opinion can be formed as to why it was applied to them. As men in the East are called 'sons' of that which is most characteristic of them, there was doubtless something 'thunderous' about them,—a tendency, e.g., to wrathful resentment of slight or injury (Lk 9⁵⁴). See BOANERGES.

TIBERIAS (Τιβεριάς).—A city situated on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee, founded by Herod Antipas, and named by him in honour of the Emperor Tiberius. The original inhabitants were foreigners, whom Herod either forced to reside in the new city or to whom he gave special inducements if they would. Our Lord, so far as is known, never visited Tiberias, it being His custom to avoid Gentile cities. The only reference to the city in the NT is Jn 6²³, in which it is stated that 'there came boats from Tiberias unto the place duplicity and crime he realized only after much evil had been wrought by him. By this time he had retired to spend the closing years of his life in the island of Capri, where he died on 16th March A.D. 37. His principate thus covers all the period of the Gospel history.

TILES.—The man sick of the palsy was healed 'through the tiles' (AV 'tiling'). See also Matt. in vol. i. p. 753^a.

TIMEUS.—See BARTIMEUS.

TIME.—1. The word 'time' is used in the Gospels in a variety of senses, more or less indefinite. Probably the most common expression is ἐν στιγμή χρόνον, 'in a moment of time' (Lk 4⁵). χρόνος is used of time in general (Lk 17⁸, Mk 9²¹, Jn 5⁶), passing or having passed. In a similar sense we find ἡμέρα (Mk 6³⁵) rendered 'day' in RV (see DAY). More definite is ἀπὸ τότε, 'from that time' (Mt 4¹⁷, 16²¹, Lk 16¹⁶), and ἕως τοῦ νῦν, 'until now' (Mt 24²¹, RV, Mk 13¹⁹). The most important word, however, is καιρός, used invariably of a definite period or occasion. Three uses in this sense are noteworthy. (1) It is used to indicate the time of certain events in the ministry of Jesus (Mt 11²⁵, 12¹⁴). (2) In a special sense we have the remarkable saying in Jn 7^{6, 8} 'My time is not yet come, but I am always ready,' where the contrast is used apparently to emphasize the peculiar character of Jesus' mission and the hostility which it aroused in Jerusalem. (3) Most important is the use of καιρός to indicate the dawn of a new epoch—πεπλήρωται ὁ καιρός, 'the time is fulfilled' (cf. 13⁴³, Lk 12³⁶, Mt 16¹⁷)—which the ministry of Jesus had inaugurated. This new era is contrasted with the past (Mk 1¹⁵) and with the future (Mk 10³⁰, Lk 18³⁰; see artt. DAY [THAT], GENERATION). In a similar sense of world-period or era we have καιροὶ ἐθνῶν, 'the times of the Gentiles' (Lk 21²⁴; but cf. ἡμέρα κυρίου, i.e. judgment-day, Ezk 30³). καιρός is also used of a season of the year (Mk 11¹³, Mt 13³⁰; cf. Lk 12⁴²).

2. Various methods of reckoning time were in existence at the beginning of the Christian era, and this fact makes it extremely difficult to locate events with any certainty. The time of day was reckoned at the outset mainly by physical considerations, temperature, etc. (Gn 3¹, 18¹, 1 S 11³, Job 24¹⁵), or by the sun's movements (Gn 19¹⁵, 32²⁴); the night in early Jewish history was reckoned by watches (see artt. DAY, HOUR, NIGHT, WATCH). The days of the week were numbered, not named.

The division of time into weeks was probably of Babylonian origin, and would be suggested by the moon's phases, although there is no trace of this influence either in OT or NT. The word for 'week' in the Gospels is σάββατον (Lk 18¹²). The use of the plural (Mt 28¹, Mk 16², Lk 24¹) may have arisen from the Aram. Sabbēthā, 'the Sabbath' (Heb. Shabbāth), which at an early date gave its name to the whole week.

Of the larger divisions of time, the month, so familiar in OT times, is hardly mentioned in the NT (Lk 12³⁶, Jn 4²⁵). The Jewish month was lunar. Hence the usual Hebrew name for 'month' (שָׁחַד) is properly the 'new moon.' Three methods were employed to distinguish the month: (1) old Canaanite names, of which only four now survive; (2) numerals (Gn 7¹¹, Ex 19¹ etc.); (3) Babylonian names (see Hastings' DB iv. 765).

The Jewish year, like the month, was originally lunar, consisting of 354 days. But as this fell so far short of the full solar year, difficulty would naturally arise in celebrating feasts at the same time in each year. To avoid this, it became necessary to add an extra month at least once in three years. This was done by adding a second Adar (the Bab. name for the twelfth month), February-March, so contrived that the Passover, celebrated on the 14th Nisan (the first month), should always fall after the spring equinox. The exact method of doing this is somewhat obscure. But as a month in three years was hardly sufficient, a cycle of eight years was observed in which three months were intercalated, based on general observation of the seasons. This continued until some time after the Christian era, when a more perfect system, a cycle of nineteen years with seven months intercalated—the invention of an astronomer of Athens named Meton—was adopted. It seems unlikely that the Jews had any fixed chronological calendar in the time of Christ, but this is disputed (see Wieseler, Chronol. Synopsis of the Four Gospels, p. 401, etc.).

The method of reckoning years is a complicated and difficult subject. In accordance with Eastern ideas, that precision in reckoning events to which we moderns are accustomed was unknown. It was not considered necessary (cf. e.g. the loose phrases 'in the days of Herod the king,' Mt 2¹; and 'Herod being tetrarch of Galilee,' Lk 3¹); nor was it easily attainable. For it was possible for a writer in NT times to employ various systems of reckoning, and it was also possible to employ any one system in various ways. In addition to the various eras in which it was common to reckon, viz. the Olympiad era (beginning B.C. 776; the Seleucid, used in the books of the Maccabees, beginning B.C. 312; the Actian era, beginning B.C. 31; there was also the Roman era, reckoning by consuls or emperors (Lk 3¹), and the Jewish by high priests. Further, the year began at a different time in different countries, e.g. the Roman year began on Jan. 1, but in a few cases the emperors dated their years from the date of their election as tribunes of the people on Dec. 10. The Jewish sacred year began about the vernal equinox, as did also, in all probability, the years of the Seleucid era. But in Asia Minor a year beginning in autumn was also observed in ordinary use. These and other considerations render it almost impossible to give the precise date of any event even in NT times (see art. DATES). The one date given with any apparent precision is in Lk 3¹ 'in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar.' This seems tolerably accurate, but the actual date intended depends on how St. Luke reckoned. He may have dated from the death of Augustus, Aug. 19, A.D. 14, counting that year as the first of Tiberius' reign, or from the beginning of A.D. 15, which was also a method of reckoning. Or he may have reckoned from Dec. 10, A.D. 15, when Tiberius assumed tribunician authority. Or, as the tribunician authority was interrupted in the reign of Tiberius, St. Luke may have dated his reign from the time when he assumed tribunician power the second time. In addition, there is the question whether St. Luke would reckon according to the Roman year from Jan. 1, or, according to local methods prevalent in Syria, from the autumn equinox.

TITHE.—On the tithe as a Jewish institution, see art. 'Tithe' in II. Scripture, DB.

Our Lord makes three references to the tithes, and they are all of the observance of them by the Pharisees (Mt 23²³, Lk 11⁴² 18¹²). In the first two passages He contrasts the minute exactness with which the Pharisees observe their less important and external laws of tithe with their careless disregard of the inner and more important virtues of justice, mercy, faith, and the love of God. In Lk 18¹² He illustrates how compliance with external requirements, especially when these are exceeded, as in the case of the Pharisees, and dissociated from the corresponding state of heart, breeds a culpable and overweening self-righteousness. Our Lord in these references, as also in Mt 5¹⁹, recognizes degrees of importance in the Law's demands. Minute observance of the less important does not excuse from attending to the greater, but neither does compliance with the greater absolve from the obligation to observe the lesser. 'This ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.' Our Lord evidently thought the tithe, as well as the other OT institutions, of Divine origin, and binding upon the Jews of His day. At the same time, He foresaw a period when outward observances should give place to the more purely inward, as men should worship the Father in spirit and in truth (Jn 4²¹⁻²⁴). See also artt. ANISE and RUE. G. GOODSPED.

TITLE ON THE CROSS.—The technical word τίτλος is found only in Jn 19¹⁹; Mt 27³⁷ has αἰρία, Lk 23³⁸ ἐπιγραφή, and Mk 15²⁶ ἡ ἐπιγραφή τῆς αἰρίας. Again, as regards the meaning of the titulus, no two Gospels agree exactly. Mt. has ὁὗτος ἐστὶν Ἰησοῦς ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων; Mk. ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων; Lk. ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων οὗτος; and Jn. Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων.

The only important variation is in the case of Lk., where the TR reads ὁὐτος ἐστιν ὁ β. π. 'He, probably from assimilation to the form given by Mt. The form above given (Lk. 23:35) is to be found in NEB, and is also found in the Latin of D: rex Iudeorum hic est. The Vulgate, however, as Peter, taking the words as an insult to Jesus on the part of the Jews, reads: ὁὐτος ἐστιν ὁ β. π. τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ.

It was customary at Roman executions, at least in the case of remarkable prisoners, for the charge under which the prisoner was to be written briefly on a tablet (stavis). . . . ῥησιν (ῥήψω ἀληψιμένος, Suidas; cf. titulus qui causam prænē indicat [Suet. Cal. 32], and μετὰ γραμμάτων τὴν αἰτίαν τῆς θανατώσεως αὐτοῦ δηλοῦντων [Dio Cassius, liv. 3]). This was usually hung round the neck of the criminal, or carried before him to the place of execution (præcedente titulo [Suet. Cal. 32]). It was afterwards hung from, or fixed to, the top of the cross.

Other words for this tablet are πίναξ and λίθισμα. The letter of the Churches of Vienna and Lyons, preserved by Eusebius (HE v. 1), gives an instance of such a titulus in the case of one of the martyrs. The words are: πίνακος αὐτὸν προάγοντος, ἐν ᾧ ἐγγράφεται· Πρωτοεπίτοπος ἐστὶν ἡ ἐκκλησία τοῦ χριστιανιστοῦ. This agrees exactly with the form of the title as given by Mt.

The Synoptists merely mention the fact that such a title was placed over the cross of Jesus. St. John, who writes as an eye-witness, adds some interesting particulars—(1) that Pilate wrote the title; (2) that it was written Ἑβραϊστί, Ῥωμαϊστί, Ἑλληνιστί (the similar words in the TR of Lk. are merely an interpolation from Jn.); (3) that Pilate, in spite of the expostulation of the chief priests, scornfully refused to alter the form of what he had written. With reference to (1) Westcott (on Jn 19¹⁹) remarks: 'The Roman governor found expression to the last for the bitterness which had been called out in him by the opposition of the Jews . . . the heathen governor completed the unwilling testimony of the Jewish priest' (Jn 11^{40f.}). The three ἱερεῖς (i.e. Aramaic), Λατίνες, and ἑβραῖοι—represent, as Westcott remarks, the national, the official, and the common dialects respectively. The true reading, therefore, preserves the more natural order.

CO Mt 27³⁷) mentions the case of the inscription on the tomb of the Emperor Gordian, which was written in no fewer than five languages; the five being the three above mentioned, together with Persian and Egyptian.

The wording of the title differs in all the four Gospels, as above remarked, and many attempts have been made to harmonize or explain the variations. Wordsworth (on Jn 19¹⁹) has even supposed that the title really ran thus: 'This is Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews.' Such an attempt at harmonizing the variations is absolutely unnecessary. All four Gospels agree in giving the important words which were offensive to the chief priests, viz. 'the King of the Jews.' Others have supposed the variations to be due to slight differences in the form of the title in the three languages. This, as a general idea, is possible, even probable; but, as regards detail, agreement seems to be nearly hopeless. The uncertainty appears greatest as to the Latin form, which Edersheim finds in Mt., Cook (Speaker's Com.) in Mk., Farrar in Lk., Grotius and Swete in John. In the case of the other two titles, there is more general consensus of opinion for ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων in Mk. and the Hebrew, or rather Aramaic, in John. It can be said with some confidence that it is more natural that ὁ Ναζωραῖος should represent the word of the Aramaic inscription, as this method of description would have little point for those who would read the Greek or the Latin (cf. Sadler on Jn 19¹⁹). We have seen above that the form given by Mt. agrees with that of the Latin titulus mentioned in the letter of the Churches of Gaul. Assuming, then, that Jn. gives the Aramaic form and Mt. the Latin, the Greek must be looked for in Mk., as Lk. agrees with Mt. in retaining the word ὄντος. We may suppose, then, that the various forms were somewhat as follows:

Aramaic : ישו המלך די יהודא
 Latin : Hic est Jesus Rex Judæorum.
 Greek : ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων.

Timothy, Journal of Theological Studies, n.s. 11 (1960), and Times, II, 591 n.), ex hypothesi, the ḥ is a ḥ because the *L*ata to have been at the top and the Aramaic last; but this is contrary to the only evidence we have. He is certainly right in his attempt to give the Aramaic form of the inscription in words which are really Aramaic. It is strange to explain II 1 as near Aramaic and then to give the words in the original (cf. Geikie, quoted in Hastings' DB IV, 78, and Thesaurus of Luke).

It may be, as Alford writes, 'hardly worth while' to comment on, and endeavour to explain, 'the variations in the Gospels with regard to the Title on the Cross; but one can hardly forbear to remark, what has been said before, how the three great languages of the East bear witness to the Saviour of Mankind.' 'The three representative languages of the world at that time,' says Plummer (on Jn 1919) — 'the languages of religion, of empire, of intellect' — were employed. Thus did they tell it out among the heathen that the Lord is king (or reigned from the tree. Ps 136: 1-3). These three languages, Westcott writes, 'gathered up the results of the religious, the social, and the intellectual preparation for Christ, and in each, witness was given to His office. The modern writers expand slightly the more expressive words of Grotius: 'Ille enim erat cui cedere debebat religio judaica, eruditio graeca, robur latinum' (cf. also some little known words of Priscillian [Tract. i. p. 30]: 'In omni littera sine hebrea sine latina sine graeca in omni quod videtur aut dicitur, rex regum et dominorum dominus est, in quibus linguis etsi titulus crucis ponitur, divinum tamen deo testimonium litteratur'). 'Thus the three languages represent not only three races, but their qualities and tendencies. Wherever these exist — where there is an eye to read, a hand to write, a tongue to speak — the cross has a message and the King a kingdom. The "Title" is, in St. John's view, the witness of language to the King of the Jews, who is also the King of humanity' (Alexander, Leading Ideas of the Gospels, pp. 277, 278).

LITERATURE.—The Comm., esp. Swete on Mk 15²⁶, Plummer and Farrar on Lk 23²⁸, Grotius on Mt 27³⁷; art. on same subject in Hastings' DB, vol. iv.; and Edersheim, LT ii. pp. 590-591.

J. M. HARDEN.

TITLE (Gr. κεφαλα [WH κεφα; see vol. ii. App. p. 151]).—Both the Gr. and the Eng. words occur in NT only in Mt 5¹⁸, Lk 16¹⁷. κεφαλα ('little horn,' dim. of κεpas) was used by H. and other marks by which in Heb. such letters as כ and כּ, ה and הּ, and נ are distinguished from each other. 'Tittle,' which is just 'title' in another form of spelling (the shorter form is used in all the Eng. VSS, except the Rhemish, up to and including the AV of 1611), comes from titulus, which was used in late Lat. to denote any mark or stroke whereby one letter was distinguished from another. It was adopted by Wyclif to render κεφαλα—Luther similar; Titel (Tittel) in modernized Germ. Its importance was attached by the Rabbis to the little marks by which certain Heb. letters are distinguished from others that they closely resemble, and there are several Jewish sayings which declare that any one who is guilty of interchanging such letters in certain passages of the OT will thereby destroy the whole world (see Edersheim, LT i. 537 f.; cf. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. xi. 99).

On the lips of Jesus the saying, 'One jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the law till all be fulfilled' (Mt 5¹⁸), is startling; and a number of modern critical scholars are inclined to meet the exegetical difficulty by denying the genuineness of the saying, or to treat it as an answer of the Pauline anti-legalism, or even as a later Jewish-Christian insertion. Certainly, if the saying stood by itself, unqualified and uninterpreted in any way, there might be some warrant for such criticism, even although on textual grounds there is nothing to be said against the verse, which, moreover, reappears in Luke, though in a shorter form. But the very fact that our Lord proceeds in what follows to repeal the old Law at various points, and to substitute for its enactments precepts of His own (vv. 31, 33, 38, 41), suggests that v. 18, so far from being likely on His lips to mislead His hearers utterly, would be understood easily enough as nothing more than an emphatic affirmation, in the Master's own characteristic style, of the rounded perfection of the ideal law. The objection that the reference to the jot and the tittle implies the written Law, and not the ideal law, has little force. One might as well say that when Jesus, in vv. 20, 30, bids His disciples pluck out their right eyes or cut off their right hands, He is urging them to a literal self-mutilation, inasmuch as hands and eyes are physical realities, not ideal things.

When we remember that Jesus was constantly charged by His enemies with being a law-breaker (Mk 2¹⁶, 18, 24 etc.), we may see in the saying an utterance that has its polemical bearing. Immediately after (v. 20) we find Him declaring, 'Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.' And elsewhere He affirms that the Pharisaic and Rabbinic legalism led to a positive dishonouring of the Divine law in the interests of a human tradition (Mk 7^{8, 9, 13}). There were thus two reasons why on polemical grounds Jesus should assert the claims of the OT Law in the strongest possible way: (1) Because His enemies themselves continually dishonoured it; (2) because they falsely accused Him of being indifferent to it. And apart from polemics altogether, there was this positive reason why He should 'magnify the law and make it honourable'—He knew (v. 17) that the very purpose of His coming was, not to destroy it, but to fulfil. And so in the striking language of paradox and even of hyperbole that He was wont to use when He felt strongly and desired to speak strongly, He exclaimed, 'For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the law, till all be fulfilled.'

The point of the saying clearly lies in the word 'fulfilled.' Christ comes, not to lower the standards of righteousness, as His enemies said, but to exalt them (cf. v. 20). He comes, indeed, to fulfil the law in the old Law. The jots and tittles, be it said, are to pass away when the Law is fulfilled. But He is to repeal the old by supplying the power for its true fulfilment, and in so doing the letter is transcended by the spirit. In this way, the saying is not only an arresting utterance of the familiar Christian truth of the relation in spiritual things between the kernel and the husk, the calyx and the flower. Every fibre of the husk is precious—until the time comes for the living germ to be released. Each tiny, pointed calyx must be preserved in its own place until the hour arrives for the bursting of the bud. Thus Jesus comes, not to destroy the least commandment (v. 19), but to fulfil it. His 'royal law,' as St. James calls it (Ja 2⁹), the law of liberty and love, is an abrogation of the Divine Law that went before only in the sense in which the blossom abrogates the bud and the flower the blossom. See, further, art. LAW, § 6.

TOLERATION, TOLERANCE.—The Lord Jesus Christ exemplified the highest forms of toleration and encouraged the virtue in His disciples (Mk 9³⁸⁻⁴⁰). The Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans (Jn 4⁹), yet Jesus laboured in Samaria (Jn 4, Lk 9⁵²), healed and praised a Samaritan leper (Lk 17¹⁵⁻¹⁹), and chose a Samaritan, in preference to a Levite and a priest, to exhibit the meaning of the term 'neighbour' (10³⁰⁻³⁷). When His enemies asked, 'Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a demon?' He passed over the former and limited His reply to a denial of the latter charge (Jn 8⁴⁸). While by example and precept He sought to build a bridge of kindly understanding between the side of Judaism, He built also from the other side, and declared in Samaria that the Jews were to be respected as the possessors of the means of salvation (Jn 4²²; cf. Ro 3^{1, 2}, 10², 11²⁵⁻³¹). There are other kinds of tolerance manifested by the Lord. Persons of diverse views, habits, temperaments, were attracted to Him, so that Petrine and Johannine minds, the tax-gatherer Matthew and the tax-hater Simon, Nicodemus and Zacchæus, Martha and Mary, found in Him what they needed. His gracious comprehensiveness shielded the good in all. The ascetic Baptist (Mt 11¹⁸), who drew men into the wilderness (11⁷⁻⁹), received the highest commendation (Lk 7²⁸⁻²⁹) from Him whose scene of ministry was the street and the synagogue, and who honoured with His presence bridal and other feasts (Mt 9¹⁰⁻¹², Jn 2¹⁻¹¹, 12²). The Samaritan villagers (Lk 9⁵²⁻⁵⁶), whose intolerance James and John would have avenged, were left alone; thus were they punished, whereas they might have made their place glorious, as he did who lent the Lord the room in which the Holy Supper was instituted (22⁷⁻²⁰). In this case we see the intolerance of the Samaritans borne with, and (as in 9^{48, 50}) the intolerance of the disciples rebuked.

Again, though the Lord Jesus was frequently compelled to attack the Pharisees on account of their doctrines ε He showed them consideration by hospitality (Lk 7³⁸ 11³⁷); and He reminded His disciples, on an occasion when His enemies criticised His conduct (5³⁰⁻³³), that those who preferred old ways were to be judged leniently (5³⁹). The great parables of Lk 15, besides being a rebuke of the leaders in religion for neglecting to minister to publicans and sinners, are a gracious appeal to share in the delight of seeing men saved,—an appeal to the benevolence latent in the hearts of Christ's unscrupulous critics. He was tolerant to the intolerant. There is, moreover, a striking proof of the existence, in the minds of the Pharisees, of a strong belief in our Lord's toleration. No matter how vehemently He denounced their hypocrisy, they were convinced that He was free from animosity. Always they counted upon His forbearance. Of the reality of His power they entertained no doubt, though they could assign it to a Satanic origin (11¹⁵, Mt 9³⁴ 12²⁴); and yet so confident were they of impunity, that they never anticipated injury at His hands, and they ridiculed Him openly (Lk 16¹⁴). They were aware that His graciousness alone spared them, and they knew that His graciousness would not fail.

TOMB, GRAVE, SEPULCHRE.—

The terms 'tomb' and 'sepulchre' are used in AV infrequently to tr. μνηστίον, μνημα, and τάφος. 'Grave' is used 8 times (Mt 27⁵² 53, Lk 11⁴⁴, Jn 5²⁸ of μνηστίον. This last is by far the μνημα occurring only in Mk 5^{3,5} usage of the RV is as follows. 'Sepulchre' is reserved as tr. of τάφος (lit. 'burying-place'); Mt 23^{27,29} 27⁶¹ 64. 66 28¹ [all the Gospel occurrences of τάφος]. In all the other passages 'tomb' is substituted for 'sepulchre,' or retained where AV already has it, as tr. either of μνηστίον or μνημα. 'Grave' thus disappears entirely in RV.

The forms of sepulture that a people adopts depend partly upon religious belief, partly upon climate, partly upon the geological structure of the country. Among the Hebrews, while the conception of a personal resurrection arose only after the return from the Exile, the belief in Sheol as a place where the soul after death remained in some sort of connexion with the body did much to determine the disposal of the corpse and the nature of the tomb. Early in Hebrew history the burial customs became stereotyped. Between the days of Abraham and Jesus they underwent no essential modification.

1. Religious belief demanded (a) that the body should be buried (see BURIAL). The soul of the unburied person was supposed to have no rest, and even in Sheol the souls of such lurked in the corners (Is 14¹⁵, Ezk 32²³). Any one, therefore, who discovered a dead body was under a sacred obligation to bury it. The soul of the body left unburied was regarded as almost under a curse (1 K 14¹¹ 16⁴ 21²⁴). (b) That members of the same family should be buried, if possible, in the same tomb (Gn 47^{29,30} 49²⁹⁻³¹, 2 S 19³⁷, 1 K 14³¹, Neh 2⁵). For this reason the family tomb was often situated upon the family property. It was this dread of being buried apart from one's kith and kin that was one of the elements of the Hebrew's hatred of the sea (Rev 21¹). (c) That, except under very exceptional circumstances, the family sepulchre should be reserved for the burial of members of the one family. There are no Hebrew monumental inscriptions; but from Aramaean inscriptions calling down curses on any who should intrude their dead upon the dead already lying there, we can measure the intensity of feeling on this point. To allow a stranger to be buried in the family tomb was a sign of the very greatest magnanimity and love (Mt 27⁵⁰, Gn 23⁶). (d) That no body should be burned except as part of the punishment of the most odious of crimes (Lv 20¹⁴ 21⁹, Jos 7²⁵). To burn the body of a foe was to do something that passed all the rights of belligerents (Am 2¹).

2. Climate demanded that interment should take place as soon as possible after death (Mt 9²³, Ac 5^{6,10} 8³).

3. The geological character of the country conditioned to a large extent the particular form of sepulture. The country is one long limestone ridge, and almost everywhere the hills are naturally terraced, while the soft rock is easily worked. But the simplicity of the Hebrew burial customs should be noticed. It is not a little remarkable that a people living between two such civilizations as those of Babylonia and Egypt, in which the cult of the dead played so large a part, should have remained uninfluenced by such ornate and imposing ceremonial. The Jews did not embalm their dead. They raised no elaborate sepulchres over them; indeed, the building of a sepulchral chamber was an innovation based on the practices of Greece. While this may have been due in some degree to the lack of artistic capacity in the Hebrew, it was due also to spiritual views of death, and to the dread of idolatry that had always characterized the Semitic race. Wherever, in Syria or Arabia, Greek or Roman civilization has left some representation of the human body, the traveller finds that the face at least has been disfigured by the nomads.

The forms of sepulture were these:—(a) The simplest, though not the commonest, form was an excavation in the rock surface, roughly corresponding to the shape of the human body, and covered with a slab of stone countersunk till it was level with the ground. All over Syria these primitive graves are to be met with. The Jews were most careful to keep the stone whitewashed, lest any should unwittingly walk over the grave and so incur ceremonial defilement. This kind of burial is referred to in Lk 11⁴⁴ 'Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, . . . for ye are as graves which appear . . . men that walk over them are not aware of them.' (b) A chamber was excavated in the limestone rock-face, and long narrow recesses, perhaps six feet by two, were cut into the rock at right angles to the face. The bodies, covered with the simplest of grave-clothes (Mt 27⁵⁰, Jn 11⁴⁴), were thrust into these. The recesses were known as kokim, and were frequently made of double width, intended for the reception of two bodies. Sometimes, but very rarely, a chamber would have only one recess; rarely, a chamber had several. It the case of the Kings of the Prophets, have one chamber opening off another, each chamber having many kokim. Three other forms of sepulture are in reality only modifications or combinations of these two main modes already mentioned. (c) Shelf tombs. Inside the chamber the recess for the body, instead of running in at right angles to the wall, was simply cut parallel with the wall, and formed a shelf on which the body was laid. The notable thing about many of these shelves is their narrowness. (d) The shelf was sometimes excavated so as to form a trough in which the body was laid. (e) In the floor of the chamber itself, or in the passage leading from one chamber to another, a grave might be cut, as in (a), and covered with a slab.

It was in one of those chamber-tombs that our Lord was laid (Mt 27⁶⁰, Mk 15⁴⁶, Lk 23⁵³); and disused tombs of this kind were used as places of abode by the outcast and the homeless (Mk 5²). To prevent desecration by wild beasts, the tombs the street to the house of the marriage festival bearing torches in their hands. Bauer also (Volk-leben im Lande der Bibel, p. 94) mentions the use of oily torches by the women who go out to meet the bridegroom. On the other hand, Robinson Lees (*Village Life in Palestine*², p. 87f.) affirms that small earthenware lamps are still carried in villages by the virgins who go to meet the bridegroom, together with little jars containing an additional supply of oil. He adds, however, that torches are used in the cities. With our present slender knowledge of the marriage customs of the Jews in the time of our Lord, it is impossible to determine exactly the nature of the torches or lamps of the parable, but the balance of probability seems to incline to some kind of lamp-torch lifted high into the air. TORMENT.—The literal and figurative references to suffering in the Gospels are to be distinguished. 1. In the natural sense of pain caused by disease the words βάσανος and βασανίζειν are used (Mt 4²⁴ 8⁶); also, of evil spirits and Christ's displeasure (Mt 8²⁹ 11). Similarly, the use of the word 'tormentors' (βασανιστοί) by Christ (Mt 18³⁴) must be taken as a reflexion of well-known severities of the time; cf. 'cut him asunder' (with scourging) in Mt 24⁵¹. It has not been an infrequent occurrence that cruelties have been inflicted on prisoners with a view to inducing their friends to raise the sum of money demanded for their release.

2. The one example of the figurative use of the word in the Gospels is in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16²³⁻²⁸ βάσανος, 'torment'; δδινάσθαι, 'to be tormented'). Christ addressed the startling language of this parable to men who were hurting their souls by covetousness. To pierce the hard crust of selfishness born of wealth He used the heaviest strokes of threatening; and, choosing language that was most fitted to cause a smart to the softness of their luxury, He spoke of torture, agony, and fire. Ethical truth has always to be expressed in terms of physical sensibility, and these were things His hearers could understand. Christ read off to them in vivid words what their vision was too dull to see,—the penalties attached to their sin by the law that 'Justice founded and eternal Love.' T. GREGORY.

TOUCH.—The word 'touch' is always associated in the Gospels with Christ Himself, except in one instance. The exception is Lk 11⁴⁶ 'Ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers,' a passage requiring no exposition.

1. CHRIST'S TOUCH.—1. Christ's touch of healing.—Christ habitually established outward contact with the sick as a sign and means of healing. Besides the word ἀπτεσθαι, 'touch,' there are used such phrases as ἐπιτιθέναι τὴν χεῖρα, 'to lay the hand upon,' and κρατεῖν τῆς χειρός, 'to take by the hand.' It might at first be supposed that there was a highly more mediatorial significance about the latter phrases, as though our Lord were rather acting as the delegate of another than on His own authority, but it will be found, on examination of parallel passages, that this distinction cannot be observed. The wide extent of Christ's contact by touch with human malady is seen as soon as the passages recording this act are enumerated. By a touch only, recorded in its simplest form (ἀπτεσθαι), Christ healed a leper (Mt 8³), fever (v. 15 where Mk 1³¹ has κρατῆρας τῆς χειρός), blind people (e.g. Mt 9²⁹), the ear of Malchus (Lk 22⁵¹). By a touch, recorded in its stronger form of grasp or imposition of hands, He healed one deaf and dumb (Mk 7³³), the blind man at Bethsaida (8²²⁻²⁶), a woman with a spirit of infirmity (Lk 13¹⁶), the epileptic lad (Mk 9²⁷), many divers diseases (6⁵), and the dead daughter of Jairus (Mt 9²⁵).

2. Christ's touch, other than of healing.—Here four instances are to be noted: the arresting touch laid upon the bier of the widow of Nain's son (Lk 7¹⁴ ἥψατο τῆς σοροῦ); the upholding touch or grasp offered to Simon Peter upon the sea (Mt 14³¹ ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα ἐπέλαβετο αὐτοῦ); the touch laid upon the disciples after the Resurrection when 'he touched them, and said, Arise, and be not afraid' (Mt 17⁷ ἥψατο αὐτῶν; cf. Rev 1¹⁷ 'He laid his right hand [ἔθηκε τὴν δεξιάν] upon me, saying, Fear not'); the touch of blessing vouchsafed to the children brought by their mothers (Mt 19¹⁵ ἐπιθεὶς αὐτοῖς τὰς χεῖρας).

The Incarnation itself has been truly described in one of its aspects as God's coming into touch with men, or God's putting Himself where men can touch Him. St. Paul says that men 'seek the Lord, if haply they may feel after [lit. 'handle'] him' (ψηλαφήσεν, Ac 17²⁷); and one purpose of the Incarnation is that in Christ this desire may be satisfied. And, accordingly, to recognize something symbolic about the 'touches' of Christ mentioned in the Gospels, is no mere exercise of fancy.

(1) In the instances recorded above we are, as a first step, permitted to see the broad fact of Divine love seeking friendly contact with those for whom it cares. Our Lord is not ashamed to call men brethren. He lays His hand upon the bier; takes children in His arms; holds up a sinking disciple; encourages by touch as well as by word those who are overwhelmed by fear. Thus we see already an acted parable of how in the Incarnation our Lord 'taketh hold of the seed of Abraham' (He 2¹⁶ ἐπιλαμβάνεται, the word already quoted of Jesus 'catching' Peter on the waves to hold him up). In Christ, 'God put on the garment of humanity, and drew near in person, that we might grasp Him as a kinsman in our arms' (Ker, Sermons, 1st ser. 191). Instead of the spoken 'word' of the OT prophets, addressed only to the hearing, there is now the living 'Word,' meeting the lives of men in warm and friendly contact.

(2) But a further and deeper truth suggests itself when we pass to the many records of Christ's touch of healing. There we see what might be called the victorious vitality of the Incarnate Saviour, whose touch represents not only a sign of friendliness, but the opening of a channel of life-imparting power. If it be true that the 'fundamental meaning of the symbol' of laying on of hands in the OT—on an offering, a criminal, a young disciple, etc.—was 'identification by contact' (Swete in Hastings, DB iii. 85^a), then even to the self-consciousness of Jesus there must have been something deeply significant about the deliberate touch or laying on of hands on others. It meant that He identified Himself with them in their weakness; and that He identified them with Himself in His superabounding life. 'He touched nothing which He did not'—heal. Christ said to men, 'Because I live, ye shall live also' (Jn 14¹⁹). He revealed this Divine power amid immense variety of malady, and amid the human helplessness of many of the cases.

(3) Still another step is offered to us when we observe that Christ healed by touch such a disease as leprosy, where contact with the polluting ailment was distinctly forbidden by the Levitical law (Lv 13⁴⁶). For here we see a vivid representation of Christ's identification with mankind, not only in weakness but in defilement. To touch the blind or deaf was the act of a Divine physician; but to touch the leper was more than this—it was the act of One who could triumph over pollution, who could come in contact with defilement and yet not be defiled. 'Another would have defiled himself by touching the leper: but He, Himself remaining undefiled, cleansed him whom He touched; for in Him health overcame sickness, and purity defilement, and life death' (Trench, Miracles, 233). Thus the life revealed in the Incarnation not only sustains and heals, but delivers from the guilt which it is not afraid to meet in closest contact.

(4) Finally, in many of the instances we can discern in Christ's touch an admirable means of suggesting the presence of a Healer, and so of challenging faith. 'Then touched he their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you' (Mt 9²⁹). The touch of our Lord must often have been of the nature of a challenge. It provoked attention, proffered help, and a direct response.

II. TOUCHING CHRIST.—The occasions on which men are recorded in the Gospels to have touched, or sought to touch, our Lord may be arranged as follows. The principle guiding the arrangement will be referred to when the instances have been collected.

1. The touch of desire or faith (the verb in this first group is ἀπτεσθαι).—'As many as had plagues pressed upon him, that they might touch him' (Mk 3¹⁰). 'They besought him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment' (Mk 6⁵⁶ ||). 'A woman . . . came in the crowd behind and touched his garment. For she said, If I touch but his garment, I shall be whole' (57. 23 ||). With these may be associated the act of the woman in Simon's house, who washed Christ's feet with tears, and anointed them with ointment, and of whom the Pharisee said later, 'This man, if he were a prophet, would have perceived who and what manner of woman this is which toucheth him' (Lk 7³⁹).

2. The touch of curiosity or indifference.—The most vivid instance of this is in the story above referred to of the woman with an issue of blood, where, in the different Gospels, no less than four Greek words are used to depict the thronging of the multitude, so finely distinguished from the significant touch of faith which brought healing to the sufferer. Mk's word is συνέβηεν, 'throng' (Mk 5³¹). Lk. uses no fewer than three words: συμπνίγειν, lit. 'choke'; συνέχειν, 'press'; ἀποθλίβειν, 'crush' (Lk 8^{42, 45}). 'Out of that thronging multitude one only touched with the touch of faith. Others crowded upon Him, but did not touch Him, did not so touch that virtue went forth from Him on them' (Trench).

3. The hostile hold of restraint or enmity.—Since, in dealing with the touch of Christ, we included instances of His 'laying hands' on others, so in pathetic contrast the following instances must be included here. 'And when his friends heard it, they went out to lay hold on him' (κρατῆσαι αὐτόν, the word often used of Christ's more kindly activity) (Mk 3³¹). 'No man laid hands on him (ἐπέβαλεν τὴν χεῖρα), for his hour was not yet come' (Jn 7³⁰). Though the connexion be not one of verbal identity, such references to a false or hostile touch of Christ suggest themselves as the betraying kiss of Judas (Mk 14⁴⁵), and the smiting in the high priest's palace (v. 65).

4. It is better to class separately the very interesting references to the touching of our Lord after the Resurrection. These are as follows: 'They came and took hold of his feet (ἐκράτησαν αὐτοῦ τοὺς πόδας), and worshipped him' (Mt 28⁹)—the permitted grasp of recognition and adoration. 'Handle me (ψηλαφήσατέ με), and see' (Lk 24³⁹); 'Reach hither thy hand (ῥέπε τὴν χεῖρά σου), and put it into my side' (Jn 20²⁷)—the solicited touch of reverent experiment. 'Touch me not (μὴ μου ἅπτου), for I am not yet ascended unto the Father' (Jn 20¹⁷)

—the forbidden handling of selfish and premature rapture.

When God and man were brought near in the Incarnation, it was natural that the Divine hand should be seen stretched out manwards in healing and help (see above); but natural also that human hands should be seen groping Godwards, seeking closer contact. An American missionary bishop tells of an Indian who knocked one day at his door, and said: 'I have often gone out into the woods, and tried to talk to a Great Spirit of whom my father told me. But I could never find Him. Perhaps you don't know what I mean. You never stood in the dark, and reached out your hand, and could not take hold of anything.' The idea is precisely that of St. Paul; men 'seek the Lord, if haply they may handle him' (ψηλαφήσειαν αὐτόν, Ac 17²⁷). Now it is this identical word, strangely enough, that our Lord uses in the gracious invitation to His disciples: 'Why are ye troubled? See my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me and see.' In the Incarnation this longing has been responded to. So that, when St. John sets forth the main purpose of his First Epistle, he uses this same word again, and with what Westcott declares to be a 'distinct reference' to the passage in Luke, he states that purpose to be the disclosure to others of 'that which we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of life' (1 Jn 1¹).

In the Incarnation, then, God has put Himself where men might touch Him; and in the various instances of touching Christ, grouped above, we see how men responded to this . . . There were those who sought with all their hearts for closer contact, impelled by the sense of need, or by the impulse of adoring love; 'the history of all God's dealings with man is the record of an approach nearer still, and nearer . . . until faith puts its fingers into the print of the nails, its hand into the wounded side, and constrains us to cry, My Lord, and my God' (Ker, l.c.). There were those who merely jostled and thronged our Lord, but obtained no blessing, because unimpelled by no deep desire. And there were those whose only impulse towards God manifest in the flesh was one of repudiation and dislike.

Only one passage of those quoted above seems at first sight to put itself outside the general symbolism. This is the record of our Lord's saying to Mary Magdalene: 'Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended unto the Father,'—a passage of which the interpretations are nearly as numerous as the commentators. But is not the explanation to be found in the present tense of the injunction, combined with the contrasted command, 'But go,' etc.—as though our Lord were saying, 'Keep not on touching me, making sure of me in a selfish clinging for the duty of the moment calls thee to be . . . to others; handle me not, but go to my brethren, and say unto them'? And if it be objected, as by Godet, that on that view the following words, 'I am not yet ascended,' present 'absolutely no sense,' the answer is that the hour was coming later, when, after the gift of the Spirit, close and intimate communion with Christ could be given along with the work of witness and service,—when it would be possible for a soul to be both in contact with the living Lord and also a messenger for Him,—when (in other words) the disciple could be in 'touch' with Christ by His Spirit and also 'go' on His errands.

R. STEVENSON.

TOWEL.—'Towel' in the two passages in which it occurs in the Gospels (Jn 13⁴⁴) represents λέντιον, which is clearly the Latin linteum, a word meaning, in the first instance, 'linen cloth,' and then 'napkin' or 'apron' worn by slaves or servants, and especially 'bath-towel.' Under the Empire this Latin word made its way not only into Greek, but also into late Hebrew in the form 'aluntith. It is found in the Mishna (Shabbath xxii. 5) of the bath-towels used at the hot baths of Tiberias and elsewhere. That slaves or attendants wore the linterium is more than once referred to in the classics. The best known passage is in Phaed. Fab. II. v. 11 ff., where an officious attendant of Tiberius, who was snubbed for his pains, is described as—

*'Ex alticinctis unus atriensibus
Cui tunica ab humeris linterio Pelusio
Erat destrecta.'*

Less known, but even more interesting, as at the same time it is a contrast, is the anecdote given by Calig. (26) of the bath-towels used by the mad emperor by allowing them to stand at his couch or his feet, girt with towels (succinctos linterio). This is evidently recorded as a grave indignity to which the haughty Romans submitted with the greatest reluctance.

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

TOWER.—'Tower' (πύργος) is mentioned three times in the Lord's teaching: in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mt 21³³, Mk 12¹), in the allusion to an accident in Siloam which led to the loss of eighteen lives (Lk 13⁴), and in the illustration of the builder who was unable to complete his undertaking (Lk 14²⁸). Two, if not three, kinds of tower may be referred to in these passages:—(1) The builder who exposed himself to ridicule by beginning what he could not finish (Lk 14²⁸) may be thought of as building a house. The larger houses in the Holy Land are sometimes provided at one end with a tower-like annex. A good representation of one in the neighbourhood of Sidon is given in the Polychrome Bible (Jordan, p. 59). The 'aliyyah or upper storey, seen from a distance, must suggest a tower rather than a dwelling-house (see also Land and Book, ed. 1874, p. 160). (2) The tower in Siloam (ἐν τῇ Σιλωάμ, Lk 13⁴) may have been connected with some fortifications. The walls of ancient Oriental cities were generally provided with towers at frequent intervals. Many illustrations could be given from Assyrian sculptures, and the old wall in the Jerusalem of the 1st cent. A.D. had sixty towers (Jos. BJ v. iv. 3), two of which, Hippicus and Phasaelus, are probably represented to some extent by two of the towers of the modern citadel, the latter being partly preserved in the so-called David's Tower (Picturaeque Palestine, i. pp. 1, 5, 7-11). Edersheim (Life of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 222) suggests that the tower may have been connected with the building of the aqueduct constructed by Pilate out of money taken from the temple treasury (Jos. Ant. xviii. iii. 2; BJ II. ix. 4); but that is unsupported conjecture. If the Tower was situated literally in Siloam, the nature of the ground may help to explain the accident. The village of Silwān, which represents the ancient Siloam, is built on a steep escarpment of rock, on which a building with good foundations would stand for ever; ill-laid foundations would drop their superstructure to the very bottom of the valley' (Hastings' DB, art. 'Tower'). For the Tower of Antonia see art. JERUSALEM. (3) The vineyard tower referred to in the two other passages (Mt 21³³, Mk 12¹; cf. Is 5²) can be illustrated from ancient ruins and modern practice. Tristram remarks (Eastern Customs in Bible Lands, p. 139 f.) that 'in many cases we still find the remains of the solidly-built tower which commanded a view of the whole enclosure, and was probably the permanent residence of the keeper through the summer and autumn.' Dr. W. Wright observes that every vineyard and garden in Syria has its tower (Palmyra and Zenobia, p. 332 f.). A representation is given in that work (p. 279) of a stone tower in the Hauran constructed of black basalt, with a stone loft at the height of 14 feet, reached by a spiral staircase (see also Porter, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Bethany, p. 18; Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, 421).

TRACHONITIS.—A Roman province of Eastern Palestine over which Herod Philip held rule when John the Baptist entered upon his public ministry (Lk 3¹). The Greek word τραχωνίτις or τράχων signifies a 'rough or stony place,' and its identification with the wild and rugged volcanic region within the limits of ancient Bashan, which the Arabs designate el-Lejā ('the refuge'), is unquestioned. This was the heart, as well as the most notable portion, of the province, and gave to it its distinctive name. The phrase τραχωνίτιδος χώρας ('the Trachonite region,' Lk 3¹) implies an extent of territory beyond the limits of the Trachon, or lava-bed section. The name does not occur elsewhere in the NT, but the boundaries of the province can be approximately defined, from statements concerning it in the works of Josephus, Ptolemy, Strabo, and other writers. Josephus informs us that its N.W. limit extended to the districts of Ulatha and Paneas, at the southern base of Mount Hermon; and also that it bordered on Auranitis (en-Nukra) and Batanaea (Ant. xv. x. 3, xvii. ii. 1; BJ I. xx. 4). The line of the western border is not definitely given, but it probably extended to the eastern limit of Gaulanitis (Jaulan), which is probably alluded to as a separate district of Herod Philip's dominion.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.—1. The terms.

The terms used in the NT in its allusions to mercantile transactions give but little indication of the remarkable developments which had taken place in the trade and commerce of Palestine since OT times.

Schürer (GVV 3 ii. 50-61) gives a considerable list of trading terms which had been borrowed from the Greek, and were in ordinary use among Palestinian Jews, but few of these appear in the NT. The only term, e.g., for 'merchant' is ἐμπόρος (Mt 13⁴⁶, Rev 18³, 11. 15, 23), this being the equivalent etymologically of the two terms which are common in OT—כַּוְכַּר and מַלְכָּה—both of which seem to have the root-idea of travel, whether by land or sea. What is, however, significant is the frequency of the words ἀγορά and ἀγοράζω (Mt 20⁸ 23⁷, Mk 6⁵⁶ 7⁴; Mt 21¹² 14¹⁶, Mk 14⁵ 15¹⁶, Lk 14¹⁹, Jn 4⁸ etc.), which, when it is remembered that in the OT, with the exception of Is 23⁸, there is no mention of markets properly so called, shows that the old conception of the merchant, as one who travels with his goods, is giving place to a more settled and organized system of trade. But the NT indications of a busy and complicated system of trade are mostly in the words ἐμπόρος and ἐμπορεύω (Mt 25⁹; cf. ἐμπόρευται in both places); πραεῖται and πράσις, Mt 25⁹; cf. the apocryphal saying of Jesus, 'Show yourselves tried bankers' (πραεῖσθε), see Westcott, Introd. etc. etc. etc. Though general references of this kind are not technical names for traders, such as πομπροπώτης (Acts 16¹⁴), are very rare. Even in the graphic description of the trade of the Roman Empire in Rev 18¹⁻²⁰ there is no word more specific than ἐμπόρος, the various trades of the merchants being described simply by mentioning the article in which they deal.

2. The status of the trader.—There is considerable evidence that in Herodian times the occupation of a merchant was held in more repute than had formerly been the case among the Jews. Such a statement as that of Josephus—'We have no taste for commerce or for the relations with strangers which it establishes' (c. Apion, i. 12), must not be taken too literally (cf. Herzfeld, Handelsgesch. der Juden, p. 80). Josephus himself makes numerous references to the widespread trade carried on by Alexandrian Jews, without any implication that they incurred disparagement thereby: he mentions the 'Upper Market-place' of Jerusalem; the Valley of the Chcemongers (BJ v. iv. 1), the wool-merchants, the cloth-mart (v. viii. 1), the timber-market (ii. xix. 4); he tells us of the export of corn from Judaea to Arabia (Ant. xiv. 1) through Joppa to Phoenicia (xiv. x. 6); he mentions the influence which a Jewish trader, Ananias, exercised at the court of Adiabene (xx. ii. 3, 4); he relates how John of Giscala made himself rich by the monopoly of exporting oil from Judaea (Ant. ii. xxi. 2); and in various places indicates the growing prosperity and affluence of the Jews (e.g. Ant. xii. iv. 10, Vit. 26, etc.). In no case do we discover any indication that the fact of engaging in trade was a reflexion upon a true Jew, so long as he took care not to defile himself by such contact as the Law forbade (cf. Mk 7⁴ 'when they come from the market-place, except they wash themselves they eat not'). There can be little doubt that the encouragement which high priests like John Hyrcanus gave to trade, and the fact that Herodian princes themselves engaged in it, tended to raise the status of the Jewish trader. Priests were sometimes themselves traders. Josephus describes the high priest Ananias as a keen money-lender (Ant. xx. ix. 2). There were, of course, different grades of traders recognized. Sirach (26) distinguishes between a merchant and a huckster. Between the merchant-prince and the mere pedlar there was a vast variety of persons who found no difficulty in reconciling their commerce with their religion, and perhaps we may infer from the following that even the humblest trade was not despised: 'Rabbi Jehudah the Nasi called Elazar b. Azariah a huckster's basket, and compared him to a huckster who, taking his basket, goes about the country, and the people come flocking around him, inquiring for various articles, and find he has everything' (Aboth, 2). In the Gospels the allusions to persons engaged in trade take it for granted that merchants have a responsible and even an honourable place in the national economy. In the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19¹²⁻²⁷), a man of noble birth carries on trade through the agency of his servants, and there seems to be no sufficient reason for A. B. Bruce's supposition (Parabolic Teaching of Christ, p. 219) that such a transaction was 'a most unusual one for a nobleman.' In the East, indeed, royalty from early times had associated itself closely with the development of trade.* The teaching of Jesus is 'full of appreciation of the bigness of the methods of trade and of the brave tempers required in it.'†

* In Ezk 27¹²⁻²⁵ the words translated (AV) 'fairs' and 'market' will not bear that meaning; see RV.

The gradual change by which the Jews, from being an agricultural people, became a people devoted to commerce, is illustrated by many Talmudic passages: e.g. 'Rabbi Eleazar said, There is no worse trade than agriculture; and Rabbi Rab added, Commerce is worth all the harvests of the world' (Jebamoth, 63. 1). This change, however, took place only very slowly; the time of Christ was the transition period, and while there were many pious Jews who did not hesitate to engage in foreign trade, there were others who viewed it with suspicion and dislike, and some who would have nothing to do with it. The Essenes abjured trade, at least among themselves (BJ ii. viii. 1). Two things which laid the basis of the change were (1) the extensive contact with the Gentiles which it involved, and the consequent ceremonial pollution; and (2) the moral deterioration which it seemed to bring.

The fact that Sirach has several passages (e.g. 31, 32) of Hellenistic influences, there was coming of Hebrew strictness and integrity: e.g. 'A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong, and a huckster shall not be acquitted of sin' (Sir 26²⁹); 'Sin will thrust itself in between buying and selling' (27²); 'Take not counsel with a merchant about exchange nor with a buyer about selling' (37¹¹).

Delitzsch, indeed, thinks that it was not until about 500 years after Christ that the Jewish people began to show any special preference for those branches of trade which deal in work furnished by others (Jewish Artisan Life in the time of Christ, p. 19), but the passages which he quotes appear to be not so much indicative of the Jew's aversion from trade, as such, as instances of the feeling that a commercial transaction is incompatible with a devout life: e.g. 'The Lord is not in heaven, that is to say, not to be proud; nor beyond the sea—that is to say, not to be proud' (Sir 31¹); 'It is among traders and travelling merchants' (ib. and Eruvin, 55a).

In the NT there is no such aversion to trade as such. A passage like Ja 4¹³ 'Go, say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into this city and spend a year there and trade' (ἐμπορεύσασθαι) is not directed against trade. The passage in Ezk 27 suggests, not the prevalence of an anti-trade spirit in the early Christian community, but a protest against the excessive luxury of the time. Whatever the obscure passage Rev 13¹⁶ 'that no man should be able to buy or to sell save he that hath the mark, even the name of the beast or the number of his name,' may mean, the writer can hardly be taken to mean more than that the habits of trade were so mixed up with pagan practices that it was difficult for a Christian to be a trader without becoming stamped with the 'mark of the beast.' In this connexion it may be noted that Deissmann (Bible Studies, p. 241 ff.) finds a reference to seals, bearing the name of the Roman emperor, which seem to have been necessary in documents of a commercial nature. We may, at any rate, set over against Delitzsch's assertion that 'in the whole Talmud there is scarcely a word in honour of trade,' the statement that in the NT there is no word in its dishonour.

3. Commercial morality.—From some of the passages already quoted it might be inferred that trade in the Roman Empire in the 1st cent. was particularly corrupt. Was this actually so? It is, of course, not difficult to put together a number of instances in which the trader appears as a person of smirched reputation. Autolytus had his parallel in Palestine. The merchants of Lydda seem to have been notorious for dishonesty (according to Pesachim, 62b). Sirach (29¹⁻⁷) dwells upon the difficulty of getting loans repaid, and upon the ready excuse of 'bad times.' Zacchæus (Lk 19¹⁻¹⁰), who probably farmed the revenues from the famous balsam-gardens of Jericho (see Jos. BJ iv. viii. 3, Ant. xiv. iv. 1; cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 267, note), was, according to the generally received interpretation, given to unscrupulous exaction. In the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16¹⁻⁹) we have a picture of a factor whose dealings are marked by dishonesty and knavery. It is probable, too, that the publicans, who appear in the Gospels with so poor a reputation, owed this partly to a shady connexion with the traffic which passed through their hands. But it is obviously unfair to assume from such data as these that there was any more dishonesty among Jewish than among other traders. Herzfeld justly claims (p. 276 f.) that, though the reproach of usury attached to the Jews of the Middle Ages, it appears that among the Jews of earlier times the rate of interest was lower than among other peoples engaged in trade. The enemies of the Jews in Roman times did not scruple to bring against them the most ridiculous charges, but precisely this charge of dishonesty in business relations is not found. In the Talmud usurers are regarded as in the same category with gamblers (Rosh ha-shana, i. 8). Surely, too, the close connexion between business and religion, which is so often emphasized in the Bible (e.g. Lv 19^{35, 36}, 25^{36, 37}, Dt 15^{23, 20}, Pr 11¹ 16¹⁴ 20¹⁰ 23⁴⁴, 28²², Am 8⁵, Mic 6¹⁰⁻¹¹, cf. Sir 42⁴), and of which the Talmudic writers have so much to say (cf. Herzfeld, p. 162f.), was not without its effect upon mercantile morality. That trade was directly sanctioned by having the sanction of religion would appear from an allusion (Joma, v. 3) to a prayer offered by the high priest on the Day of Atonement for 'a year of trade and traffic.' The indignation of Jesus when He ejected the traders and money-changers from the Temple courts (Mt 21¹²⁻¹³, Mk 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸, Lk 19⁴⁵⁻⁴⁷, Jn 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶) must no doubt have been prompted partly by a knowledge of the dishonesty of their dealings ('a den of robbers'); but His denunciation is a quotation from Jeremiah (7¹¹), and must not be pressed. What stirred His wrath was the conjunction of unscrupulousness with high religious pretensions. It was because their practice was not in harmony with their principles that He drove them forth. That they suffered it with so little resistance seems to show a tacit admission on their part that they were departing from the strictness of Jewish law. Jesus never singles out the trader, as such, as an example of covetousness or fraud; when He inveighs against corrupt practices, it is rather the Pharisees 'who devour widows' houses' (Mk 12⁴⁰), and who are 'full from extortion' (Mt 23²³) that are selected for castigation. If, as is not improbable, the Good Samaritan of Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁷ was suggested by the merchants who trafficked regularly on the trade-route that led through Jericho (cf. v. 9), we have an instance of the way in which Jesus contrasted the humanity often characterizing men of the world with the inhumanity which professors of religion may be capable of showing.

4. Relations of Jesus with the mercantile community.—It has been said* that the trade of Palestine is often reflected in the parables of Jesus spoken as He passed along the busy trade-routes of Galilee and Judaea. Typical of these is the parable of the Merchant seeking Goodly Pearls (Mt 13⁴⁵⁻⁴⁶). Jesus would be sure to meet traders on His frequent journeys. Merchandise was still carried, for the most part probably, on pack-animals—asses, mules, or camels (cf. Jos. Vit. 26f.); for, though under Imperial Rome there had been a great development of the means of transit, and a fast service of conveyances had been established on the great trunk roads of the Empire, this would hardly be the case in Palestine in the time of Jesus. But conditions had arisen more favourable to commerce: the roads were safer; brigandage was put down with a strong hand (Jos. Ant. xiv. ix. 2, xv. 4); in addition to the usual town-markets, which in the time of the Maccabees seem to have been held monthly, and to which the country people came in (1 Mac 15⁸, cf. Herzfeld, p. 75f.), there was a good deal of trade done at the regular stopping-places of the caravans, and at the inns; periodical fairs also sprang up at certain places, e.g. Gaza, Acco, and Tyre (Herzfeld, p. 134). In the towns, at any rate the larger towns, merchants would have their recognized exchange for corn, wool, etc., and their bazaars for manufactured articles. They had their trade guilds, capable sometimes of exercising a considerable influence (cf. Ac 19^{23ff.}), and their trade leagues between neighbouring towns, e.g. those of Decapolis (Herzfeld, p. 148; HGHL p. 595); there were trading corporations, which had their representatives in the important centres. Thus, there were Antiochian Jews settled in Jerusalem presumably for purposes of trade (2 Mac 4^{9, 10}), and there is little doubt that at the times of the great feasts, many who came up to Jerusalem combined business with religion, and used the opportunity to establish trade relations with their fellow-countrymen coming from other parts of the Empire. The sea, now cleared of pirates, no longer offered obstruction to the spread of commerce; the Jews had at last ports of their own; Philo (in Flaccum, 8) refers to Jewish shipmasters at Alexandria; Josephus (Ant. xviii. ix.) and the Talmud refer to the wealth of Babylonian Jews. Through Galilee ran some of the most frequented trade-routes; and in this province, more than elsewhere, the influence of the enterprising Greek was in evidence.

Jesus was in close contact, then, with the busy traffic of His day, and the allusions to it in the Gospels are many; e.g. the trade in oil (Mt 25⁹), in spices (Mk 16¹⁴, Jn 19³⁹), an indication of the extent of this traffic may be gathered from the statement made by Josephus, that at Herod's funeral there were 500 spice-bearers [Ant. xvii. viii. 3], in clothes (Mk 15⁴⁶, Lk 22³⁶), in cattle (Lk 14²⁹), in weapons (Lk 22³⁶). It is a little remarkable that there is no special reference to what must have been the trade best known to Christ's disciples, that in dried fish, for which Taricheæ on the Lake of Galilee was a famous centre (Strabo, xvi. ii. 45; BJ iii. x. 6; HGHL p. 455). Absorption in trade is hinted at in the case of the man who neglects the king's invitation, that he may go to his merchandise (Mt 22⁹), and in Mt 18²⁵ we get a glimpse into a trade the dimensions and importance of which must have been much greater than is indicated by anything in the NT,—the slave-trade. This, however, would be wholly in the hands of foreigners, its chief centre being at Delos (Strabo, xiv. v. 2), where as many as 10,000 slaves might be found at one time. Phœnician merchants seem to have been the usual intermediaries in this traffic (1 Mac 3⁴, 2 Mac 8¹¹, Ant. xii. vii. 3); and, while the only direct allusion to the slave-merchant in the NT is Rev 18¹³, this personage must have been a too familiar figure on the roads of Galilee.

TRADES.—It had long been a custom, which almost had the force of law, among the Jews, that every youth, of whatever station, must have a trade. The Rabbis insisted upon it. Of the distinguished teachers in the days of Herod the Great, Hillel and Shammai learned and wrought the trade of mechanics. So with Gamaliel, a contemporary of our Lord. It was quite usual, though by no means universal, for a son to follow the trade of his father, as Jesus did that of Joseph, who was a carpenter (Mt 13⁵⁵, Mk 6³). Tradition says Jesus made ploughs, ox-yokes, chairs, and the like. The most common trades of Christ's day were those of the smith, the carpenter, the stone-mason, the baker, the tanner, the sandal-maker, the weaver, the spinner, the wool-comber, the tailor, the tent-maker, the potter, the perfumer, the fuller. These occupations are seldom mentioned in the Gospels, but the implements or wares connected with many of them are referred to, or are used as illustrations in parables of our Lord: ploughs and yokes, work of the carpenter, Lk 9⁶², Mt 11²⁸; of the mason, Lk 23⁵³, Mt 21⁴²; of the weaver, Mt 3⁴, Jn 19²⁸; of the tailor, Mk 2²¹; the fuller, Mk 9³; of digging, Lk 16³; of spinning, Mt 6²⁸.

While mechanical labour was regarded with honour among the Jews, all the trades were not looked upon with equal respect. The tanner, probably because of the unclean nature of his work, the donkey-driver, the butcher, and the followers of a few other occupations, were more or less discredited. Sewing, weaving (Jn 19²⁸), spinning (Lk 12²⁷), grinding (Mt 21¹⁷), baking (Mt 13³⁸), and the like, were largely occupations of women. The industry of catching and curing fish (see art. FISH) was a most important one, more particularly about the Sea of Galilee; Jesus called several of His disciples from this occupation, Mt 4¹⁸, Mk 1¹⁶. See separate articles on several of the trades above mentioned. E. B. POLLARD.

TRADITION.—In its simplest and most primitive form, the conception of tradition involves what is contained in the English word delivery. Tradition is the act of transmitting the story of an event or the teaching of a master. From being thus first of all the act of transmission, it becomes in the next place the thing transmitted, and finally a whole body of narratives or teachings passed from generation to generation. In the history of all religions, traditions play a very important part. The Gospels of Jesus and the Gospels were not exceptional in this regard. Explicit mention of tradition is made in Mt 15^{2, 3, 6}, Mk 7^{3, 5, 8, 9, 13}. Both of these passages refer to the same transaction, and therefore represent the same condition of affairs in the environment and the same attitude on the part of Jesus towards the subject.

The environment was as thoroughly pervaded by the recognition of the authority of tradition as any other that we know of, either in ancient or in modern times. In fact, it stands pre-eminent in this particular (Mt 15², Mk 7⁹). The Sadducees took exception to the 'revealed' state of mind (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6); but the attitude of the Pharisees was the very opposite, and exerted a dominant influence in the matter. In the Talmud it was written that 'Moses received the oral Law from Sinai and delivered it to Joshua, and Joshua delivered it to the elders, and the elders to the prophets, and the prophets to the men of the Great Synagogue. They said three things: Be deliberate in judgment, raise up many disciples, and make a fence for the Law' (Aboth i.). The Rabbis interpreted Ex 20¹ as involving the idea that all that was to guide the Israelite into the knowledge of the nature and the law of God had been given to Moses on Mount Sinai. More expressly, they found the different parts of the complex rule of faith advocated in the phraseology of Ex 24¹². The expression used in this passage is, 'I will give thee the tables of stone, and the law, and the commandments, which I have written, that thou mayest keep them.' The 'tables of stone' were understood to mean the Ten Commandments; 'the law,' the written prescriptions of the Pentateuch; 'the commandments,' the Mishna; 'which I have written,' the prophets and Hagiographa; 'that thou mayest teach them,' the Talmud (Berakh. 5a, lines 11-16). A place was thus made for a large body of precepts which do not appear in the OT Scriptures; and all this was of at least equal authority with the written Law, because given at the same time and through the same person, Moses. To the question why it was not written down at the same time as the written Law, the answer was that Moses did indeed desire to reduce it to writing, but was forbidden by God, because in the days to come Israel would be scattered among the Gentiles, and the written Law would be taken from them; the oral Law would then be the distinctive badge of the Israelite.*

By some it was held that the oral or traditional Law was even superior to the written, because the latter was dependent for its authority upon the oral testimony of Moses. In other words, the oral precedes and underlies the written. The covenant was founded not on the written, but on the oral word of God; for it is said, 'after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel' (Ex 34²⁷).

From the nature of the case, tradition was not a clearly defined body. A large portion of it was simply a repetition of the written Law, with elaborations of detail and embellishments. Another portion consisted of distinct additions, a third of provisions looking to the strict observance of the Torah. As far as this tradition was prescriptive or legal, it was called Halākāh (-khōth), i.e. decision (or decisions) having the force of statutes. As far as it was narrative, it was called Haggādā (that which is related). As a reiteration of the Mosaic Law, it was called Mishna (repetition). As a series of questionings into or ascertaining of the meaning of the Law, it was called Midrāshim. As a means of teaching, or the body of what was to be taught, it was the Talmud. The whole body of tradition together with the Prophets and Hagiographa, in fact the whole rule of faith with the exception of the Pentateuch, was called Kabbalah, that which is received. A doctrine of paralepsis was thus developed, to correlate with the doctrine of paradosis, 'tradition.'

The administration or practical use of such a body of tradition was not an easy matter. In fact, for the average layman it was an impossibility; hence the rise of a class of men who devoted themselves to the work of studying it, and informing inquirers about it (see SCRIBES, LAWYERS). But this method raised the interpreters of the Law to a place of authority. Interpretations of the Law were accepted as binding, because they said so, not because the Law was seen to involve them. The Law was obeyed not because its Divine origin was perceived, but upon the authority of men. Tradition thus came to be doubly the enthronement of human authority. On the one side, it massed together man-made rules and representations of God's thought; on the other side, it wrought out man-made interpretations of the Law which truly came from God. For the former a direct Divine authority was claimed in the teaching that they were actually delivered to Moses on Sinai; some corroboration for each separate precept thus brought down was sought for in the written Law. For the latter not even this semblance of connexion with the known revelation of God could be adduced. In neither case could the stream rise higher than its source. The teachings of men came to take the place which belonged to those of God. It could not go further back than the elders (Fathers), and those who were called upon to accept it must do so upon the authority of human statements. Tradition thus canonized the media of communication, and lost sight of the value and authority of the things communicated on one side, and the authority of Him from whom the communication came on the other. Whatever the claim for the Divine origin of the Mishna might be, the practical result of its acceptance was the exaltation of the means through which it came to the supreme place of authority.

Jesus' attitude towards tradition relates itself decidedly to this aspect of it. He saw in it a means of transgressing the commandments of God. He denied first of all the Pharisaic teaching that tradition was of equal weight with the Law. He did not, however, definitely affiliate Himself with the Sadducean teachings on the subject. As against the Pharisees, He taught that the Law of God could not come in conflict with itself, whereas between the traditions current and the Law there were conflicts. In many cases traditional prescriptions did stand in the way of the right observance of the Law (Mk 7¹¹⁻¹²). As contrasted with the Divine Law, He calls the tradition 'your tradition.' Finally, He classes all tradition with matters of form or lip-service. He ^{applies} the application of it into the sphere of the ^{ethical}. So far as such traditions could be made serviceable in the promotion of ethical or spiritual ends, they might ^{be used} but they must in no case stand ^{in the way} of the clearly revealed will of God. TRANSFIGURATION.—The name given to that event in the course of Christ's ministry in which He was visibly glorified in the presence of three selected disciples. Difficulty has always attached to any attempt to explain it. That it represents a singular enhancement of His Person and a singular attestation of His message was seen from the beginning (2 P 1³⁶⁻¹⁸). As such it took its natural place in His Divinity. To ^{be explained} has been very generally ^{regarded} or the most part in a purely external manner. The paucity of essential ideas associated with it has diverted attention to its details, which have lent themselves to much conjectural and picturesque description, too realistic in character to be serviceable to knowledge. In recent NT scholarship a new interest in the event has sprung up, directed by the modern analytical study of Christ's self-consciousness, and discerning in the experience it embodies a moment of profound import in His self-development.

1. Narratives of the event.—(1) The evidence for the Transfiguration is remarkably strong. It is recorded by all three Synoptics in its incidents, and by the Fourth Gospel in its inner mood (Mt 17¹⁻⁸, Mk 9²⁻¹⁰, Lk 9²⁸⁻³⁶, Jn 12³⁵⁻⁴¹). In the first three Gospels both the precision of detail and the agreement are striking, including the following facts: the occasion—six days after the preceding incidents just narrated; the chosen three—Peter, James, John; the supernatural light; the heavenly visitants and their speech; the suggestion of Peter; the overshadowing cloud and the Divine voice from its midst; the awe, yet joy, of the disciples; the return of Christ to ordinary conditions of human life; the charge of silence. Additional features of importance are given by Lk. (9^{28f}): the motive of the ascent, viz. prayer, during which the unearthly lustre appeared; the subject of discourse, viz. the decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem (v. 31); the physical state of the disciples, viz. 'heavy with sleep, and, having kept themselves awake, they saw his glory' (v. 32); together with two points of time, viz. 'about eight days' (v. 28), and the descent from the hill 'the next day' (v. 37). Touches, less important, peculiar to the others, are Christ's allaying the fear of the disciples (Mt 17), and Peter's embarrassment and agitation (Mk 9⁶). The silence of Jn. has been specially commented on as weakening the authority of the Synoptic witness (cf. Strauss, Leben Jesu, pt. ii.

c. 10). But when we recognize the totally different animus narrandi in his case from that which we discover in the Synoptics, we may be reassured. The Fourth Gospel separates itself from the others in making prominent the fact that the motif and explanation of Christ's words and acts are to be found, not in the circumstances and persons around Him, but in a higher necessity incumbent on Him in virtue of His nature or His office or His work or the will of God, i.e. a higher law at work. ^{As} we may expect in the Fourth Gospel, less the outward incidents* and more the interior mood ^{is} to them, to be emphasized. There ^{is} doubt that the Johannine counterpart of the Synoptic narration is to be found in Jn 12³⁵⁻⁴¹, the ^{stands} between the record of Christ's ^{try} and the ensuing scenes of His glorification, resurrection, and ascension—a ^{with} that occupied by the Transfiguration event in the Synoptics.

The details of the Transfiguration are seldom referred to throughout the NT. Explicit allusion is made only once, viz. in 2 P 1¹⁶⁻¹⁸, a writing whose authenticity is seriously doubted.† The effort (Jannaris, ExpT xiv. [1903] 462) to find in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel a direct reference to the Transfiguration is of interest, but unconvincing. Better material may be found in such passages as 1 Jn 1¹⁻⁴, Rev 1¹³⁻¹⁷, He 1³, 4³, 6⁷, 2 Co 4⁶, in which we have statements obviously coloured from immediate conviction of Christ's visible glorification; even here, however, we have only indirect testimony. The extra-Synoptic reticence is not to be denied. It is quite explicable. It is a reticence only as to details: the idea of the Transfiguration story is so manifestly accepted that he who runs may read. In the Epistles the aim of the writers is not historical statement, but doctrinal elucidation and practical edification—an aim which calls for but slight advertence to the outward facts of Christ's earthly life. There is, too, the clear belief in the minds of the writers that all those facts pale in impressiveness and meaning before that of the Resurrection, the event which is not simply analogous to them, but that in which they find their rationale and explanation. By that fact more than by any other the glory of Christ's Person was revealed, and the Divine purpose and message in Him realized. In the light of it, the Transfiguration appeared but its pledge and forecast (Mt 17⁹, Mk 9⁹). It is probably true to affirm that the central idea of the event lay in its significance for Christ Himself rather than for His disciples, who are brought in more as spectators of its marvel than as participants in its meaning.

(2) The place of the Transfiguration is not definitely located in the Gospels. The phrases are in Mt. and Mk. 'unto an high mountain apart,' and in Lk. 'into a mountain.' Earlier tradition almost unanimously fixed on Mt. Tabor—a tradition which has enshrined itself in the calendar of the Eastern Church, where the Festival of the Transfiguration is celebrated on 6th Aug. as ἡ Ἐπεφάνεια. Modern opinion almost as unanimously regards as more likely Mt. Hermon, either one of its spurs or even its summit (Conder, Tent-Work in Palestine). The argument relies mainly on the fact of the distance of Mt. Tabor, lying near Nazareth, far to the south from Caesarea Philippi in the N.W., in whose neighbourhood the immediately preceding incidents took place. The departure of Christ and His company from Caesarea is not mentioned till later (Mt 17²³, Mk 9³⁰). There is, perhaps, a certain fitness in the Transfiguration scene having occurred in the vicinity of the Transjordan, and in the Transfiguration being charged with their novel and mysterious mission. It is perhaps, too, not a coincidence that the Hebrew 'glittering cone of snow' suggested Mk's expression, λευκὰ ὡς χιών, if the last words are to be admitted into the text.*

(3) There is a little more definiteness about the occasion. Each of the three narrators connects it by time with what goes before: 'six days,' 'eight days'; the latter (Lk.) evidently, according to the common Jewish reckoning, inclusive. The note of time is not without a purpose. The link is intentional between the new wonder and the surprising revelations recounted. Those were three in number: (a) the great confession by Peter of Christ's Messianic dignity (Mt 16¹³⁻²⁰, Mk 8²⁷⁻³⁰, Lk 9¹⁸⁻²¹); (b) our Lord's solemn announcement of His near suffering (Mt 16²¹⁻²⁸, Mk 8³¹⁻³⁷, Lk 9²²⁻²⁶); and (c) the definite prediction of His coming in His Kingdom (Mt 16²⁷, Mk 8³⁸, Lk 9²⁶, 27). Compare with these the statements concerning His mind in (a) Jn 11²⁷, (b) 11⁴⁷⁻⁵² 12⁷, and (c) 12¹¹⁻²⁵.

(4) As for the time of the day when the occurrence took place, the favoured view is that it was by night. For (a) night was generally the time of His prayer (cf. Lk 6¹² with 9²⁸); (b) the disciples were 'heavy with sleep,' and had to 'keep themselves awake';† and (c) they descended the mountain 'the next day,' i.e. after spending the night on its summit.

On the high land,‡ then, close by Caesarea, possibly in the early dawn, withdrawn a stone's cast from the disciples (cf. Lk 22⁴¹), communing face to face with the Father, Christ yielded His heart, wholly preoccupied with self-discovery and tragic anticipation, to the experience of the hour, and received the illumination and strength for which He was ripe. To the disciples it seemed as if a Divine splendour beamed around Him, lighting up the departing darkness, imparting His brightness to His raiment, and suffusing His countenance with a wondrous lustre, so that He appeared to be transformed.§ And with it, from within the veil, came, standing forth as men (Lk 9³⁰), the greatest of OT men of God, Moses and Elijah, to talk with Him of His decease (ἐξόδου), and to manifest the absorbing interest of the spirit-world in His work (cf. 1 P 1¹²). Then, to the overwhelming awe of the three, there drew near a still Greater Presence, for the cloud which now cast its shadow over them all was the cloud of God Himself, and the voice heard was His, proclaiming the Son's high state and attesting His heavenly call.

2. Reality of the occurrence.—The narratives throw upon the mind of the reader the most powerful sense of the reality of the event. Their primary impression is of the outward actuality of the scene. The structure defies dissection, the substance invention. The simple naturalness of the one, the stupendous magnitude of the other, betray no indications of artificiality, while the story as a whole is as inextricably embedded in the surrounding records as the supernatural element in the historical setting of the Gospel itself. It presents a problem to faith and unfaith alike. Its former its substance is too thin, for the latter its form too full; both are often in danger of missing its inner force.

With the external details of the Transfiguration of Christ primitive opinion concerned itself but slightly. It dwells on the fact they served to portray—'his majesty,' with the assured conviction of which the whole attitude of the early Church was animated. Patristic writers were content with the prediction of the Kingdom, not indeed in its actual working, but in that personal condition of their Lord which should be the cause and signal of its commencement. Doubt of the objective reality of the glorification of Christ does not occur, and only rarely even any doubt of the literal reality of its details.*

In the modern period the historicity of the Transfiguration has been ably contested by rationalistic criticism, and unwisely defended by spiritualistic theory. The prepossession of naturalistic thought against the supernatural has pushed it to a variety of shifts. There is the hypothesis of trance, according to which Jesus had arranged a secret meeting on the hill, when a peculiar play of light and of clouds, perhaps also a thunderstorm, caused the disciples to suppose they had perceived the transfiguration of Jesus.

The two confederates in the plot for the Transfiguration have been identified by Schleiermacher—an unfounded conjecture, which has justly lost all repute. There is the hypothesis of myth. Here the incident is taken in connexion with the subsequent Elijah conversation (Mt 17¹⁰⁻¹³, Mk 9¹¹⁻¹³) as its duplicate, and regarded as originating at a later date, when it was not held sufficient that in the Messianic time of Jesus, Elijah should only have appeared.

There is the hypothesis of the Baptist—when it was thought that the Transfiguration had shown the Baptist's true character. The legend was constructed skillfully from OT analogies (especially from the parallel illumination of Moses' countenance on Sinai), and from the prophecies as to the appearance of the Messiah and His forerunner (Mal 4⁵) Elijah. The aim of the story was to glorify Christ over Moses, and to exhibit His message as the fulfilment of the Law and the Prophets (Strauss). With inconsiderable modifications, the foregoing view is maintained by Keim and others. The mythical hypothesis has the advantage of being able to draw on the abundant sources from which the natural character of the event is derived.

There is the hypothesis of symbolism. This is the incident a symbolization of the Transfiguration of the Church.

The latest attempts have more interest, as discovering a certain measure of independent fact in the event. One finds the substratum of real history embodied in it in the confession of Peter made previously, which was elaborated by idealizing tendency into a vision and attributed to the disciples (Bacon, AJTh, 1902, pp. 236-265). A second regards as the reality underlying the occurrence an inner revelation made to Jesus alone, a short time before Peter's confession and in his presence; Peter's confession is regarded as recognizing its effect on the Master's consciousness of its meaning (Réville, Jésus de Nazareth, ii. 204-206). A third holds that the story reflects the crisis when Jesus became convinced that He was the chosen heir of God. The event admits very easily of being regarded as having taken place in the inner consciousness of Jesus; probably in the company of the three, who, after awaking from sleep perhaps, received a powerful impression of the wondrous vision with which Jesus came to meet them after He had heard the heavenly voice. The terms of which He afterwards made known to them (Schmidl, EBT 4571). A fourth sees in the scene a report by men who were confessedly in great agitation when they witnessed it, who yet were well aware that what they saw was not reality but vision. It is to be regarded as symbolic, and consequent on the determination of Jesus to go to Jerusalem and possibly encounter a fate which, to the ordinary Jewish mind, would entirely destroy His claim to be the Messiah, or in any way a chosen instrument of Deity. It is at this moment that He appeared to the eyes of His most intimate friends, heavenly radiance, and appears as One whose true nature is not to be judged by His human mien or His outward fortunes. It is then that His figure becomes framed to His friends' eyes in the same picture with the principal figures of the sacred history of Israel: Elijah, because of his prominence in Messianic thought, and Moses, the founder of the Old Covenant; their presence indicating that He is not to destroy their work, but to carry it further. The Transfiguration is the enthronement of the Apostolic Christology (Menzies, Earliest Gospel, p. 174). Akin in one respect to the foregoing is the theory of Wimmer and Holtzmann, that we have here Dichtung, truth in a picture. The glorified conception of Christ reached by His followers after His death is transferred to the time and in this aspect of His life, the Transfiguration of Christ with a fresh increase of His self-revelation. The event centres in His Person, and for it marks a period. All the foregoing hypotheses prove inadequate in failing to recognize the super-terrestrial powers which are represented as appearing, and as communicating a sense of their presence, to the disciples.

The lacuna is filled by Spiritualism, which finds a congenial theme in the very facts which rationalism would dissipate. The super-terrestrial is its special delight. It sets forth principles which are alleged to account for the unaccountable features of the light, the visitants, the voice. The existence of a 'spiritual body' is asserted, by means of which man may pass out of his ordinary mode of being, of sight and of hearing, into the spirit-sphere or unseen world which is everywhere around him, and there be and see and hear, in the unobscured conditions subsisting in that sphere, what he never can in this. The notion seems to be that in each man there is a 'spirit,' made of a sort of thin matter, existing within the outward body, but having a purer existence.

'Deep within,
Some say, the spirit has another frame,
Invisible, magnetic, beauteous, thin,
And fine as any ether, scent, or flame.'

(J. C. EARLE, Light leading unto Light).

In the Transfiguration the 'spiritual body' in Christ shone forth in its native right and splendour, overpowering the dimness of the flesh which He had assumed. And by the 'spirit-body' in them, the disciples were enabled to contemplate His and those of Moses and Elijah.

Scarcely so materialistic, yet quite in the same plane of thought, are the ideas of the spiritualization and subtilizing of the bodily frame until it became luminous by some inherent law connecting the physical radiance with the presence of God in man * (cf. e.g. George Macdonald, Wraith, p. 10; Lord, xii.). The error of such theorizing springs from imagining the two as existences of the same kind. The Transfiguration is the conception of spirit as mind or the only way of conceiving its actual presence in our world. Spirit exists in the medium of consciousness, not in a peculiar kind of matter. The spiritualization of the natural body is not to be looked for in an astral or angel-body, but in the gesture, dignity, and noble mien that make the body of the civilized man the outward image of his soul. When we leave this track we land in vulgar mysticism,—and 'that way madness lies.'

The reality of the Transfiguration may be reasonably maintained on the basis of such consideration as these:—(a) that it primarily displays the state of the inner consciousness of Christ at its height; (b) that it was the direct resultant of the preceding events; and (c) that in the description, on the face of it, there is much that is symbolical. The Transfiguration is the transcript of an exalted spiritual experience, and only in the form of symbol can such be portrayed. To the writers it was the natural mode where their Master was concerned (cf. the Temptation and Christophanies). They were but following illustrious models on which their faith had been nurtured—of Abraham (Gn 15), of Jacob (28¹⁰⁻²²), of Elijah (1 K 19), of Isaiah (ch. 6), of Jeremiah (14⁻¹⁰ 20), and above all of Moses (Ex 34¹⁻¹⁰ 27-35), of Daniel (ch. 10), and of later Jewish Apocalyptic. The story is written in one mould; it is not manufactured; it tells its truth in words and images that come easily for the purpose, and wed themselves to the truth so freely that it is not possible to divorce them. Material fact and spiritual truth shoot through each other and are inseparable. But this at least is plain, the body† shared in the experiences.

* Olshausen has a theory that all through the earthly life Christ's body was being etherealized, and that here we have a glimpse into the process.

† It is a just instinct which relates the lustre to the inner life. No satisfactory explanation has yet been given of it. For hints, but only hints, cf. Dean Church's sermon on 'Sense of Beauty a witness to Immortality' in his Cathedral and University.

There is no picture to picture more than has been seen, but it is the impression that what has been seen is nothing in comparison with what has been felt.* It is the picture of an exalted emotion quickened by the sense of contact with a fact so vast that the spectators are absorbed in contemplation of it. The thought of it cannot be recaptured or recounted, because it is so unexpected, so surprising, so new, so unlike all else. Everything is swallowed up in awe and in joy, the joy of feeling face to face with a tremendous experience, an adventure beside which all the glory of the world sinks into insignificance. Accordingly we find two unique features, the absence of imagination, and the sober insistence on circumstance. Both testify to reality. The fact to which the narrators point transcends experience, and imagination can create nothing which transcends experience. Then, odd as it may seem, the mind in recovering from transcendent wonder, and in continuing to regard as impressive what it is really immaterial, but without whose aid the wonder itself would remain hid. Here, then, we have no dream of a fevered twilight, but the fit expression of a mystery, beyond thought and observation, of insight and vision,‡ where the soul is like a dreamer, enthralled by sleep, and struggling with all his might to make some familiar motion.

3. Significance of the Transfiguration.—The inner meaning of the Transfiguration is best brought out by considering it in relation to Christ's Person and Ministry. In relation to His Person it denotes (a) a sublime self-revelation, and (b) a supreme self-dedication. In relation to His Ministry it initiates important departures in the purpose, method, and sphere of His activity.

The event was naturally led up to. We can distinguish the several moments of its development. There was, to begin with, Jesus' gradual enlargement of the Messiah-ideal. Neither Moses nor the prophets satisfied Him. This is one of the most certain results of contemporary NT learning. Jesus claimed to be the Messiah of prophecy, but declined the current expectations of what the Messiah should be. His own thought immensely enriched both the prophetic and the popular forecasts. The Temptation implies that consciousness. The interval between the Temptation and Transfiguration, i.e. His public ministry in Galilee, reveals it partly in acts, partly in hints, partly in explicit reserves. At the beginning we see the clear-cut decision; throughout its course the deepening realization of what the decision involved: there He is neither simply working, nor simply instructing, He is also 'manifesting' Himself. In the life of that Self the lines are complex and interwoven. They include, but are not circumscribed by, those specifically appropriate to the Messianic Hope. His Self is greater. That at the Baptism and the Temptation Christ saw the plenitude of its greatness and the multiplicity of its interior self-relationships is not to be believed. It revealed itself in the living process of His mental and practical powers which it excited to constant energy, and which all radiate from and converge again into it. It is a Self which has its definite stages of progression, whose outward signs are traceable,§ but which finds within the veil of outward seeming its proper home, living there a concurrent life on a higher plane, with peculiar relations to an unseen world, holding power over it, and bringing power from it; and in such wise that men, observing His external attitudes, grew in wonder, debate, belief, or unbelief. His Self grew. Day by day it enlarged its domain, and took on an extraordinary presence of which He was conscious, a secretly luminous life known to Himself, only glimpses of which He could bring within the ken of the disciples.

Nor was this whole process secret from the disciples. We have to note in them a growing perception of the mystery of His life. They began the following of Him with their own mental prepossessions. These He was daily disturbing. Their attention He was continually arresting. The particulars of His life they were driven to scan eagerly from their various points of view, curious concerning it, questioning regarding it, taking sides about it, some slowly rising towards a clear knowledge of the reality, others hardening into the exact reverse. A calm and unimpassioned looking at the material outside manifestation of His Life without any reference to the inward reality of it, was precisely the one thing that did not happen. That it was more than human they divined, but what, how, to what extent the 'more' came in, they could not tell. They were earnestly inquiring. As the Transfiguration was the stage when they could acknowledge His Messianic proportions: the confession at Caesarea. That great avowal precipitated the crisis. It was bound to be followed by a further revelation of His purposes. Then came the startling announcement of the Death, opening before their eyes a dark foreground of repudiation and suffering, of whose features Christ Himself, it is probable, could at the moment furnish no clear picture: an announcement whose effect was not mitigated by the further revelation of Resurrection and the coming of the Kingdom. It was a memorable week that followed. The silence of the narrative tells of the intensity of the time. They were on the summits where life absorbs the soul. Thither the juncture of events had brought them. The Master must be lucid.

But first to Himself. A necessary hour is upon Him. Knowing it, He, according to His wont, restrains not the inevitable, but seeks solitude and God. He spends the night in prayer. In the light of His people's destiny, in the face of His prophetic forerunners, conscious of a deeper need and a more desperate struggle than theirs, He presses His life closer to God's, reaching out after completer sympathy and perfect understanding of His purposes and of His own part in fulfilling them, and receives in return that wonderful and beautiful inflow of life which stirs up unfathomable springs of purity within, and transmutes even His face and form. It was as when in the sunlight, peering into the heart of a gem, we see depth opening beyond depth until it looks as if there were no end to the chambers of splendour that are shut up in the little stone; flake after flake of luminous colour floating up out of the unseen fountain which lies somewhere in its heart. In that high hour Christ knew Himself.

He likewise learned His task. In the same self-revealing hour the issue of His life was registering itself in the sight of God, who 'seeth the end in the beginning,' and won His approval. The issue was inevitable. For Christ to know God's will was to do it. There was neither doubt nor debate, but immediate decision. He had no instinctive unwillingness like Jeremiah. Rather He resembled Isaiah, who, when he had seen the Majesty of God, His raising Lazarus 'for the glory of God,' His cure of the blind man 'that the works of God be made manifest,' etc. etc.

Jehovah, came forth from His presence with an awe upon him that never left him, and a force of conviction that never deserted him, and with the feeling of an imperative necessity lying on him to speak His word to men which he could not resist. So Christ. He had seen His own glory and felt its power in Him, and was uplifted with a radiant energy before which, as it seemed, no wickedness could stand, and which inspired with a joy deep and strong and solemn. The sweet and awful gladness of His consecration fills His heart and shines out in His face. The Transfiguration was the Divine defiance of the coming darkness (cf. 2 Co 4⁶).

The Transfiguration event transformed His mind: it transformed also His ministry. Its fascination was upon Him, impelling Him to make it manifest with a certain eager wistfulness. The motive is not: Death is before Me, the sooner it is over the better; but, The beauty of the Father's face has risen upon Me, let it shine out into the hearts of men, and draw all men unto it.

The endeavour to bring this home to the disciples now dominates His thought and directs His activity, dividing both from the calling to discipleship and work by the clearest line of demarcation. Themes original to the Law and the Prophets yield to the 'excellent glory' of the Cross, and the nature of the Kingdom His death would introduce. Miracles† and public discourse as an integral part of His ministry. Public addresses, which hitherto had been the rule, are now limited, so far as we read, to the Temple courts and the Sanhedrin; their place is taken by more private converse. There is a less obvious calling of attention to Himself, in view of a keener anxiety to concentrate attention on the Spirit that animates Himself and the Father, and is needful for that higher form of fellowship of men with God than Israel had known, which He Himself enjoyed, and which He promises will glorify them as it had glorified Him.‡ From this last consideration we deduce the significance of the event for us. It is the same as for Christ and His disciples. 'We shall be like him,' says the disciple who had felt most effectually the power of His personal presence (1 Jn 3²).

That points to an organic change that will take place in us at His coming. It is to be taken in conjunction with His other, 'Christ in you the hope of glory' (Col 1²⁷). The moral transformation is the root and beginning of the organic. Christ not only so acts upon us as to draw us to His holy and exalted pattern now; when He comes again, it shall be to reflect His glory into the persons of His believing followers. The Church of the redeemed will mirror His surpassing loveliness and majesty, 'He shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be marvelled at in all them that believe' (2 Th 1¹⁰).

LITERATURE.—The literature of the Transfiguration is not large, and is found chiefly in sermons, for a bibliography of which see ExpT xviii. [1907] p. 313, adding, Ruskin, Frondes Agrestes, 178; Rendel Harris, Memoranda Sacra, 87. For critical treatment see Holt Strauss, Leben Jesu, pt. ii. c. 10; Keim, Jesus Christus, vol. iv.; JThSt, Jan. 1903, July 1903, Jan. 1904, 1911. For expository articles see ExpT xvii.

* Dr. Matheson (Studies in the Portrait of Christ, vol. ii.) interprets the Transfiguration as designed solely to inspire and comfort Christ in respect of His approaching Sufferings by providing an anticipation of the glory of the Resurrection ('decease' effected by resurrection and ascension). Dr. Mason (Faith of the Gospel, p. 31) thinks the Transfiguration an opening of the door of heaven for a splendid departure, His earthly probation being now ended. An ingenious writer in the Church Quarterly Review (July 1901, 'A Study of our Lord') draws out these parallels:—transfiguration of body in face of maltreatment of body, appearance of Elijah and Moses in face of rejection by rulers and people, the cloud and voice in face of the hiding of the Father's face. Such exegesis is exaggeration and misses proportion.

TRANSMIGRATION.—The idea of the pre-existence of the human soul seems to be assumed in the question which the disciples put to Jesus with reference to the man born blind (Jn 9²). The pre-existence hinted at is presumably and at first glance an incarnated one, for it is possible to sin in it. But if this exegesis of the passage be correct, then, at least in the minds of the disciples who propounded the question, there was a doctrine of transmigration. In order to ascertain the correctness of the exegesis, it is necessary to look into the antecedents and broad setting of the thought.

The doctrine of transmigration, i.e. the idea that when the soul leaves the body at death it passes into another body, was held widely among the Egyptians, the Hindus, and the Greeks. Each one of these peoples, however, developed it in a peculiar form of its own. Through the long history represented by their combined life, it assumed a large variety of aspects. Broadly speaking, these may be reduced to two, the cruder and the more refined.

(a) In the cruder form, belief in transmigration was simply the belief that the moving principle of a living being, either immediately upon the death of that being or after a more or less prolonged interval, takes upon itself another organism. In this form of it, the doctrine does not distinguish between human bodies and bodies of other living beings; or, to be more precise, of other material forms reputed to be living. The soul is supposed to pass into another organism of the same class, or of a higher or a lower class. A man might be reborn as a brute, or as a tree or stream, or even as a star. The ethical idea associated with this form of metempsychosis is in the belief that the kind of body taken by the soul depends on its realizing or failing to realize ethical ideals. Of this form of the doctrine, it is quite safe to say, there is not the slightest trace either in the NT or in the whole range of Hebrew literature, with its sequel of Jewish Rabbinical teaching of the earlier period. If it appear at all in Jewish thought, it does so as an importation in a much later stage than the Biblical.

(b) The more refined form of the doctrine of transmigration limits the sphere of movement to the human race. The human soul or personality is, according to this conception, capable of reappearing and taking part in the world. In the strictest sense of the word this is, of course, not transmigration, but reincarnation. But whatever it may be called, there are a number of expressions in the Gospels which point to the existence of the belief in the time of Jesus. Chief and foremost among these are the passages which refer to John the Baptist (Mt 11¹⁴ 17¹²⁻¹³, Mk 9¹³). Here the disciples are puzzled by the apparent inconsistency between the fact that Jesus is the Messiah and the fact that Elijah has not appeared, as, in accordance with an authoritative interpretation of the prophecy of Malachi (4⁵), he was expected, to precede and prepare the way for the Messiah. The disciples evidently accepted the teaching of the scribes. This belief, however, does not put it beyond doubt that the doctrine of transmigration or even reincarnation was current. Elijah had not died and been divested of his first body. His reappearance could only be conceived of as involving his descent from heaven with the same body which he took there at the time of his ascension. The difficulty in believing that John the Baptist was Elijah consisted, at least in part, in the fact that he was known to have had a natural birth; whereas the return of Elijah would necessarily exclude such birth. Jesus' answer to the disciples simply removes the case from the physical into the spiritual sphere, and thus makes the question before their minds an irrelevant one. The question had been fulfilled, but its fulfilment was not the reincarnation of Elijah nor his descent from heaven with his first body.

Another instance of belief which might be mistaken for transmigration is that suggested in Herod's words (Mt 11³) identifying Jesus with John the Baptist. But here, too, the words scarcely point to belief in transmigration. All that is necessary to assume is that the remorse-stricken Herod saw in the miracles reported of Jesus that John the Baptist had risen from the dead. It is belief in resurrection rather than in rebirth.

Still another case is that in which the disciples, in answer to the question of Jesus, report that some believed Him to be Elijah, others Jeremiah, and others one of the prophets (Mt 16¹⁴, Mk 6¹⁴⁻¹⁷). The idea of transmigration is more natural in this passage, but even here it is not clearly set forth. As far as Jesus is concerned, it is certainly not only not held or encouraged by Him, but quite definitely set aside. At most, it can be only an idea entertained by the common people.

Outside of the Gospels, the traces that a belief in metempsychosis was held in Palestine at the time of Jesus are very scanty. It appears that among the Essenes it was held that the soul was immortal, and its life upon earth due to its being drawn from its native ether and entangled in the body as in a prison cell (Jos. BJ II. viii. 11). The affinity of this belief with the Platonic teaching regarding the nature and origin of the soul suggests that the Platonic idea of transmigration, as its inevitable logical corollary, was held also by the Essenes.

In general, there was nothing in the nature of Jewish thought to prevent the adoption of the idea of transmigration as soon as the distinction between soul and body was clearly defined. The older idea of the unitary character of the being. On the contrary, there was very much to make the thought welcome in the Rabbinical system. The doctrine of pre-existence (of the Messiah, of the Torah, of the Tabernacle) would easily lend itself as a basis for the idea of the pre-existence in some form or other of human souls. Further, belief in the possession of the body by more than one spiritual being (as in the case of the possession of the body by more than one spirit) would tend to prepare the way for the belief in the return of disembodied spirits into human bodies. Finally, the idea of resurrection from the dead furnished an analogue to reincarnation. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, if the notion should appear more or less clearly in the later Rabbinical theology (cf. Epiphanius Wilson, The Talmud, Preface). The question of its existence in the days of Jesus Christ must be left open, while the question of its being entertained by Him or by the disciples in the Gospels must be answered in the negative.

TRAVEL.—Travelling for pleasure was almost, if not altogether, unknown in the ancient world. This is to be accounted for by lack of roads, lack of conveyances, and perils by the way. Travellers had usually some definite object in view; Abraham seeking for a home at the command of Jehovah (Gn 12^{1st}); Jacob fleeing from his brother (Gn 28¹⁰); the Israelites going up to their sacred places, and later to the Temple at Jerusalem. As the sea had special terrors, travelling was chiefly by land, and not till well on in history did men launch boldly out into the deep. In the days of the Empire, sailing was confined to certain well defined tracks, and to certain seasons. On land, travel was done for the most part on foot; hence the custom of washing the feet (Gn 18⁴, Jg 19²¹ etc.) was almost a necessity as a token of hospitality. Horses were used for war, and camels for the desert. Persons of rank rode on mules (2 S 13²⁹, 1 K 1³⁸), while the ass was more usually kept as a beast of burden. Wheeled waggons were not in general use, and, on the rare occasions on which they were employed, were heavy, cumbersome, and without springs. Joseph sent waggons for his father (Gn 45¹⁷⁻¹⁹); the kings of Israel had their chariots (1 K 22³⁵); and the Ethiopian eunuch made his journey to Jerusalem in a chariot (Ac 8²⁸); but wheeled vehicles of any kind were rare. Long journeys were generally undertaken in the summer, when the roads were good and firm. In the winter the roads were soft, and other conditions unfavourable. In Mt 24²⁰ Jesus says, 'Pray that your flight be not in the winter time,' which means the rainy season, when roads are practically impassable, and food difficult to obtain en route. This accounts for St. Paul's desire to have Timothy with him before the winter set in (2 Ti 4²¹). In the morning the traveller started on his journey, and continued it till noon-day, when he took refuge for an hour or two under some kindly shade from the scorching rays of the sun, and then resumed his course (Ca 17). To refuse hospitality to a traveller was a breach of good manners, if not, indeed, an insult to God. This state of affairs continues largely in Palestine to-day, though on the tourist routes the people have fallen in with the spirit of the age.

The ordinary way of reckoning the length of a journey was not by miles, but by time (Gn 30³⁸ ימים, Jon 3⁴ ימים, Lk 24⁴⁴ hēmeras ὁδοί), and this makes it difficult to determine accurately the distances covered. Moses asked that the children of Israel should be permitted to go into the wilderness a three days' journey (Ex 5⁵), and in Gn 31²³ it is said that Laban pursued after Jacob a seven days' journey. There would be a great difference between the speed of these two companies, and progress in the ground traversed. In hilly country progress would be less than in the flat country, and a small company or a single individual would go faster than a caravan. An ordinary day's journey might be put down at about 20 miles, but it would require an extraordinary stretch of imagination to make that fit in with Nu 11³¹. In Lk 2¹⁴ the journey meant not more than 6 miles, for caravans, with their crowds, moved at a leisurely pace; and tradition has it that the halting-place was Beeroth, which is 6 miles north of Jerusalem.

The longer the journey the slower the pace, for provision for man and beast and equipment for the way had to be carried. 'Take victuals with you for the journey' (Jos 9¹¹) was the rule and not the exception. This led Christ to say to the Twelve, when He sent them out, 'Provide neither gold nor silver for your journey' (Mt 10⁹⁻¹⁰ ||), so that they might not be hampered by these things, and that they might receive a much-needed lesson in faith.

Reference is made in Ac 1¹² to a Sabbath day's journey (σαββάτου ὁδός). This is the only place where the phrase occurs. Olivet is said to be a Sabbath day's journey from Jerusalem. The expression is very indefinite. Josephus in one place (Ant. xx. viii. 6) gives the distance from Jerusalem to the Mount of Olives as 5 furlongs, and in another as 6 (BJ v. ii. 3). Schleusner makes it $7\frac{1}{2}$ stadia or 12 furlongs. The difference seems to lie in the varying value of the cubit, which in the older Hebrew measurement was longer than in the later. The result is the same—2000 cubits, which would bring it into conformity with Rabbinical law, 'Let no man go walking from his place beyond 2000 ells on the seventh day' (Jerus. Targ. on Ex 16²⁹). A Sabbath day's journey was by common consent 2000 cubits or ells, though some Rabbis allowed a kind of sliding scale, and spoke of the greater journey (2800), the medium (2000), and the smaller (1800). This was purely Rabbinical, and deduced from (1) Ex 16²⁹ 'Abide ye every man in his place, let no man go out of his place on the seventh day'; (2) from the distance between the Ark and the people on the march (Jos 3⁴); and (3) from the conditions laid down as to the cities of refuge (Nu 35⁵). In Ex 16²⁹ the 'place' by a process of Rabbinical reasoning became the city where a man dwelt; and it was argued that 'if one who committed murder accidentally was allowed to take this journey of 2000 ells on the Sabbath day without violating the sanctity of the day, innocent people might do the same.' By a little ingenuity a Sabbath day's journey could be considerably extended. If a person desired to do so, he had simply to carry to some point within the Sabbatical limit two meals before the Sabbath began, one of which he had to eat and the other to bury; and that place became for him his dwelling-place. It is even alleged that by fixing his eye upon a tree or wall within the prescribed limit, and uttering certain words, he could make that his starting-point.

In NT times it was customary, as indeed it is to-day, to accompany a departing guest on a part of his way (Lk 15¹, Ac 15³, 1 Co 16⁶) as a token of goodwill and affection.

TREASURE.—The word 'treasure' upon the lips of a Hebrew signifies a store of anything that constitutes wealth, of corn and wine and oil, as well as of gold and silver and precious stones (Mt 13³²). Hence spiritually the word suggests an apt figure of the true eternal riches. Just as on earth the worldly-wise may lay up stores of wealth, so in the heavens the man who seeks after spiritual things may lay up for himself an eternal treasure. It has been imagined by some commentators that by 'treasure in heaven' our Lord means merely the reward which shall be given hereafter to all who suffer loss for His sake on earth. 'Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven' (Mt 19²¹, Mk 10²¹, Lk 18²²), they take to mean merely, 'Give away thine earthly wealth, and God shall give thee instead heavenly blessedness'; but so to interpret the words is to miss by far the most valuable part of their teaching. It was this interpretation that formed the chief justification for the monkish asceticism of the Middle Ages. It gave rise to a false spiritualism, to the fatal and irreconcilable dualism of sacred and secular. In addressing the words to the rich young man, our Lord was treating a particular case, the case of one whose spiritual aspirations were crushed beneath the burden of his wealth. The treasure in heaven which Christ told him he should have was not to be gained by the simple process of denuding himself of his worldly possessions—God would not step in to supply in the next world what he had voluntarily sacrificed in this. Such teaching would have been an appeal to selfish prudence merely, would justify, if it were correct, all that unbelievers have said about the selfishness of Christianity. It was not to the man's selfishness that Christ addressed Himself, but to the earnest longing after righteousness which He perceived in him. 'What luck I yet!' the man had said, even after asserting that he had kept the commandments from his youth up. Christ therefore bade him cast aside the temptation which bound him down, that his aspirations might at last have free play; that, untrammelled by earthly cares, he might take to himself the treasure of righteousness and truth which he had always longed to make his own.

That spiritual treasure is regarded by our Lord as a personal thing, not as a mere reward assigned from without, is rendered even more plain by what He says regarding the 'treasure of the heart' (Mt 12³⁵ || Lk 6⁴⁵). This treasure of the heart is manifestly the accumulated tendencies which we call character, the habits which a man makes, the qualities which he acquires, by the repeated choices of his life. He who strives continuously to follow the dictates of righteousness and love, makes for himself a righteous and loving character. His past deeds become a store from which he can continually draw anew. The more good deeds he does the richer grows his heart in goodness, and the greater will his joy become in doing what is right. His heart will of itself bear fruit of goodness. But the same is true also of the evil man. The second lie is proverbially easier than the first. The more evil he does, the more evil grows his heart, until it is well-nigh impossible for it to produce what is good. His heart becomes callous and hard, so that he can no longer take delight in goodness. Thus, again, it is true that 'where the treasure is, there will the heart be also.' The heart of the good man brings down heaven to earth, while that of the evil man could find no bliss in heaven itself.

When in Col 2³ St. Paul tells his readers that in Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, he is but following out the same figure. ἐν Χριστῷ expresses one of the two great principles of the Pauline theology. To win the true treasure a man must be in Christ; for He is the universal Man, the ideal of manhood, the only perfectly loving and wise and true of all mankind. In Him only was the heavenly treasure revealed in perfect fulness. He who would share it must therefore be in Christ, must be inspired by His spirit.

The true treasure of the human heart is the Kingdom of heaven. To have the Kingdom of God within one, is to be spiritually rich indeed. In setting forth the manner in which the Kingdom is received into different kinds of hearts, our Lord once again uses the figure of treasure, in the parable of the Treasure hid in a field (Mt 13⁴⁴). Here He refers to an experience not uncommon in the East, where the uncertain tenure of property led men often to hide their wealth, and where the equal uncertainty of life caused it often to remain unclaimed. This and the parable of the Pearl of Great Price (another kind of treasure), which follows it, describe the two ways in which the truth of the gospel is received by men. There is the finder who has never sought at all, and who comes upon his find by accident; and there is the finder who has spent his life in seeking. In this, however, they are like, that when the treasure is discovered each is willing to part with all he has for its possession. Indeed, this willingness is the test of the true finder; but it is also the essential mark of the true treasure. It is of such a nature that it cannot be possessed for less than all that a man is and has. It lays hold upon the true finder's heart; for in it he recognizes the satisfaction of all his longings: it is the completion of his being, the source of his life to all eternity.

TREASURE.—Two words are trad. 'treasure' in the Gospels. 1. γαζοφυλάκιον (fr. γάζα, a word of Persian origin = θησαυρός, 'treasure,' and φυλακή, 'guard'), 'a place for keeping treasure,' i.e. either a treasure-chest or a treasure-chamber (Mk 12^{41, 43} || Lk 21¹, Jn 8²⁰). (1) In the two Syn. it is used, in connexion with the poor widow who gave her two mites, to denote a treasure-chest, or receptacle into which offerings were cast by worshippers coming into the Temple—a sense in which the word is found also in Josephus (Ant. XIX. vi. 1, where Agrippa hangs his chain of gold ὑπὲρ τὸ γαζοφυλάκιον). According to the Talmud (Shegalim, vi. 5), there stood in the court of the women, the most frequented part of the sacred enclosure, 13 brazen chests, into which were dropped the contributions made for the service of the Temple, the support of the poor, and other pious purposes. These chests were of a peculiar shape, without out beneath so as to be of considerable size, but tapering upwards to a narrow mouth, into which the offerings were put—and, because of their resemblance to inverted trumpets, were known as ἄλκων ('trumpets'). It was into one of these that the widow would cast her all. (2) In the EV rendering of Jn 8²⁰ Jesus is said to have spoken 'in the treasury' (ἐν τῷ γαζοφυλάκιῳ), as He taught in the Temple. This rendering would imply that the γαζοφυλάκιον in question was not a treasure-chest merely, but a part of the Temple itself in which treasure was kept. Now, we know that there were special treasure-chambers within the inner court, in which not only the precious vessels of the sacrificial service and the costly garments of the priests, but vast sums of money and various other valuables were kept, and that these treasure-chambers, which were under the charge of officers known as γαζοφυλάκες, were called γαζοφυλάκια (Neh 10³⁷ LXX; Jos. BJ vi. v. 2). That Jesus would be found teaching in one of these inner treasure-chambers is, however, exceedingly improbable. And when we put such a notion aside, two views may be taken of the meaning of ἐν τῷ γαζοφυλάκιῳ. (a) We may take γαζοφυλάκιον to denote, as in the Synoptics, nothing more than a treasure-chest, and understand ἐν to be used in the sense of proximity merely (so Meyer; cf. ἐν δεξιᾷ θεοῦ [Ro 8³⁴ and frequently], 'at the right hand of God'), so that the phrase would signify 'at or near the treasury.' (b) We may take ἐν in its strict local sense (so Winer, Gram. of NT Gr. 481), and then understand γαζοφυλάκιον to denote that part of the Women's Court in which the treasure-chests were kept. But in either case the general meaning will be the same. Jesus was not in some closely guarded chamber of the inner Temple, but sitting 'near the shōphārōth,' or 'in the colonnade where the shōphārōth stood.'

2. κορβανᾶς (fr. κορβάν; see CORBAN) occurs in NT only in Mt 27⁶, where it denotes the sacred treasury of the Temple. Into this treasury the chief priests would not put Judas' thirty pieces of silver, 'because it is the price of blood.' In Josephus (BJ ii. ix. 4) the word is used not of the Temple treasury, but of the treasures it contained. Herod is said to have created a disturbance in Jerusalem by expending upon aqueducts 'that sacred treasure which is called corbanus' (τὸν ἱερὸν θησαυρὸν, καλεῖται δὲ κορβανᾶς).

It may be added that, although in EV θησαυρός is invariably rendered 'treasure,' it is occasionally used in a sense that corresponds to 'treasury' or the place where treasure is kept. In Mt 12³⁵ || Lk 6⁴⁵ it denotes the treasury of the heart; in Mt 13⁵² that of the well-provided householder, to whom Jesus likens the 'scribe who hath been made a disciple to the kingdom of heaven.'

TREE (Lat. lignum, arbor).—A tree is mentioned for the first time (Ac 5³⁰ 10³⁹ 13⁹, 1 P 2²⁴; cf. Gal 3¹⁰; nowhere in Gospels). The name no doubt originated in the practice (cf. Jos 10²⁶) of employing a tree in case of haste for the purpose of crucifixion* (cf. gallows-tree), but in mediæval times it was explained by a quaint legend. As he lay a dying, it was said, Adam sent his son Seth to the angel that guarded Paradise, to crave a bough from the tree of life. The angel gave it, and Seth carried it to his father, but found him dead. He planted the bough upon his grave. In course of time, when Solomon was building the Temple, the tree was cut down, but it refused to be fitted into any part of the Temple, and was placed over a stream to serve as a bridge. By and by the queen of Sheba came with her gifts and saw the tree. Seeing the tree she would not walk over it, but she recognized that the Redeemer of the world would suffer on it. Long afterwards the Jews took it and cast it into a stagnant pool, which derived a miraculous virtue from its presence: an angel descended from time to time and troubled the water, and the first that stepped in after the troubling was healed (cf. [Jn] 5⁴). There it remained until the time of our Lord's Passion, when it was taken out of the pool and placed on the Cross on which He suffered.†

Much devout fancy was inspired by the term. It suggested a reference to the Cross in Ca 2⁵, which runs thus in the Vulgate: 'Sicut malus inter ligna silvarum, sic dilectus meus inter filios. Sub umbra illius, quem desideraveram, sedi: et fructus ejus dulcis gutturi meo. Fulcite me floribus, stipite me malis: quia amore langueo.' The 'hymn writers extolled the 'arbor salutifera' which bore such sweet and precious fruit. One says: ‡

† *For the tree of life is the noble lignum, ‡ *Quia arbor salutifera poma geris.

And in his exquisite Laudismus de S. Cruce St. Bonaventura says: §

* *Crux est arbor decorata,
‡ *Crux est arbor decorata,
§ *Crux est arbor decorata,
¶ *Crux est arbor decorata,
‡ *Crux est arbor decorata,
§ *Crux est arbor decorata,***

The Fathers loved to contrast the first tree whose fruit brought death into the world, and the second tree whose 'leaves are for the healing of the nations' (Rev 22²). Cf. St. Jerome on Mk 15²³ 'Hic figitur salus in ligno. ligno primo infixa est mors. Lignum primum lignum scientiæ boni et mali est. Et secundum lignum boni tantum nobis et vitæ lignum est.' In Evangel. Nicodem. xxiii., after the 'muttering of hell' Hades says to Satan: 'All that thou gainedst by the tree of knowledge (δὴ τοῦ ξύλου τοῦ γινώσκου), by the tree of the Cross (δὴ τοῦ ξύλου τοῦ σταυροῦ) thou hast lost.' TRIAL OF JESUS.—The narratives of what may be termed, for the sake of convenience, the two-fold trial of Jesus yield a record of the proceedings which is fairly intelligible and substantially authentic, but which is bound up with a triple set of problems. Some of these are topographical or archaeological; some are legal, connected with the jurisprudence of the trial; while others are historical, arising from the literary criticism of the Evangelic traditions. The first set of problems* and the lack of many occasionally prevent criticism from throwing a steady ray of light upon the exact course of affairs, and this is particularly the case with regard to the first two classes of problems.

1. The topographical problem.—This includes the question of Pilate's Prætorium (see vol. i. p. 859, and PRÆTORIUM), the precise meaning of Gabbatha (Jn 19¹³, cf. GABBATHA and PAVEMENTUM), the problem whether Annas and Caiaphas had separate residences or stayed together in an official house, and the site of the meeting-place of the Sanhedrin (in the house of Caiaphas or elsewhere). These details are discussed elsewhere in this Dictionary, and it is unnecessary to examine them afresh, particularly as the decisive evidence, such as it is, has to be drawn as a rule from considerations which lie outside the words of the Gospels. The same remark applies, though in a less degree, to

2. The legal problem.—The question whether Jesus was legally condemned to death starts an interesting problem in historical jurisprudence, but it was not present to the minds of the Evangelists or of the original reporters of the Passion; and this, combined with the condensed, and even discrepant character of the narratives, renders it extremely difficult to answer the question with any confidence in the affirmative or the negative. If the Talmudic law was in force in Palestine during the lifetime of Jesus, there would be no course open but to agree with some savants of last century that the Sanhedrin acted illegally.† But the Talmud represents a much later phase of Jewish jurisprudence, and it is probable that, viewed in the light of contemporary practice, the Council were careful on the whole to observe the letter, though not the spirit, of justice, and to practise most of the forms of law.‡ Thus it is far from certain that they met at night, though it seems as if they passed their resolution before daybreak; and the main count against them are the neglect to warn the witnesses solemnly before giving evidence, the judicial use of the prisoner's confession, and the undue haste with which the proceedings were rushed through. They were kept within judicial limits only so far as it was necessary to save appearances.

The proceedings before Pilate are less obscure. It was necessary for the Jewish authorities to obtain the governor's sanction for the execution of the death sentence, and this involved a fresh trial of the accused. Pilate seems to have acquitted

* The relevant passages are Mk 14⁵³⁻¹⁵²⁰, Mt 26⁵⁷⁻²⁷³¹, Lk 22⁵⁴⁻²³²⁵, Jn 18¹²⁻¹⁹¹⁶.

† Thus the ablest of recent jurists who have discussed the problem, Mr. A. Taylor Innes, sums up his inquiry in the words: 'A process, begun, continued, and apparently finished in the course of one night, commencing with witnesses against the accused who were sought for by the judges, but whose evidence was not sustained even by them; continuing by interrogations which Hebrew law does not sanction; and ending with a demand for confession which its doctors expressly forbid; all followed, twenty-four hours too soon, by a sentence which described a claim to be the fulfiller of the hopes of Israel as blasphemy—such a process had neither the form nor the fairness of a judicial trial.' This needs to be qualified, but substantially it seems accurate.

‡ Contrast, on this point, the juristic colouring of the Acta Pilati (cf. von Dobschütz, ZNTW, 1902, 89-114, and Mommsen, ib. 198 f.).

Jesus of the majestas or high treason which the Council first brought forward against Him, but there is some doubt as to whether the acquittal was formally pronounced in accordance with law. In the Markan tradition, followed by Matthew, Pilate never pronounces Jesus to be innocent, although it is possible that he did not believe Him to be guilty. If he believed Him to be crucified is a desire to curry favour with the people. When he discovers that they prefer Barabbas to Jesus, and that the latter is not after all a popular infatuated leader, he has little or no scruples about handing Him over to the tender mercies of His compatriots. His blood be on their heads!

The Lukan tradition, followed substantially in the Fourth Gospel, raises the problem of jurisprudence definitely by affirming that Pilate thrice pronounced Jesus innocent (23: 14, 22). If so, the first acquittal makes the reference of Jesus to Herod illegal. But, as we shall see, it is probable that this formal verdict is at least antedated, and that Jesus was not finally acquitted, if He was acquitted at all, until He had been sent back from Herod. Thereafter the proceedings are destitute of justice; Pilate is concerned not with his legal duty, but with the interests of his personal safety and popularity, which were endangered by his conscientious desire to release the prisoner.

Only a critical analysis and comparison of these early Christian traditions can yield evidence for estimating aright the problems of the jurisprudence of the trials; and even the results of such an inquiry are not final, as in the case of the Jewish trial. It is with this caution of this kind that we enter on the third and most important stage of our discussion.

3. The historical problem.—The confusion and even conflicting features in the tradition of the trial of Jesus, which followed His arrest (cf. ARREST and BETRAYAL), are due to the fact that no uniform or complete account of it was ever circulated among the early Christians. The Gospels betray different currents of tradition, and these currents do not always flow in the same channel. Here and there, in different circles, different phases or reminiscences of the trial were preserved; but not even in the Markan narrative, with its Petrine basis, does an exhaustive, accurate record of the proceedings lie embedded. The later Gospels treat the account in their own way, omitting, adapting, and adding, to suit their own religious interests; and one of the tasks of criticism is to determine how far these may preserve some authentic traits, for it is as erroneous to presuppose that all later additions to the Markan outline are unhistorical as to assume that the details of the four canonical stories can be harmonized into a protocol of the actual proceedings.

In compiling the later Acts of the Martyrs, Christians were better off. For one thing, these subsequent trials were usually deliberate; occasionally they were expected for some time, so that the Church was not taken by surprise, and in any case attention was piously paid to the last words and experiences of the saint. By the 4th cent. the apocryphal reports of the trials became also accessible to the martyrologist; he was thereby enabled to write dialogues which had the merit of expressing not only what the accused and the accusers should have said, but sometimes what they did say.* The trial of Jesus found His adherents quite unprovided for any such record of what happened. 'The sudden Roman faces and the noise,' the circumstances of horror and surprise which attended the arrest of their Master, the haste of the proceedings, and the shock of fear which overtook them, were enough to prevent the disciples from realizing what was going on. All was over before they could steady their minds to anything except the general fact of the Master's arrest and execution. Afterwards, they were able to piece together, from their own observation and from the information of counsellors like Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, or of sympathizers in the crowd, or of some of the women, several of the words and experiences of their Lord before the Council and the procurator. The exigencies of controversy with the Jews and the natural desire to remember as vividly and completely as possible the details of the scene, would foster this movement towards a recollection of the trial. The extant records show how was the harvest of memory. But their instinct for embroidering the fancies did not operate to any serious extent within the primitive Christian traditions, while their tone of moderation tells in favour of the essential historicity of the method in which they record actions of the Jews and Romans which must have outraged and shocked the later Christian conscience. There is neither reprobation of the Jewish judges, nor any effusive sympathy shown towards the Roman. The trial is not burn emotional incense before the they tinged with serious and direct censure. Thus St. Luke, e.g., is content to record the painful story without pointing a moral or adorning the tale; he does not stop or step aside to blacken Judas or Herod, as Thucydides has exposed Cleon and Hyperbulos, or as many subsequent writers in Christianity have treated the Jewish and Roman actors in the Passion-story. The latter class, as may stand. In the second chapter of 3 remarks: 'The man who left on the memory of those who witnessed his life and conversation, such an impression of his moral grandeur, that eighteen subsequent centuries have done homage to him in person, was ignominiously put to death.' 'Jaspheuer. Men did not merely mistake their benefactor; they mistook him for the exact contrary. He treated him as that prodigy of impiety, which are now held to be, for their treatment of him.' These men, he proceeds to argue, 'were, to all appearance, not bad men—not worse than men commonly are, but rather the contrary; men who possessed a full, or somewhat more than a full measure, of the moral, and patriotic feelings of their time and people; the very kind of men who, in all times, our own included, have every chance of passing through life blameless and respected. The high priest who pronounced when the words were pronounced which, substituted the blackest guilt, was in all in his horror and indignation as the pious men now are in the religion they profess.' This estimate is, of course, too roseate to stand the scrutiny of historical research. Even a Jewish authority like Jost admits the illegality of the verdict against Jesus. Mill forgets, too, that some of the blackest crimes of history have been committed at, if not started, by men of quite respectable character. Sincerity, however, or innocence, even if it could be shown that the high priest and the other priests were open-minded people who acted in good faith when they misunderstood their prisoner. But the spirit which Mill properly desiderates in an estimate of such men is wonderfully preserved in the Gospels. Their records have no trace of the outraged partisan, any more than of a pious desire to cast some adventitious halo round Jesus; and when one considers how numerous were the temptations to do so, against the Jews out of this Passion-story, or to depict the trial as trivial and extravagant circumstances (as is the case in most of the relevant Apocryphal Gospels), the estimate is not only true and wonderfully

To receive the due religious impression of the Evangelic narratives, it is generally enough to read each by itself. But while devout feeling is seldom perturbed by any discrepancies, such differences do exist both in conception and in detail, and the juxtaposition of the four Gospels in the canon obliges faith to look at the variety of the records and make some attempt at a historical estimate of their relative contents. The main business is to appreciate their religious interests. Yet, whilst these are both obvious and independent of critical research, a comparative inquiry into the different traditions is imperative. 'Investigations of this kind, which attempt to weigh the merits of conflicting or parallel accounts, have always a somewhat cold-blooded and judicial spirit in them, a spirit which cannot but be out of harmony with that in which we can study the Passion of our Lord to our soul's profit. Yet these historical questions must be faced, if our estimate of the gospel is to be lifted out of the region of mere inherited sentiment.*' Fortunately, verbal accuracy is not equivalent to inner veracity. The occasional divergences of the records do not affect seriously either the religious truth or the historical value of the traditions as a whole.

The primary fact which emerges from such a study is that when Jesus was brought before the Jewish authorities,* H thy of death, and thereupon But was He really tried? and if so, before what authorities? and of what specific charge was He found guilty? These questions cannot be answered off-hand. Still less can any one Gospel be assumed to be the standard by which the others are to be measured. An examination of all four is necessary, if the problems are even to be stated, much less solved.

(a) Jesus before the Jewish authorities (Mk 14⁵³⁻⁶⁵ = Mt 26⁵⁷⁻⁶⁸ = Lk 22⁵⁴⁻⁷¹).—The arrest of Jesus, all the Gospels agree, was at once followed by His removal to the palace of the high priest in custody of the guard. What occurred between this and the crucifixion on the following day is usually described as the trial of Jesus, but a glance at the order of affairs will soon show that it is extremely doubtful if Jesus really was ever tried, in the strict sense of the term. Pilate made an attempt to try Him, yet we cannot be sure if it was carried out adequately. He gave his general impressions of the prisoner, asked a few questions of Him and His accusers, and strove to avoid a decision. A rough and honest informality marked the opening stages, at least, of the intercourse between the Roman and the Galilean prisoner. Latterly, to recognize any rights on the part of Jesus. When he gave Him up to be crucified, it was against his better judgment, and in ratification of a previous sentence pronounced by the Jewish Council. Even here, as we shall see, it is questionable if all the legal forms were observed.†

According to one tradition, the Jewish trial took place at once in the house of Caiaphas, where the Sanhedrin had gathered, despite the lateness of the hour. Not a moment was lost. The arrest was followed by the examination. Then, after being found guilty of blasphemy, Jesus was kept waiting till morning, and exposed meanwhile to the coarse mockery and rough play of the company, probably, for the most part, the servants of the high priest and the rest of the underlings). At daybreak an adjourned meeting was held, at which He was formally bound (the sentence perhaps being ratified) and handed over to Pilate's jurisdiction.

The Lukan tradition defers the examination till the morning. After His arrest, Jesus was detained in custody in the house of the high priest, and, in the absence of the judicial authorities, suffered violence at the hands of His captors. Then, at daybreak, the Sanhedrin was hastily convened. An abbreviated account of its proceedings is given, in which all reference to false witnesses and the charge about the Temple is omitted, but the end is the same. Jesus is found guilty, and taken away to Pilate.

The latter tradition is more true to the regular practice of the Sanhedrin, which met, by day; for

* St. Paul sometimes makes the whole nation (1 Th 24.15), sometimes the rulers especially (cf. Ac 13²⁷⁻²⁸), responsible for the crime, and once he ascribes it to demonic impulse (1 Co 28). St. Peter, in Ac 3¹⁸, also blames the Jerusalemites, rather than Pilate, whom from the first the Evangelic tradition rightly regarded as less culpable. But even within the circle of the canonical Gospels it is possible to trace the beginnings of that tendency to compare Pilate favourably with the Jews, which afterwards went to quite extravagant lengths.

† Chwolson, in the appendix to his Das letzte Passamahl Christi, argues that the illegal basis of the proceedings was due to the fact that the Sadducees, who were adherents of the Roman government, were in power at the time. Their antipathy to one whose teaching threatened their class privileges in the Temple and the political status quo of the nation, led them to breaches of the law which would have been less probable in the case of the Pharisees. Derenbourg in his Essai sur l'Histoire et la Géographie de la Palestine (1867), p. 201, had already urged this view. He explained the precipitate conduct of the proceedings as impossible for Pharisees, and due to the well-known severity of the Boethians. Rabbi Ziegler (in Der Kampf zwischen Judentum und Christentum, 1907, p. 34 f.) fixes the blame upon the Herodians.

only then were its decisions valid (cf. SANHEDRIN). But this does not necessarily prove that it is more original, for St. Luke may have been smoothing out what appeared to him an irregularity in the previous tradition. Upon the other hand, the difficulties involved by the Markan view are serious. Once Jesus was in their hands, the authorities had nothing to gain by rushing through the trial before morning. It would be in their own interests to preserve most of the forms of legal process; and it is difficult to think of the Council, or even a quorum of twenty-three members, being already summoned hurriedly to await the nocturnal arrest of Jesus, when nothing decisive could be done for hours.

The probability is, therefore, that while, no doubt, Caiaphas, Annas, and some others were on the spot, the Council was not formally convened until the early morning, about 6 a.m., and that Jesus spent the night in custody. Even the Markan tradition includes a morning examination (Mk 15¹ = Mt 27¹, a full and formal meeting of the court), which, after the nocturnal one, would be no more than a closing deliberation or a hasty ratification of the sentence already passed. The colourless and brief mention of this second examination shows that the Petrine tradition had no exact knowledge of its proceedings. In reality, it had no room for it, and its preservation is due simply to the fact that the morning trial, which St. Luke has described, was too firmly established in the primitive record to be entirely ignored even when it was deprived of its proper point. As to the reasons which led the Markan tradition to dilate on a nocturnal trial, the clue is probably to be found in the fact that there really was such a hasty preliminary cross-questioning of Jesus; only, it was not before Caiaphas, but before Annas (see ANNAS), the influential ex-high priest, who had been at the bottom of the whole movement to arrest Jesus. The prisoner was taken illegally and informally before him, questioned about His disciples and His teaching,* and then removed to the house of Caiaphas, where the proceedings eventually took place which are recorded by Mark and Matthew.

The fact that this preliminary examination or avépoios before Annas is recorded only in the Fourth Gospel (18^{12-14, 19-24}) has caused some scholars to regard it as a later addition, made in for the sake of novelty or variety. These efforts are quite unconvincing. Historical criticism cannot be put off nowadays with the assumption that the Markan tradition is so exhaustive and reliable as to prove a standard for judging the later Gospels. Certain data in the tradition even of the Fourth Gospel (e.g. the date of the Crucifixion, cf. vol. I, p. 131, 882 f.), with Kattenbusch in Die Christliche Welt, 1895, pp. 27 f., 381 f.) are winning more and more evidence from critics of all schools, and the insuperable difficulty about eliminating the Annas trial is the impossibility of detecting any adequate motive for its invention and removal. The tradition of the Annas trial is a growth of the Johannine tradition, and its preservation is of great interest.† It is not shot through, as is the later trial before

* Jesus ignores the query with regard to the disciples (which involved an insinuation of sedition and conspiracy), and asserts that His teaching was open and above-board, no esoteric doctrine. The well-known parallel is the remark of Socrates in the Apologia (xxi): 'If any one says he ever learnt or heard from me in private what any other people did not hear, be sure he is not speaking the truth.' Twice only, here and in Mk 14⁴⁸, does He expostulate with the priestly authorities for their unfair treatment of Him. Evidently He saw that they were determined to have Him crucified, and no further protest fell from His lips (see vol. I, p. 131). The blow of Jn 18²² is illustrated by that of Ac 23². It is arbitrary to take the latter as the prototype of the former.

† The historical basis of the report is recognized not merely by Ewald, Renan, and Hausrath, but by so thoroughgoing a critic as A. Réville (Jésus de Nazareth, ii. 378 f.). The likelihood is that it forms, as Oscar Holtzmann admits of Jn 18²⁸ (Life of Jesus, Eng. tr. p. 480), 'a fragment of the good tradition preserved in the Johannine Gospel.' The idea of Christ's publicity (18²⁰) is, of course, a genuinely Johannine trait (cf. 7¹⁴), but this does not explain why the author should have invented the Annas trial for it.

The Fourth Gospel, it is true, is not more serious than the difficulty upon the Annas trial, for the latter might well appear too insignificant or private to be retained beside the or even to be accurately distinguished from it. The priest had no power to pronounce sentence, the tendency of tradition would naturally be towards the decisive proceedings before Caiaphas.

The traditional order of the text in Jn 18, however, does not original. Some distortion has taken version shows, and efforts have been made to restore the true sequence (see Moffatt, The Historical New Test. pp. 528 f., 693 f.), perhaps the most plausible proposal being that of Professor G. G. Findlay, who would read vv. 19-24 between v. 14 and v. 15. Some such rearrangement is necessary, at any rate, in order to give a coherent sense to the passage, the Synoptic account, at the paper in the Expositor (July 1907, pp. 55-69).

It does not necessarily follow from Lk 32 that St. Luke assumed the high priest of 22:64 was Annas. But if he did, he the Council meet, they act unanimously and simultaneously (22:66); there is no need of any mouthpiece or spokesman.

These efforts of the high priest and the Council to secure evidence against Jesus proved at first a failure. Many witnesses came forward, but nothing tangible or crucial could be made out of their statements.* At last some people appeared with a garbled version of one saying which seemed relevant and final. As given by the three writers who record it, it runs thus:

MARK (14 ⁵⁸).	MATTHEW (26 ⁶¹).	JOHN (21 ⁹).
I will destroy (κατα- λύσω)	I am able to de- stroy	Destroy (ἀποκατε- στήσω)
this temple made with hands,	the temple of God,	this temple, and after three days I will build another not made with hands.	and after three days to build it.	and in three days I will raise it.

The saying bears on its face the stamp of authenticity;† but it is impossible to ascertain its original place or significance. The Synoptic omission of its utterance by Jesus is all the more striking, since it would fit in excellently with the Synoptic account of the cleansing of the Temple, which preceded and determined the arrest of Jesus. The Fourth Evangelist, who misplaces this incident, actually cites it in this very connexion (Jn 2¹⁹), but characteristically he gives it a double meaning. Jesus, he declares, was speaking of His resurrection, the temple being the body of Jesus, to the familiar symbolism of the age. The Jews, however, took Him literally. In all probability the saying was 'one of those mystic pregnant words which imply more than they explicitly state, or than any one thought of when they were first uttered' (cf. Bruce, Kingdom of God, pp. 306-310). The original meaning may have been that Jesus, who claimed to be greater than the Temple (Mt 12⁶), would raise His community, even though the Jewish system of worship was shattered. His cause was not bound up with the Temple. If He came to associate His own death with the ruin of the sanctuary, it was inevitable that the conception of His personal resurrection should further colour the saying. But in any case the later Christian reflexion would read it in the light of the resurrection, whether with or without any historical justification. The Fourth Evangelist, who makes Jesus not only fully conscious of His Messianic dignity and approaching death from the first, but outspoken on the subject, has naturally no difficulty in placing the statement at the threshold of His ministry, and it has been argued that this length of time between the saying and its quotation at the trial is historically necessary in order to explain 'that hesitation and contradiction about the evidence of the "false witnesses," and the extreme difficulty in procuring it, which both St. Matthew's and St. Mark's accounts of the trial of Christ distinctly attest' (R. H. Hutton, Theological Essays, p. 228). The contention is unconvincing. Such a saying, if uttered even a day or two before to an excited crowd, would readily be caught up and twisted according to the sympathies or the antipathies of people. Words such as those of Mk 13² would inevitably colour it, and the passion of these utterances indicates that the mind of Jesus must have been concerned with the Temple and its future in relation to His message more deeply than our extant records happen to disclose. In any case, popular animus needed but a few days to distort an enigmatic saying of this kind. Many versions of it would be afloat on the bubbling tide of gossip in the Jerusalem streets, and some of these were uttered by hostile lips to hostile ears before the Council.

St. Mark bluntly calls this information a piece of false evidence, false because it misrepresented the real meaning of Jesus by attributing to Him a revolutionary design of which He was innocent. It failed, owing to the disagreement of the witnesses. For some reason, which the Evangelist leaves unexplained, their testimonies did not tally; no coherent and decisive proof could be picked out of their conflicting reports. St. Matthew, on the other hand, will not go this length. Not merely is he silent upon the disagreement of the witnesses (contrast Mk 14⁵⁸⁻⁶⁰), but he refuses to call them false witnesses outright. This may be implied in 26⁶⁰⁻⁶¹. To the high priest's witness against Jesus probably the Council witness. He lays stress upon the original desire of the authorities to find false witness, implying that they would stick at nothing to secure the conviction of Jesus, and that they eventually managed to secure evidence which, being in itself blasphemous, and being legally corroborated by two witnesses (26⁶⁰⁻⁶¹), enabled them to proceed with their design. St. Mark, who admits that the authorities were bent on compassing the death of Jesus, does not accuse them of deliberately searching for false witness from the first, though he points out that even the evidence they secured was inadequate from a legal standpoint (cf. vol. i. 575-576).

Both agree, however, that Jesus, on being challenged by the high priest, refused to answer the charge. He kept a dignified silence,* probably for the reason given in the words put by Luke into His mouth (22^{67, 68}). It was idle to argue with those who had already made up their minds to find Him guilty. His stern, calm silence was a judgment of His so-called judges. Their malevolent prejudice deprived them of the right to demand information about His mission. The high priest, who spoke in their name, was eager, not to elicit the truth, but to make the prisoner incriminate Himself as a megith or sacrilegious foe of Judaism, by giving some explanation of the alleged saying. The silence of Jesus baffled and irritated him. It threw him out in his calculations. There were probably some in the Council who were not particularly favourable to the designs of Annas and Caiaphas; the failure to attack Jesus for cleansing the Temple may indicate, perhaps, that several members† rather approved of

* Cf. Bushnell's Nature and the Supernatural (ch. x.).

† They reasoned, or might have reasoned, that the cleansing of the Temple would be a very unlikely act on the part of a reformer who designed its destruction. But in any case, that action was not seriously and instantly challenged by the authorities (Mk 11²⁷), and its sequel proves that no exception was taken to it by the religious people of the city or even by the Romans.

* The term temple (Mk 14⁵⁸, cf. v. 59) refers to harmony of statement. Had the Evangelist meant 'adequate,' 'equal to the occasion,' he would have used isotaxos or some equivalent.

† Compare the discussion of Strauss (Life of Jesus, Eng. tr. by George Eliot, § 114), who upholds its historicity against the suspicions of Bretschneider.

the act; and it was a matter of moment to bring the whole Council into line against Jesus, to rouse every interest, sacerdotal (cf. vol. i, pp. 297-298) and official, in order that a unanimous verdict might be carried to Pilate. Furthermore, there was the people to consider. Jesus had sympathizers whose number was unascertained. If He was to be got rid of, it must be on some broad, serious charge which would command a wave of overwhelming indignation. Sacerdotal authority is generally a past master in the art of dealing upon such prejudices and organizing popular feeling in aid of its own ends, and the next move of the high priest showed no inconsiderable skill. He chose his new ground admirably. But it is not clear why he shifted his position so suddenly. Was he aware of the Messianic claims of Jesus and astute enough to use them, as a last resource, for the purpose of forcing some answer? Or was the ground really so obvious that it be inferred from the primitive Evangelic tradition, as reproduced by Mk. and Mt. alike, that the saying about the Temple (Mk 14⁵⁸ = Mt 26⁶¹) was held to imply a sort of Messianic claim* upon the part of Jesus? In that event, the high priest's next question would be simply a further move on the line already taken. The former is, upon the whole, the more likely of the two. But in any case the point is plain. Foiled by the silence of Jesus in his attempt to make capital out of the witnesses' report, Caiaphas proceeds to put the straight and final question, 'Art thou the Christ?' (Mk 14⁶¹ = Mt 26⁶³, cf. Lk 22⁶⁶; Mk's addition, 'the Son of the Blessed,' is probably more original than Mt.'s generalized 'the Son of God').† It was a categorical and crucial query. Matters were now brought to an issue which Jesus could not and would not evade.

His answer is variously reported: 'I am (ἐγώ εἰμι): and you will see the Son of Man seated on the right hand of the Power, and coming with the clouds of heaven' (Mk 14⁶²); 'It is as thou sayest (ὡς εἶπας). Yet I tell you, in future you will see the Son of Man seated on the right hand of the Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven' (Mt 26⁶⁴); 'You will not believe if I tell you, nor will you answer if I question you. But from henceforth the Son of Man shall be seated on the right hand of the Power of God' (Lk 22⁶⁷⁻⁶⁹). Primarily, the saying is a remembrance of the Messianic passage in Ps 110 in His mind—a psalm which in those days was more than once upon His lips (cf. Mk 12³⁶). So much is clear. But the details of the answer are not always quite intelligible. Thus St. Luke‡ divides the question into two, and, in reply to the query, 'Art thou the Son of God?' makes Jesus reply: ὑμεῖς λέγετε, ἐγὼ εἰμι (22⁷⁰). On the other hand, the Markan answer is perfectly explicit (cf. Menzies, The Earliest Gospel, p. 267). Jesus replies, 'I am.' St. Matthew, again, gives an evasive or ambiguous turn to the words by the phrase ὡς εἶπας, which here, as in 26²⁵, is commonly understood to mean a qualified affirmative. The person addressed replies in the sense of the questioner. 'You say so. I will not contradict you.' 'I answer you out of your own lips.' Recently, however, Chwolson, followed by Merx, N. Schmidt (The Prophet of Nazareth, p. 287), and others, has challenged the interpretation of the phrase as a Rabbinic form of affirmation; instead of being equivalent to the Latin dixisti, it is held to be really a denial. This is most unlikely, to judge from the context; and even linguistically, as Dalman has shown (Words of Jesus, p. 309 f.), it is unnecessary.*

But, minor discrepancies apart, the answer reveals three cardinal traits of Jesus: His courage in confessing the Messianic vocation, when death was the inevitable consequence; His serene confidence in the success of His cause upon earth; and His admission that only the future could unfold the real meaning of His Person.† The last point is to be noted specially. The high priest's question was so contrived as to make any answer fatal, whether negative or affirmative. In the one case, Jesus would lose all His influence and authority; in the other, He would be liable to judgment as a pretender. But Jesus realized that even a bare affirmative would be misleading, since His Messianic vocation was widely different from what the ordinary expectation imagined. Hence the fuller statement, wrung from the tension and passionate faith of His soul. The words seized on by the Council were those referring to His claim to sit at the right hand of the Power, but it must not be inferred‡ from this that the charge of constructive blasphemy for which Jesus was condemned was dissociated from His Messianic claims. The contention that such claims were not blasphemous in themselves all depends on the character of the person who made them. The Council considered themselves, rightly or wrongly, absolved from entering into any minute examination of the conduct and aims of Jesus.§ On that their minds were already made up, as His arrest shows. The attitude of Jesus to the Law and the Temple and the cherished religious traditions of Judaism left no doubt in their minds that He was a dangerous person, in whom it would be superfluous to look for any Messianic criteria. His pre-emption in claiming Messianic honour was in itself blasphemy of a capital order, as it involved a supersession of the Mosaic Law, and His words now corroborated the impression already made by His actions that He was a discredited pretender to Divine rank, and a false and disloyal prophet. In short, the verdict of the historian, as Holtzmann puts it, must be: 'Jesus confessed Himself to be Messiah, was condemned as a false Messiah, and executed as a pretender.'||

Caiaphas had now gained his point. He had induced Jesus to convict Himself out of His own mouth, and with a pious gesture of horror (cf. 2 K 22¹¹, 1 Mac 11⁷¹, Is 37¹ etc.) he professes himself at once shocked by the blasphemy of the Galilean, and satisfied with the result of his interrogation. He appeals theatrically to the Council if this is not enough evidence, and they all agree.

The condensed and unimpeachable report makes it impossible for us to be sure whether this verdict was as premature and illegal as it appears to be, and whether the irregularities were held to

* Cf. H. Holtzmann, Das messianische Bewusstsein Jesu (1907), pp. 29-31, as against Wrede's idea (Das Messiasgeheimnis, 74 f.) that the phrase 'Son of God' must be taken in a metaphorical, not in a theocratic sense.

† Bengel, on Mt 26⁶⁴, has one of his fine comments: 'In adversissimis quibusque rebus summos fines exitusque intueri, et in illis deum agnoscere.'
‡ Wrede, who omits Mk 14^{61, 62} in order to support this reading of the trial scene. But 24⁶³ does not follow the silence of Jesus very aptly; the blasphemy is more naturally connected with the straightforward utterance of Jesus than with the divergent reports of the witnesses, and Lk.'s ὡς εἶπας ἀποκρίσας is probably a correct gloss.

* The reconstruction of the Temple in the new age was one work of the Messiah, according to some circles of pre-Christian Judaism (cf. Enoch 91:2 etc.; Bousset, Religion des Judentums, 226 f.).

† The avoidance of God's name, in accordance with Jewish usage, is, as O. Holtzmann points out (Life of Jesus, pp. 164, 475), a strong point in favour of the soundness of our tradition.

‡ 'The Power' of Mk. and Mt. is more original than Lk.'s explanatory phrase.

be justified by the emergency which had transpired. The Evangelic tradition was naturally more concerned with the result than with the precise processes of the trial. In any case, however, it is unmistakable that the priests had now got what they wanted. They had secured from Jesus a confession which was nominally equivalent to a blasphemous claim (on this see vol. i. pp. 209-210), derogatory to the Divine Being. But we are in the dark as to how far the ordinary forms of jurisprudence were observed, whether the witnesses were cautioned before giving evidence, whether the case for the defence was first of all opened, and so forth. The chief point is that Jesus was condemned on the charge of blasphemy. To convict Him of claiming to be Messiah, and with that, would not have appealed to the Jews. More was needed, and this was supplied by the fact of Jesus, a Galilean peasant, with revolutionary views upon the cultus, daring to claim for Himself Messianic honours, and thus threatening to supersede the sacrosanct legal system of Judaism.

(b) Jesus before Pilate (Mk 15¹⁻²⁰ = Mt 27¹⁻³¹ = Lk 23¹⁻²⁵ = Jn 18^{28-19¹⁶}).—If the proceedings before the Jewish Council strained even the letter of justice, those before the Roman authorities show little or no attempt whatsoever to try the prisoner judicially. Jesus does not appear to have been legally tried before Pilate. The Roman governor, after the first turn in the case, seems to have been principally anxious to discover the most politic course of action, as well as to thwart the authorities. His sense of justice was overborne by considerations of personal advantage and civil prudence. But he was not driven to this end without reluctance, and the record of the proceedings, which took place in the open-air in front of his palace or tribunal, is of considerable psychological interest.

The first phase of the trial before Pilate is the procurator's dismissal of the charges brought against Jesus by the Jewish authorities, which are fixed upon the political rather than the religious side of the Messianic claim as the more likely to carry weight with the governor.

According to one tradition,† Pilate takes the initiative by asking Jesus if He is really the king of the Jews. The question breathes pity and contempt and wonder. This forlorn Galilean peasant (σὺ emphatic) a claimant of royalty! The quiet reply is, σὺ λέγεις (cf. vol. i. 931^b). To the subsequent outburst of accusation from the Jewish leaders, Jesus vouchsafes no reply; nor will He even deign to interpret His silence to the astonished procurator. Plainly, this is a very abridged version of the actual facts, and we turn for fuller details to Luke. According to his account, the Jewish authorities push forward with their accusation before Pilate has time to speak, and the charge is threefold: He is accused of being a seditious agitator, of forbidding the payment of tribute to the Roman emperor, and of claiming to be 'Christ, a king.' A political charge is thus cleverly foisted into the religious complaint, and the procurator, who would have nothing to do with a vague accusation, naturally fixes on the third point, asking Jesus (as in the other tradition) if He is really the king of the Jews. Luke's account certainly gives a better sense here than the other, for it explains how Pilate came to put his question; whereas, in the evidence of Mk 15² = Mt 27¹¹, there is nothing to account for Pilate's seizing this point at all. That the charge was astute but unjust needs no proof (cf. vol. i. p. 246^a). The Gospels show how scrupulously Jesus kept clear of abetting the fanatical hatred of Rome felt by many of His fellow-countrymen, and probably it was this refusal to side with them which secretly incited their plan of attack. At any rate, as Renan observes, 'Conservative religious bodies do not generally shrink from calumny.' To refute the charge was superfluous in the eyes of Jesus. His silence did all that was necessary; it repudiated the accusation.

The silence of Jesus before Pilate was due to moral reasons. Dr. Salmon, in his posthumous work, The Human Element in the Gospels (p. 512), prefers, indeed, to attribute it to the weakness of Jesus. But on the day of the trial, of the slanders and torments, His physical frame was incapable of conducting a discussion. And we could sufficiently account for Pilate's unwillingness to condemn, if he perceived in whom so much accusation was brought was a word in His own defence. In this choice between Jesus and Barabbas, might he not feel that the more dangerous enemy to Cesar was the man in vigorous health who had already taken which many lives had been lost, and who seemed unable to speak, much less to act. And if he had no trust in the loyalty of the Jewish advisers, might he not have even suspected that they were willing to sacrifice one whom they considered a order to save the life of one who would have been a What- ever may be thought of the psychology in the latter part of this paragraph, the opening sentence does not seem adequate to the facts. Even when wearied (46^c), Jesus would not allow fatigue to prevent Him from speaking, if utterance were necessary. If He was silent, it was because He was unwilling, not because He felt unable. Besides, the impression left by the record of the last two days of the life of Jesus is so strong that it has been considerable. Upon the whole, then, it is needless to attribute His silence before Pilate to any other reason than a belief that the charges of innocence were useless, coupled, as that belief was, with a consciousness of truth which left no room for even a vestige of anxiety about the ultimate success of His cause.

The impression made by Jesus upon Pilate started a series of attempts upon the part of the procurator to extricate himself and his prisoner from the situation created by the rancour of the Jewish authorities. Three separate movements were made by him in this direction. The first was to change the venue of the trial; for Herod as a Galilean might be expected to judge this Galilean peasant more fairly than the Jerusalem authorities. After this device had failed, Pilate tried to get behind the priests, and appeal to the better feelings of the people when undisturbed by sacerdotal and ecclesiastical intrigues; surely a Messiah would be popular, he argued, recollecting the hot patriotism of the nation. But, to his disgust and dismay, Barabbas was preferred to Jesus. Finally, as a last resource, he tried to work on their pity, now that their prisoner was out of the question; he presented Barabbas, with the bloody marks of scourging upon Him, as an object to excite compassion (Jn 19⁴). This again proved of no avail, and with its collapse Pilate saw the disappearance of the last chance of rescuing the prisoner. Such is, in rough outline, the scheme of events which we can recover from a careful scrutiny of the extant records.

St. Luke, indeed, makes Pilate at once pronounce Jesus innocent (23⁴). But this is far too abrupt. The probability is that (Mk 15⁸⁻⁹ = Mt 27¹²⁻¹⁴) the priests and elders continued to heap fresh accusations upon Him, and that His silence under the strain of calumny roused Pilate's astonishment. The procurator was evidently puzzled to know what to do with this prisoner. For though silence may have been equivalent, in Roman law, to a confession of guilt, he was unwilling to pronounce sentence in this case without some further evidence, and the invectives of the Jewish authorities did not point to any conclusive or reliable ground for arriving at a judgment. The very silence of Jesus, as Keim properly observes, impressed the Jews more than the eager, noisy vehemence of Herod. 'He did not infer guilt or innocence from silence, as the official and imperious consciousness even of a mild Pliny the Younger was apt so quickly to do: an evidence this of Pilate's intelligence, and still more of the impression produced by the Lord even when He uttered no word. In the midst of this perplexity the word 'Galilee,' flung up on the torrent of invective, reached his ear. He seemed to see a chance of saving himself, and perhaps of helping Jesus. It had been guilty of crime within the borders of Galilee, plainly Herod Antipas was the man to deal with Him; he might be more impartial, too, than the local priests and scribes. Besides, it was a politic attention to Antipas. So the procurator gladly dismissed his prisoner to the Galilaean tetrarch, only too relieved to be quit, as he hoped, of this inconvenient responsibility. But this change of venue was futile. It was not exactly illegal, for, as has been observed, the words of Lk 23⁴ are probably introduced too early; the other Gospels know nothing of such an acquittal at this point. But it did not help Pilate. The crafty Herod was shy of touching any charge of majestas. As Mr. Taylor Innes puts it, 'the Idumean fox dreaded the lion's paw, while very willing to exchange courtesies with the lion's deputy.'

* Their refusal to enter the Prætorium is noted by the Fourth Evangelist (18²⁸) with deliberate meaning. In the light of the Christian interpretation, it acquired a sinister significance. 'Polluting their souls with blood, they dare not pollute their bodies by breach of outer etiquette. . . . Men must have some scrap of conscience left to hide them from themselves. Inward defilement, unprincipled action, are atoned for by outer decorum' (Reith, Gospel of John, ii. 135).

† The Fourth Evangelist (18²⁸), like St. Matthew (27¹¹), here follows the condensed Markan tradition (15²), leaving it unexplained how Pilate had come to hear of the accusation of royalty, but implying that Jesus had not heard the priests laying this information before the governor.

The transference of Jesus to Herod (cf. vol. i. 722) is one of St. Luke's special contributions to the story of the Passion (23⁶⁻¹⁶, cf. Ac 4²⁷). Whether taken from oral tradition (cf. Justin Martyr, Dial. 103) or from the Jewish Christian source (note the technical Jewish phraseology: ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἔχοντες τὸν Χριστὸν, 23²) which some critics trace below his narrative, it goes back to the memories of the Christians who belonged to the Herodian entourage (cf. 83⁹⁴), and ought never to have been suspected by a sane criticism. No satisfactory motive for its invention can be adduced.* St. Luke (13¹) was perfectly aware that, when it suited his purpose, the author of the Gospels

The presence (v. 10) is, at first sight, certainly a difficulty; it might suggest that here, as perhaps at 22⁵² (cf. 22⁶⁶), the historian has gone too far in emphasizing the activity of the Jewish authorities. But it is just possible that they feared to let the prisoner out of their sight. Herod was not to be relied on. He might take it into his head to release Jesus out of spite or caprice, as Pilate had threatened to do, and with relentless vigour some of the authorities may have kept on the track of their victim. The omission of 23¹⁰⁻¹² in the Sina¹ is due to harmonizing tendencies. The ground for excluding it (so Wellhausen†) as a later gloss, for even if the inferior reading, 'I sent him (Jesus) to him (Herod),' be adopted, it does not necessarily imply that the authorities were not present at Herod's examination. Pilate is not giving them fresh information. He is simply rehearsing the facts of the case in a semi-formal fashion.

St. Luke does not exaggerate the share of Herod in Christ's death, as does the later Gospel of Peter, which makes Antipas sentence the prisoner formally. The historian simply brings out the idle curiosity of the tetrarch.‡ The mockery of Jesus, in which he is said even to have participated himself, was probably due to irritation at his failure to elicit any answer from the prisoner. Herod's wounded dignity and baffled curiosity were up in arms to take a petty vengeance (cf. vol. i. 454⁴), and both he and Pilate were consoled for their trouble and annoyance by getting their feud

* The ordinary theory that Herod is made the representative of Judaism, to exculpate Pilate, contradicts 23¹⁵.

† There is a dramatic contrast between the two uses of this Lukan term ἀνθύπατος here and in Ac 18²⁴.

‡ He desert here his favourite D (ἀπέστειλεν τὸν Χριστὸν πρὸς αὐτόν). Compare, against him, Blass in The Philology of the Gospels, pp. 183-184.

§ Bengel's caustic comment on v. 8 is: 'Potentes minus obivum habuere Jesum: et illi solent esse ultimi in cognoscendis rebus regni dei.' patched up and their mutual jurisdiction recognized. Their treatment of Jesus gave each the opportunity of a politic and inexpensive generosity.

Pilate then, according to Luke, proposes a weak compromise (23¹²⁻¹⁶). To appease the Jews he will scourge this harmless fanatic, Jesus, before releasing Him; for release Him he must, as His guilt has not been proven. The innocence of Jesus seems to be formally pronounced. Herod's refusal to convict Him gives Pilate the tardy courage to acquit the prisoner before His accusers, but it does not lend him courage to carry out the strict legal consequences of the decision. Utilitarian motives come into play.* The Jews realize that he must try to conciliate them. Since his offer to scourge Jesus is ignominiously rejected, some other compromise must be devised.

Here all the Gospels come into line, with an account of Pilate's next attempt to save Jesus, this time at the expense of Barabbas (see BARABBAS and INSURRECTION), though St. Luke less happily omits all reference to the custom of releasing a prisoner, and makes the idea of releasing him with the Jews (23¹⁸), not with Matthew inserts a piece of very secondary tradition about Pilate's wife (27¹⁹, cf. vol. i. p. 495) in order to explain the governor's hesitation, as well as to throw the malice of the Jews into relief. A further addition† of St. Matthew is the dramatic incident of Pilate washing his hands before the people, and proclaiming his innocence of the judicial crime which they were bent on perpetrating (27²⁴⁻²⁵).‡ The incident may be St. Matthew's anecdotal way of depicting the idea of the Jews' real responsibility for the death of Jesus. In any case, once the people deliberately prefer Barabbas, Pilate plainly throws off all responsibility for all that follows. Probably the revelation of Christ's unpopularity removed the last scruple of conscience which he felt. Why should he endanger his position and risk a tumult among the people for the sake of a Galilaean dreamer who had not a single adherent to stand by Him? Pilate could afford to thwart the priests, perhaps, but it was another matter when the people asserted their wishes.

In response to his half-perplexed, half-ironical inquiry as to what, then, is to be done with Jesus the so-called Christ, the reply (unanimous, according to Mt 27²²) is, 'Crucify him.' Carlyle, in the sixth of his Pamphlets, takes this to be an instance of the absurdity of universal suffrage. 'Can it be proved that since the beginning of the world there was ever given a universal vote in favour of the worthiest man or thing? I have always understood that true worth in any department was difficult to recognize; that the worthiest, if he appealed to universal suffrage, would have but a poor chance. . . . Alas, Jesus Christ asking the Jews what He deserved, was not the answer, Death on the gallows!' But the point of the incident is not quite this. The Markan tradition, followed by Matthew (27²⁰= Mk 15¹¹), indicates the responsibility of the priests rather than of the people. The latter were in-

* Compare the defence of the governor's action in Sir James Stephen's Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, p. 381. It is not a bench on which historical criticism will be content to rest for long. See Zimmermann's Histor. Wert der ältesten Ueberl. (1905) p. 184 f.

† Besides the account of Judas (27³⁸; cf. vol. i. 911); on these fragments of Palestinian Jewish tradition see W. O. Allen's 'St. Matthew' (ICC), p. 315. 'When truth is in danger,' said Dr. John Ker, 'the conduct of many is to wash their hands in Pilate's basin of weak neutrality; but they only soil the water, and do not cleanse their hands.'

‡ Note the intentional repetition of ἐξέκαθάρτην from 27⁴.

§ The opposition of the people to Pilate's suggestion may have been due in part to his own unpopularity. The Jews would readily take any opportunity of thwarting a proposal from one who had so repeatedly defied their prejudices and religious tastes.

stigated by the sacerdotal authorities, who were afraid of Pilate's appeal, and jealous* of the possible popularity which Jesus might win among the crowd. As a result, they worked—how, we are not told—upon the passions of the mob, religious and political. The result was a wild outcry for the release of Barabbas, which at once showed Pilate that Jesus was not a favourite of the people, but merely a discredited provincial.

The general outline of the closing scene, despite variations in detail, is fairly distinct. Pilate allows himself to be overborne by the popular clamour. Finding that his attempts to expostulate with the mob are fruitless, he at last lets them have their own way, and utters the fatal words ἐξέλευσθ' εἰς σταυρὸν (ib. 23:33).

Before ordering the prisoner off to the death which, in Roman law, must immediately follow the capital sentence, he bids the lictor, I, lictor, conliga manus, flagellis verberetur; Jesus is then subjected to the scourging which preceded, in Roman usage,† the last act of the death punishment. Such at least, according to one tradition (Mk 15:15 = Mt 27:26), was the significance of the scourging; it was a mere accessory to the crucifixion. In Luke, it occupies an earlier and a different position, as we have seen, whilst‡ in the Fourth Gospel (19:1f.) it forms part of the mockery, and issues in Pilate's presentation of Jesus to the people in order to excite a pity or a contempt which might allay their malice. This is probably correct. In closely associating the scourging with the mockery, though not in placing them prior to the formal condemnation, the Fourth Evangelist is following the Markan tradition. He rightly brings out the third and last appeal of Pilate, before the final sentence is pronounced. But for the details of this bloody punishment we must look outside the Gospels. All four eschew any harrowing pictures of the scene. The simple and sober mention of the fact is all that the tradition has preserved.

(c) The Mocking of Jesus (see CROWN OF THORNS, MOCKERY, REED, THORNS).—That Jesus was insulted and ill-treated during the course of His trial is a fixed part of the Evangelic tradition,§ but it is uncertain when and where the cruel sport took place. According to one tradition (Mk 14:65 = Mt 26:67, 68) it followed the condemnation by the Sanhedrin; either the bystanders|| or the servants

* This ill-will (Mk 15:10 = Mt 27:18) towards one who had challenged their vested interests and ecclesiastical authority was patent to Pilate (cf. vol. i. 521 f., and Lidgett's Spiritual Principle of the Atonement, p. 11 f.). As we know from the record of his previous conflict with the Jews, he took an insolent delight in humiliating them, which had thrice led to an even more humiliating surrender upon his own part. The trial of Jesus gave him another chance of thwarting the authorities. But he had learned prudence by this time. He would use Jesus as far as possible to exasperate the Jews, but he would have the satisfaction in sacrificing his prisoner to safeguard his own credit and popularity, particularly when he found that the Galilean was unpopular himself.

† Thus the Jews caught outside Jerusalem during the siege by Titus 'were first scourged, then tormented with all kinds of torture before they died, and were crucified opposite the walls of the city' (Jos. BJ v. xi. 1).

‡ Perhaps founding on the hint of Lk 23:22, where it is part of Pilate's suggested compromise. The position of the scourging, with the subsequent Ecco Homo incident (Jn 19:3-4), is rightly assigned by the Fourth Evangelist.

§ How far the tradition has been affected by the natural desire (cf. Ac 13:7-12) to conform the sufferings of Jesus to such OT prophecies as Is 50:6 (cf. Mic 51), it is impossible to determine. Even Matthew, with his predilection for discovering fulfilment of prophecy, does not refer to such passages. The likelihood is, as Strauss admits (§ 128), that while Jesus was actually maltreated as the Evangelists record, their descriptions are modelled on the prophecies which, when once Jesus appeared as a sufferer and in 'travail of spirit', were applied to Him.

|| Apparently including even some of the councillors themselves—a trait of Oriental passion which, in view of Jos. BJ vi. 3, is not to be taken as a touch of the Evangelic tradition inconsistent with the dignity of the authorities. Wellhausen thinks Mt.'s version (= high priests) is original.

of the high priest or the councillors (Mt.) blindfolded Him, spat in His face, and rained blows upon Him,* asking Him with jeers to prophesy who struck Him. St. Luke (22:63-65) more accurately places this horseplay during the nocturnal interval between His arrest and the assembling of the Council in the morning, when no responsible parties were present to prevent vulgar indignities being heaped on the defenceless prisoner. St. Luke also narrates (23:11) that Herod and his troops treated their prisoner with similar ridicule as a soi-disant king; and, when interviewed by the Herod interview is accepted as historical, there is no reason to doubt that such violence may have been inflicted, unless Luke is held to have transferred to Herod the mockery which the earlier tradition (Mk 15:16-20, Mt 27:27-31) ascribes to Pilate.

This second mockery consisted in the troops arraying Jesus in a scarlet military mantle, spitting on Him (in caricature of the kiss of homage), crowning Him with thorns, putting a reed in His hand, and paying mock deference to Him.† Then, beating Him unmercifully, they stripped Him of this finery, and reclothed Him in His own garments. 'In our time, when a man has been sentenced to death, we do not think it right to add to his sufferings by preliminary torture; but it was not so in former days; if bystanders, in their indignation, added to what had been sentenced by the judge, all this was looked upon as no more than giving the criminal his deserts; and this volunteered addition to the judge's sentence was no doubt the severest part of the penalty.‡ The rough treatment of Jesus, however, by the soldiers of Pilate took place within the barracks. As it was aimed at the nation through the person of Jesus, it was not politic to conduct it in the open air.

The mockery of Jesus was thus twofold. That inflicted by the Jews was meant for Jesus the prophet; that of the Roman soldiers, as of Herod's Syrian troops, was occasioned by His pretensions to be a king. He was ill-treated, as He was condemned and crucified, for being a royal pretender. There is no reason to suppose that the second mockery is an unhistorical echo of the former, or that even the former is (Brandt, Evangel. gesch. p. 69 f.) constructed elaborately out of Old Testament suggestions. But a more real problem has been raised, in recent years, with regard to the meaning of the mockery. Several scholars§ have attempted to find, in the details of this incident, allusions to the mock coronation which preceded the grotesque Saturnalia of the Sæcan festival in ancient Babylonia,—celebrated throughout Asia

* Professor Burkitt (The Gospel of St. Luke, pp. 51-53) holds that this is an unhistorical addition of the Evangelist, and that the real meaning of Mk 14:65 is that the face of Jesus was covered because He was formally condemned (Ex 23). But in this case, the blindfolding would immediately follow the condemnation, whereas the spitting intervenes, showing that horseplay had begun. Besides, Luke's version corroborates the Markan view as reproduced in Matthew, and the latter's account of his harmonizing touches, which smooth the roughness of the Fourth Gospel and Matthew into a graphic and intelligible picture, would be lost if he omitted the blindfolding in Mk 14:65 (with D). In his view of the context (see above), the incident of the spitting of Jesus was to be about the destruction of the Temple.

† A similar grim jest was practised by the Mediterranean pirates upon any Roman citizen whom they captured. Plutarch (Life of Pompey, xxiv.) describes how they affected to be struck with terror, dropped on their knees before him, threw a toga round him, and finally made away with him.

‡ Salmon, The Human Element in the Gospels (p. 506). The soldiers were probably seizing the opportunity to vent their contempt for the Jews, quite as much as to express personal animosity towards Jesus.

§ J. G. Frazer, Golden Bough, ii. 24 f., 253 f., iii. 150 f. Wendland, in his paper on Jesus as a Saturnalian king (Neoscholastik, 1898, pp. 175-179), thinks that the Roman troops ridiculed Him in the farcical garb of Saturn; but the late Life of Jesus of Dasius the martyr are too unreliable to serve as evidence for this period, even had the Romans been tolerant of human sacrifices.

Minor in connexion with the worship of the Persian goddess Anaitis,—where, in the course of other orgies, 'a condemned prisoner was arrayed in royal attire, only in the end to be stript of his borrowed finery, scourged, and hanged or crucified.' Another theory (advocated by Reich in his essay on Der König mit der Dornenkrone, 1905) casts back to the popular buffoonery which accompanied the mimes, e.g. at Alexandria (cf. Philo, in Flacc. 5-6, quoted by Grotius in this connexion), while Mr. W. R. Paton (in ZNTW, 1901, 339-341) further points out that the trait of a triple crucifixion reflects the Persian custom of crucifying a pretender or usurper upon three crosses. It is, of course, quite possible that two robbers were crucified with Jesus simply because no more happened to be in prison at the moment; but, in view of this custom, it seems not unlikely that the number of victims, like the mock homage paid previously to one of them, may have been determined by some hazy notion of imitating a pagan bit of ritual. The un-Jewish character of these accounts, however, of the crucifixion would certainly not lead them to relish to the soldiers' contemptuous pleasure in crucifying a caricature of a Jewish monarch.* But, while the possibility of this may be granted, it is impossible to regard the Gospel accounts as secondary products of any such pagan custom. In one thing, Jesus was not crucified on three crosses, nor was His death taken as an offering. Again, Dr. Frazer's identification of Purim with Saccæa is too precarious† to support firmly the inference that Jesus perished as a Haman at this Jewish festival; nor did it require any coarse pagan rite to stimulate military horseplay among soldiers, even although they may have been, like Herod's Syrian troops, familiar with such customs, or had been, like Pilate's Roman legions, stationed at one time on the Euphrates where the rites in question may have survived. It is extremely unlikely that such a confusion of Saccæa with the Jewish festivals should have arisen, or that any reminiscence of the Alexandrian outburst should have prompted the records of the horseplay at Jerusalem.‡ See, further, art. MOCKERY.

πάστις (Mk 14⁶⁵, Jn 18²²) is a blow inflicted with the open hand (cf. Field's Notes on the Transl. of the NT, p. 105). This is the most probable rendering of the word in the context of the reading in the Textus Receptus (cf. Textus Receptus or Textus Receptus) introduced into the Textus Receptus by the Textus Receptus.

4. Special points in the NT narratives.—Most of the characteristic features in the various reports of the trial have already been noted, but it remains for us to glance briefly at the Evangelic records one by one. The Petrine tradition in Mk. (cf. Bennett in Expositor, Dec. 1906, p. 545 f.) is substantially reproduced in Mt., most of whose additions are of secondary historical importance. St. Luke, again, appears to have access to a special source for this part of his narrative, while the Fourth Gospel presents a problem of peculiar intricacy, since its record of the Passion contains not merely elements which in form and content are plainly due to the writer's underlying religious aims, but also one or two passages which are either modelled upon the Lukan tradition or due to a good source which may have been known, at an earlier period, independently to St. Luke himself.

St. Mt.'s omission of the blindfolding of Jesus (26⁶⁸, 67) is certainly remarkable, but it merely gives another view of the scene. We see Jesus pulled hither and thither by a crowd of exasperated fanatics, twisted from side to side, knocked about, struck behind His back, and jeeringly invited to guess who struck Him. The blindfolding makes the picture more dramatic, but not more intelligible. On the other hand, the introduction of οἱ πρεσβύτεροι in 27¹², 20 (cf. 27⁴¹), and of τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστὸν (27²²), is probably due to the author's characteristic desire to accentuate the Jewish details, while changes such as the omission of Mark's favourite ἤρξαντο (26⁶⁷, 71, 27²⁰), or the substitution of aorists for imperfects (26⁶⁰, 67, 72, 75, 27¹⁸, 34), are simply literary and stylistic, adding nothing to the real sense of the narrative. Evidently the author or editor of Matthew had not access to any wider channel of authentic information than he found in the Markan tradition. At one point it is possible that the canonical text of Mark has even been enriched from Matthew, for the words ὁ ἐστὶν πατρίδον (Mk 15¹⁶), as Prof. Menzies (The Earliest Gospel, p. 276) after Brandt observes, do nothing 'to make Mark's narrative clearer, but rather the opposite, and may have crept in first as a gloss on the margin from Matthew, where the statement appears to be that the soldiers took Jesus off to another building, viz. to the praetorium, and collected there the whole cohort.' See Blass in ExpT x. [1899] 185 f.

A much more significant and complex character belongs to the Lukan narrative. Thus the freedom with which the historian has treated the Markan narrative* may be gathered from the fact that his order, in the opening scenes of the trial (denials of Peter, mockery of Jesus, examination of Jesus), exactly reverses that of the earlier Gospels. He also forgets to mention that any evidence† was laid against Jesus (cf. 22⁶⁶), or that Jesus was ever bound—a point on which the Fourth Evangelist is more correct (Jn 18¹²). Furthermore, he omits all reference to the saying about the destruction of the Temple, though it was plainly known to him (cf. Ac 6¹⁴). Possibly an 'apologetic' motive underlay this alteration. If Luke, writing after the destruction of the Temple, viewed it as a Divine judgment upon Israel, 'which might be regarded as inflicted by Jesus Himself, he might wish to avoid saying that the testimony' of the witnesses 'was false,' and so left out the entire inquiry before the Council (EBi 1772). The attempt to trace an 'apologetic' element in 23¹², as though this meant the pact of Judaism and paganism against Christianity (cf. Ac 4²⁷), is rather beside the mark, however. Herod considered Jesus quite beneath his notice, no danger was to be apprehended from Him; He was beneath hatred, though not below contempt. Nor did Pilate regard the prisoner with enmity. It is indubitable, on the other hand, that St. Luke views the conduct of the people at this point in a more severe light than the other Gospels. He omits the sacerdotal device (cf. 23¹⁸ with Mk 15¹¹ and Mt 27²⁰), writing as though the people of their own accord demanded Barabbas (cf. also 22⁶⁶, 23¹², 13), at one in this with the high priests and the rulers, though possibly, in view of passages like 18⁴⁸, 19⁴⁸, 21³⁸, we are to take the people here as supporters of the priests.‡ The Fourth Gospel, again, takes a slightly milder view of the conduct of the people (cf. the omission in 19⁹), and this leads us to the idiosyncrasies of the trial-story in that Gospel.

Here Peter (cf. vol. i. 444-445) is not the only

† The condensed nature of his account here lends too precipitate a character to the proceedings. Possibly the search for witnesses was loosely begun during the night; but even so Luke's narrative is defective on this point. That he knew the Markan tradition of the false evidence is plain from the retention of ἦν in 22⁷¹. On his own scheme the word is superfluous, since no word of any previous witnesses occurs in the narrative.

TRIBE (φύλη) is used mostly in the special OT sense of an Israelitish tribe, composed of the descendants of one of the sons of Jacob. The prophetess Anna belonged to the tribe of Asher (Lk 2³⁸). The Messianic claims of Jesus were strengthened by the fact that He sprang from the tribe of Judah (He 7¹⁴). Galilee ... territories allotted in OT times to the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali (Mt 4^{13, 15}). The promise to the Twelve Apostles that they should judge the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19²⁸ || Lk 22³⁰) may be regarded as an instance of the way in which Jesus sometimes expressed His teaching in the language of popular apocalyptic conception of the Kingdom of God (cf. Rev 7^{1, 2}). Less probable is the explanation of Weiss, that 'their judging the twelve tribes is only the reverse side of their being sent to the twelve tribes, which are exposed to judgment just because the offer of salvation was made to them through the Apostles' (NT Theol., Eng. tr. i. 154). In Mt 24⁵⁰ (quoted from Zec 12¹²) 'tribe' has the wider sense of a branch of the human race.

JAMES PATRICK.

TRIBULATION.—The Gr. word thlipsis (which means literally ‘a pressing,’ ‘a pressing together,’ ‘pressure’) is translated in the AV by the words ‘tribulation,’ ‘affliction,’ and ‘anguish.’ In every instance of its occurrence save one, viz. Jn 16²¹, where the AV tr. ‘anguish’ is retained, the RV uniformly employs the term ‘tribulation.’ The verb thlipsis occurs twice in the Gospels: in Mk 3⁹, where it describes the action of the crowd in ‘thronging’ Jesus; and Mt 7¹⁴, where it represents ‘the way that leadeth unto life,’ as being ‘straitened’ (στενυμένη). In his Study of Words, Trench gives a very interesting account of the history of the Eng. word ‘tribulation.’ Derived from Lat. tribulum, the threshing instrument or harrow by means of which the corn was separated from the husks, tribulatio, the term applied to the process of separation, came to be used for the disciplinary ordeal of distress and adversity. The following grouping of passages indicates the various usages of the word in the Gospels:

tribulation is emphasized (Mt 24⁶, Mk 13⁷, Lk 21⁹), and the circumstances attending it are described in terrible and pathetic detail.

2. 'Tribulation' is announced by Jesus as the outward lot that awaits His disciples. (a) In the confusion and conflict that would sweep the nation on to the final catastrophe, the disciples were to be involved (Mt 24⁹). They would draw this relentless hostility on themselves in consequence of their testimony and activity as disciples. It behoved them to endure (ὑπομένειν, v. 13) and prove themselves 'brethren and partakers in the tribulation, and kingdom, and patience (ὑπομονή) which are in Jesus' (Rev 1⁹ RV, cf. Ro 5³). (b) Similarly, but without reference to the ordeal, the disciples are warned to 'endure' (v. 13) must expect to meet with 'in the world' (Jn 16²²⁻³³). On account of their relation to Jesus, they would be subjected to this treatment. But their attitude ought to be one of 'good cheer' (θαρσύνετε). 'The way that leadeth unto life' was, therefore, in the case of the disciples to prove 'strained' (τεθλιμμένη).

3. 'Triumphation' and persecution (διωγμός) 'because of the word' are mentioned in the parable of the Sower as the conditions which cause those 'to stumble straightway' that 'hear the word, and . . . th joy receive it, and have no root . . .' (Mt 13²¹, Mk 4¹⁷). A mind only emotionally interested in the 'word,' that is to say, as distinct from one intellectually and morally interested (Mt 13²³, Mk 4²⁰), is incapable of with-standing the emotional shock occasioned by tribulation and persecution. With his feelings sustained and refreshed by no continuous and immediate experience in relation to the 'word,' such a person cannot resist the assault upon them of actual harassing events. TRIBUTE is used in the Gospels in two distinct senses. 1. The tribute-money (δίδραχμον, Mt 23^{ant.}) was the Temple-tax levied on all male Israelites of twenty and upwards, to meet the cost of the daily burnt-offering and the other sacrifices offered in the name of the people, and for other objects of a public character. In the days of Nehemiah the amount was a third of a shekel (Neh 10^{32, 33}), but in NT times it was half a shekel (Jos. Ant. XVIII. xix. 1), which was also the sum fixed in Ex 30¹¹⁻¹³. It was collected in the month Adar, and was paid in money of the early Hebrew standard. The 'piece of money' (στατήρ) of Mt 27²⁷ was equal to a shekel (about 2s. 9d.), and so was sufficient to meet the Temple-tax for two persons. 2. The tribute to Cæsar (φόρος, φόροι, κῆσος) denoted the taxes payable by the Jews, as Roman subjects, into the Imperial treasury (fiscus). These included taxes on land and property (tributum soli), and the poll-tax (tributum capitis), from which only children and old men were exempt. The Roman authorities made use of the Jewish courts in collecting their revenue from these sources (Jos. BJ II. xvii. 1). It was the lawful duty of paying such taxes about which Jesus was questioned by His enemies (Mt 22¹⁷ || Mk 12¹⁴ || Lk 20²²). His reply gave no ground for the charge of forbidding their payment, which was afterwards brought against Him (Lk 23²).

TRINITY.—Our subject is the doctrine of the Holy Trinity in relation to Christ and the Gospels.

We have to consider how far that great conception of God's being and nature is revealed or implied in the fact of Christ as presented in the Gospels and in the teaching of our Lord Himself.

I. The witness of our Lord's consciousness as revealed in the Gospels.—(i.) AS REGARDS HIMSELF.—It was not our Lord's custom to take to Himself the names and titles to which He knew He had a right. The passage which exhibits this fact most clearly is that in which we find Him questioning His disciples, first as to the popular opinion, and then as to their own belief (Mt 16^{13ff.}, Mk 8^{27ff.}, Lk 9^{18ff.}). After St. Peter had made his great confession, our Lord charged the disciples to keep the truth which had just emerged, to themselves. No doubt He desired to avoid the mistakes arising from the popular conceptions of the Messiah. He wished also to train the minds of the disciples, to lead them gently from truth to truth, so that spiritual experience might keep pace with knowledge. And yet our Lord's thoughts about Himself were loftier far than could be imagined from the mere names and titles which He acknowledged. When the passages which contain His statements about His own relation to God and man are collected and viewed as a whole, they are found to imply claims which are far in advance of the first and more obvious meanings of the titles.

It is interesting to note that by critical students of the Gospels, the title of Himself as the Messiah, and that the others who described Him as Messianic and permitted others to describe Him as Messianic in their significance. But when this has been granted to the full, there remains a very large proportion of His self-revelation unaccounted for. Bousset considers that the reserve of our Lord on the subject of His Messiahship was due to His deep sense of the greatness of the Messianic title for that which He felt (see Untersuchungen über das Christentum, p. 175 ff., Eng. tr.). And certain it is that, among all the conceptions which clustered round the Jewish anticipation of the Messiah, none is great enough, none deep enough, to correspond with the revelation of Himself which our Lord has made in the Gospels. (See art. 'Development of Doctrine' in Hastings' DB, Ex. Vol.; Charles, 'Enoch' and 'Eschatology' in vol. i.; also Briggs, The Messiah of the Gospels). True, we have the great OT conceptions of the later Isaiah and of the Book of Daniel, and we have the latter repeated and in some respects enlarged, in the Servant of the Lord. But the promise of pre-Christian work there is a wonderful picture of the Son of Man, which corresponds remarkably with certain passages in the Gospels. He is, as it seems, regarded as pre-existent, was named in the presence of God before creation, and takes part in judgment. But there is no anticipation of that extraordinary union of earthly humiliation with triumph which our Lord's consciousness of Himself implied. The truth is that the difficulty of representing that consciousness by means of the understood and recognized terms of the religion and theology of the day was almost inconceivably great.

It was this very inadequacy of all existing conceptions to convey the truth of our Lord's Person in His relation to God and man which rendered necessary that careful and patient handling of the faith of the disciples which we find everywhere in His dealing with them. A spiritual experience of a new kind had to be conveyed before the new language could be learned. The new wine needed new bottles. The first danger to be guarded against was a premature precision, a hasty definition. The one title which our Lord constantly used of Himself, 'the Son of Man,' most skilfully avoided any hint of the nature of definition. Messianic in its associations, it was yet not so distinctively Messianic as to constitute a claim, and it was capable of infinite suggestion, according to its application and context. It was a continual challenge to reflexion. See art. SON OF MAN above and in Hastings' DB.

These reflexions will help us to discern the true nature of the problem which is presented by our Lord's revelation of Himself. The facts of that problem may be summarized as follows, the Synoptic evidence and that of the Fourth Gospel being exhibited separately.

(1) Direct statements or claims to a position or authority more than human.—The strongest passage in the Synoptics is the solemn declaration recorded by Mt. (11²⁷) and Lk. (10²²), 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father: and no one knoweth who the Son is, save the Father; and who the Father is, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.'

These words form the most complete statement between the Father and the Son in the Gospels. They are not to be taken alone. On the contrary, they but sum up what is found everywhere, expressed or implied. The Father speaks of His mission from God in a manner which sets Him above and apart from men (Mt. 20²⁸, Mk 9³⁷ 10⁴⁵, Lk 9⁴⁸, Mt 28¹⁸ etc.). He is Judge of all and Lord of all (Mt 24^{36ff.}, Mk 13³⁵ 14⁶², Lk 9²⁶). He is David's Lord (Mt 22⁴¹, Mk 12³⁵, Lk 20⁴¹). He is higher than the angels (Mk 13³²). He demands the most complete devotion as no one else (Mt 23¹³, Mk 12²⁸, greater than Solomon (Mt 12⁴²)).

In the Fourth Gospel this great claim of Christ occupies a much larger space, and is more explicit and more fully stated, but it is a mistake to suppose that it is more strongly expressed. Such a passage as Jn 5²², 'He hath given all judgment unto the Son; that all may honour the Son even as they honour the Father,' is very definite, but it is only putting into general terms the teaching of Mt 10³⁷ 25^{31ff.}, Mk 8³⁴⁻³⁸, Lk 14²⁶. The tremendous statement in Jn 10³⁰, 'I and the Father are one,' summing up as it does the teaching of the whole Gospel, finds perhaps its most perfect explication in Mt 11²⁷, Lk 10²². The great section, Jn 14-17, is but the further development of the same doctrine, introducing, as was necessary, the promise of the Holy Spirit and certain fundamental instruction concerning His function and work.

(2) When from direct statements made by our Lord Himself we pass to the revelation of His consciousness of His unique relation to God which is to be found implied in His life and methods, we are able to note the following:

(a) The unvarying tone of authority which characterizes all His actions and utterances—authority as regards the greatest subjects which have ever engaged the mind of man. See, further, artt. AUTHORITY OF CHRIST and CLAIMS OF CHRIST.

(b) The serene certainty of His judgments upon the greatest questions of morality and religion. This characteristic is most noticeable in the Sermon on the Mount, and in all those parts of His teaching which deal with His own relation to God and to man. All the highest and greatest things are to Him easy and familiar. He walks upon the mountain peaks of vision with unhesitating confidence. He speaks as One who sees clearly into the heart of God. Examples will be found in the following passages:

Mt 6^{43ff.}, 6²⁵⁻³⁴, 7⁷⁻¹², 11²⁰⁻³⁰, 12³⁰⁻³⁷, 17²⁰, 23³⁵, 24³⁵, 25³¹⁻⁴⁶, 26¹³⁻¹⁴, 27⁴², 28¹⁸⁻²⁰, 29⁴², 30⁴², 31⁴², 32⁴², 33⁴², 34⁴², 35⁴², 36⁴², 37⁴², 38⁴², 39⁴², 40⁴², 41⁴², 42⁴², 43⁴², 44⁴², 45⁴², 46⁴², 47⁴², 48⁴², 49⁴², 50⁴², 51⁴², 52⁴², 53⁴², 54⁴², 55⁴², 56⁴², 57⁴², 58⁴², 59⁴², 60⁴², 61⁴², 62⁴², 63⁴², 64⁴², 65⁴², 66⁴², 67⁴², 68⁴², 69⁴², 70⁴², 71⁴², 72⁴², 73⁴², 74⁴², 75⁴², 76⁴², 77⁴², 78⁴², 79⁴², 80⁴², 81⁴², 82⁴², 83⁴², 84⁴², 85⁴², 86⁴², 87⁴², 88⁴², 89⁴², 90⁴², 91⁴², 92⁴², 93⁴², 94⁴², 95⁴², 96⁴², 97⁴², 98⁴², 99⁴², 100⁴².

(c) He never prays with His disciples. He teaches them to pray, He prays for them, but not with them. (See Chadwick, Christ bearing witness to Himself, pp. 104, 105; and Forrest, The Christ of History and of Experience, p. 22 ff., and Appendix to 5th ed.). We read of solitary prayers (Mk 6⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸, Jn 6¹⁵).

(d) The harmonious combination of opposite qualities in His character.—Characteristics which would be incompatible in any one else unite freely and with perfect consistency in Him. Here is perhaps the strongest proof of the absolute truth of the portrait presented in the Gospels. Nothing but the strength and reality of the Personality which inspired the various accounts could have made such a result possible. See, further, artt. CHARACTER OF CHRIST, DIVINITY OF CHRIST, MENTAL CHARACTERISTICS.

(ii.) HIS RELATION TO THE FATHER.—(1) Our Lord asserts and implies that He stands in a relation of unique intimacy with God the Father. The great passage already quoted (Mt 11²⁷, Lk 10²²) is the fullest statement in the Synoptics. The language here associates the Son with the Father in a manner which exalts Him above all creation. It corresponds with certain characteristic phrases and mental habits of our Lord. For example, He calls God 'my Father' in a manner which sets the relation indicated by the words far apart from that Fatherhood which He attributes to God in relation to men, whether disciples or not: see Mt 7²¹ 10^{32, 33} 11²⁷ 15¹³ 18¹⁰ 20²³ etc., Mk 8³⁸, Lk 24⁴⁹ 22²⁹ 24⁴⁹, Jn 5¹⁷ 10^{29, 30} 14²⁰ 20¹⁷ etc. These passages but supply the correlative to the announcement at the Baptism and the Transfiguration (Mk 1¹¹ 9⁷). They also interpret for us the title 'Son of God' attributed to Him and accepted by Him (Mt 4³ 8²⁹ 14³³ 27⁴⁰. 43. 54, Mk 3¹¹ 12⁶⁻⁸ 15³⁹, Lk 4⁴¹ 22⁷⁰, Jn 1³⁴. 40 9³⁵ 11²⁷ etc.).

In connexion with this we observe the cloudless serenity of His relation to God. It has been remarked that the absence of any note of repentance is the strongest proof of our Lord's perfect sinlessness. But we have in His life the marks of a moral state which is very much more than mere sinlessness. The value of the negative is entirely relative to the corresponding positive. The perfect innocence of a soul which possessed but small moral capacity would, so far as we can see, be of but little value as a moral factor in the universe. But, in the case of our Lord, we find a moral capacity which is absolutely without parallel in human experience, and we find the moral Being who possesses this capacity not merely conscious of innocence, but conscious of His own innocence, which is wittingly and willingly all that God would have it be (see Forrest, op. cit., Lect. I.).

(2) Unity with the Father.—The revelation which our Lord gives us of His relation to the Father amounts to much more than a manifestation of a peculiar intimacy between Himself and God. He claims distinctly certain Divine attributes and positions. He is King and Judge of all. He is the object of the most absolute trust, the utmost devotion. No sacrifice is too great to be made for His sake (see above). To reject Him or His messengers is to reject God and to incur the severest judgment (Mt 10¹⁵. 40 11²². 24, Mk 12⁹, Lk 10¹³. 14. 16 13³⁴. 35 etc.). The right of the Almighty to supremacy over the hearts and lives of men could not be expressed in stronger terms than those in which Jesus claims human allegiance. The only possible explanation of His attitude is that given by His own words, 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father' (Mt 11²⁷, Lk 10²²).

When we turn to the Fourth Gospel, we find this teaching expressed with a fulness and clearness of statement which ought not to appear extraordinary. There must surely have been an inner side to such a life as we find portrayed from the outside in the Synoptics. If the external accounts give so many indications of a unique relation to God, the revelation of the inner life of the wonderful Personality must display that relation with special clearness. What is truly extraordinary is that the inner history, as we have it in St. John's Gospel, does not reveal any essential element which cannot be found, expressed or implied, in the external histories (see above). And this is the more remarkable when we consider that the method and style of the Fourth Gospel contrast so strongly with those of the others.

From St. John we learn then to think of our Lord: (1) As One who came from God, with whom He was before, on a mission of mercy to mankind, Jn 3¹¹⁻¹⁴. 16. 17. 31ff. 5²⁴. 30. 43 9²⁹ 32. 33ff. 8¹². 716. 28 etc. 8²³. 42 etc. 10²⁵ff. (2) As One whose relation to the Father is essential and unique, 31³. 18. 34. 51⁷. 18. 23. 36. 65⁷ 816 1015. 38 14⁷. 11. (3) As the only-begotten Son of God, 316 18, and see 14. 18 (in v. 18 the stronger μονογενής seems the better reading). (4) As with the Father from all eternity. This may be gathered from 8⁵⁸ 'Before Abraham was, I am,' and 17²⁴ 'the glory which I had with thee before the world was,' 'Thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world.' These passages justify the extraordinary language of the Prologue (1¹⁻²), 'the Word was with God,' 'the same was in the beginning with God' (ἦν μετὰ τοῦ θεοῦ). The ἦν μετὰ of 8⁵⁸ certainly implies more than ἦν. As one with the Father: 'I and the Father are one' (10³⁰). 'All things whatsoever the Father hath are mine' (16¹⁵). 'All things that are mine are thine, and thine are mine' (17¹⁰), etc. The ἦν (one) in 10³⁰ is very remarkable. It signifies essence, as distinguished from person, which would be ἐγώ. The force of it is greatly strengthened by its relation to the context. This classification of passages enables us to pass along an ascending plane of thought to that which is so comprehensive, and yet so briefly the Prologue to the Gospel. We learn that the ended us to get at the conception of the Logos which is there presented is the true and of our Lord's consciousness of Himself and His work in relation to God and the world.

II. The revelation of God in the Gospels.--

(i.) THE FATHER.—We must never forget that Christianity was built upon the foundation of Jewish monotheism. A long providential discipline had secured to the Jewish people their splendid heritage of faith in the One and Only God. 'Hear, O Israel, Jehovah our God is one Jehovah: and thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might' (Dt 6⁴). This was the corner-stone of the religion of Israel. These were perhaps the most familiar of all sacred words to the ears of the pious Jew. They were recited continually. Our Lord Himself had them frequently in His mind (Mt 22³⁷, Mk 12^{29, 30}, Lk 10²⁷). That He thought of God always as the Supreme One is unquestionable. Indeed the very idea of Fatherhood, which, with our Lord, is the characteristic conception, and which is capable of being presented in a way which might weaken or injure a true monotheism, becomes in His teaching absolutely monotheistic because absolutely universal (see Mt 5⁴⁸. 48 7¹¹ 8¹¹ 10²⁹, Lk 6¹³. 13 15). To the Jewish mind, the sovereignty of God was the natural and characteristic thought. In our Lord's teaching the Divine Fatherhood overshadows and also transforms the Divine sovereignty, but never threatens to dissolve the pure and splendid monotheism of the original doctrine.

There are three degrees of the Divine Fatherhood presented in the teaching of our Lord: God is the universal Father (see reft. given above); He is, in a very intimate and special way, the Father of the disciples of Jesus (Mt 5¹⁶ 6^{1, 8}. 32 7¹¹, Lk 12⁸² etc.); He is, in the highest, and unique, sense, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (see above).

It is evident that our Lord makes a very clear distinction between His own Sonship and the relationship in which others, even the most faithful of disciples, stand towards God. Yet, in thus setting Himself apart as the Son of God, He was in truth providing that very element which was required to form a connecting link between the Divine and the human. The great danger of monotheism is its tendency towards a transcendence which removes man to an infinite distance: God and man seem to stand apart from one another in hopeless opposition. Such was the tendency of the Jewish conception in the time of our Lord. (See art. 'God (in NT)' by Dr. Sanday in Hastings' DB).

We find, then, that the teaching of our Lord and of the Gospels concerning God is the union of a true and unwavering monotheism with a great doctrine of mediation, according to which God and man enter into very close relationship in the Person of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

(ii.) THE SON.—(1) The Son is a distinct Person from the Father.—It is easy to complicate this question by a discussion of the meaning of the word 'personality.' The Latin word persona was chosen to represent the Greek ὑπόστασις, but neither the original nor its translation was adequate. To endeavour to minimize the difficulty of the traditional doctrine by recalling the primitive meaning of persona is surely vain. The truth is that the conception of personality, as we now understand it, did not enter into the thoughts of the ancients at all. They used the language which attached itself most easily to the religious ideas which the rise of Christian theology forced upon their attention, and, in doing so, laid the foundations of our modern philosophical and theological terminology. But the true force of their technical terms may be more accurately gauged by considering the meanings to which they tended, than by going back to meanings which they forsook. It is much better to interpret the Trinitarian doctrine with the help of the modern conception of personality than by means of the Latin word, for the connotation of the term has altered, its denotation is, in this case, the same, and the change of meaning was simply the inevitable development.

The truth of this will become evident when we turn from abstract doctrines and a priori arguments to the facts of the life of Christ as we have them in the Gospels. If any result has emerged from our study of the Gospels it is this: the Personality of our Lord is the most distinct and the most concrete of which we have any knowledge. If His consciousness included elements which are outside the range of our experience, if His character combined qualities which do not coexist under ordinary human conditions, if there was a completeness about His moral and spiritual life, then all these great spiritual possessions belonged to His Ego, and therefore His Ego had a distinctness and concreteness which no other human being who ever lived. To draw the boundaries which give the Ego its distinctness, for the sake of making an abstract doctrine appear more intelligible, is surely a dangerous error. Our Lord was very man, and His Ego had all the self-possession and self-consciousness which give to every human soul its personal distinctness. While we find, in His self-revelation, that He constantly entered into a communion with God which is quite without parallel in human experience, and that He knew the heart of God from within, we also find Him ever distinguishing Himself as a Person from the Father. There is no trace anywhere of the breaking down of the boundaries of personal life. The Hebrew prophet was frequently impelled to speak as the mouthpiece of Jehovah, his personality seemed to dissolve, and the voice of Deity seemed to speak through his lips. So with the mystic, the individual being seems to vanish in the moment of insight, the human drop seems to blend with the ocean of Divinity. In the records of the inner life of our Lord will be found no sign of such experiences. His utterances reveal no displacement of the centre of personal life. He is always self-contained, even in Gethsemane.

This personal distinctness may be seen clearly in the following passages. 'I have not derived unto me or my Father, and no one knoweth the Son save the Father,' etc. (Mt 11:27, Lk 10:22); 'The Son of Man shall come in the glory of His Father with his angels' (Mt 16:27); 'Whoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, the Son of Man also shall be ashamed of him, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels' (Mk 8:38); 'Not what I will, but what thou wilt' (Mk 14:36); 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (Lk 23:46); 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mk 15:34); 'My Father worketh hitherto and I work' (Jn 5:17); 'I and the Father are one' (10:30); 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life: no one cometh unto the Father but by me' (14:6), etc. These examples are selected out of a great number. The Fourth Gospel is especially rich in such passages, and this fact is the more remarkable because it is the Gospel of Christian mysticism. In it we are taught to think of the great unities which are realized in Christ: 'Thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us'; 'I in them and thou in me, that they may be one' (17:21-23), etc. Yet St. John is very clear as to the distinctness of the Persons: 'The Logos was with God,' 'The same was in the beginning with God' (1:1-2). The phrase is remarkable, τὸς τὸν θεόν. It signifies personal distinctness with active relationship. (Cf. 1 Jn 12: τὸς τὸν πατέρα). We have already seen how emphatic this Evangelist is as to the humanity of our Lord. We now find him equally emphatic as to the true Personality. Yet he is our clearest teacher about the Divinity. Surely we must recognize, as the source of this extraordinary combination, the reality of the life and consciousness to which he testifies, the fact of Christ.

(2) Organic relation of the Son to the Father.—
(a) The subordination of the Son.—This truth is everywhere in the teaching of our Lord. He speaks ever as One who enjoys a unique intimacy with the Father, though He claims God as His own Father, yet it is clear that He was filled with reverence towards the Eternal Source of all things from whom His own being is derived.

Certain passages express this very distinctly: Mk 13:32 'Of that day and that hour no one knoweth, neither the Son, nor the Father, but only the Father who is in heaven, and He will reveal it to whom He will.' But they are quite as clear as to the Son's consciousness of His own divinity. Here we find Him placing Himself above the angels in heaven, next to the Eternal Father, and the fact of His own divinity is as extraordinary. The passage involves a Christology which agrees with the teaching of St. John. There is, however, a clear teaching of the subordination of the Son; and even if His ignorance of the great day be regarded as temporary, part of the limitation involved in His humanity while on earth, none the less the assertion remains.

It may be made of Jn 14:28 'The Father is greater than I,' observes (see Table Talk, 1st May 1823), these words, which have been used to supply an argument, that the Son is not God. He does not say, 'the Son,' or, 'the Son of Man.' It is inadmissible, as Westcott points out, to suppose that He meant 'the Son' otherwise than 'in the flesh.' We cannot think that the statement refers merely to the human life of Christ on earth. 'The superior greatness of the Father must therefore be understood as referring to His divine nature as Father and not to His human nature as Son of God' (1). (See Westcott, loc. cit., and Additional Note on 14:28).

(b) The derivative nature of the Son's Divinity.—We are left in no doubt as to what is the essential nature of this subordination. The Son derives His being from the Father. His power, His active life, at every point, flows from the Father. For the detailed proof of this we are mainly dependent upon the Fourth Gospel. But here the evidence is extraordinary which may be adduced is extraordinary.

'The Son can do nothing of himself' (Jn 5:19); 'As the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son also to have life in himself' (1:26); 'I can of myself do nothing' (5:30); 'I am come down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me' (6:38); 'I do nothing of myself' (8:29); 'I speak not from myself, but the Father which sent me, he hath given me a commandment, what I should say and what I should speak' (12:49); 'The Father abiding in me doeth his works' (14:10); 'Thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee' (17:21).

(c) The kenosis.—It is this derivative nature of the Son's Divinity which helps us to realize that the limitations to which He submitted during His life on earth involved no breach of His Divine identity. Our ordinary experience teaches us that the limitation of our powers does not destroy our identity. If we shut our eyes, we impose upon ourselves voluntarily a limitation which, while it lasts, diminishes very considerably our hold upon reality; yet we continue to be the same identical persons that we were before, and that we shall be again when the voluntary limitation has come to an end. But it is hard to imagine anything similar in the case of the Eternal Source of all being. All that is depends on Him, and any reduction or limitation of His power is inconceivable. Certainly that would seem to be the case, when we think of the Eternal Father. But surely it is different with the Eternal Son. His Divinity is derivative, dependent from moment to moment upon the Father: and therefore there is no difficulty in accepting what seems to be a necessary inference from the facts of the Gospel history, that, in the Lord's life on earth, there took place a derivation of the Divine effluence. Nor is it necessary to suppose that this limitation was always the same in extent or degree. Here may be the explanation of the awful cry, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' Such a view is not inconsistent with the declaration of St. Paul that 'it was the good pleasure of the Father that in him should all fulness dwell,' the whole πλήρωμα of the Deity (Col 1¹⁹).

(d) The Logos.—For the use of this term in Christian theology we are indebted to St. John. It is a mark of the inner truth of the Fourth Gospel that nowhere is our Lord represented as using it; for it is not in His manner, nor does it arise naturally out of the thought of the first age of Christian experience (but see Rev 19¹³). It belongs essentially to the age of reflexion and philosophic construction. Yet the term was familiar to the minds of thinkers of various schools at the time. It was the means of drawing together the religious thought of Palestine and the philosophy of Alexandria. In the former, the Memra or Word of Jehovah was regarded as a personal Divine agency by which the Most High carried His purposes in the world. In the latter, the Logos is a personified abstraction, and must be connected with the Immanent Reason of Greek speculation, though sometimes conceived more concretely (by Philo) as executive power. (See Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, ch. ii. § 5, etc., and throughout, for further development of the Logos conception). See, further, art. LOGOS.

Both speculatively and historically the Incarnation is the starting-point for that course of thought which leads inevitably to the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity. As soon as Christian thinkers came to realize that the Christ is the Son of God as being the Incarnate Divine Logos, their thought was launched upon that vast speculation as to the nature of God, and especially as to the relation of the Son to the Father, which occupied the minds of theologians during the earlier centuries of Church history.

(iii.) THE HOLY GHOST.—For a general statement of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit the reader may be referred to art. HOLY SPIRIT in vol. i. and the corresponding art. in Hastings' DB. Here a briefer and more limited treatment must suffice.

(1) The evidence of the Synoptic Gospels.—The Gospels record a renewed activity of prophetic inspiration in connexion with the Advent of Christ. Of John the Baptist it was foretold, 'He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb' (Lk 1¹⁵). So we read (vv. 41, 67) of Elisabeth and Zacharias, that, filled with the Spirit, they utter a prophetic language. See also Lk 2^{25, 26, 27, 36}. A miraculous conception is ascribed to the presence of the Spirit (Lk 1³⁵, Mt 1^{18, 20}). Equally clear is the statement of the agency of the Holy Spirit at the Baptism of our Lord (Mk 1¹⁰, Mt 3¹⁶, Lk 3²²). As He entered upon His ministry, the Evangelists tell us that our Lord was guided by the Holy Spirit (Mk 1¹², Mt 4¹, Lk 4^{1, 2, 14, 18}). His miracles are performed in the Spirit (Mt 12²⁸). In His hour of most profound concentration upon the mystery of His own Person and work we are told, 'He rejoiced in the Holy Spirit' (Lk 10²¹).

Our Lord's own teaching on this subject, as given in the Synoptics, recognizes the inspiration of the OT (Mk 12²⁴, Mt 22²⁹), and connects His own miraculous works (Mt 12²⁸) and His mission (Lk 4¹⁸) with the agency of the Holy Spirit. Certain of His promises to His disciples can be fully understood only in the light of the teaching which we find in the Fourth Gospel. See Mt 10⁴¹, Lk 11^{13, 12^{12, 24, 49}}, Ac 1^{4, 5, 8}. Perhaps, however, the strongest evidence of all is that in which our Lord warns against the awful sin against the Holy Ghost (Mt 12³¹; Mk 12³², Lk 12¹⁰). The intensity of our Lord's language here certainly points to the Deity of the Spirit. See, further, art. UNPARDONABLE SIN.

(2) The evidence of the Fourth Gospel.—Here the work of the Holy Spirit is frequently mentioned. He is the agent in the new birth (3⁵); the living water (4^{14, 14}); the Paraclete (14¹⁶); the Spirit of truth (14^{17, 15^{26, 16¹³}}), etc. In these and other passages the relation of the Holy Spirit to the Father and to the Son, and His agency in connexion with the work of God in the Church and the world, are presented with extraordinary impressiveness.

(3) The Personality of the Holy Ghost.—It is inevitable, owing to the very use of the ambiguous word πνεῦμα, that in many cases it is impossible to be certain, from the mere language of the passages in which the word occurs or from their context, as to the nature of the agency to which reference is made. It is also necessary to remember that the personification of abstractions may be carried to great lengths when the conception of personality is indefinite, as it certainly was among the ancients, at least to a far greater degree than at present. It would, therefore, be a mistake to infer the Personality of the Holy Spirit from the mere use of language concerning Him which seems to imply it. Such language must be understood in relation to the whole Christian revelation and its interpretation in terms of thought. Yet the language is very strong and very definite. 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Paraclete, that he may be with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth' (14^{16, 17}). The Spirit is here indicated as 'another,' One who is to take the place of our Lord Himself as His substitute. Also He is ὁ παράκλητος, τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἄγιον (v. 26). The masculine form of the word is certainly used to impress upon the disciples the truth that the Presence which is to take the place of that to which they had been accustomed is no less a Personal Presence than the other. And this view is strengthened by the repeated and emphatic ἐκεῖνος: 'he shall teach you' (v. 26); 'he shall bear witness' (15²⁶); 'he, when he is come, will convict . . . ' (16⁸); 'he shall guide you . . . ' (v. 13); 'he shall glorify me' (v. 14). Not merely the language, strong and emphatic as it undoubtedly is, but the whole argument demands the doctrine of the Personality of the Spirit.

This group of passages also shows very clearly that we are here taught to think of the Spirit as not only personal, but as distinct from the Father and the Son. This appears remarkably in 14²⁶ 'The Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you.' Again in 15²⁶ 'Whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father, he shall bear witness of me.' Language could not make the distinctness of the Persons clearer. Yet strong and clear as this teaching is, we find its strength and clearness greatly increased by the fact that it fits into the scheme of Christian thought as we find that scheme developing in the Epistles of St. Paul and taking more rounded dogmatic form in the later ages of Christian reflexion.

(4) The Divinity of the Holy Ghost.—We can have no doubt on this subject when we have reached the point at which we attain the conviction that, in His great discourse, our Lord teaches us unmistakably the Personality of the Spirit as distinct from that of the Father and of the Son. The Three Persons are here viewed upon a plane of being which is above that of all created things.

In Jn 14:16-18, 26, 15:26, 16:14, 15 the inter-relationship of the Divine Three is expressed and implied. The dependence of both the Son and the Holy Ghost upon the Father appears: 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Paraclete.' The Spirit 'proceeds' from the Father and is sent by the Son (15:26, 16:7). His presence is equivalent to the presence of the Son, for with reference to His coming, our Lord declares (14:18), 'I will not leave you desolate: I come unto you.' In His relation to the Son, the Spirit is to bring all our Lord's words to the remembrance of the disciples (v. 26); He is to bear witness of our Lord (15:26), to glorify Him (16:14), etc. So important is the work of the Spirit in His connexion with that of the Son, that our Lord solemnly declares (16:7) that 'of His own departure in order that the work of the Spirit's activity may begin. And to this teaching we must add such statements as the following: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (14:9); 'I am in the Father, and the Father in me' (v. 10); 'If a man love me, he will keep my word; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him' (v. 23); 'All things whatsoever the Father hath are mine, therefore said I, that he (i.e. the Spirit) taketh of mine and shall declare it unto you' (16:15). All these refer to the nature and effects of that dispensation of the Spirit concerning which our Lord is instructing His disciples in this great discourse.

Such teaching certainly implies both the Personality of the Spirit and the Unity of the Three Persons, and they are at once distinguished, regarded as inseparably united, and placed upon a plane of being far above all created existence.

III. Summary.—(i.) THE BAPTISMAL FORMULA.—We have omitted from our consideration one great passage of first-rate importance on every branch of our subject. It has been kept to the last because it is the nearest thing to a comprehensive and formal statement of the doctrine of the Trinity to be found in Holy Scripture. In Mt 28:18-20 there is, as the last word of that Gospel, a solemn charge which it is stated our Lord gave to His disciples when they met Him, by His special command, after His resurrection. The charge includes: (1) a declaration of His universal authority, 'All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and in earth,' containing a very strong implication of His Divinity and of His position as Lord of the Church (cf. Mt 11:27 and Lk 10:22 as well as with the teaching of the Fourth Gospel). (2) A great commission, 'Go ye therefore and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you,'—words which are at once the greatest command, the greatest prophecy, and the greatest dogmatic statement ever given. (3) A promise, 'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,' which has been a source of power and inspiration to the Church ever since.

It is true that this passage belongs to a part of St. Matthew's Gospel which has been assailed with great persistence, and, on internal grounds, with some apparent reason. It is often argued that the First Gospel contains many additions to the Evangelic narrative which arose from the habits of thought and practice as well as from explanatory teaching, current in the primitive Church. The account of baptism given here would then be a reflexion of the teaching of a later time. Against this, we have to note that there is no textual evidence against the passage, that 2 Co 13:14 contains the threefold Divine name in a way which shows that the combination was familiar to the mind of the Christian Church at a time which was certainly less than thirty years after the Ascension, and that there is a continuous stream of testimony from the earliest times as to baptism into the threefold name, the Didache providing the connecting link between the Apostolic age and Justin Martyr. But stronger than all these is the fact that this passage merely sums up the teachings concerning God which, as we have seen in detail, may be found scattered throughout the four Gospels. It is surely somewhat hard to suppose that the Christian doctrine of God could have so rapidly assumed the form in which we find it in St. Paul's Epistles, if our Lord Himself had not brought together the various strands of His teaching; and when was this so likely to happen as when He manifested Himself to His disciples after His resurrection? The truth is that this passage in Matthew's Gospel is a clue we need in order to understand the doctrine and the continuity of custom in the Church. It is the 'God' in Hastings' DB ii. p. 213, and his Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, p. 218; also Scott in art. 'Trinity' in DB, Ext. Vol. p. 313. But there is this further proof of genuineness, that the language here possesses all the power, concision, and authority which are everywhere the marks of the true sayings of Jesus. There is not a word in this utterance, from ἐδωκεν to αἰῶνες, which has not been, in all ages, a source of life to the Church. Here the meaning of the life, death, and teaching of the Son of God is translated into a language which appeals to the minds and hearts of all ages of Christians, and this in the most Jewish of the Gospels. Moreover, the prophecy here contained is one which has to have arisen naturally out of the life of the Church in the community of the 1st century. Not even to St. Paul was granted so wide an outlook upon the history of mankind. This great vision of a world-wide Christianity belongs to the mind of Him who spoke of the Grain of Mustard Seed and the Draw-Net, and taught His disciples to pray, 'Thy kingdom come.'

We may, unless our judgments are obscured by critical prejudices, turn to this as the needful summary of all those thoughts about God which we have gleaned from the teaching of Christ and the Apostles. The expression eis τὸ ὄνομα is important. The expression eis τὸ ὄνομα is to be 'into the name.' The phrase recalls the teaching of the OT in which the 'Name' of God was revealed to Himself as revealed or brought into relation to men. So the name Jehovah was the sign or mark of the old covenant. Can we fail to gather that the name which marks the new covenant is that of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost? In this name is contained the revelation of God which Christ brought to man. It must also be observed that the word is singular, τὸ ὄνομα, signifying the unity of the Godhead. The name is threefold, yet it is one.

The doctrine of the Trinity is, then, the summing up of the teaching concerning God which is contained or implied in the Christian revelation. It is not a philosophic construction. It is not the outcome of abstract discussion upon the Being and attributes of God. It is not a method which had nothing to do with logical or scientific methods, nor did it arise out of the efforts of the understanding. Its source is simply the fact of Christ's Revelation. That amazing and, to the merely scientific intelligence, most mysterious fact, which still, after so many centuries, presents to mankind the old question, 'Who say ye that I am?' is the revelation of the Trinity. Jesus Christ manifests God as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

(ii.) THE ILLUMINATING POWER OF THE DOCTRINE.—When from the position which has now been attained we look back over the life and teaching of our Lord, we find that sudden light is thrown upon much that otherwise seems obscure. It is this reflex illumination of Christian experience which constitutes the verification of the doctrine—a verification which may be traced throughout the whole history of the Church, and which to this day may be discerned in the vitality of orthodox Christianity and its continued value for the religious consciousness of mankind in contrast with Deism in all its forms. Here we confine our brief survey to the Gospels, and note the following. At the Annunciation the angel replies to the Virgin's question (Lk 1:35): 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee: wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God.' At the Baptism the three Divine Persons are represented: 'He saw the heavens rent asunder and the Spirit as a dove descending upon him; and a voice came out of the heavens, Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased' (Mk 1:10, 11, also Mt 3:16, 17, Lk 3:21, 22). At the Transfiguration the glory of the Son and His relation to the Father are manifested (Mk 9:7, Mt 17:5, Lk 9:35).

But more profound even than such indications as these is the truth that the doctrine of the Trinity underlies the whole movement of Divine providence for the redemption and elevation of man as we have it presented in the NT. Here it is sufficient to note that everywhere in the Gospels, while God the Father is regarded as the ultimate source of all things, both in creation and in redemption, certain special functions are declared to belong to the Son and the Spirit, and yet there is no separation or opposition between the Divine Persons. God the Father is the Creator, yet all things were made by (διὰ) the Father (Jn 1:3). The work of the Son: 'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19¹⁰). He came 'to give his life a ransom for many' (Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²⁸). He is the Shepherd seeking the lost sheep (Lk 15³⁻⁷). But the love which surrounds the sinner from his birth, which remains constant throughout his life of sin, and which receives him into a perfect reconciliation on his repentance, is the love of the Father (Lk 15¹¹⁻¹²). Further, the salvation which is the result of the death of Christ is everywhere presented as the work of God Himself. Thus is the love of God revealed in Christ, and assurance as regards God's mind and will towards us attained. The unity of the Divine Persons is the underlying truth of the Atonement. So again, the works of Christ are 'in the Spirit' (Mt 12²⁸), and the Spirit is called by Christ 'the Spirit of your Father' (Mt 10²⁰). The Son is the means of communication between man and the Father (Mt 11²⁷, Lk 10²², Jn 14⁹ etc.), yet the Spirit is the source of the life which makes this communication possible (Jn 3³⁻⁸). Further, the Spirit is the gift of the Father (Lk 11¹³), and none can come to the Son unless the Father draw him (Jn 6⁴⁴). It is sufficient to point out, finally, how closely interrelated are the functions of the Three Persons as described in Jn 14-16. The coming of the Paraclete is identified with a coming of the Son (14¹⁸), and the coming of the Son with a coming of the Father (vv. 9, 23). His office is to carry on the work of the Son, which is the work of the Father (16¹⁴⁻¹⁵), in the Church (14¹⁷ etc.) and in the world (16⁸) after the departure of the Son. The Father said that the characteristic work of the Son is creation, of the Son redemption, of the Holy Ghost sanctification. The distinction is certainly Scriptural, and yet there is no one of these works in which each of the Divine Persons has not a share. The Trinity in Unity is, to use the old-fashioned language, both ontological and economical.

And all this has its counterpart in the Christian experience of our own time, for Christianity is, for the Church and for the individual, the revelation of the Fatherhood of God through and in that Christ who presents Himself afresh to every age as the manifestation of the love of God, and whose personal influence, in some mysterious manner, survives every shock of revolution as well as the slow movement of the ages.

(iii.) THE PHILOSOPHICAL ASPECT.—This is not the place to consider the great question as to how far the doctrine of the Trinity can commend itself to, or be justified by, the philosophical reason of mankind. The problem is as old as Christian theology, and is latent in all discussions which touch the life of the Christian creed. If it has not been greatly canvassed, at least directly, in recent times, it is because all the resources of Christian thought have been devoted to a work which has been in truth more pressing, the endeavour to grasp more firmly and to realize more perfectly the facts to which the Scriptures testify, the elements of the great revelation upon which the doctrine depends. When the time for full discussion comes, there is at least a probability that the general mind will be prepared. The old objection that the doctrine is apparently contradictory, that it cannot be consistently consistent, is certainly losing its force. The lines of thought which have guided so many in the direction of Agnosticism have converged upon this: that there must be an element of mystery in the nature of God. The old Deistic conception of a solitary Sovereign in the skies, standing above and apart from creation, is now impossible for the instructed. The doctrine of the Trinity stands in truth midway between Agnosticism and Deism. With the former it recognizes the impossibility of presenting to our minds the inmost nature of the Supreme One, with the latter it insists upon the absolute necessity of thinking of the Deity in terms of personality. But it keeps closer than either to the facts of the religious consciousness and the needs of humanity, because it builds upon actual experience, the experience which stands central in the history of the race, and it interprets this experience by means of the only perfect Personality known to man.

In addition to this general consideration, there are tendencies in modern thought which seem to promise new light on the old doctrine. Philosophy has been dealing with the existence of problems of extraordinary complexity and suggestiveness in connexion with it. For both, human personality appears, from one point of view, as a self-sufficing unity, and, from another, as an illuminated portion of a vast world of spiritual existence. It is both inclusive and exclusive, both universal and limited, according to the way in which it is regarded, and no principle has yet come to light by means of which these oppositions can be shown to be overcome.

The more usual way of approaching the application of the principle of personality to the doctrine of the Trinity is to follow the line indicated by Lotze (Microcosmos, bk. ix. ch. iv.) and regard personality as it exists in man as incomplete, perfect personality belonging to God only. If this conception be justifiable, we may well expect to be able to apply an ancient method and find that distinctions which we know to exist in man's personality may be correctly regarded as corresponding to distinctions of a much profounder degree in the Divine Being. The best modern exposition of this view is Illingworth's Personality, Human and Divine, a work which may justly be regarded as representing for our time the classic point of view, that of St. Augustine in his de Trinitate.

The difficulty which is inherent in this method was, however, clearly seen by Augustine himself, and it cannot be said that modern philosophers have been able to surmount it successfully. Regarding the distinctions in the Godhead as corresponding to the three, 'memory, understanding, love,' which we know of in ourselves, he yet perceives that 'Tria ista . . . mea sunt, non sua; nec sibi sed mihi agunt quod agunt, in eo ego per illa,' and again, 'Ego per omnia illa tria memini, ego intelligo, ego diligo, qui nec memoria sum, nec intelligentia, nec dilectio, sed hæc habeo. Ista ergo dici possunt ab una persona qui habet hæc tria, non ipsa est hæc tria' (de Trinitate, bk. vi. ch. xiii. § 42). Nor can it be said that Augustine or any of his successors in this great adventure, nor even Hegel in his Philosophy of Religion, has been able to show new what in us is only the attribute, faculty, or thought of a persona, can become a Person in the Deity.

There is, however, another line of thought in recent philosophy, which seems to the writer to promise much better results for the Christian thinker. Out of the Hegelian school have arisen some who, feeling the force of certain considerations relied on by Agnostic reasoners, hold that the nature of the Ultimate Reality is beyond us, our highest categories and our most concrete experiences being inadequate alike to express or to present it. In addition to this, there has been slowly gaining recognition the importance of the conception of degrees of reality. Bradley in his Appearance and Reality has done more than any other writer to call attention to this principle. Foe to theology, as he professes to be, he may prove its most useful ally. The work of Pringle-Pattison points in the same direction. Personality may be, for human thought, the highest of the existence of certain fundamental and oppositions, speculative and practical, proves clearly that it is not the ultimate form of being. There is a degree of Reality, a final Unity, higher, more concrete, than Personality. There must be, because a person is, after all, essentially one among many. A person is what he is, not merely because he is inclusive as regards his own experience, but because he is exclusive as regards his neighbours' experience. Personality cannot therefore be a full definition of the Divine nature. God is personal and something more. In His final Unity He is super-personal, and this super-personal unity is the ultimate Reality, concrete and universal. Here is exactly the condition demanded by the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The most complete monotheism is compatible with the recognition of a personal multiplicity in the Godhead.

TRUMPET.—The sole mention of the trumpet in the Gospels occurs in Mt.'s version of the small eschatological discourse of Jesus. There (Mt 24³¹) we read that when the Son of Man comes in the clouds for the final judgment, He despatches His angels 'with a loud trumpet' to gather His elect from the four corners of the earth. The context, especially in Mt., is a Jewish-Christian application of the older Messianic tradition (cf. e.g. Is 27¹³, Zec 9¹⁰ [LXX]) which depicted the scattered members of Israel being summoned together by a trumpet-blast at the Messiah's advent. The figure was natural, for the 'trumpet-blast' denoted the approach of a crisis. 'Power, whether spiritual or physical, is the meaning of the trumpet: and so, well used by Handel in his approaches to the Deity' (Fitzgerald's Letters, i. 92). It was a favourite figure of John Knox, too, as Stevenson has noted (in Men and Books). But it is rather as a rallying summons than as a herald of royalty or even an awakener of sleepers, that the trumpet is employed as a pictorial detail in the passage before us. The writer does not develop the sketch. We are not told who blows the trumpet, though possibly the angels were meant. St. Paul seems to reflect, in 1 Th 4¹⁶, the tradition which connected it with the archangel Michael, but Mt. merely inserts the realistic trait, owing to his characteristic love of Hebrew Messianic prophecy.*

* Wellhausen argues that as 'the trumpet is singular, it cannot be connected with the angels, but must be posited as a separate unit.' This seems prosaic. 'Trumpet' may have been Messianischen (1903, § 456); the same author's Die Religion des Judentums (1900, p. 221); also Haupt's Die eschatolog. Aussagen Jesu (1895, pp. 116f., 128f.).

JAMES MOFFATT.

TRUST.—That personal trust is the innermost essence of the faith that God requires, is almost universally recognized by Protestant theologians. Only in rare instances may one still meet with the pronounced intellectualistic view which regards faith as the assent to a sum of doctrines. On the other hand, one may note here and there a tendency towards the opposite extreme—to ascribe a value to faith as a subjective state, without regard to the reality of its content. But the one view is as un-Biblical as the other.

When Bellarmine (de Justif. i. 4) declares: 'heretici fidem fiduciam esse definiunt; Catholici fidem in intellectu sedem habere volunt,' he states accurately enough the fundamental distinction between the Catholic and the Evangelical conception of faith, and yet in his discussion he betrays a fatal misapprehension concerning the latter. Protestants do define faith as fiducia (trust); but this is not a bare and empty trust—the inanis haereticorum fiducia against which the Council of Trent impudently protested. A trust that is merely subjective is indeed groundless and empty, and therefore worse than worthless (cf. 1 Cor 13¹⁻²⁰). Faith has no value per se; its value lies solely in its object. If the object is unreal, the faith is vanity. Or if the object, though real, is not strong enough to bear up him that trusts himself to it, his confidence can bring him only loss. The vital question is, what a man believes; the vital question is, what we may not divide men into the two classes: those who believe and those who do not. For in varying degrees of confidence all men believe (trust). He who doubts God, believes men or the spirit of this world. Confidence in any object other than God, who alone has power over sin and death, could not in any case have saving value. And even so our faith would not be saving unless God freely purposed to save. And man, though the act of faith, is utterly unable to produce it of himself. Only the revelation of His grace can call forth and ground faith in God. Any possible confidence toward God not grounded in the revelation of His purpose is not faith, but presumption.

When it is said that Christian faith is personal trust in God in and through Jesus Christ, one need not conclude that 'faith' and 'trust' are exactly equivalent terms. The thought is only that the deepest essence of faith is trust, and that there is no Christian faith that is not personal trust in God. An examination, however, of the passages in the NT in which these words occur will clearly show that even here—to say nothing of later ecclesiastical usage—faith, formally regarded, is the more comprehensive term.

Two factors (Momente) are to be distinguished in faith, one relating to the object, the knowledge of God mediated through Christ, the other relating to the state of the subject, the trust in salvation. But the two cannot be separated from each other. Christian knowledge of God arises only in and with the trust in salvation. To the distinction between these two sides of faith correspond the two terms, fides and fiducia, which are kept in mind that the content of faith consists primarily not in a theological proposition, but in the immediate beholding and saving revelation itself' (Kierkegaard, art. 'Glaube' in PRE).

It is accordingly unwarrantable to speak of 'a purely intellectual faith in God.' The mere holding a doctrine to be true is not faith at all. Earlier theologians divided the function of faith into three parts: knowledge, instruction in the facts and doctrines of Christianity; assensus, assent to the teaching; fiducia, personal trust. This view, however, is misleading; for faith, however many aspects it may have, is yet an integral thing, not formed by the synthesis of several acts. And does not arise without the hearing of the message of salvation (ἀκούειν, Ro 10:17) is self-evident and undisputed. On the other hand, the assensus, as the sure persuasion of the power of Christ as Redeemer and of the reality of His work in the world, is brought about only in and with the hearing of this one thing must remain unobscured, that the right and proper answer of man to the saving revelation that comes to him is the fidelucia, and that out of it grows all certainty and knowledge of God and Divine things' (Kirm).

'notitia and assensus have nothing to do with religious faith except as they are included in the fiducia. That saving trust meant to denote 'trumpet-blast,' as indeed the context suggests. We should rather conjecture that trumpet was preceded by and, originally stood after trumpet, which would give a better order.

Some, again, have attempted to draw a positive distinction between faith and trust, regarding faith as the receiving from God, and trust as the yielding of self to God. The essential characteristic of faith is indeed receptivity; but it is a mistake to suppose that the trustful yielding of self to God is anything more or other than the opening of the heart and life to His influence and control through the overmastering revelation of the grace of Christ. In other words, even the trustful devotion of self to God remains at bottom a receiving from God.

The attempt has been made (cf. esp. E. W. Mayer, Das christliche Gottvertrauen und der Glaube an Christus, 1899) to show that while Christ, according to the NT, is the object of 'faith,' only God is the object of the full 'trust' of the Christian. As Jesus, the Christ, revealing in word and deed the Father's holy love, bears the offer of salvation to men, so through their faith in His revelation He brings men to the Father in trust. Trust in God is the consequence of faith in Christ. But can this view be consistently maintained? Faith in Christ—not as Prophet merely, but as the Bearer of salvation—is justified only as we have ground for the assurance that in Him God is dealing with us. So then faith in Christ is trust in the Father, and trust in the Father as revealed in Christ is also trust in the Son, the Bearer of salvation (Jn 14:10). Certain it is that the writers of the NT saw in Christ more than Teacher and Example. Even as their exalted Lord He continued to be a personal Helper.

So long as the revelation of God's grace was not yet complete in the sending forth of His Son and then of the Spirit of His Son (Gal 4:4-6), faith could not rise to its full measure. Before Christ the full conception of faith could not be reached. The word 'trust' occurs frequently in the Psalms and not seldom in certain other OT books. It does not, however, signify the perfect fellowship of the child of God, but only a reliance upon God's faithfulness. The predominant idea in the trust of the OT was hopsa. There were heroes of faith before Christ, but their faith could not be perfect, for they had not received the object of their hope (He 11:39, 40). In Christ the filial disposition is established (cf. e.g. 11:17). And so fundamental and all-comprehensive was His work as Mediator of the New Covenant that He could be truly called 'the author and perfecter of faith' (12:2). Only as men know God in Christ can they know what faith in its full sense is. The life of faith is communion with God in and through Christ, and the nerve of that communion is personal trust. Christian trust is reliance upon God, but not upon 'God out of Christ.' Neither can it be reliance upon Jesus except as the essential revelation of the Father.

Not unknown in Church history is a view of the redemptorial work of Christ which would make it consist in appeasing an angry God. According to this view Christ and not the Father is the Reconciler. God and not the world is reconciled. In such a case perfect childlike trust is not to be thought of. There would be no firm ground for it. If God has once changed His purpose, why should He not do so again? Only where God is manifest in Christ as the Reconciler of the world (2 Co 5:19) can there be perfect security for time and eternity. Where Christ is the object of as having wrought a change in the will of God, and as will with wavering hope implore Him to intercede with God on their behalf, and will perhaps also invoke the aid of many saints. Perfect assurance is not to be reached by this road.

Only as we have the Son do we have the Father

(Jn 14:9, 1 Jn 2:23, 24), but we have the Son only because of the Father's love (Jn 3:16). Jesus knows the Father, and He teaches us to know Him. His life is the glorious example of trust in the Father's love. But it is not through the contagious example of the 'inner life' of Jesus that men are led into perfect filial trust. He promised His disciples a perfect joy, which no one should take away (16:20-24), but this was to come only after He should have been glorified. God's boundless love for sinners must first be manifested in the cross of Christ (Ro 5:8). Yet even Christ's dying and rising again on our behalf (2 Co 5:15) is not the final proof of God's love. God has also sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts (Gal 4:6, Ro 8:14). The gift of the Spirit means the reality of communion in prayer, and the Spirit's work in us is the pledge of our complete salvation at last (cf. e.g. Ro 8:38, 2 Co 5:5). To be rooted in the love of God, that one may be able to know that love which passeth knowledge (Eph 3:17); to know and have believed the love which God hath in us (1 Jn 4:16); and to keep ourselves in the love of God (Jude v. 21)—this is the meaning of Christian trust.

Since the sovereign grace of God manifested in Jesus Christ is the only ground of our assurance, we must place no confidence in the flesh (Ph 3:5). The seed of Abraham or of Israel may not trust in this relation (Mt 3:9, Jn 8:39, Ro 2:28, 29, Gal 3:28, 29). Nor may we trust in works of righteousness (e.g. Ro 3:19, Eph 2:9, Tit 3:5), or in our good purpose, effort, or zeal (e.g. Ro 9:16, 10:6, Ph 3:6). Even the confession of Christ and the profession of faith will avail nothing without the vital union with Him in the faith that works by love (Mt 7:21, Ja 2:14, 1 Co 10:1-13, Rev 3:1). Moreover, not even what men call a good conscience can give security (1 Co 4:3, 4, 1 Jn 1:8). The wondrous fact of fellowship in the love of God is indeed a token of the life of God in us. And wheresoever our heart condemn us, we shall obtain assurance in the way of sincere obedience to the Spirit of love. God is greater than our heart—He can pardon and heal. And when by His grace our heart is set free from self-condemnation, our communion with God may be unbroken.

Upon the immovable foundation of the reconciliation of the world in Christ (2 Co 5:14) the individual appropriates to himself the promise by faith. Thereby he experiences a present grace and rejoices in the sure hope of the glory of God (Ro 5:2). Because he has the earnest of the Spirit—because God's love has been shed abroad in his heart—he can even glory in tribulations (5:3-5, cf. 12:12). Even bearing the cross and being crucified with Christ are his joy and glory (Gal 2:20, 6:14, Ph 3:8). Out of the richness of the grace of this fellowship he can know that all things work together for his good: that is, for his salvation, and he is persuaded that nothing can separate him from the love of God which is in Christ. There is no power that can gainsay the loving will of the eternal God (Ro 8:38-39). In every condition he proves the sufficiency of Christ's grace (e.g. 2 Co 12:9), and by prayer and supplication finds that God's peace, far surpassing all understanding of men, keeps guard over his heart and thoughts in Christ Jesus (Ph 4:7). Through faith he is kept in a hope sure and steadfast unto the final salvation which awaits him (e.g. 1 P 1:3). But the sureness of the hope does not work carelessness. 'Every one that hath this hope set on him purifieth himself even as he is pure' (1 Jn 3:3). The true believer is 'careful without care.' Moreover, the grace of our fellowship works zeal in service (1 Co 15:10). Only the Christian can enjoy perfect freedom from anxious care in order that he may devote himself fully to the work which God has given him. The past is under the blood and the future is secure in the promises of God (Tholuck). And because he sees in Christ the grand purpose of God in the redemption of the world and the security for the final accomplishment of that purpose, he cannot despair of the world any more than he can despair of himself. Because he knows the grace of Christ he can gladly accept his own lot in life, and 'in the patience of hope and the labour of love' serve and wait and watch (Lk 12³⁵, 36, 2 Co 5⁹, 10).

Christian trust is a state of heart; yet it has seemed better to lay stress upon its ground and essential significance than upon its psychological aspects. Christian joy and peace are effects of a power beyond ourselves. Only God can give them. It is our part to make sure of our union with Christ, and then to see that we receive the promise of God in vain (2 Co 6¹). The full meaning of the meaning of Christ's promise of peace is not to be had at once. The relation of such confidence in God that all our weaknesses, doubts, fears, and sins drive us to our sure Helper, the goal of perfect peace will surely be reached at last (cf. Mt 11²⁸⁻³⁰, He 4¹⁰).

TRUTH.—Apart from the adverbial phrases 'of a truth' (Mk 12³², Lk 4²⁵) and 'truly' (e.g. Mk 14⁷⁰, Lk 9²⁷ 12⁴), which are used in their ordinary colloquial sense (cf. Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 227), the only occurrence of this term in the Synoptic Gospels is in the hypocritical address of the Pharisees and Herodians to Jesus (Mt 22¹⁶, Mk 12¹⁴, Lk 20²³), where these soi-disant inquirers compliment Him on His sincerity as a teacher. Here loyalty to the truth is opposed to the disingenuous spirit that allows itself to be swayed by fear or flattery. The impression made by Jesus on His opponents was one of fearless honesty and candour; He was no casuist or time-server, and it was His recognized character of religious frankness and directness which suggested their trap. For all His sympathy, they knew He would be straightforward. They could count upon His telling dangerous and unpleasant truths, no matter what His word might cost Him. He had the courage without which truthfulness is impossible, and these Jews were cunning enough to trade upon His very virtues.

In the Fourth Gospel, however, 'truth' is used in a special, pregnant sense, characteristic of the writer and of his age. It is one of the leading categories or themes of the book, and its proportions, as well as its meaning, are entirely different from anything in the Synoptics. Occasionally, no doubt, the ordinary use of the term occurs, as in the phrases about true witness (5³¹, 32, 21²⁴), or credible statements (8¹⁴); here, as elsewhere, the word means no more than veracity, and its adjective represents 'trustworthy' (cf. 10⁴¹ with 7¹⁸ 8¹⁴, 14, 15 and 167). In Pilate's remark, 'Truth! what is truth?' (18³⁸), however, we are on the way to a more definite conception. There is, no doubt, in this scene the implied censure of a false attitude to truth, as Cowper has pointed out.—

'But what is truth?' Thus Pilate's question put To Truth itself, that dared him no reply.
And when he said, 'Will not God impart His light To them that ask it?'—Truly, His joy,
His glory and His nature, to impart,
But to the proud, uncandid, insincere,
Or negligent inquirer, not a spark.

(Task, bk. iii. l. 270).

Truth, in this passage, however, has the further connotation of speculative or abstract knowledge, and the majority of the referents of the Gospel are tinged by such. They converge on the principle that the spiritual is the real, and that the truth of human life is attainable only in relation to Christ, who is at once the true Life of God and the true means whereby men appropriate that Divine and absolute nature.

Two small linguistic problems lie at the threshold of any attempt to investigate the meaning of 'truth' in the Fourth Gospel. (a) Attempts have been made, notably by Wendt (e.g. in SK, 1883, p. 511f., and Teaching of Jesus, i. p. 259f.), to read ἀληθῆς as equivalent to 'faithfulness' or 'rectitude', on the analogy of the LXX rendering (ἀσος καὶ ἀλγῆμα) for the Hebrew original of 'grace and truth.' Certainly, in 14¹⁷, the OT antithesis is unmistakable. But, apart from the fact that χάρις is substituted for ἀσος, the author is evidently using 'truth' here in a deeper sense. The general usage of the term, as applied to God or man, cannot be 'faithfulness' or 'righteous conduct,' any more than by mere 'veracity.' Even where the OT form of expression is retained, the content and the substance of the thought are extended and intensified. (b) A cognate difficulty is occasioned by the use of two adjectives, ἀληθής and ἀληθινός, in connection with the same noun. [1904] 505, xvi. 42-43. No rigid distinction is seen them in the Gospel (note the use of ἀληθῆς and ἀληθινός were equivalent precisely to verax and verus). The latter may be translated 'true,' in the sense of real, as opposed to what is counterfeit (15¹⁹) or transient and inadequate (19⁶³² 51); but often what is true, in the sense of veracious and sincere, is thereby substantial, the sole reality amid the shadows of falsehood, just as God, who is true (cf. Field, ON iii. p. 104), as opposed to deceptive and false. ἀληθῆς is also real, in the sense of being living and true. ἀληθινός (826) and ἀληθινός (728) as the Father who has sent the Son, the former adjective is used (e.g. in 6⁵⁵) where the latter, in the sense of real or genuine, would have been equally appropriate (cf. 6⁵² 19).

Truth, in this specific sense, forms one of the nuclei of the Fourth Gospel. It is equivalent either to the knowledge of God's being and will, or to the Divine being and will itself; in other words, it represents the higher and heavenly reality of things, transcendent and absolute, and corresponds generally to light (cf. 1⁸ and 5³⁸) in its sphere and functions. Like the light, however, the truth is not an abstract entity, much less an intellectual system, to the author, but this Divine reality as manifested in the incarnate Logos, as revealed in the Son. He is the Truth (14⁶); He and it are identified (cf. 8³², 36). All else is transitory and unsubstantial. Whatever appears to compete with this truth is either counterfeit or merely relative. Jesus, as the perfect Son of God, is the final and adequate embodiment of God's saving will; and the common term for that heavenly nature, in relation to man's errors and ignorance, is the truth. But the errors and ignorance against which it has to struggle are moral rather than intellectual. It is truth to be done (3²¹), not speculation to be understood. The prerequisite for coming to the light of the Logos is a sound moral disposition, faithfulness to the light of conscience, and genuine sincerity of thought and deed. Such is the point pressed by the author of this Gospel. He was surrounded by a world which included earnest seekers for the truth (cf. 12²⁰), and so-called 'philosophers' or religious theorists, in Judaism and paganism, who refused to accept the Christian estimate of Jesus, and probably preferred Gnostic presentations of communion with God. To meet both of these contemporary currents, he states his conception of Christ as the Truth. With that Christ all truly sincere souls have an affinity, which, if allowed to develop naturally, will bring them into touch with Him. On the other hand, the objections to Christ, often paraded on intellectual grounds, are run back to moral defects, and failure to see the reality of God in Christ is attributed to some unreality of human character.

The roots of this unique conception may partly be found in Philo, but ultimately they run back to Platonism and the later Stoicism (cf. Grill, p. 204 f.), while even Egyptian theology had crowned the god Thoth with the attribute αὐτὸν ἀληθείας of the Logos (cf. Reitzenstein, Z. f. d. N. F., pp. 56, 80 f.). But the . . . the Fourth Gospel lies in its . . . conception with the historical personality of Jesus Christ. The Asiatic-Greek . . . which the book was immediately composed, learnt that He was a king of truth (18³⁶), instead of being king of some realm whose Jewish Messianic associations failed to impress Hellenic readers. This was a timely presentation of the Gospel. It was a reading of Christ's . . . which could not fail to commend itself to those for whom the more local and national associations of Judaism, or of Jewish Christianity, had lost much, if not all, of their interest and appeal. Hence the emphasis on the two realms of truth and falsehood, or of reality and unreality, which, like the cognate antithesis of light and darkness, helps to body forth the moral dualism of the Gospel. The opposition of men to Christ as the Logos is referred to their connexion with the realm of the devil (8⁴⁰), whose hereditary policy is hatred of the Divine truth. The author does not speculate on any fall of the devil, nor does he discuss the origin of this cosmic feud; he is content to trace it through history, in the practical experience of mankind. Truth and falsehood, reality and unreality, light and darkness, are set in juxtaposition. His Christ is a King of Truth. 'He reigns as Himself holy and true, by the power of the truth which He reveals—truth in the conscience, truth in the heart, and truth in the mind—and over those who, through His grace and spirit, have become fundamentally true; who stand in the eternal, abiding relationship of peace and love and holiness towards God' (Reith, The Gospel of John, ii. p. 138). The contrast between this and the realm of falsehood and unreality is moral, rather than metaphysical, for the writer, though the metaphysical basis is plain.

Hence there is a distinction between the witness borne to the truth by John the Baptist (5³⁸) and that borne by Christ (8⁴⁰ 18³⁷). The former passage (where 'the truth' is meant to cover more than its ordinary sense, although the language of the latter is employed) is in the line of 17¹³ 18³⁶. But when Jesus is said to bear witness to the truth, or to tell the truth, it is in the sense that He bears witness to Himself (8¹⁴) as the Truth. His whole Person and work are an adequate revelation of the Father's inner being. To see Him is to see the Father. His witness, therefore, consists in what may be termed His loyalty to Himself, and His devotion to that vocation of being true to God's will for which He became incarnate, and from which no fear of death could deter Him (cf. Lidgett, The Spiritual Principle of the Atonement, p. 24 f.). A further line of witness to the truth of God is afforded by those who accept the revelation of Christ (3³³). Their adhesion to the truth affords to the world fresh evidence of the truth's power; they, as it were, accredit the transcendent purpose of God by their obedience to it as the moral ideal of their life. This is indicated already in the Prologue by the words 'we beheld . . . we have all received.' Finally, there is the living witness of the Spirit of Truth (see below) in the Church, which, unlike the so-called Gnostic revelations of fresh knowledge, is ever loyal to the historical personality of Christ, and aims consistently at glorifying, instead of obscuring or diminishing, the vital significance of His life for the human soul.

This note is struck loudly and clearly at the very outset, in the Prologue: 'And the Logos became flesh and dwelt among us. And we beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth. . . . For of his fulness we have all received, even grace upon grace. For the law was given through Moses: grace and truth came through Jesus Christ' (Jn 1¹⁴ 16 17). Here, just as the conception of the Truth is subordinated to that of the Way in 14^{5,6}, the aspect of grace controls that of truth. . . . in this definition, is not the arduous . . . of man's soul, stretching up wistfully to communion with God, but the gracious revelation of God to men through the Person of Jesus Christ; the initiative is on God's side; and the Divine nature, in its absolute reality, is mediated for the soul by Christ alone, not by any number of theosophic æons. All that either the OT economy or contemporary Gnosticism could offer the soul was a partial disclosure of God's inner being. Time-honoured and plausible as rival methods might be, they were at best imperfect. The full revelation was in Christ as the Logos or Son of God par excellence, the Truth of God, and therefore of man, amid shadows and appearances. He is the revealer, or rather the revelation Himself. His personality is the sum and substance of that Divine essence which He alone can communicate in all its fulness to believing men, and through which men realize themselves fully. He is the true way to life. The author emphasizes this central and primary conception on two lines. Not only does he change the 'mercy' of the Gr. OT into 'grace,'—a change which is all the more significant that this great Pauline term never recurs in the Gospel,—but the companion idea of truth (cf. Ex 34⁸) is expanded from faithfulness or veracity to what a modern might describe as the absolute character of the Divine Being, an inner, heavenly reality, or rather the Reality, which Christ alone (1¹⁸) could disclose. The 'truth' of God is thus neither information to be gained, nor dogmas to be . . . revealed, but is at once personal and rule or initiative. It is God Himself manifesting His essential life to the faith and need of man. As Maurice once put it, 'Truth must be a person seeking us, if we are to seek him.'

While this mission and ministry of the truth have reached their climax in the brief earthly life of Jesus, the latter phase was only its final, not its first manifestation. Like the Light, the Truth has been in the world prior to its absolute revelation and embodiment in Christ the Logos (3^{20,21}). In all ages, and from all quarters (cf. 18³⁷), Christ draws to Himself those who practise the truth. In the OT and elsewhere (Jos 2¹⁴ [LXX], Ps-Sol 17¹⁷ with Æos, cf. Ps 83¹²) this phrase means simply to deal truly or to act sincerely, according to the context. The author of this Gospel, however, follows his usual method of putting into such phrases a deeper and specific content, so that here it denotes rather the active exercise and practical manifestation by good people of what corresponds to God's real character. To practise the truth is a synonym for doing works in God (3²¹). This is independent of nationality. It is also evidently intended to cover the pre-Christian era; or rather, according to this Gospel, the history of humanity, prior to the coming of Christ, was not wholly out of touch with the true Spirit and Life of God (1^{5,9}). The present . . . taken along with a remark like that of 18³⁷ . . . one that is of the truth heareth my voice', suggests a view of paganism similar to that of Ro 2¹². Furthermore, it implies that men grasp this 'truth' of God by the exercise of their entire moral nature. The reality of God, as Spirit and as Personal Life, cannot be known except by real men, by those whose character is real to the core. The conditions of that personal knowledge are singleness of mind, purity of conscience, and openness of heart. It is the exercise of these that brings a man into permanent touch with the reality of the Divine nature as manifested in Christ. The locus classicus for this profound conception is 7¹⁷; although the term 'truth' does not occur there, the identification of disinterestedness and candour with the genuine spirit of truth (cf. 7¹⁸) shows that the idea was in the writer's mind.

This inwardness, with its corollary of freedom from national or local cults, is brought out with especial clearness in the well-known definition of Christian worship (4^{23, 24}), where truth is associated with spirit. In contrast to external and ritual worship, the genuine worshipper must approach God inwardly; it is like to like, as in 3²⁴. The spiritual is the inward, the real. As God's nature is such, His worshippers must correspond to Him; and if worship is offered in the spirit, it is thereby genuine. A similar antithesis to the symbolic and unsubstantial worship of the OT underlies 17¹⁷, where truth, in a certain abstract sense, denotes the eternal reality of the Divine nature as revealed to men, the ideal or truth of life realized in Christ, and through Him in His people. By His consecration of Himself to the fulfilment of this purpose of revelation, Christ makes it possible for His disciples to be consecrated to God's service—a consecration which, as the double meaning of the term allows, implies personal purification from the transient world, which is superior to the OT ritual. Positively, it denotes an adherence to the cause of God. His name and His truth are the same. They represent the reality of the Divine revelation in Christ, with the twofold antithesis, running through the entire Gospel, between this final revelation and the inadequate OT religion on the one hand, and contemporary philosophic or theosophic speculations about truth on the other.

A further application of this freedom, inherent in the absolute and inward character of the Christian revelation, occurs in the debate (cf. Peyton, Memorabilia of Jesus, p. 446 f.) between Jesus and the Jews in 8³¹—a passage which reproduces the great Pauline ideas of Gal 3⁷⁻⁵, although redemption as usual is included under the aspect of revelation, rather than vice versa. The effects of truth, when received by men, are here described summarily as freedom (8³²). The argument is this. As the Father seeks true worshippers, whose note is spirituality, so the Son seeks true disciples, whose characteristic is loyal adherence to His teaching, i.e. to Himself (cf. 8^{32, 39}) as the revelation of the Father. Adherence or obedience of this kind yields a knowledge of God's real nature; it initiates men into the true purpose and mind of the Father, and invests them with the Divine nature itself (17²). Their knowledge, that is to say, is not a process of abstract learning. There is no intellectualism about it. It is not a mastery of theosophic principles or subtle theories, but participation in a personal life. And contact with this brings a verve and independence into life, a simplicity and a reality, a freedom from bondage and legalism, which can be attained only by a nature whose capacities are set free to realize themselves fully. In another aspect, freedom may be considered as deliverance from sin; although such a reference is not excluded even in 8³², it is definitely suggested in 17¹⁹, where participation in the Divine life is made to involve personal purification, through the death of Christ. 'What men needed was to be sanctified, that is, to be consecrated to God. It was not in their power—surely no reason can be conceived for this, but that which lies in their sin—to consecrate themselves, and what they were not able to do for themselves Christ did for them in His own person. He consecrated Himself to God in His death' (Denney, The Death of Christ, p. 269).

A third aspect of this inward and absolute knowledge of God in Christ is presented in the conception of the Spirit or Paraclete throughout the closing chapters (14-17). Considered under the category of a liberating power, these references to the function of the Spirit of Truth (which, it is curious to recollect, were applied to Mohammed by Mohammedan divines) may be defined as a presentation of the liberating effect of the truth, as opposed to traditional and antiquarian views of Jesus which, even within the Church, might restrict the full appreciation of His Person. The author had to meet a twofold danger, and he chose to state his new conception of Christ and Christianity in the form of a Gospel, not of a treatise or an Epistle. One reason for this, as he suggests in the sayings reproduced in 15²⁶ and 16¹³, is his heartfelt conviction that the Person of Christ is the sum and substance of the Divine revelation, and that no fresh statements or new views, such as those pro-present by implication in the words and works of the incarnate Logos. The deeper interpretation of Christ, with which he came forward to meet the requirement of a later age, is none other than a fresh discovery of latent truths in Christ. The influence of the Spirit on the consciousness of the Church is not directed to the manufacture of independent oracles or to the task of striking out original additions to the revelation of Christ, which would render the latter, in any sense, superfluous or inferior. The test of all such revelation is their loyalty to the historic Person of the Logos. The Spirit of Truth, bestowed by Christ upon His Church (14¹⁶), recalls to the mind of all true disciples the bearing and meaning of Christ's own teachings; 'he shall bear witness of me . . . he shall guide you into all the truth (for a different reading in Jerome, etc., cf. Nestle's Einführung 2, p. 98), for he shall not speak from himself . . . he shall glorify me, for he shall take of mine, and shall declare it unto you' (cf. Bruce, The Training of the Twelve, pp. 376 f., 418 f.). This great definition of the right and limitations of true freedom of movement within the Christian consciousness, safeguarded alike against the abuses of Gnostic speculation and the disinclination to advance beyond Jewish-Christian, or rigidly Messianic, interpretation of Christ's Person which had been promulgated by the first generation of the disciples. To know Christ after the flesh was far from exhausting the significance of His Person. His Spirit, i.e. His living presence in the Christian Church and consciousness, had still more to unfold of truth and grace. Hence one privilege of being in contact with this 'Truth,' as embodied in Christ, is that disciples, no longer in touch with the earthly Jesus, are fitted to adapt it to varying conditions, to see it in ever fresh bearings, and to apply it with inexhaustible power, while at the same time they preserve its essential meaning. Their training in it, so far from involving any disloyalty to it, is a part of their fidelity to its principles.

'They who follow the Spirit's guidance will not receive an illumination enabling them to dispense with truth, but the enablement to lay hold of truth. . . . On the one hand, the Truth given in Christ will need from age to age His expounding to unlock its stores; and, on the other hand, the faith in Him and His office in the present shall never loosen men from the Gospel given once for all, or draw them away from the eternal Father, by enabling any voice born only of the present to seem wholly Divine. Standing fast in the unchanging Truth, and an endless progress in taking knowledge of it shall be indissolubly united' (Hort, The Way, the Truth, and the Life, p. 58 f.).

Thus, while the author carefully and stringently safeguards the future revelations of religious truth by limiting them to the sphere of the historical Logos, he contributes fresh advances in the extension of the Church (17²⁰). Revelations in the future, and of the future, fall within the scope of the Spirit of Truth. The latter is not fettered by the past. This prophetic function of the Spirit may seem rather one-sided (so Beyschlag, NT Theol. i. 282) as compared with its ethical presentation in Paul. But it is in line with the Synoptic tradition, where the Spirit is primarily, if not entirely, a spirit of witness; more ethical aspect, is at least suggested in the context (cf. 14^{16, 17}). The truth or reality of the Divine life, at any rate, includes the future (cf. Ps 25⁵ [LXX]); as indeed it must, if God's purpose is a developing plan throughout history and experience, and if this truth or reality is personal. For as a personality it ex hypothesi full of resources and surprises, the richer is its life. Its spirit must be a perennial self-expression, conditioned only by the receptivity of men. Consequently the aim of the Spirit, in these allusions to the progressive witness of the Spirit of Truth, in the future and of the future, is to prevent loyalty to the historic essence of Christianity from degenerating into stagnant adherence to an institution or a creed. What Jesus said, as Cyprian used to insist, was: 'I am the Truth,' not, 'I am Tradition.' Christ is God's last Word to the world. But, as the writer strikingly implies in the phrase, 'The Spirit shall guide you into all the truth,' the full interpretation of that Word was not attained by the primitive generation of the disciples. They had no monopoly of it. 'Most friends of truth,' said Vincent, 'were it as Frederick the Great loved music. It used to be said of him that, strictly speaking, he was not fond of music but of the flute, and not indeed fond of the flute but of his flute.' It is to prevent any religious aberration of this kind that such words of the Fourth Gospel are put forward. They express the spirit of Christ's revelation, which cannot be held by a trivial or narrow life, any more than it can be selfishly grasped or adequately weighed by the most advanced age of Christendom.

The Spirit of Truth in the Fourth Gospel is notably by Westcott and Oscar Holtzmann. Besides the special essays of Wendt (see above) and of H. J. TURNING.—1. The Gospel terms.—In EV of the Gospels the vbs. 'turn,' 'convert' represent no fewer than 8 different Gr. words. The ordinary terms, and the ones we have almost exclusively to do with in the following article, are στρέφω and ἐπιστρέφω (whence ἐπιστροφή, 'conversion,' in Ac 15³). In addition to these we find (each, however, used only once in the Gospels) ἀποστρέφω (Mt 5⁴²), ὑποστρέφω (Lk 2⁴⁸), ἀναχωρέω (Mt 2²²), ἀνακλινέω (Lk 10⁶), ἀποβαίνω (21¹³), γίνομαι (Jn 16²⁰)—all associated with the idea of turning, and rendered by 'turn' either in AV or RV.

(1) Literal turning.—Both στρέφω and ἐπιστρέφω are used in this sense. Once στρέφω occurs transitively, where Jesus bids His disciples, when smitten on the right cheek, turn the other to the smiter (Mt 5³⁹). Both vbs. frequently occur in the passive form, but with a reflexive or middle meaning, to denote the turning of oneself round. Usually it is Jesus Himself who thus turns round (στροφῆς, ἐπιστροφῆς), to look for someone (e.g. Mk 5⁴⁰, Lk 22⁶¹), or to address some pointed word to those who follow (e.g. Mt 16²³, Lk 9⁵⁵).

(2) Figurative or spiritual turning.—In this sense both στρέφω and ἐπιστρέφω are employed, but the former only once (Mt 18³). The noun ἐπιστροφή, corresponding to ἐπιστρέφω in its spiritual sense, does not occur in the Gospels, and is found only in Ac 15³. Both in the Gospels and elsewhere in the NT the AV frequently renders these vbs., when they denote a spiritual turning, by 'convert,' and in Ac 15³ it renders ἐπιστροφή by 'conversion.' RV retains 'conversion' in the last-mentioned passage, and 'convert' in Ja 5^{19, 20} (where the vb. is active and transitive—'convert a sinner'); but otherwise it has substituted 'turn' for 'convert'—a wise course, in view of the fact that in modern religious speech 'conversion' has come to be used in a conventional sense that does not always correspond to the meaning of the original. In another important respect the RV has corrected a wrong impression produced by the AV renderings. The latter, through the influence of the Vg., has rendered not only uses the vb. 'convert,' but also the reflexive στρέφειν, ἐπιστρέφειν as if they were genuine passives, and instead of 'turn' has 'be converted.' A still more glaring mistranslation appears in the quotation from Is 6¹⁰ [LXX] given in Mt 13¹⁵, Jn 12⁴⁰, Ac 28²⁷ (cf. Mk 4¹²). In Is 6¹⁰ AV, correctly enough, has 'lest they convert'—'convert' in the time of King James being used intransitively. But in the NT passages, though the Gr. vb., except in Jn 12⁴⁰, is in the active form, just as in the LXX, the 'convert' of Isaiah is changed into 'be converted.' Both in the last-mentioned passages and in those cases in which, in accordance with the ordinary usage, the vbs. though passive in form are certainly reflexive in meaning, RV has changed the 'be converted' of AV into 'turn' (see Mt 13¹⁵ 18³, Mk 4¹², Lk 22³², Jn 12⁴⁰, Ac 3¹⁹ 28²⁷). It is with this spiritual turning or 'conversion' that we shall be occupied in the remainder of the article.

2. The NT facts.—(1) So far as the term 'turn' or 'convert' is concerned, the Gospels can hardly be said to afford sufficient data for a doctrine of conversion in the modern sense of the word. In Mt 13¹⁵, Mk 4¹², Jn 12⁴⁰ an OT prophecy (Is 6¹⁰) is referred to; but both in its original use and its NT application it is a national rather than an individual turning that is meant. Again, the notable passage, Mt 18³ 'Except ye turn, and become as little children,' etc., though often taken as a fundamental utterance of our Lord on the subject of conversion, can hardly be used for this purpose when read in the light of the context. For it was addressed directly to the Twelve at a time long subsequent to their call to the Apostolate; and, with the exception of Judas, who will venture to say that the Apostles at this period were 'unconverted' men? Moreover, the turning which Jesus demanded of them was not that absolute turning from sin in order to follow Himself which the word 'conversion' is used to denote, but a turning from those foolish, unworthy ambitions which had just prompted the question, 'Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?' (v. 1), and a recognition of the truth that in God's Kingdom humility is the real badge of greatness. Similarly, when our Lord says to Peter, 'When once thou hast turned again (AV 'When thou art converted'), establish thy brethren' (Lk 22³²), it seems evident that the Apostle did not lack conversion in the technical meaning of the word, but that he was being summoned beforehand to a fresh and more devoted return to his Master's service after his fall.

When we pass to Acts, however, we do find ἐπιστρέφω and ἐπιστροφή in a sense that corresponds to the familiar use of the term 'conversion.' When St. Peter, preaching to the multitude in Solomon's Porch, says, 'Repent ye therefore, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out' (Ac 3¹⁹), the turning he demands is . . . the kind of turning that conversion implies. When it is said of the inhabitants of Lydda that they 'turned to the Lord' (9³⁶), it is their conversion that is referred to. So likewise at Antioch, when 'a great number that believed turned unto the Lord' (11²¹); and when Paul and Barnabas preached to the people of Lystra that they should 'turn from these vain things unto the living God' (14¹⁵); and again when the same Apostles passed through Phoenicia and Samaria 'declaring the conversion of the Gentiles,' and causing great joy unto all the brethren (15³; see, further, v. 19 26^{18, 20}).

In the Epistles the use of the figure of turning to denote the great spiritual change that constitutes a man a Christian is infrequent; but we have it in 2 Co 3¹⁶, and notably in 1 Th 1⁹ 'How ye turned unto God from idols, to serve a living and true God.' And this use of the word 'turn,' we must remember, was not only a natural figure to denote a great spiritual transformation, but one that was especially familiar to every pious Jew. The prophetic writings are full of it. And nowhere, whether in the OT or the NT, is there a finer expression of the idea than in the words of Deutero-Isaiah: 'Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts: and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon' (Is 55⁷; cf. 6¹⁰, Ps 51¹³, Jer 3¹⁴, Ezk 33¹¹, Hos 12⁶, Jl 2¹², Zec 1³).

(2) But we are not confined to the terms for 'turning' in the NT, in seeking there for the fact of conversion. The reality itself is everywhere in evidence. In the ministry of our Lord, Himself; we have manifest cases of conversion in the sinful woman in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7^{47ff.}), in Zacchaeus the publican of Jericho (19^{8ff.}), in the penitent robber on the cross (23^{42, 43}). The parable of the Prodigal Son (15^{11ff.}), who 'came to himself' and then returned to his father, is a parable of conversion. And what are those great appeals that Jesus constantly makes for a taking up of the cross in order to follow Him, Mt 10³⁸ etc., for a willingness to lose one's life in order to find it (10^{31, 32}, 16²³, 18^{8, 9}), for a 'hating' of one's dearest friends in order to be His disciple (Lk 14²⁶)—but a demand for conversion, even though the figure of turning is not employed?

In the story of the Apostolic Church, again, we have constant illustrations of the great spiritual change—the 3000 souls brought into the Church on the day of Pentecost (Ac 2⁴¹), and those who thereafter were added to them day by day (v. 47); the results that everywhere followed the preaching of the word, whether by the lips of evangelists (8^{5, 6, 12}, 11^{21, 24}) or Apostles (9³⁵, 10⁴⁴, 14¹ etc.); the striking individual cases of the Ethiopian eunuch (8³⁷), Cornelius (10^{44ff.}, 11¹³), Lydia of Thyatira (16^{14f.}), and the jailer of Philippi (v. 30ff.). Above all, we have the case of St. Paul himself—the most typical and remarkable example the world has ever seen of that complete and conscious turning of the soul which we name conversion (9^{3ff.}, 22^{6ff.}, 26^{12ff.}).

(3) Once more, the fact of conversion is brought before us in the teaching of the Epistles, and above all in the Pauline Epistles, by the employment of other figures than that of turning. For it is evidently conversion that is described by the putting off of the old man and the putting on of the new (Col 3⁹), by the transition from a world of darkness to a kingdom of light (Ro 13¹², Eph 5⁸, Col 1¹³, 1 Jn 1^{7, 25}), by the ideas of a crucifixion of the old self (Ro 6⁶), an awaking out of sleep (Eph 5¹⁴), and even a rising from the dead with a view to walking in newness of life (ib., Ro 6⁴). This last figure of a rising from the dead reminds us how near conversion as a forthputting of the human will approaches to regeneration as an act of the Divine Spirit, and so brings us to consider the subject in its larger doctrinal relations.

3. The Christian doctrine.—Properly speaking, conversion as we use the word is a modern and popular rather than a Scriptural or theological term; but, while its inexactness leads sometimes to its being misapplied, it is nevertheless a convenient word to denote the conscious side of that change by which a man becomes a Christian. In considering it, then, on it we may think (1) of its nature; (2) of its particular contents; and (3) of its typical modes.

(1) The essential nature of conversion.—There is a very frequent misconception, according to which conversion is thought of as a passive experience rather than an active energizing of the human will. We have often heard it said, for example, that someone 'has got converted.' Most, if not all, of the blame for this incorrect use of the word must be laid at the door of the AV, with its 'be converted' instead of 'turn.' The Greek lends no support to the idea of a passive conversion. If we turn to 5^{20, 26}, where the reference is to the action, it is the power, but of the human preacher or teacher who mediates the message of salvation), there is not a single case in the NT where the word for conversion is so employed as to suggest that it is wrought upon a man from without. Conversion is an act of the man himself that is so described; the turning is a self-turning, a human and moral, not a supernatural and metaphysical change.

This, of course, is not to deny that there are other figures in the NT which represent the process of becoming a Christian: regeneration, for example, carried through by the operation of a Divine power. The new birth (Jn 3^{3ff.}), the new creation (2 Co 5¹⁷, Gal 6¹⁵), the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost (Tit 3⁵), all point to another side of the matter. But what we have to notice here is that, as distinguished from regeneration, conversion at all events is always represented as a work and a duty the full responsibility for which is laid upon man.

When we come to consider the precise relations between conversion and regeneration, we pass into a difficult region where questions are raised which, as Professor Laidlaw has said, it has been the habit of theologians to avoid. 'Reformed theology presents no reasoned connexion between regeneration in the stricter sense and conversion with its fruits' (Bib. Doct. of Man, 266). And for lack of a reasoned and definite theory, or even of a careful study of the NT teaching, the figure of regeneration has very commonly been overworked, while the moral side of the change involved in becoming a Christian has been neglected. But, while it is Scriptural to say that when a man becomes a Christian a mysterious Divine work has been effected within him, it is equally Scriptural to say (and Scripture says it much oftener) that we become Christians by our own free choice, and that the power of deciding whether we are to be Christ's disciples or not rests with ourselves. Thus we are brought face to face with the larger problem of the relation between human freedom and the Divine will, and can only say here that in the NT regeneration and conversion come before us as one and the same process, looked at from the Divine and the human side respectively, but looked at as essentially a moral rather than a metaphysical change. Men are born of the Spirit, but they must turn if they are to enter into the Kingdom of God. 'This my son was dead,' exclaimed the father of the Prodigal, 'and I have seen a miracle of Divine grace in his son's return. But that heavenly mystery had its human counterpart, that miracle of grace its moral coefficient; for the Prodigal had turned away from the Father and he arose and came to his father.' See, ibid., art. REGENERATION.

(2) The particular elements of conversion.—When we analyze conversion, two elements show themselves; for two moments are involved in every act of turning: there is a turning from and a turning to. This conversion is a turning from self, the world, and sin; and a turning to God in Christ. But these are just the two moral acts which in the NT are commonly designated by the names 'repentance' and 'faith.' And so it seems proper to say that repentance and faith are the elements that go to make up conversion. And this is confirmed when we find that in the record of the Apostolic preaching conversion or turning is associated with repentance on the one hand and faith on the other. 'Repent ye therefore, and turn again' is the point to which St. Peter brings his sermon in Solomon's Porch (Ac 3¹⁹); and St. Paul's claim, as he stands before King Agrippa, is that he has declared alike to Jew and Gentile 'that they should repent and turn to God' (26²⁰). On the other hand, we read of the Greeks of Antioch that 'a great number that believed turned unto the Lord' (11²¹). Corresponding again with this separate presentation of the two sides of conversion, is the fact that St. Paul combines the two when he says to the elders of the Ephesian Church, as he sums up his ministry among them, that both to Jews and Greeks his testimony has been this: 'repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ac 20²¹). Much has been written on the question whether in conversion repentance comes before faith, or faith before repentance. From the point of view of theory it is a somewhat barren discussion; and when we come to practice, the fact appears to be that in the conscious experience of the soul faith rises into more immediate prominence in some cases and repentance in others. But what is of importance is to note that in conversion both are inextricably joined together in the unity of a complex but single moral act.

(3) The modes or types of conversion.—(a) Two strongly contrasted types meet us in the NT and in the whole history of Christian experience. The one is marked by deep contrition for sin—contrition that amounts in some cases to a positive agony of mental distress. From the other the element of pain and contrition is almost wholly absent; it consists in a joyful and unclouded acceptance of the love of God as revealed in the face of Jesus Christ. St. Paul and the jailer of Philippi are representatives of the violent and painful type of conversion—reproduced in the later history of the Church in the experience of such men as Augustine and Bunyan. Cornelius, the Ethiopian eunuch, and Lydia 'the seller of purple,' may stand, perhaps, for the gentler and simply trustful type—forerunners of multitudes like them in every subsequent age. Theologically the difference between these two types might be accounted for by saying that as repentance and faith are the two elements that go to make up conversion, in the one case repentance is more prominent, and in the other faith. For while it is true that repentance is primarily a change of mind, and is not to be confounded with the mere feeling of sorrow on account of sin, yet repentance is at all events that side of conversion which represents the soul's backward and downward look, just as faith is the aspect of it in which the soul looks forward and upward. And so contrition for the sorrowful past, even while it must be distinguished from true repentance, is yet in certain ways a very natural accompaniment. The full explanation, however, of the differences between these two types of conversion must be sought from psychology rather than theology, in the field of experience and not in that of doctrinal theory. They are due for the most part to diversities in natural temperament, in personal history, in religious education, and especially in the prevailing atmosphere of religious thought and belief. Professor Henry Drummond, remarking on the fact that in his wide experience as an evangelist he had never met with conversions of the agonizing type so common in the history of the Church, raised the question whether such conversions are not in some way have been artificially produced.

The latter view is startling; but considered in the light of Jn 16¹³ it may have the kernel of truth in it. For the Holy Spirit has led the Church of our time into new and larger views regarding the revelation of God in Christ; and the comparative infrequency of a once familiar type of conversion is probably due to the fact that, without surrendering their belief in the reality and heinousness of sin, both the Christian evangelist and his hearers have gained a better understanding of all that is involved in the Fatherhood of God and the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

(b) Two other well-known and strongly contrasted types are those of sudden and gradual or, as it is sometimes called, natural conversion. Of the former the NT affords numerous examples; indeed, nearly all the NT conversions are evidently sudden in their mode. It does not follow, however, that we should take this to be the ordinary, much less the only legitimate type. In NT times it lay in the nature of the case that conversion should be sudden. The gospel made its appeal at first to those who had grown up in a world ruled by principles the very opposite of those of the Divine Kingdom, and the transition from either Judaism or paganism to Christianity was bound to be of the nature of an absolute and sudden break. And such conversions, of course, are common still, in Christian lands as well as in the mission field,—in the case of those who find themselves standing face to face at last with the Christ of whom they have never heard before, or of whom they have never rightly thought, or whose grace, though long familiar enough, they have hitherto deliberately resisted. Then constantly there takes place, as Henry Drummond said, 'an experience which words are not allowed to utter—a something like the sudden snapping of a chain, the waking from a dream' (Nat. Law in the Spir. World, 94).

It is different in the case of those who from infancy have been brought up under the nurturing care of the Christian Church and a Christian home, and who have almost unconsciously been responding to this nurtural treatment. Timothy suggests to us an example in NT times of gradual or nurtural conversion (Ac 16¹, 1 Ti 1⁸); though it was through St. Paul's teaching, no doubt, that his early training blossomed into the flower of a rich personal faith (1 Co 4¹⁷). In later times nurtural conversions become common; and under ideal conditions of Christian education they may be regarded as the normal type. When one has been born in a Christian home, dedicated to Christ in infancy, surrounded continually by a Christian atmosphere, and so has learned 'from a child' to know and love and follow Jesus, a sudden and startling conversion is not to be looked for. Christians with such a history can seldom tell the day and hour of their conversion. And yet the name of 'conversion' is not to be withheld from certain experiences that have usually come into such lives. For the unconscious Christianity of childhood needs to be transformed into the conscious Christianity of developed character. There may be no day and hour that can be named, but there is generally a period when the first instinctive obedience pass into the deliberate attitude of the surrendered will.

Modern students of the psychology of religious experience have proved to how large an extent what we call 'conversion' is associated with those physiological and psychological changes that belong to the transition from childhood to dawning manhood or womanhood. This transition is not a sudden process, not a thing of a day or an hour. It covers a considerable period, but in that period a momentous work is going on. And in those days there comes to every young man or woman has been well nurtured a new feeling of the reality and mystery of life, and a fresh sense also of the possibilities that life offers of good as well as of evil. The old Greek stories about the parting of the ways and the choice of youth are not only true, but have a special Christian significance. Even those who have learned from childhood to love and honour Christ as their Saviour and Lord do not escape the need for a critical decision. When the time comes for taking up the free development of character, Jesus Christ stands at the parting of the ways; and though He knows of very many that they have been following Him hitherto, He asks whether they are going to forsake Him now or follow Him still. When a young heart replies, like Simon Peter of old (Jn 6^{67c}), 'Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life,' that heart has turned consciously and deliberately to Christ. Of such conversions there are multitudes; for in order to conversion a soul does not need to be violently plucked up by the roots and transplanted to another soil. It is enough if, as the flower does, it turns joyfully to Christ, as the flower turns to follow the pathway of the sun.

(c) The question is sometimes raised whether it is possible for a man to be converted more than once; and point is given to the inquiry by the fact that in the night in which He was betrayed the Lord said to Peter, 'When once thou has turned again (AV 'when thou art converted'), stablish thy brethren' (Lk 22³²). It is impossible, however, to suppose that that process of conversion which is the full equivalent on the human side for the Divine act of regeneration is an experience that can be repeated. And in the case of St. Peter, it is evident from the Gospels that the definite yielding of his will to Christ took place at the beginning of the Lord's ministry, and not after the ministry was ended. But these words of Jesus to His Apostle suggest that while conversion in the express and primary sense can be experienced only once, there are secondary conversions, of one kind or another, that may fall within the compass of a true Christian life. One such is when a Christian man, as in Peter's case, has fallen into grievous sin, but repents and turns to Christ again, not only 'with grief and hatred of his sin,' but with a fuller purpose of new obedience than he ever cherished before. This is that repentance of a Christian man which St. Paul describes in 2 Co 7¹¹—a repentance which may work in him such indignation against himself, such vehement desire to make amends for his backsliding, and as it were to be 'avenged' upon it, that he may become in many respects a stronger Christian than he was before, and thus better able to stablish and strengthen his brethren. Another type of secondary conversion is when a man, without the quickening spur of repentance for some great backsliding, comes to a fuller realization of Christ's claim upon him for the costliest and best he has to give, and so makes a fresh and higher departure in the Christian life, a departure that is deliberate and definite, and thus may properly be described as a turning. In ways like these there may be several conversions or spiritual turning-points in a Christian's history—zigzags, so to speak, on the steep ascending path upon which he made his definite entrance when he first turned to Christ, with full consciousness, as the Lord and Master of his life.

TYRE (for many common features, see SIDON).—The most noted district and city of Phœnicia, the city being 40 miles N.W. of Capernaum in Galilee. Its name is simply the 'Rock,' from two rocks in the sea—a larger and a smaller—a mile distant from the shore, lying parallel therewith, about 3000 feet in length, and containing some 150 acres. This 'Rock,' as a breakwater, early invited mariners, and ultimately furnished the elements of two harbours,—the Sidonian, north; and to the south the Egyptian, now long filled with sand. It served also as a fortress, as well as a treasure-house for the merchandise that there was stored for trans-shipment between East and West. Old Tyre was the residential portion, extending at times for 5 miles along the shore.

As early as the monuments of Egypt and the Amarna tablets, Tyre is mentioned with Sidon as a locality of note. Its daring sailors had mastered the art of sailing the open sea by the stars, thus outdoing rivals who as yet had to steer by sight of land, and anchor at night. In the height of their power Tyrian merchantmen frequented every Mediterranean port, sailing the Atlantic to the tin mines of Britain, and even perhaps circumnavigating Africa.

In the middle of the 7th cent. B.C. Ashurbanipal laid siege to Tyre and, after a long and bloody siege, he captured the land city. Alexander the Great, in 332 B.C., besieged Tyre for seven months, at the end of which he completely subdued it. Under the Romans it was in a state of decay, morally as well as otherwise. To-day it clings to the rock, a community of some 4000, a stagnant Arab village of fisher-folk.

As the conflict between the authorities and Jesus waxed to the murder-point, the masses of the people flocked to Him all the more. St. Mark (3⁹) paints the mixed throng on the banks of Gennesaret as coming from all points of the compass, including a curious Gentile multitude from 'about Tyre and Sidon.' St. Luke's specification (8¹⁷) is not so extensive, but, true to his breadth of interest, portrays 'a great multitude of the people from . . . the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon,' while St. Matthew (4²³) is oblivious to such. Compared with the disbelief of Jesus' hearers and kin in Galilee, Tyre should stand immeasurably above those of greater light and opportunities, but of less susceptibility and response to the same (Mt 11^{21c}). Guilt and condemnation are relative. When Jesus had had to break with the carnally-minded populace that desired only an insurrectionary leader and temporal king. He retired for intensive instruction of the Twelve to the parts of Tyre (15²¹ ||); and there it was that there was found and shown to them a rudimentary, but for all that a potent, faith in an apparently pagan heart. See SYROPHOENICIAN WOMAN. WILBUR FLETCHER STEELE.

U

UBIQUITY.—See OMNIPRESENCE.

UNBELIEF.—The ἀπιστία of belief, incredulity. In respect of the term implies absence of faith, credence refused to religious tenets. Infidelity, in its sense of want of faith or belief, is a synonym; not, however, scepticism, for the latter word is more properly used of the indecision of the reflective mind. Nor is disbelief an exact synonym; disbelief suggests rather the failure of belief; unbelief implies deliberate and positive rejection. Unbeliever is open to conviction; the one who disbelieves is convinced (at all events for the time being) of the inadequacy of proofs submitted, of the improbability or impossibility of that which is proposed for acceptance. In the one case the explanation may point to want of knowledge; in the other the exercise of the reasoning faculty, even on acquaintance, if imperfect, with the subject in issue.

Illustrations in the Gospels.—The term rendered 'unbelief' is the noun ἀπιστία (occurring 5 times: Mt 13⁵⁸ 17²⁰, Mk 6⁶ 9²⁴ 16¹⁴), with a range of meaning between distrust and disbelief. There is the use of the verb πιστεύω with the objective (οὐ) or subjective (οὐκ) negative; occasionally the intensive (οὐδέν) is used with: here again varying shades of significance are observable. Four times (Mk 16^{11, 16}, Lk 24^{11, 41}) the verb ἀπιστέω occurs; and in each case the 'disbelieve' of RV suggests that it is used absolutely. It may be remarked generally that the questions at issue differ, and that there are differences in regard to mental attitude.

(a) In the Synoptics.—Jesus is on a visit to 'his own country.' If Lk 4¹⁶ refers to a previous visit (which is unlikely), He will seek once more to win His fellow-townsmen when (Mt 13^{53, 54}, Mk 6^{1, 2}) He takes His stand in the synagogue at Nazareth. They are, indeed, astonished at His wisdom: the reports of mighty works done by Him have filled them with amazement; but they are little disposed to give a patient and sympathetic hearing to one of whom they themselves have known so much, and withal nothing that has augured greatness. His claims scandalize them. They reject His teaching and Himself. 'And he marvelled,' διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν αὐτῶν (Mk 6⁶); it became evident that 'a Divine "cannot" answers to a Divine "must"' (Westcott). If the unbelief manifested on that occasion amounted to a positive disbelief, it was certainly not consequent on prolonged and serious reflexion. Adverse opinions were precipitated by bias; those who were swayed by prejudice were quick to disallow. And this unbelief of prejudice is again met with in the case of elders and chief priests and scribes as they question Jesus in their council (Lk 22⁶⁶⁻⁶⁸). The reply which comes from Him is significant: 'If I tell you, ye will not believe' (οὐ μὴ πιστεύσητε); in the face of hostile and preconceived opinion further speaking would be to no purpose.

A group of passages may be taken next where the unbelief illustrated is, generally speaking, that of incredulity. But the incredulity is diverse: its explanations point to reasonable distrust, want of receptiveness, power of discernment overcome for the time being by various emotions, knowledge limited, inability to apprehend that which is outside the sphere of previous experience. Thus Lk 24¹¹ (καὶ ἠπίστουν αὐταῖς): where reports brought by the women are discredited as idle tales by disciples unable to grasp the idea of a life lived under new conditions. Their doubt becomes assurance; but the sudden gladness told of in Lk 24⁴¹ (ἀπιστοῦντων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ τῆς χαρᾶς) renders it impossible to rise to a full apprehension of what is still the Despondency lies in the ἀπιστία of the ἀπιστοῦντων referred to in the Second Gospel (Mk 16^{11, 13}); a despondency which, because yielded to, has sunk into a state of disbelief, and to be convinced. The thought here is of that stolid unbelief in which the heart is hardened and the mind unresponsive to spiritual truth (Mk 16¹⁴). And this incredulity of apathetic minds is perhaps noticeable in the attitude which 'the priests and the scribes and the elders' had adopted in the case of John the Baptist (cf. Mt 21²³⁻²⁷, Mk 11²⁷⁻³³).

If, on the one hand, there is an incredulity which Jesus reproves (Mk 16¹⁴), so, on the other hand, there is an incredulity which He not merely sanctions but enjoins. He makes large demands for faith, trust, belief; what He will not have is that mere incredulity which bespeaks the inert mind, that superficiality which is ready to assent to anything. There is surely a depth and width of meaning in the μὴ πιστεύσητε addressed to the disciples in His recorded predictions (Mt 24²³, Mk 13²¹); and the warning against false Messiahs may be regarded as a warning against perverted notions of Divine conceptions of religion. By implication, a demand is made that tests be applied, discrimination exercised. The reality of faith will then manifest itself in the deliberate rejection (disbelief) of whatever does not bear the hall-mark of eternal truth. 'Religion is belief—surely it requires little thought to see that religion is, or should be, belief in what is true' (A. T. Lyttelton).

There is an unbelief which is indicative of a want of knowledge. But along with it there is the desire to know, to rise to a fuller apprehension of that whereof already there is the dim perception. Faith shines out in it; faith which, up to a certain point, is strong, and which can even declare itself openly; at the same time there is a profound consciousness of infirmity and limitations. And this is strikingly exemplified in the father of the demoniac boy (Mk 9¹⁴⁻²⁹); the unbelief which, realized by himself, he will not conceal from Jesus, has not deprived him of the capacity to trust. That he can, and does, trust is evident from his pathetic utterance (Mk 9²⁴ πιστέω, βοήθει μου τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ). Pleading the compassion of Jesus instead of his own faith, he unconsciously shows a genuine faith (Gould, St. Mark).

(b) In the Fourth Gospel.—A characteristic feature should be duly noted, the enhanced demand for belief in the Son of God ('statt der Sache überall nur die Person' is the distinction drawn by Wernle [Quellen des Lebens Jesu, 18]). Passages bearing on the subject will, however, be discussed as they may yet be unconscious of the person or fact on which it is actually set. The soul's venture may be made on the ground of an object of faith which is either unrecognized or unperceived, and which is yet, in point of fact, the ground of such a venture being made at all. Where the real object of faith does not come into consciousness, there is still warrant for calling this 'unconscious faith,' even though verbal exactitude might stickle at such phraseology. But when this degree of latitude is conceded, it ought not to be forgotten that the definition of 'unconscious faith' is made more difficult, not only in respect of its connotation, but of its denotation also. For the cases in which there is no consciousness of the true object on which faith rests, pass by imperceptible gradation into those in which there is some consciousness of the object, but no true perception of its real nature, and even into those in which the perception of this is markedly imperfect. But, of course, there are few cases of faith where this perception is anything like perfect; for not only is our knowledge usually very far from complete in matters spiritual, but where it is most nearly co-extensive with the truth, least occasion is left, as a rule, for faith. Bearing all these limitations in mind, however, 'unconscious faith' stands for an experience by no means rare in human life, and of very great importance in the Kingdom of God. Our object must be to understand its nature, and to realize the place it holds, and has held, in the relations of mankind to Christ.

1. At the outset we must recognize fully Jesus Christ's constant requirement of faith from all who sought or needed His help, and His refusal to give help where this requirement was not met (Mt 13⁹, Lk 23⁸⁻⁹). Only so shall we appreciate the welcome He always showed for every sign of unconscious faith. 'He that is not against us is for us' (Mk 9⁴⁰) is a principle which recognizes what may be far short not only of full avowal, but also of conscious faith. It is obvious that in saying, 'I know that Messiah cometh' (Jn 4²⁹), the woman of Samaria had little consciousness of the real meaning of her words, yet her imperfect faith drew the disclosure, 'I that speak unto thee am he.' Similarly the faith of the Syrophenician woman, who won the help she sought, can hardly have been conscious of what she was pleading for when she urged that 'even the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs' (Mk 7²⁸). A more striking instance is that of the cripple who was cured of his infirmity on Christ's order to rise, of whom it is recorded that 'he that was healed wist not who it was' that had healed him (Jn 5¹³). And to this the case of the blind man who received sight in Jerusalem is somewhat similar; for when the Lord afterwards confronted him with the question, 'Dost thou believe on the Son of God?' he was only able to reply, 'Who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him?' (9³⁵). An instructive passage as to Christ's estimate of faith which is unconscious is Lk 11²⁰⁻³². He was condemning the contemporary generation in Galilee for its want of faith shown in the repeated demand for a 'sign.' In contrast with this He set two instances of greater faith recorded in much earlier days where less might have been looked for. The first is that of the men of Nineveh, whose repentance on Jonah's appearance among them is told in the Book of Jonah; the second is that of the Queen of the South, whose visit to Solomon's court is picturesquely narrated in the Book of Kings. In the one case it is written, 'The people of Nineveh believed God, and they proclaimed a fast' (Jon 3⁵); in the other the queen says: 'I believed not the words until I came . . . and, behold, the half was not told me' (1 K 10⁷). The credit given to the prophet's message, and to the fame of Solomon's wisdom, is taken as evidencing a deeper and unconscious faith in the righteous God who was judging the iniquity of the great city, and in the all-wise God whose inspiration was the source of the king's wonderful ability. And this unconscious faith of heathens is deemed worthy to shame and condemn the faithlessness of the generation which demurred to Christ's claims, and demanded signs.

2. There were times when the Lord Jesus put this point of view into express teaching with more of generality. Perhaps the words, 'If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed . . .' (Mt 17²⁰, Lk 17⁶), were not intended solely to suggest the diminutive size of the seed, but also the inert grain in which the life lies latent for the present, though hereafter it will become active and develop. At all events when 'he called to him a little child and set him in the midst' (Mt 18²), bidding His disciples 'become as little children,' no characteristic of childhood can have counted for so much in His mind as the spontaneous readiness to trust without limit where love is, which at the same time makes a child so wonderfully teachable, and gives it charm too apt to be robbed by increasing years. A child is the very personification of eager instinctive faith unconscious of itself. There were times too when Christ's gaze ranged wider, and He welcomed the unconscious faith in Himself of those who had never known an opportunity of trusting Him. Such was the case when the Greeks who were introduced by Andrew and Philip seemed to Him the first-fruits only of a far greater harvest, and He looked on to the time when, 'being lifted up,' He 'would draw all men unto himself' (Jn 12³²). It is impossible to limit this forecast to cover those only who in time to come should consciously become His disciples. He has drawn, and is now drawing, many to Himself who are unconscious of the power which is attracting them. And there seems to be a similar recognition of a widespread unconscious faith which needs to be made conscious that it may be perfect, in the saying, 'Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must lead, and they shall hear my voice' (Jn 10¹⁶). A still more remarkable recognition of an unconscious faith in Himself, in days long anterior to His manifestation in the world, is to be found in the saying, 'Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad' (Jn 8⁵⁶).

The instance last cited opens out a view of the prophætic character of the whole life history of Israel, as it has been well called. Not Abraham alone, but all the prophets in Israel, and even all 'they that feared the Lord, and thought upon his name,' rejoiced to see Christ's day, and saw it with joy; for all of them are included in the phrase saying, 'They shall be mine in the day which I do make, even a peculiar treasure' (Clai 3¹⁷). For whatever of Divine truth, or spiritual life, was discerned in those earlier ages, was just so much of the revelation or God.

It was the Son. He 'was the light of men,' and 'all that saw Him, and rejoiced to see Him.' This, of course, was the real nature of prophecy. It was not its function to be predictive of historical detail before the event, but to discern and disclose the unseen and eternal in the things that were seen and temporal. Inasmuch as the eternal belongs to no one epoch more than another, the teaching of the prophets was bound to find its realization in after times so far as it concerned itself with the real principles and laws of spiritual life; and to this extent it was predictive in what concerned 'the deep things of God.' But the special power of prophecy was its power of foresight. This, however, was of a different nature from the anticipatory, since the revelation of God was an evolution in time. So the prophets are accurately described by St. Peter as 'searching for what, or what manner of season, the spirit of Christ which was in them was disclosing, protesting beforehand of the sufferings destined for Christ (τὰ ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ) and the glories that should follow them' (1 P 1¹³). The faith of the prophets was thus an unconscious faith in Christ no less truly than it was a conscious faith in God. And this view is explicitly taught both in His own words and in the NT Epistles. To the professed students of Scripture round Him He said: 'Ye search the Scriptures, because ye think that in them ye have eternal life: and these are they which bear witness of me; and ye will not come to me that ye may have life' (Jn 5³⁹ 40). And among His own disciples, 'beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures concerning himself' (Lk 24²⁷, cf. 24⁴⁴⁻⁴⁷).

There are two sections of the NT in which this idea of unconscious faith is emphasized which its importance is in the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the great roll-call of those sons of faith in many ages who were 'looking unto the Pioneer and Perfecter of faith, even Jesus' (He 12²). Of these it is written that they 'all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen and greeted them from afar, and having confessed that they were strangers and sojourners on the earth' (1113, cf. vv. 39-40). The faith by which they lived and in which they died was no doubt a more or less distinctly conscious faith in God and in the unseen world; but the writer of the Epistle is not content to view it so. To his eyes it was also an unconscious faith in Jesus Christ, who alone embodies faith in its conscious perfection, and is Himself the ultimate ground of its reality in all.—The Epistles of St. Paul's later Epistles, I Corinthians, passages in which the drunk of a spiritual Rock that followed them, and the Rock was the Christ (1 Co 10⁴); but it is only in the Epistles to the Colossians and Ephesians that St. Paul discloses his whole mind. In these he dwells with enthusiasm on 'the mystery which hath been hid from all ages and generations, which is Christ in you (Gentiles), the hope of glory' (Col 12⁶ 27, cf. Eph 3¹⁻¹²). St. Paul moved by the secret kept out of the world, men were being destroyed for lack of knowledge, and only disclosed at the last. God's purpose, he felt, was an eternal purpose; and if salvation was to be, it was to be through a long hidden mystery. It was a secret hope for all men, though theirs was not an unconscious faith as yet. And 'in the fulness of time' (Eph 1¹⁰), the saints in heaven and on earth had been unconscious and incomplete might become conscious and resolute and full of glory, working in power in all (Eph 6¹⁰ 12). It is a truly magnificent view of life which is here unfolded to sight. It brings all time before Christ's earthly manifestation, and all races which have not known Him, and—we may fairly add—all souls which love and revere the holiness which they have not known. Though they do not feel able to confess His name, though they do not feel able to reach the reach of healing and help in virtue of their unconscious faith. This is not, indeed, universalism, for it does not anticipate the future of all men; but it does teach that it is God's will that all men should be saved and come to a knowledge of truth; and it teaches that this is through faith—conscious or unconscious—in 'one mediator between God and men, himself man, Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom on behalf of all, the testimony being appointed for its proper seasons' (1 Ti 2⁴⁻⁶).

UNDERSTANDING.—1. συν-λέγειν, -εως, adj. erós (priv. ἀσύνετος), to bring one thing alongside of another: (1) for combat; (2) metaph., for critical comparison, 'to bring the outward object into connexion with the inward sense' (Liddell and Scott), 'to put the perception with the thing perceived' (Grimm-Thayer), to 'apprehend the bearings of things' (Lightfoot, Col.). The typical passage is Mt 13¹⁹ 23, where the exact significance is distinctly brought out. The hearer 'by the wayside' differs from 'him that was sown upon good ground' in this, that the former 'understandeth not' while the latter 'understandeth'—the former does not apprehend the bearing of what he hears on practical conduct, the latter sees the bearing and acts accordingly. The former 'does not recognize himself as standing in any relation to the word which he hears or to the kingdom of grace which that word proclaims' (Trench, Parables, in loc.), while the latter does so recognize. In v. 51, concluding the series of parables, Jesus asks His disciples if they have apprehended the meaning of all that He has said. In the same sense (Mt 17¹³) the disciples have, by the exercise of their critical faculty, recognized that in speaking of Elias, Jesus was in fact referring to the Baptist. Hence the contrast between συν and other words—ἀκούειν, Mt 13¹² 14, 15, 23, Mk 7¹⁴, Lk 8¹⁰, the sound of the word spoken falling on the ear contrasted with the exercise of such criticism as leads to the apprehending of its personal bearing: νοεῖν, Mk 8¹⁷, perceiving contrasted with earnest reflexion. A comparison of Mt 16¹² with || Mk 8²¹ is interesting, Mt. representing the disciples as having recognized on further consideration, while Mk. gives 'a question' for themselves, the comparison of leaven with teaching (Swete, in loc.). Similarly, Mk 6⁵² (RV, 'considered' AV) of the miracle of the loaves and the walking on the sea; 'debuérant a pane ad mare concludere' (Bengel). Lk. employs the word less frequently than Mt. or Mk. In 2⁶⁰ 18³⁴ 24⁴⁵, where it occurs in the narrative, the meaning of apprehending the significance of the word 'concluding' its bearing on the circumstances (the mission of Jesus, the crucifixion, and the sufferings), is apparent. He does not use the special term in his account of the exposition of the Sower.

The privative adj. ἀσύνετος 'without understanding,' exhibits the precise meaning of the verb, Mt 15¹⁰ || Mk 7¹⁸. 'The ἀσύν is the man who lacks the discernment which comes from the due use of the illuminated intellect' (Swete). The positive adj. σύνετος || Lk 10²¹, AV 'prudent,' RV 'understanding,' preserves the idea of critical comparison, in contrast with the more general intelligence denoted by σοφός; but the reference is to material not spiritual things: 'the "wisdom of the world" which is "foolishness with God" [contrasted with] the "foolishness of the world" which is "wisdom with God," on which St. Paul was so fond of dwelling' (Farrar).

The noun σύνεσις occurs only in Lk 2⁴⁷, where the precise idea is implied of the growth of Jesus in the development of His faculty of understanding truth in every aspect along with His stature; and Mk 12³³, where, however, the reading is more than doubtful.

St. Paul's usage of the word cannot be overlooked. It is in strict harmony with that of the Gospels. See especially Col 1⁹, where he combines 'understanding' with 'wisdom' in his prayer, and Eph 3⁴ of 'the mystery of Christ,' 5¹⁷ of 'the will of God' (Eph 1¹⁸ διανοίας is a disputed reading). See Lightfoot, Col., where Aristotle's definition is expounded.

2. νοεῖν, Mt 15¹⁷ || Mk 7¹⁸, Mt 16⁹ || Mk 8¹⁷, Mt 16¹¹ RV 'perceive,' Mt 24¹⁵ || Mk 13¹⁴ (AV and RV), Jn 12⁴⁰ (from Is 6⁹) RV 'to perceive (1) with the senses, (2) with the mind. As the process of perception is not an idle place between bodily sensation and intellectual apprehension. The first step is the sensuous perception (ἀκούειν, ιδεῖν, etc.), then the mental apprehension to what is thus presented (νοεῖν), which in turn precedes the derivative critical act (συν-λέγειν), by which one is enabled to form a judgment on it. The process of perception is the first step in the apprehending of the loaves, the sound of the word heard, are objects first of perception, then of attention, and lastly of reflexion, in order that their true bearing may be apprehended. Cf. 2 Ti 2⁷ and Ellicott's note.

3. γινώσκειν is rendered by 'understand' (AV) in Mt 26¹⁰, Jn 8²⁷, 43 10⁶ 12¹⁶ (cf. rendering of its privative ἀγνοεῖν in Mk 9³² = Lk 9⁴⁵). In other cases γ is rendered by 'know,' and it is difficult to find a reason for not adhering to that rendering in these verses. γ differs from συν in so far that while συν generally marks an antithesis to sense-perception, γ marks an advance upon it. Preoccupation with lower thoughts, self-complacency excluding apprehension of spiritual truths, present circumstances obscuring the full significance and necessitating a further enlightenment by new circumstances and prolonged pondering, hinder this advance. Only when these difficulties are removed can one come to know the higher aspects of the reality. (For the thought, compare Jn 2²² 13⁷ 14²⁶). αἶν (Gospels only Mk 9³² || Lk 9⁴⁵) preserves this idea of advance, 'there was a Divine purpose in their temporary ignorance' (Swete). The disciples were unwilling to admit the idea of suffering and death, and the rebuke administered to Peter made them afraid to ask questions; thus they remained ignorant for a time.

UNDRESSED CLOTH.—1. Ingredients in dressing.—The principal cleansing agents were two kinds of crude alkali salt.—(a) Mineral. This consisted of the natural deposits, chiefly in Egypt, of potassium or sodium carbonates. It was the Heb. nether, Arab. natrân, EV (incorrectly) 'nitre,' RV 'lye' (Jer 22). White clay was also used, chiefly as a detergent or scrubbing agent.—(b) Vegetable. This was obtained chiefly from the soap plant called in Arabic ishrân, growing on the desert plains of Syria. When burnt, it yields a crude substance named kali in Arabic, corresponding to the Heb. borith, 'soap' (Mal 3).

2. Process of dressing.—(a) For cotton and linen. The cleansing of these was carried out after the cloth had been woven. The present custom in Syria is to dip the cloth in water, and lay it out on a flat surface of rock. It is then sprinkled with natrân (lye) or kali (soap), and beaten with rods or clubs, and is finally rinsed in fresh water and spread out under the sun to dry.

(b) For wool. On account of the presence of natural oil and many accretions and impurities in the fleece, the cleansing had to be done before the cloth was woven. For this the chief ingredient was urine collected and kept till it formed ammonium carbonate during the process. Because of the offensive odours of these agents, as well as on account of the need for drying purposes, the fullers' establishments were placed near or outside the city walls. The wool was further purified in several changes of the lye or soap already mentioned, and rinsed in running water.

(c) For silk. This also had to be treated before being woven, in order to remove from the thread the gluey substance called sericin (fr. σερικόν, Rev 18¹²), which not only gave off an offensive odour, but, if allowed to remain, would make the cloth hard and lustreless. To remove this, the silk fibre had to be kept for several hours in a bath of hot water containing soap made of olive oil and alkali salt. This process tested the skill of the fuller; for if the soaking were insufficient, some of the sericin still adhered to the silk fibre, and if prolonged beyond a certain point it imparted an indelible yellow stain. The raw silk was then transferred for a short time to a bath of water in which dog or pigeon dung had been mixed, and, as in the case of the other materials, the last stage was a thorough washing in pure water.

The eye-witnesses of our Lord's majesty in the Mount (Mk 9²⁻⁸) testified that on that occasion the white radiance of His garments was beyond the art of any fuller on earth.

3. Christ's parabolic use of undressed cloth.—In Mt 9¹⁶ || Mk 2²¹ Christ, in reply to the question of the disciples of John the Baptist as to why His disciples did not fast, employs the figure of a piece of undressed cloth (ράκος ἀγναφον) sewed on an old garment, to show the incongruity between fasting according to rule and the new spirit of Christianity. ράκος (fr. ρήγνυμι, 'to break') is properly a piece of cloth torn off, cf. Eng. 'rag'; ἀγναφος (fr. α privative and γάρτω, 'to full or dress cloth' [whence γναφεύς, 'a fuller,' Mk 9⁸]) = 'unfulled,' 'undressed.' Neither of the Gr. words occurs elsewhere in NT. In the parallel passage Lk 5²⁶, where, however, a somewhat different turn is given to the saying, ῥάδιον καινόν ('new garment') occurs instead of ράκος ἀγναφον. By the rendering 'undressed cloth' RV brings out the point of the original, which is quite lost in the colourless 'new cloth' of AV, though suggested by the 'raw or unwrought' of AVm. A piece of cloth that is undressed or unfulled is certain to shrink with a wetting, and so to strain and tear away the old garment to which it is sewed. Thus, as Christ said, it 'taketh from the garment, and a worse rent is made.' For the religious significance of the saying see esp. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Christ, p. 302 ff. Cf. also artt. BOTTLE in vol. i., and LAW, above, p. 12^b.

UNION.—1. Union of the world with God.—In a sense the creation is always closely related to the Creator, and has no separate, independent existence: 'thy heavens' (Ps 8³), 'in him we live, and move, and have our being' (Ac 17²⁸). Yet it is in a relative independence of the creation that all things happen. Hence we read in Eph 1¹⁰ and Col 1²⁰ that God will gather together all things in Christ, and will reconcile all things unto Himself. This is spoken in reference to the human spirit and its salvation. By the redemption of man, God will perfect the relationship of the creation to Himself. All things are so linked together that God's approach to the human race, and the approach of the human race to approach to Him in Christ, is also a drawing of the whole world into a more perfect union with God.

2. Union between God and the human race.—It is only from the human side, and as matter of history, that we can study the union into which God has progressively entered with the spirit of man. It is the effect of any religious exercise that is matter of observation. Thus we are made aware of the dawning consciousness of God in the human spirit; 'then began men to call upon the name of the Lord' (Gn 4²⁶). Those who were receptive above their fellows of the Divine influence were prophets (Dt 18¹⁵, 1 S 9⁹). This being the case, we must believe in a corresponding part of God towards men, and to observe its development (see REVELATION). The history of Israel was so shaped by providences, and spiritual progress was so determined by prophecy, that Christ was prepared for, and came (Gal 4⁴), and in Him the union of God with our race was perfected (Is 7¹⁴ 8¹⁰).

In regard to the union of God with man in Christ, the emphasis in Scripture is not laid upon the manner of that union so much as upon the fact of it. If Creeds and Catechisms seem to do otherwise, it is still to be remembered that their chief concern is to establish the fact that God was in Christ. In Ph 2⁵⁻¹¹ St. Paul says nothing of the manner of the union of the Divine and human natures in Christ, but accepts as assuredly true that He was God with us, and that the same Person who emptied Himself and took the form of a servant, also humbled Himself and became obedient even unto death, yea the death of the cross.

When we turn to the narrative of Christ's words in the Gospels, we find that His attitude towards God was ethically perfect, as of a Son to a Father, in obedience, sympathy, comprehension, honour, love, trust (Mt 11²⁵⁻²⁷, Jn 5¹⁹⁻³⁰ 6³⁷ 10³⁰ 11⁴¹, Lk 23⁴⁶, and many other passages). This is what we are permitted to see of the relationship between God and Christ. But the Son who so manifested His oneness with the Father did so in our human nature. Here therefore is humanity in the person of its Head seen to be in union with God. So far as every OT saint was able to anticipate and prefigure Christ, so far this union between God and man was a process which was progressively unfolded and perfected. And so far as believers by fellowship with Christ enter into His relationship with God, the union between God and our race is still being realized; and it must always take the form perfectly set forth by Christ (1 Jn 4¹⁷).

3. Union between believers and Christ.—It is necessary that individual souls should be united by faith to Christ, if the union of mankind with God is to be general (Jn 10¹⁶ 12²²). The Gospels record how in process of events men became disciples of Christ (Jn 1³⁷, Mk 1¹⁸). That which was so effected was afterwards in many ways confirmed (Jn 6⁶⁸ 20²³), and is described in the parable of the Vine and its Branches (ch. 15). Again, those who believed when the Apostles preached, and to whom the Spirit was given, without being attached to Christ in His earthly life, became partakers of spiritual union with Him (Ac 11¹⁷. See also He 3¹⁴, 1 Co 1⁹, 1 Jn 1³). This union of the believer with Christ is more than the tie between a disciple and a teacher, and is expressed by the words 'in Christ,' 'in the Lord,' 'in him,' which occur more than 150 times in the NT, notably in 2 Co 5¹⁷ (RVm) and Ro 16⁷. As this union is entered into by trust and obedience and full consent, so it consists of identity of interests and companionship in everything. In the region of the conscience, union is expressed in peace (Ro 8¹); in that of the affections, in love (Gal 2²⁰); in regard to our labours, in partnership with God (1 Co 3⁹, 2 Co 4⁶); and in regard to all events, we are sharers with Christ in suffering and in glory (Ro 8¹⁷, 2 Ti 2¹²; see also Jn 17²⁰⁻²⁴).

4. Union of believers with one another.—The Lord's Supper is the simplest and most perfect outward expression of the union of Christians with one another, because of their common attachment to Christ, and deriving of benefit from Him. Thus in Ac 2⁴² 20⁷, 1 Co 10¹⁶ 17 it is assumed that heart-union with Christ and with one another went along with the outward expression of that union, in their partaking of the same significant bread. The obedience of the soul to Christ which alone constitutes any one a disciple may or may not coincide with participation in this or any other outward observance. Yet, like the kernel and the containing shell of a nut, they as a matter of fact appeared and developed together. Union with Christ produces an attachment to Him, and to everything that belongs to Him; besides also the traits of Christ-like character, which are in their nature unifying: 'The glory thou gavest me I have given them, that they may be one' (Jn 17²²). Should this unity be broken, the remedy is that all parties should renew their allegiance to Christ (1 Co 1-3, 2 Co 10⁷).

Union among believers is compared to the organic unity of a body (Ro 12⁴, 1 Co 12¹², Eph 4⁴). This has not the effect of ignoring the differences between believers; on the contrary, the fullest provision is made for differences of gift. So far from the eye ceasing to be specifically an eye, because the body has hands and feet, there is the more need of the eye, and it has more work to do. Individuality is to be conserved and strengthened, and not allowed to be weakened. The case taken for individuality is not that of the failure of the eye to see, when the hand would do its best to aid the eye, and do its work; but such a healthy state of things as would allow every sense to do its own work. At the same time, all are under the law of love to Christ and to one another, and are sensitive to each other's suffering or success, and their life is wholly directed to mutual helpfulness. The result is that each is exercised in the use of whatever gift he has, and the whole society is maintained in spiritual vigour and growth (Eph 4¹², Phil 9). See also ONENESS, UNITY.

UNIQUENESS.—Beyond dispute Christ appears on the theatre of human history as a unique Personality. In however large a sense He may be revealed as sharing the lot and the nature of men, He stands forth as the possessor of traits which have never been duplicated. Let a parallel be drawn between Him and any other who has won renown in human annals, and it will be found that the points of unlikeness more than match the points of likeness.

1. In several respects the self-consciousness which the Gospels show to have been resident in Christ was of a unique kind. (1) We look in vain throughout their records for any indication that He recognized the common call to repentance as applying to Himself. No utterance that is put into His mouth conveys a hint that the slightest shadow of condemnation ever rested upon His spirit. He speaks as if He felt Himself to be the channel rather than the needy recipient of grace, as if, in truth, His inner life was as stainless as it was assumed to have been in Apostolic thought. (2) Again, the self-consciousness of Christ appears to have been of a unique type as including a perfectly clear and unambiguously potent sense of sonship towards God. So rounded is the filial ideal which He presents that it is impossible to find a point at which it admits of supplement. Who can imagine a more complete expression of filial trust than that which is contained in His precepts on putting away every anxious care about the stores which the morrow may bring (Mt 6²⁵⁻³⁴)? Who can conceive of filial devotion according to a higher stage than was made manifest in the words, 'Not my will, but thine be done' (Lk 22⁴²), spoken in the presence of the most bitter cup of shame and suffering? Who can think of filial intimacy more close and constant than is attested by the whole body of Christ's words and deeds? In truth, it is impossible to review the record without being struck with the aptness of the Evangelical description which speaks of Him as the 'beloved Son' (Mt 3¹⁷) and as dwelling 'in the bosom of the Father' (Jn 1¹⁸). (3) Still further, a unique order of self-consciousness is disclosed in the record of an extraordinary mediatorial vocation which was characteristic of Christ. 'No man cometh unto the Father but by me' (Jn 14⁶)—that is the strong declaration which the Fourth Gospel places upon His lips; and a full equivalent is supplied by the other Gospels in such sentences as these: 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mt 20²⁸). 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father; and no one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 11²⁷). To what prophet or leader of the race beside have we any warrant for imputing such a conception of personal vocation? Surely it must be admitted that in His sense of the prerogative and the burden of mediation Christ makes a class by Himself; He has no peer or companion. (4) Once more, the unique character of Christ's self-consciousness is seen in His extraordinary sense of authority or rightful lordship. While He came not to be ministered unto, He still made it evident that in the depths of His spirit there was an unhesitating affirmation of a pre-eminent royalty. He spoke as one who needed not to accommodate His words precisely to the instructions of Moses or to any other ancestral standard. He claimed an allegiance so unqualified as to reduce to a secondary place the most imperative obligations enforced by earthly ties. In words which match the significance of the Pauline declaration that in His name every knee shall bow and every tongue confess His lordship (Ph 2¹⁰), He pictured the gathering of all nations before His throne of judgment, to receive from His lips the merited sentence (Mt 25^{31a}). Thus in various ways Christ gave expression to a transcendent and marvellous self-consciousness.

2. Almost baffling the impression which comes from a consideration of the exceptional self-consciousness in Christ is that which is properly derived from a consideration of the union and reconciliation in Him of so many contrasted traits. (1) He was unique in His combination of meekness with the fullest energy and force of character. With quietness of mind He accepted the yoke of parental and national requirements. He submitted to a consecration rite at the hands of one who declared that he was not worthy to unloose the latchet of His shoe (Jn 12⁷). In all His conduct there was no trace of aristocratic superiority; among all His mighty works no deed that savoured of ostentation. But while He was meek and lowly of heart, He was masterful and commanding, inflexible in purpose, remote from weak conciliation, perfectly resolute to march against a perverse generation, to confront its frown, its mockery, and its homicidal hatred. (2) Again, Christ exemplified the union of tender compassion for the sinner with sharp intolerance for sin. He was neither moved by the thought of His compassion to make unguarded concessions to the transgressor, nor incited by His intense repulsion against sin to lose the brother in the censor. In dealing with erring souls that had any longing for better things He fulfilled the prophetic picture of one who should not break the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax (Is 42³, cf. Mt 12²⁰). At the same time, He showed Himself the absolutely uncompromising enemy of unrighteousness, insisting that it must be excluded from the thoughts as well as from the deeds, and requiring that the offending right hand should be cut off and the offending right eye be plucked out (Mt 5²⁹). Tender as the dew where there was any place for a healing ministry, He was yet sharp and unsparring as the lightning against every form of iniquity. (3) In another respect also Christ exhibited a unique ability for reconciling diverse traits. We see in Him a remarkable union of spirituality with kindly contact with the world. He knew how to be unworldly without being ascetic; how to throw the weight of emphasis upon the treasure laid up in heaven without patronizing any eccentric form of self-denial. He ministered to bodily needs as well as to the needs of the spirit. Herald as He was of the Kingdom of heaven, He yet stood in sympathetic relation with the sensible world, treated it as the workmanship of His Father's hands, and used it as a book of divinity from which to read to His hearers most beautiful and comforting messages of truth.

3. Corresponding to this extraordinary balance of the various traits of ideal character, Christ showed a unique competency as a teacher to bring into a unity the diverse orders and interests of truth. In the standard of life which He set before His disciples He reconciled loftiness with simplicity. The standard is undoubtedly very high. It towers above the average level of human living like an Alpine summit. But with all its loftiness it is peculiarly free from the strained and the unnatural. Its attainment involves no sacrifice of manhood or swamping of the true self, but rather just the achievement of manhood and the realization of the true self. Rebuking nothing that is purely and truly human, it requires only that the human should come to its best by standing in the transfiguring light of intimate association with the Divine. A great reconciling function is also fulfilled by Christ's teaching in the just tribute which it pays at once to morality and to religion, and in the indissoluble union which it assumes to subsist between them. From the standpoint of that teaching no man is a fit subject to bring a gift to God until he has done his utmost to establish right relations with his fellows (Mt 5^{23b}). No man is an acceptable petitioner for the Divine clemency until he is willing to forgive the one who has trespassed against himself (Mt 6¹⁴). Ceremonial observances are not to be regarded as ends in themselves, but as means to the end of dealing with the human situation. They are no better than a whitewash upon the sepulchre (Mt 23²⁷). Religion divorced from morality is a delusion and a pretence. But, on the other hand, the teaching of Christ is vastly remote from contentment with a bare morality or discharge of the common duties of man to man. The presence of the Heavenly Father lay about Him like a radiant atmosphere. To do the will of that Father He regarded as the prime necessity of His life, His very meat (Jn 4³⁴). In the assurance of the Father's complacent love He found the unfailing spring of consolation and rejoicing, and the return of His heart in fervent love to the all-perfect One. He counted the most obvious and the sweetest of all conceivable obligations. Accordingly, it could not but come about that His teaching should be thoroughly transfused with the thought of Divine love, beginning to end it is beautified and illumined by lofty and intense religious convictions. In short, stress upon the ethical factor is not permitted in the least degree to diminish the emphasis rendered to the religious factor in man's life. The harmonious combination of the two makes one of the fairest and most fruitful ideals that has been brought to the attention of the race.

UNITY.—In the NT the term 'unity,' like its Gr. equivalent ἐνότης, occurs only in Eph 4³⁻¹³—both times with reference to the unity of the Christian Church (v. 3 'the unity of the Spirit,' v. 13 'the unity of the faith'). But the idea of the unity of the Church as the 'body of Christ' is one that constantly meets us both in positive and in negative forms—in connexion, i.e., alike with exhortations to Christian unity and with the depreciation and rebuke of schism or of the divisive spirit.

St. Paul in 1 Cor. (11⁸ 11¹⁸ 12²⁵) is the first to use 'schism' (σχίσμα) with an approach to its present technical meaning. The σχίσμα, however, which he condemns are parties only in the Church, not sects; 'strifes,' but not separations. There is no suggestion that those who called themselves 'of Paul' had ceased to communicate with those who called themselves 'of Apollos' (11²). The 'divisions' apparent in their meetings for worship (11¹⁸⁻²¹) were of class, of richer and poorer (v. 22), and did not prevent the common meeting. The 'schism' deprecated in his parable of body and members (12²⁵) amounts only to carelessness of mutual interest; solution of continuity in the body of Christ is not contemplated. The word αἵρεσις (EV 'sect,' 'heresy') comes nearer in NT use to the idea of 'sect,' though it does not reach it. It still denotes any party or faction within a single communion, as of the Sadducees (Ac 5¹⁷), of the Pharisees (15⁵ 26²) or of Christians considered as a school of Judaism (24¹⁵ 28²²). It goes no farther in Gal 5²⁰, where αἵρεσις are counted among works of the flesh, as the natural sequence of ἡμισημί and διχοστασίαν. In 2 P 2¹ they are the secret work of pseudo-prophets, and are αἵρ. ἀποστασίας; but there is no suggestion that they amounted to separations: they work 'among you.' The strongest expression used on the subject is that of St. Jude (v. 19), who speaks of some as ἀποδοκιμαστές, 'marking themselves off' from the community. There is still 'fear' (Jn 14:15). The Nicolaitans (Rev 2:15) were a party within the Church, not a separation from it. The idea of communions severally arranged upon differing bases of opinion or order does not exist within the NT thought. What is conceived as possible, only to the extent of a tendency to faction, or the spirit of party, as for actual schism—μή γίνεσθε.

1. Our Lord's personal teaching on the subject is in the Gospels; He inculcates unity rather than division. It is to be gathered (1) from His example, (2) from His recorded sayings.

(1) The condition of religion in the Jewish commonwealth of His time was unsatisfactory to Him. It called for rebuke. Its teachers, their doctrine and their practice, incurred His denunciation. The Temple demanded cleansing at His hands; the synagogues were in possession of those scribes and lawyers and Pharisees on whom He cried 'Woe, as hypocrites. Nevertheless, He bade His disciples respect their authority and obey their commands always without imitating their conduct. They 'sit in Moses' seat' (Mt 23²); a seat self-assumed,—their office had no recognition in the Law,—but in a sense they represented the prophetic succession, and de facto stood for constituted order. Christ neither separated Himself, nor allowed others to separate, on the ground of their corruption, error, or abuse of power; though He recognized that all these existed, and protested against them. His custom was to go up to the synagogue on the Sabbath days. He observed the Feasts of the Temple, that of the Dedication (which had only customary sanction) as well as those prescribed. His example suggests no extremity of circumstance under which separation from the Divine Society becomes the course of duty.

(2) His expression of unity is as emphatic as the circumstances would expect. He establishes a Kingdom which in time and place is to be represented by the Ecclesia which He will build upon the confession of Himself (Mt 16¹⁸). The essential unity of the Kingdom necessarily reflects itself in the unity of the representative society. Unity is involved in the fact that its bond is a relation to Himself: the one Shepherd implies the one flock, the one door implies the one fold (Jn 11^{9, 16}). It is presented under similes which convey the idea of unity: it is one building on one foundation (Mt 16¹⁸), one enclosed vineyard (20¹⁻¹¹), one shoal taken in a single net (13⁴⁷⁻⁴⁸), one company of watchers (25¹⁻¹³), or of guests at one feast (Lk 14⁷⁻²⁴); it is a perfect century of sheep, a complete sum of money, and the breaking of its completeness is intolerable (15⁴⁻⁸).

Its unity is primarily theological, necessitated by its causation in the unity which is in God (Jn 17^{21, 22}) and objectively effected by the indwelling in its constituent of the one Christ (17²³). The subjective unity in mutual affection of which Christians are conscious is a result of this objective unity, and is evidential of their common relation to Christ (Jn 13³⁵, cf. 1 Jn 3^{14, 19}); but that sense of unity does not constitute the bond which unites Christians; the bond is antecedent to the sense of it, and stands in the life of Christ transfused through the discipleship. This transfusion of life is effected by the mission of the Paraclete, the Holy Ghost mediated by Christ in His heavenly intercession (Jn 14¹⁶⁻¹⁹), and results in a vital unity of Christ with the recipients of the Paraclete; which is comparable to that of a single organism (the True Vine, 15¹⁻⁸) in which the individual inheres by the fact of his inherence in Christ (15⁷). So much our Lord declares of His own operation; for the rest, He implies that He is in measure, in this as in all, dependent for the realization of His purpose on our apprehension of it and co-operative obedience. Undoubtedly He desires that the vital and spiritual unity which He effects should have a concrete expression in the expression as it appears in the life of the spiritual man (Gal 2:20), but to the world, which cannot see the Spirit (Jn 14¹⁷), and is aware of that only which with eyes of flesh it sees. He commands us, as a condition of the world's recognition of our discipleship, to love one another 'as I have loved you' (13³⁴). He prays the Father that we may be one in such fashion that the world, seeing it, may believe in His mission: and defines this unity as comparable to His own unity with the Father. Beyond question He demands a unity manifested in terms of the common nature of the man of this world. He prays, 'that all believers may be at one' (in harmony of faith or temper—or as Abraham and Lot were at one in agreeing to part peaceably), but that they may be 'one thing,' ὡς ἓν ἐν (17^{21, 22}); 'completed into one thing' (17²³). It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that this 'one thing' is, spiritually, the Kingdom which His Incarnation brings among us (Lk 17²¹); representatively, the Society which He builds (Mt 16¹⁸), to which by His institution the one Baptism (Eph 4⁵) admits, and which the one Bread (1 Co 10¹⁷) shows. Every kingdom, He says, divided against itself (the Kingdom of heaven is included in the argument) is brought to desolation; every city or house (the City of God, the House built of living stones, is included) divided against itself shall not stand (Mt 12²⁵, Mk 3²⁴⁻²⁵). The unity which our Lord teaches appears, then, to be a visible and organic unity, based upon a vital unity in the Holy Ghost, and necessary both for evidence and for stability. His verdict upon schism, as the interruption of such unity, must be inferred—it is nowhere stated *—from the sanctions assigned to unity, and from the intensity of His supplication that it may be realized in the experience of His Church.

2. In this sense the Apostolic writers have understood Christ. It is noted that the disciples were 'all with one accord in one place' to receive the Spirit (Ac 2¹); that, as the result of Pentecost, they 'were together, and had all things common' (2⁴⁴); 'the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul' (4³²). The assumption of the Epistles is that 'the saints' anywhere are 'the church of God' which is there (Ro 17, 1 P 1¹ etc.). If they are 'churches,' they are not less one fellowship in the unity of Christ (Gal 1¹, Rev 1⁴).

St. Paul is copious on the subject. The unity on which he insists is not only of spirit; it is also embodied unity. Many as we are, we are one loaf and one body, being partakers of the one sacramental food (1 Co 10¹⁷; cf. Did. ix. 4). The one Spirit makes us one body, and members one of another (1 Co 12²⁴⁻²⁷), 'that there should be no schism in the body.' The unity of the Spirit is to be guarded in the bond of peace—'one body, one Spirit,' as there is unity in every basis of our life (Eph 3⁴⁻⁶). This body is the Body of Christ, and requires for its attainment to completion the harmonious interworking of every member and group, as constituting a single organism in which

* The possible exception is where (Mt 24⁵¹, Lk 12⁴⁶) Christ threatens the evil servant who smites his fellow-servants and eats and drinks with the drunken, that He 'will come and cut him asunder (βιζομαι αὐτόν). The RV translators and others suggest for this remarkable phrase (ἀντ. 29, in NT) 'will scourge him severely'—which is as if one were to say in our speech 'will flay him alive,' and is an expression which one has difficulty in hearing with that sense from those lips. Ruskin somewhere interprets it of the judicial aspect of schism, as 'God's revenge' upon worldly and oppressive priesthods—an interpretation which the history of schism may seem to commend.

all inhere (Eph 4¹³⁻¹⁶). The Church is a Body, of which Christ is Head (Col 1^{18, 24} 2¹⁹). It is 'the mystery of Christ' that the Gentiles should be of the same body with Israel (Eph 3⁶). Baptism is into a unity to which neither race nor status nor sex is a barrier (Gal 3²⁷⁻²⁸). It is against first persons to assume the name of any leader as a party distinction (1 Co 1¹³); to do so is 'carnal' (3^{3, 4}). God is to be glorified with one mouth, as well as with one mind (Ro 15⁶). The Churches of God have no custom of love of controversy (1 Co 11¹⁶); God is not the author of confusion but of peace; and so it is in all the Churches (14³³). The contentious earn indignation and wrath (Ro 2⁸); those who cause divisions are to be noted and rejected (16¹⁷); a partisan after repeated admonition is to be rejected (Tit 3¹⁰). A Church is commended which follows other Churches already in Christ (1 Th 2¹⁴). Doubtful disputations are to be avoided; the weak to be borne with; uniformity of opinion on ceremonial or ritual points is not to be insisted upon; to insist on uniformity may be 'to destroy the work of God' (Ro 14-15⁶). It becomes the gospel of love that men should stand fast in one spirit with one mind (Ph 1²⁷): nothing is to be done through strife or vainglory—the guard of unity is humility (2³); we are to do all things without murmuring or disputings, as children of God (2⁴⁻⁵).

St. Peter assumes the same general conception; diffused as the Church is (1 P 1¹), it is one building, one priesthood, one nation (2^{5, 9}). St. John conceives of the Church as a fellowship with Apostles who have fellowship with God (1 Jn 1³), united in love, which is to be in deed and truth, not in phrase (3¹⁸). The Epp. to the Churches of Asia deal with conditions of corruption, moral and doctrinal; but there is no thought of self-segregation as the duty of the faithful, even where deeds that Christ hates are tolerated (Rev 2²); He lays no other burden on His servants but to hold fast (2^{24, 25}).

The teaching of the NT, in fact, is positive. It shows a full unity of the Church:—(1) An objective unity of origin and of vital relation of its constituent elements, which (like the racial unity of blood) is constituted by the Divine act and exists antecedently to any action, for it or against it, of ours; to which we may do violence, but which we cannot abrogate; and which is the Church's spiritual oneness. (2) A social unity, the result and therefore the manifestation of this common Divine life, which is related to the life communicated in the Holy Spirit as the physical organism of the individual is to the personal life which co-ordinates that of its component cells, one body for one spirit; which (being body) may be wounded, but only with suffering and to its hurt and weakening. (3) A unity of temper and intention, of consent in belief and thought, which it rests with us to supply; which is the co-operation with the Divine action that is required of us,—obedience to the law of the nature of the Body of Christ in which we find ourselves—the bond of peace in which we are to observe (τηρεῖν) the unity of the Spirit (Eph 4³). The existence of a state of schism is not contemplated in the NT, nor is any direction given for conduct in such a case. Party spirit and divisive courses are condemned, but there is 'no precept for the regulation of the relations of one sect to another.' The Apostolic doctrine as to schism can be inferred only from these facts.

3. According to the conception of the Church of the first centuries, unity was locally constituted by association in acts of communion with God (especially in the Eucharistic synaxis), and by recognition of the authority representing the discipline of the Church; œcumenically, it was constituted by intercommunion, evidenced by reception on the part of each local community of the formata (commendatory letters) of the rest, by homologation of each other's discipline, by the encyclical letters of their respective bishops, and later by common Conciliar action. It was local unity in the faith, but not necessarily in identity of expression of the faith; the Creed, as repeated in different Churches, was not in all verbally the same. It was a unity in moral obedience, but not a uniformity in ceremony or custom: each Church ordered its own liturgy, and determined its own ritual and usage; wide differences might exist in the observance of fast and festival (Eus. v. 24—Polycarp and the Churches of Asia and Victor). Such differences were held only to demonstrate identity in the faith: 'in una fide nihil officit sanctæ ecclesiæ consuetudo diversa' (Greg. ad Leandr.). In the earlier stages of the Church's history, as by bishops and presbyters in one local Church, or by bishops with government by college of presbyters in another, without appeal to either; Antioch, Ephesus, Smyrna communicated with Rome and Corinth. Ignatius addresses the collegiate Church at Rome as cordially as he does the Church at Smyrna. Clement has no criticism for the Church at Corinth, but only for insubordination to the Churches autocephalous (externally independent). They might exercise large discretion in internal arrangement, yet recognize each other's sacraments and discipline. The centre of unity was in heaven, not on earth. It was a unity as that of Hellas, rather than as that of the Empire. Local Churches were 'as bays of the one sea.' Unity was essentially maintained when intercommunion was maintained. Schism was the interruption of communion: 'schismaticos facit, non diversa fides, sed interruptio communis societatis' (Aug., quoted by Sprott, Schism, p. 2).

As for local unity, the principle was recognized that only one bishop could exist in the same community; latterly, that only one bishop could validly occupy one seat, that presbyters could not act validly without him, and that the flock should communicate with him in sacraments. The worst form of schism was held to be the episcopalis rule, as it produced sect within the same area, and led to the setting up of altar against altar—a greater evil than intercommunion between one local Church and another, as civil war is a greater evil than war between State and State. The converse recognition was equally recognized: that no uncatholic or heterodox form of communion should be locally imposed or required between Church and Church. In the case of that being done, the schism was held to be on the part of the authority imposing such terms, or of the Church receiving them. Thus Firmilian writes (with reference to the excommunication by Stephen of Rome of those who disallowed the baptism of heretics): 'While thou thinkest that all are united, thou art divided; thou hast excommunicated thyself' (Eus. Eccl. Hist. vii. 12, Cyprian, lxxv., Opt. tr. p. 284).

4. It was to this latter principle that the Reformers appealed, as justifying in their view the principle of maintaining the autonomy of national Churches, and their administration independent of any external authority. It was regarded as a principle under which impossible terms of communion were selfishly demanded. As to schism generally, the Reformers maintained the traditional doctrine, and their view may be taken as typical. 'Such is the value which the Lord sets on the communion of His Church, that all who contumaciously alienate themselves from any Christian society in which the true ministry of His word and Sacraments is maintained, He regards as destroyers of religion' (Inst. iv.).

5. The modern tendency is to recognize that responsibility for divisions has generally been a diffused responsibility, and that a distinction is to be drawn between that of the authors of separation and of the inheritors of positions of confusion which personally they have not created; to accept the essential validity of the conceptions of unity which guided the Church in its inception, while recognizing the difficulty of return to their practice; and to welcome the efforts of those who desire to be called 'repairers of the breach, restorers of paths for men to dwell in.' See, further, artt. CHURCH, COMMUNION, ONENESS.

UNIVERSALISM.—Three different, though connected, problems are raised by this word: (1) The universality of Christianity as a gospel for all races (as against the early Ebionism (wh. see) which confined Christianity to the circumcised); (2) the universal purpose of Christ's death—for 'all men'

(as against the Augustinian and Calvinistic doctrine of Christ's death on behalf of those elected out of the mass of sinful mankind); (3) the ultimate salvation of all souls (as against the eternal suffering of the wicked; or, their destruction; or perhaps as against the uncertainty, due to our ignorance of the future Day; see below); (4) a study of Christ and the Gospels is very specially concerned with the first problem.

1. UNIVERSALITY OF CHRISTIANITY.—1. There are two ways in which religions qualify as 'universal.' They may reveal the missionary impulse (Zoroastrianism? see Jackson, Zoroaster the Prophet of Ancient Iran, 1899, p. 92; Modern Hinduism, sucking up hill-tribes into its fellowship?). Or in addition they may be very greatly—in contrast with the legal and ceremonial character of developed systems of religion in the ancient world.

Buddhism went furthest in the way of simplifying. From the first, it was a religion which might have the benefits of Buddhism, without the practices of his former faith; and at this hour many of the missionaries of the East are doing so. Taoism, on the other hand, is missionary and is simple, in the strictest sense. Pre-Christian religions, on the other hand, revealed the missionary impulse: but the simplified creed was hardly a simplification, unless to the aristoi ('devout' persons); and their religion was theoretically very insecure.

2. The Apostolic Church had the missionary impulse, but practised the OT law as inherited custom; was it also sacred duty? The question threatened to rend the new fellowship. Should the missionary mission be for Jews only? And should life be simple for the Gentiles, for those of Gentile birth—by abrogation of OT law? Or should the missionary impulse be slowly throttled by Jewish laws and customs? Both parties were pushed back, and led to define their principles more sharply. The Judaizers claim that the Law is necessary to salvation (Ac 15¹), or at least to full salvation (Gal 3³). St. Paul justifies his attitude of antagonism by declaring that the Gentile Christian, who accepts circumcision and the Law, renounces Christ (Gal 5²⁻⁴). On both sides, law is treated, not as customary, but as religious in value—good religion to the Judaizers, bad religion to St. Paul (though in mere custom he himself 'became a Jew to win Jews,' 1 Co 9²⁰). In the end the various sections of Christian Jews all died out, or merged themselves in the rival camps—the Synagogue and the Catholic Church. It may seem as if universalism failed. Christianity has been known to history as a Gentile and non-Jewish institution—a strange state of matters, were we not blinded by familiarity. And in other ways, too, success has been very partial. No religion, not even the Christian, has ever attained the destiny of universal sway to which all the higher prophetic religions aspire. Yet Christianity persists in claiming that it is truly universal. It excludes none. The Jewish people excludes itself. (Individual Jews, of course, are entangled in hereditary custom, and can break away only by self-will or moral heroism).

3. The simplifying of religion, which was carried through in controversy by St. Paul, begins uncontroversially in the teaching of Jesus. He brings the Law to a principle (Mt 7¹²) or to a pair of principles, drawn from different parts of the OT (Dt 6⁵, Lv 19¹⁸), and recognized by the Master as connected by an inward likeness (Mt 22³⁷⁻⁴⁰ ||). All these principles, of course, are moral and indifferent to ceremonial. So, too, the religious life is brought to a single principle by the name which Jesus steadily uses for God. If God is our Father, religion is sonship. This is a simplifying of the highest order—a simplifying which is also a deepening, an ennobling, a perfecting of the religious life. Thus Christ's teaching is universalist at the core. If religion consists in the belief of God's Fatherhood and in love to man, there is no reason why a Jew should be preferred to a Gentile. Nor do corollaries from these principles fail to appear in the teaching of Christ. He rejects, as lacking Divine authority, that tradition (15³⁻⁹ ||) by means of which the Pharisees, morally the most earnest among the Jews, safeguarded the OT law and applied it to new details, at the cost of making it ever more and more a burden. He hints repeatedly that ceremonies, even those taught by the OT, are of inferior moment in comparison with moral duty (9¹⁶⁻¹⁷ 12⁷, cf. 17²⁶ 22²¹ ||). He speaks of sin and pardon (Mt 9⁹ ||, Lk 7⁴⁸), and of His own approaching death (Mt 20²⁸, 26²⁸ ||), in words which send us back to the prediction of a 'new covenant' (Jer 31³¹). And thus He connects the new body of principles contained in His teaching with His own Person and destiny.

4. On the other hand, the universalist corollary itself seems strangely absent. For Christ conceives His calling upon earth as confined to Israel (Mt 15²⁴ ||). His intercourse with Gentiles (8⁵⁴), or even with the half-heathen Samaritans (Jn 4⁹, Lk 9⁵² 17¹⁶), was but casual. He bids His disciples, at their first going out, confine themselves to Jews (Mt 10⁶). All this, as we can see, was involved in His teaching that God called Him to be Messiah—Israel's king. If 'anointed' to 'preach' (Is 61¹, Lk 4¹⁸), He must direct His prophetic message to Israel. The shaping out of His royalty depends, under God, on the attitude of Israel in response to His appeal. These things are plain to us; still, there was room for doubt under the historic conditions of the early disciples. It was plausible for Jewish Christians to hold that the Master's example sanctioned particularism rather than universalism. Very possibly Mt 10—as borrowed by the author of our Gospel from an older document (the Logia? one version of the Logia? see LOGIA)—was originally a gathering together in a single context of sayings that might throw light on the permanent duties of an itinerant preacher to an audience of Jews. (We must not expect that Evangelists should write like critical historians, with exact notes of time and circumstance). On the other hand, our Gospel of Mt., as a whole, certainly presents a different outlook. Yet it is only after the Resurrection—and, in all the Synoptics, with a very definite contrast to the past—that we have the record of a positive command to preach to all men. Not that the mind of our Master is really uncertain on this point. OT prophecy had extended hope to Gentiles (Is 2², e.g.); and Jesus stands higher, not lower, than His prophetic forerunners. Could He—speaking in the light of such promises; or could He at all—preach a gospel universalist from its centre outwards, and not know what He was doing? He knew it well. And so the principles of His teaching come to their rights through the witness of St. Paul, who—in forms of his own, or, at any rate, in forms which owed to him their full and sharp development—vindicates the universal religion which has succeeded to the Old Covenant through the atoning death for sin. II. UNIVERSAL PURPOSE OF CHRIST'S DEATH.

—1. Granted that Christ is the Saviour of all races, did He die for all men in all races, or only for such as actually reap the benefits of His sacrifice? The question may seem somewhat academic. It is admitted on both sides of the controversy that the merits of Christ suffice to redeem all men; and it is [or was; but see III. below] admitted on both sides that only a certain number of souls are advantaged by the Christian salvation. Still, it seemed—e.g. to Wesley—a new and ugly particularism to affirm that, by Divine decree, the salvation, professedly offered to all, was confined to some, chosen arbitrarily or upon unknown grounds.

2. In our Lord's teaching, or in the very simple theology of the first three Evangelists, the point now before us is hardly touched on. Christ is to give His life a ransom for 'many' (Mt 20²⁸ ||); and so, too, His covenant blood is shed for 'many' (26²⁸ ||). The contrast in view is between the One suffering and the many saved. In Jn. the differences are more various. The shepherd gives His life for the sheep (Jn 10¹¹). Christ loves His own (13¹). He prays for them and not for the world (17⁹). On the other hand, the ulterior aim is 'that the world may believe' (17²¹ (23)). Lifted up, He is to draw 'all men' (12³²). And, when we turn from the Johannine teaching of Christ to other parts of the Fourth Gospel, we find strong emphasis laid on the fact that Christ is the Saviour of the whole world (1⁹ 3¹⁷ 4⁴²). A Gospel so penetrated with the thought of universalism (I.) was not likely to lend itself to a new particularism as against universalism (II.).

3. It is to St. Paul that the Augustinians and Calvinists look back as their explicit master. All that happens, happens by God's will. All that fails to happen, fails just because it was no part of God's purpose. Salvation, especially, is efficacious; grace is 'irresistible.' Pre-decimated—called—justified—glorified—the stately sequence moves on without pause or uncertainty (Ro 8³⁰). (We omit the initial term 'foreknown' as somewhat difficult—difficult perhaps to both schools of theology.) What God plans, He accomplishes. The necessary obverse of this doctrine—unless transformed by universalism (III.); so Hastie, Theology of the Reformed Church, 1894—is that neither God nor Christ meant any harm for those who are in the issue unsaved. (1 Cor. 13¹²) for some, not for all. But the NT writes differently. Even St. Paul joins in the common confession—'He died for all' (2 Co 5¹⁴). Language which in later theology is found characteristic only of transition Calvinism—i.e. of Calvinism in a state of decay, like Amyraldism—is the natural expression of the faith of St. Paul and of all the NT writers. True, A. Ritschl (J. N. T. i. iii., tr. H. R. Mackintosh and A. B. Mackintosh, ch. ii. § 22) contends that this form of expression is of inferior scientific value to the other set of expressions—noted by us in the Johannine teaching, and in Ro 8³⁰—to which grace is destined to the Church. Ritschl's peculiar doctrine—the Elect=the Church and not=a body of individuals—has found few supporters, and probably will find fewer in the future. His preference for Calvinism is noteworthy, though he was no genuine Calvinist.* Yet we feel bound to hold that it is deeper spiritual vision and not simply lowered logical acumen that makes the NT writers conceivably, sometimes, at the cost of systematic coherence, hail Christ as Saviour of all men. Otherwise, Universalism (I.) seems emptied of moral meaning. In point of fact, the Calvinistic limitation is little heard of now in Great Britain, except among some of the Evangelical in the Church of England and some of the Baptists. And few would now rank it as a burning question.

* Universalism (III.), Ritschl dismissed as 'sentimental.' His own inclination was towards a doctrine of conditional immortality, but he left his eschatology somewhat in the dark.

The controversy has gone to sleep. Or judgment in the cause goes by default.

LITERATURE.—Besides Ritschl and Hastie, referred to above, the attentive reader will find fossil marks of the controversy in some of the hymns of the Evangelical Revival, both Calvinistic and Wesleyan.

III. UNIVERSAL ULTIMATE SALVATION.—1. At the present day, 'Universalism' most naturally suggests to the reader the doctrine of the final restitution of all souls (there are Universalist churches in America in this sense). The doctrine is not, indeed, a novelty. It is found in the extraordinary insistence upon the universality of God's will, in Origen's speculative system; also in Gregory of Nyssa, and others. And Ritschl (Gesch. des Pietismus) notes, with scorn, among the symptoms of post-Reformation 'pietism,' that, ever and anon, hope is expressed even on behalf of condemned and lost souls. The most earnest and ardent supporters in Great Britain of the universalist doctrine have been Thomas Erskine of Linlathen (in his later years; d. 1870), Samuel Cox (Salvator Mundi, 1877), and Caleb Scott of Manchester. But Tennyson's In Memoriam (1849) has perhaps done more than any formal theological work to move opinion in this direction; and there has been a great break-up of the old unhesitating belief in literal eternal punishment. Some have taught the doctrine of annihilation (E. White, Life in Christ, 1875; Petavel [French-Swiss], The Problem of Immortality, 2 vols. 1890-91 [Eng. tr. in one vol. 1892]; W. D. MacLaren), others a limited punishment (F. W. Farrar, Eternal Hope, Judgment, and Judgment, 1881; hinted also in J. R. Illingworth's Reason and Revelation, 1902, ch. xii.). Others plead for uncertainty (E. H. Plumptre, Spirits in Prison, 1884, with full and interesting references; Plumptre's brother-in-law, F. D. Maurice The Kingdom of God, 1853), had stated philosophic doubts as to the meaning of 'eternal.' Present writer's Essays Towards a New Theology, 1889). An original and very curious suggestion is found in A. M. Fairbairn's Christ in Modern Theology, 1893, p. 467. Deity 'cannot' annihilate, but the sentence of condemnation is indeterminate rather than eternal (like sentences of committal to Elmira reformatory prison, N.Y.). Repentance always remains possible. If or when the damned repent, they shall emerge. Besides all these changes or innovations in belief, the growing reticence, and one may say the conservatism, of those who maintain full traditional doctrine is also more significant. Few would now write as Charles Reade did (1856) in his brilliant novel, Never Too Late to Mend (ch. 21), as if the last moments of life on this side the veil were necessarily the last moments of hope for the soul ('Never' too late?).

2. Much of what we have just mentioned concerns us only in so far as it represents a great swaying of opinion towards universalism (in the fullest sense). The three senses of the word which we have been studying form a climax—Christ for all races, Christ for all souls, Christ actually redeeming and winning all. In the theological discussion just noted—Fairbairn is an exception—the question is generally argued as one of NT interpretation. The present writer does not think that hopeful. He sees no ground for challenging the old doctrine on exegetical lines. Words often applied to the universalist hope—Apokatastasis, 'restitution of all things,' Ac 3²¹ (cf. Mt 17¹³ ||, Ac 1⁶)—do not really bear the meaning supposed. One passage teaches probation after death (1 P 3¹⁰), but it hardly falls within the limits of this article. Eternal punishment had come to be the doctrine of the synagogue, and it passed into the NT with perhaps even sharper definition, as a witness to the unspeakable evil of sin. True, the doctrine was not rigorously formulated, and it is a question among interpreters whether St. Paul's teaching is eternal punishment or rather a certain type of conditional-immortality doctrine. But generally the NT is clear, even the language used by Christ; although we note that John 12⁴⁷⁻⁴⁸ and most personal in our Lord's words (Lk 12⁴⁷⁻⁴⁸) goes to modify the dreadful wholesale dogma, and foreshadows, at however remote a time, the ultimate challenging of the letter of this article of the theological creed. Again, as a matter of fact, we cannot claim either the Johannine or the Synoptic point in St. Paul's great argument (Ro 11¹⁷⁻²⁴), as asserting universal salvation. Other plainer passages are decisive. There is a 'son of perdition' (Jn 17¹²), and St. Paul denounces 'eternal destruction' on sinners (2 Th 1⁹). Still, the question recurs here, too, whether the spirit and inner drift of such words—words spoken on the mountain-top of spiritual vision—can be satisfied by anything less than their full meaning.

3. Recent change in theological opinion is largely a matter of moral recoil. We may sum up the moral postulate by saying that, as long as there is hope for the soul, any severity is a holy and gracious thing. But if character sets permanently in the ways of evil, can we credit long-drawn-out suffering? Our generation, from a sense of duty, puts even the cruellest of murderers to a painless death. We, who dare not torture, cannot conceive that God's administration includes endless torment.

4. Passing from simpler moral considerations to a religious speculation, we note that optimism enters into every theistic creed. In some sense—in the deepest sense—what happens in God's world is the best. It is best that evil should be permitted, should show what is in itself, should be conquered. Above all, when God's providence and grace have reached their goal in history, we must be able to say, 'It is best.' Again, God is omnipotent. He cannot, of course, do anything formally impossible or inherently absurd; nor can He 'deny Himself.' But any lawful desire of His children He can and will supply. All that He has is ours, for we are 'heirs of God.' He acts in His own way, according to His own will; yet He grants what we desire, or something better. This is the key which unlocks the riddles of our private lives. Its grandest and most public application is found in redemption. God could not, or would not, ignore the world's sin. He did what was far better, when He sent Jesus Christ. Now, here it seems to us that the divinest issue of history that can be proved universal, and God all in all, not through slaughter of His enemies ('Order reigns in Warsaw'), still less through chaining them in hopeless misery and hatred, but through winning in every heart that victory which, in some of the hardest and darkest of hearts, Christ has won already.

'His blood can make the foulest clean;
His blood availed for me.'

Again, God is our Father. Men have said in the writer's hearing,—some lightly, some with the profoundest gravity and tenderness,—'I could leave no child of mine to endless misery. Can God do that?' We, being evil, cannot but raise this question. Our Maker must answer it.

5. On the other hand, we cannot banish from our minds the tendency of character to set, for good or for evil. As we know it, this tendency remains incomplete. None are perfect, nor may we regard any as beyond rescue. But even a child learns how repetition facilitates either evil or good, and how a delayed reform grows harder and less likely to be achieved. It is no skirmish or sham fight for which we are enlisted. As right differs from wrong by the whole diameter of being, so the issues of the life that has been won for righteousness and love must differ from those of the life that has willingly preferred sin. Measured and limited ill-consequence is in no sort of proportion to the infinite evil of wilful wickedness; and the rhetoric of universalism in the minds of those who 'eddy round and round' is the lazy and lying assurance, 'It will come to the same thing in the end.' God cannot brook this. He must needs threaten sin with its wages; and we have no right to affirm that the most awful of all threats is but an empty or ideal possibility. So, longing with full hearts for a universal restitution of lost souls, we must leave this theme of mystery and terror upon the steps of the Redeemer's throne of grace.

UNPARDONABLE SIN.—The expression is not a Scriptural one, but rests partly upon a saying of Jesus reported in different forms by all the Synoptists, and partly upon two analogous sayings in Hebrews and one in 1 John. It is the saying in the Gospels that we are directly concerned, but the passages in the Epistles must be glanced at as bearing upon our interpretation of Christ's words, and something must be said also as to the place of the subject in Christian experience.

1. In the Gospels.—It is the solemn declaration of Jesus that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit shall never be forgiven, and that it is a matter of fundamental authority. In an examination of these words, several points have to be considered. (1) The occasion of the utterance.—Both Mt. and Mk. connect the saying with calumnious charges of the scribes and Pharisees, based upon our Lord's action in curing demoniacs (Mt 12²², Mk 3^{11, 22}). Lk. gives it a different setting (12²⁹; cf. 11¹⁴); but while it is possible that Jesus used the words on separate occasions, there can be little question that, if He spoke them only once, it is from Mt. and Mk. that we get the proper historical connexions. His work in delivering demoniacs from the power of evil spirits had deeply impressed the multitude, who, according to Mt. (12²³), began to ask, 'Is this the Son of David?' But when the Pharisees heard it, they said, 'This man doth not cast out devils but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils' (v. 24, Mk 3²²; cf. Lk 11¹⁵). Jesus showed the absurdity of such a charge, considered from the point of view of mere reason and common sense (Mt 12²⁵, Mk 3²³, Lk 11¹⁷). And then, suddenly changing His tone as He passed from the logical weakness of His adversaries to lay His finger on their moral and spiritual fault, He uttered those memorable words in which He declared that while all other sins and blasphemies, even blasphemy against Himself, shall be forgiven, whosoever shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit shall never be forgiven (Mt 12^{31, 32}, Mk 3^{28, 29}; cf. Lk 12¹⁰).

2. The nature of the sin.—In seeking for this, the occasion of the utterance serves as a guide. A study of the context in Mt. and Mk. at once disposes of some of the views that have been entertained as to the nature of the sin against the Holy Spirit—all those, e.g., that are associated with the idea that only Christians can be guilty of it. Jesus was speaking to Pharisees, and it is by thinking, in the first place, of the Pharisees and their attitude to Him and His teaching that we get on the right line for arriving at the meaning of His words. He had cast out demons; and the Pharisees said that He did this by the help of Beelzebub. He had delivered men and women from unclean spirits (Mk 1^{33a}, Mt 10¹, Lk 4^{33a} and passim); and they said of Himself, 'He hath an unclean spirit' (Mk 3³⁰). Now, such language is not blasphemy. Jesus strikes us, first of all, as blaspheming the Son of Man Himself—and this blasphemy was counted as. But this was not the aspect of the sin upon which Jesus fastened. On the contrary, He declared that all blasphemy against the Son of Man shall be forgiven. It was possible for men to insult Him personally, through want of thought or ignorance as to His real character. Of all such offenders He was ready to say, as He said at last of those who nailed Him to the cross or reviled Him hanging there, 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Lk 23³⁴). But apart from all questions of His personal dignity, Jesus came revealing in His words and deeds the Divine spirit of holiness and love. The works He did testified to the manner of spirit He was of. But in the presence of the Divine Spirit, the light shone from His beneficent activities, and the Pharisees only gnashed their teeth and declared that the spirit of Jesus was the spirit of Satan. This was blasphemy, not against Jesus only, but against the Divine Spirit that was manifested in Him. And such blasphemy, we must remember, the Pharisees were guilty of, not once, but constantly. Jesus might have affirmed of them, as Stephen afterwards affirmed in the face of the Sanhedrin, 'Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost' (Ac 7⁵¹). John the Baptist had come 'in the way of righteousness' (Mt 21³²); and they said of him, 'He hath a devil' (Mt 11¹⁸, Lk 7³³). Jesus came in the way, not only of righteousness, but of love; and of this incarnation of the Divine grace they said again and again, 'He hath a devil' (Mt 9³⁴ 12²⁴, Mk 3³², Lk 11¹⁵, Jn 7²⁰ 8^{48, 52} 10²⁰). They said this, moreover, not rashly or ignorantly; it deliberately and maliciously. They were blind to the presence with Jesus, but because they hated Him for having crossed them in their paths of selfishness and pride, and revealed both to themselves and others the utter emptiness of their religious life. Their blasphemy thus was not the hasty utterance of a moment, but a vice of their indwelling thoughts and character (Mt 12²⁵); not a single act, but a habitual attitude. The light that came into the world shone round about them; but they loved the darkness rather than the light, because their deeds were evil. And at last they came not only to prefer the darkness, but to hate the light so bitterly that nothing would serve them but to declare to others and try to persuade themselves that it came not from God, but from the devil.

(3) Its unpardonable character.—The unpardonableness of such blasphemy as this, Jesus affirms in language that can hardly be mistaken. In Lk. once (12¹⁰) and in Mt. twice (12^{31, 32}) He declares, 'It shall not be forgiven'—adding in Mt. (v. 32) the ominous words, 'neither in this age (αἰών), nor in that which is to come.' The attempt is sometimes made to soften down the force of the last expression. The present age, it is said, was simply the Mosaic age or dispensation under which the Jews were living; while 'the age to come' was the Messianic age or Christian dispensation. Our Lord's words thus mean only that, whether men live under the Law or the Gospel, blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is unpardonable. They have no reference to the future life; they tell us nothing about a state of doom after death; they do not carry us on to any final issues (so Cox, Expositor, II. iii. [1882] 322). But while it is true that the Jews of our Lord's time used the phrases 'this age' and 'the coming age' to denote the period before and the period after the advent of the expected Messiah (cf., however, Schürer, HJP II. ii. 177), it is clear from the Gospels that Jesus Himself habitually employed them to indicate the age before and the age after His own Parousia (see Mt 13^{39, 40, 49} 24^{28, 29}, Mk 10³⁰, Lk 18³⁰ 20³⁵), thereby throwing 'the age to come' into that future world which lies beyond His Second Advent and the resurrection of the dead (see Salmond, Chr. Doct. of Immort. 381). And if Mt.'s language left us in any doubt as to the absoluteness of His meaning, the doubt would disappear when we turn to Mk. For there we find Him saying of the man who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit that he 'hath never forgiveness', but is guilty of an eternal sin' (3²⁹ RV). It stood by itself, 'hath never forgiveness' would carry a sound of finality with it. And when there is added, ἀλλά ἐνοχός ἐστιν αἰώνιον ἁμαρτήματος, it seems hardly possible to escape from the conclusion that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is here described as a sin for which there is no remedy. The words in the original are exceedingly striking. ἐνοχός (= ἐνεχόμενος, fr. ἐν and ἐχω) means 'held in the grip of' (see Morison, Matthew, in loc.). And if we give to αἰώνιος the meaning it regularly has on the lips of Jesus, 'an eternal sin' appears to mean a sin that eternally persists, a sin that has so fixed itself in the character as to become fixed of destiny. See, further, ETERNAL SIN.

(4) The reason for its unpardonableness.—This does not lie in any limitation of the grace of Christ or of the forgiving mercy of God. It lies in the very nature of the sin as just described. The sin is unpardonable because the sinner has no desire for pardon; it 'hath never forgiveness' because it is not repented of. For when men for selfish reasons hate the light, and persistently shut their eyes against it and blaspheme it, they actually put their eyes out. God's 'sovereign light' still shines about them, but they can no more see it, since they have extinguished their own power of seeing. Eternal darkness is the necessary consequence of eternal sin. It is quite true that ἁμαρτία generally stands for an act, not a state. But from the point of view of exegesis, little can be built upon this. For an act may be the revelation of a state; and when the Pharisees said of Jesus, 'He hath an unclean spirit,' this particular piece of blasphemy, as we have seen, was really the expression of a settled attitude of mind.

2. In the Epistles.—There are two passages in Hebrews that bear upon the subject. In 6⁴⁻⁸ the writer describes the impossibility of a renewal unto repentance for Christians who have fallen away from Christ after having once 'tasted of the heavenly gift' and become 'partakers of the Holy Ghost.' In 10²⁶⁻³¹ he declares that there is no more sacrifice for sins in the case of those who sin wilfully and persistently after they have received the knowledge of the truth. It is impossible to suppose that he means that a Christian cannot be forgiven if he falls into sin, however grievous, or that Jesus is unable to save men to the uttermost (cf. 2¹⁷ 4¹⁶ 10^{19a}). In the second passage certainly, and presumably in the first also, he is speaking of a deliberate repudiation of Christ on the part of those who have tasted His blessings. Once they were enlightened, but they too loved the darkness rather than the light, and so shut the light out of their hearts, and trampled under foot the Son of God, and did despite unto the Spirit of grace. Thus we have here again, though now in the case, not of Pharisees, but of members of the Christian Church, a manifestation of the same kind of sin as before.* In 1 Jn 5¹⁶ the writer distinguishes between 'a sin unto death' and 'a sin that is not unto death'; and while urging Christians to pray for one another with respect to the latter, says that he does not bid them make request to God concerning the former. It seems evident that there is a reference here to our Lord's language in Mt 12^{31f.}, but in itself the passage adds nothing to our knowledge of unpardonable sin.

3. In Christian experience.—The subject is of importance, not only theologically, but because of its practical importance, and that in two different directions. First, at a certain period of his religious history (see below, §§ 96-230) is a type of multitudes who have suffered agonies of spiritual torture through the fear that they have committed a sin for which there is no forgiveness. But if the view taken above is the right one, there is no specific act of blasphemy in word or deed, standing by itself, that we are entitled to think of as 'the unpardonable sin.' The phrase, in fact, is as erroneous as it is unscriptural, though the common use of it has helped to load thousands of sensitive souls with a burden of intolerable pain. There is no mysterious transgression which is sufficient of itself to put a man beyond the power of repentance, and so outside the pale of forgiveness. Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit may find expression and come to its culmination in some specific way; but essentially it is a settled attitude of mind and heart. It is a deliberate extinguishing of that inner light which God Himself has kindled within us, and which ought to respond to His clear shining from without. Such compunctions as Bunyan had are the very best proof that a man has not committed any unpardonable sin, for they are the experiences of one who, though he has not yet realized the all-sufficiency of Christ's grace, is at least of that contrite spirit which

... word, and so may rest upon the prophet's assurance that unto him the Lord will look (Is 66²). 'Sell Him! sell Him! sell Him!' was the urgent persuasion of the Tempter in Bunyan's ear. But though at last in his distraction he felt the thought, 'Let Him go if He will,' pass through his mind, the true intention of his heart was always, 'No, no! not for thousands, thousands, thousands!' (op. cit. § 139).

(2) But if anxious and fearful souls need to be reminded that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is not some mysterious sin into which a man may fall against all the promptings of his better nature, the case of the Pharisees and Jesus conveys to all a message of serious warning. No one can stumble suddenly into unpardonable sin; but men may drift into it after the fashion of the Pharisees. Selfishness and pride, and not least religious selfishness and pride, may slowly harden the heart and sear the conscience and deaden the eyes, until men come to call good evil and light darkness, and are ready at last to say, even of one who manifests the Spirit of God and of Christ, 'He hath a devil.' The special monition of the incident in the Gospels is against that loss of vision which comes from the hardening power of sin, that continual resistance of the Spirit which leads at last to hatred of the Spirit. Poor Francis Spiera, whose case seemed to Bunyan so like his own (op. cit. § 163), may not himself have been guilty of unpardonable sin (cf. Martensen, Chr. Eth. ii. 128); but there is deep significance for all in his solemn sentence, 'Man knows the beginning of sin, but who bounds the issues thereof?' See, further, artt. BLASPHEMY, FORGIVENESS.

UPPER ROOM.—1. The words 'guest-chamber' and 'upper room.'—(1) Guest-chamber (κατάλυμα). In the LXX κατάλυμα denotes (a) an inn or lodging-place: Ex 4²⁴, Sir 14²⁵, Jer 14⁸; (b) a dwelling-place in general: Ex 15¹³, Jer 32²⁴ (= 25¹), (= 33¹²), Ezk 23²¹, 1 Mac 3⁴⁶; (c) a chamber connected with a sanctuary or the Temple: 1 K (= 1 S) 1¹⁸ 9²², 1 Ch 28¹³, being in one case the room where the sacrificial meal was eaten, 1 K (= 1 S) 9²²; (d) a tent: 2 K (= 2 S) 7⁶; (e) the tabernacle: 1 Ch 17⁷ (not B). In the NT κατάλυμα occurs only in Lk 27 (inn, or possibly guest-chamber) and Mk 14¹⁴, Lk 22¹¹ (apparently guest-chamber). The best MSS of Vulg. have diversorio in Lk 27; refectio mea (also in bfi) in Mk 14¹⁴, diversorium in Lk 22¹¹. Of other Lat. MSS (besides differences of spelling, —divor., —dever.), in Lk 27 e has stabu.; in Mk 14¹⁴ Xq* have diversorium meum, Z has diversorium meum refectio mea, B H Θ Mt O have diversorium meum et refectio mea, ff₂ has refectorium, k has hospitium; in Lk 22¹¹ efr have hospitium, a has locus, h has locus.

(2) Upper room (ἀνάγαιον) in best MSS: other MSS have ἀνάγαιον, ἀνωγέων, ἀνωγέως, ἀνώγαιον, ἀνώγειον).

In the LXX ἀνάγαιον does not occur in any form, ὑπερῶν occurs twenty-three times, apparently always in the sense of upper room. In the NT ἀνάγαιον (TR ἀνώγειον) occurs only in Mk 14¹⁵, Lk 22¹², ὑπερῶν occurs only in Ac 1¹³ 9³⁷, 20⁸, both words in the sense of upper room. The best MSS of Vulg. have cenaculum for both words in all places. Of other Lat. MSS (besides differences of spelling, —caen., —coen., —cin., —conn.), in Mk 14¹⁵ k has sub pedaneum, sterraneum (having apparently first written subpedaneum, and then tried to alter it to sterraneum), q has locum stratum, ff₂ has stratum; in Lk 22¹² a has maediamum, b has pede plano locum, d has superiorem domum, q has superiorem locum, ce ff₂ r have in superioribus locum, l has in superioribus; in Acts 1¹³ degig MSS used by St. Augustine (*Adv. 2. Events in the upper room.—(1) The Last Supper (wh. see): Mk 14¹⁷, Mt 26²⁰, Lk 22¹⁴; (2) the washing of the Apostles' feet and subsequent discourse: Jn 13²⁻²⁰; (3) the prophecy of the betrayal of our Lord by Judas: Mk 14¹⁸⁻²¹, Mt 26²¹⁻²⁵, Lk 22²¹⁻²³, Jn 13²¹⁻³⁰; (4) the Institution of the Eucharist: 1 Co 11²³⁻²⁵, Mk 14²²⁻²⁵, Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁹, Lk 22¹⁹⁻²⁰ (see LORD'S SUPPER); (5) the prophecy of the denial of our Lord by St. Peter and subsequent discourse: Lk 22³¹⁻³⁸, Jn 13³⁶⁻³⁸; cf. Mk 14²⁷⁻³¹, Mt 26³¹⁻³⁵, where such a prophecy either that here recorded or a repetition of it is placed after the departure from the upper room; (6) discourse: Jn 14; (7) the departure from the upper room: Mk 14²⁶, Mt 26³⁰, Lk 22³⁹, Jn 14²¹.

It is possible that the room in an unspecified house in Jerusalem where the disciples met after the Resurrection (Mk 16⁷, Lk 24³³, Jn 20^{19, 26}), and 'the upper chamber (ὑπερῶν) where they were abiding' after the Ascension (Ac 1¹³), were the same as the 'upper room' (ἀνάγαιον) in which the above events took place; and that this, again, was in 'the house of Mary the mother of John whose surname was Mark' (Ac 12¹²). 'The combinations are quite legitimate, and only give unity and compactness to the history, if we suppose that the house of Mary and her son was the one central meeting-place of the Church of Jerusalem in the Apostolic age' (Sanday, Sacred Sites, p. 77). At the same time, there is no positive evidence in the NT for the ἀδελφὸν of Mk 14¹⁵, Lk 22¹² with the ἀδελφὸν of Ac 1¹³, or for placing it in the house of Mary the mother of John.

* The signs here used are those adopted in Wordsworth and White's edition of the Vulgate, and Old Latin Biblical Texts. See also Hastings' DB iii. 47-62, iv. 873-890.

3. Places at table in the upper room.—There is some probability in the suggestion (Edersheim, LT ii. 494-95) that our Lord occupied the place of the host, that St. John was on His right hand, Judas in the place of honour on His left hand, and St. Peter in the least honourable place opposite St. John, as shown in the accompanying diagram.

Such an arrangement would account for (1) our Lord telling St. John by what sign to know the traitor without the rest hearing, Jn 13²⁶; (2) the giving of the 'sop' first to Judas, Jn 13²⁶, Mk 14²⁰, Mt 26²³; (3) the inquiry of Judas whether he was the traitor, and our Lord's reply without the rest hearing the latter, Mt 26²⁵, Jn 13²⁷⁻³⁰; (4) the beckoning of St. Peter to St. John, and St. Peter's request that St. John should ask our Lord who was the traitor, Jn 13^{23, 24}; (5) the possibility that in the 'contention' among the Apostles (Lk 22²⁴), if this took place in connexion with the Supper and before it, Judas claimed and obtained the chief place; (6) the possibility that after our Lord's rebuke of the 'contention' (Lk 22²⁵⁻³⁰), St. Peter eagerly seized on the lowest place.

4. The identification of the site.—It is thought by many good judges that the traditional site of the cenaculum (the present building dates from the 14th cent.) is probably the place where the upper room stood. Dr. Sanday (p. 77) writes, 'I believe that of all the most sacred sites it is the one that has the strongest evidence in its favour. Indeed, the evidence for it appears to me so strong that, for my own part, I think that I should be prepared to give it . . . adhesion.' The most interesting . . . tradition are the following:

St. Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. (A.D. 348) xvi. 4: 'The Holy Ghost, who spake in . . . and on the Day of Pentecost, came down on the . . . form of fiery tongues here in Jerusalem, in the upper church of the Apostles: for with us are the most valuable . . . Here Christ came down from heaven. He . . . came down from heaven. And truly it is . . . as we speak of Christ and Golgotha here in . . . we should speak of the Holy Ghost in the upper church. But, since He who came down there shares in the glory of Him who was crucified here, we speak here of Him who came down there, for the worship of Them is indivisible.'

Silvia (or Etheria), Peregrinatio (c. 385 A.D.), 39-43: At Easter 'all the people conduct the bishop with hymns to Zion. When they have come there, suitable hymns for the day and place are said, prayer is made, and that passage from the Gospel is read in which, on the same day, in the same place where the church itself in Zion now is, the Lord came in to the disciples when the doors were shut, that is, when one of the disciples, namely, Thomas, was not there.' On the octave of the Resurrection 'all the people conduct the bishop with hymns to Zion. When they have come there, suitable hymns for the place and day are said, and that passage from the Gospel is read in which, eight days after the Resurrection, the Lord came in where the disciples were, and rebuked Thomas for his want of belief.' At Pentecost 'all the people conduct the bishop with hymns to Zion, so that they may be in Zion at the third hour. When they have come there, that passage from the Acts of the Apostles is read in which the Spirit descends. . . . In Zion is the very place, though there is a new church, where of old after the passion of the Lord the multitude was gathered together with the Apostles.'

Hadrian, Historia (A.D. 392) 14: 'Hadrian' found the site of the temple of the Lord to the ground, and the temple of God trodden under foot, except for a few buildings and the little church of God. It was there that the disciples, on their return when the Saviour had ascended from the Mount of Olives, went up into the upper room (Lk 22¹²); for on that site had it been built. . . . Information, this statement carries back the site to the reign of Hadrian, A.D. 117-138).

Lucian of Capernaum, Historia (A.D. 392) 14: 'Hadrian' found the site of the temple of the Lord to the ground, and the temple of God trodden under foot, except for a few buildings and the little church of God. It was there that the disciples, on their return when the Saviour had ascended from the Mount of Olives, went up into the upper room (Lk 22¹²); for on that site had it been built. . . . Information, this statement carries back the site to the reign of Hadrian, A.D. 117-138).

Theodosius, De situ terre sanctae (A.D. 530), 7: 'Zion, which is the mother of all churches, which our Lord Christ founded with the Apostles. It was the house of holy Mark the Evangelist.'

Liturgy of St. James (Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, i. 53, 54): 'Thy all-holy Spirit, who came down on Thy holy Apostles in the form of fiery tongues in the upper chamber (ἐν τῷ ὑψώματι) of the holy and glorious Zion on the Day of the holy Pentecost.' 'We offer unto Thee, O Lord, also for Thy holy place . . . Thy Christ, and . . . for the holy and glorious Zion, which our Lord Christ founded with the Apostles.'

Hippolytus of Rome, Chronicon (A.D. 235), 1: 'The virgin and evangelist, who remained at Jerusalem, the mother of the churches, at his own house, to which the Apostles fled in fear of the Jews. There also was prepared the Passover. There also the Lord appeared to the disciples after the resurrection. There also He . . . ordained as first bishop the son of Joseph, the brother of the Lord. . . . the all-holy Mother of God (Θεοτόκος) in his house until her assumption (ἕως τῆς ἀναλήψεως αὐτῆς).'

VAIN.—1. 'In vain': Mk 7⁷ (|| Mt 15⁹) μάτην δὲ σέβονται με διδάσκοντες διδασκαλίας ἐντάλματα ἀνθρώπων. This is the only place in NT where the adverb μάτην is found (orig. accus. from μάτη, 'a folly'). The Vulg. has in vanum in Mk., sine causa (= 'without reason,' Cic.) in Mt. Both senses are perhaps included: their worship was 'meaningless' and 'to no purpose' (cf. Ja 1²⁶ μάταιος ὁρησκεία, with Mayor's [Com. on James, 71] apt quotation from Isocrates, ad Nicoclen 18 E, ἡγοῦ θύμα τοῦτο κάλλιστον εἶναι καὶ θεραπείαν μεγίστην ἐὰν ὡς βέλτιστον καὶ δικαιοτάτον σαντὸν παρέχῃς).—Our Lord quotes here from Is 29¹³, where LXX reads μάτην δὲ σέβονται με διδάσκοντες ἐντάλματα ἀνθρώπων καὶ διδασκαλίας. The clause in the Heb. text may be literally rendered, 'And their fearing me is become (יהי) a statute of men which they have learned.' How to account for μάτην in the Gr. text is a question still unsolved. Grotius (Opera, ed. Amsterdam, 1679, ii. 155) thought it evident that the LXX read יהי (= μάτην, cf. Is 49⁴) and not יהי in the Heb. text, so that the clause would then have meant, 'And their fearing me is vain—a statute of men which they have learned!' This brilliant emendation of the text is adopted by Turpie (OT in the New (1868), 196) and Nestle (Expos. Times, xi. 330). It is quite possible that our Lord 'read יהי in His Hebrew scroll of Isaiah,' and that this was the received reading at the time that the Gospels were written. Such a solution of the difficulty would indeed be completely satisfying, but we must remember that the proposed reading is merely a conjectural one, and that no external evidence in its favour has been found. Other suggested explanations of the μάτην in Mt. 15⁹ are, that our Lord used the LXX and . . . it, or that in reporting His answer to the Pharisees the writer or writers quoted memoriter from the LXX (it will be observed that the order of the last words is not the same in the LXX and in the . . .). The latter explanation is the one generally . . . by expositors, some of whom assign reasons still more unsatisfying for the presence of μάτην. But seeing that it cannot be proved that our Lord did not use an Aramaic word corresponding to μάτην in quoting the passage from Isaiah, we feel it best to accept the μάτην as stamped with His authority.—Our Lord by this citation authenticates and carries forward the teaching of the prophets of the OT as to the vanity of that worship which merely conformed to human traditions, and by which it was thought possible to gain the favour of God without moral obedience (cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC 293–295; Driver, Is. 57; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. 282).

2. 'To use vain repetitions': Mt 6⁷ προσευχόμενοι δὲ μὴ βαττολογήσητε ὥσπερ οἱ ἔθνηκοι. Mrs. A. S. Lewis (Expos. Times, xii. 60) approves of the derivation of βαττολογέω from the Arabic b'tal, 'vain,' 'useless,' recently suggested by Blass. 'It is one of those hybrid compounds which come into existence in countries where two or more languages are spoken.' But it is more probable that the word is onomatopoeitic (like βατταρίζω, see Stephanus, Thesaurus, s.v.), and is derived from the sound made by the repetition of the same syllable in stammering or stuttering. Our Lord gives the interpretation of the word in the clause following, 'For they think that they shall be heard for their πολυλογία' (cf. Meyer, Holtzmann, in loc.). What He here condemns is the heathenish idea that a reluctant and ungracious Deity is to be worked upon by our saying the same thing over and over again (cf. 1 K 18²⁶), or by repeating His honours and titles (cf. Ac 19³⁴). In the words ὥσπερ οἱ ἔθνηκοι He calls up a picture of those whom His hearers have no desire to resemble (Expositor, 1900 (i.), 239). 'Pestering the gods with entreaties,' 'dinning into the ears of the gods,' were Roman phrases: thus Tacitus speaks of Galba 'wearying with entreaties the gods of an empire no longer his' (Hist. i. 29); cf. Statius, Thebais, 2. 224, 'Superos in vota fatigant Inachidæ'; Ter. Heaut. v. 1. 6, 'Desiste, inquam, deos obtundere.' Such expressions set forth the contrast between Jesus' teaching of the Divine Fatherhood and the low conceptions about God on which the prayers of the heathen were founded, and give point to the precept, 'Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him' (Mt 6⁸).

That our Lord's prohibition of βαττολογία is not meant to exclude such prolonged and repeated prayers as are genuine utterances of love and desire, the impassioned pressing-in of the devout spirit into communion with God, is evident from His enjoining increasing earnestness (Mt 7^{7–11}, Lk 11^{9–13}) and per-evering importunity (Lk 11^{9a}, 18^{af}) in prayer, as well as from His own example, when He sought relief from the weight and pressure of His work and 'continued all night in prayer to God' (6¹²), or when He 'offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death' (He 5⁷), satisfying the fervour of His feeling of Sonship with the cry, 'Abba, Father,' and returning to His oratory in the depth of the Garden to offer the same prayer as before (Mk 14³⁹ (Mt 26⁴⁴) τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον εἰπὼν, 'the same petition,' rather than 'the same words'; cf. Swete, 327). Our Lord's prayers were the beginning of His continuing intercession (Ro 8³⁴, He 7²⁵), and in the one instance reported of a prayer of considerable length which He offered as His disciples stood around Him (Jn 17) there is a repetition of the same expressions. With respect to the perfect form of words which He taught us in the Lord's Prayer (wh. see), it is by . . . it often that we come to understand . . . and how all our . . . are to be brought under one or other of . . . and when we have not said it well, . . . to say it better a second or a third time. The true sense of our Lord's saying is set forth in one of Bp. Wilson's 'Maxims of Piety': 'The eloquence of prayer consists in our proposing our wants to God in a plain manner' (Maxims, 132), and still better by Hooker in the words, 'The thing which God doth regard is how virtuous our minds are, and not how copious our tongues in prayer; how well we think, and not how long we talk, when we come to present our supplications before Him' (Eccles. Pol. v. 32. 1); cf. Augustine's letter to Proba, quoted by Trench (Ser. on the Mount, 255).

JAMES DONALD.

VEIL.—'The veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom' when Jesus died (Mt 27⁵¹, Mk 15³⁸, Lk 23⁴⁵). The Temple is, of course, the Temple of Herod, and the veil is, the 'second veil' (He 9³) which divided the ἁγία or Holy Place from the ἁγία or Holy of Holies. This is the only reference to the veil of the Temple in the NT, that in Hebrews being to the veil of the Tabernacle. The Greek words are τὸ καταπέτασμα τοῦ ναοῦ. In the LXX naos=נָדָבִיר in Ps 28 (27)² and kar.=(1) קַרְקַר, the curtain before the door of the Holy Place and before the gate of the fore-court in the Tabernacle; and (2) כַּרְמָה, the curtain between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies (Philo, Vita Moysis, iii. 5). The Gospel of the Hebrews, as quoted by Jerome, had: '... passage 'lintel' instead of 'veil' ('superliminare templi infinitae ... ractum esse atque divisum'). It is ... in the Temple of Solomon there was no veil, since it is mentioned only in 2 Ch 3¹⁴; but Thenius' emendation of 1 K 6²¹ 'drew the veil across with golden chains' is good. In the Mishna the veil of the sanctuary is presupposed. e.g. in Yoma v. 1, where the mention of the ark shows that the writer is thinking of the Temple of Solomon. Josephus (BJ v. v. 4) mentions a gorgeously embroidered veil before the הֶקֶל, and a second veil, which he does not describe, in front of the נָדָבִיר of the Temple as he knew it.

A difficulty is occasioned by the fact that there appear to have been in Herod's Temple not one but two veils between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, each representing a surface of the wall one cubit thick, which in Solomon's Temple separated the two places. In Yoma v. 1 the high priest on the Day of Atonement leaves the Holy Place by the south end of the outer veil, walks northwards down the cubit space between the two veils, and enters the sanctuary by the north end of the inner veil. This cubit space is in Middoth iv. 7 called מִדְּבַרְבָּר, that is, ῥάβδους, because in the first Temple it was filled with the wall, and the builders of the second did not know whether to reckon ... according to the Holy Place or to the Holy of Holies. ... another account, there was only a single veil, ... the veil would mean the outer one, which alone was visible to any except the priests. The Kaabah in Mecca has also a veil over its door.

The rending of the veil of the Temple would indicate the end of its sanctity, just as the tearing of a woman's veil means dishonouring her (Hamassa, Freytag, i. 141).

It is a curious fact that Jewish tradition also records the occurrence of certain prodigies about this time. Josephus (BJ vi. v. 3) enumerates several portents which presaged the destruction of the Temple: a sword appeared suspended over the city, a ... sacrificed brought forth a lamb, and ... own accord. Lightfoot (Prospect ... ed. ix. 329) says: 'There are ... Temple-doors' opening ... the scarlet list on the scapegoat's head not turning white.' Compare Plutarch's account of the prodigies which foreshadowed the murder of Caesar.

In He 10²⁰ the veil of the Tabernacle is interpreted as symbolizing the corporeal nature of Christ, and in later mysticism phenomenal existence is termed 'the veil.' In 2 Co 3^{12ff.} the veil (κάλυμμα) which Moses put on (Ex 34³³ מָסַךְ, LXX κάλυμμα) becomes the spiritual blindness of the Jewish nation, probably without any reference to Is 25⁷, where the words are different. The veil on Israel's heart is 'done away in Christ' (ἐν Χριστῷ καταργεῖται).

VENGEANCE.—The word 'vengeance' (ἐκδίκησις) occurs in EV of the Gospels only in Lk 21²², where it refers to God's providential punishment of sin. ἐκδίκησις occurs also in the phrase ποιεῖν ἐκδίκησιν (EV 'avenge') in the parable of the Unjust Judge (Lk 18⁷⁻⁸), and the corresponding verb ἐκδικέω (also rendered 'avenge'; cf. RVM 'do me justice of') is found in the same parable (vv. 3-5). Outside the Gospels these words and the cognate ἐκδικος occur exactly a dozen times. Some of the passages will call for reference in the course of this article. We are not left, however, to the very rare use of this small group of words for our Lord's teaching on vengeance. We gather it from several passages of direct instruction, from His continual insistence on an unvengeful, a forgiving, loving spirit, and from His own conduct throughout His ministry, but especially at its close.

Our word 'vengeance' is closely related to two others,—'avenge' and 'revenge,'—between which, at least in modern usage, an important distinction is made. Both have to do with the redress of wrong. In 'avenge' the idea of the justice of the redress or punishment is prominent. In 'revenge,' on the other hand, the predominant thought is that of the infliction of punishment or pain, not necessarily unjust, for the gratification of resentful or malicious feelings (note, e.g., in Jer 15¹⁹ the substitution in RV of 'avenge' for AV 'revenge,' and on the other hand the retention of 'avenge' in Ro 12¹⁹). 'Vengeance' leans, now to the one, now to the other of these meanings. It may be just, it may be malicious; even when it is just, the motive may be wrong.

1. The aim of Christ was to create in His disciples a new attitude towards those who had wronged them. Evidently He was preparing them, at least in part, for injuries that must come to them as His followers (Mt 5^{10ff.}); but His teaching has, of course, a much wider application. The permission, even encouragement, of retaliation by the OT, and still more the interpretations, exaggerations, limitations of the scribes and Pharisees, Christ swept away with an authority which astounded His hearers. He denounced the attitude of retaliation and hatred, and commanded His disciples to accept the sufferings which fell to their lot. But this was more than a demand for a new attitude. It was the exorcizing of an evil spirit, and the opening of the doors of the heart to a new spirit. An attitude may be merely external and mechanical. Christ wants more. The negative must have a corresponding positive or be morally worthless. Forgiveness and benevolence must take the place of vengeance: love, not hatred, must be the motive of thought and act. 'Enemy' must be blotted out of the vocabulary of the follower of Christ, at least as a category in which any of his fellow-men may be included. Others may hate and persecute him; he must love and pray for them, and do them good. It is this new spirit that is the supreme moral difficulty; it is here that all questions of interpretation and application must find their solution. We must remember, not only Christ's 'resist not,' but also His 'pray for,' and His 'love.'

This teaching of Christ is found constantly throughout the Gospels. He pronounced 'blessed' the meek, the merciful, the peacemakers, the persecuted (Mt 5^{5, 7, 9, 10ff.}). He rebuked James and John when they would have called down fire from heaven on the Samaritan village that would not receive Him (Lk 9^{51ff.}). He taught His disciples to forgive a sinning but penitent brother, not with a niggard, but with a generous and inexhaustible forgiveness (Lk 17^{3ff.}, cf. Mt 18^{21ff.}). He even makes God's forgiveness of a man depend on the man's forgiveness of his fellow (Mt 6¹⁴ 18³⁵, Mk 11^{25ff.}). He taught His disciples to pray that they might be forgiven as they forgave others (Mt 6¹², Lk 11⁴). He warned the Twelve, as He sent them out on their mission (Mt 10), that they would suffer hatred, persecution, even death, for His sake; and charged them to be, in the midst of wolves, 'wise as serpents and harmless as doves' (v. 10), in the endurance of their sufferings to have no fear, but to rely on God.

2. His own conduct during His ministry is the best commentary on His teaching. It is true that there is much denunciation of evil (e.g. Mt 23), that He upbraided for their unbelief the cities where He had wrought His great miracles (Mt 11^{20ff.}), that He swept the Temple clear of those who had robbed it of its sanctity (Jn 2^{14ff.}, Mt 21^{12ff.}). But these are echoes of the Divine wrath; they are not in any sense the expression of personal anger, but of hatred. On the other hand, we have His patient endurance of all manner of personal abuse, His heart-broken lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23³⁷), His bearing during and after His trial (Mt 26, 27), and above all, His dying on the cross: 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do' (Lk 23³⁴).

3. This teaching of Christ, requiring forgiveness and love, is built on a firm religious basis. His aim as a religious Teacher, as Son of God, was to renew the sin-broken fellowship between men and God, to make men sons of God; but the indispensable condition of sonship is unity of nature. The essence of the Divine nature is love, and the highest manifestation of the Divine love is forgiveness and benevolence. The spirit of malevolence, of retaliation, of vindictive dealing with men, is alien to the spirit of God. Therefore it must be banned out of the heart of those who would be sons of God, and replaced by the spirit of forgiveness, of ungrudging love. It is this conception of the essential love of God issuing in forgiveness, in love, that is the basis of the high demands of Christ, and the inspiration and possibility of our response (Mt 5⁴³⁻⁴⁵, 48, 18²³⁻²⁵, Lk 17³²). Note, also, how Christ links the Second Commandment to the First as 'like unto it,' Mt 22³⁹)).

4. If the teaching of Christ seem at first sight impracticable, destructive of moral order, and delivering wrong-doers from the fear of punishment, the answer to these objections is not far to seek. In the first place, liberation from the spirit of vengeance is a moral triumph for the sufferer of wrong. Revenge is evil. It belongs at best to a lower stage of morality and of the knowledge of God. It cannot justify itself to those who have seen God in the face of Jesus Christ. The sons of God must be like the Son of God, like God Himself, who loves and forgives without limit. Further, love is the most potent moral force that the world has ever known. To meet wrong with revenge may be a satisfaction, and may seem a right thing to the natural man. Vengeance may accomplish its object, may fully punish and even crush the wrong-doer. But it does not conquer him, it does not crush the wrong out of his heart, it does not make him ashamed of his sin, it does not win him to good and to God. Love does—not always indeed, but often—and nothing else can. Love is a heaping of coals of fire on an enemy's head (Ro 12²⁰), the kindling of a fire in his heart, the overcoming of evil with good, the triumph of God. See art. RETALIATION.

5. There is a further and a very solemn strain in the teaching of Christ, in which we find the final answer to the fear that moral anarchy may arise from the exorcism of the spirit of vengeance. The clearest expression of it is found outside the Gospels (Ro 12¹⁹): 'Avenge not yourselves, beloved, but give place unto wrath [τῇ ὀργῇ, the wrath, the wrath of God]: for it is written, Vengeance belongeth unto me; I will recompense, saith the Lord. To avenge ourselves is to assume the prerogative of God. So Christ teaches, e.g., in the parable of the Unjust Judge: 'Shall not God avenge his own elect? . . . I say unto you, that he will avenge them speedily' (Lk 18⁷). It is in this light that we must read all Christ's words of denunciation, His parables of Judgment, His judicial acts (such as the cleansing of the Temple), His lament over impenitent Jerusalem. 'It shall be more tolerable . . . in the day of judgment' (Mt 10¹⁵; cf. 10³³ 11^{20ff.} 12^{36ff.} 16²⁷, Jn 8⁴⁴). The moral order of the world will be vindicated by Him whose right alone it is to mete out vengeance to evil-doers, who alone has adequate knowledge and wisdom to do justice to sin.

It would, of course, be easy to hold this teaching of Christ in a wrong spirit, to cherish a sense of satisfaction that, even if we may not avenge ourselves, yet vengeance is certainly in store for . . . This would be entirely contrary to . . .

Christ. It would be the old evil spirit of vengeance in a new form, a more subtle and therefore a worse form. It would mean an utter absence of the love which Christ inculcates, which desires and prays for the good of the enemy. It would be the conquest of ourselves by evil, not of the evil in others by good. But, on the other hand, the moral sense which God has implanted in us, and which He has strengthened by His revelation of Himself, could not rest satisfied unless it were assured that evil shall not go unpunished, that unrepented wrong shall receive its due reward from an all-wise and, let us add, an all-loving God.

VERILY.—A formula of asseveration or corroboration.

The Hebrew is נֶאֱמַר, and, while it is translated in the OT by the LXX into τίναρτο (cf. Ps 72¹⁹) or ἀληθὺς (cf. Jer 28[35]¹⁰), and by Aquila into παρασπαινω, it is simply transliterated by the NT writers, except St. Luke, who, in deference to his Gentile readers, gives ἀληθὺς parallels have ἀμὲν (Lk 9³⁷—Mt. 21³—Mk 12⁴³).

According to R. Judah ben Sima, the formula had three uses: (1) in swearing (cf. Nu 5²²), (2) in expressing confidence (cf. 1 K. 17³⁶), and (3) in expressing confidence (cf. 1 K. 17³⁶). In the latter two, would add impressiveness to a doctrine, he prefaced it with Amen, 'Verily,' signifying that it was a tradition received by Moses on Sinai.† The congregation responded Amen to the prayers in the synagogue, a usage which passed into the Christian ecclesia;‡ and the Talmud warns against 'an orphan Amen,' meaning one uttered without consideration, or in ignorance whereto the response is being made.§

It is somewhat unfortunate that, where it is an asseverative preface, our versions have translated ἀμὲν by 'verily,' and, where it is a liturgical response, have simply transliterated it. Let it be understood that the word is the same in both cases. See art. AMEN.

Jesus, like the Rabbis, was accustomed, by way of bespeaking His hearers' attention, to preface important declarations with Amen, 'Verily.'|| All our Evangelists represent Him as doing so; but whereas the Synoptics put on His lips a single 'Verily,' St. John makes Him in every instance reduplicate the formula, 'Verily, verily.' What is the explanation? It is out of the question to suppose that, since the Johannine and the Synoptic logia are in no case identical, Jesus may have spoken after both fashions, employing now the single, now the double 'Verily.' It does not appear that the latter was in use among the Jews, and it may be assumed that Jesus always spoke according to the Synoptic representation. Lightfoot makes a shrewd and far-reaching comment on Mk 5⁴¹. Talitha, kum means merely 'Maiden, arise!' And this is all that Jesus actually said; 'but in His pronunciation and utterance of these words there flashed forth such authority and commanding energy, that they sounded no less than if He had said: "Maiden, I tell thee, arise." (Cf. Mt 9^e with Mk 2¹¹ = Lk 5²⁴). May not this be the explanation of St. John's reduplicated 'Verily'? VICARIOUS SACRIFICE.—The word 'vicarious' (vicarius from viciis, 'change,' 'alteration') means acting, or suffering, for another, or in the place of another. The idea of change, transfer, or substitution pertains to the term. It has the same root as 'vice' in 'vicegerent,' 'viceroys' or 'vicar,' and other words which signify that one person has assumed the place, position, or office of another. It may mean 'in-read of' (ἀντὶ), or 'in behalf of' (ὑπέρ). The word 'sacrifice' (from sacer, 'sacred,' 'holy,' and facere, 'to make') means something devoted, or offered at a cost; and in the stricter religious sense means something consecrated, or offered to a divinity as an acknowledgment of benefits received, or as a propitiation for favours to be extended. Sacrifice (wh. see) is a somewhat different act in different cults and in different stages of religious development, but has in it the idea of a means of access to Deity through a material oblation, and the purpose of securing His favour. When the service is voluntarily undertaken, or when it is assumed at a cost to the individual and for the sake of another, no personal benefit being expected in return, we have sacrifice which is vicarious. Vicarious sacrifice, therefore, has been appropriately defined as 'voluntarily assuming the place and entering into the condition of some one for his benefit.' The two words, 'vicarious' and 'sacrifice,' add to each other, and together well define a phenomenon which we find occurring in the more advanced religions, and especially in the religion of Christ.

'Vicarious sacrifice' is not a Scripture expression, but is used by theologians to represent the meaning of a large number of passages found in the NT, in which the substitutionary character of Jesus' sufferings are referred to, as, e.g., the one in which Jesus describes the end of His coming as a λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, a ransom for many (Mk 10⁴⁵). These passages have generally been held to teach vicarious sacrifice; but just how the words are to be understood, in what sense the sufferings of Jesus were vicarious, whether we are to consider the terms to mean 'in behalf of,' or 'in the place of,' whether the vicarious sacrifice was made in the interests of God (Satisfaction theories), or of men (Moral and Sympathy theories), or both (Mediation theories)—these questions have constituted some of the most disputed problems of theology, and have been the ground on which have been developed diverse conceptions which for hundreds of years have animated the Church. As far as the words 'vicarious sacrifice' are concerned, they can be used in either sense, for Christ's sacrifice would be vicarious if it were made to propitiate the offended dignity of God, or uphold His justice, or maintain His law, or satisfy the demands of His ethical life, or reveal the content of His ethical nature in a supreme manifestation of saving love. To determine in which sense the words are to be understood, that they may reveal to us the true teachings of Scripture, it is necessary to make a careful study of those passages which they are used to sum up or represent.

In doing this we meet with the following serious difficulties. (1) The lack of unity in the Biblical mode of representation from the view-point of Christ's work and sufferings is too diverse and manifold. (2) The fact that Christ's work is set forth both by Himself and the Apostles in metaphors and symbols which cannot be given a close logical interpretation. It has been well said, 'We make a mistake if we take their symbols of thought as equivalents of spiritual realities, or if we treat their sentences as propositions', which we may deduce the uttermost color from. (3) The NT figures are illustrations, not definitions; their expressions were forced on them by their past thought and experience, and are flung out towards truth as their best means of approximating to it (Lewis). (4) While some of the figures are rooted in popular conceptions of religious service and are drawn from the Jewish sacrificial system, others are bold strokes of the imagination, and are capable of various meanings. (5) The different views held of the Jewish sacrificial system from which the NT figures and expressions are drawn constitute a difficulty. Some regard them as close types and symbols of Christ's work, and give them expiatory value (P. Fairbairn); while others affirm that 'they disclose no trace of the idea of vicarious substitution, nor of propitiation' (Westcott). (6) Some texts used singly seem to teach what other texts contradict, e.g. 'I am the vine' are loose statements, not to be taken with too much literalness; that they represent phases of a doctrine and not the whole of it, or that they are metaphorical. (7) The fact that there are two ideas of sacrifice in the OT—one of the priests and one of the people—has been a serious difficulty from the standpoint of history, while Jesus and St. Paul represent more the ideas of the prophets. (8) The difficulty of freeing ourselves of a priori ideas in our interpretations of Scripture, dogmatic conceptions having been planted in our minds in childhood, and become a part of the religious atmosphere in which we move. (9) Finally, the difficulty of getting at the meaning attached to terms among the Palestine Jews of Jesus' time, such terms, for example, as 'ransom', 'redemption', 'propitiation', and certain legal expressions. In studying the Scriptures, therefore, to ascertain in what sense we are to understand Christ's vicarious sacrifice, we are to note the individualism of the expressions, their figurative character, their lack of logical exactness and definition, their relation to their time, and the fact that their authors are concerned with stating facts and results rather than developing theories. We are to interpret the passages in a free and vital rather than in an exact and literal way, note the general character of the teaching, the essential truth they reveal, and not be troubled by the technicalities of the language, or by the question of the exactness of the translation.

1. The teachings of Jesus in the Synoptics. Our first source of information concerning the way we are to understand the vicarious sacrifice of Jesus must be His own teachings. Too many have overlooked this and started with the conceptions of St. Paul, as if the human teacher were a clearer witness than He who was Himself the revelation. If there is any squaring to do, St. Paul must be squared with Jesus, not Jesus with St. Paul, for the Master did not preach a partial gospel. As we study His sayings concerning His sacrifice, we note that He regards it as necessary, voluntary, vicarious, and redemptive, and that He relates it (1) to the establishment of the Kingdom, (2) to the remission of sins, (3) to the ratifying of the covenant. (1) Jesus considers His vicarious sacrifice as necessarily involved in His work of establishing His Kingdom. He opened His ministry with the announcement, 'The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand' (Mk 1st, cf. Mt 4th). The Kingdom of God was not the 'politico-ethical commonwealth' (Pfeiderer) which Jewish prophecy had described, but a spiritual society, established by the grace of God, of righteous men having fellowship with one another and with a common Father. To the forming of His Kingdom He devoted Himself to the service of heart, and so well the hazard it involved; for He was free from traditionalism of the age, its formalism, its lack of spiritual vision, its worldly lust and ambition, and He knew full well the opposition He would stimulate and the conflicts He must encounter. The history of the prophets was before Him, and the blood of the martyrs cried to Him from the ground. Even Plato was able to perceive 'that one perfectly just could not appear among the senseless and wicked without provoking a murderous hatred.' The law of righteousness, fundamental in His Kingdom, would, He knew, cut across the self-interests of men, as well as the conservatism of the Rabbinical teachers of the day. Consequently He compares Himself to the good shepherd who lays down his life for the sheep, and states the terms of His discipleship as follows: 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me' (Lk 9²³). Nor did He mistake the facts, for early in His career this idealism developed which increased in intensity until it culminated in the Crucifixion. Only by a denial of His vocation in establishing the Kingdom of God could He have saved His life; but by what was impossible with Him—the failure of the will of God and the ceasing to love men. Thus we see that vicarious sacrifice was necessarily involved in His work of establishing His Kingdom, and in this sense was not singular or exceptional, but came under the general law of service. Whatever more is to be said as to the significance of Christ's death, this at least is certain, that He died as a faithful martyr for truth and love' (Bruce).

(2) There seems, however, to be something deeper in Jesus' consciousness than the mere fact that His work of founding His Kingdom will so cross the world-spirit of selfishness and sin that He will develop an antagonism which will end in His vicarious death. He clearly relates it to the fact of remission of sins. In Lk 22³⁷ there is a deeper thought than Hollmann has in mind when he says: 'He is only thinking of the dreary fact that His countrymen are going to treat Him as a criminal instead of as the Holy One of God,' for this passage was associated in the minds of His hearers with a Messianic work of the greatest significance. Stronger statements are found in Mk 14²²⁻²⁵. Jesus is going with His disciples to Jerusalem, and on the way seeks to impress them with what He has stated very earnestly before, that in Jerusalem He will be delivered to mockery and death, but in three days will rise again. This announcement is followed by the ambitious request of James and John for chief seats in His Kingdom. With His mind filled with the thought of His coming passion, He replies to them, 'Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink the cup which I drink, or be baptized with the baptism with which I am baptized?' Then follows in an address to the disciples, who are indignant at James' and John's request, the notable words, 'For the Son of Man also came not to be ministered to, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.' The correct interpretation of this passage is most important, for it is much emphasized by those who seek to find in Jesus' teaching an expiatory reference.

Dr. Baur and others have questioned its integrity, affirming that there is nothing like it in the Synoptics except Mt 20²⁸, which Baur also casts under suspicion, that it is a later addition, abruptly as to its context and its relation to the preceding and following, and if genuine it has been omitted by Luke. The criticism, however, seems scarcely valid, for in speaking to the disciples about the nature of greatness—that its value lies in service—it was natural that Jesus should allude to His expected death of which He had previously spoken, using it as an illustration of the point He was enforcing.

The passage has had various interpretations.

Usually much weight has been attached to the word λύτρον, 'ransom,' and its Heb. equivalents, these being assumed to fix its meaning; but this is unsatisfactory, for the LXX has employed λύτρον to translate four different Heb. terms, and besides, since Jesus spoke Aramaic, it is not certain that λύτρον, in the way the LXX uses it, exactly represents what Jesus said. If an exact interpretation were required, we should have to know the Aramaic word of which λύτρον is the translation. Hollmann has discussed this term cogently and ably, showing that Jesus probably did not use the Aram. cognate of kōpher, but the equivalent of a Heb. word derived either from קָפַר 'to ransom,' דָּלַק 'to deliver,' or פָּקַד 'to set free.' Thus λύτρον would mean a purchase price, or a means of setting free. In this case ἀντί, of which much is made, would not signify 'in place of' and establish a thought of substitution, but 'for,' and the passage would mean that Jesus would give His life for the freeing or saving of many—an interpretation which would fit in with the context much better than if λύτρον is taken as the equivalent of kōpher. The idea would then be that men of the world find greatness in assuming superiority over others, whereas Jesus finds it in serving others. But if we assume that λύτρον means in this passage what it means in the LXX tr. of Leviticus, where the main idea of the ransom is that of substituting one thing for another, and if we hold that ἀντί means 'in place of,' the most that we can make out of the passage is that Jesus gives His life as a ransom price to liberate many who are in bondage. But what is the bondage? Taking Jesus' other teachings into account, we cannot doubt that it is bondage to selfishness and sin, such selfishness and world-spirit as James and John had just shown. This would accord with the use of λυτρόω found in 1 P 1¹⁸ and Tit 2¹⁴. But even if this is the meaning, the passage does not state the process or manner of the ransom. The thought that because the word is taken from the old sacrificial system we must find there the meaning that is to be attached to it, is not warranted by sound principles of exegesis. That the thought of a vicarious satisfaction offered to God is not intended, is rendered clear by the fact that such an interpretation would contradict the whole tendency of the teachings of Jesus, who constantly emphasized the free grace of God as ready to forgive every repentant sinner. Jesus does not conceive of His work as an offering to God, or for the sake of God, but as performed solely in behalf of men. We conclude, then, that the important passage simply means that Jesus vicariously sacrificed His life in order to save men from the selfishness of sin. How He thought His death would accomplish this is not stated, and is a matter of inference. If anything is certain, it is that a complete surrender to the good is such a break with the world-spirit which has just revealed itself, even in such good men as the sons of Zebedee, that if men will accept this serving spirit and act from the motive of self-denying love, they will thereby win an inner, moral victory over the world, and thus be freed from its bondage and evil.

Another passage in the Synoptics which has been made to do service in attempts to explain the nature of Jesus' vicarious sacrifice and its relation to the remission of sins, is His utterance upon the cross. The depth of agony there expressed in the cry, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' is said to indicate that in this dark experience Christ as a substitute was suffering in its place the wrath of God against sin; that He was exiled from the joys of God's presence (Dale), because He was vicariously bearing the consequences of the transgressions of the race. There has been a tendency since asceticism invaded the Church, and the body was made the seat of sin,—and to crucify it was considered a way to please God,—to magnify the importance of the physical and make them the supreme which remission of sins has come. This was not the thought of the Apostolic age, which was impressed with His grace rather than by His physical sufferings. Christ's death had long been before His contemplation, and from it He never shrank. He spoke of it with calmness and dignity, and sometimes with apparent rapture: 'the Son of Man should be glorified' (Jn 12²³). But when He refers to its modes and agents, He assumes another tone. It is the form not the fact of death from which He appears to shrink. He is overcome by the thought that the agents of His suffering are the religious leaders of His time, and that from His own company has arisen a traitor. Evil is using the occasion of His voluntary, vicarious death as an opportunity for more violent manifestation, and the men He is trying to save are at work to put Him to death. The highest revelation of His grace is the occasion for the manifestation of wickedness. Being of it, not thinking about it, but experiencing it, this fact of evil comes upon Him with an overwhelming reality, and for a moment His sensitive soul is clouded, and He lays hold of a sentence found in Ps 22¹ and utters it as the most suitable words at hand by which to express His agony. The psalm does not mean abandonment by God, but abandonment to suffering, for later it increasingly expresses the confidence of the sufferer that he will be heard and delivered by God, so that he shall yet come to praise Him; nor does Jesus mean that He is abandoned by God and, substitutionally, under the crushing load of His displeasure, for He stays Himself on the fact that in His agony God is His God. As has been said: 'He who wrestles with death with such pious longing upon His lips has not fully lost His God, but rather presupposes a still abiding relationship with Him' (Wendt). We cannot, therefore, believe that the words on the cross are in any sense a consciousness of God's displeasure.

(3) But not only do the Synoptics relate Christ's vicarious sacrifice to the remission of sins, they also connect it with the ratification of the New Covenant, especially by the words spoken at the Last Supper. The account is found in all the Synoptics and in 1 Co 11. There has been a good deal of criticism concerning the true text, some holding that eis ἀφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν and περὶ πολλῶν, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν are later additions. Some also affirm that ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη of Lk. are words due to the influence of St. Paul. Some of the reasons suggested for this criticism seem to have weight, but nothing that has been said is at all decisive, so that it is best to let the text stand. To interpret its meaning we must remember the occasion with which it is connected—the celebration of the Passover. This feast was regarded as a memorial of the delivery from bondage, and was at the time of Jesus a joyful festival. In the discourse of the Last Supper the symbolism used is not drawn from the Paschal lamb, but rather from Ex 24, where the sacrifice established to celebrate the new covenant between Jahweh and Israel at Mount Sinai is described. The victim was slain, divided into two parts, and the passing between these parts was blood. Thus the covenant was partaking of the flesh in common indicated communion. As the offering at Sinai sealed the Old Covenant, so Jesus, when about to die, looked upon Himself as the victim whose blood would seal the New Covenant which He had established in inaugurating the Kingdom of God. Says Stevens (Chr. Doct. of Salv. 50):

'The Supper is, then, the symbolic ratification of the New Covenant, analogous to the solemn rite by which the ancient covenant was confirmed by an offering denoting the establishment of communion with God and participation in the blessings of His grace. If regard be had solely to the language of our Lord at the institution of the Supper, it must be admitted, I think, that it is adapted to carry our thoughts not in the direction of the current Jewish ideas of propitiation by sacrifice, but rather toward the conception of a new relation of fellowship with God and obedience to Him constituted by Jesus' death.'

We conclude, therefore, that we do not find in the Synoptics any teaching which warrants the deduction often made, that the vicarious sacrifice of Christ is an offering made to satisfy the justice of God, propitiate Him in the sense of His displeasure, or secure the remission removing objective obstacles to the free movement of God's grace.

2. Vicarious sacrifice in the writings attributed to St. John.—The writings which are ascribed to St. John present the vicarious sacrifice of Christ in a somewhat different light from the Synoptics. There is much use, in these writings, of the thought that men become free through light, or that salvation is by revelation. If one walks in the light, that is, holds fellowship with God in righteousness and love, he is saved.

It is not necessary here to go into the critical questions concerning authorship and other special difficulties which these writings present. We believe the balance of argument is in favour of their authenticity. One cannot fail, however, to note that the historic reality which characterizes the Synoptic accounts is here invaded by the subjective, mystic type of thought of the author. The parable gives way to the doctrinal discussions. The doctrine of the Kingdom is by discourses about eternal life. There that the discourses of Jesus found in Jn. were not delivered in the form there presented, but have been worked over in the contemplations of the Apostle. St. John's religious consciousness, however, has been the influence of Jesus, and his statements and built up on the basis of the real sayings of the Master. They are therefore of the highest value.

(a) The Prologue to the Gos. ws out the above conception, and of Christ's vicarious sacrifice the revelation of the Father. By illuminating the world, Jesus saves the world. He shines in on the darkness of human society and thus gives life. 'This is life eternal, that they should know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent' (Jn 17³).

But along with this conception of redemption (through revelation, there is another line of passages which refer to the sufferings and death of Christ, and which relate these to His saving office. St. John seems to have clearly recognized that sin is a power which excludes the coming in of light, and that therefore it needs in some special sense to be overcome. The first of these passages is the announcement of John the Baptist: 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1²⁹). Many have questioned the genuineness of a statement so different from those with which the Synoptics begin the ministry of Christ; but admitting it to be authentic, we have the following facts to note concerning it: (1) It is suggested by Is 13⁷. (2) The phrase ὁ αἰρων means 'who removes,' as the LXX uses other terms for bearing sin. (3) While the words 'the Lamb of God' go back to the Jewish sacrificial system, as here used they are connected with the conception of prophecy and not of ritual. (4) There is early to join this passage to the consequences, or punishment of sin.

Jn 3¹⁴⁻¹⁶ is a passage which seems to represent a sentiment of Jesus, probably enlarged and given in the words of the Apostle. It contains the following teaching: (1) That the vicarious sacrifice of Christ originated in the love of God. (2) That acceptance of it by faith secures eternal life. (3) That the lifting up on the cross is an exaltation before men. (4) That it is necessary (δεῖ) in order that men should not perish, but have eternal life.

There is ... idea suggested in the passage, but the ... seems to be that the voluntary death of Christ on the cross 'is the mode in which the love of God asserted itself and became effectual for the salvation of the world' (Terry).

The vicarious sacrifice of Jesus is taught also in other passages; as Jn 6^{50, 51} 10^{11, 15} 12²⁴ 15¹³, and in the High-Priestly prayer in ch. 17. Jn 6^{50, 51} is not an allusion to the Lord's Supper, but is connected with the miracle of the loaves, the ... multitude suggesting the idea of ... of Jesus' mission to bring to men spiritual manna by the partaking of which they would have life. It does not refer to atonement, but to something present and available.

The dominating idea is that of ethical appropriation, which Lightfoot describes as follows: 'To partake of the Messiah truly is to partake of Himself, His pure nature, His ... His spirit.' Jn 10^{11, 15} does not speak ... offering for sin, but rather 'of an exposure to loss of life consequent upon faithful care of the sheep' (Terry). Jn 12²⁴ states only the general law that to effect results in the moral world one must sacrifice himself, a principle of which the life of Jesus is the supreme illustration. Jn 15¹³ is an important passage, as some have made τὸ θάνατον τῆς ψυχῆς ὑπέρ point to a substitutionary death of judicial ... but there is no reason to see in it ... a complete consecration of life to the good of others, that withholds not even when it leads to death. The Johannine use of τὸ θάνατον favours this interpretation, as does the relation of this passage to the ... of how men should give themselves to one another's good. Nor does the word ἀγιάζειν (17¹⁹) necessitate a sacrificial or expiatory giving of Himself; for in other passages in Jn. the word is not used in this sense. Moreover, the disciples could not sanctify themselves in this manner. The passage simply means the complete consecration of His life to His work with all that it involved, but it does not give any special interpretation of His death.

(b) In the Epistles of St. John we come upon passages which seem more dogmatic, notably 1 Jn 1^{7, 21, 31, 35, 41}. In these passages, as in the Fourth Gospel, we have clearly set forth the fact that the work of Christ originates in the love of God, and is 'a move on His part to provide a covering of sins.' The word ἱλασμός, which is tr. 'propitiation,' means covering or blotting out. Westcott says: 'It contains the notion not of appeasing one often in anger, but of altering the character of that which interposes an inevitable obstacle to fellowship. The propitiation, when it is applied to the sinner, neutralizes the sin.' Deissmann shows that its strict classical meaning is lost in the NT, and that it is applied to any sacrificial offering. The context in 1 Jn. also is against giving the term a relation to the righteousness of God, since it is deduced from the Divine love (4¹⁰). Consequently we must see in this word a covering of sin in the sense of cleansing from it, or propitiation. That which separates from the fellowship of God is not any exigency of the Divine government, or any offence to the Divine nature, but it is the fact that man has chosen to walk in darkness, has participated in the works of the devil. His sin must be put away, and this the blood of Jesus is able to accomplish. If we are asked how, we know no better reply than that of Beyschlag in the following passage (NT Theol. ii. 448):

'Now what can "cover" the sin of the world in the eyes of God? Only a personality and a deed which contain the power of actually delivering the world from sin. For the sin which allows itself to be broken, and to disappear—that only can God forgive and consider extinct. This is the general view of the OT and the NT. Christ in His death has gained a power to thus deliver the world from sin. By His union with God and His love to God and the brethren in the conflict, even to blood and death, with ... d, He has overcome the spirit of selfishness ... the world, and in consequence of that He is able to overcome it in every heart into which He finds entrance. He has thus become to the Father the Surety for the purification of humanity, and for His sake the Father can offer forgiveness, if men will receive and obey Him.'

(c) The ideas found in the Apocalypse are practically the same as those found in the Fourth Gospel and the Johannine Epistles. They have been summarized as follows: '(1) That death is regarded as a great demonstration of love (1⁵). (2) It is a death which once for all has achieved something. There is a finished work in it (1⁵). (3) It is a death which has an abiding power (v. 6). (4) This abiding power is exercised in this, that it enables men to be faithful to Christ under persecution, to suffer with Him rather than sin, finally, rather to die than to sin (12¹¹). (5) Hence the blood of Christ both does something once for all, in breaking the bond which sin holds us by, and bringing us into such a relation to God that we are a people of priests; and does something progressively, in ... our gradual assimilation to Jesus Christ ... witness' (Denney, Death of Christ, p. 250).

3. The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice in the writings of St. Paul.—St. Paul's doctrine of vicarious sacrifice is very difficult to interpret, although strongly emphasized; and consequently opinions have varied more concerning his meaning than concerning the thought of any other Biblical writer.

The reasons for this are: (1) The unsystematic form in which he often presents his ideas. (2) The use of diverse figures. (3) His considering the subject from different standpoints. (4) His use of abstract and ideal rather than historic conceptions. (5) The failure to realize that St. Paul is controlled by a practical rather than a theoretical motive, that he is not consciously developing a systematic statement, but is ... experience, and trying to adjust his own ... (6) His large use of Pharisaical phrases and terms or thought in ... experiences, making it difficult to decide how ... to be taken. (7) His evident desire to find a harmony between certain incongruities between his old beliefs and his present ... and experience. (8) His rhetorical temper, ... extravagant emphasis in the midst of logical discussion. (9) The necessity he felt of dwelling on some conceptions, as the sufferings and death of Christ, because they were so contrary to current thoughts and ... doctrinal and ... Adam and the Fall as literal historic facts. (11) The little use he makes of the Christian tradition, seldom referring to the life or teachings of Jesus—'I neither received it from man, neither was I taught it' (Gal 1²). (12) The fact that Christ with him is the Christ of his spiritual intuition rather than of historic knowledge and observation.

Because of these characteristics, we are, in interpreting St. Paul, to observe the following principles: (1) Not to be too literal or exact in method, or to crowd his figures. (2) To understand that we have to do not simply with the revelation of Christ, but with the reflexion of a man of deep religious feeling, 'fiery fancy,' and ... power, who is developing facts into do ... he is doing this for practical purposes rather than to give the Church a theology, and aims to ... characteristic of his day. ... of the man, out of which he wrote, is not fully dissociated from Rabbinical dialectics and Pharisaical ... been well wrought into the framework ... He had to express himself by means ... of ideas lying ready in his consciousness, which bore a decided Jewish stamp. (5) That he is sufficiently tinged with Alexandrian methods of interpreting Scripture to use Biblical citations in accommodated ... (6) That the Alexandrian ideas about the opposition of flesh and spirit, the carnal man and the heavenly man, have determined the direction of some of his reflexions. (7) That the Pharisaical theology had much to do in determining the form of his presentation of the doctrine of vicarious sacrifice. This theology construed the relations between man and God from the legal standpoint. Men who do not fulfil the law ... involved in guilt. This guilt must be ... must be visited on the offender. Good deeds, meritorious performances, voluntary mortifications are availing, but with most men the guilt of misdoing is so great that such compensations are not sufficient to balance accounts and avert deserved punishment. Hence it is necessary to look to the superfluous merit of one eminently just or holy person to be imputed to sinners for the covering of their deficiencies. (8) While the husk of St. Paul's thought is at times Jewish, there is in him a kernel of his own, a spiritual and inner side which we must grasp to understand his real teachings. Most of the theories of vicarious sacrifice which do not accord with our modern ethical spirit and with the principles of our modern thought, arise from making too much of the 'earthen vessels' into which Paul's real beliefs are cast, and it is clear that we must get rid of these to find the 'heavenly treasures.'

Most interpreters see in St. Paul a twofold Christ's vicarious sacrifice, a product of his Pharisaical conceptions, and a product of his vivid religious experience. A. B. Bruce thinks they indicate different stages of the development of the doctrine of vicarious sacrifice in the Apostle's thinking, but one can scarcely consider them as 'two doctrines,' for (1) They are wrought out in the same Epistles; (2) They interpenetrate. Pfeiderer explains them psychologically, making them the expression of 'two souls which always struggled with each other in the breast of the Pharisee and the Apostle Paul, namely, the legal Jewish soul and the evangelical Christian soul.' As the juridical conception arises in his discussion with the Jews and has reference to Jewish ideas only, it may be that the juridical element is adopted as a form of argument which will be most convincing to a special class, and that it is not intended for a universal form in which to put the doctrine. We shall, therefore, not depend so much on the form as on the reality which seems to lie behind it—the spiritual idea—in trying to set forth Paul's view. The main positions of the Apostle which bear on his conception of Jesus' vicarious sacrifice can be stated in the following heads:

(1) Man is separated from God by the fact of sin.—This is due (a) to the attitude of God toward sin. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who, light having been given them, are without excuse and are treasuring up for themselves wrath in the day of wrath (Ro 1¹⁸⁻²⁰, Eph 5⁶, Col 3⁶). (b) Man because of sin is at enmity with God, minding the things of the flesh and not the things of the spirit, nor being subject to the law of God (Ro 8⁶⁻⁹). For men to be brought back to God they must be led to renounce sin, for God can never allow it or harmonize with it.

(2) God wants to save men from sin and reconcile them to Himself.—(a) The work of reconciliation, St. Paul says, is begun by God, who was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself (2 Co 5¹⁸⁻¹⁹), who sent Him forth (Ro 3²⁵, Gal 4⁴) to redeem them which were under the Law; and since He 'spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not also with him freely give us all things?' (Ro 8³²). In view of these explicit statements, there is no place for the idea that Jesus' vicarious sacrifice was to reconcile God to us. The word καταλλάσσω, 'reconcile,' is used three times in 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²⁰, and in each case the reconciliation is to God, and not of God to the world. The noun κατάλλαξις is twice used in this passage to indicate the gift given to us, and reinforces the verb. The peace the sinner receives through this reconciliation is a peace πρὸς τὸν θεόν, toward God, and not a peace of God toward men. Christ, therefore, in seeking the salvation of man, is the expression of God; it is God's action, God's kindness, God's sacrifice. Whatever Christ meant in His life and work God meant. (b) This idea is further enforced by the passages which speak of Christ's work as one of grace (Ro 3²⁴): those who would be justified by the Law are fallen away from grace (Gal 5⁴), for salvation is the gift of God (Eph 2⁷⁻⁸).

(3) There are certain obstacles to God's free forgiving grace which must be overcome.—(a) Such an obstacle is not the ethical nature of God, or His justice, which demands a propitiatory offering or substitute in punishment to make it possible for Him consistently to forgive. This idea is entirely out of harmony with the passages just referred to, which make God originate the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, and which make Christ's act God's own. If God is Himself acting in Christ, St. Paul cannot anywhere mean that Jesus is seeking in His sacrifice to obtain something from God which He is not willing to give. It has been well said, 'since God was working in Christ there was nothing in God to overcome' (Clarke). Certain passages, however, are said to teach a theory of expiation which has objective reference, and show the necessity of removing obstacles to forgiveness in the nature of God. Some of these are 1 Jo 2², 2 Co 5²¹, Gal 3¹³, and Col 2¹⁴. St. Paul, it is held, in these passages teaches that sin is an offence to the righteousness of God, and this righteousness must be vindicated and compensated before forgiveness is possible. Bearing in His death the punishment due to us, Christ has satisfied the Divine righteousness, so that God can consistently exercise His grace toward sinners. This makes Christ's vicarious sacrifice penal.

The interpretation is objectionable for the following reasons:—(a) Judicial punishment and forgiveness are incompatible, for forgiveness means the withdrawal and not the infliction of such punishment. The disapproval of God is the soul of the punishment of sin, but this is withdrawn when forgiveness is extended. If it is the purpose of God to reconcile man to Himself, and if He is in the world in Christ seeking to bring this about, the attitude of disapproval of the sinner which makes the penalty of the sin has been cancelled by His own act, and there can be no moral necessity in God which demands a judicial rather than an ethical vindication of His righteousness. (b) Punishment is non-transferable, and any infliction of it on a substitute is not punishment but something else. (c) When St. Paul speaks of Christ's sacrifice in relation to us, he always uses ὕπὲρ ἡμῶν 'in our behalf,' not ἀντὶ ἡμῶν, 'instead of us.' (d) St. Paul's conception of the righteousness of God is not judicial but ethical, and it is not satisfied by something offered to it, but by such an expression of it as destroys sin in man. (e) It is difficult to see how, if our sins have been atoned for by a substitutionary sacrifice, faith in Christ is necessary to salvation. When a debt is paid the obligation is released. (f) The idea does not do full justice to God's antagonism to sin, as the extinction of it is more to be desired than the punishment of it.

The statement in Ro 3²⁵ that God sent forth Christ to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to show His righteousness, cannot mean that Christ's vicarious sacrifice is intended to make us righteous for God to forgive us. εἰς ἐνδειξιν means to show, or demonstrate. Now, as Tymms has said: 'Before the righteousness of an act can be shown, or proved, or demonstrated, it must actually be righteous in itself. To say that a demonstration of a thing or a quality can produce a thing, or confer the quality demonstrated, is absurd.' If God is in Christ, this whole line of interpretation must be cut out. The passage is contradictory and incapable of being understood, if with Sanday ('Romans' in ICC) we reply to the question, Who is propitiated? the answer can only be "God." The word θυσία has been given four interpretations, of which we prefer the tr. 'mercy-seat,' since this is its accredited meaning in Biblical Greek, and since the symbolic significance of the mercy-seat made it a fitting figure for the Apostle to use. This interpretation also best explains the phrase 'in his blood,' and the middle voice employed in the Gr. verb προέθετο, 'set forth for himself.' The thought, therefore, is that God sent forth His Son 'as the reality and fulfilment of all that was symbolized in the mercy-seat.' God will no longer look upon sin, or consider it, in the case of those who by faith in the blood of Christ accept His provision. Thus God's righteousness will be revealed in His grace.

(b) Nor is the obstacle to God's forgiveness 'the Law,' of which St. Paul makes so much, considered as a judicial principle, having rights which must be met. It is often said that Christ suffered vicariously to satisfy the claims of the Law, and sometimes this idea of law is developed into a system of moral government which must be vindicated. Gal 3¹³ says, 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law.' 'The law' here is manifestly the Mosaic law, and the 'us' cannot mean those who never lived under this law, but must refer to Hebrew Christians. The Jews who were under this discipline were freed from it when they believed in Christ, for He established a new covenant. St. Paul's language must not here be made universal, for it applies only to a limited class of people. St. Paul clearly tells us that we are justified, not by anything done to or for law, but 'apart from law,' as a pure act of grace. All thought of justification on the principle of law is in Ro 3²⁰ ruled out. As has been said, Christ's gospel is not a 'veiled legalism,' and He did not work out for men a 'law of liberty' which they could not have obtained. Says W. N. Clarke (Outline of Theol. p. 336): 'If grace comes simple and whole-hearted into the world, it does not come to satisfy legal demands or win law-righteousness. . . . God does not deal with men through Christ in the character of lawgiver, or judge, or in any special character, but in His real character as God, His own very self, in personal relations with His creatures as their very selves.' Indeed, what is the Law in any true sense but God revealing to men His nature as righteous? It is not an abstract thing apart from God that has rights, or can make demands, or needs vindication. Our relations are with a person and not with a system.

There is, however, according to St. Paul, one thing necessary in order to make it possible for God to forgive, and that is, His opposition to sin must be shown. He must be Himself revealed as One who wants men to leave off sinning and become righteous. God could not be satisfied without providing some adequate revelation of this fact, and He has provided it in Christ.

(4) The reconciliation which God desires to effect is accomplished by the vicarious sacrifice of Christ; for this Christ was sent into the world; for this He lived, suffered, and died. St. Paul makes much of the cross. It is the heart of his theology, because it is God's supreme self-expression in sacrifice to sinful man. In 2 Co 5¹⁵ we read: 'He died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died and rose again.' No clearer passage is needed to show that God's forgiving grace is mediated through the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, and that His inmost heart is thus made manifest. Christ became man's Saviour (a) by His absolute obedience. 'For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous' (Ro 5¹⁹). Christ has resisted sin unto suffering, sacrificed the creature will to the will of God, become obedient unto death, even the death of the cross (Ph 2⁸), and so has conquered sin by breaking through its general dominion. To those who join themselves to Him, He imparts the same power through the influence of the Spirit. (b) He has also vicariously borne our sins. St. Paul does not say that He has borne the consequences of them, or the punishment of them, but He has taken our sins on Himself in such a way that they have been a burden to His heart and caused Him to suffer. He has borne them in the sense that He has borne with them. To God incarnate in Christ, sin, as the despoiler of those whom He loves and wishes good, must be offensive, must be an affliction, a source of suffering and pain. God's sympathy is always being taxed by the evil of the world, His holiness is always being offended, and His heart is ever being grieved. In a real and vital way this is sin-bearing—this enduring it in patience, this carrying it upon the heart. Another way in which Christ bears our sins is in labouring to overcome them. Sin puts on God a great task, that of suffering and labouring to save the world. This sin-bearing is what St. Paul refers to when he says, 'Him who knew not sin he made sin on our behalf, that we might become the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5²¹). This does not mean that He made Him a sinner, for God was in Christ; but in His work of expressing God's love for men, Christ so identifies Himself with humanity that He feels its sin as a personal burden. It is an utter mistake to interpret this passage, as many have done, to mean that Christ was made to suffer the punishment of sin, or that guilt was imputed, or transferred to Him, which is an ethical impossibility. The bold figure simply refers to such an identification with men as to make their burden of sin Christ's own. The much quoted passage in Gal. (3¹³), 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us; for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree,' is to be explained in a similar manner. This is a strong expression based on Dt 21²²⁻²³. Christ's death on the cross had the outward appearance of His being an accused criminal, and by metonymy expresses the humiliation and suffering of Christ in His vicarious identification with men under the curse of the law.' Says Terry: 'He entered into the depths of human suffering, and felt most keenly the bitter exposure of sinful man to the curse of violated law; and, being Himself without sin and without any law, He was the more capable of becoming sore troubled' over the sin-cursed humanity under the curse of holy law'.

(c) In bearing sin, Christ condemns it and establishes God's righteousness, establishes it by manifesting it. The punishment of sin is not the strongest way of expressing one's condemnation of it; a stronger way is to be willing to endure sacrifice to save one from it. It must be an awful thing, if God will go to such lengths of suffering to rescue men from its evil (Jn 3¹⁶). Men risk their lives only to save their fellows from calamitous dangers. God suffers in Christ, only because He looks at sin as an awful, destructive fact. Nowhere is the righteousness of God, as over against sin, seen so clearly as in the death of Jesus. (d) The vicarious sacrifice of Christ also expresses God's willingness to save. 'God commendeth his own love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us' (Ro 5⁸⁻¹¹). It is a voluntary expression of interest in us that withholds not at the greatest possible cost; and wins gratitude and response if anything can awaken them. Love can go no farther. In such a work God does His utmost to bring men to Himself. The vicarious element in Christ's life satisfies God, for it is God's highest effort for man's recovery; and it satisfies man, for it shows Jesus as his personal Saviour.

(5) The vicarious sacrifice of Christ becomes available through faith.—Men cannot maintain a passive relation to Christ and be saved from sin; they must join themselves to Him by a living faith.

They must die with Him on the cross, and rise with Him to newness of life. They must be one with Him in the fellowship of His sufferings. Christ must be in them their hope of glory. 'I live no longer,' cries the Apostle, 'but Christ liveth in me; and the life I now live, I live by faith in the Son of God' (Gal 2²⁰). By fellowship with Christ the old man is put off and dies. The Christ living in us becomes the power by which we break absolutely with the sin of the world, and win a victory over it. This is being saved—being delivered from sin and brought . . .

A man who in the obedience of . . . not the intellectual principle of belief, but the act of trust—joins himself to Christ, brings himself thereby into fellowship and moral unity with Him, and becomes possessed of the mind of Christ—the mind of hostility to sin and love of the good (Gal 3²⁶). Christ who has ascended in the Resurrection, descends into the heart of the believer in order to assist and complete the freeing, saving work. It is because of this that St. Paul lays such emphasis on the Resurrection in connexion with his doctrine of salvation. He 'was delivered up for our trespasses, and was raised for our justification' (Ro 4²⁵). Having been reconciled to God, the believer lives the new life of righteousness by faith, which becomes a continuous experience, and will be consummated in an eternal salvation.

(6) St. Paul also has a doctrine of a new humanity obtained through Christ's vicarious sacrifice, which grows out of the importance he attaches to human solidarity. Salvation is not only individual, but also social. This feature of St. Paul's thought has recently been worked out in an interesting way by Dr. Olin A. Curtis in The Christian Faith (pp. 317–337). The end of God in redemption is 'to obtain a race of holy men.' 'God wanted an entangled race.' While Christ is the source of help and strength, the social solidarity of men makes it essential that the social organism be redeemed, for men must help to complete one another. The new humanity built up in Christ becomes a body of which He is the living head, and for which He ever makes intercession.

4. The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice in Hebrews.—The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice as set forth in Hebrews, although elaborate, need not be especially considered here, as this Epistle gives us no new information of importance. The subject is extensively discussed with special reference to the symbolism of the OT, the doctrine being set forth largely in terms of sacrifice. We do not hear anything about 'the law,' or about satisfaction to it or to God's righteousness. Here Christ is a pure offering in sacrifice to God, but His death is not received as a substitutionary expiation. The absence of this idea is the more remarkable that the author so closely approximates it. Had he shared this conception, it is not easy to see why he did not bring it forward in connexion with such assertions as that Christ made propitiation (ἱλασκεσθαι) for the sins of the people (2¹⁷), tasted death for every man (2⁹), and was offered to bear away the sins of many (9²⁸).

'Not the satisfaction of the law, the removal of the curse, the endurance of the penalty of sin, . . . or the . . . is assigned as the reason why . . . would be made perfect through sufferings (2¹⁰). . . deduces the necessity of Jesus death from the very fact that He is a priest. It is the calling of a priest to offer sacrifice, hence "this high priest must also have somewhat to offer" (3¹), and that "somewhat" can only be His own life. In another place this necessity is derived from the import of the word διαθήκη. This word has two meanings—"covenant" and "testament." Our . . . one meaning to the other in the elaboration . . . The first covenant was sealed by a death; in fact, wherever a testament or will goes into effect, it does so in consequence of a death; therefore it was needful that the establishment of the New Covenant should be ratified by a death, that is, by the death of Christ' (Stevens, op. cit. 76 f.).

One interesting fact concerning this Epistle is the ether . . . author attaches to the whole . . . making it, as applied to Christ, an entirely different thing from what it is in the Levitical ritual and ceremonies.

The Epistles of St. Peter will not be considered, for they shed no new light on the problem under discussion.

5. Summary of results.—In concluding our investigation of vicarious sacrifice in the NT, we summarize our results as follows: (1) The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice is the very heart of the Scriptures. It is the harmonious note of all the Biblical writers, finding expression in the OT sacrifices, in the life and teachings of Jesus, and in the writings of the Apostles. God is seeking to develop a righteous people, a holy race, and the process or method is by vicarious sacrifice.

(2) In the Scriptures the doctrine is largely expressed in . . . and symbols, and current conceptions which make its interpretation difficult, and have led to much misunderstanding. Many theories have been built up on what close analysis shows to be only a metaphor, or Jewish sacrificial term. We must not strain popular language to give exact scientific statement.

(3) While Biblical writers assert their individuality in stating the fact of vicarious sacrifice, setting it forth in different ways, they all agree in what it is and what it does—that it is a method of God to save men from sin and bring them into fellowship with Himself.

(4) The Scriptures discuss the doctrine of vicarious sacrifice from different standpoints and in different relations, and do not give us what may be called a theory of the subject. It is proper for us to attempt to construct one from what is revealed, but we must have in mind the significance of the Scripture presentation.

(5) St. Paul differs from other writers in having a theology, and in having worked over the facts of Christ's vicarious life and death in the crucible of his own thinking. In doing this he has had in mind a special class of hearers, the Jewish law under which they and he have lived, and the relation of Christ's work to it; and he has expressed his thought in terms of the Pharisaic theology in which he has been trained, and has used certain conceptions from Palestinian and Alexandrian sources which we must take into account in interpreting him. While he has developed his conceptions in legal forms, he has saved himself from legalism by exhibiting the ethical content of Christ's work and vitally relating it to life.

(6) The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice . . . not in a judicial or rectoral relation of . . . a deeply personal fact and expression. (a) It is founded by God in His personal interest in and love for men. It is the unfolding of God's heart to sinners, and God is in Christ reconciling the world to Himself. (b) It seeks a personal end, namely, the salvation of sinners and their restoration to the personal relation of fellowship with God. (c) All theories, therefore, which make it effect a change in God are . . . The fact that Christ is the Logos . . . ts such conceptions.

(7) Christ's vicarious atonement, because grounded in personal relations, is to be explained not as a judicial, but as a deeply ethical and spiritual fact. It embodies and represents not God's rectoral or judicial relations, but His moral nature. It is a transaction in the realm of spirit, expressing in an empirical event a spiritual principle. We can interpret it only by rising above the abstract fictions of logic into the realm of the realities of the moral life, seeing in it not forensic transactions, but the living action of spiritual laws. Therefore, it is not (a) a compensation to law, as if law had an objective reality, and rights apart from the Being whose expression it is; or (b) a compensation to justice, as if justice and grace were in antagonism in the Divine nature, and His attributes were more than diverse reflexions of the action of His harmonious being, or as if a mechanical device, of which God is Himself the author, can compensate His justice. 'Divine justice seeks the triumph of good over evil, and hence identifies itself with love.' (c) It is, therefore, in no sense penal. It really impeaches the moral government of God to introduce an expedient, in order to render it possible for a moral Being who has created men, and taken upon Himself responsibilities in so doing, to be able to forgive His erring creatures. All these and other theories are developed out of the old idea of God's transcendence, considering Him as a Being above, ruling from without, a King on His throne, a Judge on His judicial bench, at least a Being separate, outward, remote, when the true conception is that of His immanence, as One who acts in the world, tabernacles with men, entangles Himself with our life. This is the Scriptural idea: 'In him we live and move and have our being.'

(8) Vicarious sacrifice is an expression and revelation of God. This the Scriptures abundantly teach. It manifests God's feelings about sin, the intense opposition with which He regards it; and it reveals God's love for the sinner, the depth and power and sacrificial character of it, leading even to suffering and death.

(9) The work of Jesus in salvation is closely related to the Kingdom of God. The teachings of Jesus centre about this Kingdom. He dwells on it, and puts it forth as His mission. He is come to establish on the earth. But men can enter His Kingdom only by availing themselves of the benefits of the vicarious sacrifice of Christ. They must thus come to know God, and live in that spiritual fellowship with Him which constitutes the social bond of His Kingdom.

(10) The mediator of Christ's sacrifice is rendered necessary. Not all receive its benefits as a penal satisfaction renouncing their sin and its penalty. It must be brought from an outer to an inner fact, to an experience of life, and this is possible only through a living faith which unites men to God in obedience and fellowship. By the personal participation in Christ's vicarious work for us, we become 'partakers of the divine nature' (2 P 14), and Christ comes to 'live within us,' 'our hope of glory' (Gal 230, Col 127). God's method of salvation, therefore, is by faith, bringing the soul into constant and living contact with One who embodies the higher spiritual life. We are not saved by sight, but by touch.

(11) Salvation by Christ's vicarious sacrifice is a continuous process, and not a finished work. His life and death are historic facts, but they are perpetuated in their meaning in this, that Christ has passed into the heavens, where He abides as our perpetual Mediator. He was 'raised for our justification'; but, more than that, He has come to us invisibly in the person of His Spirit, who continues His work by taking on Himself the burden of trying to influence us to accept the benefits of Christ's sacrifice and God's forgiving grace. 'The eternal Spirit and God and Christ are all one in this ministry of reconciliation, and the Lord Christ has no more finished His work of mediation than has the Holy Father or the Holy Spirit finished yearning for mankind' (Terry).

(12) Christ's vicarious sacrifice has constituted a new humanity, for it is not simply an individual, but a racial fact, seeking to produce a redeemed human family, that shall constitute the very 'body of Christ.' There is a profound meaning in the intercessory prayer of Jesus that we may be one, as He and the Father are one, 'I in them and they in me,'—and to the effect that we may be 'sanctified by the truth' and 'perfected in one,' and finally be with Him where He is, in the glory which He had with the Father before the world was (Jn 1719-24). St. Paul has this end in mind in Eph 26, where he speaks about being raised up with Christ, and coming to sit with Him in the heavenlies. The discipline of life is to help in our work of preparation, and in our realization of the great consummation of our salvation in Christ.

VICTORY (νίκος, Mt 1220, 1 Co 1555-57; νίκη, 1 Jn 54; νικη 1 S 195, Pr 2131).—Mt 1220 is a quotation from Is 423; but in the latter the word used is נֶפֶשׁ 'truth,' and not 'victory.' It is the same word, νικη (fr. νικω), which is used by our Lord in Jn 1633 'I have overcome the world,' and in many other places in the NT, to express the idea of the mind of Jesus there is only one victory. It is not the triumph over social and financial difficulties which issues in worldly success, but that mastery over our lower nature and the powers of evil within and around us which issues in self-control, and the subjection of the whole life to the will of God. This is the one real victory, without which any other is but a fleeting phantom. It was the victory which He Himself gained, and which His true disciples are enabled to achieve through His aid and guidance. This victory brings with it such blessings as forgiveness, deliverance from the dominion of sin and from the fear of death, a deep sense of the moral order of the world, peace with God, and life everlasting.

VINE, VINEYARD (ἀμπελών).—Vine-culture was one of the oldest industries in Palestine. This is attested by the presence of rock-hewn wine-presses and traces of ancient vine terraces where all is wilderness to-day. Work in the vineyard furnished occupation to many (Mt 2018, 21). Landowners planted vineyards, and let them to husbandmen (Mt 2132, etc.). The vineyard required much care and attention. It is planted in a dry-stone wall, a bank of thorns, or a deep ditch. If it be on a slope, the terrace must be of good repair, lest the soil be washed away by rains. The ground is well tilled with a hoe, and thoroughly cleared of alien roots. Pruning is done in Dec. or Jan.; the blossom is out in April and May; the vintage is general in Sept., but somewhat earlier in the Jordan Valley. The 'tower' (Mt 2133 etc.) is the shelter for the watchman who guards the crop against injury from man and beast.

The familiar form of the vine, with its abundant and luxuriant branches, would lend itself all the more readily to the allegorical use of Jesus, inasmuch as 'in the OT, and still more in Jewish thought, the vine was the symbol of Israel, not in their national, but in their Church capacity' (Edersheim, LT ii. 520; cf. Jn 15). See next article.

The fig and the vine are often closely associated (Lk 13⁶). The mod. Arab. karm stands for both vineyard and fig-tree. From the Mishna we gather that 200 years after Christ vine-culture was still a flourishing industry in Palestine. With the coming of the Arabs, vineyards almost entirely disappeared. During the last cent. the industry has in some measure revived under the influence of the German and Jewish colonists in Palestine, and the French in the Lebanon. Both E. and W. of Jordan the vine is now largely cultivated. The grapes of Eschol are in high repute.

VINE, ALLEGORY OF THE.—In the allegory of the vine (Jn 15¹⁻¹⁰) Christ describes the close relation which exists between the disciples and Himself, and impresses on them the necessity of the continuance of this intimate union as the indispensable condition of fruitfulness on their part. The other side of the allegory is not developed first and then followed by the interpretation, but figure and interpretation are woven together throughout the passage. When we separate them we find that the figurative material is comparatively slight. It presents to us the picture of a vine tended by a husbandman who takes away the unfruitful branches and cleanses the fruitful, i.e. cuts off from them all useless shoots, that they may become more productive. Attention is also directed to the fact that the unfruitful condition of fruit-bearing is that the branch abide in the vine. If by any chance it is separated from the parent stock, it is of no more use, but is cast forth from the vineyard and withers away, and is fit only for firewood.

In the interpretation Christ Himself is the vine ('the true vine' is the phrase used, of which we shall discuss the significance presently); His Father is the husbandman; believers, especially the disciples, are the branches. As there are unfruitful branches in the natural vine, so there may be some who, in spite of their communion with Christ, yet prove unproductive. The fate which overtakes them is similar to that of the unfruitful branches of the natural vine. The Heavenly Husbandman severs the connexion between them and Christ (v. 2^a). Wherein fruitfulness consists Christ does not say. Some take it as the keeping of His commandments (v. 10), and the practice of that righteousness whereby the soundness of the tree is proved (Mt 7¹⁴, 20-21), while others think specially of that Apostolic work which is to fall to the disciples (so Bruce, Training of the Twelve, p. 402). By the cleansing of the branches (v. 2^b) we must understand such Divine dealings as tend to greater fruitfulness in the life of the believer. The process of cleansing in the natural vine suggests to us the chastening discipline to which the Father subjects believers (so de Wette). But in proceeding to speak of the disciples, to whom He now directly refers as the branches, Christ gives a more general interpretation of the figure of cleansing. They are already clean, He says (v. 3), on account of the word which He has spoken to them, i.e. the revelation He has given them has had a purifying influence upon their life. The vital matter for them is to continue in such close relationship to Christ, whose word has had this cleansing influence upon them, that they may ever remain clean. Therefore He proceeds to insist upon the necessity of their abiding in Him, i.e. making Him the source from which they derive all their strength and nourishment (v. 4). This is the indispensable condition of fruitfulness in the spiritual life (vv. 4-5).

Before proceeding to describe with greater fullness the blessed results that follow from such close adherence to Him, Christ pauses to indicate the fate of those who sever their connexion with Him (v. 6). They are like the branches that have been broken off from the vine, which are cast out of the vineyard and wither away, and are gathered together and burned. Some would find an exact equivalent to all the details in this description. The casting forth corresponds to their exclusion from the Church, the withering to their loss of spiritual life, the gathering to the work of the angels (Mt 13^{30, 39}), and the fire to Gehenna. In any case the language indicates the certainty of the destruction that awaits all who break away from their adherence to Christ. In contrast to this, Christ proceeds to describe the condition of those who abide in Him. United to Him in close communion, they will obtain whatsoever they ask (v. 7). The result will be abundant fruitfulness to the glory of the Father, whereby they will become true disciples of Christ (v. 8). The exhortation to abide in Him is finally strengthened by an appeal to the example of God and Christ in their relation to one another. Christ's love to the disciples is like the love of the Father to the Son. As Christ abides in the love of the Father by keeping His commandments, so will the disciples abide in the love of the Son if they keep His commandments (vv. 9, 10).

Such is the course of the allegory. The following points in connexion with it may be briefly discussed:

1. What is meant by the true (ἀληθινή) vine? It is often taken as suggesting that the natural vine only imperfectly represents the idea of the communion of Christ with believers. But why should the vine be selected rather than any other plant? And in what respect is the organic relationship suggested by the figure only imperfectly represented by the natural vine? H. Holzman understands the phrase as meaning that Christ is the vine which belongs to the higher world and has been planted by God in the midst of mankind; and he finds here another instance of the Platonic tendency of the Fourth Gospel to regard sensible things as imperfect copies of archetypes which exist in the world above (Handcom. ad loc. and p. 35). Calvin takes the phrase as equivalent to 'Ego vere sum vitis'; and van Koetsveld (De Geloof van den Zelfmoord, ii. 199 f.), on the analogy of the true light (1^a), and the true bread (6²⁻³⁵), understands it as meaning the vine which may be called so in truth, and does not merely bear the name and appearance of such. But in the case of the true light, the true bread we can understand the force of the adjective in this sense, as light and bread are metaphors which we are in the habit of employing in a spiritual reference, and it is proper to emphasize the fact that, for the illumination and nourishment of the spiritual life, a higher light and bread than the natural are necessary. But before we can understand the force of the adjective as applied to the vine, we must recognize in what sense it is appropriate to introduce the vine metaphorically in a religious reference. The Old Testament supplies the connexion. The vine was a familiar metaphor as applied to Israel (Jer 2²¹, Ezk 15¹⁻¹⁷, 19¹⁰⁻¹⁵, Ps 80⁸⁻¹⁶, cf. Is 5¹⁻⁷). But Israel had proved unfaithful to her calling. She had 'turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine' (Jer 2²¹). Delitzsch has further pointed out that the vine is used as a symbol of the Messiah (Iris, Eng. tr. pp. 184-186). It is with reference to this familiar metaphor that Christ calls Himself the true vine.

The idea that was held before Israel in the prophetic application to her of the figure of the vine is realized in Him and His disciples.

2. What is the relationship between Christ and the disciples indicated by the mutual abiding in one another? Viewed from the side of the disciples, this relation is presented as an injunction, 'Abide in me'; from the side of Christ as a promise, 'and I in you,' i.e. and I will abide in you (v.⁴). This is the usual interpretation of the verse, though Bengel makes the injunction embrace the whole: 'Facite ut maneatis in me et ut ego maneam in vobis.' In the following verses more particular statements occur, which seem to define more clearly the relationship thus indicated. But the difficulty is to determine to which of the sides of the relationship the statements in question apply. Thus in v.⁷ we have the phrase, 'If ye abide in me and my words abide in you.' Does the latter clause take the place of the 'and I in you' of v.⁴, or is it a fuller description of the clause immediately preceding it, thus corresponding to the 'abide in me' of v.⁴? Either view may be adopted with some show of reason. In support of the first, it may be pointed out that, on this interpretation, the phrase exactly corresponds to the 'He that abideth in me and I in him' of v.⁵. On the other hand, when it is remembered that the 'and I in you' of v.⁴ contains a promise, and that in v.⁷ the two clauses together embrace the condition upon which the promise which immediately follows ('ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you') depends, there seems good ground for taking the clause 'and my words abide in you' as a more definite statement of what is involved in our abiding in Christ; while the promise which immediately succeeds may be regarded as presenting under a new aspect what is meant by Christ's abiding in us.

Again, in v.⁹ we have another aspect of abiding presented, 'Abide ye in my love,' i.e. continue to be the objects of my love. Here again the question arises, To which of the two abidings does the phrase apply? To our abiding in Christ, or to Christ's abiding in us? The parallelism of the phrase to the 'abide in me' of v.⁴ favours the first alternative. On the other hand, it may be pointed out that while the phrase occurs in v.⁹ as an injunction, it is repeated in v.¹⁰ as a promise, conditional on our keeping Christ's commandments. Now, in the interpretation of v.⁷ suggested above, to have Christ's words abiding in us, i.e. to keep His commandments, corresponds to the 'abide in me' of v.⁴. Here, therefore, the promise which is held forth to those who keep the commandments, i.e. to those who abide in Christ, will correspond to the promise of v.⁴, and to abide in Christ's love will represent under a new aspect what is meant by Christ's abiding in us.

Each of the ways of regarding the verses in question yields a view of the relationship of the believer and Christ to one another which seems to be true in fact, and to harmonize with the general Johannine conception of that relationship. To have Christ's words abiding in us is a phrase which, in view of the importance assigned in this Gospel to the word, may well represent what is meant by abiding in Christ. It is in the word that Christ reveals Himself, and that only is the true relationship to His Person which involves trustful acceptance of, and obedience to, His word (8³¹ 14^{15, 21}). On the other hand, just because of the importance thus assigned to the word as that through which Christ reveals Himself, the phrase may likewise denote the manner in which Christ abides in the believer. The sanctifying power of the word has already been referred to in the passage (v.⁸). The words which Christ speaks, they are spirit and they are life (6⁶³), and to have them abiding in us is already to have eternal life (5²⁴). In like manner, to abide in Christ's love is a phrase which may equally well describe either our abiding in Him or His abiding in us. Our abiding in Christ may in v.⁴ be the condition upon which the promise of Christ's abiding in us is given. But in the spiritual life it is difficult to draw a hard and fast line between conditions and consequences. The conditions upon which promises of blessing are fulfilled become an integral part of the blessedness bestowed. To abide in Christ's love is at once the condition and the constituent of spiritual blessedness. It is at once our abiding in Christ and Christ's abiding in us. These two abidings seem to be the same relation viewed from different sides. On the one side we have the aspect of the relation presented, on the other the objective (Weiss, Die johan. Grundbegriffe, p. 71); on the one side the attitude of faith towards the Saviour, on the other the response of the Saviour to the faith which unites the believer to Him. See also art. ABIDING.

3. Can we accept the allegory as authentic in its present form? It has been felt by some that that form is far from satisfactory. Illustration and interpretation are mixed together throughout. No clear and connected picture, of which the details are in due course interpreted, is brought before the mind; but the figure of the vine is used as the foundation upon which is based a series of metaphors, loosely strung together, describing the relation of Christ and the believer to one another. When we compare it with the parables and similitudes of the Synoptic Gospels, we realize at once what a vast difference there is between them. It has been suggested that the allegory of the vine may have been originally a parable which John has worked up into its present form. B. Weiss believes he can find the original elements in vv.^{2, 4, 6}, and thinks that it had taught that, as the husbandman does all in his power to make the vine productive, but if his efforts are in vain casts forth the worthless branches and burns them up, so God's purpose in the planting of the Kingdom of God in Israel had been to increase the fruitfulness of its members, and if that purpose is not fulfilled the only result will be the exclusion of Israel from the Kingdom. The main point in the allegory, however, have been that the increasing number of branches depended upon their abiding in the vine, but that this abiding might be forfeited by continued unfruitfulness. But the Evangelist, who ever puts the personal relation to Christ in the foreground, made this abiding in Christ as the condition of fruitfulness in the religious life the central thought, though in vv.^{2, 6} the original tendency of the parable is still apparent in Meyer's Kommentar, 1893, ad loc., and l. c. (p. 334 ff.). Jülicher thinks that Weiss is influenced by a desire to make John approach as closely as possible to the Synoptists; and while he does not believe the allegory as preserved by John to be genuine, confesses himself unable to conjecture what its original form was, supposing it to be based upon authentic reminiscences (Die Gleichnisse Jesu, 1888, pp. 120, 196).

4. Is the present place of the allegory in the Gospel the correct one? Sanday (Fourth Gospel, p. 231) thinks that it belongs to an earlier and more didactic period in the life of Christ, and that it is out of place in the present speech, of which the object is to comfort the disciples in view of their Lord's departure. De Wette and B. Weiss bring forward the same objection. The latter thinks that the allegory in its original parabolic form, of which the main point was a warning against unfruitfulness, belongs to the period of crisis in the life of Christ, when the multitudes who had been attracted to Him fell away, and He foresaw that even one of the Twelve was to prove unfaithful. The Evangelist has brought together in these farewell speeches all that seemed to deal with the self-revelation of Christ to believers; and as the interpretation which he put upon the allegory, by making the central point of it an exhortation to abide in Christ, led him to include it in this category, he has inserted it here (Leben Jesu, ii. 331). Bruce meets the objection that the allegory is out of place in the farewell discourse, by showing that Christ's object in that discourse is not merely to comfort the disciples in view of His departure, but to prepare them for the continuance of His work. When we realize that this is the purpose of the speech in which it occurs, the aptness of the allegory cannot, he thinks, be questioned (Training of the Twelve, p. 401).

VINEGAR (ὄξος, acetum) was credited with manifold efficacy by the ancient physician.* Nor was the medicinal its sole use. It served as the drink of the lower orders, especially slaves;† and it was the only refreshment allowed to soldiers while engaged in active service. 'The vigilant humanity of Julian,' says Gibbon,‡ 'had embarked a very large magazine of vinegar and biscuit for the use of the soldiers, but he prohibited the indulgence of wine.'

It is twice mentioned in the story of the Crucifixion. The quaternion of soldiers (cf. Jn 19²³) charged with the execution had with them a jar of their posca, as it was termed; and, when they had accomplished their laborious task, they refreshed themselves from it. The bystanders, led by the exultant priests, were meanwhile mocking the meek Sufferer and deriding His Messianic claim. 'He is King of Israel,' they cried: 'let him come down now from the cross, and we will believe on him.' The soldiers heard the taunt and joined in (Lk 23³⁵⁻⁴³ = Mt 27³⁹⁻⁴⁴ = Mk 15²⁹⁻³²).

Again, after He had uttered His cry of desolation: Eli, Eli, lama' azabhtāni (see DERELICTION), Jesus moaned, 'I thirst'; and one of the bystanders, probably a Roman soldier,§ moved by pity, took a sponge and, dipping it in the posca, put it on the end of a hyssop reed. His comrades interfered. Ignorant of Hebrew, they took Eli for the name Elias, and supposed that Jesus was invoking the help of one of that name. 'Hold!'|| they cried. 'Let us see if Elias is coming to save him.' But the man persisted in his humane intention, and dipped up the sponge to the parched lip of the Sufferer (Lk 15³³⁻³⁷ = Jn 19²⁸⁻³⁰).

St. Mark's account is much confused. It represents the offering of the vinegar as an act of mockery, in opposition to both St. Matthew and St. John, and the cry, 'Hold,' etc., as uttered, without any apparent provocation, by the man with the reed. There is here an example of the confusion which the Evangelic tradition—in the process of oral transmission—produced by St. Matthew suffered in the process of oral transmission: (1) The interference of the bystanders was omitted; and (2) ἄφστ, suitable when addressed to one man, was altered to fit the new conception of the situation into ἀφστ.

It is nothing strange that Jesus accepted the posca after refusing the 'myrrhed wine' (Mk 15²³ = Mt 27³⁴). He refused the narcotic (see CRUCIFIXION), He accepted the refreshment.

VIOLENCE.—In Lk 3¹⁴ part of the advice given by John the Baptist to the soldiers was, 'Do violence to no man' (μηδένα διασέσητε), the verb meaning, 'like concutio in juridical Latin, to extort from one by intimidation money or other property' (Grimm-Thayer). The word occurs again in Mt 11¹², where the adjective 'violent' is also found in AV. The adverb 'violently' appears in Lk 8³³ AV, 'the herd ran violently (ὄρμησεν) down a steep place,' and in Lk 16¹⁶ RV, 'every man entereth violently into it' (βιάζεται). Interest centres chiefly on the two occurrences in Mt 11¹² and Lk 16¹⁶, which are so much alike in different contexts, that they are obviously two versions of the same saying. We place them side by side in order that they may be more easily compared.

Mt 11^{12, 13}.

Lk 16¹⁶.

| (α) πάντες γὰρ οἱ προφῆται καὶ ὁ νόμος ἕως Ἰωάννου προεφήτευσαν (v. 13). | (ε) ὁ νόμος καὶ οἱ προφῆται μέχρι Ἰωάννου. |
| (β) ἀπὸ δὲ τῶν ἡμερῶν Ἰωάννου τοῦ βαπτιστοῦ ἕως ἄρτι. | (β) ἀπὸ τότε. |
| (γ) ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν βιάζεται. | (γ) ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ εὐαγγελίζεται. |
| (δ) καὶ βιάσται ἀρπαύζουσιν αὐτήν. | (δ) καὶ πᾶς εἰς αὐτήν βιάζεται. |

It is evident that α, β, δ closely correspond to α, β, δ; why, then, should not c be taken to convey the same idea as γ? This is the view of Melancthon, Stier, Banks, and others, who hold that βιάζεται in Mt. is the Middle voice, as it undoubtedly is in the last clause of Luke. The translation will then be, 'the kingdom of heaven advanceth violently,' it forcibly introduces itself, coming with urgency and beating down all obstacles, 'sese vi quasi obtruncit' (Berger, who adds 'sæpe LXX βιάσθαι ponunt, vim adhibeo'). This is quite in keeping with the context, where Christ is extolling the work which John the Baptist had done as a pioneer and forerunner (cf. Mt 3¹, Mk 1⁵, Lk 7²⁹). It may be illustrated by the parables of the Mustard Seed and the Leaven (Mt 13³¹⁻³³), and it has the great advantage of conveying the same sense as the parallel clause in Lk. 'the kingdom of God is preached.' The only serious objection urged against such a rendering by Meyer, Allord, and Bruce (in Expos. Gr. Test.) is that it would be inconsistent with the words following—'the violent take it by force.' Is there necessarily any inconsistency, however? May we not have here one of those passages where by a slight change in the expression, by a turning of the coin, as it were, a new and complementary truth is conveyed? Would there be any inconsistency if one were to say 'the train is advancing quickly, and those who are quick succeed in entering it'? On the other hand, the translation of the EV is open to the charge of being tautological.

βιάζεται is, however, usually taken as Passive in Mt 11¹² ('suffereth violence,' AV and RV; 'is gotten by force,' AVm; vim patitur, Vulg.; βίαιως κρατεῖται, Hesychius). The image may be taken from the storming of a city or from forcing an entrance through an opposing army: the word is used in Thucyd. Hist. vii. 70, 72, of the Athenian fleet forcing its way out of Syracuse (βιάσθαι τὸν ἔκπλου), and in Xen. Hell. v. ii. 23, of cities forced into a union (πόλεις τὰς βεβιασμένας).

The further question now arises, From whom does the violence proceed? and three answers are possible: (1) from true disciples, (2) from other aspirants, (3) from enemies, e.g. the scribes and

|| This is the Hellenistic sign of Imperat. (modern Gr. ας); cf. Mt 23³⁵ = Lk 8³²; but its construction as an independent Imperat. is equally permissible (cf. Epict. iv. i. 79) and yields a better sense, besides being favoured by Mk.'s ἀφστ.

Pharisees. If the last be adopted, the meaning will then be, 'the kingdom of heaven is violently resisted, is crushed, and violent men tear it to pieces.' So Dalman explains the passage (see below), and similarly Hilgenfeld in Mt. ('is violently crushed'), but he would render in Lk. 'every man is constrained by the gospel,' taking βιάζεται as Passive). This is certainly an anachronism, for the imprisonment of John the Baptist justifies such strong language, and is only forced by the connexion with v. 13 and with what goes before (see Meyer's note). 'Non est h. l. querela de vi mala, nam querela incipit versu 16' (Bengel). 'The subject is not the resistance made to the kingdom of heaven, but the difference between a prophesied and a present kingdom of heaven' (Alford). The second answer is based on the supposition that Jesus here meant to rebuke a wrong method, not to commend a right one, and expressed disapproval of the violence of those who, misled by the free invitations of the gospel, were inclined to force an entrance, disregarding the requirements of the Law. In its favour it may be urged that this explanation admirably fits the context of Lk 16¹⁶ and the use of πᾶς, 'every man entereth violently into it.' Jesus shows in v. 17 that 'the same orderly methods were to obtain in the Kingdom as under the Law; so much so that the Law itself might be said to be maintained in every detail. The Gospel was not a release from, but a deepening and widening and spiritualizing of the Law's requirements' (Canon Blnak, who advocates this view in a paper entitled 'The Method of the Christ,' Expos. Times, Feb. 1905).

The first answer, however, is preferred by most commentators, viz. that the βιάται are the disciples who seek a share in the Heavenly Kingdom with ardent zeal and intensest exertions, 'who strive to obtain its privileges with the utmost eagerness and effort' (Grimm-Thayer), 'men of violence' (RV); there is no art. in the Greek, 'violent men' (Wycl.), 'they that go to it with violence' (Tind.), 'the violent' (AV, Cran., Gen., Rhem.), πάντες οὐ μὲν ἀποσπῶντες προσβύτες (Chrys.). Like the publicans and sinners, like Zacchæus, they take the Kingdom by force, they drag it to themselves (ἀπράξουσι, cf. Jn 6¹⁵), they clutch at it like spoils and make it their own, 'ut raptim, celerrima vi, perruptis obstaculis, ad se redigant bonum in medio positum' (Bengel). This explanation agrees best with Pindar's use of the similar word βιάς, which has always a good sense (Meyer), 'mighty, strong,' and closely corresponds to Luke's πᾶς εἰς αὐτὴν βιάζεται, 'entereth violently into it' (RV), 'vi ingruit pia' (Bengel); 'presseth into it' (AV) is too weak. The hindrances are like a hostile army round a city which must be broken through with force; the same strenuous effort is required which is commanded in such passages as 'strive (ἀγωνίζεσθε) to enter in by the narrow door' (Lk 13²⁴), 'ask, seek, and knock' (Mt 7⁷), 'fight the good fight of the faith' (ἀγωνίζου, 1 Ti 6¹²), 'so run that ye may attain' (1 Co 9²⁴), 'contend earnestly for the faith' (ἐπαγυνίζεσθαι, Jude³). 'Every man' (πᾶς) is perhaps emphatic, showing that the Pharisees and the scribes must no longer look on the Kingdom as the exclusive possession of their nation or class; it was open to all nations, and might be entered by even the lowest men, though it would appear from the warning of the following verses that not all would seek it in the right spirit. 'Jesus uses this strong figurative expression of violence and seizure, which in their peculiar meaning were applied to the unjust, forcible appropriation of others' goods, not because He finds the point of analogy in the injustice and violence, as if men could appropriate a share in the Kingdom of God in opposition to the Divine will, but because He sought to lay stress upon the necessity of urgent energetic laying hold of a good to which they can make no claim. It is of no avail in regard to the Kingdom of God to wait idly, as in other cases men may take a waiting attitude in regard to a gift; nor does it avail to seek laboriously to earn it; but it does avail energetically to lay hold of and to retain it. It is ready as a gift of God for men, but men must direct their desire and will towards it' (Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus, ii. 49, Eng. tr.). It is possible, however, to take the words as a description rather than as a commendation of 'the violent' and to find in them a reference to those 'violent' of the Messianic Kingdom which even the Apostles held until the day of the Ascension (cf. Ac 1⁶).

Dalman (The Words of Jesus, pp. 139-143, Eng. tr.) in an important section, the substance of which is here transcribed, seeks to find the probable Aramaic antecedent of βιάζεται. A. Meyer suggests ܕܢܐ, cf. Dn 7^{18.22}; but this would mean merely 'to take possession of,' and would hardly cause one writing in Greek to use βιάζων. He finds a better equivalent in קָח, which means in Peal 'to be strong,' in Aphel 'to hold fast'; in Dt 22²⁸, Onkelos has קָחָהוּ for Heb. קִיחָהוּ, while the LXX renders by βιάζόμενος. Passive; from βιάζω, derived immediately from an Aramaic prototype. A solution more in conformity with the Greek may be arrived at provided ܕܢܐ be made the starting-point, for it can mean 'to use force' and 'to rob.' The text (Mt 11¹²) thus refers to that period of the theocracy (i.e. the Kingdom of God) which was introduced by the imprisonment of John the Baptist; it is its peculiarity that the theocracy suffers violence, not, of course, from believers, but from those in authority. The words ἀπράξουσι αὐτὴν (ܐܡܪܝܢܐ) are not intended to suggest that the violent seize the theocracy, but merely that they maltreat it in the persons of the prophets. The same may be said to be applied in opposition to the Pharisees, who were noted for their opposition as to the right use of money. Jesus thus connects the proclamation of the theocracy since the time of John made it possible for any one to intrude himself violently into it; nevertheless it was not their own estimate, but the judgment of God that decided who was worthy of entrance. The context, however, in Lk. may be pronounced peculiarly Greek. Neither the Passive βιάζεται nor εἰς αὐτὴν βιάζεται is capable of being directly rendered into Aramaic, especially if ܕܢܐ is used.

If it be supposed, adds Dalman, that by using (vv. 15-18) sayings of our Lord which originally had quite a different association, Lk. obtains the transition to a new parable, it may be surmised that he has given to v. 16 its present form to accommodate it to the context. The saying which Mt. and Lk. found in their sources made mention only of the violent treatment of the Kingdom at the time of John. St. Luke though mentioning the entrance into it, and thus found it natural to insert it here. St. Matthew, with greater reason, understood it to refer to the violent treatment of the preachers of the theocracy, and therefore connected it with the answer of Jesus to John. Neither by Jesus nor by the Evangelists is it suggested that any one could actually appropriate the theocracy by force. Unless absolutely driven to it, we ought not to try to discover beneath these words an idea so distinctly at variance with the whole style of our Lord's teaching.

VIRGIN BIRTH.—Introductory.—A cursory examination of the Gospel narratives is sufficient to reveal certain apparent inconsistencies of statement and implication regarding the parentage of Jesus. He is popularly regarded and spoken of as the son of Joseph (cf. Mt 13⁵⁵ 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' Lk 4²², Jn 1⁴⁵ 6⁴²); and even in the Nativity narrative of the Third Gospel, Mary and Joseph are several times referred to as 'his parents' (γονεῖς, Lk 27. 41, 43), * while once the mother of Jesus herself is made to say, 'Thy father [ἐκείνός] and I sought thee sorrowing' (248). It is, of course, that Jesus was popularly looked upon by his contemporaries as Joseph's son by natural generation. On the other hand, both the First and the Third Gospels contain special sections dealing with the circumstances of the birth of Jesus in detail, and, though obviously reflecting the traditions embodied in the Synoptic Gospels, in stating unequivocally that Jesus was born of a virgin mother without the intervention of a human father (Mt 1¹⁸, Lk 1³⁴, 35).

No real inconsistency is, however, involved in the narratives as they stand. The secret of Jesus' birth may have been for long jealously guarded within the narrow circle among whom it was originally known. It apparently formed no part of the early Apostolic teaching and preaching, and was not included in the common form of the Synoptic Gospel-tradition (note that the Second Gospel begins with the Baptism). In preserving, therefore, the popular references to Jesus as Joseph's son, the First and Third Gospels conform to psychological and historic truth. In one part of the narrative, popular opinion is accurately reflected and expressed; in the other, knowledge of a special character derived from private sources.

That no inconsistency was felt to exist in this double use of description appears from the fact that it occurs even in the Apocryphal Gospels, where the virginity of the mother of Jesus is often insisted upon with unnecessary stress. Thus in the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew (ch. 27) the following, e.g., occurs: 'And some went away to the chief priests, and to the chiefs of the Pharisees, and told them that Jesus the son of Joseph had done great signs,' etc. A few pages further on (ch. 30) Jesus is made to say: 'But I am an alien in your courts, because I have no carnal parent.' On the other hand, if such references as those of the Synoptic Gospels to the birth of Jesus as a mechanical consideration in the case of Mary (to the entire exclusion of the virgin birth) have been justly been impugned as violating psychological truth.

In social life and as a member of the Jewish nation, Jesus, during His earthly life, would necessarily be regarded as Joseph's son. As Dalman has pointed out, 'If no other fatherhood was alleged, then the child must have been regarded as bestowed by God upon the house of Joseph'; and while Joseph was alive, Mary and her son were undoubtedly under his legal protection. This consideration will help to explain the fact that both genealogies trace the Davidic descent of Jesus through Joseph (not through Mary). On any view Jesus belonged to the family of Joseph; and if any formal and official birth-register ever had any independent existence in the Temple or elsewhere, Jesus would naturally appear therein as Joseph's son.

The genealogy in Mt 1 in anything like its present form can hardly have formed part of the original Synoptic tradition. Its features are too clearly artificial. Regarding the text of Mt 1¹⁸ see esp. Sand. op. cit. (1905) p. 112. The genealogy in the Third Gospel (Lk 3²³) is of a different character, and is undoubtedly a later addition (cf. Sand. op. cit. p. 112).

It would be strange, indeed, if the writer of the Fourth Gospel possessed no knowledge of the tradition of the virgin birth of Jesus as embodied in Mt 1-2 and Lk 1-2. Silence in this case would presumably imply not ignorance, but tacit acceptance. Unless the tradition were contradicted either explicitly or tacitly, the presumption in such a case is that it was accepted. It is certainly significant that the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel, which occupies a similar place to that of the genealogy in the First Gospel, traces the origin of the Logos, which became incarnate in Christ, to the eternal life of God. What the genealogies attempted to do was to carry out here carried out fundamentally and intended to be a statement of the Logos and Lukan Nativity traditions? Or are these—at any rate as regards their central feature—the virgin birth—silently accepted and supplemented by the statement of fuller and deeper truth? The latter alternative accords with the characteristic manner and method of the Fourth Evangelist. So far from excluding the possibility of the virgin birth, it may be argued that the Prologue presupposes it. In view of the fact that the tradition of the virgin birth must already have been current in certain Christian circles, and can hardly have been unknown to the writer of the Johannine Prologue, this conclusion becomes at least highly probable. If the writer had conceived of the method of the Incarnation of the pre-existent Logos as being otherwise, we should at least have expected to find some hint or suggestion to that effect. In the only verse, however, in the Prologue where any allusion to birth occurs (Jn 1¹³), the reference is certainly not incompatible with the tradition of the virgin birth, but may be regarded as lending it, if anything, some presumptive support.

This conclusion is reinforced if the contention of Carr (ExpT xviii. [1907] 522) that γεννητός (Jn 1¹³), 'from its position in the "Prologue" from its form as a composite of γεννητός, must refer not to the eternal generation of the Son of God, but to the human birth of the Son of Man' (cf. also Allen, Interpretation, Oct. 1905, p. 52 f.). There is also the remarkable reading known to Justin, Irenaeus, Tertullian, and perhaps Hippolytus, according to which v. 13 directly refers to Christ's supernatural birth: 'who (sing.) was born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.' Here natural generation by a human father is denied and excluded in the most categorical manner. Even if this reading be not accepted, it is a pertinent question to ask: 'Why the elaboration of the theme, above all why the θεϊκὴς ἀδελφία, unless he (the writer of the Prologue) has in mind the supernatural birth of the Logos as a kind of pattern or model of the birth of the children of God? As He was born into the world by supernatural conception, not through the process of natural generation, so they were born out of the world into the world by a spiritual process, symbolized indeed by generation, but transcending it' (W. C. Allen, ib. p. 57 f.; see, further, the whole of his admirable discussion).

With regard to the alleged silence of St. Paul, it is by no means clear that silence in this case any more than in that of the Johannine writings is to be taken as a sign of ignorance. Nor is it certain that indirect references to the virgin birth are entirely absent in the Pauline Epistles (1 Cor. 15. 48, of a woman, 1 Ti 2¹⁵). The most that can be urged is that in the Pauline Christology no emphasis was laid on the dogma of the virgin birth.

1. The Gospel sources.—The question really narrows itself down to one concerning the amount of credibility that is to be attached to the Gospel narratives of the Nativity contained in Mt 1-2 and Lk 1-2. This is not the place to enter into a full discussion of these narratives as a whole, or to repeat what has already been said on the subject in the art. BIRTH OF CHRIST in this work. But one or two points of special significance in this connexion may be dealt with. Recent critical discussion has largely been concerned with these narratives, around which the critical battle has fiercely raged. In the result it may be said with confidence (a) that the Palestinian character and origin of the narratives have been firmly established, and (b) that the attempt to disintegrate the Lukan account has not been attended with signal success.

(a) The establishment of the Palestinian origin and character of the two Birth narratives carries with it important consequences. The narratives have been shown to be Jewish-Christian through and through. It follows that the tradition of the virgin birth gained currency among Christian circles in Palestine at a relatively early date, pro-

* Once 'his father and his mother' (233).

† Cf. for this point a discussion in ZNTW by the present writer (1905, Heft 1, p. 85).

ably by the middle of the 1st century.* A further inference is that we must look for the origin of this tradition 'on Palestinian soil at sufficiently early a date to account for its presence in two quite independent forms in the First and Third Gospels. That being so, the view that they are based upon actual facts and are not taken from the family of Christ is certainly probable.†

(b) Critical objections have been raised to the integrity of the Lukan Birth narrative. In Lk 2, it is urged, the view of the narrative is that Mary was Joseph's wife, and that he was the father of Jesus (cf. 2³³ 'his father and his mother,' v. 41 'his parents,' v. 48 'thy father and I'); the Davidic lineage of Jesus is traced through Joseph, with the explanation 'as was supposed' (3²³); and with this agrees the early reading 'preserved in the Sinaitic-Syriac, 2⁹, 'his wife.'‡ The narrative in ch. 1 could be harmonized with that in ch. 2 if vv. 34, 35—which contain 'the only reference to the virgin birth in the Third Gospel'—could be removed as an interpolation. This procedure—which has the support of (among others) as Harnack, Holtzmann, Pileiderer, Schmiedel, and Usener—is justified on the following grounds:

The reference to Elisabeth in v. 36 certainly seems to follow better on v. 35. In the same way, the child whose birth is announced is 'the Son of the Most High'; but 'Son of God' in v. 35 has a messianic significance; it denotes not official adoption, but a special relationship. v. 36 is thus a doublet of vv. 31, 32 on another point, the incredulity of Mary. The possibility of motherhood (v. 34) seems already betrothed; yet it does not (like v. 34, vv. 18-20) expose her to rebuke or penalty; the doubt seems introduced only to give occasion for the explanation in v. 35. The real reply of Mary to the original announcement in vv. 30-32, 38-37 follows in v. 38 'Be it unto me according to thy word,' and her submission to the heavenly will wins the blessing of Elisabeth (v. 42).§

A closer examination of the suspected verses does not, however, lend any support to the theory of interpolation. Their phraseology is unmistakably Hebraistic in character, the language being suggested by and derived from the OT. In fact, as Professor Briggs has pointed out, 'the Annunciation represents the conception of Jesus as due to a theophany.¶ The verses are of the same character as the rest of the narrative, and must be the work of a Jewish writer; and there is every reason to believe, with Gunkel, that they are translated from a Hebrew original. This consideration will help to elucidate the meaning of the announcement in v. 31 more closely. The Hebrew original of συνάψην there would be a participle,* and the exact rendering would be, 'Behold, thou art conceiving now.' An immediate conception is meant, not one that would naturally follow after Joseph had in due course taken her to wife; and this immediate conception is implied by the words 'with haste' in v. 39. Besides, v. 36 ('And behold, Elisabeth, thy kinswoman, she also hath conceived a son in her old age') implies that a conception of an extraordinary character has been mentioned in the previous verses in reference to Mary; and the words suggest that a not unnatural doubt and surprise on her part are being set at rest (cf. esp. v. 37 'for no word of God shall be impossible'). There would be nothing extraordinary in Mary's conceiving a son as Joseph's wife.

Again, the Lukan genealogy, far from discrediting, seems to the present writer to offer a positive argument for the authenticity of the suspected verses. Jewish genealogies usually have some edifying purpose in view, and the list in Lk 3²³⁻³⁸ seems to be no exception to the rule. The striking feature about it is that it traces the descent of Jesus right up to Adam (the son) of God. Evidently, in linking Adam to Christ, the editor or compiler intends to suggest that Christ is the Second Adam, the re-founder of the human race; and that just as the first Adam was son of God by a direct creative act, so also was the Second (by the power of the Holy Spirit). For genealogical purposes it was necessary to link Jesus to previous generations through His foster-father Joseph. But the suggestion is that the Second Adam, like the first, owes His human existence to a direct creative act on the part of God. Lk 3³⁸ thus supports the genuineness of 1³⁵ (υἱὸς θεοῦ), and the whole genealogy, viewed in the light of its edifying purpose, guarantees the original character of the alleged interpolation.

The fact that υἱὸς θεοῦ in the genealogy involves the occurrence of υἱὸς in the physical sense of origin exactly as in 1³⁵, has an important bearing on the objection noted above, viz. that while in v. 32 ('Son of the Most High') 'son' denotes official adoption, in v. 35 it describes actual origin.* But the two ideas are not mutually exclusive. At the same time, it is difficult to see what can have suggested such an otherwise un-Jewish application of the term 'son' in such a context, and amid language so Hebraistic, except the actual occurrence of the fact narrated.

But the theory of interpolation is confronted with a further radical difficulty. It is not enough to remove the suspected verses to make the narrative of the virgin birth miraculous. The figure of Joseph in the Lukan account, while that of Mary is proportionately enhanced in lonely importance. This feature dominates the whole structure of Luke's first two chapters; and in this particular a sharp (and obviously designed) contrast is suggested between the nativity of John the Baptist and that of Jesus. While in the case of the Baptist's birth the announcement is made to the father (1^{13f.}), in that of Jesus it is made to the mother (1²⁶); and while the Baptist's birth is represented as the occasion of such profound joy on the part of Zacharias that the latter's dumbness is overcome, and he bursts into the strains of the Benedictus (1⁶⁸⁻⁷⁹), no such rôle is assigned to Joseph. What reason can be adduced for this deliberate minimizing of the part assigned to Joseph—a feature that characterizes the Lukan narrative throughout?—except that the fundamental and dominating and forming the climax of the narrative is the miraculous birth of Jesus of a virgin mother?† [Cf. also the criticism of this theory of interpolation in the art. BIRTH OF CHRIST, vol. i. p. 203].

(c) The Matthean account of the virgin birth (Mt 1¹⁸⁻²⁵) has already been discussed in the art. cited above (vol. i. p. 206). Here it will be necessary to emphasize only one or two special points. The intensely Jewish character of the narrative, its sobriety and delicacy, have been justly insisted upon. It is difficult to trace in so restrained a narrative the 'pagan substratum' of which Usener speaks. The full-blown myth has certainly been divested of all its bloom. In fact, the points of difference far outnumber the resemblances with the ancient myth, as even Cheyne admits (Bible Problems, p. 89 f.). In this connexion it is noteworthy that the real significance of the virgin birth arises from the real significance of Mt. of Is 7¹⁴ (LXX): 'Behold, the virgin (ἡ παρθένος) shall conceive and bear a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel.' Two points are clear: (1) No trace exists in Jewish (as distinct from Christian) literature known to us of any Messianic application of this text; nor is it possible to adduce any indubitable evidence from Jewish sources that the belief in the Messiah's being born of a virgin was ever current among the Jews. (2) It is generally agreed among critical scholars that the narrative of Mt. could not have been suggested by the quotation (Is 7¹⁴), but that it was, in accordance with his usual practice, by the narrator as a proof-passage from Scripture in support of the story.

It is, however, difficult to account for the LXX rendering (παρθένος). It may, perhaps, have been adopted under the influence of 'current theological ideas' in order to enhance the mysteriousness of the future Deliverer's origin, or it may be due simply to the fact that the translators regarded παρθένος as being the true Greek equivalent of מַלְאָכָה, without consciously giving it any definite reference to the Messiah. If, as Gunkel supposed, the Messiah's birth was an element in Jewish Christological belief, it is, which was afterwards transferred to Jesus, at no trace of such a belief has been found. Why the reluctance and reserve manifested in proclaiming the alleged fact, if such a birth had come to be regarded as one of the distinguishing marks of the true Messiah? But so far from its being a popular or even familiar belief among the Jews, it may be inferred from the certainty from Mt.'s narrative that the story of the virgin birth was to Jewish readers a strange and new thing, which it required explanation. Not improbably Jewish readers of the Gospel had already made itself felt before Mt.'s narrative was published. The reference of Is 7¹⁴ to the circumstances of Jesus' birth can, therefore, only have been suggested by the event, or, at least, by what the narrator looked upon as the actual facts. The application is purely Jewish-Christian. (Dial. c. Tryph. lxxii.) there is a curious story of the virgin birth: 'The virgin birth: from the womb of the virgin: so LXX.' In the last passage the LXX clearly interprets of the pre-existent Messiah. The application to the virgin birth of Messiah would seem to be Jewish-Christian. Ps 110 was undoubtedly understood Messianically in the ancient synagogue. Cf. also the passages quoted in Raymundus Martini, Pugio Fidei (ed. Carpov, p. 154f.) on the words of R. Moses ha-Darshan (which cannot now be traced) 'quem suscitabo e vobis non habebit patrem' (a root out of a dry ground'), Ps 110³ and 27.

The obviously mythological figure in Rev 12 of the woman 'arrayed with the sun' who 'was delivered of a son,' if it is derived from an earlier Jewish source, shows that the Babylonian myth was not unfamiliar among apocalyptic circles within Judaism. The story itself, however, have influenced or suggested the Jewish-Christian tradition of the virgin birth. 'But,' to use Mr. Allen's words, 'it is worth while raising the question whether the author of the book [of Revelation] did not interpret this section with direct reference to the tradition of the supernatural birth of Christ, with which he must therefore have been acquainted' (Interp., Feb. 1905, p. 123). It is possible, of course, that in Is 7¹⁴ the prophet makes use of current eschatological ideas, and by the mother of the coming Deliverer (who appear at the same time as the Assyrian invasion). 'The wonderful child of whom you all know, of whom the ancient prophecy speaks, whose name is Immanuel, is already on the way to being born.' The prophet is not thinking so much of the circumstances of the birth as the time. What was generally regarded as a vague possibility of the unknown future is announced by the prophet to be a present reality. No stress, it will be noticed, is laid upon the virginity of the mother. The point does not arise. And this remark applies to the later Jewish transformations of the idea (the origin of the Messiah is often pictured as mysterious and obscure); and the 'woman' of Rev 12 is no exception.

It is important to remember that the Nativity narrative in the First Gospel is governed by an apologetic and manifestly polemical purpose. The compiler is meeting Jewish objections and (probably Jewish) calumny, which finds its explanation in a distorted version of the virgin birth. The prominence of Joseph is also noticeable. This may also, perhaps, be due to the compiler's desire to meet Jewish calumny. It was important to show what exactly Joseph's relations were to his espoused wife, to make clear that Mary and her child enjoyed his protection, in order to meet Jewish slander. Another motive, too, may have been at work. The Jews were at no time disposed to exalt the unmarried state above the married. The story of the Virgin, with Joseph completely subordinated, might easily lead to such a result, which, from the strict Jewish point of view, it was important to avoid.

2. The sources of the two Nativity narratives.

—The present writer's conclusion, arrived at independently, closely approximates to that of Professor Briggs, who points out that the material of which the 'Gospel of the Infancy' is composed is in the form of poetry embedded in prose. This poetry is of the same kind as the poetry of the Old Testament. It was translated from Hebrew originals,* and in its Greek form embodied by St. Luke in his opening chapters. 'It is probable that the prose which contains this poetry comes from the authors of the Gospels, the poetry from other and probably several different authors. Therefore we are not to look for an earlier written Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus, but are to think of a number of early Christian poems with reference to that infancy from which the author of our Gospel [St. Luke] made a selection. . . . These songs which have been selected for use in the Gospel of Luke doubtless represent reflexion upon these events by Christian poets who put in the mouths of the angels, the mothers and the fathers, the poems which they composed. But the inspired author of the Gospel vouches for their propriety and for their essential conformity to truth and fact.† In the Matthean narrative the annunciation to Joseph (Mt 1²⁰⁻²¹) is probably a citation from one of these Hebrew hymns, which has been translated into Greek. All the hymns were, perhaps, composed for liturgical use, and were so used in the early Jewish-Christian community in Palestine. As we have seen, they will probably have been in existence at least as early as the middle of the 1st cent. A.D. Their whole tone—so intensely Jewish and Messianic, but yet so spiritual—and their primitive Christology suggest early conditions. Their authority must therefore rank exceedingly high. It has often been remarked that the narrative in the First Gospel is written from the standpoint of Joseph, that in the Third from the point of view of Mary. The delicacy of feeling, the exquisite reserve, the intimate touches which mark each narrative, well accord with this conclusion. Sanday's conjecture, that the Lukan material is based upon a tradition derived from the mother of Jesus through one of the women mentioned in Lk 8³ 24¹⁰, is a suggestive and valuable one.

3. Heathen analogies.—As early as the time of Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. lxxvii.), the mythological tales of virgin birth were cited to discredit the Christian doctrine. 'Amongst the Grecian fables,' says Trypho, 'it is asserted that Persens was born of the virgin Danae; Jupiter, as they call him, coming down upon her in a shower of gold.' Such tales are widespread. 'We can no longer ignore the fact,' says Mr. Estlin Carpenter, 'that the idea of a wondrous birth without human fatherhood appears in a multitude of tales which can be traced literally round the world "from China to Peru."‡ A large collection of these has been made in Hartland's Legend of Perseus. But for purposes of comparison here the great majority of them can be dismissed. The Greek fables, which impute divinity to the origin of great men (heroes and gods (not only to Zeus, but to Apollo, Mars, Mercury), doubtless are the expression of popular feeling which finds in splendid endowments and achievements something marvellous and inexplicable on natural grounds. The soil for such beliefs in the popular feeling and consciousness was a fertile one. But this was not the case among the Jews. Such feeling assumed quite a different form among them, at any rate within historical times. It is difficult to see how ideas of the kind prevalent in the pagan popular consciousness regarding the sons of the gods could have found an entrance into primitive Christian circles—least of all Jewish-Christian circles. To borrow Dr. Weiss' words, 'The shameless glorifying of sensual desire in these myths could only provoke in the primitive Christian consciousness the deepest abhorrence; every endeavour to refer any such idea to Jesus must have appeared a profanation of what was most holy, by thus dragging it through the mire of sensuality.'^{*} Cheyne, indeed, following Gunkel, has made out a stronger case for the introduction of mythical material regarding the mother of the Messiah from Babylonian sources (cf. Bible Problems, p. 76 f.). As has already been pointed out, the 'woman clothed with the sun' of Rev 12 is clearly 'the mother of the child' as being the mother of the Messiah.

Now it is undoubtedly true that the Jewish Messianic idea bears traces of the influence of the universal myth of the World Redeemer. It is indeed, when analyzed critically, found to be largely a transformed and refined edition of the old material. The universal craving which found varying expression in the world-myth of the coming Deliverer assumed its highest and most spiritual phase in some forms of Jewish Messianic belief. One feature of the myth was the representation of the mother of the coming Deliverer. The mother plays an important rôle, but no father is mentioned. Here in all probability we must see a survival of the idea of the goddess-mother as distinct from the later one of the goddess-wife.[†] In Is 7¹⁴ the goddess-mother has been transferred to earth, and has become simply the Israelitish woman who is to bear the wonderful child.

In Rabbinical literature this idea seems to have survived in the various forms in which the conception of the Messiah's earthly pre-existence comes to expression.

(1) He is represented as leading a hidden life and then suddenly manifesting himself (cf. Mt 24^{27, 43, 44}). In the Midrash Ex. Rabbā, i., it is said that as Moses, the first deliverer, was reared at the court of Pharaoh, so the future Deliverer will grow up in the Roman capital. Another Midrash says that the Messiah will suffer at Rome and be buried there.

(2) The Messiah is represented as born, but not yet revealed.[‡] Cf. the well-known passage Sanh. 98b, where R. Joshua b. Levi is quoted as saying that the Messiah is already born and is living in a secret place in the desert of Arabia. According to the Targ. (Jerusalem), the Messiah is on the earth, but is still in concealment because of the sins of the people.

(3) The Messiah is represented as having been born at some time in the past (according to some authorities Bethlehem, but the Talmudists do not admit this, according to others, he was born in the desert of Arabia and now dwells at Rome).§

In the curious story of the Messiah's birth quoted by Lightfoot (Horæ, on Mt 2¹), the birth of the Messiah (whose name is Menahem, son of Hezekiah) is connected with Bethlehem and the destruction of the Temple. His mother's name is not given, she being described simply as 'the mother of Menahem'. At Bethlehem she is found with her infant son by the Jew who has been mysteriously apprised of Messiah's birth. The Jew leaves, and 'after some days returns to that city, and says to her, "How does the little infant?" And she said: "From the time you saw me last spirits and tempests came, and snatched him away out of my hands."'

In all these forms of the myth it is to be observed that the mother of the Redeemer is nowhere called a 'virgin.' Where the mention of a father does not occur, this feature may be due to the prominence of the mother in an earlier social stage, surviving in the form of the 'virgin birth'; an idea which later assumed the form of the 'virgin birth'.

Messiah's being concealed and unknown, and manifesting Himself suddenly. It is also to be observed that in Rev 12 the woman is a heavenly being: in other words, the conception in this passage is nearer the primitive myth than it is in Is 7¹⁴. It is difficult to imagine how the representation in Rev 12 can have suggested the idea of the virgin birth, though it is easy to see that the promise '... to the virgin mother of Jesus in the ... story may have influenced the author of Revelation in selecting so crude a piece of mythological material for the purposes of his book. In other words, it was the Gospel story that suggested the selection of the mythical representation in Rev 12. It would be easier to suppose that the LXX of Is 7¹⁴ had given rise to the story of the virgin birth than the mythical figure in Revelation.

In order to overcome this difficulty, Professor Cheyne is driven to conjecture 'that in some of the early Jewish versions of the Oriental myth of the Divine Redeemer (which has not, so far as we know as yet, been preserved) the mother of the Holy Child was called a "virgin" (Bible Problems, p. 81). And, further, it is necessary to suppose that παρθένος ('virgin'), which in its original application (e.g. to the great mother-goddess of Asia Minor) meant one who was not bound by the marriage tie (and therefore connoted anything but virginity of Lk 1³⁴), in the process of transition to the conjectured Jewish version of the myth, lost its original connotation, and was interpreted in the strict sense; 'for nothing is easier than for Divine titles to pass from one religion to another, and for their original meaning to be forgotten' (ib.). This, however, is hardly a plausible explanation of the idea of virgin birth in its various heathen forms. Some at least of these ... possessed a high religious value (cf. the ... examples cited by J. Estlin Carpenter, op. cit. p. 491 f.). On the whole question, some weighty words of Professor Sanday may well be pondered. 'If we believe that the course of human ideas, however mixed in their character—as all human things are mixed—is yet part of a single development, and that development presided over by a Providence which at once imparts to it unity and prescribes its goal,—those who believe this may well see in the fantastic outgrowth of myth and legend something not wholly undesigned or wholly unconnected with the Great Event which was to be, but rather a dim unconscious preparation for that Event, a groping towards it of the human spirit, a prophetic instinct gradually moulding the forms of thought in which it was to find expression' (op. cit. p. 647).

It is, however, all important to remember that the Gospel narrative ... to the sphere of history, and were produced under the limitations that condition the record of historic facts. The creations of the mythopoeic fancy flourish in a ... 'They are part of a common ... material reproduced without ... from age to age and land to land, ... of historic significance.'

4. Results of the discussion. Is the Gospel story of the virgin birth a legend? If so, it must have grown up within the Jewish-Christian community of Palestine, and must represent a primitive Christological dogma expressing the idea of the perfect moral and spiritual purity of Jesus as Son of God. The Christian consciousness, it might be urged, working on such a passage as 'Thou art my Son, this day I have begotten thee' (Ps 2⁷), together with the Scripture promise of the fullness of the Spirit that should rest upon the Messiah (Is 11²), may have been led to transfer these ideas to the physical beginnings of Jesus' life.* But in the absence of any analogous developments in the Christian consciousness elsewhere, this is hard to believe. Why did the Christological process assume just this form, and in this (a priori most unlikely) quarter? The impulse must have been given from without. But the hypothesis that it was imported from heathen sources into so strictly Jewish a circle is incredible; consequently it must have grown out of a conviction, cherished originally within a limited Palestinian circle of believers, that the traditional belief among them was based upon facts, of which some members of that community had been the original depositaries and witnesses.

When subjected to the criteria properly applicable to it, such a tradition would seem to possess high claims to historical credibility. The restrained character of both narratives of the virgin birth, the verisimilitude of small details, the reserve that characterizes them, their very inconsistencies, argue against the hypothesis of invention or of their being mere mythical figments. And these characteristics distinguish them as much from the apocryphal Christian versions as from heathen myths. Everything, indeed, suggests their 'essential conformity to truth and fact.' The essential truth embodied in the Christian tradition has been admirably stated by Professor Briggs:†

'The virgin conception of Jesus . . . is not to be interpreted as if it were a miracle in violation of the laws of nature, but rather as brought about by God Himself. The conception of Jesus in the womb from all other conceptions of children there was no human father. The plan was taken by God Himself; not that God appeared in theophany in the form to beget the child, after the analogy of the birth of the ethnic religions, but that God in a theophany in an extraordinary way, unrevealed to us, and without violation of the laws of maternity, impregnates the Virgin Mary with the holy seed. The words of the angel imply a theophany. . . though it might be urged that the coming of . . . was an invisible coming, after the analogy of many passages of the Old Testament, yet the parallel statement that the Divine power overshadowed her cannot be so interpreted. For it not only in itself represents that the Divine power covered her with a shadow, but this is to be thought of, after the uniform usage of Scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, hovering over her, and not as a shadow enveloping her with a halo of Divinity, in which the Divine energy enabled her to conceive the child Jesus.'

The evidence suggests that the secret of Jesus' birth was not at first generally made known. 'The doctrine of the Virgin Birth was not . . . revealed in the earlier part of the New Age.' Mr. Arthur Wright (*Synopsis*², p. xlii) believes it 'to have been kept back until conflict with heresy brought it forward.' This is not improbable. It has already been pointed out above that in all probability one strong motive at work in the Matthean account was to meet Jewish calumny regarding Jesus' birth. If this view is correct, the Matthean narrative must have been composed later than the Lukan, which shows no such strong interest, and contains more original material.

5. Meaning of the virgin birth.—If we assume, then, that the virgin birth is a fact, in accordance with the conclusions reached above, we have further to ask, What is the meaning of the fact? In the Lukan account the birth is already invested with a Christological significance. Jesus is Son of God, because He is begotten in the womb of the Virgin by the Divine energy. This represents an early stage in Christological development. In St. Mark the Divine Sonship of Jesus is connected with the Baptism (131); in St. Luke (131, 35), with the 'supernatural' birth; in St. Paul, with the Resurrection; in St. John (Prologue to the Fourth Gospel), with the essential and eternal relationship subsisting between the Father and the Son.

But the central and abiding significance of the fact consists in the expression it affords of the perfect moral and spiritual purity of Jesus. It proclaims the entrance into the world of a sinless manhood, in which 'the sinful entail' has been broken. 'It involves the introduction of a new factor, to which the taint of sin does not attach. If like produces like, the element of unlikeness must come from that to which it has itself affinity. Our names for the process do but largely cover our ignorance, but we may be sure that there is essential truth contained in the scriptural phrase, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee; wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God."'

It occurs in a sense more nearly approaching that of Lk 19⁴⁴ in 1 P 2¹², where, however, the 'day of visitation' (ἡμέρα ἐπισκοπῆς) seems to imply trial and affliction, whereas in Lk 19⁴⁴ 'the time of visitation' (ὁ καιρὸς τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς) is suggestive rather of the special care and mercy of God, and the opportunity thereby afforded.

In classical Greek ἐπισκοπή is found only in Lucian, ἐπισκοπῆς being the usual form. In LXX γὰρ, ἡμεῖς are rendered by ἐπισκοπῆς, ἐπισκοπῆς (Gn 50^{24, 25}, Ex 34⁶ 13¹⁹, Is 10³ [ὁ καιρὸς τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς], as in 1 P 2¹²), Jer 10¹⁵ [καιρὸς ἐπισκοπῆς], as in Lk 19⁴⁴), Ps 84). In the Apocrypha the word is used in the sense of inspection or oversight, e.g. in Wis 11¹⁰ (the implication of a Divine regard, or oversight, is clear in the context. In NT ἐπισκοπῆς is used in the sense of sympathy or compassion (Mt 25^{36, 43}, Ja 1²⁷); God's gracious regard (Lk 16^{8, 78} 7¹⁶, Ac 15¹⁴, He 2⁶); in the sense of 'going and seeing' (Ac 7²³); and to imply enquiry for the purpose of selection (Ac 6³).

To the general use of ἐπισκοπῆς, ἐπισκοπῆς, we may find a parallel in the use of the English word 'regard,' which, in addition to the sense of 'observation,' may imply also a kindly or gracious purpose. ἐπισκοπῆς may be said generally to signify critical inspection (by God), in which due regard is had to the good and bad features in the characters of the persons inspected. ἐπισκοπῆς implies also a Divine purpose of blessing. [The technical use of ἐπισκοπῆς, indicated above, to denote the office of a bishop, is of course secondary]. Thus in Lk 19⁴⁴ we may understand the 'time of visitation' as being either the time during which Jerusalem

* This is substantially the position taken up by Lobstein in his Essay on The Virgin Birth of Christ (Eng. tr., Williams & Norgate, 1903). Lobstein contends that 'the conception of the miraculous birth of Christ is the fruit of religious feeling, the echo or Christian experience, the poetic and popular expression of an affirmation of faith' (p. 90). He also denies pagan influence, and maintains that the conception 'has its roots deep down in Israel's religion transformed by the new faith' (p. 75, cf. p. 69 f.).

Our Lord's walking on the sea reveals Him as making material nature an instrument through which His interest in us is shown (Illingworth, *Div. Immanence*¹, 124), as coming to our aid across the troubled waters in which our conflict lies (Westcott, Characteristics of Goss., *Mir.*¹ 15, 19), and ... leading us to the ... expressed in Ro 8 ... The same word is used also of Peter's walking on the sea (Mt 14²⁹ περιπατήσεν ἐπὶ τὰ ὕδατα), so that it is incorrect to say that Peter merely 'attempted' to walk on the water: the words imply that he made some progress in going to Jesus. By the invitation 'Come!' Jesus expressed His warm sympathy with Peter in his desire for closer fellowship with Him, and gave a pledge that He would support him in the enterprise of his faith. The cause of his temporary failure was his betaking himself again to his own resources after having committed himself to a course that involved full dependence on Christ's strength. Then, after the grasp of our Lord's hand had revived his faith, he was really enabled to carry through what he had undertaken, probably walking on the sea with Jesus in returning to the boat (cf. A. B. Davidson, Waiting upon God, 241, 250). Two texts, Jn 15⁵ and Ph 4¹³, show how we should apply this narrative to ourselves. περιπατεῖν is also used: of men's gait, whereby the blind man who was being gradually restored to sight recognized the true nature of the objects which he would otherwise have taken for trees (Mk 8²⁴ βλέπω τοὺς ἀνθρώπους ὅτι ὡς δένδρα ὁρῶ περιπατοῦντας, 'I see men; for I perceive objects like trees, walking'; cf. Jg 9⁸⁶; Swete, in loc.); of people's walking over hidden graves (Lk 11⁴⁴; see WOE); of the soldiers, τὴν θελόντων περιπατεῖν ἐν στολαῖς (Lk 20⁴⁵ || Mk 12³⁸ 'love to go in long clothing', AV; see DRESS); and in the question with which the Risen Lord began the conversation with His two disciples whom He joined on the road to Emmaus (Lk 24²⁷ τίτες οἱ λόγοι ... οὓς ἀντιβάλλετε ... περιπατοῦντες; cf. Mk 16¹²).

(2) Of those ... the power of ... No passage in the Gospels is more ... the character, or more persuasive of ... of our Lord's miracles of healing than this. He says to the ... 'S n, thy sins be forgiven thee'; and in ... who cavil at this saying 'may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins.' He commands him, 'Arise, take up thy bed, and walk,' which was, from their point of view, a harder thing for Him to say, because it could at once be proved whether His words had any effect. The miracle is thus an outward and visible sign of something greater than bodily healing; it points to an inward and spiritual power, destructive of evil, now present among men. It is implied that disease is the physical effect of sin (cf. Jn 5¹⁴), and by healing the one our Lord gives an evidence of His power to destroy the other (cf. 1 Jn 3⁸). He teaches that the perfect idea of redemption is realized in 'a redeemed soul in a redeemed body,' and that He is come to deliver the entire personality of man, soul and body, from the dominion of evil (cf. Illingworth, l.c. 97). Man forgiven is enabled to 'walk and not faint' (Is 40³¹), and this looks forward to the time when 'the inhabitant of Zion shall not say, I am sick; the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity' (Is 33²⁴, cf. Rev 7¹⁴⁻¹⁷). So of the impotent man at Bethesda (Jn 5⁸⁻⁹, 11, 12—a Sabbath miracle: the others being Mk 12³¹⁻³² and 11, Lk 13¹⁴ 14⁸, Jn 9¹⁴); the lame who walk (Mt 11⁵ 15³¹, Lk 7²²; cf. LXX Is 35³ ἰσχύσατε ... γόνατα παραλελυμένα, also v. 6; Ac 3⁶ 14⁸); also of the daughter of Jairus whom our Lord raised from the dead (Mk 5⁴² περιπατεῖ, 'she began walking about').

In all His raisings from the dead there was an immediate restoration of the bodily powers (Lk 7¹⁵, Jn 11⁴⁴).

(3) It is also used in a special sense of our Lord's life of movement and unwearied activity. This use of περιπατεῖν is peculiar to St. John. In Jn 11⁹⁻¹⁰ Jesus speaks in parabolic fashion, first of His having a full working day (cf. 9⁴) of twelve hours, during which He walks in the light of life without fear of danger in the path of His heavenly Father's will, and then of the coming on of the night of death, when walking, as regulated by present conditions, will be ended for Him; because it is His enemies' 'hour,' coinciding with that permitted to 'the power of darkness' (Lk 22⁵³; cf. Jn 13³⁰; Plummer, St. Luke, 513; Camb. Bib. St. John, 230). Jn 6⁶⁶ 'many went back,' καὶ οὐκ ἐνι μετ' αὐτοῦ περιπατοῦν; the last words picture His journeyings to and fro, in which they had been in the habit of accompanying Him on foot, and hearing His teaching. The same sense: Jn 7¹ 'walked in Galilee, for he would not walk in Jewry'; 10²³ walking in the Temple ('ut in sua domo,' Beng.; cf. Mk 11²⁷); 11⁵⁴ 'walked no more openly among the Jews.' This use of περιπατεῖν is also found in Rev 2¹ of our Lord's life of activity in His exalted state: 'walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks,' as if journeying forth by the circular route which, after traversing all the Churches mentioned, returns to Ephesus (Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches, 'Letter to the Church in Ephesus,' Introduction). It is likewise used by our Lord of Peter's working life (Jn 21¹⁸ περιπατεῖς ὅπου ἡθέλεις, as when he had said to his fellow-disciples, 'I go a fishing,' v. 3), and of the life of the redeemed (Rev 3⁴ περιπατήσουσι μετ' ἐμοῦ ἐν λευκοῖς; cf. Zec 3⁴⁻⁷), which is thus suggestively ... a life of action ... with purity, ...

... and behave in any particular manner,' 'to pursue a particular course of life': Mk 7²¹ 'the only passage in the Synoptic Gospels where περιπατεῖν is used in this sense—'why walk not thy disciples κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν τῶν πρεσβυτέρων'; κατὰ indicating conformity with a standard [as in Ro 8¹⁴ 14¹⁵, 2 Co 10³⁻⁴, Eph 2²; Win.-Moult. 500]. ἡγῆν in Rabbinical language is 'the rule by which men must walk' [777]; cf. Swete, in loc.; see TRADITION), Jn 8¹², where the condition of 'not walking in darkness' (= ignorance and self-deception, narrowness, joylessness, and death) is stated to be our 'following the Light of the world,' Jesus our Sun (cf. 11⁹, Ps 27¹, Is 9² 42⁶ 60¹⁹⁻²⁰, Mal 4²), whose rising is the signal to awake and work (Eph 5¹⁴, He 3¹³), and whose movement as He mounts to attain His perfect day is a call to progress in righteousness and love (Ps 19⁸, Pr 4¹⁸, Ph 3¹⁴). St. Paul ... his figure: he who follows the Light ... becomes himself 'light in the Lord' (Eph 5⁸⁻⁹, 1 Th 5⁸). Cf. Jn 12³⁵ ('fides non est deses sed agilis in luce,' Bengel. So also is love, 1 Jn 2⁹⁻¹¹).

περιπατεῖν is used of the conduct of life; Aquila, ... περιπατεῖν σὺν τῷ θεῷ, where LXX has ἐνδύναται ... LXX 2 Co 20³, Ps 119¹²⁸, Pr 820, Ec 119. St. Paul ... in the ethical sense thirty times, and it is found in this sense ... the Pastorals. He has also ... not found in the Gospels (συναγῆναι, 'to march in file'). This word 'may imply a more studied following of a prescribed course than περιπατεῖν' (Ellie, on Gal. 122). Compare with the passages in St. John's Gospel, 1 Jn 16⁷ 20¹¹, 2 Jn 4, 3 Jn 3, 4.

2. πορεύεσθαι is used in the same sense as περιπατεῖν (3) in Lk 13³³ 'I must walk to-day, and tomorrow, and the day following'; 'I must go on my way,' RV. 'The duration of my course is ordained by God, and no power on earth can shorten it' (cf. Jn 11⁹⁴; Burkitt, Gosp. Hist. and its Transmission, 95). It is used in the same sense as περιπατεῖν (4) in Lk 16⁶ ('walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless'); cf. LXX Pr 10⁹ (with Barrow's Sermon) 14², Mic 6⁸ πορεύεσθαι μετὰ κυρίου θεοῦ σου, 'to walk humbly with thy God,' AV and RV.

11²⁴) διέρχεται, 'to pass through': Mt 12⁴⁸ (|| Lk 11²⁴) 'walketh through' RV (cf. Ps 106). Apart from humanity, evil powers have only an empty, unproductive existence; as they lie in wait continually for the return to the world of men, and so abide there' (Martensen, Dogmatics, 196).

WALLET (RV tr. of πῆρα, Mt 10¹⁰ etc.; AV ‘scrip’).—This corresponds to the kēli hārō'im, or yalkūt, of 1 S 17⁴⁰ (see, however, H. P. Smith, Samuel, in loc.). It is a bag made of partially tanned kid-skin, bound by a strap round the waist, or slung from the shoulder. In it the shepherd carries his supply of provisions when going with the flock to distant pasture. The coarse loaves of the country, olives, and dried fruit form the staple diet, with an occasional lump of cheese. The wallet, however, serves the purpose of the boy's pocket among ourselves, and often contains a curious assortment of articles. The AV ‘scrip’ appears in our literature with the same meaning. Milton (Comus, line 626) speaks of the shepherd's ‘leathern scrip’ in which are carried ‘simples of a thousand names’ (cf. Shakespeare, As You Like It, Act iii. sc. 2). Setting out on a journey, the Syrian peasant carries a wallet well furnished, which he opens for refreshment as he rests by the way, or in the shelter of the khān at nightfall. Christ's Apostles were to go unencumbered on their special mission (Mt 10¹⁰, Mk 6⁸, Lk 9³ 10⁴), trusting to ho-pitality, and the providing care of their Master. But, as an ever-present provident forethought is to be commended, the wallet

WAR (πόλεμος).—As the Gospels record the story of Christ, whose mission was to bring 'peace on earth and goodwill to men,' the references to war are not numerous. But St. Luke has three references well worthy of attention.—1. In Lk 3¹⁴ 'the soldiers' (στρατιώται, R.Vm 'soldiers on service') consult John the Baptist. It is not possible to say who the soldiers were, or in what expedition they were engaged, but they were not Roman soldiers, or any part of the force of Herod Antipas against his father-in-law Aretas, since the quarrel between Herod Antipas and Aretas had not developed then.—2. In Lk 14³¹ (where He is enforcing the general lesson that we should not undertake what we have neither the strength nor the will to achieve, or enter upon His service unless we are prepared, if necessary, to sacrifice life itself) our Lord draws attention to the action of a king in calling a council of war. Possibly there is here a historical allusion to the war between Herod Antipas and Aretas (Jos. Ant. XVIII. v. 3).—3. In

* Edersheim compares certain Rabbinical ordinances which laid down that no man might go on the Temple Mount with his staff or with shoes, or with his scrip, or with money tied to him in his purse. Whatever he might wish to contribute must be carried in his hand, possibly to indicate that the money about him was exclusively for an immediate sacred purpose. He suggests that, for similar reasons, Jesus transferred these very ordinances to the disciples when engaged in the service of the Temple, and says the direction of Matthew will then mean: "Go, ye, in the same spirit and manner as you would to the Temple services, and fear not, for the workman is worthy of his meat." In other words: Let this new Temple service be your only thought, undertaking, and care? (The Temple, etc., p. 42).

Lk 19⁴³ our Lord shows His familiarity with the history of warfare when He prophesies that the enemy will cast up a bank (χαράξ) or a trench round Jerusalem. This prophecy was literally fulfilled forty years afterwards, when Titus surrounded Jerusalem with a palisaded mound and wall of masonry (agger and vallum).

Jesus seems to have recognized war as rising from the nature of man and the constitution of society; but as His teaching lays hold upon nations, the methods of war become less barbarous, and we have good cause to anticipate a time, and to work for it, when 'nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.' While, therefore, Jesus Christ did not condemn war in the abstract, the whole spirit of Christianity is against it (see Hastings' DB, art. 'War').

WASTE.—The idea of waste is presented in the Gospels in two figures. (1) The first of these appears in the word διασκορπίζω, which indicates the scattering of one's possessions. It is the act of the man who, like the Prodigal, makes 'ducks and drakes' of his goods (Lk 15¹³), or, like the Unfaithful Steward, squanders his master's property (Lk 16¹).

(2) The second word is ἀπόλεια, which denotes the doing to death of that which should have remained to enrich εἰς τὴν αἰώνιον ζωήν. Judas thought that the pouring of the ointment upon the head of Christ was ἀπόλεια (Mt 26⁹ ||). In his opinion it was waste, because the price of it might have been added to his bag, and might have remained to enrich himself (Jn 12⁶). It was put to a use which did not commend itself to him, and this seemed to the man in whose heart the love of a once accepted Master had now been usurped by the money with which he had been entrusted, a loss of something like 'three hundred pence' (Mk 14⁵). It is very significant that Christ used the word, which Judas had applied to Mary, of Judas himself. So far wrong was he that Mary had rendered an ever memorable act of devotion. The true 'waste' was in himself; he was the 'son of waste' (ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας, Jn 17¹²). See art. JUDAS ISCARIOT in vol. i. p. 909^b. W. W. HOLDSWORTH.

WATCH.—1. The noun ‘watch’ in the Gospels represents (1) κουστωδία (Lat. custodia) in Mt 27^{65, 66} 28¹¹ AV (‘guard’ RV). This word, which is said to have been the technical term for a company of 60 men, is used here to describe either the Roman soldiers, whom the chief priests and Pharisees obtained from Pilate, or the Temple guard, which he reminded them they already had and could employ to protect the sepulchre from being rifled. (2) φύλακῃ, where it denotes the divisions of the night either into 3 (Jewish and Greek; cf. Lk 12³⁸ (?)*) or 4 (Roman; cf. Mk 13³⁵) parts. The word in this sense occurs (a) in the account of our Lord’s walking upon the Lake of Galilee, which was ‘at the fourth watch,’ i.e. just before dawn (Mt 14²⁵, Mk 6⁴⁸); (b) in His remarks upon the uncertainty and unexpectedness of the Presence (ἐλθεῖν) of the Son of Man (Mt 24⁴³, Lk 12³⁸). (3) φύλακῃ in an active sense, denoting a watching or keeping watch (Lk 2⁸).

2. 'Watch' as a verb.—The duty of constant watchfulness (γρηγορεῖν) and vigilance (ἀγρυπνεῖν) is insisted upon by our Lord in two main connections: (a) in regard to the particular, immediate need for it on the night of the Betrayal (Mt 26⁸⁸. 40-41, Mk 14³⁴. 38), and (b) in regard to the general attitude of disciples who await their Lord's Return (Mt 24⁴². 43, Mk 13³⁸. 34, 37, Lk 12³⁷. 39, 21³⁶).

* It is not unlikely that in this case the fourth watch is not named, simply because the return is not likely to be so long delayed. So Meyer, Alford, Bruce, etc.

As to the general attitude or frame of mind in which the Church is bidden by her Lord to look for His coming, the burden of His teaching is that ours must be the steadfast, active readiness of dutiful, trusty servants, who are not afraid of being caught idle or in mischief, when the Master appears and reveals His welcome, though awful presence.

WATER (ὕδωρ).—For an Eastern country, Palestine (except in the Negeb and the districts which are desert) has a fairly abundant supply of water. It is described as 'a land of brooks (torrent-valleys), of fountains and depths, that spring out of the valleys and hills' (Dt 87). It is a matter of dispute whether the climate has changed since OT times. The rainy season is in winter, from November to March, when the rains are generally heavy. At other times there are only occasional showers. 'The former rain and the latter rain' (Dt 11¹⁴) come about the autumn and spring equinox respectively. The rainfall on an average is from 25 to 30 inches in ordinary seasons (the average rainfall in England is less than 30 inches), but there are times of drought which cause great loss and suffering. In Galilee the water supply is much greater than in Judæa. The storage of water is much more imperfect than in former times. In many places the ruins of artificial tanks, pools, and aqueducts are visible. The chief waters which are referred to in the Gospels are those of the Sea of Galilee and the river Jordan.

Water is frequently mentioned in the Gospels (most instances are found in Jn.), both in its literal and figurative meanings. 1. Literally: e.g. 'Jesus went up straightway out of the water' (Mt 3¹⁶ || Mk 1¹⁰); 'Send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water' (Lk 16²⁴); 'John was baptizing in Ænon, near to Salim, because there was much water there' (Jn 3²³). The water of the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5¹⁻⁷) was supposed to have curative powers. Part of v.³ ('waiting for the moving of the waters') and the whole of v.⁴ are now rejected by critical editors. The moving of the water was a natural phenomenon, the flow of the spring being intermittent. The disciples who were sent to prepare for the observance of the Passover were instructed to look for 'a man bearing a pitcher of water' (Mk 14¹³ || Lk 22¹⁰). As water is usually carried by women in the East, the man bearing the pitcher would easily be distinguished. It was perhaps a token arranged beforehand, so that the place of observance should not be known till the last moment. See also art. PITCHER. In Jn 19³⁴ it is recorded that at the crucifixion of Jesus one of the soldiers pierced His side with a spear, and forthwith there came out blood and water; see art. BLOOD AND WATER.

2. The figurative use of water in the Gospels is varied. It is a symbol (i.) of the moral cleansing of life in repentance. 'I baptize you with water unto repentance' (Mt 3¹¹, Mk 1⁸, Lk 3¹⁶, Jn 1²⁸⁻²⁹); (ii.) it is used in connexion with the new birth. Its significance is uncertain, 'Except a man be born of water and spirit (ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ πνεύματος), he cannot enter into the kingdom of God' (Jn 3⁵). The phrase 'water and spirit' has been regarded as an instance of hendiadys, and interpreted as 'spiritual water' (Neil, Figurative Language in the Bible). Others take it as referring to the baptism of John, and as indicating that repentance is an essential factor in the new birth (Expos. Times, vol. iii. p. 318). It has also been interpreted as referring to the sacrament of baptism. This is the most ancient and general view. Wendt and others, however, regard the words ὕδατος καὶ πνεύματος as an interpolation (Gospel according to St. John). This is the most probable conclusion, unless the words are interpreted as referring to the baptism of John unto repentance; see Expos. Times, vol. xv. p. 413. (iii.) Water is also used as a symbol of innocence: 'Pilate took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying: I am innocent of the blood of this just person' (Mt 27²⁴). (iv.) As a sign of hospitality or respect (see Gn 24³² 43²⁴). Jesus said to Simon the Pharisee, 'I entered into thy house, thou gavest me no water for my feet' (Lk 7⁴⁴). (v.) At the supper in the upper room (Jn 13¹⁻¹⁷) the water for the feet had not been provided. The disciples had not noticed the omission, or they were each unwilling to undertake the servile duty. Then 'Jesus riseth from supper, and laid aside his garments; and took a towel, and girded himself. After that, he poureth water into a bason, and began to wash the disciples' feet' (Jn 13⁴⁻⁵). The ordered detail of the narrative is an indication of the profound impression which the action of Jesus had made upon the Evangelist. The act was full of significance. It was a symbolic service. It taught the disciples the duty of humility, and the need of daily cleansing from the daily defilement of sin. (vi.) In His conversation with the woman of Samaria, Jesus linked the water which she sought at the well with the living water which He alone could give. He uses it as a symbol of eternal life, the blessings of the gospel in their satisfying and permanent power of good (Jn 4¹¹⁻¹⁵). (vii.) On the last day of the feast Jesus stood in the Temple and cried, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth in me, as the scripture saith, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water' (Jn 7³⁷). The Evangelist interprets the symbol: 'This spake he of the Spirit, which they which believed on him should receive: for the Holy Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified' (v.³⁹). The accuracy of the interpretation has been doubted (Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, vol. i. p. 256 n.). (viii.) It is also used as a symbol of the smallest service: 'Whosoever shall give unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you he shall in no wise lose his reward' (Mt 10⁴² || Mk 9⁴¹). It is possible to punctuate the sentence so that it reads 'a cup of cold water only' or 'only in the name of a disciple.' But the first is greatly to be preferred.

JOHN REID.

WATERPOT (ὕδρα, freq. in LXX for ὕδωρ Gn 24¹⁴, Jg 7¹⁶, 1 K 17¹² 18³³, Ec 12⁶).—1. Jn 2⁶⁻⁷ λιβανητοὶ ὕδρας ἐξ κελυφῶν . . . γεφυρωται τὰς ὕδρας ὕδατος. The stone waterpots (λίβανητοι ὕδρας in Rabbinic writings) were placed outside the temple as well as of the vessels used (cf. Mk 7²⁻⁴, Mt 15², Lk 11³⁸). For such an occasion the family would produce or borrow the largest and handsomest stone vessels that could be procured' (Eldersheim, LT i. 357).

The view of Westcott, first put forth in 1859 in a note to his Characteristics of the Gosp. Mir. (p. 14), and afterwards stated more fully in his Com. on St. John (37, 38), that it was not the water in those vessels that was changed into wine, but the water which the servants drew from the source after having filled the vessels, has commended itself to many students of the Gospels. But it has not superseded the traditional view, which must be acknowledged to have in its favour the first impression produced on the minds of readers of the narrative in all ages,—a fact of great weight. Readers in general have understood that the number and capacity of the vessels were stated immediately before the command to fill them, in order to convey the idea that their entire contents were changed into wine (Dods, Ecceps. Gr. NT i. 704), and also that the clause 'they filled them up to the brim' was added in order to exclude all possible suspicion of collusion (Trench, Mir. 104, Anchor 175, &c.). Such are the principal objections to Westcott's view, which, however, must not be hastily pronounced to be inadmissible, or even improbable. When the arguments in its favour are carefully weighed, the balance seems to lie almost equal between it and the ordinary view.

(i.) 'It is unlikely that water taken from vessels of purification should have been employed for the miracle.' This argument holds good already been partially or the hands of the guests : (ii.) The words 'Draw out now,' etc., are, perhaps most naturally understood to mean that the same action of drawing water from the source was to be carried on as before, but that the water so drawn was now to have a different destination. In like manner v. 9 seems to imply that the guests who had drawn the water had borne it, ἐκ τῆς ἀγιάδος—word, straight from the source to the ruler of the feast. It may, however, be argued that the νῦν may equally well mean, 'Now that the guests have heard from them to the ruler of the feast'—ἀκούσαντες—which he would fill the cups of the guests, Meyer, iii. loc. (iii.) Though it would be hazardous to say that the words of ἀντὶ τῆς ἀγιάδος in v. 9 render it probable that ὕδωρ (also from the source) is to be understood after ἀντὶ τῆς ἀγιάδος in v. 8, it may yet be stated that ἀντὶ τῆς ἀγιάδος is frequently used of the drawing of water (cf. Gn 24:1, 1x 2:6, Is 123, Jn 4:15), but rarely of the drawing of wine, so that on the whole the use of the word is in favour of Westcott's view.* (iv.) It is suggested that this view is more in harmony with the symbolical and spiritual character of the miracle. The Law was given to the Jews as a type, by which Jesus pointed to Himself. The Law was given with a sign, and pointed to the fulfilling of the Law in Christ. At the command of Jesus 'they filled them up to the brim.' This may have been designed to show that the preparation of the Law was now complete. It had reached its high-water mark, if we may so speak. The number and capacity of the vessels, and their being utilized for 'the purifying of the Jews,' may thus be regarded as providentially ordered circumstances, designed to bring out the significance of Jesus' act in its relation to the Law. The vessels were filled and then left as they stood, while the water which the servants, in obedience to Jesus' word, drew from the source was carried past them and delivered to the ruler of the feast, who on tasting it said to the bridegroom, 'Thou hast kept the good wine until now.' Full justice, it may be argued, is thus done to the spiritual import of the miracle, which was intended to represent that what the Law with its elaborate ceremonial could not do, Jesus could now do for those unto whom He had come to them the true joy of salvation (cf. Ps 104:15, ὕδωρ καὶ οἶνος). The views set forth in the Encyc. Bibl. (1893), 2539; Wendt, St. John's Gospel, 83, 240, may be compared with the foregoing statement.—The symbolical interpretation of Scripture must not be hastily set aside. It has been often disfigured by unlicensed fancy (Westcott, loc. cit.) also been taken literally, as in the case of the 'miraculous relation' of the twelve apostles to the twelve baskets of fragments that were left.

2. Jn 4²⁸ ἀράχεν ὀνεν τὴν ὑδρίαν αὐτῆς ἢ γυνή. The waterpot of the woman of Samaria was one of those jars of sun-dried clay which are still in use in the East, and which are carried upon the head or on the shoulder (Encyc. Bibl. i. 887, iii. 3818; Land and Book, 576; Lane, *Mod. Egyptians*⁶, i. 187-188, who calls attention to the word garrah or jarrah for a water-pitcher, from which our word

* Dr. Giles of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, has favoured the writer with the following remarks on the use of ἀνάλη. 'I do not know of any example in Attic Greek of ἀνάλη in the sense of 'draw wine' (for which ἄστα or ἄστειν (= πρῆναι) would be expected) except the following from a fragment of Parmenides, ἴσμεν δὲ καὶ τὸ πρῶτον σπέρμα κελύκη· ὅθεν καὶ τὸ πρῶτον αἶμα (fr. 1, 300). The only other poets have so much to say of wine, this, apparently, is the sole instance. It was possibly slang, and the verb is certainly used by the Alexandrian writers as a slang word, as in the recently discovered Herodas, iv. 14, ὁ γὰρ τι παλλῶν οὐδ' ἵσταμον ἀνάλη (i.e. 'raking in the shekels'). The use for wine is also found in Theophrastus because in Theocritus x. 13 occurs the proverb ἐκ πίτου ἀνάλη (like our 'going it'). Something nearer NT times would be useful, but I cannot discover that it occurs in the Papyri.'

'jar' is derived). Her leaving her waterpot was not, as some say, because her faith in Christ made her forget the purpose for which she had originally come, but because it impelled her to announce her discovery of Him to others without delay; and in her haste to return to Sychar with the news, she did not choose to be encumbered with her heavy waterpot, which could be fetched at any time.

WAY.—The term 'way' is used in the OT and NT in a great variety of senses, physical (see art. ROADS) and moral. Any good concordance will show the frequency of the word and the range of its application. Jesus calls Himself 'the Way,' 'I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father, but by me' (Jn 14⁶). In the remarkable interview in which this passage occurs, the subject of conversation was the goal of life, the ultimate destiny of the little company. 'I go to prepare a place for you.' The declaration was an enigma. Thomas and Philip gave expression to the perplexity of the rest. 'We know not whither thou goest, and how can we know the way?' The whither is (1) union with God, (2) the Father's home, and as a corollary, (3) holiness. But the way to the end—what is it? 'I am the way.' As if He said, 'Through me, through what I have done, through what I have been teaching, through what I am about to do.' They had forgotten, or not understood, that He was the Incarnate Word, that He and the Father were one, and that He was laying down His life for them; but when they did understand these things then they would know the way. In He 10^{19, 20} the blood of Christ seems to be the way: 'Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which he hath consecrated for us.' Those who believe in Christ are 'of the Way' (Ac 9² 19⁹ 22⁴). Saul 'desired of the high priest letters to Damascus to the synagogues, that if he found any that were of the Way, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem.' The name served as a convenient term by which to describe the disciples in the early Church. Among the orthodox Jews it was a term of contempt; among the disciples of honour: for had not Jesus claimed to be the Way? A way leads to somewhere. Christ the new and living way leads to holiness, and heaven, and God.

WAYSIDE.—Two blind men sat by the wayside begging, as Jesus left Jericho on His way to Jerusalem (Mt 20³⁰). They had probably taken their station at a spot near the city where several paths met, and which may have been planted with trees. Again, in the parable of the Sower, some of the seed fell 'by the wayside' (Mt 13⁴), i.e. along the road (παρὰ τῆς ὁδοῦ), where the ground was so hard as to be impenetrable by it. Jesus gave His own interpretation of the parable. (1) Owing to their hardness of heart men do not understand the word. They hear but do not heed. It falls like seed on a drumhead; and then (2) the fowls of the air come and devour it. Hearts worn hard by selfishness and worldliness do not give entrance to the Divine truth, and the truth lying there is either trampled and destroyed by cares and anxieties, or snatched away by the host of passing thoughts.

WEALTH.—1. The Gospels differ from each other very considerably in their contributions to the subject of wealth. The Gospel of Jn. contributes scarcely anything. Such words as πλοῦσις, πλοῦτος, πλουτέω, θησαυρός, θησαυρίζω do not occur in it; and πτωχός is found only in 12⁵. 6. 8 and 13²⁹. Mk. contributes little—only 4¹⁹ and a few characteristic touches in the narrative of the Rich Young Ruler and the discourse following upon it, as for instance 10²⁴. It is to Mt. and Lk. that we are indebted for practically all the teaching in the Gospels on this subject. And the material supplied by them is specially rich. But it is not uniform. There is a contrast between the teaching on wealth in Lk. and that in Mt. Lk. has preserved a series of utterances of our Lord, which on the face of them seem hostile to wealth and partial to poverty. These consist partly of sayings peculiar to Lk. and partly of sayings common to Lk. and Mt., but having in Lk.'s version a sense apparently less favourable to wealth. The following sayings regarding wealth: Lk. : 1³³ 3¹¹ 4¹⁸ 6²⁴. 25 12¹³⁻²¹ 14¹²⁻¹⁴. 33 . . . ; following are illustrations of sayings common to Mt. and Lk., but with an apparent bias against wealth in Lk.'s version of them: Mt. 5³, cf. Lk. 6²⁰; Mt. 6¹⁹⁻²¹, cf. Lk. 12³³; Mt. 5⁴², cf. Lk. 6²⁸; Mt. 19²¹, cf. Lk. 18²²; in the parable of the Marriage Feast (Mt. 22¹⁻¹⁴) it is the 'good and bad' who are . . . from the highways, in the parable . . . Supper (Lk. 14¹⁶⁻²⁴) it is the 'poor and maimed and blind and lame.'

Because of these differences the Gospel of Lk. has been charged with Ebionism (wh. see). It has been said that it preaches the sinfulness of wealth and the merit of poverty. By some this characteristic is taken to be a faithful reproduction of the spirit and teaching of Jesus; by others it is attributed to Lk. or to his sources, or to the influence of the sub-Apostolic period to which, by them, this Gospel is assigned. But before the Gospel of Lk. is credited with a bias against wealth and in favour of poverty, certain facts, pointing to a different conclusion, have to be taken account of. In the first place, what might be construed as proofs of Ebionism are to be found in some of the other Gospels also. The strongest saying of Jesus against wealth, 'It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God,' is recorded by Mt. (19²⁴) and Mk. (10²⁵) as well as by Lk. (18²⁵). So also are the incidents of Peter and Andrew, of James and John, and of Matthew or Levi leaving all to follow Jesus (Mt. 4¹⁸⁻²² 9⁹, Mk. 1¹⁶⁻²⁰ 2¹⁴, Lk. 5¹¹. 27. 28). Mt. and Mk. tell of the Baptist's ascetic manner of life (Mt. 3⁴, Mk. 1⁶). It is to Mt. that we are indebted for the record of the sayings: 'Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon the earth' (6¹⁹), and 'The poor . . . have been preached to them' (11⁵). In Mt. 13 . . . Mk. 1 . . . Jesus is represented as using the phrase 'the deceitfulness of riches'—words not recorded by Lk.; and it is Mt. and Mk., not Lk., who have preserved the saying of our Lord in which He speaks of the blessedness of leaving lands (ἀγροίς) for His sake (Mt. 19²⁹, Mk. 10²⁹). On the other hand, Lk. reports incidents and sayings the reverse of Ebionitic. In the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus recorded by him alone (16¹⁹⁻³¹), rich Abraham is in bliss as well as poor Lazarus. It is Lk. who tells of the women of position who ministered to Jesus of their substance (8²⁻³). He alone records Jesus' injunction to His disciples, 'He that hath a purse, let him take it' (22³⁵). To him we owe the story of Zacchæus, a rich man who won Jesus' commendation even though he still retained half his wealth (19¹⁻¹⁰). And he, in common with the other Evangelists, speaks in terms of approval of another rich man, Joseph of Arimathea (23⁵⁰⁻⁵³). At the same time it can scarcely be doubted that the prominence accorded in Lk. to the contrast between poverty and wealth, and to sayings of our Lord which seem to favour the poor, indicates a deep interest on the part of the writer in the problem of wealth and poverty. See POOR and POVERTY.

2. What, then, is the view of wealth presented in the Gospels? What, in particular, is Jesus' view of wealth? (1) He assumes, though He nowhere explicitly declares, the lawfulness of the possession of wealth. This is implied in such parables as those of the Talents (Mt. 25¹⁴⁻³⁰), the Pounds (Lk. 19¹²⁻²⁷), and the Unjust Steward (Lk. 16¹⁻⁸), all of which deal with the uses of money, without any indication of its possession being indicated. It is implied in His parting injunctions to His disciples (Lk. 22³⁵. 36), and in the saying, 'Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness' (Lk. 16⁹), which also involve the possession and use of money. It is implied even in the demand which He made of the Rich Young Ruler and others to part with wealth (Mt. 19²¹, Lk. 18²² 14³³), and in the exhortation, 'Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon the earth' (Mt. 6¹⁹). In each of these cases Jesus appeared to men to forego what He did not deny was their right. 'He was pressing on them a moral choice, not establishing an economic law' (Speer). The woes pronounced upon the rich and the blessings upon the poor have parallels in the OT (Isa. 65⁷ 58³), and are to be explained on the ground of the moral dangers of wealth as well as on the ground of the . . . of the pious poor by the rich. Nor is . . . Dives (Lk. 16¹⁹⁻³¹) any proof that Jesus condemned the possession of wealth as such. See DIVES.

(2) Jesus implies that wealth is the gift of God. This is the view of the OT (Ps. 89¹¹ 50¹⁰⁻¹². 14 etc.). And it is accepted by Jesus and illustrated in the parables of the Talents (Mt. 25¹⁴⁻³⁰), the Pounds (Lk. 19¹²⁻²⁷), and the Foolish Rich Man (Lk. 12¹⁶⁻²¹). In all these, gifts are . . . wealth. are represented as . . . by God. And this is made specially clear with regard to wealth in the parable of the Foolish Rich Man. The Rich Man's wealth came to him through the medium which is most evidently at God's discretion, namely, through his ground bringing forth plentifully. The same truth is implied in the petition, 'Give us this day our daily bread' (Mt. 6¹¹, Lk. 11³), and in the sayings: 'If God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?' (Mt. 6³⁰, Lk. 12²⁸); 'Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. . . . All these things shall be added unto you' (Mt. 6³². 33, Lk. 12³⁰. 31). And the description of wealth as τὸ ἀλλότριον (Lk. 16¹²) seems to carry with it the idea that wealth belongs really to God, and is only lent or entrusted by Him to men.

(3) Wealth, according to Jesus, is essentially a subordinate good. It is characterized by Him as ἐλαχιστον (Lk. 16¹⁰) compared with spiritual interests. It is too uncertain to be the goal of life (Mt. 6¹⁹⁻²⁴). Inasmuch as it is something outside man and apart from him, the possession of it does not necessarily contribute to riches of character, but may, on the contrary, coexist with poverty of soul (Lk. 12¹⁶⁻²¹ 14¹⁸. 19, Mt. 22⁵. 6). Nor will the possession of wealth compensate for the loss of the true life (Mt. 16²⁶, Mk. 8³⁶. 37, Lk. 9²⁵). Life, in fact, in the highest sense of the term, is a larger and richer thing than mere possession of wealth (Lk. 12¹⁵. 23, Mt. 6²⁰. 25. 33); and it is, to a considerable degree, independent of wealth (Mt. 6²³. 33. 34, Lk. 12²². 23. 28-34).

(4) Wealth is a means, not an end. It is subordinate to the great moral issues of life, and it is of value only in so far as it promotes the true purpose of life. It is a test and discipline of character. The getting, possessing, and spending of wealth develop qualities which survive death, and are fraught with important consequences in the world to come. This view of wealth is presented in the parables of the Talents (Mt 25¹⁴⁻³⁰), the Pounds (Lk 19¹²⁻²⁷), the Foolish Rich Man (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹), the Unjust Steward and Christ's comments on it (Lk 16¹⁻¹³), Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16¹⁹⁻³¹), and in the picture of the Judgment of Men (Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶). In these passages wealth is regarded as a trust committed by God to man, demanding in the possessor of it fidelity, watchfulness, and responsibility. Faithfulness in the administration of the unrighteous mammon prepares for greater and more serious responsibilities in the world to come, and contributes to our well-being there (Lk 16¹⁻¹³); but failure to use wealth aright entails loss and condemnation (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹ 16¹⁰⁻¹³ 19-31). On the other hand, we are taught in the parable of the Unrighteous Steward that as the Steward employed his lord's wealth in securing for himself friends who would support him after he was deprived of his office, so we should administer the wealth committed to us in such a way that it will contribute to our well-being in the world to come.

As to how exactly this is to be done Jesus lays down no detailed rules, trusting rather to the impulses of the regenerate heart issuing in right action. Where love to God and love to man rule the life, wealth will be wisely administered. 'The cross of Christ is the solution of the social problem' (Kambli). At the same time, we are not left without hints and indications as to how one inspired by the enthusiasm of Christianity will deal with wealth. In acquiring wealth he will have regard to the rights and claims of his fellow-men as much as to his own (Mt 22³⁹ 7¹², Mk 12³¹, Lk 6³¹). He will be sparing in his own personal expenditure, and will aim at simplicity of life (Lk 10^{41, 42} RVm). He will be mindful of the claims of relatives (Mk 7¹⁰⁻¹³). He will contribute liberally in gifts and personal service for the advancement of God's Kingdom, even at much sacrifice and inconvenience (Lk 21¹⁻⁴ 8¹⁻³ 23⁵⁰⁻⁵⁶). Nor need the gift necessarily be justifiable on purely utilitarian grounds: it may be artistically expressive of devotion and gratitude (Mt 23⁶⁻¹³, Mk 14³⁻⁹, Jn 12³⁻⁸, Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰). Such a one will also relieve the needs of his fellow-men, either by alms-giving or by personal ministration, or in some other way suggested by circumstances (Mt 6²⁻⁴ 19²¹ 25³¹⁻⁴⁶, Mk 10²¹, Lk 6³⁰ 10³⁰⁻³⁷ 12³³ 14¹²⁻¹⁴ 19⁸, Jn 13²⁹), care, however, always being taken that ostentation or other wrong motives mar not the value of the gift or service (Mt 6²⁻⁴). And Jesus, by His commendation of Mary for her gift of costly spikenard (Mt 26⁶⁻¹³, Mk 14³⁻⁹, Jn 12³⁻⁹), and of the woman who was a sinner for a similar act (Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰), as well as by His presence at the marriage at Cana of Galilee (Jn 2¹⁻¹¹), and at feasts, and by His appreciation of nature, seems to sanction expenditure of wealth in ministering not merely to the necessities of men, but also to their happiness through the gratification of their social instincts and their love of beauty.

(5) But whilst Jesus implies the lawfulness of private possessions and gives guidance as to the right use of them, He is at the same time keenly alive to the perils attached to wealth; and His recorded utterances contain many warnings with reference to them. This is the explanation of those sayings of His which seem on the first reading of them to condemn wealth and the possession of it. He characterizes money as 'the mammon of unrighteousness' and 'the unrighteous mammon' (Lk 16^{9, 11}), not because money is evil in itself, but because the getting and possessing and spending of it are so apt to lead to unrighteousness. Again,

He pronounces woe upon the rich and proud ones (Lk 6^{24, 25}), not only because they were too often guilty of oppressing the pious poor, but also because their wealth exposed them to grave spiritual perils. And He indicates what some of these perils are. Wealth tends to delude a man as to his real worth, and to invest him with a factitious importance (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹). It tends to become a man's god, and to oust the true God from His supremacy in the heart (Mt 6²⁴, Lk 16¹³ 12¹⁶⁻²¹). The rich man is apt to trust in his riches, not in God, and to think that the possession of them insures him against adversity (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹). Wealth is also apt to make him forgetful of his indebtedness to God, and to lead him to regard God's gifts to him as his own absolute possessions to do with as he pleases (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹). Further, wealth has the tendency to deaden the possessor's sense of spiritual need and his aspirations after spiritual good (Mt 13²², Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹ 16¹⁹⁻³¹, Mt 22⁵, Lk 14¹⁸⁻²⁰). It tends also to limit the possessor's thoughts to this present world and its interests, to the exclusion of higher things (Mt 6¹⁹⁻³⁴, Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹ 16¹⁹⁻³¹). It is apt to come into conflict with the demands of the Kingdom of God and to indispose to the acceptance of them (Mt 19¹⁶⁻²⁶, Mk 10¹⁷⁻²⁷, Lk 18¹⁸⁻²⁷ 9⁵⁷⁻⁶² 14¹⁸⁻²⁰, Mt 22⁵). There is also a danger of selfishness and of sympathy for one's fellow-men and selfish ignoring of their needs and claims (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹ 16¹⁹⁻³¹). And, lastly, there is the danger of covetousness (Lk 12¹⁵, Mt 13²²), wealth tending to breed the desire for more wealth (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹), though this sin may beset those also who do not possess (Lk 12¹³⁻¹⁵).

(6) These dangers, vividly realized by Jesus and greatly dreaded by Him, led Him to make use occasionally of language which, interpreted literally, would seem to teach the incompatibility of the possession of wealth with membership in the Kingdom of God. Such are the Woes pronounced on the rich and proud ones (Lk 6^{24, 25}), the conversation following the fall of the Rich Young Ruler (Mt 19^{23, 24}, Mk 10²³⁻²⁵, Lk 18^{24, 25}), and the demand that whosoever would be His disciple must renounce all that he hath (Lk 14³³). These utterances are to be explained partly by the circumstances of the age in which they were spoken. Jesus foresaw trouble and tribulation for His followers. In the world they would have tribulation: they would be hated of all men for His name's sake. Hence, if they were to endure unto the end, it was necessary that they should hold property and friends and life cheap, ready to part with them for the sake of Christ (Mt 10³⁴⁻³⁹, Lk 14²⁶). And this was specially incumbent on those who were to be the preachers and missionaries of the gospel (Lk 9⁵⁷⁻⁶², Mt 8¹⁸⁻²²). Hence Jesus' demand that those who would be His disciples should renounce all that they had. And hence also the severe things He says regarding the rich. But these utterances are to be interpreted also in accordance with Jesus' practice of embodying His teaching in bold, striking, picturesque utterances calculated to arrest attention. He expresses Himself thus strongly in order to impress men in all ages with the extreme peril of wealth, and to admonish the rich that they should hold their wealth lightly, and be ready to sacrifice it if duty demands.

But Jesus went further, and in one case at least demanded of an aspirant for eternal life that he sell all and give to the poor if he would have treasure in heaven (Mt 19¹⁶⁻²², Mk 10¹⁷⁻²², Lk 18¹⁸⁻²²). This demand may have been made to make clear to the Young Man the inadequacy of his observance of the Divine law, and especially the shallowness of his love for his neighbour. But more probably it was made in accordance with the principle, laid down elsewhere by Jesus, that whatever interests or relationships conflict with a man's spiritual well-being and with the claims of God's Kingdom should be sacrificed, even though in themselves legitimate (Mt 5^{29, 30} 19¹²⁻¹⁵, Mk 9^{45, 47}, Lk 14²⁶). It was probably perceived by Jesus that the Young Ruler's wealth was

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—The specific object for which the Gospels were composed did not call for anything like a full detailed use of metrical data. Within their limited compass there are only incidental allusions to a system, or rather systems, of weights and measures. These are naturally scanty and obscure. The most that can be done with them is to identify them as nearly as possible with equivalents in modern systems, and to ascertain their places in those that were current in the Palestine of NT times. At this last point a difficulty at once emerges, due partly to the absence of regard for accuracy and precision in such matters prevalent at the time, and partly to the mixture of standards of successive and widely differing populations coming in with successive waves of conquest and invasion. The situation was not unlike that of modern Syria, with its bewildering confusion of coinage and other standards of value, brought in and introduced by French, German, and other systems.

It is generally agreed by expert metrologists that the basis and fountainhead of all systems of measurement is to be traced to Babylonia. But in passing into Western countries, the Babylonian system was naturally subjected to as many modifications as it entered regions, and gave rise to quite as many secondary or derivative systems. These, during the course of the interrelations of the peoples using them, mutually affected one another; and the result was a variety of values called by the same name, or by names derived from the same original. On account of this fact, etymological processes of reasoning are in this field of little value, if not altogether valueless and misleading. Moreover, throughout the whole history of metrology there is a tendency noticeable towards the shrinkage or reduction of primitive values, making it essential to distinguish with great care between the values current under the same name in different periods of history. In the attempt to reach the truth as far as the 1st cent. A.D. is concerned, it will be best to bear in mind that in Palestine during the OT period three main systems of metrology came into use more or less extensively, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Phœnician, and that to these, just before the times of Jesus, the Roman conquest added a fourth as a disturbing element.

I. WEIGHTS.—The primitive unit of weight was the shekel. This developed into two forms, the heavy and the light (cf. Kennedy in Hastings' DB, art. 'Weights and Measures'). The heavy shekel weighed 252.5 grs., and the light just one-half of that. Perhaps while the shekel was still being used in these forms, a third value was attached to it by the introduction of the Syrian shekel of 320 grs., and a fourth value later, viz. the Phœnician of 224.4 grs. In Roman times the denarius was introduced. This was equivalent to the Attic drachm. But Josephus (Ant. iii. viii. 2) represents the Hebrew shekel (σίκλος) as equal to a tetradrachm (4 drs.), and a drachm-denarius was fixed by Nero at 52.62 grs. At least approximately, therefore, for the 1st cent. A.D., three units in the scale of weights may be determined, as follows: the drachm-denarius=52.5 grs., the light shekel=105 grs., and the heavy shekel=210 grs. Of the higher units the mina is equated with 100 drs., and the talent with 60 minæ, hence the scale:

	Dr.-Den. Shek.	Tetr.	Min.	Talent.
Drachm-Denar.	1				52.5+grs.
Shek. (light)	2	1			105+ "
Shek. (heavy)	4	2	1		210+ "
Tetradrachm
Mina	100	50	25	1	5250+ "
Talent	6000	3000	1500	60	315000+ "

In the Gospels the words διδραχμον (light shekel), Mt 17²⁴ and τάλαντον * (talent, Mt 18²¹ 25¹⁵⁻²⁸) occur, but not as the names of weights; they are the designations of coins (see MONEY). The only term

* τάλαντον in Rev 16²¹ (cf. also Jos. BJ v. vi. 3) can in the nature of the case be only an approximation. The PEFS, 1892, 289 f., records the discovery of a large stone weighing 64600 grs. (41900 grammes), used as a heavy talent weight.

purely designating a weight is λίτρα (pound, Jn 12³ 19³⁰). * This was identified with the mina of the above scale as its approximate equivalent. Its exact weight in the Roman scale of weights is given as 5050 grs., or 11 oz. avoirdupois.

II. MEASURES.—1. Measures of Length.—The unit of linear measurement in earlier Biblical times was the cubit (παρ). This was obtained by the adoption of the length of the forearm from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger as the standard. There are evidences that such a standard was early averaged, conventionalized, and made the legal unit among the Israelites, being introduced like other standards of the kind from Babylonia. The cubit did not, however, remain a fixed unit throughout. From Ezk 40⁵ (cf. 43¹³) we learn that two standards of measurement called cubits had come into use, and were employed in the prophet's day, and that these differed by one hand's breadth. The common cubit was six hand-breadths in length, the sacred cubit, seven. The question of the length of either is, therefore, resolved into the value of the handbreadth. It would be useless to discuss in detail the various processes through which the solution of the problem has been attempted. The results of these processes show a divergence of over nine inches. Conder (Handbook, p. 11) finds the cubit to be 16 in. in length. Petrie (Ency. Brit. xxiv. 484) finds it to be 25.2. Between these extremes are the following: A. R. S. Kennedy (Hastings' DB, art. 'Weights and Measures'), 17.5 in.; Watson (PEFS, 1897, 203 ff.), 17.7; Beswick (ib. 1879, 182 ff.), 17.72; Warren (ib. 1899, 229 ff.), 17.75 in.; Smith's DB, based on Thénis, 19.5 in.; and Petrie (PEFS, 1892, 31), 22.6. If we set aside the extremes by Conder and Petrie and Smith's DB, the divergence in the remainder is reduced to a range of larger than .25 inch. Accordingly, the value of the most recent investigation may be safely taken to fix the value of the cubit in inches at between 17.50 and 17.75. Therefore the symbol, 17.5+ may be accepted as the approximate value of the common cubit among the Israelites. Upon this basis the longer cubit of Ezk 40⁵ was 20.6 in. This result coincides with the Egyptian metrological system, and it appears probable that, being introduced from Egypt as the equivalent of the royal Egyptian measure of the name, the cubit was gradually reduced until in Ezekiel's day the shorter form of it had been definitely fixed. This, then, persisted up to NT times, and was identified with the Roman cubit of a little less than 17.5 in. (cf. Smith, Dict. of Antig. p. 1227).†

The subdivisions of the cubit were the span, equalling half a cubit; the palm or hand-breadth, one-sixth of a cubit; and the digit or finger-breadth, one twenty-fourth of a cubit. The multiples in common use were the fathom, consisting of four cubits, and the reed, of six cubits. Hence the table:

	Digit (Finger-breadth)	Palm (Hand-breadth)	Span	Cubit	Fathom	Reed
Digit (Finger-breadth)	1						.73 in Palm (Hand-breadth)	4	1					3 "
Span	12	3	1				8.75 "
Cubit	24	6	2	1			17.52 "
Fathom	96	24	8	4	1		70+ "
Reed	144	36	12	6	1.5	1	105.5 "

* In this place according to Hultsch, the λίτρα is not the same as in Jn 19³⁰. He understands the term to be the name of a translucent horn vessel with measuring lines on the outside, used by apothecaries in dealing out medicines. Such a measuring instrument was used; but that it served for carrying ointment is improbable, and the identification of the λίτρα here with Jn 19³⁰ seems more natural.

† In Egypt, too, there was a longer cubit and a shorter, and these two were related to one another as 7 to 6, their values in inches being respectively 19.43 and 16.66.

While surprised that a Jew, even when urged by thirst, should so misaccost a Samaritan, the woman did not deny the Saviour's request. Even a Mett-wileh, one of the most fanatical of all Oriental sects, will give water to the thirsty, if appealed to, although to avoid the possibility of pollution he must destroy the vessel from which the infidel has drunk.

WEST (δυση). — In Palestine the direction of the setting sun is also that of the sea, and the West is therefore the source from which rain is generally expected (1 K 18⁴⁴, Lk 12⁵⁴). The observed connexion between western clouds and rain led Christ to remark on the strange inattention to the spiritual trend of the times (Lk 12⁵⁶). He attributed such disregard and misrepresentation to self-delusion resulting from insincerity. He recognized that the final stage of impotence and impotence had been reached, and that the Kingdom of Heaven required the removal of both teachers and teaching and a re-baptism of religious vision and thought (Mt 23³⁶⁻³⁹, Mk 8¹², Jn 4²¹).

The reference to North, South, East, and West as the equal sources from which the Kingdom of Heaven was to draw its membership, indicated the universal scope of His own relationship to the world. The same truth is suggested in the vision of the New Jerusalem as the city with an equal number of open gates on its four sides (Rev 21¹³). Hence to-day, in the statesmanship of that Kingdom, it is unwise and wasteful to transport to the East the controversies and cleavages of Western Christianity. Only the universal truths of the gospel should be presented to the universal mission field.

WHEAT.—Of all the cereals, wheat is at once the most valuable and the most widely distributed. It has been cultivated from very early times, as is proved by the finding of wheat grains in some of the oldest Egyptian tombs. In what land it had its origin is unknown, but de Candolle assigns the honour to Mesopotamia. In Palestine its cultivation dates back to a time prior to the Hebrew conquest (Dt 8^s). How long before cannot be said, but it was probably a considerable time. In the OT the most common name for it is חֶמֶד, which the LXX renders in most instances by σπῆδος (Gn 30¹⁴, Ex 9³² etc.) but sometimes by σῖτος (Jg 6¹¹, Ezk 27¹⁷), and the Vulg. by tritricum and, in a few cases, frumentum. On the other hand, σῖτος is used also to render כֶּרֶם (Jer 23³⁸, Jl 2²⁴), קִנְיָן (Nu 18¹², Jer 31¹²), צֶבֶר (Jos 5¹¹), and שֶׁבֶר (Gn 42³⁻⁵). In the NT this is the term invariably employed (Mt 3¹², Lk 16⁷ etc.), and in EV it is nearly always translated 'wheat.' Like the Heb. קִנְיָן, however, σῖτος is really a general term for the cereals. But we can readily understand how, just as in Scotland the word 'corn' has become the equivalent of oats, so in Palestine it has come to mean wheat. For it was the most common and the most valued of the staple products of the country, and was, as it still is, its principal bread-stuff. Several varieties of wheat are grown in Palestine. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of Bible, 492) mentions specially three of them: Triticum compositum, T. spelta (which is the most common of all), and T. hybernium.

Wheat is sown about November, shortly after the first rains have softened the soil and rendered it fit for ploughing. It is ripe in May or June, but the time of harvest varies for the different districts, being earliest in the low-lying Jordan Valley, and latest in the Lebanons. The processes of reaping, threshing, winnowing, and sifting have already been described (see AGRICULTURE). The return yielded by wheat varies greatly. Thirty-fold is reckoned to Tristram, reckoned a good return (cf. ibid.). But that applies to Palestine as it is now. The sixty-fold or hundred-fold of the parable (Mt 13⁸ ff) might well have been obtained in the days of its former prosperity. Wheat was an article of export from very early days (Ezk 27¹⁷, cf. Ac 12²⁰), and even to this day considerable quantities are exported by way of Haifa and Beirut. It is obtained mainly from the Haurān.

WICKED.—Wickedness (πονηρία) is sin contemplated, not in the light of judicial guilt, or even of moral badness, but of the active mischief which it works.

Four Greek texts in NT: 1. 'wicked' in EV.

(1) ἀθεσμος (atheismos) - describes the man who will not walk according to the lines laid down (τίθεσθαι) for him by others; the man who gratifies his own desires and whims, in defiance of public opinion, or even of Divine regulation.

(2) ἀνομιᾶς (Ac 2²⁸, and nine other times; ἀνομία, sixteen times). This word originally has to do by derivation with the sheep that ἡ τοιαύτη ἐστὶν ἀνομία - that in (1).
 It is generally 'unpleasant' (cf. Lk 16⁵, Ac 28⁵, Rev 10-), and then fulfil the apparent reason for existence, the word comes to mean 'morally bad' as opposed to ἀγαθός, morally good (Mt 21⁴¹ 24⁴⁸, Col 3⁵ etc.).

(4) πομπός. This is the usual NT word; and it occurs very frequently, being usually rendered 'wicked' or 'evil.' It is connected by derivation with toil (tróvos). J. J. Schmidt suggests that, like the word 'villainy,' it has drifted from meaning 'labouring' and hence 'lower class' to 'degraded' and thence 'vicious.' But it seems more probable that the root thought in πομπός is 'causing trouble,' 'mischievous,' and thence 'actively wicked' in contrast to χαρής, 'actively good.' A vivid picture of the wicked man is found in Mt 13:42-43 39-43, where the wicked one, ὁ πομπός. The bad man (κακός) may be content to sin alone, the wicked man (πομπός) seeks to draw away others also.

1. The causes of wickedness.—(a) The wicked one (Mt 13^{19, 38}, Eph 6¹⁶, 1 Jn 2^{18, 14} 3¹², perh. Mt 6¹³, etc.). The first great source of evil is apparently the devil. He is the great mischievous maker who disarranges God's orderly world (κοσμος, Mt 4⁸ 13²⁵, etc.), and is ever found in antagonism to Christ's dominion (Mt 13^{37, 39}, 1 Jn 5¹⁸⁻²⁰ RV). (b) Wicked spirits. Scripture reveals to us not only a general, but also an army of wicked spirits who are ever ready to do his work (see Mt 12⁴⁵, Ac 19¹²⁻¹³, etc.). (c) Fallen human nature. Suggestions from without are reinforced by willingness from within. Deceitful man himself (cf. Mt 7²¹) is traitor to Christ (Mt 13²⁵, Mt 23³⁵, 1 Th 11⁸⁹, Ro 1²⁹). This is the permanent condition of the world apart from Christ (1 Jn 5¹⁹, Gal 1⁴).

2. Manifestations of wickedness.—The tree of wickedness has many kinds of fruit, by which we detect its character (Mt 7¹⁷; e.g. violence (Mt 5³⁹, Ac 17⁵, 2 Th 3³), hypocrisy (Mt 22¹⁸), an unforgetting spirit (Mt 18²⁰), idleness (Mt 25³⁶), unbelief (Jc 3²), self-sufficiency (Ja 4¹⁶), spite (3 Jn¹⁰); everything, in fact, that is unlike Christ, flourishes in the devil's Eden—the lost world.

3. The consequences of wickedness.—The 'children of the wicked one,' if unredeemed from his service, will share his doom (Mt 13⁴⁹. 50 25²⁶. 30, Ro 1²⁹. 32; cf. Eph 2². 3).

4. The remedy for wickedness.—God's attitude towards the wicked man is not one of implacable anger, but of winning kindness (Lk 6³⁵). Reconciled through the cross of Christ (Col 1^{20, 21}), the wicked man may find complete pardon for the past. Nay more, he may be so renewed in nature as to have no taste for his former way of life (Ro 12⁹, Ac 3²⁶, 1 Co 5⁸, 1 Th 5²²). And further, he may not only be completely ransomed from the slavery in which he was formerly held (Mt 6¹⁸, Jn 17¹⁵, 2 Th 3¹, 1 Jn 5¹⁸ RV), but may become actually victorious, through the imparted power of Christ, over the evil one, who is now bitterly to his former subject (1 Jn 2¹³⁻¹⁴, Eph 6¹²).

WIDOW (χήρα).—Four widows are referred to in the Gospels.

1. Anna of the tribe of Asher (Lk 2³⁶⁻³⁸), a devout woman described as a prophetess, who had been a widow eighty-four years, and who constantly frequented the Temple, passing her time in fastings and prayers, and who, coming up at the moment of the presentation of the infant Saviour, moved by the spirit of prophecy, spake of Him to those present who were expecting the redemption of Jerusalem. The Lewis MS of the Syriac Gospels says that Anna lived only seven days with her husband, an alteration not improbably made by some scribe with the object of reducing Anna's age to a less unusual limit. See also art. ANNA.

2. The widow of Sarepta or Zarephath, referred to by our Lord in the parable of the Nazareth (Lk 4²⁵⁻²⁶) as an instance of a widow who had entertained Elijah, and had received a blessing by his means. It has been suggested by A. Meyer (Jesu Muttersprache, iv. 8) that the word 'widow' here may have been 'Gentile' in some Aramaic original, [ܐܡܝܬܐ] (armaittha), the feminine of 'Gentile' or 'Syrian' having been confused with [ܐܡܠܬܐ] (armalta), 'a widow.' If this were so, then our Lord's reference to Naaman the Syrian would be balanced by a reference to 'a woman who was a Syrian' or 'Gentile.'

3. The widow of Nain (Lk 7¹¹⁻¹⁷), a little town situated a few miles to the south of Mount Tabor in Galilee, to whom our Lord uttered His compassionate 'Weep not' just before restoring her only son to life. The people who witnessed the miracle exclaimed that a great prophet had risen up among them, probably with reference to Elijah or Elisha, the former of whom, like Christ, had raised a widow's son.

4. The poor widow who cast her two mites into the treasury (Mk 12⁴¹⁻⁴⁴, Lk 21¹⁻⁴), whom Christ commended. It should be noted in practical applications of this parable that our Lord's praise of the widow, that she cast in 'all her living,' that is to say, her day's entire income, or 'all that she had to live upon until more should be earned' (Swete), and 'all that she had' the phrase 'widow's mite' is in contrast with the small sums deducted, and more or less easily spared, from a daily income.

In addition to these four widows, who were actual persons, a widow is a character in one of our Lord's parables (Lk 18¹⁻⁸), who, having no power to enforce the justice she claims, obtains it at length by her persistence. It is from this our Lord draws His assurance that God will hear and answer those who cry day and night unto Him. Further, widows are referred to by Christ (Mt 23¹⁴ [omitted by RV], Mk 12⁴⁰, Lk 20⁴⁷) as being often cruelly oppressed and defrauded by the Pharisees of His day.

It may be regarded as certain that our Lord's mother was a widow during the time of His ministry, hence His recommendation of her, just before His death, to the beloved disciple (Jn 19²⁶⁻²⁷).

The honourable and important position which widows occupied in the early Church is entirely in harmony with the respectful and sympathetic tone in which they are referred to in the above places of the Gospels.

THE SYRIAC GOSPELS.—The Syriac Gospels as a widow. This may be another confusion of 'widow' and 'Gentile' alluded to above. ALBERT BONUS.

WIFE (γυνή).—For the general subject see FAMILY, MARRIAGE, WOMAN.

Our Lord places the claims of a wife above those of a father or mother, and emphasizes in the most striking way the spiritual and bodily unity, indissoluble except for one cause, of the two who have been joined together in marriage (Mt 19³⁻⁶, Mk 10²⁻⁹). And precisely because of His exalted conception of a wife's place in her husband's heart, He teaches the absoluteness of His own claims on the loyalty and obedience of His disciples, by setting them clearly in a man's eyes over against those of the wife of his bosom. It was on the same occasion on which He pronounced what might be called the Magna Charta of married womanhood that He uttered those solemn words about the need of a wife for His sake and the gospel's (Mt 23¹⁻², Mk 10²⁹; cf. Lk 18²⁹). And in the parable of the Great Supper, among the rejected excuses of those who do not accept the gracious invitation, is that of the man who said, 'I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come' (Lk 14¹⁹). WILDERNESS.—The word or words (more or less synonymous) which the EV tr. by 'wilderness' or 'desert' afford a striking example of the difficulties which translators, and after them the ordinary readers of Holy Scripture, have to contend with, because that word does not convey to our mind the idea of something we know: in our western European countries there is not, properly speaking, any desert or wilderness, in the Biblical sense of the word. Thus, unable to consult our own experience, we have to fall back upon books we have read, and upon notions obtained in that way. Immediately there rises in our memory the view of a desert of sand, stretching itself out of sight in a complete solitude, and giving to the caravans of travellers scarcely any other choice but death from thirst, or burial under the moving soil blown up by some terrible windstorm. Such is the classical representation of a desert or wilderness, and it is a constant source of errors for the translators of numerous passages of the Bible in which the word occurs. There is no 'desert of sand' either in Palestine or in the neighbouring countries. In fact, the Hebrew word which is usually tr. 'desert' or 'wilderness' (midbār) does not in the least convey the idea of solitude or desolation; on the contrary, it belongs to a root which means 'to pasture,' and therefore, etymologically, 'feeding-ground' or 'pasture-land' would seem to be the most exact translation. But if we should adopt it, another ambiguity would be created, and a false notion suggested. Indeed for a European reader, a pasture is a meadow with abundant grass, which is not at all true of the Palestinian midbār.

For a correct understanding of the meaning of the word 'wilderness' in the Bible, one has to remember that there were—and are still—nomads in Bible lands. Those people are not addicted to agricultural life, but to the breeding of cattle; they live on the borders of cultivated lands, between these and other regions which are either uninhabitable or practically uninhabited. The territories held by those nomads—called Bedawin in modern times—are not without water and grass; but these indispensable resources, required for the herds, are both scarce, and the tribes of shepherd are compelled to remove their camps from one place to another for feeding and watering their cattle. The midbār is therefore essentially the ground occupied by nomad tribes; it forms around agricultural districts a zone variable in extension or breadth; sometimes culture wins over uncultivated lands, sometimes these regain spaces formerly tilled and sown. At the boundary itself of those two tracts of land live some . . . which hold a sort of intermediate . . . progress of civilization: they are half-sedentary, half-shepherds (half-Fellahin, half-Bedawin), and, dwelling still under tents, they cultivate the ground, plough, sow and reap (cf. Max von Oppenheim, Vom Mittelmeer zum Persischen Golf, 1900, ii. pp. 78-84). Even in the interior of cultivated districts, where villages and towns exist, there are frequently patches of land where the soil remains abandoned to itself, without culture, and they offer, therefore, the same character as the exterior zone inhabited by nomads. Those spaces are generally used as pasture-grounds for the cattle, and have also been called midbār. They are found even near towns; thus the OT mentions the wildernesses of Gibeon, of Tekoa, of Damascus, of Riblah (MT Diblah, Ezk 6¹⁴). Besides those local denominations, others occur which apply to peripheral regions: wildernesses of Shur, of Sin, of Sinai, of Paran, of Zin, of Kadesh, of Ethan (or Yam-Suph), of Maon, of Ziph, of Beersheba, of Engedi, of Jeruel, of Beth-aven, of Edom, of Moab, of Kedemoth. Several of these wildernesses, as their names show, cover vast spaces; others, on the contrary, represent quite limited places.

One of the most important deserts is the Wilderness of Judah, twenty hours in length and five in breadth, which constitutes, with the Mountain (Har), the South (Negeb), and the Low-Country (Shephelah), the four parts of the territory of that tribe. The Wilderness of Judah is the region situated east of the watershed, between this high line and the western shore of the Dead Sea. The wildernesses of Ziph and of Maon are portions of it in the south, as well as those of Engedi and Tekoa in the middle; and finally also, in the north, the rough, barren, and uninhabited district where the road runs from Jerusalem to Jericho (cf. Lk 10^{30ff.}). That wilderness is an uneven, undulating table-land, where conical hills and rocky hillocks arise, where deep ravines are cut between steep walls of rocks; it falls down towards the east—here in gradual declivities, there in sudden and abrupt slopes—in the direction of the Dead Sea, situated 1500 or 2000 feet below. No river or rivulet, no trees, no villages; a soil without vegetation, either sandy or stony, here and there with scarce and meagre grass, which is avidly sought for by small flocks of sheep and goats, belonging to a few miserable camps of black or brown tents. That wilderness was the refuge of David when persecuted by Saul (1 S 22-26); he knew it from the time of his youth, having, when a boy, followed there the herds of his father (16¹¹ 17^{15, 34}). Later on the same region sheltered Judas Maccabæus and his companions (1 Mac 9²³).

The wildernesses mentioned in the Bible are not all as inclement and inhospitable as the Wilderness of Judah. They are sometimes inhabited; they contain wells and cisterns, towns (Jos 15^{61f.}, 1 K 9¹⁸, 2 Ch 8⁴) and houses (1 K 2²⁴), herds of sheep (1 S 17²⁸), and pastures (Ps 65^{12f.}).

The Gospel of John alludes twice to the sojourn of Israel in the wilderness (3¹⁴ Moses lifting the serpent, and 6^{31, 49} the manna). The Synoptics do not mention it; but it is spoken of in the Book of Acts, specially in Stephen's discourse (7³⁶⁻⁴⁴) and in 13¹⁸, and in 1 Co 10¹⁰ and 11c 3⁴ (quoting Ps 95⁸) and 3¹⁷.

The Wilderness of Judah is named several times in connexion with John the Baptist. His youth, according to Lk 1⁸⁰, was spent 'in the deserts'; that is, certainly, with the keepers of herds, away from towns or villages, in solitude and contemplation. In that respect, as well as in others, John is like Amos, the shepherd of Tekoa. According to the Gospels, 'the deserts' included also the country near Jordan—beyond, that is, east of, the river—where John began his ministry, preaching and baptizing (Mt 3¹, Mk 1⁴, Lk 3²; cf. Mt 11⁷, Lk 7³³; see artt. BETHABARA, JOHN THE BAPTIST, JORDAN), and the four Gospels apply to that event the prophecy of Is 40³ (Mt 3³, Mk 1³, Lk 3⁴, Jn 1²³).

Ecclesiastical tradition has not been content with the indications given in the Gospels which connect John the Baptist's life and work with the wilderness: it has connected also his birth with it. The place where Zacharias and Elisabeth dwelt . . . vaguely named in Lk 1³⁹, it has been identified by . . . of the Holy Land and the pilgrims, since the time of the Crusades, with a village situated about 4 miles west from Jerusalem; the Arabs call it 'Ain-Karim, but it is known in the language of the Churches as 'St. John in the Desert' or 'St. John in the Mountain.' That place is not in the Wilderness of Judah; its neighbourhood is cultivated and fertile, at least in the sense in which one can use that word when speaking of Judæa. Even if we should suppose that such was the birthplace of John, it would be unjustified to consider it as being 'in the wilderness' (cf. ZDP¹ xxii. pp. 81-93).

It is also in the wilderness that the Gospel narratives place the scene of the Temptation of our Lord (Mt 4¹, Mk 1¹², Lk 4¹). Since the time of the Crusades, ecclesiastical tradition has contrived to localize that event in a particular, well-defined spot, and has chosen for it the bleak and desolate mountain which arises almost vertically above the Fountain of Elisha, west from the oasis of Jericho. A Greek convent, continuation of a very old laura, which was, if not founded, at least developed by Elpidius (ZDPV iii. p. 13), is suspended on the side of that mountain, which has received the name of Mount of the Quarantania (Tebel Karantûl), on account of Jesus fasting 40 days. It is, of course, equally impossible to prove or to disprove that this place is the one mentioned in the narratives of the Temptation.

Galilee, and particularly the shores of the Lake of Gennesaret, was at the time of our Lord relatively well peopled: this is proved by the Gospels, and still more explicitly by the testimony of Josephus. There were, however, spaces of land without human habitations, and probably left to the shepherds and their cattle. According to the narratives of the Gospels, several scenes of the Galilean ministry of Jesus, and some of His teachings, were connected with places of that sort, designated now as 'a desert' or 'a wilderness' (ἐρημος or ἐρημία), now as 'a desert place' (ἐρημος τόπος). We have to mention here (a) the multiplication of loaves (Mt 14¹³⁻²¹, Mk 6³⁰⁻⁴⁴, Lk 9¹⁰⁻¹⁷, Mt 15³²⁻³⁸, Mk 8¹⁻¹⁰); (b) Jesus withdrawing for prayer (Mk 1³⁵, Lk 5¹⁶), or to avoid the crowd (Mk 1⁴⁵, Lk 4⁴², Jn 11⁵⁴); (c) the demoniac of Gadara (Lk 8²⁹); (d) the parable of the Lost Sheep (Lk 15³⁻⁷), where the 99 sheep remain 'in the wilderness,' whereas the shepherd goes after that which is lost until he finds it.

WILL.—'Every man,' says Thomas Reid (Works, 1863 ed., p. 530), 'is conscious of a power to determine, in things which he conceives to depend upon his determination. To this power we give the name of Will; and, as it is usual, in the operations of the mind, to give the same name to the power and to the act of that power, the term "Will" is often put to signify the act of determining, which more properly is called volition.' On the question of the freedom of the will see FREE WILL and LIBERTY; and on the human will of Jesus see SOUL, 668^b. Our Lord Jesus Christ has given us a perfect example of how our great possession of freedom should be used, has shown us by His own perfect subordination of His will to the will of His Father, that the goal at which we should aim is to have our wills in perfect accord with the will of God, whether it be His will as to our doing, or His will as to our doing. 'O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt' (Mt 26³⁹); 'I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me' (Jn 6³⁸). It is our part to seek to have the mind of Christ, and to obey where God would have us to obey, and endure where He would have us to endure.

'Our wills are ours to make them thine.'

WIND (ἀνεμος; πνεῦμα, only in Jn 3⁸).—The four winds' (Mt 24³¹, Mk 13²⁷) is an expression standing for 'north, south, east, and west,' the winds in Palestine coming mainly from these directions. These winds retain their character, varied only in degree, throughout the year. The north wind is cold; the west, from the sea, moist; the south, warm; and the east, from the desert, dry. This last is very pleasant in the winter months; but in spring and autumn, when it is prevalent, it is exceedingly oppressive, a few hours often causing every living thing to droop. The popular belief that the most violent winds are from the east is not confirmed by the writings of the ancients; of over five years in Galilee. The ... storm in that period was from the west. See, further, SEA OF GALILEE, p. 591.

W. EWING.

WINE (οἶνος; once, Ac 2¹³, γλεύκος).—The climate and soil of Palestine are excellently adapted to the production of grapes, and from very early times wine has been a common beverage in the country. In the OT it is praised as a source of good cheer to the heavy of heart, as a stimulant for the faint, and as a token of a full, happy, and prosperous life (Pr 31⁶, Ps 104¹⁵). The dangers of excessive indulgence are indeed clearly indicated. The priest while on duty, and the Nazirite during the currency of his vow, might not touch it (Lv 10⁹, Nu 6³). The sin of drunkenness is presented by ... (Pr 23³⁰⁻³², Is 28⁷). The Recluse ... wine, however, arose probably from the nomadic view of the vine as the symbol of the settled life, not from any objection to the use of wine in itself (W. R. Smith, Prophets, 84, 389). In the Gospels wine appears with bread as representing ordinary fare (Lk 7³³); it is drunk on festive occasions (Jn 2³), and at religious feasts (Mt 26²⁹ etc.). Mingled with oil, it is applied to wounds as a healing agent (Lk 10³⁴); mingled with myrrh, it is used as a narcotic (Mk 15²³).

The ancient methods of wine-making persist to the present day. Commonly the grapes are placed in a large shallow trough, cut in the surface of the rock. The juice is there trodden out, and conducted by a channel to a deeper trough at a lower level. The time of the vintage and wine-treading is one of great joyfulness among the people, their labours being enlivened by the singing of songs, and rhythmic clapping of the hands. Fermentation sets in quickly. The first, or what the Jews called the 'tumultuous' stage, might be passed in four days, during which the wine remained in the trough, or vat, if possible. It was then put into earthenware jars which had been lined with pitch, or, if it were to be sent to a distance, into 'bottles,' where the process was completed. In about three months the wine was fit for use.

Where the soil was deep, a press was 'dugged' in the earth (Mt 21³³ etc.). This, built round with masonry, and carefully cemented, received the juice expressed in a wooden structure set on the surface.

The 'bottles' are partially tanned goat-skins. The apertures where legs and tail have been severed are sewn up, leaving only that at the neck, which is firmly tied when the skin is filled. The wine in the first stage of fermentation, if tied in the skins, would, by reason of the gas generated, burst them. When the 'tumultuous' stage is passed, the new 'bottle' yields sufficiently to permit completion of the process. 'Bottles' once stretched in this way had no further powers of distention, and if used again for the same purpose would, of course, burst (Mt 9¹⁷ etc.).

Different qualities of wine were distinguished (Jn 2¹⁰), probably indicated, as they are still, by the localities where they are produced. The 'new wine' of Ac 2¹³ (lit. 'sweet wine') v ... 'the wine made from the drip of the ... clusters are trodden in the ... than the thin sour wines used ... (Lindsay, Acts, in loc.). The modern 'sweet wine' is made from the white or green grapes, the juice being slightly boiled.

There is nothing known in the East of anything called 'wine' which is unfermented. Pharaoh's butler pressed grapes into his master's cup (Gn 40¹¹). In a text found at Edfu, it is said that grapes squeezed into water formed a refreshing beverage which was drunk by the king (Driver, Genesis, in loc.). This possibly corresponds to the Spanish drink made by squeezing grapes not quite ripe into water. But it is never called 'wine.' The γλεύκος of Ac 2¹³ was certainly fermented. Apart from the fact that the vintage was eight months passed, which put the keeping of unfermented grape juice out of the question, it was alleged as the cause of drunkenness by those who must have known its character. The wine used by the Jews in Palestine—people most conservative in their religious customs—at the Passover, is of the ordinary kind. And there is no trace of any tradition among them of ... introduced. Their attitude to ... of unfermented grape juice may be gathered from the saying in Pirke Aboth (iv. 28), 'He who learns from the young, to what is he like? to one that eats unripe grapes, and drinks wine from his vat.'

While in the NT wine is plainly regarded as good, and its medicinal value is recognized (1 Ti 5²³), there is no blindness to the danger attached to its abuse (see, e.g., Eph 5¹⁸, 1 Ti 3³, Tit 2³). The question of total abstinence, like that of slavery, had not yet been raised. No argument for total abstinence can be built on the significance of terms used for 'wine' in Scripture. But 'the Apostle Paul has stated the case for total abstinence in Ro 14 in a way that does not need the treacherous aid of doubtful exegesis for its support' (DB, s.v. 'Food'). WINTER (χειμὼν, Mt 24²⁰, Mk 13¹⁸, Jn 10²²).—This is the time of cold and rain-storms. The modern Arab. name, esh-shitta, means literally 'the rain.' It is the season in which the rain supply of the year falls; it lasts roughly for seven months, from October till April inclusive, thus including the part of the year which we call spring (see SUMMER).

While in the deeper parts of the Jordan Valley it is never very cold, the raw air breeds many discomforts in the rainy season. On the higher lands, however, the cold is often intense, snow lying at times—e.g. in Jerusalem—to a depth of some inches. The rain moistens the soil, hard baked by the summer sun. In a land where the science of road-making is practically unknown, the paths go swiftly to mud, and travel in winter is always toilsome, and not seldom perilous. W. EWING.

i. THE BIBLICAL CONCEPTION.—In Biblical language the term 'wisdom' (OT חָכְמָה hokhmāh, LXX and NT σοφία, rarely φρόνησις (Lk 1¹⁷, Eph 1⁸), or σύνεσις (Lk 2⁴⁷, Eph 3⁴)), is applied (A) to a human, (B) to a Divine attribute.

A. Under the former head is included.—1. The type of thought illustrated in the school of religious-philosophical thinkers contemporary with and later than the prophets, rivalled and ultimately displaced by the scribes. Thus the designation of Mt 23³⁴, 'prophets and wise men and scribes,' is seen to be historically correct, as against the modified form of Lk 11⁴⁹ ('prophets and apostles'; cf. 1 Th 2¹⁵, Eph 2²⁰ etc.), the representatives of these schools of Jewish thought being regarded as commissioned by and endowed with the Divine Spirit. 2. In a derived sense the writings of these inspired men (ἡ παράδοσις σοφία, applied by Hegesippus and Palestinian writers generally to the group Pr.-Wisd. of Sol.; see Eus. HE iv. xxii. 8, 'Nicene and post-Nicene Fathers' [ed. Schaff-Wace], with note by McGiffert), regarded as utterances of the Spirit of God: 'the Wisdom of God saith' (Lk 11⁴⁹) = 'the Holy Ghost saith' (He 3⁷) = 'the Spirit (of apocalyptic prophecy) saith' (1 Ti 4¹, perhaps referring to Jannes and Jambres, 2 Ti 3⁸).

B. The designation 'Wisdom of God,' or simply 'Wisdom,' is sometimes applied to the Spirit of God as manifest in the redemption, in the illumination of the mind and regeneration of the soul.

1. In the Hokhmāh, or Wisdom literature, this is the habitual designation of the Divine Spirit, especially conceived as effecting the redeeming love of God, which goes forth to seek and save the erring (Wis 1⁶ 7²²⁻²⁸). Personification of Wisdom (Job 28, Pr 8), under the later speculative influence of Stoic metaphysics, passes imperceptibly into hypostatization and a Logos-doctrine, cosmological as well as soteriological. Wisdom = the Metathron, Wis 9⁴, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100. In Philo the terms 'Wisdom' and 'Logos' are practically equivalent, the Stoic term naturally tending among Greek readers to displace the Hebrew. Consequently, under the mythologizing influence exerted through the Wisdom literature, the redemptive mission of the Divine Spirit (9¹⁷) develops into an unmistakable avatar doctrine, wherein Wisdom becomes incarnate, and dwells among men (Bar 3³⁷, cf. Oxyrh. Fragts. Log. iii.), or even descends to the underworld to 'visit all that sleep, and shine upon all that hope in the Lord' (Sir 24³² Lat.; cf. psalm-Targum, ap. Iren. Hær. iii. xx. 4, and Eph 3¹⁰). Rejected by men, she ascends again to her seat in heaven (Enoch xlii. 1),* whence she returns to be poured out upon the elect in the Messianic age (xliv. 1). The mythologizing tendency was strongly reacted against by the scribes, especially in the period of Akiba, during the rivalry of Synagogue and Church in Palestine (A.D. 70-135). On the Jewish side, from this time forward, all personifications of the Divine Wisdom were rigidly restricted in their application to the Mosaic Torah (Sir 24²³⁻²⁷, Bar 4¹, Psalm-Targum, iii. 14, vi. 10). We even find later readings in Jewish texts altering hokhmāh to torah (torah to torah). In general, after the schism of the Nazarenes, speculative thought (doctrine of the Merkabah) is rigorously suppressed.

2. On the Christian side Wisdom speculation continued to develop in both the cosmological and the soteriological directions, with the Pauline Epistles as a basis. In the Johannine literature the Greek term 'Logos' is adopted, though the Wisdom doctrine itself continues Hebrew; but in the 2nd cent. Fathers, as in Philo, 'Wisdom' and 'Logos' are interchangeable and equivalent. Both designate the Spirit of God incarnate in Christ. The presence of mystery myths, already traceable in pre-Christian apocalyptic, becomes more pronounced. Greek speculation becomes completely Hellenized. In these Wisdom σοφία, or hokhmāh, is the feminine or passive principle in the scheme of redemption, ἐκπύρωσις the active. The present discussion will confine itself to the NT use of the two conceptions of wisdom: (A) as the inspired message of God through the 'wise men' (hokhmāh); (B) as the Divine Spirit itself, resident in Jesus, and manifested in His life as well as in His teaching. For the history of Wisdom as the Hebrew philosophy, and as a hypothesis equivalent to the Stoic Logos, the reader is

* The note of R. H. Charles on this passage of Enoch is too significant to be omitted: 'The praise of wisdom was a favourite theme. Wisdom was regarded as having her dwelling-place in heaven (lxxxiv. 3, Job 28:11-12, Bar 3:29, Ecclesi 2:23), and as coming to earth and dwelling with men. She abode with men (Pr. 1:20, 8:1, 9:1, 10:1, 11:1, 12:1, 13:1, 14:1, 15:1, 16:1, 17:1, 18:1, 19:1, 20:1, 21:1, 22:1, 23:1, 24:1, 25:1, 26:1, 27:1, 28:1, 29:1, 30:1, 31:1, 32:1, 33:1, 34:1, 35:1, 36:1, 37:1, 38:1, 39:1, 40:1, 41:1, 42:1, 43:1, 44:1, 45:1, 46:1, 47:1, 48:1, 49:1, 50:1, 51:1, 52:1, 53:1, 54:1, 55:1, 56:1, 57:1, 58:1, 59:1, 60:1, 61:1, 62:1, 63:1, 64:1, 65:1, 66:1, 67:1, 68:1, 69:1, 70:1, 71:1, 72:1, 73:1, 74:1, 75:1, 76:1, 77:1, 78:1, 79:1, 80:1, 81:1, 82:1, 83:1, 84:1, 85:1, 86:1, 87:1, 88:1, 89:1, 90:1, 91:1, 92:1, 93:1, 94:1, 95:1, 96:1, 97:1, 98:1, 99:1, 100:1). In the Messianic times she will return, and will be poured out as water in abundance, xlii. 1, and the thirsty will drink to the full of wisdom, xlii. 1; she will be bestowed on the elect, v. 8, xci. 10; cf. Apoc. Bar. xiv. 14, 4 Ezra vii. 52; and the spirit of wisdom will abide in the Messiah, the Elect One, xlii. 3. What is here said of the outpouring of the spirit of wisdom is parallel to Ac 2:16 of the spirit of prophecy (cf. Nu 11:25) and to the agraphon: 'Et factum est cum ascendisset dominus de aqua, descendit tons omnis Spiritus Sancti, et requievit super eum,' etc.

ii. NT USE.—1. A study of the use of the word σοφία, and its cognates, in the Gospels, shows it to be, in some instances, characteristic of the Lukan writings, in others, of the Synoptics, and in many examples having the characteristic forms of the Hokhmāh (Wisdom) literature (see Briggs, Expos. Times, viii, ix, [1897-98] four articles on 'The Wisdom of Jesus the Messiah'). The characteristic strophic form is apparent also in some discourse-material found only in Mt. (e.g. 5^{21f.} 27^{f.} 31^{f.} 33^{f.} 38^{f.} 62-6, 16-18), but is rearranged by additions in the canonical form of this Gospel. The word σοφία occurs but once in Mk. (6²=Mt 13⁵⁴), and is applied, as in Lk 24⁴⁵ and the series cited below, to Jesus' endowment with the Spirit. It occurs twice in Mt. (11¹⁹ 12⁴²), both occurrences being in passages verbally identical with Lk., and in a less original form. In Lk.-Acts it occurs 10 times; but the Lukan use is specially noteworthy, because endowment with the Spirit of God is here habitually spoken of, whether in the case of Jesus, of His forerunners, or of His successors, as the χάρισμα of 'wisdom.' So of Jesus (Lk 24⁴⁵, cf. 24⁴⁷ σύνεσις and 4²² λόγος χάριτος), of the endowment of the Twelve with the Spirit (21¹⁵), of the Seven (Ac 6³), of Stephen (6¹⁰), of Joseph (7¹⁰), of Moses (7²²). In the Fourth Gospel the conception of the endowment of Jesus with the spirit of wisdom is supplanted by that of an incarnation of the Logos. The word σοφία and its cognates are wholly wanting.

2. With this Gospel use should be compared that of the NT elsewhere. In the Pauline Epistles the word occurs 16 times in the passage 1 Co 11⁷⁻³¹, wherein St. Paul contrasts 'the wisdom of God,' which endows those who 'have the mind of Christ' with 'the wisdom of this world'; and 9 times in the twin Epistles (Eph.-Col.), written to oppose a 'philosophical vain deceit' (Eph 4¹⁴ 'wiles of error') by means of the 'gift of a spirit of wisdom and understanding in the mystery of the Divine will.' It is used here in but three other instances, two of which (1 Co 12⁸, 2 Co 1¹²) are directly related to the group first mentioned, while the third occurs in the doxology Ro 11³³. The word is also used by St. Paul (1 Co 17¹⁻²¹, Eph 3¹¹, Col 2²), in his letters in 2 P 3¹⁵.

3. The only other NT employments of the word, or of the connected group of ideas, are in James and the Apocalypse. In Ja 1⁵ 13¹⁵ 17 'wisdom' is more exclusively practical and ethical, but is emphatically a Divine endowment. The conception of 'the wisdom which cometh from above' (i.e. the Divine Spirit, given to all that ask, Ja 1⁵), manifested in works of love, is contrasted with wisdom of the tongue in Ja 3. The former is the fundamental characteristic of the just or righteous man (2 δικαίος), a use which agrees closely with that of St. Paul and the OT Wisdom literature (cf. Lk 11¹⁷ σοφία θεοῦ, and 11¹⁸ σοφία σατάνης... φρονιμώτεροι). In the Apocalypse 'wisdom' is an attribute of God in the doxologies 5¹² 7¹² (cf. Ro 11³³); otherwise it is referred to only as an endowment like that of Joseph (Gn 41^{38f.}) and Daniel (Dn 5¹⁴), requisite to solve riddles (Rev 13¹⁸ 17⁹). The Third Evangelist appears thus of St. James and of St. Paul, with traces of the same use in certain parts of Mt. and Mark.

iii. USE IN THE DISCOURSES OF JESUS.—The discourses of Jesus furnish a meagre but trustworthy starting point for a history of the term in its Christological development. Among these discourses we cannot venture to reckon the saying Lk 21¹⁵ (=12¹¹=Mt 10^{13f.}=Mk 13¹¹=Jn 15^{26f.}), since the parallels make it probable that σάρμα καὶ σοφία (cf. Lk 24⁴⁷ prudentiam et os, cod. e.) is only the characteristic Lukan mode of expressing the promise of the Paraclete. All other occurrences of the word or connected idea in the discourses stand more or less closely related with one of two incidents: (1) Jesus' denunciation of the faithless generation which rejected for opposite reasons both the Baptist's mission and His own (Mt 11), or (2) His denunciation of the scribes who blasphemed the Spirit of God whereby He wrought, demanding a sign from heaven (Mt 12²²⁻⁴⁵). These discourses are variously distributed in our First and Third Gospels (Mt 11²⁻³⁰ 12²²⁻⁴⁵ 21²⁸⁻³² 23³⁴⁻³⁹ and Lk 7¹⁸⁻³⁵ 10¹³⁻¹⁵ 21^{f.} 11²⁴⁻²⁶ 29-32, 49-51), but have in common a close connexion in thought and a resemblance of language in exceptional degree as between the two canonical reporters. In these two groups of discourses, therefore, must be found, if anywhere, the basis in Jesus' own utterances for the subsequent application in Christology of the conception of the Divine Wisdom.

iv. MATTHEAN CONNEXIONS OF THE TWO GROUPS OF SAYINGS.—1. The Matthean context of group (1) starts from the question of John's disciples. This is made the occasion by Jesus of a comparison of unrepentant Israel to children who are pleased with neither the mournful nor the gay melodies of their playmates. His hearers had been displeased at the asceticism of John, and are equally so with the genial life of the 'Friend of publicans and sinners.' As against this rejection by the self-righteous of the message of repentance and forgiveness, 'Wisdom's children' (here those who had rejected John, cf. 21^{31f.}, Lk 7^{29f.}) are contrasted with the methods (Mt 11²⁻¹⁹) of the Baptist, who continues with the denunciation of 'the cities wherein most of his mighty works were done,' which is perhaps accountable for the omission in some MSS for τέκνα in v. 19. These verses (Mt 11²⁰⁻²⁴) are otherwise placed by Lk.; but those which follow (Mt 11²⁵⁻²⁷=Lk 10^{21f.}) again relate to the wisdom of Jesus which is delivered to Him (παρέδοθη μοι) by His Father (in contrast with the παράδοσις of the scribes, Mk 7¹³), and, though hid from the wise, is revealed to the 'little ones.' This in turn introduces in Mt 11²⁸⁻³⁰ an invitation closely re-echoing those placed in the mouth of the Divine Wisdom in the literature of this class (cf. Sir 51^{26f.} 62³ and Orthographus Log. iii. [iv.]). This closes the chapter and the discourse.

2. In Mt 12²⁸⁻⁴⁵ substantially the same subject is resumed, but it is now à propos of the blasphemy of the scribes against the Holy Spirit in ascribing Jesus' exorcisms to Beelzebub (12²²⁻³⁷), the intervening material (12¹⁻²¹) comprising the two Sabbath incidents of Mk 2²³⁻³⁴. In this further denunciation, not of the scribes but still of 'this evil and adulterous generation,' Jesus declares that it will fare worse than the Ninevites; for, while these repented at the warning of Jonah, this generation has rejected a greater warning (i.e. the Baptist's; cf. 11¹²⁻¹⁴ and Bacon, Sermon on the Mount, App. C. iv. v. pp. 216-231). It is condemned also by the Queen of the South, because she came to hear 'the wisdom of Solomon,' whereas this generation has rejected a more important matter, i.e. Jesus, who is conceived as the 'wisdom of God.' A concluding parable (Mt 12⁴³⁻⁴⁵=Lk 11²⁴⁻²⁶) likens 'this evil generation,' with its Pharisaic mania purifica, to 'a house swept and garnished' which becomes the abode of demons, because 'the Spirit of God.' It is highly significant that in both groups the condemnation is uttered by Jesus for rejection of the Spirit of God, which in the case of the discourse against the Baptist is assumed to be manifest in Jesus' message of forgiveness, in the case of the blasphemy of the scribes in His healing power. The significance of the use of the term 'wisdom' in both cases (Mt 11¹⁹ 12⁴²) for the gracious and winning appeal of God's redeeming, forgiving love, is made more apparent by the contrast in both instances with the Baptist's harsher message of warning against 'the wrath to come.' This is manifest from the figures of wailing versus piping, mourning versus dancing, fasting versus feasting, preaching of Jonah versus wisdom of Solomon.

v. LUKAN CONNEXIONS OF THE TWO GROUPS.—

A further discourse, correctly connected in Lk 11⁴⁰⁻⁵¹ with group (2) (in Mt 23³⁴⁻³⁹ incorrectly attached to Mk 12⁴¹⁻⁴⁰ = Mt 23¹⁻¹²) carries to its logical conclusion the denunciation of the scribes who had blasphemed the Holy Spirit. Speaking now directly in the name of 'the wisdom of God' (Lk 11⁴⁰), Jesus predicts their impending fate, and in the Matthean form (which properly includes the pathetic appeal to Jerusalem, separated from it in Lk. [Mt 23³⁷⁻³⁹ = Lk 13³⁴]), the forsaking of 'your house' by God's Spirit. Not only have we throughout this context the characteristic forms and modes of expression of the Wisdom literature, but the final warning is expressly introduced as an utterance of 'the wisdom of God' (ἡ σοφία τοῦ θεοῦ), by which should be understood not the specific title of an individual writing of this literary category, but the entire canon of 'Wisdom' writings, inclusive of the lost work from which the extract is made. The following considerations will make this clear:—

1. The . . . the previous line of thought is apparent to . . . the fate of God's messengers (with cf. Mt 12⁴⁰ = Lk 11²⁹⁻³²), to the vain plea of the Spirit [Wisdom] (with Mt 23³⁷⁻³⁹ = Lk 13³⁴; cf. Mt 12³⁸⁻⁴² = Lk 11²⁹⁻³²), and to . . . = Lk 13³⁵ cf. Mt 12⁴³⁻⁴⁵ = . . . M. . . the other hand, make it probable that . . . 13³⁴⁻³⁹), if not more, is really drawn from some lost 'Wisdom' writing. (a) The sending of 'prophets and wise men and scribes' (σοφῆρας) is . . . which cannot be as . . . Mt.) but only . . . Spirit (Wisdom). . . of the figure . . . Is 31⁵, Dt 32¹¹ is appropriate only to the Divine Spirit, which broods over Jerusalem; it is actually so applied in 2 Es 13⁰. It will appear to many inappropriate if made an utterance of Jesus personally. The same may be said in less degree of the threat of the forsaking of the house (cf. Jer 12⁷⁻²⁸). Josephus preserves a kindred legend of voices in the Temple saying, 'Let us remove hence,' BJ vi. v. 3. (c) The whole context Mt 23³⁴⁻³⁹ (comp. its paraphrase in 2 Es 12⁸⁻³⁷, which, though late and . . . , preserves the material in the form of an utterance of 'the Lord Almighty'). (d) Mt 23³⁵ contains, as some think, an anachronistic reference to the murder of Zechariah the son of Baruch . . . before the siege of Jerusalem (Jos. BJ iv. v. 4). This . . . may be disregarded, as the reference may also be explained as a reference to Zechariah the son of Jehoiada (2 Ch 24²⁰) with the prophet Zechariah son of Berechiah (Zec 1¹).

2. Lk 7³⁵ presents a context . . . connected by the thought fundamental to the saying Mt . . . narrative-material . . . peculiar to Luke. . . material have the same bearing, and the former includes the nucleus of the 'wisdom' sayings of Mt 11.

It thus appears that in the two groups of discourse-material . . . represented in Mt 11 and 12 and Lk 7 and 11 we have inextricably intermingled (1) sayings of Jesus wherein His own gracious mission was set over against the harsher warning of the Baptist as the message of the Divine Wisdom; and (2) extracts in defence of His beneficent works, from the actual Wisdom literature, these extracts having been embodied along with His words of denunciation of the scribes, either by Himself or in the subsequent development of Evangelic tradition. To draw the line with precision between authentic utterances of Jesus, and material . . . from the Wisdom literature . . . by 'the wisdom of God' (Mt . . . the powers of criticism; but the . . . are needless because the really significant fact is that Jesus' actual teaching, at least in the form given it by the source here employed in common by Mt. and Lk., was so closely allied to the ideas of this Wisdom literature as to permit of intermingling at an extremely early date. A later example of the process of adaptation is furnished by the Oxyrhynchus papyrus which puts in the mouth of Jesus the characteristic Wisdom utterance: 'I stood in the midst of the world, and in the flesh was I seen of them (cf. Bar 3³⁸), and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them, and my soul grieveth over the sons of men because they are blind in their heart' (Oxyrh. Log. III.).

3. Other elements of discourse-material from the Third Gospel and Acts may be clearly traced to a source of the same Wisdom type, if not the same composition. (a) In particular, the wisdom of Solomon, especially as exhibited in the hedonistic Epicureanism of Ecclesiastes, is pointedly contrasted with a higher wisdom in the great discourse on the true riches of Lk 12¹³⁻³⁴, part of which is taken up in Mt 6¹⁹⁻³⁴. The polemic against Ec 2 in 12¹³⁻²¹ becomes tenfold more pointed as the discourse proceeds to compare the beauty of the lilies and the provision of the ravens 'which have neither store-chamber nor barn' (cf. v. 18) with 'Solomon in all his glory' (cf. Ec 1¹²⁻¹⁸ 21²⁵). The subject of the discourse ('wherein life consists,' vv. 15, 22f.) is as distinctive of Hebrew Wisdom literature as the form and phraseology.

(b) To the same original context must be reckoned the greater part of Lk 16, the material of which is peculiar to Luke. The 'wisdom' of the unrighteous steward in the use of 'the mammon of unrighteousness' is a subject manifestly in close relation to the use of riches commended in 12¹³⁻³⁴, the affinity extending even to the phraseology (with 16⁹ 'riches that fail' cf. 12³³ 'treasure that faileth not'). The combination of the two, therefore, in Mt 6¹⁹⁻³⁴ à propos of the heavenly recompense (Mt 6¹⁻⁴ 18), probably reflects a real connexion of Lk 12¹³⁻³⁴ with 16¹⁻¹³ in the source.

Similar reasoning, based partly on the phraseology (cf. 16¹³ with 18²⁴) partly on the subject-matter, connects the rest of Lk 16 (exc. v. 17, 18) with 18⁹⁻¹⁴ (19¹¹⁻²⁷?). The two companion parables 16¹⁹⁻²⁵ (vv. 26-31 seem to be a later addendum) and 18⁹⁻¹⁴ exemplify the principle laid down in 16¹³, while 16¹⁶ = Mt 11¹²⁻¹⁴ links the whole with Lk 7²⁹. The whole group of teachings and parables on worldly conditions is thus seen to have a common occasion and bearing, a common spirit, and a common point of view not elsewhere shown in the Gospels, but closely resembling the social teaching of James (cf. 1⁹⁻¹¹ 21⁹ 4^{2f.} 5¹⁰ 13⁶ 51⁶).

(c) A kindred subject having a similar development in Lk., but otherwise only scantily represented in the Gospels, is . . . on the Divine bounty in ans . . . 11¹⁻¹³), which can hardly be . . . companion parables 11⁵⁻⁸ and 18¹⁻⁸). The bare and wholly disconnected fragment taken up in Mt 7¹⁻¹¹ is as inadequate to represent . . . is Mt 6¹⁹⁻³⁴ if . . . of the parables on the Rich Man and the Shrewd Steward. Once more, it is the Ep. of James that supplies an echo of the same spirit (cf. 1⁵⁻⁸ 17 4^{2f.} 51¹³⁻¹⁸).

It is clear that the method here applied may be extended to much of the special discourse-material of Lk., including perhaps some elements of Acts (on Solomon in Ac 7⁴⁴⁻⁵⁰ see Yale Bicentennial Contributions, 1901, p. 271 f.). It is sufficient for the present to indicate that a large element of our Third Gospel is thus characterized.

vi. WISDOM UTTERANCES REPRESENT A SPECIAL TYPE OF GOSPEL TRADITIONS.—The question of the relation of the Wisdom discourses to the recognized Gospel sources is one which inevitably suggests itself as soon as the fact is recognized that they are characterized by a peculiar and distinctive point of view. It becomes our duty, accordingly, to trace at least the outline of an answer.

1. The discourse-material of Mt 11-12 falls outside the pentad characterized by the colophon καὶ ἐγένετο ὅτε ἐτέλεσεν κ.τ.λ. already discussed in art. LOGIA.

2. Besides being separated by narrative-material from these groups, Mt 11-12 differ from them in the fact of their relation to the narrative, from which they are inseparable, and in the degree of similarity in their language to the Lukan parallels. As against the groups of logia which have not, and from their character do not require, a narrative setting, the discourse of Mt 11 not only relates the coming of the Baptist¹ but presupposes an account of Jesus² and even requires us to suppose the reader somewhere informed of what had given rise to the taunt 'Behold a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners.' The same applies to the discourse in defence of Jesus' exorcism 'by the Spirit of God.' This indispensable narrative-element is always supplied more fully and in better connexion by Lk., in some cases by Lk. alone (Lk 11¹⁷, 12¹³⁻²¹).

3. The similarity of language to the Lukan parallels is here very exceptional, reaching the degree of verbal identity for whole sentences, and positively requiring the use of the same written Greek source.

4. This marked difference in the degree of resemblance serves to connect other non-Markan elements of Mt., such as 3¹⁻⁴, 8⁵⁻¹⁸, 18-22, which are again found to fall outside the Matthean pentad, to differ in content and point of view from the Logion source, and to be at once more authentic and for the most part more authentic in detail in Luke than in Matthew. Linguistic peculiarities in several instances prove the dependence of Mt. in these portions. Thus Ἱεροσολήμ is used by Lk. 68 times against 3 (5?) employments of Ἱεροσόλυμα. The latter form on the contrary is invariably employed in Mt., Mk., and Jn., except thrice in Mt 23³⁷=Lk 13³⁴. βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ is systematically changed by Mt. to τῶν οὐρανῶν. There are but four exceptions: Mt 19²⁴ (=Mk 10²⁵) and 12²⁸ 21³¹, 43. Cf. Lk 7²⁹ 11²⁰).

vii. RELATION TO NARRATIVE-ELEMENTS OF SYNOPTIC TRADITION.—Although our First and to a less extent our Third Logia both derive the main framework of the Logion from our Second, this Second itself is not wanting in evidences of dependence on the source to which we have traced the Wisdom chapters of Mt. and Luke.

1. This relation appears in the description of the Baptist as Elias (Mk 1⁶; cf. Lk 7²⁴, 33, Mt 11¹⁴, 2 K 1⁸); of the Temptation (Mk 1¹³, the ἄγγελοι and θρίαλα coming from Ps 91¹³⁻¹⁵ quoted in Lk 4¹⁰); of Jesus as 'eating and drinking' while the disciples of the Baptist were fasting, and as 'a friend of publicans and sinners' (Mk 2¹⁵⁻¹⁷; cf. Lk 7³⁴); of the blasphemy of the scribes (Mk 3²²⁻³⁵; cf. Lk 11¹⁴⁻²⁸), and perhaps of the Transfiguration (Mk 9²⁻¹³; cf. Lk 9²⁸⁻³⁶). In all these passages of Mk. and in other loosely connected material (9³⁸⁻⁴⁰=Lk 9⁴⁹, 12⁴¹⁻⁴⁴=Lk 21¹⁻⁴) the context of Lk. gives more or less conclusive evidence of priority. It is but reasonable to suppose that other Markan narratives such as 6¹⁻⁶ may also have been derived hence, though the present Lukan form has been affected by Mk.

2. Of the connexion of the narrative-elements peculiar to Lk. with the source thus characterized it is hardly needful to speak. The common point of view of this material, presenting Jesus as the friend and champion of the lowly, from His childhood in the manger, welcomed by shepherds, to His acceptance by the thief on the cross, is well known. Nor can such narratives as that of the repentant harlot (Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰) be separated without violence from the discourse context. It is only in Mt. and Mk. that Lk 7¹⁻¹⁰ and 21¹⁻⁴ find themselves on a foreign soil.

* Note especially the rare form ισθω found only in Lk 7³⁸, 34 10⁷ and 22³⁰. In all the other 55 occurrences of the verb in the NT, including 10 in Mark and 9 of Lk.'s own, the regular form ισθίω is used.

viii. CONCLUSIONS AS TO PROTO-LUKAN SOURCE.

—Admitting the precarious character of all attempts at extricating the Synoptic sources, and the probable development of the Antiochian (?) tradition between the period of it by Mk. and Mt. and its ultimate by Lk., enough remains to justify the following inference. A type of Gospel tradition grew up (at Antioch?) intermediate between those to which tradition attaches the names respectively of 'Matthew' and 'John,' and containing the ἡ λεχθέντα ἡ πραχθέντα traditionally ascribed to the preaching of Peter. The Matthean tradition is especially connected both by the unanimous testimony of antiquity and by internal evidence with Jerusalem. It takes as its method the agglutination of the logia of Jesus into a five-fold new Torah, as 'commandments . . . Lord to the faith.' This agrees with the tendencies of the Palestinian Church and the methods of the Synagogue as illustrated, e.g., in the Pirke Aboth (cf. the Oxyrhynchus Logia). Besides the halachic type of Gospel tradition the earliest a haggadic, of which Peter is source. It seems to have had two branches, the earlier (Mk.) connected by tradition and internal evidences with Rome, the later (Jn.) with Ephesus, both almost as wholly preoccupied with the doctrine of the Person of Christ as the Pauline Epistles, and appealing to the drama of the Ministry and Passion for proof of the Divine worth of Jesus. In the earlier (Mk.), connexion with the Petrine tradition is still close. In the later (Jn.), Pauline Logos-doctrine wholly dominates. Midway between these two types of Gospel tradition, the Hebrew and the Græco-Roman, is developed that which tradition credibly associates with the name of Luke at Antioch. Combining both sayings and doings (ἡρῶντο ποιεῖν τε καὶ διδάσκειν, Ac 1¹) in juster proportion than Mk., it finds in the history, as exhibited in both elements, a manifestation of the Spirit of God in terms of the Jewish Wisdom-doctrine. As our First canonical Logion presents as the . . . of the ministry the new Lawgiver or . . . of Beatitudes, so our Third presents the scene in the synagogue of Nazareth where the 'words of grace' uttered by the bearer of 'the Spirit of the Lord God' are rejected by His own people, the tragedy of the Divine Wisdom. The theme is constant, but is developed alike in message of grace and deed of mercy. The whole career of Jesus is a manifestation of 'the power of God and the wisdom of God.' Analysis of the sources of canonical Lk.-Acts reveals no difference in this fundamental point of view. From the beginning, as in the 5th cent., the Antioch school is historical, and its historical sources admittedly include, in Acts, if not in the Gospel, the oldest narrative of the NT. By the standard of internal evidence its tradition is more markedly Petrine than Mk.; its Christology roots itself, like the Pauline, but with less of the Hellenic speculative development, in that broadest, most humanitarian, most tolerant school of Hebrew thought, the followers and exponents of 'all-virtuous Wisdom.'

ix. WISDOM SPECULATION IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF CHRISTOLOGY.—The conception of Wisdom as affecting Synoptic tradition involves such literary analysis of the source as the foregoing. As affecting the doctrine of the Person of Christ it involves at least a passing glance at the Pauline Christology, the link between Synoptic and Johannean doctrine.

1. The Wisdom-doctrine of St. Paul stands in unmistakably close relation, as regards its antecedents, with the Wisdom literature; and, as respects its subsequent development, with the Johannean Logos-doctrine. St. Paul's indebtedness to

1. The Wisdom-doctrine of St. Paul stands in unmistakably close relation, as regards its antecedents, with the Wisdom literature; and, as respects its subsequent development, with the Johannean Logos-doctrine. St. Paul's indebtedness to

St. Paul's philosophy and ethics is set forth by no less a philosopher than Lightfoot ('St. Paul and Seneca' in Com. on Phil.). Recent demonstrations of his much more extensive and direct dependence on the Wisdom literature, especially the Book of Wisdom (Internat. Crit. Com. on Romans, by Sanday and Headlam, p. 51; cf. Grafe, 'Das Verhältniss der paulinischen Schriften zur Sapientia Salomonis' in Th. Abh. C. v. Weisszucker gewidmet), should by now have made it plain that Stoicism comes to St. Paul mainly through Jewish channels. Again, since it is certain that St. Paul both by temperament and by experience was more apocalyptic than scribe, it should not have been overlooked that he has advanced, however briefly, his own decision on the moot point, whether the manifestation of the Divine Wisdom is in the Torah of Moses (so the scribes on the basis of Ex 24-8), or whether it is the living Spirit of God sent forth in human form. Ro 10⁴⁻⁸ and Bar 3⁹⁻⁴¹ (especially 3^{29f.}) contain contemporary and rival conceptions of Dt 30¹²⁻¹³. By St. Paul's interpretation the word 'of revelation' is nothing more or less than 'Christ' as pre-existent spirit, the same Wisdom which, 'because she was the artificer of all things,' passing into the soul of Solomon gave him 'an unerring knowledge of the things that are, to know the constitution of the world,' etc. (Wis 7¹⁷⁻²²), the same 'mind of Christ' by possession of which Christians have similar knowledge of the purposes of the Creator, just as a man's own consciousness gives him knowledge of his private designs (1 Co 2⁶⁻¹⁶; see MYSTERY). Definite identification is thus made by St. Paul in this and many other passages between the Divine Spirit of Wisdom, through which, according to 'Wisdom,' God created the world, and the pre-existent Christ. Even the avatar doctrine of the descent and ascent of Wisdom (see references above, i. 1) is unmistakably adopted by St. Paul partly in opposition to, partly in rivalry with, the widespread conceptions of mystery religion (see MYSTERY). But just as a study of the Pauline ethics will show that its Stoic elements have been subsumed under the Christian principle of altruistic service (Eph 5¹¹, Ph 2¹⁻¹³), so it should be recognized that the Pauline incorporation of Wisdom, while clearly incorporating in Eph 4⁸⁻¹⁰ a quasi-mythological interpretation of Ps 68¹⁸, rests upon an authentic teaching of Jesus. According to St. Paul, Ps 68 sets forth the descent, conflict with the hostile powers, triumph and ascent of the Divine Spirit (cf. Col 2¹⁵, 1 P 3¹⁸) after releasing the captives of Death (cf. 1 Co 15^{26f.}). But Eph 4⁸⁻¹⁰, when compared with the earlier and later related passages concerning the avatar of Wisdom (Bacon, Story of St. Paul, p. 316 ff.), will be seen in some sense to rest upon the parable of Jesus concerning the 'spoiling' of the Strong Man armed, by the Stronger than he (i.e. the Spirit of God) in Jesus, Mt 12²⁸). We find it, in fact, applied in this sense by the Fathers (e.g. Irenaeus, frag. 2 in Pasch. Chron.; Heads again, etc.; cf. Hnydekoper, Works, vol. ii., 'Christ's Mission to the Underworld'). Thus the Pauline Wisdom or Logos-doctrine of a pre-existent, spiritual Christ is firmly rooted in the authentic teaching of Jesus Himself. To Jesus also 'the power of God and the wisdom of God,' were exhibited in His own mighty works and God-given teaching, and were a 'sign' to His generation (Mt 11²⁻²⁴ 12²⁸⁻⁴²; cf. 1 Co 1¹⁷⁻²¹).

2. Johannine and Patristic Christology.—(a) It matters little that after St. Paul the Wisdom-doctrine should have been rebaptized by the Greek title of Logos, perhaps under the influence of Philo, perhaps as a concession to a Greek-speaking Church. Even in the Fourth Gospel the basic conception remains Hebrew and Pauline. Sanday as a student of Johannine thought, Sabatier as a student of Pauline, could not but find the identity of doctrine under the different names.

(b) In the Fourth Gospel the standpoint of the Logos is purely and simply the theological. He depicts the self-manifestation of the Divine Wisdom or Logos as incarnate in Jesus by word and deed. Her 'dwelling among men' (1¹⁰⁻¹⁴; cf. Enoch 42²), rejection and apotheosis (20¹⁷) is his theme. It is characteristic that here, as in the Wisdom literature in general, Wisdom is made to 'praise herself' (Sir 24). The incarnate Logos preaches Himself; His seven parables are seven 'I am's,' His seven mighty works manifest His own glory (Jn 2¹¹). In Jn 7³⁸ Jesus even quotes again an unknown 'scripture' which by all analogy is drawn from the Wisdom literature (cf. Sir 24^{30f.} [applied in vv. 23-29, by analogy with five rivers, to the five books of the Torah], Enoch 48¹ 49¹, and for Rabbinic interpretation in the scribal sense, Emek Hammelech, 196*, on Is 12³, 'The waters are nothing else than the Torah, and the waters of salvation nothing else than the Torah of Messiah,' Weber, Lehre d. Talm. p. 360 f.; cf. also 1 Co 10⁴ and Oxyrh. Log. III.).

(c) The Wisdom utterance Mt 11^{25ff.} may be regarded as marking the transition-point between the Synoptic and Johannine representations of Jesus' teaching. Not its doctrine alone, nor its mysticism, nor its use of 1 Co 2 (see MYSTERY), but the very form of the utterance is thus seen to be characteristic; for the Wisdom of God habitually speaks in the first person. Herein the discourses of the Fourth Gospel are as close to the spirit of the Wisdom literature as its terminology is close to the Wisdom-doctrine of St. Paul. In the development of Gospel literature the presentation of Jesus' career and teaching as the manifestation of the Divine Wisdom takes a place analogous to that of the Wisdom-doctrine of St. Paul in the development of Christology.

B. W. BACON.

WISDOM OF CHRIST.—1. Christ, being God and man, possessed naturally two distinct kinds of wisdom—Divine wisdom and human wisdom. The former, as part of the totality of the Divine attributes (τὸ πλῆρωμα τῆς θεότητος), He necessarily possessed from eternity, and, according to Pauline teaching, He continued to possess in the spite of His kenosis, or self-emptying (Ph 2⁷), even after His Incarnation (Col 1¹⁹ 2⁹, cf. 2³). The continued possession by the Incarnate Logos of the fullness of the Divine wisdom is no isolated doctrine, but is necessarily involved in the Logos-Christology of St. Paul and St. John, according to which the Father does not create and sustain the world directly, but mediately through the Logos, who is the Creator (Jn 1^{3, 10}, Eph 3⁹, Col 1¹⁶, He 1²), the Life (Jn 1⁴), and the Light (v. 9) of the world, the cause of its rational order, and the principle of its coherence and subsistence (Col 1¹⁷). Cosmical functions of such a kind as this, assigned to the Logos in accordance with His essential nature and position in the Godhead, cannot be supposed to have been laid aside at the Incarnation, and therefore the limitations of Christ's knowledge, which the Synoptic Gospels recognize, either must be attributed to His manhood, or else it must be supposed that in the historical Christ were two centres of Divine consciousness—an unlimited one, in which He knew all things, and a limited one, in which He condescended to be ignorant of certain things. The latter view, which is based on an ultra-literal interpretation of Mk 13³², postulates three different centres of consciousness in Christ—an unlimited Divine wisdom, a limited Divine wisdom, and a human wisdom. This scheme appears to us . . . complicated. The 'ignorance' of Mk 13³² is ascribed to the Son, can quite naturally, on the principle of communicatio idiomatum, be attributed to Christ's human nature (οὐκ ἄγνοῶν ὁ Λόγος, ἡ Λόγος ἐστίν, ἔλεγεν, Οὐκ οἶδα, οἶδε γάρ, ἀλλὰ τὸ ἀνθρώπων δεικνύς, ὅτι τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἰδίῳν ἐστι τὸ ἄγνοεῖν, Athan. c. Avian. iii. 45); and consequently there is no need to recognize in Christ more than two wisdoms, a human and a Divine (see, further, KENOSIS).

(1) In virtue of His Divine wisdom, Christ is omniscient, i.e. He knows all actual and possible things, present, past and future, including the things which are possessed of freedom (sometimes called scientific scrutable to us; but it is . . . in many passages of both Is 41²²⁻²³, Jer 38¹⁵, He 4¹³ etc.), and is frequently claimed by Jesus (Mt 11²⁰⁻²³ 26⁵¹, Jn 6⁷⁰ etc.), who is represented as able to read the heart of man (Jn 1⁴⁷⁻⁵¹ 2²⁴⁻²⁵ etc.).

(2) With regard to Christ's human wisdom, believers in a real Incarnation (ἐνανθρώπησις), as distinguished from a mere assumption of a body (ἐνσάρκωσις, ἐσωμάτωσις), recognize both its finite character and its development. The gradual . . . is twice noticed by St. Luke (2⁴⁰ πληρούμενον σοφία [σοφίας], 2⁵² προέκοπτε σοφία καὶ ἡλικία), and once by the author of Hebrews (5⁸ κατεπερ ὡν νῆος, ἐμαθεν ἀπ' ὧν ἔπαθε τὴν ὑπακοήν, καὶ τελειωθείς ἐγένετο, etc.). To understand the growth in wisdom here spoken of as merely exhibitive—Christ being supposed, as He grew in age, to manifest more and more of the hidden wisdom which He possessed entire from the first (so John of Damascus and most of the later Fathers; also Aquinas and the Scholastics)—is not only bad exegesis, but is virtual Apollinarism. Apollinaris denied to Christ a real human soul; but Aquinas virtually does the same when he asserts that the soul of Christ was created mature, in the full enjoyment of free-will and of the Beatific Vision, and possessed of wisdom and knowledge . . . extensive with the Divine.*

It is the representation of the Gospels. In them Christ undergoes not simply a bodily, but a normal psychological development. He is true infant, true boy, true youth, in mind as well as in body. As Irenæus beautifully says: 'He came to save all by means of Himself—all, I say, who through Him are born again to God—infants, and children, and boys, and youths, and old men. He therefore passed through every age, becoming an infant for infants, thus sanctifying infants; a child for children, thus sanctifying those who are of this age, being at the same time made to them an example of piety, righteousness, and submission; a youth for youths, becoming an example to youths, and thus sanctifying them for the Lord' (Against Heresies, ii. 22-24). The Incarnation of Christ thus restored the norm of human development. In the growth of the child Jesus, God saw the doctrine is that from the moment of conception, Christ knew all actual events and things, past, present, and future. Only abstract possibilities, which were never to be realized, were hidden from Him.

for the first time human nature expanding and perfecting itself according to its original plan and plan, unhindered and undistorted by sin; and upon the gracious spectacle God and man looked with approval (Lk 2^{40, 52}).

(3) By the human wisdom (σοφία) of Christ is meant His quick understanding in the things of God (cf. Ja 1⁵); His knowledge of the Scriptures, and His power of teaching them (cf. Ac 6^{3, 10}); His deep moral insight, gained by actual experience of temptation and suffering (He 5⁸); His capacity for learning His lessons at the synagogue school (cf. Ac 7²²); His skill as a carpenter (cf. Ex 31²⁶); the power of asking and answering hard questions (cf. Rev 13¹⁸ 17⁹) which He displayed even as a boy (Lk 4⁶), and which stood Him in good stead on so many occasions during His ministry (Mt 22^{15, 23, 34} etc.); His skill in constructing parables, allegories, and sententious sayings, like those of the wise men of old (cf. Mt 12⁴); His persuasiveness as a teacher and eloquence as a preacher (see Mt 13⁵⁴, cf. 1 Co 1¹⁷ 2⁴⁻⁴); His common sense and practical ability (cf. Col 4⁹); probably also His power of working miracles (Mk 6², cf. Ac 7¹⁰), and His prophetic gift (2 P 3¹⁵), which were in Him, partly at any rate, human endowments, as in other prophets (see Mk 13³²).

(4) It is implied in Scripture that Christ's human knowledge received a great extension at His Resurrection and Ascension. At the Resurrection He received all authority (πᾶσα ἐξουσία) in heaven and on earth (Mt 28¹⁸), and this authority He exercises as man, and not simply as God (Ph 2⁶, Rev 5¹³⁻¹⁴ etc.). His human knowledge, therefore, must now be co-extensive with His human authority; that is, it must embrace all cosmical facts—past, present, and future. It is an error, however, to suppose that His human knowledge is even now co-extensive with His nature is essentially finite, and therefore the human soul of Christ, though glorified, can never completely know the Infinite Essence of God. See, further, CONSCIOUSNESS.

WISE MEN.—See MAGI.

WITNESS.—The idea of witness as related to Christ and His gospel plays an essential and highly important part in the NT writings, and in the Christian faith and life universally. Not only in the preaching, but also in all effectual evangelization, the history of the Church, the gospel is conceived not as a mere system, but as a witness to Jesus the Christ. Himself God's Witness to the world.

Among the NT writers none appears to have so definitely and fondly reflected upon the idea of witness as St. John. It is one of his 'leading ideas.' In his Gospel (cf. Westcott, Speaker's Com. on 'St. John,' Introd.) he mentions a seven-fold witness to Christ: the witness (1) of the Father (5^{34, 37}), (2) of the Son (8¹⁴ 18³⁷), (3) of His works (10²⁵ 5³⁶), (4) of the Scriptures (5³⁹⁻⁴⁶), (5) of the forerunner (1⁷ 5³⁵), (6) of the disciples (15²⁷ 19³⁵), (7) of the Spirit (15²⁶ 16¹⁴). In view, however, of the uniqueness of the Person of Christ, and in harmony with the method of the NT preaching, it will be most appropriate to consider our subject under these two heads:—I. The witness of Jesus Christ the Son, supported by the witness of the Father and of the Spirit. II. The witness of the disciples to Jesus Christ the Son of God, supported by the witness of the Holy Spirit.

I. THE WITNESS OF JESUS, SUPPORTED BY THE WITNESS OF THE FATHER AND OF THE SPIRIT.—1. Jesus' personal witness.—His first disciples Jesus gathered about Himself through the power of the truth which He spoke and of His own Personality, so marvellously at one with His word. He did not begin with declarations about Himself. He came to make the Father known. He came fulfilling, in word and deed, the Law and the Prophets. He preached repentance and inward righteousness. With a wealth of light He set forth the nature of the Kingdom of God. But in all this Jesus spoke as witness. He was conscious of an immediate, intimate, and unique fellowship with the Father, and out of this consciousness He spoke (Mt 11²⁷, Jn 3¹¹ 10¹⁵ 14¹⁰ 17^{21, 25}; see also art. CONSCIOUSNESS). The tone and manner of spiritual authority permeated all that He said and did from His earliest teaching to His sublime declaration before Pilate, and even to His words upon the cross (cf. esp. Mt 5-7, Jn 18³⁷ 19³⁰, Lk 11^{43, 46}). But this consciousness of speaking as witness finds also distinct and emphatic expression in His word (cf. esp. Jn 8^{12ff.}).

While Jesus' witness was primarily concerning the Father,—He even denied in a certain sense that He bore witness of Himself (Jn 5³¹),—it is yet certain that He also bore witness of Himself (cf. esp. Jn 8¹⁴ 18³⁷ 14⁹). Jesus testifies of Himself as the Way. This testimony is unmistakable and unqualified. And yet the method of this witness was chiefly indirect or by way of necessary implication. He appealed to the Father's testimony concerning Him, or else silently waited till it should be brought to light. And when the revelation from the Father produced in the disciples a believing confession of His Son, Jesus clearly accepted and sanctioned that confession (e.g. Mt 16¹⁶⁻²⁰).

2. The witness of the Father to Jesus includes both the personal, inward testimony to Jesus Himself, which resulted in His full consciousness as Messiah and Son (see art. CONSCIOUSNESS), and all the works of God preparatory to and consequent on the life of Jesus Christ on earth. It led men to the certainty of faith in Him as Redeemer and Lord. Under this head we note: (1) The witness of the Scriptures (cf. esp. Jn 5³⁹, Lk 24²⁷, Ac 10⁴³). This must be taken in the most real sense and yet not narrowly. The OT is full of the Messianic hope, and that hope was inspired by God. Jesus was steeped in the Scriptures, and He understood the things in them concerning Himself. We have no longer reason to insist upon a scheme of minute prediction and fulfilment, and yet we still affirm that Jesus is not to be understood otherwise than as the Fulfiller of the Law and the Prophets. (For a fuller discussion of this point see art. FULFILMENT. Cf. also Valetton, Christus und das AT; and Köhler, Jesus und das AT).

(2) The witness of John as a prophet of God (cf. esp. Jn 17. 8. 15. 19ff. 5³⁶) is manifestly closely related to that of the Scriptures; but John is, of course, more specific than the earlier prophets could be. John's witness Jesus accepts as having a very real significance, for He regards it not as the witness of man merely, but as inspired of God.

(3) The witness of the works (cf. esp. Jn 5^{30, 36} 10^{37, 38} 14^{10, 11}, Ac 22²⁴). The works are a testimony from the Father; for Jesus declares: 'The Father abiding in me doeth his works.' It would, doubtless, be a grave mistake to regard Christ's word, 'The works which the Father hath given me to accomplish the very works that I do, bear witness of me, for the Father hath sent me,' as meaning only His miracles. The testimony of the works issues from His whole life and ministry. His whole lifework was a manifestation of God, and as such was, in the larger sense, truly a miracle. See, further, artt. MIRACLES, RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, and SIGN.

3. The witness of the Spirit to Jesus the Son.—The witness of God to His Son calls for faith in the Son (1 Jn 5. 10). His witness is borne to us primarily in objective facts (1 Jn 1^{1a}. 5^{8, 10}), but it is borne in upon our consciousness only by the Spirit of God. 'It is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is the truth' (1 Jn 5⁷; cf. also Mt 16¹⁷). It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the Person and work of Jesus Christ are the object of this testimony. The Paraclete, the Spirit of truth (Christ says), 'shall bear witness of me' (Jn 15²⁶). The witness of the Spirit, according to the NT, is a much larger thing than the assurance of personal sonship through Christ (Ro 8¹⁶; cf. art. ASSURANCE). Personal assurance is an essential and respectably important part—in a sense the climax—of the Spirit's witness. But it is un-Biblical to speak of this assurance as the witness of the Spirit. The Spirit's testimony is coextensive with the objective testimony. The manifestation of the truth of God in objective facts becomes to us an inward illumination only through the inward witness of the Spirit. Without the testimonium Spiritus sancti internum the objective witness is unable to produce full assurance. On the other hand, an inward persuasion that is not firmly grounded in objective reality is miserably insecure. The climax of the inward testimony is personal assurance; but the inward witness is inseparable from the outward. They are not two separate and independent testimonies. God would make us certain of His wonderful love and grace. To this end He reveals Christ for us, and He also reveals Him in us. The outward manifestation is the indispensable means to the inward revelation. The fact of the fellowship with God through the Spirit (e.g. Ro 8. 1-4) is not a thing by itself, it is the demonstration of the truth of the promise by an initial and progressive realization of the same. The actual fellowship of the Spirit is the Spirit's own witness. See, further, art. HOLY SPIRIT.

II. THE WITNESS OF THE DISCIPLES, SUPPORTED BY THE WITNESS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.—Nothing could be clearer than that the primitive Christian preaching was not only the most direct and specific witness to Jesus the crucified and risen Lord, but also a witness of the most spontaneous and full of the assurance of the Son of God, an overpowering certainty (Ac 4²⁰, 1 Co 9¹⁶, 2 Co 4¹³).

What constitutes, according to the NT, the competence and competence of a witness of Jesus Christ? What are His original disciples the only genuine witnesses? Are not those also 'who have not seen and yet have believed' (Jn 20²⁹) competent witnesses? In the first place, then, let us inquire how the original witnesses were prepared for their office. Early in His public ministry Jesus chose from out the larger number of His disciples 'twelve that they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach' (Mk 3¹⁴). These He trained to be heralds of His gospel (see art. APOSTLES: and Bruce, The Training of the Twelve), and declared that, when the Paraclete should have come to them, they should bear witness of Him (Jn 15^{26, 27}). After His Passion and Resurrection He expressly commissioned them to go forth as His witnesses (Lk 24⁴⁸, Ac 1⁸). They could, of course, have had no vital conception of Jesus and His mission without the illumination of the Holy Spirit. But was there something in their experience which constituted them the only real witnesses? Some have so held; but this is a view unwarranted by Scripture and out of harmony with the principles of evangelical Christianity. The original disciples, it is true, were the only eye- and ear-witnesses. Yet what they literally saw and heard was not the revelation itself, but only the means thereto. In Jesus the flesh was, so to speak, 'a transparency for the Word.' Nevertheless multitudes 'saw and heard' Jesus and understood not. None of the rulers of this world recognized in Him the Lord of glory (1 Co 2⁸). The original heralds of Christ did indeed lay a certain stress upon their being eye- and ear-witnesses. But they prized their capacity of sensible intercourse with the Lord not for its own sake, but because it was to them the means of entering into an inward personal fellowship with Him. In the days of His flesh this fellowship with Him was necessarily limited by the senses, though the fellowship itself was not sensuous but spiritual. Even for these original disciples the time must come when their fellowship with their Lord should be wholly independent of the senses. Through the Paraclete the Lord would renew and continue His fellowship with His disciples (cf. esp. Jn 14 and 16 and 17²⁶). But He would be no longer manifest through the senses (Jn 20¹⁷; cf. the fine sermon of H. Hoffmann, Eins ist not, p. 153). It is clear from the NT that after Pentecost the original disciples were immovable in their persuasion that they had seen and heard, and had fellowship with their exalted Lord.

From all this it is clear that the visible manifestation of the Lord was designed to be superseded by a manifestation through the word of His witnesses. But can the word really take the place of the sensuous contact with the Lord's Person? For answer let it be remembered in the first place that Christ foretold that it should be sufficient (e.g. Jn 17^{20ff.}, Mt 28²⁰). What the original witnesses enjoyed, others should enjoy too—the same immediate fellowship, the same certainty. As the men of Sychar believed at last not for the woman's speaking, but because they had heard for themselves (Jn 4⁴²), so through the word of the Apostles others are brought into actual saving relation with the same Lord Christ. Alike for those who saw Him, and for those who saw Him not, the outward facts must be inwardly apprehended and inwardly tested. And as was the design, so also is the actual experience under the gospel: where the word is truly preached the Spirit does energize and seal it, and those who believe receive the same certainty as the original disciples possessed. The whole NT preaching manifestly rests upon the full persuasion that this is and must be so (e.g. 1 P 1⁸, He 13⁷, 2 P 1¹, esp. Ac 11^{15, 16}). Faith does come by hearing (Ro 10¹⁷)—the fact of the vital union with Christ is proof of the truth of the testimony. Such is the meaning of the following passage, 1 Jn 1⁷: 'Those who through their association with Christ in the flesh had apprehended the life manifested, bear witness to others, that they also may enter into the same fellowship with them—the glorious fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ. In the days of His flesh, Jesus was (according to an expression of Beyschlag in his Leben Jesu) 'His own prophet.' After His resurrection this office is committed to faithful witnesses. And it is thus that they conceive their office. The ministry of reconciliation is committed to them. As ambassadors of Christ they stand in Christ's stead (2 Co 5^{19, 20}). To bear witness to Christ is their one aim as heralds (1 Jn 4¹⁴). And their word is effectual. He who believes through their word is not then 'a Christian of a secondary order'; his knowledge of Christ is indeed mediated and yet immediate (cf. the vigorous discussion of E. Haupt, Die Bedeutung der heiligen Schrift für den evangelischen Christen).

The same holds good throughout all time. The word stands firm; it never passes away (He 2^{1, 2}, Mk 13³¹). Wherever the word of Christ is preached with the certainty of faith, it can bring the hearer into 'the like precious faith' (2 P 1⁴).

But the effectiveness of the word of testimony is absolutely conditioned upon the operation of the Holy Spirit. The essence of the word is the promise of fellowship, grace, eternal life through Jesus Christ. Unless the preacher has the inward consciousness of the reality of the life with Christ through the Spirit, his word is no witness. And unless the hearer is aided by the Spirit to apprehend and to prove the testimony, the word concerning peace, fellowship, freedom, and the power of an endless life would be but empty sound. When, however, the word is spoken in the Spirit, it is quick, powerful, convincing, saving (He 4¹², Jn 16⁸, Ja 1²¹).

Have, then, the original witnesses no peculiar privilege and authority? So far as personal certainty is concerned, they have no advantage over true believers of any age. Nevertheless, in the economy of the gospel dispensation, the word of the original witnesses is manifestly of cardinal importance. The mere fact that they were the first witnesses is of itself sufficient to give to their testimony a peculiar importance and to make it for evangelical Christianity a last resort. Even those believing critics who go farthest in the sifting of Apostolic tradition, agree that the saving knowledge of God in Christ is mediated to us through the primitive Christian preaching. Either we must gain our knowledge of Christ by this means, or else we must give up the inquiry, for no other way is open to us (cf. art. BACK TO CHRIST). The primitive witnesses, however, were more than merely the first, as though there by chance. They had been chosen beforehand and specially trained for the work of bearing witness. Either our Lord succeeded in giving to His chosen Apostles such an understanding of His mission and work as to enable them to bear competent witness, or else He failed. If He failed, there could be no certainty for them and no gospel to us through them. The soundness and sufficiency of their witness are established by the demonstration of the Spirit and of power, and this accompanies the same witness in every succeeding age.

For the sake of their testimony many of Christ's servants have been called upon to suffer death. Such were called in a special ethical sense μάρτυρες (Ac 22²⁰, Rev 21⁸ 17⁹). 'This is not to be understood, as in ecclesiastical Greek, in the sense that death was the form of their testimony, but in reference to their testimony of Jesus as having occasioned their death' (Cremer, Lex.; cf. also Rev 20⁴). An approach to the analogon-use of μάρτυρες is probably to be found in 1 Ti 6¹³ 'Jesus Christ, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed the good confession.'

WOE.—The word woe (in LXX for the most part the tr. of πένθος and λύπη) was spoken by our Lord in virtue of His prophetic office. He was 'the prophet that cometh into the world' (Jn 6¹⁴), the decisive exponent of God's will (Dt 18^{15ff.}, Ac 3^{22f.}, He 1^{1, 2}). As in the mouth of the OT prophets, so in His, 'the word of Yahweh must of necessity be a word of woe to a sinful people' (Encyc. Bibl. iii. 3875). Like them, He was 'full of power by the spirit of the Lord, and of judgment, and of might, to declare unto Jacob his transgressions, and to Israel his sin' (Mic 3⁸). Two were specially abhorred—those of the seducer and the hypocrite. His language respecting the Jewish leaders is 'part of the judicial language of the first Advent' (Mozley, University Sermon, 29). Other Woes He utters with a sob of pity; but His indictment of the scribes and Pharisees is spoken with the wrath of love (cf. Rev 6¹⁶). His 'prophetic plainness' is a trait that must not be left out of view in studying 'the mind of Christ,' and in contemplating His work as Priest and King. 'As well as meekness there was anger, and besides tenderness there was strength' (Hall Caine, Illus. Lond. News, 7th Mar. 1891; cf. Tennyson, Memoir by his Son, i. 326; *Ecce Homo*¹, 272, 276).—St. Mark reports only two instances of our Lord's using the word ōai. It does not occur in St. John. But St. John reports many stern utterances respecting those who sinned against light.

The Woe of Mk 13¹⁷ (|| Mt 24¹⁹, Lk 21²³) was spoken by Christ with deep commiseration; at the same time the passage in which it occurs is a prophetic one relating to the doom of Jerusalem which had rejected Him (cf. Lk 23^{28, 29}). Eusebius (HE iii. 5) and Epiphanius (de Mens. 15) mention the flight of the Christians. Mt 11²¹ (|| Lk 10¹³)—where the mention of Chorazin shows how much of our Lord's work is left unrecorded (Plummer)—is part of a farewell lamentation over the three cities by the Lake which had seen His manifestations of Divine power but had not believed. It agrees with other fore-warnings that will be most woeful for those who have thrown away the highest opportunities (Mt 12^{41, 42} || Lk 11^{31, 32}; cf. Lk 12^{47, 48}).—In Mt 18⁷ (|| Lk 17¹, cf. Mk 9⁴²), the first Woe is spoken in pity, but the second in wrath. As is shown by the ἀνάγκη γάρ and the corresponding words in Lk., as well as by the context, the κόσμος is a lamentation over the ills brought on mankind by selfishness and selfish passions. The egotist (to use a word of Carlyle's) becomes the oppressor of the weak, and he also becomes their seducer,—a character for which Christ had such a loathing that He said 'it were better for him [who bears it] that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.' The second Woe, introduced by πλῆν (on which word see Plummer, St. Luke, 182), is directed against a man of this sort (τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ ἐκείνῳ, the latter word putting him outside the pale of sympathy and respect), who, in our Lord's view, has committed the most heinous crime against the law of love (cf. Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. 237; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. 344; Carr, Expositor, 1898 (ii.), 348; Hastings' DB iii. 586*).

Of the two passages in which our Lord pronounces woe against the contemporary leaders of Judaism, the one in Lk 11 is an early utterance, and was spoken in the house of a Pharisee who had asked Him to dine with him (v. 37), while the other in Mt 23 is a late and public denunciation of them in Jerusalem on the eve of His death. It was spoken when they were present, and for the purpose of warning the multitudes and His disciples to beware of them: hence, the real parallel to Mt 23 in Mk. and Lk. is to be found in the brief sayings reported in Mk 12³⁸⁻⁴⁰ and Lk 20⁴⁵⁻⁴⁷.

In Lk 11^{42, 43, 44, 46, 47, 52} there are two indictments containing three Woes apiece, and addressed to Pharisees and lawyers (wh. see) respectively. Sentence is first pronounced upon the Pharisees for being so punctilious about matters of a subordinate nature, which should be kept in their proper place, while they neglect those moral obligations, which were of the first moment, 'judgment and the love of God' (v. 44); for putting themselves forward into the first seats in the face of the congregation, and their fondness for having reverence done to them in public (v. 43); and for being a secret source of defilement to others who were not aware of the evil tendency of their principles (v. 44, cf. 12¹). The second of these charges occurs, but without a Woe in Mt 23^{6, 7}; while the other two are repeated in a more severe form in Mt 23^{23, 27}.

The lawyers are then condemned for amplifying the written Law with their intolerably burdensome enactments, which they contrive to evade themselves, while so rigorous in exacting obedience to them from others (Lk 11⁴⁶); for their zeal in the erection and adornment of the tombs of the prophets, which, in bitter irony, is pronounced to be a sign of their continuing the work of the murderers of the prophets (vv. 47, 48; Wendt, i. 281; *Ecce Homo*¹, 267); and for taking away 'the key of knowledge' (see KEYS) by their traditional interpretation, which rendered the people incapable of recognizing the living truth (v. 52). The first of these charges is found in Mt 23⁴ without a Woe; the others are repeated in Mt 23^{13, 29, 37}.

This later denunciation (Mt 23^{13, 14} * 15, 16, 23, 25, 27, 29; cf. Is 58. 11, 18, 20-22, Hab 26. 9, 12, 15, 19) is still more impressive on account of its epic strain ('octies vac; Mr 5¹¹ octies beati,' Bengel). It shows how intense is the heat of our Lord's wrath when it is kindled (Ps 2¹²), as no other continuous passage in the Gospels does. In it, our Lord pronounces woe against the scribes and Pharisees for their 'hypocrisy' or their dishonesty and love of stage-effect in religion, which was to Him the most hateful impiety; also for shutting the doors of the Kingdom of God which He had opened by His preaching, and so preventing people from entering (cf. Rev 3⁸); for plundering (prob. wealthy and devout) widows (Plummer cites examples from the Talmud), and deceiving simple-minded people (Theophylact) by the long prayers they make (v. 14); for carrying on a most laborious propaganda for the purpose of gaining proselytes (cf. Jos. Ant. xx. ii. 4), and then making them more full of spiritual pride than themselves (v. 15, cf. the Judaistic proselytizers who so relentlessly dogged St. Paul's footsteps, Hastings' DB iv. 136^b); for pretending to guide others in the doing of God's will when they showed that they were so wanting in moral perception themselves (cf. Mt 15¹⁴ || Lk 6³⁹); as, for example, when they subverted truth and justice by the sophistical distinctions they made in regard to the binding nature of different kinds of oaths (vv. 16-22, cf. Mk 7⁶⁻¹³). He then condemned them for omitting 'the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith,' while they were so exact in tithing their smaller garden herbs, thus 'straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel' (vv. 23, 24); and for so carefully observing, 'in preparing their food, the ceremonial rules for preserving their Levitical purity,' while they were not careful 'to avoid the moral defilement caused by the unlawful acquisition of that food, and by using it to minister to intemperance' (vv. 25, 26, Wendt, i. 327). He compared the fair show of goodness they made with the artificial whiteness imparted to sepulchres by washing them with lime in spring (vv. 27, 28, cf. Holtzmann, Meyer, in loc.; Encyc. Bibl. iv. 5138). The final Woe was pronounced with a stinging reference to the honours they were paying to the prophets whom their fathers killed (vv. 20-31); and, the cup of His indignation brimming over at the thought of His own impending death at their hands, He said, 'Fill ye up then the measure of (the sins of) your fathers' (v. 32).

'Tremendous' (Mozley) as this language is, we are not to think that it was meant to apply to all the Pharisees indiscriminately. Nicodemus was a Pharisee (Jn 3¹), and there were, doubtless, many others (cf. Ac 5³⁴) with respect to whom the charge of hypocrisy was inadmissible. Paul, as a Pharisee, was no hypocrite (Ph 3⁵⁻⁶); his Pharisaic upbringing was an important part of his providential training for his Christian Apostleship, and 'from Pharisaism in so far as it meant zeal for the highest objects of Jewish faith he never departed, and never could depart' (Ac 26⁵⁻²²; Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 108 ff.). In this very chapter, our Lord admits their authority as that of those who 'sit in Moses' seat,' and even gives His sanction to some of their minor observances (Mt 23²⁻²³; cf. Hort, 31-32). A well-known passage in the Talmud, distinguishing the various classes of Pharisees from each other, says that the real and only Pharisee is 'he who does the will of his Father in heaven because he loves Him' (Levy, NHWB 4. 143).

In his famous article on the Talmud (Qu. Review, Oct. 1867), the late Emanuel Deutsch pronounced a war on 'the chiefly Pharisaic masters of the Mishna for their "noble and noble courage" (Literary Digest, Jan. 1903) has called attention to the 'new and large material, so interesting, so counter to current conceptions and verdicts,' produced by Schechter in 1895. 'He confesses that the view he has to give of Rabbinical religion presents a blank at the important period'—the time of Christ. 'We are driven back, therefore, on the Gospels.' The evidence they afford appears irresistible. . . . The principles of the religion as set forth in the Gospels cannot prevail to discredit the facts there recorded' (Menzies, Hibbert Journal, July, 1903). There is thus no reasonable ground for doubt that during our Lord's life on earth the scribes and Pharisees were immersed in that externalism and religious affectation which He so vividly depicted; and it was their intractable hostility to His spirit which began at a very early period of His ministry (Mt 23), and at the end brought about His crucifixion.

Mt 14²¹ (|| Mt 26²⁴, Lk 22²²) οὐαὶ δὲ τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ ἐκέλευσεν δι' οὗ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου παραδίδοται; Lk. has πλὴν οὐαὶ, bringing out with emphasis the responsibility of Judas, who was free to act, notwithstanding the τὸ ὀρσμένον. This, which is perhaps the saddest sentence in the Gospels, was spoken without vindictiveness, although it undoubtedly reveals that our Lord was wounded to the quick by the treachery of Judas. The ἐκέλευσεν seems to set him finally outside the circle of the disciples (cf. Westcott on Jn 13²⁷). But this Woe is not an imprecation like Ps 109. It is not the devoting of Judas to destruction. Similarly the words which follow, καλὸν αὐτῷ εἰ οὐκ ἐγεννήθη ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐκεῖνος, are 'not to be pressed with logical rigour' (Meyer), but are to be understood as meaning, 'Better not to have lived at all than to have lived to betray the Son of Man.' The whole saying witnesses to the anguish that our Lord felt on account of the perfidy of this false friend (cf. Ps 41⁹, Jn 13¹⁸); and we can sympathize with Keim when he says (Jesus of Nazara, v. 286) that we should have to greet it as the removal of a hundred-pound weight from the heart of Christendom if the treachery of Judas could be proved to have had no existence. But this is as impossible as to remove the burden, 'Tiberio imperitante, supplicio adfectus erat,' from the heart of mankind.

There still remain the four Woes which in Lk 6²⁴⁻²⁶ are set over against the four Beatitudes in vv. 20-23. Their authenticity, as well as that of the Beatitudes in their Lukan form, is called in question by many distinguished scholars. Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 16; Encyc. Bibl. iv. 133. . . . on grounds that are very far from convincing. The objection taken to the Woes from their being omitted in Mt. is not of much weight. The data for determining the precise relation between the sermons in Mt. and Lk. are wanting. Each of the writers may have had before him a different report of the same Sermon; or there may have been two similar but different Sermons, reported in two distinct documents, of which the one was used by Mt. and the other by Luke. In either case, the omission of the Woes in Mt. would be sufficiently accounted for (cf. Schaff, Hand-Commentary, 1891 (i.), 311 ff.; Loisy, Le Discours, 1891 (i.), 103). The external form in which the Woes (and also the Beatitudes) are set forth illustrates our Lord's method of teaching 'by aim' in the briefest compass. i. 130, 134; cf. ii. 68); the are comprehensive and significant enough to enable His hearers to understand who were the persons intended. When He began by saying, 'Blessed are ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God,' He gave His hearers the key to the meaning of the other utterances which followed. For 'the poor' (the πτωχοὶ) was a term that had long had an ethical and spiritual connotation (cf. Driver, art. 'Poor' DB iv. 19, 20; Harnack, What is, 92); and this would prevent our Lord's utterances from being interpreted in a materialistic sense. See artt. EBIONISM, POOR, POVERTY, WEALTH.

In our opinion it is more probable that the Woes are authentic than that they are inferences from our Lord's teaching (Bruce, Kingdom of God, 10), or that they 'arose in consequence of the affliction of the persecuted Christians' (Meyer, Comm. on Lk., p. 55), or that they 'were constructed for the purpose of strengthening and interpreting the Beatitudes, after the model of Dt 27¹⁶, 18-19' (Holtzmann, Hand-Commentary, 104). In view of the social conditions that exist at the present day, can it be said that their admonition is unneeded, or that they are not still living utterances? See also artt. BEATITUDE and SERMON ON THE MOUNT; and cf. Moulton, art. 'Synoptic Studies' in Expositor for August 1906.

WOMAN.—The relation of Christ to woman is one of the most interesting and one of the most difficult topics in the Gospels. In order to estimate it aright it will be necessary to say something of the position of woman at the time when our Lord was born. In the East generally, the penal code of Babylon well describes her abject humiliation: 'If a husband say unto his wife, Thou art not my wife, he shall pay half a mina and be free. But if a woman repudiate her husband, she shall be drowned in the river.' And her position was not much better in Judæa, where any, even the most frivolous, pretext could be given for divorce. 'The Jewish Law unquestionably allowed divorce on almost any ground' (Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 333). The school of Hillel declared it a sufficient ground for divorce if a woman had spoiled her husband's dinner. In Greece the dignity of married life was very inadequately appreciated; even Socrates invites the courtesan Aspasia to talk with him 'as to how she might ply her occupation with most profit.' In Rome there were signs of better things. There was always a halo over the old Roman matron, and though time dissipated this, and divorce was so common that Seneca tells us that ladies reckoned their ages not by the consuls, but by the number of their husbands,* yet women were gradually acquiring more and more influence and being more widely educated. In parts of the Roman Empire, especially in Macedonia, 'her social position was higher than in most parts of the civilized world. At Philippi, at Thessalonica and Berea, the women—in some cases certainly, in all probably, ladies of birth and rank—take an active part with the Apostle (Paul). . . . The extant Macedonian inscriptions seem to assign to the sex a higher social influence than is common among the civilized nations of antiquity.'† But however this position may have been in different parts of the Empire, it is not to be taken as the relation of woman to man in the ordinary degrading one. The many exceptions only draw attention to the prevailing condition.

* Ch. 7 of the Assumption of Moses (not later than A.D. 80), which has been supposed to refer to the Pharisees (Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. 53^a), is more probably a description of the Sadducees (Charles, Encyc. Bibl. i. 236).

It is not by accident that the position of Mary is brought by our Lord's life to the very foreground. This fact, though it could have been known to only a very few during His lifetime, had nevertheless its own particular bearing. It brought Mary into a prominence which otherwise would have been unaccountable. It is true that Joseph may have died when our Lord was a child or before He began His ministry, but even this does not fully account for the position the mother occupies in the Gospels. It is not much we learn, for we know it was her duty to keep to herself the secrets of her early life (Lk 2:19, 51), but that one scene at the village wedding (Jn 2) is sufficient to give us a clear conception of her importance. She alone knew how great He was, and how wonderful the destiny that was promised Him. And yet she was not so overwhelmed by its greatness as to lose her own personality. The ordinary Oriental mother would not have presumed to guide or direct the life of one so mysteriously born and whose future was so infinitely great. But she has so long been accustomed to suggest, if not to direct, that it is natural for her, when she sees an opportunity for the display of His power and the satisfaction of a need, to point it out. The reply, seemingly so harsh to us, only marks out her position the more clearly. The words, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come,' could not have been said to one who had occupied but a subservient position in the home; on the contrary, they suggest that for many years she had been accustomed to speak freely as to her wishes for Him, and that this time was now over. From this it may be inferred that our Lord rejoiced in the true development of womanhood, was glad that the mother should not be a mere drudge or slave, but one occupying a definite position with definite duties and responsibilities. Further, it is clear from her question that He had not checked her interest in the wider events of the world and the Kingdom of God. A veil will always rest over the frequent communings between the Mother and the Son, but it is quite clear from the use of the expression 'mine hour,' that she had been led to think of and desire that time of manifestation when His Personality should be revealed. From the beginning, even before His birth, her mind had often been occupied with that revelation from the spiritual world in which the angel had spoken of a 'throne' and a 'kingdom' (Lk 1:32, 33). Her mind, then, was not to be confined to the limited sphere of the household duties of the peasant's home. At the same time, it is clear that the natural desire, even in one so humble and lowly as she was, to have some share in the events which would lead to the bringing in of the Kingdom, was not to be gratified. Her part lay in the careful training, educating, and helping of that great Life which was entrusted to her.

It is singular, and some have thought that it was designed with a view to checking the Mariolatry which in the years to come was to dominate a large section of the Church, that Jesus refuses to allow the unique distinction which Mary certainly had in being the mother of the world's Redeemer to weigh against the worth of religious character. It was natural that one who recognized the beauty of His character and the power of His words should say, 'Blessed be the womb that bare thee, and the breasts that thou didst suck' (Lk 11:27); but the answer, whilst acknowledging the blessing, pointed to a higher one within the reach of all. 'Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it' (v. 28). This teaching is akin to that He gave when some one directed His attention to the fact that His mother and brethren were waiting to see Him. 'Who is my mother, and who are my brethren?'—He cried—and then stretching forth His hand towards His disciples, He said, 'Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother' (Mt 12:47-50). From this it is clear that whilst He gave her, who was blessed indeed amongst women in being His mother, full opportunities for the development of her mind and spirit, never checking during those thirty years those natural desires to know all that He would tell her of the Kingdom of which the angel had spoken to her, yet He chiefly valued in her the growth of those spiritual graces which had led to her being selected for the high position she held. And nothing is more remarkable than the response she gave. During those three years she almost disappears from sight; and when at the very last she is seen beside the cross, her attitude expresses that dignity, reserve, and self-control which she had learned of Him. When the great tragedy is being enacted, and the greatest possible excitement prevails, she, like her Divine Son, maintains an attitude of quiet self-restraint. The Oriental, even the Jewish, mother would have been prostrate, with dishevelled hair and garments; Mary is found 'standing' (Jn 19:25). There is no mention of words, not even of tears. Silently and quietly at the direction of her Son she leaves the cross, though we know that a sword was at the time piercing her through and through.

We have given much time to the study of the Virgin Mother because she was the only woman really educated by Christ, in the sense that St. John and St. Peter were, and we see in the little that is told of her what a true woman ought to be. The relation of Christ to the other women of the Gospels is just what we should expect from our knowledge of His relation to His mother. There is a freedom which surprises even His disciples (Jn 4:27), and a readiness to help which laid His character open to mis-conception (Lk 7:39). There is also the most delicate sensitiveness to the inner consciousness of shame in the sinner which at once wins confidence. His hatred of the sin never dominates over His love of the sinner. Simon was right in feeling that a prophet who knew the character of the woman who had intruded into his house would never have allowed her such close fellow-ship as the Saviour allowed. None but He, the sinless, could have done so. Again, none but He would have shown such patience as was seen in His treatment of the woman of Samaria (Jn 4). When He makes it plain that He knows her sin, and she changes the subject, He does not refuse to follow her, but makes the very controversy she introduces a means of spiritual help. It was this combination of strength and tenderness, of respect for the individuality of the soul and yet desire to disentangle it from its sins, that gave Him just that same pre-eminent place amongst the women as amongst the men of His day. They were glad to be of what assistance they could to His work, and ministered of their substance (Lk 8³). It is characteristic that whilst they show a courage which surpasses that of the Twelve, they also show a wealth of devotion which is unintelligible to them. The presence of some near the cross, where they would be exposed to insults and rudeness, is as remarkable as St. Mary's gift of the alabaster cruse of ointment in the last week of His life. They respond more readily and easily to the power of His words and Personality. From Martha our Lord obtains a confession, even fuller and more far-reaching than that of St. Peter (Jn 11²⁴⁻²⁷). And from the heathen Canaanitish woman He received one of the most remarkable illustrations of faith, the woman's insight penetrating beyond the words to the love which lay underneath them (Mt 15²²⁻²⁸, Mk 7²⁵⁻³⁰).

The great respect in which Jesus held the position of woman, the high dignity He attached to it, is shown not only by His actions and words, but by the new sanctity which He gave to marriage. The words, 'The twain shall become one flesh' (Mt 19⁵=Mk 10⁸), placed the wife at once on a level with the husband, and made the divorces that were so common impossible. Directly this teaching was received, it was impossible that woman should be deprived of her right as wife on the flimsiest excuse, or without any excuse at all. The revolution such a declaration made is realized only when we hear the comment of the spiritually minded disciples, 'If the case of the man is so with his wife, it is not possible to marry' (Mt 19¹⁰). That woman had a position in life of equal importance with that of man is made plain by the whole story of the Gospels: Anna, Elisabeth, the Virgin Mary, Mary Magdalene, and Mary Magdalene rivalling in their own spheres St. Peter, St. John, St. James, St. Andrew. Without the part played by woman, that story would have been altogether incomplete.

One other suggestion as to the influence of woman which St. Matthew gives us is as interesting as it is unexpected. The dream of Pilate's wife is an evidence of the power that Christ's life and teaching exercised beyond the narrow circle of Jewish thought. Pilate, governor though he is, neither hears nor sees anything, and even when face to face with Christ is only puzzled not convinced. His wife, on the other hand, is deeply interested in all that she hears. Her mind is full of the doings of the Prophet of Nazareth. Her sleep is disturbed. She wakes frightened, and so convinced of the greatness of the issue her husband is trying, that she dares to interfere, though without success (Mt 27¹⁹). Not too much can be made of this; but it is an indication, which the Gospel narrative emphasizes, that women are more susceptible to religious impressions than men, and are ready to make larger sacrifices. As women ministered at the Birth, the Presentation in the Temple, and during those early years when His mother was His chief teacher, so they ministered at the Entombment, when they anointed His body; at the Resurrection, when they carried the news to the frightened disciples; and at the Ascension, when they with the Apostles and the rest of His disciples received His blessing. G. H. S. WALPOLE.

WOMANLINESS.—Christianity is distinguished for the honour it assigns, the liberty it allows to woman. 'Christianity raises woman from the slavish position which she held, both in Judaism and in heathendom, to her true moral dignity and importance, makes her an heir of the same salvation with man, and opens to her a field for the noblest and loveliest virtue' (Schaff's Apostolic ... p. 441 f.). The duties of husbands are, according to St. Peter (1 P 3⁷), to be regulated by a recognition of the principle that their wives are 'also joint heirs of the grace of life.' In the Christian society 'the conventional distinctions of religious caste or of social rank, even the natural distinction of sex, are banished,' for 'there can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male and female; for ye are all one man in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3²⁸). Lightfoot in loco quotes a saying of Jesus from the Apocryphal Gospel of the Egyptians, which may be founded on this verse—'Being asked by Salome when His kingdom should come, He is reported to have answered, "When the two shall be one, and the male with the female, neither male nor female."' This mystical saying has its fulfilment in the character of Jesus. For the characteristic of Jesus Christ, and so the regulative principle of Christian morality, is completeness, symmetry, harmony, balance. Other men are known and loved for this or that excellence; but of Jesus Christ, with respect to His personal perfection, we can say what was said of Shakespeare with regard to his artistic pre-eminence, 'His speciality is everything.' Manhood in its wholeness and fulness is found in Him, alike wide in its range and lofty in its reach. Hence Jesus Christ is not a pattern merely for one sex, or one age, or one time, or one temperament, or one class. In this sense, too, there is in Him neither male nor female, bond nor free, Jew nor Greek, learned nor unlearned.

The sphere of woman is the home, not the world. Man lives in effort and conflict. 'But woman is at home in the region of feeling and affection, and she finds her highest vocation in the cultivation of those loves and sympathies that make home the dearest spot on earth.' Man, being thus active and even combative, develops ... and self-assertion; whereas the receptive nature of woman manifests itself rather in patient endurance and tender devotion to the service of loved ones. Her emotions dominate her intellect; her judgment to a certain extent is biassed by her feelings. On the other hand, where moral as well as intellectual considerations come into view, woman's judgment is likely to be as just as that of man, whose decisions are frequently based on grounds of reason alone' (Bruce, The Formation of Christian Character, p. 57 f.). May we find any such signs of womanliness in the character or teaching of Jesus?

Jesus assigned great importance to marriage and family, the sanctity and unity of the home. Although His vocation required His abandonment of home (Jn 2⁴, Mk 3^{33, 34}), and He required of His disciples also the same renunciation (Lk 14³³), yet He missed the shelter and peace of home (Mt 8²⁰), and recognized the greatness of the sacrifice involved (Mt 19²⁹). His denunciation of the lax traditions of the elders regarding divorce (Mt 19³⁻⁹) and the duty of children to their parents (Mk 7⁹⁻¹³) was in defence of the home. It is supremely significant that love, the grace of the home, and not justice, the virtue of the State, is made the first and greatest commandment (Mk 12²⁹⁻³¹). The child is nearer, means more, to the mother than to the father; and Jesus understood and cared for children (Mt 11¹⁹ 12²⁻³ 19¹³⁻¹⁵). Does not the modesty of the woman appear in His reference to the lustful glance (Mt 5²⁶), and His stooping to write upon the ground when the woman taken in her sin stood before Him (Jn 8⁹)? Jesus understood the heart of a woman in penitence (Lk 7⁴⁷) and in gratitude (Jn 12⁷⁻⁸). His defence of the offering of love shows not only His active but also His receptive affectionateness, His yearning for, as well as bestowal of, the generosity of the heart. He was not only intensely emotional, but quick in expressing His emotions (Jn 11³³⁻³⁸, Mk 7³⁴ 8¹², Jn 11³⁵, Lk 13³⁴ 19⁴¹, Mt 23³⁷). His tenderness, gentleness, patience, and forbearance are more distinctively feminine than masculine graces. In His womanliness and obedience to His Father's will (Mt 11¹⁹), is there not a womanly rather than a manly submissiveness? The prominence He gives in the Beatitudes to the passive graces of endurance rather than the active virtues of endeavour (Mt 5³⁻¹⁰) vindicates the distinctive excellence of womanhood. His teaching about non-resistance (Mt 5³⁸⁻⁴²), so much misunderstood and neglected, can be better appreciated by women than by men, for such patience under wrong has entered into their life more than into that of men. The mind of Jesus was intuitive rather than ratiocinative; His moral judgment was swift and sure; His spiritual discernment direct; and these are characteristic of women rather than of men.

Doubtless it was this womanliness in Jesus that attracted and attached so many women to Him during His earthly ministry: and they received from Him a loving welcome such as they did not find in any other religious teacher of the age. His disciples were astonished that He was speaking to the woman of Samaria (Jn 4²⁷), and doubtless the prejudices of many were offended by His action regarding women. His defence of the sinful woman and of Mary has been already noted. 'We have a love' group of female disciples and friends around the Lord: Mary, the wife of Clopas; Salome, the mother of James and John; Mary of Bethany, who sat at Jesus' feet; her busy and hospitable sister Martha; Mary of Magdala, whom the Lord healed of a demoniacal possession; the sinner, who washed His feet with her tears of penitence and wiped them with her hair; and all the noble women who ministered to the Son of Man in His earthly poverty with the gifts of their love (Lk 8³, Mt 27⁵⁵, Mk 15⁴¹), lingered last around His Cross (Jn 19²⁵), and were first at His open sepulchre on the morning of the resurrection (Mt 28¹, Jn 20¹). Schaff, op. cit. p. 442]. The reverence that the mother of Jesus has properly inspired is given to womanhood a glory, and to woman a place and influence in the Christian Church, nowhere else recognized. To the instances given above of the relation of Jesus to women we may add His compassion for the widow of Nain (Lk 7¹³), and His commendation of the widow's mites (Mk 12⁴³⁻⁴⁴). His treatment of a woman on three occasions appears harsh, but a consideration of the circumstances in each case removes this impression. His rebuke to His mother at Cana (Jn 2⁴) expresses His dread of any human interference with His fulfilment of His Divine vocation (cf. the rebuke of Peter, Mt 16²³); His repulse of the Syrophenician mother (Mk 7²⁷) was His own indignant protest against Jewish exclusiveness; His requirement that the woman healed by touching His garment should confess her deed was no violence done to her sense of modesty, but was intended to replace the uncertainty of a cure snatched unawares by the assurance of healing willingly bestowed (Mk 5³⁴). What Christ has been to and done for women throughout the history of Christendom, and what women have suffered and accomplished for His Church and Kingdom on earth, afford abundant and conclusive evidence of the womanliness of Jesus in presenting in His character all womanly grace as well as manly virtue, and offering in His salvation what meets the deepest needs, and fulfils the loftiest hopes of womanhood in all lands and ages. See also WOMAN.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

WONDERS.—The two terms 'signs' and 'wonders' are frequently joined in the OT, and this usage is carried over into the NT. The word répas, 'wonder,' never occurs in the NT except in connexion with σημεῖον, 'sign' (wh. see). The Heb. correlatives were מוֹפֵת and מוֹלָה. Jesus used the conjoined terms twice in His recorded sayings—once when He foretold that false prophets would come and 'show great signs and wonders' (Mk 13²², Mt 24²⁴), and once when He complained that the people demanded such things of Him before they would have faith in Him—'Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will in no wise believe' (Jn 4⁴⁸). The word répas occurs nowhere else in the Gospels. Elsewhere in the NT it is found once in a quotation from Joel to represent the marvels wrought by Jehovah in the heaven (Ac 2¹⁹), and twelve times in reference to miracles wrought by Moses (7³⁸), by Jesus (2²²), by the man of sin (2 Th 2⁹), and by the Apostles and early missionaries (Ac 2⁴³ 4³⁰ 5¹² 6⁸ 14¹ 15¹², Ro 15¹⁹, 2 Co 12¹², He 2⁴). From the use of the word made by Jesus we might conclude that He did not esteem signs and wonders very highly, and that He freely granted that they were possible to false prophets as well as to Himself. In Origen (c. Celsum) we find practically the same attitude of thought. Origen is disposed to concede that signs and wonders are wrought among the heathen.

'Now, in order to grant that there did exist a spirit named Æsculapius, who used to cure the lame, I would say to those who are astonished at such an occurrence, that since the cure of bodies is a thing indifferent, and a matter within the reach not merely of the good, but also of the bad, you must show that they who practise healing are in no respect wicked' (iii. 25 [Migne, vol. xi. col. 948]).

On the other hand, Celsum is willing to acknowledge that signs and wonders were wrought by Jesus, but he thinks the inference from these is unwarranted. They are to him no proof of Deity. He compares them to—

'the feats performed by those who have been taught by Egyptians, who in the middle of the market-place, in return for a few obols, will perform the most wonderful and extraordinary feats, and will conjure up the souls of heroes, and exhibit expensive banquets and tables and dishes and dainties having no real existence, and who will put in motion, as if alive, what are not really living animals, but which have only the appearance of life. Then he asks: "Suppose, then, these persons could perform such feats, will we of necessity conclude that they are gods?" No, we must admit that they are the proceedings of wicked men under the influence of an evil spirit' (i. 68).

It was easy for Origen to answer that Jesus never wrought His signs and wonders only for show, as magicians did, and that His constant aim was the reformation of character, as that of the magicians most evidently was not. Then he adds:

'How should not He, who by the miracles which He did induced those who beheld them to follow Him, to imitate His character, but also to others, as a pattern of most virtuous life, in order that His disciples might devote themselves to the work of instructing men in the will of God, and that the others, after being not fully instructed by His apostles and disciples, might follow His miracles as to how they were to do them, and might in all their conduct have a constant reference to the good pleasure of the universal God' (i. 68 [Migne vol. xi. col. 788]).

Origen seems to have caught the very mind of the Master at this point. Jesus made use of signs and wonders to authenticate His mission, but His chief emphasis was always upon His 'word and character' rather than upon His miracles. Both Origen and Celsum, however, as these passages show, are willing to grant that signs and wonders were wrought by Jesus and by false prophets alike. Origen calls attention to the fact that Jesus, as WORLD (κόσμος).—1. The underlying significance of the term κόσμος is that of order. Its probable derivation is from a root κομῶ, which appears in Lat. comptus and in our 'comb.' This order, regularity, neatness receives the widest illustration in classical literature. Thus κόσμος includes the idea of decency (Æsch. Ag. 521, cf. Soph. Aj. 293), of constitutional government (Thuc. iv. 76), of elegance of attire (Hdt. iii. 123), and so, by just transference, of the world or universe (Plat. Tim. 27 A, cf. Arist. Cael. i. 10), as exhibiting perfection of arrangement, and standing in eternal contrast with chaos. In this, its widest application, it became common to all writers of classical philosophy, its meaning oscillates, with some uncertainty, between the earth and the universe generally (see Liddell and Scott, s.v., from which the quotations are taken). It is interesting to observe that mundus in Latin does not, as might have been expected, stand as an equivalent for κόσμος. Its Latin is mundus (cf. Sanskr. mund), meaning cleanliness, neatness, or order. Thus both the Latin and the Greek pass through, with a singular exactness of analogy, the same transferences of meaning, so that Cicero (Univ. 10) identifies κόσμος and mundus in that widest application of the term above referred to (see Lewis and Short, Dict. s.v. 'Mundus'). There is, however, a further transference of meaning in a use of mundus by classical writers not found in the corresponding use of κόσμος. It is employed (Hor. Sat. i. 3. 112, cf. Luc. Pharsal. v. 469), but somewhat rarely, in a social sense to signify mankind, whereas this application is not given to κόσμος except in so-called Alexandrine Greek. In a word, the conception of order covers every departmental application of the Greek κόσμος and its Latin equivalent.

2. If proof on such an issue were needed by students, the use of the word κόσμος would strikingly show the original way in which NT writers handle and apply such terms. Certainly, to the ancients, with the word κόσμος the vision of the figure of order would be manifest in thought. Generally speaking, in the NT the ancient conception falls so far into the background as sometimes to vanish. But what the word has lost in one way it has gained in other ways, as will be seen upon a brief examination of its employment generally in NT literature.

It is interesting, however, to note that, in the transferred applications of the word, this literature follows the lines of classical usage. Thus κόσμος is used of the universe (Ro 120), of the human race (1638), and of human society (1639), but not part company with the classical use, faintly made apparent.

In the Synoptics the term is rarely employed, and the student of the AV must be put on his guard against supposing that, in all cases where the tr. 'world' is used, it stands for κόσμος in the original. In some six cases it stands for αἶων, and in two for ἡ γῆ οἰκουμένη. But, as any confusion is sufficiently checked by RVM, the point need not be pursued here. The use of the word, rare as it is in the Synoptics, is largely free from Johannine or Pauline sentiment on the idea. It is difficult to find a passage in them in which the term is used absolutely in malam partem, as it is found not only in the writings of St. John and St. Paul, but also in those of St. Peter and St. James. In the parable of the Wheat and the Tares (Mt 13⁴¹⁻⁴³) the 'world' appears in no dark or ominous colouring. It is not its cares, but the cares of the age (αἶων, Mk 4¹⁹), that choke the word so as to render it unfruitful. When our Lord in the Sermon on the Mount speaks of His disciples as the light of the world (Mk 5¹⁴), we find the figure interpreted by the parallel expression which precedes it: 'Ye are the salt of the earth' (Mt 5¹³). To declare that the world needs purification and illumination is not a wholesale condemnation of the world. There is in the Synoptics no violence of contrast between it and the Divine society. In its rare occurrences in the Synoptics the world is a sphere in which Christ's disciples live and move and have their being. For them it has its pitfalls (Mt 18⁷), its characteristic dangers, but nowhere does it appear as wholly or inherently evil.

3. When one turns from the Synoptics to St. John's writings, for here it is impossible to separate his Gospel from his letters, the contrast appears startling. Instead of a rare appearance of the term, we find that it occurs some eighty times in the Gospel, and twenty-two times in the First Epistle (A. Plummer, Com. on the Gospel in Cambridge Bible). And with this frequently comes a change in meaning, a change, however, which in the Gospel appears gradual and climactic. For in the Prologue of the Fourth Gospel the term appears with the same lack of colour in which it is painted in the Synoptic Gospels.

The world is indeed seen to be beset by the grave fault of indifference to its own darkness. The light came, but it was not recognized. Yet in this lack of welcome His own were involved (Jn 1¹¹, cf. 8¹²). The testimony of the Baptist advances the issue a step farther. His recognition of Jesus as the Lamb of God (1³⁵⁻³⁶) is his recognition of the purpose of His coming into the world's Saviour from its sin. Later, our Lord's testimony to Nicodemus informs him of the extent of His love towards the world. His intention in coming into the world was not its condemnation but its life, not death, through Him was the Father's eternal purpose (3¹⁶⁻¹⁷, cf. 4⁴² 12⁴⁷). Through the type of the manna, our Lord Himself, if it may be so expressed, into still closer touch with the world. He is the Bread of heaven which gives life to the world (6³⁸). Later, with more awful explicitness, the bread is identified with His flesh, and its offering is on the world's behalf (v. 51).

So gracious, indeed, are the Lord's utterances in regard to the world, that twice the group of the disciples are unable to distinguish themselves from it. They could not understand in the earlier stage of their discipleship why any manifestation of Jesus should not be made on equal terms to the world as to themselves (7⁴, cf. 14²²). They omitted to see that a manifestation of Himself could be made only through the medium of love. A difference, therefore, not only in point of time but also in degree of training, explains any seeming inconsistency in our Lord's teaching in respect of the attitude of the world towards His own. At an earlier stage He declared that the world could not hate His followers,—there was nothing then to excite hostility either by way of their belief or their love (7⁷). At a later stage the parting of the ways had come. His own had made their final choice. With the choice came the world's hatred. The persecution which He endured was to be theirs also (15¹⁷⁻²⁴). All turned upon the identity of themselves with Him. This once established, His own exhibited love and obedience. The world was seen as penetrated by hatred and disobedience. In this awful contrast and conflict, victory was assured for His own, and with victory would come its fruit. He was their surety. Peace and triumph were their lot through Him (16³³).

But Johannine teaching on the subject of the world cannot be regarded as complete if the First Epistle be ignored. The scope, however, of this Dictionary must limit the inquiry to general references. The doctrinal differences here are explicable, as Bp. Westcott has pointed out (Gospel of St. John, Introd. lxxviii), because the Gospel is related to the Epistle, as history to its comment or application; the former is throughout presupposed in the latter. 'The Lord's words in the Gospel have been moulded into aphorisms in the First Epistle'; and in the latter document the Apostle writes, conscious that the Church must be in dire conflict with the characteristic dangers and heresies of the age. It would seem reasonable to regard the teaching of the First Epistle on the world as a commentary, in particular, on our Lord's pregnant utterances on the 'convictions' of the world (Jn 16⁸⁻¹¹; see Westcott, in loco). In that passage, the world appears as separate from God, 'yet not past hope.' Our Lord declares there, not that He will convict the world simply as sinful, etc., but that He will show that it lacks the knowledge of what sin, righteousness, and judgment really are.

We conclude that the general teaching of St. John's Gospel on the subject of the world is that it is an order or sphere touching man's life, affecting man's life considered as apart from God; but that in the First Epistle the world is seen more darkly and ominously still: it is not merely regarded as apart from God, but as alien to Him, in direct opposition to His eternal and gracious purposes. St. John would teach us that if it is to be overcome, it must be by powers which lift us above it, and those are the twin powers of love and faith (Liddon, Easter Sermons, No. xxii.).

WORLDLINESS.—The teaching of Christianity concerning worldliness forms one of the most important parts of its practical message to mankind. And yet, more or less strongly marked at different periods, a tendency to serious misconception of this doctrine has probably existed in every generation since the days of Christ. The error into which it has led man is that of regarding the material world and whatever strictly pertains to it, as in itself evil and anti-spiritual. Such a misconception, it is true, did not originate in Christian times, but was taken over by Christianity from earlier systems of religious thought. The source from which it sprang, however, does not affect the gravity of its persistent survival; and inasmuch as the attitude of any faith to the present world must always deeply influence men's estimate of its claims, a clear apprehension of Christ's own teaching on the subject becomes of more than ordinary importance.

I. To reveal the basis of our Lord's doctrine of worldliness, we must review briefly one or two broad outlines of His message.

1. Christ's teaching concerning the existence of a spiritual realm.—Man has contact with two worlds. (a) Of his communion with the material universe and of the various relationships involved therein, he has by nature a vivid consciousness. This temporal world forms a realm of which, by his birth, he himself has become a part. It has for his possession a special form of life adapted to it. It reveals relationships of its own, as laying their obligation upon him—relationships to a properly constituted authority to be obeyed, and to relatives and friends to be loved. It provides also certain standards of conduct by which the various experiences of its inhabitants are deemed happy or sad, prosperous or unsuccessful. (b) But man has contact also with another world—the spiritual. Of his communion with this world he has, by nature, but dim and uncertain comprehension. It was to reveal the truth concerning it that Christ came to earth. Its existence and claims form one of the principal themes of His teaching. Of this realm also it is by a birth that man becomes a part (Jn 3³⁻⁶). This realm also has, adapted to it, a special form of life (6³³ 17³) which becomes his upon his entrance into it, and which receives its own spiritual sustenance (4¹⁴ 32, 34 6³⁵, 48-51 7³⁷). This realm also imposes certain relationships upon him; for it, no less than the other, has its sanctions of authority (Mk 11³, Jn 12¹³ 18³³⁻³⁷) and ties of kinship, both of man with God (Jn 1¹², 1 Jn 3²) and of man with men (Mk 3³⁴ 35 || 10²⁹, 30, Jn 19²⁶, 27). Moreover, this realm also possesses standards of its own by means of which its citizens estimate the events and experiences of their lives (Mt 5³⁶; for the contrast offered to the standards of the temporal realm, see Mt 5¹⁰⁻¹², and consider the force of δοξασθησιν in Jn 13³¹). The sphere in which these spiritual relationships are acknowledged and their influence become operative, was named by Christ as the Kingdom of God (or, of Heaven), and it formed the theme even of His earliest teaching (e.g. Mk 1¹⁵). This invisible world is as real as the visible. It is clearly marked and self-contained (Jn 3³). Its citizens possess definite characteristics (Mk 10¹³, Lk 18¹⁶ 17), and, as it is essentially spiritual in character (Lk 17²⁰, 21, Jn 4²³), a certain fitness is necessary to those who would belong to it (Lk 9⁴²). Hence it has to be definitely entered (Mt 7¹³, 14, Mk 10¹⁵ 12³⁴, Jn 3³, 5).

2. His teaching concerning communion with this spiritual world.—Now, just as man has communion with the temporal world and its life, so he may have communion with this spiritual world and its life. (a) Christ Himself, as man, constantly enjoyed such communion. The Gospel narratives reveal Him as continually converse with the Father (Mk 1³⁵ et passim; see art. COMMUNION), with His disciples (Mk 1¹³, cf. Mt 26²⁸), and with the angels of holy men (Mk 9²⁶). Indeed, this realization of His communion with the unseen realm formed the basis of His sense of mission (Lk 2⁴⁹, Jn 7¹⁶ 8^{16b}, 29 16³²) and the source from which He derived His strength in suffering (Jn 18¹¹). (b) And the fellowship with the spiritual realm which Christ thus exemplified in His own life upon earth, He enjoined upon His followers also (Jn 15⁴, cf. 6³³⁻³⁵ et passim). While they must live before men their outward life in contact with the visible universe and its affairs, they possess also an inner life which must be lived 'in secret'—in contact with the unseen (Mt 6¹⁻¹⁸ 10¹⁹, 20).

3. The twofold communion.—Man, therefore, belongs to two worlds, and may have communion with both. But just as man has a twofold nature, carnal and spiritual, so that the spiritual is the higher, so, enjoying a twofold communion, he is to learn that the spiritual fellowship must take precedence, its realization being his supreme duty and the end of his creation. Yet, as in the freedom of his will he is able to cultivate the carnal in him at the expense of the spiritual, so too he is free, as the whole appeal of Christ's teaching presupposes, to choose for himself with which realm, the temporal or the spiritual, his fellowship shall be the more real and intense.

II. CHRIST'S TEACHING UPON WORLDLINESS.
—1. Christ encouraged no indifference to the claims of the temporal world.—There is an unworldliness which so emphasizes spiritual realities as to undervalue the material universe and its lawful concerns. This attitude, which, as we have hinted, has found frequent and varied expression among His followers, derives no support from the life or teaching of Christ Himself. The beauty and charm of the visible world appealed to Him

(Mt 6^{26, 28}). Its incidents furnished illustrations for His sermons (Mk 4³, Mt 25¹⁴). He participated in its festivals (Jn 2¹³), and contrasted Himself with one whose asceticism disappointed its good cheer (Mt 11^{18, 19}). Again, the claims of this world's lawful authorities always received His ready acknowledgment. Respect for them was scrupulously maintained in His advice (Mk 12¹⁷) and in His example (Mt 17²⁷). Further, in His thought, the welfare of men is by no means a merely spiritual matter. On the contrary, the social obligations imposed by His religion form one of His most constant themes. Love towards others is the very test by which His true disciples can be identified (Mt 5⁴³⁻⁴⁸, cf. 1 Jn 2⁹⁻¹¹ 4²⁰ etc.), and that love is to find expression not in vapid sentiment, but in whole-hearted service (Mk 10⁴², Mt 22³⁶⁻³⁹, Lk 10³⁰). Indeed, Christ teaches that this love and service to man are the criterion of love and service to God (Mt 25^{40, 45}), while in several suggestive passages He even hints that the earthly life forms in some sense an interpretation of the spiritual life (see Mk 2^{5, 10, 11}, Mt 18¹⁰). Christ therefore calls His followers not to neglect the temporal world, much less to despise it, but to recognize that they have a function to fulfil in it by permeating every part of its life with beauty and truth (Mt 7¹³⁻¹⁶ 13³⁸, Jn 17¹⁸). So far, indeed, is He from any underestimation of the present life, that we know of no teacher in any age whose principles, carried into effect, would so ameliorate the material condition of mankind in all its individual aspects and social relationships.

2. Christ uttered no condemnation of worldly possessions.—See art. WEALTH.

3. A false antithesis.—It is clear, therefore, that in our study of the Christian doctrine of worldliness we must eliminate what is now seen to be a false antithesis. In view of the unfortunate ambiguity in meaning both of the Greek and of the English word, it is necessary to define closely the sense in which Christianity sets the 'world' in opposition to its own. The Christian teacher has to do this in two senses. There is the contrast of distinction, and there is the contrast of opposition. It is in the former sense alone, as our Lord's own life and words declare, that the material is set by Christianity over against the spiritual. The contrast of opposition established by Christianity is never between the material and the spiritual, but always between the material and the anti-spiritual. The material, it is true, may be made the instrument of the anti-spiritual; but the two are essentially distinct, and confusion between them, signally absent from the Gospel teaching, must never be condoned in its exponents. It is of the utmost significance in this connexion that our Lord deliberately refused to recognize a contrast of opposition between the powers of the heavenly and those of the earthly realm (Mk 12¹³⁻¹⁷, Jn 6¹⁵, cf. Ro 13⁷): the antithesis He accepted was that of the Heavenly King and 'the prince of this world' (Jn 12³¹ 14³⁰ 16¹¹ in each case ὁ πρίνξ τοῦ κόσμου or ὁ τοῦ κόσμου ἀρχὴν). The 'world' He condemned is not the material world, in which He Himself took delight, or its claims, which He loyally acknowledged, or (in themselves) its possessions, of which He spoke with guarded moderation, but a certain spirit of the world fundamentally antagonistic to man's highest life, and the men in whom that spirit has established its abode (cf. the careful definition in 1 Jn 2¹⁶ and that implicit in Jn 12³¹). It is between Christ's Kingdom and the 'world' in this sense that there is opposition, and in this case the opposition is final and complete (Jn 15^{18, 19} 16³³—note the terms of the contrast, ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ and ἐν ἐμοὶ—17¹⁴, 1 Jn 2¹⁵ 3¹³ 4⁴⁻⁶).

4. The consequent meaning of worldliness.—The accurate recognition of Christ's attitude to the temporal world at once yields the accurate conception of worldliness. Worldliness will clearly consist in devotion to 'the world,' not in any sense of that ambiguous term, but in the particular sense in which Christ revealed it to be evil. Inasmuch, therefore, as 'the world,' in the only signification in which He condemned it, is the spirit of antagonism (whether expressed as a principle or personified in individuals) to His spiritual kingdom, worldliness must be the possession of this spirit, and the practice of worldliness must be its manifestation. In view of persistent misconception of the teaching of Christianity on this subject, clearness at this point, even at the risk of repetition, is of the utmost importance. Worldliness does not consist in a love of the temporal world and its concerns, for between the Kingdom and 'the world' in this sense Christ acknowledges no necessary opposition, and a man may so use both realms as to fulfil the rightful claims of each without setting them in any inevitable antithesis. Nor does worldliness lie in the performance or non-performance of any particular actions (Mk 2^{18, 24} 3^{7-8, 15, 21}, Lk 11³⁰⁻³¹, Jn 5¹⁰ 7^{23, 24} et passim); for, since it is the possession of a certain spirit, the most scrupulous punctiliousness in outward conduct may coexist with the deepest unspirituality (Mt 27⁶, Jn 12⁵⁻⁶ 18²⁸ 19³¹; cf. the significant pronouncement in Mt 21²⁸⁻³¹), and the truest unworldliness with apparent indifference to its formal expression (11^{18, 19}). It is quite true that a love of the temporal world and indulgence in particular actions closely associated with it, may constitute manifestations of worldliness. A realm not evil in itself may easily become the medium of evil, and so, owing to an undue emphasis, man's fellowship with the temporal world may, both by its positive and by its negative influence, prove injurious to his fellowship with the spiritual. Such a misuse of the two realms inevitably turns the contrast of distinction between them into one of opposition. This result, however, is reached not by the anti-spiritual quality intrinsic in the material realm itself, but through the employment of that realm as a vehicle of the anti-spiritual. The essence of worldliness lies deeper than any particular form in which it may be expressed, and, according to the Christian teaching, its essence is found in the mind—in whatever form embodied—which leads a man to identify himself with that 'world' which is anti-spiritual in its nature and influence.

5. The manifestation of worldliness.—Such a self-identification is revealed in practice by the point at which a man lays the chief emphasis of his life. As our review of Christ's teaching has shown, man has communion with two worlds—the temporal and the spiritual. Right and lawful, however, as the first communion may be, there come frequent crises in which its interests are found to be in rivalry to those of the higher fellowship. To cling in such crises to the lower communion, in other words, to sacrifice the spiritual to the temporal, this is to be worldly, for this is to make the temporal world, innocent and good in itself, a vehicle of the anti-spiritual. It is unnecessary, and, in the strict sense, even impossible, to identify particular actions as in themselves involving the anti-spiritual; for, as we have seen, worldliness in practice is the possession of a certain spirit, and there is no action which must necessarily embody that spirit nor any which cannot be made a medium for it. The whole question of worldliness in action is ultimately one of arrangement and precedence. The things of the temporal world are right in their right place, but that is the second place in a man's life. What Christ teaches is that they must never be allowed the first place, for that belongs to God (see Mt 6³³, where both elements are recognized and the true order is laid down; and for a similar situation in OT, 1 K 3⁴⁻¹⁵). The practice of the Church, therefore, consists in such an ordering of these two elements in life as, from the point of view of God, is false. It is the laying of a disproportionate emphasis upon the temporal, to the impoverishment of the spiritual, elements in life. In some cases this may be recognized by the entire exclusion of the spiritual (Lk 12¹⁵⁻²¹); in others by its subjection to the temporal (Mt 8²¹ 10³⁷⁻³⁸, Mk 5¹⁷, Lk 14¹⁵⁻²⁴, Jn 3¹⁹). The error, however, always lies not in the cultivation of communion with the temporal world, but in the untrue emphasis laid upon it; in the failure to see that, while many things appear desirable, only one thing is needful (Lk 10⁴², cf. Mt 13⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶); in the self-identification with that 'world' which is the direct antithesis of the Kingdom of heaven.

6. The Christian's true relation to the temporal world.—Our Lord's example and teaching, thus briefly reviewed, enable us to infer the Christian's true relation to the temporal world. (a) Like his Master, he will be fully cognizant of its charms and fully responsive to its lawful claims. Christianity is a religion calculated to make true lovers of Nature, and to produce good fathers, good husbands, good rulers, good servants, good men of business and men of public spirit. Those who have truly learnt the mind of Christ will never shrink from their obligations to the full-orbed life of the world in which He has set them. On the contrary, it is their simple duty to see that every sphere of human life, public and private, individual and social, shall be permeated by His spirit (Mt 5^{13, 14} 13⁸³). (b) Yet, while the claims of the temporal world will receive their due acknowledgment, the main stress of the Christian's life will lie elsewhere. He is in the world; but, like his Master (Jn 8²³), he is not of it (17¹⁴⁻¹⁵). He will mix freely even in its darker scenes, but without sharing their spirit (Mk 2¹⁶). For he is no longer a slave to that spirit: he has acquired the independence of real freedom (Jn 8³¹⁻³⁶). Indeed, his whole attitude to the temporal world has been changed. He no longer regards himself as a permanent holder, but as a temporary steward, ever awaiting the return of an unseen Lord (Mk 13³⁵⁻³⁷). He thus maintains his fellowship with the two realms to which he belongs, but there is no division in his mind (μὴ μεριμνήσθε in Lk 12²⁹ according to interpretation of AV and RV: cf. the supreme submission of Mk 14³⁶) as to their comparative claims. His real world is the spiritual world. Whether he is giving alms, praying, fasting, or whatever he is doing, his true life is a life lived 'in secret' away from the gaze of men (Mt 6¹⁻¹⁸). (c) And it is the claim of this unseen life that dictates his policy in all his earthly concerns. If it require that he sacrifice his own temporal fame (cf. Jn 3^{29, 30}) or temporal possessions (Mt 9⁹), he does so with joy. If, on the contrary, it require that he retain these and employ them for the advancement of the Kingdom, he is equally, but no more, ready to obey. While some men make a temporal use of eternal conditions (21^{24f.} and ||), he makes an eternal use of temporal conditions (Mt 25⁴⁰, Lk 16⁹⁻¹¹). While some interpret spiritual facts by the material (Mt 16²³, Jn 6^{42, 52}), he seeks the key to material facts in the spiritual. Like his Lord, he never condemns as inherently evil the things which are temporal and material, but throughout his life he subjects them to what is spiritual and eternal (cf. 2 Co 4¹⁸). And herein he has found life's true interpretation (cf. Jn 6⁶⁸).

WRITING.—The allusions to writing in the Gospels may be classified under four headings, none of which requires any elaborate discussion.

1. In one series of passages ('Moses wrote,' or 'it is written') the reference is to the OT Scriptures, whose letter was held to be authoritative on matters of faith and morals. This view of Scripture was due mainly to the influence of the earlier Rabbis, and naturally it dominated more or less the thinking of the primitive Church, whose one sacred book was the OT. But the formula 'as it is written' had already acquired a juristic sense, as may be seen from numerous inscriptions and papyri (Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 112-114, 249, 250), so that the LXX translators were not striking out a new line in rendering Torah often by νόμος. 'A religion of documents—considered even historically—is a religion of law.' It is in this legal or semi-technical sense that Pilate is said to have written the charge against Jesus (Jn 19¹⁹ etc.), while another metaphorical application occurs in Lk 10²⁰ 'rejoice that your names are written (or enrolled) in heaven.' The latter passage alludes to the well-known Rabbinic and apocalyptic conception of the heavenly books or registers, a figure employed to denote the indelible mercy of God and the certainty of the believer's relation to Himself, as a citizen of the heavenly state. To have one's name written in the heavenly archives, or inscribed on the Divine roll of citizens, was equivalent to the enjoyment of a safe and sure lot with God. On the general use of γραφῆ in the Gospels and Epistles, see art. SCRIPTURE, and Expt v. [1903] 475-478.

2. Twice the phrase is used of the composition of the Gospels (Lk 13, Jn 20^{30, 31} and 21^{24, 25}), the object of the undertaking in both cases being carefully explained as practical, not literary. To confirm faith, if not to awaken it, is the aim of a written Gospel. Thus an implicit divergence from the above-mentioned sense of γραφῆ emerges here. No writer of the Gospel claims a juristic authority for his statements. There is nothing legal or formal about their contents (cf. Moffatt, *Historical New Testament*², pp. 42 f., 258, 259, 537, 538), nor, as the very persistence of oral tradition suggests, was there any notion of setting them up as infallible tests. Faith sprang from hearing rather than from reading in those days of primitive Christianity. The rise of written records was late, and even their growing prominence did not as yet shift the centre of gravity and influence from living intercourse to scholastic or doctrinal propositions. The living tradition of the Christian Church, the living word, prevented anything like a purely literary religion. The literary character of the Gospels. But it was produced by the Church. And not until it became isolated from the Church did its abuse begin. 'For the general principle of any study you may learn by books at home: but the detail, the colour, the tone, the air, the life which makes it live in us, you must catch all these from those in whom it lives already' (Newman). Thus the rise of written records in Christianity introduced a real problem, which is soluble only upon a proper view of the mutual relations between living intercourse, such as the Church provides, and literary standards and sources (cf. The Bible in English, 170 ff.).

3. The ordinary ἡμετέριον (Mt 11^{29f.}) mentioned, in connexion with ἡμετέριον (Lk 11) and business (16⁶⁻⁷) affairs. The three R's were taught in Jewish schools, so that writing would be a fairly common accomplishment, indispensable, of course, to the higher branches of trade and culture (cf. Ederheim's Sketches of Jewish Social Life, p. 130 f.). See art. EDUCATION.

4. Jesus Himself is only once said to have written—and that upon the dust (Jn 8⁶⁻⁸), stooping and scrawling with His finger on the ground to conceal His embarrassment and to avoid answering the brazen questions of the woman's accusers (cf. Ecce Homo, ch. ix.). It is idle to suppose that He wrote any sentence, or to conjecture what that sentence was, whether the sins of His interrogators or some text like Mt 5⁹ or Ps 50¹⁶. It is the action and nothing else that is significant. Jesus stooped to write, in short, by one of those natural gestures which a pure-minded man, seated on the ground, would employ to hide his confusion and put by a question which should never have been asked.

YEAR.—See TIME.

YOKE.—The yoke (ζεύγος, Mt 11^{29f.}) supplied Jesus with one of His agricultural metaphors (cf. Mt 13³⁸, Lk 12¹⁷ 15¹⁴, Jn 15¹). It was 'a bar which connects two of a kind usually—as the ox-yoke—fastened by bows on the necks of a pair of oxen and by thongs to the horns or the foreheads of the oxen. It consists generally of a piece of timber hollowed or made concave near each end, and fitted with bows to connect the necks of the oxen, by which means two are connected for drawing. From a ring or hook in the bow a chain extends to the thing to be drawn' (Lloyd's Ency. Dict.). Another use of the word is found in Lk 14¹⁹ (ζεύγος, tr. 'pair' in 22⁴), where it means a pair of draught-oxen. Now, while the facts of farm-life supplied the form for this metaphor of Jesus, it was not there alone that He found the idea of the metaphor. When from the fields His eye turned to the Scriptures to survey the story of His people, on many a page the yoke met His vision. There it is, in prose, poetry, and prophecy; about it have gathered the country's glory and grief. To Jesus it has harnessed the people's experiences. Ideas of opposing character—joy and woe, freedom and slavery, peace and war, plenty and poverty—are symbolized by it (Dt 28⁴⁸, Job 1³ 42¹², Jer 2²⁸, Is 58⁶, 1 K 12¹, 1a 3²⁷). Moreover, it is in His treatment of those bitter-sweet memories and realities of life that the teaching of Jesus, under this figure of speech, touches and keeps a lonely sublimity. Only once (Mt 11^{29f.}) He uses the metaphor. Now it is in everyday use. For He 'touched nothing that He did not adorn.' And He so adorned the yoke as to draw after it the whole gospel.

When Jesus turned His gaze from the fields of industrial life, and from the book of remembrance of the past to the book of the life of His own generation, He discovered a nation under the yoke, a race under the harrow. He hit the mark when He spoke of yokes. His audience was made up of those who were wearing yokes of all sorts and sizes, but no man with his own yoke harnessed on exactly as his neighbour's. On the other hand, that audience was suffering under an intolerable strain. Three yokes were galling and killing them—(1) the yoke of the Law, (2) of Rome, (3) of sin. Their leaders (Mt 23⁴) bound grievous burdens on the people's shoulders; nor would they remove them. Of some it was the constant temptation to throw off the yoke of the foreigner. The Zealots (Lk 6¹⁹) were most restive under Rome. They were the political Nationalists of the day. Again, who of them all was not 'sold under sin' (Ro 7¹⁴)?

These were the yokes of the people. The yoke of Jesus was the will of the Father. He wore it always, never worked without it; never against it, always with it (Jn 8²⁹). Once He asked thrice if He might take it off (Mt 26^{39ff.}) for the road was steep. The yoke of Jesus was the welfare of man. He came to serve (Mk 10⁴⁵). To be Saviour was at once the lowliest, loftiest, and loneliest way of working out the welfare of man. And this yoke was tied on with cords of love (Jn 13¹) unto the end. The humanity of Jesus was His yoke. He was, not the angel (He 2⁹⁻¹⁶), but the man Christ Jesus (1 Ti 2⁵); and He did the perfect will of the Father under this yoke, frail but firm—the body of His humiliation.

JOHN R. LEGGE.

YOUNG MAN.—In the Gospels we have on four occasions incidents of importance described, in which 'a young man' (νεανίσκος, not νεαρίος as in Ac 7⁵¹ of Saul, 20⁹ of Eutychus, 23¹⁷ of St. Paul's nephew) is one of the figures.

1. St. Matthew (19²⁰⁻²²; cf. Mk 10¹⁷, Lk 18¹⁸) describes by this name the 'ruler' who asked our Lord what he must do to inherit eternal life. It adds to the pathos of the scene to know that this man, who 'went away sorrowful' because he could not give up his great possessions in the quest for life, was still so youthful as to be called νεανίσκος. He had not reached the prime of life,* when the love of money had cankered his heart and soul.

2. The widow's only son at Nain, who was being carried out to burial when our Lord touched the bier and raised him to life, was νεανίσκος, young: our Lord called him νεανίσκος when He bade him arise (Lk 7¹⁴). An additional touch is given to the beauty of the miracle if we may infer the mother's early widowhood and the youth's career of promise cut short, for which the Saviour's gift of life restored (ἐδωκεν αὐτόν, v. 15) made ample and unexpected compensation.

3. St. Mark (11) records a brief and somewhat mysterious incident, which occurred on the way from Gethsemane to the high priest's palace on the night of the Betrayal. When 'all the disciples forsook him and fled' there 'followed with him' still 'a certain young man' who had 'a linen cloth cast about him, over his naked body.' Perhaps he had been roused from sleep that night, and so had nothing but his bed-robe on as he rushed from the house to see what was taking place at the garden. And when some of the 'multitude with swords and staves' who arrested Christ tried to lay hold on him also, he escaped, but left the linen cloth behind him in their grasp. The slight event had some special significance for St. Mark with the memories of that night, and it has been conjectured that the νεανίσκος is, in fact, the Evangelist himself; and, further, that he was a member of the household where the Last Supper had just been eaten, perhaps the son of the owner (v. 14). Others, with less probability, have wished to identify him with St. John or with St. James the Lord's brother (see Swete's notes, in loc.). In art he is sometimes represented as the keeper of the garden (Portolano: see Mrs. Jameson's Hist. of our Lord in Art, vol. ii. p. 43). Bengel's inference (locuples igitur erat, Mt 11⁹) tallies well with the idea that he was John Mark (see Ac 12¹²).

* The word νεανίσκος stands for any age from boyhood up to 40 years. See Liddell and Scott, s.v., and cf. Swete's note on Mk 10¹⁷.

4. According to Mk 16⁵, he who appeared to the women at the sepulchre on the morning of the Resurrection was 'a young man sitting on the right side, arrayed in a white robe.' In St. Matthew's account he is described as 'an angel of the Lord' (28²), while St. Luke tells us of 'two men in shining garments' who spoke to them (24⁴: but in v. 23 'a . . . angel'). In apt illustration of St. Mark's version Swete quotes 2 Mac 3^{26, 33} δύο ἐφάνησαν αὐτῷ νεανίαι . . . διαπρεπεῖς τὴν περιβολὴν . . . οἱ αὐτοὶ νεανίαι πάλιν ἐφάνησαν τῷ Ἡλιοδώρῳ ἐν ταῖς αὐταῖς ἐσθήσεσι ἐστολισμένοι; and Jos. Ant. v. viii. 2, where the angel who appears to Manoah's wife is φάντασμα . . . νεανία καλὰ παραπήσιον μεγάλῃ. ZACCHÆUS (Ζακχαῖος; Heb. זָכַי 'pure').—The graphic narrative of Lk 19¹⁻¹⁰ tells us all that we know of Zacchæus, and his name does not occur elsewhere in the NT. The importance of Jericho as a trade centre, the abundance and value of whose produce led forth the enthusiastic devotion of Jerichoites (BJ iv. viii. 2, 3), the employment of a considerable number of tax-collectors, and these were under the general direction of Zacchæus (cf. ἀρχιτελώνης, v. 2), who may, in point of fact, have been himself the fortunate leaseholder of the customs of that particular district. In other words, he may have purchased from the authorities the right to be as exacting as he pleased in his demands upon the people, provided he knew enough of the law to avoid the risk of exposure. There is no reason to believe that Zacchæus was a notoriously bad representative of his class; but, on the other hand, having regard to that remorseful cry of his which seems to have been the product of an awakened conscience (v. 8), it does not appear that his methods were always strictly equitable. He was, so far as one may gather, a publicanus (see art. PUBLICAN) of more than average respectability, yet not above some of the questionable ways associated with his profession. To paint his character in lurid colours, as distinguished by unusual heartlessness and selfishness, is not in accordance with the impression conveyed by the narrative.

One is never quite safe in venturing upon a pronouncement with regard to motives—they are generally so curiously mixed; and possibly a variety of motives contributed to the impulse which brought Zacchæus into contact with Jesus that day. But while it might be too much to say that higher motives were entirely absent, it is quite obvious that the part played by a naturally lively curiosity was not inconsiderable. In this connexion, the contrast between Matthew sitting at the receipt of custom and Zacchæus leaving all thoughts of business behind and climbing a tree with eager speed, is sufficiently great to indicate a vital difference in character between the two men.

More interesting than the attitude of Zacchæus towards Jesus is the attitude of Jesus towards him. If we look for an explanation of the wonderful transformation, implicated in the resolve in which Zacchæus gave expression to his feelings, we find it, undoubtedly, in the delightful frankness of Christ's first salutation, and in His courageous brushing aside of popular prejudice. In no other way could He have so completely gained, first, the attention, and then the heart of one whom society united in passing by. Nothing, surely, could be more remarkable than the delicate insight which led Jesus to choose Zacchæus as His host. It was an irresistible touch, and, mingled with the other happy recollections of that day, it would abide in the mind of the publican as a peculiarly grateful memory.

A. G. CAMPBELL.

ZACHARIAH.—See BARACHIAH.

ZACHARIAS (Ζαχαρίας).—Father of John the Baptist (Lk 1⁵⁻²⁶, 57-60); a Jewish priest, who was an old man at the close of the reign of Herod the Great (B.C. 4). 'The strawberry grows underneath the nettle,' and, even in that evil time of wickedness in Judæa, in Church and State, there lived in Palestine no inconsiderable number of just and devout persons both among priests and people. Of such was Zacharias. A Jewish priest, a member of the family of Abijah, Zacharias had been so careful to observe the law regarding the marriage of priests (Lv 21⁷⁻¹⁴), that he chose for wife one of the sacerdotal house, a daughter of Aaron (v. 5), named after Aaron's wife (Ex 6²³), Elisabeth, who was as pious as himself. They were righteous not only in the sight of men but of God, and blameless in their care to observe all His commandments and ordinances; but notwithstanding this, and the promise of God by Jeremiah (Jer 33¹⁸), and their eager desire, and Zacharias' lifelong prayer (v. 13), their union was not blessed with offspring. It was due to Elisabeth's barrenness (v. 7); and she keenly felt the reproach which it occasioned (v. 25), for it was a common opinion among the Jews that childlessness was God's punishment for guilt. They had both reached old age when the miraculous event occurred which surpassed all they could have looked for.

of Judah to fulfil in the Temple at Jerusalem his week of service; and it fell to his lot to perform the very special duty of burning incense in the Holy Place, separated only by the veil from the Holy of Holies. It was a very notable occasion in a priest's life, which did not come at all to many a priest (it is said there were 20,000 of them altogether about this period), and it was not likely the lot would ever fall on him again to offer it. The offering of incense was a symbol of prayer (Rev 5⁸); the people worshipping in the courts outside were praying while the smoke was rising from his censer within (v.¹⁰); it was impossible that he should not be praying too, and if only by the force of long habit, the old petition rose once more to his lips. Suddenly there stood in front of him, on the right side of the altar of incense (v.¹¹), where no mortal man should be, an angel of the Lord. In the presence of the supernatural, Zacharias feared and trembled; but the angel reassured him, told him that his prayer was heard, that his wife Elisabeth should bear him a son, whom he should live to see, and name John (= 'the grace of Jehovah'), which would be no barren title, but describe his character and mission: 'he shall be great in the sight of the Lord' (cf. Mt 11¹¹, Lk 7²⁸). This son must be brought up as a Nazirite in the highest form of Levitical devotion (Nu 6⁴, Jg 13⁴, La 4⁷, Am 2¹²); he should, like another Elijah (1 K 18³⁷), turn many of the children of Israel unto the Lord, and be the forerunner, as foretold by Malachi, to Messiah Himself (vv. 15-17).

Zacharias had not the faith of Abraham, who staggered not through unbelief (Ro 4¹⁹) at a promise of God exactly similar, 'involving human generation, but prophetically announced and supernatural' (Alford). He asked for a sign (κατὰ τί); and pointed out the difficulties in the way. Some (e.g. Bruce) have expressed surprise that 'so natural a hesitation' should be treated, and punished, as a sin; but to whom much is given, of him much shall be required. Others have asked why Zacharias should be censured here, and not the Virgin Mary (vv. 34, 35), not observing that hers was not a question of doubt, 'Why should I know?' but a request for direction (πῶς);—a question implying faith as to the event itself. She got a sign too, though she had not asked one; but hers was joyful, Zacharias' punitive, yet merciful. 'Thou shalt be dumb,' not only as one stupefied with wonder, but also 'unable to speak': yet for a season merely, till, at the proper time, the promise has its fulfilment. Thus, on the threshold of the Gospel, at the very outset of its great series of miracles, is unbelief chastised. The soul that will not believe shall not be allowed to speak (cf. 2 Co 4¹⁸).

It was not, the Talmudists inform us, the custom of the priests, when officiating inside the Holy Place, to make their own devotions long, lest the people outside should be anxious; but Zacharias' interview with Gabriel, and perhaps the feelings it awakened, caused him to delay. The worshippers in the Temple courts marvelled why he tarried so long; the thought likely to occur to them was that God had slain the priest as unworthy (Bruce); and when at last he did make his appearance, he could neither explain the reason for his delay, nor give them the Aaronic benediction (Nu 6²²⁻²⁴), which was pronounced after every morning and evening sacrifice by the priest with uplifted hands, the people responding to it with a loud Amen (Keil, Bibl. Archæol.). Like the dying St. Columba before the altar at Iona, though for a different reason, Zacharias signed with his hand the blessing which he could not speak (v. 22). As soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished, he returned to his home; the tokens of his wife's pregnancy soon manifested of joy to the sign of punishment which he bore about with him. The promised child was born, but the chastisement was not taken off till the hour arrived when he had his predicted function to fulfil, by calling the infant by his appointed name.

Godet remarks on the pleasant picture of family life presented by the scene of the Baptist's circumcision. It had been a custom since the time of the Jews to receive his name at his circumcision) to receive his name on the same day in which he was signed as one of God's people: for a similar reason, Christian children are named on the day of their baptism into the Church. And it is to be noted that Zacharias was dumb only and not deaf, yet is treated by the company as if unable to hear, is met by Olshausen with the remark that these two afflictions go so frequently together, that men easily accustom themselves to treat dumb persons as deaf.

The heart of Zacharias had been gathering thoughts to itself through all those months of silence, and no sooner was his mouth opened than he poured forth to God the hymn of priestly thanksgiving which we call, from its first word in the Latin version, Benedictus (wh. see). Here we need only note in it an evident allusion to his own name—signifying 'Remembered by Jehovah'—and his wife's (Elisabeth = Eli-sheba = 'the oath of God')—'to remember his holy covenant; the oath which he swears to our father Abraham' (Lk 17²⁰, 23).

Nothing is said of Zacharias after this. The statement of several of the Fathers (Origen, Greg. Nyss., Cyr., and Pet. Alex.), though accepted by Baronius, that this Zacharias was slain by Herod between the Temple and the brazen altar, has no historical basis; it is a mere guess to explain the difficulty, that whereas many of the prophets were martyred at a later date than Zechariah the prophet (2 Ch 24²⁰), yet our Lord, summing up the list of such murders, begins with Abel and ends with Zechariah (Mt 23³⁵). See BARACHIAH. Zacharias having been by this mistaken name a martyr, his relics were forthcoming, and Cornelius a Lapide speaks of seeing and venerating his head in the Lateran basilica at Rome.

ZAREPHATH (AV Sarepta).—A town of the narrow rocky Phœnician coast, 9 miles S.W. of Sidon, 17 miles N. of Tyre, and 60 miles directly N. of Nazareth, whence NT reference is made to it. Perched 500 feet high on a steep hillside a mile from the coast road, the modern shrunken hamlet looks down upon the traveller riding through a mile of the ruins of the ancient Zarephath, which once as a populous city extended to the sea, was provided with walls, and had a commodious harbour, now filled with sand and ruins.

While, in the theoretical division of the Holy Land among the twelve tribes by Joshua, Zarephath fell into the lot of Asher, going down, as that did, 'even unto great Sidon,' 'and to the fortified city of Tyre' (Jos 19^{28, 29}), it, together with the most of Asher's territory, remained almost wholly Phœnician and Gentile. St. Luke's report of Christ's sermon at Nazareth distinctly connects Zarephath with Sidon, as do the LXX and MT in the account of Elijah's sustenance by the widow there. This Evangelist—apparently the only Gentile-Christian NT writer—seizes as does no other upon the thought that the boundless grace of God has been extended in certain typical cases to remote Gentiles, even to the superseding and exclusion of those who were of the stock of Abraham and dwelt within the Holy Land. The choice, among all others, of the widow of pagan Phœnician Zarephath, and of Naaman the leper of heathen Syrian Damascus, to receive the favours of the prophets Elijah and Elisha, filled the crabbied synagogue hearers of Nazareth with wrath and murder (Lk 4^{28, 29}).

ZEAL.—It is not easy to distinguish zeal (Gr. ζῆλος from ζῆω 'to boil') from enthusiasm (which see); but, as regards the derivation, the former indicates the character, the latter the source of the inward state; and, as regards the meaning, the former lays stress on the volitional, the latter on the emotional aspect of the complex condition of soul. As 'ardour in embracing, pursuing, or defending' an object, it is ascribed to Phinehas (Nu 25^{11, 13}), Elijah (1 Mac 2⁵⁸), the Jewish people (Ac 21²⁰, Ro 10²). St. Paul claims it for himself (Ac 22³, 2 Co 11², Gal 1²⁴, Ph 3⁶), and commends it in the Corinthians (2 Co 7^{7, 11, 9²}) and Timothy (Col 4¹³, variant reading for labour). The same Greek word is used in the bad sense of jealousy, which is condemned in the Apostolic writings (1 Co 3³, 2 Co 12²⁰, Gal 5²⁰, Ja 3^{14, 16}). A quotation from the Psalms (69⁹) is applied to Jesus to describe the impression made on the disciples by the first clearing of the Temple (Jn 2¹⁷). This may throw some light on the problem of the repetition of the act at the close of the ministry (Mt 21¹²⁻¹⁷, Mk 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸, Lk 19^{45, 46}), as the first may have been due to His fresh enthusiasm for His vocation, the second may have been a more deliberate assertion of His Messianic claim. As zeal in the fulfilment of His mission is ascribed to God (2 K 19³¹, Is 97³⁷), it is, in Lk 5¹³, the mood itself as well as the occasion of it was worthy of Jesus as the Son of God.

From this term is derived the name of one of the Jewish parties, the Zealots (which see), to which, as his surname indicates, Simon the disciple (Lk 6¹⁵, Ac 1¹³) had belonged. The zeal of Jesus for the Temple may have been what drew Simon to Him.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

ZEALOT (Gr. ζηλωτής) occurs in Lk 6¹⁵ and Ac 1¹³ as the designation of Simon, one of the Twelve. In the lists given by Mt. and Mk. the equivalent 'Cananean' (Καναναῖος) is used. The Zealots were the rigorous Nationalists, the party of violent opposition to Roman domination. Josephus (Ant. XVIII. i. 6) calls them a 'fourth sect of Jewish teachers' and says that 'Judas the Galilean was their leader'. He adds: 'These men agree in all things with the Pharisaic notions; but they have an inviolable attachment to liberty, and say that God is to be their only Ruler and Lord'; he speaks of their 'immovable resolution' and their indifference to suffering and death. These qualities were all abundantly illustrated in the final struggle at Jerusalem and at Masada. Edersheim (LT i. 237 ff.) dates the rise of the party from the accession of Herod the Great, and the activity of guerilla bands in Galilee under the leadership of one Ezechias. 'It was in fact a revival of the Maccabean movement, perhaps more fully in its national than in its religious aspect.' Plummer ('St. Luke' in ICC) attaches more importance to the religious aspect of the movement:—'The Zealots date from the time of the Maccabees as a class who attempted to force upon others their own rigorous interpretations of the Law.' In the later stages of the Jewish history the party grew more violent. Its ringleaders were known as the Sicarii, and their overthrow of all moderating leadership sealed the doom of Jerusalem. There is no special difficulty in believing that a member of this party might be attracted to Jesus and become one of His chosen disciples. Galilee was the home of the party, and it naturally included in it men of very different types, from the religious fanatic to the partisan of revolution. Simon's zealotry, purified by the teaching of Jesus, might readily become true to the Kingdom of God. Edersheim gives us the additional explanation that, at the period when the ministry of Jesus began, 'A brief calm had fallen upon the land. There was nothing to provoke rebellion, and the party of the Zealots, although existing, and striking deeper root in the hearts of the people, was, for the time, rather what Josephus called it, "the philosophical party"—their minds busy with an ideal, which their hands were not yet preparing to make a reality' (op. cit. p. 243). We should, however, take note of the alternative possibility (see Plummer, loc. cit.)

that Simon may have been called ζηλωτής 'because of his personal character either before or after his call,' as St. Paul (Gal 1¹⁴) styles himself περὶ σσότηρος ζηλωτής . . . τῶν . . . παραδόσεων. See also CANANEAN. E. H. TITCHMARSH.

ZEBEDEE (Ζεβεδαῖος) is mentioned several times in the Gospels, but always as the father of James and John. Like his sons, he was a fisherman, and he and they were partners with Simon (Lk 5¹⁰). He was with James and John in a boat when they were summoned by Jesus (Mt 4²¹), and their call as disciples left him with the hired servants (Mk 1²⁰), and broke up the partnership with Simon. There is no record of any direct association of Zebedee with Jesus. JOHN HERKLESS.

ZEBULUN.—1. Description.—Our knowledge of the limits of Zebulun are even more indefinite than in the case of Naphtali (wh. see), and for the same reasons. It was bounded on the east by that tribe, while on the south it seems to have touched the northern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, and to have included a portion of it towards the Kishon at the foot of Carmel. On the west the slopes towards the plain of Acre, and on the north the plain of Suchnin, seem to have been the boundaries. Josephus, indeed, tells us (Ant. v. i. 22) that 'the tribe of Zebulun's lot included the land that lay as far as Gennesaret, and that which belonged to Carmel and the sea.' The latter portion seems to have been implied in the promises of Gn 49¹³ and Dt 33¹⁸, but it is excluded in Joshua's (Jos 19¹⁰⁻¹⁶) division of the land. The seeming contradiction may perhaps be explained by the fact that Zebulun possessed a detached portion at Haifa (חֵיפָה), for the emphasis in the Hebrew text (Gn 49¹³) clearly assigns that port to this tribe. This would agree also with the statement of the Rabbis: 'Zebulun was going out to the seas,' 'Zebulun was diligent in business (מְסַמְכִּים),' 'Zebulun was bringing in merchandise in ships' (Ber. Rab. §§ 72, 90; Mid. Rab. § 25; Yalkut Shimeoni, § 161; Mid. Tanh.; Pesikta Zutarta and Zohar on Gn 49¹³). Still the main body of Zebulun touched no sea. Apart from the south-west portion in the plain of Esdraelon, the tribal land consisted of undulating hill and narrow valleys, which, however, widen out at places into small but extremely fertile plains, the chief of which are the plain of Toran in the east, the plain of Suchnin in the north, and el-Battarf or the plain of Asochis in the centre. Zebulun is not so wild in scenery as Naphtali, nor has it the same variety of climate, being wholly situated in Lower Galilee (M. Shebiith, ix. 2). It varies in elevation from 365 feet in the plain to 1780 feet at Tell Jefat. It possesses no perennial stream of any size, and has no lake of any kind except that from the beginning of the rainy season el-Battarf is flooded. It remains in this condition all winter, and often contains a large quantity of water till June or July. This must always have been, and still is, in itself a fruitful source of malaria, as also through the springs it feeds in the direction of Gennesaret. Elsewhere Zebulun is well supplied with springs. The rock of the district is the same soft white limestone we meet with in Naphtali. Of this there are great barren tracts in the north of the plain of Toran and west of el-Battarf, but, as we have observed, Naphtali may be easily transformed into orchard land. The other hills, which for the most part run east and west, are covered with low prickly oak. There is nothing of the nature of forests now except in the west and south-west—beside Shefā-Amr and el-Hāritiye, still there is abundant evidence to show that in the 1st cent. other places, especially in the north, were well wooded (BJ III. iii. 2 and vii. 8). The chief business of the population is now and must always have been agriculture. At the present time good crops are reaped in the plains and valleys and on the hill sides. Tell Jéfât we meet with fruits of all kinds, olive trees in the valleys, and around all the villages, orchards and vineyards, with an abundance of figs and pomegranates. On the hills, flocks of sheep and goats are pastured. But, fruitful as the land now is, it was formerly more so. We are told that in the early centuries 'the land for sixteen miles around Sepphoris flowed with milk and honey' (Jerus. Biccur. i. 8), and that means the whole tribe of Zebulun. Olive oil was plentiful around Jotapata—Tell Jéfât (BJ III. vii. 28); Araba in the north was a great grain market; while Suchnîn, close by, produced the best wine, and Shikmona in the south was famous for its pomegranates, just as Kefr Kenna is renowned to-day for the size and quality of those it produces. Antoninus Martyr (6th cent.) draws a most enchanting picture of the regions around Nazareth, and he compares the district to Paradise (Itiner. §5). He was doubtless controlled to a great extent by sentiment, but it must be admitted that even at the present day many of the valleys, especially to the west of Nazareth, and above all the hills, justify his description, with their profusion of flowers, fruits, and greenness so pleasing to the eye in contrast to the white rocks.

2. People and historical associations.—As in the rest of Galilee, the Jewish population here had come in during the later days of the Maccabees and the reign of Herod. During the century preceding our Lord's Advent, Zebulun had passed through more stirring times than any other tribe of Israel. Its chief town, Sepphoris (Dio-Cæsarea),—the traditional home of the parents of Mary,—had been repeatedly taken, and immediately after the death of Herod, when the young child Jesus was safe in Egypt, it had been twice besieged and captured, once by Judas the son of Hezekiah (BJ II. iv. 1; Ant. XVII. x. 5), and then by the troops of Varus assisted by a detachment of Arabs (BJ II. v. 1; Ant. XVII. x. 9). On the latter occasion the city was burned, and many of the inhabitants were sold into slavery. Such an event would be long impressed on the minds of the people, especially those of Nazareth, who from three miles distant would view the scene from the hill tops around their city. They would lament many a friend and brother there, and during the years to come they would be making efforts to redeem their relatives from slavery. When the boy Jesus was ten years old, the land was again to pass through the horrors of war, when Judas and his Zealots held out till overcome by Gessius Florus (Ant. XVIII. i. 6; cf. BJ II. vii. 1). Thenceforward for many years there was peace, industry, and progress. The people of Zebulun are not to be thought of as poor. We learn that the inhabitants of Sepphoris had ample means. It was one of the cities rebuilt and fortified by Herod, who made it again the capital of Galilee (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1); and amongst its inhabitants were senators and citizens (Jerus. Horaioth iii. 5). We read also of a city named Zebulun in this district. It is described as πόλις ἀνδρῶν, and was said to have houses like those of Tyre, Sidon, and Berytus, and to possess all sorts of good things (BJ II. xviii. 9). But whatever may have been the extent of Zebulun's trade on the sea, the people would be familiar with, and at least engage in the carrying trade on land, for the great Via Maris of ancient and modern times passes along the plain of Toraa and el-Battâuf westward to the sea, so that, whatever wealth the people may have become possessed of, they would at least be familiar with the sight of earth's treasures.

Not only would the memories of the events,

through which the newly settled Zebulun had passed, influence its people, but their thoughts would also be moulded by the scenes around, which were rich in old historical associations. The tribe had given two judges to Israel, Ibzan of Bethlehem (Jg 12¹³) and Elon (12¹³), while 3 miles from Nazareth was Gath-hepher, the birthplace of Jonah, the first prophet to the Gentiles, and his tomb is still shown there. Then to the young Israelite of the 1st cent. no scene in the whole land could be more inspiring than the view from the hills of Zebulun. To the south the plain of Esdraelon, the battle-ground of Israel, lies stretched out—a glorious panorama. Every crisis in the nation's history had a memory there. Close at hand, by Tabor and Kishon, the men of Zebulun had 'jeopardied their lives to the death' (Jg 5¹⁸). Little Hermon—the Hill of Moreh—and Gideon's fountain (7¹) would recall the 'day of Midian'; while Gilboa would bring thoughts of Israel's darker days, and Jezreel memories of sad declension in the time of Ahab. Shunem, Endor, and Bethshean could also be seen, and Megiddo too,—the scene of Josiah's heroic fight; while nearer still on the shoulder of Carmel was 'the place of burning,'—the site of Elijah's sacrifice, and of Baal's inglorious defeat before the God of Israel. More distant were Mt. Ebal, with its memories of blessing and cursing, and Pisgah's peak in the distant haze; while westward there would be a glimpse of the 'great sea.' All these and many more historical sites are to be seen, and thoughts of them rise and stir the heart of him who views the scene; and if so to the passing stranger, what must they have been to the young Zebulunite, whose daily food they were, and who, in virtue of His blood, was the heir of all their most glorious memories?

The history of this people to the Gentile world is of note. Josephus (BJ I. iv. 3) tells us of the innate enmity of the Syrian to the Jew; but here such feelings would be less intense. We are repeatedly told of bonds of union between Zebulun and Issachar, and that this latter tribe busied itself with the Torah and made many proselytes (Jer. Rab. §98); and before such was possible mutual jealousies must have ceased. At the same time the people would become familiar with the ceremonials of admission to Judaism, including that of baptism (Bab. Jeb. 46 a, b). It is further to be remarked that, though the text seems doubtful, the town of Nazareth in this tribe is named in the songs of Eliezer Ha-kalir as one of the meeting-places of the ḥasidim when they assembled to go up to serve in the Temple.

3. Christ in Zebulun.—Although our Lord's birthplace for the most part given in the tribe of Judah, the land of Zebulun takes precedence not only in the prophecy (Mt 4¹³), but also in historical sequence, and it is equally important for a knowledge of the Gospels. If Naphtali experienced the brilliancy of the noonday of the Sun of Righteousness, it was in Zebulun that the dawn appeared and shone more and more unto the perfect day. In a city of this tribe the Lord Jesus was brought up (Lk 4²⁶). As He increased in wisdom and stature, its associations aided in the moulding of His human character. During a period of well nigh 30 years His life was passed in one of its valleys, broken into only by visits to the Holy City. His earlier years were spent in the midst of its fierce politics, He knew the various party watchwords; He knew what was meant by 'wars and rumours of wars'; He had come into contact with soldiers from Tabor and Sepphoris, and early learned the terrors associated with the word 'legion'; He had met returned slaves—redeemed, freed, or fugitive; He had wrought in the villages of this tribe, and we can even think of Joseph taking the young Jesus to work with him at Sepphoris during the busy days of its rebuilding—for there was not the same objection to entering it as the polluted Tiberias. The flowers of Nazareth had fostered His love of Nature, the operations in its fields and the products of its gardens were to be used to teach lessons for eternity. Nathanael, and perhaps other disciples, were from Cana in Zebulun (Jn 21). It was in it too that Christ publicly declared His office in the gracious words He spoke (Lk 4²¹), that He performed His first miracle, and 'manifested forth His glory' so that 'his disciples believed on him' (Jn 21). But when we have studied the power of all these influences, and considered to what they should lead, we only convince ourselves the more 'that what He was and what He became for the world cannot be explained or grasped by the help of contemporary history or social conditions' (Delitzsch, Handverkleben, § 1).

As in the case of Naphtali, the Rabbis have something to say of Zebulun. They discuss the question as to what Jacob saw in vision, in that he blessed Zebulun immediately after Judah (Gn 49¹⁰⁻¹⁴), and the usual answer they give is that he foresaw the glories of Rabbinism in the presence of the Sanhedrin at Sepphoris before it was removed to Tiberias (Yalkut Shimeoni, i. § 161). It is, however, also recognized that 'The Holy One, blessed be He, should cause His Shekinah to dwell in Zebulun' (Shem. Rab. § 1).

APPENDIX

CHRIST IN THE EARLY CHURCH.—To treat this subject exhaustively, it would be almost necessary to write a complete history (if such a thing were possible) of the early Christian Church. Christ fills the field of vision. Christian life and Christian thought centre round His Person. It is obvious that in an article of limited length, only salient points can be touched upon, a few typical examples given, and lines of thought suggested for further development.

The first Christians happily knew little of the distinction between the theological and the practical. Belief and life were one. Still, for clearness' sake, it is proposed in this article to discuss separately, as far as possible, (1) the beliefs of the early Church concerning the Person of Christ; (2) the feeling of the early Church as expressed in practice and devotion, with regard to the living Christ and His personal relationship to mankind.

The term 'early Church' is, of course, an elastic one. It can scarcely, from a theological point of view, be limited to a shorter period than that which is closed by the Sixth Ecumenical Council (A.D. 681). But within these limits a very special interest attaches to the pre-Nicene period, both from its comparative nearness to the time of Christ, and from the extreme value and interest of its records, scanty though they are. It is with this period (from the closing years of the 1st cent. to A.D. 325) that this article will chiefly deal.

1. BELIEFS OF THE EARLY CHURCH AS TO THE PERSON OF CHRIST.—1. (a) The earliest Christian writing extant outside the limits of the NT, and one which was for long on the verge of admission into the Canon, is the First Epistle to the Corinthians, usually assigned to Clement, Bishop of Rome. It was written probably about A.D. 95, to exhort a disordered church to unity and charity. Its interest is therefore chiefly practical, but it should be noted that at least once a doxology is addressed directly to Christ as to a Divine Person (20); that His unique dignity and pre-existence are evidently assumed in such a phrase as 'the sceptre of the majesty of God, even our Lord Jesus Christ, came not in the pomp of arrogance, or of pride, though He might have done so' (16); and that Christ is spoken of as shedding His blood for the salvation of the whole world (7).

(b) The so-called Second Epistle of Clement dates probably within the first half of the 2nd cent., and is a sermon rather than a letter, the earliest Christian sermon extant after the NT. Here Christ is definitely spoken of as 'God' (1), as pre-existent (14); and His Incarnation is described in the remarkable words, 'the Lord who saved us, being first spirit, then became flesh' (9).

(c) The seven genuine Epistles of Ignatius of Antioch are in some respects the most notable writings of the 2nd century. They were written by him while he was on his way to martyrdom at Rome, probably in the year A.D. 107, and are addressed to the Churches of Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles, Rome, Philadelphia, Smyrna, and to Polycarp of Smyrna. With Ignatius, Jesus Christ is 'our God' (Eph. 1. 18, and elsewhere). His blood is 'the blood of God' (ib. 1). He is 'the only Son of God' (Rom. 1); 'the unerring mouth in whom the Father hath spoken' (ib. 8). Ignatius speaks in significant language of the Incarnation, of the human life, sufferings, resurrection, and continued existence of Christ; and of His double nature; 'There is one only person of flesh and of spirit, born and unborn, God in man, true life in death, Son of Mary and Son of God, first passible and then impassible, Jesus Christ our Lord' (Eph. 7; cf. also ib. 18. 19. 20; Trall. 9; Smyrn. 1-3). The Virgin Birth of Christ is also distinctly alluded to in Eph. 18. 19.

(d) Another writing usually classed among the 'Apostolic Fathers,' is the so-called Epistle of Barnabas, of which the probable limits of date are between A.D. 70 and 132 (Lightfoot). The writer speaks of Christ as 'Lord of the whole world, unto whom God said from the foundation of the world, "Let us make man after our image and likeness"' (5).

(e) A mystical work which enjoyed considerable popularity in the early Church, the Shepherd, attributed in the Muratorian Canon to that Hermas who was brother of Pope Pius I. (A.D. 140-155), contains incidental statements about Christ which point generally in the same direction as those quoted above. The Son of God existed before all creation, and was God's fellow-counsellor in the work of creation (Simil. ix. 12). He supports all creation (ib. 14). At the same time the language of Hermas about the Incarnation is vague, almost as if the Son of God and the Holy Spirit were identical (Simil. v. 6). It is scarcely fair, however, to interpret this as if it were a careful theological statement. Hermas evidently was not a man of deep thought or originality. His aim is practical rather than doctrinal. Probably such expressions are to be understood in the same sense as 1 Co 15⁴⁵.

2. A very interesting feature of the first half of the 2nd cent. is the rise of the Apologists, men of learning who had exchanged heathenism for Christianity, and who addressed heathen readers in justification or explanation of their new faith. (a) Aristides the philosopher (about A.D. 125), addressing the emperor Hadrian, speaks of Jesus Christ as 'God' who 'came down from heaven, and from a Hebrew virgin took and clad Himself with flesh; and in a daughter of man there dwelt the Son of God.'

(b) Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, traces not only prophecies of Christ in the OT, but identifies Him with the God, or the 'angel of the LORD,' who appeared in the OT theophanies, and with the Divine Wisdom of Pr 7, etc. Justin practically anticipates the Nicene formula ὁμοούσιος τῷ Πατρὶ (128), though, as in the case of Hermas, some of his statements are vague, and, if pressed verbally, might appear inconsistent with later definitions. There can be no question, however, that he teaches the pre-existence and the Divinity of Christ, and that his writings were deeply influenced by the Logos doctrine of St. John.

(c) One of the most beautiful as well as most intellectual productions of the early Church is the anonymous Epistle to Diognetus. Here Christ is spoken of as 'the very Artificer and Creator of the Universe'; and the Father sent Him into the world, 'as sending God,' 'as a king might send his son who is a king' (7).

3. It was, however, the necessity of meeting both outside attacks on Christianity, and misconceptions of it from within, that gradually forced Christian writers to define more clearly and exactly the nature of Christ. This process of theological definition continued towards the end of the 2nd cent., and the decisions of the great Councils. Early in the 2nd cent. had begun to appear the curious half-heathen travesties of Christianity which are classed under the general name of Gnosticism. These may be described as attempts to combine Christian ideas and phraseology with ideas drawn from Greek and Oriental religions. The Gnostic systems really differed from Christianity on first principles, as they were generally dualistic, and assumed the essential evil of matter. They denied in consequence the perfect humanity of Christ (a tendency alluded to in the later writings of the NT; cf. 1 Jn 4th), and the true union of human nature with the Divine nature in one Person. The Gnostic Christ was not really born of Mary, nor did He truly suffer.

(a) The first and chief opponent of Gnosticism, one of the most extensive writers of the early Church, was Irenæus, bishop of Lyons from 177-202(?). He meets the Gnostic systems by stating what was definitely believed about Christ in the Christian Church, which is the repository of truth, — truth inherited from the Apostles, preserved by the Church, and the same in all parts of the Church (i. 10, iii. 1, 4, 24). Irenæus states this faith of the Church in language very similar to that of the later Creeds. The Church, he says, believes in 'one Christ Jesus, the Son of God, who became incarnate for our salvation; . . . and the ascension into heaven in the flesh of the beloved Christ Jesus, our Lord, and His future manifestation from heaven in the glory of the Father to gather all things in one, and to raise up anew all flesh of the whole human race, in order that to Christ Jesus, our Lord and God and Saviour and King, every knee should bow,' etc. (i. 10). Irenæus clearly teaches the pre-existence of Christ, that He was begotten and not created (iii. 18); that His humanity is perfect, sinless, yet absolutely real and not Docetic (iii. 16); and that He is God and man in one Person (iii. 16). Perhaps the most remarkable contribution of Irenæus to Christology is his teaching that all mankind is gathered together and summed up in the Incarnation ('in seipso recapitulavit,' iii. 18, etc.).

(b) In the East, Gnosticism was met by the great writers of the School of Alexandria, Clement and Origen, who further developed the conception of Christ as the Logos who is immanent in the Universe. Origen was in some respects a thinker in advance of his age, and his teaching was undoubtedly misunderstood by his successors. Whether his doctrine of Christ was altogether in harmony with the later definitions of the Councils has often been questioned. That it was really so has been maintained strongly by Bishop Bull in his Defence of the Nicene Creed, and by Bishop Westcott. Origen certainly taught the eternal generation of the Son of God (de Princ. i. 2), which doctrine supplies the basis of the reply to the Arian quibbles about the posteriority of the Son to the Father; the reality of the Incarnation (de Princ. ii. 6); and he spoke of Christ as the God-man (θεοανθρωπος).

4. The 3rd cent. is marked by a series of heresies which from different points of view attacked the doctrine which, as we have seen, had been consistently held in the Church, though at times vaguely stated, of the unique Son to the Father, in other words of the historic Christ. How, it was asked, could the Divinity and the eternal pre-existence of Christ be reconciled with the unity of God? There were two principal heretical answers to this problem, and they may be called 'heretical' in a sense that Gnosticism was not, because they arose within the Church itself, and claimed to be the original doctrine.

(a) The Adoptionists, who seem to have been the doctrinal successors of the early Judaic-Christian sect of the Ebionites, and whose chief teachers at Rome were Theodotus and Artemon, all taught a subordination, to a greater or less degree, of the Son to the Father, even making Christ nothing more than a highly exalted man, who was 'adopted' to His Sonship by the Father. This last point was the chief objection of the brilliant Paul of Samosata, who was condemned by a series of Councils at Antioch, and finally deposed in 270.

(b) On the other hand, the Monarchians or Patripassians, represented by Praxeas, Noetus, and Sabellius, denied the personality of the Son and the Holy Spirit in the unity of the Father, that it practically followed from their teaching that the historic Christ was actually the Father Himself who was incarnate, and suffered on the cross, so that, in the spiteful epigram of Tertullian, Praxeas 'put to flight the Comforter and crucified the Father.'

The most important opponents of these heresies were Hippolytus, bishop of Portus (d. 258?), and Dionysius, bishop of Rome (d. 269). Only a fragment remains of the writings of the latter; and those of the former, as well as the exact nature of his teaching, are wrapped in considerable obscurity.

The controversies of the 3rd cent. ultimately waited for a final solution. It is quite evident that the general conscience of the Church was against both Adoptionism and Patripassianism, though the uncertainty of theological language, and the absence of a fixed theological vocabulary, and the difficulty of arriving at common action owing to the stress of frequent persecutions, rendered it difficult for the Church as a whole to come to close quarters with these different forms of error. This slight sketch of pre-Nicene theology should, however, be sufficient to show that, despite the absence of any statement of faith common to the whole Church, there is an overwhelming consensus of Church belief from the first to the effect (1) that the historic Jesus Christ was truly God, pre-existent with the Father; (2) that He was also truly man; (3) that in Him are permanently united God and man in one Person.

5. The Edict of Milan (312) introduces a new era of Church history. Persecution ceased, Christianity tended at once to become the recognized religion of the Empire. This sudden outburst of popularity brought into the Church an influx of ill-instructed converts, who were naturally eager to assimilate Christianity as far as possible to their old heathenism.

(a) The teaching of Arius, a parish priest of Alexandria, who had, however, previously studied at Antioch, brought swiftly the crisis when the Church must definitely and clearly state her belief as to the Person of Christ. We thus enter upon the era of the great Councils, called 'Œcumenical,' as involving an appeal to the universal conscience and witness of the Christian Church throughout the world.

Arius seems to have taught a form of Adoptionism: Christ was the Son of God, and prior to all other created things, and yet Himself a creature. To pay Divine honours to a creature, however exalted, was, of course, really idolatry; but for this very reason Arianism was popular with those nominal converts who had never in their heart relinquished their old polytheism. To the teaching of Arius, the Church at the Council of Nicaea (325), mainly through the exertions of the great Athanasius, opposed the key-word of the Nicene Creed, Christ, the Son of God, is 'of one substance' (ὁμοούσιος) with the Father, i.e. He is, and was from all eternity, of the same Godhead as the Father. Strife and controversy raged round this celebrated phrase during most of the 4th century. It was defended consistently by Athanasius, Basil, and the two Gregorians (of Nyssa and Nazianzus). Ultimately all attempts to substitute for it some vaguer expression failed, and the Council of Constantinople (381) definitely re-affirmed the Nicene statement. The absolute Deity of Christ in the fullest sense of the term was thus finally vindicated. Other problems, however, remained.

(b) Apollinarianism, a reaction against Arianism, ascribed to Christ an imperfect human nature, in which the Divine nature took the place of the human 'spirit' (πνεῦμα), the highest part of man's rational nature. This error was condemned at the Council of Constantinople (381); and it seems that at some later date clauses were added to the original Nicene Creed, derived apparently from a Jerusalem baptismal creed, which emphasized the true and perfect humanity of Christ.

(c) The Council of Ephesus (431) dealt with a further problem, the 'Hypostatic Union,' i.e. the union of two whole and perfect natures, Divine and human, in the one Person of Christ. (a) The teaching of Nestorius, in which there are distinct traces of Gnosticism, practically made two persons of Christ, by denying that the infant child of Mary could properly be called 'God'; and by asserting apparently that at some time after the birth of Jesus, the Divine Logos united itself with Him. The key-word which the Church adopted to refute Nestorius was the title Theotokos, 'mother of God,' applied to the Virgin Mary. (β) A reaction in an opposite direction led Eutyches a few years later to exalt the Divinity of Christ at the expense of His humanity, by teaching that the humanity was in some way swallowed up in the Divinity. The famous 'Tome' of Pope Leo I. stated the balance of faith in two antithetically, and the fourth Council (Constantinople, 451), in condemning Eutyches, laid down that the two natures of Christ are to be acknowledged ἀσυγχύτως ('without confusion'), ἀτρέπτως ('without change'), ἀδιασπῆτως ('without division'), ἀχωρίστως ('without separation'). The same truths were stated in a Latin dress, for liturgic use, about this time, in the so-called 'Athanasian' Creed.

(d) Eutychianism, however, with its disproportionate reverence for the Divinity of Christ, proved too fascinating for the Eastern mind to be disposed of by the Council of Chalcedon. Political as well as religious causes entered into the long 'Monophysite' controversy. The fifth Œcumenical Council (Constantinople, 553) again condemned those who were unwilling to admit the full and perfect humanity of Christ in the one Person of Christ. The sixth Council (Constantinople, 681) marks the last phase of the long debate. Monothelitism, the last stronghold of Monophysitism, was overthrown by the statement of two wills in Christ, human and Divine, the former perfectly subject to the latter.

The steps by which the halting theology of the pre-Nicene period led finally to the full statement of the Catholic faith, were a legitimate and, indeed, a necessary development. It is not one of the least evidences to a Divine power working in the Christian Church, that, in an age of moral and intellectual superstition and intellectual unrest, all attempts to assimilate Christianity to heathenism were rejected, and a clearly defined and balanced statement of truth emerged and gained almost entire possession of the field. With all its mystery, the Catholic faith of Nicaea and Chalcedon was felt by the common Christian conscience alone to satisfy all the different sides of truth as they are contained in Scripture, and to do justice to all that Christians from the first believed concerning their Master. To-day there is practically no alternative left between the Nicene Creed and humanitarianism. If the latter is true, the appearance of Christ and its subsequent effect on the world must remain an insoluble enigma,—a miracle even more difficult of credence than the stupendous statement of the Nicene formula.

ii. DEVOTION OF THE EARLY CHURCH TO CHRIST.

—Whatever uncertainties or faulty definitions may be detected in the statements of pre-Nicene theology, there is no uncertainty as to the attitude of the early Church towards the personal Christ. Lex supplicandi, lex credendi. In the devotion which made men and women and little children live and die for Christ, we shall find even a surer guide than in the attempts of Christian writers to explain their belief. From the very first Jesus Christ stands out in all the records of the early Church as the personal, living Master, not merely the Shepherd and High Priest of His faithful ones, but the true Lord and King of the Universe. He is the object of passionate love, obedience, prayer, and worship.

1. (a) To Clement of Rome, Christ is 'the high priest of our offerings, the guardian and helper of our weakness' (36). Through Him the Father 'instructed us, sanctified us, honoured us' (59).

(b) The unknown author of the Second Epistle of Clement opens his sermon with a burst of enthusiastic gratitude: 'What recompense then shall we give to Him (Jesus Christ)? or what fruit worthy of His own gift to us? And how many mercies do we owe Him! For He bestowed the light on us; He spake to us, as a father to his sons; He saved us when we were perishing—He called us when we were not, and from not being He willed us to be.'

(c) The epigrammatic sentences of Ignatius glow with passionate love to Christ. 'Jesus Christ' is 'our inseparable life' (Eph. 3); true Christians are 'arrayed from head to foot in the commandments of Jesus Christ' (ib. 9); faith and love in Jesus Christ are 'the beginning and the end of life' (ib. 14). 'He that possesseth the word of Jesus is able to hearken to His silence' (ib. 15),—a remarkable and pregnant phrase. Ignatius desires suffering and martyrdom that he 'may attain Christ,' and 'rise free in Him' (Rom. 4. 5. 6). The blood of Jesus Christ is 'eternal and abiding joy' (Phil. 1). Those who 'speak not concerning Jesus Christ' he looks on as 'tombstones and graves of the dead, on which are inscribed only the names of men' (ib. 6).

(d) The Epistle to Diognetus speaks of 'the Word, who was from the beginning, who appeared as new and yet was proved to be old, and is engendered always young in the hearts of saints,—through whom the Church is enriched and grace is unfolded and multiplied among the saints, grace which confers understanding and reveals mysteries' (11).

(e) Justin Martyr describes how, after searching vainly for truth and satisfaction among the Stoics, the Peripatetics, the Pythagoreans, and the Platonists, he at last was led by the advice of a certain aged man whom he met on the seashore to study the Scriptures, and to conceive a love of Christ. 'Straightway,' he says, 'a flame was kindled in my soul' (Trypho. 8).

2. Not only was Christ loved, He was also obeyed. His commandment must take precedence of every other claim. To Hermas, divorce and remarriage after divorce are as absolutely forbidden as unchastity (Command. iv. 1). Justin Martyr similarly insists on the absolute teaching of Christ respecting forgiveness, charity, endurance of injuries, swearing, and civil obedience (1 Apol. 15-17).

3. That the personal Christ was worshipped in the early Church as Lord and God is indicated by Prayer and thanksgiving were addressed directly to Him.

(a) The famous letter of Pliny to Trajan (A.D. 113?) speaks of having elicited from Christians, who had been examined, that it was their custom on a fixed day to assemble before daylight and sing alternately 'a hymn to Christ as God.

(b) A remarkable hymn attributed to Clement of Alexandria, intended apparently to be sung by Christian children, in which Christ is addressed throughout and praised as Ruler, Shepherd, and King, is found in his Pedagogus (iii. 12). Of a slightly later date are such hymns as the Gloria in excelsis and the Hail gladdening Light. Indeed, it seemed to the Church, when confronted by the Arian problem, one of the most convincing proofs of the error of the teaching of Arius, that Christ had always received Divine honours in the Church.

(c) The personal nearness of Christ to the believer during Christian worship was so fully associated with the Eucharist. To Ignatius the Eucharist is the flesh of Jesus Christ. False teachers deny it (Smyr. 6). 'There is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, and one cup unto union with His blood' (Phil. 4). To Justin Martyr, the Eucharist, the conditions of receiving which are belief, baptism, and a life according to the commandments of Christ, is not common bread and common drink, but the flesh and blood of the incarnate Jesus, by which our blood and flesh are nourished (1 Apol. 66). To Irenæus and the Christian Fathers generally, participation in the Eucharist is the actual means whereby Christians share in the life and resurrection of Christ.

(d) The testimonies of the Christian martyrs are most suggestive. Ignatius, brought before the emperor Trajan, calls himself Theophoros, 'Bearer of God,' saying that he bears the Crucified within his breast. Polycarp of Smyrna, when called upon by the pro-consul to revile Christ, confessed in memorable words, 'Fourscore and six years have I served Him, and He hath done me no wrong. How then can I blaspheme my King and Saviour?' And the apparently contemporary record of the martyrdom of Polycarp closes with the significant words: 'The blessed Polycarp was apprehended by Herodes, when Philip of Tralles was high priest, in the proconsulship of Statius Quadratus, but in the reign of the Eternal King, Jesus Christ.' The martyrs of Lyons and Vienne (177) are spoken of in the contemporary letter which describes their sufferings (Eus. Hist. Eccl. v. 1) as 'hastening to Christ'; 'through them Christ showed that things which appear mean and obscure and contemptible to men are with God of great glory.' One of them, St. Blandina, 'was clothed with Christ, the mighty and conquering Athlete.' Their patience manifested 'the measureless mercy of Christ.' And with one and all who suffered, the simple confession of the name of Christ seems to have been the strength which sustained them. St. Perpetua, the African martyr (early in the 3rd cent.), was comforted before her sufferings by a vision of Christ as an aged man, a shepherd, sitting in the midst of a spacious garden, who said to her, 'Thou hast done well, my child, in coming.' St. Maximus, who suffered under Decius, declared, 'These are not torments, but anointings which are laid upon us for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ruinart, Acta Martyrum, p. 204). Phileas of Thmuis, put to death in Diocletian's persecution, said in his last words: 'Now we begin to be disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ. Beloved, attend to the commandments of the Lord.—Let us call upon Him, the spotless, the infinite One, who sitteth upon the Cherubim, the Maker of all things, who is the Beginning and the End, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen' (ib. p. 521).

4. Interesting light on early Christian feeling is thrown by the funeral inscriptions and symbols of the Catacombs. As a rule, the inscriptions are of extreme brevity. Their leading thought is that dead Christians are with Christ in a continued existence of peace and joy. The aspirations and prayers of their friends on earth go with them, and the departed in turn remember the living in prayer to Christ, e.g. 'Vivas'; 'Vivas in Deo Christo'; 'In pace'; 'Deus refrigeret spiritum tuum'; 'Quam stabile tibi hec vita est' (i.e. the life beyond the grave); 'Spiritus tuus in pace et in Christo'; μνησθε δὲ καὶ ἡμῶν ἐν ταῖς ἀγλαῖς ὑμῶν πρελύχαις (προσεύχαις).

5. Most of the early Christian pictures of Christ are merely symbolical, the Lamb and the Fish being the most common. But the earliest personal representation is suggestive; it is the figure of the Good Shepherd, sometimes bearing the lost sheep on His shoulders, sometimes surrounded by His flock. This tender personal relationship between the soul and the Saviour, or between the Church and her Lord, which stands in such striking contrast to the trials and sufferings that surrounded the daily life of the Christian in a hostile world, was evidently the aspect which appealed most deeply to the heart of the early believer.

6. The relation of Christ both to His Church and to the world was also set forth impressively in the so-called 'majesties,' with which from the 4th cent. onwards the Christian art began to adorn the churches. In these pictures Christ is represented as reigning now in glory, bearing the symbols of His royal, prophetic, and priestly offices. It was not merely to an historic Christ that Christians looked back, or a future coming to judgment that they anticipated, though both these conceptions were vividly present in the mind of the early Church. It was a Christ actually in possession of His Kingdom, even now ruling over the nations, and surrounded by His worshipping saints (who even in this present time shared His throne), that dominated the thought of the early centuries. So in the great mosaics in the Church of St. Cosmas and St. Damian at Rome (6th cent.), the colossal in his writings for any accurate definition of the relations of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ, or of the manner in which the Divine Logos and the man Jesus were united in a single personality. He guarded carefully against any admission of a blending of Deity and humanity, as well as against the supposition that Christ's humanity is converted into Deity. He calls the humanity of Christ 'garment,' 'temple,' 'vehicle,' 'instrument.' By virtue of its association with Deity, the soul of Christ possessed perfect knowledge from the very beginning; and His disclaiming of 'about this or that was for the sake of Yet Augustine denied freedom of choice to the humanity of Christ, which he made subject to predestination. He regarded the Incarnation of the Logos as necessary in order that our souls might become His members, and that the devil might be vanquished by the same nature that he had seduced. The Incarnation was the work of the entire Trinity, and the Word stood in no nearer relation to the Son than did the entire Trinity (cf. Harnack, Dogmengesch. iii. 116 [Eng. tr. v. 226]). The following sentence is highly significant:

'God assumed (suscepit) our nature, i.e. the rational soul and flesh of the man Christ, by an assumption singularly wonderful and wonderfully singular, that, no merits of his own righteousness having preceded, he should thus become Son of God from the beginning in which he began to be man, that he himself (the man Christ) and the Word might be one person' (de Correctione et Gratia, 80).

Augustine seems never to have reached a thorough Christology. . . . was necessary to man's redemption, conceiving it possible that God might have chosen another way. The body of Christ he . . . part of the Adamic mass, which was . . . a body by the act of assumption, conceived by Mary not by carnal concupiscence, but by spiritual faith (Dorner, Pers. of Christ, II. i. 398). By the Incarnation our souls become Christ's members, and the devil is vanquished by the same nature that he seduced. As in accordance with the Divine plan of redemption Christ must needs purchase sin-cursed men with His own death, He assumed a human body with all human affections and infirmities, including mortality, yet without concupiscence. In assuming human nature He cleansed it. 'He became man in order that He might make us gods.' Yet He did not renounce the 'form of God,' but continued with the Father in heaven, while Jesus was sojourning upon earth. His emptying was merely an occultation. Like St. Paul, Augustine laid the utmost stress on the humiliation involved in the Incarnation, the human life, and the obedience even unto death; and yet he insisted that the Divine nature as being absolutely immutable could only join sympathetically with the human in psychical and physical suffering. The atoning work of Christ he thought of as redemption from the power of the devil—who had taken up his abode in human souls deserted by God because of sin, and who was conceived of as having a sort of vested right in them—quite as much as reconciliation to God. By receiving the penalty of sin, and not taking upon Himself the fault (culpa), He blotted out both penalty and fault for us. Christ's death possessed atoning power because of His virgin birth, spotless righteousness, and voluntary obedience to God. The temporal death of Christ frees believers from eternal death.

Side by side with Augustine's magnifying of Christ went his disposition to exalt the Church and its sacraments. He supposed that the benefits wrought for man through the Incarnation and sufferings of Christ become available for man only through the medium of the sacraments of which the Church is the sole dispenser.

2. Gregory the Great was not an original thinker on Christological questions. He went far beyond Augustine in his ecclesiasticism and sacramentalism, and while professing to be a devout follower of Augustine, greatly enervated his doctrines in reproducing them. In his teaching regarding the atoning work of Christ he laid more stress than did Augustine on the rightful power of the devil over mankind, and the ransom paid him by Christ in His death. The God-man, virgin-born and without . . . he regarded as both a mediator between God and man, and an example for us. The atoning work of Christ does not avail for human salvation unless man fills up by a life of humility and suffering that which remained of the sufferings of Christ. 'He who strives to be redeemed and to rule with Him must be crucified.'

'Without intermission . . . for us, in that without ce . . . incarnation on our behalf; since His incarnation is an oblation for our cleansing; and when He showed Himself as man, by intervening, He washed away the faults of man. And by the mystery of His humanity He . . . because these faults also which He . . . (Moral. i. 24).

He laid much stress upon the constant intercession of Christ; but this was supposed to be mediated by angels, saints, alms, masses, and by other forms of meritorious works. In fact, he was so overmastered by the efficacy of sacramental forms and the continuous sacrifice, that he regarded the death of Christ as not absolutely necessary for man's redemption. God who created us might have delivered us from the consequences of sin without the death of Christ. He thought of the death of Christ as an exhibition of the Divine love, and as an example wherewith to teach us not to fear the misfortunes and sufferings of this world, but rather to avoid earthly good fortune. A sacerdotal view of the Lord's Supper, with its sacerdotal accompaniments, greatly enervated his . . . of the Person of Christ and its historical significance. In this rite the suffering of Christ is repeated continuously for our reconciliation, 'the whole Christ being in each portion' of the consecrated elements. In the words of Harnack:

'Christ as a person is forgotten. He is a great title in dogmatics . . . ; but the fundamental question of salvation are not answered in relation to him, and in life the baptized person has to avail himself of "means" which exist partly side by side with him (Christ), partly without him, or only bear his badge' (Dogmengesch. iii. 211 [Eng. tr. v. 271]).

Fear and hope take the place of faith and love; fear of punishment takes the place of repentance for sin. Thus the mediæval type of ascetical piety was fully established (cf. II. . . .).

3. A vigorously led . . . movement in Spain during the later . . . 8th century, probably influenced by Saracen thought, led Alcuin, supported by . . . and the Council of Frankfurt (794), . . . as the Christological teaching of the Frankish Church, in opposition to the Nestorian doctrine, alleged to be involved in the Adoptionism of bishops Elipandus of Toledo and Felix of Urgel, a doctrine scarcely distinguishable from Eutychianism. Alcuin insisted that Christ is not 'man,' but the 'God-man'; that He is not 'in everything like us apart from sin,' but 'in many things.' He taught that in the union of the Divine and the human the human personality was blotted out (delevi) or consumed (consumi) by the Divine, and that the Divine personality took the place of the destroyed human personality. 'In the assumption of flesh by God the person of man perished, not the nature' (adv. Felicem, 2. 12). Thus Adoptionism provoked a reaction in the Western Church against an extreme as well as against the natural and proper interpretation of the Chalcedonian Symbol; and while it did not lead to the general acceptance of pure Hellenism, it came perilously near eliminating from Western Christology the conception of the real and complete humanity of Christ.

It has been pointed out by Dorner, with admirable insight (II. i. 270 ff.), that while Christ continued to be regarded by the Greek Church as the revealed wisdom of God, and stress was laid upon His prophetic office employed in the diffusion of enlightenment as embodied in the 'orthodox faith,' in the Latin Church He was regarded during the medieval time as first and foremost a King, Christianity was regarded as a means of securing power, and the hierarchy was supposed to have been appointed by Christ to occupy His place, rule in His stead, virtually to supersede Him in personal government, and to abolish any direct intercourse between Him and believers. No longer was personal fellowship of the believer with Christ as of the supreme good or even as a plenary power, Christ was no longer needed as a personal presence, and was deistically regarded. If a personal and highly sympathetic supernatural was desiderated, this was to be found in the Virgin Mary, who had already been exalted to almost Divine proportions. The Church came to be regarded as the present living incarnation of Christ.

4. Next to that of Augustine, the most potent influence on mediæval Christology in the West was that of the unknown writer (probably active during the later years of the 6th cent.) whose Eccelesiastical Hierarchy, Heavenly Hierarchy, Divine Names, and Mystical Theology were credited to Dionysius the Areopagite, converted by St. Paul on the occasion of his visit to Athens. The writer was thoroughly imbued with the Neo-Platonic thought of Plotinus, Proclus, Iamblicus, etc., and wrought out a magnificent and highly impressive scheme of Christian theosophy on a Neo-Platonic basis. The credit of these works was greatly enhanced by the supposition that they constituted the esoteric teachings of the Apostle Paul, which were too spiritual and exalted for the people of his time. In The Divine Names (ii. 10):

'The Son is all in all and the head of all things . . . , for He is the fulness and cohesiveness of all things, and He conserves and firmly binds the parts by the wholeness, and He is neither part nor whole for He is above these, but both part and whole as having embraced all things; for He is exalted above nature, and is antecedent to causation; and He is perfect as being imperfect, and imperfect among the perfect as being superperfect and antiperfect, and having the power of comprehension with them as regards perfection; and He is the principle in things lacking form as the creator and originator of all form, and without form with respect to things that have received form as being above form.'

Much more is said by way of explanation of the absolute transcendence and absolute perfection of the Son.

This view of Christ and the world would seem to preclude belief in a specific Incarnation; but the devotion of pseudo-Dionysius to the creed of the Church and his sense of the reality of historical Christianity held him back in some measure from sheer Docetism. He maintained, therefore, that the Deity of Jesus in its exceeding goodness came even to our nature and truly assumed the substance of our flesh, so that the Most High God could be called man, the super-essential essence thus shining forth out of humanity. He communicated Himself to us without mixture or change, suffering no harm from His unspeakable humiliation. He was supernatural in our natural, super-essential in what belongs to our essence, and He possessed in a unique manner all that is ours, of us, and above us. True to his pantheistic conception that God can be named with the names of all His creatures, pseudo-Dionysius asserts that He who is the author of man was truly man as to His entire nature. Yet He was not merely man, and not merely super-essential in relation to man; but He is actually man above men and according to men, or, in other words, He is the archetypal man of whom all individual men are the unreal copies. In a superhuman manner He performed human acts. He was a man humanly born, but man above man; and inasmuch as in Him God had become man, He developed a Divine-human energy (Ep. ad Caium, iv.). The pseudo-Dionysius found it practically impossible to find any place in the Universe for the God-man Jesus Christ, thus vaguely and Docetically conceived (Dorner). To assign Him a place in the earthly sphere would be degrading; to place Him in the heavenly order would involve Docetism. Without being quite willing to do so, he virtually relinquished the historical Christ, retaining only the eternal. These writings figured largely in the Christological controversies in the East during the 7th and 8th centuries.

5. Maximus the Confessor (d. 662), though a staunch advocate of Dyothelitism, taught a form of mysticism derived largely from the pseudo-Dionysius. Banished by the Eastern Emperor because of his opposition to Monothelitism, he became the scene of his later activities, and his ground diffused throughout the Western Church the pseudo-Dionysian mysticism. He regarded the pseudo-Dionysius as the holy revealer of Divine mysteries, as the 'all-holy,' the 'great saint,' the 'God-revealer,' and he had no doubt as to his identity with St. Paul's Athenian convert. Associated with the Areopagite, Maximus taught the same Docetic conceptions.

The fulness of the Godhead which was in Christ by nature is in Christ by grace, as far as their nature receives. . . . On account of his love to God for God; . . . because of his love to man he becomes man for man. Christ is . . . of His own will mystically born, for He is made flesh in and through the redeemed. The Logos became the Son of Man in order that He might make men gods and sons of God.

The Incarnation can hardly be said to have been regarded by Maximus as more than a theology, and it was by no means limited to Jesus. In the latter participates in the Divine more fully than other men, it is only because His nature laid hold of it more fully (cf. Dorner, II. i. 228 ff.). The heterogeneous mixture of pseudo-Dionysian Neo-Platonic mysticism and orthodox Dyothelitism in Maximus opened the door to the West as well as in the East for the influence of the former.

6. That the influence of the Areopagite and of Maximus was brought mightily to bear upon the orthodoxy of the East is manifest in the Fountain of Knowledge of John of Damascus (d. about 754), who yet uncompromisingly maintained the persistence of two wills in the Person of Christ (Christ unitedly willing in correspondence with each of the two natures), and the freedom of His human will. The pseudo-Dionysian formula, 'Divine-human energy,' he understood to imply a Divine and a human activity each permanently differentiated from the other; yet he was at great pains to show the unity of the two natures (cf. Dorner, II. i. 210). The permeation of the human nature by the Divine involved in his conception the deification of the human. He illustrates the relation of the Divine and the human in Christ by the permeation of iron by heat. The human intellect of Christ, by virtue of this permeation, participated in the all-comprehending Divine knowledge from the beginning. He takes a Docetic view of the NT representation that Jesus grew in wisdom and favour. So also he regards Docetically the prayers of Christ. God constituting the personality in Christ, there was no occasion for prayer except to furnish an example to us and to do honour to God. Yet he was very far from accepting the Eutychian idea that Divine attributes were communicated to the human nature. While the flesh became the flesh of the Word, and the soul of Jesus the soul of the Word, the human nature remained unaltered in essence. Solely on the ground of the fellowship of the Divine and the human was the flesh of the Lord enriched by the Divine activities. It is evident that this great thinker, whose Fountain of Knowledge is still normative in the Greek Church, failed to gain a perfectly consistent view of the relations of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ.

7. The views of the pseudo-Dionysius and Maximus reappeared among the monks of Mount Athos about the middle of the 14th cent. (Hesychasts, Quietists), and occasioned the Hesychastic controversy, the chief opponents being the leaders of the party that was promoting union with the Latin Church. The cause of the hesychasts was ably defended by Nicolaus of Thessalonica, and by M. G. of bishop of Ephesus. The hesychasts is highly transcendental. He regarded Christ as the highest place of those human yearnings that are directed towards the highest good, as the luxuriant pasture of the thoughts, as the eternal good incorporated with time. Although he held fast to the Chalcedonian doctrine of two natures and two wills, he yet regarded the Word as super-essential even in the Incarnation, and Christ as superhuman and deified like substance with us. The sacraments of the Church he regarded as the channels through which life streams forth from Christ to us. Baptism represents the generation in us of the new Christ-life. Everything pertaining to man's salvation was accomplished by the death and resurrection of Christ. Baptism simply transfers the saving efficacy to the individual. The purification of human nature accomplished in the Incarnation in Christ is accomplished in the individual Christian by his partaking of the Divine-human nature present in the Eucharist. Approaching Christ in this feast, we enter into a fellowship with God and Christ; and as Christ's humanity became deified in the Incarnation, so do believers by partaking of Him.

8. In the West, John Scotus Erigena (d. about 880) translated, with Charles the Bald, the pseudo-which, as well as by the writings of Maximus, he had been profoundly influenced. Through him the Neo-Platonic mysticism was transplanted to the West, and came to exert a marked influence on later Christological thought. His teachings were even more openly pantheistic than those of his Oriental masters, and his denial of the reality of derived existence and his thoroughgoing Docetism make it extremely difficult to interpret much of the language in which he strives to give a certain value to the historical facts of redemption. While asserting that Christ took upon Him the form of a servant and human nature in its entirety, he shows at once how little his language accords with common-sense usage by saying that the human nature that the Word assumed contains in itself the entire visible and invisible creation. Christ's mission was to call back effects into causes, and thus to prevent causality itself from perishing. Thus in assuming and renovating human nature He renovated the whole of the creation visible and invisible. In assuming and renovating human nature thus with its universal contents, Christ raised it in Himself above all that is visible, and converted it into His Deity. He saved the entire human nature which He entirely assumed entirely in itself and entirely in the entire race. Entire humanity is exalted in Him and sits at the right hand of God, having become God in Him. It is manifest that such conceptions of incarnation leave no place for works of sin or redemption. By his seeming of the historical life of Christ he can have meant only to set forth belief in a theophany which had the effect of furthering and facilitating the rise of men above theophanies to the eternal (cf. Dorner, II. ii. 294 ff.).

9. A new evangelical type of mystical Christology is found in the writings of Hugo of St. Victor (d. 1114) and Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173). In them the theosophy of transformed into ecstatic enjoyment self. They were unable to find satisfaction in the Church doctrine of the transubstantiation of the bread and the wine into the body and the blood of Christ as the form in which Christ may be enjoyed, but yearned for a spiritual union with Christ, the transubstantiation of the believer by an ecstatic exaltation into a mystical union with Christ. The Christology of Hugo and Richard was clearly that of the pseudo-Dionysius and of Erigena; but with them the Incarnation was conceived of more distinctly as a historical fact, and the ecstatic union of the believer with Christ did not so clearly involve loss of individual consciousness and virtual absorption.

10. The pantheistic features of the teaching of Erigena found their most extreme development in Amalric of Bena (d. 1204), who identified God with the world and with man. Yet he did not wholly ignore the historical, and maintained that God revealed Himself as Father in Abraham, as Son in Mary, and as Holy Spirit daily in us. He declared that we are the natural members of Christ, because the identical soul of Christ dwells in all good men. Spiritual exaltation from Christ dwelling in us emancipates us from all moral obligation, and makes sins of the flesh a matter of indifference.

11. More profoundly philosophical but scarcely less Christology of the NT and to true religion was the mysticism of Master Eckhart (d. c. 1327). He refused to recognize any distinction between man and God, in nature or in persons. All creatures he regarded as a 'pure nothing.' Every believer is God's only-begotten son in the same sense in which this is true of Christ. 'Whatever God the Father has given to His only-begotten Son in human nature, He has given wholly to me. Here I except nothing, neither union nor sanctity.' 'Whatever the Sacred Scripture says concerning Christ is also absolutely true of every good man.' Eternal generation applies to every good man as fully as to Christ. In fact, man as well as God may be said to have created the heaven and the earth, and to have generated the eternal Word.

12. In John Tauler (d. 1361) we have a highly Neo-Platonic mode of thought combined with the most devout and heartfelt recognition of the Incarnation and the propitiatory sufferings of Christ as absolutely necessary for our salvation. Christ's being is cause, essence, and beginning in relation to all things. He is the life of the living, the resurrection of the dead, the restorer of the deformed and disordered who have corrupted and spoiled themselves by sin, the beginning of all light, the illumination of all those who are illuminated, the revealer of obscurity according to what it is proper for us to know, and the beginning of all beginning. His being is inconceivable and unspeakable, and without names. In becoming flesh and making atonement for the guilt of humanity He is its Redeemer. The Holy Spirit took of the most pure blood of the virginal heart of Mary, which was glowing with the powerful flame of love, and created of it a perfectly pure little body with all its members, and a pure clean soul, and united these together. This soul and body, the Person of the Son of God, who is the eternal Word and the reflexion of the Father's glory, from genuine love and mercy, for the sake of our blessedness, took upon Himself and united with Himself into the unity of the Person. Thus the Word became flesh and dwelt with us. The humanity of Christ he regarded as even in the humiliation permeated by the Divine, and sharing in the possession and use of the Divine attributes. The same was true even when He suffered and died on the cross. According to its lower powers Christ's soul was subject to needs. From this point of view he could say that not a drop of His Deity came for one moment to the help of His poor agonizing humanity in all its needs and in its unspeakable sufferings. Tauler is never weary of emphasizing the importance of the death of Christ. He speaks of the whole human race as fallen into eternal death and the eternal wrath of God, with the loss of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter. Christ broke the bands of eternal death in His death on the cross, and made a complete peace and reconciliation between man and the Heavenly Father. This reconciliation is confirmed by the gift of the Holy Spirit. The sufferings and death of Christ he regarded as an equivalent for man's guilt, as a fulfilling of the Law which we were under obligation to fulfil, in that He suffered in our place and on our behalf. Tauler dwelt with great persistence and with remarkable pathos on the details of the sufferings of Christ and His infinite love for the souls of men. It will not be practicable to give here any further phases of mystical Christological thought.

13. Scholastic Christology next demands attention. Anselm of Canterbury (d. 1109), in some respects the most important of the mediæval theologians, wrought out no new theory of the Person of Christ; but his satisfaction theory of the Atonement, involving the abandonment of the supposition that the death of Christ was a ransom paid to the devil, and basing the necessity of the death of the God-man on the infinite weight of sin and its infinite offence to the honour of God, was an important contribution to soteriology. Satisfaction to the Divine majesty could not be made by man, seeing that he is finite, or by the Son of God alone, seeing that He owed no satisfaction; but it must be made by the God-man. While perpetuating the Augustinian modes of thought as they had been modified by Gregory the Great, Alcuin, etc., Anselm was also greatly influenced by the Neo-Platonic semi-panteism of Erigena. In opposition to the tritheism of Roscellinus, which seemed to him to require the Incarnation of Father, Son, and Spirit, and not of the Son alone, as the means of man's redemption, he insisted that it was impossible for Father and Spirit to become man. The Incarnation merely accomplished the union of the Divine and human personalities, and not the union of the Divine and human natures. The Divine Person became man and bore the burden with the humanity assumed, but not the nature. There was no transformation of Deity into humanity or of humanity into Deity. Not the Divine nature but the Person of the Son became man. If the Divine Person alone and not the Divine nature took part in the Incarnation, it is plain that we cannot speak of the three Persons having become man in Christ, unless we hold that several persons could become one person (Dorner, II. i. p. 442 ff.). Anselm as a Realist insisted that in the Incarnation the Logos united Himself not with an individual man, but with impersonal humanity, in this opposing the Nominalists, who insisted that the humanity of Christ was individual and . . .

Abelard (d. 1142) was essentially Sabellian in his doctrine of the Trinity, and insisted that, being unchangeable, God could not have become something which He was not eternally. He rejected such expressions as 'God is man,' 'Man became God.' He affirmed 'God did not become anything in and through the Incarnation.' He preferred to say in effect, 'in the man Jesus, God worked'; that 'in Jesus the wisdom of God revealed itself, in order to lead men to salvation by doctrine and example' (Theologia Christiana, iv. 13). This thought he is never weary of iterating and enforcing, that whatever our Lord did in the flesh was for our instruction by way of example. This includes His walk, His death, and His resurrection. He regarded Incarnation in the proper sense of the term as unthinkable and impossible, because of his conception of the omnipresence and the unchangeableness of God.

15. Peter Lombard (d. 1160), in his Sentences, which became the text-book of mediæval scholasticism and thus exerted a moulding influence upon later scholastic thought, asked and sought to answer nearly every conceivable question respecting Christ. His great master was John of Damascus; but he was well acquainted with Augustinian thought, and no doubt with the works of Anselm and Abelard. He was also somewhat familiar with Neo-Platonic modes of thought without being overmastered by them. He sees no reason why Father or Holy Spirit might not have become incarnate, but finds especially appropriate in the fact that He who created the world should deliver it, that He who proceeded from another rather than He who is self-existent should be sent on the mission of redemption. It would have been less fitting for Him who is Father in heaven to become Son in the sphere of revelation. The human nature that the Son assumed comprised body and soul, the substance of humanity. This humanity, which was impersonal, was free from any stain of sin; yet, because He so willed, the liability to punishment which clung to humanity in general remained. Though as regards His flesh He descended from Adam and Abraham, He did not sin in Adam, there being no concupiscence in His conception. The question then arises, whether the Personality or the nature of the Son assumed humanity. As he felt the necessity of maintaining that the Son, as distinguished from the Father and the Spirit, became incarnate, and as nature is what the Persons of the Godhead have in common, while personality connotes the distinctions in the Godhead, he could only answer that the Personality and not the nature of the Son assumed humanity (against Augustine). But he seems to have held that in and through the Son the Divine nature as such united itself with, and appropriated to itself, humanity. Yet, in agreement with John of Damascus and the Antiochene theologians of the 4th cent., he thought it advisable to avoid the expression 'the Divine nature became flesh.' In further discussing the significance of the Incarnation, he rejects the Eucharistic and the Nestorian views of the union of Divine and human in the Person of Christ. He denies that out of the two natures was formed a single compound nature. The Word of God, on the contrary, was simply clothed with body and soul as with a garment, in order that He might appear in a form accommodated to human vision. Thus he virtually denied the reality of the union, and reduced to a mere theophany the Incarnation of the Son. The humanity being regarded as a non-essential, accidental feature of the Son of God, its end and aim was solely that of manifestation, and God might for this purpose have used some other means for helping man than that of Incarnation. He rejected Christ's mediatorial work as accomplished by His humanity alone, the Divine nature remaining apart by itself. We are reconciled with the Son as with the Father and the Spirit. The entire Trinity blots out our sins through the mediation of the humanity of Christ. The work of atonement is accomplished chiefly, if not exclusively, by Christ in His humanity setting forth by His sufferings the fact of God's reconciliation, and by thus awakening in men love for God and a desire to follow Christ's example of love to God and self-sacrifice for men. In some passages he seems virtually to deny that God became objectively a man in Christ, and to maintain that the humanity of God was a purely subjective conception of the human mind. Moreover, reconciliation was not really effected by Christ, but God intended that His life and death should be regarded as propitiatory. His attitude was hostile to the humanity of Christ of the growth of Christ in grace and wisdom. Peter Lombard's denial that God became anything through the Incarnation which He was not before, involves the doctrine more fully wrought out by his successors and known in the history of doctrines as Nihilianism. This conclusion had already been reached by Abelard (see above); but the general orthodoxy of Peter Lombard gave it increased importance.

16. Gerhoh of Reichersberg (d. 1169) protested most earnestly against the Nestorianism or Nihilianism involved in the teachings of Abelard and Peter Lombard, and maintained that 'the man born of the virgin mother is in truth also to be called the Most High, not only in the nature of the Word always most high, but also in His human nature that has been exalted even to the point of sitting with God the Father.' He claimed for the humanity of Christ 'the same glory, omnipotence, omnisapience, omnivirtue, omnimajesty, which belong to the Most High Father,' and held that 'the man in Christ is to be adored with worship' in the highest sense. 'Christ who is everywhere, according as He wills, cannot be shut up in a place, however beautiful or desirable.' The body of Christ 'so grew, became so dilated, that it filled the whole world.' Again he speaks of Christ's body as 'a spiritual body that has overstepped every limitation of time and space.' Thus we see in this German theologian a strong reaction against French Nominalism towards the Realism of Eutychianism and Neo-Platonism, which was to go to the utmost extreme in German Mysticism (see above) and to be perpetuated in Lutheranism.

17. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) built upon the foundations of his Scholastic predecessors, and was much influenced in his philosophy by the works of John of Damascus and the pseudo-Dionysius. Like most of the mediæval theologians, he denied the necessity of Incarnation apart from human sin; yet he guarded carefully against representing it as a mere accident as regards God, a mere assumption of flesh by God as a garment. He insisted upon a personal union of God with humanity; and yet denied that 'the Divine Person so assumed one human nature that it could not assume another.' 'That which is uncreated cannot be comprehended by a created thing.' While he opposed the Nihilianism of Abelard and Peter Lombard, he yet minimized the part taken by the Divine essence in the Incarnation. Like most of his mediæval predecessors, he denied the personality of the humanity in Christ. Personality it found in the Logos as a distinction Divinely conferred. Like Peter Lombard also, he maintained that not the Divine nature (which would involve Father and Spirit as well as Son), but only the Divine Person of the Son, became in any sense united with humanity in the Incarnation. This union bestowed upon humanity nothing of the Divine nature, but only such created graces as humanity was able to appropriate. 'The soul of Christ is a creature, having finite knowledge.' This creaturely grace was bestowed in the moment of incarnation in such a way that its increase is inconceivable. Christ's knowledge did not embrace the Divine knowledge, it being 'impossible for any creature to comprehend the Divine essence.' Whatever has been, is, or will be, was within the sphere of the comprehension of Christ's soul in the Word; but not the knowledge of the possible, involving a knowledge of the Divine essence. Thus even the time of the Divine judgment which Christ professed not to know He really knew, but was ignorant of only in relation to others. Thomas also denied omnipotence to the soul of Christ on the same ground. Only as the instrument of Deity could the human soul exert superhuman influence. He maintained that in Christ there were two wills, a Divine, which was the active cause of all He did, and a human, which was purely instrumental. In the human will he distinguished between the sensuous (sensitiva) will and the rational will, the former sometimes willing things other than God willed, but not contrary to the latter co-operating and harmonizing with the will of the Word. Yet, while the human will was free, Christ did not have the power to decide for Himself, but was determined by God. Like Peter Lombard, Thomas ascribed Christ's mediatorial function to His humanity and not to His Deity. He agreed with most of his predecessors in denying the necessity of the Incarnation and suffering of the Son for man's salvation, maintaining that without injustice God might have freely pardoned human sin. Yet he recognized the propriety of the plan of redemption actually adopted. The very least degree of suffering on the part of the God-man would have sufficed. He finds Christ, in reconciling Christ's humanity with His blessed fruition, and reaches the conclusion that the higher aspect (the essence) of His soul continued in perfect fruition while the lower suffered. It is evident that this great thinker, while rejecting Eutychianism, Nestorianism, and Adoptionism, failed to reach a self-consistent view of the relation of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ.

18. We must conclude our survey of Scholastic Christology with some account of the contribution of John Duns Scotus (d. 1308). Although Scotus differed in many respects from Thomas, and gave his name to a party antagonistic to the latter (Scotists versus Thomists), in Christology he was content for the most part to follow in the path that had been so well beaten by Thomas and his predecessors. Like these, he maintained that the union of the Divine and the human was only a relation so far as the Divine was concerned, and that for the Divine to become anything that was not eternal is inconceivable. More than Thomas he laid stress on the relative independence and separateness of the human in Christ. Independence he regarded as indispensable to personality. He supposed that the human nature of Christ was such that it would have attained to personality apart from the Word; yet a personality dependent on God, and not, like the Divine, incommunicable. More than Thomas also he kept clear of Adoptionism, and guarded against representing Christ's humanity as a selfless husk (Dorner). He regards Christ's humanity by virtue of Divine predestination and grace as exalted to a dignity not possessed by nature. Scotus had an exalted idea of human nature as such, and attributed to it a capacity for the Divine that enabled it through the Word to gain an intuitive view of creation. It may be said to be infinite in its scope. In the incarnation the infinite ethical susceptibility of the human soul was filled by the infinite God. He did not regard the humanity as merely passive and instrumental. In joining itself with the will of the Son that was seeking union with humanity, the human will of Jesus was not passive, but being wrought upon by the Divine it determined itself to increasing susceptibility to the Divine. He attributes to the humanity of Christ growth in knowledge and volition, and suffering of soul and body. He regards as miraculous and inexplicable the fact that the Divine nature did not swallow up the human so as practically to annihilate it, but rather caused it to retain its true humanity. The necessity of supposing the humanity of Christ active in the Incarnation, doubtless had to do with the stress that Scotus laid on the immaculate conception of Mary in whom this activity could be assumed. In some respects Scotus advanced beyond any of the Scholastic theologians in his efforts to solve the mysteries of the Incarnation.

19. The Christology of the various sects of the mediæval time (i.e., the Hæreticians, Arnoldists, Waldenses, Taborites, Lollards, and Bohemian Brethren) may be characterized in general as naïvely Biblical, and accordant with that of the orthodox teachers of the 2nd and 3rd centuries. Much of the mediæval Evangelical Christology, as well as much of the Anabaptist Christology that was its outgrowth, savoured strongly of Adoptionism. This was no doubt due in part to the widespread influence of the Paulicians, who were transported in large numbers from Armenia to Bulgaria by the Eastern Empire during the early Middle Ages. All the Evangelical sects of that era laid the utmost stress upon obedience to the precepts of Christ, especially the Sermon on the Mount, and on following the example of Christ. While they kept the humanity of Christ constantly before them, they worshipped Him as God, repudiating utterly all Mariolatry, and all worship of images, holy places, saints, martyrs, etc. They seem not to have concerned themselves at all about the relations of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ, but to have been content with the NT representation, accepted in a devout and simple-minded way. It is probable that nearly all of them would have hesitated with some hesitation the so-called Apostolic Creed, and would have hesitated to accept the so-called Athanasian Creed. The inquisitors frequently charge the Waldenses and related parties with denying the true Deity of Christ, although they had the profoundest reverence for Him and gladly gave their lives for Him. The Catharistic sects, following the Gnostics and Manicheans of the earlier time, denied the true Deity of Christ (regarding Him as one of many angelic beings or emanations), and the reality of His Incarnation and suffering.

Chilistic views were widely prevalent among the heretical offshoots of the Franciscans, Joachimites, Olivists (followers of Peter Olivi), Taborites, etc.

20. The idolatrous disposition of the Greek and Roman Catholic Churches in the mediæval times created an insatiable demand for holy objects connected with the Person and the life of Christ (articles of clothing, fragments of the cross, etc.), and especially for portraits and statuettes produced from life by contemporaries or miraculously formed. In the East the icons, as they existed at the beginning of the Middle Ages (close of the Iconoclastic Controversy), which had long before become conventionalized, furnished the models for all later productions, and little scope was given to the imagination of the artist or the licence of fraudulent antiquities. In the West, however, license was given to both. The Abgar picture (see ABGAR), whether what purported in the 4th cent. to be a contemporary portrait had been preserved or not, was sure under the circumstances to reappear in the mediæval West, and it could hardly have been expected that one church would be allowed to enjoy a monopoly of an object at once so desirable and so easily made. There is no sufficient foundation for the story that the handkerchief-portrait remained in Edessa till 944, whence it was taken to Constantinople by Imperial order, and thence went to Italy in the 14th cent., presumably in connexion with the Crusades. It is not likely that so perishable an article would have lasted for six centuries, to say nothing of the thousand years that have elapsed since its supposed removal from Edessa, and the ecclesiastics of the mediæval time were so unscrupulous in providing themselves with revenue-producing holy objects that no dependence can be placed on their accounts of their sources. It may safely be assumed that neither the Roman, the Genoese, nor the Parisian handkerchief-portrait is that which long abode in Edessa, and that all alike are of mediæval or later origin, though the Genoese enjoys the honour of having been pronounced genuine by Pius IX. Even more numerous and lacking in antiquity is the so-called Veronica portrait, said to have been transferred by Boniface VIII., in 1297, from the Hospital of the Holy Spirit to St. Peter's in Rome. Those who have been vouchsafed a glimpse of the sacred object represent it as almost completely faded out. The legend is that a pious woman (according to some the woman cured of the issue of blood), moved with compassion for Jesus, as, bleeding and sweating, He was going to the cross, gave Him her head-cloth to wipe His face with, and that Jesus imprinted His features upon it and returned it to her as a token of love. The name Veronica was by some supposed to be the Latin equivalent of the name of the woman; but by others it is taken to mean 'true image,' as it might. The Roman Church has since then regarded the purely mythical woman as St. Veronica. The picture, according to copies made before it faded out, represents an oval bearded face with thin hair reaching to the temples, eyes closed, and a somewhat agonized expression. This inartistic picture became a model for Coneyglio and other artists of the later Middle Ages. The stories about the sweat-cloth image, and pictures purporting to be the original, were found place as early as the 7th or 8th cent.; but those exhibited in the mediæval and later times were probably of purely mediæval origin, and were no doubt freely produced as they were needed. Rome was not allowed to monopolize the 'original' Veronica portrait, Milan and Jaen having put forth rival claims. Many other pictures, equally lacking in authenticity and with similar claims to antiquity, were produced and exhibited during the Middle Ages, portraits of the earlier time (4th cent. onward) being for the most part taken as models. The symbolical representation of Christ as a fish was perpetuated from the earlier time. Christ as the Good Shepherd, with the face of a beardless youth, was a common form of representation during the Middle Ages, as earlier. It is the opinion of many that the artists of the Renaissance, while influenced to some extent by the older portraits, drew freely on pagan materials, using especially the earlier representations of Æsculapius to aid their imaginations in depicting the ideal Christ. Crucifixes with agonized face and bleeding wounds were freely used during the Middle Ages. It needs to be said that the Evangelical and Catholic alike were utterly repelled by the use of pictures of Christ and crucifixes as idolatrous.—See CHRIST IN ART.

CHRIST IN REFORMATION THEOLOGY.—It is commonly said that the whole Christian Church has taken its doctrine of the Person of Christ from the Eastern Church, and simply adopted the definitions formulated at the Councils of Niceæ, Constantinople, and Chalcedon; and further, that at the Reformation the Reformers contented themselves with brushing away the refinements of the Scholastic divines of the Middle Ages, and accepted without change the conclusions come to in the Councils of the undivided Church. Neither of these statements is strictly accurate. They have this basis of truth that both East and West accepted the same forms of sound words, and professed the Creeds and verbal definitions sanctioned by the Ecumenical Councils down to that of Chalcedon, but they do not take into account the fact that verbal statements may cover a great deal of divergence in intellectual views—a divergence which in the present case was not merely in intellectual conception, but represented fundamentally distinct types of Christian piety.

The Western Church owed very little to the Eastern, and had a Christology of its own with a clearly marked history, from Tertullian to Augustine; and its intellectual definitions corresponded to a definite type of Christian piety. Athanasius and Augustine alike dwell on the mystery lying in the union of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ the God-man, and can express their thought in the same language; but for Athanasius the mystery lies in the union of two natures, while for Augustine the mystery lies in the Person. 'My Saviour,' says Athanasius, 'must be the great God who made heaven and earth; and He must unite the human and Divine natures which He possesses, in a union which for me is a mystery to be believed, but which my intelligence can never explain or penetrate.' The Greek type of piety fed itself on the mysterious union of natures; the Incarnation was the central thought in Christianity, and salvation appeared to the Eastern Church as a species of diffusion of the Incarnation: men were saved when they were absorbed in the Divine. Augustine felt as strongly the need for a Saviour who was both God and man; and, inheriting the theology tradition of the West, first established by Tertullian and confirmed by Ambrose of Milan, he found a clue to a statement of the Person of Christ in the NT phrases, 'the form of God,' and 'the form of a servant,' and held that these two forms coexisted in the unity of the Person (see above, p. 854*). There was no mystery in the natures. They did not coalesce or blend or unite so far as the natures themselves were concerned. The Person possesses both these forms simultaneously; the one and the same Person was at one and the same time in the form of God and in the form of a servant; and in this unity of the Person lay the mystery. 'Filius

Dei semper, filius hominis ex tempore, tamen unus Christus ex unitate personæ. In cælo erat quando in terra loquebatur. Sic erat filius hominis in cælo, quomodo filius Dei erat in terra; filius Dei in terra in suscepta carne, filius hominis in cælo in unitate personæ.' All believers feel this unity so very strongly that they instinctively create this unity of the Person for themselves. The unity exists in the heart of every Christian. The common Christian thought is that there is a Man in whom God dwells, and who is God. This is the mystery of the Person. 'Proprium illius hominis sacramentum est.'

It is evident that the piety which dwells on the mystery of the Person as opposed to the mystery of the union of the natures has its attention directed to the personal saving acts rather than to the passive condition of incarnation, and sees its salvation worked out for it in the life, death, and resurrection of the Divine Person, rather than in the diffusion of the Incarnation. Thus two types of Christian piety correspond to the two differing intellectual conceptions; the mystery lies in the Person of Christ, and each can accept the same verbal definitions.

Luther and all the Reformers held the Western conception of the Person of Christ. For Luther and for Calvin the most venerated creed was the Western symbol which is called the Apostles' Creed, which in its old Roman form can be traced back to the first half of the 2nd century. Luther and Calvin both placed it in their catechisms for children. Calvin declares that the whole of his Institutio is its exposition, and Luther always understood the Nicene and the Athanasian Creeds to be explanations of the Apostles' Creed. For Luther, as for Calvin, Jesus is a Man in whom God dwells, and . . .

Luther always declared that he accepted the doctrine, and nothing but the doctrine, of the ancient Church on the Person of Christ. 'No one can deny,' he says, 'that we hold, believe, sing, and confess all things contained in the Apostles' Creed, that we make nothing of it, that we do not depart therefrom, and in this way we belong to the old Church, and are one with it.' The Schmalkald Articles and the Augsburg Confession begin with stating over again the doctrines of the Old Catholic Church, founding on the Nicene Creed, and quoting Ambrose and Augustine; and Luther's contention always was that, if the sophistry of the Schoolmen could be cleared away, the old doctrines of the ancient Church would stand forth in their original purity. When he spoke of the Scholastic Theology, he spoke of a theology that had departed to the word. He spoke of a theology that had departed with the outsidings of doctrines, and asked and solved unnumberable trivial questions, but also that the imposing edifice they erected was hollow within, and had nothing to do with the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. He held that in the heart of the system there was, instead of the God in whom Jesus had revealed, the abstract entity of pagan philosophy, an unknown deity—or God could never be revealed by metaphysics. All this sophistry he swept away, and then declared that he stood on the ground occupied by the theologians of the ancient Church, whose faith was rooted in the true God, and in belief in Jesus Christ the Revealer of God. The old theology had nothing to do with Mariolatry or with saint-worship; it revered the true God and Jesus Christ, His Son, the Saviour of mankind. Moreover, Luther believed and rightly believed, that for the Fathers of the ancient Church, the theological doctrines in which they expressed their conceptions about God and the Person of Christ were no dead formulas, but were the expression of a living Christian experience. Luther took the old doctrines, and put them alive again in an age in which they were dead, and he believed that their reality and had degenerated into mere dead doctrines on which the intellect could sharpen itself, but which were out of all relation to the practical religious life of men. That is to say, in other words, Luther gave to theology a religious interest, and this was a recovery of something which had been lost. Medieval theology had little sense of religion. Religious phenomena, like the appearance of St. Francis and the existence of the 'Brethren,' were not taken into serious consideration by the theologians. The Summa of Thomas Aquinas gives little insight into the deep and genuine religious experience of the writer, and gets no inspiration there. The efforts of the Schoolmen were directed solely to the exposition of the philosophical implications of traditional doctrines; they ignored the relation to actual religious life in the Church, apart from which theology becomes unreal. Probably it requires a succession of religious geniuses to maintain the right connexion between theology and contemporary religious experience, and it is the opinion of Ad. Harnack that the Church had no genius between Augustine and Luther. No one realized that a supreme utterance of faith like St. Bernard's hymn—

'Jesus, our only joy be Thou,
As Thou our prize wilt be;
Jesus, be Thou our glory now,
And through eternity!—

and such experience as finds expression there, formed any part of the material of theology. And so theology missed its opportunities of serving the Church. Had the Reformation undertaken the task of understanding and interpreting words like these, it would have cleared the path to new truth, and set pious souls free. As it was, the Reformation theology languished, and simple faith, the wings of faith, still carried the people with them. They still believed in an exclusive priesthood, in magical sacramental grace, in prayers to saints, and works of merit and Papal dispensations. Even the 'Brethren' who, all through the Middle Ages, had been the most earnest and practical of Christians, put to rest the Reformation theology. When, in the Reformation, Luther's visit to the convent, recommended the Reformation theology of Tauler to the youthful scholar-monk, did the secret of Christian piety once more find lodgment in the soul of the Reformation, who saw how to make the thoughts of faith supreme throughout the whole sphere of religion—in church life, in ritual and theology, as well as in the lonely heart. Through Luther came the rediscovery that there was theological material in the living experience of Christian souls. And since in the Christian soul Christ is always enthroned, this amounted to a rediscovery of the place of Christ in theology. Directing itself thus to experience, theology realized that its important task is not to give the metaphysical assurances about Christ's Person with which the Schoolmen laboriously occupied themselves, but to explain the nature of His saving work which makes believers hail Him as Lord.

But if Luther accepted the old formulas describing the nature of God and the Person of Christ, he did so in a thoroughly characteristic way. He desired to state them in plain German, so that they could appeal to the 'common man.' Neither he nor any of the Reformers believed that theology, which for them was, or ought to be, the most practical of all disciplines, was a secret science for experts, described in a language which must be unintelligible to the multitude. He confessed with some impatience that technical theological terms were sometimes necessary, but he did not like them, and he used them as little as possible.

'Quodsi odit anima mea vocem homocousion, et nolim ea uti, non haereticus ero, quis enim me coget uti, modo rem teneam, quae in consilio per scripturas definita est' (Erlangen ed. Lat. xxxv. 366). Like Athanasius, he preferred the word one person to express the relation between the Persons in the Trinity. He even disliked the term Trinity or its German equivalents Dreifaltigkeit, Dreieinigkeit. 'Dreifaltigkeit ist ein recht böse Deutsch, denn in der Gottheit ist die höchste Einigkeit. Etliche nennen es Dreieinigkeit; aber das ist ein altes-pöthelisch . . . darum lautet es auch nicht, und viel lieber soll man Gott dem die Dreifaltigkeit' (Erlangen, xi. 100). The technical terms used in the old creeds were not used by Luther, and did not use any of them in his Small or Large Catechisms.

In framing his conception of what was meant by the Person of Christ, Luther, like all the Reformers, started from the saving work of the Redeemer. He approached the Person of Christ from our Lord's mediatorial work, and not from any metaphysical way of thinking what Godhead must be, and what manhood must be, and how Godhead and manhood can be united. He rises from the office to the Person, and does not descend from the Person to the office.

'Christ is not called Christ because He has two natures. What does that matter to me? He bears this glorious and comforting name because of His office and work which He has undertaken' (ib. xii. 244).

It is a true appreciation of His work that leads to a real knowledge of His Person. 'He who, with Peter, has a true view of the office which Christ must exercise in the world, and effect with us, must conclude with Peter that Christ must be God in like omnipotence' (ib. vi. 280). 'To remove from us the burden of sin, death, hell, and the devil, and to vanquish their power, and to bring again righteousness, life, and salvation, are the works neither of men nor of angels, but only of the One, Eternal, Divine Majesty, the Creator of heaven and earth.

Therefore must this seed of Abraham be true, everlasting, Almighty God, equal to the Father from all eternity' (ib. xix. 18). He who accomplished an effectual redemption for fallen and enslaved humanity must needs be Divine. The idea of a redeemer of man, Himself no more than man, or rather, Himself less than the one eternal God, was to Luther an absurdity. Redemption and Godhead were inseparably bound together.

So, like Athanasius, Luther found in his salvation the proof of the Divinity of the Saviour. Beneath all the reasonings of the great Alexandrian there lay his fundamental Christian experience that the Saviour who redeemed him must be the great God who made heaven and earth. It was the same with Luther.

In the second article on the Creed in his Catechism, he says, 'This means that I believe that Jesus Christ, true God . . . is my Lord who has redeemed me,' and again: 'We must have a Saviour who is more than man; for if He were no better and greater than man, He would not be helping us. But if He be God, then the treasure is so ponderous that it outweighs and lifts away sin and death; and not only so, but also gives eternal life. This is our Christian faith, and therefore we rightly confess: "I believe in Jesus Christ His only Son, our Lord, who was born of Mary, suffered and died." By this faith hold fast, and though heathen and heretic are ever so wise, thou shalt be blessed' (Erlangen ed. xlviii. 3, 4).

Jesus Christ was for Luther the mirror of the fatherly heart of God, and therefore was God; God Himself was the only Comforter who could bring rest to the human soul burdened by sin and grief; and the Holy Spirit was God. The old creeds confessed One God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and the confession contented him, whatever words were used. Besides, he rejoiced to place himself side by side with the Christians of the ancient days, who were free from the sophistries of the Schoolmen, and to feel that he also belonged to the ancient Church, the communion of the saints.

But although Luther and the other Reformers accepted the theology of the ancient Church and introduced its creeds into the reformed services of public worship, they put a richer meaning into the doctrine of the Person of Christ than had ever been done before their day; and the thought of the Divinity of Christ meant more to them than it had done to their early predecessors. Jesus, the Saviour, seemed to be God in a more intimate way to them than to the earlier divines. The old theology had stated the doctrine of the Two Natures in the Person of Christ, in such a way as to suggest that the only function of the Divine nature was to give to the human work of the Saviour such an importance as to make it effective. This is seen in Augustine, in Anselm, and in the Reformed Scholastics of the 17th century. Luther and his fellow-Reformers always refused to take this limited way of regarding the Divinity of Christ. They did not refuse the expression 'Two Natures in One Person,' but Luther makes it plain that the words suggested an idea which he believed to be wrong, and which had to be guarded against. He declares frequently that we must beware of thinking that the Deity and the humanity of Christ are united in such an external fashion that we may look at the one apart from the other. When we see Jesus, we perceive God and man really and intimately united.

'This is the first principle and most excellent article, how Christ is the Father: that we are not to doubt that whatsoever the man says and does is reckoned, and must be reckoned, as said and done in heaven for all angels; and in the world for all rulers; in hell for all devils; in the heart for every evil conscience and all secret thoughts. For if we are certain of this: that when Jesus thinks, speaks, wills, the Father also wills, then I defy all that may fight against me. For here in Christ have I the Father's heart and will' (Erlangen ed. xlix. 183, 184).

Luther's sense of the rich and full Divinity of Christ is not won at the expense or neglect of His humanity. On the contrary, he believed that the reason why the Schoolmen had made so many mistakes was that they had practically omitted the humanity of Christ altogether. They had obscured His humanity by a multitude of conceptions and fancies which Luther could not abide. The legends of meaningless miracles and supernatural claims attributed to the infant Jesus, he characterizes as 'pure foolishness.' For it widened the gulf between Him and us. Where a mediæval preacher delighted in recounting marvels taken from apocryphal sources, emphasizing all that tended to put Christ in a different order of being from us, Luther dwelt continually on all His characteristically human traits, on all that made Him one with us.

'The deeper we can bring Christ into our humanity, the better it is,' he says in one of his sermons (ed. vi. 155). So his frequent pictures of the life of Christ are full of touches from the family life of the home at Wittenberg. The boy Jesus lived just like other boys, was protected, like them, by His mother. He was suckled at His mother's breast, learned to walk like other children, was subject to His mother's reprimands for His mother, brought her water from the well, and drew firewood from the heap in the yard, and finally, when He grew up and became stronger, began to ply the axe to help His father (passim). And this, Luther asserted against those who had erected it into an article of faith that Christ from the first moment of His life was so full of wisdom that there was nothing for Him to learn. He will have nothing to do with the ascription to Christ only a mutilated humanity. 'By humanity I mean body and soul. And this I wish to emphasize because some, like Photinus and Apollinaris, have taught that Christ was a man without a human soul, and that the Godhead dwelt in Him in place of the soul' (Erlangen ed. x. 181).

As with every other article of his creed, Luther had a practical, life-interest in holding so firmly to the humanity of Christ. The human life of Jesus glorified humanity, and was a pledge of the final glory of all redeemed humanity.

'It is,' he says in his exposition of Jn 14, 'the most precious that we Christians have, that the Son of God, became man, having flesh and blood, like any other man, and became man for our sakes, that we might come to the great glory: thereby our flesh and blood, skin and hair, hands and feet, belly and back, sit in heaven above, equal to God, so that we can boldly bid defiance to the devil and all else that harasses us. We are thus made certain, too, that they belong to heaven and are heirs of the heavenly Kingdom' (Erlangen ed. xvi. 12 f.). It was no mere semblance of a man who was now exalted at the Father's right hand, but one who was bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, to whom no human experience, save sin, was foreign,—a boy who enjoyed his play and helped in little household duties, a man who shared the common lot of toil and weariness and temptation, a real man living a true human life under conditions no so far removed from our own. Having life—a true human life—He understands us fully, and we can know Him, and God through Him. Through Him alone can we come to know God. 'Outside of this Christ no other will of God is to be sought. . . . Those who speculate about God and His will without Christ, lose God completely' (Walch's ed. vol. v. p. 198).

With the Reformers, therefore, the historical life of Jesus is of the utmost importance, far exceeding all metaphysical dissertations upon the nature of a God-man. We can all have naturally a human sympathy with that marvellous life; but faith, the gift of God, is needed to see the Divine meaning in that life and death. The meaning, put in its briefest form, is that in Jesus we see God appearing in history and addressing man. Hence the Person of Christ was something more than a mere doctrine for them—an intellectual something outside us. It must be part of that blessed experience which is called Justification by Faith. It is inseparably connected with the recognition that we are not saved by the good deeds we are really able to do, but solely by the work of Christ. It is what makes us cease to trust all work-righteousness, and to confide ourselves to God alone, as He has revealed Himself in Jesus Christ. When we know and feel that it is God who is working on our behalf, then we instinctively cease trying to think that we can work out our own salvation (Erlangen ed. xii. 244). Hence the Person of Christ must always be something more than a mere doctrine for the true Christian. It is something which we carry about with us, as part of our lives.

'To know Jesus in the true way means to know that He died for us, that He piled our sins upon Himself, so that we hold all our own affairs as nothing, and let them all go and cling only to the faith that Christ has given Himself for us, and that His sufferings and piety and virtues are all mine. When I know this, I must hold Him dear in return, for I cannot help loving such a man.'

Here we reach the kernel of the Reformation teaching about Jesus, and the new theology from all previous teaching about God and the Person of Christ.

Luther lets us see, over and over again, that he believed that the only thing worth considering in theology was the Divine work of Christ and the experience we have of it through faith. He did not believe that there was any real knowledge of God without these limits. Luther, as Ad. Harnack says, 'in his relation to God, only thought of God at all as he knew Him in Christ.' Beyond them there is the unknown God of philosophical paganism, the God whom Jews, Turks, and pagans ignorantly worship. No one can really know God save through the Christ of history. Hence, with Luther, Christ fills the whole sphere of God: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father,' and conversely, 'He that hath not seen me hath not seen the Father.' The historical Jesus Christ is for Luther the revealer, and the only revealer, of the Father. The revelation is given in the marvellous experience of faith in which Jesus compels us to see God in Him—the whole of God, who has kept back nothing which He could have given us. This is the distinctive mark of the way in which the Reformers regarded Christ; all theology is Christology; they knew no other God than the God who had manifested Himself in the historical Christ, and made us see in the miracle of faith that He is our salvation.

'There is only one article and rule in theology. He who has not a full and clear grasp of it is no theologian; namely, true faith and trust in Christ. Into this article all the others flow, and without this they are nothing' (Erlangen ed. vol. lviii. 398). 'In my heart these rules alone, and shall rule, this one article, namely, faith on my dear Lord Christ, which is, of all my thoughts on things spiritual and Divine, the only beginning, middle, and end' (ib. lviii. 63).

The early Christians had said of Jesus that He must be conceived of as belonging to the sphere of God (2 Clement, i. : ἀδελφοί, οὕτως δὲ ἡμᾶς φρονεῖν περὶ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὡς περὶ θεοῦ). The Reformers added: and that He fills the whole sphere of God, so that there is room for no other vision of God than that which Christ gives us. This master-thought of Reformation theology simplified Christian doctrine in a wonderful way. It justified Luther's rejection of the complicated discussions of the Schoolmen, and his accusation that what he called their 'sophistry' was partly pagan; and it also showed clearly that Christian worship ought to be simplified too.

The reader of the second part of the second book of the Primum Movens will find that the theologian who taught that God has been first defined as Primum Movens, or the Causa efficiens a quo omnes res naturales ordinantur in finem—conceptions which can never imprison, without destroying, the vision of the Father who has revealed Himself to us in Jesus Christ. What have Christians to do, the Reformers asked, with a great Eternal Something, which is not the world, when they have the Father? It would have been well had their followers in after generations realized this principle, and the Church might have been spared the 17th cent. Scholasticism, where God was defined as the Principium essendi et cognoscendi, where His purpose in salvation became a Divine decree, taking the place of the category of substance, and where theology, borrowing as much from Aristotle as from the Scriptures, became a second-rate metaphysic.

The older theology had never grasped the thought that Jesus Christ filled the whole sphere of God. It limited the work of Christ to the procuring of forgiveness of sins, and left room outside Christ for many operations of Divine grace which were supposed to begin when the work of forgiveness was ended. So there grew up the complex system of expiations and satisfactions, of magical sacraments and saints' intercessions, which made the mediæval Christian life so full of superstitions, and, to all seeming, so empty of Christ. To the mediæval theologian all these could be justified, because they came from the sphere of God which was, as it were, beyond the influence of Christ was exhausted, they thought, when bare forgiveness had been won; and the grace needed for all holy living came from operations of the grace of God which did not necessarily flow from Christ alone. The thought of Christ alone. The grace of God. Christ; the Holy Spirit was the Spirit of Christ; the presence of God was the presence of Christ, and the possession of God was the possession of Christ. They could not, therefore, regard grace as a mysterious something, different from the soul and outside it, and at the same time different from Christ and outside Him also. Grace became simply the possession of, and the presence of, Christ, who is the whole God. This simplified the Christian life, and swept away at once the whole complex system which had bred so much superstition.

This characteristic of Reformation thought and of Reformation piety, that Christ fills the whole sphere of God, appears everywhere in the writings of the Reformers and in the rites and worship of the Reformed Churches, and may be illustrated, if not exhaustively described, in the following instances of its application.

1. The Reformers swept away every contemplation of intercessors who were supposed to share with our Lord the procuring of pardon and salvation, and they declared against all attempts to distinguish between various kinds of worship, which could only lead pious souls astray from the one worship due to God in Christ. The Romish Church said that saints did not receive actual worship, and that images were revered only in the same sense as copies of the Scriptures. Calvin has no difficulty in showing that these distinctions were not popularly grasped.

"Such subtle distinctions," he says, "as latræ, doulia, hyperdoulia, are neither known nor present to the minds of those who prostrate themselves before images until the world has become full of idolatry as crude and plain as that of the ancient Egyptians, which all the prophets continuously denounced; they can only mislead, and lead to idolatry. They actually suggest to worshippers."

"The Reformers," he says, "actually suggest to worshippers, and betake themselves to some patron who has struck their fancy. They bring it about that the Divine offices are distributed among the saints as if they had been appointed colleagues to our Lord Jesus Christ; and they are made to do His work, while He Himself is kept in the background like some ordinary person in a crowd. They are responsible for the fact that hymns are sung in public worship in which the saints are lauded with every blessing just as if they were colleagues of God." In this connexion he quotes the 'impious stanza heard in many churches': 'Ask the Father, command the Son,' addressed, of course, to the Virgin; and the invocation of St. Claud as 'the life and resurrection of the dead.'*

In the same way, he says, "the doctrine of works of supererogation as 'the merits of Christ, and says that 'in making up the treasury of the Church, the merits of Christ and of the martyrs are thrown together in the slump,' 'mixing up the blood of Christ with the blood of martyrs, and forming out of them a heterogeneous mass of merits or satisfactions.'†

In conformity with these thoughts, the Confessions of the Reformation all agree in repudiating prayers to the saints. The Augsburg Confession says:

"The Scripture teacheth not to invoke saints, nor to ask the help of saints, because it propoundeth to us one Christ: the Mediator, Propitiatory, High Priest, and Intercessor. This Christ is to be invoked, and He will hear our prayers, and liketh this invocation. He will be invoked in all afflictions: 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with God, Jesus Christ the righteous.' (1 John 2). The Second Helvetic Confession in its fifth chapter lays down the rule that prayer is to be through Christ alone, and saints and relics are not to be worshipped. And all prayer-books and liturgies in every branch of the Reformed Church, even when taking over, with little alteration, old terms of prayer, carefully exclude addresses to the Virgin or to any of the saints.

In any case, the theoretic distinctions between reverence and worship never applied to the adoration of the consecrated host. This even in theory was absolute worship, and was felt to be abhorrent and profane by the Reformers, who had experienced spiritual communion with the living Christ. Calvin calls it a 'theatrical exhibition.'

2. The Reformers insist on the necessity of Christ, and Christ alone, for all believers. Their confessions abound in expressions which are meant to magnify the Person and work of Christ, and to show that He fills the whole field of believing thought and worship; and, as Reformation theology was based on experience rather than on metaphysics, and aimed at expounding the faith of the pious believer rather than at unfolding metaphysical mysteries, we find a constant reference to the various names and offices of Christ and to the manifold aspects of His work.

The brief Netherlands Confession of 1568 has no fewer than twelve separate sections: on 'Christ, the only Mediator and Redeemer'; on 'Christ, the only Teacher'; and on 'Christ, the only High Priest and Sacrifice.' The Heidelberg or Palatine Catechism, calls Christ 'my faithful Saviour,' and says that we can call ourselves Christians, 'because by faith we are members of Jesus Christ and partakers of His anointing, so that we both confess His Holy Name and present ourselves unto Him a lively offering of thanksgiving, and in this life may, with free conscience, fight against sin and Satan, and afterwards possess, with Christ, an everlasting kingdom over all creatures.' The Scots Confession abounds in phrases intended to honour our Lord Jesus Christ. It calls Him, 'Most High, Eternal Wisdom,' 'Emmanuel,' 'our Head,' 'our Brother,' 'our Prince,' 'our Bishop of our Souls,' 'Author of Life,' 'Lamb of God,' 'Advocate and Mediator,' 'the only High Priest.' The English Prayer-book, while for the most part reflecting the stereotyped conclusion of the breviary per dominum, in the endings of the Collects introduces new forms, such as, 'for the honour of our Advocate and Mediator, Jesus Christ,' and 'through the merits of Jesus Christ our Saviour.' All the Confessions and Liturgies of the Churches of the Reformation abound in the same or similar expressions.

3. The Reformers declare that Christ is the only revealer of God.

"We are the mirror of the Father's heart," says the Scots Confession, 'not so meikle because He has created us, quhilk we have in common with the reprobate, as for that He has given us His only Son.' The instructions issued by the Synod which met at Bern in 1532 are very emphatic upon this thought, as may be seen from the headings of the various articles: (Art. 2) 'That the whole doctrine is the unique Christ' (Das die gantze leer der eygich Christus sye); (Art. 3) 'That God is revealed to the people in Christ alone'; (Art. 5) 'That the gracious God is perceived through Christ alone, without any other mediation'; (Art. 6) 'A Christian sermon is entirely about and from Christ.' It is said under the third article, 'His Son, in whom we see the Work of God and His Fatherly heart toward us,' which is not the case where the preacher talks much about God in the heathen manner, and does not exhibit the same God in the face of Christ.

The means of this revelation are the Spirit, which all the Confessions unite in declaring to be the gift of Christ, and the Holy Scriptures. The claim of the mediæval Church to be the sole trustworthy exponent of the Scriptures had barred the way to Christ through the Word, and had driven men to seek contact with Him in the sacraments, a region where they were more at the mercy of ecclesiastical assumption. The Church itself had used the Bible chiefly as a quarry for proof-texts of ecclesiastical dogmas. But for the Reformers the Scriptures are the plain man's guide to Christ. In them Christ Himself speaks to each soul.

In the English Prayer-book it is said that Christ 'offers Himself in the Word to be received by the faithful.' The Church of England says: 'Both by the Word and Sacrament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ.' The Scots Confession says: 'We believe and confess the Scriptures of God sufficient to instruct and make perfect the man of God. So do we avow the authority of the same to be of God, and neither to depend on man or angels.' In the decrees of the Bern Synod (1532) Scripture is called 'a witness to a means of access to, and a remembrance of Christ.' And again it is said that 'the Scripture leads us to Christ and teaches (Him) as the Saviour.'

We thus see clearly that the Reformers' conception of Christ as the revealer of God at once restored the Scriptures to their rightful place in popular religion, and gave to the Bible a new unity. To the mediæval Church it had been a difficult collection of isolated doctrinal texts; to the Reformers it formed a complete book with one centre, the Person of the Redeemer.

4. The conception that Christ filled the whole sphere of God, which was for the Reformers a fundamental and experimental fact, enabled them to construct a spiritual doctrine of the sacraments, which they opposed to that of the mediæval Church. It would be unfair to ignore the germ of an evangelical idea even in the materialistic Romish doctrine of transubstantiation. While the way to Christ through the Scripture was barred by the refusal of the Church to place the Bible in the hands of the people, here was one way in which the common man might suppose he got into direct contact with his Redeemer. We see this religious use of this doctrine in its crudest form in the hymn of St. Francis:

'Oh, how pure and worthy should be the priest
Who touches the living, glorified Jesus.
Let the whole earth tremble,
Let the heavens thrill with joy,
When Christ the Son of God descends upon the altar.'

What made the sacrament holy to Francis was the personal presence of Christ. Nevertheless, the ordinary attitude to the sacraments was grossly superstitious. The doctrine of transubstantiation, interpreting the presence of Christ in a material sense, practically annulled the reference to Christ altogether, and made the sacrament an exhibition of the magic powers of the priesthood. The sacraments were looked upon as magical channels of Divine grace. The accepted doctrine was, in the words of the decrees of the Council of Florence, that 'while these others (the sacraments of the OT) do not convey grace but only figure the grace given by the Passion of Christ, these sacraments of ours both contain grace and confer it upon the worthy receiver.' Thus in theory, as in practice, the sacraments usurped the place of Christ. Now, although it was the various theories about the sacraments that caused the chief differences among the Reformers themselves,—Luther, with his mediæval philosophy, insisting that, by virtue of Divine omnipresence, the words, 'This is my body,' might be literally and physically true; Calvin, with his more spiritual doctrine, insisting that the presence of Jesus is in spiritual power; Zwingli, casting overboard the whole question of the real presence and dwelling only on the memorial aspect of the feast,—still, with all their varying ideas, the Reformers united on the thoughts that the efficacy of the sacraments depended entirely on the promises of Christ contained in His word, and that the virtue in the sacraments consisted in the presence of Christ to the believing communicant. What was received in the sacrament was not a vague, mysterious, not to say magical, grace, but Christ Jesus Himself. He gave Himself in the sacraments, in whatever way His presence might be explained. The efficacy of the sacrament depends on Christ, not on any magical powers of priests; and what is received in the sacraments is not any mysterious grace, but Christ Himself.

All the Reformers taught that the efficacy of the sacrament depends on the promise of Christ contained in the institution, and they insisted that word and sacrament must always be taken together.

Thus Luther points out in the Babylonian Captivity of the Church, that one objection to the Romish sacraments is that recipients 'never hear the words of the promise which are secretly mumbled by the priest,' and exhorts his readers never to lose sight of the all-important connexion between the word of promise and the sacraments; and in his Large Catechism he declares that the sacraments include the word. 'I exhort you,' he says, 'never to sunder the Word and the water, or to separate them. For where the Word is withheld we have only such water as the maid uses to cook with.' The Augsburg Confession says, 'The institution and commandment of Christ are equally decided on the necessity of connecting the promise and the words of Christ with the sacraments. The Second Helvetic Confession says, 'There remains efficacious in the Church of God, Christ's institution, and sacramentation of the sacraments, so that the sacraments are not otherwise than the Lord's body and blood. We therefore enjoy even now that primal most glorious consecration of all. And therefore, in the celebration of the sacraments the very words of Christ are recited.' The Thirty-nine Articles declare that the sacraments are effectual because of 'Christ's institution and promise.' The Heidelberg or Palatine Catechism of 1563 says that the sacraments 'are holy and visible signs ordained of God to the end that He might thereby the more fully impart unto us the promise of the Holy Gospel.'

The Roman doctrine of sacramental grace we have these Reformation statements. In the articles of the Bern Synod (1532) we are told that the sacraments are mysteries of God, 'through which, from without, Christ is proffered to believers.' The First Helvetic Confession (1536) says, concerning the Lord's Supper, 'We hold that in the same the Lord truly offers His Blood, that is, Himself, to His own.' The Scots Confession (1562) declares that 'the Body of Christ is in heaven at the right hand of the Father,' and enjoins communicants 'to lift up their hearts and not to direct them downwards to the bread. For as the sun, though absent from us in the heaven, is none the less efficaciously present to the earth, so the Body of Christ is present to the faithful, and adds, 'Yet we hold that their substance and truth is in Jesus Christ.' So the Scots Confession of 1560 declares that 'we assuredly believe that be Baptisme we are ingrafted in Christ Jesus to be made partakers of His justice, by which our sinnes are covered and remitted. And also, that by the Supper rightly used, Christ Jesus is so joined with us, that the same cummis very nourishment and fude of our saules.' In the Manner of the Lord's Supper the minister in his exhortation says, 'The end of our coming to the Lord's Supper is life and perfection in Jesus Christ, acknowledging ourselves at the same time to be children of wrath and condemnation. Let us consider then that this sacrament is a singular medicine for all poor sick creatures, a comfortable help to weak souls, and that our Lord requireth no other worthiness on our part, but that we unfeignedly acknowledge our naughtiness and imperfection.'

The Reformation was a revolt from a system which removed God far from the common man's understanding by means of metaphysical speculations, and brought Him near only in superstitious and materialistic ways, through sacraments and priests. It was seen again that in Christ God had come close to the ordinary believer, and the appeal to religious experience proved that alike in prayer, in worship, and in teaching, Christ filled the whole sphere of God. Jesus was God appearing in history and addressing man.

THOMAS M. LINDSAY.

CHRIST IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

—The 17th cent. is the age of Protestant scholasticism. A strong Catholic reaction had set in, which weighed on the minds of the defenders of the Protestant faith, and shackled the freedom of theological thought. In their treatment of the Christological problem, both Lutheran and Reformed theologians clung fervently to the traditions of the past, and to the Confessional theology of the previous century. The main results were regarded as finally attained; and while the religious motive was not wanting, the genial spirit that had guided Luther in his most surprising paradoxes was now weighed down by the love of system and scholastic disputation. Instead of reconsidering the first principles involved, the orthodox theologians wasted their ingenuity in inventing distinctions to conceal the most obvious doctrinal inconsistencies.

1. The Lutheran Church led the way in this scholastic confusion, by its endeavours to set in clearer light the unity of the God-manhood of Christ. The Formula of Concord (1577, published in the Book of Concord, 1580) struck a compromise between the divergent views of the Brenzian and the Chemnitzian doctrine. It held that the two natures of Christ had direct and real communion with each other; and it condemned as Nestorian the view that rested the unity of Christ upon the unity of the Person, as if the natures were combined in an external way, like two boards glued together. There was a real passing over of the properties of the Divine nature to the human nature; not in the sense that the human nature was essentially altered thereby, or made the Divine properties its own by a 'physical communication' or 'essential transfusion,' but in the sense of a real and permanent communication, such that Christ 'performed all the works of His omnipotence in, through, and with His human nature.' It was admitted that this majesty communicated to the human nature was hidden or withheld during Christ's earthly life; He did not always manifest it, but only when it pleased Him to do so; or (as it is elsewhere expressed) He 'divested Himself of His Divine majesty in the state of His humiliation,' though retaining it through the personal union. By the resurrection this occultation of the Divine majesty came to an end, and He was placed in the plenary use, revelation, and manifestation of all Divine powers, so that 'now not only as God but also as man He knows all things, is able to do all things, and exercises an omnipresent dominion.'

This Formula of Concord proved in reality a formula of discord to the Lutheran divines; it was variously interpreted, and not even universally accepted. The theologians of Helmstädt, who followed the more moderate Chemnitzian view, were all the more opposed to the Formula that it was interpreted by the Swabian theologians in a sense that restored the Brenzian tradition. The Swabians presented the doctrine of the Communicatio idiomatum in the most uncompromising form; and, in the most incautious and absolute terms, they attributed the Divine attributes of eternity, omnipresence, omnipotence, and omniscience to the earthly human Christ. For a time the Swabian views prevailed; but something had still to be done to harmonize them with the historical facts of Christ's earthly life. A new controversy arose, in which the differences between Chemnitz and Brenz reappeared in an acuter form, as to what was involved in the state of humiliation, or the extent to which the human Christ had divested Himself of the Divine powers. The controversy raged chiefly between the theologians of Giessen and Tübingen. The theologians of Giessen, following the line of thought of Chemnitz and the divines of Helmstädt, endeavoured to reconcile theory with fact by distinguishing between the possession of Divine powers and their use. Looking to the facts of weakness, ignorance, and growing development in the life of the earthly Christ, they maintained that, while possessing all Divine properties, Christ did not make use of them in the state of humiliation, but entered on the full exercise of His powers at His exaltation. Only occasionally (miracles, transfiguration) did rays from the Divine majesty shine through; in general the Logos remained quiescent, and the human nature, though Divinely endowed, did not advance to the actuality of exercise (κένωσις τῆς ὑποφάνειας). This doctrine was contested by the theologians of Tübingen, who regarded the distinction as futile and involving a betrayal of the Lutheran position. They insisted that there would be no real communication of Divine attributes to the humanity unless the human Christ both possessed and used them. They would admit only that the earthly Christ hid His majesty for the time, and usually made a veiled use of His Divinely communicated powers (κρύβει). This theory was apparently more logical than that of the Giessen theologians; but neither could be harmonized with the facts of Christ's earthly life, and the Tübingen theory brought the inconsistency into more startling evidence. The Giessen distinction between use and possession of Divine powers might be applied with some meaning to the property of omnipotence; but it had no conceivable meaning as applied to omniscience or omnipresence. But it fared even worse with the Tübingen view when brought face to face with the facts. For how could a Christ who possessed and used the actuality of omnipresence in His humanity be at the same time and in the same nature circumscribed in time and space? How could a growing intelligence be at the same time endowed with absolute omniscience? Or how could the weak, human, suffering Christ be also in the full exercise of His omnipotence? The Tübingen theologians did their best to solve these startling contradictions by making small concessions, and minute distinctions that concealed these concessions. Thus they maintained that the earthly human Christ exercised His omnipresence not actu naturæ but actu personæ; or, in other words, that the Person exercised it while the human nature remained under limitations—a verbal distinction which left the difficulty where it was. In regard to the omniscience of Christ, which seemed to clash with the fact of His gradual growth in knowledge, they submitted that omniscience was not incompatible with growth in a perfected human nature; and they suspected Mk 13³², where Christ confesses His own ignorance, of being an interpolation. Or, again, when pressed with the facts of Christ's suffering and weakness as being inconsistent with a full energizing omnipotence, they admitted that Christ, for the sake of His redemptive work, 'retracted' somewhat of His Divine majesty. They made a distinction between the 'reflex' and the 'direct' use of His powers, declaring that Christ, qua Sacerdos, used His powers in reflex use of His majesty with reference to His own body, while He still, qua Rex, exercised the direct use of it in reference to creation.

These explanations of an intelligence that writhed under its own obvious inconsistencies, served only to bring in doubt the reality of Christ's human life, and more moderate views at length prevailed. The Saxon Decision of 1621 expressed a view favourable to the Giessen theology: 'We constantly affirm that He used His royal majesty most freely when, how, and where He would; but we deny that Christ as a man, immediately from His incarnation, always, fully, and universally exerted His Divine majesty of omnipotence and omnipresence, . . . since Christ could not have been taken, crucified, and put to death had He willed to use fully and universally His omnipotence and omnipresence.' The Tübingen theologians clung to their views till nearly the end of the century, but they became more and more isolated in their opinion. The common Lutheran view was that represented by Quenstedt, the Lutheran Aquinas, who completely systematized the Lutheran doctrine. He held that, from the first moment of the Incarnation, Christ was, even in His human nature, in possession of the Divine majesty, and did exercise it occasionally when His work made it expedient to do so; but He abdicated its plenary use. The human Christ on earth emptied Himself by giving up for the time the glory of the μορφή θεοῦ, i.e. the 'divine majestatis plenarius, universalis, et non interruptus sive indesinens usus.' He thus reduced the possession by the human Christ of omniscience and omnipresence to a mere potentiality. He was omnipresent while on earth, but not everywhere; He was everywhere present in fact, but not in act. He possessed the Divine powers, but He preferred usually to act through His natural powers. He had the primum actum of omniscience, but not the secundum actum; He had the potentiality of absolutely Divine knowledge, but He would not to use it.

On the whole it must be admitted that the Lutheran theologians had little success in their efforts to unify the God-manhood of Christ. Their well-meant endeavour to supplement the defects of the two-natures theory by a doctrine of intercommunication brought only more prominently into relief the contradictions involved. The further development of doctrine in this century shows that the Lutherans themselves were becoming less sure of their own principles. The old axiom that the human nature of the Divine (finitum capax infiniti) was maintained in its non-ethical sense, but it was surrounded with more definite cautions and limitations. Thus, in order to meet the charge made against them by G. Calixtus, and still more forcibly by the Reformed and the Roman Catholic Churches, that by their doctrine of Communicatio idiomatum they overthrew the distinction between the human and the Divine, they distinguished more carefully than hitherto between a personal and an essential communication of properties. It was insisted that the Divine properties communicated did not become the essential properties of the human nature, but were only personally possessed and exercised. Or, as it was otherwise expressed, the human nature of Christ possessed the Divine powers, not by absolute appropriation (μετέξω), but by participation (κατὰ συνδιακόνειαν, per unionem et participationem, Meisner, Hollaz, Buddeus). Still further, it was held that the principle finitum capax infiniti was applicable in the case of Christ alone. It was admitted that human nature was naturally and in general incapable of receiving the Divine powers, and that the human nature of Christ had been endowed with this capacity by a special act of the Divine power. When the principle of the Communicatio idiomatum is thus narrowed down on this side and on that, the old dualism reappears, and the Lutheran doctrine of the thorough union of the Divine and the human is in a state of collapse. Later attempts to rescue the Communicatio idiomatum from oblivion by removing it from its basis, the doctrine of the two natures (Dorner, and still more elaborately H. Schultz, Lehre von der Gottheit Christi), only repeat the mistake of pouring new wine into old bottles; for, as Baur says, when once the duality of natures is abandoned, there can be no further talk of a Communicatio idiomatum. Schultz tries to revitalize the doctrine in its triple form by an infusion of new ideas which have little historical connexion with it, and which could be better expressed in less scholastic forms.

The different kinds of Communicatio as given by Quenstedt may be here tabulated:—

I. Genus idionaticum, where the qualities of either nature are attributed to the person: (a) when the person is the subject: Christ is eternal; Christ has died; (b) when the concrete human nature is subject: the Son of Man is from heaven; (c) when the concrete Divine nature is subject: God has suffered.

II. Genus apotelesmaticum, marking some activity in the person: both natures concur: God is redeemer; the Son of Man is redeemer (i.e. He who is both God and Son of Man); the blood of Christ cleanses (i.e. the blood of Him who is both God and man).

III. Genus majestaticum, the attribution of Divine properties to the human nature: (a) Divina nomina: (b) Divina attributa: (c) Cultus divinus; (d) Essentialia Dei attributa: e.g. omnipotence, omnipresence, omniscience. The main controversy raged around this last genus.

2. The Reformed Church took a different path. Its theologians held fast to the principle of the Communicatio idiomatum that finite human nature is not capax of the Divine; but they applied it, as the Middle Ages had failed to do, to set in stronger relief the reality of Christ's human life. They considered the unity of Christ to be sufficiently safeguarded by the fact of the personal unity and the correspondence of the two natures, and emphasized the distinctness of the natures to the point of being charged with Nestorianism by their Lutheran opponents. Instead of such a communication between the natures as the Lutherans maintained, they were content to think of the human nature of Christ as working in harmony with the Divine through the anointing and activity of the Holy Spirit. Through this Holy Spirit, coming by way of the Logos, the human nature of Christ received certain Divine charisms; but it did not receive the absolute Divine attributes, or any other powers than such as a human nature, remaining human, could receive. Thus they claimed for the human Christ sinlessness, infallibility in His teaching, and abiding fellowship with God the Father; but they were earnest also in maintaining a true growth in Christ of positive knowledge, holiness, and power. Not even did the risen and exalted Christ surpass the limits of the human, or arrive in His humanity at complete coincidence with the Divine. On the other hand, they balanced this doctrine of a truly human development by the position that the personality of Christ lay in the Logos, who, in assuming this human nature, and appearing on earth in lowly guise, at the same time also remained outside of the human Christ, clothed with all the attributes of heavenly glory. (The Logos was totus in carne, but also totus extra carnem). Their theory results practically in the doctrine of a double life, the eternal life of the Son of God, the pure Logos ex carne, who remains unchanged in heavenly dominion and glory; and the life in time of the man Christ Jesus, the Logos Incarnate, the God-man in lowly form. (This is the interpretation given by Bruce, Humiliation of Christ, 163 ff., Schultz, Gottheit Christi, 180, and others). It may be mentioned, as indicating the growing importance attached to the doctrine of the Communicatio idiomatum, that the idea of Christ's pre-existence was revived during this century as well among the Reformed as the Lutheran divines. It recommended itself to the Lutheran theologian as exalting the human nature, and affording some support to his doctrine that the whole earthly life of Christ rested on the voluntary self-humiliation of the God-man; while to some of the Reformed side it seemed to explain the position of Christ as the type and instrument of creation, and the medium of revelation prior to the Incarnation.

Comparing the views of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, we may say that while both adhered to the ancient formula of Chalcedon, the Lutheran Church emphasized the Divinity of Christ, and the Reformed Church the humanity. In the Lutheran field of vision stands the figure of the Divine, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent Christ, upon which the humanity hangs like a thin transparent garment; while, for the Reformed Church, the human Jesus of Nazareth stands in the foreground, and the Divinity lies in the background of faith, constituting a union with the human Jesus that is beyond comprehension. It cannot be said that either Church solved the problem of Christ's Person, for indeed no solution is possible on these terms. So long as the Divine and the human are defined by categories that are absolutely inconsistent—omnipotence and weakness, omniscience and ignorance, the infinitude of omnipresence and local bodily finitude—the union of these in one person is inconceivable. It is only when we read the glory of God in the face of Christ, and realize that the central and essential attributes of God are love, grace, compassion for human frailty and need, that we can recognize the Divine and the human as one, and acknowledge in Christ the revelation of the Divine, the Word of God Incarnate.

3. Outside of the orthodox theology a freer development of thought took place, under the influences derived from the anti-Trinitarianism of the 16th cent., and the growth of modern Socinianism was a growing power, and the influence of its criticisms passed into every land. The Socinians made a clean sweep of the old Trinitarian and Christological dogmas, and so cut the knot of the intellectual difficulties involved. In their view it was irrational and unscriptural to speak of God as being three. It was equally irrational to think of God generating a Son after the manner of corruptible animals, or to speak of two natures, each complete in itself, coming together and forming one person. The rational and Scriptural doctrine was that Christ was verus homo. Yet, having once made this fundamental position clear, the Socinians made many concessions in favour of Christ's uniqueness in respect of Divine supernatural endowment. He was born supernaturally of a virgin. He was equipped for His work on earth by ascending into heaven, and receiving there all needful supernatural knowledge. He also exercised supernatural powers on earth; and after His ascension He was exalted to the right hand of God, and was endowed with new Divine powers for the guidance of His Church. As thus exalted He might be called God, and Socinus himself went so far as to justify the adoration of Christ. This Socinian doctrine rests on the same pre-supposition as the orthodoxy of the day, viz. that the supreme and essential characters of Deity are omnipotence, omniscience, unchangeableness; but by applying this conception logically to the Person of Christ, Socinians emptied their Christology of all religious-value. For union with God is the need of the human heart; and the doctrine of the God-man, contradictory as it was, held a truth for which Socinianism found no expression.

4. The Arminian doctrine was a via media between the Socinian and the orthodox doctrine. The Arminian theologians adhered to the doctrine of the Trinity, but maintained that the Son, as begotten of the Father, was essentially subordinate, though still a Person within the Deity. They also maintained the full humanity of Jesus. Though one with the Son or Logos, He lived a truly human life; He had a human body and a human soul, and, according to Curcellæus, a human personality. The union with the Logos appeared in the communication to Jesus of Divine spiritual powers, but only of such as were possible to a creature. While they held His actual sinlessness, they denied His impeccability. Had they carried out their conception logically, they could scarcely have halted short of Socinianism.

Before the close of the century the Arminian Christology had multitudes of adherents, not only in Holland but also in Switzerland and England. In the latter country Deism had already begun to undermine the Trinitarian and Christological doctrines, and Arminian and even Arian views were widely spread within the Church. The whole tendency of the period was towards a more frankly humanitarian view of Christ's Person; and leading representatives of thought, like Milton, Locke, and Newton, whose sympathies were with the Christian faith, were estranged from the orthodox rendering of the Christian verities. The great variety of view, prevailing both in the Churches and beyond them, indicated the approaching dissolution of the old dogma, while as yet the rationalism of the age had little to set in its place.

5. In this as in other centuries, Mysticism pursued its own path, and afforded to some minds relief from the high and dry dogmatism of orthodoxy. Starting from the true thought of the affinity of God and man, the Mystics tended either to lose sight of the historical Jesus entirely, or to see in Him but one manifestation of the eternal Word. Jacob Böhme may be taken as their noblest representative. Böhme stood too near to the Christian faith to sublimate Christ, and see in Him nothing more than the type of a universal incarnation; but history and dogma are but the material of his all-embracing speculation. The Trinity represents for Böhme the thought that God has life and movement, that He is no abstract, changeless entity apart from the world, but a living God, working in and through all, the source and goal and spirit of all, the unity in which all contradictions are resolved. He interprets the dogma in a variety of ways. The Father is the abyss; the Son is the first fruit of desire in the form of will; the Spirit is the eternal out-breathing of that will. Or, the Father is the originating will, the Son is the power of love which the will generates in determining itself, and the Spirit is the will's eternal outgoing. Or again, the Father is the source of all powers, Himself the one all-inclusive power; the Son is the heart and kernel of all powers; and the Spirit is their living movement. But Böhme sees the Trinity everywhere: in the soul of man (power, light, and the spirit of understanding), in plants (power, sap, peculiar virtue), nay, in all things that conceivably exist—even in the burning candle with its heat, light, and ascending air. In similar ways Böhme descends on the Person of Christ,—His double birth, in time and in eternity; His double body, the heavenly and the mortal. In spite of their incoherence, one may gather from Böhme's writings a suggestion here and there, but so far as definite ordered thought goes, his vagaries resemble the play of shadows on a wall. His meaning may be profoundly spiritual, but his language is a perverse interweaving of physics and chemistry with ethics and theology.

In no century was the rabies theologica more pronounced. The scholastic extravagance of the orthodox doctrine did not fail to work injuriously and sometimes disastrously on the religious life, while the intellectualism of the more critical circles did not directly serve the growth of religion. For the evidence of true and sincere Christianity in Christ in this age we must look rather to the obscure and humble in the Churches, who found sustenance for their souls in a faith that surpassed all formulas, and which no scholasticism or criticism could rob of its transcendent power.

CHRIST IN MODERN THOUGHT.—1. The modern spirit.—(1) Its genesis.—The modern spirit manifests its characteristic modes of thought by contrast with the mediæval age. It carries to their ultimate result the tendencies that produced the Reformation and the Revival of Letters. It has revealed itself in positive and distinctive form only in our own day and after a long process. A brief general statement of the course that process took will serve to indicate at once its legitimacy and the extent to which it was likely to affect ideas of Christ.

In essence and at the outset the gospel appeared as a revolutionary idealism, inverting the old standards of excellence and the old criteria of truth, yet not outwardly revolutionary in its immediate aims. Continuous with this instinct grew up the mediæval mind. It is a mind which sees its ideals with the vividness of reality and in the same instant confesses the no less insistent reality of the actual, and the impossibility of transforming it as yet by the ideal. It is a mind therefore of compromises and contrasts. Familiar as a summary of the mediæval spirit at its maturity are these: (a) the contrast between this world and the other world; (b) the contrast between faith and reason, philosophy and theology; (c) the contrast between the secular and the sacred—which three are all aspects of one fundamental antagonism, that, viz., between the natural and the supernatural. The practical consequences of these are the common life and thought, the most consciousness of their baleful influence. What characterized that age was its fresh sense of the reality of this life and of nature, and of the interests of both. Baptized anew in mental and spiritual experience, its loftier minds were enabled to initiate those departures from the mediæval system which were destined to determine the most powerful currents of the modern spirit and which still rule modern thought. Modern thinkers frankly abandon the idea of irreconcilable difference between nature and the supernatural. They acknowledge no revealed thought that is not to be found in nature, and have in nothing which is not to be found in nature. They work in a spirit that there are not two worlds, but that there is one, that lives in both; that not the spiritual and the natural, but the spiritual in the natural, is the formula alone adequate to represent the truth. The modern spirit differentiates itself from the mediæval by conceiving the distinction between the spiritual and the natural not of separation but of unity. To the modern spirit, by force of insight into its deeper meaning is the ruling motive, the starting-point being experience—the experience in one life of both realms.

(2) Its characteristic impulses.—Only by a slow and gradual logic has clear self-consciousness of aim been reached. Among the contributory causes four are of special importance: the rise of speculative philosophy; the scientific movement and the application of scientific method in historical and critical research; the growth of socialistic theory; revived interest in the psychological processes that enter into the construction of knowledge.

In speculative thought the new point of view formulates itself in theoretic form under the name of the 'absolute' standpoint. Absolute here means that the universe is wholly knowable. The term does not exclude relativity; it only excludes an unknowable beyond all phenomena of being and action. It is a philosophy that must never be lost sight of, viz., that the absolute is not abstract but the highest concrete, and that it can be reached by confidence in the power of Reason. The idealistic systems of Germany, in spite of their excesses, did magnificent service by their imperishable vindication of both truth and spirit. The scientific spirit observes patiently that it may define truth as that which is the spirit which takes nothing on trust, and seeks a reason for everything. It ranges knowledge in diverse spheres according as the facts it studies fall within the perceptions of sense, or manifest themselves in history, or are known in personal emotion and insight. Each science rests on its own proper principles, obtained from a study of its own facts, without reference to ideas drawn from other departments. Only thus is it possible to bring into clear relief the specialities and differentia of the various kinds of knowledge, and so establish the contribution of each to final truth. The scientific spirit has given birth to modern History and Criticism. Social theory embraces the study of the social condition, all of which have been shown to be connected with the social situation and its effects on character. The social situation is an enormous factor in the feeling of man. Liberty, we are not dependent on the absence of social pressure. The social situation is the organ of personal character. The new intellectual movement is the latest conspicuous intellectual movement. It is the peculiar product of modern philosophy. Kant's achievement was to reassert against Thomistic scepticism the claims of reason; but also to limit the range: to show that there are elements in the mind which underlie the experience, and therefore cannot be derived from it; which elements are beyond the reach of Reason. In effect Kant showed that life is more than knowledge. That pervasion rules the modern world. The key to all problems lies in man; and the key to the nature of man lies not solely in his thought, but mainly in his will. The whole man is seen in man active. There is an enhanced idea of personality. That idea carries with it two others whose significance for religious reconstruction we cannot over-estimate. There is (a) the ethical character of man's experience; his life is the fulfilment of relations with others; (b) the revealing power of his experience; to the whole man in action and passion the inner meaning of things comes nearest.

Under the above mentioned impulses the modern mind has passed through the realms of nature, history, personal experience to a more complete mastery of knowledge. The effort has brought great gain to theology.

(3) Its influence on theological method.—Contemporary theological method aims illustrate the direct effect of the above forces in at least four directions: (a) towards a more scientific system of theology; (b) towards a better appreciation of the nature of religion; (c) towards insistence on moral principle as the determining principle in theological construction; (d) towards recognition of the 'social consciousness' as contributory to theological truth.

'Scientific' applied to theology signifies a new method. The motive here is to vindicate for theology a sphere of knowledge of its own, precisely as for any other science; and to assert and defend the right of theology to employ a method peculiar to its own facts, appropriate to its own sphere. The vindication successful, it follows at once that both theology and natural science may pursue each its own path, limited only by its own law, yet in perfect harmony. The antagonism between science and theology vanishes. The vulgar conception of the 'divine' indeed, vanishes too; but simply because the 'divine' has taken its place of an inherent Divine Spirit in nature and in man, both of which are moments within the Spirit of the Divine Being. The facts alluded to in the ethical and social constituents of theological truth reveal the partial character of the sources from which in the past doctrinal construction has drawn. The sources are two, the intellect of Greece, the polity of Rome. Greek philosophy and Roman jurisprudence, working on the Christian facts, yielded the orthodox formulas. The genius of Northern Europe had later to enter in and infect the conscience of the Church with its own deep sense of the sinfulness of the present age is its fruit. It offers a new method, the earlier age. It is an age less of intellect than of feeling; it is less objective, precise, actual, but more inward, refined, wistful. Ultimate explanations take with us a touch of what is subjective and personal. Personality is one of the dominant categories of the hour. It is just what may be looked for that theology should seek to interpret its problems in terms of personality. The new method is a radical departure from the old. It begins with religion as a personal life, and from that reaches, so to speak, to the life of God and the nature of Christ; it begins with the thought of God authoritatively given and passes on from that to religion. The new method can never reach belief in any attribute of the Divine Nature. It is a religious experience. Merely metaphysical truth in terms of 'substance' or 'essence,' as these are commonly taught, fail to satisfy. A sufficient self-revelation of God can be given only in a full personal life. Fresh grace is discovered in the conscience. What the higher nature of man, his Moral Reason, witnesses to, that is the sure guide to the apprehension of Divine reality and the true foundation of religious feeling. For in that nature man is at his best; there relation to God finds place, His revelation is received and His life shared. With the ethical goes pari passu the social. Society arises where the mutual intercourse of moral spirits is possible. The conviction has grown, in a degree unknown to earlier times, that such intercourse, realized in a true brotherhood of mutual service, may minister untold blessing to men. The 'social consciousness' is simply the growing sense of the power, the worth, the obligations of our intercourse with one another. From the intercourse of man with man, the communion of God with man is known. Growth in religious knowledge follows the laws of development. The word 'person' is a term that man has discovered. It is the deepest assurance comes to him as the outcome of his experience in life, as a person, active and patient, growing stronger as faculty springs up within him at life's stern challenge. Finite human experience, imperfect though it be, affords real if limited knowledge of the Infinite. And this knowledge is to be gained, not by putting ourselves outside of experience, but by contrast constructing a Being with which our experience is opposed to the human, but rather by seeking to understand experience, and to determine which alone is the true and the purposes it contains have permanent value. The religious transition of the last four centuries has been a slow but continuous passage from the Aristotelian principle, that there is no 'proportio' between the finite and the infinite, to the principle first adopted by the Lutheran divines, that the finite is capax infiniti.

2. Modern conceptions of Christ.—Modern conceptions of Christ vary according as one or another of the characteristic forces of the modern spirit predominates. We may range them in a threefold order: (1) the Christ of Speculation or the Ideal Christ, (2) the Christ of Experience or the Ethical Christ, (3) the Jesus of History or the Historical Christ.

(1) The Christ of Speculation.—Each of the transcendental philosophies involved a speculative Christology. The first phase appears in Kant (1724-1804). The work of Kant in religious theory is the work of a pioneer. His equipment was not rich enough in mind or heart for more. Hume, as he tells us, 'awaked him out of his dogmatic slumber,' but only in philosophy. In religion he stood in line with the previous age. He shared the unhistorical views of the 18th cent. and its 'rational' religion. What of personal religion he knew, he knew intensely, as the class to which he belonged, the poorer citizen class, knows it; but, like that class also, with narrowness. It was a Christianity of heart and will, as practiced among the common people, which was real to him. He stood quite outside Christianity in its ecclesiastical or mythical forms. Religious experience of any independent type, except as a department of moral life, he was unconscious of. He had no consciousness of God distinct from the dictates of conscience. Hence, when he came to rationalize his religious experience, the outcome, as was natural, was the simple translation into forms of reflexion of an imperious moral sense. The Kantian position is usually termed Ethical Deism. The extreme deistic view is, that creation is left to itself save for occasional Divine interferences. Kant's central doctrine is in harmony, asserting 'the absolute value of the ethical life. God having originally created man and endowed him with reason and free will, nothing further is necessary on the Divine side for moral advance or redemption. Each man, as a moral personality, rests entirely on himself, on his own reason and freedom, and may make moral progress quite independently. His moral consciousness is conceived as so absolutely self-sufficient as to have no need of outward aid, whether from Nature, or Society, or God. On this general idea he constructs his conception of Christianity and Christ in his treatise, Religion within the Bounds of mere Reason (1793).

He starts with the perception of conscience of a radical evil dwelling in human nature as an indubitable fact of experience. The return to good prescribed by the moral law can be accomplished only by a thorough revolution of the entire mode of thought which establishes a new character, one susceptible of good, on the basis of which progressive moral improvement is made possible. The means by which this change in man is effected is the ideal of the idea of moral perfection, for which we are destined from the first, is brought to a new life in his consciousness. But in no way can the ideal of a perfect man be pleasing to God be brought home to us more effectively than in the image of a man, who not only himself promotes the good by word and deed, but is also ready for the benefit of the world to endure all sorrows, since we measure the greatness of moral strength by the hindrances to be overcome. In the historical figure of Jesus this ideal appears. Jesus is the idea of a humanity well pleasing to God were first invested with power and obligation by means of an example furnished by experience; rather has the idea its reality in it, since it is founded on our moral reason. Only as an historical exemplar of this eternally true idea can such a figure as that of Jesus be presented to us. In Him the ideal of the good appeared in bodily form. When we believe in Him as the Son of God, the object of our saving faith is this eternal ideal of God-pleasing humanity, not the historical man; the ideal of which the historical man is but the highest representation. Incarnation is the 'personalization of the Moral Ideal.' Jesus first declared the moral to be the only saving, and afforded in His life and death an example of it. This exhausts the significance of His Person.

Opposition to Kant's interpretation of religion as mere ethics and of Christ as a Moral Example, impelled more genial minds like Hamann, Herder, Jacobi, and others to reactionary insistence on the immediacy of the religious consciousness and the speciality of the Christian revelation; but with neither critical nor philosophical depth. The direct succession from Kant appears in Fichte (1762 - 1814), who was impressed with Kant's results, started from them as a disciple, and later carried them to further consistency, and in so doing advanced decisively beyond them.

With Fichte, Christ was the first to apprehend the Divine, the first to recognize clearly and embrace the Divine will, and hence is the first to know God. The manner of His apprehending was peculiar to Himself. The immediate unity of God and man in the spirit in which religion consists, came to Christ not by speculation or tradition as it does to us, but by His existence. This knowledge of the primary and absolute thing, immediately identical with His self-consciousness. In Him, therefore, it may be said that God became incarnate. Fichte labours under the delusion of conceiving personality as a limit of the Divine nature. That God in becoming man might not annihilate but enhance personality and raise it to its true infinite capacity, had to be discerned. The attempt came with Schelling (1775 - 1854), whose philosophy is a philosophy of the Incarnation. His problem is determined for him by the conclusions of Fichte. According to the latter, the relation of the subject and object, human and Divine, is a unity of simple identity. But such an identity, it is to be noted, ignores the characteristic differentia of the human, i.e. that in the essence of the human which it is necessary to safeguard in its union with the Divine. The unity with which Christology is particularly concerned cannot be understood if the two members of the antagonism are not thought out purely by themselves according to their idea. The unity is not a true unity if the members of the antagonism are not united by that which distinguishes and opposes them. Those two considerations, the essential unity of the subject and object, and their unity in the midst of their differences, form Schelling's contribution to this high debate. Together they yield his doctrine of the Absolute.

Whatever is, nature and spirit, is within the Absolute. It embraces all reality. It is the meeting point,—the neutrum, the ‘indifference point,’—of subject and object, preserving the opposita alongside the negation for each per se. It is living, concrete, being by ceaseless self-birth—a creative unity, and on that very ground it is manifest in itself; to manifest itself.

The manifestation is not in any one form of finite limitation, but in the whole field of history. The finite or the historical is that in which the Absolute manifests the form in which the Absolute is finite. But since the finite is merely finite, it contains the Infinite. History is thus the domain of the Divine. The domain of history is the incarnation of spirit; history itself is the incarnation of God. Everything is explainable by this idea ; God in His growth (Werden) or the Son of God. Nature points to Him, and has in Him its final causes ; history unfolds the aspects of His life ; religion experiences Him as personified grace from personal evil.

The same is also the case of the Christian religion. Christ, in His historical individuality, is not the Son of God: the eternal Son of God is collective humanity, and what is true of collective humanity is not to be limited to Him. The Son of God is received when received as an isolated fact, but He is not all eternity, and is not to be interpreted in an empirical way. Christ, however, is in a sense the beginning of this incarnation; since without Him it could not have come to be or be known. In Him God first becomes truly objective. As such He is the archetypal Man, the universal ideal Man. None before Him revealed God in such a manner, and from Him all men since have learned. But He is not the God-man. Of peculiar significance is His description of Himself as the Son of Man, in which Christ declares His deity and His principle immanent in history. At one period He teaches that the Divine can manifest itself only in an endless series of finite forms, in the totality of which its inner essence is to be known. Here there are two points which reveal how far short of the truth of the ancient Creeds such theories fall. In the first place, the finite forms are a mere series of fugitive appearances of the Infinite, into no one of which the Divine veritably enters to abide: they can only signify the Divine. And secondly, so long as it is so the finite forms are essentially equal to each other: they represent a uniform series. On this line of thought the difficulty of appreciating Christ aright is insuperable. In the last and highest estimate of the finite forms which reveal the Divine. He gives them more substance and concrete content. He arranges and organizes them, not in a monotonous series, but in ascending scale according to the measure in which the Divine spirit rises victorious in each. He is thus enabled to point to the uniquethe contact of the objective world with the individual; an emotion which is prior to both thought and action, and animates both. It is this emotion which, as the centre of existence and the meeting-point of the individual and the universe, constitutes the religious principle of man. It is this not the mystical sense of the Infinite. Mysticism has always supposed that God can be reached only by means which are above the world and the ordinary experiences of life. The world of sensible objects and human interests to be a barrier between the soul and God; the way of perfection consists in escaping from all these until the impassioned soul in its upward flight loses itself in the formless and viewless light of God. Schleiermacher, on the contrary, teaches that the experience of God's real existence is not something apart from all the human interests of life. It can come through these interests only by deepening them. The roots that join man to God are the same as those that join him to one another and to Nature, only they go deeper. The religious experience, again, is marked by spontaneity. It is in every man with the original impress which his individuality gives it. Its range and variety are infinite. It may be shown to us, shining, as it were, through the beauty and glory of the world in which we live. Sometimes in sorrow and suffering it comes as 'a deeper voice across the storm.' So, too, it may arise when the presence of something true or beautiful or good uplifts us above ourselves. In short, everything visible and invisible, every part and event of experience, may become an appearance of God, and be a means of grace. Every experience may be a religious experience. A strong current of individuality is characteristic of religion. There is no such thing as an absolute religion. And there is no man without religion. Hence, too, the relation of the founder or teacher of any historic religion to that religion is intimate and necessary; the study of his life is indispensable to the true understanding of it and its

On the basis of these ideas Schleiermacher constructs his view of Christ and the Christian religion (Reden, and Der Christl. Glaube). Here the point of departure is Christian experience and the historic Jesus. For Schleiermacher there is not religion, but simply religions; the historical relationships of the religions he does not know. Every new religion rests upon a new intuition of the universe. Jesus of Nazareth had such an intuition. What was it? The idea of Christianity is stated, in the fifth Rede, to be that the ruin of the finite in its alienation from God is removed: 'ruin and redemption are in this mode of feeling inseparably bound up with each other, and form the fundamental relations by which its form is determined.' Christianity makes 'religion itself the matter of religion.' Christ discerned in all things the Divine element. He discerned at the same time an irreligious principle everywhere. And the clearness with which He saw the need and the means of overcoming the unspiritual by the spiritual constitutes what is specific to Him and His faith. What is Divine in Him is not His purity or originality of character; but the 'splendid clearness with which the idea He had come to represent shaped itself in His soul, the idea that all that is finite needs the help of something higher to be connected with the Deity; and that for the man who is entangled in the finite and particular, salvation is to be sought only in redemption.' 'This consciousness of the uniqueness of His knowledge of God and being in God, and of its power to communicate itself and stir up religion, this was the consciousness of His mediatorship and Divinity.' To those who come to know Christ it does communicate itself with salutary energy, so that they become new creatures: He is the cause of the new life. In this relation He is the ideal type of humanity, and possessed a unique perfection. The proof lies in the existence of the Church, on the one hand, and the inexplicability of His religious consciousness by natural forces. He is perfect in what concerns His religious consciousness; here He was what He was by a primitive communication from God, in virtue of which also He was sinless. Otherwise He was truly man and subject in all respects to the laws of human growth. Divine in a sense, He was not veritably God; had no pre-temporal being, or miraculous birth, or bodily resurrection. He is Divine simply in the unique and perfect satisfaction He supplies to the needs of the believing conscience; and in the unique and perfect manner in which He Himself realized this satisfaction in His Person.

The culminating point of Schleiermacher's theory is the affirmation of the supernatural consciousness of Christ and the absolute value of His Person. In this regard his influence on subsequent theology has been of rare fruitfulness. From a multitude who own his inspiration, two may be selected as having, in an original manner, corrected and enlarged his principles: Rothe and Ritschl.

Rothe (1799-1867) was probably the most eminent divine of the middle of last century. He maintained throughout his career, amid the strong intellectual and critical currents of that time, in all of which he shared, a personal faith of extreme warmth and tenderness in Christ's Person. 'Bear with you the living certainty of the reality of the historical fact Christ, and simply live your human life in the light of that certainty,' was the ruling motive of his inner life and also of his whole theological work (Theol. Ethik and Dogmatik).

Rothe takes his start with Schleiermacher in the consciousness, the feeling of God which is found therein. In the personality of man, this, the Divine principle, is at war with the lower or carnal principle, its contrary spirit. Not until the lower principle is free or truly human. Its conquest is the moral task of mankind. The task can be discharged only in a moral progress of two stages, in which the whole nature of the material principle shall have been transformed, and in which the whole nature of the spiritual principle shall display itself. The first stage involves the passage from sin. In the second, man will reach complete holiness. The first stage, Christ crowns it. With Him a new power, a miraculous force, which serves as the point of departure for a new development of the race. Here the moral evolution is at the same time religious, since the more subordinate the insistence of sin, the more direct the emergence of the spirit of holiness of the new power, the more perfect, i.e., the more divine. The new power of Christ is due to a new revelation, which is not so made that He cannot enter in. It does thus enter. In Christ He posits a new commencement of humanity; and in order to prepare for it Rothe admits a special revelation in miracle and inspiration. The new power, the advent of Christ, are by the same time the history of Christ was a con-secration; in actualizing the same time unfolds the substance of God comes its course is uninterrupted from His Calvary which is its triumphant close. Then He shall die; face to face with Him, the Holy Spirit shall be His spiritualization. His body shall be glorified with God the Father. He shall be seated in the heavens, and from His position shall invest with a body corresponding to His glorified state. His spiritual barrier now restrains His power. His Spirit shall have no more restraint on the world. The glorified Lord reveals Himself as 'central individuality' of the secret of the increasing triumph of the spiritual principle in the race to age. When the totality of His disciples are gathered, the revelation will be complete and the creation of the universe closed. At this stage God will live in the world. Let us see the origin of the individuality ('Aur diesem Punkte ist das Menschsein Gottes zu seinem Menschheitsein,' Dogm. ii. 179).

Rothe's is a grandiose conception of Moral Incarnation exhibited with imperishable vigour of thought. Christ is no incarnation of the mythical sort, as in the imagination of India. Nor is He as one of the Heroic age, such as most primitive peoples magnify. He is man truly, yet less individual man than man generic, while at the same time God, the potency that rules the whole world-process. In its cosmical significance the Christian interpretation of Christ has never before received so impressive a statement.

Less original than Schleiermacher or Rothe, Ritschl (1822-1889), taking impulse from both, elaborates a system less speculative, more positive and Scriptural. His, like theirs, is a doctrine of redemption, and rests on experience. He construes his material, however, by a widely divergent method. The critical results of T. . . . had affrighted him with their divorce . . . of Christ's life from the idea of His Person. The metaphysical and emotional elements in the idea of His Person current in the schools around repelled him. Ritschl had a singularly self-conscious and self-reliant character, and at the bar of the rich ethical experience yielded by the inner secrets of conscience his sense of the insufficiency of contemporary tendencies deepened. Injustice was done, he felt, to the historical and social and practical aspects of Christian truth. From that standpoint he directs a pungent criticism against the theological methods in vogue. They sought to construe Christianity by reference to the conception of God reached by a consideration of His relations to the finite world and human history and experience. Ritschl seeks the meaning of God as it is disclosed in the workings of the soul of Christ and in the activities of His earthly life. It was in that soul and in His earthly experience that the work of Christ in the salvation of men was achieved. Not in the heavens by transactions on man's behalf within the Trinity, as the orthodox schools taught; nor by His immanent operations in cosmic and human progress, as speculation dreamed; but in the moral personality and acts of the Redeemer. The process of redemption is not metaphysical or evolutionary, it It was not to provide the prior should release the mercy of God, on the one hand; or, on the other, to overthrow an enemy encamped in man. Yet it was more than the announcement as by a prophet that God had forgiven or was ready to forgive. Both Anselm and Socinus failed Ritschl. According to his view, what is meant by God in Christ reconciling the world to Himself is that when God took human nature in Christ He actualized the forgiving presence of God. God in Him was in human nature, not on a visit, not arranging the conditions on which it could be redeemed, but actually redeeming and appropriating it. Christ revealed the Father not by holding Him up to be seen, but by bearing Him in upon us, leavening us with Him practically and consciously. The field of Christ's work lay therefore in His own spiritual history, and among the conditions of spiritual human nature (cf. Forsyth, Religion in Recent Art, Lect. 7). This is Ritschl's first important deflexion from Schleiermacher's procedure. The Christian consciousness or experience to which he appeals is found in the contemplation of the historic Jesus, as made known in the Gospel records. It is not to be regarded in isolated individualism, as was the case with Schleiermacher's appeal to the inner consciousness. It has in consequence an objective character alien from his method and from the subjectivism and sentimental piety often accompanying it. There is a second deflexion of not less importance. The Christian experience to which Ritschl appeals is realized socially and practically in the Kingdom of God.

'There must be added [to Schleiermacher's] nant truth that this religion, like all religious activities, can only be rightly set forth in on the presupposition of the redeeming work exists as the starting and spring of this redeeming activity. Redemption, the Redeemer, and the Redeemed Community stand in an inseparable relation' (Just. and Recon. i. p. 495 f.).

Ritschl's doctrine of the Kingdom is specially worthy of study. The Kingdom of God in his view is at once (a) a moral ideal, (b) a social organization, (c) a religious good. The Kingdom and not the individual man is the object of the Divine electing love. To the Kingdom, the Fellowship of Faith, belongs redemption, which is appropriated by the believer only as a member of it. And he shares in it in the measure in which he discharges his obligations towards it; it is as he loves and serves his neighbour that he is justified of God. The reciprocal action and reaction of the community of believers engenders experience of Christ, by which men learn His worth for them. As the value of each is determined by his service to the whole, so is Christ's worth (equivalent in Ritschl's phrase to His nature in so far as it can be known to us) to be estimated by His work.

On such principles, what, then, is the worth of Christ? Christ has the worth of God. He is a prophet sent from God, yet more than all the preceding prophets of the OT. He makes Himself known as, and is, the Son of God.

In the moral world all personal authority is conditioned upon the nature of one's vocation and upon the connexion between one's fitness for his special calling and his faithful exercise of it. Accordingly the permanent significance of Jesus Christ for His community is based, first, on the fact that He was the only one qualified for His special calling, the introduction of the Kingdom of God; that He devoted Himself to the exercise of the preaching of the truth and or deviation; and that, in a proof of His meekness, He freely accepted in the wrongs which the leaders of the Israelitish nation and the f upon Him, and which were so Him

Second, viz., the Kingdom of God, is the Id, and is thus recognized by Chr The solidaric unity between Christ and God, which Jesus accordingly claims for Himself, has reference to the whole extent of His activity in His calling, and consists in the reciprocal relation between the love of God and the good work of Jesus in His calling. Now Jesus, being the first to realize in His own personal life the final purpose of the Kingdom of God, is therefore alone of His kind; for should any other fulfil the same task so perfectly as He, yet he would be unlike Him upon Him. Therefore, as the original type united into the Kingdom of God, He is the original G, so that the love of God for the members of His Kingdom is mediated only through Him. When, therefore, this Person, active in His peculiar calling, whose constant motive is recognizable as unselfish love to man, is valued at His whole worth, then we see in Jesus the whole revelation of God as love, grace, and faithfulness' (Unterricht, pt. i. §§ 21-22). There is a third consideration resurrection. These appreciation of Jesus and are apparent in the account of His life, are referred to in the confession of the Godhood of Christ which the Christian community has made from the beginning' (§ 24).

In sum, Christ's Divinity is confessed when it is seen that His will was in perfect identification with the Divine purpose in things or the will of God; and that He displayed in the moral sphere the highest Divine attributes. He is the Son of God by His perfect knowledge of the Father's will and by His perfect obedience to it. After this manner He fully revealed the essence of God; and that in the activities of a human life; and in a sinless human life. The Divinity of Christ is thus not based, as is usually done, on the supernatural facts of pre-existence, virgin birth, miraculous works, and resurrection. These, however, are not denied; only, Ritschl would contend, the right appreciation of their truth comes after the moral witness, from reflexion on believing experience.

Ritschlian principles and results have been the subject of violent polemic. It is with their broad effect only that we are here concerned. What that is, is obvious. Ritschl has brought back men's thought to Christ as the centre of Christian life. Christ's character as moral power, and to as the builder up of spiritual life by enlightening the conscience and educating the will. Religious truth can be verified by the moral sense. It is a question of fact; inner fact, no doubt, and not scientific, but truer than what is outward. But when the theological reasoner abandons the ground of fact and the safe circle of practical reason for the shifting mirages of speculation, then he uses words without meaning. Christian verity rests primarily on internal experience, and answers to the most urgent necessities of the moral life. It has, indeed, other relations and aspects that transcend experience and, consequently, our understanding. All that can be said there is, Exit in mystery. Ritschlian modesty is often misunderstood. But it has served to clear the ground within the range of spiritual experience, and floods this ground with light. There is no true doctrine that can contradict this light, or shelter itself from its penetration.

The influence of Ritschl is the predominant theological force of the hour. It is felt wherever the attraction of religious problems is felt. He is best interpreted, not as the propounder of a 'theology without metaphysics,' or a 'religion without mysticism' (for he properly is neither, but as an exponent of the 'Christian consciousness' of Schleiermacher. He closes so far the movement begun by the latter. That movement is familiar to religious thinkers in this country in the more sober theology of Coleridge, of Maurice, and of Erskine of Linlathen, who may justly be termed the guides of the higher religious thinking in England in the first half of last century. Coleridge (1772-1834), adopting Kant's forms of thought and imbibing Schleiermacher's spirit, introduced the fruits of their teachings into England, where thought was dominated by Locke in philosophy and Paley in theology. The 'Reason' of Coleridge is the 'Practical Reason' of Kant, which grasps the higher principles. Like Schleiermacher, he falls back on experience as the test of sacred truth. He believes Christian truth because it 'finds' him. Coleridge shared in all the characteristics of the German school from whom he borrowed. He was no metaphysician. He was a great interpreter of spiritual facts, a student of spiritual life, a subject of spiritual experience. He saw in Christianity the true explanation of the facts of our spiritual being. He brought human nature near again to Christianity. He changed the conception of Christianity from being a traditional creed till it became a living expression of spiritual consciousness. 'After him,' says Mark Pattison, 'the evidence makers ceased as beneath the spell of some magician.' The line of thought marked out by the disappointed reflexions of Coleridge was continued by F. D. Maurice (1805-1872), who had been influenced also by Erskine, and still more by his own inner conflicts. His best energies were absorbed in the interpretation of religious thought from the standpoint of the Incarnation. By it alone, according to his view, could our nature be sufficient for perfect life. Quite in the style of the later Ritschl, he rests faith on historic fact, and finds the essential ground of human life in the Personality of Christ as the Revealer of the Divine will and character. Akin, in like manner, is his insight into the social aspects of Christian truth, the spring of his abounding personal philanthropy, and the inspiration of that movement which had for its chief tenet the social utilization of religion, the movement of Christian Socialism. More apart and less orthodox stood Thomas Erskine, who recalls his friend Fichte in not a few touches of nature and conviction. He was no student as Coleridge, nor of practical bent as Maurice. Meditative and introspective, he sought the truth by patient thoughtfulness and deduction from his own experience—deeper thought, not larger knowledge. He brings out an aspect of the 'theology of consciousness' not emphasized hitherto, viz. that religious experience is a growing and endlessly growing inner perception.

The experiential movement has a second phase, which calls for some mention in its bearing on present-day ideas of Christ. It is a phase outside the Churches, although not always, or necessarily, hostile to them. It shows itself in the rise of ethical societies in America, France, Germany, Holland, and this country. Its aims are familiar to us in Britain from the writings of Matthew Arnold (1822-1888). Much theological liberalism moves in the same direction.

In the last forty years a succession of writers has maintained that while the moral and practical elements of Christianity are entirely commendable and necessary, its theology, as such, must be abandoned. The aspirations of such writers are not to be confounded with those of writers still more radical, well, of the kind that the ethics as espoused by such writers including men so widely known as the Darwinian and Maeterlinck. It is relevant to our purpose to say that this cannot be viewed as within the line of progress, but as a reaction. But without warrant. These societies, often divergent from one another.

Christianity and in the historical Christ, that is not purely moral and spiritual, with the mere swathing-bands which the spirit is to outgrow. Nurtured on the modern conscience, they have not drunk its deepest draught, that inner power of Divine mystery which deepens it as nothing else. The spiritual conscience, in its sense of sin and revelation of Divine pity and love, is unfelt. It is here, too, that so much 'Broad Church' religious thought fails. There is a liberalism which is only the rich and complex manifestation of the magnificent capacities of the Christian Faith claiming all life for Christ; and there is a liberalism which, when extracted from the haze which its upholders cast around it, is found to be, in its underlying postulates, totally inconsistent with the historic faith. It seeks a purely spiritual Christ. And when it has found Him, He is neither truly human nor Divine; He is at once a non-historical and a non-mysterious Being. Undogmatic Christianity is simply abstract theism. Against its empty abstraction of the Divine Spirit, and its anemic conception of Christ's Person, the experience-theology is a passionate protest.

(3) The Christ of History.—Concurrently with the foregoing movements has gone another, simpler indeed, and, since there are no truths which more readily gain assent or are more firmly retained than those of an historical order, more within the grasp of the popular mind, but also for that very reason more nearly touching the instincts of the popular faith—the historical and literary criticism of the Scriptures. It finds its sources and growth both within and without the ecclesiastical sphere. It is part of the general movement of science, the application of the methods of science, observation, hypothesis, and induction, to the facts of Hebrew and Christian history. It was not likely that the universal spirit of investigation and discovery should feel itself free to range over the whole field of secular history, and be restrained from operating in the departments of sacred. And so the Scriptures have been taken, as scholarship had already been taking the classical books of the ancient world, as a literature of many fragments and times, and of varying authority. Their commands and teaching and records, all alike have been judged according to the occasion and circumstances in which they were given forth. In other words, they have been interpreted, not absolutely, but relatively. The Bible, as to its text, structure, the authorship of its several parts, and its literary and didactic form, is read and understood like all other ancient literature. Then, too, from the theological fluctuations of the 18th and 19th centuries, special impulses entered. Religion, as Coleridge reminds us, consists of ideas and facts both; the Christian religion blends together inseparably the historical and the spiritual. The variations in religious and philosophical theory in consequence closely affect the character of historical study, and in an instance such as that of the Christian history, where the historical substance is large, with effects of the gravest kind. Further, the emergence of the hypothesis of evolution in scientific circles in the middle of last century, and its rapid acceptance and application to all kinds of knowledge, created a temper of naturalism, which reacted on Biblical criticism and Christological doctrines. Especially in the forms of Positivism (Comte) and of Agnosticism (Huxley and Spencer), this temper rejects every form of theism which asserts the personality of the Divine Being and the beneficent character of His relation to the world of men and things; and, professing itself ignorant of anything better, has lost all belief in any wisdom or love but that which springs from the brains and hearts of men. It is a theory which limits knowledge to experience, and experience to the physical senses—the sensations produced in us by the external world. It has its own view of history, and of Christian history, as a natural evolution. The new historical sense, combined with the new interpretation of Christianity, in terms of the facts of man's existence and human experience, incited to a re-reading of the Biblical records and a resetting of their material data, which has to an extraordinary degree stimulated the interest of the general mind, and most powerfully influenced the growth of a purely humanitarian conception of the Person of Christ. 'History,' says Mommsen, 'has a nemesis for every sin.' For seventeen centuries the facts of Christ's life had been carelessly or thoughtlessly treated: they were now to take em-

The process begins with D. F. Strauss (1808–1874). Strauss runs his theory through the Gospels like a ploughshare through a field of wheat. His interest is of a purely negative character. He dis-integrates the narratives and dissolves the facts in a series of writings, in which, with frankness and lucidity, he expounds what it has become common to call the point of view of modern science as to Christ's Person. His object throughout was polemical. It was to find a way out of supernaturalism. Whatever system furnished him with the means of attaining his object he eagerly embraced. In his first book he attacked the basis of the well-known distinction between the idea and the fact, and the historical, his mythical theory as a means of exit; in his last, Darwin and natural science come to his aid.

It is by his 'mythical theory' that Strauss is best known. 'Myth,' he says, 'is the creation of fact out of an idea.' The miraculous is a foreign element in the Gospel narratives of Christ which defies all historical treatment, and the conception of the myth is the means which we shall use in order to eliminate this element from our subject. The mythical principle is well expressed by Dr. Wille: 'When any record relates an impossible thing, it is to be considered, not as historical, but as mythical.' Strauss lays it down as an absolute principle that miracles are impossible, so that every miracle which is in discordance with the laws of nature is pronounced to be mythical. The narrative connected with the birth of John the Baptist are pronounced mythical. The prophet having afterwards played a great part, and having been found in relation with Jesus, the Church judged it appropriate to glorify him in this way. The two genealogies of Jesus have nothing historical about them: they are the work of Judaizing Christians, who believed that the Messiah must necessarily descend from David. The history of the birth, baptism, and temptation of Jesus is established. His supernatural work at the outset He undoubtedly wished to perform, but by degrees He came to believe Himself the Messiah, and hoped to found a political kingdom. He performed miracles; but could heal demoniacs, and on that account all sorts of marvellous facts have been attributed to Him. He did not die for our sins, or for the redemption of the world. He did not institute the Eucharist. The disciples, convinced that the Messiah would rise again in the tomb, had visions and hallucinations which showed Him to them risen again. Life did not exist in Christ in a perfect manner; He is not the ideal of humanity. The traditional faith is entirely without historical foundation.

The work of Strauss was continued with modifications peculiar to themselves by Bruno Bauer and others, and suggested the more serious labours of the Tübingen School, headed by F. C. Baur (1792–1860). The all-important problem was now the historical reality of Jesus. Baur, differing in this from Strauss, seeks a solution through St. Paul, and a critical investigation of the sources of Christianity. His theory shows the influence of the Hegelian category of thesis and antithesis.

In four Epistles—in Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and Galatians—we have, according to Baur, authentic Apostolic documents, genuine Epistles of Paul. They are our best authorities on every question touching the origin, nature, and principles of primitive Christianity. They reveal antitheses of thought, a Petrine and a Pauline party in the Church. The Petrine was the primitive Christian, made up of men who, while Jesus as the Messiah, did not cease to be Jews. Paul was a returned and Gentile Christianity, which aimed at universalizing the faith in Jesus by freeing it from the Jewish law and traditions. The universalism of Christianity, and therefore its historical importance and achievements, are thus really the work of the Apostle Paul. His work he accomplished in the face of, and in spite of, the opposition of the older Apostles. The men who had been with Jesus did not understand Him; Paul did by natural ability. Not the unity but the differences and antagonisms of the Apostles was the point on which Paul would do his work.

The memorials of the struggle and of which it was ended lie in the canonical Gospels. They are best understood

It is not easy to affirm what position Baur assigns to Christ. He is preoccupied with Paul. In a study on the meaning of the expression 'Son of Man,' he strives to reconstruct, by means of the historical data which the Gospels furnish us, the consciousness which Jesus had of Himself and His Messianic character, but the results at which he arrives are vague and contradictory. Sometimes he admits that the historian finds in Jesus certain characteristics which indicate that He possessed qualities unknown to other men; sometimes he affirms that it is less the original Person of Christ than faith in His Person that has been the basis of the historical development of Christianity.

Baur's picture of the early Church and of Christ is now everywhere recognized as utterly incorrect in its chief and essential features. Why is this? Simply because he was under the domination of a rigid philosophical system which narrowed his outlook, and prevented him from seeing a multitude of historical facts of a different character from those upon which he based his reconstruction. The scholars who have done most to secure recognition for those new facts are Ritschl and Renan. The essence of the advance made by Ritschl lies simply in the denial that the evolution of early Christianity was a purely immanent process, and in the admission of certain outside forces as determinative factors in the development. The cardinal factor assumed by him was the spirit of the Græco-Roman world. According to his view, the rise of the Catholic Church, which means the substitution of institutionalism, ecclesiasticism, and sacerdotalism for the spiritual individualism of the earliest period, was due primarily to the influence of the Græco-Roman spirit which came into the Church with the conversion of the Gentiles in the 1st cent., and which was thenceforth a controlling influence in its development. Essentially it is the work of a group of younger historians who have introduced still other outside factors, and greatly enlarged the historian's outlook.

E. Renan (1823–1892) was a Frenchman, and attracted for a time by German Idealism without settling in it, encountered influences which were to enlighten the obscurity that his Catholic education and German initiation had left in his thought. His special work was done in the Semitic domain.

A visit to Palestine in 1860 offered the occasion for a Life of Jesus. In reading the Gospel in Galilee, he tells us, the personality of this great founder had forcibly presented to him; and the first sketch of the book was traced in the sands of the Gospel history. It is no common book, but it is a masterpiece. It sketches a life of Christ which has won wide acceptance and acceptance. Jesus of Nazareth was a simple, unassuming, innocent, rustic saint, with a villager's childlike simplicity, and the glories of a court. He expresses in His parables about kings, says Ritschl, the most delightful naïveté and want of connaissance of the world, but with a religious fire of love, a burning faith in the personal apprehension of God as His Father, and that ardour to others to the same love of Him which gives force and breadth to the least experienced wisdom. His whole nature revolted against the hard and false sanctimony of the Pharisees. With regard to the Law, He had clearly accepted the teaching, then widely disseminated among the Jews, of the school of Hillel. But it would not be for even the widest interpreters of the Law, says Renan, that Christ could have felt any great fascination. The Psalms, Isaiah, and more recent Messianic literature had for many reasons a greater imaginative charm for His genius. From the Book of Daniel He drew the Messianic title 'Son of Man,' which, with a fine appreciation of His own exquisitely human genius, He reserved specially for Himself. Moreover, the attempt in these books to sketch the future course of history was the origin of Christ's own millennial dreams, and the source of much of His imaginative power over His countrymen. Then there was the freedom of His life in Galilee. 'That mountain summit of Nazareth where no man of modern days can sit without a troubled feeling about his destiny, there Jesus sat twenty years without a doubt. Delivered from self-seeking, the source of our troubles, which makes us seek for ourselves a place in the tomb, He thought of the human race. Those mountains, that sea, that azure heaven, those high tablelands on the horizon, were for Him not the melancholy vision of a soul which interrogates nature about its lot, but the certain symbol, the transparent shadow, of an invisible world and a new heaven.' Thus love of His spiritual Father, Hebrew poetry, the living spirit of the Law, the visions of a Messianic age that should include the whole race of man, His ignorance of science and belief in the plenary force of Divine volition, the political freedom of His time which scarcely interfered with individual action, the beauty of nature about Him, and His wonderful power of inspiring love in the simple men who came to Him—all tended to raise to the highest intensity, a character of marvellous purity. Jesus did not come 'stainless out of the straits of the East.' It was the instinct of genius for acting upon the world that led Him into the Messianic groove of thought. It was that that soiled His purity, though without it He never could have founded a lasting Church. If He had any or 'the universal Eastern fault of His race, it was the appetite for miracle on the part of the people. The demand for miracle He had to meet, and was not above getting up fictitious miracles as a sort of 'pious fraud,' e.g. the resurrection of Lazarus. The same necessity led Him into fanaticism, which eventually urged Him to death; 'the tone which He had taken could not be sustained; it was time for death to come and unloose the knot of a situation of the extremest tension.'

Renan's Life of Jesus is penetrated by a profound feeling of His human personality, its charm, its potency, its pre-eminence, its capability to create a faith. It has been shown to be inaccurate in details, and meagre and uncertain in its knowledge, especially of the Jewish environment in which Jesus grew up. It displays an excess of precision in the psychology of illusion, a too ready emotion, and a want of gravitas. Yet withal the book did this service, that it introduced into the reading of Christ's life on its human side a greater sense of reality than modern criticism had hitherto attained. For the action of ideas, as in Strauss and Baur, Renan substitutes the play of individual passion and character. The arid logic of the Germans is absent, and something of the wonder and beauty of the NT story is not wholly lost. It is here that the arrears in the 'scientific' or 'historical' Christ have most to be made up. The Apostolic conception of the Saviour, however uncritical and untrustworthy in details at the bar of modern history, embodies in that very supernaturalism which is the bête noire of the scientific mind, a spirit so potent as to seem to those who gave the record the most striking reality in His life. To reproduce that spirit in natural terms calls for a depth of feeling and width of experience which the critical movement so far has shown no signs of possessing. There hangs about its Christological creations such a rawness as to tempt one to the statement that it has not yet found the equipment adequate to its task. Christ must be interpreted from within. The interest of His life is in large measure independent of its historical framework, as the orthodox construction has rightly seen, and as criticism itself acknowledges when it starts from the teaching of Christ in preference to the events of His career. Higher instincts, therefore, than the merely intellectualist instincts of 'science' or 'history,' instincts akin to the poet's when he grasps the very spirit of poetry, or the artist's when his unique sensibility unveils a new revelation of beauty, are requisite for the life of Christ is not to be profaned. The supernatural is an unscientific dogmatism. Equally unscientific is the explanation of it as 'myth' or 'vision.' The supernatural in Christ took such a hold on the minds of those who gave themselves to Him, as to render them readier than otherwise to reduce His human nature in its interests. The supernatural in Christ is that in Him to which the Church has at all times clung as the sustainer of her intensest faith and hope. It has enriched and not weakened the life of the spirit. What is the secret? How explain the tenacity with which the supernatural in Christ has fastened on the conscience of Christendom? Is it not that it has shown at all times power to embody men's highest religious hopes and aspirations, and has satisfied them? And should this not strengthen rather than lessen belief in its reality? Science has here a problem not to be evaded. In reaching a solution, the trend science has recently taken cannot fail to furnish important data. A true 'philosophy of the unconscious' is a desideratum. Already we have learned many facts having an intimate bearing on the old 'supernatural' problems. What they suggest is that the depths of a single personality there may coexist parallel states of spirit-life; a consideration which, if vindicated, will make us pause before repeating the dogmas of negation which were framed with regard to simpler and narrower facts.

A sense of such necessity is apparent in the most recent phase of 'scientific' reconstruction of the life of Christ. The articles of P. W. Schmiedel and others in the Encyclopædia Biblica, the Jesus of W. Bousset of Göttingen (tr. Williams & Norgate), and the Jesus of Arno Neumann (tr. A. & C. Black), based on essentially rationalist principles, manifest an advance on the old rationalism. They seek the secret of Jesus in a psychological analysis. They are indeed in line with previous tradition in rejecting the integrity of the Gospels as a reliable source of information, and reducing to a minimum the available material on which to base their reconstruction. At their basis, in regarding the major portion of the written record as artificial, is the nature of pious legend and in asserting the impossibility of the claims Christ made for Himself an adequate foundation for such a superstructure as the Church reared in the dogma of His Divinity; yet they are confident where earlier effort was often in doubt; they are also more reverent, genial, and expectant. A firm historical foundation is acknowledged, and that both in facts regarding His Person and particularly in His words and teaching. They are met, too, which point to a 'sovereign self-consciousness,' worth to men more than kings and prophets had been, potent over present powers and offering promise of constant conquest (Bousset, Jesus, p. 96). 'He bound His disciples to His Person as never again one man has bound men.' His uniqueness is not to be confounded with singularity, but denotes unequalled excellence in goodness and greatness. He constrains not physically but psychically; He overpowers us inwardly by His spirituality, His purity, truthfulness, and love. He is the Master of the inner life. 'We may also speak of Him as "the Redeemer."' Not in the sense that His death was a propitiatory sacrifice without which the God of love would not have been able to forgive us our sins. Not in this sense: yet it was indeed His special work to redeem by guiding us from the letter to the spirit, from the feeling of a slave to the love of a child, from self-seeking to brotherly love, from the dominion of the visible to that of the invisible; and His death showed that He was ready and determined to offer in order to procure these benefits, not His labour only but also His life (Neumann, Jesus, c. 19). Not Divine, He is none the less not to be denied worship. The interest of the situation here created is vast. It is not only the new facts and the finer appreciation of them, but the plane in which they stand and the wide range of it. Scientific criticism has tapped a new source. Discussion of the philosophical implications involved in the wider range of facts discernible will lead thought to a new Idealism which, analyzing the 'transcendental' element in man more clearly, will the better and the more convincingly interpret the Divine in Christ.

In close association with the larger view of history and science in influencing religious ideas is the great democratic movement of the modern world. Our sense of growth in knowledge has reacted upon our anticipations and hopes for the social state of men. It is only natural that the relation of Christ to the social problem should have come to occupy a foremost place, and that the traditional Christian ideas should be greatly affected by it. Almost every variety of socialist aspiration has made its appeal to Christ. It is remembered that He pronounced a special Beatitude on the poor, called to Himself the weary and heavy laden, offered a personal friendship to the publican and sinner, commanded His followers to be helpers of men's material needs; that He was Himself of the poor, and denounced in unmistakable terms, if not the rich and capitalism, then their closest neighbour, Mammon. The situation in itself is of the deepest interest, but its Christological import is but slight. Christ's supernatural dignity is ignored. He is looked upon as nothing more than man, and even then as nothing more than a 'Social Reformer,' the 'people's man,' 'Jesus the demagogue,' an unmysterious human leader of the poor, claimed now for this school and now for that, according to the partial and prejudiced predilections of His sponsors. To the great majority the Christ of the Creeds is an object of complete indifference, if not of dislike, while the Christ of the Churches, of worship, and of believing experience, is unknown or scorned. The transcendence of the Divine Life depicted in the Gospels finds no echo in their hearts.

It remains merely to remind ourselves that these three movements of Christological conception are all needful. They are not to be separated or considered antagonistic. They are complementary, helping each other to the new and richer belief in Christ. That belief will exhibit the ideal content of Christ's Person as the sum of all experience and all existence, seeing Him in all Nature, in all the forms of Nature, in all human life, in the whole range of life's experience, as that in which they all alike find at once their living energy and their goal, the ground and the final end of the successively emerging and developing phenomena that we behold as Nature, History, Experience. It will not be like the older faith, a strange hybrid, compounded part of philosophy, part of history, part of moral effort; it will be the apprehension of a Person behind the facts and processes of all three, reached through the study of His working in them and the sense of kinship with and nearness to Him; who thus known will not be found to be summed up in them but rather sums them up in Himself, whose History no history has yet exhausted, whose Life not all the lives of men have outgrown.

CHRIST IN JEWISH LITERATURE.—In spite of the fact that Jewish literature covers the whole period from the time of Christ to the present day, and that the relations between Jews and Christians during that period have usually been far from friendly, the references to Christ in the writings of Jews are, comparatively speaking, few and unimportant. What there are do not add anything to our knowledge of the history of the life of Christ. Such interest as they possess is due to their significance as indications of the way in which Jews were wont to think and speak amongst themselves of the Founder of Christianity. And it is safe to assert that in general they did not often occupy their thoughts with Him. Whatever may have been the reason, they very seldom mentioned Him; and they seem to have neither received any direct impression, nor inherited any tradition of His spiritual greatness. The few allusions to Him contained in the Talmud and the contemporary literature are, for the most part, contemptuous references to one who deceived Israel, and who owed his birth to the unfaithfulness of his mother. But they are a mere drop in the ocean of the Talmud, and do not warrant the assertion of a general and bitter hatred on the part of the Rabbis towards Him. In the mediæval literature the scattered hints of the Talmud were developed into the book called the Tal d'oth Jēshū, which is a mere lampoon, and in some parts a very disgusting one. But there is good ground for saying that this book was not countenanced by the best representatives of the Jewish religion, and did not express their opinion. It is on a level with such misrepresentations of the Roman Catholic and Protestant religions as find favour with the ignorant and bigoted of the opposite party, but are regarded by the responsible leaders on either side. Instances are to be found in which leaders of Jewish thought in the Middle Ages have made reference to Christ in the language of civil courtesy, or even of appreciation. It is true that such allusions are mostly addressed to Christians on the part of Jewish writers, and were, perhaps, influenced by the thought of the danger incurred by plain speaking. But there is evidence to show that in writings intended only for Jews the writers could refer to Jesus without bitterness, and point out what they deemed to be His mistakes without blackening His character. In modern literature the chief Jewish historians write of Jesus as of a great historical personage; and though they, naturally, do not see in Him as much as Christians see, they try to present historical truth and to avoid national prejudice. It is only in modern literature that there is to be found a serious and deliberate Jewish opinion about Jesus, a real contribution to the study of His life and character. The earlier references illustrate chiefly the effect of persecution and mutual hatred upon the Jewish mind.

In accordance with the brief sketch just given, it will be convenient to treat the subject chronologically under the three heads of (i.) the Talmudic Literature, (ii.) the Mediæval Literature, (iii.) Modern Literature.

i. CHRIST IN THE TALMUDIC LITERATURE.—The period included under this head extends from the time of Christ Himself to the closing of the Babylonian Talmud, i.e. about five centuries. The literature comprises several works besides the Talmud, and falls chronologically into two main groups. The first group is that whose chief representative is the Mishna, the code of the Traditional Law completed by R. Judah the Patriarch, A.D. 220. To this group belong the Sederim, a collection of traditions known as Sederim, the Mishna, and the Midrashim known as Siphre, Siphra, and Mechilta. The second group contains the Gemārās, i.e. the commentaries on the Mishna made in the schools of Palestine and Babylonia respectively, and forming, together with the Mishna, the Jerusalem Talmud and the Babylonian Talmud. The Gemaras contain many traditions not included in the Mishna but contemporaneous with it; such a tradition is called a Beraitha. To this same group belong the earlier parts of the Midrash Rabbah, Pesikta, and Tanhuma, though the date of compilation of these is much later. The Rabbis whose works form the first group are called Tannaim, those of the second Amoraim; and it is usual to distinguish the two periods before and after the closing of the Mishna, as the Tannaite and the Amoraite periods respectively.

The question has often been raised whether there is any mention at all, in the Talmud, of the historical Jesus of Nazareth. Until recently, Jewish writers have usually answered this in the negative. They have pointed out that the person supposed to be Jesus is described as a contemporary either of R. Joshua b. Peraiah or of R. Akiba, thus either a century before or a century after the beginning of the Christian era. This is true, but it only shows the anachronism of the tradition. For the person so indicated is called variously Ben Stada, Ben Pandira, Jeshu, Jēshū ha-Nōtzri (i.e. the Nazarene), Jēshū b. Pandira; and what is said of this person makes it impossible to doubt that the reference is to the historical Jesus. The following passages decide the question:

Bab. Sanh. 107b, 'Jēshū ha-Nōtzri practised magic, and deceived Israel.'

ib. 108a, 'Jēshū ha-Nōtzri had five disciples.'

ib. 108b, 'There came in Jacob, a man of Chephar Sechanja, to cure him in the name of Jēshū b. Pandira.'

Bab. Sanh. 43a, 'On the eve of Passover they hung Jēshū ha-Nōtzri.'

It is not likely that there should have been a second Jesus the Nazarene, otherwise wholly unknown, who 'deceived and led astray Israel,' who was executed for doing so, who had disciples, and in whose name those disciples sought to heal the sick. It is now generally admitted by Jewish writers that the reference is to the historical Jesus. At the same time it is possible that the name Ben Stada did not originally refer to Jesus, although in the later tradition the two are identified.

It is suggested elsewhere (Christianity in Egypt, p. 345 n.) that Ben Stada denotes 'that Egyptian' who is mentioned in Ac 21:38; Jos. Ant. xx. viii. 6, BJ ii. xiii. 5. As to the meaning of the two names, Ben Stada and Ben Pandira, various explanations have been given, none has, in either case, been generally accepted (Bab. Shabb. 104b) explains Stada as equivalent to Stāth dā, 'such a one has been unfaithful,' and refers it to the alleged illegitimate birth of Jesus. But this is certainly not the original meaning of the epithet. That Stada is made up of the Latin words 'sta,' 'da,' and 'da,' is a mere guess, with nothing in its favour. Pandira has been explained as πανδύρις, or πανδύρις, or πανδύρις; but beyond some likeness of sound there is nothing to recommend these suggested equivalents. The riddle is as yet unsolved.

The Talmudic literature contains all that the Talmudic writers have to say about Jesus. The passages referred to will be found in full and translated in the present writer's work already mentioned.

Jesus, called ha-Nōtzri, B. Stada, or B. Pandira, was born out of wedlock (M. Jeb. iv. 13, cf. Bab. Shabb. 104b). His mother was called Miriam, and was a dresser of women's hair (Bab. Shabb. 10b, where 'Miriam megaddelah nashaia' is a play on 'Miriam Magdalaah,' i.e. Mary Magdalene). His husband was Pappus b. Judah, Pandira. She is said to have been the descendant of princes and rulers, and to have played the harlot with a carpenter (Bab. Sanh. 106a). Jesus had been in Egypt, and had brought magic thence. He was a magician, and deceived and led astray Israel. He sinned and caused the multitude to sin (Bab. Sanh. 107b). He mocked at the words of the wise, and was excommunicated (ib.). He was tainted with heresy (ib. 103a). [He] called himself God, also the Son of Man, and said that he would go up to heaven (Jerus. Taan. 65b; Jesus is not mentioned by name, but there is no doubt that He is meant). He made himself live by the name of God (Bab. Sanh. 106a, also anonymous). He was tried in Lydda (Tannaitic) as a deceiver and as a teacher of apostasy (Tos. Sanh. x. 11; Jerus. Sanh. 25c, d). Witnesses were concealed so as to hear his statements, and a lamp was lighted over him that his face might be seen (ib.). He was executed in Lydda, on the eve of Passover, which was also the eve of Sabbath; he was stoned, and hung, or crucified (ib. and Tos. Sanh. ix. 7). A herald proclaimed, during forty days, that he was to be stoned, and invited evidence in his favour; but none was given (Bab. Sanh. 43a). He (under the name of Balaam) was put to death by Pinhas the Robber (Pontius Pilatus), and at the time was thirty-three years old (Bab. Sanh. 106b). He was punished in Gehenna by means of boiling filth (Bab. Gitt. 56b, 57a). He was 'near to the kingdom' (Bab. Sanh. 43a). He had five disciples (ib.). Under the name of Balaam he was excluded from the world to come (M. Sanh. x. 2).

The several items of the foregoing tradition about Jesus are of various date. The Mishna does not contain the names Jeshu, B. Stada, or B. Pandira; so that it is not absolutely certain that Jesus is referred to in the Mishna at all. The Tosefta contains all three names, but not Jeshu ha-Nötzi. Neither Siphre, Siphra, nor Mechilta contains any allusion to Jesus. The main authorities, therefore, for such allusions in the Tannaite period, are Tosefta and the Baraitas embedded in the Gemaras. The Baraitas contain the statements that Jesus brought magic from Egypt, that he deceived and led astray Israel, that He was tried at Lydda and hung on the eve of Passover which was also the eve of Sabbath, that a herald proclaimed the approaching execution and invited evidence in his favour, and that he had five disciples. The statements contained in Tosefta have been noted above.

The tradition concerning Jesus appears to have started with R. Eliezer b. Horkenos; at least it cannot be traced earlier. R. Eliezer was the chief disciple of R. Johanan b. Zaccai, who died about A.D. 80, and was living in Jerusalem at the time when Jesus was crucified. R. Eliezer was an old man in A.D. 109, and died probably in A.D. 117. Both he and his brother-in-law R. Gamaliel (grandson of the Gamaliel of Acts) had dealings with Christians. The tradition passed from R. Eliezer to R. Akiba and from him to R. Meir, in each case from teacher to disciple. The tradition represented by R. Gamaliel passed to his grandson R. Judah the Holy, who also had in also the tradition of R. Akiba and R. Meir. This completes the Tannaite period.

In the Amoraite period the tradition is twofold, Palestinian and Babylonian. The former contains very little that is new. R. Johanan was a disciple of R. Judah before mentioned, and his disciple R. Abahu uttered the famous dictum: 'If a man say to thee "I am God," he is a liar,' etc. On the whole, the Palestinian Rabbis took very little interest in the tradition about Jesus.

The Babylonian tradition starts with Rab, who was a disciple of R. Judah; and though Rab himself did not add anything concerning Jesus, his disciple R. Hisha gave the explanation of the relation of Jesus to Stada and Pandira. It was he also who quoted the saying that 'Jeshu ha-Nötzi burned his food in public,' i.e. was tainted with heresy. A contemporary of R. Hisha and, like him, a disciple of Rab, R. Judah b. Ezekiel handed on the tradition to R. Joseph, who corrected the explanation of the name Stada, and mentions 'Miriam Megaddalah,' evidently supposing that Mary of Magdala was the mother of Jesus. R. Papa, disciple of Abaji, who received the tradition from R. Joseph, added the remark about 'her who was descended from princes,' etc. A few of the statements concerning Jesus in the Gemaras are anonymous, notably the story of His excommunication by His teacher R. Joshua b. Peraḥiah, and His punishment in Gehenna.

The Talmudic references to Jesus afford no ground for correcting the narrative of the Gospels. There is sufficient likeness between the general outlines of the Jewish and the Christian traditions to show that the same person is referred to; but it is very doubtful if the Jewish tradition rests upon a knowledge of the Gospels. It is hardly more than a careless memory, retained in unfriendly or indifferent minds. There is also no warrant for arguing, from the Talmudic allusions, that Jesus actually lived a hundred years before the time usually accepted as the date of His birth. An equally good case might be made out for placing Him a century after that date. Rabbinical chronology is to be used only with great caution; and the statement that Jesus was the disciple of It. Joshua b. Peraḥiah (who did live about 100 B.C.), is made in the Talmud without the support of any authority. Moreover, the story, as referring to Jesus, appears only in the Babylonian Gemara; the Palestinian version does not give the name of the disciple who was excommunicated. There is nothing to show how Jesus came to be associated, in the tradition, with the famous Rabbi of a century before His time.

It is from the Talmudic allusions to Jesus that the mediaeval caricature of Him was elaborated, which will be described in the following section. It is therefore important to note that the chief points in the Talmudic tradition which furnished the base for that caricature were His alleged illegitimate birth, and His character as a magician and a deceiver. The former is a coarse interpretation of the Christian assertion that Jesus was not the son of Joseph, while the latter is due to His reputation as a worker of miracles, and to the undoubted fact that He had created a serious dissension amongst the adherents of the Jewish religion.

ii. CHRIST IN MEDIAEVAL JEWISH LITERATURE.

—There are to be found in the Middle Ages a popular and a serious treatment of Jesus by Jewish writers in the Middle Ages. On the one hand, there is the book called the Toldōth Jeshu, which relates the story of Jesus as of a vulgar impostor; on the other hand, there are references to Jesus by Jews of repute which are dignified and respectful in tone, and show a real desire to be fair towards the Founder of that Christian religion whose adherents had inflicted such injuries on Jews.

(a) The Toldōth Jeshu.—In the printed editions this is a small book of some 24 pages, in which is told the story of the birth, public career, and death of Jesus, and the origin of the Christian Church. It makes no pretension to be a serious history, though it certainly does not deserve the torrent of abuse which its Christian editors have poured out upon it. It is merely a rather stupid and silly tale intended to tickle the ears of ignorant Jews, and to satisfy their contempt and hatred of the Christian religion by mockery of its Founder. To Christian readers it is, of course, highly offensive. But it should be remembered that the book was not written for Christians, and also that Christian treatment of Jews made such retaliation only natural.

What the origin of the book was is not certainly known. Traces of statements contained in it are found in the writings of Tertullian and Eusebius; but the first evidence of the existence of a distinct book of this character appears only in the 9th century. In the work de Judaicis superstitionibus, written about A.D. 830 by Agobard of Lyons, there is an extract from a written Life of Jesus, which has considerable likeness to the Toldōth; and a similar writing, perhaps the same, is mentioned by Rabanus Maurus in 847. The Pugio Fidei of Raynbrooke, written in the 14th century, mentions the whole of the Toldōth as having been 'wholly disappeared'; but it was, naturally, never published by Jews, or even acknowledged by them. Christian writers who succeeded in finding a copy speak of it as being obtained only by bribery. Rabbinate, p. 148) says: 'We procured a copy from a friend who bought it from a certain pagan for some 110 denarii.' The copies so obtained were written in Hebrew, and it is probable that the original language was German or French, the vernacular of the country where the book first appeared. The translation into Hebrew was presumably made in order to render the book accessible to all Jews.

In the case of a work which existed only in manuscript, it is inevitable that there should be considerable differences in different copies. S. Krauss, who is the chief authority on the subject, enumerates 22 complete MSS and 6 fragments of the Tôl'dôth, which he arranges in five groups, according to their points of resemblance. It seems likely that these were not all derived from a single original, but rather that the story, founded on the story of Jesus in the Talmud, was told and circulated orally, and in course of time written down by several hands in different countries. With the exception of the fragments, no existing MS of the Tôl'dôth appears to be older than the 16th century. There are five printed editions, the best known being those of Wagenseil (in Tela Ignea Satanae, 1681) and Huldreich, 1705.

A short summary may suffice to indicate the contents of the book; and for this purpose the Wagenseil edition will be followed. Johanan, a pious youth in Jerusalem, is betrothed to Miriam, the daughter of a widow. Joseph Pandira, of the tribe of Judah, forms a plan to seduce Miriam, and effects his purpose on a Sabbath eve. Three months afterwards, Johanan, learning the condition of Miriam, consults R. Simeon b. Shetah, and accuses Joseph Pandira. Having, however, no proof, Johanan deserted Miriam and went to Babylonia. In course of time Miriam bears a son, who is Jesus. The boy is placed under the tuition of R. Elhanan, and by his conduct causes the Rabbis to suspect his birth. R. Simeon b. Shetah reveals the story, and Jesus is expelled from the community. He first went to Upper Galilee, and thence to Jerusalem, where he contrived to learn the secret of the Ineffable Name (of God). By the help of this he worked miracles, and proclaimed himself the Son of God, born of a virgin. The queen of Jerusalem, Helena, believed in him, by reason of the miracles. The leaders of the Jews, becoming alarmed, set up Judas, one of themselves, as an antagonist to Jesus. They allowed him to learn the Name, and arranged a trial of strength between him and Jesus. The latter was defeated, and condemned to death, but made his escape. Judas followed him, disguised as one of his disciples, and contrived to steal from him the Divine Name, which Jesus kept written on parchment and hidden in an incision in his flesh. Jesus, in order to obtain possession of it again, went once more to Jerusalem. There Judas betrayed him to the rulers. He was captured, scourged, stoned, and hung upon the stalk of a cabbage, because no tree would consent to bear him. After he was dead, Judas stole the corpse and flung it in the ditch of his garden. The disciples, not finding the body, said that Jesus had risen from the dead. The queen believed this, and the Jews were again alarmed. The corpse, however, was discovered, and dragged before the queen at the tail of a horse. The Christians were furious against the Jews. One of the latter, Simon Kepha, undertook to solve the problem by completely separating the Christians from the Jews. He learned the Name, worked miracles; and, having thus gained the confidence of the followers of Jesus, proclaimed to them, in his name, new laws of religion. They accepted his teaching. Thereupon he withdrew into a town, built especially for him, where he remained, sitting upon a stone, until his death. After his death another Christian teacher arose in Rome, who annulled the laws given by Simon Kepha, and gave new ones, instituting baptism instead of circumcision, and the Sunday in place of the Sabbath. The new teacher, however, in trying to perform a miracle, was killed by a stone falling upon his head. 'So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord.'

The other editions follow, more or less closely, the line sketched out above, though in detail there is considerable variety. All of them describe the seduction of Miriam by Joseph Pandira, some with a disgusting relish of obscenity. The remainder of the story is variously embellished with wonder-working and low comedy, and that word-play in which Jewish wit delighted. There is not the faintest ray of genius, or the least sign of literary skill in any of the versions, or the slightest indication that He of whom the story was told was a great or a good man. If, as Krauss is bold to affirm, the Tôl'dôth was intended seriously as a history of Jesus, it says little for the intelligence of its author and its readers. It is rather the wretched device by which ignorant and persecuted Jews revenged themselves, and found a pitiful amusement in mocking the Christ of their persecutors. It remains, an unseemly relic of evil days, but still claiming a place in mediæval literature; and if it bears witness against those who wrote it, it does so no less against those whose cruelty drove them to write it (see Krauss, Das Leben Jesu nach jüd. Quellen, 1902, for an exhaustive treatment of the whole subject).

(b) Polemical references to Christ.—We pass to a pleasanter region of literature, one where mention is made of Jesus in terms which, if not such as Christians would use, are very different from those of the Tôl'dôth.

The references to Jesus in the mediæval Jewish literature, apart from the Tôl'dôth, are not numerous. The reasons for this seem to be two: (1) that in controversy with Christians the Jews were not disposed to say more than they could help upon a subject where every word was likely to give offence and draw down persecution upon themselves; and (2) that the Jews were well aware of the difference between the Founder of Christianity and His followers. Their main quarrel was with the latter; and in their theological arguments they defended the unity of God, and denied the Trinity, upon Scripture grounds, with hardly any reference to the actual Jesus. To the Jews He was, of course, only a man. To the Christians He was God; and there was no common ground between them, or any occasion for debate as to His personal character and the events of His life. The controversy between Jews and Christians was fought in regard to principles, not persons, and was further embittered by mutual hatred. The Jews, if left to themselves, would never have mentioned Jesus at all, though armed at all points against Christians. Even in their own writings intended for Jewish readers, they say extremely little about Jesus, and in what they do say there is no attempt to estimate His character. For them He is simply 'that man,' or 'he who is known.'

The foregoing may be taken to represent the general attitude of the mediæval Rabbis towards Jesus; indeed, it is found in much later times. It may be described in the phrase 'cold neutrality'; and it remained unaltered until the great Jewish historians of the last century made a serious study of Jesus as a figure in their national history. The attitude of Jews towards Christians began to change much earlier; but that does not come within the scope of this article.

The mediæval Jewish references to Jesus may be illustrated from the report of a disputation, held at Paris on June 25, 1240, between R. Jehiel and a certain Nicolaus Donin (fragment published by Wagenseil in his Tela Ignea Satanae, 1681). The Christian, who was a converted Jew, quoted the passages from the Talmud (described in § i. of this article) as evidence of Jewish blasphemy. The Jewish champion denied that these referred to the Jesus whom Christians worshipped:

'In truth, we have not spoken thus against the God of the Gentiles (i.e. Christ), but only against another Jesus, who mocked at the words of the wise, and did not believe in their words, but only in the written Law, as thou dost. And thou mayst know that this is true; for behold, it is not written "Jesus the Nazarene," but "Jesus Gereda." Moreover, if it had been he (i.e. Jesus the Nazarene), he not only did this, but also deceived and led astray Israel, and made himself God, and denied the essence (of religion). But, clearly, it was another man, who did not deny the written Law, but only the oral, and is called a min (heretic)' (p. 16 in Wagenseil). R. Jehiel also lays stress on the fact that the man of whom the Talmud speaks was a contemporary of R. Joshua b. Perahiah, while the Jesus of the Christians lived a century later (p. 21). He says that it is quite possible that both were called Jesus, 'just as there are many boys in France called Louis, who are not on that account kings of France.' Being solemnly adjured to declare his real thought on the matter, he says: 'As I live, and hope to return home in safety, we have not thought of him (i.e. Christ) that he should be "condemned to filth" (according to the Talmudic assertion), nor have we said these things concerning him' (p. 24).

A further illustration is found in the book entitled Juhasin, by R. Abraham Zacuth (b. 1504). This is a sort of dictionary of biography for the period of the Talmud, but containing also references to other periods. On p. 15 (ed. Filippowski, London, 1857) is the following notice of Jesus:

And the truth (is this) that the Nazarene was born in the fourth year of the reign of Jannai II., i.e. Alexander (Jannaus); this is the year 263 from the building of the Temple, and the 51st year of the Hasmonaeans, and the year 3675 from the Creation (b.c. 85). Although the Nazarenes say that he was born in the time of Herod, the slave of the Hasmonaeans, in the year 3760 (from the Creation), and that he was living 35 years before the destruction (of the Temple), being 32 years old, to our shame and to declare to us that at once, speedily, 40 years in advance, the Temple was destroyed for the guilt of what we did to him. But this is not so; for his birth was 89 years before the birth which they affirm. And the truth is that he was born in the year 3675, and in the year 299 (of the Temple) he was arrested (i.e. b.c. 49), and he was 36 years old in the third year of Aristobulus.

Sages of Israel, in the Nazarenes, have written that in the Talmud there is no mention of the Nazarene whom they mean. Moreover, in the chronicles of the Nazarenes there is a dispute amongst them as to the year in which he was born. There is a further reference in the same book, p. 86, where the writer deals with the assertion that Jesus was the contemporary of R. Akiba, his mother having been the wife of Pappus b. Jehudah (see above, in § 1). The writer decides against this, and says: 'According to the knowledge of the Nazarenes, the man who is known as in the time of R. Eliezer; and in the time of Aboda Zara that R. Eliezer talked of Jeshu the Nazarene. A few lines farther down the words, 'Ben Stada is the man who is . . . but they are not found in the passage to which he refers, nor are they mentioned by Rabinowitz.

It will be observed that the above passages deal only with the chronology of Jesus, and this is, with a few exceptions, the sole point on which the mediæval Rabbis enlarge in their references to Him. The reason is, of course, their desire to ward off the charge made by the Christians, that the Talmud contains blasphemous allusions to Jesus. The following references, which all deal with chronology, may serve to illustrate this side of the subject:

R. Abraham b. David in the Sepher ha-Kabbalah, 1195 (Neubauer, Med. Jew. Chron. ii. 53), R. Jehudah ha-Levi (Cusari, ed. Buxtorf, p. 240), R. David Gans in Zemah David, 1592 (edition of 1785, pt. ii. p. 125). The last comes nearer to the Christian date. He says: 'Jesus the Nazarene was born in Bethlehem, a "parsah" and a half from Jerusalem, in the year 3761 from the Creation, i.e. the year 42 of Augustus Cæsar. Abarbanel (Maj. Jeshua, p. 67*, cited by Eisenmenger, Entd. Judenthum, i. 239) maintains strongly the Talmudic date, and ends thus: 'And the wise men of that time bore witness concerning him, his friends and companions' (i.e. the friends of R. Joshua b. Perahiah, who was said to have been), 'and how . . . on of [another for] him, from the mouth of men who did not know him, and were not there? . . . And we will not depart from the truth and tradition of our fathers, who did not say this or that, and who related the facts as . . . or omission; and all this . . . theory is untrue.'

The fullest and most elaborate statements of the chronological argument, from the Jewish side, are those of R. Salman Zebi (cited in Eisenmenger, i. 231) and R. Abraham Perizzol (contained in the same work, pp. 250-253).

There are, however, one or two mediæval Jewish works which deal with more than the chronological argument. Wagenseil's Tela Ignea Satanae, published in 1681 (which is also in N. Vetus), composed by a writer in the 12th cent., as he supposes. Buxtorf, misled by the name, attributed the work to R. Lipman in the 15th cent., the author of another book bearing the same title, and also published by Wagenseil. The author of the older work was acquainted with the Gospels, and he ranged over the whole field of Jewish Christian controversy, refuting the Christians out of their own Scriptures. His arguments all tend to show that Jesus was not God; but it is worthy of note that he very seldom speaks of Jesus Himself. His quarrel is with the Christians, not with their Master.

Another work of a similar character is the Hizzuk Emunah (Munimen Fidei) of R. Isaac Troki, a Karaite, written about 1575 (printed by Wagenseil in the Tela Ignea Satanae). The author shows an even wider acquaintance with the NT than the writer of the Nizzahon possessed; and he mentions the fact that he read the NT in the translation made by Budnæus in 1572. He lays stress on the fact that Jesus stood much nearer to Judaism than His followers did; that He never claimed the title of God; that He said, 'I am not come to destroy the law and the prophets'; that He enjoined the keeping of the Commandments on one who would obtain eternal life; that He gave many precepts which His followers disregarded. He does not hesitate to admit a saying of Jesus as true, though he immediately turns it against the Christians. All through the book his arguments are directed against what Christians asserted about Jesus, hardly at all against what Jesus said of Himself. And he may perhaps be claimed as a forerunner of the later Jewish historians who have really tried to be fair in writing of Jesus, who have at least abandoned the attitude of cold neutrality, and have scorned the wretched mockery of the Tol'doth.

It will have been observed that nothing has been said of the opinion of Maimonides about Jesus. In such of his works as the present writer has been able to consult he has found no allusion whatever. Dr. M. Friedländer, in his work on The Jewish Religion, p. 227, quotes from Maimonides, but without giving the exact reference. He says: 'Jesus the Nazarene, who imagined he was the Messiah, was killed through the court of Law, . . . of Daniel, as it is said, "And the sons of the transgressors among thy people will rise in order to establish a vision, and will stumble." Can there be a greater stumbling than this? This is interesting as being more than a mere chronological note.

On the whole, the attitude of the mediæval Rabbis towards Jesus was one of indifference. Apart from the necessity of controversy or the exposition of their own tenets, they had little inclination or occasion to mention Him. In Him, as a man, they had no interest. Their tradition taught them that He was one who had 'deceived and led astray Israel,' and they would not be at the pains to show that, although not God, He was still a good man. Controversy with Christians turned mainly on the questions of His Deity and His Messiahship, and the Rabbis fought the battle with texts, while they left the personality alone. It is probable that the great majority of the mediæval Rabbis were utterly ignorant of what Jesus had said and done; they were concerned to defend themselves against the charge of blasphemy based on the Talmud, and for that purpose worked out the chronological argument. But only one or two seem to have had the courage to read the NT; and in studying their works, the present writer is inclined to believe that these Jewish controversialists had not altogether failed to perceive that Jesus was a great man. This may be a mistaken impression; it is at least a charitable one. We shall find in the modern historians a welcome change from the mediæval attitude towards Jesus; and to the consideration of those modern writers we must now proceed.

iii. CHRIST IN MODERN JEWISH LITERATURE.—

So far as the modern Jewish attitude towards Jesus differs from that of the mediæval writers, it is to be found in the works of the great historical scholars of the last century, and in a few utterances by liberal Jews at the present day. Apart from these, the influence of which, however, must tend to promote a truer view of Jesus amongst Jews, the mediæval attitude towards Him still widely prevails. New editions of the Tôl'dôth are still published, and find readers among the uneducated, in Russian Poland. And, as regards the educated, there is still the same cautious reserve which so far as possible avoids mention of Jesus. The late Professor Theodoros of Manchester, in a lecture on the Talmud, delivered in 1874, took elaborate pains to show that Jesus was not referred to at all in that work. And later still, Dr. M. Friedländer, in his book on The Jewish Religion, makes only the slightest reference to Jesus, and, so far as the present writer has observed, does not offer any opinion of his own upon the subject.

The first Jewish writer who fairly broke away from the traditional attitude towards Jesus was Grätz, in his Gesch. der Juden (vol. iii. 1856). He boldly declared (p. 224 n.) that in estimating Christianity the historian must take his stand on the historical, i.e. the critical, method. He made no apology for the shock which he must have given to the majority of Jews by his new departure. And he was not afraid to express high admiration for the character of Jesus as a man. He formed his views upon the subject mainly under the influence of Strauss and Baur, by whose help he was enabled to put aside as unhistorical most of the non-Jewish elements in the Gospel representations of Jesus, and to emphasize the strong affinity between His teaching and Judaism. Grätz claims that Jesus was, in the main, an Essene, as the Baptist also had been; that His whole purpose was that of a moral reformer, and that He had no intention of attacking Judaism, even the Pharisaic Judaism, as such, but only the depravity of those who professed it. The objections to this view are obvious; but the fact that Grätz presented a portrait of Jesus in which the Jewish lines were overdrawn and the rest nearly obliterated, does not lessen his merit as the first Jew who gave a real portrait of Jesus at all. Later Jewish writers have, on the whole, followed the lead of Grätz; some of the exaggerations of his work have been toned down, and more recognition has been given to the originality of Jesus; but the general outline of his work is still maintained, and in which Jesus was a high-minded and justly hated man, whose fate it was to be maligned and persecuted, and whose enemies were His own professed followers quite as much as His Jewish contemporaries.

The work of Jost (Gesch. d. Judenthums u. s. Sektens, 1863) shows less of exaggeration than that of Grätz, and perhaps even more of personal veneration towards Jesus. Jost's chief contribution is his indignation against the 'judicial murder' of Jesus. There was no regular trial, such as Jewish law required. There was only a high-handed act of violence on the part of the chief priests.

He says: 'We hold it to be historical honesty, without regard to misinterpretation, to give to the fact its right name, in order to throw the responsibility upon those fanatics who did such a deed by their own power. It was not the Jews who crucified Jesus. Thousands of them revered in Jesus their teacher and friend. . . . It is time at last to judge without prejudice the authentic records of the Evangelists, who relate the course of events in simple words, albeit according to traditions of very unequal worth. Only the most blinded partisan can wish to justify the crucifixion of Jesus as a necessary evil to burden afresh the whole nation, or its rulers, with the hateful deed of Caiaphas and his associates.'

J. H. Weiss (Gesch. d. jüd. Tradition, 1871, Hebrew) is interesting chiefly as showing how the radical influence of Grätz and Jost reacted upon the more conservative Jew. Weiss asserts the Essenism of Jesus (i. p. 232), and remarks that His deplorable fate was due not to His teaching, which was not new, but to the means which He took to promote it.

'For he claimed to be a prophet, and drew away many in Israel to believe in his Divine work and his miracles. And he said, before the multitude and even before his judges, that he was the Son of God. These three claims were the reason for all that was done against him.'

Weiss, beyond question, here puts his finger on the real Jewish grievance against Jesus—'He spake as one having authority, and not as their scribes.' Grätz and Jost had made it impossible for a Jewish historian to revert to the mediæval attitude towards Jesus; but one seems to hear, in Weiss, the echo of the ancient condemnation, 'He was a magician, and deceived and led astray Israel.'

The Jewish Encyclopedia may be taken as the authorized exponent of Jewish opinion, and in its 7th volume it contains a careful and critical article upon 'Jesus.' It is the work of three writers, Jacobs, Kohler, and Krauss; and is written with a full knowledge of recent Christian as well as Jewish history. It is admitted that, while the teaching and practice of Jesus were in many respects Jewish and even Essene, He yet departed widely in other respects from Essenism, particularly in His association with publicans and sinners. His attitude towards the Law, insisting on the spirit rather than on the Halachic development of it, is represented as not necessarily or essentially un-Jewish. He was, in fact, the representative of the Am-ha-aretz, the 'people that knoweth not the Law'—a rather acute remark. Weiss was right in pointing to His assumption of power and authority as the reason 'of much modern antipathy to Jesus, so far as it exists.' He did not, at least publicly, claim to be the Messiah; and His trial and execution were quite irregular. But, after all, it is freely admitted that 'a great historic movement, of the character and importance of Christianity, cannot have arisen without a great person; to call it into existence and give it shape and direction Jesus of Nazareth had a mission from God; and he must have had the spiritual power and fitness to be chosen for it.' That is finely said, and it is with one exception the fullest Jewish recognition of the greatness of Jesus that is known to us. That exception is contained in an article by C. G. Montefiore (JQR, 1894, p. 381 ff.). He there speaks of Jesus as 'the most important Jew who ever lived, one who exercised a greater influence upon mankind and civilization than any other person, whether within the Jewish race or without it.' . . . 'A Jew whose life and character have been regarded by almost all the best and wisest people who have heard or read of his actions and his words, as the greatest religious exemplar for every age.' . . . 'It may be asked, "Was Jesus an original teacher, and on what grounds does his originality depend?" Now there is no a priori reason why Jesus should not have been original. Jewish authors sometimes write as if there were an antecedent improbability in his having made any big religious or moral step in advance.' . . . 'A religious teacher might, I suppose, be called original who combined and collected together the best elements of religion existing in his time, emphasized those most important and fruitful, developed them, drew out their implications, and rejected or ignored other elements which either did not harmonize with the first, or which, though he and his contemporaries may have been unaware of it, belonged in reality to a lower level and an outgrown age. I am inclined to believe that herein to a great extent lay the originality of Jesus.* Mr. Montefiore's article shows how it is possible for a Jew to remain a whole-hearted Jew, while yet he feels a frank admiration and reverence towards Jesus. With his full recognition of the spiritual value of Jesus, the fullest that would seem to be possible without crossing the frontier of Judaism, we will close this study of Christ in the Jewish literature. (See, further, the histories of Grätz, Jost, and Weiss; Jewish Encyc. vol. vii., and JQR, 1894).

CHRIST IN MOHAMMEDAN LITERATURE.—
i. In the Koran.*—The earliest mention of Jesus Christ in the Koran is in ch. 19, the Suratu Maryam, which was delivered in Mecca. It refers to His birth—

"Make mention in the Book, of Mary, when she went apart from her family eastward, and took a veil to shroud herself from them, and we sent our spirit to her, and he took before her the form of a man. She said: "I fly for refuge from thee to the Lord, if thou fearest Him." He said: "I am only a messenger of thy Lord, that I may bestow on thee a holy son." She said: "How shall I have a son, when man hath never touched me? and I am not unchaste?" He said: "So shall it be. Thy Lord hath said, Easy is this with me, and we will make him a sign to mankind and a mercy from me; for it is a thing decreed." And she conceived him and retired with him to a far-off place. And the throes came upon her by the trunk of a palm. She said: "Oh, would that I had died ere this, and been a thing forgotten, forgotten quite." And one cried to her from below her, "Grieve not thou." Then came she with the babe to her people, bearing him. They said: "O Mary, now hast thou done a strange thing, O sister of Aaron; Thy father was not a man of wickedness, nor unchaste thy mother." She pointed to them, pointing towards the babe. They said: "We speak with him who is in the cradle, an infant?" It said: "Verily, I am the servant of God; He hath given me the Book, and He hath made me a Prophet" (vv. 16-24, 28-32).

The child is represented as miraculously speaking in defence of His mother. He claimed to be the servant of God to whom a revelation—the Book—was made. It is said that this refers to the Injil, or Gospel, revealed to Him whilst yet in His mother's womb. The infant's speech in the cradle is taken from the story of the Nativity of Mary, when she rests under it on the way to Egypt.

In Suratu'z Zukhruf (ch. 43), also a Meccan Sura, we read—

"And when the son of Mary was set forth as an instance of Divine power, lo! thy people cried out for joy thereat. And they said: "Are our gods or is he the better?" . . . Jesus is no more than a servant whom we favoured and proposed as an instance of Divine power to the children of Israel. And he shall be a sign of the last hour" (vv. 67-69).

The idolaters of Mecca put the question recorded in the second of the above verses to Mohammed, when he condemned their gods. The Christians worship as a God, Jesus whom you praise: do you, therefore, condemn Him as you do our gods? We are quite willing to let our gods be treated as you

* The form in which the name 'Jesus' appears in the Koran is 'Isā' (عيسى), which appears to represent 'Esau' rather than 'Ieshua.' A similar variety is said to be found in Mandaic documents. Mandaic Religion, 1889, p. 141; but this, like the form 'John,' may be due to Moslem influence. It seems unlikely, though not wholly impossible, that Mohammed may have confused the personalities of Esau and Christ; it is more probable that the Koranic form is due either to intentional alteration or to mishearing. Fränkel (WZKM iv. 336) suggested that the initial y instead of the final was due to a mishearing of Mohammed's part, whereas the other alterations were due to the fact that the word rhyme with Mūsā (Moses); and this accounts for the facts (cf. Sycz, Biblische Eigennamen im Koran, 1903, p. 62). It is, however, equally likely that the alteration was due to Mohammed's informant, who may have been moved by some superstitious consideration.

treat Him. This seems to be their line of argument, and it led to the emphatic declaration that whatever the Christians might think of Him, in the opinion of Mohammed He was 'no more than a servant.'

All the other references to Jesus Christ occur in Medina Suras. We give the principal ones in their historical order.

In Suratu'l Bagarah (ch. 2) we read—

"And to Jesus, son of Mary, gave we the Gospel, and made him a sign, with the Holy Spirit, and strengthened him with the Holy Spirit" (v. 204).

In the Suratu Ali Imran (ch. 3) there are several references—

"Remember when the Angel said: "O Mary, Verily, God announceth to thee the Word from Him. His name shall be Messiah, the son of Mary, illustrious in this world and in the next, and one of those who have near access to God. And he shall speak to men alike when in the cradle and when grown up, and he shall be one of the just." She said: "How, O Lord! shall I have a son, when man hath not touched me?" He said: "Thus will God create what He will. When He decreeth a thing, He is accomplished in it." And He will teach him the Book, the Law, and the Gospel, and He shall be an apostle to the people of Israel" (vv. 40-43).

It is said that Mary was thirteen or fifteen years old when the announcement was made to her. The commentators say that she was brought up apart to speak in the cradle, and later on to the Jews.

The phrase 'son of Mary' had become so fixed in Mohammed's mind that he puts it into the mouth of the Angel, even when he is addressing Mary herself. There are several interpretations of the words 'teach him the Book.' The most generally received one is that it refers to the Divine Book of previous prophets other than the Law of Moses. There is a curious saying of Imam Mohammed bin Ali Baqir—

"Jesus was so intelligent that, when nine months old, his mother sent him to school. The master said the Bismillah—"In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate"—which the child at once repeated after him. The Master then gave a number of words to be read, of which the first was abjad. Jesus wished to know why he should do this, upon which the master became angry and struck him. The child said: "If you know, explain; if you do not, listen. In abjad, a stands for Allah la ilah ('there is no God but God'), b for Bahjat Ullah ('glory of God'), j for Jalal Ullah ('glory of God'), d for Din Ullah ('glory of God')."

Mohammed says that Jesus was sent as an apostle to the Jews, in order to show that his Mission was limited, whilst that of Mohammed was for all people. In Medina, the idea of a Mission far beyond the confines of Arabia had now taken hold of Mohammed's mind, and he thus suggests by the reference to the limited Mission of Jesus his own superiority.

In v. 43 of the above ch. 3 a miracle is also referred to—

"How have I come," he will say, "to you with a sign from your Lord; out of clay will I make for you, as it were, the figure of a bird; and I will breathe into it, and it shall become, by God's leave, a bird. And I will heal the blind and the leper, and, by God's leave, I will quicken the dead."

It is said that the bird was a bat which flew away whilst they looked at it, and, when out of sight, fell down dead. Traditions also state that he cured fifty thousand people in one day, and raised not only Lazarus, but also Shem, the son of Noah, from the dead. The story of the bird was evidently suggested to Mohammed by the account of the creation of twelve sparrows from mud, recorded in the apocryphal Gospel of Thomas the Israelite.

In the same Sura the death of Jesus is referred to—

"O Jesus! verily I will cause thee to die. I will take thee up to myself and deliver thee from those who believe not" (v. 48). The commentary Ma'alim says that he died for three hours and then went up to heaven: others say it was seven hours. Jalalain says that God took him away in a trance. Others interpret it in the sense of protection from adversaries, or the destruction of evil which would hinder the ascent to the world of spirits. The difficulty the commentators feel over this verse is that it clearly contradicts Surra 4¹⁵⁵ which distinctly denies that Jesus was put to death. In v.⁵² Jesus is compared to Adam, that is, neither had a human father.

* By 'Holy Spirit' Mohammed means Gabriel.

The next reference is in Suratu's Saff (ch. 61), and is intended to show that Jesus had foretold the advent of Mohammed—

"O children of Israel, I have sent to you to confirm the Law which was given before me, and to give me an apostle that shall come after me" (v.7).

Mohammed here confounds the term 'Parakletos,' the Comforter promised by Jesus to His disciples, with the word 'Periklyto,' which has somewhat the same meaning as Ahmed, from the root of which his own name Mohammed ('praised') also is derived.

The next reference is in Suratu'l Hadid (ch. 57)—

"We gave him the Evangel,* and we put into the hearts of those who followed him kindness and compassion."

The next reference is in Suratu'n Nisa (ch. 4). It is a denial of the crucifixion of Jesus. The Jews are reproached for speaking against Mary, and—

"for their saying, 'Verily we have slain the Messiah, Jesus the son of Mary, an apostle of God.' Yet they slew him not, and they crucified him not, but they had only his likeness . . . they did not really slay him, but God took him up to Himself" (v.156).

Mohammed here adopts the view of Basilides, an early heretic, who affirmed that the spirit who constituted Jesus the Son of God left Him before the crucifixion. He did it to prove that Jesus was not really a man, but only the semblance of one; and this is opposed to the Koran as well as to the Gospel. Mohammed apparently did not see the inconsistency of adopting the views of Basilides. Another verse denies the Divinity of Christ.

"The Messiah, Jesus son of Mary, is only an apostle of God, and His word which He conveyed into Mary, and a Spirit from Him. Believe, therefore, in God and His apostles, and say not 'Three' (i.e. there is a Trinity). Forbear! it will be better for you. God is only one God. Let it be from His glory that He should have a son" (v.158).

In a later Surra, Suratu'l Maida (ch. 5), we read—

"Infidels now are they who say, 'God is the Messiah, son of Mary.'" (v.159). "When God shall say, 'O Jesus, son of Mary, hast thou said unto mankind—Take me and my mother as two gods besides God?', he shall say, 'Glory be unto thee, it is not for me to say that which I know to be not the truth'" (v.160).

Mohammed represents Christians as worshipping a Trinity consisting of the Father, the Son, and the Virgin Mary. The undue veneration paid to the Virgin Mary may have misled him in his earlier days, but he had opportunities of correcting his error; and yet in this the latest of the Suras he makes the charge. By this time his breach with the Christians was complete, he had no hope of winning them, nothing to gain from them, and so he either seeks to mis-represent their chief dogma, or, at least, takes no pains to ascertain what it really was.

In the same Surra we have a passage which has given rise to many traditions—

"Remember when the apostles said, 'O Jesus, son of Mary, is thy Lord able to send down a furnished table to us out of heaven?'" (v.112). "Jesus, son of Mary, said: 'O God our Lord I send down a table to us out of heaven, that it may become a recurring festival to us'" (v.114).

* By 'the Evangel' Mohammed evidently meant the revelation which he supposed Jesus received in the same mechanical way as he received the Koran.

Mohammed may have had some idea of the Lord's Supper when he recited these words, or of the love-feasts which were 'recurring festivals'; but the commentators do not so interpret it. Some say it was a parable, and that a table did not actually come down; but most consider that a real table descended. Jesus made the ceremonial ablutions, recited the names of God, and then said the prescribed prayers. After this he uncovered the table and found, . . . to one account, many kinds of food; . . . to another, a fish ready cooked, without scales or prickly fins, dropping with fat, well seasoned, surrounded with all kinds of herbs, and leaves on which were olives, honey, cheese, and so on. Jesus restored the fish to life, then caused it to die again, and fed one thousand three hundred persons with it. Still the fish remained whole. The table then flew up into heaven. The miracle lasted for forty days.

ii. The following traditions are ascribed to Jesus Christ are found in the Qisasul Anbiya or Tales of the Prophets.

One day Mary in the house of her husband had . . . urda behind which she intended to . . . Gabriel in the form of a beautiful young man appeared. Mary feared, and said: 'I seek protection of God from thee, if thou fearest.' Gabriel said: 'I am sent to thee from thy Lord that a beautiful child may be given to thee.' Mary said: 'Whence shall a child come to me, for no man has touched me, I am not an evil-doer.' Then Gabriel came near to Mary and breathed on her. Some say on her sleeve, others on her neck, some on her womb. Some say that this breath was a sneeze made by Adam and preserved by Gabriel.

Mary spoke of her conception to her cousin Joseph, who was to come into the house. He in sorrow expressed his doubts about her, and, on being . . . mind freely, said, 'There is no . . . seed, and no seed without a tree.' Mary said: 'If you say God at first made the trees, then they were produced without seed: if first He made seed, then seed came without a tree.' Joseph said: 'Is a child born without a father?' Mary said: 'Yes, without parents, just as Adam and Eve were.' Joseph assented, and expressed regret for the doubts he had entertained. Then Mary told him about the good news Gabriel had brought.

They say that Jesus in the womb spoke with his mother and said the Tasbeeh: Subhana' Ulah—'I extol the holiness of God.' When the days of her confinement drew near, Mary was told to go to Bethlehem, lest her people should injure the child. Mary and Joseph went, under the guidance of Gabriel. The pangs of child-birth coming on, she got off her riding animal and rested under a date tree. Then Christ was born. Immediately a spring appeared and angels bathed the child. It is said that Jesus said then to his mother, 'Do not sorrow, God has provided this fountain.' Then ripe dates fell at her feet, and she said: 'O Lord, Thou hast granted me sustenance.' The reply came, 'O Mary, thy heart turned to me, love for Jesus has come into it; be tranquil, sustenance will be provided, eat and drink and have joy in the Messiah.'

Then Mary said to Gabriel: 'If people ask how the child was born, what shall I reply?' He said: 'Say, "I have seen no man, I am fasting; I speak with none about it."' It is said that when the Jews found her and the child under the tree, they began to make a tumult and reproached her, saying, 'Neither thy father nor mother were evil-doers.' She replied: 'I am fasting to-day, whatever you want to know, ask the child.' They became very angry, and said: 'How shall we speak to the infant?' However, they asked him the circumstances of his birth. He said: 'I am the slave of God, appointed to be a prophet and a blessing in whatever place I may be, and He has ordered me to keep the fast and almsgiving as long as I live. I am not appointed a tyrant, but the peace of God is upon me from the day of my birth to the day of my death and resurrection to life again.' Having said this, he did not speak again till the natural time for an infant to speak arrived. Having witnessed the miracle, the Jews gave up their suspicion and reproach, and said that this was the prophet of whose birth the preceding prophets had spoken.

Then Mary went to Jerusalem, where, seeing the miracles done by the child, people destroy him. Then, by the order of took him to Egypt. Some say she went with Joseph and the child to Damascus, to the house of a rich man, who protected and provided for them. He nourished many lame and blind persons. At this time a very valuable article of his was stolen, and no trace of the thief could be found. Jesus said: 'Such a lame and such a blind man stole the thing.' When accused, the blind man said: 'How could I see to steal?' and the lame man, 'How could I walk to do so?' Jesus said: 'The blind man carried the lame man, who then from a shelf took the goods and divided the booty.' So the theft was found out.

Then Jesus, having received from God the gift of prophecy, returned to Jerusalem and invited the Jews to embrace the strong religion; but they were displeased, and only his apostles followed him.

It is said that the term hawari,* 'apostle,' comes from a word meaning 'to whiten,' and that the apostles were so called because they were fullers by trade. Jesus said to them: 'Just as you make clothes clean, so by faith in God cleanse your hearts from the dust of sin.' Then they asked for a miracle. Jesus took various clothes and filled a jar with them. Some time after he took them out, when they were all of one colour. These twelve men then believed in him. God told Jesus to tell people first, that 'God is one without a partner,' then to tell them of the coming of Mohammed as a prophet, and say: 'A prophet will come after me, Ahmad by name.' Then Jesus, wearing a woollen cloth, with staff in hand went here and there. At night he used a stone for a pillow and lay on the ground. His food was barley bread and greens. He cared nothing for worldly wealth. He never desired the society and friendship of women. His life was one of great simplicity. Seeing his fatigue in walking, his disciples brought him an animal to ride; but after using it once he returned it to them, for the anxiety of providing it with fodder was more than he could bear. They then wished to procure him a house; he declined it on the ground that if he lived long it would go to ruin; if he soon died, some one else would get it.

One day he saw an old man sitting by the grave of his son. Jesus, after two prostrations in prayer, said: 'O certain one, rise by the order of God.' The grave opened, and the corpse came forth and said: 'O Lord, why didst thou call me?' The Jews said: 'We have never seen such a sorcerer.'

It is related that God ordered Jesus to go to the king of Nasibin, a proud and infidel ruler. Jesus went with his twelve disciples, and on arriving near the place said: 'Who of you will go and announce to the people of this place my arrival?' James and Thomas and Simon Peter went. When near the place, Simon told the other two to go on and give the news, and he would wait; so that if evil should fall on one of them he might make some plan. Then James and Thomas entered the city, and cried out, 'Jesus the Prophet of God and the Spirit of God has come to the city.' The people seized Thomas and took him to the king, who said: 'Who has spoken here of a prophet, and God, and the Spirit of God? if he does not repent, I will kill him.' Thomas said: 'I will not repent. Let the king do as he wills.' Then by the order of the king the people cut off the hands and feet of Thomas, and left him in an unclean place. Simon then came and sought the audience of the king, and begged to be allowed to interrogate Thomas. He then asked him how he supported the statement he had made. Thomas replied that Jesus worked miracles, for the blind and lame and sick were healed. Simon said: 'Doctors do this; what other proof have you?' 'Jesus knows what people eat, and drink, and say in their houses.' Simon said: 'This too can be done by intelligence and hearing: give another proof.' 'He makes birds of mud, and makes them fly.' Simon said: 'This is simply magic: give another proof.' Thomas said: 'He raises by the order of God the dead to life.' Simon then said to the king: 'If this is so, it is advisable that your honour should send for Jesus, and see whether what Thomas says is right: if he raises the dead he is a true prophet.' The king approved, and sent for Jesus, to whom Simon told all that had passed. Jesus asked what miracles were called for. Simon said to heal the hands and feet of Thomas; then to state what each one in the assembly had eaten, and what stores he had; then to make mud birds fly. Jesus did all these things. Salman al-Farisi says that when all the sick in Nasibin were healed, the people asked Jesus to raise the dead. Jesus said he would do so. They came to the grave of Shem, son of Noah, and said, 'Revive him.' Jesus made two prostrations in prayer and prayed to God. Then by order of God the earth opened, and a person with white hair and beard came forth from the grave, and, having saluted Jesus, said to the people: 'Certainly, Jesus is a prophet of God. All of you should believe in him and obey him.' Then Jesus said to Shem: 'In your lifetime no one had white hair; how is it yours is white?' He replied: 'When I heard your voice, I thought the day of judgment had come, and my hair turned white with fear.' Jesus said: 'How long have you been dead?' He replied: 'Four thousand years.' Jesus wished to pray for his life, but Shem said: 'Again I must die, I have no wish to live on, if you will ask God to have mercy on me.'

One day when a crowd was following Jesus, they said they were hungry. The Apostles urged him to relieve them. This relief came in the form of a tray of God from heaven. When Jesus and the Apostles saw it, they offered thanks to God. Then Jesus said: 'Let the most pious one amongst you lift up the cover of the tray.' The Apostles requested him to do it. He did so, and then they saw on the tray a fish without bones from which oil was flowing, and round it were all kinds of vegetables, but there was no garlic or leeks. Near the head of the fish was some vinegar, and near the tail some salt. Round it were placed five loaves, and on each loaf were a few olives, five pomegranates, and five dates. Simon, on seeing this, said: 'This is heavenly food.' Then Jesus told the people to eat. The Apostles said: 'You eat and then we will.' Jesus said: 'I do not eat. Let the people for whom I obtained it eat.' Then the people ate. The sick, after eating this food, were restored to health. Multitudes ate, but the food was not less. It is said that for forty days this tray came down each morning and remained till mid-day. Then the word came to Jesus: 'Only the poor, the orphans, and the sick should eat.' The rich murmured, and God threatened them with punishment. Some said: 'Make the fish alive again, and we will believe.' Jesus did so; but they believed not, and seventy men perished.

A man came to Mary one day, and said: 'The king has said that a ryot each day is to make a feast for him and his army. To-day it is my turn, and I have not the means to do it.' Mary turned for aid to Jesus, who hesitated; but Mary said that aid would be a great favour to the ryot. Jesus then sent for the master of the house, and said: 'Get ready jars and pots, and fill up with water,' which Jesus changed into pure wine. In other pots cooked meat was found, and newly baked bread on trays appeared. The king wished to know where the wine came from. The man replied, from such and such a place. The king, knowing the wine of that place, said: 'Why dost thou lie? no such wine is there.' Then the man confessed that a devil had helped by his prayers provided all. The king then asked for Jesus, and said: 'The heir to my throne died a little while ago, restore him to life.' Jesus said that his return to life meant many evils to the country. The king said: 'Let the country be ruined if I only get one glimpse of him.' Jesus said: 'If I raise him, will you let me go in peace?' The king agreed; so the prince came to life, and Jesus went away. But the prince was a tyrant, and the people killed both father and son.

One day Jesus met a Jew with two loaves. The Jew agreed to share food; but when he saw Jesus had only one loaf, he hid one of his, and next morning appeared with one only, and denied that he had more. Then Jesus, when going on the way, asked a shepherd to feed him, who said: 'Tell one of my men to slay a sheep that it may be cooked.' Jesus from the skin and bones revived the sheep. 'Who art thou?' said the shepherd. 'Jesus, son of Mary.' Then Jesus asked the Jew where the two loaves were. He swore he had only one. Jesus remained quiet. At the next stage he had a calf killed, and they all ate of it, and again he restored the calf to life and gave it back to its owner, and again asked the Jew where the two loaves were. He again denied that he had two. They then came to a city where the king was sick and at the point of death. Then the Jew told the nobles that he could cure all diseases and even raise the dead. They said: 'Cure the king and we will give you much money.' He began to heat the king with his staff, and the king died. The nobles ordered that he should be hanged. Jesus, seeing this, said: 'If I raise your king, will you forgive my friend?' Jesus raised the king and released the Jew. The Jew was profuse in his thanks. Jesus said: 'Where is the second loaf?' The Jew said he had only one.

Jesus went one day to an infidel king like Pharaoh, and called upon him to embrace Islam. The king, being annoyed, determined to kill him. Jesus hid in a mountain cave, and after a few days told his disciples that this revelation had come: 'Truly I will raise thee up and bring thee back to myself.' The Apostles wept at the idea of separation from him. He said: 'You weep now, when the enemy comes you will forsake me.' They declared that they would allow no enemy to come near him, and would protect him. They also said: 'Will another prophet come after thee?' He said: 'Yes, of the Quraish tribe, an unlettered prophet, Mohammed, superior to me, will come. Tell the generations to come to follow him.' He then added: 'Now I make Simon my Khalifa (successor), all of you obey him.' They agreed. He said: 'After my death trays full of light will come, and by the blessing of that light you will know the languages of all tribes.'

Some say that the Jews, by the advice of that bad king, and by means of an old Apostle, seized Jesus and imprisoned him all night, and in the morning fell, and angels released Jesus from prison and carried him up on high, and took the old man prisoner. The Jews, thinking he was Jesus, quickly killed him, and he was crucified, though he protested that he was not Jesus, but the man who had betrayed him. The Jews did not believe it. All historians say Mary was then alive. Others say the Jews watched and guarded the cave where Jesus was, but Jesus at night was taken up under cover of darkness. In the morning the Jews sent a man to find Jesus, but he returned and said that no one was there. Then the Jews said: 'Thou art Jesus,' and crucified him.

Others say the Jews seized him with eighteen men in a cave, and said: 'One of you will assume my appearance. God will reward you in Paradise.' One agreed. Jesus ascended on high. In the morning the Jews said, 'There were eighteen men with Jesus; one is short.' The prisoners said Jesus had gone on high; but the Jews saw one like Jesus and crucified him. After a few days Jesus returned to the Apostles; then he died, but God restored him to life and made him like an angel.

It is said that at the last day, when Dajjal the cursed, with Imam Mahdi, collects the people at morning prayers, Jesus will appear on the Mosque at Jerusalem, and will descend to join Imam Mahdi, and kill Dajjal. He will engage in Jihad, or wars of religion, and bring people to Islam. Such will be his justice that the lion and the sheep will dwell together, and children will play with serpents. When Jesus dies again, the burial prayers (namaz-i-Janazah) will be said over him, and he will be buried in the tomb of Mohammed at Medina.

LITERATURE.—The Christology of the Koran is the subject of a considerable literature, which is best represented by the times by F. Schlegel, Die Christen im Islam, 1855. Somewhat later, by H. H. K. Hamburg and Göttingen, 1867. See also H. Preserved Smith, The Bible and Islam, New York, 1897; and the missionary tract 'Islam and Christianity,' American Tract Society, 1891.

In the post-Koran literature of Islam three classes of writers are occupied with the literature of Christ for different purposes. 1. The theologians.—These persons, so far as they argue with Christians, are compelled to discuss the Christian Gospels, against which they find objections or objections which they have popularized in recent times by Strauss. The remarkable treatise by Ibn Hazm (d. 1063 A.D.), published in Cairo, 1903-4, represents the extreme of negative criticism. The author refuses to trust the Gospels even for the names of the Apostles; nothing whatever, he holds, is known about 'Isa beyond the statements of the Koran. For the mode in which the Gospels are treated we may refer to St. Clair Tisdall, Muslims and Christianity, 1904. Ibn Hazm's view is not generally popular among Moslems; and some, such as Fakhr al-din al-Razi (d. 1209), a commentator of high repute, even use the Gospels to illustrate the Koran. This practice is imitated by the Egyptian mufti, Mohammed Abdo, from whom Islam expected so much in the commentaries which are published in the Cairene bi-monthly Manār. It is not unusual to find illustrations of the Koran from the Gospels in commentaries by authors who would not consult them; in such cases they are given after a chain of authorities going back to one of the companions of the Prophet.

2. The preachers.—The Moslem sermon ordinarily consists largely of anecdotes or maxims connected with persons of largely of anecdotes or maxims connected with persons of eminence. These include prophets; Greek, Roman, and Persian sages; companions of the Prophet; and Moslem saints. In the works of these writers the name of 'Isa figures very frequently, the sayings and doings assigned to him being sometimes traceable to the Gospels, but often assigned in different times to a variety of persons. A great quantity bearing the name 'Isa are to be found in the great homiletic encyclopædia called 'Revival of the Religious Sciences,' by al-Ghazali (ob. 1126 A.D.), whence they were collected and translated in the Times (Nov. and Dec. 1903, and Jan. 1904) by D. S.

3. The story-tellers.—The profession of these persons does not differ technically from that of the preachers; but, as their purpose is only to entertain, they may be distinguished from those who aim at reforming. The work of the story-tellers (1036) cited above, called 'Tales of the Prophets,' emanates from this class, whom the more serious preachers reproach for their mendacity (Le-muqatit of Abu 'Ala of Ma'arrak, ii. 77, Cairo, 1895). The stories told by them are often purely the product of their fancy, or some of them. The character of Christ, as it appears in Moslem fabrications, is modelled on that of the Sufi saint, who is a benevolent ascetic. Ibn 'Arabi (d. 1240 A.D.), the chief mystical writer of Islam, accounts for the mild, diffident, and non-resistant character of Christianity by the fact that its founder was fatherless. That Christ will return to judge the world according to the law of Mohammed is a text on which his 'Meccan Revelations' contain many a homily. The Christian doctrine of the 'Son of God' was attributed by ingenious Moslems to a misreading of Ps 27 'Thou art my Son,' in Arabic benayyja, which should have been read nabiyayyja, 'a prophet,' two words which, in the ordinary Arabic writing, are barely distinguishable (al-Bihar al-Musajjam). In the anecdotes told by the preachers, the Apostles are ordinarily made to address him as 'O Spirit of God' or 'O Word of God,' for both of which there is authority in the Koran. As has been pointed out above, the third Person of the Trinity was supposed by the Moslems to be the Virgin.

PAUL.—It is fortunate that our subject is limited for us at the outset. We are not called upon to consider the life and theology of St. Paul per se and in all their bearings, but only in that particular relation which is treated in a Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels. That aspect alone is momentous enough. The figure of St. Paul looms so large and fills so much of the NT that he may well seem to stand between Jesus Christ and the history of the Christian Church. 'The Apostle' was the name given in the early Church to the corpus of thirteen (or fourteen) Epistles called after him. And in the NT at least he does throw the other Apostles—or all but one—into the shade. The Epistle to the Hebrews, if not actually his, is allied to him in spirit. Even 1 Peter is impregnated with his teaching, however this has come about. If we are to believe many modern critics, we should have to number among his disciples the author of the Fourth Gospel and the three Johannine Epistles. The only two really independent books are James and the Apocalypse.

It is indeed well to remind ourselves that this state of things is in part appearance. We are always at the mercy of our evidence, i.e. of such evidence as survives. And while St. Paul has ample justice done to him, the Judean Apostles and the Judean Church have not. Still even this is a testimony to the energy and widespread influence of the Apostle of the Gentiles.

The fact remains that the dilated figure of St. Paul seems to bar the way between the subsequent history of Christianity and its Founder. And we are compelled to ask ourselves whether that history may not have undergone a certain amount of deflexion. In other words, Christianity in its first stage appears to have passed through a powerful medium; and the question is, whether that medium left it substantially unchanged, whether it still is what its Founder intended it to be. Two things strike us at once. One is, that the teaching of St. Paul, as compared with that of his Master, is highly theological. The teaching of the Gospels has given place to the teaching of the Apostles and statements of doctrine.

We shall consider the significance of this fact shortly; but in the meantime it rather forces itself upon our attention. And the second point is, that this Apostle whose influence has been so great was not one of the original Twelve, and was not himself a personal companion of Christ.

These considerations are enough to make the question before us one of some urgency. We shall need to examine with all the closeness in our power the nature of the relation between St. Paul and Christ, or—what almost amounts to the same thing—between the Epistles (as represented by their content) and the Gospels, as the two main divisions of the Christian half of the Bible. To do this methodically, we will break up our inquiry into the following heads:

- I. General character of St. Paul's teaching.
- II. Data of St. Paul's theology.
- III. Genesis of St. Paul's theology.
- IV. St. Paul's knowledge of Christ.
- V. Outlines of the Pauline theology.
- VI. Comparison with the teaching of the Gospels.
- VII. Legitimacy of the Pauline theology.

I. General character of St. Paul's teaching.

—1. St. Paul the first Christian theologian on a larger scale.—It is true broadly to say that St. Paul is the first Christian theologian in the more technical sense of the word. He is the first to formulate doctrine on any considerable scale. The first Christians had their simple formulations: such as that 'Jesus is Lord' (1 Co 12³), 'Jesus is the Christ' (Ac 5⁴² 17³), 'Jesus is the Son of God' (Ac 9²⁰), 'He died for our sins' (1 Co 15³), 'Christ rose from the dead the third day' (1 Co 15⁴), 'The Lord is at hand' (Ja 5³, 1 P 4⁷). Many of these occur in Pauline contexts, but in such a way as to show that St. Paul took them over from the common stock of Christian teaching. He no doubt added to and expanded these simple formulæ. In his hands they became a theology—not exactly a system, in the sense in which (e.g.) Aristotle's Institutes (Aristotle's Institutes are systems; for such coherent logical construction is alien to the Semitic mind, and St. Paul was thoroughly Semitic—but yet, at least, a body of reasoned and elaborated doctrines. In other words, the teaching of St. Paul is a great constructive effort of thought.

2. Place of theology in religion.—Now it is also true that at the present day, in certain wide circles, theology in this technical sense has a bad name. It is regarded as something hard, cold, and formal, possessing, perhaps, a certain relative truth for the age to which it belongs, but hardly beyond this, and in our own age only a stumbling-block and hindrance to religion.

But this is just one of those idola tribus that exaggerate a certain element of truth so far as to make it untrue. Theology is a necessity of life—for the few, consciously; for the many, unconsciously. It is like philosophy. Every man really has his philosophy expressed or implied. It is inevitable that it should play upon subjects of such supreme interest; inevitable that it should try to formulate its beliefs, and to bring them into relation with one another. And if it does not do this upon right lines, it will do it upon wrong ones.

It is therefore a mistake to place theology, as religious thought, in contrast with religious feeling, and to call the one warm and living and the other cold and dead. It is the nature of feeling to be warm, and the nature of an intellectual process to be by comparison cold. But the two things should not be opposed to each other; they rather supplement and complete each other. They appeal to different faculties; the one supplies material for the other. Each without the other is wanting; and it is together that they become an activity of the whole man.

3. In the teaching of St. Paul there is no divorce between theology and religion.—In the teaching of St. Paul there is certainly no lack of religious emotion. And it is not fair to concentrate attention upon one side of his teaching and to ignore the other. What can be more intense or more elevated than the feeling of Ro 8³¹⁻³⁹, or more exquisitely delicate than that of 1 Co 13? And passages like the first of these and Ro 11³³⁻³⁶ are striking examples of the way in which theological thought supplies the ground for, and passes into, religious emotion. The controversial argument of Gal. is not the most attractive part of the Apostle's writings; but how lovely are the pictures of Gal 5²²⁻²³ 6¹⁻²! And yet these pictures are in closest contact with his theology. Indeed, the sustained enthusiasm which is so characteristic of the Apostle is kindled directly by his convictions (2 Co 5¹⁴, Ro 5¹⁻¹¹).

II. Data of St. Paul's theology.—St. Paul's theology, then, was an effort of intellectual construction. And the first question that meets us is, What had he to build with?

1. Old Testament.—Like his Master, St. Paul had behind him the OT as an authoritative volume, a sacred book. He was himself to bear a part in laying the foundation of another sacred book; but this, after all, was but a second volume in continuation of the first, and which in course of time came to be placed upon the same level with it. The OT was the religious authority from which all Christians alike started. And yet new conditions had to be met in new ways. The Master boldly laid down a new law: 'Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time . . . but I say unto you' (Mt 5²¹ etc.). The disciple could not do this; but when, at a critical stage in his career, he found himself in collision with the letter of the older Scriptures, he showed great skill in turning the edge of the arguments directed against him, by the use of current methods of interpretation.

2. Contemporary Judaism, Rabbinical and Apocalyptic.—Generally speaking, the Apostle was in regard to the interpretation of the OT at the common level of his time. But he rose above this through his superior insight and strong grasp of religious principle. The OT really was a revelation from God and the work of inspired men; and by virtue of his essential kinship with these St. Paul was able to elicit from it deeper truth than his contemporaries. His methods are not exactly those which the Christian exegete of to-day cannot help adopting; but, as he had the heart of the matter, and the OT writers also had in their measure the heart of the matter, his interpretations are really in harmony with all that was best in them. We might take as an example his treatment of Abraham's faith. There are in the OT the two elements of Law and Faith; and their ultimate relation to each other in the counsels of God is not really different from that which St. Paul made it to be.

It was not, however, purely a question of interpretation. On the common level of the OT, the contemporaries of St. Paul had developed a number of inferences and ideas which the Apostle began by sharing with them. We may distinguish—not sharply, and as though they were mutually exclusive, but rather as at one time in alliance and at another in opposition—two main streams, the Rabbinical and the Apocalyptic. From the second century of our era onwards the former became more and more dominant, while the latter dropped into the background. And, even in the time of St. Paul, the official classes inclined strongly to Rabbinism; it was chiefly the freer speculation of the time that took the shape which is found in the Apocalypses. On both sides, along with much that was arid or fantastic, there was also not a little that was penetrating and beautiful: witness the Pirke Aboth on the one hand, and 4 Ezra and Apoc. Baruch on the other. St. Paul had at his command all this accumulated material, and he used it as it suited him. But he was not in bondage to it, and he applied it in connexion with root ideas that were peculiarly his own.

3. The teaching and life of Christ.—The touchstone that St. Paul applied to the current ideas of his day and . . . their bearing upon his own intense . . . Those which proved capable of assimilation to this he retained and worked into his own teaching; those which were not capable of assimilation he simply let drop.

We have spoken of faith in Christ; it is a further question how far this faith is related to detailed knowledge of Christ's life and teaching. We shall have to estimate the extent of this presently. For the moment we need only note that, whether in greater or less degree, St. Paul must have had some such knowledge, and that knowledge must have played some part in the construction of his theology.

4. Palestinian traditions.—Nearly all his knowledge of Christ must have come to St. Paul mediately, and not immediately. It seems a natural inference from 2 Co 5¹⁶ that the Apostle had at least had sight of Jesus during His lifetime; but it can hardly have been more than this, or his self-accusations would have been even more bitter than they were. We are coming very soon to the question of the information about Christ which St. Paul derived from others. But, besides this, there must have been in any case those simple formulæ to which we have already referred, in which the first disciples summed up their fundamental beliefs. We shall see later how St. Paul dealt with these; but they must at least have formed the starting-point of his own more adventurous and developed thinking.

III. Genesis of St. Paul's theology.—We have seen what were the materials that St. Paul had to work upon. The other leading factor that gave shape to his thoughts was the subjective habit and attitude that he brought to bear upon these materials. On this head, too, there are some remarks to be made.

1. St. Paul not an immediate disciple of Christ.—No doubt it is an important fact, and from one point of view a defect and loss, that St. Paul had not been a personal companion of Christ. And yet, when we look a little further, we can see a certain appropriateness that he should have come upon the stage as he did, and at the point where he did. Christianity consists not only in a particular body of teaching, but also in the working of great spiritual forces that flow from the incarnation of Jesus Christ. That is to say, it includes not only the teaching of Christ, but an estimate, or apprehension, of His Person and work.

From this side it was not altogether a disqualification that the Apostle's outlook should be directed forwards rather than backwards. The principle of Tennyson's well-known lines holds good, that the past does not present itself in a complete and rounded form to those who are actually moving in it. So we may well believe that the first disciples were for a time immersed in the details of their own recollections, and that their grasp on the whole as a whole was weaker in consequence. In . . . as St. Paul was less involved in . . . details, his grasp on the central idea of his faith seems to have been all the stronger. This may seem at first sight paradoxical; but there are paradoxes in the use which God makes of His instruments. There was a sense in which the knowledge of Christ after the flesh hindered rather than helped the apprehension of Him according to the spirit.

2. His temperament and training.—St. Paul was not one of those who need for their mental sustenance a great wealth of concrete details. He had the gift of religious imagination, to fill out an idea or an impression and convert it into a powerful motive. So the vision on the road to Damascus held his fascinated gaze throughout his career. It worked ceaselessly within, and dominated all his thinking.

And then we have to remember that according to the standards of his time St. Paul was highly educated. His bent was intellectual, and it was encouraged by his training. When he sat at the feet of Gamaliel, he must have heard problems discussed like the faith of Abraham, to which we have already referred, or the origin of evil desire in connexion with the Fall of man. These active discussions took with him the place that books do with us. St. Paul was learned as his age counted learning, and he could not help treating the questions that arose after the manner of the learned.

3. Spiritual experience.—But a deeper influence than learning was his own spiritual experience. Continually we see this living experience reflected in what comes to us as doctrine. St. Paul taught what he had first felt, and he verified his teaching by experience. We shall naturally illustrate this when we come to speak of his theology more in detail.

4. The teaching of history.—At the same time St. Paul was not a mere student, but an active missionary, who soon came to be burdened with 'the care of all the churches.' He had something else to do besides following the logic of his own thought. The controversy with the Judaizers was one important episode in his life; and this had a great influence upon the form which his teaching took while it was going on.

Later on, when the victory was won, when the free admission of the Gentiles was secured and Jewish churches and Gentile churches stood over against each other on an equal footing, the Apostle is able to see the Divine purpose running through the alternate acceptance and rejection, and to map out the periods of history as the balance swayed now to one side and now to the other. The letters of St. Paul all bear traces, more or less distinct, of the occasions which called them forth. If, as we believe, the Pastoral Epistles are his, their different tone and style can only be accounted for by the special object with which they were written.

For the sake of clearness we have tried to distinguish the particular causes that contributed to make the theology of St. Paul what it is. But because we have seen that these causes, we of course do not mean that only one was at work at a time. Very often two or more were at work together, subtly blended and passing into each other. The abstract distinctions that the mind creates always have about them something artificial; and yet history becomes clearer when the process of analysis precedes that of synthesis.

IV. St. Paul's knowledge of Christ.—We now come to the direct question. What means had St. Paul of knowing about Jesus, and what did he know? We will take the latter half of this question first, as being the less speculative, and as helping us to answer the first.

1. Extent of his knowledge.—We are speaking now of the historical Jesus, and not of the glorified Christ. And here we are met at the outset by exaggerated statements, that St. Paul had little or no interest in the historical Jesus, and knew little or nothing about Him. It is coming to be seen that these statements are exaggerated, and in recent years allowance is being made for knowledge on a considerably larger scale than used to be the case. See, for instance, the opinions mentioned by Knowling, The Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, pp. 201-204, 503-518). There are, however, certain points that we are obliged to leave undecided.

(i.) The most important of these has reference to the two well-known passages in which St. Paul appears to show detailed knowledge—1 Co 11²³⁻²⁵ (the institution of the Lord's Supper) and 15³⁻⁸ (the appearances after the Resurrection). Are these passages to be treated as just samples of St. Paul's ordinary knowledge—so that he might, if he had pleased, have described other incidents in the Lord's life with equal fulness and precision? Or are we to take these two specimens of detailed information as something altogether exceptional and abnormal? For ourselves, we believe that the first alternative is far nearer the truth than the second. The very precision with which the Apostle writes looks as if he were drawing from a well-furnished store. On the other hand, the paucity of the references proves hardly anything. There is frequently something that will seem to be missing in our experience of such matters—the points in which a writer quotes what he might have quoted. We have to remember that, if this one Epistle had chanced not to survive, we should have had no evidence that St. Paul possessed detailed knowledge of this kind at all. This, then, is our own belief; but at the same time, if it is questioned, we cannot profess to make it good to demonstration.

(ii.) We note further that there are express appeals to 'words of the Lord' in 1 Co 7¹⁰ and 9¹⁴. Besides these, there are coincidences of expression so striking as almost to amount to quotation in Ro 12¹⁴, 1 Co 4^{12, 13, 6¹ 12^{2, 3}}.

(iii.) Again, St. Paul shows a marked insight into the character of Jesus as it is described in the Gospels. He singles out exactly those traits ('the meekness and gentleness of Christ,' 2 Co 10¹) which the Jesus of the Gospels took as characteristic of Himself ('Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart,' Mt 11²⁹). Other allusions point in the same direction (e.g. Ph 2⁵⁻⁸).

(iv.) Really this insight into the character of Christ is part of a phenomenon that strikes us on a larger scale. The hortatory passages of St. Paul's Epistles show that he understood to a nicety the new religious ideal introduced by Christ. The ideal was really a new one. The insight into it was that of 'the poor' in the 'law or in spirit' of the Gospel (Mt 5³).

But even these were not free from vindictiveness; they were not prepared to say, 'Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you,' or 'If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him to drink' (Mt 5⁴⁴, Ro 12²⁰). It is not merely a question of verbal parallelism; the whole conception is really the same. It could not be more perfectly delineated than it is in 1 Co 13. When it is contended (as it is, e.g., by Wrode, Paulus, p. 91) that St. Paul is thinking mainly of those who are brethren in the faith, that is really not the case; his exhortations are in no way confined to the relations of the brethren to one another.

2. Sources of this knowledge.—That there is a real connexion, and a close connexion, between the ideal laid down by Christ and that inculcated by St. Paul cannot be denied; it is really one and the same. How did St. Paul acquire the knowledge of it? He must have done so in no merely transient manner; he must have had the ideal so completely set before him that it sank deep into his soul.

(i.) In spite of the independence which he claims for himself, we know that St. Paul had long and familiar intercourse with disciples, like Barnabas and Mark, and with others in the church at Antioch (Ac 13¹), who could not fail to instruct him as to what was new and distinctive in the teaching of Christ. In Gal 1¹⁸ he speaks of himself as paying a visit to Peter at Jerusalem and spending a fortnight in his company. Both there and in Gal 2² a considerable comparison of notes seems to be implied. There are sufficient indications of oral intercourse between St. Paul and the older disciples to explain the knowledge which he evidently possessed.

(ii.) Had he, in addition to this, anything in writing that he could refer to? He cannot have had access to our present Gospels; but is it not possible that he may have had in his hands one or other of the documents out of which our present Gospels are composed? The Mark-Gospel is excluded by its date; but not so the second main document, often called Logia, and known by the symbol Q. There is no reason as we can see, in this document to make it impossible for St. Paul to have had the opportunity of consulting it. If we are right in forming our conception of it from the passages common to St. Matthew and St. Luke that are not found in St. Mark, it would be a work of precisely such a character as would bring out clearly the new moral ideal taught by Christ. We may well believe that this was really the object with which it was composed—that it was a manual for Christian missionaries to put into the hands of their converts as supplying them with a rule of life. The principal argument against this view is that, if it was early enough to be used by St. Paul, it is difficult to see why it should not have been used by St. Mark. Some scholars think that it was used by him, but we should not like to commit ourselves to that alternative. The question must be left open.

On the other hand, the markedly individual character of the two chief specimens of the Pauline tradition, as compared with the Gospels, would go to show that the sources from which he drew were distinct from those used by our present Evangelists.

Y. Outlines of the Pauline theology.—As we have already implied, the great and central event in St. Paul's career was his conversion. It is this that really gives the key to his theology. It determined for him at once his conception of Christ, and the nature of his own response to the appeal which Christ made to him.

1. The glorified Christ.—The vision that he saw was of Christ glorified. In other words, Christ appeared to him as Spirit; and it is this spiritual Christ that henceforth controlled his experience. And yet, not that alone. The glorified Christ was none the less identical with the crucified Jesus of Nazareth. It is in this double aspect that the exalted Form that he saw made such an intense impression upon the Apostle.

2. Christ within.—The vision was for him; it appealed personally and directly to him; and he responded with all the ardour of his being. It was as if he clasped to his heart the image of Christ that he saw, and it entered into him and possessed him. Or, conversely, it might be said that the extended arms of the Christ whom he saw embraced and enfolded himself. These two ways of speaking St. Paul always treats as equivalent—to say that he clasped Christ or that Christ clasped him, that he was 'in Christ' or that Christ was 'in him,' meant the same thing. The same act had a Divine side and a human; and the one corresponded to the other. The process of which the Apostle was conscious in himself had to be repeated in his converts (Gal 4¹⁹). It is all a way of expressing the closest appropriation, assimilation, and union.

3. Faith.—In another connexion St. Paul calls the act by which he entered into this relation 'faith.' This act of faith could be expressed intellectually as assent to the proposition that 'Jesus is the Christ,' or that 'Jesus is Lord.' But any such process of the intellect was swallowed up at once in the warmer emotion of loyalty, gratitude, and adoring love. We must think of it always as love for One who is in heaven and not on earth, and therefore as at one and the same time love and adoration. It is this which gives its peculiar quality and value to 'faith,' as St. Paul conceived it. The impression that the Apostle received was so overpowering, that it seemed to make his whole life a different thing; 'a new creation,' he called it himself (Gal 6¹⁵); 'the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me' (2²⁰).

4. The death of Christ.—We go back to the Damascus vision. It was proof that Jesus of Nazareth, whose followers the Apostle in his blindness had persecuted, was no mere ambitious pretender, but all that His disciples believed Him to be—both Lord and Christ. But if that was so, the apparently shameful death that He died could not be really shameful: whatever appearance it wore in the eyes of men, there must really be in it a Divine virtue—a virtue infinite, because Divine.

Already in the infant Church, following, as we believe, hints of the Lord Himself, there was a tendency to explain the death of the Crucified by means of principles inherent in the OT, by the idea of sacrifice and by the idea of vicarious suffering; on the one hand, by the analogy of the Levitical sacrifices, and, on the other hand, by the description of the Servant of Jahweh in Deutero-Isaiah. St. Paul took up these ideas, and worked them out in his own manner: the sacrificial idea, especially in Ro 3²⁵ 5⁹, 1 Co 5⁷ (cf. He 9²²); the vicarious idea, esp. in 2 Co 5²¹. St. Paul also added a new explanation of his own in Gal 3¹³. This last might be described as somewhat Rabbinical; but the same cannot be said of the other two. The principles of sacrifice and of vicariousness are deeply impressed upon God's world; and that they should culminate in a supreme act of self-devotion has in it nothing incredible.

5. Justification and reconciliation.—The death of Christ established a new relation between God and man. It established it, as it were, objectively and ideally. For it to take full effect, man had to do his part; he had to realize the new relation in a reformed and regenerate life. But the Christian was allowed to He had not to wait for the Divine which was vouchsafed to him at once as soon as he became a Christian and was launched upon that career of amendment and advance to which as a Christian he was pledged. St. Paul uses a judicial term, and describes the convert from the first as 'justified,' i.e. 'declared righteous' or 'acquitted.' This is the Divine answer to the faith by which he makes his profession and has it sealed by baptism. By this decisive act the Christian enters at once into the circle of the Divine favour; he is received as a son reconciled to his Heavenly Father, as a prodigal returned. Henceforth his course is not one of weary effort and failure, but the way is smoothed for him and brightened by the Father's love.

This was one way of describing the process. Another way turned round St. Paul's characteristic manner of conceiving the relation of the Christian to Christ of which we have spoken. We have said that in St. Paul's own experience the vision of the exalted Christ was, as it were, clasped to his heart. The act was so intense and so absorbing that it amounted to a kind of identification: 'No longer I, but Christ liveth in me.' And yet this ideal Christ still wears the features of the historical Christ. It is the Christ who died and rose again. The Christian who is identified with such a Christ must himself also die and rise again—in such sense as he can, i.e. in a moral and religious sense; he must die to sin, and rise again to newness of life (Ro 6¹⁻¹¹); he must emerge from the imprisonment in which he is held by sin into the free and spacious life of the Spirit (see below).

6. Law and grace.—In his earlier experience, religion for St. Paul, as for the rest of his countrymen, meant primarily obedience to law; to be righteous was to keep the Law. But that was really an impossible task. The Law might command, but it could not secure performance. Human nature was too weak to keep up obedience to its rigorous behests. In the multitude of rules and precepts there were always some that were neglected. And to break the Law in any degree was to break it, and to forfeit the reward of well-doing.

It was otherwise with the service of Christ. Here the motive was personal loyalty and devotion, carried out under the conditions which have just been described, with the assurance of forgiveness, of Divine favour and Divine aid. Thus, whatever might be its outward conditions, the life of the Christian was one of inward joy and peace.

An incidental consequence of this new experience was that in his controversy with the Judaizers St. Paul was able to take his stand upon a broad ground of principle. He was able to contrast Christianity with Judaism as a higher type of religion, as a reign of Grace over against a reign of Law.

7. Developed Christology.—At this point we may turn to consider St. Paul's contribution to the Christian doctrine of God. So far as Christianity brought a change in this doctrine, it all arose from the recognition of the Divine nature and mission of Christ, and from the further consequences which that recognition brought with it. Jesus Himself had been the promised Messiah, though during His life on earth the full supernatural attributes of the Messiah were veiled and restrained. The Resurrection was the decisive proof that they were really there; and from that time onwards the little band of believers proclaimed openly the central article of its faith. It did so especially under the double title of Messiah and Son of God. St. Paul took over these titles in the full depth of their meaning. We have seen that for him the Messiah was especially the glorified Messiah. That was, indeed, since the Resurrection, essentially the case with all Christians, but St. Paul grasped his belief with peculiar intensity and concentration. Whereas, too, the title 'Son of God,' though literally and strictly meant, was used by the first disciples in a way that was naïve and unreflective, St. Paul evidently dwelt upon it, and pressed its full metaphysical meaning. He had clearly satisfied himself of the manifestations of Christ's Divine Sonship required nothing short of this. And then, as we might expect, he went on to make use of other terms that his speculative training naturally suggested, to illustrate and carry home the same fundamental idea.

8. God the Father.—There are three ways in which St. Paul adds to the doctrine of God the Father: (i.) By discriminating and correlating the spheres of Him whom we call God the Father and of Him whom we call God the Son. The designations were already current, and the tendency to discriminate or define all grew out of the Incarnation. There is not much set teaching, but there are many side allusions which testify to considerable activity of thought on the subject.—(ii.) By calling attention to the work of the Son as revealing the character of the Father. The whole scheme (so to speak) of the Incarnation proceeds from the Father, and therefore itself bears witness, more direct and more unmistakable than any other, to the love which underlies the dealings of God with man—to the love not only of the Son who becomes incarnate and who suffers for human sin, but also to that of the Father who sent Him (Ro 5⁸, 2 Co 5^{13, 14, 17, 18}, Col 1^{19, 20}).—(iii.) By pointing out in a sort of broad chronology the periods of the world's history (Ro 9-11, 1 Co 15²⁰⁻²⁸). It is, no doubt, possible to press particular expressions (such as Ro 9^{17, 18}) in such a way as to make them conflict both with the free will of man and with the justice of God. That was not at all the Apostle's intention, but only to enforce that strong sense of a providential ordering of successive events which must be felt by every religious mind.

9. The Holy Spirit.—The belief in the Holy Spirit was just shared by St. Paul with his fellow-Christians. The remarkable phenomena which they saw around them—speaking with tongues, exorcisms, and the like—were all in the language of the time naturally referred to His activity. St. Paul did but adopt this language, and then perhaps extend it, more than his neighbours were in the habit of doing, to phenomena that were less extraordinary but more deeply related to the moral and religious life (we remember that 1 Co 13 comes in the midst of a long passage dealing with gifts of the Spirit). It is noticeable that he—not alone, but in company (e.g.) with Lk. in Ac 16⁷ (RV)—expressly associates the Spirit, not only with God, but with Christ (Ro 8⁹).

10. The Church and the Sacraments.—It was obvious and natural that the blessings brought by Christ must hold good in the first instance for those who rallied to the cause of Christ, and ratified their adhesion to Him by confession and baptism. The society so formed could not but start with a position of privilege analogous to that of the Jewish Church under the old dispensation. But neither under the one dispensation nor under the other was that position of privilege given only to be selfishly enjoyed. For the OT see Is 23-4 11¹⁰ 19¹⁸⁻²⁵ 42¹⁻⁷ 49⁶, Mic 4¹⁻³ etc. It was just an instance of 'the purpose of God according to election.' The recipients of it were to be missionaries who were to carry the gospel to the end of the world.

This was always the ulterior object with which Christians were to use and enjoy their privileges (Ro 11²⁸ 10¹²⁻¹⁵). They might enjoy them, but they were bound to do what in them lay to spread them. Therefore, when St. Paul enlarges upon the felicity of being a Christian (e.g. in Ro 5¹⁻¹¹), it is in no spirit of narrowness or exclusiveness, but rather the contrary (as appears from ch. 11). The exhortations to the Church to organize itself as efficiently as possible, and to prosecute the Christian life to the uttermost, must all be taken with this tacit condition.

The two Sacraments belong to the internal life of the Church. They are neither of them due to the initiation of St. Paul. He found them in existence, and he fully appreciated them, and from time to time he dwells upon them in such a way as to show that he was well aware of their significance and value. St. Paul distinctly recognizes them as means of grace essential to the life of Christians. We cannot at all accept the view that he was the first to introduce repeated acts of communion; 1 Co 11²⁵⁻²⁶ implies that he found it a regular practice.

11. The Last Things.—The Epp. supply an important part of the evidence that the element of eschatology in the teaching of Christ, and in His own conception of Himself, was as large as we find it in the Gospels. The position as we go back in time to the earliest period is seen at its greatest. In 1 and 2 Thess. it is the main topic, and in 1 Cor. it is very prominent. It became less so as time went on, but even in the latest period it does not wholly disappear (Ph 4⁵).

The Pauline Epp. are even more important still from the part that they play in covering the transition from a form of Christianity in which eschatology is prominent, to one in which it has fallen into the background. In the later Epp. the basis of Christianity has been silently shifted; its foundations have been 'underpinned' by doctrines of more permanent applicability—esp. by the stress that is laid upon the working of the glorified Christ or the Spirit of Christ.

VI. Comparison with the teaching of Christ.—We are now in a better position to take a coup d'œil of the relation of St. Paul's mission and teaching as a whole to that of his Master. It has been rightly observed by more than one of those who have treated of the subject (see Knowing, Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, p. 514), that the Gospel of St. Paul begins where the earthly life of Jesus ends. The dictum needs son of man (as we have seen); but it is in the dictum. It means that the elaborate Pauline theology is of the nature of a development, so that what we have to consider is how and in what sense it is a development.

1. The teaching of Jesus as compared.—That this was the case, we may see from the easy and natural allusions to the character of Christ and of the Christian ideal (§§ IV. 1. (iii.) (iv.) above); (ii.) from the general position in the earlier Epp. on the subject of eschatology, which directly continues the attitude described in the Gospels; (iii.) and, in particular, from the conception of the 'Kingdom of God.' This last point is so important that we must give it a section to itself.

2. The Kingdom of God in St. Paul.—There is no exposition of the idea of the Kingdom; it is taken for granted as well known. There are several examples in Epp. of all dates in which the phrase is used in its ordinary future sense: e.g. Gal 5²¹, 1 Co 6⁹, Eph 5⁵. Similar to these is the use in 1 Th 2¹². But by the side of these are other passages in which the Kingdom is evidently present. Such would be: 1 Co 4²⁰ 'the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power'; in Col 1^{13, 14} it is the sphere of present forgiveness into which the Christian is translated; in Col 4¹¹ it has reference to the work of missions. But most significant of all is Ro 14¹⁷ 'the kingdom of God is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.' Here the Kingdom is entirely a present idea, and it seems to cover the whole range of the gospel. Nothing could better mark the transition spoken of above.

3. Pauline developments.—So far, the teaching of St. Paul has been just a continuation of the teaching of Christ. But in the outlines of his theology which have been sketched above it will have been seen that there is much which goes beyond this. This developed teaching has reference primarily and especially to the conception of the Person of Christ. Another new element is the elaborate psychological analysis of the process of belief, and generally of the Christian habit of mind. And lastly, as we have seen, there is certain special teaching that has grown out of the circumstances of the time.

4. Origin of the developments.—It would be an utter mistake to suppose that St. Paul's teaching as to the Person of Christ was a new invention of his own. We have seen that it was really nothing more than a further analysis of the meaning contained in the simple doctrinal formulæ of the primitive Church: such as that 'Jesus is Lord,' 'Jesus is the Christ,' 'Jesus is the Son of God.' It would be equally an utter mistake to suppose that the primitive Church was going against the will of Jesus Himself. There are indications enough that it was in no sense doing this. The only thing that has given any colour to such an idea is the great reticence and reserve that our Lord showed in putting forward His claims. There is something of a paradox in this. But that Jesus knew Himself to be both Messiah and Son, we may regard as quite certain.

It is true that St. Paul reflected upon these titles, and true that in all his teaching his own conception entered as a shaping force; but it is the reflection which gives to his teaching such depth of reality.

VII. Legitimacy of the Pauline construction.—It may be said, not without truth, by way of discounting these Pauline developments: (i.) that the methods of argument which are supported, especially the exegetical methods, are not always what we should consider valid; (ii.) that the personal experience on which they rest is exceptional and peculiar; and (iii.) that, in like manner, the conditions of early Christian history by which they were shaped necessarily had about them something relative and transient.

But, on the other hand: (i.) few positions are more true than the proverbial one, that conclusions are often more right than the explicit reasoning that leads up to them. Methods of proof are often of the nature of a scaffolding: the real purpose of which is to set up a construction in presentable shape, when it verifies itself after the fact by its own inherent properties in the experimental field of life.

(ii.) It is not to be denied that the personal experience of St. Paul has in it much that is exceptional, and that is far more because of its intensity along lines that are not those of other men, than because there is in it anything eccentric that disqualifies his experience from representing theirs. In other words, St. Paul was a religious genius of the highest order that human nature has ever produced—in the same category with the writer whom we call Second Isaiah, with Jeremiah, with many of the Psalmists, with St. John, and at a later date with that other religious genius, St. Augustine. We believe that these were specially raised up by God, and endowed by His Spirit with many marvellous gifts, for the express purpose of pointing out the way in which the crowd of religious men may follow, of setting before them an example of the heights and depths of which they may strive. We have only to think of the consummate beauty of the chapter on Charity, which, after all, is but the culmination of other passages that are strewn thick over the hortatory portions of the Epistles; and to remember, along with this, that such passages do but translate the theoretic side of theology into the activities of daily life.

(iii.) It might be said of each of the foregoing heads, and it may be said specially of that which turns upon the relativity of the teaching that emerges from history, that at most the objection does but amount to this, that the theology of St. Paul, so far as it rests on the grounds enumerated, is subject to the conditions of all things human. All things human are relative, and relative, in particular, to the age to which they belong. But in this class at least of things human, while there is the perishable envelope which is inevitably stripped off by time, there is no less something permanent as well, a permanent residuum or deposit—not always definable in words, but very real and very precious—which passes on into all the ages that follow. This we believe to be true pre-eminently of the first age of Christianity, and true, in a very high degree of the teaching of St. Paul. The world since his day—and not the Christian world alone—has drawn sustenance from it to an extent of which it is probable that, with all its eulogies of the Apostle, it has never been fully aware. There is a lack of Pauline teaching in the very best courses in a Christian's veins.

LITERATURE.—The subject of St. Paul in his relation to Christ has been much discussed in recent years, and that on critical and modern lines. The larger works are: Feine, Jesus Christus und Paulus (1902); Goguel, L'Apôtre Paul et Jésus-Christ (1904); and in English, Knowling, Witness of the Epistles (1892), and The Testimony of St. Paul to Christ (1905). Dr. Knowling's two books are written with exhaustive knowledge, and with his invariable lucidity and accuracy of statement and admirable temper; they cover a wide extent of surface, and all that can be said on the other side is that, perhaps owing to some defect of construction, they may seem to be more upon the surface than they really are. There is a crowd of smaller tracts and articles, for the most part dating from the last two or three years. Among these may be mentioned: H. J. Holtzmann, 'Jesus und Paulus' in Prot. Monatschrift (1900); Kolbing, Die geistige Entwicklung der Person Jesus auf Paulus (1906); Wrede, Paulus (1907); Jülicher, P.

Of these, the writer thinks that he has derived most from the two tracts of Wrede and Jülicher—from Wrede

St. Paul: his writings are all marked by very great sincerity; and his sincerity takes the form of bringing all the objections that the natural man of the twentieth century might be moved to bring. Wrede's striking career was cut short somewhat abruptly on 23rd Nov. 1906. Jülicher's pamphlet the writer believes to be one of the very best productions of its author; when allowance is made for the position, it is full of sympathy and insight. Kaftan is also very good, but not quite so good in the second part of his little treatise as in the first. The anon. work, The Fifth Gospel: being the Pauline Interpretation of the Christ (1907), and Dr Bosc, The Gosp. acc. to St. Paul (1907), may also be recommended.
