GENESIS

Introduction

Title

The title Genesis comes from the Greek translation (the Septuagint) and means ‘origin, source, creation’, whereas the Hebrew title (taken from the book’s opening words) is ‘In the beginning’. Both titles aptly suggest the book’s subject-matter, for it describes the origins of the universe, the world, mankind, human institutions (such as marriage), the nations and, above all, the people of Israel. God’s creative work in bringing all these things into being is focused in Genesis.

Another title, now more rarely used, is ‘The First Book of Moses’. This title highlights the fact that Genesis is the first part of a five-volume work, traditionally ascribed to Moses, otherwise called the Law or the Pentateuch. Genesis puts the lawgiving at Sinai (the subject-matter of Exodus to Deuteronomy) into historical perspective and provides a theological key to the interpretation of the laws and stories contained in those books.

Place and contents

Like the other books of the Bible, Genesis is primarily theological, i.e. it is concerned with describing who God is, how and why he acts and how he deals with mankind. Often the activity of God in human affairs is not obvious, either in our everyday life or even in some parts of the Bible (e.g. the book of Esther). But in Genesis, especially in the early chapters, God is the central actor. Here he constantly speaks and acts, displaying his power and character. Modern Christian readers, brought up to believe in one all-powerful holy God, may not be surprised by the religious content of Genesis. But ancient readers, coming to the book from a background of the many gods of paganism, would have been astonished by it.

The God of Genesis is not one of many localized gods of limited knowledge and power but the almighty Creator of the whole universe and Lord and Judge of all. It is this God who created mankind, cares for them and judges their misdeeds. It is this God who spoke to Abraham, prompting him to leave his homeland, settle in Canaan (the land of Israel) and bring up his family there. God promised Abraham that his descendants would dwell in Canaan, and Genesis records how, despite numerous mistakes, these promises gradually began to be realized. In the following biblical books a more complete fulfilment of these promises is described. It is this divine perspective that gives Genesis its unity and is central to the author’s understanding, and it needs always to be borne in mind as we attempt to relate the stories of Genesis to history. Genesis is not interested in events for their own sake but for what they disclose about the nature of God and his purposes.

Genesis and history

Many individuals pass across the stage of world history in Genesis. Yet, for the most part, their recorded deeds concern their own private families, not national or international affairs. The concern with birth and death, family disputes, grazing and burial rights etc. that characterizes these stories makes it plain that for the writer of Genesis the characters he described were real historical individuals. They are not personifications of clans or the products of his imagination.

Yet can we be sure that the stories in Genesis are really historical? As yet, no patriarchal marriage document or evidence of, for example, Jacob's visit to Paddan Aram or Joseph's work as vizier of Egypt has been discovered outside the Bible. This is hardly surprising given the very small proportion of information committed to writing in ancient times and the small fraction of texts that have survived and been discovered by archaeologists. This makes the chances of demonstrating the reality of one of the patriarchs remote, apart from what we find in the Bible. But there are many pointers in Genesis to the antiquity of its traditions, and these make it unlikely that the stories were the creation of religious 'novelists' writing long after the era they profess to describe, as some scholars suggest.

First, the names of the patriarchs are names that were frequently used in the early second millennium BC but only very rarely later. Names like Jacob, Isaac and Ishmael were standard names among the early Amorites (c. 1800 BC) but went out of fashion later. Other names in the patriarchal narratives, e.g. Serug, Nahor and Terah, confirm that the patriarchs came from the area of Haran.

Secondly, the social customs of the patriarchs fit those mentioned in ancient Near Eastern texts. Some of the practices (e.g. the custom of a man giving his daughter a dowry when she married) changed very little in two thousand years and so do not help us date the stories of the patriarchs exactly. They simply show the stories were true to life, whenever they were written. However, there are some customs which do seem to have changed with time, e.g. adopting a slave as an heir (Gn. 15) or calling the eldest boy rab (Gn. 25:23), and these place the biblical stories in an early period. Similarly, many features of the Joseph story find better parallels in second-millennium Egyptian texts than in later ones, and this again supports the antiquity of the stories about Joseph.

Thirdly, the religion and morality of the patriarchs appear to be earlier than what is found in other books of the Pentateuch. Sometimes the practice and beliefs of the patriarchs contradict the demands of the later law. For example, Abraham married his half-sister (Gn. 20:12; cf. Lv. 18:9), Jacob married two sisters (Gn. 29:21–30; cf. Lv. 18:18) and Jacob erected a stone pillar (Gn. 28:18); cf. Lv. 26:1; Dt. 16:21–22). In Genesis, God nearly always introduces himself as El, e.g. El Shaddai ('God Almighty'; Gn. 17:1), El Elyon ('God Most High'; Gn. 14:19). Later (after Ex. 6:3), Yahweh, 'the LORD', became the standard Israelite name for God.

These observations tend to confirm that the patriarchal stories are historical, though obviously we can never prove the details of particular incidents. But when we come to chapters 1–11 we are treading on different ground. Most of these stories deal with periods long before writing was invented, so they cannot be 'history' in the strict sense of the term or be verified by evidence from outside the Bible. However, Genesis does try to arrange the stories chronologically and explain things in terms of cause and effect. These are the hallmarks of history writing, so that T. Jacobsen has coined the term 'mytho-historical' to describe such literature (JBL, 100 (1981), p. 528). 'Myth' has negative overtones, so 'proto-history' is probably a better way to describe Genesis 1–11. In the present state of knowledge it is difficult to know how to relate these chapters to modern scientific discovery. It is more helpful (see below on the theology of Genesis and in the commentary) to read these chapters against the background of beliefs current in the ancient Near East. Then they will be seen to be offering a powerful critique of the belief in many gods. The writer of Genesis seems to assume the historicity of Adam, Eve and their descendants, for he links them all together in long family trees that end with Abraham. This shows that for him Adam was a real individual like Abraham or Isaac.

Authorship

The authorship of Genesis has been one of the most discussed issues in biblical studies, so for a fuller explanation of the issues the reader should look at the article on the Pentateuch. However, the major viewpoints and the stance taken in the commentary are as follows:

Traditionally, Moses (c. 1300 BC) was regarded as the main author of Genesis and the following four books. However, it was accepted that certain remarks (e.g. 12:6; 36:31) showed that some parts of the book had been added later. The text of Genesis does not claim Moses as its author, in any case.

From the nineteenth century onwards main-line critical scholarship minimized the role of Moses in the composition of the Pentateuch. Indeed, the most widely-accepted view came to be that Genesis was composed from three major sources J (tenth century BC), E (ninth century BC), and P (sixth century BC). Genesis, it was held, went through a series of modifications with new material being added with each new edition.

Since the 1970s there have been many questions raised about the J, E, P documentary theory, with some scholars contesting the dating of the sources and others doubting their very existence. So far, no theory has emerged to replace the old source-critical consensus, so it is still assumed in many textbooks and commentaries.

While this critical debate has continued, it has become widely accepted that the commentator's first job is to explain the present form of the text. Whether the author of Genesis used many sources or just one, what matters is the book as it stands. It is a beautifully constructed whole, full of vividly told stories, that convey a vision of God and his truth which is presupposed throughout the rest of the Bible. So what this commentary focuses on is the present final form of the text. This may well be considerably earlier than is often supposed (for fuller discussions see the article on the Pentateuch). Whoever wrote Genesis, in whatever period, was more interested in telling us about God than in giving us clues to his own identity.

Theology

The book of Genesis splits into two unequal parts. Chapters 1–11, the proto-history, focus on the origins of the human race, and chapters 12–50, the period of the patriarchs, focus on the origins of Israel. The much greater attention devoted to the patriarchs shows what was the chief concern of the author. So, in reviewing the main theological themes of Genesis, chapters 12–50 will be dealt with first and then chapters 1–11, which give background to the choice of Abraham and his descendants.

Theology of Genesis 12–50

The key theological themes of Genesis 12–50, indeed of the whole Pentateuch, are set out in 12:1–3: 'The LORD had said to Abram, "Leave your country, your people and your father's household and go to the land I will show you. I will make you into a great nation and I will bless you; I will make your name great, and you will be a blessing. I will bless those who bless you, and whoever curses you I will curse; and all peoples on earth will be blessed through you." ' Here God makes four promises to Abraham: that he will be given a 'land' (1); that he will become a 'great nation' (2); that he will enjoy a special (covenant) relationship with God (3); and that through him all the nations will be blessed (3). Whenever God addresses the patriarchs in Genesis he refers to these promises, very often amplifying or making them more specific. For example, a 'land' (12:1) becomes 'this land' (12:7), 'all the land you see ... for ever' (13:15) and 'the whole land of Canaan ... as an everlasting possession to you and your descendants after you' (17:8).

To grasp the importance of the promises in Genesis the reader should look at all God's speeches in the book noting the changes in wording between one passage and the next (12:1–3, 7; 13:14–17; 15:1–7, 13–21; 16:11–12; 17:1–21; 18:10–32; 21:12–13, 17; 22:11–18; 25:23; 26:2–5, 24; 28:13–15; 31:3; 32:27–29; 35:1, 9–12; 46:3–4). These changes show that God makes the promises ever more specific and dogmatic as the patriarchs respond in faith and obedience. But even their misbehaviour does not nullify the promises; it serves only to slow their fulfilment.

Not only does God make promises, but the patriarchs often mention them, or their friends or foes unwittingly allude to them (15:2, 8; 16:2; 17:17–18; 21:6–7; 24:7–8, 35–40, 60; 26:22, 28–29; 27:27–29; 28:2–4, 20–22; 29:32; 30:24, 27; 31:5–16, 29, 42, 49–50; 32:9–12; 33:5, 10–11; 34:10, 21; 35:3; 41:52; 45:5–11; 48:3–22; 50:5, 19–21, 24–25). These quotations from, or allusions to, the promises indicate how important they were to the human actors in the story and to the writer of Genesis.

What is more, the episodes from the patriarchs' lives recorded in Genesis illustrate the fulfilment of the promises. Presumably, the author of Genesis (like the evangelist John; see 20:30–31) knew much more about the patriarchs than he chose to tell. He picked out those episodes that showed how the promises came true, albeit slowly. D. J. A. Clines in The Theme of the Pentateuch (JSOT Press, 1979) has aptly defined the theme of the Pentateuch as the partial fulfilment of the promises to the patriarchs. Thus, in reading Genesis we must ask about every incident: how does this contribute to the fulfilment of the promises of land, nationhood, covenant relationship and blessing to the nations?

Clearly, not every aspect of these promises is in focus in every episode. Nor does their fulfilment proceed straightforwardly—there are many hiccoughs and setbacks. Genesis is most obviously concerned with the promise of descendants, that Abraham's offspring will become a great nation. Yet, after the mention of Sarah's barrenness in 11:30, it is not till 21:1 (twenty-five years later) that the promised son, Isaac, is born. Similarly, Isaac's wife Rebekah conceived only after Isaac had prayed for a child for twenty years (25:20, 26). Similarly, Rachel, Jacob's true love and only real wife in his eyes, was dismayed to find her rival Leah and Jacob's slave wives bearing child after child before she bore one (30:23), and then she died giving birth to a second (35:16–19). By the end of Genesis (46:27) Abraham's descendants numbered seventy, which is hardly a great nation. Although they increased dramatically during the period of Egyptian slavery, the promise of innumerable offspring still seems some way from complete fulfilment even in Exodus.

As for the land promise, all that Abraham acquired was a burial plot for his wife (23:1–20). Isaac gained permission to use some wells (26:22–23), and Jacob bought a shoulder of land near Shechem (33:19; cf. 48:22). At the end of Genesis none of Abraham's descendants was living in Canaan, the land of promise; they had all migrated to Egypt. Indeed, entry to the land, though it is the dominating concern of Exodus to Deuteronomy, was not secured till the book of Joshua.

Some of the slowness in the fulfilment of the promises may be ascribed to unbelief or disobedience by the patriarchs (e.g. 12:10–20; 16:1–14; 27:1–45). Whatever they did, however, one aspect of the promise repeatedly proved true: God was with the patriarchs, blessing those who blessed them and cursing those who cursed them (12:3). Thus, despite the mortal danger Abraham believed himself to be in Egypt and Gerar, and his faithless fear which placed his wife in jeopardy, both Abraham and Sarah emerged safely and indeed enriched financially from their stays in foreign parts (12:10–20; 20:1–15). Similarly, Isaac prospered despite the opposition of the Philistines (ch. 26). Jacob was conscious that God went with him as he fled for his life to Paddan Aram, and it was through God's help that he was able to escape the clutches of his double-crossing father-in-law and return in peace to a reconciliation with the brother who had planned to murder him (28:20–21; 31:42; 33:11). Above all, the career of Joseph demonstrated that God was with him, as he rose from prison cell to Pharaoh's deputy (39:5, 23; 41:39).

Yet even here the promise was only partially fulfilled. God did make a covenant with Abraham (15:18), confirm it (17:7) and guarantee it (22:15–18). But these general covenants were just preambles to, and a foretaste of, the great covenant of Sinai to be made with Abraham's descendants.

Finally, there was a partial fulfilment of the promise to the nations. Through Abraham's efforts, the king of Sodom was rescued (14:17), and through his prayers, the childless women of Gerar conceived (20:17). Most dramatically of all, Joseph was instrumental in saving many lives, not just his own family's but the Egyptians' and those of other nations too (41:57). He pointed out that this was part of God's plan (45:5–7; 50:20–21).

Theology of Genesis 1–11

Why was it necessary for God to choose Abraham, and who was the God who made these promises? How does Abraham fit into world history? It is these questions that Genesis 1–11 addresses.

Genesis 12–50 shows that the twelve tribes were the twelve sons or grandsons of Jacob (29:32–30:24; 35:18; 48:16). Israel's nearest neighbours were descended from Jacob's brother (Edom from Esau; 25:26; 36:1) or uncles (Ishmael; 25:12) or distant cousins (Moab and Ammon; 19:36–38). The table of nations in Genesis 10 shows how Israel was related to seventy other peoples known to the writer of Genesis. Israel, like the tribes of Syria and Arabia, was ultimately descended from Shem, one of Noah's sons (10:21–28). The most distant nations known to Israel, including the Medes, Greeks and other Mediterranean peoples, are traced to Japheth, another son of Noah (10:2–5). Ham, Noah's disgraced son, is said to have been the ancestor of Israel's inveterate enemies, including the Egyptians, Babylonians and Canaanites (10:6–20). Thus, through this table of nations, Israel's place among the nations of the ancient Near East is defined.

These opening chapters of Genesis also define Israel's view of God over against the prevailing beliefs in many gods in the ancient orient. That the biblical story of mankind from creation to flood finds parallels in other ancient literature (such as the Atrahasis and Gilgamesh epics and the Sumerian Flood Story) has often been noticed. But even more significant is the way that Genesis, by retelling what to the author's contemporaries were familiar stories, presents a new, indeed revolutionary, view of God and his relationship to the world and mankind.

Ancient orientals believed in a multitude of gods of limited power, knowledge and morality, so that religion was a dicey business. You could never be quite sure whether you had chosen the right deity, or whether he or she could bring you health and salvation. But the God of Genesis was unique and without equal. He was all-powerful, creating the whole universe (even the sun, moon and stars, often thought to be gods in their own right) by a simple command. He sent the flood and he stopped the flood. He saved Noah and his family because Noah was righteous, not because of favouritism. The God of Genesis was supremely concerned with human welfare.

Unlike the Mesopotamian myths, which tell how the gods created mankind as an afterthought to provide themselves with food, Genesis declares that mankind was the goal of God's creation whom God provided with food (1:26–29).

Yet though the creation of mankind was God's crowning achievement he was, according to Genesis, totally flawed as 'every inclination of the thought of his [man's] heart was only evil all the time' (6:5). It was human sin, not human fertility (as in the Atrahasis epic), that provoked the flood. And this profound pessimism about human nature and society again distinguishes Genesis' theology from other ancient oriental beliefs. Mesopotamians (like many modern thinkers), for example, were believers in progress. They held that the Babylonian civilization was the most advanced and enlightened of all time. Genesis declares it was one of the most decadent (6:1–4; 11:1–9). Genesis traces an 'avalanche of sin', unleashed by Adam's disobedience, aggravated by Cain's murder and climaxed in the illicit marriages of 6:1–4, which eventually triggered off the flood. This great act of decreation was followed by a new creation as the new earth emerged from the waters, and Noah, a sort of second Adam, stepped out to till the land. But like the first Adam he too fell; his son Ham acted even worse; and human sinfulness reached another peak as the men of Babel attempted to build a tower that reached heaven. This led to another act of universal judgment in the scattering of the nations across the globe.

But it was a man who came from Ur, the centre of this corrupt civilization, that God called to leave his homeland, move to a new one and build a new nation, so that all the nations of the world should find blessing. For despite its gloom about human sin, Genesis is a fundamentally optimistic book. It declares that God's purpose for mankind, first intimated at his creation (chapters 1–2), will ultimately be achieved through the offspring of Abraham.

The commentary has been structured according to the divisions suggested by the text itself; these do not always coincide with the medieval chapter divisions. Genesis is notable for dividing itself into ten major sections, each beginning, ‘This is the account of’ (2:4; 5:1; 6:9 etc.). These ten ‘accounts’ are prefaced by a prologue (1:1–2:3), describing God creating for six days and resting on the seventh. The accounts themselves alternate between quite long narratives (e.g.

6:9–9:29, ‘the account of Noah’) and briefer genealogies (e.g. 11:10–26, ‘The account of Shem’). Within the fullest section of the book (the one dealing with the patriarchs descended from Abraham), the ‘non-elect’ line is summed up in a genealogy (e.g. Ishmael, 25:12–18; Esau, 36:1–37:1) before the chosen brother’s family story is recounted in detail (e.g. Isaac, 25:19–35:29; Jacob, 37:2–50:26).

Commentary

1:1–2:3 Prologue: God creates the world

This opening section of Genesis stands outside the main frame of the book set by the ten headings, ‘This is the account of’ (2:4 etc.). This shows that it is a prologue to the rest of the book, setting out who God is and how he relates to the world. It thus provides a key to the interpretation of Genesis, if not the whole Bible. But this prologue is more than a statement of theology, it is a hymn of praise to the Creator through whom and for whom all things exist.

The prologue itself is carefully arranged. Ten divine commands result in eight acts of creation spread over six days, so that there is a correspondence between days one to three and days four to six. On day one, God created ‘light’ and on day four, ‘lights’ (sun, moon and stars); on day two, he created the sky and sea and on day five, the dwellers in the sky and sea (birds and fish); on day three, he created the land and vegetation and on day six, the dwellers in the land (animals and mankind), giving them plants to eat; finally, on the seventh day (the Sabbath), he rested.

The works of creation moved to a climax on day six when mankind was created in two sexes. That this is seen as the crowning feat of God’s creation is emphasized by the lengthy comments on their creation and role (1:26–29), which are much fuller than those about any other creature. Indeed, the works of the five preceding days seem to focus on creating a home for mankind. Those aspects of creation that most affect human existence (e.g. plant and animal life and the sun and moon) are described more fully than the creation of light, land, or seas, which are less significant. God’s concern for humanity is made explicit in the provision of plants for food.

It also seems likely that the emphasis on God creating for six days and then resting on the seventh is deliberate. God’s mode of working was to be a model for human activity. People, who are made in the image of God, are expected throughout the Bible to imitate God. So, as God worked for six days and then rested on the seventh day, human beings are to work for six days and rest on the seventh (Ex. 20:8–11).

The concern with human life on earth, which is apparent in this narrative read by itself, is the more obvious when it is compared with other ancient oriental accounts of creation. Genesis is implicitly rejecting other views of the gods and their relationship with the world. Here we have no story of how gods fought, married and bore children; there is but one God, beyond time and sex, who was there in the beginning. He created all things, even the sun, moon and stars, which other peoples often held to be gods in their own right. He required no magic to do this; his word was sufficient by itself. According to the Genesis account, there is one God, the sovereign Creator, to whom all the universe owes its being and whom it is expected to obey. Within that created universe, men and women have a place of honour, having been made in the divine image. We reflect God’s nature and represent him on earth.

1:1–2 The beginning of creation

The NIV accepts the traditional understanding of these verses, namely that they describe the very first act of creation, when God created all matter (the heavens and the earth) out of nothing. But the earth immediately after creation was formless and empty, i.e. unproductive and uninhabited. So the narrative then proceeds to relate how in six days God organized this chaos into the well-ordered world we now see.

Some modern translations and commentators understand v 1 differently. Some (e.g. the NEB) take it simply to be defining the situation when God started to create, ‘In the beginning when God created ... the earth was formless ...’ Others simply regard v 1 as a summary title to the first chapter. But neither view is as likely as that adopted by the NIV. ‘Create’ is something that only God does (the verb is used only of God in the OT). He demonstrates his power by creating marvellous and unexpected things (Nu. 16:30), e.g. great sea creatures (21), men and women (27) and mountains (Am. 4:13).

V 2 pictures the world as dark and desolate, covered by water and with the mysterious Spirit (or ‘wind’) of God hovering above the ocean. The suggestion here of a power within the Godhead is developed further by Pr. 8:22–31 and Jn. 1:1–3, which speak of ‘wisdom’ and ‘the Word’ assisting in creation.

1:3–5 The creation of light. The dark world was lit up when God said, ‘Let there be light’. More precisely, day was distinguished from night by the creation of light. Light is a form of energy and may be produced in many different ways, not just by sun and stars (which were not created until the fourth day). Contemporary cosmologists say that the universe began with a hot big bang, which must have made a very bright light. Order began to appear and replace dark chaos. The refrain God saw that [it] was good (cf. vs 10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31) affirms the intrinsic goodness of the creation and its Creator.

Note. It is possible that the order of evening-morning in And there was evening, and there was morning—the first day (cf. vs 8, 13, 19, 23, 31) reflects the Hebrew concept of the day beginning with sunset and ending with the following sunset. What matters most to Genesis, however, is that God worked for six ‘days’ and then rested. In that these are days of God’s activity not human work, it is unlikely that they are supposed to last twenty-four hours. Indeed, the Hebrew word for ‘day’ covers a variety of periods: the hours of daylight (Gn. 29:7), a twenty-four-hour day (Gn. 7:4) or an indefinite period (Gn. 35:3). That they were different from ordinary days is shown by the non-existence of the sun until the fourth day. Another hint that creation did not take six literal days is the mention of the creation of the heavens and the earth, i.e. the unorganized universe (1) before the six days were counted down. Finally, it should be noted that 1:1–2:3, unlike all other sections of Genesis, is not headed by the title ‘This is the account of’, which links the proto-history (2:4–11:26) to the patriarchal history (11:27–50:26). All these differences indicate that 1:1–2:3 serves as an overture to the rest of the book and that it may not be intended to be taken as literally as what follows. Nevertheless, that God worked for six days and rested on the seventh day (however long by human reckoning his ‘days’ were) is a pattern for mankind to follow.

1:6–8 The separation of the waters. God showed his power again by putting limits on the waters which had hitherto covered the globe (cf. Jb. 38:8–11). Some were confined to the seas, the rest to the sky. The upper waters were kept there by the ‘expanse’ or ‘firmament’ (AV).

From earth the sky (firmament) appears to be a sort of dome that prevents the waters in the clouds falling to earth (cf. 7:11).

1:9–13 The creation of land and plants. Even more important for mankind was the provision, on the third day, of dry land, on which he could live, and plants to sustain life (cf. 1:29–30). The distinct varieties of plants (11–12) bear witness to God’s organizing power, and these distinctions should not be blurred (see the rules against mixed breeding in Lv. 19:19; Dt. 22:9–11).

1:14–19 The creation of the heavenly lights. Even more powerful proof of God’s creative power, and ever pertinent to human existence, are the sun, moon and stars. Pagan contemporaries of Genesis regarded these bodies as gods in their own right. To avoid any suspicion that the sun and moon were anything but created by God, Genesis calls them just lights. They were appointed to regulate the fundamental rhythms of human life by defining day and night and the seasons of the year.

1:20–23 The creation of birds and fish. The parallel between God’s work on the first three days and the second three days now becomes clear. On day one, light was created, on day four, the heavenly lights; on day two, sky and oceans, on day five, birds and fish. Once again, Genesis is stressing God’s concern for order. ‘The great sea creatures’ were regarded as divine in some ancient myths; Genesis insists that they were merely some of God’s creatures. Furthermore, God wanted the waters and air to be filled with his creatures, and his command and blessing guaranteed their fertility. No magic or fertility rites were needed to secure it.

1:24–31 The creation of animals and mankind

The creation account reaches its climax on the sixth day. Note how much fuller the description of God’s work on this day is than for any of the preceding days and the parallels with the words of day three (land).

Here Genesis defines mankind’s purpose and place in God’s plan. God says man is to be made in our image, in our likeness. This means that mankind, both male and female, is God’s representative on earth. Ancient oriental kings were often seen as bearing the image of their god, but Genesis affirms that every human being is made in God’s image. The NT affirms that Christ is ‘the image of the invisible God’ (Col. 1:15), ‘the radiance of God’s glory and the exact representation of his being’ (Heb. 1:3). Such an understanding of the divine image was beyond the reach of the human author of Genesis, but he alludes to another dimension of it by the comment ‘Let us make man in our image’ (26). Here God is pictured talking to the angels, the only allusion to other supernatural beings in this chapter. This remark implies that man is like both God and the angels. (Traditionally, Christians have seen us and our to allude to the other persons of the Trinity. While this is a quite legitimate fuller interpretation, it is not the words’ primary meaning.)

Secondly, because human beings are created in God’s image they are his representatives on earth and should ‘rule ... over all the earth’ (26). Ps. 8:4–8 offers a marvellous poetic comment on this idea. Rule implies lordship but not exploitation. Man, as God’s representative, must rule his subjects, as God does, for their own good. While legitimizing human use of the world’s resources, God gives no licence for our abuse of his creation.

Thirdly, God deliberately created humanity in two sexes to be fruitful and increase in number. He thereby blessed sexual intercourse and indicated its importance in his plan. Other ancient tales, hailing from urban Mesopotamia (which was worried by population growth), tell of the gods taking steps to curb human fertility by sending plagues, famine, flood and miscarriage.

The God of Genesis repeatedly urged the first people to be fruitful (1:28; 8:17; 9:1, 7) and promised the patriarchs that they would be successful in fathering innumerable children. Sex is thus seen as an important part of God's very good creation (31).

Fourthly, God provided food for mankind in the form of seed-bearing plants and fruit trees (29). Not until after the flood was meat-eating expressly sanctioned (9:1–3). Genesis, however, is not primarily interested in whether people were originally vegetarian but in the fact that God provided them with food. In Mesopotamian mythology the gods created man to provide themselves with food; Genesis affirms it was the other way round, that God feeds mankind (cf. Pss. 65; 50:7–15).

2:1–3 The holy seventh day

A dramatic change of pace and style highlights the distinctiveness of the Sabbath. The seventh day is not called the Sabbath here, but it is alluded to, for he rested could be paraphrased 'he Sabbathed'. Furthermore, the seventh day's importance is underlined by God blessing it and making it holy. The Sabbath is regularly called 'holy', but only in Ne. 8:9, 11 is any other festival called 'holy'. Here, God is described as resting on the seventh day, but the narrator clearly implies that mankind, made in the divine image, is expected to copy his Creator. Indeed, the context implies that a weekly day of rest is as necessary for human survival as sex (1:27–28) or food (1:29). This is an emphasis that seems to have been forgotten today, even amongst Christians.

Note. Genesis 1 and science. Genesis and modern science are answering different questions. Genesis explains who God is and how he relates to the created world. Science elucidates the God-given laws that explain natural phenomena; and from these laws scientists can work backwards to trace the course of the universe's development. Science makes us aware of the infinite power and wisdom of the Creator, but it cannot explain God's purpose in creating the universe, or his character. Genesis is not dealing with the issues raised by twentieth-century science but with ideas current in the ancient orient over 3000 years ago. Over against the polytheistic world-view that held there were many gods and goddesses of varying wisdom and power, Genesis declares there is but one God of absolute power and holiness. Rejecting the ancient view that mankind was simply created as an afterthought which the gods later regretted, Genesis affirms that man was the goal of creation and that his welfare is God's supreme concern. These principles are reaffirmed repeatedly throughout Scripture, but they are set out with exemplary clarity in Genesis 1 and are central to what the author was trying to say. Modern readers should concentrate on these original intentions of Genesis and not bring to the text scientific issues which are foreign to its purpose.

2:4–4:26 The account of the heavens and the earth

This section describes three stages in the degeneration of human society from its perfection portrayed in 1:31. The first defiance of God's commandment (3:6) is followed by the first murder (4:8) and finally by the seventy-sevenfold vengeance of Lamech (4:24). The sins are seen as both typical and unique. They are typical in that every sinful act has similar ingredients and consequences; they are unique in that, occurring at the beginning of history, they have had dire consequences for the whole human race.

2:4–3:24 The Garden of Eden

Why, if the world was created very good (1:31), is there so much pain and suffering, anger and hatred in it? This story explains the origin and effects of sin in a simple yet profound way. It starts by describing the idyllic existence of the first human couple, thereby outlining God's pattern for relations between the sexes. It then tells how one apparently minor act of disobedience upset everything and led to mankind's expulsion from paradise.

The LORD God (2:4) is a phrase common in chs. 2–3, but it is hardly used elsewhere in the OT. It sums up two ideas that are important in these chapters—that God is both mankind's Creator ('God' is the term used in ch. 1) and his friend or covenant partner (the LORD, or Yahweh, is God's personal name revealed only to Israel; Ex. 3:14; 6:3).

2:4–7 The creation of the first man. The writer flashes back to the situation before mankind was created on the sixth day (1:26–28) and describes a typical middle-eastern desert, which requires human effort to irrigate and make it bloom. It was from the clay of such an area that God, the great Potter, moulded the first man and breathed into him the breath of life. Through this traditional image Genesis implies that people are by nature more than material; they have a spiritual, God-breathed, element too.

2:8–17 God's garden for man kind. God's concern for human need, already mentioned in 1:29, is again underlined here. A delightful park full of fruit trees, rivers, gold and gemstones is prepared for human habitation in an area called Eden (i.e. 'delight'). Trees, water, gold and gems and cherubim also adorned the later tabernacle (Ex. 25:27) and temple (1 Ki. 7; Ezk. 41–47), and these symbols suggest what was most important about the garden: the presence of God. He used to walk there in the cool of the day having intimate conversation with Adam and Eve (3:8). The tree of life gives eternal life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil wisdom. The latter was forbidden for human consumption because the wisdom acquired through eating it leads to independence from God, whereas true wisdom begins with 'the fear of the LORD' (Pr. 1:7).

Note. 10–14. Two of the rivers of Eden are well known: the Tigris and the Euphrates flow through modern Iraq into the Persian Gulf. Gihon and Pishon are impossible to identify, and therefore attempts to locate Eden are doomed to failure. Mesopotamian mythology located a paradise island at the head of the Persian Gulf, and therefore the likeliest explanation is that Eden was supposed to be there. But this may be taking the story too literally, for 3:23–24 makes it plain that Eden cannot now be entered by human beings.

2:18–24 The creation of woman. Despite the idyllic environment there was something wrong. God said that 'It is not good for the man to be alone' (18), and after his repeated observation that all he had created was good (e.g. 1:10, 31) this comment is a shock and serves to highlight the next acts of creation.

First, animals were created as the man's companions. They were under human authority (the man named them in v 20), but it was intended that they should not be exploited (cf. on 1:24–31). Unfortunately, animals were not the perfect companions for the man. It was only the creation of woman that fully satisfied him.

The charming tale of God creating Eve out of Adam's rib and then presenting her to him as if at a wedding sums up beautifully many of the key biblical ideas about marriage. Here and in 1:27–28 we have God's standard for relations between the sexes set out. Whereas 1:28 emphasized the importance of procreation, 2:20–24 explores the nature of companionship within marriage. First, husband and wife complement each other. Suitable helper would be better translated 'helper matching him', i.e. supplying what he lacks. She is his missing rib. Matthew Henry commented on God's choice of a rib to create Eve, 'Not made out of his head to top him, not out of his feet to be trampled upon by him, but out of his side to be equal with him, under his arm to be protected, and near his heart to be beloved.’ Perhaps this reads a little too much into the rib, but it expresses well the biblical ideal of marriage.

Secondly, the union between man and wife should be permanent: a man is united (lit. ‘sticks’) to his wife, and they will become one flesh. Jesus (Mt. 19:5) and Paul (Eph. 5:31) quote this in decrying divorce.

Thirdly, a man must put his wife’s interest above all others, even his parents. He will leave his father and mother, not by going to live elsewhere but by putting his very important duty to care for them (Ex. 20:12) second to his duty to look after his wife (cf. Eph. 5:25–29).

Fourthly, the wife is under the authority of her husband: he names her woman (23) and later Eve (3:20), just as earlier he had named the animals (19). This concept of the man’s head-ship is taken for granted elsewhere in the Bible (e.g. 1 Cor. 11:3; 1 Pet. 3:1–6).

Finally, it may be noted that God created only one Eve for Adam, not several Eves or another Adam, thereby indicating divine disapproval of both polygamy (cf. Lv. 18:18; Dt. 17:17) and homosexual practice (Lv. 18:22; Rom. 1:26–27).

3:1–8 The fall. The innocent harmony of Eden was then ruined by the entry of sin. The mistakes of Adam and Eve are typical of all sins, but as they were the parents of the whole human race their deeds had the gravest consequences. Temptation was mediated by a serpent, later described as an unclean creature (Lv. 11:31) and, therefore, a fitting symbol of evil. The serpent begins by overemphasizing the strictness of the law (God had put only one tree out of bounds) and questioning God’s goodwill towards human beings (something the narrative in ch. 2 had put beyond doubt). Eve rebuts his suggestion, though inexactly (‘you must not touch it’ was not part of the original prohibition (2:17)). The serpent then challenged God’s judgment by claiming ‘you will not surely die’ and promised instead sophistication (that their eyes will be opened) and spiritual advancement (that they will be like God).

Lured by the prospect of instant pleasure (she saw that the fruit was good for food) and supposed maturity, Eve suddenly succumbed and persuaded her husband also to eat. In so doing he preferred the serpent’s suggestions to God’s command. (Throughout Scripture, the essence of sin is to put human judgment above divine command.) Immediately guilt and shame gripped them. Their opened eyes saw only their naked bodies, and they attempted to hide from each other and from God.

3:9–20 Trial and sentence. Man, woman and serpent were then interrogated and sentenced by the divine inquisitor. God’s questions were designed to elicit confessions, not information; he knew perfectly well what they had done.

The long-term effects of sin then started to appear. The serpent was condemned to crawl and to constant warfare with mankind, the woman’s offspring (15). In that her offspring will crush the snake’s head, the latter will come off worse in the long battle. Thus, though this was a judgment on the snake, it was at the same time a promise to man. It has, therefore, traditionally been seen by Jews and Christians, as the first hint of a saviour for mankind, and 3:15 is often called the ‘protevangelion’ the ‘first gospel’. Allusions to it in the NT include Rom. 16:20; Heb. 2:14; Rev. 12. Within Genesis the promise to Abraham that ‘through your offspring all nations on earth will be blessed’ (22:18) starts to make the vague promise of 3:15 more specific. It is also notable that this first judgment on sin is tinged with hope, something that recurs throughout Scripture (cf. 6:5–8), as God’s mercy outweighs his wrath (cf. Ex. 20:5–6).

The sentence on Eve blighted her calling as mother. To be a joyful mother of children was the hope of every OT woman (30:1; Ps. 113:9), but the pain of childbirth was a constant reminder of the first mother's sin. Furthermore, instead of marriage being a relationship of mutual care, tension was often to characterize it. Your desire may be a desire for sexual intercourse or for independence, but ultimately the husband's headship will prevail. He will rule over you may indicate harsh domination, but it may simply be reaffirming the chain of authority (God—man—woman) established at creation but reversed at the fall (1). The latter interpretation is more likely in view of the introduction to Adam's sentence of Because you listened to your wife (17). God then decreed that the man must suffer frustration in his work (gardeners and farmers face a running battle with weeds to produce food). Hard work would enable him to live, but eventually he would die. This is a hint that he was about to be expelled from Eden and deprived of access to the tree of life.

3:21–24 Judgment. Expulsion from the garden proved the hollowness of the serpent's promise that they would not die (4). For though Adam and Eve continued some sort of life outside the garden, it was a shadow of the fulness of life inside Eden, where they had enjoyed intimate fellowship with God. Now the full cost of sin is apparent. It is not just an unquiet conscience (7–8), squabbles with one's dearest spouse (12), pain (16) or the drudgery of daily toil (17–19) but separation from the presence of God and ultimately physical death (Rom. 6:23). Cherubim later decorated the ark, tabernacle and temple (Ex. 25:18–22; 26:31; 1 Ki. 6:23–28) and were winged lions with human heads (Ezk. 41:18).

4:1–26 The first human family

In sketching the story of Cain and his descendants, Genesis illustrates the increasing grip of sin on the human race.

4:1–16 Cain and Abel. Ch. 3 showed how sin disrupts relations between God and human beings and between man and wife. Ch. 4 shows it destroying the bonds of brotherhood. Indeed, Cain is portrayed as a more hardened sinner than Adam. Killing one's brother is more wicked than eating a protected fruit. Adam had to be persuaded to sin; Cain could not be dissuaded from sinning, even by God himself (6–7). Sin is personified as an animal waiting to pounce (7; cf. 1 Pet. 5:8). When questioned by God about his sin, Adam, though rather petulant, at least told the truth; Cain lied and then made a joke about it (3:9–11 cf. 4:9). Adam accepted God's judgment in silence, but Cain protested fiercely (13–14) and was despatched even further from Eden (16).

Notes. 5 The reason for the rejection of Cain's sacrifice is not immediately obvious. The contrast between Cain's some of the fruits and Abel's fat portions ... of the firstborn of his flocks probably gives the clue. Perhaps Abel brought the best parts of his flocks and Cain was not so particular. But sacrifice is only acceptable to God if it is perfect and costly (Lv. 22:20–22; 2 Sa. 24:24); he will not be satisfied with second best (Mal. 1:6–14; Rom. 12:1). 15 Whether the mark of Cain was a tattoo, his name Cain, a dog or something else is quite obscure. Like the clothing given to Adam and Eve in 3:21, the mark served a double function. It reminded Cain of his sin and assured him of God's protection against potential enemies. Thus, his protest prayer (13–14) did not go unheeded, for even hardened sinners like Cain may pray for mercy and receive it.

4:17–26 Cain's descendants. Several of Cain's descendants (his wife was presumably a daughter of Adam and Eve) are credited with significant cultural and technological advances: city-building (17), bedouin life (20), music (21) and metal-working (22). That these achievements are credited to Cain's descendants, rather than Seth's more holy line (ch. 5), suggests that all human progress is somehow tainted by sin.

Most attention is given to Lamech, who is portrayed in gory detail. A slave of passion, he married two lovely wives, Adah ('Jewel') and Zillah ('Melody'). Bigamy represents another regress from the monogamy God established in Eden. But more significant is Lamech's blood-thirsty lust for seventy-sevenfold vengeance, which shows a man who disregarded justice and was prepared to smash all who got in his way. Society was disintegrating and was ripe for judgment.

Vs. 25–26 anticipate the genealogy of Seth in ch. 5. Often at the end of a section in Genesis there is a trailer for what follows (cf. 6:5–8 anticipating 6:9–9:17; 9:18–27 anticipating ch. 10).

Call on the name of the LORD means that worship of God also began in this era.

5:1–6:8 The account of Adam's line

This consists of two parts. The first (5:1–32) lists the ten generations from Adam, through his third son Seth, to Noah. This was the beginning of the chosen line in Genesis, through which salvation for mankind would ultimately come (Noah's family was the only one to survive the flood). The second part (6:1–8) focuses on one of the worst sins of the pre-flood period—the marriages between the sons of God (see on 6:1–8) and the daughters of men, which prompted God to send a flood. It closes, however, with a hint that Noah will be saved (6:8).

5:1–32 Adam's family tree

This repetitive genealogy highlights four points about each patriarch: his age when his first son was born, his subsequent lifespan, the fact that he had other sons and daughters and his age at death. The mention of other children implies that these patriarchs fulfilled the command to 'be fruitful and increase in number' (1:28) and shows how mankind gradually populated the earth. The great ages of these men suggest that they lived a very long time ago, and that the degeneration caused by sin leading to a shortening of lifespan only gradually took effect.

It is hard to know how to understand the long lives of the men who lived before the flood. A comparable text, the Sumerian King List, lists eight kings who reigned before the flood for a total of 241,000 years. This makes the 1500 years covered by ch. 5 seem quite modest, but it still does not explain how, for example, Adam could have lived for 930 years. Various suggestions have been put forward. First, that their 'years' were much shorter than ours. But the chronology of the flood (7:11–8:14) shows that Genesis assumes about 360 days in a year. Secondly, that the years of the patriarch's life do not represent the length of his own life but of the clan he founded. In other words, many generations have been omitted. This is hard to prove since, at the beginning of the list, Seth is clearly Adam's immediate son and, at the end, Lamech—Noah—Shem, Ham and Japheth form a consecutive sequence. Thirdly, that the years are symbolic and represent periods of time known in astronomy, e.g. Enoch's 365 years correspond to the days of a solar year. Fourthly, that the numbers are symbolic and generated by the number system based on 60 used in Mesopotamia. Babylonian mathematics tables made much of the factors of 60 (30, 20, 15 etc.) and their squares and multiples. So many of the numbers in ch. 5 and the Sumerian King List would have seemed familiar to these trained in this system, e.g. 930 (Adam's age) is $30^2 + 30$. However, not all the figures are explicable this way, nor can we explain why certain figures were attached to particular people if they were symbolic. At present, the best that can be said is that the size of the numbers suggests that these men lived a long time ago. Their precision suggests that these were real people who lived and died. For further discussion see G. J. Wenham, Genesis 1–15 (Word Books, 1987) pp. 130–134.

Because of Enoch's piety (he walked with God) he probably did not die but was translated to heaven (God took him away; cf. Elijah, 2 Ki. 2:11–12).

6:1–8 Human-spirit marriages and their aftermath

In the ancient world, stories were often told of sexual intercourse between the gods and human beings; and the semi-divine offspring of such unions were held to have abnormal energy and other powers. In Mesopotamia and Canaan, divine-human marriage was celebrated in the sacred marriage rites that took place in the temples. These rites were supposed to ensure the fertility of the soil and ordinary marriages. They involved fathers dedicating their unmarried daughters for service in the temple. In practice these girls served as sacred prostitutes giving pleasure to priests and wealthy worshippers.

Vs 1–2, 4 describe these practices. The sons of God refers to spirit beings (translated ‘angels’ in Jb. 1:6; 2:1, though they are not benevolent either here or in Job). Sometimes in the OT Israel (Dt. 14:1) or kings (2 Sa. 7:14) are called ‘sons of God’, but neither meaning is appropriate here. The daughters of men refers to ordinary human women. The Nephilim are the ancient supermen supposed to be the offspring of these spirit-human unions. Some Nephilim were in Canaan when Israel invaded (Nu. 13:33).

This practice of sacred prostitution is, according to Genesis, both unnecessary (men were already increasing in number, v 1) and an abomination to God (5). Consequently, the normal span of human life was reduced to 120 years (3) and the Lord announced a plan to wipe out mankind and other living creatures (7).

Sacred prostitution is viewed here as the culminating sin in a series that began with Adam’s eating the forbidden fruit and was continued by Cain’s murder of his brother and Lamech’s unbridled vengeance. Looking at human beings God concluded that they were incorrigibly wicked and that every human thought was bent towards evil. V 5 spells out the doctrine of human depravity with frightening bluntness, but similar views are expressed by psalmists, prophets, Jesus and Paul (Ps. 51:3–6; Je. 17:9–10; Mk. 7:15; Rom. 1:18–3:20). What is more, human sinfulness provokes a fierce reaction in God, a bitter indignation (his heart was filled with pain) akin to that felt by brothers after their sister’s rape (Gn. 34:7), or that of a father after his son’s death in battle (2 Sa. 19:2). God, therefore, made a decision to destroy his creation. Nevertheless, as with earlier decrees of judgment (3:15; 4:15), there was a glimmer of hope—Noah found favour in the eyes of the LORD (8).

6:9–9:29 The account of Noah

Many ancient peoples around the world tell the story of a great flood from which only one man and his family escaped by building a boat. But, as might have been expected, the closest parallels to the biblical account come from Mesopotamia, in the Atrahasis and Gilgamesh epics. Both texts date from around 1600 BC. Like the biblical story, they tell of a man (Atrahasis or Utnapishtim) who was advised by his god to build an ark to escape the flood. He did so, loaded it with goods and animals, floated on the floodwaters for a short while, and sent out birds to see if the waters were abating. Eventually the ark grounded on a mountain top, the flood survivor emerged and offered sacrifices which greatly pleased the gods, who rewarded him with eternal life. The similarities between the biblical and Babylonian accounts of the flood show that it was a well-known story in the ancient Near East.

There are, however, various differences between the accounts, which show that they have not simply been borrowed from each other. There are differences of detail, e.g. about the size and shape of the ark, the duration of the flood and the types of birds that were sent out to inspect the floodwaters. But these are relatively trivial differences. Much more important are the theological differences between the accounts. These are so considerable that it seems likely that the author of the biblical account was deliberately trying to correct or refute the common oriental view of the flood. In particular, Genesis is trying to explain what God is really like and how he relates to the world.

In the Babylonian versions, the gods agreed on a flood to stop human population growth, but one dissented and tipped off his worshipper Atrahasis (the equivalent of Noah). When the flood was unleashed, the gods cowered before it like dogs unable to control it. After the flood the gods hurried to the sacrifice as they were hungry, since sacrifices had stopped during the flood. One of the top gods was surprised to find a man had survived the flood (evidently this god was neither omnipotent nor omniscient).

The whole theological and ethical outlook of Genesis is different. First, the flood was sent not to curb human noise or fertility but because of human corruption and sinfulness (6:11–12). Secondly, Noah was saved not because he chanced to worship a god who disagreed with the flood decision but because he was righteous ... blameless among the peoples of his time. Throughout the flood story Noah is portrayed as doing exactly what God commanded him (e.g. 6:22; 7:9; 8:18). Thirdly, the God of Genesis is all-powerful and all-knowing. He is always in total control of the flood and knows just what is happening. It was when God remembered Noah that the flood waters started to recede (8:1–2). The sacrifice after the flood did not quench God's appetite (unlike the Mesopotamian gods, he was not in need of human food) but appeased his wrath. Despite continuing human sinfulness (cf. 8:21 with 6:5), God promised that never again would the earth be destroyed in a flood. The rainbow was God's pledge that he would maintain and protect the whole earth (8:22–9:16). Finally, while the Atrahasis epic ends with the gods inventing miscarriage and female infertility to curb population growth, Noah is urged three times to 'Be fruitful and increase in number and fill the earth' (9:1; cf. 8:17; 9:7). Despite sin, God is basically on our side and concerned for the welfare of the human race. This goodwill was secured by Noah's sacrifice and by the greater sacrifice of Christ.

6:9–8:22 The story of the flood

Genesis regards the flood as the great dividing point in world history. The flood was a great act of de-creation. It returned the earth to the situation of primeval watery chaos that existed before God started speaking in 1:3. Life was destroyed. Water covered everything, even the mountain tops, so that the planet looked as it did when God first created it (1:2). Then, when God remembered Noah, he sent a wind over the earth (cf. the hovering spirit/wind of God in 1:2) to begin the process of new creation. The world was born anew. Dry land and waters were separated, and Noah, the new head of the human race, emerged from the ark and, like Adam, was told to 'Be fruitful and increase in number' (9:1, cf. 1:28). Noah is thus seen as a second-Adam figure.

This parallelism between the flood as the great act of de-creation and the re-creation after the flood is underlined in Genesis by the literary design of the story. It is written in a large mirror-image pattern ('extended chiasmus' or 'palistrophe') which emphasizes the symmetry of the story. Here just some of the most obvious features of this structure are noted. (For fuller discussion see Wenham, Genesis 1–15 pp. 155–158).

E Forty days (7:17)	E ¹ Forty days (8:6)
F Mountains covered (7:20)	F ¹ Mountains uncovered (8:5)
G Flooding for 150 days (7:24)	G ¹ Water receding for 150 days (8:3)
H God remembered Noah (8:1)

This structure not only draws attention to the parallels between God's destructive work in sending the flood and his work of recreation but also shows that the turning point was his remembering Noah. The God of Genesis was not impotent before the flood, like the gods of Babylon, but in total control, sovereign in judgment and mercy.

6:9–22 Command to build the ark. Those who construct pictures or models of the ark have to read into Genesis extra construction details, and how far these are valid may be questioned. Particularly obscure is the roof design in v 16. (See the larger commentaries on this.) What most concerns Genesis is the purpose of the ark, which was to keep ... alive all species of living creatures. Hence, pairs had to be taken aboard to ensure their continued breeding.

7:1–5 Command to board the ark. Pairs sufficed of unclean (non-sacrificial, non-edible) animals to secure their survival, but seven (or seven pairs) specimens of clean (sacrificial/edible) animals had to be taken to allow sacrifice to be made after the flood without destroying the species.

7:6–24 Entry to the ark and the onset of the flood. Every stage in the flood is dated very precisely (e.g. 7:11; 8:13, 14). This is appropriate in that the flood brought the old world to an end, and from it the new world was born.

Note on the date and extent of the flood. The Sumerian King List mentions the flood as taking place immediately before the early dynastic period, which could suggest the flood occurred about 3000 BC. Certainly, archaeologists have found plenty of evidence of local floods in Mesopotamia in this period but none suggesting the inundation of the whole area. Another possibility is that the flood coincided with the end of the last ice age (c. 10,000 BC). This involved heavy rain over normally dry regions, and the melting ice led to ocean levels rising 300 ft (100 m) and swamping previously habitable land. (For further discussion see IBD, pp. 510–512.) With our modern geographical knowledge, we automatically understand the story to be describing a total inundation of the globe, but if the story was being told from Noah's perspective (whose geographical horizons were limited), a somewhat smaller flood might have appeared universal.

8:1–22 The flood recedes. The new creation was prompted by God remembering (i.e. thinking which leads to action) Noah (1), and progressively land, vegetation, birds, animals and human beings reappeared on earth (cf. ch. 1). Ararat (4) is not specifically modern Mt Ararat but the territory of ancient Urartu, which is roughly modern Armenia and adjacent areas in Turkey and Iran. V 21 contains very similar language to 6:5. It is not God's attitude to Noah that was transformed by the sacrifice but his attitude to mankind in general. The sacrifices of the righteous Noah, the second Adam, secured the future of the human race from a judgment as catastrophic as the flood.

9:1–17 God's covenant with Noah

Although the new era after the flood was in some ways like that after the original creation, there were differences too. Noah, like Adam, was blessed and told to 'Be fruitful' (1), but now for the first time eating meat was allowed (3). Though Abel (4:2) and Jabal (4:20) raised flocks, only the green plants were assigned to Adam for food (1:30). But now Noah was allowed to eat meat, provided the blood was drained out first as a mark of respect for the God-given life contained in it. This ban on consuming blood is one of the most important food laws in the OT (cf. Lv. 3:17; Dt. 12:16–25; 1 Sa. 14:32–34).

Pre-flood history was characterized by violence (6:11): Abel's murder went unavenged, whereas Lamech overreacted (4:23–24). Now a law of strict retribution was introduced: Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed (6). The idea that punishment must match the crime is fundamental in OT law (Ex. 21:23–25) and modern notions of justice and fairness too. Though the death penalty for murder is a clear case of 'do-as-you-would-be-done-by', v 6 gives a special reason for its appropriateness. Every human being is made in God's image (i.e. represents God on earth), so to protect the unique status of human life the ultimate penalty must be exacted. It was God's purpose that the world should be filled with human and animal life (7–9), for the covenant symbolized by the rainbow was made with every living creature. Genesis does not suggest rainbows first appeared after the flood, only that it became a 'sign', i.e. a pledge of God's goodwill, then.

9:18–29 Ham's sin

Sadly, the righteous and blameless Noah succumbed to drink and exposed himself while sleeping. His relatively minor sin (cf. Adam in 3:6) was followed by the much graver sin of his younger son Ham (cf. Cain in 4:8). Once again by this sequence Genesis suggests history repeating itself. The new human race headed by Noah was, like the former one, on the slide.

Modern readers fail to see the gravity of Ham's sin and ask what is wrong with gossiping or joking to your brothers about your parents' failings? So attempts have been made to suggest Ham was guilty of incest or other sexual impropriety. But these notions are wrong and fail to appreciate how seriously the OT and other ancient cultures took filial duties. 'Honour your father and mother' comes next to the Godward commandments in Ex. 20, and striking or cursing your father or mother could be punished by death (Ex. 21:15, 17; cited by Jesus, Mk. 7:10).

Noah's only words in Genesis (25–27) praise Shem and Japheth but curse Ham (or at least his offspring, Canaan). His words are akin to the death-bed prophetic blessings of Isaac (27:27–29) and Jacob (49:2–27), in which the future history of those mentioned is foreseen. Here Noah predicts the dominance of the descendants of Shem and Japheth (whose identity is clarified in ch. 10) and the subjugation of Canaan. These verses thus serve as a trailer for the next chapter (cf. 4:25–26; 6:1–8).

Why was Canaan cursed for the sin of Ham his father? There is no clear answer. Possibly he participated in his father's sin in some way. Possibly it was a mirroring punishment. As Ham, Noah's youngest son, sinned against his father, so Canaan, Ham's youngest son, was punished.

Possibly, it was because Ham's sin foreshadowed that of the Canaanites, who were notorious for their immorality in the OT (Lv. 18:3).

10:1–11:9 The account of Shem, Ham and Japheth

This section comprises two sections: the Table of the Nations (10:1–32) and the Tower of Babel story (11:1–9) and serves three purposes. First, it defines Israel's relationship to the other nations. Secondly, it explains the diversity of languages. Thirdly, it shows the nations sinning yet further and provoking more divine judgment. It thus prepares for yet another divine attempt to rescue mankind through the call of Abraham.

10:1–32 The Table of Nations

This remarkable text sets Israel within the context of the world known to the OT writers. It lists seventy nations (probably a symbolic round number; cf. the seventy sons of Jacob who went down to Egypt, 46:27), which represent all the peoples of the world, and is not an exhaustive list of all groups known in ancient Israel. It reads a bit like a family tree, but it may be that not all the relationships described are genealogical. In the ancient world, treaties and covenants led to people calling themselves brothers or sons of their treaty-partner. What the Table of Nations describes is the relationship between the different peoples, however they may have originated historically.

But this is not a lesson in historical geography. As always in Genesis, the list was included for a theological reason—to relate the chosen line of Shem to the other non-elect lines. The genealogy of the non-elect is always placed before the chosen line: Cain before Seth (chs. 4–5), Ishmael before Isaac (ch. 25), Esau before Jacob (chs. 36–37). The choice of Shem and the rejection of Ham has already been intimated (9:25–27), and this is confirmed in this chapter. Among the Shemites are found the Arameans, with whom the patriarchs had very close relationships and from whom they sought wives for their sons. Among the Hamites are found not just all the Canaanite peoples but Israel's other great enemies, Egypt (Mizraim), Babylon and Assyria. The Japhethites comprise more distant peoples from the north-eastern Mediterranean seaboard, with whom Israel seems to have had few contacts, either hostile or friendly. It should be noted that the biblical classification into Semitic, Hamitic and Japhethite peoples does not coincide with the modern classification of people by languages. Some of the Hamites (e.g. the Canaanites) spoke Semitic languages, and among the Shemites is Elam, who spoke a non-Semitic language. The biblical divisions reflect much more the differences between those Israel felt were her allies and those who were her enemies.

10:2–5 The Japhethites. Not all these peoples can be identified, and only those which can be confidently identified are discussed here. But those that can be identified seem to represent those furthest from Israel geographically, either in the far north or the far west. For detailed discussion of their identities see IBD or the commentaries of Sarna or Wenham.

Gomer represents the Cimmerians; Magog was somewhere in the north (Ezk. 38:2); Madaï represents the Medes in northern Iran, Javan the Ionian Greeks, and Tubal, Meshech and Tiras have been identified with Turkey. 3 Ashkenaz represents the Scythians, and Togarmah was a district north of Carchemish. 4 Elishah was probably in Crete. Tarshish was a Mediterranean city, possibly Carthage. Kittim is identified with Cyprus and Rodanim with Rhodes (the Dodanim, the alternative reading, may come from the Aegean).

V 5 anticipates the dispersal of the nations described in 11:1–9.

10:6–20 The Hamites. The length of this section indicates its importance. Among the descendants of Ham are some of Israel's closest neighbours and fiercest enemies.

6 Cush was the region south of Egypt. Mizraim is identified with Egypt, and Put with Libya. Canaan is defined further in vs 15–19. 7 The sons of Cush appears to refer to a region in southern Arabia.

8–12 Mesopotamian culture is traced back to Ham via Cush, which is not a flattering pedigree, but it anticipates the explicit criticism of Babylon's pretensions in 11:1–9. Nimrod cannot be definitely identified, but his interests in fighting and hunting were typical of great Mesopotamian kings. The cities he founded are nearly all well known in that region.

13–14 Few of these tribes or peoples can be surely identified. Pathrusites refers to the southern Egyptians. The Philistines were Israel's great rivals for control of Canaan (1 Sa. 4–31). The Caphtorites are Cretans.

15–19 Special attention is given to the inhabitants of Canaan whom Israel expected to displace. Sidon was the oldest Phoenician coastal city. The Hittites (cf. 23:2–20) are different from the well-known Hittites in Turkey. The Jebusites were the residents of Jerusalem. The Amorites, Girgashites and Hivites are often-mentioned Canaanite peoples. The Arkites ... Hamathites were the inhabitants of well-known cities in Syria.

The borders of Canaan reached from Sidon in the north to Gaza in the south and Sodom (by the Dead Sea) in the east. A more precise definition of Canaan's borders is in Nu. 34:2–12.

10:21–31 The Shemites. Since Abraham was descended from Shem, Israel felt a special affinity for these peoples. However, few can be clearly identified, though many seem to be Aramean or Arabian tribes.

That Ham was Noah's youngest son is clear (9:24), but whether Japheth or Shem was the eldest depends on how this verse is translated (see the NIV mg.). Elam was in south-western Iran. Asshur, unlikely to be a reference to Assyria, was possibly a Sinaitic tribe (Nu. 24:22). The Arameans lived in Syria, and presumably the sub-groups listed here lived in that region. In so far as they can be identified Joktan and his descendants seem to have lived in southern Arabia.

11:1–9 The Tower of Babel

This short tale brings the history of the period before the patriarchs to a horrifying conclusion. The new start given to the human race by Noah had already been jeopardized by his drunkenness and Ham's indiscretion; and in the Table of the Nations the effects of the curse on Ham's descendants has already been hinted at. Indeed, 10:5, 18–20 and 31–32 have already anticipated the division by languages and the dispersal of the nations, but now Genesis deals with this explicitly. Human sinfulness now burst all limits as man tried to trespass on God's realm by building a skyscraping temple. This prompted another great judgment affecting the whole human race. Mankind was scattered across the face of the earth and linguistic diversity, which impedes cooperation between peoples, was introduced to prevent any further human efforts to storm heaven. Thus the stage was set for yet one more fresh start for mankind in the call of Abraham.

The tower of Babel, however, is not just another of the sin-and-judgment stories that make up chs. 1–11. All through these chapters we can see an implied critique of the polytheistic world-view of Israel's contemporaries. Genesis' retelling of the history of creation and the flood presents a completely different view of God and his relationship to the world from that found in ancient oriental mythology. But so far the critique of these ideas has been, by and large, implicit; here in ch. 11 it becomes explicit.

Babylon was famed for its temple tower or ziggurat, whose foundations were in the underworld and whose top was in the heavens. No, says Genesis, so far from reaching heaven, Babel's tower could hardly be seen from there—the Lord had to come down to see it (5). Babel means 'gate of god', and Babylon considered itself closer to god than anywhere else on earth. It regarded itself as the religious, intellectual and cultural capital of the ancient world, the showpiece of human civilization. 'Rubbish' says v 9, Babel does not mean 'gate of god' but 'confusion' or 'folly', and far from human wisdom, Babylon's ruined ziggurat, shows human impotence before the judgment of God. Put in modern terms the building of the city and tower may be seen as a human bid for self-achieved security on the basis of technological progress. 'Man proposes, but God disposes.'

11:10–26 The account of Shem

The brief genealogy of Shem is quite similar to that in ch. 5, though the patriarchs' ages are somewhat shorter, and it does not explicitly state the total length of life of each one. It serves to link the history of Abraham to world history and thus provides a bridge between the proto-history of chs. 1–11 and the patriarchal stories of 12–50. Though we know nothing more about the men listed here, Lk. 3:34–36 reminds us of their importance, for from them descended the offspring of Abraham in whom all the families of the earth would be blessed.

11:27–25:11 The account of Terah and the story of Abraham

Terah, Abraham's father, was alive for most of the events described in chs. 12–23, and thus he gives his name to this part of the book (cf. 25:19; 37:2). Its very length indicates its importance for the book. It is not just that Abraham was the ancestor of the Jews, but that he was the man through whom God's purposes of salvation started to be achieved. Adam's disobedience precipitated a deluge of sinful acts that ended in the flood. Noah, the new father of the human race, was 'blameless', but he also fell and that culminated in the overweening pride of Babel. This in turn was punished with a judgment affecting all mankind. Now with Abraham God started again, this time promising 'all peoples on earth will be blessed through you' (12:3).

11:27–12:9 The call of Abram

This section briefly introduces Abram, his family and his homeland and describes his call in a way that summarizes his whole journey of faith.

11:27–30 The family in Ur. This section may be set out in a family tree.

The family of Terah and Abram.

Two things are important to note. First, that Sarai was childless, a catastrophe for a woman in the ancient world. Secondly, that Lot was Abram's orphaned nephew, whom he seems to have adopted. He accompanied Abram, and it looks as though he would have been his heir if Sarai had not had a child.

11:31–32 From Ur to Haran. The whole family moved from Ur, an important centre of culture in southern Iraq, to Haran in eastern Syria. There Terah died at the age of 205, which made Abram 135 (cf. v 26). Abram must have left his father Terah in Haran 60 years before he died (12:4).

12:1–9 From Haran to Canaan. Leaving homeland and family was a much greater decision in a traditional society than in today's mobile, individualistic culture. Abram risked everything he held most dear to obey God's call. Christ similarly challenges people to venture everything to follow him (Mt. 10:37–39; Phil. 3:8).

Vs 2–3 sum up the theology of Genesis and provide the key to its interpretation. (See the Introduction on the Theology of chs. 12–50.) V 4 suggests that God called Abram in Haran not Ur. The Land of Canaan comprised the territory currently (1993) held by Israel, Lebanon and part of southern Syria. Abram's obedience was rewarded by an enhancement of the promise, a land that I will show you (1) becomes this land (cf. the introduction on the theology of chs. 12–50). God's gracious promise prompted Abram to repeated acts of thankful worship, he built an altar (7, 9).

Possible routes for Abram's journey from Ur to Canaan (Gn. 11:31–12:6). The southern route to Haran (heavily dotted line) is the more likely.

12:10–20 Abram in Egypt

Abram's initial religious enthusiasm wilted as he faced famine in Canaan and was forced to migrate to Egypt. Here fear of man replaced trust in God as his guiding principle. Describing Sarai as his sister was a misleading half-truth (cf. 20:12) designed to fend off potential suitors (cf. 24:55). Perhaps Abram hoped to delay any proposed wedding and then leave Egypt before it could take place. But royal suits cannot be denied and Sarai found herself in Pharaoh's harem (15).

From the way the story is told (cf. v 19), it is clear that Abram's behaviour is not commended. Nevertheless, the Lord intervened and rescued him by sending plagues on Pharaoh so that Abram, like his descendants, escaped from Egypt greatly enriched (cf. Ex. 12:35–36). This mini-exodus from Egypt foreshadows its greater successors (cf. Ex. 12–14; Lk. 9:31). It shows God fulfilling his promise to protect Abram (12:3) despite his unbelief. God graciously overrules even the mistakes of those he has called, to their long-term benefit (cf. 45:5–8; Rom. 8:28).

13:1–18 Abram and Lot separate

Chastened by his experiences in Egypt, Abram returned to Bethel, where he had met God before, and prayed there again. Now a new problem arose. The blessing of affluence provoked a dispute between the herdsmen of Abram and Lot. This time, instead of trying to manipulate the situation to his own advantage, Abram appealed for harmony and set the tone himself by displaying exemplary generosity towards his nephew and allowing him the pick of the land.

But 'all that glisters is not gold'. The Jordan valley may have looked like Eden (10), but it was inhabited by wicked men, sinning greatly against God (13). Not for the only time, urban prosperity dazzled a simple countryman who failed to appreciate its underlying corruption.

Abram's generosity towards his nephew was repaid with an even richer statement of the promises. This land (12:9) becomes all the land, and it was given to Abram's descendants for ever (15). His descendants would not be just a great nation (12:2) but become as numerous as the dust of the earth (16). Proposing a peaceable division of the land and giving Lot first choice, Abram showed the love of peace and a willingness to sacrifice self-interest that the Bible always applauds (cf. Ps. 133; Mt. 5:9; Phil. 2:1–15).

Note. 10 Sodom, Gomorrah and Zoar, three of the cities of the plain, cannot be surely located. Five sites on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, which were ruined shortly before 2000 BC, may be the towns concerned.

14:1–24 Abram rescues Lot

The comfortable affluence of Lot was disturbed by invasion. Four kings, led by Kedorlaomer of Elam (part of Iran), conquered the Jordan valley. Thirteen years later a rebellion by the cities of the plain led to another invasion by the same eastern coalition. The armies of Sodom and Gomorrah were defeated, the cities were sacked and Lot was taken captive.

But Abram, leading 318 men, was able to defeat these foreign armies, rescue all those taken captive and return their pillaged property. This was a striking demonstration that God was on Abram's side. But not everyone acknowledged it. The king of Sodom, who had most to be grateful for, offered no word of thanks but brusquely demanded the return of his people. Abram protested that he had no intention of profiting from Sodom's misfortune (21–24).

Melchizedek, the priest-king of Salem (probably Jerusalem), on the other hand, received Abram royally and laid on a banquet for him. Melchizedek then blessed Abram in the name of God Most High, Creator of heaven and earth. Responding to this kindly reception, Abram gave Melchizedek a tenth of all the booty he had taken (20).

The attitudes of Melchizedek and the king of Sodom are deliberately contrasted. They exemplify the two kinds of reaction to Abram predicted in 12:3. Melchizedek is one of those who bless Abram, whereas the king of Sodom clearly disdains (the NIV's curse is too strong) him. Consequently, Melchizedek could expect to be blessed by God, whereas the king of Sodom could look for a curse. Already (cf. 13:13) the fate of the city of Sodom (ch. 19) is being hinted at.

Genesis does not explain what blessing Melchizedek received as a reward for blessing Abram. However, Ps. 110:4 mentions God's oath to David 'You are a priest for ever, in the order of Melchizedek', implying that Melchizedek's memory had been venerated in Jerusalem as a forerunner of the Davidic line. The NT sees Melchizedek as a 'type' of Christ, a forerunner of the Messiah. His high status was acknowledged by Abram giving him a tenth of what he had taken (Heb. 5–7). Apart from these few verses, however, Melchizedek never appears again in Genesis. He stands simply as a reminder that all those who acknowledged God's hand at work in Abram would themselves experience blessing.

The Holy Land at the time Abram's military campaign.

Notes. The many archaic features of this chapter (see Wenham, Genesis 1–15, pp. 318–20) show it is based on an old source, but they also make some of the details hard to understand. 1 The names of the kings (Amraphel, Arioch, Kedorlaomer and Tidal) have an authentic second-millennium ring, but current archaeological evidence does not allow us to identify them precisely. Shinar is Babylonia; Ellasar may be in eastern Turkey; Elam is in modern Iraq; and the Goiim may be a reference to the Hittites. 2 Little is known about the names of these towns and their kings. (On their location cf. the note on 13:10.) 3 Siddim, a term used only here and in vs 8, 10 for the Dead Sea valley, may possibly be a reference to the southern end. 5–7 In so far as the places and peoples can be identified, the eastern raiders seem to have swept south through modern Jordan from Ashteroth in the north to El Paran (possibly Eilat) at the head of the gulf of Aqaba. Then they turned north-west across the Sinai peninsula to Kadesh Barnea. 10 Tar pits. Petroleum oozes to the surface in the area south of the Dead Sea, and this can be dug out. 11 Mamre and Eshcol, the names of Abram's allies, were also places near Hebron. 14 Dan was the northernmost town in Israel and was settled by the Danites (Jdg. 18:29). 15 Hobah is of unknown location. Damascus is the capital of Syria. 17 Valley of Shaveh could be 'the King's Valley' just to the south of Jerusalem (2 Sa. 18:18).

15:1–21 The covenant promise

Abram's defeat of the eastern kings had left him no better off. Despite the promises, he did not as yet own any of the land nor had any children been born to him. His nephew Lot, whom he had hoped might succeed him, was living in Sodom, outside the land of promise. His most likely heir seemed to be his servant Eliezer.

God, therefore, addressed Abram's disappointment directly, 'Do not be afraid Abram. I am ... your very great reward.' This prompted Abram to share with God his sense of disappointment and frustration. Far from provoking an angry response from God, Abram's honesty led to a reaffirmation and deepening of the original promises. He would father a son himself (4), and his descendants would be as countless as the stars (5).

Abram accepted God's reassurance, he believed the LORD (6). The verbal form suggests an ongoing activity, i.e. he kept believing the promise, he kept relying on the Lord. So God credited it to him as righteousness. Righteousness is that state of acceptance by God which comes from perfect obedience to the law. Abram's failure to fulfil the law's demands completely is obvious in Genesis, yet his faith in God's promise of a child is here said to count as righteousness. For Paul, this shows that faith, not works, is the prerequisite to acceptance by God (Gal. 3:6–14). Jas. 2:18–24 and Heb. 11:8–9 point out that Abraham's faith was proved genuine by his good works. This 'faith that works' is central to the Christian understanding of salvation and upright living.

Certainly, Abram's faith was anything but passive. He again asked for reassurance, '... how can I know?' Scripture nowhere condemns those asking honest questions or sincerely seeking assurance. In this case, Abram was given a far-reaching vision of his descendants' future destiny in the land. First, he killed five sacrificial animals, which symbolized the people of Israel and then drove off birds of prey that would have eaten the carcasses. When the sun set he saw a smoking brazier and a blazing torch pass between the pieces. This symbolized the glory of God that would accompany Israel, as they journeyed from Egypt to Canaan, in the pillar of fire and cloud (Ex. 14:24). This interpretation of the animal rite is confirmed by vs 13–16, which predict the period of slavery in Egypt and the subsequent exodus. Now for the first time it became apparent that God's timescale for the fulfilment of his promises was a long one. Abram was losing patience that little had happened in the ten years (cf. 12:4; 16:16) that had elapsed since the promise was first made, but God was thinking in terms of 400 years (13). Christian believers are warned in 2 Pet. 3:3–10 not to be surprised if other promises take longer to be fulfilled than they expect.

Notes. 2 One who will inherit ... Damascus is a difficult phrase, but the NIV's translation is as good as any. 16 Here the Amorites covers all the inhabitants of Canaan. Israel's conquest could not take place until the Amorites' sins warranted judgment. To have given the land to Abram would have involved an injustice. The promise could only be fulfilled when it coincided with perfect justice (cf. Lv. 18:24–27; Dt. 9:4–5). 19–21 This is the longest list of the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan, only some of whom can be identified (cf. the comment on 10:15–19).

16:1–16 The birth of Ishmael

Abram may have been willing to wait for God to fulfil his promise of a child but Sarai was not. She was hopelessly infertile, so she decided to resort to surrogate marriage, which was a perfectly respectable practice in the other cultures of the ancient Near East. A child born to a slave-girl could be regarded as the wife's own child, if she had no children of her own.

Many in ancient times saw nothing wrong in surrogate marriage, and surrogate motherhood is still an issue in contemporary society. Genesis, however, clearly does not agree with the practice. Sarai blamed God for her infertility, which suggests her motives were defective. Vs 3–4 echo the description of the fall (cf. 3:6), implying sin, and finally, the conceitedness of Hagar and the anger of Sarai show this scheme was not of God.

Yet divine mercy brings good out of human folly. On the run from her mistress, Hagar met the angel of the LORD, God in human form who most often appears in dire personal crises to bring assurance of salvation. Hagar was assured that her descendants would be too numerous to count, just as Abram had been told earlier (13:16). Her child's name would be Ishmael ('God has heard') and he would adopt a bedouin-like lifestyle, which was typical of the later Ishmaelites (11–12). Urged to return to Sarai, Hagar did so and in due course gave birth to a son. But though Sarai had hoped that the child would count as her child, vs 15–16 makes it quite clear that Ishmael was the son of Hagar and Abram and not Sarai's child. Her scheme had failed to produce a child for her. But was Ishmael Abram's promised son? We are left to wonder, but 17:18 shows that Abram at least had concluded Ishmael was the child God had promised.

Notes. 7 The location of Shur is disputed, but the road to Shur is one of the routes to Egypt through the Sinai peninsula. Hagar was on her way back to Egypt, her home (1). 13 The Hebrew behind 'I have now seen the One who sees me' (i.e. 'looks after me') is difficult and has led to many emendations and translations. The NIV's rendering is as apt as any. It is an expression of thankful amazement that God cares for people in the most unexpected situations (cf. Ps. 139:1–12). 14 On Kadesh cf. 14:7, but Bered's location is unknown.

17:1–27 The covenant of circumcision

This chapter is a watershed in the Abraham story. It marks a most significant turning point. The author does all in his power to highlight its importance. For one thing, it is very precisely dated. A cluster of dates (16:16; 17:1, 17, 24) mark this section out as special, just as the flood story is marked. Also striking here is the change of name for Abram and Sarai to the more familiar Abraham and Sarah. Five long divine speeches (1–2, 4–8, 9–14, 15–16, 19–21), arranged in a A-B-C-B-A pattern and devoted to a detailed exposition of the covenant promises, make this chapter unique in the Abraham story. Thereafter divine speeches become much rarer in the book. But these speeches do not just amplify the covenant promises, they speak of establishing or ratifying the covenant (7, 19) and introduce the sign of circumcision as a mark of the covenant's ineradicable nature (9–14).

The section begins with a reminder of the lapse of time since the birth of Ishmael, some 13 years (cf. 16:16 and 17:1). During this period Sarai had lost all hope of motherhood (cf. 18:11), and Abram had accepted the idea that Ishmael was his promised son (18). Almost immediately, however, God started to enlarge the promises. Abram was not simply to become a 'great nation' (12:2) but father of many nations (5). As a pledge of this, his name was slightly changed from 'Abram' meaning 'the father is exalted' to a variant pronunciation, 'Abraham'. Though no word raham meaning 'multitude' is known, such a word must have existed in Semitic to explain the play on his name here.

He is further promised that the covenant will be eternal and that his descendants will possess the whole land of Canaan (8). This is the first time such a precise definition of the promised land has been given (cf. 12:5). Here too the essence of the covenant is most clearly defined, I will ... be your God. Abraham and his descendants were in a unique relationship with God. The inclusion of Abraham's descendants within the covenant is yet another innovation of this chapter.

Circumcision, involving the removal of the male foreskin, was the mark of this covenant. All males in Abraham's household, whether freemen or slaves, had to be circumcised. Those who refused circumcision would be cut off (14), i.e. would die prematurely and mysteriously. Circumcision was a fairly common practice in the ancient Near East, but only the OT invested it with such significance, making it a mark of Israel's covenant status.

These promises were remarkable, but now they become astonishing. Sarai's name was changed to Sarah (both words mean 'princess') heralding the announcement that she would bear a child in her old age. (Even if Abraham and Sarah's ages (100 and 90 years respectively) are not to be taken literally, at least they indicate an age well beyond normal parenthood; cf. 18:11). Incredulous Abraham pleaded that Ishmael should be the child of promise, but God insisted that the chosen child would be born of Sarah and be called Isaac. Ishmael, however, would not be overlooked.

Eventually, after this unprecedented disclosure of God's purposes, Abraham reacted and promptly circumcised himself, Ishmael and all the men of his household. Here (as in 12:4–9) he completely obeyed God's call despite the pain it involved. One more painful act of obedience would be required of him to seal the covenant once and for all (cf. ch. 22).

Notes. 1 God Almighty (Heb. El Shaddai) is, like 'God Most High' (Heb. El Elyon ; 14:9) one of the old pre-Mosaic names of God in Genesis. Its precise meaning is uncertain, but it is always associated with God's promises of children (28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3). 19 Isaac means 'he [i.e. God] laughs/smiles' (cf. 17:17, 'he laughed'). The name expresses the parents' pleasure at the birth of a son. Like Ishmael and Jacob, Isaac is an old name typical of the early second millennium.

18:1–19:38 The overthrow of Sodom

No other twenty-four-hour period in Abraham's life is described more fully than this one. This indicates the importance of this episode for the narrator, yet on the face of it the destruction of Sodom has little to do with the fulfilment of the promises to Abraham. Admittedly, it opens with angels coming to visit Abraham and Sarah and announcing to her, albeit indirectly, that she would have a son. The rest of the story, however, apparently adds nothing to the promise theme.

Much more obvious are the parallels with the flood story. In both stories one righteous man and his family are saved from a universal destruction through God's intervention. Both stories have a short appendix in which the drunken father is disgraced by his children (9:20–27; 19:30– 38). Both stories are structured as lengthy ‘palistrophes’ or ‘mirror-images’ (cf. comments on 6:9–9:29).

A Abraham looks towards Sodom (18:16)	A ¹ Abraham looks towards Sodom (19:27–28)
B God’s reflections on Sodom (18:17–21)	B ¹ Sodom destroyed (19:23–26)
C Abraham’s plea for Sodom (18:22–33)	C ¹ Lot’s plea for Zoar (19:17–22)
D Angels arrive in Sodom (19:1–3)	D ¹ Departure from Sodom (19:15–16)
E Assault on Lot and angels (19:4–11)	E ¹ Lot’s sons-in-law reject appeal (19:14)
F Sodom’s destruction announced (19:12–13)

So how does the story of Sodom’s overthrow relate to the main theme of Genesis, the fulfilment of the promises to Abraham? First, it shows Abraham’s intimacy with God. It was the Lord who let Abraham know what he was thinking of doing to Sodom, and this prompted Abraham’s long intercession for the righteous of the city. The Lord accepted his plea that if he could find ten righteous people there he would spare the whole city. Unfortunately, the only righteous man in Sodom was Lot. The wickedness of all the others is demonstrated by the concerted attack of all men of the city—young and old—on Lot’s house (19:4). Nevertheless, the Lord heard Abraham’s prayer and rescued Lot from the city for his sake (19:29). Potentially then, the city of Sodom could have been blessed through Abraham (cf. 12:3); it was their own misconduct that cut them off from divine mercy.

Secondly, the fate of Sodom was already hinted at in 14:21. There the king’s disdain for Abraham boded ill for the future, for 12:3 warned that he who disdained Abraham would be cursed. Failure to acknowledge God’s work in choosing Abraham was disastrous (cf. Mk. 3:22–30). Although Lot was saved from the fiery destruction of Sodom thanks to Abraham’s prayers, his end was a sad one, the ultimate conclusion of his decision to part from Abraham and identify with the glitzy life of Sodom. In this way Genesis portrays the awful consequences of choosing the path of self-indulgence instead of identifying oneself wholeheartedly with God and his chosen servants.

Finally, the destruction of Sodom was a warning of what was to happen to the Canaanites as a whole if they persisted in their sinful ways. The OT insists that it was because of their wickedness that the Canaanites were conquered and displaced by Israel (15:16; Lv. 18:24–28; 20:22–24). Thus, the destruction of Sodom was a pledge of the conquest of Canaan and the fulfilment of the land promise to Abraham. But the NT views the destruction of Sodom, like the flood story, as of universal significance. Jesus warned that towns that failed to respond to his teaching (Mt. 11:20–24) would suffer worse than Sodom, and Revelation draws heavily on the imagery of Gn. 19 to describe God’s judgment on all cities and nations who set themselves against Christ (e.g. Rev. 11:8).

18:1–15 Isaac’s birth announced to Sarah. The repetition of the promise of Isaac’s birth is not redundant. In 17:19 only Abraham had been told; now Sarah had to be informed (10), for evidently Abraham had not mentioned it to her. The doubling of the message, like the doubling of dreams (41:32), indicates its prompt and certain fulfilment, at the appointed time next year.

Notes. 1 Mamre, near Hebron, was about 20 miles (32 km) south of Jerusalem. 2–8 Abraham’s concern for his guests is a model of oriental hospitality, a trait expected of all God’s people (Heb. 13:2). Angels are usually taken for men in the Bible until their words or deeds prove them otherwise. Here one of the angels seems to be the angel of God, i.e. the LORD himself (22), whereas the other two, who went on to visit Sodom (19:1), are his attendants.

18:16–33 Abraham’s plea for Sodom. It was God’s choice of Abraham that led him to disclose his plans (17–20). Abraham is here portrayed as a great prophet, one who was privy to God’s secrets and turned his knowledge into prayers for his people (cf. 1 Sa. 12:23; Am. 3:7). But Abraham prayed not just for his own people but for the town which had treated him so unkindly (cf. Mt. 5:44).

Notes. 21 The visit of the angels to Sodom (19:1–13) would confirm its wicked reputation.

19:1–26 Lot’s family rescued from Sodom. 1–3 Lot greeted his visitors just as warmly as Abraham (18:2–8), though his hospitality is described more briefly. That Lot was alone and no-one else greeted the visitors is ominous though.

4–11 The reputation of Sodom for wickedness is soon confirmed. Instead of welcoming their visitors, the Sodomites (note all the men of the city were involved) demanded to rape their visitors. No greater flouting of oriental conventions of hospitality can be imagined than to make guests submit to homosexual rape. Ancient societies often condoned homosexuality between consenting adults, but rape, especially of guests, was always regarded as wrong. Lot’s commitment to his guests was total, as the offer of his daughters demonstrates. Happily, this unfortunate offer was rejected by the attackers, and the angels struck them with temporary blindness.

14 As the NIV makes plain, it is not clear whether the Heb. sons-in-law means the men were already married to his daughters or just betrothed. Once again the Sodomites had only themselves to blame for their destruction, as they rejected Lot’s invitation to escape.

16–26 Even Lot and his family failed to appreciate the urgency of the situation, and the angels had to drag them out of the city. The Dead Sea region still reeks of sulphur, and the strange rock formations there recall the fate of Lot’s wife, who was even more attached to Sodom than he was (Lk. 17:32).

The Dead Sea region when Lot lived in Sodom.

19:30–38 Lot’s daughters. These verses portray the pathetic end of a righteous man who had compromised with the world. Putting their desire for children above principle (for their deeds breach both incest rules and filial duty), Lot’s daughters contrived to have intercourse with him. This was the origin of the Moabites and Ammonites, two of Israel’s nearest neighbours. The Ammonites lived east of the Jordan and the Moabites north-east of the Dead Sea (cf. Nu. 21:24).

20:1–18 Sarah and Abimelech

The contrast between Abraham's saintly deeds in ch. 18 and his deceitful cowardice here shocks every reader. If his fear in Egypt (12:10–20) was understandable though not justified, what can be said for his repeating the same misleading story about his wife in Gerar, a small town in the south-eastern corner of Canaan (cf. 10:19)? After enjoying such intimacy with God in ch. 18 why had he apparently abandoned faith in divine protection and relied on his cunning? On the other hand, the men of Gerar are shown to be very different from the Sodomites. Abimelech protested the purity of his motives and his desire to please God. So we learn that Abraham was not as saintly as ch. 18 perhaps suggested, nor were all the Canaanites as wicked as Sodom. Real life is often a mixture of contradictions—the totally pure or completely evil exist only in fiction.

Nevertheless, despite Abraham's failings, God did protect him and Sarah and enrich them and grant grazing rights (15). Moreover, he heard Abraham's prayers for Abimelech and his wives and healed their temporary infertility (17–18). Despite Abraham's failings, the promises were still being fulfilled. But if God could answer Abraham's prayers for Abimelech's infertile wife, what about Sarah? Was she not going to have the child as promised?

Notes. 1 From there, i.e. from Mamre (cf. 18:1). On Kadesh see 14:7, and on Shur see 16:7. 3 Throughout the ancient orient, adultery warranted the death penalty (cf. Lv. 20:10; Dt. 22:22). 5 A leader's sins have dire consequences for his people (cf. 2 Sa. 24). 12 Later biblical law forbade marriage with half or full sisters (Lv. 18:9, 11).

21:1–21 Isaac and Ishmael part

The birth of Isaac is described surprisingly briefly in view of the space devoted to Sarah's lack of a child in the story so far. However, the triple reminder that the LORD ... did what he had promised in vs 1–2 underlines the significance of the birth. Without a son, none of the long-term promises to Abraham of land, numerous descendants or blessing to the nations could be fulfilled. Isaac's birth to an incredibly old couple proves the reliability of God's promises and that nothing is too hard for the LORD (18:14). As instructed (17:12), Abraham circumcised Isaac on the eighth day after birth.

Sarah's laughter expressed her jubilation at Isaac's birth and shows the appropriateness of his name ('Isaac' means 'he laughs'; cf. 17:19). Unfortunately, her joy turned sour when she saw Ishmael mocking (lit. 'Isaacing') Isaac. Quite what the older boy was doing is unclear. (Ishmael must have been at least fifteen years old by this stage, for weaning in Bible times often did not take place till children were two or three.) However, it seems likely that Ishmael was making fun of Isaac's status as Abraham's heir. He was therefore guilty of 'disdaining' Abraham and his heir, and, as the story has already illustrated with the king of Sodom, this was a serious matter (12:3; 14:21). So God endorsed Sarah's petulant demand for Ishmael's expulsion (10–12). Abraham, however, was very fond of Ishmael (cf. 17:18), and he exploded in anger (the NIV's very distressed understates his feelings) at Sarah's proposal (12). Only God's reassurance that Ishmael would himself become a great nation persuaded Abraham to send Hagar and Ishmael away, with as much food and water as they could carry.

Soon supplies were exhausted, and they were lost and near to death. Ishmael started to pray, perhaps regretting his behaviour that had led to their expulsion. His prayer was heard, and an angel of God (cf. 16:7–11) called to Hagar, repeating the promises (18) and pointing out a well. As a result, their lives were saved. Yet again the aptness of Ishmael's name ('God hears') is demonstrated, and so is God's willingness to answer the prayers of those whose folly lands them in dire straits, if they turn to him in penitence. At the same time, the status of Isaac as the only child through whom the promises can be fulfilled became inescapable.

Notes. 14 Beersheba is about 50 miles (80 km) south of Jerusalem. 21 The Desert of Paran, the largest wilderness south of Canaan, covers much of the Sinai peninsula, Negev and Arabah.

21:22–34 Treaty with Abimelech

This treaty with Abimelech (cf. ch. 20) marked another small but decisive step towards the fulfilment of the promises. Under the treaty Abraham secured legal rights to a well near Beersheba. For a herdsman totally dependent on guaranteed access to water for his flocks this was a most important provision. This was the first foothold that Abraham secured in the land of Canaan. As a mark of his thankfulness to God Abraham planted a tamarisk tree and worshipped (33).

Notes. 22 It is not clear whether this incident immediately follows 20:18, 21:7 or 21:21. 23 Abimelech proposed a treaty with Abraham, and then (25–30) Abraham exploited the opportunity to secure permanent rights to the well his herdsman had dug. 31 Beersheba, as the NIV mg. points out, means ‘well of seven’ or ‘well of the oath’.

22:1–24 The sacrifice of Isaac

This is at once one of the most dramatic and most theologically significant episodes in Genesis. The cruel command to sacrifice Isaac, the pathos of the solitary ascent by Abraham and his son to the place of sacrifice, the painful process of binding him and laying him on the altar and the last-minute intervention from heaven makes this one of the best-told stories in world literature. But it is more than that. It is the last great test of Abraham’s faith, comparable to the original call to leave his home and family (cf. v 2 with 12:1). Although we are told it was a test (1), for Abraham God’s command was totally real. It was appalling emotionally and theologically, for on Isaac all the promises of blessing depended for fulfilment. Torn between love for his child and obedience to God, Abraham faced agonizing choices. Step by step, faith and hope triumphed over fear and doubt until the knife was raised to slay his son. In this way he showed he was willing to put God’s call above every other commitment and emotional attachment, and at that moment the test ended. He had passed with flying colours. A ram was sacrificed in place of Isaac, and the angel declared that Abraham’s act of obedience changed the status of the promises. They became sworn guarantees of innumerable descendants, the capture of land and blessing on him and, through him, on all the nations of the world.

Vs 16–18 are the last words spoken by God to Abraham in Genesis, and their significance should not be underestimated. From now on there is no doubt about the fulfilment of the promise. Abraham’s obedience prompted God to guarantee his promises with an oath.

For the NT, however, there is more to the sacrifice of Isaac than the supreme example of someone committing himself to obey God completely (Heb. 11:17–19); it is a picture of God’s sacrificial love. Just as Abraham gave his only son as a sacrifice, so the Father ‘did not spare his own Son’ for the world (Rom. 8:32; Jn. 3:16). In Isaac’s ready submission to Abraham’s will we see an image of the Son who said ‘Father ... not my will, but yours be done’ (Lk. 22:42).

20–24 With Isaac’s future guaranteed (17), the narrative now looks ahead briefly to show us the pedigree of his future bride, Rebekah. As ch. 24 makes plain, God had everything arranged. This little genealogy shows how God provides for our needs before we even recognize them (Mt. 6:25–34).

Notes. 1 God tests people to uncover their true character (cf. Dt. 8:2, 16). 2 Moriah is usually identified with the mountain in Jerusalem where the temple was erected (2 Ch. 3:1).

Thus, Abraham's sacrifice of the ram foreshadowed the subsequent animal sacrifices in the temple, as well as the supreme 'Lamb of God' (Jn. 1:29). As Abraham subsequently discovered, Moriah means The LORD Will Provide (22:8, 14). The name of the place where his son was to die would prove to be the place of God's provision. Human sacrifice is not part of God's will for his people. A burnt offering was a common type of sacrifice, in which the whole victim was burnt upon the altar (cf. Lv. 1). 9 It was usual to bind animals before sacrifice. Binding is mentioned only here in the OT and underlines Isaac's willingness to be sacrificed.

23:1–20 The burial of Sarah

Sarah, the grandmother of the nation of Israel, deserved a worthy tomb. But there was more to the purchase of a proper burial plot than that. Abraham was determined to own a piece of the promised land before he died and to bury his wife there. The lengthy negotiations described here show him using his need for a grave for Sarah to establish ownership of land.

The courteous but tough negotiations proceeded in three stages. First, Abraham asked the Hittites to give him (the NIV's sell is too precise) some land for a burial plot. They immediately offered him any of their graves (perhaps 'caves') to inter Sarah (3–6). Secondly, their kindly response prompted Abraham to request that Ephron sell him the cave of Machpelah. Ephron then offered to give Abraham the cave and the field (7–11). But a gift does not secure ownership as firmly as purchase, so finally Abraham insisted on buying the field and the land. Eventually he persuaded Ephron to name his price. Maybe the price was high for the land in question, 400 shekels would buy a large plot, but Abraham did not quibble (12–16). Now the land with its cave was unquestionably his, and he buried Sarah in it. Thus, before he died, Abraham had become a legal owner of part of Canaan, and yet another aspect of the promises had been partially fulfilled.

Notes. 1 Hebron was near Mamre (cf. 18:1), where Abraham had received many of the promises (13:8; 18:1). 3 The Hittites Semitic names make it unlikely that they had any connection with the Hittites of Asia Minor. They were just another ethnic group among many in Canaan (cf. 15:19–21). 9 The present-day mosque in Hebron has first-century BC foundations, which shows that the claim that it covers the tombs of the patriarchs is old.

24:1–67 Rebekah's call to marriage

Sarah's death and burial was followed immediately by Abraham's. At least, that is the perspective of ch. 24; 25:7 implies a much longer gap between the two deaths. In v 1 Abraham appears to be on his deathbed, and by the time the servant returns with Rebekah, Isaac is alone and head of the household (65).

As befits a man who had given his life to fulfilling promises, Abraham's last words expressed his concern that this should also be the family's priority after he had gone. He made his servant swear to find Isaac a wife, a prerequisite if the promise of numerous descendants was to be realized. She must not be a Canaanite but come from Abraham's relatives and, like Abraham, be willing to settle in Canaan (5–9).

The servant was a model of loyalty and persuasive speech, who commended his master's interests by word and deed. His speeches were finely judged to persuade Rebekah's family to give her in marriage to the unknown Isaac (34–49). Then, when next day they stalled about letting her go immediately, he refused to take no for an answer and insisted that they depart (54–58). But despite all his natural gifts, the servant was a man of prayer. He relied on God, not on chance or his own ability. Arriving at the well he prayed 'O LORD ... give me success today', and, as is often the case, his prayers were answered more quickly (before he had finished praying) and more fully (a daughter of Bethuel ... and very beautiful) than he had anticipated (cf. Is. 65:24; Eph. 3:20).

Rebekah herself not only exceeded the servant's expectations, she was shown to be the perfect wife for Isaac (cf. Pr. 31:10–31). She was energetic (running to draw water for ten camels; v 20), hospitable (eager to welcome the servant to her home; v 28) and, above all, a woman of faith (ready like Abraham to leave home and family for the land of promise; v 57, cf. Mt. 19:29).

Notes. 10 Aram Naharaim is an area now in northern Syria, east of the Euphrates. The town of Nahor is probably Haran (cf. 11:31) or a city nearby. 15 For a fuller genealogy see 22:20–24. 53 These gifts to the family, elsewhere called the bride-price or marriage present (RSV, Ex. 22:16–17), sealed the betrothal agreement. 62 On Beer Lahai Roi see 16:14.

25:1–11 The last days of Abraham

A modern reader automatically assumes that this section describes Abraham marrying again after the death of Sarah, but there is nothing here to justify this assumption. It seems more likely that he had married Keturah earlier, perhaps after divorcing Hagar.

The genealogy in vs 2–4 links Israel (via Abraham) with various tribes and peoples that live on the fringes of Canaan (e.g. Midian was a group of traders [37:28, 36] who lived in the deserts of Sinai [Ex. 3:1] and Transjordan [Nu. 25; Jdg. 7–8]). The genealogy expresses Israel's affinity with these peoples and shows how the promise that Abraham would father many nations (17:4–6) was partially fulfilled.

Notes. 8 Gathered to his people means not just that Abraham's body rested with his relatives in the family grave, but that his soul was reunited with theirs in the afterlife. 9 On Machpelah see ch. 23.

25:12–18 The account of Ishmael

Genesis tells the history of Israel's ancestors by interspersing long accounts of the main chosen line of Abraham (chs. 12–25), Isaac (chs. 25–35) and Jacob (chs. 37–50) with very short summary accounts of the side lines of Ishmael (25:12–18) and Esau (36:1–37:1). Ishmael was Abraham's eldest son and was the ancestor of the Ishmaelites, a group of twelve tribes who inhabited the deserts to the south and east of Israel. Many of the names in vs 13–14 seem to be places or tribes in Arabia or Sinai.

Genesis is not, however, just interested in history and geography. Ishmael's mother Hagar was told 'he will live in hostility towards all his brothers' (16:12). His father Abraham was assured he would father twelve rulers. This account shows how both predictions came true (16, 18). If the Lord fulfilled these fairly minor promises, how much more surely would he fulfil the much greater promises made to Isaac, Abraham's chosen son.

25:19–35:29 The account of Isaac and the stories of Jacob and Esau

Just as the account of Terah is largely concerned with Terah's son Abraham, so the account of Isaac tells the story of Isaac's sons, Jacob and Esau. It begins with two boys fighting each other in the womb and continues with Jacob cheating Esau out of his birthright and his blessing. Then, in danger of his life, Jacob fled from home, settled with his cousins and eventually returned to Canaan to make peace with his brother. Like the Terah account, this long section of Genesis is concerned with tracing the relationship between Israel (Jacob) and neighbouring peoples (Esau represents Edom) and with the fulfilment of the great promises of land, blessing and descendants. This section also has minor themes of its own, including Jacob's triumph over Esau and God's protective presence with Jacob. It is a story of a family broken by feuding, whose members meet God in their distress and eventually achieve reconciliation.

25:19–35 First encounters of Jacob and Esau

Two short sketches introduce us to Jacob and Esau. After twenty years of childlessness (25:20, 26, cf. Sarah), Rebekah at last conceived, and she had a horrible twin pregnancy. The babies smashed each other (the NIV's jostled is too gentle) inside their mother's womb. Their antenatal battle foreshadowed the life-long struggle between them.

In her distress Rebekah turned to a prophet who cryptically interpreted her condition: 'Two nations are in your womb, ... the older will serve the younger'. Even as they were born, there was no let up in the struggle between them; Jacob came out second, clutching his brother's heel. Esau was red (admoni) and hairy (sear), and this anticipated his future homeland known as Edom and Seir. Similarly, Jacob's name was interpreted in terms of his behaviour at birth. Jacob is an old second-millennium name (as are Ishmael and Isaac), which scholars suggest meant '[God] rewards or protects'. But here, as often in the OT, a traditional name is given a new meaning. Jacob is linked with the word 'heel' (eqeb) and is probably understood to mean, 'he clutches at the heel' (i.e. the grasping, cheating competitor).

Though twins, their characters developed quite differently. Jacob became a cool, calculating stay-at-home, whereas Esau became an impetuous, active countryman. One day Jacob exploited his brother's hunger to exchange some lentil stew for his birthright, i.e. the privileges assigned to the firstborn son of the family. The narrator neither explicitly commends Jacob for his unbrotherliness nor Esau for disdaining his birthright, but the incident does show the prophecy of the older serving the younger was already being fulfilled.

Note. 20 Paddan Aram is in northern Mesopotamia near Haran.

26:1–33 Isaac and the Philistines

Isaac was overshadowed by his father and his sons. Outside this chapter there is not much about him. Here we have a collection of snapshots from his life, illustrating how, despite his timidity and moral shortcomings, Isaac received extraordinary promises and experienced extraordinary blessing that in some respects outshone even Abraham's.

The comparison with Abraham's career is clear in v 1 by the reference to the earlier famine of Abraham's time (see 12:10). The promises made to Isaac exceed even those given to Abraham in 22:16–18, when the promises became guarantees. Here the promises are made to Isaac and his descendants and all these lands, not just Canaan, are given to him.

Like his father Abraham, Isaac pretended his wife was his sister. Happily, Rebekah, unlike Sarah, never joined the royal harem. But Isaac's misleading comments were just as blameworthy as his father's (10–11). Nevertheless, like Abraham, Isaac enjoyed extraordinary prosperity with his crops yielding a hundredfold (12).

His prosperity provoked jealousy, and the Philistines prevented him from using the wells dug by Abraham. (The legal right to these wells was the first one that Abraham acquired in Canaan; cf. 21:22–34). Indeed, Isaac allowed himself to be pushed around by the Philistines. Genesis does not make clear whether this happened because he was prompted by cowardice or because he was a peacemaker.

The LORD, however, reassured him, ‘Do not be afraid, for I am with you,’ and the promise of children was reaffirmed. As if to confirm these promises a delegation from Gerar arrived asking Isaac to make a security pact with them, because ‘We saw clearly that the LORD was with you.’ Now at last Isaac enjoyed peace and secure water supplies in the land of promise.

Thus, through this collection of incidents we see how God’s promises made initially to Abraham were even more abundantly fulfilled in the life of Isaac. Once again, this was not always the result of his virtue but happened despite his mistakes. The timid can experience divine blessings as much as those who respond to God’s call with greater confidence. Indeed, God’s grace is more evident in weaker vessels (1 Cor. 1:27–31; 2 Cor. 4:7).

Notes. 1 The Philistines of Genesis are different from those in Judges, who arrived in Canaan c. 1200 BC. The later Philistines came from Asia Minor and the Aegean, and these earlier groups may have come from the same area. 7–11 Perhaps this incident preceded the birth of Jacob and Esau in 25:26. 26 His personal adviser is better translated ‘his chief of shepherds’. He was the man responsible for supervising grazing rights with a ‘police force’ to enforce his decisions, a sort of police chief. 33 Another explanation of the name of Beersheba is given (cf. 21:30–31).

26:34–28:9 Jacob cheats Esau of his blessing

This is one of the most gripping stories in Genesis. Will Jacob’s disguise deceive his father? Will he receive the blessing before Esau returns? But it also poses moral and theological problems. Does God approve of Jacob’s cheating? Will he endorse a blessing gained under false pretences?

On first reading we tend to see Rebekah and Jacob just as rogues who exploited the blindness of Isaac to do down Esau. In fact the situation is not so black and white. Esau had married two wives, which was a bad step in itself (cf. Lamech, 4:19–24). Moreover, they were Hittites, i.e. Canaanites (see 23:3). Abraham had been most concerned that Isaac should not marry a Canaanite girl (24:3); why had not Isaac insisted on, or even arranged, a suitable match for Esau? Worse still, Isaac on his deathbed flouted convention and showed total bias towards Esau. When patriarchs knew their death was near, they were expected to summon all their sons and give them each a blessing (cf. chs. 48–50). Now, lamely pretending he does not know the day of his death (2), Isaac summoned only his favourite, Esau. No wonder Rebekah, who had long preferred Jacob (25:28), was incensed.

It is not clear how far Jacob approved of Rebekah’s scheme to outwit Isaac and obtain the blessing. His reluctance to cooperate may have been prompted as much by fear of being caught out as by moral scruple (11–12). Nor is the narrator’s evaluation immediately obvious. Isaac was clear that his blessing was irrevocable: that since it was pronounced over Jacob it belonged to him (37).

Yet in the longer term it is apparent that Jacob’s deceit caught up with him and Rebekah. Esau’s anger at Jacob’s deed forced the latter to leave home, so that despite Rebekah’s hope that he would only be away a few days (a while, v 44) she never saw him again. Jacob, who cheated his father, would soon be cheated by his father-in-law Laban, who would force him to marry Leah as well as Rachel. This would be a cause of perpetual distress to Jacob for the rest of his days. In their turn, Leah’s sons would deceive Jacob with a kid about Joseph’s fate, just as Jacob deceived his father with a kid (37:31–35; 27:9, 16). Later too, Jacob acknowledged his fault. When he returned to Canaan, he gave flocks and herds to Esau and invited him to accept them with the words ‘Please accept my blessing [the NIV’s ‘the present’ is inexact] that was brought to you’ (33:11). With this gesture he was trying to give back the blessing he had cheated Esau out of.

Nevertheless, despite the underhand way in which Jacob obtained the blessing, it was still valid. Isaac’s last words predicted the future relationship between Jacob (Israel) and Esau (Edom). The nation of Israel would usually dominate Edom. Israel would enjoy a settled agricultural existence, whereas Edom would be more of a nomadic people in the dry wilderness areas (28–29, 39–40). Furthermore, the promises made first to Abraham and repeated to Isaac, would now be fulfilled through Jacob (28:3–4).

Here, as often in Genesis, this new step forward in the history of salvation is set against the backdrop of unscrupulous behaviour by the patriarchs involved. Once again, it is God’s mercy, not human merit, that is the ultimate hope of redemption (cf. Rom. 9:10–18).

Notes. 28:2 On Paddan Aram cf. 25:20.

28:10–22 Jacob meets God at Bethel

Personal crisis is often the occasion for deep spiritual experience. So it was for Jacob. Running away from home to a foreign country, he lay down and dreamed under the stars. In his dream the Lord himself reiterated the promises of land, descendants and blessing to the nations made first to Abraham and repeated to Isaac. But a fresh element was added, ‘I am with you ... and will bring you back to this land’ (15). The promise of God’s accompanying presence was to be made to many leaders of Israel (cf. Ex. 3:12; Jos. 1:5; Jdg. 6:16), indeed, it is Christ’s promise to all his followers (Mt. 28:20; Heb. 13:5–6). But unlike many, Jacob was privileged to see his guardian angels (cf. Mt. 18:10; 26:53).

Waking up next morning, he set up the stone as a sacred pillar, that is, as a symbol of God’s presence. He poured oil over it to consecrate it, and then he made a vow pledging that he would tithe all his income if God brought him back in peace. Vows like this were, and are, commonly made by people in distress (cf. 1 Sa. 1:11) and, as long as the votary performs his vow, the OT does not discourage them (cf. Dt. 23:21–23; Ec. 5:4–6). Vows are not necessarily bargaining with God, rather they can express our dependence on him. Nor was Jacob’s vow here an expression of unbelief in the promises just made to him (15), for all petitionary prayer is based on God’s promises to provide for our needs (cf. Mt. 6:11 with 6:25–34).

Notes. 19 Bethel (‘house of God’) was about 12 miles (19 km) north of Jerusalem.

29:1–30 Jacob marries Rachel and Leah

God’s promised protection of Jacob soon proved itself. Jacob, like Abraham’s servant years earlier (ch. 24), journeyed to northern Syria and there met his future bride at a well. And, like the servant, he stayed in the home of his cousins. But whereas the servant came laden with Abraham’s wealth, Jacob brought nothing and was not half so attractive to the money-oriented Laban.

He had, however, fallen in love with Rachel (this is one of the few romantic marriages of the OT.) and, prompted by Laban, he asked if he could marry her. Normally betrothal was sealed by the payment of the bride-price (marriage present), given by the man’s family to the bride’s family (cf. the note on 24:53). Jacob, without any family support, could not make the usual payments, so he offered to work seven years for Rachel’s hand.

When the years were up, Laban seemed reluctant to go ahead with the wedding, and Jacob had to push him (21). Little is known of wedding procedures in Bible times except what can be inferred from this passage and Jdg. 14. A seven-day party for friends and relations was the main event, but doubtless vows and pledges were exchanged too (cf. Ho. 2:2, 16). On the first evening the veiled bride was brought to her husband. Doubtless the veil, darkness and alcohol all prevented Jacob from realizing Leah had been substituted for Rachel.

Jacob's indignation is only briefly touched on in v 25 (see comments on 29:31–30:24 below). Despite human sin, however, God's plans were forwarded, for from Leah six of the tribes of Israel, including Judah, were descended. Laban did make one concession to Jacob, he allowed him to marry Rachel immediately, but he cruelly demanded an extra seven years' service for Leah. Those did not pass as quickly as the first seven (20; cf. 29:30ff.).

Note. 24 It was the universal custom in the orient for the bride to be given a large present by her father when she married. This was called the dowry. Usually it is not mentioned, but here it is, for Leah's exceptional dowry included a maid-servant called Zilpah. Zilpah and Bilhah (29) also became mothers of Israelite tribes (30:3–13).

29:31–30:24 The birth of Jacob's sons

God never intended bigamy to be practised, for he gave Adam only one wife, and 4:19–24 gives a glimpse of how brutal bigamists can be. Here, however, we view the tragedy from the wives' side. Having been tricked into marrying Leah, Jacob never really loved her or her children. Indeed, he does not ever seem to have regarded her as his wife. But she was desperate for his affection, as the names she gave to each of her children indicate. Her deepest desire was that 'my husband will love me now' (32; cf. vs 33–35; 30:18–20). But her efforts to achieve this never worked. Rachel, on the other hand, was consumed with jealousy because Leah had succeeded in bearing children whereas she remained childless. Jacob may have loved her, but what she wanted was a baby. She pleaded with him, 'Give me children, or I'll die' (30:1).

The desperation of both wives is further illustrated in vs 3–16. First, Rachel resorted to surrogate marriage through her slave-girl Bilhah (a practice already criticized in ch. 16, when Sarah encouraged Hagar to become pregnant on her behalf). The unhappy repercussions of that former decision rumbled on to ch. 21. Here, Leah responded to Rachel's use of surrogacy by putting forward her maid-servant Zilpah as a second surrogate wife. This, however, was not the end of their struggle, for Reuben (Leah's eldest son) found some man-drakes, an ancient fertility drug. There followed a bizarre negotiation in which Rachel offered to trade a few nights in Jacob's bed for the man-drakes. Through their deal Leah hoped to gain Jacob's love and Rachel hoped to become fertile.

The result was another three children being born to Leah but no success for Rachel. It was only when God remembered Rachel that she became pregnant (22–23). Grace, not drugs, had met her need. It was in this unhappiest of biblical marriages that the twelve forefathers of the Israelite tribes were born, for Reuben, Simeon, Levi and so on are the names of the tribes. (For the meaning of the names see the NIV mg. Most of the meanings given here are plays on the words, not historical etymologies.) The promises to Abraham had taken an important step nearer fulfilment with the birth of these boys. Once again, it is on divine mercy, not human effort, that the hope of the world's salvation rests.

14 Mandrakes were famed in ancient times for increasing sexual desire and enhancing fertility (cf. Song 7:13). 21 Girls are rarely mentioned in genealogies, but in ch. 34 Dinah will occupy a central role (cf. Rebekah in 22:23). 24 Rachel's prayer was eventually answered, but she died giving birth to Benjamin (35:16–20).

30:25–31:1 Jacob outwits Laban

The ancient readers of Genesis read this section with great pleasure, for it tells how Laban, the mean old crook, was outwitted in a freely negotiated deal with his nephew Jacob.

It was the birth of a boy to Rachel that was the signal to Jacob that he must return home. Now that his wife had borne a child he had to go back to the land of promise. So he asked Laban for permission to leave. Laban cloaked his refusal in pious terms, claiming he could not afford to let Jacob go as he enjoyed so much blessing (27). So Jacob made a proposal that would cost Laban nothing. Sheep were normally white and goats normally black. Jacob said, 'Take away all the bicoloured animals, and I shall look after the monochrome sheep and goats. If any of these breed bicoloured offspring, they shall be mine.' Laban judged the chance of white sheep producing bicoloured lambs or black goats producing bicoloured kids to be small, so he agreed.

At mating time Jacob put bicoloured (peeled) branches in front of the stronger animals and by this means led them to bear bicoloured lambs and kids. Scientifically this is inexplicable, unless we suppose that the stronger animals owed their strength to being hybrids and this was the reason they produced bicoloured offspring. But such an explanation is beyond the horizon of Genesis. It sees Jacob's success as proof of his cunning and that God was with him (28:15). The episode demonstrates God intervening to help Jacob, so that he became exceedingly prosperous (43). Although Laban's sons felt Jacob had cheated them (31:1), the story makes it plain that Jacob had done well by keeping strictly to the agreement he had made with Laban.

Note. 27 'I have become rich' (NIV mg.) is preferable to 'I have learned by divination'.

31:2–32:2 Jacob leaves Laban

Another family crisis was brewing. It was not his brother plotting to kill Jacob, but his brothers-in-law, who were causing trouble this time. Once again, at Jacob's low point God spoke to him and told him to return home, again reassuring him, 'I will be with you' (3; cf. 28:13–15).

But it was more difficult escaping Laban's clutches than Esau's, for now Jacob was married with four wives, thirteen children and large flocks and herds. He was now part of Laban's clan, and disengagement was not easy. This chapter tells how he at last made the break and started for home.

First, he had to persuade his wives to leave their father. Note how he omitted to mention aspects of the situation that might have deterred them (e.g. Esau's hatred, their unhappy marriage) but emphasized how God had helped him through all the difficulties (4–16). Secondly, Jacob picked a time when Laban was away from home busy sheep-shearing, and this allowed him a three-day start over his father-in-law (19, 22).

Eventually Laban caught up with Jacob, and there was an almighty row. Indeed, if God had not appeared to Laban in a dream, warning him not to touch Jacob, there could have been war (24). This again demonstrates that God was with Jacob, fulfilling the promise to bring him back to the land of Canaan (28:15). But after charge and counter-charge, they eventually agreed to make a covenant and they parted amicably. Finally, as Jacob neared Canaan and the encounter with his brother he saw again the angels reminding him how they had guarded him on all his journeys (cf. 28:12).

Notes. 10 The dream is not mentioned in 30:31–43. 21 The River is the Euphrates. Gilead is the hilly region east of the Jordan, between the sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. 32–34 It is not clear why Rachel wanted the household gods, which were some sort of images (cf. 2 Sa. 19:13, 16). It is often supposed that their possession conveyed inheritance rights, but it is more likely that Rachel viewed them as a sort of charm, protecting her on her journey to a foreign land. 39 Normally shepherds did not have to foot the bill for loss from their flocks when it was caused by wild animals (Ex. 22:13), but Jacob had. Laban had enjoyed much better service from Jacob than would normally have been expected. 50 It is ironic that Laban should insist that Jacob take no extra wives, when he had imposed bigamy on him! 32:2 Mahanaim was somewhere north of the River Jabbok.

32:3–33:20 Jacob and Esau are reconciled

Here we come to where we began. Jacob's return home meant he must meet Esau again. Despite the divine encouragements, such a reunion seemed very dangerous. Had Esau forgiven him? Would he seize the chance to kill Jacob? These were the anxieties uppermost in Jacob's mind as he returned. All his actions were designed to soften the great encounter. He sent a delegation to make contact (3–5), and they returned with the alarming news that Esau was on his way with 400 men. They did not say whether the men were hostile or not, but Jacob feared the worst.

This drove him to pray. It is a model prayer, in which he first referred to God's command to return (9) and then to God's generosity in fulfilling past promises to him (10), before he mentioned his present plight and asked for God to deliver him and his family to ensure the fulfilment of the promises. Here Jacob based his plea on God's faithfulness to his promises. Earnest prayer, however, is no excuse for doing nothing practical. Jacob divided up his flocks and servants and sent a series of generous presents to Esau in the hope that perhaps he will receive me (20).

Action continued throughout the night as Jacob ferried his family over the Jabbok River. Then, unexpectedly, Jacob found himself wrestling with a man. He refused to say who he was, but it became clear to Jacob that the man was God. With a mere touch he put Jacob's hip out of joint, and he changed Jacob's name to 'Israel, because you have struggled with God and with me and have overcome' (28). The whole incident is shrouded with mystery. Not only did it take place at night, but what was God doing attacking Jacob and yet being unable or unwilling to defeat him? Here the paradox of the human condition is vividly summed up. On the one hand, God allows, even puts his people into, difficult or impossible situations, but it is the same God who delivers us from them. We pray, 'Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil'. This experience of Jacob at the Jabbok summed up his career. It was God who had brought him to this crisis situation, confronting Esau, but it was the same God who would bring him through victoriously. His successful struggle at the Jabbok was a pledge that his confrontation with Esau would also have a happy outcome. He was a new man as his new name 'Israel' indicated, the victor over God and man.

Next day Jacob limped out confidently to meet Esau, going ahead of all his wives and children (33:1–3). Esau suddenly appeared and ran to meet Jacob and embraced him; he threw his arms around his neck and kissed him (4). This total forgiveness overwhelmed Jacob, who could not quite believe it. Indeed he compared his brother's forgiveness to God's (10). (It is likely that Jesus drew on this story in his portrayal of the father of the prodigal son in Lk. 15:20.) Jacob sought to return the blessing (11) from which he had cheated Esau. Esau reluctantly accepted and then urged Jacob to come and live with him in Edom. Jacob politely declined (was it loyalty to God's command or lurking doubts about Esau's sincerity?), and they went their separate ways. Jacob entered Canaan and purchased a piece of land there. This was the second piece of real estate in Canaan acquired by the patriarchs. Slowly but surely the promises were being fulfilled. This prompted Jacob to worship God (20).

Notes. 3 Seir was the mountainous region south-east of the Dead Sea. 22 The Jabbok (ez-Zerqa) is a tributary of the Jordan, joining it 25 miles (40 km) north of the Dead Sea. 26 To keep his identity secret, the man asked to leave before daybreak. 28 Jacob's old name recalled his grubby past (27:36). His new name, Israel, was a promise of future triumph. 32 The tendon attached to the socket of the hip is a reference to the sciatic nerve, which looks like a tendon. The custom of not eating this nerve is mentioned only here in the OT. 33:3 Bowed down probably signified more than an act of deference. Jacob was symbolically trying to act out the blessing as Isaac intended, 'may the sons of your mother bow down to you' (27:29). 17 Succoth was somewhere in the Jordan valley (cf. Jdg. 8:5–6). 18 'He arrived at Shalem, a city of Shechem' (NIV mg.) is preferable to he arrived safely at the city of Shechem.

34:1–31 Dinah avenged by her brothers

The happy coexistence of Jacob with the sons of Hamor (33:19) was shattered by this appalling incident. Jacob had survived twenty hard years in Paddan Aram, and had escaped Laban's clutches only with difficulty. Then an unexpectedly happy reunion with Esau had brought him at last to Canaan, the land of promise, where he was happily settling down. Now his future there was placed in the direst danger by his sons' savagery (30).

But who was to blame for this situation? Was it just Jacob's sons? Whom does Genesis regard as responsible? How were God's purposes expressed or the promises forwarded by this episode? As Genesis sees it, the situation was complicated and the guilt widely shared. Dinah should not have been so familiar with the women of the land; socializing with Canaanites could lead to intermarriage (28:7–8). But that was trivial compared with Shechem's fault. Premarital intercourse is always wrong according to the OT and NT, and here the offence was further aggravated by it being forcible rape. Nevertheless, Shechem was not totally black, his lust turned into love, though Jacob and his sons doubtless did not realize this, for Dinah stayed willingly or unwillingly in Shechem's house (26).

Surprisingly, Jacob seemed unconcerned at Dinah's fate, but after all she was only Leah's daughter, and her children did not count in his eyes! But her brothers were appalled, not simply at Dinah's plight but by their father's unconcern. 'If our father will not stick up for his daughter, we must' was their reaction.

So there followed the elaborate negotiations. The deceit on the brothers' side is patent, but a close comparison of what Hamor and Shechem said to Jacob's sons (8–12) with what they said to the inhabitants of their town (21–23) shows that they too were a bit devious. But even so, the attack of Jacob's sons went beyond what was just, and we must agree with Jacob's criticism of their action here and later (49:5–7). Yet that is not all there is to be said. Here Jacob merely criticised their action for endangering his own skin (30). But moral values can never be upheld if people are not prepared to antagonize others occasionally. Shechem had treated Dinah like a prostitute, and by being willing to be paid off by Shechem for his action, Jacob too was treating her in the same way. Indirectly his sons were calling him a pimp!

Thus, none of the actors in this story appear with credit. Yet despite their deplorable behaviour, Jacob and his family were greatly enriched. The assault on the Shechemites foreshadowed the conquest. The Canaanites were doomed because of their sexual immorality

(Lv. 18:24–25). But does that imply Israel deserved the land they conquered? No, according to Deuteronomy, ‘It is not because of your righteousness or your integrity that you are going in to take possession of their land; but on account of the wickedness of these nations ... to accomplish what he [the LORD] swore to your fathers, to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob’ (Dt. 9:5). The sins of God’s chosen people may delay, but they do not ultimately frustrate, the fulfilment of his promises.

Notes. 2 Hivites were often found in northern Canaan (cf. 10:17). 12 In cases of premarital intercourse, OT law insists on payment of the marriage present (bride-price), usually equivalent to several years’ wages, to the girl’s father. He could then allow the marriage to proceed if he wanted to (Ex. 22:16–17; Dt. 22:28–29; cf. Gn. 24:53).

35:1–29 Journey’s end for Jacob and Isaac

Paralysed by fear of a potential Canaanite attack, Jacob was roused by God’s command to go on to Bethel, which was where he had made a vow when he was running away from home (28:10–22). Bethel (‘house of God’) was a holy place, and those polluted by war (cf. Nu. 31) and idolatry had to purify themselves before proceeding. Then they set out, and remarkably no-one attacked them, for a terror inspired by God had fallen on the Canaanites (cf. Ex. 23:27). Yet again the promise ‘I am with you and will watch over you’ (28:15) had been fulfilled.

Just as Abraham’s three-day pilgrimage to Mt Moriah was crowned with the richest statement of the promises he ever experienced (22:16–18), so was Jacob’s pilgrimage to Bethel. The promises given here (11–12) sum up and exceed all those previously made to him: he would be a father of nations, kings would be descended from him, and his descendants would inherit the land promised to his father and grandfather. Only the promise of God’s presence with him is not repeated, for that had obviously been fulfilled by his safe arrival in Bethel.

Spiritual elation was followed, however, by domestic tragedy. Rachel, Jacob’s favourite wife, died giving birth to her longed-for second son (cf. 30:24). Then his eldest son had intercourse with Bilhah, perhaps in an attempt to prevent her replacing Rachel as Jacob’s favourite wife and to claim leadership of the family. Such an act of incest warranted the death penalty according to Lv. 20:11 (cf. Lv. 18:8). Jacob did not comment until later (49:3–4), but there is no doubt that the incident further undermined relations between Leah’s sons and their father. Their mutual antagonism was very evident in ch. 34 (Dinah, Simeon and Levi were Leah’s children) and was to ruin Jacob’s closing years related in chs. 37ff. But as the short list of all Jacob’s sons reminds us, they were all born in fulfilment of God’s promise. Jacob’s failure to accept them did not affect their status. At least the hostility between Jacob and Esau appears to have been laid to rest as they joined together to inter their father in the family grave at Machpelah (cf. 49:31).

Notes. 8 This is the only mention of Deborah. 10 This is a reminder of the significant new name given to Jacob in 32:28. 16 Still some distance from Ephrath should be translated ‘about two hours’ distance from Ephrath’, i.e. about 7 miles (11 km) north of Ephrath, the district in which Bethlehem is located (Mi. 5:2). This suggests Rachel was buried north of Jerusalem, somewhere near Ramah (Je. 31:15), not at the relatively modern tomb which bears her name near Bethlehem. 21 Migdal Eder was perhaps near the pools of Solomon, 3 miles (5 km) south-west of Bethlehem.

36:1–37:1 The account of Esau

As already noted, Genesis alternates accounts of the non-elect patriarchs, Ishmael and Esau, with accounts of the chosen line—Terah and Abraham (chs. 12–25), Isaac (chs. 25–35) and Jacob (chs. 37–50). As in Ishmael’s case, the account of Esau does not contain much apart from genealogical information (cf. vs 1–8 with 25:12–18).

The opening summary of Esau’s career notes that, like Lot, he migrated out of Canaan for economic reasons (6–8; cf. 13:5–12).

Analogy with 25:12–18 leads us to expect a short summary of Esau’s family, but instead we find a second title in v 9, followed by a list of his sons (10–14), chiefs descended from him (15–19), sons of Seir (20–28), Horite chiefs (29–30), Edomite kings (31–39) and more chiefs (40–43). There is much overlap between the lists; many of the names appear in more than one list. C. Westermann (Genesis 12–36 [SPCK, 1986]) has suggested that perhaps these lists in vs 10–43 were derived from Edomite archives which were brought to Jerusalem after David conquered Edom (2 Sa. 8:13–14). This is speculative, but it could account for the reduplication apparent in this chapter.

Once again, this section shows how the promises were being fulfilled. Esau’s migration left Canaan to Jacob (37:1). Rebekah had been told that two nations were in her womb and that ‘the older will serve the younger’ (25:23). The emergence of Edom as a kingdom, recorded here, and its later subjection to Israel fulfilled these ancient predictions. If these relatively minor predictions came true, how much more certain is the fulfilment of the central promises made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

Notes. 12 Amalek was one of Israel’s bitterest foes (cf. Ex. 17:8–15). 20 For the relationship between Seir, the name of a region (32:3) and its earliest inhabitants, and its later inhabitants, the Edomites, cf. Dt. 2:12. 31 The kings of Edom do not seem to have constituted a centralized dynasty. More like the judges of Israel, these kings ruled in different centres at different times.

37:2–50:26 The account of Jacob

The account of Jacob, often inaccurately called ‘the Joseph story’, tells the story of Jacob’s extended family, of which he was the head. Thus, like the accounts of Terah (chs. 12–25) and Isaac (chs. 25–35), it is mostly concerned with the actions of the sons of the patriarch in question. Thus, the account of Jacob deals with all Jacob’s sons, not just Joseph. It traces the relationship between Joseph and his brothers, particularly Judah. Next to Joseph and Jacob, Judah is the most important character in the story.

The account of Jacob tells how his sons fell out with each other. The sons of Leah and the concubine-wives, like their mothers, were not loved by Jacob. He had eyes only for Joseph and Benjamin, the sons of his beloved Rachel. Already in chs. 34–35 we saw tension between Leah’s children and Jacob; now the family snapped. Leah’s sons sold Joseph into Egypt; and when they told their father that he had been killed it broke his heart. Meanwhile Joseph, through slavery and imprisonment, rose to become the Pharaoh’s righthand man, and the broken family was eventually reconciled.

The account of Jacob is, however, more than a story of a broken family restored. It shows how God uses the deeds of sinful people to save the world, for as Joseph said to his brothers, ‘You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish ... the saving of many lives’ (50:20). The account of Jacob traces more steps on the path to the fulfilment of the promises. Jacob’s family was fruitful and multiplied; and at the end of Genesis he had seventy descendants. Jacob and his sons enjoyed God’s protection and blessing. Through Joseph’s provision for the famine many ‘peoples are blessed’. The only aspect of the promises that does not seem to have been advanced by these chapters is that of the land, for Jacob’s whole family abandoned Canaan for Egypt. However, both Jacob and Joseph insisted before they died that they must be buried in the family tomb at Machpelah, for ‘God will surely ... take you up out of this land to the land he promised on oath to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob’ (50:24).

37:2–36 Joseph’s brothers sell him into Egypt

Paternal favouritism and Joseph’s youthful impudence were too much for his brothers. The first episode traces the gradual disintegration of Jacob’s family. First through Joseph telling tales on his brothers (2), then by Jacob giving him a special robe as a mark of his love, and finally by God sending two dreams that predicted that Joseph would one day rule over his brothers.

According to 41:32, duplicate dreams were thought to indicate they would certainly and promptly be fulfilled. Joseph’s brothers, however, determined to prove the dreams wrong. They decided to kill him, and only the chance to make a quick profit made them change their minds. Twenty shekels (three years’ wages for a shepherd) was a useful bonus. So Joseph was sold to traders, who then sold him as a slave to an Egyptian official. When the news of Joseph’s apparent death reached his father, he was heartbroken. His children’s efforts to comfort him proved fruitless, and he declared he would remain in mourning till his dying day. So the divided family was shattered and all seemed hopeless. Yet the dreams still stood, and Genesis expects its readers to view them as setting out God’s agenda and to keep wondering how the discrepancy between Joseph’s situation as a slave and what the dreams predicted will be resolved.

Notes. 3 The robe was the basic outer garment, a long ‘tee-shirt’ reaching the knees or ankles. 10 The reference to your mother need not imply that Rachel was still alive. 12 On Shechem see 12:6. 14 On Hebron see 23:1; 18:1. 17 Dothan was 14 miles (22 km) north of Shechem. 20 Cisterns were cut out of the limestone and used to store water in the dry season. 25 The Ishmaelites are also referred to as Midianites (28, 36; cf. 39:1). The terms seem to be used interchangeably here and in Jdg. 8:24. Either ‘Ishmaelite’ means nomadic trader, and ‘Midianite’ is the tribe involved, or the Midianites were a subtribe in a group of tribes named the Ishmaelites. 29 Reuben had evidently wandered off when the Ishmaelites arrived and bought Joseph. 31 Note the divine justice catching up on Jacob, who when he was young had deceived his father with a kid (27:9–16).

38:1–30 Tamar humbles Judah

By this unexpected interruption of the story of Joseph, Genesis keeps us in suspense. We must wait a little longer to discover what became of him in Egypt. But the story of Tamar and Judah is not irrelevant to the main course of the narrative. In many ways it relates to the rest of chs. 37–50 in themes and phraseology. It is concerned with how the promise of descendants for the patriarchs should be fulfilled. It shows how the hard-hearted Judah was stopped in his tracks, and prepares us for the new compassionate Judah of ch. 44. It tells of yet another twin birth in which the younger overtook the older (38:27–30).

The modern reader is, however, most perplexed by the sexual antics of those involved. Does the narrator really approve of Tamar’s behaviour? Why did Judah and his sons behave as they did? Was there enough time for the events in ch. 38 to occur between 37:36 and 39:2? Given that people usually married soon after puberty in Bible times, it would be possible to suppose that everything in ch. 38 occurred within the space of about twenty years. According to 37:2, 41:46–

47 and 45:6 twenty-two years elapsed between Joseph's sale into Egypt and his brothers' discovery of him there.

In many societies, ancient and modern, the custom of Levirate marriage is known. According to the OT variety, the brother-in-law of a childless widow was expected to marry her to produce children for his dead brother. Dt. 25:5–10 regards such a marriage as desirable but not compulsory. However, in the earlier time of Judah and Tamar the brother had an absolute duty to marry his widowed sister-in-law, and the father-in-law was expected to see this duty fulfilled.

Judah and his sons were reluctant to do their duty, and Onan practised a kind of contraception. This contravened the spirit of 1:28, the letter of the Levirate custom and the promise to the patriarchs, who had been assured they would have numberless descendants. So Onan died (10) because he had resisted God's declared will. Judah, who should have been concerned to see his next son Shelah fulfil his legal duty and ensure the promise's fulfilment, did nothing.

Tamar, a widow, had no legal redress against her father-in-law's injustice. So she contrived to trap him. She outwitted him and obtained her rights under the Levirate law and two sons for the household of Jacob. Indeed, one of her sons was the ancestor of David and Jesus. In the process she made a fool of Judah and showed up his hypocrisy, so that ultimately he was forced to confess, 'She is more righteous than I' (26). This is not to say that sleeping with one's father-in-law is approved of; 'And he did not sleep with her again' (26; cf. Lv. 18:15) shows it was not. Tamar's irregular behaviour was, however, in this instance, warranted because of her father-in-law's much greater negligence of morality and theology. It was her offbeat act that brought Judah to his senses.

Notes. 1–5 Adullam and Kezib were both near Hebron. 12 Timnah was about 4 miles (6 km) west of Beth Shemesh. 13 Sheep-shearing was a busy, lively festival (cf. 31:19; 1 Sa. 25:2–37). 18 Seals were carried on a cord threaded through the middle. 24 Prostitution is too precise a translation: 'illicit sexual intercourse' would be more apt. Probably, Judah regarded Tamar as guilty of adultery in that she was supposedly betrothed to Shelah. The death penalty could be demanded in this case, but not death by burning, which was reserved for even worse offences (Dt. 22:21; Lv. 21:9). 29 Perez's genealogy is in Ru. 4:18–22.

39:1–47:31 Joseph in Egypt

After a short digression about Judah, the narrative resumes the record of Joseph's doings. Three periods in his life in Egypt are described: in Potiphar's house (39:1–20); in prison (39:21–40:23); and in the palace (41:1–57). The first two periods begin with the comment that the LORD was with Joseph (2, 23) and end with Joseph's downfall, showing him thrown into prison (20) or forgotten there (40:23). The third period is a complete contrast: it begins with Joseph in prison and closes with him as vizier of Egypt.

These three episodes focus on Joseph alone, and there then follows the account of how he was reunited with his family. This too is described in three panels describing the three visits of Joseph's family to Egypt (42:1–38; 43:1–45:28; 46:1–47:31). On each journey more of Joseph's relatives went down to Egypt, and the last journey involved the whole family.

39:1–20 Joseph in Potiphar's house. Joseph landed on his feet in Egypt, having been bought by Potiphar, a high-ranking Egyptian official, described as captain of the guard. This post entailed him being in charge of the prison for royal prisoners (cf. 40:3–4). He may also have been in charge of catering at the palace.

Joseph quickly rose from being an ordinary slave working outdoors to working indoors, in the house of his ... master (2). Then he was appointed as Potiphar's personal attendant (4), and finally he was put in charge of the whole household (4–5). Joseph's success was not merely a reflection on his ability but on the fact that the LORD was with him, and that through him Potiphar enjoyed God's blessing (5).

Joseph's loyalty to his master was supremely demonstrated when Potiphar's wife tried to seduce him. He fiercely repudiated the very idea of an affair, saying 'How ... could I do such a wicked thing and sin against God?' (9). This is a sentiment every part of Scripture agrees with (cf. Pr. 5–7; Mt. 5:27–32). But the desperate woman eventually had her revenge. She caught Joseph alone in the house and pulled off one of his garments. (The NIV's cloak suggests an outer garment, but more probably it was his under-tunic or shorts.) She then brandished this before the other slaves and later her husband, claiming that Joseph had tried to rape her. Her accusations were a travesty of the facts (cf. vs 11–13 with vs 14–15 and 17–18), but they were sufficient to convince Potiphar. Or were they? He did not execute Joseph, as would normally have happened in rape cases, so perhaps he had his doubts about his wife's tale. But to be incarcerated in a royal prison on a false charge was a tragic fate for such a loyal servant as Joseph, though he was not the last to suffer for righteousness' sake (cf. Mt. 5:10–12; 1 Pet. 2:21–25). Joseph is often regarded as a 'type' of Christ, the perfect servant who was unfairly condemned, and those who follow Christ may well find themselves walking in the footsteps of Joseph and Jesus.

Notes. 6 The only other person in the OT to be described as well-built and handsome is Rachel (cf. 29:17). Therefore, it was a case of like mother, like son. Well-built may convey the wrong idea. 'A fine figure' would be more accurate as it is uncertain whether big muscularity was the OT's ideal body.

39:21–40:23 Joseph in prison. To have hopes raised and then dashed is a familiar human experience, but there was a particular poignancy about Joseph's situation as both his sale into slavery and his imprisonment were quite unjust (40:15). After having given advice to the royal cupbearer he thought he might have been rewarded by being released, but yet again he was disappointed.

His experiences in the royal prison echo those in Potiphar's house. He was rapidly promoted and became the personal attendant of the royal cupbearer and baker. These men were not just in charge of the royal cellar and bakery but were also advisers to the Pharaoh. Joseph had good reason to hope that the cupbearer would recognize the injustice done to him, but once he was released the man forgot. Once again the discrepancy between the narrator's observation that the LORD was with Joseph (39:23) and Joseph's being left to languish in prison is blatant. Joseph's skill in interpreting dreams was one indication that God was still with him (cf. 40:8), but deliverance was the ultimate proof of God's support and presence, and that eluded Joseph. That his sufferings were the pathway to glory was yet to be revealed (cf. Phil. 2:5–11).

Notes. 19 The NIV's hang you on a tree is more exactly (as the mg.) 'impale you on a pole'. Joseph was predicting an aggravated form of death penalty for the baker: execution followed by exposure. Exposure was designed to prevent the soul resting in the afterlife (cf. Dt. 21:22).

41:1–57 Joseph in the palace. Thirteen years of slavery and imprisonment came to an abrupt end. Joseph was whipped out of prison and into the Pharaoh's presence. It was not just the surroundings, however, that had changed. The once brash teenager who so riled his family had become the essence of tact and wisdom. The vale of tears had proved to be the valley of soul-making, and at last it starts to become apparent why Joseph had been allowed to suffer in this way. God's control of events became evident in his sending the smug Pharaoh two disconcerting dreams. It became plainer still when the cupbearer suggested that Pharaoh should ask Joseph to interpret them and he said, 'God will give Pharaoh the answer' (16). Then finally Pharaoh appointed Joseph his deputy, with the words, 'Can we find anyone like this man, one in whom is the spirit of God?' (38).

Joseph thus epitomized the gifts of prophet and wise ruler. He had divine insight into the future and governed Egypt with the Spirit of God, so that Egypt and the surrounding countries were saved from famine (cf. Ps. 72:16; Is. 11:2). In this he is once again a 'type' of Christ, the greatest prophet and king; the Suffering Servant through whom the world is saved and to whom every knee must bow (Phil. 2:10, cf. Gn. 41:43). Christ's experience of suffering followed by glory is a path all Christians must be ready to follow (1 Pet. 5:6).

Within the horizons of Genesis this episode raises questions. Twice in consecutive episodes Joseph had interpreted two dreams, and here he observed that the reason for paired dreams is that the matter has been firmly decided by God, and God will do it soon (32). What then about his own pair of dreams (37:5–11)? Were they going to be fulfilled? Do not the names Manasseh and Ephraim that he gave to his sons really imply that there was still something missing, that he had not forgotten his father's household? These are hints that Joseph's appointment to the supreme office in Egypt is not the climax of the story; there is still more of God's purpose to be revealed.

Notes. 17–24 Cf. Pharaoh's retelling of the dreams with the original account (1–7) to see the impression they had left on him. 33–36 Note how knowledge of God's purpose is a spur to human action, not an excuse for doing nothing. 39–43 Joseph's job description and the description of his installation show he was being appointed vizier of Egypt. 43 Make way is probably better translated 'bow down' (see the NIV mg.). 57 In all the world, i.e. all the countries near Egypt.

42:1–38 Joseph's brothers' first visit to Egypt. The first visit of Joseph's brothers to Egypt is told in seven scenes, which are echoed in the description of the second visit: Jacob's sons sent to Egypt (1–4; cf. 43:1–14); they arrive in Egypt (5; cf. 43:15–25); they have their first audience with Joseph (6–16; cf. 43:26–34); they are kept in custody (17; cf. 44:1–13); they have a second audience with Joseph (18–24; cf. 44:14–45:15); they leave Egypt (25–28; cf. 45:16–24); and report to Jacob (29–38; cf. 45:25–28).

No sooner had Joseph said, 'God has made me forget ... all my father's household' (41:51) than his brothers turned up in Egypt. And what was more surprising, considering the many visitors who came to Egypt at that time, Joseph saw them there. He recognized them but, of course, they failed to recognize him.

This is the first of three journeys to Egypt by Joseph's brothers, and each is more momentous than the previous one. When Joseph saw his brothers he remembered his dreams (9; cf. 37:5–11). Ten brothers bowed down to him in Egypt, but the dreams had shown eleven brothers and his parents honouring him. Where were the missing brother and father? This discrepancy between the prediction and the reality, as well as intense curiosity, prompted Joseph to question his brothers harshly.

He also contrived to replicate the situation when they had abandoned him to Egypt and returned home without him. He held Simeon hostage to see whether they would trade food for him, as they had exchanged Joseph for cash. The brothers sensed the analogy, and their guilty consciences prompted them to see divine judgment in their predicament and to describe details of their sin, which had not been mentioned previously (21–22).

These first hints of contrition were reinforced when they found money in one of their sacks (28). They continued to relive the events of twenty years earlier when they arrived home. Once again, they had to explain why they had lost one of Jacob's sons. The demand that they take Benjamin down to Egypt to secure Simeon's release was totally unacceptable to Jacob, for Benjamin had replaced Joseph in his affection. Jacob had his suspicions about his sons' tale, and then they were terribly confirmed. As they emptied their sacks, all the money tumbled out. They must have sold Simeon, Jacob thought. He made his accusation indirectly by saying, 'You have deprived me of my children. Joseph is no more and Simeon is no more' (36), and then he declared, 'My son Benjamin will not go down with you' (38). All the bitterness and sorrow of the last twenty years had come to the surface. How will this torn family ever come together again? How will Joseph's dreams be fulfilled? The first visit to Egypt has left many questions unanswered in the reader's mind.

Note. 30–34 Note how the brothers omitted to tell Jacob of the worst aspects of their Egyptian experience, e.g. their imprisonment or the death threat (17, 20). Even so Jacob was not persuaded!

43:1–45:28 The second visit to Egypt. Throughout this account of the second visit comparisons are being made with the previous one, and to appreciate the full flavour of the account the two visits need to be carefully compared with each other. This visit does not merely look backwards, however, it also foreshadows the third journey, when all the family moved to Egypt for good.

Jacob was still head of the family, and until he withdrew his opposition to another visit his sons could not leave. At last, hunger and Judah's promise to stand surety for Benjamin made Jacob relent. Just as he had faced the tricky reunion with Esau, so now Jacob put his trust in a present for the man in Egypt and prayer (cf. 32:7–21). Jacob's prayer shows the feebleness of his faith, yet God's mercy far outruns Jacob's expectations. He prayed that 'he will let your other brother and Benjamin come back' (14). By the other brother Jacob meant Simeon, but he was reunited with Joseph as well.

Jacob was full of apprehension about Benjamin's safety, and his sons were worried about heaven catching up on their sin. Whenever anything unexpected occurred, panic overtook them (18, 23; cf. v 33). Their uneasy consciences interpreted every development as a sign of judgment.

When he met them again, Joseph was all kindness, enquiring gently about 'your aged father', blessing Benjamin ('God be gracious to you, my son') and finally treating them to a generous banquet. The contrast with the previous harsh questioning that they had endured at his hands (cf. 42:6–16) must have further disoriented them. And how did this Egyptian vizier know the order of their ages (33)? Yet they accepted it at face value and feasted and drank freely with him.

Next morning, just as they were congratulating themselves on being able to leave Egypt safely with Simeon, Benjamin and food supplies, their world fell in. Benjamin, of all people, was arrested for stealing the silver cup, and they all had to return to Joseph's palace. It was the collapse of a world built on hatred, lies and deception, and it revealed their true characters. In particular, the hard-hearted Judah, who had proposed the sale of Joseph into slavery and demanded that his daughter-in-law be burnt (37:27; 38:24), showed himself a changed man. In the longest speech in Genesis, he pleaded eloquently for Benjamin's release, touchingly describing the effects that Benjamin's non-return would have on their aged father, and finally offering to take his brother's place himself. Now at last, it was clear that the age-old animosity between the sons of Leah (e.g. Judah) and the sons of Rachel (Joseph and Benjamin) was over. Even though Jacob might regard only Rachel and her sons as his real family, his other sons would have preferred Egyptian slavery to breaking their father's heart (44:33–34).

Judah's readiness to sacrifice himself for his brother and father allowed Joseph to reveal his own identity and the divine purpose behind his own suffering. God used his brothers' evil deeds to save lives (cf. 45:7). 'It was not you who sent me here but God' (45:8) sums up the whole purpose of the Joseph story. God overrules human deeds, whether good or evil, to achieve his saving purposes. The LORD declared to Abraham that through his 'offspring all nations on earth will be blessed' (22:18). Through Joseph and his famine relief programme this promise was partially fulfilled.

In insisting that God sovereignly controls human affairs, Genesis does not deny people full moral responsibility for their deeds. It affirms both truths simultaneously by emphasizing the deep hurt caused by the brothers' actions, Jacob's unquenchable grief, Joseph's slavery and unjust imprisonment, and the brothers' own guilty consciences. It is this belief in human guilt and responsibility that lies behind Joseph's harsh treatment of his brothers both here in vs 14–15 and ch. 42. Not until Judah confessed their guilt (16; 'God has uncovered your servants' guilt' refers to their sin of selling Joseph) and showed true repentance by offering to take Benjamin's place is forgiveness and reconciliation possible. As soon as that point is reached, however, Joseph's generosity knew no bounds and he made every provision for his family's homeward journey.

When they finally reached home, Jacob was stunned by the news and did not believe what his sons told him. Eventually, however, he was persuaded, and after twenty years of mourning he at last expressed hope again, 'My son Joseph is still alive. I will go and see him before I die.'

Notes. 43:26 This is still only a partial fulfilment of Joseph's dream (cf. 37:9–10; 42:6). 32 The Egyptian dislike of eating with foreigners is often mentioned in classical writers. 44:5 Whether true or false, the claim that the cup was used for divination served to make the charge of theft more threatening. 28 For the first time Joseph learned how his father had reacted to his disappearance (cf. 37:33). 45:8 Father to Pharaoh, i.e. his chief adviser. 45:10 Goshen was in the eastern Nile delta.

46:1–47:31 Jacob goes to Egypt. When compared with the last two sections this one seems rather subdued, with long lists and the gloom of Jacob's impending death. But this is the third and most decisive journey to Egypt, in which Jacob left Canaan, the land of promise, for Egypt, the land of future slavery. Was this a big mistake? No. Jacob's migration was not prompted just by Joseph's invitation; it was divinely authorized. 46:3–4 records the only divine vision in the Joseph story, and in it Jacob is told 'to go down to Egypt' and is assured that 'I will go down ... with you, and I will surely bring you back again' (cf. 28:15). The stay in Egypt was to be only temporary; it was indeed part of the divine purpose (cf. 15:13–14). The section ends with Jacob enjoining Joseph to bury him with his fathers in Canaan (47:29–30). God's promises were to be fulfilled.

Indeed, the promises were already well on their way to fulfilment, for Jacob's family now numbered seventy, a sacred number (cf. the seventy nations of 10:2–31). Israel was on the way to becoming the 'great nation' promised to Abraham (12:2) and reaffirmed to Jacob (46:3). Most of these listed here were the ancestors of tribes and clans in ancient Israel, and early readers would have immediately realized how the promises were fulfilled.

The story quickly refocuses on the human drama. Joseph in his glory 'appeared', as though in a vision to Jacob. But as he threw his arms around him, Jacob realized that Joseph was real and alive. This encounter with his son whom he had believed dead transformed Jacob's attitude to death. He was ready now to depart in peace (cf. Lk. 2:29), just as the resurrection of a 'greater Joseph' has allowed many to die in hope (1 Pet. 1:3).

If reunion with Joseph was the height of Jacob's desires, Joseph looked further ahead. He was the one sent to save life, and he had to secure his brothers' survival in Egypt. He therefore coached them as to what to say to Pharaoh, i.e. that they were not looking for jobs or food, that they were herdsmen who had brought their livestock with them and just needed some grazing land, and that they would not be a burden to Egypt. 47:1–6 This approach succeeded brilliantly. Pharaoh was glad to give them the best grazing land in Egypt and invited them to become royal stockmen too. Once again, we are expected to recognize the unseen hand of God at work (cf. 39:3, 21; 41:37–38).

Then Joseph introduced his father to Pharaoh. The elderly Jacob was carried into court and helped to stand before Pharaoh (this is the literal meaning of 47:7). Jacob was a pathetic figure, but Pharaoh showed great respect to him, asking about his great age, and was twice blessed by him. For despite the many sad episodes in his life (47:9), Jacob was preeminently the man of blessing through whom 'all peoples on earth will be blessed' (28:14).

Divine blessing on Egypt was immediately apparent through Joseph supplying the Egyptians with grain during the famine. Modern readers of this section tend to view Joseph's approach to the hungry Egyptians as cruel exploitation. Why did he not just give them food instead of demanding they exchanged their herds, land and freedom for grain? This is not the way the OT views the situation. Lv. 25:14–43 shows that it was regarded as a great act of charity to buy the land of the destitute and to take them on as your employees ('slaves'). Indeed such 'slavery' under a good employer was regarded by some as preferable to the risks of freedom (self-employment), and when offered freedom, some slaves refused to take it (Ex. 21:5–6; Dt. 15:16–17). Slavery in OT times was very different from the harsh exploitation that was involved in the Atlantic slave trade of more recent centuries. OT slavery at its best meant a job for life with a benevolent employer. Certainly this was how the Egyptians viewed Joseph's actions, for they declare 'You have saved our lives ... we will be in bondage to Pharaoh' (47:25).

The section closes with a glimpse of the promise being fulfilled as the Israelites were fruitful and increased greatly in number (cf. 17:2, 6; 28:3). It also contains a glance forward to the next section, the death and burial of Jacob (chs. 48–50). 'Trailers' anticipating the contents of the next section often occur in Genesis at the end of a preceding section (e.g. 6:5–8; 9:18–27; 37:36; 39:20; 41:57; 45:28).

Notes. 46:1 On Beersheba cf. 21:14. 4 Joseph's own hand will close your eyes is a promise that Jacob would die in peace. 12 Hezron and Hamul, the sons of Perez (38:29), were presumably, like Joseph's sons (46:27), born in Egypt. Benjamin's sons were also probably Egyptian-born (46:21). 34 Shepherds are detestable to the Egyptians probably reflects a common distrust of nomadic peoples by urban dwellers (cf. attitudes to gypsies and 'travellers' in modern society). 47:11 The district of Rameses, i.e. near the city of Rameses (Ex. 1:14; 12:37), was apparently another title for Goshen.

48:1–50:26 The last days of Jacob and Joseph

The extended description of Jacob's death and burial looks like morbid melodrama. It is, in fact, a celebration of the fulfilment of the promises. At Bethel (Luz) God had promised Jacob that he would make him fruitful and give him the land (cf. 35:11–12). Now Jacob reflected on how far these promises had come true. He had never expected to see Joseph again, but he had seen his grandsons as well (48:11). He also owned land in Canaan: a burial ground at Mamre (49:29–32) and a ridge of land captured from the Amorites (48:21–22).

These, however, were just a foretaste of future fulfilment. Jacob's adoption of Ephraim and Manasseh as his own children presaged their future role as two of the largest tribes of Israel, on a par with the tribes descended from Jacob's sons Simeon and Reuben (48:5). But in ch. 49 Jacob looked further ahead and he foresaw all his sons becoming tribes and settling in different parts of Canaan. Judah would be famed for wine growing, Zebulun for seafaring, Asher for its rich harvests (49:11, 13, 20). Then, having painted a picture of Israel's glorious future in Canaan and again insisted that he was to be buried there, Jacob died. Chapter 49 is called the blessing of Jacob, though not all his sentiments are blessings (e.g. vs 3–7), and is one of the oldest poems in the OT. In that many of the comments relate to incidents in Genesis, it seems to have been composed as a unit and is not just a collection of originally independent sayings. In it Jacob reflects on the past and future achievements of his sons, roughly in order of their birth. It is, therefore, one of the earliest prophetic texts in the OT. But as often in prophetic poetry, some of the words are obscure and their translation difficult.

After a grand Egyptian funeral, Jacob's corpse was taken in solemn procession to Canaan. This was not simply his sons carrying out his last wishes but an acted prophecy of the exodus, when all his descendants would leave Egypt and return to the promised land. Even the unusual route taken by the funeral cortege, skirting the Dead Sea and entering Canaan from the east, seems to foreshadow the path taken by the Israelites led by Moses and Joshua. Similarly, when Joseph died, he made them swear to 'carry my bones up from this place' (50:25). Thus, Genesis ends on a note of expectation, indeed of certainty, that the promises first made to Abraham, then repeated to his son and grandson, will be fulfilled.

Possession of the land is, however, only one aspect of the promises made to Abraham, and these final chapters are also concerned with other issues. Jacob's death raised again the question of relations between Joseph and his brothers, who wondered if he would use the opportunity to wreak his revenge. Shocked by the suggestion, Joseph reiterated his view of the situation, 'You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish ... the saving of many lives' (50:20; cf. 45:5–8). It was through Abraham's descendants that all nations would find blessing, and this was partially fulfilled in Joseph's career as famine relief organizer. But the blessing of Jacob looked yet further ahead. From Judah would come a ruler of the nations, whose era would prove so prosperous that He will tether his donkey to a vine and wash his garments in wine (49:11). In a preliminary way, this prophecy was fulfilled in the prosperity of David and Solomon, but in a fuller way by our Lord at his first coming. It will be fulfilled completely at his second advent (see also note below). Thus, Jacob and Joseph died in hope—'They did not receive the things promised; they only saw them and welcomed them from a distance ... they were longing for a better country—a heavenly one' (Heb. 11:13, 16, 40). Indeed, one that all who trust in God will share with them.

Notes. 48:5–6 Adopting grandsons, thereby putting them on a par with sons, is known elsewhere in the ancient Near East. 8 Jacob's question 'Who are these?' may have been prompted by his blindness, or be a legal requirement in an adoption rite. 11 Jacob's plaintive prayer (43:14) had been answered beyond all he expected (cf. Eph. 3:20). 13–20 The right-hand side was the place of honour and blessing in Bible times (cf. Dt. 11:29; Mt. 25:33). Jacob deliberately promoted the younger Ephraim over the firstborn Manasseh, a frequent pattern in Genesis (cf. 4:1–8; 38:27–30; ch. 27). 22 This seems to be a reference to the conquest of the city of Shechem by Jacob's sons (34:25–29). Jacob had bought land nearby (33:18–19), and Joseph was subsequently buried in this area (Jos. 24:32).

49:3–4 Like other older sons (Cain, Ishmael and Esau), Reuben lost his privileged position because of his sin (see 35:22). 5–7 These verses refer to the attacks of 34:24–29. 6 In Canaanite literature, leaders are sometimes referred to as ‘bulls’, so hamstringing oxen may refer to the killing of the leaders, Hamor and Shechem, or be a way of describing the inconvenience Jacob suffered as a result of the attack (cf. 34:30). 7 The Levites were given no territory of their own, just forty-eight levitical cities. The tribe of Simeon was absorbed by Judah (Jos. 19:1–9; 21). 8–12 Though the general sense of this blessing is clear (it predicts Judah’s supremacy among the tribes), many details are uncertain. 8 ‘Your hand will be on your enemies’, i.e. you will defeat them. 9 Judah would be as dangerous to challenge as a lion guarding its prey. This is the origin of the phrase ‘The Lion of Judah’. 10 Judah would always have a descendant (from between his feet) who would rule the nation (sceptre and staff were symbols of authority). A slight emendation of until he comes to whom it belongs would give ‘until tribute is brought to him’ (cf. the NIV mg.). The exact interpretation of this line is very difficult, but nearly every suggestion amounts to regarding it as a prediction of the Davidic Empire, in which many nations would obey the king from Judah (Ps. 72:8–11). This king was to be a forerunner of the son of David to whom all nations would submit (cf. Phil. 2:10–11). 11 The grape harvest would be so abundant in those days that the Davidic king would not worry about his donkey eating the grapes when tethered to the choicest vine. He will wash his garments in wine is another image of wine in plenty (cf. Lv. 26:5). 12 This is probably an image of the leader’s beauty. 13 The tribe of Zebulun was allotted territory in inland Galilee, and we do not know when or how long they lived on the coast. 14–15 These verses seem to reflect a stage in Isaachar’s history when they were enslaved to the Canaanites. 16–17 These verses look forward to the military successes of the tribe of Dan, which benefited the nation of Israel (cf. Samson’s exploits, Jdg. 13–16; and the conquest of Laish, 18:27). 18 Despite the minor successes described in the book of Judges, the period after the conquest was to be difficult for the nation, so Jacob prayed for them. 19 Gad was a frontier tribe and often involved in war. 20 Asher’s fertile land produced food fit for kings. 21 This is perhaps a picture of Naphtali gradually settling down in Canaan. 22 The image, whether that of a wild ass (NIV mg.) or (less likely) a fruitful vine, expresses the tribe’s vigour and strength. 23–24 These verses probably refer to the opposition Joseph faced throughout his career. But his opponents were eventually silenced by God. 25–26 Note the mention of ‘bless’/‘blessing’ six times in these verses. This is one of the key words in Genesis. Here divine blessing is especially manifested in abundant water supplies, i.e. rain (‘the heavens’), springs (‘the deep’), in many children (‘breast and womb’) and in fertile hilltops. 27 This verse probably refers to the military exploits of Benjaminite warriors (Jdg. 3:15–30; 5:14) and possibly Saul (1 Sa. 10–14). 31 This is the only mention of the burials of Rebekah and Leah (cf. 23:19; 25:9; 35:29).

50:2–3 Mummification shows Jacob’s high status in Egypt. 10 The threshing-floor of Atad was somewhere near Canaan’s border, perhaps near Gaza or Jericho. If the latter, it would imply the funeral procession took a similar route to the Israelites in the exodus. 15–17 It is usually supposed that Joseph’s brothers made up this last message of Jacob, but we cannot be sure.

EXODUS

Introduction

Title

The title 'Exodus' is derived from the name which the ancient Greek translators gave to the book, Exodos, meaning 'the going out', 'exit'. The name reflects the book's particular interest in the departure of the Israelites from Egypt.

Literary nature

As the second book of the Bible, Exodus forms part of a larger narrative which begins in Genesis and continues at least as far as the book of Deuteronomy. This material has traditionally been viewed as a unit, the Pentateuch (see article on the Pentateuch). Exodus is an integral part of this larger work, depending upon the book of Genesis for important background material (e.g. God's covenant with the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; the divine guarantee that their descendants would possess the land of Canaan; and an explanation as to how the family of Jacob came to be in Egypt), and anticipating events which are recorded in Leviticus (e.g. the consecration of Aaron and his sons as priests). While Exodus has much in common with Genesis and Leviticus, it does have, as we shall see below, a number of its own distinctive themes.

Although Exodus may appear at first sight to be a collection of separate incidents, it has been carefully composed. The narrative is a skilful blend of different types of material (e.g. prose, poetry, genealogy, speeches, regulations, laws) which have been brought together to produce a unified work. The narrator makes no attempt to give a comprehensive picture of all that took place in the period covered by the book; on the contrary his account is quite selective. Consequently, the text often omits information which the narrator did not believe to be important for his purpose in writing (e.g. a detailed record of Moses' time in Midian).

The book of Exodus is composed of blocks of material which usually have clearly marked beginnings and ends. The present chapter divisions are a poor guide to these narrative units and are best ignored. The different episodes are rarely self-contained. They assume a knowledge of earlier material and anticipate later events. To understand Exodus it is important to follow the flow of the narrative and see how the various episodes relate to each other (e.g. the account of the Israelites' meeting with God at Sinai in ch. 19 has close parallels with Moses' first encounter with God at Horeb/Sinai in ch. 3).

Main themes

The author of Exodus is primarily interested in theology; that is, he writes in order to highlight particular ideas and concepts about God. To appreciate this and see how each section of the book contributes to this overall purpose, it is important to recognize the book's main themes; other minor themes are noted in the commentary.

Exodus is essentially a book about knowing God through personal experience. The plot centres on the relationship which develops between God and the Israelites, from the dramatic meeting with Moses at the burning bush (3:1–4:17) to the glory of the Lord filling the tabernacle (40:34–38). In all of this Moses acts as a mediator, the one who first makes the Lord known to the people and who subsequently plays an important role in establishing the covenant relationship which enables the Lord to dwell in the midst of the Israelites. Significantly, it is always God who takes the initiative, revealing himself not only through words, but also through wonders and signs. In Exodus God both speaks and acts; moreover, what he says happens.

The first half of the book is dominated by the theme of coming to know God. At the outset Moses met with God at the burning bush, and in the ensuing conversation discovered much about God's nature, including his divine name, 'the LORD' (3:1–4:17). The theme reappears when Pharaoh expressed his ignorance about the Lord: 'Who is the LORD, that I should obey him and let Israel go? I do not know the LORD and I will not let Israel go' (5:2). As the different signs unfold, the Egyptians gradually came to acknowledge the Lord's sovereign power. Ultimately, God lured Pharaoh and his army to their death in the Sea of Reeds in order that 'the Egyptians will know that I am the LORD' (14:4, 18). With the defeat of Pharaoh the Israelites worshipped God in a dynamic song of celebration praise: 'Who among the gods is like you, O LORD? Who is like you—majestic in holiness, awesome in glory, working wonders?' (15:11).

The second half of Exodus develops further the theme of knowing God by focusing on the establishment of a close and lasting relationship between the Lord and the Israelites. To this end the narrative concentrates on two topics which receive extensive coverage, the making of the covenant and the construction of the tabernacle. The former of these, like the signing of a contract or the taking of marriage vows, sets out the conditions under which the Israelites must live in order to enjoy an ongoing relationship with God; these are recorded in the Decalogue and the Book of the Covenant. The people are obliged to follow God's standards if they wish to know his continued blessing and presence. Considerable attention is given not only to the making of the initial covenant agreement (chs. 19–24), but also to the events concerning the golden calf which almost brought the relationship to an early and abrupt conclusion (chs. 32–34). The building of the tabernacle forms a natural sequel to the making of the divine covenant. Built according to divine instruction, the tabernacle became the focal point of the Lord's presence in the midst of the people, and reminded them, through its materials and structure, of God's sovereign, holy nature. Significantly, Exodus ends by noting how the Lord, following the erection of the tent, took up residence in the middle of the Israelite camp (40:34–38).

Closely associated with the theme of knowing the Lord is that of obedience. Exodus stresses throughout the importance of obeying the Lord. In the early chapters we observe both Moses' reluctance and Pharaoh's stubborn refusal to comply with God's demands. Later, to achieve their safe deliverance from Egypt, the Israelites had to follow exactly the Lord's instructions regarding the Passover. Finally, after throwing off the yoke of Egyptian slavery, the Israelites had to learn obedience to their new sovereign. Significantly, obedience to God lies at the heart of the covenant relationship (cf. 19:8; 24:3, 7). Exodus emphasizes, however, that since God is the one who acts first, human obedience does not create this special covenant relationship, it merely helps maintain it. When the Israelites later made and worshipped the golden calf they were punished for their disobedience and the covenant relationship with God was broken.

Another important theme is that of holiness. On the one hand, Exodus reveals that God alone is innately holy and that human beings, because of their sinful nature, can come into his presence only in certain circumstances. When Moses encountered God at the burning bush he had to remove his sandals because the ground was holy (3:5), and later the Israelites were prevented from ascending Mt Sinai lest they should die as a result of seeing God (19:12–13, 21–24; cf. Heb. 12:14). Because of the incompatibility of divine holiness and human sinfulness specific measures had to be taken before the Lord could reside among the Israelites. A specially designed tent was constructed, incorporating features made necessary by the holiness of God (e.g. the curtains which formed a protective shield between God and the people).

On the other hand, Exodus stresses that the Israelites should share God's holy nature; they are to be 'a holy nation' (19:6). To this end the instructions and laws of the Decalogue and Book of the Covenant indicate those qualities associated with God's holy nature. Here holiness is primarily linked with moral purity and exemplary behaviour. However, since such perfection of character is beyond human attainment, Exodus underlines the importance of sacrifices which can both atone for sin and purify that which is unclean. This is displayed in various ways. We see it in the sacrifices associated with the Passover and the making of the covenant at Sinai. Similarly, sacrifices are an integral part of the procedure for consecrating the priests (29:1–46). Moreover, to symbolize the fact that God may be approached only through the offering of acceptable sacrifices the large bronze altar was placed between the entrance to the tabernacle courtyard and the Holy Place.

Special attention is also drawn to the divine qualities of compassion and justice. They are very evident in the first half of the book when God acts out of real concern for the Israelites and punishes the Egyptians because of their unjust treatment of the Israelites. Both qualities are prominent in the laws and moral imperatives which form an important part of the Sinai covenant. Not only must the Israelites maintain a particular standard of justice, but they must also act with compassion towards the more vulnerable members of society. Finally, they reappear in the events concerning the golden calf. God's justice is displayed in his punishment of the Israelites for their rebellious actions, but, because of his compassion, the covenant is subsequently renewed when Moses intercedes on behalf of the people.

Date and authorship

Exodus does not mention the person responsible for giving the book its present shape. The fact that certain sections were recorded by Moses (17:14; 24:4; 34:27) accounts for the traditional view that Moses wrote the entire book (e.g. Mk. 12:26). While there is little internal evidence to indicate when the book was written, there is no compelling reason to believe that it must have been penned long after the events described, as many scholars suppose. The only comment which may provide some indication as to when the book was composed is the reference to the Israelites eating manna for forty years until they arrived in the land of Canaan (16:35).

For over a century scholars have discussed at length the origin of the material found in Exodus. Recent studies have highlighted major weaknesses in the theory that the Pentateuch is composed of four distinctive documents, generally known by the labels J, E, D and P (see article on the Pentateuch). Because it is exceptionally difficult to recover with any degree of certainty the sources underlying the present text, the commentary which follows focuses exclusively on the text as we now have it.

Historical setting

Several factors make it difficult to determine accurately the historical setting of the events described in Exodus. First, we are dealing with events relating to the second millennium BC. According to 1 Ki. 6:1, the exodus occurred 480 years before 'the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel'. On this reckoning the Israelites departed from Egypt in about 1446 BC. While some scholars reject this date, placing the exodus in the latter half of the 13th century BC (see below), we are dealing, on either reckoning, with a period of history about which our knowledge is limited and incomplete.

Secondly, one of the noteworthy features of the book of Exodus is its lack of historical references. For example, the Egyptian kings are designated merely by their title, Pharaoh, and not by name. This is probably intentional, in order to contrast the unnamed kings of Egypt with the sovereign God of Israel whose name, the Lord (or Yahweh), was revealed to Moses and the Israelites. As a result, it is difficult to locate the exodus to a precise period of Egyptian history. A clue may be found in the name of one of the store cities, Rameses, which may have originated during the reign of Rameses II (13th century BC). However, it is possible that the place-name dates from an earlier period and was already in use when the Israelites first settled in Egypt (cf. Gn. 47:11). Alternatively, the name may belong to an earlier period and its use in Gn. 47:11 and Ex. 1:11 may be the result of editorial updating.

Thirdly, no document, apart from the Bible, has been discovered relating specifically to the Israelites' time in Egypt. Given the antiquity of the period and the nature of the events, this is not surprising. It is unlikely that Egyptian annalists would have recorded detailed descriptions of events which included the defeat of their king and the destruction of the Egyptian army. Even if they had initially noted these events, there would have been little enthusiasm for ensuring that such texts survived intact.

Fourthly, although the author of Exodus was keenly interested in these events, he wrote primarily as a theologian and not as a historian. He focused on the God encountered through these events, rather than on the events themselves. Finally, given the importance and prominence of the exodus tradition in Israelite thinking, it seems reasonable to suppose that it derives from real events. While we cannot confirm the accuracy of what is recorded in the book of Exodus, there is no reason to dismiss it as little more than mere fiction. Scholars who deny the historicity of the events underlying the book of Exodus do so without making adequate allowance for these factors.

The route of Exodus

If problems exist in determining the historical setting of Exodus, it is hardly surprising that similar difficulties arise in reconstructing accurately the route of the Israelites' journey from Egypt. Apart from a handful of place-names, the narrative sheds little light on the direction taken by those fleeing from Egypt, apart from the fact that they did not take a direct route to Canaan. Moreover, opinions differ on the reliability and identity of the places named. While many scholars favour a route which took the Israelites through the southern half of the Sinai peninsula, recent research tends to support a route further to the north. See the map of possible routes for the exodus.

Commentary

1:1–2:25 The Israelites in Egypt

The opening two chapters of Exodus (covering several centuries) provide an indispensable introduction to the plot which unfolds in the rest of the book. At the outset we learn of Israel's presence in Egypt (1–6) and the fear created by their remarkable growth (7–22). Amid the inhumane measures adopted to repress the Israelites, we are introduced to Moses, the leading human protagonist in the story (2:1–22). In spite of Pharaoh's attempts to destroy all the male Hebrew children at birth, Moses was preserved through the cunning of his mother. By an ironic twist of events, he grew up in the Egyptian court. Years later, after killing an Egyptian whom he observed beating an Israelite, he was forced to flee for his life and live in exile in the land of Midian (11–22). The introduction concludes with a short comment about God's concern for Israel (23–25) which provides an important link to the next part of the book.

1:1–6 The Israelites' arrival in Egypt. Exodus begins in an undramatic way by listing briefly the names of the twelve sons of Israel, also known as Jacob (cf. Gn. 32:28), and noting that on their arrival in Egypt the whole family numbered seventy individuals. This information forms an important bridge between Exodus and the preceding book of Genesis, and probably presupposes that the reader is already familiar with the more detailed account in Gn. 46:1–27 of those who emigrated to Egypt (the order of the names, however, follows Gn. 35:23–26). The reference to the death of Joseph in v 6 alludes back to Gn. 50:22–26.

Note. 5 Acts 7:14 gives the number of Jacob's descendants as 75, following an early Greek translation (see commentary on Gn. 46:27).

1:7–2:10 The Egyptian oppression of the Israelites. The rapid increase in the number of the descendants of Israel is emphasized in the Hebrew text through the repetition in v 7 of four verbs associated with growth (which the RSV translates, 'were fruitful and increased greatly; they multiplied and grew exceedingly strong'), and by the comment that the land was filled with them. This remarkable growth partially fulfilled various divine promises made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (cf. Gn. 12:2; 13:16; 15:5; 17:2, 6; 22:17; 26:4; 28:14; 35:11; 46:3; 48:4) and is clear evidence of God's blessing upon the Israelites.

The enthronement of a new king, who had no knowledge of Joseph, anticipates developments which will have important consequences for both the Israelites and the Egyptians. The new Pharaoh viewed the fruitfulness of the Israelites as a major threat to the continued security of his kingdom. The Egyptians had to act shrewdly and in unison against this potential danger (9–10). Consequently, the Israelites were forced to labour in the construction of store cities for Pharaoh (11). Pharaoh's actions are a chilling reminder of how one nation may seek to dominate and exploit another. Paradoxically, the more the Egyptians oppressed them, the more the Israelites increased in number (12). God's intention to make Israel a great nation would not be thwarted by callous, human efforts.

Faced with the continued growth of the Israelite population, Pharaoh looked for another method of birth control: under his orders the Hebrew midwives, Shiphrah and Puah, were to kill all newborn boys (16). When they disobeyed out of reverence for God, they themselves were rewarded by the birth of children (21). God still rewards those who put him first.

Determined to pursue his policy against the Israelites, Pharaoh commanded his own people to cast every newborn Hebrew boy into the Nile (22). The scene was set for the birth of Moses and his remarkable deliverance. Ironically, he was not only rescued from the river by Pharaoh's own daughter (2:5–6), but he also grew up under the protection of the one who had threatened his very existence (9–10).

Notes. 8 The book of Exodus does not identify any of the Egyptian kings (Pharaohs) mentioned. In spite of their influential position they are portrayed as nobodies. This is in keeping with the contrast which Exodus draws between the Lord and the Egyptian kings. 11 The precise locations of Pithom and Rameses is disputed. The name Rameses is often associated with the great Pharaoh Rameses II (1290–1224 BC). However, the place-name could either date from an earlier period or result from an editorial updating (cf. Gn. 47:11). 11 Pharaoh is a royal title rather than a personal name. 19 In view of the remarkable increase of the Israelite population, Pharaoh may well have accepted the comment about the ability of the Hebrew women to give birth prior to the arrival of the midwives.

2:11–22 Moses' flight to Midian. The narrative jumps rapidly forward in v 11 to the time when Moses was an adult; according to later tradition he was forty years old at the time (cf. Acts 7:23). Three incidents occurred which are closely connected. First, Moses killed an Egyptian who was beating a Hebrew (11–12). Next, he intervened in a fight between two Hebrews and reprimanded the one in the wrong (13–14). Finally, following his flight from Egypt, he came to the rescue of the daughters of Reuel (16–19). In each of these incidents Moses is portrayed as the defender of the weaker party. Ironies abound. In spite of Moses' attempts to avoid detection before and after killing the Egyptian, his actions were soon widely known (12–13). The response of the aggressive Hebrew, 'Who made you ruler and judge over us?' (14) unwittingly anticipated later developments in the book when Moses became leader and judge over Israel (cf. 18:13–26). After fleeing from Egypt because of his stance against Egyptian aggression, Moses was designated an Egyptian by the daughters of Reuel (19). Although his actions reveal a positive concern for the weak and oppressed, Moses did not yet qualify for the role of national deliverer. Rather he was forced to abandon membership of the Egyptian royal court and become an alien in a foreign land (22). Similarly, in a world full of injustice, Christians must, even in the face of opposition, be constantly active on behalf of the poor and helpless.

Note. 15 Moses fled eastwards to Midian, the region around the Gulf of Aqabah. This area may have been called after one of Abraham's younger sons (cf. Gn. 25:2).

2:23–25 God's concern for the Israelites. The report of Pharaoh's death introduces a brief but highly significant paragraph which focuses on the continuing plight of the Israelites in Egypt. Thematically it is linked to the preceding section; God, like Moses, cares for the oppressed. Although there have been brief allusions to God's concern for his people, only now does the narrative reveal in detail his awareness of the Israelites' suffering: God hears, remembers, sees and knows (24–25). The reference to the divine covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob is especially important. At the heart of this covenant is the promise that the patriarchs' descendants will possess the land of Canaan (cf. Gn. 17:8; 26:3; 28:13; 48:4). Abraham had received an even more specific promise: 'Know for certain that your descendants will be strangers in a country not their own, and they will be enslaved and ill-treated four hundred years. But I will punish the nation they serve as slaves, and afterwards they will come out with great possessions' (Gn. 15:13–14). The time had now come for the deliverance of Abraham's descendants from bondage and oppression in Egypt.

3:1–15:21 Deliverance from Egypt

3:1–4:23 Moses in Midian

In contrast to the initial two chapters, which span a long period of time, the pace of the narrative in this section slows down significantly. Here, God reveals what action he intends to take on behalf of the oppressed Israelites: Moses is commissioned as the one who will lead the people out of Egypt. Because of its importance, the encounter between God and Moses is recorded in considerable detail with much attention being focused on their conversation. Clearly, the entire event had a profound effect upon Moses.

Several elements of the meeting between God and Moses are noteworthy. First, Moses encounters God in a burning bush. Throughout the exodus story the divine presence is frequently symbolized by fire and smoke (Ex. 13:21–22; 19:18; 24:17; 40:38; cf. Lv. 9:24; 10:2; Nu. 11:1–3; Dt. 9:3; 18:16). Secondly, because of his awesome nature, God had to be approached with caution. Moses acknowledged God’s holiness by removing his sandals. The concept of divine holiness reappears in Exodus as a major theme. Having led his father-in-law’s flock through the desert to Horeb (1), Moses will later lead the Israelites to the same location (cf. 3:12; 19:1–2), where they also will confront God’s holy presence revealed through fire (see ch. 19).

Although the background details are noteworthy, the narrative focuses most attention on the ensuing dialogue between God and Moses. From the outset it was essential that Moses should know the identity of the one who spoke to him: ‘I am the God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob’ (6). Next, God revealed to Moses what the reader already knows; he was passionately concerned about the suffering of his people in Egypt (7–9; cf. 2:23–25). Now was the time for action. Through Moses, he intended to rescue them from Egypt, a land of oppression, and bring them to Canaan, a land of opportunity. Moses’ response was hardly surprising: ‘Who am I, that I should go to Pharaoh and bring the Israelites out of Egypt?’ (11). What qualifications had Moses for this task? How could a fugitive from Egypt possibly confront Pharaoh? God’s response was direct: ‘I will be with you’ (12). This was accompanied with the promise of a sign. However, God did not promise an instant miracle; Moses had to exercise trust first before seeing it fulfilled.

Moses raised a further difficulty. How would he convince the Israelites that God had sent him to them? Vs 13–15, which focus on God’s identity, are difficult to interpret. Moses’ request for God’s name is important because the Israelites believed that the name reflected an individual’s essence. In Genesis, different aspects of God’s nature are highlighted by the names used to designate him: El Elyon (God Most High; Gn. 14:18–20), El Roi (God who sees me; Gn. 16:13), El Shaddai (God Almighty; Gn. 17:1), El Olam (the Eternal God; Gn. 21:33). Here God introduced himself by the personal name ‘Yahweh’, translated in most English versions as the LORD (15). The Hebrew divine name ‘Yahweh’ is closely related to the phrase in v 14 which may be translated in a variety of ways: I AM WHO I AM, ‘I will be who I will be’, ‘I will be what I was’. An abbreviated form of this phrase comes in the statement, ‘I AM has sent me to you’. Unlike previous names, ‘Yahweh’ does not limit God’s nature to any particular characteristic: he is what he is. Furthermore, his nature does not change. He is the God worshipped by earlier generations (the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob) and generations yet to come (this is my name for ever, the name by which I am to be remembered from generation to generation).

On his return to Egypt, Moses was to assemble the elders of Israel. Together they were to ask permission from Pharaoh to take the Israelites on a short three-day journey into the desert in order that they might worship their God (18). Pharaoh’s reaction to this relatively minor demand would reveal his strong antagonism towards the Israelites. He would refuse to accommodate them, not because their request was excessive, but probably because he suspects that if he allows them to go they will leave for good. The narrative in chs. 7–15 reinforces this initial observation. Pharaoh would not change his mind unless a mighty hand compels him (19). The influence of God’s hand upon the Egyptians would be such that they would readily give of their possessions in order to see the Israelites leave Egypt. These gifts would compensate the Israelites for the suffering they had already endured.

In spite of these divine assurances, Moses continued to drag his feet by raising another problem. What if the Israelites did not believe him? How would he convince them that God had indeed appeared to him? In response God provided three signs which involved miraculous transformations for Moses to show to the people: his staff would become a snake (2–4); his hand would become leprous (6–7); and Nile water would become blood (9). Moses witnessed for himself the first two of these signs. The third, at this stage, had to be accepted by faith. Later, when all three were shown to the Israelites they were convinced that God had indeed sent Moses (30–31).

Moses still hesitated. He offered another excuse for not accepting God's call: he was not eloquent (10). With a series of rhetorical questions God revealed that his power could overcome any inability which Moses might have felt. When Moses asked that someone else should be sent, God, understandably, became angry (13). How could Moses continue to refuse? As a final gesture of divine patience God promised him the assistance of his brother Aaron. With this, Moses resigned himself to returning to Egypt. The fact that Moses did not reveal to his father-in-law the true reason for his departure to Egypt possibly suggests that he remained unconvinced of God's ability to accomplish his plans. God's call of Moses is a vivid reminder of how we are all called to serve the living God. Moses' hesitant response has a familiar ring to it!

Among the possessions taken by Moses on his journey to Egypt special attention is focused on the staff of God (20). As is revealed later, this staff was used by Moses when he performed before Pharaoh all the wonders God had given him (e.g. 7:10, 20; 8:5, 17; 9:23; 10:13). Moses as God's ambassador was empowered to exercise divine authority (cf. 3:20). The staff was a symbol of this authority, not a magic wand. However, he was warned that Pharaoh would stubbornly refuse to let the Israelites leave. As a result, God would punish the Egyptians through the death of their firstborn, a response which parallels Egypt's dealings with Israel, God's firstborn son (22). This prediction is fulfilled in 11:1–12:30.

Notes. 3:1 Jethro is also known as Reuel (2:18). Horeb, the mountain of God is also known as Sinai (for its location, see the Introduction and map). 8. A land flowing with milk and honey is a proverbial way of describing the fertility of the land of Canaan. 15. The English translation, the LORD, fails to convey the idea that the Hebrew Yahweh is a personal name. In the past it has been wrongly transliterated as Jehovah.

4:24–31 Moses meets Aaron

24–26 The narrative moves location to a lodging place on the way. Here we have a brief and enigmatic report of God's attempt to kill Moses (24–26). His life was spared only after his wife Zipporah intervened by circumcising their son Gershom (cf. 2:22). This unusual incident possibly centres on Moses' continued lack of faith regarding his mission. Although God had assured him that he would deliver the Israelites out of Egypt because of his covenant with Abraham, Moses had failed to circumcise his own son as required by God under that very covenant (cf. Gn. 17:10–14). The incident serves as a reminder of the danger of failing to take God seriously.

With a minimum of detail the narrative records Moses' encounter with Aaron and the elders of Israel. The brief description of these events stands in sharp contrast to the prolonged discussion which Moses had with God.

Contrary to what he expected, Moses received a most favourable welcome. When they learned of God's concern for them, the Israelite leaders bowed down and worshipped. As his earlier conversation with God reveals, Moses never anticipated a scenario like this. Everything looked set for a successful mission.

Note. 25 The precise meaning of a bridegroom of blood is uncertain.

5:1–15:21 Judgments and deliverance

5:1–6:13 Moses' first encounter with Pharaoh

1–23 With this initial success to encourage them, Moses and Aaron proceeded to meet Pharaoh. He, however, displayed absolute contempt towards Moses, Aaron and especially towards God: Who is the LORD, that I should obey him and let Israel go? I do not know the LORD and I will not let Israel go (2). Although Pharaoh had no personal knowledge of God at present, this would soon change dramatically. Significantly, the theme of knowing 'the LORD' recurs frequently throughout the following chapters (cf. e.g. 6:7; 9:14, 16, 29; 10:2). Having already revealed himself to Moses, Aaron and the Israelite elders, God would now reveal himself powerfully to Pharaoh and the Egyptians.

As instructed by God (3:18), Moses and Aaron asked Pharaoh that the Israelites be permitted to make a three-day journey into the desert to offer sacrifices to their God. Interestingly, Moses drew attention to the fact that failure to obey might cause God to strike the Israelites with plagues or the sword (3). Implicit in this was a warning to Pharaoh that God should be treated with respect. Pharaoh's response to their request appears excessive. He gave orders that the Israelites' task of making bricks should be made more difficult; they were no longer to be provided with the straw necessary for making them (cf. 1:14). To the Hebrew foremen it appeared as if Moses and Aaron had provided Pharaoh with an ideal opportunity to extend his campaign of genocide against the Israelites. As a result, they viewed Moses and Aaron with utter loathing. In the face of this rejection Moses turned in despair to God. Why had he permitted things to develop like this?

6:1–13 God's purpose was now revealed: Pharaoh would be forced to submit before the mighty hand of God (1). To reassure Moses, God reminded him of the promises which were part of the covenant previously established with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (2–8). Through their deliverance from Egypt the Israelites will know that 'the LORD' is indeed their God and that they are his people (7). The three-fold repetition of the phrase 'I am the LORD' in vs 2, 6 and 8 emphasizes that it is the LORD who will achieve this. Nevertheless, when Moses communicated God's response to the Israelites, they did not listen (9). Pharaoh's power over them seemed unshakeable. Consequently, even Moses started to believe that it was futile to ask for the release of the Israelites (12).

Note. 3 This verse raises an important question: was the name 'Yahweh' known prior to the time of Moses? Scholars are divided in their response to this question. Some point to the frequent use of the term in Genesis. Others suggest that the occurrences of the term in Genesis are later additions. While it is possible to demonstrate that in certain places in Genesis the term 'Yahweh' may have replaced an earlier divine title (e.g. 16:11, 13), this is not always possible (e.g. 15:7; 22:14). It is apparent, however, that other divine names, and in particular El Shaddai (God Almighty), were popular among the patriarchs. The correct interpretation of 6:3 remains something of an enigma.

6:14–27 Genealogy of Moses and Aaron

At this point the plot is interrupted by a genealogy which focuses attention on the family of Levi, to which Aaron and Moses belong (14–25). The genealogy follows the order of the sons of Jacob as recorded in 1:2: Reuben (14), Simeon (15), Levi (16). At this point, however, it concentrates on the descendants of Levi, rather than mentioning the remaining sons of Jacob. The genealogy serves two functions. First, it provides details, recorded nowhere else in Exodus, about the family of Moses and Aaron. Secondly, by interrupting the plot at a crucial stage, it keeps the reader waiting in suspense to see what will happen next.

6:28–7:7 Divine reassurance for Moses

The story is resumed in vs 28–30 through the repetition of comments already made in vs 10–13. If the Israelites would not believe Moses, what likelihood was there that Pharaoh would? In response, God reassured Moses of his ability to overcome Pharaoh and lead the people out of Egypt. He even stated that Moses would be like a God to Pharaoh, and Aaron would be his prophet (7:1–2). With such assurances Moses should remain confident of success. The divine speech also anticipates the miraculous signs and wonders which are to dominate chs. 7–14. Furthermore, mention is made of the hardening of Pharaoh's heart and of the mighty acts of judgment by which God will lead Israel out of Egypt. As a result, the Egyptians will know that I am the LORD (5). Thus the scene is set for the cycle of episodes which comprise 7:8–11:10.

7:8–11:10 Signs and wonders in Egypt

The Exodus narrative devotes considerable space to the account of the signs and wonders performed in Egypt. Although they are often described as 'the ten plagues', this is not an entirely satisfactory designation. First, although the biblical text refers to a few of them individually as plagues (9:3, 14–15; 11:1; cf. 8:2), as a whole they are more frequently called 'signs' (7:3; 8:23; 10:1–2) or 'wonders' (4:21; 7:3; 11:9–10; cf. 'miracle' in 7:9). Secondly, there are in fact eleven miraculous signs recorded in chs. 7–12. The first of these, the episode of the staff becoming a snake (7:8–13), is generally not included in the list of 'plagues'. Significantly, this was also the first sign which God gave Moses in order to convince the Israelites that 'the LORD' had indeed appeared to him (4:2–5). The next sign which Moses performed before Pharaoh, turning water into blood (7:14–25) was also used by Moses to demonstrate his divine calling to the Israelites (4:8–9). Yet, whereas the Israelites believed Moses on account of these signs (4:30–31), Pharaoh paid no attention to them; his own magicians were able to perform the same kind of wonders (7:11, 13, 22).

The individual accounts of the miraculous signs tend to follow the same pattern, but with some variation to avoid monotony. Several noteworthy features are common to all eleven episodes. First, the report of each miraculous sign begins with the phrase, 'the LORD said to Moses'. The initiative for each sign rested with God, with every stage in the encounter between Moses and Pharaoh being divinely controlled. Secondly, each episode, echoing the predictions given in 4:21 and 7:3–4, concludes with an explicit reference to the hardening of Pharaoh's heart. Significantly, the hardening of Pharaoh's heart stands in sharp contrast to other developments which occur in the narrative. Although the Egyptian magicians could initially duplicate the miraculous signs of Moses and Aaron, they soon reached the limit of their power and told Pharaoh, 'This is the finger of God' (8:19). Later, it is specifically noted that they could not stand before Moses because of the boils that were on them (9:11). Similarly, even Pharaoh's own officials were gradually persuaded of God's power. When Moses predicted the worst hailstorm that has even fallen on Egypt (9:18), some of them took precautions against his threat (9:20). When Moses next warned of a plague of locusts, the officials urged Pharaoh to let the Israelites go (10:7; cf. 11:3). Yet, although those around him gradually conceded to God's power, Pharaoh remained stubbornly resistant to Moses' demands.

The numerous references to the hardening of Pharaoh's heart underline the importance of this theme. Significantly, the narrative describes this hardening in two ways. Although in the initial stages it is reported that Pharaoh hardened his own heart, later it is stated that God hardened Pharaoh's heart, as predicted in 4:21 and 7:3. By describing the hardening of Pharaoh's heart in these ways, the narrative emphasizes both the guilt of Pharaoh and the sovereignty of God.

It has been suggested that the plagues described in Exodus can be related to a series of natural phenomena which may have occurred in ancient Egypt. Thus, for example, the turning of the Nile waters to blood can be accounted for as an unusually high flooding of the river during the months of July and August. The river became 'blood-like' due to the presence of red earth carried in suspension from the basins of the Blue Nile and Atbara. Such an explanation, however, does not account for the presence of such 'blood' in wooden buckets and stone jars everywhere in Egypt (7:19). Nor does it explain either the earlier sign which Moses performed before the Israelites (4:30), or the activities of the Egyptian magicians (7:22). Furthermore, the text emphasizes the divine source of these events. This is indicated, for example, by the many references to Moses or Aaron stretching out their hands, or a staff, in order to bring about the sign. Although some of the signs may be associated with natural phenomena, their occurrence is clearly attributed to divine intervention.

Although the eleven episodes which comprise 7:8–11:10 follow the same basic pattern, by comparing them it is possible to observe certain interesting developments within the plot. We have already noted this regarding the magicians who are portrayed as becoming increasingly powerless before Moses and Aaron. In a similar way, the attitude of Pharaoh's officials gradually changes. A similar change can be observed by noting Pharaoh's reaction. Initially, he agreed to let the people go on the condition that Moses prayed for the removal of the frogs (8:8). Next, while he would have preferred the Israelites to stay within Egypt, he was persuaded to let them go a little way into the desert (8:25–28). Although he actually stated, after the hail, that the people might go (9:28), this never happened. When Moses threatened an invasion of locusts, Pharaoh was prepared to allow the Israelite men, but not the women and children, to go and worship the LORD (10:8–11). Finally, he conceded that men, women and children might go, but not their flocks and herds (10:24). In spite of his apparent willingness to give way to Moses and Aaron in the face of further divine signs and wonders, Pharaoh continued to refuse to let the people go.

As well as the subtle changes which can be observed between episodes, certain aspects of the story are highlighted by repetition. Two features are worth noting. First, a clear distinction was drawn between the Israelites and the Egyptians (cf. 8:22–23; 9:4, 26; 10:23; 11:7). Secondly, Pharaoh entreated Moses on a number of occasions to pray for him (cf. 8:8–12, 28–30; 9:28–29, 33; 10:17–18). The portrayal of Moses as one who could mediate with God on behalf of others is a theme which reappears later in Exodus.

While the eleven episodes in 7:8–11:10 have the same basic form, each one contributes something distinctive to the overall story.

7:8–13 The staff becomes a snake. Interestingly, the confrontation between Moses and Pharaoh begins with the Egyptian king demanding a miracle (9); the same Hebrew word is translated 'wonders' in 4:21; 7:3; 11:9–10. Obviously, Pharaoh was convinced that in a show of strength he had the power, through his sorcerers, to defeat Moses. Yet, while they were powerful enough to duplicate Aaron's staff becoming a snake, their power was less; Aaron's staff swallowed up their staffs (12).

7:14–25 The water becomes blood. Through a fourfold repetition of the details associated with the water becoming blood, the narrative highlights the extent and seriousness of the wonder performed jointly by Moses and Aaron: Blood was everywhere in Egypt (21).

8:1–15 The plague of frogs. Pharaoh's request that Moses should Pray to the LORD to take the frogs away from me and my people introduces into this section a theme which occurs in a number of the episodes. Pharaoh acknowledged the ability of Moses to mediate with God for the restoration of normal conditions within Egypt (cf. 8:28–31; 9:28–29, 33; 10:17–18).

8:16–19 The dust becomes gnats. By abbreviating the form of presentation found in other episodes, this brief section focuses on the reaction of the Egyptian magicians to the plague of gnats. Unable to copy the actions of Moses, they admitted to Pharaoh that this is the finger of God (19).

8:20–32 The plague of flies. In this episode detailed attention is given to the bargaining between Pharaoh and Moses over where the Israelites may sacrifice to their God. The narrative highlights the deceitfulness of Pharaoh in that once Moses had prayed on his behalf he refused to let the people go. Similar deceitfulness is revealed in 9:34 and 10:16–17.

9:1–7 The death of the livestock. The characteristic feature of this section is the distinction which was drawn between the Israelites and the Egyptians. The plague which came upon the livestock brought death only to the animals of the Egyptians: not even one of the animals of the Israelites had died (7).

9:8–12 The plague of boils. This short episode resembles closely 8:16–19. It comes to a climax in the comment that the Egyptian magicians could no longer stand before Moses. Although they had been able initially to challenge Moses and Aaron, the magicians now found themselves weak and helpless in the face of these miraculous wonders.

9:13–35 The plague of hail. In contrast to the previous episode this one is much more detailed. Through repeated references to 'the LORD', the narrative focuses on his divine power. We are reminded that Moses was merely God's agent and that the purpose of the various wonders was to demonstrate God's sovereign power.

10:1–20 The plague of locusts. The most notable feature in this episode is the stance of Pharaoh's officials. After Moses announced the sending of locusts, they immediately tried to persuade Pharaoh to reconsider his position. By this stage the officials were convinced of the folly of trying to stop the Israelites from going and worshipping their God. Pharaoh, however, was only prepared to let the men go; the women and children had to remain behind. Apart from a brief comment in 9:20–21, this is the first indication of a difference in attitude between Pharaoh and his officials towards the Israelites.

10:21–29 The plague of darkness. The most distinctive feature of this episode is its conclusion. A reference to the hardening of Pharaoh's heart indicates the end of almost all the other episodes, but not this one. Several verses are added which draw attention to a new development in the plot. Whereas the other episodes conclude with Moses having already left Pharaoh, the command that Moses should leave (28) reveals that he was still in the king's presence. The narrative also highlights, as occurs nowhere else, the depth of Pharaoh's hatred for Moses; if Moses appeared before him again, he would surely die. With this climax, the scene is set for the final episode in the series.

11:1–10 The death of the firstborn announced. While still in Pharaoh's presence, Moses received a further revelation from God. There would be one last plague which would cause Pharaoh to let the people go. Immediately, Moses announced the plague to Pharaoh: Every firstborn son in Egypt will die (5). With this final pronouncement, Moses left Pharaoh's presence in anger. As a result of Pharaoh's unwillingness to listen, Egypt would experience one further terrible example of God's power. After this the Israelites would leave. Although v 10 marks the end of the cycle of episodes which commenced in 7:8, further developments in the plot are anticipated by this final episode.

12:1–41 The Passover

As we have noted above, the previous cycle of episodes ends with the dramatic announcement that every firstborn son in Egypt will die (11:5). Considerable attention is now focused on the fulfilment of this pronouncement. The unique way in which the Israelite firstborn were protected from death led to this remarkable event being called the Passover (cf. vs 11, 23, 27). Significantly, later generations would remember it in three ways. First, they would celebrate each year the seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread (14–20; 13:3–10). Several other references underline the close association between unleavened bread and the Passover (34, 39). Given their swift departure from Egypt, it was not possible for the Israelites to observe this feast until the first anniversary of their departure (cf. Nu. 9:1–14). Secondly, in conjunction with the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the Israelites would commemorate the Passover by eating a year-old lamb or kid (24–27). Celebrated on the evening of the 14th day of the first month, the Passover marks the start of the Feast of Unleavened Bread which continues until the 21st day of the month (cf. v 18). Thirdly, to commemorate the survival of their firstborn sons, the Israelites would give to God all future firstborn male animals from their livestock (13:11–16). These various activities would be a continual testimony to the fact that God had brought them out of Egypt with his mighty hand (cf. 13:3, 9, 16).

At the heart of the first Passover ritual was the slaying of a lamb or kid, the smearing of its blood on the door-frames, and the eating of its meat. The details of the ritual parallel closely those relating to sacrifices, and this is confirmed by the comment in v 27, It is the Passover sacrifice to the LORD. Yet, while resembling other sacrifices, the Passover ceremony is unique, reflecting its peculiar historical setting. Because the Aaronic priesthood had not yet been established (Lv. 8:1–9:24), Moses commanded all the elders of Israel to slaughter the Passover victims (21). Similarly, there is no reference to the central sanctuary or altar which were first instituted after the exodus at Sinai (20:24–26; 24:4; 27:1–8). Whereas other sacrifices were normally offered up during daylight, the Passover animal was sacrificed at twilight as this was the only convenient time because of the long hours the Israelites were forced to work. Finally, the timing of the Passover to the 14th day of the month coincides with the full moon, the most suitable night in the month for the exodus from Egypt.

Special attention is focused on the use made of the animal's blood: it was smeared on the sides and tops of the door-frames of the houses (7, 22). Some scholars emphasize that this action was designed to protect those within from outside hostile powers (cf. vs 13, 23). Other scholars suggest that the blood was used to purify the Israelite houses, a proposal supported by the reference to the use of hyssop (22) which is elsewhere associated with ritual purification (e.g. Lv. 14:4; Nu. 19:6, 18). However, as we shall observe below, the sprinkled blood probably formed part of a consecration ritual.

An equally important part of the Passover rite was the eating of the animal. Everyone in the Israelite community was to participate (47), and for each animal slaughtered there had to be an adequate number of people to eat all the meat. Special instructions were given concerning the cooking of the meat: the entire animal was to be roasted, not boiled (9); the meat had to be eaten indoors and the animal's bones must not be broken (46). Any meat which remained to the morning had to be burnt (10).

Significantly, the description of the Passover meal parallels closely elements of the account of the consecration of the Aaronic priests in Ex. 29 and Lv. 8. Here, the slaughter of a ram together with the sprinkling of its blood and the eating of its meat form the main elements of a consecration ritual. Although there are differences of detail, these same elements underlie the Passover ritual. By participating in the Passover the Israelites set themselves apart as holy. The sacrifice of the animal atoned for the sin of the people, the blood smeared on the door-frames purified those within, and the eating of the sacrificial meat consecrated those who consumed it. By participating in the Passover ritual the people sanctified themselves as a nation holy to God (cf. 19:6).

12:1–28 Instructions for the Passover. This section consists of two speeches containing instructions. Although placed side by side the speeches were given days apart. The first speech (1–20) was delivered by God to Moses some time before the Israelites kept the first Passover; v 3 refers to the selection of the Passover lamb or kid four days before the Passover was to be observed. In the second speech (21–27), Moses addressed the elders of Israel on the day of the Passover. Through these two speeches the narrator highlights the events leading up to the striking down of the Egyptian firstborn at midnight on the 14th day of the month (29). Interestingly, both speeches end with comments drawing attention to future commemorations of the Passover (14–20; 24–27). Moreover, the second speech complements the first, providing additional information on various aspects of the Passover celebration. Since the reader is able to picture what took place from the content of the two speeches, the author refrains from describing the fulfilment of the instructions; he merely comments, the Israelites did just what the LORD commanded Moses and Aaron (28).

The Passover figures prominently in the NT understanding of the death of Jesus Christ. According to Matthew, Mark and Luke, the Last Supper, which was to be subsequently commemorated as the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:23–33), was a Passover meal (Mt. 26:17; Mk. 14:12; Lk. 22:7–8). By highlighting Jesus' unbroken bones John alludes to the fact that the death of Jesus resembled that of the Passover sacrifice (Jn. 19:36). 1 Cor. 5:7 makes explicit this connection: 'For Christ, our Passover lamb (lit. our Passover), has been sacrificed' and 1 Pet. 1:18–19 probably also refers to the Passover sacrifice.

Notes. 3 The Hebrew word seh denotes either a lamb or a goat. 15 Bread made without yeast is also described as unleavened bread. The fact that the bread was without leaven indicates a lack of time to prepare it properly (39; cf. v 11). 18 From the evening of the fourteenth day until the evening of the twenty-first day refers to the period of time covered by both the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread. To make sense of this statement it must be assumed that the day was reckoned as beginning at sunrise, and not at sunset. From the sixth century BC onwards the Jews reckoned the day as beginning at sunset. 23 The precise nature of the destroyer is not revealed in Exodus. According to Ps. 78:49 this may refer to a 'band of destroying angels'.

12:29–36 The death of the Egyptian firstborn. Various predictions made in 11:1–10 are fulfilled in this section. God struck down all the Egyptian firstborn at midnight, causing the people to wail loudly (29–30; cf. 11:4–6). After summoning Moses and Aaron for the final time, Pharaoh permitted the Israelites to leave unconditionally (31–32; cf. 11:1). As instructed (11:2), the Israelites asked for and received from the Egyptians articles of silver and gold and clothing (35). Because the LORD had made the Egyptians favourably disposed towards the people ... they gave them what they asked for (36; cf. 11:3). The ‘plundering’ of Egypt is viewed as retribution for the way in which the Egyptians had treated the Israelites as slaves (cf. Gn. 15:14).

12:37–41 The exodus begins. With Pharaoh’s permission the Israelites began their journey to freedom, travelling from Rameses to Succoth. The haste of their departure is marked by the fact that they only had time to prepare bread made without yeast. At last, after 430 years, the people were enabled to leave Egypt as a result of the mighty wonders performed by God.

Note. 40 Gn. 15:13 refers to the descendants of Abraham being enslaved and ill-treated for 400 years (cf. Acts 7:6). The larger figure here of 430 years probably includes the period of peace which they enjoyed after first arriving in Egypt.

12:42–50 Regulations governing the Passover

The account of the departure of the Israelites is interrupted by this section which records regulations for the Passover. Clearly, these regulations applied to both the first Passover and later commemorations (42). The section ends by noting the obedience of the Israelites, with v 50 corresponding closely with v 28, possibly indicating that the instructions belong there chronologically. By ordering the material as he does, the narrator brings together in 12:42–13:16 the three ways in which the Israelites’ deliverance from Egypt was to be celebrated: by re-enacting the Passover (43–49); by keeping the feast of Unleavened Bread (13:3–10); and by consecrating every firstborn male (13:11–16).

12:51–13:16 Further instructions for commemorating the Passover

The narrative picks up in v 51 where it left off in v 41 by repeating various details (e.g. on that very day, divisions; the NIV obscures somewhat the similarity between the two verses in the Hebrew text). On the day following the destruction of the Egyptian firstborn God announced to Moses that the Israelites must set apart as special the first offspring of every womb ... whether man or animal (v 2). Moses in turn expanded this directive as he conveyed it to the people (11–16). It is preceded, however, by instructions regarding the celebration of the feast of Unleavened Bread (3–10). Although Moses and Aaron had been informed about this feast earlier (12:14–20), it was only now that the people learned of it. Moses’ speech to the people falls neatly into two halves, which parallel each other closely. Both begin with references to the people taking possession of the land of Canaan in fulfilment of God’s oath to their forefathers (5, 11). Next come instructions regarding the commemoration of the Israelites’ deliverance from Egypt (6–7, 12–13), and the explanation of these activities to the children (8, 14–15). Finally, both halves are marked by similar endings, concluding with the comment that the LORD brought you out of Egypt with his mighty hand (9; cf. v 16).

13:17–22 First stage of the journey out of Egypt

Having announced his intention to bring the Israelites back to the land of Canaan, God proceeded to lead them in that direction. However, out of concern for their security, he piloted them by a longer, safer route, taking them around by the desert road towards the Red Sea. In fulfilment of the oath made by the sons of Israel to Joseph (Gn. 50:24–25), Moses took with him Joseph’s embalmed remains. The narrator draws special attention to God's continual presence with the people, marked by a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. As the ensuing narrative reveals, God remained in close proximity to the Israelites, indicating his special relationship with them.

Possible routes for the exodus.

Note. 18 Red Sea (Heb. yam sūp̄; lit. 'Sea of reeds') probably denotes the northern part of the Red Sea that is, the Gulf of Aqabah (the north-eastern branch) and the Gulf of Suez (the north-western branch) including the region now known as the Bitter Lakes (in antiquity this latter region may have been directly connected to the Red Sea). The exact location of the crossing is uncertain; most scholars, however, favour the region of the Bitter Lakes. For the possible route of the Israelite exodus, see map.

14:1–31 The destruction of the Egyptian army

The present passage has much in common with the cycle of episodes leading up to the Passover. We encounter again some familiar themes: the hardening of Pharaoh's heart (4, 17); the stretching out of the staff in Moses' hand (16; cf. vs 21, 26–27); and the distinction which God made between the Egyptians and the Israelites (19–20, 28–29). As we read of the departure of the Israelites and the destruction of Pharaoh and the Egyptian army we come towards the climax of the first half of the book of Exodus.

Although Pharaoh permitted the Israelites to leave Egypt after the death of the firstborn, there was to be one final demonstration of God's power. Consequently, God delayed the Israelites' departure for Canaan, and they remained in Egypt on the western side of the Red Sea (cf. 13:18; 15:4). When Pharaoh and his army encountered their former slaves, the Israelites, believing themselves trapped, were terrified (10–12). However, by stretching out his staff Moses provided a safe escape route for the people through the divided waters of the sea. When the Egyptians followed, Moses again stretched out his hand over the sea, this time with tragic consequences for Pharaoh and his soldiers: not one of them survived (28). Through repetition vs 4 and 18 draw attention to God's prime motive in destroying the Egyptian army: the Egyptians will know that I am the LORD. Earlier Pharaoh had dismissively rejected Moses' request to let the people go by stating, 'Who is the LORD, that I should obey him and let Israel go?' (5:2). Now he discovered why 'the LORD' should be obeyed. The narrative also highlights the changing attitude of the Israelites, from unbelief and fear in the face of the Egyptian threat (14:10–12) to faith and trust in the light of God's deliverance (14:31).

15:1–21 The Israelites' celebration of God's power

As a fitting conclusion to the preceding account of the divine deliverance of the enslaved Israelites from Egyptian control, Moses and the people celebrated in song the majesty and power of 'the LORD' (1–18). Significantly, the narrative switches from prose to poetry. The exalted language of the poetry conveys better than prose the thoughts and feelings of the Israelites as they worshipped the one who had taken pity upon them and rescued them from the tyrant's power. By going over again what has already been recorded in prose, the reader too is encouraged to participate in the celebrations of the Israelites. As the people responded in adoration and praise for what God had already done, they looked forward with confidence to the future. Thus their song concludes by focusing on what God has yet to accomplish on their behalf (13–18). In the light of past events and future expectations it is hardly surprising that at the end of this section we read of Miriam and all the women playing tambourines and dancing with joy.

Note. 21 This verse probably records only the opening part of Miriam's song, which repeats almost word for word the start of Moses' song in v 1; together these verses frame this section, marking its beginning and conclusion.

15:22–18:27 The Israelites under divine rule

15:22–17:7 The people grumble for food and water

In spite of their miraculous deliverance from slavery, life in Egypt still held an attraction for the Israelites. There follow a number of incidents in which they grumbled about the short-comings of their new situation, revealing their remarkable unwillingness to trust and obey God (cf. 15:24; 16:2–12; 17:1–7). All three incidents focus on a lack of food or water. Nevertheless, God remained committed to his people.

15:22–27 The waters of Marah. The short account of Moses making the bitter water sweet provides a suitable transition from the situation which confronted the Israelites in Egypt to that following the exodus. The incident illustrates the change which Israel had experienced between the 'bitter' life in Egypt and the newly found freedom which they now enjoyed. The passage also stresses the benefits which belong to Israel if they remain loyal to God. Obedience to the Lord's commands and decrees is a theme which reappears frequently in the rest of Exodus, especially in connection with the covenant made at Sinai. A related theme is how God tested the people in order to ascertain the extent of their obedience (25; cf. 16:4; 17:2, 7; 20:20).

16:1–36 The people grumble for food. As they journeyed through the desert region to the south-east of the Bitter Lakes, the cruelty and suffering of Egypt was quickly forgotten when the people became hungry. They even suggested that it would have been better for them to have died by the LORD's hand in Egypt, rather than starve in the desert (3–4). In response God graciously sent quails in the evening (13) and a bread-like substance in the morning; the latter was called manna because the people said, What [Heb. man] is it? (31; cf. v 15). God tested the Israelites by issuing certain stipulations concerning the collection and storage of the manna (4–5, 16, 23). To demonstrate their faith in God's provision, the people were not supposed to keep any of the manna from one day to the next (19). However, on the sixth day of the week, Friday, double the quantity of manna was to be collected and prepared, for the next day (the Sabbath) was to be a day of rest. These instructions were not heeded by some of the people (20, 28). Although they had been delivered from the Egyptians by remarkable displays of God's power, some still lacked total commitment and loyalty to him. As the exodus story reveals, the Israelites frequently displayed their obstinacy towards God. Nevertheless, such is the constancy of God that he provides manna for the next forty years; only when the people settled in the land of Canaan did the manna cease (35–36). As a testimony to future generations an omer of manna was preserved in a jar (33).

In the NT Jesus compares himself with the manna divinely provided in the wilderness: 'I am the living bread that came down from heaven. If anyone eats of this bread, he will live for ever. This bread is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world' (Jn. 6:51; cf. 6:48–58).

17:1–7 The people grumble for water. A further dispute between the Israelites and Moses occurred at Rephidim because of lack of water. The conflict was settled when Moses, following divine instructions, used his staff to produce water from a rock (6). Whereas in the previous episode God had tested the Israelites (16:4), now they tested him by their lack of trust (2, 7). Because of their actions the place was called Massah and Meribah, ‘testing and quarrelling’ (7; cf. v 2). Paul refers to this incident in 1 Cor. 10:3–4, suggesting that the pre-existent Christ was the one who sustained the people with food and water.

17:8–16 The defeat of the Amalekites

An attack by the Amalekites led to a battle between them and the Israelites. Once again the staff of God in the hands of Moses played a symbolic role in giving the Israelites victory. When Moses held it aloft, Joshua and the Israelite army were successful in overcoming the Amalekites. Through the incidents which occurred immediately following their escape from Egypt, God proved himself more than capable of meeting the needs of the Israelites.

18:1–27 The visit of Jethro

Two factors may indicate that the events recorded in this chapter may have taken place at a later date. First, the reference to the mountain of God in v 5 suggests that the Israelites had already arrived at Sinai (cf. 19:1–2). Secondly, the account of Jethro encouraging Moses to appoint judges may presuppose that God’s laws and decrees had already been entrusted to the people (cf. Dt. 1:9–18). However, these arguments are not conclusive and the events of ch. 18 could have occurred prior to the arrival of the Israelites at Mt Sinai.

In either case, the narrative is linked thematically to the surrounding chapters. First, the visit of Jethro contrasts sharply with the previous account of the attack by the Amalekites. Jethro, as representative of the Midianites, adopted a positive approach towards the Israelites, and acknowledged God’s sovereign power (10–11). Secondly, this episode prepares for the following chapters by focusing on (i) the marvellous way in which God delivered the Israelites out of bondage in Egypt and, (ii) the importance of God’s decrees and laws. Whereas the latter anticipates the legal material given in chs. 21–23, the former emphasizes the basis of the covenant relationship established in chs. 19–24 (cf. 19:4–6; 20:2). The divine rescue of the Israelites is highlighted directly by the remarks of Jethro, and indirectly by the comment concerning the name of Moses’ second son, Eliezer, for he said ‘My father’s God was my helper; he saved me from the sword of Pharaoh’ (4).

The latter part of the chapter portrays Moses judging the disputes which arose among the Israelites. Jethro’s advice to Moses, on the need to delegate authority, led to the establishment of a hierarchical structure for the resolution of conflicts (25–26). The example of Moses delegating authority to others is a fitting reminder that within the life of the church we need to share tasks so that no single individual is unduly burdened. Those in positions of leadership should also be prepared to entrust others with meaningful responsibilities.

19:1–24:11 The establishment of the covenant

19:1–15 Preparations for the covenant

When God first called Moses to go to Pharaoh, one of the promises which he made to him was that the people would ‘worship God on this mountain’ (3:12). Their arrival at Mt Sinai is noted in 19:2. From the fourth century AD there has been a strong tradition locating Mt Sinai in the southern part of the Sinai peninsula and identifying it with Jebel Musa (Mt Moses). This identification is not without difficulty, and an alternative possibility has been suggested, locating Sinai further to the north, in Wadi Sudr. Mt Sinai is then identified with Jebel Sin Bisher.

A major new development occurs in chs. 19–24 with the making of a covenant between God and the Israelites. The basic form of this agreement is found in vs 4–6. If Israel, in the light of her divine deliverance from Egypt, would obey ‘the LORD’, then she would be his treasured possession, a kingdom of priests and a holy nation. The expression a kingdom of priests can also be translated ‘priestly kings’, suggesting that the Israelites were to enjoy the privilege of being both priests and kings in relation to other peoples. This indicates the important role which Israel was to play in God’s future plans. However, their special status was conditional upon their obedience to God. The idea of a ‘royal priesthood’ reappears in the NT with reference to the status of all believers (1 Pet. 2:9; Rev. 1:6; 5:10; 20:6).

The events which anticipate the making of the covenant are clearly intended to underline the serious nature of the agreement about to be established. The people were to prepare themselves for the third day (10–11, 14–15). The mountain was placed out of bounds, under threat of death to anyone who should venture to ascend it (12–13). As in Moses’ earlier encounter with God at Sinai, the mountain was declared holy (23; cf. 3:5). Linked to this was the instruction that Moses should consecrate (or ‘make holy’) the people (10, 14).

19:16–25 God appears before the Israelites on Mt Sinai

The third day was marked by the dramatic appearance of a cloud over the mountain, with thunder and lightning issuing from it. As God descended upon the mountain, smoke rose from it (18). Once more the divine presence is symbolized by fire (cf. 3:2; 24:17). God’s arrival was also announced through the sounding of a long trumpet blast, which grew louder and louder (16, 19).

Note. 22 The priests mentioned here, and in v 24, are those who performed priestly functions prior to the appointment of Aaron and his sons (cf. 28:1).

20:1–21 God addresses the people directly

20:1–2 Introduction. As the people stood in awe before the mountain, they heard the very voice of God introducing himself to them: I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery (2; cf. Dt. 4:12–13; 5:4). There then follows a list of stipulations which were to form the basis of Israel’s covenant relationship with God (3–17). These were later termed ‘the ten words’ (34:28; Dt. 4:13; 10:4), from which we derive the designation Decalogue or Ten Commandments. Their importance was further emphasized when they were eventually inscribed by God on two stone tablets (24:12; 31:18; 34:1, 28; see below).

The stipulations outlined by God were to govern Israel’s relationship with him. These represent the principal requirements which God placed upon the people of Israel for the establishment and maintenance of the covenant relationship between them. The people were to be single-minded in their devotion to the one who had delivered them from Egypt. They were to worship him alone (3). Furthermore, their social behaviour was to follow a pattern which placed a high priority on the rights of the individual as regards life, marriage and possessions. They were to obey these commands out of love for God (6).

Strictly speaking, the Decalogue is not a collection of laws. Various factors set it apart from the other legal collections of the Pentateuch. First it was spoken directly by God to the people; Moses did not act as an intermediary (1, 19; cf. Dt. 4:12–13; 5:4–5, 22–27). Secondly, it alone was inscribed on stone tablets by the ‘finger of God’ (31:18; cf. 24:12, 32:15–16; 34:1, 28). All other regulations and instructions were written down by Moses (24:4; 34:27–28, see note on 34:28). Thirdly, the Ten Commandments are hardly detailed precepts, since no punishments are listed. Although the second and fifth commandments appear to contain penalties, these are really ‘motivation clauses’ designed to promote the observance of the divine instructions. Finally, what human law court could begin to enforce the prohibition against coveting described in the tenth commandment?

The covenant stipulations in ch. 20 are listed in order of descending priority and focus on the Israelites’ relationship to God and other people. Jesus summarized this twofold division as love for God and love for one’s neighbour (Mt. 22:37–39; Mk. 12:29–31). Love for God must come first, but it can never be divorced from love for one’s neighbour; the former leads automatically to the latter.

20:3 First commandment. Sole allegiance to ‘the LORD’ lies at the very heart of the covenant relationship. It is the foundation upon which everything else rests. The people were in practice to be monotheistic, worshipping only God. As is made clear elsewhere in the Pentateuch, the worship of other deities was punishable by death (Nu. 25:1–18; Dt. 13:1–18).

20:4–6 Second commandment. Unlike contemporary peoples, the Israelites were not to make or worship visual representations of their God. In both Egypt and Canaan, human and animal forms played an important function in depicting the attributes of a deity. Any attempt on the part of the Israelites to represent God using such images would produce a distorted picture of his true nature. The incident of the golden calf (ch. 32) reveals both the necessity of this prohibition in the light of the people’s desire to have some visual image of ‘the LORD’, and the serious consequences of disregarding this commandment.

20:7 Third commandment. Whereas the second commandment prohibits visual representations of God, the third focuses on verbal representations. As a sign of their respect for God, the people were to exercise the greatest caution when talking about him or invoking his name. They were to say nothing which might detract from a true appreciation of his nature and character.

20:8–11 Fourth commandment. The people were to refrain from work on the seventh day, the Sabbath. According to 31:12–18 the Sabbath was the sign of the covenant relationship inaugurated at Sinai; as such it functioned like the earlier covenant sign of circumcision (Gn. 17:9–14). Anyone failing to observe the Sabbath showed their disdain for the special relationship established between God and Israel. As a result of the new covenant inaugurated by Christ the Sabbath (Saturday) was replaced by the Lord’s day (Sunday). The strict observance of the Sabbath, like circumcision, is no longer binding upon Christians.

20:12 Fifth commandment. The concept of honouring is usually associated with God or his representatives, prophets and kings. In all likelihood parents were envisaged as representing God to their children; the family unit being a miniature of the nation. The seriousness of this commandment is reflected in the fact that the death penalty was required for children who wilfully disrespected their parents (Ex. 21:15, 17). If parents, as authority figures within the home, are respected by children, then respect for authority figures within society at large will also follow.

20:13 Sixth commandment. This commandment, by prohibiting murder or manslaughter, demonstrates the high priority which God places upon human life. No human being has the right to take another's life because each person is made in God's image (cf. Gn. 1:27; 9:6). In the Pentateuch, the punishment for taking another's life is death itself. The commandment, however, does not include judicial executions for capital offences or legitimate deaths resulting from war, and it should also be noted that the OT laws draw a careful distinction between premeditated and accidental deaths (see on 21:1–22:20, the section entitled 'The sanctity of life').

20:14 Seventh commandment. In God's order of priority, the sanctity of human life is followed by the importance of the marriage relationship. Adultery here means sexual relations between a married woman and a man who is not her husband. Those caught in adultery could be executed (Lv. 20:10; Dt. 22:22). Relations between a married man and an unmarried woman do not qualify as adultery. Hence polygamy is not automatically excluded by this commandment, although in practice it was rare in OT times. Similarly, divorce was permitted, but not encouraged. The NT teaching on marriage is, in certain respects, more demanding, reflecting more closely God's ideal for human marriage as expressed in Gn. 2:24; polygamy, a husband's adultery and possibly remarriage are all prohibited (cf. Mt. 19:3–12; Mk. 10:2–12; Lk. 16:18). As a whole, the Bible reveals that God desires the establishment of harmonious marital relationships and that neither partner should do anything to undermine this.

20:15 Eighth commandment. The next principle to govern the Israelites' relationship with God is respect for the property of others. Any individual found guilty of dispossessing another was to be punished in accordance with the value of what they had stolen and the injured party was to be suitably compensated. While other Ancient Near Eastern cultures sometimes invoked the death penalty for theft, the OT consistently rejects such a position, indicating clearly that God values human life and the marital relationship above property.

20:16 Ninth commandment. In the final two commandments we proceed from prohibitions involving actions to prohibitions involving words and thoughts respectively. This concludes the downward progression of priorities which we have observed. The ninth commandment emphasizes the importance of truthfulness. While the prohibition against false testimony was primarily intended for a court of law, it may be extended to include any situation in which untrue words are used to harm another individual.

20:17 Tenth commandment. The final commandment forbids an individual to covet what belongs to another. Unlike all the other commands, it addresses inner feelings and thoughts such as envy or greed. If the Israelites were to enjoy a harmonious covenant relationship with God, every aspect of their lives must conform to his will. Outward adherence is insufficient; their inner selves must be patterned according to the divine principles of morality found in the Ten Commandments. As Jesus reminds us, to interpret the commandments as requiring only outward obedience is to misunderstand their purpose (Mt. 5:17–48).

20:18–21 The people's initial reaction. As a result of God's appearance, the people were filled with alarm. Even before God addressed them, they were terrified (19:16), and as God spoke, their fear increased (18–19). Moses, however, observed that they were being tested so that the fear of God will be with you to keep you from sinning (20). Still afraid, the people requested Moses to act as mediator between them and God (21).

20:22–26 Instructions for the offering of sacrifices

This is the first section of a long speech by ‘the LORD’ which Moses heard alone, and subsequently recorded. As we shall see below, the contents of God’s speech relate closely to the account of the ratification of the covenant in 24:3–11.

Although many commentators view this first section as part of the detailed legislation which comprises the Book of the Covenant, there are grounds for treating it as distinctive. Apart from the obvious difficulty of explaining why detailed laws would have been inserted before the heading in 21:1, the form of presentation does not conform to the patterns used throughout 21:1–22:20. These features can best be accounted for by the fact that 20:22–26 records instructions, not detailed legislation, for the building of an altar and the offering of sacrifices. These activities form an essential part of the covenant ratification ceremony described in 24:4–8. The mention of burnt offerings and fellowship offerings in both contexts, reinforces the connection. Nevertheless, although they relate in the first instance to the events of ch. 24, the instructions on building an altar were applicable to other occasions.

Notes. 26 Later, God instructed Moses to make linen undergarments for Aaron and his sons in order that they might not expose their nakedness in God’s presence (to do so would have led to death; 28:42–43).

21:1–23:33 The Book of the Covenant

According to 24:4, Moses recorded everything that God said in a document known appropriately as the Book of the Covenant (24:7). Possibly most, if not all, of this document is preserved in 21:1–23:33. It falls into four sections. First, there is a long list of laws dealing with various aspects of everyday life (21:1–22:20). The next part consists of moral imperatives which highlight the exemplary behaviour God expects of his people, especially towards the underprivileged (22:21–23:9). Thirdly, instructions were given regarding the observance of the Sabbath and religious festivals (23:10–19). Finally, God outlined how he would act on behalf of the Israelites, enabling them to take possession of the land of Canaan (23:20–33).

In a book which underlines God’s passionate concern for justice through his rescue of the Israelites from Egypt, it is hardly surprising that a similar concern for justice should dominate the covenant which he established with the Israelites. This is most apparent in the detailed legislation and moral imperatives which form the first two sections of the Book of the Covenant.

21:1–22:20 Detailed legislation. The material which comprises this section represents only some of the statutes which formed part of ancient Israel’s law. In all likelihood many of the laws included here have been selected because they corresponded closely with God’s actions in rescuing the Israelites from slavery in Egypt. At the very outset the principle was established that slaves had the right to be set free after a fixed period of time (1–4); this implied that the Egyptians acted illegally by enslaving the Israelites for such a long period of time. In contrast, the statutes concerning a slave who loves his master (5–6), and the treatment of female slaves (7–11) were intended to highlight various aspects of Israel’s covenant relationship with ‘the LORD’: the Israelites would serve him because they loved him; having chosen Israel God would remain faithful to them. A further group of laws draws attention to the principle of compensation for those who have been physically injured (18–27). In particular, any slave who suffered serious injury at the hand of his or her master was to be released immediately (26–27). In the light of Israel’s harsh treatment in Egypt (cf. Ex. 2:11; 5:14–16) these laws justify indirectly God’s action in freeing the Israelites. Another set of laws focuses on the concept of restitution (22:1–15). Here also it is possible to see a connection with earlier comments about how the Israelites demanded articles of silver and gold and clothing from the Egyptians (3:21–22; 11:2; 12:35–36). These items compensated the Israelites for the way in which they had been exploited in Egypt.

Apart from their relevance in justifying prior events in the book of Exodus, the laws in this section are also significant because of the ideals and values which permeate them. The following are the most noteworthy.

(i) Moral symmetry. The biblical laws were based on the principle that the punishment should match the crime. This is stated most clearly in the well known, but generally misunderstood, ‘law of talion’: life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burn for burn, wound for wound, bruise for bruise (21:23–25; cf. Lv. 24:17–21; Dt. 19:21). At first sight, the law of talion appears to be a rather barbaric way of ensuring justice. Yet, within the development of law in the Ancient Near East it represented an important advance. In the earliest known collections of laws monetary fines were imposed in cases of assault and bodily injury. The weakness of such fines was that they failed to take into account an individual’s ability to pay. (For an unemployed labourer a fine of a thousand pounds imposes great hardship; to a millionaire it is a mere trifle.) The law of talion removed all such discrepancies by ensuring that the punishment should be no less, or no more, than the crime demanded.

The law of talion, however, was not always applied literally. In the Book of the Covenant it is preceded by a case of wounding, the punishment for which was the cost of medical expenses and compensation for lost wages (21:18–19). Similarly, it is followed by a law in which a servant was granted release as compensation for the loss of an eye or a tooth (21:26–27). Clearly, there was no literal application of the law of talion in these instances.

(ii) The sanctity of life. Many modern readers of the biblical laws are likely to be disturbed by the use of capital punishment for a variety of crimes, including murder, kidnapping, physical or verbal assaults against parents, sorcery, bestiality and idolatry (21:12–17; 22:18–20). Against modern standards of justice this punishment appears extremely harsh. Nevertheless, it reflects the value which the Israelites placed upon individual human life; the hierarchical structure within the family; and the purity of worship. In the case of murder the death penalty was invoked, not out of indifference for human life, but rather because each human life is of tremendous value (cf. Gn. 9:6). A life for a life does not express vengefulness, but rather the idea that the only payment which can be made for the taking of a human life is a human life itself. This even applies to animals responsible for a human death (21:28).

The distinctiveness of the biblical laws is apparent when one compares them with other Ancient Near Eastern laws. In the earlier Laws of Hammurabi, a murderer was required to make only financial compensation to the victim’s family. This contrasts sharply with the biblical insistence of a life for a life. On the other hand, the non-biblical laws apply the death penalty to breaking and entering, looting at a fire, and theft. These examples reveal that in other cultures financial loss was sometimes treated more seriously than loss of life. The biblical laws consistently emphasize that human life is of greater value than material possessions.

In the light of these observations, it might appear that Christians ought to support the death penalty for crimes like murder. However, other factors must also be considered. First, the ancient Israelites did not have the option of sentencing a murderer to life imprisonment; there were no facilities to imprison someone for a long period of time. Remarkably, imprisonment was never used as a means of punishment for any crime. Obviously this greatly restricted their choice of punishment. Secondly, it is likely that the death penalty was rarely utilized. This probably ensured that its use did not have the effect of devaluing human life. To make frequent recourse to capital punishment might suggest that human life is of little esteem, thus negating the very reason for adopting it. Whatever form of punishment we endorse, as Christians we must always ensure that it does not undermine the sanctity of human life.

(iii) Preventing abuse of the legal system. Safeguards were built into the legislation to prevent its abuse or misuse. In any society there is always the danger that the law may be used by an unscrupulous individual against an innocent party. This probably explains the different judgments concerning the death of a burglar (22:2–3). If he was killed at night, the owner of the house was innocent of any wrongdoing. If the incident occurred during daylight, the householder was guilty of bloodshed. The different judgments seem to be aimed at preventing someone from murdering another person and then claiming that the victim was a thief. Without such safeguards the law would actually work in favour of the guilty party. This judgment also indicates that even a thief was offered some protection by the law.

Note. 21:6 Before the judges is lit. ‘before God’ (see also, 22:8–9 and 22:28). The judgment passed in 22:8–9 may be based on the use of the Urim and Thummim (see 28:15–30).

22:21–23:9 Moral imperatives. The material in this passage is usually taken to be detailed statutes. However, a number of factors suggest that it should be distinguished from the precepts found in 21:1–22:20. First, this section is marked off from the surrounding material by the frame formed by 22:21 and 23:9. Both verses not only prohibit the mistreatment of aliens, but they also underline this by reminding the Israelites that they were once aliens in Egypt. Secondly, the way in which the material is presented does not correspond with the two distinctive forms used in the previous section; rather, it is reminiscent of the form adopted in the Decalogue. Thirdly, apart from the general comment in v 24, I will kill you with the sword, no penalties enforceable by a human court are stipulated for breaking the rules outlined here. Fourthly, the subject matter of this section is distinctive. It encourages both a caring attitude towards the weak and vulnerable members of society (i.e. aliens, widows, orphans, the needy, the poor) and a concern that the legal system be totally impartial. Those involved in disputes are to favour neither the rich, by accepting a bribe (23:8), nor the poor (23:3). Everyone, irrespective of their class, is to be treated equally (23:6, 9). A witness must not be swayed by social pressure (23:2), and should ensure that his or her testimony is truthful (23:1, 7). These observations suggest that we are dealing with moral imperatives rather than detailed laws.

The commands found here seek to encourage a standard of behaviour which goes beyond the letter of the law. A human court is unlikely to prosecute someone for failing to return his enemy’s straying animal; nevertheless, God demands that his people should overcome evil with good (23:4–5; cf. Mt. 5:43–48; Rom. 12:19–21). In the light of the special relationship being established between God and the people it is surely significant that in the middle of this section is the command, you are to be my holy people (22:31). We see here how God’s holy people should live.

23:10–19 Instructions concerning the Sabbath and religious festivals. The material in this section is carefully structured, falling into two halves centred around v 13, with each half subdivided into two parts. The first half deals with the seventh year (23:10–11) and the seventh day (23:12). Vs 14–19 are concerned with the three main festivals which the Israelites celebrated annually: Unleavened Bread, Harvest and Ingathering. The instructions in 23:17–19 correspond with the three feasts outlined in vs 14–16 (note in particular how v 17 parallels v 14).

Three features are worth noting. First, almost all the material in this section anticipated the Israelites enjoying a settled agricultural existence in the land of Canaan. To a fugitive slave these instructions must have implied prosperous times ahead. Secondly, the observance of the Sabbath was exceptionally important because it was the sign of the covenant which was established between God and Israel (31:12–17). Anyone desecrating the Sabbath was guilty of renouncing this special relationship with God; the consequence was death (31:14–15). Thirdly, the Israelites were reminded of their obligation to worship God alone: Do not invoke the names of other gods; do not let them be heard on your lips (23:13). Such worship lies at the heart of the three annual festivals which celebrate God's benevolence towards Israel.

Notes. 15 The Feast of Unleavened Bread was celebrated at the beginning of the barley harvest (about mid-May to mid-June) to commemorate the Passover (see 12:14–20). 16 The Feast of Harvest was also known as the 'Feast of Weeks' because it was celebrated seven weeks after the Feast of Unleavened Bread. In NT times it was known as 'Pentecost' (lit. 'fifty') because it came fifty days after Unleavened Bread (cf. Acts 2:1; 20:16; 1 Cor. 16:8). The Feast of Ingathering was also known as the 'Feast of Tabernacles' or 'Booths'. 19 The prohibition, do not cook a young goat in its mother's milk is the basis of the Jewish practice of not eating dairy and meat produce at the same time. Originally it was probably related to the Feast of Ingathering and may have been intended to distinguish the celebrations of the Israelites from those of their neighbours. Alternatively, it may reflect the principle that what is designed to give life should not become a means of death.

23:20–33 Divine promises and warnings concerning the land of Canaan. The final part of the Book of the Covenant highlights the reciprocal nature of the covenant which was established between God and Israel. If the Israelites obeyed the LORD their God, then they would take possession of the land of Canaan (22–23). Furthermore, God's blessing would ensure their future comfort (25–26) and security (27–28). As a consequence of their relationship with God, the Israelites must distance themselves from the worship of other gods by destroying all pagan images and places of worship (24). For similar reasons, they must not enter into any treaty with the inhabitants of Canaan lest this caused them to compromise their exclusive allegiance to God (32–33). Such a warning was necessary because although God promised to remove from the land the nations already living there, they would be expelled only gradually to avoid the land becoming desolate (29–30).

24:1–2 God's invitation to ascend the mountain

The chapter division unfortunately implies that God's invitation to Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu and seventy of the elders of Israel to ascend the mountain is quite separate from the divine speech in chs. 21–23. However, the Hebrew text indicates that this is a continuation of the divine speech; the only difference being that God now gives specific instructions for Moses alone, and not all the Israelites (cf. 20:22).

24:3–11 The ratification of the covenant

After his descent from the mountain, Moses relayed God's words to the people. Once more they expressed their willingness to do all that God commanded (3; cf. 19:8). There follows a brief account of the ceremony by which the covenant between the LORD and Israel was ratified (4–11). Interestingly, the activities outlined here reflect the three main sections of God's speech to Moses (20:24–24:2). The building of an altar and the offering of sacrifices parallel the instructions given in 20:24–26. Moses then read to the people the Book of the Covenant (24:7), that is the main middle section of the divine speech (21:1–23:33). Thus Moses reminded them of how they should live as God's holy people, and the reciprocal nature of the covenant itself. After the Israelites again acknowledged their willingness to obey God (7), the covenant was sealed through the sprinkling of blood on the people (8). Finally, God's invitation to Moses and the elders to come up the mountain was accepted, and this resulted in a remarkable vision of the divine glory (9–11). Only those invited by God could approach his holy presence; for others to have done so would have meant death (cf. 19:21–22, 24).

24:12–31:18 Instructions for the building of a sanctuary

The next major section of Exodus is introduced by the divine command that Moses should ascend Mt Sinai to receive stone tablets inscribed with the law and commands I have written for their instruction (24:12); this refers back to the Decalogue, and not to the Book of the Covenant. The handing over of the two stone tablets to Moses (31:18) marks the conclusion of this section by forming a frame with 24:12.

Apart from a brief introduction and conclusion this section is dominated by a long divine speech outlining the preparations necessary for the construction of a special sanctuary and the appointment of priests (25:1–31:17). The importance of this sanctuary is highlighted by the space devoted to recording both God's description of how the tent and its furnishing should be manufactured, and the subsequent construction (35:4–39:43). Altogether, excluding the details relating to the consecration of the priests, approximately one-fifth of Exodus is given over to describing the construction of God's dwelling place. Yet, in spite of this, the present account does not provide all the information necessary to reconstruct fully the original tent or tabernacle, as it is commonly known. The plan of the tabernacle was similar to that adopted for the temple of Solomon and its post-exilic replacement; their dimensions, however, are twice those of the tabernacle. For an account of how the early church associated the death of Jesus with the tabernacle and its ritual, see Heb. 9:1–10:18.

24:12–18 Moses is summoned into God's presence

Although Moses had previously ascended the mountain to converse with God, there is no indication that he stayed for any length of time. On this occasion, however, he was invited to stay on the mountain and did so for a period of forty days and forty nights (18). In anticipation of this, Moses delegated to Aaron and Hur responsibility for settling any disputes which might arise among the people. No explanation is given as to why Moses had to wait seven days before being summoned into God's presence. It indicates, however, the difficulty which even Moses faced in approaching God.

25:1–27:21 Specific details relating to the tabernacle

25:1–9 Offerings for the construction of the tabernacle. After the ratification of the covenant, God instructed Moses that the Israelites should make an offering in recognition of God's sovereignty over them (1–7). Moses was to accept voluntary gifts on God's behalf; each person was to give as his heart prompts him (2). God then announced his intention to dwell among the people (8; cf. 29:45–46). This is an important theme in the final part of Exodus and considerable attention is given to the preparations necessary for this to be accomplished. God would live, like his people, in a tent. However, the inventory of precious metals and blue-coloured fabric indicates that this was no common tent; it was for royal use.

Note. 5 It is uncertain what material the hides of sea cows was. There are good grounds for believing that it was derived from the dugong, a large sea mammal which grows up to 3 m long and which used to be fairly plentiful in the Gulf of Aqabah.

25:10–22 Instructions for the ark. At the outset Moses was instructed to make three items of furniture for inside the tent. The first of these was a rectangular wooden chest or box, covered with pure gold, both inside and out (10–11). For ease of transportation the chest, or ark as it is traditionally known, was to be constructed with gold rings and poles (12–15). Inside this container Moses would later place the stone tablets which were the Testimony, or ‘terms of agreement’, to the covenant between God and Israel (16, 21; Dt. 10:8 refers to the chest as the ‘ark of the covenant’). The lid of the ark, made of pure gold, was designated an atonement cover (17; cf. Heb. 9:5, ‘place of atonement’). Lv. 16:1–34 (esp. vs 11–17) describes the annual ritual which took place when the high priest sprinkled blood on the ark’s lid to make atonement for ‘the uncleanness and rebellion of the Israelites, whatever their sins have been’ (Lv. 16:16). Two golden cherubim (or cherubs) were to be attached to the ends of the lid, facing each other with outspread wings. Here, between the cherubim, God would later meet with Moses in order to communicate his instructions to the people (22; 30:36; cf. Lv. 16:2). Thus, apart from being a container, the ark also functioned as a seat (sometimes referred to as ‘the mercy seat’), or more specifically as a throne protected by guardian cherubs (cf. 1 Sa. 4:4; 2 Sa. 6:2; 2 Ki. 19:15; Pss. 80:2; 99:1; Is. 37:16). Because of its importance as God’s throne, the building of the ark was outlined first.

Note. 18 Cherubim were the traditional guardians of holy places in the Ancient Near East. Apart from the two described here, others were woven into the curtains which surrounded the tabernacle and which separated the Holy of Holies from the Holy Place (26:1, 31). Cherubim are not to be confused with the ‘cherubic’ children often found in more recent art.

25:23–40 Instructions for the table and the lampstand. The second piece of furniture was a wooden table, overlaid with gold, and fitted with rings and poles (23–28). Plates, dishes and other utensils, all of gold, were also provided, and on the table was at all times the bread of the Presence (29–30). The third main fixture to be constructed was a gold lampstand with seven lamps (31–40). The lampstand was made in the pattern of a growing tree, decorated with flower-like cups, buds and blossoms (31). Three branches extended to either side of the central stem; the tops of the stem and branches were designed to hold lamps. There is no explanation why the lampstand should resemble a tree. Possibly it was to be reminiscent of the tree of life in Gn. 3:22, symbolizing the life-giving power of God. A table and lampstand, together with a chest/seat, comprised the main items of furniture in a home. As such they indicated clearly that God lived within the tent. The abundant use of gold emphasizes the importance of the occupant. The provision of bread (25:30) and light (27:21) are symbolic reminders that God was there at all times, both day and night.

Note. 30 For more on the bread of the Presence see the commentary on Lv. 24:5–9.

26:1–37 Instructions for the tabernacle. Detailed instructions are provided next for the construction of the actual tent or tabernacle. Some uncertainty exists over how the various curtains and wooden frames fitted together. Since the entire structure was designed to be portable, its construction was probably similar to that used for other tents. The bluish fabrics and gold fittings were indicative of royalty. The rectangular structure was to be divided by a curtain into two rooms, one probably being twice the size of the other (31–33). In the smaller of these rooms (the western half of the tabernacle) would be placed the ark of the Testimony. Because God was thought to be seated there, enthroned between the cherubim, this part was called the

Most Holy Place or Holy of Holies (34). The larger room (to the east) was designated the Holy Place; it would be furnished with the golden table and lampstand (35). The curtain separating the two rooms contained woven figures of cherubim as a reminder that the way into the immediate presence of God was barred to sinful man (cf. Gn. 3:24). (For a fuller discussion of the problems involved in reconstructing the tabernacle, see 'Tabernacle' in IBD, pp. 1506–1511.)

Notes. 11 Whereas gold clasps were used for the inner curtain, bronze clasps were sufficient for the outer curtain. 33 The curtain which will separate the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place was the final barrier between the Israelites and God. Mt. 27:51 records that when Jesus died a similar curtain in the temple was torn from top to bottom. By his death on the cross Christ removed the spiritual barrier which exists between God and humankind.

27:1–19 Instructions for the altar and courtyard. Around the tabernacle Moses was to construct a courtyard by erecting a curtain fence. Before the construction of this fence is outlined in detail (27:9–19), directions are given for the production of a portable bronze-plated altar, which was to be situated in the courtyard near the entrance to the tabernacle (1–8). From its dimensions, this altar must have dominated the area in front of the tabernacle; it was 2.5 m wide (half the width of the tabernacle) and 1.5 m high. It consisted of a square hollow framework made of acacia wood overlaid with bronze. To create a draught for the incineration of the animal sacrifices the lower part of each side was made of a grating of bronze network. Its position between the courtyard entrance and the tabernacle indicated that the worshipper could only approach God after offering a sacrifice to atone for sin. Lv. 1:1–7:38 details the various sacrifices which individuals were expected to offer.

The courtyard, a rectangular shape twice as long as it was broad, measured approximately 50 m by 25 m and was surrounded by a curtain about 2.5 m high. The shorter sides were to the east and west. A worshipper entering through the gateway on the eastern side encountered first the large bronze altar before approaching the tabernacle which stood in the western part of the courtyard. The fence which surrounded the courtyard, along with the curtain which hung across the entrance, prevented those outside from looking into the courtyard. Separated from the rest of the Israelite encampment, the courtyard was set apart as a holy area; only the tabernacle, in which God dwelt, was considered to be more sacred. This distinction between the holiness of the courtyard and the tabernacle is reflected in the value of the materials used in their construction. Whereas gold was regularly used within the tabernacle, the main metals used in the courtyard were silver and bronze. Just as the people were prevented from coming up Mt Sinai into the divine presence (19:12–13, 21–24), so too the courtyard fence prevented them from approaching God inadvertently. As Exodus regularly emphasizes, only those who are holy can live in God's presence; to approach God otherwise has fatal consequences. Without the courtyard functioning as a kind of 'buffer zone', it would have been impossible for the Israelites to dwell in safety close to God. (See the picture in Numbers).

27:20–21 The provision of olive oil. The instructions concerning the building of the tabernacle and courtyard are followed by a brief edict that the Israelites should provide olive oil for the lampstand within the tabernacle. Responsibility for keeping the lamps burning each night was assigned to Aaron and his sons (21). Mention of them provides a link with the next set of directives concerning the consecration of the priests for service within the sanctuary (28:1).

Note. 21 From the context the Tent of Meeting obviously refers to the tabernacle, and this is what the expression normally denotes. However, in 33:7 it refers to a quite different tent which was used for meetings between God and Moses prior to the construction and erection of the tabernacle.

28:1–29:46 Specific details relating to the priesthood

28:1–43 The high priest's clothing. Since the area within the courtyard was holy ground, those assigned to serve there must also be holy. To indicate this, Aaron and his sons were provided with sacred garments. The materials used in their production, gold, and blue, purple and scarlet yarn, and fine linen (5), not only highlight the dignity and honour bestowed upon Aaron and his sons, but also clearly associate them with the tabernacle which was made of similar materials. To distinguish Aaron as high priest he was to have a breast-piece, an ephod, a robe, a woven tunic, a turban and a sash (4). His sons were to be given tunics, sashes and headbands (40). The lack of reference to footwear might indicate that the priests served barefooted (when God appeared in the burning bush, Moses was commanded to remove his sandals because the ground was holy; Ex. 3:5). Most attention is focused on the special items worn by the high priest, especially the ephod and breastpiece.

6–14 Because the biblical text is too brief, it is hard to picture the ephod, but it was something like a waistcoat worn over the other vestments (4). Special mention is made of the two precious stones engraved with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. Mounted in gold filigree settings (11), they were fastened on the shoulder pieces of the ephod as memorial stones for the sons of Israel (12). They were a reminder that Aaron served God as high priest, not on his own behalf, but on behalf of all the Israelites.

15–30 The next item, the breastpiece, appears from its description to have been a square pouch which the high priest wore over his chest. The pouch was made of similar materials to the ephod and was attached to it. On the outside of the pouch were four rows of precious stones, with three stones in each row; each stone represented an Israelite tribe. Although Aaron came from the tribe of Levi, as high priest wearing the names of the twelve tribes on his chest, he ministered on behalf of all the people. The use of precious stones symbolized the value which God places upon his people Israel. Finally, instructions are given that the Urim and the Thummim should be placed in the pouch (30). The precise form of the Urim and Thummim remains uncertain but they were used to determine God's judgment (cf. 22:8–9). For a brief description and picture of a reconstruction of the breastpiece see IBD, p. 207.

31–43 The blue robe, adorned with embroidered pomegranates and golden bells, was presumably worn under the ephod and breast-piece. The tinkling of the bells would serve to identify the one entering or leaving the Holy of Holies, enabling the high priest to come close to God in safety; anyone else venturing into God's presence would die (cf. 19:12–13, 21–22, 24). As a further reminder of the sacred nature of priestly service, the front of Aaron's turban had a gold plate engraved with the words, HOLY TO THE LORD (36). Because he would be set apart as holy, Aaron as high priest was able to mediate on behalf of the Israelites, ensuring that their sacrifices were acceptable to God (38). Apart from the items already mentioned, Aaron was also to wear a tunic, turban and sash (39). (The tunic appears to have been worn under the robe of the ephod; cf. 29:5.) Because they do not relate directly to the 'dignity and honour' (2) of the priests, the instructions concerning underwear are given separately. The priests were to wear linen undergarments to prevent them from inadvertently exposing their genitalia in the Holy Place (cf. 20:26). Such nakedness was clearly inappropriate in the presence of God (cf. Gn. 3:7, 10, 21). Moreover, since only the priests could enter the tabernacle, the command that they should wear undergarments would reassure those outside that nothing unseemly occurred within the tabernacle.

Note. 41 The Hebrew term translated ‘ordain’ in the NIV literally means ‘you will fill their hands.’ This does not refer to ‘ordination’, but rather to the supplying of the priests’ needs (cf. 29:22–28).

29:1–46 The consecration of the priests. The instructions concerning the consecration of Aaron and his sons forms a natural sequel to the preceding chapter. For the priests to minister in God’s holy presence they too must be holy. Since, as the book of Exodus reveals on different occasions, only God has an innate holy nature, various measures must be taken if a human being is to become holy. The present account reflects the stages mentioned in 28:41 which lead up to the consecration of the priests: clothe, anoint, ‘fill the hands’ and consecrate.

After assembling the necessary items (1–3), Moses was to clothe Aaron and his sons in their priestly garments (5–9). Next he had to offer up three different sacrifices, involving a bull and two rams. The first (10–14 best understood as a purification offering) involved the bull, and followed closely the instructions given later in Lv. 4:3–12 concerning the unintentional sin of an anointed priest. In this instance, however, the blood was probably placed on the horns of the large bronze altar in the courtyard and not on the gold incense altar within the tabernacle (12; cf. Lv. 4:7). The blood purified the altar which had become defiled through contact with individuals who were considered unclean.

The next sacrifice (a whole burnt offering, vs 15–18) followed exactly the instructions given later in Lv. 1:10–13 for the offering of a ram. The whole burnt offering atoned for the sins of Aaron and his sons. The total destruction of the animal was a vivid reminder that sinful man could not approach a holy God. The animal died as a substitute for those who were identified with it by the laying of their hands on its head. The third sacrifice (19–34) resembled closely a fellowship or peace offering, made as an expression of thankfulness (cf. Lv. 3:6–11; 7:12–15).

However, despite its similarities to the regular offerings, the ritual described here has distinctive features, appropriate for this unique occasion. First, Aaron, his sons and their garments were to be consecrated by sacrificial blood (19–21); whatever the blood touched became holy. ‘The priest must have consecrated ears ever to listen to God’s holy voice; consecrated hands at all times to do holy deeds; and consecrated feet to walk evermore in holy ways’ (A. Dillmann, Exodus und Leviticus, 2nd edn [Hirzel, 1880], p. 465). Secondly, vs 22–35 focus on the remuneration which Aaron and his sons were to receive as priests. The NIV wrongly refers to this as the ram for the ordination (22; cf. 29:26, 27, 31, 34). It is lit. ‘the ram of [the] filling’. This ‘filling’ refers to the portion which the priests received into their hands after offering up different sacrifices (cf. Lv. 6:14–18, 25–29; 7:1–38). The ritual which Moses was to perform consecrated the right thigh and breast of the sacrificial animal for priestly consumption. A distinction was drawn between the breast, which was waved, and the thigh, which was presented (27). In this instance, the breast was given to Moses as his reward for offering the sacrifice (26) and the thigh was burnt on the altar, along with some bread (25). On future occasions, after the priests had been consecrated, the breast of the fellowship sacrifice was to be presented to all the priests, and the thigh given to the priest who officiated (Lv. 7:28–36). Apart from the breast, thigh, and various fatty portions, the rest of the ram was cooked and eaten, together with the remaining bread, at the entrance to the tabernacle. Only the priests were allowed to eat this holy food.

The ritual outlined in vs 1–34 was essential for the consecration of the priests. Most commentators believe, on the basis of v 35, that this ritual was to be repeated every day for seven days. Alternatively, the sacrifices outlined in vs 36–41 may have been offered during the next six days, with Aaron and his sons under strict instruction to remain within the courtyard of the tabernacle (cf. Lv. 8:33–35). In either case, the process of consecration or sanctification required time.

Moses was next instructed about the consecration of the altar (36–37). The sacrifice of the bull as a sin offering resembled the sacrifice mentioned in vs 10–14. The death of the animal purified the altar by making atonement; the anointing of the altar with blood made it holy (36). This was to be repeated for seven days. Finally, instructions were given concerning the daily sacrifice of two lambs as whole burnt offerings; one animal was to be sacrificed in the morning, the other at twilight. These were to be regular offerings, continuing daily after the priests and altar had been fully consecrated. Vs 42–43 highlight the purpose of these instructions: the establishment of the sacrificial ritual was a necessary requirement before God could meet with the Israelites. As God affirmed, ‘there ... I will meet with the Israelites, and the place will be consecrated by my glory’ (43). As v 46 makes clear, the ultimate purpose of God’s deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt was so that he might dwell among them. The fulfilment of the instructions regarding the consecration of Aaron and his sons is recorded in Lv. 8:1–36.

Notes. 4 Purity and cleanliness were closely associated with being holy (cf. 19:10, 14). 14 The sin offering is best understood as a purification offering (see Lv. 4:1–5:13; 6:24–30).

30:1–31:18 Additional instructions regarding the tabernacle and the Sabbath

30:1–38 Additional instructions for equipping the tabernacle. One further item of furniture was to be made for inside the tabernacle, an incense altar (1–10). Made of acacia wood and plated with pure gold, it was to be set in the Holy Place alongside the golden table and lampstand. Twice daily Aaron was to burn fragrant incense upon it (7–8), and once a year (probably on the Day of Atonement; cf. Lv. 16:15–19) he was to make atonement on its horns (10). Precise instructions were given regarding its use; it was not to be used for any other purpose except the twice-daily burning of incense.

The mention of atonement in v 10 provides a link to the next directive given to Moses. He was to count the people and collect from every Israelite, twenty years old or more, a half-shekel offering as atonement money (11–16). Through this payment the Israelites ransomed, or redeemed, their lives from punishment by plague (12). Interestingly, no distinction was drawn between the rich and the poor; all were equal in their need of atonement.

Moses was then told to make a bronze basin. This was placed between the tabernacle and the bronze altar so that Aaron and his sons might wash their hands and feet when serving within the tabernacle and courtyard (17–21). The requirement that the priests should wash symbolized their need to remain holy and pure (cf. 19:14; 29:4).

Special oil was to be made for the anointing of the tabernacle, its furnishings, and the priests who served there (22–30). Since everything touched by this particular oil became holy, restrictions were placed upon its production and use (31–33). Similar instructions were given for the making and use of the incense which was to be burned within the tabernacle (34–38).

31:1–11 The divinely gifted craftsmen. Having outlined the furnishing for the tabernacle and courtyard, God informed Moses that he had chosen and equipped certain men with the skills necessary to produce these items (1–11). Singled out for special mention were Bezalel and Oholiab. The special ability which these men possessed was attributed to the fact that they had been filled with the Spirit of God (3). This possibly provides an early example of spiritual gifts, a concept developed more fully in the NT (cf. Rom. 12:4–8; 1 Cor. 12:1–31; Eph. 4:7–13).

31:12–18 Instructions regarding the Sabbath. Having listed the preparations necessary for the construction of the tabernacle and the consecration of the priests, God then underlined the importance of the Sabbath. The concept of holiness, prominent in the preceding material, is also important in this section. As the sign of the covenant between God and Israel, the Sabbath was to remind the people that it was the LORD who made them holy (13). Because the Sabbath was holy to the LORD, all work was prohibited (cf. 20:8–11); anyone who worked on the Sabbath desecrated it, and must be put to death. By observing the Sabbath the Israelites affirmed and maintained their special relationship with God to be his holy people.

32:1–34:35 The covenant broken and renewed

32:1–33:6 Rebellion in the camp

An important condition of the covenant between God and the Israelites was complete obedience (24:3, 7). The present account, however, focuses on the people's rebellious actions which angered God, jeopardizing the covenant relationship which had just been established. Their sin was so serious that Moses could not atone for it, even after three thousand of the people had been put to death. When God expressed concern about the consequences of living among the people, the actual building of the tabernacle was placed in jeopardy.

32:1–6 The making of the golden calf. Moses' long absence (forty days and forty nights; 24:18) created an atmosphere of uncertainty in the Israelite camp. Perhaps fearful of what God might have done to Moses (cf. 20:19), the Israelites sought reassurance through the construction of an image which would represent God's presence in their midst. Turning to Aaron, the people asked him to make gods (or better 'a god', so the NIV mg.) who would go before them (1). Several factors indicate that the image of the golden calf was meant to represent 'the LORD'. First, according to the latter part of v 4, the calf represented the god who had delivered the people from Egypt; it was no new deity. Secondly, the festival, enthusiastically celebrated by the people (6), was described by Aaron as to the LORD (5). Moreover, the festal activities resemble those recorded in ch. 24 regarding the ratification of the covenant between God and the Israelites. Although the Israelites did not consciously reject 'the LORD' as their God, their attempt to portray him as a golden calf was a major breach of the covenant stipulations which they had earlier accepted (cf. 20:4–6; 20:23). Such an obvious violation of God's instructions invited fierce condemnation (cf. 32:7–10). Even the narrator hints at this indirectly through his use of the Hebrew term 'elōhîm ('god/gods') in vs 1, 4 and 8. When used, as here, with plural verbs 'elōhîm normally refers to pagan gods; when used with singular verbs it normally refers to 'the LORD'.

In the light of the preceding chapters, it is ironic that the people should desire to have a symbol of God's presence. Moses had just received instructions for the construction of a tent within which God would dwell in the midst of his people. Yet, whereas the tabernacle with its golden furnishings, portrayed God as a royal personage, the golden calf, in marked contrast, represented him as a mere beast. Although the people offered appropriate sacrifices, their worship of the calf degraded the one who had delivered them from slavery in Egypt. Worship, to be true, must be based on a right perception of God. The book of Exodus emphasizes the importance of knowing God as he truly is, and not as we imagine him to be.

Notes. 2 Aaron's instruction to the people to 'Take off the gold ear-rings' is probably to be interpreted literally (cf. v 3); the golden calf was fashioned from the golden ear-rings which the people were actually wearing. Undoubtedly the people possessed other ear-rings which they were not wearing. Later these were used in the construction of the tabernacle (35:22). 4 The calf is more precisely a young bull. Images of bulls were widely used in Ancient Near Eastern worship.

32:7–14 Moses intercedes for the people. Disgusted by what had taken place, God ordered Moses to return to the camp (7). God's anger was roused by the fact that the Israelites had so quickly turned away from his commands, and this in spite of repeated affirmations that they would do everything that he had said (19:8; 24:3, 7). Such disrespect for God merits the harshest of punishments, death. In contrast to the people, Moses was assured that he would become a great nation, echoing God's earlier promise to Abraham (Gn. 12:3). Surprisingly perhaps, Moses intervened and pleaded on behalf of the people for mercy, recalling God's marvellous deliverance of them from Egypt and his much earlier covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (11–13). His petition was based throughout on the character and honour of God. Moreover, he made no attempt to excuse the people's sinful behaviour. So compelling was his intercession that God relented from the immediate destruction of the people (14). Nevertheless, as the narrative subsequently reveals, the people did not go unpunished (28, 35).

32:15–29 Moses returns to the camp. When Moses eventually saw what had been happening in the camp, he too became enraged. By deliberately breaking the divinely inscribed stone tablets containing the terms of agreement, Moses indicated that the covenant relationship between God and the Israelites was now ended. After burning the golden calf, Moses received from Aaron a less than satisfactory explanation of what had happened. Finally, to restore order in the camp, Moses summoned to himself those who were for the LORD (26). The seriousness of the situation is reflected in the drastic action demanded by Moses: 'Each man strap a sword to his side. Go back and forth through the camp from one end to the other, each killing his brother and friend and neighbour' (27). For their display of loyalty to God, the Levites were rewarded.

Notes. 21 The expression great sin (see also vs 30–31) probably relates to the breaking of an agreement or covenant (cf. Gn. 20:9; 2 Ki. 17:21). 27 The death of about three thousand Israelites at the hands of the Levites was a grim indication of the seriousness of the golden calf incident and must be viewed as one of the ways in which the people were punished. 29 You have been set apart to the LORD is literally 'fill your hands today for the LORD'.

32:30–35 Moses intercedes again for the people. Although some of the people had been punished, their death did not atone for the sins of the others. Conscious of the enormity of the Israelites' sin, Moses sought to make atonement before God (30). His request was refused; each individual would bear the punishment of his or her own sin. To underline this truth, v 35 records that the LORD struck the people with a plague. Yet, in spite of God's determination to punish the people, Moses was assured that their journey would continue. This provides a link to the next passage.

Note. 31 The expression gods of gold is reminiscent of 20:23.

33:1–6 God refuses to go with the people. A further consequence of the people's unfaithfulness is developed in these verses. Although God instructed Moses to lead the Israelites into Canaan, and promised to fulfil his prior commitment to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, he would not go with them. He feared that further acts of rebellion might cause him to destroy the people on the way. When Moses reported this to the people, they were deeply grieved. As a further mark of God's disapproval of their actions, they were commanded to remove the ornaments which they had received at the time of their departure from Egypt (cf. 3:22; 11:2; 12:35) and which by this stage had undoubtedly become a vivid reminder of how God had blessed them. Their removal, like the discarding of an engagement or wedding ring, symbolized the broken relationship which now existed between God and the people.

Notes. 2 'I will send an angel before you' was the promise of divine help to overcome the inhabitants of Canaan and echoes 23:23. However, it did not necessarily imply that God would dwell in the midst of the people. 3 On a land flowing with milk and honey see 3:8.

33:7–34:35 Moses mediates on behalf of the people

This section is framed by two brief passages (33:7–11 and 34:34–35) which are written in a way which indicates that they describe activities which took place over a period of time and were not restricted to one particular occasion. The material relates to the period of approximately ten months between the arrival of the Israelites at Sinai and the pitching of the tabernacle (cf. 19:1; 40:1). In contrast, the main passage records the next major development in the plot, the renewal of the covenant between God and the Israelites.

Whereas the preceding chapter is dominated by the rebellion of the Israelites and God's punishment of the people, attention now switches to Moses, the faithful servant, and his remarkable friendship with God. Moses' unique relationship with God provided the opportunity for him to intercede on behalf of the people and as a result the covenant was renewed. This was attributed not to some dramatic change of heart on the part of the people but to God's compassion and mercy.

33:7–11 The tent of meeting. This passage records how Moses used to pitch a tent at some distance from the main encampment in order to meet with God. Given its specific function, the tent was known as the tent of meeting (7). It should not be confused with the tabernacle, also known as the 'Tent of Meeting' (e.g. 40:2, 6), which was constructed later (36:8–38) and which was pitched within the Israelite encampment (Nu. 1:53; 2:2, 17), not outside the camp some distance away (7). Here Moses enjoyed a unique and personal relationship with God: The LORD would speak to Moses face to face, as a man speaks with his friend (11). This intimacy enabled Moses to ask God to renew his covenant relationship with the Israelites. Although they were in close proximity to one another, even Moses the faithful servant was not permitted to look directly upon God; v 9 implies that the tent curtain shielded Moses who was inside from God who was outside. This is a further reminder of the barrier which exists between the divine and the human.

33:12–34:33 The renewal of the covenant. The conversation recorded at the beginning of this section took place at the tent of meeting. It focuses on a number of important themes. First, Moses sought reassurance that God, in spite of his earlier comments to the contrary (cf. 33:3, 5), would indeed go with the people on their journey into the promised land. Behind this request is the fear that if God did not go with the people, Moses would no longer be able to meet with him face to face. While God promised that 'My Presence will go with you (singular)', Moses persisted with his plea that this promise should include the rest of the people. God finally agreed to this because he was pleased with Moses.

Moses then asked to see God's glory (18). From God's response it is clear that he equates his glory with all my goodness (19). To assure Moses of his identity, God would proclaim his personal name, the LORD. When God had previously revealed his name to Moses, 'Moses hid his face, because he was afraid to look at God' (3:6). Now, because of his subsequent experiences, he displayed a greater confidence. Although Moses was granted the opportunity to see God as no-one else had done, even he could not look upon the divine face with immunity (20).

Before witnessing the glory of the LORD, Moses was instructed to bring up the mountain two stone tablets to replace those previously broken (34:1). When God revealed himself to Moses on top of the mountain, he stressed not only his mercy and compassion, forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin (7; cf. 33:19), but also his justice, he does not leave the guilty unpunished (7; cf. 32:34). The revelation of these divine characteristics to Moses was so significant that this passage is echoed on six other occasions in the OT (Ne. 9:17; Pss. 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Joel 2:13; Jon. 4:2). Here, in a dramatic setting, we have stated verbally two of the most important characteristics of God's nature. These are the same qualities which have already been revealed through God's actions on the Israelites' behalf in delivering them from Egypt. Moreover, they lie at the very heart of the NT understanding of Christ's death and resurrection; we experience God's forgiveness because Christ has borne the punishment for our sins.

Responding to this unique revelation of God's nature, Moses requested that God should accompany the people, forgive their sin, and take them as his inheritance (9). In reply God reestablished his covenant relationship with the people. The terms of the covenant (outlined in 34:11–26) parallel closely those found in the last two sections of the 'Book of the Covenant' (23:14–33), except that their order is reversed. Once more Moses wrote down the covenant obligations (27; cf. 24:4). Finally, God inscribed on the stone tablets the 'ten words' or Decalogue (28; cf. 20:3–17).

When Moses returned from his mountaintop encounter with God, his face was radiant (29). Such was the alarm of the Israelites that Moses had to speak reassuringly to them, first to the elders and then to the entire community. Finally, after giving them God's commands, he veiled his face (33).

Notes. 34:9 This is the first occasion on which the Israelites are referred to directly as God's inheritance. 28 Although the subject of the verb 'wrote' is not clearly stated, it may be deduced from 34:1 that the tablets were inscribed by God (cf. 32:16). It is not unusual in Hebrew narrative for the subject of the verb to change without this being clearly indicated.

34:34–35 Moses veils his face. These verses are closely linked to 34:30–33. They describe what normally happened each time Moses communed with God. After coming out from the divine presence, Moses communicated God's word to the people and then covered his face with a veil. His radiant face was a sign to the people that he had indeed met with God.

35:1–40:38 The construction and erection of the tabernacle

35:1–36:7 Preparation for the building of the tabernacle

Following the renewal of the covenant, the people were summoned together and Moses reminded them of the importance of observing the Sabbath (2–3; cf. 31:15). As the sign of the covenant between them and God, it was vital that the Israelites refrained from doing any work on the seventh day of the week. Moses was now able to carry out the directions which he had previously received concerning the construction of the tabernacle and the appointment of priests.

Next Moses asked the people to make an offering to Yahweh in order to provide the materials required for the construction of the tabernacle and related items (4–9); this fulfilled the instructions given to Moses by God (25:1–7). There then came a request for craftsmen to carry out the work (10), followed by a summary of the various items which had to be constructed (11–19). 35:20–29 records the generous response of the people to Moses' appeal for materials (cf. 35:4–9). Note the special attention given to the work of the women in spinning the yarn (25–26); their natural abilities and skills were devoted to serving God. All of the people responded so generously that later they had to be restrained from giving too much (36:3–7).

In obedience to God’s earlier instructions (31:1–6), Bezalel and Oholiab, due to their special knowledge and skill, were placed in charge of the work (35:30–36:2). Not only were they gifted as craftsmen, but they also had the aptitude to teach others (35:34).

36:8–39:31 The completion of the tabernacle and the priestly garments

Most of this section parallels very closely earlier passages in Exodus. We find here an almost word-for-word record of the fulfilment of the instructions given by God to Moses during his first stay on the mountain (25:1–31:18; see table below). The similarity between the instructions and their fulfilment indicates that the people obeyed God ‘to the letter’. Everything was made just as Moses had been instructed. Occasionally the divine instruction (but rarely the fulfilment), contains additional material relating to the use of a particular object (e.g. 30:6–10, 30:18–21).

Apart from showing that everything was made according to God’s instructions, the repetition of these details highlights the importance of the tabernacle as God’s dwelling place. Repetition, which to some readers may seem boring, was the ancient author’s way of drawing attention to important matters.

	Object	Instructions	Fulfilment
Tabernacle	26:1–11, 14–29, 31–32, 36–37	36:8–38
Ark	25:10–14, 17–20	37:1–9
Table	25:23–29	37:10–16
Lampstand	25:31–39	37:17–24
Incense altar	30:1–5	37:25–28
Anointing oil	30:25	37:29
Bronze altar	27:1–8	38:1–7
Bronze basin	30:18	38:8
Courtyard	27:9–19	38:9–20
Ephod	28:6–12	39:2–7
Breastpiece	28:15–28	39:8–21
Robe	28:31–34	39:22–26
Tunic, turban, sash	28:39	39:27–29
Gold plate	28:36–37	39:30–31

The order in which the items are here listed differs slightly from that followed when God first delivered his instructions to Moses (chs. 25–30). The earlier order tends to list the more important objects first, whereas here the arrangement reflects the order in which the items were assembled when the tabernacle was erected (cf. 40:2–8, 12–14; 40:17–33). In the inventory of precious metals which follows, the quantities involved appear very large (approximately one ton of gold, four tons of silver and two-and-a-half tons of bronze). This was, however, not unusual when compared with contemporary practices in the ancient world.

39:32–43 Moses inspects the work

Once the work was completed all the different items were brought to Moses for inspection. The list of items recorded here resembles those found in 31:7–11 and 35:11–19. When Moses saw that everything had been made just as God commanded, he blessed the people (43). All was now ready for Moses to assemble the tabernacle.

40:1–33 The erection of the tabernacle

God gave Moses final instructions concerning the erection and consecration of the tabernacle and its furnishings (1–11) and the appointment of Aaron and his sons as priests (12–15). The narrative records that Moses complied with the first half of these directions immediately. (For the account of the actual consecration of the priests we must look to Lv. 8:1–36.) Moses' obedience is highlighted through the repeated use of the expression, as the LORD commanded him (16, 19, 21, 23, 25, 29, 32). The tabernacle was set up on the first day of the first month in the second year (17), just in time for the people to celebrate the first anniversary of their deliverance from Egypt (cf. Nu. 9:1–5).

40:34–38 The glory of the LORD fills the tabernacle

When everything had been completed, a cloud covered the tabernacle, and the glory of the LORD filled it (34). God now lived among the people. The tabernacle became the Tent of Meeting (35), replacing the tent used earlier by Moses (cf. 33:7–11). It differed, however, in that God lived within the tent and Moses had to stay outside (35), whereas previously Moses had gone inside the tent and God had remained outside (33:9). God's presence was visible to everyone through the cloud and fire which settled upon the tabernacle. From here he guided them on their journeys (36–38). Thus Exodus comes to a fitting conclusion by noting the glorious presence of the sovereign God in the midst of his people Israel.

LEVITICUS

Introduction

Title

The name of the book in the Hebrew Bible is its opening word, wayyiqra‘, ‘and he [the LORD] called’. The name Leviticus is derived from the ancient Greek and Latin translations of the Hebrew Scriptures. It was given to the book doubtless because it contains many instructions relating to the work of the levitical priests. However, it is not entirely appropriate for two reasons. First, because not all the tribe of Levites were actually priests but only those of a particular family within the tribe. And secondly, because a lot of the book is directed at the ordinary Israelites, not merely the priests, addressing issues of their lives in relation to worship, family morality, social and community living, economic dealings etc. The book was as important for the ‘laity’ as for the ‘clergy’.

Authorship and date

The book is set out as a record of part of God’s revelation to Moses while Israel were camped at Mt Sinai, shortly after their exodus from Egypt. It is not explicitly stated that Moses wrote the book himself (cf. the way that some parts of the Pentateuch are attributed to him, e.g. Ex. 24:4, 7, Nu. 33:2). However, those who would maintain the traditional dating would argue that if it was not actually written by Moses, it must have been edited by someone close to him. It certainly bears the mark of careful and intelligent organization.

For a long time, however, critical biblical scholarship has argued that the book comes from priestly circles and represents their prescription for the Second Temple of the post-exilic period. Along with other parts of the Pentateuch, it is thus assigned to the material referred to as P, i.e. the latest of the hypothetical sources of the Pentateuch. Those who broadly adopt this view, however, recognize that P includes a variety of material which may in its origins be very much earlier than the exile. The date of the final editing of a text is no sure indicator of the date of origin of its contents. Furthermore, some of the reasons for the late dating of the so-called priestly material no longer seem so cogent. Detailed and elaborate rules for sacrificial worship and descriptions of sanctuaries are known from ancient Near Eastern societies much older than the Mosaic period and need not, therefore, be assigned to a later development in Israel. And comparison of laws in Leviticus with related laws in Deuteronomy and other parts of the OT often indicate the likelihood of the levitical text being earlier. If Leviticus were written almost a thousand years later than its literary setting, it has succeeded to a remarkable degree in avoiding anachronisms, and instead has some aspects of terminology which were no longer current in the later period. For these and other reasons, some scholars regard the material in Leviticus as much earlier in origin than the exile, but not necessarily Mosaic.

Structure

The fact that Leviticus is a carefully ordered document can be instantly seen from the outline of contents below. There is a definite sense of logical progress. The end of the book of Exodus has described the setting up of the tabernacle and all that was necessary for the sacrificial worship of Israel to take place. So Leviticus opens with a virtual handbook of sacrifices, explaining first in layman's terms what parts in the proceedings were to be played by all involved, what kind of animals were appropriate for which purpose and what was to be done with them etc. It then gives some extra rules for the priests' benefit. That section is then followed by a narrative of the ordination of the priesthood who would perform these sacrifices. But the priests had other duties, primarily the responsibility to teach ordinary Israelites the distinctions between what was holy and what was common, and between the clean and unclean. So the next section deals with that. Life for the Israelites under the covenant involved much more than proper worship and ritual purity, so the remainder of the book goes on to set out a wide variety of personal, family, social and economic responsibilities, all designed to enable Israel to maintain that national distinctiveness (holiness) for which God had created them. The economic realm of land and property becomes a major focus towards the end of the book, thus giving it a forward look as the reader moves on to Numbers and Deuteronomy and follows the progress of Israel towards the promised land. The book thus has a literary balance of its own, as well as a well-sculpted fit into its place in the grand theme of the Pentateuch as a whole.

The balance of the book can be seen from another perspective. In Ex. 19:4–6 God had given to Israel, even before making the covenant and giving the law, an identity and role in the midst of the nations. They were to be a priestly people and a holy nation. It could be said that Leviticus falls into two halves reflecting each of these. Chs. 1–17 are mainly to do with areas of priestly responsibility, whereas chs. 18–27 are saturated with the call for Israel to be holy in every practical area of life (so much so that 17–26 has been given the name 'the Holiness Code', or H, in critical terminology). Others have suggested that these two halves of the book reflect the double commandment to love God and to love your neighbour. The first half of the book leads up to the great climax of the Day of Atonement (ch. 16), on which right relationships were restored between the nation and God. The second half reaches its climax with the Year of Jubilee (ch. 25), when right relationships were to be restored among the people. Each half also has a historical object lesson about treating God with contempt (chs. 10, 24).

Theology and relevance

God made a promise to Abraham which included three particular points and one universal goal (Gn. 12:1–3, 15). He promised Abraham a people, a relationship of covenant blessing and a land. The ultimate purpose was the blessing of all nations. Leviticus touches all of these, but is particularly focused on the second of the three specific promises. The first part was already in the process of fulfilment; Israel had indeed become a great nation (Ex. 1:7). The third, possession of the land, still lay ahead, and is the focus of Numbers and Deuteronomy. The important issue for Leviticus is how to maintain that relationship between God and Israel which had been established through the exodus and the making of the covenant (Ex. 24). And the answer is that God himself provides the means, by his grace. The relationship which had been established by God's redeeming grace (in the exodus) could only be sustained by God's forgiving grace (as Israel had known since the golden calf incident, Ex. 32–34). The sacrificial system was not a means of buying favours, but of receiving grace. And the practical obedience to the law in the later chapters was not a matter of achieving holiness, but of living out the distinctiveness which God had already conferred on the nation. Only by appropriate response to God's grace could Israel continue to enjoy their greatest blessing, which was the presence of God in their midst, symbolically localized in the tabernacle but felt in every area of everyday life. Anything that threatened that presence of God or polluted his dwelling place was to be rigorously dealt with. We should remember this positive aim behind the atmosphere of severity in some sections.

For the Christian, the grace which Leviticus offered through the sacrificial system is now found wholly in Jesus Christ, and the sacrifices provided the NT authors with a rich imagery for interpreting the significance of the cross. Likewise, the demand for holiness, in Leviticus a badge of Israel's separation from the nations, is transformed in the NT into the call to Christian distinctiveness from the world. But the moral challenge of Leviticus, as of the whole OT law, cannot be confined to the church. God created Israel to be a light to the nations. Their distinctiveness was to enable them to model the ethical standards and direction of life that God ultimately wants for all. The book thus has important lessons for the understanding of our salvation, our personal sanctification and our social ethics. Leviticus is a part of those Scriptures which, according to Paul, are able to make us wise for salvation and are profitable for teaching us how to live (2 Tim. 3:15–17).

Commentary

1:1–7:38 Regulations for sacrifices

1:1–2 Introduction

The instructions for sacrifice given in Leviticus come within the context of the narrative of the rest of the Pentateuch. They were given, by God’s initiative, to a people who had already experienced the grace of his redemption in the exodus. They were not human attempts to placate deity, achieve salvation or buy favours. Rather, they were for the purpose of maintaining the relationship already established by God’s redemptive action, by providing an ongoing means of dealing with sin and restoring fellowship. What they taught was consistent with wider human instinct about sacrifice—that forgiveness and fellowship were not cheap.

The word offering (qorbān) is the most general word for gifts and offerings that people may bring to God (cf. Mk. 7:11). It covers all the varieties of sacrifices listed below. The preliminary specification here is that sacrificial animals must be taken from the domestic herds and flocks, i.e. wild animals were not acceptable. There may have been two reasons for this. First, wild animals did not belong to anyone and so could not have that sense of identification with the offerer that a domestic animal from his own flock or herd would have. Secondly, only the sacrifice of a domestic animal represented any actual cost to the offerer. As David realized, a sacrifice which cost nothing was no sacrifice at all (2 Sa. 24:24). On the other hand, we discover that it was possible for the very poor to offer a bird. So the matter of cost was not primary in the efficacy of the sacrifice.

The expression when any of you brings is indefinite because the frequency of such offerings for ordinary Israelite families is not stated, and they were in any case voluntary (at least the first three were). Sin offerings and guilt offerings were compulsory in certain defined circumstances, but burnt, cereal and fellowship offerings were normally brought voluntarily as and when the offerer was inclined to do so. Clearly, therefore, it was not the material value of the sacrifice that mattered primarily to God, but the motivation of the worshipper.

This is a perspective reinforced in many other places in the OT itself and then underlined by Jesus. While God took the initiative in giving the Israelites instructions as to how they were to bring their offerings to him, there were more important things that he was looking for in his relationship with them, especially those qualities of moral life, obedience and social justice that were built into the covenant law in exodus before the tabernacle was even built or the sacrifices prescribed in Leviticus (cf. 1 Sa. 15:22, Ps. 50:13, Ho. 6:6, Am. 5:21–24, Mt. 5:23f., Mk. 12:33). The content of Leviticus should, therefore, be set in the wider context of its surrounding narrative and the whole biblical revelation.

The instructions that follow were given by God to Moses to give to all the Israelites. This indicates another feature of these first seven chapters. The instructions regarding sacrifice were given, first of all, for the benefit of the worshippers themselves, i.e. the ‘lay’ people. They were the ones who would bring the animals for sacrifice, kill them and then receive words of atonement and restored fellowship with God. This is the focus of 1:1–6:7, which is then followed by a shorter section, in which the same sacrifices are listed again, but with the emphasis on the duties and benefits of the priests, who received certain portions of different sacrifices as their main means of support (6:8–7:38).

1:3–17 The burnt offering

The burnt offering heads the list of sacrifices, probably because it was the commonest. The priests were instructed in Nu. 28 that there should be daily burnt offerings, morning and evening. It was also the most total sacrifice, in that the whole animal was burnt (except the hide, which was given to the priest, 7:8). In the other sacrifices some portions of the meat were available to be eaten by the priests, or the worshippers, or both.

The name of the sacrifice (‘ōlâ) probably means ‘that which ascends’, i.e. the whole offering ‘goes up’ in smoke to the Lord. The offering was to be a male without defect. Male animals were of greater sacrificial value, though in farming reality they are more expendable since it is the females that produce milk and new generations of animals. The animal was to be unblemished. Only the best was to be good enough for God. The sacrifice, therefore, was to be a matter of value and quality, even if that were relative to the circumstances of the worshipper. To offer poor quality animals was an insult, not because God needed animals for their own sake, but because of the attitude it betrayed in the heart of the worshipper—casual indifference and lack of gratitude or commitment to God, as if he were not worth anything better. This is what Malachi complained of (Mal. 1:6–14).

The instructions for the burnt offering are divided into three sections, for cattle (the herd) (3–9), sheep or goats (the flock) (10–13) and birds (14–17). However, each section ends with exactly the same phrase, describing the offering as an aroma pleasing to the LORD. The point is being made again that the material value of the sacrifice is not what counts primarily in God’s sight. He would be as pleased with the poor man’s bird as with the rich man’s bull. Not even multiplying expensive sacrifices would increase their intrinsic value to God. He is impressed not by arithmetic but by obedience (cf. Mi. 6:6–8, Ho. 5:6).

The worshipper was to bring his animals to the entrance to the Tent of Meeting. This was the structure inside and at the western end of the court of the tabernacle, where the ark of the covenant and other items of sacred furniture were placed and where the presence of God was particularly localized. The entrance probably means anywhere within the court outside it, near the great altar. The worshipper would bring his animal to a priest and there would be a little ceremony of declaring his intended sacrifice acceptable to the Lord. The offerer was to lay his hand on the head of the animal (4). This was not just a light tap, but a significant gesture of pressing or leaning. We are not told what if anything was said along with the gesture. It may have included confession of sin (as required in 5:5, and 16:21) or, in view of v 4b, a prayer requesting that atonement be made. Or it might have been at this moment that the worshipper would declare to the priest, and to any others present, the reason for his sacrifice, such as we find in some of the Psalms (e.g. Ps. 116).

We are not told what the gesture meant. It probably had a double meaning, in the light of the context and other occasions where the action is explained. First of all, it would be an action declaring ownership and identification. It is worth remembering that the tabernacle area must have been a scene of considerable noise and confusion, with many animals and worshippers mingling together. When the worshipper, probably along with his whole family, eventually got the attention of an available priest, they needed to identify clearly what animal they were offering and for what purpose. Laying hands on its head was a way of saying, ‘This is our animal, and we offer it for our own particular reasons—for forgiveness of sin, or thanksgiving, or consecration. We claim the benefits and blessings of this sacrifice for ourselves and ask that it be accepted.’

Secondly, in view of the fact that v 4 specifies that the animal will be accepted on his behalf to make atonement for him, it is likely that the laying on of hands on the head of the animal had an element of representation and substitution, i.e. the animal was being offered in the worshipper’s place. He was laying his sins on its head so that its death would remove and cleanse them from him, the worshipper. The animal would bear the person’s sins, and die in his place. In that way it would make atonement for him. This meaning was clearly expressed in the great national Day of Atonement ceremony, when the sins of the people were laid on the head of one of the goats. In that case, the goat was not killed but was driven away to ‘carry away’ the sins of the people (Lv. 16:20–22).

After the ceremony of laying on of hands and the declaration of acceptance, the rest of the procedure was divided between the offerer and the priest who was attending to him. The offerer had most of the work to do. It was his job to slaughter the animal (5) in such a way that the blood could be drained out; to skin it (6, the hide was then given to the priest, 7:8); to chop the carcass into pieces (6); and to wash those parts of the animal which were dirty (9), i.e. covered with mud or excrement, so that the priest would not be defiled in handling the carcass. The priest had the task of taking the blood and throwing it against the sides of the altar. As is explained later in Leviticus, this was to offer the life of the animal to God himself, for the blood represented its life, a life now given up in death (17:10–12). Finally, the priest took the pieces of the animal from the hands of the worshipper as he chopped it up, and arranged them on the altar, where the worshipper and his family watched them burn until all was consumed.

The whole combined action of worshipper and priest is then said to produce an aroma pleasing to the LORD. This phrase captures the literal sense of the smoke and its aroma rising to heaven, but is of course intended symbolically. The language is anthropomorphic (i.e. describing God’s response in human terms, as though the actual smell pleased him), but the point is theological. The sacrifice pleased God and therefore achieved its desired purpose, which was to make atonement (4).

To make atonement (kipper) is the major point of the rites involving blood (cf. 17:11). Kipper can have two main meanings. It can mean ‘to wipe something clean, to cleanse and purify’, and it can mean ‘to pay a ransom’ so that a penalty can be avoided or a heavier penalty reduced (e.g. Ex. 21:30, 2 Ch. 29:24, Pr. 6:35, Nu. 35:31–33 [negatively]). The first meaning seems more in view in the blood rites of the sin offering, by which certain parts of the sanctuary and its furnishings were cleansed from pollution (ch. 4). In some cases a sin offering and a burnt offering were combined for the purpose of cleansing atonement (14:19f.). But it is more likely that the sense of ransom is what was primarily involved in the burnt offering. It achieved the effect of averting or reducing God’s anger so that the worshipper would be spared the penalty of his sin. This is supported by several OT examples where the offering of burnt sacrifices was effective in averting or soothing God’s anger (Gn. 8:21, Jdg. 13:23, 1 Sa. 7:9, 2 Sa. 24:25, 2 Ch. 29:7–8, Jb. 1:5; 42:8).

The atoning purpose of the burnt offering must be seen as primary, though it is clear that it was associated with other forms of response to God, particularly thanksgiving for specific blessings or deliverances (e.g. Ezr. 8:35), and vows of obedience. These are sometimes the focus of Psalms where burnt offerings are mentioned (e.g. Pss. 50:8–15, 66:13–15). However, the psalmists were well aware that thanksgiving and obedience could be offered only on the basis of God’s prior grace and forgiveness.

The burnt offering was symbolic of covenant commitment in Ex. 24:3–8, but it is quite clear that what is at the heart of the covenant from the people’s point of view is their commitment to obedience, not their performance of sacrifice (a priority which is clearly expressed in Ps. 40:6 and 1 Sa. 15:22). It is significant that the only two direct references to burnt offerings in the NT are quotations of these two verses, which explicitly value obedience above sacrifice (Mk. 12:33, Heb. 10:6–8). Other NT uses of the sacrificial symbolism will be considered at the end of this section.

2:1–16 The grain offering

This offering is called simply a gift (minhâ). The word is used commonly of gifts which may be expressions of reverence or homage (Gn. 32:14, 43:11, Jdg. 6:19, 1 Sa. 10:27), gratitude (Ps. 96:8), or allegiance (2 Sa. 8:2, 2 Ch. 17:11). Here it clearly refers to a specific offering of cereal or grain. The grain offering was frequently offered along with other sacrifices, particularly the burnt offering (e.g. Nu. 15:1–16, 28:1–10, which also specify drink offerings of wine, which are not mentioned in Leviticus), but it could be offered alone, as an alternative to animal sacrifices for poor people. In this case it could have the same representative and substitutionary meaning as an animal sacrifice.

Only when the offering was of firstfruits (14–16) were whole grains of cereal to be offered. Otherwise, the grain was to be ‘worked’, at least into the form of flour. What was being offered to God, therefore, was a combination of what he had first created and provided (the cereal itself) and what human labour had made of it. It signified, therefore, the consecration of the gifts of creation and the products of human work to God.

The chapter has three sections: vs 1–3 deal with offerings of uncooked flour; vs 4–10 deal with cooked offerings; and vs 11–16 add further general instructions. The main ingredients in each case were flour and oil. Incense, which was symbolic of the holiness and presence of God and devotion to him (Ps. 141:2), or simply of the joy of worship (Pr. 27:9), was added to the small portion that was burnt on the altar (2). Oil was sometimes symbolic of the Spirit of God in the OT (as in anointing ceremonies, e.g. 1 Sa. 16:13), but there is no specific indication that this is meant here. Oil also speaks of joy and blessing in life (Ps. 45:7, Ec. 9:7f., Pss. 104:15, 23:5), and it is probable that the oil and incense combined to give a sense of value, joy and sacred meaning to the offering.

Only a small portion (a handful, v 2) of the grain offering was actually burnt on the altar. This is called the memorial portion ('azkārâ), which means (lit.) 'reminder', but it is not clear who was reminding whom. Some take it as meaning that the offerer was reminded that the small portion that was burnt was only a token of the fact that he owed all that he had to God (cf. 1 Ch. 29:14). Others take it as a reminder to God of his covenant promise to bless and protect his people including, of course, the person making this particular offering. The second meaning might fit better with the end of v 2, where this offering, like the burnt offering, is said to be an aroma pleasing to the LORD.

After this small portion was offered by fire, the rest of the cereal belonged to the priests, whether uncooked flour, or loaves and cakes of various kinds (10). The cereal offerings were thus a major source of support for the priests, who did not own land and, therefore, had no means of growing their own crops. It is a most holy part because it was set aside for the priests. In other words, it was still just ordinary flour or bread, but it was set aside to be different from the everyday food of one's family. It was for the LORD's servants. 'Holiness' did not mean something magical or merely religious; it meant that which was set aside to be different. This meaning will become clearer, especially in its moral and practical sense, later in the book. The flour might be cooked in several ways before being offered (4–10). It could be baked in an oven (4), or on a griddle (5), or cooked in a pan (7). Doubtless the priests would enjoy the variety!

Finally, there are some instructions about prohibited and prescribed ingredients. The grain offering was to be made without yeast or honey (11), but it must always include salt (13). The text does not explain the reasons for this, so again we must be cautious in our own speculation. Both yeast and honey could be offered to God as firstfruits (Lv. 23:17, 2 Ch. 31:5), so the prohibition in this case cannot be because they were regarded as unclean in themselves. It may be that both yeast and honey were used in processes of fermentation and thus were symbolic of corruption. This view is strengthened by the command to add salt, since salt was certainly a preservative agent in the ancient world. Salt was symbolic not only of the stemming of corruption, but also of permanence. It is associated with covenantal promises in Nu. 18:19 and 2 Ch. 13:5. Since it is here linked with the offering of the fruits of harvest, it may be that there is an echo of the covenant with Noah and God's unending faithfulness to his creation (Gn. 8:20–22). For further Christian relevance of the grain offering, see the end of this section.

3:1–17 The fellowship offering

The Hebrew name for this sacrifice (šelāmîm) is derived from the root šalēm, which means 'to be complete, or whole', and is related, therefore, to šālôm, the word for wholeness, welfare and peace. Its precise meaning as the name for this specific sacrifice is not known with certainty. 'Peace offering' (RSV) is still widely used, and suggests that the purpose was to establish or maintain peace, i.e. good relations, between the worshipper and God. Fellowship offering (NIV, GNB; cf. 'shared-offering' NEB) points more in the direction of healthy relationships among those who offer it, and is based on the fact that this particular offering was the occasion of a family party enjoying the infrequent treat of a feast of meat.

Personal reasons for bringing a fellowship offering are listed in 7:11–18 and included thanksgiving, the fulfilment of a vow, or just any occasion for a freewill offering (e.g. 1 Sa. 1). Public reasons included the making or renewal of the covenant (Ex. 24:5, Dt. 27:7), the appointing of a king (1 Sa. 11:15) and the dedication of the temple (1 Ki. 8:63–66). In the last case, the number of animals used by Solomon was not a matter of impressing God, but of providing an abundance of free meat for the people to celebrate the joy of the occasion.

The chapter is divided into three sections, according to the kind of animal brought for sacrifice: cattle (1–5), sheep (6–11), or goats (12–17). The practical part of the ritual was the same as for the burnt offering (see on 1:3–17). The main differences from the burnt offering were first, female as well as male animals (without defect) were acceptable and secondly, only the fatty parts of the animal were burnt on the altar (i.e. the fat, the kidneys, the fat covering the liver, and the fat of the sheep's tail, 3f., 9f., 15).

The meat was divided between the priest, who got the breast and the right thigh joint (7:28–34), and the worshipper's family, who got the rest. So for the priests the fellowship offerings were a major source of protein in their diets. For the worshipper it was the opportunity for a joyful festive meal in God's presence, which was to be socially inclusive (Dt. 12:7, 12, 19). The fact that the fellowship offering led on to a shared meal may be the reason why no provision was made for the offering of a bird since no bird known to Israelites would have been big enough for a family meal. One may assume, though it is not stated here (but implied in Dt. 12), that those who were too poor to lay on a fellowship offering meal of their own would have been invited to share in those of others in the community.

The prohibition on eating the fat (17), which was instead to be offered by fire to God, is not given any explanation, as is done for blood (17:10–12). However, fat was symbolic of what was best and richest (Gn. 45:18; Ps. 81:16, where the NIV's 'wheat' is lit. 'fat' in Hebrew; Ps. 63:5, where the NIV's 'richest of foods' is lit. 'marrow and fat' in Hebrew), and the point may therefore be that the very best part of the animal must be offered to God. Modern dietary considerations, which would approve of v 17 for health reasons, would not, of course, have been known to Israel. But, inasmuch as they were not unknown to the God who made our bodies, we may be impressed with them at that level also if we choose.

4:1–5:13 The sin offering

The next two sacrifices are different from the preceding three. From the worshipper's point of view, the previous offerings were voluntary and, certainly in the case of the fellowship offering, fairly occasional, but the bringing of a sin offering or guilt offering was compulsory in the prescribed circumstances. A second difference is that, whereas the burnt and fellowship offerings were described according to the kind of animal offered, the sin offering is arranged according to the status or degree of guilt of those who were required to bring it.

The main division of ch. 4 relates to the place where the blood of the sacrifice was to be sprinkled. It was sprinkled inside the holy place in the Tent of Meeting when the sin involved the high priest (3–12) or the whole congregation (13–21). It was sprinkled on the main altar of sacrifice outside the Tent of Meeting when the sin involved a tribal leader (22–26) or an ordinary person (27–35). 5:1–4 then gives some illustrations of the kind of inadvertent sins (or sins of omission) that a person might feel guilty about and bring a sin offering for. Finally, 5:5–13 provides alternative sacrifices that enabled even the poorest person to have access to the cleansing power of the sin offering.

4:1–2 The purpose of the sin offering. When anyone sins unintentionally (1) introduces two important words that govern the rest of the chapter. First, the word for 'sin' here (ḥaṭā') means 'to miss the mark, to fail or err'. The particular sacrifice described in this chapter has a name derived from an intensive form of this verb which has the sense, 'to de-sin, to cleanse from sin'. It is called the hattā 't). This is usually translated 'sin offering'. But its purpose was not so much to deal with sin itself (though it did have an atoning dimension, like all the blood sacrifices) as to cleanse away the effects of sin, i.e. the pollution or defilement it causes. Whereas the burnt offering was the primary sacrifice for atonement through its propitiation of God's anger, this offering was primarily for purification of the holy place and the altar, so that God could continue to live in the midst of his people. God cannot dwell in uncleanness, so this sacrifice cleansed his dwelling place. Hence some scholars translate it, 'purification offering'.

Secondly, unintentionally (bišegāgâ) comes from a root which means 'to wander off', like sheep. So it is used throughout this chapter to cover sins which do not come from a wilful act of rebellion and defiance of God but rather from the weakness and failures of our daily lives. It can mean inadvertent, accidental, unintended. Hebrew law very carefully distinguished between accidental and deliberate actions. It used the expression 'sinning with a high hand' to describe actions which were premeditated and wilful acts of wickedness. In law, these had to be dealt with very severely (the best example of the distinction is in the law of homicide in Nu. 35), and in the sacrificial system there was no sacrifice for such kinds of sin (Nu. 15:27–31).

The sin offering was also used to cleanse a person who was ritually unclean but not in any sense sinful, e.g. a woman after childbirth (12:6–8) or someone with a skin disease (14:19) or bodily discharge (15:15). It was, in general, the offering which effected cleansing as distinct from, though linked with, forgiveness (15:31).

4:3–12 For the sin of a high priest. The anointed priest almost certainly signifies the high priest in this context (cf. Nu. 35:25). Because of his representative function, when he sinned the whole people became tainted with his guilt. He had a role of great seriousness and, therefore, the purification offering for his sin was the costliest of all—a young bull. And since he lived and worked in the presence of God and in his sanctuary, his sin brought defilement right into the dwelling place of God. So cleansing must be effected inside the Tent of Meeting.

When the bull was brought, the priest was to lay his hands on its head (4), just as ordinary worshippers did when they brought their animals to a priest for sacrifice. The meaning was the same. The bull would carry his sins. It would die in his place. Bull's blood would be shed for the priest's life, would cleanse the place where he served, and would remove the threat from the people he represented.

The action with the blood at this point (5–7) differs from what is done in the other sacrifices. In the burnt and fellowship offerings the blood was thrown against the altar to make atonement for the worshipper's sin. Here, some of the blood was collected in a vessel and carried into the Tent of Meeting but not right into the sanctuary (that happened only on the Day of Atonement, Lv. 16). There, some of it was sprinkled on the curtain that divided the tent in two and concealed the most holy presence of God (Ex. 26:31–37) and some was sprinkled on the horns of the altar where incense was constantly burning (Ex. 30:1–10). The horns were vertical projections on the top four corners of the altar. The rest of the blood was then poured away at the foot of the main altar of sacrifice outside. The fat portions of the animal were burned on the altar (like the fellowship offering, 8–10), but all the rest of the carcass was burned outside the camp (11–12). Since the sacrifice was for the sin of the high priest, and thus indirectly for the people as a whole, none of its meat was to be eaten by priest or people.

4:13–21 For a sin of the whole people. Two different words are used for the community. The first, 'ēdā, may mean the representative body of elders as the legal or social authorities. The second, qāhāl, may mean the wider community gathered for worship. The precise definition of the terms cannot be certain. But what is envisaged here is that when some mistake has been made (perhaps in a legal judgment or some other community decision) which only later comes to light, then as soon as the worshipping community becomes aware of it, and thus feels guilt because of it, they are to bring a sin offering. The expression they are guilty, he is guilty (13, 22, 27) would thus probably be better translated 'feel guilty'. Obviously, anyone who does what is forbidden of the LORD's commands is guilty. The point is that they are initially unaware of it. So only when they become aware of their mistake and then feel guilt are they required to come forward with a sin offering. The elders (15) were the community representatives at every level of Israel's life (cf. Ex. 24:1, 9; Nu. 11:16f.).

The rites are identical for the whole community as for the high priest. On the one hand, this confirms that the priest represented the whole people, as we saw above. On the other, it shows that Israel itself as a whole was treated as a priesthood. Thus holiness and cleanness were required of them also, and their sin, even unwitting sin, defiled God's dwelling place. Part of the seriousness of sin among the people of God, ancient or modern, is that it destroys their witness to the living God in the midst of the world. If the whole church goes astray then where can the dwelling place of God be seen among the nations?

In the next two cases, which were relatively less serious, the blood was not sprinkled inside the Tent of Meeting but on the horns of the altar of sacrifice outside in the court. The sacrificial animals were also less valuable than the bull required for the high priest or the whole community. The other major difference between the first two cases and the second two is that the whole carcass of the animal was not burnt outside the camp. After the fatty parts had been sacrificed, the rest of the meat could be eaten by the priests (6:24–30), but not by the worshippers.

4:22–26 For a sin of a leader. Leader (nāśî') was a term commonly used for the authorities in Israel before they had kings. It referred to heads of clans or tribes. It was a position of honour and responsibility and was protected by stringent laws (cf. Ex. 22:28). The sacrificial animal in this case was a male goat.

4:27–5:13 For sins of ordinary people. In these cases the standard sacrificial animals were female goats or female lambs. For poorer people, birds and cereal offerings were acceptable in either case.

Since the meat of the sin offerings of ordinary people was eaten by the priests exclusively, these offerings were the major source of meat for them, just as the cereal offerings were their major source of bread. This is what lies behind the accusation of Hosea that the priests of his day were feeding 'on the sins of my people' (Ho. 4:8). As the word for sin and sin offering was the same, the priests' perverted view was, 'the more sin, the more meat for us'.

5:1–4 Typical offences. These verses list three kinds of typical offences for which a person should bring a sin offering. First, failure to testify in a case where one has material evidence to give (1). Israelite law attached great importance to the integrity of the judicial system, and thus placed a very high premium on truthful witness, to the extent of including it in the ten commandments (Ex. 20:16; cf. Ex. 23:1–9, Pr. 12:17, 14:5, 24:28). Deliberate perjury was a serious crime treated most severely (Dt. 19:15–21).

Secondly, accidental uncleanness (3). The OT distinction between the clean and the unclean will be discussed later. We should note that although the NT has neutralized the distinction as regards physical things (Mk. 7:1–23; Acts 10:9–16), the apostles were no less serious in urging Christians to strive for cleanness of life and to avoid moral and spiritual pollution (cf. Jas. 1:27).

Thirdly, a rash oath which a person fails to fulfil (4). Good or evil is probably an inclusive expression meaning 'anything at all' (cf. Is. 41:23). Words matter, even words spoken carelessly.

So a careless promise unfulfilled is a sin in need of cleansing also, especially if an oath had been used, since that involved God's name. The wise teachers of Israel warned a lot about the misuse of words (Pr. 6:1–5; 12:18; 15:2; Ec. 5:2–7), and both Jesus and James taught that our words should reflect straightforward truth and, therefore, have no need of supporting oaths (Mt. 5:34–36; Jas. 3:5–6).

He must confess (5). Even sins of failure, neglect, ignorance or carelessness are still sins and need to be confessed in order to be cleansed and atoned for. For most of us, probably the greatest number of our typical daily sins fall into these categories. We may not set out deliberately to rebel against God and commit sin, but in the pressures of life and in the weakness of our nature we find at the end of a day that we have to admit, as the confession prayer in the Book of Common Prayer expresses it, that 'We have erred and strayed from thy ways like lost sheep, we have followed too much the devices and desires of our own hearts, we have left undone those things that we ought to have done and we have done those things that we ought not to have done'.

This is exactly the kind of behaviour envisaged in the definition of the sin offering. How important it is, then, that these daily failures should not accumulate into a cloud of depressing and debilitating feelings of guilt but should be confessed and forgiven. And how reassuring it is to know that the declaration of atonement and forgiveness (5:6, 10, 13) is even more sure for us through the sacrifice of Christ than it was for the Israelite through his priest's ministry at the altar.

5:7–13 If he cannot afford These verses give alternative sacrifices for the poorer people in the community. The grain offering that could substitute for the sin offering (11–13) was a very small quantity. A tenth of an ephah was probably about a litre of flour, though exact equivalents are unknown. It did not include the oil and incense of the normal cereal offering, to make its distinctive purpose clear (11). Rather, it was to be mixed with the animal sacrifices already burning on the altar, to show that it stood for and counted as a blood sacrifice: It is a sin offering (12).

The existence of these alternative sacrifices is a clear indication that what God most dearly wanted was not that people should come with lavish sacrifices, but that they should simply come, to avail themselves of his lavish forgiveness, no matter how little they could afford. The assurance of atonement and forgiveness was undiminished (10, 13), because God looks on the heart and because ultimately all forgiveness is based on the eternal sacrifice of Christ, not on the relative values of any sacrifice that human sinners could make. A person who knew he could come to God with nothing more than a cupful of flour and confession of his sin, and still receive forgiveness was learning something fundamental about the grace of his God. Taught by such grace, even the most powerful in the land knew that God was not impressed by the most lavish sacrifices, when it was a matter of deliberate high-handed sin. The only hope in such circumstances was to run to that same grace with a broken and contrite heart and plead for cleansing on the grounds of God's own character of love and compassion (Ps. 51:1–2, 16–17).

5:14–6:7 The guilt offering

Traditionally this offering, the 'āšām, is called the guilt offering in many translations. However, all the blood sacrifices were related to the removal of guilt, with the burnt offering especially performing that function. What is distinctive about the offering described in these verses is that it was related to restitution, or compensation, that had to be paid because of some misappropriation of property or failure in regard to material things. So some scholars call it the 'restitution offering'. Like the fellowship offering, it takes account of the horizontal effects of sin. Certain kinds of wrongdoing cause loss to one's neighbour, and the worshipper must make amends for such things as well as seeking forgiveness from God himself.

Another Hebrew word for sin (ma'al) is used here, and translated violation (5:15) and unfaithfulness (6:2). It means a breach of trust, and thus is appropriate to the kinds of sin listed here, where the offender is guilty of some lack of integrity or honesty in his dealings with either the priests or his neighbours. Three types of offence are listed.

First, offences in relation to the holy things (5:14–16). This term refers to sacred property in the general sense of anything that had been consecrated to God or the service of the priests and the sanctuary. It included all the offerings and, therefore, all the food that the priests received from them, as well as the houses and other property of the priests and the tithes that were due to them (cf. Lv. 27). So the offence, which is expressed in vague terms, could include taking and eating food that belonged to the priests, or failure to pay due offerings and tithes (e.g. cf. Ex. 30:11–16, 2 Ki. 12:16). What was required was both the sacrifice of a ram and the payment of restitution, calculated at the value of whatever had been misappropriated plus a fifth of the value.

The second offence (5:17–19) is expressed in even more vague terms. In the context, it probably means any offence that a person may have committed in relation to the sanctuary and sacred objects or persons. The point is that the person concerned does not know it, but nevertheless feels guilty. If someone has an uneasy conscience and suspects they may have offended against the holy things but cannot specify exactly how, they may bring a guilt offering, without the 120% compensation, and put their minds at rest with the assurance of forgiveness (18).

The third category (6:1–7), moves from the world of holy things to ordinary human relationships and provides for offences that involve some breakdown of trust between people over property. Four examples are given (6:2–3): deception over deposited property, theft, oppression and lying about lost property one has found. A similar range of disputes is covered in the law in Ex. 22:7–15. There, the restitution required was double the value of the object, not one fifth extra as here. Perhaps the reason was that the Exodus law deals with cases where the guilty party has been brought to court and his guilt proved by the evidence, whereas this text is dealing with voluntary confession of guilt with appropriate sacrifice. The lesser penalty in this case would thus encourage people to 'own up' rather than wait to be caught or accused and proved guilty.

It is noticeable that full restitution, plus the added fifth, must be made before the sacrifice is brought. There was no point trying to get God's forgiveness until proper amends had been made to the injured party. The horizontal aspect of the offence must be attended to before its vertical aspect could be dealt with. Both these dimensions of this kind of sin are expressed right at the beginning of the chapter: a person guilty of deceiving his neighbour is simultaneously guilty of being unfaithful to the LORD (6:2). Jesus was by no means the first to see the connection between what he called the first and second great commandments in the law (cf. Lv. 19:13, 18, Mt. 5:23f., 43f.; 19:19; Rom. 13:8–10; Gal. 5:14; Jas. 2:8).

The guilt offering thus completes the list of sacrifices that were to be brought by Israelites and their families. It is worth pausing to consider the range of symbolism expressed. The vocabulary of sin in the OT is very comprehensive, as was needed to convey the depth and variety of its understanding of the human predicament. The four blood sacrifices portray four distinct, though obviously related and overlapping, models of sin, and offer remedies that apply to those different dimensions. The burnt offering sees sin as objective guilt before God, and it functioned as the major atoning sacrifice, providing the ransom by which God's anger was soothed and kept back from venting its full force on the sinner. The fellowship offering sees that sin produces brokenness and barriers between people and, while still providing atonement in relation to God, emphasizes the need and blessing of restored relationships and shared joy. The sin offering sees sin as dirt and pollution, which inevitably offends the presence of the holy God, and thus offers the means of cleansing and purification so that God can continue to dwell among his people. The guilt offering sees sin as a wrong or a debt which has to be repaid and, therefore, demands full restitution as well as sacrifice. All of these are truths which the NT affirms in different ways and which continue to have a great theological weight long after the last animal was sacrificed on Israel's altars.

6:8–7:38 Instructions for the priests

At first sight it seems that this whole section is mere repetition of the preceding chapters. But the difference lies in the opening words, 'Give Aaron and his sons this command' (6:8). What follows are instructions meant mainly for the priests, regarding their particular duties for each sacrifice, and also what parts of the sacrifices they were entitled to. The preceding chapters were mainly for the guidance of ordinary people.

6:8–13 The burnt offering. Two main things are laid down here. First, the requirement that the fire on the main altar of sacrifice must not go out. This is stressed repeatedly (9, 12, 13). Apart from burnt offerings brought by the people, we are told elsewhere that the priests were always to offer a morning and evening burnt offering (Ex. 29:38–42). The latter was the final sacrifice of the day, and so it was the responsibility of the priests on 'night shift' to make sure that the fire was kept burning (cf. 1 Ch. 9:33; Ps. 134:1).

We are not told the reason for this, so our explanation must be cautious. Fire was certainly associated with the presence of God, both as a protecting guide (Ex. 13:21f.), and also as consuming sin and sinners (cf. Lv. 10:1–3). The permanence of the altar fire, therefore, may have suggested the perpetual presence of God, or the perpetual need for atonement for sin and consecration of life, or both.

Secondly, even for the menial physical work of clearing out the ashes, the priest on duty was to wear appropriate clothes. These were the linen clothes unique to priests (10). But when he took the pile of ashes from beside the altar outside the camp, he was to change into ordinary clothes (11). OT law was constantly concerned to keep the holy and the common separate from each other. The distinctiveness of everything to do with the priests and the sanctuary was a continuous object lesson in the intended distinctiveness of Israel herself, as a holy nation in the midst of the world. In a memorable piece of acted symbolism, Jeremiah pointed out that God had wanted to 'wear' Israel like the linen priestly garment, to display his own glory. But by their idolatries they had become soiled and unwearable (Je. 13:1–11). A people of compromised holiness had lost their priestly mission in the world and, like Jeremiah's linen sash, had become 'completely useless' to God.

6:14–23 The grain offering. All priests were entitled to eat the grain offerings brought by the people, after the memorial portion was burnt, but they must do so within the court of the tabernacle. The words, it is most holy, mean that it could be eaten only by priests. This feature applied also to the sin and guilt offerings (6:25, 7:6) and distinguished all three from the fellowship offering, which was shared among the worshipper's family and friends. The priests themselves were required to bring a daily grain offering (19–23) from the day of their ordination

(20), and this was to be burned completely, not eaten. The author of Hebrews makes this a point of contrast with the single, final, sacrifice of Jesus Christ (Heb. 7:27).

6:24–30 The sin offering. Holiness had a ‘contagious’ quality. Anything or anyone that came in contact with what was holy was affected by it, and needed to be treated accordingly (cf. 6:18). It brought the person or object into a proximity to God which could be dangerous, and so such things had to be either washed (27) or destroyed (28).

7:1–10 The guilt offering. This section provides the details of the ritual of the guilt offering which were not included in the previous section on it. They are similar to the sin offering. It also specifies that priests were entitled to the skins of animals used for burnt offerings (8), as well as the variety of grain offerings (9–10).

7:11–36 The fellowship offering. Vs 12–18 distinguish three kinds of occasion when a person might bring a fellowship offering: as an expression of thanksgiving (12); as the result of a vow; or as a freewill offering (16). There are separate regulations for the first (12–15), but the last two are dealt with together (16–18).

The expression he must be cut off, which is used more frequently later in the book, is much debated. It probably does not mean that a person said to be cut off was executed by the community (another formula was used for the death penalty). Some think it may refer to a form of excommunication, i.e. of cutting off from the worshipping community. But that might seem a lenient penalty for some of the offences mentioned (e.g. in ch. 20). The most likely interpretation is that it was a form of divine curse. The person who offended in certain ways, many of which by their nature would be unlikely to come to the public notice of the courts, would be exposing him or herself to God’s direct punitive action. That might well mean death, but could include other forms of judgment. In ch. 20, for example, it is stated that even if the human community failed to bring certain offenders to justice, God himself would ‘cut them off’, implying his direct intervention.

Vs 28–36 specify the parts of the fellowship offering that belonged to the priest—the breast (30) and the right thigh (33; whether foreleg or hindleg is not stated, but the foreleg, or shoulder, is more probable). The breast is described as a wave offering, which may mean that the meat was waved in a lateral movement before the altar, perhaps this was symbolic of presenting it to God and receiving it back. The thigh is described as a contribution that is presented (34). This is an uncertain word that ancient Jewish commentators interpreted to mean ‘heaving’ (cf. KJV), i.e. perhaps a vertical movement. However, the precise actions involved and their significance are no longer clear. What mattered was that these cuts of meat belonged to the priests as their ‘anointed portion’ (35), i.e. their share by right of their ordination (anointing, v 36).

Having come to the end of the manual on sacrifices for worshippers and priests, it may seem terribly complicated and ritualistic. However, that would be a false impression, probably owing mainly to the strangeness of the whole thing to us. In fact, in comparison with the known sacrificial rituals of other ancient cultures, the Israelite system was relatively simple and straightforward. The laws we have studied were concerned to preserve some dignity and meaningful symbolism in what could easily have degenerated into noisy chaos, by giving both laity and priests clear and simple rules about what to do. The need for decency and order applies to Christian worship also, as Paul points out (1 Cor. 11–14).

The distinctiveness of Israel’s sacrificial system can also be noticed negatively. There was no place for augury, i.e. the attempt to derive omens, good or bad, from the entrails of sacrificial animals. God provided better ways to know his will (cf. Dt. 18:9–20). There was no place for human sacrifice, or even self-mutilation and the use of human blood. Sexual and fertility rituals are entirely absent, as are sacrifices for the dead or any other occult manipulation.

The single gift that sacrifices gained from God was the declaration of forgiveness. There was no sense that other favours could be won or bribed out of the deity. Sacrifices for other reasons were brought in response to God's blessing or protection, not in order to 'buy' it. There was no grading of sacrifices in terms of quantity in favour of the wealthy or powerful. On the contrary, provision was made for the poorest, who received 'just as much' forgiveness as any other sinner. Indeed, Israel's system was unique in having no special sacrifices reserved for royalty. Like so much else in Israel, it was geared to the needs of ordinary people. And it has been pointed out by socio-economic studies that Israel's sacrificial ritual would not have made an excessive demand on the resources of average families. They were expected to give the best when they did bring sacrifices, but they were not expected to impoverish themselves under a heavy religious burden, or to enrich a powerful religious elite.

Note. Levitical sacrifices, the NT and the Christian. We have already noted how the combination of sacrifices presents a comprehensive picture of the effects of sin and also of the different dimensions of God's remedy. When we turn to the NT, we find that the individual sacrifices are only rarely mentioned by name, but the theme of sacrifice is as rich and varied as in the OT, whether applied to the work of Christ himself, or to our response as believers and worshippers. All the major dimensions noted above have their NT echoes.

The burnt offering was the primary sacrifice that provided atonement and dealt with the guilt of sin. The NT presents the death of Jesus as such a sacrifice, an interpretation which goes back to Jesus himself (Mk. 10:45; cf. Rom. 3:25; Eph. 5:2; 1 Pet. 1:18f.; 1 Jn. 2:1f.). The author of Hebrews emphasizes that Christ's sacrificial death was once for all and thus stands both in fulfilment of, and contrast with, the repeated daily sacrifices of the OT (Heb. 10:1–18). Believers in Christ, therefore, have no need to bring any sacrifice related to atonement, for he has offered that final sacrifice of himself on the cross.

The sin offering dealt with the dirt and pollution of sin by using the sacrificial blood to cleanse the dwelling place of God. The NT likewise stresses the cleansing power of the blood of Christ. It not only removes the guilt of sin, but also purges away its pollution. Hebrews points this out in relation to the heavenly dwelling place of God (Heb. 10:23ff.) and also applies it to the cleansing of the believer's conscience, so that he or she may approach God with confidence (Heb. 9:11–14; 10:19–22). 1 John emphasizes this truth also. The death of Jesus (his blood) was once and final, but its cleansing power is something that is to be applied regularly to our lives through confession (1 Jn. 1:6–2:2).

The guilt offering insisted that wrongs done to fellow human beings must be put right by appropriate restitution as part of the process of being put right with God. This holds for Christian believers also, as we saw above. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors' was probably intended by Jesus to have a concrete application, and not merely to refer to feelings or attitudes. The importance of it is highlighted by his terrible warning and related parable (Mt. 6:12–15; 18:21–35). But the very nature of the guilt offering, as primarily a matter of restitution or reparation, also suggested a view of sin itself as a kind of debt in relation to God. Sin has to be paid for. The metaphor runs deep in human thinking about wrongdoing and wickedness. We still talk about making criminals 'pay for' their crimes. This when properly controlled and understood within the framework of society's legal structures, is quite different from personal vengeance which declares 'I'll pay you back for that'. The 'āšām provided a way of 'paying back' to God the restitution due for sin, parallel to the restitution made to the wronged party for the material loss incurred.

In Is. 53 the death of the Servant of the Lord is presented in sacrificial terms. He is the one who will suffer and die in the place of others, 'like a lamb led to the slaughter' (Is. 53:5–7). In v 10 his death is described specifically as an 'āšām, i.e. as a guilt offering, making restitution for the wrongs of others so that they may be counted righteous (11). The poetry of Is. 53 was deeply influential on the theology of the NT in relation to Christ's death (cf. Mt. 8:17; Lk. 22:37; 1 Pet. 2:24–25). The sacrificial death of Christ was not only a ransom for our guilt, and a cleansing of our dirt, but also a payment of our debt. There is, of course, a metaphorical dimension to the language, and the analogy cannot be pushed into asking how or to whom such 'payment' was made. The Bible, in both testaments, simply uses these different models to explore the unfathomable depths of our salvation. Our task, ultimately, is not to rationalize but to enter into the blessing of it by faith.

The fellowship offering was a sacrifice that led into a shared meal. It thus embodied both a vertical dimension (since it had the same atoning blood rites as the burnt offering) and a horizontal dimension (since it cemented human relationships). So it was most appropriate as an expression of the heart of Israel's covenant relationship with God. It was, in a sense, a sacramental meal, with similar features to the central meal of the new covenant, the Lord's Supper. Jesus spoke of that meal as 'the new covenant in my blood', which recalls Ex. 24:8, where fellowship offerings were included in the sacrifices which ratified the Sinai covenant.

Christian worship, especially the Holy Communion service, ought to be joyful and socially caring. It may, therefore, have been the fellowship offering which the author of Hebrews had in mind when he urged Christians not to forget 'to do good and to share with others, for with such sacrifices God is pleased' (Heb. 13:16). It is noticeable too that Paul insists both on personal worthiness in preparation for the Lord's supper (just as ritual cleanness was required of Israelites who participated in the fellowship offering meal; 1 Cor. 11:27–31; cf. Lv. 7:20) and also on social harmony and consideration for poorer members of the community (1 Cor. 11:18–22).

The grain offering represented a consecration of God's gifts and human work to God. It seems probable that grain offerings (and perhaps also drink offerings) accompanied the other sacrifices. There was thus a two-way movement in the whole ritual: the atonement and forgiveness that came from God in response to the shed blood of the animal sacrifices, and the offering of life and work, praise, thanksgiving and worship to God by the worshipper and his family. Likewise in the NT, although the primary sacrifice is the self-offering of Jesus on the cross as the final and sufficient basis for our reconciliation with God, the language of sacrifice is also applied to the believer's response to God. Our bodies, our minds, our praises and our material giving are included among the appropriate kinds of sacrifice that we can offer to him (Rom. 12:1–2; Phil. 4:18; Heb. 13:15–16).

Finally, one other aspect of the OT sacrificial system which has its NT counterpart is the material support of those who minister to God's people. A substantial proportion of the income for the priests came from the parts of the sacrifices that were given to them, the grain offerings, the breast and thigh of the fellowship offerings and the accompanying loaves, all the meat of sin and guilt offerings, the skin of burnt offerings, and possibly money equivalents for some guilt offerings. It may sound a lot, but it was very necessary since the tribe of Levi were allotted no land and so had no other means of income. They were dependent on the people's faithfulness, as were other classes of vulnerable people (Dt. 14:28–29; 18:1–8).

In the NT, ministers are never called priests, but the principle that those who serve God and his people as their primary occupation should be properly paid and cared for is certainly endorsed. Jesus said so (Lk. 10:7), and Paul taught it very pointedly (1 Cor. 9). Unfortunately, Paul is sometimes used to support the view that Christian workers must somehow live by faith, or by their own labours. This can then be used by some Christians, who are themselves relatively well provided for in their secular jobs, to justify the scandalous poverty of some pastors, evangelists and other workers. But Paul's whole point in 1 Cor. 9 is that he himself is an exception to his own teaching that Christian workers have the right to be supported by the churches, for living expenses and with extra for a wife (4–5). He argues this from analogy with secular jobs (7), by extension of an OT law about working animals (8–10; cf. Dt. 25:4), from the balance of spiritual and material blessings (11), from natural justice (12), from these same levitical provisions for priests (13) and from the direct command of Jesus (14). He could hardly have built a stronger case! So the fact that he personally chose to waive his rights for his own reasons (15–18) must be seen as what it is—exceptional, not normative. Paul underlines the same point elsewhere (Gal. 6:6; 1 Tim. 5:17–16).

8:1–10:20 The institution of the priesthood

These three chapters return to the narrative of events at Mt Sinai which were being described at the end of Exodus but were interrupted by the instructions regarding the sacrifices in chs. 1–7. They recount the actual events by which the instructions of Ex. 28–29 were carried out. That is why the opening verses speak of the garments, oil, animals and basket. These objects are specific because they have already been described in detail in Exodus.

The overarching purpose behind the complex ceremonies described in these chapters, which should be borne in mind while reading them, is given in Ex. 29:44–46. It was that God, who had redeemed his people from slavery in Egypt, should be known by them in an intimate covenant relationship as he lived among them. God's presence in the midst of his people was the primary blessing of being Israel. Without it, they had no distinctiveness and might as well stay in the wilderness (Ex. 33:14–16). That presence would be visible in the splendour of the priestly garments on the one hand, and in the visible glory of God in the tabernacle on the other (Ex. 40:34ff.; Lv. 9:23–24).

The three chapters, which should be read together, first describe Moses' action in preparing Aaron and his sons for entering on their priestly ministry (8) and then how they did so, culminating in blessing, fire and glory (9). Finally, they show how the event was marred by tragic disobedience and judgment (10). They thus stand along with other biblical narratives which stress the importance of obedience, the danger of disobedience, and how even the most joyful or solemn occasions in the life of God's people are never immune from human rebellion or sheer folly (e.g. Ex. 32–34; Jos. 7; 1 Sa. 15:17–23; 2 Sa. 6:1–7; 2 Ch. 26:16–20; Acts 5:1–11).

8:1–36 The ordination of Aaron and his sons

8:1–5 The preparation. All the materials, already prescribed, were assembled, along with the entire assembly, which probably means the representative elders who would witness the events in the tabernacle court on behalf of the whole community (cf. 9:1) (though doubtless there were as many spectators as could find a viewing point). The phrase as the LORD commanded (4–5) echoes all the way through chs. 8 and 9, emphasizing the precise obedience to God's word that Moses and Aaron displayed, and thus sharpening the shock of 10:1.

8:6–9 Aaron’s priestly clothes. After ceremonial washing, Aaron was clothed in the special garments that had been made for his role as high priest. There was a tunic (or coat), a sash (or broad belt), an ephod (a cape with shoulder straps), a breastpiece containing the Urim and Thummim (some kind of sacred ‘dice’ or lots, used for making decisions in response to enquiries) and a turban with a golden brooch on the front, with the words ‘Holy to the LORD’ inscribed on it. The full description of these items is in Ex. 28, where it will be seen that they were very richly coloured, embroidered and decorated. If there was any special symbolic significance for each item, it is no longer known and not recorded in the text (with the exception of the breastpiece, which bore the names of the twelve tribes of Israel and so clearly pointed to the priest’s representative role; see Ex. 28:21, 29). It is, therefore, pointless to speculate. The overall impression, however, was of great beauty and glory. This not only highlighted the authority and dignity of the office that Aaron and his successors bore, but also reflected the visible distinctiveness that should speak of moral and spiritual sanctity.

8:10–13 The anointing. As prescribed in Ex. 40:9–11, Moses anointed with oil all the objects and persons that would be involved in the worship of God. Anointing was symbolic of being set aside, consecrated to specific tasks for God. Kings were anointed (cf. 1 Sa. 10:1ff.; 16:13), and some prophets were anointed, though the meaning could be metaphorical as much as literal in their case (1 Ki. 19:16; cf. Is. 61:1). All three (priest, king and prophet) were combined in the NT understanding of Jesus as the ‘Christ’, ‘the anointed one’.

8:14–30 The offerings. Three sacrifices followed, precisely as prescribed in Ex. 29:10–34. First of all, a bull for the sin offering (14–17) was killed so that its blood could be used to cleanse the altar and thus prevent polluted offerings, which were a serious matter (cf. Mal. 1:7). Then a ram for the burnt offering (18–21), and finally the other ram, the ram for ordination, in what was in fact a fellowship offering (22–30). From this last offering, some blood was smeared on Aaron’s right ear, right thumb, and right big toe, and on the same parts of his sons (23–24). The meaning may have been that the priests, being as sinful as any other person, needed complete cleansing, from head to toe, as it were. This would be supported by the fact that in each of these sacrifices Aaron and his sons had to lay their hands on the heads of the animals, which was symbolic of the confession and transference of sin. Or, if the blood was here primarily for consecration (as in v 30), then it would symbolize the complete consecration of the priests to hear God’s word and obey it, to do the tasks assigned, and to walk in his ways (ears, hands and feet). In both respects, Christ as our high priest surpasses the levitical priests. He had no need to sacrifice for his own sin, and his obedience was perfect (Heb. 4:14–5:9; 7:27; 10:5–10).

8:31–36 The ordination. The whole procedure of ordination took seven days, during which time Aaron and his sons were not to leave the sanctuary. The chapter ends with a final emphasis on obedience, so you will not die (35–36), another grim warning of the shock to come at 10:2.

9:1–24 Aaron and his sons begin their ministry

The pattern of this chapter is very similar to ch. 8. The main difference is that, whereas in ch. 8 Moses performs the function of priest (as well as prophet, since all God’s commands come through him) while Aaron and his sons play the part of lay worshippers, in ch. 9 Aaron takes over the priestly role by right of his completed ordination, and the people are involved in their own right.

9:1–7 The preparation. There may be some intentional irony in the fact that Aaron was commanded to bring a bull calf for his very first sin offering as high priest, since the last time Aaron played any significant part in the story was when he went along with the people's apostasy, while Moses was up the mountain, and fashioned the golden bull calf (Ex. 32). Indeed, it was only because of God's mercy that Aaron was even alive on this day, let alone entering on the privilege of high priesthood. Many others had died for their sin on that occasion. Perhaps it was the freshness of that memory that left him so dumbstruck at the fate of his own sons.

God's glory (4, 6) meant his felt and visible presence, elsewhere manifested in smoke and flame. Experiencing this was the whole purpose of the day, and indeed of the ongoing sacrificial worship of Israel. The ritual was not an end in itself but a means towards the experience of God's presence in glory and the joyful worship that responds to it (24). The rituals of Christian worship may seem worlds away from Israel's altar of burnt offering, but the end purpose is the same (cf. Heb. 12:28–29).

Again, it is worth recalling the parallels between the work of Israel's priests in relation to the rest of Israel and the role that Israel, as God's priesthood, were meant to perform in relation to the rest of the nations. The ministry of Israel's priests enabled God's glory to be seen and responded to. Similarly, God intended that through his people his glory would be seen in the world. That, according to the prophets, was the very reason for their creation and calling (Is. 43:7, 21; 49:3). Priestliness has an outgoing, missionary significance through its relation to God's glory, which will one day fill the whole earth (Hab. 2:14).

9:8–21 The offerings. These fell into two groups. First, a sin offering and a burnt offering on behalf of the priests themselves (8–14); then, a sin offering, burnt offering, grain offering and fellowship offering for the people (15–21), i.e. the representative elders who would have eaten it on behalf of the whole people (cf. Ex. 24:10–11). The order of the last group was significant in pointing to the right priorities in worship: cleansing, atonement, consecration and fellowship. Finishing with the shared meal of the fellowship offering would have given a joyful conclusion to the whole solemn week and a fitting atmosphere for what followed.

9:22–24 Blessing, glory, fire and worship. Whether he spoke them on this occasion or not, the words of Aaron's blessing are recorded in Nu. 6:23–27. On glory see on vs 4, 6 and Ex. 40:34. The fire that came and consumed the sacrifices may have been something like a bolt of lightning. It did not ignite the sacrifices, which were already burning from the day's offerings, but rather consumed the remains instantly (cf. Jdg. 13:15–21; 1 Ki. 18:38; according to 2 Ch. 7:1, a similar event crowned the dedication of the temple that replaced the tabernacle). The people's response to God's presence and favour was the shout of joy and prostration of worship (cf. Heb. 12:28–29).

10:1–20 The judgment on Nadab and Abihu

10:1–7 Fire from the LORD. The abruptness of the opening verses of this chapter captures the suddenness of the change from joy to horror. All through chs. 8–9 it was repeated that everything was being done 'as the LORD commanded', but here Nadab and Abihu, the two eldest sons of Aaron, are suddenly doing what God had not commanded. Disobedience stalks the stage. Unauthorised fire (1) is unexplained. The Hebrew (zārâ) means 'strange', 'from outside'. Perhaps they took fire from outside the sanctuary instead of from the altar (cf. 16:12), as if to say, 'Any fire will do'. Such fire would be unholy, unclean, 'illicit' (NEB), and therefore, in the context of all that had gone on so meticulously up to this point, wantonly offensive. Their action with it was also usurping the role of the high priest, and therefore included presumption, or perhaps jealous impatience. Their behaviour was not just an accidental slip in a minor detail of ritual, but a cavalier disregard for the most serious meaning of the events they were part of. It is as if a Christian minister in the middle of celebrating the Holy Communion were to inject rites or objects associated with the occult.

God answered their false fire with the real fire of his holy anger. Again, it was probably something like a bolt of lightning rather than a conflagration, since their priestly clothes were not destroyed but turned to shrouds (5). V 2 deliberately echoes 9:24. Instead of the fire of blessing that produced a shout of joy, there came the fire of judgment that produced shocked silence. Aaron was ‘dumbfounded’ (NEB). Moses alone could speak into that silence, with words that ought to have made priests cautious and diligent for ever after, but sadly did not (3). I will show myself holy would be better translated, ‘I must be treated as holy’ (NEB). The closer a person is to God, the more careful they need to be about his holiness. Otherwise they bring dishonour on God among the rest of the people (3b). It is bad enough to treat the things of God with contempt oneself; it is far worse to cause others to do so (cf. 1 Sa. 2:12–17, 29–30; 3:13; Lk. 17:1–2).

The severity of God’s judgment here, which still shocks us, is also related to the position of privilege and responsibility that Nathan and Abihu held. Their judgment had an exemplary, warning purpose. It is a recurring principle in the Bible that greater privilege exposes a person to severer discipline. Moses himself never saw the promised land because of an act similarly described as failure to respect God’s holiness (Nu. 20:12). It also applied to the nation as a whole; they would be punished precisely because of their unique covenant relationship with God (Am. 3:2). If we find this OT story of summary judgment uncomfortable, we should remember that the NT has some equally severe things to say about the responsibility of having witnessed the works of God or being in positions of leadership (Lk. 10:12–15; cf. 12:48; Heb 6:4–6; 10:26–31; 1 Pet. 4:17; Jas. 3:1).

10:8–11 Priests’ responsibilities. First, priests were not to drink alcohol before going on duty in the sanctuary (9). It has long been suggested that this command, coming in its present context, was given because Nadab and Abihu’s sin was committed in a drunken state. This is possible, but the text does not say so. The reason more probably lies in the following verses about the duties of the priests, which needed a clear head. Wine, in the OT, is one of God’s gifts and blessings in creation, suitable for celebration (Ps. 104:15) and also effective in dulling pain (e.g. of bereavement; cf. Pr. 31:7). In excess, however, it confuses and debauches (Pr. 23:20–21, 29–35), and so it is to be avoided by those who need unclouded judgment to exercise serious responsibilities (Pr. 31:4–5). Priests were not required to refrain from wine at all times (that was part of the voluntary Nazirite vow, which was normally temporary; see Nu. 6:1–20; cf. Am. 2:12) but only while on duty. Habitual drunkenness among the priests was particularly condemned by the prophets, precisely because it destroyed their teaching ability, and thus left the people with no moral guidance or knowledge of God (Is. 28:7–10; Ho. 4, esp. v 11). In the NT the same duty of moderation and soberness is laid on Christians and especially on those who teach and exercise pastoral oversight (Eph. 5:18; 1 Tim. 3:2–3, 8; Tit. 2:2–3).

Secondly, priests were to know and keep clear the essential distinctions that underlay the whole of Israel’s life, namely between the holy and the common, the unclean and the clean (10). On the significance of these terms see the commentary on ch. 11.

Thirdly, the priests were the teachers of Israel (11). This side of the priests’ duties is often overlooked, since we tend to focus on their sacrificial role. But it was a vital part of the priesthood. It was through the priest that God’s law, and thereby his character, values, priorities and will, would be made known to ordinary people in the community. This is emphasized elsewhere, both positively and, when they failed, negatively (Dt. 17:9–13; 33:8–10; Ho. 4; Mal. 2:1–9). Priests and Levites were prominent in the educational side of major reforms in the history of Israel (2 Ch. 17:7–9; 19:4–11; Ne. 8:7–8). This role of the priests in teaching Israel has its counterpart in Israel as a whole being God’s vehicle for teaching the nations his law (Is. 2:3; 42:1–7; 51:4).

10:12–20 Conclusion. After the disruption caused by sin and its punishment, the story returns to its pattern, as the remaining rituals and clearing up are seen to. The inability of Aaron and his two remaining sons to eat the meat of the sin offering on the day of their bereavement is accepted by Moses (19–20), and so the section ends with the same positive note that had concluded chs. 8 and 9.

11:1–17:16 The diagnosis and treatment of uncleanness

This section of the book follows up the instruction to the priests in 10:10 by giving detailed distinctions between the clean and the unclean, and setting out the methods of dealing with uncleanness. It deals with uncleanness in relation to food and contact with animals (ch. 11), childbirth (ch. 12), skin diseases and fungal infections (chs. 13–14) and bodily discharges (ch. 15). It leads up to the great Day of Atonement (ch. 16), which had the purpose of cleansing the sanctuary and the nation fully before God. The section closes with a postscript on sacred and ‘secular’ meat (ch. 17).

At this point we need to clarify the meaning of these categories which were so fundamental to the Israelite world-view, but so foreign to our own. 10:10 sets out two pairs of contrasts: the holy and the common; the clean and the unclean. The second pair is really a subdivision of the common. Reality for the Israelite was divided into the holy (i.e. God himself and everything that was set apart for him or closely associated with him) and the common (i.e. everything else). It is important to note that the opposite of holy was not ‘sinful’, but common. The word (sometimes translated ‘profane’, which has a misleading flavour in modern English) basically means, ordinary, everyday, the normal state of things in the world we live in. This latter category was then made up of what was clean and unclean. The normal state was that people and things were common and clean, but pollution of all sorts could make them unclean. Some things and states were unclean by definition and could never be cleansed (e.g. some animals, death), but usually that which was or had become unclean could be restored to ‘normality’ (i.e. the state of being clean and common) by appropriate rituals.

Similarly, only God is holy by definition, but certain people and things could be made holy (sanctified) by appropriate rituals. Conversely, wrong actions or contacts could de-sanctify (profane) the holy. In general, sin, weakness and various abnormalities profaned the holy and polluted the clean. In the opposite direction, it was the primary job of the blood of sacrifices to cleanse the unclean and to sanctify the common. The state of being common/clean was normal, while holiness and uncleanness were the ‘abnormal’ states in opposite directions.

The one thing that must not be allowed to happen, and which so many of the levitical rules were designed to prevent, was for the holy to come in contact with the unclean. That produced a kind of theological and spiritual short-circuit, and the shock could be fatal, as Nadab and Abihu were neither the first nor the last to discover. Ultimately, it was on the cross, when the unthinkable took place—namely, that the utterly holy gave himself up to the utterly unclean (death)—that the only truly effective sacrificial blood of Christ himself enabled an unclean world and humanity to be reconciled to their holy Creator God. To paraphrase Paul somewhat: he, the holy one, became unclean, so that through his blood we who are unclean might be both cleansed and sanctified to share in his holiness.

It was the task of the priests to teach and maintain these distinctions, so that ordinary people would be enabled to stay in a state of normal cleanness, or be quickly restored to it when they became unclean through the events of everyday life in the home or on the farm. This overall purpose is succinctly expressed at the end of the whole section (15:31). It fits in with what we have seen to be the primary concern of Leviticus as a whole, namely that God may continue to dwell in the midst of a people who are clean. The laws that follow must be seen as a means to that end, not as an end in themselves.

11:1–47 Clean and unclean food and animals

The chapter falls into two broad sections: vs 1–23 deal with animals which may or may not be eaten as food, and vs 24–25 deal with uncleanness caused by contact with certain animals. It should be noted that many of the species named in this chapter cannot be identified with certainty, hence the variation in translations and commentaries.

11:1–23 Questions relating to food. The animal kingdom is further subdivided into the three primary spheres of the creation story: land (2–8), water (9–12) and the air (13–23). In each case, general guidelines are given as to what could be eaten and what was to be treated as unclean or detestable (the word is a technical term in relation to diet here, not a judgment on the animal itself). Of land animals, only those which had divided hooves and chewed their food thoroughly (either ruminants or those that appeared to be) could be eaten. This would be primarily domesticated animals. Animals which failed either or both criteria were not to be eaten. Of water creatures, only those with fins and scales were allowed. Certain birds, most of which seem to be birds of prey or carrion (i.e. that eat dead animals), were not to be eaten; neither were swarming insects, except those that clearly have legs for hopping.

11:24–45 Questions relating to contact. Human contact with animals in rural, agricultural life is frequent and unavoidable. Guidelines are here given as to the kinds of contact that made a person ritually unclean. Perhaps because of its frequency and unavoidable nature, the uncleanness contracted this way was relatively minor, lasting only for the day on which it occurred and requiring only ordinary washing, not sacrifice, to be remedied. It is notable that contact with living animals, even ones that were unclean and therefore not to be eaten, was not polluting. You could ride camels or asses and stay clean (ritually speaking!). Only the carcasses of dead animals polluted the person who touched or carried them, or utensils that they fell in or on. And that was true for clean animals, except when sacrificed (39–40), as well as unclean ones (24–28). Death was always unclean. The other major category of animal that caused pollution when the carcass came in contact with people or things people use, is described as ‘swarming’ (29–42). Moves about the ground (NIV) is too vague. The word seems to refer to creatures whose movements are slithery or rapid or otherwise abnormal (from a human point of view!).

The chapter ends (44–47) with a reminder of the purpose behind the rules and of the historical motivation for keeping them, namely that the Israelites were the people whom God had redeemed out of Egypt and, therefore, they were to be distinctive (holy). Be holy, because I am holy, is almost a motto in Leviticus (cf. 19:2; 20:26). Addressed to the whole nation, the requirement of holiness did not mean that they should all be like the priests, but rather that just as their priests were to the mass of the people, so they as a nation should be to the rest of the nations. This demand for national distinctiveness (cf. 18:3; 20:24, 26) gives us a first clue to understanding the meaning of the clean-unclean distinctions in this chapter.

Four questions may be asked in relation to these laws:

1. Is there a rationale behind the categories? Many attempts have been made to explain why certain species were clean and others unclean. Some regard the distinctions as purely arbitrary and intended, therefore, as a test of pure obedience. Some suggest that animals associated with pagan cults were unclean, but this does not hold in many cases, e.g. bulls were sacred in Canaanite Baal worship. A popular view regards hygiene and health as a major factor. It is true that some of the unclean animals (e.g. pigs and carrion birds) have a greater likelihood of conveying contaminations and parasites. It is also true that many of the precautions in relation to dead flesh (especially thorough washing) make good sense (as do many of the public health requirements in chs. 13–15). However, while we may honour the wisdom of the Creator in such details, this theory is far from explaining many of the distinctions and is not even hinted at in the text itself.

The best recent explanation, from the perspective of anthropology, takes note of the three primary classifications (land, water, air) and the references to forms of movement in each element. There is a preference for what is regarded as ‘normal’ in broad terms. The Israelite priestly understanding of holiness and cleanness was strongly based on a concern to preserve the wholeness or integrity of things and to avoid the mixing or confusion of categories. This reflects the event of creation itself, which was a matter of careful distinctions between light and darkness, heaven and earth, land and sea etc. This was carried over into the classification of animals that conformed to a simple picture of what was ‘standard’ for each sphere. Hooved ruminants were ‘standard’ domestic land animals, suitable for sacrifice. Fins and scales were the ‘standard’ equipment of sea creatures. Birds of prey and carrion eaters obviously ate flesh with its blood and, therefore, behaved in an ‘unclean’ way. Creatures that moved in a mixture of ways and thus disturbed the boundaries, or whose movements were wily and unpredictable, were also ‘abnormal’. These categories were general and from the perspective of the average human being as a cook, not a biologist. All that was at stake was the question of whether a particular animal was suitable for eating. Uncleanness for that purpose was not a rejection of the creature itself or a denial of its place within the wonders of God’s praiseworthy creation, as the Psalmists and others so often declare.

2. Why did God make such restrictions on food? We have already noted the importance of 11:44–47 in its call for community holiness. The distinct food laws of Israel were to be a mark or symbol of their distinctiveness as a nation (cf. Dt. 14:2, 21). Just as God had limited his choice among the nations of the earth to Israel alone, so they must limit their choice among the animals. The distinction between unclean and clean animals thus mirrored symbolically the distinction between the rest of the nations and Israel. The food laws, therefore, acted as a constant reminder to Israel of the importance of holiness and the call to be different. It was not a matter of superiority (any more than clean animals were ‘superior’ to the rest), but because of God’s redemptive work in Israel’s history and redemptive purpose for their future. And since the food laws were only a part of the whole law, which, even in Leviticus, included the whole range of moral and spiritual, personal and social requirements, they were like a badge or uniform which makes a statement about the wearer and commits him or her to certain expected standards of behaviour. Holiness was thus woven into everyday life. Every meal and every encounter with the ordinary world of work reminded the Israelite family of God’s redemption of his people and the moral values they were committed to.

3. Are the food laws still binding on Christians? The simple answer is No, but it is important to understand why. Jesus explicitly abrogated the validity of the distinction between clean and unclean food by declaring that it was the moral distinction, which the law signified, that really counted. Thus, ‘cleanness’ and ‘uncleanness’ are no longer a matter of what goes into the stomach, but of what comes out of the heart (Mk. 7:14–23). The greater importance of the moral over the merely ritual was, of course, something that the OT itself taught, so it was not merely that perception which led to the abrogation of the food laws in the NT.

Immediately after this saying about ‘clean’ and ‘unclean’ Jesus went to Tyre, encountered a Gentile woman and healed her daughter. This points to the major reason for the removal of the distinction between clean and unclean food, namely the removal of the distinction between Jew and Gentile, which Jesus’ action (an exception to his normal practice in his lifetime) prefigured. This meaning is sealed in Acts 10, where Peter’s vision, by which he was taught that the division of the animal kingdom was no longer valid, was to prepare him for his visit to the Gentile Cornelius. The epoch-making abolition of the barrier between Jew and Gentile through Christ meant that the distinctive badge of Jewish separateness had no further theological significance in the new, multi-racial people of God (Gal. 3:26–29; Eph. 2:11–22). The division of the animal kingdom that had mirrored it was, therefore, also abolished.

4. What can Christians learn from these laws? First, the importance of the distinctiveness of being the people of God in the midst of the world. Even for OT Israel, ritual cleanness, from the kitchen to the sanctuary, was meant to symbolize God’s greater requirement of moral integrity, social justice and covenant loyalty. In fact, as the prophets (and Jesus) vigorously pointed out, if these latter things were lacking, then ritual cleanness of the most scrupulous kind at every level was worthless. If Christians were as serious about moral distinctiveness as Israel was about ritual cleanness, then our ‘salt’ and ‘light’ might have greater power in the world.

Secondly, that food is still a matter of moral importance. What, how, where and with whom you eat are all still significant parts of our wider cultural customs. As such, along with all factors in any given culture, they can be open to dispute, offence and misunderstanding. Thus, Paul’s detailed discussions of questions related to food (Rom. 14; 1 Cor. 8), though primarily in a Jew-Gentile context, have powerful moral force on the whole range of issues over which Christians disagree. The abolition of the law about food does not abolish the need for love, acceptance and sensitivity. While a Christian may eat anything, there are circumstances where he should not eat some things (Rom. 14:14–21). Is a Christian bound by the law of Leviticus about food? Yes! Not by the law of ch. 11, but rather by 19:18, ‘Love your neighbour as yourself’ (cf. Rom. 13:9–10).

12:1–8 Uncleanness due to childbirth

Ch. 11 dealt with uncleanness caused by external factors—eating or contact with animals. Chs. 12–15 deal primarily with uncleanness caused by functions or conditions of the human body (except for the sections on infections in houses or fabrics). It is important to realize that the concept of ritual uncleanness does not necessarily imply or presume moral sinfulness. All acts of sin made a person unclean, but not all forms of uncleanness were due to sin or a matter of moral blame. There is nothing inherently sinful about the animals that were declared unclean in ch. 11. Nor is there anything morally sinful about menstruation or ulcers. However, in the priestly thinking, discharges from the body, particularly involving blood, were a form of unwholeness. Blood was life, and so loss of it in any form was a rupture of normal health and potentially a cause of death. Such discharges, therefore, made a person temporarily unfit to participate in sanctuary worship in the presence of holy things and people. The unclean must not encounter the holy. Uncleanness was a state of ceremonial or religious quarantine, not a state of moral sin (except in so far as all were sinners, the clean and unclean alike).

This point is particularly relevant in ch. 12. It is impossible, in view of the way the OT presents childbearing as a command of God (Gn. 1:28), one of his best gifts (Pss. 127:3; 128:3–6) and one of the highest human joys, to imagine that the uncleanness associated with childbirth here somehow implies that it was sinful in itself. Nor, in view of Gn. 2:24, not to mention the Song of Solomon, was it because sexual intercourse between husband and wife was regarded as sinful. David's remark in Ps. 51:5 is not a comment on either his mother's morality or the act which conceived him, but a profound awareness of the depth of his own sinfulness, i.e. there had never been a time when he was 'innocent'. The reason for the uncleanness given in the text itself is the discharge of blood which accompanies the birth, and then continues in reducing amounts for a period of two to six weeks afterwards (technically known as lochia). The period of uncleanness thus lasted longer than for normal menstruation (15:19–24). No reason is given as to why the total period for a male child was forty days, whereas for a female child it was eighty days, though some suggest it may be in view of the girl's future expectation of menstruation.

The law, though framed in a category unfamiliar to us, namely ritual uncleanness, had a socially beneficial effect in giving to the mother a period of postnatal seclusion and privacy.

At the end of the period of uncleanness, normal social and religious intercourse was resumed, after sacrifices which effected both atonement and cleansing. The atonement was for the general sinfulness that any worshipper must be forgiven for when coming to God, not, as we have noted, because of any sin attaching to childbirth in itself. Luke records how these ceremonies were carried out after the birth of Jesus, accompanied by prophetic words and greetings (Lk. 2:21–39).

Note. 3 On circumcision see the commentary on Gn. 17.

13:1–14:57 Uncleanness due to infections

The priests were busy people in OT Israel! On top of their duties in the sanctuary and their responsibility as teachers of the law, they also functioned as public health inspectors. These three chapters deal with the detection and diagnosis of infections of the skin, 'infections' in fabrics and 'infections' in buildings, along with prescribed action in each case. Though obviously technically different, the outward appearance of the three categories had enough similarities to be grouped together as causing uncleanness and warranting careful treatment. The chapters divide into three major sections, as indicated by the heading The LORD said to Moses and the concluding These are the regulations for ...: diagnosis and action in cases of human skin disease and contaminated fabrics (13:1–59); ritual cleansing for people who had recovered from skin diseases (14:1–32); and diagnosis, action and cleansing in cases of 'infections' in houses (14:33–57).

The Hebrew word that applies to all three conditions is šāra 'at. It used to be translated 'leprosy', but it is now questioned whether the symptoms described correspond to leprosy proper (Hansen's disease), and, in any case, that term can hardly be used of fabrics or buildings. It seems that it covers a range of conditions where swelling, discoloration, scaliness, flakiness or mouldiness are present.

13:1–59 Infectious skin diseases and contaminated clothing. It is not possible to be certain about the clinical identification of the variety of diseases referred to here by their symptoms. It has been suggested that they include psoriasis (2–17), favus (a form of ringworm; 29–37) and leucoderma (38–40), as well as lesions in scars caused by boils (18–23) and burns (24–28). The descriptions may also include eczema, herpes and some forms of leprosy. The instructions gave the priest simple guidelines for an initial examination, followed by subsequent checks after specified periods of confinement, to determine whether the condition was static or healing (and thus ritually clean) or spreading and infectious (and thus ritually unclean). The priest had the duty of distinguishing serious skin disease from minor complaints (such as a simple rash) that would heal quickly. The main criteria for skin diseases were that the infection had to be chronic (11) or shown to be lasting more than a week or two (4–8, 26–28, 33–34) and be more than skin deep (3, 20, 25, 30). Raw flesh or discoloured hair in an infected area were other indications of uncleanness (10, 14–15, 20, 24–25, 30–33). In the case of fabrics, it had to last more than a week (50–58) and be more than could simply be removed by washing (55).

Isolation of the sufferer, first during the initial diagnosis period and then more permanently if it turned out to be a serious disease, may be regarded as sound practice to prevent cross infection in the community. Its prime purpose from the levitical perspective, however, was to remove the unclean from possible contact with the holy. In other words, the determining factor was religious, even though it had a beneficial hygienic contribution to public health. The same point holds for the actions applied to contaminated fabrics (47–58). It was obviously sensible, from a health point of view, to destroy (and especially to burn) fabrics with fungal or other infections, but the main reason was to prevent them polluting those who wore or used them, since they would then be at risk, and put others at risk, if they went unclean to worship.

The unfortunate person pronounced unclean by the priest because of a serious skin disease was required to do several things which were tantamount to mourning rites, involving torn clothes, unkempt hair and a covered lower face (45–46). In a sense he or she was virtually counted ‘dead’, since the disease had allowed death to invade a still living body, and was condemned to a life of separation from both the community and the place of worship (cf. 2 Ch. 26:21). The sufferer had to live outside the camp, i.e. away from the homes of the community, which in later Israel meant outside the walls or gates of the village or city (cf. 2 Ki. 7:3–11). It was a tragic condition. Once again, we need to remember that this uncleanness was not technically a matter of personal sin. But in OT thinking, disease and sin were linked, not strictly in the sense that sick people were regarded as paying for their own sin (though the book of Job shows that such popular misapprehension did exist and needed to be corrected), but rather in the fact that the universal human fate of death was the result of universal human sin (Gn. 3), and any form of disease was advance warning of death and could mark its imminence.

In a general sense, disease, along with other natural misfortunes, could be part of the effects of God’s judgment on the nation for covenant unfaithfulness (cf. Lv. 26:16), and there were exceptional cases where physical illness was a sign of God’s punishment of an individual (e.g. Nu. 12:10–15; 2 Ch. 26:16–23). However, the persons suffering from the skin diseases described in this chapter were isolated from the community because of the visible, infectious nature of their uncleanness, not because they were regarded as sinners simply by being sick. Other kinds of sickness were not treated in this way. The blind and the deaf, for example, were not excluded from the worshipping community (which makes it more ironic that the blind man whom Jesus healed was driven out of the synagogue, in a context of misunderstanding about the link between illness and sin, after he had been healed; Jn. 9). This is significant inasmuch as both blindness and deafness were used as metaphors for the spiritual and moral effects of sin in a way that ‘leprosy’ never was in the OT. Hence, it is unlikely that ‘leprosy’ was particularly linked with sin.

Whether or not ‘leprosy’ was seen as indicative or symbolic of sin, its consequences were socially and religiously disastrous. This is what makes the stories of Jesus’ compassionate approach to such sufferers all the more remarkable. He not only ignored their social ostracism by approaching them (as he did for other marginalized people), but he very pointedly touched them as well (Mk. 1:40–45), thus rejecting that source of uncleanness as decisively as he rejected the idea of unclean food. Just as he threw open the door of the kingdom of God to ‘sinners’, so also he drew the sick, the disfigured and the lost back into communion with the saving, healing God. Christian medical mission and compassionate ministry among the sick (including especially those whose sickness has been socially devastating, such as leprosy sufferers, and more recently AIDS sufferers) have always been powerful signs of the reign of God, precisely because they manifest the reign of one who himself was ‘despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows, and familiar with suffering ... one from whom men hide their faces’ (Is. 53:3).

14:1–32 Cleansing rituals for those healed of skin diseases. The rituals prescribed in this chapter were for the purpose of admitting back into the community one who had been excluded because of the uncleanness of serious skin disease, but who had subsequently recovered from it. The rituals, therefore, were not an attempt to achieve healing, but followed the recognition that healing had already taken place (3; hence, Jesus’ instruction to the ten lepers to present themselves to a priest called for an act of faith; they were healed en route, Lk. 17:11–19).

The priests in Israel were not ‘medicine men’ with secret powers. The instructions, actions and rituals all through these chapters were open to the lay person who, in a sense, could verify the diagnosis of the priest. They were not the possession of a religious élite, incomprehensible to anyone else. It is notable that in all these regulations there is no attempt to manipulate a cure by magical or occult means, nor is there any mention of demonic causes. This is not because disease was fatalistically regarded as incurable but because all healing was in the hands of God, and the appropriate recourse was to prayer and his word (Dt. 32:39, Nu. 12:13; 2 Ki. 5, 20). We may note in passing that the assumption in these chapters that some individuals among God’s people would become sick, not as a result of disobedience or blatant sin, and might or might not be healed, rules out the interpretation sometimes made of Ex. 15:26 and Dt. 7:15 that God has removed the curse of sickness from his people and will always heal them.

The cleansing rituals were lengthy, significant and public. They provided not only subjective assurance to the sufferer that all was now well, but also objective social legitimation of his or her return to the community, and especially to its worship. They amounted to the celebration of new life as the person was restored from virtual death to the land of the living and to communion with God. Once again, we should remember that the offering of the required sacrifices related to the sin and guilt which are common to all, and were not designed to win forgiveness for whatever sin was thought to have ‘caused’ the illness. Doubtless, if sufferers, now healed, considered that their affliction had been caused by divine anger against particular sin, then the healing combined with these sacrifices, would subjectively assure them that they were forgiven as well as ritually clean. But the atonement declared here is technically related to the cleansing away of pollution (not necessarily of specific personal sin), as was the case with the woman after childbirth (12:8) and certainly with the infected house after its cleansing, when the same form of words is used (14:53).

14:33–53 Treatment of infected houses. The conditions described here under the same general term, šāra ‘at, probably included fungal growths, mildew, dry rot or termite infestation. The treatment is similar to what was to be done for persons or fabrics. After initial inspection and a week’s delay, the infected parts were to be removed and replaced with good materials (36–42). If that failed to stop the rot, the whole building was to be destroyed (43–47). Some kinds of rot would make it dangerous to live in anyway. If, however, the ‘surgery’ was successful, then the house could be cleansed by an identical ritual as for the cleansing of a person, except for the omission of the sacrifices at the altar (48–53).

A house had to be clean, but it had no personal communion with God. Nevertheless, apart from the strictly personal and moral factor just mentioned, it is interesting that similar rituals were prescribed for buildings as for humans. The OT concept of wholeness included the environment as well as the person. God's desire is for clean people in a clean world. The rituals of Leviticus sought to achieve that within the limited span of Israel. Only the redemptive work of God in Christ will finally achieve it for his whole creation when God will dwell with his people in a cleansed earth (Rev. 21:1–8, 27).

15:1–33 Uncleaness due to bodily discharges

This chapter describes uncleaness that resulted from emissions from the male and female reproductive organs. It distinguishes between chronic and abnormal discharges on the one hand and intermittent, normal discharges on the other. Both kinds, however, caused ritual uncleaness. Here, as throughout these chapters on various kinds of uncleaness, we must keep in mind that uncleaness was not in itself a matter of sin, though it could be associated with sinful acts. This chapter includes forms of uncleaness that arose from perfectly legitimate actions or natural functions. Uncleaness simply prevented a person from participating in worship. Except in cases of serious skin disease (ch. 13) it did not unduly isolate a person from the community, but imposed restrictions on his or her physical contacts.

15:1–18 Male discharges. The word bodily (2) is lit. 'from the flesh', a word which in some contexts can mean the genital organ. In this chapter, since all the other cases involve the sexual organs, it is most likely that it is referring to the penis and not to anal discharges, such as haemorrhoids.

Vs 2–15 deal with chronic discharges. The condition described is probably gonorrhoea, which causes infected secretions and may last several months. The uncleaness affects not only the patient, but also anything likely to have come in contact with his infected organ. The hygienic precautions against secondary infection are notable, particularly regarding droplet and sputum infection (8), but again the primary concern was religious, since similar rules applied to contact with menstrual discharge, where there was no risk of catching an infectious disease. After such discharge had cleared up the cleansing rites were comparatively simple and cheap compared to those for serious skin disease (13–15).

Vs 16–18 deal with intermittent discharges. The normal ejaculation of semen, whether in intercourse (18) or by spontaneous nocturnal emission (cf. Dt. 23:10), also made a man unclean for a day. Simple washing effected cleansing.

15:19–30 Female discharges. These are dealt with in reverse order from the man's, producing a 'mirror' arrangement that shows the balance and equivalence of the two sections.

Intermittent discharges are dealt with first (19–24). The discharge from normal menstruation lasts about a week, and so during that period a woman was ritually unclean. Direct or indirect contact with her made another person unclean for a day, except for intercourse, which made the man unclean for seven days. This last prescription (24) probably deals with unintentional contact, where a man has intercourse with his wife just as her period is beginning and finds himself stained with blood. Once menstruation was apparent, intercourse was prohibited (18:19). Like male emission of semen, female menstruation required no sacrificial cleansing, but just simple washing.

Then chronic discharges are dealt with. Various clinical factors can prolong menstrual bleeding and such conditions made the sufferer unclean as long as the bleeding lasted. Although the law specifies only the woman's bedding as 'infected' with uncleanness, there would have been caution about anything or anyone she touched. This is what made the action of the woman suffering precisely this condition all the more courageous when she risked the hostility of a crowd in order to touch Jesus (Mk. 5:24–34). The cleansing sacrifices are exactly the same as for a chronic male disorder (28–30).

V 31 is an important verse and summarizes the reasons for the regulations in this chapter, and indeed for the laws regarding the distinctions between cleanness and uncleanness in chs. 11–15. Uncleanness defiled the dwelling place of God in the midst of Israel. It therefore not only put at risk the persons concerned (who, like Nadab and Abihu, might die for their disregard for God's holiness) but also the whole community, if God were to be so offended by the pollution of his dwelling place that he might abandon it altogether.

While the modern mind finds such regulations fussy and restrictive, a number of positive aspects can be pointed out. First, there is an interesting equality of male and female in the chapter. Sexual intercourse makes both partners ritually unclean (18), and the cleansing rites after abnormal discharges are the same for both men and women.

Secondly, anthropologists point out that in many traditional societies menstrual restrictions provide a measure of social relief and privacy for womenfolk during their periods. Certainly the prohibition on intercourse then inculcates sensitivity. The Creator knew about the effects of hormones before humans knew about their existence.

Thirdly, while it would be wrong to think that the laws in this chapter indicate that sexuality, sexual intercourse, or the physical organs related to it, were considered somehow sinful, they do put certain restraints on sexual activity. In any culture, there are some things which are good and right in themselves but inappropriate and offensive in some contexts (e.g. wearing casual clothes at a formal occasion or telling jokes at a funeral service). In Israel, sexual intercourse in marriage was good and wholesome, but out of place in the seriousness of war (1 Sa. 21:4–5; 2 Sa. 11:11) or worship (Ex. 19:14–15). The most significant practical effect of 15:18, therefore, was to make it impossible for sexual rites and 'sacred prostitution' to be part of the worship of Yahweh. Fertility cults, in which intercourse was given a sacred, ritual significance, were excluded. Similarly, prostitutes, because of their more or less permanent state of uncleanness (quite apart from the morality of the practice), could never legitimately function in relation to Israel's worship.

16:1–34 The Day of Atonement

This chapter is like a hinge for the whole book of Leviticus. It brings to a climax all the preceding chapters about priestly duties in relation to sacrifice and to the diagnosis and treatment of uncleanness. The Day of Atonement (yôm kippûrîm, the name is given to the day in 23:26–27) provided an annual opportunity to 'wipe the slate clean' by cleansing both the sanctuary and the people of all the defilements that had not been noticed and dealt with routinely. Fixed in the annual calendar exactly six months after the spring Passover, which celebrated the unique historical event of Israel's redemption, it provided the ongoing means of cleansing God's redeemed people so that he could continue to dwell among them.

On initial reading the chapter seems confused by repetition. However, it becomes clearer once we recognize the characteristic Hebrew structure of presenting an introduction and summary of main points before filling in the details. The chapter begins with a narrative introduction (1–2), lists the basic requirements for the day’s ritual (3–5), briefly summarizes the most important actions (6–10) and then describes the stages of the ritual in detail (11–22). This is followed by the ‘winding down’ rites to cleanse the participants (23–28), instructions for the people (29–31) and a concluding summary (32–34).

16:1–2 Introduction. These verses link the institution of the day to the events of the ordination of the priests and the deaths of Nadab and Abihu (chs. 8–10), reminding us once again of the basic narrative framework in which Leviticus is set. The presence of God was most powerfully localized in the inner sanctuary, the Most Holy Place (lit. ‘holy of holies’), which was behind the curtain that divided the Tent of Meeting in two (see diagram of the tabernacle in Numbers). There stood the ark (see Ex. 25:10–22) with its atonement cover. This last item (kappōret) was the lid of the ark, on which there were two golden cherubim. An older translation, ‘mercy seat’ (KJV, RSV), is misleading in that it was not a seat, except perhaps metaphorically (cf. Ps. 99:1). It does preserve the idea that it was a place of infinite holiness and yet also infinite mercy, inasmuch as God would meet Moses there (Ex. 25:22). The word probably is related to kipper (‘to atone’), hence the NIV translation. Because of the intense holiness of the presence of God there, no-one, not even Aaron, was to penetrate the curtain except on this day and in the prescribed manner.

16:3–5 Required animals and clothing. Five animals were required: one bull, two goats and two rams. The high priest’s clothes for this day were remarkably simple. When he represented God before the people, he was attired in robes of sumptuous colour and glory. When he represented the people before God, he wore little more than a slave would: linen tunic, shorts, belt and turban.

16:6–10 Summary. The day’s core proceedings are listed. The sacrifice of the bull as the priests’ sin offering was followed by the selection by lot of one of the goats to be sacrificed as the people’s sin offering and the other to be driven off into the wilderness.

16:11–22 Main rituals in detail. There were four main movements in the ritual drama, the first three of which involved the sprinkling of blood, the primary means of ritual cleansing.

First, the bull was sacrificed as a sin offering for the priests, including the high priest himself (11–14). Nobody was exempt from the need of cleansing. The high priest then made this first entry into the Most Holy Place behind the curtain, wafting ahead of him a cloud of incense that would hide the ark from direct view. He then sprinkled the cleansing blood in front of the atonement cover of the ark.

Secondly, emerging from the Tent of Meeting (doubtless to the relief of the watching people), the high priest then sacrificed the goat selected for the people’s sin offering, returned with its blood into the Most Holy Place and repeated the sprinkling. The purpose was to cleanse the sanctuary from whatever uncleanness, rebellion and sins of the people had defiled it during the past year (16). The instruction that he should do the same for the Tent of Meeting (16b), probably means that all the other objects in the Tent were similarly cleansed by sprinkling (cf. Heb. 9:21–22). In all this, the high priest acted alone (17). The point that there was only one mediator was picked up in the NT and related to Christ (1 Tim. 2:5).

Thirdly, emerging the second time from the Tent, the high priest performed a similar cleansing rite on the altar, using a mixture of the blood of the bull and the goat. This indicated that the priests as well as the people could have been agents of contaminating it with inadvertent uncleanness.

Finally, the climax of the ceremonies, and from the people’s point of view, the most visible part, was the driving off of the scapegoat. This is probably the best translation for what was lit.

called ‘the goat for azāzēl’ (8, 10, 26). The meaning of azāzēl is unknown. In view of 17:7 it was almost certainly not the name of some demon or spirit of the wilderness to whom the live goat was sent. The NEB’s translation ‘the Precipice’ reflects the fact that in later Jewish tradition, the goat was driven to a cliff in the wilderness and pushed over. Some see that meaning also in the expression a solitary place (22), which is lit. ‘a place of cutting off’. These are guesses. What is certain is the significance of the ritual, because the text explains it with unusual clarity and emphasis in vs 21–22. All the sins of the people were symbolically laid on the goat, which then carried them far away. God not only forgave sin and cleansed away its defilement, he even removed it out of sight and memory (cf. Ps. 103:12; Mi. 7:19).

16:23–28 Concluding rituals. When the central drama was over there remained the ‘tidying up’. The high priest was to wash and put back on his normal clothes, and then offer the two rams (3, 5) as burnt offerings for the priests and for the people. Other helpers were similarly to go through rites of cleansing after contact with the sin-laden goat or the sacrificial carcasses.

16:29–34 Instructions for the people. The annual date is given. The seventh (lunar) month falls in late September and early October. The day was one of utter solemnity and, therefore, not merely treated as a Sabbath, but also as a day of ‘affliction’. The command to deny oneself probably meant penitence and fasting (cf. Is. 58:3, 5, Ps. 35:13).

Note. The Day of Atonement imagery in the letter to the Hebrews. We have already seen that the NT in general uses sacrificial imagery to explain the death of Christ, but it is the writer of Hebrews who makes most detailed use of the specific rites of the Day of Atonement in relation to the crucifixion. In Heb. 9:1–10:22 especially he points out both the comparisons and the contrasts. His climactic point is that the tearing of the curtain that separated off the Most Holy Place at the time of Christ’s death (Lk. 23:45) symbolically demonstrated the spiritual truth that Christ has opened the way into the very presence of God by his blood. His sacrifice was not for his own sake, need never be repeated and has eternal efficacy. Every believer, therefore, not only may but should come frequently and with confidence to the place where the high priest could go only once a year (Heb. 10:19–22). The scapegoat is never explicitly used in the NT itself as a picture of Christ, though early Christian writings did make the connection. However, the double imagery that Christ was both ‘made sin’ for us (2 Cor. 5:21) and that he ‘carried our sins’ (1 Pet. 2:24) matches the role of both goats on the Day of Atonement—the one sacrificed as a sin offering and the one that carried off the confessed sins of the people. For in his death, ‘the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all’ (Is. 53:6).

17:1–16 Supplementary regulations on sacrifices and meat

This chapter concludes the first half of the book by adding some supplementary rules regarding sacrifices and meat-eating in order to clarify some possible areas of confusion among ordinary people. Because it is concerned with the guidance of the people rather than the ritual of the priests, some attach the chapter to the second part of the book. But it seems much more naturally linked to chs. 1–16, whereas 18:1–5 clearly and emphatically introduces a new section.

3–7 Domestic animals that were fit for sacrifice (ox, lamb and goat) were not to be killed for meat outside the tabernacle. If a family wished to have a meat meal, they must first offer the animal at the tabernacle as a fellowship offering (5), after which they would get the bulk of the meat back for cooking (7:12–18). This rule applied while Israel was a compact community in the wilderness. It was revoked when they settled in the land, when it would have been impracticable (Dt. 12:15, 20–22). The purpose of the law is explained in vs 5–7, which show that it was not simply to preserve the privilege of the tabernacle or the perks of the priests (or to encourage vegetarianism), but rather for the very serious purpose of eradicating idolatry (7). Goat idols may refer to spirits or demons of the countryside, which were visualized in he-goat form ('satyrs'). He-goat worship was part of Egyptian religion, and it seems that Egyptian idolatries survived among the Israelites for some time (cf. Jos. 24:14; Ezk. 20:7; 23ff.). The phrase to whom they prostitute themselves was used metaphorically of idolatry (Ex. 34:15–16; Lv. 20:5–6), but could imply literal acts of ritual prostitution or copulation with animals (cf. Ex. 22:19–20; Lv. 18:23; 20:15–16; Ho. 4:10–14). To prevent people carrying on such idolatrous rites, under the guise of having a family party, all animal slaughter was to take place at the tabernacle.

8–9 Probably for the same reason (i.e. to prevent idolatrous misuse) no sacrifice was to be offered except at the tabernacle, where it would be clearly to the LORD, i.e. to Yahweh, God of Israel. This rule (and the following ones) applied to the alien living among them as well as to the Israelites. Such aliens were accorded significant rights and consideration in OT law, but were not allowed to carry on sacrifices and rituals that would lead Israel into idolatry. On the identity of 'aliens', see the commentary on ch. 25.

10–12 The prohibition on eating blood (i.e. eating meat from which the blood had not been properly drained out) had already been stated (3:17; 7:26–27), but here it is explained, with repetition for added emphasis (cf. v 14, The life of every creature is its blood). The physiological facts that blood carries 'life' to all parts of the animate body and that death quickly follows serious loss of blood is here raised to a matter of moral and spiritual principle as well. The shed blood of an animal meant its life had been given up in death and thus, in the context of sacrifice, its life had ransomed and cleansed (made atonement for) the life of the sinful human being on whose behalf it had been slain. The primary reason for the ban on eating blood, therefore, was its sacredness as the major element in the sacrificial rituals. A secondary reason may have been that it inculcated a basic respect for life, which was not to be frivolously destroyed or treated with contempt. This was a very ancient principle in Israel, related to the covenant with Noah (Gn. 9:4–6).

13–14 These verses deal with non-sacrificial animals, game animals that were clean (i.e. fit to eat). They could be killed and eaten without being brought to the tabernacle for sacrifice, but the blood was to be drained out and 'buried'. Blood was still sacred and to be respected as 'life', even when not presented at the altar.

15–16 An animal found dead, i.e. one which had been neither sacrificed nor hunted and killed, was de facto unclean as a carcass (apart from being hygienically suspect as well). Eating such meat therefore made a person unclean. Other laws actually prohibited Israelites from deliberately eating such meat. It could be given to dogs (Ex. 22:31) or to non-Israelites (Dt. 14:21). These verses may, therefore, refer to someone who unwittingly ate meat which he discovered had not been killed and drained. His uncleanness could be simply cleansed, otherwise it became culpable (16).

In some cultures still, Christians prohibit the eating or drinking of blood because of its contextual association with idolatrous rituals. This seems a legitimate precaution in line with the primary intention of this chapter. Some Christians feel it right to avoid even relatively innocuous forms of gambling because of the association with the more serious sin of 'covetousness which is idolatry'. It is a principle which can be extended in several ways, but caution must be exercised lest it lead to the bondage of legalism or judgmental attitudes. The Council of Jerusalem, which ruled that the new Gentile converts need not be bound by circumcision and keeping the whole Mosaic law, nevertheless requested them to observe the essentials of this chapter, perhaps out of respect for the sensitivities of Jewish Christians. This was a principle which Paul lived by (see Acts 15:29 and the commentary there; cf. Rom. 14:14–23; 1 Cor. 9:19–23).

18:1–27:34 Practical holiness in all of life

Whereas the first half of the book was primarily concerned with the duties of priests, most of this last major section is directed to the rest of the people. Even those chapters which do apply to priests (21–22) deal more with issues that relate to their lives as families in the community than with their duties in the tabernacle. These chapters seem at first sight to be full of very miscellaneous laws. But there is a thread running through them, which is the requirement that God's people should be holy, and thereby reflect his holiness. Holiness, as we have seen, means distinctiveness, and so the opening verses of this section state that distinctiveness in very clear terms (18:1–3). The people of Israel were to be different from the pagan nations around them. This fundamental requirement sometimes explains rules which seem otherwise inexplicable. Holiness in the realm of marriage, family life and sexual relations comes first (ch. 18 and most of ch. 20). Then comes a wide variety of laws governing very practical social life (ch. 19). Holiness made special demands on the priests and their families (ch. 21–22) and was woven into the annual calendar (ch. 23). The seriousness of these laws is highlighted by a historical example (24:10–23), which parallels the case of Nadab and Abihu in the first half of the book. Holiness claimed time itself, as the sabbatical principle was extended to the sabbatical and jubilee years, and thus impacted the whole economic realm (ch. 25). The year of jubilee (which was to begin on the Day of Atonement) brings this part of the book to a climax that corresponds to the way the Day of Atonement is the climax of the first part. This is followed by a characteristic listing of blessings for obedience and curses for disobedience (ch. 26), and finally a supplementary postscript on vows and dedication (ch. 27), which parallels the way ch. 17 supplemented the preceding material.

18:1–29 Regulating sexual relations

18:1–5 A different people. The expression I am the LORD your God echoes repeatedly throughout the following chapters, distinguishing them from the preceding section of the book, where it occurred only in 11:44–45. It was a powerful summary of the covenant relationship. It pointed to God's initiative of grace in the exodus redemption (11:45) and the corresponding requirement on Israel to fulfil their distinct role in the world as a holy nation (cf. Ex 19:3–6).

That distinctiveness here has a backward and a forward look. Israel must imitate neither Egypt nor Canaan. The idolatries and perversions of Egyptian and Canaanite culture and religion are well documented archaeologically and form the background to many of the prohibitions that follow. The need for God's people to be clearly different from the sinful and idolatrous dimensions of surrounding cultures is as powerfully taught in the NT and required of Christians as it was for OT Israel (cf., e.g. Mt. 5:13–16; Lk. 22:24–26; 1 Cor. 6:9–11; Eph. 4:17–24; 1 Pet. 2:11–12). Indeed, the primary moral significance of Israel as a society is that they were created precisely to be a model of such distinctiveness within the contemporary cultural context of the ancient world. As we observe those differences, and the reasons for them, we are able to formulate ethical priorities and objectives for Christian living in the modern world.

V 5 should not be regarded as teaching salvation by keeping the law. In the OT, to live in the fullest sense meant the full enjoyment of the blessings and wellbeing of the covenant relationship with God which was already established by his redeeming action (3). Such life came through obedience to the law of the God, which was the response to salvation; it did not achieve or earn it.

18:6–18 Sexual boundaries. The basic principle of what follows is summarized in v 6. Sexual relations covers both casual sexual intercourse and marriage. Close relatives includes not only those whom we would call blood relatives (e.g. a biological parent or sibling), but also blood relatives of those related by marriage (in-laws and step-relatives). These prohibitions are, therefore, somewhat wider than a strict definition of incest and are designed to protect the integrity of relationships within the extended family structure that was characteristic of Israel's social system.

The Israelite household was much larger than the modern nuclear two-generational family unit. It included up to three or four generations descended from a single living male head, (i.e. his sons and their wives, families and servants), all living in fairly close proximity. But the extended family was not a commune of casual relationships. These laws protected the integrity and boundaries of the constituent marriages and nuclear families. The genetic benefits of such limits (like the hygienic benefits of the uncleanness rules) may be observed and admired but would have been unknown in their technical sense in Israel. A more contextually relevant effect would have been to outlaw in Israel the kind of incestuous sexual relations that were practised in Egyptian and Mesopotamian royal houses. Some degrees of incest were prohibited in ancient Near Eastern law codes, but not to the extent or with the severity of OT law. The story of Tamar and Amnon (2 Sa. 13, esp. vs 12–13) illustrates the probable rarity, and corresponding social shock, of these laws being violated. Another effect, characteristic of OT law in other places, is to protect women from sexual exploitation of their vulnerable place in a close-knit community. The relevance in principle of such protection is not hard to see in modern society, shocked by the extent of the sexual abuse of children by parents and in Children's Homes and of the sexual harassment of women at work.

18:19–23 Other prohibitions. The sacrifice of children (21; Molech was the name of a god known in Canaan and elsewhere), genito-anal intercourse between men (22) and both male and female intercourse with animals (23) are all known to have been part of pagan worship in Egypt, Canaan and elsewhere. That is probably the reason why they are grouped together here. But the additional phrases at the end of each verse indicate that a more basic immorality was involved than pagan associations alone. The actions are described respectively as profaning the name of your God (that is, bringing disgrace on the reputation of Yahweh among the nations), detestable (a term of strong disapproval in the OT, used for things which God hates or deplores), and perversion (lit. 'confusion'; i.e. the unnatural mixing of what God created and intended to be separate).

18:24–30 Warnings and object lessons. The call to be different is here sanctioned by the threat that if the Israelites followed the ways of the Canaanites they would share the fate of the Canaanites. The land itself would vomit them out. The vivid imagery matches the revulsion of God himself. These verses are important for putting the conquest of Canaan in proper perspective. The destruction of the Canaanites was not a matter of arbitrary divine favouritism, but of explicit moral judgment on a society which is described in the Bible, and confirmed by archaeology, as degraded, perverted and oppressive. Furthermore, God showed his moral consistency by not only threatening Israel with the same judgment for the same sins, but also actually carrying it out in their history. The NT uses the history of Israel with the same warning purpose that the OT here uses the history of the Canaanites. Christians too must beware of complacency and pride in the face of persistent sin (1 Cor. 10:1–12; 2 Tim. 2:11–19; Heb. 10:26–31).

19:1–37 Israel's social charter

This great chapter stands among the richest seams of OT ethics, along with passages like Dt. 23–25; Ps. 15; Am. 5; Mi. 6:6–8; Jb. 31; Ezk. 18; and Is. 58. It will richly reward close study using a cross-reference Bible, since many of its laws are expanded further in Deuteronomy and echoed in the Psalms, Proverbs and Prophets. It includes and expands all of the Ten Commandments in one way or another, and also condenses them into what Jesus called the second great commandment in the law and Paul regarded as its very essence: Love your neighbour as yourself (18; cf. Mt. 22:37–40; Rom. 13:8–10). With its definitive opening (2), sweeping conclusion (37) and pithy, memorable style, it probably functioned as an easily taught and learned catechism of familial and social responsibilities. It is a chapter which strongly influenced the moral priorities of Jesus' teaching and also lies behind some of the letter of James.

2 The chapter is headed with the motto of this half of Leviticus: Be holy because I, the LORD your God, am holy. The rest of the chapter dispels any idea that holiness in the OT was merely a matter of ritual purity. It was to be displayed in every corner of practical life—from the corners of your beard to the corners of your fields. Holiness, therefore, was not something that you pursued by retreating from everyday life into some religious sanctum. Holiness meant transforming everyday life by the quality of behaviour that was utterly different from the surrounding ways of the world.

3–4 These verses combine the fifth, fourth and second commandments. The central place of the family in Israel's social life is indicated in the priority given to parental respect (notice incidentally how the mother is not only included but put first). The same scale of values is seen in Dt. 27:15–16. The inclusion of the Sabbath law alongside children's duty to parents (3), and then again alongside parents' responsibility to their children (29–30) reflects the benefits for family life in general that the Sabbath law conferred. It was not just a religious observation but a very important social and economic protective institution. Contempt or neglect of the principle of a day of rest and cessation of economic activity was linked with greed and exploitation of the poor (Am 8:4–6; Is. 58), which were particularly destructive of families (Mi. 2:1–2, 9). Such social evils go hand in hand with idolatry (4), whether Canaanite Baalism or modern consumerism.

5–8 This looks like a piece of sacrificial law 'lost' from its proper context earlier in the book. The reason, however, for its repetition here in the midst of a chapter primarily devoted to social concerns is probably that the fellowship offering was the most social of all the sacrifices. The meat had to be eaten within two days, and so would have been shared with family, friends and neighbours. It thus inculcated a spirit of generous sharing in the community which matches the immediately following law.

9–10 Gleaning rights (cf. 23:22; Dt. 24:19–22) were part of Israel's system of welfare provision for the poor (i.e. those who lacked the normal security of a family, e.g. widows and orphans) and those who had no land and so had to live by selling their labour or skills (aliens, Levites, hired workmen). As well as this annual help, they had the benefit of the triennial tithe on produce, which was stored as a food reserve for distribution to the needy (Dt. 14:28–29), and the free use of the produce of the land in the sabbatical (seventh) year (Ex. 23:10–11).

The relief of poverty in Israel, therefore, was built into economic and legal structures, not left as a matter of private charity. This law, typically of OT law, addresses the issue not from the angle of rights but of responsibilities. That is, it assumes the right of gleaning, but commands the landowner to make sure there is something to be gleaned. Boaz was a model of this in practice (Ru. 2).

Those who possessed land (and other productive resources) may not have been responsible for the plight of the poor (though the prophets keenly observed that their greed and exploitation may have contributed to it), but they were responsible to God to alleviate it. This law thus sets possession of resources in a framework of duty to God and others, and rejects the idea that private property is an absolute right, giving one freedom to extract every last drop of income or profit from one's assets. It would be facetious to think that in a modern agricultural economy this law prohibited the efficiency of combine harvesters. Its point is that, whatever the economic system, there must be adequate provision for the poor. Ownership confers responsibilities, not just privileges. And this is the practical meaning of holiness.

11–18 Responsibility to God in respect of one's neighbour is the theme of these verses also. They cover a wide range of social contexts, but are bound together by the repeated 'I am the LORD' (12, 14, 16, 18). This shows with great clarity that the 'second great commandment', to love your neighbour (18) is an inescapable reflex of the first, to love and fear God. 1 Jn. 4:20–21 captures very precisely the thrust of these verses.

It was not just Jesus who showed the deeper relevance of the law. The eighth, ninth and third commandments are compressed into vs 11–12, and then shown to be relevant to all forms of cheating or deception in general, and to employment relations in particular. 6:2–7 has already deemed all such behaviour 'unfaithful to the LORD'. Oaths involving God's name in Israel were used to seal contracts and other commitments. Failure to honour such arrangements therefore dishonoured God as well as defrauding the other party. To take a man's labour and then fail to pay him adequately or promptly was also tantamount to robbery (13; cf. Je. 22:13).

In many parts of the world, day-labourers are still the most vulnerable and exploited part of the economy. The application of even minimal legislation like v 13b, which at least allows the worker to buy his evening meal and so not go to bed hungry, would transform the lives of millions. Dt. 24:14–15 insists also that the law should apply to immigrant, 'guest-workers', a most exploited group in the ancient as in the modern world. Jesus used the plight of such people to illustrate an even higher standard of generosity that went beyond the legal requirement (Mt. 20:1–16). Again, the OT typically enshrines rights (in this case workers' rights) in the form of responsibilities. Similarly, the human rights of the disabled are expressed in the command not to mock or take advantage of them (cf. Dt. 27:18; Pr. 17:5). This too is holiness.

Holiness demands justice in the local community (15–18). In ancient Israel, the administration of justice was in the hands of the elders in each neighbourhood. So it was vital that their integrity should not be marred either by inappropriate sympathy or undue deference (15), or by evil intent and false witness among the general public (16). The NIV's Do not do anything that endangers your neighbour's life is sound advice but not quite what the Hebrew meant. The phrase actually refers to court action that threatened another party with a capital charge. So the harmony of a community depended not just on 'the professionals', but on the positive behaviour of all in avoiding slander, hatred, vengeance and even grudges. (V 17a should dispel any misconceptions that OT law was only concerned with externals and that Christ was the first to condemn sin in the heart). It is typical of modern society that we blame all its ills on the failure of the courts, or the police, or social workers, while turning a blind eye to the real roots of any society's malaise. The context of the second great commandment, therefore, shows us that to love your neighbour as yourself is not a matter of private feelings or interpersonal generosity only, but of practical social ethics in the public arena, including the legal process. This too is holiness.

19 The holiness which took such distinctive shape in the social realm was to have its symbolic reflection also. We have already seen in the laws on clean and unclean animals that it was a priestly priority to avoid all forms of unnatural mixing of categories. The three rules in this verse arise from the same concern. The religious separation of Israel was mirrored in observing some practical separations in ordinary life. The validity of such rules lapsed for Christians at the same point as the food laws, i.e. when the distinction between Jew and Gentile was abolished in Christ (see above on ch. 11).

20–22 Adultery in Israel was technically sexual intercourse by a man with a married or betrothed woman (Dt. 22:22–24). If the betrothed woman was a slave not yet redeemed (i.e. freed), then she was technically still the property of her master, not yet having the full status of wife or betrothed free woman. So the offence was not adultery under the law. However, the moral evil of the act was underlined by the requirement of a guilt offering, which by definition would have also demanded restitution to the injured parties. The vertical and horizontal dimensions of the offence are thus both recognized.

23–25 Holiness required the complete consecration of all one's life, possessions, resources and actions to God. In material things, this included the tithe on produce, the offering of the firstfruits to God (Ex. 23:19; Dt. 26:1–15) and the consecration of firstborn animals (Ex. 34:19–20; Dt. 15:19–23). This law extended the principle to fruit trees, which take a few years to reach worthwhile fruitbearing potential. The fruit of the fourth year was to be treated as 'firstfruit'.

26–31 The main focus of most of this section is to exclude rites and practices associated with pagan, Canaanite religion, particularly those which were physically or morally disfiguring. Abuse of the body in the name of religion is a widespread human aberration. The OT, with its high view of the goodness of the body as part of God's creation, disallowed it. The NT reinforces the principle with the assertion that the Christian's body is a temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6:19–20).

32 Respect for the elderly is characteristic of OT law's concern for categories of people who could be vulnerable to poor treatment by society, e.g. children (cf. v 29), the immigrant or alien (32–33), the disabled (14) and the homeless (widows and orphans). A society which loses any respect for God (32b) quickly loses that deep and sacred respect for human life that protects those (such as the unborn, the very young and the very old) who are otherwise expendable. Part of the ironic tragedy of Job was that he, who had been meticulous in his defence of such people, himself became the victim of exclusion and mockery because of his illness (cf. Jb. 29:7–17 with 30:1, 9–10).

33–34 The same principle applies to this far-reaching law. The OT is so often maligned because of its exclusive and negative attitude to foreign nations external to Israel and its insistence on Israel's separation that we easily overlook the astonishing emphasis in Israel's law on just and compassionate treatment for aliens who lived in Israel's midst. This law is one of many (Ex. 12:48f., 22:21, 23:9, Dt. 10:18f., 14:29, 24:14, 17, 27:19, cf. Ps. 146:9; Jb. 29:16). Equality before the law was a principle that included both inclusion in the benefits of the sacrificial system (Nu. 15:15f., 26) and of the annual festivals (Dt. 16:11, 14), but also accountability for wrongdoing (24:16, 22, Nu. 15:27–31).

It is remarkable to find this explicit legal equality for aliens in the law of ancient Israel in view of its absence, until comparatively recently, in the legislation of modern countries. And even where legislation for racial equality does exist, the actual practice of society and officialdom can be very far short of it. This law has a powerful moral relevance to the pressing issues of the rights and treatment of ethnic minorities, refugees, migrant labourers, asylum seekers etc. In fact, its moral force is on the same level as the second greatest commandment in the law, since the command to love the alien as yourself (34) is phrased almost identically to v 18. It comes with a similar sanction (I am the LORD) and the added motivation of Israel's own experience of oppression and deliverance. And this too is holiness.

35–36 Finally, holiness is to govern the world of trade and the market-place. God's concern for economic justice and commercial honesty matches his concern for integrity and impartiality in the legal system. The two concerns go closely together, of course, since in Israel (as still in many parts of the world) those who corner the market-place can also corrupt the courts. Those who most successfully cheat in business are those who can buy the connivance of authority—whether the local corrupt policeman or the respected financial or legal establishment. All forms of dishonesty, from the market stall to international trade, are detestable to God (cf. Dt. 25:13–15), the same word as applies to sexual perversion and abuse of children (cf. also Am. 8:5; Mi. 6:10; Je. 5:1; Pr. 20:10, 23). It is with this perspective that Christians should be concerned about the unjust imbalance of world economics and Third World debt.

The chapter is remarkable for its breadth and depth of moral insight. It touches on the thoughts of the heart and the actions of the body, private and public behaviour and almost every major area of social life in a community. The application of some of its legislation would transform the lives of millions in today's world. And the deeper one reflects on it, the more it seems that many Christians come nowhere near the standards it presented centuries before Christ (let alone Christ's own development of it in the Sermon on the Mount).

20:1–27 Serious offences and penalties

Most of the contents of this chapter are repeated from ch. 18. The difference is that here specific penalties are linked to the offences. There is a double emphasis on sins that are against God and pure worship of him on the one hand (2–6, 25–27), and those that are destructive of the authority and integrity of the family on the other (9–21). In this respect we can see the influence of the two tables of the Ten Commandments. It is this fundamental nature of the offences (i.e. that they are against God and the family) that also explains the severe nature of the penalties.

Israel as a society was founded on the covenant with Yahweh, and therefore offences which threatened that covenant relationship were tantamount to crimes, punishable in the name of the highest authority in the state, i.e. God. The family played a central role in the experience, preservation and transmission of that covenant relationship, and therefore actions which threatened the family, either by serious and flagrant disregard for parental authority, or by sexual deviation and disruption, by their very nature also threatened the covenantal foundation of the social system. The application of the death penalty to such offences, therefore, was not a matter of primitive vengeance, but an indication of how seriously Israel was to take the covenant (cf. C. J. H. Wright, God's People in God's Land [Paternoster Press, 1990]). In the NT the covenant is no longer the foundation of a nation state, and therefore the nature of crime and the rationale for penalties are no longer bound to Israel's legislation. However, although adultery, incest and dishonouring parents are no longer capital offences in a secular society, the NT still regards them as serious moral evils (cf. Mt. 15:4; Rom. 1:29–32; 1 Cor. 5).

The penalties in this chapter are divided between those which were to be carried out by society (judicial execution); those which were left in the hands of God ('cutting off', which probably meant that God himself was expected to intervene in judgment against the offender, where the offence, by its very nature, may never have come to light in the court; see 7:25); and childlessness for two kinds of incest. If we are inclined to think these punishments inexplicably severe, we should remember the limited range of offences to which they applied. It is probable that the penalties were expressed in maximum form, and offenders may have often received lesser penalties. The fact that in the case of deliberate murder it was stipulated that there was to be no reduction of the death penalty to any other form of penalty (such as monetary compensation; Nu. 35:31) may mean that in other cases such conversion of penalties may have been allowed. It is also worth saying that in most other respects the law of Israel was decidedly humane when compared with the brutality of punishments found in the law codes of contemporary ancient societies. For a fuller discussion of the principles of the Israelite penal system, see G. J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Eerdmans, 1979), pp. 281ff.

The motivation behind this, as with every aspect of Israel's law, was that the people should manifest their distinctiveness from the nations. The fundamental demand for holiness is twice repeated (7–8, 25–26), and in both cases God is the subject: I am the LORD, who makes you holy ... I have set you apart. Holiness is not something to be achieved by our own strenuous efforts. It is a state already created and given by God. The people of God are called on to maintain the holiness he has already conferred on them through his grace in promise and redemption (24). The thrust of these verses is, 'Live differently, because I have made you different. Be what you are.'

The same expression, I am the LORD who makes you holy (20:7), occurs six times in these chapters and functions as a section divider (21:8, 15, 23; 22:9, 16, 32). All the people of Israel were called to be holy, i.e. different from the nations, but the priests were called to be holy in a unique internal sense, i.e. to be different from the rest of the people of Israel. Israel was set apart among the nations; the priests were set apart among Israel. So, just as Israel was called to higher standards than the nations, so the priests had to observe more stringent requirements than the ordinary people.

21:1–15 Restrictions were placed on priests' involvement in mourning (because of the danger of uncleanness through contact with death) and on their marriage options. The section subdivides into rules for ordinary priests (1–9) and even stricter ones for the high priest (10–15).

16–24 In the world of Israelite symbolism, spiritual and moral integrity was expressed in physical wholeness, so men who belonged to the priestly families but who had some physical defect were not allowed to perform the sacrifices at the altar. They were not, however, excluded from the material income and support of the priests, and they could eat the holy food that was the priests' share.

22:1–9 If, however, a priest became unclean for any reason, he was prohibited from eating the holy food, because of the vital principle that the holy and the unclean must be kept separate (see above on ch. 11). This could be as minor as ritual uncleanness for a day, caused by certain contacts, or as major as the uncleanness of serious skin disease which lasted as long as the disease remained uncured.

10–15 These verses define who counted as a member of a priest's family for the purpose of permission to eat the holy food.

17–33 We have already seen in ch. 11 that the distinction between clean and unclean animals mirrored that between Israel and other nations. This was taken a step further. Just as Israel was divided into priests and ordinary people so the range of clean animals was further divided into those that were to be used for sacrifice and those that were to be eaten. The parallel symbolism was thus: priests/sacrificial animals : other Israelites/other clean animals : Gentiles/unclean animals. It is this pattern which explains the similarity of vocabulary in 21:17–21 and 22:18–24. Just as defects and deformities barred a man from priestly service, so they barred an animal from sacrifice.

In the NT all these distinctions were removed. Not only is there no longer Jew and Gentile in Christ, but one new humanity reconciled to God and each other through him, but also, since Christ has fulfilled the sacrificial function of priesthood, there is no continuing separate order of priests in the Christian church in the same sense as in Israel. The temple curtain was torn. Access to God is open to all through the sacrificial blood of Christ (cf. 1 Pet. 1:19), and his high priestly ministry is now eternally carried on for his people in the presence of God. The whole people of God in Christ is thus now called his holy priesthood, and the invitation to this community is extended explicitly to the lame, the blind, the leper, and all others who would previously have been excluded from priesthood (cf. Lk. 14:13–21). Even the eunuch (excluded in 21–20) is assured that he may not only approach God’s sanctuary, but that his sacrifices will be accepted (Is. 56:3–8).

However, although those who exercise moral and spiritual oversight in the church are never called priests in the NT, their responsibilities include the teaching function that also belonged to OT priests. Because of this, the NT requires high standards of personal and family life in those who are called to such responsibility. There are echoes of these two chapters, therefore (though in a rather different tone), in the lists of qualifications for elders, overseers and deacons (1 Tim 3:1–13; Tit. 1:5–9; cf. Jas. 3:1).

23:1–44 The appointed festivals and assemblies

The holiness that was demanded in every aspect of social and economic life was also woven into the very passage of time. This chapter lists the sequence of annual festivals by which Israel not only marked the seasons of the agricultural year but also celebrated the history of their redemption. The weekly Sabbath heads the list (3), partly because the other festivals involved additional Sabbaths, and partly because all the festivals participated in the sabbatical principle of the dedication of time and labour to God. This chapter, like Dt. 16, is a layperson’s calendar. Full details of the sacrificial rituals that the priest would need are given in Nu. 28–29. Similarly, the full ritual of the Passover is given in Ex. 12–13.

23:4–22 Spring festivals. Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread were technically two separate feasts, but they merged together, since the one followed immediately after the other (4–8). This great twin festival, of course, celebrated the exodus. It was, and still is, the primary festival of Israel in its recalling of that great redemptive event at the very outset of their history as a nation. The first month of the Israelite (lunar) calendar was from mid-March to mid-April. This came towards the end of the winter rainy season and coincided with the start of the harvest season, which began with barley, the earliest crop to ripen. The offering of firstfruits (9–14) was thus linked to Passover and Unleavened Bread and was not a separate festival, as the paragraph and subheading of the NIV misleadingly suggest. In fact, the offering of fruit, grain or firstling livestock formed part of each of the three feasts that marked the agricultural year—Passover and Unleavened Bread, Weeks and Tabernacles (cf. Ex. 23:15; 34:18–20).

The Feast of Weeks (15–21), otherwise known as Pentecost, (‘fiftieth’), fell fifty days after the end of the Feast of Unleavened Bread and the offering of the firstfruits. It thus came at the joyful conclusion of the grain harvesting.

V 22 is not simply a superfluous repetition of 19:9–10. It reminded Israel that in the midst of their festivity and feasting they were not to neglect the needy in the community at harvest time. The grain and fellowship offerings provided food for the priests. Gleaning rights helped provide food for the poor. This compassionate and socially inclusive nature of Israel's religious life is spelt out more emphatically in Dt. 16:11, 14.

23:23–44 Autumn festivals. The seventh month (approximately mid-September to mid-October) came at the end of the whole agricultural year, with the ingathering of olives and grapes. It thus completed the vital trio of grain, oil and wine and counterbalanced the great spring festivals. The importance of the month (and perhaps simply acknowledging its symbolic sacredness as the seventh) was marked by a special sacred assembly on the first day, summoned by trumpet blasts (23–25). (Hence the NIV heading 'Feast of Trumpets', though it is not explicitly given that name in the text.)

The full details of the ritual for the Day of Atonement were given in ch. 16. All that was needed in this calendar was to remind the people of the importance of spiritual preparation for the day, especially the call to deny yourselves, which probably included fasting and other abstinence.

Just as the solemnity of the penitential seasons of Advent and Lent in the Christian year gives way to the joyful celebration of Christmas and Easter, so in Israel's calendar, the Day of Atonement was soon followed by the crowning celebration of the year, the Feast of Tabernacles. It came at the end of the olive and grape harvests and thus marked the completion of the annual agricultural cycle. Christian harvest festivals fall at roughly the same time of year, but are only a pale reflection of the depth of historical meaning that Israel invested in this feast. The people were to make temporary shelters out of branches (hence the name 'tabernacles', or 'booths') and live in them for a week. This was to recall the apparent physical insecurity of the Israelites when they left Egypt for their journey through the wilderness, and so to remind them of that total dependence on God which remains even when we think ourselves settled and secure (cf. Dt. 6:10–11; 8:10–18; 26:1–11).

The Christian year takes its basic shape from the ancient feasts of Israel. Jesus was crucified at the time of Passover, and Paul uses both that and the associated Feast of Unleavened Bread in 1 Cor. 5:7–8. Holy Week then climaxes on Easter Day, and Paul associates the resurrection of Christ with the firstfruits in 1 Cor. 15:20–23. It was on the day of Pentecost (the Feast of Weeks) that the Holy Spirit came in power on the disciples (Acts 2:1), and this is celebrated on Whitsunday. Thus far, it can be seen that the Christian faith follows the OT in linking its primary festivals, not merely with the cycle of the seasons, but with unique historical events. The historical dimension of the Feast of Tabernacles, however, has not been preserved in Christian harvest festivals. In any case, they are soon overshadowed by the additional festival of Christmas celebrating the historical birth of Christ.

24:1–9 The care of the tabernacle

In the holy place (i.e. the outer room of the tabernacle; see the diagram in Numbers) there were three items of furniture: the altar of incense, the golden lampstand and a small golden table. The lampstand is fully described in Ex. 25:31–39; 27:20–21; 40:25–26. The priests were to make sure that the lamps were constantly trimmed and kept burning (cf. 1 Sa 3:3). There was a practical purpose to this since the room would otherwise have been completely dark, but also probably a symbolic meaning related to the light of God's presence and salvation (cf. Ps. 27:1) and perhaps to Israel's role as a light to the nations (cf. Zc. 4; Lk. 2:32). On the table, twelve large loaves of bread were placed, in two stacks of six. A fresh batch was arranged on each Sabbath day and the priests ate what was removed. The twelve loaves probably represented the twelve tribes. It was this holy bread that the priest Ahimelech allowed David to eat because of his urgent need, a story which was used to powerful effect by Jesus (1 Sa. 21:1–6; Mt. 12:3–4).

24:10–23 The death of a blasphemer

This incident underlines the seriousness of the surrounding laws (cf. ch. 10). The surprising number of details about the man's identity show that this was not just a vague story, but a well-remembered event. His offence was that he blasphemed the Name (i.e. the personal name of God, Yahweh) with a curse (11). Misuse of the divine name and cursing God were strictly forbidden and were among the most serious offences against the very covenant itself (Ex. 20:7; 22:28). The preceding chapters show us that the offence was not merely a matter of casual foul language, such as thoughtlessly sprinkles everyday speech nowadays in public and on the media. The name of Yahweh had been repeated in almost every paragraph of the laws. It was his character that shaped the whole social system of Israel and his authority that stamped their covenant law. Thus, to blaspheme and curse him was in effect to repudiate his authority and to reject his law. It was a crime against the whole community who depended on God's continued protection under the covenant, and therefore set the offender outside that community. The death penalty in a sense sealed the offender's own decision.

The legal case gives the opportunity to express a legal principle, namely the so called lex talionis (16b–22) or law of retribution. The expression an eye for an eye has come to be used popularly for the supposed primitive, blood-thirsty nature of OT ethics. It is a most unfortunate caricature, since this was a very considerable advance in legal history, namely the removal of unlimited private vengeance and feuding in favour of a law limiting the penalty for any offence to strict and equivalent retribution. Serious offences (such as murder) were not to be punished lightly (e.g. if the offender were wealthy and influential), and comparatively trivial offences were not to be punished exorbitantly. And furthermore, as we have already seen, race or pedigree were not to make any difference (16, 22). All members of the community were to be treated equally by the same standard of justice. It is most likely that the phrases of v 20 were intended as a statement of principle through graphic illustration, rather than literally. Punishment and compensation were to fit the crime. Other laws show that some personal injuries were dealt with by compensation (e.g. Ex. 21:18–19), while in the case of a slave, bodily injury was remedied by giving the slave freedom—a quite unique law in the ancient world (Ex. 21:26–27).

While this law, applying strictly to the world of public legal action, prescribed careful attention to appropriate and equivalent punishment for offences (a concern that is permanently relevant in any society), Leviticus had already made it clear that holiness in the community means that people should not wantonly seek revenge for every wrong done (19:17–18; cf. Dt. 32:35; Pr. 25:21–22). It was, therefore, quite consistent with this when Jesus ruled that the law which governed court proceedings should not be the measure of personal behaviour among his followers (Mt. 5:38–42; cf. Rom. 12:17–21). His saying should not be misunderstood (as it often is) to be a criticism and rejection of OT moral standards as a whole, but rather a criticism of making minimum legal rights the criterion for relationships, even with those classed as enemies. In this, as in so many matters, Jesus restored the authentic voice, intention and balance of OT law (cf. C. J. H. Wright, Knowing Jesus through the Old Testament [Marshall Pickering, 1992], ch. 5).

25:1–54 The sabbatical and jubilee years

After ch. 19, this has probably been the most influential chapter in Leviticus, through its concern for economic and social justice, its influence on prophecy of the end times and on Jesus, and its use by certain strands of Christian social ethics. As much as ch. 19, it reminds us forcefully that Israel's passion for holiness was not confined to ritual and religious matters, but permeated the whole economic structure of life. It is a complex chapter, in which three distinct economic practices have been thrown closely together, along with parenthetical sections and exceptive clauses. These were: the sabbatical (seventh) year; the jubilee year (fiftieth); and redemption procedures (at any time).

25:1–7 The sabbatical year. This is an expansion of the fallow year law of Ex. 23:10–11. The land was to be allowed 'rest', like human beings with their weekly Sabbath, in the seventh year. The humanitarian motive given in Exodus has been expanded by the annual gleaning rights already prescribed in Leviticus (19:9–10; 23:22). The sabbatical year was further developed in Dt. 15:1–2 into a year in which debts (or more probably the pledges given for loans) were to be released. (On the relation between the sabbatical laws, see Wright, God's People in God's Land, pp. 141–151, 249–259.)

25:8–55 The jubilee. This is introduced as the fiftieth year to follow the seventh sabbatical year, though some scholars believe it was the forty-ninth year itself. It has also been suggested that it was a short 'year' of forty-nine days, inserted into the seventh month of the forty-ninth year, to bring Israel's lunar calendar back into line with the solar year. (See Wenham, Leviticus, pp. 302, 319.) V 10 presents the twin concepts that are fundamental to the whole institution, namely liberty and return. Those who had incurred debts were released from what remained unpaid (OT law assumes that every effort should be made to honour debts) and from any bondage which their debt had required. They were thus able to 'return' to full ownership of any land that the family had been forced to surrender to a creditor as guarantee for loans. The law had the effect, therefore, of reuniting the family on its ancestral land, not later than a generation after the original debts were incurred. It was these two components of the jubilee, freedom and restoration, that coloured the use of the idea of jubilee in prophetic and later NT thought.

13–17 The financial implications of a recurring jubilee are spelt out in these verses. Sale of a piece of land really amounted to a sale of only the use of the land. So an approaching jubilee diminished the cost for the purchaser, inasmuch as he was buying the number of harvests until the jubilee restored the land to its original owner. Do not take advantage of each other shows that the deal is actually between a creditor and one seeking a loan on the basis of selling some land as guarantor for it. The amount of the loan was thus governed by the number of years over which it could be repaid, up to the next jubilee. The creditor would schedule the loan in such a way as to recover all or most of it before the jubilee. Any outstanding debt would then be cancelled and the land returned to the owner and borrower. This arrangement made it in the interests of both lender and borrower to be cautious over the amount borrowed and would have made unscrupulous over-lending unprofitable.

18–22 This encouragement to observe the sabbatical regulations promises special blessing in the preceding year, in answer to a very natural question (20). The theological principle was that obedience to the economic legislation of Israel would require faith in the ability of Yahweh to provide through his control of nature as well as history.

23–24 These central verses in the chapter constitute a heading to the remaining paragraphs, which are primarily concerned with the economic redemption of land and persons, interwoven with the jubilee. Two vitally important principles are expressed in v 23. First, the theology of the land. As the divine landlord, God dictated how the land should be divided and used, which meant that Israel's system of land tenure had two marked features: fair distribution and inalienability. In Canaan the land had been owned by kings and their nobles, with the bulk of the population as tax-paying tenant farmers. In Israel the initial division of the land was explicitly to the clans and households within the tribes, in such a way that each received land according to size and need (Nu. 26:52–56; Jos. 13–21). The intention was that the land should be distributed throughout the whole kinship system as widely as possible. In order to protect this system of kinship distribution, family land could not be bought and sold as a commercial asset. It was to remain, as far as possible, within the extended family, or at least within the circle of families in the clan. It was this principle which lay behind Naboth's refusal to sell his patrimony to Ahab (1 Ki. 21).

The second principle of v 23 is the status of the Israelites as aliens and my tenants. These terms ('strangers and sojourners'; RSV), describe a class of people who resided among the Israelites in Canaan but were not ethnic Israelites (cf. Eph. 2:19). They did not own land themselves but survived by hiring out their services as residential employees (labourers, craftsmen etc.) for Israelite landowning households. Provided the household remained economically viable, its resident alien employees enjoyed both protection and security. But otherwise their position could be perilous. Hence Israel's law frequently requires fair and generous treatment for them.

The Israelites were to regard their status before God as analogous to that of their own residential dependents to themselves. Thus, they had no ultimate title to the land—it was owned by God. Nevertheless, they could enjoy secure benefits of it under his protection and in dependence on him. So the terms are not (as they might sound in English, especially with the unwarranted insertion of but in the NIV) a denial of rights, but rather an affirmation of a relationship of protected dependency. The practical effect of this model for Israel's relationship with God is seen in vs 35, 40 and 53. If all Israelites share this same status before God, then the impoverished or indebted brother is to be regarded and treated in the same way as God regards and treats all Israel, i.e. with generosity and redemptive action.

25–55 These verses contain the practical details of redemption and jubilee. There are three descending stages of poverty with required responses, each introduced by the phrase if one of your countrymen becomes poor (25–28, 35–38, 39–43 + 47–53). These are interrupted by sections dealing with houses in cities and Levite properties (29–34) and non-Israelite slaves (44–46).

The first response was redemption (25–28). Initially, the Israelite landowner who was in economic difficulties, would sell, or offer to sell, some of his land. To keep it within the family, it was first of all the duty of the nearest kinsman either to buy it (if it was still on offer, e.g. Je. 32) or to redeem it (if it had been sold, e.g. Ru. 4). Secondly, the seller retained the right to redeem it for himself, if he later recovered the means to do so. Thirdly, and in any case, the property, whether sold or redeemed by a kinsman, reverted to the original family in the year of jubilee. Houses in cities were exempt from normal redemption and jubilee rules, since they were not part of the economic productive base for a family. This exception did not apply to the property of Levites, since they had no tribal lands (29–34).

If the poorer brother's plight worsened, presumably even after several such sales of land, it then became the duty of the kinsman to maintain him as a dependent labourer, by means of interest-free loans (35–38).

In the event of a total economic collapse, such that the poorer kinsman had no more land left to sell or pledge for loans, he and his whole family could sell themselves to the wealthier kinsman, i.e. enter into bonded service to him. The debtor Israelite was not to be treated like a slave, but rather as a resident employee. This undesirable state of affairs was to continue only until the next jubilee, i.e. not more than one more generation. Then the debtor and/or his children (the original debtor may have died, but the next generation were to benefit from the jubilee; 41, 54) were to recover their original patrimony of land and be enabled to make a fresh start. This law was intended to preserve the viability of Israelite landowning households, and so did not apply to foreign slaves, who were not part of the land-tenure system (44–46). The OT had many other laws to protect the interests of such slaves.

If a man had entered this debt-bondage outside the clan, then an obligation lay on the whole clan (48–49) to prevent this loss of a whole family by exercising their duty to redeem him. They also had the duty to see that a non-Israelite creditor behaved as an Israelite should towards an Israelite debtor, and that the jubilee provisions were applied eventually.

Thus, the main aim of redemption was the preservation of the land and persons of the clan; whereas the main beneficiary of the jubilee was the extended family, or ‘father’s house’. The jubilee was thus a mechanism to prevent the accumulation of land in the hands of fewer and wealthier Israelites, and to preserve the socio-economic fabric of multiple household land tenure with the comparative equality and independent viability of the smallest family-plus-land units. The wisdom of all this in a day of take-overs, bigger and bigger conglomerates and monopolistic multi-national business seems very obvious.

The theological and ethical development of the jubilee

In the Old Testament. Although it is not known whether the jubilee was put into practice in ancient Israel (there is no record of it in the narratives, but equally there is no record of any observance of the Day of Atonement), the two main thrusts of the jubilee, liberty and restoration, were both easily transferred from the strictly economic provision of the jubilee itself to a wider metaphorical application. The idea of redemption and return are combined in the future vision of Is. 35, and put alongside a transformation of nature itself. The mission of the Servant of Yahweh in Isaiah has strong elements of the restorative plan of God for his people, aimed specifically at the weak and oppressed (Is. 42:1–7). Is. 58 is an attack on cultic observance without social justice and calls for liberation of the oppressed (v 6), specifically focusing on one’s own kinship obligations (v 7). Most clearly of all, Is. 61 uses jubilee images to portray the one anointed as the herald of Yahweh to ‘evangelize’ the poor, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and to announce the year of Yahweh’s favour—almost certainly an allusion to a jubilee year. Thus, within the Old Testament itself, the jubilee attracted a future imagery, but without losing its ethical challenge for justice to the oppressed in contemporary history.

In the New Testament. Jesus announced the inbreaking of the reign of God, in his own ministry. The ‘Nazareth manifesto’ (Lk. 4:16–30) is the clearest, programmatic statement of this, and quotes directly from Is. 61, which was strongly influenced by jubilee concepts. Almost certainly Jesus did not call for a literal jubilee in his own day, but there are also echoes of jubilee imagery, e.g. in the beatitudes, the response to John the Baptist (Mt. 11:2–6), the parable of the banquet (Lk. 14:12–24) and episodes of forgiveness and teaching on debts (Mt. 18:21–35). In Acts, the jubilee concept of final restoration is found in Acts 1:6 and 3:21. Significantly, the early church responded to this hope at the level of economic mutual help (Acts 4:34; cf. Dt.15:4).

Contemporary application. The jubilee still remains a powerful model in formulating Christian biblical ethics. Its primary assumptions and objectives can be used as a guide and critique for our own ethical agenda in the modern world.

Economically, the jubilee existed to protect a form of land tenure that was based on a fair and widespread distribution of the land, and to prevent the accumulation of ownership in the hands of a wealthy few. This echoes the creation principle that the whole earth is given by God to all humanity, who act as co-stewards of its resources. There is a parallel between the affirmation of Lv. 25:23, in respect of Israel, that ‘the land is mine’, and the affirmation of Ps. 24:1 in respect of humanity as a whole, that ‘The earth is the LORD’s, and everything in it, the world, and all who live in it’. The moral principles of the jubilee are, therefore, meant to apply to all on the basis of the moral consistency of God. What he required of Israel reflects what, in principle, he desires for humanity—broadly equitable distribution of the resources of the earth (especially land) and a curb on the tendency to accumulation with its inevitable oppression and alienation. The jubilee thus stands as a critique not only of massive private accumulation of land and related wealth, but also of large-scale forms of collectivism or nationalization, which destroy any meaningful sense of personal or family ownership.

Socially, the jubilee embodied a practical concern for the family unit. In Israel’s case, this meant the extended family, the ‘father’s house’, which was a sizeable group of related nuclear families descended in the male line from a living progenitor, including up to three or four generations. This was the smallest unit in Israel’s kinship structure, and it was the focus of identity, status, responsibility and security for the individual Israelite. It was this that the jubilee aimed to protect and periodically to restore if necessary. Notably, it did so not by merely ‘moral’ means (i.e. appealing for greater family cohesion or admonishing parents and children), but by legislating for specific structural mechanisms to regulate the economic effects of debt. Family morality was meaningless if families were being split up and dispossessed by economic forces that rendered them powerless (cf. Ne. 5:1–5). The jubilee aimed to restore social dignity and participation to families through maintaining or restoring their economic viability. The economic collapse of a family in one generation was not to condemn all future generations to the bondage of perpetual indebtedness. Such principles and objectives are certainly not irrelevant to welfare legislation, or indeed any legislation with socio-economic implications.

Theologically, the jubilee was based upon several central affirmations of Israel’s faith, and the importance of these should not be overlooked when assessing its relevance to Christian ethic and mission. Like the rest of the sabbatical provisions, the jubilee proclaimed the sovereignty of God over time and nature, and obedience to it would require submission to that sovereignty, hence the year is dubbed ‘holy’, to be observed out of the ‘fear of Yahweh’ (12, 17). Furthermore, observing the fallow year dimension would also require faith in God’s providence as the one who could command blessing in the natural order (18–22). Additional motivation for the law is provided by repeated appeals to the knowledge of God’s historical act of redemption in the exodus and all it had meant for Israel (38, 42, 55).

To this historical dimension was added the recurring experience of forgiveness, for the jubilee was proclaimed on the Day of Atonement (9). To know yourself forgiven by God was to issue in practical remission of debts and bondages for fellow-Israelites. And, as we have seen, the inbuilt future hope of the literal jubilee, blended with an eschatological hope of God’s final restoration of humanity and nature to his original purpose. To apply the jubilee model, then, requires that people face the sovereignty of God, trust his providence, know his redemptive action, experience his atonement, practise his justice and hope in his promise. The wholeness of the model embraces the church's evangelistic mission, its personal and social ethics and its future hope.

26:1–46 Blessings, curses and promises

It was standard practice in the ancient world to conclude major legal documents, such as international treaties, with lists of the benefits that would flow from keeping them, and the invoking of curses on those who broke them. This common format is found here and in Dt. 28. After an introduction which reminds Israel of essential demands of the law (1–2), the chapter goes on to speak of the blessing that will accompany obedience (3–13), the disasters that will be the result of disobedience (14–39), and the long-term prospect of restoration even after judgment (40–45).

26:3–13 Obedience and blessing. It would be a mistake to think that the blessings and curses in this chapter were 'equal and opposite' matters of reward or punishment (as the NIV headings suggest). It is not the case that blessing would be 'earned' as a reward for good behaviour, in the same way that the disasters would be deserved as judgment. God's blessing did not have to be earned by Israel. It was already there, promised and intrinsic to the covenant relationship—in Israel's title deeds, so to speak—since God's covenant with Abraham. But that blessing could be experienced in its fulness only as Israel lived in accordance with the covenant. Otherwise it would be withdrawn, and the withholding of God's blessing would expose Israel to the hazards of a cursed earth and human wickedness.

Four elements make up the promised blessing: rain and good harvests (3–5); peace and security (6–8); numerical increase (9); and the dwelling place of God in their midst (11–13). These are really the same as the blessings of the covenant with Abraham (Gn. 12:1–3), with some extra local colour. God had promised Abraham that he would have a multitude of descendants; that they would have a land (but that would be futile without rain, harvests and security); and above all, that they would enjoy a possessive relationship of blessing with God. These verses not only echo the Abraham covenant, but also the covenant with Noah (Gn. 8:21–9:17) and even recall the garden of Eden. I will walk among you, uses the same, unusual form of the word used to describe God walking companionably with Adam and Eve (Gn. 3:8; cf. 5:22, 24; 6:9; 17:1). It was for the restoration of such intimacy with God, for the joy of living with God in God's good earth, that God had redeemed them in the great exodus event, which was itself a proof of his covenant faithfulness (13).

26:14–39 Disobedience and curses. As was customary in such documents, the list of curses is longer. It is substantially a description of the reversal or withdrawal of God's blessing, with disastrous results. The sequence of horrors was well known in the ancient world: disease (16), defeat (17), drought (18–20), wild animals (21–22), war, plague and famine (23–31), devastation, scattering and deportation (27–39). Such things are common in the world of natural and humanly inflicted disasters. But in this context of Israel's covenant with God, they were the vehicle of God's punishment (cf. v 25). It was on this basis that the prophets could interpret events of their day which fitted such a pattern as evidence of a broken covenant and God's wrath. But the prophets also realized that the purpose of such punishment was ultimately to draw Israel back to God in repentance (cf. Am. 4:6–12), and that hope also they drew from such a text as this.

26:40–45 Repentance and restoration. Biblical 'but ifs' are often rich in significance, and this is one of the most far-reaching. In spite of sin, judgment and exile, the future was not closed off (cf. Dt. 30:1–10). Israel's only hope, as they had known ever since the incident of the golden calf (Ex. 32–34), lay in God’s faithfulness to his own covenant, even as they stood among the ruins of their own treachery and failure. God had a future and a hope for them, which the prophets at the time of the exile drew from deeply (cf. Je. 29:10–14; 30–31; Ezk. 34:25–31; 36:24–38; 37:24–28). The reason for this, not expressed here directly but implicit in the reference to the Abrahamic covenant, was that Israel was the vehicle of God’s redemptive purpose of blessing all humanity. His commitment to Israel was because of his commitment to all nations. He would not utterly destroy them because he would not abandon his mission of saving the world. It is that connection between God’s faithfulness to Israel and the extension of salvation to the Gentile nations that led Paul to reflect deeply on this and other passages of restoration (especially Dt. 32) in Rom. 9–11. It is also in that wider context that we need to interpret the threefold promise of God that he would remember his covenant with Abraham (42), the land (42b–43) and the Sinai covenant (45). Not that God had ‘forgotten’ them. But just as he remembered Abraham and then took action to save Israel from Egypt (Ex. 2:24), so he would again act to save his people. Zechariah, father of John the Baptist, turned such thoughts into a hymn of praise as he stood on the brink of the climax of all God’s saving action (Lk. 1:67–79).

27:1–34 The valuation of vows and dedicated items

OT law nowhere commands the making of vows or the dedication of people or things to God (apart from the regular tithe and firstfruits and consecration of the firstborn sons). Special vows were entirely voluntary. What the law did insist on, however, was that people should not make rash vows or commitments and then fail to keep them. God should not be trifled with, and promises made to him must be treated as seriously as promises made to any human person. The principle is well summarized in Dt. 23:21–23. There was no blame in not making a vow; but to make a vow and not fulfil it was to incur guilt (cf. Ec. 5:2–7; Pr. 20:25).

This chapter, recognizing that people committed to holiness and striving to live according to the preceding chapters may be tempted to make over-enthusiastic or unrealistic ‘offers’ to God, tempers such enthusiasm with cool realism. Vows must be entered into only in full awareness of their costliness. It was possible to redeem a vow, i.e. literally buy yourself out of its consequences, but these regulations show that this was an expensive option. In some cases, a change of mind incurred a 20% surcharge on the value of the originally dedicated item.

The chapter deals with vows involving persons (2–8), animals (9–13), houses (14–15), fields (16–25) and then finishes with a few related rules (26–33). The basic effect of a vow or dedication was that the person or object was given over to God, which would normally mean that he, she or it was at the disposal of the priests and the sanctuary. Thus, a person who dedicated themselves, or a member of their family, would perhaps assist priests in those aspects of their duties which would not involve direct contact with the holy sacrifices. Animals, houses or fields would become part of the priestly income, especially if they were converted into their cash evaluation. The child Samuel was probably an example of this, and an illustration of the kind of circumstances that might induce such a vow (1 Sa. 1–2). If the person so dedicated did not wish to serve in such a way, he or she could be redeemed by paying a sum of money to the priests in lieu. The figures in vs 3–7 are substantial, not all just token values. They probably reflect the current market values that were put on the working capacity of slaves. That is, we should not imagine that human beings were given a cash value in themselves, but rather that the valuation was an estimate of the useful work they could have done. Characteristically, as in the sacrifice laws, provision was made for the poor (8).

In the case of land (16–25), a person could dedicate some of their own property to God, and if they did not later redeem it, it would pass permanently to the priests in the year of jubilee. God was, in any case, the real landowner. But a person could not permanently devote to God the land bought from another person (probably as a guarantee for a loan), since, by the laws of ch. 25, it did not ultimately belong to the purchaser. In the jubilee it must revert to its original human owner.

Although this chapter seems somewhat of an appendix, after the great climax of ch. 26, its concern with vows, dedication and devotion is not entirely out of place. Special or exceptional acts of dedication presuppose a general life of commitment of God. Vows do not make a person any more holy, but they may represent a specific commitment, a seriousness of response to the God whose character, demands and blessings have been so clearly presented in the rest of the book. In a Christian context, such commitment may take very different forms, but it can certainly include persons, possessions, property and land. There is no compulsion, but where promises or declarations are made, then God takes no pleasure in those who cheat (Acts 4:32–5:11; cf. 2 Cor. 9:7). Ultimately, any particular vow or dedication we may make flows from that total consecration of the whole of life to the service of God, which is the mark of every true disciple of Christ (Rom. 12:1–2).

Take my life and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to Thee.
Take my moments and my days;
Let them flow in ceaseless praise.

NUMBERS

Introduction

Title

English Bibles, following earlier Latin and Greek versions, call this book Numbers. This title was known from the second century AD and perhaps earlier. It indicates that the book begins and ends with a census of Israel and its priests (chs. 1–4, 26). Jewish tradition used other titles, taken from the opening words of the Hebrew text. These were, ‘In the desert’ (referring to the fact that the forty years of this history were spent in the desert); ‘And he spoke’ (some early Christian Fathers favoured this title as it emphasized that the whole book is about the word of God, Israel’s refusal to believe that word and God’s faithfulness to it); and ‘The fourth book of Moses’ (part of the Pentateuch, from Genesis to Deuteronomy).

Outline of the book

Numbers falls into three parts.

Preparation to go to the promised land (chs. 1–10). In this section Moses prepares Israel. The tribes are numbered, organized and purified, the priesthood is established, the tabernacle is consecrated and the Passover is celebrated. Every detail of this preparation is commanded by God’s word. Two aims are in view: to make Israel fit for the Lord’s presence and to prepare them to possess the land promised as their inheritance in God’s sworn covenant with Abraham. At the end of this thorough preparation, the people set out for Canaan, led by God’s presence in the pillar of cloud and fire over the ark of the covenant.

Journeying to the promised land (chs. 11–25). What should have been a joyful pilgrimage became a trail of discontent. As they journeyed the people began to grumble. When they saw the powerful nations of Canaan they refused to enter. In unbelief, they rejected God’s promise. Consequently, they had to remain in the desert and die there. Towards the end of forty years, they advanced towards Canaan again.

New preparation for inheritance in the promised land (chs. 26–36). After forty years, they reached the plains of Moab. The focus in this section is on the inheritance. The new generation was numbered and commanded how to allot the land and what offerings to make there. Thus they were made ready to inherit the promised land. The final preparations included the command that the land allotted to each tribe must never pass out of its possession; in this way the inheritance was guaranteed. Despite Israel’s unbelief, God was faithful to the purpose of his covenant.

Type of literature

It is important to know what kind of writing Numbers is. Indeed, this is a principle of interpretation: we must identify the type of literature of biblical books and their contents. The books of the Bible are not all the same. They consist of different types of literature: law, history, psalm, gospel, letter and so on. The different kinds cannot be read in the same way. For example, history is different from doctrine. Acts (history) records that Paul circumcised Timothy 'because of the Jews' (Acts 16:3). Yet by letter (doctrine), Paul teaches that circumcision is no longer required (Gal. 2:3; 5:2; 6:12–16). The distinction is important because we must obey doctrine and not necessarily follow the example of history.

In the book of Numbers we can see four main types of writing: narrative, law, administration records and speeches. If we extracted the narrative sections, we would have a continuous story of the events which happened. For example, we could leave out the details of the census and the laws about offerings and feasts and be left with an account of what happened to Israel at Sinai, in the desert and on the plains of Moab. This is the framework of the book (see Table 2). The main subjects of the laws are the priesthood (4:4–33; 8:6–26; 18:1–19:22), purification (5:5–6:21), offerings and feasts (9:11b–14; 10:1–10; 15:1–41; 28:1–30:16) and commandments concerned with the inheritance of the land of Canaan (27:8–11; 31:21–24; 34:1–35:34; 36:7–10). The administration records include lists of leaders (1:5–16; 13:4–16; 34:19–29), genealogies and censuses (1:20–46; 3:1–4, 17–29; 4:34–49; 26:4–51, 57–62), camp-site records (2:3–33; 33:1–49), lists of tribal offerings and tribute (7:12–88; 31:32–40, 42–47), diplomatic correspondence (20:14–20; 22:5–6, 16–17) and land boundary records (34:3–12). The speeches which are quoted include prayer (10:35–36), blessings (6:24–27), oracles (23:7–10, 18–24; 24:3–9, 15–24), vows (21:2), oaths (5:19–22; 14:20–25, 28–35), poems, songs and ancient sayings (21:14–15, 17–18, 27–30). Often these speeches bring out the significance of the events recorded in the narrative and can, therefore, be crucial in their setting.

Narrative framework

The laws, administration records and speeches all fit into the narrative which supplies a framework. The administration records form a natural part of the narrative. For example, the messages sent between Edom and Israel (20:14–20) help to tell the story of how Edom refused to let Israel cross its territory into Canaan. In fact, the administration records help to create the special character of Numbers' narrative.

It is less obvious how the laws fit into the narrative. Many readers have been puzzled why the laws are placed where they are. Nevertheless, there is a link and unless it is seen the book cannot be properly understood. Two examples of this can be given. First, the narrative of the Levite Korah's rebellion against Aaron (chs. 16–17) is immediately followed by laws reinforcing Aaron's high priesthood over the Levites (chs. 18–19). Secondly, the narrative of Israel's failure to enter Canaan because of their unbelief and God's oath that that generation will never enter (chs. 13–14) is followed immediately with laws which imply that Israel will one day possess the land (ch. 15). Those laws begin 'After you enter the land ...', and the offerings required are of flour, oil and wine, i.e. they are from the produce of the land. Thus, these laws show God's grace despite Israel's sin. The relationship between narrative and law is shown more fully in Table 2.

The narrative focuses on key speeches. Hebrew narrative tends to quote the words of the leading characters. Frequently, the climax of a story is expressed in a very significant speech. For example, the account of Abraham's trial of faith (when he was commanded to sacrifice Isaac) reaches its climax in the oath of God (Gn. 22:15–18). Such key speeches express the main point of the account. Numbers, like Genesis, quotes key speeches at crucial points in the narrative. These are shown in Table 3.

Table 3. Key speeches in the narrative

Part	Reference	Key speech
I. 1–10	6:24–27	The priestly blessing. This is given only after the camp has been ordered, the priesthood established and the camp purified.

	10:35–36	Moses' prayer. Rise up, O LORD! May your enemies be scattered; may your foes flee before you and Return, O LORD , to the countless thousands of Israel. This prayer of invocation sums up the point of 1–10. God is present among the hosts of Israel and he leads them forward to the promised inheritance in the land of Canaan.
II. 11–25	14:20–25, 28–35	The Lord's oath. Israel's unbelief in God's promise and their refusal to enter the land leads to this divine oath with all its terrible finality: not one of them will ever see the land I promised on oath to their forefathers.
	23:7–10, 18–24; 24:3–9, 15–19, 20–24	Blessings on Israel. Though in Balaam's mouth, the text makes it clear that these blessings are spoken by the command of God. They cannot be changed, nor revoked. These are extremely significant because Israel is on the verge of entering Canaan.
	25:12–13	Covenant of eternal priesthood. This is extremely important: Israel has overcome its enemies and yet it falls by its own sinfulness. In the grace of God, the means of overcoming sin is guaranteed: i.e. the priesthood.

III. 26–36	26:52–56; 33:50–56; 34:2, (3–12), 29	Repeated commands that the land must be allotted to Israel as their inheritance.
	36:7, 9; (27:7–11)	A final commandment: No inheritance in Israel is to pass from tribe to tribe, for every Israelite shall keep the tribal land inherited from his forefathers. This commandment embodies the purpose of God: All the land that you see I will give to you and your offspring for ever (Gn. 13:15) The promise of God to Abraham thus leads to the inalienable right of inheritance.

Important characteristics of the narrative

Much can be learned from the style and character of the narrative.

The narrative is not perfectly chronological

Numbers is broadly chronological. In places, however, the historical order is not followed. This is true particularly of chs. 1–10 which record the events of the first two months of the second year after the exodus. If we rearranged the text, the chronological order would be as follows: on the first day, the tabernacle was set up (9:15–23); for twelve days the tribes brought their offerings for its consecration (7:1–8:26); on the fourteenth day the Passover was kept (9:1–14); two weeks later, on the first day of the second month, the census was taken and the camp was purified (1:1–6:27); on the twentieth day Israel set out for Canaan (10:1–36). Numbers is not the only book in the Bible where the chronological order has been set aside for another arrangement. It seems to be the case in some of the gospels, for example. In such cases, there is a reason why the historical order has not been followed. If we can discover that reason, it will shed light on the author's purpose.

In chs. 1–10 the author seems to follow the plan of the camp. The camp was arranged in two circles: in the outer circle were the tribes and in the inner circle were the priests with the tabernacle in the centre (see on 2:1–34). This layout taught Israel that God should be the centre of their thoughts and lives. Above all else, Israel needed God to dwell among them (Ex. 33:3–16). They were to desire his presence more than anything (Ps. 42:1–3). By following the order, tribal camp (outer circle), priests' camp and tabernacle (inner circle centre), the author leads the reader into the centre. He does this three times. First, with the numbering of the tribes (chs. 1–2) and then the Levites (chs. 3–4) and secondly, with the consecration of the camp (chs. 5–6) and then the tabernacle and priesthood (chs. 7–8). Finally, approaching the time of setting out, first Israel keeps the Passover throughout the camp (9:1–14), then the cloud appears over the tabernacle (9:15–23) and then Israel sets out. The most important event, the manifestation of God's presence which actually took place before all the other events, is thus reserved till last. This delay creates a sense of climax and points out what is most important. Israel's desire is withheld until the last moment then, at last, the cloud descends and God's abiding presence is displayed to his people (9:15–23). Only then can they go up to Canaan (ch. 10).

It is interesting to compare Exodus and Numbers (Ex. 40 is parallel to Nu. 9:15–23). Exodus takes us from slavery in Egypt to Sinai and the glory of God's presence in the tabernacle and the cloud (Ex. 40). The climax is God's dwelling among his people as he promised to Abraham (Gn. 17:7). Numbers goes beyond that point to a new focus of interest, the inheritance in the land of Canaan. God leads Israel to the land promised in the covenant with Abraham (Nu. 10:29). The rest of Numbers is concerned with the inheritance lost by one generation but preserved for the next.

The narrative leaves much out

Numbers covers a period of about forty years. However, it does not record everything that happened in those forty years. There is a thirty-eight year gap between chs. 19 and 20 (Dt. 2:14; Nu. 21:12). The record concentrates on a few months of the second year and the fortieth year at the end; in between is an almost total silence.

Moses made a list of the camp sites (ch. 33). The narrative mentions only a few places on the journey (e.g. 1:1; 9:1; 12:16; 20:1, 22–23; 33:50; 36:13). Comparison with Moses' list confirms the gap in the narrative. Two episodes might have occurred in the intervening desert years: the stoning of the Sabbath-breaker (15:32–36) and Korah's rebellion (16:1–50). The former occurred 'in the desert', but this seems to mean the desert of Paran (15:32). The latter is not dated but it appears to result from the failure to possess the land (16:14), and we may reasonably conclude that this followed fairly swiftly (note 16:41 for instance). Israel remained at Kadesh for many days, enough time for these things to take place (Dt. 1:46). Even if they did occur later on the journey, the author is not concerned to tell us; on the contrary, he attaches them to the rebellion. Thus there is no record of the journey from Rithmah to Kadesh (33:19, 36).

The point is that the author focuses on three crucial phases: the preparation (chs. 1–10); the rebellion (chs. 13–19); and the end of the journey and new preparation (chs. 20–25, 26–36). Furthermore, his silence about the period spent in the desert is eloquent testimony that these were wasted years. Clearly the author has been highly selective, choosing carefully what to include. He wants us to attend to what he has recorded and ignore all else.

The narrative alternates between the word of God and the words of men

A stark contrast is drawn between the two. God gives his word, and obedience brings great progress. When Israel speaks for itself, however, we hear grumbling, complaining and rebellion, and this provokes the judgment of God.

In chs. 1–10, the directing factor is the word of God. Repeatedly we read ‘The LORD spoke’ (1:1; 2:1; 3:1; etc.). The Hebrew word ‘spoke’ as it is used here carries the sense of giving commandment, i.e. all was done ‘at the LORD’s command’ (3:39, 42; 9:18–23). The result was progress and peace. Throughout the book we should notice statements that ‘The LORD said’; these refer to the directing word of God.

In chs. 11–25 the picture changes completely. When the people start to speak, they complain against God. Murmuring characterizes the journey and repeatedly we read that ‘the people complained’. They grumbled about hardships (11:1), the lack of meat (11:4) and about the prospects awaiting them in Canaan (14:1–4). Miriam and Aaron opposed Moses (12:1); Korah and his followers opposed Moses and Aaron (16:2–3), soon followed by the whole community (16:41–42). Many years later they were still complaining, this time about water (20:2–3); and only six months before the end of forty years (21:4f) they were still complaining. Throughout the central section of Numbers (chs. 11–25), the word of God comes in response to the evil-speaking of Israel. We read that ‘the LORD heard’ (11:1, 18; 12:2). Although judgment fell, God’s word reaffirmed his will and provided for continued blessing.

In chs. 26–36 the word of God directs Israel and confirms the inheritance.

This alternating structure reveals a fundamental element in the theology of Numbers: God remains true to his covenantal purpose despite Israel’s repeated failure. Those who provoke him lose their inheritance. They lose their lives. Yet God remains faithful and his word constantly confirms that his purposes are unchangeable. We meet this throughout Scripture. Paul writes, ‘if we are faithless, he remains faithful—for he cannot deny himself’ (2 Tim. 2:13; RSV), and, ‘What if some did not have faith? Will their lack of faith nullify God’s faithfulness? Not at all! Let God be true, and every man a liar’ (Rom. 3:3–4).

orders for the land.

Geographical information

Numbers contains information about Israel's route as they travelled from Sinai to Moab (ch. 33). Consequently, many commentaries divide the book according to its geography, i.e. according to three main locations: Sinai, the desert and Moab (see Table 1 and map in Exodus). However, the geography does not determine the structure of the book. We have already seen that most of the journey is ignored. If we attach too much weight to the geography, the result may obscure the theological structure of the text.

Nevertheless, the geography does support the theology. Sinai was the mount of revelation (and the word of God directs, chs. 1–10). The desert wastes outside the promised inheritance are the setting for wasted years of spiritual barrenness and death (chs. 11–25). Moab was at Canaan's border, where Israel prepared again to receive the inheritance. However, Numbers is not a collection of isolated episodes, brought together because they happened on the same journey, or in the same place. Rather, the book presents a clear theology which the geographical information is designed to support.

Notice also that towards the end of the book Israel's camp sites are mentioned more often. This conveys the sense of rapid advance to that goal for which Israel has waited for so long. Their progress accelerates because the forty years' wandering is coming to an end. Every camp site is one step nearer the land. Excitement mounts as Canaan is approached (20:1–22:1; 33:1–50).

Place in the Pentateuch

Numbers is an integral part of the Pentateuch. It is united to the other books in two crucial ways. First, there is continuity in the history. Numbers follows Exodus and leads on to Deuteronomy. Exodus moves from Egypt to the first year at Sinai; Numbers covers the next forty years, moving from Sinai to Moab (surveyed in Dt. 1:6–3:29); Deuteronomy deals with the renewal of the covenant on the plains of Moab. There is continuity and development of laws and institutions. Exodus records the making of the tabernacle (Ex. 25–40); Numbers overlaps Exodus on the setting up of the tabernacle and contains additional instructions on transporting it (4:4–33). Other common subjects include the priesthood, offerings, feasts, vows and purification.

Secondly, there is unity of theology. The main unifying factor is God's covenant made with Abraham (Gn. 11–22). This is the foundation provided in Genesis and shared by Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy. This is why God delivers Israel from Egypt, meets them at Sinai and takes them through the desert to the plains of Moab. This is why there is a tabernacle and a priesthood. These fundamentals are now to be explored in a study of the theology of Numbers and its leading doctrines.

Theology and leading doctrines

There is one fundamental doctrine in the book of Numbers: the Abrahamic covenant. It undergirds the entire book. There are other leading doctrines, in particular, the word of God, faith and apostasy and holiness and priesthood. These are held together by the Abrahamic covenant which provides the organizing principle.

The Abrahamic covenant

God's promises to Abraham were framed in a covenant and confirmed with an oath (Gn. 12:1–3, 7; 13:14–17; 15:1–16; 17:1–21; 22:15–18). Such was the force of this oath that it is impossible for God to forsake his covenant promises (Heb. 6:13–18). This sworn covenant is firmer than the heavens and earth (Ne. 9:6–7; Is. 40:8; Je. 31:36–37; 33:25–26; Mt. 24:35; 1 Pet. 1:23–25). The same covenant was renewed with Isaac and Jacob (Gn. 26:3–5; 28:13–15). As the covenant is repeated a formula emerges containing four main promises.

1. The relationship with God. 'I will establish my covenant as an everlasting covenant between me and you and your descendants after you for the generations to come, to be your God and the God of your descendants after you' (Gn. 17:7; cf. Gn. 15:1; 26:3; 28:13, 15). God drew Abraham and his descendants into a relationship with him by an everlasting covenant (Lk. 20:37–38; Rom. 8:35–39). That relationship is given many names in Scripture: fellowship, sonship, being the people of God and eternal life (1 Jn. 1:3, 6–10; Rom. 9:4–6; 1 Pet. 2:9–10). God is our heavenly Father. The relationship is the fundamental goal of all redemptive history; it is the fundamental concern of the entire Bible.

2. The land. 'Go, walk through the length and breadth of the land, for I am giving it to you' (Gn. 13:17). Sometimes the borders of Canaan are marked out (Gn. 15:18–21), and at other times the land is described more generally as 'the land I will show you' (Gn. 12:1) or 'the gate of their enemies' (Gn. 22:17; RSV). There is no doubt that Canaan is specifically intended. Jacob and Joseph left instructions that they should be buried there (Gn. 50:5, 12–14, 24–25). Thus, the last words of Genesis refer to the promise of Canaan. But will Canaan be big enough for Abraham's descendants who will cover the face of the earth like the dust of the earth (Gn. 13:14–17)? The NT indicates that the promise was wider: 'Abraham and his offspring received the promise that he would be heir of the world' (Rom. 4:13). Genesis supports this. In the creation, God gave mankind dominion over the earth. Because of the fall, dominion was lost through the curse and death. God's covenant was his plan to redeem the creation (Rom. 8:18–23) and Canaan was but the firstfruits. The prophets and apostles spoke of a new earth and new Jerusalem descending to that new earth. Thus Abraham 'was looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God' (Heb. 11:10), and the OT saints 'were longing for a better country' (Heb. 11:16; cf. Jn. 14:1–4; Heb. 4:1–6).

3. The people. Abraham's descendants will become a countless multitude. 'I will make your offspring like the dust of the earth' (Gn. 13:16), 'I will make you into a great nation' (Gn. 12:2), 'I will ... make your descendants as the stars in the sky and as the sand on the seashore' (Gn. 22:17). This countless multitude signifies the redeemed drawn from all mankind (Gn. 17:4). John saw that this would be fulfilled at the end of time, exactly as promised to Abraham: 'and there before me was a great multitude that no-one could count, from every nation, tribe, people and language, standing before the throne and in front of the Lamb' (Rev. 7:9). Again, the covenant has a universal scope, concerning every nation, though not every individual.

4. The nations blessed in Abraham's seed. The Hebrew word 'seed' ('offspring', Gn. 22:18 but see the NIV mg.), can refer both to all descendants and to just one offspring. All nations will share the blessings promised to Abraham; his seed will bring this about. Here is the promise of Christ Jesus, Abraham's seed and the light of the world (Jn. 1:9; 9:5; Gal. 3:16). His earthly life and work were the means of drawing men to God (Jn. 3:14–16; 12:32). But further, all Abraham's children, who are Christ's brethren, must share his work; they become the means of blessing others from the nations. This is what Christ meant by 'You are the light of the world' and 'You are the salt of the earth' (Mt. 5:13–16).

The whole book is essentially concerned with the first and second promises above: that God might be with his people and that they might enter the land of Canaan. Chs. 1–10 is concerned first with God's presence with his people. This is Moses' prayer ('Return, O LORD, to the countless thousands of Israel'; 10:36) and Aaron's blessing (6:22–27). The people prepared for this by ordering and cleansing the camp. God cannot dwell with anything unclean (Ps. 15; Rev. 21:27). The priesthood was established in its ranks so that Israel might serve God. The tabernacle was set up for God's dwelling place. After every preparation was faithfully made, God revealed his presence: the cloud appeared over the tabernacle and led Israel forward. This preparation had in view the first promise: that God might be in fellowship with his people.

The second main concern springs out of the promise of the land. 'We are setting out for the place about which the LORD said, "I will give it to you."' (10:29). They journeyed to Canaan because God had sworn to give it to them. Although they rebelled and were forbidden to enter the land (14), the rest of the book shows that God had not abandoned his purpose. After forty years God again prepared them to inherit the land. Indeed, the key to chs. 26–36 is inheritance. However, the land was not to be possessed for its own sake. The land was the place where God could dwell among his people. The land without God was no inheritance at all. Everything relates, therefore, to the chief end of the covenant: to be the people of God, secure in fellowship with him.

The other two promises are far less prominent (see on 23:1–24:25). The main point is that the Abrahamic covenant determines the theology of Numbers. If that is not understood, Numbers remains a closed book.

The word of God

A leading doctrine in Numbers is the word of God. Chs. 1–10 emphasize that everything was done according to the word of God. While this happened, Israel enjoyed the blessing of God (6:22–27) and his presence (9:15–23; 10:35–36). Certain characteristics are prominent. First, the word of God is unchangeable. This was Moses' confidence when setting out from Sinai (10:29) and his refuge in difficulty (14:17–19). Joshua and Caleb's boldness in the face of fearful enemies came from the word of God, that he would give them the land (14:7–9). Secondly, the word of God is irresistible. The Israelites who refused to enter Canaan but later changed their mind were resisting the word of God. They perished for their folly (14:41–45). Later, Balaam was unable to resist God's word of blessing. He could not curse Israel but said, 'Even if Balak gave me his palace filled with silver and gold, I could not do anything of my own accord, good or bad, to go beyond the command of the LORD—and I must say only what the LORD says.' (24:13). When the word of God comes as oath, its unchangeableness and irresistible nature are emphasized (14:20–35).

Apostasy

The term 'apostasy' is rare in Scripture, but the sin of apostasy comes into sharp focus in chs. 14–15. Two passages combine to expound and warn against apostasy: the account of Israel's rebellion (ch. 14), and the following laws which differentiate between unintentional sin and defiant sin (15:22–31). The term ‘apostasy’ means lit. ‘standing away from’. The man who commits apostasy ‘stands away from’ his covenant relationship with God. It follows, therefore, that only those who are embraced by the covenant can commit apostasy. Esau did this when he ‘sold his inheritance rights’ (Heb. 12:16). The text yields an analysis of apostasy and the following elements can be noted:

1. Apostasy involves knowledge. Israel had seen the glory of God and his signs (14:22). They knew the promise that the land would be theirs (14:3). The spies had seen the land and knew that it was exactly as promised, that ‘it does flow with milk and honey!’ (13:27; 14:8).

2. Apostasy involves rejection. Israel refused to hear the voice of God (14:22; the NIV reads ‘who disobeyed me’, but the Hebrew text reads ‘and they did not hear my voice’). They rebelled against God (14:9) and rejected the land of promise (14:31). They rejected the good news brought to them by the spies (Heb. 4:1–2, 6).

3. There is no atonement for apostasy. Those who knowingly reject God’s covenant promise cannot go unpunished. Although God forgave and was willing to preserve the nation, he could not overlook the sin of those who had ‘treated him with contempt’ (14:23). There was no atonement for them; intercession would not prevail in their case. ‘Yet he does not leave the guilty unpunished’ (14:18, 22–23).

4. Apostasy leads to dispossession. The oath of God denied the people entry to the land (14:23, 28–35). At 14:12, after the words ‘I will strike them down with a plague’, the Hebrew text reads ‘and dispossess them’ (NIV ‘destroy them’). The point is that they would be disinherited, cut off from their covenant inheritance. Only Caleb and Joshua would inherit (14:24).

What caused this terrible sequence of events? Unbelief. After receiving precious knowledge, they refused to believe. ‘How long will they not believe in me, in all the signs which I have done in their midst?’ (14:11, translated from the Hebrew). Outward disobedience springs from an inward refusal to believe despite the tremendous weight of evidence. Consequently, they treated God with contempt (14:11, 23). The same elements occur in the law of 15:22–31 where they are presented in terms of a contrast drawn between unintentional failure and defiant sin.

Thus, Numbers provides an analysis of the terrible sin of apostasy. A whole generation failed to enter Canaan because of this sin. The essence of apostasy is rejection of covenant standing through unbelief. Knowing the promises and the power of God who confirmed them with an oath, Israel refused to believe. Thus despising God, they rebelled. Afterwards, they were unable to find a way back. There was no way to undo their sin. They could never enter the land. They were dispossessed and died outside the land of promise. It is no accident that the record of their apostasy closes with the words ‘and beat them down all the way to Hormah’ (14:45). The name Hormah was given to this place later (21:3) but the writer uses it now because it means ‘total destruction’ (its NT equivalent is anathema). The name signifies the opposite of covenant relationship. The author is making the point that Israel was surely cut off, as the Canaanites were later.

Table 5. The contrast between unintentional failure and defiant sin (15:22–31)

Unintentional failure (15:22–29)

Defiant sin (15:30–31)

1. No knowledge. Although the law is known, the failure to keep it is hidden

1. Knowledge. The Lord’s word is known to the man and he knows also that he is from the people (vs 22–24). The Hebrew word ‘error’/‘to err’ is repeated ten times.

acting contrary to it.

|--|---|
| 2. No rejection. There is no rejection of the commandment. The point of the language is that the sin is a mistake. | 2. Rejection. The sin is committed defiantly (Hebrew: with a high hand). The man defies God: he blasphemes (v 30). He despises the word and acts in outright defiance of the commandment. |
| 3. Atonement. Sacrifice is provided. The point is to make atonement for the people (vs 25–26, 28). | 3. No atonement. No offering is prescribed. On the contrary, his guilt remains on him . (v 31). |
| 4. Forgiveness. The promise is repeated: the community, or the individual, will be forgiven. | 4. Dispossession. The person must be cut off from his people. This is stated twice; the second time, the text is more emphatic he must surely be cut off (vs 30–31). |

Priesthood

Numbers contains instruction about the priesthood. The chief concern seems to be with the hierarchy. Aaron was the high priest, his sons were priests with him, and the Levites served under them (3:1–10). The hierarchy determined their service (4:1–33) with the priests having the holiest duties (they alone may enter the Most Holy Place, and even then, not every priest and not at all times). This hierarchy also determined the tithing system (18:8–32). Israel paid tithes to the Levites who in turn paid their tithes. Aaron’s family received a portion from the Levites’ tithes. The doctrine of priesthood is a means for teaching about God’s holiness and his mercy. On the one hand, God’s holiness is magnified by the distance set between him and even the majority of the priests. It is emphasized by the need for mediation. On the other hand, God’s provision of mediators is a token of his mercy. He provides the means for dealing with sins. Thus Israel may continue to be his people.

When opponents challenged Aaron’s high priesthood (and the leadership of Moses), God upheld his servants (chs. 16–17). The reason is clear. Their opposition challenged the authority of God himself who had set apart his servants.

Use in the New Testament

The influence of Numbers upon the NT is extensive and profound.

1. It provided principles which influence church order and ministry. The ordering of the camp (2:1–34) shows that God requires order, not disorder, in the churches (1 Cor. 14:33). The hierarchy of priests and Levites (3:1–4:49; 17:1–13) shows that ministers must not function without authority nor think too highly of themselves but be subject to one another (Rom. 12:3–8; see on 27:12–23; cf. 1 Cor. 14:32). The fact that there was no inheritance for Levites (26:57–62) shows that ministers of God should not have worldly interests but be devoted to God’s service (2 Tim. 2:4). Tithing (18:8–32) is behind the teaching that ministers of the gospel have the right to financial support (1 Cor. 9:3–14; Gal. 6:6; 1 Tim. 5:17–18). The seventy elders (11:16–30) provide a model for church councils (Acts 15), the association of local churches, unity of practice and mutual help (Col. 4:15–16; 1 Cor. 11:16; 2 Cor. 8–9). Korah’s rebellion (16:16–35) is also held up as a warning (Jas. 5:9; Jude 11). Daily offerings (28:1–8) are a model for continual prayer (1 Thes. 5:17).

2. A parallel is drawn between the journey to Canaan and Christian pilgrimage (this is the basis of 1 Cor. 10:1–13; 2 Cor. 5:1–10; Heb. 3:1–4:13). For example, the common experience of Christ and the promise (1 Cor. 10:3–4; Heb. 4:2), the complaints about bread from heaven (11:4–15; cf. Jn. 6:1–65, especially v 41), the refusal to believe the message therefore making God a liar (14:11; cf. 1 Jn. 5:10), deliberate sin which cannot be forgiven (15:22–31; cf. Mt. 12:22–32), the impossibility of repentance (14:39–45; cf. Heb. 6:4–20; 12:17) and sin for which we should not pray (1 Jn. 5:16). In essence, the NT takes the generation that fell in the desert as a sober warning of apostasy.

3. The high priesthood of Christ is compared and contrasted with Aaron’s high priesthood (Heb. 4:14–5:10; 6:13–8:13). Hebrews can hardly be understood apart from its background in Numbers. Similarly, Christ’s sacrifice is presented against the background of the sacrifices of the tabernacle (Heb. 9:1–10:18), e.g. the reference to the ashes of the heifer (19:1–22; cf. Heb. 9:13–14).

4. The NT draws several images from Numbers: the serpent lifted up (21:4–9; cf. Jn. 3:14), the trumpet call (10:1–10; cf. Mt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 14:8; 15:52; 1 Thes. 4:16; Heb. 12:19), the cloud and tabernacle (9:15–23; cf. Jn. 1:14) and the sacrifice of lambs (28:1–8; cf. Jn. 1:29).

5. The three great feasts (28:16–29:38) supply the framework for the three main events of salvation. Passover, Weeks and Tabernacles correspond with Easter, Pentecost and the second coming of Christ. Thus, Tabernacles prefigures the harvest at the close of the age (see on 29:12–38). John’s gospel is also oriented to the feasts.

6. Other elements of NT teaching are influenced by Numbers. The Day of Atonement (29:7–11), celebrated a few days before Tabernacles, emphasizes the need for repentance, without which a person will be cut off. Similarly, repentance is needed before Christ comes and ‘unless you repent, you too will all perish’ (Lk. 13:5; cf. Mk. 1:1–8). Balaam (chs. 22–24) is taken as a warning not to desire gain from wrongdoing (2 Pet. 2:15–16; Jude 11; Rev. 2:14). The purging of the camp illustrates the purity required in the church (see on 5:1–4). The Aaronic blessing influences the greeting in all of Paul’s letters and also the end of Revelation (see on 6:22–27).

7. Hebrews seems to have adopted similar structures to Numbers: pilgrimage to the land and the connection between the covenant word of promise and faith or unbelief. It shares a keen concern with other related doctrines such as priesthood and apostasy.

Authorship

Traditionally, as part of the Pentateuch, Numbers has been attributed to Moses. Moses is the central figure, the events took place in his lifetime, and the laws were given through him.

However, there are indications that Moses did not give the text its final form. Note the following points about Numbers, which take account of evidence from the rest of the Pentateuch.

1. Moses is referred to throughout as if someone else is writing about him (1:1 says ‘The LORD spoke to Moses’, it does not say ‘to me’). Furthermore, the text highly commends Moses (12:3). Would Moses praise himself?

2. The Pentateuch contains evidence that it was written some time after Moses’ lifetime. It records his death and the thirty days mourning (Dt. 34:5–8) and compares him with later prophets (Dt. 34:10). Numbers mentions that certain cities’ names were changed, which probably happened after the settlement (32:38, 42).

3. The Bible nowhere claims that Moses wrote the whole of Genesis to Deuteronomy. It does claim that Moses actually wrote down certain parts (Ex. 17:14; 24:4; 34:27–28; Nu. 33:2; Dt. 31:9, 19, 22). Later Scripture speaks of the ‘Book of the Law of Moses’ (1 Ki. 2:3; 2 Ki. 14:6; Ezr. 7:6; Ne. 8:1; 13:1; Dan. 9:11, 13). The NT regards the law as coming from Moses and refers to the Pentateuch as ‘Moses’ (Lk. 16:29, 31; Jn. 1:17). Moses is said to have written of Christ (Jn. 1:45; 5:46). Thus Scripture indicates that Moses wrote the law, a record of Israel’s journey, a song and prophecy of Christ (e.g. Dt. 18:15). It is scriptural, therefore, to speak of Mosaic authorship in these terms. Yet it is probable that Moses’ successors drew his writings together in the final form of the text as it appears today. Other biblical writings seem to have passed through a similar process (consider Is. 8:16; Jn. 21:24–25; Rom. 16:22); Hebrews, for example, was written by those who heard the apostles (Heb. 2:3).

Scholars have developed various theories to explain how the Pentateuch arrived at its final canonical form. These are outlined in the general introduction to the Pentateuch. In dealing with this question, it is essential to distinguish between the clear evidence of Scripture and what scholars make of that evidence.

Commentary

1:1–10:36 Preparation to go to the promised land

The first part of Numbers contains an account of the final preparation of Israel before they left Sinai and journeyed to Canaan. These ten chapters must be seen in their context within the Pentateuch. Israel stayed at Sinai for about one year (10:11; Ex. 19:1). A covenant was made (Ex. 20:1–24:18) and the tabernacle was built (Ex. 25–31; 35–40). At the beginning of the second year, there was an explosion of activity: the tabernacle was erected (Ex. 40:34–38; Nu. 7:1), priests were ordained (Lv. 8–10) and for twelve days the tribes brought offerings (7:1–89). Passover was kept on the fourteenth day (for seven days, 9:1–14), a census was taken and the tribes were organized around the tabernacle (chs. 1–4). During this time, Moses was receiving laws (Lv. 1–7, 11–27) and purifying the camp (5:1–4). After one month and twenty days, Israel was ready to leave for Canaan (10:11–12).

The following points should be drawn from the context of this section. The land was Israel's goal from the time of the exodus (Ex. 13:11). They were brought out of Egypt in order to go to the land and serve God (Ex. 6:6–8). After Israel sinned with the golden calf, God told Moses to go to Canaan without his presence (Ex. 33:3). Had Moses gone at that critical moment, Leviticus and Numbers would never have been written. Israel would have gone without any preparation, with no tabernacle, no priesthood, no commandments. In short, they would have gone away 'Godless' and entered Canaan (or not!) as a secular nation. This teaches that the preparation described in chs. 1–10 was for one purpose, that God might be with his people when they left Sinai. This set Israel apart from every other nation. It would have been a curse of incalculable proportions for them to have left Sinai without God; they would have been like the Gentiles, 'objects of wrath' 'without hope and without God in the world' (Eph. 2:3, 12).

Thus, the preparation moves towards its climax. As Israel left Sinai for Canaan, Moses summed up the situation: 'Rise up, O LORD! May your enemies be scattered; may your foes flee before you Return, O LORD, to the countless thousands of Israel.' (10:35–36). God was with his people and led them forth in triumph to the land which he had sworn to give them. The sense of victory is overwhelming.

This section is written according to a scheme which is not perfectly chronological (see the Introduction). The structure follows the plan of the camp given in ch. 2. First, there is the numbering and ordering of Israel (chs. 1–2) and then the priests (chs. 3–4); secondly, the consecrating of Israel's camp (chs. 5–6) and then the priests' camp (chs. 7–8); and last, the final preparations and setting out (chs. 9–10). The details of the text should be understood as they are presented within this overarching scheme.

1:1–2:34 Israel numbered and ordered (first census)

1:1–3 The LORD commands Moses to number the people. The first words of the book, The LORD spoke, show that the word of God directed everything that was done in preparation for the journey (cf. 4:49; 7:89; 9:18–23). It has been explained in the Introduction how this book alternates between God’s word and the words of men. All was well as long as Israel followed God’s word. As soon as they began to speak, their unbelieving and discontented hearts were revealed and trouble came (11:1–3). Details of the Tent of Meeting or tabernacle are given in Ex. 25–31 and 35–40 (see on 4:1–33). This was God’s dwelling place in the midst of his people (Ex. 25:8).

We know already that approximately 600,000 men on foot left Egypt with women and children and Gentiles who had joined them (Ex. 12:37–38). Now a head-count is taken. The census followed certain principles. It respected tribal and family structures. Only males over twenty years old were counted. It seems that they became adults at the age of twenty (3). Women were not counted as they did not have independent status but belonged under the authority of father or husband (see on ch. 30). It is quite clear from this that the authority of man over woman was beyond question. Children were also kept in subjection to their parents. Israel was not a society of equals; such an idea is completely foreign to the Bible. Among the men, leaders were identified; and among the Levites, we find a hierarchy. God requires people to respect the differences which he has put among them. This is true for the church today whose members have gifts that differ according to God’s gracious will (Rom. 12:3–8). However, this must not become an excuse for imposing man-made distinctions which are not of God.

Ex. 30:12–16 gives an idea of how the census was conducted: as they were counted, the Israelites crossed over a line and joined those already numbered among the people of God (see also Ex. 38:25–28). This is a graphic picture. The census lists resemble in some ways the book of life of which Moses speaks. How terrible to be blotted out of the roll of God’s people (Ex. 32:32–33; Ps. 69:28). The book of life is not mentioned many times in Scripture. It is later called the Lamb’s book of life. Anyone whose name is not written there will not enter the presence of God but be cast out forever (Rev. 13:8; 20:11–15). There is an analogy between Israel preparing for Canaan and God’s people today preparing for the kingdom that cannot be shaken. As the camp was purged of all the unclean (5:1–4), similarly only the pure will be recorded in the book of life and enter the heavenly city (Rev. 3:5; 21:27). One purpose of the census was to muster an army. This was to be the means of bringing the people into their inheritance in the promised land. Thus, the census immediately introduces the ultimate goal of Numbers, set by the promise of God. The word army also means ‘host’, a further reminder that God was keeping his promise to multiply the descendants of Abraham. There were already so many Israelites that the Egyptians were afraid of them. God’s promise was that they would become so numerous that they could not be counted. The census thus indicates that the promise had not yet been fulfilled. A greater census is thus foreshadowed, when all God’s people will be assembled to him (Rev. 7:4, 9).

1:4–16 The leaders of the tribes. The men appointed to number the people were tribal leaders, heads of families (4). Israel’s tribes were made up of clans and families (20). By appointing these men to conduct the census, God chose to respect the social order he had already created. Although God deals with people according to their position (e.g. teachers will be judged more strictly), nevertheless, this is balanced by strict impartiality. The Bible warns that God does not show favouritism, which some have learned to their peril (chs. 16–17; Lv. 10). The names which appear in the list of leaders are interesting. Eight names include the word El, which means ‘God’ (e.g. Elizur in v 5 means ‘my God is a rock’); others have the name of God, Shaddai, in them (e.g. Ammi-shaddai in v 12). None uses the divine name revealed to Moses at the burning bush; contrast later names such as Jehoshaphat (Yeho-shaphat) or Jeremiah (Jeremi-Yah). The name of God revealed to Moses in Ex. 3:13–15 is written in Hebrew using four letters YHWH. Since the pronunciation is uncertain, most Bibles tend to translate it LORD. The fact that none of the leaders' names is formed using this divine name indicates that the list is genuinely old. Notice that these leaders later brought the tribes' offerings to dedicate the Tent of Meeting (7:1–89).

1:17–46 The census. The large numbers are striking. Only seventy persons had entered Egypt (Ex. 1:1–5) but they had multiplied until even Pharaoh was afraid of them (Ex. 1:7–9). Even in the hardship of slavery, God was keeping his promise to make Abraham's descendants like the stars, impossible to count. However, after forty years, the second census revealed that their numbers had fallen from 603,550 to 601,730 (1:46; 26:51). This perhaps signalled that God's blessing had been withheld from the evil generation which perished in the desert. Nevertheless, they were not totally abandoned and when Moses reviewed the history, he was able to remind them, 'The LORD your God has blessed you in all the work of your hands. He has watched over your journey through this vast desert. These forty years the LORD your God has been with you, and you have not lacked anything'. (Dt. 2:7). Indeed, they had been fed with manna from heaven since the day they left Egypt (Ex. 16:35). Notice also that some tribes decreased while others increased, but Judah remained most numerous. Throughout Israel's history, Judah was favoured by God. From this tribe the Messiah would eventually come (see on 2:1–34). The census record follows a formula and the same words are repeated for each tribe. Each time we read that these men were able to serve in the army. Here is a reminder of obligation. The Bible always joins privilege to obligation. Entry into Canaan was the privilege; but as each man was counted and crossed the line, he knew that he was becoming a soldier (Ex. 23:20–33). Similarly, the responsibility to be spiritual soldiers is laid upon the NT church (Eph. 6:10–17; 1 Tim. 6:12; Heb. 4:11). No member is exempt from this duty. The way to the kingdom is narrow and difficult (Mt. 7:14).

Scholars have raised four difficulties with the large numbers reported in the text.

1. The problem of size. If there were over 600,000 fighting men, the whole multitude must have been more than two million persons. How could all these have survived in the desert for forty years? The reality of this problem was faced by Israel from the start (Ex. 16:3) and the provision of manna was remembered throughout history (Dt. 29:5–6; Jn. 6:31). Besides that, they left Egypt with flocks and herds large enough to make many sacrifices (Ex. 12:32; Nu. 32:16; 7:1–89), they drank water from the rock, and moved repeatedly to new sites. They also took the spoils of battle (31:25–54; Ex. 17:8–16).

2. Alleged inconsistency in Scripture. Some texts say that their numbers were small, the fewest of all peoples (Ex. 23:29–30; Dt. 7:7). Such statements do not contain head counts but are assessments designed to teach Israel humility—they did not merit God’s love. They are balanced by evidence that Israel was nevertheless a substantial force (Ex. 1:7).

3. The totals are all round numbers and therefore seem artificial. The text states that the men counted were ‘able to serve in the army’. It is possible that the men were placed in cohorts and odd numbers were left aside, but we must avoid speculation. We are simply not told why the numbers are round. However, one thing is clear: at this time Moses had organized Israel under ‘officials over thousands, hundreds, fifties and tens’ (Ex. 18:21). This may be the clearest reason why the census produced totals to the nearest hundred, fifty and ten.

4. The relatively few firstborn sons. There were 22,273 firstborn sons (3:43) but 603,550 adult males, a ratio of 1 to 27. If there were a similar number of daughters, the figures would suggest that families had fifty or more children and only one was ‘a firstborn’. Various suggestions have been made to resolve this problem, for instance, perhaps only those born since the Passover were numbered; or the household may have included sons, homeborn slaves and servants bought with money (e.g. Abraham's household in Gn. 14:14; 15:2; 17:13 included all these, but Isaac was Abraham's heir). The term 'firstborn' may refer to the one son who would succeed his father as the head of the household in due time. Other considerations might include the Egyptian policy of murdering boys at birth, but this happened many years before and failed to reduce Israel's numbers (Ex. 1:22).

Disturbed by such apparent difficulties with the large numbers, some have thought that the numbers are not actual but require interpretation, e.g. the term 'thousand' might mean a clan or group, not exactly 1,000 people. However, Ex. 38:25–28 does not favour such a view because it confirms the total of 603,550. Furthermore, in other places in Numbers where quantities or measurements are given, it seems that the figures quoted are intended to be mathematically accurate and consistent (3:21–22; 31:32–47; 35:4–5). Should we then take the census numbers literally? This is the natural way to understand a census (a head count) unless we discover strong evidence to the contrary. The four objections noted above must not be overestimated. The first two are not strong enough to overturn the literal understanding. We cannot be certain that the totals are round numbers, nevertheless, this characteristic might alert us to look for an underlying assumption taken for granted in ancient Israel not known to us. The evidence of Ex. 18:21 points to this. The fourth objection, that there are proportionately few firstborn, may point in the same direction. We must be careful not to reject a literal interpretation simply because we cannot fully understand it. One thing is clear. The text makes no attempt to reconcile these figures. It was not a problem to the author.

1:47–54 The tribe of Levi. Levi was one of the twelve sons of Jacob (Gn. 29:34) and was known for violence (Gn. 34:25–31; 49:5–7). The Levites' ferocity in a right cause singled them out as priests. Following the sin of the golden calf, they were ready to put about 3,000 of their own kin to death with the sword (Ex. 32:25–29). Now their separation to priesthood is confirmed. They were not to be numbered in the census nor serve in the army. Instead, they were put in charge of the tabernacle. This was a great task which left no room for any other duty. The apostle Paul applies the same principle to Christian ministry (2 Tim. 2:1–7). The Levites were not to camp with the other tribes but around the Tent of Meeting (53). The Tent is called the tabernacle of the Testimony (referring to the tablets of the Testimony, Ex. 34:29).

Although Israel was called to be a kingdom of priests, not all could approach the Tent. Only the tribe of Levi was called to this service. Anyone else (described in the Hebrew as 'a stranger' to the tribe of Levi) who dared to come near was to be put to death (51). God would never allow his holiness to be forgotten. His people are to fear him at all times with reverence and awe. Overfamiliarity with God is great folly and sin. Thus, Mt Sinai was not to be touched (Ex. 19:11–13, 21–24), and Moses had to remove his shoes at the burning bush (Ex. 3:5–6). We may be astonished that the beauty of the sanctuary was hidden from the eyes of almost all Israel. Even among the priests, the high priest alone could enter the Most Holy Place, and only once each year (Lv. 16:2). The NT uses this to show that Christ's high priesthood is far superior to Aaron's; Christ opened the way into heaven itself. Nevertheless, this does not remove the fear of God; on the contrary it is emphasized (Heb. 10:19–22; 12:18–29). The separation of Levi, however, did not reduce the number of tribes. Joseph's two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, formed two tribes to make the number up to twelve.

2:1–34 Arrangement of the camp. The order of Israel's camp was a concern of Almighty God. The apostles never lost sight of the fact that God is a God of order, not confusion (1 Cor. 14:33). The plan of the camp teaches three lessons. First, the Tent of Meeting was in the centre, signifying the presence of God with his people. God was keeping his word to the patriarchs to be the God of their children. Every eye should be upon him. This is a continuous theme of the Bible (e.g. Ps. 46:5, 7, 10–11) and its ultimate goal (Rev. 21:3, 22–23; 22:1–5). Through the incarnation, the Lord Jesus was also in the midst of his people. John uses the image of the camp when he says that Jesus ‘tabernacled’ among them (Jn. 1:14). The Lord promised his disciples, ‘And surely I am with you always, to the very end of the age.’ (Mt. 28:20).

Plan of the camp.

Secondly, as a lesson in God’s holiness, the tribes were kept at a distance from the Tent. We are not told how far away, but the space in between must have been wide enough for the whole Levite tribe. Later, when crossing the Jordan, Israel followed the ark at a distance of about 1,000 m (Jos. 3:4).

Thirdly, the east side of the Tent was the place of honour; Moses and Aaron camped on this side, facing the entrance (3:38). Judah, rather than Reuben, Jacob’s firstborn, was placed on the east. This meant that Judah led the march from Sinai to Canaan. On the march, the tabernacle was carried after the first six tribes, right in the middle (17), but the ark of the covenant went before them (10:33–36). After describing the arrangement of the camp, the text concludes with a summary: Israel was numbered, a host of 603,550 not counting the Levites, and all this was done by command of the Lord.

Notes. The twelve tribes. There are several lists of the tribes in Scripture (e.g. Gn. 29–30; 49; Dt. 33; Jos. 13–21; Rev. 7:5–8). These lists raise some interesting questions. For example, the order changes and sometimes a tribe is left out (e.g. Dan is omitted in Rev. 7:5–8, a point which Irenaeus noted in the second century AD). We find other lists in Josephus, the Dead Sea Scrolls and some other ancient texts such as the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs. Ezekiel’s vision of the restoration of Israel includes a list of the tribes (Ezk. 48), and the new Jerusalem is to have twelve gates, one for each tribe (Ezk. 48:30–35; Rev. 21:10–21). The Qumran scroll called the War Rule gives directions for ‘the unleashing of the attack of the sons of light against the company of the sons of darkness’. This shows the influence of the camp organization. In various ways, the preparation for the War resembles the preparation at Sinai.

The place of Judah. In the census Reuben is listed first (1:20), but Jacob had said that Reuben would lose pride of place and Judah would have his brothers’ praise, and that the Messiah would come from Judah (Gn. 49:4, 8–12). As history ran its course, Judah was elevated. Judah’s camp was on the east of the Tent. Judah brought the first day’s offerings when the Tent was dedicated (7:12). Judah was first to go into battle against the Canaanites (Jdg. 1:1). Judah received its inheritance first (Jos. 15:1) while Reuben’s inheritance was on the other side of Jordan. King David was from the tribe of Judah and Jerusalem was in the territory of Judah. The ten tribes of Israel went into captivity in 721 BC, but Judah was spared (see on 4:34–39). Our LORD came from Judah, ‘the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David’ (Rev. 5:5).

3:1–4:49 Priests numbered and ordered

3:1–4 The family of Aaron and Moses. The priesthood is a focus of interest throughout the book. Aaron and his sons, the anointed priests, who were ordained to serve as priests (3), held the highest office among the Levites (Ex. 28–29; Lv. 8–9). Fire from God had consumed their first offerings, a mark of acceptance (Lv. 9:23–24). Later, Elijah prayed for the same sign to show that God was still Israel's God and to confirm that Elijah was truly his servant (1 Ki. 18:36–39). Although Aaron and his sons held a place of great honour, we are reminded that Aaron's two oldest sons had died when they offered unauthorised fire (Lv. 10:1–4). This draws attention to the importance of divine authority, a prominent issue in Numbers.

God was determined to establish an authorized priesthood in Israel. Several times during the desert years, Moses and Aaron were challenged. Each time, God upheld them and rejected others (chs. 12; 16–18). Because of the absolute need for divine authority, the writer to the Hebrews stresses that Christ's high priesthood is lawful, for 'No-one takes this honour upon himself; he must be called by God, just as Aaron was' (Heb. 5:4). Christ did not appoint himself but was lawfully appointed by God, even though there had to be a change in the law, since Christ did not come from the tribe of Levi (Heb. 7:12). It is of ultimate importance, therefore, to know that Christ was appointed high priest by God. Furthermore, Christ is superior: he was appointed with an oath (unlike Aaron) and his priesthood is eternally effective because he lives forever.

The death of Aaron's sons teaches the further lesson that privilege brings responsibility. God's ministers have greater responsibility than the people. When Aaron's two sons were killed, Moses said, 'This is what the LORD spoke of when he said: "Among those who approach me I will show myself holy; in the sight of all the people I will be honoured."' (Lv. 10:3). Similarly, James warns, 'Not many of you should presume to be teachers, my brothers, because you know that we who teach will be judged more strictly.' (Jas 3:1). Thus, the Bible warns that before God men stand in mortal danger and his servants must take great care to obey him in every respect. (See 1 Sa. 15:19; 1 Ki. 22:28; Is. 6:1–7; Acts 5:1–11; 1 Cor. 11:27–34.) Luther taught the priesthood of all believers, that all Christians are to serve God in their lives (Rom. 12:1–8; 1 Pet. 2:9). In this matter, care should be exercised to observe proper distinctions, since Scripture has not removed the need for preachers and leaders to be properly called and appointed. They must still take care to serve him in the way that he has commanded (Rom. 10:15) to avoid the indictment, 'I did not send these prophets, yet they have run with their message; I did not speak to them, yet they have prophesied.' (Je. 23:21). Even worse will be the judgment of those who claim to serve Christ but are mistaken: 'Many will say to me on that day, "Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and in your name drive out demons and perform many miracles?" Then I will tell them plainly, "I never knew you. Away from me, you evildoers!"' (Mt. 7:22–23).

3:5–10 The Levites given to Aaron. The whole tribe of Levi was to assist Aaron in the tabernacle service. This is a very practical measure; many hands were needed to transport the tabernacle and its furniture. A distinction was maintained between the priests (Aaron's family) and the Levites (10). The priests alone could approach the sanctuary; anyone else would face death. This hierarchy was designed to elevate the glory of God. When some Levites did challenge this strict command, they forfeited their lives (16:1–33). In early NT times, the apostles appointed seven men to assist them, later identified as deacons (Acts 6). Thus, it became common to compare elders and deacons with priests and Levites. The levitical structure is summed up in v 9.

3:11–13 Levites taken in place of the firstborn. Although the Levites were given to Aaron and his sons, they belonged to the Lord. It was a principle that the firstborn (and firstfruits) were the Lord's (13). On Passover night, God had claimed the firstborn as his own (Ex. 13:1–16). Now the Levites are taken in place of the firstborn. This substitution may have assisted the transition from household sacrifice to national worship. In patriarchal times, the head of the house (men such as Noah and Job) acted as the family's priest (Gn. 8:20; Jb. 1:5), perhaps in time to be succeeded by the first son. Now that Israel was a nation, although some celebrations of faith continued within the home (e.g. Passover), there had to be a unified, organized sanctuary (cf. Dt. 12:5–14).

3:14–39 The first Levite census. The Levites were made up of three clans, Gershon, Kohath and Merari, each with its family branches. Every male one month old and upwards was numbered in order to match the Levites with the firstborn (40–51). The duties of each clan are summarized and further instructions are added later (4:4–33).

The Levites were also told where to camp. Aaron and his sons had to camp facing the door of the tabernacle on the east. They were priests and no-one else was permitted to approach the sanctuary (38). Among the Levites, the Kohathites had the most sacred task. They were directed by Eleazar, the chief leader (Heb. ‘prince of princes’; v 32). He would eventually become high priest in place of Aaron (20:26–28). The other Levites were under Ithamar (see 4:28, 33). The total of the three Levite clans adds up to 22,300, not 22,000 (39). However, 22,000 is not a round number because it is matched with the 22,273 firstborn, and falls short by 273 (43). Many scholars accept that a slight textual corruption probably occurred very early in the copying of the Hebrew manuscripts and the Hebrew letter ‘l’ was missed out (i.e. sh-l-sh ‘three’ became sh-sh ‘six’) and so 8,300 was changed to 8,600 Kohathites.

Plan of the Tent of Meeting.

3:40–51 Census and redemption of the firstborn. There were 273 more firstborn than Levites. Each of these had to be redeemed with five shekels of silver, thought to be equivalent to a labourer’s wages for almost six months. Redemption by paying a ransom was common practice (Lv. 25). The price was measured by an official weight, the sanctuary shekel (47; cf. Ex. 30:13). The priests probably kept a standard weight in the sanctuary to ensure that just measures were used (Lv. 19:35–36). This practical matter of love for one’s neighbour entered Israel’s faith: ‘The LORD abhors dishonest scales, but accurate weights are his delight.’ (Pr. 11:1; see Pr. 16:11; 20:23; Ezk 45:10). The Rules of Discipline of the Calvinistic Methodists or the Presbyterians of Wales (adopted in 1823) laid down the same principle for members: ‘That they be men of few words in buying and selling, ... not taking advantage of others’ ignorance to put two prices on the same thing; but, as far as they understand its value and the state of the market, asking and paying for all goods the due and proper price.’ (XIV). Just as the Levites were given to Aaron, so the redemption money was given to him and his sons.

4:1–33 Duties of the Levites. Levites from thirty to fifty years old were to do the work and these were numbered. The word work (4) can mean warfare, hard service or even trials.

Therefore, the age limit was a practical matter; God's servants must be physically fit for their task. Since the Kohathites would be in charge of the most holy things (3:31), they were now ranked before the Gershonites. In clear detail, they were instructed how they must keep the ark of the Testimony (always shielded or covered by the curtain of the Most Holy Place), the table of the Presence, the lampstand and the gold altar. All these items were of gold, with their utensils and vessels. Aaron and his sons had to cover these with coloured cloths before the Kohathites entered. Even when moving the Tent, the Kohathites were not allowed to see nor touch the holy things or they would die (15, 20).

The colours of the coverings are significant. Every piece of sacred furniture was covered in a blue cloth. Perhaps blue, the colour of heaven, was a reminder of the presence of God. When God revealed himself to Israel's leaders at Sinai, we read, 'Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and the seventy elders of Israel went up and saw the God of Israel. Under his feet was something like a pavement made of sapphire, clear as the sky itself' (Ex. 24:9–10). There was also a practical purpose in choosing blue cloth. It would distinguish the most sacred vessels from other things which were covered in scarlet or purple (4:8, 13). At a glance men would know what lay beneath that blue covering. Anyone who looked or touched would be without excuse and his death would follow.

The directions given to the Levites taught them to honour God. Each man was to carry out his prescribed duties and not exceed his authority. Among those who serve him, God will be glorified and feared. It has sometimes been asked, 'How can we reconcile this with God's love? Indeed, why do such fearful things not happen today?' Taking this a step further, it is asked, 'Is not the Old Testament rather imperfect?' 'Can this God be the same as God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ?' Such questions reveal a fundamental error in understanding the nature of God. The Old and New Testaments are perfectly consistent: our God is a consuming fire; he cannot be mocked (Acts 5:1–11; Gal. 6:7; Heb. 12:29). Although the love of God and his forgiveness are beyond measure, he will not permit men to dishonour him. His own glory is first; man's good comes second. It is the miracle of his grace that these two things are both satisfied in the work of Christ. An interesting discussion of this very point is found in the second volume of Iain Murray's biography of Dr Martyn Lloyd-Jones (I. H. Murray, David Martyn Lloyd-Jones. The Fight of Faith [1939–1981] [The Banner of Truth Trust, 1990], vol. 2, p. 319). This message causes those who loved the Lord to rejoice with trembling (Ps. 2:11). A second lesson is also taught. When the gifts of God's people are ordered as God has commanded, there is room for every gift. Each one, functioning in its proper place, serves the community. The apostle Paul impresses this point upon the church at Corinth. The church is like a body, in which the many different parts help one another and every one is needed (1 Cor. 12–14; Eph. 4:7–16).

4:34–49 The count completed. A total of 8,580 Levites were appointed to active service. It was evidently a major task to move the tabernacle and its furniture.

Note. The first generation of Levites would spend their whole life following these instructions as they journeyed through the desert. However, after Israel settled in Canaan their role developed. They lived throughout Israel (see on 35:6–34). When Jerusalem became the permanent site for the tabernacle (and later the temple), the Levite clans received new tasks. David put them in charge of music and other duties of the tabernacle; the Aaronic priests still presented the offerings (1 Ch. 6:31–49).

5:1–6:27 Consecration of Israel's camp

These chapters contain the first group of laws in Numbers. At first sight, the laws appear quite varied and unrelated: skin disease, fraud, adultery, Nazirite vows, and the priestly blessing. However, these laws are related to one another by a common theme, and they fit their context perfectly. The common theme is separation, from impurity and to the Lord, in order that the whole of Israel may receive the Lord's blessing. Now that Israel and the priests have been numbered and set in order, the next step must be taken: Israel must be purified before God's blessing and presence can be known. The consecration of Israel follows two stages. First, the whole camp must be purged (chs. 5–6); secondly, the tabernacle and the priesthood must be consecrated (chs. 7–8). The laws (5:5–6:27) emphasize the complete purity and dedication required and the great blessing which arises.

5:1–4 Sending away the unclean. This sums up the interest of chs. 5–6: the whole camp must be pure for the Lord's presence. The need for cleanness was made evident when Israel first came to Mt Sinai (Ex. 19:10, 14–15). Laws were given explaining what caused uncleanness, e.g. infectious skin disease (Lv. 13–14), bodily discharges (Lv. 15:2–25) and touching dead bodies (Lv. 11:39; 21:1–4). Infectious skin disease was traditionally identified as leprosy, but modern scholars think it refers to psoriasis or a similar complaint. Animals were either clean or unclean, and only clean animals were to be eaten (Lv. 11; see Acts 10:9–16, 28–29). 'Clean' and 'unclean' were legal terms symbolizing spiritual holiness and defilement. Therefore, God's holiness demanded cleanness, so that they will not defile their camp, where I dwell among them (3). Note that the command is comprehensive: in v 2 the word 'all' is repeated three times in the Hebrew (the RSV has 'every'), but this cannot be detected from the NIV translation.

The gulf between the holy and the defiled runs through the fabric of the universe. The two realms of light and darkness, the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of the evil one, are at war. The Abrahamic covenant divides between the holy people and the unclean nations, who are strangers to the covenants of promise, without God and without hope in the world. The polarity between the two kingdoms began at Gn. 3 (God drove out Adam and Eve because of the defilement of sin), and it will be seen at the end, when 'Nothing impure will ever enter' the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:27). Thus, 5:1–4 provides a sober forewarning of the final exclusion of those who are still in their sins (cf. Mt. 25:41; 2 Thes. 1:9–10).

It may seem severe and unloving to expel from Israel's camp those who were suffering from disease. However, we learn from this that God will not lower his standards to accommodate man. Certainly, he pities our weaknesses, but never by becoming anything less himself. He always maintains his own holiness and righteousness. He will never accept the impure into his fellowship (1 Jn. 1:5–7). God's honour was the chief concern and demanded their exclusion. How can such absolute holiness be reconciled with God's compassion upon sinners, the needy and the outcast? God shows compassion by giving men the way to remove their uncleanness and thereby remove the grounds for their exclusion. That way is Christ.

Another principle also emerges from this incident, that the good of the whole people takes priority over the good of individuals. The interests of certain individuals were not permitted to jeopardize the future of the nation. If the unclean were not put out, then all Israel would be defiled and God would never be among them. There is instruction here for the modern church not to harbour uncleanness. The church dare not entertain evil and accommodate the sins of various minorities who insist on their own way, perhaps under a false claim upon love!

Note that the Gentiles were regarded as unclean, but in the New Testament they are no longer to be viewed in that way. The meaning of Peter's vision is that the Gentiles can now be brought into the church (Acts 10). Paul states that the children of a single believing parent are clean (1 Cor. 7:14). This cleanness, for Jew and Gentile alike, is gained by Christ (Heb. 9:11–14). He was crucified ‘outside the camp’ for this purpose (Heb. 13:12–14).

5:5–10 Confession and restitution for frauds. Stolen property must be restored (cf. Lv. 6:1–7) and one fifth added to compensate for the wrong. The underlying thought here is that stolen property contaminates the one who holds it. This interpretation can be established in two ways. First, the context links unfaithfulness with uncleanness (12–31), and secondly, there is the case of Achan who became ‘devoted to destruction’ by taking objects which were ‘devoted to destruction’ (Jos. 7). The practical consequences of fraud are not explored in the text, but there can be little doubt that such fraud would create serious breaches among the people of God and destroy their peace. The prophet Isaiah later portrays such strife as the uncleanness of running sores (Is. 1:5–6). Numbers here focuses rather on the nature of the wrong as unfaithfulness to the Lord, not just to man. The spiritual nature of fraud or theft needs to be understood. The man who steals from his brother takes what God has given to him, refusing to trust the goodness of God to maintain him in times of need and to enrich him out of his bounty. His unbelief leads him to hate his brother, to covet what he has and to steal it. He also reveals his heart, that his love is set not on God but on material things. Analysis reveals the depths of evil in the thief’s heart. Finally, we may recall Christ’s teaching that offerings are not acceptable if there are unresolved wrongs between people (Mt. 5:23–24). Note that the priest must function in dealing with this wrong and that confession of sin is required.

5:11–31 A wife suspected of unfaithfulness. This is another breach of faith, this time between husband and wife. In this case the husband suspects that his wife has committed adultery, which unfaithfulness causes uncleanness and destroys fellowship with God. If there were witnesses, the death penalty would follow (Gn. 20:3; Lv. 20:10; Dt. 22:22). But without witnesses, no judge could condemn on the grounds of mere suspicion. Where there is doubt, the matter must be left in the hands of God who knows all things. The priest had to follow a ritual, making the woman under suspicion take a curse upon herself. Her response, Amen, means ‘Let this come true in my case’ (see Dt. 27:14–26). If guilty, she would become a curse. The RSV translates v 21, ‘the LORD make you an execration and an oath among your people’. The thought that she would embody the curse was expressed in ritual (23–28)—the priest wrote the curse on a scroll and washed off the words into the water and the woman drank it. This was not magic, and there was no harmful substance in the ink. The writing materials were probably a leather scroll and ink made of lamp black or soot mixed in water with gum, materials readily available in the desert. The curse was powerful because it was uttered before the LORD (16), who knows the heart, and he would make the curse effective if the woman was guilty.

Note. The language of v 23 gives us insight into the meaning of later scriptures. We read that ‘Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us’ (Gal. 3:13); though not guilty, he suffered the curse in his own body. Similarly, Isaiah prophesies that the Lord’s Servant would be made ‘to be a covenant for the people’ (Is. 42:6; 49:8). Even as the Servant embodied the covenant, Paul is confident that all God’s promises are confirmed ‘in Christ Jesus’ (2 Cor. 1:20).

6:1–21 Nazirite vow. The Nazirite vow was a special vow (2), i.e. an extraordinary vow not to be taken lightly. It was assumed that the vow would last for a limited period. There were three marks of the Nazirite separation: abstaining from wine and grape products (3–4; Israel later sinned by giving Nazirites wine Am. 2:11–12); not touching dead bodies (6–8); and not cutting his hair (5). The first two conditions are like the rules for priests during their service. Priests should not drink wine, because they would cease to be vigilant in observing the law and teaching it (Lv. 10:6–11). The high priest should not even enter the place where a corpse lay, not even that of his father or mother, although the ordinary priests could attend to a close relative (Lv. 21:1–4, 11). Uncut hair was peculiar to the Nazirite and was the symbol of his separation to God (7). The word ‘Nazirite’ is related to the Hebrew term nēzer, which has two meanings, ‘vow’ and ‘crown’. Thus the Heb. text says the nēzer of his God is upon his head. This may contain a deliberate suggestion that the long hair which was a sign of the vow (nēzer) was like a crown (nēzer). If the vow was broken (e.g. if someone ‘dies on him’), he had to pay a penalty and start afresh (9–12). When the period of separation ended he had to shave his head and burn the hair in the flames of the fellowship offering (13–21). Samson was a Nazirite from birth (Jdg. 13; cf. 16:17–20), and Paul seems to have made such a vow (Acts 18:18; 21:20–26). The Nazirite expressed the highest form of separation to the Lord, apart from the priesthood. He was a token of Israel’s dedication to God. The law was clear that vows had to be fulfilled (Dt. 23:21–23; see Jdg. 11:30–39; Pss. 56:12; 65:1; 116:18; cf. Mt. 5:33–37).

6:22–27 The priestly blessing. The place of this blessing is appropriate. Israel had been set in order and consecrated to the Lord, and now God provided the blessing following their obedience. The blessing is not a thoughtless cliché which trips off the tongue; it is packed with meaning. It falls into six parts.

1. The LORD bless you. Blessing sums up the covenant benefits which God shows to his people (Dt. 28:1–14). Sons would expect a blessing from their father (e.g. Gn. 27:27–29, 38; 49:1–28). God’s blessing was given to Adam, whom Luke calls ‘the son of God’ (Gn. 1:28; 5:1–3; Lk. 3:38). Through Adam’s fall the curse came in (Gn. 3:14–19), but blessing was promised again to Abraham and his descendants (Gn. 12:1–3). Blessing entails fruitfulness (descendants, flocks, harvests), but these benefits are tokens of the true blessing, the relationship with the Lord. Only if God is our Father are we truly blessed (Gn. 17:16; 22:17–18; Lv. 26:3–13; Dt. 28:2–14).

2. And keep you. The purpose of the protection was to keep Israel in covenant relationship with God. The Lord was Israel’s keeper (Ps. 121:7–8; cf. Heb. 13:6). Christ, the good shepherd, kept his sheep and lost none except for Judas Iscariot (Jn. 6:37–40; 10:11–16; 18:9).

3. The LORD make his face shine upon you. His face means his presence, revealed in the cloud of fire (Ex. 40:34ff.); shine upon you means that God takes pleasure in his people and saves them (Pr. 16:15; Pss. 31:16; 67:1f.; 80:3, 7, 19).

4. And be gracious to you. The outcome of God’s pleasure is his grace; his covenant mercy. It is fundamental to salvation that God’s favour is unmerited. It is not deserved in any way; rather God shows mercy because of his own love and faithfulness to his oath (Dt. 7:7–8). This principle can be traced throughout Scripture (Ezk. 16:1ff.; Rom. 5:1–11; 9:10–13, 18; 11:5; 1 Cor. 1:26ff.).

5. The LORD turn his face towards you. This is more emphatic and asks that God might pay attention to Israel. It may reflect the fact that he had chosen them and not other nations. If God hid his face, Israel would suffer and perish (Pss. 30:7; 44:24; 104:29).

6. And give you peace. Peace means completeness and well-being. This has long been recognized as covenant language. Covenants were made to secure peace through a right relationship. But when God gives peace, it extends to the whole of life; even human enemies are quiet (Lv. 26:6; Pr. 16:7). These words were later seen as a promise of the Messiah, the ‘Prince of Peace’ (Is. 9:6), and find their true depths in Christ (Jn. 14:27; Eph. 2:14–18).

We should note two points about the form of this blessing. First, it is poetic, having three lines divided into two parts. Each line is longer than the previous one, making the blessing stronger and more emphatic. Secondly, it uses repetition. Twice it speaks of God’s face (presence); that we might enter the presence of God is the goal of all redemption. It repeats the divine name the LORD (Heb. YHWH) three times. Some think that this anticipates the Trinity (see Rom. 10:9; 2 Cor. 3:17). Scholars regard this as very ancient poetry. In 1979, two small silver scrolls from the seventh century BC were unearthed in Jerusalem. They were found to contain the words of Nu. 6:24–26 in a form almost identical to the Hebrew text.

The influence of these words runs through the Bible (Pss. 67; 121; 122; 124; 128). Paul's letters begin with a greeting which always uses the words 'grace' and 'peace' (e.g. Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; and 2 Tim. 1:2 adds 'mercy'). In most cases Paul says the grace and peace are from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, and without doubt he is taking up the priestly blessing.

God says, so they will put my name on the Israelites (27), which is a mark of ownership. This idea appears again at two key places in Scripture. First, in Isaiah's prophecy of Israel's restoration: 'One will say, "I belong to the LORD" ... still another will write on his hand, "The LORD's"' (Is. 44:5). This was a time of great blessing when Judah and Israel were restored from captivity. Secondly, in the final gathering of God's people, foreseen in Revelation: 'They will see his face, and his name will be on their foreheads' (Rev. 22:4; see 2:17; 14:1). The Bible closes with a glimpse of the final blessed state of the saints (Rev. 22:1–5), foretold in language that reflects the priestly blessing: 'no longer ... any curse' (Rev. 22:3; cf. Nu. 6:24, 27); 'the Lord God will give them light' and they will not need sun nor lamp (Rev. 22:5; cf. Nu. 6:25). Thus, these ancient words hold promise of that fulness of covenant blessing for which God's children in every age have longed, and which will be granted in its perfection on the day which God has appointed.

7:1–8:26 Consecration of the tabernacle and priesthood

The keynote of these chapters is holiness and purification. The tabernacle is sanctified and the priests are purified. All this is done with much shedding of blood.

7:1–89 The tabernacle consecrated. The language used here is precise: Moses consecrated the tabernacle (i.e. made it holy) and 'dedicated' the altar (1, 10–11). The word dedication occurs in only a few places in Scripture. Similarly, Solomon consecrated the middle court and dedicated the altar (2 Ch. 7:7, 9) but the occasion became known as the 'dedication' of the temple (2 Ch. 7:5). In the Apocrypha, 2 Macc. 2:19 reads, 'The story of Judas Maccabeus and his brothers, and the purification of the great temple, and the dedication of the altar.' This event is celebrated at the Feast of Hanukkah on 25th Chislev (December), a feast mentioned in Jn. 10:22. The consecration of the tabernacle was the first of such events. Israel's leaders brought gifts, sin offerings and fellowship offerings. These leaders are not named but the text says that they supervised the census (2). The census was actually taken one month after the tabernacle was set up (1:1) but the author has already told us about it. The same kind of anticipation is found in vs 6–8: carts and oxen were given to the Levites, who had not yet been ordained (3–4; 8:5–26). The gifts and offerings were brought in two stages. First, carts and oxen for the tabernacle (3–9); second, gifts of silver plates, bowls, gold dishes and offerings for the altar (10–88). The Kohathites were not given carts or oxen because these could be used only for the tent, not for the holy things, which the Kohathites looked after (9). When David brought up the ark to Jerusalem, it was placed on a new cart (2 Sa. 6:3–4). After Uzzah's death, however, we hear no more about a cart, only about 'those who were carrying the ark' (2 Sa. 6:13; 15:24). Uzzah's death caused them to discover exactly what the law required (1 Ch. 15:11–15). The record of the tribes' offerings (10–88) shows how repetitive Scripture can be (perhaps a reminder that it was not written to entertain, but for our instruction).

We may note in passing that Judah is again placed first (see on 2:1–34). By stating the offering of each tribe on its day, we see that their offerings were liberal and equal. The apostle Paul, collecting for the relief of the saints in Jerusalem, required the same kind of equality in the Macedonian churches: ‘Our desire is not that others might be relieved while you are hard pressed, but that there might be equality’ (2 Cor. 8:13).

The offerings for the dedication of the altar are totalled in vs 84–88. Rivers of blood were shed in those twelve days. Without the shedding of sacrificial blood, there could be no cleansing (Heb. 9:22). During those twelve days, other sacrifices were also made (e.g. when Aaron was ordained; Lv. 8–9). And before the twelve days were over, they were choosing the Passover lamb for slaughter on the fourteenth day.

The outcome of the dedication is presented in three ways in three parallel accounts (7:89; Ex. 40:34–35; Lv. 8–9), each account reflecting the leading interests of the book. Ex. 40:34–35 describes the cloud covering the tent and the glory of the Lord filling the tabernacle continuously, reflecting its theme of God’s glorious presence with his people. Lv. 9:23–24 tells how Moses and Aaron blessed the people and how fire came out and consumed the sacrifices, reflecting its theme of a priesthood acceptable to God. Here (89), the Lord speaks to Moses, reflecting Numbers’ theme of the word of God. However, Numbers does not ignore the other aspects. Indeed, the Levitical priesthood is the next concern (8:5–26) and then the cloud (9:15–23).

The focus of the first ten chapters is upon the word of God, and the text implies the great privilege of having it. God had favoured Moses uniquely by speaking to him face to face (12:6–8). Indeed, the Hebrew text does not even name God directly in v 89, but says that Moses entered the tent to speak ‘with him’ (the NIV adds the LORD by way of explanation). That God’s voice comes from over the atonement cover (traditionally called ‘the mercy seat’) on the ark of the Testimony shows that his word comes as a covenant privilege and displays his great mercy. Further, God speaks from between the cherubim, who in the beginning barred the way to God’s paradise and the tree of life (Gn. 3:24). God’s word is life; and this connection between the word of truth and eternal life is never lost, but it is most clearly displayed in the teaching of Christ in the gospels (e.g. Jn. 1:4; 6:63).

8:1–4 The seven lamps. These lamps were made on the pattern shown to Moses (4; Ex. 25:31–40; see Heb. 8:5) and had to face forward to light up the area in front of the lamp stand. In this position, they would cast light upon the table of the Presence with the twelve loaves. The lights had to be kept burning continually (Lv. 24:2–4). The seven golden lampstands are seen in John’s vision where they represent the seven churches (Rev. 1:12ff.).

8:5–26 Levites purified and assigned to their work. The Levites had to be ceremonially cleansed with the water of cleansing (lit.) ‘water of sin’ (7). The Israelites laid their hands on the Levites (10), and then the Levites put their hands on the sin offering. This was usually done with confession of sin, and it showed that the animal was a substitute (12). The basic meaning of laying on of hands seems to be ‘transferring’ a right or status to a substitute: transferring blessing to a successor (Gn. 48:14); transferring authority in ordination (Nu. 27:23); transferring guilt to a sacrificial victim. Ordination by laying on of hands was practised in the NT church (Acts 6:6; 13:3; also Mk. 5:23; Acts 8:15–18; Heb. 6:2). It seems to have implied participation with someone in his work, and hence Paul warns against haste (1 Tim. 5:22). The context of ch. 8 indicates that the Levites were Israel’s offering to the Lord (11, 15). They were separated to the Lord (14, 16) and replaced the firstborn (17f). Despite this emphasis, it is not forgotten that the Levites were also given to Aaron (19, 22). Finally, age limits are mentioned, from twenty-five to fifty years old (24–26). The census counted men from thirty to fifty years of age only (4:3; but the LXX reads twenty-five here also). In David's time, when the tabernacle was settled in Zion, the age limit was lowered to twenty years old (1 Ch. 23:24–27), although David counted only those over thirty (1 Ch. 23:3). This was followed in later generations (2 Ch. 31:17; Ezr. 3:8). Retirement did not mean removal from office. At fifty the Levite was to continue to function by serving his brothers. Generally, God's servants seem to have continued to serve him into old age, and till their death, according to the strength which he supplied (Dt. 34:7; 1 Sa. 4:14f.; 12:2; 2 Tim. 4:6–8; 2 Pet. 1:13–15).

9:1–10:36 Setting out for the land, led by the Lord's presence

9:1–14 The Passover. The original Passover marked Israel's setting out from Egypt. Now they celebrated its first anniversary before setting out from Sinai. We have already noted that the narrative is out of chronological sequence, and here the author wants to place the Passover just before setting out. Thus, he reminds us that God was still delivering and leading out his people. The problem of uncleanness which would prevent a man keeping the Passover is dealt with (vs 6–13; cf. Jn. 18:28). The problem was very serious: men who were unclean through contact with a corpse, could not join the people in bringing the Lord's offering. There was a real fear of being removed from the community. Therefore an additional law was given, that they must keep the Passover one month later. However, there is no reduction of the importance of the Passover as they must still observe the same rules (11–12). If, however, a man had no legitimate excuse and still failed to keep the Passover, he would be cut off from Israel. He would receive no forgiveness for wilful neglect of God's law. Weakness is helped; rebellion is never tolerated. There is also provision for the alien to participate but not in a casual way; he would have to be circumcised (Ex. 12:48–49). In this way, the Scripture anticipates the place of Gentiles in salvation. We may note how seriously the Scripture views the Passover. This became important for John, who interprets Christ's death as a fulfilment of the Passover in all its details (see Jn. 19:17–37). Indeed, John draws out the fact that this true Passover lamb of God would take away the sin 'of the world' (Jn. 1:29; cf. 1 Cor. 5:7).

9:15–23 The cloud. According to Exodus, the pillar of cloud represented the glory of the Lord filling the tabernacle (Ex. 40:34–38). Numbers, however, says nothing about the glory but is interested in the fact that the cloud led Israel forward. The passage repeats that Israel set out and encamped at the Lord's command, which was signalled by the movement of the cloud. There is also a development of thought through the repetition: the cloud was there from the beginning (15); it appeared like fire at night (16); it led Israel (17–18); the time spent at camp sites varied from a few days to a whole year, anticipating that Israel would spend a long period in the desert (19–22); and the text ends by emphasizing how Israel followed the Lord's command (23). The cloud appeared later when Solomon dedicated the temple (1 Ki. 8:10–12). Christ Jesus entered the cloud on the mount of transfiguration (Lk. 9:34) and again at his ascension (Acts 1:9). The images of the cloud of God's presence and the temple are brought together in the person of Christ. He is the temple (Rev. 21:22), and in him the fullness of God's glory dwells (Jn. 17:21; Col. 1:19). Through the presence of the Holy Spirit, believers become living stones in the temple (Jn. 7:37–39; 1 Cor. 6:19; 1 Pet. 2:4–5). Thus, God has seen fit to manifest his glory in the spiritual fabric of the church (Eph. 2:22; 3:10–11, 21).

10:1–10 The silver trumpets. This was the final preparation for setting out from Sinai. The trumpets were made from hammered silver. (Silver had been smelted and worked for centuries before this time.) Josephus describes them as a narrow tube about 18 in (45 cm) long, bell-shaped at the end, and they are shown on Titus' triumphal arch in Rome. They were different from the common ram's horn and could give a clearer note. Different trumpet notes called different assemblies (the leaders, the whole assembly, the tribes' setting out), and they were blown in warfare and at the start of great feasts. The trumpets were committed to the priests who had authority to lead (they also led through instruction). Israel's well-being was secure while the trumpet sounded God's call. Thus, the trumpet continued in use through the generations (2 Ki. 11:14; Ezr. 3:10; Ps. 98:6). The apostle Paul took it as a symbol of preaching, saying that the ministry must give a clear call (1 Cor. 14:8), otherwise men will not prepare for spiritual battle. As the trumpets were committed to the priests, so preaching is committed to God's servants, and to elders in particular (Acts 20:17–35; Tit. 1:5; Heb. 13:17; 1 Pet. 5:1–4). If the trumpet were to fall into impostors' hands, they would ruin the church of Christ, as savage wolves who will not spare the flock. The NT draws a second powerful image: as the trumpet summoned Israel to the feasts, so will the trumpet call the dead to life (Mt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Thes. 4:16; Rev. 8–9). The call to the feasts was a joyful sound (Ps. 98:6); so this image conveys the joy of the resurrection to eternal life and the table prepared in Christ's kingdom.

10:11–34 Israel leaves Sinai. This is the climax of the first part of Numbers (chs. 1–10). The whole purpose of the preparation at Sinai was that God could be present with his people and lead them to Canaan. New information is given about the order in which they journeyed: the tabernacle went after the first division, not in the middle with the holy vessels. This was, perhaps, a practical measure, so that the tabernacle could be erected before the holy vessels arrived at the new camp site. The ark led (33), with Judah as the first tribe (14) and Dan as the rear guard (25). Moses wanted Hobab, the son of Reuel, his father-in-law, to journey with them because he knew the desert terrain. Moses' words to him explained what Israel was doing: the reason for their journey lay in the promise to Abraham, and their goal was the promised land.

10:35–36 Conclusion. Moses' words express two key biblical themes: the victory of the Lord over his enemies; and the abiding presence of God with his people. These were displayed as the ark set out, and as it came to rest again in the centre of the camp. Since this was the supreme climax of almost one year's preparation (Ex. 19:1), we must pay careful attention to it.

The Bible often speaks of God's triumph over his enemies. In Eden, it was promised that the serpent, man's deadly enemy, would be defeated (Gn. 3:15). Babylon (which is the same as Babel) became the 'capital city' of God's foes, and Babel's tower was a symbol of united rebellion against the Most High (Gn. 11:1–9). Later, Babylon was the place where God's people were held captive. It was their hated enemy (Ps. 137) and was destined for destruction (Is. 13–14). In Revelation, God's victory is described as Babylon's fall, which is the cause of great praise (Rev. 12:7–17; 14:8; 17:4–6; 18:1–19:5).

God has sworn that every knee will bow to him (Is. 45:23). This will include all enemies, who will cower in terror rather than humbly bow in adoration but, nevertheless, they will bow the knee. The destruction of the kingdom of this world was determined in the eternal counsel of the Triune God, which took place before creation. Then, the course of history was ordained, which included spiritual warfare in heaven. By means of this plan, God will be glorified and shown to be above all, the almighty ruler of the universe. The Father will elevate the Son, and give him the highest name, and the Son will honour the Father. The goal is that God will be seen to be all in all. This plan entailed the creation, man's fall and redemption. It was not revealed at the start, but is slowly unfolding through historical covenants and through the course of redemptive history. It will be seen fully at the end of the age, when every creature will admire the depths of God's wisdom and mercy.

The second theme in Moses' words is one of supreme mercy and grace: God dwells among the countless thousands of Israel. This is the fellowship which the saints in every age have desired. This is the kingdom of God. Warfield writes that 'the establishment and development of the kingdom of God ... may well be called the cardinal theme of the Old Testament' (B. B. Warfield, Biblical Doctrines [Banner of Truth Trust, 1988, first published 1929], p. 11). Thus, the concluding words of the first part of Numbers draw us into the heart of the Bible's message. The second and third parts are primarily concerned with this same key theme, the entrance of God's people into the promised land.

11:1–25:18 Journeying to the promised land

The middle section of the book (chs. 11–25) covers the journey from Sinai to the border of Canaan, Israel's failure to take the land and the years of wandering in the wilderness. First, we read of Israel's rebellion (chs. 11–19); then we move directly to the end of the period, when Israel is again approaching Canaan, soon to possess it (chs. 20–25). This middle section is in sharp contrast with the first part. We move from God's word preparing the people, to their words of complaint and their refusal to believe and enter the land.

11:1–12:16 Complaining

The opening verse is very dramatic if read with what comes immediately before (10:35–36). Moses had just called on God to defeat his foes and remain with his people, and without interval, we read, Now the people complained about their hardships (Heb. 'evil') in the hearing of the LORD (1). The contrast with all the good that had just been done to them is stark. The wording in Hebrew is a deliberate contrast: they grumbled 'about evil' when they had received good. A prominent theme of chs. 11–25 is 'complaining'. The Hebrew text uses several terms; but the Greek Septuagint uses one, gonguzō (which the NIV translates 'complain'), a term used significantly by John and Paul (see on 11:4–15).

11:1–3 The first complaining at Taberah. The pattern of future complaining is established in this first short account: the people grumble; the Lord hears and his anger is provoked; Moses intercedes and the judgment is halted. Moses is often cast as interceding for them (as he did at Horeb, in the sin of the golden calf; Ex. 32). The punishment reminds us that our God is a consuming fire. Fire often symbolizes God's presence and activity (see Gn. 15:17–18, when the flaming torch passed between the pieces of animal; Ex. 3, at the burning bush cf. Heb. 12:29). The Israelites had already learned this in a costly way, in the death of Aaron's two sons, Nadab and Abihu (Lv. 10).

11:4–15 A second complaining. The Heb. for rabble gives the idea of a general gathering, and the Gk. translation (epimiktos) carries the sense of a mixed people. It probably refers to the Gentile adherents. Therefore, the text adds that the Israelites started wailing. Here is an object lesson that God's people can be influenced by those around them and led into sin. Their words show that they have despised the Lord, 'If only we had meat to eat!' (lit. 'Who will cause us to eat meat?'). Suddenly the text reads like a menu—fish, cucumbers, melons (5)—as the Israelites compare the manna provided by God with the variety of food available in Egypt. They had forgotten that they were delivered from the iron furnace and they despised the heaven-sent goodness of God. Ps. 78 describes Israel's sin at length (cf. Ex. 16:3); they had no faith, they forgot what God had done and they lied to God (Ps 78:22, 32, 36, 42). The heart of the matter is unbelief and forgetfulness, leading to discontent and complaining. Numbers gives an accurate picture of their behaviour. They went to their homes and they spread their complaints in their own families (10), which was totally destructive. By stirring up discontent in their own families, they were leading them to their deaths. We may note that the word ‘complaining’ is not very common in the NT, but John chose to use it for one specific situation—when Christ tells the Jews that he is the bread of life which came down from heaven, far superior to the manna (Jn. 6:35, 41–61). By ‘grumbling about him’ these Jews were repeating the sins of their ancestors recorded in Numbers—and the cause was the same, unbelief (Jn. 6:64). These examples are warnings to the church today (1 Cor. 10:10–11). Such grumbling can lead to a fall, and it can also destroy the faith of others. Perhaps many young people have forsaken the church, and even ultimately perished, because they heard complaining in their own home. It is a fact that evil speaking destroys those who listen to it. Numbers now exposes the burden which Moses felt (11), that Israel was like a child which must be nursed.

11:16–35 The appointment of the elders and the provision of meat. The problem was met with a double response. First, seventy elders were appointed to assist Moses. Jethro had already seen that Moses needed help and judges had been chosen (Ex. 18:13–26). Now seventy elders were established as a ruling council. These elders may have been those who ascended Mt Sinai with Moses, i.e. the chief men of the people (Ex. 24:9–11). Later in history we find similar ruling bodies, e.g. the Sanhedrin, mentioned in the gospels. Similarly, the Christian church soon called councils to address issues which concerned the world-wide church (beginning in Acts 15). Thus, Israel was governed by elders from early times. It was probably a natural development in a society in which the father was the head of the household and his household included servants as well as children. The rule of elders continued through the OT period (see Ru. 4:2; Pr. 31:23); it was found among the Jews in Christ’s time (Mt. 16:21; Lk.7:3); was adopted as the model for local churches by the apostles (Acts 20:17; 1 Tim. 4:14; 5:17; Tit. 1:5; Jas. 5:14; 1 Pet. 5:1); and, it seems, it will remain at the end of the age (Rev. 4:4; 19:4). These men were chosen in Moses’ day to act with Moses as God’s shepherds. The NT calls elders shepherds, who serve the chief shepherd (1 Pet. 5:1–4) and must give an account to him (Heb. 13:17). For this reason they should be obeyed. The elders were given to ensure that Moses did not carry the burden singlehanded, and this seems to be a pattern followed by later generations so that in the NT, it appears natural to think of churches led by a body of elders (or overseers; Phil. 1:1). The Lord placed his Spirit upon the elders who would assist Moses (24–30). The sign of the Spirit’s coming was prophecy, as at other times (1 Sa. 10:6–13; Joel 2:28; Acts 2:4; 1 Cor. 12:10). Throughout the Bible, the leaders of God’s people were enabled to function only by the Holy Spirit. The judges, Saul, David, the prophets, the apostles and the elders of the church at Ephesus are all examples.

Besides giving spiritual elders to Moses, the Lord dealt with the other side of the problem, the people’s complaining. Evidently, it seemed impossible to find in the desert enough meat to satisfy the people’s craving. (There were 600,000 men on foot; 11:21–22. Here is confirmation that the large numbers recorded in the census are intended to be taken literally; see on 1:17–46). Moses’ reaction is similar to the disciples’ at the feeding of the five thousand (Jn. 6:7). Whenever things are impossible to men, the Scripture gives the same answer: the Lord’s arm is not shortened! (Gn. 18:14; Is. 50:2; 59:1; Je. 32:17, 27). Nothing is impossible to God. The almighty power of the sovereign ruler of heaven and earth has always been a refuge to those who trust in him (see Dn. 1–6). God will display his power to confirm his word (23). The provision of quail is an example of God’s control over his creation. These birds belong to the family of pheasants and partridges. They winter in Africa and migrate northwards, usually in March or

April. In that year they were driven in great quantities to Israel by a wind. However, with this answer came wrath. As the people ate, they died of the plague. Thus, the first two places on Israel's journey were called Taberah ('burning' 11:3) and Kibroth Hattaavah ('graves of craving'; 11:34). The journey was becoming a trail of death. We do not know where these sites were, except that they must lie somewhere between Mt Sinai and Hazeroth (see on Nu. 33).

12:1–16 Miriam and Aaron oppose Moses. A third rebellion followed at Hazeroth, the next camp site. Moses had married a Cushite wife, probably Ethiopian (in Gn. 10:6 Cush means Ethiopia), and this was probably his second wife (his first wife was Zipporah, a Midianite; Ex. 2:16–21). Making this an excuse, Miriam and Aaron spoke against him. They desired equality with him as leaders of Israel. Miriam seems to have been the main culprit and she bore the punishment. It may seem strange that she, being a woman, should have challenged the authority of her brother. However, she was a prophetess and leader of the Israelite women (Ex. 15:20–21).

Again, we read that the Lord heard their hostile words. His response was to confirm his choice of Moses (6–8) and then to judge Miriam and Aaron (9–10). There are many parallels between Miriam's rebellion and Israel's craving for meat (ch. 11:4–35). On both occasions, God's provision (the manna; Moses' leadership) was rejected, and in response, God confirmed Moses' position (by giving him elders and by his word) and judgment fell (the plague; Miriam's leprosy). The author comments about Moses' humility (3). True humility consists in a commitment to obeying God's will to the point of self-denial. Such self-sacrifice can leave a man vulnerable and forced to cast himself on God to protect and sustain him. Further, as he strives to serve God, he discovers his own weaknesses and failings, and in that way reaches a proper view of himself. Humility is not a negative quality (devaluing of self) but a positive commitment to service, supremely exemplified in Christ (Phil. 2:3–8). Moses showed humility in continuing to lead Israel through the desert for forty years, even though it was a burden. He did not defend himself but turned to God, who defends and helps the humble (Pss. 147:6; 149:4; Mt. 5:5; 1 Pet. 5:6). On this occasion, the Lord left Miriam and Aaron in no doubt as he upheld his servant Moses. Thus, Numbers records three 'complaining' before Israel was half way to Canaan.

13:1–14:45 Israel rejects the promised land

The Desert of Paran lay south of Canaan and from here spies could survey the land. The journey had been a trail of complaining but, when the spies returned, Israel's rebellion was a final catastrophe.

13:1–16 The spies. The text begins with God's word. The command to spy out the land included a reminder that he was giving them the land and the time was near. Each tribe was represented by a leader. These were different from those who carried out the census and brought offerings when the tabernacle was dedicated. They were probably younger. Joshua, for instance, who was among them, was Moses' servant and a young man (Ex. 33:11; Nu. 11:28). Moses changed his name from Hoshea to Joshua, a change of meaning from 'he saves' to 'The LORD saves' (16). This is probably the first Israelite name in which the Lord's name was used. Its Greek form is Jesus.

13:17–25 Forty days of exploration. The spies were sent to explore Canaan's two regions, the Negev in the south and the hills to the north (17). They travelled as far as its northern boundary, covering the land spoken of in God's promise (21). That it was the season for the first ripe grapes (i.e. the end of July) indicates it was about two months after leaving Sinai. The spies travelled about 250 miles (400 km) northwards and did not return until mid-September. They visited Hebron (22), where the patriarchs were buried (Gn. 23:17–20; 49:29–

33; 50:13). Numbers tells us that Hebron was built seven years before Zoan (Tanis or Avaris), which was the Hyksos capital in Egypt, built c. 1700 BC (22). Perhaps the author of Numbers knew about Egypt's building of Zoan because Israel had been involved. Hebron was a powerful reminder of God's promise. But here, at the heart of Israel's goal, were the Anakim, renowned warriors (Dt. 9:2). They are even mentioned in Egyptian texts of 1800–1700 BC. Caleb eventually defeated them (Jos. 15:14; Jdg. 1:10).

13:26–33 An evil report. The spies' opening words give them away. The land to which you sent us has no mention that the Lord had sent them and no acknowledgement of his promise (cf. 10:29). They showed the rich fruit and confirmed that the land does flow with milk and honey. (This description of fruitfulness is used of the Galilee region in the Egyptian Story of Sinuhe.) This confirmed the exact wording of God's promise about the land (Ex. 3:8, 17). The spies, however, focused on the fortified cities and their powerful inhabitants, some of whom were like giants, and declared that conquest was impossible. Caleb had to silence the people (30). We learn later that Joshua was on his side (14:6). The people had already begun to complain again. It is a tragic irony that the spies were speaking of the very nations already named in God's promise to Abraham (Gn. 15:18). God had already indicated that the Amorites were 'filling up' their iniquity and were being reserved for his judgment, which Israel would execute (Gn. 15; 16).

14:1–10 The people rebel. The Israelites grumbled (i.e. 'complained'), and this was nothing less than rebellion (9). The nature of their sin is amplified through this chapter: complaining against the Lord (27, 29, 36); rejecting the land, which amounts to a rejection of the covenant (31); and turning away from the Lord (43). They questioned the purpose of God (3) and rejected Moses (4). Notice that their foolish wish that they should die in the desert (2) is granted (28). This reminds us of the later warning that men will have to give an account for every careless word they speak (Mt. 12:36–37). Joshua and Caleb were clear-sighted enough to understand the enormity of Israel's sin; they tore their clothes as a sign of their grief and anger. It is as if they were mourning for the dead. They reaffirmed their conviction that God would do what he had promised and lead them into the land (8).

14:11–25 The mercy and judgment of the Lord. The Lord's word begins with an accurate analysis of Israel's sin—it is unbelief. They refused to believe in God and treated him with contempt (11). 'Anyone who does not believe God has made him out to be a liar' (1 Jn. 5:10). Israel's real fault was to think that God was not able to keep his word. Faith is in essence the certainty that God will fulfil what he has spoken. The unbelief of Israel in this moment is in contrast with the faith of their forefather Abraham (Gn. 15:6). God's response is twofold: the NIV says 'I will strike them down with a plague and destroy them'. Destroy means 'disinherit', i.e. they would not receive the inheritance of the land. Moses interceded on the basis of covenant (16) and the mercy of God (18–19). He had stood on this very same ground when Israel made the golden calf at Horeb (Ex. 32:11–14). True prayer is of this character: it rests on the promises of God and asks that God will accomplish his word. This is what is meant by the prayer of faith; it is made according to his will (1 Jn. 5:14). The glory of God in the whole earth is bound up with his covenant and its fulfilment. The Lord's answer to Moses teaches us much about the heart of biblical theology. First, there is forgiveness, because of which God will continue with Israel as his people and work out his promise with the younger generation (24). Secondly, there is judgment. Forgiveness is never arbitrary nor at the expense of God's glory. His oath (21–25) shows that his own glory is his chief concern. Therefore, those who have despised him would never see the land. The next day, they had to return on their route, back towards the Red Sea. This was an immediate reversal of the progress made.

14:26–38 Death in the desert. A second oath followed the first (28). Every one numbered at Sinai who had complained against the Lord would die in the desert, as they had wished. Their children must endure the desert for forty years. We see here an instance of the sins of parents being visited upon their children. Forty years would pass before they would enter the land. Throughout this chapter there is constant reference to the covenant purpose, which is confirmed to the children (31), for God would give them the land. Finally, the congregation that conspired against the Lord would now experience his opposition (34). Punishment came swiftly, and the plague killed the ten spies who had brought Israel a bad report.

14:39–45 Some presume to enter the land. There was another lesson yet to learn. The people realized their mistake too late. They then wished to recover the position and proceed to attack the land. First, this is a case where repentance came too late. It recalls Esau's weeping after he had sold the birthright and lost the blessing. It was too late then (Heb. 12:17). Secondly, they were despising God's word again. He had commanded them to return to the desert (25). Therefore, when they went into Canaan, they went alone, and the Lord was not with them, the ark did not leave the camp (42, 44). Their very words 'We will go up to the place the LORD said' (40) show their lack of faith, making no reference to the oath sworn to the patriarchs. The text says that they were beaten back as far as Hormah in the Negev (its precise location is a matter of debate). Its name is connected with the Heb. word hērem ('devoted to destruction') a fitting conclusion to this appalling episode. (See on 'Apostasy' in the Introduction.)

15:1–41 Laws for the land: offerings and forgiveness

We return to the word of the Lord after the destruction of the rebels. Immediately there is comfort. Although the oath of God had closed the door to Canaan for forty years, the promise that Israel would live in Canaan was confirmed: After you enter the land I am giving you ... (2). Thus, the laws that follow are connected with what has just happened.

15:1–21 Offerings from the land. All offerings made by fire on the altar were to be accompanied by fine flour mixed with oil, and outpoured wine. The quantities are laid down for the different animals. An ephah was about 5 gall. (22 l.) and a hin was about 6 pt (3.6 l.). There is remarkable reassurance in this law. Repeatedly it speaks of an aroma pleasing to the Lord, implying that he would accept Israel again. The three elements, flour, oil and wine, were the chief agricultural products of Canaan. Indeed, since the spies had just visited the land and it was now about mid-September, Israel probably knew that the inhabitants were at that time gathering olive harvest, from which the oil would one day be taken. There is a principle of thankfulness in this law. Israel must return to the Lord an offering from the land which he had given to them in the first place. Such is the spirit of the law, the very opposite of grumbling and complaining.

The last part of the law is also remarkable (13–16). It reminds us that the community included strangers (aliens), and it makes room for them to offer sacrifices with the Israelites. They must also observe the same statutes and laws. This reflects the purpose of God's covenant with Abraham, that the nations would be blessed through his offspring (Gn. 12:3; 17:12). At a number of points, therefore, the law embraces the stranger, and in this way it respects God's promises. After saying this, God commanded Israel to bring an offering from the first of the grain harvested (17–21). This drives home the principle that God's people should offer to him first, before they satisfy their desires. These practices were to endure among the people of God (15, 21).

15:22–31 Errors and deliberate sin. The preceding laws confirm God's promise of Canaan, whereas this section addresses the obstacle of sin. There is a crucial distinction between unintentional failure (error) and defiant sin ('sinning with a high hand' is the Heb. idiom). Unintentional failure is sin committed without realizing it; it is done 'out of sight' (24) by the community as a whole or by an individual among them (27). For any such sin, forgiveness was available, and again this applied to the stranger also. Forgiveness applied where sin was not deliberate. No forgiveness was possible for any person who sinned defiantly (30–31).

The distinction contained here runs through the Scriptures. Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit cannot be forgiven in the present age or eternity (Mt. 12:22–32). This sin involves rejecting the witness of the Spirit to Christ. Indeed, Christ Jesus warned the Jews who did not believe in him that their guilt remained because they claimed to have knowledge (Jn. 9:39–41). Their sin was unbelief, a refusal to believe in the Son of God. Further warnings about the impossibility of being restored are found in Hebrews (Heb. 6:4–8) and John forbids us to pray for such a sin, which 'leads to death' (1 Jn. 5:13–17). This whole subject is of vital importance to the people of God in every age. It spurs us on to grow in faith, to 'put off the old nature' with its grumbling spirit and unbelief.

15:32–36 The Sabbath breaker. This record is placed here as an example of defiant sin. It does not state that the offender broke the Sabbath deliberately, but it is impossible to think otherwise as the whole community was resting. He must have known the Sabbath law, and the behaviour of every other person was surely witness enough. The sentence was certain death (35). The execution took place outside the camp. The assembly led him out, probably a symbolic demonstration of his removal from Israel (cut off from his people).

15:37–41 Blue tassels. These were a reminder to keep the commandments. It seems that they were worn on the four corners of the cloak (Dt. 22:12). The colour blue was chosen again. The curtain of the tabernacle which concealed the ark of the covenant was blue, and this may have been the reason why the cord had to be blue.

There is an interesting scene in the life of King David connected with this. Trapped by Saul in the caves of Engedi, David stealthily cut off the corner of Saul's robe (1 Sa. 24:1–15). David did this to prove that he was not seeking to kill Saul. His decision to cut off the corner of the garment may have been symbolic. Some suggest that it was a sign of taking away the kingdom. If the blue tassel hung from the corner of Saul's robe, it may have been a way of telling Saul that, in trying to kill David, he had forsaken the law of God. The wearing of tassels or fringes became a permanent feature of Jewish life, and the Pharisees liked to make their fringes long as a show of piety and to earn the praise of men (Mt. 23:5).

The concluding words offer a reminder of the fundamental purpose of the law: it was given because the Lord was Israel's God and in order that they might truly be his people (41).

16:1–17:13 Korah's rebellion and Aaron's priesthood confirmed

The text does not say when or where this rebellion occurred. However, there are indications that the rebels were dissatisfied because Moses had not brought them into Canaan (14). Therefore, this new opposition to Moses and Aaron may have arisen quite soon after the failure to enter Canaan. The main interest in chs. 16–19 is the high priesthood of Aaron.

16:1–15 The rebellion against Moses and Aaron. The rebels were led by men of high standing. Korah was a Levite of the Kohathite clan, which cared for the ark and the vessels of the sanctuary. The Reubenite with him also belonged to a noble family. They were joined by 250 princes of the community, who had been called to the council and were well known among the people. Their complaint was against the hierarchy; they were claiming equal status with Moses and Aaron. This, therefore, was a challenge to the order imposed by God at Sinai (chs. 3–4).

They were seeking the priesthood too (10). Moses' words, you and all you followers have banded together (11), contain a play on words. 'Banded together' is a Hebrew word connected with the name Levi. When Moses summoned them, the heart of their resistance spilt out. They contradicted the covenant promises of God in a double way (13–14): they described Egypt as the land flowing with milk and honey (a description which God had given to Canaan), and they complained that Moses and Aaron had failed to bring them into the promised inheritance.

16:16–35 Judgment on the rebels. The choice of priests was for God alone. Bringing incense symbolized coming to God's presence for his approval. Scripture compares the prayers of the saints with incense (Ps. 141:2; Rev. 8:3). When the tabernacle was set up, Nadab and Abihu, Aaron's two sons offered incense not commanded by God. They were not accepted and they died (Lv. 10). Therefore, Korah and his followers must have realized the seriousness of the situation as they drew near with their censers. Their danger became all too clear when the glory of the Lord appeared at the door of the tent, an ominous warning of judgment (cf. 12:5; 14:10). This image may have influenced James when he warns the church, 'Don't grumble against each other, brothers, or you will be judged. The Judge is standing at the door!' (Jas. 5:9).

The Lord did not acknowledge Korah's party. He addressed Moses and Aaron only. We are told later in the record that the elders were standing with Moses (25). The assembly was commanded to separate from the rebels' tents 'or you will be swept away because of their sins' (26). When the judgment came, however, it became evident that mere separation was not enough. They fled in terror (34), resembling Lot's escape from the ruin of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn. 19:17).

The judgment on Korah and his band of followers was immediate. The author's account of their deaths brings out the point that they were spiritually lost. Sheol swallowed them alive. Sheol ('the grave') was viewed as the abode of the dead beneath the earth. Their possessions perished with them, as happened to Achan when he took the spoils of Jericho devoted to destruction (Jos. 7). Finally, the text sums up that they perished from the midst of the community, implying that they had lost their place among God's people (33). The 250 supporters died as Nadab and Abihu had. Some scholars think that the splitting of the ground was a natural phenomenon, pointing to conditions in parts of the desert that would make this possible. Such explanations, whatever their substance, should never obscure the truth that God had judged the enemies of his servants Moses and Aaron.

16:36–40 Bronze overlaying the altar. Attention now moves from Moses to Aaron. From here to the end of ch. 19, the Aaronic priesthood is the key subject. The censers were hammered into a covering for the altar as a reminder that Aaron's sons alone should burn incense (see on 3:1–4).

16:41–50 The people grumble. The following day, the people showed that their hearts were with Korah. They speak of his party as the LORD's people (41). How quickly they forgot the fearful judgment that had fallen the day before. Indeed, it was worse than forgetfulness; it was a refusal to believe that God had done this. They blamed Moses for killing them. This is another instance of the unbelief of that generation. As before, the appearance of the cloud of glory signalled impending wrath. Although Moses seems to have interceded again (45), it was Aaron who made atonement to stop the plague. Aaron was thus acting as Israel's high priest. The fact that the plague stopped was a further sign that God had chosen him. There is a vivid picture of Aaron standing between the living and the dead, which should be remembered by all God's people for Aaron foreshadowed Christ, who is our high priest and stands between us and eternal death. By his intercession and atonement we are saved. The main lesson of the text here is to cleave to God's chosen servants. We can compare the early church, who were so devoted to the apostles' fellowship (Acts 2:42; 1 Tim. 4:16). The reason is clear: through the apostles' fellowship, they entered into the fellowship of God and Christ (1 Jn. 1:1–4). It is so today—we must enter the one fellowship through faith (see Jn. 17:20–23).

17:1–13 God's sign confirming his choice of Aaron. Israel's persistent unbelief and complaining was answered by a sign. It seems that signs were given not for believers but for the unbelieving and rebellious (10). For example, this was the purpose of the gift of tongues (1 Cor. 14:22) and the signs done by Christ (Jn. 6:30); and Ahaz would not ask for a sign because he would not test the Lord (Is. 7:10–14). The aim of this sign was to silence the constant grumbling against Aaron. It was actually the second sign, the first being the bronze overlaying the altar, but this sign was miraculous. The twelve staffs represented the twelve tribes (the Heb. word means 'staff, branch or tribe'). The staffs were placed, with leaders' names upon them, before the ark of the Testimony, in the very presence of God. Aaron's rod burst into life, sprouting with buds and blossom and almonds. This did not simply signify divine choice, but the nature of the sign expressed an abundance of life. The message was—through my chosen servant you will find life. This had already been experienced when Aaron stood between the dead and the living (16:48). The budding staff was kept through the generations (Heb. 9:4). It became a witness that God would confirm his word. Perhaps this lay in the background of later references to the righteous Branch (Je. 23:5; 33:15–16; Zc. 3:8; 6:12). Ch. 17 closes with the fear of Israel that they would all die because they could not approach the Lord. This is a confession: they need a mediator (as at Sinai; Ex. 20:18–21), and the laws which follow (chs. 18–19) are a response to this need. The same is true of every person, and the need is met, ultimately, only in Christ Jesus. This is made plain in Hebrews.

The message of chs. 16–17 is to insist that Aaron's high priesthood is respected. This is, first, an expression of God's holiness—he cannot be approached except by one whom he has called. This points forward to the new covenant—we can only draw near to God in Christ our high priest, whom God has appointed. Secondly, we learn that God will not allow his servants to be dismissed; he will uphold them. In the Christian age, he has appointed men to serve him. They are not masters but servants charged with oversight of the flock. These men are elders (which is the same office as bishop; see, for example, J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, IV.3.8; and Tit. 1:5–7). The church should respect these leaders out of reverence for Christ who has provided them. Their only mandate is to serve Christ, and they wield no authority other than his word. They bear tremendous responsibility, which can only be discharged through holiness, faithfulness and love. Although there is abundant teaching on this in the NT, its roots go down into OT texts such as this one.

18:1–19:22 The priests' duties

The next two chapters are a response to Israel's question, 'Are we all going to die?' The answer lies in the priesthood, in its duty (ch. 18) and its purifying of Israel (ch. 19).

18:1–7 Responsibility of priests and Levites. Rank and responsibility are combined. Aaron's family would bear guilt for any offences against the tabernacle and its service. The Levites were given to the priests to assist them, and together they would bear the guilt for any breaches (3). The Levites are said to be 'joined to Aaron'. The Heb. word 'join' comes from the same root as the name Levi. The Lord had made them a gift to Aaron. At the same time, the distinction between priest and Levite was maintained (7).

18:8–32 Tithes. When Korah, Dathan and Abiram tried to usurp Moses, he was insistent that he had not lorded it over them. In particular, he had taken nothing from them, not ‘so much as a donkey’ (16:15). Now, the Lord commanded that Aaron should have a portion of Israel’s offerings. This was an everlasting provision (19). This commandment is both righteous and practical. It is right that workers should receive wages. Even the ox must not be muzzled when it treads out the grain, such is God’s care for his creatures (Dt. 25:4). It is practical in that it ensured priests were able to serve full time in their office since they would not be anxious about their food. The tithing system is logical. Levi would not possess land in Canaan to cultivate and farm. Instead, God would be their inheritance and they would serve him without distraction, supported by tithes. Twelve tribes (600,000 men), each bringing tithes and offerings would maintain some 22,000 Levites (26). The people had received the land freely, and thus they paid their tithes from what God had first given. In their turn, the thousands of Levites must bring their tithes to the Lord. From their tithes Aaron’s family would take their portion (28). By this means, the priests would be well supplied.

The principle of tithing was not introduced by the law. Abraham had recognized this duty before the law was given. It is a principle of righteousness to return something to God from all that he has given (Gn. 14:20; Heb. 7:4). Later in history the Levites were neglected, and one of Nehemiah’s reforms was to re-establish tithing (Ne. 10:32–39). Malachi accused Israel of robbing God, through their unbelief. He challenged them to bring the whole tithe, after which God’s blessing would be so great that they would ‘not have room enough for it’ (Mal. 3:6–12). The principle of tithing was established for ever. Thus, as the Aaronic priesthood is fulfilled in Christ, there can be no doubt that the church’s tithes are his also. There is continuity in the NT. Paul defended his right to a living from the gospel (1 Cor. 9:3–14). If this commandment is despised the result will be neglect of the ministry, resulting in spiritual decline (Mt. 10:9–10; Gal. 6:6–7; 1 Tim. 5:17–18).

19:1–22 Water for purification. The law commands purity and holiness. Before leaving Sinai, Israel had driven out from the camp all unclean persons. At this point, a way of purifying from sin and uncleanness was provided. The reason for putting this law here is found in v 20: if anyone is unclean, he defiles the sanctuary. Thus, the concern is the same as in ch. 18: offences against the sanctuary bring wrath upon Israel by offending the holiness of God. The ashes of the red heifer must be mixed in water, and the water is then to be used for cleansing. This was not new. Moses had also mixed the blood of calves with hyssop, scarlet wool and water to sprinkle the people and the scroll of the covenant (Ex. 24:6–8; cf. Heb. 9:19–22). Hebrews teaches that sin cannot be cleansed without shedding blood (Heb. 9:22). Yet this sprinkling with the ashes of a heifer only cleansed the flesh; the blood of Christ cleanses the conscience (Heb. 9:13–14). If anyone neglected the water of cleansing, he would be cut off from his people. He would be deliberately spurning what God had provided, and thus committing wilful sin, done in full knowledge of God’s law. The same principle attaches to Christ’s sacrifice. If anyone refuses to believe in him, he is condemned already, because he has not believed on the Son of God (Jn. 3:18). He has turned his back upon the only means that God has given to remove his sins.

20:1–21:35 Journeying towards Canaan again

In the first month probably means mid-March. Thirty-eight years had elapsed and the fortieth year had come. We are not told this directly, but if we compare Moses’ list of camp sites (20:1 corresponds with 33:36, noting v 38), we can see that the author has passed over approximately thirty-eight years spent in the desert—silent testimony that they were wasted. By about October, Israel would cross the brook Zered, thirty-eight years after turning back from Kadesh Barnea in the desert of Paran (Dt. 2:14; cf. Nu. 14:25). Moses, and later Jephthah, reviewed this history (Dt. 2:2–15; Jdg. 11:15–27).

The fortieth year: reconstruction of the possible pattern of events.

20:1 Miriam dies. Later in the year, Aaron and Moses would also die. This marks the end of the generation that could not enter Canaan.

20:2–13 Complaining at Meribah. The desert years ended as they began, with complaining. It is possible now that the second generation was copying the ways of the first. Deuteronomy records how Moses warned them that they were hard-hearted and would soon depart from God. As in times past, the glory of the Lord appeared to confront the rebels. Moses and Aaron took the staff which had budded, the sign that God had commissioned Aaron (17:1–13). But Moses did not follow the Lord's command exactly. He did not speak to the rock but struck it twice, and his words suggest that he was bringing water out of the rock (10). Because he did not honour the Lord, he was not able to lead Israel into the land.

20:14–21 Edom refuses to let Israel pass. Israel began to come into contact with the nations surrounding Canaan. For centuries their history would be deeply affected by this contact, in both diplomatic exchange and warfare. Kadesh was situated on Edom's border. If Israel was to enter Canaan from the south, they had to pass through Edom. Notice how the text includes the messages between the two nations. Permission was refused.

20:22–29 Aaron dies. (cf. 33:37–39). The location of Mt Hor is uncertain, except that it was on Edom's border (Dt. 10:6 names it Moserah). Aaron's death occurred four months after Miriam's, around mid-July in the fortieth year (33:38). These deaths signified the passing away of the first generation. Moses, now left alone, must also die soon, since the forty years had run their course and the land must be possessed without him. Although this passage is marked by sadness, it also heralds the approaching entrance to the promised land. Eleazar takes Aaron's place.

21:1–3 Arad destroyed. Arad was a Canaanite city. These very people, with the Amalekites, had destroyed some of the Israelites about thirty-eight years earlier at the very same place, Hormah (14:45). Now they attacked them again. On this occasion, Israel relied on God. Israel's vow to 'devote them to destruction' was also in line with God's promises. These Canaanites were to be dispossessed.

21:4–9 The bronze snake. Unable to cross Edomite territory, Israel had to go around, which meant turning back towards the Red Sea (and this in the middle of the fortieth year). Impatience gave way to open rebellion once more and contempt for the manna which God had provided was again voiced. The fiery snakes may have been a kind of adder which is known in the sandy wastes of Sinai, and which is very poisonous. The antidote was to look at a bronze snake held up on a pole. Later, Hezekiah destroyed the bronze snake because it had become an object of idolatry (2 Ki. 18:4). The lifting up of Christ was compared to this incident in the desert, as those who look to him will live (Jn. 3:14–15). It seems that the means of deliverance in both cases was faith.

21:10–20 Journey to Moab. The pace of the story quickens. The tribes were on the move, speeding towards the border of Canaan. These are the last stages of the journey, and the author surveys them briefly and swiftly. The NIV has introduced a variety of language where the Hebrew is very repetitive. The Hebrew repeats ‘they set out’ and ‘they camped’ (21:10, 11, 12, 13). Looking back through the text, the same phrase ‘and they set out ...’ introduced the previous stages (20:22; 21:4). The repetition is a device to create a sense of haste. Israel was making haste to reach the land. This travelogue contains two quotations. The first is from an ancient record, the Book of the Wars of the LORD (14–15; cf. references to the Book of Jashar in Jos. 10:13; 2 Sa. 1:18). The quotation, as translated in the NIV, is an incomplete list of place-names. However, the Hebrew text may admit other translations (e.g. cf. AV). The LXX reads: ‘Therefore it is said in a book, a war of the Lord has set on fire Zoob, and the brooks of Arnon. And he has appointed brooks to cause Er to dwell there; and it lies near to the coasts of Moab.’

The second quotation is of a song. Israel now sang for joy as the Lord helped them on their journey. This fits well with the impression which the author is trying to create of rapid progress towards the goal.

21:21–35 Defeat of Sihon and Og. Israel was hemmed in between Moab and the Amorites (21:13). The way to Canaan was barred. The message sent to Sihon, king of the Amorites, was similar to the message to Edom (22; 20:17), and the response was the same: to muster an army and repel them. This time Israel did not turn away but defeated the aggressor and occupied its cities. Again, an ancient saying is quoted to mark this victory. The poets (27) is (lit.) ‘men who use proverbs’, and probably refers to the wise men of Israel, who summed up the situation in an enigmatic saying. Their words anticipated the coming defeat of Moab, whose god was Chemosh (29; 1 Ki. 11:33). Og, king of Bashan, was the next enemy defeated (32–35; a fuller account is in Dt. 3:1–11). After both victories, Israel occupied the land taken (25, 31, 35). More detail is given later about the occupation of Transjordan by two and a half tribes (ch. 32).

22:1–24:25 Balaam’s oracles

This section begins by recording the last stage of the journey, which left Israel encamped along the Jordan opposite Jericho, poised to enter Canaan (1; 33:48). Jericho would be taken first (Jos. 5:13–6:27). The events that took place on the plains of Moab probably covered the last five months of the fortieth year (mid-October to mid-March), and take in the rest of Numbers and the whole of Deuteronomy. Deuteronomy hardly mentions the Balaam episode (Dt. 4:3; 23:4–5).

22:1–20 Balaam summoned. Moab joined forces with the Midianites living in Sinai and east of Jordan (Ex. 2:15–17; Jdg. 6). Together they summoned Balaam from Pethor on the River (i.e. the Euphrates) to come and curse Israel. Israel was now at a crucial point, probably four months away from the end of the forty years’ desert exile. They were on the brink of inheriting Canaan when this deadly enemy was summoned. The crucial message of chs. 22–24 was that God would certainly bless his people and confirm his covenant promises with them. The account of Balak’s summons to Balaam drives home this point in three ways.

First, Balak’s message announces the issue at stake: Is Israel blessed or cursed? His words to Balaam, ‘For I know that those you bless are blessed, and those you curse are cursed’ (6) recall God’s promise to Abraham, And I will bless you ... I will bless those who bless you, and whoever curses you I will curse (Gn. 12:2–3; cf. Gn. 27:33). Thus, Balak’s words alert us to the fact that God’s covenant purpose is now on trial. Balak called the false prophet, renowned for the power of his curses, to contradict God’s blessing. The central message of these chapters is thus set in sharp relief: God’s blessing is irrevocable. The whole episode is important for this one reason: God’s blessing was confirmed in the mouth of a dreadful enemy (12).

Secondly, God forbids Balaam to go and curse Israel (12) or to say anything other than what he commands (20, 38). As Balaam rode to Balak, the angel of the LORD opposed him (21–35).

Thirdly, the certainty of God's blessing was acknowledged even by Israel's enemies (3–5, 11). In other words, Israel was already being blessed and was very numerous—exactly what God had promised. The security of the covenant blessing is thus hammered home throughout the episode. Balaam is regarded in Scripture as an evil man. The apostle Peter's verdict is, 'He loved the wages of wickedness' (2 Pet. 2:15–16; Jude 11). His desire for riches drove him to oppose God and his people. The text repeatedly mentions his fees for divination (22:7, 17–18; 24:11). When Israel took revenge on Midian, Balaam perished with them (31:8).

22:21–41 Balaam commanded to speak only God's word. The fact that the donkey spoke makes this incident exceptional. Though naturally unable to speak, the donkey was empowered by God to rebuke the extreme folly of the prophet. But the donkey was also a living rebuke to Balaam, because of the contrast between them. The donkey saw the angel standing in their way, and wisely drew back; Balaam saw nothing and wickedly pressed on his way. The donkey faithfully served Balaam, saving his life; he wickedly beat the animal (cf. Pr. 12:10). Balaam found that God was his adversary. The whole point of this unusual scene was to stress to Balaam that he should not speak a word beyond what God had commanded him (35, 38). Balak's eagerness to have Balaam's help oozes out of the text. He came to the border to greet him, mildly rebuked him for the delay and mentioned again how he would reward him (36–37). The very next morning, they both ascended Bamoth Baal ('the high places of Baal') to pronounce curses (41).

23:1–24:25 Balaam's oracles blessing Israel. Balaam spoke four oracles about Israel and three oracles about the nations. The text makes clear that God had put the words into Balaam's mouth (23:5, 12, 16, 17, 26; 24:2, 13, 16). One thing should be understood about these God-given oracles. Each of the four oracles concerning Israel takes up one of the promises of the Abrahamic covenant and confirms it. The first oracle (23:7–10), stressing that God has not cursed Israel, confirms that Israel will be like the dust of the earth. Who can count the dust of Jacob or number the fourth part of Israel? (23:10). The second oracle (23:18–24), stressing that God cannot change his promise, confirms that God is present among his people (a clear reference to the promise of a relationship with God). The LORD their God is with them (23:21). The third oracle (24:3–9), a vision from the Almighty, the name by which God appeared to Abraham, confirms that Israel will inherit the land promised (24:5, 6). The predicted defeat of Agag, the Amalekite king shows that Canaan is in mind here (see 1 Sa. 15:8). Finally, the prediction that Israel would devour hostile nations (24:8) fulfils the promise that they would possess their enemies' cities (Gn. 22:17). That the Abrahamic covenant is in mind is further indicated by the last words of v 9, May those who bless you be blessed and those who curse you be cursed! (cf. Gn. 12:3).

The fourth oracle is perhaps the most remarkable (24:15–19). It is an oracle from the Most High (24:16), by whom Melchizedek blessed Abraham (Gn. 14:18–20). Melchizedek is himself associated with Christ Jesus in the NT (Heb. 7:1–17; see Ps. 110:4). This oracle promises a king in the distant future who will defeat Israel's enemies (17–19). He will crush the foreheads of Moab (17) seems to anticipate David's victories (2 Sa. 8:2). However, the promise to Abraham (Gn. 12:3; 22:18), with the rest of Scripture, teaches us to see in the promise of David's throne, the promise of the Messiah whom the Gentiles will obey (Gn. 49:10). Thus, Balaam confirmed God's promises to Abraham.

Balak grew more angry as Balaam proceeded through his oracles, but the prophet could not help himself. He was compelled to bless Israel. Afterwards, unbidden, he went on to prophesy the future of other peoples: Amalek (20), the Kenites (21–22), Asshur and Eber (24). The Amalekites, Israel's fierce enemies, were destroyed in Hezekiah's time (1 Ch. 4:43). Some of the Kenites were with Israel, but Canaan was their land and they are the first nation named in the list of those to be dispossessed (Gn. 15:19). Asshur usually means Assyria. Eber might refer to Babylon and Kittim (i.e. Greece). If so, Balaam was looking far into the future of Israel's history.

25:1–18 Israel seduced by Moab

Whilst Israel could not be cursed because God's word is almighty, it could be seduced because it was weak. Once again, we observe a characteristic of Numbers: it juxtaposes the word of God with the rebellion of man. God's word had blessed; now Israel rebelled. The text of Numbers does not tell us, but we find out later in Scripture, that it was Balaam's idea to entice Israel into idolatry and sexual immorality (2 Pet. 2:13–16; Rev. 2:14). The two sins were connected. Either the cult of Baal involved sexual practices, a kind of fertility cult, or the enticement of the Moabite women led Israel to share their idolatry. This was a foretaste of Canaan's dangers, and later Israel fell in the same way. The people of God are continually warned against marriage with the surrounding nations who would lead them away from God.

When Israel sinned with the golden calf at Sinai, the Levites marked themselves out for God's service by putting their own families to death (Ex. 32:25–29). On this occasion Aaron's grandson, Phinehas, distinguished himself by his zeal for the Lord's glory. Seeing an Israelite take a Midianite chief's daughter to his tent, he followed them and ran them through with a spear. They were guilty of outright defiance of God's word in flagrant disregard of the weeping Israelites. Phinehas' action stopped the plague which had already taken 24,000 lives (Paul says 23,000 in a single day; 1 Cor. 10:8; cf. Aaron's action some years before, 16:47–48). Recognizing Phinehas' zeal, God confirmed his priesthood in an everlasting covenant (25:13; see Ne. 13:29). God displayed his mercy in giving this covenant, because it guaranteed that there would be priests in future to make atonement for Israel. The NT states that the Aaronic priesthood had been changed with the work of Christ (Heb. 7:11–22). There is no conflict here. Through the work of the prophets, it became clear that the priesthood would ultimately find its fulfilment in Christ.

Finally, in the desert, God commanded Israel to treat the Midianites as enemies because of this event. Their destruction followed swiftly (ch. 31).

26:1–36:13 New preparation to inherit the promised land

The theme of the third part of the book is the inheritance. The desert period was ending, and Israel was at its final campsite. New preparation had to be made to possess the land which God had sworn to give them. Attention is focused on how the land was to be allotted and on the laws to be kept in it.

26:1–27:23 Israel is numbered (the second census) and the land is to be allotted

26:1–4 The second census commanded. This was the way in which the first preparation began. The new census was a sign that the period of judgment was ending and the time had come to prepare anew to enter the promised land. The census was to be conducted on the same basis as the first (26:2 repeats briefly 1:2).

26:5–51 Israel counted by their clans. Three characteristics of this census report should be noticed: the total number of Israel had fallen slightly over the forty years (see 1:17–46); some tribes had increased, others decreased; this time the clans within each tribe were named. Comments were also made about Korah's rebellion (which is a warning; 10; cf. 1 Cor. 10:6, 11), the death of two of Judah's sons (19) and the fact that Zelophehad of Manasseh had only daughters (33).

It is essential to understand why the census was recorded in this way. First, the slight fall in numbers marks the withholding of blessing from the generation that fell in the desert through their rebellion. Growth in numbers was a blessing of God. But these were wasted years, when Israel marked time. The other characteristics reflect the author's primary interest in chs. 26–36, the inheritance. Each of these characteristics shapes the way in which Israel would possess the land. This should become clear as the third part of Numbers unfolds. In particular, tribes would be allotted land according to their size, and this would determine their scope for wealth and growth through the centuries. It is also noticeable that two further sections are devoted to the problem of the inheritance rights of Zelophehad's daughters, a vital concern because the inheritance would normally pass to sons (27:1–11 and 36:1–13).

26:52–56 The allotment of the land. The main concern of the third part of Numbers is the inheritance in Canaan. Each tribe was to have land in proportion to its size, distributed by lot. This did not mean leaving it to chance. It was known that God was able to determine the outcome of the lot (Pr. 16:33).

26:57–62 The Levites counted. In the first census, the Levites were numbered separately because they were not to serve in the army but were to be priests. On this occasion, they were omitted from the main census because they would receive no inheritance. This was not a new, different reason. If they had received land like the other tribes, they would have been distracted from serving God by farming duties (see on 18:8–32). This reflects a principle that the ministers of God should not become entangled in worldly business but should be completely devoted to God's service (2 Tim. 2:4).

26:63–65 Not one of the first generation remained. This is why the census was commanded. Here is a sober reminder that God's judgment is sure and certain. As he swore on oath, not one of the generation that rebelled were left, except Joshua and Caleb. It should never be overlooked that God will always fulfil his word. In particular, no oath of God has ever failed nor ever will fail.

27:1–11 Zelophehad's daughters' inheritance. It was customary that the inheritance would pass to sons (e.g. Gn. 27; Dt. 21:15–17; Lk. 15:11–32). Genealogies rarely mention a woman (Mt. 1:3–5 is an exception). It is clear that women did not have an independent standing but came under the headship of their father or husband (see on ch. 30). The principle of male headship within the churches was retained by the apostles (1 Cor. 11:2–16; 14:34–37; 1 Tim. 2:9–15; 1 Pet. 3:1–6). Zelophehad's daughters were thus afraid that they would have no inheritance, since their father had died and they had no brothers. Their action is very significant. They approached the tabernacle entrance (2). (This was the place of judgment where the leaders of the assembly met and, more importantly, the place where the Judge of all the earth stood (see on 16:16–35)). Thus, they appealed to God, the defender of the defenceless, the fatherless and the widow (Jas. 1:27). It was always his concern to defend his peoples' right to their place in the land (consider 1 Ki. 21; Is. 5:8).

The appeal made by Zelophehad's daughters gained them justice, and a permanent law was given to Israel to defend others who would be in a similar situation (6–11). This was not an incidental detail in Israel's life. The position of Zelophehad's daughters had already been hinted at in 26:33, and it is the matter which concludes the whole book (36:1–13). The spiritual significance of this issue is immense. Canaan was the homeland where God would establish fellowship with his people. If anyone were excluded, they would be kept out of God's fellowship. Canaan was not just a place in which to live; nor was it a mere token of the new earth and new Jerusalem. It was historically the kingdom of God and the only place where God was known in the earth (Dt. 4:7). Through the instruction which was to be gained here, men and women would enter the kingdom of God. Therefore, this was no trivial matter.

27:12–23 Joshua appointed to succeed Moses. Moses was soon to ascend Mt Nebo, where he would die (Dt. 32:48–52; 34:1–12). His final acts were to appoint Joshua, take vengeance on Midian and deliver again the law of God. Even this great servant of God, who was 'faithful in all God's house' (Heb. 3:2), was unable to enter Canaan because, on one occasion he had not honoured God as holy. This must teach God's people to fear his holy name (Is. 6:1–5). The holiness of God is absolute; it cannot be modified one jot to accommodate sinful people. Here is sober encouragement to heed the word of God, every line and sentence of it. But even then, it seems impossible for people to enter the kingdom, and it is therefore a cause for rejoicing that Christ Jesus has entered heaven itself on our behalf (Heb. 9:24). He entered where no man could go.

Moses, knowing that he was about to die, showed a characteristic care for the people. They were not to be left as sheep without a shepherd (cf. 1 Ki. 22:17; Ezk. 34:5; Mt. 9:36). He asked God to appoint a new leader, since God alone knows hearts of men, and is the God of the spirits of all mankind (16; see 16:22). The same concern occupied the apostles when they chose someone to take Judas Iscariot's place (Acts 1:24). God's people need to be led by people approved by God. God's chosen leaders were always at pains to know that they were acting in his will (see 1 Sa. 30:7–8; Acts 16:6–10). Joshua is identified as a man in whom is the Spirit (18). Israel's leaders could only lead by God's Spirit (see 11:25; 1 Sa. 16:1–13; Acts 20:28). The symbolic act used to set Joshua aside was the laying on of hands (see on 8:5–26).

28:1–30:16 Offerings and vows

28:1–8 Daily burnt offerings. This restates the law given in Ex. 29:38–43. Other laws are also drawn together in this section (Lv. 1–7; 23; and Nu. 15). Every morning and evening, a lamb had to be sacrificed. The purpose of this is most important: 'Then I will dwell among the Israelites and be their God. They will know that I am the LORD their God ...' (Ex. 29:45–46). Elijah's sacrifice at Mt Carmel took place at the time of the evening sacrifice, and his purpose was exactly as stated in the law: 'O LORD, God of Abraham, Isaac and Israel, let it be known today that you are God in Israel' (1 Ki. 18:36). These laws are restated at this point because the main concern is with the inheritance. The only reason why the inheritance was truly desirable was as the place where God would dwell with his people. All the time, the author has his eye upon the fulfilment of the Abrahamic covenant. Possessing the land and becoming a great nation was all to the end that God might create a people for his praise. Thus the sacrifice of the lambs was a means to this great end.

The NT teaches that these sacrifices were 'types', foreshadowing Christ's death. He was the spotless lamb who takes away the sin of the world (Jn 1:29). Indeed, he died at the time of the evening sacrifices, when the Passover lambs were also killed. His death abolished these sacrifices, and they soon ceased to be offered when the temple fell in AD 70.

The large numbers of sacrifices show the weight of sin which must be removed before God can be approached. They also speak of God's great grace as he had provided Israel with riches, flocks and herds in abundance to enable them to bring his sacrifices. They brought only a part of what he had given them in the first place. The same is true of the offerings which modern Christians should bring; they only return to God a small part of what they have received. The pattern of morning and evening sacrifices has been taken as a model for times of prayer in the church. Certainly, the apostles in early NT times observed the temple hours of prayer (Acts 3:1). We are not told whether this practice persisted, but we do know that the apostles taught the churches to pray continually (1 Thes. 5:17).

28:9–10 Sabbath burnt offerings. These were in addition to the daily offerings. The Sabbath was set apart as holy to the Lord (Ex. 20:8–11; Dt. 5:12–15).

28:11–15 Burnt offerings for the first of the month. The Israelites used a lunar calendar, so the months were determined by the phases of the moon. Each month was about twenty-nine to thirty days long and thus the year was approximately eleven days short of a full solar year. Therefore, at intervals, an extra month had to be inserted to restore the calendar. The start of each month was kept as a Sabbath. On this day, two young bulls, a ram and seven lambs were offered, plus a goat as a sin offering. It was as if each new month could not start without the covering of sacrifice.

28:16–25 Passover burnt offerings. The offerings for Passover were the same as for the new moon, except that they were repeated for seven days. Passover was also marked by unleavened bread. It was celebrated in the first month Nisan (or Abib), which fell in March/April (Ex. 12; Nu. 9:1–14; Dt. 16; Jos. 5:10; 2 Ki. 23:21). This was the time that Christ Jesus died, as a Passover lamb (Jn. 19:17–37; 1 Cor. 5:7).

28:26–31 Feast of Weeks' burnt offerings. This was the second great festival, also called the day of first fruits, celebrating the end of the barley harvest (Ex. 23:16; Lv. 23:15–21; Dt. 16:9–12). It fell seven weeks (fifty days) after the Passover near the end of May (the beginning of Siwan), and was also known as Pentecost. It was during this feast that the Holy Spirit was sent to the first disciples of Christ, who were like the firstfruits of the gospel harvest (Acts 2).

29:1–6 Feast of Trumpets' burnt offerings. The remaining three festivals were celebrated in the seventh month (Tishri, September/October). On the first day of the month, the trumpets were sounded (cf. Lv. 23:23–25). Offerings were the same as for the first two feasts, except that only one young bull was brought. The sounding of the trumpets was significant. It summoned the people and called God to remember his people (see 10:1–10).

29:7–11 Day of Atonement's burnt offerings. The tenth day of the seventh month was the Day of Atonement, when all sin was put away (Lv. 16:1–34; 23:26–32). This was the only occasion in the year when the high priest could enter the Most Holy Place. God's holiness and human sinfulness are totally incompatible (Lv. 16; Heb. 9:7). On this day, Israel had to afflict itself or deny itself. The Hebrew verb means 'to humble oneself' and seems to imply fasting. The ritual involved burning the sacrifice rather than eating it (the Passover lamb was eaten) and sending away the scapegoat into the desert. Later, Isaiah might have been referring to this when he spoke of the day of fasting (Is. 58:1–14). The crucial reason for self denial was that Israel was remembering its sin and repenting of it.

29:12–38 Feast of Tabernacles’ burnt offerings. The name ‘Feast of Tabernacles’ comes from Lv. 23:33–43 but is not used here. This was the last great feast of the year, on the fifteenth day of the seventh month. On the first day, thirteen young bulls, two rams and fourteen lambs were sacrificed. Each day, for seven days, the number of young bulls was reduced by one. On the eighth day, the same offerings as for the other feasts were presented. The concern in Numbers is with the offerings. We learn more about the significance of Tabernacles from Leviticus and Dt. 16:13–17 (see also Ne. 8:13–18). It was the time of the final harvest, a time of rejoicing, when Israel would bring abundant freewill offerings (39). This was the occasion when Solomon dedicated the temple, offering 22,000 cattle and 120,000 sheep and goats, over fourteen days (1 Ki. 8:2, 62–66).

There is a great spiritual analogy in these festivals. Passover (commemorating deliverance from Egypt and death) corresponds with Christ’s crucifixion; Weeks or Pentecost (the day of firstfruits) corresponds with the sending of the Holy Spirit and the firstfruits of the gospel harvest (Acts 2). So Tabernacles corresponds with Christ’s second coming at the close of the age, marking the end of the harvest. The time between Weeks and Tabernacles was a busy period when Israel laboured for the harvest. Similarly, between Pentecost and the second coming labourers are sent to reap the harvest among the Gentiles (Mt.9:37–38; 13:30–39; Lk. 10:2; Jn. 4:35). At the end of the age, the harvest will be gathered in and the weeds thrown into the fire (Mt. 13:39; Mk. 4:29; Rev. 14:15).

The harvest was also a time to remember that God had brought them into the land and blessed them bountifully there (this was why they lived in booths, recalling their journey to the land). Similarly, at the end of the age, God’s people will rejoice in him who has brought them into the eternal kingdom. Thus the Feast of Tabernacles celebrates the inheritance, the key theme in chs. 26–36. Finally, there is a further point of analogy. Just as trumpets called the people to this greatest of feasts, so at the end, the trumpet will summon people to assemble before the God who is the judge of the living and the dead.

29:39–40 Additional offerings. All these burnt offerings were in addition to freewill offerings and offerings made to fulfil vows. Many sacrifices were an expression of abundant thanksgiving. The heart of the matter is summed up in the NT—‘God loves a cheerful giver’ (2 Cor. 9:7). Even after we have done all, we are unprofitable servants who have done only what was our duty (Lk. 17:10).

30:1–16 The law concerning vows. The law about vows follows naturally the laws about burnt offerings (29:39). The fundamental principle is that vows must be kept (Dt. 23:21–23; Ec. 5:4). There are many examples of vows in Scripture and some were very extreme (Jdg. 11:30–40). If the vow cannot be fulfilled, Lv. 27 explains what must be done. Here, however, the concern is with vows made by a woman. The point is that a woman was under the authority of her father or her husband, and he could nullify her vow. She did not have an absolute right in this matter. If a widow, however, who was not under a man’s authority, made a vow, she was bound by it. The NT requires Christian wives to submit to their husbands in the same way as Sarah submitted to Abraham, calling him ‘her master’ (Eph. 5:24; 1 Pet. 3:1–7). This is widely contradicted today, which only confirms the truth of Scripture (2 Tim. 4:3; cf. Pr. 31:10; Ec. 7:28) and provides a telling comment on the present age (2 Tim. 3:1–9). The NT teaching is sound in this matter and does not permit husbands to become overbearing. Rather, it commands the deepest love and self-sacrifice towards their wives, but only within the proper bounds of Scripture and never to the point of abdicating their biblical authority (Eph. 5:25–33).

31:1–32:42 Vengeance on Midian and settlement in Transjordan

The most important point to realize about ch. 31 is that it is not an account of a battle. It is not like, for example, Jos. 8 (the battle against Ai) or 1 Sa. 14 (Jonathan's attack upon the Philistines). The author is not interested in the battle as such, which he passes over in one verse (7). On the contrary, the author's interest lies in three areas: the plunder and spoils of battle (which takes up 46 verses 9–54); the battle order (as previously he has been interested in the marching order; 10:11–36); and purification (19–24). These are abiding concerns of Numbers. The related attributes of God are his holiness and the fact that he is a God of order, not confusion (cf. 1 Cor. 14:33, RSV). God is holy in taking vengeance, in ordering his army, in taking spoils and in requiring his soldiers to purify themselves.

31:1–24 Vengeance on the Midianites. This account begins with a sober reminder that God has authority to take life. The destruction of the Midianites was righteous vengeance for the evil which they had done to God's people, leading them to dishonour God (see Nu. 25). At the same time, God reminds Moses that he also must soon die. This also displays God's perfect justice. Not only did he take vengeance against his enemies but he also did not overlook sin in his dearest servant. This is because his holiness and glory are more important than men's lives. Moses taught Israel the lesson that God 'shows no partiality and accepts no bribes' (Dt. 10:17; Ezk. 18; cf. Acts 10:34–35).

The battle order was established along clear principles, reflecting God's holiness and order. Each tribe was to play an equal part. Phinehas, the high priest's son, went with the army of 12,000. He had already distinguished himself (25:6–13), and it must have been a source of courage to the army to have had him in their midst, since God had sworn that his priesthood would endure (25:10–13). He took the trumpets to lead the battle and to call on God to remember his people in the warfare (10:9) and vessels of the sanctuary, symbols of God's presence (6). The text records a victory. Israel killed all the Midianite males, including Balaam, the architect of their fall (8). Later in history, the Midianites again rose as enemies (Jdg. 6–8). This does not cast doubt upon the historical truth of the record of this victory. It seems rather that the Midianites were a widespread confederation of tribes, associated with the Amalekites, Moabites, Ishmaelites and others. These Midianites were those with Moab.

Moses did not allow the returning army to bring the captives into the camp. He was angry that they had spared the women, the very ones who had tempted Israel to idolatry and immorality. At his command, only the young virgins were spared, and they became part of the nation. It is important to understand the exact nature of this killing of women and boys. Such virtually total destruction was not the 'devotion to destruction' suffered by Arad (21:1–3) and later by Jericho (Jos. 7) and the Amalekites (1 Sa. 15:3). (This topic is discussed on 14:39–45). That required every living soul to be killed, including animals, and cities and possessions were either burned or placed in the treasury of the sanctuary. The attack on Midian was different; it was vengeance or 'retribution' (3). Therefore, the spoil did not have to be destroyed. Once it was purified it could be divided (cf. Jos. 6:21, 24; 7:1–26; 1 Sa. 15:13–33). The women and boys were killed because the women had already turned Israel from the Lord, and if they were left alive, they would remain a threat to Israel's faithfulness (see on 25:1–18). Such women were the cause of Solomon's fall (1 Ki. 11:1–13).

The soldiers were unclean because of their contact with death and could not enter the camp for seven days (19–24). The purity of the camp was Moses' vital concern. He would not admit the Midianite women (13).

Note. ‘Retribution’ suggests justice whereas vengeance suggests the personal wrath of God. The wrath and vengeance of God are offensive ideas to many modern people, largely because they assume that God’s wrath and vengeance is irrational, capricious, out-of-control. But Scripture teaches that God’s wrath is revealed against man’s sin (Rom. 1:18), and, ‘vengeance is mine, I will repay’ says the Lord (Rom.12:19; (AV/KJV)). His wrath and ‘vengeance’ manifest his righteous indignation, and are not the result of bad temper.

31:25–54 Dividing the spoils of victory. The author is more interested in the spoils than the battle because the spoils were part of the inheritance in Transjordan. The scheme of dividing the spoils (sheep, cattle, donkeys and young maidens) paid respect to the priesthood and rewarded the battle toil of the soldiers. The soldiers received half, from which they paid tribute of one five hundredth to the high priest. The congregation received half, from which they gave one fiftieth to the Levites. Thus, e.g. Eleazar’s family received 675 sheep, each soldier of the army (of 12,000 men) about twenty-eight sheep, the Levites (23,000) approximately one sheep among four and the congregation (589,730 excluding the army of 12,000) about one sheep between two. No account is given of the plunder of silver and gold. Each soldier took his part (53). Since not one soldier died in battle, they offered the gold to the Lord (49–50). This was also to make atonement for themselves. They had taken men’s lives, and bloodshed had made them unclean (19–24). The numbers have been questioned by many scholars. They doubt that 12,000 men could defeat a Midianite people that must have included many warriors, judging by the fact that 32,000 virgin girls were taken. Some suggest that the number is artificial. However, it would be wrong to ignore the fact that throughout history God’s people won notable victories (e.g. Jdg. 7; 1 Sa. 30). This happens for one reason only, because the Lord fights for them as he promised (Dt. 28:7; 32:30).

32:1–42 Settlement in Transjordan. The lands of Jazer and Gilead lay east of Jordan. They were high lands (over 2,000 ft) enjoying good rainfall and ideal for flocks and herds (4). However, they were outside the land promised to Abraham. Therefore, it is surprising that these tribes wished to settle there. Moses was clearly appalled, remembering the rebellion at Kadesh Barnea approximately forty years earlier (11–12; see 14:21–35). He was afraid that they would discourage the whole nation from entering Canaan. Moses had an accurate insight into human nature. It is a natural tendency to look around at other people rather than to keep our eyes on God and his word (see e.g. Jn. 21:20–21). When this happens, the standards of obedience among God’s people tend to fall.

The Reubenites and Gadites on this occasion gave their undertaking to cross the Jordan, even ahead of the other tribes, to fulfil their responsibility to ensure that Israel possessed the promised land. Moses bound them to this, leaving instructions with Joshua and Eleazar not to give them their inheritance if they broke their word (28–30). Any failure would be sin: Be sure that your sin will find you out (23). These words have become a proverb in the English language. After it had been agreed that Reuben and Gad could settle in Transjordan, half of Manasseh was joined to them (33) since they had been involved in the conquest of these lands (39–42). The account ends with a brief note of the building work which they did.

If we accept that the events of chs. 20–36, from Miriam’s death, spanned the fortieth year, then the question of settling in Transjordan would have been raised at some time around December (i.e. the ninth month). This would be after the early rains, and the rich pastures would have been attractive (1, 4). Before the end of the year, on the first day of the eleventh month (Dt. 1:3), Moses summoned all Israel to hear the law again before he ascended Mt Nebo and died. This leaves an interval of about one month or so in which these tribes organized their settlement.

This would not have been sufficient time to do any substantial building work. Therefore, the last few verses (34–42) may refer to work that was carried out some time later (after Jos. 13:1–33; 22). Indeed, the names of these towns were changed, and this was probably done after the settlement. The fact that this is recorded here seems to imply that the account was finally written down some time after the tribes had settled in their lands. This is not the only indication that the Pentateuch was finalized some time after the events of Moses' life (see the Introduction).

33:1–49 Summary of the journey

This record of the camp sites along the journey is one part of the text which Moses wrote down (2). Some of the places named in this list are difficult to identify. Therefore, it does not seem possible, given the present state of our knowledge, to map the route accurately. The format of the list is very repetitive; occasional comment is added (vs 4, 8, 9, 14, 38, 40). The reason why this record is placed here is quite clear: it is a summing up and leads into the conclusion of the account. What remains in Numbers is concerned exclusively with the inheritance: possession, distribution and the expulsion of the inhabitants (33:50–56); boundaries (34:1–15); officers charged with assigning the land (34:16–29); towns and cities for the Levites (35:1–34); and the unchangeable nature of the inheritance (36:1–13).

The record is strictly a list of camp sites, not a brief history, and therefore it makes passing reference to the exodus (3–4) and the crossing of the Red Sea (8), and no mention at all of the long stay at Sinai (15–16). This record bridges the gap between chs. 19 and 20, giving the route which Israel took (19–35). The day of Aaron's death, the first day of the fifth month in the fortieth year, is important for dating events (38). Beginning with the first Passover, the record covers the forty years and ends with a picture of Israel's hosts stretched out alongside the Jordan between two places several miles apart, Beth Jeshimoth (modern Tell el-Azeimeh) and Abel Shittim (modern Tell Kefrain). The extensive nature of the camp implies great numbers. The ten thousand thousands of Israel waited on the edge of their inheritance. Before they entered, they had to receive instruction in the law.

33:50–36:13 Commandments for the inheritance

These laws and the whole of Deuteronomy were given on the plains of Moab opposite Jericho (36:13).

33:50–56 Command to drive out the inhabitants of Canaan. The command to possess Canaan contains three elements: the land is given to Israel, as promised in the Abrahamic covenant (Gn. 15:18–21); a summary of the way in which it was to be distributed (repeating 26:52–56); and the command to drive out the nations, destroy their idols and their high places. This command is found in Exodus, Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Ex. 23:23–33; 34:11–17; Lv. 20:1–5, 22–26; Dt. 7:1–5; 12:29–30; 13:6–18; 29:16–28).

34:1–15 The land's boundaries. Abraham was promised the land stretching between the river of Egypt and the Euphrates, identified as 'the land of the Kenites, Kenizzites, Kadmonites, Hittites' (Gn. 15:18–21; cf. Dt. 11:24). The boundaries described here match those known from Egyptian texts of the second millennium BC. This indicates that the definition of Canaan given here is a truly ancient one. By the time Israel arrived in Moab, the boundaries could be defined by reference to towns and places, and Joshua followed these same boundaries (Jos. 15–19). The land was to be allotted to nine-and-a-half tribes, since two-and-a-half tribes would settle in Transjordan (13). However, it appears that the full extent of the land promised was never possessed. For a brief period during the reigns of David and Solomon, Israel held the land from the Euphrates to the Gaza strip, or from Dan to Beersheba (1 Ki. 4:24–25), but afterwards their territory was reduced. Nevertheless, the ideal of the promise was not lost sight of (Ezk. 47:15–20). Even today, Israel maintains a claim, on a more limited scale, to this territory. The re-establishment of the state of Israel at midnight on 14 May 1948 was a remarkable event of modern times, following centuries during which the land had been occupied by other nations. But the promise to Abraham awaits fulfilment.

34:16–29 Leaders to allot the land. The authority for this task was given to Joshua and Eleazar (17), and their work is recorded in Jos. 14–19. Ten tribal leaders were appointed to assist them (18–29). Many of the names listed contain the word ‘El’ (‘God’). This is evidence of the antiquity of the list itself, since later names contained the name of ‘the LORD’ (see on 1:4–16). It may also indicate that these were quite old men, e.g. Caleb was about eighty years old (see Jos. 14:10). Although these were the heads of Israel’s tribes, they were definitely subject to Joshua and Eleazar. Caleb, for example, about five years later, asked Joshua to give him the inheritance promised to him. Such higher authority was essential to prevent territorial disputes among the tribes. It had to be clear that the land was allotted according to the will of God, through his appointed servants, and the boundaries were not to be altered (see Pr. 22:28; 23:10).

35:1–5 Levitical cities. Aaron’s house and the Levites were not to have any inheritance (18:20–24). They were to depend upon the tithes which the other tribes paid. Nevertheless, in order to preserve their identity in Israel, they were given cities in which to live. After the tribes had taken the land, they had to assign the Levites their cities (Jos. 21). Each city was to have an area of land around it for pasture, to a boundary 1,500 ft from the city walls (i.e. 450 m) (4), and measuring about 3,000 feet square (i.e. 900 m) (5). The geometry poses a slight problem. If the sides were 3,000 ft long, and each side of the square was 1,500 ft from the walls, the four sides could not have joined up. The measurements complete a square only if taken from a central point. Archaeological evidence suggests that Beth Shemesh, one of the cities chosen (Jos. 21:16), covered approximately seven acres (i.e. equivalent to about 3 hectares). The problem of interpreting the geometry has taxed the ingenuity of scholars. It seems probable that the boundaries were set by first tracing out a square or rectangle around the city walls and then measuring 1500 ft from its corners to establish the boundary.

Plan of the Levitical city.

The principle, however, is perfectly clear that the Levites should have a limited area of pasture-land around their towns.

35:6–34 Cities of refuge. The Levites’ cities were scattered through the land in proportion to each tribe’s land (8). This ensured that instruction in the law was planted among all tribes (Dt. 31:9; Mal. 2:6–7). There had to be forty-eight of these cities; they were chosen by lot a few years later (Jos. 21:1–42). Looking forward, it is significant that the Aaronic priests were settled in Judah (with Simeon and Benjamin), and the rest of the Kohathites, the Gershonites and Merarites were placed among the other tribes. God favoured Judah by placing his best servants among her. This may have been the major reason why Judah did not depart from the law as quickly as northern Israel and thus escaped the Assyrians who overthrew Samaria in 721 BC. Judah’s decline was resisted by Aaron’s descendants, men like Jeremiah. Nevertheless, Judah did eventually go into captivity in 586 BC. This history teaches that when the church has faithful preachers, it is a sign of God's favour. The church should pray constantly that God will raise up faithful ministers and clothe them with salvation.

Six of the Levite towns were to be cities of refuge (6), three on each side of the Jordan (14). A person who had killed someone could flee to one of these cities seeking asylum. He would flee from the avenger of blood. The Hebrew term avenger is gō'el, 'kinsman, redeemer' (12, 19, 21, 24, 25, 27). It was the ancient custom for the close relative of a victim of murder to avenge his kin. This could lead to a series of tit-for-tat killings. A graphic example of this is found in the case of Abner (2 Sa. 2:8–28; 3:19–39). Part of Abner's tragedy was that he died in the very gates of Hebron, a city of refuge. The cities of refuge offered safety to the manslayer until he stood trial.

The provision of cities of refuge shows God's love of justice. By this means, he imposed the rule of law upon the custom of blood feuds. In a blood feud, the manslayer might be killed even for an accidental killing. Therefore, a distinction was made between murder and manslaughter. Murder is premeditated, committed out of enmity by lying in wait (16–21). Manslaughter is unintentional killing (22–24). This resembles the difference between deliberate sin and unintentional errors (see on 15:22–31). One who had committed unintentional manslaughter was protected from the avenger of blood, although his freedom was removed (28, 32). Conversely, no murderer was allowed to live (21, 31). There was no ransom for the life of a murderer, just as there was no atonement for deliberate sin (15:30–31). The law did not prevent the kinsman from taking vengeance where it was lawful. Indeed, in the case of widows who had no kinsman, God himself took that role (Ex. 22:22–24). The NT commands believers not to avenge themselves but to leave it to the Lord (Rom. 12:19), who will avenge them (Lk. 18:7–8; Rev. 6:10; 19:2).

Justice was strengthened by the requirement for two or more witnesses (30; see Dt. 17:6; 19:15; Mt. 18:16; 2 Cor. 13:1; Heb. 10:28). This was an enduring principle to which Christ appealed (Jn. 8:16–18; 5:32–41; 1 Jn. 5:6–8). This must have been the reason why the apostles did not go alone but in pairs, since they were Christ's witnesses and their testimony had to be legally valid (Lk. 10:1; Acts 13:2; note the plurality in Acts 2:32; 10:23; and the pairing of the disciples in Mt. 10:1–4).

The root cause for the cities of refuge is found in the Abrahamic covenant (which is implied in vs 33–34), that bloodshed pollutes the land. Israel was not to defile the land where God dwelt among them. For this selfsame reason Israel had purified the camp at Sinai, forty years before (5:3). The ultimate reason, therefore, was not justice for its own sake. Rather, it was to maintain God's purposes, set forth in the Abrahamic covenant. These were, first, to preserve Israel's fellowship with God, who is of purer eyes than to look upon iniquity (Hab. 1:12–13); and secondly, to preserve Israel in the land. In this matter, two of the promises are joined (34).

The gift of cities of refuge was no incidental matter. It was vital and practical and touched the heart of God's plan of redemption. What is more, the spirit of the law must be understood. The law is summed up in love for God and his people (Mt. 22:34–40). Murder goes hand in hand with hatred, the very opposite of love (1 Jn. 3:11–15).

36:1–13 The inheritance preserved. These laws, delivered to Israel on the plains of Moab (13), conclude with a commandment that preserved Israel's inheritance. The book of Deuteronomy, which follows, is concerned with the same matter from another standpoint, teaching Israel how to live in order to remain in the land.

The daughters of Zelophehad were to have received their father's inheritance (ch. 27). However, this posed a threat to Manasseh if they married into another tribe and took with them part of the tribal inheritance (3). Two solutions were proposed. First, the immediate situation was solved: the women had to marry within the tribe (6). It is important to note that freedom of choice in marriage is not absolute but is confined within the limits of God's will. It would have been ridiculous for these women to argue that they loved someone from another tribe. Far from it! They obeyed the Lord (10–12). This yields a principle for today, that Christian marriages should be contracted in submission to God's revealed will.

The text then goes on to establish a general principle for Israel, that no inheritance in Israel is to pass from tribe to tribe (7). This is repeated for emphasis (9). This is a fitting conclusion to Numbers. The Lord was commanding that the inheritance be preserved for ever. This has immense value for the believer. Since the inheritance in Canaan anticipated the coming of the kingdom of God in all its fullness, this law also gives assurance that God will not permit that inheritance to be taken away from his people. A place is reserved for every one of his people. This message comes through in the teaching of Christ (Lk. 12:32; Jn. 6:37, 40; 10:28). What guarantees eternally the promised inheritance? It is the covenant and oath which God gave to Abraham, which were confirmed for ever by Jesus Christ the Lord.

DEUTERONOMY

Introduction

The book

Deuteronomy is the fifth and last book of the Pentateuch (see article on the Pentateuch), the books traditionally ascribed to Moses. It takes its name from the Greek translation of 17:18, which misunderstands the Hebrew 'a copy of this law', and takes it as a 'second law'. The title in Hebrew is taken from the opening words of the book, 'these are the words', i.e. the words of Moses to the Israelites just before they entered the promised land. This is a better way of thinking of the book. It is not so much a 'second law' as a preaching, or reapplication, of certain laws given in the preceding books of the Pentateuch.

Background

In the story of the Pentateuch so far, a promise has been given which is now close to its fulfilment. God had promised Abraham that he would become the father of a great nation (Gn. 12:1–3). That nation would dwell in a rich land 'flowing with milk and honey' (Ex. 3:17). The nation grew in Egyptian slavery, until miraculously delivered by God (Ex. 14), who then met them at Mt Sinai and formally made a 'covenant' with them, which included various laws that they were to keep (Ex. 19–24). The next step was to march into the land, but they failed to do this straight away because they were overawed by the obstacles in the way. Because of their lack of faith, therefore, the Lord decided that not that generation, but rather the next, should enter the promised land. In the meantime, they were condemned to forty years of living unsettled in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu. 13–14; see especially Nu. 14:20–35).

At the beginning of Deuteronomy, Moses, who himself will not enter the land, addresses the new generation. He reminds them of all the events that have brought them to this point, and prepares them to be faithful to their covenant with the Lord when they cross the River Jordan and receive the ‘inheritance’ which he has given them.

Date and authorship

Because a large part of the book is made up of the words of Moses, he has traditionally been regarded as its author. It is clear, however, that someone else must have been responsible for the final form of the book, since Moses appears as ‘he’ (rather than ‘I’) at a number of places (e.g. 1:1), including the account of his death (Dt. 34). It is best to see the book as a faithful record of his words written down at some point after his death.

At what point, then, was it written down? Many scholars believe that Deuteronomy was written as much as six centuries after Moses, in the seventh century BC. This view is based on the account of the discovery (in 621 BC) of the so-called ‘Book of the Law’ in the temple at Jerusalem during the reign of King Josiah, when he was conducting a religious reform following years of idolatrous worship (2 Ki. 22:8). (See 28:61 for the name ‘the Book of the Law’ applied to Deuteronomy; cf. 31:24.) When such a view of authorship is taken, it is usually not held that the book is a faithful record of Moses’ teaching, but rather that it expresses the concerns of Josiah’s period, and that the name of Moses is simply used to give authority to the words. Laws which presuppose a settled existence and an agricultural lifestyle (e.g. 24:19–22) are sometimes said to be evidence of composition only after entry to the land. And passages which anticipate the exile in Babylon (586–539 BC), such as 4:25–31, 28:64–68 and 30:1–10, have been thought to have been composed as late as the exile itself.

To some extent, decisions about dating depend on whether the biblical writers can be thought to have foreseen conditions and events in Israel’s history. There are independent reasons, however, for thinking that Deuteronomy was actually written much closer in time to Moses’ own day.

First, Deuteronomy shows no knowledge of the main institutions of Israel’s political and religious life during the period of the kings, namely the kings themselves and the Jerusalem temple. The phrase ‘the place the LORD your God will choose from among all your tribes to put his Name there for his dwelling’ (12:5; cf. 12:11, 14; 14:24) is often taken to be a disguised allusion to Jerusalem. This would accord with the idea that Deuteronomy was written in Josiah’s time, because he did destroy all other places of worship other than Jerusalem. There is no good evidence, however, for identifying the ‘place’ exclusively with Jerusalem. The importance of Shechem in ch. 27, for example, speaks against it.

Deuteronomy is also unenthusiastic about the idea of a king (17:14–20), merely permitting such a thing, and trying to ensure that the king would not become a tyrant. This law is unlikely to have come from the time of Josiah.

Secondly, Deuteronomy knows only a single, united Israel, and shows no acquaintance with the division of the nation into two kingdoms following the reign of Solomon, around 930 BC (1 Ki. 12).

Thirdly, the book warns again and again about the dangers of Canaanite religion (e.g. chs. 7, 13). The temptation to stop worshipping the true God, and follow the gods of Canaan, was present as soon as Israel set foot on Canaanite soil. Deuteronomy's concern, therefore, is understandable at a very early period of the nation's history, though it certainly remained a factor at all times between entering the land and the exile.

Fourthly, certain laws make best sense in relation to imminent (or recent) occupation of the land. One such is 12:15–25, which permits the 'secular' eating of meat. The law is in contrast to Lv. 17, which insists that all slaughter of meat must be sacrificial, and carried out at the Tent of Meeting (the place of sacrifice and worship until Solomon built the temple). Deuteronomy permits non-sacrificial slaughter simply because, after settling in the land, the distance to the place of worship was too great for many people to slaughter meat sacrificially simply in order to eat it.

Fifthly, Deuteronomy shares the concerns of the prophets, namely, the need for heartfelt religion, and a love of justice and the rights of the poor (14:28–29). Yet it is different from the prophetic books in the sense that it does not address particular occasions and individuals. It has much more the appearance of a programme for the future. It is likely, in fact, that the prophets take their cue from Deuteronomy, as well as from other parts of the Pentateuch. Amos, for example, may have Deuteronomy in mind when he shows how God has given different peoples their respective lands (Am. 9:7; see Dt. 2:19–23), or when through him God urges Israel: 'Seek me and live' (Am. 5:4; see Dt. 4:1; 4:29; 30:19; 32:46–47).

Finally, it has been shown that Deuteronomy formally resembles certain political treaties made by Hittite kings with weaker states, as well as certain ancient law-codes, such as that of the famous Babylonian king and lawgiver, Hammurabi. The treaty analogies are more important because Deuteronomy shares with them the elements of relationship and loyalty.

The parts of the Hittite treaty are as follows: (i) a preamble, announcing the treaty and those who are party to it; (ii) a historical prologue, remembering the previous relations between the parties; (iii) general stipulations, setting out the nature of the future relationship between the parties; (iv) specific stipulations, the detailed requirements made of the weaker party; (v) witnesses (gods were called to witness the treaty); (vi) blessings and curses: these are pronounced for loyalty and disloyalty respectively.

Deuteronomy has a similar, though not identical, pattern, namely: (i) preamble (1:1–5); (ii) historical prologue (1:6–4:49); (iii) general stipulations (chs. 5–11); (iv) specific stipulations (chs. 12–26); (v) blessings and curses (chs. 27–28); (vi) witnesses. Ch. 32 fulfils the latter function. 32:1 calls heaven and earth to witness the words to Israel, a necessary variation from the treaties because of Israel's monotheism.

The match between Deuteronomy and the treaties is not perfect. For example, Deuteronomy's curses section is unusually long. And if ch. 32 is the witnesses section the order is unusual. Furthermore, scholars vary on the precise way in which the parts of the treaty should be described, and therefore on how Deuteronomy fits it. Most importantly, Deuteronomy is not a political treaty, but a document of the covenant between the Lord and his people. The treaty form is a kind of figure of speech, showing that the Lord is Israel's 'king' (see 33:5).

For dating purposes, the important point is that these treaties date from the second millennium BC. Scholars differ, it should be said, on whether these second-millennium treaties are sufficiently different from other treaties of the first millennium to be evidence of a second-millennium date for Deuteronomy. The case is not finally proven. Yet the similarities between Deuteronomy and the Hittite treaties are striking, and remain an important supporting argument for a date in the late second millennium.

In conclusion, the data cannot prove conclusively any of the dates canvassed for Deuteronomy. But the evidence is consistent with its composition in the period following Moses' death. This may have been quite soon after, or within a few generations.

Theology

The theology of Deuteronomy has begun to become clear even as we have spoken of its background and date. It is helpful to bear in mind that it is always proclaiming the truth about God in contrast to what other peoples believe. Deuteronomy is a book for a people that has been brought out of Egypt, because God wanted a people that would be different (or 'holy'; 7:6), different from the Canaanites in the land they were going to (12:31), as well as different from the Egyptians (29:16–17). It is a book of instruction, and meant to be preserved for this purpose. As such, it has a characteristic style, whose main feature is the repetition of certain key terms and phrases. Deuteronomy, like sermons, sounds sermonic! The point is that Israel should always remember that it is different from other peoples, and why.

This is why Deuteronomy speaks about 'election', God's choice of Israel (7:6–7; 14:2). When God called Abraham, he clearly intended that the people who would be descended from him would bring benefit to all the nations (Gn. 12:3). The choice of Israel, therefore, does not mean that God does not love other peoples too. Deuteronomy, however, does not have much to say about the salvation of other peoples. It is concerned with what must come first; God's people must know him, and become faithful covenant partners.

The 'covenant' is the relationship between God and his chosen people. The idea had been present since God promised Noah that he would make a covenant with him, and that no such flood would ever happen again (Gn. 6:18; 9:9–17). The idea was developed with Abraham (Gn. 15:18; 17:2) and at Sinai, where it is shown that the covenant must be 'kept' (Ex. 19:5) and the Ten Commandments are given (Ex. 20:1–17). Deuteronomy spells out at length the two sides of covenant which we see in these other 'books of Moses', namely God's promise and the need for Israel to be obedient to his commands. On the one hand, it refers frequently to the promise to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (the 'fathers'; e.g. 1:8); on the other, it actually repeats the Ten Commandments (5:6–21) as a kind of introduction to the other laws which follow.

In the revelation of God's covenant Deuteronomy's basic ideas about God are spelt out. First, God is 'one' (6:4). Israel is not to worship other gods, or even to worship the Lord alongside other gods (5:7). These were real moral dangers. There were good reasons, however, for Israel to understand with their whole heart (6:5) that the Lord was 'one'. The first is, obviously, because it was true. But in addition, it meant that no other god had a claim on the people. There was no rivalry between gods for their service. There is great freedom in knowing this, a freedom in the service of one all-powerful God.

Secondly, God may be known. He spoke to his people when he met them on Mt Sinai (always called Horeb in Deuteronomy), and he spoke in words, so that he might be understood. Deuteronomy lays great stress upon the word by which God makes himself known. In the covenant, it is possible to have a relationship with the living God, and be confident that what he says may be trusted.

Thirdly, God is spiritual. No images may be made of him, because he cannot be reduced to a material part of his own creation, and thus controlled by the worshipper (5:8–10). Nor does he live, in any simple way, at the place where he is worshipped; rather his ‘Name’ lives there (12:5; and see 1 Ki. 8:27–30 for the same idea).

Fourthly, he controls both history and nature. The gods of Canaan were understood primarily as nature gods, and the Israelites would often be tempted to think that it was they who had the real power in this area. Deuteronomy shows that the Lord has not only brought them out of Egypt, but that he also controls fertility and the seasons (7:13), and indeed that these things are not separable (16:9–12).

Fifthly, there is the possibility of an ordered and happy life before God. Deuteronomy insists that there is a balance in the order of things between ‘righteousness’ (loyalty to the standards of the relationship with God) and ‘good’, or prosperity (6:24–25). This is elaborated most obviously in the ‘curses and blessings’ of ch. 28. The reader of the book naturally asks whether this is not too mechanistic an understanding of morality. However, Deuteronomy is more subtle in this respect than appears at first glance, as we shall see.

Deuteronomy is firmly a book of God’s grace. It stresses that Israel owes its whole being to him, for he has brought them out of Egypt, and will lead them into a land in which they will be richly blessed (e.g. 8:7–10). Even his commandments are part of his grace, for in keeping them Israel will experience true freedom. The laws of Deuteronomy are designed to enable every Israelite to enjoy fully the gifts of the land, and to protect each from possible exploitation at the hands of others. Israelites are ‘brothers and sisters’ in the community of God’s making. Everyone, from the king (should they decide to have one; 17:14–20) to the ‘slave’ (15:12), is a ‘brother’ in Israel. This was a profoundly different idea of society from others in its day, in which most people were no better than serfs. Deuteronomy, therefore, has a vision of a harmonious society, in which people’s knowledge of God enables them to live together in the best possible way.

The vision, however, cannot be realized without the faithfulness of the people. Will they have the spiritual liveliness and moral stamina to keep the covenant? The good of all requires, in the short term, what always appear to be sacrifices, the giving up of one’s ‘rights’. Deuteronomy knows very well the frailty of human beings. The frailty of this chosen people has already become evident in its story so far (1:26–46). Indeed, it is a ‘stiffnecked’ people that is to receive the gift of the land (9:4–6). From its beginning, therefore, Deuteronomy asks whether this (or any) people can keep covenant with God. The question receives its answer only at the end of the book (ch. 30), in a passage which reckons that the ‘curses’ are likely to fall before a final salvation can occur.

The theology of Deuteronomy has relevance to modern Christians, but it must be read carefully, and in the light of the coming of Jesus Christ. Christians see themselves as the chosen people of God (1 Pet. 2:9), though in a quite different way from ancient Israel. They are not a political nation, living among other nations, nor do they need a land of their own, criminal laws, or their own leaders for times of peace and war. No more do they look for a single place of worship on earth in which God is more present than in other places. The period in God’s dealings with human beings in the world when these things were important is past. Since Jesus came, God’s people is international, living under different political systems, and actively seeking to extend God’s kingdom in all the world. And, of course, it is no longer making sacrifices to atone for sin.

Yet the main lines of the theology of Deuteronomy remain relevant. The book teaches about the grace of God in making us his own, as well as about the need for us to respond to him in a wholehearted way, in love and obedience. For us too God has been made known, though now in Christ, who is himself the 'Place' where we meet him. Our covenant is a new covenant in Christ, in which, though as morally weak as ever Israel was, we are enabled to remain faithful. And the blessings of God are no longer thought of in terms of material prosperity, but apply both to this age and the age to come.

Deuteronomy, indeed, is no excuse for so-called 'prosperity-theology', though a careless reading might make it seem so. It does show a delight in the good things of the world, and a clear understanding of the need for human beings to enjoy the basic necessities of life. These things are as important for us and our world as they ever were. But Deuteronomy rules out any religion which disguises an attempt to become rich. It does so because it demands a love of God from the heart, and indeed a love of one's neighbour. This is the opposite of selfish calculation. That, in fact, is idolatry, which is for Deuteronomy the primary sin.

Commentary

1:1–4:43 Moses' first address

1:1–5 Introduction to the book

The scene is set for the book in its opening words. In fact, the book's title in the Hebrew OT is These are the words. This is appropriate because Deuteronomy consists largely of words spoken by Moses on the east of the River Jordan, just before the people of Israel entered the land God was giving them. The opening phrase also prepares us for the subject-matter of Deuteronomy, namely the expounding of the law (5). The law refers to the Ten Commandments and other laws given by God at Mt Sinai (Ex. 20–23), always called Horeb in Deuteronomy (2). The term 'word' usually implies God's word in Deuteronomy. Moses preaches to Israel only what God has first told him to (3). This is what makes him a 'prophet', a title which he is later given (18:18).

The introduction also prepares for God's command to take the promised land by waging war. The words after he had defeated Sihon (4) stress that it is the Lord who has won Israel's previous battles. (For the victories recalled here, see Nu. 21–30, 33–35, and below, 2:26–3:22). The idea that God himself fights wars for his people (holy wars) is important in Deuteronomy (see the notes on ch. 7). As in the past, it is he who will win the battles that lie ahead, against the inhabitants of the land of Canaan.

Note. The place names indicate the route from Horeb to Moab. The Arabah includes the Jordan valley, the Dead Sea and the area further south. East of the Jordan is a way of referring to this area, and is probably not evidence that Deuteronomy was written on the west of the Jordan (i.e. after the occupation of the land).

1:6–3:29 A retrospect and prologue

1:6–8 The command to enter the land. The story of the stay at Horeb spans Ex. 19 to Nu. 10:13. God now commands the people to go to their land. It is a great moment in their history, a fulfilment of the promise to the fathers (8). The description of the land recalls Gn. 15:18–21. It sweeps from west to east (the central mountain range, the foothills to the west, and the coastal plain) and from south to north (from the Negev up the coastal plain to Lebanon in the north, and even beyond, to the Euphrates). The area was not taken all at once, but finally conquered by David and held by Solomon.

1:9–18 The appointment of leaders. The increase in the people's size (10) fulfilled the promise made to Abraham (Gn. 15:5). It meant, however, that some system was needed for leadership and organization. Moses needed help (9; see also Ex. 18:17–27). The passage says more than this, however. The people of Israel were to be governed by the laws of God. The system, therefore, had to be one which allowed that government to work. The decentralization of authority (15) meant that God's law could be applied fairly to all in cases of dispute, whether between Israelites or between them and others (16–17).

The leaders were appointed to judge. They did not do so relying on their own wisdom alone, but rather, as instruments of God, they interpreted his laws. That is the nature of judgment here (17). God's judgment ensures that his standards are met for the benefit of every member of the people. All are equally entitled to justice.

In this idea of rule by God's law, which protects every individual equally, Israel is very different from the neighbouring peoples.

1:19–25 Sending spies. Having left Horeb, the people very quickly reached the borders of the land (19–20). The command to enter was then repeated (21). It is important to notice that God had already given the land. Its possession was certain—yet it still had to be taken. In a curious way, the promise is also a command. They must have the faith and courage to believe that God means what he says, and can do it. The command not to fear or be discouraged (21) was based on what the people already knew about God, for he had brought them, against all the odds, out of Egypt. The people had reason to trust him. If, however, they lack the faith and courage to do so, they could fail to receive what is rightfully theirs.

The decision to send the spies was a sign of nervousness, though Moses agreed to the plan (23). If the Israelites had believed in God's good intentions for them they would not have needed spies to confirm that 'It is a good land' (25).

1:26–33 The people's fear. The spies saw a good land, but they also saw the people who lived there, who seemed to them like giants (28). Their reaction was fear and discouragement, the very things which Moses had warned them against (21), as he now did again (29). This fear was rooted in lack of faith. They felt, as they had done before, that God had never meant them any good, but that all their journeying up to now had been for the purpose of harming them (27; see also Ex. 17:1–3). In answer, Moses not only reminded them again that God had shown himself to be powerful (30), but also that he loves them (31).

The people, however, had chosen to walk by sight, first by sending the spies, then by letting themselves be discouraged by their report. Oddly, this made them blind to the obvious, that God can overcome any obstacle. Moses was at pains to show how unreasonable this was (32–33).

1:34–40 God's sentence. In 1:8 we read that God had 'sworn' to give Israel the land. Here he swore again (34–35) that this evil generation would not see the promise fulfilled. An exception was made for Caleb (36), one of the spies (see Nu. 13:6), because he had a spirit of faith, not fear (Nu. 14:24).

While Caleb and Moses' successor Joshua (38; see Nu. 14:30), alone of their generation, would see the land, Moses himself would not (37). In Numbers, this sentence on Moses is explained by his failure to lead Israel rightly at the 'waters of Meribah' (Nu. 20:2–5, 12; 27:14). That incident may be in mind here, or possibly just Moses' part in the sending of the spies (23).

The fulfilment of the promise was held over for the next generation, those who were still children. These, being too young to make responsible choices (they do not yet know good from bad, 39), did not share the blame for the faint-heartedness of their parents. The command in v 40, however, sent the people away from the brink of their great prize to their long desert wandering.

1:41–46 Remorse too late. The people's decision (41) seemed to put right their sin of unbelief, but the time of opportunity was past. Despite their right-sounding words, they now trusted their own strength to go and take the land, thinking it easy (41). For this reason, the Lord resolved that they should not enter, and forbade them to go (42). It is very ironic that when they were told to go they would not, and when they did decide to try, that too was against God's command. They went, and were heavily defeated (44). And so they found that, in truth, they could not possess the land unless God gave it. When he turned a deaf ear to their weeping (45), it was because they first turned a deaf ear to him. The NT too teaches that salvation is the gift of God, and may not be forced from him (Acts 8:9–24).

The next two chapters tell how the Israelites set out from Kadesh (in the desert region to the south of the land of Canaan) and occupied the part of the promised land that lay east of the River Jordan. This passage recalls the story in Nu. 20:14–21:35, though it is less detailed. It will be clearer if read with the help of a Bible atlas.

2:1–8a Around Edom. At God's command (1), the people first moved south and east, towards Seir, the mountainous land which lay south of the Dead Sea. This must have seemed a move in the wrong direction, until the further command came to go north through this land, towards Canaan at last (4). The land belonged to the descendants of Esau whom Moses called your brothers (4), because Esau was the brother of Israel's own ancestor Jacob (Gn. 25:25–26). The land of Esau is elsewhere known as Edom (see Gn. 25:30).

As Jacob and Esau had quarrelled (Gn. 27:41–45), so their descendants would be enemies also (see Am. 1:11; Obadiah). In Nu. 20:18–20 we read that enmity was shown even at this meeting of Israel and Edom. However, Deuteronomy wants to stress here that God had given Edom its land, just as he was giving Canaan to Israel (see also 32:8–9; Am. 9:7). It does not tell us, therefore, that in fact the Israelites could not go through Edom, but had to go round it (Nu. 21:4). The Arabah (8) is the extension of the Jordan valley south of the Dead Sea, and, though dry, was a natural western boundary for Edom. Israel probably moved east from here. They were assured, however, that God would provide for them in this further desert journey (7).

2:8b–15 Around Moab. On their journey north, the people next came to the land of Moab, lying east of the southern half of the Dead Sea. Moab too had received its land from the Lord, and, therefore, Israel were forbidden to conquer it. It too was related to Israel, through Abraham's son-in-law Lot (Gn. 19:36–38). It too resisted Israel (Nu. 22–24; and see Dt. 23:3), though we are again told nothing of this here. The Zered Valley was the southern border of Moab; Israel somehow got from here to its northern border, with the Ammonites.

A kind of footnote (10–12) shows how both Moab and Edom had possessed their lands despite great obstacles. So too, God's power will enable his people to overcome such obstacles in their lives.

The death of those who had been adults when the people came out of Egypt (14–15) signals a new stage in the story. They were the ones who had wanted to enter the land in their own strength, and had been defeated (1:44). Now, in contrast, God would have victory. (For the time in the wilderness, cf. Nu. 14:34—forty years. Probably, Deuteronomy allows two years for the journey to Sinai and the time spent there).

2:16–25 The 'Holy War' begins. The note on the Ammonites (19–23) is as if in brackets. Ammon too was related to Israel (Gn. 19:36–38). Its land lay to the north-east of Moab. Again Israel must respect it.

The River Arnon (the northern border of Moab) marks the beginning of the land which Israel might now call its own. The area to the north of Moab, still bordering the Dead Sea, was held by Sihon the Amorite, king of one of the Canaanite peoples whom the Lord had promised to drive out before Israel (see 7:1). The command in v 24 contrasts with those in vs. 5, 9, 19. And notice that it was the Lord who would cause the peoples to fear Israel (25).

2:26–37 The defeat of Sihon. Israel's offer of peace to Sihon (26–29) shows that he brought his fate on himself by his own attitude. Deuteronomy's telling of the story makes a contrast between Edom, Moab and Ammon on the one hand and Sihon on the other, to emphasize Sihon's guilt. When we read that the Lord had made his spirit stubborn and his heart obstinate (30) we are reminded of Pharaoh (Ex. 8:15, 32). The phrase does not mean that Sihon (or Pharaoh) really had no choice. Rather, it is a way of saying that they really did oppose God in his plans for his people.

The Israelites now had another chance to obey God and take the land he had given, but they must believe and go (31; see 1:8). This time they were successful. The important difference from their previous failure against the Amorites (1:44) was that they went at God's command and in his time.

The holy war idea lies behind Deuteronomy's understanding of God's gift of the land to Israel (see also 7:1–5 and cf. Jos. 6–8). In the holy war, the Lord sometimes completely destroyed whole peoples, or put them under a 'ban' (34). This idea is very strange, and seems savage to the modern reader. Two things may be said about it at this point. First, if nations must fight wars, then God wants Israel to know that he will control that part of their life, just like every other part. (The idea of holy war, incidentally, makes sense only when God's people is an independent nation, which takes its place among others on the world stage. While Israel was exactly this at the time of Deuteronomy, Christians believe that God's people the church is a quite different thing, and therefore that the idea of a holy war has no place in the modern world).

Secondly, God is lord of all the earth and, as we have seen, it is he who gives lands to whom he chooses. His choices are not meaningless, however. For God is also judge of all the earth, and Deuteronomy insists that the nations which were driven out were actually guilty. Having said these things, the severity of the judgment on the nations is still hard to understand. We shall consider it further below (ch. 7).

The victory over Sihon has shown that nothing need stand between Israel and the land which God had promised to her. A victory over Amorites was important because it was Amorites who defeated the Israelites when they had first tried to take the land (1:44). Now that no city had proved to be (lit.) 'too high' to take (36), the people's earlier faithless reaction to the spies' report is shown up for the folly it was (1:28).

3:1–11 The defeat of Og. The Israelites continued northwards and were met in battle by another Amorite king, Og of Bashan. Once again, victory was quick and complete (3–4, 6). The main message is by now familiar, the Lord had already given victory, but the people must go and act on his word (2).

The region of Bashan (of which Argob, v 4, must have formed part) lay in the northern part of Transjordan east of the Sea of Galilee ('Kinnereth', v 17). Edrei was some distance east, on the River Yarmuk. Following the defeat of Sihon, Israel also held Gilead, to the south of Bashan. Both regions were fertile (see Am. 4:1, where Bashan is a byword for wealth) and strategic (Israel was now safe from attack from behind as she turned towards the land west of the Jordan). The total area now held by Israel was very large, stretching from the River Arnon, which flowed into the Dead Sea, all the way to Mt Hermon on the borders of Syria (8).

The note on Og's bedstead (11) is a hint of his local fame. It says something too about the technical skills being developed in his kingdom. That the bed should finish up in a museum in Ammon, however, shows nicely that Og and his greatness were a thing of the past.

3:12–17 Occupying the land. The main task of dividing the land was to fall to Joshua after the main conquest (Jos. 12–22; Jos. 12:1–6 gives again, in brief, the details of the present passage). It began here, however. Reuben and Gad are tribes corresponding to two of the sons of Jacob (Gn. 29:32; 30:11). The large tribe of Joseph had sub-divided into two groups, named after Joseph's two sons Manasseh and Ephraim (see Gn. 48:8–16). Manasseh would divide again, as far as territory was concerned, part taking land here in Transjordan, and part on the west of the Jordan (Jos. 17:7–18).

As the settlement in the land became a reality, parts of the regions allocated began to be associated with particular family groupings (14–15), because of their role in the conquest (see Nu. 32:39–42). In time, Makir came to stand for Manasseh (Jdg. 5:14)

Note. The boundary lines can be appreciated only with help of a Bible atlas. The Arabah here (17) refers to the Jordan valley (cf. the note on 2:8). Kinnereth is the Sea of Galilee, and the Sea of the Arabah, or the Salt Sea, is the Dead Sea.

3:18–22 Continuing the conquest. Moses now spoke to the tribes which had just received their territories (18–20). He warned them that their task would not be finished until they had played their full part in the conquest of the whole land. In God's people, no part is to look only to its own interests; this is the true meaning of being brothers (18). The aim of the conquest was rest for the whole people (20; see also 12:9). This means living at peace in a land which fulfils all their needs. The women and children of the Transjordanian tribes were allowed to settle now in their towns; the warriors of all Israel, however, could not do so until the same blessing had been won for all. History would show that they would not always be faithful to this responsibility (Jdg. 5:15b–17a).

Moses' words to Joshua (21–22) also spoke of the need to go on with the task. As the Lord had been faithful up to then, so would he be in the tasks ahead, even if they seemed more difficult.

3:23–29 Moses and Joshua. On the brink of the land which had been his life-goal, Moses boldly expressed to God his longing to set foot on it, in spite of what God had already said to him about this (1:37). For the most part in Deuteronomy, our attention is not drawn to Moses, even though he is always present. This is a mark of his devotion to God's service—he may well have called himself God's servant (24). Here we have a glimpse of the man himself.

His prayer shows how close was his relationship with God, even though he asked something which was refused. It expressed worship; Moses was convinced that God could act in a way that no other god would (24), having seen the evidence, both in the exodus and now again in Transjordan. (He did not necessarily mean here that other gods actually existed; his question is rhetorical.) The answer was as before (26); Moses was involved in the guilt of the unfaithful generation of the wilderness (see above on 1:37). He must be content with seeing the land from Mt Pisgah, a high range near the northern end of the Dead Sea (27). The peak that Moses climbed is more precisely identified as Mt Nebo in 34:1.

In God's wisdom, the new phase of Israel's history needed a new leader. Moses' commissioning of Joshua is an important theme of Deuteronomy, and vital for the people's confidence. We see here at what great personal cost Moses did this. His laying down of his own deepest desire is the best measure of his faithfulness.

4:1–40 Preaching God's laws

Since the beginning of the book, we have been waiting for the actual requirements made of Israel in their covenant relationship with God (1:1, 3, 18). Up to now, there has been only the basic command to have enough faith to enter the land (2:31; 3:2, 22). This new section (4:1–40), though it is still within Moses' first address, a kind of prologue to the book, begins to show what was to be expected of Israel in the covenant.

4:1–8 'Decrees and laws'. Deuteronomy typically uses a number of different words for 'law'. Three appear in vs 1–2 (decrees, laws and commands)—not counting 'word' (translated what I command you), which can have the same meaning. V 1 states that keeping the commandments will lead to life, an important idea in the book (see 30:19–20).

This idea may surprise the reader who is used to the NT's teaching that salvation does not come by works of the law, but by faith (Rom. 9:31–32). Paul even seems to oppose the present verse, with Lv. 18:5, in Rom. 10:5 (to understand the Romans passage see the commentary on Romans, and below on Dt. 30:11–14). However, we should bear in mind that Deuteronomy seeks obedience from the heart (6:5; 10:16). This is different from dry legalism.

Moses went on to show that faithfulness to God had already brought life, and wickedness, death, in Israel's experience (3–4). Properly understood, keeping God's laws brings freedom and delight (see Ps. 119:45, 47). This was Israel's true destiny in the land. Other nations had their wisdom, but would envy that of Israel, whose very laws were wisdom (6). Israel's laws were unlike any others, just as her God was unlike any other (see 3:24). Their righteousness (8) implies that they bring salvation. Law and life are intimately related.

4:9–14 Keeping the faith. The key ideas here are 'learning' and 'teaching' (10–14). It is one thing to meet God once and hear his word; it is another to remain faithful. The people would always be in danger of 'forgetting' God's ways (9), for forgetting belongs to the heart as well as the mind. Therefore, they must discipline themselves and their children by diligence in learning and teaching the words of God (10, 12–14). In this context mention is made of the stone tablets (13) on which the Ten Commandments were written; the point of their writing down was as a witness to God's revelation, so that the people might always remember the requirements of their covenant relationship with him.

4:15–24 Worshipping God alone. The single most important thing that set Israel's religion apart from those of other nations was that it allowed no image to be made of God (see v 12 and 5:8–9). Images of any creature, or even the stars in the sky, might be mistaken for the form of God, or a god (16–19). God is not to be confused with any part of his own creation; by these commands he carefully guards his own spiritual nature. If he calls himself jealous in doing so (23–24), it is because he fervently desires that his people should know him truly, and thus live (22b—for the contrast with Moses, see 1:37; 3:25–26).

4:25–31 The exile foreseen. In Israel's later history they would fail to keep the covenant at this basic level of true worship, and thus go into exile (25–27; see also 2 Ki. 17:9–12; 21:11–12; Je. 8:2). This will be like putting the promises into reverse (26–27; see also 28:64–68). And ironically, they will have in exile their fill of idols, find them powerless (28; see also Is. 44:9–20), and soon seek God again (29–30). It is very revealing for Deuteronomy's understanding of God that a breach of the covenant should not draw a line under his relationship with Israel once and for all. God, in his mercy, will receive his people again, if they seek him in heartfelt penitence (30–31; see also 30:1–10).

4:32–40 God's love for Israel. Moses finished his first address by summing up its main themes. There is no god like the God who had made himself known to Israel, nor any people like Israel, since they had been singled out by this God (see 3:24; 4:7). He saved them miraculously from slavery in Egypt, in order to give them life and freedom in a land in which he alone would be their king. In doing so he showed both his love (37) and his discipline (36). These cannot be separated; and when Israel carefully obeys God's word of love, she will have life (40).

4:41–43 Cities of refuge

When the land was occupied it was regarded as urgent to protect the lives of those who were unjustly pursued in blood-vengeance. Here cities were provided for the tribes which had been given land in Transjordan. (See also Nu. 35; Jos. 21, following the allocation of the whole land.)

4:44–28:68 Moses' second address

4:44–49 Introduction to the laws

The words This is the law (44) refer to all the laws that follow in chs. 5–26. The typical terms for the laws follow (45, see also v 1 and comment). One new term stipulations (the Hebrew word carries the idea of witness) is added. The different words do not refer to different kinds of law.

Rather, they build up a picture of the nature of the laws, bringing together ideas of witness to God's character, permanent statute and basis for right judgment.

The laws were not new ones, but the same which were given at Horeb after the exodus (45). They were now given anew, in the context of Moses' preaching in Moab (46). The geographical details (46–49) are condensed from 3:8–17.

5:1–21 The Ten Commandments

Moses' second address proper now begins, with a basic call to pay heed to the law (1). He stressed the need for the covenant to become real here and now, and exaggerated to make the point (2–3). The covenant had indeed been made with the previous generation, the one which had been sentenced to wander in the desert and not see the land (1:35). However, it was vital that it should be treated as a new thing in each generation. The word today (1) sums up the need for this new commitment. It was as if this generation itself stood at Horeb (4).

The words face to face seem odd after 4:12, 15. They do not contradict those verses, however, but point to the directness of God's speaking with them. Even so, Moses had to stand between God and the people as a kind of mediator, because of their fear (5), and because of his own special relationship with God (see Ex. 33:11).

The Ten Commandments, or Decalogue, are first met at Ex. 20:2–17. (For a full exposition of them see the commentary at that place.) They now reappear in this prominent position in Deuteronomy, because they are no less than the basis of the covenant relationship. They also stand at the head of all the commands in Deuteronomy, because they are their source. Everything else follows from them.

We notice here two slight differences from the form of the Decalogue in Exodus, which help to understand Deuteronomy's special concerns. In the fourth commandment, it is stressed that the Sabbath rest was for the benefit of the servants of the household as well as of the masters (14; cf. Ex. 20:10). This merely draws out the significance of the command, and is in keeping with Deuteronomy's insistence on the equal right of all in Israel to enjoy the blessings of the covenant. The Sabbath, furthermore, was grounded in the release from Egypt rather than in the creation, again laying stress on God's special relationship with his people (15, cf. Ex. 20:11).

5:22–11:32 Basic exhortations

5:22–33 The commandments accepted. The Ten Commandments were spoken directly to the people from the fire and the cloud that covered the mountain (Ex. 19:16–18). God would give other commands to the people through Moses, but these were special, and there could be nothing else quite like them (22). For the two stone tablets, see 4:13 and comment.

Many in ancient Israel thought that to see God was to die (see Jdg. 13:22; Is. 6:5). This is why the people were amazed to be still alive (24), but they were still fearful at being so close to God's presence (25–26). Curiously, they feared that, hearing God, they would die, yet it is only the words of God that can give them life (4:1)! However, they were willing to hear God, if only Moses would act as a go-between (27). (See also their acceptance of the terms of the covenant in Ex. 24:3.)

The Lord rejoiced in their willingness (28–29). His words here show that he is not some distant lawgiver, but loves his people passionately; his deepest desire is their good. Moses was confirmed in his role as go-between, or mediator (30–31). Faithfulness to the covenant would bring life and well-being, and the nation would have peace for a long time.

6:1–9 Passing on the teaching. Moses then moved on to the teaching which the Lord had given him for Israel in addition to the Ten Commandments, or as further explanation of them. In introducing this teaching he reminds the people again that these commandments are the way to life, reaching into the far future (2c). This long view raised once more the need for the teaching to be passed on—hence the phrase you, your children and their children after you (2). The vision of Israel in the land (3) is one of large numbers (fulfilling the promise to Abraham, Gn. 15:5), and of plenty (fulfilling a promise made to Moses at his call, Ex. 3:17).

The next passage has become a central prayer in Judaism (called the Shema, Hear, after its opening word), because it expresses in so few words the most important ideas in OT religion. First, the Lord alone is God of Israel.

To all intents and purposes he is the only God, since his power extends to all nations (32:8–9). Israel must worship him alone. Secondly, Israel itself is a unity. In Hebrew the words you and your in this passage (as often in Deuteronomy) are the words used when speaking to a single individual (the old ‘thou’ and ‘thy’ forms in English). The people’s oneness includes both those who then stood before Moses and all the generations to come. This means that they must worship and obey as one, and allow no major divisions among them (see below on slavery, 15:12–18). It is also the reason why they must educate each new generation in the truth about God and themselves (7).

Thirdly, it is not enough for God’s people simply to go through certain motions in their life and worship. Rather, they must truly love God, and devote their whole lives to him (5). The phrase with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength is a way of saying the whole person. The biblical idea of the heart covers our ideas of the will and the mind, so when Jesus recalled this passage in slightly different words he is still giving its essential meaning (Mt. 22:37; Mk. 12:30). True godliness means that all our abilities, as well as all we possess, are given to God.

The words of God are to be ever before his people (6–9), part of the routines of life, and of every normal human activity. This is not a religion for the Sabbath (or Sundays) only. God has something to say about every aspect of life and every decision that human beings can make. That is the point of the many kinds of regulations which we meet from ch. 12 onwards; together they express God’s rule over the whole life of the people, individually and together—even though we live in a different time and place, we are obliged to work at making them apply to ourselves. Whether the instructions in vs 8–9 were meant to be taken literally or figuratively is hard to tell; the crucial point is that God’s words should be upon your hearts (6). Those who love God will want to keep his commandments (Jn. 14:15).

6:10–19 Life in the land. Moses did not tire of reminding the people that the land they were about to enjoy was God’s gift, promised ages ago to the forefathers of Israel (10; cf. 1:8). Then he paused to show how good this land would be (10–11), full of all the things a desert people longs for. It was not only naturally fruitful (Ex. 3:8), but had been tended and developed by its inhabitants. Moses wanted to stress the fact that the land with its wealth was indeed a gift to Israel. Their well-being must be a cause for gratitude, not self-satisfaction (12). Material prosperity, as modern western society shows, can always lead to spiritual indifference.

In Deuteronomy, the basic promise always keeps close company with the basic command. The gift brings a choice, which is now put in terms very like the first three commandments (13–15; cf. 5:7–11). When God gives the land, then he alone must be worshipped in it; it will be his people in his land. The swearing of oaths in his name (rather than in the names of other gods) is a way of expressing his unique right to their loyalty. His ‘jealousy’ (see 5:9) is his determination not to permit rivals, which is matched, of course, by total commitment on his part to the relationship with his people.

The basic command restated, Moses referred again (16–19) to the need for obedience to the range of commands anticipated in the Decalogue (5:6–21) and still to be fully set out. These are here put beside the command to take the land (a major theme in chs. 1–3). The people's commitment to a life of right and good was the other side of God's desire to let them enjoy the good land (18). The words in v 16, however, were a necessary reminder that Israel's record had not always been one of willing obedience—even when the Lord was in the act of doing them good (see Ex. 17:7; Ps. 95:8).

Jesus used the words of vs 13 and 16 in Mt. 4:7, 10 (Lk. 4:8, 12) in response to Satan's attempt to get him to use religious power rather than give God true worship. Jesus saw his own experience of forty days in the wilderness as re-enacting Israel's testing there for forty years. Likewise, his followers should learn from times of difficulty to rely more fully on God.

6:20–25 Teaching the children. Moses then expanded the command to teach children the facts of the faith (20–25; see v 7). The child's question and parent's response remind us of the pattern for the Passover celebration (Ex. 12:26–28). When the child asks about stipulations, decrees and laws (20) it is interesting that the parent answers by telling how God miraculously rescued the people from Egypt, in fulfilment of the ancient promise (21–23). The commands, then, come after the promise, and are part of God's intention to bless his people (24b). Righteousness here has the sense of a true relationship between God and his people, and includes not only their keeping his standards, but also his commitment to save and keep them.

7:1–26 A holy people. Moses' address then focused on the need for Israel to take the land from its present inhabitants. In choosing Israel and giving her the land of Canaan, God also rejected the current dwellers in the land and put an end to their right to live there. This has always been implied by the promise (Ex. 3:17; 23:23).

The list of nations shows that the occupants of the land were not a single people, but distinct groups living in various parts of the land, and probably holding a number of fortified cities. Little is known of the Perizzites, Hivites or Girgashites (though see Jos. 11:3; Jdg. 3:3 for some locations). Amorites and Canaanites can have broader and narrower meanings, referring on the one hand to the peoples of Canaan in general (as in Gn. 15:16), but on the other to particular groups (see Jos. 5:1; 11:3). The Hittites, who controlled an empire in Anatolia and Syria in the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries BC, were apparently a migrant population (see Gn. 23). Jebusites controlled Jerusalem (see Jos. 15:63).

Part of the reason for the command to destroy the Canaanites was that they were themselves under God's judgment for their sin. The beginning of their story in the Bible goes back to their ancestor Ham, the son of Noah (Gn. 10:6, 15–18). Canaan, Ham's son, was laid under a curse because of Ham's lack of filial respect for his father (Gn. 9:20–25). When the land of Canaan was promised to Abraham's descendants, it was not given straight away because 'the sin of the Amorites has not yet reached its full measure' (Gn. 15:16). According to Deuteronomy, these peoples' wickedness was evidently very great, and therefore it was time for judgment (9:5).

The command to destroy these peoples was absolute. We have noted already that it was based on the ideas of God as lord and as judge in Israel's life and in all the world (see 2:34 and notes there). The present passage (1–6) explains the command further. Israel, God's people, was to keep itself free from the wickedness and corruption of the nations' religion and life. God's vision is for a people that knows him, and which becomes a certain kind of society because of that knowledge. That Israel should live alongside these peoples, yet be faithful to the covenant, was regarded as difficult or impossible. Inevitably (partly through inter-marriage, v 3), the covenant people would cease to be distinctive; the worship of the Lord would be overwhelmed by that of Baal (4). If this happened, the whole purpose of rescuing Israel from Egypt to be a different kind of people would be frustrated. The removal of the Canaanites aimed above all to root out the false religion which they practised (5).

The destruction of the Canaanites, therefore, is part of a war between true and false religion (see also Eph. 6:12). Like the judgment on the world in the flood, it is only meant to happen once (Gn. 9:15b), and to show, in Israel's life, God's total opposition to the worship of other gods, which brings with it every kind of evil.

In saying why God rejected the Canaanites, we have seen something of why he chose Israel. In vs 6–11 this choice is explained further. First, to say Israel was chosen is as much as to say that she was holy (6). Both ideas mean a separation of this one people to belong specially to him (as his treasured possession, a king's personal treasure; see Ex. 19:5).

Secondly, it had nothing to do with Israel's own power (7); God's people must not feel able to boast in that (see 8:17). They had done nothing to deserve the love which had led God to rescue them from Egypt (8).

Thirdly, the choice of Israel brought obligations. God had made a covenant because of his love, and he would show his faithfulness in it, but he expected in return a love which was willing to be obedient (9). God's undertaking to expel the Canaanites was quickly followed by a stern warning to Israel not to take their own relationship with him for granted. The sign that that relationship was true would not be the name of 'Israel', nor any outward mark, but only a willingness to do the commandments of God (10–11). This is the other side of 'holiness'. The same warning still echoes in the NT (e.g. Rom. 9:30–32), and comes today not only to Jews but also to Christians.

Fourthly, the choice of Israel, and rejection of the Canaanites, was not for Israel's sake alone. Though it is not evident in Deuteronomy, the long-term purpose of the choice of Israel must not be forgotten, namely to bring blessing to all the peoples of the earth (Gn. 12:3). When God brought Israel into her land, it was a step on the way to that end. Israel in covenant with God could show the world what God is like—if she could be faithful.

The next passage (12–15) gives a glimpse of an obedient people blessed by God. The blessings belong firmly to 'this life', in accordance with Deuteronomy's vision. God thus affirms that the world he has made is good (see Gn. 1), and that it is possible for people to enjoy it. The blessings mentioned here, however, may also be seen as tokens of God's good intentions for his people in the age to come as well as in the present age.

Moses finally returned to the opening theme of the chapter, the necessity to remain untouched by the wicked practices of Canaan (16–26). At the same time he urged the people again not to fear the enemy, remembering their past failures (1:26–28) and reminding them of God's power to defeat the Canaanites as he defeated the Egyptians (see 1:29). He stressed that it is God who will be the true victor. (The word translated hornet in v 20 is obscure (it may be an image of panic and confusion; cf. Ex 23:28; Jos. 24:12), but the point is clear: the LORD has his own means of doing what he plans.) V 22 gives a clue that the conquest will not be quick and easy, as the people would find out (Jos. 13:1). Yet it would be inevitable if they were faithful. And it must be complete; even the names of the former peoples (represented by their kings) are to be 'wiped out' (24).

The final commands (25–26) required the destruction of the paraphernalia of false religion, and take up Deuteronomy's special hatred of images. The people must not be tempted by the idols because of the valuable materials used in them (25). Even to tamper with these things is to play with fire. They were therefore laid under the same ban as those who used them (2:34; 7:2).

8:1–9 Discipline in the desert. Up till now, Israel's period in the desert has been seen only as punishment for failing to go into the land at God's command (1:35, 46). Here, another angle is put on it, namely an opportunity for faith to grow. Jeremiah would later remember the desert period as one of devotion to God (Je. 2:2; see also Ho. 2:14). The emphasis here, however, is on discipline (2, 5), which is another side of God's love for Israel (7:6).

The opening verse makes a link again between the commandments and life (see 4:1 and comments). The command to be careful (1) is typical of Deuteronomy (see 7:12; 11:16). It is backed up here with the call to remember God's leading in the desert (2). Obedience to God is a matter not only of understanding, but of will and heart (see 6:5 and comments); and the heart is prone to go its own way. The strong sense of this human weakness in Deuteronomy explains commands like this, and the book's repetitive teaching style in general.

In the desert, the Israelites had been suddenly removed from all the familiar ways of obtaining what they needed to live. Even as slaves in Egypt, they had known where their next meal was coming from. They had not been desert people, and the hardness of life there seemed to threaten them with death (Ex. 16:3). These were times for testing faith in God. Their hunger proved that they could not survive without God's provision; and the miracle of the manna, and other unusual signs, showed that he was well able to meet their needs (3–4; see Ex. 16:4). The words later used by Jesus against Satan (Mt. 4:4; cf. comment on 6:13), man does not live on bread alone but on every word that comes from the mouth of the LORD (3), are not contrasting the life of the spirit with that of the body; rather, they are showing that all of life comes from God. His word is creative and life-giving (see Gn. 1) as well as commanding.

The land itself is a dream come true (7–10). This is the most delightful description of it in the book. To appreciate it, we have to remember that it was spoken to a people that had known only the hard desert life (though see 6:10–11). Plentiful water, a variety of crops, even luxuries such as olive oil and honey (or 'jam')—the goodness of God's gifts to human beings is known best after scarcity.

8:10–20 Do not forget! The theme of this section is very like that of the last. Now, however, the Israelites' tendency to forget God is more to the fore. It is natural to look to God in the desert, when nothing comes easily and when death is always near. But when there is plenty, human nature finds it harder to give God his due. This is a real problem which Deuteronomy faces squarely: God wants to bless his people with all the good things of his creation; yet when they receive those good things they are very likely to turn away from him, thinking that they do not need him. Great wealth can lead to the delusion of self-sufficiency (17).

The problem goes deep in human beings' relationship with God. There are those who believe that their wealth is a direct blessing from God, a sign of his approval. It is sometimes even thought that poverty is a sign of the opposite, his anger. The truth is not so simple. Everything we have is indeed from God; yet comfortable well-being can blind people to their need of him, while the lack or loss of wealth (or health) can awaken faith. When we feel God has blessed us that is the very time to seek him as never before, and praise him for his faithfulness (10).

It was for this reason that the desert experience came before the gift of land, to humble the people. It was itself a gift, despite its harshness (15), whose purpose was blessing in the end (16b). And it was designed to remain in the people's memory, so that they might not forget, once they had reached journey's end in the promised land, that all their good comes from God (14, 18).

At stake was the covenant itself (18). The passage ends with a now familiar warning not to worship other gods. For the Israelites, to ‘forget God’ may well have meant giving their loyalty to some other god. False ideas are at the root of all wicked actions. Idolatry for modern people is any belief about what produces ‘good’ which has no place for God.

9:1–6 A stiff-necked people. The Israelites had once refused even to try to go into the land because of the great size and strength of its people, who included the gigantic Anakites (Dt. 1:28; Nu. 13:22; Jos. 11:22). The Lord now assured the people that he would overcome even these terrible enemies (as he had defeated Sihon and Og in Transjordan, 2:24–3:10). Nevertheless, the people themselves must still act. Notice the balance between he will destroy them and you will drive them out (3b).

In ch. 8 Moses spoke of the change from poverty to wealth, and the moral dangers that change would bring. Then he turned to another change in Israel’s life, from oppressed people to conquerors. The temptation that this might bring was the idea that God had given them the land because they were better (more ‘righteous’) than other peoples (4). To believe this would have been another kind of ingratitude for God’s goodness in blessing them. Moses showed, therefore (4–6), that they would conquer the other nations, not because of their righteousness, but for two quite different reasons: for the sake of God’s promise to the forefathers, and because of the other nations’ wickedness. And to reinforce the point, he went on to say that in fact the Israelites were far from being ‘righteous’; on the contrary their record showed that they were stiff-necked, or stubbornly resistant to God’s way for them.

9:7–29 The golden calf. The next long passage proves Moses’ point that the Israelites were naturally stubborn. It recalls times when they had rebelled against God, especially the worst rebellion of all, the making of the golden calf (Ex. 32). This too they must remember (7; along with God’s leading them in the desert, 8:2, and his commandments, 8:11). In order to keep on the difficult path of obedience to the covenant they must not only know God’s goodness but also their own weakness. For this reason Moses now faced them with the painful memory of what they had done at Horeb.

First the story of the calf itself is told (8–17). It was the worst sin imaginable. It happened while the covenant was still being signed and sealed at Horeb. The covenant itself had been concluded, and the people had agreed to its terms (Ex. 24:7). Moses had gone back up the mountain in order to receive from God the Commandments written on tablets of stone (9; Ex. 24:12). It was then that the people, with the Commandments fresh in their minds, as well as the awful meeting with God in the thunder, fire and cloud (Ex. 19:16–19), persuaded Aaron to make an idol (16a; Ex. 32:1). Thus they broke the first two, crucial commandments, and turned their backs on the covenant as soon as it was made (12b, 16b).

At that time the Lord had thought of disowning his people. (Notice how he called them Moses’ people, and said that Moses had brought them out of Egypt; 12.) He was even on the point of destroying them, and making a new nation of Moses’ offspring (v 14b is like the original promise to Abraham, Gn. 12:2). When Moses broke the tablets it was as if the covenant itself lay in ruins (17).

Moses, however, did not seek the honour of fathering a new people himself. Rather he prayed for those to whom he had devoted his life, showing that the prophet’s role included intercession as well as speaking the words of God. For his sincerity and persistence he was heard, and the people were spared (19b). In the prayer itself (26–29), Moses appealed to three things. First he recalled God’s promise to the forefathers, which God himself had stressed so much (27; and see 1:8). Secondly, he pointed to all that God had done for them up to now, bringing them out of Egypt and making them his people (26, 29). Since they were his inheritance, God would actually be frustrating himself by destroying his people. Thirdly, he argued that God's own honour was at stake, for his judgment on his people would be seen by other nations as powerlessness to save them (28). This element of persuasion seems to be an important part of the power of Moses' prayer.

Note. 22–24 Almost as a parenthesis, Moses mentioned other occasions when Israel rebelled on their journey to the land. This was meant to show that the first and greatest sin was not an isolated incident, but that the people was rebellious at heart.

10:1–11 The covenant remade. The following section continues directly from the preceding one. When God told Moses to make two more stone tablets it was his reply to Moses' prayer for the people (9:26–29). When the first tablets were broken (9:17) it seemed that the covenant story might end there and then. The new tablets meant that the covenant was renewed. This is very important in the theology of Deuteronomy. The covenant between God and Israel can overcome Israel's sin in the end, because of God's forgiveness and grace.

The new tablets, like the first, had the Ten Commandments written on them (see 4:13), that is, the basic requirements of the covenant. They were to be kept in a special chest, or ark, which Moses had made for the purpose (1, 3), and which is called elsewhere in Deuteronomy 'the ark of the covenant of the LORD' (31:9, 25). The ark has a particular emphasis in Deuteronomy. In Exodus we read that it was a rich and elaborate construction, a centre-piece of the tabernacle, from where the Lord spoke to the people (Ex. 25:10–22). Here its function as the container of the tablets of the law is stressed. The order of events is even compressed somewhat in Deuteronomy, in order to stress that the proper function of the ark was to hold the tablets. (In Exodus the making of the ark by Bezalel is not directly connected with the making of the new tablets; Ex. 37:1–9; see also 34:1–4).

The story of the breach and renewal of the covenant at Horeb is rounded off in vs 10–11, with the repetition of God's decision not to destroy the people. They might now continue on their way into the land as his covenant people.

Vs 6–9 seem to interrupt the story. However, the note about Aaron's death shows that he did not die at Horeb, despite his role in the sin there (9:16–21), and therefore that Moses' prayer for him (9:20) had been answered (as had his prayer for the people). For the place-names see Nu. 33:31–33. They were presumably close to Mt Hor (Nu. 20:27–28).

The mention of Aaron (who was of the tribe of Levi) seems to prompt a note about the Levites. In this passage the term Levites is used broadly to include the priests as well as the lower order of clergy, though the term can be used of these latter alone. On the death of Aaron, his role as priest would be borne by his descendants. (Aaron's sons were consecrated priests with him, Ex. 28–29.) Because of their priestly role the tribe of Levi would not possess a special territory of their own in Israel, like the other tribes. They would get their living from their priestly work.

10:12–22 Religion of the heart. The remainder of the chapter, and indeed ch. 11, is concerned with motivating the Israelites to be faithful to the covenant which had thus been renewed. First, Moses returned to the basic command of Deuteronomy, to love the Lord with heart and soul (12; cf. 6:5). To fear the Lord (12) is to give him due worship, recognizing his lordship over all the world. It is a natural accompaniment of love for him. The commands in vs 12–13 stress obedience to God's word. The phrase what does the LORD your God ask of you? is very like that in Mi. 6:8. Both passages aim to show that religion, with its practices, is dead unless it comes from the heart.

Moses went on to recall God's choice of Israel (14–15), and tried to stir their gratitude by dwelling on the wonder of this (see 7:7–8; 9:6). Then he used a new figure of speech to urge them to be changed from the stubborn people they had been in the past (16; cf. 9:6). The idea of 'circumcision of the heart' is another way of saying that outward signs and rituals are nothing in themselves, even though circumcision was given by God as a sign of his special relationship with Israel (Gn. 17:9–14). Deuteronomy does not want to abolish this and other rituals (such as sacrifice), only to put them in a true perspective.

Moses' thought then turned to another implication of God's character, namely his love of justice. A people that truly loves God will be like him in seeking the good of the defenceless, and doing so regardless of its own interests (17–19). This principle lies behind all the laws which are to follow in chs. 12–26.

The chapter finishes (20–22) with a final call to worship God alone, and a reminder of his faithfulness to his promise (see Gn. 15:5).

11:1–7 The Lord's discipline. As we have seen, the present generation was not held responsible for the people's failure to occupy the promised land at the first opportunity (1:39; cf. 2:14–15). Furthermore, Moses had stressed that God was making a covenant directly with them (5:3). They were now warned to learn from the way in which God had dealt with them since leaving Egypt. They had a special responsibility to understand the experiences they had had during the desert years. Their children, too young to appreciate those things or not yet born, would depend on them for their knowledge of what God had done (2; cf. vs 19–21).

What the people had seen is called God's discipline (2), never far from his love. It is illustrated in two quite different ways. First, Moses recalled the overthrow of the Egyptians, both in the plagues (3, cf. Ex. 7:14–12:30) and by the Israelites defeating the army which chased them after Pharaoh had allowed them to leave his land (4, cf. Ex. 14:5–31). This discipline was a proof of God's power as well as his love for his chosen people.

Secondly, Moses recalled the fate of Dathan and Abiram, who had challenged the right of Moses and Aaron to their roles of leadership, and, in particular, had wanted to share in the priesthood, rather than accept their status as 'Levites' (Nu. 16:3, 8–10). (For the duties of Levites in this narrower sense see Nu. 3:1–37, and the comment on Dt. 10:6–9).

'Discipline' here appears in its darker aspect, as the judgment of God on failure to keep the covenant, and especially on impudent, self-assertive rejection of his ways.

11:8–25 A land God cares for. Moses again made a link between obedience and life in the land (cf. 4:1). The contrast with Egypt is interesting because Dathan and Abiram had claimed that Egypt was a fertile land, and that the promised land had not materialized (Nu. 16:12–14). In fact, Egypt was fertile only thanks to laborious irrigation methods, whereas the promised land would be fertile because of the rain which God would give (10–11). V 12 suggests a parallel between God's choice of and care for the land and his love for his chosen people.

As always in Deuteronomy, the promise is linked closely with command. The richness of the land will be enjoyed only by a people that keeps the covenant requirements. Vs 14–15 give a picture of life as it might be enjoyed by such a people, with regular rains in autumn and spring, both essential to a healthy harvest. Grain, new wine and oil (14) is a typical way of speaking of the yield of the land in Deuteronomy (cf. 7:13; 12:17).

In contrast, a people that turns to other gods may not expect this abundance (16–17; and see 1 Ki. 17:1). These two alternatives are elsewhere known as the 'blessing' and the 'curse' (see below on v 26).

The blessing may be secured not only for the present generation but for all that follow, if the requirements of the covenant are faithfully taught as part of the life-style of the people (19–21; cf. 6:5–9). To avoid the impression, however, that the relationship between God and Israel was based on law-keeping alone, Moses returned to the idea of promise. The land could be Israel's only as God's gift (22–23, 25). The extent of the land (24) is as promised to Abraham (Gn. 15:18).

11:26–32 Two ways. The long prelude to the individual laws is drawing to a close. The present passage forms a link between it and the remainder of the book. The blessing and the curse (hinted at in vs 14–17) are the two ways open to Israel (26–28). These were spelt out at length after the laws had been given (Dt. 28). The solemnity of the choice Israel must make was impressed on them by a ceremony which took place on Mts Ebal and Gerizim, near the city of Shechem in the heart of the land (29–30). Their possession of Shechem was to be a kind of celebration of their conquest of the whole land, which would surely follow (hence the allusion to the Canaanites). The command itself is repeated and elaborated in ch. 27, and carried out in due course by Joshua (Jos. 8:30–35). Finally (32) Moses used now familiar words of exhortation to keep the covenant requirements. This leads directly into ch. 12, the beginning of the detailed, individual laws which were to govern the life of Israel in the land.

12:1–26:15 Specific laws

12:1–12 The place of worship. The particular laws now begin, v 1 forming a link with the general instructions which went before. The commands in ch. 12 concern the right worship of the Lord, and are a consequence of the basic requirement that Israel shall worship him alone (5:7). The former command to destroy all traces of Canaanite worship (7:5, 25) is now repeated (2–4). The point of desecrating their places of worship (2) is that that was where their names were remembered (3). The old Semitic view was that in the name lay the being and the power of any person. V 3 lists the trappings of the idolatrous religion of Canaan. The stone pillar was probably a kind of fertility symbol; the Asherah was named after the goddess Asherah, and may have been a wooden pole carved in her image.

In contrast to this false worship the Lord had chosen a place at which his Name should be remembered (5). The place is not identified. Location itself is not important, but only that it is the Lord's. In Israel's history it would be a number of places in succession, especially Shiloh (Je. 7:12) and Jerusalem (2 Ki. 21:4).

The command to go to the place (5) has in mind the regular worship of Israel. V 6 gives a list of sacrifices and offerings which will form part of that regular worship. The list here is not exhaustive, but a kind of summary of Israelite worship. (For a full description of the sacrifices see Lv. 1–7 and commentary). The burnt offering was offered as a whole to the Lord on the altar (Lv. 1:9); other kinds of sacrifice were largely consumed by worshipper and priest. The reasons for offering sacrifice might vary (see e.g. Lv. 7:11–18).

The dominant note in this worship is to be joy. V 7, in fact, offers an insight into the vision of Deuteronomy: a united people rejoicing in worship in the presence of its one God.

Vs 8–10 recall the current situation of the Israelites, not yet able, because of their desert lifestyle, to do all that would later be required. The promised rest from their enemies (see 3:20 and comment) will have been won only when all Israelites have settled in their allotted portions of the land, and their wars are over.

Vs 11–12 repeat the commands of vs 6–7, including the call to rejoice, but also issue an instruction to include the poor and weak in the community in the worship. We have seen that this is a basic implication of God's own character, to be worked out among his people (see 10:17–19). Now it is repeated in the context of worship. Deuteronomy knows that worship without either joy or love is dead.

12:13–28 An exception. This section is a long qualification of the preceding one. When the Israelites at last live in their land, many of them will live at a distance from the place of sacrifice. Though they will be required to make the pilgrimage on occasions (see Ex. 23:17), they are likely to do so infrequently. The present regulations permit them, therefore, to eat meat even though it has not been slaughtered sacrificially (the requirement of Lv. 17:1–7, when the people were still in the desert). In these cases animals which were fit for sacrifice would now be on a par with others which were not (e.g. the gazelle and the deer, v 15). The only restriction is that they must dispose of the blood properly, since blood must never be consumed (Gn. 9:4; Lv. 17:10–12). Saul carries out such a 'profane slaughter' in 1 Sa. 14:32–35.

Vs 15–19 and 20–28 are parallel statements of this permission. Each passage first gives the permission, then restates the basic rule that actual sacrifices must be taken to the place of worship.

12:29–31 Purity in worship. Ch. 12 is in many ways like ch. 7. Each begins and ends with warnings not to be led astray by Canaanite religion. These verses take up the theme of vs 1–4, and so close off the chapter by reminding the reader of the basic purpose of the regulations that it has given.

13:1–18 Temptations to idolatry. The primary concern of the laws with the first commandment (exclusive loyalty to the Lord, 5:7) underlies this chapter as it did the last. It considers three ways in which the Israelites might be led astray to worship false gods.

The first possible temptation comes from false prophets. At times it would not be easy for Israelites to recognize a false prophet, as they might use the typical language, and claim to have had revelations which could not easily be tested.

The first test of a true prophet was whether he was loyal to the Lord (there would be at least one other; see 18:20–22). No kind of experience or fine speech could make up for such basic error. The whole call of Israel would be put in danger by such a person—hence the recollection of the redemption from Egypt as part of the motivation to reject the idolater (5), and the renewed appeal to love the Lord (3). The false prophet must be severely dealt with. (The testing in v 3 is not deliberately devised by the Lord; the false prophet, nevertheless, does indeed provide a test of discernment and faithfulness).

Secondly, the temptation to false religion might come from any member of the community (6–11). In that case a grievous responsibility fell on the closest relatives and friends to expose the cancer in the body, and take the initiative in cutting it out.

Finally, the same rigour is to be applied to whole towns in which idolatrous worship has taken root (12–18). There may well be a political side to the apostasy of a whole town, since religion was so bound up with politics. That is, for a town to go after Baal would be a kind of protest against belonging to 'Israel' in the sense in which the Mosaic covenant means this. Such towns were to be subjected to the same 'ban' that Canaanite towns were laid under when Israel first entered the land (15–16; cf. 2:34; 7:1–5). Their fate—being left a heap of ruins for ever (16)—is just what would later befall the city of Ai at the hand of Joshua (Jos. 8:28). (This shows, incidentally, that it is the false religion, and not the peoples in question, that God hated.)

The measures commanded here are severe indeed, but they should be seen against the background of the powerful temptations which did indeed come to Israel during her history in the land of Canaan. The books of Kings are a story of chronic failure in this respect. Idolatry would, and did, undermine the very purpose for which God chose Israel, which was in the end the salvation of the world.

14:1–21 The holy people marked out. The next set of laws mainly concerns food. The passage opens by recalling that Israel is holy and chosen (2), a combination we have seen in 7:6 (see comment there). Now the people are also called God's children (lit. 'sons'; see 1:31; Ex. 4:22; Ho. 11:1 for the same idea using the singular). This close relationship which God has with the people is now made the basis of laws which are to mark them out visibly from others. The practices outlawed in v 1b belonged to Canaanite mourning rites (see 1 Ki. 18:28).

The bulk of the passage (3–20) distinguishes creatures which are considered acceptable for food from those which are not. The terms used are clean and unclean. There is no agreement on the exact meaning of these words. The main possibilities are that some animals were regarded as unfit to eat for health reasons, or that they were rejected for religious reasons. (The NIV's ceremonially unclean in v 7b suggests the latter, though there is no extra word in Hebrew for ceremonially.)

Attempts to explain the underlying meaning of clean and unclean are hampered by the fact that a number of the animals themselves cannot be certainly identified. It may be too that there is no single underlying reason for acceptance and rejection. Sometimes, however, a reason for rejecting a creature suggests itself. In the case of scavengers such as the vulture, for example (12), the uncleanness probably arises from the fact that they feed on animals that die by themselves. These are ritually unacceptable, because the blood has not been properly disposed of (Lv. 17:15–16; see also v 21a, and 12:16). The same could apply to birds of prey (12–16). In other cases a creature's unacceptability may arise because of its use in some non-Israelite religious setting.

A persuasive general explanation of the food-laws has been offered by the anthropologist Mary Douglas in her Purity and Danger (Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1966), and taken up by G. J. Wenham in his Leviticus (Eerdmans, 1979). In Douglas's view the idea underlying 'holiness' in biblical ritual texts is that of wholeness or completeness. Individuals, animals, even materials are 'whole', when they conform to the class to which they belong (see Lv. 18:23; 19:19; 21:17–21). Consequently, animals are considered fit to be set aside for the holy sphere (i.e. sacrifice) if they belong properly to a class, and have no characteristics which might be considered 'mixed'. (See Wenham, Leviticus, pp. 18–25.)

The regulations in v 21 are again explained by Israel's 'holiness' (though there is no definite evidence to support this in the case of the final instruction). Foreigners, not being of the chosen people, were not subject to its special rules.

14:22–29 The tithe. The Israelite tithe was a dedication of the produce of the land. In an agricultural society crops were the immediate token of God's goodness, and they were thus an inevitable part of worship. It is not easy to say how much of an Israelite's wealth the tithe actually amounted to (even though it means lit. 'a tenth'); it was, moreover, only one among a number of offerings which Israelites were expected to bring. An understanding of it is further complicated by the different laws about it in the Pentateuch. In Nu. 18:21–29 it appears as an offering for the benefit of the Levites (who needed such offerings to live). Here, it is a feast in which the offerers and their households participate, though the Levites are not forgotten (27).

A full picture may be obtained by taking the different laws together. The family feast at the place of worship would have left large amounts over for the Levites' dues. The tithe of the third year, however (28–29), seems to have been put to special use, being collected in the towns rather than taken to the place of worship, and used for the disadvantaged (as well as the Levites, who lived in all parts of the land; Nu. 35:1–8).

The tithe as presented here is typical of Deuteronomy, however. It is celebrated by all Israel at the central place of worship. It is marked by joy in worship of the one God, and symbolizes the oneness of the people by stressing the fact that all share in it. And it shows a people that were at the same time obedient (in bringing its tithes) and blessed with abundance of the land (in the feast which the offering itself affords them).

Note. 24–26 A practical detail is included which recognizes the problem that some people lived a great distance from the place of worship. The law has this in common with the law which permits non-sacrificial slaughter (12:13–28).

15:1–18 Remitting debts and releasing slaves. The day-by-day life of Israel in the land is now regulated in a further way, in relation to debts and slavery. Both of these are understood as ways in which the stronger might help the weaker in the community. The idea of brotherhood in Israel is nowhere stronger than here (2–3).

Once again, dealings with fellow-Israelites are on a different footing from dealings with foreigners (see 14:21). The laws, therefore, continue to build on the idea of Israel as a holy people, showing within itself the standards of God. (The attitude to foreigners, therefore, is not discrimination in the modern sense, nor does it justify this. It is simply a consequence of Israel's special status at this point in the history of salvation. It is not a permanent principle.)

Debts were to be cancelled in the seventh year of a seven-year cycle. Since loans were to be made without interest (23:19–20; Ex. 22:25), they were purely an act of assistance to those who had fallen on hard times (as a result, perhaps, of a bad harvest) rather than a means of enriching the lender. The motive for lending lies in the nature of Israel. The people in covenant with God must live out its brotherhood and its knowledge that it holds its land not by reason of strength (see 8:17) but as gift. A consequence of this is that there should be no poor among you (4), which is actually a command. Only when the Israelites take responsibility for justice in this way can they go on experiencing that the land is indeed a gift, and know God's continuing blessing (4–6).

The call to be generous is developed further in vs 7–11. The laws are well aware of the self-interest which enters into human planning, and the possibility, therefore, that a loan might be refused because the seventh year is approaching. This is because the borrower may not have the time (or the desire!) to repay before the lender is obliged to write off the loan. (It is not clear, incidentally, whether the loan is intended to be cancelled altogether, or merely suspended until the seventh year is past. In either case considerable self-sacrifice is required of the lender.) The NT too puts no limit on the generosity required of givers (Rom. 12:8; 2 Cor. 9:7).

At this point the laws of Deuteronomy come close to an open-ended commitment to other people of a sort which cannot easily be wrapped up in laws at all. (Cf. Lv. 19:18, which seems to make this point when it urges Israelites to 'love your neighbour as yourself'.) These things are hard to try in courts. However v 9c suggests that the obligations imposed here were very real. They could, it seems, be tested by others, and certainly by God.

Slavery in Israel was to be quite different from what is usually understood by the term. A person who had fallen on hard times might give himself or herself into the service of another as a way of surviving the emergency. This, however, was not intended to be a permanent arrangement (though the slave might choose this; 16–17). Certainly the slave (or servant—the word may be translated either way) is not owned by the master. The selling in v 12 implies only a sale of the slave's labour for a period. At the end of the period (in the seventh year again), and in return for his labour, the master must provide the slave with the means to live independently again. Once more, such generosity is the very means of a continuing enjoyment of the covenantal blessings which the Lord desires to give (18b).

15:19–23 The firstlings. All firstborn, both human and among domestic animals, were specially dedicated to the Lord. For the animals this meant sacrifice; humans were substituted by the sacrifice of another animal (Ex. 13:2, 13, 15).

Firstlings here, like the tithe, were made part of an annual feast at the place of worship. Imperfect animals, which were by definition not fit for sacrifice, might be eaten non-sacrificially (21–23). The regulations here are rather like those for non-sacrificial slaughter generally (12:13–28), the chief concern being the proper disposal of the blood.

The law of firstlings (as of sacrifices in general) stresses the offerer's willingness to part with what he might feel is rightfully his own. There is something in common, therefore, between this law and the preceding commands regarding debt and slave-release. In each case, Israel recognizes that all she has is God's gift.

16:1–17 The major feasts. The laws about sacrifices and offerings now continue with regulations about the three annual feasts (see also Ex. 23:14–17 and Lv. 23). Deuteronomy is less detailed than Leviticus, and can be seen as a kind of summary, with certain typical emphases.

The first feast occurs in March–April (Abib, known as Nisan after the exile), and is actually a combination of two feasts, namely Passover (on the 14th) and Unleavened Bread (15th–21st; see Lv. 23:5–8). This combination seems deliberate, as is suggested by the phrase Do not eat it [the Passover] with bread made with yeast, but for seven days eat [it with] unleavened bread (see the RSV). Furthermore, no clear distinction is made between the lamb of the Passover sacrifice itself and the other animals offered at the sacrifices made during the week (2).

The purpose of the combined feast is twofold. First, it is to remind the people of their miraculous escape from Egypt, because of God's power and his love for them (3; cf. Ex. 12–13). The need to remember God's care for his people is very important in Deuteronomy (6:4–12; 8:10–18), and the Passover, more than anything else, is the great act of remembering. It is similar to the Christian acts of commemoration, above all Easter, recalling the deliverance won by Christ through his resurrection, and also the Communion or Eucharist. From the similarity comes the idea of Christ as the 'Passover lamb' (1 Cor. 5:7).

Secondly, the feast as presented in Deuteronomy, points forward to the life in the land which the book everywhere anticipates. The seventh day of unleavened bread (8), moreover, is rather like a Sabbath rest, and we recall that life in the land was to be a kind of rest (12:9). When the people later enter the land, they celebrate Passover, and immediately afterwards eat unleavened bread that is the produce of the land (Jos. 5:10–12). The linking of the feasts of Passover and Unleavened Bread in Deuteronomy is probably intended both to recall God's past goodness, and to encourage belief that he will go on blessing in the land he is giving.

The Passover is essentially a family feast. It may seem surprising, therefore, that it is to be held at the central place of worship. However, after the sacrifice itself, the meal was indeed to be eaten in families, in tents (7) probably temporarily pitched around the place of worship.

The second feast of all Israel at the place of worship is the Feast of Weeks (9–12), also called the Feast of Harvest (Ex. 23:16) or Pentecost. It is celebrated seven weeks (or more precisely fifty days, Lv. 23:15–16) after the offering of the first ripe grain of the year which is made during the feast of Unleavened Bread (Lv. 23:15). Deuteronomy's command to keep this feast has its typical emphases on rejoicing in worship, care for the poor, and memory of deliverance from Egypt.

Finally, the Feast of Tabernacles celebrates the gathering in of the whole harvest in late summer. Its name is explained by the command to live temporarily in tents during the feast as a reminder of the people's temporary dwellings during their flight from Egypt (Lv. 23:42–43). It is part of an extended calendar of events in the seventh month (approximately September) recorded in Leviticus (23:23–43), though omitted by Deuteronomy.

While it was common for ancient peoples to have great agricultural feasts, Israel's are distinguished by the fact that they are linked to their salvation from Egypt. The regular blessings of the land, therefore, always remind them that all their good depends on that first salvation.

The summary in vs 16–17 expresses a further typical concern of Deuteronomy, that the people should respond generously to God in their worship, in the light of his goodness to them.

16:18–20 Judges and officials. This little passage takes up a theme from the beginning of the book, namely the responsibility of judges and supporting officials for putting the commandments of God into practice (1:9–18). They are to officiate in towns throughout Israel, though difficult cases are to be taken to the central place of worship (17:8). Justice (19–20) means the right treatment of people that is their due under the law, and which is not to be neglected by the judges for their personal benefit. The instructions here stand at the head of a number of regulations about officials: judges (17:8–13), the king (17:14–20), priests (18:1–8) and prophets (18:14–21). These all have something to do with putting the laws into practice.

16:21–17:7 No other gods. It is interesting that the rules about judges and other officials are interspersed with reminders of the need for faithfulness in religion (16:21–17:7; 18:9–13). Justice cannot be separated from right religion.

The first 'religious' command here (16:21–22) repeats Deuteronomy's strong opposition to the symbols of Canaanite worship (cf. 7:5); only the God of Israel is to be worshipped. The second (17:1) contains another basic principle of true worship, namely that only undamaged animals should be sacrificed to God (cf. 15:21). To sacrifice an imperfect animal was no sacrifice at all, because it was of little value to the worshipper. True worship implies real self-sacrifice (see Mal. 1:6–8). Thirdly (2–7), the need to root out any who would lead astray to false religion is repeated. This law is in substance like that of ch. 13, but here the judicial means of proceeding is stressed (5–7). The gate (5) was where the judges sat. The punishment is so severe because the crime is a breach of the first commandment, and would destroy the covenantal relationship of the whole people with God.

17:8–13 Difficult cases. The difficult cases were not necessarily the worst crimes, but those in which it was hard to decide whether the offence had been committed intentionally or merely by accident or carelessness. The supreme court had its sessions at the place of worship, and was presided over by both priests and the judge. The judge in question would be one like Samuel, who is later seen exercising this duty at several places (1 Sa. 7:15–17). Quite how the judging was shared by the judge and the priests is not clear to us. The law shows again, however, how closely religious and civil law was intertwined in ancient Israel.

The decision of the supreme court was final, and the penalty for refusing to accept it, death (12). This might be disproportionate to the original crime, or even, presumably, be passed on the petitioner! It aimed, however, to preserve the process of law itself, and is, therefore, another fundamental safeguard of the covenant (13).

17:14–20 The law of the king. The law anticipates the people wanting a king, like other nations (14), as they actually will in due course (1 Sa. 8:5). Deuteronomy thinks of God as Israel's king. This is said in 33:5, and implied in the treaty-structure of the book. The same sense that human kingship is not God's ideal plan for Israel is expressed clearly by Gideon (Jdg. 8:23), and by Jotham's fable (Jdg. 9:7–15). When the Lord himself says Israel's request is a rejection of him as king (1 Sa. 8:7), he may be criticizing the spirit of the request only, thus leaving the door open for his king (David). Nevertheless, Deuteronomy seems not so much to institute human kingship as to permit it, and ensure that it is of a certain type.

The king according to Deuteronomy is by no means like the kings of the nations. He is chosen by God (15a) and, therefore, not self-selected by his own power. He is a brother in Israel (15b) and, therefore, essentially equal to other Israelites. He must not exploit his position in order to gain wealth, armies or many wives. Israel was not to exchange the tyranny of Egypt for a 'mini-Pharaoh' of their own. It is striking how similar this portrait of the false king is to that of Solomon after he had become unfaithful to God (1 Ki. 10:26–11:8).

The ideal king, in contrast, is a student of God's law (18–20). He thus acknowledges that God is the true king of his people, and will not bear his office out of pride or ambition.

18:1–8 Rights of priests and Levites. The priestly classes are not much in evidence in Deuteronomy, which typically thinks of the people in its wholeness, not according to its inner divisions. However, the present passage safeguards an important principle: those who serve at the place of worship are entitled to their living from the wealth of the land.

Within the tribe of Levi, the priesthood proper was restricted to Aaron and his descendants (Ex. 28:1). The remainder of the tribe—the 'Levites'—were set aside for supporting duties in the tabernacle and temple (Nu. 3:5–10). Deuteronomy is not concerned with the differences between the kinds of 'clergy', but treats the whole levitical tribe as one. It is together, as a tribe, that they are treated differently from the rest of Israel, in that they do not have an inheritance (2)—i.e. a tribal territory.

However, they are by no means to be deprived of their right to a living, because they belong to the 'brotherhood' of Israel (2) just as much as any others. As brothers they 'inherit'. Their living comes in practice, however, from their share of the offerings made at the place of worship by their fellow-Israelites. This is what is really meant by the LORD is their inheritance (2; see also 10:8–9). Their good, therefore, depends on Israel being faithful in their worship of God. (See also Nu. 18, which sets out the dues that fall to priests and Levites more comprehensively.) The principle here applied to the Levites may have a general application to those who are employed by the churches or Christian organizations for various ministries. It implies a commitment on the part of the church membership to provide properly for such people. The only measure of what is 'proper' is the wealth of the church itself, and the principle of 'brotherhood' within it.

In vs 6–8 the point is made that Levites who live at various places in the land—in the cities which had to be provided for them in every tribal territory (Nu. 35:1–8)—had the right to come and serve at the central place of worship when they wished, and to receive payment accordingly. V 8b is a little obscure, but may imply that Levites could build up a certain amount of independent wealth from the pasture-lands they were allowed to hold around their cities.

18:9–22 Knowing God's will. The need to know the will of God on specific occasions (e.g. in time of war) was keenly felt in ancient times, and the nations around Israel had devised various magical procedures for finding it out. These included examining the entrails of birds and animals for omens, consulting the dead (11) and apparently even the sacrifice of children (10). Magic could be used to try to affect the course of events as well as simply to gain information.

All such practices are condemned in our passage. They are regarded as detestable along with Canaanite religious practices in general (7:25–26; 12:31). The use of magic emphasizes the skill of the 'knower', tampers with areas which God has ruled out of bounds, and lays the person open to influence from destructive powers. Among the people of God, in contrast, it is sufficient to know what God clearly speaks. This he has done through his word, and will go on doing, on special occasions, through his prophets. (For the stress on knowledge of God by his word, see 4:6–8, 9–14.)

The first and foremost prophet of Israel was Moses himself. He it was who spoke God's word when the covenant was being made at first on Mt Horeb. The people themselves, in their fear, had demanded such a mediator (16; cf. 5:23–27). The question now arises, however, how will the ministry of Moses be continued in Israel? The assurance comes that, though Moses himself must die in due course, he will have successors (18).

That the passage has a number of future prophets in mind (rather than one only) is clear from vs 20–22 where the issue is how false prophets may be distinguished from true ones. However, the 'Messianic' interpretation of 18:18, according to which Jesus is the promised prophet, is justified, because he spoke God's word in a wholly new and authoritative way (see Acts 3:22–23).

The final verses (20–22) ask how a true prophet may be known from a false one. The answer in v 22 is that a false prophet's words will not come true. This answer posed its own difficulties. Jeremiah faced the problem of recognition acutely, and his words did not come true until many years after he had begun to preach. However, in practice, a prophet's genuineness would in many cases be recognizable over a period of ministry. (Notice the test-case in Je. 28.) There is an important sense in which the message of God makes itself known to those who are willing to hear.

19:1–14 Cities of refuge. To the three cities of refuge provided for in Transjordan (4:41–43) a further three are to be added west of the river (2), and yet three more if necessary (9). Their purpose is that one guilty of accidental homicide might have a safe haven within easy reach, in whichever part of the land he happened to be (3). It would not be immediately clear to others, of course, whether the one who sought refuge in the city was in fact innocent. The city, therefore, was not meant to give unconditional protection to all comers. The avenger of blood, however (who may have been a relative of the victim, or an elder from his city), appears to assume the guilt of the one who caused death. The city's purpose, therefore, was to make sure that anyone accused of murder had a fair trial rather than be exposed to the revenge of the dead person's relatives. Vs 11–12 assume that some kind of legal process takes place to determine guilt or innocence (see also Nu. 35:12).

In the case of guilt the offence was capital, since murder was a breach of the basic covenant law (5:17). The death penalty was incurred in order to rid the land and people of this defiance of the covenant (13).

The law on the removal of the landmark (14) does not seem to relate closely to the preceding or to what follows. It would, however, have been a serious offence, in a land without hedges and fences, and when land was life. Abuses of this sort by greedy landowners might easily drive their poorer neighbours into poverty and slavery.

19:15–21 Witnesses. The law on witnesses follows naturally from the previous case, where a judicial process was assumed. It shows what is at stake in the ninth commandment (5:20). False witness against one accused of a crime would result in unjust punishment, which in the case of a capital offence would be death. A basic safeguard against an unjust verdict was the requirement for at least two witnesses to agree (15).

The law provides a deterrent against deliberate false witness. Whatever penalty attached to the crime for which the accused was tried was to be incurred by the witness who was found to be lying (19). The witness who perjured himself in a capital case made himself liable to the death penalty. Here was one case of the so-called lex talionis or 'law of talion' (21; cf. Ex. 21:23–25). This was not a licence for revenge, but a legal principle limiting punishment by making it fit the crime.

20:1–20 The conduct of war. This chapter contains principles for the conduct of war. These include rules for war in general (10–15) as well as the special kind of war against the peoples who occupied the land God was giving to Israel (16–18). The opening commands, however, apply to all war.

The main point in vs 1–4 is that all Israel's wars are really God's. His power in rescuing Israel from Egypt, against impossible odds, is a reassurance that the enemy's apparent greater strength need never be decisive. Even though not all war is 'holy', in the special sense reserved for war in the promised land (16–18), nevertheless, everything Israel did was 'religious', because their king was God. Thus it is that the army is addressed by the priest before going into battle. The main burden of his message is that the people need not fear, because God's power is made available to them.

The law evidently did not intend that Israel should have a standing army (of the sort that Solomon would later gather; 1 Ki. 10:26). Rather, it has a citizen army in mind. This is clear from v 9, where commanders are appointed only when the army is being prepared for battle. It is clear too because vs 5–9 assume that people will be taken from their normal activities in order to serve. In this context certain exemptions are granted. One who has built a new house but not yet lived in it need not go; nor one who is involved in the long process of bringing a new vineyard to fruitfulness (see Lv. 19:23–25); nor one who is engaged but not yet married (see also 24:5). These exemptions are in line with the main thrust of Deuteronomy, that God is giving his people a land whose fruits they are to enjoy, and in which they themselves are to have children so that future generations might also prosper (7:13). All this is only possible, of course, because God will fight for the people. It is a people that trusts God that can dare to allow some of its best people not to join its army in a crucial battle.

This is most obvious from the final exemption, which is simply for those who are afraid (8)! It was imperative that God's army should not be fearful, since victory depended on faith in a God who could overcome the odds. A fearful soldier might easily spread fear, and this could turn the tide against the whole army.

The rules of engagement are outlined for wars fought outside the promised land itself (10–15). These are relatively humane for the day. The offer of peace gave the opportunity to make a treaty with Israel, in which the defeated city would have been subordinate, but protected and, to an extent, free.

The approach to a city in the land is quite different (16–18). These verses are, as it were, in brackets. They summarize the commands regarding the taking of the land in the first place (7:1–5, 17–26), which are recalled here to make it very clear that the preceding rules apply only to warfare outside the land.

The final commands, again relevant to all war, limit the damage caused to the environment by the conduct of war. The protection of fruit trees is easy to understand, especially in relation to the promised land, since the whole point of taking it was so that the people should enjoy its fruit. War should never defeat its own objectives. Even the use of non-fruit-bearing trees for siege-works, though permitted, seems to be limited by the strict needs of the occasion. The environment as such—God's creation—is therefore respected.

The regulations for war in ch. 20 need to be used with great caution when principles are sought for the conduct of modern wars. The first requirement is to distinguish holy war from other kinds, even in Israel. Holy war is a concept which applies only, once and for all, to Israel's occupation of its God-given land. Even Israel's wars in general are special, because at that period in the history of God's dealing with humanity his people was also a nation, a political unit. Now that that people is a church, which fights no wars as such, no nation has a mandate to suppose that God marches in its ranks in the wars that it fights—even where those wars may reasonably be thought just. By the same token, Christian 'just-war' theory is right not to take this chapter as a mandate for fighting against impossible odds.

On the other hand, the principles of restraint, diplomacy, mercy and respect for non-combatants remain valid for all wars. And any warfare which involves large-scale devastation of the creation itself should be repugnant, in view of vs 19–20.

21:1–9 The unsolved murder. We have already had regulations regarding penalties for murder and manslaughter (19:4–13). The issue in cases of murder is not just the due punishment of the guilty person, but also a religious purification of the whole land and people (19:13), so that the covenant can continue. When the murderer cannot be found (and the present regulation seems to suppose that the unsolved killing is murder), the land cannot be purified in the normal way, i.e. by execution of the murderer (see also Gn. 9:6). This law, therefore, provides for the religious purification to be made in another way.

Responsibility for the procedure is taken by the elders of the city nearest to the scene of the crime (2). They carry out a ritual killing of a heifer. It is interesting that neither the heifer nor the place chosen for the ceremony should have been used for agricultural purposes (3–4). The ritual, therefore, is like a sacrifice in that the victim and the place are, as it were, set aside specially for the purpose—though the rite is not actually a sacrifice (since the animal's blood is not spilt). It is also like a sacrifice in that it makes atonement for the spilling of the murdered person's blood (Lv. 17:11).

The elders of the nearest city have taken responsibility for the act of atonement on behalf of all Israel (8). They are themselves innocent of the crime, however, as is signified by the hand-washing ritual (7).

21:10–14 Marrying a captive woman. This law follows from the law about treatment of defeated enemies in foreign lands (20:10–14, especially v 14). A man may take a captive woman as his wife after certain rituals have been observed. The shaving of hair, trimming of nails and changing of clothes are symbols of mourning for her father and mother. This may mean only that she mourns her removal from family and homeland. The rituals, therefore, represent a leaving behind of the former homeland, a kind of transition to becoming an Israelite.

Once the rituals have been completed, the marriage may be consummated. If for any reason the husband then decides to divorce her, she must be treated with all the rights of a wife, not a slave, and become a free person. The word translated dishonoured (14) may only be another way of referring to the consummation of the marriage, i.e. that which gives her her right to freedom.

21:15–17 The right of the firstborn. This law recalls the story of Jacob and his two wives Leah and Rachel, where Rachel was the younger and better loved, but where Leah conceived first (Gn. 29:21–35). The right of the firstborn is not new with this law, nor confined to Israel, but the law aims to safeguard the child against the father's tendency to follow his own preferences (see Gn. 49:3–4).

21:18–21 The disobedient son. The seriousness of the charge of disobedience to parents lies in the fact that it is a breach of a basic covenant command (5:16), and that the family is an essential means of maintaining the covenant in Israel (6:7, 21–25; cf. Mk. 7:10). Presumably, the disobedience in question is of a very serious kind; the loose lifestyle indicated by v 20 may simply be a symptom of a determined opposition to the ways of God which the parents have tried to teach (18).

This apparently unnatural law aims to stress the responsibility of parents to maintain the covenant. Indeed, it fell to parents, in principle, to initiate legal action against a son who threatened the well-being of the whole community because of his defiance of the covenant standards. In the NT too, love of God and zeal for the kingdom are to be put above family loyalties (Mt. 10:37, but see also Mk. 7:9–13).

21:22–22:12 Various laws. 22–23 The hanging here, which may mean impalement on a post, is the exposure of a body after the execution itself (see 1 Sa. 31:10). Such a practice was probably ancient, and intended to heap shame on the victim even after his death, by showing that, as one who had broken the covenant, he was under God's curse. Non-burial was supposed to prevent the spirit of the dead person enjoying repose in the after-life. The law here limits this, perhaps because the curse on the murderer might somehow defile the whole people (23b). This law lies behind the statement in Gal. 3:13 that Christ took upon himself the curse of the law due to all because of sin. The manner of his execution, therefore, was awful not only because of its pain, but also because of its shame.

22:1–4 The law says not only 'you shall not', but also 'you shall'. This is because the point of the law is to ensure the good of the whole people. If Israelites are to be truly brothers and sisters, they have a responsibility for each other's good. These obligations aim to protect the livelihood of fellow-Israelites. Deuteronomy comes close here to the idea of law as the obligation to love one's neighbour, whatever that may cost (see Lv. 19:17–18).

5 The point here is not simply about fashion, but about certain deviant sexual practices, signified by the wearing of the clothes of the opposite sex. Homosexual practice may lie behind the law (see Lv. 18:22; 20:13). It is possible too that some rituals of non-Israelite religions involved transvestism, and that the practice is condemned for this reason.

6–7 The concern here is rather like that which protected fruit-bearing trees from being destroyed in time of war (20:19), namely the fruitfulness of the land. The mother bird is spared because she can go on being fertile. There may well be a respect for the natural world itself here, as well as a concern to protect sources of food.

8 The law about a parapet is intended to safeguard life. Like the instructions in vs 1–4 it shows that the law goes further than simply stopping people from hurting others by acts of violence and greed; it requires that everything possible should be done to ensure the good of others.

9–11 The reason behind these prohibitions is no longer clear to us. It is probably either a respect for the different classes of created thing (as in Gn. 1:11c: 'according to their various kinds'), or because such mixtures were well known in Egypt. In the latter case the law would mark the distinctiveness of Israel, the holy people, and therefore be an outward mark of their wholehearted devotion to God. If such outward marks could be abused (Mt. 23:5), the need for encouragements to holy living always remains relevant.

12 The point of the tassels is to remind the wearer constantly of God's laws (Nu. 15:37–41; see also Dt. 6:8–9 for a similar idea).

22:13–30 Laws about sexual relations. 13–21 The issue here is whether a newly-married woman was a virgin at the time of her marriage. The law considers the situation in which the man accuses his new wife of unchastity, following his first intercourse with her. The accusation is by its nature hard to prove true or false. Nevertheless, provision is made for a trial, and it is presumed that proof can be obtained.

The proof of her virginity may be the blood-stained sheet from the marriage-bed on the night of the consummation, or alternatively a sheet which showed evidence of recent menstruation and, therefore, that the woman was not pregnant at the time of marriage. The latter is more likely to be available to the parents to produce.

If the charge is shown to be false, the man is punished, both by flogging and by payment of huge damages to the father of the woman. If the woman is found guilty, she is punishable by death, because she has in effect committed adultery (cf. vs 23–24).

22 The law on adultery concisely prescribes the death penalty for both offenders, in keeping with the fact that adultery is a breach of the basic covenant law (5:18). Whether the law was carried out may have depended on the wronged husband's decision (Pr. 6:32–35). The death-penalty only applied if the offenders were caught 'red-handed' (is found); an outlook common throughout the whole of the Ancient Near East.

23–29 These verses are an extension of the law on adultery, because they concern cases of intercourse between a man and a woman engaged to someone else. Whether the case is rape or adultery depends on whether the woman consented. In the town, her silence is taken as consent (23–24); in the country, she is given the benefit of the doubt, and only the man dies (25–27).

The law makes a distinction between a woman who is engaged and one who is not, in a way that is strange to the modern reader (28–29). This is because marriage laws in Israel were closely related to family and property laws. A man paid the father of his bride a substantial sum for his daughter's hand (Ex. 22:16–17). When a man rapes or seduces a woman who is not yet engaged, however, there is a simple remedy: he must make her his wife, and pay for the privilege (29).

30 The father's wife may well be the man's step-mother where, as 21:15–18 shows, the society is not strictly monogamous. However, this is a particular adulterous act which is held to be specially reprehensible (even assuming that the father is already dead), because it also breaks the commandment demanding respect of parents (5:16; cf. 27:20; Lv. 18:8; 20:11).

23:1–8 Exclusion from the assembly. The assembly of the LORD is the people of Israel as it worships the Lord in the tabernacle or temple. To belong to Israel at worship is to belong to it completely. In the ancient world, as in the modern, people often moved and settled in new places. As Israel became well-established in their land, they would face the question, on what basis might foreigners living among them become effectively members of Israel?

The exclusions in vs 1–2 probably arise from involvement in the worship of other gods. The deformities in v 1 may be self-inflicted mutilations for the purposes of idolatrous worship, possibly of the goddess Ishtar. The forbidden marriage (2) suggests a union with a cult-prostitute.

Ammonites and Moabites were permanently excluded from fellowship with Israel because of their determined resistance to them on their way to the promised land. Moab's resort to magical arts to prevent their arrival inevitably rebounded upon them because of the Lord's greater power (Nu. 22–24). Nevertheless, their hostility is remembered sombrely here. Ammon is presumed to have resisted similarly (see Nu. 21:24), though there is no similar record of a confrontation with that people (cf. 2:37).

Edomites and Egyptians, on the other hand, could be treated more generously. Both had in fact opposed Israel's progress towards their land, Egypt at the very beginning (Ex. 7–14) and Edom on the way (Nu. 20:18–21). In these cases, however, other factors are more important: it was in Egypt that Israel was permitted to flourish for many years and become a people; and Edom was Israel's brother in a special sense, because the people's ancestor Esau was the brother of Jacob (Gn. 25:21–26).

23:9–14 Uncleaness in the camp. A number of natural physical conditions, among them 'bodily discharges' (Lv. 15), could make someone, for a time, ritually unclean, that is, unfit to participate in the community's worship. These verses refer to that class of legislation in a rather general way, applying them especially to the military camp. Provision is also made for the disposal of human waste outside the camp. The camp was to be a fit place for the Lord to be (his presence probably symbolized by the ark of the covenant) and, therefore, nothing unseemly should be tolerated in it.

23:15–24 Various laws. 15–16 This regulation concerns a slave who has escaped from his master in some foreign land and sought refuge in Israel. Israel's own laws about slavery show that the OT is opposed to it as an oppressive instrument; Israel herself, indeed, had escaped from slavery. For these reasons, Israelites are to give sanctuary to runaway slaves.

17–18 Some of the rituals of Canaanite and Babylonian religion involved sexual intercourse of leading members of the community with men and women who were attached for the purpose to certain sanctuaries. It was thought that deities could be induced by this means to give fertility to the land. The practice was abominable to the God of Israel, who gave fertility because of his love for his people, and who could not be manipulated by these magical means.

19–20 This law is related to those in 15:1–18 (see comment there), which provide for the release of debts and slavery. Economics in Israel was not to result in huge gaps between rich and poor, but rather to promote the brotherhood of Israelites. For this reason interest-taking is banned, as contrary to the spirit of a land seen as the common heritage of all. Since the idea of brotherhood applied only to Israel, a concession is made for deals involving others.

21–23 Vows were voluntary acts of devotion, usually fulfilled by a sacrifice (Lv. 7:16–18; Ps. 22:25). The law here is based on the huge importance attached to words and promises in Deuteronomy; the whole covenant is based on this and, therefore, their casual or insincere use was an offence in God's eyes.

24–25 The point here is to permit the taking of the produce of the land to satisfy hunger. The law distinguishes between this and mere theft, or exploitation of one's neighbour, whose labour and livelihood is in his crops.

24:1–25:16 Further laws. 1–4 This law takes for granted the practice of divorce in Israel, in spite of the Lord's hatred of it, recorded elsewhere (Mal. 2:16). (Notice, however, the two exceptions to the man's right to a divorce; 22:19, 29.) This law makes no attempt to justify the practice in general. The reason for the man's wish to divorce (he finds something indecent about her) is not clear; it may be some ritual impurity, or a failure to bear children, or sexual immodesty. It is not, in any case, said to be an adequate reason for divorce. The point of the law is merely to prevent a return to the first husband after a second marriage of the divorced woman has ended. (Je. 3:1–5 presupposes this point.) The aim may have been to make divorce so solemn and final that it would not be entered upon lightly.

5 This law is related to those in 20:5–7, which make certain exemptions from military service. The newly-wed man is now further exempted from all public service. The crucial importance of having children underlies the law, but the purpose of bringing happiness to his wife is typical of Deuteronomy's strong emphasis on the land as a blessing to the whole people.

6–7 The taking of 'securities', or pledges, against debts was itself a permitted practice (see also vs 10–13). However, nothing must be taken which affects the debtor's right to basic necessities or his ability to make his livelihood (cf. 23:17). The concern to protect the life of all Israelites underlies v 7 too, which is in the spirit of the prohibition of murder (5:17), and of the enlightened laws regarding slavery (15:12–18). No Israelite may completely control the life of another.

8–9 The law regarding skin diseases (the term probably has a wider and more general reference than leprosy) refers to laws known from elsewhere, as in Lv. 13–14. There, provision is made for the sufferers to be ritually purified. This law merely requires care in obeying those instructions.

10–13 This law is related to that in v 6. The principle is expressed again that pledge-taking must not be the means of oppressing a poor person, or driving him further into hardship. The command in v 11 respects the freedom and dignity of the one who has fallen on hard times. And v 13b serves as a reminder that the making of a loan should be an act of generosity, pleasing to God, and intending the restoration of the debtor.

14–15 Delay in payment for work done could be a way of driving a poor person into needless hardship. Fair treatment of workers is, on the contrary, another way of putting into practice the ideals of the covenant (see also Mt. 20:1–16). In a modern setting, this law is relevant to fair employment conditions, and perhaps also condemns unfair business practices such as the deliberate late payment of debts.

16 This law affirms the responsibility of each individual in the eyes of the law (an idea developed in Ezk. 18). It does not contradict 5:9, which is about God's justice, and where the point is made that sin can have effects for generations after it.

17–22 The collection of laws here have in common the concern for those who cannot fend for themselves, namely the widow, the alien (i.e. the immigrant) and the orphan. These groups are elsewhere commended to the people's special care (14:29). Here they are expressly granted the full protection of the law. The provision for the widow goes even further than usual in the matter of pledges (17; cf. 24:12–13). Israel itself was helpless in Egypt and needed the help of God in order to become free and prosperous (18); here again her past provides a pattern for her own behaviour.

The laws on harvesting contain the idea already found in 23:24–25, only in reverse. The landowner should deliberately leave a residue of the crop for those who have no resources of their own. In this way the rights of everyone in Israel to the produce of the land are once again affirmed (cf. the book of Ruth).

25:1–3 This law is not about the judicial process itself, which has been covered elsewhere (17:8–13), but rather about the administration of corporal punishment (where it is the required penalty, e.g. 22:18). At stake is the dignity of the individual, who is, in spite of his crime, still your brother. This phrase implies that the one punished is still part of Israelite society. (2 Cor. 11:24 reflects the later practice of giving only thirty-nine strokes lest this law be broken by incorrect counting.)

4 Although Paul applies this law to the provision for those who work to spread the gospel (1 Cor. 9:9–10), here it applies to oxen and shows a real concern for their welfare: animals may be used by people, but not abused or exploited.

5–10 It was very important in ancient Israel that a man should have male offspring to carry on his name and inherit his property. It was, therefore, very serious for a man to die without having had a son. The present law (which has parallels in the Ancient Near East) provides that a specified brother of the dead man should act as husband of the widow for the purpose of having a son who would be counted as the son of the dead man.

The brother had a right to refuse to carry out his obligation (7–10). If he did this it might imply that he hoped himself to inherit the dead man's property, rather than pass it on to a 'son' of the dead man (Nu. 27:9). This may be why his refusal brings such shame upon him and his house in the eyes of the community.

11–12 In laws which are remarkable for their humaneness and concern for the personal integrity of the individual (cf. 25:1–3), this isolated example of bodily mutilation stands out. It may imply that the woman's action could injure the man's capacity to have children. The phrase Show her no pity is like the one in the 'law of talion' (19:21). The punishment may, in fact, be a near equivalent, in the circumstances, to the principle of 'eye for eye' etc. Even so, bodily mutilation in punishments is certainly exceptional in Israel, and may reflect in this case the importance in biblical thinking of having children (cf. Gn. 1:28; Ps. 127).

13–16 This law is in keeping with the general concern of Deuteronomy to avoid exploitation of fellow-Israelites, and to promote their good.

25:17–19 The memory of Amalek. The harsh sentence on the Amalekites recalls their attack on the Israelites on their journey from Egypt (Ex. 17:8–16). This attempt to stop Israel reaching the promised land makes them similar to Moab and Ammon, who were permanently excluded from fellowship with Israel for this same reason (23:3–5). Amalek's crime seems to be judged especially serious because of the methods used. The Lord's enmity with them is permanent. In due course, Saul is instructed to put the decree against them into effect (1 Sa. 15:2).

The present command may be intended to round off the long collection of laws which began at ch. 12; its reference to rest from all the enemies (19) recalls 12:9.

26:1–15 Firstfruits and third-year tithe. We have seen that the body of laws which began at ch. 12 has been drawing to a close with the command to remove the memory of Amalek (25:17–19). It is now formally rounded off in this chapter with instructions about two ceremonies. These are hardly new material, but are placed here for a particular reason.

The first ceremony is that of firstfruits, or the offering of the first ripe produce in early summer. This would normally happen at the Feast of Weeks (Lv 23:15, 20; Nu. 28:26). Deuteronomy's law about the Feast of Weeks (16:9–12) did not expressly mention the firstfruits, no doubt because this passage was being deliberately kept for its present place in the book.

The reason for keeping it until now is that the offering of the firstfruits had special significance the first time that it was done in the new land. The present law is thinking primarily of that very first offering of the fruits of harvest which was made by the people which God had taken from slavery, and then from desert wandering, to being a people with a land of its own. While Israel was to bring its firstfruits regularly throughout its history, there is something specially moving about this ceremony (a little like the first American Thanksgiving) as a token of God's keeping of his promises.

The ceremony involves a kind of confession of faith which recognizes this faithfulness of God and contains the bones of the story of the making of Israel. It begins by remembering Jacob, the ancestor of Israel, called here a wandering Aramean (5). The phrase refers to his relatively unsettled life and migration to Egypt, and also to his years spent in the area of Aram, or Syria, where he married Rachel and Leah, daughters of Laban the Aramean (Gn. 28:5; 29). The confession continues by recalling the migration to Egypt, when the people of Jacob were 'few in number' (Gn. 46:8–27), the oppression by the Egyptians, the deliverance by the mighty acts of God and the final arrival in the land itself (5–9). It may seem odd that the covenant on Horeb is not mentioned. But the emphasis falls squarely on the story of promise, going back to the forefathers of Israel (Gn. 12:1) and now gloriously fulfilled. The ceremony was to happen at the central place of worship (2), and the usual notes of rejoicing and of help for the needy are present (11).

A second ceremony is now envisaged (12–15), namely the tithe of the third year, already met in 14:28–29 (see comment there). Like the firstfruits, this too is not actually a new command. It is repeated here perhaps with a view to the first observance of it in the land, and because it is typical of the spirit of the laws. That is, that the life of Israel, including the rituals of worship, centred on mercy and justice. The concern for the poor is in fact shared by the two rituals provided for in this chapter.

The tithe of the third year is accompanied by a declaration that the worshipper has fulfilled his obligations, first in bringing the tithe itself (here called the sacred portion), and then in keeping all God's commandments (13). The point of v 14a is to ensure that the food offered for the tithe had been handled in a ritually correct way. Food might become unclean through contact, even indirect, with a dead body, and this would apply to food eaten by one who was in mourning. Offering to the dead is unclear; it may refer to a practice in Canaanite religion, perhaps an offering to Baal himself, or it may simply be the giving of food to mourners in sympathy (Je. 16:7), which would be unclean for the reason just mentioned.

The ceremony closes with a prayer which recognizes two facts, both important in the theology of Deuteronomy in general; that God is spiritual and does not actually 'dwell' in the place of worship which he himself has caused to be built for him on earth (see also 1 Ki. 8:27–30); and that the good things which the people enjoy in the land are entirely due to God's gift, not their own strength (see 8:17–18). The long section of laws closes suitably on this strong note of the land as a gift.

26:16–19 The covenant agreement

This short passage sums up the obligations which both parties to the covenant have towards each other. The word today is typical of the book's preaching; here it refers to the time on the plains of Moab when the people formally accepted the words they had heard from Moses. The Lord commands (16), the people agree to follow (17), and the Lord undertakes that they will be his specially chosen people (18–19; cf. 7:6). There is nothing particularly binding about the order in which these ideas come; they come rather differently in ch. 7. Furthermore, the chosenness of Israel is for the purpose of being a holy people that sets forth God in the world; ultimately it will mean that this people has been chosen to bring Christ to the world—though, paradoxically, only because of their failure to keep the covenant. Nevertheless, the elements of covenant are here: the mutual, heartfelt obligation of God and his people, for the honour of God's name and the benefit of the people themselves (cf. Lv. 26:12).

27:1–26 Writing down the laws

27:1–8 The altar on Mt Ebal. Instructions for two ceremonies now follow, to be held on Mt Ebal and, in the second case, Mt Gerizim also. These are mountains near Shechem, close to the centre of the promised land, and the ceremonies were to take place soon after the people had gone into it. The first ceremony (already foreshadowed in 11:26–32) consisted of setting up stones on Mt Ebal, containing all the words of this law, possibly meaning chs. 1–26 as a whole. The stones thus inscribed were to be a permanent reminder of them.

The setting up of the stones was to be solemnly marked by a sacrifice, for which an altar was to be separately erected. It is not likely that Shechem was thus marked out as the central place of worship which the Lord was to choose and which Israel was to seek (12:5); rather, this act of worship on Mt Ebal was a unique event marking the confirmation of the covenant at the beginning of the people's life in the land. For the rules for building the altar see also Ex. 20:24–25.

In this whole ceremony Deuteronomy is once again like an ancient treaty, in which a copy of its terms was placed in the temple of the god of each of the parties, in a ceremony accompanied by sacrifices. The ceremony was in fact carried out by Joshua in due course (Jos. 8:30–35).

27:9–26 Curses from Mt Ebal. Moses and the priests prepared the gathered tribes for the second ceremony on the mountains at Shechem. Treaties in the ancient world were often accompanied by a solemn declaration of blessings and curses. These were to be said (or perhaps echoed) by groupings of the tribes on the two mountains (12–13). The passage records for us, in the event, only the curses, said, not by the tribes on Mt Ebal, but by the Levites—presumably a group of these specially designated for the task, and probably stationed between the two mountains, and around the ark (the tribe of Levi as such was gathered on Mt Gerizim for the blessing). The ceremony is described in Jos. 8:33. We must assume that blessings corresponding to the curses recorded were also intended to be said.

The curses themselves are based on laws from other parts of the Pentateuch, not always from Deuteronomy. For example, the curse for misleading the blind (18) and those invoked for bestiality and certain unnatural sexual relations (21–23) come from Leviticus (Lv. 19:14; 18:9, 17, 23). The curses, then, are not a summary of Deuteronomy's laws in particular, though a number of them echo important deuteronomic concerns (e.g. vs 15, 19, 26). They all stand more or less close, however, to the Ten Commandments: the curses in vs 15, 16, 24 are strikingly so; those in vs 17, 18, 20–23, 25 are inferences from the Commandments, as are many of the laws of the OT. They may be united further by the idea of secrecy; even when someone flouts God's laws in secret and is apparently beyond the reach of the processes of law, God will pursue the criminal and punish him (note the phrase in secret; 15, 24).

The curses recorded here differ from those in ch. 28 in the following ways. First, they are directed against individuals who break various laws, and have the effect of dissociating them from the people. They are like the process of law in the sense that they aim to 'purge the evil' from the people and the land, so that the covenant might continue (22:21c). In covering secret offences they are like the law for the unsolved murder (21:1–9). Secondly, they focus on the nature of the sin or crime. The curses and blessings in ch. 28, on the other hand, relate not to individual crimes, but to apostasy of the people as a whole, and they focus (in the case of such apostasy) on the punishment itself. Thirdly, they are intended for the particular ceremony on Mts Ebal and Gerizim, while the curses and blessings that follow are part of Moses' preaching of the covenant on the plains of Moab.

28:1–68 Blessings and curses

28:1–14 The covenant blessings. Moses continued his preaching of the covenant in Moab with the blessings for keeping it and the curses which would follow if it was broken. Again the pattern of the ancient treaty is followed, where such blessings and curses, often rather similar in substance, are the motivations to loyalty.

The blessings relate to familiar themes of the book: Israel as chosen people (1, 9–10, 13; cf. 7:6; 26:19), rest from enemies (7; cf. 12:9), and prosperity (3–6, 8, 11–12). The picture is of a people roundly blessed by God. The concerns are those of every people in every place and time.

They could not, however, be taken for granted in the ancient Mediterranean world. Political instability was normal, and the failure of a harvest, a permanent worry, could plunge many into poverty and ruin. All ancient nations put fertility and victory over enemies at the heart of their religions. Baal was believed above all to ensure the former (see Ho. 2:5, 8).

In its blessings (and indeed its curses) Deuteronomy aims to show that it is the Lord and not Baal who provides these things. Furthermore, in matters of life and death, it is not the desperate persuasion of magic, ritual prostitution and idolatry that brings security, but quiet obedience to the word of the one true and just God, whose whole desire is to bless and not to torment. The blessings and curses are an important part of Deuteronomy's teaching that God's universe is rational and moral. Human beings are not cut loose on a sea of doubt and danger. They can have confidence about the fundamental things in life because they know what God is like; they may indeed know God himself.

28:15–68 The covenant curses. The curses occupy rather more space than the blessings, presumably to stress the solemnity of failure to keep the covenant. They are in essence the opposite of the picture of blessedness that went before, an unflinching portrayal of all human woe.

The first group of curses (15–19) is an echo of the blessings in vs 3–6. Here is misery in the regular routines of life, affecting basic necessities, and the well-being of families—every part and moment of life.

Life is pictured (20–24) in all its uncertainty, subject to sudden ruin, disease and drought. Where the covenant is not kept, there are no 'everlasting arms' (33:27) to protect from these things. Nor is there safety from enemies, one of the great promises of the covenant (12:9); rather, the apostate people is exposed to defeat (cf. v 25 with v 7; the people's state in v 26 is probably a result of defeat). The Lord, far from bearing his people as a father bears his child (1:31), now seems to be actively hostile to them, bringing upon them the ills he had once rescued them from (27–29). Vs 30–35 focus on a failure to enjoy those very things which the law had safeguarded. Where men had been exempted from military service in order to build a life for their families, and simply to enjoy God's blessings, now the delights of wife, children, house, vineyard, herd and flock slip through the fingers, and are enjoyed by others. This is the reverse of the unmerited wealth in 6:10–11.

The miseries rehearsed already are so severe chiefly because there is no hope of deliverance. Much can be endured if there are grounds for hope in God. Here, however, the grim truth is that he has withdrawn his help. There is no covenantal hope for those who have forsaken the covenant.

On the contrary, the prospects for the apostate people are bleak. From the general pictures of wretchedness, the focus now falls on future historical events, which will bring the downfall of the people. These are intermingled with other glimpses of more ordinary deprivations, as in vs 38–44. Contrast the saying about the 'head and the tail' (43–44) with v 13; 26:19; and notice how the 'signs and wonders' of Israel's former victory are now turned against them (46; cf. 26:8). Pictures of defeat and exile now come into focus. Vs 36–37 proclaim it in general terms; vs 49–57 portray the horrors of siege, where people are reduced to the worst kind of barbarism. Finally, the misery of exile itself is depicted (64–68). It is seen, figuratively, as a return to Egypt

(68), although in fact it would be inflicted on the larger, northern part of Israel, centuries after Moses, by Assyria, and on Judah, later still, by King Nebuchadnezzar's Babylon.

Exile is the worst possible covenantal curse. It is seen, in fact, in vs 58–63, as a complete reversal and undoing of all the promised blessings of the covenant, and all that the Lord had won for his people. Notice how plagues come on Israel (59), where they had once come on Egypt; the diseases of Egypt, once left behind (7:15), now reappear (60). The promise of a numerous people in its own land is abandoned (62–63; cf. Gn. 15:5, 7). The life of Israel with the Lord was closely bound up with the land. Its loss is the climax of the falling of the curses on the people. When it comes, it will pose the question, is there a future for this people?

The blessings and curses can seem a somewhat crude way to motivate the people to keep the covenant. They do affirm important things, however. The nations around Israel believed in an unpredictable universe, in which many gods exerted influence on events, and could do so arbitrarily, without moral principle. Israel, in covenant with God, knew that he alone controlled events, and that he would always act in accordance with his revealed character. The curses show a knowledge, perhaps a fear, of the worst things that can happen to human societies. But the fact that it is God who rules over all eventualities in human life allows for a kind of hope which was impossible for those who did not know him.

The motivating use of reward and punishment is not confined to the OT, but rooted also in the teaching of Jesus (Mt. 5:17–30; 25:31–46).

29:1–30:20 Moses' third address

29:1–29 The covenant broken

The next two chapters have their own introduction, and are often referred to as Moses' third address. However, it is not completely separate from the preceding long address (which began at 4:44). Indeed, as the opening words of the book (1:1–5) looked forward to Moses' preaching of the covenant, so now this new beginning (29:1) looks back upon it. As in 5:2–3, the covenant at Horeb is seen as being effective now in the lives of the next generation; here indeed, the preaching of Moses is actually seen as a further covenant, additional to that made at Horeb, though dependent upon it. In this way, Deuteronomy not only recalls the covenant, but is itself a document of covenant-renewal. No generation can ever take the covenant with the Lord for granted, but must always make it its own, by a fresh commitment.

The preaching in ch. 29 echoes themes already familiar from other parts of the book. First (2–8), Moses recalls all the Lord's care for the people in bringing them to the land. The verses contain a brief summary of the record of the journey to the edge of the land found in chs. 1–3. The extraordinary power of God shown on the journey out of Egypt is remembered in vs 5–6 (cf. 26:8), and vs 7–8 refer to the taking of the land east of the Jordan, more fully recorded in 2:26–3:28.

A note of caution is sounded in v 4. The people should have seen and heard enough to be able to understand and embrace the covenant. The laws themselves, which Moses gave them, were enough to make them wise (4:6). Yet Moses knew that they were not yet wise. He may have meant by this only that it would take time for them to realize how good and essential to full life the laws of God are, and how crucial it would be to observe them. We cannot help wondering, however, not for the first time, about whether Israel would have the character to be faithful covenant partners (see also 9:4–6, and comments).

The perspective in vs 9–15 is that of all God’s past dealings with his people, from the promise to the forefathers (13). The stress, however, is strongly on the present need to obey (10, 14–15). The covenant also affects every member of the community, including even the resident alien (11), to whom the people have been commanded to show kindness (14:28–29).

The fatal danger of being lured into false worship is returned to (16–21). Behind this concern lies the first commandment, loyalty to the Lord alone (5:7), without which no life with him is possible. For this reason, opposition to false worship is a major theme in Deuteronomy (7:1–5; 12:1–4), and the sin of persuading others to take part in such worship seen as extremely grave (ch. 13). One of the worst moral dangers is the belief that one’s actions in defiance of God’s law will have no consequences. This is both unbelief and a foolish trust in one’s own strength. The one who leads astray to other gods is here pictured as wholly deluded himself, thinking he can bring blessing and peace to himself when these are the gifts of God alone (19). His delusion, however, is not an excuse, for it comes from a habit of thought which has been learned and persisted with. And, therefore, because of the evil itself, and because of its danger to God’s people, he is liable to the severest punishment (20–21).

The last part of the chapter (22–28) seems to take for granted that the curses of the covenant will indeed fall in due course on the people. Its perspective is that of the exile. The devastation of the land is compared with that of Sodom and Gomorrah and their neighbouring cities (Gn. 14:8; 19), which had become bywords for the severest judgment (cf. Is. 1:7; Ho. 11:8). It must have been shocking for God’s own people to hear that they might receive a judgment like that of those nations, which they were accustomed to think of as utterly wicked. The point of vs 25–28 is that the people are in this condition, not because their God is weak, but rather because he himself has brought upon them the curses of his own covenant with them. It is ironic that this generation’s own descendants (22), presumably refugees from exile, should witness the devastation. If the generations of Israel had been properly instructed the disaster would not have occurred (cf. 6:7).

The final verse (29) means that the future is yet hidden; there is no necessity (after all) for these curses to fall. What is known to the people is the laws of God. These are all they need for life.

30:1–20 The covenant renewed

30:1–10 Returning to the Lord. The covenant curses in ch. 28 come to a climax with the threat of Israel’s exile from her land (64–68), and the preaching in ch. 29 seems to suggest that this curse is likely. Moses then went a stage further, for these verses look to a future time when the exile has become a reality. The first verse supposes that the blessings and the curses have come in sequence. That is, they look forward to a time when the people, having first enjoyed the blessings of the land (which in Moses’ day they were about to enter), in due course experience the curses of the covenant because they have failed to keep the covenant. This is a new situation that the preaching of the covenant is considering, for up till now it has concentrated on persuading the people to be faithful, and thus to avoid the disaster altogether.

The present passage shows, however, that even if the curses of the covenant should be invoked, that will not necessarily be the end of the story of God and his people. The grace of God has been shown marvellously to Israel in his choice of them and his making of a covenant with them in the first place, but it has not been exhausted even by these acts of love.

There is a future for the people of God. It does not follow automatically, however. A condition is attached, namely heartfelt repentance (2). The restoration of the people will be like their first blessing in that it involves both promises (land, population, prosperity; vs 5, 9) and commands (6b, 8, 10). Can this new arrangement, however, have any more success than the first? A new element in this passage recognizes the problem.

The new element is that the Lord is seen here taking a decisive new part in their fortunes. It will be by his power that they will be restored to their land. (This is the meaning, in effect, of the phrase restore your fortunes; v 3, see also Je. 29:14; 30:3.) Not only this, however, but he will create in them a new ability to be faithful. This is implied by the phrase: The LORD your God will circumcise your hearts (6); the same figure of speech in 10:16 had simply been an exhortation. In some mysterious way the Lord will renew the relationship to make his people faithful (though their own need to repent is not bypassed; v 2). This is without lessening the need for their real obedience; they are still responsible for their life with him. The point may be understood in the light of the NT teaching about the role of the Holy Spirit in enabling Christians to overcome their sinful nature (Rom. 8:9–27; Gal. 5:16–25).

30:11–20 The word is near. The final verses in the chapter come back to the present, as it were, with the typical stress in this book on today (15). They show that the people have in fact a real choice, and that faithfulness is not beyond their reach. The imaginary journeys up to heaven or across the sea to seek the truth (12–13) reflect the feeling of many ancient people that the meaning of life was a dark mystery which had to be teased from the gods. On the contrary, the truth about life and death, good and evil, is contained in the words which God has spoken to his people through Moses (14). There is no excuse for failure to respond, but rather a straight choice, of the most solemn kind, between life and blessing and death and destruction (v 15—elaborated in vs 16–18). The Israelites understood this on the level of prosperity in the land they were about to enter (20b). The principle, however, is an enduring one for all people, embracing life in this age and in the one to come. For it is the Lord himself who is life (20), and he does not pass away.

31:1–34:12 From Moses to Joshua

31:1–8 Moses' charge to Joshua

Moses' main speeches are over. The time for action is very close; the promises are soon to be fulfilled. The rest of Deuteronomy is taken up with the handing over of leadership by Moses to Joshua, with farewell speeches and with the account of Moses' death.

The present passage reminds us that the long addresses of Moses took place on the plains of Moab. Part of the land had already been taken, namely that part that lay east of the Jordan, and some of the enemies of the people had already been defeated (Sihon and Og; cf. 2:24–3:11). The task remained to be finished, but God had told Moses that his own part in it, and his life, would end east of the Jordan (1:37–38; 3:23–29).

God committed himself to give the people victory just as he had done in the past (3). Their part was to show faith and courage (6, 8), the area in which they once failed badly, delaying their taking of the land (1:26–36). Their conquest of the remaining peoples must be complete (5b; cf. 2:33–34; 7:1–5), because of the dangers their false religion would pose if they were allowed to remain among the Israelites. The whole passage is framed by assurances of God's presence (3, 8). His people can indeed have courage, because he has promised his presence, and he cannot fail.

31:9–13 Reading the law

Moses solemnly wrote down the words of the law which he had spoken. Perhaps he had been doing this during the time in which he gave the addresses. It is clear that the words were intended to be written and not just preached: the Lord had already commanded that they be written on stones in a ceremony on Mt Ebal (27:1–8). It is also implied by the treaty form that the words should be preserved so that the covenant might be renewed from time to time. Moses entrusted the written document to the Levites who carried the ark. The ark was the sign of God's presence among his people. When the words of the covenant were kept with the ark it meant that the presence of God could not be taken for granted merely because of the possession of something visible and tangible. The same point would be made frequently by the prophets, who saw a danger that even the temple could become a source of falsely based trust (Je. 7:1–15).

The words of the law were, of course, to be remembered and taught constantly; this indeed is one of the great themes of the book (6:6–9, 20–25). Here, however, an extra provision was made, namely for a solemn reading of the whole law every seven years at the Feast of Tabernacles (16:13–17). This would be a strong symbol that the whole people (including resident aliens, cf. 29:11) was subject to the commands of God. How far this was practised during Israel's history is not known; it may well have been an early victim of the religious decline which had already set in during the period of the judges. It is possible that King Josiah's reading of the law (2 Ki. 23:1–3) was an attempt to revive the practice—belatedly!

31:14–29 Israel's unfaithfulness predicted.

There followed a solemn ceremony of commissioning, at the tabernacle, or Tent of Meeting (where the ark had been kept during the time in the desert), in which the Lord passed the leadership from Moses to Joshua. The Lord's presence was experienced in the cloud which stood at the entrance to the Tent (15). Formerly this had been the special privilege of Moses (Ex. 33:7–11); now it was extended to his successor.

The Lord spoke first to Moses, and told of a time when the people would indeed forsake him and the covenant (16). Vs 17–18 summarize the curses which must follow (28:15–68), though the people's response to their due punishment sounds like an accusation (17b). Because the Lord knew that Israel had a heart to disobey him (21b) he told Moses to write down a song (contained in 32:1–43) which would serve as an accusation of unfaithfulness. Moses did so and taught it to Israel. They have by now been well warned, not only of the consequences of failure to keep the covenant, but of their weakness and liability to go astray.

The Lord then addressed Joshua with the familiar command to be courageous (23). He was well qualified to receive this charge, for he had already won God's approval as one of the spies who was not overawed by the strength of the enemy (Nu. 14:30, 38).

Finally, we are told again that Moses gave the written copy of his words (now called the Book of the Law, cf. 2 Ki. 22:8) to the Levites (25–26, cf. v 9), and ordered them to assemble the tribes to hear the song. The tone is rather pessimistic (like 29:22–28, and see 30:1). Moses believed that the people would certainly fail to keep the covenant, because of what he himself had seen of them (27; see especially the story of the great apostasy at Horeb, Ex. 32; Dt. 9:7–29). The curses of the covenant must surely fall.

31:30–32:43 Moses' song and final exhortation

Moses then spoke the words of the song which had been given to him by God (31:19) to warn Israel against being disloyal to him and his ways. The song is rather different from the preaching style found in most of the rest of the book. It is, in contrast, poetic, and in both substance and style it anticipates passages in the Psalms and the prophetic books.

The opening verses (1–3) are a kind of call to worship (cf. Ps. 29:1–2), announcing praise of God. They also show that the song will function as a kind of witness to the covenant that has been made. This is implied by the appeal to the heavens and the earth to listen to the words that will be spoken (cf. 30:19). Witnesses, usually gods of the nations concerned, played an important part in ancient Near Eastern treaties. Since monotheistic Israel cannot call on other gods as witnesses, Moses called, picturesquely, on the heavens and earth instead.

The next section (4–14) turns to praising God. As the Rock he is the one who saves, and in whom refuge can safely be taken (Ps. 18:2). His truth and righteousness (or straight dealing) are fundamental qualities (Ps. 25:8–10; 33:4; Jn. 14:6; Rev. 15:3; 19:11). These have been shown in his kindness to Israel from the beginning of his dealings with them (6b–14), despite the people's ingratitude (5–6a). God is remembered here as the Creator, especially of Israel (cf. Is. 43:15), and as their Father. The latter is a more intimate term than much covenantal language, but is an important note in the story of God's love for his people (cf. 1:31; also Ex. 4:22; Ho. 11:1).

The election of Israel is then put in the context of God's creation of the whole world, and his power in the lives of all nations (8); this note was also struck in the story of the conquest of the land east of Jordan (2:5, 9, 19). (The use of the name the Most High here alongside God's personal name Yahweh the LORD is for stylistic variation. It is one of the names for God used in Genesis, e.g. Gn. 14:22, and is suitable for asserting his complete supremacy in all creation.) Israel (Jacob), however, has a special place in his purposes (9). The 'finding' of Israel in a barren land (10) is a poetic way of remembering the wilderness period, which passes over many of the details of that story, including the time in Egypt itself. The beautiful image of the eagle and its young carries the ideas of both loving care and training for life (the eagle is pictured training its young for flight). These ideas, together with the oneness of God (12; cf. 6:4; Is. 43:10–12) and his rich provision for the people (13–14; cf. 8:7–10) are important generally in the book.

Israel's tendency to rebel against God, despite his goodness, is signalled even before these words of praise have been uttered (5–6a). Israel's rebellion shows an ingratitude that is deeply unnatural (cf. Is. 1:2). The point is now elaborated in vs 15–18. Jeshurun (15) is a poetic name for Israel. The rebellion takes the form, essentially, of idolatry. This has been seen throughout Deuteronomy as the supreme sin (5:7; 13). The condemnation of it here expresses God's anger vividly, and with some of the contempt shown by the prophets for gods who are no gods at all (17; cf. Is. 44:9–20; Je. 10:11). These so-called gods are impostors who have absolutely no 'track-record' with Israel; how much the true God contrasts with them, for he has lavished care and love on his people, with great patience, over generations. The fickleness of the people could not be more savagely depicted.

The note then turns to one of judgment (19–27). As Israel turned from the Lord, so he will turn from them. As he has been made jealous (cf. 5:9) and angry, he will make them envious and angry in return (21). There is thus a rightness, a 'poetry', about this judgment. The worst of it will be that he will be hidden from them, he who has so graciously revealed himself in all the words which he has spoken through Moses. The hiddenness of God is the thing which the Psalmists find hardest (Ps. 10:1; 13:1). The means of judgment, furthermore, will be a people that has no understanding, that is, they have not had the privilege of knowing the laws which the Lord revealed to Israel (4:6–8; 29:4)—a people whose god is no god. There is heavy irony in Israel being subdued by a people such as this. The punishments (23–26) are reminiscent of the curses of the covenant (28:15–68). The Lord himself finds the idea of Israel’s defeat by a godless people repugnant (27). Such a thing can only dishonour his own name in the world.

The theme of the enemies themselves is then taken further (28–33). It is nonsensical that a nation which has neither the wisdom of God (cf. v 21) nor the promise of his going with them should overcome God’s own people—which has these privileges. The success and prosperity of such a nation is false in the end, because it is false at its roots (32–33). For this reason, the nation which God uses for judgment will in due course fall itself. Such a nation does not act out of zeal for God, but only for its own gain. The judgment that falls on the instrument of judgment is an assurance to Israel of the justice of God even when he judges them, and is a typical theme in prophecy (Is. 10:5–19; Je. 25:8–14). This is the vengeance of God (35). It is vengeance for the sake of justice, and for the final salvation of God’s people. It will finally right all wrongs (Rom. 12:19). Only such vengeance counts; any other kind is mere self-destructive hatred.

The last section of the song is also the last phase in the story of God’s dealings with his people, their revival. Judgment is now at last judgment in their favour (36), the judgment that the pious in Israel long for when they are oppressed (Ps. 7:6–11). It comes after Israel has reached its lowest point. In history, this will be the Babylonian exile. It will have a positive function, namely to demonstrate to the people that foreign gods, which have seemed so powerful and attractive, are indeed powerless (cf. Is. 46:1–2). The Lord alone is God (39; cf. Is. 41:4; 43:10). And he is so powerful that he can ‘make alive’ even after he has ‘killed’ (cf. Ho. 6:1). This refers to the historical restoration of the Jewish exiles to their land after the exile (cf. 30:3–5). In a profound sense, it points to the resurrection of Jesus Christ, with whom God raises all the redeemed from the death of sin to the life of the new age with him (Eph. 2:1–7). The song, which has struck such a sombre note throughout, ends with a cry of praise for the God who can and will save his people in the end, even from their own sins.

32:44–52 Moses is prepared for his death

Moses finally called the people to take very seriously all the words he had spoken to them (not just the song), reminding them that they are the words of life (see 4:1). He was now at the end of his life. The Lord told him to ascend Mt Nebo, from where he would have a panoramic view, heart-rending for him, of the land which had been the purpose of his whole life, but on which he would not set foot. There is a reminder once more of the reason for this (51; see Nu. 20:10–13).

33:1–29 Moses blesses the people

33:1–6 Introductory blessing. Before his death Moses gave his blessing to the tribes of Israel. It is in some ways like the blessing which Jacob pronounced on his sons (the fathers of the tribes) at the end of his life (Gn. 49). Isaac had also blessed Jacob and Esau (Gn. 27:27–29, 39–40). It was properly a father’s privilege. Moses may be depicted here as a ‘father’ of Israel in a figurative sense. He had in any case a special authority to bless the people because he was the man of God (1; cf. the heading of Ps. 90), a term used for prophets (1 Ki. 17:18), among whom Moses himself was pre-eminent.

The blessing opens and closes with passages (2–5, 26–29) which praise God, and which focus especially on the story of the exodus from Egypt. This is the point of the Lord’s ‘coming’ from Sinai, where the law was given (usually called ‘Horeb’ in Deuteronomy), and of the references to places in the desert on the way (2). The idea of the Lord’s love for the people (3) belongs to the whole theology of choice or election (note again the closeness of choice and love in 7:6–7). That relationship was marked by the giving of the law through Moses (4), and the two things together—the powerful rescue of the people from slavery in Egypt and the giving of his law—establish the Lord as Israel’s king (5; see the comments on 17:14–20).

Israel’s tribal territories.

The reference to Moses in the third person (4) is a difficulty in a passage which is presented as his own words. One suggestion is that vs 3b–5 are a response of the people to Moses’ opening words, preceding the blessings themselves (P. C. Craigie, The Book of Deuteronomy [Eerdmans, 1976], p. 392). Moses’ reference to himself in the third person, however, is not unthinkable, if it is seen as coming from beyond his own authority, and as something that is to be remembered and repeated in Israel.

33:6 The blessing of Reuben. The brief blessing of Reuben is hardly more than a prayer that the tribe should continue to exist. In the light of Gn. 49:4 this was no small thing for Reuben. As a tribe it ceased to have, or probably never had, the pre-eminence due to the firstborn.

33:7 The blessing of Judah. This seems to be a prayer for their safety in battle, and that they would trust the Lord for victory. Moses’ blessing does not explicitly give to Judah the pre-eminence that Jacob’s appears to (Gn. 49:8–12).

33:8–11 The blessing of Levi. This blessing reflects the choice of the tribe of Levi to provide priests (10:8–9) for Israel. The Thummim and Urim (usually in the reverse order, Ex. 28:30) were means by which particular enquiries were made of God. The ‘testing’ of Levi at Massah and Meribah is not recorded in the pentateuchal narrative, unless the tribe is considered to have been represented by Moses himself in the event in question (Ex. 17:1–7). V 9 recognizes Levi’s zeal for the Lord, a higher loyalty than family ties. The point may be a general one, because of Levi’s dedication to the work of priesthood, which meant having no tribal territory (see 18:2). There may be a more specific reference, however, to the zeal of the Levites following the incident of the Golden Calf (Ex. 32:25–29). The tribe of Levi, as priests, had a special responsibility for the regular teaching of the law, which had been deposited with them for keeping with the ark of the covenant (31:9, 25). This was in addition to their duties in controlling and enabling the regular sacrificial worship of the people. The blessing of Levi is a prayer for his ability and protection in discharging his solemn duties.

33:12 The blessing of Benjamin. The blessing sees Benjamin as the beloved of God, perhaps reflecting his father Jacob’s love for him. The Lord’s dwelling between his shoulders refers to the location of Jerusalem in Benjamin’s territory (cf. Jos. 15:8; 18:28)—shoulders being understood as ridges of mountains.

33:13–17 The blessing of Joseph. This is the most lyrical of the blessings, praying above all for plenty for the large tribe of Joseph. The poetry evokes a wide range of the parts of the natural world. V 12 refers to the importance of the dew as a natural means of irrigation in Israel, and also, poetically, to the ancient belief that the earth was fed by waters underneath it. Joseph would actually come to be regarded as two separate tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh (17), called after the two sons of Joseph himself. They occupied a large area in central Israel and to the east of the Jordan, including some of the most fertile land. Fruitfulness is prominent also in Jacob’s blessing of this tribe (Gn. 49:22). The blessing pictures the tribe, finally, as powerful in war, and large in population (17).

33:18–19 The blessing of Zebulun and Issachar. The territories of these two tribes lay between the Mediterranean and the Sea of Galilee. Tribal maps based on the divisions in the book of Joshua indicate that neither bordered on the former and Issachar merely touched on the latter. The borders, however, are not easy to draw precisely from the data in Joshua, and indeed may have varied from time to time (cf. Gn. 49:13). In any case, the blessing pictures for these tribes a prosperity based on the seas, presumably from fishing and trade (19b). It also sees the tribes responding with proper gratitude to God, from whom all blessings come. The mountain (19) may be Mt Tabor (cf. Jdg. 4:6).

33:20–21 The blessing of Gad. Gad's territory lay east of the Jordan in good, fertile land. The opening line may preferably be read 'Blessed be the broad domain of Gad'. He chose the best land probably does not mean to imply that he grabbed the best for himself; the story of the occupation does not give this impression (3:12–16). The point is just that it is very good. The allusions to the tribe of Gad's fierceness may look forward to the noble part it would play in the taking of the land (Jos. 22:1–6).

33:22 The blessing of Dan. This brief saying suggests great future potential for Dan. The phrase springing out of Bashan is odd, as Dan never occupied territory there. The phrase may only be a continuation of the image of the springing cub. Alternatively, the word translated Bashan should perhaps be translated quite differently, 'viper', with the result: '[Dan] shies away from the viper', a picture of timidity (cf. Gn. 49:17).

33:23 The blessing of Naphtali. The brief blessing on Naphtali concerns only the extent of his land. The lake is the Sea of Galilee. Naphtali occupied land well to the north of this lake, but the southern part, along the shoreline, might well be judged its most fertile. The phrase southward to the lake, therefore, can be readily understood from the perspective of Naphtali itself, principally to the north of it.

33:24–25 The blessing of Asher. The oil in the blessing of Asher is olive oil, much prized in biblical times, for its uses in food preparation (Nu. 11:8), health (Mk. 6:13) and hygiene (2 Sa. 12:20). It is used by the biblical writers as a symbol of plenty and gladness (Ps. 104:15). The picture of bathing feet in oil is one of extravagance, betokening great prosperity. Asher is pictured as strongly defended, perhaps because, being located in the far north, it was liable to attack from enemies.

33:26–29 Conclusion. The twelfth brother, Simeon, is omitted. Simeon in fact disappeared as a separate tribe at an early stage after the occupation of the land, simply absorbed, it seems, by Judah.

The closing verses focus again on the whole purpose of the blessings, namely to pray for the people as they go into the land. The blessings have tended to stress prosperity and military strength—the capacity of the people both to hold the land and to defend it. These have been the dominant themes of the whole book. In returning to them, Moses celebrated the incomparability of the Lord (26).

34:1–12 The death of Moses

In obedience to God's command (32:48–52), Moses then climbed from the Moabite plain to the summit of Mt Nebo, and saw a panorama of the land unfold below him. He had long known—as we have from early in the book (1:37)—that he would not himself set foot on it. But God permitted him, nonetheless, to see the culmination of his life's work. We are hardly intended to think that Moses literally saw the whole land, from Dan in the far north to the Mediterranean in the west, and to the Negev, or southern wilderness. The full extent of the land is given, however, in order to affirm that what he saw was really what God had promised. God's action was truly suited to his word. The moment had come when the ancient promise to Abraham was to be fulfilled (4; cf. Gn. 12:1; 15:7).

The experience of Moses at this moment is too moving and poignant to be expressed adequately. The account of it, and of Moses' death which duly follows (5–8), is to the point, without elaboration or sentimentality. The restraint is the most fitting last respect to pay to one of the great biblical figures. Moses' death was not a tragedy. This is clear from the note about his strength in old age (7), and from his epitaph (10–12). His life was lived before God, in obedience to him and in fellowship with him. There was, in fact, none like Moses, neither before nor after, whether as prophet or as powerful leader—until the coming of the one who was 'more than a prophet', Jesus Christ. The final tribute to Moses was that he followed God faithfully to the end of his life.

Nor had Israel been left without help. Her real source of strength is in God, not in any human figure. In real life, there must be successions, and there is positive harm in overattachment to personalities. Israel continued to have the words which the Lord had spoken through Moses. And she also had a worthy new leader, Joshua (9), to whom it fell to lead the people into the next stage of her journey, and life with God.

Introduction

Author and date

Scholars differ about both the date and authorship of this anonymous book because they use different methods.

On the issue of authorship some scholars, following the Talmud (c. AD 500), assign the book to Joshua himself. They support this by noting that Rahab is said to be still alive at the time of writing (6:25) and that the author, using 'we', includes himself among those that crossed the Jordan (5:1). The remark about Rahab in 6:25, however, may refer to her descendants, and other Hebrew texts read 'they', not 'we' in 5:1. Also, as in 5:6, the author could have used 'we' out of a sense of solidarity with the generation that entered the land.

The dating issue is sometimes also decided entirely on the basis of remarks within Joshua, and some scholars who use this method date the book some time between the deaths of Joshua and his contemporaries who outlived him (24:29–31) and the time of Samuel (c. 1050 BC).

Because Sidon is reckoned as Phoenicia's leading city (11:8) and Tyre conquered it about 1200 BC, some favour that as the date of the book's completion. Other internal pointers to the book's date are that Jebus, Old Jerusalem, and Gezer are as yet unconquered (15:63; 16:10). Jerusalem eventually fell to David (2 Sa. 5:6–10) and Gezer to Solomon (1 Ki. 9:16). Also in 13:2–3 the Philistines, who invaded Judah's coastal plain in 1175 BC are present, though this could have been a later scribal addition.

More recently scholars have started to look outside the book itself to decide the issue of dating. Some of them see links between Joshua and the Pentateuch. They think there is a continuation of the Pentateuch's alleged literary strands: namely, E in chapters 2–11 and P in 13–22, with various additions from other sources. Others have reached the conclusion that in Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings there is a more or less closed, or at least shaped, unity. The language, style and theology of these books support the conclusion that a so-called Deuteronomist (an individual or a school) gathered together a variety of sources from various periods and wove them into a comprehensive whole during the exile. This would mean that Joshua was written c. 550 BC. These books are linked together by overlapping conclusions and introductions. Jos. 1:1 matches Dt. 34:1–12, especially v 5, where Moses is called for the first time 'servant of the LORD'. That accolade is bestowed on Joshua, also for the first time, at the end of Joshua (24:29). The conclusion of Joshua (24:29–31) is repeated as part of the introduction to Judges (2:6–9). The Deuteronomist's style is most apparent in the farewell addresses by Moses (Dt. 31), Joshua (Jos. 23), Samuel (1 Sa. 12), David (1 Ki. 2:1–4) and Solomon (1 Ki. 8:54–61), capped by the editorial summary of the Deuteronomist himself (2 Ki. 17).

Jews have always recognized the unity of Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings, calling them the 'Former Prophets'. This arrangement has the advantages of calling attention to the integrity of each book and of distinguishing between the Pentateuch, which describes the organization of Israel as the people of God under the Mosaic covenant, and Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings which interpret the history of Israel in terms of that covenant. The modern approach however emphasizes the strong links between Deuteronomy and these books. G. J. Wenham has found five theological themes which bind Deuteronomy and Joshua together: the holy war of conquest, the distribution of the land, the unity of all Israel, Joshua as the successor of Moses, and the covenant.

The modern approach is also an advance on the traditional view because it observes sources within Joshua to Kings and highlights the Deuteronomist's theological use of them. Joshua explicitly mentions the Book of Jashar as a source (10:13), and some problems within the book are best explained by source analysis. For example, in 11:21 Joshua is described as driving the Anakites out of Hebron, but in 14:12 Caleb is credited with that feat. This difference is not a contradiction, for Joshua as head of the army could have been credited with his subordinate's achievements. But it may be best explained in terms of varying sources.

The Deuteronomist assumed his readers knew the earlier stories within the Pentateuch. For example, Joseph's bones are provided for in Gn. 50:25, taken out of Egypt in Ex. 13:19 and buried at Shechem in Jos. 24:32; and Caleb's promised inheritance in Nu. 14:24, 30 finds fulfilment in Jos. 14:6–15.

The date of the conquest

The attempt to date Israel's taking of the land is hampered by the nature of biblical history-writing, the way the Bible reckons dates, and the ambiguity of archaeological discoveries.

The men who compiled the Bible stories aimed primarily to teach theology, not to write about bare facts, so details are sometimes left out. Some reconstructions by modern historians of what actually happened, however, depart too radically from the Bible to be taken seriously.

By taking the figures given in 1 Ki. 6:1 and Jdg. 11:26 at face value, one could date the conquest c. 1400 BC. One cannot assume, however, that the Bible simply adds up the years in this way. Nevertheless, the archaeological evidence from Jericho and Hazor point to this date. At Jericho, the study of the ceramic remnants, royal scarabs, seismic activity in the region, destruction by fire and even ruins of toppled walls along with the use of carbon-14 dating marshals impressive evidence that the fortified city was finally destroyed about 1400. At Hazor, there are destruction levels at 1400, 1300, and 1230 BC. Almost all scholars assign the 1300 destruction to Pharaoh Seti I, leaving either of the others to Israel. The reference in Jdg. 4:2 to Hazor as a Canaanite city in opposition to Israel three or four generations after Joshua precludes the later date, unless one supposes either that the biblical narrative at Jdg. 4 is flawed or that the archaeological evidence is incomplete. Ai, if rightly identified, lacks evidence of an Israelite destruction, presenting a problem for either view (see on 7:2). J. Bimson has established 1400 BC as the date of the conquest on firmer ground by refining the dates of the archaeological periods in question.

Alternative suggestions for dating biblical events and archaeological periods in the second millennium BC. (MB = Middle Bronze Age; LBA = Late Bronze Age.)

On the other hand, the archaeological evidence from Pithom and Rameses in Egypt (Ex. 1:11), the lack of data corroborating established kingdoms of Edom and Moab east of the Jordan before the thirteenth century BC, and the hundreds of new settlements by pastoral nomads that sprang up in Israel at about 1200 in contrast to their absence in the earlier period, all favour dating the conquest in the second half of the thirteenth century.

The date of the conquest, however, does not really affect the theology or message of Joshua, as long as there was a conquest.

Theology

The book of Joshua is all about the promised land: its possession (chs. 1–12), its distribution (chs. 13–21) and its retention (chs. 22–24). On the other side, it is also about the dispossession of 'the wicked' from that land. The land fit for kings was given to a people fit to be kings (see Jos. 12).

The land as gift

The Creator of the whole earth (Pss. 24:1–2; 47:4) and unique Owner of Palestine (Lv. 25:23) made the patriarchs trustees of a land fit for kings, flowing with milk and honey (Dt. 31:20). He promised to give it to their descendants as a permanent inheritance (Gn. 17:8; Ex. 32:13). The occupation of the land, to be taken by stages (see 13:1–7), was launched dramatically by Joshua. It was then 'allotted' by God to Israel's tribes by casting lots (Nu. 33:50–54), and so became their inalienable possession which no-one could take forcibly from them. Only the Levites received no land of their own; instead they ‘inherited’ the LORD himself, opening the way to a spiritual understanding of the inheritance (13:14).

With Christ’s resurrection and ascension and with the outpouring of the Spirit, it became clear that Joshua is a symbol of Christ and the land a symbol, a metaphor, of the church’s salvation in Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 10:1–4). Both the land and the salvation in Christ are a gift (1:2, 6; cf. Rom. 6:23), possessed only through faith (1:7, 9; cf. Rom. 10:8–21; Eph. 1:8–9). They are both a place of blessing (Ex. 3:8; Nu. 13:27; Eph. 1:3–14), a home base of rest (Jos. 1:13; Heb. 4:1–11) and a holy place where one uniquely meets God (Ex. 15:17; Col. 3:1–4; 1 Tim. 2:5–6). They both also demand a life-style that conforms with God’s law (1:7–8; 8:30–35; 1 Cor. 10:1–13). Through the new covenant Christ qualifies his church to live in this ‘land’ fit for kings (Ezk. 37:26). And yet, though the church today inherits eternal life and rest in Christ Jesus, after its resurrection it will enjoy a more solid ‘land’ appropriate to that state (cf. 1 Cor. 15:50–54; Heb. 11:39–40). The ‘land’ remains a gift already received but not yet fully experienced.

Unity of the founding generation

The author aims to link Joshua with Moses and to identify the people that entered the land as the representatives of those that came out of Egypt (see 24:7, 17). Though the exodus and conquest lasted over two generations, the author of Joshua treats those founding generations as one. He links Moses and his assistant Joshua throughout the book. For example, God promised to be with both (1:5); both lead Israel across a formidable body of water that amazingly dries up and so are exalted in the eyes of the people (3:7); both take off their shoes in the presence of the LORD (5:13–15); both intercede for the people when they sin (7:7); both possess the land and distribute it (12:7–8; 14:1–5); both bless the people (22:6); and both mediate the old covenant (ch. 24). The generation under these two leaders saw the LORD’s amazing wonders in the exodus and the conquest (24:7, 17) and entered into covenant with him; they are the first leaders of the nation ruled by God.

Unity of all Israel

The author is also concerned to portray the unity of the twelve tribes, using ‘all Israel’ and similar terms frequently (e.g. 3:1, 7, 17; 18:1; 22:14). The fighting men of the eastern tribes were not dismissed until after the conquest was completed (1:14–15; 22:1–9), and their misunderstood ‘rival’ altar caused consternation among the other nine-and-a-half tribes (22:10–34). Twelve men, one from each tribe, lifted a stone out of the Jordan to make a national memorial (4:1–9), and all the tribes renewed the Mosaic covenant at Shechem (8:33–34).

Covenant faithfulness

Joshua’s generation proved the dominant theme of this history; namely, the Lord kept his promise to the patriarchs and gave Israel the land and rest. It is stated and restated at key points in the book: in the prologue before the conquest (1:1–9), after the conquest (11:23), and after the distribution of the land (21:43–45). The burial notices at the end of the book also symbolize this truth (24:28–33). This sacred history establishes Israel’s confession, ‘The LORD is God’ (22:22), and the motivation for keeping his covenant (chs. 23–24). It encourages the faithful to possess the land that remains (13:1–7; 14:6–15; 19:49–50), while leaving the unfaithful without excuse (18:3), and sobers all with the dark realization that God also keeps the curses of his covenant (23:15–16; 24:19–24).

Israel for its part must fulfil its covenant obligations by taking, allotting, and retaining the land through the obedience of faith in the LORD, showing their faith in him by obeying his law.

Holy war

Obedience to the covenant involved Israel fighting according to the rules of holy war given in Deuteronomy. The LORD initiates the battle and, if Israel obeys wholeheartedly, ensures its success (1:2–9; cf. Nu. 27:18–21), intervening on occasion in the most amazing ways as at Jericho (6:20) and Gibeon (10:11, 14). While encouraging Israel to be strong in its faith in him, God destroys his enemies before battle begins by striking panic into their hearts (2:9–11, 24).

‘To the victor belong the spoils’, and so all the wicked Canaanites must be ‘devoted’ (Heb. ḥērem) to the LORD (6:17). The extermination of the Canaanites was designed to save Israel from temptation (Dt. 7:1–5). As G. A. Cooke describes it, ‘anything which might endanger the religious life of the community was put out of harm’s way by being prohibited to human use; to secure this effectively it must be utterly destroyed’. When Achan failed to devote to the LORD what was rightfully his, Achan and all he possessed were destroyed (7:15). Sometimes the LORD reserved the plunder to himself and at other times he rewarded his army with it (8:27). The Canaanites were exterminated because the righteous judgment of the Lord was at hand, not because of Israel’s thirst for blood. The prostitute Rahab repented and found a permanent place in Israel (6:25). For the most part, however, God hardened the hearts of the Canaanites who were ripe for judgment (11:19–20). Their destruction prefigures the eternal punishment of the wicked (Mt. 25:46), as had the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah centuries before. Israel possessed their land because the Lord aimed to sanctify it. That is why the author places the account of the covenant renewal at Shechem right in the heart of the battle stories (8:30–34). If we do not recognize these parallels between Israel’s judgment on the Canaanites and the last judgment we shall fail to see why Israel was instructed to act in this way.

Commentary

1:1–18 Prologue

1:1–9 The Lord commands Joshua

1:1 Historical background. The reference to ‘the death of Moses’ (1) links the book of Joshua with Dt. 34:5 (cf. Jdg. 1:1; 2 Sa. 1:1; 2 Ki. 1:1) and signals the time for renewing the conquest. Moses is called servant of the LORD both to honour him and to legitimize his instructions to possess the land.

Moses renamed Hoshea (meaning ‘Salvation’) Joshua, which means ‘The LORD is salvation’ (Nu. 13:16). The name later became yēšûa whence the Greek Iēsous, and the English, ‘Jesus’.

Joshua’s title, Moses’ assistant (cf. 1 Sa. 3:1; 1 Ki. 19:21), recalls that Joshua had been groomed for this leadership by gift, training and experience (cf. Ex. 17:8–15; 24:12–13; Nu. 14:6–12; 27:12–23; 32:12; Dt. 1:37–38; 34:9).

1:2–9 The Lord’s command. The Lord’s speech echoes those of Moses in Deuteronomy (cf. v 2 with Dt. 10:11; v 3 with Dt. 11:23–24; v 5a with Dt. 7:24; vs 5b–7a, 9, with Dt. 31:6–8).

Vs. 7b–8 recall texts in Deuteronomy which identify it as the Book of the Law and stress the importance of meditating on and obeying this law (see Dt. 5:32–33; 30:10). The promise, As I was with Moses, so I will be with you (5), recalls God’s response to Moses’ objection in Ex. 3:12. The book of Joshua picks up where the Pentateuch left off.

The commands and promises in vs 2–9 set out the covenant relationship between God and his people. On God’s side, he chose Israel to inherit the land (6). On Israel’s side, they must now by faith claim the gift (3–4). It is not so much a matter of obedience, to cross the Jordan, important as that is, as a matter of trust in God (6–7, 9). He gives them reason to trust: his promised presence with them (5, 9b). Likewise the trusting church obeys its Lord’s command to evangelize the world (Mt. 28:18–20). The command not to fear is a rule of holy war.

2–5 The first charge is to cross the Jordan. V 2 reads literally, ‘Now arise, cross ...’ (i.e. ‘cross immediately, do not delay’). Christ commands the church: ‘Follow me’, and he too allows no procrastination (cf. Lk. 9:59–62). In v 4 the outmost boundaries of the land are defined, though the southern boundary is sketchy. Only during the reign of Solomon did Israel control such an area (see 13:1–7). The desert refers to the eastern desert that begins in Trans-Jordan. Lebanon is included in the promised land in Jos. 13:5.

6 The second charge is to inherit the land. Inherit recalls God’s grant of land to the patriarchs as a reward for their faithful service. Now Joshua must conquer (chs. 1–12) and distribute it (chs. 13–21).

7–9 The third charge, to be courageous and meditate on the law vs 7–8, shows that possessing the land depends on faith’s obedience to the Book of the Law. Trust and obedience kiss, not fight (cf. Rom. 1:5; 16:26; Jas. 2:14–26). Though Joshua was groomed for this war, obedience, not might, guaranteed the success of the operation. Christians under the new covenant have the two-fold advantage that Christ satisfied the law’s demands and promises (Mt. 5:17; Rom. 3:21–26) and through the Spirit has written the law upon their hearts (2 Cor. 3:3–6; Heb. 8:7–13; 10:15–18).

1:10–15 Joshua’s charge to the people

Joshua’s commands, both to the officers (10–11) and to the eastern tribes (12–15), echo Deuteronomy. Compare v 11 with e.g. Dt. 1:8; 4:1; 6:18; 8:1; 9:1, and, note that as the text itself states, Joshua’s instruction to the eastern tribes is taken almost word for word from Moses’ command (Dt 3:18–20; cf. Nu. 32).

1:10–11 Charge to the officers. The pattern of divine command followed now by Joshua’s wholehearted and careful obedience shows how a holy war should be conducted. The narrator’s concern with spiritual preparation, the real cause of victory, not with martial details, the apparent cause of success, is reflected in the lack of specificity about supplies in v 10 (covering everything needed for violent war) and the lack of detail in the command. Israel, now reckoned as an army camp, took three days (i.e. part of today, tomorrow, and part of the next day) to prepare itself for battle before breaking camp at Shittim (11; cf. Mi. 6:5). It takes time to ready oneself for battle (cf. Gal. 1:17–18). These three days prior to breaking up the camp, at the earliest 6 Nisan (April) (see 4:19), are not the same as the three days after they had left Shittim and camped at the Jordan itself (cf. 2:16, 22; 3:2).

Canaan before the conquest.

1:12–15 Charge to the eastern tribes. God promised his people rest, that is, peace from enemy attacks, after taking possession of the land (13–15). The promise of rest comes out of the covenant relationship with God (Ex. 33:12–16). The rest into which Moses and Joshua led Israel prefigures the final and perfect rest into which Jesus leads his faithful church (Heb. 4:1–11).

1:16–18 The people’s response to Joshua

The people responded with wholehearted faith and obedience (whatever ... wherever), guaranteeing the continued success of the conquest. They promised to put the unfaithful to death and themselves commanded Joshua, be strong and courageous!

2:1–5:15 Entry into the land

This section shows how the Lord single-handedly brought Israel into the land and how the nation was prepared spiritually for the battles ahead.

2:1–24 The spies report, ‘Canaan defeated’

Although the spies were sent out to help Joshua plan his military campaign, the chief value of their report was to show Canaan’s spiritual unpreparedness.

2:1 Spies sent out. The name Shittim (lit. ‘The Acacias’) suggests a harsh environment.

Perhaps in an attempt to avoid arousing suspicion as foreigners, the spies whom Joshua sent secretly entered the house of a common prostitute, who doubtless had many visitors. Note that although the Hebrew reads literally ‘slept’, not ‘stayed’, the narrator pointedly says they slept there, not with her (1), though this was the assumption of the men of Jericho. The same verb is translated ‘lay down’ in v 8 with no sexual connotation. Clearly the author did not intend to say that they had sex with Rahab.

2:2–7 Rahab conceals the spies. Reconnaissance, espionage, and deception are necessary in war, even holy war (see 1; cf. Jdg 7:9–16). Rahab hid the spies and misled the king of Jericho’s scouts with lies (2–7). She clandestinely let the spies escape and instructed them how to avoid detection by hiding in the mountains pitted with caves to the west of the city—the opposite of what might be expected by a posse (16–17). The deceptions by Joshua and Rahab raise eyebrows. How can they be a legitimate part of holy war? (Cf. Mt. 5:33–37; Eph. 4:14–15).

Indirect analogies of situations where deception and disinformation are right and necessary may help. Hunters use traps and blinds; fishermen, lures and bait. In sport, players will often try to trick their opponents by putting spin on a ball or adopting deceptive postures. In chess a player deceives his opponent into taking his weaker piece in order to capture his stronger one; in poker one keeps a ‘straight face’. God was kind to the midwives for deceiving Pharaoh (Ex. 1:19–20), and ‘by faith Moses’ parents hid him for three months after he was born’ (Heb. 11:23). In all these situations we do not accuse the participants of acting according to the unethical principle that a right end justifies a wrong means. Rather, we recognize that in such situations deception is legitimate, not wrong. So also the OT recognizes that in war intelligence, counter-intelligence and decoys are all part of ‘the game’. Joshua set an ambush (Jos. 8:9), and David used Hushai as a mole in conjunction with a network of spies (2 Sa. 15:32–37; 16:15–22). In the NT Paul escaped the Jews under the cover of night (Acts 9:23–26), and the angel took advantage of the sleeping soldiers to release Peter from Herod’s clutches (Acts 12:6–10). In most situations, however, lies are wrong (Pr. 30:7–8), and truth is required (Eph. 4:15). The believer must listen to God's Spirit through Scripture and conscience so as not to rationalize the situation.

2:8–14 Covenant with Rahab. Rahab's night talk with the spies disclosed her faith (9a, 11b), in contrast to the Canaanites' fear (9b–11a). Israel's triumphs in contrast to the Canaanites' panic convinced her that the Lord had given Israel the land (9) and that he is God (11; cf. Dt. 4:39). To judge from pottery imported into Palestine at this time and from the international diplomacy reflected in the Amarna Letters (c. 1350 BC), Israel's exodus and conquest could have been widely reported throughout the contemporary world. Rahab and the Canaanites responded to the same reports (10; cf. Dt. 2:24–3:11). Rahab's faith led to life, while the Canaanites' unbelief led to death (cf. 2 Cor. 2:14–16).

Rahab's report that the hearts of the Canaanites were melting in fear (9) persuaded the spies that the Lord had defeated the land without them having to lift a sword (24; cf. 1:5; Ex. 15:13–16; 23:27; Dt. 2:25, 11:25). The courage of Israel's new generation of fighting men (1:6–9) contrasted sharply with the preceding, timid generation (Nu. 13–14; cf. 1 Cor. 16:13; 1 Jn. 4:4)

After her confession of faith (9–11), the first in the Bible, Rahab sought salvation within the covenant community (12–13). In v 12 kindness (Heb. hesed) is a shorthand way of saying 'unfailing help to a needy covenant partner'. God's salvation is available to all who seek him. Characteristically, Rahab sought the salvation of her entire family (see 24:15). The sign she wanted was the oath the spies gave in v 14. These circumcised men accepted this converted prostitute into the full fellowship of the covenant community, and were even willing to die for her and her family. The oath with the Gibeonites in ch. 9 is another matter. They heard the fame of Israel's God, but they never confessed him as their Lord.

2:15–16 Rahab helps the spies escape. Like Abraham and Ruth, Rahab renounced her country in favour of Israel. In fact, she risked her life to be identified with Israel's God (4–7, 15–16). The NT honours the faith (Heb. 11:31) that produced her good works (Jas. 2:25). Her faith even earned her a place in the lineage of Jesus (Mt. 1:5).

2:17–21 Covenant stipulations. The distinction the spies made between faithful Rahab and the disobedient Canaanites finds its final fulfilment in the last judgment (Mt. 25:31–46; Rev. 20:11–15). As Israel needed the scarlet blood of the lamb on their door-frames to distinguish them from the condemned Egyptians (Ex. 12:7, 13), so Rahab needed this scarlet cord that the Israelites provided to distinguish her and her family from the doomed Canaanites. Today, believing families accept by faith God's demarcating sign of baptism (Acts 2:38–39; 16:31–33) and proclaim Christ's death when they drink the cup of the new covenant in his scarlet blood (Lk. 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25–26).

2:22–24 The spies' report. The spies' exact report of Rahab's testimony (cf. 9, 24) underscored the point that God had defeated the Canaanites spiritually.

3:1–4:24 Crossing the Jordan

Crossing the Jordan marked the moment when Israel breached the last barrier to the promised land and so escaped the desert. The divine Warrior, symbolized by his ark, led them into the swollen Jordan, dried it up, protected them throughout and led them into the promised land.

During most of the year the Jordan can be forded easily (cf. Jdg. 3:28; 8:4), but God waited until early spring (when it was in full flood, principally from the melting snows on Mt Hermon) to lead the Israelites across, thereby exalting Joshua in the eyes of the nation (6) and making Israel know that the living God was among them (8, 13).

3:1–17 The Jordan opens. Under Joshua's faithful leadership the holy war proceeded in a stately, orderly fashion, without haste or delay.

1 Israel calculated that God's mighty acts connected with the crossing began at Shittim (cf. Mi. 6:5). Since the people went up from the Jordan on 10 Nisan (4:19), the first month of the lunar year corresponding to our April, they could not have arrived at the east bank of the forbidding Jordan before 8 Nisan, three days earlier (3:2, 5). The extra time between their arrival at the Jordan and their fording of it was necessary for the spiritual preparation of the people (5).

There are four speeches preparing the people for the crossing: one by the officers to the people (2–4), one by Joshua to the people and to the priests (5–6), one by the LORD to Joshua (7–8), and one by Joshua to the whole nation (9–13). Each speech reveals a bit more about the marvel to happen, reaching a climax in Joshua's final address.

2–4 The officers commanded the people about following the ark. The ark, a gold-plated chest 4 ft × 2 ft × 2 ft (120 cm × 60 cm × 60 cm; see Ex. 25:10–22), symbolized the throne of God and was sometimes carried into battle (see Nu. 10:35; 1 Sa. 4–6). But it was no mere symbol, God was really present there directing the priests who carried it (cf. 4:11; Dt. 10:8; 1 Sa. 6:7–12). Housing the Ten Commandments, Israel's constitution (Dt. 10:1–4; 31:26), the ark stood for his ethical rule and Israel's covenantal relationship with him. It also symbolizes the gospel for, in addition to housing the law by which all will be judged (see Rom. 2:12–16), its lid, the mercy seat, sprinkled with atoning blood, prefigures the cleansing blood of Christ (Heb. 9).

The command to keep a gap of about a thousand yards (900 m) between them and the ark gave all Israel a full view of God's wondrous leadership.

5–6 On 9 Nisan Joshua instructed the people to consecrate themselves (cf. Nu. 11:18), emphasizing the army's holiness. This sanctification involved washing their clothes (cf. Ex. 19:10) and abstaining from sex (cf. Ex. 19:15). On 10 Nisan Joshua instructed the priests to pick up the ark.

7–8 At this critical moment God rewarded Joshua's faith, promising that when the priests stood in the Jordan he would mark out Joshua as he had Moses. Joshua prefigures Christ who leads his church out of the wilderness of this world to cross the river of death in their pilgrimage to the heavenly city.

9–13 Joshua now solemnly addressed the people. In v 10 living God evokes a contrast with the local gods who died and came to life again with the seasons and who could not maintain control of history. Seven nations were singled out probably because seven represents completeness (cf. Dt. 7:1). In v 12, Joshua set apart the twelve men to carry stones into the Jordan to provide a firm footing in the muddy river bottom for the priests bearing the heavy ark (cf. 4:8).

At the climax of his address Joshua predicted the Jordan would stand up in a heap, showing that God, not natural causes, was responsible for it. Joshua's prophetic speech qualified him as a worthy successor to Moses.

14–17 The narrative now focuses both on the perfect obedience of the people—everything proceeded exactly according to the earlier instructions—and on the astonishing character of the event. The text goes out of its way to stress that the crossing occurred in April at first harvest (see 5:10–11), when the river was overflowing. In line with other intended parallels between Moses and Joshua, the crossing occurred at the same season of the year as Israel crossed the Red Sea.

The crossing probably took place near the ford the Arabs call Al-Maghtas, 7 miles (12 km) south-east of Jericho and 8 miles (13 km) west of Tell el-Hammam. The city of Adam, today

Tell ed-Damiye, where the waters piled up, is 17 miles (27 km) upstream from Jericho, and so a wide stretch of the river bottom, more than 18 miles (30 km), was exposed for the whole nation to cross quickly. A landslide dammed up the river in 1267 and in 1906. An earthquake on 11 July, 1927, dammed the meandering stream for 21½ hours. These parallels give the account credibility without taking away from Joshua's prediction and the amazing timing of the event.

4:1–24 The closing of the Jordan and the national memorial. The narrator continues to stress the amazing character of the crossing (18) but concentrates on the national cairn. This memorial was just one in a series of memorials commemorating God's mighty acts (cf. Ex. 13:3–6; 1 Sa. 7:12), climaxing in the bread and cup proclaiming 'the LORD's death until he comes' (1 Cor. 11:26).

1–4 Once again God, as Commander-in-Chief, initiated the action. His instruction to appoint twelve men assumes that the twelve men set apart in 3:12 had laid down the stones as a firm platform for the six priests. The number twelve, occurs five times in vs 1–8, highlighting the unity of the twelve tribes who made up one nation under Joshua's leadership (cf. Ex. 24:4; 1 Ki. 18:31–35). 1 emphasizes the salvation of all Israel and serves as a pledge that all of true Israel will be saved, both Jews (Rom. 11:25–27) and Gentiles (Gal. 6:15–16). Christ will not lose one of his sheep; all will be saved (Jn. 10:27–28).

5–7 Once again, God's commander on earth's stage obeyed his instructions. The twelve stones were to serve forever as a sign and as a memorial (cf. Ex. 12:26–27; Dt. 6:20–25). Memory plays an important role in any society. Without a memory a person loses identity, and without a history to sustain it a society and the world around it become virtually phantom. Any society that hopes to endure must become, as sociologists put it, 'a community of memory and hope'. In ancient Israel, monuments and rituals such as the Passover (Ex. 13–14) served this function. The numerous memorials mentioned in Joshua as still in existence (e.g. 7:26; 8:29; 10:27) were later superseded by the biblical books that sustain the church. It is assumed that the stories explaining the monuments were transmitted accurately in oral form until the time of the writing, otherwise they would have carried no conviction and could not have sustained the people in reality (cf. 2 Pet. 1:16). Some scholars reverse their function. According to them, these monuments encouraged Israel to create stories to explain their existence, not to remind them of what actually happened!

8–9 In v 9 the Hebrew reads literally, 'and Joshua erected twelve stones in the middle of the Jordan', expecting the reader to understand that these were twelve other stones (as the Greek translation clarifies). The solid stone platform which was removed from under the feet of the porters in the muddy river bed to make the memorial had to be replaced (see NIV mg.). Obviously these submerged replacement stones could not serve as a national memorial, but for anyone interested, they were still there as signs at the time of writing, beyond the reach of vandals.

10–13 The priests ascended from the Jordan, and the ark reassumed its lead only after everything had been properly executed. The point is that the Lord and his priests remained at the place of danger, not the people who hurried over. 12 adds that the eastern tribes went ahead of the others (see 1:12–13). Though armed for the battle, the 40,000 fighting men never lifted a sword for the Lord fought for them even as he had for the armed militia at the Red Sea (cf. Ex. 13:18; 14:13–31). The Hebrew word traditionally translated 'thousand' probably means a contingent of five to fourteen men as in the muster lists of Nu. 1 and 26. Some fighting men remained behind on the east side of the Jordan to protect their homes (cf. 22:8). The people crossed over before the Lord on the west bank as before a viewing stand. The divine Commander-in-Chief once again assumed his position as King in the midst of the war-camp.

14 As the Lord promised, Joshua was now exalted. 10 Nisan (see on 3:1), the day the Passover lamb was selected (Ex. 12:3), was a day when Israel learned again to fear both God (24; 3:10) and Joshua.

15–18 As the Jordan resumed its flow it was as though gates had closed behind the divine King and his vassals as they entered the royal estate. The timing of the Jordan's closing was just as amazing as at its opening (cf. 3:15).

19–24 On that same day Israel erected the national memorial at Gilgal (cf. 4:2). Gilgal may be located at Khirbet el-Mefjir. The national memorial commemorated in this catechism from generation to generation (21, 24) that the Lord dried up the Jordan (22–23; cf. Ex. 14:22), probably for the reasons suggested at 3:7. The joining of the crossing of the Jordan with that of the Red Sea underscored the typological unity of the two events in salvation and history. The pronoun you (plural) in v 23 represents all Israel as a united body. All believers are able to be present in some way at these historical events through Scripture, imagination, and faith. Moreover, through the monument the peoples of the earth would know that God's hand is powerful (cf. 2:10; 3:10; Ex. 15:14–16) and Israel would fear, that is, give single-minded allegiance to the Lord (see Dt. 5:29; 8:6 etc.). Today these purposes are achieved through proclaiming Christ's death for sin and his resurrection from the dead (cf. Rom. 10:6–9).

5:1–14 Ritual preparations

Each of the paragraphs in this chapter displays a parallel between Moses and Joshua, forging yet more links between the two leaders at Israel's founding. They both struck fear into their enemies (1, cf. Ex. 15:10–13), they both initiated circumcision before fully entering the task (2–9; cf. Ex. 4:24–26), they both celebrated the Passover as part of the march to the holy land (10–12; cf. Ex. 12), and they both took their sandals off before the Lord (13–15; cf. Ex. 3:5).

5:1 Introduction. This verse, depicting the Canaanite reaction to the Jordan crossing, links this chapter with 4:24, predicting the world's reaction. The Amorite kings (i.e. those of the city-states in the mountains west of the Jordan) and the Canaanite kings (i.e. those of the city-states on the plains along the coast) are a sample of the seven nations in 3:10. These kings knew about the Lord's mighty act, but instead of fleeing to him in faith, as Rahab had done, their rebellious hearts sank in fear and immobilized them (cf. 2:10; 11:20).

5:2–9 Covenant renewal: circumcision. Terse narratives of Israel's circumcision (2–3, 8–9) frame a detailed explanation (4–7).

2–3 Again, the LORD commanded (2) and Joshua executed perfectly (3). Joshua indirectly circumcised the whole nation through the parents (cf. Gn. 21:4; Ex. 4:25). Two interpretations have been proposed why the narrator represents this circumcision as again (lit. 'a second time'). On the one hand, perhaps that portion of the united militia who were forty years and older and circumcised in Egypt were reckoned as the first circumcision, and those under forty, who were not circumcised in the desert, were deemed the second. This interpretation best suits vs 4–7. On the other hand, the older portion of the militia may have had to be circumcised again because Egyptian circumcision was incomplete, unlike the Israelite complete circumcision. This interpretation best explains the emphasis on flint knives and the reference to the reproach of Egypt (9). Flint knives, so abundant in Canaan in contrast to Egypt, were probably required because they were associated with the Israelite complete circumcision. Statues of fighting men in Canaan during the third millennium BC show warriors as fully circumcised. Now in the land the Israelites could freely circumcise themselves properly and remove from themselves the reproach of Egypt (9), the incomplete circumcision. The hill of foreskins (3 NIV mg.) may have been the name of a little hillock in the vicinity of Gilgal, which means ‘Roll away, Roll away’ the reproach (9).

4–7 Most of the militia, born during the forty years in the desert (cf. Nu. 14:20–22, 29–31; Dt. 2:14), had to be circumcised for the first time. Two related questions need to be addressed: Why circumcision and why at Gilgal? In Egypt circumcision seems to have made one fit for manhood. Circumcision in Israel made one qualified for the covenantal relationship with God (Gn. 17:9–14) and so a fit heir to the promised land. J. A. Motyer has commented that ‘Circumcision ... is the token of that work of grace whereby God chooses out and marks men for His own’. He also noted ‘It [circumcision] was integrated into the Mosaic system in connection with the Passover’ (cf. Ex. 12:44). Here too the sacred rite of initiation had to precede the Passover (10). Had the unbelieving generation circumcised their children in the desert, it would have reduced the gracious ritual to levity; hence, it was appropriately held in abeyance until Israel’s arrival in the flinty land.

5:10–12 Covenant meal: Passover. The celebration of Passover on 14 Nisan at the end of their journey reminded the Israelites that they began this marvellous journey with God through his Passover. This is a forerunner of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 5:7), whose blood provides Christians with salvation from God’s judgment on Satan’s world (cf. Ex. 12:1–7) and whose flesh, symbolized by bread, provides for their sanctification (Ex. 12:8–11). On the very next day (the phrase comes three times in vs 11–12), they began to enjoy the long anticipated food in the promised land. The tiresome forty years of eating manna in the desert were now behind them (cf. Nu. 11:4–9).

5:13–15 Worship of the commander. Joshua’s final preparation for holy war involved encountering the Lord, for his worship was as yet too imperfect for the task ahead. The mysterious man Joshua met was not the Lord himself, but his heavenly captain (NIV mg. best serves the Hebrew). As secular messengers were fully equated with their senders (e.g. 2 Sa. 3:12–13; 1 Ki. 20:2–4), God’s angel (cf. Gn. 31:11; Ex. 3:2; 14:19) and his angelic captain (cf. Dn. 10:5, 20) were also treated with equal respect. He tells Joshua that he is neither for Israel nor her enemies. He is commander of the army of the LORD, including his angels (2 Ki. 6:15–17; Ps. 103:20–21), not an ally (3:10). Should Israel break covenant, the holy God will turn his sword against them (Lv. 26:25; Dt. 28:15–26), as Israel and Achan learned at the battle of Ai (ch. 7). Joshua appropriately bowed in homage before this angelic being. The answer to his second question (14b) was as unexpected as the first. Instead of an awaited battle bulletin, he was ordered to worship better. Though prostrate, his unclean sandals were still on. With Joshua unshod, holy war can begin.

6:1–12:24 Taking the land

The conquest of the land took a long time (11:18) and many battles (12:1–24). Of these the narrator selects four for historical and theological reasons. Israel initiated the first two, which were against the cities of Jericho (6:1–27) and Ai (7:1–8:29), and various Canaanite coalitions initiated the other two in the south (10:1–43) and in the north (11:1–15). Israel’s battles against the two central cities gave it a firm beach-head in the land, dividing it in two. The battles against Jericho and the southern coalition are marked by the Lord’s amazing interventions. They are balanced by the battles against Ai and the northern alliance, marked by brilliant strategy. At the heart of this section, Israel pledged itself to keep God’s law in the land (8:30–34). This is what the war was all about.

6:1–27 Battle of Jericho

6:1 Introduction. Jericho (modern Tell es-Sultan), probably dedicated to the moon god (its name means ‘moon city’), was strategically located, having a large oasis in a region where water was precious and controlling the main roads into the interior.

6:2–5 The Lord’s instructions. The Lord’s instructions to Joshua display the character of the covenant. God graciously gave Israel the land, but they must make it theirs by obeying faithfully (Heb. 11:30; cf. 1:2–9). The first instruction that the army was to march around the city about 650 yds (600 m) once a day for six days served notice that the divine King was marking out the city as his. Jericho’s king and his forces resisted Israel (24:11), but they were as impotent as Satan and his host before Christ and his church (Mt. 12:22–29; Lk. 10:18; Eph. 6:10–18). The second instruction that seven priests were to bear seven trumpets of ram’s horn before the ark, signalled the start of the holy war. The ark is God’s holy throne (see 3:3). The third instruction that the seven priests were to march seven times on the seventh day—the number seven is repeated three times in v 14—signified perfection. The fourth instruction that the people were to give an earth-shaking shout when they heard the last blast of the horns, gave voice to their faith. The fifth command that each warrior was to attack the city straight ahead after the walls fell, found its consummation when they ‘devoted’ the city to the Lord (17–20).

Jericho, Ai and the renewal of the covenant at Shechem.

6:6–7 Joshua’s commands. Joshua repeated the orders which applied to the priests and then those which applied to the people. The ark is mentioned first for God is the King (cf. 3:2–4). Joshua creatively deployed some armed men as a vanguard before the priests blowing trumpets and others as a rearguard behind the ark (9). In this way the divine King assumed his rightful place at the heart of his sacred warriors. The length and depth of the procession is not important.

6:8–14 Orders executed. As the holy army was marching in solemn procession, the seven priests were blowing the trumpets and the armed men, on Joshua’s orders, were as silent as granite. This went on for six days. The drawn out style of the dramatic narrative matches the drawn out march.

6:15–21 Jericho falls. Tradition relates that the seventh day was the Sabbath, which was not allowed to interfere with the holy war. Joshua’s command to devote (Heb. ḥērem) the city involved killing all the people in it to prevent Israel’s spiritual contagion (Dt. 20:16–18). Sometimes the ḥērem involved burning the city (24; 11:13), and on other occasions it did not include the plundering of the conquered cities (cf. 8:26–27; 11:14). The principle is worked out in the church through excommunication (1 Cor. 5:13), a principle and procedure that may need sometimes to be re-applied today.

The holy army followed the instructions perfectly and with their tremendous shout Jericho’s walls collapsed. Major earthquakes happen in the Jordan Valley on an average of four times a century, and the excavations at Jericho have revealed clear evidence of a collapse of at least one mud brick wall. This data gives credibility to the epic without detracting from the wonder that God predicted it and executed it with perfect timing.

6:22–25 Rahab lives and Jericho dies. The conclusion of the story switches between the rescue of Rahab (22–23, 25) and the destruction of the city (24, 26) to contrast their fates. Both by repetition and by extended details God’s covenant-keeping, even with a Canaanite prostitute

(17b, 22–23, 25), is underscored. Rahab and her household were at first placed outside the camp (23) because they were ceremonially unclean (Lv. 13:46; Dt. 23:3), but at the time of writing her descendants were settled permanently in Israel. There is a sense in which she continues to live in the new Israel through her descendant, Jesus Christ (Mt. 1:5).

The prophet Joshua pronounced a curse on any person trying to rebuild the foundations of this city ‘devoted’ to the Lord (cf. 1 Ki. 16:34). The curse, though descriptive, not prescriptive, was nevertheless appropriate, for the firstborn belongs to the Lord (Ex. 13:1) and so takes the place of the city ‘devoted’ to the Lord.

6:27 Joshua’s fame. Joshua’s fame was and still is spread abroad (27; 3:7; 4:14). To sum up, Rahab and Joshua live, but Jericho was ‘devoted’ in death to the Lord.

7:1–8:29 Battle at Ai

The battle’s two parts, the debacle (7:1–26) and victory (8:1–29), both teach lessons of faith.

7:1–26 The debacle. Straight away the narrator implicates all the Israelites (6:18) in Achan’s sin. The concept of national solidarity, the notion that an individual’s acts affect the whole group, illuminates other scriptures (2 Sa. 21:1–9; Acts 9:4; Col. 1:24) and is the basis for the doctrine of humankind’s original sin in Adam and for the justification of the saints through Jesus Christ (Rom. 5:12–19).

2–5 Ai ominously means ‘The Ruin’. Its modern identity is uncertain for the traditional site, et Tell, has been shown to be unoccupied at this time. Israel’s folly and defeat must be seen in the light of God’s wrath (1). It was one thing to send spies to reconnoitre Jericho (2:1), but it was a clear violation of holy war and of God’s instructions to Joshua at his commissioning (Nu. 27:21) to initiate battle without consulting the Lord. Ironically, Joshua was to cast lots after the defeat (14). The spies violated holy war standards by counting on ‘thousands’ (better, ‘contingents’; see on 4:13), not the Lord. If the contingents involved fifteen men each, then thirty-six men constituted an 80% loss. In explaining this rout, one ought not to blame just these violations of holy war, the ultimate cause of defeat, or just Joshua’s tactical blunder in attempting a frontal attack, the immediate cause: it was both.

6–9 In great distress Joshua and the elders tore their clothes (cf. Gn. 37:29, 34; Jdg. 11:35) and fell down before the ark, the sacred place of enquiry (cf. Jdg. 20:18, 23, 26–27). They complained grievously and enquired daringly and frankly of God the reason for their defeat (cf. Is. 6:11). Joshua came close to blaming God as Israel had (cf. Ex. 14:21; 16:2–8). From Joshua’s ignorant perspective the debacle seemed foolish. Should the Canaanites have regained their confidence and from their mountain strongholds descended together upon the Israelites, who were trapped by the swollen Jordan, the situation would have been desperate indeed.

10–15 The Lord answered curtly, Stand up and underscored the nation’s guilt: Israel has sinned. By defrauding the holy God—putting their tastes and assessing their judgments to be better than God’s word—the Israelites had defamed his glorious name. God protected his honour by making them the hērem.

16–23 To provide a way for national salvation, God commanded the profaned camp to reconsecrate itself (see 3:5) and to rid itself of the hērem (13). God isolated the guilty through the ‘yes’ and ‘no’ answers of the sacred lot (cf. 14:2; 18:6; Ex. 28:30), pinpointing Achan by a process of elimination (14, 17). The guilty then confessed the wrong they had done. Everything is naked before God (Heb. 4:13). The sin would be righted by burning all that belonged to Achan as God’s new glorifying hērem. Perhaps the stolen property from Jericho would have inflicted Israel with its physical contagion and so must be put to the purifying fire (see 6:17, 24). In biblical times families acted more as a single unit under the headship of the father than in western cultures. Families entered into covenant with God as a group (see on 2:8–14, 18), and they broke covenant collectively as here. Achan probably hid the plunder in the family tent with the full knowledge of his entire family (cf. Acts 5:1–2).

By confessing his sin Achan gave glory to God (19), for it entailed acknowledging God's omniscience, sovereignty, truth, zeal and holiness. Significantly, unbelieving Achan misnamed the hērem plunder. His view of holy war was wrong. For him Jericho was a prize he earned, not something the divine King won. Likewise materialists see the earth's resources as theirs, not as the Lord's.

24–26 All Israel must participate in the expiating stoning (cf. v 1). The stone cairn at Achor (which means 'disaster') commemorated Achan's tragic sacrilege (cf. 4:5–7).

8:1–29 Victory at Ai. 1–2 In the renewed attack, the rules of holy war were followed scrupulously. First, the Lord commanded the attack, and Joshua flawlessly, and yet innovatively, executed the details. Secondly, the army was commanded not to fear because God had promised it victory (see 1:7–9). Victory was just as sure at the outset of the second attack as defeat was certain at the start of the first.

Yet each battle in the conquest was unique. Holy war standards normally entailed a reduced force so that Israel's faith would be in the Lord, not in military might (see Dt. 17:16; Jdg. 7:1–8). In this case, however, Israel sent the whole army. In the first and unsuccessful attack the reduced numbers actually represented Israel's false confidence (see 7:3). Now the whole army expressed faith by going up again against the formidable foe. In this battle the Lord's hērem included only the city and the people, not the livestock and precious metals (cf. 6:17; 7:15). The battle plan called for a normal military strategy, a cunning ambush, not a priestly procession like the one that amazingly toppled Jericho's walls. At the exodus, the Lord of Hosts amazingly used the Red Sea and the east wind, not Israel's armed men, to destroy the mighty Egyptian army (Ex. 14:10–31), but in the next battle against the Amalekites he entrusted the sword to Joshua (Ex. 17:8–16; cf. 1:1). Likewise in the history of the church, at the time of the apostles there were amazing acts, and afterwards, the not-so-amazing (cf. Heb. 2:3–4). In both ways Christ builds his church (Mt. 16:19).

3–13 The Lord commanded a deceptive ambush (cf. 2:2–7). The number involved in the ambush is unclear. V 3 speaks of thirty contingents (see on 4:13) but v 12 of five. It has been suggested that v 3 be read, 'he sent thirty of his best fighting men, a man from each contingent' (Boling; see below) (cf. 2 Sa. 23:24–39). The full ambush consisted of five contingents of militia men. Note the change from fighting men in v 3 to simply men in v 12. The ambushers made the 12 mile (20 km) climb up the steep mountain, and under the cover of night hid themselves behind a hill, or boulders, or in caves, on the west side of Ai (9, 13). The next morning Joshua set out from Gilgal with the main fighting force, and in full view of Ai pitched camp beyond a valley north of it. That night, the second for the ambushers now fully ready, Joshua scouted out the valley where the battle would take place to assure the success of his deceptive manoeuvre.

14–17 To the king of Ai, Joshua's manoeuvre looked like a replay. Early the next morning he quickly and rashly marched forth to the assigned place for battle, hoping for a rerun of the previous rout. Joshua feigned a retreat, using the past one to good advantage, and lured the king to throw away all caution. To annihilate the fleeing decoy, the king summoned all his troops out of the city, even out of the temple (called here Bethel; cf. Jdg. 20:18, NIV mg.), a city's last point of defence on its acropolis. Here Bethel (lit. 'house of God') is not a place-name but a description of Ai's temple (so R.G. Boling and G. E. Wright, Anchor Bible, Joshua, p. 240).

18–23 At the critical moment the Lord intervened and commanded Joshua to raise the kîdôn, the javelin, or better a curved sword, a scimitar. Stretched out towards Ai, it symbolized the Lord's sovereignty over the city. The Hebrew of v 19 suggests that the men in ambush had already quickly left their hiding places. As soon as Joshua gave the signal, they rushed forward and into the city. Israel's main army now turned back against its hapless pursuers who, looking back, saw their city going up in smoke and the five Israelite units sallying forth from their rear.

24–27 According to the standards of holy war against the Canaanites, Ai's full twelve contingents and their wives became the Lord's hērem, destroyed (26 and NIV mg.)

28–29 The burnt city, a permanent heap of ruins, and the king's tomb, a cairn at its gate, served as memorials (cf. 4:5–7) and proved the events really happened. The king of Ai was hung on a tree, perhaps impaled on a pole, to show that he was under God's curse. According to the law he had to be taken down before nightfall (Dt. 21:23). By contrast, in the NT the King of Israel 'redeemed us ... by becoming a curse for us' on a tree (Gal. 3:13). He too was taken down at sunset (Jn. 19:31).

8:30–35 Covenant renewed at Mt Ebal

At the heart of his battle stories, the narrator pauses to recount that Israel renewed the covenant at Shechem as Moses had instructed (Dt. 11:29). The claim and rule of Israel's Lord were published abroad. The altar symbolized God's claim to the land (cf. Gn. 12:8), and the law defined the character of his rule. As unpruned vines (Lv. 25:5, 11) and uncut hair (Nu. 6:5) were symbols in Israel that these objects were holy or dedicated to the Lord, so an altar of unhewn field-stones showed it belonged to the Creator. Mt Ebal is north of Shechem (modern Nablus), the site of ill-omen, and Mt Gerizim, the lower of the two, (33) is south of it. One should assume that Israel had free access to this area either because they had an existing treaty with the Shechemites (see ch. 24; cf. Gn. 34; Jdg. 9) or because the Canaanites, cowering in their strongholds, were afraid to confront them in this sparsely populated area. Mt Ebal, the mountain of curses, was selected as the appropriate site for the altar because there God removed the sinner's curse.

The burnt offerings symbolized Israel's total consecration to God and served to ransom them. The fellowship offerings, which were eaten, celebrated their relationship with God. The same sacrifices were used in the ceremony at Mt Sinai when Israel initially ratified the covenant (Ex. 24:5). They prefigure Christ's blood for the new covenant (Lk. 22:20). An altar has been found on Mt Ebal and according to its excavator, A. Zetal, all the scientific evidence fits very well with the biblical description.

Since Joshua was following the law of Moses, the reader should assume that the great stones were covered with plaster and the law inscribed upon them (32; cf. Dt. 27:1–8). The extent of the law written in the sight of the solemnly assembled Israelites is not stated. The reader should also assume that in the natural amphitheatre with splendid acoustic properties six tribes on Mt Gerizim shouted the blessings on obedience and six on Mt Ebal the curses on disobedience (33; cf. Dt. 27). The tribes, composed of native and naturalized citizens, stood facing the priests who bore the ark, the divine King's throne (see 6:6–7). Afterwards, in the hearing of all the citizens of God's kingdom, Joshua read the law, expressed through the blessings and curses, the essence of Israel's treaty with God (34–35; cf. Dt. 11:26; 30:1).

9:1–27 Treaty with Gibeon

The treaty with the Gibeonites was an obvious exception to the rule of holy war. This account shows that Israel was able to determine that under certain circumstances an exception could and must be made to the law. Compromising situations often arise, as here (14) and e.g. in divorce cases because the word of God was not sought in the first place. In the time of the Judges, Israel so entangled itself with covenants of peace with the condemned nations, violating the hērem (see on 6:15–21), that the Lord no longer drove out the Canaanites (Jdg. 2:1–5). Many in the church today are opting for peaceful co-existence with the world and losing their spiritual power.

9:1–2 Canaanite confederacy. The exceptional diplomacy of Gibeon is presented against the background of the decision of other Canaanite confederacies to wage war against Israel (10:1–11:23). The Gibeonites risked peace, not war. Unfortunately, though they feared God, they did not opt for a third solution, full vassalage within God’s covenant, as Rahab had done (see 2:8–14). Confronted with Christ and his gospel, people can likewise opt for one of these three postures: fight against him, peaceful co-existence without submission to him, or full membership in the new covenant through his blood and spiritual rebirth.

9:3–13 Gibeon’s deception. Gibeon and its four allies are called Hivites (7) to remind us that they are one of the sentenced nations. The popular identification of Gibeon with el-Jib, 8 miles (13 km) north-west of Jerusalem, is questionable. With terms of peace in their mouths, they approached Joshua, who must take ultimate responsibility for what happened, even though he seemingly allowed the elders to participate in the negotiations (6, 8b, 15).

The Gibeonites staked their hope for a peace treaty on Israel’s policy of making peace with compliant cities that were far removed from Israel, and not a part of the condemned nations who might pollute them (Dt. 20:10–15). The Gibeonites therefore pretended to come from a great distance.

Whereas deception is a recognized necessity in war, deception in making treaties is unacceptable (see on 2:2–7), and so Joshua cursed them (23). In truth, Joshua and the elders were also in the wrong for depending on their senses rather than enquiring of the Lord (14). The church must not substitute its own understanding, however attractive, for the word of God.

9:14–15 Treaty with Gibeon. Perhaps Israel sampled (better, ‘took’) the food because it was part of the covenant-making procedure. Ultimately Israel, not Gibeon, was in the wrong for it failed to consult the Lord.

9:16–18 The Gibeonites’ deception discovered. Just three days later Israel discovered the guile of the Gibeonites, and it took another three days to make the 17 mile (27 km) journey from Gilgal to the Gibeonite league to confirm the report. The four towns constituting this league controlled the approaches to Jerusalem from the north-west and so lived on a vital artery within the Israelite confederacy. The assembly rightly complained against their leaders because Israel’s existence in the land was now threatened by this pagan presence.

9:19–27 Resolution. Three times in successive verses (18, 19, 20) the point is made emphatically that Israel must not break an oath, even though made under false colours, and so misuse God’s name (cf. Ex. 20:7; 2 Sa. 21:1–14; Mt. 5:33–37). This is a truth that needs to be reasserted in an age of broken marriage vows and of broken business contracts. The elders resolved the problem of securing an irrevocable treaty under false pretences by interpreting the treaty’s term, ‘servant’, in the most onerous way—the Gibeonites were to become wood cutters and water carriers for all the congregation. Joshua added cultic service to the non-cultic duties demanded by the elders.

10:1–43 Conquest of the south

The southern campaign consisted of two parts: the rout of the five Amorite kings besieging Gibeon, and the subsequent capture of royal cities and subjugation of territory.

10:1–28 Battle at Gibeon. 1–7 Joshua's conquest of Ai, and above all the submission of Gibeon, prompted the alarmed king of Jerusalem to form an alliance with four other royal cities and besiege Gibeon. City-states in Israel's world often joined forces in repelling an enemy (cf. Gn. 14:1–3). From a letter in the Amarna correspondence (c. 1350 BC) it may be inferred that Gibeon was part of a Jerusalem kingdom which incorporated most of the Judean hill country. Faced with attack by this powerful coalition, Gibeon appealed to Joshua to fulfil Israel's treaty obligation and come to their help. Israel rose to this first real test of their mettle.

The king of Jerusalem, Adoni-Zedek (which means 'My LORD is Righteous'), ruled over a city composed of Amorites and Hittites, both of whom were to be 'devoted' in death to God (see on 6:15–21; cf. Dt. 7:1). Adoni-Zedek's world-view prevented him from understanding that Israel's victories were due to the Lord, not Joshua, and so from his frame of reference it was a matter of matching armies against armies. Unlike the Gibeonites, who had heard the fame of the Lord (9:9–10), he heard the fame of Joshua. The king's good fighters (2), like medieval knights (cf. 'fighting men' 6:2), were trained and wealthy enough to arm themselves well. At this time the Egyptians controlled Canaan, and Lachish (modern Tell ed-Duweir) was its provincial capital.

8–15 Gibeon's battleground provided a stage on which the divine warrior displayed wonders. This is the third and final act of the Lord's amazing interventions on Israel's behalf (cf. chs. 3–4, 6). In the best traditions of holy war the Lord gave instruction, probably after being consulted; commanded Israel not to fear, promising them victory (8); threw the enemy into panic when Joshua took them by surprise after a 22 mile (35 km) tortuous, twisting, uphill all-night climb from Gilgal to Hebron (9–10); and rained a deadly barrage of hailstones upon the routed enemy fleeing towards its strongholds in the foothills (11) (cf. Ex. 14:24; Jdg. 4:15; Ps. 77:17–19.) Isaiah reflecting on this drama speaks of the Lord as rousing himself (Is. 28:21).

Using flashback, the narrator saved the most spectacular scene to last—the victory at the Beth-Horon pass (12–15). In this scene, the Lord's entourage, the sun and moon, play supporting roles to Joshua. The Canaanites coming up the slopes from the west of Gibeon (to which Joshua had brought relief after his strenuous, all-night climb) were looking east into the blinding sun above Gibeon when the battle began. To keep the advantage, Joshua, praying to the Lord, commanded the sun and moon, as the Lord's subordinates, to stay put until Israel avenged itself (i.e. defensively vindicated its sovereignty) on its enemy. Amazingly, the Lord submitted his heavenly attendants to a man's command on earth's stage. The sun may have been the principal deity at Gibeon as the moon was at Jericho (see 6:1). The narrator cites his source, The Book of Jashar ('The Book of the Upright One'), an early and probably poetic account or collection of national war songs celebrating Israel's heroes (cf. 2 Sa. 1:18–27).

There have been many attempts to translate the Hebrew of vs 12–13 in order to provide a more naturalistic interpretation of the event. Some scholars think it refers to a solar eclipse. Others suggest that the sun stopped shining, not moving, and that about a full day should be translated 'as when day is done'. A slightly modified form of this position claims that the text refers to an early morning hailstorm that blackened the sky until the enemy was defeated and renders v 13 'The sun ceased shining in the midst of the sky and did not hasten to come up, [so that it was] as when day is done'. Although the Hebrew words translated stand and stopped may mean 'cease shining', especially in poetry, the narrator's prosaic qualifier to stopped in v 13b in the middle of the sky rather than 'shining' seems to favour the traditional interpretation. Similarly to take the words translated in the NIV delayed going down as ‘did not hasten to come up’ is to strain the meaning of the Hebrew. This interpretation, though ingenious, seems motivated, not by a normal reading of the text, but by an attempt to satisfy the rules of science. There have also been attempts to classify this passage as a historicized myth (see R.G. Boling in Anchor Bible), but that interpretation undermines the credibility of the inspired author.

Other scholars have rejected scientific explanations, regarding ‘the phenomenon as one of the numerous miracles of which the Bible tells us ... a “sign” of an extraordinary divine intervention which imparts a grace unmerited by man and inconceivable in any other way’ (J.A. Soggin, Joshua [SCM, p. 123]). Joshua’s command to the sun has been compared to Agamemnon’s prayer to Zeus not to let the sun go down before the Achaeans have been victorious.

16–21 The epic of the battle of Gibeon is now resumed. Joshua did not stop his army to execute the five kings who, according to his intelligence reports, had hidden themselves in the cave at Makkedah. Instead he ordered a unit to block its entrance with great stones and to guard it, while his main force pursued the fleeing Canaanites, cutting off their retreat to their fortified cities in the west. Some, however, escaped (cf. vs 28–39). The troops then returned to the camp now set up at Makkedah. None dared criticize even one man of this vanquishing army (cf. Ex. 11:7, where ‘bark’ represents the same Hebrew word rendered here uttered a word). With that reputation they will soon have rest.

22–27 It was now time to dispatch the five kings. Joshua used the occasion to fortify spiritually his troops for future battles. Before the entire army he instructed his commanders to follow a widespread ancient custom and place their feet upon the necks of the humiliated kings (cf. 1 Ki. 5:3; Ps. 110:1; 1 Cor. 15:25–28). As the Lord had commanded Joshua at the beginning of the conquest (1:8), Joshua now commanded them not to fear, for these kings were an earnest of God’s future victories. Then Joshua killed them. As he did with the king of Ai, he had these cursed kings impaled until the evening as a public spectacle to induce the fear of the Lord, not of the Canaanites. The stones in front of the cave functioned as yet another memorial to Joshua’s amazing conquest (cf. 4:5–7). The kings’ execution prefigures Satan’s humiliation and defeat (cf. Gn. 3:15).

10:29–39 Annihilation of seven Amorite cities. In a sequel the narrator rapidly lists seven royal armies that Joshua wiped out and six royal cities that he fought against, captured, and put to the hērem.

10:40–43 Summary. The three principal geographical areas of Judah, the hill country, the Negev and the foothills, were all subdued in this campaign. Though much land still remained to be taken (see 13:1–7), the back of the condemned Canaanites had been broken; in that sense it could be said that Joshua had subdued the whole region.

11:1–15 Conquest of the north

The northern campaign, like the southern one, also consisted of two parts: the rout at the Waters of Merom (11:1–9) and the subsequent capture of the cities (11:10–15). All the condemned nations assembled against Israel for this decisive and climactic battle for the land (cf. 3:10; 9:1–2).

11:1–9 Battle at the Waters of Merom. 1–5 The convener of the Canaanite coalition was Jabin, a dynastic ruler at Hazor (see Jdg. 4:2). Hazor (modern Tell Qedah) was a huge, strongly fortified city in Joshua’s time, covering 200 acres (80 hectares) with a population of about 40,000. It was one of the major cities along the trade route between Egypt and Mesopotamia. Archaeology and ancient Near Eastern literatures corroborate the statement that Hazor had been the head of all these kingdoms (10).

The narrator presents Jabin's call to arms concentrically. At the heart of the army was Jabin (1a). Assembled around him were three kings of Galilee: from Madon (near Qarn Hattin in the heart of Galilee), Shimron (site uncertain), and Achshaph (somewhere in Asher, see 19:25). Reinforcing them were kings from the surrounding areas: in the north from the mountains in Upper Galilee, in the south from Kinnereth and the Jordan valley south of Kinnereth, and in the west from Naphoth Dor, a famous seaport just south of Mt Carmel (2). To provide maximum strength kings assembled from the more remote regions south and north of them (3). Regarding the remote south, v 3a, should read: 'to the Canaanites in the east and in the west to the Amorites: [between them] to the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Jebusites in the hill country.' From the remote north the Hivites hailed from below Mt Hermon in the region of Mizpah (an uncertain site meaning 'Look Out').

The conquest of Hazor.

These allies were armed with the ultimate weapon of their day, the lightweight horse-drawn chariot, which could be disassembled and reassembled for fighting in the plains. They met for the decisive battle probably in the plateau to the north of Jebel Jermaq, about 2.5 miles (4 km) north-east of Merom.

6–9 Once again Israel followed its rules of holy war: Joshua consulted the Lord, and he gave Joshua's army the encouragement needed against staggering odds; he told them both the time of battle, and the tactics to employ. When Joshua's men had crippled the horses, the charioteers would be forced to flee and the Israelites could then pursue them. Afterwards they could return and burn the chariots at their leisure, which is what they did (9). (On strategy versus miracle see 8:1–2; 9:1–2; 10:8–15).

Joshua and his battle-hardened army now attacked suddenly in a pre-emptive strike (7). The holy rout was on again (8; cf. 10:9–11). The unholy coalition split apart, some fleeing to the north-west and others to the north-east, both hastening headlong out of the land. Following the rules of holy war Joshua spared none of them.

11:10–15 Capture of the cities. The fate of the captured cities parallels the list in 10:28–39. As in the case of Jericho, the vaunted city of Hazor was totally destroyed (hērem); nothing was spared and the city itself was burned (cf. 6:15–21). (For the archaeological evidence at Hazor see Introduction: date of the conquest.) Unlike Jericho, however, no curse was placed upon anyone who rebuilt it (cf. Jdg. 4:2). The Israelites did not burn the other royal cities. As in the case of Ai, they kept the plunder (cf. 8:24–27), as the Lord had commanded Moses (Dt. 6:10–11). Moses' command, 'do not leave alive anything that breathes' (Dt. 20:16), must refer to human life, not flocks and cattle, for with the Lord's full approval Israel carried off the livestock for themselves (12–15).

11:16–23 Summary of the conquest

The summary at the end of the southern campaign (10:40–41) is matched by a summary of the entire conquest. The Arabah, unlike v 2, is the entire rift valley from above the Sea of Galilee to the Gulf of Eilat. Mt Halak ('Bald Mountain'), is Jeleb Halaq, far to the south-east of Beersheba and Seir is Edom. Baal-gad, the opposite pole on the north-south axis may be Banias, at the base of Mt Hermon and the source of the Jordan (17). To judge from the age of Caleb, if the numbers can be taken at face value, the long time (18) of the conquest may be seven years. Caleb was eighty-five at the end of the conquest (see 14:10) and seventy-eight when it began (cf. 14:7 and Dt. 2:14).

None of the Canaanites repented, except Rahab and her family, and only the Gibeonites sought a peace treaty, because the Lord hardened the hearts of the rest for slaughter (20; see 9:1–2). From the parallel situation of Pharaoh versus Moses one can infer that the hearts of the Canaanites against Joshua were, like all of humankind, naturally hard (Ex. 7:11–14; 1 Cor. 2:14). When confronted with the Lord's amazing deeds through his servant, they, like Pharaoh, hardened their hearts (cf. Ex. 8:32; 9:34), whereupon the sovereign Lord hardened them (cf. Ex. 10:1). All people are dead in sin and deserve God's judgment; it is only through God's mercy that he gives new life to some (Rom. 9:10–18).

The summary in v 23 refers back to 1:3. Elsewhere the narrator notes the incompleteness of the conquest in more precise terms (see 13:1; 15:63; 16:10). For rest, see on 1:12–15 and 10:21. Israel's wanderings were over. With organized resistance gone, the way was ready for the land to be distributed (23; see 1:6).

12:1–24 Appendix: list of defeated kings

This chapter, summarizing the kings the Israelites killed and whose lands they took over, provides a transition between the conquest of the land (chs. 1–11) and its distribution (chs. 12–21). This list confirms chs. 6–11.

Joshua repeatedly notes the change from the old, wicked kings and their lands to God as the new Ruler and his tribes who will sanctify the promised land. This change illustrates several truths. First, that the just kingdom of God rightfully replaces the unjust kingdoms of this world who have usurped his rule over the earth (see 3:9–13; 8:30–35). Secondly, that at the time of judgment God decisively eliminates the wicked. Thirdly, that the wicked cannot stand before a holy army, one that follows God's revelation and trusts in him (1:5; 10:8). Fourthly, that the eternal God keeps his promises. God had covenanted this land to the patriarchs and their seed. He has now fulfilled that promise but has not yet consummated it (see 1:6). The conquest reminds the church that the covenant-keeping God will give his people the new heavens and the new earth, as he promised, and correspondingly that they must wait patiently for their inheritance (Heb. 11:39–40). Fifthly, that the united people of God, in this case the tribes both west and east of the Jordan, dispossess the illegitimate rulers and inherit the promised land (see 1:12–15).

The summary is divided into two halves: Israel's conquest and settlement of the land east of the Jordan (1–5), and Joshua's conquest of the kings west of the Jordan (6–24).

12:1–5 Conquest of the land east of the Jordan by Moses and its settlement. The narrator first reminds his readers of the transitoriness of the kingdoms east of the Jordan.

1 The immense Gorge of the Arnon, Wadi el-Mujib, on the east side of the Jordan opposite Ein Gedi, is a natural border previously marking the boundary between the Moabites to the south and Amorites to the north (Jdg. 11:18–19). The Arabah here is the wide Jordan rift valley between the Sea of Galilee (Kinnereth) and the Dead Sea (Sea of the Arabah). At the time of Joshua the northern border was Mt Hermon, not the promised border at the Euphrates (see 1:4; 13:1–7).

2–3 The conquest of Sihon king of the Amorites is told in Nu. 21:21–31 and Dt. 2:24–37. Aroer (modern Ar'arah) is about 6 miles (10 km) from the Dead Sea on the north bank overlooking the Wadi el-Mujib. It symbolized the southern limit of this territory. The Wadi Jabbok, flowing westward into the Jordan, about 7 miles (12 km) north of the Dead Sea, formed Sihon's northern boundary. Israel was not allowed to encroach upon the eastern half of the land belonging to the Ammonites, who were not yet organized as a kingdom (see 13:25). Gilead proper was the hilly, forested country north of a line reaching westward from Heshbon to the Dead Sea and extending northwards towards the Wadi Yarmuk, but it flattens out into plains about 11 miles (18 km) south of Yarmuk. The northern extensions of these plains form the territory of Bashan. This hilly, wooded area is halved by the Wadi Jabbok.

4–5 The conquest of Og king of Bashan is told in Nu. 21:32–35 and Dt. 3:1–11. The Rephaites were giants who inhabited the land before the Israelites. They were known by their successors, the Moabites and Ammonites, as the Emimites and the Zamzummimites respectively (Dt. 2:11, 20–21). These formidable people, comparable in stature with the Anakites, were in the promised land at the time of Abraham (Gn. 15:20). The Geshurites and Maacathites were Aramean tribes on the eastern fringe of Israel.

6 These lands were conquered by Moses, who, under God, handed them over to the two-and-a-half tribes loyal to the Lord in order to sanctify the land. Twice Moses is called servant of the LORD (cf. 1:1) probably to show Israel's legitimate right to the land.

12:7–24 Conquest of the land west of the Jordan by Joshua. The land Joshua conquered is roughly the size of the state of Vermont in the USA or Wales in Great Britain.

7–8 Joshua and the Israelites in v 7 matches Moses ... and the Israelites in v 6. (For Baalgad, see on 11:17.) The list roughly follows the accounts of the conquest as presented in chs. 6–11 and supplements them. At this time Israel had its camp at Gilgal and had not yet settled the land or occupied its cities.

9–24 These 'kings' ruled over tiny city-states whose territory extended only about 3 miles (5 km) around the fortified city. In 668 BC, after his first campaign in Syria-Palestine, Ashurbanipal collected tribute from thirty-three kings.

13:1–21:45 Allotting the land

Land was allocated to some of the tribes prior to their taking possession of it (13:1–7). This remaining land presented a continuing challenge to the faith of these unsettled tribes.

Though all Israel fought concertedly to establish itself in the promised land, the various tribes took possession of their territories in several ways, at different times, and with varying degrees of success. The two-and-a-half eastern tribes asked for and received from Moses the area east of the river (13:8–33; cf. 12:1–6). West of the river, Judah, Ephraim and Manasseh carved out land for themselves and then had it allotted to them by Joshua (15:1–17:18). The remaining seven tribes, however, did not have this success. In their case, Joshua had the land surveyed, divided it into seven appropriate geographical areas, and then cast lots for its distribution (18:1–19:51). It was then up to each tribe to claim its allotment.

13:1–7 Land still to be taken

The book of Joshua presents two views of the nature and scope of Israel's occupation of Canaan: lightning-quick and spectacularly successful battles in conquering the entire land (11:16–23; 21:43–45; cf. Ex. 23:23), and a series of many battles over a long time (11:18) with huge tracts of territory still to be possessed little by little after the conquest (13:1–7; 18:3; cf. Ex. 23:27–30; Jdg. 1). The tension may be resolved by noting two factors.

First, biblical historians present their material according to theological schemes. Sometimes, as in the case of the books of Kings and Chronicles and of the NT gospels, different authors present the same history from different angles. To make their points they carefully select material, organizing it thematically, not necessarily chronologically, and editing as necessary. They write history in order to provoke memory and inspire vision, not merely to chronicle events. Our narrator celebrates that when Joshua's amazing campaigns ended Canaanite resistance was gone. By the 'land' he means both the territory and its inhabitants. Now that the people of the land have been defeated, it could be said that the whole land in its geographic sense had been taken. That memory aimed to nerve Israel to settle the land that remained.

Secondly, Israel's possession of the land and the rest that ensued are expandable themes, for the land was taken 'little by little' (Ex. 23:30) but never totally (Heb. 4:1–14). Future generations must play their part (Jdg. 3:1–4). The author of Chronicles used Jdg. 3:1–4 to present David as greater than Joshua for he ruled from 'the Shihor River in Egypt to Lebo [the entrance to] Hamath', using vocabulary unique to these two texts. Isaiah saw the fulfilment of these ideal national boundaries in the Messianic age (Is. 11:12–16). At any given point during the process of possessing the land, it can be said God fulfilled his promise. Moreover, each individual fulfilment was a part of the ultimate fulfilment and could be reckoned as such. The NT presents the same tension regarding the kingdom of God: it is already here but in its fullest sense 'not yet'.

The lands that remained were:

2–3 The territory that will become Philistia, from Shihor ('River of Horus', the Nile) to Gezer (following the LXX, not Geshur as in NIV). Though later ruled by the Philistines (cf. 11:22; Gn. 10:14), this land was part of the Canaanite territory promised to Israel. The Avvites lived in the neighbourhood of Gaza.

4 The territory of the Canaanites from Arah (site unknown) of the Sidonians as far as Aphek, south-east of Byblos, and the Amorites, probably the kingdom of the Amurru in the Lebanon region.

5 The territory of the Gebalites i.e. the area of Byblos and all of Lebanon east of Baal Gad beneath Mt Hermon to the entrance to Hamath.

Other areas still to be taken were: strategic cities in the Jezreel valley—Megiddo, Taanach, Ibleam, Endor and Beth Shan (17:11–12; cf. Jdg. 1:27).

The coastal plain, Aphek, Gezer and Dor (13:4; 16:10; 17:11; cf. Jdg. 1:27, 29).

The city of Jerusalem (15:63; cf. Jdg. 1:21) and the territories of Geshur and Maacah (13:13).

These comments show that Israel carved out its territory in the mountains of Palestine while the native populations remained in the plains because they intimidated Israel with their iron chariots (see 17:16; Jdg. 1:19).

Allocate in v 6 means 'to cause to fall' (i.e. the lot ruled by God; cf. Nu. 33:54; Is. 34:17; Mi. 2:4–5).

13:8–33 Distribution of the land east of the Jordan

This chapter aims to give a total idea of the land east of the Jordan, which Moses distributed.

13:8–13 Survey of the land for the eastern tribes. The allocation is linked with 12:1–5. The half-tribe of Manasseh is mentioned first to link it with v 7, not because it was most important.

13:14 The tribe of Levi. Vs 14 and 33 function as a frame to the more detailed account of the distribution of the land to the eastern tribes (15–31). In this way, the Levites' inheritance, the Lord and his offerings, is both highlighted and distinguished. The best inheritance was fellowship with the Lord himself, an inheritance available to all who desire it (cf. Pss. 16:5; 119:57; 142:5), showing that the inheritance was not linked inextricably with the land itself.

13:15–23 The tribe of Reuben. This section lists twelve captured towns first (17–20) and then the history of the conquest of the land east of the Jordan (21–22; cf. Nu. 21:21–32). The entire realm of Sihon (21a) must be qualified, for in v 27 part of it went to Gad. In view here is the part that extended over the tableland. 21b–22 mention the defeat of Sihon king of the Amorites adding that of the Midianite chiefs, and of Balaam the sorcerer (24:9–10; Dt. 23:4–5), to underscore the political and spiritual change of administrations that Moses, the lawgiver, brought about in the land (see on 12:1–5). 23 presents a summary.

Reuben, Gad and eastern Manasseh.

13:24–28 The tribe of Gad. V 25 gives an overview and sets an eastern limit while v 26 sets limits on south and north and v 27 lists the western claims in the Jordan Valley. The introductory formula (24; cf. vs 15, 29) means to say that no less a person than Moses gave them this patrimony (see on 1:6). All the towns of Gilead near Jazer in southern Gilead (cf. v 31). Half the Ammonite country refers to the western part, between the Arnon and the Jabbok, not the eastern (see 12:1–5; Dt. 2:19). This Aroer is not to be confused with the one overlooking the Arnon Gorge (see 12:2; 13:16).

13:29–30 The half-tribe of Manasseh. The southernmost border for the tribe descending from Machir, son of Manasseh, is said to be Mahanaim, but no attempt is made to define precisely its other boundaries. These roughly fit the description in Dt. 3:4. 13–15 Manasseh, as Jacob's firstborn, was exceptional in that it received two portions, despite the preference expressed by Jacob in Gn. 48.

13:31–33 Summary. The summary frames this section. The reference to Levi promises the reader something better (cf. v 14).

14:1–19:51 Distribution of the land west of the Jordan

Between the introduction (14:1–5) and the conclusion (19:51), the narrator frames this section with the exemplary faiths of Caleb (14:6–15) and Joshua (19:49–50). These two heroes, who by faith outlived their own generation, claimed their inheritances and possessed them.

14:1–5 Introduction. The introduction to the distribution of the territory west of the Jordan names the land, the administrators, the method, the tribes and the legal warrant. The Egyptians referred to this land as 'Canaan', the administrative term used here for the territory in view (see 21:2; 22:9).

The Lord ultimately directed the distribution by means of the lot (see 13:6), while Eleazar the priest, Joshua and the heads of the tribal clans (i.e. subtribal chiefs; see 21:1) mediated the decision and administered it. Eleazar is mentioned first because Joshua stood before him at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting and asked him to consult the Urim and Thummim, instruments that gave 'yes' or 'no' answers in response to specific inquiries (18:1–10; cf. Nu. 27:21).

Here the nine-and-a-half western tribes are in view, not the two-and-a-half eastern tribes (cf. 13:8–13). In Israel the firstborn received a double blessing (Dt. 21:15–17). Jacob, however, the father of all the tribes, made an exception. He passed over Reuben, his firstborn by Leah, his unloved wife (Gn. 29:31–32), and gave the double portion instead to Joseph, the firstborn of his beloved Rachel. He did this by elevating Joseph's two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, to full tribal status along with his own sons Reuben and Simeon (Gn. 48:1–9). The Mosaic law later disallowed this practice. The Levites were again excluded. In 13:14 their spiritual heritage is emphasized; here their practical needs are met (cf. Nu. 18:21–32). No less a figure than Moses, elsewhere called 'the servant of the LORD' (13:8; 14:7) and 'man of God' (14:6), approved this procedure. The point is repeated several times (2–3, 5). Since the clans followed Moses' legislation perfectly, their claims were valid.

14:6–17:18 Early allotments at Gilgal: Judah and Joseph. 14:6–15 Caleb's name means 'Dog' and may reflect the honoured status of this faithful and humble 'servant of the LORD' (Nu. 14:24). In the Amarna (c. 1350 BC) and the Lachish letters (586 BC) vassals use the term of themselves to express their loyalty to kings. The narrator refers to him as a Kenizzite because of his father (1 Chr. 4:13–15). His exceptional allotment is given first because his wholehearted commitment to the LORD—repeated three times for emphasis (8–9, 14)—exemplified the way in which the tribes were to claim their land even against redoubtable foes (see 13:1–7). With that kind of faith the land had rest from war (15; cf. 1:15; 11:23).

After an introduction (6a), Caleb's story has three parts: his legal right based on faith and God's word (6b–9), his claim of it by faith and war (10–12), and Joshua's grant (13–15).

Caleb's claim was based on God's promise to give him and Joshua the land in connection with their faithfulness in the reconnaissance from Kadesh (Nu. 14:24, 30). Caleb's conviction not to undermine the people's morale won him life and an inheritance (see Nu. 13). The land he had walked upon at that time was not the city of Hebron itself or its immediate pasture-lands but the fields and villages around it (13; see 21:11–12).

God's promise entailed that Caleb's inheritance should not be determined by casting lots. Probably the men of Judah accompanied him to support his claim. His demand exemplifies the nature of the covenant with God. He was granted the right to the land in the first place because of his faith (7–9) but now he must possess it by claiming it and driving out the mighty Anakites (10–12; see 1:6–7; cf. Mt. 25:34). Christians inherit their salvation through Christ (Eph. 1:14; Col. 3:24; Heb. 9:15). The Anakites, symbols of Israel's formidable enemies, are mentioned at the end of Joshua's battles (see 11:21–23) and now at the beginning of the distribution and Caleb's determination to drive them out. That Caleb might fully enjoy his inheritance, God did not allow him to age during his thirty-eight years in the cruel desert (11). The bodies of believers age, but not their spirits, and their bodies will be raised (2 Cor. 4:7–18).

Saints with the bold faith of Caleb and Rahab are rewarded (13–15), and the narrator goes out of his way to make the point (see 6:22–25). To 'bless' means to make potent, to reproduce and prevail (Gn. 22:17–18). Joshua, who himself was old, was making his eighty-five-year-old compatriot potent!

15:1–63 The narrator clearly states why he defines the tribal inheritances in such detail: it is to show that God keeps his promises (21:43–45). These precise definitions of the tribes' inheritances are a clear reminder that God fulfilled his promises to give his covenant people the land fit for kings. V 1 harks back to 11:23.

First, its boundaries are delineated: southern (1–4), eastern (5a), northern (5b–11) and western (12). Allotment in v 1 refers to the actual casting of the 'lot' (see 13:1–7). As an omen of Judah's future greatness and leadership (Gn. 49:10; Jdg. 1:1–2; 20:18), its allotment west of the Jordan is mentioned first (15:2–12).

Then Caleb's inheritance (15:13–19) is mentioned, again stressing how he dispossessed the former inhabitants to take possession of the gift as an example for others (see 14:6–15 and note similarity of 14:15 and 15:13). Caleb himself dispossessed the Anakites from Hebron, and he promised his daughter in marriage to a man of like faith who would take Debir (cf. 1 Sa. 17:25; 18:17). Othniel, his nephew (cf. Jdg. 1:13), won both the promised land and bride, as did Christ (cf. Eph. 5:25; Heb. 4:1–14). By boldly petitioning her father Caleb's daughter won coveted springs of water (cf. Lk. 11:1–13). This story, vs 13–19, is not presented in chronological order. Caleb and Othniel took their cities as part of the campaign recorded in 10:36–39.

Finally, the Canaanite towns included in the allotment were registered, town by town (cf. Dt. 6:10–11), according to Judah's geography. First the Negev (21–32), then the western foothills (33–44) and the coastal plain to be inhabited by the Philistines (45–47). Followed by the high hill country between Jerusalem and Hebron (48–60), and the desert towards the Dead Sea (61–62). These regions were further divided into eleven districts. Note how nearly every one ends with a total of the towns involved (32, 36, 41, 43, 47, 51, 54, 57, 59, 60, 62).

63 Though Joshua had killed the king of Jerusalem (10:1, 22–27), the Judeans could not dislodge the Jebusites from Jerusalem. In fact, however, the northern boundary of Judah (15:8) ran along the southern slope of Jebus (ancient Jerusalem) and so did not include the city itself which belonged to Benjamin (see 18:16, 28; Jdg. 1:21).

16:1–17:18 The presentation of Joseph's allotment consists of an overview of its southern boundary (16:1–4), the territory of Ephraim (16:5–10), the territory of Manasseh (17:1–13), and the complaint made by these tribes about the size of their inheritance (17:14–18).

16:1–4 This introduction describes the southern boundary, Ephraim's border with Benjamin (cf. 18:12–13) and Dan. For the meaning of allotment (1) and the theological significance of this distribution see comments on 15:1–63. Though Ephraim and Manasseh were reckoned as two tribes (see 14:4), they drew only one lot, not without protest (see 17:14): Ephraim in the south, Manasseh in the north. Manasseh's northern boundary is defined in its relation to Asher and Isaachar (10), though it retained cities within those two tribal areas (11).

16:5–10 Ephraim's inheritance is listed ahead of Manasseh's because Jacob put him first (see Gn. 48:17–20). The presentation of Ephraim's inheritance consists of a delineation of his boundaries (5–8), a reference to the towns and villages he inherited within Manasseh (9; see 15:1–63), and a note of failure (10). Joshua defeated the Gezerites but did not take their city (10:33; Jdg. 1:29).

17:1–13 Machir was Manasseh's firstborn (13:31; Gn. 50:23; Nu. 26:29). The Hebrew text says that he was a great warrior and so had already inherited Gilead, named after his son, and Bashan east of the Jordan (see 13:29–30; cf. Nu. 26:30–31). Gilead also had seven male descendants who inherited land west of the Jordan (see Nu. 26:30–32).

A grandson of Gilead, Zelophehad had no male descendants because he died in Korah's rebellion, but he was survived by five daughters. To ensure the survival of Israelite families without male offspring, even to sinners such as Zelophehad, the Lord promised that the father's rights be given to his daughters (3–6; see Nu. 26:33; 27:1–11). As a result, Manasseh's inheritance was divided among ten clans: Zelophehad's five living brothers and his five daughters. Like Caleb, these daughters appealed, by faith in the Lord's promise, to those administering the distribution of the land to give them their rights (14:1–5, 6–15).

The inability of Manasseh and Ephraim to dispossess the Canaanites serves as a transition to the next section (14–18). The lack of faith's obedience ultimately undermined Israel's spiritual commitment and led to Israel's inter-marriage with the Canaanites and to their undoing (see Dt. 7:1–6; 12:29–31; Jdg. 3:1–6).

The request and failure of the people of Joseph at the end of the section on the early allotments (17:14–18) contrasts sharply with the request and success of Caleb of Judah at the beginning (14:6–15; Jdg. 1:27–28). The peoples of Joseph complained that their allotment was too small; Joshua responded that their faith was too small. In the light of this book's concern for the unity of all Israel, one could also add their interests were too selfish.

From a legal viewpoint their complaint that they were given but one 'lot' seems to have some justification for they were reckoned as two large tribes (14; see 16:1). The Lord, however, governed the lot and both Ephraim and Manasseh had been given separate tracts of land. Manasseh's was second west of the Jordan only to Judah's, and half of Manasseh was given a large tract of land east of the Jordan as well.

Joshua used their claim, we are a numerous people (lit. many/great), against them. Since they were 'great', they should deforest the hill country and not just be content with the towns the Canaanites had built and the pasturage they had cleared (15). The hill country of Ephraim may have included the forested areas on both sides of the Jordan. The term is so used in 2 Sa. 18:6 and the inhabitants of this area, the Perizzites and the Rephaites, are said respectively to have lived on both sides of the river (3:10; 12:4, 8; 13:12). It explains Joshua's statement that Ephraim and Manasseh will have not only one allotment (17). Their claim that The hill country is not enough for us, and all the Canaanites who live in the plain have iron chariots (16) exposed their spiritual failure: sloth, timidity and lack of vision.

Joshua replied with the confidence of faith: clear [the forested hill country] and drive out [the Canaanites] (17–18).

18:1–19:51 Allotment for the rest of the tribes at Shiloh (see map on Israel's tribal territories in Deuteronomy). 18:1–10 Joshua moved his base camp from Gilgal (14:6) to Shiloh in the heart of Ephraim where the Lord's Tent of Meeting was pitched (see Ex. 33:7; Nu. 11:16; Dt. 31:14). Shiloh was in the centre of the promised land and its landscape includes a natural amphitheatre. By distributing the land in the Lord's presence, the theological significance of the conquest of the land and its distribution comes to the fore: it was the Lord's land, to be sanctified for him (see 8:30–35). In keeping with his theological perspective the narrator repeats that Israel had subdued the land, but by faith it must still be possessed (1–2; see 13:1–7).

Joshua chided the remaining seven tribes for their failure to fulfil their covenant obligations (3). The Hebrew word behind wait means 'to be slack'. God had given them the land, but they had failed to enter and possess it by faith (3; see 1:7–9, 11). To encourage them to obey in faith, Joshua sent out twenty-one men, three picked by each tribe, to survey the remaining land, write a description of it town by town (9) with a view to apportioning it, and bring the report to him. After the tribes themselves had divided it into seven parts, Joshua, through Eleazar the priest and with the elders (cf. 14:1–5; 19:51), cast the Lord's lots for them (3–10). This mode of distributing the land, he reminded them, did not apply to Judah in the south and Joseph farther north (5); to the Levites (7a; cf. 13:14, 33) or to the eastern tribes (7b). The twenty-one men were surveyors, not spies (cf. 2:1–24).

18:11–28 The Hebrew word for lot in v 6 is translated 'allotment' in 15:1; 16:1; 17:1. The first lot fell to Benjamin, Rachel's second son, after Joseph (cf. 14:1–5). Vs 11–20 list the boundaries of this area and vs 22–24 the towns included within those boundaries—twelve in the unattractive, dry eastern district (21–24) and fourteen crowded on the desirable watershed ridge north and west of Jerusalem (25–28).

19:1–9 The second lot fell to Simeon, Jacob's second son by Leah (Gn. 29:33). In mapping out the land, it was decided that Judah's portion, though designated by lot, was larger than needed, and so Simeon was given land within Judah's allocation (9). This fulfilled Jacob's curse on Simeon that he should be dispersed in Israel (Gn. 49:7). In the taking of their lands, Judah and Simeon fought alongside each other (Jdg. 1:3). Simeon's towns were concentrated in the vicinity of Beersheba and the north-eastern Negev fringe, where oases are not numerous and where deep wells are essential for continuous settlement.

19:10–16 The third lot fell to Zebulun, Leah's youngest son (Gn. 30:19–20; 49:13).

19:17–23 The fourth lot fell to Issachar, Jacob's fifth son by Leah (Gn. 30:14–17; 49:14). His towns and boundaries were not traced out beyond three certain points of reference, Jezreel (18), Mt Tabor and the Jordan River (22).

19:24–31 The fifth lot fell to Asher, Jacob's second son by Leah's maid-servant, Zilpah (Gn. 30:12–13; 49:20).

19:32–39 The sixth lot fell to Naphtali, Jacob's youngest son by Rachel's servant, Bilhah (Gn. 30:7; 49:21). His land included attractive, densely forested mountains and fairly fertile lower areas. Through this heartland of Galilee ran the major trade route between Jezreel and points north.

19:40–48 The seventh lot fell to Dan, Jacob's oldest son by Bilhah (Gn. 30:1–6; 49:16–17). Though only its towns are given, its boundaries can be inferred from those of the neighbouring territories of Judah and Ephraim. The Amorites forced this timorous and slothful tribe northwards (Jdg. 1:34). The full story of the Danites' later conquest at Leshem (Laish) is told in Jdg. 18. Dan represents the climax of failure to possess the land the Lord had given to Israel. In his case, the Amorites prevailed.

19:49–51 The conclusion consists of two parts: Joshua's inheritance (49–50) and a fulsome concluding report about the administrators of the lot, the place of casting, and the complete distribution of the land. The summary is important for the theology of this book. The unified people under God's command gave the town of Timnath Serah to Joshua, and he exemplified for them faith's obedience by requesting this as his inheritance, possessing it and rebuilding it. His example at the end the section on the distribution of the land west of Jordan complements Caleb's faith at its beginning (14:6–15). Through the casting of lots at the entrance to the Lord's tent, it was clear that this was the Lord's land, a gift to Israel, to be taken by faith. Though the tribes who failed gave excuses, they were without excuse.

20:1–9 Cities of refuge

As a practical measure to assure justice, God instructed Moses to have Israel locate six cities, three on each side of the Jordan, where anyone who killed a person accidentally and unintentionally, could flee and find asylum from the avenger of blood (Heb. gō'ēl, more precisely, 'the family protector'). After the conquest of the land east of the Jordan Moses promptly specified the three cities there (cf. Dt. 4:41–43; 19:1–13).

Innocent blood, like the curse, must find satisfaction. The Lord inquires into and vindicates innocent blood which cries out for vengeance (cf. Gn. 4:10; 9:5–6; 2 Sa. 16:7, 8). Homicidal blood pollutes the land (Nu. 35:33), defiles the hands (Is. 59:3) and calls forth judgment both by the Lord (1 Ki. 2:31, 33) and by the family protector, who is obliged to seek justice, not revenge, for his family. Innocent blood is expiated either by the death of the murderer (Nu. 35:33; Dt.

19:13) or by atonement (Dt. 21:7–9). Otherwise it brings upon the land the Lord’s wrath and disaster (2 Sa. 21; 1 Ki. 2:31–33; 2 Ki. 24:4). In that light—the place of mercy in the OT has not been examined here but see Ps. 51, in particular v 14—one sees the importance of establishing in fair courts whether the killing was deliberate or accidental. If the act was a deliberate one i.e. murder, then justice demanded the death sentence; if it was accidental or unintentional, then the criminal was allowed to live a normal life in the city of refuge.

When the alleged man-slayer arrived at a city of refuge, the elders, all Levites who were responsible for teaching the law, gave him a preliminary trial at the city gate, where court was held in ancient Israel. If he was found innocent, they gave him asylum from the family protector and sent him to stand trial before the assembly, a sort of premonarchic parliament vested with representative and judicial powers. If this assembly of chieftans or adult males there found him guilty, they handed him over to the family protector for execution. If found innocent, they sent him back to the city of refuge where he had to stay until the death of the high priest serving at that time. He stayed there to protect him and the family protector from retaliatory vengeance. Perhaps the death of the high priest, Israel’s chief representative before God, could be said to symbolize the atoning death of Jesus Christ, the church’s high priest, who made satisfaction for all sin, both intentional and unintentional.

21:1–42 Levitical towns

21:1–3 Historical background. Though the Levites had the LORD for their inheritance (13:14, 33), they needed towns to live in and pasture-lands to support them. These needs were now provided for.

Like Joshua and Caleb, and unlike the slothful, timorous seven tribes who needed Joshua’s prompting (18:2–3), the heads of the three branches of Levites (Nu. 3:17), took the initiative and approached the administrators of the sacred lot at Shiloh, claiming God’s promise through Moses to give them forty-eight towns with their adjoining pasture-lands, including the six cities of refuge (41–42; cf., Nu. 35:1–5). Tribes such as Judah that had many towns, gave up more territory than those tribes such as Naphtali that only had a few (Nu. 35:7–8).

The Israelites acceded to the Levites’ request and gave this more pilgrim-like tribe, which was scattered throughout the land, towns from their own inheritance. In giving this sort of ‘tithes’ they blessed themselves, for the separatist Levites in their midst taught them the law that sanctified, blessed, and secured them in the land (Dt. 33:8–11).

21:4–7 Overview of the Levitical towns. The distribution of the Levitical towns was done according to the three branches of Levi. In the overview the sequence of the lot is given first, then the number of towns given to each branch and the tribal areas in which the towns were located.

The narrator repeats allotted several times to emphasize that it was the Lord who assigned these towns. To judge from the first lot, the allocation came out according to importance and/or size of the branch. The lot appropriately came out first to the Kohathites, because Aaron, and so the priestly line, belonged to that branch. God gave the priests towns from Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, that is, those areas closest to Jerusalem, where the temple would be located (4). Surprisingly, and significantly, the priests were not given Jerusalem; the Lord reserved that prize for the house of David, the temple’s patrons. The rest of the Kohathites, the ‘lower clergy’, were assigned towns in the tribal areas next in proximity to Jerusalem, Ephraim, Dan, and the half-tribe of Manasseh west of the Jordan (5). The Gershonites were assigned towns in the far north, in Issachar, Asher, Naphtali and the half-tribe of Manasseh in Bashan (6), and the Merarites were given towns just south of them, in Zebulun's territory west of the Jordan, and Gad and Reuben east of the Jordan (7).

21:8–42 The distribution of the forty-eight Levitical towns (cf. 1 Ch. 6:54–81). At the time these towns were distributed some, such as Gezer (21; cf. 16:10) and Tanaach (25; cf. 17:11–12), were still in Canaanite hands. The Levites had to possess them by faith's obedience.

21:43–45 Summary: God's amazing faithfulness

These verses constitute a link with 1:6, thereby underscoring the narrator's theological scheme: the Lord kept his covenant with the patriarchs to give them the land fit for kings. They possessed it, settled in it and had rest from attack on every side (see 1:15; 11:23). Not a promise failed (see 13:1–7).

22:1–24:33 Retaining the land

The narrator now relates three episodes to show that Israel must retain the land in the same way they possessed it. After being charged by Joshua to retain covenantal loyalty, the noble eastern militia, recognizing that the Lord had given them their lands, built an altar on their way home witnessing to their unity with Israel's Lord (22:1–34). In his farewell address, Joshua stressed covenant loyalty to remain in the land (23:1–16) and solemnized Israel's covenant by renewing it at Shechem (24:1–27).

22:1–34 The eastern tribes' altar of witness

22:1–8 Joshua's farewell to the eastern tribes. 1–5 Joshua's generous farewell to the eastern tribes forms a link with the commands in ch. 1. He commended them for scrupulously keeping his charge not to abandon their brothers but to assist them until the western tribes had rest from attack by the Canaanites (2–3; cf. 1:12–18). They had displayed faith's endurance in performing this mission over a long time (cf. 11:18; Heb. 12:1) and finished their course (cf. 2 Tim. 4:6–8). To them it could have been said, 'Well done, good and faithful servant' (Mt. 25:21). Joshua's reflection on rest (4a) looks back to the prologue (1:6), and his charge to keep the law of Moses, the essence of which is summed up in one command, to love God from the heart (4–5; cf. Dt. 6:5; 10:12; 11:13; Mt. 22:37–40), and repeated the Lord's charge in the book's prologue (1:7–9). 'Love' was the basic stipulation in ancient Near Eastern treaties. No law can attain its goal so long as it is reluctantly endured. It must be founded on inward assent. Heart and soul are not meant to specify distinct spheres of life but to reinforce the complete devotion to God. Heart designates the intentionality of the whole person, and soul denotes the whole self, uniting flesh, will and vitality.

6–8 As Israel's charismatic leader, Joshua mediated God's blessing on the eastern militiamen. Sending them away to a splendid homecoming with the plunder they had won (see 11:10–15), he charged them in the best traditions of holy war to share it with those who had remained behind to protect their homes (cf. Nu. 31:27; 1 Sa. 30:16–25). All entered their rest fully rewarded (cf. Mt. 6:18; 16:27; Col. 3:24; 1 Tim. 5:18).

9–34 These faithful militiamen performed one last deed of exceptional loyalty to the Lord before rejoining their families. So that future generations in western Israel may not bar the eastern tribes from coming to worship the Lord west of the Jordan where he caused his Name to dwell, they built an imposing altar at Geliloth close to the Jordan (on either the east or west banks; the NIV is overly interpretative in v 11), as a witness that the Lord had elected them also to be his people.

Unfortunately, their creative, visionary act of faith was misinterpreted by the westerners as a rival altar to the Lord. The eastern and western tribes did not disagree on their interpretation of the law in Dt. 12:4–14—both sides assumed that law prescribed that Israel worship only at the central sanctuary. The westerners, however, thought that the easterners were intending to worship the Lord according to their own will, not his. By looking at the way in which the two groups reconciled their differences, we can draw out sound principles for resolving doctrinal differences (cf. Mt. 18:15–20).

The western tribes, as the offended party, set about mending the rift in the following way:

—they squarely addressed themselves to the problem, and did not sweep it under the rug (11–12a).

—they took apostasy so seriously that they put purity above their own lives, not buying peace at any price (12b).

—they sent their ablest leaders, the priest Phinehas who had shown himself zealous for the Lord in the episode at Baal Peor (Nu. 25:7), and ten chiefs representing all the tribes, to investigate the matter and possibly to restore the offenders, not acting rashly (13–14).

—they addressed the perceived offence objectively as a breach of faith, an act of rebellion against God, not subjectively as a body-blow to their own egos (15–16).

—they argued their case on the conviction that God punishes sin as displayed at Baal Peor (i.e. it left them with the seeds of historical guilt and the LORD's plague, not on expediency—17).

—they also argued on the conviction that the sin of some affects all, as seen at Baal Peor (17–18) and in the case of Achan (18, 20; see 7:1), and such corporate guilt was not something inconsequential to them.

—they respected their brothers' consciences and convictions (i.e. that eastern Israel was defiled because it lacked God's holy sanctuary), not ruling their weak consciences out of court (19a; cf. Rom. 14:1–23).

—they were willing to sacrifice some of their possessions to restore their brothers to a clean conscience and proper worship, not insisting on their proper interpretation of the law (19b).

—having been corrected by the perceived offenders, they acceded to their creative expression of faith, not barring new and appropriate expressions of faith consistent with God's word (30–31).

—finally, the representatives reported to the full assembly for their approval, not overreaching their authority (32).

The eastern tribes, the offenders, responded by correcting the misunderstanding by presenting the facts of the situation solemnly, piously and vigorously. They agreed with taking decisive action against apostasy, being willing to die themselves to prevent it (23), and then explained clearly and fully their motivation. They said that they needed some appropriate monument, such as this replica altar, to overcome the natural barrier of the Jordan, as a witness to future generations that their covenant children had an equal right in the worship of God (24–28; see 4:5–7). It was not intended for sacrifices and so was not an apostasy.

As a result of these sound procedures the brothers separated reconciled with one another and praising God (30–34). If the absence of apostasy is a cause to praise God for his presence with his people (31), then its presence ought to prompt believers to investigate possible cause(s) of his disfavour.

23:1–16 Joshua's farewell address

Joshua's 'last words' put him in the distinguished company of Moses (Dt. 31:1–13), Samuel (1 Sa. 12:1–24) and David (1 Ki. 2:1–9) whose last words emphasized covenant fidelity. The address was given shortly after Joshua allotted the land (see 13:1). Both Moses and Joshua, the founders of the theocracy, kept faith until their deaths and were models of the ideal leader, teaching the next generation to keep the covenant (cf. 2 Tim. 3:10–4:6; 2 Pet. 1:12–21).

23:1–4 Historical prologue. Whereas Moses validated God's covenant faithfulness by recounting his conquest of the land east of the Jordan (Dt. 31:4), Joshua verified it by rehearsing God's destruction of the Canaanites west of the Jordan (3) and his allotment of the conquered nations that remained (4). The people had seen it with their own eyes. The Hebrew word rendered 'remember' in v 4 is more precisely translated 'see', as in v 3. Today, however, the Spirit instills faith through proclaiming the words of faith (Rom. 10:6–13).

23:5–8 Covenant obligations. God had committed himself to continue to drive out the Canaanites (5) and Israel had committed itself to be strong in the faith (see 1:6, 9) and keep the law (6). They promised not to be seduced into the worship of the Canaanite deities that made few moral demands (7; cf. Dt. 5:9; 8:19) and pledged themselves to continue to cling exclusively to God (8; see 1:7–9). As in his farewell to the eastern tribes, Joshua drew his vocabulary directly from the book of Deuteronomy.

23:9–11 Covenant experience. Joshua's generation had clung to the Lord and experienced his covenant promises. As promised, none had withstood them (see 1:5). At this point we can discern the narrator's theological scheme imposed on the data (see 13:1–7). He parades Israel's successes of faith over great and powerful nations and does not mention their failures of unbelief (see 17:12–13, 14–18; 18:3, 19:47). That positive experience was sufficient motivation to love the LORD your God (see 22:5).

23:12–13 Covenant curses. Israel's old covenant contained both promises of blessings for keeping it and threats of extreme punishment for violating it (see Lv. 26; Dt. 28). In setting forth the covenant obligations Joshua underscored religious separation from the Canaanites (7), and warned against all social contact with them (12), assuming that their religious and ethical pollution was contagious and would bring God's wrath upon Israel as upon them (cf. Dt. 7:2–4). Should Israel ally itself with these nations, they will be used against Israel to inflict the covenant curses on the unfaithful (cf. 5:13–15). In the battle between the kingdom of God and the kingdoms of this world one cannot be neutral (cf. Eph. 6:10–18). Either the saint or the sinner must prevail. The one who is not for Christ is against him (Mt. 12:30). The uncommitted will be destroyed (cf. Pr. 24:30–34), but the Spirit within the saints is greater than the spiritual forces arrayed against them. Those professing a covenant relationship with God must persevere in their faith to remain in the land of blessing (13; cf. 2 Ch. 7:19–22; Heb. 6:4–7; 10:26–31), as Israel's tragic history so painfully teaches (2 Ki. 17:7–8; 24:20). For the advantages of the new covenant see 1:7–9 and for the disadvantages of co-existence with 'the nations' see 9:1–27.

23:14–16 God's word is true. The generation of Israel that conquered the land knew by experience that God kept his promises (1:1–9; 21:43–45). Joshua had validated that truth throughout his life (14). God's past faithfulness in keeping his covenant promises nerves saints to fidelity, comforts them in adversity, and restrains them in temptation (22:4–5). God is not capricious, and so his people do not have to live in anxiety. He speaks clearly both promises to inspire love and threats to provoke fear. God built Israel into a great nation in the good land to sanctify it by his law (see 8:30–35). If his people fail in their mission, he will destroy them (cf. Mk. 12:1–12).

24:1–28 Covenant renewal at Shechem

Israel's elders, who were eyewitnesses of the Lord's amazing acts in the founding of the nation, ratified and renewed their covenant with him four times. Originally at Sinai after the amazing exodus (Ex. 24); at Moab after God had miraculously preserved them in the desert and they had conquered the land east of the Jordan (Dt. 29:1); at Mt Ebal after the victories at Jericho and Ai (8:30–34); and finally here at Shechem after the astonishing triumphs over the Canaanite coalitions (11–13, 18). The first two were mediated through Moses, the last two through Joshua. Here is one of the strongest links between Moses and Joshua: both mediate the LORD's covenant. The elders on these occasions represented the whole nation.

Joshua assembled the people at Shechem before God (i.e. before the ark) to renew the covenant either at the same time as his farewell address (ch. 23) or on a separate occasion. Evidently, the portable sanctuary and ark had been moved to this sacred site (32; 8:30–35; Gn. 33:18–20).

The covenant was similar to ancient Near Eastern treaties in which a superpower (Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Hatti) entered into a relationship with a weaker nation (Ugarit and Amurru [Amorite], to name just two). This kind of treaty, known as a 'vassal treaty', typically had six parts: a preamble identifying the Great King (2a); a historical prologue reciting the King's kindnesses to the vassal (2b–13); stipulations, the basic one being to serve only the King and his kingdom (14); curses and blessings (19); witnesses (22, 27); and deposit of the treaty document (25–26). Any individual treaty could vary slightly from this outline, but the basic pattern can be discerned (cf. Ex. 19–24; 1 Sa. 12).

24:2a Preamble: Identifying the Great King. Joshua spoke as a prophet, as a messenger from the heavenly court. The Great King himself was always represented as the author of the covenant. The shift from 'I' to 'he' with reference to an author, as in v 7, is unexceptional in ancient literature.

24:2b–13 Historical prologue: The King's kindness. Typically, the Great King recounted the history of his relationship with his vassal to instil in him a sense of confidence and obligation (see 13:1–7). An enduring kingdom must be established on inward consent, not on naked force (23; 22:5).

The Lord began his unique relationship with Israel when he redeemed Abraham from his pagan family headed by Terah. Israel's blessed families circumcised their sons to show this new faith. The rest of that sacred history is well known from the Pentateuch and the book of Joshua except for the addition: the citizens [lit. 'the lords'] of Jericho fought against you (11). Seven nations are singled out to denote completeness (see 3:10). The hornet (cf. Dt. 7:20) is probably an image of panic and confusion by which God helped Israel to conquer. What is stressed is that the victory was gained not by force of arms but by God's miraculous intervention. The two Amorite kings are Sihon king of the Amorites and Og king of Bashan (12:2–5). While Israel may have used sword and bow in taking the promised land, they cannot attribute their success to them (12; cf. 23:5; Ps. 44:1–3).

24:14–18 Stipulation: Be loyal to the Lord. The ancient vassal treaties essentially stipulated exclusive loyalty to the Great King. One Hittite treaty commands: 'Do not turn your eyes to anyone else'! So also here. Fear the LORD (14a) entails waving a white flag of surrender before the Lord's law, of submitting oneself to his commandments. One cannot 'fear him' and at the same time serve other gods (cf. 2 Ki. 17:32–34); these idols must be thrown away (14b; cf. Gn. 35:2–4). Israel's jealous God tolerates no rival. Neither does Jesus (cf. Mt. 6:24; Lk. 14:26).

The reference to Egypt (14b) adds to the Pentateuch that Israel's redemption from Egypt was spiritual, not just political (see Ezk. 20:5–10; 23:1–4). God demands that the people chose where their allegiance lies, either with the old gods of Terah, the new gods of Canaan, or with himself (15; cf. 1 Ki. 18:21; Rev. 3:16), an offer of options that assumes Israel's freedom before God.

Entrance into this covenant was a matter for each individual family to decide as seen in Joshua's famous resolve (15b). Although Israel functioned as a nation, the covenant was essentially a family matter, and still is (cf. Acts. 16:31). As eyewitnesses of the acts recited in the prologue and so able to confirm its accuracy, that generation appropriately formed the foundation for the old covenant relationship with God. After this the covenant will be passed on by the mouth of one generation and received in the heart of the next (Dt. 31:11–14). So also the new covenant community is built on the apostles who were eyewitnesses of the life of Jesus Christ, especially his resurrection (Acts. 1:21–22; 1 Cor. 15:8), and after that the mouth confesses it and the heart receives it (Rom. 10:6–10).

24:19–21 Covenant curses. Joshua knew from divine revelation and from experience that the people were incapable of keeping the old covenant (19; see Dt. 31:14–32:47). He soberly warned that to break covenant with the holy and jealous God, who does not forgive your rebellion and your sins (i.e. go back on his covenant curses) would lead to the disastrous sanctions of the covenant curses (20; cf. 23:12–13). Precisely because God's character does not change, his attitude to people changes when they turn to him or against him; in this way he rewards good and punishes evil (cf. Je. 18:5–10). Their only hope is in the atoning blood of Christ (cf. Pss. 32:1–2; 130:3–4; Lk. 22:20; Rom. 3:21–26). Through the failure of the old covenant, on account of human fickleness, Israel will learn centuries later the necessity of the new covenant and a walk in the Spirit, even as Paul had to learn it (Rom. 7:7–8:4). God's ways in history are filled with mystery to his own glory (Rom. 11:33–36).

The founding generation essentially kept the covenant, though Joshua still had to exhort some families to throw away their old gods (14, 23).

24:22–27 Covenant witnesses and deposit of the law. Moses taught the people a song as a witness against them (Dt. 31:9–32:44). Joshua called upon the people to be witnesses against themselves (22). With their resolve, wise for its knowledge of God's faithfulness and yet at the same time foolish for its ignorance of human fickleness (24), Joshua renewed the covenant, drawing up its contents in line with the stipulations and recording them in a certain Book of the Law of God (25a–26), not preserved apart from this notice. The large stone he erected as a further witness against them was possibly a pillar containing the covenant (26b–27; cf. 8:31–32; Jdg. 9:6; see also 4:5–7; Gn. 28:18; 31:45–50; 1 Sa. 7:12).

24:28 Dismissal of the assembly. His work finished, the land possessed and the covenant renewed, Joshua dismissed the people for the last time.

24:29–33 Postscript: burial notices

The Deuteronomist concludes his book with the burials of Joshua (29–30), Joseph (32) and Eleazar (33) in the rest of the promised land, for they symbolize his dominant theme: God gave that faithful generation rest in the land he had promised the fathers. Joshua is finally rewarded with the honorific title he earned: servant of the LORD (cf. 1:1). Another and greater will mediate the new covenant (Is. 42:6; 49:8).

28–31 links the books of Joshua and Judges (Jdg. 2:6–9), contrasting the blessedness of the founding generation with the wretchedness of the next. V 32 links the book with the Pentateuch (cf. Gn. 50:25; Ex. 13:19).

JUDGES

Introduction

The place of Judges in the Old Testament

The book of Judges is part of the Bible's account of Israel's history from its entry into the land of Canaan (in the book of Joshua) to its eventual removal from it (at the end of 2 Kings). Much of this part of the OT is devoted to accounts of the reigns of Israel's kings, beginning with Saul, David and Solomon. But between Israel's arrival in Canaan and the setting up of the monarchy there was a period of about two hundred years (roughly 1200–1000 BC) known as the period of the judges. In this period Israel had no formal, centralized administration and depended on specially gifted men and women that God raised up to provide leadership. They were called judges because they carried out God's judgment, either by driving out enemies or by settling disputes among the Israelites themselves. The activities of these judges are described in the book of Judges (hence its name) and in the opening chapters of 1 Samuel.

In the traditional arrangement of the OT (still reflected in Jewish Bibles today) the books Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings occur in a section called 'The Prophets' along with Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the twelve so-called 'minor prophets' (Hosea–Malachi). As a sub-group, Joshua–2 Kings are known as the 'Former Prophets'. They are so called because they are traditionally thought to have been written by prophets, but also (and more importantly) because they are prophetic in their style and interests. They clearly have a very strong historical dimension to them, but like the other prophetic books they are not concerned simply with history for history's sake. They are not mere chronicles of events. Rather, they are interested in how God was at work in the events they describe. In particular, they are concerned with God's special relationship with Israel and how this was expressed in both judgment and salvation in Israel's history. This special relationship was based on the covenant which God made with the Israelites at Mt Sinai after he brought them out of slavery in Egypt (Ex. 19–20), and this in turn was based on the promises which God had made to Abraham centuries before (Gn. 12:1–2). As we shall see, the book of Judges is clearly prophetic in this sense. It is a theological account of Israel's history in the judges period. And like the other prophetic books, it contains a message which is still relevant for the present and the future.

Israel in the period of the judges

Little is known about Israel's way of life in the judges' period apart from what can be gleaned from the OT. The chief source of information is the book of Judges itself, but the books of Ruth and 1 Samuel also shed valuable light on the period.

Israel's territory at that time was divided into tribal areas (see Jos. 13–21 and map on Israel's tribal territories in Deuteronomy). Of the twelve tribes, nine-and-a-half occupied the region between the Jordan River (including the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea) and the Mediterranean coast. The other two-and-a-half occupied the plateau region east of the Jordan. Conquests by neighbouring peoples such as the Midianites, Moabites and Ammonites (to the east) and the Philistines and other so-called Sea Peoples (to the west) usually involved only part of Israel's territory, which meant that only one or two tribes were directly affected.

The essential bond between the tribes was their common history and their allegiance to the LORD (Yahweh). He himself was their supreme Ruler or Judge (11:27) and his law was their constitution. It was this covenant relationship with the LORD which bound them together and gave them their identity as a distinct people. At least once a year a religious festival was held at which the people were reminded of their identity and of the obligations which this entailed. These gatherings were probably held at Shiloh, which was centrally located and was the place where the Tent of Meeting had originally been set up after Israel's arrival in Canaan (Jos 18:1; Jdg. 21:19; 1 Sa. 1:3). This probably remained the place of the central sanctuary throughout the judges period, although the ark of the covenant was sometimes moved to other places, especially in times of crisis (20:27). How well attended these festivals were and exactly what happened at them is not definitely known but almost certainly thanks were given for blessings received (e.g. good harvests), prayer was made, sacrifices were offered, the law given at Mt Sinai was read, and a fresh oath of loyalty was taken (to the LORD and to one another). Probably it was the judge in office at the time who read the law, assisted by the priests (2:17; 18:27). What all this amounted to was a renewal of the covenant and a fresh commitment to live by it (cf. Jos. 24).

For the most part, day-to-day administration of justice and oversight of community affairs was provided locally by the elders of the various clans and tribes (11:4–11; Ru. 4:1–12). But matters which could not be settled locally were brought for settlement to the judge who was in office at the time, either at some central location (4:4–5) or at certain designated towns which the judge visited regularly (1 Sa. 7:15–17). From time to time, as occasion warranted, ad hoc assemblies of representatives from the various tribes were convened to deal with matters of common concern, such as serious misconduct by one of the tribes or an enemy attack on one or more of them. On such occasions decisive, concerted action was required to preserve the integrity of Israel. There was no standing army, so it was necessary to raise a fresh force of volunteer fighters each time a national emergency arose, and the personal charisma of an individual often played a crucial role in getting this done quickly. It seems that at least some of the judges rose to office precisely because of their ability to provide inspiring leadership on such occasions (11:1–10). Others seem to have been appointed in more peaceful circumstances, though exactly how this was done is not known.

In practice, however, the 'system' (if that is the correct term for it) rarely if ever worked as smoothly as this. There was in fact little effective unity among the Israelite tribes in the period of the judges. For a start, they were separated from each other by settlements of unconquered Canaanites (1:19, 27–36; 4:2–3). Unlike the Israelites, these people had farmed the land for generations and attributed their success at raising crops to their worship of various male and female nature gods, the Baals and the Ashtoreths. They believed that these controlled the soil and weather and hence the fertility of field and flock. The Israelites were very attracted to these gods and increasingly mixed the worship of them with their worship of their own God, Yahweh. This inevitably led to a weakening of their loyalty to God and to one another, and resulted in a spiritual and moral decline that was so serious that it threatened to destroy Israel from within. The tribes were slow to help one another in times of crisis (5:16–17; 12:1–7) and even fell to fighting among themselves (8:1–3; 12:1–6; 20:1–48). Most people were concerned only for their own interests and took advantage of the absence of central government to do as they pleased (17:6; 21:25). This inner decay threatened to destroy the very fabric of Israel and, in fact, constituted a far more serious threat to its survival in the judges period than any external attack.

As always in such circumstances, however, there were faithful Israelites who continued quietly to pursue lives of genuine piety. The book of Judges focuses mainly on the frequent crises that Israel faced and thus gives a rather turbulent impression of the period. But it also clearly indicates that there were long periods of peace and relative prosperity in which life at the local level could settle down into a more even tenor (3:11, 30; 8:28; 10:3–5; 12:8–10). In this respect, Judges is nicely complemented by the book of Ruth with its gentle, moving story of one family's affairs in Bethlehem. Here farmers struggled against the vagaries of the weather, people met and fell in love, and the elders sought to guide the affairs of the community along the tried and proven paths of covenant law and local custom. Both books testify to the fact that, whether in the turbulence of national crisis or the more even tenor of village life, God was deeply involved and sovereignly at work in the lives of his people, preserving and disciplining them, and overruling all things for their good.

The origin and date of the book of Judges

Precisely how the book of Judges came into existence and when it was completed in the form we now have it continues to be a matter of debate among scholars. The traditional Jewish view is that it was written by the prophet Samuel, and this may contain at least an element of truth. But there are indications that the process of the book's composition was far more complex and protracted than this traditional view suggests.

The bulk of the book appears to be based on source material which was either contemporary with, or very close to, the events themselves. The notices concerning the so-called 'minor judges' in 10:1–5 and 12:8–15 (framing the Jephthah story) are probably drawn from a documentary source of this kind. And the accounts of the exploits of the deliverer-judges such as Ehud, Barak, Gideon and Samson, are most probably derived from an early collection of such hero-stories in either oral or written form. The fact that Jephthah seems to have featured in both may have given the original author of the book his cue to combine these two sources. Much less seems to have been known about the exploits of Othniel, the first deliverer, and so the account of his career is expressed in fairly general, stereotyped terms by the author himself (3:7–11). The poetic Song of Deborah and Barak in ch. 5 is composed in very early Hebrew and is acknowledged by most scholars to have originated very close in time to the events it describes. Other early source material seems to be reflected in the opening chapter of the book (especially vs 4–7, 11–15, 22–26) and in the two vividly told stories of chs. 17–21.

The hand of an editor who has worked with the source materials is clearly discernible in the overview which is provided in 2:6–19, and in the repetitive introductions and conclusions to the major episodes in chs. 3–16. These provide a kind of editorial framework which unifies the central part of Judges. Another clear instance of editorial work is in the refrain of 17:6; 18:1; 19:1 and 21:25, which binds together the two major narratives that conclude the book.

The evidence for early source material is clear, as is the evidence for editorial shaping. But whether the latter was done by a single author or by two or more authors in succession is difficult, if not impossible, to say.

It is also difficult to know for certain when the final shaping of the book took place. As is explained more fully in the commentary itself, the detailed description of the location of Shiloh in 21:19 suggests a time of writing when the destruction of Shiloh (an event of uncertain date) was remembered, but long since past (cf. Je. 7:14), and the expression ‘the captivity of the land’ in 18:30 probably refers to the final devastation of the northern kingdom of Israel by Assyria in the eighth century BC. More significantly, the overview of the judges’ period in 2:11–19, the speeches in 2:1–5, 6:7–10 and 10:11–15, and the repetitive introductions and conclusions to the major episodes in chs. 3–16 are all strongly reminiscent of both the style and theological concerns of the book of Deuteronomy. This suggests that the author who added this material lived after the reforms carried out by king Josiah in the seventh century BC (1 Ki. 22). The nature of these reforms leaves little doubt that the ‘Book of the Law’ that was discovered in the temple at that time was some form of the book of Deuteronomy. Certainly the influence of Deuteronomy is clear in the next couple of centuries in the preaching of Jeremiah and in the books of 1 and 2 Kings, and it seems to be present in Judges also.

Most scholars believe that Judges is part of what was originally one long piece of historical writing spanning what is now the books of Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings. It is thought that this history of Israel from the conquest of Canaan until the Babylonian exile was written after the fall of Jerusalem in 587 BC (2 Ki. 25:1–2) to explain why this disaster had happened. It did so by showing how Israel had begun to slide into apostasy soon after its entry into Canaan, and how this had continued in subsequent centuries until God’s judgment had finally fallen on the nation. The disaster of 587 BC was thus seen to be the fulfilment of the covenant curses of Dt. 28. The style and theology of the whole work from beginning to end was strongly influenced by the book of Deuteronomy, and for that reason it is commonly referred to as the ‘Deuteronomistic history’. One of the strongest pieces of evidence for this theory is that the statement in 1 Ki. 6:1 that Solomon began to build the temple 480 (40 × 12) years after the exodus from Egypt appears to be part of a chronological scheme which spans Deuteronomy to 2 Kings and is reflected in the book of Judges itself. This can be seen in the ‘round’ numbers (40 years or 80 years) used for the periods of peace (3:11; 3:30; 5:31; 8:28). Contrast the more unpredictable figures which appear in the material drawn directly from early sources (e.g. 3:8, 14; 4:3; 10:2–3).

Scholars are divided over whether the Deuteronomistic history was first conceived as a whole and later divided up into separate books, or whether the books first existed independently and were given their final shape by someone who had the larger picture in view. Probably a combination of these two processes was involved. The books of Kings were probably written directly by the author himself from various sources, while in the earlier part of the history he worked with books that already existed in some form. In any case, the result we now have is a series of closely related books rather than a single composition in the strict sense. But given its close relationship to the other books in the series, it is probable that Judges was given its final shape at the same time as they were, namely, in the sixth century BC during the Babylonian exile. Samuel may well have had a hand in the early stages of its formation, but the identity of the final author or editor is unknown.

Structure and themes

Whatever its history, the book of Judges as we now have it is a well-rounded literary unit with a very definite structure and clearly developed themes.

The main body of the book, which deals with the careers of the various judges themselves, extends from 3:7 to 16:31. This is preceded by an introduction in two parts (1:1–2:5 and 2:6–3:6) and followed by an epilogue, also in two parts (chs. 17–18 and 19–21). The question that is asked at the beginning of the book (1:1–2) is asked again in very different circumstances at the end (20:18). Thus, as we come to the end of the book we are invited to reflect on the point from which we set out and on all that has happened in between.

The first part of the introduction (1:1–2:5) is about the progressive deterioration in Israel's relationship with the Canaanites that followed the death of Joshua (1:1). The efforts of the various tribes to possess and occupy the lands that had been allocated to them (Jos. 13–19) ran into increasing difficulties as the Canaanites, particularly on the coastal plain and in key fortified cities in the north, put up very determined resistance (see especially vs 19, 27–28). This led to a tense stalemate situation in which Israelites and Canaanites lived side-by-side. The Israelites held the upper hand, but were still excluded from significant parts of the land. The tribe of Dan, in particular, was confined to the hills and was unable to get a secure foothold in its allotted territory near the coast (1:34). It was a situation that fell far short of the expectations with which Israel had set out, expectations grounded in the promises God had made to their ancestors (Jos. 23:1–5; cf. Gn. 12:1–3; 15:12–21; 28:13–15). This section of the introduction ends with the Israelites weeping before the Lord at Bokim (Bethel) and being told what has gone wrong (2:1–5). The reason for their failure has not been the iron chariots or strong fortifications of the Canaanites, but their own unfaithfulness. In the territory which they had succeeded in taking they had begun to compromise by allowing the pagan altars of the Canaanites to remain standing, and because of this the Lord had withdrawn his help from them. As well as looking back, this key speech by the 'angel of the LORD' also looks forward with the prediction that the Canaanites and their gods will continue to be snares and stumbling-blocks to the Israelites.

The second part of the introduction (2:6–3:6) then returns to the beginning (notice how Joshua reappears in 2:6) and makes this underlying spiritual problem the main focus of attention. In a few deft strokes Israel's initial decline into apostasy is sketched in (2:6–10), and then the whole pattern of the ensuing judges' period is laid out (2:11–19). It is presented as a period of persistent apostasy, in which the Lord alternately judges the Israelites by handing them over to foreign oppressors, and then (when they are in great distress) has pity on them and raises up a judge to deliver them. At these times the Israelites temporarily give up their apostasy, but quickly return to it as soon as the judge dies (19a). In short, despite the Lord's many attempts to retrieve them from their evil ways, the Israelites persist in them (19b). This leads to another crucial speech in 2:20–22, in which the Lord announces what he intends to do as his final response to all that has taken place. The nations which were originally left (at the time Joshua died) to test Israel's faithfulness are now to be left permanently as a punishment for her unfaithfulness (see the commentary on these verses). This is the climax of this second part, and of the introduction as a whole. The verses that remain (2:23–3:6) simply summarize what has already been said.

So the introduction, as well as diagnosing what went wrong and laying out for us what is to follow, makes it very clear what the central issue of the book is, namely, Israel's persistent apostasy in the judges' period and the Lord's response to it. The book answers the question, 'Why didn't Israel ever fully possess the land that God promised to their ancestors?' And the answer is given, 'Because of the apostasy that followed the death of Joshua'. Judges explains the Lord's action as fully justified in view of Israel's persistent unfaithfulness. The later books of the Deuteronomic history go on to explain and justify his more drastic act of evicting Israel from the land altogether (see above).

The central section of the book (3:7–16:31) fills out the outline already given in the introduction (2:11–19) and develops a number of sub-themes in the process. It records the careers of twelve judges in all: Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Barak, Gideon, Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon and Samson. Deborah and Jael both play very significant roles in the Barak episode, and Deborah is even said to have 'led' (lit. 'judged') Israel (4:4–5), but in terms of the overall design of the book, chs. 4–5 must be seen as essentially an account of Barak's career. And although the activities of Gideon's son, Abimelech are recounted in some detail, he is not a judge at all in terms of the way that office has been described in the introduction.

Just as the first part of the introduction began with Judah and ended with Dan (1:1–34), so this central section begins with Othniel from Judah (3:7–11) and ends with Samson the Danite (chs. 13–16). Othniel's career exemplifies what a judge was meant to be and do. The following judges represent a series of variations on this basic pattern, culminating with Samson, whose behaviour is so bizarre that he is barely recognizable as a judge at all. The pattern of this part of the book has frequently been described in terms of a repeating cycle of apostasy, oppression, calling on the Lord, deliverance, peace and renewed apostasy. There is certainly much repetition, but there is also progressive change, so that the result is better described in terms of a downward spiral than a simple repeating pattern.

Disunity among the Israelites first appears in the Barak episode (5:16–17, 23), and grows worse under later judges. After the forty years which followed Gideon's victory (8:28), the land is never again said to enjoy peace, and by the time of the Samson episode is reached the Israelites no longer even cry out to the Lord to save them. And as these chapters run their course the judges themselves gradually become more and more implicated in the wrongdoing of the nation as a whole. The climax is reached in Samson, whose personal waywardness and reluctance to embrace his calling perfectly epitomize the waywardness and struggle of the nation as a whole. As Israel had been set apart from other nations by God's covenant with them, so Samson is set apart from other men by his calling as a Nazirite. As Israel had gone after foreign gods, Samson goes after foreign women. Israel had wanted to be as other nations; Samson wants to be as other men. And as Israel had repeatedly called on the Lord in its distress, so too does Samson. In short, the sub-themes that run through the whole central section of the book (Israel's struggle against her destiny and the Lord's perseverance with her in judgment and grace) are finally brought to a sharp focus in the story of Samson. His story is the story of Israel as a whole in the judges' period.

The two stories which form the epilogue (chs. 17–21) are located very generally in the judges' period but do not follow chronologically from what has gone before. In them the focus shifts from the sin of Israel as a whole to the sins of the individuals and communities which comprise it: 'everyone did as he saw fit' (17:6). The first story (Micah and his idols; chs. 17–18) is about the religious chaos of the period, and the second (the Levite and his concubine; chs. 19–21) is about the accompanying moral chaos. Together they show that Israel was even more endangered by its own internal decay, morally and spiritually, than by any external attack. The second story in particular shows how the very institutions which should have provided stability (the levitical priesthood, hospitality and family life, eldership and the assembly of tribal leaders) were all rendered ineffective, and even positively harmful, because of the moral bankruptcy of individuals. The epilogue leaves us in no doubt that it was certainly not the quality of its leadership or its institutions that held Israel together. Israel's survival was a miracle of God's grace.

The refrain which runs through the epilogue ('In those days there was no king in Israel ... ', 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25) brings down the curtain on one period and anticipates another. Kingship, like judgeship, will have its place in Israel's ongoing history and prove useful in its time, but it too will fail through human sinfulness. As the Deuteronomic history as a whole shows, no institution, however valid, holds the key to Israel's future. It is only the Lord's ongoing commitment to his people that does this, 'For he wounds, but he also binds up; he injures, but his hands also heal.' (Jb. 5:18).

Relevance for Christians today

The NT contains very few clear references to the book of Judges. There is a passing reference to the judges period as a whole in Acts 13:20, and Gideon, Barak, Samson and Jephthah are named as heroes of faith in Heb. 11:32. Apart from this, there are only, at best, veiled allusions. For example, Mary was hailed in terms that suggest that her blessedness was comparable to that of Jael (Lk. 1:42; cf. Jdg. 5:24), and there appear to be allusions to Samson (Jdg. 13:4–5) in the birth announcements of both John the Baptist (Lk. 1:15) and Jesus (Mt. 2:23).

These few references and allusions point, however, to a far deeper continuity between Judges and the NT than may at first appear. For the coming of Christ, preceded by John the Baptist, was the culmination of all God's acts of judgment and grace in the OT period, including the period of the judges (Lk. 1:54–55, 68–79). And if the Israelites of the judges period failed through unbelief to enter into their full inheritance, that did not mean that God's ultimate purposes for this people had been frustrated. God remained committed to them, and through Christ would finally atone for their sins and so bring to full realization all that he had promised, including the inclusion in his kingdom of people of all nations. As the apostle Paul put it, 'For no matter how many promises God has made, they are "Yes" in Christ' (2 Cor. 1:20). This means that the Israelites of the judges period are our spiritual ancestors, and that the God who showed himself to be so committed to them is our God too. He is none other than the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

It may surprise us to find men with such obvious faults as Gideon, Barak, Jephthah and Samson held up as heroes of faith. But perhaps, on reflection, it is not so surprising after all, for the one thing they all knew was that, in the end, it was only the Lord himself that could save Israel (11:27). To know that and to act upon it, as these men did, is what faith is all about. In this respect, the stories of the judges have something to teach us all, and especially those who are called to the leadership of God's people. But more importantly, in spite of their many faults, all the judges were forerunners of the greatest Saviour of all. And perhaps it is as much by their imperfections, as by their divinely empowered exploits, that they point beyond themselves to him. The book of Judges is about faithless people and a faithful God. The story of the Israelites in the period of the judges is our story too.

Commentary

1:1–2:5 After Joshua: military decline

1:1–2 The Israelites inquire of the Lord

For the death of Joshua see Jos. 24:28–29. Before his death Joshua had spoken of Canaanites still living in the land that had been allocated to the various tribes, but he assured the Israelites that with the Lord's help they would be able to drive these people out (Jos. 23:1–5). By inquiring of the Lord the people acknowledged that he was their true leader. They probably made their inquiry through a priest (see 20:18, 27–28) at Gilgal near Jericho, since this was the point from which they moved out (1:16; 2:1; cf. Jos.5:10). Judah, named to go first in the oracle of v 2, was the most numerous and powerful tribe and the tribe from which Jesus the Messiah would eventually come (Gn. 49:10).

1:3–21 The successes and failures of the southern tribes

Notice how the mention of the Judah–Simeon alliance in vs 3 and 17 frames the account of Judah’s campaign in vs 4–16. An appendix which summarizes Judah’s achievements follows in vs. 18–21. The alliance was natural because Simeon was a smaller tribe whose allotted territory lay within Judah’s (Jos. 19:1).

Judah’s progress is first traced up from the Jordan Valley to Jerusalem via Bezek (4–8; the NIV’s attacked in v 4 is lit. ‘went up’) and then down to the coastal plain southwest of Jerusalem via Hebron, Debir and Zephath-Hormah (9–16). The mutilation of Adoni-Bezek (which means ‘Lord of Bezek’) was just retribution for his own brutal treatment of others (5–7). Jerusalem (7–8) is the pre-Israelite city on the border of the territories of Judah and Benjamin (Jos. 15:8; 18:28). It was dealt a devastating blow by Judah, but its inhabitants, the Jebusites, retained (or perhaps later regained) a foothold there (21). Hebron, or Kiriath Arba (‘town of Arba’), was a stronghold of the Anakim, the descendants of Arba, who were proverbial for their stature and prowess (Nu. 13:32–33). Othniel, who distinguished himself in battle at Debir (11–15) reappears in 3:9 as the first judge, and his shrewd and resourceful bride Acsah is the first of a number of such women who feature in the book (Jael in ch. 4; the ‘certain woman’ of Thebez in ch. 9; and Delilah in ch. 16). The faithful Caleb, old but still vigorous, was a notable representative of the elders who outlived Joshua (2:7; cf. Nu.13:30). V 16 records the fulfilment of a promise made by Moses to Hobab, the leader of the Kenites, a Midianite clan (Nu. 10:29–32), while v 17 shows Judah repaying Simeon’s help by participating in the successful campaign against Zephath, a town in Simeon’s territory.

So far so good, but the appendix in vs 18–21 contains the first disturbing indications that all was not well. Judah had initial successes against the coastal cities of Gaza, Ashkelon and Ekron (18) but was unable to drive out the people of this area because they had iron chariots (19). This probably indicates that the Philistines, with their superior technology, had already arrived in the area. But why iron chariots should be so decisive is puzzling in view of the fact that the LORD was with the men of Judah (19; cf. v 2). Equally puzzling is the failure of the Benjamites to drive out the Jebusites from Jerusalem (21). Caleb fully capitalized on the victory at Hebron (20; cf. v 10), but the Benjamites did not do likewise after the victory at Jerusalem (8). The real cause of these failures is not revealed until 2:1–5.

Note. 15 The Negev is the dry, southern part of Palestine, southwest of the southern tip of the Dead Sea. Access to water was critical if the land Caleb gave Acsah was to be productive.

1:22–36 The successes and failures of the northern tribes

The tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh were descendants of two sons of Joseph of the same names (Gn. 41:51). They were the two most numerous and powerful Israelite tribes of central and northern Palestine. So the house of Joseph here refers to these two tribes and the other northern tribes associated with them. The two occurrences of this expression (22, 35) frame vs 22–35, which is an account of the successes and failures of these northern tribes. V 36 stands outside this frame as an appendix. This means that vs 22–36 have the same general pattern as vs 3–21. The house of Joseph ‘attacked’ in v 22 as Judah had in v 4 (the verb is lit. ‘went up’ in both cases), and the Lord was with them (22) as he had also been with Judah (19). Like Judah, the house of Joseph had initial success (22–26), but this was followed by a string of failures (27–35) much more widespread and serious than in the south. The seeds of this failure can already be seen in vs 22–26. Bethel was taken only by entering into an agreement with a Canaanite who later rebuilt the city on a new site (23, 24, 26). In the following verses a deteriorating situation is traced, with Canaanites living among Israelites (27–30), Israelites living among Canaanites (31–33) and finally Amorites confining Israelites to the hills (34). The end result is a stand-off situation, with the northern tribes collectively strong enough to dominate but not drive out the remaining Canaanites (28, 30, 33, 35). The final note (36) confirms that what was achieved was partition of the land between Israelites and non-Israelites rather than full occupation. Again, the reasons for this failure, only hinted at here, are given explicitly in 2:1–5.

Notes. 22 Bethel (‘house of God’) was so named by Jacob (Gn. 28:17–19; see also on 4:5). 26 The Hittite Empire included present-day Turkey and northern Palestine, as far south as the Orontes River. There were also some Hittites in the vicinity of Hebron (Gn. 23:1–16), but the context here suggests a more remote location. 27 Beth Shan, Taanach and Megiddo were a line of Canaanite strongholds extending westwards from Mt Carmel in northern Palestine along the fertile Jezreel Valley. 29 Gezer was a strategic town on the road from the coastal plain to Jerusalem. 30 The location of Kitron and Nahalol is unknown. 31 Acco ... Rehob were cities on the coast north from Mt Carmel in what is now Lebanon. 33 Beth Shemesh (‘house of the sun’) and Beth Anath (‘house of Anath’, a fertility goddess) were towns near the Jordan, just south of the Sea of Galilee. 34 The Amorites (‘westerners’) were a semitic people from the Arabian desert who had settled in Canaan before the Israelites. 35 Mount Heres, Aijalon and Shaalbim were towns in the hills west of Jerusalem. 36 Scorpion Pass (‘Akrabbim’) and Sela (‘Rock’) were near the southern tip of the Dead Sea (cf. the Amorite ‘Hazezon Tamar’ of Gn. 14:7).

2:1–5 Israel accused of disobedience

This unit is the climax of 1:1–2:5. With the ‘going up’ of the angel of the LORD in v 1, the time for review and assessment had come (see 1:1, and the comments on 1:2 and 1:22). Now at last the real cause of the failure described in the previous chapter is revealed: unfaithfulness to the Lord (2; cf. Ex. 34:12–16). If they had been faithful the Lord would have given the Israelites complete victory. As it is, what should have been a victory celebration turned out to be a time of bitter weeping (4).

Notes. 1 The angel of the LORD is ‘the LORD’ himself in the form of an angel (cf. 6:11–24; 13:3–21). Gilgal (‘circle’) was near Jericho (see 1:1, 16 and comments). Bokim (‘weepers’) was probably Bethel, but called Bokim here for the reason given in vs 4–5. 3 Now therefore I tell you is more correctly, ‘And I also said ...’. The reference is to a threat previously made (see Nu. 33:35; Jos. 23:13). It is not until 2:20ff. that the Lord announces his intention to carry out this threat.

2:6–3:6 After Joshua: spiritual decline

2:6–10 The slide into apostasy

The speech by the angel of the Lord in vs 1–5 introduced the theme of Israel’s unfaithfulness. The author now begins a second review of the period following Joshua’s death from this new perspective. It took only one generation for the memory of the great things God had done for Israel under Joshua to grow dim, and with it true knowledge of God himself.

Note. The background to vs 6–10 as a whole is Jos. 24 (especially vs 28–31). 9 Tinnath Heres (see the NIV mg.) was in the hills northwest of Jerusalem.

2:11–19 Overview of the judges period

These verses outline a pattern that will be repeated many times in the following chapters. Israel provokes the Lord by worshipping other gods (11–13). The Lord punishes them by handing them over to their enemies (14–15). When they are in dire straits the Lord raises up judges who save them (16–18). When the judge dies the people return to their old ways (19). The Lord is both angry and compassionate (12, 18b). The Israelites are stubbornly rebellious (17, 19b).

Note. The Baals and Ashtoreths (11, 13) were nature gods (male and female, respectively) worshipped by the Canaanites. They were believed to control the weather and to have power to increase the fertility of soil, animals and humans. The judges (16, 18, 19) had a military role (as deliverers), a religious role (as preachers of God’s law; see v 17) and a legal role in settling disputes in times of peace (see 4:4–5).

2:20–3:6 The Lord’s ultimate response

With this passage we are taken to the end of the judges’ period and told what the Lord finally did as a result of Israel’s persistent apostasy. The Canaanites who had originally been left at the time of Joshua’s death to test Israel’s faithfulness were finally left permanently as a punishment for her unfaithfulness (2:20–3:4). That is, Israel failed the test, and the Lord put into effect the threat he had made at Bokim (2:3). The last two verses (3:4–5) summarize the whole introduction to the book: Israel lived among the Canaanites (cf. 1:1–2:5) and served their gods (cf. 2:6–3:6). Intermarriage with Canaanites, mentioned here for the first time, was something that had been explicitly forbidden by the Lord (Dt. 7:3).

Notes. 22 The Hebrew text does not have the words I will use them. Both this verse and the next refer to the original leaving of some Canaanites as a test, at the time of Joshua’s death (cf. Jos. 23:4–5). 3:1 The wars in Canaan are the wars of conquest described in the book of Joshua. 3:2 The Lord intended to test the next generation by giving them too the experience of warfare against the Canaanites. 3:3 The Philistines migrated from Asia Minor (modern Turkey) via Crete, arriving shortly after the Israelites (see 1:18; cf. Amos 9:7). They established a five-city state centred on what is now the Gaza strip in southwest Palestine, but extending beyond it. The Sidonians are the Phoenicians, whose chief city at this time was Sidon. The identity of the Hivites is unknown. Mount Baal Hermon to Lebo Hamath refers to the mountainous region east of the main Lebanon range (towards Damascus). 3:5 This is the traditional list of the nations that lived in Canaan before Israelite occupation (cf. Ex. 3:8, 17; 23:23).

3:7–16:31 The careers of the judges

3:7–11 Othniel

After the overview of 2:6–3:6, the author now begins to give us, in order, the careers of the various judges that the Lord raised up (see 2:16). The first, Othniel, is a model figure in a number of ways. He belonged to a clan which had close connections with Judah, the leading tribe (1:13). Moreover, he had already distinguished himself in battle and won Caleb’s daughter as his wife (1:11–15)—no intermarriage with Canaanites for him! (See 3:6.)

Othniel’s career followed the pattern outlined in 2:11–19 but with two details added: Israel’s cry (9) and his endowment with the Spirit (10). Othniel was designated as God’s chosen deliverer by a special gift of power given to him by God through his Spirit. In this sense he was a ‘charismatic’ leader. Othniel, the first judge, exemplifies the essential features of judgeship. The careers of the following judges represent variations on this basic pattern.

Notes. 7 Asherahs were the equivalent of ‘Ashtoreths’ (see 2:13 and comment). 8 Cushan-Rishathaim (‘Cushan of double wickedness’) was probably a name coined for the tyrant by his victims. His real identity is unknown. Aram Naharaim (‘Aram of the two rivers’) was probably in northern Mesopotamia (modern Iraq–Syria). See the NIV mg. and cf. the RSV. 9 Apart from being Caleb’s son-in-law, Othniel was also either his younger brother or his nephew, probably the latter (the Hebrew, like the English, is ambiguous), cf. 1 Ch. 4:13–15. 10 Became Israel’s judge (lit. ‘judged Israel’; cf. the RSV) should be taken here to involve an element of proclamation (see 2:17 and comment). Cf. Samuel in the context of the Philistine crisis (1 Sa. 7:6; RSV).

3:12–30 Ehud

Vs 12–14 provide the background for the account of the career of Ehud, the second judge, in vs 15–30. While the basic pattern is the same as for Othniel, Ehud himself is a strikingly different figure. He was from the tribe of Benjamin (15), which received only negative comment in ch. 1 (see 1:21). Further, he was left-handed (15) and used cunning deception to assassinate the tyrant (16–25) before engaging in open battle (26–29). But his actions were, nevertheless, providentially directed by the Lord, who used this most unlikely hero to bring deliverance to his undeserving, but desperate people (15, 28, 30).

Notes. 12 Moab was a small state to the east of the Dead Sea (within what is now the state of Jordan). The Moabites (and the Ammonites; v 13) were descendants of Lot, Abraham’s nephew (Gn. 12:5; 19:36). 13 Ammon was directly north-east of Moab. The Amalekites were a nomadic tribe from southern Canaan and the northern parts of the Arabian peninsula. They were the first enemies the Israelites encountered after leaving Egypt (Ex. 17:8–16). The City of Palms is Jericho (see the NIV mg. and cf. 1:16). The city itself was in ruins (Jos. 6:24; 1 Ki. 16:34). Eglon’s ‘summer palace’ (probably not nearly as grand as this translation suggests; see the NIV mg.) was most likely at the nearby oasis of ‘Ain es-Sultan’, which Moab had temporarily occupied. 15 Being left-handed gave Ehud an advantage (surprise) which he exploited to the full (21; cf. 20:17). 19 Idols (lit. ‘sculptured stones’) were probably not the stones set up by Joshua (Jos. 4:20) but the remains of an ancient pagan stone circle. On Gilgal (‘circle’) see 1:1, 2:1 and comments. This was the first place the Israelites had camped after crossing the Jordan (Jos. 4:19). 26 The location of Seriah is unknown.

3:31 Shamgar

Shamgar is an even stranger hero than Ehud. He was possibly not even an Israelite, since ‘Shamgar’ is not typically Hebrew and ‘Anath’ is a clearly pagan name (see note below). Yet he too 'saved Israel' by achieving a notable victory over the Philistines, who were the enemies of both the Israelites and the Canaanites (see on 3:3). In this, and in his very unconventional way of fighting ('with an ox-goad'!) Shamgar anticipated the later exploits of Samson (15:15–16). 'The days of Shamgar son of Anath' are recalled in 5:6 as difficult times, when Israel was hard-pressed by its enemies. In these circumstances the Lord, ever faithful, used extra-ordinary means to save them, if only temporarily. Since there is no mention of peace being restored (cf. 3:30 and 5:31), Shamgar's victory was probably an isolated one, but significant nonetheless.

Notes. Anath was the Canaanite goddess of war, the sister and wife of Baal. Son of Anath here probably means 'a man like Anath', i.e. 'a warrior'. The number six hundred was commonly used to refer to an organized military force under a commander (cf. 18:11).

4:1–5:31 Barak (plus Deborah and Jael)

4:1–3 Oppression. V 1 makes it clear that apostasy had set in from the time of Ehud's death. Shamgar's victory had brought temporary relief but no change in Israel's spiritual condition. Hence the Lord's renewed judgment, this time in the form of Jabin and Sisera.

Notes. 2 Hazor was eighteen miles north-west of the Sea of Galilee, close to what is now the Israel-Lebanon border. It was at one time the most powerful Canaanite city in northern Palestine. Jabin was probably a royal title for the kings of Hazor (cf. 'Pharaoh' for the kings of Egypt). Joshua had defeated another 'Jabin' at Hazor almost 200 years earlier (Jos. 11:1–11). V 23–24 probably refer to the final destruction of the resurgent Hazor in the thirteenth century, as attested by archaeology. The name Sisera suggests he was the leader of a group of the so-called Sea People who, like the Philistines, had migrated to Palestine by ship from the eastern Aegean. Both the name of Harosheth Haggoyim ('Harosheth of the [foreign] nations') and its location (close to the Mediterranean coast near Mt Carmel in northwest Palestine) suggest that it was originally a settlement of these Sea People. In them Jabin, whose own power was on the wane, found a promising ally against the Israelites.

4:4–24 Deliverance. As the places and tribes which are mentioned indicate, the action this time took place in central and northern Palestine, rather than in the south, and especially in the vicinity of the Kishon River (7), which flows westward through the fertile Jezreel Valley to the coast near Mt Carmel, or present day Haifa. Unlike previous episodes, the work of delivering Israel this time was shared between three principal characters: Deborah the prophetess and judge (in the administrative sense; 4–5), Barak, who is called by Deborah to lead Israel in battle (6–16) and Jael, who finally despatches Sisera single-handed in her tent (17–22). It is, however, the Lord's own intervention (15) which is the decisive turning point. Particular interest lies in the way the Lord, in rescuing Israel yet again, took the honour of victory away from a man who showed himself unworthy of it (9) and gave it to a woman (not Deborah, as we expect, but Jael). Women are dominant in this episode. Jael, with her non-Israelite background (11, 17) and unconventional methods (21; cf. Ehud and Shamgar) further illustrates the Lord's sovereign freedom in using whom he will to accomplish his purposes.

Notes. 4 Leading is lit. 'judging'. (See the NIV mg. and cf. Ex. 18:13–16.) 5 Ramah and Bethel were five and twelve miles, respectively, north of Jerusalem (cf. 1:22 and note). The hill country of Ephraim is a reference to central Palestine (cf. 3:27). For 'Ephraim' see on 1:22. 6 Kedesh was just southwest of the Sea of Galilee, near modern Tiberius. For ten thousand, see on 5:8. Mount Tabor was on the northern edge of the Jezreel Valley, at the meeting place of the tribal territories of Issachar, Zebulun and Naphtali. 11 On Heber the Kenite ... Moses' brother- in-law see 1:16 and cf. Nu. 10:20–33. The Kenites (the name means ‘smith’) were nomads inhabiting southern Palestine but sometimes, as here, moving further north.

5:1–31 Victory song. The Hebrew used in this song shows it to be one of the most ancient pieces of poetry in the OT. A version of it was sung on the day of battle (1), and it was probably given its present form soon after. It may have been preserved in some such collection as ‘the Book of Jashar’ (Jos. 10:13) or ‘the Book of the Wars of the LORD’ (Nu. 21:14). Songs like this were often sung in public worship and were reminders to later generations of the faithfulness of God and of the great things he had done for Israel, his covenant people. But here, this particular song appears as part of the Deborah-Barak episode, which is not formally concluded until the song is complete (see v 31b and cf. 3:11, 30). Unlike the preceding narrative, however, it is not concerned with how the Lord took the honour of victory from Barak and gave it to a woman. It pays tribute to those individuals and tribes who valiantly played their part (including Jael) and rebukes those who did not, thus alerting us to a certain lack of unity among the tribes (a problem that will emerge more clearly later in the book). The battle involved mainly the central and northern tribes (there is no mention of Judah), and of these some acquitted themselves more creditably than others. But the main theme of the song is ‘the righteous acts’ of the Lord himself, who went forth as Israel’s champion and overwhelmed his enemies (and Israel’s) by unleashing the powers of heaven against them. In this it is very reminiscent of the song the Israelites sang in the time of Moses when the Lord fought for them against the Egyptians (Ex. 15). Through such events Israel learned that the Lord who had made them his own by covenant was Lord of creation as well as of history, Creator as well as Redeemer. This was a vital element of Israel’s faith, because their Canaanite neighbours worshipped nature deities (the Baals) who were believed to control the weather, and the Israelites themselves were constantly tempted to worship these gods (2:11).

The song’s main sections are as follows: prelude (praise to the Lord and a call to hear the song; 2–3); the Lord’s arrival as Israel’s champion (4–5); conditions prevailing before the battle (6–8); a call to participate in the battle (9–13); the response of the Israelite tribes (14–18); the battle itself (19–23); the death of Sisera (24–27); the waiting of his mother in vain (28–30); epilogue (31). The battle itself is the climax. The stars fight from the heavens, and on earth the River Kishon responds by becoming a torrent and overwhelming the enemy. The scene ends with the pounding of horses’ hooves as the defeated chariotry try desperately to escape.

The two scenes which follow show how completely the enemy was undone. The inaction (waiting) of the second, is the complement of the action (murder) of the first. The muted conversation between Sisera’s mother and her maids only thinly veiled an unspoken dread. Sisera would never return. But what was bad news for Sisera’s household was good news indeed for Israel: the oppressor was dead. It was a deliverance Israel did not deserve but one which the Lord graciously granted them. The Deborah-Barak episode ends with a crashing victory hymn in praise of the Lord and his loyal supporters, but especially of the Lord. He himself was the true Saviour of Israel and complete master of their environment.

Notes. 2 Israel had no standing army at this time. The fighters were all non-professional volunteers. 4–5 Seir was a mountain in Edom, to the south of Israel. Sinai (Mt Sinai) was further south again and was the place where the Lord first revealed himself to Israel. The Lord is pictured as coming to Israel’s rescue from Mt Sinai, via Edom. He is surrounded by cloud, thunder and earthquake, as at his first coming to his people (Ex. 19:16–19). He comes in storm, and he unleashes a storm (literally) on his enemies (20–21). 6 On Shamgar see 3:31. 8 On they chose new gods see 2:12; 4:1. The Israelites had been disarmed by their enemies (cf. 1 Sa.

13:19). The Hebrew word translated thousand originally meant a clan (as in 6:15) or small military contingent. The number of Israelites was probably much smaller than the usual English translation suggests. 10 White donkeys were ridden by the people of importance (cf. 10:4). 14 Those whose roots were in Amalek were descendants of Amalekites who had settled in the territory of Ephraim (cf. 12:15). 14 Makir is an alternative name for the tribe of Manasseh (cf. Gn. 50:23) 17 Gilead is probably an indirect reference to the tribe of Gad. At this time they lived in Gilead, a region to the east of the Jordan River (see 1 Ch. 5:16). Dan's original territory was in the south, near the coast. Later, most of them moved to a new inland location in the far north (1:34; 18:1; cf. Jos. 19:40–48). 19 Canaan was not a unified state. Jabin and Sisera were leaders of an anti-Israelite coalition (see 4:2) On Taanach and Megiddo see on 1:27. 20 As heavenly bodies, the stars (from the writer's point of view) participated in the convulsions that brought the rain. 23 Meroz is unknown but was probably an ally of whom better things were expected. Meroz is cursed. Jael, by contrast, is blessed (24). On the angel of the LORD see on 2:1. 25 Milk was used by Jael for its sleep-inducing properties (cf. 4:19). 27 Sisera suffered a similar fate to Eglon (3:25). 28 Sisera's mother is the tragic counterpart to Deborah, 'a mother in Israel' (7). 31 Cursing of enemies in this way had been common since the time of Moses (see Nu. 10:35, and cf. Ps. 68:1–3). At its best it was not motivated by personal vindictiveness but by a recognition that judgment belonged to God, and that his honour was bound up with the fate of his people. In the light of new revelation (e.g. Rom. 12:17–21), cursing enemies is not appropriate for Christians today. Like the sun when it rises in its strength, cf. Samson (chs. 13–16), whose name is derived from the Hebrew word šemeš meaning 'sun'.

6:1–8:35 Gideon

6:1–6 Oppression by the Midianites. The news of renewed apostasy in v 1 comes as a shock after the high praise of the preceding chapter. It confronts us in a particularly striking way with the fickleness of the Israelites, who cannot for long resist the attraction of other gods no matter how much the Lord exerts himself on their behalf. The Gideon episode explores this problem more fully than previous episodes have done.

Barak's victory over the Canaanite chariot forces had opened the broad, fertile Jezreel Valley to Israelite settlement and the cultivation of crops. A different kind of enemy then appeared in the same area and a new struggle for control of it ensued. This time the Israelites were punished by being subjected to repeated raids by Midianites and others who swept across the land like locusts, devouring and destroying everything in their path. With their means of sustenance destroyed, the Israelites were reduced to a pitiful state, living in dens and caves like animals. In their desperation they appealed, as usual, to the Lord.

Notes. 1 Midianites were desert dwellers from northwest Arabia, related to the Israelites through Abraham (Gn. 25:1–5). 3 On Amalekites see on 3:13. Other eastern peoples refers to other nomadic tribes from Arabia and Syria (see Gn. 29:1). 4 Gaza was on the Mediterranean coast in the south. 5 Large-scale domestication of the camel (a recent development) made long-range raids possible.

6:7–10 A prophet sent to rebuke Israel. In a surprising development, Yahweh did not respond to Israel's cry for help by immediately sending them a deliverer. Instead he sent a prophet to tell them that by their behaviour they had forfeited all right to deliverance. The prophet's speech ended on this note of indictment, leaving it unclear what the Lord intended to do. It was a tense moment, when Israel's fate hung in the balance. Only grace could save them.

Note. 10 For Amorites see on 1:34.

6:11–24 The ‘angel of the LORD’ commissions Gideon. With the arrival of the angel it became clear that the Lord intended to save Israel once again, and that his chosen instrument on this occasion was Gideon, whose call followed the same pattern as that of Moses in Ex. 3. Like Moses, he received his call while he was in hiding from the enemy, doing menial work to keep his family alive (11). Like Moses, he was told that the Lord was sending him on a mission (14). He protested, as Moses did, that he was inadequate for the task (15). He received the same promise as Moses received, ‘I will be with you’ (16), and, like Moses, he received a sign to confirm his call (17). Finally, miraculous fire signalled God’s presence (21), as it did in the call of Moses. So the message is clear: Gideon was to be used by God to save Israel from the Midianites, just as Moses was used to save Israel from the Egyptians. The God of the exodus has come to Israel’s rescue again.

Notes. 11 Ophrah was in the territory of Manasseh, but is otherwise unknown. The two references to Ophrah in vs 11 and 24 frame the description of Gideon’s call. The Abiezrite. From ‘Abiezer’ a clan belonging to the tribe of Manasseh (Jos. 17:2). 12 For angel of the LORD see on 2:1. 15 Lord means ‘Sir’ (see the NIV mg.). Gideon did not yet recognize his visitor. 22 It was only at this point that Gideon realized who he had been speaking to, and his fear stemmed from his knowledge of the rules of holiness (cf. 13:22, and see Ex. 33:20). But the Lord at once reassured him (23). Gideon had been accorded a rare privilege; the Lord had appeared to him but spared his life. 24 The LORD is Peace (Heb. šālôm). This echoes the Lord’s reassuring ‘Peace!’ in the previous verse. The altar commemorated the particular revelation of God that took place there (cf. Gn. 28:16–19).

6:25–32 Gideon pulls down the altar of Baal. Gideon’s enlistment by the Lord immediately projected him into a head-on confrontation with his own family and clan, for they had become Baal worshippers, something that the Lord would not tolerate. The Lord’s altar and Baal’s altar could not stand side-by-side, for this was a direct contradiction of the very first commandment, ‘You shall have no other gods besides me’ (Ex. 20:3; NIV mg.) Parallels to this kind of predicament are often found today when people’s commitment to Christ sets them against their families’ wishes or principles.

Gideon, fearful of the consequences, carried out the Lord’s orders under cover of darkness and with the help of his servants. The men of the town were outraged at the destruction of Baal’s altar, and Gideon was saved from death only by the quick thinking of his father who, faced with defending Baal’s honour or saving his son, unhesitatingly chose in favour of his son (31). Miraculously, Gideon emerged as a hero. In effect he had been reborn, and in recognition of this was given a new name which marked him as living proof of Baal’s powerlessness (see note on v 32). Gideon had begun his career by driving Baal from the field, and the stage was now set for him to rally the Israelite militia to fight a holy war against the external, human foe, the Midianites (33–35).

Notes. 25 The choice of the second bull (also in v 26) was apparently an act of grace whereby the clan was spared the loss of their prime breeding bull. On the Asherah pole see the NIV mg. and comments on 2:13 and 3:7. 26 On a proper kind of altar see the NIV mg. and cf. Ex. 20:25–26). 27 As the son of the clan head Gideon was a man of some wealth and influence (cf. vs 12, 14), despite his self-effacing words in v 15. 31 Cf. Elijah’s challenge to Baal’s followers at a later time (1 Ki. 19:17) 32 The name Jerub-Baal (see the NIV mg.) is a challenge to Baal to act if he can.

6:33–35 Gideon rallies the fighting men. Gideon soon showed that he was not lacking in resourcefulness when it came to uniting the scattered Israelites in a common cause and commanding them in the field. With the fighting men of his own clan, the Abiezrites, firmly consolidated as his power base (34), he called for wider support, first from Manasseh as a whole (35a) and then from the neighbouring northern tribes who had common cause with his own against the invaders (35b). But this was not human resourcefulness alone. He was a man who had been taken over and energized by the Spirit of the LORD (34).

Note. 33 See the comments and notes on vs 1–6. The implication of this verse is that, militarily, things have now come to a head and an outright battle is inevitable.

6:36–40 Gideon seeks reassurance by putting out a fleece. It was common practice in the ancient world to seek last-minute confirmation of divine support before a battle was joined (cf. 1 Ki. 22:6–28). But given the assurances Gideon had already received, his action was more an expression of unbelief than of faith, as Gideon himself virtually admitted by his opening words, ‘If you will save Israel ... as you have promised ...’ (36). Cf. also v 39: ‘Do not be angry with me ...’. God’s positive response to Gideon’s repeated experiment with the fleece was a gracious concession to his weak faith rather than an indication that God was pleased with him for seeking reassurance in this way. Similar actions by Christians today should not be necessary, but God in his mercy sometimes responds to such calls for reassurance.

Note. 39 Making the fleece dry was a greater miracle, since, supposing dew fell on both, the hard floor would ordinarily dry more quickly than the fleece.

7:1–8 The reduction of Gideon’s fighting force to three hundred. Gideon’s fighting force was reduced to 300 (the rest were made reservists) so that Israel would not be able to boast that their own strength had saved them (2). But along with this drastic reduction came a further word of assurance to Gideon: ‘With the three hundred ... I will save you’ (7).

Notes. 1 The spring of Harod (‘spring of trembling’, cf. v 3) was on the south side of the Valley of Jezreel (see on 1:29). The hill of Moreh (‘hill of the teacher’) was directly opposite, at a point where the valley narrowed. 3 The only Gilead we know of elsewhere in the OT is a mountainous region east of the Jordan (see on 5:17), but that does not fit the context here. Either this is another Mount Gilead or, as some suggest, the text originally read ‘Mount Gilboa’ (see 1 Sa. 28:4), but was accidentally changed in transmission. On thousand see on 5:8. 5–6 The text of these verses seems to have suffered in transmission. The original distinction must have been between those who knelt and drank from their hands, and those (the 300) who put their faces to the water and lapped like dogs. Thus, it was probably the most unlikely who were chosen, to make it even clearer that the victory was no human achievement.

7:9–15 Gideon goes down to the Midianite camp at night. In this final scene before the battle the Lord, realizing that Gideon would be too fearful to spy out the enemy camp alone, even at night, gave him permission in advance to take this servant Purah with him for moral support. (This night scene recalls the earlier one in 6:27–32.) They were shown that the feared Midianites were in fact in a state of near panic; the Lord had unsettled them with nightmares which had convinced them that their cause was lost (13–14). So Gideon took heart and settled on a plan to stampede them. But it was clear that there would be no real fight; God had already given the enemy into Gideon’s hand (14–15).

Note. 13 Barley was the most common cereal crop in Palestine and the staple food of the poorer people. The dream confirmed the point of the water test of vs 1–7, that the Lord would achieve a great victory with the most unpromising material.

7:16–25 The rout of the Midianites. Divine sovereignty and human responsibility go hand in hand here, as they always do in Scripture. Although the victory was God-given, shrewd tactics also played an important part. Gideon showed great skill in deploying his small band in such a way as to create the impression of a huge force surrounding the enemy camp. And the cry of Gideon's men, 'A sword for the LORD and for Gideon' (20), played upon the fears already instilled in the Midianites by the dream of vs 13–14. It was all too much for them. In panic and confusion they first turned their swords on one another, and then fled in disarray towards the Jordan, only to find their escape route blocked by the reservists that Gideon had called up (24–25). The capture and execution of two of their leaders shows just how devastating a defeat they had suffered (25). We may reflect that today God still works, by his Spirit, with the most unpromising material to accomplish his purposes.

Notes. 16 Trumpets, jars and torches were strange weapons indeed—but effective! It is possible that the 300 did not have any real weapons at all, and they do not appear to have done any fighting (see v 21). 20 'A sword for the LORD' threatened death by the sword, but ironically it was the swords of the Midianites themselves which turned out to be 'for the LORD' (22). 22 All the places mentioned in this verse and v 24 were in or near the Jordan Valley. 25 Oreb and Zeeb mean 'Raven' and 'Wolf', respectively. The places where they were killed were subsequently named after them, and were so known in the author's own time.

8:1–3 The Ephraimites challenge Gideon. Ephraim and Manasseh were the two leading tribes of the central sector of Israel (see on 1:22–36), and it was probably for this reason that the Ephraimites felt slighted by the fact that Gideon (who was from Manasseh) did not include them in his initial call-up (6:34–35). But Gideon had not yet completed the war with the Midianites, at least to his own satisfaction (4–5) and could not afford an all-out rift in his own ranks at this crucial stage. The Ephraimites had in fact done very well and had every right to be proud. When Gideon pointed this out to them their anger with him subsided. It is a classic example of a gentle answer turning away wrath (Pr. 15:1). Contrast Jephthah's reaction to the same group in 12:1–6.

8:4–21 Gideon's pursuit and capture of Zebah and Zalmunna. In this second phase of the war, which took place east of the Jordan, Gideon appears in a strange new light. His stated purpose was to capture Zebah and Zalmunna, the kings of Midian (5), and he pressed towards this goal with frenzied determination despite the hunger and weariness of his men and the refusal of the leaders of Succoth and Peniel to give him support. He expected these two kings to be given into his hand as surely as Oreb and Zeeb had been (7), but there is no indication of any involvement by Yahweh in the matter (cf. 8:11–12 with 7:21–22).

Gideon's humility and caution completely disappear. He now throws diplomacy to the wind, demanding support with threats of retribution on those who fail to give it (7–8). And in marked contrast to the earlier phase of Gideon's career, there is no longer any reference to the Lord being involved in what he does. It is clear that what he now achieves is by his own strength of character and tactical skill, not by reliance upon the Lord. His actions against Succoth and Peniel anticipate the similar, more brutal actions of his son Abimelech against Shechem and Thebez (cf. vs 15–17 with 9:46–49). At length, the reason for Gideon's frenzied pursuit of Zebah and Zalmunna is revealed: they had killed his brothers in some earlier battle, and Gideon has been intent on squaring accounts with them (18–19). Finally, Jether, Gideon's son, who is introduced unexpectedly in v 20, serves to highlight the change that has taken place in his father. Gideon's earlier diffidence is mirrored in Jether, who hesitates when he is told to kill the prisoners, because ... he was afraid (20). Gideon himself, by way of contrast, has the bearing of a prince (18), and is a man of strength (21).

Notes. 5 The place was named Succoth ('shelters') because Jacob had once encamped there (Gn. 33:17). It was on the lower reaches of the Jabbok River, just east of the Jordan. 8 Peniel ('face of God') was so named by Jacob because God had appeared to him there (Gn. 32:30). It was just a few miles to the east of Succoth. 10 Karkor was east of the Dead Sea, well beyond the limits of Israelite settlement. On fifteen thousand see on 5:8. 11 The location of Nobah is unknown. Jogbehah was seven miles north-west of modern Amman. 13 The location of the Pass of Heres is unknown.

8:22–27 Gideon’s rule over Israel. The Israelites proposed that Gideon should be more than a judge; he should rule like a king, and his sons should succeed him (22). Gideon had been behaving more and more like a king since he had crossed the Jordan, and it seemed only right to his followers that he should now become one. Their reason was that he had saved Israel. But this was a fundamental misconception, which Gideon’s own recent behaviour had helped to produce. It was the Lord, not Gideon, who had saved Israel. The danger all along had been that the people would fail to give the Lord the credit for their deliverance (see especially 7:2), and this was precisely what they now did. When it was put to him in this way Gideon quite correctly rejected the offer, and his request for materials to make an ephod (see below) was entirely in keeping with his statement that it was the Lord himself who would rule Israel. If the Lord was to rule he must be inquired of, and it was apparently with the intention of making such inquiry possible that Gideon made an ephod and put it in Ophrah, where the Lord had first appeared to him. But it was an act of piety that went wrong, for the ephod became a virtual idol, and Gideon and his family became involved in the false worship associated with it. After starting so well, Gideon ended by inadvertently plunging Israel back into apostasy.

Notes. 24 Ishmaelites is a general term for the Bedouin of the desert region east of the Jordan, of which the Midianites were one group (see Gn. 16:12, 37:28, 36). 27 An ephod was a priestly garment with two stones (the Urim and Thummim) in the breastpiece, used for obtaining yes—no answers from God (see Ex. 28:28–30; 1 Sa. 23:6–12).

8:28–35 The death of Gideon and the birth of Abimelech. Gideon’s positive legacy to Israel was forty years of peace (28), during which he apparently retired into private life (29) in keeping with his assertion that the Lord, not he, was to rule Israel. But Gideon’s lifestyle (many wives, seventy sons and a concubine) was far more like that of a ruler than of a private citizen. There was a disturbing discrepancy between his public pronouncements and his private practice. His negative legacy to Israel was apostasy and violence. After his death, the idolatry associated with the ephod which he had set up quickly developed into full-scale Baal worship (33), and his son Abimelech (see the note on v 31) showed that he had none of his father’s scruples about the acquisition and exercise of power. Vs 28–35 as a whole serve as a bridge to the account of Abimelech’s career which follows in ch. 9. What Gideon had secretly coveted his son seized with bloody force.

Notes. 31 The meaning of Abimelech (‘my father is king’) is a telling comment on Gideon’s ambivalent attitude to kingship. 33 Baal-Berith (‘Baal of the covenant’) was the god worshipped at Shechem, Abimelech’s home town. The name suggests a cult which was part Canaanite and part Israelite.

9:1–57 Abimelech’s experiment with kingship

The theme of this sequel to the Gideon episode is divine retribution. This is made crystal clear by the author at a key point in the story (23–24) and again at the very end, after the climax has been reached with Abimelech’s death (56–57). It is an account of how God caused the evil that Abimelech and the men of Shechem did to rebound upon their own heads.

The details of the story show this process of retribution being worked out with almost mathematical precision from the point at which God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem (23). Abimelech's going to Shechem to incite its leaders to conspire with him against the sons of Jerub-Baal (i.e. of Gideon; vs 1–2) was answered by Gaal's arrival in Shechem to incite its leaders to conspire with him against Abimelech (26–29). The ambush set by the men of Shechem (25) was answered by the ambush set against them by Abimelech (34). Finally, Abimelech himself, who killed his brothers on a stone (5, 18), was killed beside a stone which was dropped on his head by an unnamed woman at Thebez (54). So in the unfolding story, under God's overruling providence, act answers to act and evil to evil, until the chief instigator of the evil, Abimelech, is himself struck down. Thereupon his followers, as if waking from a bad dream, down their weapons and go home without completing their assault on Thebez (55).

9:1–6 Abimelech's rise to power. Abimelech's rise to power was totally different from that of the heroes of the previous chapters. He was no judge raised up by the Lord, but a king who raised himself up by intrigue and violence. He was the only son that Gideon had by his concubine in Shechem (8:31). So Abimelech had two sets of brothers: the other sons of his father (seventy in all) and the other sons of his mother (influential men in Shechem). Abimelech exploited his unique position skilfully. He turned brothers against brothers in such a way as to leave himself as the only surviving son of Gideon capable of succeeding his father. And succeed him he did, but without the wide support his father had enjoyed. Only the citizens of Shechem, it seems, acknowledged Abimelech as king (6).

Notes. 1 Shechem was situated at a strategic pass in central Canaan, associated with Israel from patriarchal times, but with a mixed Canaanite-Israelite population (Gn. 12:6–7; Jos. 24). 2 On Jerub-Baal see 6:32. 3 For Baal-Berith see on 8:33. 5 On one stone indicates a mass public execution. 6 'Millo' means a 'filling' (i.e. an artificial mound). Beth Millo ('house of the mound') was probably a fortress in or near Shechem. The great tree at the pillar was a sacred tree at a standing stone associated with the semi-pagan worship of the Shechemites (cf. Dt. 16:21–22).

9:7–21 Jotham confronts the citizens of Shechem. Jotham, the only son of Gideon to survive the massacre at Ophrah (5), proved to be Abimelech's undoing. He confronted the citizens of Shechem with the evil they had done and called on them to listen to him, and on God to witness their response. It was a solemn moment. Jotham used a fable to achieve his purpose, but the main thrust of his speech lay not in the fable itself (8–15), but in his application of it to the current situation (16–21). The central charge he brought against his hearers was that they had not acted honourably and in good faith towards Jerub-Baal (Gideon) and his family. Gideon had conferred many benefits on them, but their only response had been to murder nearly all his sons and make the least worthy of them their king. Jotham concluded by setting before his hearers the alternatives of blessing (19) or curse (20). Blessing, however, had ceased to be a real alternative because the crime was irrevocable. The detailing of the curse in v 20 was in effect an announcement of judgment, and in the rest of the story the author shows how it was put into effect. The concluding words of the chapter refer to this judgment as the curse of Jotham, son of Jerub-Baal (57).

Notes. 7 Mount Gerizim was to the south-west of Shechem (see on 9:1). 8 In the OT anointing with oil was used to indicate appointment to a special office or role in God's purposes. In particular, priests and kings were anointed (see Ex. 28:41; 2 Sa. 2:4). 9 Oil (like wine; cf. Ex. 29:40) was an important element in religious observances both within and outside Israel (e.g. Ex. 25:6; Lv. 8:26; Nu. 7:19). 21 Beer simply means 'well' and features in many town names of this period (e.g. Beersheba, 'well of seven' or 'well of the oath'; Gn. 21:31). The location of this particular 'Beer' is unknown.

9:22–57 The violent end of Abimelech’s reign. Abimelech’s rule was short-lived, a mere three years (22). But no doubt it was three years too long for those who had to endure it. Like all tyrants his ability to impose his rule widely depended on the loyalty of a relatively small in-group who stood to benefit from it. With the crumbling of this narrow support base Abimelech’s days were numbered. What initial grievances the citizens of Shechem had is not clear, but their conflict with Abimelech was sharpened by the arrival of Gaal, who presented himself as an attractive alternative (26). Abimelech’s downfall follows the classic pattern: general discontent, the beginnings of organized opposition, the emergence of a rival leader, fullscale civil war with its inevitable horrors, and finally the death of the tyrant and the dispersal of his supporters. It is only the final stage that contains anything really surprising, but the twist in the plot at this point is entirely in keeping with the character of the book as a whole. Abimelech, as we have seen, was not slain in a final titanic showdown with Gaal, but by a woman who dropped a stone on his head! This is a book which shows again and again how the sovereign God uses unlikely means to achieve his ends. The means by which the victory was achieved leaves us in no doubt that it was God’s doing. He constantly works in this book in a way that confounds human expectations and excludes human boasting (see 7:1–3).

Notes. 23 An evil spirit was used by God to judge Abimelech. God is not evil, but evil powers are subject to his control (cf. 1 Sa. 16:14; Jb. 1:12). 27 This was apparently a grape harvest festival involving pagan rites (see on 8:33). 28 Shechem and Hamor were rulers of the area in the time of the patriarchs. Shechem, who apparently gave his name to the town, raped Jacob’s daughter (Gn. 34:2). Gaal and his followers associated themselves with Hamor who, in contrast to Shechem (and Abimelech), was untainted by contact with foreigners. Zebul (see v 30) was apparently an unpopular figure, perhaps because he too was not of untainted native stock. 37 The centre of the land was a prominent landmark, possibly Mt Gerizim, just south of the city. The strategic Shechem Pass, between Mt Gerizim and Mt Ebal, was centrally located in Canaan (see Dt. 11:29). The soothsayers’ tree was outside the city, in contrast to the tree of v 6. Possibly it was the ‘great tree of Moreh [the teacher]’ mentioned in Gn. 12:6 and if so was an ancient pagan site, possibly still frequented by the Shechemites (see on v 6). 41 Arumah was probably Jabal al ‘Urma, a hilly area to the southeast of the city. 45 He scattered salt over it to make it and its surrounding fields infertile (cf. Dt. 29:23; Je. 17:6). 46 El-Berith (‘God of the covenant’) is equivalent to ‘Baal-Berith’ (see on 8:33, and cf. 9:4). 47 Mount Zalmon (‘shaded’) was probably so-called because it was well forested. Its precise location is unknown. 50 Thebez is the modern Tubas, north of Nablus. 53 The upper millstone was one of two large stones used for grinding grain.

10:1–5 Tola and Jair

There is no mention of any external threat during the time of Tola and Jair. Tola is said to have ‘saved’ Israel, to be sure, but in context this probably refers to the sad state that Israel had been left in by Abimelech’s disastrous rule. Tola ‘saved’ Israel by providing a period of stable administration (cf. Deborah in 4:4–5). Likewise, the description of Jair’s thirty sons in v 4 points to the peacefulness of the times and, in Jair’s case, the prosperity and prestige enjoyed by the judge. It also shows the unpreparedness of the Gileadites for the disaster about to break upon them. Small use Jair’s pampered sons would be when the Ammonites launched their invasion (10:7)! Then the Gileadites would search desperately for a fighter (10:18). They would eventually find one in Jephthah, the outcast, whose comparatively hard life had toughened him for just such a role (11:1–3).

Notes. 1 Issachar was a northern Israelite tribe (see on 4:4). Shamir is thought to be identical with Samaria, in central Israel, south of the territory of Issachar. Some members of the Issachar tribe must have migrated there. 3 For Gilead see on 7:3. 4 Havvoth Jair means ‘the settlements of Jair’. 5 Kamon was in Jair’s home territory, about 15 miles (24 km) east of the Jordan River.

10:6–12:7 Jephthah

The story of Jephthah’s career unfolds in five episodes, and in each of them a dialogue plays a crucial role. The first episode (10:6–16) has to do with Israel’s renewed apostasy and the consequences that flowed from it. This sets the scene for what is to follow. The dialogue in this opening episode takes the form of a confrontation between Israel and the Lord (10–16). The second episode runs from 10:17 to 11:11 and has to do with the recruitment of Jephthah to lead the Gileadites in the coming battle with the Ammonites. The dialogue here is between the elders of Gilead and Jephthah (11:5–11). The third episode (11:12–28) is wholly taken up with a diplomatic exchange (dialogue at a distance) with the Ammonite king. The failure of this diplomatic exchange leads inevitably to the climactic fourth episode (11:29–38), in which the battle takes place. But this episode is complicated by Jephthah’s vow and its outcome, which becomes the real focus of attention. The dramatic centre of this episode, therefore, is the dialogue between Jephthah and his daughter in vs 34–38. The fifth and final episode (12:1–7) deals with a confrontation between Jephthah and the men of Ephraim which follows the battle. The dialogue here is in vs 1–4a.

At one level, of course, the story is simply an account of how the Lord used Jephthah to save Israel from the Ammonites. But the dialogues point to a deeper level of meaning than this. Every dialogue is essentially an exercise in negotiation, and this is true even of Israel’s repentance (in the first episode) and Jephthah’s vow (in the crucial fourth). At its deepest level the story of Jephthah is about the tragic consequences that follow when religion degenerates into bargaining with God. It shows us how deeply the Israelites of Jephthah’s day, including Jephthah himself, had begun to misconstrue their relationship with God. Indeed it was only because of the Lord’s great mercies that they were not left to the fate they so richly deserved (cf. La. 3:22).

10:6–16 Israel appeals to the Lord. There are three conflicts in this opening episode of the Jephthah story. The first and most obvious is between Israel and the Ammonites. With the Lord’s permission (though they were not aware of it) the Ammonites had reduced sinful Israel to a desperate state (9). In their desperation the Israelites appealed to the Lord to save them. This brought to a head the second conflict in this episode, namely, the conflict between the Israelites and the Lord, because his response was to confront them with their shameful record of repeated apostasy and hotly to rebuff their appeal. He saw the shallowness of their repentance and was angered by it. He would not be used by them again (13–14). This was a tense moment, when Israel’s whole future again hung in the balance. We are reminded of the earlier confrontation in 6:7–10, but this one was far more ominous. Now it was the Lord himself who confronted Israel, and his rejection of their appeal was explicit and apparently final. But the closing two verses introduce hope by opening a window for us into a conflict going on within the Lord himself. For all his justifiable anger, he could not bear Israel’s misery any longer. It was not their renunciation of other gods which moved him. They had done that many times before, only to return to their old ways (16; cf. vs 11–14). It was not their repentance that he found impossible to ignore, but their misery. Only the Lord’s pity stood between the Israelites and utter ruin. They deserved to be abandoned, but (such is his mercy) he could not give them up (cf. 2:18; Ho. 11:8–9). It is this conflict within the heart and mind of God himself which holds the key to the resolution of the other two. The rest of the story will show its outworking.

Notes. 6 On the Baals and the Ashtoreths see on 2:11, 13. Aram was the ancient name for Syria (cf. 3:8 and note). For Sidon see on 3:3; on Moab and the Ammonites see on 3:12; and on the Philistines see on 3:3. 8 For Gilead see on 7:3. The Amorites (see on 1:34) had settled in Gilead as well as in Canaan itself (Nu. 21:21). 9 Only the Ammonites feature in the Jephthah story; the Philistines will loom large in the Samson story of chs. 13–16. The present passage introduces the first and foreshadows the second. 11 The reference to the Egyptians is to the time of Moses. The reference to the Amorites is probably to the encounter with Sihon recorded in Nu. 21:21–31. For the Amalekites see on 3:13. 12 The Sidonians (see 3:3) may have been part of the Canaanite coalition led by Jabin and Sisera (5:19). The Maonites are unknown, but perhaps this is a reference to the Midianites (cf. the NIV mg. and see also on 6:1).

10:17–11:11 The Gileadites appeal to Jephthah. The second episode opens with the Ammonites about to launch a fresh offensive and the Israelites taking desperate counsel with one another. It was natural that the Gileadites were the most vocal since it was their territory which was most immediately threatened. But they had no effective leader, and hence their united approach to Jephthah, whom they had formerly rejected (11:7). But Jephthah was wary. Why should he trust those who had treated him so badly in the past? This led to some hard-nosed negotiating in which Jephthah was offered, and accepted, the twin role of tribal leader and military commander (11:8, 11). The bargain thus struck was formally ratified in a ceremony held at Mizpah, the place at which the initial gathering had been (cf. 11:11 with 10:17). So the episode ended where it began, but with Jephthah now installed as leader.

On reflection we can see that this episode parallels the first. The ‘repentance’ of Israel was like the desperate negotiating of the Gileadites. But Jephthah’s response was significantly different from God’s. The Lord was moved by pity (10:16); Jephthah was apparently moved only by self-interest and personal ambition. He out-negotiated the negotiators, while the Lord stood in the background as the silent witness of all that had taken place (11:11).

Notes. 10:17 Mizpah (‘watchtower’) was a common name, but this particular Mizpah (in Gilead) is of unknown location. 11:1 Gilead is here a person’s name, in contrast to 10:17 and elsewhere (cf. Jos. 17:1, 3). 3 Tob (‘good’) was a town in Aram (Syria) (2 Sa. 10:6–8).

11:12–28 Jephthah uses diplomacy. The territory in dispute here lay in southern Gilead, to the north of the Arnon River. It had once been Moabite territory, but they had lost it to the Amorites, who had in turn lost it to the Israelites in the time of Moses (Nu. 21:21–31). By the time of Jephthah, the Ammonites had apparently seized Moab itself, which lay to the south of the Arnon (v 24 of the present passage). Jephthah’s argument was that Israel had not taken any land from the Ammonites, and that they should follow the precedent set by the former rulers of Moab and recognize the Arnon as the border between their respective territories (25).

This episode reveals something of Jephthah’s potential for greatness. He shows that he is capable of transcending the Gileadite sphere and assuming responsibility for the affairs of Israel as a whole. But it is not surprising that his diplomacy fails. His tone is hardly that of a man suing for peace. He seems more intent on playing for time and establishing the justice of his cause, in the hope that the Lord, the supreme Judge (27), will decide in his (and Israel’s) favour. His closing appeal to the Lord to decide the issue this day is virtually a declaration of war, and a clear sign that the climax of the story is at hand.

Notes. 13 The Arnon and the Jabbok were two streams or wadis on the eastern side of the Jordan River. Between them they enclosed much of southern Gilead (cf. v 18). 16 Red Sea (‘sea of reeds') is probably a reference to the Gulf of Aqabah, as in Nu. 33:10–11. Kadeshbarnea was a settlement on the extreme southern fringe of Canaan (Nu. 13:26). 17 Edom was the land occupied by the descendants of Esau, south of the Dead Sea. For Moab see on 3:12. 19 For the Amorites see on 1:34 and 10:8, 11. Heshbon was formerly a Moabite town, taken by Sihon, king of the Amorites, and made his royal city (Nu. 21:26). 20 The precise location of Jahaz is unknown. 24 Chemosh was the god of Moab (1 Ki. 11:7; 2 Ki. 23:13; Je. 48:7, 13, 46), but since the Ammonites currently ruled Moab, Chemosh was regarded as their god as well. It was common for rulers to 'adopt' the god or gods of the territories they conquered in this way. 25 Balak son of Zippor was the king of Moab in the time of Moses (Nu. 22–24). 26 Aroer was a town on the northern bank of the River Arnon (see on v 13).

11:29–40 Jephthah's vow and its outcome. The coming of the Spirit on Jephthah (29) sets in motion a sequence of events that we are now familiar with. It leads predictably to the decisive victory in v 33. But that sequence is interrupted in this case by a vow (30–31), and once made it dominates the whole episode. The battle receives only cursory treatment, its chief interest being that it creates the conditions in which Jephthah will have to fulfil his vow.

Vows, as such, were not unusual (e.g. Nu. 30; Ps. 22:25; Ec. 5:4–5). But this was no ordinary vow. It explicitly pledged a burnt offering (31b) but did not specify the victim, only the means by which it would be identified: 'whatever [or whoever] comes out ...' (31a). The wording was ambiguous, and put all the inhabitants of Jephthah's house at risk. To our horror, and his, it was his virgin daughter, his only child, who became the victim (34–35), and the real tragedy is that such a vow was totally unnecessary (as previous episodes have shown). In context it can be seen as nothing other than a mistaken attempt to bargain with God. Jephthah the master negotiator overplayed his hand and paid a tragic price. The second half of this episode reads like a grim inversion of Gn. 22, the story of another father and another only child. But Jephthah was no Abraham, and in his case there was no voice from heaven, only a punishing silence. We can only conclude that the Lord was as angry with Jephthah's vow as he was with Israel's 'repentance'. Cf. the action of the king of Moab in 2 Ki. 3:26–27. It is worth considering how often modern prayers contain elements of bargaining with God. Jephthah's example makes it clear that God is not to be bargained with in this way.

Notes. 29 On Manasseh see on 1:27. 33 On Aroer see on v 26. The precise locations of Minnith and Abel Karamim are unknown.

12:1–7 Jephthah puts down a rebellion. With the external threat removed inter-tribal jealousies sprang up again (cf. 8:1–4). It is pretty clear that the Ephraimites regarded themselves as the natural leaders of Israel and were not willing to acknowledge as judge anyone outside their own tribe, least of all a Gileadite. Jephthah took the same basic approach to them as he had to the Ammonites: he argued the justice of his cause and then (receiving no reply) took to the field. The summary notice of 12:7 makes the political consequences clear: the tribes west of the Jordan were brought to heel and Jephthah judged the whole of Israel for six years. In short, he proved himself to be a strong leader.

For all that, however, this was no holy war. There was no appeal to the Lord to decide the issue and there is no suggestion that the victory was God-given (contrast 11:27, 29, 32). In fact the whole episode is presented with wry humour as a rather squalid tribal feud which shows just how deeply divided Israel was. It is an ominous sign of things to come, especially in chs. 19–21.

Notes. 1 For Ephraim see on 1:22. Zaphon was about 2 miles (3 km) east of the Jordan in central Gilead. 4 Renegades is lit. 'fugitives'. The implication is that Jephthah's followers (or at least some of them) were the descendants of Ephraimites and Manassites who had fled to Gilead as deserters or refugees. Cf. Jephthah's own past (11:1–3). 5 Survivor is plural in Hebrew, lit. 'fugitives' (as in v 4). The Gileadites turned the tables on the Ephraimites and made them fugitives! 6 The meaning of 'Shibboleth' is uncertain and unimportant. It served admirably as a pronunciation test to identify the fleeing Ephraimites. For forty-two thousand see on 5:8.

12:8–15 Ibzan, Elon and Abdon

After the two Gileadites, Jair and Jephthah, the judgeship returned to the northern tribes west of the Jordan. The story of Jephthah and his only child (a daughter) is followed here by the note about Ibzan, who had thirty daughters and acquired another thirty as wives for his thirty sons! Of all the judges, daughters are mentioned only in connection with Jephthah and Ibzan, and the contrast between them serves to underscore the tragic barrenness suffered by Jephthah in consequence of his vow. Very little is recorded about Elon and Abdon, but the note about Abdon's sons and grandsons riding on donkeys recalls the similar ostentation of Jair and his family (10:4). The mention of sons perhaps also suggests that, from Gideon onwards, judgeship was always on the verge of turning into kingship, with sons succeeding their fathers to office (cf. 1 Sa. 8:1). But as the next climactic episode shows, the age of charismatic saviours was not yet over.

Notes. 8 This is probably the northern Bethlehem of Jos. 19:15, on the Zebulun-Asher border. Ibzan may have been from the tribe of Asher. Elon, the next judge, is from Zebulun. Led is lit. 'judged' (cf. vs 11, 13). 11 The precise location of Aijalon is unknown; it is not the southern Aijalon of 1:35. 13 Pirathon was in central Canaan, on the Ephraim-Manasseh border, 6 miles (9 km) south-west of modern Nablus. 15 For Amalekites see on 3:13; 5:14.

13:1–16:31 Samson

The structure of the Samson story is clear. After the opening verse (13:1) has briefly set the scene, Samson's extraordinary birth is described in 13:2–25. His adult career is then unfolded in two movements spanning chs. 14–16. The first begins with his going down to Timnah in 14:1 and climaxes in his slaughter of the Philistines at Ramath Lehi in 15:14–20. The second begins with his going to Gaza in 16:1 and climaxes in his slaughter of the Philistines and his own death in the temple of Dagon in 16:23–31. The two notices about his judgeship at 15:20 and 16:31b formally mark the ends of these two movements.

Samson was the last of the judges whose careers are described in the book, and more space is devoted to him than to any of the others. Of all of them, Samson most epitomises the state of Israel as a whole in the judges' period. He was separated to God but could never fully come to terms with his separateness. As Israel went after foreign gods, Samson went after foreign women. And as Israel in desperation called on the Lord elsewhere in the book, so did Samson at both climaxes of the story (15:18; 16:28). In Samson we see the Lord's struggle with wayward Israel focused in his struggle with one representative man. In a very real sense Samson was Israel. And in the end it was the Lord who was victorious. The Philistines and their false god were defeated, and Samson at last came to terms with his destiny. It is a tragic story, but also one of victory and hope. Under God, Samson began the deliverance of Israel from the Philistines (13:5); David later completed it (2 Sa. 8:1). It is perhaps not out of place to see Israel, and therefore Samson, as prefiguring the church, wayward and unpredictable but still used by God.

13:1–25 Samson's miraculous birth. The brief introduction in v 1 suggests that the faith of the Israelites had reached a particularly low ebb indeed; they no longer even cried out to the Lord to save them (contrast 3:9, 15; 4:3; 6:6; 10:10). Against this background Samson's birth was all the more remarkable. As an act of pure grace it showed the strength of God's commitment to his people, and as a miracle it proclaimed his lordship over life and death. Samson's barren mother was like Israel as a whole, and as the Lord brought life to her dead womb, so would he bring life to Israel through Samson. But it would not be without cost, a cost Samson's mother seems to be instinctively aware of in v 7, the boy will be a Nazirite of God ... until the day of his death. The climax of the story casts a long shadow before it. Like a far greater one to come, this deliverer will fulfil his mission at the cost of his own life.

Notes. 1 For the Philistines see on 3:3 and 10:9. 2 Zorah was 12 miles (19 km) west of Jerusalem, just north of the Valley of Sorek (16:4; cf. 18:2, 8, 11). For the Danites cf. 1:34; 18:1–31, and see on 5:17. 3 For the angel of the LORD see on 2:1–5 and 6:11–24. 5 Nazirite is from the Heb. nāzar meaning 'to separate, consecrate'. A Nazirite was a person who had consecrated himself to the Lord by taking a special vow (see Nu. 6). Such vows were normally voluntary and for a limited period only. Samson, however, was made a life-long Nazirite by God, even before he was born. 18 Beyond understanding is lit. 'wonderful'. The clear implication is that the messenger was in fact God himself (cf. Ex. 15:11; Is. 9:6). 22 See on 6:22–23. 25 Mahaneh Dan ('Camp of Dan') was between Zorah and Jerusalem (18:12). Eshtaol was near Zorah.

14:1–20 Samson's wedding. This chapter begins with Samson going down to Timnah (1). He went down there again in v 5, followed by his father in v 10. He later went down to Ashkelon in v 19a, and then finally back up to his father's house in v 19b. So the chapter ends where it began—one complete movement. But it was only a beginning, as we shall see in the next chapter, where the account of Samson's relationship with the girl from Timnah is continued.

Ch. 14 is full of secrets. There is the secret of the Lord's purposeful control of Samson's actions: he was seeking an occasion to confront the Philistines (4). There is the secret of what Samson did to the lion (6) and of the source of the honey he took back to his parents (9). Finally, there is the secret of the riddle (14), which is developed out of the previous two. Behind all this puzzling activity, driving it forwards to its predetermined goal, was the Spirit of the Lord (13:25; 14:6, 19). Samson seemed intent on indulging his personal desires in complete disregard of his calling as a Nazirite. He defiled himself by scooping honey from a carcass (8; cf. Nu. 6:6), presumably drank wine at the feast (10; cf. Nu. 6:3) and fraternized with the Philistines instead of trying to save Israel from them (1–3; cf. 13:5). But all the time he was unwittingly fulfilling God's purpose (4). He was the Lord's chosen instrument for the deliverance of Israel, and nothing that he did could change that.

The Samson story is a fascinating study in the relationship between human freedom and divine sovereignty. It shows the Lord working all things together for the good of his people, even when they were least aware of it, and despite the waywardness of the one he had chosen to use. He is still the same gracious, sovereign God today. He still works all things together for the good of his people, whether they are aware of it or not. In his perfect servant, Jesus, however, there is no trace of the waywardness that we see in Samson (Rom. 5:6–8; 8:28).

Notes. 1 The exact location of Timnah is unknown, but it was on the Judah-Dan border (Jos. 15:10; 19:43) and was at this time in Philistine hands. 3 Uncircumcised is a term of disdain (cf. 15:18). As far as we know, the Philistines were the only immediate neighbours of Israel who did not practise circumcision. 11 Perhaps the thirty companions were intended as a kind of bodyguard, since Samson was in potentially hostile territory. 12 The linen garments were large rectangular sheets of linen that could be worn by day and slept in at night. It was the fact that they were made of linen, and therefore of high quality, that made them such a prize. 15 Father's household refers to the entire family, including servants (cf. 15:6). 19 Ashkelon was 23 miles (37 km) south-west, on the coast (see on 1:18). 20 The friend ('best man') was presumably different from the 'thirty companions' of v 11 (cf. 15:2 and Jn. 3:29).

15:1–20 Growing conflict with the Philistines. The father of Samson's new bride interpreted Samson's violent, angry departure as evidence that he had abandoned her, and (presumably to salvage some family honour) gave her instead to Samson's 'best man' (14:20; 15:2). But Samson saw things differently, and considered himself fully justified in wreaking havoc in the fields around Timnah, effectively depriving the locals of the fruits of a whole season's labour (1, 3–5). The Philistines were understandably incensed and, unable to get their hands on Samson himself, took brutal vengeance on his wife and her father (6). Thereupon Samson went on another orgy of destruction (this time destroying men rather than crops) and then withdrew, satisfied that he had squared the account with his enemies (7–8). But by this time the train of events had gathered a momentum that was unstoppable. The Philistines would not rest until they had destroyed the destroyer himself, and to this end they invaded Judah in order to capture him (9–10). This put the men of Judah in a difficult position, but they quickly decided that Samson must be sacrificed. The cost of defending him was too great. (Contrast the courageous lead taken by the men of this same tribe in 1:1–3. Their craven behaviour here shows just how low Israel as a whole had sunk.) Apparently accepting the inevitable, Samson allowed them to bind him and prepare to hand him over (11–13). But no-one was prepared for what happened next! The Spirit of the Lord came upon Samson in power, and certain defeat was turned into a glorious (if gory) victory that marked the effective beginning of Samson's rule as judge (14–17, 20).

At one level this is a repulsive tale of retaliation and ever-escalating violence, with the action driven by the dark forces of anger, hate, and the desire for revenge. But at another, more fundamental level, it is a story of God's power bringing victory out of defeat and subduing the enemies of his people. And at the end, even Samson himself acknowledged that he was the Lord's servant and that what had happened had been God's doing (18). He cried out to the Lord, acknowledging his own utter weakness and dependence on God, and found God ready and willing to grant his request (18–19). It was one of his finest moments, and an anticipation of the climax towards which the whole story of his career was moving (see 16:28–30).

Notes. 1 Samson's marriage appears to have been according to Philistine custom, in which the bride remained with her own family and was visited there by her husband. Any children resulting from the marriage would belong to the bride's family. 8 The rock of Etam was apparently a prominent and well-known landmark. Its location is unknown. 9 Lehi ('jawbone') was perhaps so-called because of the appearance of a rocky crag there. But Samson's exploits were to give its name a new significance (17). Again, its location is uncertain. 11 For three thousand cf. vs 15–16 and see on 5:8. 15 A fresh jawbone, i.e. one that was still strong, not dry and brittle. It was a makeshift weapon (cf. Shamgar's ox-goad; 3:31). 16 For made donkeys of them see the NIV mg. 18 For the uncircumcised see on 14:3. 19 The hollow place was probably a rock depression containing a spring. The naming of the spring En Hakkore ('caller's spring') is an allusion to Samson's 'crying out' (lit. 'calling') to the Lord in v 18. In everyday Hebrew, however, the partridge was known as 'the caller' (haqôrē) because of its song, and the spring may, therefore, have originally been known as 'partridge spring'. But if so, this place too gained a new significance because of Samson. 20 Led is lit. 'judged'; cf. 16:31 and see on 2:16–19.

16:1–22 Samson and Delilah. This passage begins with Samson going to Gaza by his own choice (1) and ends with him being taken there as a prisoner (21). The action develops around his relationships with two women: a nameless prostitute (1–3) and Delilah (4–22). Both women were probably Philistines, although this is never explicitly stated. With the prostitute it was simply a matter of lust, but with Delilah it was love—at least on Samson’s side (4). The first incident gives startling proof of his great strength; the second takes up the question of what the source of this strength is. In neither incident did Samson act rationally and purposefully, yet both resulted (eventually if not at once) in humiliating defeat for the Philistines (3, 23–30). It is clear, therefore, that although Samson appeared to be out of control, the Lord was still using him to achieve his purposes.

The incident with Delilah is particularly revealing, especially when Samson finally told her everything (17). Samson was not ignorant of his calling. He had known all along that he was a Nazirite and that the secret of his strength lay in his special relationship with God (his hair was merely a sign of this). But he had never been able fully to come to terms with his separateness. He had always secretly wanted to be as other men and to enjoy the pleasures that they enjoyed (a temptation that is surely common to Christians today). In Delilah he saw a chance, perhaps his last chance, for the happiness he had always wanted. In giving in to her request, Samson virtually invited Delilah to release him from his Naziriteship; to make him the ordinary man he had always wanted to be (17). But, paradoxically, the effect of this was simply to have him forcibly removed from where he wanted to be and placed back into the front line of conflict with the Philistines (20–21). The Lord withdrew from Samson only long enough for this to be achieved. The closing verse of the passage (his hair ... began to grow again; 22) points clearly to what was to come (23–30). Samson may have wanted to be as other men, but the Lord would not let him be, any more than he would let Israel be like other nations. Samson’s struggle against his calling was like the struggle of Israel as a whole.

Notes. 1 For Gaza see on 1:18; 3:3; 6:4. 2 If typical of this period, the city gate was an elaborate structure at least two storeys high, with guard rooms flanking a tunnel-like opening. Those waiting for Samson were indoors and probably asleep when he removed the doors (3). 3 Hebron was in the Judean hills 38 miles (60 km) east of Gaza. The particular hill where Samson put the doors was probably somewhere between the two (see on 1:10). 4 The Valley of Sorek (‘Vineyard Valley’; cf. 15:5) was about 13 miles (21 km) south-west of Jerusalem. 5 Eleven hundred shekels is about 28 lbs (13 kg); cf. 17:1, 3). 7 The fresh thongs (‘pieces of uncured gut’) were possibly bowstrings in the making (see the NIV mg.). 13. The most conspicuous sign of Samson’s separation to God as a Nazirite was his seven braids (cf. v 17). See on 13:5. The loom was a primitive kind, with its two upright posts fixed in the ground. A pin was a flat piece of wood for beating down the newly woven material to tighten it. 21 They gouged out his eyes to humiliate him and make him helpless (cf. 2 Ki. 25:7). They set him to grinding, probably at a hand mill. It is doubtful if the larger type of mill, normally turned by an ass, was known at this time.

16:23–31 Death and triumph in Gaza. The Samson story reaches a stunning climax in this final scene, as does the whole central section of the book. The fundamental problem with the Israelites throughout the whole period of the judges had been their fatal attraction to other gods (2:10–13). Samson’s great contribution to God’s purpose was to demonstrate, if only in his death, the total supremacy of the Lord (Yahweh) and the utter irrelevance of other gods (represented here by Dagon). In this, Samson’s achievement is not unlike that of Elijah on Mt. Carmel (1 Ki. 18:16–40).

There is great irony in the repeated claim that their god had given Samson into their hands (23–24), for in reality it was the Lord who had done so, precisely to bring about their downfall.

There is great sadness in Samson's prayer in v 28. Earlier he had asked for life (15:18–19); now he asked for death. Even in death his motives were not pure; he sought personal revenge rather than the glory of God. But at least he did at last do what he had been finally set apart to do, and the victory was unquestionably the Lord's. There would be more telling battles with the Philistines in the future, but the recognition that the Lord alone is God was the foundation on which Israel's future deliverance was to be built. Samson certainly made a significant beginning (see 13:5).

The Samson story, therefore, ends where it began, with Samson taken home and laid to rest by his sorrowing family. At least they could take comfort from the fact that his death had not been in vain, although we are undoubtedly in a better position to appreciate that than they were. For all his failings he was a forerunner of Jesus, who by his death brought down our great enemy and laid the foundation for a deliverance yet to be revealed in its fullness (Heb. 2:14–15; 1 Pet. 1:3–5).

Notes. 23 Dagon ('grain') was a Canaanite agricultural god, apparently adopted by the Philistines on their arrival. (See on 3:3.) There was also a Dagon temple at Ashdod according to 1 Sa. 5:1–5. 25 Perhaps Samson performed by being made to carry out feats of strength. 26 The type of temple is known from excavations in the area. The roof was supported by wooden pillars on stone bases. Dignitaries were below, in the temple itself, and common people watched from above. 28 Sovereign LORD is lit., 'my lord Yahweh'. The name 'Yahweh' is particularly associated with the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt and the covenant made with them at Sinai (Ex. 6:1–8; 20:2). Samson was praying as an Israelite, invoking the covenant relationship. As often in the OT, remember here implies action, not mere recollection (cf. Gn. 8:1; 19:29; Ex. 2:24). 31 For Zorah and Eshtaol see on 13:25.

17:1–18:31 Religious chaos: Micah and his shrine

As explained in the Introduction, this is the first of two stories which form the epilogue to the book. They both feature a Levite and are bound together by the refrain of 17:6, 18:1a, 19:1a and 21:25. They describe the religious and moral chaos that threatened to destroy Israel from within during the judges period, when Israel had no king and everyone did as he saw fit, or lit. 'what was right in his own eyes'.

17:1–13 The origin of Micah's idols

Micah enters the story as a self-confessed thief. The money he had stolen had been dedicated to God by his mother—to be made into idols! Apparently conscience stricken, Micah told her what he had done and returned it to her. She, for her part, was so relieved to have it back, that she uttered not one word of reproach, but instead blessed her son in the name of the Lord! But there is more absurdity to come. Comparison of v 3 with v 4 suggests that Micah's mother used only a fraction of the dedicated money for the purpose she had stipulated. What did she do with the rest? And Micah himself, when he became the proud owner of the new idols, was sure that the Lord would bless him because he had a Levite as his priest (13)! Just how wrong he was will quickly become apparent in the next chapter.

This opening scene is full of irony that arises mainly from the fact that the characters are apparently unaware of the incongruity of their words and actions. It illustrates perfectly the chaos that arises when everyone does whatever is right in his own eyes (6).

Notes. 1 Micah ('Who is like Yah[weh]?') is an ironical name indeed for an idolater! For the hill country of Ephraim see on 4:5. 2 Eleven hundred shekels was a large sum of money (see the NIV mg. and cf. 16:5). Micah's mother had dedicated the money to God (cf. Mk. 7:11). By implication this involved a curse (or 'oath') on anyone who misappropriated it. 3 For my son is, 'on behalf of my son'. The idols would have been made by a silversmith and the finished products given to Micah (4). Micah's mother apparently regarded the carved image and cast idol as objects of religious art and mistakenly aimed to honour the Lord with them. 5 For Micah's ephod, see on 8:22–27 (Gideon's ephod). 7 The young Levite was a member of the priestly tribe of Levi (Dt. 33:8–11). Only descendants of Aaron were supposed to be actual priests; the rest were to be assistants (Nu. 8:5–26). With no tribal territory of their own, they lived among the other tribes. Although allotted specific towns, they were not confined to these, especially in the chaotic conditions of the judges period. This Levite from Bethlehem in Judah was a descendant of Moses (18:30). See also on 19:1. 10 The Levite was to be my father, i.e. someone to whom Micah would look for guidance in religious matters (cf. 2 Ki. 6:21; 13:14). In all other respects, however, the Levite was more like a son to Micah than a father (11).

18:1–31 The subsequent history of Micah's idols

As we saw in the opening chapter of the book, the Danites were unable to gain full possession of their allotted territory in the south (1:34). Their migration to the far north, which is recounted here, probably took place quite early in the judges period (see note on v 12).

The second part of the Micah story consists of several scenes reflecting the movement of the Danites to and fro, and their encounters with various persons en route. There are two scenes involving the Levite whom Micah had recruited to be his priest. He was consulted by the Danite spies (3–6) and gave them a favourable oracle, and then agreed to abandon Micah and go with the Danites and serve them instead. In the scene which follows (22–26) Micah himself makes his final appearance, a pathetic broken man (24). In Laish, which the Danites rename, Micah's shrine is re-opened, as it were, on a new site and under new management (30–31). But the ominous words until the captivity of the land point to the fact that this shrine eventually suffered the same fate as the original one (see note on v 30).

The whole story is told with wry humour. There are many superficial similarities to Israel's original conquest of the land (Nu. 13–14; Dt. 1). But for all their show of strength, the Danites here were actually in retreat, withdrawing from their true inheritance under Canaanite pressure (see above). And Laish, in contrast to the fortified cities conquered by Joshua, was remote, quiet, unsuspecting and defenceless (27–28). The author's sympathies seem to lie more with the Danites' victims rather than with the Danites themselves.

In the end the story is more about Micah than the Danites. It is above all about the false confidence people have that they can manipulate God with religious objects and institutions. The Danites essentially made the same mistake as Micah, and their new shrine was doomed from the start, just as surely as Micah's was. Self-serving religion brings God's judgment, not his blessing (see especially 17:13).

Notes. 2 For Zorah and Eshtaol see on 13:2, 25. Clans is lit. the singular, 'clan', which appears to be equivalent to 'tribe' here (cf. vs 11, 19). Contrast 6:11. For the hill country of Ephraim see on 4:5. 7 Laish was in the far north of Canaan, 25 miles (40 km) due north of the Sea of Galilee. It was renamed 'Dan' by the Danites (29). The Sidonians (see on 3:3) lived on the Mediterranean coast where Lebanon is today. 11 For six hundred see on 3:31. 12 Kiriath Jearim ('city of forests') was in the hills about 8 miles (13 km) west of Jerusalem. Cf. Kiriath Sepher,

‘city of book[s]’, in 1:11. Mahaneh Dan means ‘camp of Dan’. It appears from 13:25 that the place was already known by this name in Samson’s day. It is likely, therefore, that Samson’s community was a small group of Danites who remained in the south after the bulk of the tribe had moved north. 14 For ephod cf. 17:5 and see on 8:27. The household gods (Heb., ṯrāp̄îm) were apparently small objects (Gn. 31:19) which, like the ephod, were used for divination [see Ezk. 21:21 (where ‘idols’ translates ṯrāp̄îm) and 2 Ki. 23:24]. 19 Be our father cf. 17:10. 21 The idea was to keep the warriors between their possessions (including what they had stolen) and anyone who might give chase. 28 The precise location of Beth Rehob is unknown, but see on v 7 and cf. Nu. 13:21. 29 Israel is used here as the alternative name for Jacob (Gn. 30:4–6; 32:8). 30 For Gershon see Ex. 2:22. The founding priest was the grandson of Moses. This gave the place great prestige and probably explains why Jeroboam I later chose it to be one of the two national shrines of the northern kingdom (1 Ki. 12:25–30). It remained, however, a centre of idolatry. The Hebrew text has a small ‘n’ (Heb. nun) inserted in the word ‘Moses’ to change it into ‘Manasseh’, the wicked king of that name (2 Ki. 21). This was done out of respect for Moses, but it is clear what the original reading was (see the NIV mg.). The captivity of the land is probably a reference to the final conquest of the northern kingdom by Assyria in 722 BC, especially since 2 Ki. 17 refers specifically to the deportation of priests at that time (27; cf. vs 1–6). 31 Shiloh was about 19 miles (30 km) north of Jerusalem. It was here that the Israelites first set up the Tent of Meeting after their arrival in Canaan (Jos. 18:1). By Samuel’s time this had been replaced by a more permanent building (1 Sa. 1:9, 24), but Shiloh and its sanctuary were later destroyed, probably by the Philistines (Jer. 7:12).

19:1–21:25 Moral chaos: the Levite and his concubine

This second major story unfolds in four episodes: the outrage in Gibeah (19:1–28); preparations for war: the Levite’s call and Israel’s response (19:29–20:11); the war itself (20:12–48); and post-war reconstruction: wives for the Benjamite survivors (21:1–25). The main action takes place in the third episode. The first two trace developments leading up to it, and the last deals with the consequences that flowed from it.

19:1–28 The outrage in Gibeah

Apart from triggering the main action which follows, this opening episode serves two major purposes. It shows us how debased even such a noble thing as hospitality had become in Israel in the judges period, and it throws significant light on the character of the Levite, who is to play a key role in episode 2.

There are two scenes here involving hospitality. The first, in Bethlehem (1–10), is normal enough, but the second, in Gibeah (11–28), is perverted and grotesque, with unmistakable similarities to the description of life in Sodom in Gn. 19:1–13. This is particularly ironical because the travellers had deliberately avoided pagan towns in order to seek hospitality with their fellow-Israelites (12–14). The rowdies in the streets of Gibeah were clearly morally bankrupt, but so too was the old man who opened his house to the travellers. It was this apparently model host whose perverted sense of duty led him to conceive the idea of casting two innocent women to the dogs (23–24). Here is moral bankruptcy indeed. When God’s people do whatever is right in their own eyes they are no better than Sodomites.

The Levite himself, however, is the most perverted of all. After having thrust out his concubine to the mob he retired to bed and apparently gave no further thought to her until he found her dead or unconscious on the doorstep in the morning. Then, with almost unbelievable callousness, he told her to get up because he was ready to go (27–28). This was the man who will summon all Israel to war in the next episode. In retrospect we can understand very well why his concubine found it impossible to live with him (see v 2 and note).

Notes. 1 For the hill country of Ephraim see on 4:5. Taking a concubine was a practice common in the ancient Near East and allowed under OT law (Ex. 21:7–11; cf. Gn. 16:2–5; 29:24, 29; Jdg. 8:31; 2 Sa. 5:13). A concubine was normally a second wife or a wife without a normal dowry and, therefore, of lower status. Contrast Jephthah’s mother, who was a prostitute (11:1). Bethlehem in Judah, the birthplace of Jesus, was 6 miles (9 km) south of Jerusalem. Cf. 17:7, and contrast the northern Bethlehem of 12:8. 2 Her unfaithfulness appears to have consisted solely in leaving her husband. There is no suggestion of relations with other men. 10 Jebus was the pre-Israelite name for Jerusalem. See v 11 and cf. 1:21. 12 Gibeah was 3 miles (5 km) north of Jerusalem, in the territory of Benjamin. See v 14 and cf. Jos. 18:28. Ramah was 2 miles (3 km) north of Gibeah. 18 The house of the LORD was presumably the sanctuary at Shiloh (see on 18:31). But the Septuagint (the ancient Greek version of the OT) has ‘my house’, which makes better sense in the context and may well represent the original reading.

19:29–21:25 The response to the outrage

19:29–20:11 Preparations for war. In the previous episode it was Israelite hospitality which came under scrutiny. In this one it is the ‘assembly’, an ad hoc meeting of representatives of the various tribes to deal with a matter of common concern (20:1; cf. 21:10, 13, 16). The assembly in this sense later became obsolete, but in the days before Israel had a king it was an important institution. The welfare, and in some cases the very existence of the nation, depended on its functioning effectively. Here the matter of national importance is the outrage committed at Gibeah, and the convenor of the assembly is the Levite of episode 1.

Irony is created by the fact that we, the readers, know more about both the convenor and the matter in hand than the members of the assembly do. To us the Levite’s dismemberment of his concubine and distribution of her parts is an extension of the cool callousness he showed towards her at Gibeah. To them it was an act of holy zeal. They were galvanized into action and came out as one man, from Dan to Beersheba (20:1). That is, the summons issued by this Levite elicited a response which far surpassed anything achieved by the judges raised up by the Lord.

Having called the assembly together, the Levite gave what was at best a distorted account of what had happened, designed totally to camouflage his complicity (cf. 20:5 with 19:25). In view of this, the high moral tone he adopted has a particularly hollow ring to it. It is not even clear that his concubine had died (as he implied) as a direct result of her rape in Gibeah (5b). She may have died at his own hand when he got her home (see 19:28 and comment).

For all this, the members of the assembly are just as impressed by the Levite’s speech as they were by his grisly summons. They arise as one man and decide at once on united punitive action against Gibeah (8–11). It may well have been that drastic action was called for, but what would become of Israel when its assembly could be convened and manipulated by a person of such dubious morals as this Levite? That is the serious question posed by this second episode.

Notes. 29 Cf. Saul’s later action in 1 Sa. 11:6–7. This was apparently a customary way of summoning league partners to action, with an implied threat for any who failed to respond. The difference here is that the victim is a human being (cf. Jephthah’s daughter, 11:34–40). The twelve parts represented the twelve tribes of Israel (cf. 1 Ki. 11:29–31). 20:1 For Dan see on 18:7. Beersheba (‘well of the seven’; see Gn. 21:31) was 48 miles (76 km) south of Jerusalem, midway between the coast and the Dead Sea. From Dan to Beersheba means ‘from the far north to the far south’. For Gilead see on 5:17. Mizpah (‘watchtower’) was 8 miles (13 km) north of Jerusalem (Jos. 18:26; 1 Sa. 7:5). It is not the Mizpah in Gilead of 10:17. 2 For four hundred thousand see on 5:8. 9 Objects were cast on the ground or drawn from a container as a means of seeking guidance from God (cf. Jos. 18:6; Pr. 16:33). 10 Again the numbers seem too large, and the explanation for ‘thousand’ given in the note on 5:8 does not work so well here. Possibly only the first part (ten ... out of every hundred) is original. The essential idea is that ten percent of the men were set aside to act as a supply company for the rest.

20:12–48 The war itself. The outcome of the assembly in the previous episode was a holy war, which in many ways recalls the campaign against Ai in Joshua’s time (see on vs 29 and 48). Holy war is something we have witnessed repeatedly throughout the book of Judges, but there are disturbing differences here. The enquiry in v 18 (‘Who of us shall go first?’) recalls the opening enquiry of the book (1:1), and it receives the same reply. But how different the circumstances! There it was a united Israel waging a war of occupation against the Canaanites. Here it is a divided Israel, fighting a civil war in which brother is pitted against brother (28). There victory was given at once (1:4). Here it is withheld until Israel is thoroughly broken and demoralized (26–28). Indeed, the ‘holy’ war of this chapter scarcely rates as such. It was decided on at an assembly convened by a man of bad character, and it concluded in a bloodbath that reeked more of vengeful excess than of justice (see again on v 48).

Most of the space in vs 18–48 is devoted to a description of the fighting, with the fluctuating fortunes of the opposing sides. But the three enquiries (by the Israelites) and responses (by the Lord) in vs 18, 23, and 28 let us see what was going on at a deeper level. They show us what was happening in the minds of the Israelites and between them and the Lord as the war proceeded through its various phases. The Israelites were confident about the rightness and eventual outcome of their cause (18). They were already committed to the war, and the Lord’s approval was assumed. They therefore raised a purely procedural matter: how was the campaign to be conducted? The Lord commanded Judah to go first, appropriately so since the ravished concubine was from Judah (19:1). But there was no promise of victory and none materialized; quite the reverse (19–21). The second enquiry (23) shows the drastic loss of confidence the enquirers had suffered as a result of their disastrous defeat. They were doubtful about the wisdom of continuing the war, and struck a conciliatory note by referring to the Benjamites as their ‘brothers’. But the Lord sent them into battle again—to another resounding defeat (23b–25). After their first setback they had wept; now they wept and fasted and offered sacrifices. They explicitly asked whether they should desist—a possibility which clearly loomed very large in their minds (28). Again they were sent back to the fight, but now at last with a promise of victory. In the ensuing battle the fortunes of the two sides were suddenly reversed when the Lord intervened on the side of ‘Israel’, which was thereby saved from dissolution (35).

The Benjamites undoubtedly deserved to be punished. But the moral and spiritual state of the nation as a whole was such that holy war almost destroyed it instead of preserving it. In this third episode the Lord appears to be as angry with the rest of Israel as he is with the Benjamites, and he shows it by distributing defeat and victory in such a way that the whole of Israel is judged. He is both the judge and preserver of his wayward people.

Notes. 15 For twenty-six thousand see on 5:8. 16 Ehud, also a Benjamite, was left-handed (see 3:15 and note). 18 Since Bethel means ‘house of God’, it could be that the place referred to here is the Tent of Meeting at Shiloh (see on 19:18). But the earlier references to the town Bethel make it probable that it is that same town that is on view here (cf. v 26, and see on 1:22; 2:1;

4:5). For enquired of God see on 1:1. 26 Weeping and fasting were acts of repentance (cf. 2:4). They had concluded from what happened that the Lord was angry with them. The burnt offering (see Lv. 1) symbolized the complete consecration of the offerer to God. Fellowship offerings (see Lv. 3), which included a meal, symbolized restored fellowship with God and with one another. 27 In this period the ark was sometimes moved from the central sanctuary, especially in wartime (cf. 1 Sa. 4:4–5 where, as here, the central sanctuary was at Shiloh). See on 18:31 and 19:18. 28 Phinehas here, is the grandson of Aaron (Ex. 6:25), not the later Phinehas of 1 Sa. 4:4. The name is of Egyptian origin. Cf. Jonathan, the grandson of Moses in 18:30. If these genealogies are taken at face value (and there is no good reason to do otherwise) the events recorded in chs. 17–21 evidently took place quite early in the judges period. 29 Cf. the tactics used against Ai in Joshua's day (Jos. 8:3–8). 33 The exact location of Baal Tamar is unknown. 35 Possibly the original sense of 25,100 was 'twenty-five contingents, one hundred men'. Cf. the thirty casualties of v 39. This verse is an anticipatory summary of the fuller account given in vs 36b–46. 45 The rock of Rimmon was a limestone outcrop about 4 miles (6 km) east of Bethel, cut off by ravines on three sides and with caves where the fugitives could hide. The name survives in the modern village of Rammun. The location of Gidom is unknown. 47 On the interpretation of the numbers I have advocated, six hundred men would have been the bulk of the Benjamite force (see on vs 15, 35). 48 In holy war (war waged at the Lord's direct command) the Israelites were sometimes told not to take any loot but to destroy everything as a way of offering it to God. This was known as the 'ban'. It was also an extreme form of divine judgment on Israel's enemies (Jos. 6:21; 1 Sa. 15:1–3) and, in certain circumstances, on Israelites themselves (Dt. 13:12–18). Here it is applied without any specific instruction from the Lord to do so.

21:1–25 Rehabilitation of the surviving Benjamites. In this final episode, attention swings back to the workings of the tribal assembly (see above on 19:29–20:11). The two oaths sworn at Mizpah (1, 5b) were intended to stop the evil committed by the Benjamites from contaminating the whole nation and to ensure full participation by the other tribes in the punitive action that was required. But the excessive slaughter of 20:48 had now produced an unexpected result: the entire tribe of Benjamin was threatened with extinction.

The first attempt to deal with the problem (it was only partly successful) is a clear case of using one oath to circumvent another (6–13). It was a manoeuvre that was legally justifiable, but morally dubious to say the least, and a terrible price was paid by the people of Jabesh Gilead (11). The second (15–23) has exactly the same character. The justification given in v 22 was a clever piece of casuistry which entirely avoided the moral issues involved. The same men who had been so outraged at the rape of the Levite's concubine now asked the men of Shiloh meekly to accept the rape of their daughters as a fait accompli.

The following ironical pattern emerges: (a) the rape of the concubine; (b) holy war against Benjamin; (c) problem: the oath—Benjamin threatened with extinction; (b¹) 'holy' war against Jabesh Gilead; (a¹) the rape of the daughters of Shiloh.

The behaviour of the assembly in this episode again shows us just how morally and spiritually bankrupt Israel had become. But in spite of this the story finally moves to a point of fragile equilibrium, with the Benjamites rehabilitated and calm restored (23–24). Amazingly, Israel has survived, but looking back we must conclude that this was due much more to God's overruling than to the performance of its leaders and its institutions. Israel's survival in the chaotic period of the judges was a miracle of God's grace, as salvation always is (Eph. 2:8).

Notes. 1 For Mizpah see on 20:1. 2 For Bethel see on 20:18. 4 The altar was built, not at Bethel, where an altar already stood (20:26), but the next day, back at Mizpah, their base camp (20:1). Ad hoc altars of this kind were sometimes built in times of national peril or rejoicing, especially before or after a battle (cf. Ex. 20:24–25; 1 Sa. 14:35). For burnt offerings and fellowship offerings see on 20:26. 5 The RSV is more accurate with ‘did not come up in the assembly’. The reference is to the initial assembly of 20:1. 8 Jabesh Gilead was a town just east of the Jordan River, about 22 miles (35 km) south of the Sea of Galilee. The absence of representatives from Jabesh Gilead was conspicuous, since men had come from other parts of Gilead (20:1). 9 This count confirmed what the leaders had only vaguely been aware of, that there had been no representatives from Jabesh Gilead at the earlier assembly either (see on v 5). 10 For twelve thousand see on 5:8. For put to the sword ... women and children see on 20:48. 11 The virgins were spared. The leaders may have had in mind the precedent that had been set in the campaign against the Midianites in Moses’ time (see Nu. 31, especially v 17). 12 Mizpah had been the base camp during the war itself (20:1; 21:1). Shiloh, which was further north, was closer to Jabesh Gilead and, therefore, a more convenient place for receiving and transferring the virgins (see on 18:31). In Canaan means west of the Jordan, in Canaan proper. Cf. the further details about Shiloh’s location in v 19b. These were probably added in the final stages of the book’s composition for the sake of readers who lived long after Shiloh had been destroyed. Again, see on 18:31. 19 1 Sa. 1:3. Ex. 13:14 prescribe three such festivals, but in the chaotic conditions of the judges period it should not surprise us that only one was observed. The detailed description of Shiloh’s location is puzzling, but see on v 12. For Bethel see on 4:5. For Shechem see on 9:1. Lebonah was 3 miles (5 km) west of Shiloh (see on 18:31). 21 The festival was probably a corrupt, semi-pagan form of the Feast of Tabernacles, which was held at the time of the grape harvest (Dt. 16:13–15). See also on 9:27 and 8:33. 22 During the war, i.e. during the campaign against Jabesh Gilead. But the earliest form of the text can equally be translated ‘by war’ (i.e. ‘by force’). 23 Their inheritance (cf. v 24) was the land allotted to them after the initial conquest of Canaan (Jos. 14:1; 18:11–27).

Introduction

It is not difficult to account for the appeal of this short book. As an example of storytelling alone it has outstanding merit, with its symmetry of form and vivid characterization, but above all it is a book with a message. When Naomi was finding life bleak and pointless, Ruth chose to stand by her mother-in-law rather than leave the older widow to face the journey into the future all alone. Tragedy in Moab led to a happy ending in Bethlehem, and selfless loyalty was rewarded. God overruled events to bring love and security to those who trusted him, while at the same time weaving their lives into his purpose for the world. God remained hidden, but was nevertheless at work in the ordinary affairs of daily life, fulfilling his promises to his people.

Many attempts have been made to classify the book of Ruth according to the categories of modern European literature. It has been regarded in turn as a novella, an idyll and a historical novel, all of which imply a large fictional element. In an attempt to set the book against a Near Eastern background, other scholars have suggested that it had its origins in cultic mythology, but without producing convincing evidence. The book itself, with its opening words, 'In the days when the judges ruled', and its concluding genealogy ending with King David, imply historical and verifiable events. True, it deals with an ordinary family and not with the exploits of the great, but the link between Ruth the Moabitess and King David is not likely to have been invented, for it did nothing to enhance his standing in Israel. Though the writer took great pains to make his book a work of art, he evidently intended it to be accepted as historical. It is a true story, beautifully told, after the style of the patriarchal narratives, where some of the same themes occur, such as famine, exile and return, and childlessness, through which God makes himself known.

Authorship and date

The book offers no indication of the identity of its author. The Talmud (c. AD 200) attributes it to Samuel, but Samuel died before David became king (1 Sa. 28:3), and the book implies that the kingship of David was well known. The period of the judges is referred to as a past era, and the necessity of explaining the shoe ceremony in 4:7 indicates that some time elapsed before the events were recorded. A scribe at the court of Solomon would have had access to the royal archives, and the period which saw literature and the arts flourishing might well have produced this artistic gem. Several recent scholars have detected a female perspective in the book which has suggested to them that the author was a woman. In a society dominated by men it is significant that the book should have been written about two women, whose initiatives brought about the action, and whose faith was rewarded. In God's providence their lives even played a part in preparing for the coming of the Saviour (Mt. 1:5; Lk. 3:32). Whoever wrote the book was in tune with God's revealed purpose of blessing 'all peoples on earth' (Gn. 12:3), and had lived long enough to recognize God's working in human lives. Few writers have been more successful in making goodness attractive.

The date of writing is also difficult to establish. It could be at any point between the reign of David (c. 1000 BC) and the book's acceptance into the canon of Scripture in the second century BC. The era much favoured during this century has been the post-exilic period, especially the fifth or fourth century BC, when the book could have been a protest against the narrow nationalism of Ezra and Nehemiah. The presence of Aramaic words in the Hebrew was thought to support a late date, but more recent studies have questioned the force of this argument. The book shows no sign of being 'protest literature', and study of the language has been used to show that its classical Hebrew is likely to be pre-exilic (i.e. seventh century at the latest). It seems likely that the writer lived long enough after the events he recorded to see them in perspective, perhaps during the reign of Solomon. One tentative suggestion is that the prophet Nathan could have been the author. He left records of David's reign (1 Ch. 29:29), fearlessly challenged the king's personal life (2 Sa. 12:1–12), and yet was willing later to support Bathsheba (1 Ki. 1:11–53).

Place in the canon

The book of Ruth was treasured as Scripture in both Jewish and Christian circles, and was included in official lists of scriptural books when the church began to compile these in the second century AD. The references in the gospels (Mt.1:5; Lk. 3:32) show that Ruth was regarded as authoritative when they were written.

In our English Bibles Ruth follows Judges, as it does in the LXX and Vulgate translations. In printed Hebrew Bibles, however, Ruth appears in the third division, the Writings, where it is the second of the five scrolls which were used liturgically in the synagogue by the sixth century AD. The Song of Songs was the first because it was used at Passover; Ruth was used at Pentecost. The Babylonian Talmud, which is older than the sixth century, began the Writings with Ruth, followed by the Psalms. Other texts have Ruth as the first of the five scrolls because it belongs first chronologically. Evidently the book was first placed among the Writings and was later transferred to the position where it belongs historically, between Judges and Samuel.

Themes

Famine is the circumstance that caused an Israelite family to migrate to alien Moab. Famine was a recurring event in patriarchal times, causing Jacob and his sons to migrate to Egypt. Enslaved and oppressed, they experienced God's deliverance, an event remembered annually at Passover (Ex. 12:1–29). In the book of Ruth the same God came to the aid of two needy women, demonstrating his power to bring good out of sorrow, life out of death.

Marriage is another theme central to the book. It was central in Naomi's thinking. While she regarded herself as too old for marriage, for her daughters-in-law it was a priority which she urged them to pursue (1:9). The birth of a grandson would give her new zest for life and if, by God's providence, he could be legally accepted as Elimelech's heir then her joy would be complete. Ruth, the young widow from Moab who had thrown in her lot with her mother-in-law and had embraced the faith of Israel, assumed that remarriage was not only right and proper but also her express duty. In order that she could provide for Naomi, she needed a husband who would accept Naomi as a member of the family. For that reason her story had to be a love story with a difference, but under Naomi's guidance it turned out to be even more unusual. She might have married an eligible young man of her own generation, but that would not have solved Naomi's problem over the family property, nor would it have given an heir to Elimelech. By marrying into her late husband's family, Ruth brought security into Naomi's life as well as into her own. Her selfless love mirrored that of the God of Israel, in whom she had put her trust.

The two women dominate the story, but Boaz, a close relative of Elimelech, also had to be willing for new responsibilities. Not only was Naomi expecting him to marry the widow of Mahlon, his relative who had died in Moab, but also to buy property which might not in the end be his. The legal provision favoured the family which had been bereft, ensuring that a son born of the marriage would inherit Elimelech's property and continue his line. The nearer relative to whom Boaz put the proposition rejected it on the grounds that it endangered his own estate (4:6). Boaz large-heartedly accepted the family responsibility, though it was costly, to the unqualified approval of the elders and people of Bethlehem, who prayed for God's blessing to prosper his standing in the community and give children to Ruth.

By the end of the story those prayers were answered more fully than any of the participants could have imagined. Israel's felt need of a king was to be met after Saul's death through David, a grandson of the boy called Obed who was born to Ruth and Boaz. David, for all his faults, established the kingdom, built Jerusalem, and inspired visions of the ideal king to come. God took the love and obedience of Naomi, Ruth and Boaz, and wove it into his eternal purpose to show 'love to a thousand [generations] of those who love me and keep my commandments' (Dt. 5:10). The Messiah was indeed born into this same family (Mt. 1:5–6, 16; Lk. 3:23–31).

A further theme, implicit in all that has been written thus far, is God's providential ordering of human life. The author of Ruth could see part of God's purpose for human history being fulfilled in David; the Christian reader can fit the part into the whole, for God was executing a plan to redeem humankind through great David's greater son. The author of Ruth was also aware of God's hand upon the personal circumstances of families and individuals, encouraging them to look back over events and to trace the mysterious outworking of God's overflowing goodness in their lives. The events speak for themselves. In personal life and in history God was working out his good purpose.

Commentary

1:1–22 Return to Bethlehem

1:1–7 The scene is set

The opening words refer to the historical period described in the book of Judges (roughly 1250–1050 BC), which ends, ‘In those days Israel had no king; everyone did as he saw fit’ (Jdg. 21:25). The book of Ruth ends with the words, ‘Jesse the father of David’, and it was David who fulfilled Israel’s felt need of a king. Bethlehem in Judah, as opposed to Bethlehem in Zebulun (Jos. 19:15), is called Ephrath in Gn. 35:19; the name survived in Ephrathites (2). Bethlehem means ‘house of bread’ and the name reflects the fertility of its fields and orchards. But even in Bethlehem famine struck the community and caused one family to migrate for a while to Moab. From Bethlehem it is possible to see the hills of Moab on the horizon to the east, across the Dead Sea. Though near geographically it was not friendly territory. The Moabites were descended from Lot (Gn. 19:27) and so were distant relations of Israel, but they had been hostile when the Israelites had approached from Egypt after the exodus (Nu. 21:29). Early in the period of the judges Eglon King of Moab had invaded and dominated the Israelites for eighteen years (Jdg. 3:14).

Elimelech decided to move to Moab. For his wife, Naomi, the eventual outcome of the move was tragic. First, she lost her husband, and later her two sons. Their residence in Moab, meant to be temporary, lasted ten years and at the end of it Naomi was bereft both of a means of livelihood and of hope for the future.

The turning point came when she heard that the LORD had come to the aid of his people by providing food for them. She prepared to return, a recurring verb in the chapter. In Hebrew the same verb is used for ‘repent’, and in returning home Naomi was demonstrating a change of mind, a ‘repentance’. Her daughters-in-law, Ruth and Orpah, set out with Naomi, feeling duty-bound as close relatives to accompany her. The familiar pattern of behaviour of the old patriarchs was being repeated. Abraham and Isaac had both left in times of famine, only to return later when food was available again.

1:8–18 Far-reaching decisions

The storyteller has set the scene, but from this point on the characters speak for themselves. Naomi, taking nothing for granted, urged her two daughters-in-law to return to their parental homes in Moab. They may have been in their late teens or early twenties, and Naomi took a motherly interest in seeking what was best for them. They had both been loving wives, and Naomi appreciated their affection for her, hence her prayer, May the LORD show kindness to you. Her hope was that his providential care would lead each of them to a second marriage. The kindness of the Lord bound Israel in a special relationship to God (see the note at the end of the chapter), but Naomi did not hesitate to pray that it should be extended to these two girls from Moab. She could have had in mind the Lord’s promise to Abraham that all the peoples of the earth should be blessed through him (Gn. 12:3). Love, security and a home are among the blessings the Lord provides. Naomi’s advice, Return home, my daughters, was sound common sense (11–13), though it was to her own disadvantage. The Lord’s hand has gone out against me sums up her reading of events.

Naomi saw the famine, the consequent migration to Moab and the death, first of her husband and then of her sons, as signs of divine displeasure with her personally. That is why it was so bitter an experience. If she had thought blind fate ordered her life, she would have accepted her situation with passive resignation. As it was, by accusing God she declared her faith that he was ultimately the one who overruled events and since he was also the God who intended to bless, Naomi found hope even in the depths of despair.

Orpah left and is heard of no more, but Ruth clung to Naomi. The verb is the same as that used of marriage in Gn. 2:24, ‘Therefore shall a man ... cleave unto his wife’ (RV). Ruth, in total commitment, put care for Naomi before her own interests. Love ‘is not self-seeking’ (1 Cor. 13:4). The reader is caught up in the drama, wanting to find out how things turned out for Ruth, who took the risk of accompanying her mother-in-law.

Naomi did not accept Ruth’s decision without a protest. It was natural that parents and religious upbringing should exert a powerful attraction, but Naomi’s protest called forth the most sublime response. Ruth’s mind was made up, Where you go I will go. Naomi’s well-being was her first concern, though that involved emigration from her homeland, leaving her parents who were still living (2:11), and settling among strangers. From this point on Naomi’s people would be her people, though Ruth had no certainty that she would find acceptance. Most significant of all Ruth declared Naomi’s God to be her God. Her resolve was total, extending even to death, and confirmed on oath in the name of her new-found Lord. Ruth’s declaration forms the climax of this chapter. The author no doubt hoped that readers would follow her example.

1:19–22 The homecoming

The arrival of Naomi caused a stir of interest and excitement in Bethlehem, especially among the women. Their question suggests that they hardly recognized her because she was so changed, but also that they were overjoyed to see her again. Naomi quickly cut short any celebration by revealing the depth of her despair. Overcome by memories of past happiness in Bethlehem she could not bear to be called Naomi (which means ‘pleasant’ or ‘lovely’). Far more appropriate in her view was Mara (meaning ‘bitter’), and she blamed the Almighty (Shaddai) for her bitter experiences. He it was who had promised a great destiny to Abraham (Gn. 17:1). He ruled over the cosmic order (Jb. 34:12–13) and so it followed that he must have been responsible for the tragedy that had overtaken her. I went away full, happily married and blessed with two sons, but the Lord has brought me back empty, bereft of my source of happiness. The Lord who gave, and whose characteristic it is to give, had inexplicably taken away her loved ones. Moreover, she interpreted his action as a sign of his displeasure, for the LORD has afflicted me means ‘has testified against me’ (NIV mg.), as if in a court of law.

Some stylistic devices in the last three verses call for comment. The deliberate pattern in the use of the divine names, the Almighty ... the LORD ... the LORD ... the Almighty, lays great stress on the sovereign rule of God over human affairs, and yet he is the LORD who had revealed his loving purposes to Abraham. Because he is in control there is an implied hope, a hint of a better future. The narrator rounds off the first episode with a summary that looks both backwards and forwards. Naomi returned looks back by repeating a key verb in the chapter, whereas mention of her daughter-in-law indicates that Ruth will take centre stage in the next scene. The final words of the chapter, as the barley harvest was beginning, not only anticipate the next episode, but also match the time note in 1:1, so completing a kind of bracket round the first chapter of the narrative.

Note. 8 There is more to the word kindness than the reader might suspect. It translates the Hebrew word hesed, here and in 2:20 and 3:10. Supremely it is the characteristic of God himself in his dealings with those who are his people. Sometimes (e.g. Ex. 15:13) it is translated ‘unfailing love’ and the word conveys the Lord’s faithfulness to his covenant promises (Dt. 7:9). People who have experienced the Lord’s hesed are intended to reflect the same loving care in their relationships with others. Ruth the Moabitess is said to have done so (3:10), because of her selfless loyalty to Naomi and because, by declaring Naomi’s God to be her God, she entered into the sphere of his blessing. By the same route, other non-Israelites were able to know for themselves the Lord’s hesed, for he is ‘rich in love ... he has compassion on all he has made’ (Ps. 145:8–9). Supremely that steadfast love was revealed in Christ and is a secure basis for Christians’ trust in the God of Naomi and Ruth today.

2:1–23 Ruth finds favour

2:1–3 Family connections

At this point the narrator skilfully introduces the fact that a relative of Elimelech was still living in Bethlehem. Naomi knew of him but determined not to ask him for support, though he was a man of standing who could have helped her. The immediate need was food. It was humiliating to be reduced to such poverty, but because it was harvest time there was a means of self-help. God’s law stipulated that farmers were not to harvest the corners of their fields, but leave grain for the poor to collect (Lv. 19:9; 23:22). Special blessing would follow from this generous action (Dt. 24:19). Ruth decided to take advantage of this provision, but guessed that not all farmers would welcome people foraging on their land, especially a foreigner. She wanted to go where she would find favour. Though she knew nothing about any near relatives of her father-in-law, she ‘happened’ to choose to glean in a field belonging to Boaz, who was from the clan of Elimelech. The repetition of these words which occur in v 1 underlines their importance. Her choice of field was no accident; God had been her unseen guide as subsequent events were to prove.

2:4–17 Unexpected kindness

The landlord arrived and greeted his workforce with words which we associate more with church than with our place of work. The LORD be with you!, words familiar to many Christians, are used only here in this exact form. The usual greeting was ‘Peace’ (šālôm). Boaz and his farm workers acknowledged their dependence on the Lord for a good harvest. He wanted to know who the newcomer was and the foreman gave the Moabitess a good testimonial. She had three recommendations that had won her respect. She had come with Naomi, she had asked permission to pick up what the reapers left, and she had worked on steadily though gleaning was discouragingly unrewarding.

Boaz turned approvingly to Ruth, urging her to remain in his fields, and promising her special protection. He included her among his servant girls, gave orders that the young men were to respect her, and gave her permission to get a drink from the water jars. Unusually, these are said to be filled by the men. This farm seems to have been run on distinctive lines. Instead of being regarded with suspicion Ruth was accepted. She took nothing for granted but by bowing low indicated how grateful she was. Why should the farmer be so kind to her? The answer was that her reputation had gone ahead of her. The people of Bethlehem recognized goodness in action and approved of Ruth’s courage in accompanying Naomi. With May the Lord repay you Boaz was expressing more than a pious wish. Aware of Ruth’s self-sacrifice Boaz wanted her to be richly rewarded so that her faith would be strengthened by seeing all her needs met. Such was the promise to those who took God at his word (Dt. 5:10). God’s people loved to liken God’s protecting care to that of a bird spreading its wings over its chicks (cf. Pss. 17:8; 36:7). Jesus’ use of the same metaphor has reinforced its message (Mt. 23:37). Ruth’s reply amply expressed her gratitude, but she kept her distance by calling Boaz my lord (‘sir’) and referring to herself as his servant, so indicating her lowly status.

At mealtime Boaz singled her out again, inviting her to share the food provided for the reapers. He even served her with roasted grain, some of which Ruth saved to take back for Naomi. As she got up to start work again, Boaz gave orders that she should be allowed to collect grain from the sheaves (the norm was for the sheaves to be protected from gleaners). The reapers were told deliberately to drop grain for her to pick up. The result was that Ruth finished the day with far more to show for her work than she had dared hope to glean. One estimate is that it was the equivalent of at least half a month’s wages.

2:18–23 News and food to share

Ruth’s huge load of barley enabled Naomi to see at a glance that all had gone well. Someone must have been extra generous, hence her excited questions and her invocation of blessing on Ruth’s benefactor. For the third time in two verses Naomi is referred to as Ruth’s mother-in-law, as though to suggest that the relationship had special importance. Ruth’s disclosure of the name Boaz revealed that there was indeed a family connection, and family relationships, ‘daughter’, ‘mother-in-law’, continue to be mentioned in subsequent conversations between Naomi and Ruth. Naomi’s prayer became more specific now. She instantly foresaw possible developments. He has not stopped showing his kindness could refer to Boaz, but Naomi is thinking of the Lord’s providence in guiding Ruth to the field of Boaz. This was evidence of the Lord’s covenant love (hesed) to the dead Elimelech and his son through their widows. Though related by marriage and not by blood, they were fully included in the family. But there was more. Boaz was not only a close relative but also one of our kinsman-redeemers (see note below).

Israel’s family law made careful provision for members of a clan who fell on hard times, so protecting the continuance of the kin group. Boaz was one of those to whom Naomi was entitled to look for support but there were several ways in which protection could be given and Naomi did not specify what she had in mind. Ruth added to their elation by disclosing that Boaz had invited her to accompany his workers until harvesting was finished in a couple of months’ time. They need have no worry about the immediate future and during the harvest season Ruth would become part of the community in Bethlehem.

There have been several significant emphases in this chapter. The good character of Ruth was pointed out by the foreman (7) and enlarged upon by Boaz (11) who included her among his workers and saw she had plenty of food to take home with her. Ruth felt she belonged on this farm and gratefully accepted all that was so kindly offered. Both the giving and the receiving were aspects of a developing relationship, a growing in understanding of God’s ways. Naomi, by calling Ruth her daughter, pointed to a closeness between them. Ruth stayed close to the servant girls (23). The verb used here and in vs 8 and 21 (‘stay with’) is the same as that used of the marriage bond in Gn. 2:24 (translated ‘cleave’ in the AV, RV and RSV). It occurs in 1:14 concerning Ruth’s commitment to Naomi. The author is pointing to the secret of ‘togetherness’, of loyalty that results in cohesion in a family and in society. It should especially characterize the people of God.

Note. 20 Kinsman-redeemer. Strong family ties in Israel meant that the verb ‘redeem’ was in common use; it belonged to the realm of family law. Each member of a family or clan had an obligation to defend and provide for any other who was destitute or a victim of injustice. The redeemer of property was to buy back land a relative had sold in time of need (Lv. 25:25), thus keeping it within the family. If someone sold himself into slavery, his nearest relative was to buy his freedom (Lv. 25:47–55). A redeemer also had the duty of avenging a murder (Nu. 35:19; Dt. 19:6). The book of Ruth extends his duties to providing an heir for a male relative who has died childless. Usually this duty fell to a brother (Dt. 25:5–10), but in the case of Ruth who had no brothers-in-law, a more distant relative was expected to marry her, as Naomi revealed (ch. 3).

When the OT asserted that Yahweh was Israel’s redeemer, the events of the exodus were to the fore: ‘I will redeem you with an outstretched arm’ (Ex. 6:6); ‘In your unfailing love you will lead the people you have redeemed’ (Ex. 15:13). Yahweh declared himself to be Israel’s divine Kinsman, ready to deliver and help them (Is. 41:14). The special contribution of the book of Ruth is the insight that the near kinsman alone possessed the right to redeem, and yet was under no obligation to do so. The willingness of Boaz to undertake a costly duty foreshadowed that of the greater Redeemer, who was to descend from him.

3:1–18 Faith, resolve and action

3:1–6 Naomi’s plan

In OT times marriage was arranged by parents, so it was fitting that Naomi should take steps to find a home and security for Ruth. Some weeks had passed, because harvesting was over and threshing was in progress. Naomi had been giving careful thought to the best approach to Boaz in his capacity as a near relative. Her hope was that he would accept responsibility as their kinsman-redeemer by marrying Ruth. But, kind as he had been, Boaz had not made any move towards marriage, hence Naomi's decision to put on the pressure. Her plans were to involve considerable courage on Ruth's part.

Ruth was to wash and change so as to be at her best for this important evening. Her perfume would be alluring when the darkness blotted out all sight of her attire. Threshing-floors were usually high up to catch the full benefit of the breeze, but wind gaps could sometimes provide similar conditions at lower levels. Ruth was to remain undetected but at the same time she was to be sure to identify where Boaz chose to spend the night. When all was still she was to approach, secretly remove the covering from the feet of Boaz and lie near them. When he woke up Ruth was to present her plea. Despite the risk of rebuff and rejection Ruth carried out the plan of her mother-in-law.

3:7–15 The midnight meeting

After the traditional feasting at the threshing floor Boaz retired for the night in good humour. Providentially he chose to lie down at the far end of the grain pile where there would be a little privacy. The far end may also imply a possible approach route for thieves, against whom Boaz set himself as guard. Once he had fallen asleep Ruth took up her position at his feet, the place of submission, and waited. In the middle of the night Boaz awoke and at this point the story becomes intensely gripping. How will these two worthy people conduct themselves in so compromising a situation? Boaz became aware of a woman's presence but could not identify her. His stark question was, therefore, to be expected. Ruth's reply, though respectful, was not deferential as it had been in 2:10, 13. She spoke in her own right, and took the courage to request Boaz to act as kinsman-redeemer and marry her. That is the significance of the words, Spread the corner of your garment over me. The word for corner is the same as that for 'wing' in 2:12. Ruth reminded Boaz of his own words, and requested him to become the fulfiller of his own prayer. 'Spreading the cloak over' was a vivid expression for providing protection, warmth and fellowship. The phrase spoke eloquently of marriage.

There was no hesitation in the response of Boaz. Ruth could let go of her fears for no rebuke was forthcoming. Instead, she received a blessing and acceptance as a 'daughter' in the family. No longer was she a stranger or foreigner. Boaz realized that Ruth was primarily concerned for Naomi's future. It would have been natural for Ruth to have sought a husband of her own age rather than someone old enough to be her father. He had observed her reticence and respected her for it. He could do all she asked without incurring blame because the whole community had come to appreciate Ruth's integrity. But first he had to confront a relative who had a prior claim to the role of kinsman-redeemer. Why had this man not been mentioned before? The answer can only be surmised, but it seems likely that Naomi, if she knew of the man, had already decided that he was unlikely to take on any extra responsibilities. Boaz would put the matter to the test. Meanwhile Ruth was to remain at his feet till the morning, despite the possible danger of prying eyes. Boaz had nothing to hide, and within a few hours the public hearing of the legal case would be over and settled.

Ruth left, however, as soon as it was light enough to see her way. Once again Boaz made sure she had a generous gift of food, tied conveniently into the woven shawl she was wearing.

The six measures can no longer be exactly quantified. No doubt Boaz gave Ruth as large a gift as she could carry.

3:16–18 More encouragements for Naomi

Naomi, eagerly awaiting Ruth's return, knew from the load she was carrying that Ruth had good news. Boaz continued to show generosity to Naomi, your mother-in-law. Still the emphasis is on family relationships, which undergird the action of the story, and it continues in v 18: Wait, my daughter. There was still a period of suspense before the drama ended. Fortunately, the legal process could begin immediately, and its outcome would be known before the day was over.

4:1–22 The marriage and its outcome

4:1–12 A marriage is arranged

The main gate of the town served as the local law court. Planned with an open space around which benches provided places to sit in the shade of the high walls, the gate was a natural meeting place. It had the advantage of being open to the public, who could observe that justice was done. Boaz knew that his relative would be sure to go through the gate to work and the relative, who remains unnamed, would be prepared for some serious business when he was invited to sit down. The ten elders of the town, chosen at random, roughly correspond to the jury in English law. Responsible adults were presumed to be competent to discern what was just. In Bethlehem these elders represented the community in which the legal decision had to be carried out. Their approval was essential and the seated group of twelve constituted the court of law.

Boaz first broached the matter of property. Elimelech had been the owner of property, which would have been handed on to his sons, had they lived. It is unlikely that Naomi, the widow, would have had the right of inheritance, but she was probably selling the land on behalf of her sons. During the family's absence in Moab someone else would have been responsible for the land, but now that the harvest had been reaped the time had come for Naomi to negotiate the best possible outcome. In particular, she would want to keep the land in the family, hence her appeal to a relative. Boaz, aware of all that was involved, put the option clearly to the nearer relative, stating that if he would not redeem the land then Boaz would. Only when the reply comes, I will redeem it is the more crucial subject broached.

Elimelech had a right to an heir. Ruth the Moabitess, his daughter-in-law, was still living, and the man who bought the field had the duty of raising an heir for the dead man through her. If a son were born, the land would revert to him and Elimelech's property would remain in his family. The kinsman would then lose what he had bought and would have another family to keep, hence his reply, I cannot do it. The cost was too high. The generosity of Boaz in accepting these financial losses becomes the more apparent.

There had been no need for the author to explain the law of redemption which was apparently still current at the time of writing. Another custom, however, had dropped out of use and therefore had to be explained (7). Both parts of the redemption agreement were completed by the symbolic handing over of a sandal, which represented possession (cf. Jos. 1:3). The elders were formal witnesses that Boaz was legally entitled to the property of Elimelech, Kilion and Mahlon, and that Mahlon's widow was to become his wife. Ruth's first son would rightly be known as the 'son of Elimelech', thus perpetuating the name of the dead. This son would also be heir to the property, so ensuring continuation of the family's name and possessions. From the town records

(10) is a free translation (cf. the more literal ‘from the gate of his place’ in the RV). In view of the legal status of the ‘gate’, what is meant is the community’s legal records, whether these were transmitted orally or in writing.

Passers-by had swelled the crowd at the gate, and joined the elders in bearing witness to the legality of the marriage between Boaz and Ruth, though she was not present in person to give her consent. The approval of the people of Bethlehem helped to encourage the permanence of the marriage, as does the presence of wedding guests today, as well as providing a cause for happy celebration. Good wishes for the new venture were expressed in prayers that recalled Israel’s past experience of God’s goodness. Rachel and Leah, together with their maids, had borne Jacob (Israel) twelve sons, who became the fathers of the twelve tribes (Ex. 1:1–5). Boaz would be seen to be rewarded if Ruth bore him many sons to add to his prestige and prosperity. The prayer went on to select for mention the story of Judah and Tamar (Gn. 38). The author had good reasons for referring to this shameful incident in Judah’s life. First, it concerned a similar marriage custom to that referred to in this chapter, where a brother of the dead man was expected to marry the widow, hence the term ‘levirate marriage’ (from the Latin levir, ‘brother-in-law’). Whereas Tamar’s rights had been ignored by Judah, Boaz had honoured the obligation. Secondly, there was a special local interest. Perez, who was born to Tamar as a result of her strategem, was an ancestor of Boaz (18), and one of only three ancestors of the whole tribe of Judah. Probably most of the local population had descended from him. What God had done for Judah, despite his lack of concern for Tamar, would not God do for Boaz, and reward his kindness by giving him a family of sons? Thirdly, Tamar, like Ruth, had had to take the initiative.

4:13–17 A son for Naomi

In fulfilment of his promise Boaz duly married Ruth. The Lord enabled her to conceive may be a reference to the absence of children by her first marriage, but Scripture never takes for granted the conception of a child and regards each individual as the Lord’s special work of creation (e.g. Ps. 139:13). The birth of a son was the culmination of joy for the women present, who exclaimed, Praise be to the LORD! and addressed their delight to Naomi rather than to Ruth. Honour was due to the older generation, and those who had known Naomi before she went to Moab would be overjoyed to see how the Lord was providing for her future. Their prayer that he might be famous throughout Israel is shown to have been answered in the genealogy of David (17). Naomi, the central figure in the opening chapter of the story, is the central figure again at its close. The emptiness of bereavement had now been replaced by fulness; bitterness by joy (1:21). Because the child would have been regarded as the grandson of Elimelech and Naomi, her husband’s name would not die and his property would have an heir. Moreover, Naomi would have a protector to look after her in her old age, as well as her loving daughter-in-law, who was better ... than seven sons. Praise for Ruth reaches its climax in these words of the women of Bethlehem.

Naomi’s ‘fulness’ revolved round her grand-child; looking after him as she had looked after her own children gave her a new lease of life. The name Obed (short for Obadiah) implied that he was a ‘servant of the Lord’ and thus summed up the hopes of everyone for this child. The author then leaps forward two generations to show how important Obed was to be as the grandfather of King David. God’s sovereign purpose could be traced through all the generations from Perez, who had been named in the marriage blessing (12), to David, hundreds of years later. Ruth’s determination to throw in her lot with Naomi had had far-reaching consequences, beyond anything she could ever have guessed. In view of the fact that all Judah's kings belonged to David's dynasty, the Moabite girl had most illustrious descendants, and the prayer of Boaz that she might be richly rewarded by the Lord (1:12) was spectacularly answered.

The family of Ruth.

4:18–22 Concluding genealogy

The ten-generation genealogy from Perez to David omits some generations, as a comparison with 1 Ch. 2 shows, but it forms a fitting conclusion to the book. Whereas its opening words recorded famine, migration and deaths, the end of the book looks forward in hope. The list of names, covering the period from the patriarchs to David, reminds the reader that what happened to Naomi and Ruth was part of the ongoing saving work of God through the centuries. Life had meaning because the Lord, who had made clear promises to Abraham, was active in each generation, revealing his character, keeping his promises and achieving his purposes. This was the unseen factor that created a historical perspective in Israel, unique in the ancient world. But Israel's history is not concerned only with the great ones in the land. Ruth, Naomi and Boaz illustrate that true greatness reflects the character of the living God, whose steadfast love called forth a responding love in those who put their trust in him.

1 AND 2 SAMUEL

Introduction

In the Hebrew text the two books of Samuel formed one only. The ancient Greek Old Testament viewed the books of Samuel and Kings as a single historical work, and divided it into four sections called 'Books of the Kingdoms' (or 'Reigns'). The Latin Bible kept this division, calling the four sections 'Kings' (see the subtitles in the AV). Since the sixteenth century Hebrew Bibles too have divided the original book of Samuel into two parts, named the first and second books of Samuel.

The text

It is unfortunate that the standard (Massoretic) Hebrew text of the books of Samuel has been relatively poorly preserved (see for instance 1 Sa. 13:1). The ancient Greek text (the Septuagint) often differs from the Hebrew, and can be very helpful. Some useful additional Hebrew evidence is also available from the Qumran manuscripts (the Dead Sea Scrolls). Occasionally other ancient translations can be used. The NIV footnotes make reference to these sources of information where they are important (see for instance 2 Sa. 13:39; 14:4).

Approaching the books of Samuel

Scholars find three underlying problems in approaching the books of Samuel. The first is textual. Is the standard Hebrew text to be followed, or the ancient Greek, or Qumran or other evidence, where these differ? The second is literary. Do different source documents or traditions lie behind complex sections of Samuel? If so, must they be sifted out and treated individually? The third is historical. Did events happen exactly as stated in Samuel, or must we try to distinguish the historical from the unhistorical? All three problems sometimes coincide, as, for example, in the story of David and Goliath. Here the text is very much shorter in an important Greek manuscript than in the Hebrew, and many scholars think the shorter text is the original one. The Hebrew account may have used material from at least one extra source document. If so, is this additional material equally accurate historically or not?

For a full discussion of such technical questions, larger commentaries must be consulted. For the purposes of this commentary, the NIV text has been accepted as the basis for comment; the NIV usually follows the Hebrew closely. Secondly, the commentary assumes that the biblical stories should be treated as they stand. Many recent studies have been stressing the need to approach the material as a unity, without denying that the biblical authors used many sources. Thirdly, the commentary also treats these stories as historical. This is not to deny that some historical problems exist. However, the biblical writers undoubtedly believed that they were presenting historical facts, and we must share their approach if we are to understand their purpose and message. For this period of Israel's history there is very little by way of external evidence, but two lines of argument can be offered in support of the general historical accuracy of the books of Samuel. First, the general picture makes good sense and fits its historical context well. For example, the start of the Israelite monarchy must inevitably have been difficult and controversial—exactly how it is portrayed. Again, the Philistine activities are entirely credible. Secondly, the portraits of the main characters ring true. David in particular is represented realistically, as a man of great ability and charm, but with some very obvious weaknesses and failings. He is not idealized, in spite of the sympathetic treatment of him.

Date, authorship and purpose

The name Samuel in the title refers to the first major character in the books but he was not the author; his death is recorded as early as 1 Sa. 25:1. The author is unknown but he cannot have been writing earlier than the death of Solomon, towards the end of the tenth century BC, since 1 Sa. 27:6 shows knowledge of the divided monarchy. It is generally agreed that the books of Samuel were not written by themselves but were part of the whole sequence of books beginning with Joshua and ending with Kings. If so, the author of this whole historical work was writing at the time of the Babylonian exile (sixth century BC). Some verses, such as 1 Sa. 9:9 and 2 Sa. 13:18, suggest that the writer lived long after the events he records. However, the author made use of many ancient and authentic source documents, one of which is mentioned by name (2 Sa. 1:18).

In exploring the biblical author's purpose, therefore, we have to consider the purpose of Joshua-Judges-Samuel-Kings as a whole. These books cover the history of Israel from the time of the conquest of Canaan until the exile. It was a period of victory, success, decline and fall. Above all, the author wanted to demonstrate God's hand and God's purposes in all these historical events. In particular, these books are a commentary on kingship, an institution which ultimately failed, and yet which laid the basis for the Messianic hope. In this broader context, the books of Samuel deal with Israel's first two kings, Saul and David. David was Israel's greatest king, and his notable achievements are described in detail. Yet he was far from perfect, and his reign was by no means trouble-free. The books of Samuel explain the two sides of this picture, and show how God overruled in the history of Israel by interacting with David and other important individuals. The message is a call to repentance, as God's people suffered for their past sins at the time of the exile. It is also a call to faith, with its reminders about God's election of Israel, his provision for his people in every age, his faithfulness to them, and his promise of a coming King.

Commentary

1 Sa. 1:1–7:17 Samuel’s early years

The historical situation at the start of the narrative of the books of Samuel is that of the end of the period of the judges; 1 Samuel is the sequel to the book of Judges. There are two major themes in the books of Samuel: the problem of the leadership of God’s people Israel, and the presence of God in their midst. The first theme means that the history of Israel is presented in terms of the lives and careers of three outstanding individuals—Samuel, Saul and David. The second theme involves frequent mention of the shrine and the ark of the covenant. (The two themes come together when the Lord is said to be ‘with’ one leader or another.)

This period of three generations saw two major changes in Israel. The first was a constitutional change. The system of government changed radically, as leadership by the judges gave place to a monarchy. This change involved many administrative details, especially centralization and what we would now call bureaucracy. It also resulted in the rise of one family to great power and prestige, namely David’s dynasty. The second big change was the fall of the shrine at Shiloh. Shiloh was replaced, after an interval, by Jerusalem, which was made not only the religious but also the political capital of the kingdom of Israel. It is interesting to notice that all the events of 1 and 2 Samuel had the effect of transferring leadership in Israel from the tribe of Ephraim to the tribe of Judah. These were the two biggest tribes, and their territories were separated by the small tribe of Benjamin (see the map in Deuteronomy). The leadership moved southwards, then, from Shiloh (Eli) first to Benjamin (Samuel and Saul), and then to Judah (David).

The books of Samuel not only record how all this happened, but also why it took place. Various human beings come into the story, with a variety of motives. More important to the biblical writers was the question of God’s purposes and actions in all these threads of human history.

1:1–3:21 Samuel and Eli

During the period of the judges, the Israelite tribes usually acted independently of each other, and must have recognized different leaders in different parts of the country (see map of Canaan in Joshua). Tribal elders were important (see 8:4), and the priestly families in major shrines such as Shiloh must have been politically influential. ('Judges' as such did not always exist, nor did they give leadership to the whole country.) As our story begins, then, we can assume that the most important leader of the time was Eli. He was ageing, and his two sons were expected to replace him before long (1:3). But in fact it was to be Samuel who would replace Eli, as these chapters explain. The first question is how Samuel came to be at Shiloh at all; ch. 1 answers that question.

1:1–8 Elkanah and his two wives. The first three verses set the scene, describing Samuel's parents and their annual pilgrimage to the Shiloh shrine. It was legal to marry more than one wife (see Dt. 21:15–17), and indeed a second wife was probably a sign of affluence. The general picture is of a respectable, God-fearing family. But it was not an entirely happy family. Barrenness can still cause psychological distress, but it was much worse in OT times, in a culture where it was viewed as a disgrace for a married woman to have no children. Despite Elkanah's attempts to help and console Hannah, the unkindness of her rival-wife Peninnah made her position intolerable.

Ramathaim is a longer form of the usual 'Ramah' (see v 19). According to 1 Ch. 6:22–38 the Zuphites were a Levite clan, but the emphasis here is on the fact that Elkanah lived in the tribal lands of Ephraim. So it was natural for him to worship at Shiloh. These verses illustrate some religious customs of the times. Whole families made pilgrimages once a year to sanctuaries such as Shiloh, in order to worship either at a festival time or on some special family occasion. The families presented animals to be sacrificed. After the sacrifice had been offered, part of the meat was returned to the worshippers. Further details are given in 2:13–16. Such portions of meat were very much valued, evidently, but in this case they gave rise to favouritism, jealousy, bitterness and distress.

1:9–20 Hannah's prayer and Samuel's birth. In desperation, Hannah was driven to earnest prayer for a son. Her prayer was reinforced by a solemn vow (11). The God-given son would be consecrated to God from birth to death. Nu. 6 describes how Israelites could voluntarily consecrate themselves to God's service for a fixed period of time. Such people were known as Nazirites, and they vowed never to cut their hair, a visible symbol of their dedication to God. In the same way, Hannah promised that her son would be a permanent Nazirite.

Eli, the chief priest at Shiloh, was persuaded to give Hannah's prayer his blessing and support (17). His initial misunderstanding (13–14) is perhaps a first hint to the reader that Eli was gradually losing his competence as Israel's leader.

The sequel was the birth of Samuel. Vs 19–20 bring together the human and divine agency. In one sense Samuel's birth was perfectly natural, but the removal of Hannah's barrenness was entirely God's doing. Hannah herself was in no doubt that God had responded to her prayer. The name Samuel does not literally mean 'asked'; in Hebrew the name sounds like the phrase 'heard by God'. Several OT explanations of names draw out the implications of other, different words that resembled the names. The name Saul means 'asked', and the biblical author may be telling us at the outset that Samuel was a man sent by God in a way that Saul would not be.

1:21–28 The dedication of Samuel. The chapter ends by recording how Hannah, with her husband's full agreement, fulfilled her vow and gave Samuel to the LORD. They took other gifts and offerings to Shiloh (24), but their greatest self-sacrifice was to leave the boy there at the sanctuary, young as he was. The last sentence of the chapter probably refers to the youthful Samuel, who worshipped the LORD there at Shiloh when his parents left him with Eli (2:11 is similar). The verb worshipped is ambiguous, and either Eli or Elkanah could be intended; but Samuel seems the most natural subject. A Hebrew manuscript found at Qumran makes Hannah the subject, 'she worshipped', which gives good sense: she donated the child to Eli and then worshipped God, who had granted what she asked of him. This minor textual problem does not affect the general sense.

The story of Hannah should not be read as a promise that God will always remove barrenness or any other physical problem, though it does underline the value of believing prayer. Its chief purpose is to show how God overruled events: if Hannah had had a son at an earlier date, she would not have placed him in the Shiloh temple, to grow up there to be a man of God—in the public gaze, ready for leadership.

2:1–10 The song of Hannah. Hannah's song is thought by many commentators to have been a psalm of later date placed on her lips by the biblical writer. It reads more like a psalm than an individual's prayer; but the chief reason for this view is the reference in v 10 to a king. Obviously in Hannah's time Israel had no king, and her son Samuel was not destined to be a king. The poem is called a prayer, not a prophetic oracle, so we would not expect it to include a long-range prediction. It seems very likely, then, that Hannah's original words have been expanded. Certainly the biblical author used the poem as a whole to give a forward look and provide a theological purpose to the record of events described in 1 and 2 Samuel. Samuel's birth was the first step in God's plans to give Israel deliverance from her Philistine enemies (1). From humble beginnings and difficult circumstances, David would get divine strength as God's anointed, God's king over Israel (10). In the context, the mention of hostility (1) and barrenness (5) remind us of Hannah's own personal experiences, but the poem has a much wider standpoint. It is concerned to show how God can, and often does, upset human values and estimates. Life and death, wealth and poverty, are wholly within his control; so too are the rise and fall of nations, for God's authority and power reach to the ends of the earth (10). But God does not overthrow the powerful and strengthen the weak in a spiteful or unjust way. God had linked himself with the Israelites (a small and weak nation) and made himself their God. So the poem expresses faith from the start in our God, described as the Rock (2)—a clear picture of security and stability. The picture drawn from a raised or exalted animal's horn (1, 10) is less clear to us; it appears to mean a visible sign of strength or success.

Note. 10 The kings of Israel were all anointed with oil at the start of their reigns (see 10:1; 16:13; and the comments on 10:1 and 16:13).

2:11–26 The sanctuary at Shiloh. Samuel's service of God at Shiloh thus began in his boyhood. No doubt simple tasks, assisting Eli, were all that he could do at first, but as he grew up (21) his ministry developed sufficiently to impress favourably all who came to Shiloh (26). We are given a final glimpse of Samuel's parents in vs 19–21, and it is made clear that God had permanently removed Hannah's barrenness and brought her joy in motherhood and family life: she had given Samuel to God, but gained richly in return.

Samuel, then, however simply, ministered before the LORD (11). We are given no details of his activities, but the passage sums up by telling us that both God and Israelite worshippers were pleased with him (26). There is a glaring contrast between Samuel and Eli's sons, Hophni and Phinehas (12). They were the most prominent priests at Shiloh (see 1:3), and their greedy, arrogant and selfish behaviour is described in detail in vs 13–16. Ordinary worshippers were angered by them, as v 23 shows, and the whole sanctuary was brought into disrepute. The passage is even more concerned to emphasize God's anger, and his decision to bring the situation to an end (25). Eli himself was a godly man, distressed by his sons' conduct, but his rebuke (25) had no effect on them.

13–17 It seems likely that the practice described in v 13 was the ordinary custom at Shiloh, even though the regulations in Lv. 7:31–35 are rather different. In any case, all priests were entitled to a proper share of the sacrificial meat. Eli's two sons, however, showed such greed for roast meat that they grabbed what they wanted, by force if necessary, even before the fat was burned as a sacrifice to God. Even ordinary worshippers knew that God ought to have his part before any human beings ate their portions (16). In this way Hophni and Phinehas put God in second place, showing contempt for the LORD himself and for his offering (17).

18–19 The ephod was a priestly garment, probably worn outside the robe which his mother made him. Even in the simple matter of dress, Samuel, unlike Eli's sons, was careful to do what was right.

25 Eli's challenging question was based on legal procedure, and pictures God as the judge. A judge can arbitrate between two men, but if somebody does wrong to the judge himself, then there is no possibility of avoiding judgment.

2:27–36 A prophecy about the priesthood. The phrase man of God was another title for a prophet. The unnamed prophet here set out a very detailed picture of what was going to happen to the priesthood in Israel. The downfall of Eli's family is foretold: Hophni and Phinehas will die on the same day, and others of Eli's family will be reduced to begging for very humble priestly jobs (36). V 31 foretells the massacre which took place at Nob (see ch. 22). V 35 predicts the rise of a faithful priest, but looks beyond Samuel's ministry to that of Zadok. Zadok became high priest in David's reign (2 Sa. 8:17), and his family (his house) held the office of high priest in Jerusalem throughout the period of the monarchy. David and his line of kings are here called God's anointed.

The details of v 35 had little meaning for Eli, since he was to die many years before David became king or Zadok became high priest. The verse was important for the readers of 1 Samuel, however, since it made clear to them that Zadok's accession to the priesthood was God's will and plan. The biblical authors constantly had their readers in mind, and it is very likely that when appropriate they expanded the original words and speeches of historical characters, in order to aid the understanding of the readers. It may be, then, that the unknown prophet's speech to Eli was briefer than it now appears. Even so, an important OT principle must not be overlooked: God not only overruled in Israel's affairs but also announced beforehand all important events and changes. This was one important role of the prophets. Another feature of the prophetic role was to remind their hearers of significant past events, especially those events which revealed God's goodness. This historical dimension is found in this speech in vs 27–28.

3:1–21 The call of Samuel. An attentive reader of 2:27–36 might have been puzzled by the fact that this prophecy about the priesthood had nothing to say about Samuel's future. The prediction about a 'faithful priest' in 2:35 was not fulfilled by Samuel, and his descendants were not 'firmly established' in the priesthood. Ch. 3 supplies the answer: Samuel's future role was not that of head of a priestly family. Instead, he was to be the great prophet of his generation. Priests needed no divine call to office, because they were born into priestly families. Prophets, on the other hand, received individual calls, direct experiences of God; and ch. 3 records the prophetic call of Samuel.

The word of the LORD and visions (1) were the two types of divine gift to prophets. There are two reasons for telling us that both were rare (lit. 'precious') at that time. First, the statement draws attention to Israel's serious need for prophetic guidance. Secondly, it explains in advance why Samuel and Eli were both taken by surprise when the Lord called aloud to Samuel (4).

Two features of the temple are mentioned in v 3, the lamp of God and the ark of the covenant. Both were symbols of the presence of God. Lv. 24:1–4 gives careful instructions to the priests to keep a lamp burning in the sanctuary every night. When Samuel heard God’s voice, the lamp was still alight, i.e. it was just before dawn. If God did choose to speak, it would be here in the shrine that his voice was expected to be heard; that is why Samuel was lying down near the ark. The call came three times, confirming to both Samuel and Eli that it was truly a message from God.

Vs 11–14, God’s message to Samuel, confirmed the prophecy of 2:27–36. The full details of what would happen are not repeated, but the guilt of Eli himself is given new emphasis. Eli had not been a vicious or contemptible priest like his sons, but he was after all the man in charge of the shrine, and he failed to restrain them. Samuel naturally hesitated at first to tell Eli what he had heard. (The word vision simply means this whole prophetic experience.) On hearing the stern words of Yahweh, Eli made no complaint. His response showed his resigned acceptance of God’s judgment, so making it clear that the change of priestly leadership in Israel was accepted by Eli himself. (In exactly the same way, King Saul later acknowledged that God was transferring royal leadership from him to David; see 24:20.)

Vs 19–21 give a brief summary of the years that followed, during which Samuel grew up. For the time being Eli continued as priest at Shiloh, and so did his evil sons; but already it was Samuel who attracted popular attention. The shrine itself became less important than the man of God, since God’s presence was clearly with him. Whatever Samuel foretold came true (19). No longer was the prophetic word or vision a rarity, and all Israel came to realize this. Dan was the most important town in the north of Israel, and Beersheba lay in the far south of the country; thus Samuel’s reputation spread through the whole extent of the land. God’s word came regularly to Samuel, and from Samuel it was passed on to all Israel’s citizens (4:1).

4:1–7:17 Battles with the Philistines

At this point Samuel disappears from the story until 7:3. There is effective literary skill in this unexpected feature, since the reader has been led to expect great things from Samuel. There is also theological purpose in it. Chs. 4–6, besides explaining how God’s judgment on Eli and his family was fulfilled, make a contrast between the word of God (revealed through prophets like Samuel) and the ark of the covenant. The ark was an important symbol of God’s presence, but it was a silent one. The ark could easily be misunderstood, or stolen, or moved to some remote place. The spoken word of God, as we have already seen, was never remote, but known from Dan to Beersheba. However, for three chapters it is the ark which is the centre of attention. It not only symbolized God’s presence but also his power. In losing the ark to the Philistines, Israel would learn that God might choose to remove his power from them; neither they nor the Philistines could manipulate God!

4:1–11 Two Philistines victories. The location of the events of chs. 1–3 was a small area of southern Ephraim. The scene now shifts westwards, from the hills towards the coastal plain, which the Philistines had conquered a century earlier. This small but powerful nation had begun to dominate parts of Israel in the time of Samson (Jdg. 13–16), and their well-trained army now posed a new threat. The Israelites had no permanent army and, in an emergency, had to call men from farms and fields to fight any battle that was forced upon them. It is not surprising, then, that the Philistines won a swift victory at Aphek (2); but it was a shock to the Israelite elders, who evidently had fully expected God to give Israel the victory. The passage shows how little either the Israelites or the Philistines understood about God. Both Israelites and Philistines believed that the ark of the covenant itself was a sort of idol, a magic object which would give Israel great power on the battlefield. So the ark was brought to the battlefield, escorted by Hophni and Phinehas. The Philistines feared its power, but did not despair, presumably because they worshipped their own gods, including Dagon (5:2). They fought bravely and won an even bigger victory. Israel lost many men in battle, including Eli's two sons: and in this way the prophecy of 2:34 came true. The ark too was captured.

Notes. 4 This description of Yahweh refers to the way the ark was constructed: see Ex. 25:17–22. 6 The term Hebrew meant the same thing as 'Israelite'.

4:12–22 The death of Eli. Before following the ark into Philistine territory, the story rounds off the life of Eli. Aged ninety-eight, he did not die of old age but after a fall brought on by the shock at hearing the bad news. The prophecy of ch. 2 had foretold that Eli's family would lose their priestly leadership, but had implied that the family line itself would continue to exist. So the last verses of ch. 4 mention the birth of a grandson to Eli. Nothing is said of his life and career, but his name itself told a sad story: Ichabod meant 'no glory'. His dying mother was thinking of the loss of the ark, and she too seemed to suppose that God had departed from Israel along with the ark. In that idea she was wrong, but the name she gave to her son symbolized the fact that all honour and privilege had departed from the family of Eli.

Some commentators have asked whether Israel did not pay a very high price for the sins of two men—Hophni and Phinehas deserved to die, but what about the thousands of other Israelites who died on the battlefield? The book of Judges shows that Israel suffered many military defeats when she had been unfaithful to God, and 1 Sa. 7:3–4 shows that Israel was again guilty of idolatry in Samuel's time. In 1 Sa. 4, however, no reason is given. Yahweh acted as he planned, without explanation either to Israel or to the reader. The biblical author's interest is the fate of Eli's family. His other main purpose is to show that God was in control of events, but the reader only gradually becomes aware of that as the story unfolds in the next two chapters.

18 This verse makes it clear that Eli had been the most important political figure in Israel in his generation. The verb led literally means 'judged', so the writer is consciously linking Eli with the outstanding figures described in the book of Judges. Eli's death meant that the Israelites badly needed a new leader, and one who (like the judges) would rescue them from foreign assailants.

5:1–12 The ark in Philistine hands. The chief cities of the Philistines were five in number, and three of them are featured in ch. 5: Ashdod (1), Gath (8) and Ekron (10). The Philistines worshipped Canaanite gods, of whom Dagon was one. (Samson had destroyed the Dagon temple in another major Philistine city, Gaza; see Jdg. 16:30.) It was common practice in the Ancient Near East for conquerors to place captured idols in the temples of their own deities; no doubt it was believed that the victors' gods had defeated and captured the gods of their enemies. So the Philistines thought that Dagon had now defeated and captured Yahweh. However, it soon became clear that Dagon was not in control even of his own statue! The collapse of this idol led to a strange local superstition (5). V 6 at last tells the reader plainly that Yahweh himself was active in events in Ashdod; the Philistines there had no such revelation from God, and had to make their own deductions. If the collapse of their idol only puzzled them, their own personal sufferings quickly persuaded them that Yahweh was powerful and active because of the ark of the covenant there in their temple. So the ark was sent first to Gath, then to Ekron, with similar results in both towns.

6:1–12 The return of the ark. By now all the Philistines were convinced that the ark was the property of Yahweh the God of Israel (2) and also that it was a very dangerous object. It had to be handled with great care, or even worse trouble would afflict them. So they naturally turned to their own religious experts for advice on how to return the ark to Israel safely. Their advisers had to answer two separate questions. Where exactly in Israel should the ark be sent? And how should it be done? Their detailed reply gives us an interesting picture of religious ideas of the time. First, a guilt offering was required, as a confession that wrong had been done. Secondly, compensation must be paid (in gold). Thirdly, the transport provided for the ark must not be driven or guided in any particular direction, but left for the gods to overrule. (Evidently the religious experts feared the power of Yahweh, but were not quite sure if he had really caused the Philistine troubles.)

Another aspect of Philistine thought can be seen in the fact that they made models of the things that they wanted to get rid of (5). This practice is known to scholars as sympathetic magic; it was believed that when the models were removed, the troubles would go too! The tumours were a symptom of a plague which was probably caused by the rats. Nobody in the ancient world knew that rats were instrumental in causing plagues, and it looks as if the rats were attacking food stores.

V 6 reminds us that God had previously used plagues to force an earlier enemy of Israel, Egypt, to release his people Israel (see Ex. 7–12). The power of Israel's God was to be seen in his control of events outside Israel. In later centuries, when other enemies (especially Assyria and Babylon) proved much too strong for Israel and Judah, these stories demonstrating God's power became a source of great comfort to God's people and encouraged their faith in his ability to rescue them.

6:13–7:1 The ark returns to Israel. Without human agency, the cows took the ark to Beth Shemesh, which was a town inside Israelite territory, just across the Philistine frontier. The Philistines' scheme had succeeded—or rather, Yahweh himself had brought his property back to Israel. Vs 16–18 show how seriously the Philistines had treated the problem of the ark: all five of their kings followed the ark to the Israelite border, even though the ark had never been taken to two of the towns listed in v 17.

Vs 13–15 tell us that the Israelites of Beth Shemesh were overjoyed at the ark's return, and that their first actions were right and proper. For example, the men who handled the sacred ark were Levites, men whose special responsibility it was to carry it (see Dt. 10:8). So v 19 strikes a very unexpected note. The heavy blow suffered by Beth Shemesh showed that the ark was just as dangerous to Israelites as to Philistines: God must be treated with proper reverence and respect. The chief reason for mentioning this unhappy incident is that it explains why the ark finished its journey not in Beth Shemesh but in a nearby town, Kiriath Jearim.

7:2–17 Samuel's achievements. The story of the ark's wanderings ends at v 2. It was brought from Abinadab's house and taken to Jerusalem in David's reign, many years later (see 2 Sa. 6). The twenty years seems to refer, not to the ark's stay at Kiriath Jearim, but to the depressed state of the people of Israel. The ark's presence in their land had caused much trouble to the Philistines, but we must not forget that in the battles of ch. 4 they had inflicted a very heavy defeat on Israel. The Philistines were still the triumphant conquerors, and could impose their wishes on the Israelites in the territories of Benjamin, southern Ephraim, and elsewhere. V 7 illustrates this situation—both Philistine aggression and Israelite fear.

For the first time, we are given a reason in v 3 for the Israelites' weakness: there was widespread idolatry among them. The foreign gods included the Canaanite god Baal and the Canaanite goddess Ashtoreth (4). As it had frequently in the book of Judges, Israelite unfaithfulness to Yahweh had caused divine punishment. And as in Judges, genuine Israelite repentance would reverse the situation. God's method had always been to punish sinful Israel by means of foreign invasion and attack, and to rescue repentant Israel through the leadership of 'judges'. Ch. 7 presents exactly the same sequence of sin, repentance and salvation. The man chosen by God to bring deliverance was of course Samuel, who is in this context appropriately called 'judge' (6).

In chs. 1–3 Samuel was first an apprentice priest, then a prophet. Now in 7:6 we find him in a new role, as Israel's 'judge' or political leader. The word is deliberately used to show that he was God's chosen man to deliver Israel. In practice, it is not obvious what exactly his political role was as yet, since the Philistines were so dominant. At any rate, all Israel listened to him (4:1), and so he alone was able to call a national assembly at Mizpah, in Benjamite territory. (Shiloh had been left in ruins by the Philistines and was probably abandoned.) The purpose was a religious one, but such a large gathering looked like an army—and indeed turned into an army (10–11). So it is no wonder that the Philistines saw it as a potential threat to them and attacked it. But of course the Israelite assembly was no trained army, and but for God's help would have been massacred by the Philistines. Ancient peoples believed that thunder and lightning were signs of divine anger, so the Philistine panic is easily understood.

The memorial stone (12) set up to celebrate the Israelite victory was named Ebenezer, lit. 'stone of help'. The Israelites had suffered defeat at a different place called Ebenezer (see 4:1), some miles further north, and it seems that Samuel deliberately reapplied the name to record this first Israelite victory over the Philistines. In reality it was probably only a minor victory, but it was enough to keep the Philistines out of Israelite territory for some considerable time, and it was the beginning of a period in which Philistine power declined, thanks to the hand of the LORD (13). The Israelite successes of this period, which is referred to as Samuel's lifetime, were achieved under the military leadership of King Saul (14:47), for Samuel was never a soldier. However, Saul is not mentioned in ch. 7, for several reasons. The first is that 7:13–17 is simply a summary of Samuel's activities. Secondly, Saul has not yet been brought into the story, and it would have spoiled the effect of the following chapters to introduce his name at this point. Thirdly, there is a hidden message in ch. 7, anticipating the events of ch. 8. In ch. 8 the elders of Israel demanded a king, thereby demoting Samuel and taking political leadership away from him. Ch. 7 is therefore making the claim that even without Saul's military skills, Samuel was perfectly capable of leading Israel to victory. God was the real author of victory, and he had long ago called Samuel to speak for him and to give Israel whatever guidance was needed. From a human point of view, Samuel became subordinate to Saul once Saul became king. From God's standpoint, however, it was as if the king was subordinate to the man of God.

The final paragraph shows Samuel in yet another role—as judge in the ordinary English sense of the word, a role which he retained after Saul became king. His centre was at Ramah, his ancestral home (see 1:19), and the other cities listed were in the same general area. Thus these verses indicate the breadth of Samuel's services to Israel. They also lay a geographical foundation for the events of the following chapters, which took place in Ramah (8:4), Mizpah (10:17) and Gilgal (11:14); Bethel too gets a brief mention (10:3).

Note. 14 The Amorites, also called Canaanites, lived in towns and cities inside Israel. At times they seem to have fought alongside the Philistines against the Israelites. By whatever means, Samuel was able to keep on good terms with them.

8:1–15:35 Samuel and Saul

This section includes a full description of the sequence of events which brought Saul to the throne of Israel. The start of a monarchy meant an enormous change in the way Israel was governed and organized. Such a major development deserved the full discussion given in chs. 8–12. The first king was Saul, and he naturally plays a prominent part in the story. But the biblical author never lets us forget Samuel; indeed, in the biblical writer's view Samuel remained the real leader of Israel, even when he had handed over military and political affairs to the new king. In the last chapter of the section, ch. 15, Samuel still had the God-given authority to reject Saul's kingship.

8:1–12:25 Saul becomes king

In approaching these chapters, it is helpful to be aware of three perspectives: the modern historian's, the biblical author's, and the story-teller's.

To the modern historian, the rise of a monarchy in Israel was inevitable. The Philistines posed a serious threat, and they were well equipped and well organized. The Israelites had the advantage of a bigger population, but they were disunited. The various Israelite tribes to a large extent acted independently, and none of them had a permanent army. So the choice was clear-cut: unless they found a means of uniting the tribes and building up an army, Israel would perish as a nation. In the ancient world, kingship was the only possible structure for achieving this goal. So from the historical perspective, the elders' urgent request in 8:5 was a natural one. We should bear in mind that the Israelite victory recorded in ch. 7 had not changed the general situation of Philistine power and imperialism. So to the historian, the Israelite elders' conduct comes as no surprise.

The perspective of the biblical author was quite different. From his point of view, Israel already had a king: as 8:7 tells us, none other than Yahweh himself. Human kings might be weak or incompetent, but how could a divine king fail to lead his people to peace and prosperity? God had proved many times in the past that he could give his people victory, and in the person of Samuel God had already provided them with all the human leadership that was necessary. It was true that Israel had suffered defeats, as in ch. 4, but such defeats were their own fault, due to their failure to be loyal to their king, Yahweh. So from the biblical, theological perspective, the elders' request for a human king was sinful, a rejection of God's kingship and an attempt to win victories without his guidance or help.

As the storyteller and the theologian were the same person, the third perspective is basically no different from the second. However, it is important not to lose sight of the sheer literary skill of the biblical author, and the way he shapes his narrative to make his theological points clear and effective. To the historian, we have seen, the elders' request for a king comes as no surprise. To the ordinary reader, however, it comes as a complete shock after the picture of Samuel's achievements which the storyteller has provided in ch. 7. To the storyteller, Philistine power was relatively unimportant and so could be ignored for the time being; the real power lay in God's hands, not the Philistines'. The serious human problem was not Israelite military weakness but Israelite lack of faith.

Of course, there are other perspectives too, especially those of the actors in all these events—the elders, Samuel and Saul. The position of Saul must have been particularly uncomfortable. How could a human king hope to be acceptable to God, if the very existence of a king meant rejection of God? And yet the story says that God chose Saul to be king! In a sense there is a sort of compromise worked out in these chapters. The theological perspective, while insisting that Yahweh was Israel's king, fully recognized that a human mediator was necessary, someone who would give visible human leadership but would take his orders from Yahweh. Samuel had been such a mediator and leader. So even though the elders' demand was sinful, God could work with it, provided that he himself chose the man to be king. God in fact chose first Saul, then David, and used them to defeat Israel's enemies the Philistines. Even so, kingship was sure to bring misery to Israel in the long run. The ultimate problem with kingship was that it gave power not just to one man but to his descendants after him.

It is widely believed that different sections of these chapters were drawn from different source documents. It has been observed that chs. 8 and 12 express strong criticisms of monarchy in general. On the other hand, the middle chapters treat Saul himself very positively. Ch. 11 is in some ways a distinct story. All these sections may be equally historical, but scholars have frequently raised questions and issues. For instance, Saul is made king at three different times and at three different places (10:1; 10:17–25; 11:14–15)—which is by no means impossible in the unique circumstances. It is perfectly possible to see the overall story-line as plausible, and to think of the different sections as presenting different perspectives on kingship rather than conflicting accounts. But larger commentaries should be consulted on this whole complex issue.

8:1–9 The demand for a king. The Israelite elders, the local representatives of the clans and tribes of Israel, had genuine reasons for anxiety. They saw that Samuel was growing old and there was no obvious successor to continue the struggle against the Philistines. History was repeating itself. The sins of Eli's sons had brought about one major change in Israel; and now the sins of Samuel's sons were the first step in an even greater change. In both cases, the sins were well known to the public, and the public had a right to protest. One important difference is that Samuel's sons were not under his direct supervision, for Beersheba lay far away to the south, and neither God nor man could blame him for their activities. There is dramatic irony in all this. With both Eli and now Samuel, it was obvious to everybody that great and good men can have evil, worthless sons; and yet the elders responded by demanding a king. By definition, a king is a ruler whose son automatically becomes king after him! The biblical author thus demonstrates that the elders' arguments were insincere. It is not until v 20 that their real reason is expressed.

Undoubtedly the elders' demand was a rejection of Samuel, and naturally he was displeased, even though they left the choice of a king in his hands. God's words in v 7 do not deny that Samuel was rejected but they stress that he was not the only person being rejected. Behind the elders' rejection of Samuel lay the fact that they were also rejecting God's authority, for it was he who had sent Israel one able leader after another, including Samuel. As v 8 reminds us, there was nothing new in Israelites rejecting Yahweh for other gods, but the elders' demand went a step further, rejecting his political arrangements for his own people.

The description of God as king of Israel is very frequent biblical language, found as early as Ex. 15:18. We easily interpret it as a straightforward metaphor, a convenient human picture. The Israelites were probably apt to do the same, and so failed to see what was meant and implied. If God was truly king, then he made the political decisions for Israel, he made the laws and the constitution, he decided on wars and alliances, and did everything else that a human king might do in other countries. (Of course, God needed his messengers to announce his decisions and decrees, and the prophets, in particular, filled that role.) Unless a human king of Israel was absolutely obedient to Yahweh's decisions, then he would certainly in some ways be displacing God. So the elders' demand amounted to treason.

8:10–22 Samuel's advice rejected. Before deciding on having a monarchy, the Israelites ought to consider what it will mean to them: so Samuel here paints a grim picture of the side-effects of monarchy. The elders' vision was a narrow one; all they looked for was an effective military leader (20). Samuel's description of kingship in action draws attention to forced labour and conscription, heavy taxes and finally tyranny. So if Israel chose kingship, as they did, they would eventually have to pay a heavy price for the limited military benefits. They believed a king would give them such things as security, stability and success; Samuel warned them that kings were much more likely to take than to give. (Notice how often the verb take occurs in vs 11–17.)

It has often been pointed out that the details of vs 11–17 fit Solomon very well, and it can be argued that the description is of a much later date than Samuel's time. Against this view, there is plenty of evidence that long before Solomon's time the excesses of kingship were well known, and there is no reason why Samuel should not have voiced such sentiments. Both arguments have a valid point to make. Samuel probably did attack the whole idea of monarchy, but equally probably the biblical writer has expanded Samuel's speech in order to remind later readers of the way in which Solomon demonstrated the truth of Samuel's arguments.

If the Israelites then chose a monarchy, they would eventually be sorry—there could be no turning back. But Samuel's warning fell on deaf ears (19). We are not to suppose that the elders' decision gave God no choice, but he freely chose to let Israel have its own way in this matter (21). V 20 shows that although the elders wanted Israel to be able to defeat other nations, they also wanted to adopt the patterns set by other nations. Consciously or unconsciously, God's people are always under social pressure to conform to the ways of the world. Paul warned of the danger (see Rom. 12:2).

9:1–14 Saul comes to Ramah. It is very likely that at this point the biblical author made use of a different document for his information, but in any case there is no doubt about his literary skill and dramatic effects. Without any warning, the scene shifts from Samuel to Saul, here mentioned for the first time. The reader is held in suspense, wondering how Samuel will go about finding and making a king; but naturally every reader must have known that Saul had been Israel's first king, so the introduction of his name causes no surprise. The story goes on to explain the circumstances in which Samuel and Saul met. Note how skilfully the narrator disguises the fact that Ramah is the town and Samuel the prophet. (Ramah was Samuel's home town, but he had only just returned to it from his judicial circuit, see 7:16–17.) The only clue given is the mention of the district of Zuph (5), where Ramah was (see 1:1).

From one point of view, this is a typical 'rags to riches' story. Saul's family were not paupers, and he himself was physically impressive (2); but the family were not aristocrats, and their tribe, Benjamin, was small and relatively unimportant in Israel (see v 21), overshadowed by Ephraim to the north and Judah to the south. Saul can have had no ambitions or expectations about becoming king. The chief point of this passage may well be Saul's innocence and lack of ambition. He did not set out to gain any fame or power, but merely to retrieve his father's lost property. He did not seek kingship; but God, so to speak, found him and went on to make him king. Saul did not even know who Samuel was, or recognize him when they met. We can imagine that after the events of ch. 8, some ambitious men may have tried to get access to Samuel, to impress him with their ability, or to win his favour. Saul was not such a man.

Note. 12 Altars, such as Samuel had built at Ramah (7:17) were often on hills (or artificial mounds), and such 'high places' served as open-air shrines. It is clear from this passage that Samuel was not merely prophet and judge, but still had some priestly functions too.

9:15–27 Samuel entertains Saul. The story so far has made it clear that no human being had planned that Samuel and Saul should ever meet. God had overruled Saul's movements, and now revealed directly to Samuel that Saul was God's own choice to be king. So Samuel knew Saul when the two men met, and also knew what must be done to make Saul king. Saul, however, remained in ignorance of God's plans throughout the events of this chapter: Samuel only gradually made him aware that God had special plans for him. In v 20, Samuel referred to the desire of Israel; the reader understands that he meant their desire for a king, but such a remark naturally puzzled Saul. Then Samuel's action in v 24 showed Saul that he was an honoured guest, but still did not reveal the full truth. The section continues to make the point that far from grasping at kingship and power, Saul even now was humbly unaware of his future role. Saul did not seize power, nor did Samuel promote some close friend of his own to the kingship; Saul was wholly God's choice.

The word 'king' does not occur in this chapter. V 16 and 10:1 both use the word leader (Heb. nāgîd) instead. The exact meaning of the Hebrew word is disputed; possibly 'king-designate' is the sense, with the implication that Saul was not actually king until the public ceremony at Mizpah described in ch. 10. At any rate, in the context it is unlikely that the word stands in any contrast to a king, because the verb anoint, used with it, implies kingship. The function of Saul as leader is clarified: his task is to deliver Israel from the Philistines and to govern (lit. 'restrain', 'control') the Israelites. In this way God was going to provide, through Saul, the two most important political needs of the time. The first was the defeat of the enemy, who could otherwise have crushed Israel out of existence. The other was the internal need of Israel for unity and strong government.

Note. 27 Samuel made sure that it would be a private anointing; not even his servant knew the secret. The first anointing of David was also private (16:1–13). In both cases, their reigns did not actually begin until a public ceremony had been held.

10:1–8 The anointing. The simple act of anointing is described in v 1. Oil was poured on the future king's head by a representative of the LORD, in this case Samuel. This act symbolized that God was marking this man out, setting him apart from everyone else, as his choice of king. We cannot be sure of the full significance of anointing in Israel. One possibility is that it was a symbol of a covenant relationship; if so, it showed God making a special covenant with the individual king, promising to give him help, strength and wisdom. The oil was perhaps a symbol of God-given power. Anointing was a well-known ritual in the Ancient Near East, although outside Israel it was not usual to anoint kings. In Egypt, the king was not anointed, but his vassals were. If the same concept was familiar in Israel, it may well suggest that the anointing made Saul the vassal-king under Yahweh, who was the great king.

V 1 also describes Israel as Yahweh's inheritance, his permanent possession. This description, which included both the land and the people, is another important statement to the new king: he is in no sense the owner of Israel, which still belongs to God.

So Saul would be subordinate to God; but even so, kingship was a brand-new institution in Israel, and it would not be surprising if Saul had doubts about it all. He needed signs that he really was to be king, and signs too that he was capable of the task. Accordingly, he was promised three signs. (V 7 makes it clear that Samuel's predictions were meant as signs, and very likely the original Hebrew text mentioned signs in v 1 as well; see the NIV mg.) The first sign (2) was to assure him that he could put the past behind him; his future role was not that of a farmer. The second sign (3–4) was to assure him that the Israelites would recognize him as king. The loaves of bread were part of the offerings being taken to the shrine at Bethel, so the men would not give them casually to any passing stranger, but only to somebody of very high status. The third sign (5–6) would give him assurance that he had the necessary gifts and abilities for the task of leadership. The 'judges' before him had all been equipped for leadership by the gift of the Spirit of the LORD, and Saul would recognize that he was being equipped in the same way. Once these signs had been fulfilled, Saul could have full confidence to act as king, because God would clearly be with him.

Gibeah was Saul's home town (26), called 'Gibeah of Saul' in 11:4. Its full name was Gibeah of God, or Gibeath-elohim. It indicates the weakness of Israel that even in Saul's own home town there was a Philistine outpost at this time. Bands of prophets were a feature of times of political and spiritual danger (see also 2 Ki. 2). Unlike the great individual prophets, they appear to have remained in communities, and responded to music with ecstatic behaviour. There is evidence that Saul was easily affected by music (see 16:14–23), and God here planned to make use of this facet of Saul's personality.

V 8 is Samuel's final instruction to Saul in this passage, and it refers forward to ch. 13 (see 13:4, 8). Samuel's words to Saul must have been more detailed than this brief sentence intended for the reader, which gives the misleading impression that Saul was to go immediately to Gilgal. This cannot be the case, in view of all the events that followed before either Samuel or Saul went to Gilgal. From ch. 13 we can deduce that Samuel must have instructed Saul, once he had taken charge as king, to summon an Israelite assembly at Gilgal to form an army against the Philistines. But that lay some while in the future.

10:9–16 The secret is kept. The story-teller briefly lets us know that all three signs were fulfilled, and he moves straight to the third of them, with a new purpose in mind. It is important that the story should emphasize that nobody except Samuel and Saul knew that Saul had been designated king. This emphasis is conveyed by recounting two episodes. The first episode, the fulfilment of the third sign, shows that although Saul himself learned from the sign, other people misunderstood it completely. Indeed, they sneered at Saul's experience—so much so that it became a saying, reinforced by a later event (see 19:23–24). They apparently sneered at the band of prophets too, if And who is their father? means 'they are nobodies!'. Plainly Saul's experience did not impress people in his own home town of Gibeah. Acts 2:13 records a similar episode, when Spirit-filled men were insulted by bystanders; and 1 Cor. 2:14 remarks in general terms that 'The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them.'

The second episode is a conversation Saul had with his uncle, not previously mentioned, whom he met at the local shrine. Saul's father would have known why he had been absent, but his uncle did not. Saul's mention of Samuel invited his uncle's curiosity, but Saul was careful to say nothing about the kingship. So not even Saul's neighbours and relatives had any idea of the fact that he was the man destined to be king.

10:17–27 The ceremony at Mizpah. Mizpah seems to have acted as the capital city at this time; this was the second national assembly to be held there (see 7:15–16). So it was the appropriate place for the ceremony which would make Saul king. This passage is the direct sequel to ch. 8, so far as the Israelite representatives were concerned, for they would have known nothing of the personal and private events recorded in 9:1–10:16. Samuel immediately repeated his earlier rebukes in the name of Yahweh. Even though Saul had been chosen and equipped by Yahweh to serve as king, the Israelite demand for a king was still seen as defiance of God. Samuel reminded them afresh that God had never failed to rescue them from powerful enemies.

We might have expected Samuel to announce at once that Yahweh had chosen Saul, and then to proceed to a public anointing. But vs 20–24 record a very different ceremony, one in which Saul is chosen by lot, just as if no previous decision had been made. We know all too little about the mechanism that was used; in particular, it is puzzling how Saul can have been picked out in his absence. The point is nevertheless made that even now Saul is a modest and humble man, avoiding rather than seeking kingship. He was an impressive figure, however, and most of the assembly gave him instant recognition. And so Saul was made king by acclamation: he was not imposed on the Israelites by Samuel or by Yahweh, but was accepted by the representatives of Israel as a whole. (It is implied that the trouble-makers were few in number.) It was important that this first king of Israel should have a united people behind him, so it was appropriate that the people should freely and voluntarily accept him as king. This fact explains why the secrecy had been necessary beforehand.

V 25 refers to a document, deposited at the shrine, where no doubt the priests looked after it. It has been described as the royal 'constitution'. We are given no details of its content, but it was probably an expanded version of Dt. 17:18–20. The regulations no doubt included both 'rights and duties' (as the single Hebrew word is rendered in the RSV). In other words, it was a document which told the king what he had a right to expect from his citizens, and what his duties were, under God, towards them. Thus the king and the people were in covenant relationship with each other.

Saul went home like everyone else (26); Gibeah seems to have become his capital city in due course. At the start of the monarchy, there can have been no central taxation system, and Saul was for the time being dependent on his farm for his livelihood (see 11:5).

It is not really surprising that there were some cynical Israelites who doubted Saul's ability to lead Israel to victory over the Philistines (27). If the Israelite elders had been guilty of rejecting God's kingship, these men were doubly guilty, for they rejected God's choice of a human king too. They are described as trouble-makers, or 'worthless people' (GNB).

11:1–11 Saul's first victory. The biblical writer once again surprises the reader, by switching attention away from Israel's central region and western frontier (where the Philistines were located) to the south-eastern frontier. The Ammonite king Nahash ruled a small state in Trans-jordan, on the borders of the Israelite territory known as Gilead. At some earlier date his army had invaded Israelite territory, and they now besieged the city of Jabesh Gilead. (See map of Canaan in Joshua.)

This situation illustrates the extent of Israelite weakness at the start of Saul's reign; again we must bear in mind that the ceremony making Saul king gave Israel potential for unity and strength, but did not create these things automatically or immediately. We cannot be sure how far Saul's real authority extended even at the height of his powers and reputation; at the start of his reign his degree of control was probably very limited. Each Israelite tribe had been used to acting independently, and this narrative reveals that even an individual city like Jabesh Gilead could make its own treaties. It is significant too that the messengers from Jabesh acted as if Saul were not king, and sent word throughout Israel, seeking any help they could find; but it was Saul who in fact responded to their appeal.

The situation also shows the extent of Ammonite hatred for Israelites, though the brutality envisaged in v 2 contrasts oddly, by modern standards, with the gentlemanly delay described in v 3. Ammon was too small to have attacked a united Israel, but a disunited Israel, distracted by Philistine aggression elsewhere, was a natural prey.

Vs 6–11 reveal how Saul responded. Like the 'judges' before him, he was given power by the Spirit of God, and acted with vigour and authority, demanding a full muster of Israelite men from towns and villages, farms and fields. V 7 implies that it was fear of Yahweh rather than respect for Saul or Samuel which led so many men to come to fight the necessary battle. The numbers of soldiers given in v 8 seem much too big, here as elsewhere in the OT historical books. It is often suggested that the Hebrew word translated thousand in the NIV (and most English versions) should instead be translated '[military] unit', a fairly small group of soldiers. It is interesting to find Judah listed separately from the rest of Israel. This distinction may reflect the later division of the kingdom after Solomon's death.

This passage (and many others in the OT) reveals a God who helped his people in warfare, a concept which creates a moral problem for many Christians. The historical realities of the situation were such that there could be no peaceful solution. This Israelite war, moreover, was not due to territorial greed, nor a desire to dominate other peoples, but to prevent injustice and oppression. The OT consistently shows God's opposition to injustice.

Saul's first decisive action, then, resulted in an important victory. The citizens of Jabesh never forgot their debt to him (see 31:11–13).

11:12–15 The ceremony at Gilgal. The sequel to Saul's victory in Transjordan was a ceremony at Gilgal, when all the people acknowledged Saul as king. No doubt the participants mostly consisted of his victorious army. Gilgal was the nearest to the River Jordan of the cities where Samuel exercised authority (7:16). Some scholars find in this chapter the only genuine historical account of how Saul became king; it is easy enough to dismiss v 14 (and all mention of Samuel in the chapter) as an editorial addition, and then to translate the phrase confirmed Saul as king as 'made Saul king' (the literal sense). However, the story reads plausibly enough as it stands, and the reason for a new ceremony is plain to see, in view of the earlier measure of hostility to Saul (10:27). Now for the first time the whole nation gave him allegiance. The reference to Yahweh and to fellowship offerings in v 15 may suggest a covenant ceremony, on analogy with Ex. 24.

The excitement of the victory and of the ceremony led to a great celebration: lit. 'Saul and all the Israelites rejoiced very greatly'. The absence of Samuel's name is significant: if everyone else had by now forgotten the events of ch. 8, he had not. No blame is attached to Saul, but the elders of Israel had been guilty of rejecting both Yahweh and Samuel. The next chapter goes on to express Samuel's further rebukes and warnings.

12:1–15 Samuel's speech. It is not certain whether this speech belongs to the same context as the end of ch. 11, namely the assembly at Gilgal, or to a later national assembly towards the end of Samuel's life. In some ways the speech reads like a farewell, but the brief introduction to it in v 1 gives us no clue. In any case, the speech comes appropriately at this point. The biblical writer places it here to provide the reader with an opportunity for reflection before beginning the story of the monarchy. Ch. 11 had ended on a note of joy and excitement, as the Israelites celebrated one victory and looked forward confidently to future victories over the Philistines. They now had a king, and one who had already proved himself a capable soldier. So they had a strong sense of well-being. However, Samuel's speech analysed the present situation and explored the past, in order to provide guidance for the future. The speech makes it clear that the future did not depend on the existence of a king, nor on his abilities, but on the will of God. God's will in turn would depend on their loyalty to him.

First, Samuel asked for an accounting of his own administration, now that he had relinquished political leadership (1–5). His hearers could only agree that he had given them good and just leadership in every respect over many years. (Nothing is said of their earlier complaint about his two sons in 8:1–5; but the reference to his sons here in v 2 may imply that he had dismissed them from their posts in Beersheba and brought them back home.) There is emphasis on the fact that Samuel had taken nothing unjustly from anyone. This description of Samuel makes a strong contrast with his own description of kings in 8:11–18, which shows them taking one thing after another from their subjects. There is a broader perspective intended by the biblical author. The speech is contrasting the judges of the past with the kings of the present and future. The leaders of the past had been individuals chosen by God, and so had given good government; but now the Israelites were beginning to choose their own leaders, and that was a very dangerous step to take. It was true that God had chosen Saul, and would later choose David too, but in the Northern Kingdom after Solomon's death, many kings would be chosen by one section or another of the populace.

Vs 8–11 remind the Israelites of several important facts from their past history. First, God had constantly looked after their needs, rescuing them from many enemies. Secondly, God had chosen and provided the human leaders who had led them to victory. Thirdly, their defeats had been due to their own sinfulness, since they had repeatedly turned from Yahweh to idolatry. V 11 lists some of the able leaders God had provided for them. It is not impossible that Samuel included his own name, as the last of the judges, or perhaps the biblical author added it; but possibly we should read Samson's name instead (see the NIV mg.)

V 12 renews the accusation of 8:7–8 that by demanding a human king the Israelites were rejecting Yahweh's kingship over them. This verse, which implies that Nahash must have been harassing Israelites in Transjordan long before his attack on Jabesh Gilead, shows how readily Israel made the wrong response to the situations that arose. When Nahash harassed them, they ought to have realized that only their own disloyalty to God could have caused such a situation; but instead of repentance (as in the past) they took matters into their own hands, rejected Yahweh's rule, and demanded a king. However, at least they had asked Yahweh to choose the actual man to be king, and perhaps because of that, Yahweh was now prepared to give them another chance before any punishment. It all depended on their, and their king's, obedience to Yahweh.

12:16–25 Encouragement and warning. Samuel's listeners might have questioned whether his interpretation of Israel's history was correct. Any such doubts were removed by a miraculous sign from heaven. In early summer, the time of the wheat harvest, neither thunder nor rain would normally occur in the land of Israel, so Samuel's prediction and its prompt fulfilment proved that God was speaking through him. This whole passage shows Samuel to be a prophet in every sense of the word. He analysed the past and present, he predicted the future, he reminded Israel of God's goodness, he recalled them from idolatry, and he promised to intercede for them in prayer and teach them what was good and right.

V 22 reminds hearers and readers that Yahweh had entered into a covenant with his people: God had made Israel his own people, and was bound by his own oath not to reject them. So the lesson—both for Samuel's listeners and for later generations—was their duty to keep their side of the covenant. If they failed to do so, particularly by turning from true worship to idols, then God would undoubtedly punish them. The last verse indicates in a few words how God would punish them: by exile and by the fall of the monarchy, both of which occurred in the sixth century BC. Thus, as soon as the monarchy began, its end was envisaged. There is, however, a note of hope here for those who lived in the exilic period. Samuel's speech showed that the eventual fall of the monarchy would be part of God's actions and planning, and that even then the LORD will not reject his people. So even in the distress of the exile, Yahweh's people must not turn to other gods. In case any readers were tempted to do so, v 21 draws attention to the useless nature of idols.

13:1–15:35 Warfare and conflict

Much of Saul's reign would be a wartime situation. The Philistines were the chief enemy, and chs. 13 and 14 tell of some of Saul's early successes against them. Ch. 15 gives details of a victory over a smaller enemy, the Amalekites. Other victorious campaigns are mentioned in 14:47 but not described. So from one point of view these chapters describe a very successful start to Saul's reign, in which he consistently 'delivered' the Israelites from their enemies (14:47).

Yet these same chapters end on a grim and unhappy note: the LORD was grieved that he had made Saul king over Israel (15:35). The events recorded in chs. 13–15 were occasions not only of warfare against foreign enemies but also of personal conflicts between Saul and other Israelites. In ch. 14, Saul might have killed his own son, and he ended up quarrelling with his own troops. More seriously, in both chs. 13 and 15 we find Saul causing great offence to Samuel, who spoke in the name of God. Despite all the good signs up to this point, Saul quickly proved that though he could win battles, he was not the right man to lead Israel.

Saul's reign was not a total disaster, even though it ended in failure and defeat (recorded in ch. 31). He gave Israel fresh hope as he began to coordinate its tribes (previously independent), gradually built up an army, defeated the Philistines more than once, and drove them out of Israelite lands. Despite his final failure in battle, he paved the way for his successor in some important respects. David's own testimony to Saul should not be overlooked (2 Sa. 1:19–27).

Nevertheless, chs. 13–15 show clearly that from God's point of view Saul was a failure, in spite of the fact that God himself had chosen him to be king. The basic reason given is that he refused to submit to God's instructions mediated through Samuel the prophet. The message is clear: God would not bless a king of Israel who set himself above the prophets whom God established. The events described in chs. 13–15 can be seen as a power struggle, God siding with the prophet against the king.

It is not clear how long Saul's reign lasted. The uncertainty is due to the fact that as it stands, the Hebrew text of 13:1 reads as follows: 'Saul was year(s) old when he became king, and for two years he reigned over Israel'. Plainly a number has accidentally dropped out before the phrase 'year(s) old', and the NIV has very reasonably inserted the figure thirty, taken from some Greek manuscripts (see the NIV mg.) It is therefore equally reasonable to suppose that another figure has accidentally been omitted, before the two years assigned to his reign, although a few scholars believe that a mere two years is the correct figure. The figure forty-two is based on Acts 13:21 and on the Jewish historian Josephus; both give the round figure 'forty'. However, the number forty was often used in OT times to signify a generation, so a smaller figure, such as the 'twenty-two' of the NEB, is quite possible. A mere two years is very unlikely.

13:1–7 Preparations for battle. V 2 describes Saul's general preparations for the inevitable warfare with the Philistines. He chose men to form a permanent army in readiness for battle, and stationed them in two different places. He himself captained the larger body of troops, and his son Jonathan (here mentioned for the first time) captained the other. V 3 then describes the cause of the first major battle. Angry at the loss of their outpost, the Philistines brought a large and well-equipped army into Israelite territory, determined to crush the smaller Israelite army. The Israelite troops had very few proper weapons (see v 22), and it is not surprising that many of them deserted. Saul's 2000 men dwindled to 600 (15). But Saul had one hidden advantage: he had still one command from God to carry out, and his obedience to this command could transform his hopeless situation. This command was to go to Gilgal and wait there for Samuel (10:8). So Saul went to Gilgal (4) and remained there in readiness (7).

13:8–14 Samuel rebukes Saul. At the last minute Saul disobeyed Samuel's instructions. A modern reader's sympathy tends to lie with Saul, since the military situation was so critical

(his men were deserting) and Samuel arrived late. It is clear, however, that Samuel was only slightly late, but Saul had not waited a moment longer than the time stipulated. Saul is not rebuked for taking priestly functions upon himself, but rather for taking the prophet's place. Samuel had promised (10:8) both to offer the sacrifices which were appropriate before a battle and also to give Saul guidance and instructions about the battle. But Saul believed he could dispense with both. His offence may seem trivial to us, but a basic question was involved: would the new king be subject to the prophet or would he overrule him? The prophet spoke and acted on God's behalf, so Saul had proved by one foolish deed that he did not consider himself bound by God's instructions. It was an action which would cost his family the kingship (14). God would transfer it to another man, a man after his own heart, i.e. 'the kind of man he wants' (GNB). David is meant, who comes into the story in ch. 16. David was no more sinless than Saul, but he was always obedient to prophetic instructions.

13:15–23 Troop movements. This paragraph briefly sets out the final troop movements which preceded the battle. By moving his men to Gibeah, Saul was uniting his force with Jonathan's (see v 2), and so even if the Israelite soldiers were few in number and badly equipped, they were one single army. The Philistines on the other hand divided their troops to a limited extent (17), and this apparently contributed to their defeat.

19–21 Till now, the Philistines had been able to deny the Israelites swords and spears, and had charged a very high price for sharpening any tools that might be used as weapons. Presumably the Israelites had at least bows and arrows.

14:1–23 Jonathan's exploit. Nobody would have expected an Israelite victory, in view of all the difficulties described in the previous chapter, but two things changed the situation dramatically. One was Jonathan's courage and daring, and the other was the will of God to give Israel victory. As Jonathan himself remarked, Nothing can hinder the LORD from saving. The Philistines were literally uncircumcised, since they did not practise this custom; but the word is used here to mean that they were outside the covenant between Yahweh and Israel. Gn. 17 shows that circumcision was a covenantal sign. God would fight on behalf of his covenant people. Jonathan's plan succeeded by sheer surprise, and by the use of a very narrow vantage-point among the hills and valleys. Thus two men were able to kill twenty.

No doubt Jonathan ought to have told his father (1), but the impression we get from v 2 is that Saul was as much in ignorance of God's plans as he was of Jonathan's. He was a man out of touch with events, despite the fact that he was accompanied by the priest Ahijah from Shiloh. Ahijah was wearing an ephod, the priestly robe which offered a means for finding out the will of God (see Ex. 28:6–30). Yet it seems that Saul made no effort to find out God's will.

Vs 15–19 describe panic among the Philistines, following Jonathan's surprise attack, and puzzlement among Saul's troops. At last Saul made a move to consult God (18), but since the situation was developing rapidly, he changed his mind. The biblical writer thus emphasizes that it was God who won the victory (15, 23); Saul joined in the pursuit of the fleeing Philistines, but knew little about what was happening.

18 The mention of the ark is surprising here, though it is possible that it had been brought from Kiriath Jearim (7:1–2), just as it had been taken from Shiloh to an earlier battlefield (4:4–5). It seems more likely that the Greek text should be followed here, which refers to the 'ephod' instead of the ark (see the NIV mg.). We know from v 3 that Ahijah was wearing the ephod, by which God's will could be discovered. In Hebrew, the words 'ark' and 'ephod' are quite similar and could easily be confused.

14:24–45 Jonathan in danger. The story again takes an unexpected turn. The battle situation continues until v 46, but it is from now on merely a background to the interplay between Saul, Jonathan and their troops. The storyteller leaves these three parties to speak and act for themselves, and offers neither moral nor religious judgments on any of them. This leaves the reader with a number of unanswered questions. Was Saul right to make the oath he did (24–28)? Was Jonathan right to criticize the oath publicly (29–30)? Were the troops justified in ignoring the oath (31)? Was Saul right to seek to enforce the oath and execute an innocent man, his own son (44)? Were the troops right to defend Jonathan, and so disobey their king’s authority (45)? Perhaps these are questions we are not meant to ask. The writer’s purpose is not to moralize but to draw a clearer picture of Saul for us.

He appears as an impulsive man, making a foolish oath on the spur of the moment, without thinking about the consequences. Nevertheless, having made it he earnestly tried to carry it out to the letter. He had disobeyed Yahweh at Gilgal (ch. 13), and he had no wish to receive a second rebuke from Samuel. So he carefully offered sacrifices (33–35), and then took the proper steps to find out God’s guidance: in other words, he consulted the sacred ephod in the priest Ahijah’s possession (36, 37, 41, 42; and see v 3). Finding that Jonathan was the man who had innocently broken the oath, Saul was fully prepared to carry out the execution of his own son, rather than break his vow to God. The impression we gain is of a man who was out of touch with God’s wishes. V 37 mentions that God did not answer him, and the troops’ final comment (45) gave the credit for the victory to Jonathan and to God, not to Saul. We can readily sympathize with an impulsive and well-meaning but blundering man, but is such a man suitable to be king? Obviously not. Thus the whole episode demonstrated two things: that God could give victory to Israel against more powerful enemies, and that Saul’s leadership achieved little. Although he remained king until the end of his life, God’s plans were already bypassing him.

Note. 41–42 Without knowing exactly how the sacred mechanism worked, we can see that it was able to answer direct questions and pick out one man from another. The two parts of the mechanism were called ‘Urim’ and ‘Thummim’, which are named in the Greek text of these verses (see the NIV mg.) See also Ex. 28:29–30.

14:46–52 Outline of Saul’s reign. The chapter ends with some brief details about Saul’s reign, for our fuller information. V 47 indicates the range of enemies threatening Israel at this period, on the east, north and west. The Amalekites (48), to the south, were raiders who harassed the settled population of the area. The next chapter describes Saul’s campaign against them. The Philistines had now been driven out of Israelite territory (46) but never stopped their invasions and attacks (52).

Most of Saul’s family named in vs 49–51 will come into the story at later points. V 52, which relates to Saul’s standing army, lays a foundation for the career of David (18:2, 5).

15:1–35 The final rejection of Saul. The writer’s purpose in this detailed narrative is to confirm Saul’s unsuitability to rule Israel, and to confirm Yahweh’s rejection of him. Through Samuel, Saul was given explicit orders. He carried them out in part, but saw no harm in disregarding the rest of them. V 24 shows that he knew perfectly well what he was doing (and tells us the reason why he did so), but he told lies about it twice over (13, 20), pretending that he thought he had obeyed orders. Finally, he was forced to admit the truth and confess that he had sinned, and violated the LORD’s command. The result was God’s final rejection of him, and also the final breach between him and Samuel.

As with ch. 13, the modern reader’s sympathy tends to lie with Saul, not because of his lies, but because he wanted to save a man’s life. It is important, therefore, to realize from the start that Saul had no humanitarian motives whatever—that is not the point at issue. The issue, as the biblical author sees it, is whether a king of Israel was willing or not to obey God’s instructions as given through a prophet. Obedience is the key virtue (22); but Saul had displayed arrogance (23). The livestock evidently attracted the greed of Saul’s troops, and no doubt of Saul too. It is less clear why Agag’s life was spared, but probably Saul saw some political or financial advantage in it, and hoped to negotiate a deal with other Amalekite groups.

The Amalekites were old enemies of Israel (2), and their whole way of life was a threat to the Israelite people. They had some cities, but for the most part they were nomads, brutally raiding and plundering farms and livestock, especially on the southern borders of Israel. Their very existence was thus a permanent threat to Israel, and stern measures were essential and justified. The Amalekites were a wicked people (18).

The command in God’s name to destroy the Amalekites totally (3) made use of what is called in English a ‘ban’, a custom practised occasionally both by Israel and its neighbours. This religious vow of total destruction was not frequently employed, not even during warfare, and there were always special reasons for its use. Notice how careful the Israelites were to make sure that another tribe, the Kenites, were not harmed along with the Amalekites (6). The fact that even livestock were included in the ‘ban’ shows that there was a sort of sacrificial aspect to it; in a sense, killing humans and animals was a way of handing them over to God. The people who were so wicked must be eliminated as a threat, and they and all their belongings were, by the ‘ban’, handed over to Yahweh. It was greed, not kindness, which caused the ‘ban’ to be broken (9, 19).

The NT counterpart to such a story is the spiritual battle Paul speaks about (Eph. 6:10–18). Paul advises constant alertness, because greed, lies and disobedience are dangers to God’s people in every age.

The historical importance of this chapter is that it explains why Yahweh and the prophet Samuel rejected Saul. Its theological importance is to be seen especially in vs 22, 23 and 29. Vs 22 and 23 put in perspective the relative values of obedience to God and worship of God. It is a frequent human error to think that God will overlook and forgive all one’s sins so long as one is careful to attend the shrine (or church) and offer sacrifices (or hymns of praise). Several OT prophets had to attack this false reasoning; Amos could even describe God as saying that he ‘hated’ and ‘despised’ religious feasts, sacrifices and offerings (Am. 5:21–24). In the same way, we tend to think false worship is the worst possible sin against God; Samuel said that arrogant disobedience was just as bad.

V 29 offers us a description of God as one who does not lie (unlike Saul!) nor change his mind. God may in mercy delay punishment, or give men and women opportunities to change their minds in repentance; but he does not change his mind about his purposes and plans. God had determined that the future of Israel would be in the hands of a better man, David (28). Later readers, no doubt in very different circumstances, could take comfort and assurance from the fact that their God made them promises, and his promises were absolutely true and certain.

The chapter ends on an unhappy note: Samuel mourned and Yahweh was grieved. Israel must be provided with a better king than Saul. Ch. 16 tells how God began the process of replacing Saul.

16:1–31:13 Saul and David

The rest of 1 Samuel is the story of Saul's relationship with David. Samuel, after anointing David to be the next king, quietly fades from the scene. Saul has been rejected, although God permitted him to remain king as long as he lived. But the future will lie with David, who is very young and inexperienced as yet. These chapters describe how God equipped him for his future career, watched over him through every danger, and exhibited him to Israel as the man of his choice.

16:1–17:58 David takes his place at court

David's proper place was the royal court, but he would scarcely be welcome there as successor-designate to Saul. These two chapters tell how his own abilities brought him to Saul's side.

16:1–13 The anointing of David. Here too the narrator's skill is very evident, as he holds back mention of David's name until the last verse, even though David is the real focus of the story. From this chapter until the end of 2 Samuel, David will be the central figure. The chief purpose of this section is to show that David was chosen by God and anointed by Samuel. David was no ruthless, ambitious man determined to seize power. He was God's own choice, even when he was a young lad doing a humble task. Even Samuel would have chosen another man (6)! It was important that Samuel should carry out the anointing, the old leader creating the new leader. This action provided continuity of leadership in Israel. It was also an objective proof, though admittedly to a very small and private group of people, that David was meant to be king. A prophet might have a private call from God, but a man chosen to be king must have something more than just an inner voice calling him, which other people might doubt.

The story includes in v 7 a general point about God's principles of choice. It seems that the Israelites expected their leaders to have an impressive physique and good looks (7, 12 and 18; 9:2). Wiser Israelites would have looked more for inner qualities, and v 7 confirms that God does so. To David's inner qualities, God added something else—the power of his Spirit (13). David had this gift from Yahweh no less than the judges and Saul before him; it was vital to the leadership of the nation. In this general OT context, the function of Yahweh's Spirit was to equip individuals for military leadership.

We are reminded in vs 2, 4 and 5 that Saul was still king, and a man to be feared. From a purely political point of view, Samuel's action in anointing David amounted to treason, and he was forced to use secrecy and even a measure of deceit.

16:14–23 David brought to the court. This passage and ch. 17 show how two separate talents of David brought him to Saul's attention, making him a permanent member of the royal court (18:2). The first talent was his skill as a harpist, and the second was his military ability, which took time to develop. This passage concentrates on his musical gifts, but briefly mentions his military skills too. The background was a period of occasional Philistine attacks, when Saul would be forced to call men from their farms to fight the enemy. Thus David was sometimes looking after his father's sheep and at other times fighting the Philistines. By itself, his ability on the battlefield might not have brought him to Saul's notice; it was his skill as a harpist which brought him to the royal court.

V 14 gives us the first indication of the problems that would disturb Saul from now on. His position as king was never easy, with the Philistines a permanent threat and with the unity and support of Israel a doubtful matter. Samuel's rejection too must have undermined both his position and his peace of mind. So he is said to have suffered from an evil spirit from the LORD, which must not be understood as demon possession. The biblical writer is making the point that as David (the future king) gained the Spirit of Yahweh, so Saul (the rejected king) lost it; and God so controlled events that Saul's loss led him to need music, and Saul's own courtier led him to David. In that sense Saul's evil spirit, his anxious state of mind, was under God's control.

Thus David's first step towards kingship was to come to the royal court and give valued service to the existing king. There is good reason to think that David later suffered much hostile propaganda, which claimed that he had been a ruthless traitor during Saul's reign. Passages like ch. 16, therefore, stress David's loyalty and goodwill towards Saul.

17:1–11 The Philistine challenge. The scene switches from the peaceful royal court to a new battlefield, near Socoh in Judah—in other words there was a fresh invasion by Philistine troops, which Saul had to counter. Perhaps because of earlier losses, the Philistines used a different type of warfare this time. They put forward a champion (4) and demanded that an Israelite champion should come forward and fight him in single combat. The theory behind such individual combat was the belief that either the gods or the stronger god would grant victory to whichever man they chose. A victory could thus be won without much loss of life. In view of Goliath's height, powerful weapons and strong armour, the Philistines clearly had no doubts who would win. It is noteworthy that not even Saul, whose height has been emphasized earlier in the story (9:2, 10:23), had the courage to accept the challenge; he too was dismayed and terrified (11). Saul thus displayed his lack of leadership: Israel needed a new soldier to lead them into battle.

17:12–30 David comes to the battlefield. David now comes back into the story. Vs 12–19 explain how it happened that he was not with the Israelite army when Goliath first uttered his challenge, and why he came on the scene some forty days later. The author means us to understand that God overruled these events. David did not come as a warrior, it is evident. (Probably the events of ch. 17 took place before those of 16:21.) V 25 is not unimportant, since it explains why David would become prominent in Israel, and lays a foundation for 18:17. However, this verse makes an interesting contrast with v. 26. In his decision to take up Goliath's challenge, David's motives were not his own wealth and honour, but the wish to honour God and to remove disgrace from Israel. David showed himself a suitable leader for Israel, in contrast to the frightened Saul and his own quarrelsome brothers.

17:31–40 Saul interviews David. This conversation between Saul and David highlights David's courage and his faith in the living God, and so again testifies to his suitable qualities for leadership. Saul could have displayed the same faith and courage, but he did not. Saul is shown to put his faith in military experience and in strong armour, so that his attitude was not really very different from that of Goliath. The storyteller would not have denied, of course, that experience and armour are usually important in battle; but the truth was that only God could give David the victory in this unique situation.

17:41–58 David's victory. So the duel took place. It seemed a very unequal contest to Goliath, who felt insulted when he saw an apparently unarmed youth approaching. The reader, however, knows in advance that it really was an unequal contest, since David's God was in control. Both combatants made their speeches, as was appropriate in a battle between champions, and both named their gods. Goliath could only utter curses by his gods, but David's God was no tribal deity but the God who would become known in the whole world. The LORD saves (47) is the motto of the whole Bible; in context, David does not mean his own salvation from death but the deliverance of Israel from Philistine domination.

David's exploit resulted in a wide-ranging victory, and the Philistines were driven back to their own cities of Gath and Ekron. David had driven them away from Israelite territory. The battle trophies included the head of Goliath; the skull was later taken to Jerusalem, after David had captured that city (2 Sa. 5).

The final paragraph, vs 55–58, has caused much discussion. Scholars have often interpreted it as meaning that Saul did not recognize David or know anything about him. If so, it contradicts 16:14–23. It may be agreed that ch. 17 is drawn from a different source document than ch. 16, but it is not necessary to conclude that ch. 17 reflects a tradition that Saul and David had never previously met. On the evidence of ch. 17 alone, we know that the two men were in conversation before David's encounter with Goliath, so Saul must have known David's name at the very least. The questions Saul put to Abner were not so much about David, in fact, as about his family, presumably because Saul was now under obligation to give David his daughter in marriage, in fulfilment of his vow (17:25). It was, therefore, important for him to find out all he could about the background of the man who would now be a court figure.

18:1–20:42 David and Jonathan

Though it forms a part of the more significant story of the relationship between David and Saul, this section of 1 Samuel concentrates more on Jonathan than on Saul. The biblical writer had a purpose in describing so fully this proverbial friendship. He wanted to demonstrate beyond any doubt that the man whom David displaced from succeeding to the throne was his best friend. The story helped to disprove any later rumours that David had been a hated rival of Jonathan. In the end, it was the Philistines who killed Jonathan, at a time when David was far away (ch. 31). Before then, Jonathan himself would acknowledge David as the future king over Israel (23:16–18).

18:1–9 Saul's jealousy. The immediate result of David's exploit against Goliath was a place at court, and he gained a high rank in the army. Jonathan, whose earlier exploit had also caused an Israelite victory, showed no jealousy of this new man at court; on the contrary, he quickly made a lasting friendship with him. Indeed, his actions towards David seemed to signify that he saw in David a greater man than himself, a man who deserved to lead Israel in the future.

With far less cause, Saul did show jealousy. The popular song that angered him was never intended to make him inferior to David; the numbers were not meant to be exact! Rather, the song was meant to declare what a fine team David and Saul made. Even so, it can readily be seen that David's successes and popularity gave him the potential to become a rival of Saul, if he wished to do so. Saul's fears were misplaced but not irrational.

18:10–30 Saul attempts to kill David. Saul's jealousy soon revealed itself in action, as he tried by various means to cause David's death. His first attempt was an impulsive one, at a time when he was not fully in control of himself (10–11). He was not prophesying in any good sense, although 'raved' (RSV) perhaps exaggerates his condition.

The reason given in v 12 for Saul's fear of David is interesting. Saul saw that the LORD was with David, in other words, he saw that he was successful in all that he undertook. He saw David's success, and realized that it was God-given, but he thought he could put an end to it, as if he had the power to defeat God's plans. So the chapter describes Saul's scheming to get David killed. If David had died in battle against the Philistines, as Saul hoped, no blame at all would have attached to Saul. But since in truth the LORD was with David throughout these events (28), Saul's plans were bound to fail. From Saul's point of view, the situation got steadily worse; his young rival not only survived but increased his reputation, and married a royal princess, Michal (27). It is not fully clear why David did not marry Merab (17–19). David's humble response (18) to the king's offer was conventional and was not a refusal of Merab, any more than his words in v 23 were a refusal of Michal. Probably Saul's act in giving Merab to another man was either simply impulsive or else a deliberate insult to David.

Saul appears in an increasingly bad light in these chapters. By contrast, David took no action to harm or betray Saul, and this is proved by the fact that Saul's own family loved David (28; 19:1). Saul was David's enemy (29), but David was never Saul's enemy.

19:1–10 David's escape. Saul's hopes that David would die in battle had failed, so he now invited his own courtiers to kill David. This created a new situation, and a very dangerous one for David. Jonathan had a choice: he could carry out his father's wishes and help to kill David, or he could try to change Saul's mind and attitude. The fact that he took the second course of action proves that Jonathan was convinced that David was no enemy to him or to Saul. The fact that Saul was forced to agree with him, and even took an oath not to kill David (6), is additional proof that David was no traitor. Once again, therefore, we see how the biblical author defends David's character.

However, Saul once again lost control of himself, and threw a spear at David. David now had really no alternative but to escape.

19:11–24 David's flight. Saul's determination to kill David hardened and he made no further attempts to hide it. Jonathan had saved David's life earlier in the chapter, and now Saul's daughter Michal saved it. She used lies and deceit to do so, but the passage does not rebuke her in any way; the narrator is more concerned to show how narrow an escape David had. The passage also shows that Saul's own family were prepared to take any necessary steps to protect David from their own father. It is surprising to find that there was an idol in David's house. The Hebrew word translated 'idol' is thought to mean a household idol of some sort, but possibly it relates in some way to the worship of Yahweh; certainly there is no suggestion elsewhere that David was ever guilty of worshipping other gods.

In these chapters we see David acting with doubtful morality more than once. He is guilty of lies and deceit in ch. 21 and of murderous intentions in ch. 25, for example. Plainly he is not being held up as a model. Rather, the biblical writer is emphasizing how difficult his circumstances were, plus the fact that through all his difficulties (and in spite of his lapses) God took care of him.

It was natural that David should wish to consult Samuel, the man who had anointed him for kingship (ch. 16). However, the passage relates nothing of their conversation and instead stresses the nature of prophetic power. Normally the Spirit of God equipped men with power to perform or to speak God's will. In the presence of such power, which was in a sense infectious, Saul's soldiers and finally Saul himself found themselves prophesying. Yet in their case the experience did not give them power but robbed them of it. Saul, indeed, was robbed of all royal dignity too. It was symbolic that he himself took off all his royal robes. Once again we meet the sneering proverb of 10:11, and this time the taunt was fully justified.

Clearly, this episode does not describe what we normally understand by 'prophecy'. The Hebrew word 'prophesied' can in some contexts refer to abnormal, trance-like states (see also 1 Ki. 18:29). God's powerful presence could have different effects in different circumstances.

20:1–7 David consults Jonathan. After all that had happened, we would not have expected David to contemplate any return to his place at court. However, he was a court figure, and even Saul might wish to preserve proper procedures. It is clear that David's absence from court on a festival occasion would cause public comment and possible embarrassment (5–7). David was under no illusions about the danger he was in (3), but he felt that he had the right to demand justice: what crime had he committed? Jonathan saw things rather differently, wishing to believe the best about his father, and apparently convinced that David was in no immediate danger.

The emphasis of the passage is to be found in vs 14–17. The actual situation was the danger confronting David, in which Jonathan could help him, but these verses are concerned with David's future help to Jonathan. A simple friendship needs no formal covenant. However, both Jonathan and David were men of importance in Israel, and there would be political rivalry between their families, i.e. the house of Saul and the house of David (16). In many societies such a situation could have led to political assassinations, or even to the total destruction of one of the families. Hence the importance of the covenant they made. After the events of this chapter Jonathan and David scarcely met again, so their firm promises to each other were particularly significant now. V 17 again stresses the depth of David and Jonathan's commitment to each other. (Recent suggestions of a homosexual relationship between David and Jonathan are total misinterpretations; the whole emphasis of the biblical author lies on the fact that David was not a political enemy of Saul or his family, and that Jonathan had no fear or suspicion whatever of David.)

20:18–42 David's final departure. Jonathan's detailed instructions to David (19–22) were apparently necessary to enable him to give David a message without anyone seeing them in conversation together. It is clear that Jonathan did not want even his servant boy (21, 39) to know he was meeting David. If Saul was quite determined to kill David, any sign of Jonathan talking to David would look like treason. Not even Jonathan was safe from Saul's anger. In the event, Jonathan succeeded in holding a last private conversation with David.

Saul saw one thing clearly: unless David were killed, Jonathan would never succeed to the throne (31). The difference was that Jonathan accepted this fact, but Saul's hatred for David was by now intense. We can assume that Saul would have used the festival as an opportunity for another direct attack on David's life. The festival was a state occasion, when the absence of an important court figure would be noticed by everyone, although absence for reasons of ceremonial uncleanness was always a possibility in ancient Israel. Many regulations about this are to be found in Lv. 11–15. Otherwise the absence of an important person could be suspicious. Even a king's son had to ask for permission to be absent (see 2 Sa. 15:7–9).

21:1–26:25 David as a fugitive

21:1–15 David at Nob and at Gath. The main point of this chapter is to demonstrate how dangerous and desperate David's situation was. He was completely alone (1) and unarmed, and in itself this was a suspicious circumstance; an important soldier would naturally have an escort. David could see no option but deceit. The biblical author does not approve of deceit—indeed, David himself accepted the blame for what happened because of it (22:22). However, the writer does not rebuke David for it; he is fully aware of David's difficulties. Undoubtedly, David's enemies later condemned him for both incidents recorded in this chapter. David's visit to Nob resulted in the death of many devout men (22:18), and his visit to Gath (10–15) looked like the act of a traitor, since Achish was a Philistine king. So the writer explains, first, that although David did indeed deceive Ahimelech the priest, he could not have known what would happen afterwards. The problem was caused by Doeg (7), one of Saul's officials, who was there in order to fulfil a vow.

Secondly, the writer explains that when David crossed the frontier and went to Gath, he hoped that he would not be recognized. When he was recognized, he made a fool of the Philistine king. He was certainly not honoured by the Philistines, who would have welcomed a capable soldier who had rebelled against Saul. At the very least they would have prevented his return to Israel but for his apparent insanity.

22:1–5 David gains support. In ch. 21 David had been a lone fugitive, in very great danger. Returning from Gath to Israelite territory, he soon attracted some support. His own family joined him, not to support him but for their own safety, and David soon ensured that his parents were sent abroad, out of Saul's reach. His supporters were outlaws like himself, and there were enough of them to make a small army. In Saul's eyes, they were undoubtedly rebels and traitors. What are we to think? Later chapters will show that David never used this army to attack either Saul or Israelite troops, but this has yet to be seen. However, another supporter of David was a prophet, Gad by name, and we can see the hand of God at work, giving guidance to David (5). Thus in a very literal sense God was still with David. The successful soldier had become a successful fugitive. It was sensible for him to move into Judah, well away from Saul's capital city. Judah was his own tribe, and he could reasonably hope that some citizens would be well disposed toward him.

22:6–23 The massacre at Nob. Nob was at this time a major sanctuary. After the Philistine victory of ch. 4, the Shiloh sanctuary had been destroyed, and Nob may have replaced it in importance. Ahimelech, the chief priest at Nob, was the grandson of Eli of Shiloh. It is astonishing that Saul should have massacred so many priests at such an important sanctuary, despite the very reasonable defence which Ahimelech made (14–15). The chapter demonstrates that by now Saul was suspicious of everybody, including Jonathan (8), and saw a conspiracy where none existed. It is significant that his own officials refused to obey his orders (17).

Saul's brutality at Nob had a result which he did not foresee. One man who escaped the massacre was Abiathar (a future high priest at Jerusalem), who had little choice but to join David. In this way David gained priestly support in addition to the prophet Gad.

23:1–14 David at Keilah. This section sets up an interesting contrast between human power and God's control. Saul's royal power could not be resisted either by David or by the people of the town of Keilah. This chapter shows David forced to move further and further south, towards more barren terrain. As for the citizens of Keilah, they may have felt friendly towards David (they too were Judeans), but they dared not risk Saul's anger and revenge. Everybody must have known how Saul had treated Nob. But even though the people of Keilah were prepared to surrender David to Saul (12), they must have felt a lasting gratitude to David, who had just saved them from the Philistines (5). This was useful to him at a later date.

Saul had great power, then, from the human standpoint; but it was God who really controlled events, especially by giving David the guidance he needed through Abiathar and the ephod (6). In this way David knew when to go to Keilah and when to leave it, and how to keep out of Saul's hands (14). God allowed full freedom of action to all the individuals and groups but yet he overruled so that his will prevailed. David escaped yet again from Saul, and was able to do a service to an Israelite city, an act which would be remembered long afterwards. Saul showed himself unfit to be king, because he had attacked one of his own cities; David was already doing a king's task, in defeating his nation's enemies, the Philistines.

23:15–28 David in the region of Ziph. The district near the town of Ziph was desert (14). It is fairly easy to hide in such terrain, but it is not easy to feed an army of 600 men there. David's band of followers had grown since 22:1. This may partly explain why the people of Ziph were so hostile to him; perhaps they saw him as a threat to their food supplies. So they were ready to help Saul locate David, but once again God overruled, this time by using the Philistines to achieve his purposes (27–28).

There is dramatic irony in the fact that although Saul and his troops could not find David, Jonathan had no such difficulty. No doubt David had posted sentries, who would have guided Jonathan to David. The chief purpose of Jonathan's visit was to give David reassurance. In renewing their covenant, Jonathan again confirmed his willingness to be subordinate to David; in other words, he renounced his own position as crown prince. Jonathan did not live long enough to fulfil this promise, but the biblical writer uses Jonathan's promise as another indication of the goodwill that always existed between Jonathan and David. David stole nothing from Jonathan, and Jonathan begrudged David nothing.

23:29–24:22 David and Saul meet at En Gedi. The detailed narrative of ch. 24 recounts a dramatic incident during David's time as a fugitive. The drama draws attention to some important facts about David and Saul. At different points in the story, both men had an opportunity to kill their opponent. Both men were prevented from such violent action by the power of conscience. David must have been tempted to kill the man who had been persecuting him, especially when his own soldiers urged him to do so. But his conscience held him back; he even felt remorseful after damaging Saul's robe slightly. As for Saul, when David suddenly spoke to him, he had David completely in his power at last, trapped in the cave; but David's words stirred his conscience. The words of the two men are therefore particularly significant. David expressed high reverence for the person of the king as such. Saul, we know, had been rejected by Yahweh; but he remained king, the man who had been anointed through Samuel by the LORD (6). No man, declared David, had the right to attack the person of the king of Israel.

Saul replied by a frank confession that he had wronged David, and that David had never wronged him. Looking into the future, he acknowledged that David would be king.

Here again, the text is intended to defend David from later accusations of ruthless hostility to Saul and his descendants (21). The chapter makes it abundantly clear that David not only spared Saul's life but also took a solemn oath to spare the lives of Saul's family after him. The emphasis in David's words on the sacredness of the king's person and life may have been a sermon to later men and groups who wished to overthrow kings by assassination or rebellion.

25:1–11 Nabal's hostility. Samuel's death (1) marked the end of an era. He died before David, whom he had anointed (ch. 16), actually became king; but at least Saul had now recognized that David would be the next king (24:20). Samuel's work was done.

Despite Saul's words of repentance in 24:16–21, there was no possibility of real reconciliation between Saul and David, and David remained with his large band of men in the semi-barren areas of Judah. It would not be long before Saul made fresh attempts to capture him. Meanwhile David had the daily task of finding provisions for his followers, and this passage shows how difficult that could be. He tried to win support and provisions from rich farmers like Nabal by giving them assistance and protection from raiders (like the Amalekites), and then seeking generosity from them. No doubt there were other farmers who gladly helped David, and probably some who helped rather reluctantly; Nabal was mean by nature in his dealings (3) and rudely refused. Technically, he had the right to act as he did, and his remark that David was a 'servant' who had broken away from his 'master' was not too far from the truth. The reader, however, knows that David was no rebel against Saul, and that God had chosen David to be king; so Nabal is seen to be completely out of touch with God's plans.

25:12–35 Abigail's intervention. David's anger with Nabal was understandable, and we may sense some desperation on his part to find provisions. Nevertheless, Nabal's actions certainly did not justify David's murderous reaction. The story goes to show that David could at times be harsh and violent, but God was still overruling events and prevented David from committing an evil deed. God's agent was not a prophet, nor the guidance of the priest Abiathar, but the wife of the very man whom David planned to kill. It was no coincidence that Abigail was an intelligent woman (3), who not only saw the dangers but took swift and effective action to prevent tragedy. Her words to David reminded him that the God who had anointed him to be king was sure to protect him and take care of his needs in the meantime. David had no need, therefore, to be violent and vengeful.

The message of Abigail's words was a theological one, making clear David's position in God's sight. We may add that her message was a very sensible one from a human standpoint as well: if David had attacked a local farmer, it is very unlikely that he would ever have won the support of the tribe of Judah at a later date.

25:36–44 David's marriages. The end of the story relates the death of Nabal, followed by David's taking the widow, Abigail, in marriage. Nabal's death was after all a natural one, from the human standpoint; but the writer conveys the general truth that all life and death are in God's hands. We may be sure that Nabal's neighbours shared that belief, and took note that God might punish any hostility to David. So the death of Nabal may have helped David's cause.

David's only wife till now was Saul's daughter, Michal (18:27). Saul had remarried her to another man (44). This act showed his hatred of David; it was also a political move, intended to destroy any claim to the throne David might have had as Saul's son-in-law. Political marriages were common at the time, and by his marriages to Abigail and Ahinoam (42–43) David was making important links with influential families in Judah. His future way to kingship would be due to the support of the tribe of Judah, not because of any support from the existing royal court. The writer does not say so, but he plainly saw David's marriage to Abigail as part of God's plans for him.

26:1–25 David in Saul's camp. The kernel of this narrative is the same as that of ch. 24. Saul took an army into Judah to hunt for David, and almost caught him; David had the opportunity to kill Saul but instead he conversed with the king, who confessed that he had wronged David. Some of the details are very similar to those of ch. 24, such as the part played by the Ziphites (1). But many other details are totally different. Here David is not accidentally hiding in a cave as in ch. 24, but deliberately visiting Saul's camp. Abner comes into this story, but plays no part in ch. 24. Some scholars nevertheless suppose that both chapters are dealing in different ways with the same event. The important question is why the biblical author decided to use two such similar stories. The answer is partly that he wanted to reinforce the emphasis of ch. 24. The Israelites put faith in double testimony (Dt. 19:15), and here for the second time David resisted temptation and refused to harm the LORD's anointed (9); also for the second time, Saul admitted his own wrong-doing (21) and acknowledged that David would have a great future (25). So once again the writer emphasizes David's refusal to do any harm to Saul, and the fact that (in his better moments) Saul took all the blame on himself.

The new element in this story lies in David's words in v 19. This verse looks ahead to the next chapter, when David reluctantly left the land of Israel and took refuge with the Philistines. David's enemies later argued that David was a traitor to Israel who had even worshipped false gods in Philistia. V 19 does not mean that David would in reality worship Philistine gods, but it does draw our attention to the fact that in foreign territory there would be no temples to Yahweh where David could worship the true God. David therefore expressed his great reluctance to leave Israel's borders, so much so that he pronounced a curse on those who would be responsible for it.

Note. 21 Saul called himself a fool, just as Abigail had called her husband a fool for opposing David (25:25). The two Hebrew words are different, but the idea is the same. All who oppose God's plans are eventually shown to be fools.

27:1–30:31 David in Philistine territory

This was to be the most difficult period of David's career. Unable to stay in Israelite territory, he was forced to take refuge with one of the Philistine kings. David led a small army, and it is obvious that the Philistines would not welcome Israelite soldiers unless they could be trusted to fight against their fellow-Israelites. David's men had the initial advantage that Saul, the king of Israel, was undoubtedly their enemy. David had to persuade the Philistines that he and his men were and would remain the enemy of both Saul and Israel as a whole. Yet of course, David had no wish to attack Israelites, and he would never have become king of Israel if he had ever done so. So he faced a very difficult task, in addition to the problem of feeding and financing his army. Yet he succeeded, for God was still 'with him'.

27:1–12 David and King Achish. David's recent narrow escapes from Saul proved to him that he could not continue indefinitely to avoid capture and death. His band of 600 men could not remain hidden for long. We may assume that they would have received no welcome from any neutral country or from any ally of Saul's. David's only hope was to become an apparent ally of Saul's enemies, the Philistines. So he returned to Gath, which he had briefly visited some time previously (21:10–15). This time he had the full respect of the Philistine king, Achish, and was given a headquarters, the town of Ziklag. We may see God's overruling even in this Philistine decision. Ziklag was near the Israelite frontier (see map of Israel's Tribal territories in Deuteronomy), and Achish expected David to attack Israelites in Judah. Ziklag, however, was also close to another frontier; to the south of Ziklag lived several tribes who were enemies of both Israel and the Philistines. This gave David the opportunity to benefit the people of Judah, by attacking their enemies, and at the same time to deceive Achish. Achish could see for himself the spoils of war, but he did not guess where they came from. David was also benefiting himself, because these spoils of war met the needs of his men for food and livelihood.

David's skill in seizing such an opportunity is clear. From a Christian standpoint, we cannot admire his use of deceit nor his butchery of men and women alike. The passage is not, of course, commending deceit and cruelty. Basically, it is showing how desperate David's situation was—a situation which had been created by Saul. It also shows David's determination to do nothing to harm his own people, but to do anything and everything possible to help them. His first duty was to Israel, and he felt no obligations at all to Israel's enemies.

28:1–25 Saul consults a medium. Events now began to move towards a climax. The closing chapters of 1 Samuel deal with a single major event, a great battle between Israel and the Philistines, and with the actions and fortunes of the three parties involved—Saul and the Israelite army, the Philistine army, and David and his smaller army. The Philistines initiated these events, mustering their forces in strength (1, 4). Most of the battles between Israel and the Philistines took place in the southern part of the country, but now the Philistines changed their strategy and mustered in the north, at Shunem. They were probably trying to cut Israel in two, separating Saul from his northern tribes. At any rate, Saul could not ignore this threat, and it seems that he was forced to fight on level ground, where Philistine chariots gave them a great advantage. (Usually the Israelites were able to fight in the hills, where chariots were of little use.) Israel was, therefore, in a dangerous situation, and Saul was desperately in need of military advice. Although the story is told in personal terms, it is important to realize that Saul was seeking guidance as king of Israel, not as a private individual. But as king of Israel he could get no prophetic help. V 6 mentions the three usual means for learning Yahweh's will; the Urim refers to the priestly ephod (see 14:37). Saul could no longer consult Samuel, who had recently died, unless he could do so through a medium; but Saul himself had driven all the mediums out of the central part of his realm. The OT laws attack the practice of consulting the dead (necromancy) (see Lv. 19:31; Dt. 18:9–14) and Saul had upheld such laws. It was a sign of his desperation that he now consulted a medium, and that to do so he had to go as far north as Endor, a journey to the far side of the Philistine camp.

The biblical author here is not concerned either to attack or to ridicule the practice of necromancy; he is simply intending to portray Saul's desperation and Yahweh's firm decisions. Whether God allowed Samuel himself to reappear or whether some spirit took the form of Samuel, the fact was that so far as Saul was concerned, he saw Samuel and he heard the voice of Samuel. This voice repeated and confirmed Yahweh's rejection of Saul and choice of David. V 19 adds a new prediction, about the outcome of the battle next day.

The intention of this story is to emphasize Saul's hopelessness—and to show how low he had sunk, when even a criminal helped to comfort him. For the woman was a criminal, by Saul's own laws. The chapter is certainly not endorsing the activities of mediums; God's guidance is never to be obtained from them.

29:1–11 The Philistines and David. We have seen in ch. 28 how helpless Saul was, and that his situation was hopeless. In a different way, David seemed equally helpless, at the mercy of Philistine decisions. His group of men was too small to fight the Philistines, and he dared not disobey orders; the only hope he could see was to continue to deceive Achish. It is difficult to guess what David would have done if Achish had persuaded the other Philistine rulers of David's loyalty and reliability. However, the other Philistine kings overruled Achish. They could clearly see the danger that David's army might change sides during the battle, which could then have caused a defeat for the Philistines (4). They also remembered David's reputation as a soldier, which the Israelite women had commemorated in song (5; see 18:7). The author does not say so, but he leaves the reader to come to the conclusion that it was really God who overruled Achish and rescued David from an impossible situation.

Notes. 1 The episode occurred at Aphek, before the Philistines marched on northwards and camped at Shunem (28:1). In other words, the events of ch. 29 took place before those of ch. 28. 6 Achish here swears by the God of Israel, presumably because he was addressing an Israelite. His reference in v 9 to an angel of God is less specific; it was perhaps a conventional phrase. There is no suggestion in this passage that Achish worshipped Yahweh. 11 The Israelite camp was already at Jezreel (1), so this verse signals the start of the battle.

30:1–17 David defeats the Amalekites. The narrative follows David southwards, back to his headquarters at Ziklag, and leaves the story of the battle of Gilboa until ch. 31. Part of the writer's purpose in giving so much detail is to emphasize that David and his men were many miles away from the Philistine army when the battle took place. We can readily imagine that David's enemies later spread the false rumour that David and his men had helped the Philistines to defeat Saul's army. On the contrary, this chapter shows David attacking Israel's enemies the Amalekites while the battle between Saul and the Philistines was taking place.

Another important aspect of this story is that the enemy is Amalek. Saul's failure to eliminate this people, who had been such a longstanding threat to Israel, has been recorded in ch. 15. It was the cause of Yahweh's rejection of Saul. Now in ch. 30, David is described as doing what Saul ought to have done.

30:18–31 David’s plunder. Nomadic raiders are not easy to find, and it was a near-miracle that David recovered everything that the Amalekites had taken.

V 7 makes an important point, contrasting David’s conduct in a very difficult situation with Saul’s in ch. 28. Saul had consulted a medium, but David went to the man of God in order to learn God’s will. Saul’s consultation had ended in utter despair, David’s ended in encouragement (6).

Not only had God intervened to prevent David from having to fight against fellow-Israelites, but God’s timing was perfect too. David and his men had arrived back in Ziklag long before the Amalekites had expected them. Otherwise the captured wives and children would have been sold into slavery.

The passage shows how David imposed his authority on his troops who were fierce men (see v 6) and who included trouble-makers among them (22). Here we see him already taking decision such as a king would usually make (see v 25 especially). His overall policy was to benefit all his people equally, and also to repay hospitality to the towns and areas of Judah where he and his men had previously been fugitives from Saul (27–31). This was a shrewd political move: when the time came, the people of Judah freely chose him as their king rather than serve a son of Saul (2 Sa. 2:10).

31:1–13 The battle of Gilboa

The battle is named after Mount Gilboa. The battle began on the plain, but the defeated Israelites were driven up the slopes of the hill-side where many of them died, including both Saul and Jonathan. The chapter does not give the number of casualties, but evidently it was a major Philistine victory, enabling them to occupy several Israelite towns (7). Saul’s reign thus ended in disaster, for Saul himself and for Israel. It seemed that the gods of the Philistines had triumphed; but 2 Samuel will go on to tell how David defeated the Philistines permanently.

The last paragraph of the chapter makes a fitting end to the story of Saul’s kingship. His first act as king had been to rescue the city of Jabesh Gilead (ch. 11); its citizens now rescued his body and gave his bones a decent burial. It is puzzling why they burned the bodies, since cremation does not seem to have been an Israelite custom. Whatever the reason, the action was meant to honour the dead.

So 1 Samuel ends on a note of tragedy. It was, however, a tragedy foretold by God’s spokesman (28:19), and it did not mean that Israel’s God had been defeated. He had already chosen the next king of Israel, and equipped him to be a better soldier and a better leader than Saul. God would deal with the Philistine menace in his own good time.

The family of David, simplified.

2 Sa. 1:1–8:18 The early years of David’s reign

1:1–4:12 David and Ish-Bosheth

The death of Saul opened the way for David to fulfil his destiny to become king of Israel. The biblical writer has in 1 Samuel unambiguously pointed the way forward to this conclusion. However, there were still two major obstacles in David’s way: from a human standpoint, indeed, there was no certainty that David would become king of all Israel. The first obstacle was the fact that one of Saul's sons, Ish-Bosheth, had not been killed in the battle of Gilboa, and he was soon recognized as king by most of the tribes (see 2:9). David became king in Judah, and civil war resulted. The other obstacle was the Philistines who were determined to keep Israel weak and in subjection to them. The Philistines, however, made a tactical error. They took no action to prevent David becoming king in Judah, presumably because they wished to encourage civil war among the Israelites, thinking it would divide and weaken Israel. Nor, apparently, did they attack Ish-Bosheth, for the same reason. Thus, David did not have two enemies simultaneously, and so he was able to overcome both obstacles, one after the other. The biblical writer is in no doubt that God over-ruled in these Philistine decisions, as in all the other events which brought David to the throne of all Israel.

1:1–16 The Amalekite messenger. At the start of this narrative, David is still in Ziklag (see 1 Sa. 30:26), awaiting news about the Philistine invasion of northern Israel. It is ironic that the messenger who brought the news of Gilboa was an Amalekite, a member of the nation which had been such a persistent enemy to Israel. Both Saul and David had fought against them. This Amalekite, however, was an immigrant to Israel, a resident alien (13).

It is no surprise to the reader to be told of the death of Saul and Jonathan, but the manner of Saul's death as described by the Amalekite is unexpected. It is just possible that Saul lived for a short time after falling on his own sword (1 Sa. 31:4), until the Amalekite arrived on the scene and killed him (10) at his own request. But the Amalekite was probably telling some lies. In general, it seems more likely that he was robbing corpses on the battlefield than that he just happened to be in the middle of a fierce battle (6).

We are not told whether David fully believed him or not, but he accepted the evidence of the man's words (16) and of the crown and armband he brought from Gilboa, in the absence of any human witnesses. On the basis of that evidence, David executed the messenger. David's action in doing so is fully consistent with his attitude to Saul's person expressed in 1 Sa. 24:6 and 26:9. The king was the LORD's anointed, and the Amalekite, as a resident of Israel, was under obligation to obey Israel's law-code, yet he had killed Israel's king. In executing him as a murderer, David was already acting as if he were king and judge.

There is a further political aspect to the episode. In acting as he did, David was demonstrating once again that he was no enemy of Saul: he defended the dead king's rights to the last.

1:17–27 David's lament. The poem in vs 19–27 is not a private lament to express David's emotions but a national poem, describing in memorable language the depth of Israel's loss. The lament was published (to use a modern equivalent)—recorded in writing and made known throughout the nation (18). The Book of Jashar was an ancient document used by some OT writers (see also Jos. 10:13). We do not know why the poem was entitled lament of the bow.

God had rejected Saul, as 1 Samuel made repeatedly clear; but this poem looks at Saul from a human standpoint, and reminds us of his significance to Israel over a number of years: giving leadership, creating national unity, driving the Philistines back, and bringing Israel prosperity (see v 24). Jonathan is bracketed with Saul, both because of David's deep friendship with him and because of his military successes (see 1 Sa. 14).

The poetic imagery throughout the lament needs to be noted, but it is readily understood. In v 20 David expresses the hope that the news of Saul's death could be kept from the enemy: Gath and Ashkelon were two important Philistine cities. In v 21 he curses the hills of Gilboa, where Saul and Jonathan had been killed. In the last verse of his lament David calls Saul and Jonathan ‘warriors’ (NIV mighty) and ‘weapons of war’, reminding readers of the fact that their deaths were in the context of a disastrous defeat for Israel. The poem expresses no hope for the future, but David himself was destined to supply hope and victory to a defeated nation.

2:1–7 David becomes king in Judah. Saul’s death meant that David was now free to move out of Philistine territory and back to his native Judah. Two things might have obstructed this move. If Saul had left a strong successor, equally hostile to David, it would not have been possible. If the Philistines had objected to the move, it would have been very difficult. So it is not surprising that David enquired of the LORD about it; in other words, he asked Abiathar to consult the sacred oracle (see 1 Sa. 23:9–12).

Neither the biblical writer nor the reader finds it surprising that David was now made king (although over only one tribe, Judah). God’s will had been clearly revealed, as early as 1 Sa. 16. However, from a purely political standpoint, the decision of the men of Judah could not have been predicted. The death of Saul and the overwhelming Philistine victory at Gilboa must have created political chaos throughout Israel, and the tribal elders must have been very uncertain at first as to the wisest course of action. David had at least three things to offer them: a good reputation as a soldier, a history of helpful actions towards Judah, and some sort of alliance or understanding with the Philistines. He was also, of course, a Judean himself.

David’s message to the city of Jabesh Gilead is of special interest. This city had strong links with Saul (see 1 Sa. 11; 31:11–13), and it lay in Transjordan, in the same area where David’s rival king Ish-Bosheth had established his capital city, Mahanaim (8–9). We would, therefore, have expected Ish-Bosheth, rather than David, to send Jabesh Gilead such a message of thanks and encouragement. David was in fact already indicating to Israelites outside Judah that he believed he was the true successor to Saul, and had authority over all Israel. His message ignored the existence of Ish-Bosheth.

David’s capital city was Hebron, towards the south of Judah. Later, Jerusalem would become his capital, but at this point in time Jerusalem was not in Israelite hands. In fact, Jerusalem may have been a partial barrier, separating Judah from the Israelite tribes further north. If so, it would help to explain why Judah made its own decision and chose its own king.

2:8–32 Civil war. Abner (first mentioned in 1 Sa. 14:50) had evidently escaped from the battlefield where Saul had died, and he took charge of Israelite affairs in the northern part of the country. Although he himself was a close relative of Saul, he did not make himself king but tried to rally Israelite support to Saul’s surviving son Ish-Bosheth. So Ish-Bosheth became king; in theory over all Israel (9), but in reality over a limited area. No doubt the Philistines were now the real masters of the central areas of Israel, especially the tribal regions of Ephraim and Benjamin. Ish-Bosheth’s main area of control was east of the River Jordan (Gilead), and his capital Mahanaim was there (see map of David’s empire in 1 Kings). Still, Ephraim and Benjamin and some other groups (9) recognized him as king, despite the realities of the situation.

There is no obvious reason why David should have attacked Ish-Bosheth, so it seems probable that Ish-Bosheth decided to attack David in order to bring Judah under his control. Ish-Bosheth’s troops were sent to Gibeon, just north of the border of Judah, and David sent his own troops to block their advance. As in 1 Sa. 17, both sides tried to avoid unnecessary bloodshed by using picked champions to settle the issue. Perhaps both sides believed that Yahweh would show his will be giving a clear victory to one group of twelve men or the other. However, a real battle followed (17); vs 30–31 give us some idea of the scale of it.

The chief purpose behind all the details given in this narrative is to introduce the reader to Joab. Joab was to be David’s commander-in-chief throughout his long reign, and it is clear from vs 28–30 that he was already in command. The story explains how it happened that Abner, the Israelite commander, killed one of Joab's brothers. Abner himself obviously had no wish to kill Asahel, above all because he wanted to avoid a blood feud. After Asahel's death, Joab was willing to act sensibly and agree to a truce, but his own personal feelings remain hidden in this chapter. They will be revealed in 3:27.

3:1–5 David's family. The writer does not give further details of the civil war, in which David steadily gained the upper hand (1). Instead, he gives details of David's wives and sons. The implication may well be that David was secure and settled in Judah, unlike Ish-Bosheth, whose cause was doomed. So far as we know, Ish-Bosheth had no family. The main importance of the details, however, is to lay a foundation for later events. Several of David's sons later played significant roles. Amnon and Absalom are the chief characters in chs. 13–18, and Adonijah tried to seize the throne in David's old age (1 Ki. 1). Solomon is not mentioned yet: he was born later, in Jerusalem (see 12:24).

David's marriages to Ahinoam and Abigail have already been mentioned (1 Sa. 25:42–43). His more recent marriage to Maacah was to cement an alliance with the king of Geshur, a small state in northern Transjordan.

3:6–21 Abner changes sides. It is clear from v 6 that Abner was an ambitious man. He was powerful enough in Ish-Bosheth's kingdom, but by now the real power in Israel lay in David's hands, as Abner perceived. We may suspect that he deliberately planned the quarrel with Ish-Bosheth, in order to have a good excuse for abandoning him. It is not actually recorded that he did have sexual relations with Saul's former concubine, but he did not deny the accusation. Such an act would amount to a claim to Saul's throne (see 16:21–22), and it is not surprising that Ish-Bosheth protested and a quarrel resulted.

Abner now felt free to send messengers to David, offering to help make him king of all Israel. His question Whose land is it? (12) was intended to inform David that he, Abner, not Ish-Bosheth, was the most influential man with the northern tribes. This was no doubt true, but if both Abner and Ish-Bosheth had lived for some years after this, it is quite likely that Abner would have been forced to fight against Ish-Bosheth. The agreement Abner requested from David (12) probably included a high military position in David's army for Abner. David's insistence that his first wife Michal should be restored to him (13–14) had several motives. Saul had stolen her from him in an act of cruelty and injustice (1 Sa. 25:44), and David was determined that the injustice should be put right. The loss of Michal had also been a public humiliation for David, and that too must be put right. There was probably also a political motive: his marriage to Saul's daughter gave him status in Israel, and legitimacy to succeed to Saul's position as king. Finally, David's marriage to Michal had been a love-match at the start (1 Sa. 18:20) and his affection for her may have been an additional reason for reclaiming her now. David was in the right, but we can still feel sympathy for Paltiel.

Abner carried out his side of the bargain. When he reported back to David, he could promise the immediate acceptance of David as king by all Israel (21). This was, of course, in David's interests and we can be sure that he showed his pleasure to Abner. In turn, Abner must have been pleased with the developing situation, and he had no reason to be fearful. So he went in peace, and under 'safe conduct' (REB).

3:22–39 Abner's murder. Perhaps Joab believed that Abner was a spy and not to be trusted, as he told David (25). More probably that was merely an excuse: v 30 gives the real reason why he murdered Abner in such a treacherous way.

The murder of Abner was a very serious embarrassment to David. The murderer was one of his senior officers, and the suspicion would have been widespread that David had given the instructions to kill Abner. In Ish-Bosheth's kingdom, it must have seemed that David meant to kill all relatives of Saul in order to secure his own position. David's only defence was to show publicly, in every way possible, that he was innocent of the murder. So he honoured Abner and mourned him publicly. V 37 records that he was able to persuade the populace, both in Judah and northern Israel, of his innocence.

The fact that the writer tells the full story of Abner's death shows that at a later date some of David's enemies were still accusing David of relentless hostility to Saul and his family. It is true that David did nothing to punish the killer; v 39 gives his reason for this. David did not mean that he was weak in character, but that Joab and his brother Abishai (the sons of Zeruiah) were too influential in the kingdom to be brought to trial. David's resentment of Joab's action lasted for many years (see 1 Ki. 2:5–6).

4:1–12 Ish-Bosheth's murder. The assassination of Abner could have caused a permanent breach between the northern kingdom and Judah, preventing David from becoming king of all Israel. However, the opposite happened: the death of Abner weakened a weak king and a weak kingdom still further. The weak king was assassinated and the kingdom collapsed.

It is not explained why Recab and Baanah murdered Ish-Bosheth. Saul had once attacked Gibeon (see 21:2), and perhaps Beeroth, the home of Recab and Baanah, had suffered with it (the two cities are linked in Jos. 9:17). Whether or not the assassins had some such old grievance against Saul and his family, they certainly believed that David would reward them for killing his rival king. Once again, therefore, David had to protect himself from rumours that he had given orders for the murder. He did so by executing the murderers and speaking well of Ish-Bosheth.

Thus ended Ish-Bosheth's reign. He presumably left no sons, and his only close relative was his crippled nephew Mephibosheth (4). Clearly, nobody supposed that Mephibosheth was capable of becoming king. (The story of Mephibosheth continues in ch. 9.) The assassinations had in fact cleared the way for David to become king of all Israel; the biblical writer knew that God overruled even in wicked human deeds, but it is easy to see why some Israelites believed that David himself had 'over-ruled' and paid men to assassinate all his rivals.

5:1–25 David takes full control

This relatively brief chapter records three of David's most important achievements. First, he unified the nation, and all the Israelite tribes acknowledged him as king. Secondly, he captured Jerusalem which was one of a number of cities inside Israelite territory but not under Israelite control. Such cities split the country, separating one Israelite tribe from another. Their Canaanite citizens, too, were a permanent danger, since they were often willing to act as the Philistines' allies against Israel. So David eliminated this danger, taking control of all these 'foreign' cities. His third achievement was to eliminate the Philistine threat altogether. He defeated Israel's old enemy so thoroughly that they never again posed a problem for Israel. Ch. 8 lists further achievements of David.

5:1–5 King of all Israel. This paragraph makes it clear that David did not conquer the northern Israelite tribes, nor govern them against their will. The initiative to make him their king came from them—their representatives made the journey south to Hebron to invite him to be their king. Clearly the death of Ish-Bosheth had meant the collapse of government in the north, and in the face of Philistine aggression the northern tribal representatives were anxious to get strong and effective government. In theory, they might have chosen one of themselves, but there were three powerful reasons for turning to David which are outlined in vs 1–2.

The summary of David's reign in v 5 gives a time-scale for the capture of Jerusalem (described in vs 6–9). Ish-Bosheth's reign had lasted only two years (2:10), but David continued to reign in Hebron for more than five further years. The Israelite elders probably acknowledged him as king soon after Ish-Bosheth's death, but some time elapsed before he was ready to attack Jerusalem.

5:6–16 The capture of Jerusalem. Jerusalem was already an ancient city. In earlier times, both the tribes of Judah and Benjamin had attempted to capture it (see Jdg. 1:8, 21) but it was still controlled by a Canaanite people called the Jebusites. It was a strongly fortified city, and the Jebusites were confident that David's troops could not capture it. There are uncertainties about the meaning of some words and phrases in vs 6–8, but it seems probable that the Jebusites were contemptuous: even a blind and lame garrison would be able to defeat David's attack! But instead of a direct attack on the strong walls, David's men apparently found a water shaft and were able to enter the city unexpectedly by this means. Jerusalem's main water supply came from a spring outside the city walls; a number of shafts and tunnels have been discovered by archaeologists.

Having captured Jerusalem, David soon made it his capital. It was much more central than Hebron, and since it lay in Benjamite territory, it would help the northern Israelites to feel that David was truly king of all Israel. David had a palace built there and established a royal harem. Notice the name of Solomon in v 14.

5:17–25 The defeat of the Philistines. The Philistines had allowed David to rule in Judah without any interference; a divided Israel gave them strength. But once all the Israelite tribes supported David, the Philistines became his enemy (17). Their attacks probably occurred before his capture of Jerusalem, and the stronghold mentioned is Adullam, David's earlier military headquarters (see 1 Sa. 22:1–4). Both of the Philistines' attacks were in the Valley of Rephaim (18, 22) which lay south of Jerusalem, and this fact may have drawn David's attention to the importance of mastering this whole area.

David's two victories are described briefly, but with enough detail to show that he enquired of the LORD before every battle. God never failed to answer his chosen king; the contrast with Saul is noteworthy (cf. 1 Sa. 28:6).

The fact that a foreign king, Hiram, sent messengers to David, demonstrates the growing power and importance of both David himself and the nation he ruled. For most of the tenth century BC, Israel was the most powerful nation in the whole region. The biblical writer acknowledges David's skills and achievements but he credits them ultimately to the LORD God Almighty (10). These achievements were not intended by God to glorify David but to benefit God's people Israel (12). Without doubt, David brought many material benefits, peace and prosperity to Israel.

The writer makes no comment on David's harem. In one way, it was a recognized symbol of David's political stature in the Ancient Near East; but later chapters will show how much trouble was caused by the rivalry between his many sons. Dt. 17:17 offers a general warning about having many wives, as appropriate for David as for Solomon.

Note. 7 Zion is a frequent biblical synonym for Jerusalem. Possibly it was originally the name of the fortress part of the city. Jerusalem now became known as the City of David; this name was still used in NT times (see Lk. 2:11).

6:1–7:29 David, the ark and the house of God

Saul had never shown any interest in the ark of the covenant, and he had caused offence to prophets and priests. David, by contrast, working closely with prophets and priests, treated the ark with great reverence and honour. The ark was permanently installed at Jerusalem (ch. 6). Ch. 7 conveys some of God's plans for the future, relating to the ark's new home and to David.

6:1–19 The ark brought to Jerusalem. This chapter resumes the story of the ark (1 Sa. 4:4–7:2). For many years the ark had remained at Baalath, a town also called Kiriath Jearim (1 Sa. 7:2; see Jos. 15:9). In transferring the ark to Jerusalem, David was also transforming Jerusalem, making it the most important sanctuary in his kingdom. It became his religious capital as well as his political capital. The action had political value in itself too, since it gave Jerusalem added importance in the eyes of all Israel, and so helped to unify the country. The emphasis of the biblical writer is, however, on the religious aspects of David's actions. He took the greatest possible care to treat the ark with all reverence. The death of Uzzah (6–8), which was never forgotten, was a reminder of the power of God, symbolized by the ark. (The Israelites in Beth Shemesh had suffered for similar careless handling of the ark, see 1 Sa. 6:19). David learned that he was not free to do as he liked with the ark; still less could he manipulate the God represented by the ark. Although this event was a sad one at the time, the record of it was no doubt a comfort to later generations of Israelites; it reminded them that their God Yahweh was more powerful than any foreign attackers or oppressors. It also taught them that respect for God's holiness was essential to the well-being of the community.

So, the ark was installed at Jerusalem, but in a tent (17). It was not until Solomon's reign that a temple was built (1 Ki. 6).

6:20–23 The barrenness of Michal. This episode about Michal comes unexpectedly, and indeed it is puzzling why she was so hostile to David's actions. Despite what she said, it must have been clear to her that the people did not despise David but shared his joy in the celebrations. His angry retort was justified in the circumstances. Perhaps the writer means us to assume that this quarrel between David and Michal led to a permanent breach between them. In any case, she never gave birth to children.

V 23 is the important point. Many later chapters are concerned with David's sons and with their ambitions to become king. If Michal had ever had a son, he would have had a strong claim to the throne, as Saul's grandson and David's son. No such son was born and the writer means us to conclude that God overruled in this matter too.

7:1–17 Nathan's prophecy. This chapter continues and completes the story of David and the Jerusalem sanctuary. The events recorded in it belong to a fairly late date in David's reign, as v 1 implies.

We have here the most important passage in the books of Samuel, and one of the key passages in the whole OT. It discusses the future of the Jerusalem sanctuary and of the Davidic monarchy—the two institutions which were vital to the people of Israel for several centuries after David. Through the prophet Nathan, God made firm promises to David about both of these things. These solemn divine promises amounted to an 'everlasting covenant' given to David (see 23:5).

The two themes are cleverly linked by the use of the word 'house'. The same Hebrew word not only meant an ordinary house, but also a temple, and thirdly a dynasty (just as in English, the current British royal family is called 'the house of Windsor'). The chapter begins by discussing David's plans to build a temple for Yahweh, a house for God (5). Then in v 11, the theme of a house for David is introduced—not his palace, but the Davidic dynasty, i.e. the sons and descendants who would succeed him as kings in Jerusalem.

God's promises about both these things are brought together in v 13: David's son will build the temple; the dynasty will last for ever. These are very positive promises, but the chapter contains a number of negative points too. First, David's plan to build the temple is refused. Secondly, God does not take pleasure in temples. (These two points are implied by vs 5–7.) Thirdly, v 14 recognizes that some of David's descendants would be unworthy kings, and would deserve and get divine punishment. These various points, both positive and negative, provide a description and an explanation for the events from David's time (early tenth century BC) down to 587 BC. In that period the temple was built, not by David, but by his son Solomon. Many of their successors were weak or sinful, but the dynasty continued unbroken for four centuries.

In 587 BC, the temple was destroyed by the Babylonians, and Judah ceased to be a kingdom. The family of David continued in existence, but never regained the throne. What message does this chapter hold for such a changed situation? It tells us first that God is not dependent on temples, and his people, therefore, do not need temples. Stephen reemphasized this lesson in NT times (see Acts 7:44–50). Secondly, God's promise about David's descendants was permanent. It was the basis of the expectation of the Messiah, 'great David's greater Son'. This promise gave assurance to the generations of God's people who lived in the last centuries of the OT period, and then received its fulfilment in the birth of Jesus Christ; as the whole NT and the Christian church bear witness.

All these promises, as God fulfilled them, would make David's name great (9). Without question, David was Israel's greatest king and his reputation stands for all time as one of the greatest men of history. However, his God-given greatness was not for his own benefit and glory, but in order to benefit the nation he ruled. So v 10 indicates God's plans and promises for Israel through David. These promises came true during David's own reign and remained God's ultimate plans for his people despite the fact that in later times Israel and Judah often suffered political hardships, chiefly because of their sins against God. These plans depended on the fulfilment of God's promise to send a Son of David, the Messiah, who would be the one finally to bring God's people the security and peace they always need.

7:18–29 David's prayer. A personal thanksgiving was the appropriate response to the promises made to David through Nathan. This grateful prayer was offered in the tent-shrine David had just erected (18), and nothing more is said here about the proposed temple. The only house David mentioned was his own future dynasty (19, 25). He was grateful both for the content of God's promises and for the fact that they had been made known to him. As he said, it is given to very few individuals to be told the future of their family (19).

David's prayer does not ignore the fact that God's blessing to his family would mean blessing to Israel too. Vs 23–24 recall God's goodness shown to Israel in the past. The continuation of David's line would mean God's continued blessings to the one nation he had chosen and made his very own for ever. The grateful words of David in this prayer would bring comfort and reassurance to many Israelites in later troubled times.

8:1–18 Further victories

Many of the victories recorded in this chapter took place before the events of ch. 7. By placing them here, the biblical writer illustrates the beginning of the fulfilment of God's promises to David outlined in ch. 7.

A fresh defeat of the Philistines is briefly recorded (1). The phrase Metheg Ammah is unknown, and perhaps is not a place-name at all; several commentators translate it ‘supremacy’. The parallel verse in Chronicles refers to the well-known city of Gath (1 Ch. 18:1). The Philistines were on Israel’s south-western frontier.

The Moabites had been friendly to David at an earlier stage (1 Sa. 22:3–4), and we do not know what caused warfare between them and David now. His harsh treatment of them suggests that they were guilty of serious treachery (2). The Moabites were on Israel’s south-eastern borders.

The campaigns described in vs 3–10 were against several Aramean kingdoms, to the north of Israel. In the end David was taking tribute from a number of smaller states, and his control stretched as far as the northern Euphrates. (See map of David’s empire in 1 Kings.) Vs 12–14 return to the south-eastern area, and tell us that David defeated Ammonites and Edomites as well as Moabites.

Thus David achieved military success wherever it was necessary. He also built up a sound administration in Israel itself (15). The chapter ends by listing his chief officials. Joab and Abiathar are by now familiar names to the reader. Benaiah commanded the royal bodyguard, and he played an important part in the accession of Solomon as king (1 Ki. 1). Some of David’s sons were royal advisers; no doubt this is true, but the Hebrew word literally means ‘priests’, and no doubt they had some priestly functions, although these are not described.

The most significant new name in this list is that of Zadok. Many scholars believe that he had earlier links with worship in Jerusalem, but this can only be a guess. Whatever his background may have been, he later became the sole high priest in Jerusalem, and his family retained the high priesthood for many centuries.

9:1–20:26 King David and his court

A new section of the books of Samuel begins with this chapter. Ch. 8 has summarized the achievements of David, to a large extent outside the borders of Israel. Ch. 9 turns to internal affairs, indeed almost to household affairs. The ‘household’ is the royal court, and its affairs affected the whole kingdom.

Chs. 9–20 have often been called ‘the succession narrative’, since a major theme in them relates to the matter of David’s successor. Every reader, from the beginning, has known that it was Solomon who took the throne after David; and 12:24 indicates, early in the story, that God himself favoured Solomon from his birth. However, it was not at all clear at the time who would be the next king, and probably David himself did not decide to support Solomon until near the end of his reign. So other sons of David, especially Absalom, pursued their ambitions to seize the throne. Ch. 9–20 and 1 Ki. 1–2 follow the whole sequence of events.

These chapters show how even in David’s reign God fulfilled the two things Nathan had described to David in 7:12–15. On the one hand, God’s love would be constant towards David himself and towards his chosen (but unnamed!) successor. On the other hand, God would punish sinful behaviour ‘with the rod of men’, in other words by using the actions of other men as punishment. So in chs. 9–20 we see how David’s sins brought him a great deal of misery and trouble; and yet God’s love was never taken from him.

9:1–13 David and Mephibosheth

Mephibosheth has already been mentioned in 4:4. He was one of the few survivors of Saul's family, following the murder of Ish-Bosheth. His home, Lo Debar, was not far from Ish-Bosheth's capital, Mahanaim. David now brought him to Jerusalem. Some scholars have supposed that David viewed him as a possible threat and brought him to Jerusalem in order to keep watch on his activities. If so, the biblical writer gives no hint of it. The emphasis is rather on David's kindness, and on the honoured position he gave to Mephibosheth. David was fulfilling his promise given to Mephibosheth's father, Jonathan (1 Sa. 20:42), not only towards Mephibosheth but also his son Mica (12) after him. The chapter twice reminds the reader that Mephibosheth was crippled, so stressing his helplessness. It is doubtful if he could ever have been an effective rival to David, in spite of Ziba's later accusation (16:3).

10:1–12:31 Warfare with Ammon and its consequences

Ch. 10, taken by itself, is all about a successful Israelite campaign against the Ammonites, and resumes the record of David's victories begun in ch. 8. It is in fact a link chapter, because this particular military campaign had its effects in Jerusalem. One of the Israelite soldiers who fought in Transjordan was Uriah, whose wife Bathsheba was seduced by David in her husband's absence. Subsequently David made use of the warfare to bring about Uriah's death. Thus chs. 10–12 link the theme of warfare with affairs at the royal court.

10:1–19 The Ammonite campaign. Ammon was a small kingdom in Transjordan which had been hostile to Israel during Saul's reign; Saul had defeated the king Nahash whose death now occurred (see 1 Sa. 11). David, by contrast, had been in alliance with the Ammonites until now. The Ammonite nobles (3) no doubt feared that now David was king of a united Israel, he would change his attitude towards them. Even if they had good reason for such suspicions, it was a very foolish step to insult David and provoke him into warfare. The Ammonite kingdom was too small to win a war against Israel, and so they sought allies among the Arameans to the north.

Ch. 8 recorded some of David's victories over Aramean states and armies, and it is not clear when the victories of ch. 10 took place. Since the chapter deals with a period before the birth of Solomon, the war must have taken place quite early in David's reign. The decision of the Arameans to make peace with David (19) may, therefore, have been a temporary one. The important point is that they abandoned their alliance with the Ammonites, who continued to fight but with no hope of success. The end of the war is described in 12:29–31.

11:1–13 David's relations with Bathsheba and Uriah. It was normal for military enterprises to cease in the winter months, so David resumed his operations against Ammon In the spring. V 1 does not imply that David's duty was to accompany the army. His presence in person was hardly necessary when an Israelite victory was so certain. The Ammonites' army was quickly destroyed and their capital city besieged. By now the Israelite army was powerful, and David's position very secure. It is all too often the case that a sense of ease and security is the prelude to spiritual and moral failure.

David had every right, then, to remain in Jerusalem, but the actions that followed were inexcusable. Bathsheba was a married woman, and David knew it. The note in v 4 about her uncleanness means that she had recently menstruated, so that without doubt the pregnancy was due to David's adultery with her. Bathsheba's morality could, perhaps, also be questioned but the biblical author puts all the blame on David: David was the king, and was acting in a very high-handed fashion, abusing his power and position.

David's useless attempts to induce Uriah to go home and to have intercourse with his wife also put him in a very bad light (6–13). The author makes no attempt to justify David. The background to this part of the story is the fact that the soldiers had taken an oath at the start of the campaign to abstain from sexual relations (cf. 1 Sa. 21:4–5). It is possible that David's suggestion to Uriah that he should wash his feet (8) refers to a ritual that would release him from this oath. In any case, Uriah considered himself to be on active duty and showed the highest standards of conduct.

11:14–27 Uriah's death. Until this point David hoped that his adultery could remain hidden, and that the unborn child would be accepted as Uriah's. Now that Uriah had killed that hope, he determined to kill Uriah. He feared a public scandal, naturally, and this would have been all the more serious because the penalty in Israel for adultery was death. Yet David, as chief judge in the land, could hardly sentence himself to death! Thus his casual immorality had caused him a very serious problem. The death of Uriah solved the problem: David married the widow, and nobody would have known whose child it was (27). Joab no doubt guessed the truth, but he would never have betrayed David. But v 27 reminds us that the whole truth was known to God.

David, then, did not hesitate to plan the death of Uriah, but he hoped to avoid the death of any other soldiers. When he read David's instructions, Joab adjusted the plan, with the result that several other soldiers died alongside Uriah (17). He clearly realized that David's plan was too obvious; his own plan hid the fact that Uriah was intended to be a victim. Joab's loyalty to David is revealed by this incident, and also his ruthlessness. But David was the real murderer.

The reference in v 21 is to Jdg. 9:50–53. Abimelech's death had shown Israelite troops the dangers of getting too close to the wall of a besieged city.

12:1–14 Nathan's rebuke. Nathan was a prophet (7:2), the spokesman of God at the royal court and a worthy successor to Samuel. He had the authority and the courage to act as critic and judge of the king. Before making the direct accusations of v 9, he told his famous parable. Some biblical parables were meant to puzzle, but not this one. David was misled into supposing that Nathan was describing a genuine incident, and so he pronounced sentence before realizing what Nathan really meant. David knew that the proper penalty for the theft of a sheep was fourfold repayment (Ex. 22:1), but he also expressed his indignation—so heartless a thief deserved to die. In this way he condemned himself.

The purpose of the parable was not only to induce David to condemn himself, but also to portray vividly the realities of the situation. Kings, if they were greedy, had the power to grab anything they wanted, and ordinary citizens were helpless. Nathan went on to point out how greedy David had been. In addition to his wives, he had apparently taken Saul's concubines (8) as a symbol that he had taken over royal control from Saul.

Vs 11–14 give God's verdict. David himself would survive into old age, but bloodshed in his own family would bring calamity upon him. The following chapters show how true this prophecy was. Absalom fulfilled the prediction of v 11 literally (16:22). It is important to notice, however, that God's punishment was accompanied by pardon, because David was repentant (13). David's honest repentance is very different from Saul's attempts to deceive Samuel (1 Sa. 13 and 15). The title of Ps. 51 links this psalm of penitence with this episode.

12:15–31 The birth of Solomon. Nathan's final prediction, that the illegitimate child would die, was the first to be fulfilled. David did not accept it fatalistically. This passage emphasizes how much David cared for the baby and draws attention to his anguish during its final illness. His feelings were so deep that he ignored the usual conventions, causing anxiety to his servants. David's sincere grief, as well as his care for Bathsheba, have the effect of attracting the reader's sympathy. The writer's purpose, however, was to show how effective God's verdict was: David's punishment had begun.

The chapters that follow continue the story of David's troubles. Two verses in this passage (24–25), however, show that while punishing David, God was not forgetting Israel. The birth of Solomon was God's way of fulfilling his promise in 7:12–13. The message to David through Nathan that the LORD loved Solomon is a signal to the reader that this was the son chosen by God to be the next king. So God's plans for the future were laid. (Solomon does not reappear in the story until 1 Ki. 1.)

Vs 26–31 round off the story of the victorious war against Ammon. On this occasion David himself went with the army. Joab again demonstrated his loyalty to the king.

Note. 30 It is possible that the very heavy crown belonged not to the Ammonite king but to the idol of Milcom, the chief god worshipped in Ammon. (See the NIV mg. REB and NRSV.)

13:1–18:33 David and his eldest sons

The central figure of these chapters is Absalom, David's third son (see 3:2–3). The eldest son, Amnon, was murdered by Absalom, and it seems likely that the second son must have died young, since he is never mentioned again. At any rate, after murdering Amnon, Absalom was free to make his own bid for the crown.

13:1–22 The rape of Tamar. Tamar was Amnon's half-sister. Her mother was Maacah (see 3:2–3). Marriage with a half-sister was prohibited under the law of Lv. 18:11 and Dt. 27:22. Perhaps the king had the authority to suspend this law, as Tamar suggested (13), but at any rate Amnon plainly thought marriage was impossible (2). His lust, deceit and brutality make him a very unpleasant character—the eldest son of David, but obviously not a suitable man to rule Israel. However, the purpose of the story is not to moralize about Amnon, but to show how David's own household produced 'calamity' for him, fulfilling 12:11. David was furious (21), but evidently did nothing to punish the wrongdoer. That was a bad mistake because it only increased Absalom's understandable anger to the point of hatred.

13:23–39 The murder of Amnon. Until this point our sympathies have been with Absalom, but this passage reveals that his character was not much better than Amnon's. He was equally violent and equally deceitful. Presumably, he waited two years (23) before taking action, in order to deceive his father. This chapter shows that even the king's sons were not free to come and go as they pleased, but needed royal permission to leave the court. So Absalom had to lay his plans carefully, plans which included his flight to Geshur, his mother's home (37).

The detailed account of the false rumour that Absalom had killed all his brothers may have the purpose of demonstrating God's overruling to protect Solomon. Clearly, Absalom could have killed them all if he had wished, and if so, Solomon would have died with them. Later on, Absalom was ambitious to become king but at this stage his only motive was revenge upon Amnon.

V 39 adds a realistic human touch; after three years David's grief for Amnon had abated, and he began to think differently about Absalom, who was probably his eldest surviving son. This change of heart prepared the way for ch. 14.

14:1–20 Joab's scheme. We may reasonably deduce from v 19 that Joab had tried to persuade David to forgive Absalom and bring him back to the royal court. If so, he failed to persuade him. Joab seems to have been anxious to ensure a smooth succession, and clearly viewed Absalom as the man to succeed David. He thus had the interests of the nation at heart, but he twice gave his support to the wrong son of David (see also 1 Ki. 1:7).

Failing to persuade David, he decided to trick him instead and made use of a wise woman. Like Nathan in ch. 13, she pretended that there was a case for David to deal with in his role as chief judge. The ‘moral’ of her story was that the welfare of a whole family is more important than the proper punishment of an individual, and David agreed with her. Applying this principle, she argued that the welfare of the whole nation was more important than the punishment of its crown prince (13) and that, therefore, Absalom ought to be recalled from exile.

Joab’s fear was that David might die while Absalom was still in exile, leaving Israel in political chaos. The woman’s words in v 14 seem to mean that God was sparing David’s life long enough for him to bring back Absalom.

14:21–33 Absalom’s return to Jerusalem. Although the Tekoan woman flattered David about his wisdom (20), his action towards Absalom was not in fact very wise. He allowed Absalom back into Israel but refused to restore him to his position at court. Absalom could have done David little harm if he had remained in exile, and he might have wished David no harm if David had welcomed him back. Instead, David’s action deeply angered him and at the same time gave him every opportunity to build up a conspiracy against David. This passage shows what an attractive person Absalom was outwardly but also indicates his arrogance.

15:1–12 Absalom’s conspiracy. There is no doubt that Absalom was a natural leader, with many skills and abilities. If his character had been different, he might have been an excellent king after David. It is remarkable that he was able to persuade so many people in Israel to support him and to turn against David. Vs 1–6 tell how he deceived people who were discontented with the judicial system and no doubt he made similar use of any kind of discontent. Even so, one would have thought that David’s great benefits to the nation would have kept most of the population loyal to him. So Absalom’s skills can be seen in his ability to build up strong support. Even Bathsheba’s grandfather Ahithophel deserted David (12). Absalom was also skilful in achieving such a large-scale conspiracy without any rumour of it reaching the royal court. From various pieces of information we can deduce that Absalom gained many followers both in Judah (where Hebron was) and the northern tribes, but not many in Jerusalem. It is probable that to preserve secrecy Absalom dared not canvass support in Jerusalem to any extent.

Note. 6 By the men of Israel the writer may mean the northern tribesmen as opposed to Judah, but more probably he means both north and south as opposed to Jerusalemites.

15:13–37 David’s flight. David had two choices, either to stay in Jerusalem and face a siege, or to flee to safety. He chose the latter course, which saved Jerusalem from damage and gave him time to manoeuvre and to organize an army against Absalom. So he headed eastwards, eventually reaching Mahanaim in Transjordan, Ish-Bosheth’s former capital (17:24). Chs. 15 and 16 give detailed attention to the attitudes and decisions of some important individuals in this situation.

David’s officials (14) had little choice, since Absalom would certainly have dismissed or even killed them. The concubines were given no choice at all, either by David or Absalom (16; see 16:22). His men (18) were David’s personal troops, with his foreign bodyguard; the regular army was presumably supporting Absalom (see 17:1). The loyalty of David’s personal troops, here voiced by their captain Ittai, ultimately gave him the victory.

It was a good sign for David that the two high priests remained loyal (24–29). It is interesting that David sent the ark of God back to Jerusalem, resigned to accept God’s will for himself. Unlike the Israelites in Eli’s time (1 Sa. 4:3–4) David did not believe that the ark would magically bring him victory. He could also make use of some loyal men in Jerusalem; his question to Zadok, Aren’t you a seer?, more probably means ‘Aren’t you an observant man?’

Another loyal friend sent back to Jerusalem was Hushai (30–37), who must have been a well-known member of the royal council. The story as a whole makes it clear that Ahithophel was an outstanding adviser (see 16:23), and his support for Absalom was a cause of great anxiety for David. David therefore sent Hushai back, in the hope that he could contradict any advice given to Absalom by Ahithophel. It was an idea that proved successful (17:1–14).

16:1–14 Ziba and Shimei. The struggle for power was between father and son, David and Absalom. Which of them would get the support of Saul’s family? David was quickly led to believe that they were siding with Absalom. Shimei was openly hostile to David, accusing him of causing the deaths of several of Saul’s household. He blamed David for the murders of, at least, Abner and Ish-Bosheth (chs. 3–4). In response, David once again showed himself less violent than Joab, and also more willing to seek and to accept the will of God (10–12).

As for Saul’s grandson Mephibosheth, Ziba persuaded David that he had turned traitor. Mephibosheth’s real feelings about David are never recorded, but Ziba’s accusation (3) was probably untrue. It is very difficult to see how the struggle between David and Absalom could have resulted in Mephibosheth gaining the kingdom. On the other hand, it is easy to see why Ziba made the accusation: a reward was immediately promised him.

16:15–23 Hushai and Ahithophel. Entering Jerusalem unopposed with his army, Absalom no doubt formed a council of advisers, among them Hushai and Ahithophel. Hushai’s purpose, as we know from 15:34, was to deceive Absalom and undermine Ahithophel’s advice. He immediately succeeded in deceiving Absalom, implying that he believed that Absalom was the one chosen by the LORD. In fact, he was sure that David remained God’s chosen one.

Hushai did not interfere with Ahithophel’s first piece of advice. Ahithophel rightly saw that the public appropriation of David’s concubines would create a total and permanent breach between father and son. It is likely that many Israelites had hesitated to support Absalom in case he and his father ended their quarrel; hostile reactions against David would then have been dangerous. Hushai probably took the view that Absalom’s seizure of the concubines might gain as much support for David as for Absalom, so he said nothing.

17:1–14 Hushai’s success. Ahithophel’s next counsel concerned the military aspect of the rebellion. His scheme made good sense. Speed and surprise would win the war with very few casualties. Once David was dead, all opposition to Absalom would be pointless.

Hushai’s advice was eloquently expressed (8–13). It was based on the fact that Absalom’s army was bigger than David’s. The flaw in his scheme (as Hushai well knew) was that it involved a long delay, and so would give David and Joab, with all their military experience, ample time to make proper preparations. Hushai’s scheme was so bad, in fact, that Ahithophel soon committed suicide (23). The biblical author recognizes that Absalom and his officers were misled by God as much as by Hushai (14).

17:15–29 Before the battle. Hushai hurried off to send word to David, obviously before Absalom had made a decision. The detailed narrative of vs 17–22 emphasizes that the messengers were almost caught; their escape was another instance of God’s overruling to frustrate Absalom.

Thanks to Hushai, David was able to make his headquarters in a fortified city, Mahanaim, while Absalom and his army, in due course, crossed the Jordan (24). Absalom’s commander-in-chief Amasa lacked the skill and experience of Joab, to whom he was related. (He was also a relative of both David and Absalom.) Vs 27–29 indicate that even in Mahanaim, previously Ish-Bosheth’s capital, David had influential friends; he could face the forthcoming battle with confidence.

18:1–18 Absalom’s death. Inevitably, the casualties that day were great (7). Rebellions do not come cheap. David’s men were able to show their superior experience, while Absalom’s troops knew little about the terrain and suffered heavily as a result (8). But no doubt many men died on both sides.

The writer concentrates his attention on the lives of only two men, David and Absalom. Neither of them seems to have appreciated Ahithophel’s perspective in 17:3, namely that the death of only one man (whether David or Absalom) would settle the issue. So David was ready to risk his life (and Absalom not only risked his life but lost it) but his troops were wiser than the king, and ensured that his life was not endangered. Joab ensured that Absalom’s life was ended, and with his death the battle and the war ended too (15–16). Joab saw matters more clearly than David, who found it impossible to view his son as an enemy.

V 18 rounds off the story of Absalom, giving a fresh illustration of his arrogance. His only real monument was his grave, deep in the forest. His words imply that his three sons (14:27) had already died.

18:19–33 The news of Absalom’s death. The choice of a messenger to the king depended on the content of the news. But was the news good or bad? Ahimaaz was confident that the news was good, but Joab knew that David was more interested in Absalom’s welfare than in the outcome of the battle. So Joab chose a foreign soldier to bring David the bad news of Absalom’s death. The story is one of the most poignant in the Bible, as David hoped for the best as he tried to interpret the unusual situation of two separate messengers approaching.

David’s final pathetic words are ironic: if he had simply remained in Jerusalem he would have died instead of Absalom! David’s deep and irrational grief proves how real was God’s punishment, foretold by Nathan (12:10). It is the chief purpose of the writer to emphasize this point.

19:1–20:26 David’s return and Sheba’s revolt

Wars, and especially civil wars, may achieve their aims but they inevitably give rise to new problems. David had won, but the country had lost its unity, and chs. 19 and 20 reveal something of the consequences. David was eventually successful in re-establishing unity for the remainder of his reign, and so God’s promises to him were fulfilled. He did not lose the throne, but his later years were unhappy ones.

19:1–15 Preparations for David’s return. This section is concerned with three distinct groups of people: David’s army, Absalom’s northern supporters, and the representatives of the tribe of Judah. David could easily have offended any of these. He had to show graciousness and forgiveness to former rebels without angering loyal supporters.

At first, he was in danger of offending his victorious army, till Joab once again took firm action. David’s decision to make Amasa the commander of his army (13) had two motives. First, it would show all rebels the extent of David’s forgiveness, since Amasa had been their commander. Secondly, David took pleasure in displacing Joab, who had been responsible for killing Absalom.

The northern tribesmen were ready to accept David as king once more, but plainly Judah showed some hesitation. We may infer that Absalom’s revolt had divided Judah, and as a tribe they were uncertain about David’s attitude towards them. It was, however, essential for David’s position that his own tribe should give him solid support, and he made it his priority to win them over. Some friction between north and south resulted (see vs 40–43).

19:16–39 David’s return. This whole section is set at the River Jordan, and it is the dramatic reversal of 16:1–14. The individuals who had reacted to David in various ways when he had been fleeing from Jerusalem now came to meet him as he returned victorious. David was forgiving to enemies like Shimei (18–23) and he rewarded those who had been truly loyal like Barzillai (31–40). Ziba once again reached David before his master Mephibosheth, but this time Mephibosheth presented himself and tried to undo the harm Ziba had caused (17–18, 24–30). Perhaps David could not decide which man was telling the truth, or else he felt that Ziba’s loyalty deserved some reward. The important consequence was that Mephibosheth lost some property but retained his life and presumably his honoured position at court.

19:40–20:13 Rebellion in the north. The final verses of ch. 19 revert to the tense relationship between Judah and the northern tribes. The northern group were half-hearted about David (40), even though they claimed a greater share in the king (43). The friction between them and Judah resulted in another revolt against David, led by Sheba (20:1). It was in reality a small affair which ended without a battle, but it had wide appeal nevertheless (20:2).

The personal interest centres on Joab and his relative Amasa. Amasa showed that he was a poor general, and it was Joab yet again whose ability and loyalty to David would defeat the enemy. The story also demonstrates again Joab’s brutal and ruthless character.

20:14–26 The end of the rebellion. The weakness of this revolt is demonstrated by the fact that Sheba retreated, never stopping to fight, to a frontier town on the northern border of Israel, Abel Beth Maacah. Even here he did not fight a battle but waited to be besieged. It seems that Abel was a poor choice, because it was a town with a reputation for wisdom and for peaceful conduct (18–19). The citizens acted swiftly and ended the hostilities by killing Sheba. Once again the death of a single individual settled the issue.

The victorious Joab went back to the king in Jerusalem, confident that he was once again commander-in-chief of Israel’s entire army, and David must have confirmed this position (23). The last verses of the chapter list David’s officials towards the end of the reign, a list which contains some changes from the earlier list of 8:16–18. The mention of forced labour is new, and shows that David’s administration had to depend on forcing numbers of free-born Israelites into some state works and projects. The most poignant change is the absence of any mention of David’s sons. Some of his sons were still alive, including Adonijah and Solomon, but Amnon and Absalom were both dead in tragic circumstances. The story of David’s sons is continued in 1 Ki. 1.

21:1–24:25 David’s reign: problems and prospects

These last four chapters of 2 Samuel are often referred to as an appendix to the book. The contents are varied, and the chapters interrupt the story of the succession struggles. There is, nevertheless, more unity of theme and deliberate purpose on the part of the writer than is at first apparent. These chapters illustrate some of David’s other problems, and show how God provided guidance and loyal supporters for David in all his difficulties. They show too how his experiences of life and of God together made him ‘the sweet psalmist of Israel’. Lastly, this section opens some important future perspectives.

21:1–22 Famine and warfare

21:1–14 The execution of Saul’s family. Most of the troubles of David’s reign were due to warfare, but the land of Israel suffered occasional droughts and famines too, and this chapter recalls a particularly serious famine, perhaps fairly early in David's reign. The oracle of God, when consulted (1), referred to an episode not mentioned elsewhere, an attack by Saul on the people of the city of Gibeon. The background is that in defending Israel Saul had attacked not only the Philistines but any non-Israelites who posed a threat. But the Gibeonites posed no threat, and to break the old treaty with them (see Jos. 9) was a serious crime. The wrong had never been put right. By modern laws, to punish Saul's family for Saul's sins would be equally wrong, but in the ancient world the principle of a family's common responsibility was strongly held. Even so, we may still feel that the Gibeonites were vindictive.

The writer's chief reason for telling this story is to show that David was not responsible for the deaths of the seven men now executed. No doubt there were some Israelites like Shimei (16:5–8) who accused David of hatred of Saul's family. This passage, therefore, reminds the reader about David's treatment of Mephibosheth, and shows his scrupulous care for the remains of Saul and his descendants.

21:15–22 Incidents from the Philistine wars. This section gives us a fragment from the Philistine wars of David, and it is not clear what its purpose is, nor why it has been placed at this point. In some ways it lays a foundation for ch. 22, which contains a psalm in which enemies and warfare are a major theme. Probably the chief reason for including these verses is to provide a setting for the description of David as the lamp of Israel which must not be extinguished (17). The king was seen by his men as vital to the welfare of Israel, a very different picture from the description of a king by Samuel in 1 Sa. 8. David had been punished by God, as earlier chapters have shown, but in these closing chapters we are reminded of the close relationship between Yahweh and David, Yahweh's chosen and anointed king.

Note. 19 Elhanan ... killed Goliath. This is a puzzling statement, but both this verse and its parallel in 1 Ch. 20:5 (where the words are rather different) contain textual problems. It is unlikely, therefore, that it contradicts the story of David's defeat of Goliath in 1 Sa. 17. One possibility is that 'Elhanan' was David's personal name and 'David' his throne-name.

22:1–23:7 Two psalms of David

22:1–51 A song of praise. This song is also included, with minor differences, in the book of Psalms, as Ps. 18. Its place among the psalms shows that it was used as a general thanksgiving hymn. Its use here is partly to illustrate David's reputation as a psalmist, but more particularly to give a general commentary on David's experience of God. Much of his reign had been occupied in struggling against a variety of enemies (1) but he had won through to a period of peace. He must have been a man of great ability, but in this psalm all the credit for victory and success is given to God.

Vs 1–7 describe what God had been to David, above all his deliverer. Vs 8–20, in very pictorial language, describe God responding to David's pleas for help, and emphasize God's great power. Vs 21–25 refer to the basis for God's intervention: as a king, David had upheld God's laws among the Israelite people. (V 24 is plainly not recalling David's sins against Uriah; the psalm is concerned with royal policy, not personal conduct.)

Vs 26–37 turn to the theme of God's faithfulness; he had truly kept his covenant with David (see ch. 7). Vs 38–46 consider David's enemies, especially the foreign nations he had defeated with God's help. Vs 47–51 round off the psalm with renewed praise. The last words of the chapter look forward: God would keep covenant with David's descendants too. For more detailed comments, see the commentary on Ps. 18.

23:1–7 David’s last words. This second psalm is about the same themes as ch. 22 but puts more emphasis on the covenant God had made with David, and pays less attention to enemies. Such evil men need careful handling, but their end is certain (7).

The psalm recognizes the prophetic Spirit which inspired David as a singer of songs. Above all, however, David’s kingship is vividly described. Because his rule was carried out in righteousness and in the fear of God it was wonderfully beneficial to Israel (4). The salvation and the fulfilment of David’s every desire mentioned in v 5 also relate to his rule; victory and prosperity for Israel are meant.

23:8–39 David’s mighty men

The help God gave to David against his enemies has been acknowledged in the two psalms. The writer now testifies to the human help he received, and lists his outstanding soldiers. First, there was an elite group called the Three whose heroism is illustrated in vs 8–12. Vs 13–17 mention the exploits of three others, unnamed, who belonged to the Thirty. Vs 18–23 pick out two others from the Thirty, Abishai and Benaiah, both of whom have been mentioned in earlier chapters.

Asahel (24) was killed early in David’s reign (2:23), and the death of Uriah (39) has also been described (11:17). This suggests that other men were added to the Thirty when necessary to keep the number correct. Thus the number thirty-seven (39) can be explained.

24:1–17 Census and plague

This is a puzzling chapter for a modern reader; though if we are wise we all recognize that God’s actions may at any time be inscrutable, beyond our understanding. Here, the biblical writer does not explain why Yahweh was angry with Israel (1), nor why a census was sinful. There is evidence that in the Ancient Near East a census was thought to be dangerous and likely to attract divine anger. The simple fact is that this census was followed by a plague, and the biblical writer sees God’s hand in it. In 1 Ch. 21:1 Satan’s activity is mentioned, but the writer of Samuel is more concerned to stress God’s control of all historical events. God’s intervention was proved, in any case, by the word of the LORD (11); in fact, the plague was the least of three possible evils.

V 16 introduces us to the threshing-floor of Araunah. As early readers would have known at once, this was the site of the future temple, erected in Jerusalem by Solomon. It was precisely at this site, then, that God’s presence was revealed in this plague situation. God’s anger and God’s power had been demonstrated; now God’s mercy too was made evident to Israel.

24:18–25 The new altar

This final paragraph brings the books of Samuel to an end, with a strong forward look. The threshing-floor of Araunah becomes a sacred place, a shrine for sacrifices, offerings and prayer (25)—in fact, Solomon’s temple in embryo. Here is a scene of hope and fellowship (and the plague came to an end).

Despite David’s sin (10), he appears in a good light in this chapter. He confessed his sin, he was careful to consult God’s prophet, he interceded for his people (17) and he paid Araunah in full for all he took from him. In earlier chapters, David has been a far from perfect king, and he is still seen here to be a sinful man; but he nevertheless left a good example for later kings to follow, not least in his concern for the proper worship of God. These concerns continue into the books of Kings, which go on to complete the story of David.

1 AND 2 KINGS

Introduction

Title and place in the canon

The two books of Samuel and the two books of Kings were originally meant to be read as one. 1 Kings continues the account of David's reign begun in 2 Samuel, and the first two chapters provide the conclusion to the court history of David (also called the succession narrative), which breaks off at the end of 2 Sa. 20. The break between 1 and 2 Kings interrupts the account of the reign of Azariah and the ministry of Elijah.

The original unity of the four books is reflected in the title which they bear in the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the OT, made in the third and second centuries BC)—1–4 Basileiai, the four books of 'kingdoms' or 'reigns'. We cannot be sure when the division into four books first occurred or why, but it has been suggested that it was the work of an editor who divided the OT into lectionary rolls of roughly equal length.

In the Hebrew Bible, the books of Kings conclude the section known as the Former Prophets (i.e. Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings), the historical books which span the period from the Israelites' arrival in the promised land to their eventual loss of the land and Judah's exile in Babylon. In understanding the message of the books of Kings this wider context should always be borne in mind.

Date and authorship

Date of Kings in its present form

In its present form, Kings cannot have been written before the release of King Jehoiachin from prison in 561 BC, roughly midway through the Babylonian exile. This is the latest event recorded in the work, which therefore seems to have been composed sometime between that date and the first return of Jewish exiles to Jerusalem in 538 BC. The work was evidently not a free composition of the exilic period, however, since the author makes use of a variety of older sources, some of which he names (see below).

Recent theories of the composition of Kings

In the 1940s Martin Noth brought a new perspective to the study of 1 and 2 Kings. He argued that Kings should be seen as part of a larger work, beginning with Joshua and ending with 2 Kings, produced by a single author during the exile. Although this writer used older sources, he was more than simply an editor or compiler; he was an author who welded his sources into a unity which expressed his own understanding of Israel's history. In particular, Noth argued that the whole work was strongly coloured by the theology and style of Deuteronomy. Hence it has been dubbed the 'Deuteronomistic (or Deuteronomic) history'. Noth's 'Deuteronomistic historian' stresses that cultic worship should take place only in the Jerusalem temple (even kings who 'did what was right in the eyes of the LORD' are criticized for not doing away with alternative places of worship, 'the high places'; e.g. 2 Ki. 12:2–3). He is also strongly critical of idolatry, seeing it as the cause of the ultimate disaster of the exile (e.g. 1 Ki. 14:15–16; 2 Ki. 21:13–14).

Some scholars who accept Noth's case for a Deuteronomistic history have adapted his theory to include two or more editions of the work. Several who take this view argue that the first edition, written before the exile, came to a climax with the reforms of King Josiah. The sudden and unexpected reversal of Judah's fortunes after Josiah's reign, leading to the catastrophe of the exile, made a second edition necessary. However, most arguments in favour of two or more editions of the work depend on assumptions about how an original author would have compiled and structured his history. Recent studies of ancient methods of composition have cast doubt on these assumptions, and currently there is a trend away from the two-edition view. For example, although 2 Ki. 25:27–30 may strike a modern reader as an unlikely way for the original author to have rounded off his work, it is now appreciated that it could well have been perfectly acceptable in an ancient context. In short, there is no good reason to reject the view that Kings (if not the whole Deuteronomistic history) is the work of a single author, working in the second half of the exile.

In view of the range of sources he was able to draw on (see below), and his interest in the fate of King Jehoiachin, the author was probably one of the high-ranking civil servants ('nobles', 'officials' and 'leading men of the land') exiled with Jehoiachin in 597 BC (2 Ki. 24:12–15), ten years before Jerusalem was destroyed. He may even have been a scribe, whose profession (had the exile not intervened) would have been to record the affairs of the royal court. We may guess that he wrote primarily for his fellow-members of the exiled royal court who were searching for a theology that would make sense of the catastrophe which had overtaken them, their king, their city and their land. The theology which he offers, expressed in the form of a history, is rooted in the teachings of Deuteronomy and shot through with a high view of the prophetic word. He shows his readers time and again how God's word, delivered by his prophets, has an irrevocable influence on events, warning, judging and bringing judgment to pass (e.g. 1 Ki. 11:11–13, 31–39; 19:15–18; 21:17–29; 2 Ki. 9:1–10, 36–37; 17:7–23; 21:10–15).

Sources

The author evidently had sources at his disposal from which he derived information such as the length of each king's reign and (for the period of the divided monarchy) synchronisms between the reigns of the kings of Israel and the kings of Judah. Such information was probably contained in king lists and chronicles of the sort which we know were kept by the kings of Assyria and Babylon. Such sources sometimes contained brief accounts of selected events and achievements of a king's reign and so may have supplied the writer with, for example, his account of Solomon's building projects (1 Ki. 9:15–19). However, there is much material in Kings, particularly the numerous stories of the words and actions of the prophets, which must have come from other kinds of sources.

Sometimes the reader is referred to another work for further information, e.g. ‘the book of the annals [RSV, ‘acts’] of Solomon’ (1 Ki. 11:41), ‘the book of the annals [RSV, ‘Chronicles’] of the kings of Israel’ (1 Ki. 14:19) and ‘the book of the annals [RSV, ‘Chronicles’] of the kings of Judah’ (1 Ki. 14:29). While the writer’s original readership presumably had ready access to these, they have unfortunately not survived for us to study. (The biblical books of 1 and 2 Chronicles, written after the return from exile, are not to be confused with the ‘Chronicles’ mentioned in 1 Ki. 14; however, they may occasionally preserve some additional information from those lost works.)

Occasionally the writer leaves the perspective of his pre-exilic sources unchanged, e.g. in 1 Ki. 8:8, where the expression ‘they are still there today’ stems from a time before the temple was destroyed.

Biblical history writing

It is an impressive achievement of the author that he has produced a work which preserves the variety of his sources while welding them into a powerful unity. But what kind of writing is it? Even a first impression of the work is enough to tell us that, although it deals with history, it is not history writing of the kind produced by modern historians. The very fact that the writer refers us to other sources for further information shows that he has given us only a selection of the material available to him. In other words, he has chosen to include only that material which serves his aims. This is also suggested by the very uneven and selective treatment given to the long procession of kings. The treatment of Solomon’s reign occupies seventeen times as much space as that of Joash’s reign, although both reigns lasted forty years.

Furthermore, the writer’s view of what made a king important is very different from that of a modern historian. Thanks to archaeological discoveries we know that Omri was a king of some importance on the international scene, yet the brief and disapproving account of his reign in 1 Ki. 16:23–28 gives us no hint of this. Perhaps his true political stature was reflected in ‘the book of the annals of the kings of Israel’, to which we are referred, but the writer of Kings was not interested in telling us about it. To him, Omri’s significance was that he ‘did evil in the eyes of the LORD’, leading Israel deeper into apostasy.

Indeed, no king is judged by the writer of Kings according to his success or failure in the political arena or on the battlefield. The single most important criterion for the author is what a king did or did not do for the cultic worship of his people. Kings who upheld its purity are praised (though even they are censured for failing to ‘remove the high places’) while those who fostered idolatry are condemned. And kings who sponsored idolatry to a sufficiently serious extent are held responsible for the eventual destruction of their kingdoms. It is true, of course, that all history writing involves interpretation as well as the reporting of events. But the degree of selectivity and interpretation found in Kings (and in other OT history writing) is striking by modern standards.

In short, what we have here is not a straightforward history but a history which contains its own theological commentary on events. The author’s intention was not so much to record the events themselves as to explain their significance.

Structure

If there is a careful arrangement of the material in 1 and 2 Kings, it is not immediately obvious, and the structure of the work has been discerned in a variety of ways.

It is perhaps most helpful to see a basic threefold structure. The first part deals with Solomon's accession and reign (1 Ki. 1–11); the second deals with the period of the two separate kingdoms, Israel and Judah (1 Ki. 12–2 Ki. 17); and the third deals with the time after the fall of Israel when Judah survived alone (2 Ki. 18–25). There is a clue that the writer himself may have had some such division in mind, in that the first two parts conclude with extended theological comments (1 Ki. 11:1–13; 29–39; 2 Ki. 17:7–23, 34–41).

The middle section is by far the longest (twenty-eight chapters) and can itself be divided helpfully into three parts. The first, 1 Ki. 12:1–16:28, deals with the kings of Israel and Judah from Solomon's death to the reign of Omri in Israel. The second, 1 Ki. 16:29–2 Ki. 10:36 deals with the dynasty of Omri and its horrific downfall and is concerned almost exclusively with events in Israel. There are only two brief interludes about Judah in the whole of this section (1 Ki. 22:41–50 and 2 Ki. 8:16–29), i.e. a total of only twenty-four verses out of more than sixteen chapters. The treatment of Omri's dynasty has been extended by the inclusion of stories concerning Elijah and Elisha. Elijah dominates 1 Ki. 17–19 and 21 and 2 Ki. 1:1–2:18; Elisha is the major prophetic figure in 2 Ki. 2:19–8:15 (with further appearances in 9:1–3 and 13:14–21, the latter being outside the section we are discussing). Stories of other prophets also help to swell the account of this period (1 Ki. 20:13–43; 22:1–28). The third part consists of 2 Ki. 11–17 and once again deals with kings of Israel and Judah.

The message of 1 and 2 Kings

Kings begins with the monarchy at its high point as Solomon succeeded David as ruler over a united kingdom. In the first few chapters the climax of the whole of the Deuteronomistic history is reached with the building of the temple. But the glories of Solomon's reign were short-lived. His own foibles led to the kingdom dividing as soon as he was dead. The sins of Jeroboam, the first king of Israel, set the north on the road to disaster, and the writer provides plenty of signs that Judah had the potential to go the same way. After Israel had fallen, Judah enjoyed the reigns of two reforming kings, Hezekiah and Josiah, who seemed likely to lift their kingdom to new heights and save it from the fate of Israel. But both reigns were followed by dramatic reversals, and it became plain that even a king of Josiah's stature could not avert disaster. At the end we are left with the depressing conclusion that disaster was inevitable, given that no-one (and therefore no king) is sinless (cf. 1 Ki. 8:46). The writer admits that even David, his prototype for the good king, was not perfect (1 Ki. 15:5). If the prototype fell short, what hope could there be for any who came after him?

Kings thus demonstrates how it was that God destroyed his own people and sent them into exile. Its main purpose is to justify God's terrible decision by showing that the kings of Israel and Judah, almost without exception, were hopelessly flawed. The kings were not alone in this, of course; the people as a whole possessed a chronic tendency to sin.

Is Kings, therefore, a history without hope? It certainly offers a negative assessment of human institutions. In this respect it concludes a theme begun in the book of Judges. That book ends with the failure of the judges as an institution and the hope that monarchy might have something better to offer (Jdg. 21:25). In Kings, monarchy is put to the test and likewise fails.

On the other hand, Kings illustrates God's commitment to Israel and his involvement in the nation's political life. It therefore warns us that political institutions are not to be treated as an arena where God's writ does not run. He is shown to be active there in grace as well as in judgment. Indeed, the interweaving of human freedom and responsibility with God's sovereignty is subtly portrayed throughout, discouraging a too simplistic view of their relationship. Both good and bad human actions are taken up by God and used to forward his overarching purposes. He is a God who works out those purposes in history, both by means of and in spite of sinful human beings.

Although there is plenty of emphasis on the fact that faithfulness brings blessing and faithlessness judgment, there is more to the writer's theology than a cause-and-effect connection between actions and consequences. God's freedom produces surprising turns of events. For example, Israel was not destroyed in the time of Jehoahaz, not because its kings showed signs of improvement but simply because God chose to show Israel mercy and grace (2 Ki. 13:4–6, 22–23; 14:26–27). But God's freedom is not only freedom to exercise mercy. His determination to destroy Judah remained fixed in spite of Josiah's unquestioned piety and far-reaching religious reforms. God's freedom means that he cannot be manipulated by human beings. It is not the behaviour of kings which shapes history but the sovereign will of God.

It is partly this emphasis on God's freedom that holds out some hope for Judah at the end of 2 Kings. Because God is free to act as he pleases, exile may not be his final word. But hope also exists because, as the writer reminds the exiles, if God's people repent and seek him, he may forgive them and cause their conquerors to show them mercy (1 Ki. 8:46–51). The book is never any more explicit than this in suggesting what may lie beyond exile. There is no promise of a return to the land, nor of a restoration of the Davidic dynasty. (What hope could be pinned on the latter anyway, following its catastrophic failure to bring salvation?) The Christian reader may see the dynasty finally restored in the person of Jesus, the second David, but such a hope is nowhere expressed in Kings; for that we must turn to the books of Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

The historical background

The books of Kings cover a period of slightly over 400 years, from Solomon's accession in (or slightly before) 970 BC to the freeing of the exiled king Jehoiachin from prison in 561 BC. Only a brief sketch of the history of this period can be provided here. It is divided into three parts corresponding to the three major divisions of Kings as discussed above.

Solomon's reign (970–930 BC)

Solomon benefited from the peaceful conditions bequeathed to him by David. For at least the first half of his reign he enjoyed good relations with Egypt in the south and Hiram of Tyre in the north. Both were important trading partners. There were no major powers to threaten the security of Solomon's small empire. Egypt had ceased to be a great power in the Near East nearly two centuries before his accession. The Pharaohs of the Twenty-first Dynasty (1089–945 BC) undertook no foreign policy except to maintain secure borders and good relations with Egypt's neighbours. It was probably with Siamun of this dynasty (978–959 BC) that Solomon entered into an alliance sealed by his marriage to the Pharaoh's daughter (1 Ki. 3:1).

However, the latter part of Solomon's reign saw a deterioration of his foreign relations. There is a hint that his relationship with Hiram of Tyre became less cordial (1 Ki. 9:10–13), and he faced hostility from Edom in the south and Damascus in the north (1 Ki. 11:14–25). A change of dynasty brought Shoshenq I (Shishak) to the throne of Egypt in 945 BC; he gave asylum to Jeroboam when Solomon tried to kill him (1 Ki. 11:40) and attacked Jerusalem a few years after Solomon's death (1 Ki. 14:25–26).

The divided monarchy (930–722 BC)

Shishak's invasion of Palestine in the fifth year of Rehoboam (925 BC) was not followed up by any attempt to consolidate Egyptian control of the region. The days of Egypt's empire were past. Long-term threats to Israel and Judah lay elsewhere.

Israel's King Omri (885–874 BC) achieved considerable international standing, though we learn nothing of this from the biblical account. On the Moabite Stone (or Mesha Stele), an inscription by King Mesha of Moab c. 850 BC to commemorate his successful rebellion against Israel (see 2 Ki. 3:4–27), Omri is named as the king who had earlier conquered Moab and made it Israel's vassal. As late as 722 BC, Israel is referred to in Assyrian sources as 'the land of Omri'.

Aram ('Syria'; RSV), a city-state ruled from Damascus, became a threat to Israel in the ninth century BC. Under Ben-Hadad it attacked Israel to aid Asa of Judah (1 Ki. 15:18–20), perhaps around 895 BC. Another Ben-Hadad (probably the son and successor of the first) was the almost constant enemy of Ahab and his sons and twice besieged Samaria (1 Ki. 20; 2 Ki. 6–7). A brief period of peace between Ahab and Ben-Hadad (1 Ki. 22:1) was probably prompted by the emergence of Assyria as a common enemy. Threatened by the western advances of Assyria under Shalmaneser III (858–824 BC) a number of small kingdoms formed a coalition to oppose him. Shalmaneser's own account of the battle of Qarqar (853 BC) names Ahab and Ben-Hadad as members of this alliance and records that Ahab fielded 2,000 chariots and 10,000 foot-soldiers—one of the largest forces in the coalition. Although Shalmaneser claimed a victory over the alliance, Assyria's interference in the west was temporarily halted.

Hostilities with Aram were renewed as soon as the threat from Assyria had passed (1 Ki. 22:2–3). Around 843 BC Ben-Hadad was assassinated by Hazael who ruled in his place (2 Ki. 8:7–15). Israel barely survived the attacks of Hazael and his son Ben-Hadad III (2 Ki. 13:3–7), and even Judah was threatened (2 Ki. 12:17–18). However, military and economic revival came to both Israel and Judah under their respective kings, Jeroboam II (782–753 BC) and Azariah/Uzziah (767–740 BC).

However, Assyria was soon to change the face of the Near East. The campaigns of Tiglath-Pileser III (744–727 BC) began a drastic expansion of the Assyrian Empire, into which Israel was rapidly absorbed. Through the voluntary submission of Menahem (see on 2 Ki. 15:17–22), Israel became an Assyrian satellite state, probably in 738 BC. Following the abortive rebellion of Pekah, its territory was reduced and it became a vassal (732 BC), subject to greater Assyrian interference but still allowed its own king. When Hoshea rebelled, Samaria was destroyed (722 BC) and the district became an Assyrian province under the control of a military governor. Part of the population was deported to other parts of the Assyrian Empire and replaced by foreign settlers. Thus the northern tribes lost their identity, and Israel ceased to exist.

Judah alone (722–587 BC)

Judah had submitted to Assyria under Ahaz in 734 BC (2 Ki. 16:7–8), but Hezekiah reversed his father's policies and rebelled. The Assyrian king Sennacherib (704–681 BC) invaded Judah in 701 BC and reduced its territory, capturing forty-six fortified cities and deporting 200,150 captives. Jerusalem almost suffered destruction at his hands but was miraculously delivered (2 Ki. 18–19). Judah continued under Assyrian control throughout the long reign of Manasseh, who is mentioned as a vassal by Sennacherib's successors Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal. Under Ashurbanipal (668–630 BC) the Assyrian Empire reached its greatest extent. He invaded Egypt and captured Thebes in 663 BC. But towards the end of his reign Assyria's hold on the western parts of its empire began to crumble. Josiah was able to extend his reforms into the old territory of Israel without interference.

Judah's independence was, however, short-lived. Josiah died in 609 BC while trying to prevent Neco, king of Egypt, from aiding the last king of Assyria against Babylon (see the commentary on 2 Ki. 23:29–30). Egypt briefly moved into the power-vacuum left by the collapse of Assyria, laying claim to Syria-Palestine. Judah thus became a vassal of Egypt. However, the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar defeated Neco at Carchemish in 605 BC, and Judah became part of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. In the same year Nebuchadnezzar succeeded his father Nabopolassar on the throne of Babylon.

Judah twice rebelled against Babylonian rule. The first attempt resulted in the deportation of King Jehoiachin and the cream of Jerusalem's population to Babylon (597 BC). The second attempt was better organized but just as ill-fated. It involved Zedekiah acting as a member of an anti-Babylonian alliance and looking to Egypt for support. Egyptian help was late and ineffective. In 588 BC, when Nebuchadnezzar was besieging Jerusalem, the army of Pharaoh Hophra set out to aid the city, and the siege was briefly lifted (Je. 37:5–8). The Egyptians, however, were soon dealt with, and the siege was renewed. In 587 BC Jerusalem was destroyed, and a second group of exiles made their way to Babylon. Although the exiled Jehoiachin was later treated with respect by Nebuchadnezzar's successor (2 Ki. 25:27–30), the rule of Judah's kings was finished.

Chronology

Scholars attempting to reconcile biblical data on the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah with the dates provided by Assyrian and Babylonian sources have faced many difficulties. This is not the place to outline the problems (for one example see the commentary on 2 Ki. 18:9–12) or their possible solutions. A good brief discussion can be found in W. S. LaSor, D. A. Hubbard and F. W. Bush, Old Testament Survey (Eerdmans, 1982), pp. 288–297. For a detailed treatment see E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd edn. (Zondervan, 1984). The table in Biblical History adopts Thiele's scheme with some minor emendations.

Commentary

1:1–11:43 Solomon

1:1–2:46 Solomon's rule established

1:1–10 David and Adonijah. Here we find David in the weakness of old age, unable to keep warm or to perform sexually (1–4). Waiting in the wings is Adonijah, the fourth of six sons born to David by six different wives while he was king in Hebron (2 Sa. 3:2–5). David's first son, Ammon, had been murdered by the third, Absalom, who himself died while leading a rebellion against David (2 Sa. 13:23–29; 18:9–15). As no mention is made of David's second son, Chileab, he had presumably died too, leaving Adonijah as the eldest surviving son and natural heir to David's throne. The writer intends to remind us of these circumstances by pointing out that Adonijah was born next after Absalom (6). The description of him as a very handsome man recalls David's early good looks (1 Sa. 16:12) and further suggests that here is David's natural successor.

Adonijah had not only set his heart on the throne but had enlisted the support of some notable members of David's court (7, 9). The note that he acquired chariots and horses ... with fifty men to run ahead of him (5) recalls the preparations which Absalom made before trying to grasp the throne (2 Sa. 15:1), just as David's failure to question Adonijah's actions (6) recalls his failure to nip Absalom's rebellion in the bud. David's weakness in this scene cannot be blamed entirely on old age, for it is consistent with his earlier failures to assert himself where his sons were concerned (2 Sa. 13–15).

Without David's knowledge, Adonijah arranged a feast with sacrifices and had himself proclaimed king at En Rogel, a spring just to the south of Jerusalem (9; cf. vs 13, 18, 25). This does not mean that David ceased immediately to be king, but rather that Adonijah would henceforth rule as co-regent. In view of David's advanced age, however, there can be no doubt that Adonijah would have been the effective monarch.

1:11–37 Nathan's intervention. We have already been told that Nathan the prophet was not of Adonijah's party (8), and now he emerges as the supporter of a rival claimant, Solomon. It becomes apparent in these verses that David had sworn an oath to Solomon's mother, Bathsheba, that her son would be the next king. (Either that or Nathan and Bathsheba set out to convince David that he had sworn such an oath when in fact he had not! But the fact that Adonijah did not invite Solomon to his celebrations suggests that he recognized him as having some claim to the throne and was making a carefully timed preemptive move.) Bathsheba's entry into the story reminds us of the lustful David of 2 Sa. 11 and throws the present picture of the impotent old man into sharp relief.

Although Nathan is given his title 'the prophet' several times in this chapter he brought no 'word of the LORD' to the failing king. Instead all is done by intrigue and clever persuasion. First, having been coached by Nathan, Bathsheba reminds the king of his oath and informs him of Adonijah's accession feast. Then Nathan makes his own carefully timed entry (while she was still speaking with the king) and broaches the issue from a different angle. Speaking less confrontationally than Bathsheba, Nathan pretends to think that David might have sanctioned Adonijah's celebration and politely points out that certain people, including himself, have not been invited.

David belatedly stirs himself and seizes control of events, swearing that his former oath will be fulfilled at once (30). Calling for Solomon's other main supporters, Zadok the priest and Benaiah, he swiftly gives instructions for Solomon's immediate anointing at Gihon, a spring outside the eastern wall of Jerusalem.

1:38–53 Solomon becomes king. Accompanied by his chief supporters and David's bodyguard (the Kerethites and the Pelethites), Solomon goes to Gihon, significantly riding on King David's mule (38). David does not attend, perhaps because he was too frail to travel even the short distance to the foot of the eastern slope. The large crowd, assembled at short notice, indicates that Solomon was a popular candidate. Adonijah hears the noise of this crowd at En Rogel, and a full report of events soon reaches him; realizing that the game was up, his supporters quietly disperse.

Adonijah himself expects that Solomon (whom he refers to as 'King Solomon') would want to kill him, so he seeks refuge by taking hold of the horns of the altar. Israelite altars (as illustrated by archaeological finds) had pointed projections which stood up from the four corners of the square top. Seizing two of these 'horns' gave a person sanctuary. The altar in question presumably stood in the tent which David had set up to house the 'ark of the LORD' (2 Sa. 6:17; cf. 1 Ki. 2:28).

Until this point Solomon has been a shadowy and passive figure (he is 'made king', 'caused to ride' etc.), but now he enters the story as a character in his own right. He acts decisively but with shrewdness and caution, promising to spare Adonijah's life so long as he remains loyal. Adonijah humbly acknowledges his younger brother as the new king (53), but there is no real reconciliation between the two men. We are left with the impression that matters are not yet settled.

In the final three verses of the chapter, Solomon is referred to four times as King Solomon (twice in reported speech and twice by the narrator himself); Adonijah, on the other hand, has been referred to only once as King, and that was in the reported acclamation of his supporters (25).

Thus the chapter ends with Solomon anointed king and David satisfied that Yahweh's will has been done (48). But God's will had previously been neglected; David is spurred into action only by Adonijah's bid for power and Nathan's concern for the safety of Solomon's supporters, including himself. As in the story of Joseph, God's activity remains hidden among the plots and ambitions of human beings.

2:1–12 The death of David. We are not told how long Solomon ruled as co-regent before David died. The story moves straight to the eve of the old king's death.

First, David gives Solomon advice on matters spiritual. He is to walk in Yahweh's ways and keep his commandments. Yahweh's promise of an everlasting dynasty (2 Sa. 7) is clearly understood by David to be conditional on the faithfulness of his descendants (4), a fact which gains significance as the story unfolds.

Secondly, David instructs Solomon to deal with certain items of unfinished business. Murders committed by Joab against David's will are to be avenged; the sons of Barzillai are to be rewarded for their loyalty; and Shimei is to be punished for cursing David at the time of Absalom's rebellion. No specific instructions are given concerning Joab and Shimei; David simply tells Solomon to act in accordance with his wisdom (6, 9). The deathbed speech which begins bright with spiritual counsel ends dark with menace. It is followed by a formal notice of David's death and burial, of a kind which occurs regularly throughout the books of Kings.

The empire which King David bequeathed to his son Solomon.

2:13–25 The death of Adonijah. Adonijah approaches Bathsheba in her role as queen-mother, an honoured position at the royal court, to request the girl Abishag as his wife. Abishag's status had been that of royal concubine (even though David had been incapable of sexual relations), and for a man to take such a concubine for himself could be tantamount to a bid for royal power (cf. 2 Sa. 3:6–8; 16:21–22). When the request is relayed to Solomon the implication is not lost on him; he interprets it as the opening gambit in a new move to seize the throne (22). Unlike his father, he is not slow to take action: Adonijah is killed the same day.

2:26–27 Abiathar banished. Solomon moves with swift efficiency to mop up all other traces of opposition to his reign. For giving support to Adonijah, Abiathar is expelled from his role as priest and banished to an internal exile on his estate at Anathoth, some 3 miles (5 km) north of Jerusalem. The writer sees his rustication fulfilling the earlier words of an anonymous prophet concerning the line of Eli (1 Sa. 2:27–36). Abiathar's place is taken by Zadok (35). Anathoth was a town allotted to the Levites and was later the home of Jeremiah (Je. 1:1).

2:28–35 The death of Joab. On hearing of Adonijah's death, Joab realizes his own danger and flees to the tent of the LORD to seek sanctuary at the horns of the altar. However, it is not his support for Adonijah which endangers his life so much as David's deathbed instructions to Solomon. While Benaiah has some scruples about killing Joab at the altar, Solomon has none about ordering Benaiah to do it. He appears to consider that the need to avenge Joab's victims and the wrong done to David overrides the law of sanctuary. He declares that by having Joab killed he is enacting divine retribution and that Yahweh's blessing of peace will be upon the house of David for ever (33). Thus Benaiah kills Joab and takes his place as commander of the army.

The writer passes no comment on any of this and we are left wondering whether he approved of Solomon's actions or not. At least he knew that Solomon's prediction of everlasting peace would not be fulfilled!

2:36–46 The death of Shimei. Against Shimei Solomon takes the relatively lenient measure of confining him to Jerusalem, forbidding him to leave on pain of death. Was this all Solomon intended to do, or did he hope from the start that the condition would eventually provide a reason to put Shimei to death? Probably the latter, for David's instruction had been that Shimei be brought down to the grave in blood (9). When after three years Shimei breaks the condition, Solomon reveals that he regards his death as divine retribution for the wrong done to David (44). Once again Solomon predicts that his reign will be blessed and (incorrectly) that David's dynasty will be established for ever (45).

David's unfinished business having been dealt with and all opposition squashed, Solomon emerges as a pragmatic, shrewd and decisive monarch, confident that he is enacting God's judgments and that he will receive God's blessing. It is not a particularly attractive picture, but we are left in no doubt that the kingdom was now firmly established in Solomon's hands (46).

3:1–4:34 Greatness and wisdom

3:1 Alliance with Egypt. In order to emphasize that Solomon was also establishing himself in the arena of international politics, the writer next tells of his alliance with Egypt, sealed by his marriage to the daughter of Pharaoh (probably Siamun of Egypt's Twenty-first Dynasty; see the introduction). A marriage alliance with the erstwhile superpower of the Near East must have enhanced Solomon's standing considerably. There is, however, another side to this political move; for his marriage to a non-Israelite was in breach of Dt. 7:3. It also points forward to his duplication of this sin in 1 Ki. 11:1–6.

3:2–15 Solomon at Gibeon. This is the first of four occasions when Yahweh speaks to Solomon (cf. 6:11–13; 9:1–9; 11:11–13). The writer feels obliged to explain why the event occurred at the most important high place, Gibeon: king and people all worshipped there because the temple had not yet been built (2). To clear Solomon of any suspicion of failure, the writer also states that Solomon loved Yahweh and walked in the statutes of David (3).

It is stated twice that God spoke to Solomon in a dream (5, 15), a form of communication which is treated with deep suspicion in some parts of Scripture (Dt. 13:1–5; Je. 23:25–32), but with great respect in others (e.g. the stories of Joseph and Daniel). Yahweh's first words to Solomon simply invited him to make a request. We might expect that Solomon, faced with such an offer from the Lord of all creation, would have needed some time to think, but his reply seems to have been immediate. This, at least, is in keeping with the decisive manner with which Solomon has acted so far, but his request itself is somewhat surprising. We would not have guessed that the self-confident Solomon, already praised by David for his wisdom (2:6, 9), lacked a discerning heart. Perhaps he had realized that more than mere shrewdness and cunning was necessary for the just leadership of God's people. Faced with that task he feels he is only a little child. He is also very conscious that the people of Israel are God's people and that he is God's servant (the terms your people and your servant are both used three times in the Hebrew of vs 7–9).

Solomon therefore asks for an understanding mind with which to rule the people. The Hebrew verb used for this activity carries the ideas of judging and justice. This is in keeping with the fact that in Israel the king himself was the final court of appeal (2 Sa. 14:4–17; 15:2; 1 Ki. 3:16–28) and was personally responsible for the promotion of justice. Hence in Ps. 72:1–4 the psalmist prays: ‘Endow the king with your justice, O God, the royal son with your righteousness. He will judge your people in righteousness, your afflicted ones with justice ... He will defend the afflicted among the people and save the children of the needy; he will crush the oppressor.’ The ability to judge with righteousness and defend the poor is also an important part of Isaiah’s picture of the ideal king who is to come (Is. 11:3–5). These same qualities should provide our agenda whenever we pray for ‘Kings and all those in authority’ (1 Tim. 2:2).

God commends Solomon’s sense of priorities and bestows on him wisdom far beyond the ordinary. He promises him, in addition, those things which he could have asked for but did not: riches, honour and (if he would continue to walk in God’s ways) long life.

On waking Solomon returns at once to Jerusalem to celebrate the momentous event with sacrifices and a feast before the ark of the covenant. There were clearly some things for which the high places, even the most important high place at Gibeon, were not adequate.

3:16–28 Wisdom demonstrated. Solomon’s new gift is immediately demonstrated in the well-known story of the two prostitutes arguing over a baby.

Solomon proposes a simple solution: the child is to be sliced in half so that both women could share it. The ruling is so shocking in its brutality that it sounds like the callous response of a judge wearied beyond endurance by the claims and counter-claims of the two women. Indeed, the narrative is open to that interpretation. However, the very different reactions of the women allow Solomon to decide which was the real mother of the living child. Its life is spared, and Solomon’s reputation is made. The people are in no doubt that he is equipped with wisdom from God for the dispensing of justice.

4:1–34 Internal arrangements of the kingdom. The first nineteen verses seem at first sight to be a rather tedious listing of Solomon’s court officials. But the passage reveals some interesting facts about the administration of the kingdom.

First, we should note that the priests are included among Solomon’s chief officials (2–5). We are reminded that David had brought the cultic religion of the land firmly under royal control when he made Jerusalem the new capital of the kingdom. (It is surprising to find Abiathar included in the list in view of his expulsion in 2:26–27; perhaps he was not expelled so early in Solomon’s reign as the position of that note might suggest.)

Secondly, the list of twelve officers (7–19) reveals a significant administrative reform. Many of the twelve geographical districts for which they are responsible do not correspond to the old tribal territories. Parts of the country had been divided up in fresh ways which ignored traditional tribal boundaries. It is hard to imagine such a move being warmly welcomed. But even more important is the fact that the districts administered by these twelve officers did not include the territory of Judah. (Judah had an officer of its own if the end of v 19 is read as in the RSV, ‘And there was one officer in the land of Judah’.) This alerts us to the fact that the term all Israel is used in two different ways in this chapter. When v 1 tells us that Solomon ruled over all Israel it clearly means the whole kingdom; but when v 7 says that Solomon had twelve district governors over all Israel it means Israel (the northern tribes) as distinct from Judah. In fact, Judah and Israel are referred to as separate entities in v 20. It is therefore clear that Judah and Israel continued to be administered separately, as they had been under David (2 Sa. 24:1, 9).

Solomon's twelve administrative districts as described in 1 Kings 4:7–19.

There is, however, an even more important fact to be deduced from the list of officials. Their task was to administer the collection of taxes in kind to supply the needs of the royal household. Each of the twelve governors was responsible for supplying the court for one month of the year (7). This means that Judah had no role in the taxation system; the burden fell entirely on Israel. The description of the court's astonishing daily consumption in vs 22–23 gives us some idea of how great that burden must have been.

Nevertheless, all Israel and Judah ate, they drank and they were happy (20). The realm was secure, thanks to an army enhanced with a massive contingent of chariots (25–26). With such military strength Solomon should have had no difficulty holding together the empire which David had created, stretching from north-west Mesopotamia to the southern coastal plain (21, 24). However, this picture is modified somewhat in later chapters.

The chapter ends by praising Solomon's wisdom, stressing, with the aid of comparisons, his extraordinary depth of understanding and breadth of knowledge. For the writer this is not a change of subject; the wealth, strength, prosperity and greatness which were described in the preceding verses are all to be seen as manifestations of Solomon's wisdom. (We will find the same linkage in 10:14–29.)

And yet there is a tension in this chapter. For when we read it in the light of later events it is hard to avoid the conclusion that the extravagance of Solomon's court, and the burden which it placed on the northern tribes, were the seeds of that discontent which eventually split the kingdom.

5:1–18 Preparations for temple-building

The heart of the account of Solomon's reign is the long section (6:1–9:9) devoted primarily to the building of the temple in Jerusalem. This is framed by two notices concerning Solomon's dealings with Hiram king of Tyre (5:1–18; 9:10–14).

5:1–12 Solomon and Hiram. Hiram king of Tyre had earlier supplied David with timber, carpenters and stonemasons to build his residence in Jerusalem (2 Sa. 5:11). On hearing of Solomon's accession, Hiram sent a formal embassy to ensure that warm diplomatic relations continued between the two royal houses. Solomon took the opportunity to negotiate Hiram's help with another building project. The time had come to take up his God-given task of building a temple in Jerusalem (4–5).

Although he is styled simply king of Tyre, Hiram evidently ruled over a large part of the Phoenician coast and the forested mountains of Lebanon; men from Sidon and Byblos (Geba) were among the workers he supplied (6, 18).

In return for the timber and craftsmen Solomon undertook to supply Hiram's court with grain and olive oil. The arrangement was embodied in a treaty (12). The amount of grain supplied each year to Hiram's court (11) was not much less than the amount consumed annually by Solomon's. In other words, the commitment must have virtually doubled the grain tax which the people of Israel had to pay.

5:13–18 Solomon's labour force. Having explained how Solomon secured the raw materials for the temple, the writer turns to the raising of the labour force. Solomon conscripted labourers from all Israel, totalling 30,000 men (13). It is not clear which of its two meanings all

Israel has in this verse. These workers had to spend every third month in Lebanon; in other words, they were absent from their farms for a third of each year. In addition, 150,000 people were employed in the hill country at home, quarrying, cutting and transporting stone. The whole project took seven years to complete (6:38).

The writer doubtless intended to impress his readers with the grand scale of Solomon's preparations, but for the modern reader the account creates a certain tension which the narrator may not have intended. On the one hand, we cannot fail to be impressed that Solomon was able to command such a massive workforce and raise the taxes to pay for Phoenician help. On the other hand, neither can we escape the fact that the cost in human labour and the produce of the land must have imposed a crushing burden on the people.

6:1–7:51 Building the temple

6:1–38 The building. This chapter is clearly arranged in a symmetrical pattern in which the second part is the mirror-image of the first. The pattern has God's word to Solomon at its centre, emphasizing its importance: A¹ chronological note (1); B¹ description of the building's basic structure (2–10); C God speaks to Solomon (11–13); B² description of decoration and fittings (14–36); A² chronological note (37–38).

However, this chapter does not contain everything the writer has to tell us about the equipping of the temple. He describes its furnishings in 7:13–51, after giving an account of Solomon's royal palace. The reason for this rather surprising arrangement of the material is suggested below.

The opening chronological note does not date the beginning of the building work just in relation to Solomon's reign but also in terms of time elapsed since the exodus from Egypt. There are probably two main reasons for this. First, it invites comparison between the two events; it suggests that the building of the temple was as significant an event in Israel's history as that which saw the birth of the nation. Secondly, by placing the temple project in its historical context, it reminds us that Yahweh is a God whose purposes are worked out in history and whose plans are often long-term. The promise of a place which 'the LORD your God will choose ... to put his Name there for his dwelling' (Dt. 12:5) took many lifetimes to find its fulfilment.

The description of the temple and its decoration contains several difficulties for the modern reader. There are some architectural terms which are not easy to translate, and much of the detail is difficult to visualize. It is a great pity that the text has not come down to us complete with ground plans, elevations and artist's impressions!

Vs 2–10 describe the basic shell of the building. It was rectangular and aligned on an east-west axis. The main part of the building, consisting of the holy place (main hall; 'nave' in the RSV) and the inner sanctuary (also called the Most Holy Place; 16), was about 90 ft (27 m) long, 30 ft (9 m) wide and 45 ft (13.5 m) high. The porch or vestibule (portico) was the same width as the rest of the building and added a further 15 ft (4.5 m) to its length. Three storeys of rooms were built around the outside (excluding the porch) and were half the height of the temple itself. These had their own entrance on the south side and did not connect with the interior of the temple. The purpose of these outer rooms is not explained, but they were probably for the storage of vestments and certain offerings, and perhaps provided accommodation for the priests on duty. Light entered the temple through windows which must have been set in the upper half of the walls, above the height of the outer rooms. The building was roofed with beams and planks of cedar.

The stones for the temple were all fully prepared at the quarry so that no iron tools were used on the building site (7). This odd detail, which interrupts the description of the outer rooms, is probably intended to show that the work was done in compliance with a commandment in Ex. 20:25 (cf. Dt. 27:5–6). This actually concerns the building of altars and instructs that only unhewn stones (i.e. stones in their natural state, as would be used to make a dry-stone wall) must be employed. Solomon's craftsmen were building a temple, not an altar, and they evidently felt free to use cut and dressed stone throughout. But they worked in the spirit of the commandment's proscription of the use of tools, making sure none were used on the temple site.

Inside the temple the stonework was completely covered with wooden panels, cedar on the walls and ceiling and pine on the floors (15). The inner sanctuary must have had either a raised floor or a false ceiling (or both), reducing its height from 30 to 20 cubits (about 30 ft/9 m) and making its interior a perfect cube (20). The panels on the walls were carved to portray flowers and gourds, and the walls, ceiling and floor of the whole building were all overlaid with gold, as were the cedar wood altar and the huge olive wood cherubim of the inner sanctuary. These cherubim probably resembled the winged sphinxes familiar from ancient Near Eastern art. Phoenician examples portray a creature with a human head, an animal body with four legs, and a pair of wings; they probably provide a close analogy to those produced by Solomon's Phoenician craftsmen. Cherubim also featured in a frieze carved around the walls, along with palm trees and flowers (29).

The lavish use of gold overlay sounds extraordinary but was in fact regular practice in the adorning of ancient Near Eastern temples. The motifs with which Solomon's temple was decorated (the gourds, open flowers, palm trees and cherubim) were also part of the common repertoire of ancient Near Eastern art, and even the basic ground plan of the building can be paralleled by a number of archaeological discoveries. Solomon's temple was unique in purpose but not in conception. In its architectural design and artistic decoration it very much reflected the conventions of the time. It is a striking example of how elements of a prevailing culture can be employed for the worship and glory of God.

The motifs used to decorate the interior of the temple may seem to infringe the second of the ten commandments, which prohibits the making of images 'of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath' (Ex. 20:4). Perhaps the commandment was understood to prohibit the making of likenesses only when there was a danger of them becoming objects of worship, and this danger was thought to be eliminated in a temple dedicated to the worship of Yahweh alone.

After describing the inner sanctuary (16, 19–21, 22b–28), the account moves outwards again, describing first the doors which closed off the inner sanctuary and then the doors between the main hall and the porch. Finally, we are led outside to the inner courtyard (36), a vague term which presumably refers to the immediate surroundings of the building.

A second chronological note rounds off the account, reminding us of when the temple was begun, telling us when it was finished, and giving us the total duration of the project.

We have not yet considered God's word to Solomon which lies embedded in this account (11–13). This word is said to concern this temple you are building, but it contains no further reference to the temple. What then is its purpose? The conditional nature of God's promise to David, already made clear by David in 2:4, is now restated by God himself in words which relate it to the temple-building project. God will live among the Israelites if Solomon will walk in God's statutes and obey his commands. In other words, the building of a temple will not guarantee God's presence among his people; God cannot be tamed and kept in a box, however magnificent the box might be. His presence depends on obedience and specifically now on the obedience of Solomon. While these verses stop short of criticizing the building of the temple, they do put the project in perspective by stressing the larger issue of obedience.

7:1–12 Solomon’s palace. The account of the temple and its furnishings is divided into two parts of almost equal length by this short account of Solomon’s palace buildings. As the temple was built first and then the palace (6:37–7:1; 9:10), we might logically expect the account of the palace to follow the dedication of the temple in ch. 8. But we will see that the writer had a particular reason for placing it here.

Immediately after the note that the temple took seven years to build (6:38) comes the information that Solomon spent thirteen years building his palace (lit. ‘his house’). The Hebrew for ‘his house’ occurs twice in 7:1, highlighting the shift away from ‘the house [temple] of the LORD’ (6:37). Is there implicit criticism here of the fact that Solomon spent almost twice as long on his own house as he did building the house of God? Quite possibly, but the main purpose of this passage seems to be rather different.

David had already had a residence built in Jerusalem with materials supplied by Hiram of Tyre (2 Sa. 5:11), but Solomon required something on a much grander scale. Five distinct buildings are mentioned in vs 2–8: the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon, ‘the Hall of Pillars’ (a colonnade), the throne hall (also known as the Hall of Justice, for the king’s throne was also his judgment seat, stressing that it was as ruler that he dispensed justice), Solomon’s private residence and the private residence of the Pharaoh’s daughter. (Since she is the only one of Solomon’s wives whose residence formed part of this suite of buildings, the implication is that she was his chief wife. This is also suggested by the fact that she is mentioned so often: 3:1, 9:16, 24; 11:1.)

We are not told how these various buildings related to each other. They presumably joined to form a single complex, since they are referred to collectively as ‘his house’ in v 1. The palace complex was evidently adjacent to the temple with a passage connecting the two (cf. 2 Ki. 16:18). We are not given the dimensions of all these buildings, but it is clear that the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon alone was larger than the temple (2). The whole palace complex must, therefore, have dwarfed the temple spectacularly. In Jesus’ day the massive temple built by Herod the Great dominated the whole of Jerusalem, but in preexilic times the royal palace must have been the city’s most imposing building. And this is probably why the writer describes it where he does. Physically the palace dwarfed the temple, but in his account he dwarfs the description of the palace by surrounding it with lengthier descriptions of the temple and its furnishings. In the writer’s view this restores the correct perspective; for the temple was the true heart of the city and of the nation.

7:13–47 The temple furnishings: the work of Hiram, craftsman in bronze. A namesake of the king of Tyre, the son of a Phoenician father and an Israelite mother, was brought from Tyre to Jerusalem to manufacture the bronze furnishings for the temple. His outstanding ability is mentioned at the outset and is amply illustrated by the descriptions of the objects which he made. As in the description of the temple itself, there are some details which are difficult to follow.

The account of the work of Hiram for the temple parallels to some extent that of the work of Bezalel for the tabernacle (Ex. 36–38), and we are doubtless intended to note the broader parallel between the construction of the tabernacle and the building of the temple. However, while the tabernacle and its equipment were commanded in detail by God (Ex. 25–27, especially 25:9), no such claim is made here for the temple or its furnishings.

The purpose of the two huge pillars (about 27 ft/8 m high) is not clear. They did not support anything but were freestanding, located in front of the temple portico. They were topped with elaborately decorated, lily-shaped capitals. Their names, Jakin and Boaz, are something of a puzzle, but the most likely theory is that these were the opening words of two inscriptions. On the basis of the various expressions found in the Psalms it has been suggested that the inscriptions may have read roughly as follows: ‘Yahweh will establish [jakin] thy throne for ever’, and ‘In the strength [boaz] of Yahweh shall the king rejoice.’ If this is correct, the pillars may have commemorated God’s promises concerning the Davidic dynasty. There are hints later in Kings that on taking the throne a king stood by one of these pillars to pledge himself to keep God’s covenant laws (2 Ki. 11:14; 23:3).

Hiram’s most impressive technological achievement was perhaps the huge bronze basin some 15 ft (4.5 m) in diameter known as the Sea. It was supported on twelve bronze bulls arranged in four groups of three, each group facing one of the cardinal points. According to 2 Ch. 4:6, its purpose was to hold water for ritual washing by the priests, but its size and design, as well as its name, suggest it was symbolic as well as functional. As God’s power at creation had been displayed by his containment of the sea, the symbol of chaos (see the vivid wordpicture in Jb. 38:8–11), so this giant bowl signified his upholding of the created order and his power over the forces of chaos which threaten it.

Hiram also made ten movable stands, decorated on the sides with lions, bulls and cherubim, and ten removable basins, which stood on them. These were also for ritual ablutions, and the fact that their locations are mentioned along with that of the Sea (39) suggests they were used in connection with it.

Vs 40–45 provide a summary of Hiram’s work, adding some lesser items which do not deserve detailed descriptions (pots, shovels and sprinkling bowls). V 46 gives a tantalizing hint at the method used by Hiram to cast his products. The section closes with renewed emphasis on the greatness of his achievement: the weight of all this bronze work was never determined because there was so much of it!

7:48–51 The temple furnishings: items of gold. The list of gold items which Solomon had made for the temple (48–50) is very like the summary of Hiram’s work in vs 40–45. It is as though we have here a similar summary without a detailed account to precede it. The craftsman is not named, unless the writer intends us to understand that Solomon made these items with his own hands (which seems unlikely). Solomon also contributed to the temple quantities of silver and gold which had earlier been dedicated to it by David. These were stored in the temple treasuries (perhaps in the outer rooms), though their intended purpose is not clear. In Jerusalem’s subsequent history these treasuries were often the source of tribute for foreign kings.

8:1–66 The dedication of the temple

This long chapter divides naturally into seven sections. As in ch. 6, there is a mirror-image structure, which in this case spotlights Solomon’s prayer as the heart of the account: A¹ introduction and gathering of the assembly (1–2); B¹ installation of the ark, with sacrifices (3–13); C¹ Solomon addresses the assembly (14–21); D Solomon’s prayer (22–53); C² Solomon addresses the assembly (54–61); B² further sacrifices (62–64); A² summary and dissolution of the assembly (65–66).

8:1–2 Introduction and gathering of the assembly. A huge assembly of people, representative of all Israel, was arranged for the dedication of the temple, which began with the installation of the ark of the covenant in the inner sanctuary. The setting was a feast in the seventh month, presumably the Feast of Booths or Tabernacles which, like the feast described here, lasted seven days (65; cf. Lv. 23:33–43).

8:3–13 The installation of the ark of the covenant. The ark was brought up from the old quarter of Jerusalem, which was known as the City of David (1) to distinguish it from the new royal precinct and temple area built by Solomon to the north. The ark had been housed there ‘inside the tent that David had pitched for it’ (2 Sa. 6:17), an expression which suggests this tent was not the same as ‘the Tent of Meeting’, the ancient relic of Israel’s wilderness period which was brought to the temple with the ark. The account of the transfer of the ark to the temple, accompanied by sacrifices, is reminiscent of the account of its original transfer to Jerusalem by David (2 Sa. 6:12–19). But this time everything was on a grander scale; the ark’s resting place was not to be a tent but the magnificent temple, and the sacrifices consisted of sheep and oxen beyond numbering (5).

The ark was eventually installed in the inner sanctuary. According to our writer, it contained only the two stone tablets bearing the ten commandments, but other relics were kept there (perhaps at an earlier period) according to Heb. 9:4 (cf. Ex. 16:32–33; Nu. 17:8–10). However, the importance of the ark did not lie in what it contained but in the fact that it signified the presence of God, or more precisely the presence of God’s glory, with his people. Hence its loss to the Philistines in the time of Samuel was lamented with the words: ‘The glory has departed from Israel’ (1 Sa. 4:21–22), and the psalmist records the same event by saying that God ‘delivered ... his glory to the hand of the foe’ (Ps. 78:61; RSV).

The connection between the ark and the presence of God’s glory is also evident in the present passage. As the priests who had carried the ark and put it in place withdrew, the glory of the LORD, visibly manifested as a cloud, filled the building so that the priests could not perform their service because of the cloud (10–11). This echoes the first setting up of the tabernacle (containing the ark) by Moses: ‘Then the cloud covered the Tent of Meeting, and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle. Moses could not enter the Tent of Meeting ... ’ (Ex. 40:34–35). In both cases, the phenomenon indicated God’s acceptance and approval of what had been done; it provided a visible sign that God’s glory had taken up residence. But the sovereign God was not bound to reside in the temple. Shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, the prophet Ezekiel saw in a vision ‘the glory of the LORD’ leaving Jerusalem because of the gross iniquity of its people (Ezk. 11:23); this was later complemented by a further vision of God’s glory returning to enter a future restored temple (Ezk. 43:4).

The significance of the cherubim with outstretched wings can now be more fully appreciated. A smaller version of these cherubim had been fitted to the top of the ark when it was first made, and the space between them was the place where God was present when he spoke with Moses (Ex. 25:18–22). Solomon’s cherubim seem to have superseded the originals, indicating the place where God’s ‘glory’ would reside. Hezekiah later spoke of God ‘enthroned between the cherubim’ (2 Ki. 19:15).

In response to the appearance of the cloud, Solomon prayed a brief dedicatory prayer in poetic form. The first line of this in the RSV (‘The LORD has set the sun in the heavens’) is taken from the longer Greek version and is not in the Hebrew; the NIV omits it. If we treat it as original, it may be saying two things. First, it can be seen to proclaim God as Creator of the sun and therefore superior to it (an important affirmation in view of the fact that the sun itself was worshipped by many ancient societies). Secondly, it supplies a contrast with the next line, which thus states that although God is the Creator of light he prefers to conceal himself in the darkness and obscurity of a cloud. The link between this and v 13 is unfortunately not clear. Solomon may have been expressing a wish that, in spite of his preference for obscurity, God would reside in his magnificent temple ... for ever; or he may have been saying that the temple is entirely appropriate for a God who prefers to remain out of view. But neither interpretation fits happily with the view of the temple found in the longer prayer which follows and we must simply admit that the meaning is uncertain.

8:14–21 Solomon addresses the assembly. Solomon turned from facing the temple to face the huge crowd. The blessing he delivered (14) is probably to be understood as the whole of what is reported vs 15–21. In fact he began with the words ‘Blessed be Yahweh ...’, a way of expressing praise for what God had done; namely, he had ‘fulfilled with his hand what he spoke with his mouth’ (a more or less literal rendering of the expression in v 15). In other words, God had shown his word to be utterly trustworthy. The rest of the speech expands on this, summarizing God’s words to David through Nathan concerning a son who would succeed him on the throne and who would build the temple (2 Sa. 7:12–13). Solomon declared that the moment of fulfilment had now arrived (20). Although he was not reticent about his own achievement (‘I have succeeded David ... I sit on the throne ... I have built the temple ... I have provided a place ...’), Solomon acknowledged that it was ultimately God’s doing, for it had all come about as Yahweh had promised. Human effort and divine sovereignty are here subtly interwoven.

A new concept of the temple is introduced in this speech. As well as being a place for the ark (21) it is ‘a house for the Name of Yahweh’ (17, 20; literal rendering, with related expressions in vs 16, 18–19). This becomes an important idea in the prayer which follows.

8:22–53 Solomon’s prayer. Solomon signified the beginning of a new phase in the proceedings by taking up another position, standing before the altar and spreading his hands towards the sky. The introduction to his prayer (22–26) begins by echoing Dt. 7:9, but he speaks of God’s covenant faithfulness specifically in relation to David. Taking up God’s promise that David’s dynasty would never end, he prays that this too would receive fulfilment. At the same time, he acknowledges that the promise is conditional on the conduct of David’s descendants.

But the temple is the real subject of the prayer, and Solomon introduces that in vs 27–30. He recognizes the absurdity of supposing that Yahweh could dwell on earth (27); for even the highest reaches of the heavens are not sufficiently vast to contain him. Solomon is certainly under no illusion that Yahweh could somehow be contained in the temple he has built. His prayer is, therefore, not that God will take up residence in the temple, but rather that his attention will be focused on it to hear the prayers directed towards it. God will still be in ‘heaven, your dwelling-place’ (30), but the supplications of king and people will be received in the temple. In other words, Solomon prays that the temple might be the meeting-place for human need and divine mercy. All this seems to be contained in the notion of God’s Name being in the temple, a theme which recurs briefly in v 29. The concept of God’s Name being in a place (Dt. 12:5 etc.) is, therefore, a way of expressing that God is present in a special sense, but without suggesting a crude picture of his limitation or containment. It is closely related to the concept of God’s ‘glory’, which we found associated with the ark.

Some of the ideas in this passage find their NT counterparts in the person of Jesus, in whom God did indeed dwell on earth (Jn. 1:14), in whom the ‘name’ of God was made known (Jn. 17:6, 26), and who proclaimed himself to be the true and ultimate ‘temple’ (Jn. 2:19–22). In him, divine mercy met human need in the profoundest sense.

The next section of the prayer (31–51) consists of seven petitions which envisage particular circumstances in the life of individuals or the nation. These concern: oaths sworn before the altar (31–32); defeat by an enemy (33–34); drought (35–36); famine, pestilence etc. (37–40); the needs of a foreigner in the land (41–43); going out to battle (44–45); and captivity (46–51).

The first and fifth examples concern individuals, while the rest concern the nation. The second, third, fourth and seventh all involve the need for forgiveness and restoration.

What is the purpose of giving seven examples of circumstances in which people might pray towards the temple? We must note the significance of the number seven throughout the OT; it seems to signify completeness, fulfilment and perfection. (The number seven has an important role in the present chapter: the dedication of the temple, which took seven years to build, took place in the seventh month during a feast lasting seven days.) Probably, then, these seven examples are meant to represent all possible situations which could call forth the prayers of individuals and the nation. All contingencies are covered.

The first readers of Kings would not have failed to notice that the longest and final petition concerned their own situation: captivity in a foreign land (46–51). To them it urged repentance and held out the hope of God's forgiveness and the compassion of their captors. It did not, however, make any clear promise of return and restoration, nor did it mention the preservation of David's dynasty. The one meagre hint that return might eventually come about is contained in the reminder that God had brought them out of Egypt, out of that iron-smelting furnace (51). While this was mentioned primarily as a ground for God's forgiveness, it would perhaps have given the exiles a glimmer of hope that God would one day act in a similar way again.

This final petition begins with an acknowledgment that there is no-one who does not sin (46). Since this must include Solomon and his descendants, the phrase is pregnant with meaning: the captivity which is envisaged seems virtually inevitable, for what hope is there that a dynasty of fallible kings would live as God requires?

Solomon ended his prayer with a more general plea that God would always hear the petitions of king and people alike. The reason for his confidence in asking such a thing is then stated: God had called them out from among the nations to be his special people. God's actions in the past, particularly those actions which clearly expressed his purposes, are his people's ground for confidence in his mercy in the present and the future.

8:54–61 Solomon addresses the assembly again. Solomon then turned back to the people to 'bless' them once again. He reminded them that God had fulfilled every one of the promises he had made to Moses and prayed that God would continue to be close to his people to maintain their cause. But Solomon's desire was not (or at least not solely) for the welfare of the people; he was inspired by an even higher motive—a longing to see God glorified in the world: so that all the peoples of the earth may know that the LORD is God and that there is no other (60). This sentiment is also expressed in the petition for the foreigner who hears of God's greatness and prays towards the temple (41–43). Finally, the people were urged to do their part by being wholly true to God's ways. It is by the willing obedience of God's people that the world will learn of God's character.

8:62–64 Further sacrifices. As befitted a momentous occasion, stupendous quantities of animal sacrifices were offered (apparently all in one day!). This took place in the middle of the courtyard that stood in front of the temple (the same as 'the inner courtyard' mentioned in 6:36?) because it was the only place where there was enough room. It is implied that Solomon took on a priestly role here, consecrating the court and offering the sacrifices, just as David had offered sacrifices when bringing the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sa. 6:17–18).

8:65–66 Summary and the end of the feast. All Israel had been represented by the assembly; and by sketching the northern and southern limits of Solomon's realm the writer takes the opportunity once again to glorify his reign. On the eighth day the people returned to their homes rejoicing.

9:1–14 Conclusion to the building of the temple

9:1–9 God responds to Solomon’s prayer. Although this word from God is reported immediately after the dedication of the temple and is a reply to Solomon’s prayer on that occasion, the writer dates it after Solomon had built not only the temple but the palace as well, which took a further thirteen years (9:10). Whereas in 6:11 we are told simply that ‘the word of the LORD came to Solomon’ (perhaps through a prophet), here God appeared to him once again in a dreamvision, as at Gibeon. The reference to Gibeon reminds us that the days of the high places are now over—or should be!

God tells Solomon that he has accepted his prayer and has put his Name in the temple for ever; the meaning of this is again explained in terms of God’s attention being focused on the temple (3). This is followed by a third reference to the conditional nature of the promise to David. And it is the most sombre reference yet, for here the negative side is clearly spelt out. Solomon is told what will happen if he and the people (the you is plural, and see v 9) turn aside from God’s ways and worship other gods: the nation will be removed from the land and even the temple will be cast out of God’s sight (7) and become a heap of ruins (8). Clearly the promise that God’s Name and heart would be there for ever was subject to the same conditions as the promise of an everlasting dynasty! By emphasizing the perils of disobedience, this solemn warning casts a shadow over the rest of the account of Solomon’s reign.

9:10–14 Further dealings with Hiram. Just as the account of the building of the temple begins with Solomon’s relations with Hiram of Tyre (ch. 5), so it is rounded off with a further note of their dealings. This time, however, the tone is not so positive, and this is not merely because it records a souring of the relationship between the two kings. Solomon’s transfer of twenty cities in Galilee to Hiram (in exchange for a vast quantity of gold, 14) implies that Solomon’s dues could no longer be raised by taxation. Had his building projects become too lavish? Furthermore, the cities given to Hiram did not meet with his approval and he called the district ‘the land of good-for-nothing’ (NIV mg.). The implication is that the immense prosperity enjoyed in Jerusalem did not extend to the northern parts of the kingdom.

9:15–11:43 Greatness and folly

9:15–28 Miscellaneous projects. Various building projects (administrative centres, store cities and military installations) throughout the kingdom are listed, all built by forced labour raised from among the foreign populations remaining within Israel’s borders (15–23). Naval expeditions on the Red Sea also featured among Solomon’s ventures, undertaken with the help of the seafaring Phoenicians. Their goal, Ophir, probably lay in the southern part of the Arabian peninsula or on the east coast of Africa (or may have included parts of both). A further note on these voyages for gold occurs in 10:11–12, where it interrupts the account of the visit of the queen of Sheba. There the fleet is called ‘the fleet of Hiram’, which suggests Solomon left his Red Sea trade chiefly in Phoenician hands. Nevertheless, the undertaking redounds to Solomon’s glory, as does the quantity of gold, the precious stones and the almug-wood (apparently a type ideal for carving) which the voyages brought back.

The reference to Pharaoh’s capture of Gezer (16) strikes a discordant note. In spite of Solomon’s military might (4:26), Gezer (Jos. 21:21) had remained in Canaanite hands until conquered by the king of Egypt and handed over as a wedding gift to his daughter when she married Solomon.

10:1–13 The visit of the queen of Sheba. In this chapter the author returns to the related topics of Solomon's wisdom and wealth, bringing them to a climax before relating his fall into folly. The chapter shows how far news of Solomon's wisdom had spread, stresses the superlative nature of that wisdom, and illustrates the wealth which flowed to Solomon in the form of gifts and tributes from foreign rulers.

The queen of Sheba (in the south of the Arabian peninsula) made her long journey to visit Solomon because she had heard of his fame and his relation to the name of the LORD (1). A more straightforward translation would be that she had heard of 'the fame of Solomon concerning the name of the LORD'. While this might refer to the temple, it more probably sums up everything which Solomon had achieved, for he had achieved it as the ruler appointed and empowered by Yahweh. The queen came to see the famous king for herself and to test him with riddles (a better translation than hard questions). The content of her questions is not revealed; the important thing is that Solomon was able to answer them all and there was nothing which he could not explain to her satisfaction. She was also vastly impressed by the luxury of the royal court and (lit.) 'the house that he had built'. (Does this mean the royal palace, as the NIV assumes, or the temple?) After praising him in lavish terms, she bestowed on him gifts of gold, spices and precious stones, thus adding further to Solomon's considerable wealth.

For comment on v 12 see above on 9:26–28.

10:14–29 More examples of wealth and fame. Solomon's revenues in gold are summarized, and we learn that the queen of Sheba was not the only Arabian ruler to heap riches on him; he received gold from all the Arabian kings (15). Solomon's empire was so located that he controlled the chief trading routes northwards from the Arabian peninsula, and much of his wealth in gold probably stemmed from that fact. Arabian merchants were forced either to trade directly with Solomon or to pay for access to outlets further north. We may guess that favourable trading arrangements were among the many unmentioned things which the queen of Sheba asked Solomon for (13).

To illustrate how common gold became during Solomon's reign, the writer tells of the 500 ornamental gold shields which he made, describes his elaborately carved and decorated throne overlaid with gold, and mentions the household objects of gold in the royal palace. Furthermore, the trading ships which Solomon operated along with Hiram brought back gold and silver from their three-year voyages, as well as ivory and exotic animals.

Solomon's wisdom and his fame in the ancient world are summed up for us in vs 23–25. Here we learn that the visit of the queen of Sheba was but one of many made by foreigners to Solomon's court; they came to hear his wisdom and showered him with gifts (including, of course, more silver and gold).

Finally, Solomon imported horses and chariots, exporting the latter to the kingdoms to the north of his economic empire and accumulating both for his own use (26).

All these snippets of information are woven into a vastly impressive tapestry. But the writer's handiwork also includes another thread. A strand of criticism runs almost invisibly through this whole section. The stipulations of Dt. 17 concerning the lifestyle of an Israelite king are subtly echoed here. 'He must not accumulate large amounts of silver and gold' (Dt. 17:17); this Solomon did. 'The king ... must not acquire great numbers of horses for himself or make the people return to Egypt to get more of them ...' (Dt. 17:16); Solomon certainly did the former and probably the latter as well, for his horses were imported from Egypt (28). In other words, it seems that the writer of Kings is not only glorifying Solomon in this passage but also criticizing him. His greatness was partly achieved by overriding the stipulations of Deuteronomy. In view of the solemn warning given in the previous chapter, this passage rings loud alarm bells!

11:1–8 Solomon’s foolishness. But this is only half the story. The writer now reveals that Solomon had many wives in addition to Pharaoh’s daughter. Again this recalls a prohibition in Deuteronomy: ‘He must not take many wives, or his heart will be led astray’ (Dt. 17:17). The inobtrusive thread of criticism now becomes clearly visible. These were foreign women, from nations with which intermarriage was forbidden in Deuteronomy (v 2 summarizes Dt. 7:3–4). In the latter part of his reign Solomon built high places where his foreign wives could worship their native gods (7–8), and his own devotion to Yahweh became diluted (4–5). This is the ultimate irony: the king who built the temple, thus making the high places obsolete, went on to build high places himself—and for the worship of other gods! Twice in these verses we are told that in behaving this way Solomon failed to live up to the wholehearted commitment shown by David (4,6)—a requirement clearly stated in 9:4. The stage seems set for immediate disaster.

11:9–13 God’s verdict. Here God speaks to Solomon for the fourth and final time. We are reminded that God had appeared to him twice, stressing that Solomon had received very special benefits. But in spite of these personal encounters with the God of Israel, Solomon had strayed from following him. Disaster was indeed on its way. But for the sake of David it would be postponed until the reign of Solomon’s successor, and when it came it would not deprive him of the whole kingdom. In other words, the commitments which God had previously made to David would still be honoured, but in a drastically altered form because of Solomon’s disobedience.

11:14–25 Adversaries arise. Solomon had previously declared that he had no adversaries (5:4), but here he acquired two. (The Hebrew word translated adversary in 11:14 and 23 is the same as that in 5:4.) Although God had announced that calamity would not strike until after Solomon’s death, the storm-clouds began to gather during his lifetime. The empire created by David began to fray at the edges as Edom in the south and Aram in the north became hostile states. The warm relationship between Hadad of Edom and the Egyptian Pharaoh strikes a further ominous note.

11:26–40 Jeroboam’s rebellion. Jeroboam is introduced as an able leader, entrusted by Solomon with the entire labour force of the northern tribes. Ahijah is the first of a number of prophets in 1 and 2 Kings who intervened to alter the course of dynastic succession. His prophecy was acted out in a manner typical of OT prophets: he symbolically tore up his new cloak and urged Jeroboam to take ten of the twelve pieces. His words explained the meaning of his actions: God was going to tear the kingdom from Solomon’s hand and give ten tribes to Jeroboam. The statement that one tribe would remain for Solomon’s son to rule is puzzling; for when ten tribes are taken from twelve, there should be two left! A possible solution is that the one tribe is not Judah but Benjamin, which did continue to be associated with Judah when the kingdom divided. Judah itself does not require any mention because it was the tribe of the royal house anyway, and hence is assumed to continue in its control.

The worship of foreign deities is again given as the reason for the loss which was to befall the house of David, but here it is not Solomon alone who is guilty but they (33), implying that the people in general had fallen into the same sin. The Greek, Latin and Syriac versions have ‘he’ in place of they, referring back to Solomon in v 31 and so keeping to the tone of vs 9–13, where only Solomon is charged with unfaithfulness. These versions may preserve the original reading, but if the Hebrew ‘they’ is original we must conclude that Solomon’s folly was part of a wider trend, which the king’s example may even have started.

Ironically, Ahijah's prophecy to Jeroboam in vs 37–38 echoes the promise God had previously made to Solomon (9:4–5).

Either because Solomon somehow heard of Ahijah's prophecy, or because Jeroboam made some move to stake his claim to the northern tribes, Solomon tried to kill him and he escaped to Egypt. Jeroboam thus became an exile from his homeland, just as Solomon's other adversaries had been. The Pharaoh is now named as Shishak. He is Shoshenq I (945–924 BC), founder of Egypt's Twenty-second Dynasty, who later sent troops against Jerusalem (14:25–26).

11:41–43 The death of Solomon. Although Solomon's reign had been extraordinary, the notice of his death is of a simple form used commonly in Kings. It refers the reader to a source of further information and tersely gives the place and length of reign, notice of burial and the name of his successor.

In one sense, Solomon's reign had begun a new era, for he had built the temple and so transformed the worship and life of the nation. But in another sense, he brought an era to an end; because of his own disobedience he was the last king to rule over all the Israelite tribes.

12:1–16:29 The two kingdoms: from Solomon's death to the reign of Omri in Israel

12:1–14:31 The birth of the two kingdoms

12:1–24 The kingdom divides. It would appear that Rehoboam had to be acclaimed king separately by the northern tribes before his accession ceremonies were complete. In this he was following a pattern established by David, who initially became king over Judah (2 Sa. 2:4) and was later made king over Israel (2 Sa. 5:3). We are reminded that neither David nor Solomon had tried to weld Judah and Israel into a single entity (see above on 4:20). Solomon presumably went through a similar process of being acclaimed by Israel, although there is no mention of it. By Rehoboam's day Shechem, in the heart of the northern hill country, was the location for the event.

The kingdoms of Israel and Judah.

The northern tribes required Rehoboam to meet a condition before they would accept him as their king. They also had an alternative ruler available in the person of Jeroboam, recalled from Egypt after the death of Solomon. We learn that under Solomon the northern tribes had suffered a heavy yoke and harsh labour (4). (We previously noted various clues that this had been the case, and here we find it confirmed by Israel's spokesmen.) Israel would serve Rehoboam only if he agreed to lift this burden.

At first Rehoboam seems to act prudently. He makes no immediate response, but takes three days to consult his advisors. The older men, who have served Solomon, advise Rehoboam to concede to the people's demand. However, the men of Rehoboam's own generation give different advice, namely that he should meet the people's demand with the threat of even harsher treatment. The Hebrew word describing these young men (8, 10, 14) actually means 'young boys' or even 'children'; in the writer's view they deserve this description because their advice is so naive. And it is these 'children' whose counsel Rehoboam chooses to follow. By rejecting the advice of the older men who have served Solomon, Rehoboam turns his back on the last repository of Solomon's wisdom and embraced folly. The fate of the kingdom is sealed.

Rehoboam's tough, confrontational style was a show of strength which concealed weakness. Solomon's wisdom had had lapses, but Rehoboam displayed no wisdom at all. His attempt to regain the initiative was hopelessly mishandled, and Israel slipped from his grasp. The rallying cry which Israel had used during its abortive rebellion against David (2 Sa. 20:1) was flung in his face (16).

Whether Adoniram (18) was sent to negotiate further or to use force is not clear, but placing affairs in the hands of the man who was in charge of forced labour was at best a highly provocative act. Not surprisingly, it resulted in Adoniram's death. Jeroboam, meanwhile, was made king over Israel (20).

Returning hastily to Jerusalem, Rehoboam raised an army out of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin and prepared to wage war. However, the prophet Shemaiah put a stop to the venture, bringing a word from God that forbade him to act (22–24). It was God himself who had separated Israel from Judah and, for the moment at least, it had his protection.

The narrative thus weaves together the human and divine dimensions of the drama. Rehoboam had acted stupidly and followed bad advice, and Israel was in rebellion against the house of David (19); but the ultimate explanation is that Yahweh stood behind the scenes directing events. So the king did not listen to the people, for this turn of events was from the LORD, to fulfil the word the LORD had spoken ... (15). Human beings have the freedom to be obedient or disobedient, to act wisely or foolishly, but this freedom is contained within God's sovereignty. In particular, the writer stresses many times that events announced by God through his prophets always come about.

12:25–32 The error of Jeroboam. Jeroboam established his new kingdom in two ways. First, he strengthened two key cities, Shechem and Peniel (the latter to provide him with an administrative and defensive centre east of the Jordan). Secondly, he reorganized the worship life of Israel. His arrangements were motivated by a fear that if the people made regular visits to the temple in Jerusalem their loyalty would revert to Rehoboam. To forestall this he created alternative cultic centres within Israel, one at Dan and one at Bethel, marking the northern and southern limits of the kingdom. His fear showed a lack of trust in the promise of God given through Ahijah, that if he remained obedient God would establish for him an everlasting dynasty (11:37–38).

Jeroboam was, however, guilty of more than a failure to trust. The golden calves which he set up at Bethel and Dan led the people into idolatry (28–30). It is impossible to reconstruct Jeroboam's real intention in setting up these images. In the art of the ancient Near East it was not unusual for a deity to be portrayed standing on the back of a bull. It is therefore possible that Jeroboam intended the golden calves to represent the place where Yahweh was enthroned, and that he never wished them to become objects of worship themselves. (In the same way, the cherubim in Solomon's temple were meant to signify the place where God was present; see above on 8:3–13.) His words in v 28 are as ambiguous as the calves themselves, for they can either be translated Here are your gods ... or 'Here is your God ...'. But whatever Jeroboam's original intentions, the writer reports everything in the light of the fact that this thing became a sin. Therefore, we are surely meant to see a connection between Jeroboam's words in v 28 and the invitation to worship the golden calf at Sinai in Ex. 32:4. Furthermore, in the view of the author there can be no legitimate place for the worship of Yahweh outside Jerusalem. Jeroboam further compounded his sin by setting up lesser shrines at high places and staffing them with an illegitimate priesthood (31–32).

12:33–13:10 The visit of a man of God from Judah. Among Jeroboam's cultic reforms was the creation of a festival in the eighth month like the festival held in Judah (12:32), which probably means it was Israel's version of the Feast of Tabernacles, celebrated in the seventh month (Lv. 23:33–43). While Jeroboam may have been deliberately setting out to give Israel distinctive religious traditions, there may also have been a practical reason for the later date. The Feast of Tabernacles was meant to begin when the summer harvest was completed (Lv. 23:39), and this would have been later in Israel than in Judah because of slight differences in terrain and climate.

The arrival of an anonymous man of God from Judah took place while Jeroboam was instituting this festival with sacrifices at Bethel. However, the prophet's words were not against the festival but against Bethel's altar. There is not even a word of condemnation for the golden calf; perhaps it had yet to acquire its overtones of idolatry. The reason for the prophet's mission was simply that the shrine existed at all as an alternative to the temple in Jerusalem.

Bethel was a place with ancient associations in Israel's history (see Gn. 28) and became the more popular and important of Jeroboam's two shrines. But the prophet declared that worship at Bethel's altar would come to a violent end at the hands of one Josiah, a future member of David's dynasty. This prophecy was not to be fulfilled for over three centuries; then Josiah finally removed every trace of illegitimate and idolatrous worship throughout the territories of Israel and Judah. In short, the prophecy gives us a glimpse of the end of the affair, even as Israel's sad decline was beginning.

Confirmation of the truth of the prophecy was given instantly when the altar split and spilled its ashes. Jeroboam, pulled up short by this and the sudden withering of his arm, asked for the prophet's intercessions, and his health was restored. Jeroboam seems to have been profoundly affected by this demonstration of God's power over life and death and offered the man of God hospitality; but, in obedience to God's instructions, the prophet refused it in very strong terms. Was it to illustrate God's disapproval of what was being done in Israel that his servant was not allowed to eat or drink there? That is a possible reason, but an even more attractive explanation is that his resolute obedience was to be a further sign to the king, a reminder of the obedience that should have characterized his own life and reign.

13:11–34 The death of the man of God. The story of the man of God takes an unexpected turn with the appearance of the old prophet of Bethel. On hearing of events at the altar the prophet from Bethel made his own offer of hospitality, which was at first refused on the same grounds as before. But this prophet was determined that the man of God would spend time under his roof (we are not told why) and resorted to lying to persuade him to do so. He claimed that God had spoken to him and countermanded his earlier instructions.

The story gives us no reason to think that the prophet of Bethel was one of those who regularly 'prophesy lies', proclaiming their own fantasies instead of faithfully reporting the word of God (cf. Je. 23:16; 27:9–16). Indeed, this prophet received and delivered a genuine word from God in vs 20–22. In short, he is simply portrayed as a prophet who told a lie. But it was a lie which cost the man of God his life. The old prophet announced the death which would befall him as a result of his disobedience and his words were quickly fulfilled. The prophet of Bethel was then contrite and gave his own backing to the message of the man of God concerning the altar.

What are we to make of this strange and shocking story? We see a prophet delivering a word which was a lie, and another prophet believing it in spite of the instructions God had previously given him. On one level, the story clearly illustrates the difficulty which is sometimes involved in discerning the true word of God. On another level, it underscores the importance of unswerving obedience. In this connection the man of God continued to be a sign to Jeroboam and to Israel; for his tragic end was a warning that disobedience could lead to death—the death of the whole nation. On a third level, the story shows that prophecy is irrevocable; the word of God has creative power, shaping events and moving them towards its fulfilment. This is the lesson learned by the prophet of Bethel (32).

The lesson was, however, not learned by Jeroboam. Events had shown beyond doubt that the altar at Bethel existed in defiance of God's will, but Jeroboam persisted in his sin (33), a sin which would eventually lead to Israel's total destruction (34).

14:1–20 Jeroboam and the prophet Ahijah. We learn here for the first time that Jeroboam had a wife and sons, and that his royal residence was at Tirzah (17), about 6 miles (10 km) north-east of Shechem.

To discover what would be the outcome of an illness afflicting one of his sons, Jeroboam sent his wife to Ahijah the prophet with a gift. It seems to have been quite normal for people to consult a prophet when desiring information and to pay for his services (cf. 1 Sa. 9:3–9). Jeroboam's wife was, therefore, not doing anything out of the ordinary and it is not clear why she needed a disguise for her journey to Shiloh. If it was meant to deceive Ahijah the stratagem was useless, partly because the old man could no longer see, but chiefly because God had told him in advance who was coming and why! In the context of the story the motive for the disguise is not so important as the fact that a blind prophet could 'see through it'. Here, as in the previous chapter, we discover that God's prophets are not to be trifled with.

Ahijah had a word from God for Jeroboam, and he delivered it before his visitor even had a chance to speak. Like David, Jeroboam had been raised up by God from among the people to be their leader (7) and, like David, he received a kingdom which formerly belonged to someone else (8); but there the comparison ends. Unlike David, he had not followed Yahweh with his whole heart. Indeed, he had done great evil, ignoring Yahweh (you have ... thrust me behind your back) and leading the people into idolatry (9).

So much for the verdict. The sentence follows and has four parts to it. First, all the males of Jeroboam's family would be wiped out. The promise of an enduring dynasty was conditional (11:38) and was now revoked in terrifying terms. Secondly, the son who was sick would die. He alone of Jeroboam's sons would receive a proper burial and mourning because God had found some good in him. It is profoundly ironic that the only glimmer of light in this otherwise dark prophecy comes in the prediction of this son's death. Thirdly, God would raise up a new king for Israel who would execute judgment on Jeroboam's household. And finally, Israel as a whole was ultimately doomed because of the seeds of idolatry which Jeroboam had sown. The nation would be scattered in lands beyond the River (i.e. the Euphrates) and thus would cease to exist. (For the reference to Asherah poles in v 16, see below on vs 22–24.)

Ahijah's prophecy provides a sad picture of ruined potential. As the first king of an independent Israel, Jeroboam had the God-given opportunity to be a ruler of great stature; instead he was responsible for setting his kingdom on the road to disaster. The discrepancy between potential and performance is a recurring theme of the books of Kings.

Jeroboam's wife returned to Tirzah with the answer to her unspoken question—and much more. As soon as she got home the prophecy concerning the sick son was fulfilled. The previous chapter has left no room for doubt that the fulfilment of the rest will follow. The nation's doom, thus pronounced, was now certain. But we know it will not happen immediately, for Ahijah had mentioned a new king who would arise to put an end to Jeroboam's house (14a; the rest of this verse is unfortunately very obscure). In other words, the end of Jeroboam's dynasty and the end of Israel are two different things.

The notice of Jeroboam's death (19–20, providing a source for further information, length of reign and name of successor) follows a concluding formula typical of 1 and 2 Kings, except that the length of reign is normally noted at the beginning of a reign rather than the end. The same variation occurs in the case of Solomon (11:42) and probably for the same reason: in both cases the succession was not straightforward and the account left no place for the standard formula at the beginning of the reign.

14:21–31 Summary of Rehoboam's reign. Although we have already encountered Rehoboam in ch. 12, the real focus of that narrative was the transfer of Israel to Jeroboam. The writer now returns to Rehoboam to deal with his reign separately and so introduces him with a formula which is more or less characteristic from now on (21).

From this introduction we learn that Rehoboam was forty-one when he responded so foolishly to the demands of the northerners of Shechem. His rash advisors, who are said to have 'grown up with him' (12:8), were presumably about the same age. This confirms that the description of them as 'young men' (or 'young boys') is a comment on the quality of their advice and not on their real age (see above on 12:8).

We also learn that Rehoboam's mother was an Ammonitess, one of Solomon's foreign wives. It is surprising that Solomon's successor was not a son of Pharaoh's daughter, who seems to have been his chief wife (see above on 7:8). Perhaps she bore him no sons (or none who survived). Or it may be that, as in the case of Adonijah and Solomon, the normal rules of succession were overridden. A reason for this might lie in a changed relationship with Egypt, caused when Shishak became king and gave asylum to Jeroboam (11:40).

Vs 22–24 reveal the religious situation in Judah to have been every bit as bad as in Israel. Under Rehoboam there was a proliferation of high places, sacred stones and Asherah poles. This last expression (lit. 'Asherim' as in the RSV) refers to some kind of image, probably wooden, of the Canaanite goddess Asherah. They were nothing new among the Israelites, for the tendency to worship Canaanite deities had been a feature of the Judges' period (Jdg. 3:7).

The only difference between the situations in Israel and Judah was that Rehoboam (unlike Jeroboam) was not condemned for being personally involved in the idolatrous practices. Nevertheless, the narrating of Shishak's invasion (25–28) immediately after this catalogue of evils is surely significant. The clear implication is that the Egyptian campaign was God's chastisement for Judah, and particularly for Rehoboam, for it struck at the very heart of his kingdom—the temple and the royal palace. The king did not have to be an idolater himself to be held responsible for the idolatry of his people. It was enough that he had not checked the spiritual decline of the kingdom. (See further on 15:3 below.)

Shoshenq I (Shishak) had a relief scene carved on the wall of the temple of Amun at Thebes recording his campaign into Palestine. From this it is evident that he did not simply invade Judah but Israel as well. However, the writer of Kings ignores the effect this campaign must have had on Jeroboam's kingdom and focuses on the losses sustained by Judah. The treasuries of the temple and the palace were both plundered. The account specifically mentions the loss of the gold shields Solomon had made (200 large ones and 300 smaller ones according to 10:16–17) and their replacement with bronze copies by Rehoboam. The decline of the house of David is neatly epitomized here. Rehoboam, ruling a reduced kingdom which was easy prey for Egypt, could only afford bronze where Solomon had used gold. Size, security and wealth were all greatly diminished.

Rehoboam's reign is rounded off with another standard formula (29–31).

15:1–16:28 Israel and Judah to the reign of Omri

15:1–8 Abijah of Judah. From this point onwards until the destruction of Israel (2 Ki. 17) the writer presents us with two parallel histories. The present chapter provides us with a good example of his method. First he treats the history of Judah during the reigns of Abijah and Asa (15:1–24), but mentions the contemporary rulers of Israel (Nadab and Baasha) wherever they impinge on the narrative. Then he backtracks to relate the reigns of Nadab and Baasha (15:25–16:7). This method can be confusing for the modern reader (particularly in sections where the rulers of Aram and Assyria also enter the arena, and unfamiliar names are scattered across the pages in bewildering profusion). In the present instance, for example, it means that Baasha appears in the narrative of Judah's history before we know where he fits into the history of Israel. When he is first mentioned in 15:16 we do not know whether he is the son and successor of Jeroboam or a later king. Only in vs 27–28 is his role explained. However, the method suits the aims of the writer of Kings because it allows him to present each king's reign in a self-contained narrative.

Rehoboam's successor, Abijah, is given a standard introduction (1–2). Two items in this deserve comment. From now on the writer inserts a note dating the accession of the king of Judah in terms of regnal years of the king of Israel and vice versa. In the case of Judah only he continues to give the name of the new king's mother (as he did for Rehoboam in 14:21); however, he omits this information for Jehoram (2 Ki. 8:16–17) and Ahaz (2 Ki. 16:1–4).

Abijah's three-year reign is given a very negative appraisal (3–8). The statement that he committed all the sins his father had done before him is intriguing because Rehoboam himself is not accused of any sins in the summary of his reign (14:22–24). However, as we noted in commenting on that passage, Rehoboam was at least guilty of not arresting his people's slide into apostasy, and here the verdict that Abijah's heart 'was not fully devoted to the LORD his God' is applied by implication to Rehoboam as well (3). The following verse shows that the dynasty owed its continuing survival to the commitment God had made to David and not to the conduct of his successors. David is praised for his exemplary devotion to God's commandments, though on this occasion his murder of Uriah, husband of Bathsheba, does not go without mention (5). This is an interesting contrast with the previous reference to David (14:8), which was entirely positive. The writer does not want us to forget that all members of the dynasty, including David himself, were fallible—a fact loaded with implications for the future (see above on 8:46–51).

In v 6 we should probably read: 'There was war between Abijam [a variant of Abijah] and Jeroboam ...' (with the RSV), since war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam ... (as in the majority of Hebrew manuscripts) cannot have lasted throughout Abijah's lifetime.

A standard formula concludes the summary, reiterating that Abijah's reign was plagued by war.

15:9–24 Asa of Judah. The introduction of Asa's forty-one-year reign names his mother as Maacah the daughter of Abishalom, which is identical with the name of Abijah's mother in v 2! The NIV resolves the difficulty by translating grandmother instead of 'mother' in v 10 (and v 13).

For the first time the writer measures a king favourably against the standard set by David (11). Asa reversed the trend of the previous two reigns (and which had begun under Solomon according to 11:33), even deposing his own (grand)mother from her position as ‘queen mother’ (lit. ‘mistress’, i.e. over the royal court) because of her idolatry. Indeed, his only failing was that he did not abolish the high places. The meaning of v 15 is not clear, but it seems that Asa replenished the temple treasury which had been depleted by Shishak’s invasion.

The rest of the account of his reign concerns the ongoing border war between Judah and Israel. The fact that Baasha of Israel was turning the town of Ramah into a fortress shows that his forces had penetrated south of Bethel into the territory of Benjamin (which belonged to Judah). Furthermore, his aim was to control the main route between Israel and Judah, effectively blockading Judah’s northern border. The situation was so serious that Asa negotiated with Ben-Hadad of Damascus for help, even though this meant depleting the temple and palace treasuries again to secure the alliance (18–20). When Ben-Hadad pushed south into northern Israel, Baasha was forced to withdraw from Benjamin in order to concentrate his forces on repelling the invader. Asa then reclaimed the lost portion of Benjamin and dismantled the fortress at Ramah. He used the materials to fortify Geba and Mizpah, thus strengthening his northern border against further aggression.

The concluding formula adds that Asa was a builder of cities and that in old age he suffered from diseased feet. This latter item of information throws significant light on the writer’s theology. He clearly does not regard all sickness and suffering as divine retribution or chastisement (as in the case of Jeroboam’s withered arm; 13:4). He acknowledges that innocent suffering is also part of the fabric of life.

15:25–32 Nadab of Israel. Here we embark on a long section (1 Ki. 15:25–2; 2 Ki. 10:36) which deals almost exclusively with events in Israel (see the Introduction). The bulk of this (from 1 Ki. 16:23) concerns the dynasty of Omri, but it begins with an account of the unstable period between the death of Jeroboam and Omri’s accession. During twenty-five years, five kings held (or sought) power in Israel, and four of them met a violent death.

The character of Nadab son of Jeroboam is quickly sketched with the information that he did evil ... walking in the ways of his father ... His brief reign ended with the fulfilment of Ahijah’s prophecy concerning Jeroboam’s house. He was assassinated by Baasha who seized the throne for himself. (The note that this happened while Nadab was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon reminds us that the writer’s interests are very limited; the foreign policy of most kings receives only an incidental reference or none at all.) Baasha then wiped out Jeroboam’s family.

While v 29 says this was in fulfilment of Ahijah’s prophecy, in 16:7 Baasha’s action is condemned by the prophet Jehu. The apparent contradiction is probably explained by the fact that Baasha had gone far beyond the meaning of Ahijah’s prophecy, which mentioned only the killing of ‘every last male’ (14:10) belonging to Jeroboam. (A more literal rendering of this phrase in 14:10 is vividly given in the KJV: ‘him that pisseth against the wall’; however, the KJV mistranslates the remainder of the verse.) The AV meaning is that Jeroboam will be left with no male descendants who could lay claim to the throne. The language of 15:29 implies that Baasha went further than this and slaughtered the entire family.

The concluding note on Nadab says there was constant war between Asa and Baasha, a puzzling reference in that it has nothing to do with Nadab. Either the note should refer to Nadab instead of Baasha or the reference has been displaced from the summary of Baasha’s reign which follows.

15:33–16:7 Baasha of Israel. Baasha’s reign is very briefly summarized because his accession and his war with Asa of Judah have already been narrated. The chief subject of the summary is his condemnation by the prophet Jehu. History was repeating itself. Like Jeroboam, Baasha had been raised up by God to be king over Israel; but Baasha had walked in the ways of Jeroboam and his house would suffer the same fate as Jeroboam's. The prophecy of Jehu to Baasha closely echoes parts of Ahijah's to Jeroboam (compare 16:2a with 14:7; and 16:4 with 14:11).

16:8–14 Elah of Israel. It is therefore not surprising that the fulfilment of Jehu's prophecy was almost a re-run of earlier events. Just as Jeroboam's son reigned for two years before being assassinated, so Elah, son of Baasha, reigned for two years; and just as Nadab's assassin succeeded him on the throne, so Zimri succeeded Elah. The structure of the summary of Elah's reign is patterned on the summary of Nadab's (cf. 16:9–10 with 15:27–28; and 16:11–13 with 15:29–30). However, there are some differences. Elah is not specifically said to have walked in the ways of Jeroboam; instead this is implied by the reference to all the sins Baasha and his son Elah had committed and had caused Israel to commit ... (13). A notable contrast illustrates a difference in character between Nadab and Elah. Nadab died while waging war on Israel's traditional enemies—a proper kingly pursuit (15:27); Elah died while carousing with the steward of his palace in Tirzah (16:9), even though the war on the Philistine border continued (see v 15). Finally, Zimri was more restrained than Baasha in putting an end to the house of his predecessor, killing only the males (11).

16:15–22 Zimri and civil war in Israel. The situation now deteriorated into civil war. The army of Israel, encamped against Gibbethon, would not accept Zimri as king and proclaimed Omri, their commander, king instead. In an ironic turn of events the army then withdrew from Gibbethon and attacked Israel's own capital. Zimri committed suicide after a reign of only seven days! We may think this was hardly long enough to test Zimri's character, but a week is a long time in politics and the writer has no doubt that he walked in the ways of Jeroboam and in the sin he had committed ... (19).

Zimri's suicide did not immediately stabilize the situation, for Tibni son of Ginath emerged as a rival for the throne. War between the two factions ended in Tibni's death, leaving Omri king without challenger.

16:23–28 Omri restores stability in Israel. The events leading up to Omri's reign (16:15–22) were not directed by prophecy (in striking contrast to the events of 15:25–16:14). No prophet appears to announce the end of Zimri's reign or to designate Omri as the one raised up by Yahweh to be king over his people. We are therefore left wondering whether Omri's seizure of the throne is God's will. The question is never answered, but in subsequent chapters it becomes very clear that the rule of Omri's dynasty is certainly not beyond God's control. This is illustrated, as always in Kings, through the work of God's prophets.

The standard summary of Omri's reign, concluding with the fact that his son succeeded him, signifies Israel's return to dynastic stability.

The writer tells us nothing of Omri's political stature, which we glimpse only from Assyrian inscriptions and the Moabite stone. The only achievement singled out for mention is his creation of Samaria as Israel's new capital (24). Otherwise, he is noted only for sinning more than his predecessors and walking in the ways of Jeroboam (25–26).

1 Ki. 16:29–2 Ki. 10:36 The two kingdoms: the period of Omri's dynasty

16:29–22:40 The reign of Ahab of Israel

16:29–34 Introduction to Ahab’s reign. These verses read like a standard summary of Ahab’s reign without the usual concluding formula. In fact, the concluding formula is put on pause until 22:39–40. In between we have an unusual number of lengthy stories set against the background of Ahab’s reign. Some of these involve Elijah (chs. 17–19, 21), while others concern Ahab’s wars with Ben-Hadad and the words of other prophets (chs. 20, 22).

The summary which we have here functions as the introduction to the extended account. It tells us that Ahab was even worse than Omri, for he led Israel in a horrendous downward spiral of idolatry which made the sin of Jeroboam seem mild by comparison. His worship of the god Baal is specifically linked with his marriage to Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, successor to Hiram of Tyre. This suggests that the god in question was the patron deity of Tyre, Baal-Melqart. The fact that Ahab built a temple to Baal in the new capital implies that he attempted to make the worship of Baal the state religion of Israel, and this is confirmed by the attempts to destroy the prophets of Yahweh (see below). The image of Asherah which he set up was accompanied by the introduction of prophets of Asherah alongside prophets of Baal (18:19).

The note concerning the rebuilding of Jericho may do more than tell us that the words of Joshua were fulfilled after many centuries (Jos. 6:26). It might mean that the two sons of Hiel died as human sacrifices at the beginning and completion of the work. If so, it further emphasizes Israel’s entanglement with idolatrous practices during Ahab’s reign.

17:1–24 Elijah in exile. The appalling practices of Ahab’s reign received their prophetic challenge. Elijah, who is to tower over the rest of the account of Ahab’s reign, makes an abrupt entry into the story. Without being told that he is a prophet, or that the word of the Lord had come to him, we find him comforting Ahab with an ominous message. It is from the character of that message that we recognize Elijah as a man who acts and speaks with divine authority. Elijah’s words are introduced and reinforced by an oath which also serves to identify him: he is the servant of Yahweh, the God of Israel. The words also indicate what was at issue. Contrary to what Ahab apparently believed, it was Yahweh, not Baal, who was the God of Israel. The withholding of rain was not merely a divine chastisement, it was the first move in a contest which would reveal Yahweh’s power and Baal’s impotence.

Elijah’s flight to an isolated ravine suggests that he was in danger, but it is only in 18:4 that we discover the nature of that danger: Jezebel had embarked on a systematic extermination of Yahweh’s prophets. Elijah’s hiding-place lay in Israel’s territory east of the Jordan (a region which Elijah presumably knew well, since he was from Gilead; 1). The second half of v 4 could be read: ‘... I have ordered the Arabs to feed you there’. This would be consistent with a Phoenician woman caring for Elijah later in this chapter. However, ravens could well be the correct reading, for it is a theme of this whole narrative (chs. 17–18) that God has control over all aspects of nature.

When Elijah’s brook dried up God gave him further instructions, sending him outside Israel’s territory altogether to the Phoenician town of Zarephath. It is ironic that Elijah, fleeing the promoter of a Phoenician god, should find refuge in Phoenicia! The widow whom he met was willing enough to fetch him a drink of water, but when he asked for some bread as well she was forced to admit her abject poverty and near-starvation. She also appears to recognize him as a prophet of the God of Israel. (Was there something distinctive about the appearance of Yahweh’s prophets in Elijah’s time? See below on 20:41 and 2 Ki. 2:23–25.) Elijah assured her that she could afford to offer him hospitality, for God had promised that her meagre supplies of flour and oil would last until the drought was over. (Thus we learn that the drought announced by Elijah extended beyond Israel to Phoenicia.) The woman trusted him and obeyed (perhaps because she recognized the stranger as a prophet), and the truth of Elijah's words was borne out.

Some while later, the widow's son became sick to the point of death, though it is not completely clear that he actually died. The widow's first reaction was to think that Elijah, the man of God, had caused this tragedy as punishment for her sins (18). It was a common assumption that suffering and sin are connected in this way. Job's friends deduced that he must have sinned in order to be suffering (Jb. 8:4; 11:6; etc.) and Jesus' disciples leaped to the conclusion that a man's blindness was the result of his sin (Jn. 9:1–3). The modern sufferer's question: 'What have I done to deserve this?', expresses the same ideas as the widow's words in v 18. We need to remember that the book of Job overturns the thinking of Job's friends, that Jesus rejected the logic of his disciples, and that the widow in our present story was mistaken. The Bible does not assume an inevitable cause-and-effect connection between sin and suffering (or between righteousness and blessing), but leaves room for suffering which is undeserved and, from the human point of view, unexplained. Elijah himself clearly had no idea why this tragedy had struck. His prayer in v 20 shows him bewildered and angry. Then he prayed for the boy's restoration. His reason for stretching himself on the boy is not clear; perhaps he was simply trying to share the warmth of his body with the boy to encourage his return to life. But the boy's restoration was God's doing, in response to Elijah's prayer (22).

The widow's exclamation in v 24 contains exquisite irony: a Phoenician woman realized that Elijah spoke the word of Yahweh, while the Israelite king, worshipping his Phoenician gods, had refused to see it. Jesus cited the story of Elijah at Zarephath to support his comment that a prophet is not accepted in his own country—much to the annoyance of his hearers (Lk. 4:24–30).

18:1–19 Elijah's return. In the third year of the drought God instructed Elijah to return to Samaria and confront Ahab again. However, he presented himself first to Obadiah, the chief steward of the royal palace. This man, a worshipper of Yahweh from his youth (12), had remained loyal to his God. His loyalty was proved by the great personal risk he had taken, concealing and feeding a hundred faithful prophets in the face of Jezebel's campaign to wipe them out. He is a challenging figure, quietly living out his faith at the heart of the nation's apostasy. But he is also a very human figure, terrified that Elijah would vanish again before a meeting with Ahab could be arranged, and that he would be held responsible and executed. Elijah reassured him, again using an oath to underline his words (15), that he would meet with Ahab before the day was out.

Ahab and Elijah met and exchanged insults. Ahab's turning from Yahweh to the Baals (an expression which embraces the worship of several foreign deities) has changed Israel's king into Israel's troubler. Elijah threw down the gauntlet, calling for an assembly of the foreign prophets on Mt Carmel. The fact that these prophets eat at Jezebel's table indicates that she was ultimately behind the promotion of the new state religion.

18:20–46 Elijah on Mt Carmel. Mt Carmel is not a single mountain but a range of hills running inland from the Bay of Acre in a south-easterly direction for about 12 miles (20 km). It is impossible to know exactly where Elijah's gathering took place. The only clue we have is that the spot was not far from a vantage-point which gave a view of the Mediterranean (42–44). There is some evidence that the Carmel range was a traditional site for the worship of Baal, in which case Elijah was giving the prophets of Baal the advantage of fighting on home ground.

Not only the foreign prophets but people from all over Israel were assembled on Carmel (21; cf. v 19). Elijah did not accuse the people of outright apostasy but of hesitating between two opinions. This suggests they had been trying to worship both Baal and Yahweh to secure the maximum advantages of both! Baal was primarily a weather-god and hence responsible for the harvest; Yahweh, on the other hand, may have been popularly thought of as a god from the desert regions of Sinai (cf. Hab. 3:3–7). Or perhaps, like the Arameans in ch. 20, they thought of Yahweh as ‘a god of the hills and not a god of the valleys’ (20:28). Either way, it would have seemed likely to the people that Yahweh was out of his depth where agriculture was concerned, so it made good sense also to worship Baal, the acknowledged expert in such matters. Elijah swept away such syncretistic thinking. The people must make a decision: Yahweh or Baal.

The verb used for the people’s wavering can also mean ‘to limp’. (A form of the same verb is used in v 26 to describe the dancing of the prophets of Baal.) There is a point to the double meaning. Elijah was telling the people that their attempt to have the best of both worlds had actually crippled them.

Elijah’s claim to be the only surviving prophet of Yahweh is surprising in view of Obadiah’s earlier words (13). We will examine the claim later when discussing ch. 19. He next gave instructions for the preparation of a burnt offering—but the fire was not to be lit. The true God was the one who provided his own fire to burn the sacrifice. The people (who had previously remained silent; 21) judged the proposed contest to be a fair one (24).

The prophets of Baal had the first turn. Elijah allowed them the best part of a day, from morning ... (26) ... until the time of the evening sacrifice (29). At midday Elijah relieved the tedium with some crude mockery, in one breath calling Baal a god and then suggesting some very human reasons for his lack of response. The word translated busy in the NIV is a verb meaning literally ‘to withdraw’ (RSV ‘gone aside’), and Elijah was probably using it to mean that Baal was relieving himself. The dancing of Baal’s prophets became more frenzied during the afternoon, but the three negatives at the end of v 29 emphasize that all was in vain (lit. ‘no voice, no answer, no hearkening’).

Elijah prepared his own sacrifice from scratch using a second bull. Taking twelve stones to symbolize the original unity of all Israel, he repaired a ruined altar of the LORD—one of the high places which the writer of Kings is keen to condemn in normal circumstances. But circumstances here were not normal, for the very survival of Yahweh’s worship in Israel, indeed the survival of Israel itself, was at stake. The issue was no longer where Yahweh might be worshipped, but whether Israel would continue to worship him at all—whether Israel would remain Israel.

Elijah made sure that the cards were seen to be stacked against him, soaking the sacrifice and the wood with water which flowed into a trench around the altar. Since water would have been a rare commodity after three years of drought, the emptying of the jars over the sacrifice was a double act of faith. Elijah was trusting God for rain as well as fire.

His prayer (36–37) further shows his supreme faith at this crucial moment in Israel’s history—a history whose beginnings were recalled by naming Yahweh as the God of Israel’s ancestors. The prayer also shows Elijah’s priorities: his petition that he would be vindicated as Yahweh’s servant is framed by two petitions that Yahweh would be acknowledged as the true God of Israel.

The answer was dramatic and complete. Yahweh did what Baal, supposedly lord of sky and weather, had failed to do, producing lightning from a sky without clouds. The people finally decided (as Elijah had urged them to do in v 21) between Yahweh and Baal. Their words in v 39 were more than an acknowledgment that Yahweh was the god with power in Israel. The Hebrew phrase (lit. ‘he is the God’) proclaimed him the one and only God. The prophets of Baal, exposed as the promoters of a lie, were slaughtered at Elijah’s command.

The writer relates the massacre without comment here, but Elijah is later rebuked for a train of thought that amounted to fanaticism (see on 19:1–18), and his all-out slaughter of the prophets of Baal should perhaps be seen as an outcome of his fanatical tendency. In v 41 Ahab is mentioned for the first time since v 20. He has become an insignificant character in this chapter, and the focus has been on the people. Here, as in v 20, he took orders from Elijah who had become the real leader of the people. Unfortunately, Ahab remained equally weak before Jezebel, and made no attempt to restrain her when she tried to kill Elijah.

Elijah's prayer for rain (42–46) contains some puzzling features but the meaning of the incident is clear. Wind, clouds and rain are not beyond Yahweh's control, for he is the Creator God who has power over everything he has made. It also shows again that Elijah was God's agent, for it fulfilled his announcement in 17:1 that rain would not return except by his word.

19:1–18 Elijah on Mt Horeb. Here we see another side of Elijah's character, altogether more human, frail and fallible. In terror of Jezebel he fled to the desert south of Beersheba, not merely outside the boundaries of Israel but beyond the southern border of Judah. There, in the depths of depression and despair, he prayed that he might die. There is no indication that he had planned to travel further than this. The journey which followed was only possible because an angel (or perhaps simply 'a messenger') ministered to him. The end of the journey was Mt Horeb, the place where God had commissioned Moses (Ex. 3) and later appeared in smoke, fire and thunder to give Israel the Ten Commandments (Ex. 19–20).

On Mt Carmel we saw Elijah the great spiritual leader, saving Israel by his faith and faithfulness. On Mt Horeb we see him weak, mistaken and in need of God's rebuke. God's opening question shows that, although God's own messenger had enabled Elijah to make the journey, Elijah should not really have been there. Elijah's answer completely devalued what had happened on Mt Carmel. He ignored God's victory over Baal as though it had achieved nothing. By implication, he dismissed the people as utterly faithless. He disregarded the faithful Obadiah and the possibility that there might have been many more like him. Perhaps he saw Obadiah's position in the royal court as a sign of weakness and compromise. Once again, he stated that he was the only prophet of Yahweh left alive (cf. 18:22), thus setting no value on the hundred prophets which he knew had been concealed in caves by Obadiah. Presumably because they had not stood up to be counted they were swept aside as hopelessly ineffectual. Elijah, now (ironically) sheltering in his own cave, conveniently overlooked the fact that he had lived in hiding himself for three years and had shown his own weakness by running away.

God's response was to pass by while Elijah stood at the entrance to his cave. Wind, earthquake and fire manifested themselves in succession, but God is said not to have been in any of these. Then a different phenomenon followed. The translations a gentle whisper and 'a still small voice' (RSV) do not do full justice to the enigmatic Hebrew expression, which may be better rendered 'a brief sound of silence'. Although the text does not explicitly say so, it implies that God was at last passing by in the silence which followed the storm.

These events provide a vivid demonstration that God is not always at work in ways which are visible and dramatic. He may choose to be present silently. Elijah's diagnosis of the situation he had left behind was therefore challenged, for God can work in ways which even his servants cannot detect.

However, when God repeated his opening question Elijah's reply was the same as before. God did not repeat the lesson but gave Elijah instructions to anoint three people who would, in their different ways, carry forward the work of purifying Israel. The instructions ended with the information that God had no less than 7,000 loyal followers in Israel (18)! The lesson of the silence was hammered home by this closing rebuke. Elijah had dismissed everyone's faith but his own and had failed to appreciate ways in which God was at work. This is an attitude which often leads to a divisive arrogance and even fanaticism among God's people today.

It is often suggested that Elijah was suffering from depression. Depression can have many different causes (from suppressed anger to vitamin deficiency) and we should not assume that when we are depressed our problem is the same as Elijah's, or his the same as ours. In his case, depression and discouragement seem to have stemmed from his skewed perspective. He both underrated his own achievement and undervalued the contribution of others. The answer, in part at least, was for him to be given a glimpse of things from God's point of view. We need such glimpses too, if we are not to become discouraged in the Christian life.

19:19–21 The call of Elisha. Although Elijah did not literally anoint Elisha, this incident fulfilled the third instruction of vs 15–16. Elisha understood the bestowal of Elijah's cloak as a call to follow him and asked for time to take leave of his family. Elijah's brief reply is rather obscure but appears to grant his request. The large farewell feast which Elisha gave for the whole household must have taken some time to prepare and consume. Jesus' call to discipleship in Lk. 9:59–62 echoes this passage in some respects, but is much more pressing and immediate.

20:1–21 Samaria besieged and saved. This chapter presents us with two contrasting pictures of Ahab. At first we meet him as a courageous leader, obeying God's prophets and winning victories. But at the close of the chapter his underlying disobedience emerges again.

The northern state of Aram re-enters the story, and is still ruled (as in 15:18–20) by a king called Ben-Hadad. This was probably Ben-Hadad II, the son and successor to the previous king of the same name. Besieging Samaria, he increased his demands on Ahab until the latter, advised by the elders of the city, refused to yield. Ben-Hadad then threatened to destroy Samaria so thoroughly that not enough dust would remain for his followers to take a handful each. Ahab warned him not to count his chickens before they were hatched (11). It is not clear whether Ahab's words reflected genuine confidence (had he already received the prophetic assurance reported in vs 13–14?) or whether he was merely bluffing.

An anonymous prophet announced victory for Ahab, giving specific instructions as to who should lead the troops and start the battle. Victory would be granted so that Ahab will know that I am the LORD (13). Ahab was obedient, the Arameans were driven back and the siege was ended. However, we are not told that Ahab acknowledged God's role in saving the city.

20:22–34 Victory at Aphek. Once again, the anonymous prophet instructed the king, warning him that Ben-Hadad would be back. The truth of his warning was borne out as the Arameans strengthened their forces. When the battle lines were drawn at Aphek the Israelites were vastly outnumbered (27). However, the Arameans had seriously miscalculated. While not doubting the reality of Israel's God, they assumed him to be a god of the hills and not a god of the valleys, so that he could be of no help in a battle fought in the lowlands. The prophet announced the Arameans' defeat; they would discover that Israel's God knows no limitations, and Ahab also will know that I am the LORD (28; repeating the phrase in v 13).

Ben-Hadad's forces were crushed so resoundingly that he surrendered and pleaded for merciful treatment at Ahab's hands. After all, his father had once had an alliance with Baasha (before Asa of Judah persuaded him to break it; 15:19), and he had reached a trade agreement with Omri (20:34). In the language of international diplomacy, Ben-Hadad spoke of himself as Ahab's vassal (servant), but Ahab immediately referred to Ben-Hadad as his brother (32), as though they were already allies rather than enemies. The readiness with which he agreed to an alliance (34) suggests that he regarded it as the best guarantee of Israel's future security. For the second time, Ahab failed to acknowledge God as Israel's protector.

20:35–43 Ahab condemned. Ahab's underlying rejection of God's will is brought to light in the strange story which follows. Once again, it involves an anonymous prophet, but probably not the same one as in vs 13–28.

In order to get his message across to Ahab, the prophet had to be wounded. A man who refused to inflict the wound was killed by a lion, his death having been predicted by the prophet as punishment for his disobedience (36). This bizarre and shocking incident recalls the story in ch. 13, where another disobedient prophet was killed by a lion. Once again, we are shown the need for strict observance of the divine word and the inevitability of its outworking. The incident, however, points forwards as well as backwards, foreshadowing the prophet's exposure of Ahab's disobedience and the sentence to be pronounced.

After receiving his wound from someone more obliging, the prophet posed as a soldier fresh from the battle at Aphek. He told Ahab he had allowed an Aramean prisoner to escape and the king said that the agreed punishment must be exacted. It is not clear what the removal of the bandage revealed in v 41. Did it allow Ahab to recognize a man he already knew as a prophet? (He is surely not the same prophet who features in vs 13–28, for Ahab recognized him as one of the prophets, not as 'the prophet'.) Or did it uncover a distinguishing mark worn by the prophets of that time? (See also on 2 Ki. 2:23–25.)

The prophet's exposure of Ahab's sin resembles Nathan's exposure of David's in 2 Sa. 12. In both cases the king was guilty of a sin which he was quick to condemn in someone else. Ben-Hadad should have been executed, not released. Instead of remorse and repentance Ahab responded with resentment and anger.

21:1–16 Naboth's vineyard. The well-known incident of Naboth's vineyard is set in Jezreel, where Ahab and Jezebel had a second royal residence (1; see also 18:45–46). Ahab's offer to purchase the vineyard was reasonable enough, but Naboth had good grounds for refusing it. Apart from the fact that a vineyard represented an enormous investment of time and effort, selling his land would have gone against the grain of OT law. In Israelite society a family and its inherited plot of land were meant to be inseparable (Lv. 25:25–28; Nu. 27:1–11; 36:7). This explains the strength of Naboth's refusal in v 3.

Ahab sulked but accepted the situation. Not so Jezebel, who could not understand why a king of Israel should not get his own way (7). Here we see a head-on collision between two views of kingship. An Israelite king was bound by the law of Yahweh as much as any of his subjects (Dt. 17:18–20), but to Jezebel, the daughter of a Phoenician monarch, it was ridiculous that her husband's wishes should be thwarted because one of his subjects chose to abide by an ancient institution. However, she did not openly flout Israel's traditional religious values. Instead she arranged to have Naboth falsely charged and executed, leaving Ahab in a position to confiscate his vineyard. Naboth faced the trumped-up charge of breaking the commandment in Ex. 22:28, but in reality the commandments against coveting a neighbour's property, murder, theft and false testimony were all broken by Ahab and Jezebel in this sordid incident (Ex. 20:13, 15–17).

21:17–29 Elijah predicts the dynasty's downfall. Elijah re-enters the story, commissioned with the task of prophesying disaster for Ahab's house. Although it was Jezebel who had actually engineered Naboth's death, Ahab had acquiesced in the deed. He did not bother to ask what Jezebel intended to do when she promised him the vineyard, and he was content to fade into the background until Naboth was dead. Now he was told he had murdered a man and seized his property (19). This was the immediate reason for the prophecy, but it was merely the latest of Ahab's sins. He had caused Israel to sin (22), doubtless a reference to his going after idols (26).

The prophecy echoes those of Ahijah to Jeroboam and Jehu to Baasha, even using similar phrases (compare v 21 with 14:10; v 22 with 16:3; v 24 with 14:11 and 16:4). However, Jezebel's role was not overlooked and she received her condemnation too (23, 25).

Surprisingly Ahab, the worst yet of Israel's kings (16:30), showed the most contrition (27). In response, God told Elijah that judgment would not fall on Ahab himself, but on his son. The dynasty would survive for one more generation.

22:1–28 Micaiah and the war with Aram. In the third year of Ahab's treaty with Ben-Hadad hostilities broke out again. The initiative appears to have been Ahab's, and the reason was that he wished to regain control of Ramoth-Gilead, in the hills east of the Jordan.

First of all, he entered into an alliance with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (4). Jehoshaphat insisted that Yahweh's counsel be sought before any action was taken, and Ahab assembled 400 prophets who answered with one voice that the campaign would be a success. Jehoshaphat was evidently suspicious that these were nothing more than Ahab's 'yes-men', and asked pointedly if there was not a prophet of the LORD at Ahab's court.

Ahab admitted that there was one prophet he had not summoned because of his habit of telling the king what he did not wish to hear. The pious Jehoshaphat rebuked Ahab's attitude and Micaiah was brought. The story then takes a number of unexpected turns. When urged by the king's messenger to agree with the other prophets, Micaiah said that he could only speak what God told him to speak (13–14). Surprisingly his words did agree with the other prophets, who therefore seem to have been right all along (15). Even more surprisingly, Ahab then commanded him to speak the truth. He knew that a good word from Micaiah was not likely to be the genuine article (8). We are back among the difficult issues raised in ch. 13—how can true prophecy be discerned? But this time there is an ironic twist to the story, because Ahab, the king who had been so resistant to the word of Yahweh, was quick to recognize the lie and demand a true prophecy. The result was that Ahab walked into a trap: if he dismissed Micaiah's encouraging words as a lie, he must also dismiss the encouraging words of the other 400 prophets!

Micaiah responded with an image which clearly pointed to Ahab's death on the battlefield (17). If Ahab rejected the previous prophecy, this was the alternative which he must accept! But another surprise follows, because Micaiah went on to relate his experience of standing in Yahweh's council—an experience which elsewhere distinguishes a true prophet from his false counterparts (Je. 23:17–18). He revealed that the words of the other 400 prophets (called his, i.e. Ahab's, prophets, not Yahweh's prophets) had been inspired by a lying spirit, sent by God to lure Ahab to his death! The result of Micaiah's words was to confirm the conclusion, which Ahab had just had forced upon him anyway, that the hopeful prophecy was a lie.

The intervention of Zedekiah (spokesman for the 400 in v 11) involves an obscure question (24). This was probably a sarcastic remark intended to deny that Micaiah had received a true word from God. Micaiah's reply was that Zedekiah would discover the truth when he had to hide to save his skin. But by denying the validity of Micaiah's words, Zedekiah had reopened the crucial issue: who had the truth, Micaiah or Zedekiah and his associates? Ahab faced a choice: to believe the prophet whom he hated, or to believe those whose words he had earlier discerned (indirectly) to be a lie?

He acted in accordance with his personal hatred of Micaiah and his deep-seated antagonism towards the word of God. Paradoxically, he also acted in accordance with that word, which had forecast disaster for him (23).

This strange story raises the question of whether a prophecy can be known to be true or false. There is no easy answer to this problem. The criterion offered in Dt. 18:22 can be applied only in retrospect; an alternative criterion, in Dt. 13:1–3, places the emphasis on whether the prophet leads people towards or away from serving the true God, and not on whether his words come true.

22:29–40 The death of Ahab. Ahab went out to battle determined to cheat death by disguising himself. But he could not escape his prophesied end, and a random arrow found a space in his armour, wounding him fatally. Even when he tried to defy the words of Micaiah, he ended by fulfilling them, because the events announced by Yahweh's prophets were in the hands of Yahweh himself. The earlier words of Elijah were also fulfilled by the dogs licking up Ahab's blood outside Samaria, as dogs had licked up the blood of Naboth outside Jezreel (21:19; 22:38).

The concluding formula hints at the prosperity of Ahab's reign and his extensive building activities, now amply attested by archaeology.

1 Ki. 22:41–2 Ki. 8:29 During the reigns of Ahab's sons

22:41–50 Jehoshaphat of Judah. The summary of Jehoshaphat's reign in Judah comes as a brief interlude in the Israel-dominated narrative of these chapters. After a standard opening (41–42) Jehoshaphat is praised for continuing in the pious ways of Asa (43a) and completing his reforms (46), though it is noted that he also continued to tolerate the high places. The fact that reference to his alliance with Ahab (44) immediately follows the note concerning the high places suggests that this, too, was considered a failing. Judah's entanglement with Israel did indeed have serious consequences in subsequent reigns. Jehoshaphat's failed attempt to revive the Red Sea expeditions which were a feature of Solomon's reign (48) epitomizes Judah's decline since the golden age of Solomon.

22:51–53 Ahaziah of Israel introduced. As in the case of Ahab, so also in the case of his son Ahaziah: a standard summary without its concluding formula is used to introduce the new king's reign. The concluding formula is postponed until after a further story involving Elijah (2 Ki. 1). The account of Ahaziah's reign therefore resembles a miniaturized version of the account of Ahab's, reflecting the fact that his reign was indeed a brief echo of that of his father.

2 Ki. 1:1–18 Ahaziah and Elijah. The notice concerning Moab's rebellion (1) is picked up again in ch. 3 where it becomes the backdrop to the whole chapter. Here it hints at the decay and downfall of Omri's dynasty, predicted to occur in the reign of Ahab's son (1 Ki. 21:29).

Ahaziah's accident is not in itself portrayed as God's judgment on him. Rather it was his response in seeking an oracle from a foreign god which brought prophetic condemnation. The writer ridicules this god of Ekron by changing his name from the original Baal-Zebul ('Prince Baal') to Baal-Zebub ('Lord of Flies'). (Zebul also occurs in the name Jezebel, which means 'Where is the Prince?') Instead of returning with an oracle of Baal-Zebub from Ekron, Ahaziah's messengers returned with an oracle of Yahweh from Elijah! Ahaziah's failure to seek Yahweh in his sickness brought its own demonstration of Yahweh's power over life and death.

The horrific fate of the two captains and their companies in vs 9–12 is difficult to explain. Perhaps Elijah's life was in danger from Ahaziah as it had been earlier from Ahab and Jezebel. (The angel's words to Elijah in v 15—'do not be afraid of him'—give some support to this view.) Or perhaps Ahaziah had to learn that a man of God, like God himself, was not to be ordered around. Certainly, the words of entreaty used by the third captain produced a different response.

Whatever Ahaziah had hoped to achieve in sending for Elijah, all he got was a repeat of the previous prophecy that he would die without recovering from his injuries (16).

In view of Elijah's earlier prophecy to Ahab (1 Ki. 21:29) we might expect Ahaziah to be the last king of Omri's dynasty. But on his death, Jehoram (or Joram), another son of Ahab (2 Ki. 3:1), became king. The fulfilment of Elijah's words is still awaited.

2:1–18 Elijah's departure. The journey in this narrative took in places which were heavy with associations with Israel's past. Gilgal (1) was the first stopping-place after the Israelites had crossed the Jordan. Male Israelites born during the wilderness years were circumcised there, and a Passover was celebrated (Jos. 5). Bethel (2), some 14 miles (24 km) into the central hills, was the place of Jacob's encounter with God (Gn. 28). Jericho (4), in the Jordan valley not far from Gilgal, was the first town to fall to Joshua (Jos. 6), and the Jordan (6) had miraculously stopped to let Israel enter the land (Jos. 3).

Apart from the detour to Bethel, the journey therefore focuses on places connected with Israel's entry into the promised land. The purpose of this, or at least of the writer's account of it, is to draw attention to the special roles of Elijah and Elisha in Israel's history. Previous events in Elijah's life recalled aspects of Moses' ministry, e.g. like Moses, Elijah received a revelation of God on Mt Horeb, and his slaughter of the prophets of Baal had echoes of the aftermath of the golden calf incident (Ex. 32:25–29). Now he crossed to the eastern side of the Jordan (in a manner similar to the crossing of the Red Sea under Moses' leadership), where Moses' ministry also came to an end. Indeed, the end of Moses' life was almost as mysterious as that of Elijah's (Dt. 34:6). The parallels between the lives of the two men are underlined in the NT when they both appear speaking to Jesus at his transfiguration (Mt. 17:3).

There is a theological significance to the parallels between Elijah and Moses. Moses was the mediator of the covenant at Sinai/Horeb, the prophet (Dt. 18:15; 34:10) through whom Israel was brought into that covenant relationship and made the people of God. Elijah was the prophet through whom the people were turned back to the Sinai covenant and Israel's special status was saved. In short, the parallels with Moses dramatically heighten Elijah's importance in Israel's history and in the books of Kings in particular. H. H. Rowley ('Elijah on Mount Carmel', BJRL, 43 [1960], 190–219) neatly summed up the relationship between the ministries of Moses and Elijah: 'Without Moses the religion of Yahweh as it figured in the Old Testament would never have been born. Without Elijah it would have died.'

If Elijah is identified as a second Moses, Elisha would appear to be in the mould of Joshua. As Joshua succeeded Moses as leader of the people, so Elisha succeeded Elijah, crossing the Jordan on dry land from east to west as Joshua did (14) and following in Joshua's footsteps by going on to Jericho (15–22). (Even Elisha's name recalls that of Joshua. Elisha means 'God is salvation', while Joshua means 'Yahweh is salvation'.)

Elijah's departure demonstrated the power and mystery of God. It was foreknown by Elisha and the groups of prophets at Bethel and Jericho (3, 5) and finally occurred in a way which defies a clear description (11). Elisha's request for a double portion of Elijah's spirit (9) reflects the inheritance-right of a firstborn son (Dt. 21:17), and we may see a connection between this and Elisha addressing Elijah as his father (12). It amounts to a formal request that he might be heir to Elijah's ministry. The condition which Elijah imposed (10) probably involved Elisha understanding his departure rather than simply witnessing it. Elisha's cry, 'the chariots and horsemen of Israel' (12), showed that he perceived Elijah to be the true might and protection of God's people. He tore his clothes as a sign of mourning at the people's loss.

When Elisha approached the Jordan and it divided for him as it had done for Elijah, the event confirmed that the spirit active in Elijah now rested on him. The prophets from Jericho therefore acknowledged him as their new master (15). However, they had not understood Elijah's departure as well as Elisha, for they insisted on searching for him. Elisha knew this to be useless (16–18).

In the fifth century BC, the prophet Malachi predicted that the return of Elijah would precede the 'great and terrible day of the LORD' (Mal. 4:5). In its context this indicates a prophet who would repeat Elijah's ministry of calling the people back to God (Mal. 4:6), but it led to much speculation that Elijah would return in person (cf. Mt. 17:10; Mk. 8:28). Jesus indicated that the ministry of Elijah had been resumed by John the Baptist, fulfilling the words of Malachi (Mt. 11:14; 17:11–13).

The companies of prophets at Bethel and Jericho were presumably among the 7,000 faithful Israelites mentioned in 1 Ki. 19:18. For further comment see below on 2 Ki. 6:1–7.

2:19–22 Healing the spring at Jericho. Jericho was one of the oldest towns in the world, with a history of settlement reaching back to about 8000 BC, and it owes this distinction to the abundant spring which watered the surrounding area and made it fertile. In Elisha's day, however, the water in the spring had turned foul. Elisha's action with the salt was merely symbolic, for salt thrown into the flowing water could not affect the spring at its underground source. It was the word of Yahweh spoken by Elisha which was the true purifier of the water. In this incident we may also see the curse which Joshua had pronounced on Jericho (Jos. 6:26) being revoked by the words of Elisha, the new Joshua. Significantly, the new Joshua was also following the route taken by the first Joshua when he led Israel into Canaan (Bethel being near Ai, to which Joshua moved after taking Jericho; Jos. 7:2).

2:23–25 Incident at Bethel. By travelling next to Bethel, Elisha retraced the journey he had made with Elijah (Bethel–Jericho–Jordan in vs 2–8; Jordan–Jericho–Bethel in vs 13–23).

The death of the youths who mocked Elisha is as sudden and shocking as the burning up of the soldiers in 1:9–12. It is even more shocking if the translation 'small boys' (RSV) or 'little children' (KJV) is followed. Two different Hebrew nouns are used in vs 23 and 24, both of which could be translated as either 'boys' or 'youths'. The NIV prefers youths, but does not translate the adjective in v 23 which describes them as 'small'. This certainly implies children, unless it should be translated as 'worthless' or 'unworthy' here. The fierceness of the judgment is best explained if Elisha was being mocked specifically as head of Yahweh's prophets. It is possible that the insult baldhead referred to some kind of tonsure which signified membership of the school of prophets. After this incident Elisha travelled north to the scene of Elijah's great victory over the prophets of Baal, and then to Israel's capital.

3:1–20 Preparations to regain Moab. The NIV consistently gives the name Jehoram in its variant form, Joram, in order to distinguish this king of Israel from Jehoram of Judah, who was his part-contemporary. The same practice will be followed here.

Joram is faintly praised for merely following in the ways of Jeroboam and not descending to the depths of Ahab and Jezebel. Although he disposed of an image of Baal which Ahab had made (2), it is clear from ch. 10 that the worship of Baal was still allowed to flourish in Samaria. The significance of Elijah's contest on Mt Carmel was that the worship of Baal was no longer promoted as the official religion of Israel; but as long as Jezebel continued to dominate the royal court, Baal worship was a feature of life in the capital.

As we learn from the Moabite Stone (see the Introduction), Moab had become Israel's vassal in Omri's time. According to 2 Ki. 1:1 it rebelled in the short reign of Ahaziah. It therefore fell to Joram to try to regain control.

The account has several parallels with Ahab's campaign against Aram (1 Ki. 22). Both campaigns were undertaken to regain territory east of the Jordan; both involved an alliance with Jehoshaphat of Judah (who expressed his commitment in the same words; cf. 1 Ki. 22:4 and 2 Ki. 3:7); in both cases Jehoshaphat asked for a prophet through whom they might consult Yahweh; and both campaigns had an unclear outcome.

The king of Edom took part alongside Jehoshaphat (9). This is presumably the 'deputy' who was said to be ruling Edom in 1 Ki. 22:47, i.e. an appointee of Jehoshaphat rather than a member of a native dynasty. Thus Judah seems to have regained control of Edom since the days of Hadad (1 Ki. 11).

A severe shortage of water caused the kings to consult Elisha. We are reminded of the drought of Ahab's reign and of that king's search for Elijah (1 Ki. 18:1–15). However, in other respects the circumstances were very different.

Joram spoke piously and confidently of Yahweh initiating the campaign (10 and 13), though we have read nothing previously of him seeking guidance on the matter. Elisha dismissed his piety as shallow, if not utterly false (13–14). Joram had claimed God's sanction for his actions without attempting to discover God's will—an all too common error! Only when in dire straits did he do what he should have done earlier.

Elisha's use of a musician to aid his prophesying (15) recalls the use of musical instruments by the ecstatic prophets in 1 Sa. 10:5–13. He prophesied both water and military success, and the first part of the prophecy was fulfilled the very next day. Elisha plays no further part in the story.

3:21–27 The battle with the Moabites. It is rather surprising that the Moabite army should so misinterpret the sight of early morning sunlight on the water (22–23). We should probably understand this confused thinking as God's doing, the means by which he handed Moab over to the three kings (18). These verses contain word-plays on the similarity between the Hebrew words for 'Edom', 'red' and 'blood', which cannot be conveyed in English translations.

Joram and his allies defeated the Moabites, fulfilling Elisha's prophecy. However, when the king of Moab sacrificed his firstborn son on the wall of Kir Hareseth (27) the Israelites withdrew and did not pursue their victory. The exact reason for Israel's withdrawal is not clear from the text. Was there fury against Israel among the Moabites because their king had been forced by desperation to do such a dreadful thing? In other words, did the sacrifice renew the Moabites' determination to fight? Or did the fury (or possibly 'strife') come 'upon Israel' (RSV)? That is, were the Israelite troops so overwhelmed (with horror or superstitious dread) at the sight of a human sacrifice that they renounced the whole venture? Either interpretation is possible. The final outcome of the campaign is left in doubt; if Israel withdrew, did Moab remain free? The Moabite Stone celebrates a successful rebellion, but that does not settle the present issue as it could have been inscribed before Joram's campaign took place.

4:1–7 A miraculous supply of oil. Miracles characterized the ministry of Elisha. His healing of the waters at Jericho (2:19–22) was the first. A series of seven then followed (4:1–6:7). For their overall significance see the comment on the last of the sequence (2 Ki. 6:1–7).

It was an accepted custom in Israel that if a family could not pay off its debts by any other means, some or all members of that family would work as servants for the creditor (Lv. 25:39–41). This was the position a widow of one of the prophets found herself in, and she was about to lose her two boys. The situation was serious, for the widow would have no-one to work the family land. She faced a further downward spiral of debt if Elisha could not help.

The olive oil which unexpectedly flowed from its vessel recalls the miraculous provision of oil and flour for the widow who sheltered Elijah (1 Ki. 17:13–16), but here the oil is sold to pay off the debt.

4:8–17 A son for the woman of Shunem. Shunem lay somewhere near Jezreel (Jos. 19:18). Shunammite (12) is a feminine adjective derived from the name of the town and is used here to designate the woman who provided Elisha with hospitality. Her name is never given. In v 13 we learn that Elisha's relationship with the royal court was very different from Elijah's. He seems to have been held in esteem and to have had influence there. This verse anticipates the events of ch. 8, when Elisha's servant Gehazi did indeed speak to the king on the woman's behalf.

The promise of a son in improbable circumstances is similar to the promise God made to Abraham and Sarah (Gn. 18:10), and the woman's sceptical response recalls Sarah's on that occasion (Gn. 18:12). But the prophet's word proved trustworthy.

4:18–37 The Shunammite's son restored to life. This story has clear parallels with Elijah's restoration of the widow's son at Zarephath (1 Ki. 17). In both cases, the healing took place on the prophet's own bed in an upper room and involved a similar repeated action. But the present story is told in more detail than the earlier one and with much greater poignancy. And on this occasion it is stated unequivocally that the child had died.

The woman's action of placing the dead child on Elisha's bed and going quickly to search for him suggests she had faith that he would be able to restore the child to life. The child's return to life and his reunion with his mother are simply and touchingly told. Through the man of God, God had once more manifested his power over life and death.

4:38–41 The poisoned pot of stew. This incident is set in a time of famine (38), perhaps the one referred to in 8:1, which lasted seven years. As in ch. 2, we find Elisha associated with a community of prophets (lit. 'the sons of the prophets', as in the RSV), this time at Gilgal. Because usual supplies of food were short, one of the prophets collected an unknown fruit which turned out to be poisonous. Elisha's action of adding flour (like his action of putting salt in the spring at Jericho in 2:21) was probably symbolic. The action was effective because it was the action of the man of God.

4:42–44 Feeding a hundred. Presumably the hundred men (43) were once again a community of prophets. The twenty loaves would have been small and flat and, therefore, inadequate food for so many—hence the servant's amazed question. However, Elisha had received God's promise that there would be plenty, and so it proved.

5:1–27 The healing of Naaman. Israel's wars with Aram were interspersed with periods of peace between the two states (e.g. 1 Ki. 22:1). The story of Naaman is set in one such period. A theme which occurs at several points throughout the story is that Israel's God is the world's God; he is the only God and his power and interests are not local but cosmic in scale.

This theme emerges as soon as Naaman is introduced. He was an Aramean commander through whom the LORD had given victory to Aram. Yahweh was therefore in control of the rise and fall of nations other than Israel. The disease from which Naaman suffered was not necessarily leprosy, for the Hebrew word covers a variety of ailments affecting the skin.

Elisha's reputation as a healer reached Naaman through his wife's Israelite maidservant. In spite of the fact that Naaman had once defeated her own people and taken her captive, she showed a sincere concern for his welfare. Her simple faith that Elisha would be able to cure

Naaman's disease was in stark contrast to the reaction of the king of Israel. His panic in v 7 is almost comical and full of irony. The king could not exercise God's power over life and death, but it did not occur to him to send Naaman to the man of God who could.

Naaman was at first outraged by Elisha's instructions to wash seven times in the Jordan (10–12). His servants, however, had more faith—just as the Israelite maidservant had shown more faith than the Israelite king. They sensibly pointed out that he would have been keen enough to do something difficult, so why not something easy? Obedience to Elisha's simple instructions produced healing. God is often asking for faith and obedience in small matters when we think he is requiring mighty deeds.

Naaman's response showed great humility and gratitude. Whatever he had previously believed about Israel's God, he now declared him to be the only God (15). From now on he would worship only Yahweh (17). His request for two mule-loads of Israel's soil need not mean that he thought Yahweh was somehow limited to Israelite territory. Rather, it probably reflected a belief that Yahweh's land was holy and, therefore, its soil was necessary for the creation of a sacred area for the worship of Yahweh in Aram. Naaman's request in v 18 did not mean that he wished to continue worshipping Rimmon (a title of the Aramean god Hadad) as well as Yahweh. This would contradict his declarations in vs 15 and 17. His problem was that, as a member of the royal court, he must go through the motions of worshipping Rimmon, even though his allegiance was now to Yahweh alone. Elisha's blessing assured him of the forgiveness he asked for. The whole passage should make us very sensitive to the difficulties of those who try to serve God among people of another faith.

Gehazi's attempt at deception (20–27) provides a sad and salutary appendix to the story. As a high-ranking official, Naaman had brought with him gifts of enormous value—all of which Elisha had refused to accept. The temptation to obtain some of these riches for himself proved too strong for Gehazi, who took cruel advantage of Naaman's gratitude and generosity. The service of God does not protect his servants from temptation. Indeed, it often places them in a position to abuse their status and take advantage of others. Elisha's words in v 26 implied that there might have been times when it was right to accept gifts, but this (for a reason which is not explained) was not one of them.

6:1–7 A lost axe-head. The picture of the company of prophets becomes a little clearer in this story. They lived together as a community under Elisha's leadership. (The crucial phrase in v 1 reads lit. 'the place where we dwell in your presence'.) There seem to have been such communities at Bethel, Jericho and Gilgal (2 Ki. 2:3, 5, 15–18; 4:38), but it is not clear which of these, if any, is the subject of this narrative, or whether Elisha had equally strong ties with all of them. It would be wrong to think of them as monastic communities, like those which flourished in the Judean wilderness during the fourth to sixth centuries AD, as it is clear that the prophets married and raised families (4:1). In the present story we see a community building a new settlement to accommodate its growing numbers—a sign that it was flourishing under Elisha's leadership.

Elisha's action to retrieve the sunken axe-head is as mysterious as his earlier healing of the Jericho spring and his removal of poison from the stew. Like those stories, it shows him to have been a man possessing extraordinary powers, powers not possessed by the other members of the prophetic community. Such powers were his because of his special status as a man of God (6). The cumulative effect of these strange tales is to suggest what this phrase means: he was not simply a pious man who served God but a man whose relationship with God was unique among the prophets of his time. Like Elijah earlier, he was in a very special sense God's man for this moment in Israel's history.

6:8–23 Elisha and the Arameans. This story provides a touch of comic relief before the tension and tragedy which follows. When the king of Aram determined to capture Elisha because of his ability to warn the king of Israel of impending raids, the attempt was doomed to failure from the start. For if Elisha knew in advance of Aram's plans, he presumably knew of this one! The frustration of the king of Aram is humorously portrayed in vs 11–13.

Elisha does not take evasive action, but remains in Dothan while a huge Aramean force surrounds the city. In v 17 the servant sees the reason for Elisha's calm confidence: the horses and chariots of fire (which recall 2 Ki. 2:11–12) greatly outnumber the Aramean troops. The spiritual sight given to him when Elisha prays is balanced by the blindness which strikes the Arameans when he prays the second time. The humour turns to farce when Elisha himself leads the befuddled troops off to Samaria. He then prays for their eyes to be opened in the same words he has used to pray for the servant's special sight. But what they see is not so reassuring: they are in Israel's capital, where Israelite troops presumably outnumber them.

The king of Israel recognized Elisha's authority to be above his own. In view of 1 Ki. 20:35–43, it is surprising that Elisha forbade the slaughter of the enemy troops. The reason is left unclear, except that different rules of war seem to have applied in this situation (22). Instead, the enemy was to be entertained with a royal feast and sent back to their king. Their discomfiture was enough to end the raids on Israel.

6:24–7:2 Samaria besieged again. The tone shifts from comedy to tragedy. After the conclusion to the previous story (23), it is surprising to find Samaria besieged by the Arameans in v 24. The apparent contradiction is because the stories about Elisha are not in chronological order (see below on 8:1–6).

The siege resulted in famine within the capital, and its severity is emphasized by the inflated prices charged for food (25). The king's helplessness is powerfully conveyed in v 27. The appalling news that starvation had led to a child being eaten was the last straw. The king tore his clothes as an expression of grief, revealing sackcloth beneath. This was worn as a sign of mourning in times of disaster (La. 2:10) and in times of penitence for sin (1 Ki. 21:27) or prayer for deliverance (2 Ki. 19:1–2). Any or all of these could have been the king's reason for wearing it in this crisis.

We are not told why his anger boiled over against Elisha (31) but the reason is not difficult to guess. Elisha, who had the power to warn against Aramean invasions and to thwart them, had not prevented this one; he also had the power to multiply oil and bread, but had not used it to ward off starvation.

A transfer of power is indicated in v 32. During the previous siege of Samaria 'all the elders of the land' assembled around the king (1 Ki. 20:7). Now, in a variation on that scene, we find the elders gathered in the house of Elisha. True leadership was acknowledged to lie with the prophet, not with the king (who remains nameless throughout, as though his identity is not important).

In the Hebrew of v 33 it is the king's messenger (as in the NIV) and not the king himself (as in the RSV) who comes down to Elisha's house, and the words quoted are the king's words as conveyed by that messenger (not spoken by the king himself as in the NIV). The king's attitude is understandable but mistaken; for even if Yahweh had sent the catastrophe, that was no reason why Yahweh might not be looked to for help. Furthermore, it was an attitude which could lead only to deeper despair, for the king himself was powerless to act, as he well knew (27). If God is not our help in such times, there is no help at all.

Elisha replied that deliverance was at hand. In only twenty-four hours time, food would be so plentiful that prices would have dropped dramatically (7:1). Thus, Elisha implied (though he did not state it) that the siege would be lifted. In 7:2 the messenger is described as the officer ‘on whose arm the king leaned’ (not on whose arm the king was leaning, because the king was not present in this scene; see above on 6:33), meaning that he was the king’s regular attendant. Naaman used a similar phrase to describe his service to the king of Aram (2 Ki. 5:18). The man’s scepticism earned him a dire prediction concerning his own fate (2).

7:3–20 Samaria saved again. The miraculous means by which the siege was lifted is related in vs 6–7. But the people in Samaria might not have realized the truth in time to avoid starvation had not the outcasts at the city gate decided to throw in their lot with the Arameans (3–5). There is suspense in v 8 as we wonder whether the four men will ever take the good news back to the city and thereby save the starving population. The king was so deep in despair that he could only suspect a trap (12). As in the story of Naaman, it was a servant who provided the necessary sound advice (13). The provisions left behind by the Arameans were so plentiful that Elisha’s prophecy about the price of food was fulfilled, and in the stampede through the gate the king’s attendant met his predicted end (16–20).

8:1–6 The Shunammite’s land. There are clear signs here that the stories of Elisha are not presented in chronological order. As this story involves Gehazi (who left Elisha’s service in 5:27), it must have occurred before the healing of Naaman. The famine predicted in v 1 probably provides the background to 4:38–41.

The story shows Elisha’s continuing care of the Shunammite woman and her family. The woman acts as the head of her household, perhaps because her husband (already elderly in 4:14) has died by this time. The king’s treatment of the woman on her return shows his great respect for Elisha (4–6). God’s providential care is also illustrated in the fact that Gehazi was relating the story of the woman’s son at the moment she made her appeal.

8:7–15 Ben-Hadad assassinated by Hazael. Elisha’s high standing in Aram is shown by Ben-Hadad’s extraordinary deference to him in v 9. In Hebrew Ben-Hadad’s question about his sickness is worded similarly to that of Ahaziah in 2 Ki. 1:2, inviting us to compare the two incidents. Both kings turned to a foreign god to discover the outcome, but whereas the Israelite king sought Baal-Zebul, the Aramean king sought the God of Israel!

Elisha’s message to the sick king of v 10 can be read in two very different ways: either ‘Go and say to him, “You will certainly live”, but Yahweh has shown me that he will certainly die’, or ‘Go and say, “You will certainly not live”, for Yahweh has shown me that he will certainly die’. The problem stems from the fact that in Hebrew the words ‘not’ and ‘to him’ differ only slightly. While the main text contains the former, the latter is offered in the margin as the correct reading. Most translators follow the margin here, on the basis that the more difficult reading is more likely to be correct. The change to ‘not’ can readily be explained by a copyist wanting to avoid the impression that Elisha had lied. A change in the opposite direction cannot be explained so easily.

The reason for the false message is left obscure, but v 10 probably expresses the tension between what Elisha knew of Ben-Hadad’s illness and what he knew of Hazael’s intentions: the sickness itself was not fatal, but Ben-Hadad would die nevertheless because Hazael planned to murder him and take the throne. Elisha did not say that God had chosen Hazael to be king in Ben-Hadad’s place, merely that he would be, and that he would cause great suffering in Israel.

However we must not forget that Elijah was earlier instructed to anoint Hazael as king over Aram (1 Ki. 19:15), and although no actual anointing takes place in the present passage it must be seen as in some sense fulfilling that instruction. On the other hand, the two references to Hazael have very different emphases. In 1 Ki. 19:17 he was merely to play a part in removing the worship of Baal from Israel, whereas in Elisha's vision (and in subsequent events) Aram's oppression of Israel reached devastating severity under his rule.

8:16–24 Jehoram of Judah. In vs 16–29 we have the second of the two Judah-interludes contained in the account of Omri's dynasty. The Hebrew text of v 16 implies a co-regency between Jehoshaphat and his son Jehoram. In Jehoram's reign Jehoshaphat's alliance with Israel (1 Ki. 22:4; 2 Ki. 3:7) bore bitter fruit in Judah. Jehoram's sins, broadly defined with reference to the ways of the kings of Israel, are traced to his marriage to a daughter of Ahab (18). This verse introduces (but does not name) Athaliah, who plays a major role in ch. 11. V 19 echoes 1 Ki. 11:36 and 15:4 with its reference to God's promise to maintain a lamp for David and his descendants for ever. However, this is the last time the promise is mentioned—a fact which becomes ominous in the light of later developments in Judah.

Edom's successful bid for independence (anticipated in 1 Ki. 11:14–22) and the revolt of the city of Libnah (presumably to the Philistines, since it lay near Judah's border with Philistia) are to be understood as consequences of Jehoram's wickedness (compare the invasion of Shishak in the account of Rehoboam's reign; 1 Ki. 14:25–28).

8:25–29 Ahaziah of Judah. Ahaziah of Judah continued in his father's (and mother's) footsteps (26–27). The note of his alliance with Joram of Israel introduces the events which led to the destruction of Baal worship in both Israel and Judah. There is also a first reference here to Hazael as Israel's oppressor, beginning the fulfilment of Elisha's vision. Ahaziah's death is not reported until 9:27–28.

9:1–10:36 Jehu and the end of Omri's dynasty

9:1–13 Jehu anointed king of Israel. With Hazael on the throne in Damascus only one of God's instructions to Elijah (1 Ki. 19:15–16) remained to be carried out. Once that was done events moved swiftly to a fulfilment of Elijah's prophecy concerning the downfall of Omri's dynasty (1 Ki. 21:20–28).

For some reason Elisha did not anoint Jehu himself, but sent an anonymous man from the community of prophets to do it. The instruction in v 1 to tuck your cloak into your belt ('gird up your loins'; RSV) means to prepare for action of some kind; here it means to put on clothes suitable for a journey. Jehu has not previously been introduced except in God's instruction to Elijah (1 Ki. 19:16), but we learn in the course of events that he was the commander-in-chief of Israel's army, as Omri had been (1 Ki. 16:16). (He is not to be confused with Jehu the prophet in 1 Ki. 16:1–7.) The army was defending Ramoth Gilead, presumably after capturing it in an unreported sequel to the campaign in 1 Ki. 22.

The prophet's words (7–10) recall those of Elijah in 1 Ki. 21:21–23, adding the note that God would avenge the blood of his servants (7).

The enthusiasm of the troops in v 13 suggests that Omri's dynasty was somewhat lacking in popularity. The time was ripe for a coup.

9:14–37 The deaths of Joram, Ahaziah and Jezebel. The information concerning Joram's and Ahaziah's presence in Jezreel on account of Joram's wounds (14–15) picks up the threads of the previous chapter (8:28–29) as the action converges on the plot of ground that had belonged to Naboth the Jezreelite (21). After a pattern of thrice-repeated questions which recalls

2 Ki. 1:9–14, Jehu declares his hand (22). Joram's action of wheeling his chariot around after realizing Jehu's intentions (23) resembles Ahab's action on being wounded at Ramoth Gilead (1 Ki. 22:34). The writer deliberately gathers up earlier themes and motifs as the action approaches its climax.

Jehu's killing of the wounded and fleeing Joram is shocking in its callousness (24), as is his treatment of Joram's body (25–26; cf. Dt. 21:22–23; 2 Sa. 21:10–14). Although Jehu quotes an earlier prophecy to justify this, it is a prophecy of which we have previously heard nothing and we are left wondering whether it is authentic or a convenient product of Jehu's imagination.

His killing of Ahaziah of Judah (27–29) was not commanded by the prophet in vs 7–10. Jehu presumably felt it was justified because Ahaziah was the son of Athaliah, granddaughter of Omri (8:26). The geographical details in these verses are not clear, but it is interesting that the forces of Judah (Ahaziah's servants) were stationed in Israelite Megiddo.

Jezebel, well aware of the direction events were taking, faced death with cool detachment and even ironic humour. She painted her eyes and arranged her hair, not because she hoped to seduce Jehu (her words show that) but because 'she wished to depart this life in style!' (T. R. Hobbs, 2 Kings [Word Books, 1985], p.109). Her opening words repeat again the question addressed to Jehu in vs 18, 19 and 22 (lit. 'Is it peace?'), but this time the question was deliberately ironic. By referring to Jehu as Zimri she reminded him of another army commander who killed his king—only to die horribly himself seven days later (1 Ki. 16:9–19).

Her death was horrendously brutal. The deliberate trampling of her body by Jehu's chariot-team (33) went beyond Elijah's prophecy (1 Ki. 21:23), just as Jehu's quotation of that prophecy (36–37) went beyond the original in detail and savagery. Jehu's action of eating and drinking while the dogs disposed of her remains (34) highlights his own callousness.

10:1–17 The slaughter of Ahab's sons and supporters. The Hebrew text appears to be at fault in referring to letters to Jezreel in v 1, since Jehu was already there. The Greek text has 'to the rulers of the city [i.e. Samaria], to the elders ...' etc. (as in the RSV). This was probably the original reading, since only a small error in copying the Hebrew of this phrase would produce the reference to Jezreel.

Jehu challenged the rulers of Samaria to choose a successor to Joram who could fight for the dynasty's survival (3). His ultimate aim was the death of all seventy potential successors, which he achieved through coercion. The arrival of the basketloads of royal heads at Jezreel provided gruesome proof that the deed had been done (6–8).

Jehu's question in v 9 ('... but who killed all these?') is difficult to interpret. He appears to be denying direct responsibility for the slaughter of the princes, but it is not clear on whom he was trying to place it. Was he claiming divine sanction for all his actions and saying that ultimately Yahweh was responsible for this bloodshed? Or was he blaming the rulers of Samaria for the atrocity he had forced them to commit? If the former, his reference to Elijah's prophecy in v 10 continues the same theme; if the latter, the prophecy was cited to support the revenge he was shortly to take on Samaria. Whichever interpretation is correct, Jehu's aim was to win the support of the people (9), presumably the citizens of Jezreel and any soldiers stationed there.

The next stage of Jehu's bloodbath was the massacre of all the royal family's relatives and supporters in Jezreel (11). Then he moved on to Samaria to repeat the process there (17). On the way, however, he met and killed forty-two relatives of Ahaziah of Judah (13–14). He showed cruel caprice by murdering them after ordering his men to take them alive. And throughout he claimed to be motivated by zeal for the LORD (16)—a claim of which we should be suspicious in view of his cavalier use of prophecy to justify his atrocities (9:25–26, 36–37). Although his elimination of Ahab's family is said to be according to the word of the LORD spoken to Elijah (17), the writer's final verdict on Jehu (29) puts this in a wider perspective (see below).

10:18–28 The slaughter of the worshippers of Baal. The bloodbath continued with the wiping out of all Samaria's Baal worshippers. Jehu deceived them by claiming to be a more fervent Baal worshipper than Ahab (1)—after all, Ahab had hardly been an unswerving upholder of the new cult, and had even given two of his sons Yahweh-names (Joram and Ahaziah). Jehu's religious purge was carried out with typical callousness. Its exact scope depends on whether the Hebrew word meaning lit. 'servants' is translated 'worshippers' (as in the RSV) or ministers (as in the NIV). The former is probably correct, implying the comprehensive elimination of Baal worship and not just the removal of the officials of the cult.

10:29–36 Jehu evaluated. Chs. 9 and 10 provide an ambiguous picture of Jehu. On the one hand, he acted according to the word of the LORD spoken to Elijah (10:17); on the other hand, we have seen that he appears to go beyond that word and to manipulate it to support his brutal extermination of all who might oppose him. So in spite of his achievement in eradicating the worship of Baal from Israel (28) he is not portrayed as an exemplary character, but one whose ends were marred by his means. Like many leaders of revolutions, he indulged in excesses in his attempt to remove the evils which preceded him, committing evils of his own. His mishandling of prophecy also puts him among that breed of ruthless politicians who claim an almost prophetic authority for themselves, justifying their deeds by appealing to the will of God.

This is only implicit in the biblical narrative, but there is also explicit criticism in the concluding assessment of Jehu's reign. God's own approval of his achievement was qualified (30); he promised Jehu a dynasty of five generations in all (his own reign and those of four generations of descendants)—far short of the eternal dynasty (on the pattern of David's) which was conditionally promised to Jeroboam (1 Ki. 11:39). Significantly, the prophet Hosea was to speak of the end of Jehu's dynasty in terms of punishment 'for the massacre at Jezreel' (Ho. 1:4).

Furthermore, Jehu's professed zeal for the LORD (16) was undermined by his worship of Jeroboam's golden calves (29, 31). Divine disapproval of his reign is illustrated by Hazael's victories, described as Yahweh's reduction of Israel's territory (32–33). Jehu is a further sad illustration of the fact that divine appointing and prophetic anointing do not guarantee that the recipient will live up to God's calling.

11:1–17:41 The two kingdoms: from Jehu to the fall of Samaria

11:1–14:29 The period of Jehu's dynasty

11:1–21 Athaliah queen of Judah. We have already met Athaliah as the daughter of Ahab who married Jehoram of Judah (2 Ki. 8:18, 26). Her attempt to wipe out the Davidic dynasty can only be explained by her own ambition to seize the throne. Jehu's murder of her son Ahaziah and many of his adult kinsmen presented her with the opportunity she needed. More of her own relatives must have died in her attempted coup. In short, she emerges as a callous and calculating woman.

Her plans, had they succeeded, would have put an end to the Davidic dynasty. 2 Ki. 8:19 reminded us of God's mercy towards the dynasty because of the commitment he had made to David, and in this story we see that mercy in action. However, the dynasty's salvation is not told in terms of divine intervention; it was brought about through human courage, loyalty and cunning.

Jehosheba is described simply as the sister of the dead Ahaziah (2). She could, therefore, have been Athaliah's own daughter. However, since the Hebrew term could equally well mean 'half-sister', she may have been Jehoram's daughter by another royal wife. Other details are also unclear. We do not know why she chose to save Joash (who can only have been about a year old when she hid him; vs 3–4, 21) rather than any of the other royal princes who were about to be murdered. (See also below on 12:1–3). The absence of the child's mother (named in 12:1) from the story is surprising.

Events are described in much more detail from v 4 when Jehoiada the priest (9) enters the story. (According to 2 Ch. 22:11, Jehosheba was Jehoiada's wife.) Unfortunately, many of the details of the deployment of the soldiers in vs 4–11 remain obscure because we are unable to understand some of the military and other terms. What is clear from the willing involvement of the troops is that Athaliah did not have their support (though she must have had some support to begin with or she could not have commanded the death of the royal princes). From the bewildering detail we gain an impression of Jehoiada's meticulous planning and watertight security arrangements.

Whether the seven-year-old Joash was actually crowned in v 12 depends on the correct translation of a Hebrew word which refers to some kind of symbol of the king's dedication. It is frequently translated crown, but its exact meaning is uncertain. A similar vagueness surrounds the covenant or 'testimony' (RSV) with which he was presented. Some kind of inscribed plaque seems likely, perhaps summarizing the requirements attached to kingship. There may be no direct connection with the covenants made by Jehoiada in v 17. The shouts of the people when Joash was anointed (12, 14) attest the popularity of the restored Davidic line in Judah.

Athaliah's death is told with stark economy (13–16). Her reign is given no formal summary, for the writer does not acknowledge her legitimacy.

The first covenant over which Jehoiada officiated (17) re-established the relationship between Yahweh and Judah's king, and the relationship between Yahweh and the people (that they would be the LORD's people). The second concerned the people's acceptance of Joash. The renewed commitment to Yahweh then expressed itself in the destruction of the trappings of Baal worship and the execution of the priest of Baal (18). Clearly Athaliah, from Baal-worshipping Israel, had introduced these into Jerusalem, though we do not know whether she did so after Ahaziah's death or earlier. The renewal of the kingship was completed by Joash's descent from temple to palace to take his rightful place on the throne of David (19–21). In v 21 his name is given in its longer form, Jehoash. However, to help distinguish him from king Jehoash of Israel (2 Ki. 13:10–25), whose name is sometimes given in the shorter form, the NIV consistently refers to the king of Judah as Joash and to the king of Israel as Jehoash. The same practice will be followed here.

12:1–3 Joash of Judah: introduction. It appears from v 1 that even though the writer did not acknowledge the legitimacy of Athaliah's reign of over six years, he did not include it within the forty-year reign of Joash. Instead he counted the years of Joash's reign from the time he was formally proclaimed king in the seventh year of Jehu of Israel.

Joash grew up under the instruction of Jehoiada the priest, and thus the influence of Athaliah on the royal family of Judah was broken. Was this why Jehosheba chose the one-year-old Joash, because he was too young to have learned anything from his Baal-worshipping grandmother? In v 2 the NIV has ... did what was right ... all the years Jehoiada the priest instructed him, in order to allow for Joash's later lapse into paganism as recorded by the Chronicler (2 Ch. 24:17–22). The RSV has '... did what was right ... all his days, because Jehoiada the priest instructed him', in keeping with the fact that the writer of Kings seems to know nothing of this lapse. His only negative comment is that Joash failed to remove the high places (3).

12:4–16 Joash of Judah: repairing the temple. The reason for repairing the temple is not given here. In 2 Ch. 24:7 it is explained that Athaliah's sons had 'broken into' part of the temple precincts and taken them over for the worship of Baal.

The arrangements for the collection of money (4–5) are not clear. The NIV punctuates v 4 so that three sources of income are listed, the first phrase being taken as an inclusive description of all of them. It is likely, however, that four distinct sources are listed here. The diversion of money from all of these for the repairs indicates the seriousness of the situation. Further vagueness arises from the uncertain meaning of the Hebrew phrase rendered from one of the treasurers ('from his acquaintance' in the RSV). Another possibility is 'from his own funds' (NEB), which would mean that part of the personal income of each priest was also diverted to finance the project. This would further indicate the urgency of the undertaking. A similar expression produces the same uncertainty in v 7.

We are not told in what year of his reign Joash initiated the temple repairs, so we do not know how long had elapsed by his twenty-third year (6). The impression is that the project was delayed for a long time. This in turn suggests that the zeal and morale of the priests was at a low ebb. As a result, the project was taken out of the hands of the priests, and a new system for funding temple maintenance was introduced. The power of the king over the priesthood at this time is clear from the way Joash was able to reorganize their affairs.

The money which was placed in the chest (9) would not have been coins, as coins were not introduced until around 650 BC (in Asia Minor). When payment was not made in kind, the normal exchange commodity was metal (usually silver or gold) in pieces of known weight.

The list of craftsmen involved in the repairs (11–12) suggests that the damage was extensive. There is a sad echo here of the original building project in Solomon's reign. The contrast between Solomon's apparently unlimited resources and the difficulty Joash had in raising money for the repairs is very striking.

The meaning of vs 13–14 is slightly unclear but seems to be that the manufacture of utensils for the temple was postponed so that the gold and silver could be used to finance the repairs (further evidence of the lack of resources). Had the utensils previously been lost, desecrated or misappropriated? Or were they among the precious things which Joash used to buy off Hazael (see below on vs 17–18)? Does the lack of replacements mean that normal temple worship lapsed, or did it continue with more mundane items? Such questions are left unanswered.

12:17–18 Joash of Judah: Jerusalem threatened. The opening phrase About this time places this event during the repair programme which began after Joash's twenty-third year (6) and therefore, during the reign of Jehoahaz of Israel (which also began in the twenty-third year of Joash; 13:1). Israel's extreme weakness during Jehoahaz's reign (13:7) allowed Hazael to penetrate as far south as Judah, placing Jerusalem itself under threat.

Joash does not seem to have had the military might to stave off Hazael's advance. Instead he bought him off with precious items from the temple and palace treasuries (18). The Chronicler paints an even bleaker picture of the invasion, tracing the disaster to Joash's lapse into paganism after the death of Jehoiada (2 Ch. 24:23–25).

12:19–21 Joash of Judah: assassination. The foregoing narrative implies that Judah was weak and impoverished during Joash's reign, and this probably explains the discontent which led to his assassination. Typically, the Kings writer shows no interest in the motive of the assassins and deals briefly with Joash's murder in the context of a standard concluding formula.

13:1–9 Jehoahaz of Israel. Jehoahaz resembled his father Jehu in following the sins of Jeroboam (2). As a consequence, Israel suffered oppression by Hazael and his successor (another Ben-Hadad; v 3). We glimpse something of Israel's dire emergency in v 7, which describes the meagre remnants of Jehoahaz's army. (By contrast, Ahab was able to field 2,000 chariots at the battle of Qarqar.) In this crisis, Jehoahaz turned to Yahweh (4), but there was no change of heart on the part of the people as a whole (6).

The account in vs 3–5 follows a pattern familiar from the book of Judges: Yahweh is angry with Israel; he hands Israel over to an oppressor; Yahweh's help is sought; he hears and sends a deliverer. There are also similarities with the summary of the Exodus found in Dt. 26:7–9.

The identity of the deliverer sent by Yahweh (5) is debated. This may be a reference to the Assyrian king Adad-nirari III, whose western campaign of about 805 BC reduced Hazael's power. Another and more probable suggestion is that Elisha is intended. This would place the deliverance in the reign of Jehoash, in keeping with vs 22–25 (see below).

13:10–13 Jehoash of Israel: summary of his reign. These verses provide a standard summary of Jehoash's reign. Like his two predecessors, he continued in the sins of Jeroboam (11). His war with Amaziah of Judah (recounted in ch. 14) is singled out for mention in v 12, but not his more important defeat of the Arameans (25).

13:14–19 Jehoash of Israel: Jehoash and Elisha. After the notice of Jehoash's death the narrative backtracks to relate an incident involving Elisha. This is the first time Elisha has appeared since the beginning of ch. 9, and here we find him on his deathbed after more than fifty years at the head of Israel's prophets. In spite of the criticism of Jehoash in the preceding summary, this story shows him respectfully devoted to the elderly man of God (cf. 2 Ki. 8:4–6).

The king's words in v 14 repeats Elisha's own exclamation on the departure of Elijah (2 Ki. 2:12, on which see the comment). With these words Jehoash acknowledged Elisha to be Israel's strength and protection and bewailed his approaching death. The cry was particularly poignant in view of the fact that Israel's literal 'chariots and horsemen' had been all but destroyed (7). Would Israel be left utterly defenceless at Elisha's passing?

The story involves symbolic actions, as in the earlier miracle stories concerning Elisha. On this occasion, however, they were performed by the king (though Elisha placed his own hands over the king's when he fired the arrow; v 16). Elisha's prophecy (17) confirms that the issue underlying this incident was Israel's survival of the Aramean oppression. The first action symbolized victory and recovery. However, the king's failure to perform the second action often enough determined that his success against Aram would be limited (19). It presumably signified a lack of faith or determination.

The Aphek mentioned in v 17 is probably the same as that in 1 Ki. 20:26, 30. It lay east of the Sea of Galilee, and is not to be confused with Aphek on the coastal plain about 12 miles (20 km) inland from Joppa (1 Sa. 4:1, etc.).

13:20–21 Elisha's death and final miracle (in that order!). Unlike Elijah, Elisha underwent the normal processes of death, burial and decay. This incident must have occurred at least two years after his death, since only his bones remained. His posthumous miracle resembles nothing else in the Bible. The point of the story may be to underline once again the unique power of Elisha, by showing that even the dregs of power residing in his bones were enough to restore a dead man to life. More importantly, it symbolizes the fact that Elisha's action in the previous verses brought Israel new life after his death.

13:22–25 Jehoash of Israel: Israel's deliverance begins. Although Jehoahaz sought Yahweh's favour and Yahweh heard him (4), there was no deliverance from oppression during his reign (22). Relief came with the victories of his son Jehoash, after Hazael had been succeeded by his son Ben-Hadad (probably the third of that name; see above on 1 Ki. 20:1). Jehoash's three victories were those predicted by Elisha (18–19). This was the beginning of a revival of Israel's fortunes which reached its peak under Jehoash's successor.

Just as Judah's preservation has been linked to God's promises to David (1 Ki. 11:36; 15:4; 2 Ki. 8:19) so in v 23 Israel's preservation is linked to a much older covenant—God's covenant with the ancestors of the whole nation, which involved the promise of the land. Humanly speaking, Israel's survival at this time hung by a slender thread, but in truth it was guaranteed by a covenant made and upheld by God.

14:1–22 Amaziah of Judah. Amaziah is formally introduced (1–4) as a king who was as good as, but no better than, his father. He is the first king since Asa to be compared with David, but whereas in Asa's case the comparison is complimentary (1 Ki. 15:11) here it is critical (3). In executing his father's assassins he had regard for the Book of the Law of Moses, clearly a reference to Deuteronomy in some form (see Dt. 24:16). His defeat of the Edomites (7) did not amount to the reconquest of Edom, but it probably paved the way for his son Azariah to take Elath from the Edomites and rebuild it (22). Elath was at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba, near Solomon's old Red Sea port of Ezion Geber (1 Ki. 9:26).

So much is reported positively, but Amaziah's war with Israel (8–14) does not show him in a good light. No provocation by Jehoash is reported (but see 2 Ch. 25:6–13). Although Amaziah's message in v 8 is described by the NIV as a challenge, the Hebrew text does not say this, and it may simply have been a request for a meeting. If so, some such incident as the one reported in Chronicles might be presupposed here and Amaziah may have been hoping to negotiate reparations peacefully. On the other hand, the final words of Jehoash's reply suggest that he understood Amaziah's message as a provocation to war. The fable which Jehoash quotes (or concocts) in v 9 puts Amaziah in the unfavourable role of the worthless thistle and thus shows utter contempt for him. It is possible that the reference to a marriage means that Amaziah was trying to negotiate a marriage-alliance with Israel at this time, but there is no other evidence for this.

Jehoash did not march directly on Judah's northern border but moved his army down to the western approaches to Jerusalem. Battle was joined at Beth Shemesh (distinguished by the phrase in Judah from another town of that name in northern Israel), and Amaziah suffered the ignominy of defeat and capture. Jehoash then entered Jerusalem itself by breaking down about 200 yds (180 m) of the wall on the north-western side. The temple and palace treasuries can hardly have been overflowing, since Amaziah's father had emptied them of precious items to pay off Hazael (12:18). The taking of hostages would have deterred further hostilities from Judah.

Vs 15–16 repeat almost word for word the notice of Jehoash's death found in 13:12–13.

Amaziah was probably released when Jehoash withdrew, as he is not said to have been among the hostages in v 14. He cannot have been a popular king after bringing such disaster on his country, and it is surprising that he survived for at least another fifteen years (17) before being assassinated (19). The death of two generations of Judah's kings in a palace coup (though on neither occasion was there an attempt to replace the dynasty of David) provides a pale but menacing reflection of Israel's bloody dynastic changeovers. Was Judah still following in the footsteps of Israel in spite of Joash's religious reforms? The violent deaths of Joash and Amaziah raise for the first time a question which becomes a key issue in the reigns of Hezekiah and Josiah: can disaster be averted by reforming kings?

14:23–29 Jeroboam II of Israel. Only seven verses are devoted to one of Israel’s most important kings, a fact which once again illustrates the writer’s sharply focused interests. It was in the reign of Jeroboam II that the recovery begun under Jehoash reached its peak. His conquests restored all of Israel’s lost territories. The exact location of Lebo Hamath (or ‘the entrance of Hamath’, RSV) is unknown, but its significance here is that it had marked the northern limit of Solomon’s kingdom (1 Ki. 8:65). The Sea of the Arabah is the Dead Sea, the southern end of which corresponded to the southern limit of Israel’s holdings east of the Jordan (i.e. down to and including Moab).

We are told a little more of Jeroboam II’s achievements in v 28, but the crucial clause is difficult to translate. Literally it says that he ‘restored Damascus and Hamath to Judah in Israel’, which does not make sense. Various solutions have been proposed. The RSV assumes that ‘to Judah’ means that Damascus and Hamath ‘had belonged to Judah’—a reading which raises historical problems of its own. The NIV takes a similar line but prefers ‘Yaudi’ in place of ‘Judah’ (see also the NEB: ‘Damascus and Hamath in Jaudi’). Yaudi was a small state in north Syria. No solution is entirely satisfactory. But if Jeroboam II’s conquests reached as far as Damascus and Hamath, he must have restored Israel’s influence in the north to something like its Solomonic extent.

V 25b says that his achievements were prophesied by Jonah son of Amittai—the prophet of the book of Jonah. Two prophets who preached a very different message in the reign of Jeroboam II were Hosea and Amos, and their books show that beneath the military and economic recovery all was far from well in Israel.

Vs 26–27 recall God’s response in 13:4–5 and portray Jeroboam II’s victories as the continuation and climax of God’s act of deliverance. The fact that Jeroboam II walked in the sins of his earlier namesake (24) does not affect the outcome. Events are not decided by the obedience or disobedience of a king, but by the will of God.

15:1–17:41 The final decades of Israel

15:1–7 Azariah of Judah. This king’s name occurs in a confusing variety of forms: Uzziah in vs 13 and 30; Uzziahu in vs 32 and 34; Uzza in 2 Ki. 21:18.

He receives the same kind of qualified praise as his two predecessors (3–4). This time the comparison with David is omitted. The only incident singled out for mention from his long reign is his skin disease (it may not have been leprosy, for the Hebrew word covers a range of ailments). The Chronicler’s much longer account (2 Ch. 26) suggests that Azariah’s reign saw a time of revival in Judah which matched that enjoyed by Israel under Jeroboam II.

His skin disease is not specifically said to have been a punishment, though it is attributed to Yahweh. It is possible that the writer simply wanted to affirm God’s sovereignty over health and sickness and had no intention of implying retribution. On the other hand, the Chronicler gives an account in which the king’s illness is clearly a punishment (2 Ch. 26:16–21), and if this story was widely known, the writer of Kings may have considered it too familiar to need repeating.

The disease required Azariah to retire from the normal duties of a king while Jotham ruled as coregent. Perhaps his disease was more serious than Naaman’s, which did not prevent him continuing his duties at the court in Damascus. Or perhaps the special role of king was felt to be impossible for one so afflicted.

15:8–31 Israel’s slide to disaster. With the end of Jehu’s dynasty Israel entered another period of instability, like that which followed the death of Baasha. But this time there was no light at the end of the tunnel.

Zechariah, successor to the illustrious Jeroboam II, was murdered after only six months on the throne (8–10). V 12 draws attention to God's word to Jehu that his descendants would rule for four generations (2 Ki. 10:30). In the context of Zechariah's violent death, this now reads more like a threat than a promise.

Zechariah's assassin, Shallum, fared no better as king, dying at the hands of Menahem after only one month (13–14). Shallum does not even receive the writer's usual assessment of a king's conduct.

Tiphseh's refusal to open its gates to Menahem (16) meant that its people would not acknowledge him as king. (The location of this city is unknown. It is not to be confused with a place of the same name on the River Euphrates mentioned in 1 Ki. 4:24. The Greek text, followed by the RSV and NEB, has Tappuah, an Ephraimite city listed in Jos. 16:8.) The atrocity Menahem committed there was a warning to any other city which felt the same way inclined.

Menahem's popularity rating cannot have been improved by the tax which he levied in order to give a vast quantity of silver to Pul (otherwise known as Tiglath-Pileser III), king of Assyria. Although the NIV says the Assyrian king had invaded the land, the Hebrew need not mean this. Assyrian texts also refer to Menahem's payment of tribute, but there is no suggestion in them that he was forced into submission by an invasion. The statement in v 19 that he gave Tiglath-Pileser the silver to gain his support and strengthen his own hold on the kingdom suggests a different situation. Menahem submitted willingly because he needed Assyrian support against unnamed enemies. (Internal opposition is suggested by the incident at Tiphseh in v 16; or he may have been threatened by an independent kingdom arising east of the Jordan—see below on Pekah; or there may have been renewed danger from Aram.) Assyrian texts leave open two possible dates for the incident: 743 or 738 BC. The impressive initial gift would have been followed by a more modest annual tribute.

Whatever opposition Menahem may have faced, the chief cause of his unpopularity with the writer of Kings is that he adhered to the sins of Jeroboam (18).

Menahem's son Pekahiah receives the same verdict (24). His assassination after only two years (25) suggests that he enjoyed even less support than his father.

Pekah, his murderer and successor, is judged to have been no improvement as far as the sins of Jeroboam were concerned (28). The fact that he led a contingent from Gilead, east of the Jordan (25) has led some scholars to suggest that he had already established a rival kingdom there. This theory has the advantage of explaining his twenty-year reign (27), which is otherwise impossible to accommodate; it could have been reckoned from the beginning of his independent kingdom. Pekah and his supporters apparently wanted an end to Israel's subservience to Assyria. Pekah's anti-Assyrian policy explains Tiglath-Pileser's devastating campaign against Israel (29), which will be discussed further in connection with 16:7–9. Not surprisingly, the catastrophic results of Pekah's policy made him unpopular in his turn. He was assassinated by Hoshea, Israel's last king (30).

15:32–38 Jotham of Judah. Jotham receives the same faint praise as his predecessors on the throne of Judah (34–35). The only events of his reign singled out for mention are his building activity (on which 2 Ch. 27 says much more) and the attacks of Pekah and Rezin, which play a major role in the next chapter. Here (but not in ch. 16) these attacks are said to have been sent by Yahweh (37).

16:1–4 Ahaz of Judah: introduction. For the first time since the death of Athaliah the writer gives an unequivocally bad report of a king of Judah. Apart from Jehoram, Ahaz is the only king of Judah said to have walked in the ways of the kings of Israel (3). In the case of Jehoram this phrase referred specifically to the apostasy of Ahab (2 Ki. 8:18), and the same seems to be the case here, since apostasy (and even human sacrifice, never mentioned in criticizing Israel's kings) characterized Ahaz's reign.

16:5–9 Ahaz of Judah: war with Aram and Israel. Rezin is the first king of Aram to be named since Ben-Hadad, son of Hazael (13:25), who probably died around 770 BC. Rezin was on the throne in Damascus by 738, when Tiglath-Pileser III received tribute from him. Tiglath-Pileser's campaigns against Israel (15:29) and Aram (16:9) are also attested in Assyrian texts and occurred in the years 733 and 732 BC respectively.

Further light is thrown on these events by Is. 7:1–6. The picture which emerges is that Rezin and Pekah wanted to create an anti-Assyrian coalition including Judah. Unable to persuade Ahaz to join them, they proposed to remove him from the throne and replace him with their own nominee (Ben-Tabeel; Is. 7:6). Their success would have brought the Davidic dynasty to an end.

In v 6 Rezin's campaigning is said to have recovered Elath for Aram, a curious statement because Elath, at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah, is unlikely to have ever been under Aramean control. Reading 'Edom' instead of Aram (requiring a very small change to the Hebrew) would make good geographical and political sense. (The RSV makes a more drastic change, removing the reference to Rezin king of Aram altogether.)

Ahaz's response to the threat (much against the advice of Isaiah, according to Is. 7) was to appeal to Assyria for help, sending Tiglath-Pileser a gift of silver and gold from the temple and palace treasuries. By resorting to Assyrian aid Judah was following in the footsteps of Israel (cf. 2 Ki. 15:19)—a sinister development in view of Israel's eventual absorption by the Assyrian empire.

The Assyrian king's response was catastrophic for both Israel and Aram. Israel's fate is recorded in 15:29. The northern half of Pekah's territory was overrun and many of its people deported; it was then reorganized as an Assyrian province, leaving Pekah's successor on the throne of a much reduced kingdom.

16:10–20 Ahaz of Judah: the foreign altar. Ahaz's visit to Tiglath-Pileser presumably took place while the latter was reorganizing Aram as part of the Assyrian administrative system, after his conquest of Damascus in 732 BC.

There is no reason to think that Ahaz's decision to copy the altar which he saw in Damascus was an aspect of his subservience to Assyria. It does not sound like an altar of Assyrian type, and 2 Ch. 28:23 says it was for the worship of 'the gods of the kings of Aram' who had shown themselves powerful over Israel in the past. In short, the introduction of such an altar into the Jerusalem temple simply illustrates the irresistible attraction which foreign deities held for Ahaz. The compliance of Uriah the priest (10, 15, 16) shows that he was either as apostate as the king or else in a subservient role which allowed no open resistance. The latter seems the more likely, since he later had the approval of Isaiah (Is. 8:2).

The Assyrian Empire in the ninth to seventh centuries BC.

Vs 17–18 list other changes which Ahaz introduced in the temple, and the last is said to have been in deference to the king of Assyria (18). The exact meaning is unclear. There is no reason to think that Tiglath-Pileser III forced Assyrian religious practices on Ahaz, or that he required him to suppress Judah's national religion. Perhaps the royal entrance outside the temple (RSV: 'the outer entrance for the king') symbolized a link between the king and the cult of Yahweh which was for some reason unacceptable to the Assyrian overlord.

17:1–6 The end of Israel. We know from Assyrian texts that Hoshea was appointed king (or at least confirmed on the throne) by Tiglath-Pileser III. He therefore began his reign as an Assyrian puppet-king and vassal.

He is said (2) to have been not so bad as his predecessors on the throne of Israel—a verdict which compares him favourably with Ahaz of Judah, in view of 16:3. It is therefore ironic that his reign ended with Israel's destruction.

Hoshea brought down the wrath of Assyria by withholding the annual tribute and negotiating an alliance with Egypt (4). The identity of So king of Egypt is uncertain. (He may have been the Libyan pharaoh Osorkon IV. An alternative rendering would make So a place name: '... to So [perhaps Sais?], to the king of Egypt'.) However, Egypt at this time was too weak to provide effective support, and Hoshea's bid for independence proved as catastrophic as the earlier one by Pekah.

By this time, Tiglath-Pileser III had been succeeded by his son Shalmaneser V (726–722 BC), who is said in v 4 to have seized Hoshea and imprisoned him. Since this is unlikely to have happened before the invasion and siege of Samaria reported in v 5, events are probably not related in chronological order. The three-year siege must have brought famine and its attendant horrors (as in 2 Ki. 6:24–30), but we are spared the harrowing details. Twice before Samaria had been besieged and saved (1 Ki. 20; 2 Ki. 6:24–7:20), but this time there was to be no help. The city fell in 722 BC, at about the time of Shalmaneser V's death. In Assyrian sources Sargon II, his brother and successor, claims credit for the city's capture. Those deported (6) were numbered by Sargon at 27,290. This figure seems too large for Samaria alone and probably includes people from other cities of Israel. The deportees were resettled in distant parts of the Assyrian empire (6), not all of which can be located with confidence.

17:7–23 Theological summary of Israel's history. The slight improvement of Hoshea over his predecessors is here set off against the recurring sins of Israel which made their disaster inevitable. Following the practices of the nations the LORD had driven out (8) is expressly forbidden in Lv. 18:3, 24–28, where exile is predicted as the consequence of disobedience. The high places (9–11) were elsewhere places of worship which, in the writer's view, lacked legitimacy, especially after the building of the temple in Jerusalem. However, they were not places where idolatry was practised (e.g. 1 Ki. 3:3–4). Here the picture is different; the writer criticizes the building of high places for the worship of foreign deities. V 12 refers to the commandment against idolatry (Ex. 20:4–5).

V 13 summarizes the message of Yahweh through his prophets to both Israel and Judah. It is therefore likely that the plural verbs which follow in vs 14–17 (they would not listen, they rejected, they followed, they forsook, etc.) have Judah in mind as well as Israel. Indeed, the practice of human sacrifice (17) is only reported of Ahaz (16:3) and Manasseh (21:6), kings of Judah. However, the focus in v 16 is certainly on Israel, for it refers to Jeroboam's calves (1 Ki. 12:28–30).

When God is spoken of as removing his people from his presence (18, 20) the reference is to their being driven from the land. This is not because the writer thought of Yahweh as somehow restricted to the land of Israel, but because he regarded the land as the primary arena in which Yahweh's purposes for his people were fulfilled. Judah explicitly re-enters the picture in vs 19–20, and the expression all the people of Israel in v 20 clearly includes Judah (i.e. all the tribes descended from the ancestor Israel/Jacob). The passage compares the two kingdoms and thereby anticipates Judah's own exile.

The final summary (21–23) traces Israel's disaster back to the sins of Jeroboam and thereby recalls Ahijah's prophecy that exile would be the ultimate outcome of Jeroboam's actions (1 Ki. 14:15–16).

17:24–34a Subsequent events in Samaria. V 4 should not be understood to mean that Israelites were replaced by foreigners throughout the land. The number of Israelite deportees given by Sargon (see above on 17:6) cannot have been all or even the bulk of Israel's population. What v 4 describes is the replacement of Israelites with foreigners at Samaria and other selected towns. It was normal Assyrian practice to replace deported populations with groups from other parts of the empire. The purpose was to dilute nationalistic feeling and so make revolt less likely.

The cause-and-effect connections assumed in v 26 may sound crude and superstitious, but they are shared by the writer in v 25. As always he wishes to affirm Yahweh's sovereignty over historical events and to discern his purpose. In view of the writer's previous criticisms of religious practices in Israel, we might expect the priest sent back from exile to have been apostate. However, there is no hint of this in the account, and he is not blamed for the failure of the exercise. Indeed, the failure was only partial, for the foreign populations adopted the worship of Yahweh although they did not abandon their earlier idolatry (33). Like the Israelites in the time of Elijah, they covered all their options by worshipping Yahweh as well as their traditional gods (see the comment on 1 Ki. 18:21).

Although some translations (RSV, NEB) refer to 'the Samaritans' in v 29, the NIV is correct to prefer the people of Samaria. There is no evidence for any connection between the idolaters mentioned in this verse and the later (strictly monotheistic) sect of the Samaritans whom we meet in the NT. The Jewish historian Josephus, writing in the first century AD, for a long time influenced the translation and interpretation of this whole passage by claiming that the Samaritans of his own day were descended from the foreigners imported by Assyria (Ant. IX, 14, iii). His claim was historically unfounded and simply reflected the anti-Samaritan prejudice of his time. But in any case the people of Samaria in v 29 are not the imported foreigners but the Israelite inhabitants whose shrines the foreigners took over.

17:34b–41 Final comment on Israel. Although it is usual to translate v 34 as though it begins a further comment (continuing to v 41) on the imported population of the north, there is good reason to see here a transition to another subject. The first part of the verse certainly continues from v 33 (To this day they persist in their former practices), but it is better to translate the second part as beginning: 'No-one has worshipped the LORD (alone), nor adhered to the decrees ...' etc. The thought expressed here is that the foreigners who settled in the north were not unique in failing to worship Yahweh exclusively, for no-one, not even the descendants of Jacob, whom he named Israel, managed to do that. Vs 35–39 paraphrase the requirements of Yahweh's covenant with Israel (echoing parts of Dt. 4–6). As in v 20 it is all Jacob's descendants who are in view here, and therefore vs 40–41 include Judah as well as Israel in the condemnation of those who failed to keep the covenant requirements and whose descendants still fail to keep them to this day.

The comparisons between Israel and Judah which we meet in this chapter (here and in vs 19–20) foreshadow the latter's own impending disaster.

18:1–25:30 Judah alone

18:1–20:21 Hezekiah

18:1–8 Introduction. The previous chapter sounded an ominous note for Judah, for it carried strong implications that Judah would suffer the same fate as Israel. Here, however, the possibility of disaster seems to recede. Hezekiah reversed the policies of his father and led Judah back from the path of idolatry. Not only were the trappings of foreign worship removed, but even the bronze snake which Moses had made in the wilderness (Nu. 21:8–9) was disposed of because it had become an object of misguided reverence (4). The danger is understandable in the light of archaeological finds which show snakes to have been important symbols in the Canaanite fertility cult.

Hezekiah is the first king since Asa of whom it is said that he did what was right in the eyes of Yahweh as his father David had done (3; cf. 1 Ki. 15:11). Moreover, he was the first king to have removed the high places (4). Indeed, his unswerving trust and faithfulness receive unequivocal praise (5–6). We will see, however, that this generous assessment is modified slightly in ch. 20.

In the summary of Hezekiah's reign his rebellion against Assyria receives special mention (7). The bulk of the three chapters devoted to his reign is spent describing the consequences of this rebellion (18:13–19:37). His campaign against the Philistines (8) should be understood as an aspect of his anti-Assyrian stance. Gaza had been conquered by Sargon II, and Hezekiah's campaign, which extended as far as Gaza and its territory, was probably aimed at weakening Assyria's hold on the area. If so, it was probably undertaken soon after Sargon's death in 705 BC, before his successor, Sennacherib, had established a firm control over the empire.

18:9–12 Assyria against Israel. These verses appear at first to be a pointless repeat of ch. 17. However, here the events are dated according to the regnal years of Hezekiah (9, 10). The result is to invite the reader to compare and contrast the Assyrian invasion of Israel with the Assyrian invasion of Judah reported in vs 13 onwards. Thus the two accounts begin in similar words, literally: 'In the fourth year of king Hezekiah (which was the seventh year of Hoshea son of Elah king of Israel), Shalmaneser king of Assyria came up against Samaria ...' (9); 'In the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah, Sennacherib king of Assyria came up against all the fortified cities of Judah ...' (13). Hoshea was a slightly better king than his predecessors (17:2), but his rebellion against Assyria led to the destruction of Israel. Hezekiah was a much better king than Ahaz, and Judah survived his rebellion against Assyria—but only just, as we see below.

The chronological notices given in vs 9 and 10 are at odds with that in v 13. If the fall of Samaria in 722 BC occurred in Hezekiah's sixth year (10), then Hezekiah must have come to the throne around 728 BC. His fourteenth year (13) would then have been 715 BC, but we know that Sennacherib's campaign against Judah, recorded in Assyrian texts, occurred in 701 BC. Various solutions have been proposed, some assuming scribal errors, some involving coregencies. This is but one example of the complexities which the biblical synchronisms often present us with.

18:13–37 Assyria against Judah. Hezekiah's response to Sennacherib's attack seems to have been instant recapitulation accompanied by the payment of hefty tribute (14–16). However, in v 17 we find Jerusalem under threat once again. Some scholars have supposed that two different Assyrian campaigns are related here: vs 13–16 record the events of 701 BC, while vs 17 onwards refer to a later campaign (perhaps to be dated around 688 BC) of which we have no Assyrian record. An alternative is to assume that Sennacherib, having exacted tribute from Hezekiah, went on to press for the complete surrender of Jerusalem. This would compare with Ben-Hadad's increasingly severe demands on Ahab at the first siege of Samaria (1 Ki. 20:1–11). And just as Ahab drew the line and decided to resist, so Hezekiah refused to surrender the city.

Three high-ranking military officials were sent to Jerusalem from Lachish (17), which they were besieging (2 Ch. 32:9; the siege is known also from a series of impressive Assyrian reliefs found in the ruins of Sennacherib's palace at Nineveh, and its devastating effects are clearly attested by archaeological finds at Lachish itself). Three equally high-ranking officials of Hezekiah's court went out to the city walls to hear Sennacherib's message (18), which was delivered by the Assyrian field commander (19; the NEB has 'the chief officer'; lit. 'the Rabshakeh' as in the RSV).

The commander's speech repeatedly uses the Hebrew for 'trust(ing)' (RSV 'rely[ing]'; NIV 'depend[ing]'; it also occurs in his opening words in v 19, though English translations obscure it). This is the theme of the whole speech: in whom does Jerusalem place its trust? The commander cleverly discounts all conceivable objects of trust, thus showing Jerusalem to be without defence. Egypt is dismissed with the striking image of a reed which, because it is broken, damages the hand which leans on it for support (21). Isaiah also criticizes reliance on Egypt (Is. 30:1–5; 31:1–3), but his alternative is to 'seek help from the LORD' (Is. 31:1). The commander goes on to dismiss Yahweh as a possible source of help, not by claiming that Yahweh is weak or non-existent, but much more cleverly by suggesting that Yahweh will not respond because Hezekiah has removed the high places where he was worshipped (22). The exact logic of the argument in vs 23–24 is difficult to follow, but the gist is clear enough: Judah's army is too depleted to field an effective cavalry force, even if Sennacherib himself should supply the horses! Finally he returns to the idea that Hezekiah's reforms have offended Yahweh, claiming that Assyria has come to destroy Judah at Yahweh's own command (25).

The commander's logic is compelling and crushing: Egypt is too weak to help, Judah's own military force is useless and Yahweh has turned against his people; there is no-one from whom Hezekiah could expect help. It is not surprising that the officials of Judah ask the commander to speak in Aramaic (the language of international diplomacy) instead of Hebrew (26); they are afraid that his words will undermine morale in the city. The commander refuses, for his words are intended for everyone. In v 27 he gives a brief but vivid reminder of the horrors of starvation which are in store for the besieged city. Then he addresses the people directly (28–35), encouraging desertion with his promise of the good life for those who surrender willingly (31–32). He also returns to the religious aspect (33–35), but here with a different logic: the gods of other cities have not been able to save their people from Assyria's might, so how could Yahweh save Jerusalem? However, the context of the rest of the books of Kings undermines his logic, for it contains ample evidence that Yahweh is not like any other god.

The three officials of Judah returned to Hezekiah with their clothes torn as a sign of mourning and distress (cf. 2 Ki. 6:30).

19:1–7 Isaiah. On receiving the message, Hezekiah too tore his clothes and donned sackcloth; in v 2 we find the officials and leading priests also wearing sackcloth—an indication of the desperate straits Jerusalem was in (on the significance of sackcloth see the note on 2 Ki. 6:30). The point of the message to Isaiah was to ask him to pray for the remnant that still survives (4). Intercession was a traditional role among Israel's prophets (see Ex. 32:30–32; Je. 7:16; 15:1). The reference to a remnant reminds us that Judah's fortified cities were falling to Sennacherib's forces (18:13) and Jerusalem was becoming increasingly isolated (see Is. 1:7–9, which probably describes this time). Hezekiah pinned his hope on the fact that Sennacherib's message had ridiculed the living God; perhaps God had heard and would act to rebuke him (4).

The theme of ‘hearing’ recurs throughout the first twenty verses of this chapter. Hezekiah hears Sennacherib’s message (1); he hopes that Yahweh will hear the blasphemy (4); Isaiah tells him not to be afraid of what he has heard (6); Sennacherib will hear a certain report (7); the field commander hears that the king has moved on from Lachish (8); Sennacherib hears of Tirhakah’s advance (9); surely Hezekiah has heard what the kings of Assyria have done to other countries? (11). At the climax of the sequence Isaiah assures Hezekiah that Yahweh had heard his prayer (20).

The prophet Isaiah introduces the word of Yahweh into the situation (6), and the conflict moves on to a new level. Now, to set against the word of the great king, the king of Assyria (18:28) we have the word of the true Great King, the God of Israel. Isaiah’s first prophecy was brief and to the point; Hezekiah was not to fear; God was sovereign over Sennacherib’s actions and would cause him to return to his own land where he would be murdered. What is not clear is how this prophecy related to events as they actually unfolded. The certain report (7) would seem to be the news of Tirhakah’s advance (9), but the latter did not by itself cause Sennacherib to return to Assyria. The ultimate cause of Sennacherib’s discomfiture (35–36) is not mentioned here.

19:8–19 A letter and a prayer. The field commander’s withdrawal (8) anticipates in miniature the prophecy’s fulfilment: on hearing news of Sennacherib’s progress he returns to him. He could not, of course, have withdrawn all his forces from Jerusalem, otherwise the city would have been able to replenish its supplies of food. We must therefore suppose that he left a sizeable force outside Jerusalem while he returned to inform Sennacherib of the continuing stalemate. If Libnah is to be identified with the site of Tell Bornat, it lay north of Lachish, and Sennacherib’s move represents the advance of his main force towards Jerusalem. His departure from Lachish must have followed the successful completion of the siege there.

The Hebrew text of v 9 speaks literally of ‘Tirhakah king of Cush’. The biblical Cush corresponds to the land immediately south of Egypt, i.e. modern Nubia or northern Sudan (not strictly ‘Ethiopia’ as in the RSV). In 701 BC the Cushite Twenty-fifth Dynasty ruled both Cush and Egypt. The biblical Tirhakah is Taharqa, penultimate ruler of that dynasty, who ruled 690–664 BC. The title king which he bears in this verse was therefore given to him in retrospect, for in 701 BC he was only a prince, heading an expedition for his brother Pharaoh Shebitku.

News of Tirhakah’s approach prompted a further message from Sennacherib to Hezekiah. Sennacherib must now have been anxious to bring Jerusalem to heel quickly so that he could reunite his army in the south to meet Tirhakah’s forces. Although this message is similar to vs 33–35 it has a new twist. Sennacherib seems to have been aware of the essence of Isaiah’s prophecy, for he refers to it (10). He does not deny that Yahweh exists or that he has spoken through his prophet; he simply brands Yahweh a liar! A further list of defeated cities illustrates the point that Assyria is invincible (11–13).

Hezekiah received this latest message in the form of a letter, which he took into the temple. He intended to bring its blasphemous contents to Yahweh’s attention (16). His prayer began with an acknowledgment that although Yahweh was enthroned between the cherubim in Jerusalem’s temple, his presence and power were in no way limited. He was God over all the kingdoms of the earth and was the maker of heaven and earth (15). He also acknowledged that Sennacherib’s boasting contained much truth: many peoples had indeed been conquered and their gods destroyed (17–18). But they were not true gods. He asked Yahweh to demonstrate to the world that he was the unique Creator and Sovereign by delivering Jerusalem (19).

19:20–34 Isaiah again. In contrast to his first, Isaiah's second prophecy is lengthy and in poetic form. After the opening statement assuring Hezekiah that God has heard his prayer, we have a prophecy in three parts.

The first part (21–28) is addressed to Sennacherib. The population (Daughter) of Jerusalem is depicted mocking him as he flees (21). He is accused of blaspheming Israel's God, not merely by his recent words but by claiming the credit for Assyria's widespread conquests (22–24). The truth he cannot acknowledge is that Yahweh himself ordained those conquests (25–26). Sennacherib's error is to think that he, and not Yahweh, is the shaper of world events. He has usurped God's place by claiming supreme power and demanding total allegiance. Now, because of his insolence, Yahweh will turn him back (27–28). Many of the same themes also occur in Is. 10:5–19.

The second part (29–31) is addressed to Hezekiah. Although Jerusalem will suffer the effects of the Assyrian siege, her recovery will follow. This would be a sign for Hezekiah (29), i.e. something in which he will clearly discern God's hand. The concluding phrase also occurs at the end of Is. 9:7.

The third part (32–34) concerns the fate of Sennacherib's campaign. The siege will not culminate in an assault on Jerusalem. Normally a siege by the Assyrian army ended with an assault on the target city. As a first step the Assyrians built siege ramps to enable battering rams to be brought against the walls, and while the ramps were being constructed archers provided covering fire from behind shields. These are the activities referred to in v 32. They will not be carried out because Sennacherib will return home. God's ultimate reason for saving Jerusalem is not Sennacherib's blasphemy nor even Hezekiah's own piety and prayers, but his own glory and his promise to David of an everlasting dynasty (34).

19:35–37 Sennacherib's fate. The sudden death of 185,000 troops is described laconically and in miraculous terms. The number is very high for only one section of the invading army, and perhaps we are meant to understand that the calamity was not limited to that force encamped outside Jerusalem but affected Sennacherib's forces throughout Judah. Not surprisingly, the humiliating disaster is not reported in the Assyrian account of the campaign. Sennacherib's version of events, found in two inscriptions, majors on the fact that he successfully brought the rebellion to an end and passes over his failure to capture Jerusalem. It ends on a positive note with receipt in Nineveh of the tribute mentioned in 18:14. When commemorating the campaign in sculptured reliefs, Sennacherib chose to highlight his successful siege of Lachish.

His assassination (37), fulfilling Isaiah's earlier prophecy (7), occurred in 681 BC. It is referred to in an Assyrian text but the details remain obscure.

20:1–11 Illness and recovery. The dating of Hezekiah's illness in v 1 (In those days ...) is vague, simply suggesting a time near to Sennacherib's invasion of Judah. But a clearer chronology is provided by v 6: the promise of fifteen more years of life points to the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's twenty-nine-year reign (18:2), which was also the year of Sennacherib's invasion (18:13); and the promise of the city's deliverance indicates a time before rather than after the events of ch. 19. In short, events are not related in chronological order in these chapters. The reason seems to be that this incident and the one that followed (12–19) did not show Hezekiah in a very good light. They are deliberately separated from the rest in order to provide a contrast with the picture in chs. 18–19. And they are placed here rather than earlier because they provide a bridge to the reign of Manasseh and its consequences.

In the fourteenth year of his reign Hezekiah was only thirty-nine years old (18:2), and the news of his impending death must have been a terrible blow (20:1). But his reaction does not reflect well on his piety when compared with his reaction to the Assyrian threat. In 19:15–19 his prayer affirmed God’s sovereignty and desired God’s glory, but here he appeals to his own devotion (3). God responded with mercy and sent Isaiah with a double promise of healing and deliverance, but this would be for my sake and for the sake of my servant David (6; note the similarity to 19:34) not because of Hezekiah’s piety. The prophecy was worded in such a way as to correct Hezekiah’s attitude. The earlier reference to David as Hezekiah’s ancestor (5) also served to remind him of his context in the dynasty promised by God.

The use of a poultice of figs for the king’s skin disorder (7) is typical of the practices of ancient ‘folk medicine’. It would therefore be surprising if such treatment had not been tried on Hezekiah earlier. Perhaps we should assume that it had, but that it was ineffective until Isaiah delivered God’s promise of recovery.

Hezekiah’s request for a sign provides a further unfavourable comparison with the previous portrayal of his faith. Recovery within three days should have been sign enough that God would grant him another fifteen years of life. But Hezekiah wanted a sign to confirm the sign! The exact nature of the sign which followed is difficult to understand because the type of structure on which the shadow fell is not clear. The RSV refers to ‘the dial of Ahaz’ (11), assuming that the shadow moved back ten divisions on a time-keeping device. However, the reference is probably to steps on a stairway (NIV, NEB). Given a choice, Hezekiah opted for the more remarkable of the two signs on offer (9–10) and received it (11). Speculation on how the sign was effected has not produced a satisfactory answer.

20:12–19 Envoys from Merodach-Baladan. Merodach-Baladan (Marduk-aplaiddina in Babylonian texts) ruled Babylon independently for much of the period 721–709 BC. He was then banished by Sargon II, but on Sargon’s death in 705 BC he began to work towards Babylonian independence again. He regained the throne briefly in 703–702 BC but was finally expelled from Babylon by Sennacherib and fled into exile in south-western Elam. The embassy to Hezekiah was doubtless part of his attempt to find western allies in his bid to throw off the Assyrian yoke. The visit would fit well in the context of Merodach-Baladan’s brief revival in 703–702 BC. Since the immediate reason for the visit was Hezekiah’s illness (12) this would imply that Hezekiah was ill for one or two years. This is a possible reconstruction of events. However, the parallel account in Is. 39:1 places the embassy after Hezekiah’s recovery, i.e. in or soon after 701 BC (see above on vs 1–11). Although Merodach-Baladan was in exile by then, it is conceivable that he was still trying to influence events from behind the scenes. The chronological uncertainties cannot be resolved on present evidence.

Hezekiah’s willingness to let the envoys see his supplies and armoury (13) implies his readiness to form an alliance with Merodach-Baladan. Since Isaiah was strongly opposed to foreign alliances (see Is. 30:1–5; 31:1–3) his powerful denunciation of the move (16–18) is entirely consistent. He predicted the day when Babylon would become an enemy, carrying away wealth and people. Hezekiah’s response (19) was self-centred and unrepentant. He took comfort from the fact that Isaiah had spoken of disaster coming in the time of his descendants and not in his own reign. His assumption that there would be peace and security in my lifetime may also reflect satisfaction with the alliance he had made.

The chapter thus ends on a note of profound tragedy: Judah’s greatest reformer so far receives warning of his kingdom’s downfall and exile, and we are offered no hope that repentance might avert it.

20:20–21 Conclusion. Among Hezekiah's other achievements the pool and the tunnel by which water was brought into the city are singled out for mention. The project is also referred to, with some geographical details, in 2 Ch. 32:30. It was probably part of the preparations for Sennacherib's siege, designed to provide a reliable water-supply that was only accessible from inside the city (see also 2 Ch. 32:2–4).

21:1–26 Reversal under Manasseh and Amon

21:1–18 Manasseh. Manasseh reverted to the ways of his grandfather Ahaz, wiping out the reforms of Hezekiah as though they had never been. The high places were re-established, the cults of Baal and Asherah flourished as they did in Ahab's Israel and the temple was defiled with altars to the gods of the stars. Human sacrifice and other abominable practices were introduced. The remark that all this evil provoked Yahweh to anger (6) sounds an ominous note, and prospects grow even darker with the conditional promise quoted in vs 7–8. Since the condition of loyalty to the law of Moses has clearly been broken, the promise that the Israelites' feet will no more wander from the land is now seriously in doubt.

Vs 10–15 summarize the message of anonymous prophets of Manasseh's reign, and Judah's fate is predicted in stark and unequivocal terms. Jerusalem will be judged by the same standard as Samaria (13). The reference to the house of Ahab picks up the comparison between Ahab and Manasseh suggests in v 3. Judgment will be complete, symbolized by the vivid image of the bowl wiped clean. The remnant of my inheritance (14) may mean Judah after the fall of Israel, but more probably it refers to the reduced population of Judah after Sennacherib's campaign. The forsaking and handing over of this remnant mark the end of God's special care for his people. The evils of Manasseh's reign are merely the latest resurgence of a disobedience which has proved endemic (15). In these verses the picture of coming disaster sketched briefly by Isaiah (20:17–18) takes on tragic dimensions.

The shedding of innocent blood (16) may indicate the persecution of those who opposed Manasseh's policies, just as Yahweh's prophets were killed during the reign of Ahab and Jezebel.

The garden of Uzza in which Manasseh was buried was probably an extension of the royal burial ground, created by Azariah/Uzziah ('Uzza' being a shortened form of his name).

21:19–26 Amon. Amon continued in the ways of his father and his only distinction is that he was assassinated (23). The meaning of the phrase the people of the land is uncertain; it may indicate a particular section of society rather than the people as a whole. This group fervently supported the restoration of the Davidic dynasty in the time of Athaliah (2 Ki. 11:14). Here they executed Amon's assassins and made his eight-year-old son king in his place (24; cf. 22:1). Amon had the same burial-place as his father (26).

22:1–23:30 Josiah

22:1–20 The Book of the Law found. After two appalling reigns we again meet a king who measures up to the standard set by David (2).

In vs 3–7 we find a programme of temple renovation in progress, reminiscent of that carried out by Joash (2 Ki. 12). On that previous occasion the repairs were needed because parts of the temple had been taken over for foreign practices in the reign of Athaliah. The abuse of the temple in the reigns of Manasseh and Amon provides a logical explanation for Josiah's activities.

In course of the renovations the Book of the Law was found in the temple by the high priest Hilkiah (8). When Josiah heard the contents of this book read out, his reaction was one of intense distress (10–11). As a result he introduced the measures described in ch. 23. However, it would be a mistake to conclude from this that Josiah became a reformer because of the discovery of the Book of the Law in his eighteenth year. The repairs to the temple suggest that religious reforms were already under way when the book was found, and the Chronicler's account confirms this (2 Ch. 34:3–7). In view of what follows most scholars agree that the Book of the Law was closely related to the book of Deuteronomy, if not identical with it.

Josiah's reaction showed that the contents of the book were very serious indeed. Its demands had not been met and the king feared the consequences (13). Ordered to enquire of the LORD, the high priest, secretary and attendant resorted to Huldah the prophetess, on whom these verses are our only source of information. She lived in the Second District of Jerusalem (14; lit. 'in the Mishneh'), probably the area north of the old city of David, a sector which had grown up around Solomon's temple and palace complex. The location and her marriage to a court official (14) indicate that she was herself part of the court establishment.

Huldah gave only cold comfort. She confirmed Josiah's own conclusion that Yahweh's anger was against Judah because the demands of the book had been ignored. (It would have been no defence to argue that the book had not been obeyed because it had been lost; the book had become lost in the first place because it had ceased to be important, presumably in the reign of Manasseh.) She twice spoke of looming disaster, apparently inevitable (16, 20). But Josiah would be spared the anguish of seeing it because of the depth of his own response to the book's demands (19–20).

23:1–3 The covenant renewed. Josiah assembles representatives of the whole people for a public reading of the book. Elders (1) were originally Israel's family chiefs, but by the late monarchy the term may have been used for any civic leaders. The religious establishment was represented by the priests and prophets (2). The book is now referred to as the Book of the Covenant because the reading of its contents is followed by king and people renewing their commitment to the words of the covenant written in this book (3). The requirements of this covenant are also referred to as Yahweh's commands, regulations and decrees, words used repeatedly in Deuteronomy (e.g. Dt. 6:17) to describe the laws of the covenant which God made with Israel at Sinai. In short, Josiah presides over nothing less than a renewal of the Mosaic covenant. He stands by the pillar (3), the location in which Judah's kings traditionally stood at their anointing (2 Ki. 11:14). The position probably signifies his dual role as leader and fellow-member of the covenant people (see 2 Ki. 11:17).

23:4–20 Reforms. These verses catalogue the removal and destruction of all the paraphernalia of the idolatrous practices introduced by Manasseh. The fact that the report of this follows the renewal of the covenant implies that all these actions were carried out in response to the lawbook. However, several of them involved the temple precincts (4, 6, 7, 11, 12), which were already being renovated when the book was found. It therefore seems likely that the writer has put together reforms which occurred both before and after the discovery of the lawbook (a view supported by 2 Ch. 34:3–7).

Some of the items burnt must have been made of metal or stone, so the burning was in some cases symbolic rather than destructive, as was the removal of ashes to Bethel (4) and the scattering of the dust of the Asherah pole over tombs in the Kidron Valley (6—so that even the dust would be defiled?).

It is not clear what action Josiah took against the idolatrous priests of Judah's high places in v 5. The verb (did away with in the NIV) may mean simply that he deposed them, or it could mean that he destroyed them. He certainly took the latter step with the priests of Samaria's high places (20). However, since v 5 does not use the same explicit verb as v 20, it is better to assume that they were merely deposed. These idolatrous priests were not the same as the priests of the high places referred to in vs 8–9. The Hebrew noun used in v 5 refers specifically to priests of foreign deities (pagan priests), and this is not employed in vs 8–9. The priests in the latter verses were priests of Yahweh who had officiated at the high places rather than in Jerusalem. V 9 is obscure but probably means (as in the NIV) that after being brought to Jerusalem they ate with the other priests there (lit. 'their brethren'), but did not take part in the temple sacrifices.

The kings of Judah in vs 5 and 12 are probably Manasseh and Amon, though it is also possible that earlier kings are referred to. Hezekiah's reforms may not have been far-reaching enough to remove all the abuses introduced before his reign; see below on vs 13–14.

Localities associated with idolatry were desecrated to deter their use for such purposes again. This was done at the high places throughout Judah (8) and at Topheth, a shrine located in the valley which bounded Jerusalem on the south (10). Jeremiah also refers to Topheth (the name seems to mean 'fireplace') as a place where human sacrifices occurred (Je. 7:31). The high places set up by Solomon on the hill east of Jerusalem were also defiled (13–14). Josiah's reforms must have been more thoroughgoing than any previous ones, for earlier reforming kings had evidently left the sacred stones and images of Asherah in place at these sites (14).

In vs 15–20 we find the reforms extended to parts of the old territory of the northern tribes. Since 721 BC, following the fall of Samaria, this area had been administered as a province of the Assyrian Empire. According to 2 Ch. 34:6 the reforms reached as far north as the tribal district of Naphtali, in the region which had become an Assyrian province in 732 BC. The reason Josiah was able to interfere in these areas without provoking the Assyrians is that from about 630 BC the Assyrian Empire began to crumble and its hold on its western provinces loosened. The Chronicler dates Josiah's measures in the north to his twelfth year (2 Ch. 34:3), i.e. 629/628 BC. At around that time Judah itself must have ceased to be a vassal of Assyria, gaining its freedom by default.

This part of the account focuses on Josiah's activities at Bethel, emphasizing his fulfilment of the words the man of God had spoken in the days of Jeroboam (1 Ki. 13). We are specifically reminded of the incident involving the man of God in vs 17–18. Josiah's other actions in the north are only mentioned in summary (19–20).

23:21–23 Passover celebrated. Josiah's Passover was not simply a jamboree to celebrate his reforms. The Passover itself was observed in obedience to the Book of the Covenant (21). These verses do not mean that no Passover had been celebrated at all during the Judges period or the monarchy; the point is rather that Josiah's Passover was unique in its scope and the way it was observed. Instead of the family festival celebrated at home, as envisaged in Ex. 12–13, Josiah held a national festival focused on Jerusalem, in keeping with Dt. 16:1–8. (According to 2 Ch. 30 Hezekiah had held a national Passover festival in Jerusalem, but that had been somewhat irregular since it had taken place in the second month instead of the first.)

23:24–27 Disaster not averted. Further reforms (specifically reversing trends introduced by Manasseh; cf. 22:6) are summarized, with emphasis on obedience to the requirements of the lawbook. Josiah's unique faithfulness is praised in terms reminiscent of those used of Hezekiah (25; cf. 18:5). Indeed the two verses would be contradictory if they were meant to be taken literally. But they are simply using similar hyperbolic expressions to lavish high praise on the two kings who came closest to the writer's ideal.

However, the disaster prophesied in 21:10–15 and confirmed by Huldah in 22:15–20 is once more reiterated. The momentum of sin and judgment unleashed by Manasseh was unstoppable. The fate of Israel now approached for Judah also.

23:28–30 Death of Josiah. None of Judah's reforming kings has a story which ends happily. Joash was assassinated (12:20), as was his son Amaziah who followed in his footsteps (14:19). Hezekiah received Isaiah's ominous warning of exile for Judah (20:16–18), and Josiah met sudden death on the battlefield. Huldah's prophecy (22:20) had emphasized that Josiah would not live to see the tragic downfall of Judah and had contained no hint of his own violent end. The account of his death therefore comes as a shock, all the more so because of its terseness and its context in the concluding formula for his reign (compare the note of Joash's assassination in 12:20).

The year was 609 BC, and the political context was the last days of Assyria. The Assyrian cities of Assur and Nineveh had already fallen to the Babylonians and Medes, and Assyria's last king, Ashurballit, had fled to Harran in north-west Mesopotamia. Preferring Assyria to a new and unknown potential enemy (Babylonia), Neco of Egypt set out to aid Ashurballit against further attacks. Josiah wanted no resurgence of Assyrian power and therefore tried to stop the Egyptian army as it marched north through Palestine. He died in the attempt, but his intervention may have delayed Neco long enough to influence the outcome. Harran fell to the Babylonians and their allies and Assyria was no more.

23:31–25:30 The end of Judah

23:31–34 Jehoahaz. The three-month reign of Jehoahaz probably began a reversal of his father's reforms, for he did evil in the eyes of the LORD (32). But with Assyria gone, Neco of Egypt took the opportunity to seize control of Syria-Palestine. After his abortive attempt to save Harran, Neco had established a base at Riblah on the River Orontes in Syria. While there he deposed Jehoahaz and laid Judah under tribute (33). Jehoahaz was later taken to Egypt where he died (34)—as predicted by Jeremiah (Je. 22:11–12, where he is called Shallum, indicating that Jehoahaz was his throne-name). His brother Eliakim became king in his place, taking the throne-name Jehoiakim (34).

23:35–24:7 Jehoiakim. Jehoiakim came to the throne as an Egyptian vassal required to pay an annual tribute. The verb used for the exaction of silver and gold from the people (23:35) is a strong one implying stern and oppressive measures. Jehoiakim continued the evils begun in his brother's reign (23:37) and is strongly condemned by Jeremiah (Je. 22:13–23). His determined opposition to Yahweh's prophets (Je. 26:20–23; 36:1–32) may indicate apostasy, but the sin of which he is specifically charged is the promotion of social injustice (Je. 22:13–17).

Egyptian control of Judah lasted only four years, for in 605 BC the Egyptians were defeated in a battle at Carchemish by the Babylonians. Carchemish on the Euphrates had been an Egyptian outpost since 609 BC. Neco's forces were soundly defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, crown prince of Babylon, and Egypt lost control of Syria-Palestine (24:7; see also Je. 46:2). In the same year the Babylonian king Nabopolassar died and Nebuchadnezzar succeeded to the throne. Hence we meet him as king of Babylon in 24:1.

Jehoiakim probably became his vassal (24:1) in 605 BC in the immediate aftermath of Nebuchadnezzar's victory at Carchemish. (An alternative would be 604/603 BC when Nebuchadnezzar again marched into Palestine.) Thus Judah exchanged an Egyptian overlord for a Babylonian one.

The attacks on Judah mentioned in 24:2 were probably by mercenaries acting for Nebuchadnezzar after Jehoiakim had rebelled (1). But while we may find a political explanation for this turn of events, the writer has no doubt that it was Yahweh who sent them to destroy Judah in fulfilment of the earlier prophetic message (2–4). Although Judah's destruction still lay some twelve years in the future, the writer sees this as the beginning of an inexorable train of events.

The Babylonian Empire at its height in the seventh century BC.

24:8–17 Jehoiachin: the first siege and deportation. Like his uncle Jehoahaz, Jehoiachin reigned for only three months. On him fell the full force of Nebuchadnezzar's response to his father's rebellion (24:1). He too did evil in the eyes of the LORD (9), presumably continuing the oppressive and unjust policies of Jehoiakim.

His short reign was entirely taken up by the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem, which began towards the end of 598 BC and lasted until February 597 BC (dates provided by the Babylonian Chronicle). After surrendering (12) Jehoiachin was taken prisoner and deported to Babylon (15), as Jeremiah had predicted (Je. 22:24–28). Other members of the royal family and the leading officials of Judah were also exiled.

The craftsmen and artisans ('craftsmen and smiths', RSV) mentioned in vs 14 and 16 were probably army personnel, since they are included among those who were fit for war in v 16 (though the NIV obscures this fact). A better translation might be 'military engineers and sappers' (i.e. builders of siege ramps and towers, and diggers of siege tunnels). In which case, v 14 refers only to military personnel and gives their total as 10,000. However, v 16 speaks of 7,000 fighting men and 1,000 builders and sappers, a total of only 8,000. A further difficulty is that in Je. 52:28 the number of people deported on this occasion is given as 3,023. Perhaps this figure refers to the civilian population. Added to the 7,000 fighting men of v 16 it would give a total of 10,000, which is the figure given in v 14. This, however, would leave the 1,000 builders and sappers out of the grand total, unless they are included in the 7,000 fighting men of v 16 (i.e. reading: '... seven thousand fighting men, including a thousand builders and sappers, all who would be useful in warfare ...'). No solution is free from difficulties and we must admit that we do not know how many were deported in all. It is clear, however, that those whom Nebuchadnezzar took to Babylon were the cream of the population, those who would be useful to him as administrators and soldiers. Those left behind were the poorest people of the land (14).

True to form, the writer emphasizes that by deporting the royal family and taking the contents of the treasuries Nebuchadnezzar was fulfilling prophecy (13), the reference in this case being to the words of Isaiah (20:17–18).

Mattaniah, a third son of Josiah and uncle to the exiled Jehoiachin, was appointed vassal by Nebuchadnezzar and acquired the throne-name Zedekiah (17).

24:18–25:7 Zedekiah: rebellion and the second siege. Zedekiah continued the policies of his predecessors (24:19). In translating v 20, the NIV and RSV begin a new paragraph with the statement that Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon. An attractive alternative is to retain continuity between the two parts of the verse and to render the latter part: 'Yet Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon' (Hobbs 2 Kings, pp. 345, 354). The meaning would then be that Zedekiah rebelled in spite of all that had already befallen Jerusalem; he had learned nothing from recent events.

We learn from Je. 27:1–11 that the rebellion was hatched early in Zedekiah's reign and involved Judah in an anti-Babylonian alliance with Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Sidon. Jeremiah regarded the rebellion as foolish disobedience to the will of Yahweh and urged submission to Nebuchadnezzar, whom Yahweh himself had raised up (Je. 27:12–15).

The anti-Babylonian alliance was probably formed in 594 BC, when Babylonia was weakened by internal rebellion. Jeremiah records a visit to Babylon by Zedekiah in 593 BC (Je. 51:59) which may have been an attempt to convince Nebuchadnezzar of his loyalty. Nebuchadnezzar finally moved against Judah in 589 BC, laying siege to Jerusalem in the December of that year (25:1). The siege began in Zedekiah's ninth year and ended in his eleventh (1–2), but it did not last a full two years. The Hebrew of v 3 says that the end came 'on the ninth [day] of the month', but Je. 52:6 supplies the information that this month was the fourth (incorporated by the NIV, NEB and RSV into their translations of 2 Ki. 25:3). This points to the siege lasting eighteen months. (Je. 37:5–8 indicates that the siege was lifted briefly while the Babylonians dealt with an advancing Egyptian army.) It ended in July 587 BC with the breaching of the wall (4), but the city could not have held out much longer anyway, for the famine created by the siege had reached a desperate stage (3).

Zedekiah fled, using an escape route which is obscurely described (4) and taking with him the soldiers who had been defending the city. Once out of Jerusalem they went towards the Arabah, or preferably 'by the Arabah road', the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. Zedekiah was probably hoping to cross the Jordan and seek refuge in Edom, Moab or Ammon, all of whom were members of the alliance (Je. 27:3). But he was overtaken before he reached the Jordan. It appears from v 6 that Nebuchadnezzar had not been directing the siege of Jerusalem in person, for he was at the Babylonian headquarters at Riblah. Zedekiah's punishment was brutal but not unduly severe by the standards of the time (the Assyrians are known to have blinded their prisoners).

25:8–21 Deportation and destruction. About a month after the walls had been breached a Babylonian official arrived to organize the destruction of Jerusalem and the removal of its population. The reference to the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar drives home the fact that there was no longer a king on the throne of Judah by whose reign events could be dated. The Davidic dynasty had come to an end.

The city, including the temple, was put to the torch and the walls demolished (9–10). Those who had remained in the city and those who had deserted were all taken into exile. Je. 52:29 gives the total number deported on this occasion as 832. We saw above, however, that in the case of the earlier deportation the figure given by Jeremiah was not the grand total, and the same may be true here. The poorest were left to work the land (12). The fields and vineyards would now have produced more than the reduced population needed, and the task of those left in the land was to supply the king of Babylon with the surplus.

The list of the temple furnishings and utensils in vs 13–17 is poignant in its deliberate recollection of the golden days of Solomon. The reference to the bronze objects of unknown weight (16) recalls 1 Ki. 7:47, and the description of the two pillars (17) summarizes 1 Ki. 7:15–22.

Various officials of the city were neither taken into exile nor left in the land, but taken to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah and executed. The reason is not given. Perhaps they were deemed untrustworthy.

The final sentence of v 21 (So Judah went into captivity, away from her land) precisely echoes a statement concerning Israel in 2 Ki. 17:23 (though the NIV translation of the latter obscures the similarity). The point is clear: Judah suffered the same fate as Israel, exactly as was prophesied.

25:22–26 Gedaliah. The Babylonians reorganized the land under the governorship of Gedaliah, son of Ahikam. Ahikam had been among the officials sent by Josiah to the prophetess Huldah after the discovery of the lawbook (22:12); in the reign of Jehoiakim his influence had saved Jeremiah from death (Je. 26:24). Gedaliah himself must have been a member of the Jerusalem establishment, one whom the Babylonians trusted and who had the respect of the people.

A number of army officers (perhaps those who had escaped from the Babylonians when Zedekiah was captured; v 5) rallied to Gedaliah at Mizpah, the new administrative centre 8 miles (13 km) north of Jerusalem. Gedaliah promised them asylum if they would live peaceably in submission to the Babylonians. His advice to serve the king of Babylon, and it will go well with you (24) recalls Jeremiah's earlier advice to Zedekiah (Je. 27:12). Indeed Gedaliah may have been influenced by Jeremiah, who settled at Mizpah after being freed by the Babylonians (Je. 40:5–6).

There were those, however, who viewed Gedaliah as a detestable collaborator with the Babylonians and plotted his death. He was assassinated by one Ishmael who was of royal blood (25), and a number of men of Judah and Babylonians who were with him at Mizpah were also killed. According to Je. 40:14 the king of Ammon was behind the plot; Ammon had been a member of the anti-Babylonian alliance (Je. 27:3). If Gedaliah was appointed on the arrival of Nebuchadnezzar's official in the fifth month (8), his governorship lasted only two months (25).

Fearing Babylonian reprisals for Gedaliah's death, the entire population of Mizpah fled to Egypt (26).

25:27–30 Jehoiachin in exile. In a sudden change of scene we leave the land of Judah, without government and in chaos, and move to Babylon.

Evil-Merodach (Amel-Marduk in Babylonian texts) succeeded his father Nebuchadnezzar in 562 BC; in 561 he took Jehoiachin from prison, where he had lived as a royal hostage, and moved him to quarters in the palace, where he enjoyed relative freedom.

The purpose of these four verses has been much debated. Is this incident included merely for its historical interest, or does it convey something of the writer's message? If the latter, what exactly is it meant to convey? Some see Jehoiachin's release from prison as a chink of light in the darkness of exile, signalling the possibility of Judah's own release and restoration to her own land. Others feel that in spite of Jehoiachin's rehabilitation the narrative still ends on a downbeat, offering no real comfort. If the writer does intend to convey hope here it is unlikely to be an explicit hope of Judah's return from exile. As we noted in connection with 1 Ki. 8:46–51, restoration to the land does not enter the writer's picture of a future beyond exile. Any hope to be found in these verses is of a much vaguer kind. The book ends ambiguously, without resolution. The hope offered is simply that exile may not be God's last word to Judah.

1 AND 2 CHRONICLES

Introduction

Originally Chronicles was a single book, and its Hebrew name was ‘The events of the days’—i.e. in the strict sense, ‘journals’, though we should more probably have called it ‘annals’, the events of the years. The LXX, the Greek version of the OT called it ‘Paralipomenon’, the ‘book of things left out’, since at first glance it seems to retell the histories of the books of Samuel and Kings, adding information which they omit. As we read it we quickly realize that that is an inadequate name, because Chronicles clearly does more than fill in gaps. It also leaves out much that Samuel/Kings puts in, and where the two histories do tell the same story they often tell it very differently. Jerome, translating the Bible into Latin, said that this book was in fact a ‘chronicle of the whole of sacred history’, and from him comes our present English title. It does, as Jerome indicates, cover not only the span of time dealt with in Samuel/Kings but the entire OT story from Adam through almost to the people of the writer’s own time.

Date and authorship

Following the rise to power of Cyrus, king of Persia, who conquered Babylon in 539 BC, many of the Jews living in exile in his territories returned to their own land. Since Chronicles more than once takes that event for granted, it must obviously have been written after it. Many have believed both that Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah were all written by the same person, and that that person was Ezra himself, writing fairly soon after the return from exile. But there are also good grounds for dating Chronicles some time later, probably in the fourth century BC. If this is right, then we do not know who its author was. He is usually simply called ‘the Chronicler’. His book was in any case intended for the Jewish community which had settled back in the area around Jerusalem, with a rebuilt temple and priests of Aaron’s line (though no longer with a throne for the kings of David’s line, since it was now part of the Persian empire).

Content

Although Chronicles covers a tremendous sweep of history, it concentrates on the period of the monarchy, when for about 450 years Israel was ruled by a succession of kings, from Saul (c. 1050 BC) to Zedekiah (c. 600 BC). Samuel/Kings was certainly its main source, supplemented by other books now lost to us. So far from romancing when he recounts events not found in the older history, as some have thought, the Chronicler may well be following different sources of considerable accuracy. In 1 Ch. 1–9 he has compiled name-lists, most though not all of them family trees, which bind together the story of God’s people since the beginning of Bible times. 1 Ch. 10–29 covers the reign of David, and 2 Ch. 1–10 that of Solomon. 2 Ch. 11–36 deals with the royal line that descended from them—the kings, that is, of the southern Israelite kingdom of Judah—until it ends in exile in Babylon.

Purpose

Chronicles presents history differently from Samuel/Kings. The differences, the distinctive features of Chronicles, have to do with the Chronicler's theology—truths about God and the people of God which are his special concern. He assumes throughout that his readers know the facts already, and his object is to interpret them.

One of the most obvious of these features is his concentration on the royal line of David, and therefore on the kingdom centred on Jerusalem. (The kings who ruled the breakaway northern kingdom from 931/30 BC onwards do not in themselves interest him.) Another matter to which he devotes a great deal of space is Solomon's temple, its priesthood and its worship. This special interest, some have thought, arose from his desire to encourage his contemporaries to be wholeheartedly involved in the activities of the 'second temple', their own much less grandiose replacement for Solomon's. But when we realize how constantly he draws his readers' attention not only to the temple of Solomon (which did have a visible equivalent in their own day), but also to the throne of David (which did not), we are on the way to a wider and deeper understanding of his message. It is not really about religious observances, any more than it is about political structures. The Chronicler's twin emphases on throne and temple, on kingship and priesthood, are relevant in all ages, because the first is about how God governs his people, and the second is about how they relate to him.

This in turn helps to explain the Chronicler's view of the divided kingdom. So far as everyday names were concerned, the north was called Israel and the south Judah. But the real 'Israel' meant all those for whom the true kingship was expressed through the sons of David and the true priesthood through the sons of Aaron. That meant southerners (unless they rebelled), but could equally include northerners (if they would return). 2 Ch. 13 is a key chapter in this respect (see especially vs 4–5, 8–12). The Chronicler therefore frequently uses the phrase 'all Israel', speaks of the possibility of its reunification and renewal, and presents a picture of an ideal Israel—not a photograph of the nation as it would have appeared at any given time, but a kaleidoscope or montage of glimpses pieced together from various times and sources.

In a similar way he pictures at the heart of the ideal Israel an ideal kingship, in the form of the successive reigns of David and Solomon. As we have noted, his first readers were very familiar with the stories of these two men, and knew how human they were, with great failings as well as great virtues. So we, like those earlier readers, are to understand the Chronicler's depiction of David and Solomon as the 'official' portrait, complementing (not contradicting) the warts-and-all human one in Samuel/Kings. It is not inaccurate—simply selective. It draws attention to those aspects of their reigns which show us something of God's regular ways of governing his people's lives.

The Chronicler's hopes for his own age and his message for later ages include all this, and three other features also. One is continuity. This is brought out by the name-lists of his first nine chapters, binding the people of God together across the generations, and at a deeper level by his constant interest in unchanging principles. He would want to tell us that there is no reason why (making allowances for changed circumstances) the same principles should not apply to the life of God's people now as then.

Another feature is what some call 'retribution', meaning that 'if I sin I shall be punished' (though also that 'if I obey I shall be blessed'). Scripture recognizes elsewhere, and so does the Chronicler himself, that in practice things are usually more complicated than that, but this principle of spiritual cause and effect remains true as a basic fact. One of its consequences is that there is always new hope for each new generation: to simplify this aspect of it also, that 'if I repent I shall be forgiven'. The NT simply clarifies the principle. The Christian, like his OT counterpart, finds that both obedience and disobedience have inevitable effects; and the unconverted person, for his part, will be punished for the basic sin of rejecting Christ, and blessed when he obeys the gospel.

Finally, there are the Chronicler's surprising statistics. Amounts of money, the size of armies, and so on, often differ from those in Samuel/Kings, and often appear to be improbably large. Many of the discrepancies can in fact be readily reconciled, and many of the seeming exaggerations may be due to a misunderstanding of words like 'thousand', which frequently means a fighting unit of much smaller size, or to the kind of copying error which in our own day might add an extra zero or miss out a decimal point. But a good many queries of this kind remain unexplained. It is quite proper to leave them that way, so long as we bear in mind that the Chronicler was in other areas an accurate writer; that his concern with the regular principles by which God works in the world was served better by fact than by fiction; and that both he and his first readers, well acquainted with the older history (Samuel/Kings) and much closer than we are to the world that both these histories describe, obviously took in their stride such matters as the figures we find difficult.

Commentary

1:1–9:34 Connections

The style of these opening chapters of Chronicles is so unfamiliar to modern readers that we may well be put off and wonder what possible value it can have for us. Because of this, we need to bear in mind that the book's contents, if not its style, are familiar to anyone who knows the rest of the OT, and would have been more so to the people for whom it was written.

The section 1:1–9:34 is a proper introduction to the rest of the book in that the Chronicler is doing here what he will be doing throughout. He is taking facts about the story of God's people which are already well known, and writing them up in a new way. He is also covering the entire span of the story, from the very beginning practically up to his own time; and, while naturally he has to leave out a great deal, he includes many real-life characters and incidents. So his view of history is both comprehensive and personal.

The first nine chapters are often described as 'genealogies'. They do indeed contain many family trees, and the reader may be helped to understand them by reflecting on similar lists in better-known parts of the Bible. Gn 5, for example, shows how God saw to it that the human race spread across the earth as he had planned it should, and how he preserved it in spite of its sinfulness. Mt. 1 shows how he saw to it that through the same race the man appointed to save it from its sin eventually came into the world. In the same way, one of the great themes of Chronicles is that God's purpose for the welfare of humanity never fails.

Even so, 'genealogies' is too narrow a word to describe these chapters, for they do include other types of list. What all these lists have in common is that the names in them are not just collected, but connected. Such connections, whether of the father/son kind or of other kinds, tell us that God is at work continuously throughout the story of his people.

1:1–3:24 Connections down the ages

The family tree of 1:1–3:24 is traced from the beginnings of human history down to perhaps 400 BC, when Chronicles was written. At one end is Adam, the ancestor of all mankind; at the other is one Jewish family which had settled again near Jerusalem after the exile, for whose community the book was written. The connection is a continuous line (some of its branches drawn, some not) through Noah and Abraham and David.

1:1–3 The line from Adam. This list comes from Genesis (5:3–32) and is simply the names of the ten generations from Adam to Noah.

1:4–27 The lines from Noah. At the first branching of the tree, the families of Noah's younger sons are listed before that of Shem, whose genealogy is to be the main trunk, as in Gn. 10. That chapter is streamlined a little, and Gn. 11:10–26 a lot, to make vs 4–23 and vs 24–27. The Chronicler also copies from Genesis the little cameos of Nimrod (10) and Peleg (19), the first two of many such incidental comments that add vivid touches to what may otherwise seem such dull name-lists.

1:28–33 The lines from Abraham. Again, the main line will come last, so before Isaac's family we have Ishmael's (Gn. 25:12–16 abbreviated), and also those of their half-brothers, Abraham's sons not by Sarah or Hagar but by Keturah (Gn. 25:1–4).

1:34–54 The lines from Isaac. Once more Chronicles sets out the secondary line first, the sons of Esau (35) before the more important line of the younger brother Jacob. Again sources are streamlined (Gn. 36:10–14, 20–43), assuming that readers will know already from Gn. 36:9 why Esau (34), Seir (38), and Edom (43) are grouped together. The Edomite kings are listed not as a family tree but simply as a succession, and the chiefs may not even be that; no matter, so long as some connection is made between the names. These people are not names only; the little pen pictures of the two Hadads (46, 50), like that of Nimrod (10), hint at this by adding their touches of realism.

2:1–2 The lines from Israel. The central line which the Chronicler has traced from Adam through Noah and Abraham comes now to Esau's brother Jacob. In only one chapter of his book, where he is in fact quoting another writer (1 Ch. 16:13, 17; Ps. 105:6, 10), does the name 'Jacob' appear; he himself always uses the alternative, 'Israel'. The continuity of Israel, the nation still miraculously surviving in his own time, and the grace of God which has preserved it throughout, are his great theme; so from its very beginnings that is the name he opts for.

2:3–9 The lines from Judah. Most of these relationships are mentioned in Gn. 46:12 (cf. Gn. 38) and Jos. 7. The names of Heman and Ethan appear also in the headings to Ps. 88 and 89 (see also 1 Ki. 4:31), so this may be the first hint that the Chronicler is as interested in Israel's temple worship as in its throne and royal line. From here on he deals with the royal line not last but first.

He is equally interested in Israel as a whole, and in what it means to belong to the people of God. He makes the point through four of the names in this section. In the daughter of Shua, Judah marries a heathen, and his relationship with Tamar is incestuous, yet by the grace of God both women are drawn into the family tree, Tamar indeed in a specially privileged way (see Mt.

1:3). These are emphases unlike those of Ezra and Nehemiah; see Introduction, on authorship. On the other hand, Er and Achar are both born within the ‘holy family’, but that does not automatically assure them of God’s favour.

2:10–17 The line from Judah through Ram. This is the line that brings us to Jesse and thus to David, who will stand at the centre of the Chronicler’s whole view of history. The ‘family tree’ idea is particularly apt at this point; the tree of Jesse (see Is. 11:1, 10) is a familiar image in the religious art of the Middle Ages. Again, the Chronicler is equally interested in the main trunk of the tree (10–12) and in the spreading branches (13–17). There is no single source from which he has drawn this section as a whole, though most items in it are found elsewhere (Nu. 2:3; Ru. 4:19–22; 1 Sa. 16:6–13, where David is called Jesse’s eighth son; 2 Sa. 2:18). He seems therefore to have pieced it together himself, and, as the generations listed here are not nearly enough to cover the nine centuries between Judah’s migrating to Egypt and Solomon’s building the temple (Ex. 12:40; 1 Ki. 6:1), we may take it that he is concerned much less with completeness than with continuity. (Note the general ‘elasticity’ of Bible genealogies, since in Bible language ‘father’ can mean any male ancestor and ‘son’ any male descendant.)

2:18–24 The line from Judah through Caleb. There are difficulties with the first and last verses of this section. They may mean that by his wife Azubah Caleb was the father of Jerioth (a daughter?) (18), and that ‘after the death of Hezron, Caleb went in to Ephrathah, the wife of Hezron his father, and she bore him ...’ (24 RSV). At all events, this Caleb is not to be confused with the Caleb of Nu. 13 and 14, who was a contemporary of this one’s descendant Bezalel. Bezalel’s appearance here (20) again links the Chronicler’s two great concerns of throne and temple—the man who masterminded the making of the original sanctuary (Ex. 31:2–5) alongside the royal line leading to David.

2:25–41 The line from Judah through Jerahmeel. After various branches (25–33), the line runs straight to Elishama (34–41). If it is complete, he will be roughly contemporary with David; if ‘stretched’, with some generations left out and ‘father’ meaning ‘ancestor’, he may belong to the Chronicler’s own time. More important is the appearance of another outsider, Jarha (34–35), brought, like the daughter of Shua (3), into the family of Israel without any hint of disapproval, though she represents Canaan and he, Egypt—Israel’s two great enemies before and after the exodus. (In view of v 34, it may be that Ahlai in v 31 is either a daughter or a grandson of Sheshan.)

2:42–55 The line through Caleb (reprise). The appearance here of more Calebrates does not mean that the Chronicler has an untidy mind. This ‘repeat of an earlier theme’ points, on the contrary, to a particular kind of careful arrangement, as becomes obvious once we see that 2:10–3:9 deals in order with the families of Ram, Caleb, Jerahmeel, Caleb and Ram. This ‘chiastic’, or crossover, pattern is found in many parts of the Bible. Hur links the two Caleb lists (19, 50), but this second one is generally concerned with something new. Ziph, Hebron, Kiriath Jearim and Bethlehem (42, 50, 51) are not people but places—qiryat and bêt meaning ‘city’ and ‘house’ respectively—and ‘father’ may here be translated ‘founder’, as in NEB, or ‘leader’. In the same way vs 52–55 are dealing not with individuals so much as with clans (like the nations in 1:11–16).

3:1–9 The line through Ram (reprise). Here is the family which came from David, to balance (in the previous Ram section) the family from which David came. The sources may be 2 Sa. 3:2–5; 5:5, 14–16, though for once Chronicles has the fuller account, listing no fewer than nineteen of David’s sons.

3:10–16 The line from Solomon. This section covers most of the years of the kingdom, though the Chronicler barely mentions it (simply the word reigned, in v 4); his concern in these chapters is people and their connections. The mass of material he has brought together so far is now reduced to a single strand, the line of the kings. Even that does not include every Israelite monarch. Saul is not here, nor Athaliah, nor any of the kings who reigned in the north after the kingdom was divided. What matters is simply the line descended from David. The Chronicler's sources are of course the whole of the books of Kings—a drastic simplification indeed!

3:17–24 The line from Jehoiachin. Two major turning-points of Israel's history are practically ignored—the exile and the restoration. As the only hint of the monarchy was the phrase 'David ... reigned' (4), so here the only hint of these events is the phrase Jehoiachin the captive (17). Much more important for the Chronicler is that the people of Israel, and the line of David in particular, have survived throughout, and the latest of the line, the sons of Eliezer (24), bring right up to date a story which began with Adam.

Note. Two small puzzles arise here. Elsewhere in the Bible Zerubbabel is the son of Shealtiel, not of Pedaiiah (19); one suggested explanation is that Pedaiiah married his brother's widow, and their son counted as Shealtiel's son (see Dt. 25:5–6). The unexpected word six (22) makes sense if the words and his sons have been inserted into that verse by mistake.

4:1–7:40 Connections within the family

The Chronicler included in chs. 1–9 more than one Judah genealogy and more than one Benjamin genealogy. Why? Judah appears in chs. 1–3 as part of the royal line of David, which is the theme of those chapters, and Benjamin will appear in chs. 8–9 as part of the royal line of Saul, the theme of those chapters. Both Judah and Benjamin figure in chs. 4–7 as two of the tribes into which the tree of Israel branches.

4:1–23 The tribe of Judah. This list is linked with that of ch. 2 at a few points, but generally it is not at all clear how the two are related. However, as before (1:10, 19, etc.), the Chronicler includes here points not only of interest but of importance. First, these are real people. Finding place-names such as Bethlehem and Tekoa (4, 5) among them—'father' here must mean 'founder' or 'leader'; see on 2:42–55—reminds his readers that the setting of his book is factual, not fictional. The meanings of these names and the occupations of the people give extra realism: Bethlehem is 'Bread House', Ir Nahash (12) is 'Bronze Town'; Ge Harashim (14) is 'Craftsmen's Valley', and in other towns linen-workers and potters flourish (21–23).

Secondly, these people illustrate spiritual principles. Jabez (9–10) is commended because his name, which sounds like the Hebrew for 'pain', would have been thought unlucky; but prayerful faith in God does away with such superstition. Mered (17–18) married an Egyptian wife—these verses have caused debate, but that much is clear—and is another instance (cf. 2:3, 34–35) of the drawing into membership of God's people of unlikely outsiders, and thus of the Chronicler's breadth of vision. Caleb the Kenizzite (v 15), afterwards so prominent (Jos. 14:6–15), may himself have been another foreigner, adopted rather than born into the tribe of Judah.

4:24–43 The tribe of Simeon. Next comes Simeon, always closely linked with Judah, whose extensive territory he shared. Jos. 19:1–9 mentions this in the list of places reproduced here in vs 28–33. These geographical notes, with much less genealogy than in 4:1–23, indicate a decline in this tribe's land and population of which the Chronicler's readers are well aware (Shimei, v 27, is the exception that proves the rule). On the other hand no tribe of Israel can simply wither away, and vs 38–43 give examples of vitality even in Simeon.

5:1–26 The Transjordan tribes. As with Simeon, geographical notes are given for the next group of tribes. Reuben, Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh settled east of the Jordan, in the regions mentioned in vs 8b–11 and 23, known collectively as Gilead. The Chronicler notes that Reuben was the firstborn of Israel (1), even though the rights of the firstborn were transferred to Joseph (and so to Ephraim and Manasseh) and the dominant place became Judah's (Gn. 35:22; 48; 49:4, 8–12, 22–26). As with Simeon, we have notes of warfare. All these Gileadite tribes both took part in the campaign of vs 19–22 and suffered the invasion of v 26. If the Hagrite war is the same as that of v 10, the two events answer to each other from either end of the three-centuries-long occupation of Transjordan (10, 26; obviously very many generations have been omitted from Reuben's line in vs 3–6). They illustrate a basic spiritual law: in one, victory is due to believing prayer (20); in the other, defeat is due to faithless rebellion (25–26).

6:1–81 The tribe of Levi. With 81 verses and a central position given to it, this tribe is clearly of great importance. Its history (vs 1–30) shows the reason at once. From Levi's second son Kohath descend the high priests of Israel. Priesthood and kingship together form the chief theme of Chronicles. So the line is here taken as far as the exile (15); again continuity is more important than the great events which punctuate it, and in this chapter there are no other such events (not even the exodus; Moses himself gets the barest mention, v 3) except, significantly, the building of the temple (10). If that note really belongs, as many think, in v 9, it comes at the centre-point of the list, so here too there is a formal arrangement which underlines the centrality of temple and priesthood. Other branches of the family follow, one of them including the great Samuel (27–28), as little emphasized as Moses was.

The function of the tribe (31–53) is similarly related to that central point, the reigns of David and Solomon, when the three leading musicians Heman, Asaph and Ethan were appointed, one from each of the Levite families (33, 39, 44). To the same point come the twelve generations from Aaron, the high priests who make sacrifices and offerings (49–53).

The extent of the tribe (54–81) is nationwide. Levi has no tribal territory of its own, but is given towns and lands by every other tribe. It is typical of the Chronicler that he should write like this at a time when conditions were quite different; as if to say that whatever happens the principle of a representative priesthood is to be maintained.

7:1–12 The military tribes. A new thing appears here: notes of the military strength of a tribe. With so few names in comparison with those in earlier lists (a mere handful for the 900 years separating Issachar and David, vs 1–2), it may be that the Chronicler's genealogical information was scanty, and he used army census lists to fill it out. The numbers of fighting men in David's time do however help to make again the point that Israel in the past was very different from the sorely reduced nation that she is in the Chronicler's own time, and one has to look below the surface to see what is meant by real strength.

Notes. For the large numbers in this section, see Introduction.

The tribe of Dan is not mentioned here unless v 12b should read (cf. Gn. 46:23) 'The sons of Dan: Hushim, his son, one'.

Some think that the whole Benjamin section (6–12) is really that of Zebulun, who otherwise (like Dan) does not figure in the list, while the real Benjamin genealogy is ch. 8, balancing Judah's in ch. 4. On the other hand, the Benjamin/Dan/Naphtali sequence in Gn. 46:21–24 may mean that that is what we have here also in 7:6–13.

7:13–40 The rest of the tribes. The Manasseh and Ephraim sections are difficult. In the first, the mention of Gilead (place or person? Cf. Nu. 32:39–40) makes it unclear whether vs 14–19 deal with the whole of Manasseh or with one of its halves (see 5:23), and the mention of Maacah is odd unless we are to omit some words from v 15 and read took a wife ... (whose) name was ... “It is equally unclear in the next section whether the Ephraim of vs 22–23 is the founder of the tribe, Joseph’s son (born in Egypt, Gn. 41:50–52), or a descendant of the same name. The other two sections are straightforward.

We are not to despise these tribes, even though they were to become part of the renegade northern kingdom. The Chronicler points out that in these lists, as in earlier ones, non-Israelites are welcomed into the line of Israel (14), illustrious men are born of it (27), and women take a distinguished place in it (15b [see Nu. 36] and 24).

8:1–9:34 Connections of throne and temple

Perhaps Benjamin in ch. 8 is the last in a sequence of five, balancing Judah in ch. 4—a royal tribe at either end and the priestly tribe of Levi (ch. 6) in the middle (see note on 7:6–11). Ch. 9 would then set out once more a largely Levite section (1b–34) and a Benjaminite one (35–44), one priestly and one royal, to lead into the next main division of the book. Or we could take chs. 4–7 as a survey of the tribes, and 8:1–9:34 as the Benjamin (royal) and Levi (priestly) setting for what follows, while 9:35–44 is a repeat of the appropriate part of the Benjamin lists to lead in to the story of Saul.

8:1–40 From Benjamin: the throne prepared. The list in vs 1–28 is comparable in scope with those of Judah and Levi. It differs considerably from other Benjamin lists (e.g. 7:6–11; Nu. 26:38–41), and its section seems to be unconnected; here, as elsewhere, the reason may be that ‘sons’ may mean descendants in another time or place. We are still to see them all as bound together by their tribal ties.

The particular line within the tribe which occupies vs 29–40 is here because it is Saul’s line. It will be repeated in 9:34–44 as the immediate introduction to the Chronicler’s history of the kingdom. Yet as with Noah, Abraham, Moses, Joshua and Samuel, no attention is drawn to Saul, still less to the crucial events of his time. As always, Chronicles is interested more in continuity than in change.

Gibeon (29) is a place, like Jerusalem (see on 4:1–23). The relationships of the family based there are clarified and harmonized with 1 Sa. 9:1 by the NIV’s inserting of Ner in v 30 (see 9:36), by assuming that he had both a brother and a son named Kish, and by recognizing that neither history is necessarily giving a full genealogy. If however the line beyond Saul is complete, it would end roughly at the time of the exile; if incomplete, it would last longer still, even though it ceased to be a royal house in the events of 10:6.

9:1–34 From Levi: the temple maintained. If chs. 4–8 do form a unit, 9:1a rounds it off effectively, and 9:1b–2 introduces the next section with yet another surprising understatement: Chronicles gives just one verse to the exile before embarking on lists of the post-exile community. They run parallel to Ne. 11, and are mostly of the tribe of Levi, though the first of the four sections (Israelites, priests, Levites and temple servants, v 2) includes Ephraim and Manasseh as well as Judah and Benjamin (3–9). The Chronicler never abandons his ideal of ‘all Israel’, the north revived and reunited with the south. The priests (10–13) are the family of Aaron, offering the sacrifices of Israelite religion; the Levites (14–16) have other religious duties; and the temple servants, or gatekeepers (17–34), have general duties.

If 8:1–9:34 forms a unit, its two parts flank the period of the book’s interest, the Benjamin part leading into the monarchy and the Levi part leading on from the exile, thus again stressing continuity.

9:35–29:30 David

David, to whom practically twenty chapters are next devoted, is clearly of central importance in the Chronicler's scheme of things. With the overlap of father and son, however, the story of Solomon (who is first introduced in ch. 22) will cover almost as many chapters, and we should see the two kings side by side as forming jointly the ideal. Because the two great themes of the book are kingship and priesthood, we might say that David establishes the throne, while Solomon will build the temple. One is presented as a man of war, and the other as a man of peace. Even so, both themes (throne and temple) figure in both reigns.

The time of David and Solomon is being set forth as an ideal so their portraits here differ from the ones in Samuel/Kings. Those are human and fallible, 'warts and all', while these are the official portraits of two great monarchs. The Chronicler is not whitewashing them; everyone knows their sins and follies. He is simply being selective, to bring out the principles behind their greatness.

9:35–12:40 King and people

Against the background of the failure of his predecessor Saul, the first king of Israel, David is given the kingdom and becomes the focal point of a united nation. Though now long dead (for the Chronicler and his readers as for us), he embodies the enduring principles around which the life of God's people must always be shaped.

9:35–44 The first king's line. Up to now, 'chronicles' has meant genealogies and other name-lists. From now on it will mean something new—narratives, the history of the kingdom of Israel—and the first king is introduced by one final genealogy, his family tree repeated from 8:29–38.

10:1–14 The first king's failure. Of the twenty-three chapters which 1 Sa. devotes to the reign of Saul (9–31), the Chronicler omits twenty-two. He simply tells the story of Saul's death, and adds two verses of his own (13–14). For him, neither the gradual decline in Saul's own fortunes nor those of Saul's family after his death (2 Sa. 1–4) matters; so far as the kingdom is concerned, Saul's house came to an end at Mount Gilboa (6). Saul's disloyalty to God (13–14) is important in more ways than one. It highlights David's loyalty. David, in contrast to Saul, is the man after God's own heart (1 Sa. 13:14; the Chronicler does not quote the phrase, because his whole portrait of David will illustrate it). It is only David's obedience which can reverse for Israel the bad effects of Saul's disobedience. So if more recent experiences (that is, for the Chronicler's readers, the exile) parallel those of Saul's reign (7; 5:25–26; 9:1b), then the way of restoration is to be learned from David's reign (2 Ch. 33:8).

11:1–3 The new king's people. 2 Sa. 5:1–3 is the source. Fulfilling the old prophecy (Gn. 49:10), the people gather unitedly in obedience around the ruler from the tribe of Judah. In significant pre-echoes of his greatest descendant Jesus, David is presented as the same flesh and blood as his people, their victorious saviour, the one appointed to this by God, and the maker of a covenant (3, RSV, rather than compact) which they accept.

11:4–9 The new king's city. Jerusalem will be the place of the throne. David's powerful rule over his people's life will mean praise, peace and prosperity (cf. Ps. 122). Such is in all ages the meaning of God's government (Heb. 12:22). This city will, even in David's time, be the place where his son's temple is to be built (17:12; 22:1) and much sooner still the place where Israel's worship of God will centre on the ark of the covenant (15:3–28). But even before that it is the place where through his viceroy the LORD Almighty (9) rules his people.

11:10–12:22 The new king’s warriors. These lists come much later in 2 Samuel (23:8–39), and are brought forward here to show how from the outset ‘all Israel’ in its great variety unites around a king of the right kind. Like the lists of chs. 1–9, these may be drawn from several periods in order more effectively to make the point.

Outstanding among David’s mighty men are ‘the Three’ (11:11–14); so 2 Sa. 23:8–12 calls them, giving a full account (something is missing in Chronicles; a copyist’s eye must have slid from for battle (12; 2 Sa. 23:9) to at a place (12; 2 Sa. 23:11). Next come the Thirty, three of whom have given us another of the unforgettable incidents so dear to the Chronicler (11:15–19). This one comes from very early in David’s career (1 Sa. 22:1). Abishai and Benaiah (11:20–25) were apparently equal to the first Three, and Benaiah’s exploits were especially memorable.

Like so many of the people in chs. 1–9, most of the ‘mighty men’ in 11:26–47 are no more than names to us. It is not clear how they relate to the Thirty, and several have been added to the list of 2 Sa. 23. Paradoxically, the recording of nothing but their names (except for the occasional extra touch; 11:32, 39, 42) makes them real, in all their variety.

Four groups are now mentioned which joined forces with David during Saul’s reign, when he was at Ziklag (1 Sa. 27:6) or in his desert stronghold (1 Sa. 23:14). (Note again the ‘chiastic’ arrangement, Ziklag/stronghold/stronghold/Ziklag. See on 2:42–55.) First a group from Benjamin (12:1–7): David is to be acclaimed by ‘all Israel’, even Saul’s tribe. These come from Saul’s own clan and town. Perhaps their famous sharpness of eye (12:2; Jdg. 20:16) goes with a political and spiritual acuteness which leads them to back David when tribal loyalty would have ranged them with Saul. The closing comments on the Gadite group (12:8–15) could mean simply that they were ‘over a hundred/a thousand’ (RSV), and that it was the flooding Jordan, not they, that drove out the valley-dwellers; but in both verses, 14 and 15, the NIV is more in keeping with the Chronicler’s wish to stress the valour of David’s supporters. The combined Benjamin/Judah group which joined him in that early period (12:16–18) for some reason raised his suspicion. Perhaps he had in mind Doeg’s treachery (1 Sa. 21–22). Nothing could have been more reassuring than the inspired response as God’s Spirit clothed himself with Amasai (12:18, as in Jdg. 6:34; 2 Ch. 24:20) and made plain once more that God’s blessing is for his chosen king and for those who rally to him. From the end of Saul’s reign (1 Sa. 29–31) comes the fourth group (12:19–22). These Manassites had shrewdly left their decision till Saul’s doom was practically certain, but they were still welcome.

12:23–40 The gathering at Hebron. This is to anoint David king before he sets up his capital at Jerusalem (11:1–9). Individuals are named (27–28); tribal contingents are described in a variety of ways. For once the tally of tribes is not kept carefully to twelve (a geographical sweep from south to north then east includes Levi, both Joseph tribes, and both Manasseh territories, to give a grand total of fourteen—‘all Israel’ indeed!). Not only the variety but also the unity of Israel is stressed (38), in strong contrast to its disunity in the days of the judges. God’s people united under God’s chosen ruler have great cause for joy (39–40).

13:1–14:17 David at Jerusalem

Saul’s reign and David’s reign at Hebron (mentioned briefly; 12:23, 38) are simply the preludes to the story of the kingdom proper. First the ark, the symbol of God’s covenant of grace, must be installed in David’s new capital (13:1–14); then God will speak ‘from his sanctuary’ (Ps. 60:6–8) to proclaim David’s blessings at home (14:1–7) and his fame abroad (14:8–17). There is a backward look to the contrasting case of Saul, and a forward look to the twin themes to be developed throughout the book, worship/temple/priesthood and government/throne/kingship.

13:1–14 Bringing back the ark. The greater part of this chapter (6–14) comes from 2 Sa. 6:2–11, while 2 Sa. 5:11–25 is left for the next chapter; the ark is of prime importance, as the introduction (1–4) shows. Its description (Ex. 25; 37) and its recent history (1 Sa. 4–7) are already known; the crucial thing here is that during Saul’s reign Israel did not enquire of it (3 or ‘of him’; the ark, or the God of the ark, 10:14), but that in contrast David and all Israel with him will do so.

‘All Israel’ is stressed further as v 5 rewrites 2 Sa. 6:1, noting also a north-south extent even wider than the usual ‘from Beersheba to Dan’ (21:2). The first assembly decides, and the second one acts, to bring the ark into the heart of the nation’s life.

Uzzah’s and Obed-Edom’s experiences both illustrate the ‘goodness’ of the ark. It is a ‘terrible good’; Uzzah had shared a house with it for twenty years (1 Sa. 7:2; 2 Sa. 6:3), so his over-familiarity was understandable, but it was fatal. Where treated with proper respect, it brought positive good.

14:1–7 David established at Jerusalem. Having got the ark on its way to David’s capital (the next chapter will pick up the rest of 2 Sa. 6), Chronicles now reverts to 2 Sa. 5:11–25, and stresses further a vital contrast. First, in these verses David is given a notable ‘house’ in Jerusalem, in more senses than one, whereas with Saul’s death at the battle of Mount Gilboa ‘all his house died together’ (10:6).

14:8–17 David renowned abroad. The contrast continues with military victories and again ch. 10 is in view. Each king in turn confronts the Philistines; Saul loses, David wins; in the one case the pagan gods are honoured (10:10), in the other they are abased (14:12); Saul neither sought nor obeyed the Lord (10:13–14), while David did both (14:10–11, 14–16). Both God’s answers to David were memorable. His ‘outbreak’ here was a matter for praise (14:11; contrast 13:11), and the mysterious sound in the treetops meant that the onslaught was his, and David simply had to fall in and follow (cf. Jdg. 5:4; Ps. 68:8).

15:1–17:27 The ark of the covenant

The ark represents the covenant of grace, i.e. God’s initiative in making Israel his people for ever. How they respond to that grace in faith and worship is one of the Chronicler’s chief themes. He has a great interest in the temple, certainly, but it is more than that: he returns repeatedly (1 Ch. 13; 15–17; 23–28; 2 Ch. 3–7; 29–31; 35) to the proper honouring and housing of the ark, who and what is involved in this, and the religious observances which will centre on it. Hence his treatment of 2 Sa. 6:11–12. Between those two verses—into the three-month gap, as it were—he inserts both the establishing of David’s kingdom (ch. 14) and the planning of the religious festival with which the ark would be brought to its proper home (15:1–24). The liturgy which David appoints tells the same story (ch. 16), and the prophecy and prayer of ch. 17 again set forth the real relation between what God does for David and what David does for God.

15:1–15 Proper ceremony. The ark’s journey to Jerusalem is now resumed, in a style no less joyful, but now more considered. The ark is to be carried, not carted, and that of course by Levites (2, amplifying 2 Sa. 6:13; indeed the whole of vs 1–24 is an addition to the earlier account). This is because David has again, in contrast to Saul, ‘enquired’, and has been answered not by some mystical experience but by the law of Moses (13, 15; Dt. 10:8). Reverence for the ark means not respectful feelings, but practical obedience to God’s word.

Again representatives of all Israel are involved (3), with three further divisions of the tribe of Levi besides the normal three (4–10; Ex. 6:16, 18, 22). The ‘consecration’ required of the priests and other Levite leaders is no doubt that described in Ex. 19:10–15, but the important thing is not so much the rites in themselves as the attitude of heart and the relationship to God which they picture.

15:16–16:3 Proper praise. David's appointing of music for the festive journey looks back to his own special interest as 'Israel's singer of songs' (2 Sa. 23:1), and to the lists of leading musicians, one from each of the three great clans of Levi, already given in 6:31–47, and forward to the place that music would hold in the temple. It is not clear how many of the Levites in 15:17–18 were gatekeepers as well as musicians, though Obed-Edom seems to have been one of them; nor is it clear whether he is the Obed-Edom in whose house the ark had been staying (15:25; see on 26:4–8). But the group formed a well-organized choir and orchestra (15:19–24). (Alamoth and sheminith may mean high voices and low voices; the words figure in some of the headings to the Psalms.)

The Chronicler adds to 2 Sa. 6:13 a note of God's approval (15:26) because David had 'enquired' and obeyed, but reduces the quarrel between David and his wife (2 Sa. 6:20–23) to a mere note of her disapproval (15:29): the representative of Saul's house is still not in tune with the mind of God, as David is.

16:4–36 David's psalm of thanksgiving. The psalm which Asaph's group is to use in worship is especially apt, because it is to be sung before the ark of God's covenant, to the LORD (4) (which is God's covenant name), the ark having now been brought into the centre of Israel's life. That is the setting (4–6, 37) and the theme of the psalm. It combines parts of Pss. 96, 105 and 106. The first part (Ps. 105:1–15) sets forth what it means to praise the Lord (8–13), and why, namely because of his covenant (14–18). It is a covenant of grace—i.e. in his undeserved love he has chosen and rescued his people when they could do nothing for themselves (19–22). The second part (Ps. 96) praises him as God over all the nations, and therefore over their gods (cf. 10:10; 14:12), and indeed over the whole earth (23–33). The final verses (Ps. 106:1, 47–48) call God's people as a whole to join the Levites' praise (34–36): they are a cry to God the Saviour, and the word for 'Save us' is 'Hosanna'—to be taken up, significantly, by the crowds surrounding the last King of David's line as he rides in triumph to the temple (Mk. 11:9–10).

16:37–43 Ark and altar. Only Asaph's group stays at Jerusalem, while those of Heman and Jeduthun (probably another name for Ethan, 6:44) are sent to Gibeon.

17:1–27 A house for the ark? By and large, this chapter reproduces the earlier account. But the changes to 2 Sa. 7:11 and 14 are significant. Here, v 10 has subdue instead of 'give rest from', because, for the Chronicler, rest is characteristic of Solomon's reign rather than of David's, and because after the turmoils of David's time it will be Solomon's privilege to build the temple. In the same way, v 13 omits the possibility of Solomon's going wrong (though he would do so). In the Chronicler's view Solomon and David are to be seen as joint founders of the kingdom, the ideal figures of the golden age.

It is clear that David intends to build a house for the ark, and equally clear from the reply of Nathan, who is a man of God, that there is nothing wrong with such a desire in itself. But God's reply will teach David's 'faint desires to rise', and to stretch them by new understanding. A permanent house for the ark is something God has never asked for (4–6); indeed he designed the ark to be portable (Ex. 25:14). What God does for David takes precedence over anything David can do for God (7–10); note the repeated 'I' in these verses. And in the days of David and Solomon he will set up a house and a kingdom (11–14) which, though theirs, will also be his, and therefore eternal, and therefore something greater than a political kingdom destined to perish four centuries later (another pointer, like 16:34–36, to the NT kingdom of Christ). The chapter thus develops from the 'ark' theme (1) into both the 'temple' and 'throne' themes (12).

David, going in before the LORD (16; presumably before the ark), responds with a model prayer. First (16–22) he praises the God whose plan of blessing for his people embraces both the past (especially the making of Israel at the time of the exodus) and the future. Then he asks (23–27) that God will do what he has said he will do (12), the true prayer of faith which rests on firm ground and is therefore assured of an answer.

18:1–20:8 Israel among the nations

These three chapters condense no fewer than fourteen chapters of the earlier history (2 Sa. 8–21). The Chronicler omits the stories of the surviving members of Saul's family (2 Sa. 9; see 1 Ch. 10:6), and of David's adultery (most of 2 Sa. 11–12) and the evils that followed it (most of 2 Sa. 13–21; see 1 Ch. 3:1–9). David's wars remain, and are highlighted. It may seem odd that the Chronicler should not want to portray a lustful David yet be happy to portray a blood-thirsty one. But David's military success is to be seen as a positive sign of blessing (18:6, 13). These wars were the necessary preparation for the time of 'rest' when the temple will be built.

The background to some incidents in David's conflict with the Ammonites and the Philistines has been omitted in Chronicles; e.g. Nahash (19:2) as an opponent of Saul in 1 Sa. 11, and Goliath (20:5) killed by David in 1 Sa. 17. Background which has been painted in is the success both at home and abroad, with neighbours both friendly and antagonistic. Against this the achievements of 18:1–20:8 are paraded.

18:1–13 Foreign affairs. The Philistines, David's enemies from ch. 14, begin and end the next three chapters (18:1, 20:4–8). Ch. 18 briefly mentions Israel's traditional opponents east of the Jordan, Moab and Edom (2, 12–13), but is mostly about the nations north of Israel, in the region of modern Syria and Lebanon. Nearly all are hostile, but one (Hamath, like Tyre in 14:1) is friendly. In either case David's reputation grows, and his successes prepare for the peace during which Solomon will build the temple. In the same way, both friend and foe contribute to the store of valuables which will be David's gifts for the Lord's house (7–11). David is in a sense 'disqualified' from building the temple because he is a man of war (22:8–9), but that is not a mark of God's disapproval. For example, Abishai can be commended in the Edomite campaign (contrast 2 Sa. 8:13) because the victory is clearly one given by the Lord to David (12–13).

18:14–17 Home affairs. A note of David's 'establishment' follows, as in 2 Sa. 8:15–18. The Chronicler's own background chapter mentions David's household in Jerusalem (14:1–7). The Kerethites and Pelethites were foreign soldiers from Crete and Philistia who formed David's bodyguard.

19:1–20:3 Ammonite campaigns. The Ammonites were another nation east of Jordan (see 18:2, 12–13). The only hint of an earlier friendship between David and Nahash (19:2) is the enmity between Nahash and Saul in 1 Sa. 11, even before David came on the scene. Ammonite opinion about David (19:3) shows that whether neighbouring nations cultivate him or oppose him, he is a force increasingly to be reckoned with. When war breaks out, Aramean armies related to those of 18:5 are drawn into the conflict. The brothers Joab and Abishai, David's nephews (2:13–17), were partners-in-arms in the leadership of his armies (which may hint how 18:12 is related to the heading of Ps. 60). The Aramean allies are disposed of in two campaigns (19:14–18; the figures of 2 Sa. 10:18 differ—see Introduction). The Ammonites themselves are finally defeated in 20:1–3, but nothing is said about David's adultery with Bathsheba and murder of her husband (2 Sa. 11:2–12:25); the Chronicler is concerned to present David's successes, not his sins.

20:4–8 Philistine campaigns. This section on ‘Israel among the nations’ comes full circle with a note of Philistine enemies once more subjugated (4; cf. 18:1). The Chronicler is careful not to say, even now, that David has yet been given ‘rest’ (see on 17:10, and 2 Sa. 7:11); for him that will be Solomon’s privilege. The brother of Goliath (5): see on 2 Sa. 21:19.

21:1–22:19 The house of God

The Chronicler has taken ch. 21 almost entirely from 2 Samuel, but ch. 22 is his own. The account of the census which David ordered, and of the plague with which God punished him for doing so, is in 2 Sa. 24 simply part of the narrative, but for the Chronicler its importance lies in something which that chapter does not mention: the place where the spread of the plague stopped was to be the site of the proposed temple. The house of the LORD God is to be here (22:1) is the hinge of this section. To this verse ch. 21 moves, and from it ch. 22 directly follows. Practically everything is now ready for the building of the temple—the initial idea, the confirmation from God, the restored ark, the beginnings of a store of materials, and now the site—so ch. 22 introduces Solomon as its eventual builder. Construction will not start until David’s warlike reign gives way to Solomon’s peaceful one. The rest of 1 Ch. will be devoted mainly to detailed administrative plans (23:1–29:30).

21:1–17 Census and plague. For once the Chronicler records a sin of David’s. The reason he departs from his normal practice of showing David as an ideal king is that this particular evil in the sight of God (7) leads (as noted above) to the fixing of a site for the temple. The inciting of David to commit this sin results in a punishment which according to 2 Sa. 24:1 is primarily due to some previous sin on the part of the nation. Having in mind perhaps the principle of Jas. 1:13, the Chronicler brings in unexpectedly the figure of Satan (1). He is the one who, as in Jb. 2:3, actually causes the trouble, although only by God’s permission and within God’s limits.

It is not clear why taking a census was wrong. The law allowed it, with certain provisos (Ex. 30:11–16); a census gave the book of Numbers its name, and the early chapters of 1 Chronicles itself contain similar lists. Perhaps as this one was a military list (5), David’s motives were wrong. Chronicles often makes the point that Israel’s real security lay in trust in its God, not in the size of its army (e.g. 2 Ch. 14:11; 16:8). Not David but Joab is here presented in a good light, though in the earlier history he is not a pleasant character (1 Ki. 2:5–6). He carries out the census under protest, and draws the line at Levi and Benjamin presumably because of Nu. 1:47–50 (perhaps both tribes were regarded as custodians of the tabernacle, which was in Benjaminites territory, 16:39). The resulting numbers differs from those in 2 Sa. 24:9; again, see Introduction.

An angel with a sword appears also to Balaam (Nu. 22:31) and to Joshua (Jos. 5:13–15), and there as here the place where he appears is reckoned holy. Here he is the plague-bearer (11). David, when he sees him, is apparently on his way northwards out of Jerusalem with a group of elders, perhaps going to Gibeon to offer sacrifices in penitence (see vs 29–30). The possible reading of v 17 in NEB makes this more poignant: ‘and I am a shepherd’ (instead of and done wrong).

21:18–21 The place where the plague stopped. Araunah (the Chronicler’s version of the name is actually ‘Ornan’) is one of the original Canaanite inhabitants of Jerusalem (see 11:4–5), but obviously he recognizes the Lord’s angel and the Lord’s anointed king (21:20–21). Knowing that the honour of the Lord is enhanced, not diminished, by these events, David is quite happy to ask for the use of this pagan’s threshing-floor for the site of altar and temple.

The price noted here (21:25) may be for the entire temple site, as against the much smaller price noted in 2 Sa. 24:24 perhaps for the altar site alone. The Lord confirms the rightness of all this by sending fire from heaven (21:26) just as the angel confirmed Gideon's call (Jdg. 6:20–24). A more significant parallel is the fire that falls on the altar when the tabernacle is first set up (Lv. 9:24) and when the temple is finally consecrated (2 Ch. 7:1). The Lord's 'answer' (21:26, 28) explains his plan for the blessing of his people. Here are to be both the house, i.e. the place of the ark, representing divine grace, and also the altar, representing human response (22:1). As with Job, out of Satan's evil intentions comes great good (Jb. 42:12).

22:2–5 Materials for the house. This section, and indeed the rest of 1 Chronicles, has no parallel in Samuel/Kings. Since Solomon comes on the scene here and David does not leave it till the end of the book, the next eight chapters bind together the two reigns as the double foundation of the 400 years of the monarchy. At the same time they are all about the temple, stressing again the Chronicler's twin themes of priesthood and kingship. For the temple David gathers exceptional amounts of material; in it will be found contributions from a variety of non-Israelite nations (see on 21:20–21); by it the fame of the Lord will be made known far and wide. All these aspects underline the importance of this building.

22:6–19 Instructions for the house. David speaks at some length to Solomon about the building of the temple, then briefly to all the leaders of Israel (17). Ch. 28, with almost exactly the same subject matter, will be a public address, with closing words to Solomon. This draws a revealing parallel with the transfer of authority from Moses to Joshua long before. The command 'Be strong and courageous' is an exact repeat (13; Jos. 1:9) within two passages full of similarities. Moses had guided God's people through a period of turmoil and change, in which they became a nation; Joshua would lead them into the land of rest (Jos. 1:12–15). In the same way David has had to be a man of war (8; see 28:3 RV), but is not blamed for it, while Solomon will be a man of peace (9), merely a statement of fact (see on 18:13). In truth, NIV's man of peace is misleading. RV should be followed in v 9: he will be a 'man of rest', meaning rest from all his enemies, though following his accession God will also give Israel 'peace' (šālôm, like Solomon's name) and 'quietness' (a word used in Jos. 11:23, 14:15; Dt. 12:10 is another close parallel). The blood shed in David's wars may indeed have disqualified him ritually from too close an involvement with the temple (8b), but the point is that his work is to provide for the temple (14), not only building materials, but, following his victories, a time free from war; while Solomon's work is to build the sanctuary (19). The relation between the two reigns is summed up in David's address to the leaders of Israel in vs 17–19.

23:1–27:34 Organization for temple and kingdom

These chapters are daunting both at a casual reading, which sees only unhelpful name-lists like those in chs. 1–9, and at a careful one, which notices apparent discrepancies in them. They are in fact family lists of the tribe of Levi, with other information inserted, setting out the Levites' involvement in the services of the temple. Much of this section seems to be related to periods other than David's, some even to the Chronicler's own time. But it is all thought of as 'Davidic', just as all OT law centres on Moses and all OT wisdom on Solomon. As David prepared materials for the building of the temple, so Israel likewise was a people prepared for God's service.

23:1–6 The assembly of leaders. V 1 should be taken as a general heading to the rest of 1 Chronicles (not as the first of the two ceremonies implied by 29:22). These remaining seven chapters, bracketed between this verse and 29:28, bring David's reign to a splendid climax. The OT uses the formula old and full of years for great men who deserve honour, such as Abraham or Job. The Chronicler omits the sins and troubles of David the man because they would disfigure his official portrait of David the king. The impression that there were two assemblies as well as two ‘coronations’ may be correct; gathered (2) is less formal than the later ‘summoned’ (28:1).

The division of the tribe of Levi into priests and (other) Levites (2) is dealt with later in this chapter, while the fourfold division of the ‘Levites’ (4–5) is the basis of this and the next four chapters. The fact that the Levites’ lower age limit is 30 here (3) and 20 elsewhere (24, 27) is one of the indications that this section (like much in the early chapters of the book) is a collage of pictures of Israel from various periods.

23:7–24:31 Sanctuary staff. Levite family lists (23:7–23; 24:20–31) frame two central sections, dealing with the duties of the Levites (23:24–32) and the divisions of the priests (24:1–19).

The three sons of Levi head the first lists of names (23:7–23); 23:6b is probably meant as a title for this section. The Gershonites of 23:7 may be a later generation than those of 6:17, and the dating of the people in 23:9a may be different again. Chronicles distinguishes the duties of the priests from those of the rest of the tribe of Levi (23:13).

The latter duties are detailed in 23:24–32. In some respects they change, of course, once the movable tabernacle is replaced by a permanent sanctuary (23:25–26), and they seem to relate to the Levites generally (i.e. all the divisions noted in 23:4–5). Twenty (23:24, 27); see on 23:3.

The divisions of the priests (24:1–19) are yet another kind of classification within this tribe. Looking back, the death of Aaron’s two eldest sons is noted (24:2), though not the shameful reason for it (Lv. 10:1–2). The curious phrase officials of God (24:5) may be another way of describing officials of the sanctuary (and meaning ‘even’, or ‘that is’), or perhaps the two descriptions simply mean that these leaders were ‘holy’ and ‘outstanding’. Looking forward, some of the twenty-four heads of families reappear in later times, e.g. Jehoiarib (24:7) in 1 Macc. 2:1, Hakkoz (24:10) in Ezr. 2:61 and Ne. 7:63, and most famously Abijah (24:10) in Lk. 1:5.

The final list of Levites, 24:20–31, corresponds to that of 23:12–23, but takes it one generation further. Again the Chronicler’s picture of Israel is seen to be a many-layered one, pieced together from the records of many different periods.

25:1–31 Musicians. After the lists of sanctuary staff comes the second division of the Levites, that of the musicians. It is further divided in two ways, first according to the three families of Asaph, Jeduthun and Heman (1–6), and then according to the twenty-four ‘courses’ headed by their sons (7–31). Heman is called the king’s seer here (5), and Asaph and Jeduthun are similarly styled elsewhere (2 Ch. 29:30; 35:15); there is clearly a connection between prophesying and music-making, though the word supervision, which like ‘prophesying’ is mentioned three times in vs 1–3, shows that in biblical times (cf. 1 Cor. 14:26–33) speech or song could be inspired without being ecstatic or uncontrolled.

The first five names of Heman’s sons (4) are followed by nine others of unusual form, which sound in Hebrew like psalm-verses: Hananiah, Hanani = ‘Be gracious to me, Lord, be gracious to me,’ and so forth. Perhaps Heman named his sons after his favourite Psalms!

The courses of singers, like the courses of priests in 24:7–18, number twenty-four. A complete list in each case, like the sense of v 8 (cf. 24:31, 26:13) is characteristic of the Chronicler, and his conviction that in God’s plan all his people are to be drawn together.

26:1–19 Gatekeepers. The basic framework for this set of lists is vs 1–3, 9–11 and 19. Of the three great families of the Levites (6:1) only the Kohathites (1, Korah being a Kohathite according to 6:22) and the Merarites (10) are represented here; the Asaph of v 1 is not the famous one of 25:1, who was a Gershonite (6:39–43), but the Ebiasaph of 9:19. Where we might have expected a list of Gershonite gatekeepers we find the family of Obed-Edom (4–8). This intriguing character is not given a Levite pedigree, but if all the references are to the same person, then he is a Levite in 15:18, which would qualify him for this list, as would the special blessing of v 5 and 13:14 (and see on 15:17–25).

Though Obed-Edom's generation might have been gatekeepers in David's time, long before the temple was built (15:17–18), his name figures also here (15) after it has been built, therefore at least as late as Solomon; while 9:17–32 (which has spelt out for us some of the gatekeepers' actual duties) lists some of the same names even after the temple's rebuilding four centuries later still. This is all part of the Chronicler's many-layered technique of putting together information from different ages to create an in-depth picture of the life and worship of God's people. One gatekeeper's reputation for wise counsel (14) and the mention of the court (?) where others were on duty (the meaning of 'parbar', v 18 RSV, is in fact unknown) suggest the realism and accuracy of the parts, however artfully the whole may be put together.

26:20–27:34 Officials. The four Levite divisions in 23:4–5 were listed in order of size. The order of the detailed lists has been different, working from the centre outwards, as it were—sanctuary staff, then musicians, then gatekeepers, and now finally various officials, some of whom have duties away from the temple (26:29), indeed throughout the land, and duties secular as well as religious (26:30, 32). The lists in ch. 27 go well beyond the tribe of Levi.

The section 26:20–32 deals with officials in charge of the treasuries, or storehouses (20; same word in 27:25). Some (26:21–22) seem to be curators of the 'articles of the sanctuary', as in 9:28–32; others (26:24–28) of such valuables as the spoils of war. The duties of others again are judicial (26:29) or fiscal (if religious and secular taxes are in view in 26:30, 32). Once more the picture is built up from various periods: the extensive lands described in 26:30–32 belong to early times; Levite involvement in administration figures only in later times (2 Ch. 19:8–11). As Israel's history can be grasped only when it is seen as a whole, so its character can be grasped only when we bring together all its significant people, even Saul (26:28).

The movement in 26:29–32 away from the religious and into the secular sphere brings us to something quite non-Levite, an army list (27:1–15). This too is Israel at its most complete. The commanders are the best examples of leadership history can provide, namely twelve of David's mighty men from 11:10–31, and the statistics are perhaps what their forces were ideally intended to be—twelve regiments each of twenty-four 'thousands', recalling the twenty-four courses of priests and especially the twenty-four courses with twelve musicians in each (24:7–18; 25:6–31). So although Asahel had died even before David became king of all Israel, his name stands at the head of a regiment (27:7; 2 Sa. 2:18–23), whereas the army's organization is much more in Solomon's style.

The section 27:16–24 lists the officers presumably involved in the census of 27:23–24. Twelve 'tribes' are mentioned, if Manasseh is counted as one, though it is a very odd list, and we can only guess why Gad and Asher are omitted and Aaron added. The census is probably that of 21:1–8; the account there does not necessarily conflict, as some suggest, with this one.

The section 27:25–31 is another list of twelve, this time the royal stewards—the heads of the civil service. Again the Chronicler is happy to include non-Israelites who have been drawn into the service of the God of Israel (Obil and Jaziz, 27:30–31).

Finally David's inner cabinet (27:32–34) contains some we cannot identify, such as his 'uncle' Jonathan, and others familiar from elsewhere (18:14–17; 2 Sa. 15–17). The famous names and the masterly ordering which we find in these lists tell us again that we are being given an idealized picture of God's people. In particular chs. 23–27 display a 'David' type of organization for the temple of Jerusalem and the kingdom of Israel such as God's chosen king would have wanted to achieve, to hand it on to succeeding generations.

28:1–29:30 The succession

These two final chapters look back to ch. 23, where v 1 ('David ... made his son Solomon king') forms a heading for the whole long section (23:1–29:30) which ends the first book. A 'gathering' of Israelite leaders is introduced at 23:2; 28:1 introduces a second, larger and more formal 'assembly' for what will be in effect Solomon's coronation (29:22–24). We are also looking back to ch. 22, for what is said here both to and about Solomon amplifies in a public and formal way what David had already said more personally there. Of particular interest is the fact that David, in so many ways Israel's ideal king, is about to step down, and God's people in every subsequent generation need to know how the Davidic ideals are to be kept alive when he is no longer there. His parting instructions to Solomon and to Israel are therefore far-reaching.

28:1–10 The Lord's directions. The formality of this public speech contrasts with what has gone before, but its content is very like that of the less formal conversations in ch. 22. It also recalls Moses' words in commissioning Joshua, 'in the presence of all Israel, "Be strong and courageous"' (Dt. 31:7; cf. here vs 8, 10, 20).

For all the Chronicler's interest in a house ... for the ark (2), God's gracious plan for his people (which the ark expresses) is even more important. According to that plan David is the man of war and Solomon the man of peace (3; 22:9). God has chosen this father and son out of all Israel to sit on his throne and build his temple (4–6). The promise of an everlasting kingdom is in one sense unconditional (17:12–14), but in another sense it depends on human obedience (7). A vital part of David's 'bequest' to his descendants is the principle set out in v 9—'If you seek him, he will be found by you; but if you forsake him, he will reject you.' This is a classic statement of Chronicles' 'doctrine of immediate retribution', which will reappear frequently in 2 Ch.

28:11–21 The temple plans. All that David has said in vs 1–10 has emphasized the initiative and action of God. Now this is to be translated into action by Solomon. It is related to what God gave Moses to do when the original tabernacle was in view—plans (11) is the same word as 'pattern' in Ex. 25:9, 40—and it covers the people as well as the things that are involved in the service of God's house (13). God's plan for Moses is thus renewed for David (19) and so for Solomon (20–21). God expected Solomon's active collaboration, and Solomon did not find God's plan in any way irksome or restrictive. V 20 is even closer than vs 8 and 10 to the encouragements of Dt. 31:6–8 and Jos. 1:5–7, echoed also in Heb. 13:5–6.

29:1–9 The challenge to commitment. David has already put to his people the need for obedience to God (28:8); now he challenges them to be generous and wholehearted. He sets the example (2–5a) and they rise to the challenge (5b–9). The amount of wealth noted here is enormous (see Introduction), but it shows a generosity like that seen when the tabernacle was constructed (Ex. 35:20–36:7), like that demanded by the prophets of the days of the second temple, not long before the Chronicler's own time (Hg. 1:3–4; Mal. 3:8–10), and like that of the NT church when a new kind of 'temple' was being built (1 Cor. 3:16; 2 Cor. 8–9; Acts 11:27–30). It is made real for the Chronicler's first readers by the use of the term daric (7), a coin known in their day but not in David's. The Chronicler, not the cold man some think him to be, notes here as elsewhere the joy, liberality and wholeheartedness which David's challenge evokes (9).

29:10–20 The great thanksgiving. Those living in the Chronicler's times may have had no hope of ever experiencing such a splendid occasion as this, but he wants to bring out the underlying principle: this God is real in all ages (10, 18) and to him belong all things (11, 14). Naturally therefore all this abundance (16), everything that any generation sees when it counts its blessings, comes from God too. This truth arouses once more wholehearted joy and generosity (17, 19).

There are parts of this memorable prayer which God's people have made their own ever since. Even the solemn words of v 15 should, paradoxically, inspire confidence: the golden age of David has no more permanence than any other, and that age, like every age, finds its hope (its 'abiding', RSV) only in David's never-failing Lord.

29:21–30 Solomon made king. The next day, a day of both sacrificing and feasting (those who give to God receive from him!), is the occasion of Solomon's official accession. This was his second enthronement (22); readers are expected to know about the earlier one, hastily arranged to forestall his brother's seizing the crown (1 Ki. 1). Since the Chronicler assumes that the older history is well known, the different picture he paints of his two central characters is obviously quite intentional: the opposition Solomon had to quell before all Israel obeyed him (23), like the troubles David went through before he died at a good old age (28), are left out, because in Chronicles the two men represent jointly the ideal of kingship. Solomon's magnificence puts him on a par with his father's greatness, and behind both of them is God's eternal kingship (28:5; 29:11). The throne and the kingdom are unshakeable, because they are the Lord's (23).

1:1–9:31 Solomon

David was celebrated as the greatest of the kings of Israel, and his reign was its golden age. Chronicles stresses this (1 Ch. 10–29). So as the great king now disappears and is succeeded by his son Solomon, what follows is of special interest to all God's people who have not had the privilege of living under his rule.

Two things in particular we should look for in 2 Ch. 1–9. Where the two reigns resemble each other, we may see principles laid down by David which Solomon, and all others who care for God's people, must follow. Where they differ, this is not because of failings on Solomon's part (the Chronicler leaves out such things), but because David's achievement was actually incomplete. The son does what the father did not do, and becomes the other half, as it were, of God's ideal king. The golden age comprises both reigns together. Above all, this means the building of the temple, forbidden to David as a man of war but enjoined on Solomon as a man of peace.

1:1–2:18 Solomon established

God is at work through Solomon as he was through David (1:1). The two reigns combine to form a blueprint of how God governs his people. 'Man of rest', however, does not mean that Solomon's is a passive faith, which assumes God will do everything; on the contrary, these opening chapters show him as very active in his relations with God, with his people, and with neighbouring nations, and supremely in his enthusiasm for the temple project.

1:1–6 Solomon seeks the Lord. At once the Chronicler signals that his Solomon is to be seen as a model figure alongside David: all the unpleasantness which surrounded Solomon's establishing himself (1 Ki. 2) is omitted (1). All Israel (2) will rally to the new king as it did to the old (1 Ch. 11–12). Alongside the Solomon who will illustrate God’s rule over his people is the Solomon who seeks the Lord (5), as any needy believer should. As with David, the ark representing divine grace and the altar representing human response are in two different places (1 Ch. 15:1–3; 16:37–40), and the Chronicler pointedly mentions only the altar-sacrifices which Solomon offered (contrast 1 Ki. 3:15). He also reminds us that the tabernacle and altar in question were those made by Bezalel in the time of Moses; Solomon will replace both (see 4:1–11a).

1:7–13 Solomon asks a blessing. With Solomon’s vision the grace/faith pattern is plain. To God’s offer Solomon makes a model response, a prayer which takes account of God’s own nature (what he has done, what he has said he will do, and what only he can give, vs 8–10); of Solomon’s own inadequacy, and of his people’s need. God’s answer (11–12) anticipates the words of Jesus in Mt. 6:33 that we should seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

1:14–17 Solomon prospers in the world. The note of Solomon’s diplomatic and commercial relations with other countries comes near the end of his reign in Kings (1 Ki. 10:26–29); it has been brought forward here as one element in the establishing of his power, before he begins on his main work, the temple. It also establishes the character of his reign as one of ‘rest’, in which hostilities have given place to trade, and war to peace. These contrasts with David’s reign help to set Solomon alongside his father as the two sides of the ideal kingship.

2:1–18 Solomon prepares to build the temple. The building of both a temple and a palace is in view, but by omitting the details of the second (1 Ki. 7:1–12) the Chronicler again focuses on the first. Chronicles also omits 1 Ki. 5:3–5, having already given the reasons David could not build the temple (1 Ch. 17; 22:7–10; 28:2–3).

Between two notes of the labour force which Solomon mobilized are the two letters that passed between him and Hiram of Tyre. The work in which Hiram is being asked to help is something new, on the grandest scale; but what it is for is not new at all—namely, the ancient religion of Israel. The old observances are there (4; cf. Ex. 30:7–8; 40:23; Nu. 28–29), the same materials as before (7; cf. Ex. 35:35), and even a counterpart to the original supervisor-craftsman Oholiab (13–14, cf. Ex. 35:34). (Details, e.g. in vs 10, 14, 18, differ from the parallels in 1 Ki. 5:11, 13; 7:14; the Chronicler does from time to time seem to be using different sources. On the question of whether Solomon used Israelite forced labour, see on 1 Ki. 5:13–18.)

It is one more characteristic of the Chronicler’s that he gives us Hiram’s words in vs 11–12: like those of the queen of Sheba in 9:8, they show the outside world recognizing that the presence and blessing of God are in Israel when it is ruled by God’s chosen king.

3:1–5:14 The making of the temple

According to Chronicles, it is by the temple (rather than by any of the other things that Kings says about him) that Solomon is to be remembered. As his doings generally are abbreviated here, so the making of the temple is reduced from the longer description of it in 1 Ki. 6–7, for the Chronicler, as so often, assumes that his readers know that. The aim of the whole project is to prepare a worthy setting in which God’s glory and presence may be known among his people. It is as though this whole section is leading up to 5:13–14, and saying, ‘When Solomon had done this, and this, and this, then the glory appeared.’

3:1–17 The building. The site (1) is full of meaning. There David had seen both the wrath and the mercy of God (1 Ch. 21:16). So had Abraham long before (Gn. 22:14 RSV, ‘On the mount of the LORD it shall be provided,’ or (mg.) ‘he will be seen’; Gn. 22:2 is the only other mention of Moriah in the Bible). There too, long afterwards, Simeon would hold the baby Jesus and say, 'My eyes have seen your salvation' (Lk. 2:30).

The brief account of the building in which God was going to show his glory (see the last verse of this section, 5:14) begins naturally with the entrance (4). This might just conceivably have been a tower, the height six times the breadth (so RSV), but more probably both figures should be twenty, as in NIV. The portico leads to the Holy Place, the main hall (5–7), and that in turn to the Most Holy Place (8) where the cherubim stand (10–13). The quantity and quality of the ornamentation are both stressed; Parvaim (6) is a place-name now unknown, but its gold was obviously highly regarded, like the pure gold and fine gold of vs 4 and 5; six hundred talents (8) is an enormous amount; the fifty shekels of v 9 may mean the amount of gold leaf used for gilding the heads of the nails (nails actually made of gold would not be very practical!) There was also a curtain between the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place in the tabernacle (Ex. 26:31–33); Solomon's structure clearly follows the same principles as that of Moses; however, it differs in detail. Finally, outside the building, the free-standing pillars Jakin and Boaz are mentioned (15–17).

4:1–11a The furniture. Here too the emphasis is on principles. As both tabernacle and temple have a curtain in the Holy Place, so both structures must be furnished with an altar (1). The old one was 5 cubits square and 3 high (Ex. 38:1–2); the new one is 20 cubits square and 10 high.

The altar is the first thing one would notice as one emerged from the building. Next would be the 'Sea' (2–5), standing slightly to one side (10); then the ten washbasins (6); then, as one turned back to look inside the Holy Place, the ten lampstands (7) and the ten tables (8). The tabernacle had only one of each of these, and the Chronicler elsewhere speaks in similar terms (2 Ch. 13:11); hence the Jewish tradition that the temple contained both the new ten and the original one of each.

4:11b–22 Summary of the work. This passage follows 1 Ki. 7:39–50 in detail. It includes items not mentioned earlier, notes the vast quantity of bronze as well as gold that was used (18), and draws attention to the cooperation between Solomon and Hiram-Abi. Each is in a sense the maker of all these things (18), much as Moses and Bezalel were equally responsible for the making of the tabernacle (Ex. 33:22–23).

5:1–14 All come to the temple. The achievement is Solomon's: only when he has completed the temple are David's contributions brought in (1). The initiative has been God's: the central feature of this place of worship is that the ark, the symbol of his grace, presence and covenant, will be there (2–10). The time of the temple's inauguration is, fittingly, the seventh month (3), i.e. the Feast of Tabernacles, when 'all is safely gathered in' and God is praised for his faithful provision. The old tent is now literally taken up into the new temple (5), showing that this is the new embodiment of the original principles. They are still there today (9) probably means only 'from then on' (the ark had in fact disappeared by the Chronicler's time), but it aptly describes these spiritual principles. Heb. 8–9 shows their continuing NT significance.

Nearly all this section comes from 1 Ki. 8:1–11, though vs 11–13 have been added, tying in these ceremonies with David's when he brought the ark to Jerusalem in 1 Ch. 15–16. The word all appears repeatedly: in the ideal Israel, all will be drawn together around these principles (3), and among them God's glory will be seen, as when both temple (vs 11–13) and tabernacle (Ex. 40:34–35) were completed.

6:1–7:22 The dedication ceremony

These chapters, like ch. 5, follow 1 Ki. 8–9 closely. The events they describe interest the Chronicler even more than the temple as a building. Two-thirds of the account of those events is a record of prayer and the answer to prayer. From one point of view Solomon is following out principles which were laid down by David. God's people find blessing where they unite around the faithful ruler whom God has chosen (6:3; 1 Ch. 16:2). But he is also doing what David could not do, for where David fought to establish the kingdom, captured Jerusalem, and brought the ark there, Solomon's rule is centred on the continuing presence of the ark in its permanent home.

6:1–11 The dedication begins. Solomon's work has plainly been approved by God, since the divine glory has filled the temple (5:13–14); the note of this (1–2) leads into his opening statement (4–11), which in turn will lead into his long prayer (14–42). The darkness of the windowless Most Holy Place represents the fact that God cannot be seen (1; cf. Ex. 20:21). In the same way the ark, symbol of his presence in the temple (2, 11), shows that though he dwells in heaven he is always available on earth to those who pray (14–42 throughout).

Solomon has no other blessing to give his people than a proclaiming of the greatness of their God. This is a God who keeps his promises, particularly those to David (4). His choice of this city and this king is a covenant on a par with the one he made with Moses at the time of the exodus (5–6, a rare reference; often when the Chronicler might be expected to refer to the exodus he does not do so—that covenant has for him been swallowed up in this one, as the tabernacle has in the temple). God planned, and has carried out, the David/Solomon succession (7–10). And not surprisingly the ark is at the heart of this new age, as it was in Moses' time (11).

6:12–21 The prayer of approach. The beginning of Solomon's prayer is full of this incomparable God (14), repeats to him many of the things the last section has said about him, adds that he requires obedience (16), and makes plain how Solomon understands him to be dwelling on earth with men (18): in line with the picture of his hands and mouth (4, 15), we now have his eyes and ears always open to his people's prayers (19–21). This explains why the chief purpose of the temple is both the housing of the ark (God's covenant-promises of grace, 11) and the burning of incense (which stands for prayer; compare vs 18–21 with 2:6 RSV).

6:22–42 The prayer of intercession. This momentous prayer is offered by Solomon, with his God-given wisdom, for God's people as a whole, and covers a wide range of situations both actual and possible. Like nearly all of chs. 6–7 it is taken from 1 Kings, but is specially apt for later generations like the Chronicler's when the situations envisaged have come true. It is a prayer about prayer. Solomon is praying that Israel may be a people not passively receiving blessings, but itself actively praying for them. Temple and ark will remind every generation of its need for a personal 'practice of the presence of God'. Each must learn to pray towards this place, not necessarily physically, but always in heart and mind focusing on the meaning of it.

The seven situations listed may be defined as the administration of justice (22–23), defeat in war (24–25), drought (26–27), shortage from a variety of causes (28–31), the non-Israelite seeking God (32–33), a just 'crusade' (34–35), and sin leading to exile (36–39). Several are of course special to the geography and history of Israel, but all have equivalents for God's people in any culture, climate or age.

7:1–10 The answer of fire. Though the appearing of God's glory is mentioned at each end of Solomon's prayer, it does not mean that it appeared twice (in both vs 1 and 3 we could read something like 'the fire as well as the glory'), but v 3 does indicate that it was now above as well as in the temple, so that everyone could see it. It confirmed that Solomon's plans had been carried out as God meant them to be. But the fire was something more. What God was approving now was the first use of the temple as he had intended, i.e. for an encounter between himself and his people by way of Solomon's prayer. Hence there is a public sign for Israel to experience and remember, in contrast to the personal answer which God is about to give to Solomon (12–22). At other equally crucial encounters between God and Israel the fire fell: in the times of Moses (Lv. 9:24), David (on the same spot as on this occasion, 1 Ch. 21:26), and Elijah (1 Ki. 18:38). David and his son are again bracketed as equal partners in God's plan (10).

The 'festival in the seventh month' (5:3), which was Tabernacles, was apparently preceded by this extra week of celebration for the dedication of the temple (9).

7:11–22 The answer of revelation. In contrast to God's fire, which was public but temporary, the vision—we might say, the interview—which he gave to Solomon was private, but has become enduring common property. It is an answer, concise but meaningful, to the whole of ch. 6. V 12 confirms what Solomon said about the temple in 6:1–11. Vs 13–14 accept the entire sevenfold prayer of 6:22–42 (and take for granted a people who are both called by God's name and possessed of a land; a passage not therefore to be applied thoughtlessly in our NT times). Vs 15–16 confirm that God's eyes, ears and name are indeed there in the temple (6:18–21, 40). Vs 17–18 confirm 6:14–17; the you is Solomon (singular), and while in Kings he did sin and his throne did in the end fall vacant, in the Chronicles sense he fulfilled God's will, and Israel has never lacked a ruler. But in vs 19–22, which pick up Solomon's seventh request (6:36–39), the you is plural and means Israel, and whether or not Solomon disobeyed God, Israel certainly did. What is more, the Chronicler and his readers have actually seen both the threatened loss of land and temple (20) and the prayed-for restoration (6:37–39). These closing verses are a summary also of the fundamental rule of cause and effect which is so much a part of the Chronicler's teaching: if you obey, you will prosper; if you disobey, you will suffer; if you repent, you will be forgiven.

8:1–9:31 Solomon's greatness

At most points this section follows 1 Ki. 9:10–10:29 closely. But the Chronicler ignores 1 Ki. 11, for the follies and hostilities of Solomon's later years would detract from the picture of an ideal reign. He did the same with David (see on 1 Ch. 29:21–30); again, father and son are two sides of the same coin. It is to be noted that neither stands as an individual, but that both are seen in solidarity with the people of Israel, who are blessed through them (cf. 7:10).

8:1–10 Solomon's power. Granted that 1 Ki. 9:10–14 (where these towns are given by Solomon to Hiram) was known, and the Chronicler was not here trying to make sense of a damaged version of Kings (as some suggest), the simplest explanation of vs 1–2 is that they describe Hiram giving the towns back. It is clear from that passage that he did not like them, and from this one that Solomon admitted they needed renovating.

The verses introduce a section which shows Solomon's power being used for the benefit of the nation. Vs 3–4, the only military campaign recorded for the 'man of peace', show frontiers being established in the far north (the developing of a port on the Red Sea, in the far south [vs 17–18], may be meant as a counterpart to this, and the extent of Solomon's domains has already been hinted at in 7:8). The places mentioned in vs 4–6 indicate a country well armed, defended and provided for. The use of the surviving Canaanites for forced labour shows up by contrast the freedom and independence of true-born Israelites (7–10). God's people are blessed under the rule of so powerful a King.

8:11–16 Solomon's worship. This section describes more fully than 1 Ki. 9:25 all Solomon's work for the temple of the LORD (16). That verse may answer to 2:1, and thus conclude the main part (nearly seven chapters long) of the story of Solomon the temple builder.

His Egyptian queen is mentioned here because of the danger she would incur by being too close to the ‘holiness’ of the temple, for ‘everything connected with the ark is holy’ (rather than the places the ark ... has entered, v 11); the perils of holy things were illustrated in David’s time by the story of Uzzah (1 Ch. 13). Chronicles does not specify whether her peril would lie in being a Gentile, or a woman, or just (like Uzzah) someone unauthorized; it is making a point not about her but about the temple. Solomon, however, though not a priest, is authorized to do a great deal in respect of the temple (12–15). He defers to the command of Moses (13) and the ordinance of David (14), but the mention of these august names simply shows that his own commands (15) are to be ranked with theirs. All that he sets up is intended as a framework for his people’s worship of their God.

8:17–9:12 Solomon’s fame. Ezion Geber (8:17) certainly indicates the reach of Solomon’s power (see on 8:3–4), but it is also one of the ports of entry for his great wealth (Ophir, like Parvaim in 3:6, is now unknown, but its gold was famous), and 8:17–18 also reminds us of Solomon’s standing with surrounding nations such as Edom and Tyre. The visit of the queen of Sheba also may have had commercial motives, since Solomon’s authority straddled the trade routes of many of these nations. But the stated reason for it was his fame (9:1), in particular the fame of his achievements and his wisdom (9:5). What is recorded about her visit is the splendid speech she makes in praise of Solomon—not for his own sake, but to exalt the Lord who has made him what he is, and to compliment the people for whose benefit (once more) he has been made so great (9:8). Again Hiram is mentioned, his servants being involved in the importing of valuables into Israel (algum is an unknown variety of wood, but it was obviously precious), but also no doubt to recall that he had made a similar comment to the queen’s at the beginning of this long section (2:11).

9:13–28 Solomon’s riches. Gold represented the wealth of Solomon’s kingdom. Once the temple was finished, and the royal throne-room and household sufficiently gold-plated (17–20), the surplus went into a display of ornamental shields for the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon (15–16). The Chronicler is not yet saying that this magnificence will last barely a generation (see 12:9–11), and he is not saying what the building in question was (see 1 Ki. 7:1–12); he is concerned merely to point out that the value of the display was colossal. The range of exotic imports brought by the Israelite-Tyrian merchant fleet (21) puts the finishing touches to this account of the great king’s wealth, wisdom and power (22–28). Whether the fifth item is baboons (21) or ‘peacocks’ (AV), and whether ‘ships of Tarshish’ (21, RSV) actually went to Tarshish (Spain) or were simply long-distance traders, we do not know. Chronicles reminds us again, picking up 1:15, that Solomon’s wealth enriches his people also (27).

9:29–31 Solomon’s death. The final verses of the Solomon story are taken from 1 Ki. 11:41–43, and they do three things. They go straight to the end of that chapter, omitting the bulk of it (the tale of Solomon’s moral downfall), and thus end his reign on a high note. They refer to other accounts, not only as a check on accuracy but as giving the extra authority that belongs to the writings of prophets. And they link Solomon yet again with his father, for David too was given this kind of epitaph (1 Ch. 29:29).

10:1–36:23 The kings

Solomon is scarcely cold in his grave before the glorious kingdom falls apart. It does so along the old tribal fault-lines: an east-west line above Jerusalem leaves to its south Judah and Benjamin, along with Simeon (long since absorbed in Judah), and also of course those of the tribe of Levi who happened to live there. But the split was popularly seen as David's tribe versus the rest, so the southern part became known as 'Judah', while the majority thought of itself as 'Israel' (10:16).

This leads to complications in the use of the name Israel in the rest of Chronicles. At its broadest, it is used in a good sense to mean the people of God, north as well as south. In a political sense it is the northern kingdom. Where that means the people, it is not necessarily bad, for true Israelites continue to be found there (11:13–17; 28:9–25; 30:11; 1 Ki. 19:18), and even Jeroboam, first king of the north, is doing God's will in rebelling against Rehoboam (10:15; 11:4). But it is bad when it means, as it normally does, that the system and its rulers are determined to remain independent of David's throne and Solomon's temple even when they are no longer justified in doing so (13:8–12), and still more when kings like Ahab and his family not only desert the David/Solomon ideal but introduce foreign gods (23:17; 1 Ki. 16:30–33).

However, the north is referred to by the Chronicler only when its history ties in with that of the south, for that is where David's line will continue for the next 300 years and twenty reigns. His object will be to show how the ideals of David and Solomon were either followed or ignored by their successors, and how blessing or punishment resulted accordingly.

10:1–12:16 Rehoboam

So great was the folly of Rehoboam at the start of his reign that the Lord says the north was right to rebel against him (10:15; 11:4). 1 Ki. 12:1–24 and 14:21–31 present only his bad points. The Chronicler adds material from another source which says that after the initial disaster came a time of successful rule, then a second disaster followed by repentance and restoration. Much intermarrying within the family of David (11:18–21) could not of itself make Rehoboam a David-like ruler, and Kings is right in implying that by and large his reign was not a success. But the Chronicler's more even-handed account, though coming in the end to the same conclusion (12:14), sets forth a pattern for the rest of the book: sin brings trouble; repentance leads to blessing.

10:1–19 The kingdom divided. Shechem had been a place of political and religious importance since ancient times, and was a suitable central site for a king-making assembly of 'all Israel' (1, RSV). The first of three factors which bring about Rehoboam's discomfiture (for all of which the reader is expected to know the background in 1 Ki. 11:26–40) is there in the person of Jeroboam son of Nebat, a name to conjure with (2). With him as their natural leader the tribes bring forward the second matter, taxation and forced labour (4). The latter was supposed not to affect trueborn Israelites (8:9), but it seems it did (18; 1 Ki. 5:13–14; 11:28).

Rehoboam consulted advisers both senior and junior, and the headstrong counsel of the latter carried the day. He was running counter to the biblical principle of respect for maturity (cf. e.g. Is. 3:4–5), though, to do him justice, since the young men were his contemporaries (8) they must have been in their forties (12:13). Seeing they would gain no concessions, Jeroboam and the northern tribes revolted, and the third factor, the prophecy of Ahijah (1 Ki. 11:29–39), came back to mock Rehoboam. God had said this would happen, and so it did (15). The cry of revolt (16) is an ironic reversal of 1 Ch. 12:19. Rehoboam, not yet willing to accept it, sends (of all people) his labour minister to enforce the hated system, with dire results (18).

11:1–23 Rehoboam's obedience. One more try at reuniting Israel by force is forbidden by God, and to his credit Rehoboam withdraws (1–4). This obedience must be the reason for the blessing that follows: a programme of fortifications (5–12), an upsurge of religious life (13–17), and a flourishing royal family (18–23). The fortified towns (6–7) seem to form a line of defence not against the northern kingdom (though there was continual warfare between Rehoboam and Jeroboam, 12:15), but against invasion from the south (see on 12:1–4). Just enough is said about the alternative religion set up by Jeroboam (see 1 Ki. 12:25–33) to explain the general exodus of God-fearing Israelites from north to south. A calf representing the Lord (cf. Ex. 32:4) was bad enough, but a goat representing some local demon was too much (15). Rehoboam’s family is not only large but by our standards inbred (18, 20); here, however, that is no doubt seen as a virtue, in view of Solomon’s laxity in the matter (1 Ki. 11:1–8), and in v 23 took many wives for his sons is more likely than ‘consulted the many gods of his wives’ (JB).

The obedience and therefore the blessing lasted for all of three years (17)—not enough to affect the final verdict, He did evil (12:14).

12:1–16 Rehoboam’s later years. It is not hard to see in v 1a a pride and self-confidence, the opposite of humility and trust, which led directly to the sin of 1b and in turn to the punishment of vs 2–4. Shishak, founder of the twenty-second dynasty, had reunited Egypt (ironic in view of what Rehoboam had done to Israel) and was now extending his power north-eastward, no doubt with the collusion of Jeroboam and the rulers of Edom and Aram (1 Ki. 11:14–40). The details of the invasion do not come from Kings (3–8); the Chronicler’s source describes an army which is very large, even though sixty thousand (3) should probably read ‘six thousand’, and Shishak’s own record of the campaign lists more than 150 towns captured. Jerusalem is not one of them, so the prophecy of v 7 was fulfilled and Shishak was bought off by the plunder from temple and palace (9).

The most far-reaching event of Rehoboam’s reign was the division of the kingdom (ch. 10). Chronicles adds, first, facts about him that illustrate the principle that ‘obedience leads to blessing’ (ch. 11) and now facts that illustrate the principles that ‘disobedience leads to punishment’ and ‘repentance leads to restoration’. Ch. 12 contains all the classic terms with which Chronicles regularly teaches these things, unfaithful (2), the tit-for-tat abandon of v 5 (see also v 1), humbled (6, 7, 12); and v 6b shows the meaning of true confession and repentance—‘The LORD is just’, or ‘right’, i.e. ‘We are wrong.’ The foundation for this teaching was laid in Solomon’s prayer (6:24–25) and God’s answer (7:14). The fact remains that for all the blessing of ch. 11 and the restoration of ch. 12 (due perhaps as much to the good in Judah [12; 11:13–17] as to the king’s repentance), Rehoboam is remembered as the king who split the kingdom and who did evil (14).

13:1–14:1 Abijah

Chronicles gives three times more space to Abijah than Kings does; Kings dismisses him briefly as a bad king (1 Ki. 15:1–8). Certainly the queen mother’s influence cannot have been good (15:16). He would have been quite undistinguished, except for the incident Chronicles relates.

War between north and south was a matter not so much of who should rule the whole nation, as of relatively small-scale land-grabbing, in which at this time Judah seems to have been the more successful (4a, 19). But Abijah looked like losing the battle described here; the point of the figures in v 3 is to show how much he was out-numbered (see Introduction). He took the opportunity for a remarkable speech which sets out some of the basic principles of Chronicles’ theology.

First, it appeals to all Israel (4); Jeroboam, though addressed at the outset, is soon rudely demoted to the third person, as if he were not there (6, 8). The important thing is the allegiance of the people, and if their allegiance is to the Lord, they must recognize that he has delegated his rule to the family of David, by a covenant of salt (5; presumably meaning ‘eternal’—see Nu.

18:19). In the previous reign this went wrong, through rebellion on one side and folly on the other. (Whether the scoundrels of v 7 gathered around Rehoboam and ‘persuaded’ him, or gathered around Jeroboam and ‘opposed’ Rehoboam, Abijah’s point remains the same.) In the circumstances the revolt was part of God’s plan. But now things are back to normal: there is a true king on David’s throne, true worship in Solomon’s temple, and no excuse for any substitutes (8–12).

On this occasion Judah has not only the right theology but the right attitude (14b, 18), so the Chronicler omits the conclusion in Kings (1 Ki. 15:3) and ends with positive points indicating God’s blessing (19–21).

14:2–16:14 Asa

As with Abijah, the Chronicler’s account of Asa is three times as long as the one in Kings (1 Ki. 15:9–24). It also has complications which puzzle the modern reader. These are largely to do with dates, though they also have implications for theology. For convenience, the tables that follow are dated from the division of the kingdom.

The account as it stands seems to give these dates:

Year 20	Asa’s accession (12:13; 13:2)
Year 30	Ten years of peace end (14:1)
Year ??	Zerah’s invasion (14:9)
Year 35	Covenant ceremony (15:10)
Year 55	War begins (15:19)
Year 56	Baasha’s attack (16:1)
Year 59	Asa’s illness (16:12)
Year 61	Asa’s death (16:13)

The problem with this is that according to 1 Ki. 16:6 and 8, Baasha died in Year 46. So an alternative outline assumes that the years mentioned in 15:19 and 16:1 are years not of Asa’s reign but of the divided kingdom:

Year 20	Asa’s accession (12:13; 13:2)
Year 30	Ten years of peace end (14:1)
Year 35	War begins, = Zerah’s invasion (14:9 =

	15:19); covenant ceremony (15:10)
Year 36	Baasha's attack (16:1)
Year 59	Asa's illness (16:12)
Year 61	Asa's death (16:13)

This fits together very well, but has problems of its own: of the kind of dating used here (years of the divided kingdom), 15:19 and 16:1 would be the only examples; moreover they do plainly state that these are years not of the kingdom but of Asa's reign. The question remains unresolved. Other related matters will be touched on below (see on 15:11, 19; 16:12, and 'Note on chronology' under 16:1–14).

14:2–15 The heart of the king. After the note from 1 Ki. 15:11 that Asa did what was ... right (2), the Chronicler will be spelling out that righteousness in 14:3–15:15 with material taken from a different source. Matters religious (2–5) and military (6–8) show both Asa's obedience and God's blessing, and twice the classic word rest is used (6, 7; see on 1 Ch. 22:9). So too is the Chronicler's favourite word seek (4; cf. v 7), and the Lord who is sought is spoken of as Asa's personal God, Israel's historic God, and the nation's corporate God (2, 4, 7).

The army he has mobilized is put to the test when Judah is invaded by a larger one. The numbers seem immense (but see Introduction); God's people are outnumbered and have to trust in him. The enemy has not been identified—a variety of suggestions include that of an Egyptian army (cf. 16:8) led by a Nubian general. The memorable words of v 11 show how in a supreme crisis, as at every other time, the king's heart is set on the Lord, and it is very clearly the Lord who wins the victory (12–14).

15:1–19 The word of the Lord. Most of this chapter (15:1–15) again comes from a source other than Kings. On the face of it, Azariah's prophecy follows Asa's victory; it seems to lead to renewed reform, over and above that of 14:3–5, and the renewal ceremony includes plunder (11). On the other hand, vs 1–15 could be meant as a spelling out of what had been involved in the general movement of 14:2–7.

Azariah's message is first a statement in the plainest terms of Chronicles' so-called 'retribution' teaching (2). Although it is called a prophecy (8), the verbs in the main part of it (3–6) could be either future or past, and are usually taken as a look back to the book of Judges, which not only fits the descriptions but majors on the 'retribution' theme: then (4) as now (2) it was a matter of seeking and being found. It is noteworthy that the God who speaks through Azariah is clearly the God of the king, of his people, and of their fathers (see 14:2–7). The resulting covenant ceremony in Asa's fifteenth year (10) is all-embracing (notice the words all and whole in vs 8–15), and again a matter of seeking the Lord (12, 13, 15).

The closing verses, where the Chronicler takes up Kings again (1 Ki. 15:13–15), raise two questions. V 17 may seem to contradict 14:3; however, 14:2–8 is all about Judah, whereas Israel in this verse may well mean northern territory Asa later gained (cf. v 8). V 19 seems to contradict 1 Ki. 15:16 and 32, but those verses refer without doubt to the continuous 'cold war' between Asa and Baasha, which did not flare into open conflict until the attack of 16:1. (The word more should be omitted from 15:19. This of course favours the second of the alternative timescales suggested above for Asa's reign.)

16:1–14 The voice of the world. Baasha's attack (1) is a test for Asa, and one he will fail. The northern kingdom and its own northern neighbour Aram are hostile to each other through much of this period; a deal between Judah and Aram is politically astute, Asa can pay for it (though where from?), he has a precedent for it, and it works (2–6). The world around would say that this was the obvious thing to do. But it is the beginning of his failure to seek ... the LORD (12). From what follows (7–10), note the coming of yet another prophet; the lesson that Asa's wisdom seemed to produce a good result, but trust in God would have produced a better; the repetition of that simple lesson of trust, so basic to biblical teaching, and the appeal to past facts to confirm it; the assurance of retribution; and for the first time such rebelliousness that God's king actually persecutes God's prophet. This is of a piece with the stubbornness of v 12b.

Note on chronology. If 16:1 means what it says (Asa's Year 36; timescale 1 above), his illness (Year 39; v 12) is a relatively speedy retribution. But this does not explain the problems raised by that timescale, nor what happened in Year 35 (15:19), nor why Hanani predicted war, not illness, as Asa's punishment (16:9). If on the other hand 16:1 means the kingdom's Year 36 (timescale 2), these questions are answered; this timescale's problems do remain, but it may show that cause leads to effect less quickly and less obviously than is sometimes supposed.

17:1–21:1 Jehoshaphat

The account of Jehoshaphat's reign is in some ways very like that of his father's, but it does not have the downbeat ending of prolonged rebellion, or the chronological framework (however confusing) that Asa's is given. It is also much fuller, and presents two striking features. The first forty verses of 1 Ki. 22 tell the story of Jehoshaphat's alliance with Ahab (2 Ch. 18), and ten more verses giving general notes about his reign complete the Kings account; the Chronicles version runs to twice the length, showing his importance. What is more, neither of the main incidents which Chronicles takes from Kings, the long and the short (1 Ki. 22:1–40, 48–49), shows Jehoshaphat in a good light, and the Chronicler even adds to both the disapproving comments of the prophets, yet on balance he sees him as a great and good king, even a second Solomon.

17:1–19 Jehoshaphat's greatness. After half a verse of introduction from 1 Ki. 15:24, the Chronicler depicts the goodness and greatness of Jehoshaphat. The two are typically interwoven: strength and prosperity, as always, are seen as a blessing, which results from a faithful seeking of God (2–6); v 3 should probably read 'he walked in the earlier ways of his father', i.e. Asa (RSV). (The third year, v 7, was when Asa died, and after the joint reign of father and son Jehoshaphat began to rule alone; see 'Note on chronology' below.) Thus the religious teaching programme (7–9) extends to his people his own love for God and his law (4), his riches and honour are famous among the nations (10–11) as well as within Judah (5), and army lists (12–19) fill out the military notes of v 1–2. A similar development may be seen in Jehoshaphat himself. He clearly fostered his own personal faith in God, and it was a 'faith that works' (see Jas. 2:22), an active, not a quietist, religion: he sought ... God ... and followed his commands (4), and did so in such a way that his people were blessed ... by his rule.

Note on chronology. Jehoshaphat's reign here (17:7; 20:31) is dated from Asa's illness and the 'coregency' beginning in 873/872 BC; the shorter reign implied by 2 Ki. 3:1; 8:16 is dated from Asa's death in 870/869 BC.

18:1–19:3 The campaign against Ramoth Gilead. This follows the storyline in 1 Ki. 22, but the mentions of Jehoshaphat's greatness (18:1) and of the feast given in his honour (18:2) are only the first of a number of small changes which make the southern king rather than the northern one the central figure; this account ends with events and a prophecy relating not to Ahab (as in 1 Ki. 22:36–39) but to Jehoshaphat (19:1–3).

18:1a looks back over ch. 17, a very positive introduction; 18:1b looks forward to its very unsatisfactory sequel. The marriage alliance, from which endless trouble would come, was between Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram and Ahab's daughter Athaliah. The military alliance (18:3) was equally ill-advised. By the end of the story it will transpire that Aram is the enemy into whose hands the town of Ramoth Gilead has fallen (18:30), so we realize that the Chronicler sees the pattern of Asa repeated in his son: a good beginning, a foolish sequel, and a prophet who says in the first case, 'You should not have joined Aram against Israel' (cf. 16:1–9, Hanani), and in the second case, 'You should not have joined Israel against Aram' (cf. 19:1–3, Hanani's son Jehu).

But Jehoshaphat is more than merely Asa writ large. His personal character is hinted at by Micaiah's prophetic words in v 16. He has a shepherd's concern for all Israel, and believes that the way to exercise it is, literally, to go along with Ahab (18:3) and assume that the differences between them do not matter. The prophecy of Zedekiah says this is correct, though in the event he is proved wrong (18:10, 34); that of Micaiah says it will not work, and reveals something much more ominous going on behind the scenes (18:16–22); that of Jehu tells Jehoshaphat that his big heart needs to be more discerning and ruthless (19:2 cf. Mt. 10:16).

There are two other points in 19:1–3 about these prophecies. Concerning Micaiah's, Jehoshaphat did indeed go home in peace (the words here, returned safely to his palace, are the same as in 18:16). Concerning Jehu's, we have to ask when and how the Lord's wrath actually came.

19:4–11 Jehoshaphat's legal reforms. These verses seem of a piece with ch. 17. Neither passage comes from Kings, and both concern Jehoshaphat's achievements as a great and good king like Solomon; this one concerns the exercise of wisdom in government. Why are the two separated? Perhaps this project is an attempt to avert the wrath threatened in 19:2; perhaps it is meant as a further parallel to the account of Asa, where also a second reforming enterprise apparently followed a prophetic message (15:8–15).

Vs 6–10 here are generally in line with the provisions of Dt. 16:18–17:13. Jehoshaphat's personal interest in the matter recalls Samuel's, in 1 Sa. 7:15–17; and his own character as a man deeply concerned for the welfare of his people also shines through.

20:1–30 Judah invaded. This account is found in Chronicles only; there are similarities, but also important differences, between it and the events of 2 Ki. 3. The invasion described here can hardly be the 'wrath of the LORD' announced in 19:2, but it seems to have been allowed by God as an opportunity to prove his salvation rather than to have been sent by him as a punishment.

There is some confusion over who the invaders were and where they came from, but there was at all events a vast army (2) approaching from the direction of the Dead Sea. Significantly, the first thing noted about our hero (for that is what he is) is that Jehoshaphat was alarmed (3). The story has already shown how difficult he found it to be tough; perhaps it was because he lacked that kind of strength that he is clearly not much of a hero to the writer of Kings. But his fear leads him to 'seek the LORD', and moreover to find that the entire nation rallies round him to seek the LORD also (3–4, RSV)—no doubt the result of his diligent pastoral care for his people as evidenced in chs. 17 and 19.

In front of the assembly he prays a prayer rooted in the facts of the past, referring to Solomon (9; 6:28, 34), David (6; 1 Ch. 29:11–12), Joshua (7a) and Abraham (7b), and applies them to the facts of the present (10–11). At the climax of the prayer Jehoshaphat's weakness comes into its own as the indispensable way of blessing (12). Equally memorable is the inspired answer from the mouth of the Levite Jahaziel—another reference back, in this case to Dt. 20:2–4: 'Stand still, and see the victory of the LORD on your behalf' (17, RSV). The events of the next morning show on Jehoshaphat's part the same 'faith that works' which characterized Asa in similar circumstances ('We rest on thee, and in thy name we go', 14:11 AV), and on the Lord's part a victory bringing great glory to his own name (20–26).

20:31–21:1 The end of Jehoshaphat's reign. With 20:31 Chronicles again converges with Kings (1 Ki. 22:41–50), though there are some differences. Four points in this section raise queries. V 31 seems to differ from 2 Ki. 3:1 and 8:16; but see 'Note on chronology' following 17:1–19. V 33 differs from 17:6, though writer and readers at the time saw nothing odd in this; Jehoshaphat was a remover of 'high places', though 25 years later particular examples were evading his eye. The book of the kings of Israel (34) is probably not the 'Kings' of our Bibles. Vs 35–37 reads differently from 1 Ki. 22:48–49, but may be simply the first half of the story—yet another foolish alliance with the northern kingdom, so that the triumph of trust in 20:1–30 is followed by a reminder of Jehoshaphat's continuing weakness. Kings takes up the story at the point where the ships are wrecked, and shows a king who had at last learnt his lesson and would make no further agreements with the house of Ahab. Enough damage had been done already, as ch. 21 will go on to show.

21:2–20 Jehoram

The Chronicles account is twice as long as that of Kings (2 Ki. 8:16–24), underlining the badness of a bad king. The contrast with what has gone before is well made in vs 2–4; the large and prosperous family given to good king Jehoshaphat as a sign of God's blessing is the first casualty of his son's wicked reign (4; Jdg. 9:1–6 is a precedent, but not a justification). The throne Jehoram had inherited was 'Israelite' in the good sense (2, 4), but became 'Israelite' in the bad sense (6; see Introduction and introduction to 10:1–36:23). Whence this change? Crucial was his marriage with the daughter of Ahab, Athaliah; with it went much intercourse between the two royal houses (note how the same royal names became confusingly fashionable in both kingdoms), and in particular the adoption in the south of the pagan religion that had already infected the north. Rather than imitate his father's goodness (12), Jehoram chose to exploit his weakness, for it was Jehoshaphat who had unwisely fostered all these alliances.

Despite Jehoram's faithlessness, the Lord's covenant prevents his destroying David's descendants as they deserve (7). But there is still recompense for sin, and it is the Lord who brings it. The letter from Elijah (11–19) is not found in Kings and is surprising. Elijah was not a 'writing prophet', nor did he prophesy in the south. Yet the letter does address a very 'northern' situation in the southern kingdom. Plainly about retribution ('You have sinned, so you will suffer'), it is flanked by instances of it: vs 8–11 and 16–17 describe the disasters that resulted from Jehoram's own sin and his leading others astray. All that he might have wanted—power, family, health, respect, the very things that mark God's blessing on the obedient—he lost. He received neither honour nor mourning after his death, and the Chronicler assumes that no-one will want any more information about him (contrast 16:11 and 20:34).

22:1–9 Ahaziah

This time the Chronicler has greatly abridged 2 Ki. 8:25–9:29. The NIV clarifies points which may be misleading in other translations, by giving Ahaziah in 21:17, and twenty-two and granddaughter here in v 2.

This story of a second successive ‘bad king’ highlights what was so damaging to Judah at this period, the influence of the north (3–4), in particular the influence of Athaliah. Her position first as queen and then as queen mother, allied to her own forceful personality, gave her enormous power. And in spite of the parallel between the enterprise of v 5 and the one in which his grandfather had nearly lost his life (ch. 18), Ahaziah like Jehoram is to be seen as a contrast to Jehoshaphat (9; cf. 21:12). Perhaps the most striking event in both reigns is the downfall (7) of Ahaziah. Nemesis overtakes him in the form of Jehu, who according to Kings wipes him out together with his retinue as a bloodthirsty encore to his main project, the cleaning up of the north. But from the southern point of view, Jehu’s dealing with the house of Ahaziah is as significant as his dealing with the house of Ahab: the sort of massacre for which Jehoram had been responsible in 21:4, and which his family had suffered in 21:16–17, is now happening again. That plus Ahaziah’s own death means that there is no son of David capable of ruling (9), and God’s eternal covenant with David (21:7) is within an ace of failing. But as Jehoram’s story shows the Lord in control throughout such events, so here in Ahaziah’s they are ‘ordained by God’ (7 RSV). In fact for downfall we should perhaps read a ‘turn of events’ brought about by God, as in 10:15 (and cf. 1 Ch. 10:14).

Vs 8–9 differ from the Kings parallel. To some extent the two can be harmonized: Ahaziah’s death may have happened before those of his family and entourage, as 2 Ki. 9–10 says (v 9 here should not have the word then), and readers may be assumed to know that his burial took place in Jerusalem (2 Ki. 9:28).

22:10–23:31 Athaliah

This section begins with the death of Ahaziah and ends with the death of his mother Athaliah. But her ‘reign’ is an anomaly. It is neither introduced nor concluded with the usual forms of words. So far from belonging to the house of David, she does not even belong to the kingdom of Judah. Unknown to her, while she occupies the throne a child in the temple is already the true king (23:3, 7, 10). Her six years’ rule is dismissed in half a sentence, while an entire chapter is given to the day of her death.

Judah’s decline through the reigns of her husband and son now reaches its lowest point. The same thing is happening as in the time of Saul, two centuries earlier, and it is a perennial danger; God’s people selling out to the values of their pagan neighbours, till only the house of David can rescue them. For the fourth time all but one of the royal family are slaughtered (22:10–11; cf. 21:4, 16–17; 22:8), but this wickedness also means that in God’s plan the last and unlikely person will turn out to be his chosen one, as with David (1 Ch. 2:15). The parallel with Lk. 1 also should not be missed.

Ch. 23 is largely drawn from 2 Ki. 11, but the Chronicler has points of his own to make. Jehoiada’s coup is more far-reaching than one might have thought. He gathers round him influential leaders (23:1), calls an assembly from all Judah (23:2), claims the Lord’s authority for what he is doing (23:3), and presents Joash as king already (23:11)—all a heightening of the Kings version. What has been abandoned by three rulers in succession, but preserved in secret (like Joash himself) by God and his faithful people, is now brought out again: a covenant is made three times over (23:1, 3, 16), to reaffirm that basic relationship with the Lord. Popular support for the coup (23:12) spells the end for Athaliah, and the foreign ways of thought she brought with her are rejected in favour of a return to the principles of David and of Moses before him (23:16–18). So both throne and temple are again what they should be, and the revolution brings (to use the classic words) joy and quiet (23:18–21). But humanly speaking it has been a near thing.

24:1–27 Joash

With the accession of Joash we see once more ‘the kingdom of the LORD in the hand of the sons of David’ (13:8, RSV), having under the last three rulers been effectively in the hand of the daughter of Ahab. Joash’s is the first of three reigns all of which begin well, though not until the third of them, that of Uzziah, do we again see anything like greatness.

24:1–16 A good beginning. The first half of Joash’s reign is summed up in the opening verses, for a family (3) is, as often in Chronicles, God’s reward for obedience (2). In this case it is something else besides: the royal family, four times threatened with extinction, begins to be established again.

Joash’s successful temple project is at once his service for God and his reward from God. The background to this section is 2 Ki. 12. Leaving aside for the moment the curious passage in vs 5b–7, the restoration work is described straightforwardly and in some detail. Three verses call for comment: the tax (9) is that of Ex. 30:11–16 and 38:25–26; the note of joy (10) confirms that this work is of the same kind as that on the tabernacle in Moses’ day (Ex. 36:4–7) and that on the temple in David’s and Solomon’s (1 Ch. 29:1–9), as well as repeating the public reaction to Joash’s accession (23:1); the utensils (14) were made only after the building was finished—until then all money had been devoted to that main work (2 Ki. 12:13).

In vs 5b–7, the reason for the Levites’ reluctance to collect the tax may have been that since Joash had taken the initiative they expected him to prime the pump with royal generosity, as David had done. The temple could not be looked to for funds, thanks to the depredations of Athaliah and her sons (7; i.e. associates; see 22:10). Apparently a compromise was reached: the ‘collection’ (5) became an ‘offertory’ (8–9). With the idea of ‘seeking the Lord’ so central to Chronicles’ theology, it is perhaps to Joash’s credit that he expected a ‘seeking’ spirit in Jehoiada (required, v 6).

24:17–27 A bad ending. Again Chronicles is based on 2 Ki. 12. It is also tracing a repeated pattern in Israel’s history; Athaliah, then the Joash of 24:1–16, then the Joash of 24:17–27, lead Israel through the same ups and downs as Saul, then David and Solomon, then Rehoboam.

The loss of Jehoiada’s influence marks the change in Joash (17, cf. v 2). The officials of Judah, presumably the old Athaliah party (7), re-emerge and lead king and people astray (17–18). Jehoiada’s son is inspired to bring as plain a message as any prophet’s, in a cluster of words characteristic of the Chronicler. The most obvious is abandoned/forsaken/left (one word in the original): v 18 leads to v 20, then to v 24, then to v 25, all with ‘tit-for-tat’ connections. Similarly, Joash having ‘conspired’ against Zechariah (21, RSV) and killed him (22) himself falls victim to a conspiracy and is killed (25). Even the ‘seeking’ which Joash had enjoined on Zechariah’s father (see on 6) comes home to roost: ‘seek you out’ is the phrase translated call you to account in v 22. But the Lord’s vengeance is not inevitable; retribution is more complex than that; it is to remind Israel of the possibility of repentance that the prophets are sent (19).

25:1–28 Amaziah

Like his father's, Amaziah's is a 'good start/bad end' story. It has a helpful variation: while Joash needed a strong guide, Amaziah had God's plain words through a prophet. It is found in 2 Ki. 14, but Chronicles' version (15–16) is much fuller.

25:1–13 A good beginning. Not whole-heartedly could mean Amaziah's doing right at first and wrong later; but more probably, as hinted in vs 6 and 9, his trust in God was not very secure even from the outset. He was certainly careful to keep within the law in v 4 (Dt. 24:16), but that would have ironic echoes (see below on v 13).

2 Ki. 14:7 is a springboard for the detailed account here of Amaziah's war against Edom. Reckoning that his army is not large enough (cf. 14:8 mg.; 17:14–18), he hires mercenaries from the north, and is rebuked for doing so by the first of this chapter's two prophets. Abijah (13:8–12) and Asa (14:11) could have told him why. His complaint that he would be out of pocket if he did the right thing is perhaps a sign of his half-hearted faith, but at any rate he did it. The result is instructive. Generally the Chronicler's examples of cause and effect are simple and swift, and so here obedience results in victory (11–12). But often life is not so simple, and Amaziah's obedience also leads to the mercenaries, balked of the loot from Edom which would have been their main incentive for signing on, taking it out on Judah instead (10, 13). However, such apparently undeserved trouble (see on v 4), a Job-like exception to the simple answer Amaziah was no doubt expecting (7–9), may have made him more cynical about listening to the next prophet.

25:14–28 A bad ending. The rebuke of the second prophet is for the importing of foreign gods (15). It seems to blame Amaziah for being not only sinful but unreasonable (why adopt gods who have just let their own nation down?), but perhaps his victory showed that they had changed sides. He turns from unwelcome to congenial advice (16–17; cf. Rehoboam, 10:8, and Ahab, 18:7), and embarks on a second war, this time against Israel. This has a combination of causes: Amaziah's desire to avenge the damage done by the dismissed Israelite mercenaries (13), his over-confidence after his victory in the previous war (19; this is how Jehoash of Israel sees it), and punishment from God for his 'seeking' of the gods of Edom (20; cf. vs 15–16). In consequence Amaziah suffers invasion, defeat, capture, and destruction and pillage in Jerusalem (21–24).

The curious and unique note in v 25 (dates in the south related to those in the north) reflects a unique situation. Amaziah was held hostage in Samaria for the next ten years, and only then, after the death of Jehoash, did he return to Jerusalem for the remaining fifteen years of his reign. Meanwhile the people of Judah, faced with the unprecedented problem of both having and not having a king, made his son Uzziah regent; see on 26:1. Those who conspired to murder him were repeating the doom of his father Joash (24:25), and also showing how retribution is not always immediate—in this case the conspiracy seems to have been brewing for at least twenty-five years (27).

26:1–23 Uzziah

Uzziah's name in Kings is Azariah, which means 'Lord/help'; the name here, 'Lord/strength', is especially apt for the Chronicler's version of the story, which, though it has much about help, has even more about strength (cf. v 8). Regent at sixteen when his father was taken captive, co-regent after he returned ten years later, and sole king at last when Amaziah was killed fifteen years after that, he then began the remaining twenty-seven years of his long reign with the capture and restoration of Elath (1–2). This event, and his being stricken with leprosy towards the end of his life (21), signs of God’s approval and disapproval respectively, are practically all that Kings has to say about Uzziah (2 Ki. 14:21–22; 15:1–7). This points to his being another ‘good start/bad end’ reign, like the previous two, and a further echo of Joash’s is the influence of Zechariah (like that of Jehoiada, cf. v 5 with 24:2) in the good first half. Yet Uzziah was a greater king than either Joash or Amaziah. History tells us that he and his northern contemporary Jeroboam II, profiting from a decline in the fortunes of the super-power Assyria, gave to both kingdoms real prosperity and power. Scripture tells us that the vision of the Lord seated on the throne, given to Isaiah ‘in the year that king Uzziah died’ (Is. 6:1), marked the end of his fifty-two-year reign as the end of a significant era.

26:1–15 A good beginning. The building of Elath was a sign both of God’s blessing and of the qualities in Uzziah which brought blessing. It meant that both the territory and the trade of the kingdom now reached further than they had done since the time of Solomon (8:17–18). It marked Uzziah as a man of vision.

Chronicles describes the character underlying such achievements: the comparison with Amaziah (4) is not a snide comment on the latter, but a focus on the right that he did do; his ‘seeking’ of God (5) is the Chronicler’s word for his personal devotion; and the instruction of Zechariah in the same verse shows him humble enough to accept good counsel. The result is many blessings that come to his people through this far-sighted man. They are not only military, but wide interests in agriculture—the basis, of course, of the nation’s economic life (6–15). Behind it all are the three key words, twice affirmed (7–8, 15): helped, fame, powerful (or full of strength).

26:16–23 A bad ending. The power of Uzziah (‘Strong-in-the-Lord’) led to his downfall (16). Kings tells of his leprosy; Chronicles adds the reason for it. The burning of incense in the temple (16) was the priests’ prerogative (Ex. 30:1–10). It was precisely for flouting this rule that the first king of the northern kingdom had been condemned (1 Ki. 12:28–13:5). To attempt the rite was bad enough (18); to be angry at being rebuked for it was what brought the punishment (19).

Retribution could scarcely have been more immediate. But there are features which set this one apart from previous examples. Far from ‘forsaking’ the Lord, like so many before him, Uzziah had come to the heart of Israel’s religion, and it was by his action there, of all places, that he showed himself unfaithful (18). Nor could he blame youth and immaturity; he was a man of great experience. His affliction was almost certainly not leprosy in the modern sense, but one of a range of skin conditions any of which would debar a man from public life in Israel. His punishment was exclusion from both temple and palace (21), and from the service of his people, for the rest of his life. Paul’s words carry an apt warning (1 Cor. 9:27).

27:1–9 Jotham

Jotham did just as his father Uzziah had done (2), except for Uzziah’s resounding failure at the end; in his general life and righteousness, and in the resulting power (6) to build in town and in country, to win wars, and to receive tribute, his reign parallels his father’s closely. The Chronicler stresses these signs of blessing, and omits the negative note of attacks by Israel (cf. 2 Ki. 15:37), so that everything he says about Jotham’s reign is positive, making him the first king for 170 years—since Abijah—of whom nothing bad is recorded. After the last three reigns, each of which had a good beginning and a bad ending, Jotham’s is the first of three which are monochrome; his, being all good, contrasting with his son’s, which was a total disaster.

The people, however (2), were already providing a contrast to their righteous king. Chronicles is much more than a record of monarchs whose careers illustrate the simple principle that obedience is rewarded and disobedience is punished. Already in the reigns of Jehoram (21:19–20) and Athaliah (23:21) good people have disapproved of bad rulers; now there is corruption among the people in spite of the king's righteousness. So the nation is blessed for Jotham's sake and continues to sin without punishment until 'the one who now holds it back ... is taken out of the way' (2 Thes. 2:7) and the accession of Ahaz reveals the bankruptcy of throne and people alike. Theirs is the generation foreseen by Moses, which 'thinks "I will be safe, even though I persist in going my own way"' (Dt. 29:19), but which will find it has been grievously mistaken (see below).

28:1–27 Ahaz

The Chronicler rewrites the account in 2 Ki. 16:1–20, and heightens the contrast between father and son. From Jotham, with no fault, he turns abruptly to Ahaz, about whom there is not a positive thing to be said; he is even worse than the three rulers of Athaliah's time a century before. This account underlines his unfaithfulness (22) and tells how the worship of the Lord has been actually replaced by the worship of foreign gods (24–25). The people's faithlessness also now comes out into the open, and the result, in the words of Moses' prophecy quoted above, is that they find themselves 'uprooted ... and thrust ... into another land' (Dt. 29:28). So the reign of Ahaz both recalls the infidelities of the northern kingdom when it first broke away, and anticipates the deportations to come in 130 years' time.

Meanwhile, in one of his rare forays north of the border, the Chronicler shows two things that are happening there. Having repudiated the rule of the house of David so long before, the kings of Israel have at last been defeated and deported by Assyrian invaders. The Chronicler does not even mention the event, but simply describes a north now without kings. The people of the north, however, as distinct from their kings, are still 'family', and they even repent of sin when God sends them a prophet.

So the south is now in as bad a way as ever the north was, while the north is now as open to restoration as ever the south has been. The way is prepared for the coming of Hezekiah, the new Solomon, and the restoration of 'all Israel'.

28:1–8 Captivity. No previous southern king has been as bad as Ahaz. Without any preliminary but v 1a, the first four verses list his sins in increasing order of infidelity. Since they include the detestable ways for which the Lord had driven out the Canaanite nations when Israel first came to Canaan (3), it is no wonder that Judah begins to experience the same driving out (5, 8).

The attacks by Aram and Israel, not particularly successful in 2 Ki. 16:5–9, were effective enough to make the Chronicler's points. For one thing, the resulting captivity was a foretaste of the greater one to come. For another, vs 5–6 seem to be a deliberate reflection of the words of Abijah back in 13:11–12 and 15–17: forsaking the Lord, the God of their fathers, leads to defeat with great slaughter and to being given into the hands of their enemies—as with Israel, so with Judah.

28:9–15 The neighbours. The scene in Samaria is a remarkable one in several respects. First, not only is there a true prophet there, but he is actually heeded (9, 13). Next, the reversal of Abijah's words to show that Judah is as guilty now as Israel was then (see on vs 5–6 above) does not mean that Israel is now blameless—far from it: God is angry with both kingdoms (9, 11, 13). Then the appearance of leaders in Samaria (12) suggests that the line of northern kings has come to an end; so the way is open for the common people of the north to reunite with their ‘brothers’ (8, 11, 15; NIV’s kinsmen and fellow countrymen weaken the point; cf. 11:4) in the south. V 13 seems to show regret not just for this incident, but for the general guilt of the north. Finally, the good deed of v 15, involving people from Samaria and Jericho, foreshadows Jesus’ parable in Lk. 10:25–37. Both incidents show how the working of God’s grace may startle and confound his people.

28:16–27 Ahaz’s appeal to Assyria. There is hope then for the north. But meanwhile Ahaz’s Judah has yet to sink to its lowest depth. Philistine onslaughts (18) recall the days of Saul, and a situation from which only God’s true king (then David, now Hezekiah) can rescue his people. But people and king together have rebelled (19), and since they refuse to seek help from the only one who can give it, they can hardly be surprised when Assyria gives Ahaz trouble instead of help (16, 20, 21). His final appeal to the foreign gods, even closing down the temple altogether (22–25), brings the southern kingdom where the northern was (13:8–9). One gleam of hope is left, in that when he dies someone at any rate has the discernment to deny him a burying-place among the kings (27).

29:1–32:33 Hezekiah

Scripture tells Hezekiah’s story in two quite different ways. As the Chronicler rewrites Kings, he expands four verses on Hezekiah’s religious reforms (2 Ki. 18:3–6) into eighty-four (2 Ch. 29–31), and reduces the rest (2 Ki. 18:7–20:21) to a third of its length (2 Ch. 32). This is not just because of his great interest in the temple. He has hinted in ch. 28 at the growing menace of Assyria; the days of its weakness, when Uzziah’s power had a chance to grow, are long gone, it has been overrunning the smaller nations of the Near East, including Israel, and the Chronicler’s first three chapters on Hezekiah are to be read with an eye to the threat of imminent invasion (32:1).

The reign of Ahaz saw Judah on the brink of ruin and Israel destroyed. Hezekiah’s reign is the opportunity for a new start for both kingdoms, not unlike that at the end of Saul’s reign. Much here will recall those days, from the phrase as his father David had done (29:2)—no mere formula—to the whole of chs. 29–31, which show many parallels to Solomon’s work in chs. 7–9. For the Chronicler Hezekiah is the greatest of the Davidic kings since that golden age.

29:1–19 The temple cleansed. Where Jotham was compared to Uzziah, and Uzziah to Amaziah (27:2; 26:4), Hezekiah is compared to David thirteen generations earlier (2), and from v 3 onwards his work plainly resembles Solomon’s. It begins probably on the first ‘new year’s day’ of his reign, rather than immediately after his accession (3, 17), with a formal address to religious leaders—Levites (5) must include priests, who were of course of the tribe of Levi—requiring them to make good the ravages wrought in the temple by Ahaz. Ahaz had feared trouble and so turned to other gods, but Hezekiah is clear that the infidelity was there first and was the cause of the trouble, which by now includes both the dread and horror and scorn (8) spoken of in Je. 29:18, and a first experience of exile for both north and south (9). Now that responsible people occupy both throne and temple, God’s anger will be averted (10–11). All that has defiled the temple is taken to the valley east of the city to be burnt (16; 15:16). The work has taken sixteen days (17; see below on 30:3).

29:20–36 Temple worship re-established. The ceremony for the reopening of the temple begins with sacrifice (20–24). The sin offering means cleansing for the past, and the burnt offering consecration for the future. Vs 21 and 24 may indicate that the former was going to be offered for the sins of throne, temple and (southern) nation, but that Hezekiah included both halves of the nation. Next the worshippers' praises are described (25–30), though they took place simultaneously with the burnt offering (27). After that the whole assembly brought its offerings (31–36). As on equivalent occasions in the times of Moses, David and Solomon, one cannot miss the note of willingness, abundance and joy. The popular movement was set in motion by Hezekiah; he in turn was 'preaching' what the prophets (including David!) had said, which was itself the word of the Lord (25); all stemmed ultimately from what God had brought about (36).

30:1–12 Invitation to the Passover. After the reopening, the first regular festival to be held in the temple was to be the Passover. Kings does not mention this, and some think it an invention of the Chronicler's to justify the temple practices of his own day and to enhance his picture of Hezekiah. But the point is far from proved, and this chapter is entirely consistent with the rest of this king's story as he seeks to unite north and south around the festival which more than any other is appropriate for a new beginning for God's people (5). The decision to hold it in the second month was not arbitrary, like Jeroboam's invention of an alternative religion for his northern kingdom when it first broke away (1 Ki. 12:32–33). All agreed with Hezekiah that since in a number of ways they were not ready on the proper date (3; 29:17), they should use the concession the law allowed to hold Passover a month later (Nu. 9:9–11). This had been designed for those who were ritually 'unclean'; for example, through contact with a dead body, or who were too far from home—very fitting for a nation which had wandered from God, and been contaminated by the deadly touch of pagan religion.

The invitation (6–9), in terms very like those of the king's address to religious leaders (29:5–11), is to 'all Israel' (6, RSV) both north and south. A positive aspect of the Chronicler's emphasis on speedy retribution is that each generation can have a new start (8). The response from the north is mixed, but in all who do gather, it is again as in 29:36 the grace of God which has brought them (12).

30:13–27 Celebration of the Passover. Unleavened Bread and Passover belonged together; the name of either feast might be used for both combined. Whatever may be the reason for the priests' shame (15), it emphasizes the need for royal leadership, and is a reminder that both kingship and priesthood are necessary in God's economy. The irregularities in the ceremony of vs 15–20 (which incidentally the Chronicler would have been unlikely to invent; see on 30:1–12), were to be expected in such a novel situation, i.e. a restored temple and a reunited nation. But they were overridden by Hezekiah, who (as another Solomon) saw beyond the letter of the law to its spirit, and prayed for his people in the terms of the great prayer of 7:14, which is recalled also in the climax at v 27. The extra seven days of v 23 recall that original ceremony (7:8–10), and there were representatives from all Israel for the first time since Solomon's days.

31:1–10 Generous giving. The false gods, which had promised prosperity and failed to deliver, are at last repudiated (1). It is a return to the true God which enables the generosity of this chapter. What Hezekiah has in view here is the continuing of the worship of God, so auspiciously begun. Like David and Solomon (1 Ch. 23–26; 2 Ch. 8:12–14) he appoints the priests' and Levites' divisions, and provides what they need for their religious duties (1 Ch. 29:3; 2 Ch. 9:10–11); and he requires the people to supply their stipends (2–4). As on the previous historic occasions, generous giving follows, and does not flag as the year goes by. The temple is reopened, first month; Passover, second month; beginning of grain harvest (Feast of Weeks), third month, to end of grape harvest (Feast of Tabernacles), seventh month (5–7). Hezekiah blesses Israel, as his great predecessors had done (8; 6:3; 1 Ch. 16:2), for a liberality such as they too had witnessed (10; 1 Ch. 29:6–9; cf. Ex. 36:2–7).

31:11–21 Faithful administration. Once the principle of ‘providing for the ministry’ has been accepted, Hezekiah turns to the practicalities of storage (11–13), distribution in the towns (14–18), and distribution in rural areas (19). This administrative work, mundane though it may seem, is as much a part of the service of God’s temple (21) as anything else he has undertaken, and is carried out with care and thoroughness. It is easy enough for bureaucracy to be the enemy of spiritual life, but there is a difference between structures which hinder the flow and those which channel it.

32:1–23 The Assyrian invasion. Hezekiah has ‘come to the royal position for such a time as this’ (Est. 4:14), in two senses. Nationally, it is the providential time for the renewal of north and south alike. Internationally, the Assyrian war-machine is at the gates, and the campaigns of 2 Ki. 18:17–19:36, simplified here into a single attack, threaten the political destruction of Judah. The latter threat is the subject of this chapter, and is seen in the light of the religious reforms of chs. 29–31: where Kings dates it in Hezekiah’s fourteenth year (2 Ki. 18:13), Chronicles says rather that it came after all that Hezekiah had so faithfully done (1).

It meets strong resistance (2–8). 2 Ki. 18:14 indicates not fear, but the buying of time for the defensive works described in vs 1–8. For some in Jerusalem these were an alternative to trust in God (Is. 22:8–11), but for Hezekiah they were an expression of it. Sennacherib’s message (9–15) showed how little he understood his enemy, for the supposed insult to the Lord was actually obedience to him (12). It is the Assyrians who really insult God (16–19, recalling Ps. 2:2), encouraging God’s people to believe that now he will certainly not act to vindicate his own name. Hence the prayer of v 20, answered by the destroying angel (cf. 1 Ch. 21:15; Ex. 12:12) with an unspecified disaster; both this and Sennacherib’s murder are recorded in secular history. Note how recompense both good and bad works out, and how it is reported, in the case of each king. Hezekiah’s blessing, the lifting of the siege, was a reward for reforms begun (as noted above) fourteen years earlier; and Sennacherib’s punishment, assassination, took place twenty years after his campaigns in Judah. Chronicles foreshortens the whole story, ending it with the characteristic signs of God’s approval, rest for Israel (22 mg.) and fame for Hezekiah (23).

32:24–33 The end of Hezekiah’s reign. These incidents may run parallel to the events just described, rather than following them: ‘In the course of those days Hezekiah had become ill’ Like the last section, this general picture of the greatest king since Solomon should warn us not to oversimplify the doctrine of rewards and punishments. We are told of no sin that might have led to his illness (24a); on the other hand, prayer led to his healing, with a sign to show it was coming (24b; it is assumed that we know 2 Ki. 20:1–11). Pride led to wrath (25), perhaps the invasion just described; humility led to the invader’s withdrawal—though another would be successful later (26). Hezekiah’s greatness was like Solomon’s (27–29). The divine resources he drew on are aptly symbolized by the famous tunnel which brought right into the city a never-failing water supply, the ‘waters of Shiloah’ which his father Ahaz, unwilling to trust God, had rejected (30; Is. 8:6). He was still capable of failing the test, as when a Babylonian embassy came, ostensibly with an astronomical interest in his ‘sign’, probably also sounding out possibilities of a political alliance (31; 2 Ki. 20:12–19). But his final epitaph is that of a pre-eminently great and good man.

33:1–20 Manasseh

2 Ki. 21:1–9 shows all the weakness of Manasseh, and what Chronicles adds merely underlines it. He and his father form a stark contrast, like that seen immediately before them in Jotham and Ahaz: good then bad, then very good and very bad. But the Chronicler’s picture is different. His addition of the story of Manasseh's repentance alters the above pattern; instead of the long-term consequences of an entirely evil reign, he shows the immediate consequences of its evil first half; and within this one lifetime he sees the pattern of Ahaz followed by Hezekiah, which reflects also from earlier times that of Saul followed by David, and from later times that of the exile followed by the restoration.

33:1–9 Manasseh's sin. Such a long reign, even longer than Uzziah's, would normally be thought a mark of God's blessing. Its length would seem out of keeping therefore with a story of such unrelieved wickedness as the Kings account of Manasseh. It is not surprising that the Chronicler adds vs 11–20 to the Kings account in vs 11–20. But first he portrays the king as even worse if possible than his grand-father Ahaz, with sorcery and occultism, and the temple, previously closed, now actually desecrated (cf. Dt. 18:9–13). No doubt practices of this sort were not mere perversity, but were seen as religious means to a political end, the securing of Manasseh's position. He would not learn from history that that was the way to lose the land (2, 8), and even outdid the Canaanites in this self-destructive folly (9).

33:10–20 Manasseh's repentance. So great was Manasseh's sin, says Kings, that in the long term it made the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem, fifty years after his death, inevitable (2 Ki. 23:26–27; 24:3–4). The Chronicler, interested in the more immediate consequences, climaxes it with a refusal to heed God's warning (10), and then at once follows that with the humiliation of 11. This obviously foreshadows the time when Babylon would itself be the imperial power which would take many Israelites into exile for many years. Various occasions have been suggested when Manasseh, forced for much of his reign to recognize Assyria as overlord, might have stepped out of line and been punished.

The reforms which followed his repentance are the typical signs of blessing (14–17). His prayer (18–19; cf. v 13) is now lost; the Prayer of Manasseh in the Apocrypha is a much later composition. A closely related passage in the NT is Paul's description of God's mercy to the 'chief of sinners' in 1 Tim. 1:15–16.

33:21–25 Amon

The account of this reign is the briefest in Chronicles, and is little more than an appendix to the previous one. Here Amon undoes the good of Manasseh's later years, and the task of his son Josiah will be to put right the wrongs of Amon's reign; in Kings Amon simply adds to Manasseh's sins, and Josiah has to right the wrongs of both reigns. Nothing more is known about the conspiracy of v 24, and nothing certain about the people of the land in v 25.

34:1–35:27 Josiah

This account of Josiah, similar in length to the one in Kings (2 Ki. 22:1–23:30), has different emphases, though both books regard him as a very great man. In Kings all his reforms are related to the discovery of the 'Book of the Law'; his famous celebration of the Passover is mentioned only briefly, but he is portrayed as the greatest of Judah's kings and the climax of her history (2 Ki. 23:25). For the Chronicler, Hezekiah's is the more important reign, and since then Judah has been on the downward slope. At the same time he cannot praise too highly all Josiah's acts of devotion (35:26), and they begin long before the finding of the book in the temple.

The dating given here in 34:1–8 (Years 8, 12, 18 of Josiah's reign) have raised the question of whether Kings and Chronicles differ over when his reforms began. Commentators differ as to which book sets out to be chronological and which to be schematic. In either case the background to the story is a decline in the power of Assyria, which gives Josiah greater freedom of action, relieves the pressures on Judah (for good or ill; the 'all-Israel' solidarity which Hezekiah enjoyed Josiah will lack), and leads to a realignment of the major powers so that Egypt and Babylon will soon become forces to be reckoned with (35:20–21; 36:5–6).

34:1–13 Josiah the reformer. The Chronicler has filled out 2 Ki. 22:1–7 in two ways: Josiah's pious character before he began on the temple repairs, and his thorough methods once he did. Not even Hezekiah is credited with this undeviating godliness (2). The words while he was still young no doubt indicate a personal seeking for God, before he came of age at twenty (in his twelfth year, v 3). His early reforms were far-reaching (4–7); the Assyrian overlords of northern Israel were being assailed on other fronts and could not dispute the northward spread of Josiah's authority (6). The Chronicler characteristically sees the work of both labourers and musicians as belonging equally to the Levites' service in God's house (9–13).

34:14–33 Finding the book. The discovery of the Book of the Law may be a reward for Josiah's devotion, but it is an uncomfortable one. We do not know during which period of neglect the book had been mislaid, nor indeed what exactly it was; the majority view is that it was part or all of Deuteronomy, of which chs. 12, 16, 27 and 28 are closely related to what follows here. Perhaps more of the Torah, the first five books of our Bible, may have been included.

Another mark of Josiah's outstanding character (cf. v 2) is that he actively seeks a word from the Lord (21). The response from the prophetess Huldah (23–28) is unusual in that the curses the book pronounces (Dt. 27–28; perhaps also, e.g. Lv. 26) are about sins committed before Josiah's time (25) and punishment which will fall after his time (28). It was in the sense of being spared the experience of Jerusalem's fall that Josiah would be buried in peace, although he died of wounds sustained in battle (35:23–24). But the nation would not so be spared; its heart was not like the heart of its king. All the people (30), a phrase often used in earlier reigns to show a united willingness, now have to be made to commit themselves to God's service (32–33).

35:1–19 Celebrating the Passover. There are only three verses in the older history (2 Ki. 23:21–23) about this remarkable event. For Josiah it would have followed naturally from the covenant he had just renewed between Israel and the Lord (34:29–32). He was eager that proper dates and duties be observed (1–4). The curious note (3) about putting the ark in the temple (When had it been taken out? Why had it not been returned sooner?) may mean a deliberate re-enacting of the original inauguration of tabernacle or temple. Hezekiah may have been seen by the Chronicler as a greater king, but Josiah's provision of animals for sacrifice was even more lavish than his (6–9), and the ceremonies went right back to Moses (12), not simply to David (15); it was an occasion unique in the whole history of the monarchy (18).

35:20–27 The death of Josiah. In another addition to the Kings account (2 Ki. 23:29–30), the death of Josiah thirteen years later is here connected with disobedience on his part, though in strange circumstances. Carchemish (20) was to be the rendezvous between the Assyrians and their Egyptian allies, trying to withstand the growing power of Babylon. Whether or not Josiah was right to take sides, the Egyptian king's words are described as a message from God (22; for similar words through unlikely mouthpieces, cf. 36:23; 2 Ki. 18:25; Jn. 11:49–52). In some way this message must have been confirmed to him as one he should have heeded. His death was deeply mourned.

36:1–23 The last kings

Chronicles ends with a streamlining of the Kings account of the last four reigns of the monarchy. In Judah Josiah was succeeded by three sons and a grandson. All are here given 'throne-name' alternatives (cf. 1 Ch. 3:15–16; 2 Ki. 24:17). Nothing more is known of the eldest son, Johanan. It seems that the fourth, Shallum, came to the throne first as Jehoahaz; 3 months later he was replaced by the second, Eliakim/Jehoiakim, succeeded after eleven years by his son Jeconiah/Jehoiachin; finally came the remaining son of Josiah, Mattaniah/Zedekiah. These changes were related to developments on the international scene. Assyria was in terminal decline; Babylon was eager to hasten it; Egypt wanted to delay it. In the space of a few months in 609 BC Josiah was killed, Jehoahaz deposed, and Jehoiakim installed, all by the Egyptians. But at the battle of Carchemish four years later Egypt was defeated by the Babylonians, and it was they who three months after the death of Jehoiakim in 597 BC deposed his young son Jehoiachin, and put Zedekiah on the throne for the last few years of the monarchy until he too rebelled and was removed.

Where the Chronicler leaves out so much, it is worth noting what he leaves in. No king's death is recorded, but the disappearance from the scene of each in turn, and thus the downfall of the Davidic monarchy, is. So is the looting and final ruin of Solomon's temple. And it is made plain that whatever long-term punishment all this represents, it is also the immediate retribution for the sins of that final generation. Yet through it all Israel survives, both nation and land, as is plain from the book's closing verses even if it ends at 36:21 without the added note of the restoration under Cyrus.

36:1–4 Jehoahaz. By the time of Josiah, the Assyrian empire had dominated the Near East for well over a century. But it was being shored up in its final years by Neco of Egypt, at whose hands Josiah died (35:20–24). For some reason Josiah's three elder sons were passed over (perhaps Johanan was already dead) and the fourth was made king as Jehoahaz. The tribute demanded in v 3 almost certainly made inroads into the treasures of the temple (see vs 7, 10, 18), and after three months Neco removed Jehoahaz from the throne and replaced him with his brother Jehoiakim. Priesthood and monarchy were both nearing their end. The exile of Jehoahaz in Egypt was one more foretaste of the great exile to come.

36:5–8 Jehoiakim. It was during Jehoiakim's reign that Babylon took control of the region from Egypt (2 Ki. 24:7). Jehoiakim's subjection to the Babylonians (6) may not have been at the end of his reign, as v 6 might be thought to suggest, and he may not even have gone to Babylon, let alone died there (2 Ki. 24:1, 6). But the Chronicler twice uses the doom-laden words to Babylon, in v 6 about the king and in v 7 about the temple treasures. Exile, and the end of temple and throne, are looming larger.

36:9–10 Jehoiachin. Jehoiachin's reign is here abbreviated even more than the previous two. His being sent for had involved a rebellion against Babylon, it seems, and the arrival of the king of Babylon in person (2 Ki. 24:10–12). The only important thing for the Chronicler is the removal, once again, of temple treasure and of the occupant of the throne to Babylon.

36:11–21 Zedekiah. The account of Zedekiah's reign merges into the story of the kingdom's final downfall. His sin is noted (12) but it represents the sin of the nation (14); Josiah's reforms, as hinted at the time, had no real effect, and the last straw was the people's refusal to hear and trust God's messages (16). In the often-recalled terms of 7:14, there is no humbling (12), no turning (13), and consequently no healing (remedy, 16). It is stressed that all this is God's doing (15–17), and that what he is doing is taking to Babylon (18, 20) all that remains in Solomon's temple and the whole population of David's kingdom. 'The poorest people ... were left' (2 Ki. 24:14), but the Chronicler's picture is of a land practically depopulated.

However, vs 20–21 show that God intended to preserve the remnant in Babylon as his people, that his land too would survive, its devastation being in fact its long-overdue sabbath, and that his word (Je. 25:11) was not belied but confirmed by these events.

36:22–23 Postscript. These are the opening verses of Ezra, added here (it is not known by whom) to link the two histories. Chronicles does not in fact need them to complete its message, as the promise of restoration is already there in the previous two verses.

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH

Introduction

Although the books of Ezra and Nehemiah appear as two separate works in our English Bibles, they were originally two parts of a single work, and they should be studied together as a single whole. Not only is ancient Jewish tradition clear about this (the division into two books being probably an innovation by the Christian church), but more importantly the contents of the books themselves demonstrate it. In particular, the second half of Nehemiah serves as a climax to all that has gone before, not least the work of Ezra, as his prominence in Ne. 8 makes clear.

Although Ne. 1:1 obviously starts a new section in the work, it marks no more of a break in the narrative than does Ezr. 7:1, where Ezra himself is first introduced.

It is less certain whether in addition the books should be regarded as an integral part of the work of the author of the books of Chronicles. Clearly, they serve to continue his narrative, as the repetition of the ending of Chronicles in the opening verses of Ezra shows, but that does not by itself necessarily require the same author. Again, both works demonstrate a number of interests in common, most notably their attention to the workings and personnel of the temple in Jerusalem. But since they are both the products of a relatively small community which was itself dominated by the temple, such common interests are hardly surprising. Scholars therefore differ on this question. Fortunately, however, there are not many places where a decision one way or the other makes a great deal of difference to the interpretation of Ezra and Nehemiah. They will therefore be discussed here without further reference to the books of Chronicles.

Historical background

Since the books of Ezra and Nehemiah take the form of a historical narrative, we need to know something of their background and the wider course of events to which they refer in order to understand better their contribution to the unfolding of the biblical story as a whole.

The books of Kings tell the long history of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Israel's separate existence came to an end in 722 BC when the Assyrians finally absorbed the country into their empire (2 Ki. 17). For about another 150 years, the small kingdom of Judah, with its Davidic king and its capital in Jerusalem, continued to exist as a separate state which enjoyed very mixed fortunes. Nevertheless, it is important to remember that whatever we know of Israel in earlier times must have reached us through this channel.

In 587 BC, Judah suffered a similar fate to that of its northern neighbour Israel, though this time at the hands of the Babylonians, who had in the meantime replaced the Assyrians as the dominant world-empire of the day. It is difficult to exaggerate the radical disruption which the Babylonian conquest brought about. Many of the people, and in particular the leaders and ruling classes, were taken into exile in Babylon. The temple, which had stood for so long as a focal point for the religion and unity of the people, was razed to the ground and its valuables removed to the temple of the victorious Babylonians. The king too was removed (2 Ki. 25:7), as his predecessor had been (2 Ki. 24:15), so that the monarchy, in which such high hopes had been vested since the time of David (2 Sa. 7), simply ceased to exist. The country itself seems to have become nothing more than a somewhat remote province of the Babylonian empire. With this wholesale dismantling of all the major institutions of state, it must have appeared to many that Judah, and with it the religion to which it alone bore witness, had been consigned to the pages of history, a fate which several of the neighbouring states also suffered at this time. The book of Lamentations captures this sense of helplessness and despair.

We do not know enough about the situation in either Judah or Babylon during the next fifty years, the period commonly referred to as the exile. What is clear, however, is that among the exiles there were those who not only worked out a strategy for physical and social survival, but who, more significantly, also came to realize that God had not finished with them. Indeed, a major theological breakthrough was the appreciation that far from being outside his control, these catastrophic events were in fact his doing. By taking that awareness on board and seeking to learn its painful lessons, some at least of the community in exile learned to read, preserve and eventually to add to their sacred writings from the standpoint of this new perspective.

The year 538 BC, the point at which the book of Ezra begins, heralded a major change not only in the fortunes of the Jewish community in exile, but in the whole history of the ancient Near East. Cyrus the Persian, who had risen rapidly to power in his homeland and begun a series of wider conquests in the immediately preceding years, entered Babylon in triumph, and thereby became the undisputed ruler of the whole of the previous Babylonian empire. The Persian empire which he thus established became the major world power for the next two centuries or so. Its kings at various times controlled an area extending from Egypt as far as India. Of course, their fortunes fluctuated. There were periods of major internal unrest and rebellion; Egypt was by no means always under their control and some of their conflicts with neighbouring powers such as Greece have become legendary. Nor were all the Persian kings as able as Cyrus, Darius and Artaxerxes, the three of whom we read particularly in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Despite this, two important points emerge which need to be borne in mind. First, the territory of Judah was more important to the Persians than might initially be supposed because of its strategic position near the troubled border with Egypt. It was a matter of concern to them to ensure that the loyalty to the empire of this area was preserved. And secondly, when it suited their interests to do so, the Persians practised the policy of seeking to win such loyalty by granting a degree of local autonomy to their subject peoples in both religious and legal affairs. Of course, they could be as oppressive and cruel as the Assyrians and Babylonians when they felt they needed to be, but alongside this the more liberal policy of repatriation which we see illustrated in the book of Ezra had its place in their method of government.

As we shall see shortly, the biblical writers do not focus primarily on such wider concerns. Nevertheless, these concerns colour much of their attitude towards international politics and, perhaps more significantly, they provide the framework within which the characters they write about were able to operate. The realities of the situation constrained them in what it was practical to do and to expect, so that as we read we must not look for more than it was reasonable for them to deliver. National independence must have seemed a remote dream at best. What was required at the time was a means of adapting the religious standards and truths which had previously been worked out in very different circumstances to the new situation of a small religious community in the shadow of a major foreign world-power.

The Persian Empire in the fifth century BC.

Setting

Against this general background, where do the books of Ezra and Nehemiah fit in? For several reasons, the question is not as easy to answer as might be supposed.

As with many biblical books, it is necessary to keep two different levels in mind. First, there is obviously the level of the setting of the events which are described, and this is the more straightforward of the two. Most of the necessary information for dealing with this will be referred to at the relevant points in the commentary below. One point which will not be discussed, however, is the date at which Ezra travelled to Jerusalem. According to Ezr. 7:7, this happened in the seventh year of Artaxerxes the king, but we are not told which of the three kings who bore that name this was. Since Ezra's story is told before Nehemiah's, it is usually supposed that it was Artaxerxes I, so that the date in question is 458 BC. Readers should be warned, however, that a number of scholars think rather in terms of Artaxerxes II (so dating Ezra in 398 BC) and that he came to Jerusalem after Nehemiah. This view, which may be found in other commentaries, obviously involves a good deal of rearranging of the material at this primary historical level. It is not as popular as it once was, however, and it is not followed here. (I have discussed the matter more fully in the works cited in the Further Reading list.)

Secondly, it is always worthwhile, when reading a historical book, to ask about the setting and purpose of the writer or editor who compiled the work in its present form. Obviously, this took place later, sometimes much later, than the events which are being described. For example, when reading the gospels it is normal to investigate the particular emphases of each individual evangelist, and this is helped by the fact that we can compare his presentation with that of the others. We can note what has been included and omitted, where the order of presentation differs, and so on. We want to know both what each author teaches us about Jesus himself, and why he has done it in this particular way.

In principle the same is true of Ezra and Nehemiah. It is clear that the writer has used various sources, and equally that he has not always used all the material with which they provided him. Similarly, we shall note places in the commentary where he has arranged the material in his own order for his own good reasons. Study of these matters helps us to see what the writer was most concerned to emphasize to his own readers.

This, however, is where other problems arise, principally that there is no certain way of determining exactly when the author wrote and therefore of quite who he was writing for. One probable view is that the accounts of the work of Ezra and Nehemiah (i.e. roughly Ezr. 7–Ne. 13) were combined around 400 BC and that Ezr. 1–6 was added to bring the books into their present form about a century later. If that is right, then, as we know from other sources, a likely concern of the opening chapters, for instance, would be for the legitimacy of the Jewish community's form and expression of worship in the face of rival claims, principally the developing group who we know of later as the Samaritans. We must therefore note how the restoration of the temple is presented as being in a true line of continuity with earlier forms of Israelite worship and how the community established its sense of identity in the face of rival claims. From this, there are helpful lessons to be learned today for places where the church too is struggling to maintain its true identity in a hostile environment, especially as we live so long after the events that are at the foundation of our faith.

Some principal themes

It is possible, in the light of these considerations, to pick out a number of themes which run through the two books. The reason for mentioning these here is not to try to say everything that the books teach about these matters, but rather to raise questions and issues which it will be helpful to bear in mind when reading the text itself.

A theological view of history

The first point to emphasize is that these books are highly selective in what they choose to tell us. The phrase 'after these things' at Ezr. 7:1, for instance, covers a period of more than fifty years. Ezra's activities mostly fit into a single period of twelve months, and of Nehemiah's work we know nothing after his first year or so of frenetic activity until his second term as governor, more than twelve years later. Similarly, the references in Ne. 12:26 and 47 seem to link the generation of those who returned at first directly with the work of the later reformers two or more generations later. Clearly, this is not a modern scientific history. Rather, the period being covered is viewed from the standpoint of God's overall control of the process by which his people were first re-established and then reformed in their land. Only those things which contributed to that are included. We too need to learn sometimes to lift our vision from the narrow flow of day-to-day events, which can often be discouraging, in order to discern God's greater purposes in our lives and in our world. In the light of that broader view, we come to appreciate better our own contribution to the whole.

Continuity

In the light of the perplexing circumstances of the exile outlined above, it was important for those who returned to Jerusalem and those who followed them to be reassured that they stood in the same line of faith as their forefathers. Could they still rely on the same promises of which we read in earlier OT books? Could they depend on God to aid and direct them as he had the former generations? Since their situation was so different from that which preceded, could they even claim to be the same people of Israel? Many examples of attention to such issues will be mentioned in the commentary, and no doubt there are more to be discovered. The way in which the return from exile is described, the processes by which the temple was rebuilt, the way in which it was furnished and the people who ministered there—these are just a few of the means by which the author sought to reassure his readers and give them a sense of religious bearing.

Perhaps most important of all was the attention he gave to the book of the law, the law of Moses (he uses many different titles, but they all refer to the same thing). Of course, much of the law, which we call the Pentateuch (Genesis to Deuteronomy), was written for a people living in a quite different situation, where as a sovereign nation they could regulate their own affairs entirely. Perhaps for that very reason many had come to regard it as a dead letter. It was Ezra's particular contribution, as we shall see, to develop methods of interpretation which taught them to draw out the underlying principles of Scripture so that they could be applied anew in their own later day, something which is as necessary for us as it was for them. Adherence to the teachings of this book (which of course is as much about God's grace and salvation and the nature of faith as it is about 'law' strictly defined) gave them, as it does us, the major means of access to the knowledge of God. It is this which is uppermost in establishing continuity with the faith of those who have preceded us.

The progress of restoration

The first three major sections of the books (Ezr. 1–6; 7–10; Ne. 1–7) each have a similar pattern: permission is granted to an individual or a group to return to Jerusalem from Babylon with a specific task to perform; as they set about it they encounter opposition of one sort or another but eventually they overcome this to complete at least the main part of the task in hand. This pattern in itself can serve as an encouragement to patience and faithfulness and as a warning against being deflected by external problems.

The last part of the work (Ne. 8–13), however, is rather different. At its heart is the reading of the law, followed by confession and a pledge to keep God's law (Ne. 8–10). But then, despite celebration of what has been achieved (Ne. 12:27–43), we read of the attempts, not always successful, to translate the values of such a high point into the more hum-drum routine which inevitably must follow. From this, we may draw out two points. First, the 'covenant renewal' of Ne. 8–10 is firmly located as the climax of God's work through the reformers, not as the condition for it. Later readers may learn that the faithful obedience which is expected of them is not a means to win God's favour, but is rather the response which they may cheerfully render in view of the way in which he has already restored and transformed their community existence. Secondly, the people of God cannot expect to be sustained for ever on a high plateau of spiritual excitement. Indeed, such moments lose their value if they are not translated into a life of regular, daily faithfulness and obedience even in such 'ordinary' matters as financial contributions for the service of God. The somewhat disappointing way in which the books come to a close in Ne. 13 suggests that, unaided, this indeed is the harder part.

Relationships

Almost throughout (Ne. 9:32–37 is the only major exception) the books paint the Persian kings in a positive light. From the first verse of Ezra, where Cyrus moves in response to God's prompting, through Darius's confirmation of the permission to rebuild the temple (Ezr. 6:6–12; cf. v 14) and Artaxerxes' commissioning of Ezra (Ezr. 7:12–26) and his support for Nehemiah (Ne. 2:6), they are the principal human agents of the divine will at the official level. By contrast, the political importance of the principal Jewish actors receives very little attention. In tracing this theme, it becomes clear that the writer was attempting to sketch a programme that took full account of reality and sought rather to press home the lessons of what faithfulness would entail within this framework. Since the dominant power was disposed in a friendly manner towards the Jews, they should concentrate on the opportunities for service which God has given to them rather than agitating for a major change in the status quo. Only the close of Ne. 9 serves as a reminder that God's best is yet to be.

By contrast, the immediately neighbouring officials are cast in a uniformly negative light, with Sanballat chief, but by no means alone, among them. And here, the threat is all the more serious in that these neighbours shared to some extent in the religious values of the Jews themselves (see, for instance, Ezr. 4:1–3). We need not doubt that there is a strongly apologetic note in the resolute way in which the treatment of such opposition is described. To many, this is one of the less attractive aspects of these books, especially when part of the resolution of the problem is shown to include the dissolving of mixed marriages (Ezr. 9–10; Ne. 13:23–28). Here again, however, it is necessary to bear in mind the circumstances which the Jews confronted, and not to seek to avoid the problem by 'spiritualizing' it away. It was vital for the continuity of the community, the purity of its religion and hence of its legacy to us that at this formative period there should be no compromise either of their legal status under Persian law or of the integrity of their self-identity. (In addition, it should be remembered that they were willing to receive individuals who wished to join with them in sincerity; cf. Ezr. 6:21.) There are times, and this was undoubtedly one of them, when priority has to be given to a focus on the purity of the 'light' and 'salt' qualities of the people of God lest by being dissolved completely their witness to the love and saving grace of God is lost completely from view.

These, then, are some of the distinctive themes of these books which may serve as guidelines for informed reading. This is not to deny, of course, that many other points will also repay attention. Among others might be mentioned the sovereign nature of God in view of the wider political realm in which these books are set by comparison with the earlier history books of the OT, the nature and practice of prayer, the characters of the principal actors, the qualities of leadership which they exemplify, and so on. All in all, it is clear that there is much of abiding value to be learned from these all too frequently neglected books.

Commentary

1:1–6:22 Return from exile and rebuilding of the temple

The first six chapters of Ezra cover a period of just over twenty years (538–515 BC), during which time a number of the Jews returned from their exile in Babylon and, after some delay, rebuilt the temple in Jerusalem which had been destroyed by the Babylonians fifty years before.

These events have not been written, however, in the form of a continuous narrative, but rather certain particular moments have been highlighted while other historically important matters, such as the actual journey back to Jerusalem, are not described at all. This is because the author lived at a time much later than the events he was recounting and so was limited by the written sources, such as copies of letters, lists and other documents, which were available to him. By the way in which he has arranged these and by the connecting comments which he has added, he has drawn attention to the religious and theological significance of these events for his later readers.

First, he emphasizes that although what happened might have appeared to be insignificant within the larger affairs of the mighty Persian empire, these events were in fact governed by the sovereign God of heaven, who used even pagan kings such as Cyrus and Darius to achieve his will for his people (e.g. 1:1 and 6:14). This encourages the reader to view international affairs in a different perspective from the normal, where a small and remote religious community might otherwise easily become discouraged.

At times of political change, the Christian learns to look beyond the surface of major upheaval to discern the opportunities which God may be offering for renewed evangelism, for instance, or for a change of direction in church strategy which will make its service and witness more effective in the new climate of society's expectations.

Secondly, there is a strong emphasis throughout this section on the continuity between the old institutions of Israel and those of the renewed Jerusalem community. The readers are thus reminded that they are the legitimate heirs of all that God had promised to his people long ago; theirs is no new religion but the direct continuation of that revealed to such leaders as Moses, David and Solomon.

There may also be a negative point involved here, namely the rejection of rival claims, such as those of the newly emerging Samaritan community in the north. If these chapters were compiled at the time when the Samaritan temple was being built (about 300 BC), then such reassurance would have been necessary. Thirdly, therefore, the author makes plain in chs. 4–6 that opposition to God's work is best overcome by faithful continuation in the tasks assigned by him rather than by compromise or confrontation. All these themes will be developed further later in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

1:1–11 Cyrus orders the return of the exiles and the temple vessels

This first chapter focuses on the first two points just described. The setting is the year in which, following his rapid rise to power, Cyrus captured Babylon (538 BC), so replacing the previous world empire of Babylon with that of the Persians. Persian imperial policy differed from that of its predecessors. Whereas they had sought to establish their authority by such harsh measures as the wholesale movement of subject populations (exile), the Persians preferred to accommodate the interests of local peoples when that also best served their own purposes. The need for loyalty among the inhabitants of the western extremity of the empire, which included Palestine, was necessary before the Persians could contemplate further expansion into Egypt, and this turned out much to the favour of the Jews.

1:1–6 The proclamation of Cyrus. While the secular historian seeks to explain events in terms of the imperial policies of the day, the biblical author sees these as but the means which God used to work out his purposes. Thus the prompting of Cyrus (1) and of the people of God in faithful obedience (5) can be described with exactly the same language. Furthermore, Cyrus is said to have been used to fulfil earlier prophecies, reference probably being made to Je. 50:9 and 51:11 read in the light of Is. 44:28 and 45:13. In line with this, what may originally have been a fairly localized announcement (the form of the proclamation in vs 2–4 is that of an oral message, probably to the Jewish leaders) is now to be seen as having universal significance, a proclamation throughout his realm (1).

The proclamation (2–4) concentrates on permission to return. The details concerning the rebuilding of the temple were the subject of a separate edict (cf. 6:3–6), because they affected others, not just the Jews. The two passages should not be taken as variant forms of the same edict.

The response of the people (5) is followed by a note (6) which is meant to remind us of the exodus from Egypt. The financial support given by all their neighbours includes not only that from Jews who decided not to return (cf. v 4), but also from non-Jews. The language of this verse recalls the theme of the ‘despoiling of the Egyptians’ in Ex. 3:21–22; 11:2; 12:35–36. This is the first of a number of such allusions to the exodus which together invite the reader to view in a new light what otherwise might have been written off as an obscure and insignificant event within the history of the Persian empire. To the eye of faith, this return is no less momentous than the events surrounding the very birth of the nation of Israel itself. It was equally an act of divine deliverance and even of national rebirth.

Note. 2 The title the God of heaven makes its first appearance in the Bible here. It is most commonly used in contexts where Jews are in contact with Persians. It may initially have been adopted as a title acceptable to both parties (the Persian deity, Ahura Mazda, was a celestial god).

1:7–11 The return of the temple vessels. This paragraph is doubtless based on an inventory of the returned temple vessels which would have been preserved in the temple archives. The author’s purpose in including it was far from antiquarian, however, as his own comments about it make clear. First, several points again recall aspects of the exodus from Egypt. It is clear from Is. 52:11–12 that the return of these vessels had become part of the established expectation of what would be involved in the ‘second exodus’. In addition, v 11 uses a formula which is common elsewhere as a description of the exodus (‘were brought up from ... to’, rather than NIV came up; cf. Gn. 50:24; Ex. 3:8, 17; and especially 33:1). Finally, it is possible that the unique title for Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah (8) may be a reflection of Nu. 7:84–86 (and cf. Nu. 2:3–31; 7:1–83; 34:18–28, in all of which NIV translates the same word as ‘leader’), where the ‘princes’ of the various tribes are associated with such vessels during the wilderness period.

Secondly, v 7 emphasizes that these vessels are the very ones which had been taken from the first temple in Jerusalem (cf. 2 Ki. 24:13; 25:13–15; 2 Ch. 26:7, 10, 18). Symbolically, they perhaps took the place of the idol gods of other nations which Nebuchadnezzar captured and placed in his temple as a token of his superiority. Their return and, by implication, use in the second-temple ceremonies of the author’s own day thus helped to establish a strong line of continuity with the temple of Solomon. They served to focus attention on the unity of the people of God, so relativizing the break in worship at the temple caused by the exile.

Notes. 8 Sheshbazzar was the first governor of the Persian province of Judah (cf. 5:14). Nothing more is known for certain about him. It is likely that he was a prominent leader of the tribe of Judah, but suggestions that he was from the Davidic family or that he is to be identified with Zerubbabel are speculative. 9–10 The specific translation of the various types of vessel is highly uncertain, as a comparison of the various English versions will show. 11 The total, 5,400, does not equal the sum of the parts. This may be due to mistakes in the course of copying the signs for numerals or be a simple accounting error. There are many examples of the latter in the texts of the Persian treasury at Persepolis.

2:1–70 The list of the exiles who returned

It appears from the closing verses of the chapter that this list was compiled some time after the return itself. Quite why and when is not certain, but an attractive suggestion is that it provided the answer to the later official inquiry as to the names of those who were engaged on the building of the second temple (5:4). If this is right, then the list may include not only those who returned immediately after Cyrus's proclamation but others who may have followed them in the subsequent ten or twelve years. The list is repeated at Ne. 7:6–73, where 'the first to return' (v 5) should be understood in a general sense, contrasting with later returns such as that led by Ezra (cf. Ezr. 8). The slight differences between the two versions of the list, which mainly concern the numbers, have been explained as due to problems in later copying of the complicated system for recording numerals at this time.

Following the names of twelve leaders (cf. Ne.7:7), the order of the list is lay families (3–35), priests (36–39), Levites (40) and minor cultic officials (41–58). It is followed by notes on those who could not establish their pedigree (59–63), a concluding summary (64–67) and other brief notes. The long section on the laity appears not to be a unity, however, since some are registered by family and others by place of residence. It is possible that the latter refer to those who never went into exile, but who nevertheless joined with those returning in the rebuilding of the temple.

The main theological purpose for the inclusion of this list is to emphasize once again the continuity between the post-exilic community and the former people of Israel. This is indicated especially by the notes in vs 59–63 concerning those who could not at this stage establish their genealogy to public satisfaction, and by the number of leaders (twelve), which recalls the number of the tribes of Israel. Furthermore, the emphasis at the start and conclusion of the list on each person returning to their own town (vs 1 and 70) points to the close association elsewhere in the OT between people and land, so that the chapter functions rather in the manner of the lists in the second half of the book of Joshua. There is thus a hint at a partial fulfilment of the foundational promise to Abraham (Gn. 12:2–3).

Of course, the sense of exclusivity which this chapter conveys needs to be balanced by the inclusive nature of God's purposes attested elsewhere in Scripture, including the OT itself (and as suggested even in this chapter by the large number of foreign names, especially in vs 43–58). But in the present context of a crucial time of transition, it was inevitable that the emphasis should fall on the importance of the community's sense of identity and on the maintenance of a tangible form of continuity with the past.

Similarly, Christian communities must learn to be sensitive to the priorities which their situation demands. The overriding vision remains that of reflecting the welcoming grace of God himself. There are times, however, when moral or doctrinal failings result in a church which is almost indistinguishable from the surrounding society. In such cases it may be that for a time the emphasis will need to revert to reform and a redefinition of the boundaries, a process which looks rather exclusive. Its purpose, however, should be to recreate a vibrant Christian centre which can once again function effectively to draw others into an experience of the love of God.

3:1–4:5 The restoration of worship

This section divides into three paragraphs. The first describes the restoration of the altar and of the worship associated with it (3:1–6), the second the preparations for rebuilding the temple (3:7–13) and the third the first note of opposition to the work, which was delayed in consequence (4:1–5). On the face of it, this portrayal does not seem to square with the impression given by the prophet Haggai, who later (about 520 BC) castigated the people for their complete neglect of the temple, and who prompted what appears to be a wholly new beginning on the work of building under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Jeshua (or Joshua).

Various ways round this difficulty have been proposed; for instance, that by the time of Haggai the small start made earlier had been more or less forgotten. Alternatively, however, it may be that we should not read the present passage as referring wholly to the first days of the return. Vs 7–13 and 4:1–3 might date from the time of Haggai himself (their arrival at the house of God in v 8 will then refer to the time when rebuilding commenced, not the date of the initial return from Babylon), with 4:4–5 put in afterwards to explain why such a delay had occurred in the first place (cf. 4:4 with 3:3, and note the time span mentioned in v 5). Whatever solution is adopted, however, the writer's main point is clear, and it is intended to be exemplary: the priorities of the people were right in restoring some form of worship as soon as was practical—even before the temple itself was completed (3:6).

3:1–6 Restoration of the altar and worship. This paragraph at least refers to the first days of the return from exile. The altar was restored on its foundation (3), that is, on the site of the original altar which had been destroyed. Continuity with the worship of pre-exilic Israel was assured by centring on the very spot which God had revealed should be the sacrificial altar (cf. 1 Ch. 22:1). Similarly, the particular (4) and the general (5) sacrifices were resumed in accordance with what is written. The forms and expressions of their worship are precisely those which had been instituted by Moses and David.

Notes. 2 Jeshua was the high priest (cf. Hg. 1:1), an office which assumed increased importance after the end of the monarchy, and so here appropriately named first. Zerubbabel apparently succeeded Sheshbazzar as civil governor (cf. Hg. 1:1). Though he belonged to the Davidic family (1 Ch. 3:19), no significance is attached to that fact in the book of Ezra.

3:7–13 Preparations for rebuilding the temple. Almost every statement about the temple building in this paragraph is consciously intended to underline its similarity to that of the first temple. For instance, v 7 clearly echoes 1 Ch. 22:2–4 and 2 Ch. 2:15–16; the date in v 8 recalls 2 Ch. 3:2, while if the two years of preparation be added to the five years of building (cf. 6:15), then the total of seven years may be compared with 1 Ki. 6:38. The role of the Levites in supervising the work (8–9) is the same as 1 Ch. 23:4, and the description of the accompanying celebrations (10–11) recalls the dedication of the first temple (e.g. 2 Ch. 5:11–13; 7:3). Finally, an explicit comparison is drawn in vs 12–13, where the sound of joy at the restoration at least matched the disappointed weeping of those who were old enough to have seen the first temple. Again, therefore, an emphasis on continuity and legitimacy is the primary aim of this paragraph, while the note of joy with which it concludes is another challenge to the later generation of the author's contemporaries.

4:1–5 First signs of opposition. If the incident in vs 1–3 dates to the time of Darius, as suggested above, it may well explain why shortly afterwards the whole project became the subject of an official inquiry in ch. 5. Those who were rebuffed soon started to take reprisals. Although individuals could be received into the community from outside (cf. 6:21), it would have jeopardized the legal authority for rebuilding the temple if other groups had joined in as equal partners. The wisdom of standing firm on this point was vindicated by the subsequent inquiry (cf. 5:3). The enemies of Judah and Benjamin (1) was probably written with the wisdom of hindsight; they may not have appeared as such at the time.

Vs 4–5 were added as a separate explanation for the delay between altar dedication (3:1–6) and temple rebuilding.

Notes. 2 Esarhaddon, king of Assyria's settlement of the old northern kingdom with foreigners is not mentioned in the historical books (2 Ki. 17:24–41 concerns Sargon II), but is alluded to in Is. 7:8. 5 Darius succeeded Cambyses as king of Persia in 522 BC, and he reigned until 486 BC. The first two years of his reign were marked by many rebellions (not mentioned in Ezra, but of possible significance as background to the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah), but thereafter he is represented in Ezra as having resumed the policies of Cyrus.

4:6–24 Open opposition

In this section, there is reference to three letters of accusation against the Jews, one written to Xerxes (6) and two to Artaxerxes (7–16). These two kings reigned after Darius, but chs. 5–6 revert to his reign. Unless our author was completely muddled in his chronology of the period, we must assume that this section is a digression or excursus and that v 24 is intended to show that we resume the narrative which was broken off at v 5 (whose wording it explicitly picks up). In favour of this solution is the fact that the accusations relate to the walls of Jerusalem (12–13), not the temple, which is the subject of the remainder of Ezr. 1–6.

The reason for this digression is clear enough. The writer has just recounted the rebuff of an offer of help. This apparently harsh decision was justified by these later events, when the groups concerned revealed their true colours as indeed 'the enemies of Judah and Benjamin' (1). Since this is only the first of many accounts of opposition to the work of God in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, it serves as a warning that there is a constant need for vigilance, and that opposition is best dealt with while it is still 'outside' rather than allowing it to gain a foothold within the community, where it could be even more destructive.

Only one of the accusations is given in full (8–16), and the king's reply (17–22) may be helpful later in explaining the background to Nehemiah's mission. There is no evidence whatsoever to suggest that the charge of planned rebellion was correct, but in view of the unrest which frequently characterized parts of the western provinces of the empire, Artaxerxes could be forgiven for having 'acted first and thought later'.

Notes 8 As v 7 indicates, the language here switches from Hebrew, the usual language of the OT, to Aramaic, and continues so as far as 6:18. Aramaic was used as a 'diplomatic language' in the Persian empire, and it is probable that many of the official sources on which our author drew were written in it. As it was well understood by the Jews, he chose to retain these sources in their original language and to use it also for his brief narrative connections. 10 Trans-Euphrates was the official name of the western satrapy (province) of the empire. Several of the other names and titles in these verses are obscure. 12 It is possible that those who returned with Ezra are referred to here. 20 The powerful kings are not Judeans (such as David and Solomon) but Artaxerxes' predecessors, such as Cyrus and Darius. He is anxious not to be compared unfavourably with them.

5:1–6:22 The rebuilding of the temple

The bulk of this lengthy section is clearly focused on one incident which occurred during the rebuilding of the temple, namely the inquiry of the Persian official Tattenai (5:3–17) and the favourable response to it from the court (6:1–13). The author has framed this material with balancing comments about the overruling prompting and providence of God (5:1–2 and 6:14) before briefly rounding off the whole with notes about the celebration of the temple dedication and the Passover (6:15–22). It is worth observing that, as on previous occasions, many details that we might expect to be included are omitted; nothing is said, for instance, about the actual process and progress of the building itself. The author is concerned to tell only as much as he knows from his sources (primarily the copies of the correspondence between Tattenai and the king) and to comment on its theological significance.

In this connection, two points stand out. First, the positive attitude towards the Persian authorities as instruments of God's purposes is again emphasized (see on 1:1 etc.). The author adopts the attitude that so far as possible, and in the particular circumstances of his own time, clashes between 'church and state' should be avoided; the rule of God is not compromised by the community which seeks to exploit its rights under civil law since, as their ultimate sovereign, God is well able to work through them for the benefit of his people. He does not propose that the re-establishment of political independence is in itself a necessary condition for the liberty of the people of God. Indeed, he happily refers to state support for prayer and sacrifice on behalf of the royal family (6:9–10).

Secondly, the theme of continuity, which has been repeatedly noted in the previous chapters, is continued here, both with regard to the temple building itself (e.g. 5:8, cf. 1 Ki. 6:36 and 7:12; 5:11, 13–15; 6:3–5), and its attendant ceremonies and institutions (e.g. 6:17–18).

Although Christianity is not dependent in the same way on such external institutions, it is important for us to be reminded that the 'universal church' includes not only all true believers now, but also all those who have lived before us. We share with them the same Bible, sacraments, many forms of worship and sense of values. It is often an encouragement to reflect upon this 'communion of saints' as well as a healthy exercise to examine our present situation in the light of their example. Without in any way down-grading the full authority of Scripture, we ignore the experience of other Christians ('tradition') at our peril.

5:1–2 Rebuilding the house of God. In line with the depiction in the books of Haggai and Zechariah 1–8, the primary stimulus for the work comes from the God of Israel himself, mediated through the prophetic word which evoked an enthusiastic response.

5:3–17 Tattenai's inquiry. Whether this was prompted by the rebuff of 4:1–3 or not, there is no hint that Tattenai himself came to Jerusalem with hostile intent. Since the authorization for the work given nearly twenty years previously by Cyrus (cf. vs 13–16) was probably unknown to him, he needed to be sure that all was in order, especially as public funding may have been at issue (cf. v 15 with 6:4, 8). V 5 suggests that he was inclined to believe the Jewish account, an attitude which again the author ascribes to divine providence.

Notes. 10 The list of names is not included here, though it may have been used in ch. 2. Clearly, therefore, the author has abbreviated the copy of Tattenai's letter which he was copying.

12 It is worth noting the extent to which this generation had made their own the teaching of the pre-exilic prophets, however unpalatable. Confession of past failure is an important element in renewal. 16 The second half of this verse is not strictly true, since whatever start had been made on the reconstruction under Sheshbazzar had long since ceased. What mattered, however, was that legally the Jews were claiming that their present activity was the direct continuation of the earlier authorization. Hence, they referred to the names that would have been recorded in the state archives, not their present leaders. 17 Quite reasonably, this is the very point of which Tattenai seeks confirmation. The fact that the relevant document was not found at Babylon, as expected, but at one of the other Persian capitals, Ecbatana (6:2), is a strong pointer to the accuracy of this account.

6:1–12 Darius's reply. Darius incorporated a copy of the original decree of Cyrus in his reply (3–6). The Jews' claim was fully vindicated, and Darius went on not only to reaffirm it, but to add certain provisions of his own with strong penalties for disobedience (7–12). Recent discoveries of Persian administrative texts, though not themselves referring to the Jews or the Jerusalem temple, have shown that such support for local cults was widely practised in the empire.

Note. 3 The last part of this verse should probably be emended to read 'thirty cubits high, sixty cubits long and twenty cubits wide', i.e. approximately 45 ft (13 m) high, 90 ft (27 m) long and 30 ft (9 m) wide.

6:13–18 Completion and dedication of the temple. As at the start of this section, the author again emphasizes the overruling hand of God in the political process. To the importance of the prophets (v 14; cf. 5:1) is added the identity of God's command with that of the kings. Artaxerxes may be included here in anticipation of his support of Ezra in the next chapter; at any rate, the reference cannot be to the wholly negative role assigned to him in ch. 4.

The dedication of the temple presents the community in a very positive light. They regarded themselves as representative of the whole of pre-exilic Israel (v 17), and appropriately the ceremony was reminiscent of the dedication of Solomon's temple, when the whole nation was still united (cf. 1 Ki. 8). Though this may seem far removed from the actual circumstances of the post-exilic period, it serves to hold before the reader the inclusive ideal which any religious community, then or since, should adopt.

6:19–22 Celebration of the Passover. The author here reverts to the use of Hebrew to round off the whole of Ezr. 1–6. The Passover was an appropriate festival with which to conclude his account of what we have seen was a series of events which he regarded in many ways as a second exodus. V 21 again stresses that the community was open to any who were willing to join without preconditions.

Note. 22 The king of Assyria is a superficially curious way of referring to a Persian king (Darius) and is perhaps to be explained in terms of Assyria being regarded as symbolic of an oppressive power (cf. Ne. 9:32), a role later ascribed to Babylon (cf. 1 Pet. 5:13; Rev. 14:8; 18:2). It was not wholly inappropriate, since Persia inherited the Babylonian empire, who in turn had inherited it from Assyria. There is also some evidence that the Persians were conscious of this inheritance.

7:1–10:44 Ezra

Material about Ezra is found in Ezr. 7–10 and Ne. 8. Part of this is told in Ezra's own words, and it seems probable that the remainder has been rewritten from this account by a later editor. Assuming that the king in question is Artaxerxes I, there is a gap of some fifty-seven years between Ezr. 6 and 7. Nothing speaks louder of the writer's theological rather than purely historical intent than his casual bridging of this gap by the words After these things (7:1). Clearly, he is not going to tell just about the next thing that happened, but about the next significant event in God's overall plan for the renewal of the Jewish community after the dislocation of the Babylonian exile.

7:1–10 Introduction to Ezra

Ezra is introduced as a priest and a scribe. His genealogy (1–5) shows that he was a member of the priestly family, a descendant of Seraiah, the penultimate high priest of pre-exilic Judah (1 Ch. 6:14). In post-exilic times, however, the teaching role of the priests was increasingly assumed by the scribes, of whom Ezra is presented as an outstanding example (vs 6 and 10). This was inevitable once written Scripture became the primary religious authority. He thus stands at the transition point in the manner in which God's law was mediated to his people, and we are prepared for the important part which the interpretation of a now fixed scriptural text plays in his narrative.

His journey to Jerusalem is summarized in vs 6–9; more detail follows in ch. 8. The first day of the first month (9) points to the Passover festival (cf. Ex. 12:2), and this is in line with the later interpretation of Ezra as a second Moses. Writing such as this draws personalities and events into a pattern of familiar saving-history, leading to a fuller appreciation of God's ruling over the affairs of all his people, and enabling later readers too to trace comparable patterns in their own experience, however superficially insignificant. It is along these lines that many OT characters can still serve as an example for us today (cf. 1 Cor. 10:6, 11).

7:11–28 Ezra's commission

This copy of Ezra's commission by Artaxerxes, which may have been drafted in response to a specific request by Ezra himself (cf. 7:6), is written in Aramaic (see on 4:8). He is given four tasks to perform.

First, he is to lead a return from Babylon to Judah (13). (This is the subject of ch. 8.) Secondly, he is to transport various gifts and grants for the temple (15–20) as well as an order to the treasurers of Trans-Euphrates to make certain supplies for the temple services. A copy of the latter is included in the text of the commission (21–24). Perhaps to guard against any suspicion of irregularity in the handling of this sensitive measure, its fulfilment is carefully spelt out at 8:24–30, 33–34 and 36.

Thirdly, he is to enquire about Judah and Jerusalem with regard to the Law of your God (14). In the context, this seems most likely to refer to the need to ensure that the grants for the temple were being used according to the Jewish law, which, in line with their custom elsewhere, would have been recognized by the Persians as the properly authorized constitution for the religious life of the province. This may underlie the treatment of the question of mixed marriages, which dominates chs. 9–10, since obviously such marriages would have caused problems of determining under which jurisdiction a couple lived.

Finally, Ezra is to teach conformity to the Jewish law to those Jews who lived outside the province of Judah (25–26). This would have been a delicate issue, since there would have been many possible points of conflict between the Law of your God and the law of the king (26). The Jews in Babylon must already have faced this issue and come to terms with it. Who better than one of their leading teachers to give such instruction to other groups in a similar situation? It is a problem which many believers in various situations have faced since then, so that Ezra's approach would have been most instructive. Unfortunately, the silence of the following chapters suggests that he never got round to this part of his commission.

Momentous as the document was in terms of the history of the development of Judaism, Ezra's prayer in response (27–28) sees here only further provision for the temple, the centre of his people's worship, and an expression of God's steadfast love. The conditions might have changed radically over the centuries since the first call of Abraham with all its attendant promises, but God was still the God of our fathers, who could move even a Persian monarch and his officials to further his purposes.

8:1–36 Ezra’s journey to Jerusalem

Most of this chapter is a relatively straightforward account which, as already noted, draws attention to Ezra’s obedience to his royal commission. Nevertheless, its three principal themes are attributed not just to his own abilities, but to the gracious hand of our God [which] was on us (18; cf. vs 22 and 31).

First, Ezra was anxious that among those who returned with him (1–14) there should be some Levites (15–20). Their subordinate role in the service of the temple may have meant that such a return would have been unattractive to them, but their presence on the journey may have been felt necessary if it was to conform symbolically to the wilderness journey following the exodus (cf. Nu. 10:11–28). On that occasion too they had been especially responsible for the transport of the sacred vessels.

Secondly, the safe journey itself was attributed to God’s gracious hand when Ezra had refused the offer of an armed escort (21–23). This seemingly rash boast drove the people to their knees, and their faith was rewarded. The different attitude of Nehemiah (cf. Ne. 2:9) reminds the reader, however, that God is able to work for his people through ‘normal’ as much as through extraordinary means, a principle which reaches its climax in the incarnation itself.

There is sometimes a tendency for Christians to fall into the trap of thinking that God is only at work in miracles and special events and to write off as ‘unspiritual’ such mundane procedures as, for example, committees. However, since for our salvation God chose to become man in the person of Christ, we may expect to find him at work just as much in the consecrated use of human means as in the bypassing of them. He is the God of our whole lives, and we should beware of compartmentalizing his activity. Ultimately, that road leads only to excluding him from much of our lives, or, in other words, to hypocrisy.

Thirdly, the transportation of costly offerings (see on ch. 7) without interference from bandits was also ascribed to God’s gracious hand. Here again, however, the elaborate accounting procedures which Ezra followed demonstrate that it would be a mistake to argue that a ‘spiritual’ as opposed to a ‘practical’ approach was being advocated.

Not surprisingly, the travellers offered sacrifices of thanksgiving once they had arrived in Jerusalem and rested (35). Coming so long after the first return, they had discovered that the idea of a second exodus was not a solitary event, but an experience which successive generations might enjoy. Its promise and hope were not exhausted by the first group to return, nor was blame attached to those who chose to go later. Rather, the prospect of deliverance and new life is seen to confront each new generation with its challenge for decision.

9:1–15 A report of mixed marriages and Ezra’s confession

Four months passed (cf. 10:9), and we must suppose, as 10:3 hints, that Ezra had in the meantime begun his teaching ministry, as illustrated by Ne. 8. From this chapter and elsewhere, we learn that he was able to reapply what might have been thought to be outdated laws to new situations, in particular by linking together different passages of Scripture in order to dig out the theological principles which underlay the specific older laws.

The result was that the people came to appreciate that marriage with an unbelieving foreigner was no different in principle from marriage with the local inhabitants of Canaan which had been forbidden to their ancestors. Most of the peoples mentioned in v 1 no longer existed, but by drawing on a variety of other material (including Lv. 18; 19:19; Dt. 7:1–4 and 20:10–18) the contemporary relevance of the laws was appreciated.

Ezra's prayer is pure confession. It contains no request for forgiveness or other petition. Its climax is O LORD, ... you are righteous! (15). Even if God should destroy his people, Ezra acknowledged that he would be justified. This may be said to constitute the highest form of worship: God being praised solely for who he is, and not merely for what the worshipper hopes to gain from him.

Appropriately, therefore, Ezra adopted the stance of one in mourning for the dead (3), and he prayed representatively on behalf of all the people. His prayer (6–15) again draws on a variety of earlier biblical sources as it moves through individual and communal lament (6–7), reflection on God's present mercies, which only underline the people's ingratitude (8–9), specific confession (10–12), statement of future intent (13–14) and concluding general confession (15).

10:1–44 The problem of mixed marriages resolved

Ezra's style of leadership repays study. As elsewhere (e.g. 9:1; Ne. 8:1), so here, he waited for the people to approach him. By teaching, patience and example, he was thus able to bring them without coercion to make for themselves the decisions he considered beneficial.

The narrative proceeds in a straightforward manner, leading, after due consideration of all the attendant circumstances (14), to the divorce of their wives by a number of men who are listed in the second half of the chapter. The poignant reference to women and children in the first and last verses of the chapter suggests that the narrator was not unaware of the human cost involved. The main difficulty a reader is likely to face is not in understanding what happened so much as why it happened.

The chief point that should be appreciated is that in its precarious situation the Jewish community in Judah needed a strong sense of its own identity if it was to survive at all. Artaxerxes's commission (7:12–26) had provided Ezra with a mandate to develop Judaism as a strictly religious community. The qualifications for membership thus had to be redefined; otherwise there was a danger that the distinctive elements of the faith would be watered down, perhaps beyond the point of recognition. As a principle for the people of God, that point retains its validity (cf. Mt. 5:13–16), though the specific means which Ezra adopted to achieve it are explicitly ruled out for the Christian (1 Cor. 7; 1 Pet. 3:1–7).

For this reason, it would be unwise to see in this particular set of historical circumstances a direct parallel to the vexed question of a Christian deliberately entering into marriage with a non-Christian partner. (2 Cor. 6:14 is not directly addressing this issue, though its principle is often thought to apply to it.) Nevertheless, this whole episode serves to remind us of the primacy of doing all that we can to strengthen our own faith and that of our fellowship and not to lay ourselves open to situations which might lead in the opposite direction.

Commentary

The first half of the book of Nehemiah (chs. 1–7) is devoted almost entirely to Nehemiah’s work of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. This forms to some extent a political or social counterpart to the more religiously oriented reforms of Ezra just recounted, though of course the two spheres are by no means to be kept isolated from each other. The narrative is largely based on Nehemiah’s own first-person account. The second half of the book (chs. 8–13), which draws on a wider variety of source materials, then presents the combined climax of the two reformers’ work in the spiritual renewal of the community and related matters.

1:1–7:73 Nehemiah restores the walls of Jerusalem

The events recounted here are to be dated to the years 446–445 BC (cf. Ezr. 1:1), some twelve or thirteen years after Ezra came to Jerusalem. We can only speculate about what had been happening in the meantime (see on 1:4 below). Once again, the editor’s purpose is to concentrate on what he regards as the theologically important moments in his people’s salvation-history, focusing on divine cause and effect rather than on the more familiar means for linking events together that are appropriate in a secular history.

1:1–11 Nehemiah’s vocation

As a cupbearer to the king (11), Nehemiah held a position of trust at court. He would have been expected to serve as a tactful companion, who could thus wield considerable influence by informal counsel and discussion. There is no indication at the start of the narrative that he had any intention of abandoning this privileged position in order to throw in his lot with his fellow-Jews in the remote and insignificant Jerusalem.

By means of what may have been no more than a casual inquiry (2), he received news of some recent disaster. The effects on him were so overwhelming (4) that this cannot refer to the Babylonian destruction 140 years previously. More probably, we should see a reference here to the events narrated in Ezr. 4:7–23, which are included in that passage out of strict chronological order. We do not know whether Ezra himself was still present in Jerusalem at that time (his participation in the abortive attempt to rebuild the walls seems unlikely), but if he were we could understand how it would have proved impossible thereafter to complete the terms of his commission (see on Ezr. 7:25).

Nehemiah's response to hearing the news is indicative of his awareness that God was calling him to a completely new sphere of service, for which his position and training had uniquely prepared him. This is shown in particular by his sense of identity with his people (4, 6–7) and the fact that he prayed about the situation for four months (2:1). (Clearly, the account we have here is but a summary.) Such a period of waiting is indicative both of faith in the reality of the call and of sustained commitment.

Nehemiah's prayer (5–11), which draws heavily on Israel's rich liturgical tradition, focused first on the God of heaven, and this led immediately to confession of both personal and national sin (6–7). Only then does he turn to a summary of God's covenant promises (8–9) as a basis for his twofold petition, in general for restoration of his people's fortunes and in particular for the right approach to the king. If we are right in seeing Ezr. 4 in the background, then v 21 of that chapter shows both the potential danger which such an approach might entail as well as an opportunity that might be exploited. With so much at stake, Nehemiah, otherwise supremely a man of action, wisely left the details of timing and manner of approach in God's hands.

2:1–20 Nehemiah comes to Jerusalem

The parallel references to Nehemiah's enemies in vs 10 and 19–20 clearly divide this chapter into two parts. In the first, Nehemiah acts with a confidence born of the assurance that God is moving to answer his prayer; in the second, where he begins to encounter the unknown, he shows commendable caution.

2:1–10 Nehemiah and the king. It is not clear whether Nehemiah deliberately adopted a morose expression as a means of inviting the king to open a personal conversation (1–2). At all events, his initial response (3) was sufficiently non-committal to test whether this was indeed God's timing. Taking the king's further question as a sign that it was, he gathered up his prayers of the previous months (4) and simultaneously presented his request. When this was received favourably (6) he pressed on boldly to state his other needs in specific terms. It is a fine illustration of the balance between confidence in the sovereignty of God, with prayer as its proper response, and human responsibility, with its counterpart in thoughtful planning. We should note too that Nehemiah had no doubts that God could use human channels to supply his needs (8).

Notes. 10 Sanballat, Nehemiah's arch-rival, is known from a document discovered in Egypt to have been the governor of Samaria and to have given his sons good 'Yahwistic' names. We may speculate that, following the debacle of Ezr. 4, he had been given temporary jurisdiction over Judah and that this may account for his jealousy of Nehemiah. Tobiah had close personal links inside Jerusalem (cf. 6:17–19; 13:4–5); was he perhaps Sanballat's deputy in Jerusalem during the 'interregnum'?

2:11–20 Nehemiah inspects Jerusalem's walls. After arriving in Jerusalem, Nehemiah tested his vocation with caution. First, he engaged physically, but in secret, with the task which confronted him (11–16), no doubt 'counting the cost' of so momentous an undertaking cf. Lk. 9:57–62; 14:28–32). Secondly, with more than a hint that he believed that God had sent him, he invited the cooperation of the people in the fulfilment of his call (17–18). Their unanimous response confirmed that he was on the right path. Individual vocation generally finds such confirmation by the community of faith (Acts 13:1–2). Finally, he was not deflected by opposition, but rather responded with a positive assertion of what he had been called to do, and left the outcome to the God who had initiated the task (19–20).

Note. 19 We learn from inscriptions that Geshem the Arab was a powerful desert king whose influence extended round much of the southern and eastern borders of Judah. The motivation for his opposition is not so clear as in the case of Sanballat and Tobiah, and he is mentioned less frequently than they.

Probable reconstruction of Jerusalem as rebuilt by Nehemiah in the fifth century BC.

3:1–32 Rebuilding the wall

This list of those engaged in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem looks back from the standpoint of the completed task, a point which, strictly speaking, is not reached in the narrative until 6:15. Though there is no direct reference to Nehemiah, we need not doubt that it illustrates his skills of organization and leadership. It moves section by section round the wall in an anti-clockwise direction from and to the Sheep Gate (1, 32) in the north eastern corner. From v 16 onwards, the nature of the description changes somewhat. This is probably because up to that point the builders had been following the line of an earlier wall, whereas from this point on they plotted a new line. The destruction along the steep eastern slope of the city, overlooking the Kidron Valley, seems to have been so severe (cf. 2:14) that, for the sake of time, the wall was pulled back to a line higher up the slope; note the references to those who in consequence found themselves building beside their own houses (23–30).

The overall picture to emerge is instructive. It demonstrates first a unity of intention by the people, some forty sections apparently working simultaneously. This could not have been achieved had there not been good supervision, close cooperation and an eye open for what was being done in neighbouring sections. Secondly, however, the interests and motives of those involved differed considerably. Some worked on the basis of family association, others as individuals, some in district associations, some on the basis of their position in society and yet others because of professional association. Moreover, in many cases the people were employed at that point in the wall where they had a vested interest. These first two points serve as a useful illustration of the unity and diversity which should characterize the work of the church (cf., for instance, Rom. 12:3–8; 1 Cor. 12:4–27; Eph. 4:1–13). Finally, it is challenging to note the varying degrees of involvement. A few refused to participate at all (5); most appear to have completed the task allotted to them; but some even managed a second section (1, 19–21, 24, 27 and 30).

4:1–23 Further opposition

It is noteworthy that each stage of Nehemiah's activity was met with opposition, every time introduced with the formula 'when so-and-so heard'; (cf. vs 1, 7; 2:10, 19; 6:1, 16.) As the work progressed, so the opposition grew more fierce and the description of the response more elaborate.

4:1–5 Ridicule. Sanballat and Tobiah here amplify their mockery of 2:19 in an attempt both to demoralize the builders (5) and to reassure their own supporters (2). Nehemiah's response (4–5) was to commit the problem to God in prayer, which is commendable, for he thereby recognized that the insults were directed as much against God as against himself and that vindication should come from his LORD rather than his own efforts. Nevertheless, the sentiments he expressed have been superseded for the Christian (cf. e.g. Mt. 5:43–48; 18:21–22; Rom. 12:14–21), for whom the work of Christ has provided an assurance of the final victory of love which Nehemiah could not possibly have known.

4:6–23 Intimidation. As the work reached the half-way stage, Nehemiah faced a twofold crisis. On the one hand, his workforce was in danger of becoming demoralized both by the scale of the task (10) and by the pleas of family members who, living in outlying villages, were aware of the enemy's preparations and so kept trying to urge their menfolk to return home (11–12). On the other hand, the augmented forces of the enemy were threatening to attack (7). It is difficult to say whether this was a genuine threat (its legality within the Persian empire is questionable), but for those who had recently experienced the debacle of Ezr. 4:23 even the appearance of history being about to repeat itself would have been severely unsettling.

Nehemiah's response to these problems is a model of perceptive leadership. He displayed common-sense flexibility in interrupting the work briefly in order to rally his people (13–14; see below) and in setting in place new arrangements for security (16–20). Then he encouraged the people by an appeal to tradition, using methods and words which had proved effective in the past history of Israel. This cannot be documented in full here, but for examples compare v 14 with Ex. 14:13–14, v 15 with Ex. 15:14–16, and v 20 with Ex. 14:14 and Jdg. 6:34. By thus imposing a familiar interpretative framework on his people's sense of confusion, Nehemiah was able to turn even their fear and sense of weakness into a ground for faith. Finally, he led by example, as the concluding verses of the chapter underline.

Notes. 12–13 The translation of these verses is uncertain. It would be clearer to read 'When the Jews who lived near them came and said to us time and again from all sides "You must return to us", then I took up a position in the lowest parts of the space behind the wall in an exposed place and I made the people stand by families with their swords ...' In other words, Nehemiah rallied the people in the manner of Israel's ancient conscript army and addressed them in a way similar to that used by Moses, Joshua and Israel's other great leaders when faced with apparently overwhelming odds. 16 my men refers not to the builders in general, but to a smaller group of trained men who, for whatever reason, owed personal allegiance to Nehemiah (cf. 5:10 and 16).

5:1–19 Social and economic problems

Though not explicitly stated, it seems probable that the need of some from the countryside to work on the walls during the summer (cf. 6:15) brought to a head an economic crisis which may have been developing for some while previously. The final paragraph of the chapter (14–19), however, is from a very much later period, but has been included here because it relates to the same theme.

5:1–13 Debt problems resolved. Three separate complaints are detailed in vs 2–4, while v 5 probably serves as a summary of all three. The reference to their wives (1) may indicate that they were most conscious of the approaching calamity because they were having to manage at home during their husbands' absence in Jerusalem.

The first group (2) were families who owned no land, and so were first to feel the effects of lack of income from labouring while engaged on the wall-building. The second group (3) were already mortgaging their land and would lose their security altogether if they could not repay their debts from the annual harvest, while the third group (4) were apparently having to borrow in order to pay their taxes. For all of them, the sense of social injustice was aggravated by the facts that their creditors were fellow-Jews (1, 5) and that they were reaching the point of having to sell themselves into debt-slavery.

Though not illegal as such, such practices were permitted only as short-term measures, and the law was concerned to protect the longer-term interests of the very poor (e.g. Ex. 21:2–11; Lv. 25; Dt. 15:1–18). This could not help in the present sudden emergency, and, besides, what was happening was contrary to the whole ethos of what Nehemiah was attempting to achieve (6–8). He therefore brought moral pressure to bear on the creditors by confronting them in public and by candidly acknowledging his own shortcomings in the matter (10). In this way he cut straight through any legalistic arguments in order to uphold the moral spirit of the law, very much in the manner of some of the earlier prophets.

5:14–19 Nehemiah’s personal example. In order to illustrate the principle that within the community generosity is to be preferred to personal gain, Nehemiah reflected on his practice throughout what we now learn for the first time was his twelve-year term as governor (14). This is considerably longer than the period envisaged at 2:6, and we know next to nothing about what happened after the first year. The highly selective nature of the biblical record is thus again emphasized.

Note. 19 This is the first of Nehemiah’s distinctive ‘remember me’ prayers; cf. 6:14; 13:14, 22, 29, 31. They mostly date, as in the present case, to a time long after the wall-building and seem to indicate that, as he looked back after many years, Nehemiah had come to feel that justice had not been done to him by the community which he had sought to serve.

6:1–19 The wall completed despite personal threats

The three paragraphs in this chapter are clearly marked and shown to be dealing with a similar theme by the references to intimidation in their concluding summaries (9, 14, 19). Unlike ch. 4, however, Nehemiah himself came under personal threat. Despite this, the work was brought to a triumphant conclusion (15–16).

6:1–9 Sanballat tries to eliminate Nehemiah. When Sanballat’s initial attempt to secure a meeting with Nehemiah failed (2–4), he resorted to a lightly disguised form of blackmail (5–7). There is no reason whatever to suppose that his accusations carried any substance, but again he may have reckoned that the recent events of Ezr. 4 would have been sufficiently fresh in the memories of Nehemiah’s associates to get them to bring pressure on him to compromise.

6:10–14 Tobiah seeks to discredit Nehemiah. Tobiah’s close contacts in Jerusalem (17–19) fitted him to act as the chief protagonist in this episode. Several of its details are obscure, but the aim seems to have been to entice or frighten Nehemiah into entering not just the temple but the very sanctuary itself. Even if he had emerged alive, his trespass as a layman into the holy place, which was reserved for the priests, would have driven a wedge between him and the influential priesthood. Apart from the fact that the proposed course of action would have been out of character for a man like Nehemiah (11), its improper suggestion (13) was sufficient to warn him that such a prophetic word could not possibly have come from God.

6:15–19 The wall is completed. The main point of this paragraph comes in vs 17–19, whose chronologically vague introduction (in those days) shows that it marks a point of transition from the account of the wall-building to the remainder of the narrative which deals with reforms internal to Judah. Appropriately, the chief protagonists here, therefore, were the nobles of Judah, who may have wished to maintain good relations with their neighbours for purposes of trade as well as more personal social reasons.

Nonetheless, we cannot overlook the scale of the achievement modestly introduced in v 15. The proper reaction is suitably reserved for the surrounding nations (16), which points to the fulfilment of Nehemiah's appeal in 2:17. There is no pause for self-congratulation here, however. The wall is regarded as no more than an institutional framework; what counts are the attitudes and activities of the people who live behind it, and already the close of the chapter indicates dangers in this regard. The narrative thus points us forward to the need for the reforms which are to follow.

7:1–73 The need to populate Jerusalem

Recognizing the dangers just mentioned, Nehemiah first adopted short-term measures in order to maintain the security of the city (1–3). In the longer term, however, what was required was a thriving population of those committed to the standards and principles which Nehemiah stood for. He therefore resorted to what may seem to be the somewhat drastic measure of organizing the movement of a sizeable body of people from the countryside into the city. As a basis for this, he decided to make use of the list of those who had returned to Jerusalem at the first (cf. Ezr. 2). While we know that others had also returned in the meantime, the repetition of the list in the present context makes the important theological point that those who should populate the city of God stand in direct continuity with the community who had earlier experienced God's redemption in the 'second exodus'.

8:1–10:39 Covenant renewal

The narrative of ch. 7 is not resumed until ch. 11. In between come three important chapters which deal with the spiritual restoration of the community under the shared leadership of both Ezra and Nehemiah. If ch. 7 has already shown that bricks and mortar are not in themselves sufficient to secure the future, then these chapters further indicate that it is not enough either just to fill the city with people of any sort. Only a people which has experienced God's redemption and renewal, a people to whom is entrusted the law of God (ch. 8), who recognize their dependence upon him (ch. 9) and who are fully committed to a life of faithful obedience (ch. 10) can ensure that the institutional structures which have been set in place serve their true purpose.

8:1–18 The reading of the law

The reappearance of Ezra in this chapter raises a problem. The narrative has reached a point some thirteen years after his journey to Jerusalem with the book of the law, and nothing has been heard of him in the meanwhile. Are we to suppose that only now, after the main work of Nehemiah had been accomplished, was he able to undertake the principal purpose of his mission, or should we look for some other explanation?

There is room for difference of opinion here, and so any suggestion must be advanced with caution. It is noteworthy, however, that at this point we also take leave of Nehemiah's own account (it is resumed at 12:31) and that the account in this chapter has some features which connect it rather with the Ezra source of Ezr. 7–10. It is therefore attractive to suppose that this account of Ezra's reading the law once belonged with the rest of the Ezra material. Its original location may have been between Ezr. 8 and 9, and it could have been moved to its present setting by the compiler of the books as a whole in order both to emphasize the theological points outlined above in the introduction to Ne. 8d–10 and to demonstrate how the work of the two great reformers should ultimately be seen as parts of the single divine act of the restoration of the people of God. The giving of the law should be seen as an act of grace at the climax of the restoration programme, not a condition for the restoration in the first place. We saw in Ezr. 4 how these books sometimes allow considerations of theme to override a strict chronology.

However its origin is to be explained, the chapter as it now stands has important lessons about the teaching and reception of the law by the community of faith.

8:1–6 Reading the law. This paragraph shows the happy combination of a people eager to be taught and a teacher willing and able to meet their need. The people took the initiative in inviting Ezra to bring out the law (1); the whole community, v 2 emphasizes, gathered to hear it; they anticipated the reading with a sense of reverent expectancy (6); and they listened attentively throughout the lengthy exposition (3). As the sequel shows, such an attitude allows God's word to have its maximum impact on the hearers.

For his part, Ezra not only responded at once to the people's request (2), but he chose to do so not in the temple courts, but in an easily accessible place (3) and in full view (4) so that none should be barred from attending. Moreover, he chose to associate lay people with him in the enterprise (4). It seems that he was anxious to avoid any impression that the law was the private preserve of the religious professional.

8:7–12 Interpreting the law. There is a striking contrast between the two parts of this paragraph, the 'understanding' of the law (8, 12) first causing the people to weep (9) and then to celebrate with joy (12). The initial reaction is probably not to be explained by the fact that the law was unfamiliar to them so much as that the interpretation which Ezra and the Levites provided (7–8) brought home its relevance to their situation in a fresh way. As we saw to be the case at Ezr. 9:1–2, Ezra (perhaps for the first time) developed a means of interpreting Scripture whereby parts which had been thought to be out of date were shown to reveal the underlying principles of God's will which were of timeless relevance. The result of this was to stir the people's consciences as they came to realize how far short of God's standards their lives had fallen.

This, however, is neither the sole nor the dominant message either of the OT law or of Scripture as a whole. By reminding them that this day was sacred (9, 11)—a day on which they were especially to recall God's past acts of grace and salvation towards Israel—and that the joy of the LORD was the source of their strength (10) as they linked themselves by faith with the experience of their ancestors, Ezra set their legitimate sense of failure within the wider context of God's grace and invitation. Confession would have its proper place (ch. 9), but the first response to hearing God's word should be of joyful acceptance (10–11). It is a pattern of response not unlike that in Acts 2:37–39. It also illustrates the truth that an orthodox doctrine of the authority of Scripture is not enough. If it is to be effective it needs an interpretation which is true to the tradition from which it derives. It also requires the reverent application of reason in working through its abiding relevance to the changed circumstances of any given contemporary community.

Note. 10 The NIV has Nehemiah said whereas the Hebrew text states only 'he said'. In the context, Ezra is the more probable subject.

8:13–18 Applying the law. From the community's general acceptance of the law, the leaders turned to Ezra for more detailed instruction (13). In view of the time of year, the most immediately relevant passage would have been Lv. 23, which legislates for the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (booths, 14). The requirement to proclaim this word (15) indicates interpretative work on Lv. 23:4. The trees listed are not mentioned in the law (the phrase as it is written qualifies only the words to make booths), but testify to a desire to give a practical application to the generalized commandment of the law. In all this, the people found great joy in enthusiastically following the detailed requirements whose relevance had been freshly brought home to them (16–18). V 17 again suggests that part of this joy was a renewed appreciation of their historical tradition.

9:1–37 Confession

In the overall structure of chs. 8–10, the reading of Scripture (ch. 8) is followed by confession (ch. 9) as a preparation for a renewed pledge to keep the law (ch. 10).

9:1–5 Assembly for confession. The striking point about this paragraph is the absence of the names of either Ezra or Nehemiah. The emphasis is on each individual accepting a share of responsibility in word, attitude (1) and deed (2) for the past sin and present plight of the community. Appropriately, therefore, it was two groups of otherwise unknown Levites who led the congregation in their worship and confession (4–5).

9:5b–37 Prayer of confession. True confession arises from a renewed appreciation of who God is, and that is very much the starting point for this prayer. From the beginning of time, God has revealed himself as one who is worthy of all blessing and praise (5b). He alone is the LORD, as shown by creation (6); he chose Abram, freely promised him a land and proved that he is righteous by keeping that promise (7–8); and he proved himself worthy of such a reputation (name, 10) by the deliverance of his people in the exodus and at the Red Sea (9–11). These first three sections of the prayer, therefore, speak in unqualified terms of God’s goodness and grace, and they provide the basis for the sharp contrast which the community felt in its present circumstances as outlined in the closing verses of the prayer (32–37), where several key terms from this opening section are repeated.

With the journey through the wilderness (12–21) a new note is sounded. Alongside the continuing gracious provision of God (12–15), the people began to rebel (16–18). This, however, only revealed another aspect of God’s character, his mercy (17b), for despite everything he continued to supply and sustain them (19–21), and eventually brought them to the land which he had promised so long ago (22–25).

The portrayal of life in the land (26–31) is very much influenced by the pattern which recurs throughout the book of Judges and to a lesser extent Kings. We cannot identify specific events here; rather the focus is on the underlying rebellious nature of the people and God’s response to it. Three times we are told that they were disobedient and so were handed over to their enemies (26–27a; 28a; 29–30). In the first two cases, they then cried to God, who delivered them in his compassion (27b; 28b). That element in the pattern is not repeated the third time, however, probably because vs 29–31 are speaking of the Babylonian conquest and exile, a state which theologically speaking was still in force at the time of this prayer; the restoration could not yet be regarded as complete because foreign oppression continued (36–37).

Instead, in a most powerful move from the point of intercession, the expected report of the people’s cry to God is replaced by an actual prayer to that effect, starting at v 32. Against the background of all that has gone before, this breathes a strong atmosphere of hope that God will again move to liberate his people from their present experience of bondage, and that he will again allow them to experience freedom in the land which he had given them in faithfulness to his original promise. The people's confession is thus a vital step towards their restoration which is the subject of these chapters as a whole.

9:38–10:39 A pledge to keep the law

In this chapter, the community enters into a binding agreement (1) to observe various aspects of the law, mostly, though not entirely, related to the support of the temple and its services (29–38). In its present setting as part of the climax of the combined work of Ezra and Nehemiah, it serves to demonstrate the earnestness of the people to live a life worthy of those who have experienced the restoring grace of God. It is a response to what he has achieved on their behalf, not a condition of restoration in the first place.

Like the two chapters which precede it, its original historical setting is uncertain. Many scholars have noted that most of the specific points of the agreement appear to put on a permanent basis the avoidance of abuses with which Nehemiah dealt in piecemeal fashion in ch. 13, and so conclude that the pledge of this chapter must have been formulated later. If so, the final editor of the book would again have been grouping his material according to theme rather than in strictly chronological order. See the introductory comments to chs. 8–10 and to ch. 8 above, and note that the narrative which was interrupted after ch. 7 is only resumed at ch. 11, indicating that chs. 8–10 as a whole are to be treated separately.

10:1–28 The list of signatories. This list (which in the Hebrew text actually interrupts a single sentence made up of 9:38 and 10:28–29) comprises a comprehensive accumulation of most of the names and titles for the people who are known from elsewhere in these books to have been in good standing in the community. The point seems to be that each individual has a responsibility to accept for himself or herself the values which characterize the whole.

10:29–39 The details of the agreement. V 29 states in a general way that the people intended henceforth to observe the law of God, and the following verses spell out in detail what this will mean in various specific instances (doubtless those which had recently been particularly neglected). A vague statement of good intentions is not sufficient: a confession of faith needs to be translated into a practical and visible change of lifestyle and practice.

The details of the individual clauses of the agreement and their relationship with the laws of the Pentateuch are complex and cannot be described in full here. The general point to note is that they all have links with the written law but again display the kind of interpretative activity by way of clarification and updating which we have seen to have been a mark of Ezra's teaching. It is thus clear that the leaders of the community had made their own the new style of teaching which he had introduced.

11:1–13:31 Consolidation

11:1–20 The new residents of Jerusalem

The opening of this chapter resumes the narrative which was broken off at the end of ch. 7. It does not, however, appear to come from Nehemiah's own account, but from some alternative source. This indicates that although much of the book presents the course of events very much from one man's point of view, many of the chief elements of his programme were also shared or adopted by a number of his contemporaries.

The problem of the previously reduced population of Jerusalem was resolved by lot (a system which, under priestly direction, was believed to reveal God's will; cf. 10:34). A tenth (or tithe; cf.

10:37–38) of the people agreed to move in from the countryside (1–2). Their names were then recorded with some gratitude (3–19), for in many cases it must have involved considerable inconvenience. V 20 is an obvious conclusion for this particular list.

Most of the list is paralleled in 1 Ch. 9:2–17, and a close comparison shows that neither has preserved the whole of the original. Beyond observing the general order (men of Judah, 4b–6; men of Benjamin, 7–8; secular leaders, 9; priests, 10–14; Levites 15–18; gatekeepers, 19), we should therefore be careful about matters of detail. It is interesting to note, however, that part of the vocabulary used in the description has a military flavour (e.g. in vs 6, 9 and 14); the defensive purpose of the operation was apparently not forgotten.

11:21–12:26 Supplementary lists

After the natural conclusion of the main list in 11:20 (and note that it leads naturally into the next narrative item at 12:27), the opportunity has been taken to add a number of other lists which are not directly associated with the question of the population of Jerusalem. 11:21–24 are supplementary to the main list, 11:25–36 catalogue some of the settlements outside Jerusalem, and 12:1–26 combine several lists of priests and Levites. Though this material is thus not strictly related to the general story-line of this part of the book, it contributes in its own way to the portrayal of a community which was ordering itself anew.

Detailed analysis of this section is too complex to be attempted here, but a couple of broader matters deserve comment. First, the list of settlements in 11:25–36 is more extensive than the actual province of Judah at the time. It seems to look wistfully back to former, more glorious days (cf. Jos. 15) and thereby to stimulate hopes for a greater future yet to come. The discrepancy between present reality and the broad sweep of the promises of God is a vital element in the faith of the people of God in any age, as Heb. 11:13–16 makes clear.

Secondly, 12:1–26 presents us with an initially curious telescoping of historical perspective in which the generation of the first return and that of Ezra and Nehemiah are set right alongside one another. This lies on the surface in v 26 (Jeshua was the high priest when the second temple was built; cf. Ezr. 3:2 and 5:2), but in fact the lists of priests and Levites which precede also come from these two generations. Such a compression in the presentation of lists for theological purposes was something of a convention at the time, and it occurs in the NT as well (cf. Mt. 1:1–17). It suggests that behind the complexities of the historical process when viewed from a human perspective the eye of faith can discern the orderly progression of the outworking of the divine will.

Note. 12:22 Darius the Persian: this unparalleled title seems to be a reference to Darius I (in whose reign the temple was rebuilt) designed to distinguish him from the somewhat mysterious figure of ‘Darius the Mede’ of Dn. 5:30 who apparently preceded ‘Cyrus the Persian’ (Dn. 6:28).

12:27–13:3 The dedication of the wall and its sequel

At last we reach what appears to be the climax of Nehemiah’s career, the dedication of the wall whose construction so dominated the first half of the book. Material from Nehemiah’s own personal account has been joined with an alternative source in order to present this combined version of the united celebration by the people. Two balanced processions were formed (31–36, 38, 40–42), and after leaving the city through the Valley Gate on the west of the city they proceeded in opposite directions, each going half-way round the city before re-entering and joining up for a united service of praise in the temple (40). The emphasis on their joy in v 43 is unparalleled in its intensity, a healthy reminder of the biblical truth that the prospect of such joy may legitimately serve to strengthen us during times of hardship (cf. Rom. 5:2–5; 8:18–25; Heb. 12:2).

Unlike a fairy story, however, this ‘happy ending’ does not mark the conclusion of the book. The text hurries on (At that time, 12:44; On that day, 13:1) to deal with matters which we might too quickly dismiss as mere routine, namely financial provision for the regular temple services (12:44–47) and purification of the congregation in obedience to the law of God (13:1–3). Without such routine, the author seems to imply, the joy of a single day can never be sustained. Although it is usually the high-points of success which impress themselves on the memory, the true gauge of spiritual progress in the individual as much as in community life is the extent to which what might be passed by as ‘the normal’ has been transformed. The form of the narrative at this point emphatically asserts that without such progress in regard to the ordinary, the climaxes and celebrations will fade all too quickly into tarnished memories.

13:4–31 Concluding reforms

The book of Nehemiah seems to peter out in what might be considered a somewhat unsatisfactory manner, not so much with a bang as with a whimper. All the abuses referred to in this final chapter have been the subject of earlier treatment, but they rear their heads again here despite the best efforts of the reformers to eradicate them. Only by way of an aside do we learn that the setting is Nehemiah’s second term as governor (6–7), so that perhaps as much as fifteen years have passed since the main part of the book (cf. 5:14), even though the chronological notes in vs 4, 6, 15 and 23 seem to gloss over this. It is as though the book is pointing to its own failure, reminding us that, however important good structures and routines may be (as was pointed out immediately above), nothing can substitute for the renewal of the naturally perverse inclinations of the human heart.

The ideal description of 12:44–13:3 had dealt with the proper care for and maintenance of the temple chambers, services and personnel and with the purity of the community. The rest of ch. 13 mostly focuses on the shortcomings in these same two areas, the former in vs 4–14 and the latter from v 15 on (although admittedly the question of Sabbath observance, vs 15–22, is less closely linked than the remainder). The style of writing is as colourful and forceful as ever, and on the whole the narrative stands in little need of additional comment. Only with regard to the recurrence of mixed marriages (23–27) is it necessary to point out that the problem seems to have been quite localized, the children who spoke the language of Ashdod (24) suggesting that it may have been confined primarily to those who lived on the western borders of the province of Judah. The basic issues had been dealt with previously by Ezra (and briefly summarized by Nehemiah in v 25; cf. Ezr. 9:2, 12). This enabled Nehemiah here to deal on an ad hoc (if characteristically forthright!) basis with cases of individual abuse.

Behind this chapter lies again a concern for the distinctive identity of the community. In the face of strong external pressures it had been in danger of compromise to the extent that its witness would have been diluted and rendered ineffective. A firm and solid focus at the centre of the community, proper worship of God at his designated sanctuary, was essential.

The Christian church continues to face these issues, albeit in different forms. The principles for appropriate response remain the same: a strong core of leadership and a clear line of demarcation at the fringes. From a position of strength and security it is possible to extend a hand of welcome and forgiveness to those outside. From a position of weakness both parties would sink together.

ESTHER

Introduction

Esther, like Ezra and Nehemiah, lived during the period when the Persians dominated all of western Asia and Egypt and imposed a high degree of organization on their vast empire. Cyrus, their great empire-builder, had permitted exiled Jews to return to Jerusalem from Babylon in 539 BC (Ezr. 1:1–4), and from then on exiles did go back to rebuild, first their homes, then the temple and later, under Nehemiah, the walls of Jerusalem. They were a minority, however, and large numbers of Jews remained, scattered throughout the area we now know as Iran and Iraq (see map of ‘The Persian Empire’ in Ezra and Nehemiah).

At the time of Esther, Susa, the Persian royal city (modern Shus̄hin SW Iran), was enjoying its heyday under King Xerxes, known in Hebrew as Ahasuerus, who came to the throne in 486 BC. He enjoyed the lavish buildings put up during the reign of his father, Darius (521–486). Little remains of them, but Shiite Muslims visit the village to venerate the alleged tomb of the prophet Daniel. Archaeological excavation of the ancient city in the mid-nineteenth century identified the main features of the palace, including the throne room, the harem and the ‘enclosed garden’ mentioned in 1:5.

The book of Esther tells of the favourite of King Xerxes, the courtier Haman, who had a grudge against a Jew call Mordecai. For this reason he plotted to kill all Jews living within the Persian empire. Such was the extent of the empire at that time that virtually the whole race would have been wiped out if he had been successful. Providential intervention came through Esther, the Jewish girl who had been chosen by the monarch as his queen. Circumstances so worked out that Haman became the victim of his own plot, whereas the Jews escaped. Their enemies were liquidated and Mordecai replaced Haman as the king’s right-hand man. Such a remarkable role-reversal provided a gripping theme for the story-teller. For the Jews, whose history was to include many tragic incidents, the book became a source of hope, and the events it records are celebrated annually in the festival of Purim. Throughout the centuries the public reading of this book at Purim has kept alive nationalistic expectations. Even today, every time Haman’s name is mentioned in the Purim liturgy congregations respond with loud banging, shouting and stamping of feet, and ‘Haman’s hats’ (triangular cakes) are eaten during the celebrations. Not surprisingly the story of Esther is better known to the ordinary Jew than any other part of the Old Testament.

The book of Esther in Christian history

This is one of the books of the Bible that is often passed over by Christians. In the early Christian centuries the book was best known in Greek versions. These had extra passages added, which had the effect of building up hostility towards Gentiles and keeping Jews isolated, whereas Christians were trying to integrate believers from both Jewish and Gentile backgrounds. Understandably, therefore, Christians did not make use of the book in the form they received it because it worked against their purposes.

It has often been pointed out that the name of God does not occur in the book of Esther. A superficial reaction to this omission is to question the book's inclusion in the Bible. The great Reformation expositors, Luther and Calvin, left no commentaries on Esther, and those who write the history of the Old Testament period rarely refer to this book. This is because its claim to be a factual report of events tends to be treated with scepticism. Why then should Christians study it today?

In practice most Christians accept the book because it is bound together with the other sixty-five books that make up the Bible. It deserves attention because it is there, and part of our heritage. Historically it helps to fill in the picture of post-exilic life among Jews of the dispersion during the fifth century BC, and explains the origins of one of the festivals that Jews have observed annually from pre-Christian times to the present day. Anyone who wishes to understand the culture of our Jewish neighbours will want to read this account of the origins of Purim.

These, however, are educational rather than personal reasons, and though they are important, they do not necessarily satisfy the readers' desire to find a light for their path and understanding of God. Indeed, can the book have a theology in view of its omission of the name of God?

Theology in Esther

Esther is a book of theological inferences rather than plain statements. It speaks of fasting, but not of the prayer that always accompanied fasting, nor does it mention the answers to prayer that are clearly part of the story. Again, when Mordecai challenged Esther to rescue her people he told her that if she failed to act, relief and deliverance for the Jews would arise 'from another place', implying that God was sure to work out deliverance for his people. Faith in God can be implicit in people who, for whatever reason, scarcely ever let their faith be known.

Life in Persia under the rule of King Xerxes was oppressive for minority groups like the Jews and, according to the writer of Esther, perilous. It may seem unlikely that a ruler would decree at a whim the execution of a whole people, as Xerxes did (3:9–11), but Herodotus, the contemporary historian, confirms that Xerxes was cruel and despotic towards his own household, not to mention foreigners. The author, conscious of the need to be diplomatic lest history should repeat itself and his people be put in jeopardy of their lives again, was careful to be factual and objective, avoiding references to supernatural help. Nevertheless, he found ways of indicating that God was directing events. Indeed the events spoke for themselves; he simply needed to narrate them.

The book describes life at the Persian court with all its extravagance. King Xerxes ruled over 127 provinces, but he did not succeed in ruling his wife, Vashti. Perhaps the author had his tongue in his cheek when he ended the first episode with the king's decree that, 'every man should be ruler over his own household'. The implicit question, where does authority ultimately lie, raises a theological issue.

Haman made an ambitious bid for power, successful at the start, except that Mordecai the Jew would not bow down to him. Haman wished to use his authority, and his influence with the king to eliminate not only Mordecai but all his race. All that was needed was one decree sealed with the king's signet ring, and the plot could be put into effect. There was only one precaution: the date needed to be auspicious or fate could thwart his plan. The author pits fate against the authority of the one worshipped by the Jewish people.

The idea of a predetermined fate, operating in all aspects of life, from that of the individual to the decisions of a country's rulers, was widespread and persistent. A die from the reign of Shalmaneser (858–824 BC) survives as a reminder that each new year's day the year's diary was drawn by casting the lot to determine auspicious dates. This die bears the inscription pur, so confirming the meaning of the word purim given in 9:24. The people of these Near-Eastern lands not only believed in fate but acted accordingly. What happens when those who believe in the Creator God live among those who live by fate? The writer of Esther expects his readers to observe and take note.

Not everything in the outworking of the situation could be attributed directly to God, for each of the main characters took initiatives. Mordecai entered his ward, Esther, for the selection contest, hoping she would be chosen as the new queen. Only later when she was queen did the advantage of her status provide opportunity for her to record Mordecai's loyalty in the king's annals and discredit Haman before the king. Mordecai could not have foreseen that such a need might arise. Esther, for her part, had to risk her own life in order to petition the king, and used guile by inviting him and Haman to her private dinner party, not once but twice. She could not have known how the episode would end, but since her action had been preceded by fasting (and prayer), she evidently expected an opportunity to arise for her to plead the cause of her people. Human initiative alone would not have provided the necessary opportunities, but divine providence together with human watchfulness and timely action brought about the desired end.

In short, the book of Esther strongly supports and illustrates the doctrine of divine providence, as it operated at a particular time of danger to the Jewish people who lived under Persian domination. Mordecai's question, 'And who knows but that you have come to royal position for such a time as this?' (4:14), posed at the moment of crisis, leads the reader to expect Esther to intervene successfully, because providence had already been at work in her selection as queen. This impression is confirmed when the king extended his sceptre to Esther and received her request. As events unfolded and Haman was hanged on his own gallows, while Mordecai was promoted to high office, the dramatic reversal is so unexpected as to require supernatural explanation. Even people of other nationalities came to the same conclusion (8:17), which involved them in accepting that the God who worked justice for his people must be the true God. They therefore declared their faith in him.

Mysterious though the implications of belief in divine providence undoubtedly are, God's sovereignty involves care for all his creation, but especially for his people who put their trust in him. Jesus confirmed God's fatherly care for the natural world (Mt. 6:26–30), and urged his followers to count on their Father to supply every need. That did not mean that disasters would be ruled out. Betrayal, hatred and death awaited Jesus, and he warned his disciples that they could expect no less (Mt. 10:21–25). Pain and conflict do not cancel out the providential care, for God's concern for the sparrow is declared in the same breath as 'even the very hairs of your head are all numbered' (Mt. 10:29–31). In the book of Esther the death of the Jews was replaced by the death of their enemies. Jesus stated that he did not come to bring peace, but a sword (Mt.

10:34). God's providence embraces his justice and his love as he orders the affairs of this far-from-perfect world, hence the part played by the sword.

The book of Esther is one to ponder in any attempt to relate biblical values to life in an increasingly secular world. Belief in an inflexible fate survives today, as witnessed by the popularity of horoscopes. This book demonstrates that fate is not unchangeable when it runs counter to God's eternal purpose.

Literary features

The book of Esther is the work of a literary artist who uses his gifts as a vehicle for his deepest convictions. His introductory episode effectively depicts King Xerxes as ruler of his vast domain but unable to control his wife. Implicitly a question is raised about leadership and authority. The king appointed as his deputy Haman who was totally taken up with his own importance, so presenting another aspect of leadership. The partnership did not work well for the empire because the king left power in the hands of his deputy, without bothering to check what was happening. All this is conveyed without any hint of disapproval. A very different concept of responsibility is presented in Mordecai the Jew, who weighed up the worth of those in authority, saved the king from an assassination plot and refused to submit to self-important Haman. The contrast between the two men raises the question, (see Fowler p. 496²) how right can prevail when those who do right have no power.

The contrast between Haman and Mordecai becomes more marked as each pursued his chosen strategy. Mordecai fasted and lamented while the king and Haman sat down to drink (3:15; 4:1). Mordecai revealed his faith (4:14) while Haman completed his happiness by building a gallows for Mordecai (5:14). Thus a life-and-death struggle developed. The turning point was the king's sleepless night (6:1), when he was reminded of his debt to Mordecai and determined to reward him. From this point on a dramatic reversal begins. Haman was forced to bestow honours on Mordecai and then was hanged on the gallows he had prepared for him. Mordecai took Haman's place at the king's side, and a new edict was issued. Suddenly justice has prevailed. The threat to the Jews raised in the first five chapters fails to materialize and their fortunes are reversed in the last five; the structure of the book thus matches the message of the contents.

This artistic awareness is apparent also in the skilful characterization. Both male and female characters are finely drawn, and consistently act according to type. The king impressed his subjects by his wealth rather than by a concern for just rule. He enjoyed his privileges, passed new laws without a second thought and handed over his authority to a deputy, whom he trusted implicitly. Queen Esther was in many ways the antithesis of the king. Early on she was subject to Mordecai, but when danger threatened she was the one who suggested that all the Jews should fast for three days. Esther acknowledged a power greater than her own, and found assurance to take an initiative. She approached the king with her invitation, but could not have known how she would achieve her goal. Her concern was for her people, and for justice. The fact that the people were delivered and, under Mordecai, prospered brings the book to an end, and the reader is left to ponder on the outcome. Has divine providence been at work?

Both Mordecai and Esther faced a conflict of loyalties, arising out of their faith. Mordecai could not pretend to accept Haman's unprincipled leadership, and Esther risked disobeying the king for the sake of her people. Civil disobedience is justified in the greater cause. The author makes frequent use of irony, drawing attention to the king's ostentatious feasting, his stupidity in passing laws without due attention (1:21–22) and his abdication of duty (3:8–11). The author also uses particular words and phrases to call attention to certain themes. The feasts in the book have dire consequences, whereas the fasts (4:1–3, 16) work for good, so that ultimately the Jews themselves feast. This is an example of the way the author seeks to ‘tie up the ends’.

Fact or fiction?

Such artistic features could be thought to suggest that the book is to be classified as fiction, and some scholars have argued that the story is improbable in several details. They cite the 180 days of the king’s feast (1:4), the queen’s refusal to attend (1:12), the appointment of non-Persians like Esther and Mordecai to positions of importance in the land, and the king’s permission for a whole people to be wiped out. In addition, the characters are said to be recognizable role-types rather than individuals. Such judgments, however, are made from a modern standpoint. In view of the lack of literature surviving from this period in Persia it is impossible to verify what happened or to appreciate the account in its literary environment. Historians have verified the author’s accurate knowledge of Persian royal palaces and customs, and independent evidence has come to light that a certain Marduka (?Mordecai) was in authority in Susa, serving as an accountant in the early years of the reign of Xerxes. Evidence of the use of lot-casting or ‘pur’ has also tended to support the historicity of the narrative. The part played by irony and satire in the author’s narration accounts for some of the book’s ‘improbable’ aspects.

When might the book have been written? There are no known references to it in other literature, so a judgment has to be based on internal evidence. The subject matter and the frequent occurrence of Persian words in the Hebrew suggest a date in the Persian period, some time after the reign of Xerxes, which is referred to as if it were in the past. The author was concerned that Jews should never forget their deliverance from empire-wide massacre, hence his book establishing the annual observance of Purim, duly authorized by royal command. This could well have been needed early in the reign of Artaxerxes I, say around 460–450 BC, after the death of Xerxes. The author evidently had access to the annals of the Persian kings (6:1; 10:2), and was a Jew involved in affairs of state in Persia and its empire.

The place of the book in Scripture

In our English Bibles the book of Esther follows the history books, and adds its contribution to the history by illustrating life in the fifth century BC among Jews in western Asia. In the Hebrew canon it is among the ‘Writings’, and is usually the last of the ‘five scrolls’ allocated to festivals. Esther is the text for Purim, celebrated in the twelfth month of the Jewish year, and therefore the last. The popularity of this festival caused many copies of the book to be needed, and early translations contain a variety of readings different from the Hebrew. The LXX, probably translated as early as the second century BC, contains over 100 verses that are not in the Hebrew. They were probably added to introduce a more obviously religious emphasis, and can be found collected together in the Apocrypha.

The amazing deliverance of the Jewish people from death in the time of Xerxes has been instrumental, through the annual Purim celebration, in keeping Jewish faith alive through many another persecution, even to the present day. Jewish identity has been preserved amid the multitude of other cultures, and has survived despite the holocaust. God has not cast off his ancient people, but continues to be gracious to them. His plan is to save the world, however, and Gentile Christians owe their salvation to God's covenant, initiated with Abraham, and fulfilled in Christ. The book of Esther should stir a spirit of thanksgiving in Christian as well as Jewish hearts, and remind Christians of their debt to faithful Jewish leaders like Mordecai and Esther. As Christians enter into the aspirations of the Jewish people in the light of their past sufferings, and repent of cruel misunderstandings and victimization on the part of the Christian church in the past, they may earn the right to commend to Jews the Lordship of Jesus Christ, 'who is the Head over every power and authority' (Col. 2:10).

Commentary

1:1–22 King Xerxes deposes his queen

1–3 The narrator first introduces King Xerxes, his empire and his capital. His difficult Persian name Khshayarsha was transliterated Ahasuerus in Hebrew (so AV, RV, RSV), whereas the NIV has adopted the Greek transliteration Xerxes, better known in secular history. His empire, extending from the Indus River in Pakistan to the Upper Nile in northern Sudan, comprised an impressive 127 provinces. Susa, the ancient capital of Elam, had been rebuilt by Darius, father of Xerxes, as one of his capital cities. The citadel was the central acropolis, elevated above the remainder of the city, and fortified to protect the king. The third year of his reign (483 BC) marked the end of opposition to the new reign, and was an appropriate time to consolidate the empire by assembling its leading figures in the capital.

4–8 For six months the king displayed his royal treasures. Though his vast wealth had resulted from conquests, taxation and tribute, no voice was raised to question the justice of the king's acquisitiveness. Since wealth could be translated into military might, it inspired awe, but the writer of Esther implicitly passes judgment on the king's self-aggrandisement by painting his extravagances in vivid colours. The banquet was the culmination of the festivities, intended to impress all the leaders of civil and military affairs whose loyalty was essential to the well-being of the empire. The king's lavish hospitality extended to all ... in the citadel, his retinue, officials and visiting dignitaries. The draped linen in the royal colours of white and purple, together with the gold and silver against the background of marble pillars and mosaic floor, provided a fabulously rich setting. Some of the goblets of gold from the period survive, and are works of art, individually designed. Stress is laid on the abundance of the supply of wine and on the freedom of each guest to drink as he pleased.

9–12 Why the women were entertained separately is not explained, nor is any reason given for Queen Vashti's refusal to attend at the king's command. Any excuse would have been considered irrelevant as she had no rights. The seven eunuchs, whose names support a Persian source, were permitted access to the royal harem (cf. Acts 8:27). The queen's defiant refusal to appear at the king's feast made him look foolish, hence his fury.

13–20 Something had to be done, and the seven advisers were responsible for devising a punishment. (Note the importance of the number seven; 10, 14; cf. Ezr. 7:14.) Memucan spoke on behalf of the seven nobles in reply to the king's question. He was astute in generalizing the problem, implying that because Queen Vashti would be influential over other women of the nobility, every man present was at risk of losing his control over his wife. He called for solidarity and advised the king to issue a decree banishing Vashti (her title is omitted from this point on). The published decree would restore the king's authority, and ensure that every husband would enjoy due respect from his wife. Meanwhile, someone better than Vashti should be appointed in her place. How the new queen got her way with the king is a theme that is explored in the rest of the story.

21–22 Since there was unanimous agreement that Memucan had given good advice, the decree was framed forthwith and translated into the many languages represented by the company present at the feast. There is irony in the contrast between the Xerxes who ruled over 127 provinces (1), and the banality of his proclamation that every man should be ruler over his own household. Despite all the great show of wealth and power, King Xerxes had decided limitations in his own home. There is irony also in the reference to the laws of Persia and Media, which could not be repealed, and yet which could be passed at a whim by a monarch in high spirits from wine.

2:1–18 Esther is chosen to be queen

1–4 The king, sober once more, recalled the events on the last night of the feast. However much he regretted them he could not change his own legislation. Here was yet another limit to his great powers. The suggestion that the search for a new queen should begin, and the thought of all the most beautiful young women of the empire being assembled in his harem, restored the king's spirits. Interestingly, the name Hegai occurs as an officer of Xerxes in the Histories of Herodotus (ix. 34).

5–11 The author now introduces Mordecai, a Jew of the tribe of Benjamin. (Though the word Jew derived from 'Judah', it became a generalized term for any Israelite during the post-exilic period.) Mordecai had distinguished names among his ancestors: Kish was the father of King Saul (1 Sa. 9:1), and Shimei, his relative, had fiercely supported him (2 Sa. 16:5). The fact that the family had been deported to Babylon with King Jehoiachin in 597 BC is another indication of its importance (2 Ki. 24:14–16). The name Mordecai was connected with Marduk, the state god of Babylon. At least two common names were so derived, and there is even mention of a man named Marduka in a text of about this period who served as an accountant on an inspection tour from Susa. Mordecai was evidently a man to be reckoned with. He had adopted his orphaned cousin, Hadassah, 'myrtle', also known as Esther. This Persian name meant 'star', a reference to the star-like flowers of the myrtle, perhaps, though there is also a resemblance in sound between the two names. The fact that she was lovely in form and features was a key factor in the outworking of God's purpose, and is seen as his good gift.

Having introduced Mordecai and Esther, the author resumes the account of the king's orders and their implementation. Of the many girls who arrived in Susa, only one, Esther, is mentioned by name. Even before the king had set eyes on her, Esther had won the favour of Hegai. The Hebrew word is hesed, familiar as the covenant word expressing God's faithfulness and love, but used here in a secular context. Hegai gave Esther preferential treatment, promoting her to first place by selecting for her the best attendants and the most attractive quarters. Esther did not permit such favours to go to her head, but kept her own counsel with regard to her nationality. Unlike Xerxes, Mordecai was able to rule his household. The fact that he cared enough about Esther to check daily on her well-being provides a clue to his secret. Esther obeyed because she loved and respected Mordecai.

12–18 All who aspired to be queen had to submit to twelve months of beauty treatment, using the aromatic products for which these countries of the east had always been famous (cf. Gn. 37:25). Fumigation, hair plucking, lightening of the skin colour as well as perfuming played a part in the beautifying process. The sad part was that, despite all this luxurious indulgence, most of the girls would spend only one night with the king, and then live among the concubines, neglected wives who spent their days in idleness. The harem system was inhumane and grossly devalued women as people.

By God's goodness Esther was spared the worst fate. She had not made demanding requests for her adornment, but had been prepared to be guided by Hegai, and the inference is that Esther won approval by her good sense as well as by her beauty. The seventh year of the reign of Xerxes (16) records that four years had passed since the king had banished Vashti (1:3). Tebeth, the tenth month, was usually cold and wet but despite this disadvantage, Esther met with the king's approval. So much so that he made her his queen there and then, crowning her, proclaiming a banquet for her and marking the occasion with a public holiday and gifts to all. Consequently the whole population had cause for rejoicing.

2:19–23 Mordecai uncovers a conspiracy

When the virgins were assembled a second time is problematic because no such previous gathering has been mentioned. The reference would seem to be to v 8, and to suggest only a short time after the choice of Esther as queen. The fact that Mordecai was sitting at the king's gate implies that he had been given, perhaps at the nomination of Esther, a place in the judiciary of Susa, for 'the gate' was the traditional court of law (e.g. Ru. 4:1–10). At the gate of the citadel Mordecai kept his ears open and overheard the palace gossip. Bigthana, maybe the Bigtha of 1:10, and Teresh, trusted retainers who guarded the royal apartments, were plotting to assassinate the king. Mordecai reported this through Esther. The culprits were tried and put to death, either by being impaled or hanged, and the case was officially recorded in the presence of the king, who, however, took no action to reward Mordecai.

3:1–15 Haman plots against the Jews

1–6 Some years passed (7) and when the king decided to promote one of his nobles to the highest office in the land, he chose, not the man who had saved his life, but a certain Haman, an Agagite. The name Agag recalls the reign of Saul the son of Kish (1 Sa. 9:1–2), who failed to fight this Amalekite king to the death, so incurring condemnation by the prophet Samuel (1 Sa. 15). Jewish readers would see a recapitulation of this battle in the confrontation between Mordecai (also a 'son of Kish') and Haman the Agagite. It was a battle Mordecai determined to win. Since King Xerxes, who does not seem to have been a good judge of character, had to command his nobles to bow down to Haman, it appears that he was not highly thought of by his fellow courtiers. Mordecai disapproved of the appointment and so refused to prostrate himself before Haman, though he must have known that he was asking for trouble, especially when royal officials reported him to Haman. The fact that Mordecai was a Jew would not have prevented him from honouring those in authority, but adherence to the law of God gave Jews an allegiance higher than mere human jurisdiction, and tended to develop independence of judgment. This was interpreted as insubordination by Nebuchadnezzar (Dn. 3:12–23) and by officials of King Darius (Dn. 6:5–9). Resentful and vindictive, Haman took his time in planning his strategy for revenge. Not content with taking the life of Mordecai, he plotted against the whole Jewish people, so setting a precedent in anti-Semitism. Such a bloodthirsty intention reveals that Haman was totally unscrupulous.

7–11 The court diary of Persia was drawn up in the first month of each year with the help of dice which indicated the propitious dates for various events. The word pur, meaning 'lot' has come to light on a die from the reign of Shalmaneser III of Assyria (858–824 BC), so confirming the detail given in v 7. Dependence on belief in fate continued over the centuries, good and bad omens determining when action could be taken. For Haman's purposes the lucky month was the last of the year, so permitting time to publish the king's decree (already determined by Haman) throughout the empire. In his approach to the king, Haman carefully avoided naming the Jews, implying instead some obscure but dissident racial group, intent on ignoring Persian law. It was true that the Jews had their own customs, but they had been expressly commanded by Jeremiah to live peaceably in the lands of exile (Je. 29:7) and they did so. Haman, pleading the king's best interests, made out a plausible case for ridding the empire of this dangerous element and financial interest added a further incentive. The sum Haman promised represented a huge fortune, implying that he was extremely wealthy, even though he intended to benefit from plundering the property of those he put to death (13).

King Xerxes could not raise sufficient interest to investigate the details so he appointed Haman to work on his behalf, and by handing over his signet ring declared Haman's executive authority to do whatever he saw fit. The author, by giving Haman his full title, son of Hammedatha the Agagite, and adding the enemy of the Jews, makes a cryptic comment on the prestige of a cunning strategist. The king was indifferent to both the proffered money and the execution of an indefinite number of his subjects, but no judgment is passed on his lax abdication of duty nor on his misplaced trust in Haman.

12–14 Without delay the edict was drawn up, copied, translated, sealed with the king's ring and sent out to all parts of the empire by means of the postal system inaugurated by Cyrus. This system depended on relays of horses, stationed throughout the empire to ensure swift communication (see Herodotus v. 14; viii. 98). The decree was repetitious and specific. It was to be made public so that no-one could plead ignorance of the law. Haman was pleased with his work, and relaxed over a drink with his monarch, while the people of Susa wondered what was happening behind the scenes.

4:1–17 Esther agrees to intercede

1–5 Mordecai had every reason to grieve at the edict of Haman because his refusal to acknowledge Haman's promotion had jeopardized the whole Jewish race. By wearing a mourning garb and making loud wailing the Jews made known their plight, identified themselves and drew attention to the inexplicable edict. Mordecai, however, could no longer make contact with Esther because sackcloth was not permitted within the citadel. When Esther heard he was in mourning she sent him suitable clothing to replace his sackcloth, but to no avail. Esther's great distress indicates genuine love and concern. Her trusted attendant Hathach went to find out the facts.

6–11 Mordecai had left no stone unturned in order to assemble all the relevant details, and he told Hathach what he knew, including the exact amount of silver promised by Haman for the royal treasury. Hathach took back a copy of the edict, so that Esther had the exact wording, and the urgent request that she should approach the king for mercy. Esther's response is revealing. She did not have right of access to the throne, nor had she been summoned to the king for thirty days. Like everyone else, if she approached the king without being summoned she would be put to death unless the royal sceptre was extended to her.

12–17 Mordecai still gave Esther her orders and told her that, though she was queen, she need not think that she would escape death. If she failed to act, deliverance for the Jews would arise from another place. Mordecai undoubtedly implied that God would protect his people and that he had purposed to use Esther by causing her to be chosen as queen. This is a theological high point in the book. Mordecai believed that God guides in political events and in individual lives, even though those in power do not acknowledge him. Esther's call for a three-day fast revealed that she shared the faith of Mordecai in the God who answers prayer, though she did not mention his name. Her need was for courage to fulfil her destiny by interceding for the life of her people, though it could cost her her own life.

5:1–8 Esther takes the lead

1–4 On the third day Esther put her resolve into action, strengthened by the knowledge that the Jewish community in Susa was solidly behind her. The days of fasting had resulted in the formation of a plan, and Esther was composed and queenly as she stood robed in the hall of pillars at a distance from the throne. The king extended his royal sceptre to his consort and she approached him and disclosed the problem which had caused her to enter his presence. She touched the tip of the sceptre to acknowledge her acceptance. When the king invited her to ask up to half the kingdom (an idiom not intended literally), Esther was content to issue an invitation to a private dinner party for the king and Haman, which would present an opportunity to make the authentic request. It was a wise but daring move to invite the king's favourite, Haman.

5–8 The alacrity with which the king summoned Haman indicates that Esther's invitation had pleased him. Esther for her part had had to make advance preparations for the banquet, anticipating acceptance by the king. The king was in a relaxed mood, addressing his wife as Esther (contrast 'Queen Esther' in v 3) and prepared, after being feasted, to give her anything she asked. Even so, Esther was not in any hurry. Let them first enjoy another such occasion, and then she would make her request.

5:9–14 Haman plots against Mordecai

Haman's happiness was short-lived. The sight of Mordecai, scorning to make any acknowledgement of his presence, turned his rapture to rage; he would have to get even with Mordecai. But first he boasted to his friends of the honours bestowed on him at court, in addition to all the other signs of fortune's special favour. It is perhaps significant that Haman gave first place to his wealth. He was so convinced of his importance that he never dreamt that Esther could have anything against him. Mordecai the Jew was his one enemy, depriving him of satisfaction. Though Haman had already made certain of the death of all Jews, he readily accepted the suggestion of his wife and friends that a gallows should be built especially for Mordecai (cf. 2:23). Haman assumed that the king would pass the death sentence on Mordecai, and his delight at the thought completed his happiness. The exaggerated height of the gallows (75 ft) was in keeping with the grand scale on which Persian building was done.

6:1–14 The king honours Mordecai

It is fascinating to observe the series of coincidences, none of which could have been foreseen, that brought about the answers to the prayers made by the Jews during their fast days. Esther's moves, calculated as they appear, reflected the more-than-worldly wisdom given to her during the fast.

1–3 That night the king could not sleep. This unremarkable state of affairs became the turning point in the sequence of events, because the king heard read to him the record of Mordecai's exposure of the plot to assassinate him. The reversal of fortune that follows resulted from the king's obligation to decide upon a suitable reward for saving his life. It was natural that he should consult with his chief minister in making so far-reaching a decision.

4–14 Haman arrived early at the palace because he needed the royal assent for the execution of Mordecai, but before he could voice his petition the king had raised quite another issue: how to honour a deserving subject. Imagining that he was to be the recipient of the honour, Haman eagerly described his own ambition. He wished to receive the prestige and acclaim due to a man honoured by his sovereign; to wear the king's clothes, ride his horse and, in effect, impersonate him and receive royal homage.

The misunderstanding was total. The king was unaware of Haman's hopes and of the bitter irony of Haman's plight in being asked to honour Mordecai instead of hanging him. Most odious of all was the public loss of face, for all his friends were aware of the gallows looming high over the citadel, and of Haman's plot against Mordecai. Instead of being hanged Mordecai returned to the king's gate, unmoved by events, but fascinated, no doubt, by the volte-face of his enemy. Haman for his part was mortified, and received no comfort from his wife; the mood at home had changed. Superstitious minds read the signs, and lost their confidence in him. Events now moved swiftly. Messengers from the king were already on the doorstep to summon Haman to Esther's second banquet. Time had caught up with him.

7:1–10 The king has Haman hanged

1–4 Suspense builds up as the king puts his question a third time to Queen Esther. There is nothing of the informality of the previous occasion, and in reply Esther addressed her husband using his royal titles, and courtly phrases. Nevertheless the truth must be told. Grant me my life ... spare my people: these petitions were startling in their implications, and guaranteed the king's closest attention. Using the passive to avoid naming Haman at this point, Esther referred to the large sum which virtually sold the Jews. To have been sold into slavery could have been tolerated, but they were sold for destruction and slaughter and annihilation, the very verbs used in the decree (3:13) though the English here requires nouns. The meaning of the last clause of v 4 is uncertain, as the NIV margin indicates, but its marginal reading conveys the most likely sense. No amount of money could compensate for the loss the king would suffer if the Jewish people were to be put to death. Esther appeals to the king's best interests, and suggests that people are far more important than possessions.

5–10 The king was about to receive one further shock. He discovered it was Haman who was responsible for plotting to destroy his queen and her people. Esther's wisdom in inviting Haman to the banquets now becomes apparent: he was there to face directly the fate he deserved as the enemy, not only of the Jewish people but also of the king. Esther could not have known for sure how the king would react to the news that she was Jewish. The king in his rage took a breathing space as he decided how to control so volatile a situation. Haman in his extremity thought only of pleading the queen's mercy. Forgetting the usual conventions he approached too close to the queen, and further antagonized the king. The court retainers moved in and by covering his face virtually arrested him. Harbona, mentioned in the original list of courtiers (1:10), informed the king of Haman's gallows, intended for Mordecai who spoke up to help the king. King Xerxes needed no further prompting. Haman had, unknowingly, made preparations for his own execution, which took place forthwith. The king's wrath was appeased because justice had been done. Whereas Haman's edict had caused bewilderment (3:15), the total reversal of his fortunes, ending in his death on the gallows he had intended for his enemy, restored ease of mind to both king and people.

8:1–17 Haman's edict is reversed

1–2 Despite the death of Haman, much remained to be done if Persia were to prosper, and the author carefully ties up the loose ends in the closing chapters. The property of condemned criminals reverted to the crown in the ancient Near East (cf. Jezebel's assumption in 1 Ki. 21:7–16), hence the ease with which King Xerxes could bestow the possessions of Haman upon Queen Esther. She for her part informed the king of her relationship to Mordecai, and of her indebtedness to him. When the king summoned Mordecai to court it was with a view to honouring him appropriately for the services he had rendered. The charade dreamed up by Haman (6:7–9) had been ludicrous. This time, however, Mordecai was presented with the king's signet ring and entrusted with the affairs of state. Whereas Haman had misused his power, Mordecai was expected to continue loyal service to the king, a hope reinforced by Esther's choice of Mordecai to administer Haman's estate. The sequence of events piles irony upon irony, as Mordecai takes over both the status and property of the enemy of the Jews.

3–8 One major problem remained to be solved: Haman's edict remained on the statute book and needed to be negated. It had gone out in the name of the king, who alone could authorize any alteration, and it had been published in every province of the empire. Of necessity, Esther had to approach the throne once more as a suppliant to plead for the life of her people. This time she was bold enough to bow at the king's feet, weep, and request the king to end Haman's evil plan ... devised against the Jews. Once again Esther chose her words carefully, omitting any reference to legislation, because, as the saying went, 'the laws of Persia and Media cannot be repealed' (1:19), and the king could not be expected to lose face. The king rewarded her wisdom and courage by extending his sceptre, so bidding her rise.

Even now Esther prefaced her request with due deference, recognizing that any decision must be owned by the king, though for the present time she stood high in his favour. The edict had gone out in the king's name, but Esther contended that the wording had been devised by Haman, and therefore she argued in favour of an order ... overruling the despatches of Haman. This was a master-stroke on her part, reinforced by the double reference to her own agony of mind, how can I bear ... my people ... my family. Since Esther had spoken on behalf of Mordecai and herself, the king included both in his reply. First, King Xerxes justified himself by his drastic punishment of Haman, and went on to sanction another decree in the king's name, though the wording was left once again to his second-in-command. The words that Esther had so carefully avoided about the impossibility of revoking decrees of the king he now repeated. Once again the writer has a little dig at royal inconsistencies.

9–14 The wording echoes 3:12–14, where Haman's edict is recorded, only the content of the edict is entirely reversed. So much for laws that cannot be changed, and for the great men who frame the laws. Haman had fallen as swiftly as he had risen to power. His edict of the first month was overturned in the third month by order of his enemy, Mordecai, who added Hebrew to the list of languages in which the new edict was published. Fast horses from the royal stud ensured speedy delivery.

It is important to note the NIV translation of v 11, which captures the sense, as opposed to the NEB, JB and GNB. There is no question about the first clause, permitting Jews to organize themselves; question arises over the object of the verbs destroy, kill and annihilate, quoted from 3:13, Haman's decree. There the object was 'all the Jews—young and old, women and little children', whereas Mordecai's decree made any armed force ... that might attack them the object. Permission was given to plunder property but even that was limited to the one specified day, which Haman had regarded as propitious. The Jews would be ready to retaliate if they were attacked, whereas Haman had intended that they should be slaughtered in cold blood.

15–17 Back in Susa, where the decree originated, there was an enthusiastic welcome for the new regime and all it stood for, in contrast to the consternation occasioned by Haman's edict in

3:15. Mordecai's kingly regalia was not resented because he was judged to be worthy of trust. His good understanding won favour (Pr. 13:15) with the population as a whole, as well as with the Jews, who had every reason to celebrate their rise to favour instead of living under threat of death. Under Mordecai's leadership people of other nations, anticipating that it would be advantageous to be Jewish, 'Judaized themselves', a complete reversal of attitude on the part of the public almost over-night, and an encouraging sign for the future of the Jews.

9:1–19 The Jews are seen to triumph

1–4 When the fateful day came, the thirteenth of Adar, the Jews got the upper hand over their enemies. The writer summarizes the outcome of the day's events so that the reader is in no doubt: the victims had become the victors. In fact, he gives the impression that much of the opposition melted away because of the support for Mordecai at both popular and leadership levels. His stress on the fear inspired by Mordecai and his people implies some more-than-human intervention, as though fear of God had seized the population at the swift reversal of Jewish fortunes. The impression spread that Mordecai would not soon be removed from power. He had to be reckoned with, hence the eagerness to support him.

5–10 Nevertheless bloodshed could not be altogether avoided, and the casualties are recorded. The numbers are no doubt far less than would have been the case if the Jews had been the victims, or if there had been no widespread sympathy for the justice of their cause. Haman evidently still had his loyal followers, ready to back such leadership as his sons might provide. This core of potential resistance within the citadel of Susa was the first to be eliminated. To list the names of Haman's dead sons was to reinforce Haman's total defeat. Not one remained to support his cause. But the family property remained intact. Three times the writer states, they did not lay their hands on the plunder (10, 15, 16). In accordance with the example of Abraham they preferred not to enrich themselves through the fall of their enemy (Gn. 14:23). Such unusual self-restraint would not go unnoticed, and would commend the Jews in the estimation of the people.

11–17 The matter-of-fact way in which the king referred to the loss of five hundred men, Haman's sons and an unknown number of men in the provinces, only to offer his queen the opportunity to extend the bloodshed, is gruesome. Esther in turn proved to be an 'iron lady', concerned to demonstrate the demise of Haman by having the bodies of his sons publicly hanged, and to complete the execution of further enemies of the Jews in the city of Susa, beyond the acropolis. For this Esther requested one more day, on which another three hundred men died. Elsewhere in the empire the total of 75,000 killed by organized Jewish resistance fighters implies that Haman's decree had been implemented. Assuming that all 127 provinces were involved, each would have lost about six hundred men, less that the city of Susa alone. Thus the Jews got relief from their enemies. Their deliverance from destruction had to be celebrated, hence the institution of a holiday on the fourteenth day of Adar, when the dreaded thirteenth had safely passed. In Susa, however, the fifteenth was celebration day because of Esther's extra request. Everywhere there was joyous sharing of festive meals, ensuring that no-one was excluded. Thus the intention of Haman to wipe out the Jewish race had the effect of strengthening the bonds between its members, and increasing the communal spirit among them as they remembered their shared danger and deliverance.

9:20–32 The origin of Purim

20–22 A festival which was to endure needed written authentication. Passover, the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost) and Tabernacles were established in the liturgical calendar by the Law of Moses (Dt. 16:1–17); Mordecai added the Feast of Purim. He decreed both the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar to be kept each year as a time of thanksgiving for deliverance from the threat of extinction, which had parallels with salvation from the pharaoh at the exodus (Ps. 106:10; Lk. 1:71). Passover and Purim both speak of sorrow turned to joy and mourning to celebration. Mordecai ordered that generous hospitality, with special mention of caring for the poor, should mark the festival with lavish bounty.

23–28 What the author has not yet explained is the name Purim, therefore he gives a summary of Haman's plot. It involved his casting the pûr or 'lot', a word not found in Hebrew, hence the bracketed translation in the text. The finding of a die bearing the word pûru (see Introduction) has now confirmed the meaning of the word, so vindicating the accuracy of the author of the book. The casting of lots for fixing dates was a long-established practice in the ancient Near East, but on this occasion it did not work out as the would-be winner had intended. The adoption of the word Purim (pur with the Hebrew plural ending,—im), 'lots', was therefore a defiant repudiation of fate, because fate had not delivered the right answer to the one who believed in fate. The Jews had proved again that they knew a better way of life. For this reason it was imperative that the festival should be celebrated by every family in every generation, and never be allowed to die out.

29–32 The weight of Queen Esther's authority was added to that of Mordecai: Queen Esther ... wrote or 'decreed'. By this time written authority was required for legislation throughout the empire. Every province had its authentic copy of the royal edict, duly sealed, so that no one could plead ignorance. Fasting and lamentation had not been referred to since 4:16, but this is a reminder of one of the themes of the book, and the means whereby Esther found confidence to accept her leadership role. So fasting gets a mention in the recapitulation at the end of the story, but it is unlikely that fasting was observed as part of the original Purim liturgy. The stress is too emphatically on feasting. Nevertheless, without the fasting there would have been no feasting. It was written down in the records, presumably this time the legal reference books of Susa. The events recorded were well authenticated and documented.

10:1–3 The success of Mordecai

The book closes with a reference to King Xerxes, with whom the book opened. There mention was made of the extent of his empire (1:1); here the point is made in the most factual way that not even the most distant places escaped paying tribute, such was the power of the king to impose his will. Under such a regime who would have thought that a Jew would become right-hand man to the king? King Xerxes himself had raised Mordecai to greatness, and the circumstances surrounding this appointment were written in the royal annals of Media and Persia. (cf. 'Persia and Media' in chapter 1. Since the Median empire was founded before that of Persia the royal annals would begin with those of Media.) Mordecai was therefore well-placed to represent his people, and secure their best interests, whereas earlier in the reign of King Xerxes they were at the mercy of the tyrant who would have exterminated them. Thanks to Mordecai the empire was enjoying normal life once more, and the Jews felt secure though they were under foreign domination.

Paul's assurance that 'God is just: He will pay back trouble to those who trouble you and give relief to you who are troubled' (2 Thes. 1:6–7) could have been prompted by a reading of Esther. In both books the ‘trouble’ is persecution of God’s people, who are in no position to defend themselves. Powerful opposition has continued over the centuries, and ‘our struggle is not against flesh and blood’ (Eph. 6:12). God sometimes intervenes with spectacular providences, as he did in the time of Esther, but whether he publicly vindicates the believer or not, the church’s task is to stand firm. Paul found his vindication in the growth of the church.

In the centuries before Christ the survival of the Jewish people was essential if there were ever to be a church. The book Esther, which relates a story about that survival, is therefore an integral part of the Bible for Christians as well as for Jews.

JOB

Introduction

The theme of the book

We all know, in reading this magnificent book, that its theme is the problem of suffering. But what exactly is the problem of suffering? To many people it is the question: Why does suffering happen? What is its origin and cause? Or, to put it more personally: For what reason has this particular suffering happened to me? But perhaps these ways of putting the question mainly reflect our obsession, in the modern world, for discovering the origins of things—as if by that means alone we can come to true understanding.

To the question of the origins of suffering, serious though it is, the book of Job does not give any satisfactory answer. The question is certainly raised and partial answers to it are given by Job’s friends. Suffering, they say, is usually a punishment for sin and sometimes a warning against committing sin in the future. The book as a whole adds that sometimes, as in the case of Job himself, suffering comes for no earthly reason at all but simply in order to justify God’s claim that humans can serve him without thought of reward. But just because the book offers these different reasons for the origin of suffering, readers cannot learn from the book what is the cause of their own suffering; they are in the same position, then, as Job himself, who never becomes aware of the origin of his suffering. To him it remains a mystery to the last. We may conclude that the book does not regard this question of origins as the primary question about suffering.

There is a second problem about suffering: Do innocent people suffer, or is suffering always deserved? Now this is a question that is both raised and convincingly answered by the book. It speaks out clearly against the idea that suffering is always a punishment for wrongdoing by insisting that the Job who suffers is a righteous man. It is not only the narrator (1:1), and not only

Job himself (e.g. 6:30; 9:15) but also God (42:7–8), who affirms that Job is an innocent man. All the same, it is a very natural human tendency to ask, when one is suffering, ‘What have I done to deserve this?’ The book of Job admits that suffering may sometimes be fully deserved, but its main response to this question is to say that perhaps you have no need to blame yourself; suffering is not always what ought to happen to you. But even this question and its answer are not the essential point that the book wants to make about the problem of suffering.

The third, and essential, problem of suffering that is addressed by the book of Job is a more personal one. It is: How can I suffer? What am I to do when I am suffering? In what spirit can I go on suffering? By comparison with this question of how we can actually respond to suffering, the first question (about the origin of suffering) seems merely an academic one, and the second (whether there is innocent suffering) can be quite easily answered. This third question is the hardest one; it takes the whole book of Job to answer it.

The book of Job gives two different but complementary answers to the question as it portrays Job’s reactions to his suffering. The first answer is expressed in the prose introduction to the book in the first two chapters. Job reacts to the disasters that come upon him with calm acceptance of the will of God; he can bless God both for what he has given and what he has taken away (1:21), both for good and for harm (2:10). If sufferers can identify with Job’s attitude of acceptance, they are fortunate indeed. If, like him, they do not try to ignore the reality of their suffering by escaping into the past, and if they do not become so burdened with the present grief that they forget past blessings they have had, they have gained a benefit from the story of Job. Many sufferers, however, do not come to acceptance so easily; they are rather a blend of Job the patient and Job the impatient.

The second answer to the question, What am I to do when I am suffering? emerges from the distress and turmoil of Job’s mind as it is revealed in his poetic speeches (between ch. 3 and ch. 31). When he can no longer simply accept what is happening to him, and he becomes bitter and angry as a sense of isolation from God overwhelms him, and he even feels he is being persecuted by God, Job does what he must do. He does not try to suppress his hostility towards God for what has happened to him; he says that he will speak out ‘in the anguish of [his] spirit’ and ‘complain in the bitterness of [his] soul’ (7:11). And he does not complain or shout into the air to express his anger and frustration; his bitterness is directed towards God.

Even though Job is at times rash and unjust in the way he speaks of God, his protests are spoken in the right direction; for he realizes that it is God himself with whom he has to do. It is just because he keeps on addressing himself to God that in the end God reveals himself to him (chs. 39–41). Job’s suffering does not cease because God responds to him. He discovers that he has misjudged God, but his anguish has in some way been calmed by his encounter with God. And, despite Job’s bitter words against God throughout the book, at the end, amazingly enough, God actually praises him for speaking of him ‘what is right’ (42:7–8). That can only mean that Job has directed himself to God in his suffering and has demanded an explanation.

If the book could be heard as speaking to sufferers in Job’s position (people who are suffering, that is, for no reason they themselves can think of), what it would be saying is: Let Job the patient sufferer be your model, so long as that is possible for you. But when you cannot bear that any longer, let your grief and anger and impatience direct you towards God, for he is ultimately the origin of the suffering, and it is only through encounter with him that the anguish can be relieved.

Job is, of course, the central character in the book, but he is not the only one. What have the friends of Job to offer him in his suffering? What help for themselves can other sufferers reading their words find? Eliphaz says that if you are innocent your suffering can only be temporary and asks, ‘Who, being innocent, has ever perished?’ ‘Where were the upright ever destroyed?’ (4:7). If Job is basically a godfearing man, he has a right to confidence that he will not suffer for long. Bildad, a firm believer in the doctrine of retribution, finds his theology confirmed by the deaths of Job’s children, who must have been great sinners (8:4). Job himself still lives, so the sin for which he is being punished cannot have been so severe, and he may take comfort from the fact that his life is spared. Zophar believes suffering is always the result of sin, but believing also that God is merciful, he can only suppose that Job’s suffering is less than he really deserves from a just God (11:5–6). Elihu wants to value suffering as a channel of divine communication, a warning against future sin.

No-one in the book of Job says that the friends are entirely wrong. Even when God reproves them (42:7), it is because they have ‘not spoken of me what is right’—in Job’s case, that is, for Job was not a sinner, and his suffering was in no way God’s punishment. What the friends say about suffering in general may well be true in other circumstances. But where they fail Job is that they take their cue from their doctrine instead of from the evidence of their eyes and ears. They know that Job is a good man, and they wrong him by thinking that his suffering is a witness against his goodness. The book of Job is not against the friends, but it wants to say that suffering happens to good people who do not deserve it as well as to people who deserve all that happens to them.

The origins of the book

We cannot put a date on the composition of the book of Job, except for the outer limits, perhaps the seventh and the second centuries BC. A folk tale of a righteous sufferer probably existed long before the present poem came into being. The theme of the suffering of the innocent is found also in texts of Jeremiah and Isaiah stemming from the sixth century. So it is possible that the suffering of Job was intended to be symbolic of the suffering of the Jews in the time of the exile.

The author of the book was no doubt an Israelite. Job’s own homeland is depicted as northern Arabia; his story is set in a distant patriarchal age; and Job himself does not know God by his distinctive Israelite name, Yahweh. The author, however wants to suggest the universal character of Job’s questions, even though it is obvious that the influences on his thought and literary style are Hebrew through and through.

Among modern students of the Bible, the book of Job is reckoned to belong to the group known as ‘Wisdom Literature’. It is doubtful whether there was a common social setting of the ‘wise’ from which these books (Proverbs, Job and Ecclesiastes) originated, but it is useful to compare them theologically. Proverbs is a stalwart defender of the doctrine of retribution. Its basic principle is that wisdom leads to life and folly to death, and it takes for granted everywhere that righteousness is rewarded and sin is punished. Ecclesiastes does not doubt the value of the quest for wisdom, but it in effect inscribes a challenging question mark in the margin of Proverbs. For it asks what happens to wisdom at death? Death cancels all values, including wisdom, and the meaning of life cannot lie in gaining something that is going to be lost. It is better, says Ecclesiastes, to regard life as an opportunity for enjoyment (Ec. 2:4); for enjoyment is not a cumulative possession that can be ultimately destroyed, it is used up and spent in the process of living. The book of Job also confronts the ideology of Proverbs but in a different way. In the thought of Proverbs, a man like Job is an impossibility. If he was truly righteous, he would find life, wealth and health. The book of Job, however, depicts someone who is both righteous and a sufferer. And at the same time it shows that a truly religious attitude is not passive resignation to misfortune, but includes the courage to enter into dispute with God.

Commentary

1:1–2:13 Prologue

In this prose prologue there are five scenes, artistically arranged: the first, third and fifth (1:1–5, 13–22; 2:7–13) take place on earth; the second and fourth (1:6–12; 2:1–6) in heaven. Job and the other characters on earth remain ignorant of what happens on the heavenly plane; it is only we, the readers, who are let into the secret of why Job is suffering.

1:1–5 Scene 1: Job and his integrity

Job is not an Israelite, he is one of the ‘people of the east’, that is, east of the Jordan (Uz is Edom, south-east of Israel). He is, however, a worshipper of the true God, though he calls him Elohim (God), not ‘Yahweh’, the personal name of God. Job is a blameless man; this means he is beyond reproach, not that he is sinlessly perfect. A consequence of his goodness is that he has an ideal family: the numbers seven and three, adding to ten, symbolically suggest completeness (the same symbolic numbers are found also in the count of his possessions). In the patriarchal world, the female donkeys, valuable for their milk, and their foals were more precious than male donkeys. It was a different story, however, with sons and daughters! Job’s sons each live in their own house: for with a father as wealthy as Job they can live like royal princes. When they gather for celebration on their birthdays, Job takes care that nothing improper happens among all the partying. As head of the family, Job acts as priest, offering sacrifices in case his children had accidentally said or done anything irreligious. The whole scene is of domestic harmony and tranquillity, but the picture of extreme wealth, extreme comfort and extreme scrupulousness already carries a dark hint of some violence that will soon disturb this perfection.

1:6–12 Scene 2: the heavenly gathering

Contrasted with these innocent family gatherings there is taking place in heaven a far more momentous gathering, that of the sons of God. They are God’s courtiers, the angels (cf. also Is. 6:1; Je. 23:18, 22), and among them is ‘the Satan’ (not just ‘Satan’). He is not the personal devil but one of the servants of God (the name means ‘adversary’, see the NIV mg.). The Satan is certainly Job’s adversary, but in this scene he is not an enemy of God; for everything he does is approved of by God, and he cannot act without God’s authorization. His normal task is to act as God’s eyes and ears on earth.

Job is someone God can boast about; there are few in the OT who are called by the dignified title my servant (e.g. 2 Sa. 7:5; Is. 42:1). The Satan does not doubt Job's goodness; what he questions is whether Job is righteous for the sake of righteousness or for the sake of the reward that comes from being righteous.

1:13–22 Scene 3: the first trial

In this central scene four messengers come to Job, announcing four disasters. The disasters (two natural, two inflicted by humans) strike from all directions: the Sabeans (15) come from the south (Sheba); the Chaldeans (17) from the north; the lightning (fire from God, 16) is from the storms that sweep in from the Mediterranean in the west; and the mighty wind (19) comes from the desert in the east. We see Job so overwhelmed by the calamities that he has no time to recover from one shock before the next messenger arrives.

Job's reaction is not to blame natural events or human enemies (the LORD has taken away), not to forget God's blessing (the LORD gave), not to close his eyes to reality (has taken), but to praise the Lord for both good and evil (21). Yahweh's confidence in Job has proved justified.

Job's mother's womb to which he will return at death is probably to be understood as mother earth, out of which humans were created.

2:1–6 Scene 4: the heavenly gathering again

Yahweh's report on Job is that he still maintains his integrity, i.e. his life continues blameless as ever. The Satan now accepts that Job will suffer any external hardship piously provided he is not physically afflicted; it will be a different matter if he is personally harmed, he says. Skin for skin (4) may mean that Job has saved his own skin by piously accepting the death of his children; but more probably that if God now attacks Job himself, he will find that Job will attack him, by cursing him.

2:7–13 Scene 5: the second trial

The narrative hastens to its climax, as the fourth scene dissolves into the fifth. The Satan's exit from the presence of the LORD ends the fourth scene, and his afflicting Job begins the fifth; there is no interval of time between God's authorizing the suffering and the Satan's afflicting Job.

Job had gone to sit on the ash-heap outside his city to perform his rituals of mourning. To express his sense of desolation and isolation, he had removed himself from society and identified himself with the rubbish. While he is sitting there painful sores are inflicted upon him (7), and he uses broken pieces of pottery from the rubbish heap to scratch himself to relieve the irritation. These sores are obviously some skin disease (cf. 7:5; 30:30); more specific identifications like elephantiasis or leprosy cannot be proved. Job has many other symptoms as well, such as loss of weight (19:20), fever (30:30), nightmares (7:14) and sleeplessness (7:4), but these may well be psychosomatic expressions of his depression rather than effects of the skin disease. Other references to his suffering are probably metaphorical, as when he complains that his bones are rotting (30:17) or burning (30:30).

Job's wife must have felt herself terribly wronged by her husband, for the result of all his piety has only been to rob her of her ten children, her social standing and her livelihood. And she is expected to maintain her loyalty to him despite the guilt by association that now attaches to her. Whether out of hatred of God for what he has done to Job, or out of a desire that her husband's misery should be soon ended, she urges Job to curse God (9) and so bring death upon himself. Job does not reproach her for suggesting blasphemy, but for speaking like a foolish woman (see the NIV mg.). By this he probably means low-class, irreligious women, unable to understand the truth behind events. Job is something of an aristocrat, and though he is at this moment deprived of his wealth, he has little real understanding of the plight of the permanently poor (cf. 30:2–8). Job's response to his wife is that God is as free to send good and trouble as he is both to give and to take away (cf. 1:21). This is not fatalistic resignation to the will of an unknowable God, but a kind of trustfulness that God knows what he is doing. In saying that Job did not sin in what he said (10), the narrator does not mean that he sinned in what he thought; he means that Job has disproved the claim of the Satan that he would sin with his lips by cursing God if he was physically struck down.

Job, being a chieftain of great importance (1:3), has friends in various countries, though we cannot with certainty identify their homelands. Their intentions towards Job are kindly, we need not doubt; but strangely enough, when they see how badly he is suffering they do not offer him any consolation. They do not address a single word to him, but begin to treat him as if he were already dead. They believe they are expressing their sympathy (and our silent listening to someone in trouble can be very beneficial), but their silent mourning for seven days and seven nights (13) is inevitably alienating. As their later words will show, they cannot believe that Job does not deserve, in some degree, the suffering that he is now enduring. They uncritically accept the orthodox theology that attributes all suffering to human sinfulness.

3:1–31:40 The dialogue

3:1–26 Job's first speech, in which he expresses his grief

With this monologue of Job's, we are suddenly plunged out of the epic grandeur and deliberateness of the prologue (chs. 1–2) into the dramatic turmoil of the poem (3:1–42:6); from the external description of suffering to Job's inner experience. In the speech there is a movement from the past (3–10) to the future (20–26), and from the experience of the man Job (3–19) outwards towards the experience of humankind in general (20–22).

In this speech there is no reference to the meaning of the suffering, no question about whether it is deserved or not, no wondering about the origin of it. Job does not blame himself for it, nor does he blame God. That will come later, but here we have simply the man Job in the violence of his grief.

3:3–10 He curses the days of his conception and birth. A curse is usually directed to the future, but Job is in such despair that he utters his curse upon the past. It is a completely futile curse, of course, for the past cannot be changed. He wishes that the day of his birth and conception (viewed poetically as one event) could have been blacked out (4–6a) so that it would not have entered into the calendar of the year (6b, c); he wishes that the sorcerers who put a curse on days could have made it one of the unlucky days, in which it would have been impossible for his parents to have conceived him or for his mother to have given birth to him (8a, 10a). 8 Some ancient magicians obviously believed they could rouse Leviathan, the sea-monster (cf. Ps. 104:26; Is. 27:1) and dragon of chaos, who would perhaps swallow up the sun, so causing the darkness of eclipse.

3:11–19 He wishes that he had died at birth. Job moves in this speech from despair to questioning. Since the curse on the day of his birth had obviously never been uttered, he goes on to ask why, if he had to be born, he could not have died at birth (11a) or, at least, have been stillborn (16). Death has for him now become sweeter than life, and he compares the quiet peacefulness and restfulness of the underworld (Sheol) to his present troubled and anxious lot (13–19).

14 Near Eastern kings frequently boasted that they had rebuilt the ruins of famous cities of the past.

3:20–26 The riddle of suffering existence. Job goes on to a wider question. Now he does not only ask why, since he has been born, he himself has to go on living, but why people in general cannot simply die when they are ready for it (20–23). In the last verses (24–26) he again speaks directly of himself. The whole poem ends with the note that has sounded throughout it: unlike the restfulness of the underworld, which is what he desires, Job's life has no peace, quietness or rest, but only turmoil (26).

23 Previously, God's hedge of protection about his life (cf. 1:10) had ensured his well-being; but now that he wants to die, he can think only of God's preservation of his life as an artificial prolongation of his misery; the hedge has become a prison wall rather than a wall of defence. 25 Job's previous fear of future disaster explains his extreme care to ensure that no sin attached to his household (1:5; cf. 15:20–26).

4:1–5:27 Eliphaz's first speech: 'Be patient; all will be well'

Eliphaz, like all Job's friends, intends to sustain him in his suffering, and no-one brings a more comforting message than this friend. But there is also an irony here, as with all the speeches of the friends; for the author does not accept their dogmatic view that suffering is always deserved, and he means to portray their so-called comfort as cruelty.

The essence of Eliphaz's first speech to Job is: You are a pious man, as we know well. There is, therefore, no need to lose heart; for the innocent never finally suffer. You are suffering now because you are not perfect and you need some 'correction' and 'discipline' (5:17); but that will soon come to an end because you are basically a good man (4:6). In brief, his message to Job is, 'Only be patient; all will be well.'

4:2–6 'You are a pious man'. Eliphaz's genuine concern for Job is heard in his opening words; he is deferential and almost apologetic (2a). He is not scornful when he reminds Job how much comfort he has given to others in a similar position (3–4); it is the mildest of reproaches when he says, 'But now trouble comes to you, and you are discouraged' (5). Job's encouragement of others, as an act of true piety, is a good reason why he may expect that God will soon restore him.

4:7–11 'The innocent never perish'. By describing the wicked, Eliphaz does not mean that Job is one of them. On the contrary, he is telling Job that he has no reason for anxiety since he is not one of the wicked, who sow trouble and reap it (8; cf. Ho. 10:13; Gal. 6:7).

4:12–21 'However, even the pious are not perfect'. To support his argument that even the righteous are not perfect, Eliphaz recounts his night vision (12–16) and draws conclusions from it (17–21). Eliphaz thinks himself quite adventurous in having this prophetic insight. The author perhaps means us to be a little amused by Eliphaz's claim to divine revelation of what most normal people who have not been theologically educated would take for granted: 'Can a mortal be more righteous than God?' (17). Even though the words should be translated, 'Can a mortal be righteous [that is, absolutely without sin] in the sight of God?', the idea is still obvious and banal. What is more, it is quite inappropriate for Job. He is not suffering some little affliction because he has fallen short of absolute moral perfection; he has been completely devastated. And though he has not been killed (destroyed like the wicked of v 9), he is in some ways worse off than the wicked; for he desires to be dead, but God insists on keeping him alive (3:20–23).

14 Eliphaz's dream or waking vision frightened him because he was aware of the presence of the supernatural. 18 Even God's heavenly servants, his angels, are not infallibly trustworthy (there is no thought of 'bad' angels here); how much less are mortals, who, unlike the angels, can die within a single day (20a), and who can be so insignificant (compared with angels) that they can die without anyone else noticing (20b) and without ever gaining the kind wisdom Eliphaz and the other friends live by (21).

5:1–7 'Suffering has to be expected'. Eliphaz cannot believe that Job really wants to die (as he has said in ch. 3), and he now supposes that Job must be looking for some way to be delivered from his suffering. Eliphaz says that if that is what Job is seeking, he might as well forget about it, for there is no power, not even among the heavenly beings, that can release Job from his punishment. Suffering is natural for humans; they always bring trouble upon themselves (v 7 should probably be translated, 'It is man who begets suffering for himself').

This cycle of cause and effect is especially clear in the case of the foolish man (2) whose resentment and envy bring him to ruin. Eliphaz does not mean Job is a fool, but we wince at Eliphaz's insensitivity to Job's misfortune when he speaks of the fool's house being cursed (3; cf. 25)! All that he means to say is that not even the righteous Job can hope to escape entirely from such suffering—affliction does not produce itself (6) but is produced by people (7).

5:8–16 'All you can do is commit your case to God'. Eliphaz takes up his earlier theme that Job is essentially a pious man and so should not lose heart (4:2–6), and now recommends patience to Job: If I were you, he says, I would leave my cause in God's hands (8), for he is the great reverser of fortunes (11–16). In this powerful description of God's workings, Eliphaz gets carried away a little by his own rhetoric. Much of it does not apply at all to Job; the only point of connection is that Job, like the lowly or the needy (11, 15), can have hope that God will dramatically change his current misfortunes.

8 At least Eliphaz says one sensible thing: 'if it were I, I would appeal to God.' This is the one piece of the friends' advice that Job does follow, though he hardly needs Eliphaz to encourage him to do so. His cause is both his present misfortune and his 'case' in a more legal sense, which we shall several times hear Job laying before God in future speeches (cf. 7:20–21; 10:18–22; 13:20–23). 11–16 Here the destructive acts of God (12–14) are enclosed within the frame of his saving acts (10–11, 15), so the chief effect of this picture of God's working is to give hope to the poor (16; cf. Lk. 1:51–53).

5:17–27 'If you do so, God will restore you.' Eliphaz advises Job that if only he will wait patiently for God to act, he will find that the suffering he is experiencing is disciplinary suffering (17), and that 'he who wounds is he who soothes the sore' (18; JB). Eliphaz is determined to end this speech on a positive note. He thinks (and this too is ironic) that he is doing Job a favour by telling how well off he is in fact! 'Blessed is the man whom God corrects', he says (17), as if he had any right to tell Job what a blessing it is to be suffering the loss of his family and of his livelihood.

The picture is, however, not entirely rosy: there are conditions Job must meet. He must not despise the discipline of the Almighty (17) and he must hear Eliphaz's advice and apply it to himself (27). These do not seem on the surface to be difficult conditions to meet, but of course they are impossible for Job to accept. How can he accept God's 'discipline' if he does not regard his suffering as discipline but as cruel injustice? And how can he apply Eliphaz's advice to himself when he knows it is the product of theological reflection and not in the least true to lived experience?

6:1–7:21 Job's second speech: 'God, leave me alone'

Eliphaz's speech has not touched Job's problem at all. So Job ignores it, on the whole. This is quite a typical feature of the book, with the various contributors speaking past one another, and it is obviously something the book is wanting to say about the difficulties of bringing theology into communication with real life.

In this powerful speech there are three movements. In the first (6:1–13), which is a soliloquy addressed to no-one in particular, Job goes well beyond his position in ch. 3. There he had wished that he had never been born, and asked why, since he has been born, he is compelled to go on living. But now he yearns for immediate death (6:8–9). In the second movement (6:14–30), Job addresses the friends, complaining they have cheated him of the one thing he might have expected from them: an understanding sympathy. In the third movement of the speech (7:1–21), he surprisingly directs himself to God. For the moment, he asks of God nothing except that he should leave him alone so that he can live out his remaining days free from pain. But of course there is more to this than meets the eye; for in the very act of begging God to desert him he is in fact approaching him.

6:1–13 'May God strike me dead!' At the beginning of this speech Job is not actually addressing God but expressing a forlorn wish that God would bring his suffering to a rapid end. The key passage in this section is vs 8–9: 'Oh, that I might have my request that God would grant what I hope for, that God would be willing to crush me.' Job feels that if he could die now, before his suffering leads him into blasphemy, he could at least have the consolation of not having denied the words, the commandments, of the Holy One.

Eliphaz has called on Job to be patient, but patience needs a strength that Job does not have (11–13). Eliphaz has not recognized what a burden lies upon Job. If his misery could be weighed it would outweigh the sand of the seas (3); no wonder then that his words have been impetuous (or rather, 'desperate'). Job is apologizing for nothing, confessing to nothing. Just as in the prologue (1:21; 2:10), he recognizes that his suffering comes ultimately from God; here in the poem his pains are the result of the poisoned arrows of the Almighty (Shaddai) while the terrors of God his enemy are set in battle array against him (4). It is not the physical pain or the mental torment that weighs him down; it is the consciousness that he has become God's enemy.

5–6 Job's cries have their reasons, just as donkey or ox complain only when their wants go unsatisfied. Job's needs have not been satisfied—least not by Eliphaz, whose words are insipid and whose advice cannot be swallowed any more easily than can the white of an egg (6).

11–13 The feeling of weakness that returns to Job is not so much a physical as a psychological weakness. He has no inner resources left; his self-worth has been undermined because he sees that there is no reason in himself why God should be treating him so mercilessly.

6:14–30 'You have been undependable friends'. Job has just complained that he has no strength left (13), but now he moves to a bitter and sarcastic attack on his friends. His depression has become anger. He begins indirectly, with the image of the seasonal stream or wadi that never has water in it when it is wanted. He charges his friends with having failed to pay him friendship's debt of devotion or 'loyalty', the loyalty of friendship and unqualified acceptance through thick and thin. The friends mean something different by 'loyalty'. They offer sympathy and support, but only as much as is realistic. They cannot say 'my friend, right or wrong' when Job's sufferings plainly prove he is in the wrong and being punished by God for some wrongdoing or other. Are they to disregard the evidence of their eyes and their learning and prop Job up in what they believe to be a falsely self-righteous position?

21 The friends, says Job, are afraid that if they identify themselves too closely with him they too will come under God's judgment. They treat him not as a friend but as someone who has asked for a loan: they offer plenty of advice, but no hard cash (22–23)! 24 Job asks the friends to point out what the crime is for which he is suffering. That is all it would take to make him quiet.

7:1–21 'Why, O God, do you let me go on living?' Job's death-wish again asserts itself, but this time it is interwoven with his experience of the futility and misery of human life generally and with an appeal to God to let him alone so that he may die in peace.

1–10 Job here projects his own despair upon human existence generally: the common lot of humankind is hard service (1). His depression now leads not so much to anger as to a lament over the fruitless drudgery of life. His days that are swifter than a weaver's shuttle (6) are also the days of humankind at large; the life that is but a breath (7) is the human lot; and the fact that he who goes down to the grave does not return (9) is common to humanity. And yet, paradoxically, life that is so brief can seem so tedious: the one event Job longs for—death—seems infinitely delayed, so that he is like a slave longing for the evening shadows (2). The only changes he knows are in the condition of his scabs, one day hardened over, another broken out with oozing pus (5).

11–16 Job has had two reasons for his astonishing request that God should let him alone (16). The first has been the misery of his life filled with pain (1–5); the second, the certainty of his approaching death (6–10). He has nothing more to lose. But what he has to complain of is that God, far from letting him alone, treats him like one of the legendary monsters of the deep, Yam (the sea) or Tannin (the monster of the deep), who had to be muzzled by God (cf. 38:8–11; Is. 51:9). It is ludicrous for God to imagine that Job poses any threat to his universe, yet he receives the same attention as did those forces of chaos (12).

17–18 In this bitter parody of Ps. 8, Job returns to the theme of disproportion (12). In the psalm, 'What is man?' expresses a thankful wonder that humans, apparently so insignificant on the scale of the universe, are the objects of the Almighty God's concern. In Job, 'What is man?' begins a reproof to God that God's attention to humans has not been for their benefit but has been a merciless scrutiny, a perpetual examination, an inexplicable cruelty, a sadistic torment.

19–21 Job is nothing but one of these insignificant humans. Suppose he really has sinned? Can that have done God so much harm that he must punish him so severely? In any case, Job will soon be dead. What harm can come to God if he defers the execution of punishment for a little? Not that human sin is trivial, but the supposed sin for which he is suffering cannot be worth so much of God's attention. Why does he not 'overlook' (rather than pardon) any offences Job is supposed to have committed? Job, we should notice, is not confessing to anything.

8:1–22 Bildad's first speech: 'If you are innocent you will not die'

Bildad, like all the friends, believes that suffering is punishment and that the death of Job's children is proof of their sin. Eliphaz assumed that Job was essentially a righteous man, though one being temporarily chastised by God for some fault such as mortals cannot avoid. But Bildad has less confidence in Job's righteousness. All of his encouragement to Job depends on the condition 'if you are pure and upright' (6). Bildad is not hostile to Job, but he urges him to search his conscience; for it is only through innocence that Job can be delivered from his calamities.

Most of Bildad's speech (8–19) develops the theme that there is no effect without a cause; the death of the wicked illustrates the theme. The speech concludes on a comparatively cheerful note (20–22), and his message to Job is: 'If you are innocent, you will not die.'

8:2–7 'Your children's death and yours'. Bildad's basic view is that God does not pervert justice (3). If God has sent suffering, there must have been some sin to deserve it. The case of Job's children proves Bildad's point: 'When your children sinned against him, he gave them over to the penalty of their sin' (4). By contrast, Job himself is not dead, so he must be innocent of anything deserving of death. Job has only to look to God in prayer (5) and if he is pure and upright his prayer will be heard. Everything is straightforward for Bildad: human destinies are entirely in accord with human merits.
